

NEW CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

NEW CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

SECOND EDITION

11
Pau-Red

THOMSON
—★—™
GALE

Detroit • New York • San Diego • San Francisco • Cleveland • New Haven, Conn. • Waterville, Maine • London • Munich

in association with
THE CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA • WASHINGTON, D.C.

The New Catholic Encyclopedia, Second Edition

Project Editors

Thomas Carson, Joann Cerrito

Editorial

Erin Bealmear, Jim Craddock, Stephen Cusack, Miranda Ferrara, Kristin Hart, Melissa Hill, Margaret Mazurkiewicz, Carol Schwartz, Christine Tomassini, Michael J. Tyrkus

Permissions

Edna Hedblad, Shalice Shah-Caldwell

Imaging and Multimedia

Randy Bassett, Dean Dauphinais, Robert Duncan, Leitha Etheridge-Sims, Mary K. Grimes, Lezlie Light, Dan Newell, David G. Oblender, Christine O'Bryan, Luke Rademacher, Pamela Reed

Product Design

Michelle DiMercurio

Data Capture

Civie Green

Manufacturing

Rhonda Williams

Indexing

Victoria Agee, Victoria Baker, Francine Cronshaw, Lynne Maday, Do Mi Stauber, Amy Suchowski

© 2003 by The Catholic University of America. Published by Gale. Gale is an imprint of The Gale Group, Inc., a division of Thomson Learning, Inc.

Gale and Design™ and Thomson Learning™ are trademarks used herein under license.

For more information, contact
The Gale Group, Inc.
27500 Drake Rd.
Farmington Hills, MI 48331-3535
Or you can visit our Internet site at <http://www.gale.com>

While every effort has been made to ensure the reliability of the information presented in this publication, The Gale Group, Inc. does not guarantee the accuracy of the data contained herein. The Gale Group, Inc. accepts no payment for listing; and inclusion in the publication of any organization, agency, institution, publication, service, or individual does not imply endorsement of the editors or publisher. Errors brought to the attention of the publisher and verified to the satisfaction of the publisher will be corrected in future editions.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS CATALOGING-IN-PUBLICATION DATA

New Catholic encyclopedia.—2nd ed.
p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and indexes.

ISBN 0-7876-4004-2

1. Catholic Church—Encyclopedias. I. Catholic University of America.

BX841 .N44 2002
282'.03—dc21
2002000924

ISBN: 0-7876-4004-2 (set)
0-7876-4005-0 (v. 1)
0-7876-4006-9 (v. 2)
0-7876-4007-7 (v. 3)
0-7876-4008-5 (v. 4)

0-7876-4009-3 (v. 5)
0-7876-4010-7 (v. 6)
0-7876-4011-5 (v. 7)
0-7876-4012-3 (v. 8)
0-7876-4013-1 (v. 9)

0-7876-4014-x (v. 10)
0-7876-4015-8 (v. 11)
0-7876-4016-6 (v. 12)
0-7876-4017-4 (v. 13)
0-7876-4018-2 (v. 14)
0-7876-4019-0 (v. 15)

Printed in the United States of America
10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

For The Catholic University of America Press

EDITORIAL STAFF

Executive Editor

Berard L. Marthaler, O.F.M.Conv., S.T.D., Ph.D.

Associate Editor

Gregory F. LaNave, Ph.D.

Assistant Editors

Jonathan Y. Tan, Ph.D.

Richard E. McCarron, Ph.D.

Editorial Assistant

Denis J. Obermeyer

Director of The Catholic University of America Press

David J. McGonagle, Ph.D.

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

John Borelli, Ph.D., Associate Director of Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, Washington, D.C.

Drew Christiansen, S.J., Ph.D., Senior Fellow, Woodstock Theological Center,
Washington, D.C.

Anne M. Clifford, C.S.J., Ph.D., Associate Professor of Theology, Duquesne University, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania

Raymond F. Collins, M.A., S.T.D.,
Professor of New Testament, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

Cyprian Davis, O.S.B., S.T.L., Ph.D.,
Professor of Church History, Saint Meinrad
School of Theology, Saint Meinrad, Indiana

Dennis M. Doyle, Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religious Studies, University of Dayton, Dayton, Ohio

Angelyn Dries, O.S.F., Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religious Studies, Cardinal
Stritch University, Milwaukee, Wisconsin

Arthur Espelage, O.F.M., J.C.D., Executive Coordinator, Canon Law Society of America, Washington, D.C.

Eugene J. Fisher, Ph.D., Associate Director of Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, United States
Conference of Catholic Bishops,
Washington, D.C.

Edward J. Furton, Ph.D., Editor-in-Chief,
The National Catholic Bioethics Quarterly,
Brighton, Massachusetts

James F. Garneau, Ph.D., Academic Dean,
The Pontifical College Josephinum,
Columbus, Ohio

J. A. Wayne Hellmann, O.F.M.Conv., Dr.
Theol., Professor of Theological Studies, St.
Louis University, St. Louis, Missouri

Joseph T. Kelley, Ph.D., D.Min., Director of the Center for Augustinian Study, Merrimack College, North Andover,
Massachusetts

Judith M. Kubicki, C.S.S.F., Ph.D.,
Assistant Professor of Theology, Fordham University, Bronx, New York

William P. Loewe, Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religion and Religious Education, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

Rose M. McDermott, S.S.J., J.C.D., Associate Professor of Canon Law, The Catholic University of America,
Washington, D.C.

R. Bruce Miller, M.S.L.S., Head,
Theology/Philosophy, Canon Law Libraries,
The Catholic University of America,
Washington, D.C.

Francis J. Moloney, S.D.B., S.T.L., S.S.L., D.Phil., Professor of Biblical Studies, The Catholic University of America,
Washington, D.C.

Katherine I. Rabenstein, B.S.F.S., Senior
Credentialing Specialist, American Nurses
Association, Washington, D.C.

Joel Rippinger, O.S.B., M.A., S.T.L., Subprior, Marmion Abbey, Aurora, Illinois

Foreword

This revised edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia represents a third generation in the evolution of the text that traces its lineage back to the Catholic Encyclopedia published from 1907 to 1912. In 1967, sixty years after the first volume of the original set appeared, The Catholic University of America and the McGraw-Hill Book Company joined together in organizing a small army of editors and scholars to produce the New Catholic Encyclopedia. Although planning for the NCE had begun before the Second Vatican Council and most of the 17,000 entries were written before Council ended, Vatican II enhanced the encyclopedia's value and importance. The research and the scholarship that went into the articles witnessed to the continuity and richness of the Catholic Tradition given fresh expression by Council. In order to keep the NCE current, supplementary volumes were published in 1972, 1978, 1988, and 1995. Now, at the beginning of the third millennium, The Catholic University of America is proud to join with The Gale Group in presenting a new edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia. It updates and incorporates the many articles from the 1967 edition and its supplements that have stood the test of time and adds hundreds of new entries.

As the president of The Catholic University of America, I cannot but be pleased at the reception the NCE has received. It has come to be recognized as an authoritative reference work in the field of religious studies and is praised for its comprehensive coverage of the Church's history and institutions. Although Canon Law no longer requires encyclopedias and reference works of this kind to receive an imprimatur before publication, I am confident that this new edition, like the original, reports accurate information about Catholic beliefs and practices. The editorial staff and their consultants were careful to present official Church teachings in a straightforward manner, and in areas where there are legitimate disputes over fact and differences in interpretation of events, they made every effort to insure a fair and balanced presentation of the issues.

The way for this revised edition was prepared by the publication, in 2000, of a Jubilee volume of the NCE, heralding the beginning of the new millennium. In my foreword to that volume I quoted Pope John Paul II's encyclical on Faith and Human Reason in which he wrote that history is "the arena where we see what God does for humanity." The New Catholic Encyclopedia describes that arena. It reports events, people, and ideas—"the things we know best and can verify most easily, the things of our everyday life, apart from which we cannot understand ourselves" (Fides et ratio, 12).

Finally, I want to express appreciation on my own behalf and on the behalf of the readers of these volumes to everyone who helped make this revision a reality. We are all indebted to The Gale Group and the staff of The Catholic University of America Press for their dedication and the alacrity with which they produced it.

Very Reverend David M. O'Connell, C.M., J.C.D.
President
The Catholic University of America

Preface to the Revised Edition

When first published in 1967 the New Catholic Encyclopedia was greeted with enthusiasm by librarians, researchers, and general readers interested in Catholicism. In the United States the NCE has been recognized as the standard reference work on matters of special interest to Catholics. In an effort to keep the encyclopedia current, supplementary volumes were published in 1972, 1978, 1988, and 1995. However, it became increasingly apparent that further supplements would not be adequate to this task. The publishers subsequently decided to undertake a thorough revision of the NCE, beginning with the publication of a Jubilee volume at the start of the new millennium.

Like the biblical scribe who brings from his store-room of knowledge both the new and the old, this revised edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia incorporates material from the 15-volume original edition and the supplement volumes. Entries that have withstood the test of time have been edited, and some have been amended to include the latest information and research. Hundreds of new entries have been added. For all practical purposes, it is an entirely new edition intended to serve as a comprehensive and authoritative work of reference reporting on the movements and interests that have shaped Christianity in general and Catholicism in particular over two millennia.

SCOPE

The title reflects its outlook and breadth. It is the New Catholic Encyclopedia, not merely a new encyclopedia of Catholicism. In addition to providing information on the doctrine, organization, and history of Christianity over the centuries, it includes information about persons, institutions, cultural phenomena, religions, philosophies, and social movements that have affected the Catholic Church from within and without. Accordingly, the NCE attends to the history and particular traditions of the Eastern Churches and the Churches of the Protestant Reformation, and other ecclesial communities. Christianity cannot be understood without exploring its roots in ancient Israel and Judaism, nor can the history of the medieval and modern Church be understood apart from its relationship with Islam. Inter-faith dialogue requires an appreciation of Buddhism and other world religions, as well as some knowledge of the history of religion in general.

On the assumption that most readers and researchers who use the NCE are individuals interested in Catholicism in general and the Church in North America in particular, its editorial content gives priority to the Western Church, while not neglecting the churches in the East; to Roman Catholicism, acknowledging much common history with Protestantism; and to Catholicism in the United States, recognizing that it represents only a small part of the universal Church.

Scripture, Theology, Patrology, Liturgy. The many and varied articles dealing with Sacred Scripture and specific books of the Bible reflect contemporary biblical scholarship and its concerns. The NCE highlights official church teachings as expressed by the Church's magisterium. It reports developments in theology, explains issues and introduces ecclesiastical writers from the early Church Fathers to present-day theologians whose works exercise major influence on the development of Christian thought. The NCE traces the evolution of the Church's worship with special emphasis on rites and rituals consequent to the liturgical reforms and renewal initiated by the Second Vatican Council.

Church History. From its inception Christianity has been shaped by historical circumstances and itself has become a historical force. The NCE presents the Church's history from a number of points of view against the background of general political and cultural history. The revised edition reports in some detail the Church's missionary activity as it grew from a small community in Jerusalem to the worldwide phenomenon it is today. Some entries, such as those dealing with the Middle Ages, the Reformation, and the Enlightenment, focus on major time-periods and movements that cut across geographical boundaries. Other articles describe the history and structure of the Church in specific areas, countries, and regions. There are separate entries for many dioceses and monasteries which by reason of antiquity, size, or influence are of special importance in ecclesiastical history, as there are for religious orders and congregations. The NCE rounds out its comprehensive history of the Church with articles on religious movements and biographies of individuals.

Canon and Civil Law. The Church inherited and has safeguarded the precious legacy of ancient Rome, described by Virgil, “to rule people under law, [and] to establish the way of peace.” The NCE deals with issues of ecclesiastical jurisprudence and outlines the development of legislation governing communal practices and individual obligations, taking care to incorporate and reference the 1983 Code of Canon Law throughout and, where appropriate, the Code of Canons for the Eastern Churches. It deals with issues of Church-State relations and with civil law as it impacts on the Church and Church’s teaching regarding human rights and freedoms.

Philosophy. The Catholic tradition from its earliest years has investigated the relationship between faith and reason. The NCE considers at some length the many and varied schools of ancient, medieval, and modern philosophy with emphasis, when appropriate, on their relationship to theological positions. It pays particular attention to the scholastic tradition, particularly Thomism, which is prominent in Catholic intellectual history. Articles on many major and lesser philosophers contribute to a comprehensive survey of philosophy from pre-Christian times to the present.

Biography and Hagiography. The NCE, making an exception for the reigning pope, leaves to other reference works biographical information about living persons. This revised edition presents biographical sketches of hundreds of men and women, Christian and non-Christian, saints and sinners, because of their significance for the Church. They include: Old and New Testament figures; the Fathers of the Church and ecclesiastical writers; pagan and Christian emperors; medieval and modern kings; heads of state and other political figures; heretics and champions of orthodoxy; major and minor figures in the Reformation and Counter Reformation; popes, bishops, and priests; founders and members of religious orders and congregations; lay men and lay women; scholars, authors, composers, and artists. The NCE includes biographies of most saints whose feasts were once celebrated or are currently celebrated by the universal church. The revised edition relies on Butler’s Lives of the Saints and similar reference works to give accounts of many saints, but the NCE also provides biographical information about recently canonized and beatified individuals who are, for one reason or another, of special interest to the English-speaking world.

Social Sciences. Social sciences came into their own in the twentieth century. Many articles in the NCE rely on data drawn from anthropology, economics, psychology and sociology for a better understanding of religious structures and behaviors. Papal encyclicals and pastoral letters of episcopal conferences are the source of principles and norms for Christian attitudes and practice in the field of social action and legislation. The NCE draws attention to the Church’s organized activities in pursuit of peace and justice, social welfare and human rights. The growth of the role of the laity in the work of the Church also receives thorough coverage.

ARRANGEMENT OF ENTRIES

The articles in the NCE are arranged alphabetically by the first substantive word using the word-by-word method of alphabetization; thus “New Zealand” precedes “Newman, John Henry,” and “Old Testament Literature” precedes “Oldcastle, Sir John.” Monarchs, patriarchs, popes, and others who share a Christian name and are differentiated by a title and numerical designation are alphabetized by their title and then arranged numerically. Thus, entries for Byzantine emperors Leo I through IV precede those for popes of the same name, while “Henry VIII, King of England” precedes “Henry IV, King of France.”

Maps, Charts, and Illustrations. The New Catholic Encyclopedia contains nearly 3,000 illustrations, including photographs, maps, and tables. Entries focusing on the Church in specific countries contain a map of the country as well as easy-to-read tables giving statistical data and, where helpful, lists of archdioceses and dioceses. Entries on the Church in U.S. states also contain tables listing archdioceses and dioceses where appropriate. The numerous photographs appearing in the New Catholic Encyclopedia help to illustrate the history of the Church, its role in modern societies, and the many magnificent works of art it has inspired.

SPECIAL FEATURES

Subject Overview Articles. For the convenience and guidance of the reader, the New Catholic Encyclopedia contains several brief articles outlining the scope of major fields: “Theology, Articles on,” “Liturgy, Articles on,” “Jesus Christ, Articles on,” etc.

Cross-References. The cross-reference system in the NCE serves to direct the reader to related material in other articles. The appearance of a name or term in small capital letters in text indicates that there is an article of that title elsewhere in the encyclopedia. In some cases, the name of the related article has been inserted at the appropriate point as a see reference: (see THOMAS AQUINAS, ST.). When a further aspect of the subject is treated under another title, a see also reference is placed at the end of the article. In addition to this extensive cross-reference system, the comprehensive index in volume 15 will greatly increase the reader's ability to access the wealth of information contained in the encyclopedia.

Abbreviations List. Following common practice, books and versions of the Bible as well as other standard works by selected authors have been abbreviated throughout the text. A guide to these abbreviations follows this preface.

The Editors

Abbreviations

The system of abbreviations used for the works of Plato, Aristotle, St. Augustine, and St. Thomas Aquinas is as follows: Plato is cited by book and Stephanus number only, e.g., Phaedo 79B; Rep. 480A. Aristotle is cited by book and Bekker number only, e.g., Anal. post. 72b 8–12; Anim. 430a 18. St. Augustine is cited as in the Thesaurus Linguae Latinae, e.g., C. acad. 3.20.45; Conf. 13.38.53, with capitalization of the first word of the title. St. Thomas is cited as in scholarly journals, but using Arabic numerals. In addition, the following abbreviations have been used throughout the encyclopedia for biblical books and versions of the Bible.

Books

Acts	Acts of the Apostles
Am	Amos
Bar	Baruch
1–2 Chr	1 and 2 Chronicles (1 and 2 Paralipomenon in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Col	Colossians
1–2 Cor	1 and 2 Corinthians
Dn	Daniel
Dt	Deuteronomy
Eccl	Ecclesiastes
Eph	Ephesians
Est	Esther
Ex	Exodus
Ez	Ezekiel
Ezr	Ezra (Esdras B in Septuagint; 1 Esdras in Vulgate)
Gal	Galatians
Gn	Genesis
Hb	Habakkuk
Heb	Hebrews
Hg	Haggai
Hos	Hosea
Is	Isaiah
Jas	James
Jb	Job
Jdt	Judith
Jer	Jeremiah
Jgs	Judges
Jl	Joel
Jn	John
1–3 Jn	1, 2, and 3 John
Jon	Jonah
Jos	Joshua

Jude	Jude
1–2 Kgs	1 and 2 Kings (3 and 4 Kings in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Lam	Lamentations
Lk	Luke
Lv	Leviticus
Mal	Malachi (Malachias in Vulgate)
1–2 Mc	1 and 2 Maccabees
Mi	Micah
Mk	Mark
Mt	Matthew
Na	Nahum
Neh	Nehemiah (2 Esdras in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Nm	Numbers
Ob	Obadiah
Phil	Philippians
Phlm	Philemon
Prv	Proverbs
Ps	Psalms
1–2 Pt	1 and 2 Peter
Rom	Romans
Ru	Ruth
Rv	Revelation (Apocalypse in Vulgate)
Sg	Song of Songs
Sir	Sirach (Wisdom of Ben Sira; Ecclesiasticus in Septuagint and Vulgate)
1–2 Sm	1 and 2 Samuel (1 and 2 Kings in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Tb	Tobit
1–2 Thes	1 and 2 Thessalonians
Ti	Titus
1–2 Tm	1 and 2 Timothy
Wis	Wisdom
Zec	Zechariah
Zep	Zephaniah

Versions

Apoc	Apocrypha
ARV	American Standard Revised Version
ARVm	American Standard Revised Version, margin
AT	American Translation
AV	Authorized Version (King James)
CCD	Confraternity of Christian Doctrine
DV	Douay-Challoner Version

ABBREVIATIONS

ERV	English Revised Version	NJB	New Jerusalem Bible
ERVm	English Revised Version, margin	NRSV	New Revised Standard Version
EV	English Version(s) of the Bible	NT	New Testament
JB	Jerusalem Bible	OT	Old Testament
LXX	Septuagint	RSV	Revised Standard Version
MT	Masoretic Text	RV	Revised Version
NAB	New American Bible	RVm	Revised Version, margin
NEB	New English Bible	Syr	Syriac
NIV	New International Version	Vulg	Vulgate

P

PAUCAPALEA

Author of early glosses and a Summa on the Decretum of GRATIAN. His work was written before 1148 when it is referred to in the Summa Rolandi, which is of that date. We know practically nothing about him, the dates of his birth and death, his place of origin, etc. It seems certain that he taught at Bologna, where it is possible he had been a student of Gratian. He was responsible for some of the earliest paleae, or additions, to the Decretum of Gratian; the division of parts I and III into distinctiones appears also to be his work. He gives evidence of a good knowledge of Roman law and is a canonist of some competence. His Summa is also characterized by the many historiae or exegesis of passages of Scripture already noted in the Decretum. His work is frequently referred to by canonists after his time. For example, the author of the Summa Parisiensis mentions him by name about 20 times and seems to have had his work constantly before him. From time immemorial Paucapalea has been called “the first decretist.” More recently that title has been challenged seriously and perhaps successfully. He now appears to have made use of one or two earlier works on the Decretum that have lately come to the attention of scholars.

Bibliography: Die Summa des Paucapalea über das Decretum Gratiani, ed. J. F. SCHULTE (Giessen 1890). A. VETULANI, “Le Décret de Gratien et les premiers décrétistes . . .,” Studia Gratiana 7 (1959) 273–353; “Nouvelles vues sur le Décret de Gratien,” La Potogne au Xe Congrès international des sciences historiques à Rome (Warsaw 1955) 83–105. G. FRANSEN, “La date du Décret de Gratien,” Revue d’histoire ecclésiastique 51 (1956) 521–531. S. KUTTNER, Repertorium der Kanonistik (Rome 1937). F. MAASSEN, “Paucapalea: ein Beitrag zur Literargeschichte des canonischen Rechts im Mittelalter,” Sitzungsberichte der Akademie der Wissenschaften in Wien 31 (1859) 449–516. A. MOCCI, “Documenti inediti sui canonista Paucapalea,” Atti della Reale Accademia delle scienze di Torino 40 (1905) 316–326.

[T. P. MCLAUGHLIN]

PAUL, APOSTLE, ST.

In his apostolate to the Hellenistic world St. Paul traveled extensively from Jerusalem to Rome, preaching, teaching, and founding churches in the name of Christ. His principal message was that both Jew and Gentile, through faith and acceptance of the gospel, could enter into redemptive solidarity with the risen Christ. In the labors and perils of his ministry Paul drew strength from his personal life in Christ, the urgency of his gospel, and an indomitable will. During Paul’s lifetime, and chiefly through his ministry, the hesitant and uncertain group of Jesus’ disciples made its decisive break with Judaism and turned its energies to the worldwide mission of converting all men to Christ. The Church entered fully into the Gentile world. Paul’s conversion was not merely a call to personal sanctification; it was both a germinal source to aid Paul in the maturation of his gospel and an apocalyptic command to carry that gospel to the ends of the earth before the imminent return of Christ. Characteristic of Paul’s preaching was his emphasis on the risen Christ as the center of a new existence radically transformed by the death and Resurrection of Christ—a reality Paul experienced through his transformation “into Christ.”

This article is divided into three main sections treating, in order, of St. Paul’s life, personality, and theology.

LIFE

After treating of the sources on which any account of the life and teachings of St. Paul must be based, a summary will be given here, first of the chronology of his life, and then of his youth, his role as a persecutor of the Church, his conversion, his apostolic activity, his imprisonments, and his last years and death.

Literary Sources. St. Luke’s Acts of the Apostles (7.58; 8.3; 9.1–30; 11.25–30; 12.25; 13.1–28.31) and the Epistles of St. Paul are the only reliable accounts of Paul’s life. The 20th century saw extensive debates about whether all 14 Pauline Epistles except the Epistle to the HEBREWS (held by most exegetes to be the work of a disciple of Paul) should be attributed to Paul. The prevailing scholarly conclusion is that only Romans, First and Second Corinthians, Galatians, and (with some exceptions), First Thessalonians, Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon are authentic. Second Thessalonians, Ephesians, First and Second Timothy, and Titus are recognized as Pauline in the sense that they contain Pauline elements, and are perhaps the work of a Pauline school. (For the apocryphal Acti Pauli, see The Catholic Encyclopedia [New York 1907–22] 11:567.)

The burial of SS. Peter and Paul, 11th century fresco in the church of San Piero, in Grado, near Pisa, Italy.

Paul's Epistles were both letters (substitutes for conversation) and epistles (formal literary compositions), occasioned by the needs and conflicts of the early Christian communities. As such they became normative in Church development. These sources outline the occasions and become the very manifestation of Paul's gospel (i.e., Jesus revealed through the life of Paul).

The relation between Acts and the Epistles is as interesting as it is complex. Most modern scholars agree that Acts is best read for historical purposes in the light of the Epistles, not conversely. The Epistles give many historical details and personal insights into the providential growth and transformation of Paul. Much of this information is not in Acts. (For difficulties in the Acts-Epistles relationship, see Munck, 78–86.) Yet, the multiple purposes of the ACTS OF THE APOSTLES can cross-fertilize the Epistles. Information on the last years and deaths of the Apostles come only from early tradition.

Chronology. The proconsulship of Junius Annaeus Gallio in Achaia dates very probably between the spring of A.D. 52 and the spring of A.D. 53 (see Acts 18.12–17). The assumption by Festus of the procuratorship in Judea occurred in A.D. 59 or 60 (see Acts 25.1). Paul was arrested in Jerusalem around Pentecost of A.D. 58 and taken to Rome between the fall of A.D. 60 and the spring of A.D. 61. The specific dates in the following narrative of Paul's life are based on these assumptions (see A. Wikenhauser, New Testament Introduction 360–361).

Youth. Paul was born, probably, a few years after the birth of Jesus, into a double world symbolized by his double name: Saul-Paul. Under Jewish parents of the tribe of Benjamin (Rom 11.1; Phil 3.5), Saul became a "Hebrew of the Hebrews" (Phil 3.5), conscientiously instructed in strict Pharisaic tenets and intensely loyal to religious traditions. At the age of five he would have learned the principal contents of the law (cf. Dt 5–6). At six he would have attended the "Vineyard," a kindergarten attached to the synagogue. Studying the Scriptures until the age of ten, he would be introduced to the oral law and its multiple prescriptions (the MISHNAH). But Paul was also a Roman citizen born in Tarsus of Cilicia, a bustling maritime center of Hellenistic culture (Gal 1.14; 2.15; Acts 22.3; 25.12), so that in his boyhood he also absorbed a certain amount of Greek culture. His Epistles manifest youthful interest in wrestling, military drills, parades, and games.

At the age of 15 Saul went to the temple college in Jerusalem under the venerated GAMALIEL to learn the subtleties of rabbinic teaching with its mass of legal interpretations (HALAKAH) and folklore literature (HAGGADAH).

It was an obligation of the PHARISEE and the duty of an ordained rabbi to marry. But 1 Cor 7.7 seems to indicate that Paul never did. One unmarried rabbi justified himself thus: "What shall I do? My soul cleaves to the Torah. Let others keep the world going." As a Christian, Paul looked upon his celibacy as a mystical betrothal to Christ and the Church.

Since a trade was needed by rabbis, who were not allowed to make money in giving instructions on the Law,

The first two journeys of St. Paul. The first journey began in Antioch; the second, in Jerusalem.

Saul learned the trade of “maker of tent cloth” (Acts 18.3).

Persecutor of the Early Church. About A.D. 34, in Jerusalem, Stephen, full of grace and power, was preaching the risen Christ (Acts 7); eventually, he was stoned to death. Paul, the Scribe witness, “approved of his death” (Acts 7.60). Stephen had prayed, “Lord, do not lay this sin against them.” Later Augustine said, “If Stephen had not prayed thus, the Church would not have had Paul” [see STEPHEN (PROTOMARTYR), ST.].

Stephen’s death signaled one of the bloodiest persecutions against the infant Church. Zealous for the traditions of his fathers (Gal 1.14), Paul became grand inquisitor for the persecution, since he clearly saw Christianity as mortal enemy to Jewish legalistic tradition (Gal 1.13–23; 1 Cor 15.9). That the Mosaic Law was now supplanted by a new Christian dispensation seemed an outrageous blasphemy. Given spies, temple soldiers, and legal authority, “Saul was harassing the church; entering house after house; and dragging out men and women, he committed them to prison” (Acts 8.3).

Conversion. In the midst of his hostile activity against the emerging Church, Paul was unexpectedly converted to Christ. The most remarkable note of Paul’s conversion was its suddenness. It was hardly expected that the zealous Pharisee, Saul, as he set out from Jerusalem armed with letters to harass the young Christian community of Damascus, would enter that city a convert and disciple of Jesus. Yet, on the outskirts of the city Paul, favored by grace with a miraculous and objective vision of Christ, heard the words, “Saul, Saul, why dost thou persecute me?” (Acts 9.4). “Who art thou, Lord?” was almost a rhetorical question; he already knew the answer that he would hear: “I am Jesus whom thou art persecuting.” One of Paul’s most characteristic teachings, the doctrine of the MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST, finds its genesis here. A light from without blazed forth within him, “the light of the knowledge of the glory of God on the face of Christ” (2 Cor 4.6). Already a slave of Christ, Paul inquired, “Lord, what wilt thou have me do?” (Acts 9.6). He now realized that it was a matter, “not of him who wills nor of him who runs, but of God showing mercy” (Rom 9.16). The Lord simply directed Paul to Ananias, and Ananias baptized him.

St. Paul. (Archive Photos)

The high altar of the Basilica of St. Paul-Outside-the-Walls, Rome, over the traditional site of the grave of the Apostle. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

Although there is no direct evidence for it, it is possible that Paul, haunted by the fear of sin and subconsciously but deeply impressed by the holy deaths of men such as Stephen (Acts 7.55–60; 26.10–11), may thereby have been prepared for his liberating encounter with Christ. But Paul himself regarded his conversion as an ἔκτρομα, “untimely birth” (1 Cor 15.8). Suddenly he was freed from the uncanny power of the Law that had held him in psychological bondage. His was an utterly unexpected birth into the power of Him who was dead and risen.

The blindness that followed this event and remained for several days was probably the natural result of his psychological collapse. Possibly, Luke “baptizes” the ancient notion that blindness befalls the man who gazes on the divine. While all three accounts of Paul’s conversion (Acts 9.3–9; 22.6–11; 26.13–18) agree in substance, they differ in detail because of the literary forms and differences of polemic, purpose, and author in each case [see D. Stanley, Catholic Biblical Quarterly 15 (1953) 315–338].

Apostolic Activity. St. Paul’s apostolic ministry, as far as it is known from the NT, can be conveniently divided into four main periods: (1) early years, A.D. 34 to 47; (2) first missionary journey, A.D. 47 to 49; (3) second missionary journey, A.D. 50 to 52; (4) third missionary journey, A.D. 53 to 58.

Early Years in the Apostolate. No psychology of religion can fully explain the profound reconstruction of Paul’s religious world whereby another Person took possession of him in an experience of mystic death to the old and resurrection to the new. At first there must have been a clearing away of the debris of his old world, while the new life in Christ was being built up within him. Yet nothing worthwhile, cosmopolitan polish, intellectual acuity, or vitality, was lost. For many years the process of conversion continued. An inner change, both intellectual and emotional, was wrought in him because of Christ, whose new life he now lived: "I count everything loss because of the excelling knowledge of Jesus Christ, my Lord, for whose sake I have suffered the loss of all things" (Phil 3.8).

In Gal 1.17 Paul says that immediately after his Baptism he retired into Arabia, i.e., the semidesert Nabataean country southeast of Damascus, and there spent three years, while his "knowledge of the mystery of Christ" (Eph 3.4) grew deeper. At the end of this period he returned to Damascus, where he preached "that Jesus is the Son of God" (Acts 9.20). But when the Jews of Damascus made a plot to kill him, he escaped from the city by being lowered over its walls in a large basket—an incident of which he later boasted as evidence of his human weakness (2 Cor 11.32–33).

From Damascus Paul went to Jerusalem, where BARNABAS introduced him to Peter and the other Apostles (Acts 9.25–29; Gal 1.18–19). After two weeks spent in preaching to the HELLENISTS of Jerusalem, however, another Jewish plot compelled him to leave the city. This time he retired to his native Tarsus (Gal 1.21; Acts 9.26–30), where the process of his transformation continued. These years seem to have been for Paul a time of training, while he waited for a new command from the Lord. Through reflection and prayer he was developing and maturing his gospel. His total involvement in the dead and risen Christ absorbed him to a point where his own personality found wholeness in the reality of Christ risen in him. Thus it was at this time that he had the famous ecstatic vision of which he later wrote in 2 Cor 12.1–7.

The earliest spread of Christianity was less through intentional missionary journeys than through the storm of persecution that scattered the first believers. Some went to Antioch, the capital of Syria, which was destined soon to become more important than Jerusalem as the center of the Church in the East. About the year 44 Barnabas was sent by the Apostles at Jerusalem to act as their representative in the Christian community at Antioch. When he saw the constant growth of believers in this city, he went to Tarsus, found Paul, and brought him back with him to Antioch to help him there in the ministry. In this community of predominantly Gentile Christians, Barnabas and Paul were blessed with great success (Acts 11.25–26). A few years later this community commissioned the two to bring the "famine collection" to Jerusalem for the relief of the brethren there (Acts 11.27–30; perhaps also in Gal 2.1–10).

First Missionary Journey. After their return from Jerusalem, Barnabas and Paul, with John Mark (see MARK, EVANGELIST, ST.), Barnabas's nephew, acting as their assistant, were commissioned by the Antioch community, under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, to preach the gospel beyond the confines of Syria. Thus Paul began his first missionary journey (A.D. 47–49: Acts 13.1–14.27). The missionaries sailed first to the island of Cyprus, Barnabas's homeland (Acts 4.36). There the proconsul Sergius Paulus, who resided at Paphos, was converted to Christianity. From this point on in Acts, the Apostle is no longer mentioned by his Hebrew name Saul; apparently he now preferred to be known by his Greco-Roman name Paul, either in honor of his first important convert, Sergius Paulus, or more likely, to indicate by his "Gentile" name that his apostolate was now primarily to the Gentiles (Gal 2.7–9; Rom 15.16). Now, also, the leadership passed from Barnabas to Paul; the phrase in Acts is no longer "Barnabas and Saul," but "Paul and Barnabas."

From Cyprus the three missionaries journeyed onward into the southern part of central Asia Minor, where at Perga, because of some disagreement, John Mark turned back. Paul and Barnabas evangelized the southern region of the Roman province of GALATIA, including the key cities of ANTIOCH in Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe. At Lystra Paul was stoned and left half dead (see also 2 Tm 3.11), perhaps then receiving the wounds whose scars he called the στίγματα, "tattoo" or "brand marks," that marked him as the slave of the Lord Jesus (Gal 6.17). In spite of Jewish hostility, the missionaries were so successful that on the return journey they appointed PRESBYTERS and organized the Christian communities as they passed through the same cities.

The rapid spread of Christianity among the Gentiles brought on a crisis in the Church. A strong Judaistic movement in Jerusalem demanded that Gentile Christians should be circumcised and made to observe the Mosaic Law. Paul clearly saw the practical consequences of this. If the movement prevailed, Christianity would be turned into a merely Jewish sect that Gentiles would be loath to enter, or it would be split into a Judeo-Christian Church and a Gentile-Christian Church. But what was much more fundamental, Paul saw in the position of the Judaizers a repudiation of the very basis of Christianity—that man is saved by faith in Jesus Christ and not by the observance of any law, even though after initial salvation man is not without the law of Christ (Gal 6.2).

When the Judaistic demands were forced on the Christian community at Antioch, Paul and Barnabas were sent to Jerusalem to request a settlement of the dispute. The resultant meeting of these envoys from Antioch with the Apostles and presbyters in Jerusalem is commonly known as the Council of JERUSALEM.

According to some exegetes, Paul wrote his Epistle to the GALATIANS shortly before he left Antioch, or even on his way to Jerusalem, to attend this meeting. These scholars argue that in this epistle, which is primarily concerned with this dispute, there is not the slightest reference to any decision having been given on it at Jerusalem and that the dispute between Peter and Paul at Antioch mentioned in Gal 2.11–14 would hardly be possible after the Council of Jerusalem. Yet, because of the great similarity between Galatians (especially 3.1–4.31) and Romans (especially 4.1–25), which was written c. A.D. 57, most exegetes hold that Galatians could not have been written before A.D. 54.

In any case, the Council of Jerusalem (A.D. 49 or 50) decided that no burden should be laid on the Gentile converts except abstinence from meat offered to idols (for Paul's authentic interpretation of this see 1 Cor 10.25–30; Rom 14.14–23), from immorality, and from blood and meat containing blood. In spite of the decree, the hostility and agitation of the Judaizers continued to hound Paul throughout the rest of his life.

Second Missionary Journey. Shortly after the Council of Jerusalem Paul began his second missionary journey (A.D. 50–52: Acts 15.36–18.22). Barnabas wanted to bring his nephew Mark along, but Paul refused. Thus, the original mission team was dissolved. Barnabas and Mark journeyed again to Cyprus, while Paul took with him SILAS, valuable as a Roman citizen and a member of the mother church in Jerusalem. Paul revisited the Christian communities of (south) Galatia and at Lystra chose TIMOTHY (whom he circumcised for acceptance by the Jews) to be his constant companion and secretary. From here they traveled westward into Phrygia and northward along the western border of Galatia. They would have continued further north into Bithynia had they not been prevented by the Holy Spirit. Turning westward, then, through Mysia, they came to Troas on the coast, where Luke joined them (see LUKE, EVANGELIST, ST.). In obedience to a vision, Paul crossed the sea to Macedonia. Europe, grown sick of paganism, was calling him. Paul established vigorous Christian communities at Philippi, Thessalonica, and Beroea in spite of Judaistic hatred, which brought scourging and imprisonment at Philippi and persecution elsewhere.

Paul came to Athens by chance. Awaiting the arrival there of Timothy and Silas, he defended monotheism in a scholarly discourse before the Stoic and Epicurean philosophers on the AREOPAGUS; but results were small when he announced the risen Christ as judge of the whole world. Resolved henceforth to depend entirely on Christ and His power, not on polemic ability, he founded a large community at Corinth (1 Cor 1–2), where he worked for a year and a half (from about the beginning of A.D. 50 to the summer of A.D. 51). Here he was assisted by PRISCA (PRISCILLA) AND AQUILA (Rom 16.3; 2 Tm 4.19), a Jewish married couple expelled from Rome under edict of Emperor Claudius. Soon after his arrival at Corinth Paul wrote the First and Second Epistles to the THESSALONIANS.

Third Missionary Journey. Not long after Paul's return to Antioch, a third missionary journey (A.D. 53–58) led him back to the Christian communities of Galatia and Phrygia (Acts 18.23). At EPHEBUS he worked for three years (Acts 19.1–40; 20.31), successfully building up the Mystical Body. Here he wrote the First Epistle to the CORINTHIANS and, according to the more common opinion, Galatians. Finally, led by Demetrius, the silversmiths, whose income from their images of Diana (Artemis) decreased with Paul's preaching, instigated a riot that forced him to leave Ephesus [see DIANA (ARTEMIS) OF THE EPHESIANS]. He revisited Macedonia (where he wrote his Second Epistle to the Corinthians) and Corinth, a hotbed of problems, in which Paul became dramatically involved (2 Cor 1–7; 10–13). Here he wrote his Epistle to the ROMANS in preparation for his proposed visit to Rome (Acts 19.21).

In the spring of A.D. 58 he returned to Philippi, where he celebrated the Passover. At Miletus he bade farewell to the presbyters of Ephesus. Despite numerous warnings at CAESAREA in Palestine (e.g., the prophetic symbolic actions of AGABUS: Acts 21.10–11) and his own sinister forebodings (Rom 15.31; Acts 20.22; 21.13), Paul delivered the collection for the poor of Jerusalem (Rom 15.25–29).

Imprisonments. In 2 Corinthians, written in A.D. 57, Paul says that he was "in prisons frequently" (2 Cor 11.23). Although direct evidence is lacking, it seems probable that one of these imprisonments was at Ephesus during his third missionary journey (see 1 Cor 15.32); and it is possible that the so-called CAPTIVITY EPISTLES were written at the time of this imprisonment. However, there is certain knowledge only of his imprisonments at Jerusalem, Caesarea, and Rome.

At Jerusalem and Caesarea. Advised by James, Paul accompanied and paid the expenses of four men who were completing their vows as NAZIRITES in Jerusalem. Here the Judaizers from the province of Asia stirred up a riot, accusing him of bringing a Gentile Christian (Trophimus) into the inner court of the temple. The Roman soldiers took him, as a Roman citizen, into protective custody. As Jewish hostility mounted, Lysias, the Roman commander at Jerusalem, had Paul taken to Caesarea, where the governor resided. Here Paul was kept in confinement for two years (A.D. 58–60) by the governor Marcus Antonius FELIX. But Porcius FESTUS, successor of Felix, became inclined to accede to the wishes of the Sanhedrin that Paul should be returned to Jerusalem for trial. Knowing that Sanhedrin justice would mean death, Paul exercised his right as a Roman citizen: he appealed to Caesar.

At Rome. To Rome, therefore, Paul was sent, and on the voyage he suffered shipwreck at Malta (Acts 27). For another two years he was “imprisoned” in “house custody” (custodia libera), allowed to rent his own dwelling, to receive visitors, and to preach the Gospel to them.

Last Years. With Paul’s two-year imprisonment in Rome the Book of Acts comes to an end. A tradition of the early Church presupposes that Paul was set free. According to Clement of Rome (Pope CLEMENT I) Paul journeyed “to the end of the West” (1 Clem 5.5–7), i.e., Spain. The MURATORIAN CANON (lines 38–39) and the apocryphal Acts of Peter (1 and 3) repeat the same tradition.

The PASTORAL EPISTLES, if authentic, indicate that Paul revisited his missionary territory in the east, leaving TITUS and Timothy in Crete and Ephesus, respectively, with full authority to combat error and organize the Church there (Ti 1.5; 1 Tm 1.3). Whether the Spanish or eastern journey came first is uncertain. Once more, however, Paul was arrested and imprisoned in Rome, this time more strictly, and finally his desire “to depart and be with Christ” (Phil 1.23) was fulfilled by martyrdom in the reign of Nero (A.D. 67 according to Eusebius; A.D. 64 according to Clement of Rome and Tertullian). According to ancient, reliable tradition, Paul was beheaded at a place called Ad Aquas Salvias on the Ostian Road (Via Ostiensis), a short distance southwest of Rome, and buried along the same road, but somewhat nearer the city, in an area shown by archeological excavations to have been a pagan cemetery of the 1st and 2d centuries. The Basilica of St. Paul-Outside-the-Walls, erected over the Apostle’s tomb by Constantine the Great, was enlarged and restored several times, most recently after a disastrous fire in the 19th century.

PERSONALITY

St. Paul’s personality will be considered here from the viewpoint both of his character and physical condition and of his qualities as a writer.

Character and Physical Condition. Paul’s natural temperament and character indicate, above all, a profoundly inspired religious spirit. As a Jew, he was led by his dedication to the Law zealously to persecute the Church. As a Christian, he adhered to Christ by heroically giving himself to all men. Paul was also a powerful dialectician, as shown by the march of his ideas in Romans, with the native temper of a debater. His dialectic method is clear but could lead to misunderstanding through exaggeration (e.g., in condemning the Law or in taking a dim view of human nature). Yet he possessed exquisite sensibility and an overall charm revealing his capacity for weakness, fear, and discouragement (e.g., 1 Cor 2.3; 2 Cor 1.8). His letters, especially Second Corinthians and Galatians, reflect depths of emotional response—the fears, hopes, affection, indignation by which his soul was torn and tossed. This lively play of emotion, expressed by look and gesture (e.g., Acts 13.9; 14.12–14; 20.34; 23.1–6; 26.1; see also Gal 3.1; Phil 3.18), was firmly controlled by judgment; he ascribed his effectiveness to the Spirit of Christ possessing him (2 Cor 13.3–4; Col 1.29; 1 Thes 1.5, etc.).

However, the qualities of Paul’s character are best perceived as he functions in his ministry. Paul was a man of vision who developed the profound reality of the cosmic Christ, dead and alive, into an original system of thought called Pauline theology. Paul’s mind was “essentially intuitive” (P. van Imschoot), grasping religious truths by direct contemplation rather than by intellectual reasoning. Paul was a mystic who penetrated deeply the inner reality of all things in Christ. His profound experience of seeing all “in Christ” sustained him through 30 years of extraordinary hardship and safeguarded him from the intemperances of the fanatic. Paul was an ascetic who steeled himself (1 Cor 9.27; 2 Cor 6.5), in spite of a nervous temperament, to endure all things for Christ. His will, aflame with love, dominated all circumstances and surmounted all difficulties. Paul was a pastor who manifested the tenderness of his Master in solicitude deep and total: “Who is made to stumble and I am not inflamed?” (2 Cor 11.29). Warmhearted, natural affection for others was joined to his all-consuming love for Christ. Paul was an organizer who combined born leadership with courage and critical tact. He was able to resist the authority of Barnabas (Acts 15.37–40) as well as to confront publicly the authority of Peter (Gal 2.11–14). With leaders selected by careful judgment, Paul solidly established community after community in ample evidence of his power to organize. Timothy and Titus, two powerful bishops, became extensions of his dynamic personality. All of these qualities combined to make Paul a missionary whose overwhelming desire was to bring Christ to all men. To this purpose he tirelessly spent himself.

Paul’s personality reflects and yet transcends its many sources: Pharisaic upbringing firmly rooted in his religious heritage; Greek formation with its love of freedom; rabbinic training with its dialectic; mystic experiences; and the Christian catechesis. It was his personal encounter with the Lord that transformed these various potentials into a unified revelation of God's Son. This absorption in Christ, in whom all things have their meaning (Col 1.15–20), made Paul tolerant of everything beautiful, simple, honorable, and true (Phil 4.8).

Physically, Paul has been traditionally stylized as short, bald, with thick beard and prominent nose, with eyebrows meeting and legs somewhat bowed, but, on the whole, a distinguished man of dignified bearing. This description, found in the apocryphal Acts of Paul, derives from the legend of Paul and Thecla and is unflattering enough to be authentic (cf. 2 Cor 10.10; 12.6). His reference to a certain affliction that he calls a “thorn in the flesh” (2 Cor 12.7) refers more likely to the persecution he suffered, especially from the Judaizers, than to any physical ailment.

Paul as a Writer. If, as both Horace and Quintilian maintain, true eloquence is the fruit of feeling and strong conviction, not of literary artifice, Paul is sublimely eloquent. Although his style abounds in anacolutha, ellipses, and similar stylistic liberties, Paul is an artist who often and unconsciously creates great literature (e.g., Rom 8.28–39; 2 Cor 6.1–10; 11.21–29). Burning with zeal to shout out the “good news,” Paul may forget grammatical sequence, but he always delivers his message with force (e.g., Phil 3.1–14), frequently in the style of the Greek diatribe (Rom 3.1–20). Inflamed with love for Christ and all men in Him, Paul's letters betray indifference to none, least of all to his fellow Jews who rejected Jesus Christ.

Paul writes in a compressed style. His pet phrase, “in Christ” (used about 50 times), is a gospel in itself. A thousand ideas clamor for expression. Unified in an ever-changing mosaic of Christ, they are permeated with compelling conviction. Frequently, this pressure of crowding thoughts is forced into tight summaries. Paul is not a stylist with the studied eloquence of his time. His interest is not in words of wisdom but in the wisdom of the Word (1 Cor 1.17–2.5). In an effort to describe the indescribable impact of union with Christ, Paul impressed his creative personality on the Greek he used, giving new meaning to some words, at times even coining words or new combinations [for further discussion, see B. McGrath, Catholic Biblical Quarterly 14 (1952) 219–26].

Paul should be interpreted, not only against the background of his Greek world, but also, and primarily, in the context of OT thought processes. Paul thought and spoke cultured Greek, but his literary background was almost exclusively the OT and other Jewish writings. He used Greek words with their Septuagint (LXX) meaning, his thought patterns following Jewish tradition. For example, the body-soul-spirit relation is not Greek but Hebrew; the body (σῶμα, Heb. bāśār, “flesh”), soul (ψυχή, Heb. nepeš), and spirit (πνεῦμα, Heb. rūah) are, accordingly, three phases of an indivisible unity.

Paul, as a “Christian rabbi” (J. Bonsirven), saw Scripture alive only in Christ, who is the revolutionary fulfillment of God's plan and power. Christ is the life-giving spirit of the letter of the OT (2 Cor 3.6, 17). Yet in Paul's use of the Scriptures—quotations (some 80), allusions, and reminiscences abound—Paul can be understood only in light of the Palestinian exegetical tradition that concerned itself more with applied adaptation and messianism of texts than with the literal sense. Thus, frequently in rabbinic fashion, Paul transcends not only historical accounts (e.g., Gal 4.21–31) but also the Prophets (Rom 1.17; 2.24) and the Psalms (Rom 10.8; Acts 13.33) in his determination to proclaim only Christ. Even though Paul is steeped in rabbinic interpretations of Hebrew Scripture, it is the LXX he uses; the Hebrew text, where it differs from the LXX, is quoted only five times.

THEOLOGY

The religious teaching of the Apostle of the Gentiles will be considered here, first in the sources from which he derived it, then as he presented it in his “gospel,” and finally in the important role that it played in the Church.

Sources. The teachings of St. Paul are primarily based on those of the OT, with certain of the OT doctrines as interpreted by the Pharisaic rabbis of his time. What is typically Christian in his teachings he owes partly to the teachings of Jesus as interpreted by the early Church and partly to the revelations that he received directly from God in his mystical experiences.

Jewish Pharisaic Beliefs. The doctrines of providence and the divine ordering of the world, reward and punishment beyond the grave, the resurrection of the dead, the Decalogue, charity toward God and men, belief in angels and demons—these were all a part of the spiritual patrimony Paul inherited as a Jew and a Pharisee. From the Bible Paul acquired the deep sense of God and the sense of sin—the religious attitude that was the treasure of Judaism.

There are striking similarities between Paul and the members of the QUMRAN COMMUNITY—expressions (e.g., “earthen vessels,” “a share in the heritage of the sons”), ideas (e.g., mystery, revelation, knowledge, distinction between light and darkness, the theology of the spirit), and names (e.g., Belial and Satan disguised as an angel of light: see 2 Cor 6.14–18). Yet this similarity in terms and concepts derives mostly from the use of the OT Scriptures common to both Paul and the Qumranites.

Teachings of Jesus and Belief of the Early Church. The 19th-century rationalists saw radical differences between Jesus and Paul. Now, however, it is agreed that these apparent differences are complementary, one to the other, and not opposed. Paul is now seen in full accord with the teachings of Jesus, explicitly in 1 Cor 7.10 (cf. Mt 5.32); 1 Cor 9.14 (cf. Lk 10.7); 1 Cor 11.23–25 (cf. Mt 26.26–29; Lk 22.15–19); cf. also 1 Thes 4.8 with Lk 10.6; Gal 4.17 with Lk 11.52; 1 Cor 4.12–13 and Rom 12.14 with Lk 6.27; 1 Cor 5.4 with Mt 18.20; 1 Cor 13.3 with Lk 12.33; 2 Cor 10.1 with Mt 11.29; Rom 2.1 and 14.13 with Mt 7.1; Rom 14.14 with Mt 15.11; Rom 16.19 with Mt 10.16. The Gospel stress on love (ἀγάπη) is Paul's "way" (1 Cor 13.1–13). The traditions (παράδοσεις) of the early Church are reflected by Paul in 1 Cor 11.23 and 15.3. He gives details of Christ's earthly life (1 Cor 11.23; 15.3–7; 2 Cor 5.21; 8.9; Gal 4.4–5; Phil 2.5–11; Rom 1.3; 8.3; 1 Thes 2.15), His authority (1 Cor 7.10, 12, 25; 1 Thes 4.2–8, 15; 1 Cor 15.24; Acts 20.35), and His teaching (1 Cor 11.25; 9.14; 7.10). Paul determined to transmit the sacred deposit of revelation intact and free from error (Eph 4.14–15; Col 2.7–8; 1 Tm 2.5–7; 6.20; 2 Tm 1.14).

Revelations of Paul. In essence, Paul received everything from "the face of Christ Jesus" at his inaugural vision. Other revelations (or sacred traditions) deepened the Damascus experience or offered guidance to Paul's ministry (Gal 1.11–16; 2 Cor 12.1–4; Eph 3.3–10; see also Acts 18.9–10).

Paul's Gospel. To Paul, the GOSPEL (principally a Pauline term) is God's saving activity as constantly revealed and manifested in Christ's death and Resurrection. Death and Resurrection in Christ are the two powers, the only two powers, of man's new existence; they are the founts of salvation. A total, irrevocable commitment to Christ as Redeemer is man's necessary response to this saving act of God.

Paul's gospel (Rom 2.16; 16.25; 2 Tm 2.8; 2 Cor 4.3; 1 Thes 1.5; 2 Thes 2.14) refers to his personal experience of involvement in Christ's death and Resurrection. In his inaugural vision Paul came into transforming contact with Christ. Yet deeper growth into Christ came through the circumstances of his life.

Christocentric. Paul's interpretation of human existence is Christocentric, all men finding their raison d'être in Christ. The Apostle sees Christ's death and Resurrection as God's activity not so much for us as to us, as shown by the word "constitute" in Rom 5.19. By Baptism, Christians are fully and totally incorporated into Christ, into His death and Resurrection (Rom 6.4–6). Through these two transforming powers, Christians encounter Christ in the experiences of all reality, which has been created in, by, and for Him. In this sense, Paul declares that "To live is Christ" (Phil 1.21).

The Death-and-Resurrection Power of Christ. The patristic notion that the union of the Word with human flesh enriches our nature is not Paul's (or the Gospels'). Christ's earthly existence was "according to the flesh" (Rom 1.3). Though sinless, the flesh (i.e., human nature) that the Son of God took on Himself was the flesh of sin (Rom 8.3), and without His death and Resurrection it would be neither powerful nor glorious (Phil 2.7–11). The Father's plan of salvation had Christ enter into solidarity with man, even appearing as man-to-be-redeemed (Heb 5.7–9). Although, ontologically, Christ was always the Son of God, He Himself became "justified in the spirit" (1 Tm 3.16), a "life-giving spirit" (1 Cor 15.45), and was "constituted" (ὁρισθέντος), soteriologically, Son of God in power only with the climax of the Resurrection (Rom 1.3–4; see also Acts 13.33; Heb 1.5).

Death-and-Resurrection, seen as a single mystery, offers complementary facets: death to sinful flesh and entry into divine life. Paradoxically, Christ entered into glory through His Passion—He found life in death itself. His emptying of Himself (Phil 2.7) was a movement toward glory, corresponding to the ambivalent Johannine "hour" in which Christ was "lifted up" on the cross in glory.

The phrase "Christ dead and alive" (F. Durrwell) is significant. "Christ dead" refers to that power present in the risen Christ but grounded in a lifelong dying to "this world" (in its ethical, unredeemed sense) and climaxed by His final redemptive death, in which the baptized die to sin and are buried with Christ in death to this world (Rom 6.3–4; Col 2.20; 2 Tm 2.11). Our sharing in this death stems from a unifying solidarity in Christ, the second Adam. In one death all have died (2 Cor 5.14), not by way of substitution, but by way of mystic identification.

"Christ alive" refers to His life-giving presence in the new creation of eschatological existence, brought about by His Resurrection, in which the baptized are initiated and already share His glorious victory (Rom 6.4–5; see also 4.25).

Christians' Union with the Dead-and-Risen Christ. In Baptism we thus share in the death-to-sin and the becoming-alive-to-God in Christ's death-and-Resurrection. The Eucharist nourishes (1 Cor 10.16) this same reality and joins us in deeper union with Christ and all men (1 Cor 10.16–17). Paul's expression "the body and blood of the Lord" (1 Cor 11.27) shows that he identifies Christ's Eucharistic body with His risen body, for "the Lord" is Paul's name for the risen Christ.

This sense of sharing (κοινωνία) gives the Pauline ethic its distinctive form. No schism (1 Cor 1.10–13), no self-conceit (Gal 5.26), but a spirit of gentleness (Gal 6.1) must prevail among members of the same body. Toward this ideal Paul constantly admonishes, exhorts, warns, and encourages.

The significance of the Resurrection overpowered Paul at his conversion. But the significance of Christ's death became clear amid the birth pangs of his apostolate. Persecution, humiliation, and weakness became raw material for further transformation. Crucified together spiritually with Christ, he no longer lives, but Christ lives in him (Gal 2.20; see also 6.14). In union with Christ's death he would celebrate the perpetual passover (1 Cor 5.7–8) from death to life in Him. The life-giving law of the apostolate was to extend the death-and-Resurrection of Christ.

Paul thus speaks of a present sharing in Christ's Resurrection (Eph 2.4–8). Our whole self, body-soul-spirit, is being formed in the image of the risen Christ. The divine, unseen glory is already bestowed (in part) on our body. Our bodies are Christ's, and to use them for sin, especially sins of the flesh, is tantamount to sacrilege (1 Cor 6.12–20). The PAROUSIA does not effect—it manifests—the glorified risen state already possessed by Christians (Col 3.1–4; cf. the “spiritual body” of 1 Cor 15.44).

Mystical Body of Christ. In the Captivity Epistles, Paul concentrates on the Mystery of Christ risen and acting in His Church as the unifying force of the universe. As one body, Jew and Gentile alike are the object of God's mercy, subject to Him as head (Eph 1.22; Col 1.18), who rules through the “mighty power” of His Resurrection. In His body, sacrificed and glorified, Christ has slain all enmity (Eph 2.14). The entire universe is infused by the divinity and drawn into unity through the redeeming Christ. Thus is all created reality redeemed by God, who through Christ is at the beginning and end of all this work of the new creation (Col 1.15–20).

Although the key to Paul's theology, whether moral or dogmatic, is Christ's death-and-Resurrection, the function of the Holy Spirit is identified with that of the risen Christ (e.g., 2 Cor 3.17; 1 Cor 15.45). St. Ambrose calls Christ the body of the Holy Spirit. The Father pours out the Spirit to us through the risen Christ so that the raising of Christ and our participation in His new life are a single actuality. Paul refers to the activity of the Spirit as a “renewal” (ἀνακαίνωσις; Ti 3.5), a Greek word used in the NT to connote something utterly new, a surprising and transforming force. In Christ's death-and-Resurrection the Church, as God's community, is rebuilt on the cornerstone rejected by His own people (Rom 9.33).

Freedom from the Mosaic Law. In proclaiming Christ, dead and alive, as the only power of salvation, Paul encountered two chief doctrinal obstacles: the “wisdom” of the Gentile, and the “Law” of the Jew. The Gentiles proposed reason as a saving power. In 1 Cor 1.17–4.20 Paul magnificently praises the wisdom of God in Christ crucified. Salvation does not rest on the wisdom of men but on the power of God in Christ (1 Cor 2.5). Hence, the gospel is essentially a divine force, not a form of human reasoning.

The Judaizers posed the Law, both moral and ceremonial, as a cause of salvation. Paul saw that the Christian, by God's magnanimity, fully and personally receives Christ, dead and risen, who alone becomes the principle of saving life. The Law leaves man without hope. It has no power in itself to save; rather it condemns. Being itself holy (Rom 7.12) and spiritual (Rom 7.14), it reveals man in his sinful state. Thus, it works wrath (Rom 4.15), makes sin abound (Rom 5.20), is the power of sin (1 Cor 15.56), brings knowledge of sin (Rom 3.20; 7.7), and is a curse (Gal 3.13). These aspects of the Law died in Christ (Rom 7.4; Gal 2.19) and in Paul through Baptism. With Christ the Law was nailed to the cross and died (Col 4.14). The Law is for the unjust, not the just (1 Tm 1.9). It serves as a negative, protective pedagogue (Gal 3.24) to those not fully in the faith (Gal 3.25), or as an expression of true faith informed by charity for those wholly committed to Christ (Gal 5.6).

Such independence from the Law (Rom 3.21–28) is demanded by the gratuity of Redemption. Man, in original sin, is radically unable to save himself; history and Scripture attest universal sin (Rom 3.1–18). At best, his egocentric autonomy inclines him to turn all his law-keeping into a self-redemptive effort (Rom 10.3; Phil 3.4–9). Only through that faith that is total commitment to Christ can man accept salvation (see JUSTIFICATION).

Providential Role. The life-and-death struggle in the early Church between the Law and Christian freedom is difficult to overestimate. Had the early Christian community succumbed to the Judaizer's insistence upon the Law as a means of salvation, there would be no Christianity today. Providentially, Paul arose as the man preeminently qualified to transplant Christianity, without destroying any of its roots, from the ancient earth of Israel to fertile, Gentile soil.

Paul's life, however, reveals an even more profound role. All great movements are initiated and sustained by ideas. But Paul's is not mere intellectual genius; his is a vision of God's saving activity joined and compenetrated into man's entire human existence. For Paul, a man of many worlds, Christianity is no isolation. Jew, Greek, Roman, workman, intellectual, evangelist—through unbelievable hardships and great joys—all brought Paul, the many-faceted personality, to drink deeply of the death-and-Resurrection “mystery of Christ” (Eph 3.4; Col 4.3).

Historically, Paul’s influence on Christianity is unsurpassed. His impact is “the first after the One”—of the first in the One. Paul is ever real and contemporary. In his inspired letters, he continuously proclaims the eruption of Christ into man’s life by which he is radically remade: “If then any man is in Christ, he is a new creature. The former things have passed away; behold, they are made new” (2 Cor 5.17). Paul himself stands as a model of self-renewal and of Church-renewal: “Be imitators of me as I am of Christ” (1 Cor 11.1).

Dynamically, Paul reveals the unifying force and life-giving principle of all created reality: Christ, who identified with the Church, is the now present “mystery of God” (Col 2.2). By his personal witness to Christ’s death-and-Resurrection, Paul, Apostle to the Gentiles, has become the revealed archetype both of Christian theology and of the ecumenical Church.

Iconography. St. Paul has been portrayed very frequently in Christian art (sculptures, mosaics, paintings) since the 4th century, either alone or more often together with St. Peter. One of the oldest-known representations of him is on the beautiful sarcophagus of Junius Bassus (middle of the 4th century), in the crypt of St. Peter’s, Rome. Here he is shown as being led away by a sword-bearing executioner. The scene of Paul’s martyrdom is the predominant theme in early art, and his specific symbol since the 13th century has been the sword by which he was put to death. Later art, however, also shows various other scenes from his life, especially his conversion on the way to Damascus. Even scenes from the apocryphal Acts of Paul and Thecla are reproduced in art. At times various scenes are combined in so-called cycles, e.g., the ten scenes from his life in the mosaics at Monreale, Sicily, and the five scenes in tapestry from designs by Raphael for the Sistine Chapel, now in the Vatican Museum. Another celebrated masterpiece is Michelangelo’s fresco of Paul’s conversion, in the Pauline Chapel of the Vatican.

Bibliography: M. DIBELIUS and W. KÜMMEL, Paul, tr. F. CLARK (Philadelphia 1953). W. M. RAMSAY, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen (3d ed. Grand Rapids 1949). J. MUNCK, Paul and the Salvation of Mankind, tr. F. CLARKE (Richmond 1960). E. HAENCHEN, Die Apostelgeschichte (12th ed. Göttingen 1959). F. PRAT, Theology of St. Paul, tr. J. L. STODDARD from 10th Fr. ed., 2 v. (Westminster, Md. 1958). L. CERFAUX, Christ in the Theology of St. Paul, tr. G. WEBB and A. WALKER (New York 1959). D. M. STANLEY, Christ’s Resurrection in Pauline Soteriology (Rome 1961) with extensive bibliog. F. X. DURRWELL, The Resurrection: A Biblical Study, tr. R. SHEED (New York 1960). A. BRUNOT, Saint Paul and His Message, tr. R. MATTHEWS (New York 1959). F.

AMIOT, The Key Concepts of St. Paul, tr. J. DINGLE (New York 1962). Paul and the Law. S. LYONNET, “St. Paul: Liberty and Law,” The Bridge 4 (1962) 229–251. J. KNOX, The Ethic of Jesus in the Teaching of the Church (New York 1961). Paul’s Conversion. D. M. STANLEY, “Paul’s Conversion in Acts: Why the Three Accounts?” Catholic Biblical Quarterly 15 (1953) 315–338. W. PROKULSKI, “The Conversion of St. Paul,” ibid. 19 (1957) 453–473. N. A. DAHL, Studies in Paul (Minneapolis 1977). Anchor Bible Dictionary 5 (New York 1992) 186–201. J. MURPHY-O’CONNOR, Paul: A Critical Life (Oxford 1996). J. D. G. DUNN, The Theology of Paul the Apostle (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1998).

[F. SCHROEDER/EDS.]

PAUL, MISSIONARY JOURNEYS

Of all the great wayfarers of antiquity, the journeys of Paul of Tarsus (see PAUL, APOSTLE, ST.) are among the best documented. His travels by land and sea in the Roman dominated eastern regions of the Mediterranean during the relatively peaceful era of the Pax Romana are most reliably reconstructed by placing primary reliance upon those epistles judged authentically his (Rom, 1–2 Cor, Gal, Phil, 1 Thess, Phlm). The traditions about Paul’s movement in the deutero-Pauline letters function as secondary sources and must be critically evaluated for possible supplementary data. The massive material about Paul in the Acts of the Apostles functions as a secondary source, one most difficult to assess, since its author, Luke, clearly knew much about Paul. Luke implies that he had at times traveled with Paul (see the so-called we-passages in Acts 16:10–17; 20:5–15; 21:1–18; 27:1–28:16), yet he often gives (or appears to omit) information that does not correlate with Paul’s letters.

Paul has long been described (and mapped) as having made three missionary journeys, followed by a fourth as a prisoner, nevertheless indomitably still preaching, when taken under custody to Rome. The superimposition of the three-journey structure upon Paul’s life and travels, derived by interpreters of Acts, wherein it is merely implicit in 13:1–14:28; 15:36–18:22 and 18:23–21:14, can be used as a convenient aid for readers of the NT to organize their own understanding of the biblical text (see Brown, 431). This should be recognized as an artificial device that affects how Paul is seen. For example, the division into journeys, in which the demarcation between the second and the third (18:22–23) is not very clear, suggests that Paul’s point of initial departure and final return was consistently Antioch, thus that the Antiochene church was his home base. Yet it is uncertain that Paul considered himself so integrally linked to that church, especially after his controversy with Peter there (Gal 2:11–14).

If the conventional three-journey structure has its drawbacks in sketching Paul the missionary traveler, its helpfulness and ongoing widespread use as a framework for his post-Damascus Road years should be balanced with the apostle's own description of what he was doing. Paul's imagery divides his life into two periods rather than a sequence of journeys. In Gal 1 he speaks of a time denoted as "my earlier life in Judaism" (1:14), which he says ended "when God . . . was pleased to reveal his Son to me . . ." (1:16). In Phil 3 he describes what he was doing after that revelation as "straining forward to what lies ahead" (3:13), "press[ing] on toward the goal for the prize of the heavenly call of God in Jesus Christ" (3:14), his goal being "to know Christ and the power of his resurrection and the sharing of his sufferings" (3:10) so that he Paul, too, might "attain the resurrection of the dead" (3:11). The resurrection of the righteous dead by God was a belief that Paul as a Pharisee must have held. Resurrection, however, had become for him, once "Christ Jesus had made [Paul] his own" (3:12), attainable not by a righteousness based on the Mosaic law, but by "a righteousness . . . that comes through faith in Christ," (3:9). As he announced that faith far and wide, Paul unabashedly set forth that he was "not ashamed of the gospel . . . the power of God for salvation to everyone who has faith, to the Jew first and also to the Greek" (Rom 1:16).

In Paul's Philippian imagery of pressing on and straining toward completion, expressed as well in Gal 2:2 where he describes his evangelizing work as "running," which he hoped was not "in vain," he sees himself as one always moving urgently ahead, yet not without the great effort of struggling on many levels. It is possible that this language of progressing toward a goal was among Paul's most frequently used and best remembered metaphors for himself since the deutero-Pauline writer of 2 Tim 4:7 represents him as saying near the close of his life: "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race." This picture which emerges of Paul the runner, ever contending to stay on course and struggling even against great odds, is not incompatible with a supposed journey structure. Yet Paul's own imagery more vividly conveys a sense of relentless effort in evangelization, even when sidetracked by opposition, his own sickness, disputes with other co-religionists and co-workers, and imprisonment.

Various chronologies compete in dating the events in Paul's life (see Roetz, 178–183). In spite of the widespread disagreement about timing, the sequence of activity in Paul's cursus vitae is generally similar, a major exception being the question of whether the Jerusalem conference (see JERUSALEM, COUNCIL OF) preceded or followed the travels described in Acts 15:35–18:22, the "second journey." A traditional chronology and sequence is relied upon here (see e.g. Brown, 428–429; Fitzmyer, 1330–1337; cf. Murphy-O'Connor, 1–31).

After Damascus (Gal 1:16). Following his Damascus Road experience (c. 36 A.D.) and probably a brief period in Damascus itself, Paul went to Arabia, i.e. Nabatea (Gal 1:17). There he apparently preached on behalf of the risen Jesus, not only to other Jews living there but to Nabateans as well (see Hengel/Schwemer, Paul, 106–113), and in doing so stirred up opposition from the Nabatean king, Aretas IV. Paul returned to Damascus, remaining there for three years (Gal 1:18) until he was forced to escape when Aretas, into whose jurisdiction Damascus had passed under the Emperor Caligula (37–41), tried to arrest him. Paul proceeded to Jerusalem (c. 39), where he stayed with Cephas (see PETER, APOSTLE, ST.) for fifteen days and says he met no other apostle except James, the brother of the Lord (Gal 1:18–19). Paul's perspective is that he was unknown by sight to the churches of Judea at this time (Gal 1:22) (whether he intends "Judea" to include Jerusalem is not evident). Acts 9:26–30, however, offers a picture of Paul briefly preaching in Jerusalem and encountering problems that led members of the church to escort him to Caesarea Maritima, where they sent him off to his home city of Tarsus in Cilicia. Paul partially confirms the latter element of the Acts narrative in his statement that following this time in Jerusalem he "went into the regions of Syria and Cilicia . . . proclaiming the faith" (Gal 1:21–22). This period, (see Hengel/Schwemer, passim) during which Paul's activities are not known, has generally been dated from c. 40–44.

In the absence of further information from Paul himself concerning the next five years (c. 44–49), Acts 11:25–26 supplies this scenario: Barnabas went to Tarsus and recruited Paul to minister in the church at Antioch, where he did so for a year (c. 44–45), a year which was followed by or included a visit with Barnabas to Jerusalem to deliver famine relief (11:27–30). This Jerusalem visit, which Acts places about five years after Paul's prior one, is hard to reconcile with Paul's statement in Gal 2:1 that his second trip to Jerusalem in his Christian period was fourteen years after the first, i.e. after his return to Jerusalem following the Damascus Road event.

Proclaiming the Gospel among the Gentiles (Gal 2:2): Paul's "First" Journey. Acts 13:1–3 states that as a result of prayer and fasting in the church at Antioch, the prophets and teachers there determined that the Holy Spirit had set apart and called BARNABAS and Paul to do certain work. The Antiochene believers therefore "laid their hands on them" (13:3) and sent them off. John Mark (see MARK, EVANGELIST, ST.), the cousin of Barnabas, went with them. Because Barnabas's name is mentioned before Paul's throughout the Acts narrative up to this point, Barnabas is assumed to have been the senior partner (Daniels, 610).

Barnabas, Paul, and John Mark sailed from the seaport of Seleucia (16 miles west of Antioch) to Salamis in Cyprus, and thence went to the extreme west of the island to the capital city of Paphos. There they contended with a villainous magician, Elymas, and after temporarily blinding him, converted the Roman proconsul, Sergius Paulus. In Acts more prominence is from this point on accorded to Paul. In 13:13 the group of missionaries is denoted as “Paul and his companions” and Paul is then named before Barnabas several times (13:43, 46, 50). The crowds are also said to have recognized Paul as “the chief speaker” (14:12).

From Paphos the three sailed to Perga in Pamphylia, where John Mark left to return to Jerusalem (13:13). Acts does not specify John Mark’s reasons but does imply that Paul considered this a desertion (15:38). He and Barnabas then continued on to Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe. Because of the opposition they encountered in the synagogues, both said, “We are now turning to the Gentiles” (13:46). From Derbe they retraced their steps through Lystra, Iconium, Pisidian Antioch, and Perga, setting sail from Attalia for the journey back to Syrian Antioch.

This course has come to be called the “first journey” (13:4–14:28) and widely dated c. 46–49. While Paul’s undisputed letters give no information about such a journey, he mentions in 2 Cor 11:25 that he was once stoned, which accords with the report that this happened to him in Lystra (Acts 14:19). Further correlation is found in Gal 2:2, where Paul indicates that he had preached to the Gentiles before the Jerusalem meeting (c. 49), confirming that the debate over the integration of the Gentiles into the Jesus movement was an issue from his earliest evangelizing period.

Paul in Jerusalem (Gal 2:2). In the Acts narrative, Paul and Barnabas are said to have returned to Antioch only to encounter “no small dissension and debate” (15:2) with certain individuals, presumably PHARISEES (15:5), Judaizing believers who had come there from Judea. The controversy concerned the conversion of Gentiles and the Mosaic requirement of circumcision. Paul, Barnabas, and others were appointed to go to Jerusalem to discuss this with the apostles and elders (15:2). The resulting meeting, which has come to be called the Council of Jerusalem and dated c. 49, is recounted in Acts 15:6–29. Scholarship has widely, though by no means unanimously, judged Paul’s account in Gal 2:1–10 to be of the same event, for both narratives include the involvement of Paul, James the brother of the Lord, and Peter, and both involve a group opposed to Paul and holding that the converted Gentiles should be circumcised.

In Paul’s perception the meeting resulted with recognition from the leaders, the “acknowledged pillars” (Gal 2:9), that Paul “had been entrusted with the gospel for the uncircumcised” (2:7), i.e. those who once they became Christian would remain uncircumcised, and that even his Gentile companion and apparent co-worker in evangelization, Titus, was not compelled to be circumcised (2:3). Acts 15 correlates with the decision for non-imposition of circumcision upon the Gentiles but describes a letter sent from Jerusalem to Antioch stipulating that believers of Gentile origin in Syria and Cilicia were to observe certain food laws. Paul himself expresses no knowledge of this letter and certainly promotes no stipulations concerning food eaten by believers in his later ministry (see e.g. 1 Cor 8).

The accounts of the Jerusalem conference in both Gal and Acts agree that upon its close Paul and Barnabas returned to Antioch. What is strikingly missing from Acts, yet very prominent in Paul’s narrative in Gal 2:12–14, is that shortly after the conference Paul had a major public conflict in Antioch with Peter and with Barnabas, who sided with Peter. At issue, at least from Paul’s perspective, which is the only one available to us, was Peter’s inconsistency in sometimes eating with Gentile believers and at other times, notably when members of the Jerusalem circumcision party were present, eating only with the Jewish Christians. While it is difficult to reconstruct all the dynamics Paul saw at work in this event, it is widely thought that he must have lost the battle about food laws at Antioch since, from that time on, Antioch’s role as the base of his missionary operations receded (Brown, 432).

En Route to Illyricum (Rom 15:19): The “Second” and “Third” Journeys. The missionary activity of Paul described in Acts 15:40–21:15, covering the years of c. 50–58, is commonly divided into the “Second” (15:40–18:22) and “Third” Journeys (18:23–21:15). Paul himself subsumes his activities of these years into a general description covering all of his evangelizing. He envisioned an arc extending from Judea north and west around the Mediterranean, reaching to the Dalmatian coast on the northeastern shores of the Adriatic Sea. Paul alludes to this in writing to the churches of Rome (c. 58), which he had not yet visited. He comments that up to that time in his life “from Jerusalem all the way around to Illyricum I have finished preaching the gospel of Christ” (Rom 15:19). This could have been meant literally, or it may have been Paul’s way of saying that he had evangelized from East to West, since neither the epistles nor Acts indicate that he had actually made it to Illyricum by 58. Either way, Paul perceived that he had covered a vast amount of territory, and both his own letters and Acts 15:40–21:15 support extensive traveling in the years after the Jerusalem conference and his conflict with Peter at Antioch.

While Paul does not tell of his next move after the confrontation over table fellowship with Peter (and Barnabas), Acts 15:36–39 says that after the Jerusalem conference he invited Barnabas to make a return journey to the people they had earlier converted. In agreeing, Barnabas suggested enlisting John Mark again, but Paul refused to take someone who had not been dependable. Thus, he and Barnabas parted company. The tenor of this information from Acts 15:36–39 is corroborated by Paul's remark in Gal 2:13 about Barnabas's apparent hypocrisy at the table fellowship, namely, that it was during their return to Antioch after the council of Jerusalem that Paul and Barnabas had serious disagreements that precluded their continuing ministry together. Acts 15:41 says that Paul chose SILAS, whom he called Silvanus (1 Thes 1:1; 2 Cor 1:19), to travel with him. The two went through Syria and Cilicia to the churches of southeastern Asia Minor that Paul and Barnabas had previously established. In Lystra Paul converted Timothy, who then joined him and Silas as they went north "through the region of Phrygia and Galatia" (Acts 16:6), probably meaning the area northwest of Iconium. Acts 16:6–7 makes the enigmatic statements that they had been "forbidden by the Holy Spirit to speak the word in Asia" and that when they attempted to go into Bithynia "the Spirit of Jesus did not allow them" so that instead they went to the coast at Troas. A choice to make haste, or a divine restriction they felt imposed upon them, or some other reason to not missionize in certain areas they traversed may be reflected in Paul's later comment to the Galatians: "You know that it was [only?] because of a physical infirmity that I first announced the gospel to you" (Gal 4:13).

From Troas, via the island of Samothrace, Paul and his co-workers crossed over to Macedonia. Reaching the port of Neapolis, they went into the nearby city of Philippi, and thence, following the Egnatian Way (Via Egnatia), to Amphipolis, Apollonia, and Thessalonica. If Paul had continued west along this major Roman route as far as the Adriatic coast at Dyrrhachium, he would have been just south of the border of Illyricum. Nothing in his own letters nor in Acts, however, suggests this extended journey west either at this point nor later in his travels (see below) when he retraced his Egnatian route, although this would have been Paul's obvious route to Illyricum. The Acts' traditions instead indicate that Paul departed from the Egnatian Way at Thessalonica and went southwest to Beroea. Then, leaving Silas and Timothy behind, Paul went to the coast and shipped out to Athens. After preaching there with little success, he went on to Corinth, where Silas and Timothy eventually joined him. The tradition in Acts 18:12–17 that in Corinth Paul was brought before Gallio, the Roman proconsul of Achaia, has become the pivotal point in determining Pauline chronology since Gallio's proconsulship can be dated to a relatively narrow period, i.e. c. June through October of 51. The 18 months Paul is said to have stayed in Corinth (Acts 18:11) are therefore generally assessed as falling with the years 51–52.

Because Paul wrote to the Thessalonians (1 Thess) during his months in Corinth and would later write to the Philippians (Phil) and the Corinthians (1–2 Cor), a large legacy of his own literary evidence exists to illuminate this period and to compare it with the narrative of the same time in Acts 16:11–18:17. Within the limitations of this brief overview, it is important to point out that these were the travels in which Paul met and, in some cases converted, various important church leaders and some of his prominent co-workers, such as Lydia in Philippi (Acts 16:14–15; 40), Prisca and Aquila in Corinth (Acts 18:1–4), and probably at this time as well, Phoebe, who lived in the Corinthian port of Cenchreae (Rom 16:1–3) (see F. Gillman, passim).

Paul had worked at his trade of tent-making along with PRISCA AND AQUILA (a practice of self-support he followed throughout his missionary years). When he decided to leave Corinth in 52 to return to Syria, Prisca and Aquila left as well. They accompanied him as far as EPHESUS. Paul sailed on to Caesarea Maritima, while Prisca and Aquila stayed in Ephesus (Acts 18:19), where they led a church (1 Cor 16:19). It was during their Ephesian tenure that the eloquent, but theologically misinformed Apollos of Alexandria visited that city and preached. Prisca and Aquila corrected Apollos and became his references when he moved on to Corinth to address the Christians there (Acts 18:26–28). His presence in Corinth would eventually lead to factions in the church, a problem over the years for Paul (1 Cor 1:12).

Acts 18:22 says that after Paul's arrival in Caesarea he went to Jerusalem to greet the church and then proceeded on to Antioch. Because Acts 18:23 says he spent "some time" in Antioch (between 53–54), and because that city had earlier been his base of operations, this Antiochene "break" has become the conventional separation between the second and third journeys. But seeing an end to one trip and the beginning of another here is merely an interpretative perspective. In any case, Paul moved on, once more visiting GALATIA (confirmed by Gal 4:13 which implies that Paul made at least two visits there) and Phrygia, and then settling for a long period (c. 54–57) in Ephesus (see 1 Cor 16:8–9 and compare with Acts 19:1–20:1).

Much of Paul's known correspondence derives from this Ephesian period. It is widely held that he wrote GA-

LATIANS (c. 54) rather early in his stay. Much of Pauline scholarship would also place the writing of PHILIPPIANS and PHILEMON from this city as well. If that judgment is accurate, since both letters were written when Paul was imprisoned, the suspicion that 1 Cor 15:32 and 2 Cor 11:23–26 allude to an Ephesian period of incarceration for Paul would be validated. Paul's extensive correspondence with the CORINTHIANS, with whom he was involved in multiple serious disagreements, also began in Ephesus, from which he certainly wrote 1 Corinthians (c. 57; cf. 1 Cor 16:8) and probably the so-called "former" (1 Cor 5:9) and "tearful" letters (2 Cor 2:4). Paul may also have made a brief visit under painful circumstances to the Corinthians in this period (2 Cor 2:1).

Acts 19:8–10 situates Paul's preaching in Ephesus first in a synagogue, where he spoke out boldly for three months (19:8). In the face of opposition within the congregation, Paul moved to the hall of Tyrannus where he "argued daily" for some two years (18:9). Acts also says that Paul converted former disciples of John the Baptist in Ephesus where he came into conflict with itinerant Jewish exorcists (the seven sons Sceva) and caused a riot among the silversmiths who made shrines of Artemis, the great mother goddess of the Ephesians [see DIANA (ARTEMIS) OF THE EPHESIANS]. Sometime after Pentecost (see 1 Cor 16:8), in the late springtime of 57, Paul departed for Troas to catch a ship to Macedonia, having sent his companions Timothy and Erastus ahead. After meeting up with Titus in Macedonia (in Philippi? see 2 Cor 2:12–13), who informed Paul a reconciliation had been effected between him and the Corinthians, Paul wrote 2 Corinthians (at least in part; some judge this letter to be a composite). Paul then proceeded to Corinth, where he stayed for three months (Acts 20:2–3), i.e. late 57 into 58.

During this Corinthian period Paul envisioned himself on the verge of a major transition. He wrote to the ROMANS in 58, indicating that having proclaimed the good news of Christ from Jerusalem to Illyricum, he saw "no further place for [himself] . . . in these regions" (Rom 15:23) and thus he would proceed to Spain. He planned to visit the Roman Christians on the way, although he would first make a trip to Jerusalem to deliver a collection he had been taking up for the believers there (Rom 15:24–26). Acts says that when he was about to set sail to the east, however, he heard of a plot against him and therefore retraced his steps through Macedonia, sailing from Philippi to Troas, and then to Miletus, where he gave a farewell address to the elders of the church of Ephesus (Acts 20:18–38). From Miletus, Paul sailed to Cos, Rhodes, Patara, Tyre, Ptolemais, finally arriving at Caesarea, where he stayed with the evangelist Philip and his four prophesying daughters. The Acts traditions imply a foreboding of imprisonment and death during Paul's return trip from Miletus to Caesarea. This may reflect the knowledge of the author of Acts in retrospect, yet accords with Paul's statement in Rom 15:30–31, where he asks for prayers concerning his visit to Judea that he might be "rescued from the unbelievers in Judea" (Brown, 435).

The Road to Rome (Rom 15:23). When Paul sensed in 58 that his work in the east-northeast quadrant of the Mediterranean was over, he was correct, although the ensuing years, c. 58–64, played out differently than he planned. This period is chronicled only by Acts 21:15–28:31, unless Philipians and Philemon were not written during the Ephesian imprisonment but come from Paul's detentions in Caesarea (58–60) or in Rome (61–63). Of the plans Paul was making in 58, he did manage to reach Rome and to "reap some harvest" (Rom 1:13) among the Christians there, albeit in shackles. But his intention to evangelize in Spain after turning over his collection in Jerusalem were thwarted by his arrest and subsequent imprisonment at Caesarea (c. 58–60).

The story of Paul's transfer to Rome, due to his "appeal to the emperor" (Acts 25:12), offers one of the most detailed narratives of an ancient maritime journey. Following storms, shipwreck, and a winter marooned on Malta, Paul, under the guard of a centurion named Julius, disembarked at Puteoli, near the Roman naval base at Misenum. He was escorted into Rome, where he lived as a prisoner, but was able to continue his Christian proclamation. Acts ends abruptly, and puzzlingly, in 28:30–31 with the statement that Paul lived thus for two years (c. 61–63), implying in the judgment of many that he was released after that. If that is indeed what happened, it remains uncertain whether Paul went on further missionizing travels, either to Spain or elsewhere in the Mediterranean. CLEMENT of Rome (c. 95) observed that Paul had preached in "the furthest limits of the West" (1 Cor 5:7), although what Clement meant by this is not clear. As for information about Paul's death, history has relied upon information from Eusebius (Ecclesiastical History 2.25) that Paul was beheaded in Rome during the Neronian persecution. If there is any historical data underlying the tradition that Paul's death and burial took place on the Ostian Way (Via Ostiensis), near the basilica of St. Paul-Outside-the-Walls, then the very last leg of Paul's decades of dedicated missionary travel was on that busy, major Roman road going to and from Rome's seaport of Ostia. From the Damascus Road to the Ostian Way, the race to the finish had been completed by an indefatigable sprinter.

Bibliography: H. D. BETZ, "Paul," ABD V, 186–201. R. E. BROWN, An Introduction to the New Testament (New York 1997) 422–442. J. B. DANIELS, "Barnabas," ABD I, 610–611. J. A. FITZMYER, "Paul," NJBC, 1329–1337. F. M. GILLMAN, Women Who Knew Paul (Collegeville 1992). J. L. GILLMAN, "Silas," ABD VI, 22–23; idem, “Timothy,” ABD VI, 558–560. M. HENGEL and A. M. SCHWEMER, Paul between Damascus and Antioch (Louisville 1997). J. MURPHY-O’CONNOR, Paul: A Critical Life (New York 1996). C. ROETZEL, Paul: The Man and the Myth (Minneapolis 1999).

[F. M. GILLMAN]

PAUL, SS.

Paul the Hermit, third-century native of the lower Thebaid in Egypt. During the persecution of Decius (250) Paul fled to the desert and lived as a hermit. Though he intended to return to the world after the persecution ceased, he so enjoyed his life of solitude and contemplation that he remained there until his death, near the year 341. Legend said that Christ fed him daily with bread carried in the beak of a raven. St. Paul is usually considered the first hermit.

Feast: Jan. 15.

Paul the Simple, fourth-century hermit, was an elderly laborer who became a disciple of St. ANTHONY in the Thebaid Desert when he discovered that his wife had committed adultery. Though Anthony was reluctant to receive Paul as a hermit because of Paul’s advanced age, he put him to severe test, but Paul proved his great humility and obedience. Finally Anthony accepted Paul as a hermit and revered him as a powerful servant of God. St. Paul died in the desert about 339.

Feast: March 7.

Paul I of Constantinople, bishop, elected probably in 336; d. 350. Most of his episcopal career was spent combating ARIANISM. After a series of exiles and returns to his see, Paul was finally banished to Cappadocia during the reign of CONSTANTIUS II (337–361) and there he was strangled to death.

Feast: June 7.

Of St. Paul and St. John history records only their names and their Christian martyrdom. Relics, supposedly theirs, were found in a house on the Coelian Hill that was converted into a Christian church in the fourth century. Their cult was widely spread by a spurious passio telling of their gallant military service under Constantine I (306–337) and their martyrdom under JULIAN THE APOSTATE (361–363).

Feast: June 26.

Bibliography: St. Paul the Hermit. H. WADDELL, tr., The Desert Fathers (New York 1936) 35–53. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4v. (New York 1956) 1:91–93. St. Paul the Simple. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4v. (New York 1956) 1:513–514. St. Paul of Constantinople. Acta Sanctorum June 2:13–24. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4v. (New York 1956) 2:492–493. St. Paul and St. John. Acta Sanctorum June 7:138–142. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4v. (New York 1956) 2:645–646.

[E. DAY]

PAUL II, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Reigned Oct. 1, 641, to Dec. 27, 653. Elevated at the accession of the Byzantine emperor Constans II, who succeeded HERACLIUS, and just prior to the pontificate of Pope Theodore I, Paul became patriarch at a time when MONOPHYSITISM was fragmenting the Byzantine Church. At first he declared his adherence to the orthodox Christology, then (646–647) accepted the compromise position of MONOTHELITISM put forward by his predecessors, Patriarchs SERGIUS and PYRRHUS. In 648 he backed with his authority the decree of Constans, known as the TYPOS, which simply forbade all further discussion of the Christological question. Then in 649, along with Sergius and Pyrrhus, he was excommunicated and anathematized by the Lateran Synod called by Pope MARTIN I. This action, coupled with the fact that Martin’s elevation had taken place without imperial sanction, resulted in the Emperor’s seizing the pope and exiling him to the Chersonesus in 653, the year of Paul’s death. Imperial attempts to solve the Monophysite controversy, either by compromise or enforced silence, lost their urgency by the end of Paul’s tenure; by that time Arab conquests had overrun the most strongly Monophysitic provinces of the Byzantine Empire. The Monothelite compromise was abjured by the Byzantine Church itself at the sixth ecumenical council, CONSTANTINOPLE III (680–681), which declared Paul, among others, heretical.

Bibliography: V. GRUMEL, Les registes des actes du patriarcat de Constantinople (Kadikoi-Bucharest 1932–47) 1.1:120–121. Letter to Theodore, J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio (Graz 1960) 10:1020–26. C. J. VON HEFELE Histoire des conciles d’après les documents originaux, tr. and continued by H. LECLERQ (Paris 1907–38) 3:398–400, 426–432. H. PARGOIRE, L’église byzantine (Paris 1905) under “Monothélisme.” Histoire de l’église depuis les origines jusqu’à nos jours, ed. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN (Paris 1935) 5:165–168. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (Munich 1954–59) 2:59–63, 65ff. G. OSTROGORSKY, History of the Byzantine State (Oxford 1956, New Brunswick NJ 1957) 92, 97. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 55, 432–433.

[D. A. MILLER]

PAUL IV, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE, ST.

Patriarchate, 780–84; b. Cyprus, 724; d. Florus Monastery, Aug. 31, 784. Sometimes designated in the sources as Paul the Younger of Salamis, Paul of Cyprus, etc., Paul IV is known to have been selected for that office by Emperor Leo IV in 780 on the condition that he take an oath to pursue the imperial policy of iconoclasm. Nothing is known of Paul's background or education; but while he accepted the emperor's condition for the patriarchal nomination, he does not seem to have been a fanatic iconoclast. He used the emperor's favor, however, to extend the territorial and governmental authority of the patriarchate apparently without interfering with papal prerogatives. With the accession to power of the Empress Irene as regent (780) the religious policy of the empire was changed, and Paul, after signifying his repudiation of ICONOCLASM, submitted his resignation from his office and retired to the monastery of Florus. On his deathbed he received clerical emissaries from the empress, gave them a solemn retraction of his errors, and pronounced an anathema against iconoclasm. He was criticized severely by Byzantine historians; but the empress succeeded in obtaining his canonization from the pope, in order that, as she requested, he might serve the cause of the veneration of images better by his death than by his life.

Feast: Aug. 28.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Aug. 4:96. J.D. MANSI, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 31 v. (Florence-Venice 1757–98); reprinted and continued by L. PETIT and J.B. MARTIN 53 v. in 60 (Paris 1889–1927; repr. Graz 1960–) 12:951–1154. G. OSTROGORSKY, History of the Byzantine State, tr. J. HUSSEY from 2d German ed. (Oxford 1956); American ed. by P. CHARANIS (New Brunswick, N.J. 1957) 102–106.

[F. CHIOVARO]

PAUL I, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: May 29, 757 to June 28, 767. A member of an important noble family in Rome, Paul's career prior to his election as pope was spent in the service of the papal curia. During the pontificate of his brother, Pope STEPHEN II (III) (752–757), he served as a key papal adviser at a crucial moment that witnessed an interrelated sequence of events that revolutionized the political map of Italy and the position of the papacy in the Christian world. Included among those events were the precipitate decline of the power of the eastern Roman Empire in political and religious life of Italy, and the end of papal subordination to and dependence on the emperor in Constantinople. It also saw the formation of a papal alliance with the Franks, and the military intervention of the Franks in Italy, which prevented LOMBARD domination the peninsula, as well as the creation of the Papal States as a sovereign entity ruled by the pope. Those massive changes created a wide range of uncertainties that would dominate Paul I's pontificate, as the concerned parties struggled to adjust to the change and to seek advantage from the new conditions.

Although his election to the papacy was briefly challenged by another candidate, Paul I began his career as pope from a position of strength bequeathed by his predecessor. He was firmly linked to a strong ally, the Frankish king PEPIN III (751–768). Pepin was indebted to the papacy for the approval granted him in 751 by Pope Zacharias (741–752) to replace the MEROVINGIAN dynasty with his own family, the CAROLINGIANS, as rulers of the kingdom of the Franks. Then in 752 the new Frankish king had entered into a pact with Pope Stephen II, which among other things promised Frankish protection for the papacy, a restoration of territories that belonged to the pope, and papal sanctification of Pepin and his heirs as legitimate rulers of the Frankish kingdom. In two military campaigns in 755 and 756 against the Lombards Pepin III had demonstrated that he was prepared to protect an independent pope ruling the "special people" (peculiarem populum) of St. Peter inhabiting the Republic of St. Peter. The territory ruled over by the new pope had been substantially expanded as a result of the Donation of Pepin bestowed on the papacy as a consequence of the Frankish victory over the Lombards. The Lombard kingdom, defeated by the Franks shortly before Paul's accession, was ruled by a king, Desiderius (757–774), who owed his crown to papal support and who was well aware of the military impotence of the Lombards in the face of the Frankish threat. The position of the eastern Roman emperor in Italy had been fatally weakened by widespread opposition to ICONOCLASM and by the territorial losses resulting from Pepin III's concessions to the papacy after the Frankish victory over the Lombards in 755 and 756. From the beginning of his pontificate Paul I demonstrated his intention of keeping or even improving that position.

Immediately upon his election Paul I wrote to Pepin III in terms that indicated his dependence on the Frankish king for protection of the Papal States and for restoration of other territories claimed by the papacy. His understanding of the Donation of Pepin and promises made by the Lombard king prompted Paul I to envisage the extension of the Papal States over a large part of Italy. Throughout his pontificate Paul I never ceased conveying that message to Pepin III; so insistent were his claims that some historians have concluded that territorial acquisition was his only concern as pope. The Frankish king remained steadfast in his alliance, although not always acting in accord with the pope's demands.

From Paul I's perspective, the chief obstacle to gaining the territories he claimed was the Lombard king, Desiderius, who had made promises to surrender territories to the papacy in return for the support of Pope Stephen II in securing his election to the Lombard throne. Having become king, Desiderius showed little inclination to abide by his promises or to accede to papal demands. He was determined to continue a policy initiated by earlier Lombard kings aimed at establishing a united Lombard kingdom as the dominant political force in Italy, a goal that threatened the independence of the papacy and the Papal States. During the early years of Paul I's pontificate, extending from 757 to 762, the demands of the king resulted in a series of confrontations. Aside from spurning papal demands for territory, Desiderius on occasion threatened to use force to keep Paul from aiding those who resisted Lombard overlordship, especially the dukes of Spoleto and Benevento. Paul in turn pleaded with Pepin to force Desiderius' compliance to papal demands. His appeals were couched in terms that sought to convince the Frankish king the Republic of St. Peter was in dire danger. Although Pepin did mediate between Paul I and Desiderius, he was unwilling to commit himself to new military campaigns in Italy. Aside from problems in his own realm, the Frankish king was never persuaded that the Lombards offered as serious a threat to the papacy or the Papal States. Fully aware of Frankish military power, Desiderius was too astute a political leader to mount a threat on the papacy so serious that Pepin would feel compelled to repeat his earlier military attacks on the Lombard kingdom. Gradually, Paul I came to realize that he could not depend on the Frankish military to gain all the territory he claimed. During the last years of his pontificate, his territorial demands were greatly reduced. He was content to negotiate with Desiderius only minor adjustments of his boundaries of the Papal State and to avoid a major confrontation. Therefore although the boundaries of the Papal States were slightly enlarged, the pope and the Lombard king tacitly agreed to accept a state of equilibrium that constituted part of the newly emerging power structure in Italy.

Paul I was also always mindful of the eastern emperor, CONSTANTINE V Copronymos (741–775). The pope's concerns were both political and religious. Despite his weak political and military position in Italy and serious problems in the East, Constantine V nurtured hope of reestablishing an imperial political presence in Italy. Although on occasion Paul I sent alarmist reports to Pepin about impending invasions of Italy from Constantinople, Constantine V simply lacked the military resources to undertake such ventures. As a consequence, he sought to weaken the papacy by diplomatic means, but none of his ventures succeeded. During Paul I's pontificate it became clear that the eastern emperor was no longer a major factor in the Italian power structure.

Of greater concern to Paul I was the relentless effort of Constantine V to promote his iconoclastic policy. As had been the case with his predecessors, Paul I condemned iconoclasm as heretical and made every effort to defeat it. To offset Constantine V's efforts to propagate iconoclasm, Paul I offered refuge to large numbers of monks who fled the eastern Roman Empire to escape persecution for opposing iconoclasm and granted them freedom to worship according to their own liturgy and in their own language. He appealed by letter and by embassy to the emperor to abandon his heretical position. Some evidence suggests he may have been involved in an effort to persuade the eastern patriarchs to speak out against iconoclasm. He was especially concerned about the emperor's attempt to exploit reservations held by some in the Frankish church about the use of icons, but Paul was able to retain the loyalty of Pepin III and the Frankish Church to Rome's position on iconoclasm. Although Paul I was not successful in persuading Constantine V to abandon his policy on icons, his efforts restricted the spread of iconoclasm and fortified the papal position as the guardian of orthodoxy.

The surviving record provides little information about Paul's activities beyond his campaign to enlarge the Papal States and to defeat the heretical eastern emperor. There are hints indicating that he encouraged and advised those who were engaged in reforming the Frankish church, thereby strengthening the bonds linking the papacy and the Franks. He maintained contacts with the English hierarchy and with the newly established ecclesiastical structure put in place by Boniface in Bavaria and Germany. His biographer reported that some of his subordinates in the papal curia were tyrannical, suggesting that he introduced measures to strengthen papal administration in the Papal States. Perhaps his administrative actions were necessitated by the major enlargement of the papal territory that occurred under his predecessor, Stephen II, but they also helped to create the opposition to his regime that surfaced in the disputed election of his successor, Pope STEPHEN III (768–772). Paul was credited with initiating and supporting efforts to rebuild and redecorate churches in Rome. He also removed many relics from the catacombs and installed them in various churches in Rome. Perhaps these activities were a tangible response to iconoclasm. All these bits of evidence indicate his awareness of his role as a spiritual leader whose influence was spreading throughout western Europe. But the fact remains that Paul I's chief accomplishment was his successful effort to clarify the boundaries of the Papal States, to stabilize the administration of his realm, and to establish the pope as the political sovereign of that new political entity during a period of uncertainty following the changes that had occurred while he was a key adviser to his brother and predecessor, Pope Stephen II.

Feast: June 28.

See Also: CAROLINGIAN REFORM.

Bibliography: Le Liber Pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE, 3 v., 2nd ed. (Paris 1955–1957) 1:463–467, English trans. in The Lives of the Eighth-Century Popes (Liber Pontificalis). The Ancient Biographies of Nine Popes from AD 715 to AD 817, trans. with intro. by R. DAVIS, Translated Texts for Historians 13 (Liverpool 1992) 77–84. Regesta Pontificum Romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum MCXCVIII, ed. P. JAFFÉ, 2 v., 2nd ed. (Leipzig 1885–1888) 1:277–283. P. CONTE, Regesto delle lettere dei papi del secolo VIII: saggi (Milan 1984) 97–117, 222–229. Codex Carolinus, Epp. 12–43, ed. W. GUNDLACH, Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Epistolae: Epistolae Merovingici et Karolini aevi, v. 1 (Berlin 1892; reprinted, 1994) 507–558. Concilia aevi karolini, Part 1, ed. A. WERMINGHOFF, Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Concilia, v. 2/1 (Hannover and Leipzig 1906; reprinted, 1997) 64–71.

[R. E. SULLIVAN]

PAUL II, POPE

Pontificate: Aug. 30, 1464 to July 26, 1471; b. Pietro Barbo in Venice, Feb. 23, 1417. Having spent his youth in Florence, he became archdeacon of Bologna and then bishop of Cervia and Vicenza before being created cardinal at the age of 23 by his uncle, Pope EUGENE IV. A man of considerable fortune, he had great influence in the Curia under Popes NICHOLAS V and CALLISTUS III and in 1456 became governor general of Campania and the maritime regions.

The CAPITULATIONS drawn up by the cardinals on the eve of the election of the successor to Pope PIUS II stated that the new pope, once elected, was to fix the number of cardinals at 24, reform the Curia, open a general council within the third year of his pontificate, and resume the war against the Turks. Paul was elected on the first ballot, but steadfastly refused to publish a bull confirming the provisions of the election pact. Supremely jealous of his authority, he ruled as an ostentatious monarch, imposing on the papal court a style in the mode of the first Italian Renaissance. Yet he himself was not a humanist in the full sense of the word; e.g., in 1468 he dissolved the Roman Academy founded by Pomponius Laetus, whose paganizing attitude struck the Pope as dangerous. (Paul's biography by Bartolomeo Platina, a member of the Academy, is understandably prejudiced.) On the other hand, Paul surrounded himself with scholars and encouraged the founding of Italy's first printing shop at SUBIACO (1465). His taste for pomp and luxury was expressed in the famous Palace of St. Mark, today the Palazzo Venezia, which he began in Rome as early as 1455 and made his principal residence from 1466 on.

Paul's pontificate was dominated by the intensification of the war against the OTTOMAN TURKS. Immediately, in 1464, Paul collected the funds necessary to renew the struggle, and in 1466 he gave his support to the Albanian chieftain Scanderbeg. To the profit of the Holy See he strengthened its alum monopoly by prohibiting any trading in alum with the Turks, but he could not prevent the fortress of Negropont (Euboea) from falling (July 1470). He was distracted from the struggle only when he felt it his duty to intervene in Bohemia in opposition to King George Poděbrad and the HUSSITE church. At the Pope's instigation, Matthias Corvinus, King of Hungary, declared war on Poděbrad (March 31, 1468), whom Paul had already declared deposed. Corvinus received the crown of Bohemia from the pope in March 1469. Poděbrad, meantime, had obtained the support of King Louis XI of France, and together they demanded the convocation of a general council of the Church and initiated a process against Paul's former favorite, Cardinal Jean Balue. To mollify Louis XI, who had earlier consented to the abolition of the PRAGMATIC SANCTION of Bourges (1461) despite the Parlement, Paul officially gave him and his successors the title "Most Christian King." Paul also devoted himself to the extirpation of the heretical FRATICELLI, initiating a process against them in 1466 and prosecuting their adherents in Germany. By his bull of Aug. 19, 1470, Paul decreed that in the future HOLY YEARS would be held every 25 years (beginning 1475). In the spring of 1471 he actually contemplated the convocation of a council in Ferrara. He tried for a reconciliation with the BYZANTINE CHURCH and was negotiating an alliance with the Iranian Prince Uzom-Hassan against the Turks when he died suddenly. His famous Renaissance tomb in the Vatican is the work of Mino of Fiesole and Giovanni Dalmato.

Bibliography: Pius II, . . . Commentarii . . . (Frankfort 1614). M. CANENSIUS, Pauli II. Pontificis Maximi vita . . . (Rome 1740). B. DE P. SACCHI, Platinae hystoria de vitis pontificum, 2 pts. (Paris 1505). P. MÜNTZ, Les Arts à la cour des papes . . . Paul II (Rome 1884). L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London-St. Louis 1938–61) 4:3–194, 475–504. R. WEISS, Un umanista veneziano: papa Paola II (Rome 1958). A. BOCK, Die "Sala Regia" im Vatikan als Beispiel der Selbstdarstellung des Papsttums in der zweiten Hälfte des 16. Jahrhunderts, (Hildesheim 1997). D. S. CHAMBERS, ed., War, Culture, and Society in Renaissance Venice (London 1993). A.J. DUNSTON, "Pope Paul and the Humanists," The Journal of Religious History (Sydney 1973), 287–306. A. ESCH, "Deutsche, Frühdrucker in Rom in den Registern Papst Paul II.:" Miscellanea Domenico Maeffe dicata. Historia. Ius. Studium (1995), 439–47. G. L. GEIGER, Filippino Lippi's

Carafa Chapel: Renaissance Art in Rome (Kirkville, Missouri 1986). P. LA BELLA, "Considerazioni sulla cultura a Roma durante il pontificato di Paolo II (1464–1471)," Studi Romano 44 (1996) 10–20. A. MEYUHAS GINIO, "Rêves de croisade les Sarracins dans la Castille du Xve siècle" Revue de l'Histoire et de Religions (Paris 1995) 145–74. M.D.C. MORALES MUÑIZ, Alfonso de Ávila, rey de Castilla, (Ávila 1988). R. J. PALERMINO, "The Roman Academy, the Catacombs and the Conspiracy of 1468," Archivum Historiae Pontificiae 18 (Rome 1980) 117–55. J. RAINER, "Die zweite Romfahrt Kaiser Friedrichs III," Geschichte und ihre Quellen. Festschrift für Friedrich Hausmann zum 70. Geburtstag (1987), 183–90. B. RESTANI, "La scomunica come arma politica. Sigismondo Pandolfo Malatesta, Ludovico II Gonzaga e la Santa Sede," Studi Romagnoli (Faenza 1996), 486–515. F.J. WORSTBROCK, Krieg und Frieden am Horizont des Renaissancehumanismus, (Weinheim 1986). G. ZANDER, "La possibile ricomposizione del monumento sepolcrale di Paolo II," Atti della Pontifica Accademia Romana di Archeologia. Rendiconti (Rome 1982–1984), 175–243. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 251.

[M. FRANÇOIS]

PAUL III, POPE

Pontificate: Oct. 13, 1534, to Nov. 10, 1549; b. Alessandro Farnese, Canino, February 29, 1468. He was a member of the distinguished Farnese family whose lands around the Bolsena Lake made them a powerful force in Italian history from the twelfth century. Alessandro was educated at Rome under Pomponius Laetus and later in Florence in the Medici house, where he was friendly with Giovanni de' Medici (later Leo X). Farnese's rise to prominence in the Church proved swift. He was created a cardinal by Alexander VI in 1493, partially because of the Pope's association with his sister, Guilia. Contemporaries dubbed him "Cardinal Petticoat." In time he served under four other pontiffs, Julius II, Leo X, Adrian VI, and Clement VII, until he became dean of the Sacred College. Alessandro's career was marked by living habits that reflected his position as a Renaissance cleric. He fathered four bastards, Pierluigi, Paolo, Ranuccio, and Constanza. Of these Pierluigi became Duke of Parma, Piacenza, and Castro, married Girolama Orsini, and was murdered in 1547. Ranuccio died in 1509, and Constanza married Boso II of the house of Sforza. After his elevation he raised to the cardinalate two of his grandsons, Alessandro Farnese and Ascanio Sforza. His scandalous life, coupled with his NEPOTISM, provoked many complaints from both Catholics and the newly formed Protestant groups. Alessandro was ordained in 1519 and from that time his moral life improved. However, he remained a son of the Renaissance, very much addicted to worldly pleasures. He loved the hunt and the brilliant pomp of ceremonies, and he was a devoted patron of the arts. He began the FARNESE palace; and he commissioned Michelangelo to construct St. Peter's Basilica and ordered him to paint the Last Judgment and the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel. Paul censured Michelangelo for the nudity of the figures in the painting, and for this the artist depicted the Pontiff among the damned with an ass's ear and a serpent round his body. Paul supported also the construction of the Sala Regia in the Vatican and the interior decoration of the papal apartment in Castel Sant' Angelo. For these commissions he was severely criticized because the tone of the frescoes and of other decorations was considered pagan in its genre. He selected Giulio Mazzoni to begin the Palazzo Spada. Paul III's tomb in St. Peter's, the work of Michelangelo's student, Giacomo della Porta, is considered one of the basilica's finest monuments.

Pope Paul II, marble bust by the 15th-century Venetian Bartolomeo Bellano, in the Palazzo Venezia, Rome. (Alinari–Art Reference/Art Resource, NY.)

Reform of the Church. Despite his preoccupation with the cultural trends of the Renaissance, Paul was able to lead the Church into an important period of reform. Modern historians have called him "the first reform pope," and the first Pope of the Counter-Reformation, and there is little doubt that he did create the atmosphere and the machinery that produced reform. At the time of his elevation, he was 67 and had twice before, in 1521 and 1523, almost been elected. Although the opposition of the Colonna and Medici families had previously prevented it, on October 13, 1534, he was unanimously elected. This man of violent temper, intelligence, and skilled diplomacy directed his varied talents to the problem of reform.

Pope Paul III.

The pontificate of Paul III proved stormy, but had its major accomplishments. In 1538 he placed England under the interdict and excommunicated HENRY VIII. In that same year he was able to persuade Francis I of France and the Emperor Charles V of Germany to sign the Truce of Nice. He urged the Catholic princes of Germany to take up arms against the Lutheran SCHMALKALDIC LEAGUE, in addition to persuading the French King to adopt a policy of severity toward the Huguenots. In the midst of these upheavals he labored for reform and an ecumenical council.

In the early months of his reign he ordered the cardinals to adopt a more modest way of life. He recognized that unless the Roman clergy were first reformed he could accomplish nothing for the rest of Christendom. One of the distinctive features of Paul's program was the appointment to the Consistory of new cardinals who were committed to a program of ecclesiastical reform. Among these were John FISHER; Reginald POLE; Giovanni Pietro Carafa, cofounder of the Theatines and later PAUL IV; Marcello Cervini, who became MARCELLUS II; and such outstanding humanists as Girolamo Aleandro and the layman Gasparo CONTARINI.

By the bull Sublimis Deus, Paul appointed a commission to examine the conditions of the Church and to suggest reform. Pole, Contarini, Carafa, and others composed the commission, and their report, published in January 1538, became the basis of much of the work of the Council of Trent. Paul also recognized the Society of Jesus in 1540 and the Ursulines in 1544, encouraged the Barnabites and Theatines, and suggested the foundation of the Somaschi. In 1542 a reformed Inquisition was created in Rome to fight "against all those who had departed from or who attacked the Catholic faith and to unmask such persons as were suspected of heresy." The Index followed, and in the next year enacted penalties for those who sold any condemned books. Paul made important strides toward reform, but his problems were compounded by difficulties in seeing his reforms carried out. Opposition came from the religious and, above all, from the secular rulers of the European world.

Imperial and French Opposition. The problems that the Pope faced seemed insurmountable. What should be included on the agenda of an ecumenical council? Should the Protestants be invited and, if so, should they be allowed to participate in the debates and discussions? Where should a council be held? Would it be better to accomplish reform simply by papal edict rather than run the risk of a resurgent conciliarism? Despite these obstacles, Paul announced that a council would convene at Mantua in May 1537. Unfortunately, the refusals of the French King and the German Emperor to allow their clergy to attend forced the Pope to postpone it. A similar opposition prevented its convocation for May 1, 1538. Francis I was playing a double game: he assured his Lutheran friends of the Schmalkaldic League that all was well, while he sought to frustrate any papal reforms for fear they would impair his control over the French Church. Charles V, who was also king of Spain, was a champion of reform for Spain, but he was opposed to it in the Holy Roman Empire. He regarded Lutheranism as a purely German problem and sought to resolve the logical differences himself.

The Council of Trent. On November 19, 1544, the bull Laetare Jerusalem announced that a council would meet at Trent on March 15, 1545. After eight years of frustration, Cardinal del Monte was able to celebrate the Mass of the Holy Ghost in the cathedral of Trent with four cardinals, four archbishops, 21 bishops, five generals of orders, and 50 theologians and canonists present. Despite the success in convoking the Council, Paul faced serious obstacles. The Germans insisted upon disciplinary reforms first so as not to alienate the Lutherans. The French, aided by national antagonisms, were suspected of Calvinistic leanings. The Spanish, who adopted a haughty attitude, felt that they were the sole defenders of the faith. Nonetheless, Paul had selected his papal legates wisely. These were men committed to reform and they included Giovanni del Monte; Marcello Crescenzi; Ercole Gonzaga; Giovanni Morone; Marcello Cervini; the Jesuits Claude Le Jay, Diego Laynez, and Alfonso Salmerón; the Augustinian, Girolamo Seripando; and others.

In these first years of Trent important matters were settled. These included the role of the Holy Scriptures as a rule of faith, justification, the Sacraments, and the doctrine of original sin. Disciplinary reform of the bishops was also adopted. However, in May 1547, a plague struck Trent; and although Paul transferred the Council to Bologna in February 1548, Charles V refused to permit the German and Spanish bishops to attend. Paul was forced to suspend the Council on September 17, 1549. He died November 10, at the age of 82.

The judgment of history has been favorable to Paul III. Despite a wayward life in his younger years, a tendency to support the Renaissance in an extravagant manner, and a weakness for his family, he remains best described as follows: "The supreme merit of Paul III is that he listened to this manifold voice, the voice of Christian conscience, and that he did its bidding according to his means."

Bibliography: B. SACCHI et al., Historia . . . de vitis Pontificum romanorum . . . ad Paulum V (Cologne 1611). P. S. PALLAVICINO, Istoria del concilio di Trento, 3 v. (Rome 1656–57). L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages, (London–St. Louis 1938–61) v.11–12. P. ACCAME, L'elezione del papa Paolo III (Finalborgo, Italy 1907). W. H. EDWARDS, Paul III. oder die geistliche Gegenreformation (Leipzig 1933). W. FRIEDENSBURG, Kaiser Karl V und Papst Paul III (Leipzig 1932). L. DOREZ, La Cour du Pape Paul III, 2 v. (Paris 1932). C. CAPASSO, Paolo III, 1534–1549, 2 v. (Messina 1923–24); La politica di papa Paolo III e l'Italia (Camerino, Italy 1901). H. JEDIN, History of the Council of Trent, tr. E. GRAF., P. JANELLE, The Catholic Reformation (Milwaukee 1949). H. DANIEL-ROPS, The Catholic Reformation, tr. J. WARRINGTON (History of the Church 5; New York 1963). L. MARCHAL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 12.1:9–20. R. BIRELEY, The Refashioning of Catholicism: A Reassessment of the Counter-Reformation (Washington D.C. 1999). Epistolae ad Principes. Leo X–Pius IV (1513–1565) ed. L. NANNI (Vatican City 1993). C. ROBERTSON, "Il Gran Cardinale." Alessandro Farnese, Parton of the Arts (New Haven 1993). P. PRODI and W. REINHARD, eds. Il concilio di Trento e il moderno (Bologna 1996). B. H. MCCLUNG, Italian Cardinals, Reform and the Church as Property, 1492–1563 (Berkeley 1985).

[C. L. HOHL, JR.]

Pope Paul IV, statue by Pirro Ligorio on the Pope's tomb in the church of S. Maria sopra Minerva, Rome. (Alinari–Art Reference/Art Resource, NY.)

PAUL IV, POPE

Pontificate: May 23, 1555, to Aug. 18, 1559; b. Gian Pietro Carafa, Sant' Angelo a Scala (Avellino), Italy, June 28, 1476. His family were of the counts of Maddaloni, a branch of the noble CARAFA (Caraffa) family of Naples. Much of his education he obtained at Rome in the household of his uncle, the brilliant Cardinal Oliviero Carafa. The exceptional quality of this instruction is apparent from the fact that Erasmus corresponded with him as a young man, praising his knowledge of the three academic languages and once inviting his assistance in translating into Latin the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures. Cardinal Jacopo SADOLETO, the famed humanist, knew him as a fellow student in Cardinal Carafa's home and bears witness to his sanctity and learning. During this formative period he served blamelessly in the corrupt court of Alexander VI as a cameriere pontificio.

The Theatines. As bishop, Carafa gave an edifying example for those times by living and working zealously in his Diocese of Chiete in Abruzzi (c. 1506–13). To this activity he added valuable experience abroad as a papal envoy and observer. He was in England as legate of Leo X to Henry VIII for collecting Peter's Pence (1513–14); then he visited Flanders (1515–17) and Spain (1517–20).

In 1524 Clement VII allowed him to resign his bishopric so that he and Gaetano da Thiene of Vicenza could fulfill their desire of founding a congregation of clerks regular dedicated to restoring the apostolic way of life. From Carafa's former Diocese of Chiete (Lat., Teate) they acquired the nickname of "Teatini." In 1527 the sack of Rome by the imperial forces put an end to the first Roman house of the THEATINES. Fleeing to Venice, they established another house, where Carafa remained until Paul III called him to Rome to make him a cardinal, December 22, 1536. In his 19 years as cardinal he was consistently anti-Spanish and anti-imperial. He aligned himself with the reform group in the Curia. In 1550 Julius III named him one of the six inquisitors of the Holy Office.

Reform Pope. At the death of Marcellus II (1555), Cardinal Alessandro Farnese turned all his influence in favor of Carafa, then dean of the Sacred College, and soon obtained the necessary votes for the 79-year-old Neapolitan. Carafa chose the name Paul out of respect for his earlier Farnese benefactor, Paul III.

Elected as a reformer, he lost some of his initial momentum and prestige by declaring an ill-considered war against the Spaniards, then in possession of a large part of Italy. He was in no sense a Julius II, however much he desired to drive the foreigner from the sacred soil. Moreover, to entrust the conduct of the war to his intriguing, self-aggrandizing nephew Carlo was an irremediable error. The Carafa family was defeated by the Duke of Alva, who was viceroy of Naples; the war ended with the generous peace of Cave, Sept. 12, 1557. After 1557 the aged Pope devoted himself entirely to the reform of the Church. Opposing conciliar methods, he did not resume the Council of Trent. Instead, he relied on the establishment of a commission to which he named good and learned cardinals, chiefly men whom he had elevated. He fought an uncompromising war against simony and eventually struck a decisive blow at nepotism by exiling his own nephews. He also insisted that bishops reside in their sees and not spend their time in Rome and elsewhere, and ordered the arrest of vagrant monks in Rome.

Unpopular Reign. His zeal for the Inquisition was common knowledge and the terror it provoked earned him great unpopularity. Even during his war with Spain he attended its sessions. The number and types of cases exceeded by far those of his predecessors. Virtuous men, such as Cardinal Giovanni MORONE, were called before it on frivolous charges. Moreover, a new and more rigorous Index Librorum Prohibitorum was enacted and enforced. He forced the Jews to wear a distinctive badge and in 1555 established the ghetto in Rome.

Despite his vigilance against heresy, Protestantism made bold advances throughout northern Europe, often abetted by political considerations. Furthermore, Paul's policies toward the great powers of Europe were usually shortsighted and often arbitrary and not adapted to the political realities of the sixteenth century.

When the Pope died, the Romans rioted, tore down his statues and opened the prisons of the Inquisition, displaying their relief that his severe, unpopular rule was over. Although the positive side of his reign was long obscured by the memory of the excesses of the Inquisition, it was an era of important reforms as well.

A good likeness of the Pontiff, almost the only one extant, is the statue on his tomb, which Pius V had built in 1566 in the Carafa chapel of S. Maria sopra Minerva, Rome. Although idealized, it seems to have caught the spirit of the elderly, stern, fiery, and erratic Neapolitan aristocrat.

Bibliography: L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages, (London–St. Louis 1938–61) 14:56–424; 15:381–429. G. M. MONTI, Ricerche su papa Paolo IV Carafa (Benevento 1925); Studi sulla riforma cattolica . . . (Trani, Italy 1941). P. PASCHINI, S. Gaetano Thiene, Gian Pietro Carafa e le origini dei chierici regolari teatini (Rome 1926). G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:200–202. C. V. DONATA, Paolo IV e il Processo Carafa (Milan 1993). T. TORRIANI, Una tragedia nel cinquecento. Paolo IV e i suoi Nepoti (Rome 1951). M. FIRPO, Inquisizione romana e Controriforma (Milan 1992). Epistolae ad Principes. Leo X–Pius IV (1513–1565) ed. L. NANNI (Vatican City 1993). E. G. GLEASON, "Who was the First Counter-Reformation Pope?" The Catholic Historical Review 81 (April 1995) 173–184. A. AUBERT, Paolo IV Carafa nel giudizio della eta Contrariforma. (Città di Castello 1990).

[H. H. DAVIS]

PAUL V, POPE

Pontificate: May 16, 1605, to Jan. 23, 1621; b. Camillo Borghese, Rome, Italy, Sept. 17, 1552. Camillo's family was Sienese and traced a distant relationship to St. Catherine of Siena. His ecclesiastical career began with studies in jurisprudence at Padua and Perugia. He was appointed extraordinary envoy to Philip II of Spain in 1593 and created cardinal in 1596 and vicar of Rome in 1603. In the conclave of 1605, although the youngest cardinal, he became a compromise choice. His esteem for law made him an unbending adversary in controversy, but did not prevent him from the indulgence of nepotism. To his nephew, Scipione Cafarelli Borghese, he gave the cardinalate (1605), a large number of benefices and the Secretariate of State.

As pope, Paul took great interest in the city of Rome. His name is perpetuated there through the chapel in the Basilica of Santa Maria Maggiore, where his body was buried after temporary interment in St. Peter's, and through the Villa Borghese built outside the ancient walls by his nephew, Cardinal Scipione Cafarelli Borghese. His plans for the renewal of Rome resulted in the lengthening of the nave of St. Peter's, the erection of the façade (designed by Maderno), additions to the Vatican Palace, the restoration of two aqueducts and the erection of many fountains, including those at the Ponte Sisto, the Castel Sant' Angelo, and St. Peter's Square. He established a grain storehouse for the poor (1606) and to aid the farmers of the Papal States, he established a credit agency on October 19, 1611.

Monument of Pope Paul V, sculpture by Silla da Viggi-, in the basilica of Santa Maria Maggiore, Rome. (Alinari–Art Reference/Art Resource, NY.)

Paul, during his pontificate, was confronted by three grave international religious problems. First, a resurgence of religious hostility between Catholics and Protestants in Germany led, in 1618, to the start of the THIRTY YEARS' WAR. He helped to subsidize the Catholic League. Then James I of England demanded from his subjects a new oath that denounced the papal claim to depose a ruler. Paul condemned this oath on September 22, 1606, and again in the following year. Finally, when the Republic of Venice climaxed a policy of increased usurpation of the rights of the Church by subjecting a bishop and an abbot to trial in the secular courts, Cardinal Alessandro Ludovisi, the future GREGORY XV, was sent to Venice to negotiate a settlement. An interdict was laid on the city and excommunication inflicted on the Doge and his senators from April 17, 1606, until April 21, 1607. The Theatines, Capuchins, and Jesuits were expelled, but the rest of the clergy disregarded the papal sanctions and supported the government. The schism was ended through the mediation of Henry IV of France.

During the pontificate of Paul V, the Copernican system was proposed again by Galileo GALILEI of Pisa. Chiefly because of the precipitate fashion in which the scientist questioned Biblical exegesis, the heliocentric theories received negative judgment by the Congregation of the Index, March 5, 1616.

Among the achievements of Paul's reign were the publication of the Rituale Romanum on June 20, 1614; the permission for the use of literary Chinese in the liturgy of the Chinese missions (later suspended after the creation of the Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide); and the ban of September 5, 1607, upon further discussion of disputed topics related to grace. He followed with interest the growth of the Church in Latin America, particularly the Jesuit REDUCTIONS OF PARAGUAY. He gave many volumes to the Vatican Library and, being a scholar, he directed the religious orders to teach their members Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and Arabic in the universities. He also provided an archive to preserve the documents of the Holy See. Paul promoted the cult of saints, canonizing

Charles Borromeo and Frances of Rome in a double ceremony on November 1, 1610. He beatified Ignatius of Loyola and Francis Xavier in company with the genial Philip Neri and the mystic Teresa of Avila. On February 24, 1612, he approved the Congregation of the Oratory founded by Philip Neri, and on May 10, 1613, the similar French Oratory of Pierre de Berulle. With his encouragement the Benedictine Congregation of St. Maurus was formed in 1618, and the first Visitation convent was organized by St. Francis de Sales and St. Jane Frances de Chantal. Paul also commissioned St. VINCENT DE PAUL in 1610 to represent the Pope at the court of King Henry IV of France.

Bibliography: P. PASCHINI and V. MONACHINO, I Papi nella storia, 2 v. (Rome 1961) 2:682–687. L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages, (London–St. Louis 1938–61) v. 25 and 26. L. MARSCHAL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 12.1:23–27, full bibliog. F. X. SEPPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20 Jh., (Leipzig 1931–41) 5:248–268. I. BEGAZZI, Memoriale di Pierto di Vincenzo Strozzi (Florence 1986). R. WOLFGANG, Papstfinanz und Nepotismus unter Paul V (Stuttgart 1974). P. SARPI, Considerazioni sopra le censure di Paolo V (Turin 1977). R. FELDHAJ, Galileo and the Church (New York 1995). S.F. OSTROW, Art and Spirituality in Counter-Reformation Rome (New York 1996).

[T. F. CASEY]

PAUL VI, POPE

Pontificate, June 21, 1963, to Aug. 6, 1978; b. Giovanni Battista Montini, at Concesio, Lombardy, Italy, Sept. 26, 1897; d. Castel Gandolfo, Italy.

Early Career

Born in Concesio, at the country home of the Montini family five miles from Brescia, Giovanni Battista was the second of three children. His brothers were Lodovico and Francesco. The family atmosphere was deeply religious with great interest in literary and political issues. His father, Giorgio (1860–1943), was a lawyer, landowner, editor of the daily newspaper, Il Cittadino di Brescia, and member of the Italian Chamber of Deputies (1919–26). His mother, Giuditta Alghisi (1874–1943), instilled a love of music, art, and languages in her sons that lasted throughout their lives. She was president of Women's Catholic Action in Brescia.

The young Montini was devout and intelligent, but plagued by medical problems that he never fully overcame. Educated in the Jesuit primary and secondary school, Cesare Arici Institute (1903–14), he also attended the state school, Liceo Arnaldo da Brescia, where he received the license (1916). The Oratorians at the Church of Santa Maria della Pace in Brescia were a major influence in his youth. He was especially close to the Oratorian priest, Giulio Bevilacqua, who broadened his cultural and intellectual interests. When he began studying for the priesthood, he attended lectures at Brescia's diocesan seminary, but studied and lived at home. Following his ordination at the age of 22 on May 29, 1920, he was sent to Rome to do graduate study in literature at the Sapienza University and philosophy and canon law at the Gregorian University. In 1922, he was selected to attend the Pontifical Academy of Noble Ecclesiastics, the school for training Vatican diplomats.

Pope Paul VI.

Secretariat of State. Montini began his thirty years of service in the Vatican Secretariat of State in October 1924 as an addetto (attaché); six months later he was promoted to the rank of minutante (secretary). During those years, he was also active as a chaplain to the Catholic students at the University of Rome. In 1925, he was appointed spiritual moderator to the Federation of Italian

Catholic University Students (Federazione Universitaria Cattolica Italiana known as FUCI) which faced the growing threat of the anti-clerical Fascist movement among university students. He and Iginio Righetti, President of FUCI, founded Studium, a small publishing company, and La Sapienza, a weekly newspaper. Montini published three books that were collections of his conferences. He also translated two French books into Italian: Three Reformers by Jacques Maritain (1928) and Personal Religion by Léonce de Grandmaison (1934).

In addition to his work in the Secretariat of State, in 1931 Montini began teaching a course on the history of papal diplomacy at the Academy of Noble Ecclesiastics. In December 1937, he was named sostituto (undersecretary or surrogate) for ordinary church affairs serving Cardinal Eugenio Pacelli, the secretary of state. When Pacelli became Pope PIUS XII in 1939, Montini continued in the same post with the new secretary of state, Cardinal Luigi Maglione. When the latter died in 1944, Pius XII did not appoint a secretary of state, and Montini worked directly with the Pope in charge of internal affairs of the Holy See. Msgr. Domenico Tardini handled external affairs. During World War II, Montini had many duties: to deal with the relief efforts of the Holy See, to oversee the tracing of prisoners of war, to protect political prisoners, especially Jews, and to assist displaced persons throughout Europe. After the war, he helped organize the Holy Year in 1950 and the Marian Year in 1954. In 1952, Pius XII asked both Montini and Tardini to accept the cardinalate, but they both declined the honor. In a gesture of appreciation for their work, the Pope gave both of them the title of Prosecretary of State.

Cardinals Karol Wojtyła (l) (later Pope John Paul II) and Stefan Wyszyński arriving from Poland for the funeral of Pope Paul VI, Rome, 1978. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Archbishop of Milan. Unexpectedly, Pius XII appointed Montini the Archbishop of Milan (Nov. 1, 1954)—a decision that may have been prompted by some internal conflicts within the CURIA. He departed Rome with some anxiety, but he was determined to face the pastoral challenges in Milan with its three and a half million people, 1,000 churches, and 2,500 priests. He rebuilt churches that had been bombed during the war and revitalized the social apostolate in this highly industrialized city that had been inundated by immigrants from the poorer areas of Italy. One of his goals was to win back the working class from Communist influences. Calling himself, “the archbishop of the workers,” he visited workers throughout the archdiocese and preached the social mission of the Gospel. Devoted to the disadvantaged, he was a frequent visitor to hospitals, orphanages, homes for the aged, and prisons. Using his excellent organizational skills, he planned an intense mission for three weeks in November of 1957. Priests, bishops, and hundreds of laypersons, delivered some 7,000 talks in parishes, cinemas, factories, and city streets to encourage lapsed Catholics to return to the Church. In his eight and a half years in Milan, he wrote eight pastoral letters to the faithful in the archdiocese, and each Holy Thursday he wrote a pastoral letter to his priests.

Cardinal. It had been expected that Pius XII would name Montini a cardinal soon after his appointment to Milan, but it did not happen, and the Pope died in 1958. At the papal election, Montini's name appeared on several of the ballots, thus becoming the first non-cardinal in centuries to receive votes in an election. The conclave chose Cardinal Angelo Roncalli, Patriarch of Venice, who became JOHN XXIII on Oct. 28, 1958. In his first consistory (Dec. 15, 1958), he created 23 new cardinals. The name of Archbishop Montini led the list of names that included his former fellow-worker in the secretariat of state, Msgr. Tardini. When John XXIII announced his intention to convene the Second VATICAN COUNCIL on January 25, 1959, he appointed Montini to both the Central Preparatory Commission and the Technical-Organizational Commission. Between 1959 and 1962, Montini delivered several important lectures on the nature of the forthcoming Council and devoted a 1962 pastoral letter to the faithful of Milan on that subject. He enthusiastically welcomed the Council, which he perceived to be a kairos, an exceptional opportunity for the Church to respond to the grace of God.

Although he was convinced that that Council would benefit the Church, he realized that it would not create a Church without imperfections. During the first session, he wrote weekly articles from Rome on the Council for L'Italia, the Catholic daily newspaper in Milan. He spoke twice at the first session: once on the schema on the liturgy (Oct. 22, 1962) and a second time on the schema on the Church (Dec. 5, 1962) in which he supported the views of Cardinal Léon-Joseph SUENENS on COLLEGIALITY.

Pontificate

At the death of John XXIII (June 3, 1963), Montini was favored as his successor by those who felt that he would continue the aggiornamento of Pope John. Not all the electors were of the same mind, however. It took six ballots on June 21 before he gained the two-thirds of the votes necessary for election. Elected at the age of 65, he appeared as a slim and austere figure who, at the time of his election, was 5 feet 10 inches tall and weighed 154 pounds. Taking the name Paul, he was determined that, like Paul the Apostle, his pontificate would spread the Gospel to the entire world. In his first message as Pope, the day after his election, he set forth his agenda: to continue Vatican II, to revise Canon Law, to work for peace and justice at all levels, and to seek Christian unity. Paul VI was crowned on June 30, 1963, giving his address in nine languages. He later sold his tiara to Cardinal Francis Spellman of New York and gave the money to the poor. Subsequently, he used the miter customarily worn by bishops.

Vatican II. As he had promised, Paul VI convened the second session of the Council, September 29, 1963. In his opening address he spoke of the purposes of the Council: to seek a fuller definition of the Church using proper images and to have a deeper understanding of the episcopate; to renew the Catholic Church; to restore the unity of all Christians and to ask forgiveness for the faults of the Catholic Church; and to initiate a positive dialogue with contemporary society that conveys the truth of the Gospel.

Paul VI was well equipped to deal with the Council because of long administrative experience in the secretariat of state and in Milan. He knew the Curia thoroughly. Their actions may not have always pleased him, but they rarely surprised him. He was actively involved in the three sessions of the Council over which he presided. He decided that the Council would not discuss birth control, since the Pontifical Study Commission on Family, Population, and Birth Problems that was established by John XXIII in 1963 had not completed its work. Some of the Fathers wanted the Council to discuss clerical celibacy, but the Pope did not agree. He explained his reasons in a letter (Oct. 10, 1965) to the Council: "It is not opportune to debate publicly this topic. Our intention is not only to preserve this ancient law, but to strengthen its observance." His hope during the Council was that the final documents would be supported by the entire body and not just a slight majority. He was reluctant to stop debate on critical issues. At the end of the third session, for example, Cardinal Tisserant, speaking for the Council Presidency, announced that the preliminary vote on the hotly debated issue of religious liberty would be postponed to the next session. In response to that decision, some 1,000 Council Fathers signed a petition that was brought to the Pope requesting "urgently, very urgently, most urgently" that the schema be voted on in that session. Paul VI did not change the ruling of Tisserant.

As a member of the Council as well as its head, he suggested amendments to several of the documents: ecumenism, missionary activity, revelation, Eastern Catholic Churches, and religious liberty. Yet not all of his interventions were accepted. His suggestion that the Constitution on the Church (Lumen gentium) state that the Bishop of Rome is responsible to the Lord alone was not approved by the Theological Commission. Nor was another request, made in the first session before he was pope, that the Council declare "Mary Mother of the Church," accepted. Nonetheless Paul VI used this title of Mary in his allocution closing the third session in November 1964. He invited a certain number of laymen, lay and religious women, and priests to attend the Council as auditors. Forty Orthodox and Protestant observers were present in the first session of the Council. With the support of Paul VI, their number grew to 100 by the end of the Council.

Implementation. Vatican II ended Dec. 8, 1965, and the Pope proceeded to implement its 16 documents. He soon discovered that it was a daunting task as he faced unrealistic expectations of the Council, curial opposition, and a crisis in culture in the 1960s that questioned the very existence of authority and tradition. One of the first tasks of Paul VI was the reform of the Curia, a move which many older prelates resented. The apostolic letter Ecclesiae sanctae (Aug. 6, 1966) decreed that bishops are to submit their resignations to the Pope no later than their seventy-fifth birthday. The apostolic constitution Regimini ecclesiae universae (August 15, 1967) urged greater consultation and cooperation among the curial offices and set a five-year term for heads and members of Roman congregations which may be extended by the Pope. Finally, the motu proprio Ingravescentem aetatem (Nov. 21, 1970) ruled that cardinals in charge of departments in the Roman Curia are to submit their resignation at the completion of their seventy-fifth year, and that on completion of eighty years of age cardinals cease to be members of the departments of the Roman Curia and lose the right to elect the Pope and to enter the conclave. Several cardinals, Eugène Tisserant and Alfredo Ottaviani among them, were bitterly opposed to this ruling. In addition, the Pope internationalized and expanded the College of Cardinals by adding new members from the Third World. In all he created 144 cardinals. The number of cardinals eligible to vote in papal elections was set at 120 (Apostolic constitution Romano Pontifici Eligendo, October 1, 1975).

The Pope established three permanent offices to carry out the major directives of the Council: the SECRETARIAT FOR NON-CHRISTIANS, the SECRETARIAT FOR NON-BELIEVERS, and the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity. A day before the end of the Council, he issued a decree reforming the Holy Office which was to be called the Congregation of the Doctrine of the Faith (Motu proprio Integrae servandae, Dec. 7, 1965) and abolished the four-century old Index of Forbidden Books. The Pope also decided to continue the Commission for the Revision of Canon Law, which John XXIII had established in 1959, but appointed its first members only in March 1963. John Paul II finally approved the revised Code of Canon Law in 1983.

Collegiality—the cooperation between the Pope and the bishops—was an important part of the postconciliar efforts of Paul VI. For him, the episcopate was not in opposition to the Pope, “but working with him and under him for the common good and supreme end of the Church itself.” In 1966, the Pope in Ecclesiae sanctae mandated that each nation or territory establish a permanent conference of bishops, if one did not already exist. The Synod of Bishops is another important organ of collegiality that was formally established by Paul VI on Sept. 15, 1965, by the motu proprio Apostolica sollicitudo. The purpose of this consultative body is to foster a close relationship between the Pope and the bishops and to facilitate agreement on essential points of doctrine and policy. The five synods he convoked were all held in Rome and dealt with the following issues: 1967—the relationship between the primacy and the episcopacy; 1969—dangers to the faith, revision of canon law, seminaries, mixed marriages, and liturgy; 1971—the ministerial priesthood and justice in the world; 1974—evangelization (see EVANGELII NUNTIANDI); and 1977—catechetics.

Liturgical rites were extensively revised after the Council. The Pope approved the use of the vernacular in the liturgy and new translations of liturgical texts. After a long process, approval was given for a new Order of the Mass and a revised breviary. By the apostolic letter Sacrum diaconatus ordinem (June 19, 1967), Paul VI authorized the restoration of the permanent diaconate in the Latin rite that allowed married men to be ordained to that office. The apostolic letter Ministeria quaedam (August 15, 1972) decreed that laymen could be installed in the ministries of lector and acolyte. Laws of fasting and abstinence were modified; the Eucharist fast was reduced to one hour before reception.

Archbishop Marcel LEFEBVRE, a leader in the traditionalist movement, who vehemently opposed most of these liturgical changes, founded the Society of St. Pius X, which attracted a large number of followers. Efforts by Rome at reconciliation failed. In June 1976, Paul VI withdrew canonical approval of the Society of St. Pius X and prohibited Archbishop Lefebvre from exercising his priestly powers. When Lefebvre ordained four bishops in 1988 without Roman approval, he and the four bishops he ordained were automatically excommunicated.

International Travel. Like the Apostle Paul, Paul VI was an itinerant preacher of the Gospel. He was the first Pope to travel outside of Italy since Napoleon took Pius VII into captivity in 1809. He was also the first reigning Pope to travel by air, as well as the first to visit the United States, India, Africa, and the Holy Land. During his pontificate he travelled some 70,000 miles. He had planned to join the celebration of the 1,000th anniversary of Christianity in Poland in 1966, but the Polish government did not allow it.

In all Paul VI made nine pastoral pilgrimages. 1) In January 1964, in Jerusalem he embraced and exchanged the kiss of peace with Athenagoras, the Ecumenical Patriarch of Constantinople, and together they recited the Lord's Prayer. 2) In December 1964, he stopped in Lebanon on his way to Bombay, India for the International Eucharistic Congress. 3) In a moving address in French to the General Assembly of the United Nations in 1965, he said that the Church is "an expert in humanity," and he pleaded for world peace: "No more war. War never again." He concluded his one day visit to New York by celebrating Mass at Yankee Stadium before 90,000. 4) The occasion for his visit to Portugal in 1967 was the fiftieth anniversary of the appearances of Our Lady at Fatima. 5) In July 1967, meeting with Patriarch Athenagoras in Istanbul, Paul VI said that Rome and Constantinople regard each other as sister Churches. 6) The occasion of his visit to Colombia, August 1968, was the Eucharistic Congress at Bogotá and the meeting of the Latin American Bishops' Conference (CELAM) at Medellín. 7) In Geneva, Switzerland, June 1969, the Pope attended ceremonies celebrating the 50th anniversary of the International Labor Organization. He also visited the headquarters of the World Council of Churches and introduced himself with the words: "We are here among you. Our name is Peter." 8) Uganda July 1969. In Kampala he prayed at the shrine of the 22 Ugandan martyrs that he had canonized in 1964. He encouraged the African bishops to develop a genuine African Christianity. 9) Far East, November 1970. This ten-day visit was his longest. He stopped at Tehran, Karachi, Manila, Samoa, Australia, Jakarta, and Sri Lanka. At the Manila airport, he narrowly escaped an assassination attempt by a knife-wielding Bolivian painter. The Pope forgave him on the spot.

Ecumenism. Paul VI had an unswerving commitment to the unity of all Christians, but he was realistic about the difficulty his own office posed. In an address to the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity (April 29, 1967), he said: "The Pope, as we well know, is undoubtedly the greatest obstacle in the path of ecumenism." His relationship with Athenagoras, the Ecumenical Patriarch of Constantinople, is legendary. They met three times. At their first meeting during the Pope's trip to the Holy Land in January of 1964, they exchanged gifts of special significance, and later in September of 1964, Paul VI returned the head of St. Andrew the Apostle, the brother of Simon Peter, to the Orthodox Church in Patras, Greece. This relic, taken by the Crusaders, had been in the possession of the Vatican since 1462. Before the Council Mass on December 7, 1965, a joint statement from the Pope and the Patriarch was read, lifting the mutual anathemas that were made by representatives of the two Churches in Constantinople in 1054. In his visit to Turkey in July 1967, Paul visited Athenagoras a second time in Istanbul. The Pope spoke of "the dialogue of charity" between the two Churches, and the Patriarch welcomed the Pope as "the very holy successor of Peter who has Paul's name and his conduct as a messenger of charity, union, and love." A third meeting took place in Oct. 1967, when Athenagoras visited the Pope in Vatican City. It was the first time a reigning Ecumenical Patriarch had ever been to Rome. Athenagoras called the Pope the "Bishop of Rome, bearer of apostolic grace," and described the See of Rome as "the first in honor and order in the living body of the Christian Churches scattered throughout the world."

The Pope also received visits from two Anglican Archbishops of Canterbury: Michael Ramsey and Donald Coggan. He gave a warm fraternal embrace to Archbishop Ramsey when they met in March 1966 and said to him: "By your coming here you rebuild a bridge which for centuries has lain fallen between the Church of Rome and Canterbury." The Pope gave his own episcopal ring to the Archbishop who in turn gave the Pope a pectoral cross. This meeting led to the establishment of the ANGLICAN-ROMAN CATHOLIC INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION (ARCIC). In 1966, the Pope had a lengthy conversation with the Reformed theologian Karl BARTH. In 1973, he met with the Buddhist Patriarch and with the Dalai Lama. Paul VI's deep desire for Christian unity is reflected in his will published shortly after his death: "The work of drawing closer to our separated brethren should continue with great understanding, with great patience, and with great love, but without deviating from the true Catholic understanding."

Diplomatic Relations. Paul VI's willingness to negotiate with countries behind the Iron Curtain was his most controversial diplomatic initiative. This policy of Ostpolitik continued the "opening to the left" of John XXIII. The Pope condemned atheistic materialism and all violations against social justice, but he felt that accommodation was more productive than confrontation in improving relations between the Church and Communist countries. Cardinals József Mindszenty of Hungary and Josef Slipyj from Ukraine, both of whom had been imprisoned by the Communists, severely criticized the Vatican's negotiations with the East. Yet the policy of détente produced some favorable results and led to the restoration of the hierarchy and greater freedom for Church activities. Hungary and Czechoslovakia, for example, made significant concessions that allowed the Church greater freedom. The Pope met with several Communist leaders: President Nikolai Podgorny and Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko of the Soviet Union, Premier Nicolas Ceausescu of Romania, Marshall Tito of Yugoslavia, and other high-ranking officials from Poland, Hungary, and Bulgaria. Many Western leaders also visited the Pope, including Presidents Kennedy, Johnson, Nixon, and Ford. Paul VI established diplomatic relations with more than 40 countries. In 1964, the Holy See established an office of permanent observer at the United Nations.

Writings and Other Activities. Paul VI wrote seven encyclicals. 1) Ecclesiam Suam (August 6, 1964) anticipated some of the themes that were to appear in Lumen Gentium of Vatican II. The Pope urged the Church to have a greater awareness of itself, to undertake necessary reforms, and to establish a dialogue with the world. 2) Mense maio (April 29, 1965) called for Christians to pray for the success of the Council and for world peace. 3) Mysterium fidei (Sept. 3, 1965) presented the traditional teaching of the Church on the mystery of the Holy Eucharist. 4) Christi matri (Sept. 15, 1966) appealed for prayers for peace and explained the value of devotion to the rosary. 5) Populorum progressio (March 26, 1967) discussed the development of peoples. It warned that the disparity between nations jeopardizes peace and that wealthier nations should help poorer ones. All nations have the duty to promote human solidarity. "Development," he said "is another name for peace." 6) Sacerdotalis caelibatus (June 24, 1967) reaffirmed the role of celibacy for clerics in the Latin Church. He described priestly celibacy as "a heavy and sweet burden" and a "total gift" of the priest to God and to the Church. 7) HUMANAE VITAE (July 25, 1968) condemned abortion, sterilization, and artificial birth control. It taught that "each and every marriage act must remain open to the transmission of life" (No. 11). This last encyclical created a crisis in the Church, especially in the Western world. Some had expected change in the traditional teaching, especially since the majority of the papal commission on birth control recommended some modification. Others argued that Paul VI did not follow the principle of collegiality, since he failed to consult adequately with the episcopal conferences. Large numbers of Catholics ignored the teaching of the encyclical and many priests resigned over it. On the tenth anniversary of Humanae vitae in 1978, Paul VI referred to it as "a painful document of our pontificate," but he remained convinced that its teaching was correct.

Two of the most significant documents written by Paul VI were not encyclicals. The apostolic letter Octagesima adveniens (May 14, 1971), issued on the 80th anniversary of the encyclical Rerum novarum (1891) of Leo XIII, recognized that the world faced new social challenges and that Christians, relying on their faith, have a personal responsibility to promote justice in their particular situations. The apostolic exhortation EVANGELII NUNTIANDI (Dec. 8, 1975) taught that the proclamation of the Gospel, evangelization, is linked to social justice and must oppose all forms of cultural, political, or economic domination. In other addresses, Paul VI emphasized the essential unity of the human race and pleaded for peace in Vietnam, Northern Ireland, and the Middle East. He condemned all forms of oppression, but opposed violence or terrorism as acceptable ways to promote justice. In January 1967, he established the Pontifical Commission for Justice and Peace, and in 1968 he instituted the World Day of Peace to be observed annually on January 1. With good reason, he called himself an "apostle of peace."

The pope named St. TERESA OF AVILA and St. CATHERINE OF SIENA as Doctors of the Church in 1970, the first women to be so honored. He canonized 84 saints including the 22 Ugandan martyrs, the 40 martyrs of England and Wales, and two Americans: Elizabeth Ann Bayley Seton and John Nepomucene Neumann. Throughout his pontificate he created 144 cardinals with a great number coming from the Third World. He had appointed 100 of the 111 cardinals who were eligible to vote for his successor. Paul VI held more than 700 general audiences.

Assessment

The last ten years of his pontificate (1968–78) were difficult for Paul VI. He was more withdrawn and troubled by the negative reaction to Humanae vitae, the polarity between conservatives and liberals, the massive departure from priestly and religious life, and the lack of vocations. The Pope told Jean Guittou that Archbishop Lefebvre, who defiantly opposed the reform of the liturgy, was "the greatest cross of my pontificate." Rumors that Paul VI would resign on his 70th birthday or later on his 80th were unfounded. In fact, he remained quite active during that decade in writing, travelling, and caring for his flock. His increasing lament over international terrorism and the "renaissance of barbarism" touched him personally when his close friend, Aldo Moro, former premier of Italy, was kidnapped and murdered by the Red Brigades in May 1978.

Debilitating arthritis and acute cystitis weakened him in the summer of 1978. On August 6, he died of a heart attack at Castel Gandolfo. The Pope requested a simple funeral: "I would like to be in real earth with a humble sign indicating the place and inviting Christian mercy. No monument for me." He was buried in a simple wooden coffin in the crypt of St. Peter's. His cause for beatification was introduced on May 11, 1993.

Some observers have compared Paul VI to Hamlet—vacillating, weak, and indecisive. Certainly by nature he was cautious and circumspect. His 30 years experience in the Curia taught him to favor an orderly administrative process and to avoid rash decisions. His style was to move slowly, to examine all aspects of an issue before taking action. Paul VI was aware that some saw him as timid and apprehensive. Toward the end of his pontificate in 1975, when he was 78 years old, the Pope reflected on his life. He noted: "What is my state of mind? Am I Hamlet or Don Quixote? On the left? On the right? I do not feel I have been properly understood. My feelings are 'Superabundo gaudio.' I am filled with comfort, overcome with joy, throughout every affliction."

Paul VI was a man of the Church devoted to God's people. Labels do not easily apply to him. As he noted: "A Pope must be neither a reactionary nor a progressive. He must be a Pope—that's all." He tried to be even-handed and not vindictive or petty. Although he felt criticism deeply and was given to occasional moments of isolation and self-doubt, he never personally condemned those who disagreed with him. He showed extraordinary patience in dealing with those who dissented from Humanae Vitae, with priests who left the active ministry and sought laicization, with problems in the Dutch Church, and with theologians such as Hans Küng and Ivan Illich. The only condemnation he made was his suspension of Archbishop Lefebvre whose continued defiance of Vatican directives left the Pope no other choice.

Paul VI's two greatest achievements were the continuance of Vatican II and its implementation. In both instances, he showed by his remarkable resolve and decisiveness that he was far removed from the attitude of Hamlet. In his decision to continue Vatican II, he manifested his acceptance of the Council and its importance in the life of the Church. His active engagement in the conciliar proceedings and interventions at difficult moments enabled the Council to complete its work successfully. The implementation of the Council, which occupied the remaining years of his pontificate, was often a continuing and painful struggle for the Pope. Yet in the turmoil of the postconciliar period, he avoided schism within the Roman Catholic Church. Through skillful oversight, he was able to affirm the value of the world without diminishing the uniqueness of the Church; to encourage collegiality and still preserve papal prerogatives; to reform the Curia without losing its support; to support ecumenism without sacrificing Catholic identity; and to revise the liturgy without jettisoning its traditional richness. In a word, the Pope accomplished his greatest challenge: to balance tradition and reform without compromising either.

Bibliography: P. ARATÓ and P. VIAN, Paulus PP. VI, 1963–1978. Elenchus Bibliographicus (Brescia 1981). Insegnamenti di Paolo VI, 1963–1978, 16 v. (Vatican City 1965–1979). The Teachings of Pope Paul VI 1968–1975, 9 v. (Vatican City 1968–1975). The Istituto Paolo VI in Brescia regularly publishes: Quaderni, Notiziario, and reports of conferences. J. G. CLANCY, Apostle for Our Time: Pope Paul VI (New York 1963). J. GUITTON,

The Pope Speaks: Dialogues of Paul VI with Jean Guilton (New York, 1968). P. HEBBLETHWAITE, Paul VI: The First Modern Pope (New York 1993). Paul VI et la modernité dans l'Église: Actes du colloque organisé par l'École française de Rome (Rome and Brescia 1984). N. VIAN, ed. Anni e opere di Paolo VI (Rome 1978).

[P. GRANFIELD]

PAUL OF BURGOS

Spanish bishop, exegete, apologist; b. Burgos c. 1351; d. Burgos, Aug. 29, 1435. Since he was born of a wealthy Jewish family (and first known as Solomon ha-Levi), he began his career as a learned rabbi. The study of Sacred Scripture and philosophy, particularly the Summa theologiae of St. Thomas, led him to the Christian faith. He was baptized in 1390, when he took the name of Paul of St. Mary, and, not long after, following the death of his wife, he was ordained a priest. In 1405, he became bishop of Cartagena, and in 1415 bishop of Burgos. The next year he was appointed lord chancellor of Castile. His principal works are his Additiones (1429–31) to the Postilla of Nicholas of Lyra on all the Sacred Scriptures, and his Dialogus . . . contra perfidiam Iudaeorum, finished in 1434, and printed several times (Mantua 1475; Mainz 1478; Paris 1507, etc.). The 1591 Burgos edition of the latter work contains a biographical sketch of Paul by C. Sanctotisius. Paul surpassed Nicholas of Lyra in his knowledge of Hebrew, but not in exegetical skill.

Bibliography: M. KAYSERLING, The Jewish Encyclopedia, ed. J. SINGER, 13 v. (New York 1901–06) 9:562–563. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 5 v. in 6 (3d ed. Innsbruck 1903–1913) 2:812–814.

[L. F. HARTMAN]

PAUL OF CANOPUS

Egyptian monk, patriarch of Alexandria from 536 to 539. Nothing is known of Paul's background or education. He was one of the monks sent to Constantinople in 536 to complain to JUSTINIAN I about the Origenistic disturbances in Egypt. While there he made the acquaintance of the Roman deacon and future pope, PELAGIUS I, who recommended him to the emperor to succeed Theodosius, the deposed Monophysite patriarch of Alexandria. Paul was consecrated at Constantinople in the presence of Pelagius by the patriarch MENNAS toward the end of 536 or early in 537 and was sent to Egypt with orders to pacify the religious situation. He had to use military assistance to take possession of his patriarchal see, and he conducted himself with such violence against Monophysite groups that he worsened the situation. He was accused of having demanded the torture and death of the deacon Psoïs, suspected of intrigue against the patriarch. This execution caused a great stir (Liberatus, 23; Procopius, Hist. arcana, 150–152); and in its wake, the city magistrate Arsenius and the augustal prefect Rhodon were executed. Paul fled to Gaza, where at the instance of Justinian, a synod was held in 539 by the patriarchs Ephrem of Antioch, Peter of Jerusalem, and Hypatius of Ephesus and the imperial official Eusebius, in the presence of the deacon Pelagius. Paul was deposed and exiled, and another monk, Zoïlus, was nominated patriarch of Alexandria.

Bibliography: J. MASPERO, Histoire des patriarches d'Alexandrie (Paris 1923) 129ff. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935–) 4:455. L. DUCHESNE, L'Église au VI^e siècle (Paris 1925) 103–105; 169–170.

[P. ROCHE]

PAUL OF SAMOSATA

Heretical bishop of Antioch (260–268); b. Samosata on the Euphrates. He had acquired wealth and influence under Odenatus II, King of Palmyra, after the Persian defeat of the Roman Emperor VALERIAN (260). Under Queen Zenobia, Paul succeeded Demetrianus as bishop of Antioch, while retaining his secular position. In 264, as a result of widespread criticism of his conduct and doctrine, Bps. FIRMILIAN of Caesarea and Helenus held a synod of local bishops in Antioch to consider those accusations that referred to his financial interests and misconduct as well as to his encouragement of East Syrian usages, such as the VIRGINES SUBINTRODUCTAE and the chanting of psalms by alternating choirs of virgins and men. He was also accused of banning hymns in honor of Christ since “he considered Him but an ordinary man” (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 7.27.2). Paul was judged in two further synods at Antioch, and was deposed in 268. Credit for his final condemnation is given to the priest Malchion, who had been head of a school of rhetoric at Antioch (Jerome, De vir. ill. 71).

Paul of Samosata's doctrine is known only from records of the debate with Malchion preserved in the works of HILARY OF POITIERS (De synodis 81.86); St. Basil (Ep. 52); the De sectis (3.3); JUSTINIAN I; and in the account given by Eusebius (Hist. eccl. 7.27), who says that the council that condemned Paul sent an encyclical letter to Pope DIONYSIUS and Bp. Maximus of Alexandria for distribution in all the provinces. A Letter to Hymnaeus supposedly sent by six bishops to Paul before the Council of 268 seems apocryphal, as are the Orationes to Sabinus.

The Council that condemned Paul is said to have repudiated the term HOMOIOUSIOS, or consubstantial, which is the orthodox term explaining the equality of Godhead in Christ and the Father, because Paul used it in a modalist sense. He is accused of having “given the name of Father to God Who created all things, that of Son to Him Who was purely Man, and that of the Spirit to the grace which resided in the Apostles” (De sectis 3.3) and of having considered Jesus to be greater than Moses, but not to be God. His doctrine thus recognized a Trinity merely of names, for he taught MONARCHIANISM; in the area of CHRISTOLOGY he is considered one of the founders of ADOPTIONISM.

Bibliography: G. BARDY, Paul de Samosate (Spicilegium sacrum Lovaniense 4; 1923); Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 12.1:46–51. J. QUASTEN, Patrology (Westminster MD 1950) 2:140–142. H. J. LAWLOR, “Sayings of Paul of Samosata,” Journal of Theological Studies 19 (1917–18) 20–45, 115–120. F. LOOFS, Paulus von Samosata (Leipzig 1924). H. DE RIEDMATTEN, Les actes du procès de Paul de Samosate (Fribourg 1952). R. M. GRANT, Vigilae christianae 3 (1949) 225–229.

[P. LEBEAU]

PAUL OF THE CROSS, ST.

Mystic, missionary, spiritual director, and founder of the PASSIONISTS; b. Ovada, Italy, January 3, 1694; d. Rome, Italy, October 18, 1775. His parents, Luke Danei and Ann Marie Massari, although members of nobility, were neither wealthy nor privileged. Even though the town hall at Castellazzo had been at an earlier date the family manor, Luke Danei, a cloth merchant, was in constant financial distress. Paul Francis, the second of 16 children, had to discontinue his education at a boarding school in Genoa, and once pawned his possessions to relieve his father's embarrassment. Deprived of a formal education, he completed his studies through his own initiative and industry. His correspondence manifests a thorough study of Sacred Writ (especially the New Testament), a mastery of his native Italian, and a competency in Latin. A leader by nature, strong willed but gentle, Paul easily won the confidence of his contemporaries. Long before his own vocation was definite, he was instrumental in determining the vocations of many of his companions by his counsel and example. Simultaneously with compassion for others whose spiritual and physical poverty he keenly felt, there existed in his soul an equally strong attraction toward contemplation, solitude, and penance. The resultant tension was not resolved until he established a new order of penitential missionaries, combining a vigorous apostolate with exact monasticism.

The Vocation. In 1713 Paul was stirred by a parish sermon to serve God. Two years later he enlisted in the army of the Venetian Republic, desiring to die for his faith in the Turkish Wars. In prayer he recognized his destiny would be otherwise, and he returned to Castellazzo, where in 1720 he had what he called the “great vision,” beholding himself in God clothed in the habit that was to become the distinctive garb of his congregation. Under the direction of Arborio di Gattinara, bishop of Alessandria, he spent 40 days in prayer and penance and composed his rule. Although it took Paul of the Cross only five days to write it, the years before its approval were long and trouble-laden. Twenty-one years elapsed before BENEDICT XIV in 1741 approved the Passionist rule and institute and admitted Paul’s first followers to religious profession. In the meantime Paul had been ordained together with his saintly brother, John Baptist (1727), and had begun one of the most illustrious missionary careers of the 18th century.

From his first mission at Grazi’s Ferry in 1730 to his last at the age of 75 in the Basilica of Santa Maria in Trastevere, Rome, he exemplified the primary apostolate of his congregation, the ministerium verbi. For him the parochial mission was a confrontation of the Christian with Christ in the paradox of the cross that evoked a commitment to crucifixion in the continuing passion of Christ and its redemptive work in the daily lives of his hearers. To achieve this he developed a participated mission method that involved the laity in an active role in processions, street preaching, vigils, penitential works and sacrifices, hymns, prayers, and at times in the sermon itself. Its success accounts for the solid growth of the order in its first period.

Role as Organizer. Besides carrying on a strenuous missionary apostolate, Paul governed his rapidly expanding congregation. Before his death he had made 12 foundations, established two provinces, and presided over six general chapters in addition to founding a second order, the strictly enclosed Passionist Nuns. He also found time for the difficult and delicate task of directing souls. One-fourth of his extant letters (not more than 3,000 have come down out of a conservative estimate of more than 10,000) are concerned with spiritual direction; many of them are small treatises on ascetical and mystical theology.

Mystic of the Cross. The impressive external works of Paul of the Cross, as founder, preacher, missionary, and spiritual director, were crowned by remarkable mystical experience. Above all else Paul is the mystic of the cross. Nothing was more contemporary to him than the Passion of Christ. To keep not its memory but its actuality effective in present society was the purpose of his life. Three periods are discernible in his mystical progress: 12 years of extraordinary visions and graces mingled with trials (1713–25); followed by 45 years of interior desolation, vicarious reparation, and intense sufferings (1725–70); and finally, the last years dominated by astonishing mystical phenomena, consolations, and extraordinary favors. Paul’s importance to ascetical and mystical theology is studied in the works of R. Garrigou-Lagrange, J. de Guibert, M. Villet, Jules Lebreton, C. Brovotto, and others. Paul of the Cross was canonized by PIUS IX on June 29, 1867.

St. Paul of the Cross, after a painting from life, 1733, by Domenico Porta, original at motherhouse of the Passionists at Rome.

Feast: Oct. 19 (formerly April 28).

Bibliography: Lettere di S. Paolo della Croce, ed. A. DELLA MADRE DEL BUON PASTORE, 4 v. (Rome 1924); “Diary of St. Paul of the Cross,” Cross and Crown 6, 127–146; Lettere a laici ed ecclesiastici, ed. C. CHIARI (Rome 1974); Words from the Heart: A Selection from the Personal Letters of Saint Paul of the Cross, tr. E. BURKE, ed. R. MERCURIO and S. ROUSE (Dublin 1976); La muerte mística, ed. and tr. A. M. ARTOLA (Bilbao 1986). B. DE SAN PABLO, La espiritualidad de la Pasión en el magisterio de S. Pablo de la Cruz (Madrid 1961). E. ZOFFOLI, S. Paolo della Croce (Rome 1963–). C. ALMERAS, St. Paul of the Cross, tr. A. BOUCHARD (New York 1960). FATHER EDMUND, Hunter of Souls (Westminster, Md. 1947). M. BIALAS, Das Leiden Christi beim hl. Paul vom Kreuz (Aschaffenburg 1978) tr. as The Mysticism of the Passion in St. Paul of the Cross (San Francisco 1990). J. MEAD, ed., St. Paul of the Cross: A Source/Workbook for Paulacrucian Studies (New Rochelle, N.Y. 1983). B. KELLEY, Listen to His Love (Union City, N.J. 1985); Spiritual Direction According to St. Paul of the Cross (Staten Island, N.Y. 1993). A. CALABRESE, Maestro e mistico (Rome 1993). A. LIPPI, Mistico ed evangelizzatore (Cinisello Balsamo, Milan 1993).

[C. J. YUHAUS]

PAUL THE DEACON

Carolingian historian of the Lombards, poet, grammarian; b. c. 730; d. Monte Cassino, 799(?). Paul was apparently of noble Lombard family, the son of Warnefrid and Theodolinda. As a youth he was sent to the court of King Rachis at Pavia, where he received an excellent education under Flavianus. He knew some Greek and Hebrew. While associated with the Lombard Princess Adelperga, beautiful daughter of King Desiderius, he composed (c. 770) in her honor a poem, a chronology of world history in which the acrostic Adelperga pia appears. She induced him to join the court of her husband, Duke Arichis of Benevento, an important ally of the Lombards in southern Italy. Paul remained there until the conquest of the LOMBARDS by CHARLEMAGNE (773–774), when he entered MONTE CASSINO. It seems unlikely that he was ever a monk at St. Peter's in Civate near Milan, as some have thought. Paul's brother, involved in a revolt (776) of Duke Hrodgaud of Friuli against Charlemagne, was imprisoned, and his property was confiscated. In 782 Paul addressed a plea in elegaic verses to Charlemagne, asking the king to release his brother, whose family was suffering from want. Charlemagne, attracted by the obvious scholarship of the monk, ordered Paul to come to Aachen, and there for several years Paul was an honored member of the court circle, which included ALCUIN, THEODULF OF ORLÉANS, PETER OF PISA, and PAULINUS OF AQUILEIA (see CAROLINGIAN RENAISSANCE). Although there is no record of his brother's release, it is practically certain.

Paul added the free Italian spirit (F. J. E. Raby) to the court circle as well as a knowledge of Vergil, Ovid, Lucan, FORTUNATUS, ARATOR, and many others. He was primarily a grammarian in the palace school, and he undertook an abridgment of Festus's De verborum significatione, important for a knowledge of archaic Latin and for miscellaneous bits of information about Roman religion and law. He wrote many poems, occasional verses, epitaphs, and letters to Peter of Pisa and Charlemagne. Two poems on St. Benedict were written in 774 when he first went to Monte Cassino. Two other of his poems rank among the best examples of Carolingian poetry: the one written for his brother's release and a description of Lake Como in epanaleptic lines. At Charlemagne's order, he compiled a homiliary (Patrologia Latina, 217 v. [Paris 1878–90] 95:1159–66) using the sermons of Ambrose, Augustine, Jerome, and others. He wrote a life of St.

Gregory the Great and, at Bishop Angilramnus's request, compiled a history of the bishops of Metz. He did not write the commentary on the Benedictine Rule long attributed to him. Three hymns are said to be his: Fratres, alacri pectori (Analecta hymnica [Leipzig 1886–1922] 50:118–120) in honor of St. Benedict, one in honor of the Assumption (Analecta hymnica 50:123–125), and UT QUEANT LAXIS. The last is famous for its use by GUIDO OF AREZZO in determining the syllable names of the diatonic scale and is one of the best Carolingian hymns. Today Paul's authorship is seriously questioned or denied.

It is as a historian, however, that Paul is chiefly remembered. About 770 he edited Eutropius's Breviarium ab urbe condita, an abridgment of Roman history (753 B.C. to A.D. 364), which he extended by adding passages from Jerome and Orosius. His greatest work is the incomplete Historia Langobardorum, in six books. It covers the history of the Lombards from their legendary beginnings to the death of King Liutpard in 744, and is based on two earlier lost sketches of Lombard history, the chronicle of Secundus and Origo gentis Langobardorum, and works of other historians, such as GREGORY OF TOURS, GREGORY I THE GREAT (Dialogues), BEDE, and ISIDORE OF SEVILLE. Paul also used his own experience and observation, oral tradition, folk legends, and omens. The style is simple and unadorned, vivid in descriptive passages and dramatic in others. The work is weakest in chronology, sometimes erring by vagueness, for example, Paul's use of circa haec tempora, at other times by being from 30 to 40 years off the mark. It is a very important work because it preserved the memory of the Lombards, who were doomed to disappear as a political entity. It is unfortunate that Paul did not complete it at least to the fall of the Lombards in 774.

Bibliography: Die Gedichte des Paulus Diaconus, ed. K. NEFF (Munich 1908); Sexti Pompei Festi de verborum significatione . . . Pauli epitome, ed. W. M. LINDSAY (Leipzig 1913); Historia Romana, ed. A. CRIVELLUCI in Fonti per la storia d'Italia 51 (Rome 1914); Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Langobardicarum (Berlin 1926—) 45–187; Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Gesta epp. Mett. (ibid.) 2:260–270. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 1:257–272. W. WATTENBACH, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter. Vorzeit und Karolinger, ed. W. LEVISON and H. LÖWE, 4 v. (Weimar 1952–63) 1:212–224. F. A. WRIGHT and T. A. SINCLAIR, A History of Later Latin Literature (New York 1931) 149–157. F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (2d ed. Oxford 1953) 162–167; A History of Secular Latin Poetry in the Middle Ages, 2 v. (2d ed. Oxford 1957) 1:197–199. M. L. W. LAISTNER, Thought and Letters in Western Europe, A.D. 500 to 900 (2d ed. New York 1957) 219–222, 279–280. E. OMLIN, “Guido von Arezzo und der Johannes-Hymnus, Ut queant laxis,” J. B. Hilber: Festgabe (Altdorf 1951) 46–54. A. KOLLAUTZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:230–231. L. J. ENGELS, Observations sur le vocabulaire de Paul Diaconus (Nijmegen 1961). J. SZÖVÉRFY, Die

Annalen der lateinischen Hymnendichtung. Ein Handbuch, 2 v. (Berlin 1965–65) 1:186–189. K. GAMBER, “Il sacramentario di Paolo Diacono: La redazione del Gelasiano s. VIII in Paria,” Rivista di storia della Chiesa in Italia 16 (1962): 412–438.

[C. M. AHERNE]

PAULA, ST.

Widow, ascetic; b. Rome, Italy, May 5, 347; d. Bethlehem, Palestine, Jan. 26, 404. She was born into a rich patrician and Christian family. At age 15 she married Toxotius, and they had five children: (St.) Eustochium, (St.) Blesilla, Paulina (the wife of the Senator (St.) PAMMACHIUS), Rufina, and Toxotius. A widow at age 31, Paula consecrated her household to an ascetical way of life together with similar groups of noble Roman women on the Aventine and Coelian hills in Rome. St. JEROME was their spiritual director. With Eustochium, she followed Jerome to the Orient in 385, visited Palestine and the monks of Nitria under his guidance, and in 386 settled in Bethlehem, where she used her wealth to construct a convent for nuns, a monastery for monks, and a guest house for pilgrims. There she devoted her life to works of charity and penance and to the study of the Scriptures, which Jerome says she knew by heart. Jerome wrote her eulogy (Epist. 108). Her granddaughter Paula, the daughter of her son Toxotius and Laeta Caecina, cared for Jerome in his old age.

Feast: Jan. 26.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Jan. 3:326–337. F. LAGRANCE, Histoire de sainte Paule (8th ed. Paris 1931). G. DEL TON, S. Paolo romana (Milan 1950); F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 1035. F. X. MURPHY, ed., A Monument to Saint Jerome (New York 1952). D. GORCE, ed. and tr., Vie de sainte Mélanie (Sources Chrétiennes 90; 1962).

[F. X. MURPHY]

PAULICIANS

An Armenian dualist sect that apparently arose in the 7th century in reaction against hierarchical church organization. The name is first mentioned in the works of the Armenian Catholicos JOHN OF OTZUN and at the Synod of Dwin (719), but its origin is obscure. It comes from Paul; but it is not clear whether this is Paul, the son of the legendary Manichaean woman Kallinike—who sent her sons John and Paul to Armenia to spread the heresy and who is falsely identified with the followers of the 3rd-century heretic PAUL OF SAMOSATA—or St. PAUL, whom they held in high honor.

The Paulicians distinguished between the good God, the creator of souls and ruler of heaven, and the evil God, the ruler of the material universe. They rejected the Old Testament and parts of the New Testament, Baptism, the Eucharist, marriage, hierarchy, and cult, especially of the cross and pictures. They denied the reality of Christ's body and His Redemption and considered His teaching His most important work. The organization consisted of “apostles” and “prophets” who established the sect diversely, taking the names of disciples of St. Paul.

The first Paulician community was founded at Kibossa, near Colonia in Armenia, by Constantine of Mananali during the reign of the Emperor Constans II (641–668). Apostles who followed were Symeon or Titus, the Armenian Paul, his son Gegnesius or Timothy, Joseph or Epaphroditus, Zachary, Baanes, and Sergius or Tychicus. They founded congregations in Armenia and Pontus and gave them names of Pauline churches. A reformation within the sect itself resulted in division of the party into Sergites (the reformed sect) and Baanites (the old sect). Through his new schism Sergius strengthened the Paulicians, spreading the sect and concurrently fighting the Baanites.

Persecutions during the first half of the 9th century drove the Paulicians into alliance with the Saracen emir of Melitene, who joined them in their fight against the Byzantine emperor. Under the former Byzantine officer Karbeas (d. 863), and Chrysocheir (d. 872), they oppressed the whole of Anatolia until 872, when Tephrik, their headquarters, and other fortifications were destroyed.

The heretics continued to live throughout the empire, and groups that had been deported to Thrace founded a new military headquarters at Philippopolis from whence they terrorized their neighbors throughout the 9th and 10th centuries. The Emperor ALEXIUS I COMNENUS put an end to the heresy when in residence at Philippopolis. Yet traces of it were left: in Bulgaria the BOGOMIL sect, which spread to the West in the form of Manichaean heresies, lasted through the Middle Ages; and in Armenia there were derivative sects.

Bibliography: R. JANIN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 12.1:56–62. H. G. J. BECK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:205–206. F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 1035.

[E. D. CARTER]

PAULINE FATHERS AND BROTHERS

Popular name of the Society of St. Paul for the Apostolate of Communications (SSP, Official Catholic Directory #1020); founded, 1914, Alba, Italy, by Rev. James Alberione as a religious congregation of priests and brothers engaged in the apostolate of bringing Christ to the world through the mass media and the internet. In the U.S., the society operates a publishing house (Alba House), in addition to St. Paul Publications. The generalate is in Rome.

[J. DUNN/EDS.]

PAULINE PRIVILEGE

The term used to express the right to dissolve the marriage bond, contracted between two unbaptized persons, after the baptism of one of the spouses and the refusal of the other spouse to cohabit peacefully. The term is based on the supposition that St. Paul grants this privilege in 1 Cor 7.12–15, but it is rather a privilege granted by the Church through a broader interpretation of the Pauline text than this in itself allows. Paul teaches here that the Christian convert from paganism should not use baptism as a pretext for divorcing an unbelieving spouse (μη ἀφιέτω); ‘but if the unbeliever departs, let him depart (χωριζέσθω).’ The latter Greek verb refers merely to the desertion of the marital bed. When the Apostle adds in 1 Cor 7.15 that ‘a brother or sister [i.e., a Christian man or woman] is not under bondage in such cases,’ he means that the convert need not oppose the desertion of the unbelieving spouse. But he nowhere expressly states that the marriage bond is dissolved by such desertion or that the convert is free to contract another marriage. However, since the 4th century the majority of Catholic commentators have interpreted 1 Cor 7.15 to mean that the marriage bond between two unbaptized persons is dissolvable when the unbaptized spouse refuses peaceful cohabitation with the baptized spouse, and that it is actually dissolved when the baptized spouse contracts a sacramental marriage.

See Also: MARRIAGE, LEGISLATION (CANON LAW).

Bibliography: P. DULAU, ‘The Pauline Privilege: Is it Promulgated in the First Epistle to the Corinthians?’ The Catholic Bible Quarterly 13 (1951) 146–152.

[R. KUGELMAN]

PAULINUS OF AQUILEIA, ST.

Patriarch and theologian; b. Friuli, Italy, c. 750; d. January 11, 802. Widely renowned in northern Italy for his learning, Paulinus was called by CHARLEMAGNE (c. 776) to his court school, where he formed a lasting friendship with ALCUIN. By 787 he had written Liber exhortationis (Patrologia Latina 99:197–282) and Paulinus

Magister in tres epistulas Pauli ad hebraeos (still in MS). In 787 Charlemagne appointed him patriarch of AQUILEIA, where he governed wisely and firmly. Remaining in contact with the Frankish court, he kept abreast of theological discussions on Spanish ADOPTIONISM and the insertion of the FILIOQUE in the Creed. Paulinus attended the synod of Aix-la-Chapelle in 789; the convocation of Regensburg, which condemned the adoptionism of Felix of Urgel (d. 818) in 792; and the synod of Frankfurt in 794, at which he drafted the Libellus Sacrosyllabus (Patrologia Latina 99:151–166), a condemnation of adoptionist errors. He convoked and presided over the provincial synod of Cividale in 796 or 797, which prescribed the addition of the filioque to the Creed and condemned Spanish adoptionism. He advised this assembly that the best answer to adoptionism was the Constantinopolitan Creed and insisted that his clergy memorize the text of it that he distributed to the synod, which is approximately that in use in the West today. At the bidding of Charlemagne, he wrote Contra Felicem Urgellitanum libri tres (Patrologia Latina 99:343–468). He sat at the Synod of Aix-la-Chapelle in 801, which procured a guarantee for free episcopal elections. In view of his theological writings, hymns, poems, and letters, and his zeal for the conversion of the AVARS, Paulinus deserved to be called lux Ausoniae patriae.

Feast: Jan. 28 (formerly Feb. 9 and Jan. 11).

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina 99:1–684. Monumenta Germania Poetae 1:123–148. Monumenta Germania Epistolae 4:516–527. C. GIANNONI, Paulinus II, Patriarch von Aquileia (Vienna 1896). G. ELLERO, S. Paolino d'Aquil (Cividale 1901). Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters 1:368–370. J. REVIRON, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 12.1:62–67. P. PASCHINI, San Paolino patriarca e la Chiesa aquilei[e]se alla fine del secolo VIII (Udine 1977). Paulinus Aquileiensis Contra Felicem, ed. CETEDOC (Turnhout 1990).

[J. M. O'DONNELL]

PAULINUS OF NOLA, ST.

Meropius Pontius Paulinus, bishop of Nola from 409 to 431, and man of letters; b. Bordeaux, France, c. 353; d. Nola, Campania, Italy, 431. He came of a rich and powerful family with extensive property in Aquitaine, Gallia Narbonensis, Nola, and probably also in Spain. Paulinus was placed under the special patronage of St. FELIX OF NOLA at an early age (Carmen 21. 348–350). He studied under Decimus Magnus Ausonius at Bordeaux and later corresponded with him in verse letters. At the age of 30, he had been consul (probably consul suffectus) and governor of Campania (c. 379) and had married Therasia, a wealthy Spanish woman of distinguished family.

Baptized at Bordeaux in 389, he settled near Barcelona, where his only child, a son Celsus, died eight days after birth. Soon both he and his wife adopted an ascetic mode of life and began distributing their goods to the poor. At Christmas in 395, despite his objections, he was ordained a priest, and in the following year he and his wife went to Nola, where he devoted himself to promoting the cult of St. Felix. About 409 Paulinus succeeded Paulus as bishop of Nola. Paulinus built or restored a number of churches dedicated to the cult of St. Felix and may well have been the first to use the bell in church. Of his episcopal administration little is known.

Paulinus wrote in both prose and verse. In prose, some 50 letters are extant, addressed to SULPICIUS SEVERUS, Bp. (St.) Delphinus of Bordeaux (instrumental in Paulinus's conversion, d. 404), AUGUSTINE, RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA, and others. Of them Goldschmidt said, "His loquacity . . . spoils his lucidity," and "not one of his contemporaries interlards his writings with so many Biblical quotations."

Of his 35 poems, the most interesting are a series of carmina natalicia commemorating each year, from 395 to 407, the feast day of St. Felix on January 14. In these Paulinus shows considerable narrative skill. In one passage (Carmen 16.82) he describes how Felix escaped his persecutors when he slipped through a hole in an old wall and a spider promptly spun a web over the opening. In such passages there is a good sense of liveliness and verve.

Feast: June 22.

Bibliography: P. G. WALSH, tr., Letters of St. Paulinus of Nola, 2 v. (Westminster, Md. 1966–67); The Poems of St. Paulinus of Nola (New York 1975). W. VON HARTEL, ed. (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 29, 30; 1894). B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF from 5th German ed. (New York 1960), 482–483. R. HELM, Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. 18.4 (1949) 2331–51. R. C. GOLDSCHMIDT, ed., Paulinus' Churches at Nola (Amsterdam 1940). P. FABRE, Essai sur la chronologie de l'oeuvre de Saint Paulin de Nole (Paris 1948); Saint Paulin de Nole de l'amitié chrétienne (Paris 1949). R. P. H. GREEN, The Poetry of Paulinus of Nola (Brussels 1971). J. T. LIENHARD, Paulinus of Nola and Early Western Monasticism (Cologne 1977), with annotated bibliography. K. KOHLWES, Christliche Dichtung und stilistische Form bei Paulinus von Nola (Bonn 1979). G. LUONGO, Lo specchio dell'agiografo: S. Felice nei carmi XV e XVI di Paolino di Nola (Naples 1992). F. CEPARANO and D. RUOCCO, eds., I gigli di Nola (Naples 1994). D. E. TROUT, Paulinus of Nola: Life, Letters, and Poems (Berkeley, Calif. 1999). C. CONYBEARE, Paulinus Noster: Self and Symbols in the Letters of Paulinus of Nola (New York 2000). R. COURCELLE, Revue des études latines 25 (1947) 250–280, and St. Jerome. F. MURPHY, Revue des études augustiniennes 2 (1956) 79–91, and Rufinus.

[M. P. CUNNINGHAM]

PAULINUS OF VENICE

Franciscan bishop, diplomat, and historian; b. Venice, c. 1274; d. Pozzuoli, late June 1344. He was custos of Venice (1304) and inquisitor in the March of Treviso (1305–07). He served from 1321 to 1326, as chaplain, apostolic penitentiary, and inquisitor under Pope JOHN XXII at Avignon. As inquisitor he was examiner of the famous Liber secretorum fidelium crucis by Marino Sanudo (d. c. 1343). Paulinus's diplomatic services were used by both the republic of Venice and the Holy See. Venice sent him as an intermediary to Robert of Naples in 1315–16 and again in 1321 when Robert was in Provence. Paulinus became a friend of this king and later, as bishop, his adviser. In 1322 John XXII sent Paulinus to Venice to persuade the republic to cease hostilities against Rimini, and then to Ferrara, which was in rebellion against the Holy See. In 1324 he was named bishop of Pozzuoli, but did not take possession of his see until 1326 because of his diplomatic activity. As a historian Paulinus developed the Historiarum epitome into the Satyrica gestarum rerum regum atque regnorum . . . , a world history from the creation to Emperor Henry VII (1308–13). This work, written between 1316 and 1322, has little historical value. It has wrongly been attributed to a certain Jordan. The Chronologia magna, a world history, is unimportant except for sections pertaining to the FRANCISCANS that have been published separately. His most significant work is the Provinciale ordinis fratrum minorum, a catalogue of Franciscan provinces, custodies, and convents. The best critical edition is by P. C. EUBEL [Quaracchi 1892; an appendix in Bullarium franciscanum, 5 (1898) 579–602]. Between 1313 and 1315 Paulinus composed De regimine rectoris in the Venetian dialect. Its three parts treat of government of self, of the family, and of the republic. It has been edited by A. Mussafia, Trattato de regimine rectoris di fra Paolino Minorita (Vienna and Florence 1868).

Bibliography: K. EUBEL, "Handschriftliches zur Chronik des sogen. Jordanus," Historisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft 14 (1893) 603–608. G. GOLUBOVICH, Biblioteca bio-bibliografica della Terra Santa e dell'Oriente francescano, 5 v. (Quaracchi-Florence 1906–23) v.2. J. H. SBARALEA Supplementum et Castigatio ad scriptores trium ordinum S. Francisci a Waddingo (Rome 1936) 2:307–308. A. GHINATO, Fr. Paolino da Venezia . . . (Rome 1951). L. SPÄTLING, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 8:210–211.

[J. J. SMITH]

PAULINUS OF YORK, ST.

Benedictine (?) monk, missionary to Northumbria, first bishop of York; d. Rochester, England, Oct. 10, 644. Probably while a monk of St. Andrew's monastery, Paulist Press headquarters, Glen Rock, New Jersey.

Rome, he and others were sent by Pope GREGORY I THE GREAT in 601 to assist AUGUSTINE OF CANTERBURY in England. Nothing certain is known of his activities before his Northumbrian mission but possibly he worked among the East Angles. Consecrated bishop by Abp. JUSTUS OF CANTERBURY on July 21, 625, he went north as chaplain to ETHELBURGA, the Christian bride of King EDWIN OF NORTHUMBRIA. Once Edwin was converted two years later, Paulinus established his seat at YORK and then traveled extensively throughout the north, preaching and baptizing. This work was cut short by the death of his patron Edwin in the battle of Hatfield (632), and Paulinus, who withdrew to Kent, was given the vacant See of ROCHESTER. In 634 he received the PALLIUM from Pope HONORIUS I, but since he had already deserted York, a see for which the pope had intended metropolitan rank, it remains disputed whether Paulinus should be counted its first archbishop. He was buried at Rochester.

Feast: Oct. 10.

Bibliography: BEDE, Ecclesiastical History 2.9–20; 3.14. A. W. HADDAN and W. STUBBS, eds., Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents Relating to Great Britain and Ireland, 3 v. in 4 (Oxford 1869–78) 3:75–88. W. BRIGHT, Chapters of Early English Church History (3d ed. Oxford 1897). F. M. STENTON, Anglo-Saxon England (2d ed. Oxford 1947) 113–116.

[R. D. WARE]

PAULISTS

The Society of Missionary Priests of St. Paul the Apostle (CSP, Official Catholic Directory #1030), popularly known as the Paulist Fathers or the Paulists, is a canonically approved clerical society of apostolic life. Members are men, priests or those preparing for ordination to the priesthood, committed by promise to the apostolic mission of the community and to an evangelical life in common in support of that mission and for their own ongoing conversion as disciples. The mission of the Paulists to North America is focused on sharing Catholic faith and life with those outside of or not active in the Catholic community and engaging in a Catholic witness to and dialogue with modern society.

Origin. The Paulists were founded in New York City in 1858 by Reverend Isaac Thomas HECKER, in association with Augustine F. HEWITT, George DESHON, Francis BAKER, and, shortly thereafter, Clarence WALWORTH. All were priest converts to Catholicism in the antebellum period of social reform and religious revival in the United States. These men were drawn to the Catholic Church in the process of their own religious quests. They had then joined the REDEMPTORISTS at a time when that congregation in the United States was generally regarded as a German group dedicated to the care of German immigrants.

Hecker and his companions believed that their mission work would prosper and American vocations would increase if the congregation established an American house and addressed itself to the wider American public. Father Hecker went to Rome to plead the cause of such a new foundation before the Redemptorist major general. Misunderstanding and conflict over his intentions and his right to make the journey led to Hecker's expulsion from the Redemptorists. He appealed to the Holy See and, with the support of Cardinal Alessandro Barnabo, secured a decision from Pius IX granting the release of Hecker and his confreres from their Redemptorist vows, with the suggestion that they form a new American missionary community. Hecker himself became convinced that a new religious community was needed to help supply the wants of the Church in the United States and to carry the message of Catholicism to Americans and their society. He and his companions drew up a Programme of Rule that was approved by Archbishop John Hughes of New York. On July 10, 1858, the Paulists were founded, the first religious community of men begun in the United States. In place of vows of religion, they took solemn promises (which they regarded as binding as vows), committing themselves to the evangelical counsels and life in community. Stressing the personal guidance of the Holy Spirit, apostolic flexibility, and individual initiative, Hecker believed that in all their apostolic works the Paulists should be faithful to their distinctive mission, the conversion of America.

Early Development. In 1868, a general chapter greatly expanded and enlarged the Programme of Rule, which then became the official constitutions. Revised by succeeding chapters, these constitutions were submitted in 1925 and received final approval from the Holy See in 1940. They provided for regular General Chapters and a governing structure consisting of a Superior General with four Consultors. Father Hecker was elected as the first Superior General, holding office until his death in 1888. Father Hewitt succeeded him as Superior General, and then Father Deshon.

With the founding of the Paulists in 1858, the motherhouse of the community was established in New York City. This was also the site for the Paulist studentate until the opening of The CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA in Washington, D.C., when the Paulists became the first religious community to establish a house on campus (1889). In 1914, they opened St. Paul's College, adjoining the campus. A separate novitiate was begun in 1923.

In conjunction with their motherhouse, the Paulists were entrusted with the establishment and pastoral care of St. Paul the Apostle Parish in New York. Parish missions across the United States and Canada, aimed not only at reviving the active practice of the faith by Catholics but also drawing others to the Catholic faith, were a central work of the community's apostolate. Hecker started the Catholic World in 1865 to bring the best of Catholic theological and literary work to the attention of educated American Catholics in order to better equip them for their role in the Catholic mission in America. In 1866, he began the Catholic Publication Society, the forerunner of the Paulist Press (1916), especially noted for widespread dissemination of pamphlets and other works of an educational and apologetic nature, aimed both at Catholics and other inquirers. The Apostolic Mission House (1902) was established in Washington, D.C., to provide training for diocesan clergy in missions to Catholics and non-Catholics. A parish and base for parish missions was taken on in San Francisco (1894).

Catholic and American. Father Hecker had brought to the foundation of the Paulists a deep appreciation for positive values in the spirit and institutions of the United States, along with a trenchant critique of the deficiencies of American society, defects which he believed could only be remedied by Christ's truth and grace embodied in Catholicism. The tension inherent in being both Catholic and American was intensified by the condemnation of AMERICANISM (1898), based in part on European interpretations of Hecker and related controversies in both Europe and America. The Paulists (along with Cardinal Gibbons and others) were strong in affirmation of their Catholic loyalty and denied that the condemned tendencies were theirs or present in the Catholic Church in the United States.

The next decades saw an expanded commitment of the Paulists to the institutions of North American Catholicism, establishing or taking charge of urban parishes (in Chicago, Portland, Toronto, Los Angeles, and other major cities), rural missions (especially in Tennessee) and the emerging ministry of the Newman apostolate at state and private colleges (at the University of California at Berkeley, the University of Texas at Austin, and University of California at Los Angeles, among the early Newman Clubs and Centers). The mission of promoting Catholic organizational unity and the Church's role and voice in American life was evident in the work of Monsignor John J. Burke, CSP, who was instrumental in the establishment of the National Catholic War Council during World War I and its successor organization, the National Catholic Welfare Conference. In 1922, the Paulists were entrusted with the pastoral care of Santa Susanna, the American parish in Rome.

St. Paul the Apostle Church, New York City.

Missionary Outreach. Through the middle decades of the twentieth century, the Paulist Fathers continued to develop ways of evangelizing beyond the Catholic community. Beginning in 1937, trailer missions went on the road throughout rural areas of the South and the Midwest. Catholic Information Centers were established in New York, Boston, Grand Rapids, Toronto, and additional sites, while most other Paulist parishes and Newman Centers offered regular classes for inquirers interested in Catholicism. The Paulist Radio Station WLWL broadcast from 1928 to 1935 and initial forays into television were begun in the 1950s. The community took on additional parishes and Newman Centers, most in predominantly non-Catholic areas, in the 1940s and 1950s, a trend that continued into the 1970s.

Post-Vatican II Developments. Following the call of the Second Vatican Council for the renewal of religious life, the Paulist Fathers Renewal Chapter (1967–68) produced an experimental constitution for the Society which, after successive modifications, received approval from Rome in 1989. Quadrennial General Assemblies continued the traditional role of the general chapter. A President and General Council, elected by all members in final profession, constituted the community's governing body. The President is assisted by two of these Consultors on a full-time Presidential Board, meeting regularly with the other Consultors as a General Council.

Reverend Thomas F. Stransky, CSP, was elected the first President of the Society (1970). He had served under Cardinal Augustin Bea, SJ, in the Secretariat for Christian Unity in Rome and brought with him an expertise in both missiology and ecumenism, areas central to the post-conciliar mission of the Paulists. The new community Constitution committed the Paulists to the work of Christian unity and interreligious dialogue, along with the continued mission of invitation and welcome of individuals into the Catholic Church. The social justice dimension of evangelization was also clearly acknowledged. In light of the needs evident after Vatican II, the Paulists took a special interest in outreach to and reconciliation with Catholics who had been alienated from the Church. Parish missions were redeveloped, first to serve the needs of renewal immediately after the Council and then to promote evangelization and reconciliation outreach by parish communities. Information centers provided leadership in a number of dioceses in the transition from the traditional convert apostolate to the process of implementing the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults. Reverend Alvin A. Illig, CSP, emerged as a North American leader in responding to the call for new Catholic evangelization efforts made by Paul VI in EVANGELIUM NUNTIANDI (1975). Father Illig founded the Paulist National Catholic Evangelization Association in 1977. The Paulist General Assembly of 1986 recommitted the Society to the threefold mission directions of evangelization, reconciliation, and ecumenism, emphasizing collaboration with the laity in these mission areas. The Paulists established a coordinating Office for Ecumenical and Interreligious Dialogue in 1999.

The Paulist Press undertook a wide variety of new publishing ventures in and after the 1960s. Parish renewal programs, biblical studies and spirituality series with an ecumenical appeal, works promoting Jewish-Christian and interreligious dialogue, and basic Catholic adult education materials constituted a major portion of the publications of the Paulist Press during these decades. Other Paulist media ministries spanned the spectrum of radio, television, video, film, and the internet. Paulist Productions (1968) brought a Catholic dimension to the television and movie industry. Paulist Communications (1970), later Paulist Media Works, produced and disseminated Catholic radio programs and assisted Catholic communities and institutions in their media efforts. This has evolved into helping religious organizations communicate through the internet. The Paulist Young Adults Ministry (2000), an attempt to reach a population segment often with tangential relations to the church, focused on internet communications as a key component of its wider outreach.

The postconciliar Paulist Constitution affirmed life in community, in established community houses, as central to Paulist life. Diverse efforts to renew the Paulist life of communal prayer and mutual support in discipleship and ongoing conversion were given further impetus by the Community Direction Statement of the 1994 Paulist General Assembly. Paulist Associates involved individuals and groups (largely of lay men and women) appropriating and living the charism of Fr. Hecker and the Paulists in their own contexts of family, work, and society. The Paulist Associates program was authorized by the 1998 General Assembly and implemented in the following year. Efforts by members of the Paulist Fathers and their Associates to return to the sources of the Paulist charism were significantly aided by the publication of The Paulist Vocation (2000), a new and greatly expanded edition of selected writings of Father Hecker.

Bibliography: J. MCSORLEY, Isaac Hecker and His Friends (New York 1952). V. F. HOLDEN, The Yankee Paul: Isaac Thomas Hecker (Milwaukee 1958). J. FARINA, An American Experience of God: The Spirituality of Isaac Hecker (New York 1981). D. J. O'BRIEN, Isaac Hecker: An American Catholic (New York 1992). The Paulist Vocation, revised and expanded (New York 2000).

[R. J. O'DONNELL]

PAULUS, NIKOLAUS

Church historian; b. Krautergersheim (Alsace), Dec. 6, 1853; d. Munich, Jan. 29, 1930. After theological studies in Strasbourg, he was ordained Aug. 4, 1878, and served as a curate until 1883. Because of sickness he had to withdraw from parochial work and settled near Munich, where he led the quiet life of a scholar until his death. He earned a doctorate in theology in 1896 at the University of Munich.

Paulus was first brought into contact with the Reformation period and the religious culture of the Middle Ages by his studies in the history of his Alsatian homeland. It was J. JANSSEN's work on the history of the German people that led him to devote all his efforts to a study of the Reformation period, especially of Luther's Catholic literary opponents until then neglected by scholars. In about 50 publications he saved a great number of these theologians from oblivion. With a genuine love for truth he sought to do justice to Luther's reputation, but he also helped to undo the legends about him: Luthers Lebensende (Frankfurt 1898); Johann Tetzel, der Ablassprediger (Mainz 1899); Hexenwahn und Hexenprozess im 16. Jh. (Frankfurt 1910); Protestantismus und Toleranz im 16. Jh. (Frankfurt 1911). His chief work, however, is Geschichte des Ablasses im Mittelalter (3 v. Paderborn 1922–23). Because of his search for the whole truth and his faithfulness to the facts, he prepared the way toward a new Catholic outlook on the Reformation.

Bibliography: L. PFLEGER, Historisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft 50 (1930) 205–226; Nikolaus Paulus, ein Priester- und Gelehrtenleben, 1853–1930 (Kevelaer 1931). R. BÄUMER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:235.

[E. ISERLOH]

PAULUS ALBARUS

Writer, polemicist and central figure in the “voluntary martyr movement” of mid-ninth century CORDOBA; b. probably between 800 and 815; d. probably in Cordoba, late 862 or early 863.

All that is known of Paulus Albarus has to be gleaned from his own writings and those of his close friend and confidant, the martyr EULOGIUS. The spelling of his cognomen is Albarus rather than the customary Alvarus. He was probably born in or around Cordoba. Nothing is known of his parents beyond the fact that his father made a donation to a monastery. Nor is it known if Paulus Albarus had brothers and sisters. He belonged to a well-to-do, land-owning family of uncertain prominence in Cordoban life. The honorific titles (Aurelius Flavius) that Paulus Alvarus and his friend, John of Seville, applied to each other in their letters are suggestive of those used by the Visigothic kings of Spain but may simply reflect friendly respect between equals. Other respectful terms (“illustrissimus” or “serenissimus”) were used in letters to Albar who only used such language in his correspondence with Romanus, a doctor and former high official in the Christian community (epistle 9).

Albarus’s ancestry is uncertain. While debating with Bodo, a convert to Judaism, Albarus seems to indicate his own Jewish background (“I am a Hebrew both by faith and race.” ep. 18.). This may be a metaphorical claim that Christians represented the fulfilment of God’s covenant with Israel. As Albarus, who certainly attended a monastic school, reported that he did not know the Hebrew language, he is unlikely to have converted directly from Judaism. His claim to Gothic descent (ep. 20) is also very plausible.

As a boy, Albar was educated at the monastery of Abbot Speraindeo. There he met Eulogius, with whom he forged a life-long friendship based on their shared love of learning. Albar recalled with great affection his debates with Eulogius over points of Holy Scripture, which were continued by letter, in verse form, although as adults they wisely chose to destroy such juvenilia. The literary output of Albar is enriched with quotations from Holy Scripture, patristic writers, especially St. JEROME, and Spanish authors, especially St. ISIDORE. He was also familiar with non-Christian Latin authors. In some cases, it is clear that Albar’s knowledge was derived at second-hand from St. Isidore. On his return from a journey to northern Spain in 848, Eulogius brought back books unknown in Cordoba, which introduced Albar to other Christian and pagan writers. Both Speraindeo and Eulogius showed respect for Albar’s scholarship by submitting their own writings to him for criticism.

Unlike Eulogius, Albar was a married layman. In the preface to his Vita Eulogii, Albar contrasts the priestly status of Eulogius with his own. Greetings in John of Seville’s letters to “the adornment of your household” and “the beauty of your household” are, undoubtedly, references to Albar’s wife (and, possibly, daughters). Even less certainly, the death of “trium ancillarum vestrum,” which drew sympathetic comment from John of Seville, may refer to servants rather than daughters.

Between 840 and 860, Albar was the outstanding figure in Latin literary culture in Cordoba. Apart from an indication that he had practiced law, Albar does not appear to have held any civil or ecclesiastical post. This may have permitted him the leisure to pursue his intellectual interests and develop impressive skills in Latin composition, which included the writing of verse. It also suggests that he was a man of independent financial means.

The start of Albar’s known literary activity is his correspondence with Bodo-Eleazar. There are seven letters (four by Albar and three, badly conserved, by Bodo-Eleazar), with one clearly dated to 840. In 838, Bodo, a deacon, left the German imperial court to go on a pilgrimage to Rome. On his way there, for unknown reasons, Bodo converted to Judaism, married a Jewish woman and changed his name to Eleazar. He travelled on to Cordoba where he began to urge the Muslim authorities to persecute Christians and is last heard of in 847. It is noteworthy that Albar, a layman, should try to win back Bodo-Eleazar for Christianity and prove that Christ was the true Messiah. Albar’s correspondence becomes increasingly abusive in response to what he regarded as Bodo-Eleazar’s provocation. The letters show the state of Christian-Jewish polemic and the bitter tone of medieval disputes between the faiths.

An undated pair of letters to Abbot Speraindeo, Albar’s former teacher, probably belongs to the period before 853. Albar described the errors into which some had fallen and asked Speraindeo to write a treatise refuting them (ep.7).

A group of six undated letters make up Albar's correspondence with his friend John of Seville, another educated layman with literary tastes (ep.1–6). Albar's use of citations from Virgil's Aeneid and St. Augustine's City of God, works only known in Cordoba after Eulogius's return from northern Spain in 848, suggests that the letters should be dated between 848 and 851, when the Muslim persecution began.

Albarus and Eulogius were central figures in the voluntary martyr movement that convulsed Cordoba in the mid-ninth century. A disparate group of Christians challenged Muslim authorities in Cordoba by the public denunciation of Muḥammad or by the breaking of Islamic law, actions that carried the death penalty. Between 851 and 859, 49 Christians are reported to have been executed by the Muslim authorities. Their actions also caused a split in the Christian community between those who supported open resistance and those who wished to avoid a confrontation with the ruling power. In 859, the execution of Eulogius, who is the principal source for these events, seems to mark an end to the martyr movement.

Neither Albar nor Eulogius originated the martyr movement although each gave it his full support. They shared a concern at the rising rate of conversion to Islam and at the increasing adoption of Arabic culture among the Christian community. Their solution was a self-conscious attempt to revive Latin letters, looking back to a Visigothic past and drawing especially on Isidoran writings, as an emblem of Christian identity for a community under threat. While Eulogius's writings dealt essentially with the passions of the Cordoban martyrs, Albar's defended them against their Christian detractors and made a direct attack on Islam.

Little is known of Albar during the decade of the persecutions. He seems to have had a direct acquaintance with few of the martyrs. While he championed their actions, Albar does not appear to have incited them. In his only recorded conversation with a would-be martyr, Albar's cautionary words are heard and then rejected by Aurelius (Memoriale Sanctorum II, 10). Neither Albar nor Eulogius presented himself as a voluntary martyr. Although Eulogius was to be martyred in 859, Albar's writings, in line with his advice to Aurelius, show no self-reproach for not sharing his friend's martyrdom. In 854, Albar produced the Indiculus Luminosus, his most ambitious work. It followed two lines: attacking Christian critics of the martyrs and arguing that Muḥammad fulfilled some of the prophecies of ANTICHRIST. Albar promised a second book which would gather the judgements of the DOCTORS OF THE CHURCH to support his view. This has not survived or, more probably, was not written.

Albar corresponded with Eulogius, giving moral support during his time of imprisonment in 851. Eulogius, in turn, sent Albar two works, the Memoriale Sanctorum and the Documentum Martyriale, for approval. Soon after Eulogius's execution in 859, Albar wrote the Vita Eulogii. It celebrated his friend's life and death, treating him as a saint. He also composed poetry in honour of Eulogius.

From the evidence of epistles 9 to 13 of his collected letters, Albar's final years seem to have been dogged by poverty and sickness. Around 861 he fell dangerously ill and received the sacrament of penance. On recovering, he was obliged to do public penance and abstain from the Eucharist. In his letters to Bishop Saul of Cordoba, Albar made typically forceful requests to be allowed to take Holy Communion. There may be undertones of an earlier confrontation over the martyrs but Bishop Saul refused Albar's demands (ep. 11–13). At this time, Albar wrote his Confessio, which was not a personal confession but a short treatise on penance. This outstanding figure of the Cordoban Church slipped into an obscure death by 862 or early 863.

In 961, Bishop Reccemund wrote a calendar, dedicated to Caliph al-Hakam (961–976), in which he listed the liturgical feasts that had been celebrated at Cordoba in the previous century. For November 7, it names the feast of Albar (In ipso est festum Albari in Cordubam).

Bibliography: Writings by Paulus Albarus. Collection of 20 letters between Albar and five other known men: Bodo/Eleazar (7), John of Seville (6), Bishop Saul (3), Abbot Speraindeo (2), Romanus the doctor (1) and a letter without identification; Indiculus Luminosus; Vita Eulogii; Confessio; 11 poems, following in style and content late Visigothic models, representing virtually all of the surviving material from Christian Cordoban writing of his day. Modest in quality, they were the fruit of Eulogius's attempt to revive Latin letters. Sources. J. GIL, Corpus Scriptorum Muzarabicorum, v. 1 (Madrid 1973). E. P. COLBERT, The Martyrs of Cordoba (Washington, DC 1962). R. COLLINS, Early Medieval Spain; Unity in Diversity, 400–1000 (London 1995). C. M. SAGE, Paul Albar of Cordoba (Washington, DC 1943). K. B. WOLF, Christian Martyrs in Spain (Cambridge 1988).

[J. WREGLESWORTH]

PAULUS DE LIAZARIIS

Canonist; b. probably at Bologna, toward the end of the 13th century; d. Bologna, Feb. 8, 1356. He studied at the University of Bologna, numbering among his teachers JOANNES ANDREAE, and received his doctorate in both civil and canon law. Married three times (last in 1349), he had three children. He taught at the University of Bologna until 1321 when, in violation of the university statutes, he went to teach at Siena. In 1325 he left Siena to teach at Perugia, but by 1333 he was again teaching at Bologna. He headed a legation to Benedict XII at Avignon in 1338. His most famous work was the Lectura super Clementinas, written probably at Perugia and completed before 1330. It is often cited by later writers. He wrote also Casus summarii or Epitome Clementinarum.

Bibliography: J. F. VON SCHULTE, Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des kanonischen Rechts (Graz 1956) 2:246–247. G. ERMINI, Storia della Università di Perugia (Bologna 1947) 138–139. S. KUTTNER, “The Apostillae of Johannes Andreae on the Clementines,” in Études d’histoire du droit canonique dédiées à Gabriel LeBras, 2 v. (Paris 1965).

[C. M. ROSEN]

PAULUS EUERGETINOS

Eleventh-century Byzantine monk and ascetical writer; d. Constantinople, April 16, 1054. Paulus is known as the founder of the monastery of Euergetis near Constantinople (1048) and for the collection of ascetical writings (Paterikon) that he prepared for his monks known as his Synagoge. It consists of 50 chapters divided into four books, so ordered as to provide an ascetical education in godliness for the members of the monastery. The collected texts include selections from almost all the ascetical literature of the early Church from the vita of St. Anthony by Athanasius to the dialogues of St. Gregory I. It makes no pretense at original considerations but is a reelaboration. Its principal sources are a Gerontikon that is identical with the so-called Alphabeticon Coteliers and a collection of anonyma. These sources account for seven-eighths of the Synagoge. A Horologion also contains a homily on the Mother of God attributed to Paulus.

Bibliography: H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 587. S. VAILHÉ, Échos d’Orient 7 (1904) 268–276. Bibliotheca hagiographica Graeca, ed. F. HALKIN (Brussels 1957) 3:1450s–50z. W. BOUSSET, Apophthegmata, ed. T. HERMANN and G. KRÜGER (Tübingen 1923) 15–18.

[F. CHIOVARO]

PAVILLON, NICOLAS

Jansenistic reform bishop of Alet in Languedoc; b. Paris, Nov. 17, 1597; d. Alet, Dec. 8, 1677. For five years he was a coworker with St. VINCENT DE PAUL, who recommended him to Richelieu for the See of Alet in 1637. His asceticism attracted him to the Jansenists of Port-Royal, whom he openly favored after Vincent’s death. He was one of four bishops who, contrary to the order of Alexander VII, refused to sign the formula of 1653 condemning five propositions that summed up the doctrine of JANSEN. The bishops urged the distinction that the Church is infallible in matters of right, but not in matters of fact. Pavillon signed the compromise formula of Clement IX in 1668, although he clearly indicated verbally his distinction between right and fact. His insistence on episcopal prerogatives appears also in his refusal, together with Bishop CAULET, to sign the declaration of Louis XIV on the Droit de Régale in 1673. Pavillon’s main theological treatises favor Jansenism. His Jansenistic Rituel d’Alet (1667) was condemned by Clement IX but was used in Alet and other dioceses. There is no edition of his complete works. Manuscripts are scattered in French libraries. The Oeuvres of ARNAULD (v.36, 37) contain documents relating to Pavillon.

Bibliography: E. DEJEAN, Un prélat indépendant au XVII^e siècle (Paris 1909). J. CARREYRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 12:77–79. P. BROUTIN, La réforme pastorale en France au XVII^e siècle (Paris 1956). H. WEBER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:237.

[J. J. SMITH]

PAX CHRISTI INTERNATIONAL

Pax Christi International, an international Catholic organization for promotion of world peace, was formed in March 1945 by a French Catholic laywoman, Madame Dortel-Claudot, and Bishop Pierre Theas of Montaubon. Its original objective was to promote reconciliation between the French and Germans, initially, through an apostolate of prayer. It soon expanded its vision to peace among all nations. The organization received encouragement in 1947 from Pope Pius XII. By 1950 it had grown into an international federation of European groups with its headquarters in Fribourg, Switzerland, and later moved to Paris. Cardinal Maurice Feltin, Archbishop of Paris, was its first international president. Its objective was “the unity and pacification of the world through the promotion of international order based on the natural law and on the justice and charity of Christ.” Pax Christi was a significant inspiration for Vatican II’s teaching of the right to conscientious objection and of its condemnation of nuclear war. It has promoted a wider understanding of the social teaching of popes John XXIII, Paul VI, and John Paul II whereby peace, grounded in justice and directed by charity, must be further based on a just economic development of poorer nations. In 1965 its headquarters moved to the Netherlands under the presidency of Cardinal Alfrink, and in 1978 to Belgium under the secretariat of Etienne de Jonghe. Pax Christi has been active in peacemaking in Northern Ireland, Poland, South Africa, East Timor, and the Middle East. In 1983 it received the UNESCO Peace Prize, and in 1987, the UN Peace Messenger Award. In the midst of the Vietnam War, Pax Christi USA was established in 1972 as an affiliate of Pax Christi. In a development of Pax Christi's original broader mission, Pax Christi USA promotes a gospel-inspired non-violence: "Pax Christi USA commits itself to peace education and, with the help of its bishop members, promotes the gospel imperative of peacemaking as a priority in the Catholic church in the United States." Two American bishops were its first moderators, Carroll T. Dozier (d. 1985) of Memphis and Thomas J. Gumbleton of Detroit. By 2000, membership in Pax Christi USA had grown to more than 11,500 members, including more than 120 bishops.

[D. P. SHERIDAN]

PAYNE, PETER

Wyclifite, Hussite; b. Hough-on-the-Hill, near Grantham, England, c. 1380; d. Prague, 1455. He was the son of a French father and an English mother and graduated from Oxford by 1406. There he had become converted to Wyclif's heresies through the efforts of a few remaining LOLLARDS. Not being a man to keep his beliefs to himself, Payne wrote letters to John HUS and the Bohemian reformers in 1406, praising the character and orthodoxy of John WYCLIF, and managed to attach the university's seal to them. The ensuing furor prompted Abp. Thomas ARUNDEL to investigate orthodoxy in the university. The university resisted Arundel's invasion of its privileges but had no desire to protect heresy. A university committee examined Payne but found him free of heresy. He then became principal of St. Edmund's College (1411–13). He was soon engaged in controversy with the mendicants. Faced with an oath of orthodoxy in 1413, he fled England for the more congenial atmosphere of Prague (1415). There, for 40 years, he played a very prominent part in the religio-political disputes that wracked Bohemia. Payne drifted more and more to the extreme reformist position of the TABORITES, whom he represented at the Council of BASEL. After rejecting the settlement proposed at Basel, he became rector of the HUSSITE monastery of Emaus in Prague and a supporter of John of Rokycana.

Bibliography: T. GASCOIGNE, Loci e libro veritatum (Oxford 1881). K. B. MCFARLANE, John Wycliffe and the Beginnings of English Nonconformity (New York 1953). A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500 (Oxford 1957–59) 3:1441–43.

[J. E. HEALEY]

PÁZMÁNY, PÉTER

Cardinal, archbishop of Esztergom, often called Hungary's second apostle because of his leadership of the COUNTER REFORMATION; b. Nagyvárád, Oct. 4, 1570; d. Pozsony (now Bratislava, Slovakia), March 19, 1637. He was born of a noble Protestant family, but his Catholic stepmother and the first Hungarian Jesuit, István SZÁNTÓ, brought him into the Catholic Church when he was 13. At the age of 17 he entered the Society of Jesus (JESUITS) at Kolozsvár (Transylvania) and he was an outstanding student at the universities of Cracow, Vienna, and Rome. He taught philosophy and theology at the University of Graz, Austria (1597–1607), and then at the request of Hungary's primate, Cardinal Francis Forgách, he returned to his homeland. As the primate's counselor, he became the chief promoter of Catholic restoration. Pázmány wrote about 40 books in both Latin and Hungarian, of which As Isteni Igazságra Vezérlő Kaulauz (1613, "A Guide to the Divine Truth," since 1637 known as Ho-dogus) is the most important; all his works are apologetic and polemical. His translation of Kempis's IMITATION OF CHRIST and his sermons, characterized by a matchless vigor of speech, led 30 noble families and whole communities to the Church. His masterly prose style set a standard unmatched for three centuries. In 1616, after Cardinal Forgách's death, King Matthias, with the approval of Pope Paul V, appointed Pázmány archbishop of Esztergom, and in 1629 Urban VIII made him a cardinal. He founded the Pazmaneum in Vienna (1623), for the education of the clergy, and the University of Nagyszombat (1635), now the University of Budapest. In his political views, despite severe criticism, Pázmány was faithful to the Hapsburg kings, seeing them as the defenders of Christianity against the Turks.

Bibliography: Opera omnia: Series latina, 6 v. (Budapest 1894–1904); Ungarische Serie, 7 v. (Budapest 1894–1905); Epistolae collectae, 2 v. (Budapest 1910–11). J. KORNIS, Le Cardinal Pázmány, 1570–1637 (Paris 1937). S. SÍK, Pázmány (Budapest 1939). N. ÖRY, Doctrina Petri Cardinalis Pázmány de notis ecclesiae (Chieri 1952).

[O. J. EGRES]

PAZZI

Merchant and banking family of FLORENCE, for which there are records from the late 12th century. Members of the family held offices in the government; its bank with several branches was second only to the MEDICI bank. Brunelleschi designed the new palace and built the handsome chapel (both still standing) for Andrea and his eldest son, Jacopo. Piero, another son, was one of the learned men in the city. Their nephew Guglielmo married Bianca, sister of Lorenzo de' Medici. The Pazzi were part of the unsuccessful 1478 conspiracy led by Girolamo Riario, nephew of Pope Sixtus IV, against the Pazzi family rivals, the Medici. Giuliano de' Medici was killed, but Lorenzo survived. Disgrace, executions, and confiscation of properties followed for the Pazzi family. Early in the 16th century, however, the Pazzi began to serve in the government again. In later generations two members brought renown. Mary Magdalene de' PAZZI, a Carmelite nun, was canonized in 1669. Giangirolamo Pazzi (1681–1743) was a member of several academies, a translator, and the founder of the Società Colombaria.

Bibliography: P. LITTA, et al., Famiglie celebri italiane, 14 v. (Milan 1819–1923) v.11. L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London-St. Louis 1938–61) 4:300–312, 512–515. Acta Sanctorum May 6:175–348. VESPASIANO DA BISTICCI, Vite di uomini illustri del secolo XV, ed. P. D'ANCONA and E. AESCHLIMANN (Milan 1951). F. MORANDINI, "Il conflitto fra Lorenzo . . . Sisto IV," Archivio-storico italiano 107 (1950) 113–154. A. POLIZIANO, Della congiura dei Pazzi (Padua 1958).

[M. L. SHAY]

PAZZI, MARIA MADDALENA DE', ST.

Carmelite mystic; b. Florence, Italy, Apr. 2, 1566; d. there, May 25, 1607. She was born of a noble family, the daughter of Camillo de' Pazzi and Maria di Lorenzo Buondelmonti, and was given the name Catherine at her Baptism. Precociously pious, she learned to meditate at the age of nine from the family confessor, the Jesuit Andrea Rossi. She was less than ten years old when she made her first Communion, one month after which she made a vow of virginity. She attended school, first as a day student (1574–78) and then as a boarder (1580–81), at the monastery of S. Giovanni dei Cavalieri, where, with the help of the sisters and the nearby Jesuits, she completed the solid spiritual formation begun in the family and revealed her desire to become a nun.

