The traditional Jewish teaching on providence was also affected by later considerations on man's free will. In Josephus's account (Antiquities 18.1.4) the Sadducees, to safeguard human freedom, denied divine influence. In general, at the time of Christ, it was held that God acted on external events, particularly those of a national or worldwide character. Two opinions were prevalent about His operation in man's inner life: He either gave virtue or persuaded man to exercise it.

Patristic Period. With the more complete revelation of man's final destiny, the notion of providence undergoes greater precision. Thus Redemption by Christ, action under grace (sanctifying and actual), predestination to eternal life, and final reprobation are within its scope. (See PROVIDENCE OF GOD [IN THE BIBLE].)

Augustine's teaching is representative of early ecclesiastical writers. All things are caused by divine OMNIPOTENCE. If at any time this power were withdrawn, everything would cease existing (Gen. ad litt. 4.12.22; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 271 v., indexes 4 v. [Paris 1878–90] 34:304). This care extends to the whole world and to its smallest part (Conf. 3.11.19; Patrologia Latina 32: 692). No one is released from sin except by the grace of the Redeemer (Pecc. orig. 29.34; Patrologia Latina 44:402). In his actions man is free (Serm. 125.5; Patrologia Latina 38:692–693). To react against the evils in this world by denying God's existence, or providence, or justice is great impiety (In Psalm. 31.25; Patrologia Latina 36:273). These evils, if borne properly, are useful in proving one's love for the Creator, in making satisfaction for faults, in leading one to desire and strive more fully for heaven, where true happiness exists. (Trin. 13.16.20; Patrologia Latina 42:1030). Future good things have been prepared for the just that the unjust will not enjoy; and evil things for the wicked with which the virtuous will not be tortured (Civ. 1.8.1; Patrologia Latina 41.20).

In early Christianity, however, there were false views on divine providence, as, for example, those given by Gnosticism and Manichaeism. The first, introduced by Marcion in the middle of the 2d century, made a distinction between the father-god, the supreme cause of all being, and the creator and law-giver of the OT, who held a subordinate rank. In the 3d century Manes, a Persian convert, taught the concept of two eternal principles, one good, the other bad. From this latter comes all evil, physical and moral.

Boethius greatly influenced later Christian thought. He gives the classical definition: providence is the divine intelligence that is above all things and directs them (De consol. phil. 4 prosa 6; Patrologia Latina 63:814). God is responsible for the production, change, and motion of everything. Some interrelated philosophical and theological problems are also discussed: fate, chance, divine knowledge and predestination, and freedom of will.

St. Thomas Aquinas. The teaching of St. Thomas, together with the pronouncements of the magisterium, gives a very detailed picture of providence. Thomas considers this the principal part of the virtue of prudence, whose object is the proper ordering of things toward their end, or purpose (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 49.6 and ad 1). Divine providence is twofold, insofar as it is conceived as directing things to a natural end or intellectual creatures to one that is SUPERNATURAL.

Existence of Providence. Several proofs can be given for the existence of this natural providence. One proceeds from God to creatures. He is the first and universal cause. Since His divine simplicity excludes any composition, His intelligence and will are identified with this causality, and thus He knows and wills all things (Summa theologiae 1a, 45.5; 19.4).

Another is based on an analogy between the activities of the creature and the Creator. If a person enters a well-arranged house, he can safely assume a reasonable cause behind the order. In the world, in the great majority of cases, there is a pattern whereby things turn out for the better. This regularity cannot be explained except in terms of the overall directing providence of the author of the universe, God (Summa theologiae 1a, 103.1).

The same argument is presented with a slight variation. All good must be attributed to God. This would include not only the mere existence of individual beings but also the order found in and between them, e.g., the regular succession of seasons or the benefits of living in a well-organized society. These things, clearly recognizable as good, are the work of divine providence (Summa theologiae 1a, 22.1).

Providence Described. While the analogical argument is based on similarities between the things compared, it still recognizes their differences. So divine providence is quite unlike its human counterpart. It is infinite and eternal, not limited and temporal. It exists in God's intelligence and presupposes His will, yet it is not multiple or successive, but one simple act identified with His essence (Summa theologiae 1a, 21.1 ad 3). Man can direct himself and others toward a goal. God, the last end of all things, is incapable of any determination to something outside Himself; His providence extends not to Himself but only to creatures (Summa theologiae 1a, 22.1).

God, the first cause of all things, disposes them to the end that He intends (Summa theologiae 1a, 22.2). Everything is eternally in Him, and in this way He immediately cares for them. This is the meaning of providence in the strict sense. The execution of His plan, however, takes place in time and is called governance (Summa theologiae 1a, 22.1 ad 2). For it He usually employs instruments, and thus His watchfulness is also mediate.

Such use does not imply any defect in Him. It is rather a sign of His infinite goodness, whereby others are allowed to share in His causality (Summa theologiae 1a, 22.3).

Creatures either possess or lack intelligence. The former are free, capable of self-determination. The others are without freedom. They tend toward an end that is either apprehended by the senses (as the actions of brute animals indicate) or completely unknown (as in the case of plants and minerals). This diversity in beings is the work of providence and contributes to the perfection of the universe (Summa theologiae 1a, 22.4; 1a2ae, 1.2).

In addition to existing on the natural level, man is also destined by divine providence to a supernatural last end, God as He is in Himself. Human reason alone cannot prove this; an appeal must be made to revelation. As Vatican Council I stated: Revelation must be said to be absolutely necessary, “because God out of His infinite goodness ordered man to a supernatural end, namely to share in the divine goods, which completely surpass the understanding of the human mind” (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [32d ed. Freiburg 1963] 3005).

Such a direction of man, or predestination, falls under divine providence; yet differences are to be noted. These are to be considered only from the part of the creature affected and from the end toward which he is directed. In God there is no distinction. Providence is the more general term. It applies to all things, rational and irrational, good and evil, and to both natural and supernatural orders. Predestination considers only the intellectual being and his principal purpose, his final union with God, something above the power of unaided nature. It touches on such things as the eternal choice for glory, sanctifying grace, actual grace, and other means in this order (De ver. 6.1).

Difficulties. Providence involves both God’s foreknowledge and His omnipotence. Relative to these attributes some difficulties, philosophical and theological, arise. There is the riddle of good and evil. If God has care of all things, how can evil, both physical and moral, be explained? There is also the question of human freedom. If from all eternity man’s actions are divinely known and willed, how can he be free?

Insofar as these problems deal only with the natural order, human reason supplies an answer without leading to complete understanding. Its knowledge of the divine essence is analogical, which by its very nature is not exhaustive. Thus God wills evil not in itself but for the good toward which it is directed. For example, a man in charge of a single thing will exclude a defect from it insofar as he can. One with more extended authority may permit some imperfection in a particular thing under his charge to ensure the general welfare. Since He cares for all things, God allows deficiencies in individual instances to bring about the good of the universe (Summa theologiae 1a, 19.8, 22.2 ad 2).

Likewise on the purely natural level it cannot be said that God’s providence destroys man’s free will. God is the first and universal cause of all things. As such He moves all things according to the nature He has given them—irrational creatures without freedom, rational beings with the possibility of choice. To be free one need not be primary cause of his actions; as a secondary cause, however, he must be capable of true self-determination (Summa theologiae 1a, 103.7, 83.1 ad 3).

When these same difficulties are placed in the supernatural order, however, it is impossible for human reason alone to give an answer. Here entrance is had into the realm of mystery—predestination to eternal life, the supernaturalization of the soul and its actions, the freedom of the will under the influence of actual grace, final reprobation, the sufferings of the just in this life and the good fortune of the evil. Recourse must be had to the teachings of faith.

Magisterial Teaching. In various documents the Church clearly sets forth the nature of divine providence. Its universality is declared in the profession of faith required of the Waldensians desirous of returning to unity: “we believe . . . also the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit . . . to be the creator, maker, ruler, and . . . disposer of all things” (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 790). Vatican Council I enunciates the same truth, making mention of man’s freedom: “All things that He founded God by His providence protects and governs, ‘reaching from end to end mightily and governing all things well’ (cf. Wis 8.1). ‘For all things are naked and open to His eyes’ (Heb 4.13), even those things which are future by the free action of creatures” (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 3003).

From several local councils there are indications on predestination. Thus the Council of Quiercy (May 853) substantially follows Augustine: “The good and just God according to His foreknowledge chose from the same mass of perdition those whom through grace He predestined to life, and for them he predestined eternal life: the others, however, whom in the judgment of His justice He left in the mass of perdition, He knew would perish, but He did not predestine them to perish, although He predestined eternal punishment for them, because He is just” (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 621). The Council of Valence (Jan. 8, 855) states: “this foreknowledge of God has not imposed necessity . . . the evil perish not because they could not be good but because they did not want to be good” (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 627).

Divine providence allows both moral and physical evil in the world. God permits man’s sin, without being its cause; the human being is responsible for his actions. The Council of Trent decreed: “If anyone says that it is not in man’s power to make his ways evil, but that God works evil as He does good, not permissively only but properly and per se . . . let him be anathema” (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 1556). In his encyclical Libert as praestantissimum, Leo XIII touches on the question of the physical evils that afflict man. “Although this most provident God is of infinite goodness and can do all things, yet He allows evils in the world, partly that greater goods be not impeded and partly that greater evils be prevented” (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 3251). A correct perspective on these evils is indicated elsewhere. Against M. Baius Pope St. Pius V stated that the afflictions undergone by the just are not always a punishment for sins (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 1972). Clement XI, rejecting the position of Pasquier Quesnel, taught that God does allow the innocent to suffer, that these troubles are not always a punishment for or a purification from sin (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 2470).

See Also: DESTINY, SUPERNATURAL; EVIL; FREE WILL AND PROVIDENCE; GOD, ARTICLES ON; GRACE, ARTICLES ON; MERCY OF GOD; OMNISCIENCE; SCIENTIA MEDIA; WILL OF GOD

Bibliography: H. D. SIMONIN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 13.1:941–960. A. RASCOL, ibid. 961–984. R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, ibid. 985–1023; Providence, tr. B. ROSE (St. Louis 1944). “Vorsehung,” Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) v. 10. THOMAS AQUINAS, Providence and Predestination, tr. R. W. MULLIGAN (Chicago 1961). ST. AUGUSTINE, Divine Providence and the Problem of Evil, ed. and tr. R. P. RUSSELL (New York 1942). C. F. D’ARCY, Providence and the World Order (London 1932). M. C. D’ARCY, The Pain of This World and the Providence of God (New York 1952). C. S. LEWIS, The Problem of Pain (New York 1944). J. M. MARLING, The Order of Nature in the Philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas (Washington 1934). A. G. SERTILLANGES, Dieu gouverne (Paris 1942). P. SIWEK, “God and Evil,” Homiletic and Pastoral Review 58 (1957–58) 879–885, 961–970. J. HARRINGTON, “The Concept of Chance and Divine Providence,” American Catholic Philosophical Association. Proceedings of the Annual Meeting 28 (1954) 176–183. H. D. ROQUEPLO, “Est-il possible que Dieu s’occupe de nous?” La Vie spirituelle 106 (1962) 319–335. W. L. YSAAC, “The Certitude of Providence in St. Thomas,” Modern Schoolman 38 (1961) 305–321.

[E. J. CARNEY]

PROVIDENTISSIMUS DEUS

Encyclical letter of Pope LEO XIII on the study of Holy Scripture, published Nov. 18, 1893. This article discusses its background, its contents, and its effects.

Background. The rapid progress of the natural and historical sciences made the 19th century more conscious of the human aspects of the Bible. Rationalist scholars began to study it as a purely human document. In the last two decades of the century a division took place among Catholic Biblical scholars: the so-called “liberals” tried to distinguish between the undoubted scientific achievements and the unacceptable philosophical bias in the work of liberal Protestants, whereas the conservatives, afraid of rationalism and confusing traditionally accepted opinions on scientific and historical matters with the dogmatic tradition of the Church, opposed the new views.

Thus Providentissimus Deus appeared at the very beginning of the Catholic effort to harmonize newly acquired scientific and historical knowledge with the traditional teaching of the Church. It was occasioned by an article written by Msgr. d’Hulst in Le correspondant of Jan. 25, 1893, reporting the opinions of the “left wing” theologians, according to whom the Bible, though inspired in its entirety, is inerrant only in matters of faith and morals.

Contents. The encyclical sought to encourage the study of the Bible and to impart to it “a direction suitable to the needs of the present day.” The encyclical may be summarized as follows.

The Church has always considered the Bible an inexhaustible repository of divine truth and a source of prayer and meditation. Rationalist errors, however, were destroying the true belief in the inspired word of God in the minds of many.

In view of this danger, the following directives were given for the defense of the Bible and a fuller presentation of its doctrine.

The study of Scripture in seminaries and universities was to be given the place proportionate to its great importance. Professors must be properly prepared. The courses given should enable the student to defend the Bible, to interpret it correctly, and teach him to love it and use it “for the advantage of religion and piety.” The text to be used was the Latin Vulgate. Where the Vulgate is not sufficiently clear, one could turn to other ancient versions and, above all, to the original texts. While “a wide field is still left open to the private student” who should feel free to go beyond the achievements of the past, he must never forget that the Church is the infallible interpreter of the Bible in matters of faith and morals. A unanimous interpretation given by the Fathers is likewise free from error.

Another directive dealt with difficulties raised by rationalism. Since the Bible offered many proofs of the Church's claims, its trustworthiness as a human document must be vindicated. Its defenders must be well versed in Oriental languages and the art of criticism to be able to combat the exaggerations of rationalist higher criticism.

To refute the assertion that findings of the natural sciences contradict the Bible, the encyclical pointed out that there could be no contradiction between the theologian and the scientist, as long as each remains within his own field. The sacred writers had no intention to teach about the nature of the universe; they, like their contemporaries, spoke of things as they appear to the senses. Opinions of the Fathers in this field are not binding. "The principles here laid down will apply to cognate sciences, and especially to history." This statement became the object of much discussion and was clarified by BENEDICT XV and PIUS XII.

Having indicated various ways of defending the trustworthiness and truthfulness of the Bible, the encyclical singled out one method of solving difficulties as being incompatible with the traditional doctrine: that of limiting either the inspiration or inerrancy to the passages that deal with matters of faith and morals. Whatever the Bible contains was written by men moved by the Holy Spirit who cannot be the author of error.

Effects. Providentissimus Deus served as a firm guide to Catholic Biblical scholarship. It endorsed a gradual liberation from undue traditionalism; it made fruitless disputes with findings of the natural sciences unnecessary; it encouraged a judicious acceptance of contemporary scientific and historical discoveries and the desire to return to the original texts. With its definition of inspiration in terms of motion, rather than revelation and suggestion, it led toward a more adequate concept of inspiration.

Bibliography: E. MANGENOT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 7.2:2177–2266. LEO XIII, "Providentissimus Deus," Acta Sanctorum Sedis 26 (1893–94) 269–292. English tr. Rome and the Study of Scripture (7th ed. rev. and enl. St. Meinrad, Ind. 1962). J. LEVIE, The Bible, Word of God in Words of Men, tr. S. H. TREMAN (New York 1962). J. DIDOT, Traité de la Sainte Écriture d'après S. S. Léon XIII (Paris 1894). M. D'HULST, "La Question biblique," Le Correspondant 170 (1893) 201–251. J. BRUCKER, "La 'Question biblique,'" Études 58 (1893) 361–387; "L'Apologie biblique, d'après l'encyclique 'Providentissimus Deus,'" Études 61 (1894) 545–565; 62 (1894) 619–641. M. J. LAGRANGE, "À propos de l'encyclique Providentissimus," Revue biblique 4 (1895) 48–64; "L'Inspiration et les exigences de la critique," Revue biblique 5 (1896) 496–518. A. F. HEWIT, "The Encyclical Providentissimus Deus," American Ecclesiastical Review 12 (1895) 318–328, 395–404, 454–465.

[A. M. AMBROZIC]

PROVISION

In the medieval Church, "provision" generally designated one of the extraordinary roads to benefices, particularly that of "papal provision," which began to develop in the century after the GREGORIAN REFORM. Originally a benefice was a concession of land for or to a church, but by the time of Gregory VII there was emerging the concept that a benefice was actually distinct from the office (parish church, canonry, etc.) that it was designed to support. Ordinarily the COLLATIO, or disposal, of these benefices rested with a bishop or other patron; but with the development of new forms of education in the wake of the Gregorian reform, some educated clerics found that their qualities were better appreciated at Rome than by local patrons of churches. The oldest form of papal provision, that of Pope Innocent II in 1137, was in fact nothing more than a simple request to a bishop to provide a certain cleric with a benefice. By the time of Pope Honorius IV (1154–59), however, the request was turning into a formal mandate de providendo, and from the time of Alexander III (1159–81) onward there was a movement toward a stabilized system of provisions. In fact the practice was so well established by 1240 that it was almost notorious. Some of the opposition directed against it was no doubt due to vested interest (see NEPOTISM), but many bishops, sincere in their pastoral duties, viewed the system with misgivings, judging from the GRAVAMINA presented to the Council of LYONS in 1245 by the English Church (see ROBERT GROSSETESTE). If, as was claimed, the practice provided a way of curbing abuses in ordinary collation, it also afforded the papacy an opportunity of consolidating its authority. Only in 1265, however, did the papacy formulate in theory what it had achieved in the course of the preceding century: in the decretal Licet ecclesiarum (Aug. 27, 1265; Corpus iuris canonici VI^o 3.4.2), Pope Clement IV set out for the first time the papal right to dispose of all ecclesiastical benefices. After additional legislation by Boniface VIII, Clement V, and John XXII, the system had grown into an efficient if not profitable business by 1350, and it was to occasion stiff opposition in several countries, notably in England (Statutes of PROVISORS of 1351, 1353, 1365, 1385). However, since a papal provision granted a right only to be considered by the ordinary collator, a relatively small number of these provisions had final efficacy, and normal rights of collation were rarely trampled upon.

Bibliography: E. VON OTTENTHAL, Regulae cancellariae apostolicae: Die päpstlichen Kanzleiregeln von Johannes XXII bis Nicolaus V. (Innsbruck 1888). K. LUX, Constitutionum apostolicarum de generali beneficiorum reservatione . . . collectio et interpretatio (Breslau 1904). U. BERLIÈRE, ed., Suppliques de Clément VI. (1342–1352) (Analecta Vaticano-Belgica 1; Brussels 1906). G. MOLLAT, La Collation des bénéfices ecclésiastiques sous les papes d'Avignon, 1305–1378 (Paris 1921); Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 2:406–449. G. BARRACLOUGH, Papal Provisions (Oxford 1935).

[L. E. BOYLE]

PROVISORS, STATUTE OF

This statute of 1351 was directed against the practice of “papal provisions,” i.e., the appointment of clerics to offices in the English church by the pope. Such appointments, which began to be made on a large scale in the 13th century, were always unpopular since the papal appointees were often absentee foreigners and a petition against them was presented at the Parliament of Carlisle in 1307. Subsequently the outbreak of the Hundred Years’ War at a time when a line of French popes was established at Avignon increased English resentment against alien provisors and in the 1340s there were several more parliamentary petitions on the subject. The statute eventually enacted declared that ecclesiastical electors and ecclesiastical patrons in England were to exercise freely their right to elect or to present to church offices. If the Roman Curia attempted to make any provision “in disturbance of the free elections, collations or presentations aforementioned,” the right of collation was to fall for that occasion to the king. Any provisor who attempted to disturb the nominee of the king or of an ecclesiastical patron was to be imprisoned until he paid a fine to be fixed at the king’s discretion and undertook not to defend his claim by a suit before the Roman Curia. The statute was never systematically enforced. So far as royal rights of presentation were concerned, the development of case law by mid-14th century had provided the king with ample means of enforcing his will without recourse to the statute.

Bibliography: H. GEE and W. J. HARDY, Documents Illustrative of English Church History (New York 1896) 112–121, statutes of 1351 and 1390. G. BARRACLOUGH, Papal Provisions (Oxford 1935). F. CHEYETTE, “Kings, Courts, Cures, and Sinecures: The Statute of Provisors and the Common Law,” Traditio 19 (1963) 295–349.

[B. TIERNEY]

PROVOST, JAMES H.

Priest, Canon lawyer, and university professor. b. Washington, D.C., Oct. 16, 1939; d. Takoma Park, Maryland, Aug. 27, 2000. The third of four children born to Oscar and Mary Provost, James Provost spent most of his formative years in Missoula, Montana, where he attended local schools. After graduating from Carroll College in Helena, Montana, with degrees in philosophy and mathematics, he studied theology at the Catholic University of Leuven and was ordained to the presbyterate for the service of the Diocese of Helena in Leuven in 1963. After a short period as a parish priest, he earned his doctorate in canon law (J. C. D.) at the Pontifical Lateran University in Rome with a dissertation entitled Interecclesial Communion in the Light of the Second Vatican Council.

From 1967 to 1979, Provost served as chancellor and officialis of the Diocese of Helena under Bishop Raymond Hunthausen. Active in ecumenical affairs, Provost was a founding member of the Montana Association of Churches and served on the ARC-MONT, the Anglican-Roman Catholic dialogue, from its inception. For the last few years before his death, he was a member of the Anglican-Roman Catholic Conversation (ARCIC) for the United States.

Provost was a leading member of the Canon Law Society of America (CLSA) for over thirty years, serving as its vice-president from 1976 to 1977, its president from 1977 to 1978, and its executive coordinator from 1980 to 1986. In 1979, Provost joined the faculty of canon law at the Catholic University of America. He chaired the department from 1987 to 1998 and was the managing editor of The Jurist from 1980 until his death. Provost was also one of the editors of the church order section of the international theological journal Concilium and a member of the board of the Consociatio Internationalis Studio Iuris Canonici Promovendo. In 1991, the CLSA awarded him its highest award, the Role of Law Award, for his contribution to the reform of church law.

Provost saw the great task of canon law in the last four decades of the twentieth century to be translating the ecclesiological vision of the Second Vatican Council, whose sessions he had observed while a student in Rome, into concrete reality. As a result, he approached canon law as an instrument not to exert control over the faithful, but to facilitate the actualization of the Church’s self understanding expressed in its theology. For him, the study and teaching of canon law was not a purely academic undertaking, but ministry that was deeply pastoral. For many years, he directed the Canon Law Society’s Permanent Seminar, a study group that brought together scholars from various disciplines. This seminar produced several collections of essays including The Church as Communio, The Church as Missio, Official Ministry in a New Age, and Protection of Rights in the Church. To each of these collections, Provost contributed a concluding essay which synthesized the other contributions and projected a vision of the shape of the Church in the future and the challenges, practical and intellectual, to realizing that vision. Provost also made important contributions to the two commentaries on the 1983 Code of Canon Law sponsored by the Canon Law Society of America. He wrote the sections on the rights and obligations of the Christian faithful (cc. 204–231) and the supreme authority of the Church (cc. 330–367) for The Code of Canon Law: A Text and Commentary (1985) and the section on ecclesiastical office (cc. 145–196) for A New Commentary on the Code of Canon Law (2000). Provost also published numerous studies, both scholarly and popular, on such subjects as matrimonial jurisprudence, diocesan administration, rights in the Church, and the governance of the Apostolic See when the see is impeded. Through his writings, teaching, and lecturing, Provost's influence extended well beyond the United States and shaped a whole generation of canon lawyers.

[J. P. BEAL]

PROXY (CANON LAW)

The fundamental principle of canon law regarding proxy is that one can do through others what one can do oneself. There are, of course, many exceptions to this principle, arising either from the nature of the case or from the law itself. The law expressly forbids the use of proxies in diocesan synods or eparchial assemblies (Codex iuris canonici c. 464; CCEO c. 239), in a profession of faith demanded by the law (Codex iuris canonici c. 833), and in the taking of oaths where required or permitted by the law (Codex iuris canonici c. 1199 § 2). Non-Catholic Christians or non-Christians can act validly as proxies in ecclesiastical matters, but not lawfully without a grave reason. Proxies are either extrajudicial or judicial. An oral authorization (mandate) is, in general, sufficient for the valid appointment of extrajudicial proxies.

Proxies for the contracting parties in matrimony in the Latin Church require for validity a special mandate for the contracting of marriage with a specific person, signed by the person giving the mandate and by the pastor or ordinary of the place or a priest designated by one of these priests, or by at least two witnesses (Codex iuris canonici c. 1105). If the mandate is revoked or the party giving the mandate develops amentia before the proxy contracts, the mandate is invalidated immediately (Codex iuris canonici c. 1105 § 4). A minister is generally not to assist at a marriage in which one of the parties is represented by a proxy without first obtaining the permission of a local ordinary (Codex iuris canonici c. 1071 § 1, 7°).

Generally speaking, one who possesses legal capacity to enter or defend a suit in person is free to appoint a proxy (attorney or procurator) to represent him in the course of the trial (Codex iuris canonici cc. 1481 § 1, 1482, 1483; CCEO cc. 1139 § 1, 1140, 1141). However, the law or the judge may at times demand personal appearance (Codex iuris canonici c. 1477; CCEO c. 1135). On the other hand, the law demands that some persons (e.g., juridic persons; minors, in certain cases), in order to stand in court at all, must act through proxies (Codex iuris canonici cc. 1478, 1480; CCEO cc. 1136, 1138).

For the validity of judicial appointment, the principal must give his proxy a special written and signed mandate authorizing the proxy to represent him in judicial matters (Codex iuris canonici c. 1484; CCEO c. 1142). Some judicial acts require a further specific authorization by the principal (Codex iuris canonici c. 1485, CCEO c. 1143).

A proxy may be rejected by the judge for cause or removed by the principal at any time (Codex iuris canonici c. 1487; CCEO c. 1145).

Bibliography: J. ABBO and J. HANNAN, The Sacred Canons (St. Louis 1960). S. WOYWOD, A Practical Commentary on the Code of Canon Law, rev. and enl. C. SMITH (New York 1963). C. CONNORS, Extra-Judicial Procurators in the Code of Canon Law (Catholic University of America Canon Law Studies, 192; Washington 1944). J. HOGAN, Judicial Advocates and Procurators (Catholic University of America Canon Law Studies, 133; Washington 1941).

[J. D. KING/J. STAAB]

PRUDENCE

The Greek φρόνησις, the Latin prudentia (by contraction from providens according to Cicero, from porro videns according to the Etymologies of St. Isidore); the English word “prudence” has been inflected in ethical writing by the Klugheit of Kant and has ceased to convey the confidence, enterprise, and generosity of what perhaps is better now called “practical wisdom.”

Aristotle. Of the five intellectual virtues set out by Aristotle, prudence is the only one to be taken into Christian moral theology, which treats understanding, science, and wisdom as gifts of the HOLY SPIRIT, and art as outside its scope. It is a steady disposition of the practical reason to right-doing and therefore directly involves morality; accordingly it appears throughout the Nicomachean Ethics and enters the perennial debate whether good or bad conduct can be resolved into knowledge or ignorance or whether affective factors are more decisive. To Aristotle, who combined the statement of universal truths with a strong sense of individual reality, which, he maintained, was an interest for the rational part of man, prudence was like a bridge flung out from necessary principles to contingent occasions in human living. He originated the distinction between the theoretical and the practical reason; and though he recognized the function of appetite in ἠθικῆ, or morals, a dialectic of love the Christian theologians were to explore at greater depth, he remained faithful to the teaching of Socrates and always qualified it by reason; the final step, he said, and was later echoed by St. Thomas, may be called either appetitive intelligence or intelligent appetite.

Prudence, detail from "The Allegory of Good Government," fresco by Ambrogio Lorenzetti, the Palazzo Pubblico, Siena, 1338–1340. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

This decisive knowledge held in prudence is therefore experimental. It is elicited from the opinative, or calculative, part of the soul, not from the scientific; its regard moves from the abstract and general principles of moral theory to their embodiment in particular practice; hence prudence is to be looked for in men of affairs such as Pericles, rather than in philosophers such as Thales and Anaxagoras. It consists in putting meaning into the moral virtues that otherwise could be represented merely as laudable tendencies toward fair, brave, and temperate dealing—to name only the cardinal virtues from Aristotle's repertory. An act deserves to be called virtuous because it goes to an object, not as happening to be good, but for the reason that it good; it is not only that it is according to right reason, κατά τον ὀρθόν λόγον, by behaviorist tests, or because it manifests goodwill and honest feeling, but because by prudence it is charged with right reason, μετά τοῦ ὀρθοῦ λόγου. So prudence enters into the activity of all the moral virtues; in fact there is no question of acting prudently prudent, but of acting prudently just or courageous and so forth.

The Fathers. The moral science of the patristic writers and of the Latin Stoics whose lessons they digested was less analytic and more descriptive, and it was not until after the middle of the 13th century, when Aristotle was rediscovered, that the special character of prudence was explored and mapped in the scheme of the virtues. Yet in acknowledging its importance, the patristic writers did not soften its intellectual accent. The Scriptures, of course, offer no set of psychologico-moral treatises; yet the conduct of life according to good sense runs as a current throughout the Old Testament, notably in the Sapiential books; the New Testament, notably in the parables (for instance, of the unjust steward and of the wise virgins), enjoins men to use their wits. They are to emulate the cunning of serpents, and the contrast between worldly prudence and the folly of the cross does nothing to detract from the apostolic insistence on an intelligent appreciation of how men should conduct themselves.

Accordingly, SS. Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, and Gregory the Great helped to form the theological tradition that prudence is the first of the cardinal virtues; and its cognitional content was reinforced by the Vulgate words discernere, disceptatio, and discretio, which represented key ideas in the monastic teaching of Cassian, St. Benedict, and St. Bernard. Discretion is the salt that preserves the virtues, and Richard of Saint-Victor said that without it they go to waste.

St. Thomas Aquinas. The specific notion of prudence, though somewhat more developed by Philip the Chancellor, working on St. John Damascene, Cicero, and Macrobius, than by Peter Lombard, was not isolated from the general characteristics of inspired common sense that St. Thomas treated as the components, or integral parts, of the virtue. He did not mention some proposed by Chrysippus, εὐλογιστία, or right reckoning; ἀγχινοία, or ready wit; βουνέχεια, or discreetness; εὐμηχανία, or being fertile with expedients. He listed memoria, which profits from past experience; intelligentia, which grasps the point at issue; docilitas, or teachableness; eustochia and solertia, which swiftly find the mark for themselves; ratio, which comes to the conclusion of a practical decision; providentia, or foresight; circumspectio, which attends to the relevant circumstances; and cautio, which does not mean a cautious playing for safety (an attitude later frowned on by the Church under the name of TUTIORISM) but a wary escaping from the evil that may take on the color of good in the mixture of interests involved in any practical course. These eight headings (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 49), taken from Robert Grosseteste's translation of the περί παθῶν of the Pseudo-Andronicus, together with the treatment of the vices against prudence (ibid. 2a2ae, 53–55), provided a clearly articulated summary of the moral theology of prudence as St. Thomas found it.

The vices fall into two classes, of the too little and the too much. The first, generally called imprudence, includes ill-advisedness, carelessness in judgment, and negligence and inconstancy in execution. The second, or false prudence, covers giving in to the wiles of the flesh, the prudencia carnis of the Vulgate; craftiness, astutia, expressed in guile and deceit; and the over-solicitude about temporal things and the morrow the Gospel tells us to avoid.

The precision of St. Thomas's treatment of prudence as a special virtue is prepared for by his two psychological studies—first, on the distinction of human powers (Summa theologiae 1a, 77–83, in particular 79.11–13); next, on the analysis of the partial acts integrating a complete human act (ibid. 1a2ae, 8–17, in particular 16–17)—and by his ethical study of intellectual and moral virtue (loc. cit., 55–61, in particular 57–58). He writes as an intellectualist who holds that an act of mind is constitutive, though not complete, of happiness and of the moral activity that teleologically gets reality and meaning from that end. His detailed study of virtuous activity in the Secunda secundae starts from the high theological virtues whose object is nothing less than God himself. The moral virtues, which come afterward, are concerned with penultimate values in man. In addressing himself to these, he begins with prudence, which strikes the note of intelligence in action.

St. Thomas's notion of prudence is built up in four stages: (1) prudence is about means to ends, (2) which are individual, (3) about which it comes to a practical decision, (4) leading to effective execution. These should not be taken to represent more than four abstract moments that, like the virtues themselves, flow into one another in the acting singleness of a human person; nevertheless it will be convenient to consider them separately.

Concerned with Means to Ends. St. Thomas drew from Aristotle and from St. Gregory the Great for his teaching on the contemplative and active lives. Christian contemplation, which surpasses the ideal of philosophy and of natural mysticism, is of God Himself, in heaven seen face to face and on earth immediately "intended" by faith, hope, and charity and the accompanying gifts of the Holy Spirit, above all through the love-knowledge of Wisdom. The moral virtues are on the lower plane of the active life, and the prudential knowledge that charges them is less final in its reach and bears on more particularized objects. These are called ea quae sunt ad finem, or realities that are Godward; this can be translated as "means to an end" as long as this is not taken to mean that they are mere utilities having no value in themselves and desirable only because of an extrinsic reference to an ulterior end. They are the creaturely objects of moral virtue manifesting reason and grace. In any given situation it is the office of prudence to decide where they are to be found.

Concerned with What Is Individual. Consequently, moral activity neither begins nor ends with prudence. That the theological virtues are already engaged is presupposed (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 58.4, 5; 65.2), and so also the habit of SYNDERESIS (ibid. 1a, 79.12) and the bent of the moral virtues each to its own proper type of good (ibid. 2a2ae, 47.6), together with an instructed moral science. The dialectic of prudence is to bring these premises to bear on an individual course of action in an operative syllogism, so called because it partly resembles a demonstrative syllogism: not rarely St. Thomas compares the process of making up one's mind to the discourse of reasoning. Hence prudence is said to be collativa and consiliativa; it is deliberative and not contemplative; it has to make do with evidences that are more multiple, variable, and contingent than those of scientific argument; and the conclusion it comes to cannot be wholly resolved into necessary premises.

It is true that necessary principles are established in the theoretical mind by abstraction from experience; yet a man can remain in a sort of fastness if he merely thinks about things without trying to do something about them.

Prudence involves the reflection by which the mind applies itself again to the experience of individual things; and though this attachment implies the appetite for things as they are in themselves and not in the mind, prudence itself is an act of reason reaching past the general meaning to the reality beyond, past quidditas carnis to ipsa caro (Summa theologiae 1a, 86.1; 1a2ae, 27.2 ad 2; 2a2ae, 47.3; In 3 anim. 8).

Arrival at Practical Decisions. The judgment of prudence is practical; it states not what is, but what is to be done. Though the generalizations of moral science can show the necessity of good intention and define the types of good activity, they cannot legislate for individual circumstances. Moreover, the judgment issues from an interaction of mind and will in the field of morals and friendship, where appetitional factors are peculiarly untranslatable into cognitional terms; the possession of virtue sets up a sympathy that requires no rational exposition or justification (Summa theologiae 1a, 1.6 ad 3), and on earth God can be loved more than He is known (ibid. 2a2ae, 27.4). On these three counts, then—namely, because it is individual, practical, and in love—the judgment of prudence goes beyond the findings of moral philosophy and theology, though not beyond the sacra doctrina of revelation (ibid. 1a, 1.3–7).

Effective Execution. At this third stage the judgment is an act of conscience, which itself is not a virtue (ibid. 1a, 79.13). A sincere and truthful conscience is not enough to ensure virtuous conduct; one may stop there or act against its dictate. Even a conscientious person may not be a prudent person. So prudence moves from the indicative to the imperative, from the mood of stating a preference, that this and not that is to be done, to the mood of commanding, do this and not that. Moreover, in this command the forces of the will are gathered so that the deed is effectively executed. In this implanting of truth into action consists the act of prudence as a specific virtue; in the preceding stages of taking counsel and making a choice St. Thomas sees the operation of the associated virtues of eubulia, synesis, and gnome, soon to be noticed.

He treats effective command, imperium, in reference to both the dynamic psychology of a human act (ibid. 1a2ae, 17.1) and the political ordinance of law (ibid. 1a2ae, 90.1) as an act of mind and not of will, in which some later scholastic theologians disagreed with him: for the technicalities of the discussion, which includes the meaning of usus, whereby what is intended is actually carried out, the student is referred to the commentators (ibid. 1a2ae, 16.1; 17.3). His own formula is that the reason is dirigens, the will is movens, while another power may be exequens; in this context he speaks of "application” as the act of prudence to refer to taking the abstract universal to the concrete individual and also to bringing intention into execution.

A Moral Virtue. It is by this commitment to good doing, in which good living consists, that prudence is a moral virtue, surpassing the condition of intellectual virtue, which takes a detached view of things, and of art, which governs the making of external things. And because it is recta ratio agibilium putting “good-as-meant,” ratio boni, into what is done, it forms the link connecting the activities of all the moral virtues. As inclinations they may pull apart (thus, for example, friendliness and sobriety), and as defined by types of activity they are distinct from prudence; nevertheless their practice on any occasion is truly virtuous only when directed by prudence. St. Thomas here crystallizes the doctrine received from the Stoics and the Fathers, according to which each virtue represents one general condition of virtue, and all virtue is composed of them all; thus prudence and justice and courage enter into the texture of temperance (ibid. 1a2ae, 58.4, 5; 65.1; 2a2ae, 47.6, 7). Now he is saying more, namely, that prudence as a special virtue commands the acts of all the moral, though not the theological, virtues.

The governing role of prudence extends from the conduct of a single personal life, prudentia monastica, to the business of the commonwealth. It is like justice, which includes the general or legal justice safeguarding and promoting the bonum commune. So there is a type of prudence comprehensively called “political,” πολιτική, possessed by all free and responsible citizens in a regime and given the special names of regnativa and legis positiva, βασιλική and νομοθετική, in the ruling and legislating authority (ibid. 2a2ae; 47.10; 50.1, 2); this last, it is worth noting, repeats the prudential dialectic and does not deduce decisions like conclusions from principles but produces them like works of art freely answering to the general specifications (ibid. 1a2ae, 95.2). Two other types may be noticed for directing infrapolitical groups: the domestic prudence, economica, οἰκονομική, for running a family or household, a neighborhood or tribal community, and a business company; and the prudentia militaris of good generalship. Pseudo-Andronicus mentions this στρατηγική; there may have been biographical reasons why St. Thomas devoted a special article to it (ibid. 2a2ae, 50.4) and treated soldierliness as a prudence and not just an art.

More directly needed by everybody are the companion virtues of prudence, its potential parts: eubulia, εὐβουλία, good counsel; synesis, σύνεσις, sound judgment in the ordinary run of affairs; and gnome, γνώμη, which decides about exceptional cases. For Aristotle these three enter into the field of prudence, but St. Thomas was more precise about treating them as distinct and special virtues; to be well-advised is not the same as being judicious in day-to-day events or when the laws do not fit the occasion; and to be judicious does not necessarily amount to an effective precept that carries out what should be done (ibid. 2a2ae, 51). Gnome is of particular interest because of its intimate relation with equity, ΕΠΙΚΕΙΑ, ἐπιείκεια, the highest part of justice (ibid. 2a2ae, 120.2). They check pharisaism (even the noblest), are set on the spirit rather than the letter, and expand in the freedom of the Gospel as against the constraint of positive law (ibid. 1a2ae, 106–108).

Gnome stands as a comment, neglected in some periods of moral theology, on the attempts of the various quasi-legal moral systems to convert a doubtful conscience into a sufficient guide for conduct and in effect to provide a reassurance against sin by a reference to a code or to glosses on it. It shows that prudence does not seek legality as such, but to be reasonable in a unique situation. It may make mistakes and has a healthy fear of the consequences; yet it is not overanxious, for its truth is measured by conformity more to fair loving than to an objective fact (ibid. 1a2ae; 57.5 ad 3). Not looking for a guarantee of fixed evidence that its variable matter cannot provide or for the kind of security not allowed by Providence, it is marked by a robustness and an abandon to God that philosophers are unable to teach and jurists unable to prescribe. In short, there is nothing mean, tame, or timid about prudence, nor is it tangled in regulations; like all the virtues, it gives a strength and ease and, indeed, an elegance about what is best.

This best is nothing less than living in the society of the divine Persons of the Blessed Trinity. Though St. Thomas’s treatise on prudence reproduces the structure of Aristotle and the mood of the Stoics, the virtue itself is seen in the setting of Christian theology against the grandeur in the background of St. Augustine’s teaching of the eternal law and lit by the revelation of God’s majesty and mercy and friendship. It is a virtue infused with grace; its measure exceeds that of living merely according to reason—its measure is the mind of Christ; its purpose is not to be respectable but to be a fellow citizen of the saints and a familiar of God (ibid. 1a2ae, 63.4). It springs from and lives only in charity, without which one may be shrewd but cannot be prudent (ibid. 1a2ae, 65.2, 3; 2a2ae, 47.13, 14). Furthermore it is touched by the Spirit to act with heroism in the gift of counsel (ibid. 2a2ae, 52.2).