The CARMELITE convent in Florence, S. Maria degli Angeli (founded in 1474), attracted her because of its privilege of daily Holy Communion. In August of 1582 she sought admission and spent the customary ten-day probationary period in the convent. On December 1 she was received as a postulant, taking the name Maria Maddalena (Mary Magdalene), and the following Jan. 30, 1583, she entered the novitiate. A year later she became critically ill, and in spite of the best medical treatment she seemed at the point of death. On Trinity Sunday, May 27, 1584, her superiors allowed her to make her profession in articulo in a private ceremony on a cot in the chapel. It marked the beginning of extraordinary ecstatic experiences whose number, intensity, and variety were to gain her the title of the Ecstatic Saint.

Immediately after the profession, she fell into an ecstasy that lasted about two hours and was repeated after Holy Communion on the following 40 mornings. These ecstasies were rich experiences of union with God and marvelous insights into divine truths. Visions and locutions, as well as the symbolic mystical graces, such as the exchange of hearts or the invisible stigmata, abounded within them. Similar transports but without the insensibility of ecstasy, "excesses of love," in which she talked and moved about, likewise began to occur. As a safeguard against deception and to preserve the revelations, the convent confessor, Agostino Campi, directed her to dictate her experiences to sister secretaries, who would also write down what they observed. This is the origin of the works of Mary Magdalene de' Pazzi. Over the next six years, five large volumes were filled. The books were properly attested by witnesses and approved by ecclesiastical authorities and theologians. They are preserved in the archives of the convent now called the convent of S. Maria Maddalena de' Pazzi in Florence.

Book 1, called The Forty Days, covers the first period from May 27 to July 26, 1584, and includes intermittent ecstasies until August 15. Book 2, The Colloquies, records experiences between Christmas of 1584 and the following July 4, 1585. However, Pentecost week, June 8 to 16, 1585, is recorded separately in Book 3, Revelations and Intelligences. This week was a preparation for a severe, five-year trial that began on Trinity Sunday. Book 4, The Probation, records this trial, which lasted until 1590. After this time ecstasies were less frequent. The majority occurred in the two-year period (1584–86). The final volume, Book 5, The Renovation of the Church, recounts only one ecstasy but includes 12 letters concerning reform and renewal that were dictated in July and August of 1586 and were directed to important personages in the Church (and apparently never delivered to them).

One other literary work remains, the so-called Admonitions (manuscript title: Ammaestramenti, avvisii, e ricordi della Madre Beata Maria Maddalena, Arch. Monast., Pal IV, N. 57 and 65; pub. as Avvertimenti et avvisi . . . , 1669). This is a collection of her sayings and owes its existence to the pedagogical roles she fulfilled in the convent. Beginning in 1589 she was either assistant novice mistress or instructor of the young; in 1598 she became novice mistress, and in 1604, subprioress. Although her vocation was a contemplative one of love and suffering for the Church, her own capable novice mistress and prioress throughout her convent life, Mother Evangelista del Giocondo, saw to it that Mary Magdalene de' Pazzi collaborated in the formation of the young. Her disciples showed their appreciation by collecting the lessons they learned and preserving them as a last testament. She died at the age of 41, was beatified by URBAN IV, on May 8, 1626, and canonized by CLEMENT IX, on April 28, 1669.

Mary Magdalene de' Pazzi has been a popular saint, especially in her native Italy. Two contemporary biographies, those of V. Puccini and V. Cepari, SJ, and the publication of her writings (however uncritical and truncated the published editions to date have been) have given rise to an abundant devotional literature concerned with her. But until the mid-twentieth century there were only a few scientific studies of her life or her spiritual doctrine. The publication in the 1960s of the original texts of her works should lead to better studies of her life and work. The style of the writings is a hindrance: it is baroque, pedantic, excessively allegorical, and repetitious. But this poor vehicle conveys a rich doctrinal spirituality that is Trinitarian, Christological, and especially Eucharistic. Her teaching is preeminently liturgical and ecclesial.

Feast: May 25 (formerly May 29).

Bibliography: Tutte le opere di Santa Maria Maddalena de' Pazzi dai manoscritti originali, ed. F. NARDONI (Florence 1960–1966). F. BAERTIUS and C. JANNINGUS, Acta Sanctorum May 6 (1866): 175–348. ERMANNINO DEL SSMO. SACRAMENTO, “I manoscritti originali di S. Maria Maddalena de' Pazzi,” Ephemerides Carmeliticae 7 (1956): 323–400. M. MINIMA, Seraph among Angels: The Life of St. Mary Magdalene de' Pazzi, ed. and tr. G. N. PAUSBACK (Chicago 1958). S. THOR-SALVIAT, Secrets of a Seraph: The Spiritual Doctrine of St. Mary Magdalene de' Pazzi, ed. and tr. G. W. PAUSBACK (Downers Grove, Ill. 1961). Portrait of a Seraph; a Pictorial Life of Saint Mary Magdalene de' Pazzi, tr. G. N. PAUSBACK (Fatima, Portugal 1965). B. SECONDIN, Santa Maria Maddalena de' Pazzi: esperienza e dottrina (Rome 1974). A. MAGGI, Uttering the Word: The Mystical Performances of Maria Maddalena de' Pazzi (Albany, N.Y. 1998).

[E. E. LARKIN]

PEACE

A state of untroubled tranquility between persons (social) or within an individual's own self (personal). Social peace is dealt with under other headings; this article is concerned only with peace in the personal sense. So understood, it is the tranquil composure of soul that an individual experiences in the absence of a strong conflict of urge or desire between different elements of his own being.

The positive basis of such peace, theologically speaking, is the virtue of CHARITY. In one who has charity the functionings of all the appetites are united in a constant effort of love toward the ultimate point of focus that is God, the Supreme GOOD. This causes a unity of desire within the individual and eliminates the strife or contention that exists when there is contrariety of desire. Peace postulates order or harmony of conation, whereas conflict is always devisive. One cannot have internal peace if he is torn within himself between good and evil desires; such conflicts make personal peace impossible.

Personal peace, since it is based upon or is an effect of charity, can be had only by one who is in the state of sanctifying grace. In other words, there can be no true internal peace except when the appetite is directed to a true good, for an evil object or action, though it may have the appearance of good and thus be able to satisfy the appetite in some respects, nevertheless has many defects, which cause the appetite to remain restless and disturbed. Moreover, even a total dedication to evil could not produce a true peace in a wicked man because evil, unlike good, is not a unifying principle. The completely evil man, if such were possible, would remain a victim of conflict between his evil desires. Thus the peace of the wicked is not true peace, but at most a counterfeit of it (cf. Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologiae 2a2ae, 29.2 ad 3).

Although the highest and most genuine personal peace is the consequence of a perfect unity of desires made cohesive by charity and thus directed, at least implicitly, to the Supreme Good, a lesser degree of peace is possible when the intellect and will control and curb the irrational impulses that spring spontaneously from the sense appetite and that would issue in sin if indulged. The occurrence of such impulses indicates a measure of division within a man, but not on the rational or moral level.

Although charity causes peace in the individual by uniting all his desires in the love of God above all else, it also brings about the peace of the individual in relation to other men, insofar as in loving his neighbor as himself, he wishes in some manner at least to fulfill his neighbor's will as though it were his own (Summa Theologiae 2a2ae, 29.3). The will of his neighbor thus becomes part of the unity of a man's own desires.

Although peace is directly the work of the essential unitive force of charity, indirectly it is also “the work of justice” (Is 32.17), insofar as justice removes obstacles to peace, for example, the possible conflict of wills concerning the rights that should be conceded to another.

True peace can be either perfect or imperfect. Perfect peace is achieved in the eternal beatitude, which will unite all of a man's desires by giving them permanent rest in one object. Only imperfect peace is possible in this life; for although a person may habitually have his will united to God in love and thus enjoy basic peace within himself, still his will is free and he may fall from grace. Moreover, there are many other things and situations, both within man and external to him, that can disrupt his essential peace and make it imperfect, e.g., the constant threat that his senses and emotions may escape the control of his will or the opposition to virtue of wicked men with which he has to contend (Summa Theologiae 2a2ae, 29.2 ad 4).

Peace is implicitly listed among the beatitudes enunciated by Christ: “Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God” (Mr 5.9). It is also one of the fruits of the Holy Spirit (Gal 5.23).

Bibliography: T. AQUINAS, Summa Theologiae 1a2ae, 69.3; 2a2ae, 29, 37, 38, 39; C. gent. 3.34. E. SCHICK and A. AUER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4: 361–363. B. H. MERKELBACH, Summa theologiae moralis (Paris 1949) 1:920, 954. W. R. FARRELL, Companion to the Summa, 4 v. (New York 1932–42) 3:104–106, 118–121.

[P. C. CURRAN]

PEACE (IN THE BIBLE)

The Hebrew word for peace, šālôm, translated in the Septuagint most often by the Greek word, eirēnē, has a wide semantic range including the notions of totality or completeness, success, fulfillment, wholeness, harmony, security and well being.

Peace in the OT. The most comprehensive description of shalom is a cosmic order ordained by God through creation (Gn 1) and established with God’s people in the covenant (Ex 20–23). In this cosmic order each part finds its meaning and function as it conforms to God’s purpose. Shalom describes the “realm where chaos is not allowed to enter” (Hanson, 347), chaos being understood as sickness, war, social strife, or the violation of the covenant.

Peace can result from military victory (Jgs 8:9), or from diplomacy (Est 9:30; 10:3). The phrase “to ask the peace” (2 Kgs 9:11, 19; cf. Dt 20:10), often serving as more than a common greeting, signals the process of initiating negotiation, whereas “go in peace” (Jgs 18:6; 1 Sm 20:13; 2 Sm 15:9) functioning as more than a farewell, appears to be used predominantly “as the conclusio of successful negotiations” (Wiseman, 323).

As the Hebrew Scriptures frequently attest, peace in its fullness is possible because Yahweh is its source and the giver of peace to others (Lv 26:6; Ps 29:11; 122.8; Is 26:12; Ez 34:25; Zec 8:12). In the well-known Aaronic blessing, “The Lord look upon you kindly and give you peace” (Nm 6:20), peace is associated with God’s presence. There is no peace for the wicked (Is 48:22), but the one who keeps God’s law has great peace (Ps 119:165). Frequently peace and righteousness are linked together (Ps 72:7; 85:10; Is 9:7; 48:18). Those who proclaimed peace when injustice and greed prevailed were berated by the prophets (Jer 6:14; 8:11; Est 13:16). In the “covenant of shalom” (Nm 25:12; Is 54:10; Ez 34:25; 37:26), peace is experienced as the result of living in fidelity to the covenantal stipulations. During the period of the monarchy, Israel’s kings hastened the return of chaos as they abandoned trust in Yahweh, relying instead on the strength of their armies. Peace comes to the nation that trusts in God (Is 26:3).

After the collapse of the Southern Kingdom, at the time of the Exile, the restoration of Shalom was announced. The era of shalom would encompass the whole world with its center in Zion (Is 60–61). The coming of the day of salvation is linked with the Prince of Peace (Is 9:6–7), who is God’s anointed (Is 61:1). Peace became the mark of the awaited Messianic kingdom and is announced along with salvation by its heralds (Is 52:7).

New Testament. The term eirēnē occurs in all the NT writings except 1 John, appearing most often in Luke-Acts, Romans, and Ephesians. Occasionally, eirēnē is used in its classical sense to designate a condition of law and order or the absence of war, as experienced, e.g., during the Pax Romana (Mt 10:34 par; Lk 11:21; 14:32; Acts 12:20; 24:2; Rv 6:4). Usually, however, the term is used to refer to the experience of salvation that comes from God or the harmonious relationships between persons.

In Luke-Acts Jesus is proclaimed as the one who brings “peace on earth,” understood as salvation for (not from) the world (2:14), and who guides others “into the way of peace” (1:79). In fact, peace is used as term for salvation (7:50; 8:48). It is a peace that Jerusalem (the “city of peace”) unfortunately has failed to understand (19:45) because it failed to recognize its “king” of peace.

The disciples are instructed to have peace among themselves, i.e., to form a community of peace (Mk 9:50) and to seek reconciliation among themselves before worship when the communal peace has been disturbed (Mt 5:23–26; 18:15–20). They are sent on mission to bring peace, but only the person receptive to God’s salvation receives it; those who are non-receptive come under God’s judgement (Mt 10:13 pa.; cf. Acts 10:36). Those who decide against Jesus can expect not peace but the sword (Mt 10:34–36 par).

In John’s Gospel, the “world” is portrayed as a hostile place neither able to give, nor easily receptive to the peace that already exists between Jesus and his disciples (Jn 14:27; 16:33). Accompanying the gift of the Spirit is the risen Jesus’ gift of peace (Jn 20:19, 21, 26), a gift that drives out fear.

In the Pauline letters, the reconciling love of God in Christ (Rom 5:6–11) has bestowed justification upon believers, resulting in “peace with God” (Rom 5:1; see Col

1:20; Eph 2:11–22). Those who live according to the Spirit know peace (Rom 8:6). Peace is a fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5:22), the hallmark of the gospel (Eph 6:15), and, along with righteousness and joy, the essence of God's kingdom (Rom 14:17). For this reason Paul urges his readers to be "at peace" not only with other believers (Rom 14:19; 1 Cor 7:15; 2 Cor 13:11), but with everyone (Rom 12:18). Similarly, in the other letters believers are called to cultivate peace (Jas 3:18; cf. Mt 5:9) among themselves, with outsiders (Heb 12:14), and even with their enemies (1 Pt 3:10–12, quoting Ps 34:12–16).

God is a God of peace (1 Cor 14:33; cf. Rom 15:33; 16:20; 1 Thes 5:23) who will keep our hearts in Christ Jesus (Phil 4:7); Christ is himself the peace between us (Eph 2:14).

Bibliography: H. BECK and C. BROWN, "Peace," Dictionary of New Testament Theology 2 (1976) 776–783. J. I. DURHAM, "Šālôm and the Presence of God," J. I. DURHAM and J. R. PORTER, eds., Proclamation and Presence. Old Testament Essays in Honour of Gwynne Henton Davies (Richmond 1970) 272–293. J. FOLK, "Salvation as Shalom," Dialog 26 (1987) 104–110. V. P. FURNISH, "War and Peace in the New Testament," Interpretation 38 (1984) 363–379. P. D. HANSON, "War and Peace in the Hebrew Bible," Interpretation 38 (1984) 341–362. V. HASLER, "eirēnē, ēs, hē eirēnē Frieden," Exegetisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament, v. 1 (1980) cols. 957–964. D. J. WISEMAN, "'Is it Peace?' Covenant and Diplomacy," Vetus Testamentum 32 (1982) 311–326.

[J. L. GILLMAN]

PEACE OF GOD

A movement, largely of ecclesiastical inspiration, to arrest anarchy by means of censures and pacts of peace; it originated in Aquitaine toward the end of the 10th century and had spread to most parts of Europe by the middle of the 12th century.

By the time the Capetian dynasty took over in France (c. 987), the Carolingian organization had been in a shambles for over a century, particularly in the center and south: property was a prey of robber barons; private wars were common; the judicial system was next to powerless. Consequently, local churches were moved to take measures to protect property, lay as well as ecclesiastical. An early example comes from a council of the archbishop of Bordeaux and his suffragans (Poitiers, Périgueux, Saintes, Angoulême) at Charroux (Poitiers) in 989, where excommunications were pronounced against violators of churches, aggressors of unarmed clerics, and despoilers of the livestock of the poor (J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio [Paris 1889–1927] 19:90). At Le Puy in the following year, the local bishop imposed a "peace pact" on all his subjects; and a council called by Count William V of Aquitaine at Poitiers (1000–14) had as its theme "A delicious name indeed is that of peace" (J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio [Paris 1889–1927] 19:267). Later, with the consent of King Henry I of France, a Council of Peace was established by the bishops of Aquitaine at Bourges in 1031 (J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio [Paris 1889–1927] 19:507); its success allowed the Limousin bishops meeting at Limoges in 1033 to hope, as they formulated a stirring anathema against warlords, that the peace then prevailing in Aquitaine "would soon be achieved among the Limousins" (J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio [Paris 1889–1927] 19:529–530). Writing in 1046, Rodulphus Glaber, a Burgundian historian, described how the example of Aquitaine had inspired all France to hold councils "for remaking peace" at which those present cried out with hands uplifted, "Peace! Peace! Peace!" as "a sign of a perpetual pact between them and God" (Historiarum libri quinque, ed. M. Prou [Paris 1886] 103–105). In the principalities of Normandy and Flanders in the north, secular power was sufficiently strong to dominate the movement; thus Baldwin IV of Flanders organized a great collective oath of peace in 1030, while in Normandy the rulers commissioned the bishops to use excommunication and, if necessary, to call on the secular arm, against violators of peace pledges (Council of Lillebonne, 1080; J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio [Paris 1889–1927] 19:555).

Outside of France. In Italy, despite overtures by some French prelates to Italian bishops in 1040 and 1041, the peace was not introduced until Pope URBAN II and the Norman barons proclaimed it in 1089 in southern Italy. During the quarrels between Pope GREGORY VII and the Emperor HENRY IV, the bishops and nobles took the initiative in Lorraine and Germany, but the emperor assumed charge of the peace on his return from Italy in 1077. Spain lagged behind until c. 1124, while the peace was never more than a name in England, since an Anglo-Saxon regime in which the power of the lords never wholly impaired the freedom of others passed directly in 1066 to a vigorous, well-organized monarchy. In general the movement had a qualified success, relying greatly upon EXCOMMUNICATION and on the feudal homage due rulers, nobles, and bishops (see FEUDALISM). Sometimes the pledges of local lords were substantiated by hostages, and barons often undertook to bring to heel any of their ranks who should break the collective oath. On occasion the movement got out of hand, as in the reckless and ill-fated Militia of Berry, founded in 1038 by Aimon, bishop of Bourges, or in the popular "Peacemaker" groups founded in Le Puy in 1082.

Truce of God. Allied to the peace of God, but distinct from it, was a “Truce of God,” during which hostilities would be suspended. First mooted, perhaps, at the Council of Toulouges (Roussillon) in the diocese of Elne in 1027, where certain “days of rest” from fighting, notably Sundays, were proclaimed (J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio [Paris 1889–1927] 19:483–484), this excellent idea was later overused to the point of extinction; by 1139 (Third LATERAN COUNCIL; Conciliorum oecumenicorum decreta [Bologna-Freiburg 1962] 169) it covered a weekly lull from sunset on Wednesday until sunrise on Monday, as well as the whole of Advent, the octaves of Christmas and Epiphany, and the period from Quinquagesima (from Septuagesima by 1179; Conciliorum oecumenicorum decreta [Bologna-Freiburg 1962] 198) to the Octave of Easter.

Bibliography: L. HUBERTI, Studien zur Rechtsgeschichte der Gottesfrieden und Landfrieden (Ansbach 1892). F. V. DUVAL, De la Paix de Dieu à la Paix de Fer (Paris 1923). Y. BONGERT, Recherches sur les cours laïques du Xe au XIIIe siècle (Paris 1949). B. TÖPFER, Volk und Kirche zur Zeit der beginnenden Gottesfriedensbewegung in Frankreich (Berlin 1957). M. BLOCH, Feudal Society, tr. L. A. MANYON (Chicago, Ill. 1961). K. BOSL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1106–07. D. KENNELLY, “Medieval Towns and the Peace of God,” Medievalia et humanistica 15 (1963) 35–53. A. HOFFMANN, Gottesfriede und Treuga Dei (Stuttgart 1964).

[L. E. BOYLE]

PEACE OFFERING (IN THE BIBLE)

Also known as a communion offering, of which the main characteristic was that the victim was shared between God, the priest, and the person offering the sacrifice. The Hebrew terms for this kind of offering, zebah, zebah šelāmîm or šelāmîm, were almost interchangeable. Zebah described the sacrifice by its outward ritual, a slaughtering, or immolation; šelāmîm by the intention of the offerer, with opinions varying according to the derivation of šelem from šālôm, peace, or šillam, complete or make good (vows). Three types of peace offerings include sacrifices of praise, VOTIVE OFFERINGS, and the free-will offering. The distinctions between the three were not very precise, and the time allowed for consuming the portions varied (Lv 7.15–18). The principal ritual is described in Leviticus ch. 3 and corresponds to that for HOLOCAUST. The victims were also the same as those for holocaust, though birds were not allowed; they could have been male or female, and minor blemishes were tolerated in a victim offered as a voluntary sacrifice (Lv 22.23). Yahweh’s portion was burned on the altar. It comprised all the fatty parts, since fat, like blood, was considered a life-giving part (Lv 3.16–17; 7.22–24). The breast (wave offering) and the right leg (raised offering) were assigned to the priest. The remainder of the animal belonged to the person who offered the sacrifice. He ate it with his family and any guests, all of whom had to be in a state of ritual purity.

Bibliography: R. DE VAUX, Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions, tr. J. MCHUGH (New York 1961) 417–418, 427–428. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1784–85.

[J. B. FREUND]

PEARL, THE

A Middle English alliterative poem. The Pearl-Gawain MS, written in the last quarter of the 14th century, contains four alliterative poems, Patience, Purity (or Cleanness), The Pearl, and Sir Gawain and the Green Knight. This MS (in the Cotton Collection, British Museum) is the only extant version. All the poems are written in the same scribe’s hand, but there is no agreement among scholars about common authorship. All the poems are excellent examples of 14th-century alliterative verse, but Patience, which relates the story of Jona, and Purity, which contrasts the virtue of Christ and the Blessed Virgin to the wickedness of all pagan gods and goddesses, are completely overshadowed by Pearl and Gawain; in the latter two poems Middle English alliterative poetry reaches its highest eminence.

Pearl, in 101 interlinked 12-line stanzas, is cast in the form of an elegy. The speaker, sorrowing over the loss of his not quite two-year-old daughter, falls asleep in his garden and is granted a vision of her. She instructs him about the joys of heaven, tells him not to weep for her since she is in the company of the virgins who dance before the throne of God, and finally shows him a vision of the Heavenly Jerusalem, with its golden buildings and towers of precious stones, as it is described in Revelation. The glories of the narrator’s vision are matched by the ornate and intricate verse. Each stanza contains only two rhyming sounds, and each is bound to its fellows by the device of beginning each stanza with a line containing a key word, and closing the stanza with a line including the same word, so that one word runs through each of the sections as a unifying principle.

Pearl is now widely interpreted as an ALLEGORY, though critics are not agreed as to its significance. Allegorical readings generally suggest that the poem is concerned with the loss of grace or with a dark period in the narrator’s spiritual life. Whatever the ultimate interpretation, the poem is obviously a powerful argument for submitting to God’s will in adversity.

Sir Gawain and the Green Knight relates in 2,530 lines the story of Gawain’s exchange of blows with the preternatural Green Knight, who survives a beheading by Gawain and demands the right to a return match one year later. Gawain’s search for the Green Knight the next year ends in a castle at Christmas. The lord of the castle keeps Gawain there for three days, during which it is agreed that the lord will exchange the trophies of three days’ hunting for whatever Gawain receives on those days. On two days Gawain receives kisses from the lady of the castle, who tries to seduce him, and he keeps his bargain with the host. On the third day he receives from the lady a magic girdle that is supposed to ward off all harm. This he does not give to the host but wears to his meeting with the Green Knight. The Green Knight, who only nicks Gawain’s neck, reveals himself to be the lord of the castle and announces that all was done at the command of Morgan le Fay, to test the Round Table and to frighten Queen Guinevere. The poem is written in stanzas consisting of a varying number of alliterative lines, ending in one two-stressed line followed by a four-stressed quatrain (a device known as the bob-and-wheel).

Two book pages from the “Pearl-Gawain” manuscript, on left, painting of the Dreamer speaking to his lost Pearl, who is standing on the battlements of the New Jerusalem. The river represents the great gulf between this life and the next, English, c.1350–1400.

Interpretations of Gawain vary greatly. Among them, the poem has been regarded as a straightforward romance, as an allegory, and as a repository of English and Celtic myths. All critics agree, however, that it is one of the greatest of Middle English poems, and it is universally praised for the intricacy of its structure, controlled diction, sure characterization, balanced composition, and general high poetic achievement. Recent interpretations have increasingly stressed the religious aspects of the poem, and it may well be that Gawain represents the Christian in the world—virtuous, following his duty as he sees it, but occasionally fallible and in need of testing and correction.

Bibliography: Patience, ed. I. GOLLANZ (2d ed. London 1924). Purity, ed. R. J. MENNER (New Haven, Conn. 1921); under the name Cleanness, ed. I. GOLLANZ and M. DAY, 2 v. (London 1921–33). Pearl, ed. E. V. GORDON (Oxford 1953); ed. and tr. M. V. HILLMANN (Convent Station, N.J. 1961), valuable introd. and notes. Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, ed. J. R. R. TOLKIEN and E. V. GORDON (London 1925); ed. I. GOLLANZ et al. (Early English Text Society, orig. ser. 210; 1940); ed. J. KREUZER and tr. J. ROSENBERG

(New York 1959), with excellent introd. G. L. KITTREDGE, A Study of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight (Cambridge, Mass. 1916). M. BORROFF, Sir Gawain and the Green Knight: A Stylistic and Metrical Study (New Haven, Conn. 1962). M. W. BLOOMFIELD, "Sir Gawain and the Green Knight: An Appraisal," Publications of the Modern Language Association 76 (1961) 7–19, invaluable summary of previous scholarship. SR. MADELEVA, Pearl: A Study in Spiritual Dryness (New York 1925), the first fully allegorical study. D. W. ROBERTSON, "The Heresy of The Pearl: The Pearl as Symbol," Modern Language Notes 25 (1950) 152–161. J. SPEIRS, Medieval English Poetry: Non-Chaucerian Tradition (London 1957). D. EVERETT, Essays on Middle English Literature, ed. P. KEAN (Oxford 1955).

[N. D. HINTON]

PEASANTS' WAR (1524–25)

The Peasants' War was a rebellion by the poor agrarian classes against their overlords, which began in 1524 at Stühlingen and spread to most of the areas of southern and southeastern Germany, including Austria, the Tyrol, Alsace, and the provinces of the lower Rhine. Eventually, the rebellion touched off calls for reform in some South German cities as well, with the urban poor adding their calls for reform to those of the rural peasantry. The causes for unrest were many, including: economic pressures stemming from the commercial revolution; the increasingly burdensome demands of the landed classes; the growing sense of release from traditional social discipline resulting from the events and popular preaching of the early Reformation; the reception of Roman law, which lowered the social position of the German peasants and urban proletariat in relation to the authority of the Holy Roman Empire's princes, magistrates, and nobles; and the tradition of militant peasant action which had produced a number of peasant revolts during the previous half century, including the disturbances at Niklashausen in 1476, the uprisings of the Bundschuh of 1502, of Armer Konrad in 1514, and of Styria and Carinthia in 1515. Nineteenth-century historians once stressed that the Peasants' War resulted from a tragic misinterpretation of the doctrine of Christian freedom, as expressed most vigorously by Martin LUTHER in his On Christian Liberty of 1520. Scholarship since the 1970s has stressed multiple and complex causes for the event and has often styled the Peasants' War as an early social revolution that eventually came to challenge aristocratic institutions and privileges and the hierarchical nature of the social structure.

Peasant demands were codified in the Twelve Articles of Memmingen, widely circulated in 1525, which included: the right of congregational election of pastors, modification of tithe payments, abolition of serfdom, discontinuance of land enclosure, elimination of traditional feudal dues, and reform in administration of justice. The relationship between the German Protestant REFORMATION and the Peasants' War, while not immediate, was perceived at the time to be very real. In his "An Exhortation to Peace in Response to the Twelve Articles of the Swabian Peasants" of 1525, Luther initially counseled Germany's peasants against the use of force and the empire's nobles to conciliate with their subjects. As the conflict escalated to include Thuringia, and as the the peasants of Swabia and Franconia were won over to the doctrines of Thomas Münzer, Luther reacted decisively against the movement. In "Against the Murderous and Robbing Horde of the Peasantry" (1525), he issued a violent attack on them, advising the princes to make every effort to crush the rebellion. PHILIP OF HESSE, the Elector John of Saxony, and the Dukes Henry and George of Saxony met and defeated Münzer's force at Frankenhausen on May 15, 1525, slaughtering more than 5,000 peasants and capturing and executing their leaders, including Münzer. Anton of Lorraine annihilated the rebel bands in Alsace, while George Truchsess, with the Electors of Palatine and Trier, destroyed those under Metzler at Konigshofen.

Bibliography: P. BLICKLE, The Revolution of 1525, trans. T. BRADY, JR., and H. C. E. MIDELFORT (Baltimore 1981). G. FRANZ, Der deutsche Bauernkrieg (Darmstadt 1956); *Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart*³, 7 v. (Tübingen 1957–65) 1:927–930. F. ZOEPFL, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 2:58–59. B. GEBHARDT, Handbuch der deutschen Geschichte, ed. H. GRUNDMANN, 4 v. (Stuttgart 1954–60) v. 2. J. BÜHLER, Deutsche Geschichte (Berlin 1954) v. 3.

[P. L. HUGHES]

PECIA

A "piece" or section of a manuscript used in university bookstores of the 13th and 14th centuries. The newly established universities created a great demand for books. The bookstores carried official copies, or exemplars, whose accuracy was vouched for by university professors; these were rented out in small sections, or peciae, usually of four leaves, to students to have copied. If the next pecia was in use, the student rented the following one, and his scribe left space for the one not available. In the MSS so produced the telltale indications are: (1) the abbreviation p, pe, or pec (for pecia), in the margins where peciae began or ended; often these were numbered serially; (2) change of hand or ink at the beginnings of peciae; (3) space left between peciae when a scribe, being forced to skip, wrote smaller than necessary; (4) crowding at the end of a pecia when not enough room was left.

The changes wrought by the new system, though considerable, arose naturally out of earlier practices. Previously when a book had to be copied quickly, the quires were divided among several scribes. Now a smaller unit, the 8-page pecia, was substituted for the 16-page quire; thus greater speed was made possible. The number of scribes must have increased considerably. Monks no longer sufficed for the task, and professional scribes largely supplanted them in the transcription of schoolbooks. The sudden demand (four universities were founded in Italy between 1222 and 1231) caused the multiplication of inaccurate copies and brought about university control of official copies, the heart of the new system. The net result was cheaper textbooks (for the prices were fixed), more rapidly produced, with the text guaranteed by the bookseller (called stationer). On a small scale this was an industrial revolution. The new system began about 1225. By 1264 it was so well established that the statutes of the University of Padua could declare that without exemplars a university could not exist.

J. Destrez's epoch-making book and his posthumous article brought the pecia into prominence. He examined more than 15,000 MSS of approximately 300 authors and found 82 exemplars. He confined himself to authors represented in the university curricula, chiefly in the fields of theology, law (civil and Canon), and medicine, to which he added Aristotle. The liberal arts he covered incompletely and scantily; hence it is not possible to say to what extent the system was employed for them. It seems, however, that few arts books were produced under it. When such are found, they deserve particular attention.

Destrez devoted his investigations largely to the Universities of Paris, Bologna, Oxford, and Naples. He noted the distinguishing characteristics of each in script, abbreviation, etc. The paleography of the MSS involved and their textual criticism are greatly affected by practices connected with the pecia. Naturally, exemplars are preferred to copies in the editing of texts.

Bibliography: J. DESTREZ, La Pecia dans les manuscrits universitaires du XIIIe e du XIVe siècle (Paris 1935). J. DESTREZ and M. D. CHENU, "Exemplaria universitaires des XIIIe e XIVe siècles," Scriptorium 7 (1953) 68–80. G. FINK-ERRERA, "Jean Destrez et son oeuvre," ibid. 11 (1957) 264–280. K. CHRIST, "Petia," Zentralblatt für Bibliothekswesen 55 (1938) 1–44.

[B. L. ULLMAN]

PECOCK, REGINALD

Bishop, English philosopher of religion; b. Wales, probably Saint David's diocese, between 1392 and 1395; d. Thorney Abbey, 1460 or 1461. He entered Oxford in 1409, took a B.A. in 1413, and in 1414 was elected to a fellowship at Oriel College. By 1424 he was bachelor of theology; by 1444, a doctor of theology. He was ordained in the Diocese of Lincoln (1420 or 1421). On July 19, 1431, he became rector of St. Michael in Riola and master of Whittington College, London, a body of five secular chaplains, two clerks, and four choristers, in the patronage of the Mercers Company. While there, he carried out part of his design to win back the LOLLARDS to the orthodox faith through philosophical argument in English and in Latin in the form of expository works outlined in his Afore Crier. The key work of the series was the Book, or Rule of Crysten Religioun: soon after this came the Donet, then the Just Apprising of the Holy Scriptures. These and other works, circulated among his friends before they had received final shape, got him into trouble with conservative theologians, who detected in his "cleer witt" the elements of heresy, particularly when in his New English Creed he propounded a doctrine of belief that could not be reconciled with the classic understanding of the symbol, or creed. Meanwhile at the insistence of his Lancastrian friends he received promotion to the bishopric of SAINT ASAPH (1444) and then to CHICHESTER (1450). But as a member of a court group of bishops, he became unpopular with the working clergy; and as one who was not prepared to attribute infallibility to the FATHERS OF THE CHURCH and one who held that bishops were not bound by their office to preach, he incurred the enmity of the powerful and passionate chancellor of Oxford, Thomas Gascoigne. In 1456 his enemies charged him with trying to disturb the faith of England. He was put on trial at the request of the council (October 1457) by a specialist tribunal, convicted before a great council, and forced (December 1457) to repudiate his errors. He was not deprived, having made his peace with Rome, but his enemies continued to pursue him, this time for offenses against the Great Statute of PRAEMUNIRE, and a new inquiry into his books was commissioned (September 1458). Pecoek resigned (1458), but he was not allowed to go free. He was confined to the monastery of THORNEY, limited in his reading to the Scriptures and service books, and not allowed to write.

Bibliography: V. H. GREENE, Bishop Reginald Pecoek (Cambridge, Eng. 1945). T. KELLY, Reginald Pecoek (Manchester U. diss. 1950). E. F. JACOB, "Reynold Pecoek, Bishop of Chichester," Proceedings of the British Academy 37 (1951) 121–53. Emden 3:1447–49. E. H. EMERSON, "Reginald Pecoek: Christian Rationalist," Speculum 31 (1956) 235–242.

[E. F. JACOB]

PECTORIUS, EPITAPH OF

An inscription found (1830) in seven fragments in an ancient Christian cemetery near Autun, France, and published by Cardinal PITRA. He and G. de Rossi ascribed it to the beginning of the 2d century; E. Le Blant and J. Wilpert attributed it to the end of the 3d century. Both dates are too early; the form and style of its letters indicate as the period of its origin sometime between 350 and 400. The phraseology, however, resembles the inscription of ABERCIUS (end of the 2d century) and clearly reflects the discipline of the SECRET. It is quite possible that the first part of the epitaph is a quotation from an older poem.

The inscription consists of three distichs and five hexameters; and the first five verses are bound together by the acrostic IXΘΥΣ, a word that appears five times in the text. The content falls into two parts. The first (verses 1 to 7) is addressed to the reader and is of doctrinal character. Baptism is called “the immortal fountain of divine waters”; the Eucharist, “the honeysweet food of the Redeemer of the saints”; Christ, “the light of the dead.” The second part (verses 8 to 11) is personal. Here Pectorius prays for his mother and asks his deceased parents and brothers to remember him “in the peace of the Fish.” The words “holding the Fish in your hands” recall the ancient Communion rite in which the Eucharist was placed in the hands of the recipient.

Bibliography: J. QUASTEN, ed. Monumenta eucharista et liturgica vetustissima (Bonn 1935–37) 24–27, text, and Lat. tr. QUASTEN, Patrology (Westminster MD 1950) 1:173–175, with bibliog. F. J. DÖLGER, IXΘΥΣ?, v.1 (Rome 1910) 12–15, 177–183; ibid., v.2 (Münster 1922) 507–515. M. GUARDUCCI, Rendiconti della Pontificia Accademia di Archeologia 23–24 (1947–49) 243–252.

[J. QUASTEN]

PEERS, EDGAR ALLISON

Hispanic scholar and authority on Spanish mysticism; b. Leighton Buzzard, Bedfordshire, England, May 7, 1891; d. Liverpool, Dec. 21, 1952. He was educated at Dartford Grammar School and Christ’s College, Cambridge. After a distinguished university career, he taught modern languages. In 1920 he was appointed to the Gilmour Chair of Spanish in Liverpool University, a post he held until his death.

Professor Peers made an important contribution to Spanish studies, in both teaching and research. He organized vacation courses in London and Liverpool and eventually in Spain. He founded the Institute of Hispanic Studies and its Bulletin and was for some time educational director of the Hispanic Council. He was a brilliant but also a patient teacher who took a personal interest in his pupils. He published a definitive annotated translation of the works of SS. TERESA OF AVILA and JOHN OF THE CROSS, based on the critical text of P. Silverio de S. Teresa and on discussions with the latter and Dom Edmund Gourdon, Prior of Miraflores charterhouse (Burgos). Peers (himself an Anglican) produced numerous other works on Spanish mysticism. He wrote ably on the Spanish Civil War, and under the name of Bruce Truscot produced several books calling attention to the potentialities of the modern “red-brick” universities.

Edgar Allison Peers.

Bibliography: E. A. PEERS, Studies of the Spanish Mystics, 3 v. (London 1927–60). Translations. Complete Works of St. John of the Cross, 3 v. (London 1934–35; rev. ed. London 1953). Complete Works of St. Teresa, 3 v. (London 1946); Letters of St. Teresa (Westminster, MD 1950). BERNARDINO OF LAREDO, Ascent of Mount Sion (London 1952). Bulletin of Hispanic Studies 30 (1953) 1–20, memorial number with bibliog.

[K. POND]

PEGIS, ANTON CHARLES

Philosopher, educator, editor; b. Milwaukee, Wisconsin, Aug. 24, 1905; d. Toronto, Canada, May 13, 1978. He received a B.A. in 1928 and an M.A. in 1929 from Marquette University. In 1929 Pegis entered the Institute of Mediaeval Studies in Toronto, where he studied under Etienne Gilson and Gerald Phelan, and in 1931 received the Ph.D. in philosophy from the University of Toronto. He lectured at Marquette from 1931 to 1937 and at Fordham University from 1937 until 1944, when he returned to the Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies in Toronto as professor of the history of philosophy. He also taught as professor in the graduate department of philosophy at the University of Toronto.

Pegis served as president of the Pontifical Institute from 1946 to 1952 and subsequently became editorial director of the Catholic textbook division of Doubleday and Company in New York. He remained a fellow of the institute, returning to Toronto to teach full time from 1961 until his retirement in 1974. In his last years he supervised the new Graduate Center of Thomistic Studies at the University of St. Thomas, Houston, Texas, and lectured there on the philosophies of St. Thomas, Husserl, and Heidegger. Pegis was elected president of the American Catholic Philosophical Association in 1946 and in 1975 received its Aquinas Medal.

Pegis readily accepted the notion of Christian philosophy proposed by Pope Leo XIII in AETERNI PATRIS. He defended the rationality of philosophy and thought that Christian revelation, far from destroying that rationality, strengthened and deepened it. Though Pegis's research and writing in the history of philosophy and his own philosophical reflections touched upon many topics, his focus was the Augustinian themes of God and the soul.

To Pegis, the philosophy of St. Thomas appeared as the finest example of Christian philosophy. He saw Thomism as first and foremost a theology, one that employed philosophy as its handmaiden. The modern Thomist, he insisted, accepts the task of creating an autonomous philosophy true to the philosophical principles of Aquinas in a dialogue with contemporary philosophers and scientists that is open to the light of Christian revelation.

See Also: THOMISM.

Bibliography: Essays in Honour of Anton Charles Pegis, ed. J. R. O'DONNELL (Toronto 1974) 9–16. A. C. PEGIS, St. Thomas and the Problem of the Soul in the 13th Century (Toronto 1934); St. Thomas and the Greeks (Milwaukee 1939); Basic Writings of St. Thomas Aquinas, tr., 2 v. (New York 1945); Introduction to St. Thomas Aquinas, tr. (New York 1948); The Wisdom of Catholicism, ed. (New York 1949); St. Thomas Aquinas: On the Truth of the Catholic Faith, Book One: God, tr. (Garden City, NY 1955); A Gilson Reader, ed. (Garden City, NY 1957); Christian Philosophy and Intellectual Freedom (Milwaukee 1960); At the Origins of the Thomistic Notion of Man (New York 1963); The Middle Ages and Philosophy (Chicago 1963); St. Thomas and Philosophy (Milwaukee 1964).

[A. A. MAURER]

PÉGUES, THOMAS

Thomistic theologian; b. Marcillac, France, Aug. 2, 1866; d. Dax, April 28, 1936. He entered the Dominican order in 1888 and was ordained in 1892. He taught theology at Toulouse (1892) and Rome (1909). He became regent of studies for the Toulouse (1921) and Roman provinces (1928–35). Pégues' principal works are Jésus-Christ dans l'évangile (Paris 1899), Initiation thomiste (Toulouse 1921), Aperçus de philosophie thomiste et de propédeutique (Paris 1927), and Commentaire français littéral de la Somme Théologique de Saint Thomas d'Aquin, 21 v. (Toulouse-Paris 1907–32). In his monumental commentary he carefully followed the text of the Summa theologiae and explained St. Thomas's meaning by citing almost exclusively from his other works to show continuity and consistency of doctrine. Among his many articles the most noteworthy historically is "L'hérésie du renouvellement" against MODERNISM. It appeared in the Revue Thomiste (1907) two months before the promulgation of the encyclical Pascendi by Pius X (d. 1914).

Bibliography: R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, Revue thomiste 41 (1936) 441–445. Memoire dominicane 53 (1936) 193–197.

[W. D. HUGHES]

PÉGUY, CHARLES PIERRE

French poet and essayist; b. Orléans, Aug. 7, 1873; d. Battle of the Marne, Sept. 5, 1914. He was of a peasant family and was raised by his mother, his father having died when Charles was a year old. He was educated at the lycée in Orléans, the lycée La Kanel, and, after military service, the École Normale (1894). He became a bookseller and later director of La revue de la quinzaine, in whose pages he showed himself to be a socialist, but opposed to the "Socialists," and an intellectual opposed to the "Intellectual party." In 1900 he founded Cahiers de la quinzaine, which introduced many young writers—and much of his own work—to the public. Jeanne d'Arc (1897; in the form of a medieval mystery play, 1910) strikes the note of exalted patriotism that was to mark all his work. This is evident also in Notre patrie (1905) and Notre jeunesse, his vigorous defense of Alfred Dreyfus. Clio (1909) sets forth a theological concept of history, and L'argent exalts French culture. His later Mystères and Tapisseries give witness to his "conversion" and reveal a new poetic inspiration. He had early come under the influence of BERGSON, to whom he paid homage in Note sur M. Bergson (1914). He deliberately lived a poor life and, though devoutly Catholic, was somewhat unique in his manifestations of his faith.

Restless and full of pent-up violence, Péguy recalls BLOY and BERNANOS. The evil of the time, he conceived, rested in a disembodied intellectualism that belonged to a world of fantasy. Liberty is not derived from a philosophy or a political regime, but from daily struggle at the price of rigid discipline and constant effort. Love of liberty demands the help of the mystic. In some epochs of history the mystic controls human actions and, sustaining their impetus, gives them a direction consistent with honor; in other periods the mystic is consumed by politics—liberty of mind and heart are replaced by an unfeeling, rigid dogmatism. Persons on the scene, Péguy thought, are incapable of illuminating true history, which is what man knows “by the Gospels of these fishermen, boatmen, and tax-collectors who actually encountered Christ.” The people alone are able to bear witness, for they alone are “charged with the memory that preserves the essential against the alterations of time.” The Cahiers foretold the “city harmonious” in which the theoreticians would give way to people of enthusiasm and faith.

Above all else, Péguy mistrusted the atheism of a progress that masqueraded under the aegis of science, as in RENAN and Jean Jaures. His goal was to foster a salvation that would join the spiritual with the temporal, intellectual, and vocational. In Jeanne d'Arc he proclaims the Christian dogmas of the reality of the Incarnation and Redemption. In some of his poems he portrays God speaking almost in the accents of a French peasant, in an effort to make real His loving providence. At one and the same time a chronicler of the Middle Ages and an illuminator and prodigious producer of words and ideas, Péguy created a language suitable for the poetic presentation of the irresistible march of Christianity since the paradise of Adam. This is the theme of Eve (1913).

Bibliography: Oeuvres complètes, 15 v. (Paris 1917–34); Oeuvres poétiques complètes, introd. F. PORCHÉ (Paris 1962). Cahiers de la quinzaine, ed. C. P. PÉGUY, 229 v. (Paris 1900–14). J. ROUSSEL, Péguy (Paris 1963). A. ROUSSEAU, Le prophète Péguy, 2 v. (Paris 1942–46). R. ROLLAND, Péguy, 2 v. (Paris 1945). H. DANIEL-ROPS, Péguy (rev. ed. Paris 1935). A. SUARÈS, Péguy (Paris 1915). D. O'DONNELL, Maria Cross: Imaginative Patterns in a Group of Catholic Writers (New York 1952). C. MOELLER, Littérature du XX e siècle et christianisme, 4 v. (Tournai 1953–60).

[G. MOURGUE]

PEIRCE, CHARLES SANDERS

American philosopher, pioneer in symbolic logic, originator of one version of pragmatism, outstanding neorealist; b. Cambridge, Mass., Sept. 10, 1839; d. Milford, Pa., April 19, 1914.

Life and Work. A close associate of Chauncey Wright, John Fiske, Josiah ROYCE, and William JAMES, Peirce studied at Harvard University and lectured there briefly in philosophy in 1864. Besides another brief teaching stint at Johns Hopkins University (1879–84), he worked as a physicist for the U.S. Coast Survey. Peirce was known for his broader philosophical speculations by only a few contemporaries familiar with his articles, lectures, reviews, and correspondence. He wrote no single definitive philosophical work that clearly establishes the unity of his thought. The first presentation of a unified portion of his work appeared in M. R. Cohen's edition titled Chance, Love and Logic (New York 1923), containing the first Peirce bibliography. Between 1931 and 1953 appeared the first eight volumes of the Collected Papers of Charles Sanders Peirce (Cambridge, Mass.). Because of the lack of any certain order in Peirce's treatment of essential aspects of his philosophy, the extensive indexes in the Collected Papers are indispensable for the study of Peirce. (In references to Peirce, the general practice is to indicate the volume and paragraph number of this edition, e.g., 5.432.)

Charles Sanders Peirce.

Teaching. Under the influence of his father, Benjamin Peirce, a Harvard University professor, Peirce became a complete mathematician. He made extensive and original contributions to the then-growing symbolic logic. I. KANT was his first philosophical mentor, although he grew critical of Kant as he studied British EMPIRICISM, ARISTOTLE, and scholastic sources, especially Duns Scotus. He sums up his position thus: "I should call myself an Aristotelian of the scholastic wing, approaching Scotism, but going further in the direction of scholastic realism" (5.77).

Although this statement is arguable, Peirce tried to establish a complete system by relating all his conclusions to his three categories: firstness, secondness, and thirdness. He claimed that these are not only the categories of all experience as revealed in phenomenology, but that they are also the essential categories of thought, of sign relations, and of reality itself. Independent of, and perhaps prior to, E. HUSSERL, Peirce determined the role of phenomenology (or phaneroscopy, as he called it) and worked out its details along lines remarkably similar to those of Husserl. This he related to a theory of meaning that embraced his metaphysical realism, asserting that things have meaning insofar as they embody triadic relations. It was in this sense that he maintained; "General principles are really operative in nature. This is the doctrine of scholastic realism" (5.101).

His teaching that general principles are signs operating in nature is essential to an understanding of his doctrine of pragmatism, which he called pragmaticism to distinguish it from William James's version. James, he contended, borrowed the idea of pragmatism from him and badly misinterpreted it. Peirce modified his conception of pragmatism several times, finally concluding that it is a method of determining the meaning of signs, completely in accord with his version of scholastic realism.

Moreover, Peirce incorporated into his system a thorough evolutionism, in which respect he compared with H. BERGSON and A. N. WHITEHEAD. Chance and law, he maintained, were two sides of evolution. The theory that chance is an objective reality operating in the universe he called tychism. The operation of law he called synechism, explaining it thus: "Synechism is founded on the notion that the coalescence, the becoming continuous, the becoming governed by laws, the becoming instinct with general ideas, are phases of one and the same process of the growth of reasonableness" (5.4). Metaphysics, taken as ontology and cosmology, is fundamentally concerned with this evolution of law as reality, which is the heart of his category of thirdness.

It is strongly debated as to whether Peirce was indeed a realist or an objective idealist. The complexity of his thought and its wide range make it unwise to offer any certain critique this early in the development of Peircean studies. He is generally considered to be far superior to his contemporary American philosophers and particularly relevant to the statement of present scholastic philosophy.

Bibliography: W. P. HAAS, The Conception of Law and the Unity of Peirce's Philosophy (Fribourg 1964). J. BOLER, Charles

Peirce and Scholastic Realism (Seattle 1963). M. G. MURPHEY, The Development of Peirce's Philosophy (Cambridge, Mass. 1961).

[W. P. HAAS]

PELAGIA, SS.

The name of six saints listed in the Roman MARTYROLOGY (1961 ed.); three are significant.

Pelagia of Antioch, d. 311? As a girl of 15, Pelagia of Antioch is said to have thrown herself from the rooftop to protect her virginity when soldiers came to arrest her during a persecution of DIOCLETIAN. St. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM praised this martyr's action in a homily preached probably in the church erected over her tomb (Patrologia Graeca 50:579–584). Her name is included in the canon of the Milanese Mass.

Feast: June 9.

Pelagia of Jerusalem, also known as Pelagia the Penitent, d. c. 457. According to a probable eyewitness writing under the pseudonym James the Deacon, Pelagia lived a dissolute life as an actress and dancer. Converted by the preaching of St. Nonnus (d. c. 458), an Egyptian bishop living at Antioch, Pelagia, disguised as a man, lived a life of penance in the Garden of Olives. Although a cult to St. Pelagia already existed in 530, the Vita by James the Deacon is the contamination of a sermon of St. John Chrysostom on an anonymous Syrian penitent (Hom. 67 in Mt.; Patrologia Graeca 58:636–637), mixed with the life of Pelagia of Antioch and the theme of the virgin monk. Her story is similar to that of several other saints, including Margaret, Marina, Euphrosyne, and Theodora.

Feast: Oct. 8.

Pelagia of Tarsus, d. 302? This Pelagia is said to have become a Christian after breaking her engagement with the son of Diocletian. When her fiancé then committed suicide, Diocletian summoned her and found her so beautiful that he proposed marriage, then ordered her burned to death when she declined.

Feast: May 4.

H. USENER tried to demonstrate that these three saints are the Christian sublimation of a Venus theme since Pelagia connotes "from the sea." But his theory is untenable.

Bibliography: Acta sanctorum May 1:458–463, June 2:153–162, Oct.4:248–268. H. USENER, ed., Legenden der heiligen Pelagia (Bonn 1879). H. DELEHAYE, The Legends of the Saints, tr. D. ATWATER (New York 1962). A. BENETTI, S. Margherita dei Lesini e le pievi della Postumia (Verona 1976). P. PETITMENGIN, Péla- gie la pénitente: métamorphoses d'une légende, 2 v. (Paris 1981–84). Die mittelniederdeutsche Margaretenlegende, ed. K. O. SEIDEL and G. DREXEL (Berlin 1994).

[R. K. POETZEL]

PELAGIUS I, POPE

Pontificate: April 16, 556 to March 4, 561. Pelagius inherited a daunting situation—much of his own making—from his predecessor Vigilius (537–555), and his pontificate was consumed with it. Pelagius was by birth a Roman, son of a civic official named John. He was a deacon under AGAPETUS (535–36) and dealt with diplomatic matters, joining that pope on an embassy to Constantinople to convince the emperor JUSTINIAN I (527–565) to depose the Monophysite patriarch of Constantinople, Anthimus. He replaced Vigilius as the papal representative in the imperial city when Vigilius returned to Rome to succeed the deposed Silverius (536–537) as pope. Since Vigilius had concurred with the imperial deposition of the pope, Pelagius found himself rumored to have worked against SILVERIUS, but that accusation is unproven. He was a success in Constantinople, becoming a confidante of Justinian, whom he convinced to denounce officially the teachings of the long deceased Alexandrian theologian Origen (c. 185–c. 253).

But friendship with the emperor did not deter him from his duties. He was in Rome in 544 when Justinian, to pacify the Monophysites in Egypt, condemned some writings of three Chalcedonian theologians, the famous THREE CHAPTERS. Pelagius promptly requested the theological opinion of the North African Ferrandus of Carthage (d. 546), who opposed the condemnation of three theologians who had died in the peace of the Church. The emperor assumed that Vigilius would agree with the imperial line, but when he balked at the Three Chapters ploy, Justinian's agents kidnapped him in 545. He would never return to Rome. The Romans rejected any imperial appointees as head of the local church, and so Pelagius assumed that role as vicar of Vigilius. When the Goths besieged the city in 547, the vicar used much of his personal wealth to alleviate the sufferings of the people, and after the Goths had captured Rome, he bargained with their king Totila and avoided a massacre. Quite taken by Pelagius, Totila sent him as ambassador to Justinian to try to win a peace in Italy, but the negotiations failed.

In 551 he went again to Constantinople and met with Vigilius who, after six years of captivity, was ready to acquiesce to the emperor's demands. Pelagius stiffened the pope's resolve but only temporarily. When Vigilius capitulated, Pelagius split from him. Justinian had Pelagius imprisoned in a monastery, and from there he wrote a scathing attack on Vigilius. After the pope had attended and approved the fifth ecumenical council, CONSTANTINOPLE II (553), Justinian allowed him to return to Rome. He never made it, dying in Sicily on June 7, 555. The crucial point in Pelagius' life had arrived.

In the absence of both pope and vicar, a priest named Mareas had governed the Roman church and looked to be the next pope. But Justinian wanted Pelagius, a former friend who, even in his most stringent writings against the condemnation of the Three Chapters, had not censured the emperor. Pelagius accepted the offer. Scholars debate whether he saw the opportunity for the papacy and could not resist it or whether he accepted Constantinople II and the condemnation of the Three Chapters as a fact of ecclesiastical life and was reconciled to the emperor. Most likely both motives played a role. When Mareas died in August of 555, the way was open for Pelagius' election in September of that year. But the pope-elect could not become pope because, in the laconic words of the Liber Pontificalis, "there was not a bishop to ordain him." Seven months later, on April 16, 556, two bishops and a priest agreed to do the job, but neither of the bishops were from Ostia, Portus, or Albinum, whose bishop traditionally ordained the pope.

Most Western bishops considered Pelagius an opportunist who had sold out for the papal office, and these included the bishops of suburcarian Italy, the regions around Rome. The new pope had to restore his authority. His imperial patron was eager to help. When the African bishops raised objections to Pelagius, Byzantine troops forced them to recognize him. But this tactic could not work everywhere. The pope sent an embassy to the king of FRANKS, Childebert I, to assure him of his orthodoxy, a dangerous precedent since the popes usually represented orthodoxy and could demand that other bishops assure him of theirs. When the Gallic bishops were slow to acquiesce, Pelagius urged Childebert to force them into agreement. The bishops of northeastern Italy refused communion with the pope, who urged them to come to Rome to judge his orthodoxy for themselves—a remarkable offer. But these bishops remained recalcitrant, so Pelagius asked the Byzantine exarch (ruler of foreign territory) in Ravenna to use troops against them, but the exarch refused. Pelagius was, however, successful in winning over the suburcarian Italian bishops, who accepted not only him as pope but also the authenticity of Constantinople II and the condemnation of the Three Chapters.

Aside from the schism (which lasted in Italy into the next century), Pelagius enjoyed much success. Relations with Byzantium were generally good, and the Goths ceased to menace Rome. The war against the barbarians as well as the decade-long absence of Vigilius from the city had depleted the ranks of the Roman clergy, whose numbers and moral quality Pelagius considerably augmented. The war had also ruined papal finances, and the pope brought in the first lay papal finance minister, a banker named Anastasius. Pelagius was a scholar, a patron of monasticism, and translator into Latin of some sayings of prominent Eastern monks. Few popes have led so full a life or worked against such formidable odds.

Bibliography: L. DUCHESNE, "Vigile et Pélage," Revue des questions historiques 36: 369–440; 37 (1885) 579–593. L'Église au VI^e siècle (Paris 1925) 225–238. R. DEVRESSE, ed. and tr., Pelagii diaconi ecclesiae romanae In defensione trium capitulorum (Studi e Testi 57; 1932); Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 12.1:660–669. P.M. GASSÓ and C. M. BATLLE, eds., Pelagii I papae epistulae quae supersunt (Monseratt 1956). L. ABRAMOWSKI, Vigiliae christianae 10: 160–193. E. STEIN, Histoire du Bas-Empire, tr. J. R. PALANQUE, 2 v. in 3 (Paris 1949–59) v. 2. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF from 5th German ed. (New York 1960) 555–556. R. ENO, The Early Papacy (Wilmington, Del. 1990) 134–139. E. FERGUSON ed., Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (New York 1997) 2:890. H. JEDIN, History of the Church (New York 1980) 2:445–446, 628–629. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 62–64. J. RICHARDS, Popes and Papacy in the Early Middle Ages (London 1979) 143–162.

[J. F. KELLY]

PELAGIUS II, POPE

Pontificate: Nov. 26, 579, to Feb. 7, 590. Because the Lombards were besieging Rome and the situation at the time was critical, a new pope was elected and consecrated as the successor of BENEDICT I without waiting for imperial confirmation. The deacon (later Pope) Gregory was dispatched to Constantinople to explain the omission and beg for military help. Pelagius II, born a Goth (son of Unigild), was the second pope of Germanic extraction. The emperor could spare few troops, hard pressed as he was by the Persians, but he advised the pope to bribe the Lombard dukes and to obtain the help of the Frankish King. The pope's appeal to the Frankish bishop of Auxerre (580) was without success, but it is an anticipation, by some 200 years, of a move that was ultimately to alter the course of history profoundly. The Byzantine exarch of Ravenna finally managed in 585 to secure from the Lombards a truce that lasted until 589.

The interval was used by the pope to end the Aquileian schism. The deacon Gregory was brought back from Constantinople to assist in the negotiations. Unfortunately the patriarch of Aquileia-Grado and the bishops of Venetia and Istria were unyielding in their refusal to restore communion with Rome. The pope asked Smaragdus, Byzantine exarch in Italy, to use force against the recalcitrant bishops, but the exarch was powerless to bring about the desired reconciliation, in spite of the pressure he brought to bear.

The pontificate of Pelagius II saw the beginnings of the controversy between Rome and Constantinople over the title of "ecumenical patriarch," regularly used by the patriarchs of Constantinople since the fifth century. Pelagius II refused to accept the use of that title by Patriarch John IV the Faster and also the acts of a council held at Constantinople, which John had confirmed.

In spite of the perilous political situation, Pelagius II provided a number of important adornments to Rome. It was probably he who began to raise the presbyterium of St. Peter's so that the high altar would be directly over the shrine of St. Peter while a covered passageway would lead to a small chapel directly behind the shrine for daily Masses. The earliest Lateran monastery of San Pancrazio dates perhaps from this reign, though it is uncertain whether the Benedictine monks from Montecassino, fleeing from the destruction of the famous abbey by the Lombards in 577, were received there as a body. The pope's personal residence nearby, which he converted into a hospital, may have given rise to the present Ospedale di San Giovanni. Recent excavations seem to show that he was responsible for adding a second adjoining basilica to San Lorenzo fuori le Mura, where his portrait in mosaic appears on the triumphal arch. Pelagius II perished in a plague that followed an unusually severe flooding of the city by the Tiber in early 590. He was buried in the portico of St. Peter's.

Bibliography: Clavis Patrum latinorum, ed. E. DEKKERS 1705–07, 6 genuine letters. Patrologia latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 72:703–60. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–1958) 1:309–311; 3:92–93. H. LECLERQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie (Paris 1907–53) 13.1:1222–24. G. B. LADNER, Die Papstbildnisse (Vatican City 1941–). P. VIELLIARD, Recherches sur les origines de la Rome chrétienne (Mâcon 1941; repr. Rome 1959) 142. G. FERRARI, Early Roman Monasteries (Rome 1957). J. TOYNBEE and J. B. WARD PERKINS, The Shrine of St. Peter (New York 1956). R. U. MONTINI, Le tombe dei papi (Rome 1957) 112. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:250. R. ENO, Rise of the Papacy (Wilmington, DE 1990) 139–142. E. FERGUSON, ed., Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (New York 1997), 2:890–891. H. JEDIN, History of the Church (New York 1980) 2:629. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 65. J. RICHARDS, Popes and Papacy the Early Middle Ages (London 1979) 166–168.

[J. CHAPIN]

PELAGIUS AND PELAGIANISM

A fifth-century heresy, Pelagianism was concerned with grace and freedom of the will; it is named after Pelagius, its principal author.

PELAGIUS

Born probably in Britain c. 354, Pelagius arrived in Rome c. 380, and although not a priest became a highly regarded spiritual director for both clergy and laity. His followers were few but influential, and their rigorous asceticism was a reproach to the spiritual sloth of many of their fellow Catholics. Before the capture of Rome by Alaric (410), Pelagius left for Africa with Coelestius, a close friend and collaborator. The latter remained there in the hope of becoming a priest, while Pelagius proceeded to Palestine, which became his home until 418, after which date he disappears from history.

Pelagius had received a solid training in the classics and achieved a fairly good knowledge of the Bible and the works of the Greek and Latin theologians. Many of his writings were formerly attributed to AUGUSTINE, JEROME, and other orthodox scholars. Some of his works, such as De fide Trinitatis, have disappeared. Three have been preserved: Expositiones XIII Epistularum Pauli (completed by 405); Epistola an Demetriadem (414), and Libellus fidei (addressed to Pope INNOCENT I in 417). There remain only fragments of some letters as well as of his De natura (414), De libero arbitrio (416), and Liber testimoniorum, a methodical collection of texts from Sacred Scripture. C. Caspari and G. de Plinval regarded him as the author of other anonymous or pseudonymous letters and treatises.

Pelagian Theological System. The doctrine of Pelagius, which can be reconstructed from his authentic writings, rests on freedom of the will and divine grace. According to him the human will is completely free and is equally ready to do either good or evil. This freedom would be destroyed if the will were inclined to evil because of another's sin or had to be strengthened by another's help. Divine grace is for him something external, as the free will itself, or the precepts of the Old and the New Testaments. Its purpose is merely to facilitate what the will can do by itself, and it is always given in proportion to one's merits.

These two basic principles led to the following conclusions: Adam's sin was purely personal; therefore it would be unjust for God to punish the human race for his transgression. Death is not a punishment of sin, but a necessity of human nature. Since all are born without sin, infant baptism is useless, and infants who die without the Sacrament go immediately to heaven. The Redemption does not give new life to the human race; Christ merely helps by His good example. Prayer for the conversion of others is futile since it cannot help them in saving their souls.

Pelagianism, therefore, denied the supernatural order, explained away the mystery of predestination, and made God only a spectator in the drama of human salvation.

Opposition to Pelagianism. These doctrines created no stir in Rome because Pelagius seems to have taught them only to a carefully selected audience, but soon after his departure from the city they were proclaimed openly in many parts of the Christian world. This was due mainly to the untiring propaganda of Coelestius. The first opposition was raised in 411 when Aurelius, Bishop of Carthage, summoned Coelestius to a local council. He was there ordered to retract his statements rejecting original sin and infant baptism. On his refusal, he was excommunicated and forced to leave the country.

Augustine. Augustine was not present at this council but, as he claims in his Retractationes (1.9.6), he was the enemy of Pelagianism long before it appeared. In 412 he wrote De peccatorum meritis and De spiritu et littera. In them, as in all his later anti-Pelagian writings, he emphasizes the weakness of man's will as a result of original sin and man's continuous need of God's help in order to be saved; and insists that grace is something personal, intrinsic, and above all a gratuitous gift of God, for if it were not gratuitous it would no longer be grace.

Orosius. While Coelestius was under excommunication, Pelagius was being honored and consulted by the clergy and laity of Palestine, and even DEMETRIAS in Rome sought his advice before dedicating herself to a life of virginity. In 414 Augustine sent a young and intelligent Spanish priest named OROSIUS to alert Jerome in Bethlehem and the hierarchy of the Holy Land to the dangers of the new heresy.

Orosius and Pelagius appeared before a meeting of bishops at Jerusalem on July 28, 415, where Orosius charged Pelagius with heresy. As Orosius did not know Greek, he was hindered in his presentation of the evidence, and Pelagius, who had become fluent in this language, easily refuted him by his equivocal statements. Bishop John of Jerusalem decided to refer the matter to the Holy See, urged both men to remain silent, and hinted that Orosius himself was not above suspicion. The latter professed his orthodoxy in his Liber apologeticus and also insisted that Pelagius should be condemned.

Jerome. In this same year Jerome wrote two treatises against the Pelagians: one is in a letter to Ctesiphon and the other is called Dialogus adversus Pelagianos. In both he weakened the force of his arguments by the use of vituperation and violent personal allusions. Jerome also exaggerated when he addressed Pelagius: "You boast a justice in men which is perfect and equal to that of God Himself" (Epistolae 133). Pelagius never went that far, for he carefully reminded his followers that they were inferior to God. His mistake, as Augustine repeatedly pointed out, was in teaching that man could acquire even a relative degree of justice by his own unaided efforts.

Synod of Diospolis. Eulogius, Metropolitan of Caesarea, did not wait for Rome's reply to the hierarchy of Palestine. Urged on by two exiled bishops of Gaul, Heros and Lazarus, he summoned Pelagius before a council of 14 bishops at Diospolis (ancient Lydda) on Dec. 20, 415. Since no accuser appeared, Pelagius was questioned about the doctrines attributed to him. When the incriminating passages were read he either denied that he had ever taught them or else offered an orthodox explanation. The bishops therefore exonerated him from the charge of heresy. Augustine later wrote a detailed account of this council, De gestis Pelagii, in 417, and showed that Pelagius had been forced to disavow Coelestius in some points of doctrine and to anathematize one of his essential principles: that grace is given according to man's merits.

The African Bishops. When the hierarchy of Africa first heard of this council they believed that it had given its approval to Pelagianism. Therefore, in 416 sixty-seven bishops from the province of Africa assembled at Carthage and fifty-eight from the province of Numidia at Milevis. Both councils sent letters to Pope Innocent I in which they pointed out the errors of the Pelagians concerning freedom of the will, the futility of prayer, and infant baptism, and implored him to condemn its two principal leaders. On Jan. 27, 417, the Pope wrote three letters in reply. In them he approved of what the African bishops had written and excommunicated Pelagius and Coelestius.

Commenting on this exchange of letters Augustine declared: "The reports of two councils concerning this case [Pelagianism] were sent to the Apostolic See. From there replies have come; the case is closed" (Serm. 131). This was later popularized as "Rome has spoken, the case is closed." Pelagius at once forwarded a profession of faith, Libellus fidei, to Rome, and Coelestius went there in person to vindicate himself.

Roman Phase. When Innocent died on March 12, 417, the matter was brought to the attention of ZOSIMUS, his successor.

Pope Zosimus. The new Pope was satisfied with the orthodoxy of Pelagius after reading his profession of faith and restored him to unity with the Church. He was also lenient with Coelestius, but warned him not to teach in public. Through his correspondence with the hierarchy of Africa, however, he became aware of the real danger of the doctrines that Pelagius and Coelestius had concealed by their ambiguous language. He was also disillusioned by the disobedience of Coelestius, who challenged his opponents to debates that often ended in riots. With the Pontiff's approval, therefore, the Emperor HONORIUS expelled the Pelagian leaders from Rome on April 30, 418.

The following day, 214 African bishops assembled for the Sixteenth Council of Carthage. They condemned nine specific errors of Pelagius on original sin and its transmission (c. 1–3), the nature and necessity of grace (c. 4–6), and human impeccability (c. 7–9). In the summer of this year Zosimus issued the so-called Epistola tractoria in which he gave a brief history of Pelagianism, pointed out its falsehoods, ratified the acts of the Council of Carthage, and renewed his predecessor's excommunication of Pelagius and Coelestius. All the bishops of the Church were ordered to sign this letter.

A council at Antioch summoned by the Patriarch Theodotus accepted the letter of the Pope and Pelagius was expelled from Palestine; he disappeared from history leaving only conjectures about his subsequent fate. Coelestius refused to accept the verdict of the Holy See, escaping punishment because of his protectors.

Julian of Eclanum. The leader of the Pelagians after 418 was JULIAN, Bishop of Eclanum. He and 17 other bishops of Italy would not sign the epistola tractoria and demanded that a general council should be summoned to reopen the case. All were excommunicated, deposed, and exiled, and Julian began a literary war with Augustine in defense of the condemned heresy. He was more radical than Pelagius or Coelestius and was quoted as saying: "The freedom of the will is that by which man is freed from God" (Contra Iulianum, opus imperfectum, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1878–90] 45:1102), but his principal argument is that original sin, as approved at Carthage and Rome, was a revival of MANICHAISM.

Augustine refuted Julian in four major works: De nuptiis et concupiscentia (419–420), Contra duas epistolas Pelagianorum (420), Contra Iulianum (421), and his final work, begun in 429 and not finished at the time of his death (430), Contra Iulianum opus imperfectum.

SEMI-PELAGIANISM

In his last years Augustine had to refute the teachings of the monastic leaders, such as John CASSIAN, who repudiated Pelagianism but taught that man was capable of making an initial act of faith without the aid of divine grace. They also objected to Augustine's theory of predestination

Against these Semi-Pelagians (see SEMI-PELAGIANISM), as they were later called, Augustine wrote De gratia et libero arbitrio and De correptione et gratia in 427, and De predestinatione sanctorum and De dono per- severantiae in 428 or 429. Despite the cogency of his arguments, the struggle against Semi-Pelagianism did not end until the Second Council of Orange (529).

Some of the bishops who had resisted the order of Pope Zosimus eventually made their submission. The rest were forced into exile in the East where they were befriended by THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA. In 428 or 429 Julian of Eclanum and three other bishops arrived in Constantinople, where they met Coelestius and were received by NESTORIUS who had just become bishop there (April 428).

The Council of Ephesus. In 431 the general council, which Julian had demanded in 418, met at EPHESUS. It condemned not only Nestorianism, but Pelagianism as well (c. 1 and 4), and in the synodal letter of July 22 the bishops ratified the deposition of the “impious Pelagians.” This council gave the deathblow to Pelagianism, for East and West were now united against it, and it ceased to exist as an organized movement.

Later History. There is no further mention of Coelestius after 431, and Julian, disgraced and discredited, died c. 455. Some traces of the heresy persisted, however, as is clear from a letter of Pope GELASIUS I to the bishops of Picenum on Nov. 1, 493. Either before or during his pontificate, Gelasius also wrote the Dicta adversus pelagianam haeresim. No papal pronouncements against Pelagianism were necessary in the sixth century.

The Pelagian heresy led Catholic theologians to make a profound study of original sin and the Redemption of Christ, but its principal result was a vindication of the supernatural character of Christianity, and the unqualified assertion that grace is a gratuitous and undeserved gift of God. The Church of Africa was the uncompromising foe of Pelagianism from the beginning, and its most illustrious member, Augustine, has been called “the Doctor of Grace” because his teachings on this dogma have been adopted in great part by the Catholic Church.

Bibliography: R. HEDDE and É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903—50) 12.1:675–715. AUGUSTINE, Gest. Pelag., ed. C. F. URBA and J. ZYCHA (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum [Vienna 1866–] 42; 1902); C. Pelag., ed. C. F. URBA, and J. ZYCHA (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 60; 1913). PELAGIUS, Expositions of the Thirteen Epistles of St. Paul, ed. A. SOUTER, 3 v. (Texts and Studies 9.1–9.3; Cambridge, Eng. 1922–31). C. CASPARI, Briefe, Abhandlungen, Predigten (Oslo 1890). G. DE PLINVAL, Pelage: Ses écrits, sa vie et sa réforme (Lausanne 1943). J. FERGUSON, Pelagius: A Historical and Theological Study (Cambridge, Eng. 1956). J. TIXERONT, A Handbook of Patrology (St. Louis 1930). E. PORTALIÉ, A Guide to the Thought of St. Augustine (Chicago 1960). T. DE BRUYN, Pelagius's Commentary on St Paul's Epistle to the Romans: Translated with Introduction and Notes (Oxford; New York 1993). B.R. REES, Pelagius: Life and Letters (Rochester, N.Y. 1998); Pelagius, a Reluctant Heretic (Woodbridge 1988). J. FERGUSON, Pelagius: A Historical and Theological Study (New York 1978). R. F. EVANS, Four Letters of Pelagius (New York 1968); Pelagius; Inquiries and Reappraisals (New York 1968). C. C. BURNETT, God's Self-revelation in the Theology of Pelagius (diss.; Catholic University of America 1998).

[S. J. MCKENNA]

PELCZAR, JÓZEF SEBASTIAN, BL.

Bishop, founder of the Servants of the Most Sacred Heart of Jesus; b. Jan. 17, 1842, Korczyn, Poland; d. March 28, 1924, Przemyśl, Poland. Józef Pelczar founded the Servants of the Most Sacred Heart of Jesus (1894), which came to the United States in 1959. He was consecrated titular bishop of Meletopolis (Feb. 20, 1899) prior to assuming the see of Przemyśl, Poland (Jan. 13, 1901), which he guided through the horrors of World War I. He is remembered for his selfless heroism following the invasion of Russia (March 1915), as well as for opening medical centers to care for the wounded and victims of epidemics. At Pelczar's beatification in Rzeszów, Poland, June 2, 1991, Pope John Paul II remembered the bishop as “the man who did the will of the Father.”

Bibliography: L'Osservatore Romano, 23 (1991).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

PELICAN

In the Christian tradition, the pelican is identified as a symbol of Christ the Redeemer. The long beak of the white pelican is furnished with a sack which serves as a container for the small fish that it feeds its young. In the process of feeding them, the bird presses the sack against its neck in such a way that it seems to open its breast with its bill. The reddish tinge of its breast plumage and the redness of the tip of its beak fostered the folkloristic notion that it actually drew blood from its own breast. The Physiologus found the action of the pelican, so interpreted, as a particularly apt symbol of Christ the Redeemer:

The little pelicans strike their parents, and the parents, striking back, kill them. But on the third day the mother pelican strikes and opens her side and pours blood over her dead young. In this way they are revived and made well. So our Lord Jesus Christ says also through the prophet Isaiah: “I have brought up children and exalted them, but they have despised me” (Is 1:2). We struck God by serving the creature rather than the Creator. Therefore he deigned to ascend the cross, and, when his side was pierced, blood and water gushed forth unto our salvation and eternal life.

Under the influence primarily of the Physiologus, the pelican as a symbol of Christ the Redeemer, a symbol already familiar to St. Augustine (Enarr. In Psalm. 101:7), has a wide usage in Christian literature. As important and typical examples of medieval use, it will suffice to mention the allusion in the hymn Adoro te devote and that in Dante's Paradiso (25:113). In Christian art it is employed from the late Middle Ages, but especially in the Renaissance and in the baroque period. From the late Middle Ages the pelican is employed also as a symbol of the Eucharist. In art, particularly in baroque art, the pelican is found frequently as an ornament on altars, pyxes, chalices, and tabernacle doors.

St. Maria Euphrasia Pelletier.

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE/EDS.]

PELLETIER, MARIA EUPHRASIA, ST.

Foundress; B. Noirmoutier (Vendée), France, July 31, 1796; d. Angers, France, April 24, 1868. Rose Virginie Pelletier was sent for schooling to Tours where she joined (1814) the Religious of Our Lady of Charity of the Refuge and took the name Maria of St. Euphrasia. In 1825 she became superior of this autonomous community engaged in caring for women in need of moral reform. The house, which had been struggling to reestablish itself after suppression during the FRENCH REVOLUTION, flourished under her capable leadership.

In 1829 Mother Euphrasia established a house in Angers and became its superior in 1831. She received papal approval (1835) to centralize the administration of several independent convents under one superior general. The Sisters of Our Lady of Charity of the GOOD SHEPHERD, as they came to be known, grew rapidly. During the lifetime of the foundress, who acted as superior general, 110 foundations were started, including several in the U.S. For penitent women, Mother Euphrasia founded the Sisters Magdalens as a cloistered group of religious women dedicated to reparation. In 1950 they became affiliated as a branch of the Good Shepherd Sisters, and in 1964 they were renamed Contemplatives of the Cross. Mother Euphrasia was beatified on April 30, 1933 and canonized on May 2, 1940.

Feast: April 24.

Bibliography: Conferences and Instructions (Westminster, Md. 1943). SISTERS OF THE GOOD SHEPHERD, In Truth, I Am Their Foundress (SME): Selections from and concerning St. M. Euphrasia Pelletier Compiled from Our Contemplative Communities (s.l. 1978). Lettres, 8 v. (Angers 1995–1996). G. BERNOVILLE, Saint Mary Euphrasia Pelletier: Foundress of the Good Shepherd Sisters (Westminster, Md. 1959). J. T. MCVEIGH, Rose Virginie Pelletier: The Woman and Her Legacy (Lanham 1997).

[M. ANDREOLI]

PELLICANUS, KONRAD (KÜRSCHNER)

Pioneer Christian Hebraist; b. Ruffach, Alsace, January 1478; d. Zurich, April 6, 1556. He entered the Franciscan monastery in Ruffach (1493) and was later transferred to their monastery in Tübingen for his theological studies (1496). After his ordination (1501) he taught Scripture in the Franciscan monasteries of Basel (1502–07) and Ruffach (1508–11) and was then made local superior in Pforzheim, Ruffach, and Basel. While in Basel (1519–26), he became acquainted with the writings of M. LUTHER. When he was deposed from his office as superior because of his Protestant tendencies, he accepted the professorship of Scripture at the University of Basel (1523). In February 1526, when he accepted U. ZWINGLI's invitation to teach Scripture in Zurich, he definitively left the Catholic Church in favor of the Reformation.

Having taken a special interest, even as a seminarian, in the study of Hebrew, Pellicanus was the first Christian to publish a Hebrew grammar [De modo legendi et intelligendi Hebraeum (Strassburg 1504)]. He was highly regarded as the outstanding Hebraist of his day; thus he had a great influence on contemporary Scripture scholars and was an important collaborator on the German translations of the Bible made at Zurich. Besides other works, he wrote also the Commentaria Bibliorum (7 v. Zurich 1532–37) and in 1544 an autobiography [Chronicon, ed. B. Riggenbach (Basel 1877)] that is important for the study of the history of the Reformation.

Bibliography: O. VASELLA, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:254–255. H. R. GUGGISBERG, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 5:208.

[L. F. HARTMAN]

PEMBROKE, PRIORY OF

Also known as Monkton, former Benedictine monastery in Pembroke, Saint Davids diocese, Wales. It was founded in 1098 as a cell to St. Martin's Abbey, Sééz, Normandy, by Arnulf Montgomery, Lord of Pembroke, and was further endowed by later earls of Pembroke. Richard II, because of the French war, seized it into his hands (1378). Henry IV restored it (1399), but it was evidently again seized, since Henry VI granted it (1441) to Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, who in turn granted it to the Abbey of SAINT ALBANS (1443). Under Saint Albans, Pembroke had a prior and probably three or four monks. Henry VIII dissolved it (1539). Dugdale describes the priory church, prior's mansion, dove house, and two chapels. The church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, and mother of two other Pembroke churches, continues in (Anglican) ecclesiastical use.

Bibliography: W. DUGDALE, Monasticon Anglicanum (London 1655–73); best ed. by J. CALEY et al., 6 v. (1817–30) 2:243–244; 4:320–323; 6.2:999. Calendar of Documents Preserved in France, ed. J. H. ROUND (London 1899–) v. 1. J. E. LLOYD, A History of Wales from the Earliest Times to the Edwardian Conquest, 2 v. (3d ed. New York 1939) v. 2. D. KNOWLES and R. N. HADCOCK, Medieval Religious Houses: England and Wales (New York 1953).

[R. W. HAYS]

PEÑA MONTENEGRO, ALONSO DE LA

Bishop of Quito; b. Villa de Padrón, Spain, April 29, 1596; d. Quito, May 12, 1687. In 1611 he entered the University of Santiago de Compostela, where he received the degrees of bachelor and licentiate in arts and philosophy. He continued his studies into theology, earning the doctorate in 1621. Two years later he won the position of teaching canon at the Colegiata de Iria and at the same time held a professorship at the University of Compostela. He had acquired these high ecclesiastical positions without becoming a priest, but in February of 1639, he was ordained and went to Salamanca to compete for a fellowship in the old Colegio de San Bartolomé. There he became a friend of Gaspar Bracamonte y Guzmán, later president of the Council of the Indies. In January of 1653 Peña Montenegro was appointed bishop of Quito and set out for the diocese with a large library and a retinue of 18 servants. He was consecrated in Bogotá by Abp. Cristóbal de Torres in April 1654, and took over his diocese September 23. After making his pastoral visitation, he wrote Itinerario para párrocos de Indias to instruct his clergy in parochial administration. He fostered vocations to the priesthood, restored the cathedral, founded the Carmelite monastery of Talacunga, helped in the establishment of the Dominican Colegio de San Fernando, served as interim president of the Audiencia, and promoted culture generally in the area.

[J. M. VARGAS]

PEÑALVER Y CÁRDENAS, LUIS IGNACIO

Bishop; b. Havana, Cuba, April 13, 1749; d. Havana, July 17, 1810. He studied in Havana at St. Ignatius College until 1768, when a decree of King Charles III of Spain closed this and other Jesuit institutions. He moved to the University of Havana and earned a doctorate in theology (1781). After Peñalver's ordination in 1772, Bp. Santiago José de Echevarría Felguezua placed him in charge of contributions and legacies made to the Diocese of Santiago de Cuba. In 1773 Peñalver became vicar-general and ecclesiastical judge. He also held the post of administrator of the diocese for two years. He assisted in founding a public library; organized an asylum for the poor, the Casa de Beneficencia; and inaugurated a program to promote better relations between the upper classes and the common people of Cuba. He spent much of his fortune in relief work for victims of a hurricane that swept Cuba in 1792.

When Pius VI created the Diocese of Louisiana and the Floridas in 1793, he appointed Peñalver the first bishop. He arrived in New Orleans July 17, 1795, and found the religious life of the people at a very low ebb. There were approximately 11,000 Catholics in New Orleans and its environs, but hardly more than a fourth of them ever attended Mass. Accompanied by his secretary, Rev. Ysidro Quintero, and the pastor of St. Louis Cathedral, Rev. Antonio de Sedella, Peñalver made a visitation (1796) of the 14 parishes and, in lieu of a synod, which he did not consider feasible, he issued detailed letters of instructions. These had the force of synodal regulations and helped stem some deeply rooted abuses. After six years, he could claim only qualified success for his efforts in Louisiana. On Nov. 3, 1801, he departed for Guatemala City, Guatemala, to whose archbishopric he had been promoted. After five years there, he retired to Havana.

[H. C. BEZOU]

PENANCE, PRACTICES OF

Concrete expressions of the penitential spirit involving either ascetical deeds or the sacrifice of legitimate pleasure for a spiritual purpose have been characteristic of the Christian Church since its foundation. The source of the penitential ideal is the life of Jesus Christ. For example, He praised the ideal of virginity, which renounces the great good of marital love, the better to love God, and the bestowal of one's earthly goods on the poor, the more easily to seek heavenly goods (cf. Mt 19.12, 16–22). And He emphasized His teaching by embracing these penitential practices in His own life.

The teaching and practice of Jesus were continued by His disciples. St. Paul noted that freedom from marriage gives a virgin opportunity to think about the things of the Lord, that she might be holy in body and spirit (1 Cor 7.25–35). St. John spoke of a special closeness to Christ that is a prerogative of the virgins in the Kingdom of Heaven (Rev 14.1–5). The faithful at Jerusalem gave up the ownership of their goods for the support of the community (Acts 2.44; 4.32); St. Paul presented his self-inflicted chastisement as an example for all Christians (1 Cor 9.27); the four daughters of Philip the Deacon dedicated themselves to a life of virginity (Acts 21.9); it was recorded of St. James the Less by Hegesippus, who lived in mid-second century, that James denied himself meat and wine and the use of razor and bath.

The Fathers of the Church praised such works of penance and reflected its practice in their own times. It is clear that the motives behind the various penitential practices were uniform: principally, a desire to answer the Lord's invitation to imitate Him in carrying a cross (Lk 9.23); reparation for sin, personal or otherwise (see REPARATION); and the mastery of all their human inclinations (1 Cor 9.27).

During the first centuries the penitential ideal was expressed in the lives of the chosen few, the virgins and ascetics, but also in the program of fasting that came into use throughout the Church, with varying local observances. There are signs that, very early, Friday was kept as a day of fast, in memory of the Lord's suffering and death on that day. In pre-Nicene times there was a period devoted to pre-Paschal fast, roughly parallel to present-day Lent, with local variances in length and rigor. In some places it lasted only a few days, with one meal taken late in the day; in other places it was longer but less rigorous. The sackcloth (see HAIR SHIRT) spoken of by Christ (Mt 11.21) was always the garb of the penitent. In both East and West there were grades among these penitents, depending on the severity of their penances: for example, the "weepers," who accompanied their pleas for prayers with tears, and the "prostrati," who begged prayers while lying on the ground. Kneeling during religious services began as a penitential practice and at one time was not permitted on feast days. Manual labor, once the badge of slavery, was given a penitential aspect by the monks of the desert and later was adopted by religious rules. The monasteries, in due course, became schools of penance each with its own penitential pattern.

The detail of penitential practice differs in intensity from one culture to another; in extreme times there were many extremes, but they were generally short-lived. The rigors of the Egyptian hermits and the Irish monks, for example, passed quickly, but the reality of penance remains. Every age, even the present one, witnesses the attraction of the Christian to follow the Master by taking up a cross of some kind.

Bibliography: M. VILLER and M. OLPHE-GAILLARD, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932–) 1:959–977. J. DE GUIBERT, ibid. 1:977–990. S. SOLERO, A. MERCARTI, and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico, 3 v. (Turin 1954–58) 3:143. L. GOUGAUD, Devotional and Ascetic Practices in the Middle Ages, tr. G. C. BATEMAN (London 1927). H. THURSTON, Lent and Holy Week (London 1904).

[P. F. MULHERN/EDS.]

PENANCE, SACRAMENT OF

The sacrament of penance is the sacrament through which Christians "obtain pardon from the mercy of God for offenses committed against him, and are, at the same time, reconciled with the Church which they have wounded by their sins and which by charity, by example, and by prayer labors for their conversion" (LG 11). Conversion (metanoia) and reconciliation were central to the mission of Jesus and remain the foundation of disciples' life in Christ. Those preparing for baptism and Eucharist learn to be part of a converting and reconciling community. Those already baptized who sin return to the path of conversion and to Eucharist in this second sacrament of conversion. Though the understanding and practice of the sacrament have changed over the centuries, the essential elements (substantia) have remained constant: calling sinners to conversion and supporting those who respond ("binding"); reconciling the repentant who have undergone conversion ("loosing").

Terminology. The earliest name for this sacrament was paenitentia secunda, from the Latin translation of the

Emperor Henry IV begging Matilda, Countess of Tuscany, before Hugo Abbot of Cluny at her castle, Canossa, Italy, manuscript illumination. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

Pilgrims at a public square at Fatima do penance by walking around a designated path on their knees, Portugal. (©Tony Arruza/CORBIS)

Greek metanoia (conversion, repentance): baptism was the first conversion and penance the second. In the early Middle Ages “confession” became the usual term because of its ritual prominence and this usage has continued into our time. The twentieth century saw the return of “penance” to common use, and Vatican Council II and its new ritual stressed reconciliation. Theologically, this is a sacrament of both conversion (penance) and reconciliation, with the two mutually required: conversion leads to reconciliation with God and Church, and reconciliation requires conversion.

Origins. The sacrament is broadly based in the ministry of Jesus who preached repentance and conversion to the reign of God. Forgiveness of sins was prominent in his ministry (Mk 2:3–12), and the early Church believed it was authorized to continue his ministry (Mt 16:19, 18:18; Jn 20:22–23). Baptism was the most striking expression of this authority, but sinners in the community also had to be dealt with. The ministry of binding and loosing included both the authority to exclude serious sinners from the community and its Eucharist and the authority to restore to the community of salvation those who underwent conversion (1 Cor 5:5; 2 Cor 2:11). Some communities were reluctant to forgive certain sinners (1 Jn 5:14–17; Heb 6:4–8; 10:26–31; 12:16–17), but generally conversion was the only prerequisite to welcoming them back.

Ancient Penance. The Shepherd of Hermas (c. 140) contains the earliest evidence of a second penance entrusted by Christ to the Shepherd. It was limited, like baptism, to once only but was open to all sinners. Other early authors—Clement of Rome (d. c. 96), Ignatius of Antioch (d. c. 110), Polycarp (d. c. 156), and 2 Clement (c. 150)—witness to this sense of clemency but say little about procedures. As pastor, the bishop was responsible for this ministry.

Everyday sinners repented and generally found support and reconciliation in the Eucharist. Practice varied on which sins required ecclesial ministry. The practice of penance took several forms, including fasting, almsgiving, wearing sackcloth and ashes, prayer and works of charity. Tertullian’s description of exomologesis (confession, in the sense of celebrating God’s greatness) in the De Paenitentia gives us some detail on the making of penitents in a liturgy confessing God’s mercy. Sackcloth symbolizing the goats separated from Christ’s flock, ashes symbolizing exclusion from the paradise of the Church, penitential practices (kneeling, prayer, fasting, works of charity), and community prayer for penitents were major ritual actions marking a person’s entrance into the communal process of conversion called the order of penitents.

Cyprian of Carthage (d. 258), in the mid-third century, speaks of the laying on of hands in exorcism at the entry into penance and again at its completion, this time granting peace with the Church through communion with the Holy Spirit. These show how he understood the operational dynamics of conversion and reconciliation and also the liturgical orientation of the penitential works that characterized the time of penance: they expressed in practice the repentance manifested to the Church in becoming a penitent; at the same time they, together with the community’s prayer and example, moved that repentance toward maturity.

Controversy over how to maintain the Church’s holiness and opposition to reconciling some sinners helped shape Western development. The East, largely unaffected by this rigorism, kept more of a gospel leniency that gave priority to healing the community by healing sinners.

The elitist ecclesiology of third-century Montanists and Novatianists challenged the bishop’s authority to forgive certain sins; e.g., Tertullian in De paenitentia held out hope of pardon to all sinners through exomologesis (liturgical conversion) but as a Montanist in De pudicitia denied the bishop’s power to forgive those guilty of certain unpardonable sins. Such puritans, as they were termed at Nicaea, called the guilty to conversion but refused reconciliation. Cyprian of Carthage went against this when he authorized penance and reconciliation for the dying and, expecting another persecution, for all sinners, even those who had earlier apostacized. Rome followed a similar policy.

Nicaea upheld the Church's authority over all sinners, calling for the Eucharist to be given to the dying, even those who could not enter penance. This exceptional adaptation of procedures suggests that forgiveness was understood as due to divine mercy, not the penitent's efforts. Pacian (d. before 392) and Ambrose (d. 397) both upheld the Church's full authority as expression of divine mercy.

Communal disciplinary and liturgical structures developed to highlight the Church's authority over sin. Those who had begun to repent spoke privately with the bishop or his delegate. They entered the order of penitents in a public liturgical rite. The order of penitents provided community ministry parallel to the catechumenate. Fasting, prayer, and works of charity symbolized turning from self-centeredness to God and neighbor. The process of conversion often took years and frequently required celibacy and withdrawal from public life.

We know little of the liturgy reconciling penitents until after the resolution of the PENITENTIAL CONTROVERSIES and the emergence of canonical penance. The liturgy then became increasingly dramatic, perhaps to compensate for an abbreviated and less committed conversion, but certainly to highlight the Church's authority to reconcile all repentant sinners. In the fifth century the ritual of reconciliation took place after the dismissal of catechumens, at the time when penitents normally "came under the hand" to receive the community's exorcism-blessing and prayer. Penitents expressed their sorrow, their prayer became the community's, the bishop was asked to reconcile them, he prayed to voice the penitent's prayer now become the prayer of the Church, and he imposed hands to show that the penitents were freed from sin and restored to the Eucharist.

Penitents reached the completion (absolutio) of their conversion in a public liturgy just before Easter. Ritual dynamics expressed that both conversion and forgiveness were in and through penitents' relationship to the community of salvation: they were reconciled to God by being reconciled to the Church. However, the refusal to allow more than one such reconciliation (a parallel with baptism) signaled a failure to reflect in practice the doctrine of the Church's full authority.

Canonical regulation of the order of penitents in the fourth and fifth centuries also failed to take adequate account of the changing socio-cultural situation of the Church where sin was no longer the experience of a return to pagan ways. Coercive penalties were often inconsistent from one region to another; their severity discouraged many people from undertaking the ecclesial conversion that was increasingly experienced as punitive. Not surprisingly, there was a rise in deathbed penance, as many sought to avoid or mitigate the harshness of doing penance and the public stigma of being branded a public penitent. Voluntarily joining the ranks of the conversi was much like religious profession for the pious—Francis later founded three orders of penance—but those forced to undergo the canonical discipline were often penalized for life.

A priest listens to a woman's confession in an open confessional, Puerto Rico. (©Corbis)

The demise of the catechumenate meant that the developing season of Lent took on a penitential rather than baptismal spirit. In the fifth and sixth centuries others began to join the penitents and by the tenth century all were expected to. Lent thus became a communal form of penance.

In many places, particularly the East and Gaul, repentant sinners undertook conversion on their own or with the assistance of a spiritual advisor but without the official and liturgical support of the Church. The East, however, provided prayers for forgiveness in the Hours and Liturgy that maintained a communal orientation to penance.

Medieval Penance. Doing penance privately without official ecclesial and liturgical support increased in the early Middle Ages. In the West Celtic monks extended to the laity the ministry of soul-friend. Spiritual advisors, usually nonordained monks or nuns, gave counsel on how best to compensate for sin (a perspective of Anglo-Saxon and Celtic culture also evident in Anselm's theory of redemption). Advisors adapted the Celtic penal system with tariff and commutation in evaluating the penance that needed to be carried out for sin. This took the form of penitentials, lists of sins and appropriate remedies or penalties which generally functioned as tariffs imposed on sins.

The depth of the penitent's contrition was, however, taken into account. Unlike canonical penance, there was no public stigma, penalties were often mitigated by commutations and redemptions (later, indulgences), and, most importantly, penance could be done repeatedly for any sin at any time to reassure the anxious. All that was needed was contrition (sincere repentance), detailed confession, and the performance of assigned penances.

"Confession" grew in importance. This was no longer the praise of a merciful God calling the sinner to conversion (exomologesis) but the detailed admission of sinfulness to the advisor for the purpose of receiving an appropriate "penance." After this was done, the individual could return to eucharistic communion. If what was later called "absolution" existed—and this is doubtful—it was given by lay as well as ordained advisors who heard confession.

After unsuccessful efforts to revive canonical penance during the ninth-century Carolingian reformation, the official structures were adapted in a fashion that accepted private confession and penance for grave sins not publicly known. With the growing popularity of the Celtic practice of confession, a private liturgy of penance began to develop. At first this was simply confession (in the sense of admitting one's sins to receive the benefit of the confessor's advice and assignment of penance), but in the tenth century reconciliation (absolution) was added immediately after the confession. The private ritual contained many elements from the canonical liturgy but lost the public, communal process that liturgy engendered and the consequent sense of identity for both community and penitents. Priests were to serve as confessors and, after penance, to give an official declaration of completion, the absolution, as an exercise of the power of the keys. The penitent's active participation was largely limited to responding to the priest's questions regarding sin, listening to the Latin prayers, affirming faith and confidence in response to the priest's questions, and receiving the declaration of forgiveness (absolution). Confession and absolution were the ritual foci. It was the failure of penitents to return for absolution after doing their penance led to absolution being joined to confession in the tenth century.

Medieval theologians debated how penance fit into the new category of sacrament and how the penitent's acts (contrition, confession, and satisfaction as phases of personal conversion) and the priest's absolution related to one another in effecting forgiveness. These debates developed out of the private individual experience of repentance and the lack of a clear sense of reconciliation to the Church that had been expressed in the ancient liturgy.

Influenced by the spirit of Celtic culture that had shaped private penance, some theologians emphasized the penitent's efforts to make satisfaction. However, the displacement of confession-penance by confession-absolution meant that penance (satisfaction) diminished in importance and became more lenient. This led many twelfth-century theologians to emphasize contrition, interior penance or repentance manifested in confession, as the source of pardon (e.g., Abelard). Others (e.g., the Victorines) emphasized the power of the keys removing guilt. Bonaventure saw confession and absolution disposing a person to contrition, with that the cause of forgiveness, and there were other attempts at synthesis.

Aquinas achieved a balance between the personal and ecclesiastical factors by regarding the penitent's acts as the matter of the sacrament and the priest's absolution as the form. The two act as a single cause, with the penitent's acts sacramental signs and the absolution dominant. Grace is the formal, efficient, and final cause of both contrition and forgiveness; contrition and forgiveness are the material cause of grace and dispose the person to receive it; absolution serves as the instrumental cause. Attrition (incipient contrition) is the remote disposition for grace. In the sacramental ritual attrition matures into contrition and becomes the proximate disposition for grace. There is thus a single means of postbaptismal justification, in the sacrament or outside it: contrition as the expression of faith and love in response to grace.

Later scholastics exploited ambiguities in Thomas' explanation to relate the subjective and objective elements in a more extrinsic manner. Duns Scotus distinguished sharply between attrition and contrition (on the basis of motive, whether self-love or the love of God above all things) and gave prominence to the absolution by seeing only attrition as needed in the sacrament but "perfect" contrition required outside it.

In addition to private confession, the Middle Ages made use of other forms of penance: solemn penance (the rarely used remnant of ancient canonical penance's liturgy), the Lenten season, pilgrimage, and general (public) absolutions in the liturgy. Lay confession continued to be used into the fourteenth century, especially when a priest was not available, and was often considered sacramental or quasi-sacramental, although Scotus' view of absolution as the essence of the sacrament eventually led to it not being regarded as sacramental.

Modern Penance. Lateran IV (1215) began the transition from medieval to modern penance by requiring each Christian of the age of reason to make an annual confession to his or her priest for the sake of receiving absolution. Confessors were encouraged to interrogate penitents, a sign that penitents' understanding of sin and penance was shallow. Yet, in the face of Albigensianism, confession became a sign of loyalty to the Church and the obligatory means of forgiveness. Most lay people, submitted reluctantly to the priest's judgment. Most commentators saw this compulsory confession as binding only those conscious of mortal sin, a view given tacit approval by TRENT and incorporated into the 1983 Code of Canon Law.

The official requirement of confession and absolution began a shift from medieval understanding and practice. Confession became the ordinary means to gain forgiveness of serious postbaptismal sin. For some this was onerous discipline; for others, consoling grace.

LUTHER's understanding of justification by grace through faith led him to regard penance as the gospel promise of grace encouraging the sinner to confident trust in divine forgiveness. He criticized requiring integral (full) confession of all mortal sins. By limiting the power of the keys to proclaiming the gospel of forgiveness he rejected priestly absolution as a juridical act.

Trent's response (Session 14, 1551) was to insist on penance's institution by Christ for the forgiveness of postbaptismal sin. It solemnly reaffirmed integral confession of mortal sins to the priest and his absolution as a judgment reconciling the sinner with God. Both were declared to be iure divino, but at the time the term's meaning varied from a custom in line with the divine will to something essential by God's will.

The importance of the penitent's confession and the priest's absolution grew in response to Reformation criticism. The 1614 Rituale Romanum removed or diminished liturgical elements, including prayer, to show the centrality of integral confession and juridical absolution. As a consequence, few penitents experienced confession as ecclesial worship.

The Counter-Reformation continued the medieval association of confession and communion, and as communion became more frequent, so did confession. The introduction of the confessional, intended to prevent accusations of sollicitation, strengthened the sense of privacy and isolation. When Pius X's Quam singulari (1910) lowered the age of first communion, penance, rather than confirmation, became the ritual transition between baptism and Eucharist, and the age of this first confession became a matter of controversy following Vatican Council II. Throughout the era of the Counter-Reformation, highlighting confession as a sign of Catholic loyalty made its ritual performance the only ordinary means of postbaptismal justification. Devotional confession (the confession of venial sins or of already-forgiven mortal sins) became a common practice.

Vatican Council II. The ancient theme of experiencing reconciliation with God through reconciliation with the Church in the context of community worship (Xiberta, K. Rahner) was restored to prominence as a result of nineteenth- and twentieth-century historical study. Theologians consequently shifted focus from contrition (interior penance) to reconciliation with the Church in speaking of how God's action enters sacramentally within human experience (the res et sacramentum, to use the scholastic term).

Vatican Council II emphasized conversion as both personal and ecclesial and called for a reform to express the sacrament's social and ecclesial character (Sacrosanctum concilium 72). It stressed that the penitent sinner is reconciled at the same time with God and Church (Lumen gentium 11; Presbyterorum ordinis 5). Theological consensus on the priority of reconciliation with the Church was matched pastorally by grassroots development of communal celebrations of the sacrament.

The 1973 Rite of Penance provides three sacramental forms (for reconciling an individual, for reconciling several penitents with individual confession and absolution, for reconciling several penitents with general confession and absolution) and nonsacramental penitential celebrations to support conversion. The Introduction reflects theological consensus of the mid-twentieth century. Conversion to God is a personal process in community and the traditional acts of the penitent are restated in this context. Reconciliation is fundamental to the Church's character and responsibility, with bishops and priests exercising the ministry of this sacrament. Reconciliation with the Church is sacrament of reconciliation with God. For the first time in an official ritual social dimensions of sin and reconciliation and the sacrament's orientation to justice are noted.

Rite I, i.e., the rite for reconciling an individual penitent has also been enhanced liturgically with prayer, scripture, and fuller participation. It too is described as the liturgy by which the Church renews itself (RP 11). A pleasant room rather than a dark booth is the appropriate place for this liturgy, although penitents may choose to use a grille to maintain anonymity. Overall, practice has changed little, and focus is still more on confession and absolution than shared prayer.

Rite II situates individual confession and absolution in a new, communal context. Individual confession and absolution follow an initial communal celebration (including a Liturgy of the Word with homily and examination of conscience), ending with a proclamation of praise and prayer of thanksgiving. The difficulty of finding enough confessors to celebrate Rite II properly often means a truncated celebration still focusing on individual confession and absolution and eliminating communal praise and thanksgiving. However, when carried out in full, the communal context of Rite II is able to aid in the formation of one's conscience and a deepened sense of sin, conversion, and reconciliation that is both personal and communal.

Rite III provides a fully communal celebration for reconciling the repentant. The communal celebrations consist of introductory rites (song and prayer), celebration of the Word (including homily and examination of conscience), the rite of reconciliation, and a concluding rite. The rite of reconciliation begins with a general or communal confession, including the Lord's Prayer. Provision is made for a general or communal absolution and a proclamation of praise. The use of Rite III is governed by the provisions of canon 961 of the 1983 Code of Canon Law, which restricts its use to the following situations: (i) where danger of death is imminent and there is insufficient time for the hearing of individual confessions (c. 961 §1, 1), and (ii) there is grave necessity, i.e., when in view of the number of penitents, there are not enough confessors available for individual confessions within a suitable period of time in such a way that the penitents are forced to be deprived for a long while of sacramental grace or holy communion through no fault of their own (c. 961 §1, 2). The competent person to judge whether such conditions exist is the diocesan bishop (c. 961 §2).

The post-Tridentine increase in frequency of confession slowed and began to reverse in the second quarter of the twentieth century. A changed sense of sin, dissent from Church moral teaching (especially on artificial contraception), and the experience of reconciliation in other contexts (especially Eucharist, with more frequent communion) have been major factors in what amounts to a return to the medieval standard of frequency.

Bibliography: B. POSCHMAN, Penance and the Anointing of the Sick (London 1963). K. RAHNER, "Forgotten Truths Concerning the Sacrament of Penance," Theological Investigations 2 (1963) 135–174. K. DOOLEY, "From Penance to Confession: The Celtic Contribution," Bijdragen 43 (1982) 390–411. K. DOOLEY, "Development of the Practice of Devotional Confession," Quaestiones Liturgiques (1983) 89–117. J. DALLEN, The Reconciling Community

(Collegeville, MN 1986); J. FAVAZZA, The Order of Penitents (Collegeville, MN 1988); K. OSBORNE, Reconciliation and Justification (New York/Mahwah, NJ, 1990). INTERNATIONAL THEOLOGICAL COMMISSION, "Penance and Reconciliation" (1982); JOHN PAUL II, "On Reconciliation and Penance in the Mission of the Church Today" (1984).

[J. DALLEN]

PENITENTIAL CONTROVERSY

The problem regarding the practice of sacramental penance in the early Church. No unequivocal evidence exists for the formal method whereby sins were submitted to the priest and absolution given to the penitent during the first four centuries, although the practice of Penance and the forgiveness of sins is an essential fact of Christian belief from the beginning of the Church. During the second and third centuries, controversy broke out in various local churches as to whether formal absolution for sins committed after Baptism could be obtained more than once, and likewise regarding the possibility of the Church's granting pardon for certain grave sins—adultery, homicide, and idolatry—committed after Baptism. Finally, the readmittance to Communion in the Church of those who had committed acts of apostasy during persecution, particularly the LAPSI, or fallen, and the LIBELLATICI, or those who obtained certificates without sacrificing, was disputed. This difficulty also involved the intercessionary powers of the martyrs and confessors of the faith.

Postapostolic Documents. Although the DIDACHE and the so-called Second Epistle of CLEMENT I indicate that penance for the forgiveness of sins was a common Christian belief, neither of these documents specifies the technical machinery of effecting pardon other than through reconciliation with the leaders of the Church. In the Shepherd of HERMAS, there is evidence of a dispute regarding the number of times pardon can be extended to postbaptismal sinners, and the writer indicates the possibility of a time of pardon that has been variously interpreted by modern authors to mean a period of jubilee, although this season is identified with the building of a tower that represents the Church under an eschatological or chiliastic perspective. Hence the time of pardon could be coextensive with the perdurance of the Church. Hermas also spoke of one penance, μετάνοια μία (Mand. 4.1.8, 3.6); but this could mean one type rather than the usual significance of a single opportunity.

Tertullian and Cyprian. It is with TERTULLIAN (d. after 220) that the polemic concerning the possibility of only one absolution for postbaptismal sins comes clearly into focus (De pudicitia). He spoke of duabus plancis in the sense of Baptism and one other chance for safety given to those who relapsed into grave sins after the total forgiveness in Baptism (De paenit. 12.9). In his Montanist period (after 196), he likewise challenged a bishop, whom he ironically termed the supreme pontiff, for having declared that the irremissible sins of adultery, murder, and idolatry (De pud. 9.20; 21.14; 19.25; Adv. Marc. 4.9) can be forgiven by the Church. He termed these sins exitiosa and said their forgiveness is reserved to God (De pud. 19.6). The supreme pontiff to whom Tertullian referred was probably Agrippinus, Bishop of Carthage (218–22), and not the bishop of Rome. St. Cyprian of Carthage, half a century later, commented on Tertullian's opinion regarding unforgivable sins and said it did not represent the true teaching of the Church (Epistle 55); and Augustine in the 5th century also made reference to it as an error (De libro Act. Apost.; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 34:994).

Hippolytus and Novatian. Contemporary with Tertullian, however, a dispute had broken out in the Roman Church between Pope CALLISTUS (217–22) and the antipope, later reconciled martyr, HIPPOLYTUS. The latter in his Philosophumena (9.2) accused the Pope of laxity in his dealing leniently with Christians who had been guilty of grave sins. It is not certain whether there was an immediate connection between the Roman and Carthaginian disputes. However, both at Carthage and at Rome, during the Decian persecution (249–51), Pope CORNELIUS (251–53) and Cyprian were faced with the difficulty of dealing with the lapsi. Cyprian tried to curb the presumption of certain confessors who had suffered for the faith and were granting bills of pardon to the fallen without due penance and at the same time he had to assert the priestly power of forgiving sins even for apostates (De lapsis 16; Epist. 61.3). In Rome Novatian had dealt with the problem during the vacancy of the apostolic see before the election of Cornelius. In two letters to Cyprian (Epist. 30, 36), Novatian described the Roman doctrine of the possibility of forgiving sins of apostasy during persecution; but he cautioned that for the time being, this should be done only in case of imminent death. After the election of Cornelius (March 251), however, Novatian reversed his stand and claimed that apostates should be excommunicated forever. He went into schism (see NOVATIAN AND NOVATIANISM) when his position was rejected. He was condemned by a Roman synod of 60 bishops (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.43.2).

Origen and Clement. In the Oriental Church, Origen (De orat.) and Clement of Alexandria (Quis dives; Stromata 2.12.55; 7.16.102) testify to the Church's teaching that postbaptismal sins of all gravity are forgiven in the Church through the use of God's power, but insist upon the necessity of long and vigorous penance. The third-century document called the Didascalia Apostolorum condemns those who deny that God grants pardon for sins through reconciliation by the Church's bishops and priests.

In the 12th and 13th centuries, when this matter was disputed at length, it was generally agreed that there are three kinds of penance: solemn, public, and private. The first, for those guilty of capital sins that hurt the Church, required a special ceremony of absolution and could be given only once since it meant retirement from worldly affairs including cohabitation in marriage (Peter Lombard, Sent. 4.14.3); the second was the penance performed publicly by ecclesiastical acts of prayer, fasting, almsgiving; the third was that made cotidie coram sacerdote—daily before the priest (Alain de Lille, Lib. poenit.; Patrologia Latina 210:297).

See Also: PENANCE, SACRAMENT OF.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 12.1:749–1127. A. D'ALÈS, L'Édit de Calliste (Paris 1914). B. POSCHMANN, Paenitentia secunda: Die kirchliche Busse in ältesten Christentum bis Cyprian und Origenes (Bonn 1940). H. KOCH, Cyprianische Untersuchungen (Bonn 1926). P. BATIFFOL, Études d'histoire et de théologie positive: Première série. (7th ed. Paris 1926). P. GALTIER, L'Élise et la rémission des péchés (Paris 1932); Aux origines du sacrement de pénitence (Rome 1951). E. F. LATKO, Origen's Concept of Penance (Quebec 1949). K. RAHNER, Recherches de science religieuse 37 (1950) 47–97; 252–86, 422–56. Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 72 (1950) 257–81. J. T. MACNEILL, The Celtic Penitentials and Their Influence (Paris 1923). R. C. MORTIMER, The Origins of Private Penance in the Western Church (Oxford 1939).

[F. X. MURPHY/EDS]

PENITENTIAL PSALMS

A group of seven Psalms especially suitable for the use of penitents and considered, at least since the 6th century (e.g., by Cassiodorus), as forming a class by themselves. They are Psalms 6, 32, 38, 51, 102, 130, and 143. The number seven was interpreted allegorically by Cassiodorus to indicate seven means for obtaining forgiveness: baptism, martyrdom, alms, forgiving spirit, conversion of a sinner, love, and penance. By order of Innocent III they were to be prayed in Lent, and under Pius X they became part of the Friday ferial office of Lent. Although no longer officially mandated, they are still widely used in the liturgy, especially Psalm 130, the De Profundis (Out of the depths I cry to you, O Lord), and Psalm 51, the Misereere (Have mercy on me, O Lord). Although they are the classic Christian prayers of repentance for sin, they are not always directly concerned with this (particularly Psalms 6, 102, and 143). All of them, however, can be classified as laments (on this form, see PSALMS, BOOK OF).

"Hearing a confession," woodcut in an edition of "Eruditorum poenitentiale," printed at Paris by Antoine Caillaut, c. 1488–1490, Latin inscription above and below (Rosenwald Incu. X.E7).

Bibliography: E. HERTZSCH, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 1:153–39. B. FISCHER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 2:822–823.

[R. E. MURPHY/EDS.]

PENITENTIALS

Manuals for confessors, setting forth allotments of penance for specified sins. They originated in the Celtic Church (Wales?), became established in Ireland in the 6th century, and were introduced to the Franks and the Anglo-Saxons along with the Irish mission. Such manuals became necessary when private confession and penance, originally a monastic practice, began to replace the public confession and canonical penance of the early Church. This pastoral practice was inaugurated, it seems, by St. CAESARIUS OF ARLES; it was fully developed in Wales and Ireland by the middle of the 6th century. Its principal features were: (1) Penances were graded according to the status of the sinner as well as to the nature of the sin. (2) The penance was enjoined by a private confessor (normally a priest) of the penitent's choice. (3) Most penances were of limited duration, which made it possible to receive the Sacrament of Penance repeatedly. (4) Long penances were often performed in monasteries; i.e., the penitent temporarily joined a monastic community. (5) Long penances could be converted into more austere ones of shorter duration. (6) Ordinary penances consisted mainly in periods of fasting (often on bread and water) and the recitation of Psalms; alms could be substituted for fasting in case of sickness or for other reasons. Some commutations (arrea), however, were reminiscent of the more austere forms of Irish asceticism.

Welsh and Irish Penitentials. The private character of the "Celtic" penance and the absence of diocesan organization and episcopal jurisdiction in these countries explain why the penitentials were not decreed by synods but were the work of individuals, often of abbots of great monasteries. These authors fixed penances in accordance with Sacred Scripture, canonical and monastic tradition, and their own spiritual judgment; an element of secular law was the admission of wergeld. The penitentials had no other authority than their compilers' reputation for sanctity and holy wisdom.

The penitential ascribed to Gildas fixes penances for monks only. The penitentials of Vinnian (Finnian of Clonard, d. 549?) and of St. Columbanus (after 591?), who draws largely on Vinnian, have specific penances for clerics and laymen. Both penitentials are of rather loose composition. The most comprehensive of Irish penitentials, that of Cummean (probably Cummaine Fota, "the Long," d. 662) and the Old Irish penitential (of the Culdees of Tallaght near Dublin, 8th century), are based on Cassian's ogdoad of deadly sins. Both Vinnian and Cummean emphasize the remedial aspect of penance beside and above its vindictive aspect, that is the "healing" of the soul besides atonement for offending God. For example, Cummean (following Gildas) allows a long-term penitent to receive the Eucharist after 18 months "lest his soul perish utterly through lacking so long the celestial medicine." Much consideration is given to sinful thoughts and their expiation—another monastic element. The "medicine of souls" that the penitentials offered had doubtless a salutary influence also on social life: it curbed blood feuds and brawls, condemned sexual perversion and the practice of causing abortion by magic potions; it insisted on a minimum of hygiene by enacting some of the Old Testament dietary laws, etc. It had to compromise with the firmly rooted pagan custom of keening: the penance for keening decreased according to the higher rank of the dead person.

Later Penitentials. Columbanus brought the Irish penitential system to the Continent, where it soon became established. The Anglo-Saxons received it through the Irish from Iona who convened Northumbria. Even after the synod of Whitby (664) it was not abandoned. The penitential texts that go under the names of Theodore of Canterbury (d.c. 690), Bede, and Egbert (8th century) are still in the Irish tradition.

The two largest and best known Frankish penitentials of the 8th century, the Excarpsus Cummeani (Pseudo-Cummean) and the penitential of Codex Bigotianus (Paris, Bibl. nat. lat. 3182, 10th century), draw, inter alia, on both Cummean and Theodore. As a counterpart, one began to collect the penitential canons also in the native conciliar collections. Such compilations as the Saint Gall Tripartitum, or the Capitula iudiciorum, put, side by side, the iudicia canonica (and iudicia Columbani), the iudicia Theodori, and the iudicia Cummeani. The Carolingian reformers criticized the penitentials for their lack of canonical authority, the discrepancies of specific penances found between one penitential and another, and the abuses to which the option of substituting alms for fasting had led in course of time. New penitentials were composed from such canonical sources as the HADRIANA COLLECTIO and the HISPANA COLLECTIO, e.g., the Collectio Dacheriana, which was combined with a "Roman" penitential (actually a tripartitum) by Halitgar of Cambrai (817–831), but only as far as the latter would agree with Roman discipline. The penitential of Hrabanus Maurus is strictly canonical; it is based almost entirely on the Hadraina and Hispana.

A late descendant of the Franco-insular penitential tradition is the "Corrector," b. 19 of the Decretum of BURCHARD OF WORMS in the beginning of the 11th century. It contains questions to be asked by the confessor, with the appropriate penance for each sin confessed. Later penitentials, beginning with that of Alan of Lille, are general guides for confessors and not "tariff books," that is, books simply listing specific penances appropriate to certain sins.

Bibliography: C. VOGEL, La Discipline pénitentielle en Gaule des origines à la fin du VIIe siècle (Paris 1952). F. W. H. WASSER-SCHLEBEN, Die Bussordnungen der abendländischen Kirche (Halle 1851), texts and introd. H. J. SCHMITZ, Die Bussbücher und die Bussdisciplin der Kirche (Mainz 1883); Die Bussbücher und das Kanonische Bussverfahren (Düsseldorf 1898), historical, with ed. and analysis of many texts. J. F. KENNEY, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland, v. 1: Ecclesiastical (New York 1929) 235–246, survey with bibliog. P. FOURNIER and G. LEBRAS, Histoire des collections canoniques en occident depuis les fausses décrétales jusqu'au Décret de Gratien (Paris 1931–32) v.1, passim. G. LE BRAS, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al.

(Paris 1903–50) 12.1: 1160–79. T. P. OAKLEY, "Celtic Penance: Its Sources, Affiliation and Influence," The Irish Ecclesiastical Record 52 (1938) 147–164, 581–601. J. T. MCNEILL and H. M. GAMER, Medieval Handbooks of Penance (New York 1938), introd., Eng. tr., notes, bibliog., list of penitential MSS. Le Pénitentiel de St. Columban, ed. J. LAPORTE (Tournai 1958). C. VOGEL, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 2:802–805. L. BIELER, ed., The Irish Penitentials, app., D. A. BINCHY (Scriptores Latini Hiberniae, Dublin 1963), introd., critical eds., Eng. tr., notes, indexes.

[L. BIELER]

PENITENTIARY, APOSTOLIC

One of the three tribunals of the Holy See (along with the Roman Rota and the Supreme Tribunal of the Apostolic Signatura), which have the task of upholding moral conduct and safeguarding justice in the comportment of both individuals and of the diverse offices of the Apostolic See. The Roman Pontiff is the supreme judge for the entire Catholic world; he tries cases either personally or through the ordinary tribunals of the Apostolic See or through judges delegated by himself (Codex iuris canonici c.1442).

History. The early history of the Apostolic Penitentiary is marked by a gradual development of the penitential discipline of the Church of Rome particularly as applied to the pilgrims who came to Rome to honor the memory of the early Christian martyrs, to obtain forgiveness of their sins, in many cases to be freed from censures reserved to the Roman Pontiff, or to obtain graces and dispensations reserved to him. According to documents of 1200, a certain Cardinal Giovanni "de S. Paolo" heard confessions for the pope. Quite probably he was assisted by other confessors placed under his authority. In the time of Pope HONORIUS III (1216–1227), the cardinal who exercised that office was known as "Penitentiary," "General Penitentiary," then "the Highest Penitentiary," or as he is known today, "Major Penitentiary." He had collaborators among whom were some "friars" later called "Minor Penitentiaries."

Under Pope BONIFACE VIII (1294–1303) there were ten or more minor penitentiaries, almost all of whom were members of the Mendicant Orders. In the colleges of the minor penitentiaries functioning in three of the major basilicas there were also Franciscans, later known as Conventual Franciscans. PIUS V (1566–1572) introduced a radical reform of the three colleges of penitentiaries, and because of the widespread suppression of the Conventuals, misinformed (malus informatus) as Pope SIXTUS V (1585–1590) would later write (see Gatti, 176), he dismissed them from the office of confessor (penitentiary) in the Lateran Basilica and appointed the Friars Minor of the Observance in their stead while at the same time appointing the Jesuits as confessors for St. Peter's Basilica. When CLEMENT XIV (1769–1774) reluctantly suppressed the Society of Jesus he appointed the Conventual Franciscans to the college of the penitentiaries in the Basilica of St. Peter. The Friars Minor of the Observance (today known simply as “Friars Minor”) continue their service in the Lateran Basilica. The Dominicans are confessors at the Basilica of St. Mary Major, and since 1933 the Benedictines offer their services as confessors in the Basilica of St. Paul outside the walls. The minor penitentiaries, despite their name and the fact that they depend upon the Apostolic Penitentiary for their nomination, authority, and specific government, are not strictly speaking members of the Apostolic Penitentiary.

The Council of Vienna (1311–1312) decreed that the authority of the cardinal major penitentiary continue even during the interregnum (sede vacante) of the papacy. BENEDICT XII (1334–1342) with the bull In agro domini gave precise norms for the working and organization of the penitentiary, creating the office of “canonist” to assist the cardinal penitentiary in all juridical questions. In the course of time the competence of the cardinal major penitentiary extended beyond matters of conscience (the internal forum) to those concerning the external forum (public affairs and the government of the Church). PIUS IV (1559–1565) tried to reduce the exorbitant jurisdiction of the cardinal penitentiary, but it was PIUS V (1566–1572) who, after revoking all the faculties of the major penitentiary, went on to suppress the Apostolic Penitentiary entirely so as to radically reform it, reducing the cardinal penitentiary's authority in the external forum to a minimum and creating the office of “theologian” (which by privilege is reserved to the Jesuits). BENEDICT XIV and St. PIUS X enacted further modifications, while BENEDICT XV, in 1917, transferred to the Apostolic Penitentiary all matters concerning the granting and use of indulgences that St. Pius X had reserved to the Holy Office.

The most recent reorganization of the norms of this tribunal was undertaken by PIUS XI in the constitution Quae divinitus (March 25, 1935), which presents the fundamental structure and norms that govern the penitentiary. These norms were reconfirmed by JOHN PAUL II in his apostolic constitution on the ROMAN CURIA, PASTOR BONUS (1988).

Structure. Since Pius V and Benedict XIV, except for an occasional difference of nomenclature, the Apostolic Penitentiary is structured as follows: the Cardinal Major Penitentiary, the Regent, the Theologian, the Canonist and three Councilors, and three minor officials.

The cardinal major penitentiary assumes in his person all the faculties of the penitentiary. He is assisted by the regent and three minor officials. In the exercise of his authority, he acts collegially both in the Congress (which is the union of his ordinary collaborators for day-to-day solutions and decisions), and in the Signature (the collegial body made up solely of the prelates). He is not subject to the Congress; in other words, he may act contrary to the mind of his collaborators, but not without them; neither is he subject to the Signature. In the latter case, however, should he take a different stand, the fact must be noted in the protocol.

The regent has a position corresponding to that of the prelate secretary in the congregations of the Curia. He presides at the Congress—unless the cardinal himself presides—and directs the ordinary work of the office with ordinary or delegated powers according to the prescribed norms.

The theologian, the canonist, and the three councilors are prelates who together with the regent form the Signature. The cardinal must seek their advice in cases of special difficulty or importance. The prelates may offer their assistance either as individuals or as a group in which they express their opinion by majority vote according to the rules prescribed for the Roman Curia. Matters exceeding the competence of the cardinal penitentiary are brought to the attention of the pope in the semi-annual audience which the cardinal has with him.

The minor officials are the aiutante di studio, the archivist, and the adetto di segreteria, who assist in carrying out the ordinary business of the Apostolic Penitentiary.

Competence. The Apostolic Penitentiary has two major areas of competency: matters of the internal forum and indulgences. The apostolic constitution Pastor bonus (nos. 117–120) asserts that this tribunal has jurisdiction over all that concerns the internal forum, sacramental and non-sacramental, and whatever refers to the concession and use of indulgences, with due regard for the right of the Congregation of the Faith to examine questions that touch dogmatic doctrine in reference to indulgences. To the internal forum (typically ecclesial as opposed to civil) pertain what takes place in the intimacy of conscience and has immediate relation to God, and also occult (hidden) actions as long as they remain such.

The Apostolic Penitentiary grants absolution from sins and censures reserved to the Holy See. The reservation of sins as such has been done away with in the 1983 Code of the Latin rite but has been retained in the Code of the Canons of the Oriental Churches, which has reserved to the apostolic See (concretely the Apostolic Penitentiary) the absolution of the sin of direct violation of the sacramental seal and that of the absolution of one's accomplice in a sin against chastity (c.728 '1,1° and 2° Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium, cc. respectively 1388 and 1378 of the Codex iuris canonici). The Apostolic Penitentiary also grants dispensations from private vows (public vows belong to the external forum) and oaths; dispensations from irregularities and matrimonial impediments whenever these are actually occult, even though public by nature; the commutation of vows and other obligations; the validation of religious professions and of marriage; and the condonation of obligations to the Church and third parties. It may be approached even by members of the Oriental rites for the solution of practical cases of conscience.

In the vast array of matters within the competence of the Apostolic Penitentiary, it has the authority to resolve concrete, individual cases, whereas the solution of problems under the aspect of universality belongs to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. The solutions of the Apostolic Penitentiary are authoritatively binding—preceptive or freeing from an obligation, according to the nature of the case—only for the concrete circumstances which are submitted for examination. It is clear, however, that the doctrinal and disciplinary direction furnished with the solution can prudently be applied by analogy on a broader scale.

Procedure. The modus operandi of the Apostolic Penitentiary may be illustrated in the case of a priest who attempts marriage, even though civilly only, and thereby incurs an irregularity, reserved to the Holy See only in public cases (c.1047, '3 Codex iuris canonici), and an automatic suspension (c.1394, '1 Codex iuris canonici). If the penitent priest wants to exercise the priestly ministry, he must obtain a dispensation from the irregularity by recourse to competent authority. The censure of suspension, of its nature public, though not reserved, will be lifted by the same authority, competent to dispense from the irregularity.

Under the 1983 Code, there is no automatic excommunication consequent upon the crime of attempted marriage by priests. Since the censure of suspension does not of itself prohibit the reception of sacraments, priests who have attempted marriage and, though contrite, cannot separate from the woman they are living with may seek and obtain absolution and be admitted to the reception of the sacraments like lay persons provided their situation is occult, that they are truly penitent, namely that they promise to live chastely with their companion in a brother-sister relationship, repair as far as possible whatever scandal was given, and seek to regularize their situation as soon as possible, and this because the obligation of celibacy which is reserved to the Roman Pontiff alone (cf. c. 291) remains.

Cases submitted to the Apostolic Penitentiary are resolved as far as possible within 24 hours of their receipt. This is in obedience to the disposition given already by Benedict XIV and confirmed by Pius XI. The reason for this rule and for the effort of the penitentiary to abide by it is very clear: Salus animarum suprema lex ("the salvation of souls is the supreme law"). This salvation does not admit procrastination. Should a case present special difficulties so that a reply cannot be given immediately, the penitentiary acknowledges the receipt of the case at least with an interlocutory reply. In connection with the exigency of the principle enunciated above, the Church has provided in c. 1357 (cf. c. 1048, by analogy, regarding the exercise of orders by one who is irregular) the means whereby the state of grace can be regained by sacramental absolution even before recourse is made. In giving an interlocutory reply, the penitentiary always reminds confessors of the faculties granted to them by this canon and of the opportuneness to grant absolution to the penitent.

The rescripts (written responses) of the penitentiary are not stereotype formularies but specific answers drawn up to respond to concrete and specific cases in order not to give the impression of impersonal bureaucracy. In conformity with the norms governing the Roman Curia modern languages are used in so far as possible, even though preference is still given to Latin when writing an answer to a confessor.

Although the replies of the penitentiary never contain personal information like the name and surname of the addressee of the provision or opinion, the rule is that the rescripts and replies are to be destroyed as soon as possible as a maximum safeguard of the sacramental seal or of the secret of conscience. However, if the decisions of the penitentiary have relevance for the external forum (e.g., permission to receive the sacraments that might be a motive or cause of scandal should the person not be able to adduce proof in the external form of the now regularized position), permission is given to keep the rescript so that, if necessary, it can be produced as evidence. All responses are sent in a double-sealed envelope, the first of which carries the protocol number by which the case can be identified in future correspondence should the need arise.

Recourse to the Apostolic Penitentiary. As in general regarding all the organizations of the Holy See, all the faithful have the right to have recourse to the penitentiary either directly or through someone else. The nature of the matters involved and experience indicate that recourse should be made anonymously, through the services of the confessor if the matter has to do with sin or through a spiritual director if it is a matter of the internal nonsacramental forum. The recourse should be made in a clear and succinct fashion, presenting elements regarding the theological and canonical connotations, serious circumstances impinging on the common good as well as the state of mind and psychology of the petitioner. The request is to be addressed to the cardinal major penitentiary or the Apostolic Penitentiary, Città del Vaticano.

External Forum. Finally, the Apostolic Penitentiary is entrusted with whatever concerns the granting and use of indulgences, with due regard to the competence of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith in whatever has to do with the dogmatic aspect of indulgences (see Pastor bonus, no. 120; Indulgentiarum doctrina [January 1, 1967], AAS 59 [1967]: 5–24), a revision of the doctrine of indulgences).

Bibliography: JOHN PAUL II, Pastor bonus (June 28, 1988). Enchiridion Indulgentiarum, Normae et Concessionones, 4th ed. (Vatican City 1999). Catechismus Catholicae Ecclesiae (Vatican City 1987), nos. 1471–1498. F. M. CAPPELLO, De Curia Romana, 2 v. (Rome 1911–1912). L. CHIAPETTA, Il Codice di Diritto Canonico, 2 v. (Napoli 1988). L. DE MAGISTRIS and U. M. TODESCHNI, “La Penitenzieria Apostolica” in La Curia Romana nella Cost. Ap. Pastor Bonus (Vatican City 1990), 419–428. N. DEL RE, La Curia Romana: Lineamenta storico-giuridici (Roma 1970), 272–274. I. GATTI, “Da 50 anni i Frati Minori Conventuali nello Stato della Città del Vaticano (1948–1998)” in Commentarium Ordinis Minorum Conventualium 95 (1998):165–193. E. GOELLER, Die Päpstliche Pönitentierie von Ihrem Ursprung bis zu Ihrer Umgestaltung unter Pius V, 2 v. (Roma 1907–1911). C. H. HASKINS, “The Sources for the History of the Papal Penitentiary,” The American Journal of Theology 9 (1905): 421–450. L. ICHONET, La sacrée Pénitencierie Apostolique: Etude de droit et d'histoire (Lyon 1908). L. LARRAONA and S. GOYENECHÉ, De SS. Congregationum, Tribunalium et Officiorum constitutione et interna ordinatione post const. Sapientis consilio, in Romana Curia a B. Pio X “Sapientis consilio” reformata (1951), 123–129. V. PETRA, De sacra Paenitentiarum Apostolica (Roma 1712). F. ROBERTI, “De Curia Romana ante Pianam reformationem” Appollinaris 25 (1952): 13–34. F. TAMBURINI, “Per la storia dei Cardinali Penitenzieri Maggiori,” Rivista di Storia della Chiesa in Italia 36 (1982): 332–380.

[B. HEISER/D. KOS]

PENN, WILLIAM

Quaker statesman and colonizer; b. London, England, Oct. 14, 1644; d. Ruscombe, Berkshire, England, July 30, 1718. He was the son of Adm. Sir William Penn and received an education suited to good social position. About 1667 he became a Quaker; he was subsequently imprisoned a number of times for nonconformity and he became a leading spokesman for general religious toleration. As a friend of King James II, Penn was suspected of being a Jesuit and was regarded with suspicion under succeeding Protestant monarchs. In 1681, in payment of a debt due his father from the Crown, he received from Charles II a grant of land in America. As sole proprietor of PENNSYLVANIA, Penn developed the province into a “holy experiment” of his ideals of religious and political freedom, with the support of many Quakers and others who settled there. He framed a liberal government for the colonists and made just peace treaties with the native peoples. Unfortunately, he had political and financial difficulties at home and spent only two two-year periods in Pennsylvania. He wrote numerous religious and political tracts and preached extensively until a stroke of apoplexy in 1712 disabled him mentally.

Bibliography: Of Penn’s writings (see list in Peare), most fully collected in 1726, only a few are now reprinted. A well-chosen anthology is The Witness of William Penn, ed. F. B. TOLLES and E. G. ALDERFER (New York 1957), bibliog. 203–205. Biographies include M. R. BRAILSFORD, The Making of William Penn (New York 1930). W. I. HULL, William Penn (New York 1937). W. W. COMFORT, William Penn (Philadelphia 1944). C. O. PEARE, William Penn (Philadelphia 1957), bibliog.

[H. J. CADBURY]

PENNINGS, BERNARD HENRY

Missionary; b. Gemert, Holland, June 9, 1861; d. De Pere, WI, March 17, 1955. He joined Berne Abbey in Heeswijk, Holland, in 1879 and was ordained on June 19, 1886. He volunteered for the American mission undertaken by the abbey in 1893 in response to a request from Bp. Sebastian G. Messmer of Green Bay, WI. Messmer wanted assistance in combating the work of Joseph Rene Vilatte, “Archbishop of the Old Catholic Church in America,” who was proselytizing among the Belgian immigrants in northeastern Wisconsin. In September 1898 Pennings became prior of the first permanent foundation of the Premonstratensian Order in North America, established at West De Pere, WI. In 1925 Pius XI raised the De Pere house to the status of an abbey, and Pennings was blessed as abbot on May 27. At the time of his death, his community conducted five high schools and St. Norbert College, West De Pere; operated one television and two radio stations; and served parishes in eight dioceses. Papal honors conferred on Pennings were: the cappa magna and purple pileolus (1934), the purple birretta (1936), and the title of knight commander of the Order of the Holy Sepulchre (1951). In 1951 the Belgian government named him a knight of the Order of the Crown in recognition of his work among Belgian immigrants.

[R. J. CORNELL]

PENN’S CHARTER OF LIBERTIES

The Charter of Liberties was drawn up by the PENNSYLVANIA Legislature and approved by William PENN, proprietor of the colony. It was the culmination of enlightened progress toward securing personal freedoms against a capricious proprietor and crown, and served as the constitution of Pennsylvania from 1701 to 1776. Its most notable features were the establishment of a popular assembly with the right to initiate legislation and the affording of persons accused of crimes the right to counsel. It was not until 1836 that English law gave the defendant an absolute right to counsel in all cases.

Background. The charter that King Charles II gave to William Penn in 1681 made him the absolute proprietor of the area in America where Penn was to establish a colony. The crown did, however, reserve to itself certain rights, including that of approving or disallowing acts passed by the General Assembly. Penn's first plan of government, the Fundamental Constitutions of Pennsylvania, granted freedom of conscience and provided for an Assembly with privileges like those of the House of Commons. Some of Penn's ideas failed to please prospective land buyers, and he modified them somewhat.

A new Frame of Government, issued in 1682, gave freemen the right to elect members to both the Council and the Assembly—a departure from the usual practice of having the upper house or council appointed. But the Assembly could not initiate legislation. Another Frame of Government, reducing the size of the Council and the Assembly, was issued in 1683 while Penn was in Pennsylvania. After Penn returned to England to defend his rights, his deputy governor, William Markham, issued a new Frame of Government in 1696. The Assembly approved this, but Penn never gave his consent, and the law could not be considered as binding. When he returned to Pennsylvania in 1700, Penn advised the colonists to change the Frame of Government, if it did not suit them. The Council studied the Frames of Government of 1683 and 1696, took what was best in each and presented the results to Penn for his approval. On Oct. 28, 1701, Penn gave his consent. The required six-sevenths of both houses voted to replace the Frame of Government of 1683 with the new Charter of Liberties, and on Nov. 8, 1701, it became the constitution of Pennsylvania.

Provisions. In this charter Penn granted and confirmed to “all the Freemen, Planters and Adventurers, and other Inhabitants of this Province and Territories, these following Liberties, Franchises and Privileges,” to be kept and enjoyed by them forever. Liberty of conscience was guaranteed to all who acknowledged one almighty God, the creator, ruler, and upholder of the world. Those who professed to believe in Christ were eligible for service in any legislative or executive capacity, providing they solemnly promised allegiance to the king, fidelity to the proprietor and governor, and took the attests established by law.

Bernard Henry Pennings, founder of St. Norbert's Abbey.

Each October freemen of the colony were to choose four persons from each county for the Assembly that would meet in Philadelphia two weeks later. The Assembly had the power to choose a speaker, appoint committees, prepare bills, decide on adjournment, impeach criminals, and redress grievances. It also had “all other Power and Privileges of an Assembly, according to the Rights of the free-born Subjects of England, and as is usual in any of the King's Plantations in America.” If a county refused to choose representatives, or if those chosen refused to serve, the rest of the properly chosen delegates meeting together had the full power of the Assembly, providing that two-thirds of the whole body was present.

The freemen also nominated two men for sheriff and two for coroner. The governor then chose one man for each office, and those men selected served three years. In the case of death or default, the governor filled the vacancies until the end of the term. If the freemen failed to choose candidates for these posts, the incumbents remained in office until a new election was held. Justices of the counties nominated three persons for the position of clerk of the peace, and the governor appointed one of these to serve during his good behavior.

Other parts of the charter dealt with the recording and preservation of laws; the giving to criminals the priv-illeges of counsel and of calling witnesses; the safeguarding of a citizen's property from actions by the governor and Council, except in the ordinary course of justice; the preventing of the forfeiture of property in the event of suicide or death by accident; and the licensing of taverns and public houses.

The charter could not be amended in whole or in part except by the consent of the governor and six-sevenths of the Assembly. The one exception to this was the article on liberty of conscience, which was so basic to the true intent of the charter that it must be kept forever without alteration. Penn promised on behalf of himself and his heirs to do nothing that would impair the liberties expressed in the charter.

Bibliography: R. L. PERRY, ed. Sources of Our Liberties (Chicago, Ill. 1959). E. B. BRONNER, William Penn's Holy Experiment: The Founding of Pennsylvania, 1681–1701 (New York 1962). C. O. PEARE, William Penn: A Biography (Philadelphia, Pa. 1957). W. I. HULL, William Penn: A Topical Biography (New York 1937).

[H. D. LANGLEY]

PENNSYLVANIA, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The second of the original 13 states to ratify the U.S. constitution (Dec. 12, 1787), Pennsylvania is bordered by the Delaware River that separates it from New Jersey on the east, Delaware, and Maryland on the south, West Virginia on the southwest, Ohio on the west, by about 40 miles of Lake Erie shore at the northwest corner, and New York on the north. More than 80 percent of the population lives in metropolitan areas. Philadelphia is the largest city, followed in size by Pittsburgh, Erie, and Allentown. Harrisburg is the capital.

The eight dioceses in Pennsylvania comprise the ecclesiastical Province of Philadelphia, anchored in the eastern end of the state by the metropolitan see of PHILADELPHIA, and in the west by PITTSBURG. These two oldest dioceses in Pennsylvania also have the largest population of Catholics in the state, both by numbers and by percentage—Philadelphia with approximately 1,400,000, faithful and Pittsburgh with 750,000, each about 38 percent of total residents. Though both dioceses are centered in large metropolitan areas they have very different characters; it has often been said that the Midwest begins in western Pennsylvania, while Philadelphia has an atmosphere of established catholicity that it shares with other East Coast sees such as New York and Boston. In the middle of the state the diocese of Harrisburg, centered in the rural agricultural counties of the Susquehanna valley, comprises the lowest percentage of Catholics in the state, with 238,000 faithful out of a total population of 1,940,000 (12 percent). The other dioceses are Allentown, Altoona-Johnstown, Erie, Greensburg, and Scranton. In 2001 there were about 3.5 million Catholics throughout the state, about 30 percent of the total population of almost 2 million.

Colonial Times. William PENN embarked on a unique experiment in religious liberty in his colony of Pennsylvania. As Sally Schwartz has observed: "Other colonies experienced migration of German and Scotch-Irish peoples to their frontiers, but conceded at best only the privilege of toleration to newcomers, not the right of freedom of conscience. Only in Pennsylvania was there no 'establishment' to dispense or withhold favors." ("A Mixed Multitude": The Struggle for Toleration in Colonial Pennsylvania, 292). Catholics benefitted more than most from this freedom of conscience. Though barred by the provisions of the Test Oath (1693–1775) from office-holding and the exercise of the franchise, Catholics enjoyed greater opportunities for worship and the practice of their faith in Penn's colony than in any of the 13 colonies.

That said, when, in 1708, news of Catholic activity in the province first reached the ears of Governor Logan, he complained to Penn of the "scandal of the Mass." The Proprietor responded by warning Logan to be on the watch for an anti-Catholic backlash. None ensued, and indeed Jesuit missionaries regularly traveled north into Pennsylvania from their farm at Bohemia Manor on Maryland's eastern shore. Sources indicate that the priests were routine visitors at the Wilcox farm in Ivy Mills near Chester, and were certainly celebrating the Eucharist there by 1720. In 1729 Fr. Joseph Greaton was living in Philadelphia, celebrating the Mass in private homes, and the year 1732 saw his purchase of a plot of land off Walnut St., where by 1734 he had erected a small chapel and residence, frequented by a small congregation of about 40 persons (mostly German). St. Joseph's was the first place of public Catholic worship in the colonies since the chapel at St. Mary's City in Maryland was demolished in 1704.

St. Vincent College and Archabbey, first permanent Benedictine foundation in U.S., Latrobe, Pennsylvania.

In 1741 two German Jesuits arrived to care for the sizable number of Catholics who were migrating to southeastern and south-central Pennsylvania. William Wappeler found about 300 Catholics in Lancaster, and soon established three mission stations at Conewago (where a chapel serving Catholics from nearby Maryland had already been founded in 1730), Codorus Creek (near York, where a chapel would be built in 1750) and Lancaster itself (Wappeler would purchase land there in 1742 for a church that would come to be known as “old St. Mary’s”). Theodore Schneider, a former university professor from Heidelberg, was the other missionary who disembarked in 1741; he traveled to Berks county and set up his headquarters on a farm which Greaton had purchased at Goshenhoppen (present-day Bally, named in honor of a famous 19th century pastor). From there he and his successors were able to attend to congregations in Reading (where a “meetinghouse” existed by 1753), Lebanon, Pottsville (which boasted a wood church in 1827), Bethlehem, Easton (the mother church of the Lehigh Valley was erected there in 1836), Sunbury and Williamsport.

A census of Catholics in Pennsylvania in 1757 enumerated 1,365 communicants, of whom 948 were Germans and 416 Irish. About 40 percent of the Catholic population was centered in Philadelphia, Chester and Bucks counties. The increasing number of Catholics in the city of Philadelphia required the erection of a new church; St. Mary’s was completed in 1763, its congregation made up mostly of Irish. The city was well served by priests such as Ferdinand FARMER, SJ, who cared for the poor and needy of the city as well as immersing himself in its intellectual life, serving as a Trustee of the fledgling University of Pennsylvania. A zealous pastor, who found time to make missionary journeys throughout Pennsylvania and New Jersey, he was mourned at his death in 1786 as a “father of his people and friend of civilized humanity.”

Western Pennsylvania, unlike the east, traces its Catholic roots to France. Fr. Joseph Bonnacamps, SJ, accompanying a military expedition, offered Mass in what would become Westmoreland county in 1749, while the first site of public Catholic worship in the area was at the Chapel of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary of the Beautiful River, located in Fort Duquesne, at the confluence of the Allegheny and Monogehela rivers (Pittsburgh). The chapel, which functioned till its destruction four years later by British forces, was served by Fr. Denis Baron, and his extant baptismal register serves as an eloquent testimony to his pastoral labors.

Just as England's victory in western Pennsylvania brought an end to Fr. Baron's work, so the French and Indian War saw heightened anti-Catholic tensions in the eastern half of the state. News of General Braddock's defeat in 1755 touched off mob violence in Philadelphia, and St. Joseph's church was only saved from destruction by the intervention of a group of Quakers. In that same year in Goshenhoppen, a Corpus Christi procession was mistaken by neighbors for a military drill, and the Berks County Justices wrote to Gov. Morris in alarm. Yet Catholics retained their liberties throughout this period, and by the time of the War for Independence many of them supported the colonials, though Clifton's Regiment, a company of 180 men from St. Mary's church, did fight on behalf of the British. St. Mary's, though, could also boast of a number of prominent patriots, including Stephen Moylan (1734–1811, a merchant and aide-de-camp to Washington), Thomas Fitzsimmons (1741–1811; a financial backer of the colonial cause and Congressional delegate), and Commodore John Barry (1745–1803, honored as the "father of the American Navy"). The church of St. Mary's itself would play a role in the birth of the new nation, serving as the setting for a number of liturgical celebrations attended by members of Congress and foreign dignitaries, including a Te Deum on July 4, 1779, and a service of Thanksgiving for the victory at Yorktown on Nov. 4, 1781.

A Diocese and Turmoil in Philadelphia. The new state Constitution granted all the rights of citizens to Catholics in Pennsylvania, and as the eighteenth century waned their numbers continued to increase. John CARROLL, the newly appointed Bishop of Baltimore, estimated in 1790 that there were 7,000 Catholics in Pennsylvania, 2,000 of these living Philadelphia and its environs. Finding clergy to care for such numbers was certainly a challenge (an outstanding young immigrant priest, Lorenz Grassel, died during the great Yellow Fever epidemic of 1793, soon after being named as Carroll's coadjutor). New churches were also needed, especially in Philadelphia. In 1789, the German Religious Society of Roman Catholics, under the guidance of Fathers John and Peter Heilbron, built Holy Trinity church. This premier "national" church would be but the first of many to seek autonomy in its choice of pastors and internal governance (leading to years of ecclesial strife). St. Augustine's church was begun in 1796 by newly arrived Irish Augustinians, and would soon, thanks to the generosity of its subscribers (including George Washington), rank as city's largest church.

The young nation's rapidly expanding Catholic population moved Bishop Carroll to request a division of his diocese. Among the four sees formed from Baltimore would be Philadelphia, which comprised at its establishment not only the states of Pennsylvania and Delaware, but also western and southern New Jersey. An Irish Franciscan, Michael Egan (who had labored at St. Mary's since 1803), was named the first Bishop of Philadelphia on April 8, 1808 — Carroll's only choice for that office. Though a fine preacher and a conscientious pastor, Egan was not possessed of a strong constitution, and his peaceable and pious nature was not equal to the conflicts that developed with the trustees of St. Mary's (which had become the new Cathedral). The contentious nature of the two Harolds, the Dominican William, and his uncle James, priests of the Cathedral, only exacerbated conflicts Egan had with the trustees over financial matters and personnel. Upon Egan's death in July of 1814, ecclesiastical affairs in Philadelphia had reached an impasse.

Following Egan's demise the see was vacant for six years. The War of 1812 and its aftermath hampered communications, and French and Irish factions in the United States and on the Continent feuded over the appointment. Both Louis de Barth (the administrator of the see, resident in Conewago), and Ambrose Maréchal (future archbishop of Baltimore) refused the nomination; finally Henry CONWELL, an Irishman from Armagh, arrived in the city in November of 1820, having received the appointment the previous year (Rome had given him his choice of Madras or Philadelphia).

Conwell was not a happy choice. He was 73 by the time he arrived in Philadelphia, and was an obstinate, vain man, lacking the oratorical skills so prized by the city's Catholics, and the talent for leadership so needed by the diocese. The bishop's lack of skill in the pulpit only added to the prestige of William Hogan, a flamboyant but troubled young priest, who soon could boast a following among St. Mary's congregants. The bishop sought to regulate Hogan's wayward lifestyle, while the priest denounced Conwell from the pulpit. The parish was soon divided—many of the trustees sided with Hogan—and both men were sued in court. A bloody riot even broke out on April 9, 1822. Rome was moved by the struggle to weigh in on the proper role of church trustees, and following the letter Non sine magno of Pius VII in August of 1822, Hogan's influence waned.

Troubles would flare up again in 1826, after the bishop agreed to a pact with the trustees of St. Mary's regulating pastoral appointments. Three of the lay leaders claimed that the deal gave them the authority to veto episcopal appointments. William Harold, now serving as Conwell's Vicar General, denounced the bishop's actions, whereupon the latter removed him from his post, only to see his cause taken up by the trustees. Rome criticized the terms of the pact, and Conwell was summoned to Rome. Suffering from the onset of senility, he fled from Rome after giving a report of his actions, and headed back to Philadelphia. In response to this bizarre turn of events, and prompted by the pleas of the American bishops, Rome appointed Francis Patrick KENRICK as Conwell's coadjutor, and entrusted the administration of the diocese to his care. He was consecrated in Bardstown, KY on June 6, 1830, and arrived in Philadelphia on July 7.

Kenrick, both a scholar and administrator, possessing gracious manners and steely determination, acted quickly to bring order to the diocese, which was, lamented his friend John Hughes (future bishop of New York) "in a deplorable state." He placed St. Mary's under interdiction until such time as the trustees renounced the right of naming pastors (which they soon did), and brought in Hughes to supervise the construction of a new church, St. John the Evangelist, which would have no trustees. Though hampered by the hostile and deluded meddling of Bp. Conwell (who besides criticizing Kenrick to all who would listen, on one occasion even threw his coadjutor's possessions out of the residence they shared), Kenrick was able to make great strides in the diocese. A synod was held in 1832 (whose pastoral provisions were soon copied by many U.S. bishops), a seminary begun, and a newspaper, the Catholic Herald, was founded. Heroic charitable assistance was offered during the cholera epidemic of the same year, most notably by the SISTERS OF CHARITY. Parishes were established to meet the needs of the thousands of immigrants streaming into the diocese, which numbered 100,000 souls by 1832, yet possessed only 38 priests. So great was the pastoral burden that already in 1835 Kenrick petitioned to have a new diocese erected in Pittsburgh. Though Rome put off a decision for eight years, finally on Aug. 11, 1843 the Diocese of Pittsburgh was established, comprising 21,000 square miles of territory and 45,000 Catholics. Michael O'Connor, formerly rector of St. Charles Seminary in Philadelphia, was named the first bishop.

Growth in Western Pennsylvania. During the time that the Church in Philadelphia was in turmoil, the rest of the state could boast of a growing number of Catholics. A band of the faithful from Goshenhoppen had migrated to Westmoreland county, and in 1789 Fr. Theodore Brouwers had joined them to provide for their pastoral needs. A 300-acre farm, Sportsman's Hall, near present-day Latrobe, was purchased by Brouwers and willed before his death in 1790 to whoever would succeed him in the care of the region's Catholics. The sad escapades of a rogue fortune-hunting priest would cloud much of the following decade, but finally Fr. Peter Heilbron (who had earlier served at Holy Trinity in Philadelphia) arrived to take up residence at the hall (a small cabin), and minister to the Catholics living throughout western Pennsylvania.

Demetrius GALLITZIN, who joined Heilbron, became known as the Apostle of the Alleghenies. The son of a Russian count and a German princess, Gallitzin completed his seminary studies in Baltimore and was sent by Bishop Carroll to care for Catholics living in the region of Magurie's Settlement (now known as Loretto), where he founded a church and school. From there he traveled for miles on horseback (and sleigh in old age) seeking out Catholics and ministering to their spiritual needs.

When Bishop O'Connor arrived in Pittsburgh, he found St. Patrick's Church, which had been built in 1811 by the city's first pastor, William O'Brien. His successor, Charles Maguire, had begun Pittsburgh's second Catholic church, St. Paul's, in 1820, which upon completion was the largest in the country. It was an obvious and impressive choice for O'Connor's cathedral church. The diocese was, however, in dire need of clergy and religious; while the bishop was in Europe for his consecration, he sought assistance in Ireland. He acquired eight seminarians from Maynooth, and the newly established Sisters of Mercy promised their support, and sent seven members to western Pennsylvania where they opened St. Xavier's Academy in 1844 and Mercy Hospital in 1846 (displacing the Sisters of Charity who had operated similar institutions in the city since 1835). The community would increase rapidly from this humble beginning, establishing foundations in Philadelphia, Erie and Scranton.

Attracted by the plight of German immigrants in the United States, the Bavarian Benedictine Boniface WIMMER and a band of companions arrived in the diocese in 1846 from the Abbey of St. Michael in Metten. Though their plans called for them to settle at Carrolltown, not far from Loretto, they found the land unsuited for farming, and Bishop O'Connor was able to entice them to Latrobe with the promise of the Sportsman's Hall property. There they founded St. Vincent's Priory (later Archabbey), the first Benedictine monastery in the country, and soon were staffing parishes and missions throughout western Pennsylvania, as well as an academy, college, and seminary.

Though he feuded with the headstrong abbot over the free education of his seminarians and the monk's brewery, O'Connor knew what a blessing the community was to his young diocese. Soon he was able to welcome another religious family, the Passionists, who sent a pioneer group of three priests and a brother to establish a foundation in Birmingham (the city's south side) in 1852.

The Rise of Nativism. All was not peaceful in Pittsburgh, though. The waves of Catholic immigrants flooding into the country in the 1840s had aroused the fear and suspicion of earlier immigrant groups. These Nativists sought to counteract the influence of the "Catholic menace" through political action and violent intimidation (see NATIVISM). The Protestant Association of Pittsburgh, for example, planned in 1850 to set fire to Mercy Hospital, which was saved only by the bishop's vigilance in ordering the facility to be guarded day and night. That same year, though, saw O'Connor arrested by the Nativist mayor of the city, who was ironically governing the city from his prison cell.

Tribulations far more deadly had occurred in Philadelphia, where Nativists were roused to action by the resistance Catholics offered to their children's use of the King James Bible in public schools, and their exposure to anti-Catholic materials in the schools' curriculum. Exacerbated by urban unemployment and ethnic strife, riots broke out in the Kensington section of the city in May 1844, during which two Catholic churches were burned (including St. Augustine's and its extensive library). Two months later, following reports that St. Philip Neri Church was being used to stockpile arms, a pitched battle ensued between a Nativist mob and the state militia which had been ordered to guard the church. The violence claimed 20 lives and saw over 100 people injured before order was restored.

Given the challenges that immigrants faced in this climate of hostility, a number of proposals were made to found rural "colonies," where Catholics could live and work unmolested by their effects of prejudice. One such community was established in northwestern Pennsylvania, in Elk County. A settlement was established on 35,000 acres of land by German families from Philadelphia and Baltimore, who arrived on Dec. 8, 1842, and named their village St. Mary's. Though the first harsh winters tested the determination of the colonizers, and the Redemptorists who had initially backed the project turned it over to the Benedictines from St. Vincent's; in time the community flourished, developing mills and other small industries.

Despite the hostile climate for Catholic immigrants, the number of faithful in the diocese of Philadelphia continued to increase. The pastoral care of his flock was always Bishop Kenrick's first priority, and the arrival of new communities of religious women enabled the diocese to continue its ministry. The Sisters of St. Joseph were established in the city in 1847, and soon were running St. Joseph's Hospital (the first Catholic hospital in Philadelphia, established in 1849), a boy's orphanage, an asylum for widows, and a private academy. They were joined in their service to the Church by the School Sisters of Notre Dame (1848), the Good Shepherd Sisters (1849), and the Visitation nuns (1850). The Augustinians had recovered from the loss of their church during the Nativist troubles to embark on a college, Villanova, founded in 1842, and the Jesuits, not to be outdone, opened St. Joseph's College in 1851. The bishop, concerned not only with the spiritual but also economic welfare of his people, founded a diocesan bank in 1848. Finally, before his departure in 1851 to become archbishop of Baltimore, he had the satisfaction of purchasing land at 18th and Race streets, on which would one day be built a magnificent cathedral, modeled on the church of San Carlo al Corso in Rome. The diocese he left behind numbered some 170,000 Catholics, 101 priests, and 92 churches.

Philadelphia's Sainly Bishop. Upon his arrival in Baltimore, Kenrick found himself impressed by a quiet, humble Redemptorist then in residence in the city. He made a habit of making his confession to this priest, and when the time came for him to submit the name of his successor in Philadelphia to Rome, Fr. John NEUMANN's name was second on the list drawn up by the suffragans of the Baltimore province (only his "foreignness" — Neumann was from Bohemia — prevented him from officially occupying the first place, and Kenrick made it clear he was his personal choice). Neumann himself was horrified, but obediently submitted to the divine will, and was consecrated on March 28, 1852. He chose as his motto: "Passion of Christ, Strengthen Me."

Neumann had come to the United States in 1836 as a seminarian, and was ordained for the Diocese of New York. After a few years of pastoral work, he entered the Redemptorist community, and after professing his vows (the first in the country to do so), labored energetically in Baltimore and in St. Philomena's parish in Pittsburgh. He brought with him to Philadelphia a uniquely personal approach, spending much of his time in pastoral visitation; by September he had visited half the parishes in the diocese. The bishop referred to the promotion of Catholic parochial schools as his key project. Only a year after the establishment of a diocesan Board of Education in 1852, the number of children in diocesan parish schools had risen from 500 to 5000. To help in the evangelization of his ever-increasing flock, Neumann founded parishes, established the first diocesan-wide FORTY HOURS DEVO-TION in the United States (1853), assisted in the foundation of a religious community of women, the Sisters of the Third Order of St. Francis (1855), and welcomed a second community, the Sisters, Servants of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, to the diocese in 1858.

Neumann was a man of paradox, beloved for his piety and devotion, yet criticized by some within and without his diocese for his foreignness and discomfort with Philadelphia "society." As the diocese grew (in 1855 it already numbered 145 churches, the largest in the United States), Neumann proposed its division at the Eighth Provincial Council of Baltimore, suggesting that Pottsville be named the cathedral city of the new territory, and volunteering himself as the bishop of this more rural see. Some prelates, including O'Connor of Pittsburgh, urged Rome to accept Neumann's offer, but in 1857 it was decided that the diocese would remain as it was, but that Neumann would be given a coadjutor. James Frederic Wood, a financial genius possessed of a more urbane character, was the choice, and set himself at once to the task of straightening out the diocesan books. In this he was successful, yet his role as diocesan administrator remained nebulous while Neumann lived, even as the latter continued to long for a poorer, less cosmopolitan see. His strength sapped by pastoral labors, the saintly bishop of Philadelphia collapsed on the street on Jan. 5, 1860. He was beatified in 1863, and canonized in 1977.

New Dioceses for Pennsylvania. Bishop Wood finally came into his own as Bishop of Philadelphia, yet even as he came out of the shadow of his godly predecessor, he earned the nickname "the Shadow," by remaining a quiet, reserved man. As an administrator, though, he guided the diocese with a vigorous and steady hand. The long anticipated Cathedral of Saints Peter and Paul, whose construction had been a long-standing burden to diocesan finances, was dedicated on Nov. 20, 1864, even as the bishop announced plans for a new seminary building in the suburbs at Overbrook ("Wood's Folly"). As the number of Catholic faithful continued to increase, Wood was forced to return to a subject dear to the heart of Bp. Neumann; namely, the division of the diocese. Acting on the recommendations of the Second Plenary Council of BALTIMORE (1866), and Wood's own proposals made to Pius IX while on a visit to Rome in 1867, the Holy See announced a major revision of diocesan boundaries, erecting three new sees on March 3, 1868. The Diocese of Wilmington was created, removing the state of Delaware from the jurisdiction of the bishop of Philadelphia (southern New Jersey had previously been reassigned to Newark in 1853). Bishop William O'Hara was given charge of the Diocese of Scranton, which was formed from ten counties in northeastern Pennsylvania.

Catholic roots here stretched back not only to the pastoral work of Fr. Jeremiah Flynn, who as recently as 1825 had cared for Catholics throughout the whole region, but also to a settlement in Bradford County aptly named "French Azilum," whose fifty dwellings and chapel awaited the arrival in 1793 of a band of royalist exiles to have been led by Queen Marie Antoinette herself. The Diocese of Harrisburg was created from 18 counties in the state's central section, where Jeremiah F. Shanahan was named bishop. Bishop Wood was relieved by this redistribution of his pastoral responsibilities, and no doubt honored when he became Archbishop of Philadelphia — the diocese having been raised to the dignity of a metropolitan see in March of 1875. Sadly, the last decade of his life would be plagued by increasing bouts of illness and paralysis, which lasted till his death on June 20, 1883.

By the time the Province of Philadelphia was created, it included not only the dioceses mentioned above, but also Erie, which had been created by Pope Pius IX on April 29, 1853 from 13 northwestern Pennsylvania counties soon after the recommendation of the Fifth Provincial of Baltimore (1852). Its first bishop was none other than Michael O'Connor, who was transferred by his request from Pittsburgh, but returned there seven months later following outspoken and vehement pleas from his former clergy and faithful. Erie's second bishop was the Maine convert Josue Moody Young, who was followed by Tobias Mullen. During the latter's tenure of three decades (1868–1899) the Catholic population of the diocese increased four-fold, and the number of parishes tripled.

Bishop O'Connor's return to Pittsburgh, though, was not to be long-lived. For many years the former seminary professor had struggled with a call to the Society of Jesus. Though counseled by the pope against following this aspiration at the time of his consecration as bishop, O'Connor decided to pursue his dream in 1860, resigning as bishop of Pittsburgh. He was followed by another seminary instructor from St. Charles in Philadelphia, the Spanish Vincentian Michael DOMENEC. His task as bishop was made perplexing, though, by financial difficulties, conflicts with numerous religious in his diocese, a restive clergy, and the financial intriguing of Fr. John Hickey, the rector of St. Paul's cathedral. Partly in aid of lessening the discord he was facing, Domenec recommended in 1875 that the diocese of Pittsburgh be divided, and proposed his own name for the newly created see. Accordingly, in January of 1876 Rome created the Diocese of Allegheny City (only a stone's throw across the Allegheny river from the city of Pittsburgh), appointed Domenec its bishop, and named John Tuigg (formerly pastor of St. John's church in Altoona) as his successor. Tuigg was shocked as he slowly discovered not only the level of indebtedness of many diocesan parishes, but also the reality that diocesan boundaries had been redrawn in such a way that the bulk of the financial (as well as other) problems were located in his, and not Domenec's, see. Following a local audit of diocesan records, the bishop requested the intervention of the Holy See. Bishop Domenec was called to Rome, and, unable to adequately respond to the evidence presented by Tuigg's representatives, was asked to submit his resignation as Bishop of Allegheny City. The dioceses were subsequently reunited by Rome, while Bishop Domenec, his health weakened by his ordeal, died in January of 1878 in his native Spain while enroute to America.

The see of Pittsburgh, thus reunited, saw its population continually increase as thousands of immigrants flocked to western Pennsylvania. Bishop Phelan first requested the division of the diocese in a meeting with Absp. Ryan of Philadelphia in 1899, and when a petition of the province's bishops met with no response from Rome, they repeated their entreaty in February of 1901. This latter petition met with a favorable response and eight counties were united to form the see of Altoona. Eugene A. Garvey (a Scranton priest) was chosen as the diocese's first bishop. Over half a century later the see city would be twinned with its neighbor to the west to become the diocese of Altoona-Johnstown.

The Challenges of an "Immigrant Church." The face of the Catholic Church in Pennsylvania continued to be altered by the tens of thousands of immigrants who arrived in its dioceses throughout the second half of the nineteenth century, drawn by promises of employment in the state's burgeoning coal mines, steel mills, oil rigs, and garment factories. Many of these new arrivals hailed from central and eastern Europe, and longed for an experience of the Church similar to that in their native lands. Pennsylvania's bishops responded by creating ethnic or national parishes, some (e.g., Scranton's St. Joseph's Slovak Church or Pittsburgh's St. Nicholas Croatian) were the first of their kind in the nation. Religious communities also sprang up to care for particular ethnic communities, such as Daughters of St. Cyril and Methodius in 1909.

A unique challenge was presented by the appearance in Pennsylvania of Eastern Rite Greek Catholics, almost half a million of whom had arrived in the United States by the beginning of the First World War. As early as 1884, a group of Ukrainians had settled in the town of Shenandoah, and had requested a pastor from the archbishop of Lviv. A priest, Fr. Ivan Volansky, arrived to care for the community, celebrating the first liturgy on December 19 of that same year. Other parishes were established in Freeland (1886) and Hazelton (1887). As occurred elsewhere in America when Greek and Latin rite Catholics came into contact, however, Volansky encourtered opposition because of his marital status (he had a wife) and unfamiliar ways. Within five years, at the urging of the American hierarchy, he was recalled to the Ukraine.

In 1890, at the request of many U.S. bishops, Rome restricted Eastern rite clergy in the United States to celibates or widowers, and placed them under the jurisdiction of Latin rite bishops. A bishop for the Greek Catholics, Soter Ortynsky, was not appointed until 1907, and it would not be until 1914, in the decree Cum episcopo, that Rome would grant him full ordinary jurisdiction and independence from local bishops. Ortynsky based his exarchy (diocese) in Philadelphia. Following his death in 1916, and responding to tensions between Greek Catholics from Galicia (Ukrainians) and Greek Catholics from Hungary/Trans-Carpathia (Rusyns), Rome appointed two administrators, one for each nationality. On May 20, 1924, a bishop for each group would be named by the Holy See, Constantine Bohachevsky for the Ukrainians, and Basil Takach for the Rusyns. Both were consecrated in Rome in June, Bohachevsky becoming the bishop of Philadelphia (with pastoral charge of all Ukrainians in America), and Takach bishop of Pittsburgh (with pastoral charge of all Byzantine rite Catholics from Transcarpathia, Slovakia, Hungary and Yugoslavia). In 1958 Philadelphia was raised to an archeparchy (with Stamford, CT as a suffragan), while Pittsburgh became a metropolitan see in 1963 (with the addition of Passaic, NJ).

Many Greek Catholics joined the Orthodox church during the decades of their contentious relationship with the Latin rite hierarchy. Similar struggles occurred between the bishops and other ethnic groups, who aggressively, and at times stubbornly, advanced their demands. These cases often resulted in misunderstanding, enmity or worse, as in the case of Polish National Church. In 1897 a group of Polish Catholics in Scranton had completed construction of Sacred Heart Church, and asked Bp. O'Hara for control of the property. When he refused, as required by church law, the congregation of 250 families, led by their priest Fr. Francis Hodur, built a new church and refused to hand over the title to the property. O'Hara threatened sanctions, and the assembly was ultimately excommunicated, their appeals to Rome having been rejected. Hodur and many of his flock remained adamant, though, ultimately joining with similarly disaffected Polish Catholics from other dioceses to form a synod and electing Hodur as bishop of the Polish National Catholic Church, which would distinguish itself from the Roman church by its use of Polish in the liturgy, a married clergy, and lay control church property.

The growth of secret societies, often formed to protect the rights of unskilled laborers working in Pennsylvania's heavy industries, presented another challenge to the Church. Terence Powderly, a Catholic from Scranton, was the charismatic leader (1879–93) of the Knights of Labor, America's first national union. Unlike the Molly Maguires, miners who used violence in their struggle against the mine owners and operators, Powderly sought arbitration through peaceful means, and worked to conform the rituals and practices of the Knights to Catholic teaching. Working tirelessly in close consultation with Bp. O'Hara, Abp. Ryan, and others in the hierarchy, Powderly managed to receive the approval of the Catholic church for his organization in 1887, though sadly by then its decline had already begun.

Prominent Pennsylvania Catholics. Catholics in Pennsylvania were known not only as laborers in heavy industry, however. Priests such as the historian Peter Guilday (1884–1947) and Herman Heuser (1851–1932), editor of the American Ecclesiastical Review, were acclaimed in academic circles, while Maurice Francis Egan (1852–1924) and Agnes Repplier (1855–1950) were popular literary figures. In the field of medicine, Catholics could point with pride to such physicians as John M. Keating (1852–1893), a respected pediatrician, the surgeon Ernest Leplace (1861–1924), and Lawrence F. Flick (1856–1938) a leader in the fight against tuberculosis. Nicola A. Montani (1880–1948), the choirmaster of St. John the Evangelist Church in Philadelphia, was known to Catholics across the country for his work in restoring Gregorian chant to the liturgy, and his authoritative St. Gregory Hymnal (1920). Charles G. Fenwick (1880–1973), an expert in International Law, was a dedicated activist in the Peace Movement of the 1920s and 1930s.

The Church in Pennsylvania benefitted as well from the material success that had rewarded the labors of a number of her members. Nicholas and Genevieve Garvan Brady gave large sums of money to Catholic causes, and built an impressive novitiate for the Maryland province of the Society of Jesus at Wernersville. Charles Michael Schawb, who rose from being an engineer at Andrew Carnegie's Braddock works to become the president of US Steel, donated lavishly to Church-related institutions, including the Franciscan College of Loretto. Other Pennsylvania Catholic millionaires included Martin Maloney and John J. Sullivan, all of whom used their wealth to support the Church, and who were honored in turn with various awards and papal knighthoods.

One outstanding heiress who desired no earthly honors was Katherine DREXEL (1858–1955). Born into a wealthy banking family, which moved in the upper echelons of Philadelphia society, Katherine nonetheless was taught from her youth the importance of sharing the family's wealth with those in need (every week she joined her mother and sisters in distributing food and clothes to the poor who came to their house). As a young woman, Katherine sought to respond to the call of the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore to aid missions to America's African-Americans and Native Americans, but was taken aback somewhat when Pope Leo XIII suggested she found her own congregation of missionary religious. That, however, is precisely what she did, and after a novitiate with the Sisters of Mercy in Pittsburgh, she established the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament for Indians and Colored People in 1891. Traveling across the country with her sisters, she used her substantial fortune (12 million dollars by the time of her death) to build churches and schools, and even a college (Xavier University in New Orleans). St. Katherine Drexel was beatified in 1988, and canonized in 2000.

The generosity of the Catholic laity made possible the founding of numerous colleges across the state, most notably those for women, run by ever-expanding orders of religious sisters, including: Marywood (1915) and College Misericordia (1924) in Scranton diocese; Villa Maria (1925) and Mercyhurst (1926) in Erie; Seton Hill (1918) and Mount Mercy [Carlow] (1929) in Pittsburgh; and Immaculata (1920), Rosemont (1921) and Chestnut Hill (1924) in the Archdiocese of Philadelphia.

The Twentieth Century. Philadelphia was fortunate to have a steady hand guiding it for much of the first half of the twentieth century. Dennis DOUGHTERY, "God's Bricklayer," would serve as archbishop from 1918 to 1951, working with zeal and determination to found 112 parishes, 145 schools, four colleges and 12 hospitals, while personally ordaining over 2,000 priests to serve the needs of his ever-growing archdiocese. A formal and demanding administrator, Dougherty was named the state's first member of the college of cardinals in 1921.

Erie also was blessed with an ordinary of considerable longevity in John Mark Gannon, who served the diocese as bishop from 1920 to 1966. Known for his vigorous work in founding parishes, schools and even a college, Gannon was honored with the personal title of archbishop in 1953.

Pittsburgh also had a long-lived bishop in Hugh Boyle, whose tenure lasted from 1921 to 1950. As the city continued to grow, so did the diocese, which soon ranked as the eighth largest in the country. Most of this growth was the result of Pittsburgh's booming steel industry, which did not always receive praise from the Church for its labor practices. In fact, Pittsburgh priests and members of the Catholic Radical Alliance such as George Barry O'Toole, Carl Hensler and Charles Owen Rice were vocal critics of management and enthusiastic supporters of organized labor. The message of the Alliance helped to form Catholics such as Philip Murray, Patrick Fagan and John Kane, who all would become prominent union organizers in the steel and mining industry.

The diocese's postwar population growth soon provided an argument for a further division, and in May of 1951 four of Pittsburgh's eastern counties were united to form the Diocese of Greensburg. The first bishop was Hugh L. Lamb of the Archdiocese of Philadelphia, which itself was facing a rapidly expanding population. In 1961 Bp. Joseph McShea, who was serving as the administrator in the wake of the death of Cardinal O'Hara (1952–60), recommended to Rome that a new diocese be erected in either Bethlehem or Allentown. He was pleased by Rome's announcement on February 15 that a new Diocese of Allentown was to be created, but surprised by the news that he would be going there as the first bishop. The same momentous day saw the appointment of John KROL as the new archbishop of Philadelphia. Krol would serve as an undersecretary at the Second Vatican Council, as well as a member of the Central Coordinating Committee. The newly appointed bishop of Pittsburgh, John J. WRIGHT, would also distinguish himself as a member of the council's preparatory commission and worked to draft the celebrated chapter on the laity in the Constitution on the Church (Lumen gentium). Wright would subsequently be named a cardinal and Prefect of the Congregation of the Clergy in Rome. Krol too was named a cardinal in 1967, and remained in Philadelphia to guide the post-Vatican II church with a firmness and authority till his retirement in 1988, when he was succeeded by Anthony Bevilacqua, the bishop of Pittsburgh.

A number of Catholic dioceses in Pennsylvania faced the challenge of shrinking numbers of clergy as the century drew to a close, and many looked to the reorganization of their parishes as a means not only of ensuring a more effective distribution of priests, but also of revitalizing the faith. Pittsburgh, under the guidance of Bp. Donald Wuerl, took the lead in this initiative.

Serving as a helpful resource to the Church in Pennsylvania in the years following the Second Vatican Council was the Pennsylvania Catholic Conference. Formed in 1960 (as the Pennsylvania Catholic Welfare Committee) with constitutional lawyer William Bentley Ball as general counsel and executive director, the Conference was established to, in its own words "give witness to spiritual values in public affairs and . . . provide an agency for corporate Catholic service to the statewide community." It formulates policy positions, speaks on behalf of the Church before state government, and works to educate the public about Catholic teaching on morality, education, and human and civil rights. Most notable, perhaps, was the conference's advocacy on behalf of the Pennsylvania Abortion Control Act of 1989, which led to the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Planned Parenthood v. Casey. After the Act went into effect in 1994, the number of abortions statewide fell 14 percent. The conference was also an outspoken champion of civil rights and seasonal farm workers rights, educational services for nonpublic school students, and the right of nonprofit charitable organizations to tax-exempt status. Figures provided by the conference placed the Catholic population at the beginning of the 21st century at approximately 3.5 million, or 29.7 percent of all Pennsylvanians. The dioceses of Philadelphia and Pittsburgh had the highest concentration of Catholics, at 38 percent, Harrisburg the lowest, at 12 percent.

Bibliography: Penn. Hist. and Museum Com., Bibliography of Pennsylvania, comp. N. B. WILKINSON, ed. S. K. STEVENS and D. H. KANT (2d ed. Harrisburg 1957). W. F. DUNAWAY, A History of Pennsylvania (2d ed. Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1948). J. F. CONNELLY, The History of the Archdiocese of Philadelphia (Philadelphia 1976). L. G. FINK, Old Jesuit Trails in Penn's Forest (New York 1936). F. A. GLENN, Shepherds of the Faith, 1843–1993: A Brief History of the Bishops of the Catholic Diocese of Pittsburgh (Pittsburgh 1993). J. P. GALLAGHER, A Century of History: The Diocese of Scranton, 1868–1968 (Scranton 1968).

[J. C. LINCK]

PENTATEUCHAL STUDIES

This survey of Pentateuchal scholarship comprises two parts. The first part examines the course of critical Pentateuchal scholarship from its beginnings down to 1965, while the second part extends the survey to the following decades.

Part I: Origins until 1965

The first five books of the Bible (Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy) are traditionally ascribed to Moses. The word Pentateuch, from the Greek πεντάτευχος, meaning the "five-scroll" work, was applied to these five books by the Jews of Alexandria at least from the beginning of the Christian Era. More commonly among the Jews, as already in the OT (2 Chr 23.18; Neh 8.1–2), these books were known as the Torah (Heb. tôrâ) or Law (of Moses). The Jewish title aptly designates much of the content; almost half of the material is legal in form. But the narrative portions give the theological meaning to the whole. It describes the religious history of mankind in very general terms from creation to Abraham (Gn 1–11), then in greater detail the patriarchal story (Gn 12–50) and the events surrounding the Exodus from Egypt and the wandering in the desert (Exodus through Deuteronomy). It is in the context of these latter events, in particular of the Sinai revelation, that the legal portion is conceived as an emergent of history. The Law, including all the religious, ethical, civil, and rubrical legislation in Israel, expressed Yahweh's will for His chosen people and accordingly was always related to the covenant of Sinai regardless of its actual date of formulation. Israel's concept of history had determined her concept of law. This article discusses the history of the origin and development of the Pentateuch as determined by Biblical scholarship. The following general outline will be followed: history of early scholarly opinion up to and including the Wellhausen documentary hypothesis; the four documents or traditions of the Pentateuch as determined by the classical documentary hypothesis; reactions to and refinement of the documentary hypothesis; summary and modern trends; Catholic opinion; Moses and the Pentateuch. (See GENESIS, BOOK OF; EXODUS, BOOK OF; LEVITICUS, BOOK OF; NUMBERS, BOOK OF; DEUTERONOMY, BOOK OF.)

Early Scholarly Opinion. Jewish and the earliest Christian tradition agreed in ascribing the Pentateuch as a whole to MOSES. As we shall see later in detail, this was in accord with a concept of authorship different from that of the modern Western world. By the time a more strict concept of the author's inviolability had been developed, in the Christian Era, the attribution to Moses was already traditional.

Richard Simon and Jean Astruc. In 1678 an Oratorian priest, Richard SIMON, published a critical work on the text, versions, and commentaries of the OT. On its appearance he was assailed by Catholics and Protestants alike, and his works were put on the Index. Despite this, he is called, and rightly so, the father of Biblical criticism, because of his pioneer work. It was 75 years later (1753) that another Catholic author, Jean ASTRUC, a French physician, published a literary analysis of Genesis in which he suggested the presence of two sources. By separating those sections using the name YAHWEH for God from those using ELOHIM he was able to reconstruct two fairly coherent stories. This was the beginning of the documentary hypothesis.

Early History of Documentary Hypothesis. Catholic reaction to Astruc's work was again not favorable. As a result, further development of the theory was undertaken mainly by German Protestant scholars. J. Eichhorn (1780) is generally credited with having systematized the investigation by drawing up certain principles of Biblical criticism and so assuring its development as a proper science. Moreover, he carried the analysis made by Astruc through to Leviticus and so made the problem of the origin of the Pentateuch an acute one for Biblical scholarship of the early 19th century. K. Ilgen (1798), Eichhorn's successor at the University of Jena, probed further into the Elohim sections and discovered two distinct sources there. Thus three documents had now become at least tentatively detached.

A paper scroll from the Pentateuch, written to Aaron's son, Eleazar. (© Christel Gerstenberg/CORBIS)

The documentary hypothesis received its first major setback in the early part of the 19th century when a new theory, the fragment hypothesis, was championed. The seemingly complex tradition history of the material provided the basis for the theory. A. GEDDES (1792), an English Catholic priest, ascribed most of the material to the Solomonic era and considered it a conflation of a number of disparate documents. J. Vater (1802) further dissected the material and set the terminal date for its composition in the exilic period. W. M. L. De Wette (1805) concentrated on historical criticism and came to a similar conclusion, showing that much of the legislation could not have been made in the earlier period. But his outstanding contribution was the connection of Deuteronomy with the "book of the Law" found in the temple at the time of the reform of Josiah (2 Kgs 22.3–20; De Wette considered this "finding" a pious fraud on the part of the reformers); this had special interest for the next phase in the development of this hypothesis.

Further Development of Documentary Hypothesis. A partial return to this earlier theory was witnessed by G. H. A. Ewald's (1831) acceptance of a First Elohist (the modern "Priestly Code," abbreviated P; see PRIESTLY WRITERS, PENTATEUCHAL), a YAHWIST (abbreviated J after its German form), a redactor of these two, and De Wette's Deuteronomy (abbreviated D; see DEUTERONOMISTS). Though Ewald later changed to a supplement hypothesis, positing an Elohist (the modern P) Grundschrift to which passages from other sources were added, his work prepared the way for the further development of the documentary hypothesis. This perfecting of the theory was heralded by H. Hupfeld (1853), who showed clearly the existence in Genesis of two Elohist (the modern P and ELOHIST, abbreviated E) and the one Yahwistic (J) sources. Like his predecessors, Hupfeld considered P as basic and the oldest of all. Then E. Riehm (1854) proposed De Wette's Deuteronomy as the fourth distinct source in the Pentateuch. Thus the three sources in Genesis, first distinguished by Ilgen and then more clearly by Hupfeld, were proposed, together with Deuteronomy, as accounting for all the material for the Pentateuch. The task of substantiating this theory, revising some details, and filling in others remained.

The major revision was the reversing of the relative chronology of the sources. What had been considered the earliest of the Elohist documents was, mainly through the work of E. G. E. Reuss (1833) and H. Graf (1866), considered to be postexilic in composition, at least with regard to its legislative sections. The latter scholar then followed W. Kusters (1868) in extending this conclusion to the narrative section of P. Thus, what once had been considered the oldest document of the Pentateuch was recognized as the youngest. The acceptance of this by the scholarly and influential A. Kuenen (1870) assured its acceptance by many others. The relative chronology as still held today had become more or less fixed.

Work of Julius Wellhausen. The great work of synthesizing all these conclusions and presenting them in a convincing way to the scholarly world was performed by J. WELLHAUSEN. The year 1876 marked the appearance of the first of his articles, which were later put in book form. This became the basis for almost all liberal critical work on the Pentateuch after that time. While he showed more clearly than any before him that the Yahwist was the oldest and the Priestly Code the youngest of the documents, he also provided an absolute dating for each, assigning the Yahwist to the 9th, the Elohist to the 8th, Deuteronomy to the 7th, and the Priestly source to the 5th centuries B.C. The determination was made on the basis of religious, social, and legal concepts supposedly found in the documents themselves.

Wellhausen made brilliant and full use of the science of literary criticism as developed at that time, a fact that helped in the wide diffusion of the documentary hypothesis as proposed by him. His writings, however, were partially vitiated by certain historical and philosophical preconceptions. He was completely skeptical about the ability to reconstruct any part of Israel's history that predated the beginnings of the monarchy. While some historical facts underlie the accounts of the Exodus, wandering, and conquest, they cannot be reconstructed, he argued, into any kind of organic story. And anything before that is, of course, pure legend or myth.

The lack of sufficient documentation for the history of the surrounding nations made it difficult also for Wellhausen, and others, to place Israel's history within its proper context. Hence they could more readily apply to OT literature criteria based on an evolutionary concept of religion. All the forms of religious belief, from animism to monotheism, were found to be expressed, and their expressions were dated in accord with the developing science of comparative religion. This science, as practiced by the majority at that time, left no room for the possibility of divine intervention and hence precluded any development of religion within Israel different than that among the pagan peoples.

Wellhausen's aprioristic reconstruction of Israel's religious history cast a shadow over the brilliance of his insights and presentation and was chiefly responsible for the reaction he met on the part of the more conservative scholars of his day, a reaction that has since been justified. The documentary hypothesis itself, however, in its determination of the four sources with their "constants" has retained the allegiance of the great part of the scholarly world, with the modifications to be noted.

Classical Four-Documentary Hypothesis. The characteristics of the documents or traditions, along with the principal passages attributed to them, determined by the process described above and as reflecting the generally accepted position, will be briefly presented.

Yahwist (J). This document was first recognized by its use, from the very beginning of its history, of the name "Yahweh" for God, although the name was revealed only in the time of Moses (Ex 3.15). The narrative is colorful and interesting; the painting of scenes and the delineation of characters are superb. The dialogues especially are presented with consummate skill and artistry (e.g., Gn 24). It is through the stories that J presents its religious convictions, which are quite profound and which reveal deep psychological insights into the human condition. The origin of evil, man's propensity to sin, the relationship between civilization and morality, the relevance of the apparently least significant events to the divine plan, and the grand sweep of that plan are all subjected to J's analysis. The underlying conviction is that God has intervened in Israel's history and manifested His loving concern for this people. In presenting this God, J makes bold use of anthropomorphisms, which easily distinguish it from E and P. God forms man, breathes into his nostrils, plants a garden, talks to man, walks in the garden, makes garments (Gn 2-3), is pleased (Gn 4.4), regrets, and is grieved (Gn 6.6), etc. Wellhausen and others placed the composition of J in the kingdom of Judah in the latter part of the 9th century B.C. There were to be later refinements of this, but the southern provenance during the monarchical period would continue to be maintained. Following are the principal passages attributed to J: Gn 2.4b-4.26; 6.1-8.22 (mixed with P); 9.18-27; 10.1-32 (mixed with P); 11.1-9; 12.1-13.19; 15.1-16.16; 18.1-19.38; 21.1-21 (mixed with P); 24.1-67; 25.1-26.35 (mixed with P); 27.1-45; 28.10-32.22 (mixed with E); 32.23-33.20; 34.1-31 (mixed with E); 37.1-36 (mixed with E); 38.1-39.23; 41.1-43.34 (mixed with E); 44.1-34; 45.1-48.22 (mixed with E and P); 49.1-33; 50.1-26 (mixed with E and P); Ex 1-2 (mixed with E and P); 3-5 (mixed with E); 7-11 (mixed with E and P); 14 (mixed with P); 32-34 (mixed with E); Nm 10.29-11.34 (mixed with E); 13.17b-16.35 (mixed with E and P); 20.1-24.25 (mixed with E and P); 32.1-42 (mixed with E and P). There is no universal agreement on all the attributions, and at times the conflation with other sources is such as to preclude a precise analysis.

Elohist (E). This document's careful use of the name "Elohim" for God in the pre-Sinai material is already an indication of its more exact theology. While the style is not as colorful as J's, it is more consciously didactic. E can be recognized by a preference for "Horeb" to "Sinai," for "Amorrites" to "Canaanites," etc. Its interest in the covenant is reflected in an emphasis on the obligations flowing from it (e.g., Gn 35.2). Similarly its morality is stricter than that of J (cf. Gn 20 with J's 26.6-11). Prophetic influence has probably colored E's description of Moses as charged with a prophetic office (Ex 3), and has determined its anachronistic identification of Abraham as a prophet (Gn 20.7). Finally, it avoids the bolder anthropomorphisms of J and presents God as speaking to man in dreams, from clouds or in the midst of fire, or through the medium of an angel. While the early critics debated the relative date of E and J, they all agreed in placing the composition of E in the northern kingdom, and the majority concurred on the time as the middle of the 8th century B.C. E was conflated with J, to J's advantage, in Judah some time after the fall of the northern kingdom. Following are the principal passages attributed to E: Gn 20.1-18; 21.22-22.24; 40.1-23; Ex 17-18; 20 (mixed with P); 21-24. See also the many passages conflated with J.

Deuteronomist (D). Early in the 19th century De Wette had already pointed out the special character of the book of Deuteronomy and argued that it had been composed as the basis of a reform program during the reign of Josiah. Riehm (1854) confirmed its special character. All critics accepted their principal conclusions. Within the Pentateuch D is confined, for the most part, to the book of Deuteronomy, whence its name, and is easily distinguished by its marked literary style. In vocabulary it makes frequent use of expressions such as "choose," "the good land," "with all your heart and with all your soul," "make his name to dwell," "a mighty hand and outstretched arm," etc. These and its manner of presenting its material in the form of Mosaic addresses that are strongly hortatory and moving readily characterize it as a separate document. Its theology, too, is marked, stressing the law as a loving response to the God who chose Israel out of love and who made His name to dwell in the one Temple of Jerusalem where pure worship can alone be offered. While the critics did not endorse De Wette's thesis that Deuteronomy was composed and then put in the Temple to be "found," they did agree that it was a document of the 7th century B.C. that bore some relation to Josiah's reform. As will be seen, later scholars recognized D in other books of the OT. As already stated, within the Pentateuch D is confined to the book of Deuteronomy except for a few brief passages in Exodus (Ex 12.24-27; 13.3-6; 15.26).

Priestly Document (P). The identification of P was relatively easy once E had been separated from it and recognized as a separate document. P's vocabulary tends to the abstract. Stereotyped expressions abound. The style is pedantic and redundant. P makes much use of genealogies, gives minute descriptions especially of ritual matters, and delights in chronological precision. Its presentation of history is liturgical in character, which accounts for the systematic and precise way in which the events are said to occur. As might be expected, God is presented in P less anthropomorphically than in any of the other documents. God "appears," although it is not always indicated how, and speaks to man. The conversation is usually one-sided; man's attitude is one of respectful listening (Gn 17). P is responsible for most of the legal collections in their canonical form, and this interest is reflected in the whole composition. The critics agreed on a postexilic date for the document and that it was the work of priests attempting to restore liturgical worship in Jerusalem. Following are the principal passages attributed to P: Gn 1.1-2.4a; 5; 17; 23; 27.46-28.9; Ex 6; 16; 25-31; 35-40; the whole of Leviticus; Nm 1.1-10.28; 13.1-17a; 17-19; 25-31; 33-36. See also the passages conflated with J and E. Toward the end of the 7th century B.C., D had been joined to the conflated JE. The addition of P at some time in the 5th century B.C. would have completed the work, and the Pentateuch would have existed in its canonical form.

Reactions to the Documentary Hypothesis. In the succeeding years the Wellhausen hypothesis was subjected to many attacks that resulted in extensive revisions. While the outer shell of the theory, represented by the fourfold siglum of JEDP, has held up well and still claims the majority of supporters, the inner construction has been radically changed. The change was brought about by work in three major directions. The first and second of these were a more intense application of the principles of literary criticism and of a form-critical analysis. It is not always easy to distinguish the two, since the latter was a natural development of the former. Scholarly research led to the recognition that much of the material of the "documents" that had been the object of the classical literary criticism had developed from originally independent units. The attempt to recognize these units and trace their development through their varying "life situations" (Sitze im Leben) until they reached the final stage represented in the canonical books was an approach initiated principally by H. GUNKEL (1910) in his commentary on Genesis. The approach was called form criticism (see FORM CRITICISM, BIBLICAL). Thus, single stories or legal units were examined to see what could have given rise to them in early history. They would then be studied in relation to the complex cycle of stories or code of laws of which they became a part. Since the form critics agree that the fixing of these cycles or codes had already taken place to some extent within the period of oral tradition, this would throw considerable light on the role of the authors of the classical "documents" or "sources." These, whether individuals or schools, would not have been authors in the modern sense of the word. Rather would they be editors of already developed material, but with no little freedom to rearrange, conflate, revise, and, in general, cause the material to reflect their theology. It is clear that such an approach demands a much more extensive knowledge of history, in particular of the social, political, and religious institutions, and of situations that would have occasioned the origin or influenced the shaping of the unit in question. Such a knowledge was not possible in the 19th century and only in the 20th century was it becoming such that the form-critical approach could be used with some degree of confidence.

Literary Criticism. As indicated, there was first a more intense literary analysis that showed that the four documents were much more complex than generally suspected. Thus J was seen to reveal several strata in some of its stories. In the face of this, several scholars have posited a fifth source, called L (Laienschrift or Lay Document) by O. Eissfeldt, K (Kenite Document) by J. Morgenstern and S (South, or Seir Document) by R. Pfeiffer. These proposals, though differing in detail from one another, indicated that the documents in the Pentateuch had developed over a long period of time. This was strengthened by A. Welch's tracing of D to an earlier and northern origin, by G. von Rad's division of P into two strands, and by many other attempts along the same lines.

At times, the results of literary criticism took on absurd proportions that did much to discredit the science in the eyes of those who were suspicious of its conclusions from the outset. Thus B. Baentsch (1900) divided Leviticus into seven distinct P sources and worked with primary and secondary redactors of secondary documents, etc. A mere listing of his sigla indicated the extreme complexity of his analysis. On the other hand, there were a few who thought that the number of independent documents should be reduced. P. Volz, followed in part by W. Rudolph (1933), denied the independent existence of E and P, at least in Genesis. S. Mowinckel (1930) similarly expressed doubts about E, describing it rather as the product of several centuries of oral tradition. Later (1963) he dated J, which for him is equivalent to what others consider JE, to the 8th century B.C. but considered historiography to have begun in Israel with the Solomon saga, to which was later added a David story that included events dealing with Saul and Samuel.

These revisions, based principally on literary analysis, have not all been accepted. But they have influenced greatly the conception of the development of the sources within Israel. It is fairly commonly agreed that behind J and E there does stand some common source (e.g., M. Noth's Grundschrift) that would account for the many parallels in the two documents. Many, too, are more confident of being able to identify, at least partially, an older stratum (such as Eissfeldt's L) in J that would go back to the 10th or 9th century B.C. and a later stratum that shows the influence of the prophetic movement. In general it would be agreed that historiography began in Juda in the 10th or 9th century B.C. with J or one of its strata, that it continued in both kingdoms with succeeding editions of both J and E, and that the two were conflated in Juda after 721 B.C.

As for D, indication has already been made of the proposal that the development of its theology and of the resulting legal code in Deuteronomy took place over a long period of time, deriving its motivating force from the emphases of the Prophets, especially from Hosea in the North and Jeremiah in the South. More significant has been the identification of the vocabulary, style, and theology of the book of Deuteronomy with certain editorial passages in the historical books from Joshua to 2 Kings. It was concluded that these books form a long history based on material that had been passed on down over the years in both literary and oral form and had been given its definitive shape by the addition of editorial reflections and revisions in the appropriate places. Since these reflections and revisions echo the spirit of the Book of Deuteronomy, the entire history was called by M. Noth (1943) the "Deuteronomistic History" and the fifth book of the Pentateuch was considered its introduction. While this D history was probably not written at any one time, its final form must have been given in the exilic period, since it records the Babylonian Exile and seemingly looks forward to some kind of restoration (2 Kgs 25.27–30). Later in the postexilic period, perhaps around the time of Ezra, the historical books were detached from the introductory Deuteronomy, which was now attached to the first four books to form the Pentateuch. This now isolated corpus, with its emphasis on legal content, thus became the Torah, or Law, for later Judaism.

The development of P is similarly complex. All accept the final formulation of P in the postexilic period but admit also that it contains much older material. This is true especially of the legal sections that formed distinct codes in an earlier period. The Holiness Code (or H = Lv 17–26) was early recognized by A. Klostermann (1877) as forming a distinct unity that would later have been incorporated into the Priestly Code. The date of H has been placed as early as the period of the Judges (E. Robertson) and as late as the end of the kingdom of Judah (H. Cazelles, Von Rad). All would agree that it underwent a long development in accord with the same historical processes that helped to shape the other documents, that the Priestly Code of which it was made a part had similarly been developing over the centuries, and that the final redaction of the entire P did not take place until the postexilic period. (See HOLINESS, LAW OF.)

Form Criticism. Out of all this work there has come in recent years a more fruitful attempt to apply the principles of form criticism to the Pentateuchal material. Von Rad (1938), for example, isolated what he regarded as the ancient creeds of Israel (e.g., Dt 26.5–9; Jos 24.2–13) and considered them, or some form of them, to be the most primitive expression of SALVATION HISTORY (HEILSGESCHICHTE). The Sitz im Leben for the creed would have been a cultic celebration at the ancient shrine of Galgal (Gilgal). A separate tradition preserved the account of the Sinai covenant and its resulting covenant code; the covenant festival celebrated at SHECHEM would have been the original Sitz im Leben for this tradition. With this as his basis, Von Rad then gradually builds up to the profoundly constitutive work of J and to the gradual development of the Pentateuch along the classical lines.

Analyzing in greater detail the tradition history of the material, Noth (1948), who had already detached the great Deuteronomistic history (1943), attempted to identify and trace the basic themes of the Tetrateuchal history (the first four books of the Pentateuch). He found five of these themes, each of which he attempted to trace to its ultimate origin and then through its later development. While the extreme complexity of the task precluded a final solution to the whole problem, and while many of Noth's reconstructions were influenced by a regard for an underlying historical character more skeptical than generally held by scholars, he provided many insights that later scholars gratefully used in their own reconstructions. In both Von Rad's and Noth's studies we can detect a clear appreciation of the constitutive value of the classical documents or traditions, at least to the extent that they are seen to provide a basic theology to the heterogeneous material of which they are composed. This represents a reaction to the fragmentation of documents resulting from an overly critical literary analysis.

Besides the richer insights into the constitutive traditions, form criticism has already provided much deeper understanding of the individual elements of the traditions. Thus, working on a distinction proposed by A. Jirku (1927) and A. Jepsen (1927) between the type of laws proper to Israel and those common to the ancient Near East, A. Alt (1934) distinguished the former as apodictic and the latter as casuistic (see LAW, ANCIENT NEAR-EASTERN). G. Mendenhall (1954) and others then proceeded to show the close relationship between the Covenant Code (Ex 21–23), the oldest body of laws in the Pentateuch and the center of the attention of the other scholars, and the Hittite treaties, in which the concept of overlord-vassal relationship is presented in the same form as in the ancient Israelite Code. All this helped to give a more profound appreciation of the covenant itself and of its role in Israel's life.

In appraising the work of the form critics it can be said that they have confirmed the antiquity of much of the material of the Pentateuch, thrown greater light on the developing theologies within Israel and shown the need for much further study before any hypothesis can be accepted with all its details. The excesses in this field have not vitiated the value of the approach.

Uppsala School. A third approach that had its influence on Pentateuchal criticism was that of the so-called Uppsala School. Scandinavian scholars, such as Mowinckel (1930), J. Pedersen (1931), H. Nyberg (1935), and I. Engnell (1945), contributed in varying ways to the prestige of this school. In general there was a great stress put on the predominance and fidelity of oral tradition in ancient history and a consequent disregard for any supposed written documents in the early period. Even after the material had been consigned to writing (and Engnell would more readily accept an early written form for some of the legal matter), oral tradition was considered to have had its influence on the written documents. Such an approach would clearly be detrimental to the documentary hypothesis. In fact, Engnell, one of the most enthusiastic supporters of the approach, rejected the four classical documents and replaced them with a P Work, a symbol standing for the heterogeneous material in the Tetrateuch (Genesis through Numbers), and a D Work, Noth's Deuteronomistic history. In both cases the emphasis is not on fixed literary traditions that can be precisely marked off as J, E, P, or D, but on a long history of oral tradition that was finally edited in the postexilic period in two principal works.

The vehemence with which these proposals were made, including occasional violent attacks on scholars of an opposite view, did not hasten their acceptance. Today most scholars would agree that the Uppsala School has not paid sufficient attention to the importance of writing, and consequently of written documents, in the early period of Israel's history. On the other hand, the emphasis on oral tradition and especially on its fidelity in transmission was a welcome stress, since it contributed to a healthier respect for the antiquity of much of the material of the Pentateuch. The school has also shown a reluctance to accept variant readings of the Masoretic Text, a reluctance that has frequently been justified on the basis of further studies.

Summary and Mid-20th Century. What has been stated above already affords some idea of the present situation with regard to the origin of the Pentateuch. Almost all would agree to the extreme complexity of the picture. Israel's Torah represented both a literary and a religious heritage that was kept ever alive by its adaptation to the constantly changing historical scene. The adaptation necessitated the addition of new material and the revision of the old. Today the emphasis is being placed on the successive stages of this adaptation and the development of the theological concepts. When the attempt is marked by sound methodological principles, the results are positive and valuable.

Throughout the long and occasionally heated history of the documentary hypothesis the question of historicity was constantly being raised. As we have seen, in the earlier stages of the theory's history grave doubts were cast on much of the historical character of the Pentateuch, in particular on the Genesis narratives. This situation has changed, owing in great part to the results of archeological work. The ruins themselves and, above all, the literature of other ancient peoples have provided an authentic background against which the Pentateuchal narratives can be seen. The patriarchal stories, for example, have been convincingly shown, in a series of articles by R. de Vaux (1946–49), to reflect the first half of the 2nd millennium B.C. This does not mean that these contain history in the modern sense; not even the later stories of the Exodus, wandering, and conquest do that. But it does mean that they contain a sufficient historical basis to support the weight of the credal interpretation that is their principal object. Once the concern for that historical basis can be satisfied, at least to the extent that is possible, greater emphasis can be correctly placed on the theological development.

Pentateuchal criticism in the future, then, will most probably concentrate on three general aspects of this theological development. The first aspect is that of the individual units and their meaning before their introduction to a particular cycle of tradition. The second is that of the principal cycles of tradition, such as the Yahwist, Elohist, and others. Some of the richest theological meaning was given to the material at this stage, and for that reason this aspect will continue to be studied for further insights. The third is that of the canonical Pentateuch. At times this is neglected by the scholars in their interest in the earlier stages. But it is in this aspect that the Pentateuch was made a part of the Christian Scriptures and that it has influenced the greater part of Christian history. It is likely that the canonical Pentateuch will be the object of the most intensive work in the future.

Catholic Opinion. Despite the fact that Catholics were among the first to cast doubts on the literary unity of the Pentateuch, the history of Pentateuchal criticism has been marked chiefly by Catholic opposition to its results. The opposition was to a great extent justified by the failure of the critics to distinguish properly between literary and historical criticism. The conclusions of the former were bound to have an undue influence on the latter. Also, the rationalistic philosophy of the 19th century vitiated much of the work of the liberal scholars and made all their conclusions suspect to the more conservative Christians. Toward the end of the 19th century a few Catholic scholars, notably, M. J. LAGRANGE, made an attempt to extract what was scientifically valid in the work of the critics. Lagrange, for example, accepted the distinction of the four sources, admitting that D and especially P represented, for the most part, post-Mosaic development. This Catholic beginning in literary criticism was again hampered by the flowering of the Modernist crisis early in the present century. MODERNISM accepted the most radical of the conclusions of the literary critics, including the evolutionary concept of Israel's religion. Catholic scholarship was placed once again on the defensive, and Pentateuchal criticism, as exercised by Catholics, was practically brought to a standstill. In a four-part decree, issued June 27, 1906, the PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL COMMISSION stated that, although the use of sources and of secretaries by Moses could be admitted along with the introduction of some post-Mosaic modifications, the arguments of the critics were not at all convincing. Despite the guarded wording of the decree, it had a strong negative influence on Catholic scholarship in the area for many years.

Between the two world wars some attempts were made by Catholic scholars to adopt the most certain of the conclusions of the literary critics and combine them with the theory of substantial Mosaic authenticity. In non-Catholic circles, where scholarship had already done much to correct some of the exaggerations of the Wellhausen school and had forged ahead in new areas, these attempts were little noted. But they played their part in paving the way for the encyclical DIVINO AFFLANTE SPIRITU in 1943, which opened the door to Catholic scholarship in all areas of Biblical study. This remarkable document must be read in the light of all the controversy that preceded; only then will its vigorous championing of scientific investigation in all fields be fully appreciated. The Pentateuchal question is not brought up ex professo in this encyclical. Rather, Pius XII is dealing with the general principles that must underlie all Biblical work. But these principles are such that their application would necessarily involve a broader interpretation of the Pentateuch.

This conclusion is confirmed by a letter, sent on Jan. 16, 1948, by the secretary of the Pontifical Biblical Commission to Cardinal Suhard of Paris. It was in response to a query regarding the liberty of Catholic scholars to investigate the two problems of Pentateuchal sources and the historicity of the first 11 chapters of Genesis. The secretary first states that, in the light of the encyclical of Pius XII, the earlier decree of the Commission can be interpreted as not opposing "further and truly scientific examination of these problems." For this reason the Commission did not wish to promulgate a new decree at the time. Going into more detail, it has this to say about the origin of the Pentateuch: "There is no one today who doubts the existence of these sources or refuses to admit a progressive development of the Mosaic Laws due to social and religious conditions of later times. . . . Therefore, we invite Catholic scholars to study these problems, without prepossession, in the light of sound criticism and of the findings of other sciences connected with the subject matter." Attention should be called here to the complete objectivity of scholarly approach urged by the Commission in this letter. It is in marked contrast to the historically conditioned defensive attitude of the earlier decree.

The incentive given to Catholic scholars by the encyclical of Pius XII and again by the letter to Cardinal Su-hard produced its fruits. The most recent studies in Pentateuchal criticism by Catholic scholars will, as a result, show few differences from those of respected non-Catholic scholars, and most of the differences would not be on the confessional level. Among the modern Catholic studies that reflect this new attitude mention can be made particularly of the commentaries on Genesis where the acceptance of the classical sources (more commonly called "traditions" by Catholics to indicate their long historical development) is presumed. J. CHAINE (1948), H. Junker (1949), De Vaux (1951), A. Clamer (1953) and B. Vawter (1956) are among those who accept them or develop their own reconstruction of the complex problem.

Moses and the Pentateuch. With regard to Mosaic authenticity a more subtle approach, but one more in keeping with the primitive concepts of authorship, is taken. Lagrange had long ago (1897) remarked that the modern concept of the inviolability of the author, with its repugnance to successive and extensive redactions of material over a long period of time, is a development of the Christian Era. It was not shared by the ancient Near East or by Israel. For them authorship was seemingly determined more by the one who provided the initial and pervading spirit of the work than by the one who oversaw its final redaction. This is evidenced, for example, in the tradition of the Davidic authorship of the Psalms and, in a much more remarkable way, in the completely pseudonymous attribution of Ecclesiastes and Canticle of Canticles to Solomon. Moses' historical role in the events of the Exodus, of Sinai and of the wandering, a role which must be accepted if only to explain the unity that is found in the Pentateuchal traditions, provided the basis for the literary role, which flowed from it and was conditioned by it. Because Moses, therefore, is at the heart of the Pentateuchal history and theology, Israel had no hesitation in attributing the entire literary work to him.

See Also: BOOK OF THE COVENANT; COMMANDMENTS, TEN; COVENANT (IN THE BIBLE); LAW, MOSAIC; PATRIARCHS, BIBLICAL; PRIMEVAL AGE IN THE BIBLE; SINAI, MOUNT.

Bibliography: J. COPPENS, The Old Testament and the Critics, tr. E. A. RYAN and E. W. TRIBBE (Paterson 1942). R. H. PFEIFFER, Introduction to the Old Testament (rev. ed. New York 1948). C. R. NORTH, "Pentateuchal Criticism," The Old Testament and Modern Study, ed. H. H. ROWLEY (Oxford 1951). H. F. HAHN, Old Testament in Modern Research (Philadelphia 1954). H. J. KRAUS, Geschichte der historiach-kritischen Erforschung des Alten Testaments (Neukirchen 1956). F. ROBERTI and A. TRICOT, Guide to the Bible, tr. E. P. ARBEZ and M. P. MCGUIRE, 2 v. (Tournai-New York 1951-55; v. 1 rev. and enl. 1960) 1:157-282. D. N. FREEDMAN, The Interpreters' Dictionary of the Bible, 4 v., ed. G. A. BUTTRICK (Nashville 1962) 3:711-727. J. BRIGHT, "Modern Study of Old Testament Literature," The Bible and the Ancient Near East, ed.

G. E. WRIGHT (Garden City, N.Y. 1961). H. CAZELLES, Dictionnaire de la Bible, supp. ed. L. PIROT et al. (Paris 1928) 7:687–767. A. SUELZER, The Pentateuch: A Study in Salvation History (New York 1964).

[E. H. MALY/C. T. BEGG]

Part II: From 1965 to the Present

The older scholarship on Pentateuchal studies up to 1965 was overwhelmingly diachronic in focus, i.e., it was concerned to get behind the present complex of books Genesis through Deuteronomy to the earlier materials underlying it. In this enterprise, the formative stage which received particular attention was that of the “documents” or “sources” held to extend over one or more of our existing Pentateuchal books. Such sources, it was believed, could be reconstructed on the basis of indications offered by the present Pentateuch, e.g., duplications of content, terminological variations, differences of anthropology, theology, and presupposed background, etc.

More specifically, for the books Genesis-Numbers (the “Tetrateuch”), scholars reckoned with three long-established sources, namely, the Yahwist (J), dated c. 950 B.C., the Elohist (E) of c. 800–750 B.C., and the Priestly (P) deriving from the Exilic/post-Exilic period. A fourth source, the Deuteronomic, from c. 700–650 B.C., was seen as comprising an earlier form of the Book of Deuteronomy and as having stronger links with the following books (Joshua-Kings) (cf. M. Noth’s 1943 theory of the “Deuteronomic History”). In the decade beginning 1964, scholars like H. W. Wolff, W. Brueggemann, and P. E. Eliis strove to identify a distinctive “kerygma” for the various sources, reflective of the particular moment in Israel’s history from which they emanated.

Given the above, this article explains the evolution of Pentateuchal studies over the last quarter of this century by first surveying diachronically-oriented scholarship of the most recent period and then touching upon the newer synchronic approaches where the focus is not on hypothetical earlier forms of the Pentateuch, but rather on the complex (and/or its component parts) in its actual existent shape.

Diachronic Approaches. Especially since about 1976, the “three-source model” for the origin of the Pentateuch/Tetrateuch (the special case of the “Deuteronomic source” will be left largely out of account here), as cited above, has become the object of intense controversy within diachronic Pentateuchal scholarship itself. It seems possible to divide participants in the controversy into three main groups: those who uphold the one-time independent existence of all three of the traditional sources, authors denying that any of the three sources (as traditionally understood) ever existed separately, and scholars ready to accept one or two but not all three of the classical sources. Each of these positions will now be considered in turn.

Maintenance of the Three Source Theory. In view of the controversy currently surrounding the theory of sources, it is important to note, at the outset, that the theory has not lacked weighty advocates throughout the period under discussion. Among these may be mentioned: W. Resenhöfft (1974), P. Weimar (1977, 1985), E. Otto (1977), H. Seebass (1977, 1978, 1983), R. Smend (1978), H. Vorländer (1978), R. E. Clements (1979), E. Zenger (1980, 1982), R. E. Friedman (1981, 1987), W. H. Schmidt (1982, 1984), L. Schmidt (1983, 1986), L. Rupert (1985) and F. Kohata (1986). All these authors attempt, both negatively and positively, to counter the arguments against the existence of the various sources advanced by scholars of other persuasions. At the same time, the group under consideration is markedly heterogeneous in many respects.

The scholar who most clearly goes his own way with regard to the others is Resenhöfft. For him, each of the three sources extends into the Book of Kings. In addition, Resenhöfft takes source division further than any previous critic; e.g., he partitions the “P chapter” Genesis 17 among his three sources. By contrast, the other scholars listed tend to minimize the content at least of J and E, ascribing much material earlier authors attributed to one or other of these documents rather to later redactors, R^{JE}, R^D and R^P (this tendency is especially marked in the works of Zenger and Weimar).

Authors in this group also diverge regarding the date and extent of the three sources. Friedman, e.g., assigns P to the reign of Hezekiah as compared with the traditional Exilic/post-Exilic dating advocated by the others. Vorländer, for his part, dates both J and E to the Exilic period. Similarly, Friedman finds J’s conclusion in Nm 25.5, whereas Weimar, after earlier identifying Nm 14.9 as the last extant text of the source, has more recently proposed that J’s final occurrence is in Ex 14.30. Again, Smend is unsure whether the compilation of J took place already in Solomon’s time or only towards the end of the royal period. Thus even among contemporary “documentarians” significant differences do exist.

Rejection of the Three Sources. There are recent diachronic scholars who deny that J, E, and P ever existed as independent, free-standing documents. Positively, these authors espouse what in the history of scholarship has been called a “supplementary hypothesis.” In this conception, the Pentateuch originated, not via a combination of originally separate sources, but by the repeated reworkings/expansion of a “foundational document” (or documents). Advocates of this approach claim for it the advantage of being a more “economical” account of the Pentateuch’s formation in which one no longer has to reckon with a combiner of J and E (R^{JE}), etc.

Differentiations are also in order within this group. The variety existing within the contemporary supplementary hypothesis is perhaps best illustrated by a summary presentation of the more specific conceptions of several of its leading representatives.

1) S. Tengström (1976, 1982) traces the Pentateuch (Hexateuch) back to a very early (11th century B.C.) “foundational narrative” comprising material now found in Genesis 11.27–Joshua 24, which related how the confederation of the 12 tribes came into possession of its land. This document is not to be identified with either J or E; it contains material normally assigned to both of these sources. Subsequently, the basic narrative underwent reworkings by assorted Deuteronomistic and Priestly redactors.

2) The views of J. Vermeulen (1981, 1986) are much more reminiscent of the standard documentary hypothesis. Vermeulen recognizes distinctive bodies of Yahwistic, Elohist, and Priestly material present throughout the Tetrateuch and assigns these a content and a date largely along traditional source critical lines. For him, however, the Pentateuch came into existence by a process in which a Solomonic Yahwistic stratum (itself incorporating discrete materials from the reign of David) was reworked first by an Elohist and then by a whole series of Deuteronomistic and Priestly redactors.

3) J. van Seters (1975) advocates the thesis of a late (Exilic, post-Deuteronomistic) Yahwistic history extending from Genesis to Joshua 24. This work took up existing “pre-Yahwistic” and Elohist material and was itself subject to a Priestly redaction. H. H. Schmid (1976, 1981) and N. E. Wagner (1977) put forward similar views.

4) R. Rendtorff (1977, 1983) and his pupil E. Blum (1984) maintain, at opposite extremes from Tengström, that a continuous narrative extending from creation to the death of Moses came into existence only quite late, thanks to Deuteronomistic and Priestly redactors working in the Exilic and post-Exilic periods. Up until that time the various thematic blocks recognizable in the present Pentateuch, i.e., the primeval and ancestral histories, the complexes concerning Exodus, Sinai, and the desert wanderings, had circulated and developed independently. Thus for them one cannot speak of any continuous Yahwistic and Elohist strands. A somewhat comparable conception is advocated by C. Houtman (1980). He holds that the books Genesis, Exodus-Numbers, and Deuteronomy each had a distinctive pre-history before finally being assembled by a Deuteronomistic redactor into a complex encompassing Genesis through Kings (the “Hennateuch”).

5) The contemporary tendency to discard the classical documents reaches its culmination in the work of R. N. Whybray (1987). After an extended critique of the presuppositions and criteria operative in the identification of both “sources” and longer redactional strata in the Pentateuch, Whybray advances an “alternative approach” regarding the origin of the Pentateuch. Briefly his suggestion is that the Pentateuch be seen as the work of a single author writing in the sixth century B.C. who had available to him, as far as narrative material is concerned, little more than scattered items of tradition which he arranged and embellished with considerable creativity in a way reminiscent of his near-contemporary, the Greek historian Herodotus. For Whybray, this author should not be identified with any particular theological or literary current, that is to say, the Deuteronomistic or the Priestly; like Herodotus he would deliberately have varied his mode of presentation over the course of his work.

Compromise Positions. There remain a large group of diachronically minded scholars whose views on the formation of the Pentateuch (Tetrateuch) fall somewhere between those of the “documentarians” and the “supplementarists.” C. Westermann (1981) and A. H. J. Gunneweg (1985), for example, admit both a J and a P source (as well as the traditional dates for these), while viewing the Elohist material as intended from the start as a supplement to J. Conversely, F. M. Cross (1973) accepts distinct J and E sources, even though he denies that “P” ever existed independently.

Three other recent authors to be mentioned here can be categorized basically as “supplementarists” except as regards the P material. H.-C. Schmitt (1980, 1985) suggests that “proto-Yahwistic” materials going back to the Solomonic period were, during the Exile, worked over by an Elohist redactor whose composition was, in turn, supplemented by a post-Exilic “late-Yahwist” (cf. van Seters). P, however, did originate as a distinct document.