Of all qualities, mercy is the most divine (ibid. 1a, 21.3, 4). And St. Thomas, taking his cue from St. Augustine, who with sure instinct if at some strain of literary artifice attributes a corresponding evangelical beatitude to each gift of the Holy Spirit, perceives in counsel a practical compassion (ibid. 2a2ae, 52.4) for which Our Lord has given His promise: Blessed are the merciful, for they shall find mercy.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, La Prudence (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 47–56), ed. and tr. T. H. DEMAN (2d ed. Paris 1949). H. D. NOBLE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 13.1:1023–76. A. RAULIN, “Prudence,” in The Virtues and States of Life, ed. A. M. HENRY, tr. R. J. OLSEN and G. T. LENNON (Theology Library 4; Chicago 1957) 209–50. A. M. HENRY et al., Prudence chrétienne (Paris 1948). J. PIEPER, Prudence, tr. R. and C. WINSTON (New York 1959). C. SPICQ, “La Vertu de prudence dans l’A. T.,” Revue biblique 42 (1933) 187–210. A. GARDEIL, La Vraie vie chrétienne (Paris 1935) 99–189. O. LOTTIN, “Les Débuts de traité de la prudence au moyen-âge,” Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 4 (1932) 270–93. J. R. CONNERY, “Prudence and Morality,” Theological Studies 13 (1952) 564–82. W. A. GERHARD, “The Intellectual Virtue of Prudence,” The Thomist 8 (1945) 413–56.

[T. GILBY]

PRUDENTIUS

Aurelius Prudentius Clemens, the greatest Christian Latin poet and the only layman regarded as a Latin Father; b. 348, probably at Calahorra, Spain; d. after 404. All knowledge of his life is based on what he says in his works. He had a normal Roman education. He “twice ruled noble cities,” made a journey to Rome for personal reasons, and in his 56th year felt a sense of compunction for the way his life had been spent.

His Cathemerinon consists of 12 hymns, six for daily use (cockcrow, morning, etc.) and six for special occasions (for the dead, Christmas, Epiphany, etc.). The Peristephanon (Crowns of Martyrs) includes poems on SS. Lawrence, Eulalia, Vincent, Cyprian, and Agnes. A long poem on St. Romanus is usually printed as Peristephanon 10, but does not belong to that work. Most of the Peristephanon poems appear to be written for singing by a Christian congregation, probably at Calahorra, at the celebration of the feast (annua) of martyrs. The Cathemerinon belong to domestic cult, being designed for use in a household of the Roman type. The poems of both collections are in lyric meters, and selections from them form hymns used in both the Roman and Mozarabic rites.

Three poems in hexameters, Apotheosis, Hamartigenie, and Psychomachia are marked as books 1, 2, and 3; but the title of the combined work is not extant. The Apotheosis deals with the deification of man through the actions of Christ; the Hamartigenia concerns the origin of sin and evil; and the Psychomachia is an allegorical poem in which the Soul assisted by specific Virtues rescues the Body from the attack of Vices. It concludes with a description, based on the Apocalypse, of the construction of a Temple of Holy Wisdom in the soul.

A poem in two books, Contra Symmachum, attacks the Roman pagan religion and is related to the controversy over the removal of the altar of Victory from the Senate in Rome. Prudentius’ arguments parallel those of St. AMBROSE. Most striking in this work are his vision of the Roman world as one people (una propago) formed out of many by common laws and institutions and his vigorous attack on gladiatorial shows.

Prudentius saw Christianity as involving not the overthrow of Rome and its institutions but rather the fulfillment of Rome’s essential civilizing function, since paganism and barbarism are frequently opposed to Christianity and civilization. Just as works of sculpture are begrimed with soot and grease through the rituals of ancient religious sacrifice but can be made pure and clean by being washed and scrubbed, revealing themselves as works of art and beauty, so also could Roman institutions, by Christianization and baptism, achieve a more adequate realization of their essential purpose and function in the design of Providence.

Prudentius had a firm command of the resources of the Latin language. His writings show a fondness for Lucretius, Vergil, and Juvenal; but he was a slavish imitator of none. His sentences vary from the short and pithy to periods of 17 lines. For extended imagery he preferred examples and figures drawn from Scripture or nature to traditional simile or metaphor.

Especially notable is his ability to project personalities and actions of Sacred History or Christian legend in vivid detail. His descriptions of the denial of Peter (Cath. 1); the fury of Herod and his soldiers, as well as the Holy Innocents playing with their crowns of martyrdom in heaven (Cath. 12); Abraham rescuing Loth (Psych. praef.); and Lawrence on his gridiron (Perist. 2) have led to charges that Prudentius was prolix and gruesome and that he offended against good taste; but his technique seems appropriate to the social context for which the poems were intended.

Prudentius soon became a Christian classic. He was quoted by GREGORY OF TOURS and many others. His works formed a staple item in the monastic schools of the ninth century and were provided with commentaries and glosses. His writings, especially the Psychomachia, were early provided with illustrations, which in turn inspired a rich group of illustrated manuscripts of the early and high Middle Ages.

In the post-Renaissance period a lack of sympathy with Prudentius’ aims and artistic ideals led to neglect of his work.

Bibliography: Works, ed. J. BERGMAN (Corpus scriptorum Christianorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 61; 1926); ed. M. LAVARENNE, 4 v. (Budé ser.; Paris 1943–51), with Fr. tr.; ed. and tr. H. J. THOMSON, 2 v. (Loeb Classical Library; 1949–53). E. K. RAND, “Prudentius and Christian Humanism,” American Philological Association: Transactions and Proceedings 51 (1920) 71–83. R. J. DEFERRARI and J. CAMPBELL, A Concordance of Prudentius (Cambridge, Mass. 1932). B. M. PEEBLES, The Poet Prudentius (New York 1951). C. GNILKA, Studien zur Psychomachie des Prudentius (Wiesbaden 1963). L. PADOVESE, La cristologia di Aurelio Clemente Prudenzio (Rome 1980). A. KURFESS, Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. (Stuttgart 1893) 23.1 (1957) 1039–72.

[M. P. CUNNINGHAM]

PRUDENTIUS OF TROYES, ST.

Theologian; b. Spain; d. Troyes, 861. He came of a refugee family, was educated at the Palatine School, and served as chaplain at the court of Louis the Pious before becoming bishop of Troyes in 843 or 846. In the predestination controversy he supported GOTTSCHALK OF ORBAIS against HINC MAR OF REIMS, defending the doctrine of double predestination in his Epistola ad Hincmarum (c. 849) and again in his treatise De predestinatione contra Joannem Scotum, i.e., against JOHN SCOTUS ERIGENA, whose aid Hincmar had solicited. Prudentius differed with Gottschalk, however, in limiting God’s salvific will to believers in Christ. Apparently he subscribed to the anti-Augustinian propositions of the Synod of Quiercy (853), but in 856 in his Epistola Tractoria, addressed to Wenilo of Sens, he challenged these propositions and professed a strictly Augustinian doctrine. Prudentius wrote also a continuation of the Annales Bertiniani for the years 835 to 861, valuable for the history of the Frankish Empire, as well as a scriptural floritegium, a Sermo de vita et morte gloriosae Maurer, and some poetry. A Pontifical erroneously attributed to him (Paris B. N. ms. lat. 818) is in reality an 11th-century Missal-Ritual.

Feast: April 6.

Bibliography: A critical ed. of the continuation of the Annales Bertiniani by G. H. PERTS, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 1:429–454; PRUDENTIUS’ complete works (except for poetry) in Patrologia Latina ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 115:965–1458; Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Poetae 2:679–680; Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae 5.1:323–324; 5.2:631–633. J. GIRGENSOHN, Prudentius und die bertinianischen Annalen (Göttingen 1872). M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters (Munich 1911–31) 1:344–348. A. WILMART, “Le Vrai pontifical de Prudence de Troyes,” Revue Bénédictine 34 (1922) 282–293. F. STEGMÜLLER, Repertorium biblicum medii aevi 4:7015–17. K. VIELHABER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:846–847.

[A. H. TEGELS]

PRÜM, ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine Abbey of the Holy Savior, Eifel, Archdiocese of Trier, founded in 721 by Bertrada of Mür-lenbach. A generation later Pepin the Short brought it under Carolingian protection, granting it immunity from the local lord. Prüm, with a market and a mint (861), had economic and political importance under the Carolingians. It was a stronghold, and Charlemagne imprisoned his son Pepin there. Norman raids in 882 and 892 caused no serious setback, and by 893 Carolingian gifts brought the abbey’s holdings to 1,530 estates. Its position as an imperial abbey was strengthened in 919 by the right to choose its own Vogt (advocatus). The abbey played an important role in the Empire through the early Middle Ages, and until the 18th century its abbot had a seat in the Reichstag.

The peak of its spiritual and intellectual life occurred in the 9th century under abbots Tancred, Markward, Eigil, and ANSBALD. Its cloister school was noted in the Carolingian period, and the Annales Prumienses are the best history of the Empire for the 10th century. The Lotharingian reform of 1003–04 began at Prüm, and in the 11th and 12th centuries active building took place there.

In the 13th century discipline was relaxed, debts accumulated, and the abbey had quarrels with its Vogts, who were closely allied with the counts of Luxembourg. To maintain their freedom against this combination, the abbots turned to the prince-archbishops of Trier, but in the next three centuries Prüm and its estates became an appendage of the Electorate of Trier. There was a revival of spiritual life in the 18th century under energetic priors. A new abbey church was begun in 1721. In 1794 the abbey was besieged by revolutionary troops, and in 1802 it was one of the ecclesiastical territories secularized by Napoleon I to reimburse German princes for the lands they lost to France.

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:2371. P. SCHMITZ, Histoire de l’Ordre de Saint-Benoit, 7 v. (Maredsous 1942–56). J. SEMMLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:848–850.

[P. P. BECKMAN]

PRÜMMER, DOMINIKUS

Dominican moral theologian and canonist; b. Kalterherberg, near Aachen, Germany, Sept. 3, 1866; d. Fribourg, Switzerland, June 9, 1931. Prümmer became a Dominican in 1884, studied philosophy and theology at the University of Louvain, and was ordained in 1890.

While continuing his studies, he also wrote and taught theology at Venlo and at Düsseldorf, where he served for three years as prior. In 1906 he went to England to teach moral theology in the Dominican house of studies at Hawkesyard near Rugeley in Staffordshire. He received his doctorate in Canon Law in 1908 at the Collegio Angelico in Rome and was then assigned to teach moral theology at the University of Fribourg. There he spent the remainder of his life. Prümmer's writings included books and articles on moral theology, Canon Law, psychopathology, and history. Among his works were the treatise Manuale theologiae moralis secundum principia S. Thomae Aquinatis (3 v., Freiburg im Breisgau 1914); the Vademecum theologiae moralis in usum examinandorum et confessoriorum (an epitome of the Manuale, Freiburg im Breisgau 1921), and the Manuale iuris ecclesiastici (2v. Freiburg im Breisgau 1907–09). All these works went through several editions. Prümmer was a frequent contributor to many ecclesiastical journals and edited the Fontes vitae S. Thomae Aquinatis notis historicis et criticis illustrati (Toulouse 191–137). Toward the end of his life, Prümmer devoted much time to the problem of the relationship between moral theology and psychopathology, but his untimely death kept him from completing his works on this subject.

Bibliography: Analecta Sacri Ordinis Praedicatorum 39 (1931) 247–249.

[C. LOZIER]

PSALMS, BOOK OF

The book of Psalms, or Psalter, is unique in the Bible. It is a collection of prayers, for the most part without reference to date or specific events or persons. Thus, more than any other part of the Bible, it is timeless.

The Book

Text and Versions. The primary text used in study and translation of the book of Psalms is the traditional Hebrew version, called the Masoretic Text. Other versions that are most helpful in determining the meaning of the psalms are the Septuagint, the Greek translation made around the 2d century B.C., and the three Latin translations made by Jerome in the late 4th century A.D.: the Roman Psalter, translated from the Old Latin with an eye on the Septuagint; the Gallican Psalter, translated from the Greek with an eye on Origen's Hexapla; and the Hebrew Psalter, translated from the Hebrew text. The Gallican Psalter is included in the Vulgate.

The best extant copies of the Masoretic Text are from the 10th to the 11th century A.D., but the discovery of several scrolls and fragments at the Dead Sea has provided versions of Hebrew psalms from the period between the 2d century B.C. and the 1st century A.D. These scrolls have helped to explain difficult words or phrases, but they have also provided new questions. For example, a scroll from Cave 11 at Qumran has many psalms from the last half of the Psalter, but they are in a different order than the one found in the Masoretic Text or the Septuagint (see QUMRAN COMMUNITY.)

Structure of the Book. The most notable feature regarding the structure of the book of Psalms is its division into five books of unequal length. Each of these books is marked off by a doxology at the end (see Ps 41.14; 72.18; 89.53; 106.48; 150). These doxologies are a later addition to these psalms to give the book a fivefold structure like the Pentateuch.

The book of Psalms is a collection of collections. These collections were apparently formed before the book reached its final stage. The psalms of David (Ps 3–41; 51–72) may include some psalms written by David the king. The attribution, however, is honorary, recognizing David as the patron saint of the Psalms. Other attributions categorize the psalms by groups of singers: Asaph (Ps 50; 73–83) and the Korahites (Ps 42–49; 84–85; 87–88). There is a collection entitled Songs of Ascent, probably pilgrimage psalms (Ps 120–134), a couple of collections of Hallel Psalms (Ps 113–118; 146–150; see also Ps 104–106; 111–112), and a collection of psalms celebrating the Lord's kingship (Ps 93–99).

A further characteristic indicates different collections or origins. The psalms from 1–41 frequently use the proper name of Israel's God, Yahweh. Ps 42–89 most often use the generic term "Elohim" for God. A comparison of Ps 14 and 53 demonstrates the difference.

Superscriptions. More than half the psalms begin with a verse or two that gives information about the collection and the performance of the psalm. Musical notes indicate the melody (e.g., "according to Lilies," Ps 45; 69; 80) and the instrumentation ("strings," Ps 4; 6; 54; 55; 61; 67; 67; "flute," Ps 5). Liturgical notes suggest the proper day for the psalm (e.g., Ps 92 on the Sabbath) or the special event (Ps 38 for the memorial sacrifice). Some superscriptions in the David collection connect a psalm to an event (e.g., "when David fled from Saul into the cave," Ps 57). These notes suggest the occasion and mood for praying a psalm.

Numbering. The numbering of the psalms has been a particular problem. The problem begins with Ps 9–10, which are two psalms in the traditional Hebrew Bible but one psalm in the Greek translation, the Septuagint. Thus from Ps 10 on, each psalm has two numbers, a higher one in the Hebrew Bible and a lower one in the Greek (and Latin) Bible. This situation continues until Ps 146–147, which are two psalms in the Septuagint but one psalm in the Hebrew Bible. There is also a minor confusion around Ps 114–116. Hebrew Ps 114 and 115 are combined in the Septuagint as Ps 113; Hebrew Ps 116 is divided in the Septuagint into Ps 114 and 115. Virtually all recent translations use the Hebrew numbering.

There is also a divergence in verse numbering. The King James Bible and those that follow its tradition (New Revised Standard Version [NRSV], Revised English Bible) do not number the superscriptions, whereas the New American Bible (NAB) follows the Hebrew verse numbering (so too the Septuagint and the Vulgate). Thus Ps 51 has 21 verses in the NAB and only 19 in the NRSV.

Canonization. The earlier consensus that the book of Psalms reached its final form around the 4th century B.C. has been challenged because of discrepancies found in scrolls at the Dead Sea. The question of when the Psalter was included in the canon of Scripture is also debated. It seems to have been included in the Hebrew Scriptures at least by the 2d century A.D., and perhaps sooner (see, for example, the references to “the law, the prophets, and the psalms;” Lk 24.44). Christian writers as early as the 2d century also presume that the Psalms are a part of Scripture (see CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA; IRENAEUS; JUSTIN MARTYR).

Interpretation

Genre. Through the 20th century, influenced by Hermann Gunkel, the primary way of interpreting the psalms was by considering their genre. The whole gamut of human emotions is covered by the various categories of psalms. The lament (e.g., Ps 22, 51) is a cry for help in suffering and a complaint to God who allows this to happen. Most laments, however, turn toward hope. Two categories develop from this turn. The psalm of thanksgiving (e.g., Ps 18, 107) captures the moment after pain. When God delivers the sufferer, the story must be told. The storytelling itself is thanksgiving. The repeated experience of God’s deliverance leads to trust, which is expressed in the psalms of confidence (e.g., Ps 23, 27). Then there are moments when the focus turns to God alone. All creation—human and otherwise—is called to join the song of praise, the hymn (e.g., Ps 100, 146).

The two major genres—lament and hymn—are distinguished by form as well as content. The lament usually begins with a cry to God. A middle section may contain any of these elements: a description of suffering, a complaint, a prayer for vengeance, a promise to offer sacrifice in thanksgiving. The lament usually concludes with a prayer of thanksgiving or confidence. Most hymns begin with a call to prayer, a call for help in giving praise to God. Those called may be one’s own being, faithful people, all nations, angels, or other created things such as animals, sun and stars, musical instruments. Ps 148 shows a rich variety of those called to help give praise. The call to praise in a hymn is followed by the reasons for praise. For example, God is just, compassionate. God delivers those in trouble, feeds the hungry. Ps 117 is a perfect example of a hymn with call to praise (v. 1) and reasons for praise (v. 2).

Miniature from French manuscript psalter; finest psalter specimen in United States.

Each of these genres is found either as the prayer of an individual or as a communal prayer. Other minor categories are distinguished by content alone: historical psalms, wisdom psalms, songs of Zion, liturgies.

Shape and Shaping. Toward the end of the 20th century scholarly interest turned to the Psalter as a book. Questions were raised concerning the editorial purpose of the arrangement of the psalms and the effect of that arrangement. Ps 1–2, without superscriptions and set off by beatitudes at beginning and end, were recognized as the introduction to the Psalter. Ps 1 sets a wisdom tone and praises the one who ponders God’s law day and night. Ps 2 is a recognition of God’s action in history especially through the anointed king, the messiah. Ps 150 is the great concluding doxology. There are more lament psalms at the beginning of the Psalter and more hymns at the end.

“The Pius II Book of Psalms,” illumination from a Medieval manuscript with Gregorian Chant annotations. (©David Lees/CORBIS)

The concluding psalms of books 2 and 3, Ps 72 and 89, are royal psalms. Ps 72, which concludes the David collection, paints a glowing picture of the king. In Ps 89 the monarchy is in trouble. Book 4 begins with a Psalm of Moses, the pre-monarchical leader, and continues with the collection acclaiming God as the king.

Other studies have been made of the positioning of the various collections and their relationship to other parts of the Old Testament. Michael D. Goulder, for example, links the Psalms of Asaph to the Pentateuch and the psalms in Book Five to Ezra-Nehemiah and the return from exile.

Translations. New translations of the Psalms continue to appear. Many are revisions of previous translations, e.g., the NRSV, and the revised psalms of the NAB. The International Commission on English in the Liturgy (ICEL) prepared a Psalter for liturgical use, using the principle of dynamic equivalence rather than that of formal correspondence. Dynamic equivalence is an attempt to capture the meaning in idiomatic English without echoing specifically the Hebrew grammar. Compare, for example, Ps 51.3 in the ICEL translation (“Have mercy, tender God, forget that I defied you”) with the NAB translation (“Have mercy on me, God, in your goodness; in your abundant compassion blot out my offense”).

Theology of the Psalms

The psalms portray God as the creator, ruling over and delighting in all that exists. They also portray God as the redeemer who works in history and delivers the people from their enemies. There is a strong sense of awe in the presence of the divine as well as a confidence that anyone in need can call upon God. God is especially solicitous for the helpless—the poor, the widow, the imprisoned, the oppressed.

In the psalms human beings are presented in all their diversity and fallibility. Sin is acknowledged but innocence is also claimed. The gamut of emotions is represented from joy to despair, anger to love. The physical body is significant in the psalms: bones ache, the throat is dry, the heart rejoices, the body rests. It is impossible to pray the psalms as disembodied spirits.

The psalms are a communal prayer. There are communal laments, communal thanksgivings, and the narration of the people’s history. But even the individual psalms turn frequently to the community. For example, both Ps 130 and 131 end with a prayer for Israel.

Christians pray the psalms in the spirit of Christ. The New Testament shows Jesus praying in the words of the psalms (see Mt 27.46; Mk 15.34; Lk 23.46). Early Christian writers heard the psalms as Christ’s prayer, as prayer to Christ, or as meditation on Christ.

Christian Use of the Psalms

Liturgical Use. The primary place the Catholic Christian meets the psalms is in the Liturgy of Word in the Eucharist. The responsorial psalm that follows the first reading distills the message of the readings and allows the participant to enter into them. For example, on the feast of Christ the King Year A the first reading is from the book of Ezekiel. In the reading God who chastises the selfish leaders of the people and declares: “I myself will look after my sheep.” The congregation claims God’s care by singing Ps 23: “The Lord is my shepherd.” In the first reading of the Twelfth Sunday of Year

A Jeremiah complains to God about his enemies. The congregation sings Ps 69 in the voice of Jeremiah: "Lord, in your great love, answer me." An excellent way to meditate on the readings from the Sunday liturgy is to begin with the responsorial psalm and to read the other readings through its lens.

The other major Christian use of the psalms is in the LITURGY OF THE HOURS, the daily prayer of the Church. At morning and midday, evening and night, Christians sanctify time through prayer. The bulk of this prayer consists of the psalms, arranged in a regular order, so that within a set period of time—anywhere from one to four weeks—the whole Psalter is prayed. A few psalms that are particularly violent are often omitted: Ps 58, 83, and 109.

Personal Prayer. Many Christians use the psalms for personal prayer. Ps 23, "The Lord is my shepherd," has become a favorite for believers across denominations, as demonstrated by its use for occasions as different as a Fourth of July celebration and a funeral. Psalm books are published listing psalms to be prayed in sickness, in trouble, in thanksgiving, at times of joy, and so on. Often the Psalter is published alone with the New Testament, showing its preferred status among the Old Testament books.

Problems. Praying the psalms is not without difficulty, however. Three problems are critical: the difficulty caused by the age and cultural presuppositions of the psalms; a contemporary distaste for lament; and the violence and desire for vengeance expressed in the psalms.

The psalms were written in ancient Hebrew, a language that ceased to be a living language in the last few centuries B.C. They reflect the culture of the first millennium B.C., a primarily agrarian milieu in the Middle East. Many of the images and practices reflected in the psalms are foreign to a reader in the third millennium A.D. Nonetheless, the effort to understand is well rewarded. The human situation reflected in the psalms and the relationship of the believer to God remain remarkably similar.

Most of the psalms are laments. Contemporary culture frowns on lament or any demonstration of weakness and vulnerability. The bitter complaints, the hot anger, and the attempt to "persuade" God by whatever means are all distasteful to people today. Psychologists and spiritual directors, however, point out that the inability to lament is a sickness in our society and makes individuals sick as well. The lament psalms are good teachers and healthy prayers.

One characteristic of the lament in particular is difficult for believers: the prayer or wish for vengeance against enemies. One who prays the psalms regularly discovers phrases such as "Crush their teeth in their mouths" or "May they dissolve like a slug in the sun." These prayers seem in direct contradiction to the command to love one's neighbor. It is possible simply to avoid the difficult psalm. It is also possible to consider what today's enemies are. One can pray against cancer: "Crush its teeth." Or against homelessness, "May its memory disappear from the earth." Or against war: "Wipe it out from the earth." These psalms reflect the spirit of the quintessential Christian prayer, which concludes, "Deliver us from evil." This prayer is the necessary corollary to "Thy kingdom come."

The psalms are central to Christian prayer. As the New Testament bears witness, they are the prayer of Jesus.

Bibliography: Commentaries and General Studies of the Psalter. B. W. ANDERSON with S. BISHOP, Out of the Depths: The Psalms Speak to Us Today (3d ed. rev.; Louisville, Ky. 2000). R. DAVIDSON, The Vitality of Worship: A Commentary on the Book of Psalms (Grand Rapids, Mich./Cambridge, Eng. 1998). W. L. HOLLADAY, The Psalms through Three Thousand Years: Prayerbook of a Cloud of Witnesses (Minneapolis 1993). J. L. MAYES, Psalms (Interpretation; Louisville, Ky. 1994). J. D. PLEINS, The Psalms: Songs of Tragedy, Hope, and Justice (Bible and Liberation Series; Maryknoll, N.Y. 1993). Genre and Form. H. GUNKEL, Introduction to Psalms: The Genres of the Religious Lyric of Israel, completed by J. BEGRICH; tr. J. D. NOGALSKI (Macon, Ga. 1998). Shape and Shaping of the Psalter. M. D. GOULDER, The Prayers of David (Ps 51–72): Studies in the Psalter II (Sheffield, Eng. 1990); The Psalms of Asaph and the Pentateuch: Studies in the Psalter III (Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series 233; Sheffield, Eng. 1996); The Psalms of the Return (Book V, Ps 107–150): Studies in the Psalter IV (Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series 258; Sheffield, Eng. 1998). J. CLINTON MCCANN, JR., A Theological Introduction to the Book of Psalms: The Psalms as Torah (Nashville 1993). Biblical Prayer and the Liturgical Use of the Psalms. P. D. MILLER, They Cried to the Lord: The Form and Theology of Biblical Prayer (Minneapolis 1994). I. NOWELL, Sing a New Song: The Psalms in the Sunday Lectionary (Collegeville, Minn. 1993). T. P. WAHL, The Lord's Song in a Foreign Land: The Psalms as Prayer (Collegeville, Minn. 1998).

[I. NOWELL]

PSALTERS, METRICAL

Metrical translations of the Psalms into the vernacular for the chief purpose of congregational singing. Although examples of metrical Psalters from earlier periods are known, the Reformed Churches of the 16th through the 18th centuries placed particular emphasis upon this type of text, the most notable exception being the Lutheran chorale, which, because it admitted the element of non-biblical poetic and religious thought, was generally rejected outside of Germany.

An attempt to survey in a limited space the history of metrical psalmody must be highly selective. Short titles will be used; and indicated dates refer not necessarily to the first edition but rather to the first complete, or most nearly complete edition of a specific title.

The earliest significant Psalter of the 16th century is the Souterliedekens of 1540. Printed in Antwerp, this Psalter, which was intended for use in the home and at social gatherings, contains the Psalms, the Te Deum, and five of the biblical CANTICLES; 33 editions are known to have been published between 1540 and 1613.

Two basic trends, one French, the other English, are to be observed in the history of metrical psalmody. The French concept was developed in the Genevan Psalter of 1562, translated by Clément Marot and Théodore de Bèze with music selected, edited, and in some instances apparently newly composed primarily by Louis Bourgeois. Translated into Dutch verse and keeping the same tunes, this Psalter became the Dutch Psalter of 1566. The English concept was developed in the Psalter of Thomas Sternhold and John Hopkins, published in its complete form by John Day in 1562 and known as Sternhold and Hopkins or, later, the "Old Version." In its variety of stanza forms and its flexibility and subtlety of melody, the French concept was artistically superior; but the use of the familiar ballad stanza patterns and a formalized type of melody, made the English concept of greater practical value.

Toward the middle of the 16th century religious persecution in England drove various Protestant groups to the Continent. Under the influence of the Genevan Psalter, they reworked Sternhold and Hopkins and completed the Anglo-Genevan Psalter in 1561. A similar development produced the Scottish Psalter of 1564. In 1612 Henry Ainsworth completed a new Psalter for the English "Separatists" who had settled in Amsterdam. Known as the Ainsworth Psalter and brought to America by the Pilgrims in 1620, this Psalter borrowed music from both Sternhold and Hopkins and the Dutch Psalter. Mention should be made also of the BAY PSALM BOOK, published in America in 1640.

The second half of the 17th century witnessed a general trend toward revision. Changes in the French language threatened to make the Marot-Bèze version unintelligible; and in 1679 a "revision," to all intents a new translation, was completed by Valentine Conrart. The English "Old Version" was gradually superseded by the "New Version" of 1696, completed by Nahum Tate and Nicholas Brady and known as Tate and Brady. The Scottish Psalter of 1650, surrendering artistic vitality for practical usefulness, reduced the varied metrical patterns of its earlier editions to the monotony of the English common meter.

The publication in 1719 of Isaac Watts's The Psalms of David Imitated in the Language of the New Testament marks a turning point in the history of metrical psalmody. Although it is ostensibly a Psalter, the freedom with which Watts paraphrases the Psalm texts is very different from the strict adherence to the Hebrew required in the earlier Psalters; the Psalter served as a model for the writers of the hymns that gradually replaced the Psalms as the basic texts for congregational singing in the majority of Protestant churches. The change from psalmody to hymnody met with considerable opposition, particularly from churches with strong Calvinistic backgrounds. Not until 1861 did the Established Church of Scotland authorize the singing of hymns.

Bibliography: M. PATRICK, Four Centuries of Scottish Psalmody (New York 1949). W. S. PRATT, The Music of the French Psalter of 1562 (New York 1939). E. PARKS, The Hymns and Hymn Tunes found in the English Metrical Psalters (New York 1966). R. ILLING, Est-Barley-Ravenscroft and the English Metrical Psalter (Adelaide 1969). R. J. MILLER, John Calvin and the Reformation of Church Music in the Sixteenth Century (Ann Arbor 1971). R. G. APPEL, The Music of the Bay Psalm Book (Cambridge, MA 1975). R. LEAVER, "English Metrical Psalmody," The Hymnal Companion, ed. R. GLOVER (New York 1990), 321–48. R. A. LEAVER, "Goostly Psalmes and Spirituell Songes": English and Dutch Metrical Psalms from Coverdale to Utenhove, 1535–1566 (Oxford 1991).

[A. GARRETT/EDS.]

PSEAUME, NICOLAS

French prelate active at the Council of Trent and in the Counter Reformation; b. Chaumont-sur-Aire (Meuse), Dec. 11, 1518; d. Verdun, Aug. 10, 1575. Though his family was not wealthy, Pseaume (Psaume, Psalmaeus) was sent to school first at the Norbertine Abbey of St. Paul in Verdun, then to Paris, Orleans, and Poitiers. In 1538 he returned to Verdun where he joined the Norbertines, subsequently replacing his uncle as abbot of St. Paul's (1540). A year later he was awarded a doctorate in theology from the University of Paris. In 1548 Pseaume was made bishop of Verdun. When sent to Trent in 1551 as a representative of the Norbertine Order, Pseaume spoke out strongly against the prevailing system of benefices held in commendam and advocated residence for bishops. While at the Council, he kept a diary of the proceeding, which was later published in Paris and Verdun. Returning to Verdun (1552), Pseaume attended to the administration of his diocese. He rebuilt St. Paul's Abbey, which had been destroyed by war, and reorganized the hospital and reformed the municipal institutions of the city. To further the cause of Catholic education in his diocese, he helped establish a Jesuit college in Verdun. Called back to Trent in 1563, Pseaume took part in the final sessions and subsequently edited the acts of the Council. He lies buried in the cathedral of Verdun.

Pseume's publications include a number of religious treatises defending Catholicism against the reform movement: Le Vrai et naïf portrait de l'église catholique; Avertissement à l'homme chrétien pour cognoistre et fuir les hérétiques de ce temps; Préservatif contre le changement de religion.

Bibliography: J. J. I. VON DÖLLINGER, Ungedruckte Berichte und Tagebücher zur Geschichte des Concils von Trient, 1 v. in 2 (Nördlingen 1876). C. N. GABRIEL, Étude sur Nicolas Psaulme, évêque et comte de Verdun (Verdun 1867). C. L. HUGO, Sacrae antiquitatis monumenta . . ., 2 v. (Étival-Saint-Dié 1725–31) 1:9–21. N. ROUSSEL, Histoire ecclésiastique et civil de Verdun, 2 v. (Bar-le-Duc 1863–64). A. ERENS Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 3.1:1086–93. A. K. HUBER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:863–864.

[C. HOLMES]

PSEUDO-CLEMENTINES

A collection of early Christian writings, wrongly attributed to Clement of Rome, which includes two Epistles to Virgins, the Pseudo-Clementine Homilies, and Recognitions, and several fragments known as the Epitomes. The two Epistles to Virgins (Ad virgines) are exhortations in the form of letters supposedly addressed by Pope Clement I to men and women leading celibate lives. Both writings explain the ideals toward which these persons are to strive and the dangers they must avoid. In each work the author sternly reproves those “who under the pretext of piety live with virgins (see VIRGINES SUBINTRODUCTAE) and expose themselves to danger” (Ad virgines 1.10). Numerous texts and examples are cited from both the Old and New Testaments to support the author's viewpoint. Only fragments of the original Greek text survive in quotations by the 7th-century Palestinian monk Antiochus of the monastery of St. Sabas, but a complete text of the letters has survived in a Syriac translation. The original author is unknown, but a Coptic translation of the first Epistle (1–8) attributes this letter to St. ATHANASIUS. As objections to the practice of ascetics of both sexes living under the same roof are raised for the first time in extant Christian literature toward the middle of the 3d century, scholars generally assign the Epistles to this date. The place of composition seems to have been Palestine.

Pseudo-Clementines, more specifically, is the name given to a long didactic novel whose central figures are the Apostle Peter and his disciple Clement of Rome, a man of noble birth diligently in search of truth. At the direction of Barnabas, Clement sets out for the East, meets Peter in Caesarea, becomes the Apostle's companion on his missionary journeys, and witnesses the encounter with SIMON MAGUS. These experiences are related in 20 Homilies in Greek and ten books of Recognitions now extant in their abbreviated Latin translation by RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA.

The Homilies (Homiliae) purport to be the missionary sermons of Peter. They clearly show influences of Judaist-Ebionite teaching, and even admit the existence of two principles, one good, the other evil. Christ, as portrayed in the Homilies, is a true prophet come to restore the pristine purity of the Law, but He is not the Redeemer. Paul is described as a “hostile man” distorting the Law, which Peter preaches in its purity. Two letters, one from Peter, the other from Clement, addressed to James the Less, Bishop of Jerusalem, serve as a preface to the Homilies. Peter begs James to allow only duly approved persons to read the sermons. In addition to a certain prestige attached to the church of Jerusalem some scholars see in Peter's letter a report of a missionary submitted to the mother church and its bishop.

Clement's letter addresses James as “bishop of bishops,” informs him of Peter's martyrdom, and states that shortly before his death the Apostle appointed Clement bishop of Rome, handing over to him the chair (cathedra) of preaching and teaching and the power to bind and loose. This is probably the earliest extant formal reference to the bishop of Rome as the heir of the Petrine powers. These letters were written some time in the early 3d century.

The narrative materials of the Recognitions (Recognitiones), supposedly a detailed account of the experiences of Clement and members of his family, are basically the same as those in the Homilies. Unusual circumstances separate father, mother, and three sons. Through Peter's intervention they are reunited, and the recognition scenes give this work its name. Its didactic content is clearly Christian in tone; Judaistic elements are minimized and the doctrine of the Trinity is clearly set forth. The Christian elements may be the interpolations of the Latin translator Rufinus.

A study of the relation between the Homilies and the Recognitions entails complicated problems of literary criticism and theological interpretation. It is now generally admitted that both works go back to a basic source mentioned by ORIGEN, entitled Periodoi, which incorporates materials from two earlier accounts of Peter's preaching and journeys. In their present form the Homilies date from 325 to 380, and the Recognitions from 360 to 380.

The Epitomes (Epitomae) preserve two Greek excerpts from the Homilies, to which are added details from Clement's supposed letter to James and a Martyrium Clementis by Symeon Metaphrastes. Two Arabic excerpts from the narrative portions of the Homilies and Recognitions also are extant.

Bibliography: F. DIEKAMP, ed., Patres apostolici, v.2 (3d ed. Tübingen 1913), Epistles. Die Pseudoklementinen (Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte 51; Leipzig 1964), v.1 Homilien, ed. B. REHM; v.2 Die Rekognitionen, ed. B. REHM and F. PASCHKE. J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster, MD 1950–) 1:58–63. B. REHM, Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum, ed T. KLAUSER 3:197–206. J. DANIELOU, Théologie du Judéochristianisme (Tournai 1938) 71–76. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF from the 5th German ed. (New York 1960) 103–106. W. ULLMANN, Journal of Theological Studies NS 11 (1960) 295–317; Studia Patristica 4 (Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 79; 1961) 330–337. F. S. JONES, “The Pseudo-Clementines: A History of Research [2 pts],” Second Century, Second Century 2, No 1 (Spring 1982), p. 1–33, 2, No 2 (Sum 1982), 63–96. G. STRECKER, Das Judenchristentum in den Pseudoklementinen (Berlin 1981).

[H. DRESSLER]

PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS

Dionysius the Areopagite is the name assumed by the author of four Greek treatises on liturgical and mystical theology that appeared at the beginning of the 6th century and were first referred to by the Monophysite theologians in the train of SEVERUS OF ANTIOCH. The author claims apostolic sanction for his writings by publishing them as the work of the Dionysius, who was baptized after listening to a sermon St. Paul preached in the Areopagus of Athens (Acts 17.34). These writings were quoted by the Monophysite leader in the colloquy of the orthodox and Severian bishops held in Constantinople in 532, but immediately challenged by Hypatius of Ephesus, the orthodox spokesman, as unknown to such older Fathers as Cyril and Athanasius. Translated into Syriac by SERGIUS OF REŠAINA (d. 536), they were the subject of an early 6th-century commentary by JOHN OF SCYTHOPOLIS.

These four treatises, strongly Neoplatonist in concept and terminology, deal with (1) the celestial hierarchy, (2) the ecclesiastical hierarchy, (3) the divine names, and (4) mystical theology. They were used by both the Chalcedonian and Monophysite theologians during the 6th and 7th centuries. Their influence was greatest in the Latin West, however, where in 827 they were first introduced in the translation of Abbot HILDUIN OF SAINT-DENIS made from the Greek uncial manuscript (Codex Paris gr. 437) sent by the Emperor Michael II as a gift to Louis the Pious. The translation of JOHN SCOTUS ERIGENA in particular supplied the scholastic theologians and medieval mystics with material for Neoplatonic speculations regarding the Trinity and the ecclesiastical hierarchy that had been only touched upon by St. Augustine.

Authorship. Only occasionally during the Middle Ages was the Dionysian authorship of these writings questioned. But Lorenzo VALLA (d. 1457) had challenged their dating in a commentary on Scripture that was first published by ERASMUS (Paris 1505) on the score that the Neoplatonist terminology as well as the liturgical and hierarchical notions could not have been produced in the 1st century. A considerable controversy followed during the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries in which theologians attempted to defend the 1st-century authorship. But in 1895 H. Koch and J. Stiglmayr, working independently, proved that these writings could not have been composed before the 5th century, since the doctrine of evil, for one thing, was of a strictly Nonplatonian origin.

The date for the composition of the Pseudo-Dionysian writings is set by the fact that there is no mention of them before the 5th century, that their Christological teaching reflects post-Chalcedonian doctrine, such as that of the HENOTICON (482), and that the first indisputable citation of these writings is made by Severus of Antioch between 518 and 528. In 171 the Dominican Orientalist M. LE QUIEN offered arguments to prove that the true author was Peter the Fuller, the Monophysite patriarch of Antioch (d. 488), whose use of the writings of the Neoplatonist philosopher Proclus (d. 485), and whose influence in the composition of the Henoticon as well as in the introduction of the Creed in the Mass, rendered him the most likely candidate.

Of the 5th- and early 6th-century authors capable of having produced these documents, the Syrian Neoplatonist and mystic, author of the Book of Hierotheus, STEPHEN BAR-ŠŪDHAILĒ; the Monophysites Peter the Iberian, Peter the Fuller, Severus of Antioch, and Sergius of Rešaina; and the Chalcedonian John of Scythopolis have all been proposed as responsible, but despite the most elaborate study of style, theological cross-reference, and historical coincidence, modern criticism has not accepted any of these candidates as the author.

Contents. The body of Dionysian documents consists of four treatises and ten letters that further elaborate both the theological content and the pseudo-1st-century atmosphere in which they were supposedly written.

The Divine Names. This treatise deals with man's knowledge of God from His revelation of Himself in the Scriptures. These manifestations proceed from His ineffable and invisible unity. Of the three persons in the Trinity, the Son alone became incarnate, thus expressing in the universe the presence of the ineffable and inexpressible One in the world of sin and multiplicity. After a chapter on the effects of prayer, which is indispensable in theological investigation, the author gives an account of the different names that can be applied to God, beginning with the Good and proceeding to Unity and Trinity, Beauty, Love, Being, Life, Wisdom, Intelligence, Reason, etc. In all this he is reflecting the Neoplatonic thought of PROCLUS.

Mystical Theology. This treatise is a compact description of the negative dialectic that prepares and renders possible the mystical experience that by its very nature is inexpressible and indescribable, for it deals with "the divine darkness." Notable here is the lack of reference to love as the cathartic and unifying factor in the mystical approach to God. In this treatise the author contents himself with discussing the sensible and intelligible preparations that are necessary before the soul is raised to ecstasy. Letters 1 and 3 complete this treatise.

The Celestial and Ecclesiastical Hierarchy. The hierarchies of heaven and of the Church are described, in this work, on a triadic principle, proceeding from the Trinity and descending in threes through the nine angelic orders, thence to the ecclesiastical organ of bishops, priests, and deacons charged with initiating the monks, saints, and purified in a divine way of life through the process of purification, illumination, and perfection or union with the divine Being. The two aspects of the Dionysian universe, that of angelic and that of incarnate or human intelligence, complement each other, one being the image of the other. The nature and function of these intelligences are described in Scripture mainly through symbols, and Pseudo-Dionysius maintains that the triadic order pervades throughout the Old Testament and New Testament, tradition, and the history of the Church.

In the roles ascribed to bishops, priests, and deacons in the Church, the practice of the 5th century is reflected, with the bishop sanctifying by ordaining bishops and priests and consecrating monks; the priest aiding the bishop particularly in his function of illuminating the faithful through preaching the Word of God; and the deacons in charge of the purification ceremonies connected with preparation for Baptism, and the care of the poor and unfortunate.

The four treatises are completed by the letters. Letters 1 and 4 describe the divine darkness and inaccessible light of the mystical theology; letter 2 deals with the transcendence of the divine names; letters 8, 9, and 10 detail the respect to be paid to the Church's hierarchy, mercy for sinners, and fortitude in persecution; letters 3 and 5 examine Christological questions; letter 6 condemns polemics in theology; and letter 7 describes the prodigies of the noonday darkness and the earthquake that accompanied Christ's death.

Influence. The doctrinal content of the Pseudo-Dionysian corpus forms a complete theology, from the Trinity and angelic world through the Incarnation and Redemption to the last things, and provides a symbolic and mystical explanation of all that is. Its extremely spiritual doctrine gave great satisfaction to the theologians and spiritual writers of the Middle Ages and the Renaissance both in the Orient and in the West; hence the failure to question its authorship and the essentially Neoplatonic quality of its mystical excursions.

In the East, these writings were influential but not as pervasive as was once believed; rather they were incorporated into a stream of spiritual and mystical theology that was formed by the Alexandrian and Cappadocian Fathers. They were synthesized to a large extent by MAXIMUS THE CONFESSOR in the 7th century, having contributed to the Christological debates of the 6th century, and were appropriated extensively by both parties in the Palamite controversy of the 14th century, without contributing substantially to either crisis.

In the West, the legendary biography identifying Pseudo-Dionysius with both the Areopagite and the patron of Paris, which was composed by the Abbot Hilduin and attached to his Latin translation of the Dionysian writings, set the tradition that prevailed down to modern times. The Dionysian writings were cited in part by GREGORY I for his commentaries on the angels, and by Pope MARTIN I at the Lateran synod of 649. They are further mentioned by Pope AGATHO (680), BEDE, Pope PAUL I, and Pope ADRIAN I before the translation by Hilduin that was redone by John Scotus Erigena at the request of Charles II, the Bald, between 860 and 862, and then retouched by ANASTASIUS THE LIBRARIAN in 875. In the scholastic and later period John Sarrazin, ROBERT GROSSETESTE, Ambrose Traversari, and Marsilio FICINO produced Latin versions along with commentaries, and the corpus was further commented upon in whole or in part by HUGH OF SAINT-VICTOR, THOMAS GALLUS, ALBERT THE GREAT, THOMAS AQUINAS, Jean GERSON, and DENIS THE CARTHUSIAN.

Down to the first decade of the 17th century, the authority of these writings was unchallenged by Catholic and many Protestant theologians. Thereafter, though most theologians refused to consider the evidence objectively, men of the caliber of Prosper Lambertini (later BENEDICT XIV), in his treatise on the Beatification of Saints, expressed great caution in utilizing these works. Recent scholarly investigation has demonstrated beyond question the late date and provenience of the Dionysian writings.

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857-66) v.3-4 (no critical edition exists). Works, tr. J. PAR-KER (London 1897). H. KOCH, Pseudo-Dionysius Areopagita in seinen Beziehungen zum Neuplatonismus und Mysterienwesen (Mainz 1900). J. STIGLMAYR, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. HERBERMANN et al., 16 v. (New York 1907–14; suppl. 1922) 5:13–18. R. ROQUES, L'Univers dionysien (Paris 1954); Reallexikon für Antike und christentum, ed. T. KLAUSER (Stuttgart 1950–) 3:1075–1121. R. ROQUES et al., Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 14:265–310; Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932–) 3:244–429. U. RIEDINGER, Byzantinische Zeitschrift 52 (1959) 276–296; “Der Verfasser der pseudo-dionysischen Schriften,” Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 75 (1964) 146–152. P. ROEM, Pseudo-Dionysius: A Commentary on the Texts and an Introduction to Their Influence (New York 1993). R. BLUM and A. GOLITZIN, The Sacred Athlete: On the Mystical Experience and Dionysios, Its Westernworld Fountainhead (Lanham, Md. 1991). A. LOUTH, Denys, the Areopagite (London and Wilton, Ct. 1989). P. ROEM, Biblical and Liturgical Symbols within the Pseudo-Dionysian Synthesis (Toronto 1984). G. SHAW, “Theurgy and Dionysius the Areopagite,” Journal of Early Christian Studies 7:573–599. J. WILLIAMS, “The Apophatic Theology of Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite,” Downside Review 117:157–172. S. J. BEGGIANI, “Theology at the Service of Mysticism: Method in Pseudo-Dionysius,” Theological Studies 57, 201–223.

[F. X. MURPHY]

PSYCHICS

A term of opprobrium used by TERTULLIAN as a MONTANIST to describe Catholics whom he accused of laxness in fasting and in forgiving sins against purity (De pudicitia 1.10; 6.14; 10.8; 16.24; 18.2; 21.16). In Greek ψυχικοί, and in Latin psychici, the word is taken from St. Paul (1 Cor 2.14), where it means the “natural” man as opposed to the “spiritual” (πνευματικός) man. But Tertullian, who employed the word also in his Adversus Marcionem (4.22), De monogamia (1.1), De jejuniis (1.1), and Adversus Praxean (1.6), understood it as signifying “materialminded,” a meaning similar to that previously given to it by certain Gnostic sects.

Bibliography: Tertullian, De paenitentia, ed. and tr. P. DE LABRIOLLE (Paris 1906) 138–143; Adversus Praxean, ed. and tr. E. EVANS (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge; 1948) 187–188; Treatises on Penance, ed. and tr. W. P. LE SAINT (Ancient Christian Writers 28; 1959) 194–195.

[F. HAUSER]

PSYCHOLOGISM

A philosophy or viewpoint regarding the empirical CONSCIOUSNESS of the subject as the source of knowledge of all reality; it thus teaches that the data of consciousness have ontological value. In a general way psychologism is equatable with SUBJECTIVISM and is traceable to R. DESCARTES. Whereas Descartes limited his commitment to clear and distinct ideas, however, subsequent thinkers attributed metaphysical reality to all thoughts and sensations. This type of psychologism is opposed by those who hold for OBJECTIVITY in human knowledge.

In a stricter sense, psychologism is the theory that psychology is the basis of philosophy and of the social and normative sciences, if not of all sciences. The most forceful advocates of this view, which is a reaction to Kantian apriorism, were the German philosophers J. F. Fries (1773–1843) and F. E. Beneke (1798–1854). For them, the critical examination of reason (Vernunft) does not yield, as Kant maintained, a priori propositions whose synthesis is due to the activity of the mind independently of experience; it yields only the empirical facts of consciousness. According to Fries, all the basic principles and ideas of philosophy can be attained merely by psychological INTROSPECTION (Selbstbeobachtung), and therefore, philosophy is not founded on speculation but on pure experience. Similarly, Beneke held that the only possible groundwork of philosophy is EXPERIENCE (Erfahrung) and, more specifically, psychological experience. Metaphysics, he felt, should rest on psychology and not psychology on metaphysics.

Cultural science psychology (geisteswissenschaftliche Psychologie), promoted especially by Wilhelm DILTHEY, maintains that psychology provides the foundation for the cultural sciences. The latter aim at the understanding of the meaning, value, and purpose of events and phenomena, in contradistinction to the natural sciences, which try to explain the causal relationships between phenomena and reduce them to general laws. The task of psychology is to understand the products of the human mind. The mind of man reveals itself in what he has achieved in the world—works of art; science; justice and law; philosophical and moral systems; language; social, economic, and political institutions; and religion. The sciences concerned with these expressions of the human mind, such as philology, ethnology, aesthetics, history, economics, ethics, and philosophy of religion, are called Geisteswissenschaften—literally, sciences of the spirit. The term is often translated as cultural or socio-historical sciences.

Other types of psychologism may be designated as logical, ethical, and aesthetic. These maintain that the normative sciences of logic, ethics, and aesthetics are founded exclusively on the data of experience. The argument on which they are based runs somewhat as follows: psychology is altogether an empirical science; logic, ethics, and aesthetics rest on psychology; therefore, these disciplines must be empirical also. Logical psychologism, advocated by Beneke, T. Lipps (1851–1914), J. S. MILL, W. WUNDT, and C. Sigwart (1830–1904), holds that logical laws have no universality or necessity, but only tentative value. Ethical psychologism is the view of moral relativists such as F. Hutcheson (1694–1746), D. HUME, F. H. JACOBI, J. F. HERBART, Beneke, H. SPENCER, and J. DEWEY. For them the laws of morality do not hold for all times and all peoples, since they rest on moral sentiment or moral sense that differs from period to period and from individual to individual.

See Also: SCIENTISM; LOGICISM.

Bibliography: F. E. BENEKE, Erfahrungsseelenlehre als Grundlage alles Wissens (Berlin 1820); Lehrbuch der Psychologie als Naturwissenschaft (Berlin 1832; 2d ed. 1845). J. F. FRIES, Neue oder anthropologische Kritik der Vernunft, 3 v. (Heidelberg 1807); Handbuch der psychischen Anthropologie, 2 v. (Jena 1820–21). H. PFEIL, Der Psychologismus im englischen Empirismus (Paderborn 1934). G. DEL VECCHIO, Materialismo e psicologismo storico (2d ed. Rome 1953).

[J. H. VAN DER VELDT]

PSYCHOLOGY (CLASSICAL)

A term meaning the study of the soul, coined from the Greek ψυχή (soul) and λόγος (concept) by R. Goclenius (1547–1628). The branch of knowledge it designates has taken on a distinctive form since 1850, but its beginnings can be traced to the ancient Greeks. Aristotle is generally considered the “Father of Psychology,” both because he wrote extensive treatises on expressly psychological questions and because he grounded his studies as a natural science on a broad empirical base. Nevertheless, even before Aristotle, the Greek thinkers were speculating on psychological questions.

Development of the Concept. For the Greeks the study of living organisms was only one part of the general study of nature. ARISTOTLE distinguished between natural bodies that are not moved except by others, and natural bodies that are able to move themselves. The latter, living things including plants, brute animals, and men, form the subject of a special part of the science of nature. He undertook to classify living things, to examine their structures and functions, and to formulate definitions of the principle within them by which they were able to move themselves, which he called the soul. His treatise De anima (On the Soul) served as a fundamental text in psychological science for over 2,000 years.

After Aristotle, psychology developed mainly along three lines. A few Greek and Arabian philosophers wrote fresh treatises on matters that Aristotle had touched only lightly or not at all, but most contented themselves with writing commentaries on the master’s works, or commentaries on other commentaries. The Greek and Arabian physicians contributed shrewd insights from their clinical observations, but introduced errors also. Finally, moral philosophers and the Christian Fathers enlarged the scope of descriptive psychology, especially in the areas of human passions, habits, attitudes, and will, in treatises whose main focus was the living of the good life and the avoidance of vice.

In the 12th and 13th centuries, when the universities began to flourish in Europe, psychology experienced a new vigor. By this time the study of plants and animals had been largely separated from the study of human life, and a new purpose animated philosophers. Their aim was to formulate a systematic science of human nature, culminating in a definition of the human soul and its relationship to the body. The medieval philosophers drew heavily on the Greek, Arabian, and Christian traditions, especially on PLATO and Aristotle, AUGUSTINE, GREGORY I (THE GREAT), JOHN DAMASCENE, GREGORY OF NYSSA, AVERROËS, and AVICENNA, but they did not hesitate to adapt the ideas they used to the demands of their own systems of thought.

Method. The psychology of St. THOMAS AQUINAS exemplifies the medieval approach to the subject. He followed Aristotle in holding that the study of living things was a special part of the science of nature, but his interests were directed almost exclusively to human psychology. He maintained that as a science it should be based on strictly empirical data, but he was willing, as were all philosophers of the day, to speculate on the basis of these data, sustaining conclusions that could not themselves be demonstrated by direct evidence. He accepted data both from observation and from INTROSPECTION.

Observation was mostly a matter of general and common experience; controlled and systematic observation was not yet part of the scientific method. The procedure was first to determine the most general principles governing an area of investigation, and then to divide the matter into parts and determine the principles of each subdivision, and so on. Thus, if the purpose of the investigation were scientific knowledge of sensation, the first step would be the definition of the nature of knowledge in general. Then the difference between intellectual and sense knowledge would be established. Next would come the distinction between internal and external sensation, and then the specific kinds of internal and external sensation, and finally the variety of modes or functions of which each specific sense is capable. In the investigation, search would be made for all the causes governing the nature of the given object at each level of generalization. The causes include the final cause or purpose, the efficient cause or agent, the formal cause or specific feature, and the material cause, or elements out of which the thing was made (see DEMONSTRATION). When the four causes had been determined, the investigation would have achieved its purpose.

The validity of this procedure rests on the accuracy and thoroughness of the empirical data on which it is based, and the rigor of the logical formulations and deductions. The method is successful in establishing the general principles and canons of psychology and in framing its broader conclusions, but for more detailed knowledge and for practical applications of knowledge, the facts of general experience must be augmented and refined by data from controlled observations, experiments, clinical experience, and the variety of techniques being evolved in contemporary research.

Contents. Scholastic philosophers are generally agreed on most of the major theses concerning the human soul and human nature, although they differ among themselves on points of interpretation, emphasis, and approach.

Life. They define life as self motion, that is, the capacity of an organism to move itself from potentiality to activity. From another point of view, the distinctive feature of vital operations is their IMMANENCE, that is, the characteristic of self-perfecting action that is involved in living activity. In a broad sense, for instance, nourishment perfects the organism nourished. In a stricter sense, knowledge is the perfection of the mind knowing. Both characteristics, i.e., self movement and immanence, imply that living things exist and operate on a higher scale than inorganic bodies, for living things move themselves to full perfection and maturity through their interactions with other bodies, whereas inorganic bodies lose their energies and even their existence when they interact with others.

The Soul. The principle of life in living things is called the SOUL. In essence, the soul is the factor in virtue of which living bodies have their special organization, and thus are able to function in special ways. The soul is not necessarily immaterial or spiritual; in animals and plants it is purely material. Only in man is there evidence of its transcending purely material being.

Since living things operate through parts that have special functions (organs) and yet are single units whose various operations are directed to the survival, development, and propagation of the whole, the soul, as the principle of the whole, is conceived by Thomists as something essentially simple but capable of several distinct operations, fewer in lower forms of life and most numerous in man. These capacities for distinct operations are called FACULTIES OF THE SOUL. Other scholastics acknowledge the faculties, but argue that there is more than one principle of life, or soul, in higher organisms.

Scholastics generally agree on five genera of vital faculties: vegetative faculties, powers of local movement, sensitive faculties, intellective faculties, and powers of appetite. They generally agree also in assigning three specific faculties to the vegetative order, viz, nourishment, growth, and reproduction. The study of these vegetative processes would probably have been given scant attention if the requirements of a philosophical system alone were in question. But scholastics devoted considerable thought to processes such as reproduction or birth, because some of the key mysteries in Christian revelation were couched in these terms. The Second Person of the Blessed Trinity is born of the Father, and again born of the Virgin Mary. A baptized person is reborn of water and the Holy Spirit. To interpret these mysteries, scholastics wanted precise knowledge of the natural process of birth, and thus this topic became a matter of prime interest.

Sensation. In considering the category of SENSATION, scholastics distinguish between external and internal SENSES, but differ on their number. Most are agreed on five external senses, with the sense of touch being a compound sense attaining several distinct objects, such as temperature, resistance, pain, and pleasure. After St. Thomas, internal senses were generally held to be four, viz, the CENTRAL SENSE, IMAGINATION, MEMORY, and the COGITATIVE POWER. But some 20th-century scholastics question the existence of the central sense, the cogitative power, or both.

All scholastics make a sharp distinction between the senses, which know concrete and singular objects, and the intellect, which knows objects in abstract and universal forms. They divide appetite along the same lines as knowledge, i.e., into sense appetites and the intellectual appetite or will, although there is some disagreement over details.

Knowledge. A key point in any psychological theory is the theory of knowledge, i.e., the precise explanation of the operation by which man knows objects distinct from himself (see KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF). It is a curious fact that outside the scholastic tradition no attempt is made to face the full requirements of an adequate theory of knowledge. Much is written by philosophers concerning the validity of knowledge acts and concerning the logical force of knowledge processes, and more is written by psychologists on the acquisition of knowledge and on its physiology, but the phenomenon whose validity, processes, acquisition, and physiology are under investigation is itself left undefined. According to the traditional theory of knowledge the objects of KNOWLEDGE are the forms of things, namely, all the determinants that make a thing to be what it is. The process of knowledge involves the reception of these forms into the knowing powers of the knower, but it is a reception that is somehow immaterial (see KNOWLEDGE, PROCESS OF). Unlike the process by which a stone is heated (receiving the form of heat from another) or wax is imprinted by a seal (receiving the shape of the seal), the FORM received in a knowledge act is undetectable in the knower and known to be present only by himself. Hence it follows that the form is present in a way unlike the way physical forms are present, and hence it is termed “immaterial,” meaning not received in the knower as a simple physical effect. Then, since materiality is the reason two like forms are distinct from each other, the immaterial presence of the form in the knower leaves it somehow indistinct from the form in the thing known. Thus the OBJECTIVITY that is an experiential feature of knowledge acts is capable of reasonable explanation.

This theory of knowledge purports to be the fundamental explanation of all acts of knowledge, whether of sensation or of intellection. The difference between these two operations lies in the difference in the mode of the form received. In sensation the concrete, individual forms of an object are received, viz, its visible, palpable, audible, etc., features, as, being present, they impress themselves on the subject, or as they are later recalled. In intellection the mind attains the abstract, and hence universal, ideas drawn from the sensible experience of its objects.

The clear-cut distinction that scholastics place between sensation and intellection presents them with a problem that a purely materialistic or a purely idealistic psychology does not face. They must explain how the mind can form UNIVERSALS, and abstract ideas of concrete and singular objects. To account for this process of ABSTRACTION, an agent INTELLECT is posited, as an active power of the mind by which intelligible species are formed out of the sensible images of things, and then impressed on the knowing intellect. The intellect then knows its objects as the universal, abstract essences, or definitions, of the concrete, singular objects from whose sensible images it has drawn its knowledge.

Appetition. In scholastic psychology, the appetitive processes are, functionally subsequent to knowledge processes. They are responses to known objects, in the form of inclinations toward good objects and away from evil objects; At the sense level, APPETITE begins with the sensations of pain and pleasure, and operates to orient the organism toward pleasant objects and away from painful objects. This simple pleasure-pain appetite is called the concupiscible appetite. In cases of emergency, a second sense appetite, the irascible appetite, operates to overcome difficult objects.

The highest appetite in man is the rational appetite, called the WILL, which operates to seek out the reasonable good and avoid the reasonable evil. The will follows whatever the intellect proposes as good, and whenever the intellect proposes several goods, none of which is compelling, the will is free to elect among them (see FREE WILL). The will is the highest motive force in man, controlling his other powers, although not all to the same extent. It commands overt behavior “despotically,” as the scholastics say, but has only “political” control over the lower appetites and knowledge faculties. In comparing the intellect and the will from the point of view of excellence, St. Thomas and Thomists argued for the superiority of the intellect; DUNS SCOTUS and his followers urged the superiority of the will; other scholastics held for an equality of excellence (see INTELLECTUALISM; VOLUNTARISM).

Man. The process of determining the elements of human nature, namely, body and soul, and the specific faculties with which it is equipped is the analytic part of scholastic psychology. The synthetic part is the definition of the whole human composite made up of these elements and the assessment of the structure of human nature. (See MAN, 2.)

In the classic definition, man is a rational animal, that is, an animal like other animals, but distinct by having the power of universal, abstract reason, and all that follows from it. One of the principal conclusions scholastics draw from this is that the soul of man is spiritual and therefore immortal, that is, that after death the vital principle of the human composite does not decay or corrupt or pass away, but persists in existence and in vital operation (see IMMORTALITY). The question then arises as to how the union of a spiritual principle and a physical body is to be conceived. At one extreme, the soul was conceived as something quite separate from the body and dwelling in the body like a man in a prison, or like a driver in a machine. Another opinion, deriving from the Arabian philosophers, was that the intellect was a separate entity, one for all men, in whose ideas all men, although physically distinct, somehow participated. St. Thomas fought vigorously for the concept of the unity of the human composite—perhaps in the field of psychology this was his major preoccupation—insisting that the soul and the body were incomplete principles that when joined together formed one, single entity, the soul being the determining element and the body the element determined (see SOUL, HUMAN, 4). Therefore, even though the soul could exist and act after death, it was in an extreme state of violence, and, naturally speaking, as miserable as it could be. After St. Thomas, scholastics did not generally hold opinions that separated soul and body as radically as those mentioned above, but some scholastics, for instance, Duns Scotus and F. SUÁREZ, held for more than one vital principle in man, the rational soul being his major soul, while other vital forms gave him lower levels of life.

While all men, in virtue of having rational souls, are essentially alike, different men can have the various powers of life in different degrees and different proportions; therefore there is a basis for asserting various diversities among men. Some of these differences are inborn—the scholastics pointed out the obvious differences of the two sexes and supported the classical theory of TEMPERAMENT according to which the different proportions of the basic humors in the human body affect men psychologically as well as physically. They maintained that individuals differ in native talent and psychological tendencies, so that some men are naturally noble and born to rule whereas others are naturally base and more fit to serve.

Given the inborn differences among men, the disparities between one man and another can be increased by acquired differences. According to St. Thomas, who developed much of his psychology of habit formation within the context of moral philosophy and theology, an acquired HABIT may be partly natural, as coming from native propensities, or purely acquired, by repeated acts. The intellect and will are the subjects of the most numerous and important habits, but the sense appetites can also be affected by habit formation. He did not consider the senses themselves and the physical functions and organs apt for habit formation except in a secondary and ancillary way.

Relation to Other Disciplines. The traditional psychology of the scholastics, which is today called philosophical psychology, or the philosophy of man or of human nature, is still considered a part of the general science of nature, or natural philosophy (see PHILOSOPHY OF NATURE). The principles that explain bodies in general, and the laws that govern them, are applicable to living bodies as well, and in living bodies often find their clearest exemplification.

When the scholastic psychologies were being formulated, the sphere of living organisms was set apart as one area of investigation. Today this area is studied in numerous more or less distinct branches of science, e.g., biology, psychology, zoology, botany, physiology, taxonomy, morphology, genetics, embryology, ecology, and evolution; but the basic unity of these diverse sciences is gradually regaining recognition in studies under the title of life sciences. The relation of these life sciences, and especially of modern psychology, to traditional psychology is a matter of dispute among contemporary scholastics. At the level of broad and basic principles, traditional psychology and the modern sciences often raise the same kind of questions for discussion. At the level of empirical research, experimentation, and formulation of data, the relationship is not so clear. Some hold that rational and empirical psychologies are distinct and unrelated, others hold that they are distinct and complementary, while still others hold that they are not distinct sciences but stages or grades of development within one science.

In relation to other philosophical disciplines, traditional psychology holds a key position. Discerning and defining the acts and processes of the intellect, it supplies the materials of the sciences of logic and epistemology. It is necessary for the science of metaphysics, which reaches the highest causes of things, because “if the nature of the possible intellect were unknown to us, we could not know the order of the separated substances” (St. Thomas Aquinas, De anim. 1.7). By defining human acts, analyzing the conditions of free and deliberate behavior, and elucidating the possible goals and the limits human nature can achieve, psychology provides the elements of study with which moral philosophy or ethics deals. Consequently, psychology enters into all the special parts of ethics, into politics, economics, social sciences, education, etc.

The relationship of psychology to the theological disciplines is equally vital. Much of scholastic psychology is found in the context of theological discussion, in which the concepts and conclusions of psychological investigation are brought to bear to elucidate the terms of the mysteries of revelation. The concepts of the human soul and its powers of intellect and will are basic to concepts of God and the angels and their intellects and wills. The Trinity and its processions and relations are understood in terms of analogies with the intellect and intellection and love. Man’s rebirth in grace, his growth in grace, the nature of the theological and infused moral virtues, man’s destiny in terms of his divine vocation, the gifts and fruits of the Holy Spirit, and the beatitudes are all understood by comparison with psychological realities. It can be asserted without hesitation that an understanding of the contents of rational psychology is an essential part of the understanding of all rational philosophy and Christian theology.

See Also: SOUL, HUMAN; MAN, 2, 3.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Aristotle’s De Anima and Commentary of St. Thomas Aquinas, tr. K. FOSTER and S. HUMPHRIES (New Haven 1951); The Soul, tr. J. P. ROWAN (St. Louis, Mo. 1949); In Aristotelis libros De sensu et sensato, De memoria et reminiscencia commentarium, ed. R. M. SPIAZZI (3d ed. Turin 1949); Summa theologiae, tr. Eng. Dominican Fathers (New York 1947), 1a, 75–92, on the structure of human nature; 1a2ae, 1–17, on goals and the acts of the will; 1a2ae, 22–60, on passions and habits; Truth, tr. R. W. MULLIGAN et al., 3 v. (Chicago 1952–54), questions 10, 12, 13, 15–17, 22, 24–26; On Aristotle’s Love and Friendship, tr. P. CONWAY (Providence, RI 1951), books 8 and 9 of the Commentary on the Nicomachean Ethics. ARISTOTLE, Works, ed. W. D.

ROSS, 12 v. (New York 1908–52), v.3 De Anima. R. E. BRENNAN, Thomistic Psychology (New York 1956). J. F. DONCEEL, Philosophical Psychology (2d ed. New York 1961). H. D. GARDEN, Introduction to the Philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas, tr. J. A. OTTO, 4 v. (St. Louis, MO 1956). É. H. GILSON, The Spirit of Medieval Philosophy, tr. A. H. C. DOWNES (New York 1936). J. GRETT, Elementa philosophiae Aristotelico-Thomisticae, ed. E. ZENZEN, 2 v. (13th ed. Freiburg 1961), v.1. E. HUGON, Cursus philosophiae Thomisticae (Paris 1905) v. 3–4, Philosophia naturalis: Biologia et psychologia; metaphysics psychologica. G. P. KLUBERTANZ, The Philosophy of Human Nature (New York 1953). O. LOTTIN, Psychologie et morale aux XII^e et XIII^e siècles, 6 v. in 8 (Louvain 1942–60), v.1 Problèmes de psychologie. M. MAHER, Psychology (9th ed. New York 1921). J. MARITAIN, Distinguish to Unite, or The Degrees of Knowledge, tr. G. B. PHELAN (New York 1959). T. V. MOORE, The Driving Forces of Human Nature and Their Adjustment (New York 1948). A. C. REGIS, St. Tomas and the Problem of the Soul in the Thirteenth Century (Toronto 1934). J. E. ROYCE, Man and His Nature (New York 1961). J. WILD, Introduction to Realistic Philosophy (New York 1948).

[M. STOCK]

PTOLEMY (CLAUDIUS PTOLEMAEUS)

Astronomer, mathematician, and geographer; author of the famous Almagest (Syntaxis mathematica), the standard work on astronomy from the 2d century until the 16th century. Ptolemy's biographical data are uncertain, except the fact that he lived and worked in Alexandria, Egypt. According to later sources, he was born probably at the end of the 1st century and died during the reign of Marcus Aurelius, i.e., between 161 and 180. Of Ptolemy's major writings mentioned here, the Almagest was by far his most influential work. It consists of 13 books that contain the main tenets of geocentric cosmology, and it gives a systematic summary of the achievements of Greek astronomy up to Ptolemy's time, including certain results of his own investigations. The first two books give mainly the geometrical theorems forming the basis of his mathematical astronomy and the basic assumptions of the geocentric hypothesis, i.e., the spherical shape of the earth and its state of rest in the center of the finite universe bounded by the sphere of the fixed stars. The third book deals with the movement of the sun, and the fourth and fifth with that of the moon. In these books, as well as in the other parts of his work, Ptolemy, in order to construct a consistent model accounting for the apparent motions of the celestial bodies, makes use of the theory of epicycles and eccentric circles. An epicycle is a small circle along whose circumference the star is carried while the center of the epicycle moves along the circumference of a larger circle round the earth. The center of this circle either coincides with that of the earth or, in the case of eccentric motion, is situated at some distance from the earth. The next two books deal with the fixed stars and contain also a catalogue of more than a thousand stars with their positions and magnitudes. The last five books expound the theory of the five planets—the two inner planets Mercury and Venus, and the three outer ones Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn. Ptolemy also confirms Hipparchus's discovery of the precession of the equinoxes, giving, however, a slightly less accurate value than Hipparchus.

A print by Andea Cellario, entitled "Harmonia Macrocosmica," showing Ptolemy's geocentric system of the world. (©Enzo & Paolo Ragazzini/CORBIS)

The Almagest was held in highest esteem during late antiquity and the Middle Ages until COPERNICUS's De revolutionibus (1543). It was translated into Arabic and commented on by several Islamic astronomers from the 9th century on; and it was also the principal astronomical source book in the Western scholastic world, as can be seen by the numerous quotations in, e.g., THOMAS AQUINAS, JOHN DE SACROBOSCO, and ROGER BACON, and by various commentaries, for example, the Epitome (1496) of Regiomontanus.

In another astronomical work, "Hypotheses of the Planets," Ptolemy gives several improvements on the results of the Almagest and polemizes against attempts to return to the Aristotelian model of a single set of homocentric spheres; he reveals himself as a Platonist who believes that each planet is driven by a vital force emanating from its soul. His astrological work, Tetrabiblos, was one of the most famous of its kind during the Middle Ages. He is also the author of a geography, containing tables of the latitudes and longitudes of the main places of the inhabited world known at his time. His Harmonics is the last great systematic work of antiquity on musical harmony containing a theory of musical intervals and scales. In his Optics (extant only in a Latin translation), Ptolemy deduces mathematically, and verifies experimentally, several optical laws, e.g., the laws of reflection and refraction of light.

Bibliography: F. LAMMERT, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. (Stuttgart) 23.2 (1959) 1788–1859. J. L. E. DREYER, A History of Astronomy from Thales to Kepler (2d ed. Dover pa; New York 1953).

[S. SAMBURSKY]

PUBLIC ORDER (CANON LAW)

Public order (canon law) is a legal term referring to the stability that exists in a society when its most urgent laws are obeyed and its security is assured. Nineteenth-century canon lawyers borrowed this term from civil law chiefly to indicate the measure of the traveler's subjection to local statutes.

Civil jurists developed the notion of public order with reference to the alien and the laws of the country he visits. His legal relations are generally somewhat different from those of the citizen. In continental Europe, jurists look upon nationality as the factor determining a person's rights and duties. They have developed theories of private international law to decide the individual's nationality, to define the rights enjoyed by the alien, and to resolve the conflicts that arise with respect to these rights.

The situation is different in England and in the United States. Domicile rather than nationality governs the legal status of the individual. The alien is regarded before the law as being much the same as the citizen. His distinctive rights are specified in public international law, which chiefly concerns relations between nations and is often described simply as international law.

The most frequent conflict of laws facing U.S. courts is the choice between the rule of law of the individual's domicile and the place where the court sits. Normally this involves competing laws of several states rather than of independent nations. Hence the solution of these jurisdictional questions is known in the United States as conflicts of law, and not private international law.

Occasionally a U.S. court is faced with a choice of law involving the statute of a foreign country. In the Anglo-American tradition, civil statutes are generally conceived of as territorial, affecting the person in and through the locality. They bind all who are present, aliens and nationals alike. It may happen by exception that a court will find it useful to apply to an alien the law of his own country, but this is purely a matter of comity. It is inadmissible whenever a question of public policy arises affecting the nation's vital interest.

In the 19th century, several European jurists rejected this strictly territorial concept of law. Pasquale Stanislao Mancini (1817–88) taught that laws are closely linked, not with the place but with the persons for whom they are enacted. Since the legislator acts with a view to the needs of his own people, the laws of each country are best suited to serve the interests of its citizens, wherever they may be. From this principle, Italian private international law concludes that the individual has the right to be governed by the laws of his own country. Every state is bound to guarantee this right for the alien as well as for its citizens. A notable exception to the rule arises from the need to protect the public order. Whenever the vital interest of the community is involved, the alien must submit to the local statute just as though he were a citizen.

Resolving conflicts of law is a fundamental problem for the canonist as well as for the civil jurist. The earliest commentators on Gratian's Decree regarded travelers as subject to all local laws. Later, Francisco SUÁREZ (1548–1617) took this position and developed the juridic principles that serve as its basis. He taught that the welfare of the community requires the uniform observance of its laws, not only by its subjects, but by all who happen to be present, even for a short time.

Later decretists and decretalists taught that, apart from exceptional cases, the traveler is free from the obligation to observe local statutes because he is not a resident. Tomás SÁNCHEZ (1551–1610) accepted this theory, explaining that the ruler's exceptional jurisdiction is based upon the need to protect the community from harm.

By the 19th century, canonists generally regarded the opinion of Sánchez to be the more probable, although they did not add substantially to the reasoning of its earlier defenders. Philippus de Angelis (1824–81), Franciscus Santi (1830–85), and others did, however, introduce a new phrase into canonical literature. They borrowed from civil law the term "public order" to define what had become the commonly accepted canonical doctrine, the legislator's exceptional jurisdiction over the traveler. Both the new term and the opinion of Sánchez received full legal force by their incorporation in the 1917 Code of Canon Law.

In defining this concept, it is helpful to bear in mind that all laws tend to promote order in the community and to foster the common good in one of two ways. Either the law seeks to provide some advantage to the individual, affecting the community only in a secondary way, and this is the private good; or it has for its object something that is not proper to any individual but is to the advantage of all. This is the social and public good.

The resident is bound to obey all the laws of his community, for at least indirectly he thereby contributes to the social well-being. The traveler is bound to observe only the law that has a public good as its object and directly affects the society as such. Moreover, he is obliged to do this only to the extent that uniform observance of the law is an indispensable condition for the welfare of the place he visits. When he does so, he helps to secure public order, which is that pattern of conduct prescribed by a law having for its object a public good that is found to be essential to the security of society.

Bibliography: G. MICHIELS, Normae generales juris canonici. Commentarius libri I. Codex iuris canonici, 2 v. (2d ed. Paris-Tournai-Rome 1955): 1:391–402. G. ONCLIN, De territoriali vel personali legis indole (Glembac 1938) 257–260; 331–351. A. VAN HOVE, “Leges quae ordini publico consulunt,” Ephemerides theologicae Lovanienses 1 (1924) 153–167. E. ROELKER, “The Traveller and the Local Statute,” Jurist 2 (1942) 105–119. J. H. HACKETT, The Concept of Public Order (Catholic University of America Canon Law Studies 399) (Washington 1959). A. PILLET and J. NIBOYET, Manuel de droit international privé (Paris 1924). M. WOLFF, Private International Law (New York 1945).

[J. H. HACKETT]

PUBLIC PROPRIETY (IMPEDIMENT TO MARRIAGE)

Public propriety may be defined as a certain propinquity of persons or quasi-affinity arising from an invalid marriage after common life has been established or from public or notorious concubinage. In deference to public decency, such unions create an impediment that invalidates the marriage of either party with the blood relations of the other party within the first degree of the direct line.

Most authorities maintain that the impediment of public propriety in church law derived from Roman law. The impediment in Roman law had its source in betrothal—the Roman law Sponsalia. The canons in which Gratian presents impediments are considered by many to be apocryphal. The Council of Trent restricted the scope of the impediment (sess. 24, de ref. matr., c. 3). The decree Ne temere made a further restriction [Acta Sanctae Sedis 40 (1907) 525].

Similar legislation prescribes the impediment of public propriety in both Latin and Eastern church law (Codex iuris canonici, c. 1093; Codex canonum ecclesiarum orientalium, c. 810). It is apparent from the terms of the law that public propriety springs from a twofold source: invalid marriage after the establishment of common life, and public or notorious concubinage.

To give rise to the impediment under the rubric of invalid marriage after the establishment of common life, the union must have the semblance of marriage (species matrimonii). As the so-called civil marriage of persons bound to the canonical form (Codex iuris canonici, c. 1108; Codex canonum ecclesiarum orientalium, c. 828) lacks this semblance of marriage, such a civil union is not, strictly speaking, an invalid marriage. However, such a civil union followed by cohabitation does give rise to the impediment (Response of the code commission, AAS 21 (1929) 171; Codex canonum ecclesiarum orientalium, c. 810 §1, 3°).

The second source of the impediment is concubinage. Only such concubinage as is either public or notorious gives rise to the impediment of public propriety. The term public means that the concubinage is known in the community. The term notorious signifies that concubinage is publicly known and lived in the community so that it cannot be concealed or excused.

This impediment is an ecclesiastical law impediment. Therefore, the local ordinary can dispense from it (Codex iuris canonici, c. 1078; Codex canonum ecclesiarum orientalium, c. 795).

See Also: MARRIAGE LEGISLATION (CANON LAW).

Bibliography: A. BRIDE, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 5:1179–1203. J. F. GALLAGHER, The Matrimonial Impediment of Public Propriety (Catholic University of America Canon Law Studies Washington 1916–) 304. W. HÖRMANN, Quasi-affinität, 2 v. (Innsbruck 1897–1906) 2:466–467. P. GASPARRI, De matrimonio . . ., 2 v. (Rome 1932) 1:728–248. J. P. BEAL in J. P. BEAL et al., New Commentary on the Code of Canon Law (New York 2000) 1294–1295.

[J. F. GALLAGHER]

PUBLICANS

Publicans were collectors of various revenues and taxes in the province of the Roman Empire. Roman taxes were of two types, direct (property, poll, and income; Lat. vectigalia) and indirect (fees on sales and purchases, export and import customs; Lat. portitoria). Instead of collecting the indirect taxes through government officials and under public control, the state usually auctioned them out to rich contractors. These tax farmers divided their territory into districts and employed local agents to do the actual work of collecting revenues. These subagents were the custom house officers who examined merchandise, assessed its value more or less arbitrarily, and exacted the levy. The tax farmers were, in the strict sense, the publicans, for the Greek term used in the New Testament, τελώναι (from τέλος and ώνέομαι), means literally to farm taxes; yet the word came to be loosely extended to the subordinates, or the portitores, and these are the publicans (from the Latin publicani) so frequently mentioned in the Gospels.