M. Rose (1981) also thinks in terms of a late Yahwistic body of material which utilized pre-existing “Elohist” matter. More specifically, Rose holds that J was written in dependence on the Deuteronomistic history and was intended to stand together with it as its corrective introduction. For him too P constitutes a formerly free-standing document. E. Cortese (1983, 1986), unlike Schmitt and Rose, admits the existence of a continuous early J stratum (cf. Vermeulen). Subsequently, this underwent a large-scale supplementation by a Yahwistic redactor to whom Cortese likewise attributes the material normally ascribed to E. Corresponding to these early and late J strands are Cortese's source P which was reworked by a later Priestly redactor. Finally, under this heading may also be mentioned O. Kaiser (1984) who while advocating Exilic/post-Exilic dates for all three bodies of material J, E, and P, leaves it undecided whether these sigla are to be understood as representing "sources" or redactional strands.

Synchronic Approaches. As in Biblical studies in general Pentateuchal scholarship of the last two decades has witnessed a spectacular emergence of synchronic approaches in which the text in its currently extant form becomes the center of interest. Negatively, this development reflects the frustration felt by many faced with the hypothetical and conflicting character of diachronic scholarship's results. More positively, it bespeaks the impact on contemporary Biblical studies from the side of such disciplines as "Orientalistics," literary theory, and theology. Against this background, mention may be made of several representative synchronic approaches to the Pentateuch all of which concentrate on unifying features within the material which cut across the sources or redactional strands distinguished by the diachronists.

C. J. Labuschagne (1982, 1986) and C. Schedl (1986) discover recurring numerical patterns throughout, e.g., the divine speeches of the Pentateuch. G. Larsson (1983, 1985) finds a self-consistent chronological/calendrical system undergirding the complex. R. P. Knierim (1985) identifies an overall genre for the present Pentateuch, i.e., a "biography of Moses."

On a more theological level, A. J. H. Clines (1978) ascertains an overarching theme, i.e., the (partial) fulfillment of God's promises governing both the Pentateuch's movement and its ending with Moses dying outside the land. Similarly, B. S. Childs (1979) attempts to uncover the "canonical function" of the Pentateuch in its "canonical shape" for those faith communities which recognize it as their authoritative Scripture.

Finally to be noted are the increasing number of studies which examine a particular segment of the Pentateuch from a synchronic perspective, e.g., G. J. Wenham (1977) on the flood narrative, B. W. Anderson (1978) on the primeval history, J. L. Ska (1986) on Exodus 14 and R. W. L. Moverley (1984) on Exodus 32–34.

All of the above authors explicitly acknowledge that the extant Pentateuch and/or its components have a pre-history which is a legitimate object of study. Indeed, e.g., Childs affirms his acceptance of J and E as distinct sources and of P as partly a source and partly a redactional stratum, while Labuschagne notes that his findings lend support to the supposition of an extensive Deuteronomistic redaction in the Tetrateuch. At the same time, their investigations do, inevitably, serve to shift attention to the remarkable degree of unity (literary, thematic, etc.) which resulted when the Pentateuch was given its present form.

Some scholars would go further, however, claiming that synchronic approaches vitiate the whole notion of the heterogeneity of the materials underlying our Pentateuch. Y. Radday, et al. (1982) claim, for example, on the basis of computer study of word frequency and linguistic patterns in Genesis, that there are no grounds for distinguishing between J and E, just as the linguistic differences between the P and non-P material are explainable in terms of the peculiar subject matter of the former. In a similar vein, I. M. Kikawada and A. Quinn (1985) appeal to the Ancient Near Eastern parallels and to stylistic considerations in upholding the unity of authorship for the primeval history in Genesis 1–11.

Reflections and Prospects. The foregoing account makes clear that contemporary Pentateuchal studies are characterized by diversity and fluidity. This state of affairs, while confusing, does have a positive side. It forces scholars continuously to rethink and refine their positions in view of other ways of explaining the data which are being put forward.

With regard to diachronic approaches to Pentateuchal study, it seems that the long-standing documentary hypothesis will not and should not be abandoned too readily. Respondents to Rendtorff point out the connections existing between the different blocks of material already at the pre-Deuteronomic and pre-P levels: they cite, by way of example, how the account of Abram's "Egyptian interlude" in Gn 12.10–20 foreshadows developments in the Joseph and Exodus narratives. In addition, the analogy of Chronicles in relation to the Deuteronomistic history (or the Gospels of Matthew and Luke in Mark) would suggest that when, in Biblical times, the need was felt for a "revised version" of events that need was met by the production of a new, free-standing document, rather than simply by a corrective reworking of an existing one. Or to put the point differently: the P material's peculiar slant on the Patriarchs' activities emerges far more effectively when that material is taken for and by itself, whereas it is largely neutralized when read in conjunction with the non-P matter, i.e., a "P-redaction" seems like a self-defeating procedure.

The above remarks notwithstanding, it must likewise be recognized that the material of the Pentateuch (Tetrateuch) allows itself to be partitioned among the three sources only to a quite limited degree. This point is widely recognized even by present-day documentarians whose reconstructed sources tend to contain far less material than those of their predecessors (see above). Thus also these authors acknowledge the presence of much redactional material in the Pentateuch—a fact relativizing the opposition between the documentary and supplementary approaches. Future Pentateuchal study needs to investigate more intensively the various redactions the complex has undergone in terms of, e.g., their relations to the sources, dating, and contextual thrusts. Thereby, diachronic scholarship's excessive preoccupation with the stage of the sources will, it may be hoped, receive a needed corrective.

The various synchronistic approaches to the Pentateuch outlined above are long overdue. They hold out the promise for furthering appreciation that the Pentateuch as a finished product makes sense. On the other hand, however, they should not be allowed to become what the Pentateuchal documentary hypothesis was for so long, i.e., the only scholarly "respectable" way of looking at the data. As most synchronists themselves recognize, diachronic investigation of the Pentateuch remains perfectly legitimate. Moreover, it should be kept in mind that the synchronic approaches are not without their own problems of hidden presuppositions, subjectivism, arbitrariness, and defective conceptualization [see, e.g., the critiques of the methods of Labuschagne and Radday by P. R. Davies and D. M. Gunn (1984) and S. L. Portnoy and D. L. Petersen (1984), respectively].

Bibliography: P. E. ELLIS, The Yahwist. The Bible's First Theologian (Collegeville 1968). F. M. CROSS, Canaanite Myth and Hebrew Epic (Cambridge, Mass. 1973). W. RESENHÖFFT, Die Genesis im Wortlaut ihrer drei Quellenschriften (Bern 1974). J. VAN SETERS, Abraham in History and Tradition (New Haven 1975). S. TENGSTRÖM, Die Hexateucherzählung (Lund 1976). Die Toledotformel und die literarische Struktur der priesterlichen Erweiterungsschicht im Pentateuch (Lund 1982). H. H. SCHMID, Der sogenannte Jahwist (Zurich 1976). "Auf der Suche nach neuen Perspektiven für die Pentateuchforschung," Congress Volume Vienna 1980, J. A. EMERTON, ed. (Leiden 1981) 375–394. G. J. WENHAM, "The Coherence of the Flood Narrative," Vetus Testamentum 28 (1977) 336–348. H. SEEBASS, "Zur geistigen Welt des sog. Jahwisten." Biblische Notizen 4 (1977) 39–47; Geschichtliche Zeit und theonome Tradition in der Josephserzählung (Gütersloh 1978); "Num xi, xii und die Hypothese des Jahwisten," Vetus Testamentum 28 (1978) 214–223; "Gerhörten Verheissungen zum ältesten Bestand der Vätererzählungen?" Biblica 64 (1983) 189–210. N. E. WAGNER, "A Response to Professor Rolf Rendtorff," Journal for the Study of the Old Testament 3 (1977) 20–27. E. OTTO, "Stehen wir vor einem Umbruch in der Pentateuchkritik?" Verkündigung und Forschung 22 (1977) 82–97. P. WEIMAR, Untersuchungen zur Redaktionsgeschichte des Pentateuch (Berlin-New York 1977); Die Meerwundererzählung (Wiesbaden 1985). R. RENDTORFF, Das überlieferungsgeschichtliche Problem des Pentateuch (Berlin-New York 1977); The Old Testament: An Introduction, tr. J. BOWDEN (Philadelphia 1983). R. SMEND, Die Entstehung des Alten Testaments (Stuttgart 1978). B. W. ANDERSEN, "From Analysis to Synthesis: the Interpretation of Genesis 1–11," Journal of Biblical Literature 97 (1978) 23–39. H. VORLÄNDER, Die Entstehungszeit des jehowistischen Gesch- ichtswerkes (Bern 1978). D. A. J. CLINES, The Theme of the Pentateuch (Sheffield 1978). R. E. CLEMENTS, "Pentateuchal Problems," Tradition and Interpretation, G. W. ANDERSON, ed. (Oxford 1979) 96–124. B. S. CHILDS, Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture (Philadelphia 1979). C. HOUTMAN, Inleiding in de Pentateuch (Kampen 1980). H.-C. SCHMITT, Die Nichtpriesterliche Josephsgeschichte (Berlin-New York 1980); "Die Hintergründe der 'neuesten Pentateuchkritik' und der literarische Befund der Josephsgeschichte Gen 37–50," Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft 97 (1985) 161–178. E. ZENGER, "Wo steht die Pentateuchforschung heute?" Biblische Zeitschrift 24 (1980) 101–116; "Auf der Suche nach einem Weg aus der Pentateuchkrise," Theologische Revue 78 (1982) 353–362; Israel am Sinai. Analysen und Interpretationen zu Exodus 17–34 (Altenberge 1982). C. WESTERMANN, Genesis 12–36 (Neukirchen-Vluyn 1981). J. VERMEYLEN, "La formation du Pentateuque à la lumière de l'exégèse historico-critique," Revue théologique de Louvain 12 (1981); Le Dieu de la Promesse et le Dieu de l'Alliance (Paris 1986). M. ROSE, Deuteronomist und Jahwist (Zurich 1981). R. E. FRIEDMAN, The Exile and Biblical Narrative (Chico, Calif. 1981); Who Wrote the Bible? (New York 1987). W. BRUEGGEMANN and H. W. WOLFF, The Vitality of the Old Testament Traditions (2nd ed. Atlanta 1982). Y. RADDAY, et al., "Genesis, Wellhausen and the Computer," Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft 94 (1982) 467–481. C. J. LABUSCHAGNE, "Divine Speech Formulas in the Pentateuch," Vetus Testamentum 32 (1982) 268–281; "Neue Wege und Perspektiven in der Pentateuchforschung," Vetus Testamentum 36 (1986) 146–162. W. H. SCHMIDT, "A Theologian of the Solomonic Era? A Plea for the Yahwist," Studies in the Period of David and Solomon, T. ISHIDA, ed. (Tokyo 1982) 55–73; Old Testament Introduction, tr. M. J. O'CONNELL (New York 1984). E. CORTESE, "Il Pentateuco oggi: la teoria documentaria in crisi?" Scuola cattolica III (1983) 79–88; Da Mose a Esdra. I libri storici dell' Antico Israele (Bologna 1985). L. SCHMIDT, "Pentateuch," Altes Testament (Neukirchen-Vluyn 1983) 88–101; Literarische Studien zur Josephsgeschichte (Berlin-New York 1986). A. H. J. GUNNEWEG, "Anmerkungen und Anfragen zur neueren Pentateuchforschung," Theologische Rundschau 48 (1983) 227–253; 50 (1985) 107–131. G. LARSSON, "The Chronology of the Pentateuch: A Comparison of the MT and LXX," Journal of Biblical Literature 102 (1983) 401–409; "The Documentary Hypothesis and the Chronological Structure of the OT," Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft 97 (1985) 316–333. P. R. DAVIES and D. M. GUNN, "Pentateuchal Patterns. An Examination of C. J. Labuschagne's Theory," Vetus Testamentum 34 (1984) 399–406. S. L. PORTNOY and D. L. PETERSEN, "Genesis, Wellhausen and the Computer: A Response," Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft 96 (1984) 421–425. O. KAISER, Einleitung in das Alte Testament (5th ed. Gütersloh 1984). E. BLUM, Die Komposition der Vätergeschichte (Neukirchen-Vluyn 1984). R. W. L. MOBERLY, At the Mountain of God. Story and Theology in Exodus 32–34 (Sheffield 1984). I. M. KIKAWADA and A. QUINN, Before Abraham Was: The Unity of Genesis 1–11 (Nashville 1985). D. A. KNIGHT, "The Pentateuch," The Hebrew Bible and Its Modern Interpreters, D. A. KNIGHT and G. M. TUCKER, eds. (Philadelphia/Chico, Calif. 1985) 262–296. R. P. KNIERIM, "The Composition of the Pentateuch," SBL 1985 Seminar Papers, ed. K. H. RICHARDS, (Atlanta 1985) 395–415. L. RUPPERT, "Pentateuchdiskussion und Joseferzählung," Biblische Zeitschrift 29 (1985) 31–48. C. SCHEDL, Zur Theologie des Alten Testaments (Freiburg 1986). E. E. CARPENTER, "Recent Pentateuchal Studies," Asbury Theological Journal 41 (1986) 19–36. J. L. SKA, Le Passage de la Mer. Etude de la construction, du style et de la symbolique d'Ex 14,1–31 (Rome 1986). F. KOHATA, Jahwist und Priesterschrift in Exodus 3–14 (Berlin-

Basket of fruit gathered for the Jewish feast of Shavuot, or Pentecost. (©Hanan Isachar/CORBIS)

New York 1986). D. J. MCCARTHY, "Twenty-Five Years of Pentateuchal Study," The Biblical Heritage, J. J. COLLINS and J. D. CROSSAN, eds. (Wilmington 1986) 34–57. R. N. WHYBRAY, The Making of the Pentateuch (Sheffield 1987).

[C. T. BEGG]

PENTECOST

The second great annual pilgrim feast of ancient Israel was the Harvest Feast or qāšîr (Ex 23.16) celebrated at the completion of the wheat harvest in Palestine. It was called also the Feast of Weeks and later, the "fiftieth day" or Pentecost, and was primarily an agricultural festival. The celebration of this feast to commemorate the giving of the Covenant at Sinai began only in late Old Testament times.

Origin and Terminology. The custom of presenting the first fruits of the harvest to a god is an ancient one among agricultural peoples. The Hebrews borrowed from the Canaanites, in whose land they settled, a feast of thanksgiving at the end of the harvest of cereal grains, offering to Yahweh the first fruits, two loaves made from the new flour. Originally the date of the feast must have varied according to the condition of the crops (Ex 23.16; 34.22). When the commemoration of the Passover was joined to the Feast of the Unleavened Bread (maššôt) in the Priestly Code, the date for the "feast of the first fruits" (bikkûrîm) was set seven weeks after the maššôt, hence the name "feast of Weeks" (Ex 34.22; Nm 28. 26; Dt 16.10).

Since the time that elapsed between the offering of the first fruits of the barley harvest (on the day after the Sabbath of the maššôt) and the day after the 7th Sabbath was a period of 50 days, the feast was called πεντηκοστή or "fiftieth day" or Pentecost by the later Greek-speaking Jews (2 Mc 12.31–32; Tb 2.1 in Septuagint).

Nature and Rites. Pentecost was a joyful feast, a "thanksgiving day" celebrating the first real harvest of the year. At the Feast of the UNLEAVENED BREAD, the loaves were presented without yeast; on Pentecost the use of leaven was ritually prescribed (Lv 23.17), signifying a sacrifice of the ordinary food of the Palestinian peasant and marking the close of the harvesting of cereal grains. The earliest liturgical calendars used in Israel (in the Elo-histic Code of the Covenant, Ex 23.14–17 and in the Yah-wistic Code, Ex 34.18–23) call the feast of the grain harvest a ḥag, or pilgrimage, the ḥag of the šābu'ôt (weeks). At first the feast would have been kept at the local shrines on a date determined by local crop conditions but with the growing centralization of cult under the monarchy, the celebration became the occasion for a true pilgrimage to the central shrine chosen by Yahweh (Dt 16.11).

The ritual found in the Priestly Code (Lv 23.15–22 and its commentary in Nm 28.26–31) prescribes the offering or "waving" of the newly baked wheat loaves, the sacrifice of seven yearling male lambs, two young bullocks, and one ram (one bullock and two rams in the earlier Lv 23.18) as a holocaust or burnt offering ('ôlâ), cereal offerings of flour and oil (minḥâ) and libations of wine and of blood from the slain animals. A he-goat was slain as a sin offering (ḥattâ't), according to Leviticus 23.19, and two other yearling male lambs were offered for a thanksgiving sacrifice (zebah šelāmîm). The liturgy would normally include also processions, hymns and psalms of praise and thanksgiving, and the offering of gifts. In return the blessing of Yahweh would be bestowed on the pilgrims through the benediction pronounced by the priest.

Date of Pentecost. There was fixed, in Lv 23.11, 15–16, a period of 50 days from "the day after the Sabbath" of the maššôt, counting seven weeks to "the day after the seventh week" on which the Pentecostal feast was to be observed. Later, the Pharisees identified the Sabbath of the Feast of Unleavened Bread with the feast-day itself on the 15th of the 1st month (Nisan) and, computing the 50-day period from the 16th, they celebrated Pentecost of the 6th day of the 3d month. The Boethuseans (a sect of the SADDUCEES), interpreting the Sabbath as the ordinary Sabbath that fell during the week of the maṣṣôṭ between the 15th and 21st day of Nisan, kept Pentecost on the Sunday following the 7th Sabbath. The calendar of the Book of Jubilees numbered the 50 days from the Sabbath after the whole Passover festival, i.e., beginning with the 26th day of Nisan. Consequently, Pentecost always fell on Sunday, the 15th day of the 3d month.

Commemoration of the Giving of the Law. The tendency of Israel to found its cult in its history affected the Feast of Pentecost comparatively late. According to Exodus 19.1 the Hebrews arrived at Sinai in the 3d month after leaving Egypt. When the feasts of the Passover and of Unleavened Bread were combined and fixed in the middle of the 1st month, the following seven-week period until Pentecost would approximate the time between the Exodus and the arrival at Sinai. A feast celebrated by Asa in the 3rd month of the 15th year of his reign to renew the Covenant may have been the Pentecostal feast (2 Chr 15.10–12) but the first unequivocal testimony to the commemoration of the giving of the Law at Pentecost is in the late noncanonical Book of Jubilees. The QUMRAN COMMUNITY, which followed this calendar, celebrated Pentecost as the chief feast of the entire liturgy because of this association with the Covenant. The calendar found in Ez 45.18–25, however, does not mention the feast and the more orthodox Jews after the Exile seem to have considered it a secondary feast. Not until the 2d century A.D. was its connection with the Covenant generally admitted by the rabbis.

Christian Pentecost. The events of the first Christian Pentecost are recounted in Acts of the Apostles 2.1–41. The text is structured as follows: (1) Introductory notice on the gathering together of the Christian community; description of charismatic phenomena: a roar like that of a mighty wind fills the house, and tongues like tongues of flame rest on everyone present. They are filled with the HOLY SPIRIT and begin to “speak in foreign tongues” (verses 1–4). (2) Following an introductory notice on the “devout Jews from every nation under heaven” staying in Jerusalem, there is described the gathering of a crowd, drawn by the sound of the community’s charismatic prayer. Foreign visitors hear God praised in their own native tongues and ask, “What does this men?” Some, however, dismiss the phenomenon with “They are full of new wine” (5–13). (3) The discourse of Peter, which has three parts. Part one (14–21) explains the phenomenon of the community’s prayer: not wine, but the outpouring of the Holy Spirit as promised in the Prophets. Part two (22–36) gives the explanation of how it is that the Spirit has come. And this explanation is the KERYGMA: the recounting of Jesus’ ministry and Passion, the proclamation of His Resurrection and messianic enthronement at the right hand of the Father: “He has poured forth this Spirit which you see and hear.” And all this is in fulfillment of the prophecies of old. Part three (38–40) is spoken in answer to the crowd’s bewildered query, “Brethren, what shall we do?” The answer is, “Repent and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the forgiveness of your sins; and you will receive the gift of the Holy Spirit” (14–40). (4) A concluding notice narrates, “Now they who received his word were baptized, and there were added that day about three thousand souls” (41).

A detail of a retable by J. Cascalls depicting the Apostles at Pentecost. (©Ramon Manent/CORBIS)

The Meaning of Pentecost. The eschatological expectations of the Old Testament and Judaism are supposed by the meaning of Pentecost. According to ancient rabbinical teaching, all the pious and upright in the age of the Patriarchs had been initiated through the Spirit of Yahweh into the whole range of God’s mysteries. But from the time of Israel’s adoration of the golden calf, God had restricted this gift to a chosen circle of Prophets and high priests.

Still later, with the death of the last of the chosen Prophets, the Spirit was altogether denied Israel; God spoke to His people exclusively through “the heavenly voice” and through omens. Only with the coming of the Messiah and the outbreak of eschatological SALVATION would the Spirit reappear. At that privileged moment Israel would be purified of its sins and again become “a people of prophets” (cf. Nm 11.29; Is 59.21; Jl 3.1–5).

In this context it becomes clear why the prophetic figures of John the Baptist and of Jesus had awakened expectations of imminent salvation. But above all the meaning of the Pentecostal event is illuminated. For, at Pentecost salvation is realized in the messianic blessings of “the forgiveness of your sins” (Acts 2.38; cf. 5.31; 10.43; 13.38; 26.18; see also 3.19; 22.16) and “the gift of the Holy Spirit” (Acts 2.38; cf. 1.5; 2.4, 17–18, 33; 4.31; 5.32; 8.15–19; etc.).

These are truly messianic blessings, accorded a community messianic not simply by aspiration but in the full consciousness of an already accomplished messianic event: the enthronement of Jesus at the right hand of God. Jesus made “Lord and Christ” (Acts of the Apostles 2.36) is the final explanation of the Pentecostal gifts (cf. verse 33), and these gifts, in turn, are the consummation of His ministry, death, and RESURRECTION.

Pentecost, then, is a salvific and messianic event, but it is also and par excellence an ecclesial event: (1) In the forgiveness of sins and the outpouring of the Spirit Israel is supremely blessed by its Savior. But these gifts are offered it only on condition of entry into the community of the saved (verses 38–40). For it is precisely this community of believers in Christ that is now revealed as the object and organ of salvation. (2) By the outpouring of the Spirit the messianic community is equipped to accomplish its salvific purpose. The immediate effect of the Spirit’s advent is the joyous proclamation of the magnalia Dei in ecstatic prayer (Acts 2.11; cf. 4.31; 8.17–18; 10.45–46) and in kerygmatic discourse (Acts 2.14–40; cf. 4.8; 5.32). That is, the inner life of the community is created anew, and with Peter’s summons to salvation its apostolic mission is launched. (3) With the gifts of Pentecost the Scriptures find fulfillment: the promise of Israel’s purification and renewal in the Spirit (Is 32.15–20; 44.3; 59.21; Ez 11.19; 36.25–27; 39.29; Jl 3.1–5), the image of eschatological Sion drawing the whole world to salvation (Is 2.2–4; Jer 3.17; Zec 2.14–15), the prophecy of the messianic remnant [see F. Dreyfus, “La Doctrine du reste d’Israël chez le prophète Isaïe,” Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques 39 (1955) 361–68; cf. “the saved” of Septuagint Is 37.31; 45.20 with Acts 2.21, 47]. (4) Finally, it is the Spirit given on Pentecost that guarantees the growth of the new ἐκκλησία (Acts 2.41; cf. 9.31).

Details of the Account. It is probable on the basis of parallels (Acts 1.14; 2.42–47; 4.31–32) that the gathering together described in verse 1 refers to the entire community, not merely to the Twelve, and consequently that the “tongues like flames” rested on each of the 120 (cf.

Acts 1.15), all of whom were inspired to pray “in foreign tongues.”

The explanation of the phrase in verse 4 λαλεῖν ἐτέραις γλώσσαις, “to speak in foreign tongues,” is disputed. Elsewhere in Acts of the Apostles (10.46; 19.6) λαλεῖν γλώσσαις, “to speak in tongues,” refers to glossolalia, the “language” of ecstatic prayer, intelligible only to those to whom the Spirit has given the gift of interpretation. It is likely that this was the original sense of verse 4 (cf. the taunt in verse 13, “They are full of new wine”). But at some stage in the tradition, perhaps at the stage of final redaction, the “tongues” motif was connected, by insertion of the word ἐτέραις, “foreign,” in verse 4, with another and quite distinct theme: salvation made known to all the peoples of the earth (verses 6–11). In connection with “tongues” this theme recalls, perhaps consciously and intentionally, both the confusion of tongues that according to Genesis chapter 11 divided mankind into distinct and hostile peoples, and the rabbinic legend of the preaching of the Law of Sinai to the nations. On the supposition that these allusions are consciously intended, the Pentecostal event is presented as the restoration of mankind’s unity, the reverse of Babel, and as a new Sinai in which the law of the Spirit takes the place of the Mosaic Law. (Pentecost even prior to the Christian era was celebrated as a covenant renewal in commemoration of Sinai.)

The literary background of the list of the nations (verses 9–11) is with some probability to be located in ancient astrological-geographical catalogues [S. Weinstock, “The Geographical Catalogue in Acts 2, 9–11,” Journal of Roman Studies 38 (1948) 43–46], but the theological point of the list is to accent the universalism of salvation in Christ. It is furthermore likely that the list was originally intended, in Luke’s source, to evoke the Isaian theme (Is 2.2–4; 11.10–12; 25.6–8, 10; 42.6; etc.) of the eschatological pilgrimage to Sion, center of the world and source of salvation in the last days [A. Causse, “Le Pèlerinage à Jérusalem à la première Pentecôte,” Revue d’histoire et de philosophie religieuses 20 (1940) 120–41]. This corresponds to the primitive Christian conception of the coming of the nations into salvation as a centripetal movement of all the world to “the holy mountain,” a conception founded on certain images used by Jesus Himself [e.g., Mt 8.11–12; see J. Jeremias, Jesus’ Promise to the Nations, tr. S. H. Hooke (Naperville, Ill. 1958)].

The Pentecostal discourse is of interest on several counts: (1) As elsewhere (e.g., Acts 3.12–16), the proclamation of salvation through the paschal mysteries of Jesus and in particular through His glorification is made to serve an immediate, ad hoc purpose—in this case, to explain the pneumatic phenomena of Pentecost. But the proclamation transcends this purpose. Its ultimate intent is to win Israel over to repentance, belief, and aggregation to the eschatological community (verses 37–41). (2) The speech is argumentative, its central argument being that messianic prophecy is fulfilled in and through Jesus and Him alone. The scriptural loci, here taken from the Psalms, are interpreted as prophetic testimony to His glorification. (The accent on glorification is characteristic. In the schematized discourses of Acts explicit scriptural citations bearing on the Person of Christ are in every instance concerned with His Resurrection and exaltation in glory.) It is noteworthy that the community, in the person of PETER, regards itself not merely as “measured and judged” by the Scriptures, but more profoundly, as their charismatically guaranteed interpreter (cf. QUMRAN COMMUNITY). (3) The Christology of the discourse draws on three motifs: the Davidic Christ (verses 25–31, 33–36), the LORD (verse 21, 36), and the Name (verses 21, 38). The archaic character of certain aspects of this Christology and the lack of interest in the Crucifixion as itself a salvific mystery indicate the text’s relative antiquity.

Lucan Theology. In the specifically Lucan perspective, Pentecost inaugurates a new era in SALVATION HISTORY, defined at its temporal extremes respectively by Jesus’ already accomplished enthronement as Lord and His still future coming as judge. Concern over an imminent PAROUSIA gives way to concentration on the Church’s inner life and apostolic mission. As the Lucan Gospel is conceived in terms of movement from Galilee to Jerusalem, so the dynamic of the early Church’s life and growth as portrayed in Acts is conceived in terms of movement from Jerusalem to Rome. It is the glorified Christ who governs this movement through the Spirit bestowed on Pentecost.

See Also: MISSIONS, DIVINE; SOUL OF THE CHURCH.

Bibliography: W. F. ALBRIGHT, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel (Baltimore 1953). R. DUSSAUD, Les Origines cananéennes du sacrifice israélite (Paris 1921). A. S. HERBERT, Worship in Ancient Israel (Richmond 1959). A. ARENS and N. ADLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:421–23. H. HAAG, ed., Bibel-Lexikon (Einsiedeln 1951–) 1:1324–27. J. A. BRINKMAN, “The Literary Background of the Catalogue of the Nations (Acts 2,9–11),” The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 25 (1963) 418–27. D. M. STANLEY, “The Conception of Salvation in Primitive Christian Preaching,” The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 18 (1956) 231–54.

[B. F. MEYER/J. L. RONAN]

PENTECOST, ICONOGRAPHY OF

The PENTECOST, or Sending of the Holy Spirit, was the last stage in the glorification of Christ, although He was not present. It occurred directly after the Ascension. In early Christian iconography of Pentecost, the 12 Apostles are grouped in a circle around the Virgin Mary (6th century, Gospel Book of Rabbula; Biblioteca Laurenziana, Florence), who appears in the scene probably as a symbol of the Church. Above their heads the Holy Spirit is represented in the form of a dove, from which golden rays of light emanate or tongues of fire dart upon them. The hands of the Apostles are shown making a variety of gestures following the linguistic miracle that has enabled them to go forth and spread the gospel to the four corners of the world.

Pentecost, painting by El Greco. (©Francis G. Mayer/CORBIS)

Although not nearly so common as those with the Virgin, there occur representations of Pentecost with the Apostles alone (11th century, Gradual of Reichenau; Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris). The fire of the Holy Spirit is shown also as a flaming wheel with the Apostles grouped around it (11th century, Book of Pericopes; Munich Library). On occasion, instead of the dove, the hand of God is represented with rays of light coming from the extended fingers. Representations of the 12 Apostles alone, with Peter and Paul at either side of the throne of Christ, a doorway of a church, or an archway with the nations in it, depict the foundation of the Church.

In the typological art of the late Middle Ages (e.g., the Speculum humanae salvationis), the TOWER OF BABEL is shown alongside the miracle of Pentecost. The parallel is based on an early literary and pictorial tradition alluded to in homilies and sacramentary texts of the Feast of Pentecost, in both East and West. The Tower of Babel represented, according to interpretation, a confusion of tongues and the dispersion of the peoples of Earth; at Pentecost, on the contrary, there was a gift of tongues and a regathering through the power of the gospel.

The representation of the “Throne, Gospel Book, and Dove,” called the Etimasia, became an accepted symbol and an important part of Pentecost representations. The Etimasia has been taken to mean the gospel preached by Christ and confirmed by the Holy Spirit; or a Trinitarian symbol in which the “Throne” stands for the Father, the “Gospel Book” for the Son, and the “Dove” for the Holy Spirit. The Russian Orthodox connect the symbol with the seat of the Last Judgment and the “preparation of the Throne” (Hetoimasia tou Thronou) of Christ’s Second Coming.

The Etimasia is in the center of the Pentecost dome mosaic of St. Mark’s, Venice. There is a similar mosaic in the dome of St. Luke in Phocis, Greece. In the Pentecost frescoes of the Cappadocian rock churches the Etimasia comes at the top of the picture; this arrangement has been copied into many illuminated manuscripts.

Frequently, below the group of the Apostles are depicted representatives of the 16 nations (mentioned in the Acts as present in Jerusalem at the time of the descent of the Holy Spirit) who marveled on hearing the Apostles speaking their native tongues. In the dome mosaics in Venice and Phocis, the nations appear between the windows of the drum supporting the dome. In Venice, each nation is represented by a pair of figures, male and female. In later miniatures, to avoid the difficulty of representing 16 nations, an old man symbolizing “Time,” with rolls of the Gospel in his arms, is placed in a central arched doorway. The central doorway occurs in many Pentecost miniatures. In the Syrian miniatures of the Orthodox Convent, St. Mark’s, Jerusalem, the doorway is interpreted as the door of the Cenacle through which Christ passed when He appeared to the Apostles, who testify to His Resurrection. The figure of the Virgin also may occur in the central doorway.

In the Anglo-Saxon MS of the famous Winchester School, the Apostles are seated in two groups but without either the Throne or the Virgin Mary in the center. From the same period, the Gospel Book of St. Paul’s Outside-the-Walls, Rome, shows the Virgin in the center of the design. The Gospel Book from Cologne (now in Brussels, dating from 1250) goes so far as to place St. Peter in the center. In England, however, in the 13th-century St. Alban’s Psalter, the Virgin Mary maintains the central position.

In later centuries Pentecost has been represented by the 12 Apostles surrounding Our Lady. The subject was frequently represented in the 16th and 17th centuries: Tintin (S. Maria della Salute, Venice); Tintoretto (Victoria and Albert Museum, London); El Greco (Prado, Madrid); Zurbarán (Cadiz Museum). The 16 nations are not often referred to, nor are the 120 persons present in the Cenacle given much attention.

Bibliography: G. DE JERPHANION, Les Églises rupestres de Cappadoce, 5 v. (Paris 1925–42) 1:297–376. A. M. GRABAR, La Schéma iconographique de la Pentecôte (Prague 1923). A. FABRE, “L’Iconographie de la Pentecôte et le Portail de Vézelay,” Gazette des beaux-arts (1923). S. SEELIGER, Die Ikonographie des Pfingstwunders (Munich 1956). L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l’art chrétien, 6 v. (Paris 1955–59) 2.2:591–596.

[J. U. MORRIS]

PENTECOSTAL CHURCHES

The Pentecostal churches originated out of the Holiness movement, especially in the wave REVIVALISM that swept through the U.S. during the early decades of the 20th century. They are characterized by a distinctive emphasis on sanctification that includes a conversion process in which an adult makes a decision or has a conversion experience; a cleansing from sin, or justification; a baptism of the Holy Spirit as an instantaneous spiritual transformation separate from and following justification; and, as a specific characteristic, a renewal of the gifts of Pentecost (Acts 2.1–4) consequent to baptism, especially the climactic charismata of glossalalia and faith healing. Many adherents of the Pentecostal movement are found in bodies that do not include the Pentecostal name, such as Elim Missionary Assemblies, International Church of the FOURSQUARE GOSPEL, and the largest of the Pentecostal bodies, the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD.

World interest in the Pentecostal movement stems from the sensational accounts of a prayer meeting held in Los Angeles, Calif., on April 9, 1906, at which an African-American boy began to speak in tongues. Although some Pentecostal churches predate this event, 1906 is regarded as the birth year of the Pentecostal movement. Another source of development has been secession and merger. The Pentecostal Assemblies of the World, organized in 1914 as an interracial body, split in 1924 when the white members withdrew and formed the Pentecostal Church, Inc., which in turn merged with the Pentecostal Assemblies of Jesus Christ in 1945 to form the United Pentecostal Church with its distinctive anti-Trinitarian formulation of doctrine. Other Pentecostal churches that are the result of mergers are the Assemblies of God, the Pentecostal Holiness Church, International Pentecostal Assemblies, and the Pentecostal Fire-Baptized Holiness Church.

Morning Star Pentecostal Church, Petersburg, Virginia. (©TimWright/CORBIS)

The Bible is the sole doctrinal authority, interpreted from a fundamentalist position. In addition, the Scriptures are looked upon as furnishing rules of order and discipline for all conditions of the life of man. Some of the Pentecostal churches accept the Lord's Supper, but allow a free interpretation of its significance. Many practice foot washing as part of the divine ordinances. Faith healing is common.

Good works, as part of the "spirit-filled life" and as a preparation for the coming of the Lord, are urged on all Pentecostals. They include visiting the sick, strengthening the weak, encouraging the fainthearted, and pointing out the way of salvation. The Pentecostal ethos prescribes a strict abstinence from worldly pleasures, obedience to civil laws, the support of the church through tithes, and a complete cleansing of heart and soul from all remaining sin. In addition members are constrained from participating in war, destroying property, or injuring human life.

Worship is informal rather than ritualistic or liturgical, and freedom is encouraged. A large degree of emotionalism often permeates the devotional life of Pentecostals. Favorite themes of preaching include atonement through the blood of Jesus, spiritual baptism, and the second coming.

Government is generally along the lines of congregational polity, although in some instances the organization of the church includes district conferences, annual conferences, and a general conference, all somewhat similar to those of the Methodist system. Missionary work is vigorously carried on at home and in many foreign countries under the guidance of local or denominational missionary boards.

Bibliography: D. GEE, The Pentecostal Movement (London 1941). S. H. FRODSHAM, With Signs Following (rev. ed. Springfield, Mo. 1946). R. M. RIGGS, The Spirit Himself (Springfield, Mo. 1949). S. DURASOFF, The Bright Wind of the Spirit (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1972). W. J. HOLLENWEGER, The Pentecostals (Minneapolis 1972). V. SYNAN, The Holiness-Pentecostal Movement in the United States (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1971). W. W. MENZIES, Anointed to Serve (Springfield, Mo. 1971). F. S. MEAD, S. S. HILL and C. D. ATWOOD, eds., Handbook of Denominations in the United States, 11th ed (Nashville 2001).

[R. MATZERATH]

PENTECOSTALISM

Pentecostalism began as a modern religious movement in 1900 at the Bethel Healing Home in Topeka, Kansas. Its fusion with revivalist forms of piety produced the Holiness Movement and a bewildering number of Protestant Pentecostal churches. More recently Protestant Pentecostalism has manifested growing ecumenical interest and openness. Neo-Pentecostalism is an interdenominational movement involving Christians from almost every existing church communion, including Roman Catholics. One must then distinguish denominational Protestant Pentecostalism from Neo-Pentecostalism.

Protestant Pentecostalism. Protestant Pentecostal piety is Biblical piety. It looks to Scripture as divinely inspired and infallible, and regards the Word of God as superior to reason and conscience, though not contrary to either. Protestant Pentecostals tend to regard every word of Scripture as divinely inspired; and their fundamentalistic tendencies incline them to be suspicious of "modern theology" and "liberal exegesis," which they believe often ignores or distorts the literal sense of Scripture. Such devotion to the inspired Biblical word endows the Pentecostal use of Scripture, in both personal and shared prayer, with ultimate authority and ritual significance. Protestant Pentecostals are more inclined to celebrate God's Word as a personal grace than to reflect on it with academic scholarship.

As a group Protestant Pentecostals hold to orthodox trinitarian theology, although a small group of Unitarian Pentecostals reject the Trinity as scripturally unfounded. As a group, Protestant Pentecostals affirm the two natures of Christ, the virgin birth, and the redemptive atonement effected by the blood of Jesus.

Protestant Pentecostal piety is preoccupied with personal religious conversion. It insists that Jesus has already fulfilled the divine conditions for spiritual regeneration and that the experience of conversion and Spirit baptism are therefore available to all. In the act of conversion, one turns away from sin and receives salvation in Christ. The Spirit baptized are, however, said to receive a "second blessing," subsequent to the grace of conversion. Most Protestant Pentecostals equate Spirit baptism with the reception of the gift of tongues, although some see tongues only as the inauguration of Spirit baptism. This belief is largely grounded in the more fundamental belief that the experience of Spirit baptism described in Acts 2 is normative for all Christians. The theological dissociation of conversion from the reception of the Spirit and the equation of the latter with the gift of tongues are both commonly rejected by theologians of other communions.

Some Protestant Pentecostals distinguish a third stage in the conversion process, that of sanctification. "Third-stage" Pentecostals are, however, divided over the question of the instantaneous or gradual character of sanctification.

Protestant Pentecostals believe that all the Pauline gifts are available to believers today, including tongues, prophecy, healing, and miracles. They practice faith healing and claim both physical cures and the psychic "healing of memories." In their approach to healing there is the tendency to affirm that no sickness, depression, and poverty can be sent by God and that these sufferings are often demonic in origin.

Protestant Pentecostals as a group recognize only two sacraments: baptism and the Lord's Supper. They regard baptism as an external sign of an inner grace that has already been given. Many reject infant baptism, but a significant minority practice it. The Lord's Supper is looked upon as a memorial meal symbolizing the atoning sacrifice of Jesus and expressing the personal faith of the worshipping community. Some Protestant Pentecostals also practice foot washing in obedience to Jesus' command in Jn 13.14, but they are divided as to its obligatory character.

As a group Protestant Pentecostals are ethically conservative. They believe in the Sabbath rest, and some practice tithing. Some are religious pacifists and reject military service. Most are opposed to smoking and alcoholic beverages. Some reject the consumption of pork and ban musical instruments, movies, slang, jesting, swimming, fairs, theaters, make-up, hairwaving, loud clothes, short skirts, etc. These rigoristic tendencies are both a protest against moral laxity and an ascetical bulwark against backsliding.

Protestant Pentecostal piety often has a chiliastic character. It tends to affirm the immanence of the second coming of Jesus. Its other-worldly caste leads it to minimize the importance of political involvement and social reform. Classical Protestant Pentecostalism tends to be suspicious of ecumenicism.

Neo-Pentecostalism. The fusion of Protestant Pentecostal piety with the religious traditions of other main-line churches has given rise to Neo-Pentecostalism. Neo-Pentecostals reflect the doctrinal pluralism of the different communions to which they belong. As a group they are ecumenical in bent, although they derive much of their popular forms of piety from the Protestant Pentecostal tradition.

Whatever their church affiliation, Neo-Pentecostals gather regularly for spontaneous shared prayer. These gatherings are either denominational or ecumenical in tone. In their prayer they are concerned to “focus on the Lord.” This phrase usually implies that the presence of the Lord will become manifest in the activities of the praying community: in the reading of Scripture, in praying and singing in tongues, in prophecy and the interpretation of messages in tongues, in personal witness to graces received, in spontaneous and rote prayers, in hymns, and in healings.

The fusion of Pentecostal forms of piety with that of the more traditional, institutional churches can produce pastoral concern and even apprehension among the hierarchy and “non-Pentecostal” membership. Neo-Pentecostals are most often criticized for the “elitist” and “fundamentalistic” tone of their rhetoric and for their lack of active involvement in social reform.

Catholic Neo-Pentecostalism began as a movement in 1966 at Duesquesne University. It spread throughout the United States and Canada and has taken hold in South America and in Europe. On Nov. 14, 1969, the American bishops gave a cautious and tentative approval to the movement and encouraged prudent priests to provide sacramental and pastoral ministry to charismatic Catholics. Since then it has won a growing acceptance from the hierarchy. In 1973 a meeting of the international leadership of the movement was held in Rome.

Among Catholics, the Neo-Pentecostal movement tends to be referred to as the “Catholic charismatic renewal.” Catholic charismatics as a whole manifest strong devotion to the institutional, sacramental Church and welcome priestly leadership. Most attend Mass in their parishes and are concerned to be accepted by their fellow Catholics. They tend to regard the charismatic renewal as Church renewal and believe that the renewal of charismatic piety was prepared providentially by Vatican Council II, which refocused attention on the Holy Spirit and his gifts.

The Neo-Pentecostal movement is forcing a theological reevaluation within the Catholic community of the gifts and their place in a sacramental, hierarchical tradition. And it is providing many Christians of different communions with a meaningful shared prayer experience.

See Also: PENTECOSTAL CHURCHES.

Bibliography: F. D. BRUNNER, A Theology of the Holy Spirit (London 1971). J. DUNN, Baptism in the Holy Spirit (Naperville, Ill. 1970). W. HOLNWEGER, The Pentecostals: The Charismatic Movement in the Churches (Minneapolis 1972). E. O’CONNOR, CSC, The Pentecostal Movement in the Catholic Church (South Bend 1971). D. L. GELPI, SJ, Pentecostalism: A Theological Viewpoint (New York 1971).

[D. L. GELPI]

PEOPLE OF GOD

Essentially, a segment of the human race, freely selected and set apart by God, the recipient of special divine blessings. Thus God chose ABRAHAM and ISAAC, Patriarchs, promising them the land of Canaan. In return, God made certain demands on His chosen ones, entering into a formal pact, or covenant, with them. [See COVENANT (IN THE BIBLE).] After narrowing down the line of Isaac to the Patriarch JACOB’s descendants (the Israelites), God established the Mosaic covenant with this ethnic group. The elements of both nationality and religious fidelity, then, formed the basis of the Old Testament people of God.

The purification of this chosen nation entailed further selection. Only a remnant of Israel survived the Assyrian and Babylonian captivities. Later, in the second century before Christ, the Syrian persecution took its toll. Second Isaiah, in fact, describes the remnant under the figure of the Servant of Yahweh, whom New Testament writers—especially St. Mark—were to identify with Jesus Christ.

Christ’s choice of the TWELVE Apostles inaugurated the New Covenant envisaged in Jer 31.31–34, and His death on Calvary sealed it in His blood. After His Resurrection the new people of God manifested a striking similarity to the synagogue. Like the qāhāl of old, it was convoked by the proclamation of the word of God, to which was added the breaking of bread (cf. Nehemiah ch. 8; Acts 2.42). Nationality no longer served as a basis for the selection of members. Indeed, a distinctive feature of the New Covenant was the admission of gentiles into the Christian community without discrimination. The people of God, however, did not come together by a spontaneous coalescence, but by apostolic activity as outlined in Christ’s discourse (Mt ch. 10). The Apostles and their successors are the connecting links referred to in Eph 2.20.

In developing the theology of the new chosen people, St. Paul sees them as constituting a living organism that he designates as the Body of Christ. Following the lead of such exegetes as P. Benoit and L. Cerfaux, more and more theologians are adopting a position of physical realism in treating the union between Christ and His members. According to MYSTICI CORPORIS, the terms Church and MYSTICAL BODY are coextensive. The term people of God does not represent a different reality, but rather the same. This New Testament counterpart of Israel will continue to expand until, in Pauline terminology, the pleroma, or fullness, of Christ has been attained.

Mid-twentieth-century exegesis also led to a new emphasis on the use of the term people of God in dogmatic treatises on the Church. In its dogmatic constitution on the Church, Vatican Council II gave it preference over the term Mystical Body. Chapter 2 of the constitution is entitled De populo Dei. Transcending both Old and New Testaments, "people of God" lends itself better to a synthetic approach to the Church. It takes its origin from the raw material from which the community of the redeemed is constructed: those diverse races that have been amalgamated into a single religious unit through the Holy Spirit. The term Mystical Body, on the other hand, suggests the end product: the organism with its charisms and functions sustained by the sacramental bond.

The generic designation of the Church by the term "People of God" suggested also a way in which one could speak of various levels or degrees of "membership," not all of which require full sacramental communion. The council documents envisage Catholics as "incorporate," non-Catholic Christians as "linked" or "joined," and non-Christians as "related" to the Church (Lumen gentium 14–16; Unitatis redintegratio 3). Within the full communion of the Church, the People of God have responded to this title by the assumption of new roles, notably in the Eucharistic celebration: permanent deacons, readers, commentators, and lay ministers of Communion. Team ministries have become commonplace, often including persons of both sexes. Catholic education and communications have witnessed an increase in lay leadership. Lay spirituality, although developing along its own proper lines, has been freed of the "double standard" of perfection which relegated it to a lower level of holiness than that demanded of priests and religious.

Even if Christ and His people are identified in a truly ontological sense, there remains a principle of opposition preventing any pantheistic fusion of divinity and humanity. Creating a wholesome polarity, this ambivalent relationship between Head and members is perhaps best subsumed under the Church's title Spouse of Christ. He is one with His people insofar as they have become apostolic instruments of SALVATION to others; He is other than they to the degree in which they themselves are still in the process of salvation. This consideration brings out clearly the eschatological character of the people of God: only at the end of time will Jesus become totally one with His Spouse, the people of God, the Church.

See Also: CHURCH, ARTICLES ON; KINGDOM OF GOD.

Bibliography: H. STRATHMANN, G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 4:29–57. G. BERTRAM, ibid. 2:362–366. J. SCHARBERT, "Volk (Gottes)," in J. B. BAUER, ed., Bibeltheologisches Wörterbuch, 2 v. (2d ed. Graz 1962) 2:1147–58. P. GRELOT in Vocabulaire de théologie biblique, ed. X. LÉON-DUFOUR (Paris 1962) 815–826. J. HAMER, L'Église est une communion (Paris 1962) ch. 2. A. VONIER, The People of God (London 1937). R. SCHNACKENBURG, God's Rule and Kingdom, tr. J. MURRAY (New York 1963). A. DULLES, Models of the Church (New York 1974).

[M. K. HOPKINS/EDS.]

PEPIN III, KING OF THE FRANKS

First king of the Carolingian dynasty; Mayor of the Palace, 741–751; King, 751–768; b. 714 or 715; d. St-Denis, Sept. 24, 768.

The second son of CHARLES MARTEL by Chrotrude, his first wife, Pepin was educated at the monastery of St-Denis, near Paris. In 737 he was sent to the court of the Lombard king Liutprand (712–744) in Italy. There, Pepin had his hair cut in the Lombard style, was adopted as a son by Liutprand, and returned home, loaded with gifts. The significance of this is unclear. Since Liutprand already had a named successor, his treatment of Pepin did not affect the Lombard throne. In Francia, the Merovingian king Theuderic IV (721–737) had died and not been replaced, so there is a possibility that Charles Martel was cultivating royal connections with the eventual aim of placing his own son on the throne. The most likely explanation is that Charles was using his younger son to confirm an alliance with the Lombards, who were to give assistance against Muslim invaders in 739.

Towards the end of his life, Charles Martel divided Frankish territory between his two sons by Chrotrude. CARLOMAN, the elder, received Austrasia, Alamannia, and Thuringia; while Pepin acquired Neustria, Burgundy, and Provence. At the request of Swanachild, his second wife, Charles also made territorial provision for their son, Grifo, although the details are not now known. On Charles Martel's death in 741, the succession was disturbed, as it had been during his rise, with crises at the heart of the dynasty and rebellions by dukes of the peripheral regions.

Pepin and Carloman acted promptly to assert themselves over other family members. Their sister, Chiltrude, fled to Bavaria and married its duke, Odilo. The two mayors of the palace then moved against their half-brother, Grifo. He was captured at Laon in late 741 or early 742 and imprisoned; his mother was placed in the royal convent at Chelles. Another possible rival, Theudoald, a half-brother of Charles Martel, was killed in unknown circumstances (741).

Pepin and Carloman Establish Their Power. Having secured Francia, Pepin and Carloman campaigned, separately and together, against their enemies on the frontiers of Francia until 746. Like their father, they were able to muster enough supporters and resources to subdue widely dispersed opponents in Alamannia, Aquitaine, Bavaria, and Saxony. The Alamans were punished especially hard by Carloman, whose victory at Canstatt (near Stuttgart) in 746 was followed by mass executions. In the southwest, the Aquitanians were a test for Pepin until 768.

After an interregnum of six years, the brothers re-established a member of the Merovingian family, the traditional ruling dynasty, on the throne of Francia. In his final years as mayor of the palace, Charles Martel had governed without a Merovingian king. His sons extricated a member of the dynasty from a monastery and raised him up as King Childeric III (743–751). Such a restoration might have disarmed opponents by restoring a veneer of legitimacy to the status of the Carolingians, the descendants of Charles Martel. It points to the political vulnerability of the brothers. There is also a possibility, from limited charter evidence, that Carloman may have been the driving force behind Childeric's elevation, suggesting a difference between the brothers as Pepin, alone, was to depose their Merovingian figurehead in 751.

The brothers exerted real power under their Merovingian figurehead until 746 when Carloman chose to retire to monastic life. This was surprising, but there were precedents in Anglo-Saxon kings laying down office and making a pilgrimage to Rome. According to later historiographical tradition, Carloman, having entrusted his son Drogo and his territory to Pepin's care, left for Italy in 747, where he entered the monastery at Monte Cassino and became a monk. Pepin's takeover of Austrasia was resisted by Drogo until his capture and imprisonment in 753.

In the fluid circumstances surrounding Carloman's abdication, another family member challenged Pepin. Grifo, his half-brother, escaped or was released from captivity in 747. He fled first to the Saxons, then to Bavaria. On the death of Duke Odilo, Grifo was able to exploit a claim to power through his sister and succeed him. Pepin defeated the Bavarians in 749, installing his young nephew, Tassilo III, as duke. Grifo was treated generously, being ceded rule over 12 counties at Le Mans in Neustria, but remained irreconcilable to Pepin. He fled to Aquitaine and the protection of Duke Waiofar (744–768), whose family had long resisted Carolingian authority. In 753, after Pepin had demanded his return, Grifo was cornered and killed by Frankish forces while en route for Italy.

Pepin III. (Archive Photos)

Pepin Becomes King. Against this background of continuing unrest within his family and on the peripheral areas of Francia, Pepin took the profoundly significant step of deposing his Merovingian ruler and installing himself as the legitimate king of a new dynasty. In 751, he was elected king of the Franks, anointed, and raised to the throne at Soissons, while King Childeric III was tonsured and returned to a monastery. The sources describing these events are too late in date, too vague, and too partisan in defense of the Carolingians for a clear understanding of Pepin's actions and intentions. The earliest account (the Continuator of the Chronicle of Fredegar) reports that Pepin's emissaries went to Rome to seek approval for his proposed elevation to the throne. Having obtained this, Pepin was “. . . chosen as king by all the Franks, consecrated by the bishops and received the homage of the great men.” In later versions of the mission and its results, unreliable details were added or altered, Pope Zacharias (741–752) becomes Pope Stephen II (III) (752–757), papal approval becomes a papal command, and St. BONIFACE alone is made responsible for anointing Pepin as king. Anointment with consecrated oil was a new element in Frankish ritual practice, which became increasingly important, and, with its biblical connotations, demonstrated the special status of the new king and his line.

Pepin III, 12th-century relief in parish church at Petersburg, near Fulda, Germany.

To justify the change of dynasty, Pepin needed the seal of divine authority which would come from papal approval. In the eighth century the papacy was under constant threat from Lombard kings, especially Liutprand (712–744) and Aistulf (749–756). Its traditional guardian, the Byzantine empire, was unable to give protection because it was distracted by warfare against Arabs and Avars. Relations with Constantinople were also soured by Rome’s opposition to its religious policy of iconoclasm and to Byzantine moves to increase taxation in Italy. In its quest for support, the papacy seems to have approached the Aquitainians (c.721) and Bavarians (743) and, as late as 752, appealed for Byzantine aid.

By the mid-8th century, the Franks were attractive as allies. There was a long tradition of Franco-papal relations, furthered by the work of Anglo-Saxon missionaries, especially Boniface, and reformist church councils who increased contact between the Franks and Rome. Papal overtures in 739 to Charles Martel for an alliance failed, as Lombard support against Muslims was evidently held to be more to Frankish advantage. In 751 Pope Zacharias’s need for an ally against Lombard encroachment coincided with Pepin’s need for a higher authority to sanction his deposition of the Merovingians. Curiously, there is no mention of these events in the Liber pontificalis, with its contemporary 8th-century lives of the popes. The promotion of Pepin was ultimately made possible by the power, prestige, and wealth that had been accumulated by his family over the past two generations. He was elevated to the throne by the Franks and anointed by their bishops in events that were endorsed, rather than commanded, by the papacy.

Further Lombard aggression in Italy tightened Franco-papal ties and produced more tangible results for the papacy. The Byzantine empire was unable to halt the advance of King Aistulf, who, by 752, had overrun the exarchate of Ravenna and now threatened the duchy of Rome. Early in 753, Pope STEPHEN II (III) (752–757) sent an appeal to Pepin, who dispatched a diplomatic mission to investigate the situation. After the failure of a mediated settlement with Aistulf at Pavia, Pope Stephen crossed the Alps to Ponthion, where he was greeted by Pepin in an elaborate piece of public theatre. In response to the request for aid, Pepin promised the restitution of papal territories, including the Byzantine exarchate of Ravenna. Despite some reluctance shown by the annual assembly of the Franks in 754, Pepin sent an unsuccessful embassy to Aistulf, demanding the return of occupied lands. Aistulf’s shrewd response was to call Pepin’s brother, Carloman, out of his monastic retirement and send him to Francia in the hope of blocking aid for the papacy. Pepin’s reaction is unknown. Carloman failed in his mission, being promptly relegated to a Frankish monastery where he died, apparently of natural causes, in 755.

At St. Denis in July of 754, Pope Stephen anointed Pepin as king (again), along with his wife, Bertrada, and their sons, Charles (Charlemagne) and Carloman. Once more, the Carolingians had been legitimized as the true rulers of the Frankish kingdom. Pepin and his sons were awarded the title “Patrician of the Romans”, probably indicating some form of protectorate over Rome. The ceremonies deepened the ties between the papacy and the Carolingians. Future kings of the Franks were to be chosen only from Pepin’s family, while the Franks would defend papal interests, with prayers being offered in the Roman liturgy for the CAROLINGIAN DYNASTY.

In 755 and 756, Pepin carried out two successful campaigns of limited scale against the Lombards. Aistulf was eventually forced to surrender the disputed regions. An optimistic appeal by Byzantine ambassadors for the return of former imperial lands (the exarchate of Ravenna) was rejected by Pepin, who bestowed on the papacy the lands that had been surrendered by the Lombards. Despite appeals by Pope PAUL I (757–767) for help against the threats of the Lombard king, DESIDERIUS (757–774), Pepin carried out no further campaigns in Italy during the rest of his reign. He was anxious to avoid a possible Byzantine-Lombard alliance while facing persistent problems with Aquitaine, especially, and Saxony. The Frankish involvement with the papacy and the Lombard kingdom was to have important consequences in the reign of Pepin’s son, CHARLEMAGNE.

Pepin’s Significance. The traditional view of Pepin as king is that he was a reformer and defender of ecclesiastical interests whose work was developed by Charlemagne. During the seventh century, powerful local families had taken control of bishoprics with their resources, extending their authority over independent churches and monasteries. Control over ecclesiastical appointments enabled noble families to exploit the church’s resources. Charles Martel was singled out, unfairly, in the mid-9th century, for secularization of church property. Modern research recognizes Pepin’s patronage of reform, but now emphasizes his determined use of the church to attain political objectives.

The stern criticisms of the Frankish church’s education, discipline, and organization made by Boniface (675–754), the great Anglo-Saxon missionary, may well have been distorted by his personal experiences in the mission field from the time of Charles Martel. Through church councils, Carloman (Concilium Germanicum, 742 or 743; Les Estinnes, 744) and Pepin (Soissons, 744) attempted to address the problems. Carloman, especially, was a patron of Boniface. On Carloman’s retirement in 747, Boniface no longer seems to have been involved at the heart of Frankish church life. Under Pepin, CHRODEGANG OF METZ became the most prominent bishop in the Frankish kingdom. He revived the church councils (Ver, 755; Verberie, 756; Compiègne, 757; Attigny, 760–762; Gentilly; 767) which seem to have lapsed after Carloman’s withdrawal from public life, and continued Boniface’s reform program. Above all, he aligned the Frankish church with Roman liturgical practice.

Pepin’s encouragement of reform within the church did not exclude his right to exploit its wealth for economic or political reasons. He systematically weakened the great families with aristocratic bishops by taking away their land and substituting royal rather than aristocratic rule over monasteries. After Boniface’s death (754), Pepin turned his foundation at Fulda and others in its circle into a royal monastery. In recently converted or newly conquered areas, monasteries under royal control were a cornerstone of Frankish and, especially, Carolingian power. As a result, Pepin’s reforming zeal was to his own advantage, as well as those of the church and the kingdom. The combination of royal influence over the church, the drive for reform and contact with the papacy was to be important under Pepin’s successors.

Following the bloodless coup d’état of 751, there is an essential continuity between Pepin’s activities as mayor of the palace and those as king. He continued to campaign to assert control over the kingdom’s peripheral regions, such as in Saxony (753, 758). Here, effective Frankish conquest was checked militarily by the decentralized nature of Saxon society and culturally by the stubborn resistance of the region’s inhabitants to Christian missionaries. Aquitaine, especially, resisted Carolingian rule and preoccupied Pepin throughout his reign. In the disturbed period after the death of Charles Martel, Pepin and Carloman had campaigned there in 742 to curb Duke Hunoald, the son of Eudo. Grifo, Pepin’s irreplaceable half-brother, took up residence at the court of Hunoald’s son, Duke Waiofar, until 753. To end Aquitaine’s independence, Pepin needed to win over the loyalty of the nobles and to establish control over the church. With one exception there were annual campaigns in Aquitaine between 759 and 768. This pressure brought about the murder of Waiofar by his own followers, which signaled the effective end of the war and Aquitanian independence.

During his final campaign in Aquitaine, Pepin fell ill and returned north to the royal monastery of St. Denis, where, c. 754, he had begun the construction of a new church. He died there on Sept. 24, 768, and was buried, like his father, in the ancient pantheon of the Merovingian kings. Shortly before his death, Pepin divided the Frankish kingdom between his two sons, Charles (768–814) and Carloman (768–771), who had been designated as heirs and anointed by Pope Stephen in 754. Relations between the brothers were uneasy until the death of Carloman in 771, but there was no succession crisis for the Carolingian dynasty.

Bibliography: P. FOURACRE, “Frankish Gaul to 814” in New Cambridge Medieval History, v. 2 (Cambridge 1995). R. MCKIT-

St. Jean-Gabriel Perboyre.

TERICK, The Frankish Kingdom under the Carolingians (London and New York 1983). T. F. X. NOBLE, The Republic of St. Peter: The Birth of the Papal Republic (Philadelphia 1984). M. ROUCHE, L'Aquitaine des Wisigoths aux Arabes (Paris 1979). J. M. WALLACE-HADRILL, The Frankish Church (Oxford 1985). I. N. WOOD, The Merovingian Kingdoms (London and New York 1994).

[J. WREGLESWORTH]

PERBOYRE, JEAN-GABRIEL, ST.

Martyr, priest of the Congregation of the Mission of Saint Vincent de Paul; b. Le Puech (Lot), Mongesty (diocese of Cahors), France, Jan. 6, 1802; d. Wuchangfu (near Hu-pei), CHINA, Sept. 11, 1840.

The eldest of eight children (five of whom became Vincentians) of the farmers, Pierre and Marie Rigal Perboyre, Jean-Gabriel attended minor seminary with his brother Louis at Montauban, founded by their uncle Jacques Perboyre, a Vincentian who had survived the French Revolution. In 1818 Jean-Gabriel became the first French Vincentian seminarian since the revolution. He studied theology in Paris, then accepted an appointment as professor at Montdidier College (1823), and was ordained in 1826.

After working as a teacher, spiritual director, and in other capacities in various Vincentian seminaries and training centers in France, he went to east central China (1835) to replace his brother, Fr. Louis, who had died en route. In the missions of Hunan and Hu-pei Provinces, he acquired a familiarity with the Chinese language and dedicated himself especially to instructing abandoned children. When persecution broke out, he was arrested (Sept. 16, 1839) at Cha-yüan-kou for entering China illegally to spread Christianity. Imprisoned at Wuchangfu, he was interrogated many times by mandarins and by the viceroy and tortured in a vain effort to make him reveal the hiding places of other priests. After eight months' imprisonment he was strangled to death Chinese-style (on a cross) on Ou-tch'ang (Red Mountain), and was buried in the nearby cemetery in Wuchangfu close to the remains of his confrere and fellow martyr, Bl. François Clet.

He was beatified Nov. 10, 1889, the first of the Chinese martyrs to receive the honors of the altar. On June 2, 1996, Pope John Paul II canonized Perboyre, the first saint of China, Patron of the VINCENTIAN missionaries.

Feast: Sept. 11 (since 1969).

Bibliography: Life of the Bl. Servant of God, the Heroic Martyr, John Gabriel Perboyre . . ., tr. C. FEILDING (New Orleans 1894). L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 23 (1996): 1–2, 5, 12. J.L. BAUDOT and L.CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints . . . avec l'histoire des fêtes, 9: 252–255. A. CHATELET, Jean Gabriel Perboyre, Martyr (Paris 1943). L. CHIEROTTI, Il beato Gian Gabriele Perboyre: Lo strangolarono ad una croce (Genoa 1995). A. SYLVESTRE, Jean-Gabriel Perboyre: prêtre de la mission, martyr en Chine (Moissac 1994).

[J. KRAHL]

PERCY, THOMAS, BL.

Seventh Earl of Northumberland, martyr; b. 1528; beheaded at York, England, Aug. 22, 1572. Thomas and his younger brother, sons of Sir Thomas Percy and Eleanor Harbottal, were brought up by Sir Thomas Tempest of Tong Hall, Yorkshire, after the execution of their father at Tyburn (1537) for his part in the PILGRIMAGE OF GRACE of 1536. The brothers were restored in blood by the crown in 1549. Thomas's loyal adherence to the Catholic faith brought him favorable notice from Queen Mary, who made him governor of Prudhoe Castle. Knighted and created Baron Percy, he was, in consideration of "his noble descent, constancy, and virtue, and value in arms," made earl of Northumberland (1557). Shortly afterward he was nominated a member of the Council of the North and high marshal of the army in the north and was appointed captain of Berwick, lord-warden-general of the East and Middle Marches toward Scotland.

On the accession of Elizabeth I, however, the earl resigned his office. Despite Lord Burghley's suspicions, Percy was made a knight of the Garter in 1563. At Mary Queen of Scots' flight into England, Northumberland insisted the custody of Mary should by right be his as the chief magnate of the north. When admitted to an interview with Mary at Carlisle, he expressed sympathy with her misfortunes. This angered the London government, and the Earl was ordered to withdraw from Carlisle and Mary was placed under the guardianship of Sir Francis Knollys.

Resentful at this treatment, desirous of religious freedom and for liberty for Mary Stuart, Percy joined the northern rebellion (1569). At the imprisonment of the Duke of Norfolk in the Tower, Northumberland and the Earl of Westmorland were summoned to court at London. Knowing this meant imprisonment and probable death, the Earl of Westmorland agreed with the fiery desires of the gentry for a rising. Northumberland accidentally stumbled into this nascent rising as he sought safer refuge from the queen's agents in his Yorkshire house and was finally convinced to throw in his lot with the rebels. It was another Pilgrimage of Grace. Under the banner of the five wounds of Christ crucified, the forces, led by Northumberland, took Durham, where Mass was said in the cathedral for the last time, Nov. 14, 1569. Four days later they were at Ripon. But the earls were no generals, nor had they any plans. By December 16, the royal forces were upon them, forcing the earls to flee to Scotland. Percy led a hunted life there, while his wife Anne, daughter of Henry Somerset, second earl of Worcester, did her best to raise ransom for him from her own exile in Antwerp, but without success. He was finally handed over to Elizabeth in August 1572 by the regent of Scotland, the earl of Mar, for £ 2000. He was taken to York and offered his life if he took the oath of supremacy and abandoned Catholicism. He refused and was beheaded. His last words were a renewed declaration of his faith as a Catholic and in family: "I am a Percy in life and in death." Pope Leo XIII beatified him in 1886.

Feast: Aug. 26 (Dioceses of Hexham, Leeds, and Middlesborough).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: P. HUGHES, The Reformation in England (New York 1963). C. READ, Mr. Secretary Cecil and Queen Elizabeth (New York 1955). C. SHARP, ed., Memorials of the Rebellion of 1569 (London 1841). E. B. DE FONBLANQUE, Annals of the House of Percy, 2 v. (London 1887) v.2. J. H. POLLEN, English Catholics in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth (New York 1920). Calendar of State Papers, Domestic (1569–70), ed. M. A. E. GREEN, 7 v. (London 1856–72).

[J. D. HANLON]

Walker Percy. (©Jerry Bauer)

PERCY, WALKER

Novelist, essayist; b. Birmingham, Alabama, May 28, 1916; d. Covington, Louisiana, May 10, 1990. After the suicide of his father, LeRoy Pratt, in 1929 and the death of his mother, Martha Susan Phinizy, in an automobile accident in 1932, Percy and his two younger brothers were adopted by their father's cousin, William Alexander Percy, the lawyer-planter-poet of Greenville, Mississippi. Percy always respected "Uncle Will" for his noble ideals and romantic appreciation of the arts, but he ultimately rejected the mournful stoicism to which his relative gave classic expression in his memoirs, Lanterns on the Levee (1941).

Percy turned away from such a melancholy heritage by pursuing a secular faith in science. He majored in chemistry at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill and graduated from Columbia University's College of Physicians and Surgeons in 1941. Then Percy faced what he called "the cataclysm." He contracted tuberculosis while interning at Bellevue Hospital in 1942 and confronted a spiritual crisis. During a two-year rest cure at Trudeau Sanatorium (which formed the basis of an early, unpublished novel, "The Gramercy Winner"), Percy read his way to better health. He learned from the work of Tolstoy, Dostoyevsky, Kafka, and Mann, but found the most salutary understanding of his own dilemma through discovering the religious philosophy of Soren KIERKEGAARD. He discovered that science could speak about humanity in the abstract, yet it could say nothing about what it meant to live and die as Walker Percy. In seeking to appreciate that mystery, Percy discontinued his career in medicine, married Mary Bernice Townsend in 1946, converted to Catholicism in 1947, and began writing fiction as well as scholarly articles about language and Southern culture.

Although Percy published a collection of his essays on semiotics (The Message in the Bottle, 1975) and a parody of self-help books for an age near semiotic catastrophe (Lost in the Cosmos, 1983), he made his most distinctive contribution in his novels about quests to understand the perplexing signs of the spiritual life. Percy's fictional Southerners live out their faith through sharing in the same kind of despair, wandering, discovery, and return to daily work that marked the story of his own religious search. The Moviegoer (1961), for which he won the National Book Award, chronicles how Binx Bolling is drawn to stoicism, scientism, and aestheticism before accepting the Catholicism of his mother's family as a way of placing himself in the everyday world. As Percy shifted from such wryly understated comedy to the picaresque adventures of The Last Gentleman (1966) and the satirical science fiction of Love in the Ruins (1971), he portrayed religious faith as a scandalous alternative to lives and worlds that increasingly seemed on the verge of disaster.

The crisis of modern life exploded in a vitriolic tour de force, Lancelot (1977). While Percy's knight of the unholy grail tells of how he pursued the mystery of his wife's infidelity, he reveals his own more horrifying faithlessness as a vengeful champion of a morally-purified America. After such a bleak apocalypse, Percy wrote his most joyous novel, The Second Coming (1980), in which Will Barrett of The Last Gentleman discovers that his romance with Allie Huger may be the unexpected sign of God's presence in his life. Percy looked to the future with greater anxiety in The Thanatos Syndrome (1987). As Dr. Tom More of Love in the Ruins investigates a mysterious plague, he learns to oppose the scapegoating and social engineering that seek to undermine a semiotic understanding of humanity.

Percy repeatedly maintained that fiction must not preach, yet he viewed his Catholic faith as central to his artistic vision. The Judaeo-Christian understanding of humanity as fallen but engaged in a search deepened his conviction that the novel should focus on people in trouble in particular places, moments, and predicaments. Percy's fiction embodied this faith through its rootedness in the physical world, commitment to historical time, and exploration of spiritual wayfaring. Renouncing the fatalism of the Old South and the naive optimism of the New South, Percy's seekers may come to themselves and to others as they discover how they may finally come to God.

While Percy has been criticized for his moralizing, muddled plot details, and reductive portrayals of women, he is recognized as one of the pre-eminent novelists of the South. His writing combines philosophical depth, linguistic resourcefulness, wide-ranging comedy, clinical powers of observation, and trenchant social criticism as it explores the religious vision of a constant seeker. Percy's fiction contemplates not only the sadness and craziness of humanity's spiritual isolation but also the surprising possibility of overcoming that aloneness by living with others under God.

Bibliography: W. R. ALLEN, Walker Percy: A Southern Wayfarer (Jackson, MS 1986). R. H. BRINKMEYER, Three Catholic Writers of the Modern South (Jackson, MS 1985). G. M. CIUBA, Walker Percy: Books of Revelations (Athens, GA 1991). R. COLES, Walker Percy: An American Search (Boston 1978). J. E. HARDY, The Fiction of Walker Percy (Urbana, IL 1987). L. W. HOBSON, Understanding Walker Percy (Columbia, SC 1988). M. D. HOWLAND, The Gift of the Other (Pittsburgh 1990). L. A. LAWSON, Following Percy (Troy, NY 1988). M. LUSCHEI, The Sovereign Wayfarer (Baton Rouge 1972). P. L. POTEAT, Walker Percy and the Old Modern Age (Baton Rouge 1985). P. SAMWAY, ed., Signposts in a Strange Land (New York 1991). T. R. SPIVEY, The Writer as Shaman (Macon 1986). J. TAYLOR, In Search of Self (Cambridge, MA 1986). J. TOLSON, Pilgrim in the Ruins (New York 1992). R. C. WOOD, The Comedy of Redemption (Notre Dame 1988).

[G. M. CIUBA]

PEREIRA, TOMÁS

Missionary in CHINA; b. San Martinho do Valle, Province of Braga, Portugal, Nov. 1, 1645; d. Beijing, Dec. 24, 1708. He entered the Society of Jesus in Coimbra in 1663, left for the Indies in 1666, and in January 1673 arrived in Beijing. By his rare musical talents, he won the good favor of the Emperor Hsüan-Yeh and retained this esteem until his death. In 1689, he and Jean Gerbillon, SJ, assisted the Chinese delegates in the negotiations at Nerchinsk that led to the first peace treaty between the Chinese and the Russians. In recognition of the success of the two Jesuits in this mission, K'ang-Hsi in 1692 granted the first edict of toleration for Christianity. On this occasion Pereira spoke for all the missionaries and publicly thanked the emperor. Pereira became rector of the Jesuit College in Beijing and from June 1692 to June 1695, was vice provincial of the Chinese Vice-Province of the Society of Jesus. After his death, the emperor contributed toward a splendid funeral and composed an epitaph in his honor.

Bibliography: L. PFISTER, Notices biographiques et bibliographiques (Shanghai 1932) v.1. J. SEBES, The Jesuits and the Sino-Russian Treaty of Nerchinsk, 1689 (Rome 1961).

[E. HAGEMANN]

PEREIRA Y CASTELLÓN, SIMEÓN

Nicaraguan “martyr bishop”; b. León, Nicaragua, July 2, 1863; d. there, Jan. 29, 1922. He was a member of a family of high social status, the son of Pedro Pereira and Dolores Castellón. In 1879 he entered the Society of Jesus and attended the Colegio de San Ignacio de Loyola in Matagalpa. When the Jesuits were exiled in 1881, he went with them to Ecuador, where he completed his studies at the University of Quito. He then taught for several years, first in Bogotá and then in Medellín. Ill health caused him to return to NICARAGUA in 1892. He was ordained in León and celebrated his first Mass on March 19, 1894. On the expulsion of the vicars general from Nicaragua, the vicariate was entrusted to him. He too was ordered into exile, but influential friends persuaded President José Simón Zelaya to cancel that decree, and Pereira remained in Nicaragua.

On July 25, 1896, he was consecrated auxiliary bishop of Nicaragua with the right of succession to Bp. Francisco Ulloa y Larios (1880–1902). As bishop he continued to be harassed by the political authorities to such an extent that he gained his epithet “Martyr Bishop.” When he wrote a strong pastoral letter against the anti-Catholic decrees of President Zelaya, he was first imprisoned in the barracks at Managua and then (Nov. 3, 1898) exiled to Costa Rica. He was again exiled in 1905 when clerical garb was forbidden in Nicaragua. This time he went to Rome and on the way preached in Spain, in Toledo and Zaragoza, and was acclaimed by the press as a representative of the American pulpit. He also lived in Mexico, Panama, Colombia, and Costa Rica before he was able to return in triumph to Nicaragua.

Bishop Pereira y Castellón reorganized the minor seminary in León and repaired and decorated the cathedral. With the permission of the Holy See he turned over the episcopal residence for the use of the Colegio de la Asunción. He founded a catechetical institute and, largely with his own funds, built an orphanage. He arranged to have Christian Brothers and Dominicans come into the diocese. He founded, and had printed on his own press, a diocesan newspaper. When the archdiocese was created in Nicaragua in 1912, he remained bishop of León, but the pope made him titular archbishop of Síscico. Benedict XV later gave him the titles of Roman Count and Attendant at the Pontifical Throne. In 1914 the national congress passed a resolution of public gratitude to Bishop Pereira and authorized the erection of a monument to him after his death.

Bibliography: A. AGUILAR, Reseña histórica de la diócesis de Nicaragua (León 1927).

[L. LAMADRID]

PÉREZ, ESTEBAN

Disclaled Franciscan mission preacher in Peru; b. Olite, Navarre, Spain, 1854; d. Lima, Peru, 1934. Starting out from the Colegio de Ocopa and from the Descalzos of Lima, which gave them their name, Disclaled missionaries constituted the most powerful force for the preservation and consolidation of Christian life in PERU and neighboring countries from the middle of the 19th century. The Catholic Church was in a critical state because of the continued shortage of priests, the spread of rationalism, secret societies, regalistic governments, antireligious laws, secular teaching, and sectarian propaganda. The evangelical action of the Disclaled Fathers extended itself throughout Peru, embracing the aristocracy, the middle class, the clergy, religious communities, and reaching even to the Quechua and Aymará-speaking native population and the eastern jungle tribes. The missionaries, in well-trained groups of two, four, or six, traveled through the territory of more than a million square kilometers giving missions of one-and-a-half or two months in the principal cities, one month or 15 days in the smaller cities, and a proportional length of time in less-populated areas. To the clergy, the intellectuals, influential groups, students, and religious communities they gave courses of religious exercises. Esteban Pérez was a typical example of these missionaries. A vigorous man of convincing eloquence, great zeal, and untiring activity, he gave missions in Peru, Chile, Bolivia, Ecuador, and California. He encouraged social work and organized and gave new life to Lima’s devotion to the Señor de los Milagros. In order to consolidate the mission gains, he wrote various works, among them the Devocionario manual (Lima 1960, 42 ed.), of which it has been said that “it has converted more souls than it has letters.” In 1932 he delivered the funeral oration for Leguía, former president of Peru.

Bibliography: T. MORI, “El padre Esteban Pérez,” Colección Descalzos 6 (Lima 1944) 12–14.

[O. SAIZ]

PÉREZ, JUAN

Spanish Franciscan, patron of COLUMBUS; date and place of birth uncertain; d. c. 1515. He was once confused with Antonio de Marchena, another Franciscan patron of Columbus, but the two are distinct. Marchena in 1473 was probably guardian of San Esteban de los Olmos in Burgos, and in 1485 of La Rábida, where he gave Columbus shelter and approved his plans. Marchena also was versed in astronomy. He became custos of the Observant Franciscans of Andalusia in 1487; vicar provincial of Castile, 1499 to 1502; and guardian of Murcia, 1502 to 1505. As a youth, Pérez was employed in the office of accounts of Isabella I, and as a friar was for a time her confessor. He probably is the Juan Pérez de Segovia of the friary of Arrizafa in Córdoba, to whom Isabella gave aims in 1485. As guardian of La Rábida in 1491, he befriended Columbus, going to the court to commend him to Isabella and in his name, April 17, 1492, signing the agreement for the voyage of Columbus. He helped in the preparations for the voyage, especially by persuading Martín Yáñez Pinzón, the most eminent mariner of Palos, to take part in the venture. He heard the confessions of the crew and gave them his blessing for the voyage. He probably accompanied Columbus on his second voyage, on which Marchena did not go despite the wishes of the king and queen. The Franciscan Order contributed to the discovery of America with the learning of Marchena, the social and political patronage of Juan Pérez, and the understanding and charity of both.

Bibliography: A. ORTEGA, La rábida, 4 v. (Seville 1925–26) v.2. A. BALLESTEROS Y BERETTA, Cristóbal Colón, 2 v. (Barcelona 1945). A. YBOT LÉON, La iglesia y los eclesiásticos españoles en la empresa de Indias (Barcelona 1954—) v.1. A. URIBE, “Una bula inédita de Paulo II . . .,” Archivo Ibero-Americano, 2d ser. 4 (1944) 464–472. J. MESEGUER FERNÁNDEZ, “Íñigo de Mendoza y Antonio de Marchena en un documento de 1502,” Hispania 12 (1952) 401–411; Archivo Ibero-Americano, 2d ser. 19 (1959) 163–164, 167.

[J. M. FERNÁNDEZ]

PÉREZ DE RIVAS, ANDRÉS

Jesuit missionary, historian, and administrator; b. Córdoba, Spain, 1575; d. Mexico City, March 26, 1655. Little is known of his early years other than that he studied at the Jesuit school in his native city. He did not enter the Jesuit order until 1602, after he had been ordained a diocesan priest. Departing from custom in the order, Pérez de Rivas, while still a novice, was sent in 1602 to Mexico and completed his novitiate in Puebla. By the fall of 1604, he was at work in the San Felipe mission on the Río Sinaloa. By 1605 he had learned the native languages of the area and moved farther north to the Fuerte River region of Sinaloa, where with Jesuit companions he established several mission stations. Pérez de Rivas was next assigned to the Yaqui mission in Sonora. This whole missionary movement in the present Mexican states of Sinaloa and Sonora contributed greatly to extending the frontier up the mainland coast of the gulf and ultimately to Alta California. By the end of 1619 poor health forced the recall of Pérez de Rivas from the missions. Administrative positions in the order and historical writing occupied the rest of his life.

Of his works, Historia de los triumphos de nuestra santa fee entre gentes los más barbaros y fieros del Nuevo Orbe (Madrid 1645) is the most important. In 12 books, the author covers the Jesuit missionary endeavor in northern New Spain from 1591 to 1643. The first part of the work tells of the mission expansion from the Río Sinaloa up along the coast, over the rivers that fall into the Gulf of California, and up hundreds of miles into the Sonora Valley. The second part narrates the missionary development in the Sierra Madre Mountains of the west, and on the eastern plains in present Durango and Coahuila. The third part, consisting of only the 12th and last book of the work, treats of the early Florida mission. It is one of the finest accounts that exists concerning mission history and the gradual development of the colonial frontier. Under the title Páginas para la historia de Sinaloa y Sonora; Triumphos de nuestra santa fee, it was reedited in Mexico City in 1944. Pérez de Rivas's other published work of considerable importance is his Corónica y historia religiosa de la provencio de la compañía de Jesús de Mexico en la Nueva España, 2 v. (Mexico City 1896), which traces the history of the order from the coming of the first Jesuits to New Spain in 1572, to 1654. The published edition of the work omits numerous chapters, most of which are biographical. A short treatise on the life of Father Juan de Ledesma was printed in Mexico in 1636, and an answer to the Bishop of Puebla, Juan de PALAFOX, concerning some financial aspects of certain Jesuit schools in 1641. At least four other known works exist in manuscript form and deal with theological matters and different phases of the history of the order in New Spain.

Bibliography: P. M. DUNNE, Andrés Pérez de Ribas: Pioneer Black Robe of the West Coast, Administrator, Historian (New York 1951).

[N. F. MARTIN]

PÉREZ FLORIDO, PETRA DE SAN JOSÉ, BL.

Foundress of the Congregation of the Mothers of the Helpless and of St. Joseph of the Mountain; b. December 7, 1845, Málaga, Costa del Sol, Spain; d. August 16, 1906, Barcelona, Spain. From her youth Pérez desired the religious life. Full of compassion for the poor, she begged in the streets on their behalf despite her father's opposition. With the approbation of the bishop of Málaga, who also named the congregation, Petra and three companions formed (1880) the Mothers of the Helpless. Mother Petra labored (1895–1901) to build the royal sanctuary of Saint Joseph of the Mountain (Montaña Pelada), while guiding her growing religious communities. She was beatified by Pope John Paul II, October 16, 1994.

Feast: Aug. 16.

Bibliography: F. DE LA HOZ, Desde el valle a la montaña (Seville 1961). MOTHERS OF THE HELPLESS, Sobre la 'piedra' (Valencia 1972).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

PERFECTION, ONTOLOGICAL

Etymologically, perfect and perfection derive from the Latin per facere or per-factum, meaning made through or thoroughly; they imply a state of completion or totalization, as in that which is fulfilled or consummated. The perfect thing, then, suffers no lack or defect within the order of its perfectiveness. The concept is obviously a transcendental one, realizable on different levels of being (see TRANSCENDENTALS).

Kinds of Perfection. It is possible to discern at least two ontological significations of perfection, the first permitting a distinction between absolute and relative perfection, the second between substantial and accidental perfection.

Absolute vs. Relative. Absolute perfection, meaning that to which nothing whatsoever is lacking, embraces the total plenitude of being and is nowise compatible with defect. Such absolute perfection may be posited either as real, subsisting of itself outside the mind (thus identical with traditional concepts of GOD), or as ideal, having objective existence only within mind, as an IDEA.

By contrast something may be only relatively perfect, its perfection limited to a given order, inferior to the absolutely perfect, and bespeaking a greater or lesser removal from absolute perfection, with reference to which it is measured. The perfection of man, for instance, is at once greater than that of the irrational animal or the vegetable and less than that of intellectual substances, the angels of Christian tradition.

Substantial vs. Accidental. The second and wider sense of the word means that which lacks nothing due to its nature, possessing everything answering to its objective CONCEPT. Distinguishable here is substantial perfection, whereby a thing is constituted as an existent ESSENCE, and accidental perfection, bespeaking whatever completeness accrues to the thing in a consequential way. This latter in turn includes the indispensable properties and the common accidents added only contingently; operative perfection as well as entitative; and the final fulfillment of a thing, consisting in the attainment of its end or destiny.

Relationships. It is entirely accidental to perfection as such that it be realized as the term of a process; it is itself only completeness. The formality of perfection is ordinarily to be found, in the real order, resident in a being that is in other respects imperfect. The transcendental of the concept lies in its conceptual proximity to BEING and the GOOD. A thing is perfect to the extent that it is; its actuality formally determines its perfectness. The PURE ACT of being is thus the sole instance of absolute perfection; to exist substantially is to have first perfection; to be in accidental ways is to achieve secondary perfection; to be actually in possession of the end is for any nature to reach the ultimate term of its relative perfection. The formal constitutive of perfection is this actuality. In turn, the actuality or perfection of a being, bespeaking its capacity to perfect another, gives rise to the relationship toward others of desirability. Goodness, or the good, is thus fundamentally (not formally) the perfection of a being.

A fuller understanding of the meaning and kinds of ontological perfection can be achieved by tracing the development of the notion in Greek, Thomistic, and modern thought.

Greek Thought. PARMENIDES, founder of the Eleatic school, reacting strongly against the doctrine of HERACLITUS that all things are in a state of constant change, developed a doctrine of being in opposition to the becoming of Heraclitus. For Parmenides, the very fact of knowledge determined his position: to think means postulating something that is; what is not cannot be thought. Becoming and change are illusory; there is only being, which is homogeneous and unchangeable—indeed there is only One Being without any inner differentiation; even the plurality of individual things is not real. Nothing can be added to being, so it is complete, i.e., perfect; thus it is immovable, eternal, continuous, and immune to evil. True enough, Parmenides regarded this Perfect Being as finite, but in the sense of determined and definite, as avoiding the imperfection of indetermination and indefiniteness. Melissus (fl. 440 B.C.), a disciple of Parmenides, reversed this and granted infinity to being. The evidence favors seeing Melissus's position as a monistic materialism; being is there seen as limited, at least in space, for outside of it there is the "void." In short, the notion of perfection in this school is that of a totality that does not escape the restrictions of matter.

PLATO attempted to reconcile the many of Heraclitus and EMPEDOCLES with the one of Parmenides, deriving his insight from the teaching of PYTHAGORAS that all things exist by participating in the numbers. Things are thus multiple, composed and imperfect; yet at the same time each is what it is by participating in the Ideas that exist separately as simple, unchangeable, infinite, and perfect. All perfection is thus in the Ideas, which are said to be real and subsistent and are ranged hierarchically among themselves, the Idea of the Good being supreme. Without an explicit concept of efficient causality, Plato explained the sensible world as coming to be through the Ideas “uniting” themselves to matter.

This Platonic concept of perfection is basically an essentialism; the ideal order is not distinguished from the real, and there is a failure to recognize the all importance of existence. The Ideas are thus reified and the perfection they embody is that of pure essence without reference to actual existence. From this it follows that the distinction in perfection between an Idea and the varied instances of PARTICIPATION in it is merely one of degree in possessing a univocal essence.

ARISTOTLE rejected the Ideas of Plato, which he called poetic metaphors (Meta. 991a 21), as abstract universals enjoying existence only in the mind. Perfection lies only in the real order, where it is to be distinguished from a principle of imperfection. Imperfection is POTENCY capacity for being; perfection is ἐνέργεια, ACT, being itself. If ἐνέργεια means first of all a process whereby form is realized in matter, it comes to mean eventually the being or act so achieved. Potency and MATTER are infinite (τὸ ἄπειρον) and unknowable but in the traditional Greek sense of indefinite and undetermined—that outside of which there is always something. FORM and act, as the very opposite of this, mean that which is complete and whole (ἄλλο), from which nothing is left out (Phys., 207a 1–10), that which is perfect (τέλειον). There is no unending process of development; each thing attains its maximum perfection when all the potentialities with which its NATURE is endowed are realized.

The transition from potency to act can be effected only by a being already actual. In the Metaphysics (1072a 25), Aristotle reasons to an Unmoved First Mover whose perfection is such as to account for all becoming, at least in the order of final causality. Whether the logical structure of his thought should have allowed this or not, Aristotle does appear to give real existence to this all perfect Nous (1072b 5, 25).

Thomistic Analysis. Perfection in the thought of St. THOMAS AQUINAS is developed along two distinct lines—the theological and the philosophical. While the latter order remains intrinsically free of any illumination from faith, still there are Christian presuppositions that extrinsically give direction to the philosophical endeavor. Nonetheless, St. Thomas’s concept of perfection is basically an explication of that of Aristotle (see In 5 meta. 18), with a new shift of emphasis on the primacy of EXISTENCE over essence. “To the extent that something is in act, to that degree it is perfect” (Summa theologiae 1a, 5.1; 1a2ae, 3.2; C. gent. 1.39, 2.41, 3.22). And the supreme and ultimate act of all is existence, “. . . the actuality of all acts . . . the perfection of all perfections” (De pot. 7.2 ad 9). The primacy of the Ideas in Plato and of substance in Aristotle thus gives way in St. Thomas to the primacy of existence (esse). Potency, as the principle of mutability and determinability, is the source of imperfection; it limits the act that accrues to it (see POTENCY AND ACT). Thus essence, as potential to esse, limits the infiniteness of being and in so doing explains finiteness and plurality.

Divine Perfection. This composition, or potency-act relationship, between essence and existence establishes the caused nature of finite things and leads the mind by a natural dialectic to posit the real existence of Pure Act, Unreceived Being. This subsistent act of being suffers no limitation; it is thus the sole absolutely perfect being, i.e., God. The procedure is a negative one, denying of God any composition and thus any imperfection. The human mind is incapable of any quiddative knowledge of Perfect Being (ST 1a, 3.4 ad 2); it acknowledges Him in an analogical way only by an inference from the FINITE BEING it does know.

None of the perfections of being can be lacking to God (ibid. 4.2 ad 3); thus the perfections of all things pre-exist in Him, but as really identified with Himself and distinguishable only by the human mind in a conceptual way. Perfections of the created order derive causally from God and, because of their state of limitation by potency, are finite participations of infinite perfection. Some of them are pure perfections in their own order, the objective concept being one that excludes all imperfection, even though the perfection may be extrinsically conjoined with an imperfect subject. Others are intrinsically of such limited perfectness as to bespeak imperfection of themselves. Life and intelligence are examples of the first kind; rationality, sensibility, and the virtues of faith and hope belong to the latter category. In scholastic terminology the prior are designated as perfections simpliciter simplex, the latter as perfections secundum quid.

The subject possessing any given perfection may be said to have it either formally, i.e., according to its proper concept as expressed in the definition (e.g., rationality in man); or virtually, i.e., in a causal way only, lacking the perfection in actual fact but having the power to achieve the effect of such perfection (e.g., rationality in an angel); or eminently, i.e., in terms not of the proper form but of a higher form expressive nonetheless of whatever perfection is in the lower (e.g., rationality in God).

Supernatural Perfection. Approached theologically, however, in the light of Christian faith, the Perfect One is discerned not only to be eminently whatever there is of perfection in the natural order, created or even creatable, but to be of an entirely other order of perfection—the supernatural. The Subsistent Being in His inner trinitarian life is perfection in a transcendental sense that will not admit of manifestation in the universe of nature. Intellectual creatures, however, can in a totally gratuitous way be elevated to another universe, that of grace, wherein they are enabled to know and love God as He is in Himself.

Modern Views. R. DESCARTES, opening the era of modern philosophy, posited an absolutely perfect being, really existent and transcendent over the universe. His THEISM, however, is purely rationalistic, seeing an all perfect God in terms of function, i.e., as explaining the universe of things. The Infinite and Eternal is necessary to establish the universal laws for all things and to guarantee the validity of man's distinct and clear ideas. The direction of thought is a priori; the reality of the infinitely perfect Being is not demonstrated discursively; nor need it be acknowledged in faith, for this is the first intuitive truth from which all others derive. The human mind thus possesses a complete idea of the Perfect, which is no longer the incomprehensible Ipsum Esse of St. Thomas, but rather self-caused essence.

The RATIONALISM of B. SPINOZA is pantheistic in nature, beginning with a "Being absolutely infinite and consummately perfect" that is no other than the totality of nature. This is God as the cause of things, in an immanent rather than transcendent sense, however, and thus ultimately identified with all things. Spinoza marks a return to the doctrine of Parmenides; there is only one substance and all things are modes of it, ways in which it exists and operates. As infinite, substance produces its own existence.

G. W. LEIBNIZ continued the rationalist approach with the same apriority in gratuitously positing God as supreme perfection. The finite world derives from this pure essence, yet in such fashion that both belong to the same order. An underlying univocity of being means that God and creature differ only in degree of perfection. The will of the Perfect Being is limited by His essence and by the objects of His intelligence; God is even constrained morally to the creative act, since He can do only what is best. The way is thus open for the finite god of contemporary PANENTHEISM; ontological perfection is qualified.

I. KANT, influenced by empirical philosophy, reacted strongly against the apriority of the rationalists. All that can be known are the appearances of things, knowledge being what the senses furnish to certain structures of consciousness. The perfect being, then, while probably really existent, remains unknowable. The idea of God as the infinitely perfect Being has only logical validity; it enjoys only ideal existence. No analysis of that idea will reveal, a priori, the real existence of deity; nor may it be used to deduce the finite world. The supremely perfect is, then, for Kant, merely a form of thought.

G. W. F. HEGEL and the idealists (J. G. FICHTE, F. W. J. SCHELLING, and others) carried the IDEALISM of Kant to the point where every vestige of theism disappeared. Whereas Kant left God as unknowable in His transcendence, Hegel brought forth a metaphysics of the ABSOLUTE to replace the idea of God. The Absolute is spirit, ultimately pure thought, yet totally immanent within human consciousness. It develops as the process of finite things, moving through nature and history in self enrichment. The real world represents transient determinations of the impersonal Absolute. The perfection of the Absolute, however, is not total, for it is itself the internal developing principle of historical process. It seems not to enjoy consciousness apart from the conscious striving of finite minds, and thus to stand in need of human rational effort.

Critique of Modern Thought. These modern doctrines concerning the supremely perfect Being represent radical departures from the traditional teaching of St. Thomas and Aristotle. This latter, for example, is opposed to the rationalism and essentialism of Descartes and Leibniz. It argues that there is no basis in man's experience for innate ideas (see INNATISM). Rather, man's conscious knowing life originates from the real material world through sense activity. Even were there such, moreover, the existence of the idea in the mind could not of itself establish the real existence of the object; the most that one could conclude would be the notion of actuality, not the real exercise thereof. Also, both Descartes and Leibniz saw essence as ultimate perfection, reducing existence to another merely formal perfection.

Much the same can be said for the pantheism of Spinoza. The contingency of finite things reveals their caused nature, and the principle of causality, rightly understood, demands a real distinction of effect and cause. The Uncaused Necessary Being transcends the world of contingents; these latter cannot be mere modes of the necessary Substance.

In criticism of Kant's idealistic agnosticism, to say that one cannot know (but only believe, as a postulate of practical reason) whether a reality corresponds to one's idea of a totally Perfect Being is to limit human knowledge to the order of sensible appearances. This is to fail to acknowledge the evidence that the very being of things presents, namely, that existents are not only sensible but also intelligible. Also, the movement from CONTINGENCY to an Uncaused Necessary (and hence Perfect) Being is not a result merely of a synthesizing need on man's part; it lies in the very intelligibility of contingency as such. Nor does it follow, as Kant maintains, that the perfection of such a Being would then be relative, because His causal relation to the world is not in virtue of an action distinct from His very substance. The misunderstanding results from restricting ANALOGY to a mere symbolic function, from failing to see its ontological fundament with the implied underlying causal connectives.

In the dialectical monism of Hegelian idealism there is an unresolved ambivalence. Either Absolute Consciousness is sufficiently actual in itself, and then the world is mere illusion, or else the Absolute is realized only in conscious human striving, and then there is no Absolute Spirit or Pure Thought. Also, the reason for change is enrichment of the changing subject, and this speaks an underlying imperfection. Whatever perfection lies in pure process, then, cannot be absolute.

See Also: GOD; INFINITY OF GOD; BEAUTY.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 1a, 4, Eng. Existence and Nature of God, ed. and tr. T. MCDERMOTT (Summa Theologica 2; New York 1964); Commentary on the Metaphysics of Aristotle, 2 v., tr. J. ROWAN (Chicago 1961). G. DINAPOLI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 3:1282-90. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927-30) 3:427-4:29. R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, God: His Existence and His Nature, tr. B. ROSE, 2 v. (St. Louis 1934-36) v.2. É. H. GILSON, God and Philosophy (New Haven 1941). J. D. COLLINS, God in Modern Philosophy (Chicago 1959). C. HARTSHORNE and W. L. REESE, eds., Philosophers Speak of God (Chicago 1953).

[W. J. HILL]

PERFECTION, SPIRITUAL

The concept of perfection, as applied to Christian life, is scriptural in origin. Christ admonished His disciples: "You therefore are to be perfect, even as your heavenly Father is perfect" (Mt 5.48). The word translated into English as "perfect" is the Greek τέλειοι, which fundamentally implies the attainment of goal or end.

Notion. The term perfection as applied to human life in general, however, was used in antiquity even by the barbarians, who thought of it as fortitude, as is frequently evidenced in their legends. The idea that human perfection consists in fortitude has reappeared in recent times. Indeed, some have explained Christian perfection as the supreme act of fortitude, which is martyrdom. Others would have had the essence of perfection consist in penance and mortification. Quietism, on the contrary, rejecting all human efforts in the struggle for perfection, made it consist, rather, in a complete passivity that suppresses personal mortification as well as acts of charity toward one's neighbor. Some Greek philosophers explained perfection in terms of wisdom. Their error has been revived in modern theosophy, which makes perfection a consciousness of the divine in man. Something analogous to this is found in the doctrine of those who hold that the essence of Christian perfection consists in the contemplation that issues from the gift of wisdom.

In opposition to the above explanations, the majority of theologians have insisted upon charity as the formal element in true Christian perfection. In so doing, they are merely following the doctrine of the Scriptures which teach that "God is love, and he who abides in love abides in God and God in him" (Jn 4.16). St. Paul confirms this by his insistence upon charity as "the bond of perfection" (Gal 3.14). These words of St. Paul only summarize the teaching of Christ that the whole law depends on these two precepts of love: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart, and with thy whole soul, and with thy whole strength, and with thy whole mind; and thy neighbor as thyself" (Lk 10.27).

In order to understand this explanation more clearly it is necessary to understand the two senses in which the term can be used. St. Thomas Aquinas speaks of a first and second perfection. "The first perfection is the form of the whole, the form which results from the whole, complete with all its parts. The second perfection is the end, which is either operation, as the end of the harpist is to play the harp; or something that is attained by operation, as the end of the builder is the house he makes by building" (Summa theologiae 1a, 73.1). Applying this division of perfection to Christian life, one is said to possess first perfection, or is substantially perfect as a Christian, when he possesses sanctifying grace, through which he participates in the supernatural life of God. As the human soul constitutes a body truly human, and brings with it the powers necessary for human development, so sanctifying grace elevates the soul to supernatural life and brings with it all the infused theological and moral virtues and the gifts of the Holy Spirit.

Considered integrally or as the sum total of things necessary, second perfection will require all the virtues and gifts. But in the operation of which virtue does man attain his end, or union with God, while still on earth? Not in the operation of the moral virtues, since they are concerned rather with the means to the end than the end itself; nor can it be found in the operation of faith, which no longer exists in one who enjoys heavenly vision of God; nor in hope, which also disappears in the possession of the Divine Good in glory. Charity alone remains as the source of effective union with God in this life. "A thing is said to be perfect in so far as it attains its proper end, which is its ultimate perfection. Now it is charity that unites us to God, who is the last end of the human mind, since 'he who abides in charity abides in God, and God in him' (1 Jn 4.16). Therefore the perfection of the Christian life consists chiefly in charity" (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 184.1). Thus St. Thomas concluded: "Primarily and essentially, the perfection of the Christian life consists in charity, principally as to the love of God, secondarily as to the love of neighbor, both of which are the matter of the chief commandments of the divine law" (ibid. 2a2ae, 184.3).

Although everyone in a state of grace receives the virtue of charity, which gives him the capacity for supernatural friendship with God, the mere capacity for such friendship does not make him a perfect Christian in the proper meaning of second perfection. When charity is referred to as second perfection, which is perfection in the formal and proper sense, it is not the habit but the act of charity which is meant. Charity is a virtue, a power ordained by its nature to make the Christian capable of loving God as the supreme Good. But power is made perfect only in actual operation. For this reason the formal or second perfection of the Christian life consists in actual charity, not in the mere capacity for love. Nevertheless, in order to be perfect in charity in this life, one need not be engaged at all times in the actual exercise of the love of God; such uninterrupted love of God will be possible only in heaven. What is required for such perfection in this life is that all the other activities of Christian life should flow from the love of God.

It is precisely because man cannot always be actually loving God in this life that the other virtues have a role to play in Christian life here on earth. In this life the Christian, according to his state in life, must be concerned with actions and objects other than God. Nevertheless, he must preserve the state of grace and concern himself with other occupations in such a way that charity is not lost. The virtue of charity should rule over the acts of all the other virtues, for it is from charity that such acts receive their supernatural merit.

Degrees. While man can never exhaust God's capacity to be loved, for He is the Infinite Good, nor can the Christian always be actually loving God except in heaven, there are recognizable differences of degree of perfection that depend upon the extent of man's efforts to remove the obstacles to the love of God in this life. The first and lowest degree consists in the removal of all that is directly contrary to charity, i.e., the avoidance of mortal sin. A higher degree of perfection is achieved in the effort to remove whatever in man's affections might hinder him from tending wholly to God. St. Thomas summarized the traditional teaching concerning these degrees when he wrote: "The various degrees of charity are distinguished according to the different pursuits to which the increase of charity brings man. For it is first incumbent on man to occupy himself chiefly with avoiding sin and resisting his concupiscences, which move him in opposition to charity. This concerns beginners, in whom charity has to be fed or fostered lest it be destroyed. In the second place, man's chief pursuit is to aim at progress in good, and this is the pursuit of the proficient, whose principal aim is to strengthen their charity by adding to it. Man's third pursuit is to aim chiefly at union with God and enjoyment of Him: this belongs to the perfect who 'desire to be dissolved and to be with Christ' (Phil 1.23)" (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 24.9). Even in this final degree of charity in this life, perfection is only relative, however, because, in a true sense, there is no limit to growth in the love of God in this life.

Perfection and the Counsels. Although some have held that the perfection of charity goes beyond the precept to love God with the whole heart, this opinion does not follow from the above explanation. Were this opinion true, the perfect love of God would go beyond the precept and require certain counsels of charity (Súrez, De statu perfectionis, 11.15, 16). The perfection of charity is not a matter of counsel, which the individual Christian is free to choose, but is commanded as the end to which all Christians must tend. As indicated above, the perfection of Christian life consists in the love of God and neighbor. But precisely in this love the whole of the law is summarized. The precept to love God is a command to love with the whole heart. Christ, by these words, explicitly excluded the placing of a limit beyond which one need not advance in love by reason of the commandment. Since the very perfection of Christian life terminates in being united to God as perfectly as possible—a union possible only through charity—the precept to love God is without limitation. "Now the love of God and neighbor is not commanded according to a measure, so that what is in excess of the measure be a matter of counsel. This is evident from the very form of the commandment, pointing, as it does, to perfection—for instance, in the words: 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart'—since 'whole' and 'perfect' are synonymous. This is so because, according to the teaching of the Apostle, 'The end of the commandment is charity' (1 Tm 1.5). Now the end does not present itself to the will subject to a measure" (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 184.3).

Hence, with regard to the perfection of charity, one must distinguish what is essential and what is not. Perfection consists, primarily, in a program for all Christian life; namely, the observance of the commandments, which are directed to removing obstacles to charity. One attains the lowest degree of charity by doing nothing contrary to charity. Secondarily, however, it consists in the observance of certain counsels which remove the primary obstacles to the actual exercise of charity, even though these obstacles might not be directly contrary to charity. The counsels are good works, better than their omission, proposed to the faithful by our Lord, and commended by Him as useful for the attainment of the perfection of charity. In general, they are reducible to the three evangelical COUNSELS of poverty, chastity, and obedience. While without the counsels one cannot reach the higher degree of the perfection of charity, the counsels are free from precept and hence of obligation. Religious make the counsels an obligation by reason of vow.

One must note the distinction between Christian perfection and the state of perfection. Christian perfection is subjective and personal, a most intense habit of charity, hence a grade of perfection; the state of perfection is objective and external. A lay person who has supernatural charity and is keeping the commandments has personal perfection. One enters the state of perfection by binding himself solemnly to those things that pertain to Christian perfection.

Bibliography: J. AUMANN and D. L. GREENSTOCK, The Meaning of Christian Perfection (St. Louis 1956). R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, The Three Ages of the Interior Life, tr. T. DOYLE, 2 v. (St. Louis 1947–48). J. DE GUIBERT, The Theology of the Spiritual Life, tr. P. BARRETT (New York 1953). A. A. TANQUEREY, The Spiritual Life (Westminster, Md. 1945). T. AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 184. B. HÄRING, The Law of Christ, tr. E. G. KAISER, 3 v. (Westminster, Md. 1961–).

[R. MASTERSON]

PERGOLESI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA

Baroque composer of the Neapolitan school; b. Iesi (The Marches), Italy, Jan. 4, 1710; d. Pozzuoli (near Naples), March 17, 1736. Between 1720 and 1724 he attended the Conservatorio di Poveri di Gesù Cristo at Naples. His brief but successful career began in the summer of 1731 with the production of a dramma sacro, La Conversione di San Guglielmo, and thereafter his finest works were operas and sacred music. The popularity of his music caused many anonymous works to be attributed to him; thus the majority of extant compositions carrying his name are spurious. To the early Pergolesi period belong a Mass in D major, a Dominus ad adjuvandum me, and the psalms Dixit Dominus and Confitebor, probably commissioned by the city of Naples toward the end of 1732. In May 1734 he conducted his two-choir Mass in F major (commissioned by Duke Carafa Maddaloni and rewritten several times) in San Lorenzo in Lucina, Rome. In content and quality these works were far superior to the general music of that period. Long al fresco-like counterpoint or contrapuntal phrases alternate with concerto passages for solo and choir, solo ensembles, and arias, in which the unusual melodic talents of Pergolesi are effectively expressed.

Pergolesi's Masses consist only of Kyrie and Gloria. To the late Pergolesi period belong the psalm Laudate pueri, in which he finds a new form of expression in the exchange between solos and choir, and probably also the very popular Stabat Mater for two solo voices and strings and the Salve Regina in C minor for soprano and strings. All are outstanding examples of the sentimental style in Catholic sacred music. At the end of 1735 Pergolesi was forced by serious illness (probably bone tuberculosis) to retire.

Bibliography: Opera omnia, ed. F. CAFFARELLI, 5 v. (Rome 1939–42), performing edition. G. RADICIOTTI, G. B. Pergolesi (Rome 1910; 2d ed. Milan 1935). A. DELLA CORTE, Pergolesi (Turin 1936). W. KAHL, "Pergolesi und sein Stabat Mater," Kirchenmusikalisches Jahrbuch 35 (1951) 84–97. H. HUCKE, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 10:1048–64. P. H. LANG, Music in Western Civilization (New York 1941). P. M. YOUNG, The Choral Tradition (New York 1962). H. E. BECKWITH, "Giovanni Battista Pergolesi and the Chamber Cantata" (Ph.D. diss. University of Maryland, 1983). F. DEGRADA, ed., Studi Pergolesiani: Prolusione el Convegna "Lo stato attuale degli studi su Pergolesi e il suo tempo" (Jesi, 18–19 novembre 1983) 2 v. (Florence 1986). H. HUCKE and M. E. PAYMER, The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980) 14:394–400. D. E. MONSON, "Adriano in Siria," International Dictionary of Opera 2 v., ed. C. S. LARUE (Detroit 1993); "La Serva Padrona," ibid. M. E. PAYMER, "The Instrumental Music Attributed to Giovanni Battista Pergolesi: A Study in Authenticity" (Ph.D. diss. City University of New York, 1977). D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge 1996). N. SLONIMSKY, ed. Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (8th ed. New York 1992).

[H. HUCKE]

PERICHORESIS, CHRISTOLOGICAL

The mutual indwelling of the divine and human natures in Jesus Christ. Trinitarian perichoresis (CIRCUMINCESSION) is the sacred indwelling of the three Persons in one sole God. The second is the compenetration of Divine Persons in one NATURE; the first, the compenetration of the human nature in Christ by the divine in the one Person of the LOGOS. Trinitarian perichoresis affirms the CONSUBSTANTIALITY of the Divine Persons against ARIANISM and the distinction of Persons against SABELLIANISM. Christological perichoresis proclaims (a) one sole PERSON in Christ against NESTORIANISM'S concept of two persons morally united and (b) two distinct natures against MONOPHYSITISM's confusion of the elements of Christ in one nature.

Only the Second Person possesses human nature, for only the WORD was made man and lived among men. Only He can say, "This is my body." Both natures subsist mutually in each other without any modification of the Logos, but with, in predication, reciprocal interchange of attributes because of the oneness of Person. Thus the HYPOSTATIC UNION is the basis for the perichoresis that is reflected in this interchange or COMMUNICATION OF IDIOMS.

Incarnational perichoresis must be studied in its concrete existential richness, not merely in abstractive repetition of the great (and eternally true) Chalcedonian formula: two natures, one Person, unconfused, undivided, the difference of nature preserved in one SUBSISTENCE. The unifying power is from the Logos alone: the theologian must explain the concrete human subject, totally sanctified by the divine, existing with all the perfection of mind, will, and heart, profoundly conscious of itself, possessing tremendous initiative in the work of Redemption. Diverse from the Logos, it can be studied only as united to the Logos, only diversity explaining the unity, and unity giving insight into the diversity (Rahner).

Christ's human nature is God's presence among men. It is the divine plan that men are to find in Jesus Christ. Only in His human face can they see God, only in His word hear God, only in His GRACE become close to God. For this reason the Son of God took on visible human form. Even in His humanity He is the Son of God. Therefore Christ is God in a human way, and man in a divine way. As man He acts out His divine life in and according to His human existence. Everything He does as man is an act of God the SON, a divine act in a human form, His human love the human embodiment of the redeeming love of God, His humanity concretely intended by God as fulfillment of the promise of SALVATION. Because the human deeds are divine deeds, personal acts of the Son of God, divine acts in human form, they bring salvation, cause grace (Schillebeeckx).

In this light of the Incarnational perichoresis one studies the IMPECCABILITY OF CHRIST, for His humanity is substantially sanctified by uncreated holiness, His human nature and existence actuated by the divine Logos. In this light, also, the theologian studies the knotty problems of the one or two existences in Christ, of the human consciousness of the Savior and His "psychological" personality. Devoutly men commit themselves to Christ in whom alone they encounter God, for He is the primordial sacrament, the divine invitation and human response. In His Eucharistic presence both Trinitarian and Incarnational perichoresis promise the eternal encounter.

Giovanni Battista Pergolesi.

See Also: HYPOSTASIS; INCARNATION; JESUS CHRIST, III (SPECIAL QUESTIONS); PERSON, DIVINE; THEANDRIC ACTS OF CHRIST.

Bibliography: F. MALMBERG, Über den Gottmensche (Quaestiones disputatae 9; Basel 1960). E. H. SCHILLEBEECKX, Christ: The Sacrament of the Encounter with God, tr. P. BARRETT (New York 1963). K. RAHNER, Theological Investigations, v. 1, tr. C. ERNST (Baltimore 1961). I. SOLANO, Sacrae theologiae summa (Madrid 1962) 3:1.46. L. KÖSTERS, The Believer's Christ, tr. J. W. GRUNDNER (St. Louis 1939).

[E. G. KAISER]

PERICOPES

A Greek word meaning excerpt, pericope was used in early Christian times to designate any passage in Holy Scripture [Justin Martyr, Dialogus cum Tryphone 65.3 (Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 6:625); Clement of Alexandria, Stromata 7.14 (Patrologia Graeca 9:517)]. Since the 16th century it has become a technical term for a Biblical passage read according to a determined order in the liturgy. This article treats the practice of reading Scripture in the liturgy, the meaning of terms used for such readings, the historical evolution of the Service of the Word, and a description of the various pericopal systems.

Biblical Reading in Liturgy

Sacred Scripture, which “is of the greatest importance in the celebration of the liturgy” (Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy 24), can be read in a more or less continuous fashion (lectio continua) or in passages that are chosen for their appropriateness for the liturgical day, season, or special objective. Prescinding from the mosaic type of lesson (found in certain liturgies, e.g., Gallican and Spanish), made up of verses from different Biblical books or chapters of the same book, and from the pericopes constructed out of Gospel-harmonies, generally the text is altered only by introductory and concluding formulas, by individual words that help establish the context, and occasionally by the omission of individual verses. The liturgical use of Scripture is a very weighty witness to the canon of the Bible.

The most important place for the reading of Scripture in all liturgies from the earliest days of the Church has been the Mass. “The liturgy of the Word and the Eucharist are so closely connected with each other that they form but one single act of worship” (Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy 56). The readings of the Service of the Word share the memorial character of the Mass and indeed specify it in the course of the year (ibid. 102–104, 109). The Liturgy of the Hours also has Biblical pericopes in Matins and brief passages called chapters or short readings in the other hours. Pericopes are provided for other sacramental rites, e.g., Baptism, Matrimony, and the Anointing of the Sick.

Meaning of Terms

When manuscripts of the Bible were used for the liturgical readings, the beginning and end of the passage to be read were indicated by means of signs (a cross) or words (e.g., lege, finit) and a liturgical title usually written in the margin (Klauser numbers 11 manuscripts from the 7th to 14th centuries with Roman marginal notes).

Capitulare. In time manuscripts with marginal notes were replaced by lists arranged according to the calendar and containing the necessary details for the Gospels (Klauser notes 429 such lists from the 8th to 15th centuries), less frequently for both Epistles and Gospels (Klauser has 179 for the same period), and very seldom for only the Epistles (Klauser has only seven; these and the following figures represent only Roman manuscripts). Such lists stand either at the front or at the end of manuscripts. The most frequent name for a Gospel list, at least since the 8th century, was Capitulare (also Breviarius Evangeliorum); it was so called precisely because it gave the chapter (capitulum) and verse numbers for the selections to be read. Numerous names were used for the other lists.

Comes. Books containing the full text of the pericopes arranged according to the calendar began to appear, at the latest, in the 5th century. For the period from the 8th to the 17th centuries, Klauser numbers 397 providing only the Gospel text, 147 only the Epistles, and 113 both readings one behind the other. Ancient names for this type of book were many. Modern liturgical science distinguishes between Evangelary, Epistolary (often bound together with Evangelaries), and Full-Lectionary. An Epistolary, Full-Lectionary, or a list (even a Homiliary) was frequently called Comes (companion) or Liber Comitatus. This is not to be confused with the Mozarabic name for the Full-Lectionary, Liber Commicus (comma meaning excerpt).

It is often said that Lectionaries appeared later than the marginal notes and the lists. However, both manuscript and literary witnesses to Lectionaries are almost older than those for the lists and marginal notes. Lectionaries were cheaper, more handy, and for areas using cento pericopes, indispensable. The Admonitio Synodalis (J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 14:841), which stems probably from Caesarius of Arles (d. 542), required that every priest possess a plenary Missal, Lectionary, Antiphonary, and Homiliary. Musaeus of Marseilles (d. 461) and Claudianus Mamertus of Vienne (d. c. 474) are known to have compiled Lectionaries. See Gennadius, De viris illustribus 80 (ed. E. C. Richardson, Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 14.1:88); Sidonius Apollinaris, Epist. 4.11 (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Auctores antiquissimi 8:63).

Christian Reading Service and Synagogal Worship. There is a formal parallelism between the Service of the Word, especially of the Roman Mass and synagogal worship: two readings separated by a psalm (sung responsorially in early times), intercessory prayers (to be reintroduced according to par. 53 of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy), explanation of Scripture, and a blessing. The NT itself already attests to the reading to the people of NT writings not only in those communities to which they were addressed (1 Thes 5.27; Ap 1.3, 11; 2.1, 8, 12, 18; 3.1, 7, 14; 22.18), but also in others (Col 4.16). First of all, all the texts of the NT were composed, transcribed, and preserved precisely for public reading.

Despite the absence of testimony, one must admit that the OT was read in the liturgy, whether from whole books, florilegia, or testimonia. In favor of this, one can adduce the knowledge of the OT presupposed in the NT (1 Thes, 2 Thes, Phil, Col, 2 Tm, and Ti are, however, without explicit Scripture citations; there is only one in 1 Tm, and three in Eph). But there is no proof that the OT was read according to the order of the synagogue, i.e., the entire Pentateuch continuously (in a cycle of one or three years, known since the 3d century A.D. as the Babylonian or older Palestinian usage) and, in a secondary position, only short selections from other books such as readings from the “Prophets.” Moreover, not only Psalms, but also other spiritual songs were sung (Eph 5.19; Col 3.16; cf. Ap 5.9; 14.3). A continuous reading of the Pentateuch (consider Lv, Nm, and Dt) seems unthinkable in face of the Christian teaching on the Law, especially the teaching of Paul. The chief emphasis was precisely on the Prophets. New Testament quotations from and allusions to the prophetic books are twice as numerous as references to the Pentateuch. The ratio between the Pentateuch and the prophetic books in the Jewish sense is approximately one to four. The Psalter is either quoted or alluded to as often as the first four books of Moses together; the book of Daniel (never read in the synagogue) as often as Deuteronomy, but a little less frequently than Exodus; and Job (another book never read in the synagogue) not much less frequently than Numbers.

The Apostolic Constitutions (Syria, c. 380) testifies that: “After the reading of the Law and the Prophets, of our Epistles and the Acts, as well as the Gospels, the bishop greets the assembly” (8.5.11; F. X. Funk, ed., Didascalia et constitutiones apostolorum 1:477). From this statement authors usually conclude that there were four pericopes (some speak of five or three). In another obscure place, the Constitutions seem to require at least four (six or eight) readings from the OT before the two (or three) from the NT (2.27.5–7; Didascalia et constitutiones apostolorum 1:161).

The thesis that the ancient Church originally had two pericopes from the OT (as the synagogue) followed by two from the NT is usually based on the Apostolic Constitutions (8.5.11; Didascalia et constitutiones apostolorum 1:477). However, the pericope system found in the Constitutions is to be taken as typical only for the Syrian Church, which was ecumenical-minded toward the synagogue (Kunze, “Die Lesungen,” 135–138). This is supported by the actual state of the Liturgies: only the East Syrian Liturgy has two readings from the OT alongside the two from the NT. The West Syrian Liturgy as a rule adds a pericope from the Sapiential books. Historically, many liturgical rites have one pericope from the OT before the two from the NT, namely, the Armenian, the Ambrosian (only in the high Mass; however, on some occasions the first lesson is also from the NT, on others there are only two readings, one of which may be from the OT), the Mozarabic (always three readings, but the first is not always from the OT nor the second always from the NT). There are no OT lessons in the Byzantine (two lessons), Coptic and Ethiopian (all four readings are from the NT, but often the first is hagiographical). The Roman Missal of 1570 had only two readings; the first is taken from the OT on Lenten ferias, on 110 saints’ feasts (on many of which the same pericope is repeated), in 11 votive Masses, and in 30 Masses pro aliquibus locis. In the 1969 reform of the Roman Missal, a three-reading (one OT, one Epistle, one Gospel) framework was adopted.

The Georgian Lectionary from Jerusalem of the 5th through the 8th centuries [ed. M. Tarchnischvili, Corpus scriptorum Christianorum orientalium (Louvain 1959) 188–89, 204–05; cf. idem, Muséon 73 (1960) 261–96] supplies for the numerous simple feasts only two pericopes, both from the NT; three, or less frequently four, readings are provided for Sundays and greater feasts, and according to the character of the feast the first or the first two are often taken from the OT (rarely from the historical books, however). On the few days having more than four readings (as many as nine), the number of pericopes from the NT varies from two to seven; the number from the OT, from one to six. The Armenian-Palestinian Lectionary of the 5th century [ed. C. Conybeare, Rituale Armenorum (Oxford 1905) 518–27; A. Renoux, Muséon 75 (1961) 361–85; 76 (1962) 385–98] and the Syro-Palestinian Lectionary of the 9th century [ed. A. Smith-Lewis (London 1897; supplement London 1907)] usually have two pericopes from the NT. A preliminary reading on saints’ feasts is taken from the OT for saints of the OT, otherwise from the NT or hagiographies.

In general scholars have claimed that originally the Byzantine Liturgy had three pericopes, the first of which was taken from the OT. The examples brought forward [Chrysostom, Homil. in Acta 19.5, 29.3 (Patrologia Graeca 60:156, 218); Homil. in 2 Thes. 3.4 (Patrologia Graeca 62:486); Homil. in Hebr. 8.4 (Patrologia Graeca 63:75); Maximus Confessor, Mystag. 23 (Patrologia Graeca 91:700)], insofar as they deal with the Mass, as in Maximus, prove only that there were pericopes from the OT (only the first of two?). The three pericopes spoken of by Basil of Caesarea (Is, Acts, Mt: Homil. 13.1 de bapt.; Patrologia Graeca 31:425) belong to a catechetical service. The one place that unequivocally attests to three lessons in the Mass, with the first from the Prophets, is the biography of Bp. Theodore of Anastasiopolis in Galatia, who died in 613 (16; Acta Sacntorum 3:36).

Of the ancient liturgy of Milan, Ambrose has this to say: “First the Prophets are read, then the Apostle, and finally the Gospel” (In ps. 118.17.10; Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 152:382.17). The Milanese Sacramentary of Bergamo from the 9th century (ed. A. Paredi, Bergamo 1962) contains three pericopes (the first from the OT outside paschal time) for a few Sundays and feast days; otherwise there are only two, the first being from the OT only in Lent and on a few other days.

According to Augustine's homilies, three pericopes (the first from the OT) were read on a few major feast-days, otherwise only two were read [Sermo 13.4.4, 112.1.1, 165.1, 176.1.1, 180.1 (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 38:197, 643, 841, 950, 972); the first was sometimes taken from the OT: Sermo 45.1, 48.1, 2, 289.3 (Patrologia Latina 38:262, 319, 1309)]. The genuine homilies of Maximus of Turin (Corpus Christianorum. Series latina 23) and Peter Chrysologus [A. Olivar, Los sermones de S. Pedro Crisólogo (Montserrat 1962)] show that both pericopes were taken from the NT.

For Gaul, the writings of Gregory of Tours [Hist. Franc. 4.1.6 (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum 1.1:149–50); Mirac. S. Martini 1.5 (Patrologia Latina 71:918)] and Pseudo-Germain [Exposit. ant. lit. gall.; ed. J. Quasten (Münster 1934) 13; cf. Patrologia Latina 72:90] give evidence of a prophetic pericope from the OT before the two from the NT (cf. Caesarius of Arles, Sermo 73.2; Corpus Christianorum. Series latina 103:307). Among the old Gallican Lectionaries, that of Weissenburg, from the 5th through the 6th centuries, contains nine Mass formularies with two pericopes and ten with three (in paschal time, even the first is from the NT). That of Luxeuil, from c. 700, has 39 formularies with three pericopes, and 13 for lesser feasts with two readings (from the NT). The Bobbio Missal from c. 700 has 12 formularies with three pericopes and 51 with two (only six times is the first pericope taken from the OT). The Lectionary of Schlettstadt contains only the pericopes from the OT.

It is almost universally believed that the ancient Roman Mass had three pericopes. A statement of Tertullian, often cited in support of this view, "the Roman Church mixes (miscet) the Law and the Prophets with the evangelical and apostolic writings and thus nourishes the faith" (Lib. de praescr. 36.5; Corpus Christianorum. Series latina 1:217), can be said equally of the Roman Missal, which as a rule has only two pericopes (the first sometimes from the OT). Seldom are three called for (the Wednesday of Embertides, of the 4th week of Lent, and of Holy Week and Good Friday).

In addition, Roman sources of the 7th through the 9th centuries have three pericopes for Christmas and some other days. But when the Comes of Würzburg provides four Epistles for other occasions, a choice is intended. This is proved by the practice observed in later Lectionaries: if they do not introduce new readings, they choose two of the four readings offered by the older books.

That the Roman Mass had as a rule only two pericopes, at least in the 6th century, is shown by a notice in the Liber pontificalis about Celestine I. He is supposed to have introduced the singing of Psalms, whereas before "only the Epistle of blessed Paul and the Gospel were read at Mass" (Liber pontificalis, ed. L. Duchesne, 1:88). In the homilies of Leo I and Gregory I there is not a trace of a three-pericope system.

One cannot invoke in favor of a three-pericope system the fact that the fragments of the 10th-century Missal of Zurich-Peterlingen-Lucerne (like some other Sacramentaries) occasionally have before the Secret three Orations, the first two of which were to be sung before the Epistles. In these fragments the first two Orations stand together before the first reading, and they are found also on days of lesser rank with only two pericopes; on the other hand, there are a few days with three pericopes that have only one Oration provided.

Lectio Continua. Arguments are often given in support of the thesis that originally the Bible was read in a continuous fashion at Mass. However, they do not hold up under examination. A dependence on the continuous reading of the synagogue is very improbable. As regards the formula Sequentia sancti Evangelii, it first appeared about the 9th century when there was certainly no continuous reading (Roman Ordinal 5.35; M. Andrieu, Les 'Ordines Romani' du haut moyen-âge, 2:216); in early manuscripts, in other rites such as the Milanese and Mozarabic, and in the Breviary, the word Sequentia is lacking. Besides, it means nothing more than "The following passage is from the Gospel according to . . ." Nor are the references in Justin (1 Apol. 67, J. Quasten, ed., Monumenta eucharista et liturgica vetustissima 19: "as long as there is time"), Pseudo-Hippolytus, and Basil [cc. 37 and 97; W. Riedel, Die Kirchenrechtsquellen des Patriarchats Alexandrien (Leipzig 1900) 224, 273: the readings are to continue until all the faithful have assembled] necessarily to be understood as a continuous reading of the Bible.

Patristic homilies on whole books of the Bible, insofar as they were truly homilies preached at Mass and not at purely catechumenal services, offer a sound argument. Augustine preached his 35 homilies on Jn 1.1–12.50 in the year 413, but he may not have preached them at Mass. During this period, however, not only was there a long interruption from Monday of Holy Week until the 5th Saturday after Pentecost because of paschal time, but also Augustine suspended his series of Johannine homilies again and again on other days, even Sundays. Other evidence in Augustine of a continuous reading is rare and concerns almost always short passages. The same holds for Peter Chrysologus. On the other hand there is no evidence at all of such a continuous reading at Mass in the homilies of Ambrose, Maximus of Turin, Leo I, or Gregory I.

Although according to Augustine the reading of certain Biblical books was obligatory during paschal time [In epist. Ioh. prolog; Sermo 227.1; 231.1; 315.1; In evang. Ioh. 6.18 (Patrologia Latina 35:1977; 38:1100, 1104, 1426; Corpus Christianorum. Series latina 36:62.1)], he repeatedly alludes to the freedom used in choosing pericopes, often occasioned by rather banal circumstances [Sermo 93.1.1; 302.1; 362.1 (Patrologia Latina 38:573, 1385; 39:1611)]. Peter Chrysologus also mentions the fact that pastoral necessity frequently caused him to change the pericopes (Sermo 114, 120; Patrologia Latina 52:512, 529).

The continuous reading obtaining in some current liturgies is a late phenomenon influenced in part by the monastic lectio continua. That for ferias in the Byzantine Liturgy goes back only to the 9th century and is not always carried out strictly. The Epistles of the Roman Missal for the post-Pentecostal Sundays are selected according to the Biblical order; for 18 of these Sundays they hark back to the 41 pericopes in the Würzburg list that are arranged one after the other, following the order of the Pauline Epistles, but without any explicit liturgical determination. This same Würzburg list was the source of many different arrangements in later Lectionaries. The only time of the year in which the continuity of Epistle pericopes is almost complete in the Roman Missal (and Würzburg list) is the season after Epiphany (1st–4th Sundays, Rom 12.1–21, 13.8–10).

In conclusion, it is certain that at the very beginning there was a continuous reading of the NT, at least of the Pauline Epistles; it is equally certain the pericopes from the OT were not read according to strict synagogue order. Freedom to choose pericopes as well as whole books declined sharply as the temporal and sanctoral cycles were formed. A hard-and-fast system of continuous or semi-continuous readings was a secondary phenomenon.

Sundays After Pentecost. The greatest differences—prescinding from the sanctoral cycle—among the various witnesses to the Roman pericope system are found in the Sundays after Pentecost. The Würzburg Epistle list did not yet have fixed pericopes for these Sundays, and its Gospel list was incomplete. Other reasons for differences were the varying ways of designating the Sundays, either as grouped around principal sanctoral feasts (Peter and Paul, Lawrence, etc.) or as numbered after Pentecost, which changed date from year to year; the existence of an octave day for Pentecost in some sources; and variations in the date of the summer and fall Embertides and in the number of Advent Sundays (four or five).

Non-Roman Latin. Non-Roman Latin rites are too numerous to attempt here an adequate description of the evolution of their pericopal systems. Let it suffice to indicate the principal sources for each area.

Gaul. In his Lectionnaire de Luxeuil (Rome 1944), P. Salmon constructed pericope tables from 12 very diverse (and mostly fragmentary) sources from the 5th to the 8th centuries: Gamber 250, 255, 258, 260 c and d, 265, 266, 220, 240, 369 b; the notes in the Kilian-Gospel Book from Würzburg [P. Salmon, Revue Bénédictine 61 (1951) 38–53, 62 (1952) 294–96]; and the Freising manuscript of the Pauline Epistles (Clm 6229).

Northern Italy except Milan. Besides the above-mentioned Bobbio manuscripts (Gamber 220, 240), Cod. Vat. Regin, lat. 9 (Gamber 242) is important for the Epistles. Godu has published tables from the notes in the more or less related Cod. Rehd., Foroj., Clm 6224, and Ambros. C 39. The last four have also been described by Gamber [Münchener theologische Zeitschrift 13 (1962) 181–201] along with the notes from the Gospel Books, Cod. Vercell. A and Verona VII, the Evangelaries from Constance (Gamber 261) and Ambros. 28 (Gamber 543), and the Lindisfarne list (Gamber 405, 406).

Milan. The pericopes of the Ambrosian Missal (ed. typica 1902) are based on the Lectionary in the Sacramentary of Biasca of the 9th and 10th centuries (Gamber 515). The 9th-century Sacramentary of Bergamo (Gamber 505), except for later supplements, lacks the first reading; this reading is found in a 12th-century manuscript (Gamber 548). The Evangelary of Busto Arsizio (Gamber 541, 542) contains an older Gospel list. For pre-Carolingian pericopes in a few fragments of Sacramentaries, see Gamber 501, 502, 540.

Elsewhere in Italy. Sources for the Pauline pericopes are the list and notes in the NT of Bp. Victor of Capua (d. 554), Gamber 401; sources of importance for the Gospels are the lists of the Lindisfarne Gospel Book (Gamber 405, 406) and the notes in the Burchard Gospel Books (Roman admixture, Gamber 407). For Benevento and the rest of southern Italy, special pericopes have been preserved in a palimpsest of the 10th century (Gamber 434) and in some otherwise Roman sources of the 10th to the 12th centuries (Gamber 430–432, 440, 442, 455, 1411, 1412).

Spain. Beissel constructed an incomplete list of gospels from the Missale Mixtum of 1500 (Patrologia Latina 85:109–1036) and indicated parallels in the Silos Lectionary of the 11th century (Gamber 360). The latter was one of the sources (others in Gamber 362–365) of the Liber Commicus Mozarabicus (Madrid 1950–55), edited by J. Perez de Urbel and A. González. A large fragment from the 9th century (Gamber 361) was published in 1956, with tables comparing it with the above-mentioned Lectionaries and the somewhat older notes in Biblical manuscripts of the 8th to the 10th centuries (Gamber 369).

Bibliography: A. G. MARTIMORT et al., The Liturgy and the Word of God (Collegeville 1959). O. CULLMANN, Early Christian Worship, tr. A. S. TODD and J. B. TORRANCE (Studies in Biblical Theology 10; Chicago 1953). K. DICK, "Einleitung und Schlussformeln in der Perikopenlesung der römischen Messe," Archiv für Musikwissenschaft 4.1 (1955) 73–80. H. JEDIN, "Das Konzil von Trient und die Reform des römischen Messbuches," Liturgisches Leben 6 (1939) 30–660. K. GAMBER, Codices liturgici latini antiquiores (Spicilegium friburgense subsidia 1; Fribourg 1963). G. KUNZE, Die gottesdienstliche Schriftlesung, v.1, Stand und Aufgabe der Perikopenforschung (Göttingen 1947); "Die Lesungen," Leiturgia: Handbuch des evangelischen Gottesdienstes, ed. K. F. MÜLLER and W. BLANKENBURG, (Kassel 1954–) 2:87–187. A. BAUMSTARK, Comparative Liturgy, rev. B. BOTTE, tr. F. L. CROSS (Westminster, Md. 1958) 111–29, 201–35. S. BEISSEL, Entstehung der Perikopen des römischen Messbuches (Stimmen der Zeit Ergänzungsband 24.96; 1907). P. GLAUE, Die Vorlesung heiliger Schriften im Gottesdienste, v.1, Bis zur Entstehung der altkatholischen Kirche (Berlin 1907). W. BAUER, Der Wortgottesdienst der ältesten Christen (Tübingen 1930). G. GODU, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 5.1:245–344, 852–923. W. CASPARI, J. J. HERZOG and A. HAUCK, eds., Realencyklopädie für protestantische Theologie, 24 v. (3d ed. Leipzig 1896–1913) 15:131–59. K. DIENST, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 5:220–24. G. G. WILLIS, St. Augustine's Lectionary (London 1962). J. A. JUNGSMANN, Missarum sollempnia (4th ed. Freiburg 1962) 1:501–83. E. C. RANKE, Das kirchliche Pericopensystem aus den ältesten Urkunden der römischen Liturgie dargelegt und erläutert (Berlin 1847). W. H. FRERE, Studies in Early Roman Liturgy, 3 v. (Oxford 1930–35) v.2, 3. T. KLAUSER, Das römische Capitulare Evangeliorum (Münster 1935). A. WILMART, "Le Lectionnaire d'Alcuin," Ephemerides theologicae Lovanenses 51 (1937) 136–97. R. J. HESBERT, "Les Séries d'évangiles des dimanches après la Pentecôte," Maison-Dieu 46 (1956) 35–39. A. CHAVASSE, "Les Plus anciens types du lectionnaire et de l'antiphonaire romains de la messe," Revue Bénédictine 62 (1952) 3–94, cited in the text as Chavasse; "La Formation de l'Antiphonale Missarum," Bulletin du Comité des Études 32 (1961) 29–41. T. MAERTENS, "L'Avent," Mélanges de science religieuse 18 (1961) 47–110. E. STOMMEL, "Messperikopen," Trierer theologische Zeitschrift 61 (1952) 205–13. H. SCHÜRSMANN, "Eine dreijährige Perikopenordnung für Sonn- und Festtage," Liturgisches Jahrbuch 2 (1952) 58–72. H. KAHLEFELD, "Ordo lectionum," ibid. 13 (1963) 133–39. G. FRÉNAUD, "Les Péricopes évangéliques et fériales," ibid. 4 (1954) 210–29. P. JOUNEL, "Pour une réforme des lectures du missel," Maison-Dieu 66 (1961) 36–69. O. STEVENS, "Gedanken zur Perikopenverteilung," Liturgisches Jahrbuch 13 (1963) 140–50. R. W. PFAFF, ed. The Liturgical Books of Anglo-Saxon England (Kalamazoo, Mich. 1995). L. LARSON-MILLER, Medieval Liturgy: A Book of Essays (New York 1997). E. PALAZZO, A History of Liturgical Books from the Beginning to the Thirteenth Century (Collegeville, Minn. 1998).

[E. J. LENGELING/EDS.]

PÉRIN, HENRI CHARLES XAVIER

Principal representative of Catholic social thought in 19th-century Belgium; b. Mons, Aug. 29, 1815; d. Ghlin, near Mons, April 4, 1905. An attorney, he was named to the faculty of law at Louvain in 1844 and the next year succeeded Charles de Coux as professor of political economy. He taught for 35 years, quitting in 1881 only when a warning issued by Leo XIII to placate Conflicting Catholics prejudiced his position. Accused of too strongly defending civic freedoms, Périn withdrew to his home at Ghlin and completed in the years that followed many of his major works. He was a vigorous critic of the 19th-century economic liberalism that held that the self-regulating mechanism of the market provided justice for all. He did not share, however, the confidence of other Catholic social critics in the role of the state as the provider of welfare. He supported free workingmen's associations as well as those of management. He was one of the organizers of the congresses of Malines of 1863, 1864, and 1867. His works include: Les économistes, les socialistes, et le christianisme (1849), Le socialisme chrétien (1879), and Économie politique d'après "Rerum Novarum," (1891).

Bibliography: P. MICHOTTE, Études sur les théories économiques qui dominèrent en Belgique de 1830 à 1886 (Louvain 1904). R. KOTHEN, La pensée et l'action sociales des catholiques 1789–1944 (Louvain 1945)

[E. T. GARGAN]

PERJURY

In a broad sense perjury is an unlawful oath, one lacking a condition required for a licit oath, viz, truth, prudence, or justice. In a strict sense, perjury is a false statement supported by an oath. Usually perjury refers only to declaratory OATHS, but in some European law systems the willful violation of a promissory oath is treated as perjury. Theologians in general say that if such an oath was sincere when uttered, a violation of the promise would be sinful—the gravity depending on the promise—but would not be perjury.

A lying, or perjured, oath is always a mortal sin because it involves contempt for God and disrespect for His attributes. The perjurer asks God to be a witness to a lie or supposes that God can be deceived. Perjury is one of the most serious offenses against the virtue of religion; it contains the malice of contempt for God. Hence only an imperfection in the act can excuse a perjurer from grave sin, for example, if he lacked sufficient reflection on, or full consent to, the oath or its falsity.

Imprudent or useless oaths usually are venial sins, similar to profane use of the holy names. But perjury in a strict sense is always a grave sin, as is shown in the condemnation of the contrary opinion: "To call God to witness to a small lie is not a great irreverence because of which God would wish to or could condemn a man" (H.

Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [32d ed. Freiburg 1963] 2124). Perjury in a wide sense, where required prudence is lacking, would not normally be a grave sin if it does not violate justice directly, because no serious irreverence is shown to God thereby. But such an oath could be gravely sinful because of scandal. If the virtue of justice is violated, perjury in the broad sense is considered a mortal sin ex genere suo, i.e., one that admits of light matter.

It is not lawful for a private person to seek or receive an oath from one who he is sure will commit perjury. With sufficient reason, however, one may seek and receive an oath without knowing whether the person swearing will do so truly or not.

Formal cooperation in an act of perjury is never lawful because it would make the cooperator share the guilt. Hence he who by command, counsel, promise, etc., induces another to swear falsely is guilty as the principal or as an accessory to the crime. Material cooperation is permissible if there is sufficient reason for it. For example, a public official may demand an oath required by law from one who he knows will swear falsely. In such a case, the public good demands that the oath be administered, even though for this person it is an occasion of perjury. The lawgiver, however, should not lightly multiply demands for sworn statements; otherwise the oath can become a mere formality that is thus deprived of probative value, and the temptation to perjury is thereby increased.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae, 2a2ae, 89. N. JUNG, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 14.22:1939–55.

[M. HERRON]

PERNET, ÉTIENNE CLAUDE

Religious founder; b. Velleux (Haute Saône), France, July 23, 1824; d. Paris, April 3, 1899. During his studies in the major seminary at Besançon scruples about his worthiness caused him to leave the institution (1848) contrary to the advice of his superiors. In 1850 he joined the recently founded ASSUMPTIONISTS, whose founder Emmanuel d' ALZON persuaded him to proceed to ordination (1858). Pernet taught at the Assumption college in Nîmes (1849–52, 1860–63). Together with Marie Fage, he founded the LITTLE SISTERS OF THE ASSUMPTION (1865). He also organized three societies of laymen and laywomen to collaborate with his congregation and to engage in charitable and other apostolic works. During the Franco-Prussian War he served as a military chaplain. The decree introducing his cause for beatification was issued in 1931 and the preparatory congregation concerning his virtues met in 1956.

Étienne Claude Pernet.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1931) 341–344.

[I. M. THIERRY]

PÉROTIN

The most gifted composer of the Notre Dame school, places and dates of birth and death unknown. Little is known of Pérotin's life; the assertion that he was court composer to the French kings has been challenged, and scholars set his death year as early as 1200 and as late as 1230: Called optimus discantor (most excellent composer of discant), he was probably the first composer to write in as many as four parts, and he developed the use of unifying devices such as imitation, exchanged voices (Stimmtausch), and melodic variation, which he inherited from earlier generations and which have been standard contrapuntal practice ever since. Like J. S. BACH and MOZART after him, he blended diverse national influences into well-organized, large-scale masterpieces that were the high points of his period.

A Pérotin organum consisted of a liturgical chant melody and text that formed the tenor of the polyphonic section but with its rhythm altered. In approximately the same vocal range he added one, two, or three voices, in one of six rhythmic patterns known as modi. Although these patterns were varied at irregular intervals by different devices, the variations never obscured the patterns. The added voices crossed and recrossed one another in clear-cut phrases that usually began and ended on perfect consonances, touching on unisons midway. But the particular color of 12th-century polyphony was conveyed by occasional sharp dissonances on the weak beats, and sometimes even on the strong beats. The syllabic parts of the tenor were extended beneath the added voices into very long notes, sometimes lasting 40 measures and sounding more like a series of drones at different levels than like a melody. This liturgical melody, however, was known to the hearers; an impression of two mental worlds could be conveyed. The melismatic sections of the chant tenor were also reshaped rhythmically into one of the modi, often a slower modus than that of the added voices; these sections were called clausulae. Typical unifying devices are the fragments of imitation in measures three and four and the varied repetition of whole phrases as in measures one and two, seven and eight. There is also a typical Pérotin coda on a prolonged tenor note, with the change to iambic rhythm and descending scale in the added parts.

Pérotin set also sacred and perhaps secular Latin verse in the conductus style. This had no liturgical tenor, and the voices, all in the same modus, were sometimes set syllabically throughout and sometimes with melismatic sections on a single syllable, called caudae. Pérotin's works have survived, along with others of his school, in four "Notre Dame Manuscripts." The pitches in these MSS have been deciphered, but the rhythm problems have not been fully solved. LÉONIN's Magnus liber organi, which was partially rewritten by Pérotin, has not yet been found.

Bibliography: H. HUSMANN, Die Drei- und vierstimmigen Notre-Dame-Organa (Leipzig 1940) contains Pérotin music in modern notation; "The Origin and Destination of the Magnus liber organi," tr. G. REANEY, Musical Quarterly 49 (1963) 311–330; "The Enlargement of the Magnus liber organi and the Paris Churches, St. Germaine l'Auxerrois and Ste. Geneviève-du-Mont," tr. A. P. BRINER, Journal of the American Musicological Society 16 (1963) 176–203. H. TISCHLER, The Motet in Thirteenth-Century France (Doctoral diss. unpub. Yale U. 1942) 1:42–54, lists attributions in Middle Ages and in modern research; The Earliest Motets, Corpus mensurabilis musicae, ed. American Institute of Musicology, v.1–(Rome 1947–), v.30 (in press). New Oxford History of Music, ed. J. A. WESTRUP, 11 v. (New York 1957–). v.2. G. REESE, Music in the Middle Ages (New York 1940). A. WULF, "Denken in Tönen und Strukturen: Komponieren im Kontext Pérotins," Musik-Konzepte 107 (2000), 53–100. I. D. BENT, "Pérotin" in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, vol. 14, ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980) 540–543. D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge 1996) 683–684. N. SLONIMSKY, ed. Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, Eighth Edition (New York 1992) 1391. J. STENZL, "Pérotin und das Ereignis Notre Dame: Auswahlbibliographie," Musik-Konzepte 107 (2000), 101–105. H. TISCHLER, "Pérotin and the Creation of the Motet," Music Review 44 (1983), 1–7.

[E. THURSTON]

PERPETUA AND FELICITY, SS.

Martyrs. The Passio Perpetuae et Felicitatis is one of the most ancient reliable histories of the martyrs and recounts the martyrdom of Perpetua, her slave Felicity, and companions in the arena of Carthage on March 7, 202. Perpetua and Felicity were commemorated in Rome in the fourth century on March 7, and their names were inserted in the list of saints in the canon of the Mass.

During the persecution of Septimius Severus, the catechumens Vibia Perpetua, a noblewoman of 22 and her infant; Felicity, a pregnant slave; Revocatus; Saturninus; Secundulus; and later their catechist Saturus were arrested. While under arrest, they were baptized, and Perpetua's father besought her to apostatize. Perpetua, removed to prison, had a vision of a ladder guarded by a dragon and strewn with arms that prohibited ascent, but she walked over the dragon and reached a beautiful place. Again her father besought her, and he repeated his appeal in the forum before the people. They were condemned to the wild beasts for the feast in honor of Caesar Geta. Perpetua had another vision that her small brother, Dinocrates, who had died of cancer, was in heaven following her prayers for him. A few days before the spectacle they were transferred to a camp prison, where Perpetua had her last vision. At first Felicity was not with them, since it was illegal to execute a pregnant woman; but three days before the spectacle, Felicity gave birth prematurely to a girl. After being flogged, they were led into the amphitheater and eventually beheaded. In the Passio four other martyrs are recorded: Jocundus, Saturninus, Artaxius, and Quintus, who had already suffered in the same persecution.

Part of the Passio (3–10) was written by Perpetua, and part (11–13) by Saturus; the introduction and conclusion, by an eyewitness, formerly thought to be TERTULLIAN. The Latin text is probably the original. The Passio is famous for its account of the visions and important for early Christian ideas on martyrdom. It was frequently quoted by St. AUGUSTINE. These martyrs were greatly venerated in Carthage, and a basilica was erected there over their tomb, which was identified in 1907.

Feast: March 7 (formerly 6).

Bibliography: C. VAN BEEK, ed., Passio sanctarum Perpetuae et Felicitatis, Florilegium Patristicum, ed. J. ZELLINGER et al. (Bonn 1904–) 43; 1938. S. MAITLAND, ed., The Martyrdom of Perpetua (Evesham 1996), incl. the sermons of St. Augustine. v. L.

KENNEDY, The Saints of the Canon of the Mass (Vatican City 1938). J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster, Md. 1950–) 1:181–183. A. J. FRIDH, Le problème de la Passion des saintes Perpétue et Félicité (Göteborg 1968). R. PETRAGLIO, Lingua latina e mentalità biblica nella Passio sanctae Perpetuae: analisi di caro, carnalis e corpus (Brescia 1976). P. HABERMEHL, Perpetua und der Ägypter, oder, Bilder des Bösen im frühen afrikanischen Christentum (Berlin 1992). C. M. ROBECK, Prophecy in Carthage: Perpetua, Tertullian, and Cyprian (Cleveland, Ohio 1992). J. E. SALISBURY, Perpetua's Passion: The Death and Memory of a Young Roman Woman (New York 1997).

[E. HOADE]

PERPETUAL ADORATION, SISTERS SERVANTS OF THE HOLY SPIRIT OF

(S.Sp.S.deA.P., Official Catholic Directory #3540); a cloistered contemplative congregation founded in 1896 at Steyl, Netherlands, by Arnold JANSSEN, SVD, with the collaboration of German-born Mother Mary Tönnies (d. 1934). The rule received final papal approval in 1950. Besides adoration of the Blessed Sacrament and the chanting in choir of the Liturgy of the Hours, the sisters engage in manual and literary work. In 1915 the congregation went to the U.S. and took charge of the newly erected Chapel of Divine Love in Philadelphia. The generalate is in Bad Driburg, Germany. The U.S. headquarters is in Philadelphia, Pa.

Bibliography: A. FREITAG, Tabernakelwacht und Weltmission (2d ed. Steyl 1924).

[V. J. FECHER]

PERPETUAL ADORATION OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT, NUNS OF THE

(AP, Official Catholic Directory #3190); a cloistered community of nuns with papal approbation, dedicated to an apostolate of contemplative prayer, primarily through the perpetual adoration of the Blessed Sacrament. The order was founded at Rome, Italy, on July 8, 1807, by Mother Mary Magdalene of the Incarnation (Catalina Sordini Movizzo, 1770–1824), a Franciscan sister from the convent on the island of Ischia in the bay of Naples. The nuns, who take solemn vows, are engaged in constant prayer, including the Divine Office, before the exposed Blessed Sacrament. In the U.S. they are located in El Paso, Texas (1925), and San Francisco, Calif. (1928). Worldwide, the congregation has houses in Spain, Mexico, Chile and Africa.

[J. H. MCNEELY]

PERPETUUS OF TOURS, ST.

Bishop; d. 491. Perpetuus, of a senatorial family, was bishop of TOURS for 30 years (461–491). He zealously restored discipline in his diocese, regulated fasts and vigils, and built churches, including the magnificent basilica of St. MARTIN OF TOURS described by GREGORY OF TOURS (Hist. Franc. 2; 10) and by the fifth-century poet-bishop, SIDONIUS APOLLINARIS (Epist. 4). St. Martin's body was transferred to the apse of this basilica, and Perpetuus himself was buried there. His presence at the provincial councils of Tours (461) and Vannes is attested to, but his epitaph and will were proved to be 17th-century forgeries of Jérôme VIGNIER.

Feast: April 8, Dec. 30.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum April 1:744–748. L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule, 3v. (2d ed. Paris 1907–15) 2:300–301. E. GRIFFE, La Gaule chrétienne à l'époque romaine (Paris 1947). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 15, 2:2619–20. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, (Paris 1935–56) 4:182–188. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 2:53. H. DELEHAYE, "Saint Martin et Sulpice Sévère," Analecta Bollandiana 38 (1920) 5–136.

[L. M. COFFEY]

PERRET, AUGUSTE

French architect important for original contributions to civic and ecclesiastic architecture; b. Brussels, 1874; d. Paris, 1954. His use of reinforced concrete (invented by the French engineers Hennélique and Coignet in the 1890s) for an apartment at Rue Franklin, Paris (1903), was the first such use of concrete in frame construction. This and subsequent structures liberated concrete from a basement-hidden material into a frankly expressed, monolithic constructional system that bears considerable influence on contemporary building. His church of Notre-Dame du RAINCY (1922–23) was the first to break with the accumulated styles of the past and to house a congregation on 20th-century terms. It is built of reinforced concrete with slender concrete nave columns supporting the roof; its side walls are independent, prefabricated concrete grills filled with colored glass, so that the interior is light and open. The altar is placed nearer to the congregation than in earlier churches. After the similar church of Sainte-Thérèse de Montmagny (Seine-et-Oise, 1925–26) his work became increasingly formalistic with even classic qualities. The rigid postwar rebuilding of Le Havre is punctuated by his last work, St. Joseph's Church (1952–55), a kind of "spiritual lighthouse" that towers some 350 feet above the city.

Bibliography: A. HENZE and T. FILTHAUT, Contemporary Church Art, ed. M. LAVANOUX, tr. C. HASTINGS (New York 1956) 21–23. J. PICHARD, Modern Church Architecture, tr. E. CALLMANN (New York 1962). B. CHAMPIGNEULLE, Perret (Paris 1959). G. E. KIDDER SMITH, The New Architecture of Europe (Cleveland 1961) 105–106; The New Churches of Europe (New York 1964).

[G. E. KIDDER SMITH]

PERRONE, GIOVANNI

Theologian; b. Chieri (Turin), March 11, 1794; d. Castelgandolfo, Aug. 28, 1876. He entered the Society of Jesus Dec. 14, 1815. A year later he began teaching dogmatic theology, a task he performed for the rest of his life, first at Orvieto for seven years (1817–24) and then at the Collegio Romano (1824–48), except for a short period when he was rector of the college at Ferrara (1830–34). Because of the revolutionary agitations of the Roman Republic in 1848, he went to England, where he taught theology at the Jesuit scholasticate at Benhart (Wales) from 1848 to 1851. He then returned to the chair of theology at the Collegio Romano where he was rector (1853–55) and prefect of studies until his death.

He played a principal role in the struggle against G. HERMES and in the preparation for the definition of the dogmas of papal infallibility and the Immaculate Conception, which he defended in his work, De immaculato B. Marina conceptu (Rome 1847, 10th ed. Milan 1852). He had an excellent grounding in patristics and positive theology; at the same time he possessed a clear, concise, and methodical style.

He was the author of many doctrinal and controversial works. His principal doctrinal works were: Praelectiones theologiae dogmaticae (9 v. Rome 1835–42), which had 34 editions up to 1888; Praelectiones . . . in compendium redactae (5 v. Rome 1845), which had 47 editions up to 1892; De virtute religionis (Paris 1866); De Domini Nostri Jesu Christi divinitate adversus huius aetatis incredulos (3 v. Turin 1870); De matrimonio christiano (3 v. Turin 1870); and De romani pontificis infallibilitate (Turin 1874). His controversial works include: L'hermesianismo (3 fasc., Rome 1838–39); Il protestantesimo e la regola di Fede (3 v. Rome 1853); and Catechismo intorno al protestantesimo (2d edition, Turin 1883).

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 6:558–571. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae (Innsbruck 1903–13) 5.2:1496–98. C. BOYER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 12.1:1255–56. W. KASPER, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:282.

[C. TESTORE]

PERSEVERANCE

Perseverance is a moral virtue that perfects the irascible appetite so that a person is reasonably inclined to continue in the practice of virtuous action in spite of difficulties arising from the protracted period during which the effort must continue. It is one thing to be called upon to perform a single virtuous act; it is quite another thing to be expected to continue to act in a virtuous manner for a long time. There is a kind of fatigue that overcomes the emotions when they must persist in a course of action and this fatigue inclines a person to abandon what he has undertaken.

In a broader sense, perseverance means the pursuit of some course of action or some undertaking until it is completed. Final perseverance is the continuance in the state of grace until death (see PERSEVERANCE, FINAL). Both the virtue of perseverance and final perseverance play important roles in the spiritual life, but they have completely different functions. Perseverance provides the fortitude of spirit that is necessary for the continued daily practice of virtue. It is the bulwark of all virtuous life. Virtue, by its very nature, demands a certain immobility and stability; all good habits demand a certain permanence. Without the virtue of perseverance, no virtue would be practiced for a prolonged period of time, and thus it would be impossible to attain the perfection of virtue demanded by the Christian life.

For the exercise of the virtue of perseverance man in his present state of fallen nature has a special need for actual graces. The Council of TRENT declared: "If anyone should say that he who is justified can, without the special assistance of God, either persevere in the justice of God received or with that assistance cannot persevere, let him be anathema" [H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer (Freiburg 1963) 1572]. Thus the virtue of perseverance and the grace of perseverance cooperate in the ultimate work of salvation. The virtue gives man the ready disposition to continue in the life of virtue, but because of the ever-present possibility of sin—especially to a human nature wounded by original sin—man needs special actual graces to cause the virtue to be constantly operative.

The virtue of perseverance is opposed by the vices of inconstancy or cowardice and of pertinacity or stubbornness. There is a reasonable endurance of the tedium and fatigue involved in a life of virtue and the mean can be violated either by refusing to endure reasonably, or by continuing to act when it is no longer reasonable to do so. The Latin term for inconstancy (mollities) indicates a kind of softness or effeminacy of spirit. Hard, stubborn pertinacity lies at the other extreme. A person with this disposition will not abandon a course of action when he should. For example, such a man will attend a Confraternity meeting (for he has never missed one) while his wife is home sick and there is no one to care for the children.

The virtue of perseverance is extolled in Sacred Scripture. “Take all that shall be brought upon thee and in thy sorrow endure” (Sir 2.4). “Be steadfast and immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, knowing that your labor is not in vain in the Lord” (2 Cor 15.58). “He who has persevered to the end will be saved” (Mt 10.22).

Bibliography: F. L. B. CUNNINGHAM, ed., The Christian Life (Dubuque 1959). A. ROYO, The Theology of Christian Perfection, tr. and ed. J. AUMANN (Dubuque 1962). THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae, 2a2ae, 137–138. A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 12.1:1256–1304.

[R. DOHERTY]

PERSEVERANCE, FINAL

Living and dying in the grace of Christ is final perseverance. The simplicity of this description has a twofold merit. It bypasses, as exceptional cases, the situation of the baptized who never reaches the age of reason and the situation of the sinner who finds RECONCILIATION with God only at the hour of death. It stresses the two essentially related elements that constitute the grace of final perseverance. The first is a certain continuance in grace. This depends on God’s special help. The second is the fact of death in the state of grace. This depends on God’s special protection. St. Thomas combines these elements in defining final perseverance as “the abiding in good to the end of life” (St. Thomas, Summa theologiae, 1a2ae, 109.10). The Council of Trent speaks of “the great gift of final perseverance” [H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer (32d ed. Freiburg 1963) 1566] and links it with the mystery of predestination:

No one . . . so long as he lives in this mortal life, ought to be so presumptuous about the deep mystery of divine predestination as to decide with certainty that he is definitely among the number of the predestined, as though it were true that, because he is justified, either he cannot sin again, or, if he does sin, he should promise himself certain repentance. [H. Denzinger, ibid., 1540; see, for tr. of this and subsequent passages, J. F. Clarkson et al., The Church Teaches (St. Louis 1955)]

It is important to distinguish between perseverance and final perseverance. Many receive grace who do not persevere in grace to the end of life (St. Thomas, Summa theologiae, 1a2ae, 109.10). It is likewise important to distinguish between the power to persevere in grace and actual perseverance. Every just man receives the grace of potential perseverance [H. Denzinger, ibid., 1536]. It does not follow that every just man actually perseveres in grace until death. These distinctions become clear when the mystery of final perseverance is placed in its proper theological context. This is the task of this article. At the end, attention is given to the question, how does the just man obtain the all important grace of final perseverance?

Special help of God. Theologians commonly teach that the justified adult, who has made a fundamental option for God and is habitually disposed to the avoidance of serious sin, has the need of special help from God—if he is to persevere in justice. As early as the 5th century, it was the authentic teaching of the Church that “no one, not even he who has been renewed by the grace of Baptism, has sufficient strength to overcome the snares of the devil and to vanquish the concupiscence of the flesh unless he obtains help from God each day to persevere in a good life” [H. Denzinger, ibid., 241]. The Council of Trent speaks of “the special help of God” in this regard (ibid. 1572). This canon is open to various interpretations [see A. Michel, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. Vacant et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 12.1:1283–86]. Sacred Scripture, by teaching that man’s life is warfare (Eph 6.11–17) and by insisting on the need for prayer (Mt 6.13), makes men very much aware that sanctifying grace, while making them God’s sons, does not remove the weaknesses of fallen nature. Special help from God is a moral necessity. While the Church has never defined this special help with any precision, theologians usually speak of it in terms of God’s providential protection in the external order of a man’s life (see St. Thomas Aquinas, C. gent. 3.155) and the actual graces that illuminate the intellect and give inspiration to the will. Whatever its nature, this special help is given to all the just. St. Paul writes, “But the Lord is faithful, who will strengthen you and guard you from evil” (2 Thes 3.3; cf. 1 Thes 5.23–24; Rom 8.31–33; 1 Cor 10.13). The Church also authoritatively expresses this teaching by quoting St. Augustine: “God ‘does not abandon’ those who have been justified by his grace ‘unless they abandon Him first’” [H. Denzinger, ibid., 1537].

Death in the State of Grace. So much for the grace of potential perseverance, a great benefit from God. Theologians speak of an even greater benefit, the grace of final perseverance. This grace, inestimable because of the utter seriousness of man’s hour of death, is the coinciding of the state of grace with the hour of death. It is the watchful protection of God, who so arranges—in the inscrutable mystery of His providential designs—the events of a man’s life that the moment of death comes while he is persevering in the grace of Christ. Dying in the state of grace is no accident. It is God's most special gift, most special because it is distinct from all other graces and benefits, and most special because it is had only by those who are saved. One is face to face here with the mystery of God's grace and man's liberty. If a man dies in the grace of Christ, the thanks belong to God. If a man dies in serious sin, the fault is his own. Theologians disagree in their ultimate explanations of this mystery because of differing views on predestination and the mystery of efficacious GRACE. However, all Catholic theologians agree that final perseverance is a greater benefit from God than the grace of potential perseverance. The magisterium of the Church has never solemnly defined the matter. It is the common teaching of Catholic doctrine.

The Bible contains no explicit teaching on the grace of final perseverance. The doctrine, however, is an expression in theological categories of the biblical theme of divine election. The question developed in the consciousness of the Church at the time of the struggles with the Pelagians. As the theologian reflects on this doctrine at the present time, it is a theological conclusion that flows from the mystery of divine predestination and efficacious grace.

How does the just man obtain the grace of final perseverance? Does he MERIT this conjoining of grace and death? The answer is in the negative. The GOOD WORKS of a man in grace are gifts from God. They are also the good merits of the man himself. According to the Council of Trent, good works merit an "increase of grace, life everlasting, and, provided that a man dies in the state of grace, the attainment of that life everlasting and an increase of glory" [H. Denzinger, ibid., 1582]. As this text illustrates, final perseverance is not an object of merit. Rather it is the condition for meriting the attainment of everlasting life. St. Thomas gives us the explanation [Summa theologiae, 1a2ae, 114.9]. The object of merit is the term of a good action, not the principle. Final perseverance depends on God's action that inclines the just man to good works until death. This motion from God is the principle of the good action. Thus, final perseverance cannot be merited. It is the very ground for meriting the attainment of eternal life. How, then, is the just man to persevere to the end, if such a grace is not the object of merit? The answer is prayer. The Scriptures give assurance that God infallibly hears the prayers that seek the true well-being of the just man (Mt 7.7; Mk 11.24; Lk 11.9). The theologians have discussed the conditions necessary for such infallible prayer [see St. Thomas, Summa theologiae, 2a2ae, 85 ad 2]. The grace of final perseverance is the supreme object of the just man's prayer. The just man will receive this grace—if he assiduously seeks it in true prayer.

See Also: DEATH (THEOLOGY OF); GRACE, ARTICLES ON; PREDESTINATION, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 12.1:1256–1304. K. JÜSSEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 2:123–124. THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae, 1a2ae, 114.9. J. JAROSZEWICZ, De dono perseverantiae finalis (Kielce 1932). S. GONZÁLEZ, Sacrae theologiae summa, ed. Fathers of the Society of Jesus, Professors of the Theological Faculties in Spain, 4 v. (Madrid 1958–62); Biblioteca de autores cristianos (Madrid 1945–) 3.3:60–70. H. LANGE, De gratia (Freiburg 1929).

[J. J. CONNELLY]

PERSIA

Persia is the European name for the plateau land in the Near East extending from the lowlands of Mesopotamia to India. The native name has always been Iran, from Aryan. The name Persia is derived from the southwestern province of modern Fars, called Persis by the Greeks and Parsa by the ancient Persians. The political boundaries of Persia have changed throughout its long history, but at its peak, it encompassed not only the sovereign nation now known as Iran, but also the entire Iranian cultural area, including Afghanistan, Central Asia, and the Transcaucasus.

The Aryan invaders of the plateau probably came from the north in successive waves, beginning about the 16th century B.C. or earlier. Cuneiform inscriptions from this early period reveal Aryan personal names and Aryan deities. Although the Aryans or Indo-Iranians may have come into the Near East and into India both from over the Caucasus and through Central Asia, the expansion of the Iranians in the 9th century B.C. seems to have come mostly from the Caucasus. The Iranian tribes spread over the plateau and settled down in areas to some of which they gave their names. The two main tribes of the western section were the Mada or Medes and the Parsa or Persians. Others were the Asagarta or Sagartians in the central portion, and the Parthians, Bactrians, Sogdians, Khwarazmians, and others in eastern regions. From the Avesta and from the Old Persian inscriptions, one may surmise that the Iranian tribes were subdivided into clans and extended families. For example, Darius, son of Vishtaspa, belonged to the family of the Achaemenids, the clan of the Pasargadai, and the tribe of the Parsa. When the tribes settled down, the clans lost their importance, and tribal loyalties were tempered by a greater national or imperial allegiance.

The earliest Iranian state recorded in history was that of the MEDES. The frequent raids of the Assyrians probably brought the Medes together into a confederacy and then into a kingdom (c. 700 B.C.). At that time an invasion of Cimmerians and Scythians from the north disrupted the Median state. The Medes recovered and defeated the Assyrians, taking their place in creating an empire. The Medes in turn were overthrown (c. 549 B.C.) by the Persians under CYRUS II.

Achaemenid Dynasty. Cyrus II (559–530) took over the empire of the Medes and extended its frontiers. He captured Sardis (c. 547 B.C.) and took prisoner Croesus, king of Lydia, annexing his kingdom. The Greek cities of Ionia were absorbed later, one by one. In 539 Cyrus entered Babylon and brought an end to the kingdom of Nabu-na'id (Nabonidus). He further incorporated Syria and Palestine into his extensive empire. Evidence points to the tolerance of Cyrus in respect to subject peoples; his ending of the Jewish Exile in Babylon is well known from the Bible. Cyrus was killed while fighting against nomads in Central Asia.

Cambyses II (530–522), the son and successor of Cyrus II, conquered Egypt; but then a revolt broke out in Persis, and during his return journey Cambyses died, probably from an accident. According to the Behistun inscription of DARIUS I (522–486) and classical sources, the revolt in Persis was led by a Magian who claimed to be Bardiya (Greek Smerdis), Cambyses' brother who was supposed to have been secretly murdered by Cambyses before he left for Egypt. Some scholars discount Darius's story and claim that Bardiya was the true brother of Cambyses and that Darius overthrew him in 522. In any case, Darius was the real organizer of the Achaemenid empire.

Darius started building palaces at Persepolis; his capital, however, at least in winter, was at Susa, although Ecbatana and Babylon retained their past importance. Herodotus (8.98) tells of the various institutions of the Achaemenid empire, such as the postal service, the royal road from Susa to Sardis, the special agents of the king, and the bureaucracy. The lingua franca of the bureaucracy was apparently Aramaic, and inscriptions in this language have been found all over the area of the Achaemenid empire. It would seem that Darius also instigated a revision and codification of the laws in use in various parts of the empire. The Iranian word for law, dāta, was borrowed by Akkadian, Hebrew, and Aramaic, indicating the importance of law to the Achaemenid rulers. Darius also made a new division of satrapies or provinces of the empire, and Herodotus (3.89) lists 20. Darius further reorganized the system of taxes and tribute. The ruling Persians were exempted from paying taxes, since they supplied troops and officials. The royal guard was called "the Immortals" by Herodotus (7.83), but in time of war a vast army of various peoples from all over the empire could be assembled. Herodotus (7.61) gives a description of the various contingents of the army of Xerxes that invaded Greece.

The coinage of the Achaemenid empire was in gold, silver, and copper. The first, the daric, called στατήρ by the Greeks, shows the king kneeling with a bow and could have been minted only by the Achaemenid ruler. Silver and copper coins were struck by satraps and generals, while some autonomous cities, such as the Phoenician seaports, also struck their own coins. The striking of gold coins by a satrap was usually a sign of rebellion. The gold daric, probably so called after Darius, weighed 8.4 grams, and the silver shekel, Greek σίγλος, was 5.6 grams. The silver-to-gold ratio was $13\frac{1}{3}$ to 1. The imperial coinage, however, apparently did not have a wide circulation, for Greek silver coins have been found in various parts of the Achaemenid empire, from pre-Alexander hoards, which attest the importance of Greek commerce in the 4th century B.C.

The empire reached its largest extent under Darius, who invaded the Balkans and south Russia c. 510 B.C. He was unsuccessful in this campaign against the Scythians (Herodotus 4.83–92), but many lands north of Greece submitted to the Persians. The defeat of Darius at Marathon in 490 B.C. is well known, but only after the final defeat of the Persians in 478 B.C., in the time of Xerxes (486–465), was the Achaemenid empire put on the defensive. Egypt proved to be the most rebellious province of the empire and was lost and regained several times before Alexander's conquests. Persian gold and bribery proved more effectual than the army of Xerxes in Achaemenid relations with the Greeks.

The history of the empire after Xerxes, from the time of Artaxerxes I (465–424) on, is one of intrigues, assassinations, and dominance of the central government by the harem. That the empire was able to survive is a tribute to the fine organization of the state and bureaucracy by the early Achaemenids. One attempt to seize power is known through Xenophon's Anabasis, the story of 10,000 Greek mercenaries employed by Cyrus the Younger in his ill-fated attempt to overthrow his brother Artaxerxes II (404–359) in 401. Later, Egypt and several satrapies in Anatolia were able to gain and maintain their independence. It seemed as though the Achaemenid empire were falling apart. The accession of the capable monarch Artaxerxes III (359–338) was the beginning of a reconsolidation of the empire. Egypt was reconquered, and the rebel satraps were won back to allegiance. The murder of Artaxerxes, however, coincided with the conquest of Greece by Philip of Macedon. The last Achaemenid, Darius III Codommanus, had to face ALEXANDER THE GREAT and lost his empire at the battle of Gaugamela in 331 B.C.

The οἰκουμένη (world) of the Achaemenids made a great impression on later peoples, but the lack of a historical tradition in their homeland caused the Persians to forget the Achaemenids, although the memory of a Persian world empire did persist in legend in later times. The bureaucracy, using Aramaic, was maintained by Alexander and his successors of the Seleucid dynasty side by side with Greek. For the Persians, however, the period from the death of Alexander in 323 B.C. to the establishment of the Sasanian dynasty c. A.D. 225 was a dark age of warring princes.

Hellenism had an even greater influence in the Orient than Achaemenid culture had, and the Seleucid empire, as well as the Greco-Bactrian kingdom in the area of present Afghanistan, maintained Greek political dominance until the Parthians took over the Seleucid heritage in the west and the Kushans that of the Greco-Bactrians in the east of the Iranian Plateau. The founding of many cities by Greeks in the east, with the Greek πόλις (city-state) culture, provided important avenues of influence on the local populations. Undoubtedly the Greek colonists were influenced also by the Iranian peoples among whom they settled. The mother of Antiochus I, son and successor of Seleucus I, who was killed in 281 B.C., was an Iranian noblewoman. The mixture of Greeks and Iranians must have proceeded apace. Strabo in his geography (11.509) well characterized Seleucid rule in the east when he said that they were so occupied with wars (in the Mediterranean area) that they could not attend to their remote possessions.

A chronological list of the rulers of the Achaemenid Dynasty follows:

1. Achaemenes (Hakhamanish)
2. Teispes (Chishpish)
3. Cyrus I (Kurush)
4. Cambyses I (Kambujiya)
5. Cyrus II (559–530 B.C.)
6. Cambyses II (530–522)
7. Smerdis (Bardiya or Gaumata; 522)
8. Darius I (Darayavahush; 522–486)
9. Xerxes I (Khshayarsha; 486–465)
10. Artaxerxes I Longimanus (Artakshassa; 465–424)
11. Xerxes II (424–423)
12. Darius II Nothus (423–404)
13. Artaxerxes II Mnenon (404–359)
14. Artaxerxes III Ochus (359–338)
15. Arses (Arsha) (338–336)
16. Darius III (336–330)

Arsacid Dynasty. The heirs of the Seleucids in Persia were the Parthians. Parthia was the Achaemenid satrapy covering most of the modern Province of Khurasan, but the rise of Parthia was caused probably by nomadic invaders from Central Asia, chief of whom was a tribe called the Parni by Strabo (11.508). The first ruler of the new state was Arsaces (Parthian Arshak), a name that became a generic term for later rulers. Most of the Parthian coins have only “Arsaces” on them, making identifications of various rulers very difficult. The Arsacid Dynasty was founded c. 250 B.C., but the expansion of the state was slow. The Seleucids regarded the Parthians as rebels against their authority similar to other rebels in the East. The Seleucid Antiochus III probably brought the Parthians back under Seleucid suzerainty between 209 and 189 B.C., when Antiochus was defeated by the Romans at the battle of Magnesia.

The real founder of the Parthian empire was Mithradates I, who became ruler c. 171 B.C. He had to fight against ANTIOCHUS IV EPIPHANES, who tried to restore Seleucid hegemony but died in 164. In 141 Mithradates entered Seleucia on the Tigris. The Seleucid King Demetrius II Nikator was defeated and captured by Mithradates in 139. In the reign of Phraates II (138–128), son and successor of Mithradates I, Antiochus VII tried to restore Seleucid rule in Mesopotamia and Persia. Although successful at first, he was subsequently defeated and slain by the Parthians. Phraates, however, lost his life in battle against nomadic invaders in eastern Iran. His uncle and successor Artabanus II (128–123) also was killed in the east, but Mithradates II (c. 123–87 B.C.), son of Artabanus, restored Arsacid power in the east, defeated the Armenians, and concluded the first treaty with Rome in 92. Even before the death of Mithradates II, however, the Parthian state suffered from revolts, and a period of disorders prevailed. King Tigranes of Armenia extended his boundaries, much at Parthian expense. It was not until Phraates III (69–57 B.C.) that Parthian unity was restored.

Although the early Parthian kings were known as Philhellenes and used Greek on their coins, their empire was variegated under many local feudal rulers and local influences. There were many vassal states and autonomous Greek cities in the Parthian domain. The most important of the latter was Seleucia on the Tigris.

The actual territory of imperial rule under the Parthians was not extensive, comprising mostly the lands on the plateau following the trade route described by Isidore of Charax in his Parthian Stations. In the east, the region of modern Kandahar in Afghanistan was probably under an independent Indo-Parthian state, although at times it may have submitted to Arsacid rule. In Mesopotamia there was a series of vassal states: OSRHOENE (Edessa), Gordyene, Adiabene, and in the south, Mesene, also called Characene. Ancient Elam was a kingdom called Elymais, and in Persis there were local rulers called frataraka

(more likely than fratadara). Azerbaijan in the north, called Atropatene, also was a vassal state, and there may have been others.

The Parthians had their own era of time reckoning beginning from 247 B.C., but the Seleucid era, from 311 B.C., was widely used all over the Near East. Although remains from the early Parthians show an overwhelming influence of Hellenism in both art and objects of material culture, native features became more prominent with the passage of time. The first Christian century seems to have been the period of greatest change, when Parthian replaced Greek as the language of administration, and Parthian appeared together with a debased Greek in the coin legends. A token of the change was the seven-year revolt of Seleucia (A.D. 35–42) and the subsequent founding of a new though short-lived capital, Voloesia, by the Parthian king.

During the last two centuries of Parthian rule, the kingdom was on the defensive, against the Romans in the west and the Kushans in the east. The latter, invaders from Central Asia, established a kingdom in the area of present-day Afghanistan and northwest India in the 1st Christian century. Under the Kings Kanishka and Huvishka, whose dates are uncertain, the Kushans expanded, in the west probably at the expense of the Parthians, although there is no source material. The Kushan rulers were patrons of BUDDHISM and of the Buddhist art called Gandharan.

The wars with Rome began with the defeat and death of Crassus at Carrhae in 53 B.C. Mark Antony defeated the Parthians in 36 B.C. but suffered a setback in the following year. Under Augustus, peace was made between the two empires, and for a time pro-Roman rulers sat on the throne of Parthia. In the middle of the first Christian century a conflict over Armenia broke out, and a Roman army under Corbulo invaded Parthian domains. In A.D. 63 peace was restored, leaving Roman suzerainty over Armenia but with the presence of a Parthian royal family, the origin of the Arsacids of Armenia.

The later history of Parthia is filled with civil wars and rival claimants to the throne. The Romans took advantage of the internal struggles of the Parthians to invade Mesopotamia, under Trajan. He occupied Ctesiphon, the Parthian capital opposite Seleucia, in A.D. 115 and then sailed down the Tigris to the Persian Gulf. In 117, however, Trajan had to retreat, and after his death his successor Hadrian made peace and evacuated Parthian domains. The Parthians under Vologeses III (148–192) in turn invaded Syria in 161, provoking a Roman reaction. A Roman army again conquered Ctesiphon in 165, but an epidemic caused the Romans to retreat. Septimius Severus fought the Parthians, and in 198

he captured Ctesiphon but again could not hold it long. None of the Roman expeditions succeeded in taking the Arab-fortified city of Hatra in northern Mesopotamia, which always remained a threat to the Roman line of communications in Mesopotamia. As a result of internal strife and the Roman invasions, the Parthian state was greatly weakened. From c. 211 to the end of the kingdom (c. 227) there were two rival kings in Parthia, Vologeses V and Artabanus V, known from their coins. The invasion of Parthian territory in the north by Caracalla was matched by the rebellion of a vassal prince in Persis. By 226 Ardashir I, founder of the Sasanian empire, had overthrown both Parthian kings.

The rulers of the Arsacid Dynasty are listed below (most dates are approximate):

1. Arsaces I (247–? B.C.)
2. Tiridates (?–211)
3. Artabanus I (211–191)
4. Priapatius (191–176)
5. Phraates I (176–171)
6. Mithradates I (171–138)
7. Phraates II (138–128)
8. Artabanus II (128–123)
9. Mithradates II (123–87)
10. Gotarzes I (91–c. 80)
11. Orodes I (?–77)
12. Sinatrukes (80–69)
13. Phraates III (69–57)
14. Mithradates III (57–55)
15. Orodes II (57–37)
16. Phraates IV (38–2)
17. Tiridates II (30–25)
18. Phraataces (2 B.C.–A.D. 4)
19. Orodes III (4–7)
20. Vonones I (7–12)
21. Artabanus III (12–38)
22. Tiridates III (36)
23. Vardanes (39–47)
24. Gotarzes II (38–51)
25. Vonones II (51)
26. Vologeses I (51–80)
27. Artabanus IV (80–81)
28. Pakores (79–115)
29. Oroses (109–128)
30. Vologeses II (105–147)
31. Mithradates IV (128–147?)
32. Vologeses III (148–192)
33. Vologeses IV (191–207)
34. Vologeses V (207–227)
35. Artabanus V (213–224)
36. Artavasdes (226–c. 227)

Sasanian dynasty. The rise of Ardashir, son of Papak, descended from Sasan, parallels the story of Cyrus, founder of the Achaemenid Dynasty. Papak established his capital at Istakhr, near Persepolis, and he and then Ardashir extended the frontiers of their principality. The conquest of Mesene by Ardashir brought him into conflict with his Parthian overlords. Much fighting was necessary before Ardashir was able to take the place of the Parthian ruler. His victory over Artabanus V is symbolically represented on a bas-relief at Naqsh-i Rostam, near Persepolis; another success, possibly over Artavases, son of Artabanus, is depicted on a rock carving near Firuzabad.

In the east, Ardashir wrested much territory from the Kushans and possibly secured Kushan submission to his overlordship. Unfortunately the chronology of the early Sasanian rulers is disputed, and dates of accession and other events may vary by as much as 3 years. Ardashir became "King of Kings," with more power than the Parthian monarch, who had ruled more as the chief of many feudal princes than as a king or emperor.

Shapur I, son and successor of Ardashir, seems to have been the Darius of his time. Shortly after becoming king he defeated the Romans in a battle in which the Emperor Gordian III (238–244) was killed. The new Emperor, Philip the Arab (244–249), sued for peace and paid a heavy tribute to the Persians. A decade later a dispute over Armenia led to an invasion of Roman territory by Shapur in 256 (or in 253 according to some scholars). Antioch, capital of the Roman East, was captured, as well as many cities in Syria and Cappadocia. In 259 the Roman Emperor Valerian (253–260) was defeated and captured by Shapur, who proclaimed this extraordinary event on several bas-reliefs and in a great trilingual (Greek, Parthian, and Middle Persian) inscription at Naqsh-i Rostam. Persian troops again ravaged Syria and Anatolia, but on the return trip to Ctesiphon, Odenathus, king of PALMYRA, defeated the Persian army and secured much booty. From 260 to 263 the troops of Palmyra dominated northern Mesopotamia. The Romans put an end to Palmyra, and in 283 the Emperor Carus captured Ctesiphon. Internal disorders and wars in the East reduced Persian resistance, but the Romans retreated. Sporadic warfare ended in 296 with a truce favorable to Rome, by which Armenia and parts of northern Mesopotamia remained under Roman rule.

The long rule of Shapur II (309–379) saw a renewal of the struggle with Rome. The conversion of the king of Armenia to Christianity c. 298 and of the Roman Emperor CONSTANTINE I two decades later brought religious factors into the struggle of the two powers. In 337, the year Constantine died, Shapur II laid siege to NISIBIS, but fighting was desultory until Julian the Apostate (361–363) invaded the Sasanian domain. He was killed near Ctesiphon, and his successor, Jovian (363–364), made peace by relinquishing Armenia and many Roman possessions in northern Mesopotamia, including the key fortress of Nisibis, to the Persians. One of the features of the reign of Shapur II was his persecution of the Christians living within the Sasanian empire. Persian policy in this matter varied, and under Yazdagird I (399–421) Christians were not molested, although at the end of his reign persecutions were resumed. Varahran (Bahram) V (421–439), known to popular tradition as Gor (the onager) because of his prowess in the hunt, lost a war to Rome in 422, and in the peace treaty he guaranteed freedom of worship to the Christians.

In the second half of the 5th century the Sasanian empire in the east was subjected to invasions of HUNS or Hephthalites from Central Asia. Peroz (459–484) lost his family and his life in fighting them. His son Kavad I (488–531) was restored to the throne in 499 with the aid of the Hephthalites, after a revolution had deposed him. These eastern successors of the Kushans usually proved more than a match for the Sasanian armies. It should be noted that NESTORIANISM became the dominant form of Christianity in Iran, especially after a synod in 483 favored Nestorianism in the Sasanian domains.

Kavad I (488–531) is noted for his espousal of the Mazdakites, a communist sect of Zoroastrianism (see ZOROASTER) that flourished at the beginning of his reign. Toward the close of Kavad's reign, however, his son together with the chiefs of the Zoroastrian faith instigated a massacre of the Mazdakites. Afterward the name Mazdakite vanished, but it reappeared again and again in Persia as the term for arch-heretics even in Islamic times.

Khusrau I (Khusro, Chosroes; 531–579), surnamed Anushirvan (immortal soul), reestablished orthodoxy and made peace with the Byzantine Emperor JUSTINIAN I (527–565) in 532. He instituted a new system of taxation, based probably on a post-Diocletian Roman model, with a fixed sum based on the land, rather than a variable amount based on yield. A reform of the bureaucracy was carried out, especially after the disruption caused by the Mazdakites. Later in Khusrau's reign, war against Justinian broke out again. Khusrau was able to capture Antioch, but the armistice of 561 left matters much the same as before the hostilities.

Following Khusrau's reign, the throne of Persia changed hands several times in a short period, and weak rulers and rebels hindered stability in the empire. The Hephthalites in the east were defeated by new invaders from Central Asia, the Turks, and after initial cooperation, hostilities between Persians and Turks followed. Under Khusrau II Parviz (591–628), the Sasanian empire reached a pinnacle, but after his time it suffered a rapid decline. In 602, after the assassination of the Emperor Maurice (582–602), Khusrau invaded the Byzantine Empire. Antioch was taken in 611, Jerusalem in 614; and shortly afterward Egypt was conquered, and Persian troops appeared before Constantinople. A brilliant counterstroke by the Emperor Heraclius (610–641) carried the war to the heart of the Sasanian empire. In 624 he invaded Azerbaijan and then Mesopotamia. Khusrau was assassinated, and the Sasanian empire fell into disorder. The Persians, by the terms of the peace treaty, evacuated all Byzantine territories. Thereafter one Sasanian ruler followed another in rapid succession, until Yazdagird III (632–651), the grandson of Khusrau, ascended the throne.

The rulers of the Sasanian Dynasty are listed as follows:

1. Papak King (208–222?)
2. Shapur King (c. 222)
3. Ardashir I King of Kings (222?–240)
4. Shapur I King of Kings (240–c. 272)
5. Hormizd I Ardashir (272–273)
6. Varahran (Bahram) I (273–276)
7. Varahran II (276–293)
8. Varahran III (293)
9. Nerseh (293–302)
10. Hormizd II (302–309)
11. Shapur II (309–379)
12. Ardashir II (379–383)
13. Shapur III (383–388)
14. Varahran IV (388–399)
15. Yazdagird I (399–421)
16. Varahran V (421–439)
17. Yazdagird II (439–457)
18. Hormizd III (457–459)
19. Peroz (459–484)
20. Valash (484–488)
21. Kavad I (488–531)
22. Zamasp (496–498)
23. Khusro I (531–579)
24. Hormizd IV (579–590)
25. Varahran Chobin (590–591)
26. Khusro II (591–628)
27. Kavad II (628)
28. Ardashir III (628–629)
29. Boran (629–630)
30. Hormizd V Khusro III (630–c. 632)
31. Yazdagird III (c. 632–651)

Persia under Islam. The rise of Islam in the Middle East brought a speedy end to the Sasanian empire. In the battles of Qadisiya in 637 and Nihavend in 641, the Persians were defeated, and Yazdagird fled from the Arabs eastward until he was killed (651) near the city of Merv in Central Asia.

The Arab conquest of Islam brought an end not only to the state but also to the official Zoroastrian church. Zo-roastrians became fewer; eventually only a few thousand existed in the country, primarily in Yazd and Kirman. Others, however, fled to India, where their descendants, primarily in Bombay, the PARSEES, became a flourishing community.

The early history of Persia under Islam should be distinguished from the history of the Arabs in Persia. For several centuries, under the Umayyad and early 'ABBĀSID Caliphates, many conversions to Islam took place, but old Persian customs, such as the celebration of Noruz or new year's day, remained little changed. The writing of Persian in the cumbersome Pahlavi script became more and more restricted to Zoroastrian priests, while Arabic became the language of government and bureaucracy and also of literature and learning. There are indications, however, that spoken Persian was widely used in the eastern Islamic world, not only by natives but also by the Arabs as a lingua franca. Probably in the second half of the 9th century, Persian was written down in the Arabic alphabet. The resultant flowering of New Persian literature at the court of the independent dynasts in Bukhara, the Samanids, ushered in a new phase of Persian culture. The New Persian renaissance, as it has been called by some scholars, was based on an Islamic-Persian language and literature, a brilliant and successful fusion of ancient Iranian (not just Persian, but also Sogdian, Parthian, and Khwarazmian) elements with the Arab-Islamic culture from the Arabic-speaking Near East. Henceforth Islam was not bound to Arab or Bedouin mores and backgrounds but became universal, a manifold and variegated world culture. The Samanids ruled Central Asia and Khurasan from c. 875 to 999.

Boyd, Turkish, and Mongol Dynasties. The 10th century saw the rise also of petty principalities in western Persia, the most important of which was the Boyd Dynasty, which ruled western Persia and Mesopotamia, including the caliphal capital Baghdad, until 1055. Under the Boyids there was an interesting flowering of pro-Islamic motifs in art and other domains. For example, the ancient title shah an-shah (king of kings) reappears in the sources. The Boyids participated also in the New Persian renaissance, but rule passed from the hands of the Iranians to the Turks after the turn of the millennium.

The SELJUK Turks took Baghdad in 1055 and soon established a large empire extending from Central Asia to the Mediterranean Sea. The empire was organized along feudal lines, and the Persian language was generally the language of administration. The extent of Persian influence on the Turks is revealed by such books as the Siyasat name (book of state) by Nizam al-Mulk, the prime minister of the Seljuk Sultan Malikshah. The Turks were replaced by Mongols, who ruled over Persia from c. 1256 to 1335.

Turko-Mongol rule in Persia brought into the land many influences from Central Asia and even China. Pottery and miniature painting both reflected strong Far Eastern elements, and the administration and army also were greatly influenced. This can be seen in the many words and terms introduced into Persian from the Turkish and even Mongolian languages, e.g., ordu (army) and tufangchi (rifleman). Persian influence on the Turks, however, was much stronger than the reverse, and even OTTOMAN sultans composed poetry in Persian rather than Turkish.

After the Mongol Dynasty of the Il-Khans, Persia was ruled for a short period (c. 1380–1469) by TIMUR (Tamerlane) and his successors. These Central-Asian Turkish rulers, with their capitals of Samarqand or Herat, were great patrons of the arts and literature. Under them the regions of Central Asia and present Afghanistan experienced a flowering of culture, the architectural remains of which still embellish the cities mentioned above.

Safavid Dynasty. The modern history of Persia really begins with the rise of the SAFAVID dynasty in 1500. Although these rulers were also Turkish in origin, they espoused the SHI'ITE form of Islam and established a state church different from the SUNNI faith that prevailed elsewhere. The land again had a national solidarity closely resembling that of Sasanian and even Achaemenid times. The militant Shi'ite state soon came into conflict with its neighbors, and just as in the past, Persia had to fight on two fronts, the Ottoman Empire in the west and a new Özbek Turkish state in Central Asia, both Sunni. So the wars of the 16th and 17th centuries were religiously as well as politically motivated.

The greatest of the Safavid rulers was Shah 'Abbas I (1587–1629), who defeated both Ottoman Turks and Özbeks (or Uzbeks, a Turkic people of the region north of Afghanistan), but who is known chiefly for his building activity, especially in his new capital of Isfahan, where some of the masterpieces of Persian architecture are found. Shah 'Abbas also moved rebellious people from one part of his kingdom to another, a common practice as old as the Assyrian Empire. Some Kurds were moved from their homeland in western Persia to Khurasan, while Armenians were transferred from Julfa in Transcaucasia to a suburb of Isfahan that they called New Julfa. The Armenian church and other buildings of New Julfa are surviving masterpieces of Safavid architecture. Under Shah 'Abbas, Europeans began to arrive in Persia as merchants, missionaries, and even as mercenaries. The British East India Company established a base on the island of Hormuz in the Persian Gulf (c. 1622).

The later Safavids proved so weak that in 1722 a force of Sunni Afghans under a chief called Mahmud was able to take the Safavid capital of Isfahan. As a result of the ensuing disorders in Persia, foreign powers were able to annex parts of the land. In the north, PETER I (THE GREAT) OF RUSSIA took the Caspian Provinces of Gilan and Mazandaran (1723), as well as Baku and parts of Transcaucasia that had been under Persian rule. The Ottoman Turks invaded Azerbaijan, Kirmanshah, and Hamadan and in 1724 made a treaty with Russia that in effect divided northern Persia between them.

For the Safavid period of history there are fortunately many European travel accounts and a valuable chronicle of the Carmelites who were established at Isfahan. As a result of the disintegration of central authority following the Afghan occupation, however, many of the western Europeans established in the country left, so that there is less information about the 18th century than about the earlier periods.

The Safavids represented the high point of culture in modern Persian history. From the time of their rule come the finest rugs, miniatures, and architecture in the history of Persia. Such was the fame of Shah 'Abbas as a builder that even today the common folk believe most Islamic ruins in the country were edifices raised by the Safavid ruler. The elegance of the court of the grand sophy, as the ruler of Persia was called in Western sources, has been described by several European embassies. The importance of Safavid religious leaders, such as Mulla Muhammad Baqir al-Majlisi, in laying the present foundations of Shi'ite Islam must be emphasized. Philosophy also, which enjoyed little development in the Ottoman Empire, experienced a revival in Persia, especially in the Ishraqi (illuminationist) school of Mulla Sadra of Shiraz and others.

The Afghan occupation did not last long, for a new conqueror rose in Khurasan, a Turk called Nadir from the Afshar tribe. In 1729 he took Isfahan from Mahmud's successor, Ashraf the Afghan, but Nadir was not crowned ruler until 1736, when he deposed 'Abbas III, the boy Safavid ruler. Nadir Shah made many military expeditions, enlarging Persia's frontiers. In 1739 he took and plundered Delhi, and in the following year he obtained the submission of the Özbeks in Turkistan, including Bukhara, Samarqand, and Khiva. In 1742 he conquered part of Daghistan and much of the Caucasus area. The empire built by Nadir Shah quickly fell apart, however, after his assassination in 1747.

The chronology of the rulers of the Safavid Dynasty is as follows:

1. Ismail I (1500–24)
2. Tahmasp I (1524–76)
3. Ismail II (1576–77)
4. Muhammad Khudabanda (1577–87)
5. 'Abbas I (1587–1629)
6. Sail I (1629–42)

7. 'Abbas II (1642–67)
8. Sulaiman (1667–94)
9. Husain (1694–1722)
10. Tahmasp II (1730–32)
11. 'Abbas III (1732–36)

Qajar Dynasty. From 1750 to 1779 Karim Khan Zand, with his capital at Shiraz, maintained unity and order in the country, but at his death troubles recurred, and only in 1794 did a eunuch Called Aga Muhammad reunite the country. This tyrant was assassinated in 1797, and his nephew Fath 'Ali Shah ascended the throne as the real founder of the Qajar Dynasty. During Fath 'Ali Shah's reign, the European powers brought Persia into the international politics and diplomacy of the Napoleonic period. British and French rivalry in Persia was replaced by British and Russian rivalry, after the final defeat of Napoleon. In 1813, after a disastrous war with Russia, Persia was obliged by the Treaty of Gulistan to cede her Transcaucasian possessions, save Armenia, to Russia. Another war ended in 1828 with the Treaty of Turkmanchai, whereby the boundary between Russia and Persia was set at the Aras River and Russia obtained extraterritorial rights in the domains of the shah.

The 19th-century history of Persia is largely the story of Russian and British diplomacy trying to obtain a favored position at the court of the shah. A new religious movement called BABISM was partially suppressed with the execution of its leader, the Bab, in 1850, but his successor, Baha Allah, changed the movement and founded the religion known as BAHAI'ISM, which, with the flight from Persia of the leader and many of his followers, became an international faith. Baha'is, however, have continued to exist in Persia down to the present day.

The Persians captured Herat from the Afghans in 1856, but the British declared war on Persia and forced it to give up all Afghan territory in a treaty of 1857; the boundary between the two countries was not settled until 1872. Rivalry between the British and Russians was intensified with the Russian conquest of Central Asia in the second half of the 19th century. The growth of foreign influence usually took the form of loans to the shah, although more obvious indices of influence were the Persian Cossack brigade, trained and led by Russian officers, established in 1878, and the Imperial Bank of Persia opened by the British in 1889.

Nasir al-Din Shah was assassinated in 1896, a sign that the absolutism and tyranny of the Persian rulers would not last long. Not until December of 1905, however, did the revolution begin. The Persian revolution, from which dates the rise of contemporary Persia, began as a movement against the extension of foreign influences and as a protest against the corruption and tyranny of the prime minister of the shah. The revolutionary movement that began as a protest soon changed to a demand for a constitution and a representative assembly. After a great demonstration in the grounds of the British legation in July of 1906, the shah was constrained to agree to the convocation of an assembly (majlis) that met in the autumn of 1907 and drew up a constitution. Muzaffar al-Din Shah signed the order creating constitutional government in Persia shortly before his death on December 30 of the same year.

At the same time, the discovery of oil in the area heightened the interest of both the British and Russians in finally establishing hegemony. This conflict was temporarily resolved in 1907 with the Anglo-Russian Entente, which divided Persia into spheres of influence. During World War I, Persia was occupied by both Britain and Russia, but in 1921 the newly formed Soviet government renounced imperial claims to Persian lands.

The rulers of the Qajar Dynasty are as follows:

1. Aga Muhammad (1794–97)
2. Fath 'Ali Shah (1797–1835)
3. Muhammad Shah (1835–48)
4. Nasir al-Din Shah (1848–96)
5. Muzaffar al-Din Shah (1896–1906)
6. Muhammad 'Ali (1906–09)
7. Ahmad Shah (1909–25)

Pahlavi Dynasty. In 1921, a popular military officer named Reza Khan engineered a coup that established him as minister of war and later as prime minister. As Reza Khan's popularity eclipsed that of Ahmad Shah, the latter was forced into exile; in December of 1925, the majlis officially deposed the last of the Qajar rulers and elected Reza Khan hereditary shah.

Pro-Western in his approach, Reza Shah Pahlavi enacted a number of reforms intended to modernize Persia, including the official renaming of the country as Iran in 1935. His son and successor, Muhammad Reza Shah Palevi (1941–79), continued with pro-Western, pro-modernization reforms, but nationalist and Islamic opposition grew steadily. In 1979 the shah was deposed in a violent revolution and Iran officially became an Islamic republic under the cleric Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini.

See Also: IRAN, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Bibliography: Pre-Islamic history of Persia. R. N. FRYE, The Heritage of Persia (Cleveland 1963), extensive bibliog. The rise of the Safavids. L. LOCKHART, The Fall of the Safavī Dynasty and the Afghan Occupation of Persia (Cambridge, Eng. 1958). P. M. SYKES, A History of Persia, 2 v. (3d ed. London 1951), gen. popular hist. G. BARDY, "Les Églises de Perse et d'Arménie au V^e siècle," Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours, ed. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN (Paris 1935) 4:321–336, with bibliog. R. MAYER and W. DE VRIES, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:283–287, with bibliog.

[R. N. FRYE]

Bas-relief depicting winged monster, late 6th century B.C., Palace of Darius, Susa, Persia. (©Vanni Archive/CORBIS)

PERSIAN RELIGION, ANCIENT

Persian religion is defined here as the religion that prevailed in Persia from about the 6th century B.C. until the Muslim conquest in the 7th or 8th century A.D. and its subsequent replacement by Islam. It is now the faith of a very small minority in Persia and of the PARSEES settled in India since the 10th century A.D. It is often called Zoroastrianism, after the Greek form of the name of its traditional prophet or reformer Zoroaster, or Mazdaeism after the epithet of its supreme God AHURA MAZDA (Wise Lord), later Ohrmazd. The inadequacy of written documents and the lack of monuments explain the disagreement among specialists on even the most important points. To present a "generally accepted view" would be misleading. All that can be done is to describe sources and outline the most probable theories.

Sources. The main ancient source is the AVESTA, the sacred book of the Zoroastrians. It was discovered among the Parsees and deciphered by A. H. Anquetil-Duperron, who published a French translation (2 v. Paris 1771). The ancient form of Iranian, now known as Avestan, was soon seen to be akin to Sanskrit. Its interpretation was solidly established as a result of the progress of Indo-European philology in the 19th century. The Avesta is a series of books used mainly for liturgy. The Yasna is the text of the HAOMA sacrifice parallel to the Indian Soma. The rubrics are in middle Persian (i.e., Pahlavi) and, with greater detail, in Gujarati, an Indian language of the Bombay area. The oldest stratum, in an archaic dialect, are the GĀTHĀS, metrical poems attributed to ZOROASTER himself. The Visprat is a short addition to the Yasna. The Vidēvdāt (incorrectly Vendidād) comprises a miscellaneous collection of instructions regarding purifications after death and a penal code. Quite different in character is the collection of Yashts, some of them older than the Yasna, but some, late and awkward imitations; they are hymns to the gods presiding over each day of the month.

The Khortak (short) Avesta is a collection of prayers for the various hours of the day.

Other Avestan texts have survived only in Pahlavi commentaries; the Dēnkart, a Pahlavi encyclopedia compiled and partly composed in the 10th century A.D., summarizes the original books (Nasks) known in Sassanid times, most of which are now lost. The Yasna and Vidēvdāt were translated into and commented upon in Pahlavi. There is one ancient book dealing with eschatology, the Zand i Vohuman Yasht, preserved in a Pahlavi paraphrase, and portions of the Nask on the life of Zoroaster are embedded in a continuous narrative in book 7 of the Dēnkart.

Most of the extant Zoroastrian literature in Pahlavi dates from the 9th or 10th centuries. It is of great value because it is based on older tradition. The Būndahishn (Cosmology) gives an embryonic theology; the Zātspram contains the cosmological and eschatological myths; the Artāg Vīrāf describes a visit to heaven and hell; the Mēnōk-i-Khrat is a miscellaneous collection of ethical teachings; the Shkand Gumānīk Vicār, a philosophical refutation of Judaism, Christianity, Islam, and Manichaeism, betrays the influence of Greek philosophy and of Islamic theology.

The Gods. In the Gāthās the Yazatān (Worshipful Beings) form a group round Ahura Mazda, the one great God. They are Vohu Mann (the Good Spirit), Arta Vahishta (Best Righteousness, in a vast range of meanings), Khshathra Vairya (Desirable Rule), Āramaiti (Devotion, Obedience), the twins Haurvatāt (Integrity, Health), and Ameretāt (Immortality). G. Dumézil has shown that these are typically Iranian transformations of the earlier Indo-Iranian gods. Ahura Mazda, the supreme God, has taken the place of Varuna, while the other gods have been reduced to the status of his servants, Khshathra Vairya, for instance, taking the place of the warrior-god Indra.

The group was later called the AMESHA SPENTA, i.e., the Beneficent Immortals. Their rank is clearly less divine than that of the Adityas, their Indian parallels. The Amesha Spenta are patrons of the different spheres of creation: man, fire, metals, earth, plants, and waters. Some scholars have described them as aspects of the one God, though Mazdaean tradition clearly depicts them as His “creatures.” However, they are considered worthy of veneration, and the place they occupy in cult shows that they participate in the divine.

Zoroastrianism could thus be characterized as a qualified monotheism—with Ahura Mazda, as paramount God, alone described as creator—but with a certain vagueness about the status of the Amesha Spenta, probably because they come from beings who had a divine status before the Gāthās. Another indication of such a change is their vague and shifting character in the Gāthās. This makes it difficult to distinguish them without considering them in the light of their earlier history.

Ancient Persian fire altars, 5th century B.C., at Naksh-I-Rustem, Achaemenid Necropolis, near Persepolis, Iran. (The Catholic University of America)

Other primeval entities in the Gāthās are the Beneficent and the Evil Spirits whose conflict is described chiefly in Yasna 30. It is not clear what their relation is to the Amesha Spenta or whether the Evil Spirit was created by Ahura Mazda. The description of their personalities and conflict may reflect not a fully worked out system of thought but a myth expressing ethical and ritual dualism, good and bad ways of worship as well as of action. The ethical aspect became dominant and colored the subsequent cosmology. Yasna 30 may have been the theological interpretation of the myth of the god Zurvan (Time). He gives birth to the twins Ormazd and Ahriman, who triumph for alternating periods in the world they have created until the Good is finally victorious and Evil destroyed. Evidence of this myth is hardly earlier than the Sassanid period, and it was always repudiated by orthodox Mazdaeans. Yet it was certainly more than a bookish phantasy (see MANICHAISM), since later Muslim historians speak of it at length.

The Gāthās denounce those who do wrong to the Cow. Zoroaster is promised as its protector on earth, just as he is the helper on earth of the poor against violence and depredation. There is an obscure allusion to the slaying of the Bull, which is probably not so much a condemnation of animal sacrifice as of violence and orgiastic cults. The allusion may reflect, too, a remnant of Indo-Iranian reverence for the cow as providing milk and the necessities of life. Other helpers are Saoshyant (the Savior) and a chief Vishtāspa, who is the special protector of Zoroaster. Thanks to Vishtāspa, the cult will be maintained.

The eschatology of the Gāthās is fairly well worked out. Souls are tried at the Bridge, the world will be submitted to a fire of molten metal, the righteous will be saved and the wicked purified. The Yasna Haptanhati (Yasna of the Seven Chapters), which, judging by linguistic evidence, is slightly later than the Gāthās, stresses the importance of the fire cult, always paramount in Persian religion, and especially in the Yasna sacrifice. Many small fire shrines have been located by Muslim geographers and modern archeologists. Later parts of the Yasna name many other gods. There are hymns to Mithra, the god of contract (Yasht 10); to Ardvi Sura Anāhīta, the only important goddess, patroness of rivers and fecundity (Yasht 5); to Verethragna (later Vāhrām), the multiform god of strength, who gives his name to one of the most important fires (Yasht 14); to the FRAVASHIS, doubles of all men alive or to be born (Yasht 13, containing a long list of ancient heroes, a sketch of the mythical history of Iran). There is a similar passage in Yasna 9–11 in honor of the Haoma, the personified sacrificial plant offered with water and milk in the ceremony of the Yasna.

Zarathustra. Zarathustra (in Greek, Zoroaster) is given an important part in all these texts. Since the Gāthās do not mention the main gods of the Yasna and the Yashts, Zarathustra has been taken by most modern scholars to have been a reformer who repudiated the traditional Indo-Iranian gods and condemned the Haoma cult. According to the scholars mentioned, these two phases of worship were later reintroduced into the religion, which was still considered, however, to be that of Zarathustra. They have therefore sought to reconstruct the pre-Zoroastrian state of Persian religion from the data in the non-Gathic texts that are incompatible with the content of the Gāthās. Zarathustra thus appears as the prophet of a new reformed religion, approximating the role given to him in the Dēnkart. The problem is to explain how notions that are incompatible with the prophet's teaching were later reconciled with it. More recent research (e.g., that of M. Molé and R. C. Zaehner) suggests that the antagonism between the Gāthās and the later Avesta can be exaggerated and that in this case the argument a silentio is especially dangerous.

Zarathustra may have belonged to a priestly circle using an esoteric terminology. The date traditionally given to him is 258 years "before Alexander," i.e., probably 258 years before the sack of Persepolis in 330 B.C. Were the Gāthās written by him, or were they a liturgical text attributed to him as the priest par excellence (Molé)? His legend must have developed rapidly, since the Pahlavi resume of it is interspersed with literal translations from an Avestan text now lost. It presents the prophet's birth and childhood in a framework of miracles. Then come his Revelation as a dialogue with the Amesha Spenta, the wars waged by Vishtāspa on behalf of the new religion, and lastly the epochs of world history ending with Sōshyans.

In the Pahlavi works, Bundahishn and Zātspram, the cosmic dualism is fully worked out. Ahriman attempts to invade his rival's domain. Ohrmazd drives him out and, after an unsuccessful attempt at peace, creates the world as a bulwark against him. It is first created in spirit (mēnōk) and so remains 3,000 years. It then passes into actuality (gētī) and is mingled with the creatures of the Evil Principle. The fight lasts for 6,000 years with alternating triumphs and defeats, but the Good finally wins. Mēnōk and gētī are not opposed as spiritual and material. There is no trace of Platonic dualism, since all things have a mēnōk phase. This type of dualism is combined with another, that of the microcosm corresponding to the macrocosm, much as in the Corpus Hippocraticum. That the Iranian idea had priority over the Greek (A. Goetze) is no longer undisputed (J. Duchesne-Guillemin).

The Spread of Zoroastrianism and Its Problems.

The geographical environment of the oldest parts of the Avesta is Eastern Iran. When did Zoroastrianism come to Western Asia? The oldest texts, the inscriptions of the Achaemenids, contain the name of the supreme God, written Auramazda (the Behistun inscription of Darius I, 486 B.C.), and he is mentioned with "other gods," e.g. with Anāhīta and Mithra by Artaxerxes II (404–358 B.C.). Zarathustra is never mentioned, but that is not decisive in itself, and it should be noted that the ethical attitude is not unlike that of the Gāthās. It is possible that the Persian kings reflect a royal rather than a priestly form of Zoroastrianism. An inscription of Xerxes (486–65 B.C.) proclaiming the destruction of "the lairs of the DAĒVAS" shows only that various cults were in opposition to one another. Daēva came to mean demon in Persian, but in India it is the name for a class of gods. The Persians may have worshiped exclusively the other class, the Ahuras, of whom Varuna, renamed Ahura Mazda, became predominant and tended towards a monotheistic status. In India, there was no such antagonism between the classes of gods as in Persia, nor was there a tendency towards monotheism.

The earliest Greek author to speak of the Persian religion, Herodotus, describes the cult rendered to the elements and insists on the presence of the Magi, described as a Median tribe expert in ritual. These may have been responsible for much of the later development of Zoroastrianism as exemplified in the Vidēvdāt, which furnishes rules for the disposal of the dead (by exposure to carnivorous birds on the so-called "Towers of Silence," still in use among the Parsees), against coming into contact with dead matter, and on the great ceremony of purification called Bareshnūm; it presents also a code of law covering injury and assault, and the sacredness of the dog and sins against it.

Dualistic Features and Their Influence. In the Pahlavi books dualism is hardened into a thoroughgoing opposition on the cosmic as well as moral plane. Personal eschatology describes how three days after the soul has left the body it has a vision of a maiden, beautiful or repulsive; this is the soul's dāenā (religion) and leads it to the Bridge, which expands or narrows, and to judgment by Mithra, Sraosha, and Rashnu. These judge it according to its merits, and weigh it. The soul is then awarded heaven or hell. Hell is ultimately purified by a river of molten metal. Creation is not absorbed into it, and creatures find the perfection they have lacked. The gētī world returns to the mēnōk state. Time is not cyclical, despite Plutarch's account, and there is no transmigration of souls as in Indian religion.

The later literature of Zoroastrianism contains philosophical vindications of the dualist position. Most Muslim treatises on apologetics refute Zoroastrianism and describe its heresies. Manichaeism used Zoroastrian patterns, though Manichaean theology is decidedly opposed to Zoroastrianism. To appraise the influence of Zoroastrianism on Judaism one would need a detailed knowledge of Zoroastrianism as it was when the two religions were in contact during the Exile. Its apparent polytheism would have repelled the Jews, but the overwhelming personality of Ahura Mazda may have reminded them of Yahweh. Zoroastrian eschatology seems to have stimulated the development of their own, but it is very unlikely that Khshatra gave rise to the idea of the Kingdom of God. Even if Iranian dualism is the source of the myth of the two spirits in the Manual of Discipline (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS) and in late Jewish pseudepigraphical writings, it has there been transformed so as to preserve the paramount sovereignty of God and to assign a subordinate role to the Devil.

See Also: ZOROASTER (ZARATHUSHTRA); PARSEES; MITHRAS AND MITHRAISM.

Bibliography: J. DARMESTETER, Le Zend-Avesta (2d ed. Paris 1960). E. W. WEST, Pahlavi Texts I–V (Sacred Books of the East 5, 18, 24, 37, 47; Oxford 1880–97). Zand-Akāsīh, Iranian or Greater Budahishn, ed. with Eng. tr. B. T. ANKLESARIA (Bombay 1956). Shkand Gumānik Vicār: La Solution décisive des doutes, ed. with a Fr. tr. J. P. MENASCE (Collectanea Friburgensia 30; Fribourg 1945). E. BENEVENISTE, The Persian Religion according to the Chief Greek Texts (Paris 1929). J. BIDEZ and F. CUMONT, Les Mages hellénisés (Paris 1938). J. DUCHESNE-GUILLEMIN, The Western Response to Zoroaster (Oxford 1958); La Religion de l'Iran ancien (Paris 1962). E. PAX, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:111–15. R. C. ZAEHNER, The Dawn and Twilight of Zoroastrianism (London 1961). M. MOLÉ, Culte, mythe et cosmologie dans l'Iran ancien (Paris 1963). F. KÖNIG, Zarathustras Jenseitsvorstellung und das Alte Testament (Vienna 1964).

[J. P. DE MENASCE]

PERSICO, IGNATIUS

Cardinal; b. Naples, Italy, Jan. 30, 1823; d. Rome, Italy, Dec. 7, 1895. He received his early training with the Jesuits, entered the Capuchin Order in 1839, and was ordained Jan. 24, 1846. He volunteered for the missions and departed the same year for the Vicariate of Patna, India. In 1849 he became secretary to Bp. Anastasius Hartmann, OFM Cap., vicar apostolic of Patna and administrator of Bombay. In 1850 he became the first editor of the Bombay Catholic Examiner. Later, as commissary of the vicars apostolic of India, he helped bring the threatening Goanese schism to an end and obtained limited government recognition of the Catholic missionaries in India. Persico was consecrated coadjutor to Hartmann at Bombay on June 4, 1854, and successively became visitator (1854), administrator (1855), and vicar apostolic (1856) of Agra. He resigned (1860) because of illness and returned to Italy. Upon recovery he offered his services in 1867 to the Diocese of Charleston, South Carolina. In 1869 he was present at the Tenth Provincial Council of Baltimore, where he was permitted to vote. While attending Vatican Council I, he was appointed the fourth bishop of Savannah, Georgia (March 20, 1870), but illness again forced him to resign in 1872. In 1874 Rome entrusted him with a secret mission to Canada. He also went to Malabar, India, in 1877 to settle the Syro-Chaldean schism and to prepare for the erection of the Indian hierarchy. In 1878 Persico was made consultor of the Propaganda Fide and the following year became bishop of the united dioceses of Aquino, Pontecorvo, and Sora, Italy. Illness forced his resignation (1886), and he was named titular archbishop of Damietta, Egypt. In 1887 he went as a papal envoy to Ireland. Upon his return he was named vicar of the Vatican Basilica and secretary of the Propaganda Fide. Leo XIII made Persico a cardinal priest and prefect of the Congregation of Indulgences and Relics on Jan. 16, 1893.

Bibliography: B. A. FINN, Twenty-four American Cardinals (Boston 1947). D. C. SHEARER, Historical Records and Studies of the U.S. Catholic Historical Society of New York 21 (1932) 54–137, with sources and bibliog.

[N. MILLER]

PERSON (IN PHILOSOPHY)

A term derived from the Latin persona, traceable to the Greek πρόσωπον, and originally used to denote the mask worn by an actor. From this it was applied to the role he assumed; and finally, to any character on the stage of life, i.e., to any individual. The term has taken on a special significance in SCHOLASTICISM, where it has figured importantly in theological discussions of the INCARNATION and the Holy TRINITY. This article is restricted to a consideration of the notion as used in scholastic philosophy and is divided into two sections: the first sketches the historical development of the concept and the second provides a metaphysical analysis. (For the psychological treatment and the use of the term in modern philosophy, see INDIVIDUALITY; PERSONALISM; PERSONALITY; and SELF, THE; for the theological discussion of the term, see PERSON [IN THEOLOGY]; PERSON, DIVINE.)

History. The main stages in the evolution of the concept are its early formulation by Boethius, its adaptation by St. Thomas Aquinas, and its various refinements by later scholastics.

Boethius. The classical definition is given by BOETHIUS in his De persona et duabus naturis, where he teaches that person is “an individual substance of a rational nature” (ch. 3; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 271 v., indexes 4 v. [Paris 1878–90] 64:1345). Boethius uses the term “SUBSTANCE” in the definition primarily to exclude accidents: “We see that accidents cannot constitute person.” The term “substance,” as Boethius understood it, can be used in two senses, one referring to the concrete substance as existing in the individual and called first substance, the other referring to substance conceived abstractly as existing in the GENUS and the SPECIES and called second substance. It is disputed which sense of the term was here being used by Boethius. It seems probable that he prescind from the technical significations of first substance and second substance, but used the qualifier “individual” to make his meaning equivalent to that of first substance. Individual, in turn, refers simply to what is undivided in itself; unlike the higher branches of the PORPHYRIAN TREE, namely, genus and species, it cannot be further subdivided. Boethius does not seem to attach any further signification to the term, but makes it a mere synonym for singular. The most important part of his definition is the expression “of a rational nature.” This serves to indicate that person is predicated only of intellectual beings. The generic term that includes all individual existing substances is supposit (see SUBSISTENCE); supposit may be applied equally to rational and irrational, to living and nonliving individuals. The sense of Boethius’s definition is that a person is a particular type of supposit, namely, one with a rational nature.

Thomas Aquinas. The definition proposed by Boethius is not completely satisfactory as it stands, since the words taken literally can be applied to the rational soul of man and also to the human nature of Christ. St. THOMAS AQUINAS accepted it nonetheless, possibly because by his time it had become the traditional definition. The terms in which St. Thomas explained it, however, practically constitute a new definition. “Individual substance” becomes, for him, a substance that is complete, subsists by itself, and is separated from others (Summa theologiae 3a, 16.12 ad 2). When the remainder of Boethius’s definition is added to this, there are five notes that go to make up a person: (1) substance—this excludes accident; (2) complete—the person must have a complete nature, and thus that which is but part of a nature, either actually or aptitudinally, does not satisfy the definition; (3) subsistent by itself—the person exists in himself and for himself, being the ultimate possessor of his nature and all its acts, and therefore is the ultimate subject of predication of all his attributes; (4) separated from others—this excludes the universal notion of second substance, which can have no existence apart from the individual; and (5) of a rational nature—this excludes all suppositis that lack rationality. To the person, therefore, there properly belongs a threefold incommunicability expressed in notes (2), (3), and (4). The human soul belongs to the nature as part of it, and is therefore not a person, even when existing separately (see SOUL, HUMAN). The human nature of Christ does not exist by itself alone, but in another, i.e., in the divine personality of the Word; thus it is not a person. Lastly, the divine essence, though subsisting by itself, is so communicated to the three Persons that it does not exist apart from Them; it is therefore not a person.

Later Scholastics. Further scholastic discussions of the notions of person have been largely disputes over the ultimate foundation of personality, i.e., to ascertain the precise determination of a nature that, if present, will make it subsistent and a person, and, if absent, will not.

According to John DUNS SCOTUS, as he is usually understood, the ultimate foundation of personality is a mere negation. An individual intellectual nature is a person if, in its nature, it is neither destined to be communicated, as is the human soul, nor actually communicated, as is the humanity of Christ. Were the hypostatic union to cease, Christ's humanity would, ipso facto, without any further determination, become a person.

To Duns Scotus's position it is commonly objected that the person possesses the nature and all its attributes, and it is difficult to regard this possessor, as distinct from the objects possessed, as constituted only by a negative. Consequently, traditional Thomists, following Tommaso de Vio CAJETAN, hold that personality must be based on a positive determination, which they call the MODE of subsistence. It is the function of this mode to make the nature incommunicable, terminated in itself, and capable of receiving its own esse, or EXISTENCE. Without this mode the human nature of Christ subsists only by the uncreated esse of the Word.

F. SUÁREZ also insists that the ultimate foundation of personality cannot be a mere negation but must be a positive perfection. Since he holds that there is no real distinction between nature (or essence) and existence, he does not regard personality as something that prepares the nature to receive its own proper existence. In his view, personality is something added to a nature conceived as already existing. Subsistence can be added to a substance actually existing because, according to his teaching, existence itself is quasi potential. The sense in which personality or subsistence consists in incommunicability is that it excludes only communication to another as to the ultimate term of existence (De incarn. 11.3; Disp. meta. 34). Thus personality, for Suárez, is the final term or complement not of a substantial essence but of existence itself.

Other thinkers have attempted to define the formal constitutive of personality without employing Cajetan's mode or Suárez's conception of a positive determination. Some hold that a substance is a supposit, and an intelligent substance a person, from the mere fact of its being a whole, a totum in se. This totality, it is contended, is a positive note that adds no reality, just as the whole adds nothing to the parts that compose it. Those who reject this explanation do so because the concept of totality seems to reduce, according to their analysis, to the Scotistic concept of a mere negation. Still others consider personality to be ultimately constituted by the esse, the actual existence of an intelligent substance. That which subsists with its own esse is by that very fact incommunicable. This theory finds some support among the writings of the early Greek Fathers, but otherwise has not been regarded as completely satisfactory by philosophers and theologians.

Analysis. In the light of the foregoing, a more systematic analysis of the concept of person may be given, drawing mainly on the insights of St. Thomas and other scholastics but making their presentation more relevant to contemporary discussions among philosophers.

Ontological Foundation. The problem of the metaphysical definition of person is basically that of ascertaining what the notion of person adds to the more general concept of supposit, and, whatever this may be, of determining its ultimate ontological foundation. St. Thomas points out that person has a special dignity, that it represents what is most perfect in all of nature, and that its special excellence consists in having dominion over its own activity (Summa theologiae 1a, 29.1). Although in explaining this dignity he does not refer to the special mode of subsistence, there can be no doubt that for him the special excellence of the person derives from its entitative sufficiency for independent existence. The person is thus superior to the THING, which, although something in the order of substance, has a substantial form that is limited in its existential capabilities (see MATTER AND FORM). For example, the substantial form of a material thing, although itself a formal principle of substance, has no immediate aptitude to existence, because of its essential dependence on matter for both its becoming and its being. To this extent its ability to subsist is minimal, since the union of matter and form can be disrupted at any time under the influence of external physical agents. The human soul, on the other hand, although the substantial form of a body, by reason of its spirituality has a special aptitude for existence that it actually communicates to the body (see SPIRIT). Because of this, it has a more perfect type of subsistence than a material thing; at least on the part of the soul, existence is independent of any extrinsic causal influences. Thus the primary note that distinguishes human persons—and a fortiori ANGELS—from lower types of beings is the perfection of their spiritual forms, which confers on them a more perfect and enduring manner of existing.

The metaphysical basis of personality is thus traceable to a special mode of subsistence that is rooted in the spirituality of the form or substantial act of the intellectual substance. It is true, of course, that man's spiritual substantial form, or his soul, though complete in the order of substance, is not complete as a species and is thus not to be identified with the human person (De anim. 1; De spir. creat. 2, 2 ad 5, 2 ad 16). This notwithstanding, the proper perfection of man as a person derives from the subsistent character of his soul, because man exists and subsists only through the existence and subsistence of his spiritual soul. For this reason, the spirituality of man may be regarded as the metaphysical root of his personality; it is this characteristic that confers on him a more perfect type of subsistence than that found in other corporeal creatures.

Corollaries. As a consequence of this existential independence of material conditions, certain corollaries follow that relate to the person's activities and to his relationships to others.

The human person, precisely as spiritual, is free from the limitations of space and time that circumscribe irrational beings. Although he has a beginning in time, his subsequent duration in being is in a certain sense extratemporal; he cannot be considered merely as an integral part of the physical universe, completely subject to the laws of its history. Viewed from another aspect, he exhibits a type of IMMATERIALITY that is best seen in his rational or intellectual character. He is able to possess abstract and universal knowledge that transcends the data of sense (see INTELLECT). He has the capacity also of reflecting on his activities and even on himself; thus he is said to be endowed with CONSCIOUSNESS. Having dominion over his own activity, he also possesses FREE WILL. From this follows his moral character and all that this implies, e.g., the personal responsibility that is his for having dominion over his own activities.

Other properties of the human person are associated with the complex of relationships man may have with beings below him, with other finite persons, and with God. Because he transcends the rest of corporeal creation, the human person has a type of dominion over it and can use it for his own proper good. Since he stands in the relationship of EQUALITY to other humans, he may not derogate from their personal independence and liberty or deprive them of their rights. Even more, his community of nature with other humans provides the ontological basis for FRIENDSHIP and for LOVE. Similarly, man's personal character provides the foundation for all his social relationships, whereby he and others strive to attain the common good in civil SOCIETY. Finally, the person, precisely as rational or intellectual, is an image of his Creator and thus stands in special relationship to God. His autonomy and freedom are not absolute, but are limited by his dependence on God, i.e., on the divine will and on the eternal law. His ontological limitation as a finite person is the ultimate reason in the natural order why man should love God more than himself and should order his entire life toward God as his final end and ultimate completion.

See Also: MAN, 2, 3; SOUL-BODY RELATIONSHIP.

Bibliography: M. J. ADLER, ed., The Great Ideas: A Syntopicon of Great Books of the Western World, 2 v. (Chicago 1952); v. 2, 3 of Great Books of the Western World 2:1–41. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 2:393–401. L. W. GEDDES, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al., 16 v. (New York 1907–14) 11:726–727. L. STEFANINI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 3:1297–1304. C. DE KONINCK, De la primauté du bien commun (Quebec 1943). J. MARITAIN, The Person and the Common Good, tr. J. J. FITZGERALD (New York 1947). R. GUARDINI, Welt und Person (Würzburg 1940). M. DEANDREA, Praelectiones metaphysi- ca., v. 2 (Rome 1957). J. B. METZ, Christliche Anthropozentrik (Munich 1962).

[L. W. GEDDES/W. A. WALLACE]

PERSON (IN THEOLOGY)

Christianity is love and its “God is love” (1 Jn 4.8, 16). Love manifests personality—a person loving and a person loved. Hence Christianity is an eminently personal religion and its God a very personal God. Three personalist mysteries summarize Christianity: (1) God, the absolute and infinite, unique and wholly “other” One, is three Persons; (2) Jesus Christ, the one mediator between God and man, is the Person of the WORD having both a divine and human nature; (3) there is a mystical personality of Christ, in which Christians enter into personal communion with God. All theology is ultimately a reflection on and seeking an understanding of these three personal realities. Because the developments of the concept of personality in Trinitarian and Christological theology are so intimately interconnected, these are here treated together. There follows a consideration of person in MYSTICAL BODY theology.

Person in Trinitarian-Christological Theology.

Hebrew is without a term for our concept “person.” There are instances in the Old Testament when the word pānīm (face) practically corresponds to our understanding of person. The Greek word for face, πρόσωπον, likewise has the meaning of person (cf. 2 Cor 1.11). Postapostolic Christian teachers soon discovered that mere repetition of biblical phrases inadequately preserved the integrity of the Christian faith taking root in the Greco-Roman world. Because of the central place personality has in the mysteries of the Trinity and of Christ, there was need of a gradual clarification of the notion of person in Catholic theology. We shall trace this theological development of the notion of person in the mysteries of the Trinity and INCARNATION through four general stages.

Nicaean-Chalcedonian Formulation. The Trinitarian-Christological controversies of the 2d to the 5th centuries in the Greco-Roman world occasioned the first development in the notion of person. Christian Trinitarian monotheism had to be preserved while being incarnated in a new culture steeped in Neoplatonic philosophy and language. Whereas the starting point of Eastern writers was the distinction of Persons with an ever-present danger of SUBORDINATIONISM, the Western writers looked to the unity of the divine substance, with a dangerous tendency toward MODALISM. It was Tertullian's exact egalistic mind that gave precision to Western terminology at a very early date. Persona referred to that which is threefold in the Trinity and one in Christ; natura or substantia, later also essentia, designated that which is one in the Trinity and dual in Christ. In the East, however, four Greek words (πρόσωπον, φύσις, ὑπόστασις, οὐσία) signified our concept of person, the latter three words also designating nature. Moreover, πρόσωπον, taken in its etymological sense (face, mask, appearance), was capable of a modalistic meaning. The Nicæan-Chalcedonian formulas gave the first doctrinal clarification to the terms nature and person. NICAËA I (325) defined that the Son is of the Father's substance and ὁμοούσιος (consubstantial) with the Father, while Chalcedon (451) defined that Christ is one Person (πρόσωπον, or ὑπόστασις) with two natures (φύσεις, or οὐσίαι). These doctrinal formulas are both an end and a new beginning, for every propositional form of the divine mysteries is necessarily incomplete. Christianity's personalist message has to be constantly restated with ever-greater depths of understanding.

Relationship Pertains to Divine Personality. The mystery of the Trinity appears in the Bible in reference to distinct roles in the economy of salvation, but in the theology of the Greek Fathers as distinct Persons. The oneness of the divine substance is preserved by their doctrine of perichoresis, i.e., the coinherence of the Divine Persons in a dynamic compenetrating existence (see CIRCUMINCESSION). Though perichoresis contains an implicit mutual relationship between the Divine Persons, this aspect of Trinitarian theology reaches greater development in Western theology.

St. Augustine, faithful to the Western viewpoint, took the divine essence as the starting point of his investigation, but then had difficulty maintaining the distinction of Persons. He solved this difficulty when he saw that the term "Person" in the Trinity can only mean subsistent relation—a discovery that had a great impact on future Trinitarian theology. "Substance comprehends unity, relation multiplies Trinity" (Boethius). Starting with the unique divine nature in developing a doctrine of subsistent relations is admittedly not a New Testament approach to the Divine Persons. Nevertheless by returning to the biblical data now, it will be discovered that the description there of the Divine Persons can be taken in the sense of mutual relations. Moreover these mutual relations bring Western theology once more in contact with the dynamic Trinitarianism of Eastern theology. The mutual relations place in the Godhead eternal begetting, being begotten, and proceeding. The Divine Persons are now seen to reveal God in terms of His own inner life. Analogies are now easily discovered in man's spiritual, intellectual, and volitional life: Memory, Understanding, Will; Lover, Beloved, Their Love.

Ontological Precision of Person. Boethius, an Italian philosopher-statesman of the 6th century, defined person as an individual substance of a rational nature. This definition, explained by later theologians, especially St. Thomas, has become classic in theology. All recognize the term "rational" to mean any intellectual nature, not merely human, and the term "substance" to designate first substance, the subsistent subject or hypostasis. The precise clarification in this third stage is that the notion of SUBSISTENCE, existence in itself, and therefore INCOMMUNICABILITY, belongs to the notion of person. Person is the subsistent, incommunicable subject of an intellectual nature—theology now has a notion of person that accounts for the distinct roles of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit in the biblical description of the economy of Redemption. This ontological notion of person, while far from adequate, offers a secure basis for theological consideration of the Trinitarian and Christological mysteries.

Relation of Person, Nature, Existence. Catholic dogma teaches that Christ is one Person (that of the Word) with two natures, divine and human. Consequently, human nature cannot of itself mean human person. Christ is a human but not a human person. Theology now had to come to a more precise understanding of personality or subsistence. Prescinding from particular modifications, the commentators on St. Thomas offer three principal explanations. (1) The Scotists see in subsistence a negative element—not being assumed. Christ is not a human person because His human nature is assumed by the Person of the Word. (2) Proper existence itself is subsistence in the view of Capreolus reaffirmed by Billot. Christ is without human personality because His human nature does not have a proportionate human existence but shares in the infinite act of existence of the Word. (3) For Cajetan subsistence is a substantial mode added to nature, terminating it in ultimate incommunicability, which makes nature immediately apt for existence. In Christ there is no such human substantial mode and hence no human personality.

That is where the matter lies today—one of free and divergent opinion. All three views are not without shortcomings. The nonassumption of the Scotistic view hardly seems an adequate explanation of so rich a reality as personality. The Capreolus-Billot view runs into serious metaphysical difficulties and seems to endanger the reality of Christ's human nature. Christ exists as God and exists as man; how can these existences be more one than His divinity and humanity are one? Even positing real existential unity of the person, there still seems a necessary parallel unity and distinction in essence and in existence. Cajetan's substantial mode seems to be a made-to-order explanation of the HYPOSTATIC UNION without much corroborating evidence from an examination of human personality as such.

Contemporary Psychological Notion of Person. The ontological categories that have prevailed in the theology of the Trinity and of Christ, fruitful as they have been, have not sounded the depths of the inexhaustible source—Scripture. New approaches are usually along three lines: (1) taking a more theological view of human personality, considering also what is known from the Trinitarian-Christological mysteries; (2) using the data of contemporary psychology in theologizing about the mysteries of the Trinity and Incarnation; and (3) complementing the ontological notion of person (a definition according to common notions of singularity, Summa theologiae 1a 29.1 ad 1) with existential aspects of personality (descriptions of singular uniqueness and dynamic vitality). In all of these the Catholic theologian is not questioning the ontological foundation of personality; hence no Günther-Rosmini identification of personality with self-consciousness.

Significant theological insights manifesting a new vitality in theology have resulted from these new perspectives. Human personality is seen as a center of relationships through self-consciousness (self-possession) and self-giving. A person is therefore someone complete in himself but also someone who is constituted by his relations. This is theologically significant, for we know that the relatedness of one Person to another in the Trinitarian mystery stands at the core of personality. This insight into personality gives new pertinency to RICHARD OF SAINT-VICTOR's trinitarian analogy—the Lover, the Loved, and the Love as Initial Gift. The New Testament definition “God is love” is understood no longer in an essentialistic sense of an absolute attribute of the divine nature, but in the strictly personalistic sense that God is Self-Giver, Responsive Self-Giver, and Mutual Gift.

It is impossible to overestimate the contribution made by the mystery of the Incarnation to our understanding of the human person. Christ's human consciousness and freedom reveal a Divine Person who is truly mediator in His humanity. The human person, radically in relationship to God, can then realize himself only in union with Christ. But this involves the human person in the mystery of Christ crucified and risen. In this life, the person finds it impossible to give himself without losing himself, so that the ultimate fulfillment of self-possession and self-giving is attained only after death and then not as a result of man's endeavors but of God's Self-giving. Made one with the Spirit, the human person is caught up in the Self-giving life of the Divine Persons.

Person in the Theology of the Mystical Body. The Old Testament presents a double theme on human personality: a gradual development of a sense of individual responsibility is intimately bound up with the collective—of the specially chosen PEOPLE OF GOD. There is a solidarity of the group and of the individual persons that constitutes a form of “corporate personality.”

The full harmonization of the individual person and the corporate person is realized in Christ. Already St. Augustine speaks of Christ and Christians as constituting a certain oneness of personality (una quaedam persona). So basic is this oneness of all mankind in Christ that it can be said to be constitutive of the Christian viewpoint. As a consequence it is absolutely impossible for there to be any real opposition between the individual person and the community of persons.

A wonderful harmonization of personality and community is contained in the Church's theology of the Sacraments. Each Sacrament constitutes the Christian an ecclesial person in a particular way—either in state or in action. Through this being-a-person-in-society, the Christian comes into immediate contact with Christ inasmuch as that society is also the living organism, Body, of Christ, who is head. By the life that flows from that head to the members, the Christian becomes a more perfect person in Christ by opening himself in love and service to other persons: God and neighbor.

The consummation without absorption of human personality in the mystical personality of Christ is the elevation of the natural inviolability of the human person. Catholic theology has always taken its stand against any form of collectivism that reduces the human person to a means. The human person is an absolute value and therefore an end in regard to the entire material and spiritual universe, precisely because of its immediate ordination to God. The special dignity of the human person consists of an openness that enables him to relate himself consciously to God. Most perfectly and most eminently is this immediate communion with God realized by the hypostatic union in Christ. Dependent on and modeled after this hypostatic union is the mystical union of all Christians in the mystical personality of Christ. Here the Christian becomes as perfectly as possible a self-possessor, possessing self in Christ, and a responsive self-giver by the Spirit of Christ, joining him to Christ and in and through Christ to the Father.

“A person means that which is most perfect in nature” (Summa theologiae 1a. 29.3). Catholic doctrine acknowledges the necessity of revelation for fallen man to know completely the more exalted natural truths. Where would this need of divine guidance be more acute than when man comes to search the meaning of himself at the deepest and central point of his being—personality. How deficient man finds his rational method whenever he comes to consider anything in its totality. Such is the person. The history of human thought certainly seems to confirm Cajetan's suspicion that man would never have even directed his attention to the subtleties of human personality had not the revealed mysteries of the Trinity and the Incarnation invited him to do so. If these mysteries have raised new problems in the understanding of personality, theology does not hesitate to seek in these same mysteries new insights into human personality. And from this better understanding of human personality, we can return to a fuller understanding of mystical personality and divine personality in Christ and in God.

See Also: ANALOGY, THEOLOGICAL USE OF; CONSUBSTANTIALITY; CREATED ACTUATION BY UNCREATED ACT; HOMOIOUSIOS; HYPOSTASIS; INCORPORATION IN CHRIST; JESUS CHRIST, III (SPECIAL QUESTIONS); JESUS CHRIST, ARTICLES ON; LOVE; PERSON, DIVINE; PERSON (IN PHILOSOPHY); RELATIONS, TRINITARIAN; SUBSISTENCE (THEOLOGICAL ASPECT); TRINITY, HOLY; TRINITY, HOLY, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 7.1:369–437. A. HALDER and A. GRILLMEIER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:287–292. A. GUGGENBERGER, Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe, ed. H. FRIES, 2 v. (Munich 1962–63) 2:295–306. I. M. DALMAU, Sacrae theologiae summa, ed. FATHERS OF THE SOCIETY OF JESUS, PROFESSORS OF THE THEOLOGICAL FACULTIES IN SPAIN, 4 v. (3d ed. Madrid 1958) 2.2. I. SOLANO, ibid. (4th ed. Madrid 1961) 3.1. J. MARITAIN, Distinguish to Unite, or The Degrees of Knowledge, tr. G. B. PHELAN (New York 1959), “App. 4: On the Notion of Subsistence—Further Elucidations, 1954.” K. RAHNER, Theological Investigations, v. 1 God, Christ, Mary and Grace, tr. C. ERNST (Baltimore 1961). H. DE LUBAC, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET, tr. L. C. SHEPPARD (New York 1950; 1958). B. COOKE, “Theology of Person,” Spiritual Life 7 (1961) 11–20. H. DIEPEN, “La Critique du Basileme selon saint Thomas d'Aquin,” Revue thomiste 50 (1950) 82–118, 515–562. J. HAWKINS, “On Nature and Person in Speculative Theology,” Downside Review 80 (1962) 1–11. J. B. REICHMANN, “St. Thomas, Capreolus, Cajetan and Created Person,” New Scholasticism 33 (1959) 1–48, 202–230.

[M. J. DORENKEMPER]

PERSON, DIVINE

This article successively examines the scriptural foundation of the doctrine, the testimonies of early tradition, and finally the theological formulation.

Scripture. The Trinitarian mystery of God's inner life, remotely foreshadowed in the Old Testament (Prv 8.22; Sir 24.3–21 for the Word; Ez 3.12, 14; 36.26; Jl 3.1–5 for the Spirit), is unfolded in its totality, but gradually, by Christ Himself. Old Testament monotheism, deeply rooted in the Jewish mind (Dt 6.4–5; Mt 22.37) is the basis on which the new mystery is built and at the same time its main doctrinal obstacle. Yahweh's divinity needs no proof for a Jew. Paul, reared in the purest Jewish tradition (Phil 3.5), reserves the title ὁ θεός exclusively to GOD THE FATHER (Rom 15.5, 13, 33; 1 Cor 2.11; Col 1.3).

Jesus Christ is the only Son of God (Mk 1.11, where ἀγαπητός is the equivalent of only). Though rarely called God in the New Testament, Christ is endowed with strictly divine attributes: He is the spouse (Mt 9.15) and shepherd of the people (John, ch. 10), titles which were strictly divine in the Old Testament (Hos 2:16–25: spouse; Ezekiel ch. 34: shepherd). He forgives sin (Lk 5.20) on His own authority (Mk 2.7), perfects and completes the Law (Mt 5.17), is the supreme master of the Sabbath (Mt 12.8; Mk 3.1–6), and supreme judge of all men (Mt 25.31; Rom 2.16), who knows His Father as intimately as His Father knows Him (Mt 11.27). Christ is called directly God by Paul in Rom 9.5 if the Christological character of this doxology is admitted (see SON, GOD THE).

As for the distinct, divine personality of the HOLY SPIRIT, it is at the Last Supper that Jesus discloses it in full: He is the PARACLETE (John 14.16, 26), who hears (Jn 16.13), speaks (ibid.), announces (Jn 16.13–15), and teaches (Jn 14.26; 16.13). In Paul, the expressions “to live in Christ” and “to live in the Spirit” are practically synonymous: man is justified in Christ (Gal 2.17) and in the Spirit (1 Cor 6.11), sanctified in Christ (1 Cor 1.2) and in the Spirit (Rom 15.16), sealed in Christ (Eph 1.13) and in the Spirit (Eph 4.30). Both, Son and Spirit, preexistent in God, are sent by Him into the world (Gal 4.4–6; Rom 8.15–16).

Early Tradition. The doctrine is definitely shaped by NICAEA I (325, divinity of the Son) and CONSTANTINOPLE I (381, divinity of the Spirit). Simultaneously with the fixing of the doctrine itself, the thorny problem of terminology is thrashed out. After some initial hesitation (Tertullian, Novatian), the term persona is adopted in the West. This word translates the Hebrew pānîm (face), and originally designated a mask, then a theatrical role, and finally any concrete individual. The use of the word reflects Hebrew usage, easily recognizable in the literal Vulgate: “facies mea praecedet te” (Ex 33.14); “in tempore vultus tui” (Ps 20.10); “ab increpatione vultus tui” (Ps 79.17). In 2 Cor 1.11 the word persona has the meaning of an individual (see H. Lesêtre, Dictionnaire de la Bible, ed. F. Vigouroux [Paris 1895–1912] 5.1:159–160). The word πρόσωπον (person) is applied to the Persons of the Trinity already by Hippolytus (Cont. haer. Noet. 7, 14; Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1857–66] 10:813, 822), but the definite formula “three Persons, one substance'' is due to Tertullian (Adv. Prax. 11–13; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1878–90] 2:166–170). After him, this terminology spreads throughout the West (Damasus, Hilary of Poitiers, Ambrose).

In the East there are similar uncertainties with regard to terminology: the HYPOSTASIS (ὑπόστασις) of Biblical origin (Heb 1.3) is now taken to mean a concrete individual with definite characteristics of his own, as opposed to a common substratum, or οὐσία, which can be shared by several individuals (see Basil, Ep. 236.6; Patrologia Graeca 32:884). Therefore in God οὐσία expresses what is common to all three, such as goodness and divinity; whereas ὑπόστασις signifies respectively paternity, FILIATION, and sanctifying power (Basil, Ep. 214.4; Patrologia Graeca 32:789). It is Gregory of Nazianzus who brings about final reconciliation between the conflicting terminologies of East and West (Orat. 42.16; Patrologia Graeca 36:475–478). Hereafter the Greek terms οὐσία and ὑπόστασις will be equivalent to the corresponding Latin substantia and persona (Orat. 21.35; Patrologia Graeca 35:1125). At the explicit request of Basil and Jerome, Pope Damasus authoritatively pronounces the validity of Basil's formula (Damasus, Ep. 2.1; Patrologia Latina 13:350). In 382 the East accepts the Latin formulation (Theodoret of Cyr, Hist. eccles. 5.9; Patrologia Graeca 82:1212–17), and, conversely, the West agrees to the Greek formula (Theodoret, op. cit. 5.3; 82:1202).

Theology. A Divine Person is essentially constituted by a SUBSTANCE that is both individual and incommunicable. Divine personal PROPERTIES cannot be shared among the three Persons. Yet, this concept of Divine Person, far from suggesting a nature that is closed up within itself, signifies rather an essential openness, an outward tendency relating each Person to the other two. In man, this social, outward bent is counterbalanced by and rooted in an unavoidable self-centeredness that is to be surpassed and perfected by an external acquisition. This social tendency in man fills up his own innate poverty. In the Trinity, on the contrary, each Person lacks this self-centeredness: a Divine Person is nothing else than an infinite, eternal, loving, centrifugal force, necessarily related to the other two centrifugal forces. In God that outward inclination has as its origin not poverty to be filled, but superabundance to be communicated. Each Person is nothing but a total self-gift to the other two, and this communication is so peculiar as to constitute a personal, distinct trait, a distinct Divine Person. A Divine Person is the supreme pattern of man's unselfish generosity.

See Also: TRINITY, HOLY, ARTICLES ON; PERSON (IN THEOLOGY); NATURE; INCOMMUNICABILITY; PATERNITY, DIVINE.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 7.1:369–437. A. GRILLMEIER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 8:290–292. A. MALET, Personne et amour dans la théologie trinitaire de st. Thomas d'Aquin (Paris 1956). F. PRAT, The Theology of St. Paul, tr. J. L. STODDARD, 2 v. (London 1926–27; repr. Westminster, Md. 1958). T. DE RÉGNON, Études de théologie positive sur la Sainte Trinité, 4 v. (Paris 1892–98).

[A. M. BERMEJO]

PERSONALISM

Although any philosophy that insists upon the reality of the person—human, angelic, or divine—may legitimately be classified as personalist, the name personalism more commonly designates a movement of some significance in 19th-century philosophy. This developed as a reaction to MATERIALISM, evolutionism, and IDEALISM, and has assumed various forms both in Europe and the U.S. It is usually theistic in orientation, and places great stress on personality as a supreme value and as a key notion that gives meaning to all of reality. This article treats briefly of currents in European philosophy that contributed to the origins of personalism.

During the 19th century there was considerable reaction to the crass materialism of the 18th century as propounded by thinkers such as C. A. Helvétius (1715–71) and P. H. D. HOLBACH; the reaction was accompanied by a growing and firm opposition on the part of many philosophers to the determinism and reductionism of some followers of Isaac Newton. Such personalists protested against reductionist systems that did not recognize a real distinction between man and the rest of nature. Again, whereas some of the followers of Charles DARWIN tended to integrate man into the rest of nature so completely that he ultimately lost his distinctive spiritual character, personalists stressed the value of man as a person, a moral self, with freedom, dignity, and responsibility. In stressing man's dignity some of these thinkers tended to denigrate material things and treat them as mere appearances or flux without any substantial character. Others, particularly among the Americans, thought that the common identification of both man and God as persons places a limitation on God, and thus they spoke of God as "finite."

Another formative factor in the development of personalism was a protest voiced against the absolutism inherent in the philosophy of G. W. F. HEGEL. In Hegelianism, humans allegedly are mere phenomenal beings who easily lose their identities in the collectivities of the family, the community, and the state. In opposition to such an absolutist tendency, personalists have frequently developed a form of idealism that allows the human self a kind of uniqueness and autonomy. In this vein the British personalist A. Seth Pringle-Pattison (1850–1931) wrote: “Each self is a unique existence, which is perfectly impervious . . . to other selves. . . . I have a centre of my own, a will of my own, which no one shares with me or can share—a centre which I maintain even in my dealings with God Himself.”

Prominent European personalists such as C. B. Re-nouvier, Maurice BLONDEL, and E. Mounier (1905–50) have all embraced philosophies that continue to stress the distinctive worth of human striving. In 1932, Mounier founded the journal Esprit, and this has become a major source of materials for those wishing to trace the development of the European movement. Since the 1930s, such thinkers have been greatly concerned with the problems of modern man seeking to retain his freedom and authentic spiritual character in the face of a massive technology that is more dominated by material considerations than by spiritual values. Because of their strong stand for human freedom as against domination by the forces of a spiritually barren mass society, existentialists such as Gabriel Marcel, Jean Paul Sartre, and N. A. BERDIAEV should be included as personalists (see EXISTENTIALISM). Also listed among the personalists are such distinguished Thomistic philosophers of freedom as Jacques MARITAIN, Yves SIMON, and Etienne GILSON (see THOMISM).

For the development of personalism in Catholic teaching, see PERSONALIST ETHICS.

Bibliography: G. MARCEL, The Philosophy of Existence (New York 1949). J. MARITAIN, The Person and The Common Good, tr. J. J. FITZGERALD (New York 1947).

[J. A. MANN/EDS.]

PERSONALIST ETHICS

The expression “personalist ethics” has a wide range of applications. The feature common to the diverse and, at times, contradictory positions of which it can be predicated is that all insist on defining value in terms of persons in community. For all advocates of personalist ethics the human person is central and foundational. Personalists note, first of all, that ethical questions arise only for persons, because only persons are capable of determining their lives by their own free choices. Only persons stand in need of moral norms to help them, prior to choice, discover which alternatives are morally good, i.e., truly fulfilling of human beings as persons, and which are morally bad, i.e., inimical to their fulfillment as persons. In addition, according to all forms of personalist ethics the norms for making true moral judgments and good moral choices are grounded in the being of human beings precisely insofar as they are persons.

Diverse forms of personalist ethics give widely different and frequently contradictory answers to such questions as the meaning of person, the source, scope, and universality of moral norms, the meaning of personal fulfillment, etc. Thus the expression “personalist ethics” can be and has been predicated of a wide spectrum of ethical thought, ranging from such disparate forms of existential personalism as those espoused by Martin BUBER, Jean Paul SATRE, Gabriel MARCEL and others, through the type of situation ethics championed by Joseph Fletcher, for whom persons are “front and center,” and the varied types of phenomenological analyses of ethics found in such writers as Max Scheler and Dietrich von Hildebrand, to several types of personalist approaches advocated by contemporary Catholic theologians as diverse in their thinking as Louis Janssens and Karol Wojtyła (Pope JOHN PAUL II). This article will focus on the emergence of “personalist ethics” in current Catholic thought and on the form of personalist ethics developed by Karol Wojtyła.

Development of Catholic Personalism. The personalist movement had its beginnings in the 19th century thought of such figures as J. M. Seiler and J. B. Hirscher, but it was not until the 20th century, with the work of O. Schilling and Fritz Tillman in fundamental ethics and the efforts of Dietrich von HILDEBRAND, Herbert Doms and others in marital and sexual ethics that the “personalist” approach took root in Catholic ethical thought. Personalist writers were representative of Catholic thinkers who faulted the standard manuals of Catholic moral theology for their legalism and minimalism and insensitivity to the personalism central to the gospel. These authors stressed the gospel call to love as Jesus did and to live a new kind of life made possible by personal union with Christ and the community of his disciples gathered in the Church. This phase of Catholic personalism culminated prior to Vatican Council II in the work of Gérard Gillemann and Bernard Häring, with the former’s The Primacy of Charity in Moral Theology and the latter’s The Law of Christ standing as landmark works reflecting this early phase of Catholic personalism.

Vatican II gave impetus to this movement. It did so preeminently by the emphasis it placed, particularly in Gaudium et spes and Dignitatis humanae on the inherent worth of the human person, created in the image and likeness of God and called to be, with Jesus, a child of God and member of his family. Gaudium et spes insisted on the objectivity of moral norms, but taught that these “are drawn from the nature of the human person and human action” (n. 51).

Personalist Ethics of Karol Wojtyła. Among contemporary Catholic proponents of personalist ethics

Karol Wojtyła (Pope John Paul II) is by far the best known. His rich but complex thought in its ethical dimensions can best be understood initially by focusing on four key ideas: the centrality of free choice; the significance of the human body; the personalist norm for making good choices and the human person's call to love; and the mystery of Christ as the deepest revelation of what it means to be human.

Freedom at the Core of the Person. Wojtyła seeks to deepen the Boethian definition of the person as an "individual substance of a rational nature" by stressing, with St. Thomas, the fact that the person, as person, is not a mere individual instance of a rational nature, but subsists in that nature as a being in mastery of itself, with dominion over its own actions. It is for this reason that the person is truly incommunicable, sui iuris. Through his freely chosen acts the human person determines himself and gives to himself his identity as a moral being. The acting person constitutes himself as a person, as one utterly unique from others, by his freely chosen acts, which are not mere physical events—happenings—but rather constitutive elements of the being of the person. In short, we are the persons that we are because we make ourselves to be our unique selves by the actions that we freely choose.

The Significance of the Body. While stressing that it is through free, self-determining actions that we make ourselves to be the persons that we are, Wojtyła insists that ontologically all members of the human species, from conception onward, are persons. Rooted in the being of the human person is the natural capacity to make free choices, although, it is true, this capacity must be developed before it can be exercised. Yet for Wojtyła every living human body, consciously aware of itself or not, is a person. The human body is the expression or sign or indeed "sacrament" of the person, for the human body is an integral and constitutive dimension or aspect of the person. By stressing the bodily character of human personhood, Wojtyła separates himself from some purely phenomenalist types of personalism according to which only those members of the human species who are actually conscious of themselves as selves are persons.

Self-consciousness, self-cognition, and self-determination through free choice are indeed, for Wojtyła, the hallmarks of the person. Nonetheless he insists that our personhood is rooted in our being, and the being of the human person is inescapably bodily or corporeal. Thus the human body is the expression of the human person; the body participates in the dignity of the person. It is not some tool or instrument of the person. It is thus a good of the person, not merely a good for the person.

The "Personalist" Norm. Wojtyła holds that the basic normative principle that should inwardly shape our free choices and actions is the personalist norm. Negatively expressed, this norm states "that the person is the kind of good which does not admit of use and cannot be treated as an object of use and as such the means to an end." Stated positively, this norm holds that "the person is a good toward which the only proper and adequate attitude is love."

Love, for Wojtyła, is at heart a gift freely given. It is rooted in the willingness of the acting person to give to other persons what is their due, to revere and respond fully to their awesome dignity as persons. To love another, moreover, we cannot be guided by blind choice. Rather we must be guided by the truth, and by the truth of persons. Our whole endeavor, then, must be to discover the goods that are truly perfective of human persons, the goods meant to flourish in them and contribute to their being fully themselves. Such goods include the good of life itself, of knowledge of the truth, of peace and harmony and fellowship with others and with God. The personalist norm requires that we will that persons flourish in these goods. It requires, above all, that we never make another person an object of enjoyment or use.

Thus, for Wojtyła, sensuality, or the natural and spontaneous response to the sexual values of another person, and affectivity, or the feeling of tenderness one experiences when in the presence of another person are not of themselves authentic human love. Rather, they are the raw materials of love and they must be integrated into a wholehearted response to the irreplaceable value of the person as such, as a good to be loved for its own sake. Thus bodily union through sexual coition is right and good only when it is an expression of the communio personarum brought about by the irrevocable gift of one person to another in marriage. If it is not the expression of this kind of personal communion, it is a lie.

The Mystery of Christ and the "Human." Wojtyła's personalism is at its depths a Christian personalism, for he sees in the mystery of Christ's Incarnation, life, death, and Resurrection the ultimate disclosure of what it means to be human. Indeed, because of the reality of sin and of the concupiscence which entered into the human heart as a result of sin, Wojtyła holds that it is only in union with the redeeming Christ that human persons can fully be themselves and respond to the call of love that God has put into their hearts. Christ has revealed to us the depths of God's love for human persons and the glorious vocation to which human persons are called: to love, even as they have been and are loved by God in Christ, with a total, complete, disinterested gift of their very selves, of the persons they have made themselves to be by their self-determining choices, to other persons in love. In and through Christ, human persons can redeem suffering and conquer evil, including the evil of death. This can be accomplished by enduring evil in love for God and those irreplaceable and priceless bodily beings, human persons, whom God has created for their own sake.

See Also: PERSONALISM.

Bibliography: B. ASHLEY, Theologies of the Body (St. Louis 1984). J. C. FORD and G. KELLY, Contemporary Moral Theology, v. 1 Questions in Fundamental Moral Theology (Westminster, Md. 1963). B. HÄRING, The Law of Christ, 3 v. (Westminster, Md. 1960–); Free and Faithful in Christ, 3 v. (New York 1978–). L. JANSSENS, “Norms and Priorities in a Love Ethic,” Louvain Studies 6 (Spring 1977) 207–238. R. LAWLER, The Christian Personalism of John Paul II (Chicago 1982). A. SZOSTEK, “Karol Wojtyła’s View of the Human Person in the Light of the Experience of Morality,” Existential Personalism, American Catholic Philosophical Association. Proceedings of the Annual Meeting, v. 60 (Baltimore 1986) 50–64. G. H. WILLIAMS, The Mind of John Paul II (New York 1981). K. WOJTYŁA, Love and Responsibility (New York 1981); The Acting Person (Boston 1979); The Original Unity of Man and Woman (Boston 1981); Redemptor hominis (papal encyclical; Wash., D.C. 1979). A. M. WOZNICKI, “Revised Thomism: Existential Personalism Viewed from Phenomenological Perspectives,” Existential Personalism, American Catholic Philosophical Association. Proceedings of the Annual Meeting, v. 60 (Baltimore 1986) 38–49; Karol Wojtyła’s Existential Personalism (New Britain, Conn. 1980).

[W. E. MAY]

PERSONALITY

In philosophy and theology the term personality is relatively new, having been introduced by thinkers with longstanding psychological interests, such as W. JAMES, E. S. BRIGHTMAN and S. A. KIERKEGAARD. The older philosophical tradition preferred to center its discussion on the concept of PERSON, of which personality is a more abstract derivative. With St. THOMAS AQUINAS one may trace the origins of the formal definition of person to BOETHIUS, the earliest of the Christian Aristotelians in the West (Summa theologiae 1a, 29.1). The absence of any significant discussion of person or personality among the Greeks or Romans is itself meaningful. It reveals that this concept, which occupies so prominent a place in the 20th century, was of little interest to the ancients. It likewise is an indication that the concept of person was of minor concern in palco-pagan culture, just as the person has lost significance in the cult of the masses in the neopaganism of K. MARX.

In a sense, then, personality is a concept that belongs to Christian tradition, and only in an environment that maintains contact with its Christian origins does this concept achieve its full significance. This follows logically from the central Christian dogma of the Incarnation of the Word and the priceless gift of divine adoption that God conferred on man. Only a person can be adopted, and the entire economy of salvation is based on the relation of person to person. In view of this ultimate orientation, the human person is discussed in this section from three different points of view: the psychological, the philosophical, and the theological.

Psychological Aspect. The psychological dimension is man as he is known and as he knows himself. This is the empirical or existential personality, the aspect of man that has already been discussed. Psychological description of the person attempts to resolve a complex unit, MAN, into patterns of observable traits and inferred internal dynamics. The danger in this method is one of losing contact with the functioning whole in the preoccupation with traits and syndromes. Gestalt psychology, existential analysis, and clinical studies aim to avoid this pitfall and keep in focus the individual person in all his uniqueness and originality. Other studies of empirical or existential personality give rise to the variety of personality theories already noted. Most of these reflect the clinical methods and research interests of particular psychologists or schools of thought. They do not penetrate to the metaphysics of man or to the philosophy of the human person.

Philosophical Aspect. Without conflicting with empirical studies of personality, the philosophical aspect of the study of man is concerned with the metaphysical question, “What does it mean to be a human being?” and the ethical and juridical question, “What rights and immunities accrue to man by reason of his being a person?”

Historical Genesis. Aristotle’s balanced formula for man, animal rationale, was “baptized” by St. Thomas in the 13th century and remained current until the decline of SCHOLASTICISM. Even among the scholastics, however, there was a persistent tendency to upset this balance and to extol reason at the expense of man’s animal or organic functions. Finally, R. DESCARTES (1596–1650), with only a sketchy background in 17th-century scholastic thought, introduced a complete divorce between mind and body through his doctrine of the two substances. In his psychophysical model of man, mind became the seat of exclusively spiritual functions, whereas organic activities were reduced to the domain of physics.

With the Cartesian disruption of man’s psychosomatic unity and the exploitation of reason by later philosophers, the individuality and uniqueness of human personality were soon lost, particularly in the abstractions of Kantian transcendentalism. The age of the Enlightenment carried the angelism and excessive RATIONALISM of Descartes still further, until it reached its climax in Hegel's dialectic of subject and object. Even the launching of the new science of psychology in the latter half of the 19th century did little to offset this development. In fact, experimental psychology in its early decades was entirely dominated by POSITIVISM and ASSOCIATIONISM, which stemmed ultimately from the philosophies of T. Hobbes and J. Locke.

With the beginning of the 20th century, however, a massive reaction to the rationalistic concept of man began to take shape. This reaction was due in great measure to Darwin's glimpse of an evolutionary pattern underlying all organic life and to Freud's sometimes crude but persistent probing of human emotion and unconscious drives.

Psychosomatic Unity. As a result, there has emerged a concept of man as a psychosomatic unit that gives full meaning to the Aristotelian-Thomistic definition without ignoring man's organic or animal nature. Pope Pius XII gave currency and authority to this concept when defining personality in his address to the Rome Congress of Applied Psychology shortly before he died: "We define personality as the psychosomatic unity of man insofar as it is determined and governed by the soul."

In medical contexts, the term psychosomatic refers to ailments in which physical symptoms are caused or influenced largely by emotional conflicts and psychic tensions. But the word itself, derived from the Greek ψυχή (soul or mind) and σῶμα (body), is admirably suited to signify any interaction between organic and mental components in man. Used in conjunction with unity, this term expresses the organic uniqueness of human beings among other forms of animal life, excludes interpretations that split human beings into two substances (body and mind), and signifies the incommunicable uniqueness of the individual person that is studied by empirical enquiry or clinical analysis.

All the important philosophical conclusions concerning humanity also follow from this psychosomatic unity. In particular, human sexuality and emotional life have their origin in this organic complex that functions also at the spiritual or psychic level (see SEX; EMOTION). They are not something foreign to humans, contracted by association with brute animals. At the same time, autonomy, the continuity of self-consciousness, and a sense of responsibility establish humanity's rights and immunities as a person.

While the philosophical or metaphysical concept of human personality goes beyond the conclusions of contemporary psychology and is the foundation of humanity's rights and immunities as a person, it in no way contradicts current scientific views of man. In fact, when contemporary clinical and existential psychologists insist upon the necessity of a unified and self-integrated personality as the sine qua non of normal functioning and of sound adjustment, they are very close to demanding a return to such a concept of humanity.

Theological Aspect. This organically integrated and spiritually sensitive being is likewise the subject of elevation to the supernatural plane by the action of the Holy Spirit, which is made connatural to man through the mediation of Christ. This constitutes the supernatural or theological aspect of personality. Supernatural man, the sublime concept of Christian humanism, stands out in sharp contrast to the cult of the superman of F. W. NIETZSCHE, A. Hitler, and the proponents of neopaganism. Entirely the creation of grace, supernatural man could not have come to be except through the Incarnation of the Word. This is the "new man" who is created in "the justice and sanctity of truth" and of whom St. Paul speaks so eloquently to his new converts of Galatia, "My little children, with whom I am in labor again, until Christ is formed in you" (Gal 4.19).

The unobtrusive transformation of nature by grace does no violence to the human personality because it begins with faith, the free assent of the mind to God's redeeming word. The first word spoken in a dialogue, faith is a person-to-person communion with Christ that reaches its climax only in the life after this. Thus the liturgy, the Sacraments, ascetical practices, and prayer take on the character of a personal encounter with the Transfigured Christ. Hence, even the possibility of redemption rests upon the fact of human personality.

The doctrinal epitome and guarantee of this teaching is found in the dogma of the Resurrection, which St. Paul places in the very center of the affirmation of Christian faith. This is a twofold dogma. It begins with the simple affirmation of the Creed that Christ suffered, died, was buried, and rose again. From this central doctrine a corollary follows: those who believe in Christ, whose lives are engrafted on His, the True Vine, who strive to conform their lives to His, will rise in glory with Him on the Last Day. This doctrine of the resurrection of the body, undreamed of in pagan philosophy, can be grasped by faith alone. Yet, what could be more fitting than that the psychosomatic unity so harshly disrupted by death be restored at the moment the human person enters into his glorified state? The organic complex preceded the soul in existence, called forth its unique creation, and, throughout the life span of the person, participated in every advance of the soul in virtue. Since the body has a real part in the preparation of the soul for beatitude, it is only fitting and proper that it be reunited to the soul to share in the life of glory.

Indeed, one may say that only in the light of the dogma of the Resurrection does the true dignity of the human personality stand fully revealed. Humans are surely rational animals, as they are social and emotional animals, but they are much more. They are spirit vitalizing matter, living under the laws of protoplasm, but destined to lead matter to a life in which only the laws of spirit hold sway. Such is the conclusion that the gospel accounts of Christ's appearance to His disciples after the Resurrection force upon us; it represents the complete transformation of the human personality in Christ.

Bibliography: T. J. GANNON, Psychology: The Unity of Human Behavior (Boston 1954). M. B. ARNOLD and J. A. GASSON, eds., The Human Person (New York 1954). A. WALTERS and K. O'HARA, Persons and Personality (New York 1953). J. E. ROYCE, Man and His Nature: A Philosophical Psychology (New York 1961). G. P. KLUBERTANZ, The Philosophy of Human Nature (New York 1953). T. V. MOORE, The Driving Forces of Human Nature and Their Adjustment (New York 1948). B. FROGET, The Indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the Souls of the Just, tr. S. A. RAEMERS (Westminster, Md. 1950). PIUS XII, "Venus du monde" (address, April 10, 1958) "Applied Psychology," tr. P. J. OLIGNY, Pope Speaks 5 (1958) 7-20.

[T. J. GANNON]

PERSONS, ROBERT

English Jesuit; b. Nether Stowey, Somersetshire, June 24, 1546; d. Rome, Apr. 15, 1610. He was educated at Stogursey and Taunton and earned his degree at Oxford, becoming a fellow and later bursar of Balliol. In 1575 he left England to study medicine in Padua; but in Louvain, after a retreat under W. Good, SJ, he was probably reconciled to the Church. Having entered the Society of Jesus in 1575, he left Rome with (Bl.) Edmund Campion on April 18, 1580, for England. There he exercised considerable influence on Catholics by his pastoral work, as well as by his writing. In August of 1581, after Campion's arrest, he left England to consult Dr. William ALLEN, but he was forbidden to return by the Jesuit general, Claudius ACQUAVIVA, since he and Allen had been declared traitors by the government. He retired to Rouen to write. He made two journeys to win support for invasion plans to aid James VI, king of Scotland, and his captive mother, Mary, Queen of Scots: one to Philip II in Lisbon in May of 1582, the other to Gregory XIII in August of 1583. Both plans failed because Philip II, though urged by the pope, refused military aid. Such political activity must be viewed in the light of contemporary practice, when popes often employed Jesuits on political missions, for example, the missions of Antonio Possevino and Francisco Toledo. Nor was there any other person to send on a mission that demanded dispatch and secrecy.

Back from Rome, Persons worked closely with Allen, residing chiefly in Rouen and Saint-Omer, writing books and preparing priests for the English mission. In September of 1585 he journeyed to Rome with Allen to do his tertianship and to expose the intrigues of English councilors, who employed an agent, Solomon Aldred, to bribe leading personalities in the papal court to the jeopardy of the Catholic cause. In this the two Catholic leaders were successful. In Rome Persons took his final vows on May 9, 1587 and was instrumental in promoting Allen to the cardinalate.

Robert Persons.

After the failure of the Spanish Armada, Acquaviva sent Persons to Spain society business. Persons won high commendation for his work in Spain. He founded English seminaries at Valladolid and Seville and residences for English priests at San Lucar and Lisbon, and he brought about the foundation of a school for English Catholic boys at Saint-Omer in 1593.

Recalled to Rome in 1597 to settle the longstanding troubles in the English College, he succeeded in restoring peace and became rector of the college, a post he retained until his death. His plan for organizing the English Jesuits, proposed to Acquaviva while in Spain, was put into effect in 1598. They were to form a quasi province under a superior in Rome, to which post Persons was appointed, with prefects in Flanders and Spain and a superior in England. In the same year George BLACKWELL was appointed archpriest and superior of seminary priests in England. Persons had proposed a plan for two English bishops, one in Flanders, the other in England, explaining it to the cardinals concerned; but Rome decided that the time was not propitious for such appointments. In the resistance of a few priests to the new institution and their ensuing controversy with Blackwell, Persons supported the archpriest and strove vainly to reconcile both parties in the disputes (see ARCHPRIEST CONTROVERSY).

Of Persons' writings the most famous is A Christian Directory, published in 1582 under the title The First Book of the Christian Exercise. The book went through many editions and translations. The Book of Succession was not written by Persons alone, but was the joint production of several contributors. Among his controversial works, the most outstanding is his Answer to the Fifth Part of Coke's Reports (1606), with his reply to Coke's answer, A Quiet and Sober Reckoning (1609). His Briefe Apologie is remarkable for its rich documentation.

Bibliography: "Memoirs," ed. J. H. POLLEN, Publications of the Catholic Record Society 2 (1906): 12–218; 4 (1907): 1–161; "Letters and Memorials to 1588," ed. L. J. HICKS, ibid. 39 (1942). T. FITZHERBERT, "Letters," ed. L. J. HICKS, ibid. 41 (1948). P. RENOOLD, ed., "The Wisbech Stirs," ibid. 51 (1958). L. J. HICKS "Fr. Persons, S.J. and the Seminaries in Spain," Month 157 (1931): 193–204, 410–417, 497–506; 158 (1931): 26–35, 143–152; "The Growth of a Myth: Fr. Robert Persons, S.J. and Leicesters Commonwealth," Studies 46 (1957): 91–105; "The Embassy of Sir Anthony Standen in 1603," Recusant History 5 (1959–60): 91–127, 184–222; 6 (1961–62): 163–194; 7 (1963–64): 50–81. For further articles of L. Hicks see C. READ, ed., Bibliography of British History: Tudor Period, 1485–1603 (23 ed. New York 1959). C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 6:292–316.

[L. HICKS]

PERU, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Republic of Peru is bound on the northwest by ECUADOR, on the northeast by COLOMBIA, on the east by BRAZIL and BOLIVIA, on the south by CHILE and on the west by the South Pacific Ocean. Peru has three distinct regions. Its costa or coastal area, a narrow strip of desert that is fertile where irrigated by mountain streams, while the central region, the sierra, is formed by the Andes mountains that run north to south through the center of the country. Peru's vast jungle area, the selva, encompasses nearly two-thirds of the country and is sparsely populated by indigenous groups and Spanish-speaking settlers who live along the rivers that feed the Amazon basin. Natural resources include copper, silver, gold, petroleum, iron ore and phosphates, while agricultural produce consists of coffee, cotton, sugarcane, rice, wheat plantains and potatoes. Fishing is also an important in-Capital: Lima.

Size: 496,222 sq. miles.

Population: 27,012,900 in 2000.

Languages: Spanish, Quechua, Aymara.

Religions: 24,041,480 Catholics (89%), 1,971,850 Protestants (7.3%), 268,500 practice indigenous faiths (1%), 731,070 are without religious affiliation.

dustry in Peru, where fishmeal is one of its major exports, as is the cultivation and export of coca, which is processed into cocaine in neighboring countries. In 1999 the government curtailed production of coca by 24 percent as a way of curtailing the presence of the illegal drug trade in Peru.

Peru was part of the Spanish viceroyalty of Lima until 1821, when José de San Martín proclaimed independence. Under a republican government, the region joined with Bolivia in the Peruvian-Bolivian Confederation from 1836 to 1839; from 1879 to 1884 it engaged in a bloody war with Chile. Under military rule from 1968 to 1980, Peru returned to democratic government and experienced stable economic growth in addition to making progress in combating both outbreaks of guerrilla violence and the activities of traffickers in illegal drugs. Almost half the population is ethnic Amerindian, with 37 percent mestizo and the remainder of European, Asian or African descent.

Early Christianization. In Peru, the seat of many cultures thousands of years old, there arose in the 14th century an Andean state, the empire of the Incas, which constituted a social and economic structure without equal, although lacking in individual liberty. In 1532 Spanish explorer Francisco Pizarro, at the head of a group of 200 conquistadores, put an end to that political organization by defeating Incan leader Atahualpa, and ten years later, Lima was created as a viceroyalty of Spain, its jurisdiction the entire southern continent, although it was effective only along the Pacific Coast. Catholicism was introduced by the regular clergy at the same pace as the conquest, and by 1550 Dominicans, Franciscans, Mercedarians, Augustinians and Jesuits were all active in Peru. The Incas continued to revolt against the Spanish conquest, leading full-scale rebellions as late as 1814, all without success.

Although the Church was aided in its work by Spain, there were several obstacles present in evangelizing a vast area housing three million inhabitants. Altering tribal customs and rituals, while not difficult with children, was extremely difficult with adults in whom such customs were deeply rooted. The number of unfamiliar Amerindian languages made communicating the scriptures difficult, for mastering one such language did not make the others spoken any easier to comprehend. In addition, the region suffered a shortage of clergy, which forced missionaries to gain the help of Spanish-speaking natives called alguaciles or fiscales de doctrina. These individuals helped the priest, leading repetitions of minor catechism, and tending the general management of the parish. After 1570 settlements of native converts were formed from which the doctrinero or rural priest operated. From these settlements the doctrineros, who served entire provinces, would also establish mission centers that they visited according to distance and necessity.

Besides their primary objective, the orders undertook to protect their converts and to disseminate culture. The DOMINICANS and JESUITS particularly worked in higher education, the Dominicans having opened 60 schools by 1548. The University of San Marcos in Lima was created in 1551. The Jesuits directed the Colegio de San Martín in Lima, San Bernardo in Cuzco, the University of St. Ignatius of Loyola in Cuzco, schools for the children of caciques in the Lima and Cuzco regions and schools in Juli. In addition, orders attended to evangelization, distributing the Peruvian territory among themselves. By the end of the 1500s the Dominicans had founded 22 convents, which attended to a total of 57 doctrinas; the Mercedarians had 13 convents with 47 doctrinas; the Franciscans, 22 with 28; the Augustinians, 13 with 28; and the Jesuits, in addition to residences in Lima, Arequipa and Cuzco, took charge of doctrinas in Huarochiri and Juli as well as of the native people living in Lima.

Despite the many challenges posed in Peru, the Jesuits and Franciscans went on to excel in Marañón and Ucayali and in the eastern region of present-day Bolivia. The Jesuits founded flourishing missions in the areas of the Morona, Santiago and Chinchipe Rivers; tragically, these missions would disintegrate when the Jesuits were expelled from South America after 1760. The Franciscans from the Colegio de Propaganda Fide de Santa Rosa de Ocopa (valley of the Mantaro) projected their evangelizing labor over the Pampa del Sacramento toward the Ucayali. At the beginning of the 19th century the Franciscans established themselves in the remote headwaters of the Yavarí, Yuruá and Purús Rivers. The bishopric of Maynas, erected in 1802, embraced the entire Amazon region and the tributary missions, in which neophytes were abundant.

In the 17th century new orders of men and women entered Peru, among them the Benedictines, the Hospitalers of St. John of God, the Minim Fathers, the Bethlehemites and the Oratorians. In the 18th century the Camillians or Ministers of the Sick began their activities.

The two hospitaller orders of St. John of God and Our Lady of Bethlehem (the latter founded in America) expanded rapidly. The first took over the convalescent hospital in Lima; in Cuzco, Ayacucho and Huancavelica, they staffed previously established institutions. The Bethlehemites took charge of hospitals in Lima, Cajamarca, Trujillo, Chachapoyas, Piura and Cuzco.

Development of the Hierarchy. While missionary work was carried out by the religious orders, the tasks of direction and coordination fell to the episcopate. The Church in Peru was first subject to Seville, but in 1529 the first see was erected in Tumbes. In 1537 Cuzco was created, its first bishop the Dominican Vicente de Valverde. Lima followed in 1541, and was raised to an archdiocese by Paul III in 1546. In 1559 Lima Archbishop LOAYSA founded the 12-room hospital of Santa Ana for Amerindians, which continued to operate for centuries on archdiocesan funds; later the hospital of San Bartolomé was opened for blacks, that of San Pedro for priests and that of Nuestra Señora de Atocha for orphans; and in Cuzco that of San Juan de Dios (1555) and that of Nuestra Señora de los Remedios for Amerindians. In addition the Church founded schools for children of all races, with instruction suited to their needs. During the third council (1582–83) the conversion of natives was of special concern. The knowledge of native languages was made obligatory, to aid priests in confession (up until the mid-16th century interpreters had been tolerated). In addition, a single catechism and confesionario in the Quechua and Aymara languages was adopted.

It was a general rule of the Church in Peru to elevate to the priesthood Creoles (whites born in Peru), and soon they outnumbered clerics from Europe. Mestizos (mixed white and Amerindian) were not excluded from religious orders, and after 1588 their ordination was authorized if they had the qualities necessary for the priesthood. Since natives were new to the faith and, because of their lack of familiarity with Western culture, did not possess the formation necessary for a priest, it is understandable that the early councils closed the way to them. However, as Amerindian converts adapted to Christian customs and gained the necessary ability and skills, there was no reason to keep them from the altar. Among the first Amerindians admitted to orders were a Dominican lay brother, Francisco de San Antonio (1585–1635) and a Mercedarian lay brother. A 1769 decree of Charles III encouraged prelates to admit into the seminaries one-fourth Amerindians or Mestizos so that their compatriots would strengthen themselves in the faith. However, few made use of this privilege; native vocations appeared very slowly and increased only in modern times. At the end of the 17th century, a religious house was opened for native women: the Beaterio de Copacabana in Lima, under the direction of the Concepción Order.

View of Cuzco City and Cathedral, Peru. (©Brian Vikander/CORBIS)

Independence, Decline and Revival. As the stirrings of nationalism filtered throughout South America, the Creole clergy were sympathetic to the cause of independence, which the Spanish authorities, both civil and ecclesiastic, tried in vain to combat. Among the cathedral clergy, Peninsulars were more numerous because the king filled many of the offices, and the natives of Spain took advantage of this. Many pastoral letters like those of the bishop of Arequipa La Encina (1811 and 1815) and of the bishop of Cuzco Orihuela (1821), which introduced the apostolic brief of Pius VII (Jan. 30, 1816), tended to calm dissident citizens.

The Church could not remain indifferent to the struggle that divided her followers. Royalists and insurgents each attempted to win Church leaders to their side, realizing the Church's power and influence over its subjects. Royalists knew that the Church was obligated to preserve fidelity to the sovereign and would make use of the canonical resources within its reach to repress insurrection. Insurgents knew that many of the clergy, both religious and secular, were inclined by their birth toward separatism, and they took advantage of the indirect influence these priests could exert, even if they could not intervene actively.

In 1821 José de San Martín stormed Lima and proclaimed political independence. Three years later, following the Battle of Ayacucho, Spanish troops were withdrawn from the region. After almost three hundred years of Spanish rule, Peru was now a sovereign nation. Under the dictatorship of Simón Bolívar, Peru briefly entered the alliance of Gran Colombia, but this dissolved by 1830. A period of civil war was ended with the presidency of Ramón Castillo (1844–62), who ended slavery in Peru and nationalized education.

Political independence caused a temporary crisis of leadership within the Peruvian Church as Spanish-born bishops, who had taken an oath of loyalty to the Spanish crown, departed the country. From 1821 until 1835 there was no resident archbishop in Lima. Gradually, however, the crisis of episcopal leadership was solved as the Peruvian Congress, exercising the patronato in the name of the Republic, named bishops that Rome eventually recognized. A large number of highly trained and politically progressive priests helped the Church survive the immediate post-independence period and forge a working relationship with the new state. 33 served as members of the first Congress that made Catholicism the state religion.

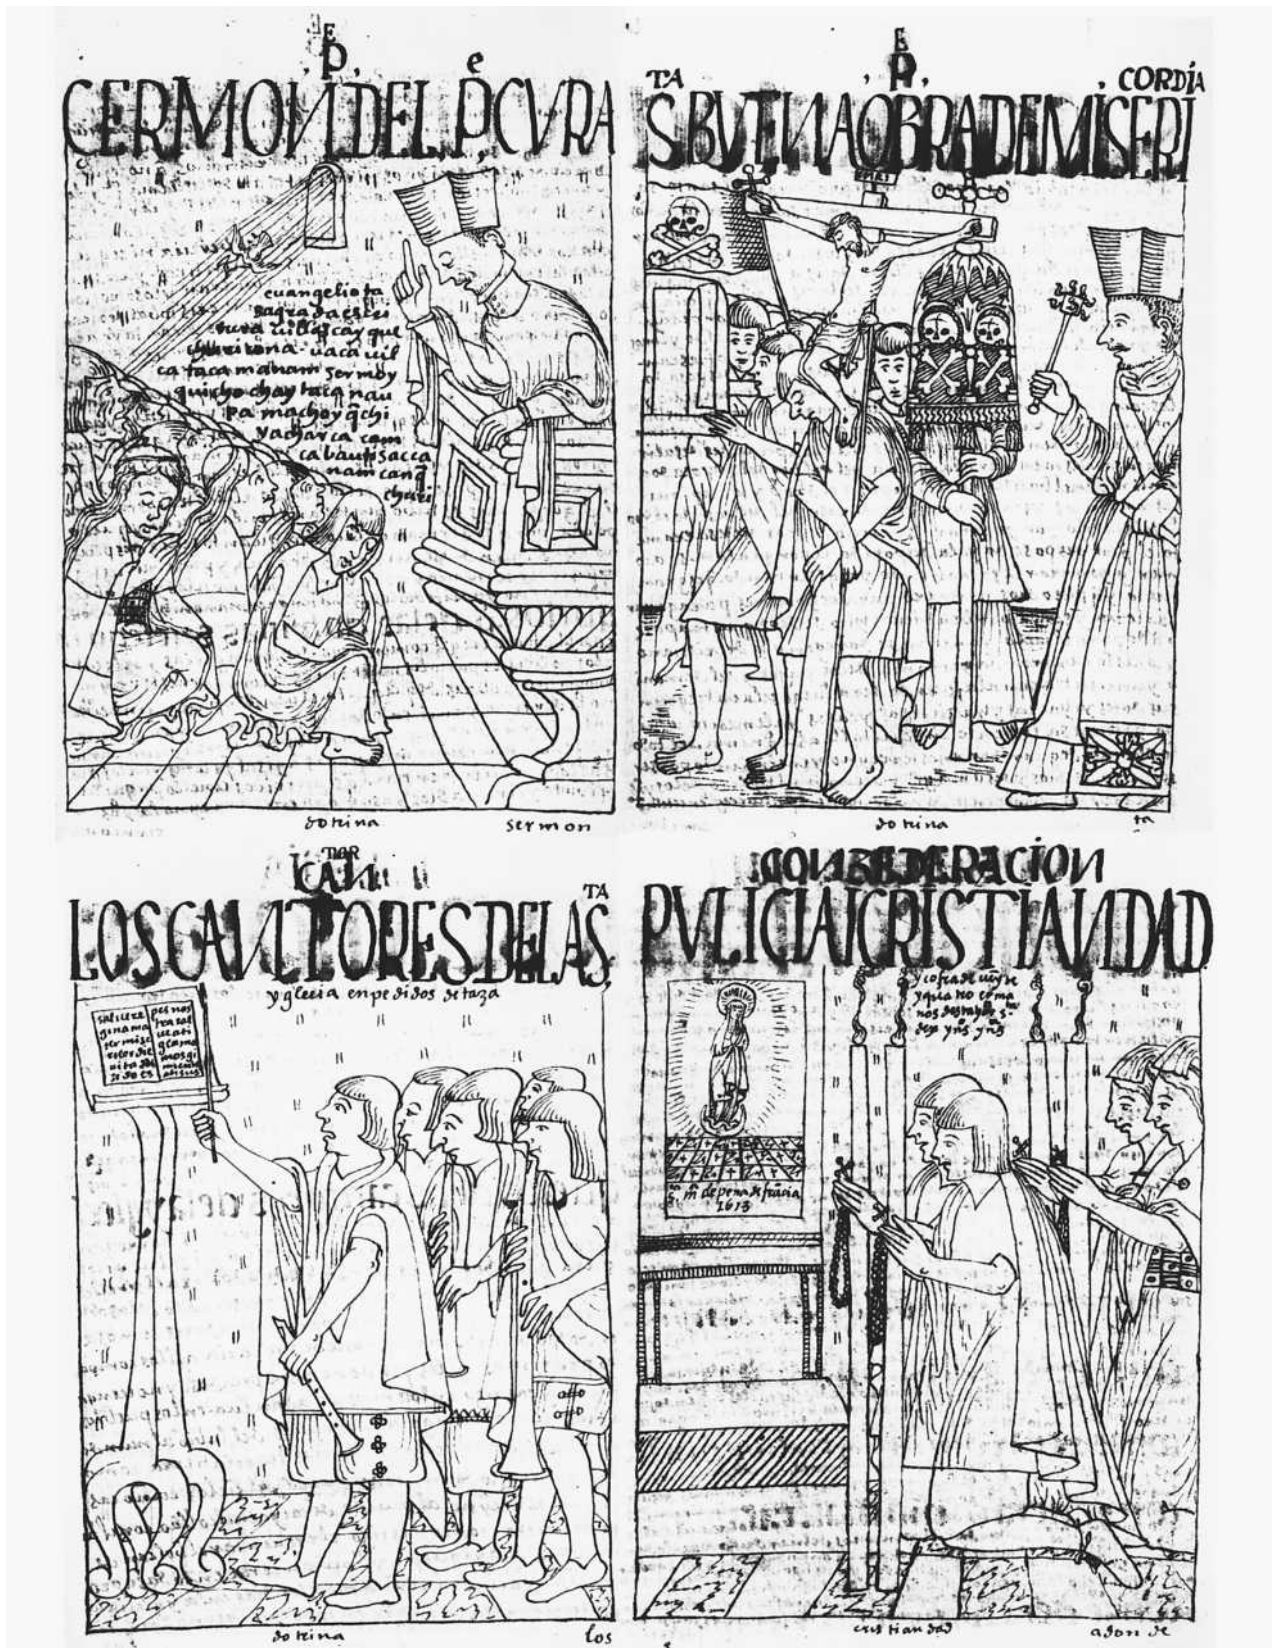

Roman Catholic cathedral, Plaza de Armas in forefront, Lima, Peru. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The economic resources of the Church had permitted an untroubled existence up to the beginning of the 19th century. Its patrimony had slowly increased because the monarchs fulfilled conscientiously their duty of placing at the disposal of the Church the tithe-rents that had been conceded by the Holy See. To this had been added voluntary contributions of the faithful in the form of chaplaincies, legacies and other agencies and the contribution of tithes and first fruits. In the 1830s, as the government descended into civil war, the economic contribution of the Church, demanded alternately by each political faction, sped its impoverishment, since many properties and treasures were consumed in the struggle. Both factions seized what they could, confiscating the treasures of local churches and real estate tied to charitable foundations and works. The situation grew worse as the economy faltered later in the century, and laws were introduced regarding the suppression of convents; expropriation of their properties; suppression of tithes and first fruits (1856) and of ecclesiastical entailment (1856); redemption of encumbrances and chaplaincies (1864); administration of the properties of brotherhoods (1889); abolition of MORTMAIN (1903); and consolidation of usufruct (1911). In the law of 1856, the state provided that the public treasury give the bishops and clergy their income. The political change also negatively affected the orders: the superiors could not carry out canonical visits, the religious were divided among political parties and many left the cloisters to become secularized. Under a 1826 decree many convents were closed and towns were prohibited from having within them more than one house of the same order. The government, without consulting the Holy See or the ordinaries, took over the vacated places and mismanaged rural properties, except in the few cases in which these were converted into educational institutions.

The independence movement brought with it direct contact with the Holy See, of which the Peruvian Church had been deprived because of the PATRONATO REAL, although the orphaned state suffered for many years until the mechanism for the naming of prelates could be reestablished. The right of patronage began to be exercised by the heads of state when they assumed that they had subrogated the privilege given to the kings of Spain by the popes. The Holy See did not recognize this, and although it accepted the presentation of subjects for the bishoprics, this was not mentioned in the appointment bulls that were issued motu proprio. This irregular situation was normalized, in the absence of a suitable instrument (such as a concordat), through a bull signed by Pius IX in 1874, in which the chief of state's right to patronage and to the exercise of the inherent prerogatives under certain conditions was recognized pro tempore. The regulations and prerequisites indicated in the bull were complemented by the provisions of the constitution, which fixed Peruvian birth as a requisite for an archbishop or bishop. The congress was also given the right to create new sees or to suppress them at the initiative of the executive power. The president of the republic made the selection of pastors in the Peruvian Church with the counsel of his ministers, the legislative power being excluded from any participation. The president of the republic enjoyed the privilege of also making presentations for the dignitaries and canons of the cathedrals and of conceding or denying approval to pontifical rescripts, with the consent of congress.

Clergy Suffers a Reduction. While from the 16th to the 19th century Peru had attracted more than enough priests for its growing faithful, after 1800 a progressive reduction in the number of the clergy could be seen. While the clergy was still numerous enough to serve almost all the parishes by 1850, a shortage of seminarians was already evident and vacancies were difficult to fill. The causes were varied: the poverty of the Church forced the bishops to turn away some candidates who requested scholarships; civil strife drew into the services many youths who would not normally have taken up military life; the loss of Christian spirit in the home influenced the lack of vocations. In addition, some young men who might have become priests were attracted to new careers through the opening of technical institutes, normal schools and art and trade schools. New laws also contributed to the decline in the number of religious by raising the required age for the profession and placing other impediments in the way of entrance into the cloisters.

Although the clergy began to shrink, increasing communities of religious devoted themselves to charity, teaching and the general welfare of Peru. The Sisters of the Sacred Heart of Picpus dedicated themselves to teaching, while the Sisters of Charity, Daughters of St. Vincent de Paul assumed the care of public hospitals in Lima and other cities. During the second half of the 19th century, new orders arrived to replace the old, many of which had seriously declined in numbers and some of which had disappeared completely. The Redemptorists dedicated themselves to the study of Quechua; the Jesuits returned; and the Salesians spread themselves through various parts of the country, taking charge of the education of needy children.

Church life in the missions of Peru during the early 17th century, four drawings from the manuscript of the "Nueva coronica" of Felipe Huaman Poma de Ayala, preserved in the Royal Library, Copenhagen.

Believers congregate to pay homage to Peru's most revered Catholic religious icon, the "Purple Christ" or "Lord of Miracles" (Señor de Los Milagros), Lima, Peru, Oct. 18, 2000. (©Reuters NewsMedia Inc./CORBIS)

Contributions to Peruvian Culture. The influence of the Church in the development of Peruvian culture was significant throughout the colonial era and into the republic. Noted writers included Dominican Diego de Hojeda, author of the religious epic poem La cristiada, while mystical poetry was written by the Augustinian Fernando Valverde, the Jesuit Juan de Alloza and the Dominican Adriano de Alessio. Catholics contributed to the study of native languages: Domingo de Santo Tomás, Luis Gerónimo de ORÉ, GONZÁLEZ HOLGUÍN and Torres Rubio documented Quechua, while BERTONIO wrote on the Aymara language. Convent chroniclers reflected in their works not only internal history and events but also the daily life, customs and events of society. Among them were the Augustinians Antonio de la Calancha and Bernardo de Torres; the Franciscans Diego de CORDOVA Y SALINAS and Fernando Rodríguez Tena; and the Dominicans Reginaldo de LIZÁRRAGA and Juan de MELÉNDEZ. Theologians included the Jesuit Hernando de Avendaño, with his The-saurus indicus (in six volumes) and the Augustinian Gaspar de VILLARROEL; in mysticism and asceticism were the Jesuit Diego Alvarez de Paz, Toribio RODRÍGUEZ DE MENDOZA, pedagogical reformer of the end of the 18th century and the bishop of Trujillo MARTÍNEZ COMPAÑÓN, who compiled invaluable manuscript and graphic material on the ethnology and life of his diocese (1779–90). The Catholic press, although limited, also had a considerable tradition, beginning with El Bien Público, which was published in 1865.

Despite the many contributions of Peru's Catholic population, by the 1850s the relationship between the government and the Church began to break down as certain members of the Peruvian oligarchy took up the causes of liberalism and POSITIVISM. Influenced by intellectual and political trends in Europe and North America, some were overtly anticlerical, accusing the Church of medievalism and questioning the patriotism of bishops because of their loyalty to Rome. Although a tiny percentage of the population, this Lima-based elite controlled national politics, often forcing the Church into a defensive position. The battle between political liberals and the Peruvian Church continued well into the 20th century.

As relations between Church and State became increasingly secular, religious fervor in Peru declined. Many priests abandoned their doctrinas, at times voluntarily, out of loyalty to political principles, at other times, forcibly, because of preference for the party out of power. Many sees remained without a bishop, and many resignations resulted from the republican government's favor of secularization. While liberal governments, to avoid wounding the religious sentiments of the people or alienating the good will of the clergy, showed themselves respectful, they were not inhibited from enacting their increasingly secular agendas. The dissemination of writings contrary to the Catholic faith was permitted, showing defections by many writers influenced by the rationalist philosophy of the Enlightenment. Among them were Manuel Lorenzo Vidaurre (1773–1841), who won renown with his ecclesiastical code; Benito Laso;

Francisco Javier Mariátegui, the grand master of Peruvian Masonry; and above all, the heretic Vigil.

As the century continued, non-Catholic Christian influences began to appear in Peru. The constitution of 1860, in force until 1920, restricted the influence of other faiths by stating that the public exercise of any cult besides the Catholic was not permitted. Until 1895 what little Protestant propaganda existed in the country passed almost unnoticed, partly because very few Protestants preached their doctrines in Peru. After 1900, however, Protestant evangelicals appeared with increasing frequency. Owing to the lack of Catholic priests and other social factors, Protestantism would successfully infiltrate many areas of Peru during the 20th century.

Bibliography: R. VARGAS UGARTE, Historia de la iglesia en el Perú, 5 v. (Lima 1953–62). R. LEVILLIER, Organización de la iglesia y órdenes religiosas en el virreinato del Perú en el siglo XVI, 2 v. (Madrid 1919). A. TIBESAR, Franciscan Beginnings in Colonial Peru (Washington 1953).

[G. LOHMANN VILLENA]

The Modern Church

Toward the end of the 19th century an influx of missionaries from Europe and North America sparked a renaissance within the Church. Schools and hospitals were opened and rural parishes that had been abandoned due to the shortage of Peruvian priests were now staffed. Several universities were founded, among them the Pontificia Universidad Católica del Perú in 1917; the Universidad de San Martín de Porres, operated by the Dominicans; the Universidad de Santa María, in Arequipa, under the Marianists; and the Universidad del Pacífico, under the Jesuits. A second influx of missionaries after World War II, many from English-speaking countries, also helped the Church reestablish its presence in Peruvian society. In the 1950s a new generation of committed young Peruvian Catholics sowed the seeds of revival. Members of the Catholic Student Association (UNEC; an offshoot of Catholic Action), these students went on to assume prominent positions in both secular society and the Church in the 1960s and 1970s.

The Church after Vatican II. When the Second Vatican council opened in 1962, over 30 Peruvian bishops were present. Most returned to Peru committed to a new vision of the Church, especially the country's primate, Juan Landázuri Ricketts (1955–1990), who established new parishes in poor urban areas and invited foreign missionaries to work among the poor. In addition to staffing parishes, these new clergy also opened up cooperatives, schools and dispensaries to alleviate the poverty of Lima's new inhabitants, most of whom were newly arrived from the sierra. This scenario was repeated in other urban areas, and because of this new contact between the institutional Church and the poor, lay leaders who would have a profound impact on the direction of the Peruvian Church in subsequent years began to emerge. Large parishes gave birth to small Christian communities in which committed Catholics deepened their faith through prayer, study and social action. The energy and optimism of the 1960s was reflected in the Peruvian episcopal conference, which publicly advocated economic and political justice for all Peruvians, unheard-of themes from a Church once noted for its theological and political conservatism.

Francisco Pizarro. (Corbis)

Despite the enthusiastic reception of Vatican II, some obstacles to liturgical reform were present in Peru, one of which was the region's great cultural and linguistic diversity. In the Andean areas, efforts to assimilate indigenous culture and language in rituals such as the eucharist progressed slowly because the number of priests who spoke fluent Quechua and Aymara was extremely small. In addition, the historic tension between the institutional Church, which in the minds of many symbolized European culture, and the indigenous society with its many languages, cosmic vision and ritual tradition, acted upon the growth of the faith. Meanwhile, liturgical reform got caught up in the more complex issues of ecclesiology and the limits of INCULTURATION.

Political Instability. In 1968 two events took place that affected both the Church and society: the Latin American Episcopal Conference held in Medellín, Colombia, and a military revolution. The purpose of the conference was to apply the teachings of Vatican II to the reality of Latin America. The Peruvian bishops were one of the most articulate groups at the conference, their insightful contributions due to the presence of Peruvian theologian Gustavo Gutiérrez. The MEDELLÍN conference addressed the need for structural change in Latin American society. Condemning the growing gap between the rich and the poor as contrary to the Gospel, the bishops also recognized that the Church was sometimes more concerned with maintaining its social power than with proclaiming the gospel.

Peruvian bishops returned from Medellín better prepared to face the events that would confront them beginning in October when the military coup that ousted the country's civilian government unleashed what became known as the "Peruvian Revolution." Intent on modernizing the country, the military government began to reform many facets of Peruvian society. Education was universalized and land was redistributed. The government opened up new universities and created agricultural cooperatives to help the impoverished rural population. The Church, while generally supporting these reforms and issuing pastoral letters focusing on the rights of workers and the question of land for Peru's indigenous peoples, maintained a certain distance from the government. In many respects, the Church was more visionary than the government itself, whose reforms began to bog down and generate opposition by the mid-1970s. Government leaders accused the Church of being too radical, and a period of tension ensued. In 1979 nearly all connections between the Church and the State were dissolved, although the constitution continued to recognize the special place of Catholicism in Peruvian society. When the military relinquished power and elections were held in 1980, tensions lessened.

Gustavo Gutiérrez and Liberation Theology. In 1971, following his contribution to the Medellín Conference, theologian Gustavo Gutiérrez published A Theology of Liberation, a work that gave a theological grounding to Christians involved in the transformation of Latin American society. This book became a classic text in a movement Gutiérrez helped name, LIBERATION THEOLOGY. In 1974 he founded the Bartolomé de las Casas Center in Lima to carry out theological and social scientific investigation of Peruvian society. Staffed by young Peruvians, many of whom were members of UNEC, the center exerted great influence on the Church throughout Latin America. In the Andes, where the Church had been dominant for decades, new life emerged. The five bishops of Peru's southern dioceses took up the cause of the country's Quechua- and Aymara-speaking peasants, and helped establish the Andean Pastoral Institute in Cuzco. Known in Spanish by the acronym IPA, this institute generated theological and social scientific studies about Peru's Andean peoples that led to new pastoral strategies and training programs for indigenous lay leaders, and sparked the eventual translation of the Bible into these languages. During the 1970s and 1980s the Church of the Sur Andino, comprising the five southern dioceses of Cusco, Sicuani, Ayavira, Puno and Juli, was considered one of the most dynamic sectors of the Peruvian Church.

Not all Catholics agreed with the theological and social trends engendered by liberation theology. For more traditional Catholics, many of whom came from the upper and middle classes, liberation theology and new forms of Christian community among the poor were sources of concern. More conservative bishops were likewise alarmed at what they perceived as an excessive concern with the social and economic issues on the part of progressive Catholics. While tensions continued to exist through the end of the century, destructive polarization in the Church was avoided, in part because no one in the Church, conservative or progressive, denied the need for the Church to address social issues.

A Rising Tide of Violence. In the late 1980s, as the Peruvian economy neared collapse, the resulting political instability created a climate of violence as Peruvians found themselves engulfed in poverty. A serious political menace surfaced in the form of Sedero Luminoso, or Shining Path, a group of ultra-violent Maoist guerillas that wreaked havoc in the late 1980s and early 1990s. Nearly 30,000 deaths resulted from the campaign of violence waged by both the Shining Path and extremist members of the Peruvian military, as the radicals assassinated Church leaders and religious due to a belief that articulate, socially involved Christians threatened its goal of becoming the sole voice of the poor. Through the efforts of both the Archbishop of Lima and the government, the Shining Path surrendered to the government in 1991, leaving in its wake a group of saints and martyrs whose deaths represented a tragedy but also a tribute to the Peruvian Church. Two years later Sendero Luminoso founder Abimael Guzmán was arrested and imprisoned, although terrorist acts by other Marxist guerrilla groups would continue into the 21st century.

Through the 1990s the Church continued its efforts on behalf of the poor by responding to the continuation of a government-led austerity program of drastic economic cutbacks. In addition to feeding and otherwise caring for the millions of Peruvians made destitute by the economic collapse, bishops noted that the private sector, not just the state, was responsible for reducing poverty. In 1996 a government program of forced sterilization of poor women drew strong Church condemnation as a violation of personal freedom, and the program was disbanded in 1998. A new coalition government, which took office after a contested election in 1999, expressed its intention to sustain Peru's economic stability into the 21st century and asked for the help of the Church in addressing social issues.

Into the 21st Century. By the year 2000 there were 1,400 parishes tended by 1,300 diocesan and 1,200 religious priests, with vocations on the increase. Other religious included approximately 2,050 brothers and 5,400 sisters, many of whom operated the 514 primary and 471 secondary schools operated by the Church throughout Peru. The Church, as a significant influence on Peru's development, continued to receive benefits from the government in the areas of tax-exemption and funding for education, and most public schools devoted a portion of time to Catholic study. A move by the government to scale back religious education under a restructured secondary program was a point of concern for Lima Archbishop Juan Luis Cipriani Thorne, who in 1999 called religious education "not a privilege but . . . a right that belongs... to the Peruvian people."

Despite the fact that under 20 percent of Peruvian Catholics regularly attended Mass by 2000, the country retained a fervent Marian cult and a special devotion to the Crucified Christ. The latter sanctuaries included the Señor de los Milagros in Lima, which dated back to the 17th century; the Señor de Luren in Ica; the Church of Huamán in Trujillo; and the Church of Los Temblores in Cuzco. The devotion to the Mother of God opened the way for pilgrimage centers as important as the sanctuary of Our Lady of Guadalupe in La Libertad, that of Cochacarcas in Apurimac (Replica of Copacabana in Bolivia) and those of Chapi and Characato in Arequipa. Peru is the birthplace of the first South American-born saint, Rosa of Lima, a Dominican who was canonized in 1671.

Bibliography: J. HEMMING, The Conquest of the Incas (New York 1970). J. KLAIBER, The Catholic Church in Peru: 1821–1985 (Washington DC 1992). J. C. MARIÁTEGUI, Seven Interpretive Essays on Peruvian Reality (Austin and London 1971).

[C. R. CADORETTE/EDS.]

PERUGINO (PIETRO VANNUCCI)

The leading Umbrian painter at the close of the fifteenth century, best known as Raphael's teacher; b. Città del Pieve, c. 1448; d. Fontignano, 1523. He is recorded as a pupil of the Umbrian artist Piero della Francesca and of the Florentine Verrocchio and by 1472 was a member of the Florentine painters' guild. Of his most important commission, for frescoes and an altarpiece for the Sistine Chapel, all but the "Delivery of the Keys" (1481–82, Vatican) were destroyed. Here the balanced symmetry and lucid arrangement of figures in relation to architecture are clearly the legacy of Piero della Francesca. A mural of the "Crucifixion" within a triple arcade (1493–96; S. Maria Maddalena dei Pazzi, Florence) shows gentle figures placed in a serene, expansive landscape, which serves to unify the painting. Perugino was at the height of his powers from about 1495, executing the fresco cycle of the Sala del Cambio, Perugia, between 1496 and 1500. Raphael seems to have spent a year with Perugino from 1499, and the work of the two artists can be distinguished only with difficulty at that period. By 1506 Perugino's style was outdated, and he retired to Perugia. In his late paintings the figures with their tilted heads became repetitive and sentimental. The young Raphael is nevertheless indebted to him for his idealized types and classical serenity.

Perugino. (Archive Photos)

Bibliography: E. CAMESASCA, Tutta la pittura del Perugino (Milan 1959). R. WITTKOWER, "Young Raphael," Bulletin of the Dudley Peter Allen Memorial Art Museum of Oberlin College 20 (1963) 150–168.

[M. M. SCHAEFER]

PESCH, CHRISTIAN

Jesuit theologian; b. Cologne-Mulheim, May 25, 1835; d. Valkenburg, Holland, April 26, 1925. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1869. After completing the course of studies, he was sent to Ditton Hall in England, where he taught dogmatic theology from 1884 to 1895, after which he taught for 17 years at Valkenburg. The influence of St. Thomas, Suárez, and De Lugo is apparent in both his doctrine and methodology. At the time when modernism was influencing the thinking of many German theologians, Pesch became a leading authority and proponent of orthodoxy and contributed notably to the eradication of modernism in Germany. The best-known of his works is the Praelectiones dogmaticae (9 v. Freiburg 1894–97). This work is still a popular textbook of dogmatic theology because of its clarity, precision, and order. The Compendium theologiae dogmaticae (4 v. Freiburg 1913–14), is a résumé of the one previously mentioned. Pesch's other well-known book is De inspiratione Sacrae Scripturae (Freiburg 1906).

Bibliography: H. WEISWEILER Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 12.1:1305–06.

[G. V. KOHLS]

PESCH, TILMANN

Jesuit philosopher whose works constitute a major contribution to the textbook, or manual, tradition in the Thomistic revival of the late 19th century; b. Cologne, Feb. 1, 1836; d. Valkenburg, Holland, Oct. 18, 1899. He entered the Society on Oct. 15, 1852, and was ordained in 1866. From 1867 to 1869 he taught philosophy at Maria-Laach. After a lapse of seven years, during which he was exiled in Belgium and devoted himself to pastoral work and philosophical polemics in the vernacular, he taught philosophy at the Jesuit College at Blyenbeek, Holland, from 1876 to 1884. Thereafter he spent his life in writing and pastoral care. His textbooks constitute the following parts of a series called Philosophia Lacensis, all published in Freiburg im Breisgau: Institutiones philosophiae naturalis (2 v. 1880; 2d ed. 1.897), Institutiones logicales (3 v. 1888–90; 2d ed., 2 v. 1914–19), and Institutiones psychologicae (3 v. 1896–98). Inspired by AETERNI PATRIS, Pesch explicitly followed St. Thomas Aquinas and Albert the Great, while incorporating material from F. de TOLEDO, the Conimbricenses, F. SUÁREZ, S. MAURUS, and J. Kleutgen. His tract on logic includes Aristotelian logic (Dialectica), epistemology (Critica), and quaestiones ontologicae. Consequently the Cartesian and Kantian traditions, though rejected, condition the place and function of epistemology in his synthesis.

Bibliography: J. L. PERRIER, The Revival of Scholastic Philosophy in the 19th Century (New York 1909). Stimmen aus Maria-

Laach 57 (1899) 461–475. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae (Innsbruck 1903–13) 5:1873–74.

[N. J. WELLS]

PESHITTA

(Syriac p̄šīttā), the official Bible text of Syrian Christians. The name, in use since the 8th century, means “common” or “simple,” in contradistinction to elaborate, which is applicable to versions such as the Syro-Hexaplar and the Harklean [see BIBLE (TEXTS), 2]. Although it was once believed to be the oldest version in the Syriac tongue, the Peshitta is no longer accorded this honor; yet it does have a venerable past, since it claims the heritage of the whole of Syrian Christianity despite the doctrinal separations that began in A.D. 431. One sign of its great antiquity is its limited New Testament canon, which did not include 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, Jude, and the Revelation.

[A. VÖÖBUS]

PESSIMISM

The term pessimism, formed by analogy with the word OPTIMISM, appeared first in the writings of Coleridge in 1815. It signifies either a permanent attitude of mind and settled feeling, or a philosophical doctrine. The former manifests itself in man's tendency to see the world in its worst aspect and is exemplified in the lyrical pessimism of Byron, Leopardi, Musset, Baudelaire and Heine, which is basically a pathetic affirmation of evil in the world.

As a philosophical doctrine, pessimism asserts that, on the whole, the world is bad rather than good. This doctrine presents itself variously as (1) empirical pessimism, (2) metaphysical pessimism and (3) pessimisms confined to special areas of thought. According to empirical pessimism only the present terrestrial existence is bad. Metaphysical pessimism, on the other hand, declares that the world as such is essentially evil, that it would be better if it did not exist at all. In more restricted usages, pessimism becomes concerned with particular spheres of human activity that seem to be hopelessly unsuccessful. Thus, sociological pessimism despairs of ever finding a satisfactory solution to the social problem; ethical pessimism believes man radically incapable of moral improvement; eudaemonistic (hedohistic) pessimism affirms that the amount of evil in this world surpasses the happiness of even the happiest individuals; cultural pessimism emphatically denies the possibility of any real advancement in culture. Suggestive of such views are the writings of Jean Jacques ROUSSEAU, Renouvier, LESSING and TOLSTOI.

Pessimism and Religious Thought. While many great religions of the world are optimistic in promising their faithful final salvation and eternal happiness, they are pessimistic when considering man's present condition. They look upon this world as a vale of tears, and its pleasures as vanity and deception, from which the faithful should in great part abstain by the practice of heroic abnegation. Particularly restrictive is BUDDHISM with its famous "Four Noble Truths on Suffering." Moreover, Buddhism teaches that only arhats, that is, perfect monks, can obtain salvation immediately after death. Christianity, when explaining the doctrine of future happiness, exhorts its disciples to become accustomed to live in hope, and to see in their present life a time of trial. But a man who loses Christian faith falls easy prey to pessimism. We see this clearly in atheistic EXISTENTIALISM and in some lyrical pessimism.

Some critics err in seeing a radical pessimism in the Books of Job and Ecclesiastes. The expressions of poignant distress that we find in these books are counterbalanced by other texts that are highly optimistic. Moreover, their authors sincerely believed in God, and whoever believes in God is implicitly satisfied with the world in which God has placed him. Certain Gnostics, in particular MARCION and his followers, pushed pessimism so far as to attribute the creation of the world to a demiurge, who is distinct from the supreme God. A number of Christian apologists have also placed undue emphasis on the evil, which causes men to suffer in this world. For example, ARNOBIUS THE ELDER calls man "an unhappy and miserable being who deploras that he exists."

Philosophical Pessimists. The most radical pessimist in antiquity was Hegesias, a Cyrenaic philosopher. Many of his pupils are said to have reduced his teaching to practice by committing suicide. For this he was called Πεισιθάνατος, that is, persuading to die. Stoic philosophy also contained much empirical pessimism, as did EPI-CUREANISM.

At first following a deistic optimism, VOLTAIRE wrote a poem two months after an earthquake in Lisbon, November 1755, in which he proclaimed a gloomy view of the world. Moreau de Maupertuis (1698–1759) taught that the evil in the world far surpasses the good. In the writings of David HUME, pessimism appears intrinsically connected with the thought expressed, which is particularly skeptical and radically phenomenistic. Atheistic existentialism professes that man has been thrown into existence by an unknown Being without a reasonable goal and has been abandoned to his own forces, which are insufficient to procure for him even elementary happiness. Existence itself is said to be irrational, blind, fatal and absurd.

Schopenhauer's Philosophy. Since the pessimism of Arthur SCHOPENHAUER (1788–1860) and Eduard von HARTMANN (1842–1906) was erected into a system of philosophy, it merits more careful consideration. Immanuel KANT had taught that only representations of our mind—pure PHENOMENA—can be objects of our intelligence. Schopenhauer, on the other hand, held that things in themselves could also be known by man; in reality, they are nothing else but products of will. Man's will, being deprived of any knowledge, pushes ahead blindly and thus becomes an inexhaustible source of suffering. The present world is the worst of all possible worlds; if it were only a little worse, it would not exist. Pleasure is purely negative: "want, depression, pain—these are positive." Again, "suffering is the true destiny of life." Man's redemption or salvation can be obtained only by "the negation of the wish to live," for then the world itself, "which is the reflection of our will," will disappear.

Hartmann's Position. Eduard von Hartmann tried to correct the system of his master, Schopenhauer. On the irrational will he grafted the Absolute Idea of HEGEL, but he replaced Hegelian dialectic by an inductive-scientific method. In order to explain the finality existing in nature, Hartmann postulated a particular reality that is diffused in it. As the activity of this reality (digestion, growth and many psychic acts) does not betray any consciousness, he called it the Unconscious. When, in pursuit of its ends, the will encounters an opposition, consciousness appears and with it, pain. The sum total of pain far surpasses that of pleasure. "The existence of this world is worse than its nonexistence."

Critical Evaluation. The pessimism of many people can be explained almost entirely by psychological factors. Leopardi's pessimism is the crying out of his soul, so to speak, in rebellion against the natural deformity of his body and his continuous misfortunes. Schopenhauer suffered from chronic nervousness with paranoid tendencies. Not all pessimists, however, are to be considered insane. Some arrive at a pessimistic view of the world through imitation or by whim. Others profess it in theory, but practice optimism in their lives. Here can be mentioned, in particular, Hartmann and some modern existentialists.

Another condition that leads many people to pessimism is their lack of experience, which makes them unable to face life realistically. In this way they expose themselves to bitter disappointments, become irritated and rebel. This possibly explains why pessimism finds most of its followers among young people. Schopenhauer published his theory of pessimism when he was 31 years old; Hartmann when he was only 26.

The philosophical foundations of pessimism are certainly questionable. Schopenhauer's assertion that the present world is the worst possible one was rejected even by many pessimists themselves (for example, Hartmann). His doctrine about the purely negative nature of pleasure is refuted by consciousness and experimental introspection. Although Hartmann taught that evil surpasses good in the world even in “the happiest of individuals,” he never proved it. Many individuals declare that they feel happy rather than unhappy. How could they be convinced of the contrary? Helen Keller, blind and deaf all her life, was an enthusiastic propagator of optimism.

The Darwinian “struggle for life” finds its proper corrective in the help that living creatures give one another. In order to understand the meaning of evil, one must take care not to mutilate this life. Moreover, pessimists consider only one fragment of human life, namely, terrestrial life; they reject a priori the immortality of the soul and its eternal destiny. Perhaps this explains why pessimism develops in men a sense of discouragement and leads many to suicide, which they see as the only logical conclusion to be drawn from pessimistic premises.

See Also: EVIL; SUFFERING; DEATH (THEOLOGY OF); DUALISM; IRRATIONALISM.

Bibliography: P. SIWEK, The Philosophy of Evil (New York 1950) 145–198. G. MORRA, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 3:1329–36. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 2:404–408.

[P. SIWEK]

PESTALOZZI, JOHANN HEINRICH

Swiss educator and social reformer; b. Zurich, Jan. 12, 1746; d. Brugg (Aargau), Feb. 17, 1827. He was born of a distinguished and strict Protestant family and was educated by his devoted mother after the early death of his father. He attended schools in his native town and ultimately the Collegium Carolinum, where such men as Johann Bodmer (1698–1783) and Johann Breitinger (1701–76) were his teachers. Influenced by physiocratic ideas, Pestalozzi attempted to organize a farm, Neuhof (near Brugg, Aargau), which he continued as a charity school after its financial ruin in 1773. When the same disaster struck his school, Pestalozzi was forced to support himself only by his writings. During the French Revolution, he sided with the Swiss Unitary State (centralized government) and was in charge of an almshouse in Stans (Nidwalden) in 1798, after the bloody suppression of the popular revolt. In 1799 he taught in Burgdorf (Berne), where he founded an educational establishment (1801), which he transferred to Münchenbuchsee (Berne) and to Yverdon (Neuchâtel) in 1805. Difficulties with his fellow teachers forced him to close this school in 1825. Returning to Neuhof, he wrote autobiographical accounts in which he explained his failure in terms of “lack of foresight and inability to govern,” shortcomings that are in sharp contrast to his fervent love for and devotion to mankind. His ideas, however, had profound and lasting influence. In the contemplative review of his life, Die Abendstunde eines Einsiedlers (1780), he paints an ideal picture of a man who is at peace because he has worked for the development of men’s inner powers through faith in God, a healthy family life, and an individual, vocational, and professional education adapted to the good of the community.

To Pestalozzi elementary education was the natural right of every child, who should be afforded the opportunity to develop his physical, moral, and intellectual powers. He was convinced that every child, if properly trained, could be prepared to earn a living while developing his intelligence and moral nature. Noting carefully the results of his educational experiments, Pestalozzi declared: “There unfolded itself gradually in my mind the idea of an ABC of observation to which I now attach great importance, and in the working out of which the whole scheme of a general method of instruction in all its scope appeared, though still obscure, before my eyes.” He considered it an important principle of instruction to reduce all subject matter to its simplest elements and adapt observation of these elements to the level of the child’s development. “The starting point of thought is sense-perception, the direct impression produced by the world on our internal and external senses,” he said, adding, “These impressions give the child his first ideas and at the same time awaken the desire to express them, first by signs, then by words.” Pestalozzi therefore stressed that sense-perception or observation was the foundation of instruction and that it should be joined with expression in language, for, he says, “We can only speak clearly and exactly of those things from which we have received clear and exact impressions.” In keeping with these views, Pestalozzi used a great variety of objects upon which he expected the children to exercise their sensory powers in the process of learning: field trips in the study of geography; elements of computation taught by counting steps and objects about the room; and moral training to grow out of occurrences in the daily lives of the children. There was oral discussion based on observation of the object of the lesson, a separation of the essential from the accidental and eventually the formulation of a definition. The procedure was chiefly oral: textbooks were not used, the pupil was active throughout the process, and the teacher instructed orally. This required of the teacher careful organization, resulting from proper preparation of the materials for each lesson, and skill in the art of questioning.

Influenced by J. J. ROUSSEAU's Social Contract and Emile, Pestalozzi introduced a vocational course of instruction as the ideal way to better the condition of the poor. The Neuhof experiment (1774–80) was intended to further this idea. Here the boys studied farming, the girls were taught sewing and housekeeping, and both learned spinning and weaving in a good home environment. Later in Stanz, (1798–1825), as he himself related: "I tried to connect study with manual labor, the school with the workshop, and make one thing of them." Earlier he had corresponded with Philip Emmanuel von Fellenberg, Swiss educator and agriculturist, explaining his ideas relative to this. Fellenberg, a man of means, established an institute at Hofwyl that emphasized practical training in agriculture and industrial arts. Pestalozzi did not include history and literature in his program because they were not readily adaptable to object teaching and because of his prejudice against books, which may have been influenced by Rousseau's Emile.

To Pestalozzi the principal center for the education of children was a well-regulated home, the center of love and cooperation. This spirit should also permeate the atmosphere of the classroom, where a "thinking love" should become the basis of the relationship between teacher and pupil. The school, he maintained, should be the focal point of activity wherein the individuality of the child would be regarded as sacred and instruction would be in harmony with his nature and inborn powers. He believed strongly in the development of head, heart, and hand in surroundings resembling those of a good Christian home.

Fellenberg's application of Pestalozzian principles were used effectively in the rehabilitation of juvenile delinquents in Germany and England. The manual labor movement in American education stemmed from the same source as did, also, the changes brought about in reform schools, e.g., segregation of young offenders from hardened criminals, and the growth of the cottage plan that grouped juvenile delinquents in homelike situations. The spirit and methods of the Swiss reformer later became the foundation of the Prussian system of education whose leaders had studied under him at Burgdorf and Yverdon. The report of Victor Cousin, the French philosopher, on "The Study of Public Instruction in Germany, Particularly Prussia" (1831) influenced French education and its translation into English in 1834 was widely distributed in England and America. Visitors to European schools disseminated their views upon their return through various educational journals, e.g., Henry Barnard's American Journal, the American Annals, and Horace MANN's Seventh Report. Pestalozzian methods came to be emphasized in American teacher's institutes. Edward A. Sheldon (1823–97), Superintendent of Schools at Oswego, N. Y., introduced the methods into the schools of his district. A teachers training school developed from the in-service training given the teachers, and in 1865 gave rise to the Oswego state normal school whose influence spread throughout the state and the Middle West in what came to be known as the "Oswego Movement."

Johann Heinrich Pestalozzi. (Archive Photos)

Pestalozzi was essentially a reformer interested in the social regeneration of the poor, which he thought could best be effected through instruction. His ideas introduced changes ranging from an enlightened atmosphere in the classroom to an improved methodology that was based upon and in accord with the natural development of the child. His experiments and observations emphasized the need for prospective teachers to know how as well as what to teach. This factor, together with his advocacy of universal elementary education, added impetus to the establishment of an increasing number of teacher training institutes in the U.S. and abroad.

Pestalozzi was a religious man and considered religious and moral education a very important aim. However, influenced no doubt by Rousseau, he abandoned dogmatic Christianity, although believing in God, and adhered to a purely rationalistic interpretation of a natural religion. His educational ideals inspired two great German educators, J. F. Herbart and F. W. FRÖBEL, who developed further many of Pestalozzi's theories.

Bibliography: Sämtliche Werke: Kritische Ausgabe (Zurich 1927–). F. DELEKAT, Johann Heinrich Pestalozzi (2d ed. Leipzig 1928). T. LITT, Der lebendige Pestalozzi (2d ed. Heidelberg 1961). K. SILBER, Pestalozzi: Der Mensch und sein Werk (Heidelberg 1957), Eng. tr. (London 1960). H. HOFFMANN, Die Religion im Leben und Denken Pestalozzis (Bern 1944). W. BOYD, The History of Western Education (6th ed. London 1952). E. P. CUBBERLEY, Readings in the History of Education (Boston 1920). F. P. GRAVES, Great Educators of Three Centuries (New York 1912). P. J. MCCORMICK, History of Education, ed. F. P. CASSIDY (3d ed. Washington 1953). P. MONROE, Founding of the American Public School System, 2 v. (v.1, New York 1940; v.2 n.d. microfilm). G. O'CONNELL, Naturalism in American Education (Washington 1936). F. V. N. PAINTER, ed., Great Pedagogical Essays (New York 1905). G. COMAYRÉ, The History of Pedagogy, tr. W. H. PAYNE (5th ed. London 1903). J. H. PESTALOZZI, How Gertrude Teaches Her Children, tr. L. E. HOLLAND and F. C. TURNER, ed. E. COOKE (Syracuse 1915); Pestalozzi's Leonard and Gertrude, tr. and ed. E. CHANNING (Boston 1897). R. H. QUICK, Essays on Educational Reformers (new ed. New York 1896). H. STETTbacher, Lexikon der Pädagogik, ed. H. ROMBACH, 4 v. (3d. ed. Freiburg 1962) 2:373–374.

[J. B. KELLER/W. G. WIXTED]

PETAU, DENIS (PETAVIUS)

Jesuit theologian and patrologist; b. Orleans, France, Aug. 21, 1583; d. Paris, Dec. 11, 1652. He received his master of arts degree at 16, defending his dissertation in Greek instead of Latin, and at 19 began to teach philosophy in Bourges (1603–05). He studied theology at the Sorbonne, and under the guidance of Isaac Casaubon devoted himself to patristic studies. In 1605 he became a Jesuit and was ordained in 1610. From 1611 to 1621 he taught rhetoric at the Jesuit colleges in Reims and La Flèche, and from 1621 to 1644 he taught positive theology at the Collège de Clermont in Paris, where after his retirement from teaching, he served as librarian until his death. Philip IV of Spain and Pope Urban VIII both sought his competent and erudite services, but without success.

Works. Guided by Fronton de Duc at Clermont, Petau edited the works of the fourth-century bishop SYNESIUS (1612), the 16 orations of the fourth-century Greek rhetorician Themistius (1613), three orations of JULIAN THE APOSTATE (1614), the Breviarium historicum of NICEPHORUS I (1616), and the complete works of St. EPIPHANIUS OF CONSTANTIA (1622). Petau's Doctrina temporum (2 v., 1627) was a thorough revision of SCALIGER's standard work of world chronology; the abridged version, Rationarium temporum (1633), was used by Bossuet for his Discours sur l'histoire universelle. Petau also wrote works of humanist and apologetical interest, as well as polemics against the Jansenists and Calvinists. His correspondence with famous persons was published in 1652.

The fame of Petau rests on his contribution to positive theology in his Dogmata theologia (4 v. 1644–50), in which he follows the lead of M. CANO and J. MALDONATUS and traces the Church's doctrines to sources in Holy Scripture and tradition. Of ten books planned, five appeared: De Deo, De Trinitate, De angelis, De mundi opificio, and De Incarnatione—each accompanied by an exhaustive discussion of the history of the topic, opposing heresies, the Church's decisions, and allied problems. Jansenists and other enemies of the Jesuits at the University of Paris caused a poor reception for the first three volumes in 1644; but outside scholars recognized their worth and the fourth volume appeared in 1650.

Theology. In his Prolegomena to the work, Petau discusses the nature and scope of theology in a fundamental manner and "leaves to others the frequently contentious and subtle theologizing of many scholastics." Recognizing that scholastic methods were useful in the clarification of positions and the refutation of heresy, he points out that some authors had trapped themselves in purely dialectical exercises or relied too much on the opinions of schools or champions. Petau's purpose was to make convenient for dogmaticians the evidence of the Scriptures and patristic theology as a basis for further study and development.

On two problems in particular, public penance and the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, Petau's contribution has been of considerable value. While editing the works of Synesius and of St. Epiphanius, he had already studied the history of penance in the early Church. In 1644 he published De la Pénitence publique et de la préparation à la communion to refute A. ARNAULD's Jansenistic propositions in the tract De la fréquente Communion. Citing the Fathers of the first three centuries and the Council of Nicaea, Petau argued that, while certain sins had been generally regarded as unabsolvable, the Church had never hesitated to grant absolution at the hour of death; and that in the first four centuries the practice of penance varied considerably from one period to another and from one church to another. In conclusion, he upheld the practice of frequent confession and Communion on the principle that the Church had power to regulate its discipline even in the matter of the Sacraments. While many of Petau's statements on the practice of penance in the early Church are open to question, he brought forth much new evidence on a historical problem that has not yet received a satisfactory solution.

In discussing the indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the soul (De Trinitate 8.4–7), Petau contended that theologians of his day stopped short of the true scriptural doctrine taught by the Greek Fathers. Granting that justification is caused by the presence of created grace in the soul, Petau maintained that, since both the Scriptures and the Fathers insist that sanctification is the work of the Holy Spirit: (1) the other Persons are present in the soul only through being inseparable from the Holy Spirit; and (2) as the Holy Spirit is called the “sanctifying power” of the Father and the Son, His action in the soul requires a special title, and a special mode whereby the union of the soul with the divinity terminates in the Person of the Holy Spirit. Though completely different from the hypostatic union, which is singularly characteristic of the Incarnation, this union of the Holy Spirit with the soul is still substantial, “so that the very substance of the Holy Spirit is joined with us in some mysterious and unusual way.” Petau’s theory was rejected by most theologians but in a modified form found favor with L. THOMASSIN (De Incarnatione, 6.11) and J. B. FRANZELIN (De Deo uno, 341–342). More recently M. SCHEEBEN (Die Mysterien des Christentums, 30), T. de Régnon (Études de théologie positive sur la sainte trinité, 4:524–526), and G. Waffelaert (L’union de l’âme aimante avec Dieu) have sought to render Pétau’s theory acceptable by modifying his explanations.

Petau called the attention of theologians to the hesitations, misconceptions, and inexactitudes of many of the early Fathers with regard to the theology of the Trinity in the primitive Church, and was immediately accused of making “almost all the Fathers of the first three centuries deny the divinity of the Son of God” by the Jansenists, and the Anglican theologian G. Bull in his Defensio fidel Nicaenae, 1685. Actually Petau’s work was of crucial significance in the appreciation of the development of doctrine through the centuries, as J. H. NEWMAN early came to realize. As a proponent of positive theology, Petau is one of the great theologians of all time.

See Also: PATRISTIC STUDIES.

Bibliography: Theological works pub. in editions of: Opus de theologicis dogmatibus, 6 v. (Antwerp 1700); as Dogmata theologica, 8 v. (Vivès ed. Paris 1865–67). P. GALTIER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 12.1:1313–37. A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 15.2:1851–54. P. DE LETTER, “Sanctifying Grace and the Divine Indwelling,” Theological Studies 14 (1953) 242–272. J. C. V. CHATELLAIN, Le P. Denis Pétau d’Orléans (Paris 1884). C. BAUMGARTNER, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:314. P. DI ROSA, “D. Petau e la chronologia,” Archivum historicum Societatis Jesu 29 (1960) 3–54.

[F. X. MURPHY]

PETER, APOSTLE, ST.

This article will discuss Peter’s name, his career as presented in the Gospels, position in the Apostolic Church, death and burial, and representations in early art.

Name. In all likelihood, Peter’s original name was šim’ôn (transliterated Σιμεών twice: Acts 15.14; 2 Pt

1.1). The form Simon (Σίμων), a genuinely Greek name, is used much more often, about 50 times. This could be simply a NT adaptation of the Hebrew name, but it is also quite possible that Peter, like many of his compatriots, used two names, one Hebrew and one Greek. However, it was by neither of these names that he came to be generally known. Jesus gave him a new name, the Aramaic word for rock, kêpā’. In the primitive Church, which was at first Aramaic-speaking, this form of his name would have been most common. Later it was transliterated into Greek as Κηφῶς (Cephas), but this form turns up only nine times in the NT, once in John and eight times in the letters of Paul. In fact, only once does Paul refer to him in any other way; in Gal 2.7 he calls him Peter (Πέτρος). This is intended as a Greek translation of kêpā’ and is used more than 150 times in the Gospels and Acts. It told the Greek-speaking Christians more about Peter’s function than the noncommittal Cephas. Finally, there is the double name, Simon Peter, which occurs about 20 times, mostly in John.

Career as Seen in the Gospels. That Peter was accorded a special place among the Apostles appears from an examination of the Gospel material.

Early Background. Before his call to follow Jesus, Simon, son of Jonah (Mt 16.17) or of John (Jn 1.42; 21.15–17), was a commercial fisherman. He and his brother ANDREW worked in partnership with another pair of brothers, JAMES and JOHN, the sons of Zebedee (Lk 5.10). The family home was in Bethsaida of Galilee (Jn 1.44), but by the time Jesus began His public ministry, Simon had married and moved to Capharnaum (see CAPERNAUM). His mother-in-law lived with him there, and on one occasion Jesus cured her of a fever (Mk 1.30–31). There is no direct mention of his wife or of any children, but 1 Cor 9.5 is commonly interpreted to mean that he took his wife about with him on his missionary travels.

The Synoptic and Johannine traditions do not agree on the circumstances of his initial call to discipleship. According to John, the first meeting took place at “Bethany beyond the Jordan,” where Peter, Andrew, and John were listening to the preaching of John the Baptist, who called their attention to Jesus (1.28, 40–42), and on this occasion Andrew recognized Jesus as the Messiah, and Jesus gave Simon his name of Peter. According to the Synoptics (Mt 4.18–22; Mk 1.16–20; Lk 5.11), the call took place in Galilee; Matthew and Mark differ somewhat from Luke in point of detail. It is, of course, possible to reconcile the two traditions. Peter may well have had his first meeting with the Master in the valley of the Jordan, with the definitive call to discipleship coming only later, after the return to Galilee. After all, John was an eyewitness. On the other hand, there is reason to suspect that John's account is influenced more by theological than by strictly historical considerations. In this account it is Andrew who first recognizes Jesus as the Messiah, and this is immediately at the beginning of the public ministry. In the Synoptics, it is Peter who first attains to this knowledge, and then only after several months of association with Jesus. Furthermore, it is in connection with this later avowal of Jesus' messianic dignity by Simon that the Lord changes his name to Peter. But John often telescopes historically separate incidents in order to make his "witness" more impressive. Using a sort of concentric-circle method of composition, he tends, from the very beginning of his Gospel, to present the whole truth about Christ in each episode. A striking example of this tendency to anticipate occurs in the passage under discussion. Even before he records Simon's change of name to Peter (1.42), he writes: "Now Andrew, the brother of Simon Peter, was one of the two." (1.40) (see JOHN, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST.).

In the Synoptics. Simon Peter figures prominently in the Gospels, especially in the Synoptics. His leadership is indicated in many ways. He is pictured as taking the initiative on several occasions and as acting quite consistently as the spokesman of the disciples. With surprising boldness, he asked Jesus to let him walk across the water to meet him (Mt 14.28). He usually spoke for the whole group of disciples, and their acknowledgement of his leadership is no less eloquent for its being tacit. In their name he asked for an explanation of the parable of the Alert Servants (Lk 12.41). When Jesus asked them their opinion of His identity, it was Peter who answered and proclaimed that He was the Messiah (Mt 16.16; Mk 8.29; Lk 9.20). Immediately after this he objected to Jesus' prediction of the Passion and was reprimanded for his trouble (Mt 16.22–23; Mk 8.32–33). On another occasion he reminded Jesus of the sacrifice they had made in answering His call and asked what sort of reward they could expect (Mt 19.27; Mk 10.28; Lk 18.28). Even in some instances where one Gospel attributes a question to the disciples as a group, another makes it clear that it was Peter who was the interlocutor (cf. Mk 7.17 with Mt 15.15; Mt 21.20 with Mk 11.21).

Whenever the Twelve are listed, it is always Peter who is mentioned first (Mt 10.2; Mk 3.16; Lk 6.14; Acts 1.13), and Matthew underscores his preeminence by starting his catalogue thus: "first Simon, who is called Peter." Even within the circle of the favored three, Peter, James, and John, he is always named first. This privileged trio witnessed the raising of Jairus's daughter (Mk 5.37), the Transfiguration (Mk 9.1–7), and the Agony in the Garden (Mk 14.33). In many instances where a group of the Apostles is involved in an incident, only Peter is mentioned by name (Mk 1.36; 16.7; Lk 8.45; 9.32).

Quite often in the Gospel narrative, Peter is singled out for special attention. It was from his boat that Jesus addressed the crowd on the lake shore (Lk 5.3), and it was to Peter's house that Jesus went in Capharnaum (Mk 1.29). It was with Peter that Jesus discussed the paying of the Temple tax, and immediately afterward He sent Peter to catch the fish in whose mouth was found the coin that covered the payment for both of them (Mt 17.23–26). Peter was the first of the Apostles to make a public declaration of his faith in Jesus as the Christ, and was selected as the Rock (his name!) on which the Church would be built (Mt 16.16–19). This selection was confirmed at the Last Supper when Jesus assured him that He was praying for the staunchness of Peter's faith in order that he, in turn, might be a bulwark for his fellow Apostles (Lk 22.31–32). When Peter answered that he was prepared to follow Him to prison and to death, Jesus predicted that, for all his protestations of loyalty, he would deny Him publicly before dawn (Lk 22.33–34; Mt 26.33–35; Mk 14.29–31). The sorry fulfillment of this prediction is recorded in all the Gospels. But the Synoptics record also the fact that when he realized what he had done, Peter wept in repentance. Shortly before this, when Jesus' enemies were preparing to lead him from the garden, Peter, again displaying his characteristic impetuosity, cut off the right ear of a servant of the high priest (Mk 14.47; cf. Jn 18.10). That Jesus recognized the sincerity of Peter's sorrow and forgave him is attested by the fact that He favored him with a special appearance after the Resurrection (Lk 24.34; 1 Cor 15.5).

In John. Peter does not figure quite so prominently in John as in the Synoptics. But then, the Johannine tradition has theological centers of interest quite different from those of the Synoptic tradition. John's anticipation of the recognition of Jesus as the Messiah and of the change of Simon's name to Peter is mentioned above. After the Eucharistic discourse (Jn 6.22–68), when Jesus asked the Apostles if they also were minded to leave Him, Peter replied: "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast words of everlasting life, and we have come to believe and to know that thou art the Christ, the Son of God" (Jn 6.69–70). At the Last Supper he protested when Jesus approached to wash his feet (Jn 13.6–10), and he motioned to John to ask Jesus the identity of the betrayer about whom He had been speaking (Jn 13.23–24). In concert with the Synoptics, John records the prediction of Peter's denial (Jn 13.38) and its fulfillment (Jn 18.17–18, 25–27). He alone identifies Peter as the disciple who cut off the ear of the high priest's servant (18.10). On the morning of the Resurrection, Mary Magdalene brought news of the empty tomb to Peter and John. Together they hurried to the spot, but it was Peter who entered first (Jn 20.1–10). Simon Peter's decision to return to his fishing is recorded in Jn 21.3. While he and his companions were at their work, Jesus appeared on the shore. After He had successfully guided them to a good catch, John realized who He was and immediately told Peter. The latter jumped overboard and waded ashore (Jn 21.4–8). And when Jesus asked for some fish for breakfast, Peter dashed out and dragged in the whole catch (21.10–11). After they had eaten, Jesus elicited from Peter a three-fold profession of love and gave him the commission to feed His lambs and His sheep, thus confirming him in his primacy (21.15–17). He then foretold Peter's martyrdom (21.18–19).

Primacy. Because of its theological importance, Peter's confession in Mt 16.16–19 calls for special comment. All three Synoptics record his avowal of Jesus' messiahship, but Matthew alone includes his profession of faith in Jesus' divine sonship and the promise of primacy that follows. This passage presents several problems. First, is the matter peculiar to Matthew authentic, and if it is, why did Mark and Luke omit it? It used to be the fashion in certain circles to deny flatly the authenticity of the Matthean material. Now, however, there is general agreement that Mt 16.17–19 is part of the original Gospel according to St. Matthew. But there is still some question as to whether the promise was made on this specific historical occasion. The question is not an idle one. Mark and Luke both record the event that took place at Caesarea Philippi, but both give a shorter version of Peter's confession: "Thou art the Christ" (Mk 8.29); "the Christ of God" (Lk 9.20). And neither of them makes any mention of the change of Peter's name or of the promise of primacy at this point. Interestingly enough, even in Matthew's account, Our Lord brings the incident to a close with the charge "to tell no one that he was the Christ" (16.20).

The explanation may lie in Matthew's method of composition, which is obviously synthetic. He groups incidents and sermons topically rather than chronologically. The section in which this passage appears (13.54–19.1) is concerned with the structure of the Kingdom, and within this section Matthew has gathered several incidents that point up Peter's prominence: his walking on the water, his role in the drama of the Transfiguration, his finding of the coin for the Temple tax (for himself and Jesus) in the fish's mouth, and his inquiry about the forgiveness of offenses. It is quite possible that, following his method of logical grouping, he filled out the incident at Caesarea Philippi with another confession of Peter from the post-Resurrection period, the profession of faith that occasioned the bestowal of the primacy. In the Johannine tradition, this bestowal took place in a post-Resurrection context. Such a remarkable act of faith would seem more in place in this context. At any rate, whether or not it is in its proper historical setting in Mt ch. 16, the text is certainly authentic and retains its full force (see MATTHEW, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST.).

In the Early Church. After Christ's Ascension Peter is undisputed leader of the Church. He takes the initiative in the election of Matthias to the Apostolic college (Acts 1.15–26). At Pentecost he explains to the curious crowd the meaning of the strange phenomena that accompanied the descent of the Holy Spirit (2.14–40). His cure of the lame beggar is the first recorded miracle of an Apostle (3.1–11). He takes advantage of this occasion to preach Christ within the Temple precincts (3.12–26), and when the authorities arrest him and his companion, John, he fearlessly defends himself before the Sanhedrin (4.1–22). So great did his renown become that people brought their sick on stretchers and placed them on the ground in the hope that his shadow might fall upon them as he passed (5.15). And when all the Apostles were arrested, Peter again spoke in their defense (5.29–32). Once they were released on the advice of Gamaliel, they continued steadfastly to spread the Good News, in spite of the fact that they had been flogged as a warning (5.40–42). Peter vigorously condemned Ananias and Sapphira in the name of the Church (5.1–11). Leaving James in charge of the local community, he visited the churches in Samaria (8.14) and Galilee (9.31–32), Lydda (9.32), Sharon (9.35), and Joppa (9.36). In Lydda he cured the paralytic Aeneas, in Joppa he raised Tabitha from the dead. In Caesarea he received the centurion Cornelius into the Church (10.9–48).

This last incident illustrates the forthrightness and decisiveness of Peter's leadership. The question of the admission of Gentiles into the Church was far from being settled. In fact, it took a supernatural vision to form Peter's convictions on the matter, but, once convinced, he acted fearlessly. The reaction of the Jerusalem community was not favorable, but when Peter explained his action they acquiesced (11.1–18).

Not long after this, Herod Agrippa I arrested Peter, but he was miraculously released from prison; thereupon he departed, and went "to another place" (12.1–17), the identity of which is unknown. Antioch in Syria is a good possibility. At any rate, he was back in Jerusalem for the council called to discuss the still burning question of the admission of Gentiles into the Church. The matter had been somewhat clarified. It was no longer a question of whether or not they should be admitted, but rather of the terms on which they could be admitted—whether or not they needed to observe the Law. After a preliminary discussion among the Apostles, Peter settled the matter by citing the case of Cornelius (Acts 15) (see JERUSALEM, COUNCIL OF).

It is uncertain whether Paul's altercation with Peter at Antioch, as recounted in Gal 2.11–14, preceded or followed the council (see GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THE). Peter was associating freely with the Gentile members of the Antioch church until some of the Judaizers came from Jerusalem. Apparently in an attempt to avoid trouble, he avoided the Gentiles while this group was in town. This created a nasty situation. The Gentiles were hurt and bewildered, and Paul, their champion, remonstrated with Peter for his disturbing inconsistency.

Death and Burial. It is quite certain that Peter spent his last years in Rome. The first of the two epistles ascribed to him was written from "Babylon," a code name for Rome. It is, however, impossible to say how long he stayed there. An old tradition that he spent 25 years in Rome is quite unacceptable. All that can be said with certainty is that he went to Rome and was martyred there. St. Clement of Rome wrote, about A.D. 95, in his Epistle to the Corinthians (5–6): "To these men [Peter and Paul], whose lives were holy, there is joined a great multitude of elect ones who, in the midst of numerous tortures inflicted for their zeal, gave amongst us a magnificent example." St. Ignatius of Antioch, in his Epistle to the Romans a few years later, says that it is not for him to give them orders as Peter and Paul did. In the first half of the 2d century Papias wrote that Mark's Gospel was a record of Peter's Roman preaching (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3.39.15). From the second half of this century comes the testimony of Irenaeus, a man well acquainted with the universal Church of his day; he is quite explicit on the activity of Peter in Rome (Adversus haereses 3.3.3). By the late 2d and early 3d centuries, the tradition of Peter's Roman sojourn and martyrdom is solidly established. The martyrdom is usually dated 64 or 65 during the Neronian persecution. The tradition that he was crucified goes back to Tertullian (De praescriptione 36; Scorpiacus 15).

The earliest testimony to Peter's burial on Vatican Hill comes from the Roman priest Caius during the reign of Pope Zephyrinus (199–217). The tradition has been constant since then, and recent archeological discoveries beneath the Basilica of St. Peter have confirmed it. For details see the article on the VATICAN.

Peter in Early Christian Iconography. The earliest known painting of Peter is in a house in Dura-Europos, a city in the Syrian desert not far from the Euphrates. One of the rooms of this house, which was built in 232–233, was used as a Christian chapel. The walls are covered with paintings, one of which depicts the miracle of the walking on the lake. Peter is on the point of sinking, and Jesus is stretching out his hand to him. The figure of Peter is very well preserved and portrays him as bearded and with a fine head of curly hair. In the mausoleum of the Valerii, discovered during the recent excavations beneath St. Peter's, there is a scratching of just the head of an old man, bald, with wrinkled brow and pointed beard. The accompanying Latin inscription has been translated as follows: "Peter, pray Christ Jesus for the holy Christian men buried near your body." Both the picture and the inscription have been dated about 280.

Peter is depicted also in the friezes decorating Christian sarcophagi. In the center of one such frieze, from the 4th century, Christ is pictured predicting Peter's denial, and Peter himself is shown being arrested and striking a rock to procure water for the baptism of his jailer. On another type of sarcophagus, of Asiatic columnar construction, he is pictured at the head of the Apostles, carrying a cross and receiving from Jesus the scroll of the New Law.

With the coming of peace under Constantine and the building of churches, portraits of the Apostles become more common. An interesting example of the differences in art traditions comes from the Basilica of San Lorenzo Fuori le Mura at Rome. The mosaics, which date from 578, show a definite Byzantine influence, and Peter is pictured at Christ's right. In the Roman tradition, from the 4th to the 13th century, he appears always at Christ's left. St. Peter is traditionally represented as carrying two keys, a symbolism based on "the keys of the kingdom of heaven" of Mt 16.19, their number probably determined by the "two swords" of Lk 22.38.

Feast: June 29 (Ss. Peter and Paul).

Bibliography: U. HOLZMEISTER, Vita S. Petri Apostoli (Paris 1936). O. CULLMANN, Peter, Disciple, Apostle, Martyr: An Historical and Theological Study, tr. F. V. FILSON (2d rev. ed. Philadelphia 1962). O. KARRER, Peter and the Church: An Examination of Cullmann's Thesis, tr. R. WALLS (New York 1963). J. LEBRETON and J. ZEILLER, The History of the Primitive Church, tr. E. C. MESSENGER, 4 bks. in 2 (reissue; New York 1951), pub. as A History of the Early Church, 4 v. (1962). J. FINEGAN, Light from the Ancient Past (2d ed. Princeton 1959) 297–304. J. DUPONT, "Pierre et Paul dans les Actes," Revue biblique 64 (1957) 35–47; "Pierre et Paul à Antioch et à Jérusalem," Recherches de science religieuse 45 (1957) 42–60, 225–239. D. STANLEY, "Études matthéennes: La confession de Pierre à Césarée," Sciences Ecclésiastiques 6 (1954) 51–61. R. E. BROWN, K. P. DONFRIED, and J. REUMANN, eds., Peter in the New Testament (Minneapolis 1973). R. PESCH, Simon-Petrus (Stuttgart 1980). T. V. SMITH, Petrine Controversies in Early Christianity (Tübingen 1985). Anchor Bible Dictionary 5 (New York 1992) 251–63.

[J. J. CASTELOT]

PETER, CARL JOSEPH

Priest, theologian, and teacher; b. Omaha, Nebraska, April 4, 1932; d. Washington, D.C., Aug. 20, 1991. Oldest of four children born to Carl J. and Anne Marie (Schinker) Peter. Gifted with a brilliant mind and eidetic memory, the younger Carl excelled at school. As a seminarian for the Archdiocese of Omaha, he studied philosophy and theology at the Pontifical Gregorian University in Rome where he was ordained a priest in 1957. After two years as assistant pastor at St. Patrick's Church and dean of studies at Archbishop Bergan Central Catholic High School (1958–60) in Fremont, Nebraska, Peter returned to Rome for doctoral studies. For the next four years he held the posts of assistant vice-rector and repetitor at the North American College, earning the S.T.D. at the Gregorian (1962) and the Ph.D. at the University of St. Thomas Aquinas (1964). His dissertations, both published in their entirety (1964), treated Aquinas' views on the beatific vision and the eviternity of rational souls.

In 1964 Peter was appointed assistant professor of dogmatic theology at the CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA in Washington, D.C., where he spent his academic career. He chaired the Department of Theology (1975–77) and served for two terms as dean of the School of Religious Studies (1977–85). In 1990 he became the first occupant of the Founders (Caldwell-Drexel-Duval) Chair in Theology. He was also a visiting professor at St. John's University (Collegeville, Minnesota) during summer sessions (1970–91 passim) and a visiting lecturer at Princeton Theological Seminary (1974, 1976).

Peter's theological expertise was also widely esteemed outside the university. He was active in ecumenical dialogues, beginning as a member of the U.S. Bilateral Roman Catholic-Presbyterian and Reformed Churches Consultation (1967–72) and then as a prominent participant in the Roman Catholic-Lutheran Bilateral Ecumenical Consultation in the U.S. (1972 until his death). He served as a Roman Catholic observer (1969–70), as a member of the Interdenominational Study Group on Intercommunion (1970–71), and as a commission member (1971–72) of the Department of Faith and Order in the National Council of Churches. He was elected president of the CATHOLIC THEOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF AMERICA (1971–72) and received the society's John Courtney Murray Award for Distinction in Theology (1975). He was a peritus to the American delegates to the International Synod of Bishops in 1971, 1983, and 1985. Pope John Paul II appointed him to two five-year terms (1980, 1985) as a member of the International Theological Commission. Beginning in 1986 he was also a theological advisor to the Committee on Doctrine of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops. Peter had a reputation for being open-minded regarding the positions of others and moderate—"centrist"—in positions he himself espoused.

His numerous publications were in the form of articles and reviews. At the time of his death from a sudden, massive heart attack, he was at work on a book about academic freedom in Catholic theology and the Catholic University of America. Fortright yet prudent, hard working, and deeply concerned about others, he was lavish in his generosity to the University in support of scholars and scholarship and to the needy.

Bibliography: For a bibliography of Peter's books and articles, see Church and Theology: Essays in Memory of Carl J. Peter, ed. P. C. PHAN (Washington D.C. 1995) 280–84. His personal writings and notes are preserved in the archives of the Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

[N. H. MINNICH]

PETER, EPISTLES OF

Since the two Epistles that bear St. Peter's name are quite different in many ways, they are treated separately here, according to the contents, authenticity, destination, time and place of composition, and theology of each.

1 Peter. After the writings of the Pauline corpus, this is probably the best-known and most important of the New Testament Epistles. It is written with rare unction. Among the catholic epistles, it has the greatest claim to have been written by the person whose name it bears, contemporary scholarship generally holds that it was written some time after the death of the Apostle Peter.

The author opens with a salutation (1.1–2) and blesses God, who has given rebirth, through the Resurrection of Christ, and an imperishable inheritance (1.3–5). He states that this is a source of joy even under trials (1.6–7) and that Jesus is now the object not of sight but of faith (1.8–9). Christian salvation was foreseen by the prophets (1.10–12); his readers must therefore be holy (1.13–17), being aware that they were ransomed by the blood of Christ (1.18–21). They are to love one another since they have been born anew of imperishable seed (1.22–25). They are newborn infants, living stones in God's building, a holy priesthood, God's own people (2.1–10). They must keep clear of fleshly passions, conduct themselves becomingly among the Gentiles, and be subject to human authority (2.11–17). Servants should be submissive; for all Christians must be willing to suffer, even unjustly, since Christ did so for them, dying on the cross that they might live (2.18–25). Wives and husbands are to practice the virtues appropriate to each (3.1–7). Mutual love is to prevail among all (3.8–12). They should be zealous for good, even if this involves suffering (3.13–17), since Christ, the righteous one, died for sinners and saves people, in Baptism, through His Resurrection (3.18–22). In conformity with Christ, who suffered in the flesh, they should live no longer by human passions, as formerly, and as the Gentiles now do (4.1–6). In view of the proximity of the end, they must practice all virtue (4.7–11). They are not to be surprised that they must suffer; rather, they should rejoice in sharing Christ's sufferings (4.12–19). The elders are to tend the flock with diligence, and the young are to be subject (5.1–5). All are to be humble and watchful; God will soon restore and strengthen them (5.6–11). The author concludes with a final greeting (5.12–14).

Authorship. The Petrine authorship of this letter—asserted in 1.1, confirmed by the reference to Babylon (a veiled reference to Rome; see BABYLON, CITY OF) and Mark (see MARK, EVANGELIST, ST.) in 5.13, and never challenged in antiquity—in modern times has been and remains the subject of considerable debate. Reasons for questioning authenticity include: (1) the excellent Greek style of the letter an ready familiarity with the Septuagint Bible, both of which would scarcely be possible for an unschooled Galilean fisherman (see Acts 4.13); (2) numerous similarities to Pauline theology and expression; (3) references to persecutions in the provinces (especially 4.12–17), which would be historically improbable until several decades after the death of Peter. In answer to these objections it is pointed out that: (1) In 5.12 Silvanus (SILAS) is mentioned as the one through whom the letter has been written. In accordance with ancient practice in writing letters, this prominent Christian (Acts 15.22) and companion of Paul's journeys (Acts 15.22–17.15; 1 Thes 1.1; 2 Cor 1.19) may be responsible for the literary qualities of the letter. (2) Much of the similarity to Pauline writings may be attributable to a tradition of Christian doctrinal and paraenetic formulas common to New Testament authors. Likewise the influence of Silvanus's extensive contact with Paul is pertinent. (3) The allusions to persecutions do not necessarily imply official governmental persecution of Christianity as such, particularly in view of the exhortation to submission to temporal authorities in 2.13–17.

While nothing in the letter is directly contrary to Petrine authorship, many tend to see it as a pseudonymous work of the 80s (Elliott, Brown). Nonetheless, the composition's use of fictional details is relatively sparse when compared with other samples of the pseudepigraphical genre (Brox). Although Brox is skeptical about the oft-repeated notion that this is a deliberate amalgam of Pauline themes and Petrine window dressing written in the interests of Church unity, he points out that further work is yet to be done.

The familiar thesis of Preisker (1951) that 1.1–4.11 constitutes a baptismal homily, followed in 4.12–5.14 by parenesis about persecution has been seriously called into question. Though a two sermon approach still has its defenders (Blevins), the style is more and more seen as consistent throughout the letter (Shimada), and 1.3–12 has been thought to establish the program of the whole letter (Kendall).

There is growing consensus that the letter is wholly parenetic, and it is a parenesis affected partly by liturgical language: the "spiritual sacrifices" of 2.5 refer both to the Eucharist and to the addressees' everyday lives (Hill); the "appeal" to God for a clean conscience (3.21) is derived from the baptismal adjuration to leave the way of death by obeying God's commands (Tripp).

The author has adapted some imagery from Judaism, including "convenantal" language (Pryor). One Old Testament phrase, "aliens and strangers" (2.11) has been argued to be a technical term in addition, referring to resident aliens/migrant workers brought to Asia Minor to work in the fields or from rural areas to be house servants (Elliott). In this view, "persecution for the name" need not be linked to a major threat either from Nero or Domitian, but may refer to the ongoing hostility and suspicion accorded the resident aliens by their neighbors.

The injunctions to slaves and wives to obey the head of the household (2.13–3.12) have been seen as a needed apologia (3.15) to a culture deeply suspicious of the dire consequences for the Empire of adopting Eastern deities perceived as promoting egalitarianism (Balch). The thesis presupposes as common currency the notion in Aristotle, among others, that the Household of the gods, of the state, and of the individual are interrelated. The Thesis seems supported by the fact that the "code" is surrounded by reference to the slander of pagans (2.12; 3.13–16). The thesis has been criticized for asserting, though not sufficiently proving, that there were Christian households in which this egalitarianism was functioning (Neyrey). Moreover, the codes may serve as much to provide internal cohesion as to provide the group a defense to outsiders (Elliott).

The codes have been seen as part of a late-stratum of material imposed on the Pauline and Petrine corpus (Munro) and have been called a corruption of the original ideal of "equal discipleship" (Schüssler-Fiorenza). The attitude of 1 Peter toward the codes is further complicated by the partial critiques of patriarchy which may exist in his presentation of them (Balch).

Interpretive Problems and Models. Suggestions for more accurate translations have focused on 1.2, "because of the obedience and the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ" (Agnew); 3.2, "chaste behavior with reverence (to your husbands)" (Sylva); 4.15, "let none of you suffer as a murderer, thief, sorcerer, or embezzler" (Bauer).

Concerning the term “spirits” of 3.19, 4.6, since 2 Peter may have been aware of 1 Peter, 2 Peter may be helpful in understanding general problem passages in 1 Peter. On this theory, the spirits of 3.19 are seen to be evil because of the portrait in 2 Pt 2.4, 5; those who have died, but are “alive in the spirit” (4.6) are those who have died awaiting a new heaven and earth (2 Pt 3.9, 13) (Dalton).

2 Peter. This Epistle is a precious witness to the trials that were being inflicted on the Church by false teachers toward the end of the apostolic age.

The author opens with a salutation (1.1–2). He states that the divine goodness and promises, which include even a participation in the divine nature, should motivate Christians to the practice of all virtue, by which they may enter into the eternal kingdom (1.3–11). In view of his imminent death, the author wishes to leave this written memorial to the faith, based on his personal witness (e.g., of the Transfiguration) and on the prophetic testimony of the Scriptures (1.12–21). His readers are to beware of false teachers (2.1–3), whose punishment will correspond to that of the sinners of old (2.4–9); they give themselves over to every kind of evil, lead others astray, and revert to their original corruption (2.10–22). His readers must not be misled by those who scoff at the delay of the Lord’s coming (3.1–10). Rather, their lives are to be lived in holy expectation, in accord with the genuine (not the twisted) teaching of the letters of Paul (3.11–18a). The author concludes with a doxology (3.18b).

Author and Genre. There is a general willingness to see the 2 Peter work as pseudepigraphical, and one commentator suggests that the letter comes from turn of the century Rome that also gave us 1, 2 Clement and Hermas (Bauckham). Whatever its geographical origins, the author is seen as having used Jude and straightened out its chronology (Neyrey). However, the reference to “my first letter” (3.1) is not a reference to Jude, but to 1 Peter (Johnson). The choice of a Petrine pseudonym is seen as a necessity in view of the Pauline canon being already known as closed (Farkasfalvy).

The parenetic nature of the letter is defended with the thesis that it displays appeals to memory (1.9; 1.12–15; 3.1–2, 5, 8), models (2.6), and maxims (1.5–7) typical of parenesis (Johnson).

There is a renewed appreciation of the fact that a denunciation of false prophets is appropriate to literature describing the End Time (Cavallin). This motif is often present in testamentary literature, and works with the author’s prediction of his imminent dissolution (1.13, 14) to justify the description of the letter as a testament of sorts.

The appeal to the transfiguration is used by the author as a defense of the proclamation about the parousia (Neyrey). The author is not so concerned to defend the meaning of parousia as the second coming per se, since he feels free to use parousia for the “presence” of Jesus at the Transfiguration (Kee). But the author is concerned to answer those, Probably influenced by Epicurean notions, who think that death brings only Dissolution and not judgment. He attacks as false, the “freedom” which such a notion can offer (2.19), and insists on God’s power to judge, both in the past and in the future (Neyrey). The letter, therefore, amounts to a Christian theodicy.

The letter shares with some gnostic texts the description of a deity who punishes throughout successive ages of world history; indeed, a study that traces the Petrine trajectory in relation to the Nag Hammadi library suggests that the letter is aimed at gnostics (Smith). But that position might be called into question in part because the letter was known in Justin’s time, a generation before Irenaeus fought the gnostics (Thiede). More importantly, the anti-Epicurean polemic described by Neyrey does not need gnostics on the horizon to be coherent.

Recent suggestions about the translation of individual verses include a defense of the reading “found” at 3.10, a term often used absolutely in an eschatological context of both persons and things (Lenhard); and an interrogative reading of the same passage: “shall the earth and everything in it be found?” (Overstreet).

Bibliography: E. BEST, 1 Peter (1971; Grand Rapids 1982). E. G. SELWYN, The First Epistle of Peter. The Greek Text With Introduction, Notes and Essays (1947; 2nd ed. Grand Rapids 1981). L. GOPPELT, Der Erste Petrusbrief, ed. F. HAHN (Göttingen 1978). D. KENDALL, “The Literary and Theological Function of 1 Peter 1.3–12,” C. H. TALBERT, ed., Perspectives on First Peter (Macon, Georgia 1986). W. MUNRO, Authority in Paul and Peter. The Identification of a Pastoral Stratum in the Pauline Corpus and 1 Peter (Cambridge 1983). J. CALLOUD and F. GENUYT, La première épître de Pierre: Analyse sémiotique (Paris 1982). D. C. ARICHEA and E. A. NIDA, A Translator’s Handbook on the First Letter from Peter (New York 1980). C. PERROT, ed., Études sur la première lettre de Pierre (Paris 1980). D. L. BALCH, Let Wives Be Submissive: The Domestic Code in 1 Peter (Chico, California 1981). J. NEYREY, “Let Wives Be Submissive” (review), The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 49 (1987) 690–91. R. E. BROWN and J. P. MEIER, Antioch and Rome (New York 1983). J. W. PRYOR, “First Peter and the New Covenant,” Reformed Theological Review 45 (1986) 1–4; (1986) 44–51. E. SCHÜSSLER-FIORENZA, “Discipleship and Patriarchy: Early Christian Ethos and Christian Ethics in a Feminist Theological Perspective,” Annual of the Society of Christian Ethics Dallas, Texas (1982) 131–72. D. HILL, “To Offer Spiritual Sacrifices . . . (1 Peter 2.5): Liturgical Formulations and Christian Parenesis in 1 Peter,” Journal for the Study of the New Testament 16 (1982) 45–63. D. SYLVA, “Translating and Interpreting 1 Peter 3, 2,” Bible Translator 34 (1983) 144–47. D. H. TRIPP, “Eperotema (1 Peter 3.21). A Liturgist’s Note,” Expository Times 92 (1981) 267–70. W. J. DALTON, “The Interpretation of 1 Pet 3, 19 and 4, 6; Light from 2 Peter,” Biblica 60 (1979) 547–55. J. B. BAUER, “Aut maleficus aut alieni speculator (1 Petr 4, 15),” Biblische Zeitschrift 22 (1978) 109–15. N. BROX, “Tendenz und Pseudepigraphie im ersten Petrusbrief," Kairos 20 (1978) 110–20. N. BROX, "Der erste Petrusbrief in der literarischen Tradition des Urchristentums," ibid. 20 (1978) 182–92. D. L. BALCH, "Early Christian Criticism of Patriarchal Authority: 1 Peter 2.11–3.12," Union Seminary Quarterly Review 39 (1984) 161–73. J. L. BLEVINS, "Introduction to 1 Peter," Rev 79 (1982) 401–13. F. H. AGNEW, "1 Peter 1.2—An Alternative Translation," The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 45 (1983) 68–73. J. H. ELLIOT, 1 Peter (AB 37B; New York 2000). P. J. ACHTEMEIER, 1 Peter (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress 1996). T. SMITH, Petrine Controversies in Early Christianity: Attitudes Toward Peter in Christian Writings of the First Two Centuries (Tubingen 1985). R. E. BROWN, et al., eds., Peter in the New Testament (New York 1973). J. H. NEYREY, "The Form and Background of the Polemic in 2 Peter," Journal of Biblical Literature 99 (1980) 407–31; "The Apologetic Use of the Transfiguration in 2 Peter 1.16–21," The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 42 (1980) 504–19. R. L. OVERSTREET, "A Study of 2 Peter 3.10–13," Biblioteca Sacra 137 (1980) 354–71. H. C. C. CAVALLIN, "The False Teachers of 2 Pt as Pseudo-Prophets," Novum Testamentum 21 (1979) 263–70. H. LENHARD, "Noch einmal zu 2 Petr 3.10 d.," Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche 69 (1978) 136. F. W. DENKER, "2 Peter 1: A Solemn Decree," The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 40 (1978) 64–82. D. FARKASFALVY, "The Ecclesial Setting of Pseudepigraphy in Second Peter and Its Role in the Formation of the Canon," Second Century 5 (1985–86) 3–29. C. P. THIEDE, "A Pagan Ready of 2 Peter: Cosmic Conflagration in 2 Peter 3 and the Octavius of Minucius Felix," Journal for the Study of the New Testament 26 (1986) 79–96. J. H. NEYREY, 2 Peter, Jude (AB 37C; New York, 1993).

[T. W. LEAHY/M. KILEY]

PETER, SARAH WORTHINGTON KING

Lay leader and philanthropist; b. Chillicothe, Ohio, May 10, 1800; d. Cincinnati, Ohio, Feb. 6, 1877. Sarah was the daughter of Thomas and Eleanor Van Swearingen Worthington. Her father, descended from an ancient Lancashire (England) Catholic family, whose Virginia branch had become Episcopalians, was the first U.S. senator from Ohio and its sixth governor. Sarah attended private schools in Kentucky and Baltimore, Maryland. At 16 she married Gen. Edward King, son of U.S. Senator Rufus King, a former member of the Continental Congress and ambassador to England. In 1831 the Kings moved to Cincinnati where they became prominent in social life. Sarah took part in various charitable activities and worked for St. Paul's Episcopal parish until Edward's death in 1836. Three of their five children predeceased their father.

Sarah spent the next four years at Cambridge, Massachusetts, while her sons, Rufus and Thomas, attended Harvard University. Meanwhile, she continued her own studies, becoming fluent in German, French, and Italian. In 1844 she married William Peter, British consul at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and former Member of Parliament. At their home in Philadelphia, they received many of the most distinguished literary men and influential citizens of the country. Sarah founded the Philadelphia School of Design for Women, the first of its kind and a model for similar schools in other cities. She helped to establish a Quaker home for magdalens, and interested herself in a projected Episcopalian religious order for women.

When her husband died in 1853, Sarah returned to Cincinnati where she organized the Ladies Academy of Art, from which developed the Cincinnati Academy of Fine Arts and School of Design, later absorbed into the Cincinnati Art Museum. While collecting masterpieces in Europe she had been impressed by the liturgy of the Catholic Church and the social work of Catholic nuns. On March 25, 1855, she was received into the Church at Trinità dei Monti convent, Rome. With her own fortune and with funds collected from European nobility and royalty, she increased her charitable works. Through her instrumentality, the Sisters of Mercy, Sisters of the Poor of St. Francis, Sisters of the Good Shepherd, Little Sisters of the Poor, Religious of the Sacred Heart, and the Passionist Fathers were brought to Cincinnati. Thereafter, she gave them substantial assistance, frequently helping them to make foundations in other cities.

During the U.S. Civil War Sarah was a field nurse with the Franciscan sisters and worked in Cincinnati hospitals and war prisons, even nursing a soldier who had falsely accused her of spying. While living the life of a semireligious in an apartment of the mansion she had given to one of the sisterhoods, she pursued her civic and apostolic works until her death.

Bibliography: Rufus King Papers, Cincinnati Historical Society, Cincinnati. J. H. LAMOTT, History of the Archdiocese of Cincinnati, 1821–1921 (New York 1921). A. S. MCALLISTER, In Winter We Flourish: Life and Letters of Sarah Worthington King Peter, 1800–1877 (New York 1939). M. R. KING, Memoirs of the Life of Mrs. Sarah Peter, 2 v. (Cincinnati 1889).

[J. D. SAUTER]

PETER I (THE GREAT), EMPEROR OF RUSSIA

The greatest and most controversial of the Russian czars, chiefly responsible for the country's emergence as a great power; b. Moscow, May 30, 1672; d. St. Petersburg, Jan. 28, 1725. Peter, the son of Czar Alexis Mikhailovich and his second wife, Natalia Naryshkina, succeeded to the throne in 1682 as co-czar with his mentally disabled brother, Ivan V. Until Peter came of age, his sister Sophia ruled as regent while Peter lived a largely unsupervised life with his mother at Preobrazhensk, a village away from Moscow and the court. There he first sailed a boat and learned the rudiments of war in games with the local boyar and peasant boys. Sophia's plot to have herself proclaimed czarina brought Peter back to Moscow at 17. He deposed his sister, sent her to a monastery, and put the affairs of state largely into the hands of the Naryshkins, his maternal relatives. The palace guard (Streltsy) was so suspect that Peter built his personal forces around his boyhood regiments, the Preobrazhensky and Semenovskiy, and put his trust in non-Russians, Gen. Patrick Gordon, a Scot, and the Swiss Col. Franz Lefort.

Window on the West. Russia's landlocked mass led Peter to attack and finally to overcome the Turkish controlled fortress of Azov. However, Turks still controlled the Black Sea. Therefore, Peter arranged a mission to the Christian West to seek allies against the Turks, but also to learn of western European culture and to hire specialists in various fields to work in Russia. He accompanied his own mission to the various courts, but only as a scarcely disguised Peter Mikhailov, private citizen. Peter's mission did not win allies, but in the shipyards of Holland and England Peter became a master shipbuilder. Even Vienna was not congenial, but there Peter began to think of exploiting the Catholic desire for reunion with the Orthodox, in the hope of a campaign in the Baltic regions against Sweden. Another revolt of the palace guard brought about their liquidation at the cost of more than 2,000 lives. With his position secure at home Peter embarked on his 21-year war with Charles XII of Sweden, a war that, at the Peace of Nystadt (1721), finally secured for Peter his "window on the west" at the east end of the Gulf of Finland. In relief and triumph the senate hailed Peter as Emperor and gave him the epithets Great and Father of His Country.

Program of Reform. Peter's reforms began with the boyars, in whom he had no confidence. The Boyars' Duma (council) was abolished, and in its place Peter created a specially selected senate, which was, after the czar, the highest organ of state and empowered to propose laws, supervise other state organs, and substitute for the absent ruler. A special procurator's office supervised administrative legality and the procurator-general controlled the senate itself. At first nine, then 12, collegia were established with various portfolios, such as foreign affairs and war. Internally, Russia was divided into eight administrative regions (guberniya) and subdivided into provinces. Each guberniya was ruled by a gubernator appointed by the senate and responsible to the senate. These administrative reforms made for better centralized government. Peter's reforms extended also to the Russian Orthodox Church. Both the Patriarch Joachim and his successor Adrian opposed Peter and condemned his personal and public actions. Therefore, when Adrian died (1700), Peter abolished the office of patriarch, and replaced it with the Holy Synod, supreme in ecclesiastical affairs, although subordinated to the senate and to the procurator-general in all else.

Peter the Great.

Further reforms affected public education, economic and agricultural life, and especially the nation's cultural life. Although poorly educated himself, Peter saw the value of an intellectual life for the nation. He opened libraries, schools, and museums; he sent the sons of boyars to Western universities; he introduced a new and more simplified alphabet and writing style, encouraged printing, and even inaugurated the first Russian newspaper, Vedomosti (The Gazette). Never very tactful, he aroused great opposition when he abandoned the old church calendar (from the creation of the world) in favor of the Julian calendar (Old Style). His tax on beards, mustaches, and the old form of Russian dress was especially distasteful. He recognized and used talent where he found it; the Procurator-General Paul Yaguzhinsky was said to have been a swineherd as a boy; his Minister for Foreign Affairs, Peter Shafirov, had been a sales clerk; and "Prince" Alexander D. Menshikov, Peter's First Councillor, had sold meat pies in the Moscow streets. Gordon, Lefort, and the Dutchman Carsten Brandt were his military advisers and friends.

Building of St. Petersburg. On an island in the Neva River, Peter built the Fortress of Peter and Paul (1703). With a few surrounding houses this fortress constituted the beginning of Peter's city. The larger city Peter called St. Petersburg and proclaimed it the new capital of Russia. History says it was constructed on the bones of the 40,000 peasants and serfs who died building Peter's dream. The swamps were filled, the forests were felled. While surveyors laid out the broad, straight prospekts and boulevards, foreign architects planned the great stone buildings and the numerous parks with their varied fountains. Nowhere, perhaps, is Peter's love of water better illustrated than in the planning and building of his summer palace, Peterhof, overlooking the Gulf of Finland—the estate is replete with fountains of all sorts for adornment, recreation, and irrigation.

Family Life. Peter endured only what family life he could not escape. As a boy he had witnessed family feuds and blood baths. He ended his first marriage with Eudokia Federovna Lopukhina by forcing her to enter a monastery. His son, Alexis, with whom Peter never troubled himself, was accused of plotting against the throne and on his father's orders was imprisoned and died under torture (1718) in the Peter and Paul Fortress. A commoner, Martha Skavronska, lived with Peter for several years before she embraced the Orthodox faith and took the name of Catherine. In 1712 Peter wed her officially, and she bore him 11 children, of whom only two, Anna and Elizabeth, survived. When Peter abolished the traditional succession of inheritance to the throne (1722), he made Catherine an empress and proclaimed her his successor. He died during the night of Jan. 27–28, 1725, as a result of an illness contracted while trying to save some soldiers caught in a storm at sea off Petersburg.

Czar Peter and Catholicism. Although the Roman Catholic Church could not be said to possess any great strength in Russia, it was ever interested in bringing back the Russian Orthodox to Christian unity and, in Peter's time, desirous of using the Russian land route to China. Peter tried to use this interest to his own advantage. During Sophia's regency, Leopold I of Austria had sent an embassy to Moscow to enlist aid against the Turks and to safeguard the precarious position of the few Catholics in Moscow. The two Jesuit priests in that mission discussed reunion with Boris Galitsyn, the regent's councilor. Nothing came of the mission or of the talks, but John Schmidt was allowed to remain in Moscow as chaplain to the Catholics. Later Albert de Boye joined him, and until 1689 two Jesuits served some 100 Catholic families in Moscow. General Gordon, a Catholic and a confidant of Peter, even helped them to open a small school. When a few boyar families became Catholics, Orthodox opposition increased. In 1689 Boris Galitsyn fell into disfavor and was exiled by Peter to Siberia. The Jesuits were also ordered to leave Moscow. A Dominican and later two secular priests also served for a while in Moscow. However, Peter was offended when he learned that the Jesuit Philippe AVRIL had mentioned his epilepsy in a book on the Catholic missions to Russia, and even the intercession of Gordon was unable to check the Emperor's growing hostility to Catholicism.

Two other Jesuits, John Milan and John Berula, and a Veronese missionary, Casagrande, accompanied another mission from Leopold I in 1698. Casagrande was allowed to attend to the spiritual needs of the Venetians in Voronezh; the two Jesuits remained in Moscow. There they reopened the school and even made some converts among the boyars. Since the Jesuits in their school were doing what Peter felt was needed, he did not hinder their work, despite the opposition of the Orthodox, even after the death of their protector, Gordon (1699). But when the friendship between Austria and Russia cooled, the Jesuits again were unwanted in Russia. When they departed in April 1719, they left behind some 2,000 Catholics, including some Russians, a bishop, three priests, and about 25 boyars. Rome replaced the Jesuits with Franciscans, Conventuals, and Capuchins, who, in turn, were expelled in 1724. Dominicans were planned for the Moscow mission, but after Peter's death they were never sent.

Peter was not a religious liberal. Although Catholics of the Latin rite were generally left in peace, such was not the case with the Eastern Catholics in the western regions of Russia. Although promised protection by Peter, they were constantly harassed by Russian troops. Some priests even died at the hands of the soldiers. Peter's tolerance for Catholics came from his desire for Vatican support against Charles XII of Sweden. He protested concern for reunion, but Pope Clement XI recognized his aims as political and refused to endorse the campaign against Sweden. After the battle at Poltava (1709), Peter had no further use for the Vatican and all talk of reunion ceased.

It was Peter the Great who catapulted Russia, for a time, into the mainstream of the West. This is recognized even by the Soviets, who claim that the spirit of Peter was that of a "first Bolshevik," despite the fact that it was Peter who was responsible for autocracy in Russia.

Bibliography: V. O. KLIUCHEVSKY, Peter the Great, tr. L. ARCHIBALD (New York 1961). M. JUST, Rome and Russia (Westminster, Md. 1954) 78–88. R. N. BAIN "Peter the Great and His Pupils, 1689–1730," Cambridge Modern History (London–New York 1902–12) 5:518–557. J. GLAZIK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65)

8:364–365. C. B. O'BRIEN Russia under Two Tsars, 1682–1689 (Berkeley 1952). C. DE GRUNWALD, Peter the Great, tr. V. GERWIN (New York 1956). B. H. SUMNER, Peter the Great and the Emergence of Russia (New York 1951). R. WITTRAM, Peter der Grosse: Der Eintritt Russlands in die Neuzeit (Berlin 1954). R. T. MCNALLY, "Chaadaev's Evaluation of Peter the Great," Slavic Review 23 (1964) 31–44. R. K. MASSIE, Peter the Great, His Life and World (New York 1980). E. J. PHILLIPS, The Founding of the Russia Navy: Peter the Great and the Azov Fleet, 1688–1714 (Westport, Conn. 1995). A. G. CROSS, Peter the Great through British Eyes: Perceptions and Representations of the Tsar since 1698 (Cambridge 2000). P. BUSHKOVITCH, Peter the Great: The Struggle for Power, 1671–1725 (Cambridge 2001).

[W. C. JASKIEWICZ]

PETER ACOTANTO, BL.

Benedictine recluse; b. Venice, c. 1115; d. Venice, 1180 or 1187. Peter was educated in the BENEDICTINE monastery of San Giorgio in Venice as a result of a vow made by his noble parents when he was very ill. After marrying a girl from Crete, Peter went off on pilgrimage to the Holy Land, returning three years later. Finding that his wife had died, he entered San Giorgio a second time and later obtained permission to live near it as a recluse. His body is now in San Trovaso. CLEMENT VIII approved his cult.

Feast: Sept. 23, Aug. 15.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Sept. 6:651–655. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901) 6690–91. G. ZAPPERT, Vita beati Petri Alcontati (Vienna 1839). J. STADLER and F. J. HELM, Vollständiges Heiligen-Lexikon, v. 4 (Augsburg 1875) 843–844. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 3:93–94. A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico (Turin 1954–58) 204.

[M. CSÁKY]

PETER ARBUÉS, ST.

Augustinian canon, first inquisitor of the Spanish INQUISITION in Aragon; b. Epila, near Saragossa, Aragon, Spain, 1441; d. Saragossa, Sept. 17, 1485. After studies in philosophy at Huesca, he earned a doctorate in theology at the College of Alborno in Bologna (1473). He became a canon regular of St. Augustine (1474) in Saragossa, where he helped revise the missal and wrote several works in MSS. He was made inquisitor in 1484 by Ferdinand V and preached vigorously against apostates. Although he was not responsible for a single sentence of death or torture, two arrests led to the attack on his life. He died after being stabbed at prayer in the cath-dral at the instigation of MARRANOS and nobles who were threatened by the Inquisition. He was buried in the cathedral, beatified in 1664, and canonized on June 29, 1867.

Feast: Sept. 17.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Sept. 5:728–754. G. COZZALUZI, Della vita, miracoli e culto del martire S. Pietro de Arbues (Rome 1867). F. DE LATASSA Y ORTÍN, Bibliotecas antigua y nueva de escritores aragoneses, ed. M. GOMEZ URIEL, 3 v. (Saragossa 1884–86). H. C. LEA, A History of the Inquisition of Spain, 4 v. (New York 1906–07) v. 1. A. ALCALÁ, Los orígenes de la Inquisición en Aragón: S. Pedro Arbúés, mártir de la autonomía aragonesa (Epila, Aragon 1984).

[D. W. LOMAX]

PETER ARMENGOL, BL.

Martyr; b. Guardia de Prats, Spain, 1238?; d. April 27, 1304? Data for his vita derive from questionable documents "discovered" in the 17th century for the canonization of St. PETER NOLASCO. According to these sources, he was a descendant of the counts of Urgell, arrogant and vindictive, who left his fellow students to become a bandit leader with immunity from ordinary justice. In 1258 he repented and joined the MERCEDARIANS in Barcelona, probably as a knight. On his second trip to ransom captives, he remained in Moslem Algeria as a hostage for 18 Christians. He was hanged for his apostolic efforts, but the Blessed Virgin sustained him miraculously. Bearing the marks of his ordeal, he returned home and devoted himself to prayer and penance. His immemorial cult in Catalonia was confirmed in 1686.

Feast: April 27.

Bibliography: R. LECHAT, Analecta Bollandiana 39 (1921) 214. B. DE GAIFFIER, ibid., 58 (1940) 88. D. MANSILLA, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:349. Acta Sanctorum Sept. 1:317–335. F. BONET I ARMENGOL, Pere Armengol i Cornet, penitenciarista català (Barcelona 1994).

[E. P. COLBERT]

PETER AUREOLI

French Franciscan theologian and archbishop, known by the scholastic titles Doctor facundus and Doctor ingeniosus; b. near Gourdon, Aquitaine, c. 1280; d. Aix, Provence, January 1322. After entering the order he was sent to Paris, where he may have known Duns Scotus. By 1312 he was lector in Bologna, where he wrote Tractatus de paupertate et usu paupere (ed. Paris 1511) and an unfinished Tractatus de principiis. In 1314 he was lector in Toulouse and won fame for defending the doctrine of the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION. His Tractatus de conceptione beatae Mariae Virginis (ed. Quaracchi 1904) was completed on Dec. 20, 1314. Attacked for his views, he replied toward the beginning of 1315 with Repercussorium editum contra adversarium innocentiae Matris Dei (ed. Quaracchi 1904). At the general chapter of Naples in 1316, his name was submitted as a candidate for the Franciscan chair at Paris. The new minister general, MICHAEL OF CESENA, immediately assigned him to Paris to lecture on the Sentences (1316–18). Two versions of this important commentary exist. The first version (bk. 1, ed. E. M. Buytaert, 2 v. New York 1953–56) may have been written in 1317 or even before he arrived in Paris. The important definitive version was written in 1318–19 (2 v. Rome 1596–1605). Apparently Peter had some difficulty in obtaining license to incept as master, for on July 14, 1318, JOHN XXII ordered the chancellor to grant this license. A university list of magistri actu regentes, dated Nov. 13, 1318, carries the name of Peter as regent master in theology. As master he composed a highly respected Compendium sensus litteralis totius sacrae scripturae in 1319 (ed. Quaracchi 1896). He also determined one series of quodlibetal questions in 1320. Toward the end of 1320 he was elected provincial of the province of Aquitaine. On Feb. 27, 1321, John XXII named him archbishop of Aix-en-Provence, and the Pope consecrated him at Avignon on June 14, 1321.

Aureoli was an independent and highly original thinker, having a tendency to criticize doctrines that were generally received by his predecessors and contemporaries. His thought is highly speculative and subtle. In his works he frequently revels in disagreeing with the foremost masters of the immediate past, among them St. BON-AVENTURE, St. THOMAS AQUINAS, DUNS SCOTUS, HENRY OF GHENT, and GODFREY OF FONTAINES. He is especially fond of ARISTOTLE and AVERROËS and not always aware of the dangers implicit in some of their positions.

For Aureoli the role of reason in theology is much more modest than it is for Aquinas. In the teaching of Aureoli the unity of the human composite, the immortality of the human soul, and even the fact of intellectual knowledge cannot in the final analysis be demonstrated by human reason. Contrary to many Franciscans of his day, he maintained that reason cannot establish with strictly demonstrative arguments the doctrines of creation and divine omnipotence. As opposed to Scotus, he maintained that intuitive knowledge does not require the presence of the existing thing.

Though often called a conceptualist and a forerunner of WILLIAM OF OCKHAM, Aureoli did not deny UNIVERSALS. For him, universals have a foundation insofar as several similar beings can be created by God.

Bibliography: J. BEUMER, “Der Augustinismus in der theologischen Erkenntnislehre des Petrus Aureoli,” Franziskanische Studien 36 (1954) 131–171. J. HALVERSON, Peter Aureol on Predestination: A Challenge to Late Medieval Thought (Leiden 1998). T. KOBUSCH, Philosophen des Mittelalters: Eine Einführung (Darmstadt 2000). S. R. STRUER, Die theologische Einleitungslehre des Petrus Aureoli: Auf Grund seines Scriptum super Primum Sententiarum und ihre theologiegeschichtliche Einordnung (Werl/Westf 1968).

[J. J. PRZEZDZIECKI]

PETER CANTOR

Theologian, glossarist; b. probably Reims, France; d. Longpont Abbey, Sept. 22, 1197. In 1171 he was canon and professor of theology at the cathedral school in Paris, and from 1184 held the office of cantor in the cathedral of Paris, whence his name. His reputation as an ecclesiastic and a theologian soon spread beyond Paris. The people and clergy of Tournai chose him in 1191 for their bishop, but his election was opposed by William of Champagne, archbishop of Reims, on grounds of irregularity. In 1196 he accepted the office of dean of the cathedral chapter of Reims. He died in the Cistercian abbey of Longpont. His works cover a wide range of subjects: dogmatic and moral theology, Sacred Scripture, canonical legislation, and monasticism. They are Verbum Abbreviatum, first published in 1693 and reproduced in Migne (Patrologia Latina, 205:21–554); Summa de sacramentis et animae consiliis; Distinctiones Abel; De tropis theologicis; and glosses on most of the books of the Old and the whole of the New Testament. With the exception of Verbum Abbreviatum, his works have remained unpublished.

Bibliography: Chartularium universitatis Parisiensis, ed. H. DENIFLE and E. CHATELAIN, 4 v. (Paris 1889–97) 1:46. M. GRABMANN, Geschichte der scholastischen Methode, 2 v. (Freiburg 1909–11) 2:478–485. F. S. GUTJAHR, Petrus Cantor Parisiensis (Graz 1899). N. IUNG, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 12.2:1901–06.

[G. M. GRABKA]

PETER CHRYSOLOGUS, ST.

Archbishop and Doctor of the Church; b. Imola, Italy, c. 400; d. Imola?, Dec. 3, c. 450. The oldest vita by Agnellus of Ravenna c. 830 (Patrologia latina 106:553–566; Patrologia latina 52:13–28), confuses him with two other bishops of Ravenna named Peter (Acta Sanctorum Dec. Propyl. 560). The confusion arose because Peter was not distinguished as “Chrysologus” (of the golden word) until the seventh century. Ravenna, then the Western capital of the empire, became a metropolitan see following his installation (c. 431) as bishop. His relations with SIXTUS III and LEO I were close. When EUTYCHES, father of MONOPHYSITISM, was condemned at the synod of CONSTANTINOPLE in 448, he asked Peter in 449 to intervene in his favor. Peter replied, "In the interest of peace and the faith we cannot judge in matters of the faith without the consent of the Roman bishop" [see Patrologia latina 52:255; ibid. 54:743; and E. Schiltz, Nouvelle revue théologique 55 (1928) 265–276]. Besides the letter to Eutyches, Peter has left 183 sermones (ed. A. Olivar in Corpus Christianorum). The Catalogus Felicianus of Felix, archbishop of Ravenna (709–725), which contains 176 sermones (badly edited in Patrologia latina 52: 183–666), includes some apocryphal sermons [A. Olivar, Revue Bénédictine 59 (1949) 114–136] and lacks some authentic sermons [D. de Bruyne, Journal of Theological Studies 29 (1927) 362–368].

Most of the sermons offer biblical exegesis for reading in the liturgical Office; they are without theological depth or original speculation, but full of moral applications for daily life. They have considerable historical importance for the authentic picture they give of Christian life in Ravenna in the fifth century. The Catalogus contains also doctrinal homilies on the Incarnation and the mysteries of Christmas (140–160), and sermons for catechumens on the Apostles' Creed (56–62) and the Lord's Prayer (67–72). The sermons are brief (10–15 minutes) but sacrifice clarity for classical rhetoric. Despite his title "Chrysologus," Peter was not as eloquent as AMBROSE or AUGUSTINE, or his Greek opposite JOHN CHRYSOSTOM.

Feast: July 30 (formerly Dec. 4).

Bibliography: J. H. BAXTER, "The Homilies of St. Peter Chrysologus," Journal of Theological Studies 22 (1921) 250–258. C. JENKINS, "Aspects of the Theology of St. Peter Chrysologus," Church Quarterly Review 103 (1927) 233–259. O. BARDENHEWER, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur (Freiburg 1913–32) 4:606–610. R. H. MCGLYNN, The Incarnation in the Sermons of St. Peter Chrysologus (Mundelein, IL 1956). F. SOTTOCORNO, L'anno liturgico nei sermoni di Pietro Crisologo: ricerca storico-critica sulla liturgia di Ravenna antica (Cesena 1973). R. BENERICETTI, Il Cristo nei sermoni di S. Pier Crisologo (Cesena 1995).

[J. VAN PAASSEN]

PETER COMESTOR

Theologian and exegete; b. Troyes, c. 1100; d. Paris, c. 1180. He was dean of the cathedral of Troyes (1145–67?) and chancellor of the cathedral school in Paris (1164–68; 1178–80); he taught theology there (1164–68) and became a canon regular of Saint-Victor (1169). He wrote the Historia scholastica (Patrologia Latina, 198:1053–1644), a Bible history supplemented from the Fathers and profane historians (1169–73), Sententiae de sacramentis (ed. R. M. Martin, Pierre le Mangeur, De sacramentis, Spicilegium sacrum Lovaniense, 17, Appendix [Louvain 1937]), some 150 sermons (13 scattered in Patrologia Latina, 171:339–964), commentaries on the Gospels and on Peter Lombard's Commentary on the Psalms, and perhaps a commentary on the Lombard's Sentences, and on Romans 1 and 2 Corinthians. Unauthentic are commentaries on the other Pauline Epistles and the Liber pancrisis (compiled 1220–25). G. Raciti suggests his authorship of Pseudo-Augustine's De spiritu et anima (Patrologia Latina, 40: 779–832).

Bibliography: N. IUNG, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 12.2:1918–22. R. M. MARTIN, "Notes sur l'oeuvre littéraire de Pierre le Mangeur," Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 3 (1931) 54–66. A. LANDGRAF, "Recherches sur Pierre le Mangeur," ibid., 292–306, 341–373. F. STEGMÜLLER, Repertorium commentariorum in Sententias Petri Lombardi, 2 v. (Würzburg 1947) 1:669–673. F. STEGMÜLLER, Repertorium biblicum medii aevi, 7 v. (Madrid 1949–61) 4:6543–92. B. SMALLEY, The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages (2d ed. New York 1952). M. M. LEBRETON, "Recherches sur les manuscrits contenant des sermons de Pierre le Mangeur," Bulletin d'information de l'Institut de Recherches et d'Histoire des Textes, 2 (1953) 25–44; 4 (1955) 35–36. O. LOTTIN, "À propos de la date de deux florilèges concernant Anselmo de Laon," Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 26 (1959) 307–314. G. RACITI, "L'autore del De spiritu et anima," Rivista di filosofia neoscolastica 53 (1961) 385–401. L. HÖDL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:357–358.

[J. N. GARVIN]

PETER CRISCI OF FOLIGNO, BL.

Franciscan tertiary; d. Foligno, Italy, July 18, 1323. He lived for some time as a hermit at Pesaro, where he built the church of S. Maria di Montegranaro. He spent the latter part of his life in his home city of Foligno, where he was noted for his spirit of piety, poverty, penance, and good works. He is mentioned in the autobiography of ANGELA OF FOLIGNO under the name of Petrucius. He is buried in the cathedral church at Foligno, where he is still honored.

Feast: July 19.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum July 4: 663:668. M. FALOCI PULIGNANI in Analecchia Bollandiana 8 (1889) 358–369. ANGELA DA FOLIGNO, L'autobiografia. . . , ed. M. FALOCI-PULIGNANI and M. CASTIGLIONE HUMANI (Città di Castello 1932). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–36) 7:455–456. A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico (Turin 1954–58) 3:204. E. GRAU, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:362.

[K. NOLAN]

PETER DAMIAN, ST.

Benedictine cardinal (1057), Doctor of the Church; b. Ravenna, Italy, 1007; d. Faenza, Italy, Feb. 22–23, 1072. The traditional account of Damian's childhood, featuring abandonment by his parents, rearing by sacerdotal foster parents, and hardships bordering on starvation, stems from hagiographical embroidering by his biographer, JOHN OF LODI (Patrologia Latina, 144:113–146). His later career points to a sound primary education provided by his older brother at Ravenna and continued later at Parma, Modena, and Faenza. A brief but successful teaching career in Ravenna and ordination to the priesthood preceded his entry into the religious life at FONTE AVELLANA (1035). By 1043 he was elected prior of this congregation of hermits; as prior he reorganized their life by statutes combining the ideals of St. BENEDICT and St. ROMUALD. The result was an Eremitico-cenobitic amalgam, with stern but rational practices of asceticism, in which Damian claimed to carry out the mind of St. Benedict.

From this self-reforming base, Damian turned his attention to the reform interests of the Church at large, making contact with the German court of HENRY III and with the papal Curia. At first tentative in the reigns of GREGORY VI and CLEMENT II, his role matured during the pontificate of LEO IX. Two of his significant reform writings, the Liber gratissimus, defending the validity of orders conferred gratis by simonists, and the Liber gomorrhianus, attacking the moral decadence of the 11th-century clergy, date from this period. Unlike HUMBERT OF SILVA CANDIDA and GREGORY VII (Hildebrand), Damian viewed the reform movement as a joint project, conducted by both papacy and empire (see GREGORIAN REFORM).

As a churchman his services to reform stemmed primarily from his relation to the papal Curia. He was elevated to the cardinalate against his will by STEPHEN IX. Damian's active participation in the public life of the Church by synodal work, by diplomatic missions, and by his writings, which display an almost compulsive need to communicate, spanned nearly a quarter of the 11th century. His missions took him to Milan (1059–60) to settle the conflict between the archbishop and the PATARINES, soothing Milanese sensibilities while pointing up the Roman primacy. During the schism of antipope Honorius II (Cadalus of Parma), he strenuously defended the interests of ALEXANDER II, in whose cause he produced the Disceptatio synodalis, a fictitious debate between representatives of church and state, attempting to settle Alexander's disputed election. CLUNY was the beneficiary of his Iter Gallicum (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores, 30.2:1034–46) in 1063 when, by on-the-spot arbitration, he upheld Abbot HUGH in his exemption dispute with Bp. Drogo of Mâcon.

During the last decade of his life he traveled to Mainz (1069), hoping to stabilize the marriage of young King HENRY IV and his wife, Bertha. In 1071, at the invitation of his friend Abbot Desiderius (see VICTOR III), he took part in the dedication of the basilica of St. Benedict at MONTE CASSINO. In 1072 he paid a last visit to his native Ravenna, working for better relations with the Roman See. On his return he died in the monastery of S. Maria in Faenza; his remains now rest in the cathedral. In 1828 his cult was approved when he was declared a Doctor of the Church.

Few medieval writers can compare with Damian in the number and range of his writings. His extant letters (c. 170), sermons (53), vitae (7), treatises, and minor works in prose and verse (epigrams, prayers, hymns, liturgical Offices) mark him as one of the great Latin stylists of the Middle Ages. The sources of his inspiration range from the Sacred Scriptures, allegorically interpreted, through the Latin and Greek Fathers (the latter in translation—Damian knew no Greek), the works of the Carolingian age, the Latin writings of antiquity, Roman law, and to a surprising degree, the pre-Gregorian collections of Canon Law. His favored canonical source was the Decretum of BURCHARD OF WORMS; he made no direct use of the FALSE DECRETALS of Pseudo-Isidore. The content of his theological and ascetical writing is distinguished by its practicality rather than by its theory. He preferred anecdote and example to the methodical presentation of principle. In contact with most of the problems of his day, he nevertheless showed a perplexing unconcern for the contemporary struggle between the Greek and Latin Churches (see EASTERN SCHISM). Affairs of church and state outside of Italy and the Empire—in England, Spain, and the Middle East—seem to have been beyond his horizon of interest. The “dialectic” of his career was that between the active and the contemplative life, which he resolved classically in his search for an ordered society in a world to which he always remained a stranger.

Feast: Sept. 21 (formerly 23).

Bibliography: Editions. Patrologia Latina 144, 145. Opusc. 4, 6, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Libelli de lite 1:15–94. Opusc. 13, 36, 45, 58, ed. P. BREZZI and B. NARDI, S. Pier Damiani: De divina omnipotentia, e altri opuscoli (Florence 1943). Vita Romualdi, ed. G. TABACCO (Fonti per la storia d'Italia 94; Rome 1957). Die Briefe des Petrus Damiani, ed. K. REINDEL, 4 v. (Munich 1983–1993). Hymns, ed. G. M. DREVES and C. BLUME, Analecta Hymnica 11, 22, 48, 51. O. J. BLUM, Traditio 12 (1956) 87–148; tr. Letters, 5 v. (Washington, D.C. 1989–1998). Literature. Acta Sanctorum (Paris 1863—) 3:416–27. O. J. BLUM, St. Peter Damian: His Teaching on the Spiritual Life (Washington 1947). F. DRESSLER, Petrus Damiani Leben und Werk (Rome 1954). J. J. RYAN, Saint Peter Damiani and His Canonical Sources (Toronto 1956). P. MCNULTY, tr., Selected Writings on the Spiritual Life (New York 1960). J. LECLERCQ, Saint Pierre Damien: Ermite et homme d'église (Rome 1960). Studi su san Pier Damiano in onore del Cardinale A. G. Cicognani (Rome 1961). K. REINDEL, "Studien zur Überlieferung der Werke des Petrus Damiani," Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 15 (1959) 23–102; 16 (1960) 73–154; 18 (1962) 317–417. J. SZÖVÉRFY, Die Annalen der lateinischen Hymnendichtung. Ein Handbuch (Berlin 1964–65) 1:393–398. M. LOKRANTZ, L'opera poetica di S. Pier Damiani (Göteborg-Uppsala 1964). A. BENEDETTI, Contemplazione e poesia in Pier Damiano (Brescia 1975). A. CANTIN, Les sciences séculières et la foi: les deux voies de la science au jugement de S. Pierre Damien (Spoleto 1975). H. P. LAQUA, Traditionen und Leitbilder bei dem Ravennater Reformator Petrus Damiani (Munich 1976). L.-A. LASSUS, Saint Pierre Damien, l'homme des déserts de Dieu (Paris 1986). I. M. RESNICK, Divine power and possibility in St. Peter Damian's De divina omnipotentia (Leiden 1992). T. WÜNSCH, Spiritualis intelligentia: zur allegorischen Bibelinterpretation des Petrus Damiani (Regensburg 1992). M. GRANDJEAN, La cs dans l'Eglise (Paris 1994). S. FREUND, Studien zur literarischen Wirksamkeit des Petrus Damiani (Hannover 1995), includes German tr. of John of Lodi's 11th-century Vita Petri Damiani. G. FORNASARI, Medioevo riformato del secolo XI: Pier Damiani e Gregorio VII (Naples 1996).

[O. J. BLUM]

PETER DES ROCHES

Bishop of Winchester; b. Poitiers, France, late 12th century; d. Farnham, England, June 9, 1238. Peter was a royal knight and chamberlain of King RICHARD I and trusted counselor of King JOHN. When he was elected bishop of WINCHESTER in 1205, the election was disputed, but he was consecrated by Pope INNOCENT III in person on Sept. 25, 1205. Peter was among the king's most faithful adherents during the Interdict of 1208 to 1213 and the struggle leading to MAGNA CARTA in 1215, and he was justiciar from 1213 to 1215. His influence continued into the minority of Henry III, whom he crowned in 1216 and whose tutor he was for a while, but his power began to decline after 1219, and especially after 1223 when he came into competition with Hubert de Burgh (d. 1243). Dismissed from office in 1227, he went on crusade with Emperor FREDERICK II and returned to England in 1231. A reversal of fortune led to the eclipse of De Burgh and the supremacy of Peter's adherents in 1232 to 1234, but he again fell out of favor, this time through the hostility of Abp. EDMUND OF ABINGDON, and went into exile in 1235. He supported Pope GREGORY IX in his campaigns against the Romans and returned to England in 1236; after his death he was buried at Winchester.

Peter's work as bishop is reflected in the papal letters he received and in his synodal statutes, dating probably from 1224, implementing the canons of the Fourth LATERAN COUNCIL of 1215, which he did not attend, and of STEPHEN LANGTON's synod of Oxford in 1222. He was the founder of many churches and religious houses and a distinguished manager of his episcopal properties as is shown from the earliest pipe rolls of the bishopric of Winchester, which survive from his time and record an exceptional maturity of estate administration. A great and magnificent prelate, both hated and respected, at once bishop, statesman, warrior, and diplomat, Peter transcended the merely regional interests of the kingdom and was a European figure in Church and State alike.

Bibliography: W. E. RHODES, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900. (London 1885–1900) 15:938–942. M. GIBBS and J. LANG, Bishops and Reform, 1215–1272 (London 1934; repr. 1962). F. M. POWICKE, King Henry III and the Lord Edward, 2 v. (New York 1947); The Thirteenth Century (Oxford History of England 4; 2d ed. 1962); Councils and Synods, ed. F. M. POWICKE and C. R. CHENEY, 2 v. (Oxford 1964) 2:125–137. Selected Letters of Pope Innocent III concerning England, ed. C. R. CHENEY and W. H. SEMPLE (London 1953). The Pipe Roll of the Bishopric of Winchester, 1210–1211, ed. N. R. HOLT (Manchester, Eng. 1964).

[C. DUGGAN]

PETER GEREMIA, BL.

Preacher, theologian, and reformer; b. Palermo, Italy, Aug. 1, 1381; d. there, March 3, 1452. Born of distinguished parents, Peter took a doctorate in law at BOLOGNA where he joined the DOMINICANS c. 1401. His preaching won him the title of preacher general and the admiration of St. Vincent FERRER. In 1427 the master general, Bartholomew Texerius, sent him as visitor to Sicily (1427) where he encouraged the Dominican Observantines at the priory of St. Zita in Palermo, and developed the reform in other priories. Pope EUGENE IV invited him to the Council of FLORENCE (1439) and then appointed him apostolic visitor to Sicily where he was distinguished as a reformer. Five volumes of his Sermones have been published (Brescia 1502). His Dictionary of Morals and several theological works are unpublished. He is buried at St. Zita's, Palermo. PIUS VI confirmed his cult, May 12, 1784.

Feast: March 10.

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (Paris 1719–23) 1.2:810–811. I. TAURISANO, Catalogus hagiographicus ordinis praedicatorum (Rome 1918) 38. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 1:550–552. M. A. CONIGLIONE, Pietro Geremia (Catania 1952). A. WALZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 8:363.

[A. DABASH]

PETER GONZÁLEZ, ST.

Spanish Dominican, patron of sailors; b. Astorgá, Spain, before 1190; d. Túy, Spain, c. 1246. He is called also "St. (T)Elmo" through confusion with Erasmus (see ELMO, ST.), another patron of sailors. Peter was a worldly young noble of Palencia, educated by an uncle, Bp. Tello of Palencia; but he surrendered his canonry and prospects in order to enter the recently founded DOMINICANS. A great preacher, he became chaplain to King Ferdinand III of Castile and reformed the Castilian court. He advanced the Spanish crusades by his preaching and advice. At CÓRDOBA's surrender (1236), he won easier terms for the Muslims. Thereafter Peter evangelized along the coast and in Galicia. Because of his particular concern for sailors, he is pictured carrying a ship. He was buried in Túy cathedral, beatified in 1254, and canonized in 1741.

Feast: April 14.

Bibliography: "Legends b. Petri Gundisalvi," H. FLÓREZ et al., España sagrada, 54 v. (Madrid 1747–1957) 23:245–285. Acta Sanctorum April 2:385–396. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:94–95. P. ÁLVAREZ, Santos, bienaventurados, venerables de la Orden de los Predicadores, 4 v. (Vergara 1920–23) 1:121–177. A. DÁVILA, San Telmo: notas sobre el desarrollo de su culto en las Antillas (Santo Domingo 1983), with bibliography.

[R. I. BURNS]

PETER GROSSOLANO

12th-century theologian, bishop of Savona, then archbishop of Milan from 1101 to 1116; b. Greece or Sicily, c. 1050; d. Rome, Aug. 6, 1117. Nothing is known of Peter's career or of his election to the See of Savona, but upon the death of Anselm IV de Buis (Sept. 11, 1101) Peter became the archbishop of Milan. His election displeased the reform party in Milan, and they appealed to King Liutprand, through whose intervention Peter was forced to leave Milan (1103) and appeal to Pope Paschal II. In a Roman council held in 1105, Peter's position was upheld, and he was restored to his see. However, he was again deposed by the civil authorities and given Jordanus as a successor in 1112. He then embarked on a voyage to the Near East and, after a sojourn in Jerusalem, visited the court of ALEXIUS COMNENUS in Constantinople. Invited to attend a synod held in the Emperor's presence, he pronounced a discourse justifying the use of the filioque in the creed; this greatly upset his Greek hosts, and John Phurnes felt himself obliged to reply.

Grossolano's position was based on the thesis that to deny that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son is to lower the Son's glory and His equality with the Father.

Grossolano's intervention was ill taken and caused a further renewal of polemic between Byzantium and Rome on the question of the procession of the Holy Spirit and the use of unleavened bread in the liturgy. A second discourse to the Greeks, attributed to Grossolano, repeated the same argument with considerable documentation and closed with an invitation to the emperor to bring about the reunion of the churches. Eustratis of Nicaea says Grossolano spoke frequently at the synod, but there is no further record of these interventions.

In 1116 both Peter and the intruded archbishop of Milan, Jordanus, appealed to the Council of the LATERAN for a settlement of their rival claims; and despite the support of the pope, the Council decided that Peter should return to his first see at Savona. Peter preferred to retire to the Monastery of St. Sabas in Rome, where he died a year later.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina 162:1005–15. Patrologia Graeca 127:909–919. LANDULPHUS JUNIOR, Historia Mediolanensis, Patrologia Latina 173:1447–1546. V. GRUMEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 12.2:1939; Échos d'Orient 22 (1933) 22–33. Bibliotheca casinensis, 5 v. (Monte Cassino 1873–94) 4:351–358, text. J. DRÄSEKE, Byzantinische Zeitschrift 5 (1896) 328–329, Eustratis.

[F. CHIOVARO]

PETER IGNEUS, BL.

Cardinal bishop of Albano; b. Florence, Italy, c. early 11th century; d. Jan. 8, 1089. He entered the VALLOMBROSAN Order in the lifetime of its founder, and he was given the name of "Igneus" because in 1068, by order of his abbot, he passed through fire unharmed to prove the guilt of Pietro di Pavia, bishop of FLORENCE, who was accused of SIMONY. He was prior at Passignano and abbot at Fucecchio, and he was made cardinal bishop of Albano, one of the SUBURBICARIAN dioceses of Rome, in 1074 by Pope GREGORY VII, who made frequent use of him as legate in Italy, France, and Germany. He showed great zeal for the reform of the clergy, and soon after his death he was venerated as a saint in Vallombrosa Abbey, where he was buried. His cult was not officially approved until 1673, and his name was then inserted in the Roman Martyrology.

Feast: Feb. 8.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum July 3 (1863) 297, 298, 330, 331. G. M. BROCCHI, Vite de' santi e beati fiorentini, v. 1 (Florence 1742) 143–158. A. SALVINI, Vita di s. Pietro Igneo (Alba 1928). A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 1:185–187. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 2: 185–186.

[S. OLIVERI]

PETER JOHN OLIVI

Franciscan philosopher and theologian; b. Sérignan, near Béziers (Hérault), 1248; d. Narbonne, March 14, 1298.

Life. He entered the order at the age of 12 in the monastery of Béziers and studied under Fra Raimondo Barravi, a Joachimite and proponent of the most rigorous evangelical poverty. After preliminary studies he was sent to Paris, where WILLIAM DE LA MARE, JOHN PECKHAM, and MATTHEW OF AQUASPARTA, all disciples of BONAVENTURE, were teaching. There he attended the lectures Bonaventure delivered on the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit in 1268 and on the Hexaëmeron in 1273.

After becoming a bachelor in theology, he declined further study, considering the title of doctor incompatible with the status of a humble Franciscan. He returned to Provence and devoted himself entirely to writing. With his brilliant and independent talent, and because of his zeal for the rigorous observance of the Franciscan Rule, especially the observance of evangelical poverty (usus pauper), he soon won the unreserved, almost fanatical, esteem and admiration of the zealous (called Spirituals), as well as the no less fanatical envy and enmity of those who interpreted the obligation of Franciscan poverty less strictly. This gave rise to a long series of accusations, defenses, and counter-accusations.

In 1279 Olivi was in Rome on a commission charged with drawing up the decretal Exiit, qui seminar, the most important interpretation of the Franciscan Rule. Olivi himself, by order of the minister general, wrote a treatise on Franciscan poverty. He also may have written the question De indulgentia Portiunculæ (Quaracchi 1895) at this time. After accusations were leveled at him at the general chapter of Strasbourg (1282), a commission was appointed to examine his writings; it compiled a series of 34 propositions, declaring some false and others heretical. At the same time the commission prepared a letter with 22 articles, all beginning with the words "we firmly believe," and all opposed to the propositions of Olivi. Since each of the seven members of the commission placed his seal on the letter, it was called the letter of the seven seals, Littera septema sigillorum [ed. G. Fussenegger, Archivum Franciscanum historicum 47 (1954) 45–53]. Olivi's writings were withdrawn from circulation, and he was summoned to Avignon, where, in the presence of the minister general, he was obliged to accept and sign the letter.

Olivi replied to 20 of the 34 accusations, leaving aside the philosophical questions, and devoting a separate, extensive declaration to his doctrine concerning the divine essence [D. Laberge, "Fr. Petri Ioannis Olivi, O.F.M. tria scripta sui ipsius apologetica annorum 1283 et 1285," Archivum Franciscanum historicum 28 (1935) 115–155, 374–407, 595–608; 29 (1936) 98–141, 366–387]. Elsewhere he demonstrated that the propositions he held had already been defended by authors such as Thomas Aquinas and Bonaventure, and he protested that in all he had done he had been motivated solely by zeal for the faith and love for the Church. But his enemies gave him no peace; at the general chapter of Milan (1285) he was accused again of heading a rebellious and superstitious sect that was spreading errors and creating divisions within the order. The chapter accordingly directed the confiscation of his writings. He was summoned to appear before the general chapters at Montpellier (1287) and at Paris (1292) regarding his teachings on Franciscan poverty, but both times he escaped censure. After the chapter at Montpellier, Matthew of Aquasparta, the new minister general, invited him to be lector at the studium at Santa Croce in Florence; a few years later he was transferred to the studium at Montpellier. This was tantamount to a complete rehabilitation. He was in Narbonne (c. 1295) and spent the last few years of his life there. Soon after his death he was venerated as a saint.

Works. Olivi's works, according to UBERTINO OF CASALE, were 17 times larger in volume than the Sententiae of Peter Lombard [F. Ehrle, "Zur Vorgeschichte des Concils von Vienne," Archiv für Literatur- und Kirchengeschichte des Mittelalters 2 (1886) 406]. D. Pacetti enumerates 64 writings and divides them into four groups: (1) philosophical and theological works, 1–15; (2) expositions or readings on the Scriptures, 16–42; (3) works dealing with evangelical perfection and Franciscan life, 43–52; and (4) ascetic and mystic works, 53–64. His most important philosophical and theological works are Quaestiones ordinatae, or Summa super Sententias, the second book of which was edited by B. Jansen [Bibliotheca Franciscana scholastica medii aevi (Quaracchi 192–226) 4–6]; Commentarius in quatuor libros Sententiarum; and Quodlibeta (Venice c. 1509). Concerning the Franciscan life and evangelical perfection the following works are of capital importance: Expositio super regulam fratrum minorum [ed. in Speculum Minorum seu Firmamentum trium Ordinum (Venice 1513) pars. 3, 106a–124c] and the Quaestiones de perfectione evangelica. Of the 12 short ascetic and mystical works, four have been published (Spiritulis e Beghini in Provenza 274–290).

Teachings. Olivi remained faithful on many points to the teachings of St. Bonaventure, although he abandoned the theories of seminal reasons and divine illumination. For him, St. Augustine is the greatest authority after the Scriptures. He was well acquainted with Aristotle, Averroës, and Avicenna but thought it absurd that the authority of pagan and Muslim philosophers be admitted without discussion, as if they were inspired writers. He himself did not attribute great importance to purely philosophical questions; in his view, philosophy must serve theology.

He conceived the soul as essentially dynamic and active. In the act of knowing, the intellect integrates or assimilates itself to the object. Hence there is no need for species impressae, either of sensibles or of intelligibles. The human soul is a spiritual substance composed of spiritual matter and of formal or constitutive parts that are the vegetative, sensitive, and intellective powers of the spiritual matter. The soul is the substantial form of the body, yet the intellective part does not unite with the body immediately, as form to its matter, but consubstantially. Olivi advanced this theory to safeguard the freedom of the will and the immortality of the soul. In the field of physics he was among those who explained the motions of bodies by the theory of IMPETUS.

Olivi's influence as a philosopher and theologian was not great, but his writings on evangelic perfection and his ascetic tracts were a source of inspiration for St. BERNARDINE OF SIENA as leader of the Observance, the most important reform movement within the Franciscan Order.

Bibliography: C. BERUBE, De l'homme a Dieu: Selon Duns Scot, Henri de Gand et Olivi (Roma 1983). D. BURR, The Persecution of Peter Olivi (Philadelphia 1976); Olivi and Franciscan Poverty: The Origins of the Usus Pauper Controversy (Philadelphia 1989). K. B. OSBORNE, ed., A History of Franciscan Theology (St. Bonaventure 1994). F.-X. PUTALLAZ, Figures franciscaines: De Bonaventure a Duns Scot (Paris 1997).

[G. GÁL]

PETER LOMBARD

Theologian; b. Lumellogno (Novara), c. 1095; d. Paris, Aug. 21 (22), 1160. After studies at Bologna, or possibly Vercelli, he went to France, according to St. Bernard [Epist. 410; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne (Paris 1878–90), 182:618], about 1134 to visit the schools of Reims and Paris. He then decided, or was persuaded, to remain at Paris, where he finished a commentary on the Psalms before 1138 and a gloss on St. Paul from 1139 to 1141, and began his teaching career in the school of Notre Dame. By 1143 he was known as a “celebrated theologian” (Metamorph. Goliae Episc. 197), and while in minor orders, he became a canon of Notre Dame in 1144 to 1145. Meanwhile, he had begun the composition of his Book of Sentences, which attained final form c. 1157 to 1158. He took part in the Paris consistory of Eugene III, April 21, 1147, and again in the Council of Reims, March 21, 1148, both of which concerned errors attributed to GILBERT DE LA PORRÉE. By 1156 he was one of the archdeacons of Paris, and perhaps as such made a journey to Rome, likely with Bishop Theobald in late 1154. He was elected bishop of Paris in 1159 and consecrated about June 29; he died the following year.

Sermons and Exegetical Works. Some 30 sermons at least are acknowledged as Lombard's, many of them published among those of Hildebert of Lavardin [Patrologia Latina 171:339–964]. Most likely, however, the list is far from complete. An English disciple, Heribert of Bosham, later secretary of St. Thomas Becket, related that Peter himself told him he had begun his scriptural commentaries as private works designed to clarify the brevity and obscurity of the glosses of ANSELM OF LAON, and only later were they used in the schools. The text of Lombard reveals that he also used the glosses of Gilbert de la Porrée. Recognizing this mutual dependence, the scholastics named Anselm's work the Glossa ordinaria; Gilbert's, the Glossatura media; and Lombard's, the Major (or Magna) Glossatura [B. Smalley, The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages (New York 1952) 64].

The commentary or gloss on the Psalter (ibid.) must have been written immediately after Lombard's arrival at Paris, for there is no influence evident of the anonymous Summa Sententiarum (c. 1137–38). Doctrinal development proves that it antedates the gloss on St. Paul, while extant manuscripts show the author did not apparently subject it to a later revision. In content, like all 12th-century glosses on the Psalms, it offers primarily a moral and spiritual exegesis, to render the Divine Office more intelligible and fruitful. Only occasionally does it touch on theological doctrine.

By contrast, the Collectanea (a title used only since the edition of 1535) on the Epistles of St. Paul (ibid.) presents many literary and doctrinal problems. Since the Summa Sententiarum is an important source, and since the commentary on Philippians is cited by Gerhoch of Reichersburg in 1142, the Collectanea was very likely composed between 1139 and 1141. Yet this must have been only a primitive redaction, as Heribert of Bosham indicates Lombard constantly revised it while using it in teaching. It is rather evident that Lombard began his course in theology with a commentary on the Apostle, then transferred much material from this and the gloss on the Psalter to a more systematic summa, the Book of Sentences, and continued to rework both the latter and the Pauline gloss. An early redaction of this gloss is found in the MS Vat. Lat. 695, which contains many questions that reappear in the Sentences but are not to be found in the printed text of the gloss. The latter represents rather the final redaction, but fails to distinguish between the body of the text and Lombard's later marginal additions. The gloss was later used as a standard text in the schools. It seems doubtful that Lombard wrote any of the other scriptural works attributed to him [F. Stegmüller, Repertorium biblicum medii aevi, 7 v. (Madrid 1949–61), 6625–36, 6639–53].

Book of Sentences. Partly in reaction to the extreme use of dialectic in theology, partly in keeping with the trend of medieval teaching after Peter ABELARD, the Sentences presents the whole of Christian doctrine in one brief volume on the basis of Scripture, the Fathers, and the Doctors, with speculation held in firm control. This work is divided into four books and chapters (the grouping of chapters into distinctions was introduced most likely by ALEXANDER OF HALES).

The work is largely a compilation from older and contemporary sources: Augustine, whose thought and spirit is evident throughout; Ambrose (and Ambrosiaster); Hilary; Julian of Toledo (on the Last Things); the older Glossa ordinaria (especially for the first part of book 2); Lombard's own glosses; Hugh of St. Victor; the Summa Sententiarum; and the Decretum of Gratian; as well as the canons of Ivo of Chartres. Yet such was Lombard's genius in organizing this material, in relating it to all the questions and controversies of the day without digressing into the merely curious or engaging in useless polemics, and in presenting a sound, brief, objective summary of doctrine, that the Book of Sentences was quickly recognized both for its contents and for its didactic qualities as the best of its kind. It influenced medieval thought also by its defects and omissions: little or nothing is said of the Church or the role of the Roman pontiff; while certain aspects of the Redemption and of the doctrine of grace in it leave much to be desired.

Long before Alexander of Hales introduced it in Paris (c. 1222) as the manual of his theological course, whence it passed into the curriculum of the university and eventually to other schools, the Liber Sententiarum had gained renown throughout Europe (as the number of early manuscripts attests) and had become the subject of numerous glosses and abbreviations (details in Landgraf, Einführung 96–102; Introducción 167–176). On the other hand, the work did not meet complete acceptance. Within Lombard's lifetime certain doctrines were attacked by Maurice de Sully and ROBERT OF MELUN. In particular, his apparent acceptance of so-called Christological nihilism (Quod Christus secundum quod est homo non sit aliquid) implicated him in the censures of Alexander III (1170, 1177). At the same time he was unmercifully and stupidly attacked for this and other teachings by Walter of St. Victor in his violent diatribe Against the Four Labyrinths of France (1177–78). At the end of the century, Lombard's Trinitarian doctrines were opposed by followers of Gilbert de la Porrée as well as by JOACHIM OF FIORE. This last polemic carried over to the Fourth Council of the Lateran (1215), which, instead of condemning the Book of Sentences, anathematized Joachim and in an extraordinary move acknowledged Lombard's orthodoxy (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [32 ed. Freiburg 1963] 804).

Peter Lombard.

Nonetheless, not every position of Lombard found adherents among the scholastics. The 13th and 14th centuries produced lists of "articles in which the Master of the Sentences is not commonly held by all." The number grew with the years. Despite such mild disagreement, however, the Sentences continued to be used and commented on in all the schools of Western Christendom until well into the 17th century, though it was often replaced by St. Thomas after the work of CAJETAN (TOMMASO DE VIO).

Bibliography: J. DE GHELLINCK, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 12.2:1941–2019; Le Mouvement théologique du XII^e siècle (2d ed. Bruges 1948); "La Carrière de Pierre Lombard: Nouvelle précision chronologique," Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 30 (1934) 95–100. D. VAN DEN EYNDE, "Essai chronologique sur l'oeuvre de Pierre Lombard,” Miscellanea Lombardiana (Novara 1957) 45–63. A. M. LANDGRAF, Einführung in die Geschichte der theologischen Literatur der Frühcholastik (Regensburg 1948), revised as Introducción a la historia de la literatura teológica de la escolástica incipiente (Barcelona 1956). P. DELHAYE, Pierre Lombard: Sa vie, ses oeuvres, sa morale (Paris 1961). N. ESPENBERGER, Die Philosophie des Petrus Lombardus (Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie und Theologie des Mittelalters 3.5; Münster 1901). J. SCHNEIDER, Die Lehre vom dreieinigen Gott in der Schule des Petrus Lombardus (Munich 1961). J. SCHUPP, Die Gnadenlehre des Petrus Lombardus (Freiburg 1932). E. F. ROGERS, Peter Lombard and the Sacramental System (New York 1917). V. DOUCET, Commentaires sur les Sentences (Quaracchi-Florence 1954).

“St. Peter Martyr,” fresco by Fra Angelico.

[I. C. BRADY]

PETER MARTYR, ST.

Preacher, miracle worker, first Dominican martyr; b. Verona, Italy, c. 1205; d. near Milan, Italy, April 6, 1252. Peter, born of heretical parents, embraced the Faith and c. 1221 entered the Dominican order. He preached in the important cities of central and north Italy, founding militant, pious confraternities of laity to counteract heretical influences. At Florence (1244–45) he aided the seven founders of the SERVITES. He was prior of Dominican houses at Asti (1240), Piacenza (1241), and Como (1251). In 1232, and again in 1251, he was named papal inquisitor (see INQUISITION). Because of his vigorous preaching and numerous converts, he aroused the hatred of the CATHARI. At Paschaltide, 1252, he was assassinated on the road between Como and Milan. INNOCENT IV canonized him the following year. St. Peter, patron of inquisitors, enjoyed a wide cult in the Middle Ages and was frequently depicted in art. His tomb is in the church of Santo Eustorgio, Milan.

Feast: April 20 (formerly 29).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum April 3:686–727. Una vita per il credo, notizie biografiche storiche artistiche nel VII centenario del martirio di s. Pietro da Verona (Seveso, Italy 1952). R. FRANCISCO, S. Pietro da Verona (Alba 1952). G. EDERLE, San Pietro da Verona (Verona 1952). E. LIBERTI, Seveso deve qualcosa al sangue di un martire (Milan 1968).

[J. F. HINNEBUSCH]

PETER MONOCULUS, BL.

Abbot of CLAIRVAUX; b. Burgundy, France; d. Foigny, France, Oct. 29, 1186. Peter, the son of a noble family, joined the Cistercian community in his early youth. In 1164 he was elected abbot of Valroy, where in a nearly fatal illness he lost an eye. He became abbot at Igny (1169), then at Clairvaux (1179). A worthy successor of St. BERNARD in his humility and love of poverty, he was held in the highest esteem by the popes and monarchs of his time. He died while on a tour of visitation at Foigny, but was buried at Clairvaux. Sixteen of Peter's letters have been edited (Patrologia Latina 201:1391–1404). Although never officially canonized, his cult is widespread among Cistercians.

Feast: Oct. 29.

Bibliography: Sources. Acta Sanctorum Oct. 8:53–90. Patrologia Latina (Paris 1878–90) 209:1007–36. P. L. PÉCHENARD, Histoire de l'Abbaye d'Igny (Reims 1883). S. LENSSEN, Hagiologium cisterciense (Tilburg 1948–49) 1:254–257. A. A. KING, Cîteaux and Her Elder Daughters (London 1954).

[L. J. LEKAI]

PETER NIGRI (SCHWARZ)

Dominican philosopher, theologian, and Hebraist; b. Kaaden, Bohemia, 1434; d. Eger, 1483. In 1481, at the request of King Matthias Corvinus, he became rector of the University of Budapest. Peter was a champion of THOMISM, defending it especially against the nominalists. His chief theological work is Clypeus Thomistatum (1481); he wrote also a commentary on the Psalms and possibly on the Isagoge of Porphyry and the Categories of Aristotle. Because of his acquaintance with Oriental languages, he may be considered the chief Hebraist of the late Middle Ages. He sought to convert the Jews through instruction and persuasion, and was active in religious concourses, delivering theological sermons. The rabbis, however, were usually reluctant to engage in disputation. Noteworthy was the seven-day session at Regensburg in 1474. The substance of this event was published as Tractatus contra perfidos Judaeos de conditionibus veri Messiae, scilicet Christi vel uncti (1475). In 1477 Peter expanded this work and published it in German as Der Stern des Messiah. The Tractatus is a rare incunabulum and possibly the first book printed in Hebrew characters. Peter published also a Hebrew primer or grammar, the first produced in Europe by a Christian.

Bibliography: R. BAUERREISS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:372. B. WALDE, Christliche Hebraisten Deutschlands am Ausgang des Mittelalters (Münster 1916) 70–152; Die deutsch Literatur des Mittelalters, ed. W. STAMMLER and K. LANGOSCH (Berlin-Leipzig 1933–55) 4:130–134, 5:1045.

[J. F. HINNEBUSCH]

PETER NOLASCO, ST.

Founder of the Order of Our Lady of Ransom (MERCEDARIANS); b. probably Barcelona, Spain, perhaps Languedoc (Saint-Papoul or Masdes-Saintes-Puelles), France, c. 1182; d. Barcelona, Dec. 25?, c. 1249. Peter's vita is obscured by legends (e.g., that he crusaded against the ALBIGENSES, that he tutored King JAMES I OF ARAGON), but especially by a plethora of false documentation. Forgeries of the 17th century, promoting his canonization, furnish much of his traditional biography; genuine documents tell little about him. Involved controversies between Mercedarian and Dominican scholars add further confusion. Peter was born probably of merchant or improbably of knightly family. It is questionable whether simultaneous visions to Peter, RAYMOND OF PEÑAFORT, and King James of Aragon caused them to co-found the Mercedarians. More likely, perhaps, Peter was the procurator of Peñafort's lay confraternity for ransoming, which became an Order (1218 or 1223 or 1228 or better 1234). As master-general until 1249, Peter supposedly ransomed 400 Christians on one trip to Muslim Valencia and Granada, and a total of 890 during several ransom tours. King James fostered the Mercedarians, but much of his connection with Peter seems legendary. Perhaps Peter was on the Valencian crusade; he appears at Valencia in 1244. He was canonized 1628.

Feast: Jan. 28 (formerly Jan. 31).

Bibliography: P. N. PÉREZ, San Pedro Nolasco, fundador de la orden de la Merced (Barcelona 1915). E. VACAS GALINDO, San

Raimundo de Peñafort, fundador de la orden de la Merced: Estudio histórico-crítico (Rome 1919). F. D. GAZULLA GALVE, La orden de Nuestra Señora de la Merced: Estudios históricos-criticos, 1218–1317 (Barcelona, 1934). J. M. DELGADO VARELA, "Sobre la canonización de San P. N.," Estudios [mercedarios] 12 (1956) 265–295. E. GOMEZ, "San P. N. en la espiritualidad mercedaria," ibid. 329–355; and other studies in this journal. P. F. GARCÍA GUTIERREZ, Iconografía mercedaria: Nolasco y su obra (Madrid 1985). A. REMÓN, Las fiestas solemnes de San Pedro Nolasco (Madrid 1985), cult in Spain. A. PRONZATO, Un mercante di libertà (Turin 1986). L. O. PROAÑO, Miscelánea histórica, 2 v. (Ibarra, Ecuador 1986–1995).

[R. I. BURNS]

PETER OF AILLY (ALLIACO)

French scholastic theologian, cardinal; b. Compiègne, 1350; d. Avignon, Aug. 9, 1420.

Life. He began his study of philosophy in 1363 at the College of Navarre in Paris, where he became master in arts in 1368 and was influenced by the ideals of ROGER BACON. Beginning theological studies in 1372, he commented on the Sentences in 1375 (4th ed. Venice 1500), deeply influenced by the NOMINALISM of WILLIAM OF OCKHAM. As delegate of the "French nation," he presented the university's obedience to CLEMENT VII in Avignon in the spring of 1379. Becoming master of theology and professor at the Sorbonne on April 11, 1381, he defended before the royal council the authority and right of a general council to end the WESTERN SCHISM. Appointed rector of the College of Navarre in 1384, he became extremely active in academic, ecclesiastical, and political affairs. When John of Montson attacked the doctrine of the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION in 1387 and appealed to the pope in the matter, Peter energetically defended the doctrine before Clement VII. His most illustrious pupil was Jean GERSON. On Oct. 7, 1389, Peter became university chancellor. In 1390 or 1391 he was appointed chaplain and confessor to Charles VI and (1391) archdeacon of Cambrai. The pope named him bishop of Laon, but the king, not wishing to release him, made him treasurer of Sainte-Chapelle and allowed him to retain his many lucrative benefices; he had as many as 14 benefices at one time. On April 2, 1395, BENEDICT XIII appointed him bishop of Le Puy; although consecrated, he never visited his see. He was made archbishop of Cambrai on June 5, 1397.

Although he was convinced that the schism could be repaired only by a general council, which he considered to be higher than a pope, he held a moderate position at the 1406 synod of Paris that considered withdrawing obedience from Benedict XIII, the antipope. He arrived too late at the Council of PISA to exert any influence. The an-tipope JOHN XXIII won his allegiance by creating him cardinal (Dec. 19, 1412) and administrator of Limoges and Orange and appointing him legate to Germany (March 18, 1413). At the Council of CONSTANCE (1414–18), which he himself had prepared, he adopted an opportunist attitude, changing views whenever it seemed useful to reach agreement. The legitimate pope, MARTIN V, elected at the council, appointed him legate at Avignon, where he died. His body was brought to Cambrai in 1422.

“Vision of Saint Peter Nolasco,” painting by Francisco de Zurbarán. (©Francis G. Mayer/CORBIS)

Works and Influence. His 175 writings [listed by P. Tschackert, Peter von Ailli (Gotha 1877) 348–366] cover practically the whole domain of human knowledge of concern to his contemporaries. Most of them, however, concern canon law and theories pertaining to the constitution of the Church. Among his more influential works, besides the commentary on the Sentences, are Tractatus brevis de anima (ed. Paris 1503), Destructiones modorum significandi, Libellus sacramentalis (ed. Louvain 1487), Imago mundi (ed. Louvain 1480; Paris 1930), De materia concilii generalis tres partes, Tractatus super reformatione ecclesiae [ed. in Joannis Gersonis Opera omnia (Antwerp 1706) 2:903–916], and Tractatus et sermones (ed. Brussels c. 1484).

Although facile and versatile, he was frequently contradictory in his teachings. In his scientific writings concerning nature he showed the influence of Roger Bacon. In philosophy and theology, however, his nominalism was tempered somewhat by THOMISM. He denied not only the infallibility of the pope but also that of the council, so that for him it is possible to appeal from one council to another. Concerning the EUCHARIST, he considered impanation as a possible alternative to TRANSUBSTANTIATION; in this he prepared the way for the doctrine of Martin LUTHER and other Reformers.

As a man of action, he was greatly concerned for the welfare of the Church. He strove harder than any of his contemporaries to restore unity to the Church, at whatever er the cost. However, he was too much of an opportunist, strongly influenced by the needs of the moment; he disenchanted many friends because often they could not rely on him at crucial moments.

The influence of his writings was considerable, particularly on Gabriel BIEL, Jacques ALMAIN, John Major, DENIS THE CARTHUSIAN, and Martin Luther. Gallicanists considered him one of their foremost authorities.

Bibliography: A. CARDIN, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 1:113–114. F. STEGMÜLLER, Repertorium biblicum medii aevi, 7 v. (Madrid 1949–61) 1:306–309. L. SALEMBIER, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART (Paris 1912–) 1:1154–1165; Le Cardinal Pierre d'Ailly (Tourcoing 1932); Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 1:642–654. J. P. MCGOWAN, Pierre d'Ailly and the Council of Constance (Washington 1936). L. R. LOOMIS, tr., The Council of Constance, ed. J. H. MUNDY and K. M. WOODY (New York 1961). B. MELLER Studien zur Erkenntnislehre des Peter von Ailly (Freiburger theologische Studien 67; Freiburg 1954).

[A. EMMEN]

PETER OF ALCÁNTARA, ST.