The complicated system doubtless saved the government—central and local—a great deal of trouble and expense, but it opened the way to flagrant injustices. The unscrupulousness and rapaciousness of the publican became proverbial; he was universally hated (Cicero, De officiis, 1.42). The Jews had additional reasons for despising him. Most of them looked upon taxes, not as a legitimate requirement for the preservation of the social order, but as a tribute exacted by a hated conqueror, and those of their race who exacted this badge of subjection were regarded as base and despicable. They were classified with sinners (Mt 9.11, 11.19; Mk 2.15–16; Lk 15.1), heathens (Mt 18.17), and harlots (Mt 21.31–32). No publican was allowed in the Temple or synagogue; his testimony in a court of justice was not accepted. St. Matthew stresses the horror with which the publican was viewed by the people (Mt 5.46–47, 9.10–11, 11.19, 18.17), and he is the only Evangelist who indicates that Levi, the publican called to be an Apostle, was Matthew himself (cf. Mt 9.9–13 with Mk 2.14–17). (See MATTHEW, APOSTLE, ST.) All three Synoptics emphasize Our Lord's compassion for these outcasts of society (Mt 9.9–13, 11.19; Mk 2.15–17; Lk 7.29–34, 15.1, 18.9–14).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek, 1960–61. J. JEREMIAS, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (Tübingen 1957–65) 6:1927–28. J. SCHMID, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. M. BUCHBERGER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1930–38) 10:1092.

[J. M. DOUGHERTY]

PUCCI, ANTONIO MARIA, ST.

Servite pastor; b. Poggiole di Vernio (Tuscany), Italy, April 16, 1819; d. Viareggio (Tuscany), Jan. 12, 1892. His parents were peasants who tended a small herd and tilled the fields. Eustachio, as he was named at baptism, followed this simple life until his 18th year, when he joined the SERVITES in Florence and received (July 10, 1837) the name Anthony in religion. After classical and theological studies at the Hermitage of Monte Senario, near Florence, he was ordained (Sept. 24, 1843). Appointed pastor (1844) in the new parish of St. Andrew in Viareggio, he spent his next 45 years there. To his flock and to all who knew him, he became known as “the little parish priest” (curatino). His spiritual achievements were remarkable, despite a lack of natural endowments. He was not handsome; his voice was unpleasantly nasal; he was withdrawn and very sparing in words. Yet he was entirely devoted to his flock's spiritual and temporal welfare. From 1883 to 1890 he was also prior provincial of the Servites' Tuscan province. He was beatified June 22, 1952, and canonized Dec. 9, 1962.

Feast: Jan. 14 (formerly 12).

Bibliography: I. FELICI, Il curatino santo B. Antonio M. Pucci dei Servi di Maria (Florence 1952). P. M. PERRONI, Il beato curatino di Viareggio: Il beato Antonio Maria Pucci dei Servi di Maria (Rome 1953). G. PAPÀSOGLI, Il beato curatino di Viareggio (Rome 1962).

[J. M. RYSKA]

PUCCINI, GIACOMO

Opera composer; b. Lucca, Italy, Dec. 22, 1858; d. Brussels, Belgium, Nov. 29, 1924. His ancestors for four generations were church musicians, and he was expected to carry on the tradition. After studies at the Lucca and Milan conservatories and two posts as church organist, however, he devoted himself almost entirely to opera composition. Of his 12 operas, Manon Lescaut (1892), La Bohème (1896), Tosca (1900), Madame Butterfly (1904), Gianni Schicchi (1918), and the unfinished Turandot are most popular. They are characterized by a melodious style, superb orchestration, idiomatic vocal writing, and a telling sense of theater. “Lax in his religious beliefs, if not actually an unbeliever” (Carner), he did, however, produce a Mass in A-flat (1880, published 1951 as Messa di Gloria), nonliturgical and highly operatic throughout (the Agnus Dei was later used in Manon Lescaut). An early motet for the feast of St. Paulina and an unpublished Requiem (1905) are his only other essays in church music, although he used religious ceremonies for dramatic effect in Tosca and Suor Angelica.

Bibliography: G. PUCCINI, Letters, ed. G. ADAMI, tr. E. MAKIN (London 1931). A. BONACCORSI, Puccini (Milan 1950). G. R. MAREK, Puccini (New York 1951). M. CARNER, Puccini (London 1958). F. BONAVIA, Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. E. BLOM 9 v. (5th ed. London 1954) 6:987–991. A. W. ATLAS, “Crossed Stars and Crossed Tonal Areas in Puccini's Madama Butterfly,” 19th Century Music 14 (1990) 186–196; “Mimi's Death: Mourning in Puccini and Leoncavallo,” The Journal of Musicology 14 (1996) 52–79. M. GIRARDI, Giacomo Puccini: l'arte internazionale di un musicista italiano (Venice 1995). H. M. GREENWALD, “Verdi's Patriarch and Puccini's Matriarch: ‘Through the Looking-Glass and What Puccini Found There,’” 19th Century Music 17 (1994) 220–36. J. C. PETTY, “The Ravished Flower: A Major Poetics in Madama Butterfly,” The Opera Journal 30/4 (1997) 2–20. M. ROSENTHAL-ENGLISH, Giacomo Puccini's ‘La fanciulla del West’: Eine neue Opern-konzeption im Oeuvre des Komponisten (Berlin 1997). D. SCHICKLING, “Puccini's ‘Work in Progress’: The So-Called Versions of Madama Butterfly,” Music and Letters 79 (1998) 527–537.

[R. M. LONGYEAR]

PUCELLE, JEAN

Head of a Parisian workshop producing illuminated religious MSS; active c. 1320 to c. 1360. Pucelle's existence is attested by only five 14th- to early 15th-century sources; three fall within his lifetime: his name appears in two books produced in his shop, and c. 1320 he was paid for designing a seal for a Parisian confraternity, traced through MSS from his workshop. His chief works are the Belleville Breviary (Paris, Bibl. Nat. Lat. 10483–84) and the Hours of Jeanne d'Evreux (The Cloisters, New York). These are distinctive, first, by reason of their decorative detail, typical of his products: the MSS abound with grotesque animals, or heads and figures, or scenes from everyday life (though in this they reflect the general decorative fashion of the times). More remarkable is his apparent knowledge of contemporary Italian art; reminiscences of Tuscany and Tuscan art are frequent, and his experiments in pictorial space mark him as a pioneer in French MS illumination. Most of these features were developed and imitated by later Parisian illuminators, and literal quotations from Pucelle are still found in work of the early 15th century.

See Also: MANUSCRIPT ILLUMINATION.

Bibliography: K. MORAND, Jean Pucelle (Oxford 1962). E. PANOFSKY, Early Netherlandish Painting, 2 v. (Cambridge, Mass. 1953). J. DUPONT and C. GNUDI, Gothic Painting, tr. S. GILBERT (New York 1954). L. BAER, U. THIEME, and F. BECKER, eds., Allgemeines Lexikon der bildenden Künstler von der Antike bis zur Gegenwart, 37 v. (Leipzig 1907–38) 27:442–443.

[A. MARTINDALE]

PUDENS, PUDENTIANA, AND PRAXEDES, SS.

Early Christian saints and titular churches. The earliest source in which the name Pudentiana appears is an inscription of 384, Leopardus lector de Pudentiana (G. de Rossi, Inscript. Christ. 1:384). This refers to a titulus, i.e., a place of cult and not a saint, because in the fourth century it was not the custom to dedicate a church directly to a saint.

Pudentiana is an adjective, and in the present church the old inscription reads: Dominus conservator ecclesiae Pudentianae, meaning that the founder was a certain Pudens. Sometime in the sixth century the titulus Pudentis was reevaluated and Pudens was canonized. Misreading the adjective Pudentianae as a person created “St.” Pudentiana.

In the seventh century there appeared a legendary Gesta Pudentianae et Praxedis that states that Praxedes, after the death of her sister Pudentiana, “who was buried on May 19 beside her father Pudens in the cemetery of Priscilla, with the consent of Pope PIUS I, dedicated the Baths of Novatus as a church, under the name of the Bl. Virgin Pudentiana, in the vicus patricius”—the patrician suburb. Prior to this, the same Gesta narrates that Pudens had constructed a church over the same house. The author of the Gesta thus identified the titulus Pudentis with the titulus Pudentianae, and since there was only one church on the site, he concluded that it referred to a Sancta Pudentiana, who could only be a real person, a virgin, saint, and martyr.

Giacomo Puccini.

During the next centuries the name fluctuates between Pudens and Pudentiana, but from the ninth century on it is the church of St. Pudentiana, and in time her feast was entered in the LIBER PONTIFICALIS.

The Roman MARTYROLOGY lists SS. Pudentiana and Pudens, Senator, on May 19, with Praxedes on July 21. A son of Pudens is mentioned on June 20.

A Pudens is mentioned by St. Paul (2 Tm 4.21). Excavations beneath the church reveal the ruins of Roman houses, one of which near the Baths of Novatus could be that of Pudens. The tradition that St. Peter lived there need not be excluded. The house of Pudens was probably turned into a church by Pius I (140–155), and when rebuilt by Pope SIRICIUS (384–399), extended over the baths. Pope PASCAL I (817–824) transferred the body of a St. Potentiana from the cemetery of Priscilla to the church of St. Pudenciana, and the same pope transferred hundreds of bodies to the nearby church of St. Praxedis.

Madonna and Child with SS. Praxedes and Pudenciana.
(©Gianni Dagli Orti/CORBIS)

Praxedes, according to the Gesta, was the sister of Pudenciana; in fact, she was foundress of the titulus Praxedis, which certainly existed in 489 as we know from an inscription. The ITINERARIA of the seventh century indicate her tomb in the Priscillan cemetery beside her sister Pudenciana. Her feast is first found in the Capitulary of Wissenburg (seventh–eighth century).

Feast: May 19.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum May 4:298–300. J. P. KIRSCH, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al. (New York 1907–14) 12:344–345. H. DELEHAYE, Les Origines du culte des martyrs (2d ed. Brussels 1933); Étude sur le légendier romain (Brussels 1936) 264–266. R. U. MONTINI, Santa Pudenziana (Rome 1959). A. AMORE, Antoniano 39 (1964) 30–33, 36–37.

[E. HOADE]

PUEBLA

The Third General Conference of the Latin American Episcopate (CELAM III), took place in Puebla, Mexico, in January 1979. The meeting, originally intended to mark the tenth anniversary of CELAM II at Medellín, had to be postponed because of the deaths of Pope Paul VI and Pope John Paul I. Paul VI's apostolic exhortation EVANGELII NUNTIANDI provided the theological background. The presence of John Paul II, especially his remarks in three major homilies, set the tone.

Meeting Overview. The CELAM Secretariat, strongly influenced by Bishop Alphonso Lopez Trujillo, prepared a preliminary document which concentrated on the problem of secularization and the role of the Church in Latin America's transition from a rural-agrarian society to an urban-industrial society. At the outset divisions emerged among the voting bishops and non-voting participants. Many felt that the preliminary document was a betrayal of the program established at Medellín. Gradually a consensus emerged. CELAM president, Cardinal Aloisio Lorscheider of Brazil was instrumental in bringing the perspective of the meeting closer to the social analysis, methodology, and human rights concerns of Medellín. Unofficial periti, mainly Latin American liberation theologians, also influenced the process leading to the final document.

The bishops recognized that the social, economic, and political problems of 1968, not only remained, but had become more serious. Secularization was not the principal obstacle to spreading the gospel. Evangelization in Latin America meant that the Church had to address once again the problems of poverty, structural injustice and social sin. Once this situation was faced, the discussions took on more of a liberationist perspective. The final document, to some degree, reflects this perspective, “. . . a cry is rising to heaven, growing louder and more alarming all the time. It is the cry of a suffering people who demand justice, freedom and respect for the basic rights of human beings and peoples” (par. 87).

Final Document. The final document is divided into five parts: Pastoral Overview of the Reality That is Latin America; God's Saving Plan for Latin America; Evangelization in the Latin American Church; Communion and Participation; A Missionary Church Serving Evangelization in Latin America; Under the Dynamism of the Spirit: Pastoral Options. The conference's view of Jesus is significant for its attempt to hold a middle ground within the contemporary Latin American theological context. It lamented the attempt to distort the message of Jesus and use it for ideological purposes. “That can be done in one of two ways: either by turning him into a politician, a leader, a revolutionary, or a simple prophet on the one hand; or on the other hand, by restricting him, the Lord of history, to the merely private realm” (par 178).

Two dominant themes emerged: “Communion and Participation” and “A Preferential Option for the Poor”

On the one hand the central motif of communion and participation appeared to try to replace liberation as the dominant theological message. The preferential option for the poor, however, recalled and reinforced the message of liberation. "We affirm the need for conversion on the part of the whole Church to a preferential option for the poor, an option aimed at their integral liberation" (par. 1134). The text continues, "The vast majority of our fellow humans continue to live in a situation of poverty and even wretchedness that has grown more acute" (par 1135). "Hence service to the poor is the privileged, though not exclusive, gauge of our following of Christ" (par. 1145).

In spite of some repetition and contrast, the final document clearly understands evangelization as liberating from personal and social sin and as fostering communion and participation both in the Church and in society at large. CELAM III endorsed a centrist position but further committed the Church to social pastoral planning, solidarity with basic Christian communities and defense of the poor.

Bibliography: CELAM III, La Evangelizacion en el Presente y en el Futuro de America Latina: Puebla, Documento Aprobado (Mexico 1979); J. EAGLESON and P. SCHARPER, eds., Puebla and Beyond: Documentation and Commentary, translated by J. DRURY (Maryknoll 1979) (References in text to paragraph numbers are the same in Spanish and English versions). P. BERRYMAN, "What Happened at Puebla," Churches and Politics in Latin America, ed. D. H. LEVINE (Beverly Hills 1979). E. DUSSEL, The History of the Church in Latin America: Colonialism to Liberation, trans. A. NEELY (Grand Rapids 1981). G. GUTIERREZ, The Power of the Poor in History (Maryknoll 1983). P. LERNOUX, Cry of the People (New York 1980). G. MACEOIN, Puebla, a Church Being Born (New York 1980).

[J. P. HOGAN]

PUERTO, NICOLÁS DEL

Bishop of Oaxaca, Mexico; b. of indigenous parents in the mountain village of Santa Catalina Minas, near Oaxaca (date unknown); d. Oaxaca, 1681. His early studies, it seems, were made with the Jesuits in Oaxaca and were continued in the Jesuit Colegio de San Ildefonso in Mexico City where he studied philosophy and jurisprudence. He then entered the diocesan seminary. After ordination, he spent some time in Oaxaca; but he left owing to what he considered discrimination, when another was chosen for an ecclesiastical post over him. He was reported to have said that he would not return to his native city except as bishop. In 1642 he entered the Colegio Mayor de Santos in Mexico City, where he received the degree of doctor, and where he later taught and was rector and chancellor. In May 1656 he was made canon of the cath-dral of Mexico and in the following year was appointed commissioner general of the Cruzada. He was also consultant of the Inquisition and vicar-general of the archdiocese. The bulls from Spain formally appointing Puerto as commissioner general of the Cruzada were late in arriving, and this created a problem. The appointee resolved the difficulty by placing a seal on one of the former bulls of Cruzada. He informed the Council of the Indies of his actions, which they approved. Having studied law, Puerto also aimed at the chair of Canon Law in the University of Mexico. In two competitive examinations he was defeated. However, convinced that he had been unjustly treated in the second examination, he appealed to the royal court, which ruled in his favor. Satisfied with the decision, he did not press for the chair, which was given to his opponent. In February of 1679 Puerto was appointed bishop of Oaxaca despite his advanced years. He had been bishop for only two years when he died, but he lived long enough to see the establishment of a seminary, which his predecessor had received permission to build, and which opened in January 1681.

Bibliography: J. A. GAY, Historia de Oaxaca, 2 v. (Mexico City 1881). J. M. BERISTAIN DE SOUZA, Biblioteca hispano-americana septentrional, 5 v. in 2 (3d ed. Mexico City 1947).

[C. E. RONAN]

PUERTO RICO

The smallest and most easterly of the Greater Antilles, Puerto Rico is a commonwealth of the United States. Located 885 miles southeast of Florida, the island is characterized by mountainous terrain dropping to coastal plains in the north. Sandy beaches circle much of the island, combining with the region's mild climate to create a landscape inviting to tourists. Natural resources include copper and nickel, as well as the possibility of coastal oil reserves. Puerto Rico relied for centuries on agriculture for its economic stability; sugar was raised along the coast and coffee, tobacco and starchy vegetables in the mountains. After 1949 the Industrial Development Company, a government agency, encouraged U.S. investment in the region and by 2000 Puerto Rico's exports included pharmaceuticals, electronics, rum and apparel. San Juan is one of the Caribbean's largest natural harbors.

Early History. Originally inhabited by the Arawak, Puerto Rico was discovered by Columbus on his second voyage, Nov. 16, 1493, and named San Juan de Borinquén. Juan Ponce de León, searching for gold, founded a settlement at Caparra in 1598 and the following November took possession of Puerto Rico in the name of the King of Spain, becoming its governor. Spanish missionaries entered the region shortly thereafter, working from Capital: San Juan.

Size: 3,515 sq. miles.
Population: 3,915,798 in 2000.
Languages: Spanish, English.
Religions: 3,407,661 Catholics (87%), 274,100 Protestants (7%), 234,037 without religious affiliation.
Archdiocese: San Juan, with suffragans in Ponce, Arecibo, Mayagüez, and Caguas.

the new capital city of San Juan. On Aug. 6, 1511, Puerto Rico was made an episcopal see as a suffragan of Seville, Spain, and Father Alonso Manso became the first bishop. Jurisdiction would eventually pass from Seville to Santiago, Cuba.

Within half a century the Arawaks had become extinct due to forced labor and disease, the gold mines were exhausted. The Spanish residents petitioned to leave, but were forced to remain on the island by the Spanish government. By 1600 sugar and tobacco plantations prospered, owned by Spaniards and worked by African slaves. The 17th century witnessed the origins of the island's most famous place of pilgrimage: the church of Nuestra Señora de Monserrate in the town of Hormigueros. This shrine owed its existence to alleged apparitions visited upon the daughter of Giraldo González. While lost for two weeks, the young girl was fed by the Blessed Mother, allowing her to survive until her father found her. In about 1640 Giraldo built a chapel in the parish of San German to commemorate his daughter's visions; after his wife died he donned the robes of a priest and tended the chapel.

Still under the influence of the Spanish Church, the jurisdiction of the Diocese of San Juan was restricted to the island proper in 1791, but in 1903 it was separated from Cuba and made immediately subject to the Holy See. The Diocese of Ponce was separated from San Juan in 1924, and Edwin V. Byrne was named the first bishop. In 1960 the present hierarchy was established: the Diocese of Arecibo was established under Bishop Alfred Mendez and on April 30, San Juan was made an archdiocese with James P. Davis its first archbishop. Four years later the Diocese of Caguas was created, and Rafael Grovas was consecrated its first bishop. By 1965 the jurisdiction of San Juan had expanded to include the islands of Culebra and Vieques off the eastern coast. The diocese of Mayagüez was established in 1976.

Into the 21st Century. In 1821 Spain withdrew its protection from Puerto Rico, as the island was no longer of strategic importance. The region gained home rule under Spanish hegemony until 1898 when the United States gained the island at the close of the Spanish-

American War. In 1917 the Jones Act declared all inhabitants of Puerto Rico to be statutory U.S. citizens, although they were not extended the right to vote in U.S. elections. Through the constitution of July 25, 1952 the island was declared a commonwealth. Although efforts were made to make Puerto Rico the 51st of the United States, a vote in 1993 rejected that option in favor of continued status as a self-governing commonwealth.

By 2000 there were 324 parishes with resident priests in Puerto Rico, maintained by 396 diocesan and 390 religious priests: Salesians, Dominicans, Capuchins, Vincentians, Benedictines, Jesuits, Redemptorists and Marianists. The Pontifical Catholic University of Puerto Rico, located in Ponce, was founded in 1948 and by 1965 contained a college of arts and sciences, a school of education, a school of law, and operated six extensions throughout the island. Religious women maintained over 150 primary and secondary schools, as well as a number of specialized institutions of learning, in addition to operating hospitals, orphanages and homes for the elderly. The Religious of the Sacred Heart operated a small college near San Juan. Two native communities existed, the Hermanas del Buen Pastor and the Hermanas de Fatima.

PROTESTANTISM grew steadily on the island during the 20th century, with the most active groups Methodists, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Disciples of Christ, the United Church of Christ, the Brethren and Jehovah's Witnesses. In addition to watching its influence eroded by active evangelical sects, the Church also had to contend with liberal social attitudes imported from the United States. In 1998 Redemptorist Father Richard Welsh, C.Ss.R., who was also president of Human Life International, fought an unsuccessful battle against abortion rights clinics. A euthanasia bill introduced the same year was, however, successfully defeated through his ability to mobilize Catholic opposition. Pope JOHN PAUL II also addressed the trend toward materialism and liberalized values during a meeting with Puerto Rican bishops in 1999. Noting that the commonwealth was in a transitional period, the Pope urged Church leaders to confront "the challenges of a society which is ever more inclined toward secularization," citing as evidence the rising divorce rate and instance of illegitimate births on the island.

Bibliography: A. CUESTA MENDOZA, Historia eclesiástica de Puerto Rico (Santo Domingo 1948-). S. BRAU, La colonización de Puerto Rico (San Juan 1907).

[M. MCCABE/EDS.]

PUGIN, AUGUSTUS WELBY

Architect and author; b. London, March 1, 1812; d. Ramsgate, Kent, Sept. 14, 1852. The only child of Augustus Charles Pugin, he led the Gothic revival in England, striving as a Catholic for an architecture of Christian inspiration. After being professionally trained early in life by his father (an architect, illustrator, and teacher), he accompanied a party to Normandy in 1825 to study Gothic architecture. Following his conversion to Roman Catholicism in 1834, he established his reputation with Contrasts (1836), wherein he attributed the artistic decline to the change of religion in the Reformation; as an architect he worked chiefly within a Catholic milieu. His theories linked the social and religious convictions of an age with the quality of its art. The principles he formulated were derived from a study of medieval art (published in True Principles, 1841) and won him a place in the development of modern design. With their somewhat utopian view of the Middle Ages, his studies of Gothic art and the history of the liturgy contributed to a revival of interest in liturgical art. His writings, coupled with the high quality of his buildings and decorative designs, influenced both Protestant and Catholic circles.

Among his more than 25 publications are a Glossary of Ecclesiastical Ornament (1844) and A Treatise on Chancel Screens and Rood Lofts (1851). His buildings include the cathedrals of Birmingham (St. Chad, 1839–41) and Nottingham (St. Barnabas), and the churches at Brewood (St. Mary, 1834–44), Cheadle (St. Giles, 1846), and Ramsgate (St. Augustine, 1851).

Bibliography: M. TRAPPE-SLOMAX, Pugin: A Mediaeval Victorian (London 1932). H. SIRR, "Augustus Welby Pugin: A Sketch," Journal of the Royal Institute of British Architects 3d ser., 25 (1917–18) 213–226. P. B. STANTON, ibid. 60 (1952–53) 47–54, well illus. C. L. EASTLAKE, A History of the Gothic Revival (London 1872). K. M. CLARK, The Gothic Revival, an Essay in the History of Taste (London 1928). H. R. HITCHCOCK, Early Victorian Architecture in Britain, 2 v. (New Haven 1954).

[P. B. STANTON]

PULCHERIA, ST.

Byzantine empress, virgin; b. Constantinople, Jan. 19, 399; d. July 453. The daughter of the Eastern Roman Emperor ARCADIUS, she was proclaimed Augusta on July 4, 414. She was regent for her brother the Byzantine Emperor THEODOSIUS II and arranged his marriage in 421 with Athenais Eudocia, the daughter of a pagan philosopher. Pulcheria had made a vow of virginity. She was noted for her benefactions, composed secular verse and church hymns, and helped reorganize the university founded by Constantine I in Constantinople. A strong adversary of NESTORIANISM, she received a letter of gratitude from St. CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA. Because of the hostility of Empress Eudocia and the prime minister Chrysaphius, she left the court to lead a secluded life in the palace of Hebdomon, but returned after the Robber Council of EPHESUS (449) and received frequent requests for assistance in the settlement of ecclesiastical affairs from Pope LEO I.

On the sudden death of Theodosius II (July 28, 450), she assumed power and married the elderly senator Marcian, who had the eunuch Chrysaphius executed. She effected the reconciliation of the Patriarch ANATOLIUS OF CONSTANTINOPLE with Rome and, despite many objections, she and Marcian convoked the Council of CHALCEDON (451) in which she took an active interest, probably being present at the sixth session.

Feast: September 10.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Sept. 3:503–540. G. OSTROGORSKY, History of the Byzantine State, tr. J. HUSSEY from 2d German ed. (Oxford 1956); American ed. by P. CHARANIS (New Brunswick, N.J. 1957) 51, 55. A. B. TEETGEN, The Life and Times of the Empress Pulcheria (London 1907). E. SCHWARZ, "Die Kaiserin Pulcheria auf der Synode von Chalkedon," Festgabe für Adolf Jülicher (Tübingen 1927) 203–212. P. GOUBERT in A. GRILLMEYER and H. BACHT, Das Konzil von Chalkedon: Geschichte und Gegenwart (Wurzburg 1951–54) 1:303–321.

[G. T. DENNIS]

PUNCH, JOHN

Franciscan philosopher and theologian; b. County Cork, Ireland, c. 1599; d. Paris, 1661. He has been frequently but erroneously called Ponce, from the Latinized surname Poncius. He entered the Franciscans at St. Anthony's College, Louvain, studied philosophy in Cologne, and then theology, first in Louvain, and from Sept. 9, 1625, at St. Isidore's College, Rome. He taught two courses of philosophy at St. Isidore's and then theology for many years; his brother Edmund, also a Franciscan, studied under him. For a brief period, beginning July 8, 1630, he was rector of the Ludovisian College, Rome. Under its founder, Luke WADDING, St. Isidore's became the center for the 17th-century revival of Scotism. Punch collaborated with Wadding in editing the opera omnia of John DUNS SCOTUS.

Exterior of Ponce Cathedral at dusk, Ponce, Puerto Rico. (©Bob Krist/CORBIS)

He left Rome for France probably early in 1648. With the exception of a short stay in Lyons and a brief period as commissary of the Irish Franciscan residence, Paris, he resided at the Grand Couvent, Paris. In 1653 he found himself in the thick of a literary battle with Richard Bellings and John MacCallaghan over Nuncio Giovanni Battista RINUCCINI's censures. Having got the worst of the battle, Punch retired to his Scotist studies. In 1658 he wrote to the minister general a strongly worded defense of the Irish Franciscan exiles from Cromwellian persecution. He was the first to give a complete course of Scotist philosophy and theology, distinct from the traditional commentary on the Sentences; as a result he became, after Wadding, the most familiar figure of the Isidorian school of writers. A mature scholar, gifted with a subtle intelligence, he made no effort to reconcile St. Thomas Aquinas and Scotus, but accepted traditional Scotism, oc-asionally propounding original arguments. Even opponents, e.g., B. MASTRIUS, admitted his greatness. His major work on philosophy had five editions between 1642–43 and 1672. A course of Scotist theology was published in 1652; and in 1661, his monumental Commentarii theologici. Well-versed in the humanities and a facile writer, he was preeminently a metaphysician.

Bibliography: J. KAUP, in Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:607. A. TEETAERT, in Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 12.2:2547–48. G. CLEARY, Father Luke Wadding and St. Isidore's College, Rome (Rome 1925) 43, 55–56, 83–87. B. MILLETT, The Irish Franciscans 1651–1665 (Rome 1964). B. JENNINGS, ed., Wadding Papers 1614–38 (Dublin 1953); “Miscellaneous Documents 1625–40,” Archivium Hibernicum 14 (1949) 1, 3, 10, 12; “Sint-Truiden: Irish Franciscan Documents,” ibid. 24 (1961) 184. L. WADDING, Scriptores Ordinis Minorum (Rome 1650; 3d ed. 1906) 149–150. J. H. SBARALEA, Supplementum et castigatio ad scriptores trium ordinum S. Francisci a Waddingo, 2 v. (Rome 1806; new ed. in 4 v. 1906–36) 2:118. U. SMEETS, Lineamenta bibliographiae Scotisticae (Rome 1942) 4, 19, 55, 109. Father Luke Wadding: Commemorative Volume (Dublin, London 1957). M. O'N. WALSH, “Irish Books Printed Abroad 1475–1700,” Irish Book 2 (1963) 25–26. M. GRAJEWSKI, “John Ponce, Franciscan Scotist of the Seventeenth Century,” Franciscan Studies 6 (1946) 54–92.

[B. MILLETT]

Catholic church in the Puerto Rican town of Isabella. (©Tony Arruza/CORBIS)

PUNIET DE PARRY, PIERRE DE

Benedictine liturgist, b. Rochefort, France, March 24, 1877; d. Abbey of Oosterhout, Holland, April 4, 1941. De Puniet, who was of a noble family of Anjou, made his profession at Solesmes on Dec. 8, 1895. Ordained on March 23, 1901, he was sent to the Abbey of Farnborough and attached to Dom Cabrol's circle. For a while he collaborated on the Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie. The conference he gave at the Westminster Eucharistic Congress in 1908 on the Dér Balyzeh—of such importance for the early history of the Mass—made his reputation as a liturgist. Though novice master of Oosterhout for 25 years (1917–42), he was nonetheless able to continue his scholarly writing. His chief work, Le Sacramentaire romain de Gellone (Rome 1938), is actually less well known than either Le Pontifical romain: Histoire et commentaire, 2 v. (Bruges-Paris 1930–31), of which the first volume was translated into English as The Roman Pontifical (New York 1932), or Le Psautier liturgique à la lumière de la tradition chrétienne, 2 v. (Bruges-Paris 1933–35).

Bibliography: S. G., Ephemerides Liturgicae 58 (1944) 316–317.

[N. HUYGHEBAERT]

PUNISHMENT

Punishment is the infliction of a penalty upon a person for a misdeed. As used here the term is to be distinguished from revenge, which is the vindictive response of an individual against one who has wronged him. As opposed to this, human punishment is here understood as the action of society against one who has transgressed its laws and so has threatened the common good.

The right to punish belongs supremely to God as to the source of all authority. In the Old Testament even natural disasters are seen as part of the punishment that God has imposed because of the infidelity of His people (e.g., Bar 2.6–10). Human lawmakers participate in God's legislative authority, and they must consequently participate in some measure in His right to punish, for without SANCTIONS their laws would have no effect. All societies bound together by laws in the proper sense of the term have therefore claimed and exercised the right of punishing transgressors of the law. The Christian sees this as a participation in God's right to punish. "If thou dost what is evil, fear, for not without reason does it carry the sword. For it is God's minister, an avenger to execute wrath on him who does evil" (Rom 13.4).

In most early legal codes the penalties are those of death, torture, mutilation, exile, the deprivation of civil rights or of property. In primitive societies there is commonly an effort to secure equivalence in punishment, such as the lex talionis, "an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth" (cf. Ex 21.28–37).

The Church claims the right to punish as following from its mandate from Christ. Ecclesiastical penalties and censures are designed to vindicate the law of God and Church and to make the offender aware of his misdeeds. Their purpose is primarily medicinal (see 1917 Codex iuris canonici, cc. 221–19). In a society with a single religion, the distinction between civil and religious offenses—and so of the punishments they respectively incur—can be difficult to determine. Moral sanctions extend to the total life of society. But, with the emergence of a pluralistic society, there can be only limited moral agreement among its citizens, and the relation of law to morals, and of punishment to both, is subject to radical change.

Bibliography: PIUS XII, "Accogliete" (message, Dec. 5, 1954) Acta Apostolicae Sedis, 47 (1955) 60–71, Eng. Catholic Mind 53 (1955) 364–373. Dublin Review 230 (1956) 1–88, special issue on crime and punishment by I. EVANS et al. F. A. PAKENHAM, The Idea of Punishment (London 1961). L. RADZINOWICZ et al., "Punishment" in D. S. DAVIES et al., The Modern Approach to Criminal Law (London 1945). 2d United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and Treatment of Offenders, Report, Prepared by the Secretariat (New York 1961). P. DEVLIN, The Enforcement of Morals (New York 1965). J. CORBON in Vocabulaire de Théologie Biblique, ed. X. LÉON-DUFOUR (Paris 1962) 122–124. S. LYONNET, ibid. 345–346. C. WIÉNER, ibid. 919–925. E. WELTY, A Handbook of Christian Social Ethics, tr. G. KIRSTEIN, rev. J. FITZSIMONS (New York 1960–). W. TEMPLE, The Ethics of Penal Action (London 1934). A. C. EWING, The Morality of Punishment (London 1929).

[I. EVAN]

PURCELL, HAROLD

Missionary, editor; b. Gerardville, Pennsylvania, Jan. 3, 1881; d. Montgomery Alabama, Oct. 22, 1952. He attended Catholic schools in Philadelphia and entered the Passionist Congregation in 1897. Purcell was ordained in Union City, New Jersey, Dec. 17, 1904, and served as a home missionary for 15 years. Preaching throughout the East and Middle West, he conducted more than 300 missions and retreats. In 1921 he founded the Sign, a Passionist monthly magazine. Within three years he raised subscriptions to 60,000 and attracted excellent writing talent in the United States and England. The success of the Sign (circulation 420,000 in 1961) was due in large measure to the policies and principles Purcell established during his 13-year editorship. In 1934 he left his order to devote himself exclusively to the African American apostolate in the Mobile, Alabama diocese. Here he planned, financed, built, and directed "The City of St. Jude," a $5 million complex of schools, recreation units, church, rectory, convent, hospital, and nurses' home, for the service of African Americans.

[C. J. YUHAUS]

PURCELL, HENRY

Preeminent Restoration (English) baroque composer; b. London?, 1659; d. there, Nov. 21, 1695. Purcell's father, Thomas, was associated with the private music of the royal household from the Restoration (1660) until his death in 1682. As a boy Henry sang, as did his father, in the chapel royal and attended its choir school; and in 1677 he joined his father in composing for the King's violins. He was appointed successively to the organ of Westminster Abbey (where his body rests) in 1679; to the chapel royal organ in 1682; and to the King's private music in 1689. In line with his official duties, Purcell composed for church, concert hall, and stage in an artificial, ceremonious milieu in which music—even church music—was expected only to entertain. Moreover, late Puritan "reform" had recently broken the last remaining links with the country's pre-Reformation liturgical traditions, so that Purcell's opportunities to create serious sacred music were limited to such forms as verse anthems, hymns, Psalm settings, sacred songs (actually solo cantatas, with texts by Cowley, Herbert, and other poets), and a few massive choral works—the Te Deum, Magnificat, Nunc Dimittis, and the Jubilate for St. Cecilia's Day (1694). On the other hand, his theater music, consisting of one complete opera, Dido and Aeneas, and several semioperas, enjoyed the stimulus of the flourishing Restoration stage and the unbroken masque tradition; their scores are crammed with charming songs, instrumental intermezzi, and dance interludes. Although accommodated to the taste of the times in both sacred and secular spheres, Purcell's music soars above its circumstances in an unstereotyped expression that, as the poet G. M. Hopkins put it, “uttered in notes the very make and species of man as created both in him and in all men generally.” Added to this perception of the universal in the individual were his “ear-thronging” gifts of melodic and contrapuntal invention and his sensitivity to the meaning and dramatic yield of his texts. Though traditionally English in modality and tonality (the composer was called Orpheus Britannicus in his time), his music is probably the earliest to be considered “modern” by 20th-century norms.

Bibliography: Works, 31 v. (London 1878–1928, 1957–61); 22 sonatas, ed. W. G. WHITTAKER (London 1930–36). J. A. WESTRUP, Purcell (New York 1937); Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 10:1758–74. F. B. ZIMMERMAN, Henry Purcell, 1659–95: An Analytical Catalogue of His Music (New York 1963). J. A. FULLER-MAITLAND et al., Grove’s Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. E. BLOM 9 v. (5th ed. London 1954) 6:997–1019. E. WALKER, A History of Music in England, ed. J. A. WESTRUP (3d ed. Oxford 1952). C. H. H. PARRY, Music of the 17th Century, v.3 of Oxford History of Music, ed. P. C. BUCK, 7 v. (2d ed. London 1929–32). G. E. P. ARKWRIGHT, “Purcell’s Church Music,” Musical Antiquary 1 (1909–10) 63–72, 234–248. M. ADAMS, Henry Purcell: The Origins and Development of His Musical Style (Cambridge, England 1995). M. BURDEN, “Gallimaufry at Covent Garden: Purcell’s The Fairy-Queen in 1946,” Early Music 23 (1995) 268–284. M. CAMPBELL, Henry Purcell: Glory of the Age (London 1993). R. R. CRAVEN, “Nahum Tate’s Third Dido and Aeneas: The Sources of the Libretto to Purcell’s Opera,” The World of Opera 1/2 (1979) 65–78. M. CYR, “Tempo Gradations in Purcell’s Sonatas,” Performance Practice Review 7 (1994) 182–98. C. PRICE, “Dido and Aeneas: Questions of Style and Evidence,” Early Music 22 (1994) 115–25. R. SHAY, “Purcell’s Revisions to the Funeral Sentences Revisited,” Early Music 26 (1998) 457–67. I. SPINK, “Purcell’s Music for The Libertine,” Music and Letters 81 (2000) 520–531.

[M. E. EVANS]

PURCELL, JOHN BAPTIST

Archbishop; b. Mallow, County Cork, Ireland, Feb. 26, 1800; d. St. Martin’s, Brown County, Ohio, July 4, 1883. He was the third of four children of Edward and Johanna (Keefe) Purcell, who gave John an excellent classical education in the school at Mallow. At 18 he immigrated to the United States, where he obtained work as a private tutor with a prominent family on Maryland’s eastern shore. In 1820 he entered Mt. St. Mary’s Seminary, Emmitsburg, Md., receiving minor orders and serving on the faculty there before being sent (1824) to complete his studies at the Sulpician seminary at Paris, France. After ordination on May 20, 1826 in Notre Dame Cathedral by Abp. Hyacinthe L. de Quelen of Paris, he continued his studies at Saint-Sulpice until 1827, when he returned to the United States. At Emmitsburg he served as professor, vice president (1828), and president (1829) of Mt. St. Mary’s until his appointment (1833) as bishop of Cincinnati, Ohio, to succeed its first bishop, Edward Fenwick, OP.

Henry Purcell, portrait by Closterman.

Bishop. Purcell was consecrated Oct. 13, 1833, by Abp. James Whitfield in the Baltimore cathedral and remained in the city to attend the sessions of the Third Provincial Council of BALTIMORE. He was installed the following November 14 in the see city of his diocese, which at the time had one church at Cincinnati, one under construction at Hamilton, and 14 others throughout the state, 9 of which had been willed by Bishop Fenwick to the Dominicans of Ohio. The new bishop lost no time in providing for the wants of the growing church in Ohio. He purchased a site for a new cathedral, and St. Peter’s was completed and consecrated by Abp. Samuel Eccleston of Baltimore on Nov. 2, 1845.

After trying several locations for a diocesan seminary, Purcell laid the cornerstone (1848) of a new building on Price Hill, west of the city, and changed the name to Mt. St. Mary Seminary of the West, which was solemnly dedicated and opened with 12 seminarians in 1851. For many years it was an important center for the training of priests until its transfer (1904) to Hamilton County, Ohio. From the beginning, Purcell was an advocate of Catholic education, and under his administration parochial schools multiplied. Among the communities of religious women invited to staff them and other diocesan institutions were the Sisters of Charity, who had arrived in Cincinnati in 1829, Notre Dame sisters (1840), Precious Blood sisters (1844), Ursulines (1845), Good Shepherd sisters (1857), Sisters of Mercy and Franciscan sisters (1858), Little Sisters of the Poor (1868), the Religious of the Sacred Heart (1869), and Sisters of Christian Charity (1881). In 1840 Purcell welcomed the Jesuits and the Precious Blood fathers and, subsequently, the Lazarists (1842), the Franciscan fathers (1844), the Brothers of Mary (1849), the Passionists (1870), the Holy Cross fathers (1871), and the Holy Ghost fathers (1875).

To provide for the growing number of German immigrants in his diocese, Purcell built (1834) Holy Trinity Church, the first German-speaking parish in Cincinnati and the first west of the Alleghenies. As the German Catholic population continued to increase, numerous other such parishes were founded, directly or indirectly, from Holy Trinity. The first Catholic German periodical published in the United States was the Wahrheitsfreund of Cincinnati, which appeared in 1837 and continued until 1907, when the need that had brought it into existence had passed. The Catholic Telegraph for English-speaking Catholics had been founded in 1831 and was also used by Purcell to diffuse a correct knowledge of the Catholic faith. In 1837 the bishop's brilliant defense of Catholic teaching and practice in the debates with Alexander Campbell, a Baptist minister, not only helped to dispel much of the existing prejudice against Catholicism, but also greatly enhanced Purcell's position and reputation among his own flock and throughout the United States. When numbers of Protestant ministers began to enter the Church, Purcell urged (1853) the establishment of a fund for these highly trained men whose conversion left them without means of support.

After several visitations of his diocese, Purcell recognized the impossibility of administering the entire state properly and therefore petitioned for the erection of a new see for the northern part of the area. In 1847 the Diocese of Cleveland was erected, dividing the Diocese of Cincinnati into two parts; two years later the boundaries were adjusted by mutual agreement of the two bishops.

Archbishop. Rome recognized the rapid growth of the church in Ohio and in 1850 elevated Cincinnati to an archdiocese, making Purcell its first archbishop. He received the pallium from Pius IX the following year, during one of his many trips to Europe. When Abp. Gaetano BEDINI, who had been commissioned by Rome to investigate TRUSTEESISM in the United States, visited Cincinnati in 1853, he was the victim of a wave of KNOW-NOTHINGISM then sweeping the city. Under the leadership of Purcell, the champion of the rights of the Church in the West as Abp. John HUGHES was in the East, bloodshed was avoided and the insult to Bedini was deplored by right-minded citizens. In 1861 Cincinnati's archbishop, proclaiming himself an advocate of the Union, had the flag flown from his cathedral spire. Although this action called forth adverse criticism, Purcell continued boldly throughout the Civil War to support the North. At its close, he attended the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore (1866) and preached at one of its sessions. The conciliar decrees were sent to Rome with the usual letter to Pius IX. Later, when the text of the letter was used to support the thesis that the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore had at least implicitly affirmed papal infallibility, Purcell was one of the signers who denied the allegation.

At VATICAN COUNCIL I (1869–70), he opposed the formal declaration of papal infallibility, not only because he considered it inopportune, but also because he objected to the definition of the doctrine itself before it was clearly stated just what was meant by the pope's infallibility. Before the final vote on the question was taken, Purcell was granted permission to return home. However, once the matter had been decided, he lost no time in publicly professing his belief in the dogma as defined.

Under Purcell a number of diocesan synods were held as well as the first three provincial councils (1855, 1858, 1861). Although the question of a coadjutor came up several times, it was not until 1862 that Sylvester H. Rosecrans was appointed auxiliary to Cincinnati. His transfer to Columbus, Ohio, in 1868 again left Purcell alone until 1880, when he resigned all affairs into the hands of the new coadjutor and administrator, Bp. William H. Elder. Purcell's last days were clouded by the serious financial disaster that struck the archdiocese in 1878. The archbishop's brother, Rev. Edward Purcell, had for 40 years conducted a private banking system that had attracted many depositors, particularly after the failure of several local banks and a number of national financial panics. However, in 1878 a run on the money deposited with Purcell depleted available funds and payments were suspended. A subsequent examination disclosed the insolvent state of the banking operation and an assignment of all the resources of the bank was supplemented by the transfer of certain diocesan property. When these proved insufficient to cover all liabilities, legal action ensued (1880–1905) in state and federal courts.

The archbishop's health was affected by the strain, and in November 1879 he took up residence in the Ursuline convent in Brown County, where he died a few years later. His remains were interred in the convent cemetery. During his administration the church had made great progress; in 1833 there had been only 16 churches for about 7,000 Catholics served by 14 priests, whereas in 1883 Ohio counted 500 churches with a Catholic population of 500,000, served by 480 priests.

Bibliography: Archives, Cincinnati archdiocese. M. A. McCANN, Archbishop Purcell and the Archdiocese of Cincinnati (Washington 1918). J. H. LAMOTT, History of the Archdiocese of Cincinnati, 1821–1921 (New York 1921). M. E. HUSSEY, “The 1878 Financial Failure of Archbishop Purcell,” The Cincinnati Historical Society Bulletin 36 (1978).

[M. P. CARTHY]

PURE ACT

Pure act is an expression used in scholastic philosophy and theology to describe the absolute or pure perfection of God, in contrast with the limited or mixed perfection of creatures. ACT here is a technical term meaning actually possessed perfection, while pure means unmixed with POTENCY, that is, with any intrinsic capacity for change or limitation. The expression is to be understood, therefore, in function of the general theory of potency and act initiated by ARISTOTLE and further developed by St. THOMAS AQUINAS and scholastic thinkers from the 13th century on (see POTENCY AND ACT).

This theory was originally developed by Aristotle to explain CHANGE or MOTION. Potency was conceived as a capacity for change, and not yet as a principle of LIMITATION. Hence, for Aristotle, any being that has no intrinsic potency for change but always actually possesses the full measure of perfection proper to it is a pure act. Since matter is of its nature a principle of change, a pure act must be a purely spiritual intelligence whose act or perfection consists in eternal, changeless, and blissful self-contemplation.

Although Aristotle’s proof for the existence of an unmoved mover in the Physica (258b 10–267b 27) mentions only one such being explicitly, he seems finally to have admitted, for reasons based on the current astronomy, some 55 of these, each a prime mover for one of the heavenly spheres (Meta. 1073a 13–1074b 14). Perfection for him, as for pre-Christian Greek philosophy in general, seemed not to imply infinity, but rather connoted the formless, the indeterminate, and the imperfect. Thus pure act excluded change but not limitation, and there could be several different pure acts, each complete in its own act of self-contemplation.

When 13th-century Christian thinkers took over Aristotelian philosophy as an instrument of theology, they modified the Aristotelian notion of pure act and applied it to the Christian God, unique Creator of all. It then became the infinite plenitude of all possible perfection, from which all other beings received perfection in different limited degrees, each in proportion to the limiting potency or capacity of its own nature. Potency thus became a principle of limitation as well as of change, and all beings outside of God were seen to be, in some way, mixtures of act and potency. For St. Thomas, since the ultimate perfection of all things is existence itself, God is a pure subsistent act of existence, Ipsium Esse Subsistens, including all other perfections. At the opposite end of the scale of perfection lies pure potency or primary matter; considered in itself (though according to St. Thomas it could never exist by itself), this is pure capacity for perfection, with no act or perfection of its own (see MATTER AND FORM).

The few modern philosophers outside the Aristotelian-scholastic tradition who have adopted the expression use it to convey a conception of God as Absolute Spirit, thinking Himself and the world in a single pure act of thought; this group includes G. W. F. HEGEL, G. GENTILE, M. BLONDEL, and L. LAVELLE.

See Also: ASEITY (ASEITAS); GOD IN PHILOSOPHY, 3; INFINITY OF GOD.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, C. gent. 1.16–18, 28, 43; THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae, Ia, 3–4, 7. W. N. CLARKE, “Limitation of Act by Potency: Aristotelianism or Neoplatonism,” The New Scholasticism 26 (1952) 167–194.

[W. N. CLARKE]

PURE AND IMPURE

The OT concept of the pure and impure, a notion shared with most of the ancient religions, does not derive its origins from moral considerations. Rather, its origins are found in primitive disgust with the loathsome, a dynamic consideration of sin, and the consciousness, proper to Israel, of being a holy people, striving for holiness, separated and apart from other peoples. This article treats the pure and impure in this order: consideration that it is not a moral concept, it is related to the holy, the concept’s growth and change, and its position in NT Christianity.

NOT A MORAL CONCEPT

The pure (tāhēr) is not to be identified with physical cleanness or moral purity; on the other hand, the impure (tāmē’) positively suggests something mysterious and dangerous and, consequently, to be avoided at all costs. Hence the impure is strictly forbidden or taboo. Thus a person, an animal, a certain thing or action may be impure, e.g. a woman after childbirth, a camel, a corpse. Words that convey this concept of pure or impure appear more than 500 times in the Bible. Purity seems to become a matter of national life and death, its loss causing Yahweh to turn away His face: "According to their uncleanness and their transgressions I dealt with them" (Ez 39.24). This attitude stems from Israel's response to the holiness of Yahweh: "Be holy, for I, the Lord, your God, am holy" (Lv 19.2). Cleanness or purity implies holiness; yet, in certain respects, the impure resembles the holy.

RELATED TO THE HOLY

The idea of the impure and the holy are closely related. This is well illustrated by the Semitic root ḥrm with its polarity of meaning, signifying both the holy and the abominable [see W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity (New York 2d ed. 1948) 176]. That which is holy (qādôš) is untouchable (Lv 11.31–40; 15.4–12, 20–28). Therefore, after performing his sacred duties, the priest had to take off his holy garments and put on others (Ez 44.19; Ex 28.43; Lv 6.3–4; etc.). By touching sacred objects, such as the red heifer (Nm 19.1–10), one became impure; hence the priest who sprinkled the blood contracted impurity that necessitated washings before he could approach the Holy One. Although the removal of impurity is called "sanctifying" (Jos 3.5; 1 Sm 16.5), to be pure and to be holy are not the same. Purity seems to be a condition or prerequisite for holiness, a positive power of worthiness for approaching the "Holy One." The "holy" God can not tolerate the impure, which shows that the foundation of the purity prescriptions in the OT are of a religious nature. [See HOLINESS (IN THE BIBLE)]. Since Yahweh is a jealous God and tolerates no other gods, His people become impure by worshiping other gods (Jer 2.7, 23; Hos 6.10; etc.), by consulting fortunetellers (Lv 19.31), shaving the hair above the forehead for the dead (Dt 14.1), etc.; because other gods are worshiped in foreign lands, these lands (Am 7.17; Is 52.1) and all that comes with them, including their food, (Hos 9.3; Dn 1.5–16), are impure. Consequently, Canaanite sanctuaries and their contents had to be utterly destroyed (Dt 7.5, 25) and the booty of the Midianite war had to be purified (Nm 31.20–24). Returning from Babylon, the Jews purified themselves (Est 6.20–22) and the walls of Jerusalem, which had been defiled by foreigners (Neh 12.30). As illustrated by the practice of the Jews who returned from the Babylonian Exile, the center of the laws of ritual purity in the postexilic age was the theological notion of the holiness of separation [see J. Bonsirven, Le Judaïsme Palestinien au temps de Jesus-Christ 2 v. (Paris 1934) 2:183–185]. In NT times the Jews are mentioned as avoiding impurity, i.e., contact with foreigners at the time of the Passover (Jn 18.28).

GROWTH AND CHANGE

The distinction between the pure and impure existed among the Israelites before the codification of the Mosaic Law. Having taken over and sanctioned the customs, the Law transformed them into religious precepts. Their observance became a sign of the holiness of the people of God (Lv 11.44) and served to preserve monotheism among the Israelites since it set them apart from the pagan nations (Dn 1.8, 12; Tb 1.10–12; etc.); moreover, because the precepts of purity were regarded as God's commandments, their observance fostered morality. In fact, this practice led to heroic deeds, such as the martyrdom of Eleazar (2 Mc 6.18–31). Nevertheless, the danger of formalism was ever present and an exaggerated zeal for ritual purity arose. The preexilic Prophets inveighed against abuses in cult practices of purification: "This people draws near with words only and honors me with their lips alone, though their hearts are far from me, and their reverence for me has become routine observance of the precepts of men" (Is 29.13; see also Hos 6.6; Am 4.1–5; Jer 7.21–24). The Prophets continued to emphasize that the real impurity that stained man was sin (Ez 36.17–26), a stain in man that only God could purify (Is 6.5–7). The radical purification of lips and heart and of the entire being comes with the messianic promises: "I will sprinkle clean water upon you to cleanse you from all your impurities, and from all your idols I will cleanse you . . ." (Ez 36.25; see also Zep 3.9; Is 35.8; 52.1).

The Psalmists also celebrate moral purity. God's goodness turns to the clean of heart [Ps 72(73).1]. Approach to the Lord is for the sinless, whose heart is clean [Ps 23 (24).4]; the Lord rewards according to one's justice [Ps 17(18).21, 25]. More than all other Psalms, the "Miserere" [Ps 50(51)] manifests the transition to moral purity: "Cleanse me of sin with hyssop, that I may be purified; wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow" (v. 9). Paralleling Ezechiel (36.25) and crowning the OT tradition, the Psalmist cries: "A clean heart create for me, O God, and a steadfast spirit renew within me" (v. 12). The other Wisdom teachers also stress purity of heart, hands, and prayer (Jb 11.4, 14; 16.17), while noting a radical impurity of man before God (Prv 20.9; Jb 9.30–31).

POSITION IN NT CHRISTIANITY

Side by side with the tradition accenting moral purity in postexilic Judaism, there is found also the legalistic tendency, which continued to the time of Christ, that placed increasing emphasis on the material conditions of purity, i.e., repeated ablutions (Mk 7.3–8), cup washing (Mt 23.25), avoidance of sinners (Mk 2.15–16), and the like. Jesus Himself observed certain rules of purity (Mk 1.43–44) and seemed to condemn only excesses [Mk 7.6–13; see V. Taylor, The Gospel according to Mark (London 1952) 342–347]. It is not likely that He explicitly and categorically abrogated the dietary laws of Judaism; otherwise, it is difficult to understand why the early Christian community had to go through such painful searchings before finally eliminating these laws (Acts 10.14; 15.28–29; Gal 2.11–17; Rom 14.14; Col 2.20–22). Yet, Jesus decisively proclaimed that moral impurity, not ritual, is the true defilement: “Hear men, all of you, and understand. There is nothing outside a man that entering into him, can defile him; but the things that come out of a man, these are what defile a man” (Mk 7.14–15). In this sense devils can be called “unclean spirits” (Mk 1.23; Lk 9.42). It is then the pure of heart (Mt 5.8) who have access to God. To see God and to come into His Presence, not only in the Temple but also into His Kingdom, moral purity is not sufficient. The active presence of the Lord is necessary; only then is man radically pure or holy: “You are already clean because of the word I have spoken to you. Abide in me, and I in you” (Jn 15.3; see also 13.10).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 196–94. G. A. BUTTRICK, ed., The Interpreters' Dictionary of the Bible, 4 v. (Nashville 1962) 1:641–648. P. VAN IMSCHOOT, Théologie de l'Ancien Testament, 2 v. (Tournai 1954–56) 2:204–216.

[J. LACHOWSKI]

PURE NATURE, STATE OF

The term pure nature as it comes into modern theology is very much colored by the controversies over the teaching of BAIUS and C. JANSEN. As it is customarily used, it describes a possible state of man contrasted with elevated or engraced nature, and fallen or sinful nature. In the state of pure nature a man would possess all the physical and spiritual realities necessary to constitute a human being: a body and a rational soul with all their properties and capacities. In addition to this, pure nature would have a natural destiny, i.e., an end proportionate to its created capacities. This natural end would be the love of God as author of nature above all things [see R. Garrigou-Lagrange, Grace (St. Louis 1952) 33]. While no Catholic theologian would maintain that any such state ever actually existed, a very large number have insisted that only by formulating the notion of pure nature as a genuine possibility can the absolute gratuity of the SUPERNATURAL ELEVATION OF MAN be clearly understood and defended. For, once it can be ascertained what precisely belongs to nature, then the theologian is in a position to determine what GRACE is and, therefore, what must be affirmed as God's unowed gift. This approach has been used extensively against the teaching of Baius and Jansen. It is pointed out that since they deny the possibility of pure nature they make of God's gifts of grace something owed to human nature. Therefore the loss of grace through sin must necessarily corrupt the very nature of man.

In recent years, however, there has been considerable reevaluation of the notion of pure nature. Much of it began with the publication of H. de Lubac's historical study of the issue, entitled Surnaturel (Paris 1945). The extensive debate and discussion that followed the appearance of this book concerned itself with both issues raised by the book, although not always keeping them clearly separate. The first issue concerned the historical development of the notion itself. The correlative issue that Père de Lubac raised concerned the validity of the theological position maintaining that this notion of pure nature was necessary for the proper understanding and protection of the absolute gratuity of the supernatural [see P. J. Donnelly, “The Gratuity of the Beatific Vision and the Possibility of a Natural Destiny,” Theological Studies 11 (1950) 374–404]. These noteworthy issues require some elaboration.

Historical Issue. As to the historical issue, De Lubac asserted that the theological notion of pure nature found in modern theology was unknown to St. Thomas and his contemporaries. He saw it as being first formulated in the 16th century under the influence of Cajetan. In Cajetan's thought man cannot naturally aspire to what his natural powers cannot accomplish. It is possible, therefore, for an intelligent creature to exist without effective orientation to the BEATIFIC VISION. Cajetan and those who follow him hold that such a nature could be satisfied by an end or destiny proportionate to its own powers. Others would hold that even if such a nature could exist without the vision of God, nevertheless it would have a conditioned desire for it. De Lubac, however, claimed that St. Thomas never considered the idea of a spiritual being as having any end other than the vision of God.

After a lengthy debate in the many articles Surnaturel engendered, it would seem to be clear that St. Thomas does not explicitly treat of the possibility of a pure nature with a purely natural end. He is concerned with a pure nature (in puris naturalibus) in relation to the means of salvation, i.e., nature with a desire to see God but not having grace. A further question raised in the course of the debate was whether or not the internal structure of St. Thomas's theology excludes the possibility of a purely natural end. In the light of the evidence presented during the debate, it seems clear that St. Thomas's system does allow for this possibility [see G. de Broglie, De fine ultimo vitae humanae (Paris 1948)].

Theological Issue. The question of the necessity of the notion of pure nature to explain and undergird the gratuity of the order of grace is still under debate. It is clear, of course, as Pius XII affirmed in Humani generis, that God could have created intellectual beings not called to the beatific vision (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [Freiburg 1963] 3891). The fact, however, of the possibility of not being called to the beatific vision is quite distinct from the possibility of pure nature, for in this latter case the use of the term nature presupposes a determined philosophical position on what precisely “nature” and “natural” are. It is this last point that has been challenged by a growing number of theologians in recent years as is illustrated by the following arguments.

In the first stage of the debate a few appeared to maintain that man’s orientation to the vision of God is a necessary dynamism of a created spirit—an element of its very nature. Hence, the notion of pure nature as commonly used in theology would have neither meaning nor relevance. Something is natural only in the sense of being contrasted to the divine. It is this position that seems to be the object of the statement of Pius XII referred to above. It was a view that never gathered much support since it makes no distinction between creation and creation in Christ and so does not preserve the special gratuity of salvific grace.

Coming to the fore in the course of the debate was another opinion: that since God has in fact called man to the beatific vision, then this vocation, itself a free gift of God, enters into the total structure of man’s concrete nature. In the terminology of K. Rahner, it is a SUPERNATURAL EXISTENTIAL, which of necessity brings into being a resonance and a tendency to the vision of God [see K. Rahner, “Concerning the Relationship between Nature and Grace, Theological Investigations, v.1, tr. C. Ernst (Baltimore 1961) 295–317]. In this perspective the distinction between natural and supernatural would be reformulated. It would begin by recognizing that there is nothing in man that is not affected by the supernatural sphere. Created human nature as it exists in fact would make it impossible to set down in any detailed way a definition of the distinction between the two natures. Thus, the conception of the notion of pure nature cannot be delineated without ambiguity. For it cannot be done with either completeness or surety. Hence, while nature as distinct from the supernatural is a genuine reality and a proper order, it cannot be defined exactly. Those who follow this opinion, therefore, would tend to give much less importance to the notion of pure nature than it has had for many modern theologians and theological manuals.

See Also: DESIRE TO SEE GOD, NATURAL; DESTINY, SUPERNATURAL; MAN, 3; NATURAL ORDER; NATURE; OBEDIENTIAL POTENCY; PRETERNATURAL; SUPERNATURAL ORDER.

Bibliography: J. ALFARO, Lo natural y lo sobrenatural desde Santo Tomás hasta Cayetano (Madrid 1952). H. DE LUBAC, Augustinisme et théologie moderne (Paris 1965); The Mystery of the Supernatural, tr. R. SHEED (New York 1967). J. P. KENNY, “Reflections on Human Nature and the Supernatural,” Theological Studies 14 (1953) 280–287. L. RENWART, “La Nature pure à la lumière de l’encyclique Humani generis,” Nouvelle revue théologique 74 (1952) 337–354. H. RONDET, “Le Problème de la nature pure et la théologie du XVI^e siècle,” Recherche de science religieuse 35 (1948) 481–521. D. J. M. BRADLEY, Aquinas on the Twofold Human Good (Washington, D.C. 1997). S. A. LONG, “On the Possibility of a Purely Natural End for Man,” The Thomist 64 (2000) 211–37.

[E. M. BURKE]

PURGATORY

According to the teaching of the Church, the state, place, or condition in the next world, which will continue until the last judgment, where the souls of those who die in the state of grace, but not yet free from all imperfection, make expiation for unforgiven venial sins or for the temporal punishment due to venial and mortal sins that have already been forgiven and, by so doing, are purified before they enter heaven.

In the Bible

Although the doctrine of purgatory is not explicitly stated in the Bible, belief in its existence is intimately related to the biblical doctrines of divine judgment [see JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THE BIBLE)], the forgiveness of sins [see FORGIVENESS OF SINS (IN THE BIBLE)], the mercy of God, and the temporal punishment due to sin. The essential truths known to the Israelites before the time of Christ and familiar to the writers of the New Testament were that the dead are to be judged according to their works; that their sins render it a terrible thing to be judged by God; that souls need God’s mercy in order to enter heaven; and that their brethren ought to pray to God to show them mercy.

In the Old Testament. Prayer and sacrifice of expiation for the dead appear only in the last two centuries before Christ. Before this time no acts of worship directed toward the dead seem to have existed. (See R. De Vaux, Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions, tr. J. McHugh [New York 1961] 60.)

The only passage that can be cited in support of the doctrine of purgatory is 2 Mc 12.39–45. According to the text, when Judas Maccabee and his men made arrangements for the fitting burial of the soldiers of his army who had died near Adullam, it was discovered that they had worn pagan amulets, contrary to the prescriptions of the Mosaic Law. Judas concluded that God had punished the soldiers for this sinful practice; God's just judgment was praised, and prayers were offered on behalf of the victims. A collection of 12,000 drachmas was then gathered and sent to Jerusalem to have expiatory sacrifices offered for those who had fallen in battle. The inspired author of 2 Maccabees, a firm believer himself in the resurrection of the dead (2 Mc 7.9, 11, 14, 23, 29), concludes that Judas also believed in the resurrection of the dead. He, therefore, praised Judas, who acted out of consideration for the resurrection of the dead, and argued that, if he had not hoped that the slain should rise again, it would have been useless and foolish to pray for them when dead; but if he did this with a view toward the splendid reward that awaited those who died in godliness, it was a holy and pious thought. Therefore, Judas made atonement for the dead, that they might be freed from sin. See SIN (IN THE BIBLE).

According to the traditional interpretation of this passage, the inspired author believed that those who had otherwise led good lives were purified by prayer and sacrifice from their sins. This essentially is the Catholic doctrine on purgatory. If, however, as many modern exegetes hold, the author regarded these sacrifices as necessary for the eschatological resurrection of the dead soldiers, then these passages do not directly refer to the doctrine of purgatory. The words of Sir 7.33, "withhold not your kindness from the dead," refer directly to proper mourning and burial of the dead; if, however, they are read in the light of 2 Mc 12.43–45, prayers for the deceased might also be recommended.

In Judaism. In rabbinical literature, besides the everlasting punishments of GEHENNA and the punishment of sinners, the idea was current that some people would remain only for a time in Gehenna, where they would be purified. Some rabbis interpreted the words of Zec 13.9 in this sense: "I will bring the one third through fire, and I will refine them as silver is refined, and I will test them as gold is tested." The school of Shammai attributed this purification to the eschatological place of torture, where certain people, through God's mercy and goodness, would be prepared to enjoy eternal life.

In the New Testament. The New Testament shows that the disciples of Jesus were familiar with His teaching on sin and judgment (Mt 12.32, 36; 16.27; Lk 7.47; 12.47–48). His words deepened their sense of God's holiness, kindled their hopes of merciful forgiveness, and inspired them to pray for the dead. He taught them the stern truths of death and judgment, and nothing suggests that only the spotlessly pure would escape hell (see Mt 8.12; Lk 12.20; 16.22; Jn 9.4; 11.9; 12.35).

Several texts can be understood as referring to purgatory at least indirectly, e.g., Mt 12.32, where mention is made of certain sins "which will not be forgiven either in this world or in the world to come." Also, Paul's prayer for Onesiphorus (2 Tm 1.18), "may the Lord grant him to find mercy from the Lord on that day," seems to imply the existence of purgatory. St. Paul's parable in 1 Cor 3.10–15 on various Christian preachers working to spread the kingdom of God is not concerned about purgatory, except perhaps in an accommodated sense. In the final analysis, the Catholic doctrine on purgatory is based on tradition, not Sacred Scripture.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 1964–65. J. GNILKA, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:50–51. A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 13.1:1163–79. E. O'BRIEN, "The Scriptural Proof for the Existence of Purgatory from 2 Mc. 12.43–45," Sciences ecclésiastiques 2 (1949) 80–108.

[J. F. X. CEVETELLO]

In Theology

The Catholic doctrine on purgatory may now be considered, along with indications of its basis in early tradition and in the councils. Also to be taken up is the theological speculation on the data of revelation; in the course of treating this latter, modern opinions about the nature of purgatory may be summarized.

Catholic Doctrine. Underlying the teaching on purgatory are several presuppositions. (1) The Church solemnly teaches the difference between mortal sin, which causes the eternal loss of the soul in hell (Denz 1002), and venial sin, which does not cause eternal DAMNATION and which even the just commit in daily life (Denz 1573). (2) The Church also teaches that the punishment due to sin, whether mortal or venial, is not always and necessarily forgiven along with the guilt of sin; hence this punishment is to be paid by the sinner either in this life or in the next before he can enter the kingdom of heaven (Denz 1580, 1712).

Magisterial Statements. The existence of purgatory as a state where those dying with such temporal punishment may be cleansed before being admitted to heaven and the direct vision of the divine essence is clear from the authoritative teaching of the First and Second Councils of Lyons (Denz 838, 856) and of the Council of Florence (Denz 1304), all of which expressed the common belief of both the East and the West. Finally, the Council of Trent reiterated the revealed character of the existence of purgatory against the reformers, who had denied that there was any basis for it in Sacred Scripture (Denz 1580, 1820). Since there is no solemn statement of the Church about the existence of the guilt of venial sin in purgatory, the only thing certain is that at least the punishment due to forgiven sins is exacted from the soul. In addition to the certain existence of purgatory, the Church has also authoritatively defined that the souls detained there can be helped by the prayers and other good works of the faithful on earth (Denz 856, 1304, 1743, 1753, 1820, 1867; see INDULGENCES). The manner in which these prayers and good works of the faithful are applied to the souls in purgatory has not been authentically determined by the Church.

Tradition. The Fathers in general are clear in their affirmation of the reality of purgation in some form. This is not to deny that some time was needed to formulate a clear and definitive idea of the purification to take place in the other world, for varying eschatological views prevented in the early centuries a uniform presentation of its nature. The witness of the Fathers to the fact of such purification after death, therefore, is beyond doubt; their explanation of the purifying process has as much validity as the reasons advanced by each one. One thing is certain: the primitive Church never accepted the belief that in each and every instance the eternal beatitude of the just began immediately after death. The widely held though false theory that heaven would begin, at least for those who were not martyrs, only at the RESURRECTION of the dead excluded this. In addition, prayers and other good works were offered for the departed souls as a matter of common practice. There can be no doubt, then, that the widespread belief of the early Church, as shown by many of the Fathers (see TERTULLIAN, ORIGEN, CYPRIAN, EPHRAM, AMBROSE, AUGUSTINE, CHRYSOSTOM, CAESARIUS OF ARLES, and GREGORY THE GREAT; texts in Enchiridion patristicum, ed. M. J. Rouët de Journel [21st ed. Freiburg im Breisgau 1960] index 587–589) and as evidenced by the liturgy, demanded the existence of a state after death in which the souls of the just would be fully purified from any remains of sin before entering heaven.

The scholastic writers accepted this teaching of the Fathers and constructed a more consistent synthesis. They taught clearly the doctrines of the existence of purgatory and the finite duration of its punishments; there was general agreement on the presence of fire as the purifying agent. On secondary points, such as the remission of venial sins, the gravity and duration of the punishments, and the location where they took place, differences were apparent. The basic teaching was then incorporated into the Councils of Lyons, Florence, and Trent, and forms the nucleus of present Catholic belief about purgatory.

The teaching of the Eastern Church today displays some differences from that of the West. The dead find themselves in an intermediate state, awaiting the day of the final judgment. The good already enjoy some foretaste of heaven, while the evil experience some of the torments of hell. Beyond this, Eastern doctrine is not too clear, although their theologians in general reject the idea that the purification takes place by fire and that a special place is set aside for it. Since neither of these points was defined in the councils, the seeming opposition between East and West in the matter of purgatory is not insurmountable. In general, the teaching of the Eastern Church reflects the primitive and somewhat undeveloped doctrine of the Fathers on the status of the departed souls.

Nature of Purgatory. Questions relating to the punishments of purgatory and allied topics are much more obscure than the question of the existence of purgatory. All theologians hold that there will be some kind of purifying punishment there (from the very etymology of the word) that will cease with the last judgment. Of its very nature, therefore, the punishment is temporary.

Duration of Purgatory. It is a false question to inquire more precisely how long purgatory will endure. First, the separated soul no longer lives in the time of this world, but in aevum, where duration is not measured in days and years. Second, the soul becomes very conscious of its tremendous shortcomings, of the actions it has failed to perform, or performed poorly, or not done at all, and it is wholly intent on making good for these. Thus the intensity of the suffering could well take place in an instant, or could endure for some time, without the soul being aware of it. Because of these considerations theologians have abstained from speculating on the duration of the sufferings of purgatory.

Nature of the Punishment. The temporary deprivation of the BEATIFIC VISION, for which the soul would otherwise be prepared, is surely one of the keenest punishments of purgatory. Some theologians wish to call this the pain of loss, seeing that the consciousness of being separated from the Creator, who is so near and yet so far, causes terrible suffering and longing for Him, which is heightened still more by the knowledge that the venial sins and punishment due to sin could have been expiated so easily by contrition, prayer, and other good works in this life. Others maintain that there is no pain of loss in the proper sense of the word. In regard to the pain of sense there is likewise great diversity of opinion. Many think that the total suffering of purgatory is identified with the awareness of the temporary postponement of the beatific vision, although the more common view holds that, in addition to this, there is some positive punishment, intended to repair the disorder caused by the partial aversion from God and the turning toward creatures that is the result of venial sin.

An entirely different question concerns the constitution of this pain of sense. In the Latin Church it has been generally maintained that this pain is imposed through real fire. This is not, however, essential to belief in purgatory. It is not even certain. The Greeks explicitly rejected the notion that the punishment was by means of fire, a view they were not required to change before subscribing to the statements of faith in the councils of reunion. St. Thomas explained the fire as a binding and hampering of the soul. Others hold for fire in the real sense. When the objection is raised that real fire could have no effect on the spiritual soul, these theologians are ready with an answer. The soul in purgatory, even though separated from the body, remains in some mysterious way related to the material world and open to its influence, so much so that it attains its ultimate fulfillment only at the resurrection, that is, when it is again rejoined to the body. This relationship of the soul to matter, lasting even after death, furnishes a metaphysical and salvific basis for its purification by a material agent. Even if one chooses, with the theologians of the East, to reject the idea of suffering induced by fire, one should be careful not to exclude all positive suffering from purgatory. There are still real affliction, sorrow, chagrin, shame of conscience, and other spiritual sorrows capable of inflicting true pain on the soul.

Intensity of the Punishment. This question is less discussed today than it was in medieval times. St. Bonaventure thought that the deprivation of the beatific vision was the most intense and painful suffering encountered in purgatory. Suárez was inclined to agree with him, but at the same time saw a difficulty in the case of a very holy person who entered purgatory with only the slightest punishment for which to atone. This holy soul, because it was soon to attain to a very high degree of union with God, would suffer more from the postponement of this union than another soul who was destined for a lower place in heaven. Suárez, therefore, made the following modifications: first, although the deprivation of the glory of heaven ought of its very nature to bring more suffering to the souls who are most holy, because of the mercy of God this suffering is tempered by the perfect love with which these souls accept it; second, the sorrow of the souls in purgatory also stems from the degree of glory that they have failed to attain, which makes the suffering of a less perfect soul more intense precisely because it realizes it has attained less perfection than it could have.

A veil of mystery prevents any accurate assessment of the intensity of the pain of purgatory. St. Catherine of Genoa wrote that the desire of the soul for God was an ardent fire more consuming and painful than any earthly fire. SS. Thomas and Bonaventure held that the slightest fire of purgatory was more painful than the greatest sufferings of this world. Modern authors adhere more closely to the view of Suárez, who denied the validity of such comparisons, since they deal with two entirely different orders, one of which is beyond our present experience and hence incapable of being compared with that which we know here. One should remember, at any rate, that in the midst of their sufferings these souls also experience great joy over the certainty of salvation. This point will be treated below.

It is not out of place to remark here that the terrifying descriptions of purgatory sometimes found in popular writing, sermons, and other such material are not based on the teaching of the Church. As has been shown, even the idea of fire is not universally accepted. Certain conceptions, then, stressing too much the horror and misery of purgatory, running counter to the incomparable dignity of the children of God who are detained there, and causing scandal to the faithful, should be discountenanced. They either arise from the indiscreet use of private revelations, which generally do not rise above the theological level of the recipient of such alleged apparitions, or they mirror the thought of the time. In this matter the advice of the Council of Trent is wise, insisting upon the exclusion from sermons not only of difficult and subtle questions that do not edify the people, but also of what savors of idle curiosity and superstition, and of what is scandalous and repulsive (Denz 1820). It is to the interests of both theological precision and of the dignity of this mystery to avoid all fantastic imagery in speaking of the nature of purgatory.

Purpose of the Suffering. The soul in purgatory must be freed of certain defects: (1) the guilt of venial sin; (2) inclination toward sin (inordinate desires); and (3) temporal punishment due to sin. Until quite recent times the preponderance of theological thought denied that the suffering of purgatory had as its purpose the forgiveness of the guilt of venial sin. Authors held that the guilt of venial sin was forgiven by the intense act of love of God that the soul elicited at its entrance into purgatory, an act of love that is the more intense now that the soul, freed from the trammels and drag of the body, turns toward God with the full powers of its spiritual faculties. In this state a divided, partial allegiance to God would be unthinkable. Thus the soul in purgatory is freed from the guilt of sin from the beginning and suffers only the temporal punishment due to his sins. Many authors, however, question this view.

It does not seem to take into consideration the weakness of the soul induced by lifelong habits of sin, habits acquired, it is true, through the body, but many of which affect the powers of the soul itself. The opinion also overlooks the fact that Scripture, when it refers to purification after death, speaks of the forgiveness of the guilt of venial sin in purgatory. The authority of St. Thomas is claimed by both sides of this dispute, but it is noteworthy that only after the 16th century did the view become prevalent that the guilt of sin was removed at entry into purgatory. The liturgy seems to favor the modern view also, as in the prayer for the blessing of a cemetery: "Absolve the souls of all whose bodies are laid to rest here from every bond of sin." Again: "We beseech You, O Lord, grant to the souls of your faithful whose bodies rest here the forgiveness of all their sins." While the probative force of these prayers may be questioned by contending that no distinction is made between the guilt of sin and punishment due to sin, they do serve as a strong confirmation for the view that the guilt of sin itself is forgiven in purgatory.

This latter opinion is also in greater conformity with the sanctity of God and the dignity of the human person. It seems more in keeping with the holiness of God that He would progressively transform and perfect the soul until it was ready for heaven than that He would continue to punish a soul otherwise worthy of the beatific vision. Of course, even if God were to punish one already freed from the guilt of sin, this would serve as an explicit revelation of the mystery of God's justice and bring once more to the consciousness of the sinner, as he stood at the threshold of heaven, the heinousness and gravity of even venial sin. But the image of God presented in Holy Scripture inclines modern authors to see the divine love, holiness, and justice combining to punish the soul still guilty of venial sins as the soul is transformed and cleansed. This would also respect the personal dignity of the created person, depriving him of the vision of God only as long as the guilt of sin remained in the soul. As soon as the last of this disappeared, the person would be ready to enter the eternal happiness of heaven.

Recent theological speculation about the nature of sin and its effects upon the whole of the human personality gives further reason for thinking that purgatory is a gradual process whereby the soul is not only punished, but also freed from the guilt of sin and especially from the evil consequences that sin has left imprinted in its very substance. The soul of the just, presuming that it is not ready for immediate admission to the sight of God, is weighed down with impurities and imperfections of varying degrees. The number and gravity of unforgiven venial sins can vary greatly, as can the punishment due to these and other forgiven sins. Even more, the ravages of CONCUISCENCE will have made themselves felt more or less deeply in the soul. Persistent habits of sin or uncontrolled desires may have left deep spiritual scars on the faculties of the soul, scars that penetrate below the level of consciousness into the very fibers of the personality. Before the person is fully ready to enter heaven and face the unspeakable holiness and majesty of God, all of these must be removed. The whole person, in other words, must be made over, formed again in the image of God to which it was made and which sin has tried to efface by its onslaughts. Granted these deep-rooted effects of sin on the soul, one can see more clearly why modern authors do not favor the theory of the forgiveness of sins immediately upon entry to purgatory. This guilt of sin, the remains of sin in the soul, is more deeply imbedded than the person is aware. There must be quite literally a process, a purification that lays bare, so to speak, the successive layers of the personality and exposes to view the faults buried in the depths of the nature. As this purification progresses, the full personality of the individual emerges for the first time. On earth concupiscence and ingrained, subconscious habits prevented the person from acting to the fullest extent as a child of God and from displaying the wonders of its varied talents; now the person is enabled to live as its own self to the utmost for the first time and to reveal the richness of its personality. Thus purgatory is not a place of negative suffering, designed only to punish the soul, but a state of positive progress where the person is enabled to possess God by first truly possessing itself.

Manner of Suffering. Theologians distinguish the suffering endured in purgatory from that undertaken on earth in reparation for sin. The latter is called satisfaction, because the human person freely and voluntarily "makes good" to God the injury done by sin; such reparation is an action that is also meritorious of grace. But the soul of the departed person is no longer in the state of the wayfarer and can no longer perform satisfactory or meritorious works. Such a soul can only give satisfaction for its sins, that is, accept willingly the sufferings imposed by God for its sins. This is not to say that the sufferings of purgatory imply only passivity on the part of the souls detained there. They are rather an activity of the person under the influence of God. But there is a passive acceptance of this purification because it does not depend upon the free decision of the departed soul, but is dispensed by divine decree. This suffering, however, does not fall upon the soul as if it were a stone or a piece of wood. It is rather accepted readily and even joyfully.

State of the Souls in Purgatory. The treatment of this point can be divided into two parts: (1) the souls are confirmed in grace; (2) they are certain of salvation.

Confirmation in Grace. The theological ground for this assertion is the condemned proposition of Luther that states: "The souls in purgatory sin without intermission so long as they crave for rest or shrink from pain" (Denz 1489). Merit and demerit are no longer possible for the soul; the end of the earthly pilgrimage has been reached and the soul is assured that it will possess God. This assurance excludes any feelings of anguish or horror in the soul. The earliest Christian inscriptions and the liturgy constantly repeat that the departed souls "rest in the sleep of peace." Thus Luther was mistaken in attributing to them despair, anguish, and horror at the punishments they undergo. Their sufferings, as noted above, are rather undergone voluntarily and accepted as the means that will enable them to join God. This does not lessen the pain they endure, but it does render impossible any anguish or despair on their part.

Certitude of Salvation. Whether the fact of their salvation becomes known to the departed souls through the particular judgment or by any other means, it is plain that this awareness is one of the greatest joys of purgatory, preventing it from being merely a place of torture and suffering. These souls have, in substance, already achieved salvation; nothing more can imperil their final happiness, though they are not yet in possession of the beatific vision. The fact that they must still undergo a period of suffering to remove the last dross and imperfection remaining from their mortal life does not prevent an intense joy in the near anticipation of their full union with God. If they are suffering from a purifying fire, these souls are nonetheless inflamed by the Holy Spirit, who animates them as members of Christ's Mystical Body wholly given over to the Spirit. It is His strength and love that have taken complete hold of their souls and nothing can disengage them from His grasp. The suffering is there, indeed, but it is tempered by a joy and a love that literally place it beyond the power of earthly language or concepts.

Prayers for the Dead. Besides the existence of purgatory, the only other revealed dogma concerning it is that the souls in purgatory can be helped by the prayers of the faithful on earth. The basis for this assertion is the communion of saints, the community of all those who are joined in Christ, whether in heaven, purgatory, or on earth. This means that the action of any member of this community affects all others in it, although the manner in which this is accomplished is hidden in the mystery of the divine wisdom. Concretely, the souls in purgatory can be helped by works of piety, such as prayer, indulgences, alms, fasting, and sacrifices. These works are undertaken by the faithful on earth in the Spirit of Love, who also fills and animates the souls in purgatory, and they are performed for the benefit of these souls. While one cannot dictate that God apply the satisfactory value of one's personal works to the poor souls, one may certainly hope that God will hear one's petitions and help the members of the Church suffering. Because the application of these good works depends on one's petition to God, there is no infallible assurance that one's prayers help an individual soul in purgatory, or any one of them, here and now. But the mercy and love of God for the souls in purgatory, who are already so close to God, surely prompt God to speed their release from the period of purification when the faithful on earth direct their prayers to this purpose.