Friar Minor, ascetic, mystic, Franciscan reformer; b. Peter Garavita, in Alcántara, Estremadura, Spain, 1499; d. Arenas, Spain, Oct. 18, 1562. Peter, of noble parentage, entered the Franciscan order in the disalced vice province of Estremadura in 1515. Although not its founder, Peter is closely linked with the disalced reform, a controversial movement within Spanish Franciscanism. Because of his adherence to it, the movement spread from Spain to Portugal, Italy, Mexico, the East Indies, the Philippines, and Brazil, and his followers became known as Alcantarines. By his followers he was hailed as the restorer of the Franciscan Order and, as such, his statue was placed among the other founders of religious orders in the Vatican basilica. Peter is known for the severity of his mortifications, some of which are related in the autobiography of St. TERESA of Jesus, whom, in his last years, he advised and encouraged in her Carmelite reform. He wrote little. His justly famous Tratado de la oración y meditación was already popular in his lifetime, although its authenticity has not escaped challenge. It has gone through more than 175 editions and numerous translations. Peter died at Arenas, where his remains are still venerated in the shrine built at royal expense. He was beatified in 1622 and canonized in 1669. In 1826, by decree of the Sacred Congregation of Rites, he was made the patron saint of Brazil; in 1962 he was declared copatron of Estremadura.

Feast: Oct. 19.

Bibliography: "Estudios sobre San Pedro de Alcántara," Archivo Ibero-Americano 22 (Madrid 1962). PETER OF ALCANTARA, Treatise on Prayer and Meditation, tr. D. DEVAS (London 1926; repr. Westminster, Md. 1949). E. A. PEERS, Studies of the Spanish Mystics, v. 2 (London 1930). PETER OF ALCANTARA, Vida y Escritores de San Pedro de Alcantara, ed. R. SANZ-VALDIVIESO (Madrid 1996). CONFERENCIA DE MINISTROS PROVINCIALES, OFM., Místicos Franciscanos Espanoles (Madrid 1996), bibliography.

[J. B. WUEST]

PETER OF ALEXANDRIA, ST.

Bishop (300–311), martyr; d. Alexandria, Egypt, Nov. 25, 311. After serving as head of the catechetical school at Alexandria, Peter succeeded Theonas as bishop c. 300, and was "beheaded in the ninth year of the persecution" (EUSEBIUS, Hist. eccl. 7.32.31). This intrepid churchman reflected the milder school in his attitude toward the LAPSI. While Peter was in hiding during the persecution of DIOCLETIAN (303), Meletius, bishop of Lycopolis, assumed his episcopal rights. Meletius, whose view of the lapsi was more rigid, was declared excommunicate by a synod in 306, deposed, and banished to Palestine until 311; but the MELETIAN SCHISM of which he was the cause continued for several centuries after his death.

Peter's most important writing is the Paschal epistle; it contains 15 canons for the reconciliation of the lapsed (c. 306). Those who denied the faith under torture are assigned a 40-day fast for three years; those who lapsed without torture are assigned an additional year; those who obtained certificates of sacrifice are given a six-month penance; those who fell but later confessed are forgiven, but the clergy are not to be reinstated; those who sacrificed wealth and fled into exile are forgiven (Patrologia Graeca 18:468–508).

Peter's works exist mostly in Greek and Coptic fragments, and include treatises against ORIGEN AND ORIGENISM, On the Godhead (quoted at EPHESUS in 431), and a Letter on the Meletian schism. He was a courageous and enlightened churchman, and despite the tragic effects of the Meletian schism, his canons were a milestone in primitive Church discipline. The Acts of the Martyrdom of St. Peter of Alexandria (Latin, Greek, Syriac, and Coptic) is not authentic.

Feast: Nov. 26.

Bibliography: PETER OF ALEXANDRIA, Patrologia Graeca 18:449–522. J. QUASTEN, Patrology 2:113–118. B. ALTANER, Patrology 239–240. G. FRITZ, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 12.2:1802–04. F. KETTLER, Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft 12.2 (1938) 1281–88. T. Y. MALATY, Pope Peter of Alexandria: The Deans of the School of Alexandria (Jersey City, N.J. 1994). W. TELFER, "St. Peter of Alexandria and Arius," Analecta Bollandiana 67 (1949) 117–130; Harvard Theological Review 48 (1955) 227–237, and Meletius. M. RICHARD, Mélanges de science religieuse 3 (1946) 357–358, Christology. H. I.

BELL and W. E. CRUM, eds., Jews and Christians in Egypt (London 1924). É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 10.1:531–536.

[H. MUSURILLO]

PETER OF ANAGNI, ST.

Bishop, crusader; b. Salerno, Italy, 1030 or 1035; d. there, Aug. 3, 1105. Peter entered a Benedictine monastery in Salerno. He later became a papal chaplain, and in 1062 ALEXANDER II created him bishop of Anagni. In 1071 Peter became the pope's representative to the Byzantine Emperor Michael VII Ducas. When Michael fell ill, Peter cured him and was lavishly rewarded. He returned to Anagni, where he commenced to rebuild the city's cathedral. Before the reconstruction was finished, Peter left Anagni to participate in the First CRUSADE as a member of the expedition led by Bohemund I. After the capture of Jerusalem, Peter returned to Italy and retired to Salerno. He was buried in the city's cathedral, and then translated to Anagni. By a decree of June 4, 1109, PASCHAL II authorized his feast day.

Feast: Aug. 3.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Aug. 1:231–242. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 8:59–60.

[J. A. BRUNDAGE]

PETER OF APAMEA

Sixth-century Monophysite bishop of Apamea in Syria (II). A disciple of the Monophysite theologian, Patriarch Severus of Antioch (512–518), Peter was installed in Apamea as metropolitan, but deposed in 518 by a synod under the bishop of Mariamne in Syria upon the accession of the Catholic emperor JUSTIN I. In 535 Peter accompanied Severus to Constantinople at the invitation of Empress THEODORA (1), but in the synod held there by Patriarch MENNAS the following year (May 2 to June 4, 536), he was condemned with his master. In a letter from JUSTINIAN I to the patriarch (June 10, 536), his name, together with those of Anthimus, the deposed patriarch of Constantinople, Severus of Antioch, and the monk Zooras, was anathematized. This condemnation passed into Justinian's Codex juris as novella 42. It enjoined the banishment of the four guilty men from Constantinople and all the major cities of the empire. Severus fled to the desert of Egypt, but nothing further is known of Peter.

See Also: MONOPHYSITISM.

Bibliography: J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collection (repr. Graz 1960) 8:578, 1068–82, 1093–1138. P. PEETERS, Mélanges Henri Grégoire, v. 2 (Annuaire de l'Institut de philologie et d'histoire orientales et slaves, 10; Brussels 1950) 5–51. A. GRILLMEIER and H. BACHT, Das Konzil von Chalkedon: Geschichte und Gegenwart, 3 v. (Würzburg 1951–54) v. 2. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935) 4:427, 452.

[P. ROCHE]

PETER OF AUVERGNE (ALVERNIA)

Secular master of Paris and later bishop of Clermont; b. Crocq, Auvergne, between 1240 and 1250; d. Clermont, Sept. 25, 1304. As a secular master of the arts, Peter taught philosophy at Paris for many years and wrote commentaries on all the Aristotelian books. He was still in the faculty of arts when Simon de Brie, the papal legate, appointed him rector of the university on March 7, 1275, in order to prevent an irreparable split between the followers of SIGER OF BRABANT and those of Alberic of Reims. Although an admirer and close associate of THOMAS AQUINAS, he could not attend Aquinas's lectures in the theology faculty and can be called his disciple only in a limited sense.

After the death of Aquinas he completed Aquinas's commentaries on the Politics, 3.7–end; Meteora, 2.1–end; and De caelo et mundo; 3.9–end. Before 1290 Peter enrolled in the faculty of theology and studied under HENRY OF GHENT and GODFREY OF FONTAINES. His commentary on the Sentences is no longer extant. Becoming master in theology in 1296, he taught as regent master until December 1301. His only theological writings extant, six Quodlibeta, stem from this period of regency.

Already a canon of Clermont before 1296, Peter obtained a canonry in Paris on June 18, 1296. On Jan. 21, 1302, he was named bishop of Clermont by BONIFACE VIII. After a visit to Rome that year, he returned to Paris, where he subscribed to the Parisian appeal to a council against Boniface VIII (June 1303).

Ptolemy of Lucca called Peter fidelissimus discipulus of Aquinas; and historians of THOMISM generally consider him an early representative of the Thomistic school in France. However, his fundamental orientation is Aristotelian and Averroist, with a certain dependence on Avicenna and Aquinas. This is particularly true of his Quaestiones in metaphysicam (10 qq., ed. A. Monahan). He interpreted Aristotle's concept of being as primarily a form, maintained that a being's esse differs only logically from its essence, and expounded the analogy of being solely in terms of attribution without reference to proper proportionality. For Peter, metaphysics is divided into general ontology and natural theology; ontology should be taught before all other sciences and theology should be taught last. His denial of a real distinction between essence and existence followed Henry of Ghent in literary structure, but his rejection of Henry's "intentional" distinction expressed the personal opinion of Godfrey of Fontaines. Similarly, Peter recognized only a logical distinction between the individual and its essence. In the Quaestiones in metaphysicam the principle of individuation is said to be a relation to a given efficient cause. In later writings, however, Peter followed Godfrey of Fontaines's view that form is the principle of individuation.

Bibliography: P. GLORIEUX, Répertoire des maîtres en théologie de Paris au XIII^e siècle (Paris 1933–34) 1:412–417. P. GLORIEUX, La Littérature quodlibétique (Kain 1925) 1:257–263. P. STELLA, Enciclopedia filosofica (Venice-Rome 1957) 3:1374. A. P. MONAHAN, "Peter of Auvergne's 'Quaestiones in Metaphysicam,'" Nine Mediaeval Thinkers, ed. J. R. O'DONNELL (Toronto 1955) 145–181; "The Subject of Metaphysics for P. of A.," Mediaeval Studies 16 (1954) 118–130. É. H. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (New York 1955) passim. F. J. ROENSCH, Early Thomistic School (Dubuque 1964).

[A. P. MONAHAN]

PETER OF BERGAMO

Dominican theologian and lexicographer; b. Bergamo, Italy, early 14th century; d. Piacenza, Oct. 15, 1482. He entered the order and was ordained at Bergamo in the Dominican province of upper Lombardy. His career was one of teaching theology, principally at the studium generale in Bologna. He was master of students in 1461, lecturer on the Sentences in 1466 and 1467, and regent of studies from 1471 to 1476. He had the highest reputation as a teacher and many revered him as a saint. Among his outstanding disciples were DOMINIC OF FLANDERS, Paul Soncinas (d. 1494), and Ambrose Alemannus. His greatest contribution to THOMISM consisted in an Index universalis to all the works of St. THOMAS AQUINAS, completed in 1475; a Concordantia locorum doctoris angelici, quae sibi invicem adversari videntur (ed. Bologna 1473) that harmonized apparently contradictory passages; and a table of biblical passages quoted by St. Thomas. These three works were collected under the general title of Tabula aurea and published in Bologna (1475) and again in the Piana edition of the complete works of Aquinas (Rome 1570; photocopy, Rome 1960).

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (New York 1959) 1.2:863–864. A. WALZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:351. I. COLOSIO, "La Tabula Aurea di Pietro da Bergamo," Divus Thomas 64 (1961) 119–132.

[J. F. HINNEBUSCH]

PETER OF BRUYS

An itinerant priest in Daupiné and Languedoc; d. 1126 (according to Borst), or c. 1132–33 (according to Manselli). Documentation of Peter of Bruys' career and ideas is provided by PETER THE VENERABLE, who addressed his tract against the PETROBRUSIANS to the bishops of Embrun, Gap, and Die, as well as to the archbishop of Arles. Peter was also condemned as a subverter of the Church by ABELARD and TANCHELM of Flanders. For 20 years Peter spread his teaching in southern France, including Gascony, until he was seized and burned by the faithful at Saint-Gilles in Languedoc for desecration of the cross.

Peter's ideology is just one example of the variety of religious fermentation that occurred in many parts of France during the first third of the 12th century, but whereas other itinerant preachers, such as Bl. Robert of Arbrissel, St. BERNARD OF TIRON, and VITALIS OF SAVIGNY, urged reform along apostolic lines within the ecclesiastical fabric, Peter moved from attacks on clerical delinquency and worldliness to bitter criticism of hierarchy and Sacraments, demonstrating the difference between legitimate, extraordinary preachers and a mere gyrovagus. He spurned as imposters regular and secular clergy alike. Accepting only the Gospels, Peter cast doubt on other portions of the Bible. He rejected infant Baptism and discounted the Mass and transubstantiation, affirming that each individual is to be saved by his own faith.

Peter disapproved of all ceremonies and outward forms, even the erection of churches. He held that one may pray as effectively in tavern or church, in market place or temple, and may commune with God before a stable as well as before an altar; that crosses are to be broken and burned because, as the instrument of the Passion, they are not worthy of veneration; and that sacrifices, prayers, alms, and good works of the living are not efficacious for the dead. Peter rejected art and ridiculed hymns, since what pleases God is the pious sentiments of the soul, not outbursts of the human voice or musical instruments. Upon Peter's death his followers were dispersed or joined the heretical monk, HENRY OF LAUSANNE.

Bibliography: Sources. PETER THE VENERABLE, Epistola sive tractatus adversus Petrobrusianos haereticos, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 189:719–850. P. ABELARD, Introductio ad theologiam 2:4, Patrologia Latina 178:1056. Literature. S. M. DEUTSCH, J. J. HERZOG and A. HAUCK, eds., Realencyklopädie für protestantische Theologie (Leipzig 1896–1913) 15:219–221. F. VERNET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 2.1:1151–56. R. MANSELLI, Studi sulle eresie del secolo xii (Studi storici 5; Rome 1953) 25–43. E. VACANDARD, Vie de Saint Bernard (4th ed. Paris 1910). A. BORST, Die Katharer (Stuttgart 1953) 83–84.

[E. W. MCDONNELL]

PETER OF CASTELNAU, BL.

Legate, martyr; b. Château-Neuf, Montpellier, France; d. near Saint-Gilles, Belgium, Jan. 14, 1208. While Peter was archdeacon of Maguelonne (Montpellier), INNOCENT III made him papal legate to Languedoc to deal with the ALBIGENSES (1199). Peter gained the recantation of Raymond VI of Toulouse whose domains were rife with heresy. In 1202 Peter joined the CISTERCIANS at FONTFROIDE ABBEY. In 1207 Innocent III again made him legate to cope with Raymond, who had lapsed. With the support of the nobles of Provence and Languedoc, Peter issued a bull of excommunication and placed Raymond's domains under interdict, thus bringing him to submission. On January 15, a henchman of Raymond assassinated Peter. This led to the Albigenian Crusade led by Simon de Montfort l'Amaury. Peter is honored as a martyr in the Midi dioceses.

Feast: Jan. 15 (formerly March 5); Diocese of Nîmes, March 15.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum March 1:409–415. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines Jusqu'à nos jours. (Paris 1935–) 10. S. LENSSEN, Hagiologium cisterciense (Tilburg 1948–49) 1. B. GRIESSER, "Rainer v. Fossanova," Cistercienser-Chronik (1953) 151–167. K. SPAHR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 8:354–355.

[M. A. MULHOLLAND]

PETER OF CELLE

Cluniac, abbot, bishop, Latin stylist, and spiritual writer; b. Champagne, c. 1115; d. Chartres, Feb. 20, 1183. Peter was abbot of Montier-la-Celle, near Troyes, from 1145 or 1150 to 1162, and then of Saint-Rémi, Reims, from 1162 to 1181, and bishop of Chartres from 1181 until his death. His Christocentric piety and ascetic ideals, expressed in a prolixity of Biblical allegorizing, and his administrative abilities, demonstrated early in his reform of Celle and in continuous assistance to diocese and papacy, made him the admired counselor, confidant, and correspondent of nearly all the great personalities of his time, to whom he addressed a flow of letters, sermons, and tracts (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1878–90] 202: 397–1146).

Bibliography: J. DE GHELLINCK, L'Essorde la littérature latine au XII^e siècle (Brussels-Paris 1946) 1:100–101, 194, 225. J. LECLERCQ, La Spiritualité de Pierre de Celle 1115–83 (Paris 1946); "Nouvelles lettres de P. de C.," Analecta monastica v. 5 (St Anselm 43; 1958) 160–179, works, bibliog. P. GLORIEUX, "Candidats à la pourpre en 1178," Mélanges de science religieuse 11 (1954) 5–30. JOHN OF SALISBURY, Letters, ed. and tr. W. J. MILLOR et al. (New York 1955–) 1:ix–liii.

[P. EDWARDS]

PETER OF DIEBURG

Also known as Dieppurch; chronicler of the Hildesheim house of the Brethren of the Common Life; b. Dieburg, east of Darmstadt, Germany, c. 1420; d. Hildesheim, 1494. Dieburg is known chiefly as the author of the annals (1440–94) of the house of the BRETHREN OF THE COMMON LIFE in Hildesheim. These Latin annals, which are generally dependable, begin in 1440, the year the Brethren were founded at Hildesheim. They lived first in the Luremanshof in the Old Market, then purchased the Löchtenhof in 1443. Shortly before 1440, Dieburg had joined the Brethren in Herford; in 1440 he went to Hildesheim as a novice. He worked first as a kitchen helper, then as a copyist. After ordination, he became rector of the Hildesheim house in 1476 or 1477 and remained in office until his death, even though he tried to resign in 1491 because of his age. While rector, he maintained strict discipline, putting an end to the high-handed dealings of some of the Brethren.

A domus scolarium, or college, where students were boarded and educated by the Brethren, was founded during his rectorship. As in other houses of the Brethren, e.g., in Deventer and in Emmerich, the school aimed mainly—or even exclusively—at giving religious training to suitable young candidates for the community, or at least at inculcating a pious way of life in every student. Actual scholastic instruction was usually left to others. While Dieburg was in office, new houses of Brethren were founded from Lüchtenhof—one in Magdeburg (1482) and one in Berlicum in Friesland (1483), although the Friesland house perished in 1488. Dieburg was a pious, modest man who lived and acted entirely in the spirit of the DEVOTIO MODERNA.

Bibliography: Annalen und Akten der Brüder des Gemeinsamen Lebens im Lüchtenhofe zu Hildesheim, ed. R. DOEBNER (Hanover 1903). E. BARNIKOL, Bruder Dieburgs deutsches Christentum (Eisleben 1933). K. ALGERMISSEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 8:361.

[W. J. ALBERTS]

PETER OF IRELAND

Teacher of Aquinas; b. probably in Ireland, c. 1200; d. probably at Naples, after 1260. As a professor in Naples, he taught THOMAS AQUINAS natural philosophy, and probably logic (c. 1239–44). Peter's commentaries on PORPHYRY'S Isagoge and on Aristotle's De interpretatione and De longitudine et brevitate vitae (De morte et vita) survive in manuscript and still await full study. A determinatio magistralis (or master's judgment) of a scholastic disputation in natural philosophy given by Peter, probably at Naples in the presence of King Manfred (c. 1260), has been published (Baeumker). It shows that Peter was well versed in Aristotelian natural philosophy and was under the influence of Averroës. Peter's early career is still largely a matter of conjecture. He must have gone abroad for his studies, as Ireland had no university in the 13th century. His interest in Aristotelian natural philosophy might suggest Oxford; his logic and his methods of commentary have been thought to indicate Paris. His becoming a professor in the Norman kingdom of Naples strongly suggests that he was Anglo-Norman and not native Irish by race.

Bibliography: C. BAEUMKER, "Petrus de Hibernia . . . und seine Disputation vor König Manfred," Sitzungsberichte der Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu München (1920). M. GRABMANN, "Magister Petrus von Hibernia . . . seine Disputation vor König Manfred und seine Aristoteleskommentare," Mittelalterliches Geistesleben, 3 v. (Munich 1926–56) 1:249–265. A. PELZER, "Le Cours inédit d'Albert le Grand sur la Morale à Nicomaque . . ." Revue néo-scholastique de philosophie 24 (1922) 333–361. M. B. CROWE, "Peter of Ireland, Teacher of St. Thomas Aquinas," Studies 45 (1956) 443–456; "Peter of Ireland's Approach to Metaphysics," Miscellanea mediaevalia, 2 (1963) 154–160. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 3:xxx. A. PELZER, Études d'histoire littéraire sur la scolastique médiévale (Paris 1964) 272–335.

[M. B. CROWE]

PETER OF JERUSALEM

Patriarch from 524 to 552. Nothing is known of his origin or career until he succeeded John of Jerusalem in 524. The latter had held a synod in 516 that condemned both NESTORIUS and the Monophysites, EUTYCHES and SEVERUS OF ANTIOCH. Peter was of a similar theological orthodoxy. He accepted the appointment of Anthimus as patriarch of Constantinople in the fall of 535, for, as Zachary Rhetor said, "he disliked to be quarrelsome or a heretic" (Hist. eccl. 9.19); but he was reproached by Pope AGAPETUS I for so doing, and he accepted the rebuke (ibid.). Peter was represented by two monks, THEODORE ASCIDAS and Domitian, at the Constantinopolitan council (Aug. 6, 536) that confirmed the deposition of Anthimus by the pope, and condemned Severus of Antioch and Peter of Apamea. Peter called a synod of his own (Sept. 19) that accepted the Constantinopolitan decisions.

Troubled by the Origenistic monks in Palestine who were supported by Theodore Ascidas and Domitian, become bishops in Constantinople, Peter complained secretly against them. Called to Gaza in 539, he took part in the synod that deposed Paul of Alexandria and appointed ZOÏLUS as the new patriarch. Peter welcomed the Roman deacon and future pope, PELAGIUS (I), to Jerusalem and had his monks provide him with information that resulted in the condemnation of ORIGEN by JUSTINIAN I (543), but that in turn occasioned the emperor's edict against the THREE CHAPTERS (544). Peter refused to sign this document, and wrote to his monks in favor of THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA; but he was called to Constantinople, forced to sign, and, at the insistence of Theodore Ascidas, accepted two Origenistic syncelli or counselors, who aided the Isochristic monks in their attempt to have Origen's doctrine accepted by the Palestinian monks. Peter's reign ended in great difficulties. He was succeeded by an Isochristic monk, Macarius, but the latter was quickly deposed and replaced by Eustachius in December 552 or early 553.

Bibliography: F. DIEKAMP, Die origenistischen Streitigkeiten (Münster 1898). Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours 4:458–462. G. FRITZ, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 11.2: 1574–80. L. DUCHESNE, L'Église au VI^e siècle (Paris 1925) 169–176, 206–209.

[P. ROCHE]

PETER OF JULY, BL.

Monk; b. England; d. June 23, 1136. Peter met STEPHEN HARDING in Burgundy, and together they made a pilgrimage to Rome, after which Stephen entered the Abbey of MOLESME. Peter, however, spent some time in solitude before he followed Stephen's example. At the request of Bl. HUMBELINE, sister of St. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX and prioress of Jully-les-Nonnais (Diocese Langres), the abbot of Molesme appointed Peter to be the chaplain of her convent, an office he held until his death. His cult was revived in the Diocese of Sens in 1884 after it had lapsed in the 16th century. He is sometimes referred to as "saint."

Feast: June 23.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 5:517–523. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 2:374–375, 377. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 6:382–383. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 2:622.

[V. GELLHAUS]

PETER OF LA PALU (PALUDANUS)

French Dominican theologian and patriarch of Jerusalem, known by the scholastic title Doctor fructuosus; b. Varambone (Ain), c. 1277; d. Paris, Jan. 31, 1342. The sixth son of Gerard of La Palu, lord knight of Varambone and allied territory, Peter entered the Dominican order at Lyons. After studying theology at Toulouse, he was sent to Paris to lecture on the Sentences (1309–10) as successor to DURANDUS of Saint Pourçain. He incepted in theology on June 13, 1314, and remained regent master until 1317. After the general chapter of Metz in 1313, he, together with HARVEY NEDELLEC and JOHN OF NAPLES, was appointed to a commission entrusted with examining the works of Durandus for errors. The first investigation resulted in a list of 91 errors that were sent to the 1314 chapter of London; a second investigation (1316–17), in which Peter examined bks. 2 and 3 of Durandus's commentary, resulted in a list of 235 errors. Beginning with his Advent quodlibet of 1314, Peter defended the rights of mendicant orders against the attacks of John of Pouilly (fl. 1301–21); this prolonged controversy culminated in a three-year trial at Avignon in which Peter showed his skill as a prosecutor. The trial ended with the condemnation of John of Pouilly on July 24, 1321. Simultaneously, Peter composed his Commentaria in universa biblia. Between April and June 1318, he was sent by the pope to make peace between Flanders and France in the ultimate hope of organizing a crusade. Having failed to secure the desired peace, he was twice charged with treachery by the king of France, but he was vindicated. At Avignon during the trial of John of Pouilly, Peter was also on a commission with six other theologians to examine the Postilia on the Apocalypse by PETER JOHN OLIVI; this commission censured 60 propositions. Between 1321 and 1329 he returned to Saint-Jacques in Paris, continued his commentary on Scripture, undertook various missions for the Church and crown, and wrote two important works on ecclesiology: De causa immediata ecclesiasticae potestatis (ed. Paris 1506) and De potestate papae (c. 1324).

In 1329 Peter became patriarch of Jerusalem. Commissioned by JOHN XXII and the King of France to inquire diplomatically whether the Sultan of Egypt would negotiate a return of the Holy Places to Christians, he accompanied William Durant, bishop of Mende, to Cyprus. Failing to reach agreement, he returned to Avignon and suggested a new crusade. Apathy and enmity among Christian princes rendered all attempts impossible. On Dec. 19, 1333, the king of France established a commission of 29 Paris masters to study the view of John XXII concerning the state of the blessed before the Last Judgment. Peter was one of the leading theologians; some scholars believe that he directed the entire discussion. In a letter to the king, the commission asserted that the pope neither held nor taught the view attributed to him, but only mentioned and examined it. In 1335 BENEDICT XII called Peter to Avignon to assist in drawing up the bull settling the controversy over the beatific vision. He was then successively administrator of the Diocese of Limisso in Cyprus (1335–36) and of Conserans in St. Lizier (1336). In 1338 he tried to dissuade the pope from changing the Dominican constitution in matters of poverty.

Peter was one of the most eager promoters of THOMISM in the early 14th century, but this apparently was not based on an extensive reading or profound comprehension of St. Thomas Aquinas. He was more successful as a polemicist and diplomat than as an original and speculative thinker. Although he had great prestige among his confreres, James of Lausanne compiled a list of teachings "in which Peter departs from Thomas," and John CAPREOLUS frequently rejected Peter's views as unfaithful to St. Thomas.

Bibliography: F. STEGMÜLLER, Repertorium commentariorum in Sententias Petri Lombardi (Würzburg 1947) I: 327–328. J. KOCH, "Der Prozess gegen Magister Johannes de Polliaco und seine Vorgeschichte," Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 5 (1933) 391–422. P. FOURNIER, Histoire littéraire de la France 37 (1938) 39–422. J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores ordinis praedicatorum (New York 1959) 1.2:603–609. W. ECKERT Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:374–375. P. STELLA, Enciclopedia filosofica 3:1379–80. F. J. ROENSCH, Early Thomistic School (Dubuque 1964).

[J. A. WEISHEIPL]

PETER OF LUXEMBURG, BL.

Cardinal deacon; b. Ligny-en-Baurrois, Lorraine, July 20, 1369; d. Villeneuve-les-Avignon, July 2, 1387. He was the son of Guy of Luxembourg, count of Ligny. Despite his extreme youth, Peter was appointed to several ecclesiastical offices and finally, in 1384, was named bishop of Metz and cardinal by the antipope CLEMENT VII. Clement hoped to strengthen the AVIGNON papacy through Peter's well-founded reputation for extraordinary asceticism and charity and through his family attachments in Luxembourg. Weary of the controversies accompanying the WESTERN SCHISM, Peter renounced his bishopric in 1386 and, leaving Avignon, retired to a nearby Carthusian monastery, where he died, at age 18. He was beatified by the valid Pope CLEMENT VII on April 9, 1527; his relics are now in Saint-Didier, Avignon.

Feast: July 2 (formerly July 4).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum July 1:428–551. H. FRANÇOIS, La Vie du B. Pierre de Luxembourg (Nancy 1927). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 7: 51–59. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 3:9–10. J. CAMPBELL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:369.

[J. C. MOORE]

PETER OF MOGLIANO, BL.

Franciscan; b. Mogliano, in the March of Ancona, Italy, 1442; d. Camerino, Italy, July 25, 1490. Peter studied law at Perugia until 1464. Three years later, after hearing a sermon preached by the pious and zealous Franciscan observant, Dominic of Leonessa (d. 1497), at that time vicar-provincial of the Marches, Peter at once chose to enter the order. An exemplary and apostolic religious, he was assigned as companion to JAMES OF THE MARCHES. In 1472 the General Congregation of Aquila sent him to Crete as their representative. He was appointed three times (1477, 1483, and 1489) to be vicar-provincial in the Marches and once, in Rome (1474).

Peter was spiritual director to Bl. Baptista Varano (d. 1524) of the order of Poor Clares of Camerino, who left an account of his last days. On July 2, 1490, it was revealed to Peter that he was about to die. On July 4 as had been foretold, he was stricken with a raging fever. In spite of his suffering and the harassment of the devil, he retained a noble serenity throughout the ordeal and died advocating the observance of the rule.

Peter was at once venerated as a saint, and many miracles were attributed to him. In 1502 his relics and those of John of Parma were transported to the city of Camerino; later, following the suppression of the religious orders after 1860, they were transferred to the cathedral. His cult was confirmed in 1760.

Feast: July 30.

Bibliography: Archivum Franciscanum historicum 4 (1911) 329. Le opere spirituali della beata Battista Varani, ed. M. SANTONI (Camerino 1894) 61–101. L. OLIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. M. BUCHBERGER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1930–38) 8:169. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 7:622. LÉON OF CLARY, Lives of the Saints and Blessed of the Three Orders of Saint Francis, 4 v. (Tauton, England 1885–87) 3:1–8. I. BRANDOZZI, Il beato Pietro da Mogliano (Rome 1968).

[J. CAMBELL]

PETER OF ONESTI

Founder and superior of an establishment of regular canons at the church of S. Maria in Portu on the isle of Isola adjoining Ravenna (known also as de Honestis); b. mid-11th century; d. Ravenna, 1118–19. At the request of Peter, Pope Paschal II confirmed his rule Dec. 21, 1116. Mercati denied the authenticity of Peter's letter and questioned the papal confirmation. He maintained that the rule was not composed by Peter, but was already in existence between 1025 and 1050. Whether it was Peter's or not, the rule adopted at S. Maria in Portu obtained a wide diffusion, and the church became regarded as the head of its own congregation with associated foundations in many Italian cities and in Germany. Writers of the 14th and 15th centuries frequently confused Peter of Onesti with St. PETER DAMIAN.

Bibliography: Text of the rule in E. AMORT, Vetus disciplina canonicorum, 2 v. (Venice 1747) 1:339 ff., and Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 271 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 163:703–748. G. MERCATI'S criticisms in his "Pietro Peccatore," Studi e documenti di storia e diritto, 16 (1895) 3–47, reprinted in Opere minori, v. 1, Studi e Testi 76 (1937) 170–201. P. F. KEHR, Regesta Pontificum Romanorum. Italia Pontificia, 8 v. (Berlin 1906–35) 5:96–97.

[F. COURTNEY]

PETER OF PISA

Deacon, grammarian, and poet at the court of Charlemagne; b. Lombardy, first half of the 8th century; d. Lombardy, sometime before 799. Peter probably learned grammar and rhetoric in Lombardy where he took part in public disputations. When ALCUIN was a youth on a trip to Rome, he heard Peter speak in Pavia in a disputation on the Jews. Later Peter came to CHARLEMAGNE'S court, probably after the destruction of the Lombard kingdom (773–774). Already an old man, he was Charles' honored guest for several years and an integral part of his learned court circle (see CAROLINGIAN RENAISSANCE). Two other Lombards later joined this group, PAUL the Deacon and PAULINUS OF AQUILEIA. A close bond existed between Charles and Peter as well as between Peter and Paul, but Peter apparently was not much liked by either EINHARD or Alcuin. Peter seems to have been proud of Paul's intellectual superiority over the others, including himself. He instructed Charles in Latin grammar and probably read the Latin authors with him. Einhard mentions this fact (ch. 25) and describes Peter as elderly. It seems likely that both Peter and Paul brought manuscripts from Italy that kept Carolingian scribes busy for many years.

Charles used Peter's poetic talent when writing letters in verse to Paul; when Charles wrote to Peter, in turn, he pieced together verses from the works of the poets with Alcuin's help. One poem that Peter wrote in Charles's name can be dated 783; addressed to Paul, the letter asks him to remain in the Frankish kingdom to give instruction in Greek to clerics accompanying Hrotrude. Of this exchange of poems, at least one is lost. The surviving pieces contain riddles, admonitions to Christian charity, a vision, and the like.

Like Paul the Deacon, Peter was important as a grammarian. In a manner typical of the 8th century, he illustrated his teaching with writings of ancient pagan and Christian authors. His grammar is preceded by a dedication preface in elegiac verse stating that the work was composed "by Peter for love of his lord" and praising Charles as conqueror of the Lombards, builder of churches, converter of heathen, and punisher of evildoers. Noa, Samson, Gideon, and David are held up to Charles as models. He prays that Christ may help Charles in the future; the Saxon wars were not yet completed. In his grammar, Peter borrowed from Donatus, Probus, Sergius, Augustine, Cominian, Priscian, and Vergil. This work, dealing chiefly with declensions and conjugations, treated pronouns, adverbs, participles, conjunctions, and prepositions very much as did the anonymous author of MS Bern 207, fol. 112a–127b. Peter's treatise appears in the same MS, and its editor, H. Hagen, believes both are reproductions of a common source. Reichenau MS 821 (B 6:403) is a 10th-century copy of the grammar, complete with its dedicatory poem to Charles. Peter promised additional treatises, but if he wrote them, they are no longer extant.

Bibliography: H. HAGEN, Anecdota Helvetica (Leipzig 1870) 159–171, partial ed. of Peter's grammatical works. PAUL THE DEACON, Die Gedichte des Paulus Diaconus, ed. K. NEFF (Munich 1908) 57–, critical ed. of poems of Peter of Pisa with those of Paul the Deacon. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters (Munich 1911–31) 1:452–456. F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (Oxford 1953) 150–279. M. L. W. LAISTNER, Thought and Letters in Western Europe, A. D. 500 to 900 (New York 1957) 219–222, 279–280. F. J. E. RABY, A History of Secular Latin Poetry in the Middle Ages (Oxford 1957) 1:181182, 197–199.

[C. M. AHERNE]

PETER OF POITIERS

Theologian and chancellor of Paris; b. Poitiers (or in the Poitou) c. 1130; d. Paris, Sept. 3, 1205. Peter was in Paris and had begun his theological studies before 1159 if, as appears probable, he studied under Peter Lombard, whose election as bishop of Paris in 1159 ended his teaching career. Peter of Poitiers began his own career as a teacher of theology in 1167. In 1193 he was named chancellor of Paris. The chancellor was primarily an officer of the cathedral chapter, and he was charged with the direction of the higher schools within the jurisdiction of the bishop of Paris. This made him, in effect, chief officer of the university, and his chancellorship from 1193 to 1205 came during the transition of the cathedral schools into the university.

Peter of Poitiers was one of the late 12th-century theologians to whom is attributed the development of Paris into a great medieval center of theology. In this lies his importance. His first interest was in the dogmatic and moral questions to which the study of Scripture gave rise. His outstanding work is the Sententiarum libri quinque, a systematic and comprehensive exposition of these questions. In this work he draws heavily upon PETER LOMBARD, who was the father of the 12th-century Sentences books, but at the same time he is largely independent of the Lombard. Thus, at least half of the questions he discusses are not found in the Sentences of his master. Then, he was one of the most enthusiastic champions of the application of dialectics to theology. This gave reason a much greater role and changed the traditional theology, which was based entirely or almost entirely on authorities. This enthusiasm for dialectics followed in the wake of ABELARD and the introduction of the works of Aristotle into the West. In applying dialectics, and also grammar, to the solution of theological questions, Peter and his contemporaries initiated the scholastic method, which reached its greatest perfection in the Summa theologiae of St. Thomas in the 13th century. While Peter's Sentences follows the general systematic pattern of topics of the Lombard, he divided them into five books instead of four. Book one treats of the Trinity, book two of creation, book three of grace and the virtues, book four of Christology, and book five of the Sacraments and eschatology. Under the virtues he deals with a great many moral questions, thereby giving much more prominence to moral theology than did the Lombard. Among the technical terms that he was one of the first to use are apere operato and apere operantis, spiratio, and synderesis. Peter also devoted much time to the interpretation of Holy Writ according to the four senses or meanings of Scripture, which constituted medieval exegesis. These senses were the historical, allegorical, tropological, and anagogical. Peter was also interested in a third branch of the medieval theological curriculum, sacred history. One work on this subject, the Compendium historiae in genealogia Christi, certainly belongs to him, and the Historia Actuum Apostolorum, the last part of the famous Historia Scholastica of Peter Comestor and long attributed to this master, is most probably from the pen of Peter of Poitiers. On the other hand, he scrupulously avoided the subject of Canon Law, though he must have been well versed in law because he was appointed several times by the pope as judge-delegate in ecclesiastical disputes. To his teaching in the classroom, Peter added preaching from the pulpit. Fifty-nine sermons have been preserved and, from a study of their construction and diction, B. Hauréau placed him among the best preachers of the 12th century. Among the works that have been attributed to Peter but of which he certainly was not the author, the most important are the Glossae super sententias, which remains anonymous, and the Allegoriae super vetus et novum testamentum, which belongs to Richard of Saint Victor [The New Scholasticism 9 (1935) 209–225].

Bibliography: PETER OF POITIERS, Sententiarum libri quinque, ed. H. MATHOUD (Paris 1655), repr. in Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNÉ, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90), 211:789–1280. Sententiae Petri Pictaviensis, ed. P. S. MOORE and M. DULONG (Publications in Medieval Studies 7, 11; Notre Dame, Ind. 1943, 1950), critical ed. of bks. 1–2. Allegoriae super tabernaculum Moysi, ed. P. S. MOORE and J. S. CORBETT (ibid. 3; 1938). P. S. MOORE, The Works of Peter of Poitiers (ibid. 1; 1936), with extensive bibliog. of unpub. and pub. sources and secondary works, both books and articles.

[P. S. MOORE]

PETER OF RUFFIA, BL.

Inquisitor, martyr; b. Ruffia, Piedmont, Italy, c. March 1320; d. Susa, Piedmont, Feb. 2, 1365. Born of the noble Cambiani family, he entered the DOMINICANS when he was 16 years old. A brilliant student of Scripture, theology, and law, he directed his learning against the heretical WALDENSES. Because of his knowledge of Piedmont and its people, INNOCENT VI named him inquisitor general there in 1351. Peter worked in the Diocese of Turin until mid-January of 1365, when he began a tour of the Alpine valleys near Switzerland. At the Franciscan friary in Susa he was assassinated by two heretics. He is buried in the church of St. Dominic, Turin. PIUS IX approved his cult on Dec. 4, 1856.

Feast: Nov. 7.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Nov. 3:684–686. I. TAURISANO, Catalogus hagiographicus ordinis praedicatorum (Rome 1918) 1:29–30. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 4:291–292.

[A. DABASH]

PETER OF TARENTEISE, ST.

Archbishop; b. near Vienne, Dauphiné, France, 1102; d. Bellevaux, Sept. 14, 1174. Peter (Pierre), who was of poor peasant stock, joined the Cistercian abbey of Bonnevaux. In 1132 he became the first abbot of Tamié in Savoy, and in 1141 was elected archbishop of Tarentaise. He reformed his diocese, effectively supported ALEXANDER III against Emperor FREDERICK I Barbarossa, and, for the same pope, undertook several successful diplomatic missions. For his charity and healing powers, Peter was venerated as a saint even in his lifetime. He was canonized by CELESTINE III, May 10, 1191.

Feast: May 8; May 10 (Cistercians).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum May 7:317–345. J. M. CHEVRAY, La Vie de Saint Pierre II, archevêque de Tarentaise (Baume-les-Dames 1841). G. MÜLLER, “Der hl Petrus, Erzbischof von Tarentaise,” Cistercienser-Chronik 3 (1891). S. LENSSEN, Hagiologium cisterciense (Tilburg 1948–49). Les Saints de tous les jours, ed. A. MAI (Paris 1957). H. RIGUET, Printemps en chrétienté, l’aventure spirituelle de saint Pierre de Tarentaise (Mercury, Savoie 1967).

[L. J. LEKAI]

PETER OF TIFERNO (CAPUCCI), BL.

Dominican preacher and wonder-worker; b. Città di Castello (Tiferno), Italy, 1390; d. Cortona, Italy, Oct. 21, 1445. After being clothed in the Dominican habit (1405) and professed at Tiferno (1406), he was sent to St. Dominic’s Priory, Cortona, where he began his preaching career. Austere, prayerful, and mortified, he developed in his preaching the theme of death with extraordinary power, performing miracles to move men to penance. His relics were placed in the main altar at Cortona (1597) and then moved to the church of St. Liberius, Colorno (1786); they were finally returned to St. Dominic’s at Cortona. PIUS VII confirmed his cult on May 11, 1816.

Feast: Oct. 21.

Bibliography: P. ÁLVAREZ, Santos, bienaventurados, venerables de la Orden de los Predicadores, 4 v. (Vergara 1920–23) 2:176–178. I. TAURISANO, Catalogus hagiographicus ordinis praedicatorum (Rome 1918) 37. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l’ordre du calendrier avec l’historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 10:673–674.

[B. CAVANAUGH]

PETER OF TREVÌ, ST.

Italian preacher; b. Roccabotte, near Subiaco, Italy; d. Trevi, Italy, Aug. 30, 1052. From the usual medieval tale of prodigy and marvel the story of his life emerges, verified by contemporary accounts and later papal documents. He was born in what is now Roccabotte, about ten miles from Subiaco and 20 from Trevi, the pivotal towns of his apostolate. As a young man he was introduced to Gregory, bishop of Tibur, who educated him for his ministry and conferred his TONSURE. He died after two years as a bitterly persecuted itinerant preacher in the region around Trevi. INNOCENT III canonized him Oct. 1, 1215. Later popes honored Peter as a patron of Subiaco and the “holy protector” of Trevi, where his relics are preserved. His aid is invoked as protection against wolves by the inhabitants of the neighboring countryside.

Feast: Aug. 30.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Aug. 6:634–647.

[N. M. RIEHLE]

PETER OF VAUX-DE-CERNAY

French chronicler; b. c. 1194; d. after 1218. He became a CISTERCIAN monk at VAUX-DE-CERNAY near Paris, where his uncle Guy was abbot. He accompanied Guy on the Fourth Crusade. From 1212 on he was with the royal army in the war against the ALBIGENSES, and he became the historian of that war. His account, titled Hystoria Albigensis, begins in 1203 and ends in 1218, shortly before its author's death, undoubtedly. In it Peter was especially interested in extolling the exploits of Simon de Montfort l' Amaury, chief of the expedition, whom he admired. Peter's Hystoria is the work of a fierce adversary of heresy; it is a passionate but well-composed work, full of details that are precise and objective when relating the excesses and weaknesses of the Crusaders.

Bibliography: Hystoria Albigensis, ed. P. GUÉBIN and E. LYON, 3 v. (Paris 1926–39). Histoire littéraire de la France 17:246–254. U. CHEVALIER, Répertoire des sources historiques du moyen-âge. Bibliographie (Paris 1905–07) 2:3753. A. BORST, Die Katharer (Stuttgart 1953). A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico (Turin 1954–58) 3:215.

[É. BROUETTE]

PETER OF VIENNA

Theologian; b. France; d. in 1183. He studied under Gilbert of Poitiers (d. 1154), and before 1155 went to Austria, where he became known as Master Peter of Vienna. To defend Gilbert, his teacher, he soon turned against Gerhoch of Reichersberg (d. 1169) who had been attacking the “novel” doctrines of the French schools since 1141. He accused Gerhoch mainly of not distinguishing clearly between Christ's divine person and his human nature. Peter and his friend HUGH OF HONAU wrote to Hugh Etherian, asking him to provide them with translations of passages in which Greek Fathers teach a distinction between nature and person in God. In 1179, Hugh's answer was brought to the West. Little is known about Peter's official task or position in Austria. As Master Peter he signed a charter issued in 1158 by Bishop Conrad of Passau. In a later document (1161) he is called a member of “the Order of Chaplains” (de ordine capellanorum). He taught in Vienna and may have written a compendium of theology (MS Zwettl 109).

Bibliography: PETER OF VIENNA, letter addressed to Otto of Freising (d. 1158), ed. H. WEISWEILER, Scholastik, 13 (1938) 231–246; letter addressed to Hugh Etherian, ed. A. DONDAINE, Archives d'histoire doctrinale et littéraire du moyen-âge 27 (1952) 131–132. H. FICHTEAU, Mitteilungen des Instituts für österreichische Geschichtsforschung 63 (1955) 283–297.

[N. HARING]

PETER ORSEOLO, ST.

Doge of Venice, Benedictine recluse; b. Venice, 928; d. Cuxa Abbey, Prades, France, Jan. 10, 987. Married at age 18, Orseolo (Urseolus) and his wife lived in continence after the birth of a son. In 948 he commanded the fleet in a war against pirates. After a revolution (976) during which Doge Peter IV Candiano was murdered, Orseolo was elected doge of Venice. He promoted peace, built hospitals, and cared for widows, orphans, and pilgrims. Using his own money he began the reconstruction of St. Mark's Cathedral and the doge's palace, both having been destroyed in the revolution.

At Mass one day, Peter heard, “And he who does not carry his cross and follow Me cannot be my disciple” (Lk 14:26), and he determined to join Marinus and ROMUALD, hermits living in the Po Delta. They refused to accept him, but shortly afterward he met Abbot Guarin of Cuxa, the great reformer of northern Catalonia and southern France, who took Orseolo and two other Venetians, John Gradenego and Morosone, as well as the two hermits, back to CUXA ABBEY on Sept. 1, 978. Orseolo was immediately a model religious, seeking the most menial tasks and undertaking severe penances.

As for Venice and her affairs, Peter contented himself with instructing his son, Otto, then doge, in the virtues of a Christian ruler. After Peter's death a cult sprang up; his body was translated in 1027; his cult was approved for Cuxa and Venice in 1731 and later for all Benedictines and CAMALDOLESE.

PETER DAMIAN (Vita s. Romualdi, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1878–90] 144:959–963) claimed that Orseolo entered Cuxa in reparation for his share in the revolt and murder of his doge predecessor. Orseolo's chaplain, John the Deacon of Venice (Chronicon Venetum, Monumenta Germaniae Historica [Berlin 1826–] Section: Scriptorum. 7:4), gave other reasons. And while it is likely that the Candiano family deliberately fostered the story given in Damian's account, it remains a fact that Orseolo's election was somewhat mysterious. The piety of certain chronicles may conceal the factional strife to which Orseolo owed his office. Furthermore, mild and tolerant, he probably encouraged local mischief and was happy to go to a monastery to fulfill an old vow. Peter called himself duke of Venice, Dalmatia, and Croatia, a title that reflected his ambition rather than an historical reality.

Feast: Jan. 10.

Bibliography: Vita (1027) by a monk of Cuxa, in J. MABILON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti 5:851–860. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901) 2:6784–86. H. TOLRA, St. Pierre Orséolo (Paris 1897).

B. SCHMID, Studien und Mitteilungen aus dem Benediktiner- und Cistercienser-Orden 22 (1901) 71–112; 251281. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 1:81–84. R. CESSI, Enciclopedia Italiana di scienze, lettere ed arti (Rome 1929–39) 25:603. G. F. VON PÖLNITZ, Venedig (Munich 1949) 78–84. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 1:64–65.

[C. M. AHERNE]

PETER PAPPACARBONE, ST.

Bishop, monastic reformer; b. Salerno, Italy, c. 1038; d. March 4, 1123. He was a hermit at LA CAVA and received his formative monastic training in the BENEDICTINE order at CLUNY under Abbot HUGH OF CLUNY. Peter was responsible for the reform of the monastery of Cilento in 1068; and although he accepted the bishopric of Policastro in 1070, he returned after a few years to La Cava, became coadjutor abbot in 1076, and succeeded Abbot LEO OF CAVA in 1079. Peter imposed the Cluniac customs at La Cava and secured from GREGORY VII the establishment of a congregation on the Cluniac model, thus beginning the monastic reform of central Italy. Under his rule, La Cava's domestic organization was improved, and many religious houses were placed under its jurisdiction. His cult was approved in 1893, and his relics were enshrined under the high altar at La Cava.

Feast: March 4.

Bibliography: Vita, L. A. MURATORI, Rerum italicarum scriptores, 500–1500, 25 v. in 28 (Milan 1723–51) 6.5:16–28. P. GUILLAUME, Essai historique sur l'abbaye de Cava (Naples 1877). P. LUGANO, L'Italia benedettina (Rome 1929) 164–179. P. SCHMITZ, Histoire de l'ordre de saint-Benoît, 7 v. (Maredsous, Bel. 1942–56) 1:185–187. K. HALLINGER, Gorze-Kluny, 2 v. (Studia anselmiana 22–25; 1950–51) A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:481. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 1:28:2–284.

[B. D. HILL]

PETER PASCUAL, ST.

Bishop and martyr; b. Valencia, Spain, 1227; d. Granada, Spain, Dec. 6, 1300. He was of noble birth. He became a doctor of theology in Paris and a priest (c. 1250), taught in Barcelona and administered the Diocese of Toledo (1266–75) for its young Archbishop Sancho, son of James I of Aragon. He then traveled on foot, performing works of mercy. In Paris, he defended the Immaculate Conception, and in 1296 he was consecrated bishop of Jaén by BONIFACE VIII in Rome. He was captured by the Moors in 1298 and died in prison. His relics are in the cathedral of Baeza; his cult was approved in 1673. Peter wrote several religious works in Catalan and Castilian and a gloss on the Lord's Prayer against the teachings of Judaism and Islam.

Feast: Dec. 6.

Bibliography: Opera, ed. P. A. VALENZUELA, 4 v. (Rome 1906–08). F. FITA, ed., Bulls of Boniface VIII, Boletín de la Real Academia de la Historia 20 (1892) 32–61. Analecta Bollandiana 23 (1904) 507–508; 58 (1940) 88. D. MANSILLA, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:375. Homenajes de las entidades culturales de Valencia a San Pedro Pascual en el III centenario de su canonización (Valencia 1973), anonymous author. F. COLOMBO, Resumen de la vida del glorioso mártir San Pedro Pasqual de Valencia, ed. J. B. MEREGA (Valencia 1979). W. METTMANN, Die volkssprachliche apologetische Literatur auf der Iberischen Halbinsel im Mittelalter (Opladen 1987).

[E. P. COLBERT]

PETER PETRONI, BL.

Carthusian; b. Siena, Italy, 1311; d. there, May 29, 1361. He demonstrated great piety as a youth and devoted himself to the care of the sick and lepers. At the age of 17 he joined the CARTHUSIANS at the charterhouse of Maggiani near Florence. The prior there wished to ordain him a priest, but Peter, feeling himself unworthy of this office, cut off the index finger of his left hand in order to disqualify himself for ordination. He is reputed to have warned BOCCACCIO to mend his ways. Peter was venerated by the faithful for his many virtues during his lifetime, and numerous miracles are reported to have occurred at his tomb in the charterhouse, where his relics were translated some 60 years after his death. He is honored as blessed, although he has never been officially beatified; his tomb was for a long time the object of local pilgrimages. His vita was written by JOHN COLOMBINI.

Feast: May 29.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum May 7:184–228. L. LE VASSEUR, Ephemerides ordinis cartusienis, 2 v. (Montreuil 1890) 2:169–270. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 2:421–422. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 5:574.

[B. J. COMASKEY]

PETER RIGA

Canon of Notre Dame of Reims, later canon regular of Saint-Denis, student at Paris (1165), prolific writer of Latin verse; b. c. 1140; d. 1209. Riga's fame rests on the Aurora, a metrical paraphrase of most of the books of the Bible with allegorical interpretations and moral applications, completed toward the end of the 12th century. It incorporates pieces appearing originally in the Floridus aspectus, compiled c. 1162 at the request of Samson, archbishop of Reims. Recapitulations in 23 sections summarize the content of each book. These are ingeniously composed: in the first poem the letter "a" does not occur in any word, in the second, no "b," etc. Three successive editions of the Aurora, the last revision containing more than 15,000 lines, attest to its popularity. Educators recommended it to their pupils (MS Dresd. 120 is glossed for schoolroom use); poets freely appropriated it (Chaucer, Book of the Duchess; Gower, Vox clamantis; Macé de la Charité, Old French verse Bible); clerics and religious used it for devotional reading. The first printed text of the poem appeared in Aurora Petri Rigae Biblia Versificata, ed. P. E. Beichner, 2 v. (Notre Dame, Ind. 1965).

Bibliography: M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters (Munich 1911–31) 3:820–831. K. YOUNG, "Chaucer and Peter Riga," Speculum 12 (1937) 299–303. P. E. BEICHNER, "The Old French Verse 'Bible' of Macé de la Charité, a Translation of the Aurora," ibid. 22 (1947) 226–239; "The Cursor Mundi and P. R.," ibid. 24 (1949) 239–250; "Gower's Use of Aurora in Vox Clamantis," ibid. 30 (1955) 582–595; "La Bible versifiée de Jehan Malkaraume et l'Aurora," Moyen-âge 61 (1955) 63–78; "The Champagne Letter Writer and P. R.," Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 30 (1963) 336–340.

[M. I. J. ROUSSEAU]

PETER THE DEACON OF MONTE CASSINO

Librarian and forger; b. Rome, probably 1107; d. after 1153. Peter went as a boy to MONTE CASSINO. He was a deacon by 1128 when Abbot Seniorectus exiled him as a sympathizer of the deposed Abbot Oderisius II. After his recall in 1130, he became bibliothecarius and supervised the compilation of the chartulary of the monastery, the Registrum Petri Diaconi. In 1137 he defended Monte Cassino's stand during the schism before the German Emperor LOTHAIR III at Lago Pesole (see PIERLEONI).

Peter is known only from his own numerous writings, many of which survive in the autograph codices Casinenses 361 and 257. Both MSS contain his autobiography. His handwriting is therefore known; it is "an uneven ordinary minuscule" (Willard), not the Beneventan calligraphy used in the Registrum Petri Diaconi and the Registrum s. Placidi, a corpus of hagiographical works pertaining mainly to St. Placidus, composed by him. Hence, as Meyvaert proved, Peter "wrote" neither these MSS nor the marginalia of MS Munich Clm 4623 of LEO MARSICANUS of Ostia's Chronicle of Monte Cassino and of codex Casinensis 413 (Translatio s. Mennatis).

Many of Peter's writings are careless excerpts from the works of others (e.g., the exegetical treatises in codex Casinensis 257) or outright forgeries. He may be one of the most prolific and brazen forgers in history, and studies in progress will show him to have been a pathological case. Some of these forgeries center around saints such as Placidus or MAURUS, St. Benedict's pupils, or Mark of Atina, an alleged disciple of St. Peter, and are buttressed by works of his invention ascribed to earlier authorities. The Atina papers, believed to be lost, were rediscovered in 1951 and will be edited by H. Bloch. Peter's historical works include the Liber illustrium virorum archisterii Casinensis and the Ortus et vita iustorum cenobii Casinensis, dictionaries of Monte Cassino's outstanding men and saints. His exact contribution to the Chronica mon. Casinensis, started by Leo of Ostia, continued by his own teacher Guido, and brought up to 1138 by Peter himself, remains to be determined.

Bibliography: E. CASPAR, Petrus Diaconus und die Monte Cassineser Fälschungen (Berlin 1909), fundamental. H. BLOCH, "The Schism of Anacletus II and the Glanfeuil Forgeries of P. the D.," Traditio 8 (1952) 159–264. P. MEYVAERT "The Autographs of P. the D.," The Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 38 (1955) 114–138; "The Exegetical Treatises of P. the D.," Sacris Erudiri 14 (1963) 130–148. P. MEYVAERT and P. DEVOS, "Autour de Léon d'Ostie et de sa Translatio S. Clementis," Analecta Bollandiana 74 (1956) 211–223, with ref. to the earlier articles by W. Smidt and H. W. Klewitz on the Chronica Casin. A. MANCONE, "Il Registrum P. D.," Bullettino dell'Archivio paleografico Italiano 2–3 (1956–57) pt. 2:99–126. H. WOLTER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 8:360–361.

[H. BLOCH]

PETER THE DEACON OF ROME, BL.

Friend and fellow student of Pope GREGORY I; d. Rome, c. 605. He came to Gregory's monastery of St. Andrew's in Rome, traveled to Sicily in the interest of the pope (590–592), and as subdeacon of the Roman church (592–593) was charged with caring for its temporalities. Created cardinal deacon, he was Gregory's constant companion and appears in the Dialogues (4.57) as the pope's partner in discussing the problems of the day. Peter is cited as evidence for the appearance of the Holy Spirit in the form of a dove inspiring Gregory and for certain marvels occurring at the pope's death (Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 3640–41); but both accounts are late and legendary. He was at first buried in Rome near Gregory; later his remains were translated to Vercelli, and since 1480 they have rested in Salussola, in the Diocese of Biella, Italy.

Feast: March 12.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Mar. 2:208–209. J. MABILON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti (Paris 1668–1701)

1:484–485. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 1:323.

[O. J. BLUM]

PETER THE HERMIT

Crusade preacher; b. Diocese of Amiens, c. 1050; d. Neufmouëtier Monastery, July 8, 1115. Peter's early career is obscure. He was known as Peter the Little to his contemporaries, who described him as short and swarthy, with a long, bony face. The name Peter the Hermit derived from the hermit's cloak he usually wore. He went barefoot at all seasons, never bathed, and abstained from bread and meat, subsisting mainly on fish and wine. He was probably not present when Pope URBAN II proclaimed the First CRUSADE in November of 1095, but shortly thereafter Peter was preaching the crusade to enthusiastic audiences in northern France. By April of 1096, when his recruits left Cologne, Peter had collected a numerous army, which he led through Hungary and the Balkan provinces of Byzantium to Constantinople. In Asia Minor, most of Peter's forces were quickly annihilated by the Turks. Peter and the few survivors fled to Constantinople and joined the ranks of the major crusading armies in the spring of 1097. At Antioch in 1098 he deserted from the crusade but was brought back in disgrace. After the capture of Jerusalem in 1099, Peter returned to the West and became prior of the Canons Regular of St. Augustine at Neufmouëtier, near Huy, Belgium.

Feast: July 8.

Bibliography: ALBERT OF AACHEN, "Historia Hierosolymitana," in Recueil des historiens, 16 v. (Paris 1841–1906) Historiens occidentaux 4:265–713. H. HAGENMEYER, Peter der Eremit (Leipzig 1879). A. WAAS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:333. J. FLORI, Pierre l'ermite et la première croisade (Paris 1999).

[J. A. BRUNDAGE]

PETER THE PAINTER

Latin poet, known also as Petrus Pictor; fl. c. 1100. All that is known of this remarkable figure is that he was a canon of the cathedral at Saint-Omer, where he probably received his education. By 1120 a number of his poems are already to be found in the Liber floridus, a compilation of LAMBERT OF SAINT-OMER. These works are typical of the carmina, or short poems, produced in the cathedral and monastic schools of the late 11th and early 12th centuries, and Peter is one of the better authors to practice this genre. Mention should be made of his eloquent Contra simoniam, a bitter attack against the Roman clergy in 70 rhyming hexameters, and his De sacra Eucharistia, which explores the nature and doctrine of the EUCHARIST in 688 verses. The De vita Pilati presents in 369 rhyming couplets the various legends concerning Pontius PILATE; the Dominus vobiscum is a 152-verse satire on clerical ignorance and materialism; and the De illa quae . . . filium adamavit is a drama in 246 leonine hexameters on a classical theme. Peter was also the author of the charming De laude Flandriae, written—judging from internal evidence—between 1100 and 1110; it is a poem of 43 hexameter lines with a variety of rhyme combinations, a eulogy in praise of his native Flanders. Seventeenth-century scholars often attributed much of this author's work to either PETER OF BLOIS or HILDEBERT OF LAVARDIN, but more recent research has assured Peter his rightful place in literary history.

Bibliography: Works. Contra simoniam, Monumenta Germaniae Historica Libelli de lite, (Berlin 1826–) 3:708–10; Dominus vobiscum in Notices et extraits des manuscrits de la Bibliothèque nationale et autres bibliothèques (Paris 1884) 31a:130–132; De sacra Eucharistia, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNÉ, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 207:1135–54; De illa quae impudenter filium suum adamavit, in B. HAURÉAU, ed., Notices et extraits de quelques manuscrits latins de la Bibliothèque nationale, 6 v. (Paris 1890–93) 5:220–226; De laude Flandriae, ed. W. WATTENBACH, Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde 18 (1893) 509–510. A. BOUTEMY, "Quelques oeuvres inédites de Pierre le Peintre," Latomus 7 (1948) 51–69. Literature. Histoire littéraire de la France (repr. Paris 1865) 13:429–433. L. WILLEMS in Biographie nationale de Belgique 17:466–470. M. MANITUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 3:877–883. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 12.2:2036–38. W. WATTENBACH, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter. Deutsche Kaiserzeit, ed. R. HOLTZMANN, v. 1.1–4 (3d ed. Tübingen 148; repr. of 2d ed. 1938–43) 1.4:710773. E. R. CURTIUS, European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages, tr. W. R. TRASK (New York 1953) 472. F. J. E. RABY, A History of Secular Latin Poetry in the Middle Ages, 2 v. (2d ed. Oxford 1957) 2:2630.

[B. J. COMASKEY]

PETER THE VENERABLE, BL.

Ninth abbot of Cluny (see CLUNY, ABBEY OF) and a significant personality in the monastic and literary renaissance of 12th-century Europe; b. Auvergne, c. 1092; d. Cluny, Dec. 25, 1156. Committed to Cluniac life as an oblate at an early age by his noble parents, Peter made his profession at Cluny under St. HUGH (1109). During the troubled administration of Pons de Melgeuil (1109–22) he was advanced to claustral prior at VÉZELAY, then to conventual prior at Domène, and finally swept by acclamation to the abbatial throne, Aug. 22, 1122, to rule the 300 to 400 monks at Cluny and the 2,000 dependent houses throughout western Europe. Although unable to check Cluny's decline beyond his lifetime, and eclipsed by St. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX in ecclesiastic as well as monastic spheres, Peter struck a note, remarkable in a polemic age, of peace and reasonableness in official and personal contacts and through the letters, tracts, and other writings by which he is known (Patrologia Latina, 189:15–1072). He was the last of the great "holy abbots,"—humane administrator, a controversialist, and an "occasional" theologian—and was much esteemed as a counselor. He won reconciliation for Peter ABELARD after the Council of Sens (1140), but his attempts to divert the crusading spirit from combat and conquest to dialogue and conversion went unheeded. He was called "venerable" in his lifetime by both St. Bernard and Frederick Barbarossa; his cult at Clermont was approved by Pius IX in 1862.

Feast: Dec. 29.

Bibliography: G. CONSTABLE and J. KRITZECK, eds., Petrus Venerabilis, 1156–1956: Studies and Texts Commemorating the 8th Anniversary of His Death (Studia anselmiana, 40; 1956), bibliog. of classic sources and continuing study. D. KNOWLES, The Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 39 (1956) 132–145. G. CONSTABLE, ed., The Letters of Peter the Venerable (Cambridge 1967). J. MARTIN and G. CONSTABLE, eds., Peter the Venerable: Selected Letters (Toronto 1974). Pierre Abélard, Pierre le Vénérable, proceedings of colloquium at Cluny Abbey, July 2–9, 1972 (Paris 1975). Petrus Venerabilis, Adversus Iudaeos, ed., Centre de Traitement Electronique des Documents (CETEDOC), Catholic University of Leuven (Turnhout 1985). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'histoire des fêtes, (Paris 1935–56) 12:674–678, bibliog. J. KRITZECK, Peter the Venerable and Islam (Princeton 1964). J. P. TORRELL and D. BOUTHILLIER, Pierre le Vénérable, Abbé de Cluny (Chambry 1988).

[P. EDWARDS]

PETER THOMAE

Franciscan scholastic (Petrus Thomae); b. probably in Compostella or nearby, c. 1280; d. c. 1340. Peter was lector at the Franciscan studium generale of Barcelona sometime after 1317 (more likely after 1322), and seems to have continued teaching until 1333. In that year he became apostolic penitentiary at Avignon. Nothing is known of him after 1336 although some older writers, confusing him with the Carmelite, St. Peter Thomas (d. 1366), Bishop of Patti in Sicily, claimed he ended his days as a bishop.

At least nine works of theology and philosophy are known to be from Peter Thomae. Of his Sentences only a reportation of the first book is extant. This is followed by his De esse intelligibili, nine questions on the ontological status of ideas both in creatures and in God, perhaps an answer to a work of like title by WILLIAM OF ALNWICK. The 15 (unpublished) questions on being (De ente) appear to be merely the first part of a work on the TRANSCENDENTALS in general; it defends Scotus's doctrine of BEING, ANALOGY, and univocity, and gives some attention to the attacks on RICHARD OF CONINGTON. Peter again reveals his debt to Duns Scotus in two works on formalities about the formal distinction and its applications. Both seem to have brought Peter considerable fame in the late Middle Ages. The Quodlibet, one of his later works, is incomplete in the only extant manuscript (ed. M. R. Hooper and E. M. Buytaert, St. Bonaventure, New York 1957). While Peter's last philosophical work was the De unitate minori, there is considerable evidence that he wrote a commentary on Aristotle's Metaphysics and perhaps on the Physics.

In the field of theology, Peter wrote the exegetical-moral work "On the Christian Rich Man," as well as the more important Liber de originali Virginis innocentia. This is the first extensive defense of the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION after those of Duns Scotus and PETER AUREOLI (both of which are primary sources for the theological reasoning); it contains the first earnest effort to find positive support for the doctrine in Sacred Scripture. Unfortunately, the work did not exert a real influence until 50 or more years after its appearance when it was used by Peter of Candia (later antipope ALEXANDER V), Andrew of Neufchâteau, John Vitalis, and John of Segovia.

In his own day, Peter Thomae was called "a great Scotist" and given the titles Doctor strenuus, invincibilis, proficiuus, and serenus. He is viewed today as a faithful disciple of the Subtle Doctor, important for his clarifications of the Scotist synthesis (see SCOTISM).

Bibliography: É. BUYTAERT, "The Scholastic Writings of Petrus Thomae," in J. AUER and H. VOLK, eds., Theologie in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Munich 1957). G. G. BRIDGES, Identity and Distinction in Petrus Thomae OFM (St. Bonaventure, N.Y. 1959). A. MAIERU, "Logica e Teologia Trinitaria ne Commento Alle Sentenze Attributo a Petrus Tomae," in J. JOLIVET, Z. KALUZA, and A. DE LIBERA, eds., Lectionum Varietates: Hommage à Paul Vignaux, 1904–1987 (Paris 1998), 177–198. I. BRADY, "The Later Years of Petrus Thomae," in Studia Mediaevalia et Mariologica (Rome 1971), 249–257.

[I. C. BRADY]

PETER TO ROT, BL.

Martyr, married man, father, lay catechist; b. Rakunai, New Britain Island, northeast of Papua New Guinea, c. 1912; d. Vunaiara, Papua New Guinea, c. 1945.

As the son of the local chieftain, Angelo To Puia and his wife Maria la Tumul, Peter was baptized by the Missionaries of the Sacred Heart when his father invited his people to become Catholics. During his 40 years as chieftain, Angelo promoted the faith, but felt it was unwise for his son Peter—or any of the new Christians—to become priests or religious. He did allow Peter to study at Saint Paul's Mission School (1930–33) to become a catechist. After receiving his diploma, Peter taught effectively in Rakunai. He married (Nov. 11, 1936) another Catholic, Paula La Varpit, with whom he had three children (the last born shortly after Peter's death).

When the Japanese invaded (1942), the clergy and religious were imprisoned; however, Peter was allowed to continue his work. In the absence of priests, he led other laity in ministering to the extent permitted them: baptizing, witnessing marriages, visiting the sick with the presanctified Eucharist, conducting communion services, catechizing, and running charitable organizations. He even built a church from branches on the outskirts of the village to replace one destroyed by the Japanese.

Peter protested against the 1945 Japanese prohibition against Christian religious instruction and worship, as well as the imposition of polygamy. For this he was arrested (1945) and beaten repeatedly during his two-month incarceration in a cave. Finally he was killed for refusing to espouse polygamy. A fellow prisoner, Arap To Binabak, testified to Peter's martyrdom.

Pope John Paul II beatified him at Port Moresby, Papua New Guinea, on Jan. 17, 1995. In his address to the bishops of Papua New Guinea and the Solomon Islands during their ad limina visit (Nov. 30, 1998), John Paul II pointed to Peter To Rot as an example that young people "have a role and responsibility in the Church's life" that must be encouraged.

Feast: July 7.

Bibliography: The Martyrs of Papua New Guinea: 333 Missionary Lives Lost during World War II, ed. T. AERTS (Port Moresby 1994). Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1995): 166–68.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

PETERBOROUGH, ABBEY OF

Former BENEDICTINE monastery in the town of the same name, Northamptonshire, England. The original monastery, called Medehamstede, was founded c. 655 by King Peada of Mercia and by Saxulf, the first abbot. Destroyed by the NORMANS in 870, it was restored c. 970 by ETHELWOLD OF WINCHESTER. It proved to be an important Anglo-Saxon monastery, especially under Abbot Leofric, who died in the year of the Norman Conquest, 1066. Peterborough continued to be one of the wealthiest and most important abbeys in Anglo-Norman England. The year after Abbot Arnulf of Beauvais was made bishop of Rochester in 1115, the abbey church burned. It was rebuilt in Norman style (with later emendations) and consecrated by ROBERT GROSSETESTE in 1237. BENEDICT OF PETERBOROUGH, chronicler of BECKET and friend of King Richard I, the Lion-Heart, was abbot from 1177 to 1193. The Black Death reduced the number of monks there from 64 to 32. In 1534 the abbot and monks subscribed to the Act of Supremacy, and when King HENRY VIII created the new Anglican diocese of Peterborough, comprised of Northampton and Rutland, the last abbot, John Chambers, became the first Anglican bishop, while the abbey church became the cathedral in 1541. CATHERINE OF ARAGON is buried there, as was MARY STUART, Queen of Scots, until transferred to WESTMINSTER ABBEY in 1612.

Bibliography: Sources. The Peterborough Chronicle, ed. C. PLUMMER in Two of the Saxon Chronicles Parallel, 2 v. (Oxford 1892–99). The Peterborough Chronicle, 1070–1154, ed. C. CLARK (London 1958). The Peterborough Chronicle, tr. G. N. GARMONSWAY in The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (New York 1953). W. T. MELLOWS, ed., The Last Days of Peterborough Monastery (Kettering 1947); Peterborough Local Administration (Kettering 1941). Carte nativorum: A Peterborough Abbey Cartulary of the 14th Century, ed. C. N. L. BROOKE and M. M. POSTAN (London 1960). Literature. W. DUGDALE, Monasticon Anglicanum (London 1655–73); best ed. by J. CALEY et al., 6 v. (1817–30) 1:344–404. J. BRITTON, History and Antiquities of the Abbey and Cathedral Church of Peterborough (London 1828). The Victoria History of the County of Northampton, ed. W. R. D. ADKINS et al. (Westminster, Eng. 1902–). L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:2262–63. D. KNOWLES and R. N. HADCOCK, Medieval Religious Houses: England and Wales (New York 1953) 73, 299, 34.7. D. KNOWLES, The Monastic Order in England, 943–1216 (2d ed. Cambridge, Eng. 1962). D. KNOWLES, The Religious Orders in England, 3 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1948–60). F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 1057.

[M. J. HAMILTON]

PETER'S PENCE

Originally an Anglo-Saxon tax of obscure origin, paid to the Holy See and theoretically levied on every English hearth not specially exempted. It was probably distinct from money gifts made to Rome by the rulers of newly converted subkingdoms, such as that by King OFFA OF MERCA. It seems, rather, to have originated under King ALFRED THE GREAT OF WESSEX, at least as early as 889, and to have been imposed throughout the English kingdom built up by him and his immediate successors. The practical difficulties of collecting such a tax under contemporary conditions were not inconsiderable, but payment was regular for some time, being annual under EDWARD THE CONFESSOR. If a later authority is to be believed, the proceeds were originally shared between the Roman See itself and the Schola Saxonum at Rome.

In the reign of King WILLIAM I the Conqueror the tax was in arrears: these payments were requested by Pope ALEXANDER II in a letter that also asserted a claim to feudal suzerainty over England, though it is not certain that the two claims were connected. William consented to pay the traditional Peter's Pence but rejected the claim to feudal suzerainty. Collection of the tax continued to be difficult, and in the course of the 12th century payment was commuted into an annual payment of 299 marks (£199 6s 8d) for which each diocese was assessed according to its means. Prosperity and population were then increasing, with the result that the bishops who levied Peter's Pence were making a profit from the transaction. Pope INNOCENT III protested vigorously but fruitlessly against this, and all attempts to increase the valuation proved quite unsuccessful.

In later times the sum involved was usually small, and payment of it was irregular. By the time of the Reformation, Peter's Pence was a very small item in the complex financial relationship of the English Church and the papacy. It was abolished by King HENRY VIII in 1534 (25 Henry VIII, c. 21) along with other payments.

It seems that during the Middle Ages not only was Peter's Pence (called also Rome-Scot, heorðpaenning, denarius, or census s. Petri) extended into Ireland and Wales, but the denarius-per-household was offered the Holy See by the northern nations whose religious background had known England's influence, e.g., Sweden, Norway, and Iceland. Other areas, such as Hungary, Istria, Dalmatia, and Poland, may also have paid a "Peter's Pence" distinct from their feudal tribute. As in England, Peter's Pence in these areas did not survive the Reformation.

The modern Peter's Pence collection originated under Pope Pius IX in the 1860s as a subsidy to compensate the papacy for the loss of revenue from the STATES OF THE CHURCH. Through the encyclical Saepe venerabiles fratres (1871), it was given official approval. Even after the Lateran Pacts, it remains a free offering of Catholic dioceses to the pope.

Bibliography: O. JENSEN, "The Denarius Sancti Petri in England," Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, NS 15 (1901) 171–247. S. L. OLLARD et al., eds., A Dictionary of English Church History (Milwaukee 1912; 3d ed. New York 1948) 457–458. W. E. LUNT, Financial Relations of the Papacy with England to 1327 (Cambridge, Mass. 1939) 3–84.

[M. J. HAMILTON]

PETERSHAUSEN, ABBEY OF

Former BENEDICTINE monastery on the Rhine River, near Constance, Germany (Latin, Petridomus). It was founded by Bp. GEBHARD II of Constance (983), who built the abbey church facing west in imitation of St. Peter's, Rome, and decorated it with magnificent frescoes and wood, silver and gold ornamentation. The bishop enshrined there the head of Pope Gregory I the Great, which he had brought from Rome (hence Gregory was first patron, Gebhard second). The original monks were from EINSIEDELN. The HIRSAU Reform was introduced by Bp. GEBHARD III. Under Abbot Theoderic (1086–1116), Petershausen monks went to Andelsbuch, MEHRERAU, KASTL, NERESHEIM, Wagenhausen, and Fischingen, at the request of those houses. After the fire of 1159 the Constance architect Wezilo (1162–80) built the new cruciform basilica. The first provincial chapter of the Mainz-Bamberg province of Benedictines was held there in 1417, with all Benedictines at the Council of CONSTANCE in attendance. The abbey was in a poor financial and domestic state in the mid-15th and early 16th century, but after 1519, under Abbot J. Merk, there was improvement. The Reformation in Constance forced the monks to leave their monastery from 1529 to 1549, and its buildings were a "quarry" for the bridge being built across the Rhine. In 1583, Pope Gregory XIII incorporated the Benedictine monastery of STEIN AM RHEIN and the Kingenzell provostry into the revived Petershausen. Abbot Wunibald Saur (1671–85), the "second founder" of the abbey, was a good administrator, and he undertook much building activity in the parishes dependent on the abbey and in the monastery itself. In 1769 Petershausen gained the status of an independent imperial abbey. It was suppressed in 1802, and its goods were assigned to the state of Baden. The church was demolished in 1832; its columned, Romanesque portal is preserved in the Landesmuseum, Karlsruhe. The abbey archives are in Karlsruhe Generallandesarchiv; the library is in Heidelberg University Library. The monastic buildings are presently a barracks.

Bibliography: Life of Gebhard and the Petershausen Chronicle, written c. 1156 by an unnamed monk, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores (Berlin 1826–) 10:582–594. P. LINDNER, Professbuch von Wessobrunn (Kempten 1909). P. MOTZ, "Die Neubauten der ehemaligen Benediktiner- und Reichsabtei Petershausen bei Konstanz im 18. Jahrhundert," Schriften des Vereins für Geschichte des Bodensees 79 (1961). J. N. HAUNTINGER, Reise durch Schwaben und Bayern im Jahre 1784 (Weissenhorn 1964), with illustrations and bibliography.

[G. SPAHR]

PETERSON, JOHN BERTRAM

Bishop, educator; b. Salem, Mass., July 15, 1871; d. Manchester, New Hampshire, March 15, 1944. Peterson studied at the Marist College in Van Buren, Maine, and at St. Anselm's College, Manchester, New Hampshire, before entering St. John's Seminary in Boston, Mass. He was ordained on Sept. 15, 1899 and spent two years studying church history at the Institut Catholique in Paris and at universities in Rome. Upon returning to St. John's Seminary, he became professor of church history, and two years later, professor of moral theology, a post he held for 20 years. While rector of St. John's (1911–26), he was named domestic prelate and held the archdiocesan posts of tribunal judge, defender of the bond, synodal examiner, moderator of ecclesiastical conferences, and consultor. In 1926 he was appointed pastor of St. Catherine of Genoa parish, Somerville, Massachusetts, and a year later was named titular bishop of Hippo and auxiliary to the archbishop of Boston. He was consecrated on Nov. 10, 1927. On the death of Bp. George A. Guertin, he was named to the See of Manchester and installed on July 14, 1932.

In New Hampshire, his influence was felt through his efforts to alleviate industrial problems. On the national scene, he was one of the founders (1904) of the National Catholic Educational Association and served as its president for five years. In 1930 President Herbert Hoover appointed him to a national commission that surveyed the U.S. educational system. He was vice chairman of the Administrative Council of the National Catholic Welfare Conference and episcopal chairman of its education department. He served as a trustee of both the Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C., and of the North American College in Rome. In 1934 he was named an assistant at the pontifical throne.

[J. J. MARKHAM]

PETIT, LOUIS

Archbishop and orientalist; b. Vuiz-la-Chiésaz (Haute-Savoie), France, Feb. 21, 1868; d. Menton (Alpes-Maritimes), France, Nov. 5, 1927. After joining the ASSUMPTIONISTS (1885) in Osma, Spain, where they had taken refuge from France, he made his perpetual profession at Livry near Paris (1887), studied at Rome, was ordained (1891), and then went to the East. From 1895, when he became superior of the scholasticate at Kadiköy (formerly Chalcedon), Turkey, he devoted himself to the religious past of Byzantium. In 1897 he founded the periodical Échos d'Orient, which he directed for the next decade, while contributing to other learned journals. As a member of the Russian Archeological Institute and the Greek literary Sylloguè of Constantinople, he explored MOUNT ATHOS with Jules Pargoire in 1901 and 1905, and published his findings, together with M. Millet, in Recueil des inscriptions chrétiennes de l'Athos (1904). Together with other scholars, he edited Les Chartes des monastères grecs (5 v. 1903–11). In collaboration with Jean B. Martin, he was editor for the reprinting and continuation of MANSI, Sacrorum Conciliorum collectio (60 v., 1899–1927). Petit was responsible for 12 of the additional volumes, including five on Vatican Council I. He went to Rome in 1908 and acted as adviser to the Armenian Catholic bishops who met there in council (1911). When he became Latin archbishop of Athens and apostolic delegate to Greece (1912), he continued his scholarly labors and won recognition from even the most rigid Orthodox. He was instrumental in the foundation of the Pontifical Oriental Institute (1917) and of the Roman Congregation for the Oriental Church, for which he acted as consultor. In 1926 he resigned the archbishopric of Athens, and became titular archbishop of Corinth. His Bibliographie des acolouthies grecques appeared in 1926. Petit contributed to the Dictionnaire de théologie catholique numerous articles concerning Greek ecclesiastical writers and a long, highly regarded article on Armenia.

Bibliography: S. SALAVILLE, Mgr. Louis Petit, Échos d'Orient 15 (1912) 97–105; 27 (1938) 129–137. Ibid. 137–144, bibliog. of P.'s works. J. RODRIGO, "Necrologia," Religion y Cultura 1 (1928) 147–160. R. JANIN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 12.1:1345.

[J. DAOUST]

PETIT-DIDIER, MATTHIEU

Benedictine theologian; b. St. Nicholas-du-Port (Lorraine), Dec. 18, 1659; d. Senones (Lorraine), June 15, 1728. After his early studies with the Jesuits at Nancy, he entered the Abbey of St. Mihiel (1675), where he was appointed professor of theology and philosophy (1682). He was elected abbot of St. Leopold in Nancy (1705–08; 1711–15), and of Senones (1715). His Traité théologique pour l'autorité et l'infailibilité du pape (Luxembourg 1724) was attacked by the Jansenists and suppressed by the parlements of Metz (June 8, 1724) and of Paris (July 1, 1724). After his appointment as titular bishop of Macra in 1725, he lived in Senones until his death. Other of his works are Remarques sur la Bibliothèque ecclésiastique de M. Dupin (Paris 1691–93); Dissertation historique et théologique dans laquelle on examine quel a été le sentiment du Concile de Constance et des principaux théologiens qui y ont assisté, sur l'autorité du pape et sur son infailibilité (Luxembourg 1724); Dissertationes historico-critico-chronologicae in Vetus Testa- mentum (Toul 1699); Justification de la morale et de la discipline de Rome et de route l'Italie (1727).

Bibliography: J. CARREYRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951—) 12:1346–48, bibliog. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 5 v. in 6 (3d ed. Innsbruck 1903–13) 4:1108–10. G. HEER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:323. O. L. KAPSNER, A Benedictine Bibliography: An Author-Subject Union List, 2 v. (2d ed. Collegeville, Minn. 1962) 1:444.

[N. R. SKVARLA]

PETITE ÉGLISE

The “Little Church” was a schism that arose in France and French-controlled territories in Belgium because of opposition to the CONCORDAT OF 1801 and the related Organic Articles. In accordance with article three of this concordat, Pius VII issued the brief Tam multa (Aug. 15, 1801) requiring the resignation of the entire hierarchy in French territories in order that new appointments could be made to all sees. Obedience to this unprecedented exercise of papal authority was particularly difficult for clerics imbued with GALLICANISM. In June 1802 Joseph Fouché, French Minister of Police, demanded that bishops and priests swear by oath their adhesion to the concordat and recognize the newly appointed bishops. In London (April 6, 1803) 36 bishops who had refused to resign their sees, joined by two others who had previously submitted, claimed that they alone retained jurisdiction over their dioceses. Eventually all of them submitted, but two of them delayed their submission for several years, during which they encouraged priests and laymen to follow their example. Many priests were the more ready to do so because they too were removed from office. Bishop de Coucy, formerly of La Rochelle, submitted in 1817 and was made archbishop of Reims. Bishop de Thémines, formerly of Blois, was the principal figure in the origin of the schism. His followers claimed that in virtue of extraordinary powers conferred on bishops during the French Revolution and never retracted, De Thémines retained a jurisdiction that had no territorial limitations. Eventually De Thémines severed relations with the Jansenistically inclined Petite Église of Lyons. Shortly before his death (1829) in exile in Brussels, he submitted to the pope and received the Last Rites. By 1850 the communities had lost all their priests. The schism declined in membership, but three groups still existed without priests. In 1955 the Petite Église of Lyons had about 400 members; the Petite Église in the Vendée region another 3,500; and the Stevenists, named after Canon Corneille Stevens (d. 1828), in Belgium approximately 400, concentrated around Leerbeeck and especially in the small village of Hal. Although these Petites Églises were independent of one another, they all maintained similar religious practices. Pius XII, as well as his predecessors, repeatedly sought reunion with these groups and eased the way to return by not requiring individuals to make a formal abjuration of schismatic beliefs.

Bibliography: C. LATREILLE, L'Opposition religieuse au Concordat de 1792 à 1803 (Paris 1910); Après le Concordat: L'Opposition de 1803 à nos jours (Paris 1910); La Petite Église de Lyon (Lyons 1911). E. MANGENOT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 1.2:1372–78. R. DE CHAUVIGNY, La Résistance au Concordat de 1801 (Paris 1921). C. G. VAN RIEL, Internationale kirchliche Zeitschrift 28 (1938) 30–43, 65–77, 141–155. E. TORFS, Le Stévenisme dans le sudouest du Brabant (Enghien 1955). C. DE CLERCQ, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ (Paris 1935–65) 6:1438–47.

[L. P. MAHONEY]

PETRARCH, FRANCESCO

Italian poet and humanist; b. Arezzo, July 20, 1304; d. Arquà, July 19, 1374. He was the son of one of the Florentine Whites who were banished with DANTE (see GUELFS AND GHIBELLINES). His father, a notary, frustrated in his hope that the coming of Emperor Henry VII would open the way for his return to Florence, moved (1312) to Avignon, the seat of the papacy, after Henry's failure. The town, however, was so overcrowded that the family had to find a home in Carpentras, about 15 miles from the court. There young Francesco attended grammar school under Convevole da Prato; it was probably he who aroused in the youth a lifelong love for Latin eloquence. At the age of 12, Francesco was sent to the famous university at Montpellier to begin the study of civil law. He remained there four years and then with his brother, Gherardo, went to Bologna to continue his law studies, remaining there until his 21st year. How much progress he made in the legal studies to which his father had set him is not known, but it is clear that he was attracted by other interests: as early as Montpellier he had acquired some works of Latin literature, including the works of Cicero; his father had opposed this interest and even burned some of the books but finally allowed Francesco to have Vergil and the Rhetorica ad Herennium, falsely ascribed to Cicero. In 1325 he bought a copy of De civitate Dei of St. Augustine, the author who (with Cicero) was to dominate his thought.

At that time the association between classical studies and religious aspirations that became the central theme of his life was probably to some degree already established in his mind. He stated later that the harmonious beauty of the classic language was at first the chief attraction and that he was to discover, “under the cortex,” the fruit, the moral value, only some years later. But then the conviction that the classics could be the basic element of Christian perfection became firm and ineradicable in his mind. During those years in Bologna, literature, especially poetry, was his chief love, and that stay was above all decisive in his formation as a poet in the vernacular. He encountered the poetry of Guido Guinizelli (1230?–76) and Cino da Pistoia (c. 1270–1337) and probably began to write poems in Italian. His father's death (1326) marked the end of young Petrarch's life of intimate literary friendships in a prosperous, cultured, and peaceful town. Upon his return to Avignon he abandoned any thought of a legal career and for some years spent his time in fashionable ease, writing verses, meeting people, and taking an excessive care of his own appearance in an effort to attract attention. In 1327 he met a young woman, Laura, who became his lifelong love. His affection was unreciprocated but endured as a dream-fantasy to be ceaselessly relived in poetry.

Abandonment of Neoplatonism. Realizing the need to order his life, Petrarch became a cleric and probably took minor orders in 1330. Perhaps he thus sought refuge from unhappy love; perhaps he thought that a dream-love was not incompatible with a clerical status. At any rate, he shared for a time the view of the poets of the dolce stil nuovo that beauty and love lead to perfection. At a certain point, however, he fully realized that love can be an estrangement from God and not a ladder to Heaven. With deep Christian awareness he refuted the neoplatonic, pagan theories of the dolce stil nuovo poets in his Secretum (1342), yet he was not able, at that time, to free himself from the passion that had so affected him. Finally, after Laura's death in the plague of 1348, he was reluctant to dismiss thoughts then tempered with a deep sense of remorse and repentance and a sincere longing for God's mercy. Laura had become the symbol of the fascination of the beauties of the world and at the same time a challenge God had given him to prove his soul.

Petrarch entered the service of Cardinal Giovanni Colonna, serving as a household chaplain until 1337 and later enjoying the cardinal's friendship and generous patronage. He traveled widely, searching for books in monastic libraries; in Liège, for instance, he found copies of two orations of Cicero. About 1333 Petrarch had become a friend of the Augustinian monk Dionigi da San Sepolcro, the man who probably most deeply influenced his life. Dionigi gave him a miniature copy of the Confessions of St. Augustine, which he carried about with him until his death. The Augustinian, a man of vast erudition and deep piety, probably encouraged Petrarch in his love for classical literature. Petrarch had discovered by himself, however, the sterility of late scholastic culture. In contrast to the syllogisms and the garrulous arguments of scholastic dialecticians, the works of the ancients appeared to him to be full of concrete examples of humanity, virtue, and human dignity. The beauty and elegance of classical literature became for him synonymous with humanitas—moral value, illumination. A list made by the poet himself (1333) of *libri mei peculiare*s shows clearly that the works of Cicero, Vergil, and Horace, together with those of St. Augustine and St. Jerome, were, to the complete exclusion of any scholastic book, his preferred reading.

Francesco Petrarch. (© Michael Nicholson/CORBIS)

Espousal of the Classics. The Christian world of Petrarch's epoch was in a state of degenerate turmoil: war, superstition, ignorance, violent outbreaks of extreme mysticism, heresy, despair, rebellion, and brutal materialism were rampant. The papacy itself was wholly absorbed in secular matters. To Petrarch this sad state of affairs was related to the disappearance of the classical heritage, the advent of Aristotelian scholasticism, the corruption of taste, the spread of atheistic naturalism, the forgetfulness of the great ancient examples of virtue, magnanimity, and human dignity. Against the culture of the "schools" and the prevailing Aristotelianism, the study of the great classical works appeared to him to be the only means to restore spiritual values in the world. These classical studies were to be called litterae humanae, a school for being humane, but certainly they did not imply any rejection of religious beliefs or attitudes; they rested on the assumption, and indeed on the explicit statements (clearest and most uncompromising in Petrarch himself), that the effort to perfect what is humanly most noble is acceptable to God and a way to perfection. It is known, however, that anti-Christian attitudes were to be found, in fact, only in those writers and scientists who did not accept or who rejected the culture of litterae humanae, men such as Leonardo da Vinci, Pulci, Pomponazzi, and MACHIAVELLI.

15th-century Florentine manuscript illumination of "The Triumph of Death," from Petrarch's "Rime i Trionfi."
(©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

A good part of Petrarch's work could form a treatise or an anthology on the theme "Christianity and Culture," pointing out the indispensable connection between the two. If his familiarity with and appreciation of Cicero's work were so great that he inevitably felt resounding in his own conscience the warning that St. Jerome had once heard, "tu es ciceronianus," his answer was as assured and as sincere: he was and intended to remain a Christian; he was a Ciceronian in the sense that "Cicero himself would have been a Christian had he known Christ" (De sui ipsius ignorantia). With the same confidence and with an honesty that should forestall speculation about his personal failures, he proclaimed: "licet peccator, certe christianus sum" (ibid.).

Petrarch is too frequently thought of merely as the author of love sonnets and the founder of modern lyricism. He was both, but far more important, he was one of the authors who have exercised the deepest influence on the culture of the Christian world. As a matter of fact, there resulted from this renewed contact with the Ancients a new Christian attitude divorced from despair, anxiety, and dialectical subtleties, and based upon confidence in nature and in human forces. His work revealed the Christian vision that not only inspired most of the literature and art of the Renaissance but also led to the martyrdom of St. Thomas MORE, supported the action of St. IGNATIUS LOYOLA, opened the way to the recovery of the great teaching of St. Thomas, and resulted in the vast Catholic synthesis that the Council of TRENT was to codify. He was really a teacher to Christian Europe.

A New Christian Vision. Economic and political forces that gave birth to what has been called the essor of Europe were obviously independent of Petrarch and were at work long before him. Indeed, many elements of the civilization of the 15th and 16th centuries were unaffected by Petrarch's humanism or even ran counter to it. The world of politics with its violence and restless ambitions, the world of Cesare Borgia and of the other condottieri, for instance, were untouched by Petrarch's ideals of virtue and piety. It was, in brief, the world of the Counter-Renaissance. But the moral and religious ideas, together with the artistic and literary ideals of the epoch, had their source for the most part in the work of Petrarch. Probably in no other instance can a new epoch of the Christian world be traced so distinctly to the work of one man. Further, Petrarch's own spiritual career was most coherent. He has been described as a man continually in doubt, divided between his attachment to the old faith of the Middle Ages and to the new secularism of the Renaissance. The facts are quite different. On the one hand, Petrarch rejected the Middle Ages, judging them to be a period in which religion had been adulterated, especially in the preceding century, by dialecticism, Arab naturalism, heresy, and superstition—in a word, immanitas. On the other hand, Petrarch did not hide, either from himself or others, his own failures: his fondness for poetry, human beauty, and glory. He spoke at length of his ardors, of his vanity, of his real passion for Laura. His major Latin work, the Secretum, is a sincere, soul-searching, courageous, and public confession of his folly. But it is not simply an ascetic work. To St. Augustine, who, in the imaginary dialogues reported in the Secretum, urges him to think on death and the salvation of his soul and to renounce the vanities of the world, he confesses the weakness of his will but goes on to express his hope that even amidst the occupations and errors of the world one may find a way to God. Too often overlooked by critics, this humanistic conclusion contains the true meaning and value of the Secretum; it is the definitive expression of Petrarch's vision.

Petrarch wrote the Secretum about 1342, after his brother Gherardo had become a Carthusian monk, as a kind of justification of his decision not to follow his brother's steps. The opinion that it was written in a period of asceticism following a spiritual crisis does not correspond to the character of the work. Moreover, the letter in which the poet gave an allegorical description of the ascent of Mont Ventoux in France, made by Gherardo and himself in 1336, expresses the same thought.

Previously, in his early 30s, Petrarch had written many sonnets and canzoni, in which substantially he was still faithful to the manner of the stilnovist poets, writing verse as a manifestation of literary skill and praising the ennobling influence of his lady. But his deepening familiarity with the ancient poets, chiefly Propertius, soon turned him from the abstractions of the dolce stil nuovo and taught him to speak of his real experiences, of the aspects of nature, of a true woman. At the same time he realized how delusive were the neoplatonistic views about love as a ladder to perfection. The beauty of the world and of women, he recognized, was all too prone to divert one from God. He was not able to free himself from a passion that, despite the fact that it was not returned, had become extremely ardent. Yet he was willing to accept the test that was given him for his soul's sake. He lived this experience with the full awareness of its limits and its dangers, through moments of abandon and deep feelings of repentance, finding himself in a state of mundane ecstasy and then awakening to the sense of his failure and his misery, with "shame being the fruit of his raving." Petrarch's attitude, therefore, reflected a true Christian concept of love: something made of acceptance and penance, joy and sadness, entirely distant both from the fearful condemnations of medieval asceticism and from the pagan idealizations of the poets of the 13th century. His sonnets are full of expressions of pain caused by the unresponsiveness of Laura. But other poems that reveal his feeling of shame are filled with deep sorrow and fervent prayer to Christ to be delivered from his bondage.

It is this alternation of moments of weakness and moments of repentance, an essential characteristic of a Christian life, that is the substance of Petrarch's poetry. After the death of Laura in 1348, he continued to think of and to write poems about her. Some part of his soul was linked to the memory of his beloved, and he did not want or was not able to heal the wound that was for him a reminder of his weakness and of his need for God's help. He had begun to make collections of his poems in Italian. They were to him, then, only "fragments in the vernacular." After Laura's death, however, he began to regard them as fragments of his own soul and decided to divide them into Rime in vita and Rime in morte (for Laura, after her death). He finally assembled 366 of them to signify that all the days of his life were there gathered. He included among them poems about politics and other matters: Il Canzoniere, as the work was later called, was to be the testimony of his whole life. It begins with an introductory sonnet that summarizes the entire story and concludes with the Canzone alla Vergine, probably the most sublime poem ever dedicated to the Virgin Mary. It is on the whole his "confession," a revelation of his life that is pervaded with the final sense of misery, repentance, and hope.

Writing in Latin. Petrarch labored at this work to the last days of his life. From the beginning, however, Petrarch's creative work in Italian had been accompanied by, and had even given place for long periods to, an extraordinary amount of work in Latin. When he realized (c. 1337) the insidiousness of the courtly theories on love and had read Le Roman de la Rose, he wrote a Triumphus Cupidinis in Italian to show, in contrast with the French work, the slavery and the misery caused by love. Later he added other Triumphs: those of Pudicitiae, Mortis, Famae, Temporis, and Aeternitatis. He worked on these separate parts until his last years. But he was never completely satisfied with it, realizing that he had not succeeded in composing an organic, wholly inspired work.

Petrarch gathered a great number of letters in various collections: Familiares (24 books), Seniles (17 books), and Sine nomine. Two other collections were assembled posthumously: Variae and Miscellaneae. In 1337 Petrarch started a vast work, De viris illustribus, on which he labored intermittently until his last years. It was to be a collection of biographies, mainly of Roman heroes. By 1343, Petrarch had written 23; later he added other biographies, devoting extended treatment to Scipio and Caesar. Scipio was also chosen as the protagonist of the epic Latin poem Africa, the most ambitious of all of Petrarch's works. The inspiration came from the very core of the humanistic vision of the poet. Dealing with the war between Rome and Carthage, the pious Scipio and the dire Hannibal, Africa was to exalt the humanitas of Rome and its providential mission: the work was intended to evoke for Italy and the world the great pre-Christian values of the Roman world.

Petrarch began Africa in 1338–39, pinning his hopes for literary immortality on it. In 1341, thanks to the fame he had already achieved but not without solicitation on his part, he was given the laurel crown at the Roman Capitol. Africa, however, remained unfinished and Petrarch was not satisfied with what he did complete: he realized that he had not transfused the subject matter with a vivifying historical imagination. The poem reflected only a part of Petrarch's larger dream that Rome, the city, would be restored to its ancient glory and that the spirit of Roman civilization would renew the world. In this hope Petrarch supported the attempt of Cola di Rienzo to found a free Roman republic in 1347. He heard the news of the successful revolution with deep excitement, immediately wrote several letters in Cola's behalf and others to offer him his services. He was profoundly distressed at Cola's failure. Other political events won Petrarch's interest and intervention. Several passionate poems included in the Canzoniere, many poems in Latin (Epistolae metricae), and a great number of letters manifest his moral and religious concern with the problems of the time and his effort to mediate for peace. As it had for Dante, religion for Petrarch entailed concern for the political and moral condition of the world; yet there was nothing in Petrarch of the eschatological, prophetic element so characteristic of the author of the Divina Commedia. Yet this fact does not mean that Petrarch's faith was less profound.

One of Petrarch's last important works was Invectiva de sui ipsius ignorantia (1367), an answer to the charge made by four young Venetian Averroists that he was a "good but uneducated man." He admitted his ignorance of science and natural philosophy but opposed to such knowledge his ceaseless search for the moral and religious wisdom necessary to the soul. The treatise typically exalted humanistic studies in opposition to science and natural philosophy and opposed Augustine and Cicero to Aristotle and Averroës. It was Petrarch's last and most vigorous battle against naturalism in defense of classical learning and Christian values, a superb example of what is called littérature engagée.

His Achievement. Yet Petrarch did not subordinate poetry to politics or ethics. The remarkable characteristic of his personality is that contrasting attitudes somehow found in him an extraordinary fusion and harmony. He had not only St. Augustine's sense of human misery and of the transience of life but also his deep consciousness of personal failure; together with these there were the clarity and reasonableness, the sense of human relationship of Cicero. He was perhaps as great a thinker, writer, and promoter of ideas as either ERASMUS or MONTAIGNE. More original than they, he was one of the most delicate and elegant poets of world literature. Petrarch gave to European poetry themes, movements, expressions, and above all, examples of classic style that were to be imitated for centuries in Spain, France, and England, as well as Italy.

From both the theoretical and the practical points of view, Petrarch's work also marked one of the most decisive evolutions in the history of aesthetics and taste. With it one passes from the aesthetic ideals of the Middle Ages, with their search for complication, artfulness, and subtlety, to the aspirations for simple elegance and naturalness. The Gothic yielded to classicism. Even for Dante, some few decades before, poetry was still "something made with rhetoric and music"; beauty consisted in correspondence of sounds and was the result of art, technique, the use of rules. For Petrarch, beauty resided in measure, purity, and simplicity. Art gave way to imitation; Petrarch completely rejected the artes, the colors, the figures, alliterations, and metrical complexities that had been the characteristics of Gothic literature, and he exalted constant familiarity with the great authors, the assimilation of their taste, the imitation of their direct example. Poetry became the "remembrance of experienced things." It was a very definite shift and one of which he was fully aware. From it also stemmed Petrarch's detachment from Dante, which has too often been explained by historians on the grounds of Petrarch's jealousy and weakness of character. His letters constantly return to the great theme of imitation. Classicism, the essence of the new artistic and literary civilization, had in Petrarch's Canzoniere and the theoretical statements of the Epistolae its clear, unmistakable foundation.

Other works of Petrarch were: De otio religiosorum, De remediis utriusque fortunae, De vita solitaria, Invectivae, Rerum memorandarum libri, and Psalmi penitentiales.

Bibliography: Editions. Latin works (Basel 1496); complete ed. J. HEROLD (Basel 1554); Scritti inediti di F. P., ed. A. HORTIS (Trieste 1874); Africa, critical ed. N. FESTA (Edizione nazionale 1; Florence 1926); Le familiari, critical ed. V. ROSSI and U. BOSCO, 4 v. (ibid. 10–13; 1933–42); Rerum memorandarum libri, ed. G. BILLANOVICH (ibid. 14; 1945); Epistolae e metricae, v.2–3 of Poemata minora, ed. D. ROSSETTI, 3 v. (Milan 1829–34); Bucolicum carmen, ed. A. AVENA (Padua 1906); Sine nomine, critical ed. P. PIUR, Petrarchas 'Buch ohne Namen' und die päpstliche Kurie (Halle 1925); De otio religioso, ed. G. ROTONDI (Studi e Testi 195; 1958); Invectivae, ed. P. G. RICCI (Rome 1950); Rime, Trionfi, e poesie latine, ed. F. NERI et al. (Milan 1951); Prose, ed. G. MARTELOTTI et al. (Milan 1955), includes Secretum, De vita solitaria, Invectivae, etc.; The Sonnets, Triumphs and Other Poems, ed. T. CAMPBELL (London 1859; repr. at various dates); Some Love Songs, ed. and tr. W. D. FOULKE (London 1915); Sonnets, tr. J. AUSLANDER (London 1931); Secret, tr. W. H. DRAPER (London 1911); Sonnets and Songs, tr. A. M. ASCOLI (Armi, pseud.) (New York 1946); The Life of Solitude (De vita solitaria), ed. and tr. J. ZEITLIN (Urbana, IL 1924); On His Own Ignorance and That of Many Others (De sui ipsius et multorum ignorantia), tr. H. NACHOD in The Renaissance of Man, ed. E. CASSIRER et al. (Chicago 1948); The Triumphs, tr. E. H. WILKINS (Chicago 1962); Petrarch, the First Modern Scholar and Man of Letters: A Selection of His Correspondence with Boccaccio and Other Friends, ed. and tr. J. H. ROBINSON and H. W. ROLFE, 2d ed. (New York 1914). Studies. Studi petrarcheschi (Bologna 1948-). A. SOLERTI, Le vite di Dante, Petrarca e Boccaccio: Scritte fino al sec. XVI (Milan 1904). R. SABBADINI, Le scoperte dei codici latini e greci ne' secoli XIV e XV (Florence 1905). P. DE NOLHAC, Pétrarque et l'humanisme, 2 v. (new ed. Paris 1907). A. FORESTI, Aneddoti della vita di F. P. (Brescia 1928). C. CALCATERA, Nella selva del Petrarca (Bologna 1942). U. BOSCO, "Il P. e l'umanesimo filologico," Giornale Storico della Letteratura Italiana 120 (1943) 65-119. G. BILLANOVICH, Petrarca letterato, v.1, Lo scrittoio del P. (Rome 1947). E. H. WILKINS, The Making of the "Canzoniere" and Other Petrarchian Studies (Rome 1951); Studies in the Life and Works of Petrarch (Cambridge, MA 1955); The Life of Petrarch (Chicago 1961). M. BISHOP, Petrarch and His World (Bloomington, Ind. 1963). G. TOFFANIN, History of Humanism, tr. E. GIANTURCO (New York 1954). É. H. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (New York 1955). G. MARTELOTTI, "Linee di sviluppo dell'umanesimo petrarchesco," Studi petrarcheschi 2 (1949) 51-81. P. O. KRISTELLER, Renaissance Thought (New York 1961). R. R. BOLGAR, The Classical Heritage and Its Beneficiaries (Cambridge, England 1954). F. DE SANCTIS, Saggio critico sul P., new ed. B. CROCE (Naples 1907). H. HAUVETTE, Les Poésies lyriques de P. (Paris 1931). G. DE ROBERTIS, Studi (Florence 1944). U. BOSCO, Francesco Petrarca (2d ed. Bari 1961). R. MONTANO, L'estetica del Rinascimento e del Barocco (Naples 1962). J. VIANEY, Le Pétrarquisme en France au XVI^e siècle (Montpellier 1909). H. K. HASSELKUUS, Der Petrarkismus in der Sprache der englischen Sonnettdichter der Renaissance (Barmen 1927). A. MEOZZI, Il petrarchismo europeo (secolo XVI) (Pisa 1934). C. CALCATERA, "P. e il petrarchismo," in Problemi ed orientamenti critici di lingua e di letteratura italiana, ed. A. MOMIGLIANO, 5 v. (Milan 1948-59) 3:167-273. L. BALDACCI, Il petrarchismo italiano nel Cinquecento (Milan 1957). J. G. FUCILLA, Estudios sobre el petrarquismo en España (Madrid 1960). C. TRINKAUS, In Our Image and Likeness (Chicago 1970). C. TRINKAUS, The Poet as Philosopher (New Haven 1979). R. WITT, In the Footsteps of the Ancients (Leiden 2000). M. O'ROURKE BOYLE, Petrarch's Genius (Berkeley 1991).

[R. MONTANO]

PETRE

Family resident in Essex since 1539, with houses in Ingatestone and vicinity. Its members figured prominently in post-Reformation Catholic history; their wealth financed religious institutions; and their homes served as centers of Catholic life. They intermarried with many influential Catholic families; the title of Baron Petre of Writtle was granted in 1603.

Sir William, lawyer and civil servant; b. Tor Newton, Devonshire, 1505?; d. Ingatestone, Essex, Jan. 13, 1572. He was a pliable tool in carrying out the widely fluctuating policies of four sovereigns, and he also successfully established his own family fortunes. Sir William's sympathies probably remained Catholic, but were not put to the test; his son John, first Lord Petre, conformed at least externally.

Sir William Petre.

William, third son of William, second Lord Petre; b. Ingatestone, Essex, July 28, 1602; d. Stanford Rivers, Essex, 1677. He started the Petre line of Bellhouse. His father had financed the Jesuits in East Anglia, and he himself translated Pedro de Ribadeneira's Flos Sanctorum in 1669. Two daughters and six granddaughters became nuns and two grandsons were priests.

William, fourth Lord Petre, nephew of William Petre; b. Essex, 1627; d. London, Jan. 5, 1684. He suffered much with great constancy for his religion, both financially under the Commonwealth and by imprisonment at the time of the OATES PLOT (1678). Accused of having received from the Jesuit general a commission as "lieutenant-general in the popish army," he was imprisoned in the Tower, where he died. A letter written by him to the King shortly before his death aroused public sympathy for the persecuted Catholics.

Sir Edward, SJ, confessor of James II; b. London, 1631; d. Watten, France, May 15, 1699. Cousin of the Petres of Ingatestone, Edward, of Cranham, England, entered the Jesuits in 1652. In England at the time of the Oates Plot (1678), Edward succeeded to his brother's title (1679) but was jailed in 1680 and 1683. Afterward, as Jesuit vice provincial, he was chosen by James II to be head of the chapel royal. The King, perhaps seeking to make amends for the Jesuits martyred in 1678 and, like most Catholics, overestimating his power to reverse the course of religious history, sought to have Petre made a cardinal; but Pope Innocent XI refused. When James nominated him privy councilor his enemies accused him of being bewitched by the Jesuits. Father Petre fled to the Continent in 1688.

Benjamin, bishop, vicar apostolic; b. Fithlers, Essex, Aug. 10, 1672; d. there, Dec. 22, 1758. Benjamin was educated and ordained at Douai. Largely because of his family wealth he was consecrated (1721), very unwillingly, coadjutor with right of succession to Bp. Bonaventure Giffard. After succeeding as vicar apostolic of the London district in 1734, he continually sought to resign, and at his insistence Richard CHALLONER was appointed coadjutor, whereupon Petre retired to his family estate.

Bibliography: Essex Recusant (Brentwood, Eng. 1959–) passim. F. G. EMMISON, Tudor Secretary: Sir William Petre at Court and Home (Cambridge, Mass. 1961). M. D. PETRE, The 9th Lord Petre . . . (London 1928). T. COOPER et al., The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900; repr. with corrections, 21 v., 1908–09, 1921–22, 1938) 15:976–983.

[D. SHANAHAN]

PETRE, MAUDE DOMINICA

Modernist, theological writer; b. Essex, Aug. 4, 1863; d. London, Dec. 16, 1942. Descended from a titled recusant family, Petre was the daughter of Arthur Petre (whose own father was the 13th Lord Petre) and Lady Catherine Howard, a convert to the Catholic faith. At age 22, Petre, with the encouragement of a Jesuit advisor, went to Rome to study scholastic thought under private tutelage. In 1890 she entered the Society of the Daughters of the Heart of Mary in London. She held several leadership positions in the community, but was refused permission to renew her vows in 1907 over a dispute concerning her book Catholicism and Independence, which had appeared the same year.

Petre befriended many of the major figures involved in the MODERNIST controversy: Friedrich von HÜGEL, Alfred LOISY, and most notably George TYRRELL. When Tyrrell became mortally ill shortly after his expulsion from the Society of Jesus, he moved to a cottage on Petre's property, and it was there that he died in 1909. A prolific writer of articles on literature and philosophy, Petre authored over a dozen books, including the Autobiography and Life of George Tyrrell (1912); Modernism: Its Failure and Its Fruits (1918); the autobiographical My Way of Faith (1937); Von Hügel and Tyrrell: The Story of a Friendship (1937); and Alfred Loisy: His Religious Significance (1944). The major female figure involved in Modernism, her approach to the movement at times mingled approval with a critical perspective.

Petre served as a nurse in France in World War I, and as a fire warden in London during the Blitz. She frequently spoke out on social and spiritual issues, and was a strong proponent of the League of Nations. She died at her home in London in 1942. A requiem funeral Mass was accorded her at her Kensington parish in the diocese of Westminster. She was buried, however, at Storrington in the diocese of Southward, and no priest was permitted to be in official attendance at the graveside services.

Bibliography: C. F. CREWS, English Catholic Modernism: Maude Petre's Way of Faith (Notre Dame 1984). E. LEONARD, Unresting Transformation: The Theology and Spirituality of Maude Petre (Lanham, Md. 1991)

[C. F. CREWS]

PETRI, OLAUS

Principal Swedish reformer under Gustavus Vasa; b. Örebro, Diocese of Strengnäs, Jan. 6, 1493; d. Stockholm, April 19, 1552. Petri received his preparatory education in Strngnäs's Carmelite school and his advanced education at Wittenberg (1516–18). Upon returning to Strengnäs in late 1518, he was ordained by and became secretary to Bp. Mattias Gregorii. Petri won to his cause Laurentius Andreae, Sweden's great church politician and chancellor of the king's privy council, who, in turn, converted King Gustavus Vasa to LUTHERANISM.

Olaus Petri was a gifted theologian, a great popular preacher, and an able writer. He was not a fighter like LUTHER, but more a man of peace and seriousness. He had a genius for absorbing materials from Luther or other reformers (for example, the Ratschlag of Osiander of 1524) and reworking them into literature adapted to his countrymen. While his work was not original, neither was it slavish translation. Petri published his doctrinal tract An Useful Teaching and had translated the New Testament into Swedish by 1526, but his greatest contribution was made in 1527 to 1528 when in the Lutheran-Catholic disputes he stressed that Sweden had strayed from the Christian church established by English missionaries, which he now aimed to restore. His writings covered the sacraments, marriage, monastic life, the primacy of God's Word and other fields. As a result of these efforts, the Diet of Västerås (1527) voted to break with Rome and introduce reforms. At the Council of Örebro (1529), Chancellor Andreae paved the way for a "Reformed Church" as proposed by Olaus and his younger brother Laurentius, then archbishop of Uppsala.

The period of 1529 to 1531 was productive of liturgical and homiletical writings for use in the emerging Lutheran Church: a Manual of Service (1529), Hymn Book (1530), Catechism (1530), and a Swedish form of The Mass (1531) modeled upon German forms in Wittenberg and elsewhere. The Petri brothers collaborated further in the translation of the Swedish Bible published in 1541. By the 1544 Diet of Västerås most of the Catholic usages had disappeared, and by 1552 Sweden was definitely Lutheran. Olaus engaged in a series of disputes with Gustavus Vasa over the position of the Church within the State. The Petri brothers also opposed any efforts at reconciliation with Rome during the early years of the Council of Trent. Gustavus honored Petri by placing him in charge of the Ecclesia Stockholmensis, supervising all churches in addition to his own church, St. Nicholas, where he had been pastor for more than 20 years.

Bibliography: O. PETRI, Samlade skrifter, ed. B. HESSELMAN, 4 v. (Uppsala 1914–18). C. J. I. BERGENDOFF, Olavus Petri and the Ecclesiastical Transformation in Sweden (New York 1928). W. GÖBBEL, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 5:246. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 8:326.

[E. G. SCHWIEBERT]

PETRILLI, SAVINA, BL.

Foundress of the Sisters of the Poor of Saint Catherine of Siena; b. Aug. 29, 1851, Siena, Italy; d. there April 18, 1923. At the age of ten, Savina was introduced to and inspired by the life of Saint CATHERINE OF SIENA and the saint's eucharistic devotion. Her family, the parish Children of Mary Sodality, and her pastor all nourished her spirituality and encouraged her generosity toward the poor. During an audience with Pope Pius IX (1869), she was told to follow Saint Catherine. In 1873, she requested permission from the archbishop of Siena to found a religious order. He instructed her to draw up the Rule. With three friends Savina founded (1874) a small group to care for the poor, beginning in a small apartment with an abandoned baby. Mother Savina continued working with the Sisters of the Poor of Saint Catherine of Siena, approved by the Holy See in 1875, until her death from cancer. The order spread to India, Italy, the Philippines, and Latin America. She was beatified by Pope John Paul II on April 24, 1988.

Feast: April 18.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1988): 583. L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 16 (1988): 12.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

PETROBRUSIANS

The followers of PETER OF BRUYS, who were widely spread throughout southern France during the first half of the 12th century. Their views concerning hierarchy, Sacraments, and ecclesiastical observances were typical 12th-century protests that deteriorated into heresy. Peter of Bruys's contemporary, the monk HENRY OF LAUSANNE, spent most of his career in France, first in Le Mans, where his insistence on evangelical life spent in penance and poverty finally persuaded Bp. HILDEBERT OF LAVARDIN to expel him. In the south he accepted the teachings of Peter of Bruys, which, according to PETER THE VENERABLE, he modified and elaborated (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne 189:723A). Although he did not at first hold the cross in horror as did Peter, he too developed an antisacerdotal and antisacramental aspect in his teaching. Henricians were accordingly identified with Petrobrusians. There is no evidence that they prepared the way for the WALDENSIANS. More probable is their indebtedness to the MANICHAEAN current (as Vacandard and Döllinger once suggested). Support for such a connection has been deduced from a passage in the Exordium magnum Cisterciense 17 (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne 185:427C), where BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, on his way to refute the Henrician heresy, is described as setting out for Toulouse "to confute the heresy of the Manichaeans." But this work was written c. 1210 in the full tide of ALBIGENSIAN influence, when no careful distinctions were drawn. Furthermore, in place of subscribing to thoroughgoing DUALISM, the Petrobrusians did not reject marriage, though they urged continence. They denied only infant Baptism. The Second LATERAN Council (1139) condemned some Petrobrusian ideas but not the movement itself. Canon 22 (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer 718), reproducing word for word canon three of the Council of Toulouse (1119; see J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 21:226), dwells on the denial of the Eucharist and the rejection of infant Baptism and of the priesthood, but the repudiation of Matrimony attributed to them belongs probably to other sects.

Bibliography: R. MANSELLI, Studi sulle eresie del secolo XII (Studi storici 5; Rome 1953) 1–23. E. VACANDARD, "Les Origines de l'hérésie albigeoise," Revue des Questions Historiques 55 (Paris 1894) 50–83; Vie de Saint Bernard (4th ed. Paris 1910). F. VERNET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 6.2:2178–83. J. J. I. VON DÖLLINGER, Belträge zur Sektengeschichte des Mittelalters, 2 v. in 1 (Munich 1890) 1:75–97.

[E. W. MCDONNELL]

PETRONAX OF BRESCIA, ST.

Refounder and abbot of Monte Cassino; b. Brescia, Italy, c. 670; d. May 6, 750. Petronax went to the tomb of St. BENEDICT in 718 on the advice of Pope GREGORY

II. Among the ruins of MONTE CASSINO, destroyed in 581 by Lombards, he found a few solitaries with whom he remained. They elected him their superior, and their numbers grew. With the assistance of prominent nobles and three popes (among them Pope ZACHARY, who gave him [742] the autograph copy of the BENEDICTINE RULE), he succeeded in rebuilding Monte Cassino. In 729 St. WILIBALD, an English monk who was afterward bishop of Eichstätt, arrived at Monte Cassino, where he remained for ten years as Petronax's disciple. Willibald's biographer (Acta Sanctorum July 7:509–510) credits him, rather than Petronax, with the restoration of genuine Benedictine observance, which he himself had experienced from his childhood in WALTHAM Abbey (Hampshire).

Feast: May 6.

Bibliography: H. LECLERQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 11.2:2461–65. J. CHAPMAN, "La Restauration du Mont-Chassin par l'abbé Petronax," Revue Bénédictine 21 (1904) 74–80.

[C. MCGRATH]

PETRONILLA, ST.

Probably third century, authentic Roman martyr. Since no certain acts of her martyrdom exist, it is impossible to determine the date of her death and the persecution in which she perished. The opinion that she died of a natural death, as stated in the Roman MARTYROLOGY, stems from the apocryphal Passion of Nereus and Achilles. Certain Gnostic writings quite probably led to the erroneous identification of the saint with the daughter of St. PETER THE APOSTLE. Petronilla's tomb, as marked in an itineraria of the seventh century, was located in the cemetery of St. Domitilla on the Via Ardeantina. A fresco of the fourth century depicts a holy woman entering heaven and bears the inscription "Petronilla martyr." During the pontificate of Pope SIRICIUS (384–399), a basilica was erected over the saint's tomb. Though G. B. de Rossi contested the allegation that Petronilla was a martyr, the opinion that she died for the faith has prevailed. In art Petronilla is represented as a little girl holding a palm and a book in her hand. She is a special patroness of France.

Feast: May 31.

Bibliography: A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:434. R. DALL'ARA, Petronilla e le altre: il mestolo dalla parte di lei (Mantua 1998).

[E. DAY]

PETRUS COLLIVACCINUS (BENEVENTANUS)

Canonist and cardinal; b. Benevento, of the noble family of the Collis Vaccini; d. Rome, Sept. 21, 1219 or 1220. He studied and taught canon law in Bologna, probably with Lothar of Segni, later Pope Innocent III, in the school of HUGUCCIO. He may have followed Lothar to Rome, where he appeared as early as 1205 as Capellanus Domini Pupae. In 1210 he was called by the pope himself subdiaconus et notarius noster. He is recorded as cardinal deacon of S. Maria in Aquiro from March 15, 1212, to March 7, 1216, and as cardinal priest of S. Lorenzo in Damaso from April 13, 1216, to March 1217; before April 19, 1217, Pope Hanorius III named him cardinal bishop of Sabina. As confidant of two popes he took part in various missions, of which the most important was the legation of 1214 and 1215 for the Albigenian territory. Another of his achievements was the compilation of the Compilatio III Antiqua. This compilation was commissioned by Innocent III in 1210; it arranged the decretals of the first 12 years of the pontificate of Innocent III in five books and was the first such collection officially given to school and forum. He was probably the author of the Summa Reginensis on the Decretum of Gratian (see GRATIAN, DECRETUM OF).

Bibliography: F. HEYER, "Über Petrus Collivaccinus von Benevent," Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung 6 (1916) 395–405. S. KUTTNER, Repertorium der kanonistik (Rome 1937) 355; Studi e Testi (Rome 1900—) 71. S. KUTTNER, "Bernardus Compostellanus Antiquus," Traditio 1 (1943) 30.1, n. 54. A. M. STICKLER, "Decrefisti Bolognesi dimenticati," Studia Gratiana 3 (1955) 375–410. A. TEETAERT, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 3:1000–02.

[A. M. STICKLER]

PETRUS DE CRUCE

Composer and theorist, active in Paris at the close of the 13th century (also called Pierre de la Croix). In 1298 King PHILIP IV requested a musical Office for St. Louis from a Petrus de Cruce of Amiens, who was probably the composer-theorist. Two motets, Au renouveler and Aucun one trouvé, are identified as his work by the 14th-century theorist Jacques de Liège. Of the writings ascribed to Petrus, only some excerpts preserved by the theorists Robert de Handlo and John Hanboys and a Tractatus de tonis remain. Even though the conservative De Liège lauded him as a model of the 13th-century ars antiqua, Petrus was in fact a bold innovator. Going beyond the rhythmic novelties of FRANCO OF COLOGNE, he increased the number of semibreves subdividing the breve from two or three, to from four to nine, and separated such groups of semibreves from one another by means of a dot of division, the punctus divisionis. By introducing note values (minims) smaller than the officially recognized semibreve, Petrus accorded his music an unparalleled rhythmic freedom. His innovations were transformed by 14th-century composers and theorists into the quatre prolations of the ars nova.

Bibliography: PETRUS DE CRUCE, Tractatus de tonis, H. COUSSEMAKER, Scriptorium de musica medii aevi nova series, 4 v. (Paris 1864–76) 282–292. G. REESE, Music in the Renaissance (rev. ed. New York 1959). W. APEL, The Notation of Polyphonic Music (4th, rev. ed. Cambridge, Mass. 1949) 318–324, 338, 369. PETRUS DE CRUCE, “Ambianensi Tractatus de tonis.” in Corpus scriptorum de musica, vol. 29, D. HARBISON, ed. (Rome 1976) vi–xxv. D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge 1996) 688. E. H. SANDERS, “Petrus de Cruce” in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, vol. 14, ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980) 598–599.

[E. R. LERNER]

PETRUS DE DACIA

Dominican, Swedish author; b. probably Gotland Island, c. 1235; d. Visby, 1289. Of Petrus’s early life nothing is known except that he entered the Dominican Order of the province of Dacia. Presumably he was educated in the Dominican monastery of Visby (founded 1228). In 1266 he was sent to the studium generale of the order in Cologne, and in 1269 he went to Paris, where he may have studied under THOMAS AQUINAS. Returning to Sweden in 1270, he became lector in the monastery of Skänninge; after a short time as prior of the Vüsterås monastery (1278–79), he was appointed lector in the monastery of Visby, becoming prior in 1284.

During his stay in Cologne, Petrus met the visionary virgin Christina of Stommeln, around whom had gathered a circle of followers. Petrus became one of her ardent admirers, and from Paris and later on from Sweden he carried on correspondence with her. Twice (1279, 1287) he journeyed to Stommeln to see her, and before his last visit he had written a Latin biography of her, the Vita Christinae Stumbelensis, which he brought with him, along with Christina’s letters to him. The whole correspondence, as well as Petrus’s biography of Christina, was copied in a manuscript (Cod. Juliacensis) that is now the chief source of knowledge of the idylle monacale, as E. RENAN named her. Petrus’s writings reveal him as a master of elevated prose style, a scholar with profound theological insight and knowledge, and a sensitive and sometimes mystical mind.

Bibliography: H. SCHÜCK, Vår Förste Författare (Stockholm 1916). Ny illustrerad svensk litteratur-historia, ed. E. N. TIGERSTEDT, 5 v. (Stockholm 1955–58) 1:143–150; bibliog. 380.

[T. D. OLSEN]

PETTAZZONI, RAFFAELE

Historian of religions; b. Persiceto, Italy, Feb. 3, 1883; d. Rome, Dec. 8, 1959. He was professor of the history of religions at Bologna (1914–23) and then at Rome (1923–53). In his early career he was concerned primarily with the scientific study of religion in specified areas and periods, as in his La religione nella Grecia antica fino ad Alessandro (Bologna 1921; 2d ed. 1953). Subsequently he developed an original phenomenologico-historical comparative method, which he exemplified in his ethnographical study La confessione dei peccati (3 v. Bologna 1929–36) and in his L’omniscienza di Dio (Turin 1955; tr. H. J. Rose, The All-Knowing God [London 1956]). The last study was the culmination of investigations of the primitive “high god,” which he had begun some 30 years earlier. Special mention should be made, too, of his Saggi di storia delle religioni e di mitologia (Rome 1946; tr. H. J. Rose, Essays on the History of Religions [Leiden 1954]). He was the founder and director of the journals Studi e Materiali di Storia delle Religioni (1925–54) and Numen (1954–59), and he was cofounder (1950) and president (1950–59) of the Association Internationale pour l’Histoire des Religions.

Bibliography: C. M. EDSMAN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 5:263–264. M. GANDINI, “Nota bibliografica degli scritti di R. Pettazzoni,” Studi e materiali di storia delle religioni 31 (1960) 3–21. A. BRELICH, “Discorso di commemorazione,” ibid. 191–202. V. VAN BULCK, Gregorianum 42 (1961) 797–800.

[G. SANDERS]

PEYTO (PETO), WILLIAM

English cardinal and Franciscan friar, a courageous figure at the time of the Reformation; b. Warwickshire, c. 1477; d. probably Greenwich, 1558. Presumably legitimate but of uncertain parentage, he was a relative of the Throckmorton family of Coughton, Warwickshire. He was educated at Oxford and Cambridge, and as a member of the Observant Franciscans (the Grey Friars), he acted as confessor to MARY TUDOR when she was a girl. On Easter Sunday, March 31, 1532, as head of the English province he preached a sermon before HENRY VIII condemning the proposed marriage to Anne Boleyn. The warden at Greenwich, Henry Elston, supported Peyto’s statement some weeks later. In consequence, both priests were imprisoned, and on their release in 1533 they immediately fled to Antwerp. Peyto, attained in 1539, spent 20 years on the Continent working with the COUNTER REFORMATION. In 1543 Paul III appointed him bishop of Salisbury, but he later resigned from this purely nominal position. After the accession of Mary, he returned to England and lived quietly in the restored friary at Greenwich. When Paul IV recalled Cardinal Reginald POLE from England, he appointed Peyto to succeed him as cardinal and legate (June 1557) despite the friar's plea that he was too old and otherwise unsuitable.

Bibliography: M. HAILE, The Life of Reginald Pole (New York 1910). D. KNOWLES, The Religious Orders in England, 3 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1948–60) v. 3. L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages, 40 v. (London–St. Louis 1938–61) v. 14. J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time, 5 v. (London–New York 1885–1902; repr. New York 1961) 5:300–303. J. GAIRDNER, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900; repr. with corrections, 21 v., 1908–09, 1921–22, 1938; suppl. 1901–) 15:974–975.

[M. R. O'CONNELL]

PEYTON, PATRICK JOSEPH

The "Rosary Priest"; b. Carracastle, Attymass, County Mayo, Ireland, Jan. 9, 1909; d. San Pedro, California, June 3, 1992. One of nine children, Patrick Peyton grew up praying the rosary daily with his parents in their three-room cottage. In 1928 he emigrated to Scranton, Pennsylvania, where he worked as a janitor in St. Peter's Cathedral. Upon entering the Congregation of the Holy Cross, he studied at the University of Notre Dame. Diagnosed with incurable tuberculosis in 1939, he regained his health through faith and prayer and was ordained a priest on June 15, 1941. In January of 1942, Peyton decided that in gratitude for his recovery he would give the Blessed Mother ten million homes in which the Family Rosary would be prayed.

As the chaplain at Vincentian Institute High School (Albany, New York), Peyton preached the rosary at parishes throughout the eastern United States and Canada. In 1945, the Mutual Broadcasting Company permitted him to offer a radio program for Mother's Day that coincided with the national celebration of Victory in Europe Day. Two years later, he inaugurated the Family Theater (Hollywood, California), a national radio show featuring Loretta Young, Bing Crosby, and other stars of stage and screen. Airing weekly, it ran for 22 years. Peyton coined the slogan, "The family that prays together stays together." In the 1950s, Peyton sponsored several award-winning television programs. During 1956 and 1957 he produced 15 films on the life of Christ, each treating one mystery of the rosary. In 1973, he arranged the first satellite transmission to North America of the Christmas Midnight Mass at St. Peter's Basilica in Rome.

Peyton also established the Family Rosary Crusade (Albany, New York). Assisted by Holy Cross religious, he organized diocesan crusades, culminating in inspirational outdoor rallies. The first crusade was held in London, Ontario, in 1948. In 1952 Peyton assembled 75,000 people in New York City, 83,000 in London, England, and 150,000 in Melbourne, Australia. In 1960, he gathered 550,000 people in Santiago, Chile; in 1961, 500,000 in San Francisco; in 1962, one million people in Bogotá, Colombia; in 1964, two million in Sao Paolo, Brazil; and in 1985, two million in Manila, the Philippines. In all, Peyton spoke at rallies in more than 40 countries on 6 continents to approximately 27 million people. Peyton is buried at Stonehill College (North Easton, Massachusetts).

Bibliography: J.G. ARNOLD, A Man of Faith (Hollywood 1983). R.E. GRIBBLE, The History and Devotion of the Rosary (Huntington IN 1992). P. PETYON, The Ear of God (Garden City 1951); Rosary Prayer Book (Albany 1952); All For Her: The Autobiography of Father Patrick Peyton (Garden City 1967).

[R. KRIEG]

PFÄFERS, ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine abbey near the spa of Ragaz, St. Gall, Switzerland. It was founded c. 750 under the influence of St. PIRMIN and REICHENAU and became with CHUR and DISENTIS a spiritual center of Rhaetia. The free imperial abbey, under the protection of the Carolingian Lothair I by 840, came under the bishops of Constance (905), St. Gall (909), and Chur (920) before becoming independent (950). After an association with EINSIEDELN (c. 1000), Pfäfers was made exempt of the bishop of Basel (1116) during the investiture controversy, in which the abbey sided with the papacy. Territorially dependent on feudal lords in the 13th and 14th centuries, it came under the Swiss Confederation in 1482. Abbot Johann Jakob Russinger (1517–49) joined Zwingli but returned to Catholicism after the battle of Kappel (1531). Johann Heider (1586–1600) and Bonifaz Tschupp (1677–1706) headed revivals during which the baroque church was built (1694), but an economic and disciplinary decline led to suppression (1838). Since 1845 the abbey has been converted to use as a mental institution while the church serves a parish. From medieval times the abbey owned the spa Tamina-Ragaz.

Bibliography: H. WARTMANN, Das Kloster Pfäfers (St. Gallen 1883). M. GMÜR, Urbare und Rödel des Klosters Pfäfers (Bern 1910). L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:2271–72. R. HENGELER, “Der Untergang des Klosters Pfäfers,” Jahrbuch Heimatbund Sarganserland 1 (1930) 25–238; Professbuch der Benediktinerabteien Pfäfers, Rheinau und Fischingen (Einsiedeln 1933). E. ROTHENHÄSLER, ed., Die Kunstdenkmäler des Kantons St. Gallen, v.1 (Basel 1951). F. PERRET, Aus der Frühzeit der Abtei Pfäfers: Ein Kulturbild aus dem Ende des ersten Jahrtausends (St. Gallen 1958). O. L. KAPSNER, A Benedictine Bibliography: An Author-Subject Union List, 2 v. (2d ed. Collegeville, Minn. 1962) 2:249. I. MÜLLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:392–393.

[A. MAISSEN]

PFANNER, FRANZ

Trappist abbot, African missionary, religious founder; b. Langen, near Bregenz, Austria, Sept. 21, 1825; d. Emmaus, Natal, SOUTH AFRICA, May 24, 1909. After university studies in Innsbruck and Padua, Franz (whose baptismal name was Wendelin) studied for the priesthood (1846–50) and was ordained. He served in parish work at Haselstauden until 1859 when he became chaplain to the Sisters of Mercy in Zagreb. In 1863 he joined the TRAPPISTS at the priory of Mariawald, located in the Eifel region in the Diocese of Aachen. An attempt to expel him from the order (1867) because of a quarrel with the Trappist vicar-general was overruled by the Holy See. In 1869 Pfanner founded Mariastern in Bosnia and acted as its prior. In response to the appeal of Bp. James Ricards, Vicar Apostolic of the Eastern Districts of the Cape of Good Hope, before the Trappist general chapter (1879), Pfanner set out with 31 monks for South Africa, erected the priory of Dunbrody, and acted as its prior until 1882. Since this location was unsatisfactory, the community moved to Natal at the invitation of Bp. Charles Jolivet and began near Pinetown a priory called Mariannahill. In 1885 the priory became an abbey, with Pfanner as abbot. To further his missionary work among the Zulus he founded the MISSIONARY SISTERS OF THE PRECIOUS BLOOD and the MARIANNHILL MISSIONARIES. Under Pfanner's direction Mariannahill developed into the most important missionary center in South Africa, with 11 mission stations. Difficulties over the conflicting demands of the Trappist rule and evangelization led to Pfanner's suspension for a year as abbot (1892). Within that period he resigned and spent his remaining years laboring on the mission station at Emmaus, despite great suffering from arthritis.

Bibliography: B. HOFMANN, The Founder of Mariannahill (Dearborn, Mich. 1948), adapted from the Ger. B. HUSS, Mariannahill: Half a Century of African Mission Life (Detroit 1935). J. DAHM, Mariannahill (Mariannahill, Natal, S. Africa 1953). F. SCHIMLER, Mariannahill: A Study in Bantu Life and Missionary Effort (Mariannahill 1953); Against the Stream (Mariannahill 1949), w.

BROWN, The Catholic Church in South Africa from Its Origins to the Present Day (New York 1960). A. WILMOT, Life and Times of the Rt. Rev. James David Ricards (Cape Town 1908).

[J. E. BRADY]

PFEFFERKORN, IGNAZ

Jesuit missionary; b. Mannheim, Germany, July 31, 1725; d. date unknown. He entered the Society of Jesus on Oct. 21, 1742. In 1754 he received permission to go to the New World as a missionary. Late that year he arrived in Cádiz, where he waited until Dec. 25, 1755, before sailing for New Spain. He arrived in Veracruz on March 19, 1756 and after a few months in Mexico City was sent to the missions of Sonora. In late 1756 he was assigned to the mission of Atí among the Pima natives. For reasons of health he was transferred to Cucurpe among the Eudebes; he worked there until the expulsion of the Jesuits from the Spanish dominions in 1767. A prolonged journey under guard brought him and his companions back to Cádiz on July 12, 1769. Pfefferkorn, with several other Sonoran missionaries, was held prisoner in Spain because their knowledge of Spain's outlying possessions was considered potentially dangerous. He returned to his homeland in 1777 and spent his last years writing Beschreibung der Landschaft Sonora samt andern merkwürdigen Nachrichten von den inneren Theilen NeuSpaniens und Reise aus Amerika bis in Deutschland (2 v., Köln am Rheine, 1794–95). A projected third volume of this work was never published.

Bibliography: I. PFEFFERKORN, Sonora: A Description of the Province, tr. T. E. TREUTLEIN (Albuquerque 1949).

[F. B. WARREN]

PFEFFERKORN, JOHANNES

Controversial opponent of Jewish literature; b. Nuremberg, 1469; d. Cologne, 1524. A converted Jew, Pfefferkorn began a campaign to purge Germany of Jewish literature suspected of being subversive of Christianity. Supported by the Dominicans in Cologne, he secured a mandate from Emperor Maximilian I (1509) permitting the indiscriminate confiscation and destruction of Hebrew books. Protests, however, forced the emperor to seek opinions from theologians and private scholars, especially Johann REUCHLIN, humanist and renowned Hebraist. Reuchlin's courageous defense of many Hebrew writings prompted violent recriminations by Pfefferkorn, and a war of pamphlets ensued, Pfefferkorn and the original issue concerning questionable Jewish literature were dwarfed during the Reuchlin affair, which culminated in a widespread controversy between the conservative schoolmen of the universities and the humanists who defended the "new learning." As for Pfefferkorn, his reputation has since suffered considerably because of his fanaticism and the caricature of him in the popular writings of the humanists.

Bibliography: J. JANSSEN, History, of the German People at the Close of the Middle Ages, tr. M. A. MITCHELL and A. M. CHRISTIE, 17 v. (London 1896–1925) 3:48–52. F. ZOEPLF, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:416. J. MACKINNON, The Origins of the Reformation (New York 1939). J. LORTZ, Die Reformation in Deutschland, 2 v. (Freiburg 1941).

[J. T. COVERT]

PFLUG, JULIUS VON

Theologian and bishop; b. Eyra, near Leipzig, 1499; d. Zeitz, Sept. 3, 1564. His father, Caesar, had an important role in the Leipzig disputation of 1519 as councillor to Duke George of Saxony. Pflug's education, begun at Leipzig and continued later in Italy at Padua and Bologna, imbued him with humanistic ideals of reform but gave him little formal training in theology. The noted humanist Peter Mosellanus was his master at Leipzig. Later the two corresponded frequently. More than 100 of Pflug's letters are extant [M. C. G. Müller, Epistolae Petri Mosellani . . . ad Julium Pflugium (Leipzig 1802)]. Because of his temperament and reputation as a moderate, he was often invited to negotiate a conciliatory statement of doctrine acceptable to Lutherans and Catholics. At Regensburg in 1541, Gropper, ECK, and Pflug, the Catholic conferees, met with MELANCHTHON, BUCER, and Pistorius. The resulting formula of twofold justification, examined later at the insistence of Seripando by the Council of Trent, was rejected. Though Gropper and Pflug wanted to save the conference with another formula, however vague, it broke up over the question of the Eucharist.

In 1548 Pflug drew up the document that was to become the basis of the Interim of Augsburg (see INTERIMS). Many alterations were introduced in the course of the discussions, but the main outlines of the original draft were not changed. The dogmatic content, stated in the mildest and most general terms, is nonetheless basically Catholic. When the Elector Maurice of Saxony demanded further concessions for the Protestants of his jurisdiction, Pflug and Melanchthon worked out the Leipzig Interim (1548). Although Lutheran in tone, it was a compromise in that some externals of Catholicism were allowed. Pflug presided over the Colloquy of Worms in 1557 and won high praise from his friend Peter CANISIUS for his patience and tact.

Pflug was the last Catholic bishop of Naumburg. The cathedral chapter elected him in January 1541, but a year passed before Pflug, assured of imperial support, accepted the appointment. Meanwhile the Elector John Frederick forced Nikolaus von AMSDORF, an avowed Lutheran, into the see. Only after Emperor CHARLES V defeated the Elector at Mühlberg in 1547 was Pflug established in his diocese. Pflug tried to win people back to Catholic practices but without notable success. Forced by the realities of the situation, he sought approbation for married priests and Communion under both species for the laity. In 1559 Pflug was named president of a council of German bishops, formed with the encouragement of Peter Canisius, to promote local reform. Pflug was residing at the collegiate church in Zeitz when he died. No successor was named; the Elector Augustus expropriated the See of Naumburg for himself.

Bibliography: L. CHRISTIANI, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 12.1:1366–69. F. LAW, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 5:319. H. JEDIN, in Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:429–430. W. OFFELE, Ein Katechismus im Orient der Glaubenseinheit (Essen 1963).

[B. L. MARTHALER]

PFORTA, ABBEY OF

(Schulpforta, Porta), Cistercian abbey in Thuringia, Germany, Diocese of Naumburg; founded 1132; secularized 1540. In 1127 Count Bruno of Pleissengau founded, near Schmölln, a convent for nuns. They were replaced in 1132 by Benedictine monks, who were followed by Cistercians invited from Walkenried, Brunswick, by Bishop Udo of Naumburg. In 1137 the Cistercians moved to Pforta, a more favorable location. Within a century Pforta founded three other abbeys: LEUBUS (1163), Altzelle (1170), and Dünamünde (1208). Through model farms and advanced agricultural methods, Pforta contributed to the economic growth of medieval Thuringia. Under the pressure of the Protestant Duke Henry of Saxony, the abbey was secularized in 1540 and made a secondary school. As such, "Schulpforta" achieved a reputation for scholarly excellence; it is still a school. The early church, in transitional style, was built (1137–50) after French models, but has been preserved as remodeled in 13th-century Gothic.

Bibliography: W. HIRSCHFELD, Zisterzienserkloster Pforte (Burg, Ger. 1934). R. BÄUMER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 8:430.

[L. J. LEKAI]

PHANTASM

In its current acceptance, the term phantasm signifies a representation or apparition distinct from the ordinary reality of things and frequently subjective in character. In the latter case it is commonly attributed to the IMAGINATION. For Aristotle, φάντασμα means image (Anim. 432a 9), a representation similar to sensation (except that it is immaterial) and needed for the activity of the INTELLECT. Scholastics such as St. THOMAS AQUINAS define phantasm functionally as a likeness of a particular thing (Summa theologiae 1a, 84.7 ad 2). It is found at the level of the internal senses and constitutes an indispensable step in man's knowing process, where its principal role is to supply a representation of concrete reality from which the intellect extricates the essential meaning (C. gent. 2.77; Comp. theol. 1.83; Summa theologiae 1a, 84.7).

Explanation. Because the internal SENSES reach material reality only through the medium of the external senses, they generally (i.e., with the exception of the CENTRAL SENSE) need a representation of this reality to serve as the expression (species expressa) of their knowledge. When transmitting the integral object of their sensations to the internal senses, the external senses are unable to know the meaning or function of certain aspects of reality perceived by the COGITATIVE POWER (In three de anim. 3). Moreover, imagination and MEMORY store the impressions of the central sense and the cogitative power respectively (Summa theologiae 1a, 78.4), since the reality affecting all the senses changes continually. A representation of this reality as known by these three internal senses is thus required to complete their knowing activity. The need for the phantasm must therefore be admitted not only in the imagination, as many scholastics teach, but also in the cogitative power and memory, as St. Thomas expressly holds (C. gent. 2.73). Besides, since the species expressa is to represent the object as known, the latter two senses cannot elaborate their specific activity of knowing if they do not express this knowledge through a phantasm distinct from that of the imagination.

While phantasms, as expressed species, are representations of things other than themselves, they are realities of the organic order (In lib. de memor. 3), as are the cognitive powers that produce them. It is possible to detect their presence in particular areas of the brain by means of suitable techniques. Phantasms are subject to the physiological and psychological conditions of the internal senses and are liable to change with time (C. gent. 2.73); thus they can become weak and disappear.

Related Phenomena. While ILLUSION is primarily a sensory phenomenon of the external senses, to the extent that it implies a perceptual judgment concerning the data of SENSATION it also involves the internal senses. Imagination and memory can be active, particularly when there is interference of past experiences in the knowing process. The phantasms of these internal senses are joined to images directly brought on under the stimulus of actual sensations, and proportionately modify the whole as perceived and evaluated by the central sense and cogitative power. Such cases of illusion are limited because, in the wakened state, the imagination generally follows reason in preference to natural influences (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 172.1 ad 3). However, because susceptible to the disturbing action of these influences, imagination is justly regarded as a source of error, and much more so than the external senses (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 11.1 ad 3; De ver. 1.11). The typical illusion brought on by the imagination consists in presenting its phantasms to the consciousness of the subject with sufficient intensity to make it difficult to distinguish between things that are present and those that are merely representations of the imagination (Summa theologiae 1a, 17.2 ad 2).

Illusion consists principally in a distorted perception of a reality actually present to sensation. Hallucination, on the other hand, is produced by the interposition of an internal representation that is substituted, on the field of consciousness, for the perception of external reality. Its cause is the paroxysmal activity of the imagination's conserving and reproducing functions.

Following Aristotle, St. Thomas did not hesitate to attribute this hyperproduction of phantasms to biological factors—e.g., humoral circulation produces some phantasms (Summa theologiae 1a, 111.3)—or to the action of stupeficient substances (De ver. 13.1 ad 12). Devils also can bring on these apparitions (De malo 3.4).

The scholastic theory of phantasms is considerably elaborated with respect to dreams because of the related moral problems (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 154.5), and even more so because of the paranormal states involved in visions and prophecies (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 173.2, 3). A DREAM is essentially a product of phantasms appearing during sleep, while the senses are inhibited, so that the phantasms occupy almost exclusively what is left of the sleeper's consciousness. The causes of the production of these phantasms include everything that can act upon the imagination during sleep. St. Thomas draws up a systematic list (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 95.6): first, internal causes, including those of a psychic nature (previous evening's preoccupation persisting during sleep), and those of a corporal nature (sleeper's organic disposition—whence Aquinas notes the usefulness of the study of dreams by doctors); and then external causes, including those of a physical nature (ambient temperature), and those of a spiritual nature (God, through the ministry of angels, or even the devil). As the central sense frees itself of hypnogenetic inhibitions, the subject begins to make a distinction between phantasms and the reality affecting the senses, although this distinction remains imperfect so long as the central sense is not completely awakened (Summa theologiae 1a, 84.8 ad 2).

See Also: SPECIES, INTENTIONAL; KNOWLEDGE, PROCESS OF.

Bibliography: F. GAETANI and M. L. FALORNI, Enciclopedia filosofica 2:264–268. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30)2:434, 424–433. R. E. BRENNAN, Thomistic Psychology (New York 1952). F. A. WALSH, “Phantasm and Phantasy,” New Scholasticism 9 (1935) 116–133. T. M. BARTOLOMEI, “Le immagini,” Divus Thomas (Piacenza) 58 (1955) 124–142.

[A. M. PERREAULT]

PHARISEES

The predominant sect or religious party among the Jews in the time of Christ. After outlining their history and principal teachings, this article considers the NT references to them.

History and Teachings. The Pharisees were those who had “separated themselves” (Heb. perûšîm; Aram. perîšayyā from which comes the Gr. φαρισαῖοι) from others on the basis of ritual purity through minute observance of the Law. It would seem that the sect arose during the Greek period, as a continuation and development of the HASIDAEANS. At the time of the Maccabees, they were strong enough to offer efficacious support to the HASMONAEANS; they came into conflict with this dynasty, however, during the reign of John Hyrcanus (135–10.5 B.C.). In NT times the Pharisees were in conflict with the priestly SADDUCEES; the latter were conservatives who rejected the oral tradition accepted by the Pharisees. Most Pharisees were lay, but some priests as well as many of the doctors of the Law or SCRIBES joined their number.

The teaching of the sect was based on oral tradition as well as on the written Law. The Pharisees held for such religious truths as the resurrection of the body and the existence of angels. Since these doctrines were not clearly taught in the Pentateuch (the only Scripture accepted by the Sadducees), the Pharisees founded their belief in them upon later writings and oral traditions. In the field of morals the Pharisees taught a rigorous observance of the SABBATH and insisted on legal purity and the payment of tithes. They offered various opinions on minute observance of these and other precepts, to such an extent that their opponents accused them of degenerating into rigorism and casuistry and focusing on sterile externalism destructive of a real religious spirit.

After the destruction of the Temple and the overthrow of the Jewish state, the Pharisees became practically the only influential group among the Jews. Through the uncertain centuries that followed, they held the Jewish people together. Later rabbinical schools looked back with admiration upon the Pharisees as the true upholders of Israel’s Law and traditions. The rabbis of the TALMUD were their spiritual descendants.

In the New Testament. The fact that Jesus rejected much of the legalistic tradition of the Pharisees (Mk 7.1–23), sought to free people from its burden (Mt 11.28–30) and to interpret to them the profounder meaning of the Law (Mt 5.20–48), inveighed against externalistic pietism (Mt 6.1–18; 23.5–12, 23–31), and taught that redemption would come from Him (Mk 10.45) brought Him inevitably into conflict with the Pharisees. After His Ascension this conflict continued between the Christians and the Pharisees. While the debates between Jesus and the Pharisees recorded in the Gospels do recount historical events of His public ministry, their very preservation and the manner in which they are cast reflect the later struggle of the Church against the Pharisaic spirit both within and without.

The NT writers frequently mention the Pharisees, sometimes favorably, sometimes unfavorably. The Gospels narrate conflicts between the Pharisees and Jesus in Galilee (Mk 2.6–3.5; Lk 5.17–6.5; Mt 9.1–17; 12.1–45), in Jerusalem (Mk 11.27–12.40; Lk 20.1–47; Mt 21.23–22.46), and in several other less well-defined circumstances (Mt 15.1–20; Mk 7.1–23); and a strong condemnation of Pharisaism is found in Mt 23.1–36. Yet St. Luke relates incidents in which the Pharisees appear in a more favorable light (Lk 13.31; Acts 5.34; 23.6–9). It should be noted also that the Evangelists do not emphasize the activities of the Pharisees against Jesus in the Passion narratives. Only a few times are the Pharisees explicitly mentioned among those who brought about Jesus’ death (Mt 27.62; Jn 18.3). The same reluctance to identify Pharisees as enemies is found in the Synoptic tradition about the predictions of the Passion (Mt 20.17–19; Mk 8.31; 10.33; Lk 9.22; 18.31).

In spite of, or because of, this ambivalent attitude toward the Pharisees as manifested in the Gospels, some modern critics consider the Evangelists biased and their testimony about the Pharisees untrustworthy. Other scholars attempt to vindicate the Evangelists in their apparent hostility to the sect.

In recent years exegetes have sought to rediscover the literary origins of the narratives, to analyze the religious background of a given pericope in the life of the early Church, and to stress the theological purposes that led an Evangelist to incorporate a narrative into his Gospel. (See FORM CRITICISM, BIBLICAL.) It should be noted that many of the Gospel incidents mentioning the Pharisees are concerned with disputes between them and Jesus. It would seem that the narratives in which these incidents are recounted reached their present form during the heated Judaizing crisis in the early Church. The Judaizers insisted on the strict observance of the Mosaic Law by Gentile Christians as well as by those of Jewish origin. It was on the authority of the Lord that such a dispute had to be settled, and the early community recalled the occasions on which He had debated with the Pharisees concerning the observance of the Sabbath, circumcision, distinction of foods, legal purity, etc. As the orthodox Christians recalled these discussions and repeated them against the Judaizers (and to some extent against the Pharisees outside the Church), it is obvious that the Pharisees as a group would be depicted in a poor light. The Evangelists then used these ready-made narratives in their Gospels. Their intent was not to disparage the Pharisees as such, but rather to prevent Christian readers from falling into the evils of the Judaizers and the externalism of many Pharisees. Their motive was not a national or party bias but a deep concern for Christian believers.

“Pharisees Instructing a Man Not to Transport a Bed on the Sabbath,” manuscript illumination by Cristoforo de Predis from the “Predis Codex.” (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

The Evangelists mentioned the Pharisees with a theological intention in mind. Their chief purpose was to preserve for their Christian readers the authentic teaching of Jesus regarding the primacy of the spirit over the letter, of inner religion over sterile externalism.

Bibliography: L. FINKELSTEIN, The Pharisees: The Sociological Background of Their Faith, 2 v. (3d ed. rev. Philadelphia 1962). J.W. BOWKER, Jesus and the Pharisees (Cambridge 1973). J. NEUSNER, Formative Judaism: Religious, Historical and Literary Studies: Third Series: Torah, Pharisees, and Rabbis (Chico, Calif. 1983). S. MASON, Flavius Josephus on the Pharisees: A Composition-Critical Study (Leiden 1991). D. B. GOWLER, Host, Guest, Enemy, and Friend: Portraits of the Pharisees in Luke and Acts (New York 1991). G. STEMBERGER, Jewish Contemporaries of Jesus: Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenes (Minneapolis 1995). J. NEUS-

NER, The Rabbinic Traditions about the Pharisees before 70 (Atlanta, Ga. 1999). A. J. SALDARINI, Pharisees, Scribes, and Sadducees in Palestinian Society: A Sociological Approach, new ed. (Grand Rapids, Mich. 2001). J. WELLHAUSEN, The Pharisees and the Sadducees: An Examination of Internal Jewish History (Macon, Ga. 2001).

[R. MERCURIO/EDS.]

PHELAN, DAVID SAMUEL

Priest, editor, author; b. Sydney, Nova Scotia, July 16, 1841; d. St. Louis, Mo., Sept. 21, 1915. As the son of Alexander and Margaret (Creedon) Phelan, he moved with his family to St. Louis, Mo., in 1853. On completion of his studies for the priesthood under the Vincentians at Cape Girardeau, Mo., he was ordained by Abp. Peter Richard Kenrick (May 30, 1863) and assigned as assistant at the cathedral in St. Louis. Within a few months he became pastor at Indian Creek, Mo., and shortly afterwards, at Edina, Mo. Here he purchased the machinery and type of two small, often anti-Catholic newspapers and began publication of the Missouri Watchman. In 1868 he was named pastor of Annunciation parish in St. Louis. In 1873, after serving at Pacific, Mo., he became pastor of Our Lady of Mount Carmel parish, St. Louis, a post he held until his death. Phelan organized parishes in Ferguson and Spanish Lake, Mo., and was involved in the establishment of a Carmel in New Orleans, La., by nuns from the St. Louis Carmel. Phelan was best known as a journalist. At Edina, where his newspaper attacked the test oath demanded by the Missouri constitution, he was arrested when he refused to take the oath. He was released without conviction. His newspaper, renamed the Western Watchman, in St. Louis, often indulged in controversy. Phelan frequently criticized the actions of the hierarchy, including his own superiors. He was outspoken, for instance, against Cahenslyism, attempts to recruit American volunteers for papal service against Garibaldi, the condemnation by some bishops of the Ancient Order of Hibernians, and the educational provisions of the Third Council of Baltimore. He was a great admirer of Abp. John Ireland, who supported him in several disputes. In addition to exposing the American Protective Association in St. Louis, Phelan usually favored Democratic foreign and domestic policies and reflected contemporary Irish-American antipathy to Britain. Besides his editorial contributions, he produced two volumes of sermons, The Gospel Applied to Our Times (1904) and Christ the Preacher (1905). He also compiled and translated from the French three works in ascetical theology.

Bibliography: J. E. ROTHENSTEINER, History of the Archdiocese of Louis, 2 v. (St. Louis 1928). M. C. SMITH, Our Pastors in Calvary: Biographical Sketches of Parish Priests of St. Louis, 1854-1924 (St. Louis 1924).

[M. F. HASTING]

PHELAN, GERALD BERNARD

Philosopher, psychologist, medievalist; b. Halifax, Nova Scotia, Aug. 26, 1892; d. Toronto, Ontario, May 30, 1965. He was ordained a priest of the Archdiocese of Halifax Dec. 27, 1914. The next year he received an S.T.B. from The Catholic University of America; in 1918, an M.A. from St. Francis Xavier University, Nova Scotia; in 1924, a Ph.D. from the University of Louvain; and in 1925, an Agrégé en philosophie from the same institution. He was made a domestic prelate on Jan. 15, 1960. From 1914 to 1918 Phelan was engaged in parochial work in Nova Scotia and Bermuda. He lectured in philosophy at St. Mary's College, Halifax, from 1917 to 1922. In 1925 he was appointed professor of psychology at St. Michael's College, the University of Toronto, and from 1926 to 1946 he was professor of philosophy there. He served as librarian of the Institute of Mediaeval Studies, Toronto, from 1929 to 1931; as codirector with Étienne Gilson; and as president from 1937 to 1946. He was the founder and director of the Mediaeval Institute at the University of Notre Dame from 1946 to 1952 and head of the department of philosophy at Notre Dame during those years. From 1952 until his retirement in 1962 he was professor of philosophy at St. Michael's College, and from 1958 professor of philosophy in the Pontifical Institute. He served as president of the American Catholic Philosophical Association in 1931. He received the Cardinal Mercier medal in 1925 and the Cardinal Spellman-Aquinas medal in 1959.

He received his training in psychology under A. Michotte. He excelled in teaching the philosophy, especially the metaphysics, of St. Thomas Aquinas. A collection of his essays was published by the Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies in 1966.

Bibliography: Works. Feeling, Experience and Its Modalities (Louvain 1925); Jacques Maritain (New York 1937); St. Thomas and Analogy (Milwaukee 1941); Some Illustrations of St. Thomas's Development of the Wisdom of St. Augustine (Chicago 1946); On the Governance of Rulers (Toronto 1935; New York 1939), tr. of THOMAS AQUINAS'S De reg. princ.; The Wisdom of St. Anselm (Larrobe, Pa. 1960).

[A. MAURER]

PHELAN, GERARD, MOTHER

Religious superior, educator; b. Kilkenny, Ireland, Jan. 17, 1872; d. Tarrytown, New York, March 22, 1960.

Baptized Anastasia Phelan, Mother Gerard was educated by the Sacred Heart of Mary Religious, Waterford and Lisburn, Ireland. She entered their congregation at Béziers, France, in 1893. After taking temporary vows, she attended Cambridge University and served as headmistress at Crosby, England before she was called to the United States in July of 1907. On December 8 of the same year, she and Mother M. Joseph BUTLER founded the first MARYMOUNT at Tarrytown, New York. After taking the M.A. and Ph.D. at The Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C., and Fordham University, New York, New York, she specialized in educational work. As Mother Butler's closest collaborator, she also filled successive offices—from conventual superior to superior general. Under her administration the Sacred Heart of Mary apostolate became global as foundations doubled in number and extended as far as Africa. In 1952, Fordham University, in conferring its honorary Litt.D., paid tribute to her extension of Mother Butler's work.

Bibliography: K. BURTON, Mother Butler of Marymount (New York 1944).

[F. S. BORAN]

PHENOMENA

Phenomena, or appearances, are attributes that make accessible to sensible perception the objects of the visible world. They are interpreted variously. According to PARMENIDES, they are the "untrue." For Protagoras, they are subjective and relative; as the thing appears to a person, so it is for him (frag. 1). For ARISTOTLE, not every phenomenon is necessarily true (Meta. 1010b 1–29); however, when critically evaluated, phenomena make objective truth accessible and one should therefore study them (Meta. 986b 31). In the thinking of I. KANT, the phenomena are generally valid and objective, but only for man since he constitutes them. More specifically, perceptions are formed by space and time, "which contain a priori the condition of the possibility of objects as appearances" (Critique of Pure Reason, A 89); i.e., they are the pure intuitions that are contained a priori in sensible nature. The phenomena are then conceived by reason, through its a priori concepts and categories, as objects, while cognition remains limited to the thing—for-us, and never reaches the thing—in-itself (ibid. B 164). Likewise, we know "our own subject only as appearance" (ibid. B 156). As opposed to this view, E. HUSSERL returns "to the things themselves"; these he understands as the contents of CONSCIOUSNESS that manifest themselves as the result of eidetic and phenomenological reduction and are comprehended by INTUITION or ideation (see PHENOMENOLOGY).

Gerald Bernard Phelan.

NOLOGY).

See Also: NOUMENA; KANTIANISM; PHENOMENALISM.

Bibliography: G. CAPRONE BRAGA, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice–Rome 1957) 2:329–334. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 2:415–416.

[J. B. LOTZ]

PHENOMENALISM

Strictly taken, phenomenism is a theory of knowledge attributing existence only to appearances or to sense data precisely as experienced. The commonsense thing, along with its philosophical counterpart, SUBSTANCE, is banished as an illicitly inferred and superfluous entity. "Mr. Jones" then becomes a shorthand term standing for a congeries of sense data, such as lowpitched sounds associated with a certain color, height, configuration, and so on. The statement "Mr. Jones will be there," translated into phenomenistic idiom, roughly reads: "If you perform certain operations, you will receive such-and-such sensory impressions (summarily named Mr. Jones)." The esse est percipi of G. BERKELEY was its first pure formulation: a thing is simply an aggregate of per-cepts, upheld by God. Shifting the phenomenal basis to the associative activity of the percipient, J. S. MILL defined matter as the permanent possibility of sensation. B. RUSSELL added logical sophistication by reducing a physical object to a logical construct or class of appearances. To avoid hypostatizing appearances, A. J. Ayer proposed linguistic techniques for replacing sentences about physical objects with sentences about sense data alone.

Broadly taken, phenomenism admits extraphenomenal objects. I. KANT maintained that a thing-in-itself underlies the PHENOMENA. The “Unconditioned” of W. HAMILTON and the “Unknowable” of H. SPENCER, both quasinoumenal realities, betray a like spirit of Kantian compromise.

An empiricist bias restricting all immediate cognition to sensibilia bars phenomenists from reaching non-inferred substance, but the very formulas allegedly excluding substance admit the notion through the back door. SOLIPSISM aside, permanently possible sensations imply publicly permanent objects able to be sensed. Too, a class embraces appearances objectively similar, i.e., regularly emanating from one objective whole. Again, it is impossible to phenomenize the self. Only an already unified subject can systemize data; a linguistic fiction cannot construct a linguistic fiction. Finally, while claiming to treat things as phenomena, phenomenists in fact treat phenomena as things.

See Also: KNOWLEDGE; KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF; SENSE KNOWLEDGE.

Bibliography: G. CAPONE BRAGA, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice–Rome 1957) 2:314–329. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 2:416–419.

[J. M. QUINN]

PHENOMENOLOGY

From the Greek φαινόμενον and λόγος, the setting forth or articulation of what shows itself. [For an etymological derivation and exposition of the term, see M. Heidegger, Being and Time, tr. J. Macquarrie and E. Robinson (New York 1962).] The word was first used in the 18th century by J. H. Lambert (1728–77), then by I. Kant; finally it became a fundamental notion in the celebrated work of G. W. F. HEGEL, Phänomenologie des Geistes (Würzburg 1807). In the 20th century the term was revived and given fresh meaning by E. HUSSERL, and it is from his work that contemporary usage derives its basic connotation.

Intentionality. Guided by the doctrine of the INTENTIONALITY OF CONSCIOUSNESS, which he had acquired from his teacher F. BRENTANO, Husserl was led to repudiate and criticize his own earlier views on the nature of knowledge. In the Logische Untersuchungen (2 v. Halle 1900–01), he laid bare the logical inconsistency in PSYCHOLOGISM, the prevalent view that the laws of thought and the nature of thinking were attained by inductive generalization from the observation or INTROSPECTION of one's mental states. Thus, J. S. MILL held that the principle of CONTRADICTION was a generalization from the fact that belief and disbelief were two different “mental states” excluding one another. Husserl showed that such formulations not only could never attain the certainty and specific character of logical laws, but that they disastrously confused the act of thinking and the object of thought, so that what one thought was conceived as a content of the mind (and as subject to its laws) just as much as the thinking itself. In opposition to this, he argued that what presents itself to consciousness—what one judges, imagines, and remembers—is not an element or ingredient of the stream of conscious acts (judging, imagining, remembering, etc.) but transcends them in some way, as evidenced by the fact that one can return to the same thought indefinitely many times. To speak of consciousness as intentional is to refer to this essential characteristic of all conscious experiences, their intrinsic reference to an object that is not a real element of the experience. All consciousness is consciousness of something beyond it, something presented to it but not contained in it (i.e., the mind is not a container).

This doctrine of the intentional structure of consciousness is the cornerstone of phenomenology, but it is only the cornerstone. The influence and importance of phenomenology lie not in the recovery of this notion, but in its twofold analysis: one toward the ontological ground of this structure (and from this emerges contemporary EXISTENTIALISM) and the other toward the classification and clarification of the many different types of intentionality and intentional objects (perceptual, volitional, aesthetic, psychic, etc.).

Once the OBJECTIVITY of the objects of consciousness is secured, Husserl lays out the foundations of phenomenology as a “prephilosophical” descriptive protoscience, whose concern will be with the systematic delineation and classification of (not the stream of consciousness, but) the fundamental types of intentional objects and, correspondingly, the intentional acts of the subject presenting them. If this can be done, one will have at hand the fundamental data on which all systematic knowledge is founded.

Phenomenological Method. Such an effort, to be successful, requires that the phenomena be described as they really give themselves, free from any cultural, philosophical, or ontological bias: it requires an ascetic neutrality in one's attitude toward the phenomena of one's awareness. To achieve this neutrality is the purpose of the reductions that are sketched in bk. 1 of the Ideen zu einer reinen Phänomenologie und phänomenologischen Philosophie (Halle 1913); tr. W. B. Gibson, Ideas: General Introduction to Pure Phenomenology (New York 1931). There is, first, the philosophical epoché, or bracketing, the setting aside of all philosophical presuppositions about reality, the world, man, the distinctions of primary and secondary qualities, the exterior and interior worlds, etc. The eidetic reduction focuses one's attention on the essential structures of what appears, so that one is dealing not with an empirical description, nor with a description of subsistent Platonic Forms, but with the sense or meaning of what appears. The phenomenological reduction crowns this process by bracketing the reality of the phenomena (whether psychical or physical) that one spontaneously and implicitly accepts as existing. To do this is not to deny or ignore their reality, but rather to focus on precisely what in their appearance or mode of appearing gives them the index of real.

At this point, one is at the center of the labyrinth of phenomenological method and presumably prepared to proceed with an absolutely pure (i.e., unbiased) description of the structures of conscious experience: its temporality, the acts by which various intentional objects are constituted or rendered present, and the various types of objects themselves—perceptual, imagined, etc. Husserl goes further and seems to contend that the intentional acts and objects of consciousness exist absolutely, whereas physical objects exist only for consciousness, being nothing more than the system of their concordant appearances. Although the word is not used in the Ideen, it seems that IDEALISM is the direction of development here indicated. At least, this is the way in which many of Husserl's "first generation" of students read it and repudiated it, while accepting the phenomenological reduction (or the transcendental-phenomenological reduction, as it was later called) as a methodological device. To this first group belonged such eminent thinkers as Jean Hering, Alexander Koyré, and a notable group of later converts to Catholicism such as Dietrich von HILDEBRAND, Max SCHELER, and Edith Stein.

Meaning and Experience. Some other characteristic elements of Husserl's phenomenology developed in the Ideen and later works are the following. First is the distinction between empty and filled meaning-intentions, corresponding roughly to the distinction between "I understand what you mean" and "I see that it is the case." The formulation of a hypothesis and its verification would exemplify this, but so also would the anticipation of how a melody now being heard will be resolved and its actual heard resolution. The latter example is significant because the anticipation is not a hypothesis, nor is it conceptual, but it is part of the meaning of the unfinished melody in process.

Doctor Dietrich von Hildebrand.

Second is the affirmation that every object of awareness (perceptual, conceptual, etc.) is given in a horizon or field of other objects or meanings that contributes to its significance. Thus Husserl holds, as do the Gestaltists, that PERCEPTION is not of the individual object but of a figure on a ground of some kind. Moreover, Husserl extends the notion of horizon to the implicitly anticipated perceptions that one could have of the object before him if, e.g., he walked around it. He calls this the internal horizon of the object and insists that the not-yet-given-but-anticipated perceptions (the "protentions") are part of the meaning of the aspect of the object that is actually given to the perceiver. His view of perception, therefore, is not Humean in the sense that one is presented with naked sense data: there is a potential as well as an actual element in the objects of which man is perceptually aware. Moreover, the protentions are pre-predicative or pre-conceptual: they are not, as has been noted, hypotheses about what will come next. This reflects the phenomenological position that it is the appearing of the object that constitutes the phenomenon, not apparent objects about whose external status one has still to decide.

Third is the distinction between noesis and noema. Every conscious experience is, phenomenologically, extraordinarily complex. The fundamental composition is that of the intentional object, or noema, and the act of intending, or noesis: for example, that which one judges and the act of judging. Noesis and noema are correlative in the sense that every distinct kind of intentional object is rendered present to man's awareness by a distinct type of noetic act. Moreover, each intentional object is itself a synthetic unity of many distinct noematic aspects. Thus every noema, in addition to its fundamental sense or meaning, presents itself with the index of really existing, or being unreal (imagined, dreamt, etc.); with this or that aspect focused on by attention; with affective and volitional aspects (desirable, valued, sacred, etc.); and with a "doxic" character (possible, probable, problematic, doubtful, etc.). To each of these aspects of the full or complete noema corresponds a noetic element of consciousness (e.g., for the last series of doxic modalities: supposition, conjecture, question, and doubt).

Phenomenology and Idealism. In the later works of his middle period, Husserl's idealism grew more pronounced and more explicit. In the Cartesian Meditations (Paris 1931; tr. D. Cairns, The Hague 1960), phenomenology is described as a "transcendental idealism," and every dimension of conscious experience is said to fit into the schema "ego-cogito-cogitatum." Already in this work and increasingly in the 1930s, there are elements that resist subsumption into such idealism: the notions of history and the alter ego, of a time both constituted and constituting, of passive constitution and the genesis of meaning, and, perhaps most importantly, of the world as the passive pre-given ground of all intentional objects. Two posthumous works, Erfahrung und Urteil (ed. L. Landgrebe, Prague 1939) and the essays collected under the title of Die Krisis der europäischen Wissenschaften und die transzendente Phänomenologie (v.6 of Husserliana, The Hague 1954), have a decidedly more realistic tone, and in their development of the notion of the Lebenswelt, or vital world of everyday life, served to lay out the frame of an ontological structure of consciousness as being-in-the-world.

It is as yet not possible to pass definitive judgment on the import of these late years for Husserl's own conception of phenomenology. What is clear is that it is primarily from the problems and orientation of this last period that the existential phenomenology of the 1940s and 1950s took its bearings. Among the themes of these writings, still only partially published, perhaps the most influential has been that of the Lebenswelt.

Lebenswelt. The Lebenswelt is the encompassing world of man's daily life, whose primordial structures tend to be lost sight of under a "clothing of ideas," basically the ideas or attitudes of the physical sciences. For example, there is, according to Husserl, a primordial experience of spatiality that is neither Euclidean nor Riemannian nor Lobachevskian, i.e., not geometrical at all. It is structured around such basic poles as near and far, home ground and away, etc. Its central foundation is the earth, not in the sense of the circling globe of Copernicus, but as the ground upon which all motion takes place and which itself neither moves nor is stationary. All concrete, perceived motion requires a ground against which the motion is given. True, one can think about the motion of particles in mechanics without reference to this ground, but to do so is precisely to abstract from one's concrete experience and to leave behind part of its essential structure. The abstraction may indeed be truly revealing of a dimension of the real world, but insofar as it is taken to be the fundamental world-picture on the basis of which one must account for the perceived world, it represents an inversion of viewpoint rooted in a forgetfulness of its origins.

It is this forgetfulness of its concrete origins that underlies the contemporary crisis of the sciences of the West, in Husserl's view. To overcome this crisis, what is needed is a reduction that recovers (or rather uncovers) the primordial levels of the experience of living-in-the-world. Only then will one be able to secure the foundations of scientific knowledge by seeing how it arises out of, and hence is rooted in, the Lebenswelt. It was to the phenomenological exploration and description of the Lebenswelt that most of Husserl's work in the 1930s was addressed, and it is in large part around this theme that the later development of phenomenology has crystallized. A good example of this is the Phenomenology of Perception, by M. MERLEAU-PONTY (Paris 1945; tr. C. Smith, New York 1962), which provides descriptive accounts of the basic structures of living-in-the-world: perception, the body, things, space, time, other persons, etc.

Existential Phenomenology. In spite of the continuity of theme and approach, however, there are fundamental criticisms of Husserl's transcendental phenomenology in the writings of these more recent philosophers, so much so that it is appropriate to distinguish a second major phase of the phenomenological movement as a whole, a phase that has been called existential phenomenology. Three of these fundamental differences may be noted: the status of reduction and constitution, the role of pre-predicative intentionalities, and the significance of the body.

Reduction and Constitution. The transcendental epoché had as its goal the reduction of all objects of consciousness whatsoever to the status of cogitata, i.e., intentional-theoretic objects of the transcendental ego, the absolutely disengaged observer. The obverse of the reduction is the “constitution” of the mundane objects from which one began: once one has “unpacked” all the implicit and explicit intentionalities that make up the meaning of the objects he experiences, he is in a position to see and say how these objects are constituted for himself, namely, by the thus delineated intentional acts of the transcendental ego. For a transcendental idealistic phenomenology, then, reduction and constitution are coextensive and exhaustive: every possible nonego element of conscious experience can be reduced and produced. For the existential phenomenologists, however, the reduction does not reveal a disengaged transcendental ego for whom all else can be rendered objective, but discovers a world whose reality coconstitutes the ego rather than being constituted for the ego. It discovers a radical and irreducible involvement of consciousness with the world. It discovers, in sum, an ontological structure of participation: being-in-the-world. (Merleau-Ponty attributes this discovery to Husserl, in the form of the distinction between the intentionality of the acts of the ego and an operative intentionality that others have called “existence.”)

Pre-predicative Intentionality. For existential phenomenology, then, there is a gap between reduction and constitution. The world as the encompassing ground of all constituted objects is itself pre-given, pre-objective, and unconstituted. The genesis or constitution of the “true and exact” world of objective science is still a problem consequent upon the reduction to the pre-objective world of the Lebenswelt, but the latter is only to be described, not constituted or constructed. The fundamental structures of the Lebenswelt underlie and thus escape from what Husserl in his idealist period considered to be the all-encompassing matrix of meaning: the ego-cogito-cogitatum. There are perceptions of meaning (e.g., of sexuality, of other persons, of the world) that are not cogitationes envisaging cogitata.

Intentionality remains, for the existential phenomenologists, the “defining” characteristic of awareness, although it is not primarily the intentionality of ego related to object through its thetic or explicit acts, but the irreducibly pre-reflective intentionality of an ontological situation. The critical operative element in this ontological structure, that which effects the in-the-world dimension of the being of consciousness, is its incarnation.

Significance of the Body. Perhaps no difference between classical modern philosophy and phenomenology is more striking and at the same time more significant than that of the status of the body. From R. DESCARTES on, the body has been an object for consciousness, bound to the ego in a unique way, no doubt, yet on the same footing with other objects in the world. This is still true for the early Husserl. For the existential phenomenologists, on the other hand, it is the lived body as a dimension of one’s subjectivity that is the source of the (pre-reflective) intentionalities that structure the Lebenswelt.

Problems of Evaluation. The difficulty involved in making any final evaluation of Husserl’s thought was mentioned, and it is perhaps clearer now why this is the case. It is simply not clear as yet (and may never be so) whether in his late years he abandoned the project of a transcendental idealism or whether the solidity of the Lebenswelt represented merely a temporary detour in the path of the transcendental reduction. In any case the phenomenological movement is beyond question the dominant philosophical current on the Continent. It seems to have laid to rest the epistemological problem of “inside” and “outside” worlds and to have at least blunted the conflict between science and philosophy by basing philosophy on the description of a pre-objective world of experience.

Causality. At the same time, a number of basic questions remain unanswered or answered unsatisfactorily. One of these is the relation of CAUSALITY to intentionality. The phenomenologists tend to deny any causal relation between nature and consciousness: the physical world acts on consciousness only by “offering it a meaning”; by at most, then, a kind of sollicitation. Although they have addressed themselves to such objections as, e.g., an aspirin eliminating a headache, there is as yet no general consensus on how to state the relation between the “lived body” and the “object-body.” Yet the latter is clearly involved in causal interactions with nature.

Eternal Truths. A second problem is that of eternal truths. There are, according to Merleau-Ponty, for example, no absolute certainties or eternal truths about anything other than the ontological structures of being-in-the-world; and since these are not objects of consciousness but dimensions of its subjectivity, there are no eternal truths about things in the world. However, it appears that this position commits the same fallacy as did that of D. Hume; namely, it purports to state an eternally true rejection of eternal truths. (see TRUTH.)

Metaphysics. A third problem, related to both the former, is the relation of phenomenology to METAPHYSICS. Merleau-Ponty and J. P. SARTRE, among others, have leveled lethal criticisms at the pretensions of modern RATIONALISM to pass from being-for-us to being-in-itself. The only meaning that being can have for man, according to them, is the meaning that it presents to him in his experience; in other words, it can have no consistent transphenomenal meaning. What is at issue here is the possibility of a metaphysics in general and of statements about a transcendent being in particular, but it seems that the challenge is to a metaphysics vitiated by a rationalistic univocity rather than to one recognizing that there is no common res significata that is realized imperfectly in the finite and perfectly in the infinite being. If one recognizes for certain terms, of which man grasps only a “phenomenal” meaning, that they are predicable of a transfinite being, without knowing precisely what they mean in Him, this seems to be sufficient both to establish the possibility of a metaphysics and to avoid this type of criticism.

Extent of Movement. In Germany, Husserl’s former disciples have gone from describing the basic structures of Dasein, or human existence to focusing on the question of the meaning of being. The work of HEIDEGGER, in particular, has been an influential source for the transmission of the phenomenological problematic and method to theology, philosophy of religion, and psychology. Among Husserl’s earlier students who did significant work in phenomenology, one may note the writings of Alexander Pfänder in logic and psychology, Adolf Reinach on essences and social philosophy, Moritz Geiger on aesthetics, Edith STEIN on psychology and social philosophy, as well as the relation between Thomism and phenomenology, Max SCHELER in ethics and religion, and Roman Ingarden in ontology and aesthetics.

In France, apart from the writings of former students such as Jean Hering in religion, Alexander Koyré in history of science, Gaston Berger, and Emmanuel Levinas, the major sources of phenomenological influence have been the works of Sartre, Merleau-Ponty, and Paul RICOEUR.

In the U.S., where phenomenological writings and interest in them have thus far been scant, the studies of Marvin Farber stood almost alone until the rise of Hitler brought a number of German phenomenologists to America. Men such as Alfred Schuetz, Felix Kaufmann, Fritz Kaufmann, Aron Gurwitsch, and Herbert Spiegelberg have had a definite influence on the growth of interest in phenomenology among American philosophers. The corresponding interest in existentialism and the increasing prominence of the phenomenological approach in theology, psychology, psychiatry, and the social sciences suggest that its present influence is likely to increase.

See Also: OBJECTIVITY; SUBJECTIVITY; CONSCIOUSNESS.

Bibliography: H. SPIEGELBERG, The Phenomenological Movement, 2 v. (The Hague 1960). The Husserl Archives at Louvain are publishing a series of studies on or influenced by phenomenology, Phenomenologica (The Hague; 1958–). Recent translations of Husserl include The Phenomenology of Internal Time-

Consciousness (1904–10), ed. M. HEIDEGGER tr. J. CHURCHILL (Bloomington, Ind. 1964); The Idea of Phenomenology (from 1907), tr. W. ALSTON and G. NAKHNIKIAN (The Hague 1964). A yearbook was founded by Husserl, Jahrbuch für Philosophie und phänomenologische Forschung (Halle 1913–30); the American journal Philosophy and Phenomenological Research was founded by M. FARBER in 1940 as its continuation. In France the collection Épiméthée directed by J. HYPOLITE has pub. several trs. of Husserl’s works and studies of his thought, as well as original phenomenological studies. M. FARBER, The Foundations of Phenomenology (Cambridge, Mass. 1943). P. RICOEUR, Philosophie de la volonté, 2 v. in 3 (Paris 1950–60). M. MERLEAU-PONTY, The Structure of Behavior, tr. A. L. FISHER (Boston 1963).

[F. J. CROSSON]

PHILADELPHIA, ARCHDIOCESE OF

The Archdiocese of Philadelphia (Philadelphiensis) comprises the city and county of Philadelphia, and the counties of Bucks, Chester, Delaware, and Montgomery, an area of 2,182 square miles in the southeastern part of PENNSYLVANIA. In 2001, there were 1,430,161 Catholics, 39 percent of the general population of 3,707,238

Early History. William PENN’s colony, founded in 1682, as a “holy experiment” by which “all persons living in this Province shall in no way be molested or prejudiced in their religious persuasion or practice or in matter of faith or worship,” became a refuge for persecuted Catholics.

First Catholics. There were Catholics in the Philadelphia area from the beginning of its colonization. In 1681 the first governor of what is now Pennsylvania, Anthony Brockholes, was a Catholic. Perhaps the first Catholic resident of “Penn’s Province” was a servant of Daniel Pastorius, the founder of Germantown. One of the richest men of the time was J. Gray (alias John Tatham), a Catholic from London who had extensive holdings in New Jersey and in Bucks County. His residences were stopping places, where the Jesuits traveling between Maryland and New York celebrated Mass. The Jesuits visited the home also of the wealthy Frenchman Daniel Debuc (d. 1693). There is record of Mass being celebrated publicly in Philadelphia in 1707. Repeated complaints were made to London about this “Popish Mass,” but Penn’s “Great Law” protected the religious freedom of the Catholics.

In 1720 Joseph Greaton, SJ (d. 1753), was given charge of the Catholics in Pennsylvania. He made his headquarters in Maryland but regularly traveled from Bohemia Manor to Concord, Chester County, Conewago, Lancaster, Philadelphia, and back. Greaton decided to reside permanently in Philadelphia, and in 1733 he purchased land and built the first Catholic church in Student Library, St. Joseph's College, Philadelphia.

Philadelphia, St. Joseph's, which had about 40 parishioners. A year later the governor questioned the right of Catholics to have this public chapel, but he was overruled by the city council. In March 1741 Greaton received an assistant, Henry Neale, SJ (d. May 5, 1748), and the services of two priests from Germany to take care of the German Catholics in Pennsylvania. Father William Wappler resided at Conewago; Father Theodore Schneider at Goshenhoppen (the present parish of Bally, near Reading). Both also ministered to the Germans in Philadelphia. Financial support for the Church in Pennsylvania was given by Sir John James of London, who set up a fund of £4,000, called the Sir John James Fund.

When Greaton retired to Bohemia Manor in 1749, English-born Robert Harding, SJ (1701–72), succeeded him. Eight years later Harding reported that in Pennsylvania there were 1,365 Catholics (from 12 years of age) who received the Sacraments; 378 of them were living in Philadelphia.

During the French and Indian War the loyalty of the Catholics was questioned and there was a move to keep all papists out of the Philadelphia militia, but without success. Harding purchased ground for another church and cemetery, and St. Mary's was opened in 1763, becoming the parish church of Philadelphia with Harding as pastor; St. Joseph's remained a chapel. The German Jesuit known in the colony as Father Ferdinand FARMER (d. 1786), came from Lancaster to assist Harding in Philadelphia, but he also continued ministering to the German Catholics in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and New York. In 1772 Robert MOLYNEUX, SJ, succeeded Harding as pastor.

Revolutionary Era. During the Revolution, many of St. Mary's parishioners were leaders of the colonial forces. One exception occurred when General Howe withdrew from Philadelphia in the summer of 1778, taking with him a "Roman Catholic Battalion" of about 180 men with Col. Alfred Clifton of St. Mary's parish in charge. In general, however, the Catholics of Philadelphia fought bravely for the Revolution. After the French entered the war, St. Mary's Church became the outstanding Catholic church of the colonies. On Sept. 7, 1777, members of the Continental Congress were present there for the Requiem Mass of General du Coudray. They were present again on July 4, 1779, for the first public religious commemoration of the Declaration of Independence. On Nov. 4, 1781, the Congress met with General Washington at a Solemn Mass of Thanksgiving for victory over the Barbelin Building, St. Joseph's College, Philadelphia.

British. On Feb. 22, 1800, the Congress met there for a memorial service for President Washington.

After the war, Molyneux built the first parish school in Philadelphia at St. Mary's in May 1782. The practice of pew rent was introduced to offset some of the cost. In October 1785 John CARROLL, then prefect apostolic, administered the Sacrament of Confirmation for the first time in Philadelphia. A year later when Farmer died, his funeral was attended by the members of the American Philosophical Society, the professors and trustees of the University of Pennsylvania, and a large number of non-Catholics. Molyneux retired and was succeeded by the Reverend Francis Beeston, SJ, who built the rectory for St. Joseph's. By 1790 there were reputed to be 2,000 Catholics in Philadelphia. Five years later Holy Trinity Church for German Catholics was completed, and Father John Heilbron was assigned as pastor. Carroll had reluctantly consented to the erection of this national parish, warning the parishioners against a feeling of separatism and denying them the right to name their own pastors. Meanwhile, a large number of destitute persons from the West Indies arrived in Philadelphia during the spring and summer of 1793, bringing the yellow fever mosquito with them. An epidemic ensued, causing about one-half of the inhabitants to flee Philadelphia, which became practically a quarantined city. All the priests of St. Mary's died from the fever, among them Father Lorenz Grässel, who had been chosen as coadjutor to Bishop Carroll, with residence in Philadelphia.

Early Trusteesism. In December 1793 the Reverend Leonard NEALE was appointed pastor of St. Mary's and coadjutor to Carroll. Because of trouble in Europe, the bulls did not arrive until 1800. The appointment in 1796 of Father John Goetz as Heilbron's assistant marked the beginning of TRUSTEEISM at Holy Trinity. Heilbron was forced to retire to St. Joseph's, where he conducted services for the loyal Germans. Although Goetz was suspended, he persisted in his opposition and was joined by Father William Elling, who came to Holy Trinity from Reading to teach in the school that the trustees were forming. At length, Carroll, in February 1797, was constrained to publicly excommunicate both Goetz and Elling. There was a falling out among the schismatics. Four months later, Goetz was forced to resign, and the trustees made Elling pastor. When the trustees tried to make common cause with another group of German schismatics in Baltimore, Carroll came to Philadelphia in 1798. A court case ensued during which the trustees argued that Carroll was bishop of other nationalities, but not of the Germans. The case reached Rome and the Holy See backed Carroll against the trustees. But it was not until 1802 that Elling, the trustees, and the parishioners of Holy Trinity, which had been put under interdict, publicly recanted. Their abjuration was taken by Thomas Matthew Carr, OSA, the vicar-general.

Cathedral Basilica of Saints Peter and Paul, Philadelphia; during Mass for Holy Thursday. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Under Carr, the Irish Augustinians began another parish in 1796. But it was not until 1801 that St. Augustine's, "the largest church in Philadelphia," was dedicated. President Washington, Commodore John Barry, and Stephen Girard were among the largest contributors. When the trustees of St. Mary's petitioned Carroll to send them a pastor capable of preserving the dignity of "the leading church in the United States," he appointed Michael EGAN, OSF (d. 1814), who had been stationed at Lancaster, and gave him Father John Rossiter as assistant.

Diocese. On April 8, 1808, Egan was appointed bishop of the new Diocese of Philadelphia, which included the entire states of Pennsylvania and Delaware, and the western and southern part of the state of New Jersey, up to a line running west to east and slightly south of Barnegat Bay. St. Mary's was selected as the cathedral. Napoleonic difficulties in Europe prevented the bulls from arriving until 1810, so during the interval Egan remained at St. Mary's as Carroll's vicar-general.

Egan. At its beginning the Diocese of Philadelphia had 16 churches attended by 11 priests, who ministered to 30,000 Catholics. Unfortunately, the trustee problem at St. Mary's marred the new bishop's administration from the first. In 1808 Egan accepted William HAROLD, an Irish Dominican, as a priest of the diocese and in 1810 made him his vicar-general. The next year Father James Harold, an uncle of William Harold, was accepted into the diocese. Trouble, instigated by the Harolds, then developed between the bishop and the trustees of St.

Rosemont College, a Catholic women's college in Philadelphia. (©Kevin Fleming/CORBIS)

Mary's. Although the Harolds returned to Ireland and a schism was averted, the trustees of St. Mary's had acquired such ill fame that it was five years before a successor was named after Egan's death on July 22, 1814. John David, later Bishop of Bardstown, Ky.; Ambrose Maréchal, future Archbishop of Baltimore; and Louis De Barth, pastor of Conewago, all refused the Diocese of Philadelphia. During the interval De Barth was the administrator of the diocese. Finally Henry CONWELL (1748–1842), vicar-general of Armagh, Ireland, was nominated. Having been consecrated in London by Bishop Poynter on Sept. 24, 1820, he arrived in Philadelphia on November 25.

Conwell. The most urgent problem awaiting him was the case of William HOGAN, a priest from Albany, N.Y., whom the administrator had admitted into the diocese without proper credentials, and who preached a sermon against Conwell in the bishop's presence within a week after he took possession of the see. At length a schism began that is known as Hoganism. At Conwell's invitation, William Harold returned to Philadelphia in November 1821 and allied himself with Father Ryan (former rector of the College of Corpo Santo in Lisbon, Portugal) in defense of Conwell against Hogan and his followers.

Defeated and disgraced, Hogan left Philadelphia in August 1824, but the trustees of St. Mary's continued to fight against their bishop. Finally, on Oct. 9, 1826, Conwell signed the notorious pact with the trustees giving them the right to veto his appointment of their pastors. This pact was rejected by the Congregation of the Propaganda and the rejection was approved by Pope Leo XII on May 6, 1827. Further trouble ensued when Harold, who had been appointed pastor of St. Mary's and vicar-general, was suspended by Conwell on April 3, 1827. There were appeals to Rome and to the U.S. government. Finally, the aged Conwell was summoned to Rome; Harold and Ryan were transferred from the diocese, and the Holy See named Francis Patrick KENRICK (1796–1863) coadjutor with right of succession. Conwell returned unexpectedly to the U.S. and gave many anxious moments to Kenrick and to the Holy See until his death in 1842 at the age of 94.

Kenrick. On June 6, 1830, Kenrick was consecrated in the Cathedral of St. Joseph at Bardstown, Ky. He arrived in Philadelphia that July 7, but it was not until August of 1831 that Pope Gregory XVI approved the brief that entrusted all ecclesiastical jurisdiction to Kenrick alone. The trustee problem at St. Mary's continued until Kenrick closed the church and the cemetery on April 16, 1831. The greatest problem confronting him was the lack of priests, so in June 1832 he opened the diocesan seminary of St. Charles Borromeo, which obtained a state charter six years later. During the first three years of his administration, he doubled the number of the churches. St. John the Evangelist, built by Father (later Bishop) John Hughes before he was transferred to New York (1838), was dedicated April 8, 1832 (it became the cathedral in 1838). Next, St. John the Baptist, Manayunk, was dedicated with Father Thomas Gegan as first pastor; and on April 8, 1833, the cornerstone of St. Michael's in Kensington was laid, with Father Terence J. Donoghue as founding pastor. By 1832 the diocese numbered 100,000 Catholics, 38 priests, and 50 churches.

When the cholera epidemic devastated Philadelphia in 1832, the Sisters of Charity at St. Joseph's and St. John's Orphan Asylums gave heroic nursing service to the victims. Michael HURLEY, OSA (d. 1837), pastor of St. Augustine's, turned his school and convent into a hospital where 367 patients were treated. In the following year the city council passed a formal resolution of gratitude and gave a purse to the Sisters of Charity. Parochial expansion characterized these years; St. Francis Xavier parish was founded for the Fairmount district and St. Patrick's for the Schuylkill suburb (1839). The following year St. Philip Neri's parish was established in the Southwark district, with Father John P. Dunn as pastor. In 1842 the Redemptorist Fathers were given the new parish of St. Peter's which was built for the Germans in Kensington. In 1843 St. Paul's was founded in the Moyamensing section and St. Stephen's parish in Nicetown near a spot where the early missionaries had celebrated the first Masses in Philadelphia.

When the western portion of Pennsylvania became the Diocese of Pittsburgh (1843), Philadelphia was left with 58 churches, seven missions, 43 priests, and a Catholic population of 100,000. Despite the bitter NATIVISM of these years, which erupted in the 1844 riots in Philadelphia and the burning of two churches, Kenrick continued to direct the steady progress of his diocese. On Nov. 16, 1848, St. Anne's, founded in Port Richmond, was dedicated by Father Francis X. Gartland, later Bishop of Savannah, Ga. On Sept. 28, 1845, Bishop de la Hailandière of Vincennes, Ind., laid the cornerstone for St. Joachim's church in the Frankford district. On June 29, 1846, Bishop Kenrick issued a pastoral letter announcing his determination to build a cathedral. It was to be modeled after San Carlo al Corso in Rome with Napoleon Lebrun as its architect. Other foundations included the Church of the Assumption (1848) with Charles I. H. Carter, a convert and later vicar-general of the diocese, as pastor; St. Dominic's (1849) in the far north suburb of Holmesburg; the parish of St. James (1850) in West Philadelphia; and St. Malachy's church, the cornerstone of which was blessed on May 25, 1850. Before its completion Kenrick transferred to the Metropolitan See of Baltimore. The suburb of Germantown received its parish when St. Vincent de Paul's was founded on July 13, 1851, and placed under the care of the Vincentian Fathers, who conducted the seminary. The first pastor was Father Michael Domenec, later Bishop of Pittsburgh.

Kenrick also opened the first Catholic hospital in Philadelphia, St. Joseph's, staffed by the Sisters of St. Joseph, in June 1849. Educational facilities were expanded with the arrival in March 1846 of the Sacred Heart nuns to conduct a private school for girls, and of the Sisters of St. Joseph, who came the following year. In 1850 the Christian Brothers arrived to teach the boys in the Assumption parochial school. Two colleges for men were established also: Villanova (Augustinians) in 1842 and St. Joseph's (Jesuits) in 1851. When Kenrick left in 1851 to assume his new duties as archbishop of Baltimore, Philadelphia had 92 churches, eight chapels, 101 priests, 43 seminarians, two colleges, six academies for girls, seven charitable institutions, and 170,000 Catholics.

Neumann. John Nepomucene NEUMANN, the fourth bishop of Philadelphia, was consecrated on March 28, 1852. He had immigrated to the U.S. from Bohemia in 1836, was ordained for the Diocese of New York, June 25, 1836, and was the first Redemptorist to be professed in America (1842). During his episcopate, Neumann constantly pressed for parochial schools. He was unsuccessful in his relations with the trustees of Holy Trinity, but he undermined their influence when he established the parish of St. Alphonsus (1852) for German-speaking Catholics. In the same year he established St. Mary Magdalen de Pazzi Church, the first parish for Italian-speaking Catholics. He also introduced the FORTY HOURS DEVOTION in the diocese at St. Philip Neri's Church.

In 1853 the New Jersey section of the diocese was taken to form part of the Diocese of Newark, leaving Philadelphia with 121 churches, 32 missions, 119 priests, and 175,000 Catholics. On April 26, 1857, Neumann received as coadjutor with right of succession, James Frederick Wood, to whom was committed the work of completing the cathedral. He succeeded to the see upon Neumann's death on Jan. 5, 1860. The latter's cause was introduced in Rome in 1897 and on Oct. 13, 1963, Pope Paul VI beatified him. He was canonized by Pope Paul VI on June 19, 1977; his feast day is January 5.

Wood. The fifth bishop had been baptized a Unitarian but was received into the Catholic Church in 1838 and the next year was sent to Rome to study at the Propaganda College. He was ordained in Rome on March 25, 1844, and returned to Cincinnati, Ohio, where he served as curate at the cathedral and pastor of St. Patrick's Church until his consecration on April 26, 1857. His thorough knowledge of the financial world was one of the reasons for his appointment to Philadelphia. In the first year of his administration, Wood established the parishes of the Annunciation in South Philadelphia and All Saints, Bridesburg. His cathedral was nearing completion, but because of the Civil War, he did not have the happiness of singing the first Mass there until Nov. 20, 1864. On Dec. 8, 1865, he announced the purchase of 100 acres at Overbrook (called by some, "Wood's Folly") as the site for a seminary. By 1871 this seminary had 128 students.

During a visit to Rome in 1867, he petitioned the erection of two dioceses. On March 3, 1868, the new Dioceses of Harrisburg, Scranton, and Wilmington were founded, leaving Philadelphia with 93 churches; 67 missions; 157 priests; 42 parochial schools; 491 sisters; and a Catholic population of 200,000. Wood was prominent at the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore and attended also Vatican Council I (1869–70), but ill health forced an early return from Rome. He was unanimously appointed treasurer of the episcopal board of the new North American College in Rome. On Oct. 15, 1873, he solemnly consecrated the diocese to the Sacred Heart of Jesus.

Archdiocese. In 1875 Philadelphia became the metropolitan see for the state of Pennsylvania with Wood as archbishop. Although in poor health, he went to Rome in 1877 for the golden jubilee of Pius IX's episcopate. On May 23, 1880, he presided over the first provincial council of Philadelphia. When he died, he left 127 churches, 53 chapels, and 58 parochial schools.

Ryan. The see was vacant for one year until Rome appointed St. Louis's coadjutor, Bp. Patrick J. RYAN, second Archbishop of Philadelphia. Ryan, often referred to as the "Bossuet of the American Church" and perhaps the outstanding pulpit orator of his day, took formal possession of Philadelphia on Aug. 20, 1884. Under his care the archdiocese was provided with such charitable institutions as St. Joseph's Protectory for Girls, Norristown; St. Vincent's Home and Hospital, Philadelphia; St. Francis Vocational School, Eddington; and the Philadelphia Protectory for Boys, near Phoenixville. In 1890 Cahill High School for Boys (later called Roman Catholic High School), Philadelphia, was opened as the first free central Catholic high school in the U.S. In 1908 Ryan announced that a free central high school for girls (later called the John W. Hallahan Catholic Girls' High School) was opened, but he died before its completion in September 1912. A leading figure in the development of Philadelphia's Catholic school system was the diocesan superintendent of schools, Philip McDevitt, later Bishop of Harrisburg.

Ryan took paternal interest in the founding of the motherhouse of the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament for Indians and Colored People, whose foundress, Mother Katherine DREXEL, dedicated her life and her fortune to the salvation of African Americans and Native Americans. At his death on Feb. 11, 1911, he was succeeded by Edmond Francis PRENDERGAST who had been consecrated auxiliary bishop to Ryan on Feb. 24, 1897.

Prendergast. The third archbishop directed the building of many new institutions: Misericordia Hospital, the Chapel of Divine Love, the Archbishop Ryan Memorial Institute for the Deaf, St. Edmond's Home for Crippled Children, the West Philadelphia Catholic High School for Boys, and the Archbishop Ryan Memorial Library at the seminary. He also renovated the cathedral. He died in Philadelphia on Feb. 26, 1918, and was succeeded by Bp. Dennis DOUGHERTY of Buffalo, N.Y., the first native son to be appointed the archbishop of Philadelphia.

Dougherty. The new archbishop was enthroned by Cardinal James Gibbons on July 10, 1918. During his 33-year administration 112 parishes, 145 parochial schools, 53 Catholic high schools, four Catholic colleges, 12 hospitals, and 11 homes for the aged were established. He consecrated 15 bishops and ordained over 2,000 priests. On March 7, 1921, Pope Benedict XV made him a cardinal priest. He died at his residence on the 61st anniversary of his ordination and was buried in the crypt of the Cathedral of SS. Peter and Paul. At that time the archdiocese had 1,896 priests (1,224 diocesan), 401 parishes, nine chapels, 62 missions, 6,825 sisters, seven colleges, 35 parochial and diocesan high schools, 21 private high schools, 330 parochial elementary schools, 20 private elementary schools, and 1,114,122 Catholics.

O'Hara. On Nov. 28, 1951, John F. O'HARA, former Bishop of Buffalo, was appointed the ninth ordinary of Philadelphia and was solemnly installed on Jan. 9, 1952. Although he was never in good health, O'Hara's episcopate in Philadelphia was most active and vigorous. Embarking on a bold and imaginative program to expand education facilities, he created 30 parishes, opened 55 new parish schools, and improved about 300 others. Fourteen new high schools were built, including Cardinal Dougherty High School with a capacity of 6,000 students. He was actively interested also in the education of the mentally retarded. He continued the unique system of financing Catholic education in the archdiocese, under which the pastors of the students, not the students, are responsible for their tuition. On Nov. 16, 1958, he was named cardinal priest by Pope John XXIII. Two years later on August 28, he died in his see city; his remains were interred in Sacred Heart Church at the University of Notre Dame, South Bend, Ind. After his death the archdiocese was further divided when the Diocese of Allentown was established Jan. 28, 1961, with Joseph McShea, former auxiliary bishop of Philadelphia and administrator of the archdiocese, as first bishop. The counties of Philadelphia, Bucks, Chester, Delaware and Montgomery were left to Philadelphia.

Krol. On Feb. 11, 1961, John Joseph KROL (b. Oct. 26, 1910), former auxiliary bishop of Cleveland, was nominated archbishop of Philadelphia and installed on March 22. Born in Cleveland, Ohio, Krol was ordained on Feb. 20, 1937, and served as chancellor of the Cleveland diocese. He was appointed auxiliary bishop of Cleveland and vicar-general on July 11, 1953, and consecrated September 2.

In the wake of Vatican II, Philadelphia itself was caught up in the dramatic changes in church life, as well as the societal changes of America itself. If the city escaped some of the unrest which sprung from the Civil Rights Movement, it was in no small measure attributable to the success the newly created Archbishop's Commission on Human Relations, which helped bring the different factions together.

A first English-language Mass was celebrated Nov. 29, 1964; new rituals, increased roles for the laity and the reinstatement of the permanent diaconate came in time fashion, however introduction of Saturday evening Mass was delayed until 1983, when it was mandated for the entire American Church. Krol had opposed the change, but on some other issues he was quite open; for example, the Philadelphia archbishop was vocal in his support of disarmament and opposition to nuclear weapons. On June 26, 1967 he was created cardinal, along with another Philadelphian, Francis Brennan, dean of the Holy Roman Rota.

In 1976, the Bicentennial Year, Philadelphia hosted the 41st International Eucharistic Congress. Among the dignitaries who attended the Congress were MOTHER TERESA of Calcutta, Dorothy DAY, Archbishop Fulton J. SHEEN, Cesar CHAVEZ, Dom Helder CAMARA and President of the United States Gerald Ford. Absent for reasons of health was Pope Paul VI, but almost unnoticed among the host of prelates attending was the future Pope JOHN PAUL II, Poland's Cardinal Karol Wojtyła, who had received his red hat with Krol and who had become a fast friend.

In 1977 Philadelphians traveled to Rome for the canonization of their fourth bishop, John Neumann, as America's first male saint. The cause had begun under Cardinal Dougherty, then languished until it was given new life by Krol, with beatification in 1963. Under his administration too, the cause for Mother Katharine Drexel was also begun and seen through the critical early stages.

After the death of Paul VI and the brief pontificate of John Paul I, Krol was able to participate in the 1978 election of Cardinal Wojtyła as John Paul II. The new pope visited Philadelphia as part of an American tour the following October, and his Mass on Logan Square facing the cathedral attracted more than a million people of all faiths. On Dec. 8, 1987, Cardinal Krol, then 77 and in poor health, announced his retirement.

Bevilacqua. On Feb. 11, 1988, Anthony J. Bevilacqua (born June 17, 1923), was installed as Archbishop of Philadelphia at the Cathedral Basilica of SS. Peter and Paul. Ordained a priest for the Brooklyn Diocese June 11, 1949 and possessing degrees in both canon and civil law, he was ordained as an auxiliary bishop for Brooklyn on July 24, 1980 and was named 10th Bishop of Pittsburgh on Oct. 7, 1983, before his appointment to the Archdiocese of Philadelphia.

As Archbishop of Philadelphia one of his first priorities was a reorganization of the archdiocesan administration to a system of regional vicariates overseeing the parishes and secretariats to administer the diocesan offices. This established a chain of command which freed the archbishop from much of the administrative detail, affording more time for pastoral care. An early pleasant duty for Bevilacqua was that of leading a pilgrimage to Rome for the Nov. 20, 1988 beatification of Mother Katharine Drexel (1858-1955), the Philadelphia born heiress who had renounced her wealth to found the Sisters of the BLESSED SACRAMENT, a congregation devoted to the evangelization and care of Native Americans and African-Americans.

A major challenge in Philadelphia — as elsewhere — were problems associated with shifts in Catholic population from the core city to the suburbs, and skyrocketing costs which were driving students away from the archdiocese's vaunted parochial school system. During Bevilacqua's administration, after exhaustive study some under-utilized churches would close or be twinned with another parish, as would schools. In certain cases the closed parishes were replaced by evangelization centers which would be charged with reintroducing the Church to the affected region. The archdiocesan high schools were a special problem; and in 1992 consultants recommended drastic reduction in the number of schools. Through aggressive fund-raising and elimination of restrictive territorial admission policies, most of the schools were saved; tuition increases were reduced to affordable levels and enrollment stabilized. Parishes also underwent self-studies, and were formed into clusters which enabled group cooperation and joint programs.

Bevilacqua, who was elevated to the College of Cardinals on June 28, 1991, fostered the spirituality of his archdiocese through a nine-year renewal leading up to the Jubilee Year 2000. As part of the renewal, a “Bless Me” hotline was inaugurated in 1997 on telephone and Internet, resulting in thousands of inquiries from people who wished to be reconciled with the Church or counseling by a priest. Ecumenism and interfaith relations were also encouraged during the Bevilacqua years with special outreach to Philadelphia’s Jewish community. Seminary formation was also enhanced in 1991 through the addition of a separate “Spirituality Year” away from St. Charles Borromeo Seminary, Overbrook at Mary Immaculate Seminary in Northampton, Pa., which was acquired from the Vincentians for this purpose. A shortage of Spanish-speaking clergy was partly addressed in 1999 through the adoption of a parish in Arecibo, Puerto Rico where Philadelphia priests and seminarians could become accustomed to the special needs of Hispanic Catholics, and in that same year a Spanish-language radio program was launched by the archdiocese. With the Oct. 1, 2000 canonization of Mother Katharine Drexel, Philadelphia had the unusual distinction, at least at the time, of being the only diocese in the United States with two canonized saints. Her Feast day is March 3.

Bibliography: D. MAHONEY, Historical Sketches of the Catholic Churches and Institutions of Philadelphia (Philadelphia 1895). J. L. J. KIRLIN, Catholicity in Philadelphia (Philadelphia 1909). H. J. NOLAN, The Most Reverend Francis Patrick Kenrick (CUA Studies of American Church History 37; Washington 1948). G. E. O’DONNELL, Saint Charles Seminary, Overbrook, 2 v. (Philadelphia 1943–53). American Catholic Historical Researches (Overbrook, Pa. 1885–). Archives, Archdiocese of Philadelphia. T.J. DONAGHY, Philadelphia’s Finest: A History of Education in the Catholic Archdiocese, 1692–1970 (Philadelphia 1972). J.F. CONNELLY, The History of the Archdiocese of Philadelphia (Philadelphia 1976).

[J. F. CONNELLY/L. BALDWIN]

PHILEAS OF THMUIS, ST.

Martyr, first known bishop of THMUIS in the Nile Delta, Egypt; d. Feb. 4, 306. Phileas was a learned and distinguished native of Thmuis who held many civil offices before his conversion and consecration as bishop. Imprisoned during the Diocletian persecution, he joined with three other Egyptian bishops, Hesychius, Pachomius, and Theodorus, in addressing a protest to Meletius, bishop of Lycopolis. Meletius’s adherents had invaded their dioceses as well as that of Alexandria, thus beginning the MELETIAN SCHISM. The Acta of Phileas’s martyrdom and EUSEBIUS in his Ecclesiastical History (8.9.7–10, 12; 8.13.7) tell of Phileas’s trial and beheading with Philoromus, an eminent Roman official. The Acta and a stirring letter of Phileas to his people of Thmuis, given by Eusebius, are regarded by most scholars as authentic.

Feast: Feb. 4 (Latin Church); Jan. 9 (Greek Church).

Bibliography: EUSEBIUS, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 271 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 23:687; Ecclesiastical History (Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte 9.1–3; 1903–09) 2:758–764, 772–773. R. KNOPF and G. KRUEGER, eds., Ausgewählte Märtyrerakten (Tübingen 1929) 111–116. Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) 18:509–510, letter of bishops. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d’archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 14.1:703–709. F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 1061. H. DELEHAYE, Analecta Bollandiana 40 (1922) 299–314. F. HALKIN, ibid. 81 (1963) 1–27. Revue d’histoire ecclésiastique 58 (1963) 136–139. M. SIMONETTI, Studi agiografici (Rome 1955) 109–132. Apologie de Philéas, évêque de Thmouis, ed. V. MARTIN (Cologny-Genève 1964).

[M. C. MCCARTHY]

PHILEMON, EPISTLE TO

This shortest of PAUL’s letters has occasioned some interesting discussion in the history of interpretation. Though even Marcion had not challenged its authenticity, in the fourth century Jerome, Chrysostom, and Theodore of Mopsuestia had to defend it against detractors who claimed that it taught nothing of theological interest or ecclesiastical discipline and that it had not been written by Paul. Luther and Calvin expressed appreciation for it, and even F. C. Baur, who sought to reduce the Pauline corpus to Romans, Galatians, and the Corinthian correspondence, was impressed by its attractive form and Christian spirit. Paul’s authorship of the letter is generally recognized today. As with Philippians, the other undisputed captivity epistle, the place of writing is unclear; Caesarea, Ephesus, and Rome have been proposed. Probable dates range from the mid-50s to early 60s.

The most thorough treatment of this epistle is a 1985 work by Norman Petersen. He maintains that if the letter is lacking in theological concerns, it is of great interest from a sociological perspective. He moves from examining the narrative world of the letter to the symbolic universe of the complete undisputed Pauline corpus (Rom, Gal, 1 & 2 Cor, Phil, Phlm, 1 Thes) in an effort to ascertain the sociological interactions among Paul, Philemon and his house church, and the wider Christian community.

Despite the fact that interpretations of Philemon often stress its private, domestic character, J. D. G. Dunn notes that Apphia, probably Philemon’s wife, is addressed with the feminine singular form “the sister,” suggesting that a serious effort was being made to treat women as individuals and as Christians in their own right. Also, the designation of Archippus as “fellow soldier” probably indicates one who had carried out an independent commission in the service of the gospel. Finally, the church in Philemon’s house is addressed, intimating that Philemon probably recognized the church’s right to advise on internal matters, even though slaves probably constituted part of the house church.

While it is often argued that Onesimus simply ran away from Philemon, reputable scholars maintain that Onesimus had offended Philemon but did not feel completely in the wrong and left with the purpose of seeking Paul’s intercession in mending matters. Dunn suggests that if this is true the dynamics of this three-way relationship cause the letter to be even more fascinating than Petersen suggests. It would mean that what Onesimus perceived as most likely to work in his favor was Philemon’s character as a Christian who had not enforced his belief on his entire household; it might also suggest that Onesimus was already attracted to Christianity. Thus perhaps there is more of theological interest in this letter than is sometimes presumed.

Modern aversion to SLAVERY as an institution is probably not a fair standard against which to judge the acceptance of the institution in ancient times. The ethical question then was the treatment of slaves. Paul’s ultimate appeal to Philemon clearly reflects the baptismal formula of Gal 3.28. Onesimus is now “in Christ” and the distinction between master and slave no longer exists within that relationship.

Bibliography: D. L. ALLEN, “The Discourse Structure of Philemon: A Study in Text Linguistics,” in Scribes and Scriptures: New Testament Essays in Honor of J. Harold Greenlee, ed. D. A. BLACK, (Winona Lake, Ind. 1992). 77–96. J. M. G. BARCLAY, “Paul, Philemon and the Dilemma of Christian Slave-Ownership,” New Testament Studies 37 (1991): 161–86. J. D. G. DUNN, The Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon (New International Greek Testament Commentary; Grand Rapids, Mich.-Carlisle 1996). D. B. MARTIN, Slavery as Salvation: The Metaphor of Slavery in Pauline Christianity (New Haven, Conn. 1990). N. R. PETERSEN, Rediscovering Paul: Philemon and the Sociology of Paul’s Narrative World (Philadelphia 1985).

[V. KOPERSKI]

PHILIBERT OF REBAIS, ST.

Abbot; b. Eauze, Gascony, France, c. 616–620; d. Abbey of Noirmoutier, France, Aug. 20, 685. He was the son of a noble family. His father, Philibald, became bishop of Aire. Philibert entered the household of King Dagobert I (d. 630), where he met OUEN OF ROUEN, and c. 636 he joined Ouen’s BENEDICTINE foundation at Rebaix. He succeeded AGIL as abbot, but left to study other monastic observances, visiting especially LUXEUIL and BOBBIO. In 654 he founded the monastery of JUMIÈGES and a convent for women at Pavilly. His criticism of Ebroin (d. 681), the mayor of the palace of Neustria, led to his imprisonment in Rouen. After his release he founded Noirmoutier, perhaps refounded Quinçay near Poitiers, and supervised Luçon. His kindness to neighboring families is particularly remembered. He died at Noirmoutier, but because of the unsettled times, the travels imposed on the monks with the relics of their saint spread his cult widely. In 875 his body was buried in the abbey church of St. Valerian at TOURNUS, where it remains.

Feast: Aug. 20.

Bibliography: Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1826–) 5:568–606. R. POUPOARDIN, Monuments de l’histoire des abbayes de Saint-Philibert (Paris 1905). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l’ordre du calendrier avec l’historique des fêtes, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 8:372–377, full bibliog. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 2:597, 600–601. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 2:6805–10. L. JAUD, Saint Filibert . . . (Paris 1910). H. CURÉ, St. Philibert le Thaumaturge (Marseille 1936).

[V. I. J. FLINT]

PHILIP, ANTIPOPE

Pontificate: July 31, 768. Philip was chaplain of the monastery of St. Vito on the Esquiline in Rome; nothing else is known of his earlier life. In the confusion after the antipope Constantine II (767–68) had been taken captive, a Lombard priest named Waldipert attempted to install Philip as pope. Constantine had represented the interests of the military elite, and the former papal chancellor, Christophorus, had approached the Lombards to help depose Constantine. Waldipert, serving as a personal envoy of the Lombard king Desiderius (757–74), accompanied Christophorus’ brother Sergius in an attack on Rome that ended Constantine’s papacy. Upon entering Rome, Waldipert found Philip, managed to have him acclaimed pope by some citizens, and took him to the Lateran. When Christophorus heard of this, he appeared outside the city and swore he would not enter until Philip was removed. At this, one of Christophorus’ partisans, a military official named Gratosus (who would later become duke of Rome), forced Philip to return to his monastery. Then Christophorus entered the city and soon oversaw the election of Pope Stephen III (IV) (768–72). No harm appears to have come to Philip, and nothing more is known of him.