See Also: DEAD, PRAYERS FOR THE; FIRE OF JUDGMENT; GUILT (THEOLOGY OF); JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THEOLOGY); POOR SOULS; SANCTION, DIVINE; ESCHATOLOGY, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: For further information consult esp. the first three works. A. MICHAEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 13.1:1164–1326. K. RAHNER et al., *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:49–55. J. F. SAGÜÉS, De novissimis, Sacrae theologiae summa, ed. FATHERS OF THE SOCIETY OF JESUS. PROFESSORS OF THE THEOLOGICAL FACULTIES IN SPAIN (4th ed. Madrid 1962) 4:861–1061. M. SCHMAUS, Von den letzten Dingen (his Katholische Dogmatik 4.2; 5th ed. Munich 1959) 511–541. J. P. ARENDZEN, Purgatory and Heaven (New York 1960). R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, Life Everlasting, tr. P. CUMMINS (St. Louis 1952). R. W. GLEASON, The World to Come (New York 1958). M. JUGIE, Purgatory and the Means to Avoid It, tr. M. G. CARROLL (Westminster, Md. 1949). A. WINKLHOFER, The Coming of His Kingdom, tr. A. V. LITLEDAL (New York 1963). M. F. EGAN, "The Two Theories of Purgatory," The Irish Theological Quarterly 17 (Dublin 1922) 24–34. P. FRANSEN, "The Doctrine of Purgatory," The Eastern Churches Quarterly 13 (Ramsgate 1959) 99–112. V. KERNS, "The Traditional Doctrine of Purgatory," The Irish Ecclesiastical Record 80 (Dublin 1953) 326–342. J. LE GOFF, The Birth of Purgatory tr. A. GOLDHAMMER (Chicago 1984).

[R. J. BASTIAN]

PURGATORY, ST. PATRICK'S

A famous place of pilgrimage on the island of Lough Derg, County Donegal, Ireland. Although St. PATRICK preached in the neighborhood, his connection with the island remains obscure. The pilgrimage dates probably from the 12th century, when a community of Canons Regular of St. Augustine settled on Saints' Island in the lake. Jocelin of Furness, Henry of Saltrey, GIRALDUS CAMBRENSIS, and others made the little sanctuary known to the great European public. According to legend, an Irish knight named Owen (c. 1153) was condemned to do penance on the island and while so doing had a terrifying vision of purgatorial punishments. By 1186 the pilgrimage was efficiently organized. Each pilgrim had to be accepted beforehand by the bishop of the diocese. He then proceeded to Saints' Island, whence, after nine days, he was rowed to Station Island, where he spent a day and a night in the purgatorial cave. He then returned to Saints' Island for another nine days of prayer and penance. Pilgrims from France, Hungary, Portugal, and England left exciting accounts of their experiences and visions.

Alexander VI's order (1497) to close the cave was carried out to the letter: the cave then in use was rejected as spurious, but another was opened nearby. The pilgrimage was never interrupted, though the cave, the chapel, and all buildings were destroyed by order of the government in Dublin in 1632. By that time the Franciscans had replaced the Canons Regular as spiritual directors. A new arrangement of the exercises is mentioned by the papal nuncio to England, Chiericati, who made the pilgrimage in 1517. The cave remained in use until about 1790, when it was replaced by a chapel large enough to accommodate the ever-increasing number of pilgrims. A priest of the Diocese of Clogher, nominated prior by the bishop, succeeded the Franciscans as director. The three-day order of exercises still observed is based on a scheme drawn up in 1613. The season begins on June 1 and ends on August 15.

Bibliography: S. LESLIE, Saint Patrick's Purgatory (London 1932). A. CURTAYNE, Lough Derg: St. Patrick's Purgatory (London 1944). GEORGIUS MILES DE HUNGARIA, Visiones Georgii, ed. L. L. HAMMERICH (Copenhagen 1930). D. O'CONNOR, St. Patrick's Purgatory, Lough Derg (Dublin 1895).

[J. RYAN]

PURIFICATION

In primitive culture there is widespread belief in a mysterious supernatural energy, a sort of occult, more or less immaterial dynamic power, that attaches to persons and things and produces effects beyond the normal course of nature. In itself, this power is neutral; whether it is to be good or evil depends on how it comes into contact with man. It can be approached by especially qualified persons, but it must be avoided by others. It is taboo, that is, forbidden as being fraught with mystic danger. Being transmissible, it clings to an individual who has come into contact with it, and it can spread from him to others like an infectious disease. When a state of taboo has not been avoided or cannot be avoided, a man of primitive culture seeks an antidote or disinfectant for it by means of purification.

Methods. Since the pollution is conceived of as being material in character, the methods employed in removing it are of the same nature as those used in the cleansing and decontamination of material objects: ablution, or use of such detergents as clay, mud, charcoal, ashes, dung, eggs, wool, fleece of animals; burning; fumigation; shaving of the hair; change of clothes; use of emetics; etc. Often an abstergent is obtained from a particular source that is thought to possess especially powerful purificatory qualities, e.g., sea water or water drawn from a certain river, pool, or spring. Besides these means of purification there are many others. Noise, produced by various implements, is used to drive out the evil thing that has caused the pollution (exorcism). Persons in a state of uncleanness are required to confess their particular kind of taboo-breaking. Sometimes the accumulated pollution of a community is transferred to an animal or a human scapegoat, which is then expelled from the settlement or, less commonly, killed. Survivals of this simple primitive conception of purification were "the emissary goat" of Leviticus (16.7–10, 26), which, after having been declared laden with all the transgressions of Israel, was driven into the desert, and the pharmakoi of ancient Greece, who, by carrying away pollution, brought "remedy" to the city.

Ceremonies. Ceremonies of purification accompany primitive man from the cradle to the grave. The need for them is felt especially at the critical points of human life—birth, adolescence, marriage, and death—when man is thought to be more exposed than at other times to the attacks of dangerous forces. These crucial moments in human life are therefore surrounded by a series of purificatory rites. Thus a house in which a death occurs becomes defiled and, after the corpse has been carried out for burial, must be cleansed with fire or smoke or by a ritualistic sweeping. Likewise, all persons who have come into contact with the corpse must purify themselves by washing in water or a potent medicine prepared for this purpose. These proceedings may be repeated several times over a certain period.

Originally, then, purifications are intended to ward off evil forces. In the religions of the higher civilizations, this initially merely negative-apotropaic aim becomes in a further, quite natural development of the same idea transformed into a positive one. To be free from the disturbing influences of such pernicious powers also means to be in a state of purity, which seems to be necessary for persons who want to enter into communion with the divine. As a result, the old-fashioned, time-honored purificatory practices are elevated to a command of the gods who above all require purity from their worshippers.

Ritual Purity. In this way, there arises the idea of "ritual purity." Anything ritually impure antagonizes the deity, especially anything connected with foreign or suppressed cults and rival demonic powers. Uncleanness, it is true, is here still conceived of as something material, as an infection that can be remedied by the external removal of the evil thing. But, by putting the notions of the pure and the holy side by side and by shaping the more elevated ideas of the divine and the demonic, of the sacred and the accursed, religion plants the seeds out of which grows the moral concept of purity. In this refining and spiritualizing process the cathartic rites, though retaining their traditional outward forms, assume more and more a purely symbolic meaning.

A Japanese boy offering water for purification, a Shinto shrine, Tokyo, Japan. (©G. John Renard)

Bibliography: E. N. FALLAIZE et al., Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, ed. J. HASTINGS (Edinburgh 1908–27) 10:455–505. R. HINK and R. RENDTORFF, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 5:939–944, 946–948. E. STIGLMAYR and W. KORNFELD, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1143–44, 1145–47. W. KORNFELD, ibid. 1150–51. L. HAMBURG, καθαρμός, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. (Stuttgart 1893—) 10.2 (1919) 2513–19. G. VAN DER LEEUW, Religion in Essence and Manifestation, tr. J. E. TURNER (London 1938) 343–349 (par. 49). J. DÖLLER, Die Reinheits—und Speisegesetze des Alten Testaments in religionsgeschichtlicher Beleuchtung (Münster 1917). E. ROHDE, Psyche, tr. W. B. HILLIS (New York 1925). E. FEHRLE, Die kultische Keuschheit im Altertum (Religiongeschichtliche Versuche und Vorarbeiten 6; Giessen 1910). T. WÄCHTER, Reinheitsvorschriften im griechischen Kult (ibid. 9.1; Giessen 1910). K. LATTE, “Lustratio,” in Römische Religionsgeschichte (Munich 1960). H. WEBSTER, Taboo (Stanford, Calif. 1942).

[R. ARBESMANN]

PURIFICATION (IN THE BIBLE)

In biblical usage the term “purification” refers to a certain rite in the external worship of God. Purification seeks to remove legal uncleanness so that the purified individual may resume normal activity in society. Special holiness arising from close contact with divine things is also something that at times requires subsequent purification.

The rites of purification are found chiefly in the section of the Priestly Code known as the Law of Purity (Lv 11–16). This postexilic codification of rituals of the period of the second Temple contains much ancient material that is used to emphasize both the separation of the Israelites from pagan peoples and the holiness of Yahweh.

Origin. The origin of these rites is lost in antiquity, since they are based on the notions of pure and impure that stem from primitive ideas of tabu (see PURE AND IMPURE). There are indications in the Bible that this distinction between the clean and unclean, with the consequent need of purification, was present among the patriarchs and must have been inherited from the common Semitic culture (e.g., Gn 31.35; 1 Sm 20.26). Exposure to contamination was presented by the prophets as a punishment of Yahweh for the infidelity of the people (Am 7.17; Hos 9.3–4; Ez 4.13–14). Although purification had such origins, it must likewise be recognized that the rites received a much deeper significance in the light of the covenant and of the development of religious ideas. Accordingly, a metaphorical interpretation is given to a ritual action in Ps 50(51).9.

Types. The rites of purification in the Bible are of different types and degrees. There are, first of all, simple ablutions and temporary quarantine (Lv 11.25; Dt 23.12). Then there are purifications brought about by ablution with specially prepared water (Nm 19.11–22; 31.23). The preparation of this lustral water (Nm 19.1–10) is itself related to ancient customs known to have existed in Arabia. Finally, there are purifications accomplished by letting a determined period of time pass and then offering a prescribed sacrifice (Lv 12.6–7), or by ablutions, lapse of time, and the offering of such a sacrifice (Lv 15.13–15).

The distinction between these various rites is not based on a notion of the voluntary or involuntary occurrences of contamination, as can be seen from the fact that the same rite is used for both types (cf. Lv 15.8 with Lv 11.40). Their differences may be explained as the concurrence of various traditions and a heightened sense of moral guilt leading to the use of sacrifices of expiation even for occurrences that were not voluntary (Lv 15.13–15; Lv 15.28–29).

The legal uncleanness that is to be removed by these rites may be divided into several distinct categories that have a certain aura of mystery about them. The first of these is connected with the functions of reproduction or sexual activity. Sexual intercourse itself renders the parties unclean and requires the purification of simple ablution and lapse of time (Lv 15.18), a tradition evidenced also in Ex 19.15. Nocturnal emissions or any unnatural flow is a cause of uncleanness requiring the purification of ablution and lapse of time (Lv 15.2–12; Dt 23.10). The same is true for the menstrual flow or any unnatural flow affecting women (Lv 15.19–27). Childbirth results in a legal contamination that is purified by passage of time and the offering of sacrifice (Lv 12.2–5).

Another category of legal uncleanness results from contact with dead bodies, whether of animals or human beings (Lv 11.24–25, 39–40; Nm 19.11–20). It is notable that in the tradition of Numbers, the purification is accomplished with the specially prepared lustral water mentioned above. The contamination from these dead bodies, as from all unclean objects, can be transmitted either directly or indirectly so that even objects that come in contact with such bodies must likewise be purified or broken, as in the case of articles of clothing or wooden or earthen jars (Lv 15.12).

LEPROSY or various forms of skin disease were a source of contamination, contact with which required purification. Upon being cured, the victim of such diseases could return to normal activity in society only after an involved ritual of purification (Lv 13–14).

Special holiness resulting from contact with divine things was also something that required purification. This is the signification of the sacrifices offered at the term of the NAZARITE vow (Nm 6.10–12), as also at the conclusion of the ordination of Aaron and his sons (Lv 9.1–7).

The rites of purification were used as needed, but during the last centuries of OT times some elements of these rituals were connected with a feast that was a sort of feast of national purification known as the Day of ATONEMENT (Lv 16).

The heightened sense of guilt and need for purification that existed among the Jewish people at this late period of OT history carried over into the NT, where the excessive zeal of the PHARISEES for ritual purity became the object of Jesus' condemnation (Mk 7.6; Lk 11.38). Such concern for purification was prevalent also in the QUMRAN COMMUNITY of the ESSENES, as evidenced by their writings and suggested by the architectural features of their monastery.

Bibliography: H. LESÈTRE, Dictionnaire de la Bible, ed. F. VIGOUROUX (Paris 1895–1912) 3.1:857–861; 5:872–874, 879–880. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible (New York 1963) 1966–67. R. DE VAUX Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions (New York 1961) 460–466. W. EICHRODT, Theology of the Old Testament, tr. J. A. BAKER (London 1961) 1:133–141.

[S. M. POLAN]

PURIFICATION, SPIRITUAL

Studies on the necessity, kinds, nature, and characteristics of purification are based generally on the doctrine of St. JOHN OF THE CROSS. Theologians commonly turn to him in their discussion of these matters, since he provides the best analysis and synthesis within the Catholic tradition of the soul's purification.

Disorientation by Sin. The complex of virtues emanating from the grace with which the first man was adorned subjected perfectly the sensory or lower part of his soul to the directives of the spiritual or higher part, and the higher part to God. Once this order was lost through sin, the lower part tended toward its own satisfaction, heedless of the limits prescribed by reason, and the higher part tended to its own good also, without attention to the order God established. The reacquisition of grace did not free man from this inclination toward his own satisfaction. With great difficulty does he seek God's will only and allow himself to be guided always by the Holy Spirit.

Moreover, every personal sin, small or large, leaves embedded in the faculties, in its own measure, the very disorder produced by original sin and increases the strength of the inordinate tendencies, rooting them more deeply in their subject. The more embedded these tendencies are, the greater is the pain of their extirpation. The restoration of order consequently involves suffering.

The traditional analysis of this suffering and of the process by which order is restored is based on the essential principles of grace and the virtues, and the conditions these demand for their full evolution. Sin is a turning away from God and a conversion toward creatures; the remedy of grace in its full development involves a conversion toward God and a turning away from creatures. Grace, then, is a supernatural force destined to destroy the work of sin and restore to man an image of that first righteousness he possessed in the garden of Paradise.

Restoration through Purification. Purification makes one pure, cleanses one of all the disorder introduced by sin. By means of spiritual purification wrought through grace and the virtues, the forces of the soul, which ought to be employed in seeking God and His will as the last end in every action but which rebel against this supreme order, are redirected toward God and employed in what is for His greater glory alone.

The purifications of the two parts of the soul are also referred to as "nights": the "night of the senses" and the "night of the spirit." They are effected in two ways: through the soul's active efforts (active nights) and through God's special intervention (passive nights).

In the active nights, a man, assisted by grace, strives through his own diligence to uproot all his sinful and imperfect habits. This he does by an earnest endeavor to use his sense faculties (the active night of the senses) and also his spiritual faculties (the active night of the spirit) only as God desires them to be used. Obviously, this involves much privation, and just as night entails the privation of light, so the purifications are like nights for the soul.

The passive purifications or nights are wrought mainly through a purgative contemplation that is God's gift and by which the soul is deprived passively, weaned from dependence upon spiritual sweetness, and strengthened in virtue. Purgative contemplation is an infused, obscure, mystical, or general, loving knowledge of God, which has also as its partial object the soul's own miseries and nothingness. The purgative contemplation of the night of the spirit does not differ essentially from that of the night of the senses, but comprises a more abundant knowledge. Nor are the senses fully purged until the spirit is purified, since all the imperfections and all the disorders of the sensory part are rooted in the spirit.

Purgative contemplation purifies by enlightening a man concerning his own misery and nothingness. The pain of this experience is increased by the illumination received on the infinite purity and holiness of God. Such immersion in the consciousness of his own misery will deprive the person undergoing this purgation of the joy and satisfaction formerly experienced in the operations of the faculties. This impedes the actuation of these faculties and makes every other operation outside this deep awareness, in a certain manner, impossible. Thus, even though the individual will continue, in his intense charity, to tend to and serve God with every effort, he feels frustrated in his effort and abandoned by God. The feeling of being forsaken by God, considering the person's charity, is the most painful part of the sufferings of the passive nights. Moreover, because of this deep awareness of his own misery, he will not find any comfort in spiritual books, or in the counsels given by his spiritual director, or in any other creature. The soul, deprived through this contemplation of all connatural satisfaction in its operations and impeded in these operations, will gradually lose its imperfect habits, since the satisfaction found in the operation of the faculties is what sustains the imperfect habits.

The passive purification of the senses, by which they are, in a certain fashion, reformed and accommodated to the spirit, is common; the passive purification of the spirit, by which the soul is united perfectly with God through love, is rare. The time a person must spend in the passive purifications depends on the amount of imperfection and the degree of love to which God wishes to raise him. Not all theologians agree, however, that the passive purifications occasioned by purgative contemplation are necessary in order to reach perfect union with God through charity.

Signs of Purgative Contemplation. Three signs manifest whether or not a person is receiving this purgative contemplation: (1) He finds that in spite of his efforts he is unable to meditate and make use of the imagination. (2) Deprived of satisfaction and consolation in the things of God, he derives none from creatures either. (3) He ordinarily turns solicitously and with painful care toward God, thinking that he is not serving Him but falling back.

A soul undergoes passive purification not only through this purgative contemplation but also through other sufferings. Thus, for the purification of souls God may allow war, persecution, calumny, imprisonment, injustice, abuse of authority, sickness, accident, poverty, failure, scandal, ingratitude, the loss of loved ones, conflict and misunderstanding arising from differences of opinion and temperament, and even the suffering of death. The constant daily fulfillment of the duties of one's state in life demands heroic virtue, and the burden of these duties may well serve as an instrument of purification. Severe temptations, too, will often form a part of passive purification.

These passive privations demand an active, intense life of supernatural virtue. Without this life of virtue, which withdraws man from what is not God and unites him with God alone, thus subjecting the lower part of his soul to the higher, and the higher to the divine Spirit, there is no purification.

Bibliography: A. ROYO, The Theology of Christian Perfection, tr. J. AUMANN (Dubuque 1962). J. DE GUIBERT, The Theology of the Spiritual Life, tr. P. BARRETT (New York 1953). GABRIELE DI SANTA MARIA MADDALENA, St. John of the Cross, Doctor of Divine Love, tr. by a Benedictine of Stanbrook Abbey (Westminster, Md. 1946). U. BARRIENTOS, Purificación y purgatorio (Madrid 1960). PHILIPPE DE LA TRINITÉ, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932–) 4.1: 911–925.

[K. KAVANAUGH]

PURIFICATION OF MARY

The ceremony performed by the MOTHER OF GOD in the temple of Jerusalem 40 days after the birth of Christ in fulfillment of the Mosaic Law requiring the cleansing of a woman from the ritual impurity incurred at childbirth. This rite is one of several prescribed in the Old Law to render a person pure who has been legally defiled.

The rite of purification after childbirth consisted in the offering of a pigeon or turtledove as a sin offering. (The accompanying sacrifice of a yearling lamb, for which a poor woman could substitute a second pigeon or turtledove, is not part of the purification ceremony itself, but a HOLOCAUST of thanksgiving for a successful delivery.) The ceremony took place 40 days after the birth of a male child, 80 days after that of a female (Lv 12.1–8).

The sacrifice for purification was unnecessary for Mary. However, as a faithful Israelite obedient to the Law, she accomplished the prescription of the Mosaic code by offering two turtledoves. To the ceremony of purification of the mother was joined that of the dedication of the firstborn son who did not belong to the tribe of Levi. The law was fulfilled by the payment of five shekels to "redeem" the child—to have a LEVITE take his place in the direct service of Yahweh. There was no express regulation demanding the traditional presentation of the child to the Lord and it was therefore not necessary that this ceremony be performed by the priests. More likely it was performed by the parents, and in the case of Our Lord, also by Simeon who "received him into his arms and blessed God" (Lk 2.28).

This double ceremony, a mystery of the obedience of Jesus and Mary, was marked not only by the fulfillment of Simeon's desire to see the "Christ of the Lord" but also by his prophecy concerning the mother and child: "Behold, this child is destined for the fall and for the rise of many in Israel, and for a sign that shall be contradicted. And thy own soul a sword shall pierce . . ." (Lk 2.34–35). Anna, an elderly woman, joined in the praises of the Christ Child and "spoke of him to all who were awaiting the redemption of Jerusalem" (Lk 2.38).

The liturgical celebration of this double event originated in Jerusalem, where as early as the 4th century it was celebrated under the title of "the fortieth day after the Epiphany." The feast spread to Byzantium in the 6th century as ὑπαπάντη (the "meeting" of Jesus and Mary with Simeon) and finally to Rome in the 7th century, where it acquired the title Purification of Mary. However, the Roman liturgy still refers in its greater part not to the Purification of Mary but to the Presentation of Jesus.

Feast: Feb. 2.

See Also: PRESENTATION OF MARY; MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1966–67. S. GAROFALO, Mary in the Bible, tr. T. J. TOBIN (Milwaukee 1961). G. M. ROSCHINI, Mariologia, 2 v. in 4 (2d ed. Rome 1947–48) 2.3:136–139. D. ATTWATER, comp., Dictionary of Mary (New York 1957) 232–233. H. J. SCHULZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:66.

[P. J. GAFFNEY]

PURIM, FEAST OF

The Jewish Feast of Lots, in Hebrew pûrîm, is celebrated on the 14th and 15th of Adar (February–March) or of Second Adar in a leap year. In 2 Maccabees 15.36, the oldest historical reference to it, it is called "the Day of Mardochai."

Origin. Purim is intimately associated with the OT Book of ESTHER, which is read in the synagogue on the feast. According to Esther 3.7; 9.20–32, the feast recalls the escape of the Jews of Susa, King Xerxes' Persian capital, from the destruction plotted for them by the evil minister Haman, who drew lots to determine the date of their death, the 14th of Adar. The danger turned into an occasion of rejoicing when the plot was thwarted by Queen Esther and MORDECAI, and the Jews avenged themselves upon Aman and their other enemies. The Book of Esther enjoins that the feast be celebrated annually, preceded by a period of fasting and mourning; the celebration is to be marked by feasting, exchanging gifts, and giving alms to the poor.

Students prepare Purim baskets, Ramaz Hebrew Day School, March 1, 1999, photograph by Tina Fineberg. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The real origin of the feast remains obscure, however. Although the Book of Esther is designed to explain the feast and is called a “letter on Purim” (9.29; F. 11), the passages on the “lots” seem to be interpolations and the book itself is not written as a historical account. Various suggestions have been made about a pagan origin of the feast, but no specific pagan feast can be pointed to with certainty. An origin in some historical deliverance of a group of Eastern Diaspora Jews is possible. It is also possible, even likely, that the feast incorporates elements of a pagan festival, perhaps a new year’s celebration, which the Jews may have adopted. The setting of the story would suggest Persia; the Babylonian loan-word used as the name of the feast and the names Mardochai and Esther, which may be related to the Babylonian dei-ties MARDUK and Ishtar, would suggest a Mesopotamian origin. What remains most striking is the fact that Purim does not appear to have originally been a religious feast and has no original connection with the worship of Yahweh.

Historical references to the observance of Purim occur in 2 Mc 15.36; Est F. 11; Josephus, Antiquities 11.290–295, as well as the earlier witness of the Hebrew Book of Esther itself. A tractate of the Mishnah (Megillah) is devoted to Purim.

Modern Customs. The observance of Purim begins with the fast day on the 13th of Adar (the Fast of Esther). The day after the main feast day is called Purim Shushan, the 15th of Adar, recalling the date of its celebration in Susa (Esther 9.18). When Purim is celebrated in the intercalary month Second Adar in leap year, a limited observance called Purim Qatan (Little Purim) takes place on the 14th and 15th of Adar.

The principal religious ceremony is the reading of the Book of Esther, popularly called Megillah (the Scroll), on the eve and again on the morning of the 14th of Adar. The reading is introduced by three benedictions and concluded by another. When it is chanted, a traditional mode peculiar to Purim is used. The scroll is fully unrolled at the beginning, to distinguish it from Torah reading. The Talmud, which allows the Megillah to be read in any language intelligible to the audience, prescribes that all attend the reading, including women, since it was a woman, Queen Esther, who obtained the deliverance of her people. The names of Aman's ten sons (Est 9.7–10) are to be read in a single breath to indicate their simultaneous death (Megillah 16b). In former times it was a custom, particularly favored by the children, to drown out, by stamping and noisemakers, the name of Aman whenever it was mentioned, thus "blotting out the remembrance of Amalek" (Dt 25.19), the progenitor of Aman. This practice, along with other boisterous variations in the reading, created a din in the synagogue that was not out of harmony with the exuberant spirit of Purim. The Hallel [Ps 112 (113)–117 (118)], customary on religious feasts, is not sung at Purim.

Among the many other customs of the feast, the festive meal in the evening of the 14th is an important one. The joyousness of this feast may be inferred from the rabbinic exhortation to drink until one can no longer distinguish "Cursed be Haman!" from "Blessed be Mordecai!" Special cakes are often prepared for this feast, and where the tradition prevails, special songs are sung. Gifts of choice foods are sent to one's neighbors; when the Purim feast was celebrated as an open house for all, these were brought round and consumed during the long period of revelry. Purim is also a time for almsgiving, which was regarded as a strict obligation for all Jews at this feast. Collections are sometimes taken in the synagogue for this purpose.

Beginning in medieval Italy, probably under the influence of the Roman carnival, and soon spreading through Europe, masquerades and street celebrations also marked the Feast of Purim. A popular but often unruly part of this celebration was the burning in effigy of Aman. The carnival aspect has survived in the public celebration now held in modern Israel. In the Middle Ages dramatic representations of the events of Esther were held on the feast day, and in the 18th and 19th centuries, especially in Germany, there flourished a comic drama form known as Purimspiele, sometimes burlesquing both ancient and modern characters. More recently Purim is the occasion for playlets or satirical farces in the Jewish schools.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 1967–68. R. DE VAUX, Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions, tr. J. MCHUGH (New York 1961) 514–517. J. SCHILDENBERGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S.

BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 8:903–904. N. S. DONIACH, Purim or the Feast of Esther (Philadelphia 1933). J. LEWY, "The Feast of the 14th Day of Adar," Hebrew Union College Annual 14 (1939) 127–151. V. CHRISTIAN, "Zur Herkunft des Purim-Festes," Alttestamentliche Studien: F. Nötscher, eds. H. JUNKER and J. BOTTERWECK (Bonn 1950) 33–37. H. RINGGREN, "Esther and Purim," Svensk exegetisk årsbok 20 (1955) 5–24. T. H. GASTER, Purim and Hanukkah in Custom and Tradition (New York 1950).

[G. W. MACRAE]

PURITANS

Followers of a religious movement whose definition and date of origin cannot be given with precision. The movement embodied a wide range of different sects and communities that quarreled over liturgy, dogma, political theory, and social reform both within and without the Church of England. The effective period of Puritan activity covered the span from the Elizabethan Settlement (1559) to the Restoration (1660), by which time the term ceased to be meaningful in its original sense.

Early Development. Puritanism aggravated the English religious controversy between the advocates of a simpler, fundamentalist church rooted in apostolic Christian times and a more formal, ritualistic, authoritarian church developed since that time. More specifically, Puritanism was an attitude toward religion that arose in opposition to the alleged unscriptural, Catholic forms embodied in the Act of UNIFORMITY (1559) and the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES (1563). The Puritans generally sought to purify the Church of England of these forms, substituting Calvinistic models of ecclesiastical polity and liturgy (see NONCONFORMISTS). Even before the break with Rome (1534), Cambridge scholars lectured and wrote on Continental Reformation ideas, which forced many to take refuge at Geneva and elsewhere upon the accession of MARY TUDOR in 1553. They returned when ELIZABETH I assumed the throne, hoping that she would make sweeping reforms after the Genevan system, but were frustrated at the Crown's moderate Protestant posture and its unwillingness to tolerate dissent or entertain change. Thomas CARTWRIGHT assumed the earliest leadership of one faction, mostly academicians at first, who promoted PRESBYTERIANISM in place of the existing Episcopalian system of church government and who had already found common ground for opposition to Elizabeth's insistence on conformity in the Vestiarian Controversy (1566). This dispute, at first limited to Saint John's and Trinity College, Cambridge, but later involving Puritan-minded clergy in London and elsewhere, arose when Archbishop Matthew PARKER, acting on Elizabeth's order, laid down strict rules governing services and clerical dress. Coercive measures by the Anglican hierarchy followed; Puritan scholars and clergy were suspended; and a flood of pamphlets appeared to support both sides of the question. An illustration of this opposition to religious uniformity may be seen in the publication of the Marprelate Tracts (1588–89). The invention of several Midland authors who used the pseudonym Martin Marprelate, the tracts railed against the episcopacy. They appeared despite, and perhaps because of, Archbishop John WHITGIFT's order in 1586 that all publications be censored. Several suspected authors were arrested, one of them was executed, and most of their books were burned.

Puritans going to church, painting by George H. Boughton. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Source of Faith. The Puritans disagreed over dogma, but virtually all of them stressed the Bible as the only true source of faith and conduct. Puritan divines as well as individual members of their congregations read it avidly, interpreted it as they chose, and thereupon quarreled over the form of church government it enjoined. From this Calvinistic conviction of the validity of private interpretation of the Bible grew English Protestant sectarianism.

Variant Systems of Government. By far the largest majority of Puritans went along with the episcopal system, provided the laity could share in the policymaking process and "popish" forms in the liturgy were expunged. This group of moderates retained general control of Puritanism until the Civil War. Other Puritans, led by Thomas Cartwright, advocated a Presbyterian ecclesiastical polity; they were originally few and largely discredited in Elizabeth's reign. With the outbreak of war in 1642 and the parliamentary alliance with the Scots that followed, the Presbyterian Puritans gained temporary ascendancy, controlling, for instance, the Westminster Assembly (1643–49), convened to reform the church. These Puritans invested ecclesiastical sovereignty in four bodies, the Kirk Session, the Presbytery, the Provincial Synod, and the General Assembly. The Separatists (known also as Brownists originally, and as Independents later on) constituted the third broad category of Puritans. As early as the 1550s groups of persons met in separate congregations (conventicles) to conduct services apart from the Established Church. Robert BROWNE, one of the early Separatist leaders, wrote several pamphlets that advocated the independence of each parish congregation from either a parental, hierarchical, or secular political control. Such Puritans professed the autonomy of each congregation under the sole supremacy of Christ and formed self-governing parishes that supposedly operated on a principle of democracy, but often became subject to the dictates of their elected ministers. From this form of Anne Bradstreet, American poet (c. 1612–1672) wearing Puritan clothing, depicted in stained glass.

Puritanism evolved Congregationalism, some of whose adherents migrated to Holland and America to escape persecution. But others stayed to reap the rewards of Independency during Oliver CROMWELL's administration.

Doctrine and Behavior. Puritans generally shared a belief in predestination and agreed that the Bible was the sole rule of faith and morals to be interpreted individually. They maintained that one's life should in every way manifest a deep sense of devotion to Christ and to duty, and they severely criticized what they termed idolatrous forms, including vestments, statuary, the sign of the cross, the use of holy water and other sacramentals, and the position of the altar (communion table). Puritans also minimized the intermediary role of ministers and encouraged preaching. Caroline Puritans more than their Elizabethan predecessors emphasized simplicity of dress and hair styles, unostentatious ceremony, and music. They also regarded the Sabbath as a day without work, travel, or recreation that might interfere with worship (see SAB-BATARIANISM). Aside from these broad maxims of Puritan belief, they agreed upon little else.

Minor Sects. The Independents warrant particular attention if for no other reason than that they illustrate the heterogeneity of Puritanism. The Levellers, led by John Lilburne, were among the most important of the Independents. They exerted strong influence in the parliamentary army between 1647 and 1649 to effect a republican system of government that recognized the equality of all men, universal suffrage, and general religious toleration. One small faction of Social Levellers, the Diggers, directed by Gerrard Winstanley, aroused far more antagonism and put considerably more pressure on the authorities than their numbers would suggest. They preached an equalitarian, agrarian, communistic social order wherein men might put to use whatever common or wasteland lay fallow, regardless of ownership. The Diggers, like the Quakers (see FRIENDS, RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF), were pacifists and offered no resistance to those who abused them on the common of Saint George's Hill (Surrey) in 1649 when they tried to dig up the ground. Others of the Independents were Millenarians, such as the politically oriented Fifth Monarchy Men and the quietistic communities of SEEKERS. The anarchistic Fifth Monarchists believed that, according to the words of the Prophet Daniel in the Old Testament, four great monarchies (Assyrians; Persians; Greeks; and Romans, who passed on their authority to the Hapsburgs) would be followed by the Second Coming of Christ, who would establish a divine kingdom on earth together with His elect. But they attempted to hurry His conquest by rebellion led by Thomas Venner in 1657 and 1661. The Seekers lived in several communities, principally in Yorkshire, Westmoreland, and Cumberland. They refused to recognize any formal church, set up congregations without any firm leadership, and practiced a pietistic faith essentially similar to that of the Quakers, with whom they had joined almost entirely by 1652. Another parallel of Puritan dissimilarity may be seen in the Family of Love and the Ranters. The former, a very small sect which originated in Flanders, was related to the Anabaptists. They symbolized pacifism and communitarianism in their traditional greeting of a kiss of peace. The Ranters, on the other hand, comprised a wide selection of unorganized Puritans who represented perhaps the most unorthodox elements of the movement. Some of them, such as Lodowick Muggleton, thought themselves sinless Messiahs; others wished to undertake another crusade to the Holy Land. Virtually all of these left wing Puritans suffered persecution and had disappeared by the Restoration, although others managed to survive until the Revolution of 1688.

Opposition from the Crown. No account of the Puritans can ignore their extraordinary role in politics during Elizabethan and early Stuart times or the constitutional changes that resulted from their activity. The Acts of Supremacy (1534, 1559) endowed the English monarch with full authority over the Church of England, and the Act of Uniformity required all Englishmen to conform to it. Since the spiritual sovereignty of the Crown was barely distinguishable from its temporal authority and since the episcopacy supported the Crown, defection from the Anglican Church was a political as well as a religious crime, the more so because of the instability of the Crown in terms of the parliamentary opposition to its prerogatives (see ERASTIANISM). Elizabeth and the first two Stuarts believed that religious uniformity was essential to political stability; so that Puritans and Catholics alike were treated virtually as traitors. Many of the penal laws, especially the Act of 1593 against “sectaries,” were directed at the Puritans. Cartwright and Browne both went to prison several times for preaching Puritanism. Puritans hoped that James I would be more sympathetic to their views, for he had been reared a Presbyterian. For this reason a number of Puritan clergy presented the Millenary Petition (1603) soon after he crossed the Tweed from Scotland. This document, which called for moderate ecclesiastical reforms, such as the right of the clergy to choose the garb they would wear at services, the abolition of sacramentals, bowing at the name of Jesus, simplicity of worship, and release of clergymen from the necessity of accepting everything in the Book of Common Prayer so long as they subscribed to the Oath of Supremacy, James allowed to be debated at the Hampton Court Conference (1604). When Dr. Reynolds, one of the Puritan spokesmen, suggested that disputed religious questions might be referred by the bishops to presbyters, James abruptly dismissed the conference, alleging that Puritans meant to subordinate him to a Presbyterian government. The King then deprived about 300 Puritan clergy of their benefices, thereby setting them and their flocks squarely against him. From that time onward neither James nor Charles I saw eye to eye with the Puritans, who had heavy representation in the House of Commons.

Not one Parliament between 1604 and 1640 acquiesced to the royal will; not one failed to introduce legislation, petitions, or remonstrances to block many of the Crown’s religious, financial, and foreign policies, or allowed the country to forget Puritan ideals. A constitutional impasse between parliamentary “rights” and royal prerogatives, frequently punctuated by lengthy periods of royal personal rule, pamphleteering, and occasional Puritan outbursts, culminated in the calling of the Long Parliament in 1640. Their series of legislative and governmental reforms caused another impasse that erupted into the Civil War and the execution of the monarch, and the creation under Cromwell of the first republic in English history.

Emigration to America. Stuart absolutism in religion, particularly during the administration of Archbishop William LAUD in the 1630s, was partly responsible for Puritan emigration to America. Laud, favoring High Church ritual and strict uniformity, relentlessly attacked the Puritans, as may easily be seen in the lives of William Prynne, Richard BAXTER, and Henry Burton. This persecution caused some Puritans to despair of ever finding a sympathetic ear in England. Those who founded Virginia in 1607 and settled in some of the Caribbean islands went largely for material gain, land, and adventure, but the Jacobean and Caroline Puritans who landed at Plymouth Rock in 1620 and Massachusetts Bay in 1628, who were joined by about 20,000 co-religionists during the 1630s, had left England to establish their own Christian commonwealths in the New World. As their towns grew, a Puritan oligarchy grew apace, and the Presbyterian system established in Massachusetts Bay Colony drove out the Antinomian Anne Hutchinson and the Seeker Roger WILLIAMS as quickly and as ruthlessly as Laud had driven the Presbyterians out. Puritanism proved to be as contentious in New England as it had been in England; the differences among Puritans were no less pronounced under Cotton Mather than they had been under Robert Browne or Thomas Cartwright.

A great academic controversy still rages among scholars of American Puritanism over the influence, for good or ill, exerted upon later generations of Americans by their Puritan forefathers. Some historians credit many American virtues to the Puritan colonials, while others speak only of Puritan oppression, intellectual stagnation, and religious intolerance. The question is not easily answered; but there is agreement that Puritanism had a lasting effect upon the moral concepts of American society.

Influence and Significance. What influences did the Puritans of England and New England have upon Anglo-Saxon civilization? Politics certainly commanded much of their attention, both theoretically and practically. Many of the 30,000 political pamphlets published in the 1640s were written by Puritans, not to mention the thousands of broadsides, tracts, and books they wrote on religious issues. Pacifists, Millenarians, republicans, social reformers, and Levellers were Puritans who created a wide literature that their countrymen read at the outset of the Civil War when newspapers were just appearing. Puritan authors contrived every conceivable political system, among them a fresh approach to democracy, which undeniably germinated under the veneer of authoritarianism that characterized the age. Puritan political agitation toppled Charles I’s divine right monarchy, reformed Parliament, created a republic and, despite the interlude of the Restoration, helped to bring on the Revolution of 1688, the Bill of Rights, and limited monarchy.

Prose, poetry, and the theater felt the impact of Puritanism. John BUNYAN and John MILTON were giants of the age; William Prynne, when read seriously, could be recognized as a master of satire and a symbol of literary freedom. Conversely, Puritan prose aroused such opposition as that in Thomas Hobbes's Leviathan. Elizabethan drama had been far superior to early Stuart drama, which was generally poor, but the Puritan attitude toward actors and plays did much to kill it, at least temporarily, and to leave a stigma upon the stage that still lingers. Sabbatarianism was rooted in Puritanism, and "blue laws" flourished long after the name Puritan was forgotten. It is true that the Puritans' attitudes toward music and aesthetics have been grossly exaggerated. Moreover, the thesis about the close relationship between Calvinism and capitalism is subject to many reservations; yet there remains much about Puritan thrift, hard work, and devotion to duty that rings true. It is no coincidence that many Puritans belonged to the moneyed mercantile or professional middle class during the 17th century. Social class mobility is also associated with the Puritans. The rise of the gentry in the century from the death of Henry VIII to the outbreak of the Civil War worked its influence upon the rise of the House of Commons as a powerful force against absolutism, played a part in bringing on the Puritan Revolution and in the process narrowed the gap between the higher and lower classes of England.

Bibliography: W. HALLER, The Rise of Puritanism (New York 1938). A. F. S. PEARSON, Thomas Cartwright and Elizabethan Puritanism, 1535–1603 (Cambridge, Eng. 1925). M. M. KNAPPEN, Tudor Puritanism (Chicago 1939). C. HILL, Puritanism and Revolution (London 1958). W. A. SHAW, A History of the English Church . . . 1640–1660, 2 v. (London 1900). H. N. BRAILSFORD, ed., The Levellers and the English Revolution (Stanford 1961). A. JESSOP, "Robert Browne," The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900, repr. with corrections, 21 v., 1908–09, 1921–22, 1938) 3:57–61. A. SIMPSON, Puritanism in Old and New England (Chicago 1955). A. S. P. WOODHOUSE, Puritanism and Liberty (Chicago 1951). P. MILLER, The New England Mind: The Seventeenth Century (Cambridge, Mass. 1954). R. B. PERRY, Puritanism and Democracy (New York 1944). P. MILLER and T. H. JOHNSON, eds., The Puritans, 2 v. (New York 1938). P. A. SCHOLES, The Puritans and Music in England and New England (New York 1934). S. E. MORISON, The Intellectual Life of Colonial New England (2d ed. New York 1956). C. HILL, Society and Puritanism in Pre-Revolutionary England (New York 1964). J. F. NEW, Anglican and Puritan: The Basis of Their Opposition, 1558–1640 (Stanford, Calif. 1964).

[M. J. HAVRAN]

PURPOSE OF AMENDMENT

A resolve on the part of a penitent not to sin again. It is not a mere wish, nor is it a promise, but a simple determination of will to avoid sin. In the early Church a relatively long period of actual reform was often required to precede the reconciliation of a sinner. But in the later discipline of the Church the intention to reform was, under ordinary circumstances, permitted in the Sacrament of Reconciliation to substitute for actual reform as a condition necessary for reconciliation. However, there can be no forgiveness of sin without sorrow, and sorrow is insufficient if it does not include a purpose to give up future sin; hence the purpose of amendment is an indispensable part of the true contrition necessary for the valid reception of the Sacrament. Both the Councils of Florence (Enchiridion symbolorum, 1323) and Trent (Enchiridion symbolorum, 1676) expressly associate the resolution to improve in the future with regret for past moral lapses. Although a clearly deliberate and distinct volitional proposal regarding moral reform is more helpful than a vague, undetermined, and implicit intention of amendment, the proposal to improve implicit in true contrition is sufficient in practice to ensure the validity of the Sacrament.

Theologians commonly enumerate three qualities that should mark the purpose of amendment. (1) It should be firm, i.e., the penitent's present attitude should be one of sincere determination to avoid the sin at the cost of whatever self-denial or effort may be required. (2) It should be universal. Negatively, it must exclude any present intention to sin mortally, and it should include, at least virtually, a positive intention to avoid any kind of mortal sin in the future. As regards the sins a penitent actually confesses, his purpose of amendment must therefore extend to all that are mortal. If he has no mortal sins to confess, his purpose of amendment should specifically embrace either all the venial sins he has confessed, or at least some one of them, or some sin of his past life contained in the matter of his confession. (3) It must be efficacious. This means that it must include the intention of using the means necessary to the avoidance of sin—e.g., prayer, vigilance, the shunning of the free occasions of sin. It also includes the determination to make necessary reparation for one's sins, if and when this is possible.

It must be remembered that the purpose of amendment is an act of the will, not of the mind, and it must not be confused with certainty on the part of the mind that one will succeed in implementing his proposal to reform. It is, indeed, compatible with strong doubt of mind. What is required for the purpose of amendment is not actual success, or the certain expectation of success, but a present act of will to turn away from sin. Failure to keep the resolution does not necessarily mean that a person was insincere when he made it, although frequent relapses, coupled with the neglect of obvious, necessary, and easy means may indicate that something is wanting in a penitent's purpose of amendment.

See Also: CONTRITION; PENANCE, SACRAMENT OF.

Bibliography: P. F. PALMER, Sacraments of Healing and of Vocation (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1963). C. JOURNET, The Meaning of Grace, tr. A. V. LITLEDALE (New York 1960). E. H. SCHILLEBEECKX, Christ: The Sacrament of the Encounter with God (New York 1963). J. C. HEENAN, Priest and Penitent: A Discussion of Confession (London 1946).

[J. D. FEARON]

PURVEY, JOHN

Wyclifite; b. Lathbury, Buckinghamshire, England, 1353?; d. after 1407. He was ordained in 1377. Because of his close connection with John WYCLIF, he may have been an Oxford man. He was Wyclif's constant and devoted companion after the latter's withdrawal to Lutterworth in 1381. Purvey was most probably responsible for translating and revising Wyclif's original works for popular circulation among the LOLLARDS. He may have revised the translation of the Bible by Wyclif and Nicholas HEREFORD. After Wyclif's death in 1384, Purvey lived among Lollard sympathizers in Bristol, where his sermons brought a ban on preaching from the bishop of Worcester (1387). In 1388 and 1389 royal warrants authorized the confiscation of all writings of Wyclif, Hereford, Aston, and Purvey, and the arrest of their possessors. A second translation of the Bible (1396) has been ascribed to Purvey, but according to McFarlane, this "rests on slight foundation." In 1401, after some time in prison, he publicly recanted. He was presented with a living, which he resigned after two years. There is reason to believe he was alive in 1407.

Bibliography: M. DEANESLY, The Lollard Bible (Cambridge, Eng. 1920). K. B. MCFARLANE, John Wycliffe and the Beginnings of English Nonconformity (New York 1953). H. HARGREAVES, "The Latin Text of Purvey's Psalter," Medium Aevum 24 (1955) 73-90. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500 (Oxford 1957-59) 3:1526-27.

[J. E. HEALEY]

PUSEY, EDWARD BOUVERIE

Anglican theologian, leader of the OXFORD MOVEMENT; b. Pusey, Berkshire, England, Aug. 22, 1800; d. Ascot Priory, Sept. 16, 1882. His father, Philip Bouverie, took the name Pusey in 1789. Edward was educated at Eton and at Christ Church, Oxford. Elected a fellow of Oriel College, Oxford, in 1823, he formed close friendships there with John KEBLE and John Henry NEWMAN.

Edward Bouverie Pusey. (© Bettmann/CORBIS)

From 1825 to 1827 he attended German universities at Göttingen, Berlin, and Bonn, where he studied under Friedrich SCHLEIERMACHER, Johann August Neander, and other leaders of the higher criticism. He studied also Oriental languages before returning to England, where in 1828 he was married, ordained, and appointed regius professor of Hebrew and canon of Christ Church, offices he held until his death. In 1833 he joined Newman, Keble, and Richard Hurrell FROUDE in their effort to revive the Catholic tradition in the Church of England. Pusey's learning and prestige helped to establish the Oxford Movement as a serious force. His essay, Scriptural Views of Holy Baptism (1835), changed the character of the Tracts for the Times from pamphlets to learned studies. He also helped to found the Library of the Fathers. Despite his somewhat awkward preaching style, his sermons were most influential in propagating the movement's ideals.

Like Newman, Pusey was treated harshly by the Oxford authorities, who in 1843 condemned his moderately Catholic sermon on the Eucharist and suspended him from preaching for two years. Unlike Newman, Pusey refused to despair of the Church of England. Assuming leadership of the faltering movement, he sought to prevent others from following Newman into the Catholic Church by emphasizing that ANGLICANISM retained the sacraments and apostolic succession. While his treatises on the sacraments, The Real Presence in the Fathers (1855) and The Real Presence (1857), defended the High Church position, he attempted to check the spread of liberalism in the church. He tried unsuccessfully to have Benjamin Jowett, professor of Greek at Oxford, prosecuted for heresy in 1863, and he maintained the eternity of hell against the views of F. W. Farrar in 1880. Pusey believed that reunion with Rome was the most effective means of checking the spread of unbelief. His first Eirenicon (1865) asserted that the only obstacles to reunion were unofficial doctrines respecting the Blessed Mother, purgatory, and indulgences. His second Eirenicon (1869) stressed Anglican objections to the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION. Newman's discouraging reply to his appeals, however, and the definition of papal infallibility in 1870 ended his hopes.

Bibliography: Spiritual Letters of E. B. Pusey, ed. J. O. JOHNSTON and W. C. E. NEWBOLT (London 1898). H. P. LIDDON, Life of Edward Bouverie Pusey, ed. J. O. JOHNSTON and R. J. WILSON, 4 v. (London 1893–97), with list of his writings in v.4.

[T. S. BOKENKOTTER]

PUSILLANIMITY

A vice opposed to the moral virtue of magnanimity; a disposition by which the irascible appetite is inclined to desist from works of virtue because a person considers them beyond his strength when in reality they are not. This vice is also called cowardice of spirit. Such smallness of soul arises from a culpably erroneous judgment either overestimating the difficulty of the virtuous work to be done or underestimating one's strength and resources to perform the action. When pusillanimity leads to the omission of an action that a person is gravely obliged to perform, it is a mortal sin; otherwise it is a venial sin. The servant in the Parable of the Talents who buried his talent for fear of the master is the classic example of a person with the vice of pusillanimity (Mt 25.14; Lk 19.12). Pusillanimity in superiors and others having authority can easily be a serious sin because it often brings harm to the common good. It is also very serious if it causes a person to neglect spiritual works that are necessary for salvation.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 133. F. L. B. CUNNINGHAM, ed., The Christian Life (Dubuque 1959).

[R. DOHERTY]

PUSTET

A family of Catholic publishers, whose original home was the Republic of Venice. Probably in the 17th century they emigrated to south Germany, where Anton became a bookbinder in the lower Bavarian borough of Hals, near Passau. He married Anna Scheuerocher, by whom he had a son, Friedrich, on March 25, 1798. Having learned bookbinding under his father, Friedrich started a small bookstore in 1818, and in 1822 founded a separate printing establishment.

As his business prospered, Friedrich founded a publishing house in Regensburg in 1826, which developed into a worldwide enterprise. Its first catalogues show great diversity, with a leaning towards history and religious literature. Regensburg Liturgical Publications achieved wide reputation when in 1845 they issued an altar missal and shortly thereafter a breviary for use by traveling priests. In the 1850s Friedrich associated the firm with the budding reform of German church music being urged by Karl Proske and Franz Xaver Witt and the Pustet Publishing House became its most important organ. Friedrich's zeal earned for him in 1870 the title "Typographus S. R. Congregationis." Among other distinctions, his firm was entrusted by the Vatican with the Editio Typica of all its liturgical works. In 1860 Friedrich turned the business over to his sons, Friedrich (1831–1902), Klemens (1833–98), and Karl (1839–1910). Friedrich the elder died on March 5, 1882. The firm consistently adhered to the policies and goals set by its founder.

[R. TAPKE]

PUTZER, JOSEPH

Theologian and canonist; b. Rodenek, Austrian Tyrol, March 4, 1836; d. Ilchester, Maryland, May 15, 1904. He was professed a Redemptorist Aug. 14, 1856, studied at St. Barbara's Seminary, Mautern, and was ordained Aug. 7, 1859. For two years he was a lector at Mautern, and for 14 more he served as a missionary at Eggenburg and Innsbruck, Austria, before immigrating to America in 1876. He spent the next 11 years in the active ministry as assistant at St. Alphonsus, and St. Michael's, Baltimore, Maryland, and as superior at St. Mary's, Buffalo, New York, before going to Ilchester in 1887. There he taught theology and Canon Law for the remainder of his life, except for three years (1893–96), when he was again superior at St. Mary's, Buffalo, and assistant in St. Michael's, Baltimore. In 1893, in reediting a work previously published by Anthony Konings, CSSR, Commentarium in Facultates Apostolicas, Putzer so revised and enlarged it that it was a new work. Writers on both sides of the Atlantic immediately acclaimed it for its clearness, depth, and accurate scholarship. His Instructio de Confessariis and many articles in Catholic periodicals and newspapers also reflected his wide and exact knowledge, keen power of analysis, and unerring judgment. Bishops and priests constantly sought his opinion in difficult cases of theology and Canon Law.

Bibliography: Archives, Redemptorist Fathers of the Baltimore Province. C. MADER, Die Congregation des allerheiligsten Erlösers in Österreich (Vienna 1887). M. DE MEULEMEESTER, et al., Bibliographie générale des écrivains rédemptoristes, 3 v. (Louvain 1933–39) 2:335–336. J. F. BYRNE, The Redemptorist Centenaries (Philadelphia 1933). M. J. CURLEY, The Provincial Story (New York 1963). American Ecclesiastical Review 30 (1904) 614.

[M. J. CURLEY]

PYRRHONISM

Pyrrhonism is the earliest Greek skeptical movement, originating with Pyrrho of Elis (365–275 B.C.). Fragmentary evidence relating to Pyrrhonism is found in Aristocles of Messene (preserved in Eusebius's Præparatio Evangelica), Sextus Empiricus, and Diogenes Laertius in one tradition and in Cicero in another. Pyrrho himself, once a painter, seems to have accompanied Anaxarchus of Abdera on Alexander's Asian campaign. He may have assimilated Oriental ideas through association with the Magi and Gymnosophists. Democritean influence is traceable in his doctrines on knowledge and the practical life, and he may have had some contact with the CYRENAICS. He left no writings, and from ancient sources alone it is impossible to determine with certainty his philosophical positions.

Teachings. Pyrrho was essentially a moralist, not a dialectical or speculative thinker. Cicero characterized him as an austere teacher of an uncompromising ethic, one who advocated absolute indifference to the circumstances of life. He conceived philosophy as a way of life whose goal was happiness, which for him was a state of interior tranquillity (ἀταραξία). Pyrrho regarded things in themselves as wholly incomprehensible to man and consequently incapable of grounding either true or false judgment; they are wholly indifferent, neither more this way than that. Appearances alone are evident; beyond them one cannot go. Since reasons of equal weight can be advanced both for and against any opinion, the wise man withholds judgment.

Though the true Pyrrhonian did not make truth judgments, he could not be reduced to complete inactivity in the affairs of life. Pyrrho advocated the making of practical decisions not by basing them on the real values of things, for these cannot be known, but rather by following accepted usages, customs, and laws. His program for attaining inner tranquillity entailed, in the speculative order, the total suppression of reason's natural desire for truth; in the moral order it demanded total conformity and the consequent abandonment of personal freedom and self-determination.

Disciples. Timon of Phlius (c. 325–c. 235 B.C.) was the apologist of early Pyrrhonism. In his prolific writings he developed the ideas of Pyrrho and also lampooned the dogmatic philosophers in verse (Σίλλοι). According to Aristocles, he summarized Pyrrho's teaching under three headings: (1) the intrinsic nature of things (they are indifferent); (2) the human situation in reference to them (man can say nothing about them); and (3) the ultimate result (man will attain tranquility). Other disciples were Philo of Athens and Nausiphanes of Teos, the Democritean philosopher who taught EPICURUS.

The movement declined after the time of Timon and enjoyed but small popularity until it was given new life through the theoretical contributions of Aenesidemus (c. 100–40 B.C.) at Alexandria. Sextus Empiricus (c. A.D. 200), the historian of Pyrrhonism, has preserved the ten tropes (τρόποι) of Aenesidemus; these are ways of achieving suspension of judgment.

See Also: SKEPTICISM; GREEK PHILOSOPHY.

Bibliography: F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy, (Westminster, Md. 1946–) v. 1 Greece and Rome (1950). J. OWENS, A History of Ancient Western Philosophy (New York 1959). E. R. BEVAN, Stoics and Sceptics (New York 1959). L. ROBIN, Pyrrhon et le scepticisme grec (Paris 1944).

[L. A. BARTH]

PYRRHUS I, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Dec. 20, 638, to Sept. 29, 641, restored Jan. 8–9, 654, to June 1, 654; d. Constantinople, May 19–23, 655. A key figure in the BYZANTINE CHURCH's controversy over MONOTHELITISM, Pyrrhus was archimandrite of Chrysopolis when he succeeded his friend Patriarch SERGIUS I in the Patriarchate of CONSTANTINOPLE. Like Sergius, he espoused the Monothelitic Ecthesis of Emperor HERACLIUS and wrote to Pope John IV in support of Monothelitism (Patrologia Latina 87:1205). Because of alleged complicity in court intrigue, he was forced by Emperor CONSTANS II to leave Constantinople in 641, and he escaped to Carthage. He was replaced as patriarch by Paul II; Pope Theodore I approved the deposition of Pyrrhus, but admonished that it should have been canonical (PL 87:81). In July 645, in the presence of the exarch of North Africa, Gregory, Pyrrhus held a disputatio with MAXIMUS THE CONFESSOR (Patrologia Graeca 91:287–354), who had succeeded him at Chrysopolis and who was a resolute opponent of Monothelitism. Then, hoping for Gregory's help in his attempt to be restored to his see, Pyrrhus declared himself converted, went to Rome with Maximus, condemned the Ecthesis, and was received by Pope Theodore with the honors of a patriarch. However, after Gregory's death (648) Pyrrhus was induced to recant his recantation. Theodore thereupon deposed and anathematized him; this was confirmed by Pope Martin I (649) and later by Pope Agatho (680) and the sixth general council, Constantinople III. When Patriarch Paul died, Dec. 26, 653 (Pope Martin I had already been condemned), Pyrrhus was restored as patriarch for a brief period before his death.

Bibliography: J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio (Graz 1960) 10:859–877; 11:276, 557–572. V. GRUMEL, Les Regestes des actes du patriarcat de Constantinople (Kadikoi-Bucharest 1932–47) 1:118, 121. K. KRUMBACHER, Geschichte der byzantinischen Literatur (Munich 1897) 60–64. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 109, 295, 432, 439. G. OSTROGORSKY, History of the Byzantine State (Oxford 1956; New Brunswick NJ 1957). O. VOLK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:908–909.

[T. P. HALTON]

PYTHAGORAS AND THE PYTHAGOREANS

Pythagoras (fl. c. 530 B.C.), Greek philosopher and mathematician, was one of the most influential and creative thinkers of the pre-Socratic period. A native of the island of Samos off the western coast of Asia Minor, he is reported to have traveled extensively, but this cannot be verified. At about the age of 40 he fled from Samos to avoid the tyranny of Polycrates and migrated to Croton in southern Italy, where he lived for 20 years. It was here that he founded his famous society. His last years were spent in Metapontum, farther north from Croton, where he died on an unknown date. The Pythagorean society continued in existence for well over a century, disappearing finally in the fourth century B.C.

Pythagoras himself apparently wrote nothing, preferring to transmit his teachings orally to the members of the school. Moreover, the members of the society were supposedly sworn to secrecy on their doctrines which, if true, would militate further against the development of a written tradition. As a result, most knowledge of the Pythagoreans has come indirectly through later classical writers. Furthermore, Pythagoras was held in such high esteem by members of the school that they regularly attributed their ideas to him. Thus, although there must have been some development of the tradition, it is difficult to distinguish the teachings of the various Pythagoreans. Even Aristotle usually refers to the "Pythagoreans" as a common group rather than to Pythagoras himself. The later members of the school included Philolaus, Eurytus, Lysis, Xenophilos, Phanton, Echekrates, Diokles, Polymnastos, Timaeus of Locri, and Archytas of Tarentum, a friend of Plato. The authenticity of the fragments attributed to Philolaus has been questioned.

Basic Principles. The Pythagorean society was a quasi-religious community devoted to the purification of the soul and its liberation from the "wheel of birth." The emphasis on communal life as a road to self-perfection, along with the doctrine of the transmigration of souls, may have derived from the earlier Orphic religious tradition. The members of the society were bound by numerous dietary and other practical proscriptions to purify the soul in accordance with their belief in METEMPSYCHOSIS. Over and above these religious and ascetic aspects, they were also actively involved in political life, which led to the eventual expulsion of the society from Croton. But above all, they placed value on the discovery and cultivation of knowledge, giving the highest place to mathematics. They held that devotion to science was the noblest form of purification.

Unlike the Homeric tradition in which the soul is merely the shadow of the man, that of the Pythagoreans held that the soul is the man and is imprisoned in the body, thus introducing the soul-body dichotomy so prominent later in Plato's thought. It is difficult to reconcile this with the doctrine, also attributed to the Pythagoreans, that the soul is the harmony or attunement of the four elements constituting the body. They also looked upon virtue as a harmonious mathematical proportion in human action.

The Pythagorean system was based on a duality of first principles: the limited, as the source of definiteness, and the unlimited, as the source of divisibility. The entire universe was a harmony of these two principles. Aristotle reports (Meta. 986a 23–27) that some members of the school expanded the basic duality into a table of ten opposites: (1) limited and unlimited, (2) odd and even, (3) one and plurality, (4) right and left, (5) male and female, (6) rest and moving, (7) straight and curved, (8) light and darkness, (9) good and bad, (10) square and oblong.

Mathematical Teachings. The first product of the limited and unlimited was the number one, which in turn is the principle of all the cardinal numbers. According to the testimony of Aristotle, the Pythagoreans identified number with the physical universe. This latter point is difficult to see and has been the subject of much discussion.

Number and the Universe. The theory seems to have been based on an identification, or at least an association, of arithmetical numbers, geometrical entities, and physical bodies. Aristotle suggests (Meta. 985b 31–986a 3) that Pythagoras's discovery that musical harmony is expressible in terms of the ratios of small whole numbers prompted him to conclude that all other phenomena in the universe are also mathematical in nature. Moreover, the Pythagoreans customarily represented numbers by placing a pebble or dot for each unit in the number. In this way the number one became a point; two, a line; three, a plane triangle; and four, a tetrahedron. Possibly because the first four numbers culminate in a solid figure, which is identifiable with an extended body, these numbers arranged in a plane triangular configuration became a sacred figure, the "tetractys," and the sum of the first four numbers, that is, 10, was a sacred number. In this way the Pythagoreans could say that things are numbers: numbers were geometrized, and geometrical entities were incarnated. Though this theory may seem strange and difficult for the modern mind, it embodies a hope and an ideal of perennial recurrence, that is, the reduction of the physical universe to mathematical structure. Many of the founders of modern physical science, especially J. KEPLER and G. GALILEI, were motivated by this same ideal.

Types of Numbers. The Pythagoreans were characterized by several further mathematical teachings. Their distinction between triangular, square, and oblong numbers was based on their practice of representing a number by a corresponding group of dots. Triangular numbers (3, 6, 10, 15, etc.) were the sums of the unbroken natural number series beginning with one and arranged in a triangular pattern. The "tetractys" was, of course, the chief triangular number pattern. Square numbers (4, 9, 16, 25, etc.) were the sums of the odd numbers beginning with one and arranged in the form of a square. Such numbers have a rational square root. Oblong numbers (2, 6, 12, 20, etc.) were the series of even numbers beginning with two and arranged in a rectangle. Each successive addition to the latter two geometrical patterns was called a "gnomon."

Pythagorean Theorem. The use of the lengths 3, 4, and 5 for the purpose of constructing a right triangle dates back to the very earliest times. To Pythagoras belongs the credit of universalizing this relation into the famous theorem that still bears his name: the square on the hypotenuse of a right triangle is equal to the sum of the squares on its sides. But this discovery was a mixed blessing for the Pythagoreans. For the use of this theorem results in many cases in the uncovering of incommensurable quantities, that is, the hypotenuse and sides of the triangle are so related that no unit of measurement however small can be divided into them without a fractional remainder. This in effect was the discovery of irrational numbers, a scandal for Pythagorean cosmology. For if numbers are irrational, then so are things. Hippasos of Metapontum was reportedly drowned at sea for revealing this embarrassment. The solution to this problem of incommensurability escaped the Pythagoreans and had to wait for the theory of proportions developed by Eudoxus in the Academy. The Pythagoreans appear to have known only three of the five regular solids: the cube, tetrahedron, and dodecahedron. The discovery of the octahedron and icosahedron, along with the use of the five regular solids as cosmological principles, were later Platonic developments.

Pythagoras. (©Bettman/CORBIS)

Astronomical Views. Pythagorean astronomical theory was both ingenious and highly influential. The universe as a whole is surrounded by a "boundless breath" that is inhaled by the universe after the manner of a huge animal. As inhaled, this breath plays the role of empty space separating the celestial bodies. At the middle of the universe is the central fire, variously called the hearth of the world, the watchtower of Zeus, and the mother of the gods, which is never seen by us because it is always on the other side of the earth. The celestial bodies from the central fire outward are the counterearth (antichthon), earth, moon, sun, Venus, Mercury, Mars, Jupiter, Saturn, and the fixed stars. The counterearth, also never seen from our side of the earth, was posited according to Aristotle either to bring the celestial bodies up to the sacred number 10 or to explain why there are more lunar than solar eclipses. The heavenly bodies are visible as orifices in wheels of fire that revolve at a methodic pace producing the musical harmony of the heavens, which is not noticed because it is always heard. The celestial bodies periodically return to their original orientation in a time interval called the Pythagorean Great Year. Other notable elements in the theory were the doctrine of the sphericity of the earth and the distinction between the diurnal westward motion of the heavens and the slower eastward motion of planets. These astronomical views are very prominent in Plato's Timaeus. The early Pythagoreans clearly did not introduce the heliocentric hypothesis, an honor that must be reserved for Aristarchus of Samos (fl. 281 B.C.).

Neo-Pythagoreanism. The first century B.C. saw a Neo-Pythagorean revival that continued into the second century of the Christian Era. The emphasis in this movement was on the religious and ascetic traditions of the old school, but intellectual pursuits were not overlooked. The result was a rather eclectic combination of Pythagoreanism with Stoic, Aristotelian, and especially Platonic elements. The chief figures in Neo-Pythagoreanism were Nigidius Figulus, Plutarch of Chaeronea, Apollonius of Tyana, Nicomachus of Gerasa, Numenius of Apamea, and Philostratus of Lemnos.

See Also: GREEK PHILOSOPHY; SCIENCE (IN ANTIQUITY).

Bibliography: W. K. GUTHRIE, A History of Greek Philosophy (Cambridge, Eng. 1962-) v. 1. J. BURNET, Early Greek Philosophy

(4th ed. London 1930). J. E. RAVEN, Pythagoreans and Eleatics (Cambridge, Eng. 1948). E. L. MINAR, Early Pythagorean Politics in Practice and Theory (Baltimore, Md. 1942). T. L. HEATH, A History of Greek Mathematics, 2 v. (Oxford 1921) 1:65-117, 141-169; Aristarchus of Samos: The Ancient Copernicus (Oxford 1913).

[R. J. BLACKWELL]

PYX

A container for the Blessed Sacrament. It was at first a small wooden box, usually round and with a lid. During the Middle Ages it was sometimes of metal or of ivory; when containing the Blessed Sacrament it was kept at first in people's houses, later in the sacristy, then on the altar, then suspended above the altar, sometimes inside a metal dove. When ambries, sacrament-houses, and tabernacles came into use for reserving the Blessed Sacrament, the pyx underwent a twofold development; by enlargement and the acquisition of a foot it developed into the CIBORIUM by diminution in size and the addition of a hinged lid it became the small vessel now used for carrying a few consecrated hosts to the sick. Nowadays this is the meaning usually given to the word "pyx," though the name is used also for a similar vessel, a metal box that contains, inside the tabernacle, the large Host used for Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament.

Bibliography: J. BRAUN, Das christliche Altargerät in seinem Sein und in seiner Entwicklung (Munich 1932). C. ROHAULT DE FLEURY, La Messe, 8 v. (Paris 1883-89) v.5.

[C. W. HOWELL/EDS.]

Q

QATAR, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Qatar is an independent emirate occupying the peninsula of the same name which projects into the Persian Gulf southeast of BAHREIN. (For map, see the entry on the UNITED ARAB EMIRATES.) It covers an area of approximately 4400 square miles, with the capital at Doha, on the eastern coast. The land is almost entirely barren desert, with small areas of pasture; only one percent is arable. Before 1949, Qatar's main source of income was from pearl fisheries on the coast; after that date, it became an important producer of petroleum. In World War I, when its bonds with the Ottoman Empire were broken, it became an independent sheikdom under British protection; it became an independent state and a member of the United Nations on September 3, 1971.

The vast majority of Qatari people are Muslim (95 percent). The majority of Catholics are foreign workers. Qatari Catholics are under the jurisdiction of the Apostolic Vicariate of Arabia, with its seat in Abu Dhabi, in the neighboring United Arab Emirates.

[L. F. HARTMAN/EDS.]

QUADRAGESIMO ANNO

Encyclical letter of Pope PIUS XI on the reconstruction of the social order, issued May 15, 1931, "forty years after" Leo XIII's RERUM NOVARUM. Appearing in the depths of the worldwide depression which began in 1929, it attracted immediate attention as a critique of the prevailing economic system and as a program of institutional reform. A generation later, in MATER ET MAGISTRA, John XXIII summed up its teaching as twofold: First, the supreme criterion in economic matters "must not be the special interests of individuals or groups, nor unregulated competition, economic despotism, national prestige or imperialism, nor any other aim of this sort. On the contrary, all forms of economic enterprise must be governed by the principles of social justice and charity.'" Second, "man's aim must be to achieve in social justice a national and international juridical order, with its network of public and private institutions, in which all economic activity can be conducted not merely for private gain but also in the interests of the common good" (pars. 38-40).

Quadragesimo anno begins with a review of developments following Leo's encyclical: the gradual formulation and application of a body of authoritative social teaching, the extension of social legislation, and progress in labor organization. A second section clarifies Catholic teaching on private property, the relations of capital and labor as social classes, the nature of social justice, and wages. The extension of property ownership to workers is advocated as a means toward their security and toward a fairer distribution of the fruits of industrialism. Reestablishment of an order of mutual cooperation among occupational groups analogous to the medieval guilds is presented as a demand of social justice. In this section principles of corporativism are exemplified, although Italian Fascism is explicitly rejected. The final section of the encyclical has a scathing indictment, not of the capitalist system as such, but of the trend toward concentration of economic power leading to a threefold conflict: within the economy, for the control of the state, and between states. Communism as an alternative system is condemned, and although the trend toward moderation in socialism is carefully noted, its essential doctrine is found incompatible with religion. Men are reminded that, ultimately, a solution through institutional reform will be dependent upon a prior reform of morals and of the Christian spirit.

The encyclical gave a strong impetus to Catholic social action. Attempts to give it practical effect through designs as specific as the industry council plan sometimes betrayed lack of appreciation of prerequisites for social change. But its significance for the development of Catholic thought on the economic order was made apparent by the application and development of its teaching in the pronouncements of Pius XII and John XXIII.

Bibliography: Official Latin text in Acta apostolicae sedis 23 (1931) 177–228. English translation in D.J. O'BRIEN and T.A. SHANNON, eds., Catholic Social Thought: The Documentary Heritage (Maryknoll, NY, 1992) 42–79. R. J. MILLER, Forty Years After: Pius XI and the Social Order (St. Paul 1947).

[R. J. MILLER]

QUADRATUS, ST.

Early second-century apologist, possibly martyr. Only a fragment of the Apology addressed by Quadratus (or Codratus) from Asia Minor to Emperor HADRIAN during a persecution (124 or 129) has been preserved by EUSEBIUS (Hist. eccl. 4.3.1–2). It speaks of the witness to Christ's wondrous deeds by people who had been healed or raised from the dead and were still alive. Quadratus is thought to have been a disciple of IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH and POLYCARP OF SMYRNA (Eus., Chron. 2140; Hist. eccl. 3.37; 5.17). R. Harris has attempted to prove that the legendary Apology of St. Catherine of Alexandria quoted in the romance of BARLAAM AND JOSAPHAT was an adaptation of the Apology of Quadratus, and P. Andriessen considered the Apology to be identical with the Epistle to DIOGNETUS. However, neither of these theses has been accepted as established. Jerome (De vir. ill. 19; Epist. 70) mistakenly identified the apologist with the Bp. Quadratus of Athens who lived during the time of Marcus Aurelius. He has also been mistakenly identified with the Bp. Quadratus of Utica who was put to death in the Valerian persecution (Aug. 21, 259) and was eulogized by St. AUGUSTINE in several sermons as the patron of a church in Hippo Zarytus (Bizerte).

Feast: May 26; Sept. 27 (Byzantine Church).

Bibliography: R. HARRIS, Expository Times 32 (1921) 147–160; The Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 7 (1923) 355–383. E. KLOSTERMANN and E. SEEBERG, Die Apologie der hl. Katharina (Berlin 1924). É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 13.2:1428–31. P. ANDRIESSEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:366, s.v. Kodratos; Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 13 (1946) 5–39, 125–149; 14 (1947) 121–156.

[F. X. MURPHY]

QUADRUPANI, CARLO GIUSEPPI

Barnabite preacher, spiritual director, and writer; b. Induno (Varese), Lombardy, 1740 (1739?); d. there, July 14, 1806. He was superior of S. Alessandro's in Milan and then provincial of the Barnabites of Lombardy. His greatest success was in preaching, for which he became famous throughout Italy. His preaching career began in the church of S. Lorenzo in Rome in 1771, and from then until the end of his life he was occupied principally with preaching in the major cities of Italy, conducting retreats for clergy and laity, hearing confessions, and giving spiritual direction. His writings went through an extraordinary number of editions and translations and were still being published in the 20th century. The Documenti per istruzione e tranquillità della anime (Turin 1795) was given the title Documenti per tranquillare le anime timorose nelle loro dubbiezze in the 30th edition (Milan 1807). He also wrote Documenti pratici per vivere cristianamente (published post-humously, Milan 1807), which was later published together with the first work as Documenti di vita spirituale.

Bibliography: O. M. PREMOLI, Storia dei Barnabiti dal 1700 al 1825 (Rome 1925) 3:387–388. G. BOFFITO, Biblioteca Barnabiti-ca illustrata, v.3 (Florence 1934) 225–234; v.4 (1937) 431.

[J. C. WILLKE]

QUALITY

A primary and universal notion that cannot be strictly defined, although it can be described and illustrated. Its Greek equivalent, ποιότης, was coined by Plato (Theaet. 182A) and was used by Aristotle to designate one of the CATEGORIES OF BEING. It was translated by Cicero into Latin as qualitas. As used in logic, quality denotes a formal property of the copula whereby the PROPOSITION is affirmative or negative. As used by Aristotle and by scholastics in metaphysics, it designates one of the ten categories and means an ACCIDENT (e.g., intelligent, white, robust) that makes an already essentially determined SUBSTANCE (e.g., man) to be of a certain kind. In modern philosophy, and generally in contemporary thought, quality refers to those characteristics of sensible reality whereby the senses are determined; for example, the color, sound, and shape of an object.

Aristotelian Division. According to Aristotle, the species of quality has the following four main divisions (Cat. 8b 25–11a 39). (1) Habits and dispositions. A HABIT is a firmly established condition of some nature. The man who, by repeated acts, becomes truly virtuous, acquires scientific knowledge, or develops an art conditions his nature in a certain way. Because this sort of quality is comparatively difficult to remove, it is known as habit. On the other hand, a condition of the subject that is easily changed, such as opinion, health, or disease, is called a DISPOSITION. (2) Power and incapacity. From the point of view of a nature's ability to operate, one can speak of the power or capacity to know, to will, and to resist pressure, as qualities of the being. In speaking of the powers of the soul, one frequently uses the term faculty (see FACULTIES

OF THE SOUL). When powers are weak, as resistance in soft things or nearsightedness in a man, they are called incapacities or impotencies. (3) Sensible qualities. These qualify the substance insofar as it is capable of affecting the senses, as colors, sounds, odors, hardness (see below). (4) Figure and shape. These are modifications of QUANTITY and tell about the kind of line or figure, as curvedness, straightness, and triangularity.

Aristotle points out that while some qualities may have contraries (as justice and injustice) and some may admit of degrees (as white and whiter), these are the exception rather than the rule.

Primary and Secondary Qualities. This division of qualities has its roots in the works of Galileo GALILEI, R. DESCARTES, and R. Boyle, and was fixed in modern terminology by John LOCKE. The division corresponds almost exactly to the traditional distinction between common and proper SENSIBLES. Common sensibles are the objects of more than one sense, as extension, shape, motion, and number. These are listed by Locke as primary qualities; but he added solidity to them. Proper sensibles are the objects of only one sense, as color and sound; and these in contemporary discourse are called secondary qualities.

The bases of differentiation for Locke and the scholastics, however, are quite different. Locke's viewpoint was the dependence of the secondary qualities on the primary, and his chief interest was in their gnoseological value. The scholastic interest was primarily psychological; its viewpoint was that of determining the formal OBJECT of each sense, or the relating of the proper sensible to the corresponding sense. Locke was influenced by current scientific theories, which stressed the mechanical explanations of the process of perception. For this point of view only the quantitative had mechanical importance. The qualitative as such was looked on as irrelevant, since it was thought to be merely the reaction of a sensitive organism to its environment.

Sensible Qualities. Sensible qualities are accidents that inhere in and determine corporeal substances and are perceived by the external senses; hence they are classified by their relation to the SENSES. Some qualities, being perceptible by one and only one sense, are referred to as the formal object of that sense: for sight, color; for hearing, sound; for taste, flavor; for smell, odor; for touch, tangibility (pressure and temperature). Other qualities are perceived by more than one sense; for example, extension can be sensed by sight, touch, and even taste. Qualities of this type include motion, rest, number, and shape. Since these are sensed by two or more senses (by means of the proper sensibles) they are called common sensibles. This classification into proper and common sensibles was traditional until the rise of modern philosophy.

Galileo and Descartes. While in some sense retaining this division, but not the terminology, Galileo and other philosophers and scientists after him claimed that the secondary qualities, being merely "apparent" qualities, should be reduced to and identified with their source in primary qualities. These were conceived to be the mathematical dimensions of matter in motion, which were themselves the truly real. When Descartes speaks of any reality he always means a substance (spirit as thought and body as extension) existing autonomously. Sensible qualities cannot be realities in any true sense, even as accidental determinations distinct from and inhering in the substance. For him this would mean that they were forms "joined to substance like little souls to their bodies" ("Letter to Mersenne," 1643, ed. Adam-Tannery 3:648). Although at times Descartes verbally refers to modalities or qualifications of substances, his interest is in substance as entire and present to his mind (Prin. Philos. 1.56; ed. Adam-Tannery 8:26).

Rationalism and Empiricism. Other rationalistic philosophers also enhance substance almost to the exclusion of qualities or accidents. B. SPINOZA could conceive only of attributes or modes of the one divine substance (Ethics 1. def. 4, 5) that do not determine but manifest and flow from the divine essence as corollaries follow a theorem. The monadology of G. W. LEIBNIZ presents a world made up of indivisible substances so closed off from all others that the classical meaning of accident loses all relevance. On the other hand, for the empiricists the notion of substance is an embarrassment. Locke sees it as a "something we know not what" to which qualities belong; G. BERKELEY denies material substance along with the extrasubjectivity of all qualities; and for D. HUME, only ideas are perceived, and substance is suggested by the association of ideas.

Modern Scientists. When the empirical scientist discusses the objectivity and nature of qualities, he enters the domain of the philosopher, whose function it is to determine the categories of being. The scientist himself is interested in the quantitative and the measurable; even in his studies on colors and sounds, it is their quantitative aspects (such as wavelengths) that occupy him. This is as it should and must be. The difficulty arises when he begins to philosophize; when he does, he often follows Locke in the reduction of quality to quantity, in the at least implicit denial of the qualitative. But modern physicists who follow Locke "are deceived about the significance of their own discoveries. In describing perceptual experiences in terms of electrons and light-waves and so on they are explaining how it happens that we see things. They are not correcting our account of what it is we see" [M. Cranston, John Locke (New York 1957) 269].

Reality and Qualities. Since the time of Galileo and Descartes, most modern philosophers (and scientists generally) have conceded the objective existence of primary qualities. Locke very clearly taught that “ideas of primary qualities of bodies are resemblances of them, and their patterns do really exist in the bodies themselves” (Essay Concerning Human Understanding 2.8.15). Except for IDEALISM and subjectivism, this position is generally maintained, although there are further differences in the explanation of how primary qualities are known.

Locke’s Theory. Locke held that the mind has “no other immediate object but its own ideas” (ibid. 4.1.1.). So while quantity is truly a characteristic of reality, it is the idea of quantity that is known and that is asserted to correspond to reality. Scholastics disagree with this and hold that the real (not the idea of it) is the immediate object of both sensation and intellection.