Bibliography: L. DUCHESNE, ed. Liber Pontificalis (Paris 1886–92; repr. 1955–57) 1.470–71. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum Romanorum (Leipzig 1885–88; repr. Graz 1956) 1.284. H. K. MANN,

The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages (London 1902–32) 1(2).367–74. T. F. X. NOBLE, The Republic of St. Peter (Philadelphia 1984). J. N. D. KELLY, The Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 94–95.

[P. M. SAVAGE]

PHILIP, APOSTLE, ST.

A native of Bethsaida (Jn 12.21) and one of Our Lord's first disciples (Jn 1.43–44). In the Synoptic Gospels he is mentioned only in the lists of the Apostles (Mt 10.3; Mk 3.18; Lk 6.14; see also Acts 1.13). In St. John's Gospel, however, he has a larger role: he was one of the first disciples called by Our Lord and was instrumental in introducing Nathaniel to Jesus (Jn 1.45–49); moreover, he is mentioned in connection with the miraculous feeding of the five thousand (6.5–7) and with Jesus' discourse at the LAST SUPPER (14.8–9). Certain friendly Gentiles singled out Philip as an intermediary in their desire to meet Jesus (Jn 12.20–23). Apart from these facts, nothing more is known about the Apostle. In the 2d century, Polycrates, Bishop of Antioch (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3.31.3), and Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 3.6.16) identified him wrongly with PHILIP THE DEACON. Papias of Hierapolis (c. A.D. 140) may have been responsible for this idea (see Eusebius, ibid. 3.39.9). Epiphanius (Heres. 26.13) mentions a Gospel forged in the name of Philip that was used by the Egyptian Gnostics. In the Pistis Sophia, a remarkable Gnostic work of the 3d century, Philip is accorded a prominent place. The feast of the Apostle St. Philip, together with that of St. James the Less, was celebrated in the West on May 1 until 1955, when it was transferred to May 11; the Greeks celebrate it on May 14.

Bibliography: A. WIKENHAUSER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al. (1966) 8:465–466. H. KÖSTER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 5:337–338. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek, 1835–36. H. H. PLATZ, The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, ed. G. A. BUTTRICK (Nashville 1962) 3:785.

[C. H. PICKAR]

PHILIP I, KING OF FRANCE

Reigned from 1060–1108; b. 1052. The son of Henry I (1031–1060) and Anne of Kiev, Philip was consecrated king at Reims in 1059 prior to his father's death. Owing to Philip's accession to the French throne at a young age, Baldwin V of Flanders, his father's brother-in-law, served as regent from 1060 until 1066. In 1072, Philip married Bertha of Frisia, the mother of Louis VI, but he later repudiated her because of his affection for Bertrada of Montfort, wife of Fulk IV of Anjou in 1092. In 1095 at the Council of Clermont, URBAN II excommunicated Philip over his marriage to Bertrada of Montfort, but support from French bishops, who were eager to limit papal interference in the French church, lessened the impact of the papal condemnation. Although most French bishops sided with Philip, the canonist Ivo of Chartres strongly voiced his opposition, which Philip ignored. Philip's antagonism toward the papacy continued throughout his reign. GREGORY VII's attempts to intervene in French episcopal elections, especially those that involved simony and lay investiture, met with stiff resistance from Philip. These issues reached a climax under Pope Urban II, who challenged the elections of the archbishop of Sens and the bishop of Orléans. In an age of religious reform, Philip's contemporaries often regarded him as no friend of ecclesiastical authority. Despite previous quarrels, Philip eventually came to terms with Pope Paschal II at the Council of Troyes (1107), where they reached an agreement over lay INVESTITURE. To enrich his own royal coffers, Philip plundered episcopal lands and religious houses. Yet, Philip provided for some monastic houses, especially those with Cluniac affiliations. In 1079, he re-established his father's house of Saint-Martin-des-Champs as a Cluniac priory. He was buried at the abbey of Saint-Benoit-sur-Loire at Fleury.

Bibliography: SUGER, The Deeds of Louis the Fat, ed. and tr. R. C. CUSIMANO and J. MOORHEAD (Washington, DC 1992). R. FAWTIER, The Capetian Kings of France, tr. L. BUTLER and R. J. ADAM (New York 1960). E. HALLAM, Capetian France, 987–1138 (London 1980). A. LUCHAIRE, Les Premiers Capetians (Paris 1901). A. FLICHE, Le Règne de Philippe Ier, roi de France, 1060–1108 (Paris 1912).

[P. D. WATKINS]

PHILIP II AUGUSTUS, KING OF FRANCE

Reigned 1180 to July 14, 1223, seventh of the Capetian dynasty and the first to control most of France; b. Paris, Aug. 21, 1165; d. Mantes. As king he first overcame attempts by the houses of Champagne and Flanders to control his policies, and then in the late 1180s blunted the greater threat posed by HENRY II's Angevin Empire by inciting Henry's sons to rebellion. When the Angevin died in 1189, Philip's position was so secure that he willingly joined Richard I, the Lion Heart, in the Third CRUSADE.

Home again in 1191, Philip attacked Normandy soon after, hoping for gains during Richard's imprisonment in Austria. Richard's release led to reverses for Philip, but victory ensued after JOHN's accession in 1199. Condemned by Philip for contumacy in 1202, John was easily driven from Normandy; the conquest of his other northern French lands quickly followed; and at Bouvines in 1214 Philip Augustus ensured his supremacy by defeating the forces of John, Otto IV, and Ferrand of Flanders.

Governmental reforms helped to consolidate these gains. Salaried bailiffs were appointed for local administration while the king's council became more competent and professional. The semifederalized great offices of the crown were suppressed, bourgeois support was gained, and attempts to introduce legislation and taxation were made. Philip emphasized his royal position by refusing to do homage to anyone, and his conscious distinction between his powers as a private and a public person led to more modern concepts of political authority.

Philip's relations with the Church were mixed, and his religious policy was often dictated by political considerations. He left the Holy Land purely to add to his domains, and refused INNOCENT III's appeals to head the Albigenian Crusade (see ALBIGENSES). Only an interdict forced him to renounce his third wife in favor of his second; and while his 1213 plan to depose John had been drawn up at Innocent's request, it took threats of excommunication to stop his invasion after John submitted to the pope. Marital problems aside, his personal life showed religious devotion, and he both encouraged the building of Notre Dame and in 1200 granted clerical status to the students of the University of Paris.

Bibliography: L. DELISLE, Catalogue des actes de Philippe-Auguste (Paris 1856). H. F. DELABORDE, Recueil des actes de Philippe-Auguste (Paris 1916). A. LUCHAIRE, Les Premiers Capétiens, in Histoire de France, ed. E. LAVISSE, 9 v. (Paris 1900–11) 3.1:83–284. A. CARTELLIERI, Philippe II. August, König von Frankreich, 4 v. (Leipzig 1899–1922). J. W. BALDWIN, The Government of Philip Augustus: Foundation of French Royal Power in the Middle Ages, (Berkeley and Los Angeles 1986). J. BRADBURY, Philip Augustus: King of France, 1180-1223 (London and New York 1998). G. SIVERY, Philippe Auguste (Paris 1993). G. DUBY, The Legend of Bouvines: War, Religion and Culture in the Middle Ages, tr. C. TIHANY (Cambridge 1990).

[C. T. WOOD]

PHILIP IV, KING OF FRANCE

Reigned 1285 to 1314, called the Fair; b. Fontainebleau, 1268; d. Fontainebleau, Nov. 29, 1314. Philip brought the French monarchy to new heights of power, yet many of his contemporaries and some modern scholars assert that his ministers deserve all the credit (or blame) for his policies. It is true that his agents (Flotte, Nogaret, and Marigny) were forceful personages and that

Philip IV, King of France. (Archive Photos)

Philip himself always let them speak for him on formal occasions. But general policy remained the same for 29 years while ministers changed, and the records show that behind the scenes Philip worked with unflagging industry. Those who have studied the period most carefully suspect that he was responsible for the events of his reign.

The Reign and Its Problems. Philip was a devoted husband, a loyal friend, and a pious Christian. But his piety, without flaw in his private life, showed two peculiarities in public. First, he had no great respect for the leadership of the Roman CURIA. His father's death in the disastrous Crusade against Aragon, a death that left Philip at the age of 17 to cope with a hopeless war and a heavy debt, may have engendered his doubts about papal policies. Second, Philip, the heir of crusaders, the grandson of a saint, the ruler of the largest Catholic country in Europe, believed that the French monarch was as necessary for human welfare as the Roman See. Philip's duty to God and to his people was to strengthen the Kingdom of France, and anyone who interfered with this task, baron or emperor, bishop or pope, was to be swept aside.

He and his advisers had a fairly clear concept of sovereignty. Everyone who was "in and of the kingdom" owed obedience to the king. But what was the kingdom? There were bishops in the south who were virtually independent; there were lands on the border of the Empire that had both French and German connections; worst of all, the two great and wealthy fiefs of Guienne (held by England) and Flanders had almost escaped royal control.

Some of these problems were easily solved. Self-governing towns, many barons, even the great bishops of the Midi had to accept the oversight of royal officials. The French boundary was pushed east at the expense of the Holy Roman Empire; the city of Lyons was annexed. But England fought to retain Guienne, and Flanders fought to keep its autonomy. To gain English neutrality, Philip had to relinquish most of Guienne and marry his daughter to the Prince of Wales (thus creating the later English claim to the French throne). Even then, Philip could not win a complete victory over the Flemings; he acquired only the towns of Lille, Douai, and Bethune.

These wars, fought with paid soldiers, were very expensive. Philip was always short of money; his greatest innovations and his greatest mistakes were due to the fact that he was near bankruptcy during most of his reign. He imposed the first general taxes in French history; he inflated the currency; he expelled the Jews and confiscated their property; he abused judicial procedures to extort large fines from clergy, barons, and towns.

Relations with Boniface VIII. Both financial need and the desire for sovereign independence led to his quarrel with Pope BONIFACE VIII. Philip wanted to tax the clergy without securing papal consent; Boniface forbade this in the bull CLERICIS LAICOS (1296). Philip's ministers accused the clergy of disloyalty and harassed them so that they begged the pope to remove his prohibition. Boniface finally ruled that in an emergency for the defense of the realm the clergy could be taxed by the king.

The second stage of the quarrel came when Philip sought to condemn Bishop Bernard Saisset for treason. Boniface demanded the bishop's release; Philip's ministers charged that this was an attack on the authority of the king and the independence of France. A meeting of representatives of clergy, nobility, and bourgeoisie was held at Paris in 1302, where Pierre Flotte denounced the pope. When the Flemings defeated the French and killed Flotte at Courtrai, there was a brief lull, but Guillaume de Nogaret was soon ordered to carry on the case. He accused the pope of simony, vice, and heresy, and persuaded most French communities, including cathedral chapters and monasteries, to appeal for a general council to depose Boniface. Nogaret went to Italy in 1303 to arrest the pope and succeeded in holding him prisoner at Anagni for a few days. A popular uprising freed the aged pontiff, but he died of the shock within a month.

The next pope, BENEDICT XI, did not live long enough to settle the affair. After his death, mysterious intrigues, still imperfectly known, resulted in the election in 1305 of the archbishop of Bordeaux as CLEMENT V. Clement, throughout his pontificate, acted as if he were under obligation to Philip. To end the scandal caused by continued attacks on Boniface's memory, he praised the king's pious zeal and absolved Nogaret and his aides. When Philip accused the Knights TEMPLAR of heresy, probably because he coveted the wealth that they had gained by operating as bankers, Clement suppressed the order even though its guilt was not proved. Worst of all, disorders in Italy gave Philip a chance to urge Clement to remain north of the Alps. The pope finally settled at AVIGNON, just across the Rhone from France. Thus began the "Babylonian Captivity" (see AVIGNON PAPACY).

Philip's determination to be a strong king in a united France made a lasting impression on the French government. All branches of the administration were professionalized, and the number of royal officials greatly increased. The high court of Parlement at Paris was strengthened and a much more efficient financial administration was created. France was already on the road to becoming a bureaucratic state, but Philip accelerated the process.

Nevertheless, whereas Philip's administrative structure survived, his unscrupulous methods tarnished the prestige of kingship. Revolts broke out after his death, and for the next century, the French monarchy rocked from crisis to crisis. Philip had very nearly exhausted the reservoir of goodwill that had been left by his grandfather, St. LOUIS IX. It took another saint, JOAN OF ARC, to replenish it.

Bibliography: R. FAWTIER, ed., Campes royaux, 1285–1314, 3 v. (Paris 1953–58); Registres du trésor des chartes (Paris 1958). J. VIARD, ed., Les Journaux du trésor de Philippe IV le Bel (Paris 1940). A. A. BEUGNOT, ed., Les Olim, ou registres des arrêts, 4 v. (Paris 1839–48); Ordonnances des rois de France, ed. E. J. DE LAURIÈRE et al. 23 v. and suppl. (Paris 1723–1847). Recueil des historiens des Gaules et de la France (Paris 1738) v.21–24, contains many important documents and chronicles of the reign. P. DUPUY, Histoire du différend d'entre le pape Boniface VIII et Philippe le Bel (Paris 1655). C. V. LANGLOIS, Saint Louis, Philippe le Bel, les derniers Capétiens directs, 1226–1328, v.3.2 of Histoire de France, ed. E. LAVISSE, 9 v. (Paris 1900–11). R. FAWTIER, L'Europe occidentale de 1270 à 1380. 1^{re} partie. De 1270 à 328, v.6.1 of Histoire générale, ed. G. GLOTZ (Paris 1933). G. A. L. DIGARD, Philippe le Bel et le Saint-siège de 1258 à 1304, 2 v. (Paris 1936). K. WENCK, Philipp der Schöne v. Frankreich: Seine Persönlichkeit u. das Urteil der Zeitgenossen (Marburg 1905). R. SCHOLZ, Die Publizistik zur Zeit Philipps des Schönen und Bonifaz' VIII (Stuttgart 1903). J. R. STRAYER and C. H. TAYLOR, Studies in Early French Taxation (Cambridge, Mass. 1939). J. R. STRAYER, "Philip the Fair: A 'Constitutional' King." American Historical Review 62 (1956–57) 18–32. J. R. STRAYER, The Reign of Philip the Fair (Princeton 1980). D. POIREL, Philippe le Bel (Paris 1991).

[J. R. STRAYER]

PHILIP II, KING OF SPAIN

Reigned 1556 to 1598: b. Valladolid, May 21, 1527; d. the Escorial, Sept. 13, 1598. He was the son of Charles I of Spain (the Emperor CHARLES V) and Isabella of Portugal. He received his early education from Juan Martínez Siliceo, Bishop of Cartagena, an indulgent tutor, and Juan de Zúñiga, grand-commander of Castile, who provided a more systematic education, imparting piety and seriousness to his pupil as well as an extensive knowledge of history and an appreciation of scholarship, the arts, and politics.

His Empire. Philip's apprenticeship in government began in 1543 as regent in Spain during his father's absence in Germany. From 1549 Philip traveled in the Low Countries and Germany, and in 1554 played his first major role in the Emperor's foreign policy with his marriage to Mary Tudor, Queen of England, on which occasion his father gave him the Kingdom of Naples and the Duchy of Milan. When the Emperor decided to retire, he abdicated to Philip on Oct. 25, 1555, the sovereignty of the Low Countries; on Jan 16, 1556, Philip received the crown of Castile with Navarre and the Indies, the crown of Aragon-Catalonia with Sardinia, and the crown of Sicily. He was now the ruler of a world empire. But it was not the empire of Charles V. After the Peace of Cateau-Cambrésis with France in April 1559, Philip returned from the Low Countries to the Iberian Peninsula, where he remained for the rest of his reign. Financial difficulties forced him to settle in Spain, impose his authority, and withdraw from the widespread commitments of his father. In the process, the empire he ruled changed, not in size, but in character. Less ecumenical than that of Charles V, who had already lost Germany, it was also more solid, being firmly based in the Iberian Peninsula, and was essentially Castilian in character.

Domestic Tragedies. Philip II, whose accession was exceptionally free of complication, found it less easy to provide for his successor. He married Maria of Portugal in 1543; within two years she had died in bearing him the Infante Don Carlos. In 1554 he married MARY TUDOR, but the union was barren of children and, on Philip's side, of love. His marriage to Elizabeth of Valois in 1559 was also a diplomatic arrangement, but Philip grew to love his third wife and was desolate when she died in 1568, having borne him two surviving daughters. Her death was preceded by that on July 25, 1568, of Philip's problem son, Don Carlos, who had been mentally and physically abnormal. As a result of his deranged and dangerous meddling in affairs of state, Philip regarded him as permanently unfit to rule. He therefore confined him in January 1568, partly in his son's own interest but above all to prevent his succeeding to the throne, and perhaps with the intention of disinheriting him. His enemies accused the King of poisoning his son, a charge not proved by available evidence. In 1579 he married his fourth and last wife, Anne of Austria. Of the five children she bore him, only one survived, and he was to succeed his father as Philip III. These personal tragedies left their mark on Philip II, who behind the mask of sovereignty, was a sensitive man and devoted to his family.

Philip II, King of Spain. (Archive Photos)

Exercise of Power. In other ways, however, Philip was completely attuned to the exercise of power; he took the disaster of the ARMADA with the same equanimity as the triumph of Lepanto. He had a high sense of royal prerogative and with it a notion of personal duty that made him one of the most hard-working monarchs in history. He ruled his empire from his desk, dealing personally with all affairs of state. His distrust of subordinates was due to his anxiety to prevent the crown becoming a cipher in the hands of the aristocracy; his notorious slowness was not simply a defect of character but was imposed by circumstances, for he had to measure the distant repercussions of his acts, governing as he did an immense empire formed of constituent kingdoms separated by vast distances. His system of government was one of absolute monarchy; he was assisted, but never controlled, by his councils and secretaries. He completed the unification of the peninsula, annexing Portugal in 1580 and crushing a separatist revolt in Aragon in 1591. But he always respected the semi-autonomous status of the constituent kingdoms. In the administration of justice, he wrote that “in cases of doubt the verdict must always be given against me.”

“Philip II, King of Spain,” portrait by Titian, 1551.

Concern for Religious Orthodoxy. Philip’s religious beliefs were firmly based and carefully practiced. The affairs of the Church were his daily concern, and he was known to be a friend of religious reform, as St. Teresa of Jesus acknowledged when he assisted her Discalced Carmelite reform. His religious devotion, combined with a taste for literature, art, and science, gave birth to the greatest architectural monument of his reign, San Lorenzo de El Escorial, which was at once a monastery and a palace. Like other contemporary rulers, he was intolerant of religious dissent. One of his first actions when he returned to Spain in 1559 was to attend an auto de fe, one of a series that eliminated the faint traces of Protestantism in Spain; and in 1570 he ruthlessly suppressed a rebellion of Moriscos (convert Moors), in Granada, which the intemperance of the Spanish Inquisition itself had provoked. Philip even permitted the Inquisition to try the Archbishop of Toledo, Cardinal Carranza, whose orthodoxy it questioned and to keep him in prison for 17 years. Philip regarded these as essential measures of state to strengthen his power, the first because Protestantism itself was unapproachable, the second because Granada was a potential bridgehead for his Islamic enemies in the Mediterranean. His concern for orthodoxy was also seen in the support he gave Pope PIUS IV for reconvening the Council of TRENT in 1562 and for the Council’s adoption of a specifically Catholic position.

Relations with Rome. However, on two issues (episcopal jurisdiction and the prerogatives of the crown, especially in ecclesiastical appointments), Philip II adopted a national point of view, and he published the decrees of Trent in his dominions only with the proviso that they would not encroach on the ecclesiastical rights of the Spanish crown. Philip supported the Spanish INQUISITION against Rome as well. Indeed, on ecclesiastical jurisdiction and on foreign policy Philip clashed with almost every pope with whom he dealt, which makes it impossible to regard him as “the secular arm of the Counter Reformation.” After the victory of LEPANTO (1571), Philip withdrew from the papal-led Holy League and, in spite of the Pope’s pressure, began a policy of disengagement from the Turks. In northern Europe, he was equally reserved about papal policy. He long repudiated aggressive Catholic plans against ELIZABETH I, for he had no wish to further the cause of MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS, and thus of his enemy, France. When he finally decided to invade England, it was for a series of political and economic reasons rather than religious ones; his objective was to strike at the source of English harassment of Spain and its empire. Philip wanted the cooperation of the papacy for financial reasons and for moral support of his claim to dispose of the crown of England. But his alliance with SIXTUS V in 1587 was not a fruitful one. The Pope had little faith in the Armada and feared that a Spanish victory would overthrow the balance of power in Europe; for the same reason, he and his successors refused to support Philip II in his claim to the French throne in the last years of his reign. Philip II, on the other hand, believed that his own cause and that of the Church were identical.

Bibliography: J. LYNCH, Spain Under the Hapsburgs (Oxford 1964–) v.1. R. B. MERRIMAN, Rise of the Spanish Empire in the Old World and in the New, 4 v. (New York 1918–34) v.4. F. BRAUDEL, La Méditerranée et le monde méditerranéen à l’époque de Philippe II (Paris 1949). L. FERNÁNDEZ Y FERNÁNDEZ DE RETANA, España en tiempo de Felipe II, 1566–1598, 2 v. (Historia de España, gen.

ed. R. MENÉNDEZ PIDAL 19; Madrid 1958). J. H. ELLIOTT, Imperial Spain, 1469–1716 (Toronto 1963). H. LAPEYRE, “Autour de Philippe II,” Bulletin Hispanique 59 (1957) 152–175. P. GALLAGHER and D. W. CRUICKSHANK, eds., God’s Obvious Design: Papers for the Spanish Armada Symposium, Sligo 1988 (London 1990). M. J. RODRIGUEZ-SALGADO and S. ADAMS, eds., England, Spain and the Grand Armada 1585–1604: Essays from the Anglo-Spanish Conferences, London and Madrid 1988 (Edinburgh 1991). H. KAMEN, Philip of Spain (New Haven and London 1997). J. MARTÍNEZ MILLÁN, ed., Felipe II, 1527-1598: Europa y las monarquía católica (Spain 1998). E. MARTÍNEZ RUIZ, ed., Madrid, Felipe II y las ciudades de la monarquía (Madrid 2000).

[J. LYNCH]

PHILIP BENIZI, ST.

Fifth general of the Servite Order; b. Florence, Italy, Aug. 15, 1223; d. Todi, Umbria, Italy, Aug. 23, 1285. Born of the renowned Benizi and Frescobaldi families, Philip studied first in Paris and then in Padua, where he completed his course in medicine. After practicing medicine among the poor in Florence for a year, he entered the SERVITES (1254) as a lay brother and was sent to Monte Senario near Florence. While on a journey to Siena in 1258, his great ability and learning, hitherto hidden from his brethren, was accidentally discovered; he was immediately required to prepare for Holy Orders and was ordained to the priesthood the following year. On June 5, 1267, Philip was elected the fifth superior general. He proved to be a great administrator and zealous apostle. He preached and reputedly worked miracles throughout Europe; the order gained many members, e.g., Peregrine Laziosi and Andrew Dotti. In the GUELF-GHIBELLINE controversy he acted as peacemaker throughout Italy with great success. Aware that his death was approaching, Philip placed the order in the hands of Bl. Lotharingus Stufa in 1285 and retired to a poor Servite convent in Todi. He was buried in the Servite church there; many miracles followed. Pope LEO X approved his cult in 1516, and CLEMENT X canonized him in 1671.

Feast: Aug. 23.

Bibliography: P. SOULIER, Life of Saint Philip Benizi (New York 1886). P. SOULIER et al., eds., Monumenta Servorum Sanctae Marine, 20v. (Brussels 1897–1930) v. 2. L. PAZZAGLIA, S. Filippo Benizi nella storia e nella leggenda (Rome 1953). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints. rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 3:385–388. G. M. BESUTTI, Saint Philippe Benizi, tr. J. M. DESGRANDCHAMPS, ed. A. M. CIMICHELLA (Montreal 1985). L. DOMINICI, Todi e S. Filippo Benizi: itinerario storico artistico (Todi 1985).

[M. B. MORRIS]

PHILIP OF GRÈVE

Canon and master at Notre Dame, a native of Gravia Parisiensis, today the site of La Place de l’Hôtel-de-Ville, Paris; d. c. 1220–22. Since the 16th century most histories of medieval literature mistakenly identified him with his more famous contemporary PHILIP THE CHANCELLOR, theologian and chancellor of the University of Paris (1218–36) and outstanding poet of his time. Henri Meylan shattered this age-old identification (1927): manuscripts and obituaries prove that the two are not the same. Philip of Grève was a canon at Notre Dame, Paris (since 1182), and magister since 1104; he was teaching canon law there c. 1200. He died as dean of the cathedral chapter of Sens. He is not the author of the poetry formerly ascribed to him nor of any known writings. Philip the Chancellor was the poet, and he is always identified in the manuscripts as “the Chancellor,” never as Philip of Grève.

Bibliography: H. MEYLAN, Les questions de Philippe le Chancelier (Thèse de l’École Nationale des Chartres; Paris 1927). P. GLORIEUX, Répertoire des maîtres en théologie de Paris au XIII^e siècle (Paris 1933–34) 1:282–284; v. 17–18 of Bibliothèque Thomiste (Le Saulchoir 1921–). M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 3:930. H. TISCHLER, “New Historical Aspects of the Parisian Organa,” Speculum. A Journal of Mediaeval Studies 25 (1950) 25. N. WICKI, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:450.

[G. M. COOK]

PHILIP OF HARVENGT

Praemonstratensian abbot and ecclesiastical writer; b. Harvengt(?), near Mons (Belgium), early 12th century; d. Bonne-Espérance, April 11 (13?), 1183. He received a good classical education, probably at the cathedral school at Cambrai. He entered the monastery of Bonne-Espérance and in 1130 was made prior under the first abbot, Odo. Difficulties ensued with St. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX over an incident involving a monk from Bonne-Espérance who wished to join the house of Clairvaux. The conflict caused considerable notoriety, and opposition to Philip was aroused. In 1149 he was removed from his position by the general chapter of the order, and with seven other monks he was sent to another monastery. He was reinstated at Bonne-Espérance in 1151, and in 1158 he succeeded Odo as abbot. Under Philip’s rule the abbey prospered, the collection of manuscripts continued, and intellectual activity among the monks flourished.

His writings reveal a vast knowledge of the ancient classics, the Bible, and the writings of the Church Fathers. He stands as a distinguished representative of pre-scholastic Augustinian philosophy. Many of his works were written for the education and inspiration of his own monks. Of these, the De institutione clericorum is a mirror of his views on monastic and clerical life. In his commentaries on Scripture, of which that on the Canticle is most important, he employed the allegorical explanations typical of his time. He wrote also a number of biographies, including those of St. Augustine and Odo of Rivreulle. In his theological teaching he failed to do complete justice to the human nature of Christ and its capacity to suffer, and, although he accepted the idea of the Assumption of the Blessed Mother, he denied the Immaculate Conception in the sense in which it was propounded at that time.

His works were edited at Douai in 1621 by Nicolas Chamart, Abbot of Bonne-Espérance, and were included in Migne (Patrologia Latina v.203). However, modern scholarship has ascertained that certain treatises in these editions have been falsely ascribed to Philip of Harvengt.

Bibliography: Analecta Praemonstratensia 14:37– and 189–; 15:129–166; 35:336–; 37:5–30, 177–231. M. FITZHUM, Die Christologie der Praemonstratenser im 12. Jahrhundert (Marienbad 1939) 62–129. F. PETIT, La Spiritualité des Prémontrés aux XXI^e et XIII^e siècles (Paris 1947) 129–. A. ERENS, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 12.1:1407–11.

[J. C. WILLKE]

PHILIP OF HESSE

Landgrave, confidant of Martin LUTHER, Philipp MELANCHTHON, and Ulrich ZWINGLI; b. Marburg, Hesse, Nov. 13, 1504; d. Kassel, Hesse, March 31, 1567. The son and successor of Landgrave William II, he married Christina of Saxony in 1523. He was called “the Magnanimous” because of his interest in political, church, and educational reform. He established a model government in Hesse before 1526 and founded the University of Marburg in 1527.

After his conversion to LUTHERANISM in 1525, his diplomatic and military activities greatly affected the process of the German reformation. Influenced by correspondence with Zwingli, Philip attempted to reconcile Zwingli and Luther at the abortive Disputation of Marburg in 1529. In the next year he publicly subscribed to the Confession of AUGSBURG. After his defeat of the peasant forces under Thomas Münzer at Frankenhausen in 1525, he was a recognized leader of the Protestant princes and was instrumental in the formation of the SCHMALKALDIC LEAGUE in 1531. His bigamous marriage with Margaret von der Saal in 1540 aroused strong controversy within the ranks of the reformers and alienated the support of certain of the princes. In the consequent weakening of the league, Philip was forced into signing the Treaty of Regensburg (1541). The War of the Schmalkald (1546–47) was disastrous to the landgrave. Defeated at Mülberg he was imprisoned until 1552; he displayed little interest in German affairs after his release.

Bibliography: W. HEINEMEYER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 5:332–333. S. SKALWEIT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:452–453. K. SCHOTTENLOHER, Bibliographie zur deutschen Geschichte im Zeitalter der Glaubensspaltung, 1517–85, 6 v. (Leipzig 1933–40; repr. Stuttgart 1956–58, v. 7, 1962–) 6:450–451.

[P. L. HUGHES]

PHILIP OF THE BLESSED TRINITY (ESPRIT JULIEN)

Discalced Carmelite theologian and writer; b. Malaucene, (Vaucluse), July 19, 1603; d. Naples, Feb. 28, 1671. Philip took the Carmelite habit and was professed on Sept. 8, 1621. In 1629 he was sent to the Carmelite Missions; first to the mission of Ispahan, Syria, then to the mission of Malabar (now Kerala, India), where for 12 years he taught philosophy and theology. From 1634 to 1639 he was prior in Goa, where he received and professed Bl. Denis of the Nativity, the protomartyr of the DISCALCED Carmelites. He returned in 1659 to Europe, where he was appointed consultor of the Congregation of the Index; he was elected definitor general, and finally became general of the Discalced CARMELITES of the Italian Congregation (1665–68). Although reelected to the office (1668–71), he died on a visit to the convent of Naples before the completion of his term. Among his many works are the fruits of his years of teaching: Summa Philosophica (Lyons 1648); Summa Theologiae Mysticae (Lyons 1656); Cursus Theologicus (Lyons 1653–65); Itinerarium Orientale (Lyons 1649); Tractatus de Immaculata Conceptione (Lyons 1667).

Bibliography: MELCHIOR DE STE. MARIE, “Pour une biographie du P. Philippe de la Trinité,” Ephemerides Carmeliticae 2 (1948) 343–403. H. KUMMET, Die Gotteserfahrung in der “Summae Theologiae Mysticae” des Karmeliten Philippus a SS. Trinitate (Würzburg 1938). B. HONINGS, “La Contemplazione secondo Filippo della SS. Trinité,” Ephemerides Carmeliticae 13 (1962) 691–713. ANASTASE DE SAINT-PAUL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 12.1: 1412–13.

[O. RODRIGUEZ]

PHILIP THE CHANCELLOR

Theologian and philosopher; b. Paris, between c. 1160 and 1185; d. Paris, Dec. 23, 1236. H. Meylan has shown that Philip is not the same as PHILIP OF GRÈVE, with whom he has been identified from the first edition of his Distinctiones super psalterium (ed. J. Bade, Paris 1523). Philip was a son of the archdeacon Philip of Paris. There is no record of his youth and education, but it is certain that he studied theology, and probably Canon Law, in Paris. He was first mentioned in a charter of 1211 as archdeacon of Noyon, an office he held until his death. In January 1217, however, he received from Honorius III the dispensation pro defectu natalium and permission to change to the Diocese of Paris. He is first mentioned as chancellor in the testament of Bp. Peter of Nemours (June 1218). The office of chancellor, although subordinate in the chapter, was important in Paris because of the statute of Innocent III (1215) giving to the chancellor limited jurisdiction over professors and students of the university.

The first half of Philip's tenure was disturbed by conflicts with the university. In 1219 he was summoned to the papal Curia for excommunicating masters and students, but was discharged in grace by Honorius III because his accusers did not appear. In the controversy over the appointment of WILLIAM OF AUVERGNE as bishop of Paris (1228), Philip supported Philip of Nemours, who had been elected by the chapter. In the university strike of 1229 to 1231, he sided with the university and the pope against the bishop and the regent, Blanche of Castile. In a sermon in Orléans he exhorted masters and scholars who had retired there to return to Paris. He readily submitted to the Parens scientiarum of Gregory IX, April 13, 1231, that ended the university strike.

Philip was a prominent preacher, often charged with special commissions. At the famous assembly of the masters of theology at Paris in 1235, he defended the permission of the benefice cumulation, which was probably a cause of the Dominicans' enmity. He remained friendly with the Franciscans and was buried in their church. The Summa quaestionum theologiarum (Summa de bono), Philip's chief work, dates from between 1230 and 1236 and probably was never finished. It is a systematic presentation of theology from the point of view of the good. Although the materials originate from the Augustinian tradition, most of the solutions it proposed were new, influenced by Aristotelian philosophy. He also wrote many sermons and approximately 20 theological Quaestiones.

Bibliography: É. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (New York 1955). Chartularium universitatis Parisiensis, ed. H. DENIFLE and E. CHATELAIN (Paris 1889–97) v.1. H. MEYLAN, Les Questions de Philippe le Chancelier (Paris 1927). P. GLORIEUX, Répertoire des maîtres en théologie de Paris au XIII^e siècle (Paris 1933–44) 1:282–284. A. M. LANDGRAF, Einführung in die Geschichte der theologischen Literatur der Frühscholastik (Regensburg 1948) 132–133. V. DOUCET, "A travers le manuscrit 434 de Douai," Antonianum 27 (1952) 531–580. J. B. SCHNEYER, "Philipp der Kanzler—ein hervorragender Prediger des Mit-alters," Münchener theologische Zeitschrift 8 (1957) 174–179. N. WICKI, "Philipp der Kanzler und die Pariser Bischofswahl von 1227–1228," Freiburger Zeitschrift für Philosophie und spekulative Theologie 5 (1958) 318–326. J. B. SCHNEYER, Die Sittenkritik in den Predigten Philipps des Kanzlers (Münster 1963).

Philip of Hesse.

[N. WICKI]

PHILIP THE DEACON

One of the seven men chosen by the Apostles to perform certain administrative tasks for the poor in the early Christian community at Jerusalem (Acts 6.5–7). Because of his zeal in preaching the gospel he became known as Philip the Evangelist (Acts 21.8). According to Acts 8.4–5 Philip was among the Christians who were forced to leave Jerusalem after the martyrdom of Stephen. He preached the gospel with great success in Samaria (Acts 8.5–12), where Simon Magus became one of Philip's converts (Acts 8.13). On the road from Jerusalem to Gaza Philip instructed and baptized the Ethiopian minister of Queen Candace (Acts 8.26–39), and thereafter he apparently preached the gospel in every coastal city from Azotus (Ashdod) to CAESAREA in Palestine (Acts 8.40), where he became a permanent member of the early Christian community. Years later at the end of St. Paul's third missionary journey (A.D. 58), Philip acted as host to him and his party (Acts 21.8–9). In this same context mention is made of the fact that Philip had four virgin daughters endowed with the gift of prophecy; these, like Agabus and other Christian prophets, foretold the trials and difficulties that awaited Paul upon his return to Jerusalem. According to St. Basil (Menol. 1.69; Patrologia Graeca 67:103) Philip became bishop of Tralles. He is mentioned in the Roman Martyrology on June 6.

Bibliography: A. WIKENHAUSER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al. (1966) 8:464. G. STRECKER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 5:338. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek, 1835. H. H. PLATZ, The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, ed. G. A. BUTTRICK (Nashville 1962) 3:785.

[C. H. PICKAR]

PHILIPPA MARERI, BL.

Poor Clare abbess; b. Petrella Salto, Cicoli, Abruzzi, Italy, 1200; d. Villa Casardita, Feb. 16, 1236. Philippa was the daughter of Philip, first lord of Mareri. She early became acquainted with the work of St. FRANCIS OF ASSISI. Not wishing to become involved in the quarrels between her brother Thomas and FREDERICK II, she refused all marriage proposals and withdrew with a few of her friends to a grotto near Mareri for a life of prayer and penance. Thomas reconciled himself to her decision and on Sept. 28, 1228, gave her a church in Villa Casardita, now known as Borgo San Pietro. She restored the building and built a convent that is the POOR CLARES' oldest convent in the kingdom of Sicily. On July 21, 1231, GREGORY IX took the house under his protection and integrated its community with the Poor Clares. The pious abbess recruited many young women of quality, was recognized for her humility, austerity, and charity, as well as for her organizational ability, and governed the monastery until her death. Her spiritual director, ROGER OF TODI, was present at her deathbed and delivered the eulogy at her burial. Philippa's reported apparitions and miracles gave rise to a local cult, and on June 27, 1247, INNOCENT IV granted an indulgence of 40 days annually on her feast day. In the 14th century a rhythmic office was composed in her honor (ed. Rome 1545, Naples 1668). In 1806 the cult was extended to the Franciscans and to the Dioceses of Rieti and Sulmona; new lessons in her honor were approved in 1838.

Feast: Feb. 16.

Bibliography: A. CHIAPPINI, "S. Filippa Mareri," Miscellanea francescana 22 (1922) 65–119. L. ZILIANI, La baronessa santa (Bergamo 1935). LÉON OF CLARY, Lives of the Saints and Blessed of the Three Orders of Saint Francis, 4 v. (Taunton, Eng. 1885–87) 1:257–260. Vies des saintes et des bienheureux 2:365–367. G. FUSSENEGGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 8:457.

[J. CAMBELL]

PHILIPPIANS, EPISTLE TO THE

Place, Date, and Unity of Composition. Philippians has in the past generally been classified with the "CAPTIVITY EPISTLES," although the disputed status of Ephesians and Colossians leaves only Philippians and Philemon remaining in this category. The question of where Philippians was written continues to be debated. Four suggestions have been made as to provenance: Rome, Ephesus, Caesarea, and, more recently, Corinth. In the absence of compelling evidence, however, it seems best not to base one's exegesis of the epistle on the issue of where it was written.

Because of its association with what might have been Paul's final captivity, Philippians was long held to be one of Paul's later letters. However, even though Paul contemplates his death within the letter, he ends up expressing strong confidence that he will continue to live for the sake of the Christians in Philippi. In her detailed study of Rom 6:5, Florence Morgan Gillman has argued that the terminology there has been influenced by the morph-vocabulary in Phil 3. Additionally, there appear to be indications that the Letter to the Philippians was composed around the time of the Corinthian correspondence, most likely before 2 Corinthians. The first two chapters of 1 Corinthians, like Philippians, appear to share a background which contrasts a human view of wisdom with the Wisdom of God that 1 Cor 1:24 identifies as the crucified Christ. 2 Cor 8:1–5 appears to be a later reflection on the situation described in Philippians, and 2 Cor 8:9 seems to echo Phil 2:5–11.

Another point of debate regards the integrity of the letter. Particularly since the mid-20th century, it had become fashionable in discussion of this letter to propose that in fact Philippians is composed of parts of two or even three letters. Since 1981, however, the pendulum seems to be swinging in the other direction, initially stimulated by an article by David Cook that exposed the pseudo-scholarship of a number of exegetes who claimed to find early evidence for the "partition theory" in the 17th century writing of Stephanus LeMoigne. The fact that advocates of a partition theory are by no means in agreement as to where the supposed "obvious breaks" in the letter occur has led to the existence of at least 16 versions of this theory, as David Garland has pointed out. Wolfgang Schenk (1983) has attempted to "objectively" demonstrate the lack of integrity of the letter using the methodology of text linguistics, but in fact an appeal to linguistics cannot conclusively resolve the issue either way, as Jeffrey Reed has demonstrated. There is no manuscript evidence to indicate that the text ever existed in anything other than its canonical form. Also, as recent commentaries (see bibliography) have demonstrated, good sense can be made of the extant letter.

The Relationship between Paul and the Philippians. One item that has never been in dispute is the manifest affection between Paul and this community and the high regard in which its members were held by Paul, evidenced not only in this letter, but also in 2 Cor 8:1–5. The mutual participation in the gospel which extended to sharing of material resources is indicated by the frequency of koinōnia terminology (Phil 3:10). This was the only one of the churches Paul founded from which he accepted financial support for his own use “from the beginning of the gospel” (Phil 1:5, 4:15–16; cf. 2 Cor 11:9), contrary to his usual practice as illustrated in 1 Thes 2:9 and 1 Cor 9:1–15.

While in every one of his undisputed letters Paul at times uses the terms brother(s) or sister to indicate the addressees’ equal status with him in the gospel, normally this is balanced by indications of his superior status as one who has a right to teach, as illustrated, for example in the use of apostle (Rom 1:1, 1 Cor 1:1, 2 Cor 1:1, Gal 1:1; cf. Phlm 1:14), father (1 Cor 4:15, 1 Thes 2:11; cf. 2 Cor 12:14), or mother (1 Thes 2:7; cf. Gal 4:19 and 1 Cor 3:1–1). Only in Philippians is there no explicit claim to superior status. At first glance this appears more remarkable insofar as modern scholars are increasingly inclined to agree with the observation of Chrysostom that it appeared to him the women mentioned in Phil 4:2 were the heads of the church at Philippi. In appealing to them to resolve their dispute, which may have been due to serious concerns regarding the threat of persecution, Paul is extremely courteous, although he takes the almost unprecedented step of naming persons involved in a dispute. This may indicate that Paul can rely on the strength of their relationship. In Galatians and 1 Corinthians, while he expresses disapproval in much stronger terms, the only person who is named as being party to an earnest disagreement is Peter (influenced by James; see Gal 2). The difference between his report of undisguised anger at Peter and the gentle courtesy extended to Euodia and Syntyche is understandable if Paul was expressing sensitivity to their serious situation which involved the threat of persecution.

Koinōnia in Suffering (Phil 3:10). The tendency to read Philippians as dealing with relatively minor problems in intra-community harmony has increasingly been replaced by a viewpoint which recognizes that most likely the letter was directed to a community in danger of persecution and even death for its belief in the gospel Paul preached. The initial impetus for this change of perspective was the 1930 commentary of Ernst Lohmeyer, which read the epistle against the background of the possible impending martyrdom of Paul (Phil 1:20–23) and also of the Philippian community (Phil 1:29–30). Such a reading makes better sense of Phil 2:5–11, which is preceded by an exhortation to have the same “mind” as Christ (or “as you have in Christ”). Earlier objections to such an “ethical” interpretation of 2:5–11 were primarily based on the perceived incongruity between putting forth the model of Jesus’ obedience even unto death as an incentive for the community to improve its internal relations. However if the disputes within the community are viewed not as petty squabbles, but rather as serious disagreements as to how to deal with the possibility of impending persecution, the exhortation to obedience in Phil 2, immediately following the example of the freely chosen obedience of Jesus unto death, makes better sense. Likewise, Paul’s impassioned plea in Phil 3 to beware of the advocates of circumcision is more understandable if perhaps some in the community might have been considering the option that accepting this mark of Jewishness could be a means of avoiding Roman persecution. Philippi was a city in which abstaining from participation in Roman cult would have been noticeable, but Jews were exempt from such participation.

Reversal of Values. Phil 3:7–11 testifies to a profound reversal of values on Paul’s part as the result of his encounter with the risen Christ. Not only his former privileged status in Judaism, but everything other than Christ is now accounted as worthless. The 15th century mystical writer Dionysius the Carthusian pointed out the similarity of this passage to Wis 7:7–9. It is in the Book of Wisdom that the notion of a righteous sufferer apparent in the Book of Isaiah becomes explicitly linked with the hope of resurrection for the just. In encouraging this community which, together with him, is “knowing” the koinōnia of Christ’s sufferings, Paul holds out to them his own hope that he and they will likewise experience the power of Christ’s resurrection (Phil 3:10), when the one who did not consider equality with God something to be used for his own advantage (Phil 2:6) “will transform the body of our humiliation that it may be conformed to the body of his glory, by the power that also enables him to make all things subject to himself” (Phil 3:20–21, NRSV).

Bibliography: D. A. BLACK, “The Discourse Structure of Philippians: A Study in Text Linguistics,” Novum Testamentum 37 (1995): 16–49. M. BOCKMUEHL, The Epistle to the Philippians, Black’s New Testament Commentary 11 (London 1998). G. F. HAWTHORNE, Philippians, (Word Biblical Commentary 43; Waco, Texas 1983). V. KOPERSKI, “Feminist Concerns and the Authorial Readers in Philippians,” Lowain Studies 17 (1992): 269–292. v.

KOPERSKI, "Textlinguistics and the Integrity of Philippians: A Critique of Wolfgang Schenk's Arguments for a Compilation Hypothesis," Ephemerides theologicae Lovanienses 68 (1992): 331–367. V. KOPERSKI, The Knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord: The High Christology of Philippians 3:7–11, Contributions to Biblical Exegesis and Theology 16, (Kampen, Netherlands 1996). P. T. O'BRIEN, The Epistle to the Philippians: A Commentary on the Greek Text, New International Greek Testament Commentary (Grand Rapids, Mich 1991). L. PORTEFAIX, Sisters Rejoice: Paul's Letter to the Philippians and Luke-Acts as Received by First-Century Philippian Women, Coniectanea Biblica, New Testament 20 (Stockholm 1988). J. T. REED, A Discourse Analysis of Philippians: Method and Rhetoric in the Debate over Literary Integrity, JSNTSuppl 136, (Sheffield 1997). W. SCHENK, Die Philipperbriefe des Paulus (Stuttgart 1984). M. SILVA, Philippians, Wycliffe Exegetical Commentary (Chicago 1988).

[V. KOPERSKI]

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENT CHURCH

Also known as Iglesia Filipina Independiente (IFI), or more popularly as the Aglipayans, after its founding leader and first supreme bishop, Gregorio Aglipay. The IFI emerged out of the intense nationalism that accompanied the 1898 Philippine revolt against the Spanish and the resulting strong anti-Spanish and anti-friar sentiments directed against the PATRONATO REAL system that resulted in a church dominated by bishops and clerics appointed by the Spanish Crown. It is in communion with the U.S. Episcopal Church since 1961 and the Old Catholic Union of Utrecht since 1965. Its national office is located in Manila.

History. During the Philippine Revolution (1898), Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo and other Filipino leaders, wishing to overthrow both the political power of the Spaniards and the spiritual power of Spanish friar-bishops, persuaded Gregorio Aglipay (1860–1940) to head the Church in the Philippines by appointing him military vicar-general (Oct. 20, 1898). For his anti-Spanish rhetoric and anti-friar efforts, he was excommunicated by Abp. Nozaleda of Manila (April 29, 1899). Aglipay had been ordained (1889) and had labored in the Manila Archdiocese. He tried to obtain spiritual jurisdiction by persuading the imprisoned bishop of Nueva Segovia to appoint him ecclesiastical governor of that diocese. Supported by the Filipino clergy, Aglipay assembled the "synod" of Paniqui (October 1899). Forced to flee before the advance of the U.S. army of occupation, he led the Filipino resistance in Ilocos Norte but surrendered with other guerrilla leaders (April 1901).

In April of 1901 two priests representing the anti-Spanish nationalist movement went to Rome to request papal recognition of the actions of Aguinaldo and Aglipay, and the establishment of an indigenous hierarchy to replace the discredited Spanish patronato real bishops. Finding themselves rebuffed, the resolve of the Filipino nationalist clergy hardened. Isabelo de los Reyes, Sr. (1864–1938), newly returned from political imprisonment in Spain, proclaimed the establishment of the Philippine Independent Church (Iglesia Filipina Independiente or IFI) on Aug. 3, 1902. Aglipay was chosen supreme bishop and had himself "consecrated" bishop by 12 priests. About 36 Filipino secular priests joined him, some of them being similarly "consecrated." Consecration by priests was defended on the ground that the priesthood was the essential order, while the episcopacy was merely a title of rank.

Highly successful at first, the IFI could claim the loyalty of some one-quarter to one-third of the total Christian population of Philippines at the peak of its influence in 1904. The Aglipayans seized Catholic churches, rectories, and cemeteries. These were ordered restored to the Catholic Church by a Philippine Supreme Court decision (Nov. 24, 1906). Because no bishops joined the movement, the church lost the apostolic succession. It maintained a presbyteral transmission of the threefold ordained ministry until 1948, when the U.S. Episcopal Church consecrated three bishops with valid apostolic succession, who in turned transmitted the historic episcopate to other IFI bishops.

Teachings. The original doctrines of the IFI are contained in the epistles (1902–03) and the doctrinal books published after 1904. Their author, Isabelo de los Reyes, Sr., a Philippine senator and trade unionist, returned to the Catholic Church in 1936. Aglipay was unsuccessful in his attempt to be elected president of the Philippines in 1935. In 1940 the former Senator Santiago Fonacier succeeded him as supreme bishop.

From its early days, two principal factions co-existed uneasily within the IFI, one Unitarian and the other Trinitarian. This situation lasted until 1946, when a bitter feud erupted between these two factions. The Trinitarian faction had its bishops reconsecrated by U.S. Episcopalians in 1948 and sued the Unitarian faction for sole rights to the name and property of the original IFI. After prolonged litigation, in 1955 the Trinitarian faction, under Isabelo de los Reyes, Jr., as supreme bishop, was awarded by the Filipino Supreme Court the right to the name and possessions of the original IFI.

Bibliography: P. S. DE ACHÚTEGUI and M. A. BERNAD, Religious Revolution in the Philippines: The Life and Church of Gregorio Aglipay, 1860–1960, 2 v. (Manila 1960–66). I. R. RODRÍGUEZ, Gregorio Aglipay y los orígenes de la Iglesia Filipina Independiente (1898–1917), 2 v. (Madrid 1960).

[P. S. DE ACHÚTEGUI/M. A. BERNAD/EDS.]

PHILIPPINES, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Philippine archipelago consists of 7,107 islands stretching southward from the southern coast of China; the largest are Luzon in the north and Mindanao in the south. Central Philippines comprises several medium-sized islands known as the Visayan Islands. Stretching from the southwestern tip of Mindanao toward Borneo is a chain of small islands collectively known as the Sulu Archipelago.

There is evidence of human settlements in the islands as early as 20,000 B.C. First to arrive were the small black people called Negritos by the Spaniards. They were driven into the mountainous interior when brown-skinned Malays migrated to the islands. Today, one finds various hill tribes such as the Aetas and Ifugao of Luzon and the Mansakas, Mandayas, and Bukidnon of Mindanao, many of whom still practice their traditional religions. Malay Filipinos occupy the lowlands and constitute the majority of the population. The modern Republic of the Philippines is one of only two countries in Asia that have a predominantly Roman Catholic population (the other country being East Timor).

Arrival of Spaniards. In March 1521 Ferdinand Magellan arrived in search of spices and converts for Charles I (Emperor Charles V). It was his son Prince Philip, later King PHILIP II, whose name was bestowed on the islands by Villalobos in 1542. Lapulapu, a native chieftain of Cebu, resisted Magellan's claim of Spanish sovereignty and mortally wounded him. In 1565 Miguel Lopez de Legazpi established the first permanent Spanish settlement in Cebu. In 1571 Legazpi moved his headquarters to Manila, making it the capital of the colony. By the end of the century, most of the lowlands were under Spanish rule, except for some southern islands, which had been Muslim since the late 14th or early 15th century. When the Spaniards encountered the Muslims in the Philippines, their hostile attitudes based on Muslim-Christian encounters in Europe (the struggle for independence from Moorish rule in the Iberian Peninsula) colored their outlook and relations; these very negative attitudes were also transmitted to non-Muslim Filipinos.

Systematic Christianization. An organized program of evangelization of the Philippines was begun in 1565 by the AUGUSTINIANS who accompanied Legazpi's expedition. They were followed by FRANCISCANS (1578), JESUITS (1581), DOMINICANS (1587), and AUGUSTINIAN RECOLLECTS (1606) from both Spain and Mexico. Manila became a bishopric in 1579 and an archbishopric in 1595. The Spanish system of the PATRONATO REAL facilitated the implementation of the evangelization program. Under Capital: Manila.

Size: 115,651 sq. miles.

Population: 82,841,518.

Languages: Filipino (based on Tagalog) and English (both official); eight major dialects: Tagalog, Cebuano, Ilocan, Hiligaynon or Ilonggo, Bicol, Waray, Pampango, and Pangasinense.

Religions: Catholics 85% (this places the Philippines as the world's third largest local Church, after Brazil and Mexico). The population of southwestern Mindanao and Sulu is predominantly Muslim.

this arrangement, the Spanish crown gave financial support and protection to the Church in the Philippines while exercising a large measure of control over its activities. Missionaries traveled to the Philippines in the king's ships. While engaged in mission work, they were entitled to a stipend drawn from either the colonial government directly or from the right to tribute in certain territories (encomiendas) into which the country was initially divided. The encomienda system was gradually abandoned during the 17th century after widespread criticism of extortion and other abuses.

On the other hand, the appointment of missionaries to a parish or mission station was subject to the approval of the governor as vice-patron. In fact, it was Philip II himself who determined that each missionary group should have its own section of the country for evangelization purposes. Under this system the Church in turn exerted great influence on government policy. The early missionaries often sought to protect the natives from the abuses of the conquistadors and encomenderos; they had a vigorous leader in Fray Domingo de SALAZAR, OP, the first bishop of the Philippines. The synod that he summoned in 1582 clarified many difficult problems regarding the conquest, settlement, and administration of the country in accordance with Christian ideals and principles of justice.

The Philippine Church of the 16th century certainly took sides, and it was not with the rich and powerful nor with their fellow Spaniards, but with those who were oppressed and victims of injustice. Church historian J. N. Schumacher notes: "Skeptics have often questioned the reality of the rapid conversion of 16th-century Filipinos. If one wishes the answer, it is to be found right here, that the Church as a whole took the side of the poor and the oppressed, whether the oppressors were Spaniards or Filipino principales."

Mission Methods. The Spanish missionaries in the Philippines employed a variety of approaches to evangelization. The scattered clan villages were gathered together into larger communities (pueblos, cabeceras); often this implied radical lifestyle changes and hence could only be accomplished with difficulty and very gradually. Instruction was given in native languages, as few Filipinos outside the Intramuros area of Manila were ever able to read, write, or speak Spanish with any proficiency. In most missions primary schools supplied the new Christian communities with catechists and local officials. Religion was made to permeate society by substituting splendid liturgical and paraliturgical observances (fiestas, processions, novenas) for the traditional rites and festivals; many pious associations of prayer and charity were formed and promoted.

Education and social services were almost exclusively the concern of the Church during the entire period of Spanish rule. By the end of the 16th century, Manila had three hospitals, one for Spaniards, another for natives, and a third for the Chinese. The first two were administered by Franciscans, the third by the Dominicans. In 1611, the Hospitallers of St. John of God established their hospital ministry in the Philippines. In 1595, the Jesuits opened a grammar school for Spanish boys that later developed into the University of San Ignacio and had attached to it the residential college of San José, founded in 1601 and today the San José Seminary. The year 1611 saw the beginnings of the Dominican University of Santo Tomás, which continues today as a vibrant educational center. In 1640 the Dominicans also took charge of the College of San Juan de Letrán, started about a decade earlier by a zealous layman for the education of orphans. Various religious communities of women established themselves in Manila in the 17th and 18th centuries; frequently, they undertook the education of girls. In 1684, Ignacia del Espíritu Santo founded the first religious institute for local Filipino women, the Religious of the Virgin Mary (RVM).

The considerable funds required for the support of these schools, hospitals, and charitable works came from pious donations and legacies, called obras pías; they were often invested in the galleon trade or in large agricultural estates, the so-called friar lands. At the same time, the friar lands were leased to tenant cultivators for development and administration, an arrangement that led to frequent conflicts of interest and a deepening resentment of the Church as landlord. This background must be borne in mind for a balanced understanding of the anticlerical reaction that developed in the latter 19th century among a people deeply and sincerely Catholic.

Native Clergy. By the 18th century, Catholicism had taken permanent root in the Philippines as the religion of the people. However, it had one serious weakness: the retarded development of the native clergy. The unsatisfactory results of early experiments in Latin America had made the Spanish missionaries in the Philippines extremely cautious in admitting native candidates to the priesthood. Apparently, only in the late 17th century were native Filipinos ordained. A proposal of Gianbattista Sidotti, a member of Cardinal Charles de Tournon's entourage, to erect a regional seminary in Manila for the whole of East Asia was sharply rejected by the Spanish Crown in 1712. Bishops became increasingly eager for a diocesan clergy completely under their jurisdiction when conflicts over parish appointments continued—conflicts between the bishops and the religious orders on the one hand, and the bishops and the government on the other. Since very few secular priests came to the Philippines from Spain, this meant ordaining large numbers of natives. Archbishop Sancho de Santa Justa y Rufina of Manila (1767–1787) threatened to take away their parishes from the religious who refused to submit to episcopal visitation; he also ordained natives even when they lacked the necessary aptitude and training. The results proved disastrous, confirming the prevailing opinion that natives, even if admitted to the priesthood, were incapable of assuming its full responsibilities. Some improvement in formation and an increase in vocations occurred after the arrival of the VINCENTIANS (1862), who took charge of diocesan seminaries. Even so, the departure of a large proportion of Spanish clergy after the transfer of sovereignty from Spain to the United States (1898) left over 700 parishes vacant.

Religious Clergy. The privileges of the Patronato Real conferred by the Holy See on the Spanish crown were a mixed blessing; they promoted constructive collaboration between the Church and the colonial government, but also led to friction. The focus of difficulty was the religious parish priest and the extent to which he was subject to episcopal visitation and control. The conflict gave rise to series of crises that began as early as the administration of Bishop Salazar (1581-1594). In 1744 the Holy See ruled that religious parish priests were subject to the jurisdiction of the ordinary in all matters pertaining to their parish duties (in officio officiendo) and to their religious superiors in their personal conduct. With the advent of the revolutionary era in Europe and the loss of Spain's American colonies, the terms of the problem in the Philippines changed. It became widely believed in official circles that the presence of the religious in the parishes was a political necessity, not so much because they were religious as because they were Spaniards and could be relied upon to keep the population loyal. This seems to have been the thinking behind the royal decree of 1862 transferring the Mindanao missions from the Augustian Recollects to the newly returned Jesuits (they had been expelled in 1768) and giving the former an equivalent number of parishes in Manila and Cavite, which were consequently taken away from the native clergy. The result was mounting disaffection among the native priests thus deprived or threatened with removal. Naturally, the Filipino priests assailed the government policy; among their active leaders and spokesmen were Fathers Gómez, Burgos, and Zamora, who were executed by the government for alleged complicity in a mutiny of native garrison troops in Cavite (1872).

Emerging Nationalism and Change in the Church. The deaths of these Filipino priests gave a powerful impetus to the emergence of Filipino nationalism by sensitizing Filipinos to injustices by the Spanish colonial government. The movement began as an initiative for colonial reforms led by Dr. José Rizal (1862–1896). After Rizal's arrest and execution for treason, it developed into a separatist movement. The ensuing revolution (1896–1898), which was markedly anti-friar, though usually not anticlerical or anti-Catholic, was cut short by the intervention of the United States, which demanded cession of the Philippines at the conclusion of the Spanish-American War.

Ricardo Cardinal Vidal, Archbishop of Cebu. (Photo by James H. Kroeger)

The change of sovereignty ended the Patronato system. The U.S. policy of Church-State separation was extended to the Philippines, but interpreted in a manner much less favorable to the Church. Thus, a system of nonsectarian public education was established that failed to take into account that the overwhelming majority of Filipinos were Catholics. In addition, there was the strong influence of hundreds of American public-school teachers, most of whom were Protestants. They were popularly known as the Thomasites; a group of 540 arrived in 1901 aboard the U.S.S. Thomas and many others followed. The professed neutralism in religious matters of the state university, founded in 1911, was copied by other privately founded nonsectarian universities, resulting in the undermining of religious belief among the educated class.

One consequence of the revolutionary upheaval was the formation by Gregorio Aglipay, a Filipino secular priest, of a schismatic church along nationalist lines, the Philippine Independent Church or Iglesia Filipina Independiente (1902). Initially it drew a considerable following; however, it soon broke up into factions, some of which rapidly deserted Catholicism in doctrine as well as in discipline. The Supreme Court in 1907 also restored to the Catholic Church much of the property that had been taken over by the Aglipayans. The largest Trinitari-an faction was received into full communion by the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States, established in the Philippines since the beginning of the century.

Protestant denominations sent mission personnel to the Philippines almost as soon as the transfer of sovereignty was effected. In 1901 Presbyterian, Baptist, Methodist, and United Brethren groups, along with societies such as the Christian Missionary Alliance, the YMCA, and the American Bible Society, formed an Evangelical Union to coordinate their activities. A denomination of local origin with an evangelical orientation, the Iglesia ni Cristo, was founded in 1914.

The Church suffered disastrously during the years following 1898; in several respects it would be decades before a condition approximating normalcy would again be reached. From 1898 to 1900 there were almost no resident bishops; diocesan priests remained in very short supply and some had defected to the Aglipayans; seminaries were closed in 1898 and did not reopen until 1904. From 1898 to 1903 the total number of friars decreased over 75 percent from 1,013 to 246. In a word, the Church was in chaos. The true beginnings of the reorganization of the Church began with the persistent efforts of Monsignor Guidi through his negotiations with the U.S. government and the Filipino clergy. Pope LEO XIII, in his apostolic letter Quae mari sinico (1902) reorganized the hierarchy, created four new dioceses, and strongly recommended to the Philippine hierarchy the formation of a native clergy. The first official Provincial Council of Manila was convened in 1907 with the goals of reviving the faith of the Filipinos, restoring the local church, and inspiring in the clergy a spirit of apostolic zeal.

Meanwhile, the severe shortage of priests and religious was met in part by new, non-Spanish missionary congregations of women and men from Europe, Australia, and the United States. For example, male missionary societies that responded to the pressing needs in the 1905-41 period are: Irish REDEMPТОRISTS (1905), MILL HILL MISSIONARIES (1906), Scheut-CICM (1907), Sacred Heart Missionaries and Divine Word Society (1908), De La Salle Brothers (1911), Oblates of Saint Joseph (1915), Maryknoll Missioners (1926), Columban Missioners (1929), Society of Saint Paul (1935), Quebec-PME Society (1937), and Oblates-OMI (1939). Many dedicated female religious came as missionaries to the Philippines, often working in partnership with the societies just mentioned.

By the mid-1920s, the situation was taking a turn for the better; some significant factors in the survival and resurgence of the Church were: the revitalization of Catholic education, growth of Filipino diocesan and religious vocations, a more educated laity, Church involvement in social questions and the labor movement, and the involvement of Catholics in national life. The celebration of the 33rd International Eucharistic Congress in Manila (1937) focused the attention of the Christian world on the Philippines and deeply inspired thousands of Filipino Catholics.

The Church from 1941 to 1965. Japanese forces invaded the Philippines in December of 1941. Allied forces under General MacArthur returned in 1944, but intense fighting continued until the Japanese surrender in August of 1945. Manuel Roxas became president of the second independent Republic of the Philippines on July 4, 1946. The war inflicted heavy damage; 257 priests and religious lost their lives. Priests, brothers, sisters, and dedicated Catholic women and men exhibited great faith and heroism during the war; many suffered imprisonment.

The origins of what is known today as the Catholic Bishops' Conference of the Philippines (CBCP) can be traced back to February 1945 when Apostolic Delegate William Piani, even as the war was still raging, appointed John Hurley, S.J. to take charge of relief work and created the Catholic Welfare Organization (CWO). As the very name indicates, the primary purpose of the CWO was to assist in alleviating the immediate suffering and destruction brought on by the war. On July 17, 1945, the bishops met in Manila for their first meeting after the Japanese Occupation; they requested that the CWO become the official organization of the Hierarchy of the Philippines. In subsequent years, the CWO continued to be largely engaged in relief services and the rehabilitation of Church institutions; it also became the vehicle through which the interests and values of the Church were protected and furthered.

The period from 1945 to 1965 was characterized by rapid recovery from the ravages of war, greatly expanded school system at upper levels, involvement of Catholics (laity, sisters, clergy) in social action, and growing Filipinization of Church structures and administration. The First Plenary Council of the Philippines (1953) focused on the "preservation, enrichment, and propagation of Catholic life" and offered Church resources "to renew the social order." The Church became involved in CATHOLIC ACTION programs with farmers (FFF) and workers (FFW). Guidance from the hierarchy continued; from 1945 to 1965 the CWO issued 39 joint pastoral letters and statements on a variety of subjects relevant to Church and civil society. The Philippine bishops sponsored a Marian Congress in Manila (1954) and inaugurated the Pontificio Collegio-Seminario Filipino in Rome (1961). The period saw renewal programs introduced; the Christian Family Movement (CFM) came to the Philippines in the 1950s; the Cursillos de Cristianidad introduced in 1963

Philippine Roman Catholic church leader Jaime Cardinal Sin kisses the doors of the Manila Cathedral after closing them to symbolically end celebrations marking the 2000th birth of Jesus Christ, or the Jubilee year. (©AFP/CORBIS)

(and the evangelization seminars for various Church sectorial groups they inspired) ignited a renewed fervor of lay involvement in the Church.

In mid-1965, the nation observed a six-day renewal celebration of the quadricentennial of evangelization in the Philippines (1565–1965). The bishops established the Mission Society of the Philippines, signifying Filipino's commitment to spread the faith they had received to other lands. Two more events would prove to shape significantly the experience and mission of this local Church. The first was the election of Ferdinand Marcos as president of the Philippines; the second was the conclusion of the Second Vatican Council.

Authoritarian Rule and Revolt. The Philippine constitution, modeled on that of the United States, established a democratic form of government. Ferdinand E. Marcos, first elected president in 1965, declared martial law in 1972 and imposed a form of "constitutional authoritarianism." The martial law period posed new, challenging questions for the Church and nation. Among the more pernicious effects of the two-decade Marcos era (1965–1986) were increased militarization, insurgency, the absence of juridical procedures, the destruction of democratic processes, economic decline, and pervasive fear. The end result, in the words of a Filipino social scientist, was to place the country “on the trembling edge of a social volcano.” This period proved a time of testing and growth for the Church. Prophetic stances were often met by military abuse, imprisonment and torture, and even deportation for foreign missionaries. The Church evolved a position of “critical collaboration,” cooperating with the regime on programs beneficial to the populace while criticizing government actions judged harmful.

José Rizal.

An important 1977 pastoral letter, The Bond of Love in Proclaiming the Good News, addressed many social problems as well as the divisions within the Church created by various positions taken regarding martial law (e.g. the absence of a clear stance and the long-delayed response on the part of most members of the hierarchy; the infiltration of Church structures and institutions by left-leaning priests and religious). The pastoral letter sought to enunciate a clear, holistic vision to guide the Church’s mission of integral evangelization.

President Marcos announced the lifting of martial law on Jan. 17, 1981. It was carefully timed—three days before the inauguration of President Ronald Regan, and one month before Pope JOHN PAUL II’s visit to the Philippines. In view of the broad range of authoritarian controls that Marcos retained, the lifting of martial law was recognized by the Filipino people as purely cosmetic. The papal visit brought two clear messages to Filipinos: a need for dynamic faith in their lives and an emphasis on justice and peace. Specifically, John Paul II told the president and government leaders: “Even in exceptional situations that may at times arise, one can never justify any violation of the fundamental dignity of the human person or of the basic rights that safeguard this dignity.”

The assassination of opposition leader Benigno Aquino on Aug. 21, 1983, ushered in a period of national mourning and a widespread clamor for justice and truth. In this highly charged atmosphere the Church’s response was crucial. Jaime Cardinal Sin, Archbishop of Manila since 1974, cautioned Filipinos: “If we allow his death to fan the flames of violence and division, then he will have died in vain.” Events moved rapidly in the ensuing years. Filipino consciousness had been awakened; Philippine society had been galvanized. In 1986, Marcos attempted to forestall his overthrow by staging elections. Corazon Aquino, widow of the slain Benigno, won the popular vote, and when the national assembly nevertheless declared Marcos the winner, the Filipino people took to the streets in protest. The Church did not remain on the sidelines during this national crisis. In the volatile context that followed the elections, the Catholic bishops issued a statement declaring that fraud provides no moral legitimacy for any regime. If citizens agreed that the election had been stolen, they should oblige the regime to respect their will. However, resistance “must always be according to the Gospel of Christ, that is, in a peaceful, non-violent way.”

An analysis of the story of the “bloodless revolution” of February 1986 and the roles played by church people and Cardinal Sin is instructive. The overthrow of the Marcos regime was “a victory of moral values over the sheer physical force on which he had relied” [J. Carroll]. It signaled people’s determination not to shed Filipino blood. The revolution was a “movement for active non-violence which was promoted by Church-related groups” [ibid.]. In addition, “the February Revolution was a political event, not a social revolution” [ibid.]. Basic social issues of wealth and power that plagued the nation for generations remained. Many Filipinos still found themselves outside the mainstream of national social, political, and economic life.

The Aquino Presidency. Corazon Aquino, catapulted into office with little experience, served as Philippine president from 1986 to 1992. Her main contribution was the reestablishment of a democratically functioning government. In May 1986, Aquino appointed a constitutional commission (including church people) and asked that a new document be produced within three months. This constitution was ratified overwhelmingly by a national referendum in 1987. Difficult issues facing Aquino included a bankrupt economy, the status of the U.S. military bases, continuing political insurgency (including militant Islamic separatists), natural disasters, a burgeoning population, foreign debt, agrarian reform—the list appeared endless. Yet she guided the Filipino people to free and fair elections in May 1992 and the orderly transfer of power to President Fidel Ramos (1992–1998), the first Protestant to become President of the Philippines.

The Marcos years further accentuated the mass poverty that had long been and continues to be the most tragic aspect of Filipino life. Fifteen years after he was overthrown, his ruinous legacy was still felt: 50 percent of Filipinos lived below the poverty line; servicing the domestic and foreign debt absorbed an average of 40 percent of the government budget; unemployment was at 11.8 percent and underemployment stood at 22 percent; 10 percent of the total population had to work abroad as migrant workers; graft and corruption remained prevalent—even endemic; environmental degradation remained unabated; and infant mortality rated among the highest in Asia. In stark contrast to the widespread immense poverty, there remained pockets of great luxury, brutally emphasizing the gross inequity of income distribution. In the political system, power, like wealth, remained concentrated in the hands of a few influential politicians, business and military people. There appeared to be a self-perpetuating social system and political culture. Politicians, for the most part, had not introduced truly transformative social programs into their platforms.

The Implementation of Vatican II. VATICAN COUNCIL II promoted a major ecclesiological paradigm shift, entailing changes in theologies, values, and orientations. Received by the local Church of the Philippines, it prompted the Filipino bishops to launch a New Evangelization; the social apostolate was among its emphases. Early efforts centered on the formation and support of unions and cooperatives for farmers, laborers, and fishermen. The bishops issued several pastoral letters on social action, justice and development. They sponsored a National Rural Development Congress in 1967, the slogan of which, “The Church Goes to the Barrios,” became axiomatic for the Church’s commitment to development and social justice. The bishops established and funded the National Secretariat for Social Action, Justice, and Peace (NASSA) as their means of coordinating the social justice apostolate. In 1971, the influential Mindanao-Sulu Pastoral Conference (MSPC) was established. In the late 1960s and early 1970s, the Church’s vision of human development as integral to evangelization expanded from a concern for social change to include the need for structural change. It became clear that efforts that had improved the conditions of the farming and working classes could not be sustained without corresponding political leverage. Church involvement in broader social, political, and economic questions became imperative.

Priests leading procession of new missionaries during National Mission Congress. (Photo by James H. Kroeger)

Vatican II’s ecclesiology took root in the Philippine Church, resulting in a mature, vibrant local Church. The presence of strong BASIC CHRISTIAN COMMUNITIES (BCCs) provided grass-roots structures for spiritual, catechetical, ministerial, and social growth. Important strengths developed within this Church: the inductive and experimental approach of theology; its inculturated social teaching; its spirituality of human development; its renewed ecclesiology/missiology; its concrete service to many Filipinos facing diverse dehumanizing social ills; its engagement in social issues in a non-partisan but active manner; its efforts to promote and practice non-violent approaches to socio-political crises; its commitment to create structures of participation in Church and society. The Church also had its witnesses and martyrs: Bishop Benjamin de Jesus, OMI (Feb. 4, 1997), Father Rhoel Gallardo, CMF (May 3, 2000), and Father Benjamin Inocencio, OMI (Dec. 28, 2000).

Priest raising chalice during celebration of the first mass by Spanish missionaries in Philippines, painting. (Photo by Alfredo Juson; James H. Kroeger)

The Philippine bishops have continued, with moderate effectiveness, to use pastoral letters to communicate their holistic vision of the Church's evangelizing mission. The CBCP (Catholic Bishops Conference of the Philippines, canonically constituted in 1967) has issued more than 125 pastoral letters and statements in the period 1965 to 2000, two-thirds of which address social, political, and economic matters. Bishop Claver noted that they have generally proven to be quite accurate barometers of Philippine life. This effective tool of evangelization has promoted a basic Christian "faith-realism" and continually needs to be actualized within viable Christian communities.

The Church today retains moral authority and credibility in Philippine society; its witness to justice and solidarity with the poor, marginalized, and oppressed has established a reservoir of good will and credibility. Yet, as a living organism, she has clear limitations. There were unfortunate divisions in Church leadership, particularly in the mid-1970s; this resulted in missed pastoral opportunities and negative influences on the broader Church membership. Some bishops were hesitant to engage in human development programs and prophetic evangelization especially during the early years of martial law. Although indigenous clergy and religious continue to increase, that growth rate is below the percentage of population increase. There is also a glaring inequitable distribution of apostolic personnel within the country, with an over-concentration in urban areas.

Catechesis and Education. Given the large and rapidly expanding population of the Philippines, catechesis for Catholics remains a basic area of Church renewal. The catechetical ministry has shown considerable growth in vision, publications, institutes, and personnel. The Episcopal Commission on Catechesis and Catholic Education (ECCCE) has published several works and sponsored a variety of national workshops and congresses. Significant publications include The Shape of Religious Education in the Philippines (1979), National Catechetical Directory for the Philippines (1982-1985), Filipino Family Growing in the Faith (1983), The Catechists' Basic Formation Program (1992), Catholic Faith Catechism (1989-1993), Catechism for Filipino Catholics (1997) and its Tagalog translation Katesismo para sa mga Pilipinong Katoliko (2000). ECCCE publishes a quarterly catechetical review, Docete, which has raised interest in and the quality level of catechesis throughout the country.

Significant catechetical congresses were sponsored by ECCCE in the 1990s, beginning with the celebration of the National Catechetical Year (1990). Diocesan catechetical institutes were established in major cities (e.g. Bacolod, Cebu, Davao, Iloilo, Manila, Naga, Vigan, etc.). Other national centers which prepare women and men for their vocation as catechists (e.g. Mother of Life Center, Manila) continue their decades of service. The Philippine constitution affords opportunities for religious education in public schools; this critical area of the catechetical ministry is limited by inadequate numbers of adequately formed catechists.

The Philippine Church continues to operate hundreds of high schools and grade schools as well as over 300 colleges and universities. The Catholic Educational Association of the Philippines (CEAP), founded in 1941, continues to represent the interests of Catholic educational institutions and promote religious instruction. Similar activities are the focus of the Association of Catholic Universities of the Philippines (ACUP), established in 1973.

A unique and successful form of religious education and renewal has evolved in the Philippine Church with the holding of large national congresses, dedicated to particular themes. Delegates were expected to become trainer-facilitators upon their return home; audio and video tapes as well as printed materials of the congresses are made available. This approach proved particularly effective in the years connected with the Great Jubilee 2000. A partial list includes the following: Marian Year (1985), Eucharistic Year (1987), Bible Year (1989), Catechetical Year (1990), World Youth Day (1995), Eucharistic Congress (1997), two Holy Spirit Congresses (1998), Congress on God the Father (1999), Congress on the Trinity (2000), and the National Mission Congress (2000).

Catholic Bishops Conference of the Philippines (CBCP). The 50th anniversary celebrations of the CBCP in 1995 became an opportunity to review and assess the CBCP's structure, mission, and functions. The CBCP amended its constitution and bylaws; it established the new offices dedicated to media, legal matters, research, bioethics, women, and the cultural heritage of the Church. The CBCP now has 33 departments, commissions, and offices to address the many concerns of this local Church. In addition, the bishops relaunched the CBCP Monitor in a new format, initiated a weekly radio program, and established the CBCP Website [<http://www.cbcp.net>]. Responsive to the call for renewal in Tertio Millennio Adveniente, the CBCP issued a series of exhaustive and in-depth pastoral exhortations, designed to address vital aspects of Philippine life and Christianity: Philippine Politics (1997), Philippine Economy (1998), Philippine Culture (1999), and Philippine Spirituality (2000). The bishops concluded the series with their document on the Philippine Church's Mission in the New Millennium. The CBCP also sponsored the large National Mission Congress, which they saw as the "fitting culminating activity" of the Jubilee Year celebrations and the "first step as a Local Church into the Third Millennium."

Additional Ministries. Dialogue and peace-building with a variety of partners remain a continuous commitment of the Philippine Church. It strove to be an instrument of reconciliation during the Marcos years; along with the National Council of Churches in the Philippines, she made several overtures to various leftist and armed groups. In their 1990 pastoral letter, Seek Peace, Pursue It, the bishops laid out a ten-point path to peace. The Church also engages in interfaith dialogue with indigenous and Muslim peoples; the Silsilah movement and the pivotal Bishops-Ulama Forum have worked to foster Muslim-Christian harmony in Southern provinces. The annual Mindanao Week of Peace was begun in 1999.

Local Theologies. The Philippines has an impressive growing body of local theology emerging from local communities. Recurrent themes include evangelization, prayer, spirituality, peace-making and reconciliation, dialogue with peoples, cultures, and religious traditions. Several important theological, pastoral, catechetical, and mission journals are published. Prominent among Filipino theologians are C. Arévalo, T. Bacani, F. Claver, A.

Co, D. Huang, A. Lagdameo, L. Legaspi, L. Mercado, J.-M. de Mesa, O. Quevedo, and L. Tagle.

Continuing Renewal and Commitment. A definite sign of a vibrant local Church is its mission outreach. In mid-2000 Catholic Filipino missionaries numbered 1,329 women and 206 men from 69 religious congregations serving in some 80 countries. The bishops established the Mission Society of the Philippines (1965). Maryknoll founded the Philippine Catholic Lay Mission (1977). Cardinal Sin established the San Lorenzo Mission Institute (1987), whose goal is serving the Chinese; its patron is San Lorenzo Ruiz, the first Filipino saint, canonized in 1987. Pedro Calungsod, beatified on March 5, 2000, inspired the successful National Mission Congress 2000.

A major Church milestone was achieved in the 1991 month-long Second Plenary Council of the Philippines (PCP-II). After three years of intense preparation, a total of 504 participants (including 165 lay faithful) gathered for a comprehensive review and renewal of Christian life. The Council challenged the local Church to be "a Community of Disciples, a Church of the Poor, committed to the mission of renewed integral evangelization, toward building up of a new civilization of life and love in this land." A systematic implementation scheme was elaborated in the National Pastoral Plan, In the State of Mission: Towards a Renewed Integral Evangelization, approved by the bishops on July 11, 1993.

In January of 2001, delegates gathered for the National Pastoral Consultation on Church Renewal (NPCCR) and reflected on "how far we as a Church have fulfilled the grand vision and mission proposed by PCP-II and the National Pastoral Plan." The evaluation was both sober and hopeful: "The Church in the Philippines has, to our shame. . . remained unchanged in some respects. . .; we, as Church, have to confess some responsibility for many of the continuing ills of Philippine society. . . . We rejoice, however, in the perseverance and increase of many movements of renewal. . .; we hear anew God's call to renewal." NPCCR recommitted the Church to nine focused pastoral priorities for the first decade of the new millennium; they center on faith, formation, laity, the poor, the family, community-building, clergy renewal, youth, ecumenism-dialogue, and ad gentes mission.

Providentially, the NPCCR, as originally scheduled, took place during the week immediately following the People Power II events of Jan. 16–20, 2001 that removed Joseph Estrada from the Philippine presidency after only a little over two years of his six-year term; Gloria Macapagal-Arroyo became the fourteenth president and the second woman to hold the highest office in the land. There was muted euphoria; the Church had played a significant role; the event was described as “the gift of national and moral renewal which God empowered the Filipinos to receive.” The tasks ahead were clear: democratic institutions needed strengthening; confidence in government awaited restoration; poverty demanded amelioration; the economy needed rebuilding. The Philippine Church’s commitment to “renewed integral evangelization” took on new depths and urgency.

Bibliography: P.S. DE ACHUTEGUI, ed., The “Miracle of the Philippine Revolution (Manila 1986). C.G. ARÉVALO, “Filipino Theology,” in K. MÜLLER, et al., eds. Dictionary of Mission (Maryknoll 1997) 161-167, with extensive bibliography. T.C. BACANI, Preparing Our Future: The Pope and the Filipino Youth (Manila 1994). F.B. BAUTISTA, Cardinal Sin and the Miracle of Asia (Manila 1987). P. BERNIER and M.G. GABRIEL, eds., Journeying with the Spirit: A Commentary on PCP-II (Quezon City 1993). J.J. CARROLL, Forgiving or Forgetting? Churches and the Transition to Democracy in the Philippines (Manila 1999). Catholic Bishops Conference of the Philippines, Acts and Decrees of the Second Plenary Council of the Philippines (Manila 1992); Catechism for Filipino Catholics (Manila 1997); In the State of Mission: Towards a Renewed Integral Evangelization [National Pastoral Plan] (Manila 1993). F.X. CLARK, Mission and the Philippines: Past, Present, Future, 2d ed. (Pasay City 2000). F.F. CLAVER and P.C. QUITORIO, eds., Anamnesis 1995 (Manila 1996). D. J. ELWOOD, Toward a Theology of People Power (Quezon City 1988). P. GIORDANO, Awakening to Mission: The Philippine Catholic Church 1965–1981 (Quezon City 1988). H. M. GOMEZ, The Moro Rebellion and the Search for Peace: A Study on Christian-Muslim Relations in the Philippines (Zamboanga City 2000). Kasaysayan: The Story of the Filipino People I-X (Hong Kong 1998). J.H. KROEGER, The Philippine Church and Evangelization: 1965–1984 (Rome 1985), with extensive bibliography. J. H. KROEGER, ed., Telling God’s Story: National Mission Congress 2000 (Quezon City 2001). W. J. LAROUSSE, A Local Church Living for Dialogue: Muslim-Christian Relations in Mindanao-Sulu (Philippines) 1965–2000 (Rome 2001), with extensive bibliography. P.C. QUITORIO, ed. CBCP: On the Threshold of the Next Millennium (Manila 1999); Pastoral Letters: 1945–1995 (Manila 1996). J. N. SCHUMACHER, “Has the Philippine Church Been on the Side of the Poor?” Life Forum 16/3-4 (1984) 13-20; Readings in Philippine Church History, 2d ed. (Quezon City 1987). R. L. YOUNGBLOOD, Marcos against the Church (Ithaca, New York 1990).

[J. H. KROEGER]

PHILIPPISM

Named after Philipp MELANCHTHON, designated a Melanchthonian interpretation of Lutheranism, whose conciliatory tone was opposed by Gnesio (genuine) Lutherans (see GNESIOLUTHERANISM). The differences became open and often bitter controversies after Martin Luther’s death (1546) and lasted more or less continuously until the end of the 17th century. The disputes were various and were named for content or for prominent spokesmen, e.g., the Adiaphoristic (indifferent), Majoristic (see MAJOR, GEORG), Synergistic (see SYNERGISM), Interimistic (see INTERIMS), Crypto-Calvinistic (see CRYPTO-CALVINISM), and Calixtine (see CALIXTUS, GEORG) controversies. Sometimes these have received separate treatment without proper emphasis on their common character of Philippism. The questions in dispute were not unimportant, e.g., the role of good works (Solafidism); the nature of Justification; efforts in the direction of ecumenism involving relations with Catholics (for a time some Philippists discarded even the Lutheran German hymns for Latin ritual) and with Calvinists (having mainly to do with the nature of the Real Presence in the Lord’s Supper). Among Philippists, besides Georg Major, were Melanchthon’s son-in-law Caspar Peucer (1525–1602), Justus Menius (1499–1558), Johann BUGHENHAGEN and Nikolaus Crell (1550–1601).

Philippism had practically disappeared by the end of the 16th century—partly because of Melanchthon’s inadequacies as a leader and his lack of realistic political sense; and also because certain Gnesiolutheran leaders, especially Matthias FLACIUS ILLYRICUS, were singled out, as well as erudite and gifted with the power of poignant popular expression; and finally because of shifts in personnel of princely powers. Philippism received new strength in the era of Georg Calixtus. The Philippists helped preserve an irenic, ecumenical tradition in Protestantism.

Bibliography: O. RITSCHL, Dogmengeschichte des Protestantismus, 4 v. (Göttingen 1908–27) v. 2. H. W. GENSICHEN, Dammatus: Die Verwerfung von Irrlehre bei Luther und im Luthertum des 16. Jahrhunderts (Berlin 1955). V. VAJTA, ed., Luther and Melanchthon in the History and Theology of the Reformation (Philadelphia 1961).

[Q. BREEN]

PHILISTINES

The Philistines were a people from the area of the Aegean Sea who invaded the southern coast of Palestine and threatened the Israelites. This article, after discussing their origin and name, treats of their history, language, culture, and religion.

Origin and Name. In the latter half of the 2d millennium B.C., invading Indo-European tribes forced many people living on the islands and coast of the northeastern Mediterranean out of their original homeland. These displaced people attacked the HITTITES in Asia Minor and the cities of the North Syrian and Palestinian coast; they finally invaded Egypt in the reign of Ramses III, who defeated them in a land and naval battle fought on the coast (c. 1170 B.C.). When these so-called Peoples of the Sea were forced out of Egypt, one group, the Tsikal, settled in the coastal area of Palestine at the vicinity of Dor (South of Carmel). Another group that are called prst in the Egyptian records settled along the Palestinian coast south of Dor.

“Samson Captured by the Philistines,” by Guercino. (©Geoffrey Clements/CORBIS)

Their Egyptian designation, pronounced approximately pulastu, corresponds to the name p^hlištīm, Philistines, by which they were known to the Israelites. The name Palestine is derived from it. In a short time the Philistines took over the area between Joppe and the Wadi Ghazzeah and formed a pentapolis, a group of “five cities,” consisting of Gaza, Ashkelon, and Ashdod (later Azotus) on the coast and Gath and Ekron inland. The area was one of the richest tracts of land in Palestine. These independent cities were governed by s^hrānīm (lords), who met in council and could overrule a decision made by an individual “lord” that did not advance the common good (1 Sm 29.1–7). Such ability for concerted action was an important factor in their successful expansion, particularly in the face of the disunited activity of the early Israelites.

History from the Beginnings to David. Early references in the Bible connect the Philistines with this region long before their arrival in the 12th century B.C. Abraham is spoken of as “residing a long time in the land of the Philistines” (Gn 21.34), and Abimelech is named as the king of the Philistines at the time of Abraham (Gn 21.32) and Isaac (Gn 26.1, 8, 18). These references are clearly anachronistic, although based perhaps on some Aegean colony in the Gerar area. The Philistines arrived shortly after the Israelite conquest of the hill country of Palestine and captured the sites of their pentapolis from the Canaanites. The Canaanite population remained as subjects. Apparently the Philistines were well-disciplined soldiers with a strong military tradition, who had a local monopoly on iron, which they used widely in their weapons. Inevitable conflict arose between Israel and the Philistines as the latter expanded into the nearby areas. The first tribe of Israel to feel the force of the Philistines was that of Dan. The elaborated story of the unsuccessful resistance of Samson, as they were pushed out of their holdings on the coastal plain to areas in the far North, is told in Judges ch. 13 to 16 and ch. 18. The Philistines were able to make definite advances also into the hill country of Judah. The Israelites suffered a major defeat c. 1050 B.C. near Aphek and Ebenezer, though they had brought the ark from Shiloh in the hope of stemming the advance of the Philistines by confronting them with the presence of Yahweh. Not only was the army of Israel defeated, but the ark was captured and held by the Philistines, who then spread out through the land (1 Sm 4.1–11). Even the town of Shiloh was captured and the tribal sanctuary destroyed. Although the Philistines did not gain control over all the land (parts of Galilee and the area east of the Jordan were still free), they constituted a grave problem to Israel. This menace was one of the chief reasons for the institution of the Israelite monarchy. The first king of Israel, Saul, had some initial success in stopping the advance of the Philistines (1 Sm 13.1–14.47), but later was decisively beaten and killed in the battle of Gilboa (1 Sm 31.1–10); the Philistines now recouped their recent losses and had Israel at their mercy.

After David, who had been a Philistine vassal in the latter days of Saul, was anointed king, the Philistines attacked his armies in the Valley of Rephaim (near Jerusalem); but David defeated them and drove them back to Gezer (2 Sm 5.17–25). Although the way in which it was effected is not entirely clear, the cities of the Philistine pentapolis were made vassals to King David (2 Sm 8.12), and with this subjugation the Philistine threat to Israel was ended. Subsequently, the Philistines and related peoples (the Cherethi and Pelethi) served as mercenaries in David's army (2 Sm 8.18). From this time on, the history of the Philistines is one of individual cities rather than of a unified people.

Philistia from Solomon to Roman Times. During the reign of Solomon, the Philistines continued as vassal states of Israel, but after his death and the consequent splitting of his kingdom, the Philistine cities, with the exception of Gath, which was controlled by Judah, existed independently and suffered from various encroachments on their territories. In about 815 B.C. the city of Gath was captured by Hazael, King of Damascus, when he invaded Judah (2 Kgs 12.18). Adad-Nirari III of Assyria (811–784 B.C.) forced tribute from the Philistines. Tiglath-Pileser III (745–728) captured both Gaza and Ashkelon in 734. Sargon II (721–705) attacked Gaza and installed his brother as governor of Ashdod. Sennacherib (705–682) also invaded the area and captured several cities, including Ashkelon.

With the fall of the Assyrian Empire, the Philistine cities were beleaguered by Egypt. In his turn, NEBUCHAD-

NEZZAR of Babylon (605–561) assaulted Ashkelon (604 B.C.) and deported its people and their rulers. During the Persian period the provincial organization centered on Ashdod. Gradually this area became almost completely Hellenized and its people allied themselves with the Syrians against the Jews in the Maccabean wars. Still later they became part of the Roman Empire. In the 2nd century of the Christian Era the southern part of the province of Syria was called "Syria Palestina" and thus the name Palestine became extended to the Holy Land generally.

Language, Culture, and Religion. There are no surviving documents written in the Philistine language, and practically nothing is known about it. Most likely the Philistines, soon after their arrival in Palestine, adopted the prevalent Canaanite dialect of the area. The word serānîm (Jos 13.3), used of the heads of the Philistine cities, is equated by many with Greek τύραννος, becoming English "tyrant." This, however, is presumably the Greek borrowing from one of the indigenous languages of Asia Minor, and does little to advance our knowledge.

The absence of adequate archeological excavation of the cities of the Philistine pentapolis is another reason why our information on Philistine culture is limited. The most typical find from scattered sites is the well-known pottery called "Philistine ware." This includes two-handled bowls and beer jugs with strainer spouts; it is generally buff in color and decorated with panels painted with black and reddish-purple designs, either geometric figures or sketches of swans preening themselves. It is almost identical with a type of Mycenaean pottery (stratum III C 1 b) discovered at Sinda and Enkomi in eastern Cyprus. From scenes at Medinet Habu in Egypt it is known that the Philistine soldiers wore plumed headdresses and kilt-like garments. They used a long, leaf-shaped sword that suggests a Danubian provenance.

Little more is known about Philistine religion. All their gods had Semitic names such as DAGON (Jgs 16.23), Ashtaroth (1 Sm 31.10), and Beelzebul (2 Kgs 1.1–16). The Philistines did not practice circumcision, which set them apart from the Israelites and the neighboring peoples who almost universally had this custom. Moreover, the Bible makes allusion to Philistine preoccupation with soothsaying (Is 2.6). At Gezer and Beth-Shan there are indications of burial customs in which the mouth of the corpse is closed with a gold mouth plate. This practice, perhaps reminiscent of the royal burials of Mycenae in the 16th century B.C., is known also from Phoenicia. At Beth-Shan and Tell Fara (in the south) coffins of pottery have been found that have lids with human features roughly modeled on them; this custom could be linked to the Egyptian sarcophagi. There is also evidence for the practice of cremation at Ashkelon, a custom accepted by the Philistines but entirely foreign to Israel. It seems most likely that the religion of the Philistines was a syncretistic one that assimilated notions and practices from the Canaanites, the Egyptians, and their original Aegean habitat.

Bibliography: R. A. S. MACALISTER, The Philistines: Their History and Civilization (London 1914), the most complete work in Eng. though now somewhat outdated. G. VON RAD, "Das Reich Israel und die Philister," Palästina-jahrbuch (Berlin 1905–41) 29 (1936) 30–42. W. F. ALBRIGHT, The Archaeology of Palestine (rev. ed. Pelican Bks; Baltimore 1960) 112–117. J. GRAY, Archeology and the Old Testament World (New York 1962). G. A. WAINWRIGHT, "Some Early Philistine History," Vetus Testamentum (Leiden 1951–) 9 (1959) 73–84. O. EISSFELDT, Philister und Phönizier (Leipzig 1936). K. M. KENYON, Archeology in the Holy Land (New York 1960), esp. ch. 9 which summarizes the archeological evidence gathered at Philistine sites.

[D. A. PANELLA]

PHILLIMORE, JOHN S.

Classical scholar; b. Boconnoc, Cornwall, Feb. 26, 1873; d. Sheffield, Hampshire, Nov. 16, 1926. At Westminster School and at Christ Church, Oxford, he won a succession of honors in classics. Christ Church appointed him a lecturer in 1895, and a tutor in 1898. The following year he succeeded Gilbert Murray in the chair of Greek at the University of Glasgow. Upon the retirement of G. G. Ramsay in 1906, he was transferred to the chair of humanity, a position that to him was most congenial. He produced critical editions of Propertius (1901; 2d ed. 1907) and Statius, Silvae (1905), and an excellent translation of Philostratus, Apollonius of Tyana (2 v. 1912). Throughout his life he published a large number of scholarly articles and learned notes in the Classical Quarterly, Classical Review, Mnemosyne, and similar journals. Phillimore was also a gifted poet, as is evidenced by his Poems (1902) and Things New and Old (1918), and a brilliant lecturer and writer on classical and literary themes in general who exercised a marked influence on Scottish intellectual life. Following his conversion to Catholicism in 1906, he became an occasional contributor to the Dublin Review and developed an interest in Christian Latin poetry. His last work was The Hundred Best Latin Hymns (London 1926).

Bibliography: S. N. MILLER, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900; repr. with corrections, 21 v., 1908–09, 1921–22, 1938; suppl. 1901—) (1922–30) 675–677.

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

PHILLIP, ROBERT

Priest and court chaplain; b. in Scotland, probably in the 1580s; d. Paris, Jan. 4, 1647. Robert was a descendant of the family of Phillip of Sanquhar, but his early life remains almost wholly unknown. The first definite dates for him are those of his ordination as a seminary priest at the Scots College in Rome in 1612 and of his arrest in Edinburgh as a traitor on Sept. 14, 1613. The sentence of death was, however, commuted to exile, and he withdrew to France, where he joined the newly founded Oratory of Cardinal Bérulle. In 1628 he went to England as confessor to Queen Henrietta Maria, and as such he became identified with the interests of the court. His negotiations with Rome for papal financial aid at the time of the Long Parliament and a letter of his to the exiled Walter Montagu led to his denunciation by the parliamentary leaders as a spy and a pernicious influence on the Prince of Wales. Concern for Richelieu, whose name had been introduced into the proceedings, and eventually a direct intervention by Henrietta Maria terminated the inquiries, and Phillip was remanded to Somerset House. When the queen left England for the Hague in March of 1642, he accompanied her and resumed his role as her chaplain in Paris after 1644 until his death.

Bibliography: J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time, 5 v. (London–New York 1885–1902; repr. New York 1961) 5:304–305. M. J. HAVRAN, The Catholics in Caroline England (Stanford 1962). G. ALBION, Charles I and the Court of Rome (London 1935).

[R. I. BRADLEY]

PHILLIPS, GEORGE

Legal historian, canonist; b. Königsberg, East Prussia, Jan. 6, 1804; d. Aigen, near Salzburg, Austria, Sept. 6, 1872. Phillips, whose father was English and whose mother was Scottish, studied law in Berlin and Munich, where he was greatly influenced by Friedrich von Savigny and Johann Eichhorn. Phillips taught history and law at the Universities of Berlin (1827–28), Munich (1834–47), Innsbruck (1850), and Vienna (1851–72). His friend Karl Jarcke influenced his conversion to Catholicism (1828). Together with Guido Görres he founded the Historischpolitischen Blätter (1838). He played a leading role in the revival of German Catholic life and scholarship, but his thought and politics became progressively more conservative. As a champion of ULTRAMONTANISM, he contributed greatly to popularizing in Germanic countries the doctrines of papal primacy and infallibility and to the ultramontane victory at VATICAN COUNCIL I. Joseph de MAISTRE's views had much influence on Phillips, who has been called a German de Maistre. Phillips's numerous writings, composed in clear, elegant German and replete with erudition, were widely read and at one time very influential. He ranks as one of the leading German canonists of the 19th century.

Philo Judaeus.

Bibliography: Works. Versuch einer Darstellung des Angelsächsischen Rechts (Göttingen 1825); Deutsche Geschichte mit besonderer Rücksicht auf Religion, Recht und Verfassung, 2 v. (Berlin 1832–34); Deutsche Reichs und Rechtsgeschichte (Munich 1845); Die Diözesansynode (Freiburg 1849); Kirchenrecht, 7 v. (Regensburg 1845–72); Vermischte Schriften, 3 v. (Vienna 1856–60). Literature. J. F. VON SCHULTE, Allgemeine deutsche Biographie 26:80–88. J. F. VON SCHULTE, Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des kanonischen Rechts, 3 v. in 4 pts. (Stuttgart 1875–80; repr. Graz 1956) 3.1:875–886. G. VON PÖLNITZ, “George Phillips, ein Grossdeutscher Konservativer in der Paulskirche,” Historische Zeitschrift 155.1 (1937) 51–97. J. FUCHS, Magisterium, Ministerium, Regimen (Bonn 1941). B. POEHLMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:468.

[S. J. TONSOR]

PHILO JUDAEUS

The greatest Jewish philosopher and theologian of the Greco-Roman period; b. Alexandria, Egypt, c. 13 B.C.; d. there, between A.D. 45 and 50. To distinguish him from other Philos of antiquity, he is known as Philo Judaeus (the Jew) or Philo of Alexandria. His family was wealthy and influential. Although attracted to a life of speculation and contemplation, he was forced into an active, political life for the sake of defending his coreligionists who were victims of anti-Semitic movements or discriminatory legislation. He fought to have their rights recognized and to strengthen them in the faith of their fathers. About A.D. 40 he was senior member of a delegation sent to Rome to have Emperor Caligula grant the Jews the right to live according to their own laws and to be dispensed from the obligation of taking part in the rites of emperor worship. These are about the only facts known concerning his life.

His Works and Their Nature. The principal writings of Philo, some of which are preserved only in part or in ancient translations, can be divided into four groups: (1) historical and apologetic: In Flaccum, De legatione ad Gaium, De vita contemplativa (hereafter Contempl.), Apologia pro Iudaeis, De vita Mosi; (2) philosophical: De aeternitate mundi, Quod omnis probus liber sit (hereafter Prob.), De providentia, De Alexandro; (3) expository on the Pentateuch: De opificio mundi (hereafter Opif.), De Abrahamo (hereafter Abr.), De Josepho (hereafter Jos.), De decalogo, De specialibus legibus (hereafter Spec.), De virtutibus (hereafter Virt.), De praemiis et poenis; (4) Legum allegoriae (hereafter Leg.), an allegorical commentary on Genesis—his most important work. Some of his other works are referred to in the course of this article.

As a commentator on the Scriptures, Philo limited himself almost entirely to the Books of Moses (according to the Septuagint translation); he seldom even cited the other books of the OT. For him the Prophets were but the “disciples of Moses.”

Allegorical interpretation is characteristic of Philo's method. This manner of exposition seems to have been customary in the schools of that period, both among the Greeks, who used it to draw a moral lesson from the poets or to give meaning to the religious myths (the “physical” allegory of the Stoics), and among the rabbis. By means of his commentaries Philo seems to have wished to reduce the symbolic “philosophy” of Moses to formulas drawn from that syncretism of which Posidonius was the outstanding representative and which contained Platonic, Neo-Pythagorean, and Stoic themes. The extent and variety of Philo's vocabulary have led scholars to discover in him the most diverse influences: Greek (of various schools of philosophy), Jewish (of both Palestinian and Alexandrian Judaism), Egyptian, and Oriental (mystery religions). He can be regarded as a witness of the development of classical thought toward the different forms of later NEOPLATONISM, which are actually in germ in his works. He can also be considered another kind of witness—one showing the fermentation of Jewish thought at the very time when Christianity came into being. He, in turn, certainly had great influence on the early Fathers of the Church. Since lack of space here prevents even a summary exposition of the many studies that have been made on these different points of view, the rest of this article is limited to an endeavor to show in what the originality of Philonic thought consists.

His Education and Teaching on Education. Philo is a good representative of the intellectual training that a man of the cultured class received in Alexandria at the dawn of the Christian Era. In this cosmopolitan city, education was fostered and flourishing. Philo makes allusion to it when he speaks of the ἐγκύκλιος παιδεία. This “general education,” or preliminary instruction, has a special meaning in his system, although several passages seem to refer to the historical reality of this institution. Philo calls it also μέση παιδεία (intermediate education) to indicate that it is a middle stage between unculture and perfect knowledge [De congressu quaerendae eruditionis gratia (hereafter Congr.) 22]. He lists the program of studies [De agricultura (hereafter Agric.) 18; Congr. 11, 15, 74; De somniis (hereafter Somn.) 1.205] as consisting, in an ascending order, of grammar, the study of the poets and historians, arithmetic and geometry, music, rhetoric, and dialectics. These serve as preparation for philosophy, which in turn has two phases: the lower one gives to the different individual sciences their principles and basic definitions (Congr. 146) and furnishes the moral principles for governing the passions in self-control, the ἐγκράτεια of the Stoics (Congr. 80); the upper one is concerned with the knowledge of God and leads to Wisdom [De fuga et inventione (hereafter Fug.) 141; Congr. 79]. The “profane” studies that Philo made extended from the course in grammar to instruction in the lower phase of philosophy. This school philosophy was nothing else than the syncretism then in fashion.

A good student, Philo retained much of his early education, and in his system he allotted to the common truths thus acquired the “intermediate” place that belonged to them. All this, however, was merely his intellectual equipment; it was not his own thought. To investigate the sources that he used is an interesting enough enterprise, but it is of little utility for understanding Philo himself. What belonged to him as his own lies in the upper phase of philosophy, his religious doctrine that directed the organization of all his knowledge and reflection. No doubt, on this level also he was subject to certain influences, some of them more purely Platonic, others of Jewish origin. His tendencies were not foreign to those that are dominant in sapiential literature (the idea of Wisdom).

His purpose was the same as that expressed by Ben Sirach’s grandson in his Prologue (Sir Prol.) to his Greek translation of the Book of Sirach: to instruct the Jews of the DIASPORA, who were in danger of losing the faith of their fathers and to render them fit to help “those outside” (καὶ τοῖς ἔκτος; Sir Prol. 4), i.e., the Gentiles.

Philo’s display of profane learning does indeed too often mask the fidelity of his thought to the heritage of his faith; his skill in the use of allegory runs the risk of making one suspect that he is juggling the content of the Mosaic revelation; his rather simplistic moralism gives the impression of a banal spirituality and hides the originality of his mystical ideal. Learned investigations of his sources have made no small contribution in setting in bold relief the personal traits of his thought. The works of E. R. Goodenough and H. A. Wolfson, each in its own way, by showing the Alexandrian-Jewish and Palestinian-Jewish side of Philo, have brought light to bear on this question. In recent years detailed studies of Philonic ideas and images have been made directly in the texts themselves, so that now one recognizes more clearly that Philo was a genuine thinker who had a doctrine quite his own.

Active and Contemplative Life and Their Union.

At the beginning of the third book of the Special Laws, Philo conjures up the time of his youth when he devoted himself to speculative philosophy: “I imagined myself raised in the air on high and ever carried away by divine inspiration. . . . Then I leaned over from the heights of the heavens and, as if looking down from a summit, I fixed the eyes of my soul and viewed the innumerable theories regarding the beings that are on earth. I was glad at heart to have fled, as far as possible, from the miseries of mortal life.” But “discontent, the enemy of good,” forces him to mix in political life. Although he suffers from it, he thanks God that he was not submerged in it and that he kept enough vision to understand the Holy Commentaries of Moses and make them known to the multitude who were ignorant of them.

Philo was drawn by nature to contemplation. In the De vita contemplativa he speaks with sympathy of the THERAPEUTAE, their way of life, and their manner of meditating on the Law as understood allegorically. Besides, the ideal of the ESSENES seems to have been his; of the three parts of philosophy, they neglected both logic, as being useless for the acquisition of virtue, and physics, as surpassing the possibilities of human nature (except when it treats of the existence of God and of creation); but they applied themselves to ethics in a study of the laws of their forefathers, inspired laws that human nature of itself could not attain to (Prob. 80). It is a matter, therefore, of revealed, religious morals. This is precisely the order of values that Philo respected: to meditate on God and His powers (creative, royal, and legislative) and to return to God both by a literal observance of the Law and by an effort to conform interiorly to the real values that are revealed there by means of symbols. Therefore, it is necessary to flee the corporeal for the incorporeal realities, the sensible for the intelligible world.

Philo, however, saw the insufficiency of this naïvely Platonic schema. Plato wanted the wise man to go down again into the cave; Philo wished to keep him there only for a certain time. He merely delayed his departure for the heights. As a young man, he could think that, in order to realize his ideal, he would have to retire to the desert, far from human affairs. Yet he did not neglect the course of studies established in his city; he saw in this a means by which he could attain to philosophy. “As for me, when I began to be urged on by Philosophy’s goads to desire knowledge, I frequented, while still young, one of her handmaids, Grammar, and all that I engendered from her . . . I offered to her mistress . . .” (Congr. 74). He then passed in review all the branches of study. But the profit he drew from them he did not devote to the search for worldly interests; he turned it toward philosophical activity. This preparation was indispensable, since it is dangerous for a soul to cast itself too quickly into research of the purely intelligible.

Commenting on Gn 27.42–45, Philo imagines Rebecca speaking thus to Jacob: “When you see a wicked man breaking out in invectives against virtue and making much fuss over things that should be held of no account, such as good fortune, glory, or pleasure, or when you hear him praising injustice as the means for winning such things . . . , do not turn forthwith in the opposite direction, toward renouncing wealth and pride and striving to lead a life of austerity in the desert, for thus you will only provoke your enemy and arm him as a still more dangerous foe against you” (Fug. 25). It is necessary to know the world in order to fight against it and make it better: “Truth would rightly censure those who, without looking into it, would abandon the business of political life” (Fug. 33). “Become acquainted with your body, know yourself and the parts of which you are composed, understand what each one is, the purpose for which it was created, how it acts according to its nature, and who He is who puts its wonderful mechanism in motion and who, Himself invisible, invisibly cares for His children—is this the spirit that it is in you or the Spirit of the universe? When you have examined yourself, study closely that which stands out as proper to Laban and his successful deeds, which vain opinion thinks are brilliant. . . . When, having become involved in a troubled, political life, you show that you have a strong character, sustained by a good education, I will take you back from down there” (Fug. 46). There is, then, a relationship between practical life and education (Leg. 2.89).

The same idea is developed in his treatise De ebrietate (33–80). Philo well saw that education receives its definitive form from the political regime, from the social and moral state of the city that gives it. Thus it may be used for merely human ends; of itself it does not attain to perfection. But if God comes to its aid, it becomes an indispensable basis and means. Besides, he who rises directly to the vision of truth in itself can no longer speak to men in their language (cf. Moses and Aaron).

Thus, the originality of Philo consists in having discovered a middle term in education, wisdom, virtue, the soul, and life [De plantatione (hereafter Plant.) 94; Leg. 1:93; Opif. 154; De mutatione nominum (hereafter Mut.) 30; Quod deterius potiori insidiari solet (hereafter Deter.) 68]. Indeed, he found in Plato, in Aristotle, and in the development of the moral teaching of the Painted Porch school toward a new Stoicism examples of an opening on the material reality of human life that would soften the rigors of a pure spirituality or an absolute rationalism. For the philosophers, however, it was merely a matter of making concessions to ordinary human conditions; for Philo, since the creative act reaches all creatures in their most material and insignificant reality, it is from this lowest level of their being that they must return to God. In a sense, everything in them is good, for God devoted the same art and the same care in forming all of them [Quis rerum divinarum heres (hereafter Her.) 159].

Good and Evil. This being the case, all that is required for a being to be GOOD is that it return and be united with God. Philo writes: “The perfect take their point of departure in the body, in sensation, in the different parts of their organism without which it is not possible to live (for these parts are useful to education applied to the life that accompanies the body), and they come to their end at the side of the wisdom of God. . . . Beginning with what is mortal, improvements are produced in the direction of what is incorruptible” (Her. 315–316). “It is good to bring to an end the combats of practical life before struggling for the contemplative life; this serves as a prelude to a more perfect combat” (Fug. 36). The whole moral and religious system of Philo is swept by a fresh breeze of hope, improvement, and progress, which end in joy and goodness. But this presupposes effort and asceticism, for evil must be conquered. EVIL is out of place in creation inasmuch as it contrasts with the creative power that is all good. By this power God satisfies ontologically and physically the needs of all creatures; to none of them does He refuse anything that they can receive, since He loves to give. Evil is not in matter, the existing thing that, bereft of quality, form, and activity, God has completed by giving it what it lacked. Nor is evil in sensation or even in the pleasure taken in it. Evil is pure disorder, a turning upside down of order. It comes from the fact that creatures, which should be subordinate to God, are taken for primary causes and last ends. Man's free will is responsible for this. In this sense the possibility of evil is enveloped in creation and in God who knew it beforehand. Having made in His LOGOS the intelligible plan of the universe, He wished to give to all the forms that the material world could receive at its various levels a definite place, so as not to leave any void in the projected ensemble. Minerals, which are ruled by their ἔξις (state of being), involuntarily follow their own laws; the same for vegetables, with their φύσις (natural instinct), and for irrational animals, with their ψυχὴ (animal life). All these are still in the domain of the involuntary. At the other extreme, pure intelligences are constantly attached to truth and intelligible goods. But man is an intermediate being, made of a mixture, and he must be so in order that there may not be a discontinuity in the universe [De confusione linguarum (hereafter Confus.) 176–179]. The reason for the disorder in man lies in his φιλαυτία (self-love), which is present both on the level of sensation, attaching itself then to sense pleasure, and on the level of intelligence when, unmindful of God, it thinks itself superior to everything else (Spec. 1.333–338). Another form of this evil is οἴσις (self-conceit, presumption). Besides these vices, which come from the ἐπιθυμῖαι (sensual desires) that nothing can satiate, there is a false wisdom by which a man regards everything from his own viewpoint, the wisdom of the δοκησίσοφος (self-conceited sage), portrayed by Cain and Jethro. True wisdom is the fruit of the upper phase of philosophy, all turned entirely toward God. Evil results, therefore, from a voluntary choice of a center of life that is something other than God.

Thus, even though Philo makes no place for any sin of the angels (who are divine λόγοι, forming an army that cannot disobey), Adam's trespass brought into the world a permanent principle of subversion and corruption that has effects just as serious as those of original sin in Christianity. It entrains the dissolution of being. The Logos, transcendent intelligible unity of the world, enjoys, on the plane of immanence, the role of τόνος (cohesive force); it is a bond, a "glue" (Her. 188; Fug. 110–111; Plant. 8–10). It binds beings to their Creator even while making them distinct from Him. It is also called God's "angel" or archangel [Her. 205; Somn. 1.239; Quod Deus immutabilis est (hereafter Deus) 162; Leg. 3.177; De Cherubim (hereafter Cher.) 35]. Wrongdoing, however, withdraws man from this unifying action, for it detaches him from the creative plan and from God. Thus, he cannot save himself; he needs a savior. By himself he cannot attain to the light; he needs inspiration and revelation. In the order of creation man was penetrated with this light, which poured forth in him all the graces of the God of goodness. It is so no longer; θεός (God, name of the Creator) has become for him ὁ Κύριος (the Lord), who, while not abandoning him, rules him henceforth by another of His powers, the royal power that is legislative and punitive. This restores and saves what is good.

Ontology of Salvation. Being is not divided up between the creative power and the royal power; these two are united in the divine Logos, the firstborn, the elder brother of the world (Cher. 27). These powers manifest their duality and distinctness only in regard to man (Fug. 94–104). They are arranged in hierarchical order on the way of salvation. Man meets first the power of punishment, then that of mercy, and finally that of creative goodness. He finds them first in himself, within his conscience, and then in themselves. Having arrived at perfection, man is in relation to both the creative power and the royal power, since he is united to the Logos that embraces both (Mut. 19). To create the mixed nature of man in his intermediate condition, God made use of assistants: "Let us make man," it is written—in the plural; for the Father cannot be the cause of the evil that He knows must be born of His creature. He made man in His image, which is His Logos. Man, therefore, because of his complex nature, cannot escape from the royal power that sets him aright. But the perfect one, united to the Logos and unified by it against the disintegrating force of evil, recovers a state of innocence, as if he came forth, like the firstborn Logos, from God alone. This state of perfection is a result, not of nature, but of a grace of adoption that bestows on man, as on the Logos, the whole heritage of God. So it is explained in the De mutatione nominum. Thus, whereas Jacob, who had attained to virtue through effort and exercise, received the name of Israel but continued to be called Jacob also, since effort, even when sustained by God, does not guarantee an unchangeable result, Abraham, who by a pure gift of grace begot perfect virtue, joy (Isaac, who did not change his name, which means "he laughs"), was no longer called Abram. Therefore, the punitive power corrects the wicked; the creative power sustains man in progress. But the two powers in union, that is, the Logos, bring definitive salvation to the man who thus receives the lot of perfection.

Man's Need of God's Grace. It would be too much to say that in Philo there is a doctrine of the supernatural life in the Christian sense. Yet it is certain that beyond the mixed nature of man there is a transcendent nature, pure light, the light of the Logos in which the "friend of God" can participate by a gift of grace. The immanentism of the Stoics has no real value. The virtues defined by the Porch were taken up by Philo, but with this correction, that man by his own efforts cannot practice them consistently. The Stoic ideal (see STOICISM) can be realized only as a result of an absolute divine initiative. Inasmuch as man is mere man, he remains a mixed being, and his virtues are never perfectly pure. He must become a “man of God.” True virtue is not a moral qualification of the soul; it is a sharing in the divine virtue and in the power that God has to create what is good. Man, in his intermediate condition, cannot truly do good; he is fortunate if he does not do evil. Intermediate education has value only if it is assumed by God, through His call and the ἀφορμή (start) that He gives to the soul.

Man’s Cooperation. God, however, does not do it all; He demands an effort, and He urges one on through the Law. Philo used the image of athletic combat to express the fight against the body and its passions. This dualism of the intelligible and the sensible has meaning only in the intermediate phase of progress. Here the victory remains precarious, and it does not give access to a higher order of reality. The fight may even wear one out, and one should not become stubborn about it (De migratione Abrahami 26). Should one flee from it? A flight from the passions, when it is a human undertaking, suits those souls that love virtue without perfection (Leg. 2.90–91). There is another flight, one that is in answer to a divine call. In this case, the Logos “congeals” the passions, like the waters of the Red Sea, and he who looks to God can pass through them (Leg. 3.172). Having reached his goal, man, like the Logos that he shares in, does not retreat from the troubled world, but wages an all-out war against evil (Leg. 2.91). From God and His Logos comes the victory that consists not in resisting by such-and-such particular virtue such-and-such particular assault of evil, but in reestablishing the universal order thanks to the most generic virtue that begets, rules, and unifies all the others (Leg. 1.59).

Man’s Need of Divine Revelation. What is true of virtue is true also of truth. Both are ontological realities in God before being human moral or intellectual values. Truth is the splendor of virtue (Contempl. 26; Spec. 1.209; Virt. 102; Fug. 139; Somn. 1.216–218; Deus 96; Jos. 68). Just as man, in the acquisition of virtue, cannot surpass the limits of his own efforts without divine aid, so also he cannot advance beyond the intermediate education without a revelation from God. True wisdom is connected with prophecy. Human language cannot express sublime realities unless God lets man hear an echo of them here below. The verb ὑπηχεῖν (to echo) is often used by Philo. It is to be compared with the noun ὑπόνοια (conjecture, hidden meaning) used in regard to symbolism and allegory. The allegorical method is connected with this concept of prophecy and with the idea of a sudden and gratuitous intervention of God. The prophet, who is a “seer,” must have an interpreter who speaks for him (as Aaron spoke for Moses). The commentator on God’s word goes in the opposite direction: starting with the words, he goes on to unveil the light.

Relation between the Sensible and the Intelligible. Having made use of the Stoic formulas to speak of the immanence of this world, Philo employs a Platonic vocabulary to express his religious thought. But it is still merely a matter of language. If Philo sets the intelligible in opposition to the sensible, he does not construe the former by means of a dialectic; God has created it in His Logos with all the relations that it implies. Plato made the sage descend again into the cave, to organize the demotic virtues there in the image of the dialectic virtue; in Philo’s view, the perfect man, united to the Logos and armed with its power, contributes to the accomplishment of its work on earth, and he is then “pleasing in the eyes of God” (Mut. 39–40). He does good to men as God does good to His creatures. The relationship between the sensible and the intelligible becomes a personal relationship between man and God in the work of salvation. Even the break between human effort and divine grace has a Platonic aspect. In Plato’s Symposium (210E), at the last stage of a man’s ascent toward the beautiful in due order and succession (ἐφεξῆς), he has a sudden (ἐξαίφνης) revelation of Beauty in itself; Philo writes: “When God bestows on us the gift of the precepts of eternal wisdom, suddenly, without expecting it (ἐξαίφνης οὐ προσδοκῆσαντες), we find the treasure of perfect happiness.” He means the true gift of grace of a personal Being.

Conclusion. Despite these resemblances, Philo’s profound thought remains just as foreign to the Platonic as to the Stoic system. Philo’s God is the living God of the Bible. His God cannot be brought into comparison with the παντελῶς ὄν (absolute being) of Plato’s Sophist (248E–249A) that lives and has life but is only a notion (τὸ ὄν, being—in the neuter). Philo’s God is He who is (ὁ ὄν, the Being—in the masculine: Somn. 1.231; Mos. 1.75; Opif. 173; etc.). He is the cause of all life and the source of eternal life (Fug. 198). He is “faithful” because He is unchangeable, and all confidence must be placed in Him. Faith in God gives consolation and encouragement in life (Abr. 268). Here is a theology of faith, hope, and love that shows the man essentially engaged in the word of God (cf. Cher. 85; Spec. 1.310; Fug. 58). Between God and man there is a perpetual exchange of gifts from the One and acts of thanksgiving from the other, of which the Jewish cult is the symbol.

Philo thus does right by all the philosophical tendencies of his time: he puts each one in its place, using it where it can express a partial truth. But his religious thought is well above all this, and that is what he wished to show in thus justifying his basic faith in the preeminence of Moses, who infinitely surpasses all the other philosophers.

Bibliography: Editions. Philonis Alexandrini Opera quae supersunt, ed. L. COHN et al., 7 v. in 8 (Berlin 1962), with complete index verborum; Philo, tr. F. H. COLSON and G. H. WHITAKER, 10 v. (Loeb Classical Library; London-New York-Cambridge, Mass. 1929–62); Philo: Supplement, tr. R. MARCUS, 2 v. (Loeb Classical Library; London-New York-Cambridge, Mass. 1953), fragments preserved only in Armenian; Oeuvres de Philon d'Alexandrie, tr. R. ARNALDEZ et al. (Paris 1961–). Bibliographical studies. J. HAUSSLEITER, "Nacharistotelische Philosophen 1931–1936," Jahresbericht über die Fortschritte der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft 281–282 (1943) 107–116. R. MARCUS, "Recent Literature on Philo (1924–1934)," Jewish Studies in Memory of George A. Kohut, ed. S. W. BARON and A. MARX (New York 1935). E. R. GOODENOUGH and H. I. GOODHART, The Politics of Philo Judaeus, Practice and Theory (New Haven 1938). L. H. FELDMAN, "Scholarship on Philo and Josephus (1937–1959)," The Classical World 54 (1960–61) 281–291; 55 (1961–62) 36–49, reprinted with some unauthorized changes by Yeshiva University, Scholarship on Philo and Josephus, 1937–1962 (New York 1963). Literature. É. BRÉHIER, Les Idées philosophiques et religieuses de Philon d'Alexandrie (2d ed. Paris 1925; reprint 1950). E. R. GOODENOUGH, By Light, Light: The Mystic Gospel of Hellenistic Judaism (New Haven 1935); An Introduction to Philo Judaeus (2d ed. rev. New York 1963). H. A. WOLFSON, Philo: Foundations of Religious Philosophy in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, 2 v. (Cambridge, Mass. 1947). J. DANIELOU, Philon d'Alexandrie (Paris 1958). C. MONDÉSERT and R. ARNALDEZ, "Philon d'Alexandrie," Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. v.7, ed. L. PIROT et al. (Paris 1928–).

[R. ARNALDEZ]

PHILO OF BYBLOS

Phoenician scholar who flourished c. A.D. 100. Philo of Byblos is the author of several works in Greek, of which fragments have been preserved in the citations of later Greek writers. Of these works, the most important is Ἱστορία Φοίνικας, a history of Phoenicia, of which sections are transcribed in books 1 and 4 of EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA'S Praeparatio evangelica. These sections of the work recount the theogonic and cosmogonic myths of ancient Phoenicia, and picture the contemporary world state as derived from a dark and infinite chaos that gave birth to successive generations of divine beings. The first several of these generations include hypostatized natural forces, such as Desire, Death, Light, Fire, and Flame; these, however, are succeeded by the gods proper, successive generations of whom engage in a conflict whose outcome determines their permanent hierarchical relationship. Philo represented this history as the translation of a work written by Sanchuniaton, a native Phoenician of a remote age who gathered in written form the traditions of his country.

Despite evident editorial additions by Philo himself—notably his euhemeristic explanations of myths and his comparisons with Hellenistic religious concepts—the antiquity claimed by Philo for his material has been largely justified by comparison with ancient Near Eastern texts discovered in the 20th century. Thus, the names of several of the gods of Philo's pantheon, hitherto unattested elsewhere, are found in the Ugaritic texts of the 14th century B.C. (see UGARIT), and details of his myths recur in Hittite texts of the second millennium B.C. (see HITTITES). Therefore, while one must allow for the influence of Greek thought in Philo's history, the work in its essentials must be judged to be representative of ancient Phoenician religious thought. Those parts of it that have been preserved, therefore, offer a source of great importance for a knowledge of the Canaanite religious conceptions that surrounded Israel in the early period of its history. Fragments of two further works of Philo, On Cities and On Forming a Library, have been preserved by Stephen of Byzantium (5th century) and Serenus. Nothing remains of a composition On the Reign of Hadrian mentioned by Suidas (late 10th century).

Bibliography: L. B. PATON, Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, ed. J. HASTINGS (Edinburgh 1908–27) 9: 843–844. H. EISING, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 8:471. C. MÜLLER, ed., Fragmenta historicorum graecorum, 5 v. (Paris 1878–85) 3:560–576. W. F. ALBRIGHT, Archeology and the Religion of Israel (Baltimore 1946; 4th ed. 1956) 69–71. O. EISSFELDT, Sanchuniaton von Beirut und Ilumilku von Ugarit (Halle 1952); Taaautos und Sanchuniaton (Berlin 1952).

[R. I. CAPLICE]

PHILOLOGY

A term derived from the Greek φίλος "lover" and λόγος "speech, word." In time this meaning of "lover of the word, fond of literature or study" came to be applied especially to lovers of the languages of Greece and Rome and then to include their whole culture.

In the early Alexandrian age, the philologists safeguarded the textual purity of the ancient Greek epic and dramatic writers and set up canons of criticism. Suetonius tells us that Crates brought philology from Greece to Rome in 169 B.C. Here philological study for a time concerned itself with older Latin writers, such as Plautus and Terence, whose texts were particularly liable to corruption at the hands of theatrical producers. This interest spread to other writers, such as Virgil; commentaries on him by Servius and Donatus are still extant. Christian writers, such as St. Jerome, were well acquainted with the general principles of textual criticism. Cassiodorus established a monastery where the principal work was the copying of religious and secular manuscripts. Even pagan authors were copied, and writers such as Isidore of Seville attempted a reconciliation of pagan and Christian thought. Irish monks preserved classical texts during the barbarian invasions and re-Christianized Europe afterward largely through their monastic centers of prayer, learning, and classical culture.

With the rise of scholastic philosophy in the 11th century, the texts of Aristotle attracted philologists. For well over a century before the fall of Constantinople, Greek scholars had been teaching in Italy. With the invention of printing and the spread of learning a great need arose for accurate texts of the classics. During the Reformation, both Catholic and Protestant scholars used the same Biblical and patristic texts to vindicate their stands. Later the Maurist Benedictines and the Jesuit Bollandists widened the scope of philology by using such auxiliary sciences as chronology, diplomatics, and palaeography. (See MABILLON, JEAN; BOLLANDISTS.)

Richard BENTLEY showed how literature and classical antiquity opened up new vistas in scholarship. After him Friedrich Wolf (1759–1824) attempted a new science of philology, naming it Altertumswissenschaft. He pleaded for an encyclopedic view of all antiquity, defining the 24 divisions of the field: metrics, grammar, history, geography, mythology, public and private law, religion, etc. This concept influenced the chief manuals of A. Boeckh (1785–1867), I. von Müller (1830–1917) for classical philology, L. Geiger (1856–1943) and E. Kuhn (1846–1920) for Indo-Iranian, J. Bühler (1837–98) for Sanskrit, H. Paul (1846–1921) for Germanic, and G. Gröber (1844–1911) for Romance. It underlies L. Traube's (1861–1907) concept of medieval Latin philology.

Bibliography: J. E. SANDYS, History of Classical Scholarship (New York 1958). C. H. HASKINS, The Renaissance of the Twelfth Century (Cambridge, Mass. 1927). U. VON WILAMOWITZ-MOELLENDORFF, Geschichte der Philologie (3d ed. Leipzig 1959).

[R. T. MEYER]

PHILOMENA, ST., THE LEGEND OF

In 1802 archeologists unearthed a tomb in the Catacomb of St. Priscilla. The remains appeared to belong to a young woman of the second or third century. Nearby were tiles painted in red: LUMENA PAXTE CUM FI, with images of a whip, arrows, anchors, a lily, and palm. They reconstructed this as PAX TECUM FIILUMENA, "Peace [be] with you, Filumena." The tiles were thought to have sealed the original tomb. The images were taken to be instruments of a martyr's suffering and emblems of her purity and heavenly victory.

Nothing was known of any historical Philomena. Eminent archeologists insisted that the tiles came from a nearby tomb. Despite these efforts to dampen the enthusiasm of those who declared these the bones of a martyr, within two decades there was a flourishing cult of Philomena, a detailed biography, and reports of many miracles. In 1961 the Congregation of Rites struck her feast from the Roman Calendar for lack of historical evidence of her existence, along with that of St. Christopher. The rise of Philomena's cult and her continuing veneration into the twenty-first century need to be read against the background of the duel between traditional religiosity and modern rationalism.

The cult of St. Philomena arose and spread in this environment. Religious orders including the newly reestablished Jesuits appreciated Philomena as model of Christian perseverance in a time not unlike the period of persecution by the ancient Roman empire. Bishops who visited Rome in the 19th century often brought home relics as this was a period when many catacombs were being excavated. In 1805, Father Francesco di Lucia of Mugnano del Cardinale petitioned for the relics. After being denied them, he was cured of a fever. He attributed his cure to Philomena. After much persistence he was granted the relics and enshrined them in his home town in 1832.

Reports of miracles during and after the relics were brought to the shrine advanced the cult. Sister Maria Louisa, Superior General of the Sisters of Sorrow of Mary (d. 1875), recorded visions of Philomena whose biography stressed chastity and resistance to persecution. In 1832 di Lucia recorded the biography, the story of the discovery of the relics, and many miracles, along with an essay on chastity. Eminent Catholics supported her cause including John Vianney, Madeleine Sophie Barat, Pierre-Julien Eymard, and Pauline Jaricot. In 1855 the Congregation of Rites established a feast day (Sept. 9), Mass, and Office for her.

Even when her feast was officially suppressed, her devotees continued to ask for and attribute cures to her intercession. Her omission from the calendar was not a prohibition of private devotion, but it does mean that the Congregation of Rites found insufficient evidence regarding her to mandate a place in the calendar or to allow the naming of official Catholic institutions for her.

Bibliography: F. DI LUCIA, Relazione istorica della translazione del sacro corpo e miracoli di santa Filomena vergine e martire da Roma a Mugnano del Cardinale (1834). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 3:299–301. Acta Apostolicae Sedis 53 (1961) 174. S. LA SALVIA, "L'invenzione di un culto: S. Filomena de taumaturga a guerriera della fede," in Culto de santi e classi sociali in età pre-industriale (1984).

[M. A. TILLEY]

PHILOSOPHY

Of Greek origin (φιλοσοφία), the term philosophy is a neologism attributed to PYTHAGORAS; it means literally “love of wisdom,” and represents philosophy as a high or supreme achievement of man and philosophers as aspirants to or proponents of WISDOM. In this relatively strict sense, philosophy implies both the process of questioning and the results of this interrogation as embodied in a personal or public enterprise of value to mankind. Such expressions as “the philosophy of X”—when X can stand for art, advertising, government, and so forth—reveal that philosophy is taken to mean also an outlook on or a background to a given topic, subject, or enterprise. This broader meaning embraces academic philosophy as well as the philosophy of the man on the street; it makes philosophy equivalent to the sum total of basic views or principles accepted by a particular age or group.

Even this general meaning of the term, however, implies a distinction between philosophy and its proponents. Each philosopher has a personal conviction, and this even before he may make this public by means of verbal or written symbols. Yet one praises and esteems or deprecates and condemns not philosophers but what they proffer. Thus arises the basic question: What is philosophy? Any significant answer implies some ability to identify the content of philosophy as distinct from that of other branches of learning or to characterize the invariants in different forms of philosophizing. The difficulty of this task arises from the very nature of philosophy itself. Unlike other branches of knowledge, philosophical knowledge is both involutorial (in the sense of growing more inward through reflection) and evolutionary (in the sense of opening new domains for consideration). Accordingly, as a whole it is not static and closed; rather, it is dynamic and evolutionary. Each generation, and each philosopher for that matter, limits or enlarges its scope and colors or shades its meaning.

This dynamic and evolving character helps to account for the disagreement among philosophers themselves and for the phenomenon of philosophical schools or systems (see PLURALISM, PHILOSOPHICAL). Through such disagreement, however, as well as by genuine rapport, philosophers function as catalysts for the philosophical enterprise itself. Sometimes their efforts are misunderstood; this serves as the occasion for the rise of antiphilosophers, who attack philosophy from their own notions of what philosophy should be. They may underscore its failures in contrast with scientific success, deride its abstractness as opposed to the needs of daily life, or belittle its expressions as vacuous in comparison to religious vision. When the issues at stake have been settled, philosophy may have adopted a new position within culture or assisted in clarifying important issues for its very accusers. Thus man can be regarded as somehow trapped in a philosophical net; he can escape such confinement only by some point of view, but this itself will constitute his philosophy.

History. Granted that one may write the history of philosophy from a variety of points of view, there seem to be some common traits that the past life of philosophy reveals. In the first place, the philosophical enterprise seems to be a constant search for an integral and unified master plan as coextensive with, and explanatory of, the entire range of human experience. A second trait of philosophy derives from its constant renewal from the exigencies of practical life. Whether the problems be labeled as personal, social, political, or religious and whether they spring from technology or from other developments, man’s everyday questions lead him to philosophical reflection. A third, and possibly more controversial, trait of philosophy is its zeal for TRUTH and for CERTITUDE in knowing. This is at once its most demanding and its most frustrating characteristic, one that seems to motivate all philosophers but that leaves many of them unsatisfied with their accomplishments. The philosophical task requires, moreover, that the philosopher express his insights in meaningful symbols. This relatedness to the LIBERAL ARTS is a fourth trait that seems to characterize most philosophical investigation.

Prior to Christianity. Considering philosophy in its broadest sense, one cannot name the first philosopher or delineate precisely philosophy’s moment of nativity. Restricting consideration to academic philosophy, however, one may say that Western philosophy began with the Greeks partly as a result of their own genius and partly as an offshoot of Eastern thought. Compared, then, to the total age of the universe or of man, the life span of philosophy is short.

Western philosophy, which is of primary concern in this article, first began to take on a recognizable form or structure among the Greeks about the 6th century B.C. Its primitive trait can be designated as interest, or WONDER, over the changes taking place in the universe. The first philosophers, far from being presumptuous in their attempts to understand nature and being, spoke of themselves not as wise men but as lovers of wisdom. Philosophy, wisdom, knowledge, and truth—all were seen by them as synonymous and as valuable in themselves. They tended to identify philosophy with all true knowledge. Gradually, and especially in the eyes of the Ionians, it became a matter of privilege to have an orderly set of responses to questions concerning the nature and origin of both the universe and its contents, and especially of man himself. The ability to answer questions, then, came to be presupposed in the philosopher; the asking of the questions themselves, however, represented the first stage of the art of philosophizing.

Classical philosophy as a total outlook on the world and as somehow equivalent to knowledge in general developed largely with SOCRATES, PLATO, and ARISTOTLE. The latter two thinkers especially can be regarded as having broached the major issues with which Western philosophical thought has concerned itself to the 20th century, albeit in different ways. What does it mean for anything to be or to become? What are the origins, the conditions, and the final terms of being and becoming? Who is man and how is he related to being? What does it mean to know and to be known, and what are the conditions and requirements of knowing? In what ways are being and knowledge related? The major branches or areas of interest for philosophers also were marked out during this period: orderly thought was pursued in logic, then came mathematics and the philosophy of nature, after which personal and political activity was studied, and all was finally seen to culminate in metaphysical wisdom.

Again, already with Socrates and Plato, philosophy became self-conscious. Anything worthy of the name philosophy was expected to possess certain attributes: (1) it was to be universal, orderly, and systematic; (2) it was not to be transitory but necessary, even an eternal type of knowledge; and (3) it was not merely a response to questions by the ordinary man, but something attained by the very few. In brief, it was to be SCIENCE in the strict sense, and thus it came to be equated with all true and certain knowledge. To be a mathematician or a metaphysician, to be an astronomer or a musician was, in some participative sense at least, to be a philosopher. After about 400 years of growth, then, philosophy was considered as an open but all-embracing system, asking and answering questions about anything and everything, but answering them securely and definitively.

There were many attempts during this period, even by philosophers themselves, to challenge this concept of total and supreme wisdom. The SOPHISTS and the various proponents of SKEPTICISM introduced subsidiary currents that were to reappear in later centuries. But, by and large, the classical Greek thinkers had the greater influence. They set the course that philosophy was to follow, for the most part, in its subsequent history.

Philosophy and Christianity. It is somewhat surprising that philosophy survived the dramatic opposition of Christianity to its own world-view. Offering a set of new proposals, new terminology, and a complete way of life, Christianity claimed superiority over current and earlier forms of wisdom that were merely human. But philosophy was too well entrenched to succumb readily, and the need for a rapprochement soon became evident. True, in this first confrontation, there was the tendency of Christians to denigrate philosophy and of philosophers to ridicule or degrade Christianity. Both movements, however, survived and benefited from the encounter. Christianity opened new domains for philosophical consideration: the notion of a personal God and the possibility of knowing about His inner life; the idea of God as creator and as related to men and the world; the conception of a basic value of each man in God's sight. Christianity benefited likewise, especially in its aim to make all things Christian: it aspired to join the words of Christ with those of men to provide a unified outlook on the world. This task, however, was not accomplished with any tour de force for centuries. The first successful synthesis, in the 5th century, still perdures as the Augustinian-Platonic current of thought (see AUGUSTINIANISM). An alternate synthesis, Thomistic ARISTOTELIANISM, took form in the 13th century after assiduous preparation by such thinkers as ANSELM OF CANTERBURY, Arabian and Jewish philosophers, ABELARD, and countless other Christians and non-Christians (see THOMISM). A third proposal was the via moderna of the 14th and 15th centuries, originating with WILLIAM OF OCKHAM (see OCKHAMISM; NOMINALISM). Others may yet be in the offing, for the rapport between Christianity and rational thought is a perennial problem facing Christians, one that they may well solve differently in succeeding generations. (See PATRISTIC PHILOSOPHY; SCHOLASTICISM; CHRISTIAN PHILOSOPHY.)

Philosophy and the Sciences. The new sciences of the 17th century and later did not originate completely de novo. The currents of ancient philosophy reappearing in the Latin West in the 12th and succeeding centuries, along with countless other influences, conspired to make science possible. No one can fail to give credit, of course, to Galileo and his fellow pioneers. But the contributions of medieval philosophers also played an important role, particularly by way of synthesizing and transmitting the aggregate of human knowledge to the innovators.

The first and most immediate effect of the new sciences on philosophy was that of deliberate or implicit imitation. As the sciences grew and expanded, a retinue of philosophers, with F. BACON in the forefront, hoped to found a "new philosophy" that would be, in effect, a universal science. R. DESCARTES, B. SPINOZA, and G. W. LEIBNIZ were among those who sought to model the new philosophy on mathematics. British empiricists inclined more to the experimental sciences as a basis for their philosophizing. The many thinkers who conceptualized within the framework of KANTIANISM and HEGELIANISM, as well as LOGICAL POSITIVISM, endeavored to use both mathematics and the positive sciences as models for their philosophies. More recently, philosophers such as H.

BERGSON and W. JAMES saw philosophy and science as two complementary but radically distinct branches of learning.

Another effect of the new sciences on philosophy was the attempt to assimilate scientific findings into philosophy or even to erect philosophies exclusively on a scientific theory or viewpoint. Thus Darwin's theory of evolution, Einstein's theory of relativity, Brouwer's intuitionism, and Freud's libido have formed the basis for much philosophizing, to say nothing of the "scientific philosophy" of Hans Reichenbach and the Vienna Circle. Related to this development is the problem of philosophical methodology as contrasted with that of the sciences. Are the sciences themselves unified or distinguished by their methods; and, in any case, are their methods distinct from those of philosophy? [See METHODOLOGY (PHILOSOPHY)].

The increasing concern of science with problems earlier regarded as those of philosophy has forced philosophers to reconsider the various dimensions of the philosophical enterprise. The tendency of some to regard all knowledge as science and to leave the domain of spirit, élan vital, will, aesthetic experience, and life to philosophy occasionally has manifested itself. Others have seen the overlap of interest as an indication of the basic unity of science and philosophy as these seek satisfactory, if complementary, solutions to the same problems (see PHILOSOPHY AND SCIENCE).

Transitional and Contemporary Trends. Apart from the concern with science, philosophers in the 20th century have become increasingly aware of man and his problems. Even the new philosophers of despair are as much prophets of hope as they are of man's ill-fated condition. Before pretending to discuss the very being of all things, these thinkers philosophize about man and his experience in the everyday world. They designate man as historical, as consciousness, as body-self, as transcendence, and in general as a being-in-process toward a future; but they also see an ontological dimension in human modes of being and activity. They regard men as the responsible authors, with or without God, of their private and public philosophies and their effects. In their opinion science, concerned with specialized experience, builds an abstracted world of its own; but, through technology, science can help free man for his historical tasks. Religion and the arts are seen as closer to man's workaday world, adding to the meaning of life in the present and for the limitless future.

Definition. There is no definition of philosophy that is agreed upon uniformly by all philosophers. However, if the consideration is restricted to views of philosophy that are commonly accepted in the classical and scholastic tradition on the one hand, and in the modern tradition on the other, it becomes possible to mark out fairly broad areas of agreement.

Classical and Scholastic Tradition. Thinkers in the classical and scholastic tradition tend to regard philosophy as a HABIT of mind or a body of natural KNOWLEDGE that results from the use of special methods and that enables one to explain in a more or less profound way the sum of human experiences. It differs from common knowledge in that it is acquired and evolved systematically, although it must take its beginnings from ordinary experience. Insofar as it considers everything knowable and is not restricted to one or other species or kind of entity; it is more universal in its concern than are the special sciences; in a certain way it includes even them and their objects in its consideration.

A more detailed description of philosophy, as considered in this tradition, may be had by enumerating the questions and problems it commonly treats. Thus one of its areas of inquiry concerns the procedures to be used in the acquisition of knowledge; another concerns the world of nature and related topics such as motion, time, and space; yet another concerns life and its meaning, the nature of man, and his various cognitional and appetitive activities; another concerns morality, social and political life, the nature of law and other institutions that preserve the common good; still another concerns being, its attributes, its categories, and its principles.

Thinkers in the Aristotelian-Thomistic tradition, particularly, accent the certain and causal character of philosophical knowledge. Though not holding that every subject investigated by philosophers permits absolutely certain judgment, they regard truth and certitude as the goal of philosophy and insist on the availability to the human mind of at least some starting points on which philosophical reasoning can be solidly grounded. Philosophy, in their understanding, remains ever open to further extension and development, but it is not subject to change with regard to FIRST PRINCIPLES and other self-evident truths on which this development is based, except in the sense that these come to be more deeply comprehended and understood with the passage of time. Thus they define philosophy as all certain and evident knowledge, grasped either directly or through causal analysis and DEMONSTRATION, that man can attain through human reason alone, and this both in the speculative order and in the practical order, but in the latter only as this enables man to reach his ultimate end. Being concerned with all knowledge, philosophy is not merely one science but is an aggregate of several different sciences; since its unity is merely analogical, it cannot be defined strictly. Its certain and evident character separates it from conjecture and from mere personal OPINION, and also from divine FAITH which, though certain, is not evident to the human mind. Again, it is purely natural knowledge, and this separates it from sacred THEOLOGY, which makes use of knowledge that can be had only through the acceptance of divine revelation.

Modern Tradition. Attempts by modern philosophers to define philosophy can be explained in terms of the interrelationship between SUBJECT and OBJECT; for them, the confrontation of subject and object is what generates philosophical content. No philosopher in the modern era denies the function of subject in philosophizing. Materialists, empiricists, and phenomenologists may reduce the subject or his experience to brute matter or to sense imagery, and a monist or a subjective idealist may merge subject with object. But all seem to concur that philosophy is a reflection on the subject's experience; it is the response of the self to whatever appears to be nonself. In the early 20th century greater emphasis than theretofore was placed on the subject as central in all philosophizing. Though philosophy may be a true report or counterpart of extramental objects, like all knowledge it is regarded as indigenously personal; it is evoked from, surrounded by, and presented in symbols that spring from a field of CONSCIOUSNESS also manifesting the philosopher himself. From this point of view, philosophy is what a philosopher considers it to be. He himself is the final referent for its veridical meaning. Philosophers employ a wide variety of designations—such as science, wisdom, freedom, Weltanschauung, Dasein, and Lebenswelt—to denominate this personal aspect of the subject-for-philosophy.

But philosophy is generally conceded to be about something—whether this be termed object, being, idea, matter, principle, self, cause, thing, spirit, or will. The object of philosophy is regarded by some as that which comes to or is conveyed into the subject; others consider the object as that to which the subject reaches out, as that toward which he is tendential, or even as that which he finally attains. Object, as the counterpart of subject, is thus accorded different values by various philosophers. It is therefore evident that one can have philosophical content in the modern sense at its sober minimum in the solipsist subject or at its ecstatic maximum as concerned with a great plurality of objects. No matter which factors are highlighted, however, philosophy comes out to be a reflection on, and a derivative of, the fusion between subject and object. It is a content by way of personal reflection, and a content that is reflected also in the dialogue philosophers have, at least among themselves, about intersubjective relationships (see SUBJECTIVITY; OBJECTIVITY).

Scope. The following survey of the branches or domains of philosophy adopts the traditional classification of knowledge into speculative, with its three degrees or levels, and practical, with its realms of art, prudence, and moral science (see SCIENCES, CLASSIFICATION OF). It may be argued that this distinction is either indefensible or inapplicable to modern thought, but the fact remains that no newer classification is generally accepted. The problem here proposed, of course, presupposes an answer to the question: What kind of totality is philosophy? Some hold that it is an integral, organic unity: it studies being in general and in particular: it encompasses large issues and ferrets out minor details; but it is uniform in outlook, the sole differentiation within it arising from the variety of topics it considers. Others view philosophy as, say, primarily metaphysics or logic: other branches they regard as philosophical only by way of participation. Whatever position is maintained, however, contemporary philosophy can be understood without too much distortion as a historical development from the following branches of classical philosophy: logic; philosophy of nature and psychology; mathematics and its philosophy; metaphysics, including epistemology and natural theology; and the practical domains of art, ethics, and politics.

Logic. Traditional philosophy views LOGIC in one way as propaedeutic to higher learning. Logic teaches the modes of correct thinking in terms of the CONCEPT, the JUDGMENT, and REASONING. Throughout ancient and medieval times, logic was closely allied to other branches of learning, though there were some noteworthy attempts at liberating it from its affinity to psychology and to metaphysics. Bacon, Descartes, Leibniz, and Kant are key figures in the struggle to give logic an outlook and a domain of its own as distinct from metaphysics; G. Boole, G. Peano, G. Frege, B. RUSSELL, and E. HUSSERL, on the other hand, are prominent among those who strove to de-psychologize logic. As a result of these influences, one may identify at least three aspects of logic. In its first aspect, which is more traditional, logic functions as a tool or instrument subserving other branches of learning. In its second aspect, logic becomes a discipline in its own right that is concerned with the forms of thought; this usage is best exemplified in logistics, or mathematical logic, or symbolic logic. PHENOMENOLOGY unveils a third aspect of logic. It proposes a methodology whereby answers can be sought to the question: What is involved in, or what is the very meaning of, concepts such as God, or velvet, or atom? (See LOGIC; LOGIC, HISTORY OF; LOGIC, SYMBOLIC.)

Philosophy of Nature and Psychology. The earliest philosophies of nature served as a background for the rise of the physical, biological, and psychological sciences. Plato's Timaeus and its many commentaries, together with Aristotle's physical treatises and their medieval and early modern commentaries, go far to explain why 17th-century scientists came to regard themselves as the new philosophers of nature. A series of epochal discoveries, however, altered this situation and gradually separated the philosophical from the scientific world-view. Evolutionary theory and such sciences as biology, paleontology, geology, and anthropology challenged the static conception of nature latent in some presentations of ancient thought. The discovery of analytical geometry, of the calculus, and of non-Euclidean geometries provided new instruments for investigating the world of change. Similarly, new concepts associated with quantum theory and the theories of relativity led to the questioning of all centuries-old world pictures. As a result, the very possibility of a philosophical outlook on the world independent of scientific knowledge was seriously challenged. Philosophy was confined to the roles of evaluating the proposals of science and of defending human values against the encroachments of technology. More recently, however, the philosophy of science has made its appearance, and one finds scientists returning more to philosophical conceptions of the world of nature. The traditional philosophy of nature likewise has strong support among those who aspire to harmonize its basic tenets with the changed outlook of science. (See PHILOSOPHY OF NATURE.)

A similar upheaval led to the divorce of philosophy from psychology and its branches. The nature, function, and ultimate disposition of man is an age-old question treated extensively in the Platonic and the Aristotelian traditions. For both, the study of man was primarily the study of psyche or soul, and the problem of the body-soul relationship was of paramount importance. With the rise of new sciences more directly concerned with man, however, various philosophies (dualistic, monistic, materialistic, etc.) were developed in attempts to answer the question: Who is man? Psychology and its attendant disciplines, separated in time from these philosophies, developed a closer affinity to the natural sciences.

Mathematics and Philosophy. No branch of learning has longer or closer contact with philosophy than mathematics. Except for extreme empiricists and materialists, philosophers have frequently regarded mathematical science as the exemplar of sophisticated thought, as the limit of certitude toward which other branches of learning converge. Early philosophers, regarding mathematics as the science of quantified being, conceded it a position intermediate between those of metaphysics and of the philosophy of nature. Modern thinkers, influenced by new discoveries in mathematics, have modified these views. But the closeness of mathematics to philosophy still is witnessed in current concerns over the foundations of mathematics and related topics in the philosophy of mathematics. (See MATHEMATICS, PHILOSOPHY OF.)

Metaphysics, Epistemology, and Natural Theology. No subject of learning in man's history has been the recipient of warmer accolades or more virulent gibes than metaphysics. For some, metaphysics is more divine than theology; for others, more diabolical than astrology. Nor is any other subject matter as much confounded with other subjects and forced to wear the masks now of a logic, now of a psychology or an anthropology, and so on. Traditionally, metaphysics is the science of being in general, as contrasted with other branches of learning whose proper concern is particular being. Metaphysics, then, functions as a wisdom to all the sciences and arts, including the art of life itself. After its hegemony in this latter regard was challenged by the Christian faith, metaphysics became an instrument for exploring Christian mysteries. Throughout the early Christian and medieval periods of thought, it thus retained its contact with other branches of learning. The new sciences, however, made sport of metaphysics along with the decadent science with which it was associated. All too often, metaphysicians reacted by continuing to expound their science in traditional form—neither receiving from, nor contributing anything to, the new sciences.

The outstanding success of these sciences, however, together with the rise of totally new philosophies, has served to awaken metaphysics from its slumber. Some scholars, appalled at the implications of the new sciences and their methods, raised the cry "back to metaphysics." The problem of the nature of human knowledge was reopened and led to the development of the branch of metaphysics called EPISTEMOLOGY—a discipline of key importance in modern philosophy. From the throes of these and other movements, a renewal of metaphysics is currently in progress. The new metaphysics sees man as intentional-toward-being, as consciousness, as freedom, as transcendence—as a questioner to whom being is both manifest and hidden. (See METAPHYSICS; METAPHYSICS, VALIDITY OF.)

Traditionally, metaphysics culminates in natural theology, with its proofs for God's existence and its study of His nature. This is another area of metaphysics that is undergoing renewal as the result of many factors, e.g., the problems associated with the theories of evolution and relativity, the question of man's function in this world as a being-toward-death and his ultimate disposition, and the renewed interest in Eastern philosophy. Thus the principal questions of theodicy are again being brought into focus: Can God be conceptualized in human categories and regarded as totally immanent to all being? Does He transcend all human categories? Is He at once immanent and transcendent? A greater merging of religious, philosophical, and scientific thought is in evidence; and channels are being opened by Christian philosophers that may lead to more agreement on the concepts of God in metaphysics and in revealed religion. (See THEOLOGY, NATURAL; EXISTENTIAL METAPHYSICS.)

Arts and Philosophy. The ordering of the arts among themselves and the function and meaning of art were discussed by Greek thinkers as well as by their medieval heirs. A much discussed question was whether or not BEAUTY is to be enumerated among the transcendental properties of being as such. The beauty of human works of art was seen to lie in their successful imitation of nature or in their exemplification of a truth of religious message. The introduction of Greek and Roman classics in the Renaissance gave great impetus to the arts, with the result that new theories of the nature of art were proposed by artists themselves and by philosophers. AESTHETICS generally has limited its analyses to the fine arts; its current tendency is to stress the creativity of the artist and the modes in which he symbolizes his cultural milieu [See ART (PHILOSOPHY); POETICS (ARISTOTELIAN); LIBERAL ARTS].

Ethics and Politics. In traditional thought, the intellect has always been viewed as directive of human action. As in art, so in moral science, reason serves as a counselor and guide affording practical principles for all of man's activity. Two main areas have consistently been recognized: ethics, relating to the sphere of individual man and his responsibility, and politics, concerned with man's social and political nature.

The traditional outlook on ethics has insisted that the GOOD is in things and that man's choice and conformity to this good affords him whatever happiness is available in this life. This doctrine, accepted for centuries, gave way in modern thought to Kant's ETHICAL FORMALISM. The notion of value, more recently, has opened up new directions for studying man's significance and his role in forming his future. (See ETHICS; ETHICS, HISTORY OF; VALUE, PHILOSOPHY OF.)

Among the Greeks, the social and political orders held primacy over the individual and his personal concerns. This effective subordination of ethics to social and political philosophy was only gradually challenged in the modern era by such writers as J. J. ROUSSEAU, T. HOBBS and the British empiricists. Contemporary discussions are concerned with the basic tenets of social and political philosophy and how these are to be differentiated from, and at the same time related to, the findings of the social and political sciences.

Philosophy and the Catholic Church. The historical relationship of the Catholic Church to philosophy is a patchwork of light and darkness. No one can deny, of course, the greatness of an AUGUSTINE or of a THOMAS AQUINAS. Lights of the philosophical world as well as of the Church, such thinkers are symbolic of the positive aspect of this relationship: the interest, concern, and support of philosophy by the Church. This general belief in reason and in philosophy is attested in various ways: (1) official pronouncements on the value of philosophy for Catholic and specifically for seminary education; (2) the traditional role of philosophy in the Church as subserving theological interests and needs; (3) discussions on the possibility of a Christian philosophy; (4) the notion of a philosophia perennis that continually reworks and reshapes a basic philosophical message in accord with Christian revelation. In the U.S., Catholics manifest their interest in philosophy by requiring it not only in seminaries but in collegiate education as well; by sponsoring philosophical journals; and by their membership and support of the American Catholic Philosophical Association and similar congresses and movements.

On the other hand, one cannot fail to acknowledge that leading authorities in the Church have often been unfriendly or openly inimical to certain philosophers and their teachings or that they favor some doctrines over others—often for insufficient or prejudicial reasons. Some of these episodes are intelligible within their historical context, whereas others are not. Occasional clashes between philosophers and Church authorities illustrate the perennial tension within the Church itself between FREEDOM and AUTHORITY. It is not to the purpose to recount here the long history of these episodes. It need only be pointed out—while admitting that tactical blunders have been made in the past—that the Church can no more be indifferent to philosophy than philosophers can be to each other's proposals. If one believes in an open society and in the freedom of knowledge, he can no more deprive the Church of its say than he can other interested parties and critics.

Teaching of Philosophy. If the nature of philosophy and of its branches is difficult to describe and if the relationship of philosophy to other branches of knowledge is quite complex, what can be said of the teaching of philosophy? It is evident, in the first place, that this question can be asked (and answered) only by those who have a definite view of human knowledge and its personal and cultural functions. Both the order and the method of teaching philosophy must be determined by one's personal outlook as well as by cultural and student needs. For those who grant philosophy a place in the curriculum, its content and method of teaching vary depending on what philosophy is considered to be, viz, either a form of wisdom that completes other types of knowledge, or an introduction to religious knowledge, or a personal outlook on the totality of experience, or a rigorous academic discipline, or a combination of any or all of these views. Probably the best teachers of philosophy are those of Socratic lineage who are both generalists and specialists, who awaken their students to reflection and also give them material on which to reflect, and who thus propound the simple truth that philosophy is not only a search for wisdom but is itself the wisdom that is sought.

Bibliography: M. J. ADLER, The Conditions of Philosophy (New York 1965). V. MATHIEU, Enciclopedia filosofica 2:397–411. A. M. MOSCHETTI, ibid. 412–415. G. RABEAU, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 12.2:1459–94. Encyclopedia Française, v. 19 (Paris 1957). H. ROMBACH, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, 472–478. L. OEING-HANHOFF, ibid. 8:471–472. G. PATZIG, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–63) 5:349–356. S. RAMÍREZ, “De ipsa philosophia in universum secundum doctrinam aristotelico-thomisticam,” La Ciencia Tomista 27 (1922) 33–62, 325–364; 28 (1923) 5–35; 29 (1924) 25–29, 207–220; “De propria indole philosophiae Sancti Thomae Aquinatis,” Xenia thomistica 1 (Rome 1925) 53–64. L. B. GEIGER, Philosophie et Spiritualité, 2 v. (Paris 1963). J. MARITAIN, An Essay on Christian Philosophy, tr. E. FLANNERY (New York 1955); On the Use of Philosophy (New York 1965). A. M. MALINGREY, Philosophia (Paris 1961). E. W. HALL, Philosophical Systems: A Categorical Analysis (Chicago 1960). K. JASPERS, The Perennial Scope of Philosophy, tr. R. MANHEIM (New York 1949). M. MERLEAU-PONTY, In Praise of Philosophy, tr. J. WILD and J. M. EDIE (Evanston, Ill. 1963). J. ORTEGA Y GASSET, What Is Philosophy?, tr. M. ADAMS (New York 1961). J. A. PASSMORE, A Hundred Years of Philosophy (New York 1957). J. H. RANDALL, The Career of Philosophy: From the Middle Ages to the Enlightenment (New York 1962). W. DILTHEY, The Essence of Philosophy, tr. S. A. and W. T. EMERY (Chapel Hill, N.C. 1954). M. HEIDEGGER, Being and Time, tr. J. MACQUARIE and E. ROBINSON (New York 1962). E. HUSSERL, Ideas: General Introduction to Pure Phenomenology, tr. W. R. BOYCE GIBSON (New York 1931; pa. 1962). J. P. SARTRE, Being and Nothingness, tr. H. E. BARNES (New York 1956). J. H. RANDALL, The Career of Philosophy: From the Enlightenment to the 19th Century (New York 1965).

[E. A. MAZIARZ]

PHILOSOPHY, HISTORY OF

The history of philosophy is a special branch of the general history of CULTURE whose object is the critical study of the formation and development of PHILOSOPHY and its associated concepts from their first appearance to the present. This article surveys some general notions associated with the history of philosophy and then summarizes its chronological development through the ancient, medieval, modern, and contemporary periods.

GENERAL NOTIONS

The history of philosophy is a composite concept; to attempt to define it one must first take account of the concepts of philosophy and history upon which it obviously depends.

Philosophy. In ancient times and during the Middle Ages, the term philosophy had a broad meaning identical with that of SCIENCE (SCIENTIA). In conformity with this classical notion, the history of philosophy would be the same as the history of scientific thought. Yet from I. Kant and 19th-century POSITIVISM onward, the sciences came to be separated from philosophy; they ceased to be regarded as a whole and were set in mutual contraposition as though they constituted two distinct fields of knowledge. This division was aggravated by the fact that there was hardly a modern philosopher who did not propose a distinct notion of philosophy, attributing to it various functions in conformity with what he deemed to be the basic principle of reality. This limitation and diversity in the concept of philosophy had its necessary repercussions in the concept of the history of philosophy. For purposes here it is convenient to adopt the classical notion of philosophy, regarding it as synonymous with science and attributing to the history of philosophy a material object broad enough to embrace the formation and development of all human sciences. This does not prevent this history, once provided with a breadth and diversity of materials, from being subdivided into a multitude of particular histories corresponding to the development of each of the branches into which science can be divided. (see SCIENCES, CLASSIFICATION OF; PHILOSOPHY AND SCIENCE.)

Aristotle.

History. The term HISTORY can be taken in two ways, namely, as an ontological reality and as a science

Clement of Alexandria.

(the German distinction between Historie and Geschichte).

In the ontological sense, the problem about the essence of historical being, or historicity, is a partial aspect of the general problem concerning being. All real things have duration, but not all of them have a history. God, the absolute and immutable Being, has duration (eternity), but not history. However, all contingent and changeable beings, such as minerals, plants, and animals, have a history. Historicity is a property of man, not as regards his essence, which is immutable, but in reference to the accidental result of some of his actions. Historicity does not constitute the essence of man, as taught by W. DILTHEY and the historicist school, but consists in an accidental modality acquired by some individual or collective human actions achieved in time. Historical reality is the result of a past action that is not completely past, since some virtuality of it remains to continue actuating into the future.

History as a science consists of the critical study and explanation of historical facts considered in their chronological succession, through the investigation of their mutual relations, their antecedents and consequents, their connections and affinities, and their influences and reactions. This is done in search for a meaning and interpretation, so that these facts are presented in a total or partial view of the whole. History is a true science, although historical facts, which constitute its material object, are particular; this is possible since, once they have occurred, such facts acquire a type of absolute necessity (what has been done cannot not have been done). At times one can arrive at an absolute CERTITUDE in the knowledge of historical facts, and, at others, at a probability sufficient to establish certain and true knowledge, and therefore scientific knowledge.

Historicity of Philosophy. Philosophy is historical and has a history, since it is a product that men have elaborated by their intellectual activity in the course of time. Achieved philosophy (in facto esse) is a present and actual reality. It is the term at which the human intellect has arrived in the process of investigating the truth. Yet TRUTH is absolute, unchangeable, and timeless. From the moment wherein philosophy arrives at the possession of truth, scientific knowledge remains beyond change and temporality and therefore outside of history. Nevertheless, in the process of its becoming or formation, philosophy consists in the temporal process of its formation and in the stages that man's mind must follow until it arrives at the truth. In this second meaning, it is as though philosophy constitutes the object with which the history of philosophy is concerned. For this reason the attention of the historian of philosophy must be focused more upon vicissitudes that have been encountered in the formation of philosophy throughout a temporal development than upon philosophy itself.

Philosophy is a historical reality and has a history, but it is not identified with history. G. W. F. HEGEL converts history into philosophy, whereas Dilthey converts philosophy into history. However, philosophy, once accomplished, is one thing; quite distinctly other is the process throughout the centuries by which it has come to be what it is presently. Historicity is not an ontological property of philosophy in itself, but affects only the process of philosophy's formation and the vicissitudes of its development in the course of time. One can indicate the following as differences: (1) Pure philosophy is concerned with the truth, which is unchangeable and timeless. The history of philosophy is concerned with the formation or becoming of philosophy and the changeable and temporal process pursued by the human mind until it arrives at the knowledge of the truth. (2) Pure philosophy aims at unity, which is identical for all men and for all times; this unity is achieved when one attains the truth. The history of philosophy attains the unity of a science when it succeeds in establishing the truth of historical facts; yet it should reflect the diversity and dynamism of the process through which men have arrived at the unity of science in the possession of the truth. (3) Pure philosophy moves in a region of abstract, universal, and necessary concepts, of absolute truths, independent of time and space. The field of historical research comprises concrete, particular, free, contingent, and variable facts. (4) The philosopher himself studies the scientific problems corresponding to distinct parts of philosophy, and can prescind from the past as well as from the opinions of other thinkers. The historian studies facts as they have occurred in the past, and cannot prescind from the opinions and distinct solutions proposed by philosophers. (5) The philosopher studies the essences of things, which are immutable; the historian considers existences, which are contingent. (6) Pure philosophy seeks, not what men have said, but what the truth is. The history of philosophy seeks the truth of what men have said and done in their efforts to attain the possession of the truth.

Philosophical problems. The problems that philosophers attempt to solve are as numerous and varied as reality itself. They can be reduced to three great themes, corresponding to the three great orders of being: God, the world, and man; or, again, being, knowledge, and function. However, each of these great themes for investigation unfolds, in turn, into almost an infinite number of particular problems within each branch of science. These include (1) ontological problems concerning being in itself; (2) logical problems concerning the order and relationships among concepts; (3) mathematical problems concerning the nature of quantity and number; (4) physical or cosmological problems concerning the nature of changeable beings in the material world; (5) biological problems concerning the nature of living things; (6) anthropological problems concerning the nature of man; (7) psychological problems concerning the nature and functions of the human soul; (8) epistemological problems concerning the nature and value of human knowledge as representative of reality; (9) social problems concerning the relations of man with his fellow creatures; (10) political problems concerning the relations between citizens and civil authority; (11) juridical problems concerning law, justice, and right; (12) theological problems concerning the existence and nature of God; (13) moral problems concerning human actions as these are viewed in their order to an ultimate end or to the perfection of man; (14) religious problems concerning man's relations with God; and (15) aesthetic problems concerning beauty and art.

The consideration of philosophical problems in themselves corresponds to the various branches of philosophy. What pertains to the history of philosophy is the study of the answers that philosophers have offered in their attempts to solve them. The historian of philosophy should take account of the temporal preponderance of determinate themes of thought in various eras. Philosophical problems did not arise simultaneously, nor have all branches of science appeared at one time nor have they had an equal development. One of the distinctive characteristics of philosophical eras and currents is precisely the predominance of interest in some particular problem. For example, theological and moral problems were prevalent in Neoplatonism and medieval scholasticism; political themes, during the 17th century; physical and biological questions, during the 19th century; and human and social problems, during the 20th.

Marsilio Ficino, Italian philosopher and Platonist.

Philosophy and philosophies. Reality is one, and the problems it poses are the same at all times and for all men. Nor is there more than one truth, which consists in the adequation of human concepts with things as they are in themselves. Scientific knowledge should be an exact mental representation of reality. For this reason there should be only one philosophy and only one system that is representative of reality. In fact, however, not only is there no one system, but there are many distinct and even contradictory systems (see PLURALISM, PHILOSOPHICAL).

José Ortega y Gasset. (AP/Wide World Photos)

There are many causes for this diversity, both subjective and objective.

Among the subjective causes may be enumerated: (1) the basic limitation of man's knowing faculties with respect to their proper object, and much more so with respect to transcendent objects; (2) the nature of his intellect, which is rational and discursive; (3) the incapacity of his mind to have an intuitive perception of the essences of things; (4) the influence of environment and of historical, social, and political circumstances peculiar to each era; and (5) the influence of philosophers upon each other. Frequently, philosophy has not developed by making a direct investigation of reality itself, but has been elaborated by discourse on the books and opinions of philosophers. Various systems give rise to others, sometimes by way of reaction, sometimes as attempts at reconciliation or advancement.

Objective causes of philosophical pluralism include (1) the very nature of reality and the intrinsic difficulty of the problems it presents to the human mind, and (2) the difficulty of acquiring the means and instruments needed for their investigation. Many beings fall within the scope of the proper object of the human mind, but others, such as God, are beyond the direct reach of human means of perception, and man can know them only by ANALOGY. Even in the realm of the directly knowable, moreover, there are many questions that can be answered only with the help of costly and complicated instruments, and these were unavailable.

Nevertheless, there are also causes of philosophical unity, such as the nature of reality, which is one and the same and presents the same problems at all times to the minds of all men. There is, for example, the identity of human nature, which is essentially the same despite accidental differences. From the conjunction of the causes of unity with those of diversity there results a historical process that is not rectilinear but rather exhibits advances and backward movements, as well as fluctuations and oscillations. The final result, however, has been real and positive progress in most branches of philosophy.

Philosophical Systems. From the diversity of attitudes among philosophers in the presence of problems posed by reality, as well as from the multitude of their solutions, there arises a great variety of philosophical systems.

Being. As regards the basic problem of being, upon which all other problems depend, the following systems may be enumerated. REALISM holds that beings really exist and that man's faculties are able to know them. IDEALISM distrusts the veracity of the senses, breaks the contact with external reality, and imprisons itself within its own interiority, elaborating logical systems based upon combinations of mental concepts. According to MONISM, reality consists in one sole finite, spherical, compact, undifferentiated, and immovable being, or in one sole infinite being, of which all other beings are nothing more than emanations or modalities that do not alter its essential unity. According to PLURALISM, on the other hand, reality is constituted by a multitude of existent, individual, and distinct beings (ARISTOTELIANISM, THOMISM). MATERIALISM deems matter to be the sole reality. SPIRITUALISM holds that, in addition to sensible, bodily realities, there are spiritual realities that cannot be perceived by the senses. Essentialism limits itself to necessary and immutable essences, whereas EXISTENTIALISM focuses its attention upon existences or on concrete and particular existing things.

Truth. Positions concerning the problem of truth can be classified as positive or negative. The positive positions include realism, eclecticism, and dogmatism. According to realism, truth really exists. It is one, identical, absolute, and unchangeable, and all minds can attain it in a complete or partial way. ECLECTICISM holds that each philosophy succeeds in attaining only one part or some aspect of the truth; purged of their errors, these aspects can be coordinated into a single system. DOGMATISM locks itself within systems expressed in absolute formulas of pretended universal value. Among negative positions may be enumerated skepticism and relativism. SKEPTICISM, complete or partial, holds that the truth does not exist, or at least that it cannot be discovered by the human mind. According to RELATIVISM, there are no immutable essences. The truth is partial, relative, and changeable; it depends upon the way in which the subject perceives it, and it varies according to the circumstances of place and time.

Knowledge. As regards the problem of knowledge, there are the positions of SENSISM, EMPIRICISM, INTELLECTUALISM, etc. (see KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF).

God. Concerning the problem of God, the most important positions may be listed as atheism, theism, and pantheism. ATHEISM denies the existence of a personal God distinct from the world. THEISM can be divided into two positions. One holds that there is an eternal, infinite, and intelligent God, but that He is not a creator, nor does He exercise providence over the world; at the same time, there is an eternal and finite world (Aristotle). The other position is that there is an infinite, eternal, intelligent, and free God, Creator and Ruler of the world, and that there is a created, finite, and temporal world that is dependent upon God (St. THOMAS AQUINAS). PANTHEISM holds that there exists only one being, the universal principle of all things, and that the world is identical with this principle. Pantheism can be partial or total. According to partial pantheism, God is either the soul of the world, primary matter, or the existence of the world. Total pantheism can be distinguished into various forms: the static, introdynamic, emanationistic, and evolutionistic. The static form holds that there exists only one finite, spherical, undifferentiated, and immovable being (see PARMENIDES). The introdynamic form teaches that there is only one substance having infinite attributes and modes (B. SPINOZA). According to the emanationistic view, beings flow as descending emanations from the One (PLOTINUS). Evolutionistic forms teach that particular beings are the products of evolution from one sole principle, whether this be the Absolute (F. W. J. SCELLING), the idea (Hegel), the will (A. SCHOPENHAUER), matter (K. MARX), life (H. BERGSON), or some similar principle.

Method. The history of philosophy must be preeminently history. It is a branch of the historical sciences, and its particular method is essentially that of historical investigation. A priori dialectical methods that make the history of philosophy a branch of logic (Hegel) or an exercise of pure reason are inadmissible. History is not concerned with possible, abstract, or universal essences, but with concrete facts and particular and real events. The historian's mission does not lie in imagining how matters should have occurred but in investigating and reporting how and why they did occur. The historical method embraces two functions, namely, the heuristic and the hermeneutical.

The heuristic function serves to investigate the facts and to reconstruct these as they happened. First, the historian of philosophy should reconstruct the authentic thought of philosophers by studying their writings, with the help of direct and indirect sources and auxiliary sciences. Second, he should state this thought faithfully, without alteration or falsification. He should classify thinkers and their systems in conformity with an order based upon reality itself. He should establish them in their coordinates of place and time, and take account of their relations of dependence to other philosophers and their thought.

The hermeneutical function is necessary since the statement of the facts should be completed by their explanation and interpretation. The historian should investigate not only the facts themselves but also the reasons for the facts, and explain one by the other without recourse to nonhistorical elements. Furthermore, he may rightfully pass judgment on the intrinsic value of the systems. However, he may not attribute a sapiential mission to history, as though it were a superphilosophy coordinating the divergencies of the systems and unifying their plurality. Even less acceptable are the Hegelian asides of Dilthey, who uses history to explain the relativity of systems, as a sort of reflection of spirit upon itself that includes the partial philosophies developed in the course of time.

Division. A priori divisions based upon determinate concepts of philosophies of history are inadmissible. Hegel adjusts the development of philosophy to the stages in the evolution of the Absolute Spirit. Influenced by the historical progressionism of CONDORCET and Turgot, A. COMTE establishes three stages, namely, the theological, the metaphysical, and the positive, but these have no basis in the reality of history. G. SANTAYANA indicates three great peaks in thought: naturalism, supernaturalism, and romanticism, which culminate in three great poets, namely, Lucretius, Dante, and Goethe.

The best division is one resulting from the reality of the facts. It can be made in conformity with various criteria. The first of these is chronology. Taking account of the temporal succession of the facts is basic and indispensable. In the history of philosophy, however, it is not enough merely to pursue the horizontal line of development in time. Thought has not followed one straight and ascending line of homogeneous progress; rather the many sources of diversity have dispersed the efforts of philosophers into different directions. From this there results a complicated process wherein some systems influence others, at times over many centuries and in quite distinct geographical localities. It is necessary to make the relation and connection among currents of thought evident. For example, Aristotelianism (4th century B.C.) and Neoplatonism (3rd century A.D.) had an influence on Persian Islam (10th century), and this, in turn, had an influence in Spain (12th century) and on SCHOLASTICISM (13th century). The currently accepted division of philosophy into ancient, medieval, modern, and contemporary is based upon Western history, but is defective since it does not coincide with the development of Oriental cultures, nor does it suit the effective development of philosophy itself.

The second criterion is geography. The development of philosophy can be manifested as it occurred in Greece, Rome, Italy, France, Germany, Spain, etc. Yet philosophy is supranational. Speaking of Greek, Roman, Italian, French, or German philosophy is less exact than saying that there are Greek, Roman, Italian, French, and German philosophers.

The third criterion is the enumeration of problems. To clarify philosophical problems, it is useful to group the systems and opinions of philosophers around some concrete problem, as, for example, some ontological, epistemological, or theological problem. Yet this procedure fails to offer a panoramic and articulate view of the whole development of philosophy. Associated with it are divisions according to schools and attitudes. Platonism, Aristotelianism, Neoplatonism, Thomism, Scotism, etc., can be presented, each one separately from the others; or, pursuing basic options, one can follow the lines of realism, empiricism, idealism, skepticism, etc.

Metahistory of philosophy. The history of philosophy, too, has its own history, which may be referred to as a metahistory of philosophy. The recognition of history as scientific knowledge is rather recent. Among the Greeks, the anecdotal had a predominance over the doctrinal. Aristotle, Plutarch, Diogenes Laertius, and Sextus Empiricus expounded the "opinions" of the various sects (doxography) without establishing a relation among them and without a perspective of integration within a universal process. These are documents of inestimable value, but they do not properly constitute histories of philosophy. During the Middle Ages, there was no intention of producing a history of philosophy. The scholastics expounded, criticized, and used the opinions of philosophers, but without trying to order and systematize them within a unified panorama. During the Renaissance, there appeared numerous monographic studies on the life and teaching of ancient philosophers, all based upon references in the Greek and Latin doxographies, but having the same deficiency of information and historical perspective. Something like this occurred during the 17th century in works dominated by the eclectic preoccupation of reconciling distinct philosophical "sects." During the 18th century and the early part of the 19th, preoccupation with criticism was reflected in plans to apply it to the history of philosophy, and yet there was wanting a solid basis of information. The ENCYCLOPEDISTS contributed the concept of unity, continuity, and progress in the process of historical development. Despite his apriorism, Hegel took a very important step toward presenting philosophical systems as included within the framework of universal history, as stages in the dialectical development of the absolute spirit.

The greatest step, however, in the scientific study of history in all its branches started during the middle of the 19th century and was based upon a critical and objective investigation of facts and documents, upon attaining an ever greater freedom from fantasies and a priori interpretations. From this period date the great general histories of philosophy, completed with innumerable monographic studies on personages and schools. The result has been a moving revelation of the process involved in the formation and development of philosophy, itself a magnificent conquest attained by the efforts of the human mind as these efforts have been multiplied over the span of centuries.

See Also: HISTORY, PHILOSOPHY OF; HISTORY, THEOLOGY OF.

Bibliography: F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy, (Westminster, Md. 1946). F. UEBERWEG, Grundriss der Geschichte der Philosophie, ed. K. PRAECHTER et al., 5 v. (12th ed. Berlin 1923–28). N. PETRUZZELLIS, Enciclopedia filosofica 2:415–419; 4:982–993. G. FRAILE, Historia de la filosofía (Biblioteca de autores cristianos 160, 190; 1956–), esp. v.1. W. WINDELBAND, History of Philosophy, 2 v. (Torchbks; New York 1958). E. VON ASTER, Geschichte der Philosophie (11th ed. Stuttgart 1956), Fr. (Paris 1952).

[G. FRAILE]

ANCIENT PHILOSOPHY

By ancient philosophy is meant primarily ancient Western philosophy from its beginnings among the Greeks on the Ionian coast of Asia Minor to its last manifestation in Neoplatonism. At the same time, ancient philosophy rightly includes those forms of Chinese and Indian thought that contain elements of philosophical thinking under a moralistic or religious exterior.

Origins of philosophy. The desire to know, begotten by wonder at the marvels of nature, said Plato (Theaet. 155) and Aristotle (Meta. 980a 22), led men to philosophize. Not all human thought is by its very nature philosophical; but as men began to penetrate into the deeper nature of things and to seek by reason the most basic causes of what they knew by experience, they became philosophers. Thus philosophy, at least among the Greeks, stood in marked contrast to credulous acceptance of the theogonies and mythological cosmologies, the time-worn traditions of the race embodied in the poets Homer and Hesiod. These ancient teachers of Greece often spoke the truth, but they used the language of belief, not of proof (cf. Aristotle, Meta. 1000a 19). GREEK PHILOSOPHY emerged as a conscious reaction to such dogmatism, when men took experience, rather than tradition, as the starting point of their thought.

Only with the Greeks did ancient philosophy reach consciousness of its nature as a rational investigation of things. In contrast, the philosophical thought of the East remained hidden in religious beliefs or in the traditions of national culture. The "Great Master" of CHINESE PHILOSOPHY, K'ung or CONFUCIUS, was content to "transmit and comment on the teachings of the ancients," without inventing anything new in his ethical reform. LAOZI, perhaps, was more metaphysical in his Way (DAOISM), yet even this was primarily a mystical-philosophical exposition of the principles that should govern one's moral life. Much more rational was the INDIAN PHILOSOPHY of the Brahmans, since the Upanishads formulate a speculative system that is essentially metaphysical. But it was elaborated by the priestly caste primarily as a wisdom of salvation, a quest for union with a higher being; and as such, endowed with the attributes of a religion. Like Brahmanism, of which it is a corruption, BUDDHISM proposed an anthropocentric philosophy of self-salvation. The Persian dualism of ZOROASTER was a mixture of religion, mythology, and reason in a non-philosophical form. One can well agree with Diogenes Laertius, an ancient collector of facts and fables on the philosophers: "Thus it was from the Greeks that philosophy took its rise; its very name refuses to be translated into foreign speech" (1:4).

Early Greek philosophy. If the Greek quest for philosophical wisdom showed a marked reaction to myth and uncritical tradition, it did not thereby represent a break with the general culture of the race. The Greek regard for the individual and his personal freedom and for the ideals of παιδεία, i.e., the shaping and educating of man to his true form, was constantly reflected in the philosophers. Of equal and even greater importance, perhaps, was the Greek feeling for the whole, an architectonic sense that looked for the bond that integrates individuals and events into a greater unity: the ἄρμονία, the "golden chains" (Iliad 8:18–26) that bind all things together. For Plato, the philosopher must be synoptic, since he is to see particulars together in one Idea; for Aristotle, even the study of man is to show how he is a part in relation to the whole (Pol. 1252a 24–1253a 38).

In different degrees this ideal pervaded Greek philosophy in all its history. In what is called the pre-Socratic period, for all their lispings thought (Aristotle, Meta. 993a 16), the early thinkers were searching for the one source; the φύσις or nature, whence come the scattered particulars of everyday experience. The first to do this were the "physicists" of Ionia, in the 7th and 6th centuries B.C., viz, Thales, Anaximander, and Anaximenes. Though each gave a different answer—Thales, water; Anaximander, the boundless or unlimited; and Anaximenes, air—all held to one principle, a φύσις, from which things evolve. More obscure, perhaps, was the thought of PYTHAGORAS and his followers, who studied the φύσις in terms of number. Yet this, too, was a search for the harmony and inner unity of the cosmos.

Two later thinkers, HERACLITUS and PARMENIDES, were inclined to brush this earlier thinking aside as failing to penetrate by reason (λόγος) behind the world of ceaseless change to discover that which truly is. Not the philosopher of pure becoming (despite the judgment of Plato and Aristotle), Heraclitus was primarily a teacher of moral wisdom who discerned behind the physical world and human life an all-abiding, all-ruling law or λόγος as the principle of unity amidst universal change and opposition. The physical world process interested Heraclitus chiefly as an illustration of this law, that men might learn from the order of the cosmos to order their own lives. In contrast, Parmenides was exclusively the physicist whose epic poem concentrated on the reality, the being ("that which is"), of the physical world, in opposition to current illusions on the nature of the universe. Reason alone, not sense knowledge or the traditions and "opinions of mortals," must be man's instrument in penetrating nature. Though a physical philosopher, Parmenides had insight into the basic problem of philosophy, the problem of being: λόγος or reason proves the existent cannot be what one's senses reveal to him, something manifold and in motion; it is rather something whole and indivisible, motionless and perfect. Hence ZENO OF ELEA, his follower, sought to prove that "there is no many."

The last of the physicists, EMPEDOCLES, ANAXAGORAS, and DEMOCRITUS, turned from the search for the principle of the universe to study nature as found in ordinary things. To retain Parmenides's position that being alone is, and yet explain obvious motion and change, these thinkers, each in his own way, posited basic unchanging elements whose combination would give rise to the things of experience. Empedocles adopted four basic elements; Anaxagoras, an infinite number of principles; and Democritus and the school of Abdera, unchanging atoms (see ATOMISM; MATERIALISM).

Classical period. None of these early philosophers, save Anaxagoras and those of Abdera, lived on the mainland of Greece, much less in Athens. The scene shifted with the coming of the classical period of Greek philosophy, even as philosophy itself passed from concentration on the physical world to the truly metaphysical and universal thought of Plato and Aristotle. In this change the SOPHISTS provided the transition, since they focused attention on man and the city-state. Not philosophers but teachers, whose aim was to prepare men for public life and political activity in the new democracies, the Sophists revitalized παιδεία through a comprehensive cultural program, the beginnings of the liberal arts. Unfortunately, they often emphasized rhetoric and eloquence at the expense of truth. In reaction to their ideal of speaking well, SOCRATES professed a new σοφία, the wisdom of thinking well, a wisdom of the inner man who lived what he thought: the true philosopher. In this he set the pattern for Plato and Aristotle, who as true Socratics and lovers of wisdom sought to penetrate reality and human life to the fullest.

For PLATO, the philosopher is not primarily the metaphysician, though the doctrine of the Ideas is at the heart of his philosophy. He is rather the man liberated by right παιδεία from slavery to the senses, whose life is formed and guided by true knowledge of true being (which is found only in the Ideas). His life is his philosophy, since he has built within himself a city that he rules in peace. He alone is thus fit to rule others: the philosopher-king. To build this inner city, he must pursue true virtue and wisdom: his conduct must not be based on his own opinions but modeled on what is the transcendent "form" of virtue, the Idea of justice, temperance, and the other virtues. Thus does the "man within man," the rational part of the soul, achieve mastery over the less noble elements within him. True knowledge, man soon realizes, is not found in sense experience, since this sense world does not contain true being. Hence he strives for a knowledge derived from the stable and fixed being of things beyond transient phenomena: the world of Forms or Ideas, and comes at last to the best and highest of the Ideas, the Good itself. Philosophy is thus for Plato essentially the life of the spirit, "the culture of the soul," the guide of human life. Of its very nature, it does not give final answers even to the deepest questions, but spurs the philosopher ever upward to a more perfect vision of the absolute.

ARISTOTLE, "the Philosopher," as he has long been known, lacked the lyrical quality that pervades the doctrine of Plato, and was more scientific and coldly logical in the pursuit of knowledge. Yet as a true Socratic, he too did not separate philosophy and life, since philosophy and virtue are means to the well-being of the soul and steps to happiness. As the disciple of Plato, he was convinced that philosophical knowledge is not concerned with the particular sensible, but with the essence of things and their ultimate causes and principles. Against Plato, however, he refused to have recourse to a separate world of Ideas to answer the problem. Man does not start with things only to push them aside as empty of being and intelligibility. Since one says of things that they are, one should rather analyze the very being he attributes to them. This is the first step in a new science of being, which later came to be called metaphysics. But since even the form (εἶδος) of sensibles, which is the primary instance of being within them, is subject to potency and change, one must postulate the existence of suprasensible beings that are actual and imperishable, the heavenly bodies, and find beyond them one perfect principle whose very entity is perfect act. The god of Aristotle is thus an entity "which moves without being moved, being eternal, substance, and actuality," the final cause that produces motion by being desired (Meta. 1072a 25). But such a god, whose inner life is self-subsistent thought, has no knowledge of, or care for, the world, which he did not produce and does not govern. It is in terms of such a doctrine on being that Aristotle studies man and soul in his "On the Soul," a treatise that created many problems and spawned a host of commentaries. Since he is not sure that soul or mind survives the body, Aristotle's ethics and politics are earth-bound, pagan, and centered on the perfection of the individual within the city-state. Despite its limitations, however, the doctrine of Aristotle represents the peak of Greek thought. All succeeding philosophers, Greek, Arabian, Christian, and modern, stand in some debt to him (see ARISTOTELIANISM).

Post-Aristotelian developments. Greek philosophy after Aristotle reflected, and to some extent caused, a change in Greek political outlook. With the conquests of Alexander the Great, human thought burst the confining limits of the city-state to emphasize the world as a commonwealth and men as members of a world society.

The CYNICS, lesser followers of Socrates, had professed to be cosmopolitans, citizens of the world rather than of a particular city-state. Directly influenced by them, Zeno of Citium (the founder of STOICISM), Cleanthes, and later Chrysippus elaborated a physics whose monistic materialism made of the world a harmonious whole, a city of gods and men. The active principle of this universe, called god, fire, mind, fate, is above all law or λόγος. If such a doctrine recalls Heraclitus, the Stoics gave his teachings some new interpretations. The ethical ideal is a life in agreement with nature, that is, the inexorable law of nature and of the individual. The virtuous man thus conforms his will to the divine reason, in a passionless and calm detachment from all self-love and worldly interests. Even as it sought to answer ethical questions untouched by earlier philosophers, Stoicism attracted many by the nobility of its ideals. Less appealing because more individualistic, EPICUREANISM resembles Stoicism as an ethics based on a monistic physics. Pleasure, less in the hedonist sense of the CYRENAICS than in peace of mind and freedom from pain, formed the goal of EPICURUS. To rid men of fear of the gods and fear of death, he adopted a form of atomism in which the gods have nothing to do with the world or with men, wherein death brings dissolution of soul as well as of body. The SKEPTICISM that marked other Greek thinkers of this period was itself intended to be a step toward happiness.

Further witnesses to the spread of Hellenistic culture are to be found in the JEWISH PHILOSOPHY of PHILO JUDAEOUS and in the smattering of philosophy that appeared in the Roman republic and empire. Jewish tradition was marked by a general distrust of reason and philosophy, so that Philo appears as an exception. Not properly a philosopher, he nonetheless sought to develop his religious belief by elements taken from Plato and the Stoics. After him there is little or no speculative thought among the Jews until AVICEBRON, whose Fons vitae was manifestly Neoplatonic in inspiration; and Moses MAIMONIDES, whose Guide for the Perplexed, written to solve apparent conflicts of faith and reason, is preeminently Aristotelian in spirit. Among the Romans, philosophy was hardly more than a reflection of Greek thought tempered and shaped by the Roman spirit. Stoicism as expounded by SENECA, EPICETUS, and MARCUS AURELIUS had a special appeal for its rugged moral tone, as a help in forming the good citizen.

Neoplatonism. The last great philosophical movement of pagan antiquity was a revival of PLATONISM reaching its climax in what is now known as NEOPLATONISM. In many instances, the movement was marked by a deeply religious coloring as philosophy came to be used as a medium for union with the divine. Middle Platonism (in Plutarch, Celsus, and others) accented the transcendence of God, multiplied intermediaries between God and the world, contrasted to an extreme the dualism of matter and spirit, and laid great force on revelation, mysticism, and ecstasy. These characteristics carried over into the teachings of PLOTINUS, the first of the Neoplatonists. At the same time, Plotinus drew from Plato, Aristotle, and the Stoics to construct a synthesis that was the last stand of intellectual paganism against the growing appeal of Christianity. His map of the intelligible world, derived from an analysis of human knowledge, was designed to point the way to union with the One, the first principle of all. The school of Plotinus thrived in such disciples as PORPHYRY and PROCLUS; through them, if not through the works of Plotinus himself, it left its mark on patristic culture, in NEMESIUS OF EMESA, PSEUDODIONYSIUS, and St. AUGUSTINE. The direct descendants, however, of Plato, Aristotle, and Plotinus were the proponents of ARABIAN PHILOSOPHY.

Ancient philosophy came to a kind of official end in 529, when Justinian banished the philosophers from Athens and confiscated their schools. By that time, however, it had left its mark on Christian thinkers and had produced the new movement of Christian philosophy.

Bibliography: F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy, v.1. (Westminster, Md. 1946). F. UEBERWEG, Grundriss der Geschichte der Philosophie, ed. K. PRAECHTER et al., 5 v. (12th ed. Berlin 1923–28). I. C. BRADY, A History of Ancient Philosophy (Milwaukee 1959). J. OWENS, A History of Ancient Western Philosophy (New York 1959), A. H. ARMSTRONG, An Introduction to Ancient Philosophy (3rd ed. London 1957). E. ZELLER, Die Philosophie der Griechen . . . , 3 v. in 6 (5th–7th eds. Leipzig 1920–23), W. K. C. GUTHRIE, A History of Greek Philosophy (Cambridge, Eng. 1962) v.1.

MEDIEVAL PHILOSOPHY

Christianity is not a philosophy, but a revealed religion, a means of salvation. Yet because it answers many of the same questions asked by philosophy, dialogue and even conflict between these two forms of knowledge was almost inevitable from the beginning of the Christian Era—whether in the early centuries, the period of patristic culture, or later, in the Middle Ages, in what has come to be called scholasticism. Under medieval philosophy, then, we shall consider both periods, that of patristic philosophy and that of scholastic philosophy.

Patristic philosophy. The first dialogue between Christianity and philosophy, held by St. Paul in the Areopagus of Athens (Acts 17.17–34), was an apparent failure, as this new wisdom was ridiculed by the philosophers as foolishness (1 Cor 1.23), an old wives' tale. In succeeding centuries, many philosophers continued to regard Christianity as a specious doctrine of little or no value; some bluntly opposed or attacked it. On their part, many Christians refused to have anything to do with philosophy. For some, as Clement of Alexandria remarks, it was the invention of the devil for the ruin of man. For Tertullian, it was the source of error and heresy: what then has Athens to do with Jerusalem? Did not the blasphemous errors of Gnosticism arise from overconfidence in philosophy? Or again, it represented purely human wisdom incapable of teaching the truth; faith alone and the wisdom of Christ were sufficient for the Christian. Perhaps in many this attitude was but part of their wider opposition to secular learning or to anything that savored of the pagan life they had abandoned in accepting Christ.

Greek Fathers. On the other hand, those philosophers and rhetoricians who had been converted to Christianity were not inclined to abandon entirely the wisdom they had acquired by rational methods, but proposed to put it to use in the service of Christianity. An early instance of this new attitude is found in the Greek APOLOGISTS of the 2nd and 3rd centuries, who employed the techniques of rhetoric, law, and philosophy to defend their new-found faith. At the same time, they came to see, as did St. JUSTIN MARTYR and CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, that whatever truth is found in the philosophers is but a fragmentary sharing in divine wisdom; while, in the providence of God, as Clement and EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA held, Greek philosophy itself is intended to be a preparation for the gospel and a pedagogue to Christ. For Clement, it not only retained this role, as a "preparatory discipline" for those still to be converted; it also had actual value for Christianity itself, in defending the faith from assault and presenting it in such fashion as to win a hearing. Properly used, it perfected the Christian, helping him to understand what he believed and to grow in virtue, thus making him a true Gnostic, a learned and holy man.

Once secular learning had thus been brought into the service of Christ (however poorly Clement may have accomplished this in specific details), the way was open to a greater collaboration of philosophy and Christianity. Yet the approach of ORIGEN was not that of Clement, his master in the School of Alexandria. He was primarily a theologian, one of the most penetrating if daring minds in the history of the Church. He had no use for philosophy for its own sake; rather, he felt the need to know it and use it that he might meet the philosophers of his day on their own grounds and expound Christian dogma to them in their own terms and in relation to current philosophical problems. Often at fault because he went too far in many of his speculations, and the center of a long controversy after his death, Origen nonetheless paved the way for others, who followed his ideals in more orthodox form. Even his adversaries, such as St. METHODIUS OF OLYMPUS, an admirer of Plato, owed him more than they admitted (see ORIGEN AND ORIGENISM).

The Origenist controversy was prolonged perhaps because it was related to a deeper problem that faced Christian thought in the 4th century. As the Church gained her freedom and her belief and worship became the state religion, she confronted the problem of absorbing or being absorbed by the culture of HELLENISM: would the empire be Christianized or the Church Hellenized? More than one heresy, e.g., Arianism and Apollinarianism, was closely connected with Greek philosophy; more than one churchman, as was said of SYNESIUS OF CYRENE, was more Platonist than Christian. Yet others, such as EPIPHANIUS OF CONSTANTIA, were deadly enemies of all classical culture and Greek philosophy.

A happy balance is to be found in three great thinkers of Cappadocia who share a common love and admiration for Origen: St. GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS, who gave attention to man's knowledge of God in a series of sermons admired by St. Augustine; St. BASIL, who synthesized the cosmological and scientific knowledge of his day, and in a famous letter to his nephews showed how Christians could profitably use the classics; and St. GREGORY OF NYSSA, the best philosopher of the three, who continued his brother Basil's work with a study on man, De hominis opificio, the first of its kind among Christian philosophers, and another on death and the Resurrection in manifest imitation of Plato's Phaedo. Gregory's influence is apparent in the "On the Nature of Man" of NEMESIUS OF EMESA. A century later (between 500 and 528) the works of the enigmatic PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS the Areopagite made their appearance in Syria, presenting a curious blending of Christian teaching and Neoplatonic thought. The unknown author apparently sought to convert the Neoplatonists and turn their philosophy into a Christian one. Instead, his writings, with the scholia of John of Scythopolis and MAXIMUS THE CONFESSOR, had greater influence among Christians of both East and West. The last of the Greek Fathers to enter the scene, St. JOHN DAMASCENE, summarized Greek patristic thought in his "On the True Faith" and made ample use of Dionysius's doctrines.

Latin Fathers. Among the Latin Fathers before Augustine, one can trace no set pattern. MINUCIUS FELIX composed his Octavius in imitation of Cicero, with some dependence on Seneca. TERTULLIAN relied on Soranus the Stoic to explain the nature of the soul and thus fell into materialism. MARIUS VICTORINUS remained a Neoplatonist even after his conversion, since he used that philosophy to help explain the Trinity. On the other hand, St. JEROME forbade Christians even to read the philosophers or poets [Patrologia Latina 22 (ed. 1859):385]. Yet without the help derived from the Neoplatonists, St. AUGUSTINE would hardly have achieved a concept of the spiritual, so deeply had he fallen into Manichaean materialism. When he came to the Church, it was not to abandon whatever good he had found in philosophy, but to vindicate its use for the Christian. Whatever truth the philosophers have discovered must be taken away from them by the Christian, to be used in the structure of Christian wisdom (Doctr. christ. 2:40:60). Philosophy thus became for Augustine a step in the structure of Christian knowledge—not an independent discipline, but a means of penetrating the truths of the faith. Philosophy was a part of his search for God: "What do I love when I love Thee?" (Conf. 10:6); and every branch of philosophy was made to contribute to that search (Conf. 10:6–7; In psalm. 41:6–8).

After Augustine, in the period marked by the migration of nations, there was little philosophical thought beyond that of Boethius and Cassiodorus. Preeminently the mediator between ancient culture and the Middle Ages, BOETHIUS left his mark on logic, the problem of UNIVERSALS, LIBERAL ARTS, and theology; while CASSIODORUS, author of a De anima, introduced learning and intellectual culture into monastic life. St. ISIDORE OF SEVILLE and St. BEDE deserve mention as encyclopedists. In addition, Bede marks a transition to the Middle Ages, since from his monastic tradition came those who would achieve a rebirth of learning in the Carolingian renaissance. (See PATRISTIC PHILOSOPHY.)

Scholastic philosophy. Patristic philosophy in almost every instance is the philosophy of men who were Christian in all their thinking, who did not cut philosophy off from faith or seek it for itself and in itself. This tradition was not abandoned in the revival of learning under Charlemagne. ALCUIN and his pupil RABANUS MAURUS continued the ideal of Augustine, making philosophy and secular knowledge the handmaids of faith. At the same time, the court of Charles the Bald witnessed a philosophical controversy on the nature of the soul carried on by RATRAMNUS OF CORBIE and HINCMAR OF REIMS, and was intrigued if not scandalized by the bold thinking and writing of JOHN SCOTUS ERIGENA. Possessed of some knowledge of Greek and widely read in Pseudo-Dionysius, Maximus, and Gregory of Nyssa, as well as in Ambrose and Augustine, John undertook a daring and powerful synthesis of philosophy and theology in his De divisione naturae, to show how the multiplicity of things proceeds from the oneness of God and is in turn brought back to Him. Even here, however, philosophy was a meditation on Holy Scripture and the faith, not the exercise of pure reason for its own sake.

Early Scholasticism. Only after Erigena, and partly under his influence, did Western thinkers make any real distinction between philosophy and revealed doctrine, to the extent that they began to cultivate logic or dialectics for its own sake. Called by John Scotus “the mother of the arts” and “the science of disputing well,” and yet regarded as the science of being (Patrologia Latina 122:869–870), dialectics attracted fresh interest in the 11th and 12th centuries and often intruded itself in areas where it had no place (see DIALECTICS IN THE MIDDLE AGES). Yet it is here that one finds the real beginnings of the movement known as SCHOLASTICISM, which reached its high point in the 13th century. Often indeed this early scholasticism, as in Peter ABELARD, thought it could answer such metaphysical questions as the nature of UNIVERSALS by the doctrine and method proper to logic, or explain the mysteries of the faith by pure dialectics. At the same time, the sound use of reasoning in LANFRANC of Bec and St. ANSELM OF CANTERBURY opened the way to a wholesome flowering of doctrine in the 12th century. From the school directed by Anselm’s pupil, ANSELM OF LAON, came many theologians who by the middle of the century had done much to systematize theology in numerous Summae and Sententiae, often in imitation and rivalry of Peter Abelard’s theological synthesis. The same tendency to summarize theology marked the work of the Parisian School of Saint-Victor, under Masters HUGH OF SAINT-VICTOR and RICHARD OF SAINT-VICTOR, who at the same time were much interested in philosophy and in mysticism. The most complete and most influential of such books of Sentences was that of Master PETER LOMBARD, composed at Paris about 1155 to 1158. Finally, though Paris was gradually becoming the intellectual center of the West, in the early part of the 12th century it was rivaled as a center of philosophy and surpassed as a seat of classical humanism by the School of Chartres. The last and greatest of the pre-university cathedral schools of Europe, under BERNARD OF CHARTRES, GILBERT DE LA PORRÉE, and others, it became known for its feeling for antiquity, its Platonism, and its growing interest in science. Its most perfect representative was perhaps JOHN OF SALISBURY, who at the same time mirrored the learning of Paris and was a witness to the growing importance of its schools.

High Scholasticism. Those schools, organized about 1200 as the guild or “university of the masters and scholars of Paris,” prepared the way for the flowering of scholasticism proper in the 13th century. Yet without the influx of new literature and ideas, through the translation of hitherto unknown works of Aristotle and of the Arabian and Jewish philosophers and scientists, the intellectual horizon of the West would never have been broadened beyond the narrow limits of earlier centuries. Nurtured in the Augustinian tradition of Christian wisdom, the schoolmen were suddenly faced with another wisdom that proposed itself to them as the complete embodiment of rational thought. Hesitant at first—sometimes victims of their own enthusiasm as they labored, as said ROBERT GROSSETESTE, to make Aristotle Catholic; sometimes content, with SIGER OF BRABANT, to “recite” the opinions of the philosophers whether or not they agreed with the faith—the scholastics came gradually to sift truth from error and to incorporate and integrate these new-found treasures into the body of Christian thought. In this, the lead was often taken by the teachers of the mendicant orders at the direction of the papacy: the DOMINICANS under St. ALBERT THE GREAT and St. THOMAS AQUINAS meeting the problem directly; the FRANCISCANS under St. BONAVENTURE inclining more perhaps to the older tradition, yet ready to accept the truth wherever found. It is the merit and glory of St. Thomas above all that he produced a new synthesis of Christian wisdom in which Aristotle and Arabians alike were brought into captivity to Christ. Not all were willing to accept his work; some bogged down in criticism and correctives; others, such as John DUNS SCOTUS, tried to build a new and stronger synthesis after a reexamination of the problems involved.

Late Scholasticism. With the 14th century, which brought so many religious and political changes and upheavals, scholastic thought became even more critical in character. Metaphysics and its integration into Christian theology no longer occupied the center of attention. Logic received a fresh emphasis and almost usurped the role of metaphysics, as WILLIAM OF OCKHAM initiated what came to be called the “modern way” of NOMINALISM. The beginnings of modern physics appeared at Oxford, always most receptive to science, and somewhat at Paris. Yet among the theologians, thought began to crystallize into schools: THOMISM, followers of GILES OF ROME, SCOTISM, and even nominalism. Paris became a city of conflict and confusion, as its intellectual life lost its vitality and degenerated into a mere commentary on the great syntheses of the 13th century.

Yet, while the failings and weaknesses of the scholastics are often much in evidence, they should not obscure the real and solid accomplishments of the movement itself and its effect on European culture. Paris and the many universities modeled upon it contributed to the transformation of Western education and the formation of an intellectual elite that was henceforth to dominate Western culture. From these schools, marked by rigorous use of the art of logical thinking, even more than from the Renaissance, Europe and the West derived the critical intelligence and restless spirit of scientific inquiry that sets Western culture off from the East, and even from other forms of Christian culture, and is the ultimate source of modern science. To label scholasticism a barren system, to call it “one of the greatest plagues of the human mind” (Diderot), is to fabricate a calumny that has no foundation in history.

See Also: AUGUSTINIANISM; OCKHAMISM; SCIENCE (IN THE MIDDLE AGES).

Bibliography: É. H. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (New York 1955). F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy, v. 3–4 (Westminster, Md. 1953, 1958). F. UEBERWEG, Grundriss der Geschichte der Philosophie, ed. K. PRAECHTER et al., 5 v. (11th, 12th ed. Berlin 1923–28). P. DELHAYE, Medieval Christian Philosophy, tr. S. J. TESTER (New York 1960). A. A. MAURER, Medieval Philosophy (New York 1962). D. KNOWLES, The Evolution of Medieval Thought (Baltimore 1962).

[I. C. BRADY]

MODERN PHILOSOPHY

The time span of modern philosophy reaches from about 1400 to 1900, although there is no sharp division

setting it off from either its medieval roots or its contemporary fruits. The whole development includes three main phases: the Renaissance transition (1400–1600), the classical modern methods and systematic explanations (1600–1800), and the 19th-century attempts at philosophical reconstruction. Each period makes a distinctive contribution to the process. The painful work of producing fresh ideas and attitudes begins in the Renaissance age, whose transitional character is marked by the intermingling of old and new elements and by the tentative nature of the philosophies. There follows a two-century spurt of great creativity in all parts of philosophy, with the emphasis placed upon new methodologies and systematic unifications of knowledge. Many deep divisions kept recurring, however, thus provoking the 19th century to search for broader bases of synthesis between evolving nature and historical man.

Modern philosophy does not grow in isolation from the other modern cultural factors. The national context is seen in the widespread use of vernacular languages, with a technical vocabulary being forged for philosophy in each linguistic area. Modern philosophy is unusually sensitive also to the methods, concepts, and problems evolved in the physical and biological sciences. Another mark of philosophical modernity is its dissociation from any particular theological framework, even though religious faith and its attendant questions continue to have a definite bearing on philosophical inquiries. Moreover, the modern growth in historical awareness leads to a special philosophical interest in genetic questions and human historicity.

Renaissance philosophy. Cardinal NICHOLAS OF CUSA embodied the early Renaissance disenchantment with the medieval systems, its epistemological uneasiness, and its special concern to rethink man’s relations with God and the world. Although religious faith held firm his conviction in God’s reality and creative power, he shifted the inquiry about God from a causal basis to a symbolical use of concepts similar to the mathematical way of dealing with infinite figures. Thus Nicholas heralded the appeal of modern philosophical methodology to the procedures in mathematics and physics, as well as the modern dialectical correlation between God and a world regarded as His expressive image and locus for constant social reforms.

A form of Christian humanism was developed by the Florentine humanists M. FICINO and PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA. They strongly defended man’s freedom, personal immortality, and ordination to beatitude in God, against the attacks of the Aristotelians at Padua. P. POMPONAZZI and other Renaissance Aristotelians removed the Christian interpretation of Aristotle’s view of man, nature, and the prime mover, thus hastening the separation of philosophy from theology. Their strongest work was done in the fields of logic and the philosophy of nature, where they influenced Galileo on method.

Renaissance Stoicism and SKEPTICISM arose from a continued dissatisfaction with all current accounts of human knowledge and conduct. J. LIPSIUS urged that Platonism was too cabalistic; that pure Aristotelianism ran counter to faith in a personal, free, transcendent God and beatitude; and that a sounder view was obtainable from Stoic logic, physics, and ethics. The really radical challenge came, however, from the reformulation of Greek skepticism by MONTAIGNE and P. CHARRON. They produced a crisis by regarding man's knowing powers as unreliable, by pointing out the large mixture of fantasy and wish in human speculations, and by pitting one philosophical school against another. Right down to P. BAYLE, the skeptical attitude remained strong, thus providing a spur for the great systematic thinkers in the 17th century.

Three other facets of the Renaissance mind are captured in the thought of N. MACHIAVELLI, G. BRUNO, and the philosophers of nature. Machiavelli placed brackets around the social precepts of Christianity and took the attitude of the inquiring scientist toward the realities of political life. His stark findings on the drive toward power and the political management of men pointed up the need for a relevant and yet morally disciplined political philosophy. Bruno's pantheism expressed a passionate desire to comprehend and unite oneself with total cosmic reality, but it was hampered by taking the substance-and-mode relationship as regulative for explaining the relation between God and the world. Although B. TELESIO and T. CAMPANELLA took a qualitative and quasi-magical approach to nature, they testified to the need to understand it better and to reorder social life in new ways.

The counterpoint to all these movements was the steady current of Renaissance SCHOLASTICISM, which continued to achieve new forms. This was the period of the great commentaries on St. Thomas Aquinas, the new developments in the law of nations and colonial moral problems, and eventually the shift to the teaching manual as the main instrument of tradition. (See RENAISSANCE PHILOSOPHY.)

Systematic philosophies. The impetus for the great 17th-century systems came largely from the effort of the mechanical philosophers and Descartes to counterbalance skepticism with a positive theory of nature and man. A modest role was played by F. BACON, even though he did not appreciate the primary lead of mathematics in the study of nature. He gave a new rhetoric to the age by codifying the criticism of scholastic philosophy of nature, by directing attention to the moving efficient causes, and by raising doubts about whether philosophy can say anything about God and the spiritual principle in man. But it was GALILEO himself who regarded nature as a divinely grounded system of mathematical intelligibilities and who bifurcated the primary qualities in nature and the secondary qualities in the perceiver. And although Sir Isaac NEWTON was less confident about the ontological import of mathematical rules, he worked out their explanatory functions with unsurpassed thoroughness.

But how does man fare in the mechanically ordered universe? Divergent responses were given to this leading question by T. HOBBS and R. DESCARTES. The Englishman's importance lay as much in his presuppositions as in his particular doctrines. For he developed the always attractive procedure of generalizing the dominant scientific outlook and, at least in principle, confining the philosophical analysis of man to what is attainable through this generalized method. Descartes agreed that man can fare very well indeed in the mechanically constituted universe, but only on condition that the mechanical conception of nature be integrated with an adequate theory of method, knowing, and being. By "adequate," he meant one that can meet the skeptical challenge better than do either the older realism or the newer MECHANISM. Descartes sought to combine mechanism with a reflective metaphysics of the self and God in so firmly grounded and closely knit a system that skepticism would be eliminated and the Christian faith would be liberated from an outmoded philosophy of nature.

During the second half of the 17th century, the Cartesian school was plagued by the breakdown of the unity of man, by the recrudescence of skeptical doubts over the relation between evidential reality and clear and distinct ideas, and by the eventual substitution of the Newtonian for the Cartesian physics (see CARTESIANISM). The great rationalists—B. SPINOZA, N. MALEBRANCHE, and G. W. LEIBNIZ—found it necessary to begin all over again with fresh principles of metaphysical speculation adapted to life's moral ends. Spinoza laid stress on the purgative and reforming functions of the theory of method, which had to bring the finite human intelligence to the point of regarding man as a composite modal modification and dynamic expression of the unique and powerful divine substance. The other side of the modern debate between monistic naturalism and pluralistic theism was taken by Malebranche and Leibniz, who defended the reality of many finite substances and volitional centers as being related to the personal God. All three thinkers agreed, however, that man can attain to metaphysical principles of certitude, that the crux of systematic explanation lies in the theory of human unity, and that the entire speculative effort deeply affects the moral reordering of human life and the search for happiness.

Historians of philosophy rightly caution against making a rigid contrast between Continental RATIONALISM and British EMPIRICISM. The two groups share many problems and presuppositions, especially on the direct ordering of the mind to its ideas and mental states and on the basic use of the method of analysis. Each group strives in its own way to blend experience and reason, the scientific view of nature and the life of reflective mind. Still, some characteristic emphases distinguish them on how to achieve this blending of the components in human life. The empiricists are much less confident about metaphysical principles and the dependence of moral judgment upon a metaphysical account of the God-man relationship.

Another salutary warning from the historians is to respect J. LOCKE, G. BERKELEY, and D. HUME in their quite distinct intellectual configurations, rather than to blur them together in a close series. The important thing about Locke is that he tempered all claims made for the human understanding with a caution born from his training as a physician and his observation of the nonmathematical methods of R. Boyle and T. Sydenham. Berkeley's immaterialism combined a delicate sensitivity to the skeptical objections on man's knowledge of the world with a reflective personal grasp of the relations between God and participant minds. Hume cut out his own path between skepticism and Newtonian science by making the study of human nature and associative beliefs the central theme for theoretical and moral philosophy.

The minor philosophical movements in the 17th and 18th centuries constituted an influential cultural background for the main endeavors. Among the lesser British thinkers must be counted the CAMBRIDGE PLATONISTS with their rational theology, the Deists ranging from mild minimalists in religion to virulent opponents of revelation (see DEISM), and the SCOTTISH SCHOOL OF COMMON SENSE, which tried to break out of the skeptical impasse and the Humean restriction of knowledge to perceptual objects and associative beliefs. The French and German Enlightenment embraced a broad spectrum of positions, ranging from the minimal rational THEISM of Voltaire and Mendelssohn to the naturalistic ATHEISM of Holbach and Diderot, and on to Rousseau's plan for educating man through the moral sentiments (see ENLIGHTENMENT, PHILOSOPHY OF).

The great genius of I. KANT was to transcend these Enlightenment divisions and renew the main philosophical task of integrating experience and reason. Unconvinced by metaphysics in the dogmatic form proposed by C. WOLFF, Kant worked out a critical method for inspecting the structure of human judgments and the a priori principles involved in the several domains of human activity: Newtonian science of nature, moral rules, biological research, aesthetic appreciation, religious belief, and the taming of political power. Kant reserved knowledge in the strictest sense for man's scientific grasp of phenomenal objects and for a metaphysical reflection upon the structure and principles of the mind. But he looked upon man as the active unifier of knowledge with the other uses of the mind in areas of belief and reflective judgment. (See KANTIANISM.)

19th century. Kant's synthesis of freedom and nature was too precarious to last, since it rested upon a dualism of self and appearances that provoked the search for a closer kind of unity in human experience. Philosophical ROMANTICISM flourished in Germany upon the demand for a principle of synthesis drawn from the inner life of the self and an imaginative view of nature. The drive of men such as F. von BAADER and F. SCHLEGEL was to expand the scope of vital intuition and to give greater play to the wisdom of the imagination and the passions, as aids in mastering the sharp contrasts in life. On the theological side, F. D. E. SCHLEIERMACHER emphasized man's basic feeling of dependence upon a superior power as furnishing the very springs of religious belief.

The German idealists were then confronted with the need to join Kant's methodic control over concepts with the romantics' feel for the unity and divinity of life. J. G. FICHTE made the fruitful suggestion that all phases of reality and thought respond to a common pattern of positional thesis, counterpositional antithesis, and resolving synthesis, and that they do so respond because this threefold pattern is the graven law of the absolute ego and its activity. F. W. J. SCHELLING tested this hypothesis from two sides, starting first from nature in order to reach spirit, and then proceeding in reverse from spirit to nature. But it required the surpassing mind of G. W. F. HEGEL to work out the dialectical development of spirit in all modes of experience. He interpreted all oppositions as expressing the tragic life of spirit. The creative travail of spirit shapes the logical sphere, the domain of nature, and especially the human world of psychic life and morality, history and art, religion and philosophy, as the encompassing system of knowledge. (see IDEALISM.)

Hegel's awesome synthesis seemed to be suffocating, however, to S. A. KIERKEGAARD as a religious critic and to L. FEUERBACH and K. MARX as naturalistic critics. They all agreed upon the need to deflate the theory of absolute spirit by referring it back to the human exister and agent. Where a new parting of the ways occurred was over how best to describe the existence and agency of man. Kierkegaard located these perfections primarily in the free individual, taken in his search for happiness, his moral responsibility, and his religious faith in the transcendent personal God. The other aspect of the human situation was explored by Feuerbach and Marx, for whom man is not fully real except in his social relations with other men and the natural world. Marx and F. ENGELS laid special stress upon the activity of work, the historical law of class struggle, and the vision of a classless society—the main tenets of communism or dialectical and historical MATERIALISM.

Two varieties of POSITIVISM were advanced by A. COMTE and J. S. MILL. Comte aimed at joining the search for the unity of knowledge with the social aspirations aroused by the French Revolution. Hence his objective synthesis ordered all the positive sciences, whereas his subjective synthesis placed these sciences at the disposal of man's moral aims and the positivist religion. Mill was soberly critical of this latter phase, since he was prolonging the empiricist analysis of knowledge and the utilitarian calculus of social happiness. Hence he allied positivism with his logic of science and his defense of human liberty in the democratic society.