On the question of the reality of secondary qualities there is even wider divergence. According to Locke, “the ideas produced in us by secondary qualities have no resemblance to them at all. . . . They are, in the bodies we denominate from them, only a power to produce those sensations in us” (ibid. 2.8.15). For Locke, then, these qualities are neither the immediate object known, nor are they really objective. The reasons given by Locke for the subjectivity of secondary qualities, closely paralleling those of Descartes, revolve around such considerations as the way in which a jewel changes color in slightly different light conditions, or with the change of the observer’s viewpoint; the fact that the same water can feel warm to one hand, cool to the other; that pounding an almond changes its color and taste; and so on.

Berkeley’s View. Berkeley insisted that any argument against the objectivity of secondary qualities told even more strongly against the primary, and he concluded that all are equally subjective. The fact of the matter seems to be that if once it is conceded that ideas are the only immediate objects of the mind, one is in the strange position of never being able to know whether or not they do conform to anything “outside.” In fact, in that case Berkeley might be right in looking on the outside as an unnecessary duplication, existing to no purpose. At least, if one is shut up in himself with only his ideas to contemplate, the opportunity will never be offered him to compare them with the “originals.” He will then be in the position of sensing various “signals” and having no way to discriminate between them as purely subjective or truly objective.

Scholastic Teaching. Scholastics, while disputing among themselves about the nature of sensible qualities, do agree that: (1) they are not something merely subjective, but really exist in objects; (2) there is an accidental determination in the object, a dynamic extrasubjective quality, that is not equivalent to mere local motion (as Descartes held). With these points agreed, they dispute over whether sensible qualities exist formally in things, or merely fundamentally and causally.

“Perceptionists” (Aristotle, the early scholastics, T. PESCH, C. Boyer, et al.) hold that such qualities exist formally in things. Some of their reasons are: that this is required for the objectivity of knowledge as a conformity to what is, that otherwise there is a danger of idealism, and that the scientific objections offered are not conclusive.

“Interpretationists” (J. BALMES, D. MERCIER, M. DE LA TAILLE, M. Maher, P. Siwek, et al.) hold for the immediate apprehension of real objective qualities by a virtual (not formal) assimilation, such as is had between a natural cause and its univocally determined effect. They claim that there is not merely a symbolic, but a true similitude. In this position they see no conflict with a realistic explanation of knowledge as truly objective, and they feel that scientific facts require it. A few of these facts will suffice here: (1) rotation of the Newtonian disk results in the seeing of white, whereas at rest the disk has the various spectral colors; (2) one and the same stimulus, e.g., electricity, causes different sensations in different organs; (3) sound varies with the distance, as experienced in the Doppler effect; this has also been verified of colors. On sound, even St. THOMAS AQUINAS says that “sound is only potentially in the sounding body” (In 2 anim. 16.441). A fuller discussion of the entire question and of other scientific facts is had in J. G. Moran’s Psychologia 1:226 to 252.

Relation to Quantity. In scholastic philosophy both quality and QUANTITY are said to be absolutely inherent accidents; that is, they are not relative to anything outside the substance they modify. Thus shape and color, considered in themselves, merely modify the substance and bespeak no relation to another being. Other accidents, such as ACTION AND PASSION, for example, are relative.

Moreover, quantity and quality are intimately related both metaphysically and noetically. Metaphysically, quantity is the ground for the sensible qualities. By this is meant that, while all accidents properly inhere in and are sustained in being by substance, yet no sensible quality exists except as extended; thus all qualities such as color, sound, and odor require a substance that is already quantified. In the order of knowledge it is in virtue of qualities that quantity is grasped. The eye, for example, is actuated by color, and it sees extension or shape by virtue of the color. With one’s back to the ocean, one can not only hear the sound of the waves, but can perceive also their magnitude. So, while sensible qualities are the primary object of the senses, these also sense the species of quantity.

Intensification of Qualities. Because physical qualities are rooted in quantity, they are indirectly quantified through the quantity of the subject in which they exist. Apart from this, however, qualities can be quantified also by reason of their intensity, which is sometimes referred to as their quantity of perfection or of power. This quantification is essentially different from that of dimensive quantity and undergoes intensification and diminution in a special way.

Dimensive quantity is increased through simple addition (and diminished through subtraction) of homogeneous parts; thus the difference of two lengths is another length. This is true also of the quantity of a quality that is based upon the quantity of the subject in which the quality inheres; in this way, the quantity of heat is increased by the simple addition or juxtaposition of hot bodies. On the other hand, the intensity of qualities, not being additive or divisible with respect to homogeneous parts, is not increased or diminished in this way. Rather it is increased or decreased by the intensification or remission of the qualitative form, i.e., by a greater or less actualization of the quality in the subject in which it is found. This is how a body becomes hotter, with a greater intensity of heat than it had previously. Such intensification is not divisible in the same sense as extensive quantity. Thus the difference between two intensities is not an intensity of the same kind; for example, the difference in heat intensity between water at 100°C and water at 80°C is not the heat intensity found in water at 20°C. This difference between the dimensive and intensive quantities of qualities becomes of special significance when one attempts the measurement of qualities.

Measurement of Qualities. Since measurement has primarily to do with size, movements, weight, and the like, it is more proximately related to quantity than it is to quality. Yet the radication of quality in quantity provides one basis for speaking of the measurable aspects of quality. Another indirect way in which qualities can be measured, and particularly their intensification, is through the effect that they produce on another body, usually called an instrument. It is in this way that the physicist measures quantitative aspects of the intensities of heat, sound, color, and so forth. The psychologist similarly measures the effects of qualities on sense receptors in terms of their response to changes either in the environment or in the individual himself.

Modern psychophysics, prescinding from the philosophical aberrations of some of its exponents, is primarily interested in studying the correlations between the physical properties of stimuli and the psychological reactions of the organism to the various stimuli, in the hope of finding laws relating these measurements. Studies along these lines have more or less determined the threshold of sensation, or the minimum stimulus needed to activate a given sense, as well as the maximum stimulus that can be sensed. E. H. Weber and T. Fechner similarly studied the perception of increased stimulation. Weber felt that his experiments led to the “conclusion that the increase in stimulation resulting in a just noticeable increase in sensory experience must be a constant fraction of the original stimulus” [P. Siwek, Experimental Psychology (New York 1959) 104]. Fechner sought to express this in a mathematical equation, with questionable results.

Occult Qualities. The hidden forces, powers, or qualities discussed by late medieval and early Renaissance writers are generally known as occult qualities. The period in which these men lived was marked by a thirst for knowledge of nature, without the aid of present-day scientific methods and instruments. Thinkers such as J. L. Vives (1492–1540), deploring the dependence on Aristotle in the study of nature, advocated independent investigations and reflections on new observations. He urged the same empirical approach even in studying the soul. Another, Peter RAMUS (1515–72), also voiced discontent with previous methods of instruction, especially with Aristotelian logic, which he held responsible for the sad state of the universities. The spirit of the times was one of reflection and criticism, of revolt against authority and tradition in the name of reason and freedom, and interest gradually centered more and more on natural science.

Not content with the plodding means of observation and experiment and lacking refined instruments, many sought shortcuts. Some felt that there were latent powers or occult forces in nature that could be discovered and used in the service of man. The way to this was through MAGIC, the use of secret arts, symbols, and mystic formulas; through ASTROLOGY, the study of planetary influences on man and his world; and through ALCHEMY, the magical transformation of metals. Agrippa von Nettesheim (1486?–1535) combined medicine with magic in the hope of learning about nature’s occult qualities in herbs and minerals. Paracelsus (1493–1541) held that the physician must know not only medicine, but philosophy, astrology, and theology. He has to care for man, argued Paracelsus; and man belongs to this world through his physical body, to the sidereal world through his astral body, and to the spiritual world through his soul. So while he urged the correct use of available medicines to treat diseases, he sought to know the secret terrestrial and astral forces or occult qualities at work, and to control them by alchemy and magic. While this interest in the occult qualities of nature was extravagant and superstitious, it did foreshadow modern science in its attempt to control nature. As time went on alchemy evolved into chemistry; magic, into experiment; and astrology, into astronomy.

Qualifies and Modern Science. Because of the attitude modern scientists adopt toward sensible qualities, they generally tend to deny, or show little interest in, the qualitative as such. For example, the nonobjectivity of color, as distinct from measurable wavelengths, is almost axiomatic for scientists, and what can be said of color frequently applies to other qualities. Despite their rejection of sensible qualities, however, modern scientists are much concerned with nonsensible attributes of bodies, such as electricity, magnetism, gravity, and chemical affinity, which scholastic philosophers regard as pertaining to the qualitative order. Some of these were enumerated among the occult qualities by late medieval writers, because they cannot be directly perceived by any sense. Strictly speaking, however, they are not completely occult, because they are indirectly or reductively sensible from the effects they produce on instruments or experimental apparatus.

Granted that these are qualities, a considerable problem presents itself when one attempts to fit them into the Aristotelian category of quality. Most authors tend to locate them within the second species, as special types of active qualities. Thus gravity and IMPETUS are regarded as active powers or potencies, because of their relation to mechanical motion. Electricity and magnetism, on the other hand, are frequently listed in the third species of quality because of their close relationship to light and color, particularly when these are regarded as forms of electromagnetic radiation.

Whether mass and energy should be regarded as qualitative attributes, in a scholastic sense, is a disputed question. Since these are primarily measurements and because mass is traditionally associated with "quantity of matter," there is some basis for including these under the category of quantity. Yet insofar as mass can also be regarded as a measure of gravitational or inertial tendency and since energy is commonly defined as an ability to do work, or to effect mechanical motion, there is also basis for enumerating these among the active qualities. The same appears to be true of other "force fields" studied in modern physics.

The difficulty in classifying these measurable attributes of bodies within traditional categories is explained by the distinctive procedures used in the physical sciences. Although the scientist investigates observable qualities of the material world, his description is usually in terms of working definitions that satisfy immediate needs. This usage, and the conceptual structures he evolves in its process, is pragmatically oriented and does not profess to offer a final explanation of the reality being described. In this way, standard scientific terminology admits of a multiplicity of philosophical interpretations when evaluated in terms of classificatory schemes that are like Aristotle's categories. The continued usage of qualitative attributes by the scientist, however, gives indication of his inability to work in quantitative terms alone and of his implicit admission that physical qualities are the means through which he comes to know the world of nature.

See Also: SENSATION; SENSE KNOWLEDGE; KNOWLEDGE; KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF; EPISTEMOLOGY.

Bibliography: L. M. RÉGIS, Epistemology (New York 1959). F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster, Md. 1946-); v.4, Descartes to Leibniz; v.5, Hobbes to Hume. J. OWENS, An Elementary Christian Metaphysics (Milwaukee 1963). J. G. MORAN, Psychologia, 2 v. (Mexico City 1949). F. SELVAGGI, Cosmologia (Rome 1959). J. GREDET, Elementa philosophiae Aristotelico-Thomisticae, 2 v. (11th ed. Freiburg 1956). R. J. BLACKWELL, "The Methodological Function of the Categories in Aristotle," The New Scholasticism 31 (1957) 526-37. W. A. WALLACE, "The Measurement and Definition of Sensible Qualities," ibid. 39 (1965) 1-25. M. J. ADLER, ed., The Great Ideas: A Syntopicon of Great Books of the Western World, 2 v. (Chicago 1952) 2:513-26.

[R. F. O'NEILL]

QUANTA CURA

An encyclical of PIUS IX published Dec. 8, 1864, in conjunction with the SYLLABUS OF ERRORS, which announced the Jubilee of 1865 and treated of the current errors of LIBERALISM. The opening words recall the care exercised by the papacy in nourishing the faithful with true doctrine and preserving them from error. The document deplors the attempts being made to destroy the foundations of the Catholic religion and of civil society by corrupting the minds of men, especially the young, with a false doctrine of liberty and naturalism and the teaching that civil society must be governed without reference to religion, or at least making no distinction between true and false religions. Pius IX appeals to the authority of the Fathers of the Church and to human reason in combating these errors.

Bibliography: PIUS IX, "Quanta cura" (encyclical, Dec. 8, 1864) Pii IX pontificis maximi acta 3:687-700. H. DENZINGER, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. SCHÖNMETZER (Freiburg 1963) 2890-96. J. C. FENTON, "Humani Generis and its Predecessors," American Ecclesiastical Review 123 (Dec. 1950) 452-458.

[W. F. HOGAN]

QUANTITY

One of the supreme CATEGORIES OF BEING, and as such incapable of strict definition. According to Aristotle, quantity answers the question "how much?" (Gr. ποσόν; Lat. quantum). It may be described as that by which a thing is said to be large or small, or to have part outside of part, or to be divisible into parts. Most philosophers in the Western tradition admit that something like quantity exists, although they are not all agreed as to precisely what it is. Those who may be identified as materialists or as mechanists, such as LUCRETIUS and Thomas HOBBS, regard quantity as a primary attribute of bodies, even though they conceive matter as bereft of all qualities. Others, such as John LOCKE and Sir Isaac Newton, list the quantitative attributes of material entities as primary or universal qualities, evidently understanding quality in the broad sense of attribute. Scholastic philosophers, following St. THOMAS AQUINAS, distinguish between physical and mathematical quantities, i.e., quantities that inhere in bodies and those that are abstracted from them. René DESCARTES, in considering extension the one primary attribute of material substance, also insisted on the reality of quantity.

Those who have denied the reality of quantity have generally done so because of an idealistic theory of knowledge or because of a dynamist theory of physical reality. Absolute idealists, denying the real existence of bodies, and therefore of quantity and extension, hold that mind or spirit is the only reality, of which bodies are only a representation. Immanuel Kant, though not denying the existence of quantity, held that it was completely unknowable in itself and made it a pure category of the mind. G. W. von LEIBNIZ also subscribed to a subjectivist view of quantity, insofar as he taught that reality is composed of simple and unextended entities, or monads, which accounted for the appearance of extension (see DYNAMISM; MONAD).

Many of these difficulties arise from the fact that quantity can be studied under various formalities. For example, it is considered differently by the logician, who sees it as a measure of substance and is concerned with the properties that distinguish it from the other categories; by the metaphysician, who sees it as a mode of being and considers its ontological properties; and by the mathematician, who considers quantity and the relations that follow from it as the proper subject of his science. To clarify these different formalities, this article presents an analysis of quantity as studied in logic, in metaphysics, and in mathematics, with particular reference to the Aristotelian origins and elaboration of the doctrine.

In Logic. The logician, following Aristotle, considers quantity as the first category after substance (Cat. 4b 20–6a 36). For him, quantity is the measure of substance in its material aspect. The logician divides quantity into the continuous and the discrete, although he is not concerned with the actual existence of either, considering only what these terms imply in their signification. Gross examples of both continuous and discrete quantity are available to the senses. A bookshelf appears to be continuous, even though the books resting on it are discrete; whether the bookshelf, upon further analysis, actually turns out to be discrete is not a logical question but one pertaining to physical science.

Parts. As a somewhat parallel division, Aristotle lists quantities whose parts have a position relative to other parts and quantities whose parts have no such relative position. The position to which he refers is the order of the parts in the whole, considering these parts in themselves, which is to be distinguished from position as a separate category, considering the parts of a whole with respect to place (see LOCATION [UBI]). The former position requires permanence, situation, and continuity. Permanence of parts is necessary for there to be order, since a relation of order among parts requires that they coexist. Situation further clarifies this relation: each part must be somewhere—i.e., above or below, before or after, etc.—with respect to the others. This does not mean that as parts they are in PLACE in any proper sense, since only bodies have place. The last requirement, continuity, explains how position properly distinguishes continuous quantity from discrete. By continuity is meant that all parts are joined by some common term. Thus the parts of a line are united by a point; those of the surface, by a line; and those of the body, by a surface.

Instances. As a logician Aristotle gives number and speech as instances of discrete quantity, and lines, surfaces, and bodies, together with TIME and place, as instances of continuous quantity. By speech the logician refers to sounds made by the voice and grouped into syllables that may be long or short; in pronunciation such sounds are separated, thus discrete. Among the examples of continuous quantity, the logician regards time and place as extrinsic measures of material substance, as opposed to line, surface, and body, which are intrinsic measures.

In addition to the above quantities, which the logician considers as proper, or per se, there are also things that are quantified by reason of something else, or per accidens. White, for example, is greater or smaller because of the surface in which it is found. An action is longer or shorter by reason of its duration or time. These and others like them are not considered to be quantified as such, but merely in reference to something else.

Properties. Finally, as is proper to his science, the logician gives three properties by which the quantified can be distinguished from what is not quantified. The first is that quantity has no contrary, such as is found in QUALITY. Second, quantity does not permit of more or less; e.g., one line is not more so than another, nor is one pentad more five than another. Third, quantities can be said to be equal and unequal.

In Metaphysics. The investigation by the metaphysician is quite different from the foregoing (Meta. 1020 a7–34). He treats quantity not as the measure of substance but as it depends upon being. Thus he studies the various modes of being that are found in the quantified. This method of dealing with the quantified leaves out certain kinds of quantity that are mentioned in the Categories. Thus place, as an extrinsic measure, does not indicate a different mode of being from that of surface. Also time, which is quantified by motion, is not considered in metaphysics as a per se quantity, nor is speech, which is quantified by both motion and time.

Definition. The metaphysician provides a proper definition also of the quantified, namely, that which is divisible into constituent parts each of which is naturally apt to be a unit and a particular being. Thus plurality is a quantity if it is numberable, and magnitude if it is measurable. Plurality differs from magnitude in that it is divisible into noncontinuous parts, whereas magnitude is divisible into continuous parts.

Number. Since number by definition is a plurality, the question arises how it can be one and thus a true species of quantity. The answer to this question, involving the notion of homogeneity, also presupposes that number arises from the division of the continuum. That number, as a plurality measured by the unit, arises from such division can be seen from the example of the line divided into two or more parts. The number of parts is given by the application of one of them to the multitude that results from the division. This implies that the unit or measure be homogeneous with the measured, and so a line must be measured by a line, and a surface by a surface.

In this understanding, the unity of number is possible despite its discontinuity, multiplicity, or aggregation. Yet its unity is different from that of substance, being a unity of order. The unity of number is an ordering of all the parts of the whole under one part or unit. Only a material or quantitative multitude is capable of such orderings; thus the numbering of nonmaterial things is an analogical use of the term “numbering” (see MULTITUDE). The last unit of the plurality is what gives the order, or number, to the other units; it determines that the particular multitude be three, seven, or some other number. In this way a heterogeneous whole with homogeneous parts can be expressed as a numbered plurality.

Not every order, however, gives a per se unity to that which is ordered. The unity of an army or of a city is one of order; yet the being that results is an accidental being. This is so because the ordering of these is one of relation only, and relation is not sufficient to constitute an essential unity. The unity of quantitative order, on the other hand, derives from the homogeneity of its parts and thus constitutes an essential unity.

Magnitude. Some question whether line and surface are true species of quantity because of what they call the imperfections contained in these notions. They maintain that just as point is an indivisible and is quantitative only reductively as a principle of the line, so line and surface are indivisibles and thus imperfect quantities. They argue further that these exist only in the body and have extension and measure only because of the body. Thus line and surface cannot be true species of quantity.

The answer to this objection is to be found in the description of quantity given above: that which is divisible into constituent parts each of which is naturally apt to be a unit and a particular being. Since this description is verified of both line and surface, they are proper species of quantity. If it be said that these have this divisibility by reason of body, and are thus quantified per accidens, it should be pointed out that the reverse is also true. Body is divisible by reason of surface and line.

Properties. Objections such as these serve to make the properties of quantity, as set forth by the metaphysician, more precise. The metaphysician sees order as the most important aspect of quantity. It is by reason of order that quantity effects a distinction of the parts of material substance. Without quantity such substance would have parts only in a confused way. The ordering of parts in a material subject, in fact, makes quantity a primary factor in the INDIVIDUATION of material substance.

The order of homogeneous parts is the basis of other properties of quantity: divisibility, extension, measurability, and impenetrability. If such parts are to be distinct, they must be separated, and this requires EXTENSION. If such extension results in an actual plurality, the quantity is discrete and the unity that of number. If the distinction produces only potential parts, the quantity is continuous and the extension that of line, surface, or body. The latter extension, in turn, is the basis of divisibility and IMPENETRABILITY.

Although these properties are real and are founded in the nature of material things, they can nevertheless be separated from their subject. For example, in the Sacrament of the Eucharist, the effects of quantity as well as of other accidents are found separated from the substances of bread and wine, which are changed into the Body and Blood of Christ while retaining their former appearances or accidents (see TRANSUBSTANTIATION). Certain other miracles performed by Christ, as when He appeared through closed doors, would indicate that impenetrability also can be separated from material substance (see GLORIFIED BODY).

In Mathematics. The treatment of quantity by the mathematician is different from that of the logician or of the metaphysician. The science of mathematics considers its subject not only as abstracted from singulars, as does every science, but also as abstracted from sensible matter (see ABSTRACTION; SCIENCES, CLASSIFICATION OF). Such a consideration is possible because quantity is the first accident of substance and, by reason of its role in determining the parts of a material thing, serves as the foundation of all other accidents. Since it is thus prior to quality, quantity can be considered without the qualities that render substance sensible.

Procedure. In his proper treatment of quantity the mathematician begins by defining different species of quantity, e.g., unit, number, line, surface, and circle. With these definitions he demonstrates properties that differ from those of the logician and the metaphysician. In fact, his method of abstracting renders many properties of quantity more evident than those discerned through the more material consideration of the metaphysician. This was one of the reasons why the mathematical arts were called disciplinaes by the scholastics; they are the easiest for the student to grasp, since they require little experience and their proofs depend on constructions that are controlled by the imagination. Yet the mathematician is not concerned with quantity exclusively. As the development of modern mathematics has shown, he can be concerned also with relations and qualities that are only remotely connected with quantity. His science, however, considers these entities in abstraction from the data of sense perception and precisely as they can be visualized in the imagination or through some form of symbolic construction.

Infinity. This explains why the mathematician, for example, can speak of lines being divisible to infinity. In the division of the mathematical line it is obvious that every division results in line segments that are further divisible. This is so because the only relevant consideration is that set by requirements of quantity itself. From the viewpoint of quantitative extension, there is no reason division should stop at any particular place. In the case of natural things, however, some point exists beyond which division cannot continue. In the division of water, for example, a point is reached when further division does not give water but some other thing; thus the division of water is terminated. The same is true for all natural substances, whose forms require a minimum of matter for their existence. This is not true of the quantities studied in mathematics, where one is not concerned with existence in the extramental sense.

See Also: CONTINUUM; EXTENSION; INDIVISIBLE; MATHEMATICS, PHILOSOPHY OF.

Bibliography: M. J. ADLER, ed., The Great Ideas: A Syntopicon of Great Books of the Western World, 2 v. (Chicago 1952); v. 2, 3 of Great Books of the Western World 2:527–545. S. CARMELLA, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 3:1792–97. F. SELVAGGI, Cosmologia (Rome 1959). H. G. APOSTLE, Aristotle's Philosophy of Mathematics (Chicago 1952). V. E. SMITH, The General Science of Nature (Milwaukee 1958). JOHN OF ST. THOMAS, Cursus philosophicus thomisticus, ed. B. REISER, 3 v. (new ed. Turin 1930–37). T. DE VIO CAJETAN, Scripta philosophica: Commentaria in praedicamenta Aristotelis, ed. M. H. LAURENT (Rome 1939).

[R. A. KOCOUREK]

QUARACCHI

Popular name for the international College of St. Bonaventure, a Franciscan center of historical research, so called from its location at Quaracchi, a suburb of Florence, Italy. When the college moved from Quaracchi to Grottaferrata, near Rome, in 1971, it took the name with it and is now known as Frati Editori di Quaracchi, Fondazione Collegio San Bonaventura. The college was established in 1877 by Fidelis a Fanna (d. 1881) under the Franciscan Minister General Bernardino del Vago da Portogruaro for the publication of St. Bonaventure's works. After 1881 the project was completed by Ignatius Jeiler (d. 1904) in 10 volumes (1882–1902). While the work on Bonaventure was going on, the college had already begun work on other Franciscan scholastics. The results were published in the series Bibliotheca franciscana scholastica medii aevi, begun in 1903. At present it contains 27 volumes (Alexander of Hales, Matthew of Aquasparta, Peter Olivi etc.). A more modest series was begun the following year under the title Bibliotheca franciscana ascetica medii aevi, with, at present, 12 volumes. From 1940 to 1966 the college published a critical edition of the writings of Bernardine of Siena in nine volumes. A new series was begun in 1963 under the title Spicilegium bonaventurianum, containing to date 28 volumes. Of special importance in the series are volumes IV and V (1959–1980), with I. Brady's new edition of Peter Lombard's Sententiae; and volume XIII, K. Esser's Die Opuscula des hl. Franziskus von Assisi. Neue textkritische Edition (1976). The college also began editing historical writings in 1893 under the title Analecta franciscana. To date 12 volumes have appeared. A quarterly review, the Archivum franciscanum historicum, published its first issue in late 1907, dated to 1908, and has continued since. The college has published much else, and in particular the third edition of Luke Waddings' Annales Minorum, from 1933 to 1964 in 25 volumes. Recently (1999) it began a new series: Collectio Oliviana, devoted to writings of Peter Olivi, with three volumes to date.

Bibliography: Archivum franciscanum historicum 70 (1977), a special issue dedicated to Quaracchi's history. G. BUFFON, Aspetti della vita e del governo di P. Bernardino Dal Vago da Portogruaro ofm, 1822–1895 (Porziuncola 1997), 657–730 on the founding of Quaracchi and the Bonaventure edition. F. IOZZELLI, "Le edizioni scientifiche del Collegio S. Bonaventura di Quaracchi-Grottaferrata," in A. CACCIOTTI and B. FAES DE MOTTONI, eds., Editori di Quaracchi 100 anni dopo: Bilancio e prospettive (Rome 1997), 21–39.

[I. C. BRADY/M. F. CUSATO]

QUARESMIO, FRANCESCO

Missionary and Orientalist; b. Lodi, Italy, April 4, 1583; d. Milan, Oct. 25, 1656. Having become a Franciscan (c. 1598), he taught philosophy and theology for several years and held successively the offices of local superior and provincial. In 1616 he went to Palestine, where he became superior of all the Franciscan houses in the Holy Land (1618–19). During the following years he was, in turn, vice commissary apostolic of Aleppo, commissary apostolic of the East, papal commissary, and vice patriarch for the Chaldeans and Maronites of Syria and Mesopotamia. Best known of his numerous works are his Historica . . . terrae sanctae elucidatio (Antwerp 1634–39), an account of his travels in the Holy Land, and his Jerosolymae afflictiae . . . (Milan 1631), in which he appealed to Philip IV of Spain to organize a campaign to reconquer the Holy Land.

Bibliography: A. TEETAERT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 vol. (Paris 1903–50) 13.2:1442–44. G. FUSSENEGGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 vol. (2nd ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:923. G. GOLUBOVICH, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al, 16 vol. (New York 1907–14) 12:593.

[D. A. MCGUCKIN]

QUARR ABBEY

Benedictine abbey near Ryde on the Isle of Wight, off the south coast of England; the name derives from the nearby royal quarry. It was founded by Baldwin de Redvers as a daughterhouse of SAVIGNY (1132) with which it became affiliated with CÎTEAUX (1147). Its fervor and importance led to the foundation of Stanley (1151) and BUCKLAND (1278) as daughterhouses. The monk Stephen of Lexington became abbot of CLAIRVAUX (1243). Neither writings nor chartularies are available for the decline caused by coastal raids of the Hundred Years' War. Quarr was suppressed under Henry VIII (1536), and the buildings were demolished to build coastal fortifications. Monks in exile from SOLESMES rebuilt the monastery (1906–14), which became a priory (1925) and an abbey (1937) of that congregation.

Bibliography: F. BURTON, Quarr Abbey (Ryde 1900). P. G. STONE, The Monks of Quarr (Newport 1912). D. KNOWLES, The Monastic Order in England, 943–1216 (2d ed. Cambridge, England 1962). D. KNOWLES, The Religious Orders in England, 3 v. (Cambridge, England 1948–60). Quarr Abbey (London 1960). O. L. KAP-SNER, A Benedictine Bibliography: An Author-Subject Union List, 2 v. (2d ed. Collegeville, MN 1962); v.1, author part; v. 2, subject part. 2:251. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:2385.

[E. P. COLBERT]

QUARTER, WILLIAM

First bishop of Chicago, Ill.; b. Killurine, King's County, Ireland, Jan. 24, 1806; d. Chicago, April 10, 1848. He left Ireland at age 16 to enter Mt. St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg, Maryland, and was ordained for the Diocese of New York on Sept. 19, 1829. After four years as curate at St. Peter's Church, New York City, he was appointed pastor of St. Mary's, where he soon established a parochial school. When Chicago was named a diocese in 1843, Quarter was consecrated its first ordinary by Bishop John Hughes of New York on March 10, 1844. The new bishop arrived in Chicago with his brother, Rev. Walter Quarter, on May 5, 1844, and found only eight priests serving a diocese that included the entire state of Illinois. In less than a month, he opened the College of St. Mary's as a boys' school and seminary. Later the same year it was incorporated by the state legislature as the University of St. Mary of the Lake, and a university building, for which Quarter solicited funds in New York, was dedicated on July 4, 1846. At his invitation, the Sisters of Mercy opened St. Xavier's Academy for girls in September of 1846. The bishop turned over his own residence to the sisters for a convent.

Early in his administration, Quarter successfully petitioned the state legislature to enact a law constituting the Catholic bishop of Chicago and his successors a corporation sole to hold property for religious purposes. To obtain funds for expanding diocesan needs, he appealed to the Society for the Propagation of the Faith at Lyons, France, and to the LEOPOLDINEN STIFTUNG of Vienna. The two Quarter brothers also spent their personal funds to purchase property for churches and a cemetery. In addition to extensive travels throughout the diocese preaching and administering the sacraments, Quarter built 30 churches and ordained 29 priests; he kept a diary that still exists. He convened the first diocesan synod in April of 1847, and assembled what was perhaps the first theological conference in the United States in the university chapel on Nov. 12, 1847. Quarter, apparently in good health, preached on Passion Sunday, April 9, 1848, but died suddenly the following morning. His last will left all his property to the University of St. Mary of the Lake.

Bibliography: J. E. MCGIRR, Life of the Rt. Rev. William Quarter, D.D. (Des Plaines, Ill. 1920). G. J. GARRAGHAN, The Catholic Church in Chicago, 1673–1871 (Chicago 1921).

[H. C. KOENIG]

QUARTODECIMANS

The term “Quartodecimans” refers to those Christian communities in the early Church which celebrated Easter on the 14th of Nisan (die quarta decima), the day of the Jewish Passover (Ex 12.6). Prevalent in Asia Minor and Syria in the second century, Quartodecimans emphasized the death of Christ, the true Paschal victim (Jn 18.28, 19.42), while Roman practice emphasized the observance of Sunday as the day of the Resurrection. Implicit in these two positions is the disputed chronology of Holy Week.

Roman efforts to induce the Quartodecimans to abandon their practice were unsuccessful. On a visit to Rome (c. 155), St. POLYCARP OF SMYRNA amicably discussed the question with Pope ANICETUS without, however, reaching agreement. Pope VICTOR (189–198) sought unity through a series of synods held in both East and West; all accepted the Roman practice except the Asiatic bishops. When Victor attempted coercion by excommunication, St. IRENAEUS OF LYONS intervened to restore peace (EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History 5.23–25). During the third century Quartodecimanism waned; it persisted in some Asiatic communities down to the fifth century.

See Also: EASTER CONTROVERSY.

Bibliography: W. H. CADMAN, “The Christian Pascha and the Day of the Crucifixion: Nisan 14 or 15,” Studia Patristica 5 (1962) 8–16. C. W. DUGMORE, “A Note on the Quartodecimans,” Studia Patristica 4 (1961) 411–421. M. RICHARD, “La lettre de saint Irénée au pape Victor,” Zeitschrift für die Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der Älteren Kirche 56 no 3–4 (1966) 260–282. C. C. RICHARDSON, “New Solution to the Quartodeciman Riddle,” Journal of Theological Studies ns 24 (1973) 74–84. L. SABOURIN, “Easter in the Early Church,” Religious Studies Bulletin 2 No. 1 (1982) 23–32. S.G. HALL, “The origins of Easter,” Studia Patristica 15:1 (1984) 554–567.

[J. FORD/EDS.]

Quarr Abbey, photograph by Gillian Darley. (©Edifice/CORBIS)

QUAS PRIMAS

A papal encyclical promulgated Dec. 11, 1925, by Pius XI to institute the Feast of Christ the King. In setting up the feast, Pius XI wrote that observance of Christ’s royal rights, particularly those over human society, would prove the most effective answer to the challenge of secularism and communism.

Bibliography: PIUS XI, “Quas primas,” (Encyclical, Dec. 11, 1925) Acta Apostolicae Sedis 17 (1925) 593–610. The Encyclicals of Pius XI, tr. J. H. RYAN (St. Louis 1927).

[M. D. MEILACH/EDS.]

QUASTEN, JOHANNES

Patristic scholar, university professor; b. Homberg, across the Rhine from Duisburg, May 3, 1900; d. March 10, 1987. After a traditional classical education at the Gymnasium of nearby Moers, he entered the University of Münster in 1921. Following his ordination as a priest in February 1926, he pursued higher studies, especially in the area of ancient Christian literature and archaeology. Franz Joseph DÖLGER, whose school became known by the name Antike und Christentum, particularly inspired him. Studying the relationship between the ancient world and that of the nascent Christian Church, Quasten came to have a special love for early Christian worship. His work culminated in his doctoral thesis of 1927, Musik und Gesang in den Kulturen der heidnischen Antike und christlichen Frühzeit. A revision of this work was published in 1930 (Eng. 1983).

Quasten was an early student of the newly founded Pontifical Institute of Christian Archaeology in Rome and participated in excavations in Sicily, Yugoslavia, and North Africa. After the preparation of his second doctoral thesis (required for university teaching in the German system) on the Good Shepherd in early Christian art, he began his teaching career as a privatdozent in Münster in 1931. Under the Nazi regime after January 1933, his academic activities were made increasingly difficult, and he was forbidden to teach in the fall of 1937. He returned to Rome briefly before accepting an invitation to join the theological faculty of the Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C., in the fall of 1938. His career of teaching and research continued well beyond formal retirement in 1970, and he offered graduate seminars in patristics until 1977, when he returned to Germany, taking up residence near Freiburg.

Works. Over the years, Quasten published many studies in the area of patristics, especially in the area of liturgy. While at work in Germany, he edited a series of fascicles in the series Florilegium patristicum, which contained Latin and Greek selections of the most significant texts bearing on the early Eucharist (Monumenta eucharistica et liturgica vetustissima 1935–37). After World War II, he contributed numerous articles to the second edition of the Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche and The New Catholic Encyclopedia.

His activities in the United States included the direction of numerous dissertations by his students, and his general influence helped inspire young American scholars in the field of patristics. In the mid-1940s, he collaborated with Joseph PLUMPE to publish a collection of patristic texts in English translation, Ancient Christian Writers (1946–). Another series he inaugurated, Studies in Christian Antiquity (1941–), offered to the wider public important studies by his students.

Quasten's best-known publication is his three-volume Patrology, a standard reference work which details the lives, writings, and theological teachings of the post-Biblical authors of the early Church. Originally published in English, the volumes have been translated into French, Spanish, and Italian, each with updated bibliographies. Though unable to complete the Patrology himself, Quasten wrote a brief introduction to volume IV, the Italian edition, published in 1978, in which eight scholars from the Augustinianum in Rome completed the project. This additional volume covers the golden age of the Latin Fathers.

Among the many honors conferred on Quasten was the Cardinal Spellman award in theology (1960). Upon his retirement from the Catholic University of America in 1970, Quasten was presented with two volumes of essays and studies by colleagues and former students from around the world, titled Kyriakon. A complete bibliography of his writings, along with a biographical sketch, can be found at the end of the second volume.

Quasten's predilection for liturgical history made a significant contribution to the liturgical movement which preceded the Second Vatican Council. His work led him to be named a member of the council's preparatory commission for the liturgy. Next to his Patrology, his principal influence has been the inspiration of deeper interest in the field of patristics among American scholars.

Bibliography: P. GRANFIELD and J. A. JUNGMAN, eds., Kyriakon: Festschrift Johannes Quasten, 2 v. (Münster 1970). P. GRANFIELD, "Johannes Quasten, a Biographical Essay," 921–923; "A Bibliography of the Writings of Johannes Quasten," 924–938. Interview, Theologians at Work (New York 1967) 22–34.

[R. B. ENO]

QUEBEC ACT OF 1774

By the Peace of Paris of Feb. 10, 1763, which ended the French and Indian War, France ceded Canada and Cape Breton Island to England. Moreover, the Mississippi River was recognized as the boundary between Louisiana and British territory. Thus the area bounded by the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers and the Great Lakes, over which the war originated, was added to Britain's continental domain.

Background. Since the Proclamation of 1763 closed this area to expansion from the seaboard colonies, few Englishmen were found there. Various Native American tribes inhabited the district, and there were several French settlements in southern Illinois, at Vincennes, Detroit, and lesser ones elsewhere. With the withdrawal of French officials, civil government ceased abruptly, and only a limited jurisdiction was exercised by British commanders at the various military posts. Before long, serious problems developed.

Relying on their charters, several colonies, notably Virginia, claimed portions of this territory. But they did not exercise effective control over trade with the natives, check the trespassing of squatters, restrain the aggression of land companies, or prevent the inroads of land-hungry colonists, who, in general, defrauded the Native Americans in trade and land purchases. Actually, there was no civil government, no legal acts, no order. This situation could not be tolerated. Civil government and the control and legalizing of trade and land transfers were imperative. Aware of the growing hostility of the Native Americans over the conduct of white transgressors and intent on introducing law and order, the British government resolved to place the area under imperial government in default of colonial neglect or ineptitude. A decade of study and discussion brought forth the Quebec Act.

Provisions and reaction. Alexander Wedderburn, the solicitor general, drafted the bill, which became law on June 22, 1774. It stipulated that the Province of Quebec was to include the area circumscribed by the Allegheny, Ohio, and Mississippi Rivers and the Great Lakes. As a concession to the French settlers and to win their loyalty to the British king, French civil law and customs were to continue, but the British criminal code replaced that of France. Government was vested in a governor and a council nominated by the Crown with complete legislative power. Finally, the act allowed the inhabitants liberty to profess the "religion of the Church of Rome . . . subject to the King's Supremacy," but for the oath of royal supremacy in religion, a simple oath of allegiance was substituted. Furthermore, the clergy "may hold, receive and enjoy their accustomed dues and rights with respect to such persons only as shall profess the said religion."

Apart from the disregard of colonial claims to portions of this country on the basis of their charters, the fact that the Quebec Act was contemporaneous with the Coercive Acts precipitated additional widespread opposition in the old seaboard colonies. The sacredness of colonial charters and their unilateral abrogation by Great Britain was stressed; the sacred right of the new British subjects to the enjoyment of British civil law with trial by jury as well as British criminal law was given emphasis; the absence of representative government was condemned.

But the granting and safeguarding of religious freedom and the right to practice the Catholic religion without interference in this territory evoked the loudest and most bitter denunciation. On this aspect of the act, rather than on disregard of colonial charters or virtual exclusion of British traders and prospective colonists, opposition was concentrated. The act was held to equate "establishment" of the Catholic religion and to be a violation of the royal coronation oath.

While opposition to this section of the act was general, New England, and in particular Boston and Newport, led the forefront of the crusade against popery. Writers and speakers professed to see in the act a threat to the Protestant religion and a subtle device eventually to impose popery on themselves. Some zealots joined in the campaign out of conviction, while others had less worthy motives; they simply seized the opportunity to participate in the traditional propaganda against popery and the Catholic religion. This flood of sustained criticism from clergy and men prominent in civil life became at least a contributory cause, and, for some individuals, a primary cause, for the break with England.

Effects. Unquestionably, the Quebec Act was influential in reconciling the French in Canada to their new rulers and new regime and in fostering the loyalty of priests and seigneurs during the American Revolution. When the two groups came to know of the volume of abuse of their religion in the press of the older British colonies and the pulpits of Protestant churches, and of the double-dealing of the Continental Congress in its several addresses, association or cooperation with the American patriots was precluded. It has been maintained that even today the French in Canada regard the Quebec Act as their Magna Carta of liberty. And a distinguished historian has recently lauded this remarkable act of parliament as "one of the greatest pieces of statesmanship in the history of the empire" [A. L. Burt, The British Commonwealth (Boston 1956) 39.]

Bibliography: R. COUPLAND, The Quebec Act: A Study in Statesmanship (Oxford 1925). C. H. METZGER, The Quebec Act (U.S. Catholic Historical Society 16; New York 1936). A. L. BURT, The Old Province of