Throughout the century, there was a strong attraction toward the philosophy of life. Its early version was advanced by A. SCHOPENHAUER, who taught the universal presence of a relentless will to live. He sought surcease from this drive partly in aesthetic contemplation and partly in ascetic denial of self. After Darwin's work on evolution appeared, the philosophy of life became expressly evolutionary. Whether it should merely echo biology or become a general cosmology and new morality was a disturbing question for F. W. NIETZSCHE. Within his conception of the will to power and the eternal cycle of becoming, there was no room left for God and an absolute standard of truth and morality. A paradoxical split opened between this philosophy and the religious view of God as the source of all life and truth.

Minor currents during the first part of the century included TRADITIONALISM and ONTOLOGISM, which based certitude on social transmission and a concept of being. In the latter part, there was a revival of Kantianism and a spread of idealism beyond Germany (see NEO-KANTIANISM).

Bibliography: G. BOAS, Dominant Themes of Modern Philosophy (New York 1957). É. BRÉHIER, La Philosophie moderne, v.2 of Histoire de la philosophie, 2 v. (Paris 1926–32). A. R. CAPONIGRI, Renaissance to the Romantic Age (A History of Western Philosophy 3; Chicago 1963); J. D. COLLINS, A History of Modern European Philosophy (Milwaukee 1954). F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy v.3–7 (Westminster, Md. 1953, 1958, 1959, 1963). B. A. G. FULLER, A History of Modern Philosophy, v.2 of A History of Philosophy, ed. S. M. MCMURRIN, 2 v. (3rd ed. New York 1955). É. GILSON and T. LANGAN, Modern Philosophy: Descartes to Kant (New York 1963); Recent Philosophy: Hegel to the Present (New York 1966). H. HÖFFDING, A History of Modern Philosophy, tr. R. E. MEYER, 2 v. (New York 1950). R. KRONER, Speculation and Rev- elation in Modern Philosophy (Philadelphia 1961). J. H. RANDALL, The Career of Philosophy: From the Middle Ages to the Enlightenment (New York 1962); From the Enlightenment to the Nineteenth Century (New York 1965).

[J. D. COLLINS]

TWENTIETH CENTURY

There is a narrower and a broader meaning for the expression “contemporary philosophy.” In the narrower and highly fluid sense, it signifies those problems and positions that are at the center of interest and discussion in a specific situation at present. In a broader way, contemporary philosophy includes the major currents active in the 20th century and relevant for its continued inquiries. The latter is the working historical meaning, being comprehensive enough to include the significant prolongations of previous philosophies as well as the basically new approaches developed in the 20th century. There are some special difficulties in studying contemporary philosophy: the sifting process has not gone on long enough to distinguish clearly between the weight of argument and cultural influences; the perspective is not fully attained for setting off the major from the minor, but temporarily impressive, contributions; and not all the systematic consequences have been worked out sufficiently to measure a philosophy in the round. However, the main lines of 20th-century development can be charted and the most prominent landmarks indicated.

Life philosophies. The theme of life was prolonged in the direction of man's interior activities by H. BERGSON, and in the direction of cultural unities by W. DILTHEY. In order to countervail the positivistic reduction of life processes to physical laws, Bergson cited the difference between the physicalist meaning of time as discrete movements along a spatial line and the reflective human meaning of time as interior duration. This opened up a metaphysical view of evolution as a striving toward freedom, and of human social life as a tension between the closed system of morality and religion and the open attitude best exhibited by the Christian mystics. Thereafter, P. TEILHARD DE CHARDIN gave a theistic and personalistic interpretation of the evolutionary character of life. The surge of life is at once from God in a creative outpouring and toward God in function of man's ability to concentrate the streams of life in order to advance, in community form, to the divine spiritual goal of the entire universe.

What impressed Dilthey was that human life finds its expression not solely in the individual's spiritual striving but also in the various modes of cultural activity. In a given historical period, these cultural modes of artistic, scientific, religious, and political life unite in a pattern, sometimes called the tone or spirit or characteristic outlook of the age. Dilthey made two methodological findings: the cultural pattern in history discloses itself better to the procedure of sympathetic understanding than to either the positivist sort of physical-causal explanation or the Hegelian dialectic of absolute spirit; and the great differences between one cultural outlook and another can be studied in terms of a common set of humane categories. The method of sympathetic understanding and categorical analysis of the expressive cultural forms was applied to the areas of language, myth, and science by E. CASIRER. And it was related to the individual existent's free interpretation of his destiny by J. ORTEGA Y GASSET. (See LIFE PHILOSOPHIES; HISTORY, PHILOSOPHY OF).

Idealism. During the first part of the century, idealism flourished in England, the U.S., and Italy. Among the British idealists, B. Bosanquet wrote persuasively about the ideal and absolute factor in art and the tension in practical life between absolute standards and particular situations. The most powerful mind was F. H. BRADLEY, who used the principle that the absolute is the totality of experience to argue for the ultimate internality of all relations, the constant breakdown of perceptual objects and empirical facts in the field of appearance, and the reality of the one undivided life of the absolute. Nevertheless, he denied any direct knowledge of the absolute reality as the union of all differences, and stressed the relative nature of the particular theoretical and practical standards that men do determine in experience.

In the U.S., J. ROYCE strove to accommodate evolutionary science and modern logic within idealism by exploring the dynamic, intentional relationship between an idea and its fulfilling meaning. He compared the bond between finite individuals and the absolute self to that between the living components in an interpreting system and the whole system or community of interpretation itself. On the moot question of preserving the reality of the human selves, Royce was criticized by such personal idealists as G. H. Howison and E. S. BRIGHTMAN (see PERSONALISM). Personal idealism emphasized the distinction between the personal God and finite persons, although it added that the divine nature itself contains both infinite and finite aspects to account for the presence of evil.

The leading Italian idealists were B. CROCE and G. GENTILE. Croce identified philosophy with history, because the former is a reflection upon the very process of spirit that internally constitutes the latter. He also revived the systematic claims of idealism by following the course of spirit through the theoretical realms of aesthetic and logical expression and the practical realms of economic and moral activity. Act was the key to reality for Gentile, who worked out a theory of actualism extending from logic to education.

Philosophy of the spirit. There was a loose association between several French and Italian thinkers who examined the life of the spirit apart from the Hegelian framework, in order to preserve unequivocally the integrity of the human person and his religious relation to the personal God. M. BLONDEL accepted from the philosophy of life a stress upon striving interior action, and from the idealists a respect for the interrelatedness of all domains of thought and reality. In his own synthesis, the philosophical inquiry remained open to the initiative of divine revelation. This inductive spiritual notion of Christian philosophy exerted an appeal upon M. F. Sciacca. But the renewed need to consider the fundamental philosophical issues in knowledge, metaphysics, and the growing theory of values was felt strongly by L. Lavelle and R. Le Senne. They exhibited the resources of the spiritualist position in penetrating downward into human experience at the levels of perception, ontological participation, and moral activity. (See SPIRIT)

American philosophy. American philosophy came of age with the impact of evolutionary thought, the interest it aroused in scientific method, and the questions left unanswered by the idealistic interpretation of evolution, science, and morality. C. S. PEIRCE emphasized the role of the idea of consequences in determining a particular scientific concept. He also examined the scientific attitude of unrestricted fallibilism, as well as the abductive method whereby the scientific mind develops fruitful new hypotheses. Against the antimetaphysical bias of positivism, he proposed a theory of the categories and a description of reality in terms of chance, continuity, and love. PRAGMATISM as a theory of meaning and truth was popularized by William JAMES. He argued that a pluralistic and melioristic universe, complete with a developing God, is not only more stimulating to man's moral fiber but also closer to the truth about being. The test of practice remained ambiguous in his hands, however, because of the difficulty of distinguishing between the satisfaction and the validation of ideas.

NATURALISM arose as a way of meeting this difficulty without returning to the idealistic absolute. The version proposed by G. SANTAYANA rested on the dictum that everything ideal has a real basis in the natural material world, and everything real has an ideal mode of fulfillment in the order of imagination. Santayana viewed the human spirit as a constant act of transition from matter to imagination and back again, and reduced religion to a refined filtering of aspirations by the play of imagination. Even so, the verdict of J. Dewey was that Santayana flirted so perilously with transcendence that he ended with a broken-backed dualism. Dewey's own naturalism aimed at being antidualistic in respect to the soul-body and God-world distinctions, and yet antireductionist in respect to the evolutionary levels of experience. He identified the knowable real with the totality of nature that can be investigated by the scientific method. This placed considerable weight upon the logic of scientific inquiry, which Dewey patterned after the biological relation of organism to environment and which he applied to man's artistic, social, and moral experience.

Since his main philosophical work was done in the U.S., A. N. WHITEHEAD belongs in American philosophy. He mounted a sustained attack upon the empiricist bifurcation of nature into causal factors and those that appear in the mind, as well as upon the empiricist disruption of causal relations in experience. His own philosophy of process and of organism was a speculative theory combining cosmological and metaphysical features. It revolved around the concrescence of "actual entities" and their dynamic togetherness in weaving "eternal objects" and achieving constant novelty. The systematic consequences of Whitehead's process philosophy were worked out for the various domains of experience in the metaphysical realism of P. Weiss.

Logical positivism. As originally propounded in the Vienna Circle consisting of M. Schlick, R. Carnap, and O. Neurath, LOGICAL POSITIVISM had the threefold task of analyzing the basic kinds of propositions that give knowledge, of determining a criterion of verification for these basic types, and of achieving the unification of the sciences. The first task resolved itself into a rigid distinction between the analytic, a priori propositions found in logic and mathematics and the synthetic or empirical propositions expressing sense data. The second step was to reduce all cognitive meaning to what can be verified through a formal test or a purely empirical test. And the third step was to use the language of physics as the basis of unification of the sciences, regarding every proposition that resisted such reduction as being metaphysical, in the pejorative sense of having neither formal nor empirical cognitive meaning.

Although this plan was simplicity itself, it ran into trouble when A. J. Ayer popularized it in England. The sharp contrast between the analytic and the empirical was attacked, the verification principle was weakened to several modes of verifiability in principle, and the physical language was discovered to contain unexpected contributions of mind. Both Ayer and H. Feigl moved on to broader conceptions of empiricism.

Analytical philosophy. The British school of analysis built upon the pioneer work of G. E. Moore and B. RUSSELL. What counted most in Moore's refutation of idealism was his method of moving from metaphysical justification to clarification of what is already known. His positive analysis of perceptual and moral problems took of piecemeal approach, fastened upon ordinary modes of discourse, and ferreted out the logical kinds of questions and reasons involved in commonsense talk. Russell's collaboration with Whitehead not only led to modern mathematical logic but also suggested ways of overcoming misleading expressions. His theory of types and descriptions led Russell to distinguish between the apparent and the real logical form of a proposition, to construct ideal languages out of known entities, and thus to devise a metaphysically neutral method of handling the traditional puzzles.

WITTGENSTEIN, the leading analyst, regarded philosophy as an activity of elucidation rather than as a theory. He proposed to dissolve rather than solve metaphysical theories about the world by showing that they arose from a misunderstanding of the structure and limits of language or from an attempt to express that which cannot be expressed in language but only shown by contrast with what is sayable. Eventually, Wittgenstein concentrated on the rules for particular language games and the particular meanings determined by such uses. J. Wisdom and the Cambridge school took a therapeutic approach to metaphysical conflicts, whereas G. Ryle and J. L. Austin at Oxford stressed plural usages, category mistakes, and good reasons.

Phenomenology. E. HUSSERL took the first step toward founding PHENOMENOLOGY with his critique of psychologism, or the attempt of J. S. Mill and C. Sigwart to reduce logical meanings to psychic occurrences and their conditions. He distinguished between the act of judging as a psychic phenomenon and the judgmental content or structure of meaning itself. After also criticizing naturalism and historicism for failing to distinguish between the context and the validity of thought, Husserl sought to make philosophy a rigorous science. He put brackets around the natural attitude of unquestioning acceptance of the world, developed descriptive and reductional techniques for examining the essential structure of things (acts and objects), and traced meanings back to the transcendental ego and its constitution of self and world.

M. SCHELER and M. MERLEAU-PONTY developed phenomenology in the moral-religious and the psychological spheres respectively. Scheler found a corrective for ETHICAL FORMALISM in the careful study of actual states of soul and attitudes. He used the theory of intentionality to examine the religious believer's ordination to God, as well as his self-realization through prayer and love of neighbor. His research was distracted, however, by an evolutionary pantheism in which God and man evolve together in life. Such speculations were foreign to Merleau-Ponty, who made phenomenology speak the language of perception again, in order to locate reality in the mutual relation between man and the world. He used the theme of the living body and man's relation to his life world as a means of regulating the sciences and of vindicating the act of human interpretation of visible reality.

Existentialism. The existentialists made their own return to the existent reality of man, partly to liberate him from being a modalized phase of the idealistic absolute, partly to recover the sense of freedom and moral decision, and partly to gain orientation for the study of being. But each of them made a distinctive development and came eventually to resist classification along with the others.

K. JASPERS and G. MARCEL maintained a threefold kinship. They were highly critical of the depersonalizing effect of technological civilization; they regarded the free human existent as being related to transcendence as well as to the world; and they recognized the limiting effect of life situations upon the project of reaching God. Marcel worked out a theory of recollection and participation in being whereby the human searcher is united to God, whereas Jaspers remained fundamentally ambiguous about this relationship. For J. P. SARTRE's part, both the social and the religious projects of man are unavoidable and yet doomed to frustration. Sartre based this conclusion on a sharply dualistic theory of matter and consciousness in man, reminiscent of the idealistic thesis and antithesis taken in isolation from any unifying principle. M. HEIDEGGER's route led him backward from things-that-are to being, from technology to the pre-Socratic grasp of nature, and from the long philosophical tradition to the act of thinking in which being can perhaps be enshrined. His analyses of being in the world, being along with others, and being related to instruments and to integral things, were clues to the metaphysics of being for which he sought. (See EXISTENTIALISM.)

Scholasticism. In the wake of the papal recommendations after Leo XIII's Aeterni Parris, there was a quickening of traditional Christian philosophies. The historical labors of M. GRABMANN and M. DE WULF restored knowledge of the medieval philosophies, a task carried on by É. GILSON, who also gave special place to St. Thomas Aquinas. J. MARITAIN's work was to bring THOMISM into living relation with modern problems in science, art, and society. The task of rethinking the scholastic heritage was continued in all areas of thought. (See SCHOLASTICISM, 3.)

Bibliography: J. L. BLAU, Men and Movements in American Philosophy (New York 1952). I. M. BOCHENSKI, Contemporary European Philosophy, tr. D. NICHOLL and K. ASCHENBRENNER (Berkeley 1956). J. D. COLLINS, Three Paths in Philosophy (Chicago 1962). F. C. COPLESTON, Contemporary Philosophy (Westminster, Md. 1956). A. DONDEYNE, Contemporary European Thought and Christian Faith, tr. E. MCMULLIN and J. BURNHEIM (Pittsburgh 1958). J. FERRATER MORA, Philosophy Today (New York 1960). A. W. LEVI, Philosophy and the Modern World (Bloomington, Ind.

1959). J. A. PASSMORE, A Hundred Years of Philosophy (New York 1957). The Library of Living Philosophers, ed. P. A. SCHILPP (Evanston, Ill. 1939), separate volumes on Broad, Buber, Carnap, Cassirer, Dewey, Einstein, Jaspers, Lewis, Moore, Radhakrishnan, Russell, Santayana, and Whitehead. V. E. SMITH, Idea-Men of Today (Milwaukee 1950). H. SPIEGELBERG, The Phenomenological Movement: A Historical Introduction, 2 v. (The Hague 1960). M. F. SCIACCA, Philosophical Trends in the Contemporary World, 2 v. (Notre Dame, Ind. 1964).

[J. D. COLLINS]

PHILOSOPHY AND SCIENCE

Prior to the 19th century, the philosophy of nature and natural science were one and the same discipline (see PHILOSOPHY OF NATURE). Their union dates back to Greek antiquity, when Aristotle considered as a single science what are now called the philosophy of nature, cosmology, chemistry, and biology. Such a unified view of philosophy and science survives in the title of Isaac Newton's masterwork The Mathematical Principles of Natural Philosophy (1687) and, more than a century later, in John Dalton's A New System of Chemical Philosophy (3 v., 1808, 1810, 1827). Contrasted to the "mathematical philosophy" fostered by Newton was another study, "experimental philosophy." These mathematical, chemical, and experimental philosophies, as they were then called, are today considered as science—a term that, with the foundation of the British Academy of Science in 1831, came into vogue to designate modern physics, chemistry, biology, and related disciplines.

Status before Kant. The separation of science and philosophy and the restriction of the term science—which Aristotle had used in a sense broad enough to include his philosophy of nature—must also be viewed against the background of modern philosophy (see PHILOSOPHY, HISTORY OF). Aristotle had applied the term physics to the single science of nature whose parts are listed above, and contrasted this with another science subsequently called METAPHYSICS. Aristotle's physical science was a project to explain material realities in terms of the four causes: MATTER, FORM, AGENT, and END. But the philosophers Francis BACON and René DESCARTES restricted the scope of physics. Bacon held that the concern with form and end belonged to metaphysics; Descartes, removing from physics the concern with FINAL CAUSALITY, conceived the world of nature as a machine and identified the physical with the mechanical. These developments, which had great influence, effectively destroyed the philosophy of nature as a physical science, leaving the material world to be studied only in the spirit of those subjects officially labeled science in the Anglo-American world of 1831.

Bacon and Descartes left metaphysics standing. But in a series of philosophies climaxed by that of Immanuel Kant, metaphysics itself was declared impossible. Science in the spirit of Newton and his successors was thus left as the only legitimate body of speculative knowledge concerning existing things. At this historical stage of the relations between philosophy and science, it could be said that science stood alone as a study of things, whereas philosophy, with respect to science, was purely critical and epistemological, warning students of nature against treading beyond knowledge like that in Newtonian physics.

Idealism and Positivism. In the wake of Kant's work, two new philosophical currents were put in motion. One was IDEALISM, which reached a climax with Georg HEGEL. Hegel constructed a philosophy of nature but in a sense quite different from its Aristotelian version. For Hegel, the idealist, nature was Spirit or Idea externalizing itself; these external manifestations could be studied by the philosophy of nature in three disciplines: (1) mechanics, which begins with a study of empty space; (2) physics, a study of things in their totality; and (3) organics, a study of the living world where Idea or Spirit, fractured in the externalizing process, is struggling in a more intense way to recover its unity. Hegel's notion of the estrangement (externalization) of a primitive reality from itself, and the subsequent struggle, in various stages, toward reunion, is important not only for understanding the Hegelian notion of nature and its sciences, but also for understanding the Marxist philosophy of science to be sketched below.

The other 19th-century view of science is called POSITIVISM and was begun by Auguste COMTE. He regarded his so-called positive philosophy as having concern not with the causes or origins of things but with "their invariable relations of succession and resemblance." This apparently descriptive, as opposed to explanatory, program for the study of nature leaves the material world entirely to the positive sciences. Herbert SPENCER, a later positivist, assigned to philosophy the role of synthesizing scientific results. But most positivists conceived the main burden of speculative philosophy as one of accounting for the apparent necessity and universality in the laws discovered by the sciences.

This project dates back to Kant, who had prepared its way by his ban on metaphysics and by his restriction of valid knowledge to PHENOMENA. Kant had argued that the phenomenal world could not give rise to the universality and necessity found in physical laws, and that such universality and necessity had therefore to come from a priori structures in the human mind. Comte's own preference was to view all history as following a law of three stages: a theological stage, wherein the world is explained by an appeal to supranatural deities; a metaphysical stage, wherein things are explained by abstract essences; and a positivistic stage, wherein reality is accounted for by sciences like that of Newton. Necessity is attributed to nature's laws, according to Comte, because even modern man has not yet outgrown the so-called metaphysical stage.

Charles Sanders Peirce. (Bettmann/CORBIS)

Other positivists proposed different theories. Ernst Mach regarded scientific laws as economies of thought that make it psychologically easier for man to study nature. Henri Poincaré held such laws to be mere conventions. Karl Pearson (d. 1936) considered scientific law a mental shorthand. For Hans Vaihinger (d. 1933) law was a fiction, but since one could proceed practically "as if" laws were real, he called his view "the philosophy of 'as if.'"

Other Philosophical Views. At the end of the 19th century and the beginning of the 20th, the relations between philosophy and science, as indeed the whole fabric of Western philosophy, were elaborated in a context of idealism or of positivism. Early in the 20th century, Anglo-American philosophy experienced a return to REALISM in one or other of its forms. For this and other reasons associated with the 20th-century revolution in physics, the relations between philosophy and science took new turns. Even 20th-century idealist and positivist philosophies of science became different from philosophies of the 19th century bearing similar labels. Generally speaking, six theories of the relations between philosophy and science can thus be identified; pragmatism, idealism, linguistic philosophy, existentialism, dialectical materialism, and realism of scholastic and nonscholastic varieties.

Pragmatism. PRAGMATISM owed its immediate origin to Charles Sanders PEIRCE, who held that ideas could be made clear only by looking to their "effects." This is the so-called pragmatic test. But Peirce, a self-styled scholastic realist, rejected positivism in its account of scientific laws and held to the existence of "particular characters," analogues to "natures" in the Aristotelian sense. Somewhat like Aristotle also, and again in contrast to positivism, he regarded man's first questions about nature as being "the most general and abstract ones." Unlike the arrangement in positivism, this would put philosophy, not after science, but before it.

Other pragmatists like William JAMES and John Dewey did not have the intellectual interests of Peirce. They did not make distinctions of any importance between philosophy and science. But both James and Dewey insisted that experience extends beyond the phenomena of Kant or the sense data of British EMPIRICISM. According to this larger view, there is personal experience, religious experience, experience of values, etc. Such an enlargement of the Kantian and positivist notion of experience, while important in itself, prepared the way for philosophies of science like Whitehead's.

Idealism. Idealism, as a philosophy of science, was defended in the 20th century principally by Arthur Eddington and James Jeans. Eddington was led to his position by arguments that science consists of "pointer readings" recorded on instruments. The scale for such readings, which determines how much of the real will register on us, is selected by the mind. Hence the mental or idealistic component in science. What lies behind the pointer readings escapes science, Eddington alleges. He likened this basic reality to spirit and consciousness, stressing once more his preference for "idealism." Jeans was led to a similar position by the predominance in modern science of the mathematical, which he identified with the mental.

Linguistic Philosophy. Linguistic philosophy must be subdivided into LOGICAL POSITIVISM and analytical philosophy. Both have common ancestors in Bertrand RUSSELL and Ludwig WITTGENSTEIN. Like earlier positivisms, logical positivism recognized as meaningful the various propositions occurring in a science; these are alleged to be either about sense data (in the British empiricist sense) or about what is reducible to sense data. It is the work of philosophy to clarify the meanings of such empirical statements. A second type of meaningful expression is the analytic statement, which is true by the very meaning of its symbols, e.g., A is A . In working with both types of statement, philosophy is reduced to logic, and science alone is left to study the real. Even among those who do not accept it completely, logical positivism has heightened interest among philosophers such as Ernest Nagel in searching for criteria by which scientific laws and theories are accepted.

Because of its concern with the propositions of the science, logical positivism has been referred to as a philosophy of artificial language. In contrast, another branch of linguistic philosophy, represented by Gilbert Ryle, P. F. Strawson, R. B. Braithwaite, and Stephen Toulmin, insisted on the importance of analyzing ordinary language. Such analytical philosophers, apart from their other commitments, argue that language can be meaningful without being merely analytic or empirical in the logical positivist sense. By recognizing ordinary language as a layer of first-level meanings that must be examined before the technical second-level terminology of science, analytical philosophers, while strictly concerned with language, acknowledge as genuine at least some of the questions raised by Aristotle in his philosophy of nature.

Existentialism and Phenomenology. EXISTENTIALISM as a philosophy of science can be seen best in the work of Karl JASPERS (b. 1883). For him there is an authentic primordial experience of subjectivity, existence, and transcendence. But science, while not itself such authentic experience, enlarges the field within which the act of transcendence can be accomplished. In form, though not in content, Jaspers's view here is reminiscent of the PHENOMENOLOGY of Edmund HUSSERL, who launched a program for the reduction of knowledge to primordial intuitions, e.g., of time and space, which condition man's interpretation of scientific results. Such a phenomenology was advanced also by Maurice MERLEAU-PONTY.

Dialectical Materialism. Though initiated in the 19th century, dialectical materialism reached its climax in the 20th century (see MATERIALISM, DIALECTICAL AND HISTORICAL). It has always claimed to remain close to science. Its theorists have insisted that philosophy precedes science and lays down such truths as the union of opposites in the essence of matter. Science, by such findings as the wave-particle duality in quantum theory, is regarded as confirming the earlier philosophical commitment.

Nonscholastic Realism. Finally, several 20th-century philosophers of science can be associated with realism, if merely for want of a better term to characterize their opposition to positivism and to idealism. Peirce, the pragmatist, belongs among these. Other realist philosophers include Emile Meyerson, Henri BERGSON, and Alfred North WHITEHEAD. Meyerson held that there was an ontology in all science, as shown by the scientist's commitment to the existence of abiding identities in a changing world. Bergson maintained that science as such presents a geometrized, hence static, view of a world in motion, and that motion can be grasped only by an intuition that lies beyond the techniques of science. Whitehead proposed that the scientist, in advance of his science, commits himself to "half truths" that the philosophers must examine. Using experience in the wide sense given it by James, Whitehead elaborated a philosophy of organism. He used science more to confirm and correct this philosophy than to establish it.

Scholastic Positions. With the revival of Thomistic philosophy in the wake of Leo XIII's encyclical Aeterni Patris, scholastics began to develop their own distinctive views on the relation between science and philosophy. One of the earliest and most active centers of this revival was the University of Louvain; its dominant figure was Cardinal Désiré MERCIER. As a follower of Aquinas, he subscribed to Thomistic metaphysics; he also accepted a philosophical physics that preceded metaphysics in the pedagogical order. With later generations at Louvain, however, the philosophy of nature, under the name of COSMOLOGY, gradually lost its originality and came to be considered more or less as an applied metaphysics. The most extreme presentation of this view is that of Ferdinand Van Steenberghen, for whom the sciences are subdivided into epistemology, which includes logic; positive science, which includes mathematics; and metaphysics, which includes cosmology, psychology, and even moral science.

Jacques MARITAIN (d. 1973) departed from the position just outlined by his recognition of a philosophy of nature distinct from metaphysics. The philosophy of nature is called by him ontological knowledge, in contrast to the modern sciences, which are called empiriological and are subdivided into empirioschematic and empiriometric. At the physical level of ABSTRACTION Maritain proposed a distinct type of natural science, called empirioschematic; such science, for him, uses so-called qualitative models, like the theory of evolution in biology, as explanatory tools. Empiriometric knowledge, on the other hand, is a mixed or intermediate science, described in principle by Aristotle, Saint Thomas Aquinas, and Cajetan, and roughly equivalent to today's mathematical physics. In such empiriometric knowledge the explanatory tools are quantitative, and the resulting science may be considered terminally physical.

Charles DE KONINCK of Laval University proposed a view denying that Maritain's so-called empiriological knowledge represented a distinct type of science. For De Koninck the modern sciences are dialectical in Aristotle's sense, whereas true or demonstrative natural science, again in Aristotle's sense, is found only in the general philosophy of nature and philosophical psychology (see DIALECTICS; DEMONSTRATION). The modern natural sciences are thus dialectical continuations of the philosophical study of nature, where demonstration can be achieved and science thus attained.

The Albertus Magnus Lyceum in the United States, taking its inspiration from Anicetus Fernandez and William H. Kane, agreed with Maritain that mathematical physics is a science distinct from the philosophy of nature. The Lyceum position agreed with De Koninck's in recognizing that empirioschematic knowledge is not a distinct science but a continuation of the philosophy of nature. However, this continuation of the philosophy of nature is regarded as not only dialectical; some of it is said to be demonstrative also. To this extent it continued the philosophy of nature not merely in a dialectical but also in a scientific way.

See Also: SCIENCE (IN ANTIQUITY); SCIENCE (IN THE MIDDLE AGES); SCIENCE (IN THE RENAISSANCE); SCIENCES, CLASSIFICATION OF; PHILOSOPHY OF NATURE

Bibliography: V. E. SMITH, ed., The Philosophy of Physics (Jamaica, New York 1961). J. MARITAIN, Distinguish to Unite, or the Degrees of Knowledge, tr. G. B. PHELAN from 4th French ed. (New York 1959). C. DE KONINCK, "Les Sciences expérimentales sont-elles distinctes de la philosophie de la nature?," Culture 2 (1941) 465-76. J. A. WEISHEIPL, ed., The Dignity of Science (Washington 1961). P. H. VAN LAER, Philosophy of Science, 2 v. (Pittsburgh 1956-62). S. STRASSER, Phenomenology and the Human Sciences (Pittsburgh 1963). R. MCRAE, The Problem of the Unity of the Sciences: Bacon to Kant (Toronto 1961). B. K. MILMED, Kant and Current Philosophical Issues (New York 1961). A. J. AYER, ed., Logical Positivism (Glencoe, Illinois 1959). S. E. TOULMIN, The Philosophy of Science (New York 1953). K. JASPERS, Way to Wisdom: An Introduction to Philosophy, tr. R. MANHEIM (New Haven 1960). C. S. PEIRCE, Philosophical Writings of Peirce, ed. J. BUCHLER (New York 1955). R. M. PALTER, Whitehead's Philosophy of Science (Chicago 1960).

[V. E. SMITH]

PHILOSOPHY OF NATURE

The philosophy of nature, variously referred to as natural philosophy, COSMOLOGY, and the science of nature, is the discipline that treats of the world of nature or the physical universe in its most general aspects. Traditionally it considers such topics as the definition of matter, nature, motion, infinity, time, life, soul, and similar concepts, and speculates about the elements and component parts of the universe. In the present day, philosophers of nature are faced with two major problems. One is how to distinguish their discipline from metaphysics; the other is to preserve it from being displaced by modern sciences, such as physics, chemistry, biology, and psychology.

While recognizing alternative views of the philosophy of nature, this article devotes major attention to that first propounded by ARISTOTLE in his Physics, and subsequently clarified and enriched by Greek, Arab, and Latin commentators, especially St. ALBERT THE GREAT and St. THOMAS AQUINAS.

Scope of the Philosophy of Nature

Aristotle characterized his study of nature as being both scientific, in contrast to Plato's "likely story," and natural, in contrast to being mathematical or metaphysical. The first claim he justified by delineating the subject of the science, its concern with causes and principles, and its scientific order of development. The second he showed by differentiating the natural from other scientific approaches, particularly the mathematical. This article follows his order in establishing these foundations and in proceeding from them to outline the scope of the entire discipline.

Subject of the Science. The claim that the philosophy of nature is scientific can be approached in several stages. First, the subjects considered in the philosophy of nature are said to be known in terms of a universal sensible matter (see SCIENCES, CLASSIFICATION OF). The corresponding universal knowledge is abstract, although not in the way in which mathematical knowledge is abstract. Mathematics, in its abstractions, leaves behind the sensible, physical world, while natural science does not. It merely abstracts the universal, or the type, from the individuals that impress themselves upon man's senses; in this respect, physical science stays within the sensible world, although considering only what is general within it. ABSTRACTION from individual to common sensible matter thus constitutes the special intellectual light under which the philosophy of nature views its subject.

Second, this subject itself may be defined in a general way as mobile being, where mobile means capable of being changed in any way. It is by their mobile character that things in the physical world first come to be understood. Water, copper, maple trees, cows, even men are initially known by their behavior, their weight, their combustibility or lack of it, their growth, or other such activities. Thus it is appropriate to characterize physical reality as mobile.

On the other hand, to consider the subject of the philosophy of nature to be "being" as mobile, one would have to presuppose a metaphysics. Until proof is given that there exists at least one immobile being—such as a Prime Mover or a spiritual human soul—reason, unaided by faith, can make no real distinction between being and the mobile. This is why, in the language of Cardinal CAJETAN, the philosopher of nature has to consider mobile being as an unsegregated whole (totum incomplexum). In the same vein, Cajetan urges that it would be inappropriate for the philosopher of nature to consider his subject matter to be corporeal reality. That every mobile being is a body has to be itself established in the philosophy of nature.

Scientific Character. These considerations raise the question whether there can be a scientific knowledge of a subject such as mobile being. If SCIENCE (SCIENTIA) is defined in Aristotle's sense, it is certain knowledge of things through their proper causes (Anal. post. 71b 8–12). To fulfill this definition, natural philosophy must initially seek the primary causes or FIRST PRINCIPLES of this subject. Such an objective governs the initial development of natural philosophy, as pursued in the Aristotelian tradition.

An orderly search for these principles is guided in that tradition by the methodological conviction that the mind's natural tendency is to go from the known to the unknown. This explains why, though God is the most universal cause of all reality, man's knowledge of nature, as reached by unaided reason, does not logically begin with Him or with any other metaphysical subject. The search for first principles must stay within the proper order of nature. This again explains why, for Aristotelian Thomists, the study of metaphysics is postponed until after that of the philosophy of nature. Another application is that within the level of physical knowledge, what is best known to man are physical things as grasped in a universal and vague mode; only from such considerations does the mind advance toward notions that are more particular and distinct.

Order of Invention. This way of stating the progress of the mind from the known to the unknown is based on the fact that man has an imperfect knowledge of a thing before such knowledge grows more complete. To know a thing imperfectly is to recognize its common features without being able to differentiate it from other things. A GENUS, which includes its SPECIES in a universal and indistinct manner, is more intelligible to man than a species itself. The mind is able to recognize an entity such as a circle or a man (vague knowledge) before it can give a scientific DEFINITION of either (distinct knowledge). As indicated by his speech, a child first tends to regard all women as “mother” and all men as “father”; then, as his knowledge increases, he is able to put a differential (hence distinct) structure into such notions.

The movement of the mind from general aspects of things toward their more particular features is a progress from what is most intelligible to man toward what is most intelligible in itself. The more generic man’s considerations, the more remote these are from the world of actual being, which is the source of objective intelligibility; again, the more specific these become, the closer man gets to actuality, even though this more actual entitative level is less intelligible for him. This is why, though modern science analyzes nature in a highly specific and detailed way, it is frequently uncertain and hypothetical in its conclusions. In very detailed areas of science, e.g., quantum theory, notions become so hazy that the physicist no longer knows what his mathematics represents and hence no longer knows what he is studying.

Order in Natural Science. The methodological approach just outlined has two important consequences, one concerning the order of the subjective parts of the science of nature, and the other concerning the level at which the mind should search for the first principles of physical things.

Subjective Parts. In the study of any type of mobile or material being, its most generic level should be examined first: this most generic level is mobile being without regard to its types, such as water, iron, maple tree, dog, or man. Such a procedure avoids repeating the analysis of mobile being in general whenever an analysis of a particular type of mobile being is begun. The subject of this basic study, entitled the Physics by Aristotle, is mobile being in general (ens mobile simpliciter). After this, the philosophy of nature considers the first and most common type of mobile being, bodies undergoing local motion; this formed the subject of Aristotle’s On the Heavens, whose content may be best described as cosmology, the science of the universe at large. In the progress to the even more particular, the next study is that of qualitative change, exemplified in On Generation and Corruption, Aristotle’s rudimentary work on chemistry. Finally come the biological works, beginning with a study such as that outlined in Aristotle’s On the Soul.

This sequence of books is mentioned here not to defend the content of Aristotle’s cosmology or chemistry, but only to illustrate a formal order for treating the various materials concerning natural things. This issue must be reopened in discussing the relation between philosophy and science. The contents of the Physics alone are often described today as the philosophy of nature; although this restriction is not quite accurate, it can be used until further precisions are made.

Principles of the Philosophy of Nature. The proper order of invention thus requires a search at the universal level of mobile being for those first principles which, when discovered, assure that the philosophy of nature is scientific in the sense of the Posterior Analytics. The result of this search leads to the recognition that in all motion there are three factors: (1) a subject or MATTER; (2) a new qualification of this subject, called FORM; and (3) the previous lack or PRIVATION of this form in the subject able to possess it (see MATTER AND FORM). Moreover—and now at a level only slightly less general than before—two kinds of change are recognized: on the one hand, SUBSTANTIAL CHANGE, e.g., the burning of wood, whose subject is called primary matter and whose form is called substantial form; on the other, accidental change, e.g., the splitting of wood, whose matter is called secondary matter and whose form is known as accidental form. Primary matter, substantial form, and the previous privation of such form are the three first principles of all mobile being. The recognition that such principles exist in the world of nature is the clear assurance that a science of the natural world is possible.

Nature and the Natural. Aristotle is furthermore at pains to distinguish the meaning of the term “nature.” If the philosophy of nature is a natural science, then he must show that the subject as well as the middle terms for demonstrating about that subject are both natural. He does this by first defining nature.

Art. NATURE has several opposite poles to which, in different contexts, it can be contrasted. First of all there is art [See ART (PHILOSOPHY)]. In all types of art, but especially in mechanical art, man obviously does something to the given world. He finds iron ready-made but shapes it into a fence. He obtains wool from sheep but sews it into a garment. He cuts wood from a forest but arranges it into a house. All such products of art can undergo changes as in the rusting of the fence, the tearing of the garment, and the burning or collapsing of the house. But second thought shows that the changes take place not because of the artistic form but because of the natural matter. The fence rusts because it is iron, the garment tears because it is wool, and the house burns or collapses because it is wooden. Thus, what is by nature has a principle of motion within itself; what is by art, to the extent that it is art, has its principle extrinsic to it and in human reason.

Chance. Another opposite to nature is CHANCE—an interference between two lines of natural causality not determined, by the nature of either, to interfere with one another. Such happens when, say, a cosmic ray strikes a gene and results in the production of abnormal offspring. “Nature is the first principle of motion and of rest in that in which it is [by contrast to art] primarily and essentially and not accidentally [by contrast to chance]” (St. Thomas, In 2 phys. 1.5). In a briefer but less rigorous wording, nature is an intrinsic principle of motion.

Mathematical Physics and the Physical. But though the phenomena of art and chance may aid in the defining of nature, the most important modern opposite of the natural or physical is the mathematical, especially the kind of mathematical knowledge called mathematical physics. In listing Aristotle’s major works in natural science, no mention was made of mathematical physics. The reason is that this is not a natural or physical science in its internal structure, as Aristotle explains in Book 2 of his Physics. It does not have a strictly physical subject, like water or sheep, but a mixed subject, e.g., sensible lines in optics, where the physical or sensible is compounded with the quantified or mathematical. Moreover, it is only the mathematical component of the mixed subject that the mathematical physicist explains. Evidence for this can be found in the fact that the middle term in a mathematico-physical argument, hence the causal knowledge employed in such an argument, is mathematical (cf. 193b 23–194a 18).

Physical Subjects. The philosophy of nature, by contrast, is strictly physical or natural. It studies the mobile world as known through the principles of motion. Whereas the mathematical physicist may measure motion to determine its velocity or acceleration, the philosopher of nature tackles the more fundamental question of what motion is. In a similar fashion, the mathematical physicist measures time, but to define time is a problem in the philosophy of nature. Unlike mathematical physics, which has a mixed subject—materially physical and formally mathematical (St. Thomas, In Boeth. de Trin. 5.3 ad 6)—the subject of a genuine philosophy of nature is strictly physical or natural; it is the mobile as such.

Middle Terms. Unlike the mathematical physicist, whose mathematical reasons show only “that” something is so without giving the physical “why” (cf. Summa Theologiae 2a2ae, 9.2 ad 3), the philosopher of nature uses middle terms that are physical. These middle terms ultimately represent one or other of the four causes (see CAUSALITY). The determination that there are such causes in every mobile being is made in the latter part of Book 2 of the Physics (198a 14–200b 9). Therefore, in their middle terms as well as in their subjects, mathematical physics and the philosophy of nature are distinct sciences.

Physical Interpretation. Mathematical physics is said, in the language of St. Thomas, to be terminally physical (In 2 phys. 3.8), or, in the language of 20th-century philosophers of science, to require physical interpretation. This problem of terminating or interpreting mathematical physics means finding, if possible, a physical reason or model for the facts that mathematical physics knows in only their mathematical reasons. Such interpretation or termination, for Thomists, is external to mathematical physics; it is a function of the philosophy of nature, where the physical causes of material things are properly sought.

Unity of the Philosophy of Nature. Having established in Book 1 of the Physics that the philosophy of nature is a science and in Book 2 that it is a natural or physical science, Aristotle turns in Book 3 to a definition of MOTION, the fundamental property of mobile being; Book 3 looks, later on, at a possible intrinsic characteristic of motion, that of infinity. Having shown that motion is not infinite but finite and hence measurable, Aristotle turns in Book 4 to the extrinsic measures of motion, PLACE, the measure of mobile being, and TIME, the measure of motion. Motion is divided in Book 5 into its subjective parts and in Book 6 into its quantitative or integral parts. Books 7 and 8 are devoted to the Prime Mover and associated problems (see MOTION, FIRST CAUSE OF).

Relation to Metaphysics. In a work devoted to the consideration of the universal causes and principles of mobile being, it is relevant to raise the issue of the universal efficient cause of motion. This is the point where, if the proper order of invention is followed, the philosopher discovers that being need not be necessarily mobile and material. It is this so-called common being, i.e., being as common to both material and immaterial things, that becomes the subject of METAPHYSICS.

Relation to Modern Science. To the extent that physics and chemistry are mathematical, they are grouped by Aristotelian-Thomists with the mathematical physics described earlier; similarly, to the extent that biology invokes mathematics, as in the study of genetics, it is treated likewise. However, to that extent that modern sciences are not mathematical but physical—as in parts of chemistry, much of biology, and many notions of modern cosmology—these sciences are regarded as natural and physical. For those who subscribe to the Aristotelian-Thomistic view on the order of learning, i.e., that the mind moves from the universal level to the specific level in its understanding of nature, such sciences become parts of a single physical science that begins at the general level of what is now called the philosophy of nature and reaches to the more specific levels of modern science.

Disputed Questions. Yet these are disputed points even for Thomists. Many agree that the modern sciences in which mathematics predominates are affiliated with the “mixed sciences” of Aristotle and the medievals. But there is great controversy as to the place of the natural sciences in the Thomistic hierarchy of knowledge. Among those who maintain that there is a philosophy of nature distinct from metaphysics, one group envisions a continuation between the philosophy of nature and such sciences, while another maintains that these sciences are themselves, formally distinct from the philosophy of nature. While there is common agreement about where the philosophy of nature begins, there is no consensus about where it ends when compared to modern science. (See PHILOSOPHY AND SCIENCE.)

Psychology and the Philosophy of Nature. For Thomists who reject the view that the philosophy of nature is an applied metaphysics, PSYCHOLOGY is considered to be a part of the philosophy of nature. This is in accord with the analyses of St. Thomas in various of his commentaries on Aristotle's texts. What is called philosophical psychology is not about the soul only, as the etymology of psychology (from Gr. $\psi\upsilon\chi\eta$, meaning soul) might suggest. It is about the composite, with the soul or form being the principle of the science rather than the subject.

According to Aristotle's ordering, the study of mobile being in general becomes more and more specific until it extends to that type of mobile being that is animate. But the study of the living has no first principles of its own; the principles of living things are still the matter and form discovered in Book 1 of the Physics. In any living thing there is simply a special type of form, called a SOUL, producing a special kind of effect in primary matter, rendering the matter not only corporeal but animated in this or that specific way. The study of the animate world thus is a subjective part of the scientific knowledge developed in the more general philosophy of nature.

In the light of the foregoing, it is incorrect to think of the philosophy of nature and philosophical psychology as two coordinate branches, or integral parts, of the science of material things. This misconception is likely to occur when the philosophy of nature is considered in the spirit of Christian WOLFF and labeled cosmology. On the other hand, writers who reject the Wolffian usage often employ the expression philosophy of nature to designate the philosophical study not simply of the inorganic world but of what all mobile beings, lifeless and living, have in common. Such a study should be more accurately labeled the general philosophy of nature; in this understanding, it would be appropriate to regard philosophical psychology as a proper subjective part.

Method in the Philosophy of Nature

By contrast to mathematical physics, which abstracts from nature only those features that can assume quantitative form, the philosophy of nature methodologically takes the whole of EXPERIENCE into account. One of the reasons alleged by modern scholars for Aristotle's failure to construct a better mathematical physics was his over-empirical temper; this possibly prevented him from abstracting from the medium through which a body, say a falling body, actually moved. At any rate, the philosophy of nature is through and through an empirical science; its conclusions must be "terminated" as St. Thomas said, or tested, as we would say in a later age, in sense experience. Because it depends so much on experience, St. Thomas locates the philosophy of nature after mathematics and mathematical physics in the order of learning.

Mode of Discourse. In regard to other aspects of method, the philosophy of nature, always remaining close to experience, progresses from universal truths—such as those involving mobile being in general—to more particular truths. This progress is called by St. Thomas "the method of concretion" and is further described as "the application of common principles to determinate [types of] mobile beings" (In lib. de sensu 1.2). In this descending movement, the philosophy of nature is far from a deductive science of a mathematical or rationalistic type. It does not predict, except in the trivial sense that if x is a mobile being, x will have for its first principles primary matter, substantial form, and privation, etc. In progressing by the method of concretion, the philosopher of nature must discover, through experience rather than by deduction, what exists in the mobile world; the application of common principles discovered in earlier experience can then be offered in explanation of what later and more refined experience reveals.

Aquinas contrasts the methods of mathematics with the more discursive method of the philosophy of nature. In mathematics, the mind considers, for instance, the essence of an object such as a triangle; without reverting to experience, it deduces the properties, e.g., the sum of its interior angles. But in the philosophy of nature the mind does not study one thing such as a triangle; in response to experience, it goes from one thing, an effect, to another, e.g., the extrinsic causes. Thus the philosophy of nature proceeds discursively or rationabiliter, whereas mathematics is said to proceed "in the mode of learning," or disciplinabiliter (In Boeth. de Trin. 6.1).

Use of Induction. As another aspect of its experiential character, the philosophy of nature establishes its principles by INDUCTION (In 8 phys. 3.4). Even in the Physics, abstract as it is in contrast to the study of later "concretions," the method is predominantly an inductive examination of the world revealed through sense experience. Such inductions require a pre-inductive dialectic that is not part of the philosophical science of nature. It prepares for induction, and it is this post-dialectical induction that gives the philosophy of nature its experiential mood. There are far more inductions in the Physics and in On the Soul than there are causal demonstrations. Moreover, when such demonstrations are made, as in the case of the two definitions of motion or two definitions of the soul, the premises themselves are the fruits of induction. Most of the demonstrations are from effect to cause (demonstratio quia), not from cause to effect (demonstratio propter quid). Since the latter type of demonstration is known as DEDUCTION, and since such demonstrations are not especially characteristic of the philosophy of nature, it would be an error to regard the philosophy of nature as a deductive science. Its method of proceeding discursively (rationabiliter) actually involves something quite different.

Recent Views of Natural Philosophy

The Aristotelian view of the philosophy of nature was commonly accepted until the beginnings of the Renaissance. Then, as modern philosophy and modern science began long periods of development, natural philosophy suffered a steady decline under successive attacks from MECHANISM, EMPIRICISM, and POSITIVISM. The 19th and 20th centuries, however, have witnessed a renewal of interest in this discipline. While differing in many respects from the traditional expositions by scholastics, these new philosophies show some sympathy and accord with the basic theses that had earlier been developed.

Philosophies of Matter. Original philosophies of nature, for example, were developed by the idealistic and romantic philosophers of the 19th century (see G. Henne-mann, Naturphilosophie im 19. Jahrhundert, Munich 1959). These are important in themselves as well as for their historical bearing. Out of the Hegelian movement came MARXISM, with a philosophy centering on the world of matter. This was given a more or less systematic form in the 20th century, not only by Lenin but by the more recent work of Soviet philosophers. Somewhat as in the strict Aristotelian scheme, Soviet philosophers hold to a general and philosophical study of matter with its opposing principles of thesis and antithesis. Since, among Soviet thinkers, there is only one matter and one view of it, scientific findings are said to verify and reflect the results of the prior and more general analysis by philosophers (See HEGELIANISM AND NEO-HEGELIANISM; MATERIALISM, DIALECTICAL AND HISTORICAL).

Notion of Nature. In the West, Aristotle's insistence that mathematical physics does not function as a fully natural science was matched by similar insights of thinkers like Charles S. PEIRCE, Alfred North WHITEHEAD, Henri BERGSON, Pierre TEILHARD DE CHARDIN, and, more remotely, such 20th-century naturalists as Samuel ALEXANDER, Roy Wood Sellars, and John DEWEY (see NATURALISM). All of these writers had some more or less explicit notion of nature—Peirce's "particular character"; Whitehead's "organism"; Bergson's "élan vital"; and Teilhard's "psychic."

If their language seems too biological and even, as in the last case, psychological, it should be remembered that the term "nature" itself had biological connotations in both its Greek and Latin origins. Softer and analogical meanings can be given to the similar terms of modern philosophers; one need not take as univocal, in all their occurrences, words like "organism," "vital élan," and "psychic." Even with these qualifications, however, much work remains before 20th-century philosophers of nature can be brought into harmony with each other, into agreement with the valid insights of past thinkers, and above all into accord with reality as experienced.

Duality and Directionality. Again, the 20th-century philosophers of nature named above attest more or less to a dualistic character of natural things like that explained through primary matter and its form. The naturalists even speak of "levels" of process and "the emergence of novelty," both of which give evidence that in all natural things there is a substratum, differentiated in various ways by what has been called form. But the same thinkers are inclined to take "levels" and "novelty" as something given, rather than to try to explain the given, as do Aristotle, Whitehead, Bergson, Peirce, Teilhard, and the Soviet philosophers.

Finally, all of the 20th-century philosophers of nature named above, including the Soviet theorists and Western naturalists, see directionality in the cosmos. These insights are intimations of the causality of the END (see FINAL CAUSALITY; TELEOLOGY). Whitehead is explicit in regard to the causality of purpose and, contrary to Hume, insists on man's power to grasp EFFICIENT CAUSALITY. Thus, though in different terms and a different context, such a philosopher as Whitehead recognized all four of the physical causes in a more or less conscious way.

Since 19th-century efforts to construct a priori philosophies of nature, such as IDEALISM, or to deny the philosophy of nature, as with positivism, important 20th-century Western philosophers seem to have rediscovered the need for a realistic evaluation of nature, one that considers mobile being at a level more general than the specialized natural sciences and at a level more natural than mathematical physics.

See Also: PHILOSOPHY; MATHEMATICS, PHILOSOPHY OF.

Bibliography: T. DE VIO CAJETAN, De subjecto naturalis philosophiae, ed. C. DE KONINCK and E. GAUDRON (Selecta Lavalensia; Quebec 1939). JOHN OF ST. THOMAS, Cursus philosophicus thomisticus, ed. B. REISER, 3 v. (Turin 1930–37). V. E. SMITH, The General Science of Nature (Milwaukee 1958); ed. The Philosophy of Physics (Jamaica, NY 1961). W. H. KANE, “The Nature and Extent of Philosophy of Nature,” Thomist 7 (1944) 204–232. J. MARTAIN, Philosophy of Nature (New York 1951). F. RENOIRTE, Cosmology, tr. J. F. COFFEY (New York 1950). C. DE KONINCK, “Introduction à l’étude de l’âme,” Laval Théologique et philosophique 3 (1947) 9–65. A. FERNÁNDEZ-ALONSO, “Scientia et philosophia secundum S. Albertum Magnum,” Angelicum 13 (1936) 24–59.

[V. E. SMITH]

PHILOSTORGIUS

Fourth-century Church historian; b. Borissus, Asia Minor, c. 368; d. probably Constantinople, 425 or 433. A layman well read and widely traveled, Philostorgius wrote a church history in 12 books known only through a summary and epitome in PHOTIUS (Biblioth. Codex 40), and fragments in Suidas, the Martyrion of Artemius by John of Rhodes (ninth century), a Vita Constantini (H. Optiz, Cod. Ang. Gr. 22), and the Thesaurus orthodoxae fidei by Nicetas Acominatus. Philostorgius presented his work as a continuation of the Ecclesiastical History of EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA, and covered the period from 315 to 425. He was, however, obviously an Arian partisan and favored the cause of the neo-Arian heretic Eunomius of Cyzicus. While praising his style and diction, Photius maintained that Philostorgius was frequently inaccurate, particularly when he praised Eunomius, Aëtius of Antioch, and Eusebius of Nicomedia or condemned Acacius of Caesarea in Palestine and Basil of Cappadocia. His history is important for the citation of Arian sources that have not been preserved, for the evidence it offers of the attraction Arianism had for the cultured Greek mind, and for its thesis that the acceptance of the theology of ATHANASIUS OF ALEXANDRIA spelled the destruction of the Roman Empire. Philostorgius mentioned an Encomium on Eunomius and a Refutation of Porphyry of his own composition, which have not been preserved.

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) 65:459–624. J. BIDEZ, ed., Philostorgius: Kirchengeschichte (Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte 21; 1913) 1–150. H. OPITZ, Byzantion 9 (1934) 535–593. J. BIDEZ, ibid. 10 (1935) 403–442. H. HESELER, ibid., 399–402. H. BECKBY, ed. and tr., Anthologia Graeca, v. 3 (Munich 1958) 120–121. H. RAHNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:478. J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 4 v. (Westminster, Md. 1950–86) 3:530–532. P. BATIFFOL, Quaestiones Philostorgianae (Paris 1891). J. MARQUART, Theologische Literaturzeitung 38 (1913) 705–709. G. FRITZ, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 12.2:1495–98. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF from 5th German ed. (New York 1960) 274. G. GEUTZ, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. 20.1 (1941) 119–122.

[F. X. MURPHY]

PHILOTHEUS COCCINUS, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Patriarchate from 1353 to 1354 and from 1364 to 1376; Byzantine theologian and Hesychast; b. Thessalonica, c. 1300; d. apparently Constantinople, 1379. Born of a Jewish mother in poor circumstances, Philotheus paid for his education by serving as cook to his preceptor, Thomas Magistros. He became a monk on Mt. Sinai, then entered the Grand Laura on MOUNT ATHOS, where he served as abbot and defended the Hesychastic doctrine of Gregory PALAMAS. Although he had been appointed bishop of Heraclea in Thrace, he spent most of his time in Constantinople and was not present for the sacking of his episcopal city by the Genoese in 1352. He was appointed patriarch of Constantinople by Emperor John VI Cantacuzenus (November 1353), but with the fall of the emperor, Philotheus was forced to resign and was imprisoned for treason. Eventually he was allowed to return to his former bishopric of Heraclea, and through the good graces of the high official Demetrius CYDONES was rehabilitated (1363) and reappointed patriarch the following year. He took a vigorous part in the political affairs of the empire, and he strongly opposed the efforts made by the restored emperor John V Palaeologus (1354–76) in favor of union with Rome. This gained him the enmity of Demetrius Cydones, particularly when Philotheus called a synod (1368) to condemn his brother Prochorus CYDONES.

Asserting the independent primacy of his patriarchate, Philotheus canonized Gregory Palamas in the synod of 1368 and declared him a doctor of the Church. Pursuing his ecclesiastical policy, he successfully won the allegiance of the Orthodox Serbs, Bulgarians, and Russians to the empire faced with the Turkish menace, and took repressive measures against Byzantine Catholics. In 1376 he resigned his position as patriarch because of age and ill health.

While still a monk on Mt. Athos, Philotheus seems to have written two tracts against Gregorius Akindynos (d. 1349) in favor of Taborite spirituality; and as bishop of Heraclea he wrote 14 Kephalaia, or chapters, against the heresies of Akindynos and the Calabrian monk Barlaam. At the suggestion of Emperor John Cantacuzenus (before 1354) he produced the most imposing of his polemical works, the 15 Antirrhetica, or diatribes, against the historian Nicephorus Gregoras, a severe opponent of Palamitism in Constantinople. This work appeared in separate sections: books 1 and 2 with an epilogue (book 3) were published first; then the succeeding 12 books were published. From this period there is also an unedited letter to the Barlaamite monk Petriotes on the Divinity (Paris MS Gr 1276).

Philotheus was the author of one of the weightiest Palamite documents, the Hagiorite Tome, written c. 1339 and used by Palamas in his own defense in 1441. With Nilus CABASILAS he prepared a second tome for the synod of 1351; and as patriarch he produced the Synodal Tome of 1368, in which Prochorus Cydones was condemned. He also edited a confession of faith for bishops, and the anathemas for the Synodicon (1352) for the celebration of Orthodox Sunday.

His hagiographical writings are numerous and seem to have been aimed primarily at preventing the anti-Palamite writings of Nicephorus Gregoras from affecting the liturgy. Philotheus wrote a life of St. Anysia of Thessalonica, the martyr Febronia, the monk Germanus, his predecessor Isidore, Onuphrius, and Sabas the Younger. He preached Encomia in favor of the 12 Apostles, St. Demetrius, the Three Hierarchs, All Saints, his spiritual father Nicodemus the Younger (d. 1321), the martyr Phocas, and sermons honoring St. John Chrysostom, Theodore Teron, and St. Thomas the Apostle. He wrote the life and the liturgical office of Gregory Palamas, whom he had canonized. His sermons on the Feast of the Transfiguration, on orthodoxy, on the Koimesis, and on the Holy Cross have been preserved. He was the author of two canons or liturgical hymns and an Acoluthion for the Fathers of Chalcedon. However the Homiliary formerly attributed to Philotheus was actually a re-elaboration of the Patriarchal Homiliary, whose author was Patriarch John IX Agapetus (1111–34); and the 40 ascetical chapters under his name in the Philocalia were the work of Philotheus of the Thorn Bush Monastery on Mt. Athos (twelfth century). The same is true of 21 chapters on the Lord's Prayer.

While still abbot of the Grand Laura on Mt. Athos, Philotheus had written a Précis of Divine Liturgy and an Order of Service for the Diaconia. He attacked the validity of the anathemas passed against the canonical Hexabiblos of George Harmenopoulos (d. 1383), and he is said to have written scholia for that work. Of his exegetical writings, three homilies on wisdom (Prv 9.1) are known and two on the woman of the Gospel cured of a curvature of the spine (Lk 13.10). He wrote a homily on Psalm 37 and apparently an explanation of the Psalms, as well as a tract on circumcision, three letters on the beatitudes, an address to Empress Helene (wife of John V), and a sermon and consolatory epistle to Heraclea on the occasion of its sacking by the Genoese. Two anti-Roman polemical pieces ascribed to him are not authentic: the Kata Latinos belongs to Nilus Cabasilas; and the Diologue on Dogmatic Theology belongs to Philotheus of Selymbria. Many of Philotheus's works are still unedited; but his writings in favor of Palamitism and his patriarchal acts asserting the primacy of his see had a lasting effect on the development of the Orthodox churches.

Bibliography: V. LAURENT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 12.2:1498–1509; Revue des études byzantines 10 (1952): 113–123. R. JANIN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:478–479. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 723–727. Patrologia Graeca, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) 151:551–656, 693–1186; 152:1303–1460; 154:719–826. F. MIKLOSICH and J. MÜLLER, eds., Acta et diplomata graeca medii aevi, v. 1 (Vienna 1860) 325–350, 448–594. G. MERCATI, “Notizie di Procoro e Demetrio Cidone,” Studi e Testi 56 (1931) 243–246. P. JOANNOU, ed., “Germanus the Athonite” Analecta Bollandiana (1952) 35–115. O. HALECKI, Un Empereur de Byzance à Rome (Warsaw 1930) 152–154, 235–242. F. DÖLGER, Historisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft 72 (1953) 205–221. E. HONIGMANN, Byzantinische Zeitschrift 47 (1954) 104–115.

[F. CHIOVARO]

PHILOXENUS OF MABBUGH

Syrian bishop and influential Monophysite theologian; b. Tahal, Persia, c. 450; d. Philippopolis, Thrace, Dec. 10, 523. After studying in Edessa and rejecting the current Nestorianism of that school, Philoxenus was selected bishop of Mabbugh (Hierapolis in Syria) by Peter the Fuller, patriarch of Antioch, in 485. An ardent opponent of the doctrine of the Council of CHALCEDON, and a friend of the Emperor Anastasius I, he was humiliated at the Synod of Sidon (511); but in the following year he succeeded in having many of his orthodox enemies deposed from neighboring sees and had SEVERUS OF ANTIOCH installed as patriarch (512–518). Exiled to Philippopolis by the orthodox Emperor JUSTIN I in 519, he continued his polemical and ascetic writings despite the rigors of captivity.

A classical author in Syrian literature, Philoxenus is honored as a saint and doctor by the Jacobite (Monophysite) Church. Among his 80 major exegetical, dogmatic, homiletic, and ascetical writings, 13 orations on Christian life, 5 tracts on the Incarnation and the Trinity, and a collection of letters have been edited. Although vehement, his MONOPHYSITISM is more verbal than actual. He adhered to the pre-Chalcedonian, Cyrillian terminology and preached a dynamic Christology, which he opposed to a suppositious dualism of Chalcedon. Inspired by the Alexandrian theological school, his thinking was creative and original.

Bibliography: The Discourses of Philoxenus, ed. and tr. E. A. W. BUDGE, 2 v. (London 1894). E. LEMOINE, ed. and tr., Sources Chrétiennes v. 44 (1956). R. LAVENANT, ed. and tr., Patrologia orientalis 30.5 (1963) 725–894. I. ORTIZ DE URBINA, Patrologia syriaca (Rome 1958) 147–150, complete bibliog. E. STEIN, Histoire de Bas-Empire. tr. J. R. PALANQUE (Paris 1949–59) 2:157–159, 171–173, 232. A. DE HALLEUX, Philoxène de Mabboug, sa vie, ses écrits, sa théologie (Louvain 1963). E. TISSERANT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 12.2:1509–32.

[G. T. DENNIS]

PHOENICIANS

A Northwest Semitic people who inhabited Palestine and Western Syria. The name is commonly used to designate the Canaanites after 1200 B.C. For a history of the Phoenicians see CANAAN AND CANAANITES. The term Phoenician is clearly derived from Greek φοῖνιξ, which means purple (or crimson) as well as Phoenician. Though the etymology of the Greek word is uncertain, two possibilities can be considered: (1) if the primary meaning of φοῖνιξ (and its derivatives) is purple, then the land received the name Phoenicia because of its purple dye industry; but (2) if the primary meaning of φοῖνιξ is Phoenician, then the Greek word is used later in the sense of purple because the discovery and earliest use of a dye of this color was ascribed to the Phoenicians.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1846–49. H. HAAG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:481–482. For additional bibliography see CANAAN AND CANAANITES.

[A. A. DI LELLA]

PHOENIX

The unique bird of Eastern legend, brilliant and beautiful, that lived for 500 years (longer in some accounts), and after dying rose again from its own ashes. It appears in Old Sanskrit poetry, Egyptian religious texts, and in Greek and Roman writers from Hesiod onward. Herodotus is the chief source for details. Christians especially used the myth for paradise and resurrection themes.

The compiler of the PHYSIOLOGUS (original Greek c. A.D. 200) provided the phoenix story as ALLEGORY for Jn 10.18: “I have the power to lay down my life and take it up again,” for “the phoenix is the symbol of our Savior who came from heaven with both wings full of fragrant perfume, that is divine words.” With time, commentaries acquired length and variety, and its attractive symbolism passed into frequent use in patristic and medieval Latin and vernacular literature.

A Phoenician fertility goddess found at the Island of Moya, Sicily in 1971. (©David Lees/CORBIS)

Paintings, mosaics, sarcophagi, and pottery show the bird rising from its ashes. What had symbolized for Egyptians the sun’s daily return and for Romans imperial APOTHEOSES became for Christians a symbol of resurrection, Christ’s and their own.

Bibliography: G. TÜRK, W. H. ROSCHER, ed. Ausführliches Lexikon der griechischen und römischen Mythologie (Leipzig 1921) 3:3450–72. A. RUSCH, Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. 20.1 (1941) 414–423. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d’archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie. ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 14.1:682–692. M. C. FITZPATRICK, Lactanti de ave phoenix: With Introduction, Text, Translation and Commentary (Philadelphia 1933). M. F. MCDONALD, “Phoenix redivivus,” Phoenix 14 (Toronto 1960) 187–202, with emphasis on its place in Judeo-Christian tradition.

[M. F. MCDONALD]

PHOTIUS, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Patriarchate from Dec. 24, 858, to Sept. 25, 867, and from 878 to December 886; b. of a noble family in CONSTANTINOPLE, c. 810; d. in the monastery of Armeniakon, after 893.

Photius, Patriarch of Constantinople.

Early Career. His father, Sergius, and his mother, Irene, were exiled by the emperor THEOPHILUS because of their opposition to his iconoclastic policy. In the Byzantine SYNAXARY the confessor Sergius and his wife, Irene, are commemorated on May 13 (Acta sanctorum, Propylaeum Novembris, ed. H. Delehay [Brussels 1902] 682). Photius revealed in one of his letters that the whole family and his uncle, the former patriarch TARASIVS, were anathematized by one of the iconoclastic synods (Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 161 v. [Paris 1857–66] 102:877). In letters to his brother Tarasius and to the Oriental patriarchs, Photius also praised the piety of his parents and their sufferings for the true faith (Patrologia Graeca, 102:972, 1020). Although the property of his parents is said to have been confiscated, Photius and his brothers Sergius and Tarasius, who were left in Constantinople, were able to obtain a good education. In a letter addressed to the Oriental patriarchs, Photius confessed that he was attracted in his youth by the monastic life but that he chose a secular career. Because of his learning, Theoctistus, the prime minister of the empress THEODORA, appointed Photius professor of philosophy at the University of Constantinople, which he had reorganized. Photius's brother Sergius married Irene, the sister of the empress, and Photius became director of the imperial chancery and a member of the senate.

Despite his new functions Photius continued with his disciples to study philosophical and theological literature. Around the middle of the century, he led an embassy to the Khalif Muttawakkil and was absent from Constantinople when Bardas, the brother of Theodora, in connivance with the young emperor MICHAEL III, terminated the regency of his sister after plotting the murder of prime minister Theoctistus and made himself regent. Bardas found support among liberals and intellectuals, but conservative circles favored Theodora, who had restored the cult of images in 843. The patriarch IGNATIUS, who had been appointed by Theodora, lost the favor of the new government because he sided with the conservatives and gave credit to slanderous stories about Bardas's private life, circulated by his opponents. When an attempt at the restoration of Theodora had failed, the empress and her daughters were obliged to take monastic vows. Ignatius refused to bless their monastic garb. He resigned his office on the advice of bishops who were anxious to prevent a conflict between the Church and the government and asked his adherents to select a new patriarch. In a local synod the bishops of both parties recommended to the emperor the layman Photius, avoiding the election of bishops from the rival parties. Photius was recognized as legitimate patriarch by all the bishops, even the five most faithful supporters of Ignatius, after he had given them certain guarantees concerning the position of Ignatius after his abdication. Because the new patriarch had to function during the feast of the Lord's Nativity, which was approaching, Photius obtained all the degrees of Holy Orders in a week. He was consecrated by Gregory Asbestos, leader of the liberals, and by two Ignatian bishops. This was a sort of compromise arranged at the synod. Gregory had been suspended by Ignatius and had appealed from Ignatius's judgment to Rome. As yet Rome had not decided about the justification of Ignatius's measure, and Gregory was rehabilitated by the synod.

First Patriarchate. About two months after Photius's ordination, the extreme followers of Ignatius, assembled in the church of St. Irene, refused obedience to the new patriarch and demanded the reestablishment of Ignatius. The reason for this action may have lain in differing interpretations of the nature of the guarantees given by Photius to the five leaders of the Ignatian party. Photius convoked a synod in the church of the Holy Apostles (859). The opposing party prevented their condemnation by provoking a riot (Zonaras, Patrologia Graeca, 137:1004–), which had a political background and which was suppressed with bloodshed by the imperial police. Photius protested against the cruelty of the police and threatened Bardas with his abdication. After peace had been established, the synod was reconvened in the church of the Blachernae palace. In order to deprive the opposition of any claim concerning the legitimacy of Ignatius's patriarchate, the synod declared, on the request of Bardas, that the whole patriarchate of Ignatius was illegitimate because he had not been elected by a synod, but had been simply appointed by Theodora. During the riots Ignatius and some of his followers were imprisoned. Ignatius was interned in various places, finally in a monastery on the island of Terebinthus. Bardas must, however, have convinced himself that Ignatius was not responsible for the riots, because he allowed him to stay (860) in the palace of Posis in Constantinople, which had been built by Ignatius's mother.

Because of these troubles, only in 860 was Photius able to send a letter to Pope NICHOLAS I regarding his enthronement. In this communication he announced that he had accepted his election unwillingly after Ignatius had abdicated. The emperor Michael III and Photius also asked the pope to send legates to a new council in Constantinople, which would once more condemn ICONOCLASM and confirm the decision made by Theodora in 843 concerning the reestablishment of the cult of images. In his answer to Photius, Nicholas objected to the elevation of a layman to the patriarchate and sent Bishop Radoald of Porto and Zacharias of Anagni to the council with orders to reexamine the religious situation in Constantinople, while reserving to himself the definite decision concerning the legitimacy of Photius's elevation. According to the Byzantine practice, the case of Ignatius had been definitively settled by a local synod. The government and Photius were, however, willing to let the legates reexamine the whole affair on condition that they would pronounce their verdict in the name of the pope during the council. The legates accepted this compromise, seeing in it the confirmation by the Byzantines of the supreme jurisdiction of the pope over the Church. After the interrogation of Ignatius in the synod of 861, the legates confirmed the decision of the local synod of 859, suspending Ignatius and declaring his patriarchate illegitimate. The acts of this synod are partly preserved in the collection of canon law by Cardinal Deusdedit. The declarations of the bishops and legates that the BYZANTINE CHURCH, when allowing the legates to reexamine the affair, had accepted the canons of SARDICA (343), showed their recognition of the right of the bishops to appeal to the pope as the supreme judge in the Church. Ignatius, although protesting against the initiative of the legates, seems to have accepted the verdict of the synod when he declared: Romam non appellavi nec appello. Nicholas, not satisfied with the course of events, asked for more documentary evidence to justify the decision of the synod. Photius, regarding the case of Ignatius as closed, remained silent.

In the meantime, several extremely partisan monks led by Abbot Theognostus succeeded in reaching Rome and giving the pope their own biased account of events in Constantinople. Theognostus even presented the pope with an appeal in Ignatius's name although he was not authorized by Ignatius to do so. The pope, resenting Photius's negative attitude to his request, gave credit to the account of Theognostus, who exaggerated the importance of the opposition to Photius. Disapproving the attitude of his legates at the synod of 861, Nicholas condemned and excommunicated Photius at a Roman synod of 863 and recognized Ignatius as the legitimate patriarch, announcing his decision to Photius and the emperor. The Byzantines disregarded this decision, and in 865 Michael III protested bitterly against this intervention of the pope in Byzantine ecclesiastical affairs in a letter that provoked a sharp reaction from the pope.

The situation took a turn for the worse because of a new conflict between Rome and Byzantium over BULGARIA. The Bulgarian ruler BORIS I (Michael) became discontented because Photius would send only missionaries to his country and refused to give him a patriarch or an archbishop. He therefore turned to the Franks and to Rome. Nicholas sent Boris a long pastoral letter and two bishops, Formosus and Paul. The latter succeeded in winning over Boris to the cause of the pope and of Western Christianity. The Latin missionaries, in rivalry with the Greeks, criticized certain customs of the Byzantine Church and seem to have introduced the FILIOQUE into the creed. The emperor Michael invited all the Eastern patriarchs to a synod (867) to deal with this encroachment of Rome into the Byzantine sphere of interest and to condemn the innovations introduced by the Latins into Bulgaria, especially the filioque. Nicholas was condemned, and the German emperor Louis II was asked to depose him. Alarmed by the hostile reaction that the conflict of interests in Bulgaria had provoked in Byzantium, the pope requested several Western theologians to refute the Byzantine critics of Latin customs. This was the atmosphere in which the first Latin polemical treatises against the Greeks (by Aeneas of Paris, RATRAMNUS OF CORBIE) were written. Nicholas died before learning about the fateful decisions of the Eastern synod of 867, and the situation was changed by a political revolution in Byzantium.

Deposition and Second Patriarchate. The emperor Basil I, whom Michael III had promoted to be coemperor, murdered first Bardas, the emperor's uncle and regent, and in September 867, also his benefactor Michael III. On becoming emperor, being anxious to win the support of the zealots, of conservative circles, and of Rome, he deposed Photius, reinstated Ignatius, and asked Pope ADRIAN II to send legates to Constantinople for a new council that should pacify the Byzantine Church. Adrian II condemned Photius and his synods (869) and sent the bishops Donatus and Stephen and the deacon Marinus to the council in Constantinople. The legates were instructed to demand from the fathers the acceptance of the decision of the Roman synod. This angered Basil I, who wanted a new examination of the controversy by the synod, reserving the final decision to himself. Only 110 bishops attended the council (869–70), called the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE IV (eighth ecumenical) by the Latins. Photius and his followers were suspended and excommunicated, but the great majority of the hierarchy and the clergy remained faithful to Photius. This circumstance hampered Ignatius in the administration of the patriarchate. He soon became involved in a sharp conflict with Pope JOHN VIII because he accepted the decision of the Eastern patriarchs made at the end of the council. At the request of Boris I, Bulgaria became a part of the patriarchate of Constantinople. Ignatius established a Greek hierarchy in Bulgaria and gave the new Church a certain degree of autonomy.

In the meantime Basil I revoked Photius's exile and entrusted him with the education of his sons. Ignatius was reconciled with Photius and asked Rome to send legates to a new council of union. Unfortunately, before the papal legates, Bishops Paul of Ancona and Eugenius of Ostia, had reached Constantinople, Ignatius was dead and Photius had been reinstated as patriarch. John VIII sent Cardinal Peter to Constantinople with instructions to recognize Photius as the legitimate patriarch after the latter expressed to the legates and the fathers his regret for his former behavior. Photius could not accept this condition because he had been elected by a synod after Ignatius had abdicated and could not be held responsible for the troubles provoked by the zealots. The synod was to put an end to the strife between the two parties and give satisfaction to Photius and his followers for their unjust treatment. For this reason the letters sent by the pope to Photius and to the council were changed, with the consent of the legates, who had become convinced that Rome had been wrongly informed about the true situation in Constantinople. All passages that did not correspond to the spirit of the union council were left out in the Greek version read to the fathers of the council (879–80). It should be stressed, however, that the main scriptural arguments by which the pope confirmed his own primacy in the Church were left in the Greek version, a circumstance that shows that Photius, although defending the autonomy of his Church, did not deny the PRIMACY OF THE POPE. The anti-Photian council of 869–70 was suppressed. Because of the canceling of this council by the union synod, the genuine Greek acts of this council are not preserved. We have only their Latin translation made by ANASTASIUS THE LIBRARIAN and an extract in Greek, preserved in the anti-Photianist collection. Consequently, the ORTHODOX CHURCH accepts only the first seven councils as ecumenical, calling the Photian synod of 879–80 a union synod.

John VIII protested against the changes made in his letters by the Greeks, but he accepted the decisions of the union synod and recognized the rehabilitation of Photius. This explains the fact that in the West before the end of the 11th century the council of 869–70 was not counted among the ecumenical councils (see COUNCILS, GENERAL). It was given an ecumenical character by the canonists of the GREGORIAN REFORM who, during the INVESTITURE STRUGGLE, exploited for their cause canon 22 of this council, forbidding laymen to appoint bishops. The union synod was forgotten, and only Cardinal Deusdedit and IVO OF CHARTRES made some quotations from its acts. So it happened that the Photian legend grew in the West, picturing the patriarch as the father of schism and the archenemy of papal primacy (see EASTERN SCHISM).

During his second patriarchate Photius endeavored to bring about a reconciliation with all his former enemies, especially with Marinus and Stylianus. He made concessions to Rome in Bulgaria, but Boris I refused to return to the Roman jurisdiction. According to a version of the Synodicon Vetus (MS Sinaiticus 482 [1117], fols. 357–365), Photius himself canonized Ignatius, whose feast (Oct. 23) is marked in the Typikon, which was revised under the second patriarchate of Photius. The emperor LEO VI induced Photius to abdicate, probably because of his hostility to Theodore Santabarenius, promoted by Photius to be metropolitan of Euchaita, and appointed his brother Stephen as patriarch. The belief that the successors of John VIII—Marinus I, Stephen V, and Formosus—had broken with Photius is a legendary invention. Photius died in communion with Rome. His feast (Feb. 6) is noted in several Synaxaria from the end of the 10th and 11th centuries and is celebrated by all Orthodox Churches.

Churchman and Humanist. Photius was one of the leading figures in the Byzantine intellectual renaissance of the 9th century, and his learning commanded the respect of his bitterest enemies. His scholarly reputation is established through his Μυριόβιβλον (Bibliotheca), giving criticisms of and extracts from 280 works that Photius had studied, many of which are not preserved today. The other of his main works, the Ἀμφιλόγια, contains answers to more than 300 questions of a theological and profane nature. His writing against the filioque (Mystagogia Spiritus Sancti) was exploited by anti-Latin polemicists from the 12th century on. His 200 extant letters and his Homilies are written in an elegant style. In his Διήρησις he attacked the doctrine of the PAULICIANS. He reorganized the patriarchal academy for the education of the clergy and brought philosophical and theological speculation back to the foundation established by Aristotle. He manifested interest in philology by composing a Lexicon and an Etymologicum. The writing against the Roman primacy (M. Gordillo, "Photius et primatus Romanus," Orientalia Christiana periodica 6 [1940] 6–39) cannot be ascribed to Photius because the legendary tradition that St. ANDREW the Apostle was the founder of the Byzantine bishopric, which this writing contains, had not yet been developed in the 9th century (F. Dvornik, The Idea of Apostolicity in Byzantium and the Legend of the Apostle Andrew [Cambridge 1958]). He initiated the revision of the Typicon of HAGIA SOPHIA and of a Nomocanon. Photius sent his disciple Constantine-CYRIL and his brother Methodius to the Khazars for religious discussion and with the emperor entrusted to them the mission to Moravia (see SLAVS). He also attempted to reunite the Armenian with the Orthodox Church (see ARMENIA).

Bibliography: Editions. Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) 101–104. Φωτίου . . . λόγοι καὶ ὁμιλία, ed. S. ARISTARCHOS, 2 v. (Constantinople 1900). V. LAOURDAS, ed., Homiliai (Thessalonike 1959). C. MANGO, tr., The Homilies of Photius (Cambridge, Mass. 1958). Letters. V. LAOURDAS and L. WESTERINK, eds., Epistulae et Amphilochia, 6 v. (Leipzig 1983–88). A. PAPADOPOULOS-KERAMEUS, Φωτιακά (St. Petersburg 1897); in Pravoslavniĭ Palestinskij Sbornik 11 (St. Petersburg 1891) 179–213, letter to the Catholicos Zacharias. R. HENRY, ed. and tr. (French), Bibliotheca, 9 v. (Paris 1959–91). C. THEODORIDIS, ed., Lexicon (Berlin, New York 1983). On the Mystagogy of the Holy Spirit, tr. HOLY TRANSFIGURATION MONASTERY (New York 1983). Sources. Etymologicon magnum, ed. T. GAISFORD (Oxford 1848). The anti-Photianist collection in J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 31 v. (Florence, Venice 1757–98) 16:209–534. Synods, ibid. 536–549; 17:371–530; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 271 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 129:9–262. DEUSEDIT, Collectio canonum, ed. V. WOLF VON GLANVELL (Paderborn 1905). IVO OF CHARTRES, Decretum, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 271 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 161:59–1022. G. HOFMANN, ed., Photius et ecclesial Romana, 2 v. (Rome 1932). J. DUFFY and J. PARKER, eds., The Synodicon Vetus (Washington, D.C. 1979). Literature. J. HERGENRÖTHER, Photius, Patriarch von Konstantinopel, 4 v. in 3 (Regensburg 1867–69). É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 12.2:1536–604. K. ZIEGLER, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. 20.1 (Stuttgart 1941) 667–737. A. P. KAZHDAN, Oxford Dictionary of Byzantium (1991) 1669–70. F. DVORNIK, The Photian Schism (Cambridge, Eng. 1948); The Patriarch Photius in the Light of Recent Research (Munich 1958); "Patriarch Photius, Scholar and Statesman," Classical Folia 13 (1959) 3–18; 14 (1960) 3–22. V. GRUMEL, "Y eut-il un second schisme de Photius?" Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques 22 (1933) 432–457; Échos d'Orient 29 (1930) 257–264, 33 (1934) 257–288, 34 (1935) 129–138, 35 (1936) 5–42, 37 (1938) 357–372, 39 (1940–42) 138–156; "Photius et l'addition du Filioque au symbole du Nicée-Constantinople," Revue des études byzantines 5 (1947) 218–234; Les Regestes des actes du patriarcat de Constantinople (2d ed. Paris 1971–91) v. 2. P. STÉPHANOU, "Les Débuts de la querelle photienne vus de Rome et de Byzance," Orientalia Christiana periodica 18 (1952) 270–280; "La Violation du compromis entre Photius et les ignatiens," ibid. 21 (1955) 291–307. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 520–528. R. J. H. JENKINS, "A Note on Nicetas David Paphlago and the Vita Ignatii," Dumbarton Oaks Papers 19 (1965) 241–247. H. AHRWEILER, "Sur la carrière de Photius avant son patriarcat," Byzantinische Zeitschrift 58 (1965) 348–361. R. S. HAUGH, Photius and the Carolingians: The Trinitarian Controversy (Belmont, Mass. 1975). P. LEMERLE, "Photius and Classicism," in Byzantine Humanism: The First Phase, tr. H. LINDSAY and A. MOFFATT (Canberra, Australia 1986) 205–235. C. MANGO, "The Liquidation of Iconoclasm and the Patriarch Photios," in Iconoclasm, ed. A. BRYER and J. HERRIN (Birmingham, Eng. 1977). J. A. MEIJER, A Successful Council of Union: A Theological Analysis of the Photian Synod of 879–880 (Thessalonike 1975). G. MENESTRINA, ed., Forzio: tra crisi ecclesiale e magistero letterario (Brescia 2000). L. SIMEONOVA, Diplomacy of the Letter and the Cross: Photios, Bulgaria and the Papacy, 860s–880s (Amsterdam 1998). D. STRATOU-DAKI WHITE, Patriarch Photios of Constantinople: His Life, Scholarly Contributions, and Correspondence Together with a Translation of Fifty-Two of His Letters (Brookline, Mass. 1981). W. TREADGOLD, The Nature of the Bibliotheca of Photios (Washington, D.C. 1980).

[F. DVORNIK]

PHYLACTERIES

Phylacteries are small boxes containing certain verses of Scripture worn by Jews at prayer. The term is derived from the Greek word φυλακτήριον (safeguard, amulet). The Jewish name for them is tefillin (Heb. ṭepillîn, which probably represents an Aramaic word meaning "attachments" but which was popularly connected with the Hebrew word ṭepillâ, "prayer"). A minor pseudo-Talmudic tractate also is called Tefillin; it discusses the laws regarding the preparation and wearing of phylacteries. Most of the material in this tractate has been taken from the TALMUD proper.

According to the prescriptions of the Talmud, phylacteries are two small leather boxes with leather straps attached; in each box is a piece of parchment on which are written four passages from the Scriptures: Ex 13.1–10 (the law, on the use of unleavened bread at the Passover in memory of the Exodus from Egypt); Ex 13.11–16 (the law on the first born in memory of the sparing of Israel's first born at the Exodus); Dt 6.4–9 (the Shema Yisrael or the Great Commandment of the love of God); Dt 11.13–21 (the promise of a bounteous harvest as a reward for keeping the Law). Jewish men, when they say their morning prayers on weekdays (but not on Sabbaths or feasts), are to tie (literally “lay”) one of the phylacteries on the forehead and one on the left arm. The custom of thus wearing phylacteries is still observed by Orthodox Jews, but not by Reform Jews.

A Hasidic boy wears phylacteries for his morning prayers.
(©Richard T. Nowitz/CORBIS)

The institution of the phylacteries is based on a literal interpretation of the injunctions in Ex 13.9 (“It shall be as a sign on your hand and as a reminder on your forehead”) and Dt 6.8, 11.18 (“Bind them at your wrist as a sign and let them be as a pendant on your forehead”); hence the choice of the four passages for the phylacteries. Originally, however, these injunctions were no doubt intended to be understood in a figurative sense, like the modern expression, “Tie a string on your finger that you don’t forget”; the Israelites were never to forget Yahweh’s laws or His mighty deeds in rescuing them from bondage in Egypt. There is no evidence for the custom of wearing phylacteries before the last few pre-Christian centuries. But several phylacteries have been found at Qumran and further south in the Desert of Judah, e.g., at Murabba’āt, that come from about the time of Christ. The words of Jesus in Mt 23.5 show that the wearing of phylacteries was a common custom at His time; He did not condemn the custom as such, but only the hypocritical display of “wide phylacteries.” Among ignorant people phylacteries might have been regarded primarily as amulets; hence their name in Greek. It is possible that the wearing of phylacteries had certain affinities with the apotropaic practices of the ancient Near East; E. A. Speiser seeks to establish this connection by means of the words used to describe phylacteries in Dt 6.8, 11.18: ’ōt (sign) and ṭōṭāpōt (pendants).

See Also: MEZUZAH.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek, 1853–54. J. H. GREENSTONE et al., The Jewish Encyclopedia, ed. J. SINGER, 13 v. (New York 1901–06) 10:21–28. M. JOSEPH, Universal Jewish Encyclopedia, 10 v. (New York 1939–44) 8:522–523. J. SCHMID, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:554. E. A. SPEISER, “TWTPT,” Jewish Quarterly Review 48 (1957–58) 208–217. K. G. KUHN, Phylakterien aus Höhle 4 von Qumran (Heidelberg 1957).

[S. M. POLAN]

PHYSICAL LAWS, PHILOSOPHICAL ASPECTS

In considering physical laws, this article presents a historical survey of humanity’s understanding of the nature and existence of these laws and a critique of various philosophical positions concerning them.

The conception that nature is regulated by physical laws in its properties and activities has received explicit formulation only in modern science, but it is rooted in notions that have been gradually formed through human experience. The animistic view of nature held by primitive peoples, through reflection and observation, have given place to a rational and philosophical concept of physical reality, and of natural events, as a regular concatenation of causes and effects. This rationalization of the concept of nature has been furthered by astronomical observations of the movements of the stars and by the development of technical arts—involving the construction of instruments and machines—that embody basic applications of mathematics. In these advances one can already detect a foreshadowing of physical laws in the modern sense.

Historical Survey. The mathematical conception of nature came into philosophy with PYTHAGORAS and the Pythagoreans, and with PLATO, who taught that God acts as the geometrician in the world. For ARISTOTLE, the existence of physical laws has a more solid basis in his conception of NATURE as the active principle of MOTION and rest in bodies. Moreover, Aristotle distinguishes events in the heavens from those on earth, the former being regulated by absolutely necessary laws admitting of no exception, the latter—while subject to determinate laws of nature and not merely to CHANCE—admitting of exception and thereby leaving room for chance events (Phys. 192b 20–23, 195b 31–198a 13).

After Aristotle, philosophy—and scholastic philosophy in particular—preserved and developed the Aristotelian concept of nature, while corroborating its philosophical analysis with the conception of the world proposed in the Bible. Sacred Scripture describes the universe as a work of the wisdom and omnipotence of God the Creator, by whom all things are disposed “by measure and number and weight” (Wis 11.20). According to St. THOMAS AQUINAS, “since all things subject to divine province are ruled and measured . . . it is evident that all things partake the eternal law in some way, namely, inasmuch as, from its being impressed upon them, they have inclinations to their own acts and ends. . . . And this participation of the eternal law in the rational creature is called the natural law. . . . In the irrational creature, however, [the eternal law] is not shared in a rational way; so it cannot be called a law except by way of similitude” (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 91.2 and ad 3). All creatures, then, have from their Creator those determined natural inclinations to their own respective ends “which we say are natural laws” (In Dion de div. nom., 10.1).

Thus, already in ancient and medieval thought, the lawfulness of physical nature is clearly stated, and the founders of modern science, especially GALILEO and Isaac Newton, were clearly conscious of the continuity of their thought with the foregoing philosophical tradition.

Ontological Value of Laws. Not only in Aristotelian and scholastic philosophy, therefore, but also for the founders of modern science, physical law has an ontological value. The regular and constant relation in the succession of physical phenomena, expressed by a mathematical function relating experimental variables in a determinate way, is, in its turn, and expression of an ontological necessity based upon the very nature of physical agents, which results from the directive will and divine wisdom of the Creator. Moreover, this conception, even when purified of its metaphysical and theological connotations, remained dominant in modern physical science until the 19th century. The classical POSITIVISM of A. Comte expressly acknowledged the realism of physical laws, which were deemed by him to be dogmatically universal facts, no less positively verifiable than singular facts [Cours de philosophie positive (Paris 1930) Lesson 1]. A similar realistic conception is defended by contemporary dialectical materialism, which, according to the teaching of K. MARX and F. ENGELS, holds that scientific knowledge is assimilated as a passive representation and faithful mirror of reality (see MATERIALISM, DIALECTICAL AND HISTORICAL).

Empiricism and Criticism. To this objective and rationalistic conception of physical laws is opposed EMPIRICISM, notably in the extreme form proposed by D. HUME. According to Hume, the necessity of phenomena expressed in physical law is something purely subjective, a mere psychological expectancy resulting from series of constant connections observed in the past (Treatise of Human Nature, 1.3.6). Wishing to save the necessity of physical laws thus compromised by Hume’s skeptical empiricism, I. KANT had recourse to synthetic a priori judgments. For him, law is the application of a mental category to PHENOMENA, already ordered in representation through the subjective forms of space and time. In Kant’s view, law is valid for the phenomenal world but cannot be acknowledged as valid for reality itself (Critique of Pure Reason, Analysis of Principles).

The motives prompting the criticisms by Hume and Kant coalesce, near the end of the 19th century, in the empiriocriticism of E. Mach. This resolves the world of perception into pure sensations and, therefore, the natural sciences into a mere analysis of sensation. For Mach, physical laws are not necessarily operative in reality, since this presupposes the unverifiable postulate of regularity in nature. They are merely a restriction that the subject imposes upon himself in anticipating future sensations, for the sake of economy and as a means of functional adaptation in the struggle for life (Analyse der Empfindungen, Jena 1900).

Conventionalism. Very close to this conception is the conventionalism of J. H. Poincaré, for whom general principles—both of mathematics and of physics—are free conventions or masked definitions, adopted as criteria of scientific convenience, i.e., for their simplicity and logical coherence (La Science et l’hypothèse, Paris 1902). Poincaré’s conventionalism was inspired not so much by philosophical preconceptions as by the evolution of mathematics and physics during the 19th century, which had shown that many laws and principles, held to be necessary and eternal by classical science and by positivism, had to be revised and replaced by other principles and laws that were more in accord with experimental facts. From this it was easy to conclude that principles and physical laws are not absolutely imposed by experience and do not express objective relations or the causes of phenomena, but are posited by the scientist as apt conventions and as approximate and provisional expressions. Hence physical laws become mere algebraic relations connecting the numbers that result from experimental measurement; such relations can be approximated in an infinite number of ways by mathematical functions, from which the simplest relations are selected only for the sake of convenience and economy.

Neopositivism. The neopositivism of the Wiener Kreis, of Rudolf CARNAP and Otto Neurath, took up the teaching of Hume and Mach, eliminating its psychological elements and reducing empiricism to mere nominalism. For LOGICAL POSITIVISM the only meaningful propositions are "protocol statements," which state an experimentally verifiable fact; physical laws, when enunciated as universals, cannot be verified. Rather, in their abstractness, they are not even complete propositions, but only propositional functions containing indeterminate variables in which determinate and concrete values can be substituted. Thus, for logical positivists, universal law is transformed into a protocol statement [J. Joergensen, The Development of Logical Empiricism (Chicago 1951) 30].

Critical Realism. The subjectivistic conception of physical laws is widely diffused in contemporary thought, being accepted even by neoscholastic philosophers such as J. MARITAIN and F. Renoirte, who deem it a legitimate purification of sciences from philosophical and metaphysical elements. Yet many scientists and philosophers defend the ontological value of physical laws by a kind of critical realism that steers a middle road between opposing extremes. Among these, the first to be cited are the founders of contemporary physics, namely, Max Planck and Albert EINSTEIN. Critical realism accords to empiricist and subjectivistic views the merit of having combated the exaggerated realism of a Platonic or mechanistic type that was dominant in classical physics. Thus it recognizes the essential activity of the mind in formulating scientific laws, which necessarily contain subjective, approximate, and provisory elements. At the same time, however, it admits the capacity of human thought to know material reality in itself and to penetrate into its essence through observed phenomena and by scientific reasoning.

Uniformity. The ontological value of physical laws can be justified by a critical theory of KNOWLEDGE in general, and then reinforced by a consideration of the practical value of science itself. If, in fact, physical laws lack all ontological value, the ability to predict phenomena from physical laws and the practical value of science in technical applications would be only casual and fortuitous coincidences, as even Poincaré noted in opposing the extremist interpretation given by E. Le Roy to his teaching [H. Poincaré, La Valeur de la science (Paris 1905) 220]. One must therefore admit that the constant and uniform regularity observed in experience, and stated in physical laws, has an ontological basis in the nature of physical agents. This nature is independent of human knowledge and is antecedent to action itself. Physical law thus objectively, in actu primo, as a causal antecedent of the activity regulated by it, even before being discovered and formulated by scientists, even before man appeared on the earth. The principles of UNIFORMITY in nature or of ontological determinism in physical agents offer, then, the ontological basis and rational explanation of physical laws.

Determinism. The ontological determinism of physical agents, or the principle of determinate causality, is a necessary presupposition for the formulation of physical laws and is also the ontological basis for scientific INDUCTION. As such, it cannot result from this type of induction, but must be seen as an application of the self-evident principle of SUFFICIENT REASON, according to which everything existing or happening has a reason for existing or happening. If the physical agent, deprived of knowledge and choice, were not determined by its nature to one action rather than another, it would be indifferent to any action whatever and would therefore not act (St. Thomas, C. gent. 3.2). Even as regards physical determinism, however, contemporary physics has moderated the rigidity claimed by classical physics. This determinism is no longer absolute, but relative. Thus, from a metaphysical point of view, one can reject the illicit extrapolation of determinism from the physical world to the human will and, even more so, to the divine will. From a physical point of view, the discovery of statistical laws and of quantum indeterminism has shown the value of a conception of nature like that of Aristotle. While seeing determinism and necessity as arising from FORM, this recognizes the existence of indetermination and potentiality arising from MATTER and admits the existence of chance events as exceptions to natural law.

See Also: LAW; NATURAL LAW; INDETERMINISM; MECHANISM.

Bibliography: F. SELVAGGI, Filosofia delle scienze (Rome 1953). F. RENOIRTE, Cosmology: Elements of a Critique of the Sciences and of Cosmology, tr J. F. COFFEY (New York 1950). M. BUNGE, Metascientific Queries (Springfield, Ill. 1959). E. SIMARD, La Nature et la portée de la méthode scientifique (Quebec 1956). A. G. M. VAN MELSEN, Science and Technology (Pittsburgh 1961). R. B. LINDSAY and H. MARGENAU, Foundations of Physics (New York 1936). J. DE VRIES, "Das Problem der Naturgesetzlichkeit bei Thomas von Aquin," Scholastik 10-24 (1949) 503-517.

[F. SELVAGGI]

PHYSIOLOGUS

Physiologus, composed in or near Egypt in the 2d century A.D., was the most widely known animal book during the Middle Ages. The author had before him unidentified descriptions of creatures known to classical literature (the phoenix, the sirens, the fox) and others deriving from accounts from India, Africa, and Asia Minor. To the short descriptions of physical traits of animals and mystic stones, he added Christian moralizations, illustrated by quotations from the Bible. The elements are fused with true artistry, and each chapter is something of a creative masterpiece.

In his critical edition of 1936, which replaces all earlier ones, F. Sbordone divided the Greek MSS into four versions. His fontes actually are parallels in the writings of the early Fathers and in a few cases borrowings, the sources proper being unknown. He adds the version of MSS AEIII, from which are derived the Armenian and all Latin translations. The fixed contents of this version are best presented alphabetically according to the 37 chapters of the Latin versio B correlated with the 49 of versio Y (names common to both are preceded by †, and those peculiar to Y are set in italics): †arbor peredixion; arbor psycomora (as “Amos” in B); †aquila; aspischeleon (cetus); asida, i.e., struthiocamelon; †autolops; caladrius (charadrius); caprea (dorchon); †castor; †cervus; †columbae; †elephas; †formica; fulica (herodius); †herinacius; †hyaena; hydrus (niluus); hyrundo; †ibis; ichneumon, as echinemon; lacerta (saura eliace); lapis achatis; lapis adamas (lapis adamantinus in two separate chapters); lapis magnis; lapis margarita [l. sosteros (i.e., “ostrea”) et margarita]; lapis senditicus, i.e., “indicus”; lapides igniferi (l. piroboli); †leo; mirmicoleon; †mustela et aspis (plus a vipera); †nycticorax; †onager et simia (twice in Y); †panthera; †pelicanus; †perdix; †phoenix; rana; salamandra (saura); serpens; †serra; †sirenae et onocentauri; †turtur (plus a cornicola); unicornis (monoceros); upupa (epops); †vulpis; vultur.

The importance of the influence of India is evident in the mystic stones, the elephant, the mandrake, and the whale. The presence of any creature other than those listed proves later interpolation. Shorter versions include versio L (in 27 chapters, extant in some 15 MSS) and De naturis duodecim animalium (extant in over 70 MSS; Patrologia Latina 171:1217–24).

Versio B was in circulation by 386, when St. Ambrose quoted from it (Hex. 6.13:3), and was expanded in several steps, using St. Isidore of Seville and Solinus, until its final form as De Bestiis et aliis rebus. The four old French translations, by Philippe de Thaon, Pierre le Picard, Guillaume le Normand, and Richard de Fournival, make few innovations, except that the last develops a concept of love.

Even in the French, the original doctrines remain essentially unchanged. In stereotyped form, typical of the 2d century, a fluid demonology of fallen gods is described; and Satan is usually merely a symbol of death, wicked but not ugly; the association with the monkey relates to a moral idea. The work is violently antifeminist, and eternal damnation often results from mere imprudence: good intentions are of no avail, and a superhuman vigilance is required to frustrate the legions of Evil and their leader Satan. Both main Latin versions, rich in quotations from pre-Vulgate Bibles, add important variants for the Afra and the Itala. They also contain bold Hellenisms in addition to the names, and rare morphological and syntactical forms. Christianity took many symbols from Physiologus, the most important being the phoenix and the pelican; many animals represented in medieval stone and glass have no symbolic value, however, or are related to sermons and the works of HONORIUS OF AUTUN rather than to Physiologus.

Studies of Physiologus began with Ponce de León's edition (1587) of the Greek version attributed to St. Epiphanius of Constantia (Patrologia Graeca 43:517–534), but there was little further interest in the work until the beginning of the 19th century, when fragments began to be collected and translations made from Semitic languages: Angelo Mai (Classici auctores, v. 7, Rome 1835), J. B. Pitra (Spicilegium solesmense, Paris 1855). The most useful single collection of Latin and French versions appears in C. Cahier's Mélanges d'archéologie, d'histoire et de littérature, 4 v. (Paris 1847–56). One major Greek version was edited by F. Lauchert, Geschichte des Physiologus (Strasbourg 1889).

Bibliography: Physiologus, Greek ed., F. SBORDONE (Milan 1936); Versio B, ed. F. CARMODY (Paris 1939); Versio E, M. R. JAMES, The Bestiary (London 1928); Versio L (in 27 chapters), G. HEIDER, Archiv für Kunde österreichischer Geschichts-Quellen 5 (1850); Versio T (in 12 chapters, attributed to Theobald), Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNÉ, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 171:1217–23; Eng. tr. A. W. RENDELL (London 1928); Versio Y, F. CARMODY (Publications in Classical Philology 12.7; Berkeley 1941). K. AHRENS, Zur Geschichte des sogenannten Physiologus (Plön 1885). E. DINKLER and V. SCHUBERT, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 5:364–365. B. E. PERRY, Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. (Stuttgart 1893) 20:1074–1129.

[F. CARMODY]

PIAGET, JEAN

Child psychologist; philosopher; b. Neuchâtel, Switzerland Aug. 9, 1896; d. Geneva, 1980. Widely known as a psychologist of children's thinking, Piaget was a prolific researcher and writer with over 100 books and innumerable articles to his name. Piaget's chief aim was to transform philosophical epistemology into an interdisplinary empirical science, involving notably psychology, biology, and the history of science. His typical methodology was to investigate the genesis of knowledge—in the individual, the species, society—hence the name “genetic epistemology.”

Piaget limited his research to the most general structures of knowledge, what used to be called the universals or a priori categories, or more simply, the logical-mathematical framework that is assumed to structure all biological actions and human thinking. Piaget resolutely held to three basic assumptions: knowledge is an action, the relation of a subject acting on an object; the object is constructed (in evolution or individual development); this construction at all levels implies logical structures. Note that “object” in this context does not mean an external (objective) fact or event, untouched by “subjective” interactions, but almost the opposite: for Piaget subject (through active assimilation) and object (through passive accommodation) form a biological whole and reciprocally imply each other. With respect to human knowledge in particular, Piaget rejected the traditional dichotomies of heredity vs. environment, nativism vs. behaviorism, and idealism vs. empiricism, in favor of a tertium quid, namely, a radical constructivism.

Cognitive Development. In support of his thesis Piaget meticulously observed children first constructing sensorimotor know-how, shown in perception and movements in nearby space and time, which leads around age two to the transition from the undifferentiated object of action to the differentiated object of knowledge. The immediate consequence of object knowledge is the psychological representation of the desired object in symbol formation. Pretend play and gestures, mental image, and societal language are the major symbol types. Object knowledge ushers in a new stage of development in the form of “pre-operations” which between the ages six to eleven reach a partial closure with “concrete operations,” such as classification, seriation, number, and the subsequent full closure of “formal operations,” as shown in ordinary hypothetical and propositional reasoning.

Operations are the common and most general logical structures accessible to human consciousness, characterized logically by reversibility and universality, and psychologically by the subjective conviction of logical (as opposed to empirical) necessity. Development is here conceived as an active structuring and restructuring of general logical coordinations at sequentially more comprehensive stages. This developmental growth has repercussions on specific psychological acts, such as learning (in the strict sense of learning a particular skill or content), perception, imagery, memory, as well as moral and social conduct.

Stages are strictly defined in terms of the quality of logical understanding. Children are said not merely to know less but to know, and therefore to live in, a different reality than adults. Moreover, even though all healthy adults, regardless of external circumstances, can be assumed implicitly to share formal operations, the theory requires that this logical power is individually appropriated and applied. Any uniformity among people or across content areas is thereby excluded. In this manner Piaget’s theory encompasses the tension between the freedom (and respect) for individual and cultural differences and the necessary constraints of logical implication and empirical confirmation. Only through the constructive interplay of these two conditions can knowledge attain a measure of—always relative—objectivity and certainty.

Knowledge and Freedom. For Piaget knowledge is not a “point-at-able” fact or merely information coded in the brain; it is alive and open-ended such that by its own motivation it cannot but lead to improvement and development. However, this growth is not an automatic internal program or a mere imitation from outside, but requires a serious personal commitment and contribution. Consequently in individual development genuinely new knowledge is constantly being constructed, just as throughout history social, artistic, and scientific achievements are the new products of human interactions.

In fact, the universal categories and their logical necessity are seen as the firm anchor against which true freedom of acting and thinking and moral autonomy can come to fruition. Human knowledge as relational translates into openness to other people’s thinking, which must be restructured in one’s own terms. In this sense operation is not something solitary and intrapsychic, but an interpersonal, social, and ultimately moral affair. For Piaget operation and cooperation, just as knowledge and development, are reciprocal notions: “logic is the morality of thought just as morality is the logic of actions.” Likewise, “the logic of development is the development of logic.”

Piaget’s theory can be appreciated as a reformulation of Kant’s epistemology in a Darwinian and social-historical perspective. In contrast to other similar attempts, Piaget accepted the nature of Kant’s a priori categories, but he rejected their temporal priority. Instead he offered an evolutionary description of their origin as an empirical answer to a heretofore purely philosophical question. “Equilibration” is Piaget’s key concept through which he analyzes the developmental progress from instinctual know-how to the beginnings of a logic of action and ultimately to the necessary coordination of conscious logical operations.

On account of its unusual philosophical flavor Piaget’s work is controversial and easily misunderstood.

Nevertheless, it has been widely applied wherever developmental considerations are relevant, including religious development and education. Three Piagetian notions seem particularly pertinent. First, his theory of symbol formation (Piaget 1946) is unique in being apparently the only scholarly attempt to go beyond the recognition of the specific power of symbols to an explanation of their psychological origin. Second, his study on children's moral judgment (Piaget 1932) stresses the important distinction between unilateral and reciprocal relations and how these affect the development of the moral person. Third, many facets of human life, particularly in interpersonal, artistic, and religious spheres, do not lend themselves to full operatory coordination. With Piaget (1926) the child's pre-operatory conception of the world can be appreciated as something valuable in its own right and permanently affecting the deeper layers of a person's psychology.

Bibliography: J. C. BRINGUIER, Conversations with Jean Piaget (Chicago 1980). H. G. FURTH, Knowledge as Desire: An Essay on Freud and Piaget (New York 1987). H. E. GRUBER & J. J. VONECHE, eds., The Essential Piaget (New York 1977). J. PIAGET, The Child's Conception of the World (Totowa, N.J. 1969); The Moral Development of the Child (New York 1965); Play, Dreams, Imitation in Childhood (original title Symbol Formation in the Child) (New York 1951); Insights and Illusions of Philosophy (New York 1971). J. PIAGET and B. INHELDER, The Psychology of the Child (New York 1969).

[H. G. FURTH]

PIAMARTA, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, BL.

Diocesan priest, founder of the Congregation of the Holy Family of Nazareth and the Humble Servants of the Lord; b. Nov. 26, 1841, Brescia, Italy; d. April 25, 1913, Remedello, Italy.

Born into a poor but pious family headed by a barber and a seamstress, Piamarta received his education in local schools until he entered the seminary in 1860. Following ordination (1865) his ministry, first in rural parishes (Cargazo Riviera and Bedizzole), then in Brescia, focused on working-class young people and their families.

With Msgr. Petro Capretti he founded (1886) the Istituto Artigianelli to provide working-class children with the moral foundation and professional skills needed in the newly industrialized society. He built housing and workshops for 100 boys, whom he served as a father and spiritual director.

With Fr. Bonsignori he established (1895) an agricultural research center on 140 hectares at Remedello to enhance the farming skills of peasants. Remedello gained an international reputation, and its structure was copied in many countries.

In 1902, he founded the Congregation of the Holy Family of Nazareth to perpetuate his work. A women's community, the Humble Servants of the Lord, was established, with the help of his mother and Elisa Baldo Foresti, to strengthen rural and urban families in the region through education. Piamarta gave precedence to the material and spiritual needs of others, while finding his own consolation in prayer.

He died peacefully surrounded by his brothers and Fr. Bonsignori. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Oct. 12, 1997 and is a patron of families and workers.

Feast: June 26.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 20 (1997): 999. L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 42 (1997): 1–2. Lettere di P. Giovanni Piamarta e dei suoi corrispondenti, ed. by A. FAPPANI (Brescia 1994). Giovanni Piamarta e il suo tempo: atti del colloquio di studio: Brescia, 12 settembre 1987 (Brescia 1987).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

PIARISTS

The Order of the Poor Clerics Regular of the Mother of God of the Pious Schools (Sch.P.), popularly known as the Piarists, was established in 1597 by a Spanish diocesan priest, St. JOSEPH CALASANTUS (Calsanz) (1556–1648) in Rome. The founder wished to provide free education for youth, both rich and poor. All Piarists profess four religious vows, including a special vow to educate youth, especially the poor. The order, which dates its official foundation from March 25, 1617, has grown despite the numerous political persecutions it endured. In 1808, Napoleon destroyed the flourishing German-Swiss province; in 1832, the large and fruitful provinces in Lithuania and Poland were liquidated by Russia in the wake of the Polish revolution of the previous year. The Spanish Civil War (1936–1939) caused great destruction to the schools and the four provinces in Spain; 260 priests were killed. In the 1950s, foundations in Czechoslovakia, Hungary and Romania were abolished by communist governments.

Piarists are found in 33 countries in Europe; North, South, and Central America; Asia; and Africa. Established in 1975, the American province has its headquarters in Washington, D.C. Members of the American province serve in Washington, D.C.; Devon, Pennsylvania; Fort Lauderdale, Florida; Miami, Florida; Lackawanna, New York; Passaic, New Jersey; and Martin, Kentucky. Piarists also work in New York-Puerto Rico vice province and California vice province.

Alumni of the Piarists' schools include Pope Pius IX, who graduated from the Piarist school in Volterra, Italy, and St. John Nepomucene Neumann, C.S.R., fourth bishop of Philadelphia and a graduate of the Piarist school in Straznice, Moravia. St. Anthony Maria Claret, founder of the Claretians, was also a student of the Piarists. Thaddeus Kosciusko, the American Revolutionary hero, Gregor Mendel, the father of modern genetics; the Spanish painter Francisco de Goya; Haydn; Mozart; Schubert: all had been educated by the Piarists. Prominent Piarists include Bishop Ladislaus Iranyi, the first bishop for Hungarians outside of Hungary, and Alfonso Mistrangelo, who became a cardinal in 1916 and was appointed archbishop of Florence. The Order has two saints among its members: St. Joseph Calasanz and Pompilius Maria Pirotti (canonized, 1934), and several beati including Glycerius Landrinai, Peter Casani, and 13 Spanish martyrs of Spain.

Bibliography: J. C. BAU, Biografía crítica de San José de Calasanz (Madrid 1949). C. S. DURANT, The Life of St. Joseph Calasanz (Los Angeles 1954).

[J. KERSHNER/D. POWERS]

PIBUSH, JOHN, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. Thirsk, North Riding, Yorkshire, England; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at St Thomas's Waterings, Camberwell, Southwark, Feb. 18, 1601. John, probably the son of Thomas Pibush of Great Fencott and Jane Danby of Scotton, studied at Rheims (1580–87) before his ordination on March 14, 1587. He was confined to prison for most of his 12 years in the English mission. After his arrest at Morton-in-Marsh, Gloucestershire (1593), he was sent to London, then committed to the Gatehouse at Westminster for a year. After his trial at the Gloucester Assizes under 27 Eliz., c. 2, for being a priest, he was returned to Gloucester jail. He escaped for a day, but was recaptured at Matson. From Gloucester he was sent to the Marshalsea, London, and again tried in Westminster under the same statute, July 1, 1595. Although he was condemned for high treason, he was kept in prison at the Marshalsea and the Queen's Bench prison for more than five years. In the end he was permitted a single day to prepare for his death. He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969) I, 123. T. F. KNOX, First and Second Diaries of English College, Douai (London 1878) 169, 179, 198, 212, 214, 222. J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1901) 333–6.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

PICARDS

A heretical group of semisecluded communities in Bohemia since the late 14th century. The name originated either as a Slavized version of Beghards (see BEGUINES AND BEGHARDS), or from those supporters of the movement who immigrated to Bohemia from Picardy, France, due to the Inquisition in the early 1400s. Whether the Picards were originally heretical or merely unique in their communal way of life is questioned. The religious life of 14th- and 15th-century Bohemia was intricate, and the Picards can be understood only against that background.

Shortly after 1300, the Czech branch of the DEVOTIO MODERNA began to flourish under the bishop of Prague, John of Dražice. The Devotio had ties with the Netherlands, whence the Beghards, including Gerard GROOTE, who had studied at the Charles University in Prague, had spread through Europe. It is possible that this relationship between Bohemia and the Netherlands influenced the origin of the Picards. Furthermore, JOHN MILÍČ, a leading preacher in Prague, had insisted, as early as mid-14th century, on the usefulness of the semisecluded communities in which a brotherly life was practiced by Christian laymen. Although Milíč's own similar community in Prague, "New Jerusalem," remained orthodox, most of those outside the capital—including the Picards—eventually became contaminated with heresy. The fact that John ŽIŽKA, the military leader of the TABORITES, put to death a community of Picards in 1421 does not in itself prove that the Picards were or were not HUSSITES of some variety, as Žižka treated in like fashion anyone unwilling to submit to his leadership. Actually, the Picards were never orthodox Hussites, being more in sympathy with such radical Hussites as the Taborites and Adamites.

The Picards advocated a pseudorationalistic biblical criticism. They emphasized individual piety, and their mysticism, borrowed from the Beghards, became a pantheistic hedonism. Not unlike the WALDENSES in their criticism of the Church, they denied the priesthood, confession, the liturgy, and especially the role of the Holy Spirit in the Church. They denied the presence of Christ in the Eucharist and broke with orthodox Hussites, who were willing to compromise on the doctrine of transubstantiation. The Picards were still to be found in Bohemia and Moravia in the 19th century.

Bibliography: F. M. BARTOŠ, Husitství a cizina (Prague 1931). F. G. HEYMANN, John Žižka and the Hussite Revolution (Princeton 1955). R. KALIVODA, Husitská ideologie (Prague 1961). F. SEIBT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:503–504.

[B. CHUDOBA]

PICCOLOMINI

A Siense noble family, of Roman origin according to tradition and legend. Documentary evidence of its residence in SIENA goes back to 1098, when a Martino Piccolomini is mentioned. The family early engaged in commerce. By the 13th century it had several banks in Italy, France, and England, and eventually invested its wealth in land. Traditionally Guelf, the Piccolomini family played a significant role in Siense political life. In 1458 they were granted the title of counts palatine by Emperor Frederick III. Besides PIUS II, his nephew, PIUS III, and Cardinal Jacopo AMMANATI DE' PICCOLOMINI, who had been adopted by Pius II, the family furnished many bishops of Siena and Pienza, and several cardinals. Other outstanding members of the family include the following.

Bl. Ambrogio, d. 1348, was one of the founders, and second superior, of the Olivetan BENEDICTINES.

Alessandro, humanist, theologian, and philosopher (b. Siena, June 13, 1508; d. Siena, March 12, 1578), was an author of sonnets and plays in his youth and later turned to philosophy and became professor of ethics in 1540. His works include translations of Ovid, Vergil, Aristotle's Poetics and Rhetoric, and several scientific and philosophical treatises. Made bishop of the nominal See of Patras in 1574, he was coadjutor of the archbishop of Siena during the last years of his life.

Francesco (b. Siena, 1582; d. Rome, 1651) was general of the JESUITS from 1649 until his death. Celio, d. 1681, was made cardinal in 1664, and archbishop of Siena from 1671 until his death.

Octavio, military commander during the Thirty Years' War (b. Pisa, 1600; d. Vienna, 1656), had joined the Spanish army in Italy and had become imperial cavalry commander and imperial field marshal in 1648, before he was made a prince by the Emperor in 1649. Several branches of the family still exist.

Bibliography: A. LISINI and A. LIBERATI, Genealogia dei Piccolomini di Siena (Siena 1900). A. BALDINI, Enciclopedia Italiana di scienze lettere ed arti, 36 v. (Rome 1929-39) 27:156-157. V. SPRETI, Enciclopedia storico-nobiliare italiana, 8 v. (Milan 1928-35) 5:325-337. F. V. CERRETA, Alessandro Piccolomini (Siena 1960).

[E. G. GLEASON]

PICCOLOMINI, ALESSANDRO

Littérateur, philosopher, bishop; b. Siena, June 13, 1508; d. Siena, March 12, 1578. Piccolomini, a student of the classics in both Padua and Rome, also became a master of Petrarchan style. This author of more than 100 sonnets also composed several comedies, among them Alessandro and Amor Constante. He translated into Italian Ovid's Metamorphoses, Aristotle's Poetics and Rhetoric, and part of Vergil's Aeneid. His most famous work, Raffaella o Dialogo della creanze aelle donne (1540), written in the style of Aretino, was later repudiated by its author as too licentious. In the same year (1540), Piccolomini turned to philosophy, becoming a professor in Padua and later in Rome. He devoted himself principally to writing philosophic, scientific, and astronomical treatises. As a controversialist, Piccolomini attacked the Aristotelian theory concerning the extent of land mass on Earth; he also wrote in support of the Ptolemaic view of astronomy. Alessandro was converted from his youthful indiscretions, received Holy Orders, and in 1574 was appointed titular archbishop of Patras and coadjutor archbishop of Siena by Gregory XIII, whose interest in calendar reform Piccolomini shared.

The Piccolomini coat of arms, five crescents on the arms of a cross, shield flanked by two angels, above, two cherubs holding the papal tiara, relief in the Casa Piccolomini at Siena.

Bibliography: A. POSCH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 8:492. Il Cinquecento (4th ed. Milan 1950).

[P. S. MCGARRY]

PICHLER, JOHANN AND WILHELM

Brothers distinguished in the field of catechetics and pastoral theology.

Johann, pastoral theologian; b. Grosskrut, Austria, March 22, 1860; d. Vienna, Oct. 22, 1927. Ordained in 1882, he was pastor in Maissau until 1903. He then went to Vienna, where he began his lifelong career in catechetics. With his brother, Wilhelm, he was the cofounder of the Viennese catechetical method and played a leading role in the Vienna Catechetical Union. At variance with the intellectualist catechetical method of the 19th century, he worked as a pioneer for the transformation of catechetical instruction of his day. His writings include Kath. Volksschul-Katechesen (Vienna 1905–07); Katechesen für die Oberstufe . . . sowie für die Christenlehre (Vienna 1911–14); with Wilhelm, Lehrplan für den kath. Religionsunterricht an den Volks- u. Bürgerschulen Östr.s (Vienna 1904).

Wilhelm, outstanding contributor to the field of catechetics; b. Grosskrut, May 11, 1862; d. Vienna, March 3, 1938. Ordained in 1887, he entered the field of catechetics in Vienna in 1903. There he quickly recognized the fruitlessness and formalism of the religious instruction of his time. He therefore exposed the deficiencies inherent in the current catechetical method and attempted to bring about a transformation in its form and methodology. He began by developing an entirely new curriculum in which Scripture, doctrine, and liturgy were united. In order to free catechetics from the methodological conflicts of his time, he called attention to its need of a strong Biblical foundation. In this he adhered closely to the thinking of Otto Wilmann, Augustin Gruber, and Johann Gustave Mey, contemporary workers in catechetical instruction and method. Pichler was strongly pastoral in his approach and saw pastoral concerns as basic to catechetics. His catechisms made him a pioneer for all Biblically grounded books of catechetical instruction. His writings include Unser RU Seine Mängel u. deren Ursachen (Vienna 1907); Das Kath. Religionsbüchlein (Vienna 1913); Katechesen für die Unterstufe der Volksschule (Vienna 1918–22); Zur Methode des RU (Vienna 1935); and Hauptfragen des RU (Vienna 1937).

On the practical level, he went far beyond the catechetical demands of his time, but failed to win complete understanding and sympathy for his work. Personal modesty and a shyness about making public his ideas were an obstacle to his success, and his co-workers remained few. Nevertheless, he had a marked influence on the application of religious instruction, especially to the lower grades. He also developed an interest in missionary catechetics and devoted the last years of his life to this area.

Bibliography: F. JACHYM, “Wilhelm Pichler: Sein Leben und Werk” in Katechetische Besinnung (Vienna 1951) 9–22. H. KREUTZWALD, Zur Geschichte des biblischen Unterrichts (Freiburg 1957). L. LENTER, Katechetisches Wörterbuch (Freiburg 1961) 623–624. A. HEUSER, in Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:493.

[E. LEWIS]

PICHLER, VITUS

Canonist; b. Grossberghofen, Germany, May 24, 1670; d. Munich, Feb. 15, 1736. After ordination he entered the Society of Jesus on Sept. 28, 1696. He was professor of philosophy at Dillingen, and later of theology, controversial and scholastic. He taught canon law for 19 years at Dillingen and Ingolstadt, where he succeeded Franz SCHMALZGRUEBER. His first important literary work was Examen polemicum super Augustana Confessione (1708). His other controversial works were directed against the Reformers, such as Lutheranismus constanter errans (1709), Una et vera fides (1710), Theologia polemica particularis (1711), and Cursus theologiae polemicæ universæ (1713). It is said he was the first to make a clear distinction between fundamental theology and other divisions of the science. His important work on papal infallibility is Papatus numquam errans in proponendis fidel articulis (1709). He is better known as a canonist. His solutions to complex cases in jurisprudence kindled a wider interest in the study of canons and a better insight into the Corpus iuris canonici.

Bibliography: H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 5 v. in 6 (3d ed. Innsbruck 1903–13) 4:1279–81. C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932; v. 12, suppl. 1960) 6:706–714. A. DE BACKER, Bibliothèque des écrivains, S.J., 7 v. (Liège 1853–61).

[T. D. DOUGHERTY]

PICKERING, THOMAS, BL.

Benedictine lay brother and martyr; b. Westmorland(?), England, c. 1621; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London) May 9, 1679. Thomas was admitted to the Benedictines at St. Gregory's Abbey, Douai, in 1660. Upon returning to London (1665), he was procurator and steward of the community at the queen's chapel. Pickering, who was known to King Charles II, was allowed to stay in England after the expulsion of the Benedictines in 1675 because he was not a priest. He was unjustly implicated in the Titus Oates Plot in 1678. Although the queen upheld his innocence, the jury convicted and condemned him. The king made attempts to save Pickering while satisfying the public blood thirst by executing two others condemned for the conspiracy. However, after the House of Commons petitioned (April 26, 1679) for Pickering's execution, the king yielded and Pickering was martyred. Downside Abbey, Bath, preserves a relic. Pickering was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: Remarks on the tryal of Mr. Ireland, Mr. Pickering, and Mr. Grove (London 1679). R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969), II, 376. W. IRELAND, The tryals of William Ireland, Thomas Pickering, and John Grove . . . (London 1678). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA

Surname of uncle and nephew Italian philosophers of the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries.

Giovanni. Count of Concordia; b. Mirandola, Feb. 24, 1463; d. Florence, Nov. 17, 1494. Giovanni Pico was the son of Gianfrancesco I and Giulia (Boiardo) Pico of the ruling family of Mirandola, a small independent duchy near Modena. At age 14 he went to Bologna to study canon law, and two years later he went to Florence, where he first made contact with M. FICINO and the Platonic Academy. At the University of Padua (1480–82) he began studying Aristotelian philosophy and also showed an interest in Hebrew and Arabic, becoming one of the first Europeans of the Renaissance to study these languages. In 1482 he returned to Florence, where he read Ficino's Theologia Platonica, studied Greek, and became fast friends with Angelo Poliziano. In 1485 Pico engaged in a famous controversy with Ermalao Barbaro on philosophical style, taking the position that philosophy must be judged by its truth value rather than by the literary style in which it is written. Later in the same year, he went to Paris to study scholastic philosophy and theology.

In 1486 Pico returned to Florence and made plans to hold a disputation in Rome in which he would defend against all challengers the truth of 900 selected theses in philosophy, theology, and science (Rome 1486). These theses, which include material from many sources, show the great breadth of learning of Pico at age 23. Before the disputation could take place, however, it was suspended by Pope INNOCENT VIII. Pico's Apologia (Naples 1487) only made matters worse, and his theses were condemned on Aug. 5, 1487, as containing heretical material. Pursued by a papal order for his arrest, Pico fled to France and was arrested there in January of 1488; he was released a short time later.

"Giovanni Pico della Mirandola," portrait by an unknown artist, in the Uffizi Gallery, Florence, Italy.

He returned to Florence, protected by the MEDICI family, and in 1489 composed his Heptaplus (Florence 1489), a commentary on the six days of creation dedicated to Lorenzo de' Medici. In 1492 he wrote De Ente et Uno (Bologna 1496), dedicated to Poliziano, the only completed portion of a projected longer work on the concord between Plato and Aristotle. In the same year Pico was absolved from the earlier charge of heresy by Pope ALEXANDER VI. In 1493 he finished Disputationes contra Astrologiam (Bologna 1496), the first of a proposed series of works to be written against the enemies of the Church.

Pico's works were published after his death by his nephew, Gianfrancesco II (see below), who prefaced them with a biography of his uncle (Bologna 1496) that Thomas More translated into English a few years later (London c. 1510). Although Pico's writings exhibit enormous erudition and extensive knowledge of source material, they are somewhat unsystematic and often inconsistent. Because of his early death, he was unable to finish many of his projected works, and, therefore, his philosophical system is incomplete. The extant works attempt to promote a universal accord of philosophical systems, a pax philosophica; their syncretic tendency to utilize what is best in all systems of thought is perhaps the most characteristic mark of Pico's thought.

His most famous single work, the Oratio, written as a preface to his proposed disputation, extols man's dignity. Man does not have a particular place or ability, as do the other animals, but he can raise himself to the level of the angels through his own efforts. Philosophy is of greatest assistance in the ascent toward the highest form of human life, the life of contemplation.

Pico was perhaps the first Christian of the Renaissance to study carefully the Jewish CABALA. His wide learning and originality of thought have attracted many thinkers to the study of his works.

Gianfrancesco II. Humanist thinker; b. Mirandola, 1469; d. there, Oct. 16, 1533. He was the author of numerous literary and philosophical works. The most important is Examen vanitatis doctrinae gentium . . . (Mirandola 1520), an extended attack on pagan philosophy in general and on Aristotle in particular, and a defense of Christian religion. He was the first Renaissance thinker to utilize the ancient skeptical writings of Sextus Empiricus (see SKEPTICISM).

See Also: RENAISSANCE PHILOSOPHY; PLATONISM.

Bibliography: Giovanni. Works. Opera omnia (Bologna 1496; Venice 1498, 1519, 1557; Strasbourg 1504; Reggio 1506; Paris 1517; Basel, 2 v. 1572–73, repr. 1601); modern edition, ed. E. GARIN (Florence 1942–); Of Being and Unity, tr. V. M. HAMM (Milwaukee 1943); "Oration on the Dignity of Man," tr. E. L. FORBES, in The Renaissance Philosophy of Man, ed. E. CASSIRER et al. (Chicago 1948) 223–254. Literature. E. CASSIRER, "Giovanni Pico della Mirandola: A Study in the History of Renaissance Ideas," Journal of the History of Ideas 3 (1942): 123–144, 319–346. A. DULLES, Princeps Concordiae: Pico della Mirandola and the Scholastic Tradition (Cambridge, Mass. 1941). E. GARIN, Giovanni Pico della Mirandola: Vita e dottrina (Florence 1937); La cultura filosofica del Rinascimento italiano (Florence 1961); Garin's volumes have fullest bibliog. P. KIBRE, The Library of Pico della Mirandola (New York 1936). E. MONNERJAHN, Giovanni Pico della Mirandola: Ein Beitrag zur philosophischen Theologie des italienischen Humanismus (Wiesbaden 1960). G. F. PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA, Giovanni Pico della Mirandola: His Life by His Nephew, tr. THOMAS MORE (London 1510), modern ed. J. M. RIGG (London 1890), and other short works tr. THOMAS MORE. Gianfrancesco II. Opera omnia, v. 2 of G. PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA, Opera omnia, 2 v. (Basel 1572–73; repr. 1601). E. GARIN, La filosofia, 2 v. (Milan 1947) 2:72–77. R. H. POPKIN, The History of Scepticism from Erasmus to Descartes (Assen 1960).

[C. B. SCHMITT]

PIDAL Y CHICO DE GUZMÁN, MARÍA MARAVILLAS DE JESÚS, BL.

Baptized María Christina Luisa Ildelfonsa Patricia Josefa, also known as Mother Maravillas de Jesús, Discalced Carmelite; foundress of the Association of Saint Teresa; b. Madrid, Spain, Nov. 4, 1891; d. Dec. 11, 1974, in the Carmel of Aldehuela (Madrid). María Pidal was born while her father, Luis Pidal y Mon, the marquis of Pidal, was the Spanish ambassador to the Holy See. Her mother, Cristina Chico de Guzmán, was also a devout Catholic.

María did not enter religious life until she was nearly thirty. Drawn to the Carmelites after reading the works of saints JOHN OF THE CROSS and TERESA OF ÁVILA, she entered (1920) and was professed (1921) at the Escorial Carmel, Madrid.

In 1924, with three others, she founded the Carmel of Cerro de los Angeles at the geographical center of Spain, where she pronounced her solemn vows that same year. Because the carmel expanded so quickly, other communities, including one in Kottayam (1933), India, evolved from it.

During the Spanish Civil War (1936–39), the sisters lived in an apartment in Madrid, and their number continued to grow. In September 1937, they opened a carmel in the Batuecas near Salamanca. Following the war, Marí restored Cerro de los Angeles and continued to found other carmels (Mancera de Abajo, Duruelo, Cabrera, Arenas de San Pedro, San Calixto, Aravaca, Talavera de la Reina, La Aldehuela, and Montemar-Torremolinos) and restored that at El Escorial and Ávila. To bind these carmels together, Mother María obtained Vatican approval for the Association of Saint Teresa (1972).

A miracle attributed to her intercession was approved Dec. 18, 1997. Pope John Paul II beatified Mother Maravillas de Jesús on May 10, 1998.

Feast: Dec. 11 (Carmelites).

Bibliography: Si tu le laisses faire: mère Maravillas de Jésus, Carmélite Déchaussée (Montsûrs 1993), French tr. of Si tú le dejas: vida de la Madre Maravillas de Jesus, Carmelita Descalza (Madrid 1976). Acta Apolstolicae Sedis, no. 12 (1998) 599.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

PIE, LOUIS FRANÇOIS DÉsirÉ

French cardinal, bishop of Poitiers; b. Pontgouin (Eure-et-Loir), Sept. 26, 1815; d. Angoulême, May 18, 1880. After studies at the seminary of Saint-Sulpice in Paris, he was ordained (1839), became curate at the cathedral of Chartres, and in 1844 vicar-general of the diocese. As bishop of Poitiers (1849–80) he constantly upheld the rights of the Church and the Holy See, notably during the invasions of the States of the Church after 1860. A discourse by him on this topic in his cathedral caused him to be haled before the Council of State. He defended the SYLLABUS OF ERRORS against DUPANLOUP and others. At VATICAN COUNCIL I Pie, who had been a strong promoter of ULTRAMONTANISM, was president of the commission on faith and took a leading role in the definition of papal infallibility. Naturalism, LIBERALISM, and other modern errors found in him a sturdy opponent. Politically he was a monarchist, a follower of the Bourbon claimant to the throne, Comte Henri de Chambord. A promoter of provincial councils, he was appointed by the bishops of the Bordeaux province to edit the statutes elaborated at diocesan synods. His episcopal ministry was marked by frequent pastoral visits, numerous discourses, the dedication of more than 120 churches, the introduction of many religious congregations into his diocese, the creation of a diocesan society of missionary priests called the Oblates of St. Hilary, the establishment of an institution of higher theological education entrusted to the Jesuits, and the development of various religious and charitable works.

Pie's numerous publications bear the stamp of his talent as writer and orator and of his scriptural, patristic, and theological knowledge, although he has been judged more facile than profound. His discourses of all types were collected in nine volumes, Discours et instructions pastorales (1858–79). The Oeuvres de Mgr l'évêque de Poitiers saw numerous editions between 1865 and 1894. In 1878 appeared volume 1 of Oeuvres choisies, comprising Instructions synodales sur les principales erreurs du temps présent, suivies de l'Instruction synodale sur la première constitution dogmatique du concile du Vatican. A two-volume selection of his sermons and instructions between 1839 and 1849 appeared in Oeuvres sacerdotales (1891–95). Many of his discourses, funeral eulogies, letters, and synodal instructions were printed separately. He also left in manuscript a large correspondence, numerous homilies, an Essai sur le concile du Vatican, and other longer works. In 1879 he became a cardinal.

Bibliography: L. BAUNARD, Histoire du cardinal Pie, 2 v. (Paris 1886). J. M. BESSE, Le Cardinal Pie (Paris 1903). E. CATTA, La Doctrine politique et sociale du cardinal Pie (Paris 1959). C. BUTLER, The Vatican Council, 2 v. (New York 1930), with photo. C. CONSTANTIN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 12.2:1740–43; R. AUBERT, in Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:495.

[R. LIMOUZIN-LAMOTHE]

PIEDRA, ABBEY OF

Former Cistercian monastery in the Diocese of Tarazona, Saragossa province, Spain; founded in 1194 by Abbot Gaufrido de Rocaberti and 12 monks from Poblet, who occupied the castrum de petra and the surrounding land donated by Alfonso II of Aragon. Peter II in 1203, James I (1213–76), the lords of Albarracín and Molina, and bishops favored the abbey, which held many privileges and absolute jurisdiction over many places. The officials of the abbey, which depended on the Holy See, were elected by the community. Peter IV (1319–87) defended the monks from local outbursts and made them limit their prodigality to pilgrims. Martin de Vargas, the 15th-century Cistercian reformer, came from Piedra. Most of Piedra's art treasures were lost in the lootings that followed its suppression in 1835, when it was still a center of monasticism and spirituality. The buildings, which have been converted into a government tourist inn, contain architectural elements of Romanesque, Byzantine, Gothic, Renaissance, and churrigueresque styles. The setting, enriched by the famous cascades of the river Piedra, is remarkably beautiful.

Bibliography: J. PÉREZ DE URBEL, Las grandes abadías benedictinas (Madrid 1928) 227–236. Enciclopedia universal ilustrada Europeo-Americana, 70 v. (Barcelona 1908–30; suppl. 1934–) 44:724–731.

[J. PÉREZ DE URBEL]

PIERIUS, ST.

Fourth-century Alexandrian ecclesiastic and writer; d. apparently Rome, 312. A priest at Alexandria under Bp. Theonas (c. 281–300), Pierius was a noted exegete, preacher, and ascetic. He was a disciple of ORIGEN and successor of Theognostus as head of the School of Alexandria; he was the teacher of PAMPHILUS, and he suffered as a confessor in the Diocletian persecution, after which he settled in Rome. Philip Sidetes and JEROME speak of the elegance of his style and profundity of his teaching (De vir. illus. 76), and PHOTIUS mentions a collection of 12 λόγιοι, or sermons, including a homily, On Easter and the Prophet Osee, and a treatise on St. Luke's Gospel (Bibl. codex 119). Philip Sidetes mentions a work, On the Mother of God, and a Vita of Pamphilus. Jerome was acquainted with his NT MSS in Caesarea. His close connection with Origen probably explains the loss of his works after the condemnation of Origenism.

Feast: Nov. 4.

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) 10:241–246. C. DE BOOR, Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 5.2 (1888)

165–184. Acta Sanctorum Nov. 2.1:254–264. L. B. RADFORD, Three Teachers of Alexandria (Cambridge, Eng. 1908). J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 4 v. (Westminster, Md. 1950–86) 2.111–113. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF from 5th German ed. (New York 1960) 239. G. FRITZ, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 12.2:1744–1746.

[F. X. MURPHY]

PIERLEONI

Leading family of the Roman nobility in the 11th and 12th centuries, intimately and consistently associated with the papacy during the GREGORIAN REFORM. Its earliest known representative was the Roman Jew Baruch, whom the sources call Benedictus Christianus after his conversion (date unknown). He married a lady of the Roman aristocracy and died before Nov. 19, 1051. His son Leo, an important figure by 1051, supported Hildebrand in every way. Last mentioned in 1062, he was succeeded by his son Petrus Leonis, who gave the family its name. Their closeness to Hildebrand, a notice in the Annales Pegavienses [Monumenta Germaniae Historica Scriptores 16:238], and other circumstantial evidence gave rise to the highly controversial theory that GREGORY VI and GREGORY VII were related to them. URBAN II took refuge from the followers of the antipope CLEMENT III on the Tiber island, which was controlled by Petrus Leonis, and he died in Petrus Leonis's fortified house near the church of S. Nicola in Carcere (close to the theater of Marcellus). Petrus Leonis remained a faithful supporter of Urban's successors PASCHAL II, GELASIIUS II, and CALLISTUS II. He died between 1124 and 1130, perhaps in 1128.

His son Petrus (called, like his father, Petrus Leonis) was for a time a student in Paris and a monk at Cluny and was raised by Paschal II not later than 1113 to the rank of cardinal deacon and by Callistus II in 1120 to that of cardinal priest. The growing influence of the Pierleoni aroused the enmity of the other leading Roman family, the FRANGIPANI. More important, under HONORIUS II, new forces opposed to the older cardinals of the reform began to rise in the Sacred College under the leadership of the chancellor, Aimeric of Santa Maria Nuova. Upon Honorius's death (Feb. 14, 1130), a committee of six cardinals dominated by Aimeric elected the cardinal deacon Gregory of Sant'Angelo pope (INNOCENT II). Later in the day the majority of cardinals (21) elected to the papacy Cardinal Pierleoni, who called himself Anacletus II. He prevailed for a time in Rome and most of Italy, but Innocent, with the powerful help of BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, was victorious. Upon the death of Anacletus in 1138 the schism came virtually to an end.

Anacletus's brothers remained prominent adherents of the papacy, except for Jordan, who in 1144 became the official leader of the rebellious populace of Rome after the restoration of the Roman Senate and received the title PATRICIUS. A nephew of Anacletus, Hugh was made bishop of Piacenza in 1154 and cardinal bishop of Tusculum in 1164 or 1165 (d. 1166). He was the uncle of another member of Alexander III's Sacred College, also named Hugh, cardinal deacon of Sant'Angelo (1173 to 1178), cardinal priest of San Clemente (1178 to 1182), and legate to England (1175 to 1176) and France (1176 to 1177).

Monuments of the family are found especially in Roman churches of the 16th and 17th centuries.

Bibliography: Main study still P. FEDELE, "Le famiglie di Anacleto II e di Gelasio II," Archivio della Società romana di storia patria 27 (1904), 399–440. R. L. POOLE, "Benedict IX and Gregory VI," Proceedings of the British Academy 8 (1917–18), 199–235, esp. 219–226. P. F. PALUMBO, Lo Scisma del MCXXX (Rome 1942), see index, 696. H. BLOCH, "The Schism of Anacletus II and the Glanfeuil Forgeries of Peter the Deacon of Monte Cassino," Traditio 8 (1952), 159–264, esp. 159–182, with references to the earlier literature. F. J. SCHMALE, Studien zum Schisma des Jahres 1130 (Cologne 1961), esp. 15–28, 66–82, weak. H. WOLTER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Friburg 1957–65) 8:496–497. P. E. SCHRAMM, "Das Zeitalter Gregors VII," Göttingische gelehrte Anzeigen 207 (1953) 62–140, esp. 66–73, literature on the origin of Gregory VI and VII. V. FORCELLA, Iscrizioni delle chiese e d'altri edifici di Roma, 14 v. in 7 (Rome 1869–84). V. SPRETI, Enciclopedia storico-nobiliare italiana, 8 v. (Milan 1928–35), v. 5.

[H. BLOCH]

PIERS PLOWMAN

The full title of Piers Plowman, the master literary work of 14th-century England's alliterative revival in the West Midlands, is The Vision of William concerning Piers the Plowman. Common in the MSS and in early references are the Latin titles: Visio Willelmi de Petro Plowman and Liber de Petro Plowman. The poem survives in 49 MSS in three successive versions of unequal length, known as the A, B, and C texts; ten of the MSS are composed of parts from two of the texts. The A text (2,558 lines), written c. 1362 to 1373, is divided into a prologue, 11 passus (cantos) and a "Passus XII" of dubious character, written by a John But and printed as an appendix in recent editions. The B text (7,242 lines), written c. 1377, has a prologue and nine additional passus following the 11 of A, these earlier passus being altered in many respects. The C text (7,357 lines), written c. 1387 to 1398, is a revision of B, having no prologue and 23 passus. The first printed edition (B text) was by Robert Crowley in 1550.

Authorship and Organization. Although the famous controversy over the authorship is not completely resolved, Piers Plowman is now generally attributed to William Langland on the basis of two 15th-century notes in MSS and of internal evidence. He was possibly the illegitimate son of Eustace de Rokayle, was born at Cleobury Mortimer or Ledbury in Shropshire, and educated at the priory of Great Malvern in Worcestershire. All else about him seems speculation.

Each version of the poem follows the same basic organization of two large divisions, each containing several visions composed of one or more passus. The B text, the one most often read and translated today, includes the Vision concerning Piers the Plowman (Prologue-Passus VII), two dreams, and the Lives of Dowel (VIII-XIV), Dobet (XV-XVIII), and Dobest (XIX-XX), eight dreams, two of which are dreams within dreams.

The Visio and the Vita. In the Visio, Will, a persona for William the author and the will of every medieval man, recounts his dream of the various contemporary professions, of the “fair field full of folk,” working out their fates between the Tower of Truth (eternal life) and the Castle of Care (eternal fire). A Lady (the Church), the first of many tutors to appear, explains the divine origin and destiny of men and their duties to God. There follows a series of dramatic scenes dealing with the proposed marriage of Lady Meed (reward) first to False, and then to Conscience. In the second dream, the folk repent their past sins and begin a pilgrimage in search of Truth. Piers now makes his first appearance, directing them first to plow their own half-acres, after which Truth sends a pardon to him and his true followers: “Et qui bona egerunt, ibunt in vitam eternam;/ Qui vero mala, in ignem eternum.”

In the Vita, Will’s quest for the three degrees of doing well (bona egerunt) moves mainly in his own mind; his search is a pilgrimage through the three grades of Christian perfection toward the ideal society. The pattern at the center of the poem, the lives of Dowel and Dobet, is progress through struggle. In the third vision, Will confronts his own faculties, such as Thought and Imagination, gradually learns the responsible use of man’s distinguishing gifts, wit and will, and recognizes his sinfulness. In the fourth, under the tutelage of Conscience and Patience, he beholds Hawkin the Active Man’s discovery of his stained coat (soul) and adopts an attitude of penance and poverty in preparation for the focusing of divine powers within his own soul, Anima. In the fifth vision, he then moves to the contemplation of the three theological virtues and the Trinity, and in the sixth, to a meditation on the Passion and its relation to his own salvation. It is in this last vision that Charity, who is also the Good Samaritan, takes on the flesh of Piers Plowman, who appears as Christ the Knight, come to joust at Jerusalem. In Dobest, Piers makes his third appearance as Christ’s reeve, the Pope. The final two dreams present the testing of Will’s love and poverty and of the 14th-century Church, which is attacked by Antichrist. Will recounts his own tribulations and the coming of old age; the poem concludes with his Conscience vowing that he will “walk as wide as the world lasts” in search of Piers the Plowman. Each passus, or “step,” has made it clear that the pilgrimage is the poem’s dominant motif, a fact that relates it to CHAUCER’s Canterbury Tales.

Relationship with Other Works. In form and technique Piers Plowman is related also to the works of other contemporaries. No other medieval poem presents such a mixture of genres. In keeping with the basic form of allegorical dream narrative, mental faculties (Reason), sins (Pride), virtues (Patience), institutions (Holy-church), and a great many other personifications, as well as divine persons (Holy Ghost), Biblical figures (Moses), and contemporary people (Friars) appear as characters, undergo a variety of transformations, and vanish unexpectedly. Parts of the personified action relate the poem to the morality plays, while mystery plays have clearly influenced other scenes (see DRAMA, MEDIEVAL).

The unifying action, a quest, connects it with the romance, and, inasmuch as the quest involves Will with a series of guides, it resembles the consolatio in which Boethius is tutored by Dame Philosophy. The character Will, uneducated but argumentative, is similar to the autobiographical ingénu of encyclopedic satire, and in the continual criticism of the actual in the light of the ideal, there are elements of complaint in the de contemptu mundi tradition. Other materials are derived from the sermon, the devotional, penitential, and ascetic handbooks, and the commentaries and glosses of the Bible. Langland “spoke Bible” and used at times both typology (see TYPOS) and the four allegorical levels of Scripture (singly or in combination) to shape a poem that, in its eschatological orientation and its scattered prophetic warnings, is apocalyptic. Some of the alliterative lines are macaronic and acrostic, and others contain repetition, riddles, puns, and word play of all kinds. All critics agree that Piers Plowman is one of the most puzzling poems in English literature.

Main Theme. If the author’s aims and accomplishments are to be understood, the three versions should probably not be regarded as variants of the same poem, but as a cumulative work in which successive attempts are made to develop and clarify his main theme, the search for salvation. This is treated thematically as a pilgrimage, in keeping with the Augustinian definition of charity as the motion of the soul toward God, and is associated with plowing, the tending to the duties of one’s own estate. The value of both depends on cooperation with the way of the cross, the pardon. These motifs of pilgrimage, plowing, and pardon are unified in penance, which is not only the ritual followed in the confession scenes for which the poem is well known, but a virtue related to poverty and patience. For the author, these three seem to define the life of perfection.

In depicting Will’s search, Langland incorporates all the elements associated with the medieval spiritual life: the creed; the Ten Commandments; the seven deadly sins; the three theological virtues; the four cardinal virtues; the four daughters of God; the world, the flesh, and the devil; and the three types of chastity—in marriage, in widowhood, and in virginity. Key terms of medieval philosophical thought, such as Need, Fortune, and Kind (Nature), all receive systematic treatment as personifications, and the century’s problems, such as the questioning of the value of learning and the rising emphasis on voluntarism, are given penetrating and balanced analysis. The poem, finally, is the most significant vernacular expression of English social thought in the Middle Ages; it makes explicit and detailed reference to the plagues, the Hundred Years’ War, the Great Schism, and the wide variety of clerical and economic abuses; yet, grounded as it is in the actual religious practice, philosophical thought, and historical events of its time, it conveys, like no other English poem, the timelessness of Christian truth.

Scholarship Devoted to Piers. Piers Plowman has been fortunate in its editors and interpreters. The basic edition of all three texts is that of Skeat, but this is gradually being replaced by the new London edition, of which Kane’s A text has already appeared. This edition, which was begun as a result of the famous authorship dispute between J. M. Manly, who argued that the composition of the three versions was the work of five men, and J. J. Jusserand and others, who argued for a single author, will probably not fully resolve the dispute for all, but Kane’s book (1965) clearly indicates that the evidence points toward unity of authorship. Despite the speculations of A. Bright, little more is known about the author; the chief source for his biography is internal evidence, and most critics today agree that the events in the poem do not mirror his life in such close detail as has previously been argued. Chambers, Coghill, and Wells were among the poem’s first great interpreters. Owst and Spearing have shown how much the poem has in common with the medieval sermon. Dunning’s early study of the A text has left subsequent writers on all three versions in his debt, as has Donaldson’s pioneering work on the C text. In more recent years, critical studies have focused on the B text and its Biblical, theological, devotional, and apocalyptic backgrounds; the best are those of Robertson and Huppé, Frank, Fowler, and Bloomfield. Interest in this important work is still very strong and further scholarship appears every year.

Bibliography: Editions. W. W. SKEAT, ed., The Vision of William concerning Piers the Plowman in Three Parallel Texts, Together with Richard the Redeless, 2 v. (London 1886). T. A. KNOTT and D. C. FOWLER, eds., Piers the Plowman: A Critical Edition of the A-Version (Baltimore 1952). G. KANE, ed., Piers Plowman: The A Version (London 1960). Translations. N. COGHILL, tr., Visions from Piers Plowman (New York 1949). J. F. GOODRIDGE, tr., Langland: Piers the Ploughman (Baltimore 1959). H. H. WELLS, tr., The Vision of Piers Plowman (New York 1935). Studies. A. H. BRIGHT, New Light on ‘Piers Plowman’ (London 1928). M. W. BLOOMFIELD, Piers Plowman as a 14th-Century Apocalypse (New Brunswick, N.J. 1962). R. W. CHAMBERS, Man’s Unconquerable Mind (London 1939). C. H. DAWSON, Medieval Religion and Other Essays (New York 1934). E. T. DONALDSON, Piers Plowman: The C-Text and Its Poet (New Haven 1949). T. P. DUNNING, Piers Plowman: An Interpretation of the A-Text (New York 1937). W. ERZGRÄBER, William Langlands ‘Piers Plowman’: Eine Interpretation des C-Textes (Heidelberg 1957). R. W. FRANK, Piers Plowman and the Scheme of Salvation (New Haven 1957). D. C. FOWLER, Piers, the Plowman: Literary Relations of the A and B Texts (Seattle 1961). D. L. OWEN, Piers Plowman: A Comparison with Some Earlier and Contemporary French Allegories (London 1912). G. R. OWST, Literature and Pulpit in Medieval England (2d ed. New York 1961). D. W. ROBERTSON and B. F. HUPPÉ, Piers Plowman and Scriptural Tradition (Princeton 1951). A. C. SPEARING, Criticism and Medieval Poetry (New York 1964). E. M. TILLYARD, The English Epic and Its Background (New York 1954). H. C. WHITE, Social Criticism in Popular

Religious Literature of the 16th Century (New York 1944). G. KANE, Piers Plowman: The Evidence for Authorship (London 1965).

[G. L. O'GRADY]

PIERZ, FRANCIS XAVIER

Missionary; b. Kamnik, Carniola, Slovenia Nov. 20, 1785; d. Ljubljana, Carniola, Jan. 22, 1880. After study with the Franciscans in Kamnik and at the diocesan seminary in Ljubljana, Pierz was ordained on March 13, 1813 by Bp. Antonius Kautschitz. He spent the first 22 years of his priestly career in Yugoslavia as assistant at Kranjska Gora and Fuzine and as pastor at Pece and Podbrezje. His experiments in the development of fruit stock suitable for the region were recognized by the Carniolan Agricultural Society. In 1830 he published a text on the science of fruit growing, Kranjski Vertnar (The Carniolan Gardener), which remains a standard reference work in Slovenia. In 1834 Pierz went to the United States to work with his countryman Rev. Frederic Baraga, later the first bishop of Marquette, Michigan.

Baraga stimulated his interest in the evangelization of the Native Americans and persuaded him to volunteer for work among the Ottawas. From 1835 to 1871 Pierz labored among the natives of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, achieving his most notable success with the Chippewas of Minnesota. He arrived there in 1852 and, from his headquarters at Crow Wing, traveled by foot and horseback to virtually every Chippewa village in the territory. As government policy restricted the Native Americans' domain, he worked to have their vacated lands settled by German and Slovenian Catholics. Many Catholic communities in the Diocese of St. Cloud, Minnesota owe their origin to his efforts. He also brought the Benedictines to Minnesota from their foundation in Pennsylvania. In 1873, when he was 88 years old, he returned to his native land.

Bibliography: G. McDONALD, "Father Francis Pierz, Missionary," Minnesota History 10 (1929) 107–125. J. SELISKAR, Acta et Dicta 3 (1911) 66–90. W. P. FURLAN, In Charity Unfeigned: The Life of Francis Xavier Pierz (Paterson, N.J. 1952).

[W. P. FURLAN]

PIETÀ

An iconographic theme representing the Virgin (alone or with John and Mary Magdalen) grieving over the body of Christ on her knees. Late medieval religious spirit, preoccupied with pain and suffering, found its most pathetic expression in the Pietà, a devotional image of the compassion of Mary in the time between deposition and entombment.

"Pietà," wooden sculpture, on display at Mainfrankische Museum, in Marienberg Fortress, Würzburg, Bavaria, Germany. (©Adam Woolfitt/CORBIS.)

Literary sources of the theme are Pseudo-Bonaventure's Meditations, St. Bridget's Revelations, and the sermons and poetry of the mystics, but its ultimate origin is a fusion of the Virgin's lamentation with either the entombment (Duccio, Maestà) or the deposition (Giotto, Arena Chapel) of Christ. The isolated, emotionally charged mother-son group in sculptural form is a specifically German achievement of c. 1300, most frequently and variously produced in Rhenish and Swabian centers.

The Pietà, is a synthesis of the Madonna enthroned with the slaughtered Innocents' mourning mothers. Three main types are distinguishable: Christ in a sitting position, His head and knees angularly bent—the earliest German manifestation; Christ in a horizontal position across the Virgin's lap (from the lamentation)—preferred in Italy; and Christ in a sloping position in an unbroken curve (from the deposition)—favored in France.

The small, sculptured Pietà in the Landeuseum, Bonn, datable c. 1320, poignantly expresses human suffering and sorrow through the angularity of Christ's broken body and the Virgin's disproportionately large head. The great anonymous Pietà of Villeneuveles-Avignon, painted c. 1460, is moving in its noble constraint. With eyes cast down on Christ's rigid body, Mary prays, joined by John and the donor—her mute anguish intensified by the openly weeping Magdalen. Simple composition, subdued colors, and archaic gold-ground accentuate the concept of restraint. In 15th-century Italy the horizontal (entombment) type, with surrounding saints, prevailed (Crivelli, Tura, Perugino, Sellaio). In his earliest of four sculptured Pietàs (Rome, St. Peter's, 1498), Michelangelo replaced the horizontal form with a northern composite—creating through the monumental pyramid a transformation from agony to solemnity and heroic resignation. Although the theme continued intermittently (Carracci, Rubens, Guenther), not until the 20th century, e.g., Zadkine's small bronze Pietà (1952), has the original emotional impact been restored.

Bibliography: W. PINDER, Die Pietà (Leipzig 1922); "Die dichterische Wurzel der Pietà," Repertorium für Kunstwissenschaft 42 (1919–20) 145–163. W. PASSARGE, Das deutsche Vesperbild im Mittelalter (Cologne 1924). R. HAMANN, "Die Bonner Pietà," Festschrift zum 60. Geburtstag von Paul Clemen (Bonn 1926) 365–374. E. PANOFSKY, "Imago Pietatis: Ein Beitrag zur Typengeschichte des Schmerzensmannes und der Maria Mediatrix," Festschrift für Max J. Friedländer zum 60. Geburtstage (Leipzig 1927) 261–308. F. C. SCHNEIDER, Die mittelalterlichen deutschen Typen und Vorformen des Vesperbildes (Rendsburg 1931). É. MÂLE, L'Art religieux de la fin du moyen âge en France (5th ed. Paris 1949). W. KOERTE, "Deutsche Vesperbilder in Italien," Kunstgeschichtliches Jahrbuch der Bibliotheca Hertziana 1 (1937) 1–138. W. H. FORSYTH, "Medieval Statues of the Pietà in the Museum," Bulletin of the New York Metropolitan Museum of Art NS 11 (1952–53) 177–184.

[R. BERGMANN]

PIETISM

Broadly defined, pietism denotes a distinctive quality of religious life issuing in rigorous morality and personal piety. JANSENISM, PURITANISM, precisionism, and METHODISM share this quality. In a stricter sense, it refers to its expression within German Lutheranism, particularly by P. J. SPENER, A. H. FRANCKE, and N. L. von ZINZENDORF.

The spirit of Pietism, as set forth by Spener in his Pia Desideria, revealed the influence of Arndt's Von wahren Christentum, the writings of the English Puritans and the Reformed Christianity of Geneva. It called for a return to personal devotion and morality in response to the decay of German life following the Thirty Years' War and in reaction to the arid intellectualism of the Protestant scholasticism then dominating orthodox Lutheranism. It deemed Christianity more a matter of the heart than of the intellect; the mark of a Christian was more properly love of one's neighbor than right doctrines. Spener urged that a greater emphasis be given to devotional than to doctrinal and polemical studies in theological education, with a corresponding reformation of preaching. The errant and heathens were to be won by love and persuasion.

Pietism did not produce the sweeping reforms that Spener desired for the church. However, an improved moral climate was achieved and a greater emphasis given to the study of Scripture, along with a wider use of Scripture in preaching. Perhaps the greatest impact on church life occurred in Lutheran hymnody. Similarly the movement produced no immediate transformation of orthodox Lutheran theology, the two positions, indeed, differing not greatly in doctrines per se but rather in the emphasis given to doctrine. Nevertheless, Pietism revealed the weaknesses of Lutheran scholasticism and helped prepare the way for the theological resurgence of the 18th and 19th centuries.

The failures of Pietism were largely a result of its individualistic emphasis and a lack of organization. Spener never exercised the control over this movement that Wesley did over Methodism. Separatism was a constant threat in Pietism. Spener early founded the collegia pietatis, small devotional gatherings that he envisaged as a spiritual leaven within the church. Nevertheless, this drawing apart of a spiritual elite led to strained relations with the rest of Lutheranism. Some of Spener's more enthusiastic followers finally broke away from the Church but Spener (and Francke agreeing with him in this) being opposed to separatism broke with them and suppressed the collegia. Extremism plagued Pietism and detracted from its influence. Unlike Spener's, Francke's spiritual development had been traumatic and he regarded this as the norm for all true conversion, tending to impose this character upon the movement. Excessive and false religiosity both found frequent expression. In fact, Ritschl questioned Spener's classification as a Pietist because he confessed no such traumatic conversion. Extreme individualism in Biblical interpretation occasionally marred the Pietists' free study of Scripture, and subjective approaches to religion led to bizarre theological expressions, such as those of Zinzendorf. The deemphasis of doctrine inherent in Pietism also tended to weaken its impact. In reaffirming the necessary subjective aspect of faith, it tended to neglect the equally valid objective side. Consequently, the Halle school under Francke produced little scholarly research. In contrast, the less radical form of Pietism at Württemberg under Bengel pursued scholarly research and continued as a significant force after the more extreme Pietism had disappeared.

A group of female Pietists at a Sunday afternoon gathering c. 1910. (©Hulton-Deutsch Collection/CORBIS)

The Pietist emphasis upon a quality of life rather than orthodoxy of belief tended to produce a softening of religious divisions and an improved relationship between the Lutheran and Reformed churches. Contact with like-minded Roman Catholics, initially inhibited by Spener's strong opposition to the papacy, developed late in the 18th century only to succumb to the ULTRAMONTANISM prevailing on the Roman side. The movement was, in this respect, a forerunner of religious freedom. Unlike the Puritans, the Pietists never became a political force. Nevertheless, they had considerable social impact, humanizing society and inspiring the growth of philanthropy. The Halle orphanage and schools under Francke were a precursor of the Innere Mission, the home mission, social service movement. Pietism fostered an upsurge of missionary effort. Inspired by Pietism, Frederick IV of Denmark commissioned two men from Halle for service in India. An active campaign was conducted to evangelize the Jews by establishing the Institutum Judaicum at Halle. The Moravians later gave a new impetus to the mission cause with their use of lay personnel. Pietism was influential also in the founding in England of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, with its decidedly missionary purpose.

This movement was destined to be a factor in shaping the theologies of SCHLEIERMACHER and RITSCHL, and through the Moravians it promoted the rise of Methodism. Some cite a connection between Pietism and the rise of both rationalism and German nationalism. However, these latter movements in their developed expressions certainly did not reflect the spirit of Pietism.

Bibliography: A. RITSCHL, Geschichte des Pietismus, 3 v. (Bonn 1880–86). H. HEPPE, Geschichte des Pietismus und der Mystik in der reformierten Kirche namentlich der Niederlande (Leiden 1879). E. SACHSSE, Ursprung und Wesen des Pietismus (Wiesbaden 1884). H. SCHMID, Die Geschichte des Pietismus (Nördlingen 1863). M. STALLMANN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 5:370–383. L. CRISTIANI, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 12.2:2084–93. C. MIRBT, S. M. JACKSON, ed. The New Schff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, 13 v. (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1951–54) 9:53–67. J. T. MCNEILL, Modern Christian Movements (Philadelphia 1954).

[J. C. HOFFMAN]

PIETRANTONI, AGOSTINA LIVIA, ST.

Baptized Livia, nurse, a Sister of Charity of Saint Joan Antida Thouret (Istituto delle Suore della Carità di Santa Giovanna Antida Thouret); b. March 27, 1864 in Pozzaglia Sabina (between Rieti and Tivoli), Italy; d. Nov. 13, 1894, Rome.

Livia, the second of the eleven children of farmers, received little formal education. Responding to a call, Livia entered the Sisters of Charity at Rome in 1886. Sister Agostina became a nurse in the pediatric ward at Holy Spirit Hospital near the Vatican, where she cared for the critically ill. Later she was transferred to the tuberculosis ward, where she contracted the deadly disease but was miraculously cured.

Following a month of threatening notes, a former patient, Giuseppe Romanelli, stabbed Sister Agostina to death while attempting to rape her. As she died, she prayed for Romanelli's salvation and forgiveness. Agostina was beatified in 1972 and the miracle required for her canonization approved, April 6, 1998. She was canonized by Pope John Paul II, April 18, 1999.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 65 (1973): 229–235. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed. 47 (1972): 1–2. A. PRONZATO, Una certa suor Agostina. Suora della carità di S. Giovanna Antida Thouret (Turin 1971).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

PIETY, FAMILIAL

The virtue, akin to justice, that directs the interpersonal relationships of domestic society. It guides husbands and wives, parents and children, in their conduct toward each other. Whereas justice regulates the general relationships between individuals and between the individual and society, piety is concerned with the special relationships between the family and its members and between the members themselves. Without this thoughtful regulation of each person's activities, the frictions inevitable when people live very close to each other can make life unbearable and some form of escape attractive, whether this be divorce or simply leaving home.

Love. To understand the duties and rights of members of a family one should first reflect upon their basis, love, Christian love of one's neighbor. No neighbor is closer than husband to wife, parents to children. A self-seeking love that uses the object of love for the lover's own advantage cannot be a basis for union between members of a family. It can bring together only consumer and consumed. Even the love of friend for friend is insufficient as a basis for a family, for it lasts only so long as there are common interests—business, social, or emotional. When new interests supersede those on which the friendship was based, it ceases. If the family ceases there is a greater loss not only to its members but to society as a whole, for children need protection over a long period, and even after they are grown, the husband and wife still need the assistance each of the other, especially in sickness and old age. The only kind of love that can serve as a solid foundation for the family, exemplified by the Holy Family, is that which imitates the love whereby the Creator continually pours out His gifts upon His creatures.

Romantic love, which draws the man and woman together at the junction of their lives, does not endure forever, but rather settles down, in marriages that last, into that deeper, stronger current of married love that continually and actively promotes the well-being of the partner. It is, however, beset in the meantime by various dangers. Some of these arise from third parties. Thus, one parent may begin to think of "my" rather than "our" children, with the result that children come between the husband and wife. Again, husbands and wives may not detach themselves enough from their own parents in forming a new family. Such "in-law trouble" was foreseen long ago (Gn 2.24). Another danger is an attachment for an outsider, which, however "platonic," gives to that person the husband's or wife's heart, leaving little love to the partner, or less if the attachment becomes adulterous. Assertions of man's natural tendency to promiscuity really deny his capacity for enduring love and contradict the evidence of the great majority of marriages, which do last.

Even if third parties are not a threat, a danger lurks in the human tendency to jealousy. This may be aroused by an imprudent action or a fault of the partner, or it may grow out from a mere suspicion on the part of an insecure person who is always fearing, yet seeking, a sign that love for himself, or herself, is waning.

Considerateness. Considerateness on the part of both husband and wife can do much to overcome these dangers. It implies, among other things, that they always try to control their tempers and to speak to each other in a normal tone. Considerateness also avoids sarcastic, belittling remarks, as well as nagging, ridicule, and undue silence. It bears no grudges. Considerateness implies a willingness to talk over difficulties. Many a marriage ends because husband and wife can no longer communicate, can no longer talk with, but only at each other.

Tapestry of Sister Agostina Livia Pietrantoni, hanging on St. Peter's Basilica. Agostina was a nurse in a Rome hospital stabbed to death by a crazed patient. (AP/Wide World)

Considerateness implies also tolerance of the friends and relatives of the other partner. Partners cannot continue to spend excessive amounts of time with old friends from school or work. These must be replaced with new, mutual friends in their married circle. While the couple is developing shared interests, new social activities, and a fresh circle of friends, however, they should each be considerate of the other's feelings for the friends who are gradually slipping away.

Considerateness also involves respect of each for the privacy of the other, both with respect to mail and to professional secrets. It implies, too, that mealtimes will be calm, not sparring sessions, and that nightfall will bring an end to the day's problems so that each can relax and be ready to face those of the morrow. It includes care of one's personal appearance. After long association one may become careless and so offensive that cohabitation becomes distasteful. Certainly considerateness is required in love-making.

Duties of Husband and Wife. Love between members of the family should be orderly. The individuals involved are equal in regard to some things, such as their eternal destiny; however, in other things, such as government of the home, there must be subordination. The husband, in general, has the duty of taking the responsibility of head of the family, governing the home. The wife has a right to expect him to do this, not as a brute or as a weakling, but as a man who will do his best to protect his wife and children, support them, guide them, and handle wisely the family property and finances.

Improper management of finances can be avoided by the habit of openness and mutual management, for example, by the depositing of monthly salaries in a joint account. The handling of household expenses and the allotment of pocket money for husband, wife, and children should be agreed upon after careful discussion so that each person understands clearly the financial situation of the family. Without a family budget and careful regulation of charge accounts, there may be excessive spending, getting the family so deeply in debt that the wife is forced to go to work to help pay the bills. As a result the home is neglected and both husband and wife are continually so tired and nervous that they are no longer able to be considerate of each other. This frequently leads to separation.

The wife, in general, has a duty to respect her husband, unless by his conduct he forfeits his right to this. It is likewise her place to defer to him regarding the location and operation of the home and to care for it diligently. This, however, does not mean giving in to his every whim, or to demands that are contrary to her dignity as wife and mother. The degree and manner of the wife's subordination varies with persons, places, and the times. The wife may even have to take over the position of breadwinner, when the husband is incapacitated or cannot find employment. She may have to take over management of the family finances, if he is a spendthrift or simply a poor manager.

Finally, both husband and wife have a right to expect the help of the other, through prayer, example, and encouragement, to lead a virtuous life that will one day be rewarded in heaven. Marriage is intended to provide not only for the procreation and education of children, but also for mutual assistance by the spouses in the reaching of the goals of life, intermediate and ultimate.

Duties of Parents. The duties of parents and children are likewise mutual. The parents have a duty to love, educate, and provide for their children to the best of their ability, and children have a duty to love, respect, and obey their parents in all things lawful. In loving and taking an active interest in their children as they grow up parents should present a united front in dealing with them; one parent should not seek to win them as allies against the other. This united front is destroyed if the parents quarrel or speak ill of each other in the children's presence. Such quarreling infringes also upon the children's right to have a harmonious home in which to grow up.

Fairness in treatment of the children is another duty of parents. They cannot be partial to one and indifferent to the others, e.g., stepchildren. The whole family, however, parents and brothers and sisters, may well vie with each other to shower love upon one who is, for example, physically or mentally handicapped.

That is not true love which treats children as if they were mere extensions of the parents, instead of being individuals with their own responsibilities and eternal destiny. Thus, punishment administered to the children by the school or the court may reflect upon the training parents have given, but parents cannot complain of a violation of their rights when their children are held accountable for delinquency. Love needs to be moderate, not excessive; giving in on everything may hurt the child, either at the time, or later in life when he or she discovers that the rest of the world does not give in so easily.

Nagging the children, treating them harshly, and provoking them to anger by calling them vile names, all too often produces a rebellious attitude in children, which may result in their running away from home or their truancy from school to spite the parents, and, later, in more serious delinquency. On the other hand, regular rules of conduct and reasonable orders or suggestions regarding the running of the home, given after one has secured the children's attention, joined with moderate praise for good work done, develop an attitude of obedience to law as well as a sense of responsibility and of accomplishment.

The education of the children, if it is to be a progressive and harmonious development of all their faculties, has both spiritual and physical aspects. As to the former, the parents owe it to the children and to society to give them that religious and moral training without which they will not have those inner controls necessary for social living. Until these controls become second nature it may be necessary from time to time to correct the children, but physical punishment administered in anger, or in public, thus downgrading them in the eyes of their group, defeats its own purpose, as it draws the children's attention away from the reason for the punishment to its attendant circumstances. Disapproval of a child's conduct by a loved and loving parent is the best discipline, particularly when the reason for the disapproval is explained. When correcting conduct that is not acceptable, the parents do well always to remember that while they are correcting the fault they continue to love the child who has committed it.

When the children have questions the parents owe it to them to give honest and serious answers so far as they are able, and to direct them to sources from which they can obtain such further enlightenment as is necessary and proper. If this is not done, the child may be forced to get information, often inaccurate, elsewhere.

Besides giving good example as to the relative importance of spiritual and material things, of the law of God and the maxims of the world, parents should develop in their children sound judgment regarding companions, reading material, and entertainment, realizing that as the children grow older the parents will not always be available to advise them. They should also train their children to have respect for their own property and for that of others, lest later they become involved in vandalism.

The physical development of children requires protection of the life not only of the mother and fetus but also of infants too young and weak to care for themselves. It requires, further, and for some years, provision of food, clothing, and shelter in keeping with the economic condition of the family, at least to the extent that the law enforces contracts for such "necessaries." Bodily development demands that the children have such exercise and engage in such labor as is suitable to their years, not being subjected to that overprotection that would leave them so poorly developed that they could not pass a physical test.

The parents have a duty to provide for the children's future, so far as they are able. This means seeing that they achieve a place in life suited to their temperament and aptitudes. They ought to be given an opportunity for such training, academic or in a trade, as will enable them later on to care for themselves in suitable fashion. Children will also need advice as to their choice of a state of life. Parents should not, however, interfere with the children's choices, except to the extent that their continued support is needed by the parents because of age or illness and requires the postponement of the pursuit of other objectives.

Duties of Children. Children, for their part, also have duties with regard to their parents, to each other, and to the society in which they live. They have a duty to love their parents in thought, word, and deed. There can be no question of hating, despising, or cursing parents, using harsh words to them, slandering them, or wishing them ill or dead. Striking them, provoking them to anger, mocking them, pretending not to recognize them if they are poor and shabbily dressed, or turning them out of the house, when they are not upsetting the family of the child with whom they may be living, is unconscionable. Further, children owe it to their parents not to sadden them greatly by consorting with evil companions, keeping unreasonably late hours, or neglecting their studies or training for a job. They have, also, a duty to help their parents when they are in need, whether spiritual or corporal.

OBEDIENCE is required of children, in all things licit, as long as they are at home and a part of the domestic society. When a parent gives a real command regarding a serious matter, the child is bound in conscience to obey. The matter is to be regarded as serious when disobedience would involve harm to the children, or to the family. Real commands, however, are not to be identified with what is intended only by way of counsel, or as an expression of preference. Similarly, obedience requires children who are not yet emancipated not to leave home unreasonably.

Obedience is also due, proportionately, to other persons who stand in loco parentis, i.e., guardians, older brothers and sisters who have taken over the responsibilities of their deceased parents, other relatives, and teachers.

Among themselves the children have mutual duties and rights to love, assistance, and protection in keeping with their developing abilities.

Bibliography: T. A. IORIO, Theologia moralis, 3 v. (5th ed. Naples 1960) v. 2. B. H. MERKELBACH, Summa theologiae moralis, 3 v. (8th ed. Paris 1949). D. JOHNSON, Marriage Counseling (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1961).

[T. O. MARTIN]

PIETY, GIFT OF

The gift of the Holy Spirit that perfects the acts of the infused virtues of religion and piety. By religion, one worships God as the Creator; the gift of piety moves the soul to venerate God as the Father of mankind. Thus the gift elevates the soul to approach God more perfectly than religion does. The infused virtue of piety prompts the soul to acts of respect for the members of one's own family. But the gift of piety raises this tendency to a higher plane, moving a person to acts of respect for those who belong to his spiritual family, all his fellow children of God. Three Beatitudes flow from the gift of piety: meekness, because it removes the obstacles to piety; justice, because piety perfects its work; mercy, because piety is exercised in its works. Goodness and benignity are piety's direct fruits, because it causes them; piety's indirect fruit is meekness, which removes impediments to acts of piety.

See Also: HOLY SPIRIT, GIFTS OF; RELIGION, VIRTUE OF.

Bibliography: B. FROGET, The Indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the Souls of the Just, tr. S. A. RAEMERS (Westminster, Md. 1950). A. ROYO, The Theology of Christian Perfection, ed. and tr. J. AUMANN (Dubuque, Iowa 1962) 447–454. R. CESSARIO, Christian Faith and the Theological Life (Washington, D.C. 1996). S. PINCKAERS, The Sources of Christian Ethics, tr. M. T. NOBLE (3d rev. ed.; Washington, D.C. 1995).

[P. F. MULHERN]

PIFFL, FRIEDRICH GUSTAV

Cardinal, archbishop of Vienna; b. Lanškroun (Landskron), Bohemia, Oct. 15, 1864; d. Vienna, April 21, 1932. The son of a bookbinder, he entered the CANONS REGULAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE at KLOSTERNEUBURG monastery (1883), was ordained (1888), and then took an active part in the parochial and educational work of the monastery before becoming its provost (1907). He became archbishop of Vienna (1913), apostolic administrator of Innsbruck (1922), and cardinal (1914). Charges of modernism were leveled against him by supporters of INTEGRALISM at that time, but they lacked foundation and had no effect. Thoroughly loyal to the monarchy and the emperor throughout World War I, as were the other bishops of AUSTRIA, Piffel urged Catholics to support the new Austrian Republic (Nov. 12, 1918). Known as the "people's bishop" because of his keen interest in the spiritual and material welfare of his flock, he played an important role in developing the Catholic response to the social problems of his day. Unpretentious and mild, he was the active leader of Austrian Catholics during two difficult decades.

Bibliography: A. M. KNOLL, Kardinal Fr. G. Piffel und der österreichische Episkopat zu sozialen und kulturellen Fragen (Vienna 1932). Neue österreichische Biographie, v. 9 (Vienna 1956) 175–187.

[W. B. SLOTTMAN]

PIGGE, ALBERT (PIGHIUS)

Theologian and humanist; b. Kampen, province of Overijssel, Netherlands, c. 1490; d. Utrecht, Dec. 29, 1542. Pigge studied at LOUVAIN where he became master of arts in 1509, but the date of his ordination is unknown. After a stay of several years in Paris, he went to Rome in 1522. Through his writings, as an adviser to papal nuncios, and by his participation in religious dialogues, he contributed much to the Catholic position in the 16th century.

Within the Church he belongs to the most caustic exponents of the papal system, which he especially defended in his principal work, Hierarchiae ecclesiasticae assertio (Cologne 1538). On the problem of JUSTIFICATION he supported the viewpoint of double JUSTICE, which was condemned at the Council of TRENT. His interpretation of papal infallibility went far beyond the then-current opinion and questioned even the possibility that a pope could be capable of HERESY. By his thorough study of the cases of LIBERIUS, ANASTASIUS II, HONORIUS I, and JOHN XXII, he attempted to prove that no pope had been a heretic. His views were accepted by many theologians, especially Robert BELLARMINE, and he was one of the more frequently quoted authors at the Council of Trent.

Pigge's critical examination of sources won him a recognized place in Church history. His theory that the acts of the councils of NICAIA II and CONSTANTINOPLE IV, which condemned Pope Honorius I, had been falsified was still current even in the 19th century. Several of his works, De libero hominis arbitrio (Cologne 1542) and the disputed passage on original sin in his Controversiarum praecipuarum . . . explicatio (Cologne 1541), were placed on the Lisbon INDEX of 1624.

Bibliography: Works. A. PIGGE, Adversus novam Marci Beneventani astronomiam (Paris 1522); Apologia indicti a Paulo III . . . concilii (Paris 1538); Adversus furiosissimum libellum Henrici Angliae regis et senatus eius in Concilium Tridentinum. Diariorum, actorum, epistularum, tractatum nova collectio, ed. GÖRRES-GESELLSCHAFT (Freiburg 1901–38) 12:774–810. Literature. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 12.2:2094–2104. H. JEDIN, Studien über die Schriftstellertätigkeit Albert Piggés (Münster 1931). L. PFEIFER, Ursprung der katholischen Kirche und Zugehörigkeit zur Kirche nach Albert Pigge (Würzburg 1938). J. FEINER, Die Erbsündenlehre Albert Piggés (Zurich 1940). R. BÄUMER, "Die Wiederantdeckung der Honoriusfrage im Abendland," Römische Quartalschrift für Christliche Altertumskunde und für Kirchengeschichte 56 (1961) 200–214; "Die Auseinandersetzungen über die römische Petrustradition in den ersten Jahrzehnten der Reformationszeit," ibid. 57 (1962) 20–57, esp. 51–56; Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 8:502.

[R. BÄUMER]

PIGNATELLI, JOSEPH MARY, ST.

Spanish Jesuit who lived in exile in Italy after his expulsion from Spain (April 3, 1767) and the order's suppression (July 21, 1773) and who became a rallying point for his displaced brethren during the long period before the restoration (Aug. 17, 1814); b. Saragossa, Spain, Dec. 27, 1737; d. San Pantaleone, Rome, Italy, Nov. 11, 1811.

Early Years. Joseph's father, Don Antonio Pignatelli, was of the ducal house of Monteleone in Calabria; his mother, Marquesa Francisca Moncayo, was descended from the Spanish counts of Fuente. His mother died when Joseph was five and his father, four years later. Don Joaquín, the eldest of the eight children, assumed charge of Joseph and his younger brother Nicolás, another future Jesuit. For a time the boys live with a married sister, the countess of Acerra, and then, by special arrangement with the JESUITS at Saragossa, as the first resident students at their school; Father José Moreno was appointed their special instructor. Pignatelli, not yet 16, entered the Jesuit novitiate in Tarragona after securing the king's permission as was required of members of the nobility. During his studies at Calatyud (1756–59) and Saragossa (1760–63) he attained eminent success; but he contracted tuberculosis, which afflicted him with varying severity for the rest of his life. After ordination (1762) and the completion of his studies, he taught at Saragossa and served as chaplain of the prison. His merciful attention to those who awaited execution earned him the title "Padre of the Condemned." Pignatelli and a companion would walk beside the sled to which the doomed man was lashed, holding a cloth sling under his head to keep it from pounding painfully on the cobbled street.

Edict of Expulsion. Pignatelli's unsuspected capacity for leadership was first tested in the Cloak and Sombroero Riots that flared in Saragossa and Madrid. His success in dissuading enraged Saragossans from arson and bloodshed was gratefully commended by Charles III, until his chief minister Pedro Pablo Aranda portrayed Pignatelli as the instigator of the rioting. This and similar distortions of Jesuit activities led to the edict of expulsion that was read to all Jesuits in Spain at dawn, April 3, 1767. Father Soldevilla, rector of Saragossa, judging himself unequal to the crisis, transferred his authority to Pignatelli, who, with his priest brother Nicolás, refused the offers of royal agents to return to their homes. The entire Jesuit province of Aragon converged on the port of Tarragona, where the provincial transferred his own extensive authority to Pignatelli, who in vain pleaded youthful inexperience. The assignment was to last "as long as the emergency." In the flotilla of 13 ships, carrying 600 Jesuits to Civitavecchia, Italy, Pignatelli ferried from ship to ship to counsel and console the exiles.

At Civitavecchia, the Jesuits were refused entry because no authorization to disembark had been secured by the Madrid government. They then sought asylum in Corsica, first unsuccessfully at Bastia, where the ships waited offshore for 18 days because of an insurrection on land, then at Ajaccio, where a small Jesuit college, a Franciscan residence, and some vacant buildings lodged the exiles. From that time on Pignatelli's unfailing genius for providing food and shelter became a legend. Although his wealthy sister the countess of Acerra later aided with substantial sums, neither his family's generosity nor other sources of money known to his closest associates could fully account for the fact that funds were always sufficient.

After three weeks in Ajaccio the ships brought the refugees to San Bonifacio at the southern end of the island. There they remained until Corsica fell under French control 11 months later. The law that had banished the Jesuits from France in 1762 then drove them to the Ligurian Coast near Genoa, one of the few places in southwestern Europe where the Jesuits were not under Bourbon quarantine. When they disembarked Pignatelli learned that CLEMENT XIII, whose representatives had prevented their landing at Civitavecchia, would give them asylum at Ferrara 300 miles away. In that city Monsignor Francesco Pignatelli awaited them with hospitality that was typical of the family. As soon as Pignatelli had settled his exiles, by then doubled in number by Jesuits evicted from the missions of Mexico and Peru, he arranged class schedules and other academic projects before leaving for Rome to report to the general, Lorenzo RICCI.

Exile at Bologna. When CLEMENT XIV issued the brief of suppression in 1773, the Jesuits in Ferrara were disbanded and Pignatelli went to Bologna to live in enforced retirement. Forbidden to exercise the sacred ministry, he devoted his time to prayer, study, and collecting books and manuscripts on the history of the society; the library reached a total of 3,000 volumes. Many former Jesuits who gathered in Bologna were assisted by Pignatelli in finding employment and the means of subsistence. Upon hearing that the society had survived in Russia, he secured permission from PIUS VI to rejoin the order there.

However, he was prevented by a physical breakdown brought on by worry over his brother Nicolás, who indulged himself beyond his means and after a period of dissipation was sent to prison. When Nicolás was dying in Venice years later, Joseph overcame his resistance to grace and received him again into the order.

Eve of Restoration. The first effective step in restoring the Jesuits was taken in 1788 by Duke Ferdinand of Parma, who had been unable to take action earlier because of the opposition of his uncle Charles III of Spain. When Charles died, Ferdinand, with the encouragement of Pignatelli, secured the approval of Pius VI; of the Jesuit general in White Russia, Thaddeus Brzozowski (1749–1820); and of the new king, Charles IV of Spain, to establish a vice province in the Duchy of Parma to be attached to White Russia. In Parma on July 6, 1797, Pignatelli renewed his solemn profession and reentered the Society of Jesus. Duke Ferdinand was later poisoned, probably by enemies of the society, and died in Pignatelli's arms.

On Feb. 20, 1798, Pius VI was seized in Rome by French troops and hurried to Valence, France, where he succumbed to ill treatment. While he was being brought through Florence in chains Pignatelli eased his destitution with a substantial sum referred to by PIUS XI in the decree of beatification: "It gives me the opportunity as the eleventh Pope Pius to requite him in a measure for his memorable act of mercy to my predecessor in his distress, the sixth pontiff of my name."

Provincial of Italy. During this meeting Pius VI authorized Pignatelli to receive novices at Parma. As master of novices, Pignatelli directed their training with his characteristic gentleness. The novitiate was moved to Colorno, where, on May 7, 1803, he received word from the general in St. Petersburg that he was appointed provincial of Italy. Pignatelli, who had held great numbers of Jesuits together in northern Italy, as provincial of Italy sought to extend the society into the south. With authorization from PIUS VII, on Dec. 3, 1804, he presided at the restoration of the society in the Gesù in Naples, where 170 former members reentered the order. Despite crowded quarters this assemblage of aging Italian, French, German, Spanish, Portuguese, and American Jesuits resumed their work and prayer. The decree of Napoleon (March 30, 1806) proclaiming his brother Joseph, king of Naples, and the French seizure of the city, again dispersed the Jesuits and brought Pignatelli to Rome, where Pius VII turned over both the Gesù and the Roman College for Jesuit occupancy. Uneasy lest a too much publicized return to Rome incite hostility, Pignatelli purchased an abandoned house behind the Colosseum, named it San Pantaleone, and settled his Jesuits there, so that they escaped notice when Napoleon's forces swept through the city (1808) and carried Pius VII off to Savona and Fontainebleau. From Rome Pignatelli directed the reestablishment of the society in Sardinia (1807) and opened colleges at Rome, Orvieto, and Tivoli.

Last Days. The tuberculosis, which had flared intermittently throughout his life, now hastened the end. He offered his last Mass, Oct. 15, 1811, and received Communion each day thereafter until his death. In a final intimation of the future, Pignatelli, when dying, asked to be carried to the deathbed of Father Aloisi Panizzoni, his predecessor as provincial. He assured Panizzoni that he would not die, but despite his advanced age would succeed him as provincial, take a vital part in the restoration of the order, and live on into the term of his third successor in the provincialate. These events transpired as foretold, and Panizzoni, living into his 90s, was the recipient of the brief of restoration (Aug. 7, 1814). Pignatelli was beatified by Pope Pius XI in 1933 and canonized in 1954 by Pope Pius XII.

Feast: Nov. 28.

Bibliography: C. BECCARI, Il B. Guiseppe Pignatelli (Rome 1933). D. A. HANLY, Blessed Joseph Pignatelli (New York 1937). P. ZURBITU, Blessed Joseph Pignatelli (Bombay 1933). J. NONELL, El ven. José M. Pignatelli y la Compañía de Jesús en su extinción y restablecimiento, 3 v. (Manresa 1893–94). R. NASH, Saint of the Displaced: St. Joseph Pignatelli (Dublin 1955). L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London-St. Louis 1938–61) v.37. J. M. MARCH, El restaurador de la Compañía de Jesús: Beato José Pignatelli y su tiempo, 2 v. (Barcelona 1933–36; 2d ed. 1944). P. DELOOZ, "Canonizations récentes (21 Juin 1951–12 Juin 1960)," Nouvelle revue théologique 82 (Tournai-Louvain-Paris 1960) 723–72. M. BATTIORI, "José Pignatelli el hombre y el santo," Razón y Fe 149 (1954) 512–530. J. SCHAACK, "Saint José Pignatelli, S.J.," Nouvelle revue théologique 76 (Tournai-Louvain-Paris 1956) 673–688. Acta Apostolicae Sedis 46 (Rome 1954) 332–334, 357–358, 360–361, 374–375. H. WOLTER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al. (1966) 8:503. C. TESTORE, Il restauratore della Compagnia di Gesù in Italia: S. Giuseppe Pignatelli, S.J. (1737–1811) (Rome 1954).

[R. F. COPELAND]

PIKE, WILLIAM, BL.

Lay martyr; b. in Dorset; hanged, drawn, and quartered Dec. 22, 1591 at Dorchester. He lived on the Moors, near Christchurch, Hampshire, and was an Anglican. On his way home from Dorchester one day, probably in 1586, he met Bl. Thomas Pilcher who convinced him of the truth of Catholicism. Thereafter he was reconciled to the Roman Church, and it was for this that he was arrested. At his trial he was asked to apostatize in order to save his life and that of his family, but refused, saying that it did not become a son of Mr. Pilcher to do so. Feast: Feb. 12. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

PILATE, PONTIUS

Roman procurator of Judea who condemned Jesus to be crucified. He was a Roman equestrian of the Samnite clan of the Pontii; hence his nomen Pontius. The meaning of his cognomen Pilatus is uncertain; his personal or first name is not known. In A.D. 26 the Roman Emperor TIBERIUS appointed him procurator of Judea, Samaria, and Idumea, subject to the legate (governor) of Syria. In 1961 a Latin inscription containing the words Pontius Pilatus praefectus Judaeae was discovered at CAESAREA IN PAL-ESTINE [see Journal of Biblical Literature 811 (1962) 70–71].

Soon after his arrival in Palestine, Pilate offended the religious sensibilities of the Jews by having Roman troops carry into Jerusalem military standards bearing the emperor's image. The outraged Jews forced him to remove the images after five days (Josephus, Bell. Jud. 2.9.2–4; Ant. 18.3.1–2). When he hung votive shields inscribed with the emperor's name in Herod's palace in Jerusalem, Herod's four sons protested to Tiberius, who ordered the shields to be taken to a temple in Caesarea (Philo, Leg. ad Gaium 38). His other crimes against the inhabitants of Palestine included the financing of a Jerusalem aqueduct with money from the Temple treasury (Josephus, Ant. 18.3.2), the slaughtering of some Galileans who were subjects of HEROD ANTIPAS (Lk 13.1; 23.12), the minting of coins bearing pagan religious symbols, and, in A.D. 36, the attacking of armed Samaritans on Mt. Garizim. The Samaritans appealed to Vitellius, Legate of Syria, who ordered Pilate back to Rome to stand trial for cruelty and oppression. The Jewish attitude toward Pilate is further shown in a letter from Herod Agrippa I to Caligula, describing him as inflexible, merciless, and corrupt, and accusing him of executing men without proper trial (Philo, Leg. ad Gaium, 38). According to an uncertain tradition reported by Eusebius, Pilate killed himself on orders from Caligula in A.D. 30 (Ecclesiastical History 2.7; Chronicles ad annum 39 AD).

Philo and Josephus were very likely prejudiced, but Pilate's cruelty and injustice are exemplified also in the Gospel accounts of the TRIAL OF JESUS. All four Gospels describe Pilate's weak submission to the unjust accusations against Jesus and do not excuse Pilate in order to curry Roman favor. They portray him as superstitious, vacillating, and hostile to the Jews.

Justin (Apol. 1.35.9; 1.48.3) and Tertullian (Apol. 5.2; 21.24) mention an official report sent by Pilate to Tiberius purporting to be about the life and death of Jesus. It is doubtful if a genuine report of such a nature ever existed. In any case, the so-called reports of Pilate to the Roman emperors that are contained in the apocrypha are certainly spurious. The chief apocrypha about Pilate are the Acts of Pilate, Letter of Pilate to Claudius, Letter of Pilate to Tiberius, Anaphora Pilati, and Paradosis Pilati. The legends in these works led the Abyssinian Copts to honor Pilate as a saint (feast, June 25). His wife, traditionally called Claudia Proc(u)la, is venerated as a saint by the Greeks (feast, Oct. 27).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible 1856–57, 1880. J. BLINZLER et al., *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*² 8:504–506. J. BLINZLER, The Trial of Jesus, tr. I. and F. MCHUGH (Westminster, MD 1959) 3–9, 177–184.

[F. J. BUCKLEY]

PILCHER, THOMAS, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. ca. 1557 at Battle, Sussex, England; hanged, drawn, and quartered March 21, 1587 at Tyburn or Dorchester. Pilcher earned his master's degree (1579) at Balliol College, Oxford, but resigned his fellowship in 1580. In November 1581, he began study in Rheims and was ordained priest at Laon in March 1583. That same year he went back to England to work in Hampshire and Dorset. In 1585, he was arrested and banished, but returned almost immediately to serve another two years before being apprehended in March 1587. Such was his zeal that during his two-week imprisonment at Dorchester, he converted 30 people to Catholicism. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

“Christ Before Pilate,” from polyptych known as the “Liesborn Altarpiece,” by Master of Cappenberg, c. 1525, National Gallery, London. (©National Gallery Collection/CORBIS)

PILGRIM HOLINESS CHURCH

A church in the Holiness tradition with a strong emphasis on the Wesleyan principles of sanctification of believers and evangelistic missionary work. In 1897 Martin Wells Knapp, a Methodist minister in Cincinnati, Ohio, organized the International Apostolic Holiness Union to restore the primitive spirit of John WESLEY on "apostolic practices, methods, power and success." Twenty-five years later the International Holiness Church (derived from the Union) joined with the like-minded Pilgrim Church of California to become the Pilgrim Holiness Church. In 1968, the Wesleyan Methodist Church merged with the Pilgrim Holiness Church.

The church's stress on sanctification is based on Wesley's teaching that once a person is justified he may grow in holiness through his generous response to the Indwelling Spirit. This "second blessing" adds a sense of security that the sinner is now reconciled with God, and gives him an emotional experience that is unmistakable. In its accent on "true Wesleyanism," the Pilgrim Holiness Church holds that sanctification is both possible and commendable; that man's sinfulness has not deprived him of the capacity for a willing cooperation with grace. The church also professes belief in millennialism, i.e., the belief in the early Second Coming of Christ (see PAROUSIA). The Pilgrim Holiness Church further believes that the Second Coming will precede this 1000-year period of the highest spiritual and material blessings on earth as a prelude to the end of the world.

Bibliography: F. S. MEAD, S. S. HILL and C. D. ATWOOD, eds., Handbook of Denominations in the United States, 11th ed (Nashville 2001).

[J. A. HARDON/EDS.]

PILGRIM OF PASSAU

Missionary bishop, of the noble Aribo family of Bavaria; d. Passau, May 21, 991. The nephew of Abp. Frederick of Salzburg, he was educated in the monastic school of St. Pirmin, in NIEDERALTAICH; he became bishop of Passau in 971. When Henry the Wrangler, Duke of Bavaria, rebelled against OTTO II, Pilgrim remained steadfast on the side of the Emperor. As bishop he was gifted chiefly in the field of administration, as was shown in the reconstruction of churches and monasteries and in the restoration of Catholic life in great areas of his diocese, destroyed by Hungarian hordes. Pilgrim met the danger of fresh barbarian attacks by undertaking, on a grand scale, the task of converting the Hungarians to Christianity. The time was propitious, for the Germans on the west and the Byzantine Empire on the east had by then made it clear to the Hungarians that they had nothing to gain by warlike activities. The Hungarian leader, Geisa, married a Christian princess and was anxious to live in peace with his Christian neighbors. The transition from paganism was made easier by the presence in the area held by the Hungarians of two groups of Christians: a Slavonic element, a surviving remnant of the conquered population, and a Germanic group, a large number of prisoners of war brought home by the barbarians from their earlier successful expeditions. The missionaries sent by Pilgrim enabled these Christians once more to profess the Catholic faith. Not only did Pilgrim send considerable numbers of priests and monks to Hungary, but on occasion he took himself a place in their midst. He was thus in a position to send a personal account of the promising prospects to Rome. There were disappointments and setbacks, however, before the Hungarians, a generation later, were brought into the Christian fold by their own King STEPHEN.

Pilgrim's eagerness to establish dioceses in Hungary and to attach them to Passau as their metropolitan see led him to fabricate charters (the Forgeries of Lorch), showing that Passau, through its connection with Lorch, had an ancient right to archiepiscopal status. It is possible that he busied himself with the translation of old German sagas, especially with a Latin version of the Nibelungenlied, in which a "Bishop Pilgerin" is mentioned.

Bibliography: E. L. DÜMMLER, Pilgrim von Passau und das Erzbisthum Lorch (Leipzig 1854). A. HAUCK, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands 3:163–180. I. ZIBERMAYR, Noricum. Baiern und Oesterreich (Horn 1956). R. BAUERREISS, Kirchengeschichte Bayerns, 2 v. (St. Ottilien 1949–55) 2:142–145. J. OSWALD, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 6:1142; 8:509.

[J. RYAN]

PILGRIMAGE OF GRACE

The name given to a series of uprisings in northern England in the reign of Henry VIII, but especially to the rebellion in Yorkshire in late 1536. The first outbreak, at Louth in Lincolnshire in early October 1536, quickly had most of that count in an uproar but collapsed within three weeks—though not before it had incited the southeast corner of the neighboring county of Yorkshire. Here a much more serious rebellion developed, led by Robert ASKE. By late October Aske had a large force behind him, carrying the banner of St. Cuthbert and badges of the Five Wounds of Our Lord. Had he marched southward he might have broken the king, HENRY VIII. But, insisting that he and his men were pilgrims seeking justice, not rebels, he halted at Doncaster to await a parley with Thomas Howard, Duke of NORFOLK. After six weeks of suspense, Pilgrim “councils” at York and Pontefract drew up a petition to the king that was presented to Norfolk on December 5. Norfolk made insincere promises and announced a dubious royal pardon, whereupon the Pilgrims, trusting Henry’s goodness, disbanded. Two more rebellions broke out in January and February of 1537: one in Yorkshire, led by Sir Francis Bigod; the other in Cumberland. Both failed quickly.

These were sudden, popular, incoherent uprisings. Inevitably there was a wide variety of motives behind them. In particular, landlordism, heavy taxation, regionalism, and political conservatism all played a part. The Lincoln rebels, who recruited little help from either religious or gentry, made no mention of the pope and were even ready, some of them, to accept the Royal Supremacy, while the Yorkshire Pilgrims’ articles included several purely secular demands. Bigod was a Protestant, driven to rebellion by motives far different from Aske’s. The Cumberland peasants were stirred by oppression and hunger. But if these risings were not simply the protest of a Catholic north against the Reformation under Henry, they certainly had a large religious content. The Pilgrims’ articles rejected explicitly the Royal Supremacy, called for a return to Rome (though not to papal fiscalism), and demanded that heresy in England be repressed and the Church’s liberties restored. Above all, both the Lincolnshire and Yorkshire rebels opposed the suppression of the monasteries, then under way, and even asked that dissolved houses be restored. Had material and political motives not been added, the rebellion might have been smaller (and more coherent), but Aske claimed it would still have happened.

No other Tudor faced so large and courageous a domestic challenge as this. Henry bided his time, yielded nothing, and then wreaked terrible vengeance. Hundreds suffered death, including the admirable Aske, a number of religious (including several heads or former heads of houses), and some secular priests. The uprisings provided the excuse to suppress larger monasteries in the north, which had escaped the first act of dissolution.

Bibliography: M. H. and R. DOODS, The Pilgrimage of Grace, 1536–1537, and the Exeter Conspiracy, 1538, 2 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1915), standard work. H. F. M. PRESCOTT, The Man on a Donkey (New York 1952), excellent historical novel about Aske. D. KNOWLES, The Religious Orders in England, 3 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1948–60) v.3. A. G. DICKENS, Lollards and Protestants in the Diocese of York, 1509–1558 (New York 1959), on Bigod.

[J. J. SCARISBRICK]

PILGRIMAGES

A pilgrimage may be described as a journey to a sacred shrine or sanctuary for a religious motive. Such journeys are a common religious phenomenon not restricted to any one people. This composite article examines pilgrimages in the Bible, in the early Christian period (to 600), in the Middle Ages (600 to 1500), and in modern times (1500 to mid-20th century).

1. IN THE BIBLE

Pilgrimages have a long history in the ancient Near East among Semitic peoples; they are as old as the sacred shrines uncovered by archeologists. To these various cultic centers the common man carried a part of the fruits of his land and livestock to offer it to the gods in homage and thanksgiving. The sanctuaries were places believed to be chosen by the gods as special abodes and manifested as such by peculiar natural phenomena (a height, a spring, a tree) or by a THEOPHANY, e.g., Jacob’s dream (Gn 28.10–22).

Some of the Canaanite open-air shrines were merely converted to the use of the Yahwistic cult, e.g., SHECHEM, BETHEL, and Mamre. Because of Israel’s tribal structure one shrine usually served as the central sanctuary, at least for partial confederations of the 12 tribes. The cultic center acted as politico-religious bond, an intertribal focus to which the federated clans periodically came on pilgrimage. At various times Gilgal, Shiloh, Mizpeh, and probably Gibeon served as such local centers. A description of a pilgrimage to a central shrine is found in the prescriptions for offering the first fruits of the grain harvest (Dt 26.1–10; cf. 1 Sm 1.3–7). Jerusalem became the focal point of religious gatherings after King David brought the ARK OF THE COVENANT there. Later, Jeroboam I, King of Israel, in order to have his own cultic centers in the Northern Kingdom, separated from Judah, established sanctuaries for Yahweh at Bethel and the city of Dan (1 Kgs 12.27–30).

Many other local sanctuaries attracted pilgrims during the time of the two kingdoms, as is clear from the preaching of the Prophets who condemned the evil influence of religious syncretism that these shrines fostered. These sanctuaries were destroyed by the centralizing reforms of Hezekiah (2 Kgs 18.4) and Josiah (2 Kgs 23.8–20), Kings of Judah, but flourished again after their deaths.

The custom of sacred pilgrimages was affirmed in ancient Israelite legislation concerning the religious FEASTS. The three hag (pilgrim) festivals, the Feast of PASSOVER, the Hebrew Feast of PENTECOST, and the Feast of BOOTHS (TABERNACLES), were times when the Israelites were commanded to appear before the Lord (Ex 23.14–17; Dt 16.16), a practice parallel to the Arabic HAJJ.

Israelite religious pilgrimages continued during and after the exile [Ps 41(42)]. Josephus (Bell. Jud. 6.9.3) speaks of the large gatherings at Jerusalem to celebrate the feasts of Yahweh. Evidence for them in the New Testament is found in Lk 2.41–42; In 2.13; 5.1; 7.2–10; 12.201; and Acts 2.1–11.

Catholic nuns on a pilgrimage from Italy, Church of the Nativity, Bethlehem, Israel. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Bibliography: R. DE VAUX, Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions, tr. J.MCHUGH (New York 1961) 468–517. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 1858.

[S. M. POLAN]

2. EARLY CHRISTIAN

Journeys to holy places made by Christian men and women between the 1st and the 7th century. These voyages were undertaken to venerate places sanctified by the life of Christ; by the saints, especially the martyrs; or by miracles; and also to beg divine aid and to perform acts of penance or thanksgiving. After the Peace of the Church (313) and all through the 4th century, several events fostered the idea of making a pilgrimage: the honoring of the holy places in Palestine by CONSTANTINE I and his mother, HELENA; the publicity given the Holy Land by JEROME, and the monastic life he helped to foster there; the attention directed to the monastic life in Egypt by such works as ATHANASIUS's Life of Anthony, the anonymous Historia monachorum in Aegypto, and PALLADIUS's Lausiaca History; and, in Rome, the work of Pope DAMASUS I in restoring the catacombs.

Pilgrimages will be treated here in three sections: (1) the Holy Land, the preferred place of pilgrimage; (2) the monasteries of Egypt and the tombs of Rome; and (3) shorter pilgrimages arising from local cults throughout the early Christian world. Despite difficulties of travel in ancient times, pilgrimages, especially to the Holy Land, were not unusual by the end of the 4th century, as the writings of the Fathers frequently attest.

The Holy Land. EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA supplies information on a 2d-century pilgrimage of Bishop MELITO

Pope John Paul II greeting pilgrims during papal visit to Czestochowa, Poland, June 1, 1979. (Archive Photos)

OF SARDES (c. 160) to the land where the Scriptures were enacted (Ecclesiastical History 4.26.14) and on a 3d-century pilgrimage of Bishop Alexander of Cappadocia, who journeyed to Jerusalem (c. 216) in consequence of a vow and for the sake of information about the holy places (ibid. 6.11.2). Eusebius characterized Constantine and Helena as the most noble of pilgrims and described the great works they promoted in the Holy Land between 325 and 330. To Constantine he attributed the finding of the Holy SEPULCHER and the building of a great basilica on its site, and another on the site of Abraham's visit from the angels at Mamre, near Hebron; to Helena he attributed the building of magnificent basilicas on the sites of the Nativity, and of the Ascension from Mt. Olivet (Vita Constantini 3.25–40). Eusebius did not mention Helena's finding the true cross. However, by the end of the 4th century she was credited with this by AMBROSE, JOHN CHRYSOSTOM, Jerome, RUFINUS, the historian Socrates, and Aetheria.

Whether or not she found it, she and her son gave great impetus to the pilgrimage movement, as an increasing number of sources attests. A text of 333 details the stations of a pilgrimage from Bordeaux to Jerusalem and back via Rome to Milan (Geyer, 1–33). SOZOMEN notes that in 351, on the occasion of the appearance of a miraculous cross in the sky above Jerusalem, there were travelers from all parts of the world there for prayer and to visit the places of interest (Ecclesiastical History 4.5). By the end of the 4th century, references to pilgrimages can be found frequently in the FATHERS OF THE CHURCH, who especially valued them because they brought one to the land of the Sacred Scriptures. In a letter to a group of virgins who had returned from a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, Athanasius introduced a theme that was to become familiar: they can remain with Christ by a holy life, although they have left the scenes of His earthly life [ed. J. Lebon, Muséon 41 (1928) 170–203]. John Chrysostom spoke of the efficacy of pilgrimages in arousing devotion (In Phil., Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 62:702–03).

Jerome has probably made himself the most famous of early Christian pilgrims to the Holy Land, not only as a resident there for over 30 years, but also as its most prolific writer and the greatest Scripture scholar of his age. He influenced the aristocratic Roman ladies PAULA, EUSTOCHIUM, and both MELANIA the Elder and the Younger to establish monasteries there. His own words show the impetus he was capable of giving to the pilgrimage movement, by pointing out the benefits to be derived from journeys to holy places:

Just as one understands the Greek historians better when one has seen Athens, or the third book of Virgil when one has sailed to Troas or Sicily . . . so we also understand Scripture better when we have seen Judea with our own eyes, and discovered what still remains of . . . ancient towns That is why myself took care to travel through this land [Praef., In lib. Paralip.]

His friends Paula and Eustochium witness to the appeal of Christian pilgrimaging:

Here one can see the most important people from everywhere . . . the best known in Gaul The Briton . . . comes . . . to seek a city which he knows . . . by what he has read of it in the Holy Scriptures. What shall we say of the Armenians, Persians, peoples of India and Ethiopia, from Egypt, . . . Pontus, Cappadocia, Coele-Syria, Mesopotamia and all the crowds from the East? . . . We shall be able to enter with you the cave of the Savior, weep at the Sepulchre, . . . kiss the wood of the cross, ascend . . . the Mount of Olives [Jerome, Epist. 46.]

Much more celebrated now than in her own time is the pilgrim nun Aetheria, famous for her account of the celebration of the liturgy in Jerusalem when she visited there (395) and for the extent of her travels, which included upper Syria as far as Edessa, the Sinaitic peninsula, and Egypt. Other noted Holy Land pilgrims also visited the DESERT FATHERS in Egypt; Rufinus and Melanie the Elder (371–372); Cassian (c. 385); Jerome (386); Palladius (388); the anonymous author of the Historia monachorum (394); Sylvania, sister-in-law of the Consul Rufinus (c. 396); and Postumianus, disciple of Sulpicius Severus (401–404). Some of the 5th-century abbots of Lérins seem to have been Palestine pilgrims (Acta Sanctorum June 1:75–78; January 2:18–19). From the 5th or 6th century comes an enumeration of the sanctuaries of Jerusalem (Geyer, 151–155). The De situ terrae sanctae of Theodosius, an archdeacon from North Africa (c. 520–530; Geyer, 135–150), and an account of several pilgrims from Piacenza to Palestine (c. 560–570; Geyer, 157–218) are witnesses to the continued flow of pilgrims to Palestine through the 6th century.

One of the strongest witnesses to the popularity of early Christian pilgrimages and to sound teaching concerning them lies in the frequent warnings the Fathers uttered against their abuse: St. John Chrysostom (Ad pop. Antioch hom. 3, Patrologia Graeca 49:49), St. Jerome (Epist. 58), St. Augustine (Epist. 160), and especially St. Gregory of Nyssa (Epist. 2).

Pilgrimages to Egypt and Rome. In the 4th century, monasticism proved to be a link between Egypt and Palestine, the two famous places of early Christian pilgrimage. Athanasius's Life of Anthony not only fostered the monastic movement throughout the Mediterranean world but also drew pilgrims to seek counsel from the austere Desert Fathers. Those of Nitria, some 50 miles south of Alexandria, were fairly accessible, but as the author of the Historia monachorum relates, the journey to the THEBAID was arduous and dangerous. He had made it; so also did the intrepid Aetheria.

Although in the first six centuries Rome had not the same importance for pilgrimages as the Holy Land, the graffiti on the walls of the catacombs witness to a steady stream of pilgrims. The tombs of Peter and Paul were equally objects of pilgrimage, often made by visitors who had come to Rome on business. Polycarp of Smyrna visited Rome c. 150; both Abercius of Hierapolis in Phrygia (c. 216) and Origen seem to have made a sort of pilgrimage (c. 212), “desiring to see the most ancient church of Rome” (Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 6.14). As in the case of the Holy Land, it was after the Peace of the Church that Roman pilgrimages increased. In the second half of the 4th century, Pope Damasus gave impetus to the movement by architectural restorations in the catacombs and by the inscriptions he had carved on the tombs. Jerome tells of his own visits to the catacombs when he was a youth studying in Rome and of the crowds of pilgrims: “Where save at Rome do they crowd with such frequency to the churches and sepulchres of the martyrs?” (Comm. in Ezech. 12.50; Comm. in Epist. Galat. 2). Ambrose (Hymnus 15) and Prudentius (Peristephanon 12) are among the many witnesses to the vast streams of pilgrims who flocked to Rome for the feast of Saints Peter and Paul on June 29.

This pilgrimage and others throughout the Christian world often gave rise to feasting and merrymaking, against which the clergy constantly had to preach. Prudentius in his Peristephanon is witness to a full flowering of the cult of the martyrs and the important role of pilgrimages in the century after the persecution of DIOCLETIAN and the Peace of the Church. He was especially moved by the great pilgrimages to Rome on the feast of the Passion of St. Hippolytus (Peristephanon 11). A dramatic feature of Roman PILGRIMAGES in the 4th century were those of Roman emperors to the tombs of the Apostles. The writings of John Chrysostom (Patrologia Graeca 61:582) and St. Augustine are among the witnesses to these events. In the words of St. Augustine: “. . . the emperor comes to Rome: whither does he hasten? To the temple of the emperor, or to the memorial of the Fisherman?” (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 37:1830). In 450 Valentinian III came to Rome, according to Pope Leo the Great, “to seek the Fisherman’s intercession” (Patrologia Latina 54:858). A steady stream of pilgrims to Rome seems to have continued unabated into the Middle Ages. At the opening of the 6th century, Pope Symmachus (498–514) built three hospices near the tombs of Saints Peter, Paul, and Lawrence. Later in the century, Gregory of Tours speaks of Roman pilgrimages from Gaul and describes an activity commonly connected with them, that of procuring relics for local shrines (De gloria martyrum 1.28).

Local Pilgrimages. Not far from Rome, at Imola and at Nola, pilgrimage cults in honor of the martyrs Cassian (Prudentius, Peristephanon 9) and Felix (Paulinus, Carmina, Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum v.30) spread during the 4th century. By the end of that century, the cult of St. Felix was greatly extended by the devotion of the noted aristocrat and poet PAULINUS, who retired to the monastery he had built at Nola and celebrated in his poetry the throngs of pilgrims who came there, among them the noted Bishop NICETAS OF REMESIANA (Carmen 17). Important pilgrimage centers grew up in Gaul also. By the middle of the 4th century, a shrine had been established near the site of the martyrdom of St. Maurice and his THEBAN LEGION in Valais, Switzerland (d. probably c. 286). Pilgrims returning from Rome and, above all, pilgrims seeking cures came in such numbers that by the middle of the 5th century a large hostelry and infirmary had been built, and by the 6th, the still famous Abbey of SAINT-MAURICE d’Agaune. The late 4th century saw also the rise of Gaul’s most extraordinary center of devotion and pilgrimage—the tomb of St. Martin at Tours. Gregory of Tours, who was one of Martin’s most devoted episcopal successors, witnesses two centuries later to the unceasing stream of pilgrims to the tomb. They range from the Frankish King Chlotar (c. 560), making atonement for the murder of his son, to the simple youth Wulflaicus from Lombardy, who was so moved by the grace of his visit to Tours that he became an austere hermit near Yvois and converted many in the surrounding region (Hist. Francorum 8.15–16). In 5th-century Arles the throngs of pilgrims passing between the two shrines of St. Genesis on his feast were so great they broke the bridge over which they crossed (Patrologia Latina 50:1273–76).

Patristic literature bears witness that pilgrimages became an established part of Christian devotion, whether they involved traversing a city or more than half of the civilized world. The early Christian centuries gave the movement an impetus that took it well into the Middle Ages.

Bibliography: P. GEYER, ed., Itinera Hierosolymitana saeculi IV–VIII (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum (Vienna 1866–) 39; 1898). Library of the Palestine Pilgrims' Text Society, 13 v. (London 1890–97). F. STUMMER, ed., Monumenta historiam et geographiam Terrae Sanctae illustrantia (Florilegium Patristicum 41; 1935). EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, and Vita Constantini, Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 20:45–1440. SOCRATES, Ecclesiastical History, and SOZOMEN, Ecclesiastical History, Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1857–66) 67:29–1630. E. R. BARKER, Rome of the Pilgrims and Martyrs (London 1913). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 14.1:65–176. G. BARDY, Analecta Bollandiana 67 (1949) 224–235. B. KÖTTING, Peregrinatio religiosa (Münster 1950). A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds. Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935–) v.3, tr. E. MESSENGER (New York 1950) 504–512. J. M. THEURILLAT, L'Abbaye de St-Maurice d'Agaune, des origines à la réforme canoniale, 515–830 (Sion, Switzerland 1954). F. VAN DER MEER and C. MOHRMANN, Atlas of the Early Christian World, ed. and tr. M. F. HEDLUND and H. H. ROWLEY (New York 1958). H. LHARKAMP, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:822–824.

[M. C. MCCARTHY]

3. MEDIEVAL AND MODERN

Pilgrimages in the sense of journeys to SHRINES or holy places for veneration, either to obtain favors through the intercession of the saints honored there or to render thanks for favors received, are a phenomenon common to all civilizations. In the Christian world they developed in all countries and in many fashions. As indicated above, the earliest documents of the pilgrimage as an institution link its origin with the veneration of places where Christ lived and of His tomb, the Holy SEPULCHER, in Jerusalem. But very soon pilgrimages began to be made also to the tombs of the earliest martyrs, “witnesses” of Christ. Well before the time of St. Augustine, who spoke very clearly on the point, it was held that complete remission of sins was obtained by going to the tomb of a martyr and meditating there.

Goals of Pilgrimages. If one excludes Jerusalem, the bodies of SS. Peter and Paul in Rome were the primary attraction for Christian pilgrims (see PILGRIMAGES, ROMAN). Later, alleged tombs of other martyrs came to be venerated, especially that of the Apostle JAMES (SON OF ZEBEDEE), once his supposed tomb was discovered in Galicia at Campus stellae, hence Compostela, in 830 (see SANTIAGO DE COMPOSTELA).

Soon pilgrimages acquired varied and diverse goals. The faithful began to venerate the tombs of nonmartyrs, e.g., those of the confessors MARTIN OF TOURS in Gaul (the most popular of all) and NICHOLAS OF MYRA, whose body was transported to Bari, Italy, in the 11th century, and much later those of SERGIUS OF RADONEZH in Russia and the saintly Jean VIANNEY in the Lyonnais, as well as the tombs of such penitents as Mary Magdalene in Sainte-Baume, Provence (see SAINT-MAXIMIN, ABBEY OF).

Pilgrimages were made also to places hallowed as the result of a reputed supernatural apparition. Thus it seems that from the 6th century many pilgrims went to Monte Gargano in Apulia, made famous by an apparition of the archangel Michael. After 710 pilgrims went for the same reason to MONT-SAINT-MICHEL on the borders of Normandy and Brittany.

There were also pilgrimages in honor of the Virgin Mary, Mother of God. Although they originated later than the early pilgrimages to the Holy Sepulcher or tombs of saints in general, certain Marian pilgrimages are obviously very old, dating back at least to the Frankish period so far as the West is concerned; e.g., Ambronay in Burgundy dates from the 7th century at least; EINSIEDELN in Switzerland goes back to 954; while Savona (near Genoa, Italy) claims to have received pilgrims as early as the age of Constantine.

Origins of Pilgrimage Shrines. Many pilgrim shrines owe their renown to origins so legendary that it is difficult to sift out the historical truth. More than one such shrine coincides with the site of a holy place that was previously a pagan shrine, e.g., at Fourvière (Lyons) a statue of Mercury was honored before that of the Virgin. Many new shrines have appeared even in modern times in the wake of revelations—quite often impossible to verify—made in dreams to simple folk. The sanctuary of St. Anne in Auray, France, was begun in the early 17th century by a simple Breton peasant, Yves Nicolazic, in obedience to repeated visions. In the following century it was a child who “discovered” the picture of the Virgin painted on a rock in Concepción, Chile. The miraculous icon of Tenos was found in the 19th century as a result of the dream of a Greek nun. Each of these events was the beginning of a new pilgrimage. Weeping statues, such as the “Regina sanctorum omnium” in the cathedral at Ancona during the French invasion in 1796 or the majolica madonna in a street in Syracuse, Italy, in 1953, have also resulted in pilgrimages.

Popular piety creates new sites of pilgrimage with disconcerting spontaneity, neither seeking nor tolerating, in many cases, counsels of prudence or warnings from the hierarchy. "We have learned," wrote WILLIAM DE GRENEFIELD, the archbishop of York in 1313, "that a statue of the Blessed Virgin newly installed in the parish church of Foston is stirring up many simple souls as if something divine were more apparent in this statue than in others." Every new instance of this sort raises the possibility that the unenlightened faithful will be victimized by illusions or fall into superstition.

In modern times Marian apparitions in rapid succession have generated immense new shrines and places of pilgrimage, whose renown has eclipsed that of the more ancient and traditional sites, e.g., Fatima has evidently eclipsed Compostela. But Marian pilgrimages are hardly all of modern origin. Well before LA SALETTE (apparition in 1846), LOURDES (1858), Pontmain (1871), or FATIMA (1917), waves of pilgrims had rushed to Laus in the Dauphiné Alps (17th century), to Garaison near Tarbes, France, to GUADALUPE in Mexico (16th century), and to Caravaggio in Lombardy (15th century). The ancient and venerable pilgrimage to Our Lady in Le Puy-en-Velay, southern France, likewise owes its origin to an apparition.

Chronology of Pilgrimages. It would be of interest to establish a chronology of Christian pilgrimages in an attempt to discover significant fluctuations throughout the centuries. No such chronological table has, in fact, ever been compiled. Were it to be, it would show the permanence of the pilgrimage phenomenon, which seems to live on despite the Reformation, the Wars of Religion, the Enlightenment, and despite the rationalism, materialism, and atheism of modern times. However, certain stages in the evolution of the pilgrimage are discernible.

Fourth-century documents testify that pilgrimages to Jerusalem had been going on without interruption since the Apostolic Age. EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA stated that a bishop from Cappadocia had made a pilgrimage to Rome as early as 217. Constantine's work of pacification that made possible the rebuilding of Jerusalem, the finding of the Holy CROSS, and the erection of shrines, e.g., Holy SEPULCHER (326–336), in effect initiated the widespread popularity of pilgrimages that continued unabated throughout the Middle Ages, even though it was slowed down during the first centuries of the Moslem occupation. Rome, then Compostela, and later such sites as those of the relics of Mary Magdalene at Vézelay (succeeding Provence) and of Thomas BECKET in Canterbury (from 1171) all served to satisfy the piety of pilgrims who could not get to the holy places in Jerusalem. The Crusades began in 1095, and the fighting men considered themselves—and were considered—pilgrims, though there is scarcely any need to call attention to the extent to which the pilgrimage spirit had, in their case, been deflected from its original character. The influx of pilgrims at Canterbury (1220), Rome (1300), and Compostela was considerably augmented by the proclamation of the HOLY YEARS, which promised special spiritual favors to pilgrims.

The 16th century, understandably, was marked by a decline in pilgrimages in Europe, while the military advances of the OTTOMAN TURKS discouraged travelers to the Holy Land. Thus, when Ignatius Loyola went to Palestine in 1523, he found it deserted, and there were very few pilgrims in Jerusalem—at least from the West—down to the time of CHATEAUBRIAND. However, the newly Christianized areas in America were experiencing a rise and spread of pious pilgrimages in the 17th century, and Europe itself saw the road to Compostela become crowded once again after the THIRTY YEARS' WAR. The "Holy House" of Loreto, long after its singular appearance in central Italy at the end of the 13th century, attracted a growing number of pilgrims, and even a man so "reasonable" as Descartes traveled there in 1624 before he began publication.

After the great crisis of the French Revolution there was a renaissance of pilgrimage; and this despite the fact that many relics had been removed, many shrines burned or demolished since the religious crisis of the 16th century, either in the name of reform of the Church or as a result of the Enlightenment. Everything smacking of "fanaticism" was to be swept away. Yet, despite, or even because of, these excesses, western European Christians once again began to go on pilgrimage; other Christians, e.g., in Greece or Russia, had never ceased to do so. The movement turned instinctively toward the site of martyrdoms, including most recent ones; e.g., the people of Angers, France, would go on Sundays to the Field of the Martyrs where a number of nonjuring clergy had been executed during The Terror (1793–94). Pope Pius VII encouraged the resumption of the cult of Our Lady of Fourvière, whose statue had been burned by the Huguenots, and in 1836 Marseilles "rediscovered" the shrine of Notre-Dame de la Garde, which had been destroyed during the Revolution. In 1858 Pauline de Nicolay became a zealous sponsor of renewed Holy Land pilgrimages, which, like many others, were directed by the ASSUMPTIONISTS. Meanwhile the shrine at Lourdes had come into existence. Under the influence of Charles P. PÉGUÉ in the early 20th century a new movement was begun, designed to interest intellectual circles then sharply affected by scientism and positivism. The "Chartres pilgrimages" of Paris students, copied since then by various other universities, comprise one of the newest aspects of the modern pilgrimage spirit.

The Individual Pilgrim. It should be noted that from the time of the invasions by the barbarian nations a pilgrimage was often imposed as a penance on one who had confessed a particularly grave fault. Thus, in the 8th and 9th centuries and even later, murderers or other capital offenders were compelled to go on pilgrimages that often lasted years, wearing mean attire or even chains as a token of the incomplete remission of temporal punishment due to their sin. In certain regions, especially in the Low Countries, lay tribunals were allowed to sentence offenders to pilgrimages long after public penance had been abolished in the Church. However, the pilgrimage that has been important in the history of Christian piety and spiritual life is that undertaken by a free man as a spontaneous gesture in his quest for salvation.

Motives sending Christians on pilgrimages over land and sea may not always have been entirely pure: Sir John Mandeville, who set out for the Holy Land in 1322, was prompted as much by the desire to see the world, to have new and marvellous experiences, and to be accepted as an expert traveler as by a sincere desire for personal sanctification. And the same could certainly be said of many another pilgrim. But, just as John Chrysostom dreamed of being able to go to Rome simply “to see the chains and the prison” of the Apostle, many pilgrims in all ages expect nothing else from their journeys than the simple joy of being able to reach the holy place (ad limina), i.e., the tomb of a saint they were invoking, and there to saturate themselves with his virtus, to obtain full remission of their sins, to invoke the saint’s power to cure their ills of soul or body, or to thank him for a cure already effected.

These two motives, entreaty and thanksgiving, seem constantly to alternate in pilgrimages. In both cases the object is frequently physical health, just as it was for those who sought out Christ during His earthly life. But many other graces and favors might also be solicited, e.g., liberation of a captive, victory over enemies, success in a temporal or spiritual undertaking. One of the first acts of King Richard I the Lion-Hearted after his release from the German prison following the Third Crusade was to visit the tomb of St. Edward the Confessor in WESTMINSTER ABBEY. During the national wars against the Turks in the 17th century, Prince Esterhazy and more than 10,000 faithful made the pilgrimage to Mariazell (Austria) to implore success in arms. Each of the great wars of the 20th century has seen a revival of pilgrimages to St. Leonard of Noblat, the popular patron of prisoners: 700 to 800 persons a day came to pray before his statue at Huyssinghem in Brabant (1914–18).

In the Middle Ages the pilgrim received a special liturgical blessing before setting out; he would have already put on a special dress reminiscent of a penitent, with a broad-brimmed hat, a wallet, or pouch, slung across his back, and a long iron-shod cane or “pilgrim’s staff” in his hand. Before leaving, he would have been advised to put his affairs in good order, return any money unjustly acquired, make provisions for the support of his family in his absence, and give alms while retaining enough money to defray the expenses of his often long and costly journey. Furthermore, to claim the privileges to which the authentic pilgrim was entitled (for a pilgrim was protected by many conciliar decrees and was, in a certain sense, assimilated into the clergy), the pious traveler had, in fact, to get written authorization of his bishop (or abbot, if he were a monk). By the 12th and 13th centuries only the production of such testimonial letters (testimoniales) enabled him to escape being classified as an adventurer or pilgrimage profiteer. An ordinance of King Richard II of England in 1388 indicated that any pilgrim without such testimoniales risked arrest.

Today modern transportation has removed not only all danger for the majority of pilgrims but even, in most cases, any flavor of penance. But for centuries millions of Christian pilgrims suffered grim hardships, from both the length and the difficulties of their journeys. English pilgrims crossing to Compostela in the 14th century or Europeans going to the Holy Land in Venetian boats in the 15th were uncomfortable and in danger of shipwreck or capture by the infidels, harassed by poor sanitation and the extra fees often demanded by shipowners. The German Dominican Felix Fabri, who went from Ulm to Jerusalem in 1484, left a detailed account of such conditions.

For a long time pilgrims traveled on land by horse or mule. The Indians of Minas Gerães still travel by mule over the Brazilian plateaus to Aparecida, a town whose name tells its story. Frequently, pilgrims traveled all or part of the way on foot. This is not unknown even today, e.g., Péguy’s pilgrims and the Cologne pilgrims to SAINT-HUBERT in the Belgian Ardennes at the beginning of this century both went on foot. Many of the Portuguese peasants going to Fatima still travel on foot.

Very rare today, and constituting the exception even in the Middle Ages, were pilgrimages on which pilgrims went barefoot. King Louis IX walked five leagues barefoot on the road to Chartres; and Enea Silvio Piccolomini, the future Renaissance Pope PIUS II, walked barefoot through snow on pilgrimage to Our Lady of Whitekirk.

Pilgrim Roads. Popes and secular rulers early realized their duty to organize pilgrim roads and erect hostels and to ensure, as far as possible, the safety of the pilgrims. In Rome, for example, Pope SYMMACHUS concerned himself with pilgrim safety as early as the 6th century, and the famous Schola Saxonum was in existence in the 8th century (see HOLY SPIRIT, ORDER OF THE). In the 16th century the staggering influx of Holy Year pilgrims in the city of Rome prompted St. Philip NERI's work there. On the most dangerous parts of the journey refuges were built: Novalesa (on the road through the Mont-Cenis Pass) was encouraged by Emperor Louis the Pious (825); and Roncesvalles, a hostel for pilgrims to Compostela, was perhaps the most renowned of all such hospices and was showered with favors by the kings of Navarre. Certain orders were created expressly to aid pilgrims, such as the KNIGHTS OF ST. JAMES in Spain, the Knights TEMPLARS, and the KNIGHTS OF MALTA, who were initially intended to aid poor, unarmed, and sick pilgrims. The seal of the Templars bore the figure of a knight aiding a pauper et peregrinus. From the 13th century there appeared all over Christendom a great number of confraternities whose aim was to assist pilgrims. One of the most famous of these was that of Altopascio founded in Tuscany. Its influence in Paris is marked by its church of Saint-Jacques "du HautPas," at the starting point of the Paris stage on the road to Compostela. A shrine-city like Lourdes today, or the hostels for pilgrims (in the widest sense of the word) founded in Chartres or Vézelay by PAX CHRISTI, are modern extensions of the efforts and the spirit of the medieval hospitallers.

Rarely does any pilgrim travel alone: he joins with companions for reasons of economy, security, or spiritual support. Thus, the pilgrimage as a mass phenomenon is of interest to the sociologist as well as to technical scientists, such as sanitation engineers and town planners.

Pilgrim Numbers. Sources tell of mob scenes at many medieval shrines, especially on certain dates (e.g., Holy Saturday at the Holy Sepulcher), with everyone wanting to be the first to reach the holy places; many were trampled in crowds carried away by misguided eagerness. The figures given by medieval sources seem astonishing; yet modern statistics tend to corroborate the huge numbers involved in pilgrimage statistics. Villani states that, during the first Holy Year in 1300, Rome had a steady 200,000 inhabitants above normal; 100,000 pilgrims are said to have congregated in Trier for the first solemn exhibition of the Holy Shroud in 1512. But then there were 300,000 pilgrims in Puy in 1853, close to 160,000 in Aachen in 1881, and at least 1,200,000 in Kiev in 1886 (the railroad had opened that year). Einsiedeln had 150,000 pilgrims a year at the beginning of the 20th century. Lourdes had 8,000,000 in 1958, the centenary year of the apparitions. The annual number of pilgrims in Lisieux (St. THÉRÈSE DE LISIEUX) still exceeds 1,000,000. In India a week-long exposition of the arm of St. Francis XAVIER in Goa attracted several million pilgrims who, incidentally, were not all Christians.

Pilgrim Ritual. The pilgrim usually brought an ex-voto to the shrine, which he would leave there, e.g., a wax or metal reproduction of a limb that had been healed or a tablet telling of an accident that he had escaped. Different centuries and civilizations have seen pilgrims bring an infinite variety of such objects: tammata to Greek sanctuaries, silver orange trees with golden fruits to Tenos, wax ships to the shrine of St. GERALD OF BRAGA in the 13th century, silver ships recalling shipwrecks survived to Notre-Dame de la Garde in Marseilles in the 20th century, military medals and sabres to Notre-Dame des Victoires in Paris, crude and homely figurines of domestic animals for the little shrines in Carinthia, and innumerable marble plaques to Pontmain, to Sainte-Radegonde in Poitiers, and to Sainte Anne de Beaupré in Canada.

Usually the pilgrim offers gifts in money or in kind at the shrine. In fact, many shrine churches of the Middle Ages depended on offerings of oil and wax from their pilgrims for their illumination needs. Furthermore, a considerable number of old coins have been found in ST. PETER's, Rome; the Anglo-Saxon, 7th-century coins found there are one of the sources attesting to the early flow of English pilgrims to the tomb of Peter. In the 14th century gifts to the shrines of St. CUTHBERT OF LINDISFARNE and St. BEDE at DURHAM, England, were particularly abundant. In modern times CZĘSTOCHOWA in Poland was considered one of the richest shrines in the world. But even more modest shrine churches overflow with gifts; e.g., a little pilgrimage center in south Italy, Viggiano in Lucania, received sums amounting to 2,500,000 lire (or $4,000) in 1950, as well as some four pounds of gold.

The pilgrimage vow itself was discharged by prayer and penance at a shrine. The pilgrims generally prayed kneeling, and in consequence, e.g., the stone placed in front of the reliquary of Edward the Confessor in Westminster Abbey is now worn almost hollow. But penance was no less essential than prayer. Medieval pilgrims assumed a penitential posture as soon as they reached the mons gaudii, the height from which they first caught sight of their goal, and they retained this posture from that point on. Emperor Otto III thus approached the tomb of ADALBERT OF PRAGUE at Gniezno. One of the most constant penitential exercises was climbing a lofty staircase on hands and knees (Rocamadour; the Scala sancta in Rome; the shrine on Mt. Sinai; the oratory of St. Joseph in Montreal, Canada). Another penance was begging at the approaches to the shrine. Sometimes even more demanding penances were required of the pilgrim, such as those minutely codified for the pilgrim to the famous St. Patrick's PURGATORY.

A custom frequently observed at shrines, now as in the past, is the all-night vigil, in which a great number of pilgrims pass the entire night in the shrine itself or nearby in order to saturate themselves with the mysterious power of the saint. This is mentioned as early as the Miracula of St. HILARY OF POITIERS. In the 15th century Felix Fabri and his companions spent three nights in the church of the Holy Sepulcher. Even in the 20th century it used to be a frequent occurrence to see villagers camping out all night singing psalms and canticles during pilgrimages to Uzhgorod in the Ukraine, Russia, or to the Ostra Brama in Vilna, Lithuania. On Tenos, for the vigils of the Annunciation and the Assumption, the church is open for worshippers day and night.

Other pilgrim practices require the pilgrim to circle the tomb or pass under it if the architecture permits. This latter can often be observed in Breton “pardons” (pilgrimages). At some shrines the pilgrims circle the church itself, not unlike the practice in Mecca. Processions made over rocky ground at Fatima are considered especially penitential.

Receiving the Sacraments is one of the most appropriate acts for the pilgrim who has reached the goal of his pilgrimage, for he has journeyed all the way essentially to be freed from his sins. There are no pilgrim shrines without numerous confessionals; in Laus, hearing confessions is a steady and weighty duty of the chaplains. In Lourdes, during the peak pilgrimage period, pilgrims receive Communion for hours on end every day at the grotto. And it is a striking fact that even during the worst period of JANSENISM (1732) there were an average of 250 Communion a day at Notre-Dame de Hal in Belgium.

Bodily cures have always been sought by pilgrims, and in fact there is no shrine venerated by popular piety that has not at some point been the scene of cures. There is no way of verifying the cures reported—probably with exaggeration—in medieval sources. In modern times, however, a rigorous system of checking has been instituted, and the cures reported are all the more impressive. In many shrines the sick lie along the length of the processional route of the Blessed Sacrament or reliquaries of the saints, or they are immersed in the water of a miraculous spring. At the procession of Aug. 23, 1897, at Lourdes, when 350 miracles were recorded, there were 41 miraculous cures. At the 1891 Trier expositions 11 cures were officially reported. In England certain pilgrimages that were discontinued at the Reformation have been recently revived, and miraculous cures have been reported at the WALSINGHAM pilgrimage (revived in 1927).

Pilgrims’ Return Home. Many pilgrims, especially in the past, could only regretfully bring themselves to leave the place where they had found peace of soul; in fact, some settled down at the holy site, especially Jerusalem, for months or even years, devoting themselves to works of mercy, to caring for the sick in the hospitals, etc. Even into the 20th century the faithful who went to the famous Solovetski Island shrine in the White Sea would often remain for some time in the service of the monks who were custodians of the shrine. Sources mention pilgrims who would express the wish that they might die there at the goal of their pilgrimage lest they fall again into sickness or sin. In exceptional cases this favor would be granted.

When pilgrims returned home, they always tried to take some tangible memento of their journey, some “relic.” Most had to be satisfied with a few drops of the oil used in the lamps burning before the tomb of the saint. This oil would be carried away in AMPULLAE, or phials, such as those preserved in the treasury of Monza in Lombardy. Or they would take minute fragments of the tomb itself, surreptitiously removed splinters of stone or a little of the dust scratched from the tombstone and carried away in a small bag. The “dust of the Holy House” at Loreto is still collected for pilgrims each year on Good Friday; rosaries with a lunula reliquary in their crosses containing “earth of the catacombs” are still sold just outside St. Peter’s in Rome.

Many pilgrims in the Middle Ages were anxious to prove themselves bona fide returning pilgrims and to distinguish themselves from the swarms of pseudopilgrims, such as those Chaucer so mordantly denounces on the Canterbury roads. Their proof was the emblem (signum) they prominently displayed while returning home. The most renowned insignia were Holy Land palm branches broken off at Jericho (hence the term “palmer” to designate the pilgrim) and the St. James shell gathered on the beaches of Galicia when at Compostela. Insignia from Rome, which began to appear only about the 14th century, were more likely to be a Veil of Veronica with a reproduction of the Holy Face than an emblem picturing the heads of the two Apostles. The periodic exposition of Veronica’s Veil in St. Peter’s was enriched by popular indulgences. Other insignia included the picture of Thomas Becket on Canterbury phials, the Sinai torture wheel recalling the martyrdom of St. Catherine, the head of John the Baptist for Amiens, leaden statues of Our Lady of Walsingham, of Rocamadour, and other Marian sanctuaries, such as the statuettes that King Louis XI was fond of carrying.

Pilgrims generally wanted to repeat their pilgrimages. The case of Duke William V of Aquitaine (c. 1000) is famous: each year he went to Rome or else to Compostela. King Charles VII traveled to Puy five times, Louis XI went to Notre-Dame de Béhuard in Anjou 15 times, King Henry III journeyed to Chartres 18 times. In 1843 a simple Austrian blacksmith made his 33d pilgrimage to Mariazell. There were perpetual pilgrims in the West during most of the Middle Ages and in Russia until modern times (called peregrinantes as opposed to peregrini; in Russia startsy). They went from shrine to shrine throughout most of their life, with no other aim than to proclaim Christ by their lonely wandering. St. Benedict Joseph LABRE was one of these “fools for Christ’s sake,” as late as the 18th century.

Reaction to Pilgrims. Both perpetual and ordinary pilgrims were often mocked, scoffed at, and sometimes insulted, as were those of La Salette in Grenoble (1872). Literary satire on pilgrims has been a constant phenomenon, from the Roman de Renart to attacks by Erasmus or Voltaire. Moralists, spiritual writers, and preachers have more than once deplored the abuses of pilgrimaging; one need only recall the remarks in the Imitation of Christ or Jerome’s protest that the important thing was not to go to live in Jerusalem but to live a holy life, adding: “You can reach the court of Heaven just as well from Britain as from Jerusalem.” And, though a pilgrimage well performed is an important means to salvation, he added, it is not a necessary means; it is hardly proper to neglect the duties of one’s state in life to go wandering over pilgrimage roads, especially if one is a monk. More than once BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX reminded his Cistercian confreres, “Your cell is Jerusalem.” Yet despite these constant criticisms, despite the great popular credulity in relics and legends and the enormous number of pilgrims who were far from ideal, many great minds defended the principle of pilgrimaging. Sir Thomas More, for example, took pains to compose (1529) a treatise in defense of pilgrimages. “There was never a pilgrim,” wrote CHATEAUBRIAND, “who did not come back to his village with one less prejudice and one more idea.” Charles Eugène de FOUCAULD, for his part, maintained that the haji came back more tolerant, more just, and more pious than they had been before setting out for Mecca. These assessments are perhaps too optimistic. But this does not alter the fact that many Christian pilgrims have returned from their long journeys cured in body and at peace with God (ad Deum conversi).

Bibliography: J. J. JUSSERAND, English Wayfaring Life in the Middle Ages (4th ed. London 1892). J. SCHMITZ, Sühnenwallfahrten im Mittelalter (Bonn 1910). L. DE VALON, Les Pèlerinages expiatoires et judiciaires de la Belgique à Roc-Amadour au moyen âge (Marseille 1935). W. J. MOORE, The Saxon pilgrims to Rome and the Schola Saxonum (Fribourg 1937). M. ROMANI, Pellegrini e viaggiatori nell’ economia di Roma dal XIV al XVII secolo (Milan 1948). P. DEFFONTAINES, Géographie et religions (Paris 1948). L. VAZQUEZ DE PARGA et al., Las Peregrinaciones a Santiago de Compostela, 3 v. (Madrid 1948–49). C. BAUSSAN, Lourdes et les pèlerinages de la Vierge (Grenoble 1949). H. F. M. PRESCOTT, Friar Felix at Large: A 15th Century Pilgrimage to the Holy Land (New Haven 1950). B. KÖTTING, Peregrinatio religiosa: Wallfahrten in der Antike und das Pilgerwesen in der alten Kirche (Münster 1950). R. ROUSSEL, Les Pèlerinages à travers les siècles (Paris 1954). R. KRISS and H. KRISS-HEINRICH, Peregrinatio Neohellenika: Wallfahrtswanderungen im heutigen Griechenland and in Unteritalien (Vienna 1955). M. MARTINS, Peregrinações e livros de milagros na nossa idade media (2d ed. Lisbon 1957). P. CABANNE, Les Longs cheminements: Les Pèlerinages de tous les temps et de toutes les croyances (Paris 1958). E. R. LABANDE, “Recherches sur les pèlerins dans l’Europe des XI^e et XII^e siècles,” Cahiers de civilisation médiévale 1 (1958) 159–169, 339–347. H. ENGELMANN, Pèlerinages (Paris 1959). A. M. BESNARD, Le Pèlerinage chrétien (Paris 1959). H. QUÉFFÉLEC, La Bretagne des pardons (Paris 1962). R. OURSEL, Les Pèlerins du moyen âge: Les Hommes, les chemins, les sanctuaires (Paris 1963).

Pilgrims gather in catacombs, Rome. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

[E. R. LABANDE]

PILGRIMAGES, ROMAN

Devotional or penitential journeys to visit the center of Christendom, with its tombs of the Apostles Peter and Paul (ad limina apostolorum), its catacombs, and other famed sanctuaries and churches. Pilgrimages are a natural phenomenon in most ancient religions, and Rome itself in pagan times had sanctuaries that were the object of religious visits and celebrations by devotees from afar.

The first recorded Christian pilgrimage to Rome was made by ABERCIUS, Bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia. On an epitaph written before 216, he left a record of his visit to Rome as the center of the Church, whose community was marked by the seal of Baptism (sphragidion). During the pontificate of Pope ZEPHYRINUS (198–217), ORIGEN visited Rome “to see the ancient Church of the Romans” (Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 6.14.10). While the graves of the Apostles Peter and Paul were marked by monuments called trophies (ibid. 2.25.17) and were honored in the second century, there is no record of visits by specific strangers before the late third century, although graffiti inscriptions witness to the devotion of visitors at the tomb site beneath the main altar in St. Peter’s and in the catacombs, particularly in the trichia of St. Sebastian’s, which go back to the start of the cult of MARTYRS.

Peace of the Church. With the Peace of the Church (313) and the construction of the Constantinian basilica to St. Peter (c. 325–354); of the Sessorian basilica of the Holy Cross called “in Jerusalem,” as well as of the Lateran basilica; of St. Paul’s on the Via Ostiensis; of St. Lawrence; and of St. Agnes, new impetus was given to devotional visits to the Eternal City. Pope DAMASUS (366–384) provided for the proper care of the catacombs and decorated them with verse inscriptions that served as sign posts for pilgrims, from the fourth to the eighth century. The DEPOSITIO MARTYRUM preserved by the CHRONOGRAPHER OF 354 records the names of 52 martyrs whose feasts were commemorated annually by the Roman Church; almost a century later, the calendar of Pope BONIFACE I (d. 422) registers 300. St. JEROME has described the crowds of visitors to the catacombs and martyr churches in Rome (c. 365) that he witnessed as a youth (Comm. in Gal. 2; Comm. in Ezech. 45.5). In a hymn ascribed to St. Ambrose (d. 397), mention is made of three roads by which devotees arrived to celebrate the feasts of the martyrs: Via Aurelia for the Vatican; Via Ostiensis for St. Paul’s; and the Via Appia for St. Sebastian’s (Hymn 13.21–32). St. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM, writing in 387, spoke of the emperors, generals, and consuls who visited Rome to venerate the tomb of “a fisherman and of a tent maker” (Cont. Jud. et gent. 9), and deplored his own inability to visit the tomb of St. Paul (Hom. in Rom. 32.2–3).

Paulinus and Prudentius. While Rome was the scene of constant comings and goings by Church and imperial officials engaged in ecclesiastical and public affairs, there is no record of their pilgrim interests. At the end of the fourth century, PAULINUS OF NOLA informed St. AUGUSTINE of his annual visits to the shrine of the Apostles (Epistolae 17.1; 18.1; 20.2; 45.1) and mentioned visits to Rome in 400 and 403 by NICETAS OF REMESIANA (ibid. 29.14). Palladius, the monk, came from Palestine to Rome about the same time and mentioned a visit of the Galatian monk Philoromus (Hist. Laus. 45). During the fifth century, frequent visits were made by bishops, monks, and ecclesiastics, such as John Cassian, HILARY OF ARLES, and PROSPER OF AQUITAINE.

The Spanish poet PRUDENTIUS (348–405), in his Peri Stephanon, or verse in honor of the martyrs, spoke of the awe with which he beheld the places where the martyrs shed their blood and left innumerable relics (Hymn. 2.541–548; 11.1–2), and he described the catacombs and churches he visited, including the crypt of St. HIPPOLYTUS. There, for the saint’s feast (Aug. 13), vast crowds assembled, having marched from the city in processions and been joined by men, women, and children, arriving on the roads from the Alban hills, Abruzzi, Etruria, Capua, and Nola (Hymn. 11.199–216).

Despite the sack of Rome by the barbarians in 410 and 452, GREGORY OF TOURS described pilgrimages made by St. BRICE (Hist. Franc. 2.1) and Bp. Aravatus of Tongres (ibid. 2.5); SIDONIUS APOLLINARIS was there in 456 and 467 (Acta Sanctorum Aug. 23: 603), and King Sigismund of Burgundy toward the end of the century. Sigismund had to write to Pope SYMMACHUS (498–514) for a further consignment of relics, having distributed all he himself obtained in Rome (Monumenta Germaniae Historica [Berlin 1826–]) division: Auctores antiquissimi, 6.2.59). Fulgentius of Ruspe (c. 500) described the custom of making regular rounds of pilgrim visits to the catacombs and churches, including St. Peter’s, St. Paul’s, St. Agnes’, St. Lawrence’s, St. Sebastian’s, and SS. John and Paul’s (Vita 13.27). CASSIODORUS (d. 583) spoke of the universitas of Christians who desired to visit the confessions or shrines in Rome (Viv. 11.2); and Gregory of Tours reported the return of his deacon (c. 590) from Rome with many relics (Hist. Franc. 10.1).

Roman Relics. Already in the early fifth century, so many pilgrims passed Spoleto on the Via Flaminia bound for Rome that Bishop Achilleus (402–418) thought it proper (on the inscription in his cathedral) to warn against possible superstition in the cult of relics; but later, another inscription in the same church informs pilgrims that the cathedral possessed a splinter of the true cross and a link of St. Peter’s chain (De Rossi, Inscript. Christ. 2.8.114). Justinian I had written to Pope HORMISDAS (514–523) for sanctuarium b. Petri et Pauli or pieces of cloth that had touched the stone in the “second cataract” or level in the shaft that led down to tombs beneath the altar in St. Peter’s and St. Paul’s, as well as a piece of Peter’s chain and, if possible, of the grill of St. Lawrence (Hormisdas, Epist. 77). In 595 the Bavarian Princess Theodelinda, as queen of the Lombards, asked Pope GREGORY I (590–604) for relics for the new church of St. John, which she had built at Monza, and received a consignment of ampules filled with oil that had been burning before the tombs of some 65 martyrs. Each ampule was marked with the location whence the oil was drawn (Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie. ed. F. Cabrol, H. Leclercq and H. I. Marrou [Paris 1907–53] 1.2:1737–39). Contrary to Eastern practice, at Rome during this period bones were not distributed as relics, but openings were made above the tombs, and articles could be let down to touch the interior.

Schola Saxonum and Irish Pilgrims. The sixth and seventh centuries saw a great influx of monks and visitors from Byzantium, encouraged by the founding of a Greek monastery in Rome by anti-Monophysite monks. Likewise BEDE reported the visits of Danish and Anglo-Saxon princes and princesses who had put aside their diadems to visit the shrine of the Apostles, as well as visits of clerics and laity, men and women (Ecclesiastical History 5.7). BENEDICT BISCOP (628–689) made five journeys to Rome; Wilfrid of York (634–709) made two; and King Caedwalla of Wessex (d. c. 709) abdicated his throne, made a pilgrimage to Rome, was baptized in St. Peter's, and later was buried there (BEDE, Ecclesiastical History 5.7). MATTHEW PARIS credited King Ina of Wessex (689–726) with the foundation in Rome of the schola Saxonum, or pilgrim hostel, with the church of St. Mary, which burgeoned into an Anglo-Saxon colony and gave its name to the borgo, or neighborhood, in Trastevere, and was soon imitated by the hostels and churches of St. Savior for the Franks, St. Michael for the Frisians, and St. Justin for the Lombards (Matthew Paris, Chron. Mai., ed. Luard, 1:331). Pope LEO III (d. 816) established a hospital for pilgrims in Rome, dedicated to St. Peregrinus of Auxerre.

From Ireland, so large an army of pilgrims followed Columbanus across the Continent on the road to Rome that in the vita of St. Gall, Gozbert remarked: "Of late so many Scots [Irish] are pilgrims that it would appear that the habit of traveling is part of their nature." In the Irish lives of the saints, hardly a one does not mention peregrinans pro Dei amore, or pro nomine Christi—"on pilgrimage for the love of God" or "in the name of Christ"—thus the vitae of SS. Agilus, Kilian, and Fintan (J. Mabillon, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti [Venice 1733–40] 2:324). St. Molua (d. c. 608), setting out on pilgrimage, said, "Unless I see Rome, I will die soon."

Pilgrim Guide Books. The ITINERARIA, based evidently on the Roman military maps and tax records, such as the Anonymous of Piacenza and the itinerarium of Einsiedeln, indicate that a number of private pilgrim guides existed for directing pilgrims on the Roman roads and conducting them to the various sites when they got there. A notitia ecclesiarum urbis Romae existed in the time of Pope HONORIUS I (625–638); it directed pilgrims from the church of SS. John and Paul on the Caelian Hill in a circle round the city from the Via Flaminia on the north, to the churches and cemeteries on the east and south, then west, and finished with a description of the wonders of St. Peter's. In the De locis sanctis martyrum quae sunt foris civitatis Romae, the pilgrim visits began with St. Peter's and made a round of the sanctuaries outside the city. The book was full of legends; it pointed out a kind of altar in St. Peter's constructed by Peter himself; on the road to Ostia was an oratorium on whose altar was a stone used in the stoning of St. Stephen; in the vestibule of St. Lawrence's, the rock used to drown St. Abundus was on exhibition; in St. Maria in Trastevere was a picture of the Blessed Virgin painted by herself; and the chains of St. Peter and St. Lawrence's grill, as well as other such relics, were carefully pointed out. In his History of the English Kings, William of Malmesbury (d. 1142) preserved a much older itinerary of Rome, which led the pilgrim out of 14 gates in the Aurelian Wall to visit all the cemeteries between the Porta Cornelia and the Porta Flaminia.

Dimissorial Letters. On the road to Rome, guest houses were constructed, and many monasteries, such as that at Rebaix in northern France, were frequented by the Irish and offered free lodging overnight. Usually the pilgrims traveled in groups to ward off robbers; and they carried dimissorial letters supplied by the bishop with the acknowledgment of the civil authorities. In 514 CAESARIUS OF ARLES obtained the Formulary of Marculf (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1878–90] 87:755) from Pope Symmachus granting the pilgrim safe-conduct and freedom from customs and other taxes. Pilgrims also made offerings to local churches or monasteries for prayers for their safe return; or made over their property to the bishop for safekeeping.

The custom of bishops, princes, and kings visiting the Eternal City continued during the eighth to early tenth century; they not only endowed St. Peter's and specific sanctuaries, but saw to the care for pilgrims on the routes to Rome and in Rome itself. They included Bp. CHRODEGANG OF METZ; Theodo, Prince of Bavaria; Bertrade, wife of Charlemagne; and Charlemagne himself, who visited Rome at least four times.

Penitential Pilgrimages and Abuses. In the ninth century, under Popes Nicholas I (858–867) and Stephen V (885–891), the custom of substituting pilgrimages for ecclesiastical penances and civil or criminal law penalties began; instead of excommunication, banishment, or exile for heresy, murder, arson, or breaking of the peace of God, the culprit was allowed to don pilgrim clothes and was supplied with a safe-conduct to a particular shrine. In the high Middle Ages, with the development of Canon Law, the ordinary penalty for striking a cleric was a pilgrimage to Rome, since the absolution of this crime was reserved to the pope. However, with the rise of the universities in the 12th and 13th centuries, this penalty had to be abolished since so many students were taking advantage of it.

Abuses and Complaints. As early as the fourth century, Gregory of Nyssa (Epistolae 2; 3) and Jerome (Epistolae 58.2–6) complained about the abuses committed by unruly monks and pilgrims in the Holy Land. Yet Jerome justified the veneration of images and the cult of the saints in his Contra Vigilantium. John Chrysostom (Ad pop. Antioch. 3.2.49) and Augustine (Epistolae 155.4.15; Patrologia Latina 33:672) reminded their parishioners that they were to honor God through the saints not by their feet, but in their hearts. The strongest voice raised against pilgrimage abuses connected with Rome was that of St. Boniface (Monumenta Germaniae Historica [Berlin 1826–] division: Epistolae, 3:354), who complained that despite synods and royal prohibitions, the majority of women making such trips to Rome lost their virtue. Claudius of Turin (c. 820) condemned images, relics, and pilgrimages and was answered by the Irish scholar Dungal and Jonas of Orléans, who in his De cultu imaginum (Patrologia Latina 106:305–388) followed the moderate doctrine of the Libri Carolini. Councils at Verneuil (755), Aquileia (796), and Châlons (813) forbade monks to go to Rome and cautioned against other abuses, and a poem in an eighth-century Irish manuscript admits, “To go to Rome [teicht do Roim] means great labor and little profit; the king you seek can only be found there if you bring him within yourself” [see R. Thurneysen, Old Irish Reader, tr. D. A. Binchy and O’Bergin (Dublin 1949) 41].

Erasmus. The author of the IMITATION OF CHRIST complained: “Those who wander much are but little hallowed,” and the 15th-century Dominican John Bromyard observed that many peregrinamur a Domino: pilgrimage away from God and toward the devil. The sharpest critic amid the voices raised against pilgrimages during the Reformation was ERASMUS, whose Colloquies [ed. E. Johnson (London 1878) 2.1–37] summed up the abuses as (1) neglect of home duties, (2) excessive credulity in relics and legends, (3) insistence on pilgrimages as if necessary for salvation, and (4) wantonness and evil conduct of pilgrims. However, he felt they were justified if entered on freely and with true piety.

Holy Years. Despite the break between the Roman and Eastern Churches, after 1054 relations, including pilgrimages to Rome, continued intermittently. The internal strife with which Rome was afflicted from the ninth to the 15th century had greatly lessened pilgrimages during that period; but the proclamation of the HOLY YEAR by Boniface VIII (Feb. 22, 1300), and the subsequent celebrations of jubilee years in 1350 under Clement VI, in 1390 under Urban VI, in 1400 under Boniface IX, and in 1423 under Martin V gave the movement new impetus. Paul II (1464–71) decreed the present system of 25-year intervals, which, with the exception of 1800 and 1850, has been followed to the present. Confraternities, such as that of the Holy Trinity established by St. Philip NERI in 1548 and those of the Gonfalone and the Holy Cross of St. Marcello, set up hostels and sanitary and hospital services and fed pilgrims down to modern times.

Secular and Religious Pilgrims. In the Renaissance period pilgrims’ guide books, such as the De mirabilibus civitatis Romae, by N. Roselli (1314–62); the versified English Stations of Rome; and the Itinerarium urbis Romae (c. 1517), of the Franciscan Mariano da Firenze, provided pilgrims with information and direction in visiting the sites hallowed by the pagan, but more particularly by the Christian, heroes of Rome.

With the rise of the Renaissance, and more particularly during the Enlightenment period, the attention of the secular visitors to Rome, such as GOETHE on his Wanderjahr, was directed exclusively to pilgrimages to the ruins of ancient pagan Rome. This attitude has changed radically, and, with modern pilgrim movements arranged by the tourist industry, more emphasis is placed on the possibility of seeing the pope and visiting the shrines of the Apostles than on the relics of Rome’s ancient glory.

Pope Boniface VIII had prescribed visits to the basilicas of St. Peter and St. Paul as requisite for the jubilee indulgence; Clement VI added St. John Lateran’s; and Urban VI, St. Mary Major’s. Visits to these four basilicas have become the custom for all true Roman pilgrimages.

Bibliography: H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d’archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie. ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 14.1:40–65. J. HASENFUSS et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 10:941–946. B. KÖTTING, Peregrinatio religiosa (Münster 1950). E. R. BARKER, Rome of the Pilgrims and Martyrs (London 1913). G. SCHREIBER, ed., Wallfahrt und Volkstum (Düsseldorf 1934). G. BARDY, Analecta Bollandiana (Brussels 1882–) 67 (1949) 224–235. H. DELEHAYE, Les Origines du culte des martyrs (2d ed. Brussels 1933). D. GORCE, Les Voyages, l’hospitalité . . . des IV^e et V^e siècles (Paris 1925). L. GOUGAUD, Gaelic Pioneers of Christianity, tr. V. COLLINS (Dublin 1923); Revue d’histoire ecclésiastique 9 (1908) 21–37, 255–277. W. KUBITSCHKE, Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. (Stuttgart 1893–) 9.2 (1916) 2308–65. K. MILLER, Itineraria romana (Stuttgart 1916). U. BERLIÈRE, Revue Bénédictine 7 (1890) 520–526, judicial pilgrimages. É. VAN CAUWENBERGH, Les Pèlerinages expiatoires et judiciaires (Louvain 1922). F. X. MURPHY, American Ecclesiastical Review 121 (1949) 164–180, Holy Year. G. B. PARKS, The English Traveler to Italy (Stanford, Calif. 1954–).

[F. X. MURPHY]

PIMENTA, SILVÉRIO GOMES

Brazilian archbishop; b. Congonhas do Campo, Minas Gerais, Jan. 12, 1840; d. Mariana, Aug. 30, 1922. One of the most outstanding ecclesiastical figures in Brazil at the beginning of the 20th century, Pimenta came from a very humble family. He made his first studies in his home town, and he began to work as a clerk in a commercial house to support the family when he was nine years old. His uncle and godfather, Manuel Alves Pimenta, aware of the great intelligence of the boy, asked the Vincentian Fathers of Congonhas to give him more education. Working to help his mother and studying at the same time in the most precarious circumstances, Pimenta nevertheless succeeded in excelling in Latin, French, and the humanities. In 1855 Antônio Ferreira Viçoso, Bishop of Mariana, knowing that Pimenta wanted to be a priest, took him under his protection and gave him a place in the seminary at the expense of the bishopric. On July 20, 1862, he was ordained. In 1871 Pimenta was chosen to teach Latin in the seminary, and he did this for 18 years, becoming a master in the language.

Pimenta's first writing was in defense of the Church, in 1872, in the famous Religious Question that had started in Rio between the Free Masons and Bp. Pedro Maria de Lacerda, former teacher of Pimenta in the seminary of Mariana. Pimenta worked as a journalist for four years. In 1875 he was named vicar capitular, in spite of some opposition because he was a person of color. In 1877, he was made vicar-general of the diocese of Mariana. In 1890, Father Pimenta was appointed titular bishop of Camaco and auxiliary bishop of D. Antônio Benevides of Mariana. Again there was criticism by those who did not wish to have a person of color as pastor.

He took over most of the administration of the diocese because the bishop was ill. Preoccupied with the shortage of clergy, he asked the Redemptorists and the Jesuits to come to his diocese. With the separation of Church and State in 1890, the bishops were free to rule over their territories, and D. Pimenta readily took advantage of it. On Dec. 3, 1896, he was named bishop of Mariana and was triumphantly received by his people.

His zeal was endless; he traveled dozens of miles on horseback to administer Confirmation and visit his priests in the vast diocese. Mariana became an archdiocese in 1906; and D. Pimenta, its first archbishop, having Goiás, Diamantina, and Pouso Alegre as suffragans. He established conferences for the clergy and founded an organization for fostering vocations. In 1920, he was elected a member of the Brazilian Academy of Letters, being the first clergyman to enter that house of poets and writers. Among other works, he wrote a biography of his predecessor Antônio Ferreira Viçoso.

Bibliography: J. SILVÉRIO DE SOUZA, Vida de D. Silvério Gomes Pimenta (São Paulo 1927).

[T. BEAL]

PINARD DE LA BOULLAYE, HENRI

Jesuit theologian, preacher, and author of numerous books and articles on philosophy, fundamental theology, apologetics, comparative religion, and Ignatian spirituality; b. Paris, Sept. 1, 1874; d. Lille, Feb. 9, 1958.

In 1893, a year after his graduation from the Jesuit College at Reims, he entered the Society of Jesus. Upon completion of his studies he was appointed professor of fundamental theology at the Jesuit theologate at Enghien. He held this post from 1910 to 1927. During this period he became interested in the study of comparative religion. He published the manual De vera religione, numerous theological works proper, and several studies on religious experience and the history of religions, contributing articles to Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, Dictionnaire apologétique, and Recherches de sciences religieuses on those subjects. In 1922 and 1925 the two volumes of his major work, L'étude comparée des religions, appeared. Throughout his life Pinard continued to revise and improve upon this book, producing several editions.

From 1927 to 1934 he taught the history of religions at the Gregorian University in Rome. He also preached a series of Lenten conferences at the Cathedral of Notre Dame in Paris from 1928 to 1937. Upon completion of these assignments he returned to Enghien, where he devoted himself entirely to his studies in comparative religion. He intended to produce a dictionary in this field, but his researches were interrupted by World War II, which made it impossible for him to complete his project. Frustrated in this pursuit he turned his energies to a study of the Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius and the spirituality of the society. Between 1940 and 1956 he produced several books and articles in this area.

All of Pinard's works were characterized by a great erudition. A man of rigorous logic and objectivity, he held sentiment, the irrational, and the subjective in suspicion. According to him, religion imposes itself on man first on a rational, deductive plane. For Pinard, God was concluded to before being seen, and religious experience was a complement or reward. His entire life was a total dedication to truth, seeking with all his energies to show that science and faith are not in conflict but ultimately proceed from the same source, the Giver of all truth.

Bibliography: V. VAN BULCK, Annali Lateranensi 24 (1960) 434–461. J. GOETZ, Anthropos 53 (1958) 1010–13. M. COLPO, Archivum historicum Societas Jesu 27 (1958) 481.

[E. J. MURAWSKI]

PINEDA, JUAN DE

Biblical scholar; b. Seville, 1558; d. there, Jan. 27, 1637. He became a Jesuit in 1572, taught philosophy at Granada for three years and at Seville for two years, and taught Scripture at Cordova, Seville (where he was also rector), and Madrid for 18 years. As a member of the staff of the Spanish INQUISITION, he edited, with P. Daza, the Spanish Index librorum prohibitorum (Madrid 1612–14; 2d ed. 1632). But his fame rests chiefly on his Biblical studies. Because of his wide knowledge of languages and history, his exegetical works had genuine scientific value for their time, though they are now outmoded. Chief among these are his commentaries on Job (2 v., Madrid 1597–1601), the Canticle of Canticles (Seville 1602), and Ecclesiastes (Seville 1619). Also very popular in its day was his Salomon praeivus (Lyons 1609, Mainz 1613), a study of the reign of King Solomon.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL et. al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 6:796–801. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae (Innsbruck 1903–13) 3:770–772. A. ASTRAIN, Historia de la Compañía de Jesús, 7 v. (Madrid 1902–25) 4:52–53, 234, 796.

[L. F. HARTMAN]

PINOT, NOËL, BL.

Martyr; b. Angers, France, Dec. 19, 1747; d. there, Feb. 21, 1794. After ordination (1771) he became a curate in Bousse (1771) and Corzé (1776), hospital chaplain in Angers (1781), and pastor of St. Aubin's Church in Louroux-Béconnais (1788). During the FRENCH REVOLUTION he refused to take the oath supporting the CIVIL CONSTITUTION of the Clergy and publicized from the pulpit his opposition to this legislation. As a result he was dismissed as pastor and ordered not to approach within eight leagues of his parish for two years. Disguised as a farmer he continued to perform priestly functions. When he persuaded the pastor and curates at Corzé to retract their oaths, he became an object of government search. When the army of the Vendée occupied Louroux-Béconnais, he celebrated Mass in his parish there (June 24, 1793), but he had to resume his disguise when the revolutionary army regained strategic territory. After being captured in the village of La Milanderie (Feb. 9, 1794), he was condemned to death as a "conspirator against the people," and guillined, attired in priestly vestments. He was beatified Oct. 31, 1926.

Feast: Feb. 21.

Bibliography: F. TROCHU, Le Bienheureux Noël Pinot (Angers 1955). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by the Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56); v. 13, suppl. and table générale (1959) 2:445–448.

[M. LAWLOR]

PINY, ALEXANDER

Dominican theologian; b. Allos, Provence, Feb. 25, 1640; d. Paris, Jan. 20, 1709. He came from a middle-class family of noble lineage, and entered the Friars Preachers in his early youth. In 1676, after preaching and teaching philosophy and theology in Provence, he was named master in sacred theology and appointed professor of Sacred Scripture at the newly erected national Dominican studium in Paris, a post he retained for 16 years. Having already published two multivolume texts in Thomistic philosophy and theology, he brought out the first of many works in spiritual theology in 1680.

Piny represents the Thomistic viewpoint in the quietist controversy and resembles Fénelon and the semiquietists in his mode of expression, but his teaching was never unorthodox. He was influenced by St. Thomas and Tauler through Chadron, rather than by Molinos or Mme. Guyon. In 1685, before the condemnations of quietism, either on the advice of his superiors or through his own prudence, he stopped writing and devoted himself to the direction of souls.

Bibliography: Anné Dominicaine (Jan. 1912) 508–518. H. BRÉMOND, Histoire littéraire du sentiment religieux en France depuis la fin des guerres de religion jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1911–36) 8:78–178. M. M. GORCE, Figures Dominicaines (Juvisy, France 1935); Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 12:2119–24. J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (New York 1959) 2.2:772–773.

[M. BEISSEL]

PIONA, ABBEY OF

Originally a Benedictine monastery in the Diocese of Como in Lombardy, northern Italy. It was founded by the CLUNIACS in the first half of the 12th century on a picturesque promontory at the point where the Adda empties into Lake Como and was dedicated to Our Lady and St. NICHOLAS OF MYRA. The solitude of the mountainous site and its distance from the main roads did not favor the numerical growth of the community, which always remained small and was governed, in accord with Cluniac usages, by a PRIOR rather than an ABBOT. It did, however, have numerous holdings on the banks of the lake and in the hinterland. In 1488, when the practice of COMMENDATION was introduced, the abbey was abandoned by the monks. In 1798 the commendation was itself suppressed and the property of the monastery was confiscated by the Cisalpine Republic. Partial restorations were undertaken in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. In 1937, the remaining buildings and grounds were given to the CISTERCIAN monks of the Casamari Congregation, who used it initially as a residence for the Abyssinian Community. It was abandoned by them shortly thereafter because of the rigors of the climate, and is now the home of Italian Cistercians. The monastery church is an excellent example of 12th-century Lombard Romanesque, while the cloister dates from the 13th century. Adjacent is a courtyard whose Cluniac style porticoes show strong local influences in design.

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topographique des abbayes et prieurés (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:2286. A. K. PORTER, Lombard Architecture, 4 v. (New Haven 1915–17) 3:286–289. V. ADAMI, “L’antica abbazia di Piona” Le Vie d’Italia 32 (1926) 341–345. M. ZECCHINELLI, Le tre Pievi (Milan 1951) 197–210.

[I. DE PICCOLI]

The 13th-century cloister of the Abbey of Piona, Italy. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource)

PIOUS DISCIPLES OF THE DIVINE MASTER

(PDDM, Official Catholic Directory #0980); a religious congregation of women with papal approval (1960), founded at Alba (Cuneo), Italy, in 1924 by Don Giacomo Alberione, the founder of eight congregations known collectively as the Famiglia Paolina or Pauline Family. Besides daily eucharistic adoration, the sisters perform domestic services in houses of the Famiglia Paolina; operate homes for sick or retired clergy; and engage in various forms of the liturgical ministries. The generalate is in Rome; the U.S. headquarters is in Staten Island, NY.

[M. F. MARCHEGANI/EDS.]

PIOUS FUND

Originally associated with the Jesuit mission field of Lower California, the pious fund opened in 1697. The Spanish crown permitted the venture on condition that it should not be supported out of the royal treasury. As a result, throughout the 18th century various benefactors offered gifts of money and land for the new missions.

These contributions were used as capital, the interest of which supported the apostolic undertaking. Eventually the Jesuits became administrators of the holdings, known as the Pious Fund of the Californias. Upon the expulsion of the Jesuits from Spanish dominions in 1767, the crown assumed management of the fund to support the Dominican missions in Lower California and those of the Franciscans in the new field of Upper California. After the Mexican Revolution, the fund was administered by the new government, which offered the income to support a bishop in California. In 1842, however, the Mexican government withdrew this offer, sold the fund’s holdings, and placed the entire capital into the national treasury, acknowledging an annual indebtedness of six percent for religious purposes in California. After Upper California was annexed to the U.S., no payments were made until a protest was lodged before a joint commission by the bishops of the new state. In 1875 the umpire, Sir Edward Thornton, decided for the claimants and ordered back payments to be made. Mexico paid the past accrued interest, but gave nothing for the period following the decision. Protest was made again in 1902 before the Hague Tribunal, which ruled that Mexico should pay to the U.S., for the Church in California, both the delinquent interest on the fund and a perpetual annuity, in the future, of $43,050.99. Mexico paid this for a time but defaulted in 1913. In 1967, Mexico's Pious Fund debt was settled with a one-time payment of $719,546 to the archdioceses of San Francisco and Los Angeles.

Bibliography: J. A. BERGER, The Franciscan Missions of California (Garden City, N.Y. 1948). U.S. Senate, 57th Cong., 2d sess., United States vs. Mexico. Report of Jackson H. Ralston, Agent of United States and of Counsel in the Matter of Pious Fund of the Californias before Permanent Court of Arbitration, The Hague, Sept. 15–Oct. 14, 1902 (Washington 1902).

[E. D. BURNETT/EDS.]

PIRHING, EHRENREICH

Canonist; b. Sigarthin, Bavaria, Apr. 12, 1606; d. Dillingen, Bavaria, Sept. 15, 1679. He entered the Society of Jesus and taught philosophy, moral theology, Scripture, and Canon Law at Ingolstadt. His classic work Universum jus canonicum secundum titulos Decretalium distributum nova methodo explicatum was written between 1674 and 1677 at Dillingen. An abridged edition of this massive work appeared in 1690 under the title Facilius et succincta sacrorum canonum doctrina. The Venice edition of 1693 was subsequently published under the title Synopsis Pirhingana seu compendiarium S.S. canonum doctrina. Pirhing's method in dealing with the Corpus, in contrast to the purely exegetical method in vogue of treating each title in sequence, was to choose the principal elements and coordinate them into a logical system.

Bibliography: R. NAZ, Dictionnaire de droit canonique (Paris 1935–65) 6:1504. J. F. VON SCHULTE, Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des kanonischen Rechts (Graz 1956) 3.1:143–144. A. VAN HOVE, Commentarium Lovaniense in Codicem iuris canonici (Mechlin 1928) 1:531, 537.

[B. R. PISKULA]

PIRKE AVOTH

One of the 63 tractates of the MISHNAH, placed at the end of Nezikin, the fourth order of the Mishnah. The Pirke Avoth (chapters of the Fathers), often cited as Avot, Avoth, or Aboth, is known also as the Ethics of the Fathers and Capitula patrum. It is a collection of ethical, moral, and philosophical maxims distilled from the flow of spiritual teachings of the rabbinic sages over a span of centuries. The Mishnah was compiled at the end of the second Christian century by Rabbi JUDAH HA-NASI with the collaboration of Rabbi Meïr, a student of Rabbi AKIBA BEN JOSEPH. Its six orders discussed religious, legal, domestic, agricultural, commercial, and physiological topics. The fourth order, Nezikin, dealt mainly with civil and criminal law and thus was appropriately followed by Avoth, which describes the desirable moral qualities of judges, wise men, and spiritual leaders.

The first chapter forms a chain of tradition reaching back to Moses and the Law received at Mt. Sinai, followed by the Prophets, through the generations to the men of the Great Synod, to Hillel and Shammai, and from them to the principal teachers of the Mishnah.

Chapter 2 begins with more of the wise sayings of Hillel, followed in verses 9 through 16 by quotations from the teachings of Rabbi JOHANAN BEN ZAKKAI and five of his disciples. When the Temple was destroyed in 70 A.D., the academy that Johanan founded at Jabneh became the cultural and spiritual center of Jewish learning and tradition. The closing verses in this second chapter are maxims quoted from Rabbi TARPON.

Chapters 3 and 4 contain teachings of many sages, mostly of the Tannaic period. About 41 of them are cited by name.

Chapter 5 has a different format—the anonymous sayings have a numerical basis (10, 7, 4, 3), perhaps as a pedagogic aid to memory. For instance, Mishnah 19 uses the number 4: “There are four types of those who sit before the sages: The sponge, the funnel, the strainer, and the sifter. The sponge soaks up everything; the funnel takes in at one end and lets out at the other. The strainer lets out the wine and retains the dregs; the sieve lets out the bran and retains the fine flour.” This illustrates also the timelessness of the sayings of Avoth, for the wisdom of this truism is apparent to teachers and students of every generation. The only attributed authorship is toward the end of the chapter, where there is a reference to Ben Bag Bag and Ben He He.

Chapter 6 is a separate group of rabbinical sentences collected in a Baraita (addition to the Mishnah), called Kinyan Torah (Acquisition of the Law), added to the original five at a later date.

Raba, who died in 352 A.D., is quoted in Baba Kama 30a as advising: “He who wants to become truly pious and virtuous, let him study and practice the teachings of Avoth.” As early as the eighth century (according to the Siddur of Rabbi Amran Gaon) the Babylonian academies had inaugurated the custom of reading a chapter of Avoth on Saturday afternoons. This custom continues today. Throughout the summer months Avoth is studied in the synagogues on the Sabbath, after the afternoon service by the Ashkenazim and in the morning by the Sephardim. It has been translated into Latin, Italian, Spanish, German, English, and many other languages. With its central themes the love of God and man and the veneration of learning, Avoth has exerted widespread influence over many generations.

A midrashic expanded form of Avoth known as Avoth de-Rabbi Natan has been preserved in two variant versions.

Bibliography: H. GOLDIN, tr., Pirke Abot: Ethics of the Fathers (New York 1962). R. TRAVERS HERFORD, ed. and tr., Pirke Aboth (2d ed. New York 1930; pa. 1962). C. TAYLOR, Sayings of the Jewish Fathers (2d ed. Cambridge, Eng. 1897); An Appendix to the Sayings . . . (Cambridge, Eng. 1900). M. GUTTMANN, Encyclopaedia Judaica: Das Judentum in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Berlin 1928–34) 1:365–368. M. MEILZINER, The Jewish Encyclopedia, ed. J. SINGER (New York 1901–06) 1:81–82. J. KOHN, Universal Jewish Encyclopedia (New York 1939–44) 1:32–33.

[E. SUBAR]

PIRKHEIMER, CHARITAS

Learned abbess of the Nuremberg convent of St. Clara; b. Nuremberg, March 21, 1466; d. there, Aug. 19, 1532. Her family was prominent in the civic government of Nuremberg, and her brother, Willibald, won renown as a humanist. She entered the monastery of the Poor Clares and, in spite of her earnest remonstrances, was elected abbess Dec. 20, 1503. For 20 years her life was peaceful and studious. Under the guidance of her brother, she read Latin classics as well as the Fathers of the Church, of whom Jerome was her favorite. Through Willibald, she met many of the outstanding scholars of the day, and was in correspondence with Conrad Celtis, Georg Spalatin, Christopher Scheurl, Sixtus Tucher, Johann Cochlaeus, Albrecht Dürer, and Desiderius Erasmus. Charitas Pirkheimer remained unaffected by the great praise of these scholars, and her convent, though considered a center of culture, maintained its religious regularity. When Lutheranism reached Nuremberg, the peace and quiet of convent life ceased. Pirkheimer had written (1522) a letter to Luther's adversary, Hieronymus EMSER, in which she thanked him for his courage as the "powerful defender of the Christian faith." The convent thus became a chief target of the governor of Nuremberg who from 1524 assigned to the convent Lutheran preachers to whom the nuns were obliged to listen. Until her death, despite the sufferings inflicted on her and her community, Pirkheimer defended her rights with courage and resourcefulness against the attacks of the town council, the abusive words of preachers, and the slanders of townspeople. The diary that she diligently kept during the stormy period of the Lutheran persecution came to light in 1852 in the archives of the convent of Bamberg. It adds much light to obscure points in the Reformation history of Nuremberg.

Bibliography: J. KIST, Charitas Pirkheimer (Bamberg 1948). Caritas Pirkheimer: Quellensammlung (Landshut 1961–). J. KIST, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:516. G. PFEIFFER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 5:385.

[M. DUFFEY]

PIRKHEIMER, WILLIBALD

A leading German humanist; b. Eichstatt, Dec. 5, 1470; d. Nuremberg, Dec. 22, 1530. The son of a distinguished lawyer, he studied jurisprudence, music, and classics at the Universities of Padua and Pavia (1489–95). In 1498, appointed one of the town councilors at Nuremberg, he became the center of the humanistic movement. He translated Greek classics into Latin and wrote a history of early Germany that won him the title of the German Xenophon. At the beginning of the Reformation, Pirkheimer sided with Martin Luther and attacked Johann Eck, Luther's opponent, in a bitter satire, Eccius dedolatus. He was included in the bull of excommunication of 1520, but he was absolved in 1521, after formally denouncing Luther's teaching. Later he attacked Protestantism with force when he learned of the persecutions to which his sister Charitas, abbess of the Poor Clares in Nuremberg since 1503, was subjected by Lutheran members of the city council. In that same convent his sister Clara and his two daughters, Katherina and Crescentia, were nuns.

Bibliography: Opera, ed. M. GOLDAST (Frankfurt a.M. 1610); Briefwechsel, ed. E. REICKE and A. REINMANN, 2 v. (Munich 1940–56). K. SCHOTTENLOHER, Bibliographie zur deutschen Geschichte im Zeitalter der Glaubensspaltung, 1517–85, 6 v. (Leipzig 1933–40; repr. Stuttgart 1956–58, v. 7, 1962–) 2:141–144; 5:219. H. LUTZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:516–517. G. PFEIFFER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 5:385.

[M. DUFFEY]

PIRMIN, ST.

Benedictine abbot, missionary bishop, founder of REICHENAU; d. Hornbach, c. 754. His ninth-century vita indicates he was a Visigoth from either Aquitaine or Spain. A Benedictine, Pirmin centered his missionary activity in the Upper Rhine region, and instead of being bishop of Meaux, as was earlier alleged, he was a CHOR-BISHOP, residing probably at some time in Medelsheim, a village near Hornbach. In order to evangelize the area of the Upper Rhine, Pirmin founded a number of monasteries in the area, notably Reichenau, c. 724, perhaps on a commission from CHARLES MARTEL. He founded there also Hornbach, Gengenbach, Schwarzach, and in Alsace, while in exile, MURBACH (726). He reformed Schuttern and Maursmünster. Although a contemporary of BONIFACE, he seems to have had little contact with him. Pirmin was buried in the monastery of Hornbach. His cult began in the early ninth century, and RABANUS MAURUS placed him in his martyrology for November 3 in the mid-ninth century.

Pirmin is almost certainly the author of the Dicta Pirminii or Scarapsus [G. Jecker, Die Heimat des hl. P. (Münster 1927) 34–73], a brief account of salvation history, as well as a commentary on the Apostles' Creed and a summary of Christian duties. The work is significant as an example of an eighth-century missionary's manual.

He is the patron of the Rhenish Palatinate, Alsace, and Innsbruck; he is invoked against rheumatism, rats, and snakes; the cities along the Inn River sought his intercession against the plague. In art he is portrayed as a monk and bishop holding a staff that is entwined with snakes.

Feast: Nov. 3.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Nov. 2.1:2–56. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores (Berlin 1826–) 15.1:17–35. A. ANGENENDT, Monachi peregrini; Studien zu Pirmin und den monastischen Vorstellungen des frohen Mittelalters (Munich 1972). U. ENGELMANN, ed., Der heilige Pirmin und sein Missionsbüchlein (Constance 1959); Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al. (1966) 8:517–518.

[C. E. SHEEDY]

PIRROTTI, POMPILIUS, ST.

Baptized Domenico Pirrotti; b. Monteclavo, Naples, Italy, Sept. 29, 1710; d. Campo (Lecce), Italy, July 15, 1766. After a good rearing and early education he decided in 1727 to enter the Order of the Pious Schools (PIARISTS), and to dedicate his life to the apostolate of teaching. He took the name Pompilio (Pompilius) Maria of St. Nicholas, and after completing his studies taught in various schools of the order, particularly in the mountainous region of Abruzzi. His zeal for instructing and helping the poor was particularly manifest, and when he was appointed novice master in 1744 and sent to Naples his zeal only increased. He was among the first to propagate devotion to the SACRED HEART in Italy and to advocate daily Communion, which was most unusual at that time. His enthusiasm provoked suspicion and a campaign of slander that resulted in his exile by Charles III, king of Naples. The indignation of the people, however, forced Charles to revoke his decree. Pompilius was later sent to Manfredonia for two years and then to Campi, near Lecce, where he died. He was beatified in 1890 and canonized on March 19, 1934.

Feast: July 15.

Bibliography: F. GRILLO and G. TASCA, Vita di San P. M. P. (Novara 1934). F. LÁZARO MARTÍNEZ, San Pompilio María Pirrotti: su persona, vocación, carácter y fisonomía espiritual (Madrid 1976). S. LÓPEZ RUIZ, S. Pompilio María Pirrotti, un escolapio mis- tico y activo (Salamanca 1984). L. PICANYOL, ed., Lettere scelte di S. Pompilio (Rome 1934). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 27 (1935) 223–234. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4v. (New York 1956) 3:113.

[L. A. IRANYI]

PISA, COUNCIL OF

A council convened in 1409 by the concerted action of cardinals of both Avignon and Roman obediences in the hope of ending the WESTERN SCHISM, then of about 30 years' standing. It was first broached in June of 1408 at Livorno, when 13 Italian cardinals who had wearied of the procrastination of GREGORY XII joined forces with the estranged curia of Antipope BENEDICT XIII. The two rival popes were pressed to attend, but they stoutly resisted all overtures, each determining instead to hold a council of his own, Benedict at Perpignan, Gregory at an unspecified place, which was in fact to be Cividale. Some of the established areas of obedience decided to cling to their old loyalties. King Rupert of Germany, Hungary, Venice, and Rimini chose to follow Gregory, while Aragon, Castile, Scotland, and some parts of France rallied to Benedict's side. The moment was so critical, and the propaganda of the Pisan cardinals so persuasive, that the greater part of Western Christendom placed its faith in the gesture of the united cardinals. Opening at Pisa on March 25, 1409, the council was supported by four patriarchs, 200 bishops (102 in person), 287 abbots (180 by proxy), the generals of the mendicants and of most other orders, some 700 theologians and canonists, delegates from most of the Western states, and 13 of the greater universities.

Disappointed at the refusal of the contending popes to cooperate with it, the council gradually turned into what was, in effect, a legal process for a crime of schism which, because of its long duration, had passed into heresy. Thus, after evidence had been heard that the parties had been legally summoned and had failed to appear, the two popes were declared contumacious at the second session (March 27). A month later this sentence was extended to those cardinals who had remained faithful to them. A dissident element entered the assembly when envoys of King Rupert of Germany presented a pro-Gregorian memorial at the fourth session (April 15). However, they departed the council on April 21, without waiting to hear the promised reply. The central phase of the council began three days later (fifth session) with an indictment under 37 heads of those measures taken by the papal rivals to hinder union. The council, however, attempted at this crucial stage to be as legal and as unexceptionable as possible in its procedure: before going further, it had the amalgamation of the two cardinalatial colleges and the withdrawal of obedience from either pope declared "canonical and legitimate," on May 10, at the eighth session. Only then were witnesses examined (May 17–22) on the 37 charges, to which further articles were added later. Finally, at the 15th session (June 5) the two popes were formally deposed as schismatics and heretics. Three weeks later Peter of Candia, the Gregorian Cardinal of Milan, was elected as Pope ALEXANDER V. He presided over the remaining sessions, published some reform decrees and, promising to call a council for 1412, dissolved the assembly on Aug. 7, 1409.

Since the Council of Pisa was not convoked by papal authority, it is not recognized by the Church as ecumenical. At the time, however, it was warmly defended by many distinguished proponents of conciliar theory (see CONCILIARISM, HISTORY OF), e.g., by Jean GERSON, NICHOLAS OF CLAMANGES, and PETER OF AILLY. It had juridical support in the great exposition of the legal foundations of the conciliar doctrine written in 1408 by the Paduan canonist (later Cardinal) Francesco ZABARELLA. Because Benedict XIII and Gregory XII both refused to admit the sentence of deposition, the net result of the council was that the Church now found itself enmeshed with three popes. In fairness, however, it could be argued that members of the Council of Pisa meant well; it must be acknowledged that by complicating an already disastrous situation, they made imperative the solution adopted at the Council of CONSTANCE in 1415, when the three contending popes were persuaded to retire and Odo Colonna (one of the Pisan cardinals) was elected to the office in their stead as Pope MARTIN V.

For the Council of Pisa II (1511–12) see LATERAN COUNCIL V.

Bibliography: Sources. J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio (Florence-Venice 1757–98; reprint Graz 1960—) 26:1131–1256. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux (Paris 1907–38) 7.1:1–69. "Acta Concilii Pisani," ed. J. VINCKE, Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumskunde und für Kirchengeschichte 46 (1938) 81–331. J. VINCKE, Briefe zum Pisanerkonzil (Bonn 1940); Schriftstücke zum Pisaner Konzil (Bonn 1942). Literature. J. LENFANT, Histoire du concile de Pise, 2 v. (Amsterdam 1724). F. BLIEMETZRIEDER, Das Generalkonzil im grossen abendländischen Schisma (Paderborn 1904). E. F. JACOB, Essays in the Conciliar Epoch (2d ed. Manchester, Eng. 1953); "The Conciliar Movement in Recent Study," John Rylands Library Bulletin 41 (1958) 32–38. B. TIERNEY, Foundations of the Conciliar Theory (Cambridge, Eng. 1955). G. MOLLAT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 12.2:2128–30. J. VINCKE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:520–521.

[L. E. BOYLE]

PISANI, MARY ADEODATA, BL.

Benedictine nun. b., Naples, Italy Dec. 29, 1806; d. Mdina, Malta Feb. 25, 1855. She was baptized Maria (Marija in Maltese) Teresa on the day of her birth in the parish church of St. Mark at Pizzofalcone. Her father, Benedetto Pisani, was a Maltese baron, and her mother, Vincenza Carrano, a Neapolitan who, when Maria was still very young, separated from her husband because of his dissolute life. At first Marija lived with her paternal grandmother. After her grandmother's death she attended the Istituto di Madama Prota, a famous boarding school in Naples that catered to Neapolitan aristocracy, until she turned seventeen. Her father's involvement in politics resulted in his expulsion from Naples and deportation to Malta. Marija and her mother followed her father and settled in Rabat, in the vicinity of Mdina, the old capital city of Malta. Although her father continued to squander his life, Marija always showed him respect whenever she met him.

Marija chose a quiet and simple life. She attended church daily and helped the poor. Inspired by a sermon she decided to join the Benedictine Community of St. Peter's Convent at Mdina, taking the name Marija Adeodata. Her monastic life was exemplary and edifying. She held various official positions in her community. Her favorite duties were that of a porter so that she could be close to the poor and that of sacristan that allowed her to spend more time in the chapel. For four years (1847–51) she was novice mistress until she was elected abbess. Although ill health forced her to resign as abbess after two years in office (June 1853), she is credited with initiating changes to reflect more authentically the Benedictine way of life. Over the years she wrote her personal reflections on spiritual life and spiritual direction and composed prayers in both Maltese and Italian.

People revered sister Marija for her saintly life. The canonical process for her beatification, begun in 1892, culminated when Pope John Paul II visited Malta on May 9, 2001.

Feast: Feb. 25.

[E. MAGRO]

PISE, CHARLES CONSTANTINE

Educator, editor, historian; b. Annapolis, Md., Nov. 22, 1801; d. Brooklyn, N.Y., May 26, 1866. He was the son of Louis and Margaret (Gamble) Pise. After attending Georgetown College (later University), Washington, D.C., he joined the Society of Jesus and went to Rome as a scholastic. Shortly thereafter, he left the Jesuits to prepare for the secular priesthood, probably at Mt. St. Mary's Emmitsburg, Md., although he may also have attended St. Mary's Seminary and College, Baltimore, Md. He taught at Mt. St. Mary's, where his students included two future archbishops of New York, John Hughes and John McCloskey. McCloskey later attributed his priestly vocation largely to the counsel Pise had given him at Emmitsburg. After his ordination March 19, 1825, Pise continued to teach at Emmitsburg and also for a time at the newly founded seminary in Cincinnati, Ohio. Between 1827 and 1832 he served at the cathedral in Baltimore and then at St. Patrick's in Washington, where he became friendly with Pres. John Tyler and Sen. Henry Clay and was elected Chaplain of the U.S. Senate (1832–33), the first Catholic priest to hold this position. At the invitation of Bp. John Dubois, Pise went to New York and served at St. Patrick's Cathedral and as pastor of St. Peter's parish. In 1850 he transferred to Brooklyn and was founder and pastor of St. Charles Borromeo Church until his death.

Charles Constantine Pise.

Pise achieved a national reputation as a preacher and polemicist; he delivered his noted panegyric on Charles Carroll of Carrollton at Georgetown a month after the death (1832) of the signer of the Declaration of Independence. In 1848, at the request of Bp. John Fitzpatrick, he lectured in Boston against the bigotry of the times. For a time he edited the Metropolitan, and he was coeditor with Rev. Felix Valera of the Catholic Expositor and with Rev. Joseph Schneller of the Weekly Reporter and Catholic Diary. Pise's works included a five-volume History of the Catholic Church (1827–30), Christianity and the Church (1850), Aletheia (1845), and a poem, "The American Flag," written to answer the Know-Nothing charge that a Catholic could not be a good American.

Bibliography: M. M. MELINE and E. F. MCSWEENEY, The Story of the Mountain, 2 v. (Emmitsburg, Md. 1911). J. GURN, Charles Carroll of Carrollton (New York 1932).

[W. K. DUNN]

PISTOIA

Town in Tuscany 20 miles northwest of FLORENCE; it is one of the most important in Italy for history and art. Of ancient origin, but with few ancient monuments, it resembles Florence with churches and palaces of the 12th and 13th centuries, a number of which, including the Romanesque cathedral of three naves, alternate black and white marble. Rich in all forms of art by many famous artists, the city has especially fostered music in the cathedral from the 14th century and in the theater from c. 1600. The Lombards, who influenced Pistoia's laws and customs, made it the seat of a gastaldo between dukes in Lucca and Florence. Bordering Byzantine Bologna and RAVENNA, Pistoia was important in the eighth century, but declined under the Franks, to revive in the tenth century. Its commune was very active (1100–1300), but from 1219 Pistoia was ruined in wars of Lucca and Florence and in internal struggles between GUELFs AND GHIBELINES, Blacks and Whites, and Cancellieri and Pancia-tichi. The failure of its bankers in the 14th century left Pistoia in a bad state. Florence deprived it of autonomy in 1401. A synod under a Jansenist bishop made it noteworthy in 1786, and it took part in the Risorgimento. The Diocese of Pistoia, known from the fifth century, flourished with monasteries in the eighth century and came to possess 14 abbeys. Originally immediately subject to the Holy See, it has been suffragan to Florence since 1420; for some time Prato was united with Pistoia (1653–1954).

Bibliography: E. LUCCHESI, I monaci benedettini vallombrosani nella diocesi di Pistoia e Prato (Florence 1941). P. PAOLINI, Pistoia e il suo territorio (Pistoia 1962).

[E. P. COLBERT]

PISTOIA, SYNOD OF

From Sept. 18 to Sept. 28, 1786, Pistoia was the site of a diocesan synod that had extraordinary significance in the history of JANSENISM. The Jansenist movement, which began at Louvain, followed a geographical trajectory that after PORT-ROYAL proceeded into Utrecht (see UTRECHT, SCHISM OF) and ended in Pistoia. The synod met in the church of the seminary and of the ecclesiastical academy, a church dedicated to Saint Leopold in honor of the Grand Duke Peter Leopold. The synod was held under the presidency of Scipione de' RICCI, Bishop of Pistoia-Prato, and the vice presidency of the grand ducal legate, Giuseppe Paribeni, with Pietro Tamburini, professor at the theological faculty of Pavia and theologian of Italian Jansenism, as promotor of the faith. Tamburini was assisted by Vincenzo Palmieri and other Jansenists and Jansenizing groups in Pistoia.

Preparation. The synod, convoked by a pastoral letter from Ricci (July 31, 1786), was preceded by a series of consultations with the Jansenists of Paris and leading spirits of the schismatic church of Utrecht and by publications and innovations condensed in the "57 Points" of ecclesiastical reform sent with the letter to all the pastors of the Pistoian diocese. The points were concerned with the renewal and updating of studies; the revision of the catechism and liturgical texts, including those of the Breviary, the Mass, and other sacred ceremonies; the economic reorganization of the clergy and a more just distribution of Church goods; and the purification of private and public piety of a devotionism considered superstitious and contrary to the spirit and practice of the primitive Church. The points, showing a combative attitude toward the Roman Curia and the so-called papal monarchy, were accompanied by a list of books intended for distribution. Recurring among the authors' names were Saint-Cyran (DUVERGIER), P. QUESNEL, and Z. van ESPEN, while the titles of many other Jansenistic and Gallican works, together with others of an orthodox nature, were included.

Acts of the Synod. The synod held seven sessions and ten congregations, of which three were extraordinary and seven ordinary. Compelled by the at times violent insistence of the bishop, about 250 priests attended the synod: from the Diocese of Pistoia, ex officio, the parish priests, the parish chaplains, and the canons (called "fathers of the council") along with secular and regular priests who were expressly invited (called "co-priests"). The development was rapid, even though the discussions dealt with almost the whole body of doctrine. From a neighboring residence Grand Duke Leopold himself kept watch, remaining aloof from "the Romish meddlers" and day by day receiving the result of each meeting "with complete satisfaction," not, however, failing to intervene with secret letters to the recalcitrant. To obtain votes, violence and favors were resorted to. Amid the fear and the violence and unaware of the subtleties, equivoca-

Relief sculpture stands above the main doorway of the cathedral Santa Giovanni in the town of Pistoia, Tuscany, Italy. (©Hubert Stadler/CORBIS)

tions, and ambiguities of wording, the pastors signed the synodic minutes, but their endorsement was only apparently unanimous, as became clear from their subsequent repudiations and retractions. The acts, published in their entirety in various languages, aroused the enthusiasm of not only the Italian Jansenists, but also and especially of foreign Jansenists. In a Latin codex of the Vatican Library one can read: "a printer from Leghorn had earmarked 18,000 copies to be sent to Spain and France," and from Spain, Cardinal F. de Lorenzana and the nuncio made known that they could no longer prevent the reprinting of the acts in the Spanish language without a previous formal condemnation. Attending the synod were French, Austrian, German, Dutch, and Polish clerics and laymen. The bishops of the schismatic church of Utrecht, the archbishop of Salzburg (H. Colloredo), and French clerics such as Bellegarde, Maultrot, and Clément, by letters and the Nouvelles ecclésiastiques, the Gazette universelle, the Gazette d'Europe, and the Gazette fran- caise, among the periodicals, extolled what in Tuscany was commonly referred to as the “Pistoian comedy.”

Subsequent Events and Condemnation. As a sequel to the synod, as had been foreseen, there had to be a national council “at Florence to put an end to all the gossip the Roman court and its adherents would be able to start and the dealings they could attempt.” The bishops, however, thwarted the project in the assembly held during April of 1787, in the Pitti Palace, in a hall called Novissimi. Fourteen bishops and three archbishops were present. In it arose a popular and ecclesiastical counter reform that had its epilogue in the bull Auctorem fidei, issued by Pius VI on Aug. 28, 1794.

The synod had affirmed, although in a form more prudent, the theories of C. O. JANSEN, A. ARNAULD, Quesnel, and Febronius (HONTHEIM), taking up again propositions that had already been condemned in the bulls UNIGENITUS and In coena Domini, the four articles of the Gallican clergy of 1682, the 43 presented by the Faculty of Louvain to Innocent XI in 1677, and the 16 presented by Cardinal L. Noailles to Benedict XIII in 1724, as Ricci himself was to confirm in a defensive letter sent to the Holy See and attested to in his Memorie (2:193–).

In the bull Auctorem fidei, which was drawn up by Cardinal H. Gerdil, seven of the 85 propositions taken from the synodic constitution (set forth under 14 titles according to the diverse subject matter) were condemned as heretical, and the others were proscribed under different censures, often according to the multiple meanings in which they could be presented (false, rash, scandalous, near-heresy, etc.). Also censured was the praise accorded the Gallican Articles in the decree on faith; the judgment pronounced against them by Innocent XI and Alexander VIII was renewed. The book of the acts of the synod was anathematized by name since it was not possible to single out each and every error (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer, 2600–2700).

Balanced View. It would be unjust, however, and ungenerous not to point out in the synodic reformist theme certain positive values, especially in regard to its pastoral and liturgical aspects. The letters of Bishop Ricci to the clergy and to the people, his personal letters, and the Memorie written toward the end of his life, admit of a calmer judgment than that which the historians of the 19th and early 20th centuries accorded them. It is true that there was a resentful anticurialism, heir to the spirit of P. SARPI and of SAVONAROLA; there was also a never-lulled anti-Molinism that turned the desire to purify the Church toward heterodox expressions formulated by the Jansenists and the Gallicans of the 17th and 18th centuries, and determined sympathies or antipathies in the various religious and theological schools. On the other hand, there is a correspondence and affinity between points discussed or decreed at Vatican Council II and some of the innovations attempted or desired by the Synod of Pistoia. Specifically, the synod gave great importance to the press, to the means of social communication. Ricci took an interest in the development of an enlightened culture. He saw to the translation of famous works. He founded reviews and other periodicals; he even had at his disposal various publishing houses. He reformed the program of studies in seminaries. There was a keen sense of the validity of the episcopal character (even if Ricci had the fault of episcopalism) united to a profound love of parish and parish priests (which, unfortunately, turned into parochialism). There was a constant attention to the theology of the faith drawn from the sources of the Bible and of tradition, for Ricci did make available the theological sources: biblical and patristic collections. There was an active concern to give new, expressive, and up-to-date form to the traditional catechesis. Versions of the catechisms that he patronized and diffused were numerous.

Finally, there were several positive elements of a liturgical nature. Here was revealed a certain appreciation of Protestant sensitiveness, at least in the theological conclusions. The Italian 18th century was stirred by a singular rebirth of liturgical studies, as seen in the works of Cardinal G. Bona and Cardinal P. Lambertini (later Benedict XIV). Even the historian Lodovico Muratori published, not without difficulties from the Holy Office, an excellent book, Della regolata devozione dei cristiani (1743). The polemical atmosphere of Jansenism brought about, however, an irritated and irritating psychological climate in which the essential values were confused with secondary elements, with the result that revisions and emendations were made of the Breviary, of the Missal, and the like that, instead of reforming, ended by deforming them. The history of the famous controversy on liturgical Communion, or infra missam, had as protagonists G. Nannaroni, a Dominican, and C. Traversari, a Servite; their conclusions, although attenuated, can be found in the acts of the synod and prove how correct insights and affirmations, in dispute and through dispute, become serious deviations from the authentic teaching of the Church.

But the Riccian experiment, intended to popularize the Latin language and make the people active participants in the celebration of the liturgy of the Word and the Eucharist, is not without significance. Perusing Ricci's circular letters, homilies, decrees, and books today [among them Brevi preghiere ad uso delle parrocchie, con l'ordinario della messa ed altre devote orazioni (Prato 1784); La maniera di pregare e di assistere alla s. messa secondo l'intenzione della Chiesa (Pistoia 1785); Della pronunzia del canone della messa (Florence 1787)], together with a series of little works regarding the order of ceremonies and sacred rites, the translations of the liturgical texts, and an accurate historical and theological revision of the traditional exercises of Christian piety “in which he avoided superstitious Pharisaism, and a licentious Sadduceism,” one is enabled to understand some of the synodic reforms, despite their illegitimacy and intemperance.

The acts and decrees of the Synod of Pistoia, purified of episcopalist mania, all schismatic and misdirected zeal, and the passions of a reformist anticurialism, give some evidence of an ordered and legitimate progress of the reality of Christian piety and an improvement, not a rupture, in a tradition of the faith that continues to be ever-present and contemporary.

See Also: BAIUS AND BAIANISM; GALLICANISM

Bibliography: Atti e decreti del concilio diocesano di Pistoia del anno 1786, ed. P. STELLA (Florence 1986). J. CARREYRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 12.2:2116–99. A. BOLTON, Church Reform in the 18th Century: The Synod of Pistoia 1786 (The Hague 1969). A. GERHARDS, “Von der Synode in Pistoia zum 2ten Vatikanischen Konzil: zur Morphologie der Liturgiereform in 20ten Jahrhundert.” Liturgisches Jahrbuch 36 (1986), 28–45. A. C. JEMOLO, Il giansenismo in Italia prima della rivoluzione (Bari 1928). C. LAMIONI, ed., Il sinodo di Pistoia del 1786 (Rome 1991). B. MATTEUCCI, Scipione de’ Ricci: Saggio storico-teologico sul giansenismo italiano (Brescia 1941), bibliography 228–330. M. ROSA, Giuridizionalismo e riforma religiosa nella politica ecclesiastica leopoldina. Rassegna storica toscana, XI (1965). M. ROSA, ed., Cattolicesimo e lumi nel settecento italiana (Rome 1981). R. TANZINI, Historia dell’assemblea degli arcivescovi e vescovi della Toscana tenuta in Firenze nel 1797 (Florence 1788). A. ZOBBI, Storia civile della Toscana dal 1717 al 1848, 5 v. (Florence 1850–52).

[B. MATTEUCI/J. M. GRES-GAYER]

PITHOU, PIERRE

Canonist, in whose writings were initially codified the maxims of Gallicanism; b. Troyes, Nov. 1, 1539; d. Nogent-sur-Seine, Nov. 1, 1596. Pierre and his brother François, sons of a distinguished legal family, studied at Bourges and Valence under Cujas. Since his Calvinist background prevented admittance to the bar at Troyes, Pierre withdrew to the Protestant district of Sedan, where he codified the legal customs into law. He resided for a time at Basle and returned to France after the edict of pacification in 1570. Having escaped the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, he was converted to Catholicism in 1573. As an adherent of Henry IV, he published an anonymous letter in 1593 canonically defending the right of bishops to absolve Henry IV without papal consultation. In 1594 he codified the maxims of Gallicanism in the epic Les Libertés de l’église gallicane in 83 articles. Pithou’s work formed the basis of the Four Articles of 1682. By decree of April 21, 1768, the Parlement of Daphiné gave legal enforcement to certain of Pithou’s 83 articles. After resigning the post of procurator general of the Parlement of Paris he concentrated on juristic studies, editing, among other works, the Capitularies of Charlemagne and the Corpus Iuris Canonici.

Bibliography: R. NAZ, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 6:1506. L. DE ROSANBO, “Pierre Pithou, biographie,” Revue du seizième siècle 15 (1928) 279–305. J. CARREYRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 12.2:235–38.

[B. R. PISKULA]

PITRA, JEAN BAPTISTE

Benedictine scholar and cardinal bishop; b. Champforgeuil, France, Aug. 1, 1812; d. Rome, Feb. 9, 1889. After being ordained in 1836, he taught history and rhetoric at the seminary of Autun, where in 1839 he published a study of the third-century epitaph of PECTORIUS. In 1841 he joined the Benedictines at SOLESMES under Abbot P. GUÉRANGER. While prior of the new monastery of SAINT-GERMAIN-DES-PRÉS in Paris in 1843, he drew up the list of authors and their complete editions for MIGNE’s Greek and Latin patologies. From 1845 to 1850 he engaged in scholarly research while traveling in search of funds to restore Solesmes. His Spicilegium Solesmense (4 v. 1852–58; Graz 1963) contains texts discovered by him. He was called to Rome in 1858 to study the law of the Eastern Church, and during a profitable journey studying manuscripts in Austria and Russia (1859–60) he came to the conclusion that relations between the Greek and Roman churches had been close until the time of PHOTIUS. After he was made a cardinal in 1861, he published the Juris ecclesiastici Graecorum historia et monumenta (2 v. 1864–68). In 1863 he discovered the secret of Greek hymnography and published Hymnographie de l’Église grecque in 1867. After Vatican Council I, he returned to his publications in Analecta sacra spicilegio Solesmensi parata (8 v. 1876–83). In 1869 he was appointed Vatican librarian. He became bishop of Frascati in 1879 and bishop of Porto and St. Rufina in 1884. He made contributions to the history of ancient Christian literature that are still of value, but his works have not received the attention they deserve. He died alone at his work and poor, as he had lived; he left many notes that have not been studied.

Bibliography: F. CABROL, Histoire du Cardinal Pitra (Paris 1893). P. SÉJOURNÉ, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 12.2:2238–45. U. ENGELMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:527. A. BATTANDIER, Le Cardinal J.-B. Pitra (Paris 1896).

[F. X. MURPHY]

PITTS, JOHN

Biographer; b. Alton, Hants, c. 1559 or 1560; d. Liverdun, Lorraine, Oct. 17, 1616. Pitts was nephew to Nicholas Sanders and a scholar of Winchester College (1571) and New College, Oxford (1578–79). He went abroad and entered the English College, Rome (1581), and was ordained (1588). Professor of rhetoric and Greek at the English College, Reims, Pitts earned further degrees at Pont-à-Mousson, Trier (1592), and Ingolstadt (1595). After two years as a canon at Verdun, he was for 12 years confessor and almoner to Antonia, Duchess of Cleves. Following her death, a former pupil, then bishop of Toul, appointed him dean of Liverdun.

Pitts published Tractatus de legibus (Trier 1592), Tractatus de beatitudine (Ingolstadt 1595), and De peregrinatione libri septem (Düsseldorf 1604); but his chief work is Relationum historicarum de rebus Angliae, of which only volume 1, De Illustribus Angliae scriptoribus, completed in 1613, was published (posthumously, Paris 1619, ed. William Bishop). Other sections, on the kings, bishops, and apostolic men of England, were left in MS at his death. Although he strove to replace John Bale's virulently anti-Catholic bibliography, and although he took pains to cite his authorities, Pitts, in exile, lacked opportunities for original research into the English medieval authors who occupy most of his volume, and he was seldom able to supersede or correct Bale's statements of fact by appealing to fresh sources. Concerning English Catholic writers who were his own contemporaries, however, he records valuable firsthand information.

Bibliography: J. PITTS, De illustribus angliae scriptoribus (Paris 1619) 816–817. J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time. (London–New York 1885–1902) 5:318–319. T. F. KIRBY, Winchester Scholars (London 1888). Publications of the Catholic Record Society 37 (1940) 30. W. R. TRIMBLE, The Catholic Laity in Elizabethan England 1558–1603 (Cambridge, Mass. 1964).

[D. M. ROGERS]

PITTSBURGH, DIOCESE OF

The diocese of Pittsburgh (Pittsburgensis), a suffragan of the Metropolitan See of PHILADELPHIA, comprises the six southwestern counties of Pennsylvania, an area of 4,092 square miles. The diocese, erected Aug. 8, 1843, originally included the entire western half of the state. It was reduced in 1852 when the Diocese of Erie was established, and in 1901 and 1951 with the erection of the dioceses of Altoona and Greensburg respectively. At the beginning of the 21st century, Catholics numbered about 40 percent of the total population. The Catholic Church in Pittsburgh is best known for the diversity of its ethnic communities and for the association of some of its well-known figures with the labor movement.

Early History. Catholicism was first brought to the area by the missionaries who accompanied the French expeditions of the early 18th century. The chapel of Fort Duquesne, built in 1754 and dedicated under the title of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin, of the Beautiful River, was the first place of public worship within the territory. The chapel's register of baptisms and burials, still extant, records many Native American converts, as well as occasional Irish and German traders. When the French evacuated and burned Fort Duquesne in 1758, the British renamed the site Pittsburgh. For the next 40 years, there were no resident Catholic priests in the area.

In 1799 Rev. Theodore Brouwers purchased a tract of land called Sportsman's Hall in Westmoreland County not far from Greensburg and became the pastor for the whole of western Pennsylvania. Ten years later, in 1799, Rev. Peter Helbron arrived at the Sportsman's Hall parish, carrying out many years of arduous but fruitful labor there. In the same year, Rev. Demetrius A. GALLITZIN came to the McGuire Settlement, renamed it Loretto, and opened a mission and a school. The first resident pastor in the city of Pittsburgh was Rev. William F. X. O'Brien, who built Old St. Patrick's Church in 1808. In 1820, Rev. Charles B. MAGUIRE succeeded O'Brien. He built St. Paul's Church, which was the largest and most imposing church edifice in the United States at that time. His successor, John O'Reilly, completed St. Paul's, invited the Sisters of Charity into the diocese and established a Catholic school and an orphanage. Michael O'Connor became pastor of St. Paul's and vicar-general for western Pennsylvania in June 1841.

Diocese. O'Connor. Michael O'CONNOR was consecrated bishop of the new Diocese of Pittsburgh on Aug. 15, 1843. Within a year, he had opened St. Paul's parochial school, begun publishing the Pittsburgh Catholic (the oldest diocesan newspaper in the United States), opened a chapel for free Africans, and established a seminary. By 1852 the diocese had grown to such an extent that the Diocese of Erie was created, and O'Connor was transferred there to be its first bishop. Popular outcry in Pittsburgh against O'Connor's transfer was so great that in three months he was reassigned back to Pittsburgh. In 1860, he resigned to enter the Society of Jesus.

Domenec. Michael DOMENEC was consecrated Pittsburgh's second bishop on Dec. 9, 1860, beginning an episcopate that was marred by the Civil War unrest and the financial panic of the postwar era. Growth in the diocese and a financial crisis prompted Domenec to recommend dividing it. The See of Allegheny was created March 19, 1876, with its cathedral city just across the Allegheny River from Pittsburgh. (Allegheny was later annexed by Pittsburgh and is now known as the North Side.) Domenec became the first Bishop of Allegheny, and on the same day John Tuigg was consecrated third Bishop of Pittsburgh. The new arrangement took most of the wealthy parishes from the Diocese of Pittsburgh and left it with a crushing debt. Bitter resentment and recriminations ensued, and Domenec was summoned to Rome for an explanation. He resigned on July 27, 1877, and the See of Allegheny was reunited to the jurisdiction of the Diocese of Pittsburgh. It was suppressed July 11, 1889.

Tuigg. The third bishop of Pittsburgh, John Tuigg, successfully reorganized the reunited diocese, bringing it out of its financial difficulties. During his administration, the notorious railroad riots of 1877 resulted in the long struggle between labor and management that would frequently involve the Church on the side of labor. At his death on Dec. 7, 1889, his coadjutor, Richard Phelan, consecrated Aug. 2, 1885, succeeded to the see.

Phelan. During Richard Phelan's episcopate (1889–1904), tens of thousands of immigrant families from eastern and southern Europe came into western Pennsylvania to work in steel mills and coal mines. National or ethnic churches were established to serve those immigrants in their own languages, creating a diverse plurality of tongues, cultures and traditions that would characterize the diocese for a century. In the Homestead steel strike of 1892, priests emerged for the first time as labor leaders, since they were often the only ones who could translate the workers' languages. A miners' strike in 1894 had the same effect in the rural areas. To keep pace with the growth in population, the Diocese of Altoona was formed May 27, 1901.

Canevin. During the episcopacy of J. F. Regis Canevin (1904–21), the diocese experienced a threefold growth in population, and a corresponding expansion of facilities. Canevin sponsored the lay retreat movement, furnished spiritual care for blind and deaf children, and introduced the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine. The steel strike of 1919 again prompted some priests to take the side of the workers, among them. Rev. Hugh C. Boyle, who succeeded Canevin as bishop in 1921.

Boyle. Bishop Hugh C. Boyle (1921–50) oversaw the development of a flourishing parochial school system and many charitable institutions. In the Depression, the Catholic labor movement took a more definite shape, with Leo XIII's encyclical RERUM NOVARUM as its guide. Some prominent Pittsburgh "labor priests" were Rev. James R. Cox, who was the Jobless Party candidate for president of the United States; Rev. John Hugo, spiritual director to Dorothy DAY; and Msgr. Charles Owen Rice.

Dearden. The term of Bishop John F. DEARDEN (1950–59) was marked by significant expansion, but also by the first stirrings of the mass migration from city to suburbs. When Dearden was transferred to the Archdiocese of Detroit, he was succeeded by John J. WRIGHT, Bishop of Worcester, Mass., who was installed in Pittsburgh March 18, 1959.

Wright. A brilliant theologian with a talent for public relations, Wright (1959–69) made the bishop's office even more prominent in Pittsburgh public life. He was a pioneer in the ecumenical movement and in the expansion of the role of the laity, and his ideas on both topics were reflected in the diocese of Pittsburgh before they were enshrined in the documents of Vatican II. Wright was named a cardinal in March of 1969, and shortly afterward transferred to Rome as Prefect of the Congregation for the Clergy.

Leonard. Wright's successor, Bishop Vincent M. Leonard (1969–83), faced ecclesiastical, civil and economic upheavals during his episcopate with determined but charitable orthodoxy, and the diocese suffered less in those times than it might have suffered without his steady hand. In the early 1980s, the steel industry collapsed suddenly, and more than 200,000 people left the Pittsburgh area to seek jobs elsewhere. Parishes in the industrial river valleys were devastated, and many of the ethnic parishes were among the hardest hit.

Bevilacqua. When Bishop Leonard retired in 1983, Anthony J. Bevilacqua was named to succeed him. During Bevilacqua's term (1983–87), an economic boom brought prosperity back to Pittsburgh, but the old industrial boroughs continued their decline. Bevilacqua reorganized the administration of the diocese and streamlined the parishes to bring finances under tighter control.

Wuerl. Upon Bevilacqua's appointment as Archbishop of Philadelphia in 1987, he was succeeded by Donald W. Wuerl, a native of Pittsburgh who had been Cardinal Wright's secretary in Rome. Recognizing the profound changes that migration to the suburbs and the collapse of the steel industry had wrought, Wuerl began an ambitious program of reorganization and revitalization. Many of the declining ethnic parishes were closed or combined into new territorial parishes, while ministries and services were established for new immigrant communities. Wuerl also reformed the diocesan school system, gaining it accreditation through the Middle States Association of Colleges and Schools, and creating foundations to give tuition assistance to poorer children.

Idealized portrait of Pope Pius I in the Sistine Chapel.

Bibliography: A. A. LAMBING, A History of the Catholic Church in the Diocese of Pittsburgh and Allegheny (New York 1880). W. P. PURCELL, Catholic Pittsburgh's One Hundred Years (Chicago 1943). M. AQUILINA, Building the Kingdom of God: An Illustrated History of the Diocese of Pittsburgh (Pittsburgh 2002).

[C. BAILEY]

PIUS I, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: 142 or 146 to 157 or 161. According to Eusebius (Chron.; Hist. 4.11; 5.6, 24) Pius I reigned for fifteen years. Both Eusebius and Jerome placed his accession in the fifth year of Antoninus Pius (142). Although the Liberian and Felician catalogues make Pius the successor of Anicetus, he was his predecessor according to Irenaeus, Hegesippus, and Eusebius, who list him after Hyginus. (See POPES, LIST OF.) The fourth century LIBERIAN CATALOGUE reports that he was an Italian from Aquileia, the son of a Rufinus. Like the second-century MURATORIAN CANON, the catalogue records that he was the brother of HERMAS, author of the Shepherd, which was apparently written during Pius's episcopacy. Her-mas's statement that he had been sold into slavery may suggest that the family was of plebeian origin. It also might explain why Hermas is a Greek name and Pius is a Latin one—slave owners were free to give slaves the names they (the owners) wished.

His attitude toward penance may be reflected in the theories exposed in the Shepherd. There is an indication that he excommunicated MARCION, the pupil of Cerdo, in 144, thus opposing a semi-Gnostic dualism and a stringent Paulinism that would deprive humans of their integrity as agents of their own salvation by making them helpless wards of an overpoweringly merciful Redeemer. The Gnosticism of VALENTINUS is said to have made great headway at this time. Along with the Gnostics came such famous scholars as HEGESIPPUS, JUSTIN MARTYR of Palestine, POLYCARP of Smyrna, and IRENAEUS of Lyons. These visitors testify to the existence of an influential episcopate in Rome as well as the city's growing significance as a major Christian intellectual center. ADO OF VIENNE was the first to include Pius in the martyrology. Modern excavations indicate that his supposed burial place next to Peter in the Vatican is without substantiation.

Feast: July 11.

Bibliography: J. QUASTEN, Patrology (Westminster, 1950–) 1:92–105, 268–272. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 12.2:1612–13. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 8:528. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 25–26. A. KIRKLAND, “The Literary History of the Shepherd of Hermas, Vision I to IV, Second Century.” A Journal of Early Christian Studies (Abilene, TX 1992) 87–102.

[E. G. WELTIN]

PIUS II, POPE

Pontificate: Aug. 19, 1458, to Aug. 15, 1464; b. Enea Silvio Piccolomini, Corsignano, now Pienza, near Siena, Oct. 18, 1405; d. Ancona. The most distinguished representative of papal HUMANISM, he began his studies at the University of Siena (1423). In 1431 he accompanied Domenico CAPRANICA to the Council of BASEL, and under the direction of Niccolò ALBERGATI and others he began a brilliant diplomatic career. Rising rapidly in the council's service, he became secretary to Amadeus VIII of Savoy, who later became the antipope FELIX V. To his early poetical writings he added prose treatises in defense of CONCILIARISM. These, together with his unsurpassed oratorical ability, procured his coronation as poet laureate (July 27, 1442) by Emperor Frederick III. Sensing the growing futility of the council, he entered Frederick's service and left Basel in November 1442.

“The Pius II Book of Psalms” manuscript with Gregorian chant annotations. The left page shows the Madonna and Child (initial “O”), while the right shows St. John the Baptist baptizing Christ in the river, Orvieto Cathedral. (© David Lees/CORBIS)

His sojourn in Germany, although unhappy, was fruitful in literary activity, at times serious, at others frivolous, e.g., the celebrated Historia de Eurialo et Lucretia. Personal suffering and his conviction of the need for concerted action against the Turks instilled moral seriousness. He was reconciled with EUGENE IV in 1445 and in 1446 received Holy Orders. With NICHOLAS OF CUSA, he negotiated the reconciliation of Germany with the papacy (1447).

In 1447 NICHOLAS V named him bishop of Trieste, where he completed his De viris claris and De Rebus Basileae gestis, his final word on that subject. In 1450 he was translated to Siena. On Dec. 18, 1456, CALLISTUS III created him cardinal. His literary production continued. The important Historia Frederici imperatoris and other works date from this period.

Pontificate. Moved by the recent fall of CONSTANTINOPLE (1453), Pius placed a crusading counterattack in the first place of the papal agenda. In October 1458, following his election as pope, he summoned a congress of Christendom to meet the following June at Mantua to formulate plans for the crusade. Indifference, evasion, and insult awaited him there. The French denounced his recognition of Ferrante of Naples and diverted men and money already collected for the crusade to René of Anjou’s invasion of Naples. To the levy of a crusade tax, the Germans replied with a personal attack on the pope, reminding him of the sins of his youth. Pius replied courageously to this opposition, and, immediately before the dissolution of the congress, issued the bull Exsecrabilis (Jan. 18, 1460; H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer, 1375), which reaffirmed papal prerogatives by condemning appeals to “future councils.”

Returning to Rome (October 1460), he brought order to the city and the states by courageous persistence and judicious nepotism. His love for Rome found expression in the bull (April 28, 1462) forbidding further destruction of ancient monuments. Pius never forgot his native soil. In 1461 he canonized CATHERINE OF SIENA and in 1462 made Corsignano an episcopal see. To the south, the struggle for Naples continued. Louis XI of France abrogated the PRAGMATIC SANCTION of Bourges (March 16, 1462), hoping to win papal support for the Angevin cause. Pius refused to abandon Ferrante, and thus sacrificed all possibility of French support for the crusade. Further, Louis replaced the sanction with a series of Gallican ordinances (1463–64).

The Crusade. Although his realistic appraisal of European attitudes had led Pius to attempt to convert the Sultan to Christianity by argument and exhortation (the famous Epistola ad Mahumetem, 1460–61), his crusading zeal remained strong. Undoubtedly his desire to avoid further distraction led him to lay aside the many proposals for Church reform submitted at his request. The final impulse to action was stimulated by appeals from Christians in the Levant, the scurrilous attacks on the papacy and himself made in Germany (see his moving reply, In minoribus agentes, April 26, 1463), and the actions of the heretical George Poděbrad of Bohemia. Angered by Pius's refusal to accept the Compacts of Basel, Poděbrad openly challenged papal direction of the crusade and the pope's traditional position as spiritual arbiter of Christendom. Encouraged by Cardinal BESSARION's success in persuading Venice and Hungary to join forces (Sept. 23, 1463), Pius declared his intention of leading the crusade in person and proclaimed the crusade on October 22. While there was some popular enthusiasm, his hopes for support from the princes proved illusory early in 1464. Nevertheless, having excommunicated Poděbrad (June 16), Pius assumed the cross and left Rome. He arrived at Ancona only to die there in the full knowledge that Christian Europe had proved indifferent to his appeals. His body was interred in the chapel of St. Andrew in Rome.

Appraisal. His heroic death did not receive appropriate recognition. Many humanists, feeling themselves neglected, vented their scorn on the dead pope. However, posterity has never ceased to value his writings. His Commentaries, a veritable autobiography and history of his reign, reflect his refreshingly ingenuous mind, his curiosity, delight in nature, and, above all, his firm grasp on abiding values. It is true that his reign witnessed the papacy's loss of control of the crusade as well as the final collapse of the moral unity of Christendom. Yet historians increasingly pay tribute to Pius's courage, self-control, judgment, and patient endurance. A sympathetic study of his life will carry one far toward a true appreciation of the grandeur and misery of the 15th-century Church.

Bibliography: Works. Opera quae extant omnia, ed. M. HOPERUS (Basel 1551); Orationes politicae et ecclesiasticae, ed. J. D.

MANSI, 3 v. (Lucca 1755–59); Opera inedita, ed. J. CUGNONI (Rome 1883); Der Briefwechsel, ed. R. WOLKAN, 4 v. (Fontes rerum Austriacarum 61–62, 67–68; Vienna 1909–18); Lettera a Maometto II (Epistola ad Mahumetem), ed. G. TOFFANIN (Naples 1953); Memoirs of a Renaissance Pope, tr. F. A. GRAGG, ed. L. C. GABEL (New York 1959). Literature. L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes From the Close of the Middle Ages (London–St. Louis 1938–61) v.3. E. VANSTEENBERGHE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 12.2:1613–32. J. G. ROWE, "The Tragedy of Aeneas Sylvius Piccolomini (Pope Pius II)," Church History 30: 288–313. R. J. MITCHELL, The Laurels and the Tiara: Pope Pius II, 1458–1464 (Garden City, N.Y. 1963). G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:528–529.

[J. G. ROWE]

PIUS III, POPE

Pontificate: Sept. 22, 1503, to Oct. 18, 1503; b. Francesco Todeschini Piccolomini, Siena, c. 1440. His father was Nanno Todeschini; his mother, Laodonica Piccolomini, was a sister of PIUS II. Pius conferred upon him the use of the Piccolomini surname. Although his father had wealth, it was his uncle who fostered his studies in law at Perugia, where he received the doctorate. He was then made archbishop of Siena although only 20 years old and a deacon. In March 1460 he was created cardinal deacon of S. Eustachio. He served as papal legate under four pontiffs. His diplomatic service began in 1460 when Pius II sent him as legate to the Marches. Paul II made him legate in Germany. Having learned German, he defended the interests of the Church effectively both with the emperor and before the Imperial Diet at Regensburg (1471). Under Sixtus IV he remained in Rome, winning praise for his upright life, gentleness, and culture. Innocent VIII entrusted him with the task of restoring peace in Umbria, which was torn by factional strife. Alexander VI sent him as emissary to Charles VIII, but this mission was not successful.

The election of the reformist Cardinal Piccolomini as pope, following the death of Alexander VI, took place under unusual conditions. Cesare Borgia had gathered troops and amassed money in preparation for an attack on Tuscany. Though stricken by the same fever that had caused the death of his father, Alexander VI, Borgia still hoped to dominate the conclave, and his troops took possession of the Vatican. But the cardinals then assembled in the Church of the Minerva, where, defended by the Roman populace against troops under Michelotto Coreglia, they elected Cardinal Piccolomini. Eight days after his election Pius III was ordained by Cardinal Giuliano Della Rovere; he was consecrated on October 1 and crowned a week later. Pius III's brief pontificate marked the beginning of the collapse of Borgia power. After the election Borgia was permitted to reenter Rome, but without troops. While he was placed under protective guard in the Castel Sant' Angelo, local lords with Venetian help were moving into Rimini and Pesaro and other Borgia holdings. This shift in power affected the next conclave; for although Borgia hoped that the Spanish cardinals might prevent the election of Cardinal Guiliano Della Rovere, his weakened position led him to negotiate with Della Rovere and to assist in the latter's election as Julius II. Pius III is remembered in Siena for commissioning Pinturicchio to paint the frescoes in the cathedral library, which he founded.

Bibliography: L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London–St. Louis 1938–61) 6:191–207. E. PICCOLOMINI, “Il pontificato di Pio III . . .,” Archivio-storico italiano 32:102–138. J. SCHLECHT, Pius III und die deutsche Nation (Kempten, Ger. 1914). C. WIRZ, Die Pontifikate Alexanders VI und Pius III (Bern 1918). G. B. PICOTTI, La Giovinezza di Leone X (Milan 1928). G. VOIGT, Enea Silvio de'Piccolomini, als Papst Pius der Zweite und sein Zeitalter, 3 V. (Berlin 1856–63). J. A. F. THOMSON, Popes and Princes, 1417–1517 (London 1980). R. BIRELEY, The Refashioning of Catholicism, 1450–1700 (Washington D.C. 1999).

[D. R. CAMPBELL]

PIUS IV, POPE

Pontificate: Dec. 25, 1559, to Dec. 9, 1565; b. Giovanni Angelo de' Medici, Milan, Italy, March 31, 1499. His family was of modest nobility and unrelated to the famous Medici of Florence. As the son of Bernardino de' Medici, who was deeply involved in the party strife of Milan, he experienced many changes of fortune. The family became so poor that he required free tuition, secured through the mediation of his father's friend, Girolamo Morone, in order to attend the college of Pavia. In 1525 he attained the doctorate in Canon and Civil Law at the University of Bologna. His oldest brother, Gian Giacomo, the condottiere, sent the youth to Rome for his personal safety in 1526. There he soon became a prothonotary. Later Giovanni left the Roman Curia to serve his brother again as secretary. His knowledge of the law and his native ability were eventually utilized by Paul III from the first year of his reign (1534), in the government of the States of the Church. He held the post of governor in several places, the last and most important being that of Parma, 1540.

His brother Gian Giacomo's marriage to an Orsini, the sister-in-law of Pierluigi Farnese, the pope's favorite son, greatly enhanced Giovanni's position at the court of Paul III, who even as cardinal had been his protector. He was made archbishop of Ragusa, Sicily, Dec. 14, 1545, “Tomb of Pope Pius III,” tomb effigy, located in the Grotto of the Vatican. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

only then receiving Holy Orders. He was appointed papal vice legate for Bologna, July 23, 1547; while in this office he hurried to Parma at the news of Pierluigi Farnese's assassination, and was largely responsible in saving that city for the Farnese. He served Paul III for 15 years before attaining the cardinalate in the pope's last consistory, held on April 8, 1549.

Cardinal Medici supported the Imperialist (Hapsburg) party and exerted much influence in the election of Julius III as pope; yet he managed to keep on good terms with the French. He was papal legate with the pope's army in the war around Parma, at the same time Gian Giacomo commanded the Imperial troops. He was altogether unsympathetic with PAUL IV's anti-Spanish policy, nor did he approve his often ill-advised zeal for Church reform. The Carafa pope made use of him principally as a consultant in legal matters. Happily Medici's health furnished a legitimate excuse for leaving Rome, June 13, 1558, for his Diocese of Foligno, awarded him in 1556 by a grateful emperor. From there he went to Florence to consult with his patron, appropriately now the Medici duke, Cosimo I, who for dynastic reasons was interested in Il Medichino (“Little Medici”) as a future candidate for the papacy. Having continued then to his native Milan to settle the affairs of his brother, who had died, he remained there from Oct. 18, 1558, until the death of Paul IV on Aug. 18, 1559.

Pope Pius IV. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

The conclave had lasted more than three months when Cardinal Medici was recognized as a candidate, being acceptable to both the French and Spanish governments. Christmas morning 1559 he was elected pope, assuming the name of Pius IV, saying that he wished to be pious in both name and deed. The Romans applauded the new pontiff for his tranquil manner and moderate disposition.

Papal Rule. In the light of his reputation for moderation Pius IV’s treatment of the CARAFA, especially his permitting the brutal execution of Cardinal Carlo, who had worked hard for his election as pope, seems incongruous and remains an enigma. The theory, espoused even by Ludwig von Pastor, that he wished by such drastic means to show his opposition to the type of nepotism involving high political stakes, is hardly convincing. His relatives, the Hohenems (Altemps), the Serbelloni on his mother’s side, and the Borromeo family descended on Rome soon after his election.

Two phenomena in Pius IV’s pontificate tend to obscure for many readers his person and his just claim to fame. They are (1) nepotism (certainly much less objectionable than that of his predecessor), especially exemplified by the pope’s high regard and affection for his cardinal secretary of state (and later saint), Charles Borromeo, son of his sister Margherita; and (2) the resumption and conclusion of the Council of Trent. However, with regard to the first matter, it must not be supposed that the pope with his good knowledge of law and wealth of experience in secular and ecclesiastical affairs ever relinquished the reins of Church government to his gifted young nephew. As to the second, even though not physically present at Trent, the pontiff made his influence felt through his legates, whom he chose with the greatest care to represent him and preside over the assembly, and to keep him informed promptly of their deliberations.

Conclusion of Trent. In fact, Pius IV’s greatest accomplishment and enduring monument is the Council of Trent, which he caused to be resumed Jan. 18, 1562, after a ten-year suspension, and which, after many vicissitudes, he brought to a successful conclusion, Dec. 4, 1563. Although his own formation was not scientific and he had no real theological knowledge, he knew how to delegate technical matters to experts. After the council he was prudent in establishing a commission of cardinals, which later became a congregation, to interpret and enforce the council’s decrees. Logical sequels to the council were the first Roman Catechism, designed to popularize the faith defined at Trent, and a new Index Librorum Prohibitorum, more practical and less rigid than that of Paul IV. Unlike his predecessor Pius IV did not attend sessions of the Inquisition, and he somewhat reduced its powers because he did not altogether approve of its strictness.

Although not a humanist, Pius IV appreciated scientific and literary merit, assisting many writers, and raising to the cardinalate a number of very learned men, e.g., Girolamo SERIPANDO, Stanislaus HOSIUS, and Guglielmo SIRLETO. He revived the Roman University, which was almost immediately staffed with a distinguished faculty. His zeal for building and urban public works knew no bounds. Allowed to bear the Medici coat of arms by the Medici duke of Florence, he patronized architects and artists, especially the titan MICHELANGELO. The drum of the dome and some other parts of St. Peter’s, the Church of S. Maria degli Angeli within the Baths of Diocletian, and the Porta Pia in the Wall of Aurelian, named after the pope, are all examples of the collaboration of Pius IV and Michelangelo. The Borgo Pio, a section of the city between Castel Sant’ Angelo and the Vatican, and the exquisite Villa Pia within the Vatican Gardens, also bear the name of him who completed them.

The pope's last days were disturbed by an abortive conspiracy directed against his life by Benedetto Accolti, a visionary of dubious antecedents, in a climate of public disgruntlement over the high taxes necessary to finance the Reform. The pontiff's recurring gout and its complications culminated in his death. Cardinal Borromeo arrived from Milan in time to assist his uncle in his last hours. Although first buried in St. Peter's, later (1583) in accordance with his testament, his remains were entombed, appropriately enough, in S. Maria degli Angeli. His simple but elegant monument, erected by his nephew Cardinal Altemps, is inconspicuous today behind the main altar in an area serving as the choir.

Bibliography: L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London–St. Louis 1938–61) v.15, 16, also Ital. ed., esp. v.17 (Rome 1963). G. CONSTANT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 12.2:1633–47. H. JEDIN, Papal Legate at the Council of Trent: Cardinal Seripando, tr. F. C. ECKHOFF (St. Louis 1947). G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:530–531. M. A. MULLET, The Catholic Reformation (New York 1999). J. W. O'MALLEY, Trent and All That (Cambridge, Mass. 2000). A. TALLON, La France et le Concile de Trent (1518–63) (Rome 1997). Epistolae ad Principes. Leo X–Pius IV (1513–1565) ed. L. NANNI (Vatican City 1993). C. GUTIERREZ, Trento, un problema (1552–1562). (Madrid 1995). P. PRODI and W. REINHARD, eds. Il concilio di Trento e il moderno. (Bologna 1996).

[H. H. DAVIS]

PIUS V, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: Jan. 7, 1566, to May 1, 1572; b. Antonio Ghislieri, Bosco Marengo (Alessandria), Italy, Jan. 17, 1504. As a boy of a poor family he tended the flocks. At the age of 14 he entered the Dominican convent at Voghera, taking the name Michele in religion. He was professed a Dominican friar on May 18, 1521.

Early Career. After residence in Bologna for higher education, he was sent to Genoa, where he was ordained in 1528. For many years he was lecturer in philosophy and theology in the Dominican convent at Pavia as well as commissary of the Inquisition there. Twice prior of his convent, he was later elected definitor for Lombardy, second only to the provincial. In 1550 he was appointed to the difficult post of inquisitor at Como, which borders Switzerland, then a haven for heretics. His courage in opposing the bishop's vicar-general and the chapter, who challenged his methods, brought him to the attention of Cardinal Gian Pietro Carafa (later PAUL IV), a member of the Inquisition at Rome. The elder champion of orthodoxy recognized a kindred spirit in the other's purity of faith and firmness of position. Later Ghislieri twice acted as inquisitor at Bergamo.

Pope Pius V. (Archive Photos)

Appointed commissary general of the Roman Inquisition in 1551 by Julius III, he was confirmed in the same office when Paul IV ascended the papal throne. On Sept. 4, 1556, Michele was consecrated bishop of Sutri and Nepi, and appointed prefect of the palace of the Inquisition. On March 15, 1557, Paul IV created him cardinal and gave him the titular church of Santa Maria sopra Minerva. On Dec. 14, 1558, Cardinal Alessandrino, as Ghislieri was then called (from his native city), was named grand inquisitor of the Roman Church for life. Even the new grand inquisitor could not always please the choleric old pontiff, and toward the end of Paul's reign suffered papal rebukes. The zealous cardinal was soon out of favor with PIUS IV (1559–65), who was ever the moderate and diplomat, whether dealing with nations or persons. Cardinal Alessandrino thought of retiring to his bishopric of Mondovi in the Piedmont, to which he had been named in 1560, but serious illness prevented him.

In the nineteen-day conclave (Dec. 19, 1565, to Jan. 7, 1566) that followed the death of Pius IV, Cardinal Alessandrino, despite his reluctance to be pope, was the choice of the majority. Cardinal Charles BORROMEO's support had turned the balance in his favor; Borromeo overlooked the differences between his late uncle, Pius IV, and the person whom he regarded as best fitted to direct the Church's destinies.

Papal Reign. Pius V began his pontificate with the announced intention of carrying out the decrees of the Council of Trent. Ascetic in appearance and attitude, he introduced monastic austerity into the papal household, e.g., the solitary frugal meals of the pontiff that became the custom until mid-twentieth century. Although adamant against nepotism, he was prevailed on by cardinals of the Curia to raise his Dominican grandnephew, Michele Bonelli, to the cardinalate. Fra Michele, taking his uncle's former title of Cardinal Alessandrino, became, in effect, the papal secretary of state. The pope, however, still retained Girolamo Rusticucci, his private secretary of former days. He created him cardinal with the title of Santa Susanna, and at times entrusted him with matters of great importance, especially during the illness or absence of Cardinal Alessandrino.

The Romans were apprehensive about the new pope because of his long association with the Roman Inquisition, and vigilant struggle against heresy, fearing he might prove another Paul IV. The building of a new palace for the Inquisition—the first had been destroyed at the death of the hated Paul—reinforced their fears. Pius V, to be sure, made ample use of the dread tribunal in his pledge to root out heresy, but not with the caprice and lack of logic of Paul IV. Pius V, determined to preserve the unity and integrity of the Catholic faith in Italy, strengthened the Index Librorum Prohibitorum to which he gave new prestige by creating a new administrative congregation fashioned after those of the Inquisition and of the Tridentine Council.

Papal Reforms. Pius V proved energetic in his reforms of the Church, Curia, and the diocese of Rome. He insisted on the residence of bishops, threatening long-term absentees with deprivation of their revenues and jurisdiction. He also made a systematic review of the religious orders, exposing and correcting corruption. A few orders, such as the HUMILIATI, were abolished altogether. Seminaries were established; synods were held; and stated meetings of diocesan clergy, or larger groups, were emphasized. He was greatly assisted by Charles Borromeo in setting this example of conformity to the Tridentine decrees.

Pius V has an enduring monument in the liturgy and two published compendia thereof: the Roman Breviary (Breviarium Romanum, 1568), and the Roman Missal (Missale Romanum, 1570), whose title pages in all subsequent editions bear his name. These works supplanted, with very few permitted exceptions, the multiplicity of Breviaries and Missals, full of medieval accretions and often barbarous Latin, then in use. They advanced uniform recitation of the Divine Office and the Mass according to the restored (restitutum) earlier and purer tradition, and thus were useful instruments in Pius V's policy of centralizing Church control in Rome. The definitive Latin catechism for parish priests, decreed at Trent, and in large part prepared in the pontificate of Pius IV, was published. It was most appropriate for a Dominican pope to sponsor an edition, published in 1570 in 17 volumes, of the complete works of St. Thomas Aquinas, the theologian par excellence of the council, whom Pius V had declared a Doctor of the Church, April 11, 1567. A new edition of the Vulgate was projected, and the work assigned to distinguished scholars. In short, scientific criteria were being applied to most of the sacred sciences, e.g., liturgy, hagiography, and Canon Law.

International Relations. Pius V's policies toward the great powers of Europe proved unfortunate. His excommunication of Queen Elizabeth I (Regnans in excelsis, Feb. 25, 1570) had an effect contrary to the one he envisioned, and his support of the measures of the crafty Catherine de Médici against the Huguenots in France, as well as his dealing with the opportunist Emperor Maximilian II, were criticized. His statescraft always reflected the friar and theologian. Despite his shortcomings as a statesman from the secular viewpoint, his great popular renown, ironically enough, lies in the field of international politics, although his approach was heavily colored by religious mystique.

A primary goal of his pontificate had been to propagate the idea of a Holy League of the Christian powers in a crusade against the Ottoman Turks, who had so long threatened the bulwarks of Europe. It was his hope that the league would dispel a very real danger to Europe and Christianity, and unite Christian nations in the face of a common peril. After many months of rivalry and disagreement, Spain, Venice, Genoa, the Knights of Malta and the States of the Church joined forces in a great naval expedition. They met the Turkish fleet in the innermost part of the Gulf of Corinth (Lepanto), and inflicted a humiliating defeat, Oct. 7, 1571 (see LEPANTO, BATTLE OF). On that day, the Rosary Confraternity of Rome was meeting in the church of the Minerva, headquarters of the Dominican Order, to recite the rosary for the special intention of victory for Christian arms. When news of the victory reached Rome, it was attributed to the intercession of the Virgin invoked by their prayers. In the wake of Lepanto, the pope's prestige grew immensely, though he declined any credit for the success. In commemoration of the victory he established for the first Sunday in October the feast of Our Lady of Victory, which was changed by Gregory XIII to the feast of the Most Holy Rosary.

The pope did not long survive Lepanto, a fitting climax to his relatively short, but significant, pontificate. His death at the age of 68 caused considerable lamentation. On Jan. 9, 1588, Sixtus V had his remains transported from St. Peter's to St. Mary Major's, where they were committed to a splendid tomb, surmounted by a seated statue of the pontiff by Leonardo da Sarzana. He was beatified by Clement X, May 10, 1672, and canonized by Clement XI, May 22, 1712. Behind the image of stern lawgiver, of a new Moses, which he projected, lay kindness, and zeal for the well-being of the Church. Besides guarding it against heresy and the might of Islam, he encouraged its expansion through the missions, and was a patron of learning, especially the ecclesiastical sciences. He was not indifferent to the fine arts, considering them as ancillary to religion. Thus he left only a modest impression on the architecture of Rome.

Feast: May 5.

Bibliography: L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London-St. Louis 1938–61) v.17, with bibliog., and v.18. R. HEDDE and É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 12.2:1647–53. A. FRANZEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:531–532. H. H. DAVIS, “A Rosary Confraternity Charter of 1579 and the Cardinal of Santa Susanna,” American Catholic Historical Review 48 (Washington 1962) 321–342. R. ANDERSON, Saint Pius V (Rockford, Ill. 1978). N. LEMAITRE, Saint Pie V (Paris 1994). A. SILLI, San Pio V (Rome 1997). F. A. P. FALLOUX, Historie de Saint Pie V (Paris 1844). M. FIRPO and D. MARCATTO, Il processo inquisitoriale del Cardinale Giovanni Morone 5 v. (Rome 1981–89).

[H. H. DAVIS]

PIUS VI, POPE

Pontificate: Feb. 15, 1775, to Aug. 29, 1799; b. Giovanni Angelo Braschi, Cesena, Italy, Dec. 25, 1717. His pontificate was the longest and most dramatic of the eighteenth century.

Prepapal Career. Gianangelo came of an ancient and noble, but far from wealthy, family of Cesena, in Emilia, North Italy. Following a youthful education in his home town, he studied law, became a Doctor utriusque juris (1735), and then entered the papal administrative service under the patronage of Cardinal Ruffo, legate to Ferrara. His aptitude for public affairs led to his rapid advancement under Benedict XIV. Under Clement XIII, he was named treasurer of the Apostolic Chamber, i.e., finance minister of the States of the Church. Only in 1758 did he become a priest. Clement XIV elevated him to the rank of cardinal in May 1771.

An amiable and rather ostentatious man gifted with excellent health and attractive presence, he had avoided the politico-religious debates that brought the Holy See into conflict with Catholic crowns concerning the suppression of the JESUITS. Upon Clement XIV's death (Sept. 22, 1774), Braschi ranked high among the papabili. Adversaries and friends of the Society of Jesus counted equally on him, one group hoping to achieve the dissolution of the order decreed by the deceased pontiff; the other, to temper the application of the brief Dominus ac Redemptor. After a long conclave of 134 days, Cardinal Braschi emerged as successor to the throne of St. Peter. He received the tiara on February 21.

Pope Pius VI. (Archive Photos)

Decline of the Ancien Régime (1775–89). Between 1775 and 1789 Pius VI had to confront an almost universal hostility of governments and public opinion against the Holy See. Rulers maneuvered to wrench from the pope concessions designed to earn popular acclaim, or to increase their authority over the clergy in their domains. Under the influence of the ENLIGHTENMENT in France and England, incredulity infiltrated the educated classes, the upper ranks of society, and even the clergy. National churches, even when they preserved regularity and piety, displayed active defiance of the absolutism of the pope and the Roman CURIA. This “anti-curialism,” bolstered by JANSENISM, aligned the bishops against the “pretensions of ULTRAMONTANISM.”

A pope able to hold his own against these opposing forces, oblige lax clerics to reform, and impose respect for papal authority would have needed unparalleled genius and energy. Pius VI possessed neither quality. Sincerely intent on fulfilling his duties as administrator and defender of the Church's rights, he lacked firmness, and even clearheadedness, concentrating on secondary questions, personal considerations, and petty diplomatic quarrels.

Rome and the States of the Church. Although greater tasks demanded his attention, Pius VI became absorbed in the administration and defense of the STATES OF THE CHURCH. No doubt the ruinous condition and misery of that region clamored for remedies. Too much money, however, was spent on an unsuccessful attempt to drain the Pontine Marshes, and on lavish projects within Rome, e.g., the foundation of the Pio-Clementine Museum in the VATICAN, and the restoration of the Capitol. The Eternal City regained a rather artificial brilliance which attracted outsiders, but the pope did not enhance his prestige by his excessive nepotism, and his ostentatious entourage.

For years Pius VI persisted in demanding from his neighbor, the King of Naples, a feudal tribute of a white palfrey, symbolizing centuries-old papal suzerainty. Failing to obtain satisfaction, he kept dispatching protests to all the European courts until the outbreak of the French Revolution.

Catholic States. In his relations with Catholic kingdoms, Pius VI was able to attain some improvement. In Portugal the death of King Joseph I (1777) resulted in the disgrace of POMBAL, archenemy of religious orders and of the Holy See. The very devout Queen Maria I put an end to anticlerical violence. In Spain the situation improved during the final years of the reign of Charles III (1759–88). In France Louis XVI, ruler since 1774, was pious and personally well disposed. Both Madrid and Versailles, however, were prepared to take action against impiety only when the Holy See maintained great reserve in its interventions within their borders, and when it continued to effect the total destruction of the Jesuits.

Prussia and Russia. FREDERICK II, King of Prussia, and CATHERINE II, Empress of Russia, sovereigns who were not Catholics but maintained relations with the Holy See, constituted themselves protectors of the last small communities of Jesuits, whose educational talents they appreciated. Catherine II even authorized the Jesuits to establish a novitiate within her realm. Pius VI tried to have them apply the brief of Clement XIV suppressing the Society of Jesus, at the risk of displeasing two powerful rulers who controlled, since the Partition of Poland, the fate of large numbers of Catholics.

Febronianism. Germany was the source of the gravest fears during the 15 years preceding 1789. Anti-

Roman tendencies there affected the leaders among the clergy. In 1763 "Febronius" issued against the authority of the Roman pontiff a veritable manifesto, repercussions of which were to be widespread. Pius VI succeeded in unmasking the author, HONTHEIM, coadjutor to the archbishop of Trier, and extracting from him a retraction, but FEBRONIANISM was not thereby checked in southern and western Germany. At the request of the Elector of Bavaria, Pius VI sought to establish (1786) a nunciature in Munich. This impelled the archbishops, who were also electors, to issue a public declaration, the Punctation of EMS, affirming that German Catholics depended only on their bishops, to the exclusion of any papal representative. Schism seemed imminent.

Josephinism. In the Austrian territories the situation during the same period was still more alarming. JOSEPH II, emperor since the death of MARIA THERESA (1780), had put into practice ideas inspired by the ENLIGHTENMENT and Febronianism, and constructed from them a system of ecclesiastical government known as JOSEPHINISM. He sought: (1) to submit the Church in Austria completely to the State; (2) to grant tolerance to all religious confessions; (3) to suppress houses of religious; (4) to oblige candidates for the secular priesthood to attend State colleges; (5) to abolish practices that he considered superstitious; and (6) to impose modifications in the liturgy and worship of the Church.

Pius VI was alarmed by the emperor's haste and uncompromising rigorousness. After his protests proved vain, the pope believed he could win over the ruler by an extraordinary move. Although no supreme pontiff had left Rome since 1533, he made a personal visit to Vienna, and resided there a month (March-April 1782). Joseph II received him courteously, visited him in return, but made no agreements. Joseph even persisted in carrying ahead his reforms, with so little regard for popular traditions that insurrections broke out in the more ultramontane provinces, notably in Brabant. At his death (1790) Belgium was aflame with revolt. Such was the determination of the population that this country was on the verge of obtaining concessions that Pius VI had been unable to gain from the emperor by persuasion.

Synod of Pistoia. The contagion of Josephinism reached Italy. In Tuscany Grand Duke Leopold I copied the reforms of his brother Joseph II. He found in Bishop Scipione de' RICCI a collaborator by conviction. The Synod of Pistoia (September 1786), an assembly of Tuscan priests with Ricci presiding, published decrees hostile to papal authority. As a result the Holy See beheld itself defied by anticurialists in ultramontane territory near Rome itself. This moved Pius VI to an unaccustomed outburst of energy. He roused the indignation of the faithful attached to orthodoxy, compelled Ricci to quit his See, and issued against his heretical theses the apostolic constitution AUCTOREM FIDEI (1794), a solemn condemnation of the aftereffects of Jansenism.

French Revolution (1789–99). The FRENCH REVOLUTION, far from ending the difficulties of the Holy See, posed more menacing perils.

Papal Attitude. Pius VI perceived events in France as signs of a rebellion against the social order ordained by God and of a conspiracy against the Church. He was convinced that the world faced a religious persecution. Doctrinally he condemned the principles formulated in the Declaration of the Rights of Man, while he supported the league against the Revolution.

Counterrevolutionary Actions. Pius's conduct up to the spring of 1791 seemed hesitant, either because he still counted on Louis XVI to preserve in France the constitution and Catholic traditions, or because he was uncertain about the will to resist on the part of the Gallican clergy. The enactment of the CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY, the royal assent to it, and the firm opposition of the episcopal body induced him to act. In two briefs (Quod aliquantum, March 10, 1791, and Caritas, April 13, 1791) he condemned not only the ecclesiastical reforms decreed by the Assembly, but also the political principles on which they rested, represented by the pope as the negation of the fundamental truths of divine revelation. The uprising of the citizens of AVIGNON and of the Comtat Venaissin against his sovereignty served to render the Revolution detestable. Basically, however, his opposition arose from religious considerations. This explains his unwavering condemnatory attitude toward all the oaths of obedience required of the clergy by the revolutionary assemblies and his resolution to demand of all Catholics submission to the "judgments of the Holy See on the affairs of France."

Once diplomatic relations with France were broken with the recall of the nuncio Antonio Dugnani (May 31, 1791), Pius VI pressed for the formation of a counterrevolutionary crusade. His support of the First Coalition partially explains the enduring hate vowed against him by the Jacobins. The States of the Church, not yet menaced by the war, welcomed numerous émigrés, including aristocrats and priests who were victims of the deportation laws. Toward the priests particularly, Pius VI displayed extraordinary generosity. The Oeuvre pie de l'hospitalité française, confided by the pope to Monsignor Lorenzo Caleppi, enabled several thousand to live at the expense of the papal treasury.

French Antipapal Action. The invasion of Italy (1796) by Napoleon abruptly changed the situation by advancing the Revolution to the frontiers of the Papal States (see NAPOLEON I). The Directory intended to take vengeance on Pius VI, at least by exacting a ransom for Rome, and perhaps by destroying the papacy itself. For two years the prudence of General Bonaparte, who refused to be the destroyer of the Holy See, permitted papal diplomats to purchase a precarious peace at the cost of abandoning the LEGATIONS, or northern provinces of the States of the Church, at the armistice of Bologna (1796), and the Peace of Tolentino (1797).

Once Bonaparte left for Egypt, incidents inevitably occurred between Jacobins and zealous partisans of the Holy See. This furnished the pretext for a French punitive expedition against Rome. General Louis Berthier entered the city (Feb. 10, 1798), proclaimed the establishment of the Roman Republic, and drove out Pius VI and the Curia.

Capture and Death. The pope was placed in circumstances that made his spiritual government of the Church impossible. The French made him captive, and began (March 1799) forcing him from city to city toward France. The octogenarian pontiff was afflicted with a seizure depriving him of the use of his legs, yet he appeared a picture of courageous and serene resignation. Unexpected consolation came to him from the veneration accorded him by the French populace. He reached Valence, in southeastern France, on July 14, and was held prisoner there until his death, August 28. This marked the nadir of papal fortunes in modern times.

Bibliography: Sources. Bullarium Romanum Continuatio, ed. A. BARÈRI et al. (Rome 1835–57) v.5–10. A. MERCATI, Raccolta di Concordati . . . (Rome 1954) 1:493–560; [59]–[66]. Literature. J. GENDRY, Pie VI, sa vie, son pontificat, 2 v. (Paris 1906). G. BOURGIN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 12.2:1653–69. G. SORANZO, Peregrinus Apostolicus: Lo spirito pubblico e il viaggio di Pio VI a Vienna (Milan 1937). M. C. GOODWIN, The Papal Conflict with Josephinism (New York 1938). A. LATREILLE, L'Église catholique et la révolution française, 2 v. (Paris 1946–50) v.1. J. LEFLON, La Crise révolutionnaire 1789–1846 in A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours 20 (Paris 1949). L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London-St. Louis 1938–61) v.39–40. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20 Jh., (Leipzig 1931–41) v.5. P. PASCHINI and V. MOANCHINO, eds., I Papi nella Storia, 2 v. (Rome 1961) v.2. E. KOVACS, Der Papst in Deutschland. Die Reise Pius VI in Jahr 1782 (Munich 1983). E. E. Y. HALES, Revolution and Papacy, 1769–1816 (Notre Dame, Ind. 1966). J. MCMANNERS, The French Revolution and the Church (New York 1970). D. MENOZZI, ed. La chiesa Italiana e la rivoluzione francese (Bologna 1990). A. D. WRIGHT, The Early Modern Papacy: From the Council of Trent to the French Revolution, 1564–1789 (London 2000).

[A. LATREILLE]

Pope Pius VII, portrait by Jacques Louis David, 1805.

PIUS VII, POPE

Pontificate: March 14, 1800, to Aug. 20, 1823; b. Barnaba Chiaramonti, Cesena (Emilia), Italy, Aug. 14, 1742.

PREPAPAL CAREER

He was from an old aristocratic family with a tradition of culture. Among his ancestors were the astronomer Scipione, famous for discussing with Galileo the nature of comets; jurists; and physicians of repute. His mother came from the Ghini family, closely connected with the Braschi, the family of Pius VI. Left a widow in 1750, she entered a convent of the Carmelites (1762) after rearing her five children. This background helps explain Chiaramonti's attraction toward positive sciences and his religious spirit. He exhibited also the characteristics of a native of the Romagna: independence, openness, vigor, vivaciousness. While studying under his first teachers, the Benedictines at Cesena, he often gave vent to his love for pranks.

Benedictine Monk. After entering the Benedictines (1756) he took the name Gregorio and pronounced his vows (1758) at the Abbey of Santa Maria del Monte of Cesena. During his studies at St. Justina's in Padua and later at St. Anselm's in Rome, which prepared professors of the Benedictine Congregation of Monte Cassino, Dom Gregorio was exposed to the influences of JANSENISM, and to a milieu receptive to modern sciences. At St. Anselm's, one of his teachers was the inventor of the seismograph, Andrea Bina, considered an excellent physicist. Italian Jansenism was then very influential, but less interested in doctrine than in reforms. From it Gregorio retained a desire to spiritualize the Church, and disengage it from temporal interests.

From 1766 to 1775 he was professor at the Abbey of St. John in PARMA, a city penetrated with French culture. There he acquainted himself with contemporary problems; witnessed Tillot's attempt to apply the principles of the Physiocrats; learned new bibliographical techniques after heeding the counsels of Paciaudi, organizer of the celebrated library in Parma; knew CONDILLAC, tutor of the young prince; and supported his method of introducing into psychology the principles of Isaac Newton.

Dom Gregorio's years as professor at St. Anselm's in Rome (1775–81) determined the orientation of his life. They coincided with the early years of the pontificate of Pius VI, a fellow native of Cesena and friend of the Chiaramonti family. The Abbey of St. Paul in Rome was experiencing domestic dissension. When the pope learned that the young professor was accused of supporting the young monks against the authority of the abbots, the pontiff named Dom Gregorio titular abbot, and in 1783 bishop of Tivoli.

Bishop of Tivoli and of Imola. In the small diocese of Tivoli Chiaramonti showed himself a model pastor, although he had to spend long months at the Quirinal familiarizing himself with what he termed "the great labyrinth of the Roman Court." Thanks to his influence he succeeded in defending his episcopal rights against the Holy Office.

Bishop Chiaramonti was transferred (1785) by Pius VI to the more important See of Imola, and raised to the cardinalate. At Imola the young cardinal displayed his abilities. Obligated to occupy himself with local civil administration since he was in the STATES OF THE CHURCH, he was able to ascertain the weakness of papal government. He was very energetic in repressing abuses, independent in his relations with the papal legate at Ferrara, and above all else careful of spiritual interests. His charity, firmness, broadmindedness, and tact were revealed especially during the FRENCH REVOLUTION. During the first French military invasion (1796), he intervened to prevent incidents between his flock and the invaders and opposed the uprising in Lugo. Under the regimes of the Cispadane Republic and the Cisalpine Republic, his attitude was very clear: to recognize the existing government, but to resist strongly whenever spiritual issues were at stake.

His Christmas homily (1797) admitted that democracy is not contrary to the Gospel, but recognized that it requires more than natural virtues, and cannot last if it disregards religion, which is ready to lend its support. On matters of principle he was inflexible, whether it was a question of taking an oath to support the Constitution of the Cisalpine Republic, or of the application of religious laws. His diplomatic skill and willingness to conciliate succeeded in conserving the essentials. When, for example, the Cisalpine Republic fell, he saved Imola, menaced by reprisals from General Hulin. Likewise he saved the Jacobin municipal government from being executed. He reproved the excesses of the anti-French reaction, preaching pardon and peace. So generous was the cardinal to French refugee priests in his diocese and to his own flock, suffering from a grave financial crisis and high food prices, that he had to borrow money to reach the conclave held in Venice after Pius VI's death (Aug. 29, 1799).

PONTIFICATE (1800–14)

During the fourteen-week conclave (Dec. 8, 1799, to March 14, 1800) Cardinal Chiaramonti voted with the more liberal group, the politicanti. The adroit intervention of Antonio Despuig, representative of Spain, and Ercole Consalvi, both future cardinals, broke the deadlock and settled the election.

From the beginning of his pontificate Pius VII left no doubt of his independence of Austria, which wanted to entice him to Vienna, and forbade him to traverse the Legations on his way to Rome. Forced to travel by sea to Pezzaro, he reached Rome, occupied by the Neapolitans, on July 3 and appointed CONSALVI as secretary of state.

Concordat with France. Overtures came a few days later from Napoleon for a concordat with France (see NAPOLEON I). Although taken unaware, the new pope proved decisive and revealed the spirit that was to animate his entire pontificate. Although he was pleased with the prospects of religious peace, he declared himself discontent that the First Consul should promise to safeguard the States of the Church provided the pope proved accommodating in religious matters. Effectively Pius VII was repudiating a confusion between the temporal and the spiritual, and making clear his intent to concentrate exclusively on the latter. He also discerned the difficulties involved in arranging an agreement, and still more in applying it. Yet he did not hesitate to accept the risks, for these delicate conversations could, he realized, reconcile the Church with the society that issued from the Revolution. Despite formidable obstacles; despite Bonaparte's brutalities; despite the opposition of Louis XVIII, the royalists, and the conservative zelanti group of cardinals, Pius VII succeeded in concluding the CONCORDAT OF 1801.

States of the Church. The reorganization of the States of the Church, whose richest provinces, the LEGATIONS, had been amputated, also posed problems. The pope relied heavily on his secretary of state. His solution was one of great moderation and adaptation. An amnesty, which exempted only the revolutionary leaders, prevented excess in the way of reaction. The question of alienated Church possessions was regulated by compromise. Lay persons, chosen from the nobility, entered the civil administration. The judicial system was simplified. Financial problems were faced by retiring the monetaria erosa to restore value to the coinage, and by improving the tax system. Chief among the innovations was the liberty accorded commerce. Efforts were made to improve agriculture, including a tendency to the partitioning of latifundia into tiny sections. Despite these measures the economy remained weak; nor were the reforms promoted by the opposition of the zelanti and the passivity of the bureaucracy.

Relations with Napoleon. The first part of the pontificate (1800–15), as indeed the whole history of Europe during these years, centered around the struggle against Napoleonic domination. The enterprises of Napoleon as first consul, then as emperor, imperiled the independence of the spiritual. Pius VII resisted this threat with increasing energy, conciliatory though he was in other respects. He protested against the Organic Articles, which reintroduced the GALLICANISM abolished in the Concordat. He also castigated the weaknesses of his legate CAPRARA for permitting the nomination of constitutional bishops to the new French sees. The government's doctrine on marriage met his further disapproval. Contrary to the zelanti, however, he resigned himself to the sometimes regrettable application of a Concordat that was on the whole very beneficial.

Italian Concordat. The Italian Concordat (1803) with the Italian Republic, eventually to become the Kingdom of Italy, disappointed the pope in other ways. Although it recognized Catholicism as the religion of the state and provided conditions more favorable to the Church than those in France, the Melzi d'Eril's decrees putting the accord into practice were inspired by JOSEPHINISM. Divorce was legalized with the introduction from France of the Civil Code.

Imperial Consecration. Despite the opposition of the cardinals, the Holy Father agreed to go to Paris for the consecration (Dec. 2, 1804) of Napoleon as emperor, although given only vague promises. Pius VII refused to demand the restoration of the Legations as a condition of his journey, in order to concentrate on matters spiritually advantageous. He agreed to modifications in the traditional ceremonial proposed to him beforehand by BER-NIER, and consented to have Napoleon crown himself. He refused, however, to receive from the latter the constitutional oath, since the constitution contained clauses contrary to the Church's principles.

The pope's remonstrances to Napoleon to improve the religious situation in France were for the most part repulsed. From the constitutional bishops who had not retracted but remained obstinate the pope could obtain the submission of Bernier alone. Marriage legislation remained unchanged. Catholicism was not recognized as the state religion. Concessions were limited to assurance of a salary for 25,000 priests (desservants), the foundation of six metropolitan seminaries, the expulsion of married priests from teaching posts, and greater liberty to religious congregations dedicated to education and charity. To compensate for this, Pius VII made so deep an impression by his spirituality and won so much acclaim from the populace that his visit gained extraordinary prestige for the papacy.

Increasing Tension. Napoleon failed to gain acceptance from the pope of a concordat with Germany; but the pope was unable to prevent the secularization of ecclesiastical possessions in Germany. Pius VII distrusted DALBERG with good reason. He also feared that the emperor wished to extend to all Europe his religious system by introducing the spirit of the Revolution, as he had in Italy. Napoleon's coronation in Milan as king of Italy (1805) resulted in a new statute given to the clergy from abroad, one which Rome judged contrary to its rights. As this Napoleonic system extended to the Italian Peninsula and approached Rome, the danger mounted that the Holy See would become a vassal of France. After the papal conversations in Paris, the events at Milan caused an irremediable rupture in the entente between the priesthood and empire.

The agreements realized became more difficult to maintain for reasons at once strategic and economic. Napoleon found himself impelled to take possession of all Italy. This led him into a conflict of ever-increasing gravity with Pius VII, who wanted to maintain neutrality as head of the Church and to assure the spiritual independence guaranteed by his secular sovereignty. The occupation of Ancona (October 1805) provoked a strong papal protest. Napoleon replied after Austerlitz by demanding that the Holy Father expel from his States the agents of the Allies, and close his ports to their vessels. Pius VII categorically refused. The conquest of Naples and the occupation of the west coast completed the encirclement of Rome. The recall of FESCH, which provoked the resignation of Consalvi (June 17, 1806), heightened the tension. Napoleon went so far as to summon the pope to league with him against the heretical English and the infidels, and then to participate in the Continental Boycott.

Pius VII reacted by suspending the application of the Italian Concordat. After this the Holy See awaited the worst; but the emperor, who had crushed Austria and Prussia, waited until he was finished with Russia before regulating his accounts with "the old imbecile." After Tilsit he tried vainly to make the pope yield, but a negotiation carried on by Cardinal de Bayane failed. General Miollis invaded Rome (Feb. 2, 1808), and in 1809 annexed the Papal States to France. In return the supreme pontiff launched an excommunication against the instigators of this aggression, without explicitly designating Napoleon. The non-Roman cardinals were driven from Rome. Pius VII, who had opposed the arrest of Pacca, his Secretary of State, was seized, carried off from Rome (July 10, 1809), and deported to Savona, near Genoa.

Captivity of Pius VII. Deprived of his liberty and his counselors, the sovereign pontiff henceforth refused to exercise his papal authority. As a result he would not canonically appoint those nominated to bishoprics by the emperor. Numerous sees remained vacant, to the great embarrassment of the French government. An attempt was made to escape this predicament by compelling chapters to name vicars capitular the bishops chosen by the emperor; but the papal brief reproaching MAURY for accepting the See of Paris under these conditions was brought to France by reliable messengers and disseminated by Monsieur ÉMERY. A further effort to bend the Holy Father was made by a delegation of bishops sent to Savona from the National Council in 1811, but the pope did not weaken. The affair of the "black cardinals," those who refused to attend Napoleon's religious marriage (April 1810) with Marie Louise, as a religious one, marked the beginning of a police persecution that increased Catholic resistance.

Fontainebleau. Napoleon then (June 1812) transferred Pius VII to Fontainebleau, near Paris, to force his capitulation after the French victories in Russia. When the Russian campaign turned into a disaster, Napoleon hastened to finish with the pope. Under compulsion Pius VII appended his signature to a projected concordat, which was intended as a basis for future negotiations and to remain secret. But Napoleon published the document, the so-called CONCORDAT OF FONTAINEBLEAU, as if it were a final one. After the emperor's departure, Pius VII, exhausted, sick, and fearing his death, had drawn up in the form of a testament a text in which he annulled and abrogated the concessions granted in the project he had signed. This document, recently found in the private papers of PACCA, contradicts what Pacca says in his Memoire. He was not, nor were the cardinals who returned to Fontainebleau after their liberation, responsible for Pius VII's retraction. They only counseled the pope on how to inform the emperor of his decision. Pius VII wrote to Napoleon in vigorous terms, but Napoleon kept the letter secret. Military reverses in France induced Napoleon to liberate his prisoner, who reentered Rome on May 24, 1814.

PONTIFICATE (1814–23)

Save for the crisis during the Hundred Days, which obliged the pope to retire to Genoa because of the impulsive act of Murat, who wanted to stir up all Italy, the second part of the pontificate (1814–23) proved less dramatic than the first. It was a period of attempted reorganization in the States of the Church, and restoration of the Church in various countries.

States of the Church. At the Congress of Vienna Cardinal Consalvi succeeded in obtaining the restitution to the Holy See of its temporal domain, with the exception of AVIGNON and the Comtat Venaissin, which the Most Christian King Louis XVIII intended to retain. Reorganization of the States of the Church posed grave problems. Two opposing tendencies clashed. Cardinal Pacca and the zelanti wanted to return to the conditions of the ancien régime, abolish French innovations, and severely punish collaborators in them. A second group, headed by Consalvi, now returned to the secretariate of state, judged excessive reaction unwise and adaptation to changed conditions necessary. “After a new deluge one cannot act as before,” wrote Consalvi. He undoubtedly realized that a pope-king could not adopt a constitutional regime, since his temporal sovereignty was meant to assure his spiritual independence, which would no longer be guaranteed if his temporal authority were limited by assemblies capable of voting laws contrary to Church principles. Consalvi did not regard all French institutions as bad; indeed, he esteemed many of them as excellent. He also found it essential to take into account the marked change in mentality due to long French occupation, and the force of new ideas sprung from the Revolution. The cardinal sought, therefore, a compromise between past and present by a series of administrative, judicial, financial, and economic reforms. These provoked the opposition of conservatives without satisfying liberals, who organized in secret societies, with SANFEDISTS combating the CARBONARI and the followers of NEO-GUELFISM with their own methods.

A series of revolts (1816, 1817, 1820) resulted and was blamed on the secretary of state’s weakness. Pius VII relied on Consalvi for administrative details and supported him more readily, since Metternich wanted the pope to supply military aid to crush the Neapolitan revolution, and unify the police and postal service of all Italian sovereigns in the battle against secret societies. Pius VII was as careful to safeguard his independence as under the Napoleonic regime and sharply refused.

Ecclesiastical Restoration. In Europe the Church everywhere, save in Austria, had been disorganized during the period of Revolution. A program of restoration had to take into account situations varying widely from country to country, and react against anti-Christian liberalism without becoming a party to the HOLY ALLIANCE. Pius VII braved both parties by restoring the JESUITS (1814). He had to conserve a sage equilibrium in dealing with governments in order to arrange agreements concluded at least by papal documents, if not by concordats.

Negotiations, carried on in a conciliatory spirit, succeeded in Piedmont, Naples, the Lombard-Venetian Kingdoms, the Principalities of Tuscany and Parma, Bavaria, Prussia, Baden, Württemberg, both Hesses, Saxony, and in Russia, concerning Poland. The way was prepared for future settlements with England and Switzerland. Only Spain, Portugal, and Austria remained aloof to this movement. In France the ultraroyalists sought to abolish the Concordat of 1801. Five years of negotiation and the defeat of two projects were required for a return to this Concordat.

In South America the revolt of the Spanish colonies was first reproved by Rome on the basis of information received solely from the Spanish court and the South American bishops (all appointed by the king of Spain). Better informed toward the end of his pontificate, Pius VII decided to send a papal mission to South America to investigate the situation and to prepare a reconciliation. The mission, under Muzi and Mastai (the future Pius IX), took place after his death. North America left the pope with a freer hand, and offered much hope. Missions had suffered from the European crisis, and began to revive very slowly.

Conclusion. In eight years the aged and unwell pope could not solve all the problems of religious restoration of the Church and the reorganization of the States of the Church in a changing world. At least he labored constantly to discover a modus vivendi between the new society and the Church, which would preserve the Church’s principles without violating those of the modern world. Pius VII’s troubled pontificate was characterized by a desire for comprehension and conciliation without weakness and by an alternation of the most amiable suppleness with firmness to the point of inflexibility. For the monk become pope, detached from all temporal interests, what counted above all else was the spiritual, which he lived intensely. He was courageous, lucid, and although averse to administrative minutiae, able in critical moments to frame major decisions to orient the Church. He deserves to be called “the pope of the new age.”

Bibliography: Bullarium Romanum Continuatio, ed. A. BARÈRI et al. (Rome 1835–57) v. 11–15. A. MERCATI, Raccolta di

Concordati (Rome 1954) 1:561–688. I. RINIERI, La diplomazia pontificia nel secolo XIX, 3 v. (Turin-Rome 1902–06). J. SCHMIDLIN, Papstgeschichte der neuesten Zeit, 1800–1939 (Munich 1933–39) v.1. A. LATREILLE, Napoléon et le Saint-Siège, 1803–1808 (Paris 1935); L'Église catholique et la révolution française, 2 v. (Paris 1946–50) v.2. G. BOURGIN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 12.2:1670–83. J. LEFLON, La Crise révolutionnaire 1789–1846 (A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours 20; Paris 1949); Pie VII (Paris 1958–) v.1. (to 1800). A. FUGIER, Napoléon et l'Italie (Paris 1947). E. E. Y. HALES, Revolution and Papacy 1769–1846 (New York 1960); The Emperor and the Pope (New York 1961). A. DANSETTE, Religious History of Modern France, tr. J. DINGLE, 2 v. (New York 1961) v.1. P. DE LETURIA, Relaciones entre la Santa Sede e Hispanoamérica, 3 v. (Analecta Gregoriana 101–103; Rome 1959–60) v.2, 3. P. PASCHINI and V. MONACHINO, eds., I Papi nella Storia, 2 v. (Rome 1961) v.2. L. PASZTOR, “Per la storia del Concordato di Fontainebleau,” Chiesa e stato nell'ottocento: Miscellanea in onore di P. Pirri, ed. R. AUBERT et al., 2 v. (Padua 1962) 2:592–603. M. O'DWYER, The Papacy in the Age of Napoleon and the Restoration (Lanham, MD 1985). R. ANDESON, Papa Pio VII (Rome 2000). M. CHAPPIA, Pie VII et les Pays Bas (Rome 1984). J. A. BRADY, Rome and the Neapolitan Revolution of 1820–21 (New York 1976). H. H. WALSH, The Concordat of 1801 (New York 1977). W. ROBERTS, “Napoleon, the Concordate of 1801, and its Consequences,” Controversial Concordates: That Vatican's Relations with Napoleon, Mussolini and Hitler, ed. F. J. COPPA (Washington D.C. 1999) 34–80. J. M. ROBINSON, Cardinal Consalvi, 1757–1824 (New York 1987).

[J. LEFLON]

PIUS VIII, POPE

Pontificate: March 31, 1829, to Nov. 30, 1830; b. Francesco Saverio Castiglioni, at Cingoli (Ancona), Italy, Nov. 20, 1761. Educated first at Osimo, then at Bologna and Rome, he was ordained in 1785. A specialist in Canon Law, he served as vicar-general at Anagni and Cingoli until he was appointed bishop of Montalto (1800). His refusal to take an oath of allegiance to NAPOLEON I caused him to be imprisoned (1808). Pius VII, who held him in high esteem, made him a cardinal (1816), appointed him bishop of Frascati and summoned him to Rome as grand penitentiary (1821). In the conclave of 1823, which elected LEO XII, he was a leading candidate. During the five-week conclave in 1829 the pious and learned Castiglioni was a favorite of the moderates and emerged as Pius VIII, despite health problems.

Poor health plagued him during his brief pontificate and hindered his officiating at liturgical functions, but it did not prevent him from pursuing a vigorous policy that avoided the conservatism of his predecessor. In his first encyclical, Traditi humilitati nostrae (May 24, 1829), Pius VIII announced his intention to put into effect his authority, to combat religious indifferentism, to maintain marriage laws, to promote Christian education, and to oppose secret societies. The brief Litteris altero (March 25, 1830) renewed earlier papal condemnations of Freemasonry. In his government of the STATES OF THE CHURCH, Pius VIII was milder than Leo XII had been and sought to improve conditions economically and socially. In his relations with Prussia, he was faced with the problem of mixed marriage. After acquiring the Rhineland and Westphalia in 1815, Prussia sought to enforce in these Catholic regions its own legislation concerning mixed marriages. To conciliate Prussia, Pius VIII's brief of March 25, 1830, allowed priests to assist passively at these ceremonies when they were not accompanied by the guarantees usually demanded by the Church. This did not satisfy Prussia and the conflict became more tense during the following pontificate (see COLOGNE, MIXED MARRIAGE DISPUTE IN).

France was disturbed at this time by hierarchical opposition to Hugues Félicité de LAMENNAIS, who at this stage of his career favored ULTRAMONTANISM and attacked GALLICANISM. The pope did not give his approval to the program of Catholic liberalism advocated by Lamennais and his followers, but neither did he issue the condemnation sought by Archbishop De QUELEN of Paris and other legitimist French bishops.

When revolution erupted in Paris, July 1830, it soon became apparent that King Charles X lacked popular support. Because of the close union of throne and altar during the Restoration period (1815–30) the July Revolution assumed a decidedly anticlerical cast. When some legitimist bishops fled France, Pius VIII disapproved their conduct and refused them admission into the States of the Church. By September the pope expressed hopes that the July Monarchy under Louis Philippe would be firmly established and would maintain friendly relations with the Holy See. He called upon the French bishops and priests to rally to the support of the new regime and rejected the plan of Archbishop De Quelen to withhold the clergy's loyalty. Pius VIII insisted on applying the traditional title of Most Christian King to Louis Philippe, whose private life hardly warranted it. In this way the pope successfully detached the Church in France from any official tie with legitimism, insisted that this Church remain independent of any regime, and prepared it for the burst of spiritual activity that emerged during the next two decades.

Revolution in France was soon followed by revolution in the Netherlands, where a concordat between the Holy See and King William I had been signed in 1827. Pius VIII followed a conciliatory policy but William I had antagonized all segments in his southern provinces. Belgian Catholics united with Liberals in patriotic agitation and won independence for Belgium in 1830 after a successful revolt. Although Francesco Capaccini, the internuncio, and Cardinal Giuseppe ALBANI, the papal secretary of state, opposed the proceedings in Belgium, Pius VIII took no adverse action. However, he opposed liberal and national movements in Ireland and Poland.

“Monument of Pope Pius VIII,” sculptural group by the 19th-century Italian sculptor Pietro Tenerani, St. Peter’s Basilica, Rome. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

In Latin America Pius VIII confronted problems caused by the movement toward independence from Spain.

The bishops of the U.S. held their first formal meeting, the First Provincial Council of BALTIMORE (October 1829). After the decrees had been submitted to the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, Pius VIII approved them granting the American bishops the faculties they had requested concerning baptisms.

Bibliography: R. BELVEDERI, in I Papi nella storia, ed. P. PASCHINI and V. MONACHINO, 2 v. (Rome 1961) 2:898–903. E. E. Y. HALES, Revolution and Papacy, 1769–1846 (Garden City, N.Y. 1960). J. LEFLON, La Crise révolutionnaire, 1789–1846 (A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours 20; Paris 1949). H. HAAG, Les Origines du catholicisme libéral en Belgique, 1789–1839 (Louvain 1950). A. DANSETTE, Religious History of Modern France, tr. J. DINGLE, 2 v. (New York 1961) v.1. J. SCHMIDLIN, Papstgeschichte der neuesten Zeit, 1800–1939 (Munich 1933–39) v.1. G. MOLLAT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 12:1683–86. P. DE LETURIA, “Pio VIII y la independencia de Hispanoamérica,” in Miscellanea historiae pontificiae 21 (1959) 387–400; repr. in Relaciones entre la Santa Sede e Hispanoamérica, 3 v. (Caracas 1959–60) v.2. O. FUSI-PECI, La vita del papa Pio VIII (Rome 1965). A. PENNACCHIONI, ed. Il papa Pio VIII (Cengoli 1994). J. D. HOLMES, The Triumph of the Holy See (London 1978).

[T. F. CASEY/EDS.]

PIUS IX, POPE, BL.

Pontificate, June 16, 1846, to Feb. 7, 1878; b. Giovanni Maria Mastai Ferretti, Senigallia (Ancona), Italy, May 13, 1792.

Prepapal Career. Born into a family of the lower nobility with moderate reform tendencies, the future pope studied (1802–09) in Volterra at the college run by the Piarists until he suffered an epileptic attack. His health restored, he studied theology at the Roman College, which was not yet fully reorganized after the French occupation, and was ordained (April 10, 1819). Initiated into Ignatian spirituality by the saintly Cardinal Carlo Odescalchi, for a short time he thought of joining the Jesuits. He spent his first priestly years at the Roman orphanage of Tata Giovanni. Then as auditor he accompanied (1823–25) Msgr. Giovanni Muzi, apostolic delegate to Chile and Peru, where his interest in the missions was roused. After returning to Italy, he refused to continue a diplomatic career and took charge of the Roman hospice of San Michele. As archbishop of Spoleto (1827–32) he confronted the revolutionary troubles of 1831 mildly yet firmly. Transferred to Imola (1832) and made cardinal (1840), he guided the diocese zealously until 1846 and was well regarded in liberal circles for his administrative qualities, good will, and avoidance of party spirit. It has been claimed by some that he was won over to the national and liberal program of GIOBERTI and Balbo by his friend Giuseppe Pasolini, but matters were not that clear-cut. Undoubtedly he disapproved the reactionary policies of GREGORY XVI and his secretary of state, Cardinal LAMBRUSCHINI, as well as their police regime in the STATES OF THE CHURCH. As early as 1845 he outlined administrative reforms (for the text, see A. Serafini, Pio IX, 1:1397–1406); but this program aimed to correct abuses rather than to modify structures. It did not envision political reforms or the introduction of a parliamentary regime, for lay participation in the government of the States of the Church seemed to him incompatible with the religious character of papal rule. Apparently he always regarded the program of NEO-GUELFISM as chimerical and believed that a pope, as spiritual head of the faithful throughout the world, should not act as president of a federated Italian state. Yet the highly emotional Mastai Ferretti sympathized with Italian national aspirations, nourished by the Romantic movement, to shake off the official and officious yoke of Austria that weighed on the various states of the peninsula.

After Gregory XVI's death, the mounting agitation of Italian patriots and liberals stirred a group of cardinals led by BERNETTI to support, in opposition to Lambruschini, favorite of the reactionary Austrophiles, a cardinal disposed to make some concessions to the spirit of the times and a native of the States of the Church, and thereby to appear more independent of foreign influences. Since they erroneously regarded Gizzi as too advanced in his ideas, they upheld Mastai Ferretti, who on the first ballot received 15 votes to Lambruschini's 17 and emerged as pope the next day (June 16, 1846). He took the name Pius IX in remembrance of Pius VII, who had aided him in his youth. Pius IX's pontificate was long, eventful, and significant.

Conservatism of Pius IX. The new pope was an enlightened conservative. Some regarded him as a liberal, and for a while his actions seemed to justify them, because he signed an amnesty decree (July 17); named as secretary of state Cardinal Gizzi; chose as counselor Msgr. Giovanni Corboli-Bussi (1813–50), a young prelate open to new ideas; showed favor to Father VENTURA DI RAULICA, an eloquent disciple of LAMENNAIS; and granted some ardently desired reforms, although this concession lacked a comprehensive plan. These limited gestures sufficed then to release mass enthusiasm. Heedless of the fact that the encyclical Qui pluribus (Nov. 9, 1846) renewed Gregory XVI's condemnations of liberalism's fundamental principles, many saw in Pius IX, as Ozanam did, "the envoy sent by God to conclude the great business of the 19th century, the alliance of religion and liberty." All liberal Europe applauded the pope. For some months papal prestige attained its zenith, especially since Rome reached an agreement with the Ottoman Empire, which resulted in the reestablishment of the Latin Patriarchate of JERUSALEM (October 1847); Rome also signed a relatively favorable concordat with Russia after negotiating since 1845. Enthusiasm was highest in Italy, where all manifestations against the Hapsburg and other reactionary regimes were accompanied with the cry "Viva Pio Nono!"

The myth of the liberal pope soon exploded. Despite concessions won by those who exploited Pius IX's yearning for popularity, it gradually became clear that the pope would refuse, in the name of the spiritual independence of the Holy See, to transform the States of the Church into a constitutional government and that he would never agree to participate actively in a war for Italian independence against Austria, because this would be incompatible with his role as common father of all the faithful, as he noted in his allocution of April 29, 1848. An economic depression and Pius IX's lack of political competence precipitated a crisis. After the assassination of the papal prime minister ROSSI by the radicals, the pope fled the uprising and took refuge in Gaeta in the kingdom of Naples (Nov. 24, 1848). Soon afterward Mazzini and his followers proclaimed the Roman Republic; but Pius IX, supported by European diplomacy and a French expeditionary force, reentered Rome (April 12, 1850). The papal regime, restored in an atmosphere of passionate resentment, justified Carbolli-Bussi's designation of it as "reactionary and maladroit."

More important than the retrograde character of this political restoration was the changed mentality evident in Pius IX, whose preoccupation with religious reaction dominated and conditioned his ideas on political reaction. As often happened, he continued to allow his illusions to deceive him; and his entourage lost no opportunity to revive in his impressionable soul memories of the bloody Roman revolution. Apart from psychological considerations, the pope's theoretical conviction was reinforced, and so was his habitual distrust of principles whose dangerous results were becoming evident. Henceforth he was more firmly persuaded than ever that an intimate connection existed between the principles of the FRENCH REVOLUTION and the destruction of traditional values in the social, moral, and religious order. In this experience lay the seed of the entire Syllabus of Errors.

End of Temporal Power. The government of the States of the Church, directed by Cardinal ANTONELLI,

Pope Pius IX. (Archive Photos)

secretary of state (1848–76), put into effect administrative improvements too little noted by 19th-century historians; but the educated classes were exasperated by a regime that accorded no political liberty to its citizens. It was not difficult for Cavour to exploit this situation to hasten Italian unification. After the annexation of Romagna (March 1860) and of the Marches after the battle of Castelfidardo (September 1860), French military aid permitted the retention of Rome and its environs for another decade by the pope, who did not cease protesting and demanding the restitution "pure and simple" of the "stolen" provinces. To realists who tried to persuade him that sooner or later he must negotiate, Pius IX opposed a mystical confidence in divine providence, nourished by the conviction that the political convulsions in which he was implicated were only an episode in the great battle between God and Satan, in which Satan's defeat was inevitable. The conflict of liberal and anticlerical Italy against the papal temporal power seemed to the pope a war of religion, in which resistance to what he described more and more freely as "the Revolution" was no longer a question of the equilibrium of diplomatic or military forces, but a matter for prayer. Although he was merciless in his judgment of the concrete manner in which Italy realized its unification under the lead of anticlerical Piedmont, Pius IX was never disinterested in the national cause; and to the astonishment of many of his counselors, he had to restrain himself from manifesting publicly his union of mind with certain aspirations of the heroes of the RISORGIMENTO. Italian troops took advantage of the Franco-Prussian War, occupied Rome (Sept. 20, 1870), and ended the papal temporal power. Pius IX, who regarded himself less as a dethroned sovereign than as the custodian of a property for which he was responsible to all Catholics, refused to bow to the fait accompli. After refusing to accept the Law of GUARANTEES, proposed by Italy, he considered himself a prisoner in the Vatican.

Varied Activities. The ROMAN QUESTION and the bitter politicoreligious conflicts with Italy that resulted from the official world's incomprehension of the Holy See's preoccupations by no means absorbed all Pius IX's energies. The essential part of his pontificate was on another plane, i.e., the internal guidance of the Church. He concluded concordats with Russia (1847), Spain (1851), Austria (1855), and several Latin American states. Further, he promoted Catholic reinvigoration in Germany, where the KULTURKAMPF highlighted the new vitality of this Church, so weak only a half-century previously. He reestablished the hierarchy in England (1850) and in the Netherlands (1853), and erected 206 new dioceses and vicariates apostolic, notably in the U.S. and in British colonies. Under Vatican impulse missionary work expanded vigorously throughout the world.

Increased Centralization. Centralization of authority progressed continually and was one of the most striking phenomena of Pius IX's pontificate. It eliminated the remaining ecclesiastical particularism in various nations. This growth of Roman influence caused regrets among those who had known the advantages of pluralism; and it even aroused somewhat violent reactions in the Eastern Churches united with Rome, which did not acquiesce in the reduced autonomy of their bishops decreed in the bull Reversurus (1867). On the whole, this trend was beneficial in countries where the Church was weakened by the regalian traditions of the ancien régime. Diverse means were used after 1850 to accelerate this evolution, but the victory of ULTRAMONTANISM over the last centers of resistance by GALLICANISM or FEBRONIANISM has rightly been termed "the triumph of a man as much as that of a doctrine." In good part the explanation lies in the immense prestige, far surpassing that of any predecessors, that Pius IX enjoyed for more than a quarter-century among the Catholic masses and that manifested itself on the occasion of the pope's various anniversary jubilees: 50th as a priest (1869), 25th as pope (1871), 50th as bishop (1877). This prestige rested partly on the attractive personality of the pontiff, who multiplied personal contacts during innumerable private and group audiences, and partly on sympathy for his repeated misfortunes, such as the exile to Gaeta, the Piedmontese aggression, and the occupation of Rome, which led some to venerate him as a true martyr. In large segments of the Catholic world, above all in France, a true devotion to the pope resulted. This was a very important new phenomenon in Church history, which explains the facility with which the mass of the clergy and faithful rallied to the doctrine, obscured for centuries, of personal papal infallibility (see PAPACY).

The triumph of this movement toward closer and closer direction of the entire Church from Rome disquieted governments, which took it ill to see the local clergies freed from their control. The Kulturkampf in Germany, the rupture of the concordat in Austria, and numerous difficulties in Latin America are evidence of the vigorous reaction in some states, especially after 1870.

Shortcomings. Democratic opinion did not pardon Pius IX for his reversal of policy in 1848, and reproached him for the support supplied everywhere by the Church after 1848 to conservative parties, and especially for the repeated anathemas against modern liberties. Pius IX was maladroitly counseled by his advisers and failed to discriminate with the lucidity of LEO XIII between rationalist LIBERALISM and INDIFFERENTISM, and the legitimate elements in Catholic liberalism, combined as they sometimes were with imprudences. As a result the pope proved unable to adapt the Church to the profound political and social evolution that kept intensifying from midcentury. On the contrary, as he advanced in years he tended more and more to identify the Church's misfortunes with the forms of government inspired by liberal principles, without taking into account the danger of so insistently presenting political realities as associated with the triumph of an anti-Christian philosophy. At Pius IX's death the Catholic Church, though strengthened within, appeared isolated in a hostile world, the more so since he did not succeed in imparting on the scientific level the impulse needed to react efficaciously against the progress of RATIONALISM and POSITIVISM and to adapt certain traditional theological positions to contemporary intellectual movements, notably the progress of natural and historic sciences.

Doctrinal Accomplishments. Despite this grave lacuna, which caused Catholic teaching to lose precious time, Pius IX played an important doctrinal role. He issued warnings or condemnations against ONTOLOGISM and TRADITIONALISM; against the teachings of certain philosophers and theologians, notably Anton GÜNTHER and FROHSCHAMMER; and against the tendencies of the school of DÖLLINGER (Tuas libenter, Dec. 21, 1863). These measures favored the restoration of NEOSCHOLASTICISM. Pius IX also published numerous encyclicals and allocutions, which constitute a much more complete and systematic ensemble than Gregory XVI's, although they lack Leo XIII's originality. The pope also took frequent occasion to recall the principles that should guide the restoration of society, particularly in the encyclical QUANTA CURA and the accompanying SYLLABUS OF ERRORS, both of which were the objects of passionate discussions. In addition Pius IX solemnly defined the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION (Dec. 8, 1854), which promoted a flowering of Marian devotion. Above all he convoked VATICAN COUNCIL I (1869–70), important for its definition of papal primacy and infallibility, on which most contemporary attention concentrated, and also for its constitution De fide catholica, which was characteristic of Pius IX's positive contribution and marked a strong effort to eliminate the last traces of the naturalistic DEISM of the ENLIGHTENMENT and to refocus Catholic thought on the fundamental data of revelation.

Spiritual Achievements. This vast doctrinal effort had its counterpart in Pius IX's parallel effort to deepen the clergy's spiritual life and to stimulate the devotion of the faithful. The greatest of the many changes in the Church during his pontificate was the deepening spiritual quality of average Catholic life. Among the many factors contributing to this development, the pope's personal role was important, because he appeared to all as an exemplar of piety, and still more because he consecrated a good part of his efforts to activate and sometimes to hasten the evolution that followed the great revolutionary crisis. Precisely because he believed the success of this work permitted no concession to modern ideas, he always maintained an intransigent attitude, often without nuances.

Conclusion. Pius IX during his lifetime was exalted as a saint and criticized as a vain autocrat and unintelligent puppet maneuvered by obtuse reactionaries. A threefold disadvantage always impeded him. From his childhood malady he retained an excessive emotionalism, which explains his propensity to heed the most recent advice; yet when duty required, he could be unyielding in the face of difficulties. Second, like most Italian ecclesiastics of his generation, he had made only superficial studies, and he had scarcely an idea of modern scientific methods. As a result he did not always take into account the complexities of questions and the relativity of some theses. He was not, however, deficient in intellectual interests or in finesse; hence he grasped concrete situations with good sense when they were accurately presented. Unfortunately, his entourage constituted his third disadvantage; for if the men in his confidence were generally pious and zealous, they also tended to be quixotic or intransigent, theorists without practical viewpoints. Apart from these limitations Pius IX possessed numerous good qualities and merits. Notable were his touching simplicity, his great goodness, his serene courage in adversity, his lively practical intelligence, and his fervor that aroused the admiration of all who saw him at prayer and corresponded with his intimate sentiments. Still more remarkable were his pastoral virtues, his care to act always as a priest, and even under the torment of the Roman question to comport himself not as a sovereign defending his throne, but as a man of the Church cognizant of his responsibility before God for the defense of Christian values menaced by the rise of laicism, rationalism, and impiety. His admirers soon after his death introduced his cause for beatification. He was declared venerable in 1985, and was beatified by John Paul II, along with Pope John XXIII, on Sept. 3, 2000.

Bibliography: Acta Pio IX. Pontificis Maximi. Pars prima acta exhibens quae ad Ecclesiam universam spectant (1846–1854). (Rome 1855). Atti del Sommo Pontefice Pio IX, Felicemente Regnante. Parte seconda che comprende I Motu-propii, chirografi editi, notificazioni, ec. Per lo stato pontificio, 2 v. (Rome 1857). N. BLAKISTON, ed., Extracts from the Dispatches of Odo Russel from Rome 1858–1870 (London 1962). C. BUTLER, The Vatican Council: The Story Told from Inside in Bishop Ullathorne's Letters (New York 1930). P. DALLE TORRE, Pio IX e Vittorio Emanuele II. Dal loro carteggio privato (Rome 1972); "Cardinale Giacomo Antonelli fra carte di archivio ed atti processuali," Pio Nono VIII (1979). P. DE FRANCISCIS, ed., Discorse del Sommo Pontefice Pio IX Pronuziati in Vaticano ai fedeli di Roma e dell'orbe dal principio della sua prgionia fino as presente (Rome 1872). G. MAIOLO, ed., Pio IX da Vescovo a pontice. Lettere al Card Luigi Amat, Agosto 1839–Luglio 1848 (Modena 1943). G. MARTINA, ed., Pio IX e Leopoldo II (Rome 1967). A. SERAFINI, Pio Nono. Giovanni Maria Mastai Ferretti dalla giovinezza alla morte nei suoi scritte e discorsi editi e inediti (Vatican City 1958). Servi Dei Pii posito super introductionem causae, 2 v. (Rome 1954). R. AUBERT, Le Pontificate de Pie IX (Paris 1967). O. CHADWICK, A History of the Popes, 1830–1914 (Oxford 1998). F. J. COPPA, Pope Pius IX: Crusader in a Secular Age (Boston 1979); Cardinal Giacomo Antonelli and Papal Politics in European Affairs (Albany 1990); "The Modern Papacy Since 1789," Longman History of the Papacy (London 1998). A. FILIPUZZI, Pio IX e la politica Austriaca in Italia dal 1815 and 1848 (Florence 1958). E. E. Y. HALES, Pio Nono: A Study in European Politics and Religion in the Nineteenth Century (Garden City, NY 1981). D. I. KERTZER, The Kidnapping of Edgardo Montara (New York 1998). G. MARTINA, Pio IX (1846–1850) (Rome 1986); Pio IX (1867–1878) (Rome 1990); La Chiesa nell'età del liberalismo (Brescia 1978). R. MORI, Il tramonto del potere temporale (Rome 1967). G. RADICE, Pio IX e Antonio Rosmini (Vatican City 1974).

[R. AUBERT]

PIUS X, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: Aug. 9, 1903 to Aug. 20, 1914; b. Giuseppe Melchiorre Sarto, at Riese (Treviso), Italy.

Early Life and Prepapal Career. Giuseppe Sarto was born on June 2, 1835 in the village of Riese in Vene-

Pope Pius X.

tia. He was the second of ten children of Giovanni Battista and Margherita (Sansone) Sarto. His family circumstances were humble. His father was a village messenger and postman, and his mother helped out as a seamstress. Especially from his mother, he received a deeply religious formation, and even as a child, he felt a strong call to the priesthood. After studies in his home village and Castelfranco, in 1850 at the age of 15 he entered the seminary of Padua. Ordained to the priesthood on Sept 18, 1858, he spent nine years as curate in Tombo- lo and eight years as a pastor in Salzano. These years of parish work helped to shape the future Pope with a pastoral sensitivity and a love for the common people. In 1875, he was called to Treviso to serve as the spiritual director of the major seminary and to work as the chancellor of the diocese. The Bishop of Treviso likewise made him a canon of the cathedral. As the spiritual director of the seminary, Msgr. Sarto was zealous and demanding but also warm and compassionate. He combined his work at the seminary with his duties as chancellor, and for a seven-month period, in 1879–1880, he served as the Vicar Capitular of the diocese following the death of the bishop.

In 1884, Msgr. Sarto was named the Bishop of Mantua, and, during his nine years there, he did much to revitalize the spiritual life of the diocese. He was especially devoted to catechetics, and the lessons he drew up formed the basis for what was to become The Catechism of Pius X. Likewise, he encouraged the laity in their pious associations, especially the Third Order of St. Francis to which he himself belonged. He was equally dedicated to fostering vocations to the priesthood. In 1885, he ordained only one priest, but by the end of his nine years as bishop of Mantua, he had ordained 175.

On June 12, 1893, Pope Leo XIII named Bishop Sarto of Mantua a Cardinal, and three days later, appointed him to be the next Patriarch of Venice. The Italian government delayed his entry into Venice, claiming that the state must approve such appointments. Eventually, the government relented, and Cardinal Sarto was permitted, on Nov. 24, 1894, to make his solemn entry into Venice as the Patriarch-Archbishop. In his new role, Cardinal Sarto continued to emphasize the need for sound catechesis, lay devotion and holy and well-educated priests. In a pastoral letter of May 1, 1895, he treated the subject of church music, and he underlined the importance of Gregorian chant. In August 1897, he presided over a Eucharistic Congress, and he encouraged the frequent reception of the sacrament.

Cardinal Sarto's time in Venice was marked by apostolic zeal, a spirit of poverty, concern for divine worship, directives in the field of Catholic action, and also for his professional, social and political interests. His pastoral letters of this period also afford a glimpse of his future work. Thus, a letter to the Mantuans (1887) reproved the principles and tendencies of what was later termed "MODERNISM." His first pastoral to the Venetians underscored the need for obedience to the pope. As Cardinal Sarto noted, in matters concerning the Vicar of Christ, "there should be no questions, no subtleties, no opposing of personal rights to his rights, but only obedience." His reforms as pope reflected, to a large extent, the needs and aspirations he had experienced and expressed as a pastor and bishop.

Papal Program. The conclave of 1903 (July 31–August 4) elected him successor to Leo XIII, despite his entreaties. Cardinal MERRY DEL VAL, secretary of the conclave, became his secretary of state. His first encyclical, E suprema Apostolatus (October 4), together with his allocution to the sacred college (November 9), formulated the guiding principles of his pontificate: to battle against estrangement from God and against apostasy, which was becoming ever more ruinous to societies. To this end he would seek “to restore all things in Christ, in order that Christ may be all and in all.” He desired to be merely the minister of the Most High; but this position he intended to fill completely. In no area of human activity, he promised, would he fail to affirm the authority of God, the rigorous obedience due His Church, and the limitless extent of the papal mission. Even political affairs, so far as they concern faith and morals, must not escape the need for universal “restoration”; as was reiterated in the encyclical Jucunda sane (March 12, 1904), commemorating the 13th centenary of Pope St. Gregory the Great. Pius X also resolved “to teach the Christian truth and law,” and to defend them with circumspection against “the insidious maneuvers of a type of new science.” He further aimed to promote social justice and charity, the sole guarantee of real order and peace among individuals and groups.

Modernism. Modernism provided the gravest concerns for Pius X in the realms of philosophy, theology and biblical exegesis. Since the time of the ENLIGHTENMENT, there had been various efforts to accommodate the Christian faith to newer philosophical and scientific movements. A certain tendency emerged that seemed to reduce revelation to subjective feelings and the aspirations of the human spirit moving towards transcendence. Modernism provided the gravest problems with which Pius X had to contend in the philosophical, theological, and exegetical realms. For some years this new trend had been infiltrating intellectual circles in Christian nations and gaining entrance into some periodicals in the U.S. As a result several works of unequal importance had been placed on the Index, including writings by LOISY, HOUTIN, LABERTHONNIÈRE, Fogazzaro, and others. The Pontiff revealed his attitude on several occasions, notably in the encyclical Pieni l'animo (July 28, 1906), and even more clearly, in the Consistory of April 17, 1907. Official condemnation came with the publication of Lamentabili sane exitu (July 3, 1907), a decree of the Holy Office approved by the Pope, which reprobated 65 propositions containing in summary form the errors imputed to Modernism. The encyclical Pascendi dominici gregis (September 8) completed the repression of what it termed the “résumé of all the heresies.” Pius X enacted in it a series of measures destined to protect the faith of the laity and, still more, of the clergy. The motu proprio Praestantia (Nov. 18, 1907) confirmed LAMENTABILI and PASCENDI under penalty of grave censures.

Despite these measures, supplemented by a number of excommunications, and several additions to the Index of Forbidden Books, resistance did not disappear. This led to the imposition of an oath against MODERNISM (September 1910) that created difficulties in Germany. To the end of his pontificate the Pope continued to denounce the Modernist peril and the “circuitous means” by which it maintained itself.

Excesses unfortunately accompanied the repression of Modernism. They were caused chiefly by the supporters of Integralism, particularly Monsignor Benigni and his SODALITUM PIANUM (League of St. Pius V). As a result numbers of Catholics, savants among them, found themselves unjustly denounced. Ecclesiastical studies suffered a setback. Three papal letters encouraging the Sodalitium were published; but these did not mention all of its numerous secret activities. Never did the Pontiff accord it “formal and definitive approval.”

Popular Action Groups. Unfavorable by nature to alliance with groups hostile or even foreign to Catholicism, Pius X desired Catholics to form a great union to effect a program of just and prudent social reforms. From the beginning of his pontificate he issued instructions of this tenor to the Italian Opera dei Congressi. His motu proprio Fin dalla prima (Dec. 18, 1903) tried to remove Italian popular action groups from the ardent political involvements in which Romolo MURRI and others were trying to engage them, contrary to the directives of the Holy See.

After dissolving the internally divided Opera dei Congressi, Pius X directed his attention to the followers of Christian Democracy led by Murri. In two encyclicals, Il fermo proposito (June 11, 1905) and Pieni l'animo (July 28, 1906), he affirmed the great social role (actually the role of prudent political preparation), which devolved on CATHOLIC ACTION, under the control of the heads of the Church. He also opposed the spirit of insubordination, shown by some ecclesiastics, which menaced young clerics. This insubordination had, in the Pope's mind, ties with Modernist errors. The Holy Office's condemnation (Feb. 13, 1908) of the journal of Abbé Naudet, La Justice sociale, and that of Abbé Dabry, La Vie catholique, manifested Roman disquietude concerning the activities of French Christian Democracy, which had oriented itself toward politics in the framework of the RALLIEMENT, as recommended by Leo XIII. The letter to the French episcopate Notre charge (Aug. 25, 1910) condemned the Sillon, directed by Marc SANGNIER, a man to whom the Pope was at first attracted. But the inter-confessional Sillon freed itself from ecclesiastical authority; adopted social, civic, and even religious theses in opposition at times to pontifical directives; “enfeoffed religion” to the party of democracy; and formed alliances that compromised the defense of the Church in a grave hour.

Distaste for inter-confessional groups appeared again in the encyclical Singulari quadam (Sept. 24, 1912), which authorized under certain conditions Protestant membership in some groups, but preferred in principle purely Catholic associations.

Internal Affairs of the Church. Pius X profoundly reformed the Church's interior life, while favoring its missionary expansion. Interest in public prayer and the splendor of divine worship inspired his motu proprio Tra le sollecitudini (Nov. 22, 1903), which supplied norms for sacred music, especially Gregorian chant. Breviary prayers were distributed anew, permitting the weekly recitation of the entire Psalter, by the apostolic constitution Divino afflatu (Nov. 1, 1911).

To modernize the vast body of ecclesiastical laws and bring them into agreement with one another, Pius X undertook the codification of the Code of Canon Law in the motu proprio Arduum sane (March 19, 1904). At his death the enormous labor was nearly completed.

The Church's central government was simplified, harmonized, and strengthened by the apostolic constitution Sapienti consilio (June 29, 1908). Among other provisions, it removed from the jurisdiction of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith the U.S., Canada, Newfoundland, England, Ireland, Holland, and Luxembourg.

Pius X commended the development of studies that conformed to the spirit of Christianity. Notable was his establishment (May 7, 1909) of the PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL INSTITUTE, destined to promote, despite some criticisms, the scientific knowledge of Sacred Scripture. The philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas always found in the Pope a zealous champion. Pius X's dedication to Thomism was manifested in his, motu proprio, Doctor Angelici, of June 29, 1914. In this document, he ordered the ecclesiastical schools of Italy "to uphold religiously the first principles and major declarations of Thomas Aquinas" contained in the 24 metaphysical theses that he authorized for promulgation by the Congregation of Studies (cf. H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 32nd. ed., edited by A. Schönmetzer (Freiburg 1963) 3601-3624). However, after the death of Pius X, Pope Benedict XV qualified this mandate. In his March 19, 1917 letter, Quod de fovenda, to Wladimir Ledochowski, the Superior General of the Jesuits, Benedict XV explained that the 24 theses were to be understood as "secure directional norms" and there was no strict obligation "to accept all of the theses." To the Jesuits (some of whom were Suarezians instead of Thomists) this came as welcome news.

The importance of religious instruction and the catechism were emphasized in the encyclical Acerbo nimis (April 15, 1905). The greatness of the priesthood was extolled in the papal jubilee exhortation (Aug. 4, 1908). His devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary appeared frequently, notably in the encyclical commemorating the 50th anniversary of the definition of the Immaculate Conception. As Pope of the Eucharist, he considerably advanced devotion to it, especially by the decree Sacra Tridentina Synodus (Dec. 20, 1905), recommending greater frequency of Communion. His decree Quam singulari (Aug. 8, 1910), concerning the reception of first COMMUNION by children, demolished the apprehensive resistance at first met.

Pius X canonized Alexander SAULI, Gerard MAJELLA, Joseph ORIOL, and Clement HOFBAUER. He also beatified numerous martyrs, and founders and foundresses of religious congregations.

Relations with Governments. The apostolic constitution Commissum nobis (Jan. 20, 1904) ended the veto power of Catholic governments resurrected by the Austrian Cardinal Puzyna at the 1903 conclave to defeat Cardinal Rampolla.

Pius X's pontificate coincided with the growth of ANTICLERICALISM in France, especially during the ministry of Émile Combes, which saw the prohibition of all teaching by religious congregations, and conflicts over episcopal nominations. It witnessed the rupture of diplomatic relations with the Holy See (July 30, 1904) subsequent to the note of Cardinal Merry del Val concerning the visit of President Loubet of France to the king of Italy, and also the summoning to Rome of the bishops of Dijon and Laval. A French law (Dec. 9, 1905) annulled unilaterally the CONCORDAT OF 1801, separated Church from State, and transferred the Church's goods to lay associations. Pius X condemned the legislation in the encyclical Vehementer Nos (Feb. 11, 1906). Despite the wish of the French bishops, who were concerned for the existence of their dioceses, the Pontiff opposed all projects for bettering the lay associations in the encyclical Gravissimo officii munere (Aug. 10, 1906). In his solicitude for the rights of God and the Church, he repeatedly displayed his hostility to the new legislation, which had been enacted in violent circumstances and which included expulsions and violations of the archives of the nunciature.

French Catholics were advised by the Holy See not to continue to identify the defense of their religion with union of Church and State. Pius X was remarkably indulgent toward the leader of the ACTION FRANÇAISE, Charles MAURRAS, when he left unpublished for a time the decree condemning several of Maurras' books.

In his relations with the government of Italy, Pius X upheld the temporal rights of the Holy See, while preparing the way little by little in diverse acts for the solution of the ROMAN QUESTION. He felt compelled to protest against the anticlerical violence of Ernesto Nathan, Mayor of Rome. Consideration for the country's general welfare dictated his encyclical Il fermo proposito (June 11, 1905), which allowed bishops in certain cases to remove the papal prohibition that kept the faithful from political elections.

One of the Pope's commemorative encyclicals, Editae saepe (May 26, 1910), dedicated to St. Charles Borromeo, roused some ill-feeling in Germany because one passage was interpreted as being severe toward the Reformation. Sympathy for the Poles won for the Pontiff the hostility of the Russian government. Similarly, the mission of Cardinal Vincenzo Vannutelli as legate to Ireland was viewed amiss in London. Catalan revolutionaries plunged the Spanish Church into mourning (1909); and the anticlerical government of Canalejas caused it extreme distress. The young republic of Portugal was reproved in the encyclical Jamdudum in Lusitania (May 24, 1911) for its law separating State from Church, which led to violent religious persecution.

Public opinion in the U.S. deplored the refusal of a papal audience (1910) to former Pres. Theodore Roosevelt, because he intended to speak in the Methodist church in Rome. On the other hand, Pius X praised the liberalism of the government of the U.S. He also approved (June 11, 1911) the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Frequently he praised and aided the fervor of North American Catholics.

Antireligious legislation in Ecuador merited papal disapproval (1905). Bolivia was reminded of certain ecclesiastical laws. The Holy See's prestige mounted with the arbitration of the pope's delegate, Monsignor Bavona, in the conflict involving Brazil, Bolivia, and Peru. The encyclical Lacrimabili statu (June 7, 1912) invited the Latin American bishops to do their utmost to improve the lot of the native peoples.

Conclusion. Pius X's grief at the outbreak of World War I appeared in his exhortation Dum Europa fere (Aug. 2, 1914). He died soon after (Aug. 20). Christendom recalled in manifold ways the sanctity of this pontiff of luminous faith and compassionate humility. The cardinals of the Roman Curia requested (Feb. 24, 1923) the introduction of his cause. After long investigations (1923–46), the approval of the required miracles, and the ritual formalities, Pius X was beatified (June 3, 1951) and canonized (May 29, 1954).

Devotion to Pius X was particularly strong in the U.S.A. from the 1930s through the 1950s. Edwin Vincent O'Hara, Bishop of Great Falls, Montana and later of Kansas City, Missouri, was especially committed to his cause. In part, this dedication was inspired by the growth of the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine (CCD) in America which had been mandated for every parish by Pius X's encyclical, Acerbo Nimis, of 1905. O'Hara led a popular movement that produced books, holy cards and prayer crusades to promote the cause for the Pius X's beatification and later canonization. Cardinal Cushing of Boston was also an enthusiastic promoter of the cause. During this period, Pius X was especially esteemed for his Eucharistic piety, humility, warmth and his love for children. In many respects, he was held up a "people's Pope" in a manner similar to that of John XXIII.

Since Vatican II, some scholars have become critical of Pius X for what they perceive as his overly harsh treatment of theologians accused of Modernism. The 1967 replacement of the Oath against Modernism with a simpler profession was welcomed as an end to an unfortunate era. On the other hand, many "traditionalist" Catholics, such as the followers of Archbishop Marcel Lefebvre, have associated themselves with Pope Pius X in his zeal against the Modernist heresy. This can be seen in the chosen name of the Society of St. Pius X, a group of priests who carry on Archbishop Lefebvre's resistance to many of the doctrines of Vatican II and the new Mass promulgated by Paul VI in 1969. Some Catholics resent this "usurpation" of the heritage of Pius X by a schismatic movement. They see no contradiction between the sanctity and Eucharistic piety of St. Pius X and the "universal call to holiness" promoted by Vatican II and the post-conciliar pontiffs. As for Pius X's resistance to Modernism, some Catholic theologians recently have become more sympathetic to the general spirit (if not every detail) of his opposition to this "movement."

Feast: Sept. 3.

Bibliography: M. C. CARLEN, Dictionary of Papal Pronouncements: Leo XIII to Pius XII, 1878–1957 (New York 1958). PIUS X, Acta, 1903–08 (Rome 1905–14). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1–6 (1909–14). V. A. YZERMANS, All Things in Christ (Westminster, Md. 1954), Eng. tr. of Pius X's papal documents. A. MARCHESAN Papa Pio X nella sua vita e nella sua parola (Einsiedeln 1904). R. MERRY DEL VAL Memories of Pope Pius X (Westminster, Md. 1951). É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 12.2:1716–40. F. A. M. FORBES, Life of Pius X (London 1918). J. SCHMIDLIN, Papstgeschichte der neuesten Zeit 1800–1939, v.3 (Munich 1933–1939). R. AUBERT, "Le Bienheureux Pie X," Revue Nouvelle 14 (1951) 386–399. G. DAL-GAL, Pius X: The Life Story of the Beatus, tr. and ed. T. F. MURRAY (Westminster, Md. 1954). C. LEDRÉ Pie X (Paris 1952); Un Siècle sous la tiare (Paris 1955). P. FERNESOLE, Pie X: Essai historique, 2 v. (Paris 1952–53), Dansette. A. LATREILLE et al., Histoire du catholicisme en France, v.3 (Paris 1957–62). H. DANIEL-ROPS, L'Église des révolutions: Un Combat pour Dieu, Histoire de l'Église du Christ 6.2 (Paris 1963). Y. DE LA BRIÈRE, Les Luites presentes de l'Église, v.1–2 (Paris 1913–). M. PERNOT, La Politique de Pie X (Paris 1910). J. RIVIÈRE Le Modernisme dans L'Église (Paris 1929). N. FONTAINE, Saint-Siège: Action française et catholiques intégraux (Paris 1928). V. MARTIN, Les Cardinaux et la Curie (Paris 1930); Les Congrégations romaines (Paris 1930). M. RANCHETTI, The Catholic Modernists (London 1969). A. VIDLER, A Variety of Catholic Modernists (Cambridge 1970). L. KURTZ, The Politics of Heresy: The Modernist Crisis in Roman Catholicism (Berkeley and Los Angeles 1986). T. MCGOVERN, "A Charter for Priestly Holiness," Homiletic and

Pope Pius XI. (Archive Photos)

Pastoral Review (March 1989) 13–19. R. MYERS, “A Saint Speaks,” The Priest (November 1993) 36–93. W. DIETHELM, St. Pius X, The Farm Boy who Became Pope (San Francisco 1994). The Catechism of Pope Saint Pius X (Kansas City nd). A. MAGGIOLINI, “Magisterial Teaching on Experience in the Twentieth Century: From the Modernist Crisis to the Second Vatican Council,” Communio (Summer 1996) 33:225–243. S. M. AVELLA and J. ZALAR, “Sanctity in the Era of Catholic Action: The Case of St. Pius X,” U.S. Catholic Historian (Autumn 1997) 15:57–80. G. SALE, “Pio X, ‘La Civiltà Cattolica’ e gli accordi Clerico-Moderati del 1904,” La Civiltà Cattolica 151 (1) (2000): 537–550.

[C. LEDRÉ/R. FASTIGGI]

PIUS XI, POPE

Pontificate: Feb. 6, 1922 to Feb. 10, 1939; b. Ambrogio Damiano Achille Ratti, at Desio, near Milan, May 31, 1857.

PREPAPAL CAREER

After ordination (1879) and studies at the Gregorian University, Rome (Ph.D., D.D., J.C.D.), he became (1882) a professor at the major seminary in Milan and was appointed to the staff of the Ambrosian Library, Milan (1888–1911, after 1907 director). During this period he became known especially for his work in paleography and published Acta Ecclesiae Mediolanensis (4 v.

Milan 1890–99) and Missale Duplex Ambrosianum (Milan 1913). From 1911 to 1918 Ratti worked at the Vatican Library, first as pro-prefect under F. X. EHRLE, and after 1914 as prefect. In April 1918 Benedict XV entrusted Ratti with the difficult task of apostolic visitor to the young Polish Republic, which had just established diplomatic relations with the Holy See. Ratti was appointed nuncio to Poland in June 1919 and titular archbishop of Lepanto on Oct. 28, 1919. His mission, extending to the areas that had formerly been part of the Czarist Empire, acquainted him with the difficulties in reconstructing the State and Church in Poland and in the Baltic states of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia. He was also drawn into the rivalries and border disputes of these young states. Still more delicate was his task as papal delegate on the Inter-Allied Commissions for the plebiscite areas in Upper Silesia, where his sympathies were with Polish Catholicism. As national passions heightened, the nuncio’s situation became so untenable that Benedict XV transferred him (June 13, 1921), making him archbishop of Milan and a cardinal. After the death of Benedict XV, Achille Ratti was elected pope on the fourteenth ballot on Feb. 6, 1922.

PONTIFICATE

Pius XI’s 17-year pontificate was devoted to achieving the great task of peace and the reordering of the Church. After the collapse of the old systems in World War I, he strove for the Pax Christiana in a world that had not reestablished genuine peace. In the age of disappearing monarchies he referred the nations, war-weary and yet filled with unrest, to the kingdom of Christ. For him, the highest goal was the unification of humanity—a humanity seeking true peace and community—under the royal scepter of Christ.

Encyclicals. In his program of religious renewal, the Pope’s encyclicals were of special significance. The first, Ubi arcano (Dec. 23, 1922), inaugurated CATHOLIC ACTION or “the participation of the laity in the hierarchical apostolate” for the purpose of restoring a society animated by Christian spirit and of permeating all manifestation of public life with the Catholic doctrines of faith and morals. Although the organization of Catholic Action in all countries was very close to the heart of Pius XI, it took on special importance for Italy, where it was linked up with existing organizations. The pope stressed repeatedly its nonpolitical, purely religious character. The encyclical on Christian education, Divini illius magistri (Dec. 31, 1929), lays the foundation for a genuinely Christian theory of education, opposes the modern state’s monopoly of schools, and undertakes the demarcation and coordination of the education rights of the family, the Church, and the state. The marriage encyclical CASTI CONNUBII (Dec.

30, 1930) treats of the properties of marriage (children, mutual trust, holiness), warns against contemporary false solutions (marriage for a specified duration, trial marriage, marriage of comradeship, abortion, sterilization, infidelity, mixed marriage, divorce, birth control), and asks for respect for the divine commandments and esteem for the graces conferred by the Sacrament of Matrimony. Besides the primary purpose (children), the “mutual and harmonious development of the partners” is recognized as a “primary reason for marriage” (Catechismus Romanus 2:8, 13).

The encyclical on the Christian social order, QUADRAGESIMO ANNO (May 15, 1931)—forty years after LEO XIII’s RERUM NOVARUM—is the second great social encyclical. Going beyond the demands of Leo XIII, it presses for social reform, and under this aspect develops the ideas of the principle of SUBSIDIARITY and of the “corporate order.” As a supplement to Quadragesimo anno, the encyclical Nova impendet (Oct. 2, 1931) treats of the world crises of financial distress, unemployment, and the international military arms race. The pope’s concern over the growing distress after the 1929 world economic crisis found expression in the encyclical Caritate Christi (May 3, 1932). To offset the widespread misery in the world, the pope called for the Christian activity of love, prayer, penance, and devotion to the sacred heart of Jesus. In the face of growing dangers from the totalitarian systems of various states, Pius XI, in numerous addresses and writings, warned urgently against ideologies that alienated men from God, and he emphasized that the dignity of the individual, the sanctity of the family, and the order and security of society would be secured above all by religion and the apostolic work of the Church. These papal efforts culminated in Non Abbiamo Bisogno (July 5, 1931) against Italian Fascism, Mit brennender Sorge (March 14, 1937) against National Socialism, and Divini Redemptoris (March 19, 1937), a defense of human society and culture against atheistic communism. The encyclical Ad Catholicum Sacerdotium (Dec. 20, 1935) was devoted to the priesthood of the Church.

Also directed to the goal of renewing and deepening religious- ecclesiastical life were the World Eucharistic Congresses; the Jubilee Years of 1925, 1929, and 1933; the encyclicals QUAS PRIMAS (Dec. 11, 1925), instituting the Feast of Christ the King, Miserentissimus Redemptor (May 8, 1928), Caritate Christi (May 3, 1932), and Mens Nostra (Dec. 20, 1929); and a decree concerning catechetical instruction of Jan. 1, 1935.

Beatifications and Canonizations. Among those beatified or canonized by Pius XI were St. THÉRESE OF LISIEUX, St. John VIANNEY, St. Robert BELLARMINE, St. John BOSCO, St. Peter CANISIUS, St. ALBERT THE GREAT, St. John EUDES, St. Madeleine Sophie BARAT, St. Marie Madeleine POSTEL, St. CONRAD OF PARZHAM, ST. BERNADETTE SOUBIROUS, St. Thomas MORE, St. John FISHER, St. Andrew BOBOLA, and others. Pius XI elevated to Doctors of the Church Peter Canisius, JOHN OF THE CROSS, Robert Bellarmine, and Albertus Magnus.

World Mission. In pursuit of the goals of Pope Benedict XV’s Maximum illud (Nov. 30, 1919), Pius XI gave new direction to the Church’s world mission by urging the renunciation of the prevailing Eurocentrism, by the planned training of a native clergy and the recognition of the intellectual-cultural individuality of the peoples to be evangelized, by the 1925 Missions Exhibit in the Vatican (thereafter housed in the Lateran as a missions and ethnological museum), and by the encyclical Rerum Ecclesiae (Feb. 28, 1926). Despite considerable opposition, the pope ordained the first six Chinese bishops in St. Peter’s on Oct. 28, 1926, and the first Japanese as bishop of Nagasaki on Oct. 30, 1927. Additional episcopal ordinations of native priests from India, Southeast Asia, and China took place in 1933. At the beginning of Pius XI’s pontificate there was no mission diocese under native direction; at the pope’s death there were 40. In addition, the number of native priests in mission lands rose from 2,670 to more than 7,000, and about 200 apostolic vicariates and prefectures were established. The Catholic population in the mission countries increased from 9 million to 21 million. Moreover, the apostolic constitution DEUS SCIENTIARUM DOMINUS (May 24, 1931) officially included MISSIOLOGY among the subjects of theological study in colleges. A faculty of missiology was established at the Gregoriana and an institute in the same field at the Roman Propaganda College.

The Eastern Catholic Churches. The encyclical Ecclesiam Dei (Nov. 12, 1923) honored the memory of the martyr-archbishop Josaphat of Polozk. The abbot primate of the Benedictines was commissioned to promote the work of union by founding a special congregation. A novitiate of the Society of Jesus for the Greek-Slavic rite was established in Albertyn, Poland. The Oriental Institute founded by Benedict XV was promoted. Colleges for the training of priests of the Eastern rite Churches were founded or reorganized. The Ethiopian and Ruthenian Colleges in Rome were rebuilt. The encyclical Rerum orientalium (Sept. 8, 1928) called for greater understanding of the Eastern Churches, reviewing the past and planning for the future. In 1929 work was begun on the codification of Eastern Church law, under the direction of Cardinal Pietro Gasparri. In 1935 the Syrian rite Patriarch Tappouni was elevated to the cardinalate.

Non-Catholic Christendom. On the invitation of the learned Belgian primate and cardinal Désiré Mercier, conversations on the subject of union took place between Catholics and Anglicans at MALINES in the years 1921 to 1926, at first with the knowledge and toleration, later with the express approval, of the Holy See and the archbishop of Canterbury. However, the Holy See took a negative attitude toward the ecumenical movement of non-Catholic Christendom, which rapidly acquired strength especially through the support of the Protestant Archbishop Nathan SÖDERBLOM of Uppsala.

Art and Science. Having come from a scholarly background, Pius XI gave sustained support to art and science. Among other things he had a new building erected for the Gregoriana and combined with it the Bible Institute and the Institute for Oriental Studies. At the Gregoriana he established faculties for Church history and missiology. The apostolic constitution Deus scientiarum Dominus (May 24, 1931) produced a unified, improved arrangement of Church study on the college level. In 1925 the Pope established the Roman Institute for Christian Archaeology. He promoted the Vatican Library, published new editions, encouraged the establishment of Catholic universities (especially the University of the Sacred Heart in Milan), and interested himself in church music and church art.

Church Diplomacy. It was only in the pontificate of Pius XI that the catastrophic consequences of World War I became clear. In the states deranged by the aftereffects of war and revolution, the pope strove for Church consolidation. His pontificate was a new era of concordats. In part the preparatory work extended back into the time of Benedict XV. Aided by his two cardinal secretaries of state, Pietro Gasparri (till 1930) and Eugenio Pacelli (1930–39), Pius XI concluded concordats with the following states: Latvia (Nov. 3, 1922), Bavaria (March 29, 1924), Poland (Feb. 10, 1925), Rumania (May 10, 1927), Lithuania (Sept. 27, 1927), Italy (Feb. 11, 1929), Prussia (June 14, 1929), Baden (Oct. 12, 1932), Austria (June 5, 1933), Germany (July 20, 1933), and Yugoslavia (1935, not ratified). In addition he signed agreements with Czechoslovakia (1926, 1928), France and Portugal (1928), and Ecuador (1937). World War II and its consequences caused many of these treaties to lapse.

Roman Question. The most significant political event of the reign of Pius XI was the settlement of the ROMAN QUESTION, which had festered since 1870. This settlement meant reconciliation of the papacy with the Italian state, since 1922 under the dictatorial leadership of Benito Mussolini. After two and a half years of difficult negotiations the LATERAN PACTS were signed on Feb. 11, 1929. They comprised: (1) a treaty on the founding of the sovereign state of Vatican City (Stato della Città del Vaticano, 44 hectares in area) as a guarantee of the freedom and independence of the papacy in the governance of the Church; (2) a concordat of the Holy See with the Italian state whereby the Catholic religion was confirmed as the state religion in Italy, with freedom of pastoral work and of religious instruction in the schools and with state recognition of Christian marriage and religious orders and societies; (3) a financial agreement awarding the Holy See a lump-sum payment of 1,750,000,000 lire as compensation for damages sustained. For Italy this peaceful settlement meant the ideal conclusion of the RISSORGIMENTO; for the Catholics, Rome was made secure as the center of the Catholic Church. After the fall of the monarchy (1946) the Lateran Pacts were incorporated into the new republican constitution of Italy.

Totalitarian States. In the aftermath of World War I and against the background of dictated peace treaties, powerful upheavals in economic life, and changes in social structure that affected all the Christian churches, there grew up in many parts of the world a completely new form of national life: the totalitarian state. Three principal forms developed: Russian Bolshevism of Marxist-Communist origin, Italian Fascism, and German National Socialism.

Between the Papacy and the Soviet Union there was no direct liaison whatever. In 1922 Pius XI made a vain effort, through diplomatic mediation, to achieve the cessation of Russian persecution of Christians. An attempt, through the Jesuit Michael d' HERBIGNY and the secret consecration of bishops, to strengthen the Catholic Church in Soviet Russia also miscarried. D'Herbigny was expelled, and the bishops were sent to penal camps. In the encyclical Divini Redemptoris (March 19, 1937) Pius XI issued a sharp condemnation of atheistic communism.

Mindful of the stable power of Catholicism, the Italian "Duce" Benito Mussolini sought to avoid conflict with the Church. In the Lateran Pacts of 1929 he made a satisfactory arrangement with the Holy See. In 1931 serious difficulties in the interpretation of the Italian concordat were compromised, though Catholic organizations were gravely damaged. The Vatican's relation to Fascist Italy worsened considerably in 1938, when National Socialist racial doctrine was introduced.

In 1933 it appeared that the way was being paved for a settlement with the National Socialist regime of Adolf Hitler. On the strength of his repeated and solemn assurances as Reich chancellor to make the two Christian churches "the cornerstone of the work of national renewal," the German bishops believed that they had to modify their hitherto sharply negative attitude and that they could not withhold from the new state the cooperation of Catholics. On July 20, 1933, the Holy See concluded a concor-dat with the German Reich, the initiative for which had come from Hitler. Though the concordat was not the first international treaty concluded by Hitler's government (it was preceded by a trade agreement with the Soviet Union on May 5, and a treaty with England, France, and Italy on July 15) it enhanced Hitler's prestige in the eyes of foreign states. Combined with the German bishops' modification of their previous sharp condemnation of Hitler's movement (mentioned above) the concordat introduced an element of uncertainty into German Catholics' instinctive mistrust of the regime. In the atmosphere of increasing lawlessness and terror in Germany, the Holy See sought to bind the suspect new system to legal guarantees of Church rights. The German concordat was "the attempt to save the Concordats with several states of the German Reich by means of territorial and substantive enlargements as Germany moved into a quite uncertain future" (Pius XII on July 19, 1947). After its brief initial camouflage, National Socialism soon showed its atheistic face. Against the growing oppression suffered by the Catholic Church in Germany, between 1933 and 1936 Pius XI directed 34 notes of protest to the Reich government. Most of these went unanswered. These protests climaxed in the encyclical Mit brennender Sorge (Latin Ardenti cura [March 14, 1937], which was written by Cardinal Secretary of State Eugenio Pacelli with the help of Cardinal Michael von FAULHABER, Archbishop of Munich, and was read from all Catholic pulpits in Germany. The encyclical condemned with unusual sharpness the constant violations of law and the un-Christian teachings and practices of National Socialism. Taken together with the previous papal protests, the encyclical constituted a public demonstration of Hitler's duplicity the like of which was not attempted by any other sovereign power prior to the outbreak of World War II. From March 1937 on there began an intensified persecution of the Church in Germany, which was moderated somewhat only in World War II.

France. The relationship of the Holy See to France was substantially improved under Pius XI. The encyclical Maximam gravissimamque (Jan. 18, 1924) confirmed a practical accommodation on the vexing issues consequent on the Law of Separation (1905). Aided by the resumption of Franco-Vatican relations in December 1921, Pius XI extended the efforts of Benedict XV to find a path of accommodation with the government of the French Third Republic. His primary objective was to encourage those elements in the French Church that wished to work constructively within the democratic framework. He opposed all extremist political statements and consistently appointed conciliatory candidates to the episcopacy and other key posts. The climax of this vigorous policy, properly termed the Second Ralliement, came with the condemnation of the nationalistic and monarchistic ACTION FRANÇAISE (letter to Archbishop and Cardinal Andrieu of Bordeaux, Sept. 5, 1926), which produced severe shock waves for parts of French Catholicism. The Pope, after long examination, excommunicated the adherents of this movement as atheistic and neopagan. The consequence was a release of the pent-up energies of French Catholics and the dawn of a new era in the French Church.

Other Countries. In Spain under the republican government (after 1931), anti-Catholic excesses occurred, including wild attacks on churches and monasteries. Against the harsh anti-Church separation of Church and State, decreed in 1931 on the French model, Pius XI raised a protest in the encyclical Dilectissima nobis (June 3, 1933). The civil war, begun in July 1936, led to frightful atrocities on both sides and the murder of many bishops, priests, members of religious orders, and Catholic laymen. In Portugal the situation of the Church visibly improved, and there was even a resumption of diplomatic relations with the Holy See. However, during the pontificate of Pius XI, Mexico witnessed a hard and bloody persecution of the Church there as President P. Calles (1924–28) executed the harsh anti-Church provisions of the Constitution of 1917. In the encyclical Iniquis afflictisque (Nov. 18, 1926), the pope described the "Diocletian persecution" of the Church in Mexico. In several addresses he repeated his complaints and protests and censured the "conspiracy of silence" in the world press toward the atrocities. After a temporary improvement, Pius XI again (1932, 1937) strongly protested the persecution in Mexico. Only after the 1930s did the situation of the Church gradually improve.

Jews and Anti-Semitism. Pius XI several times condemned anti-Semitism in the sharpest manner. In September 1938 Pius XI told a group of Belgian pilgrims: "Anti-Semitism is inadmissible. Spiritually we are all Semites." Ten years previously, on March 25, 1928, the Holy Office, with papal approval, had issued a formal condemnation of anti-Semitism. In the summer of 1938, after the encyclical Mit brennender Sorge, Pius XI, wishing to expand that document's condemnation of racism, commissioned another encyclical which would condemn anti-Semitism. Drafted by the Jesuits John LaFarge, Gustav Gundlach, and Gustave Desbuquois, the text was not yet ready for publication at the death of Pius XI on Feb. 10, 1939. His successor, PIUS XII, felt that the rapidly deteriorating political situation in Europe required him to concentrate all his efforts toward preventing the outbreak of war. When these efforts failed, he incorporated portions of the draft in his first encyclical SUMMI PONTIFICATUS (Oct. 20, 1939).

Character. A man of simple, sober character and strong integrity, Pius XI was averse to all ostentation.

Quite conscious of the fragility of the peace in the interwar years, he made every effort to strengthen the will to peace, to encourage international organization, and to contain racism and excessive nationalism, which he saw as the major threats to peace. Despite the external misfortunes of his pontificate, Pius XI appears as one of the most significant and most able of the popes of modern times. He died shortly before the outbreak of World War II and was interred in the grotto under St. Peter's.

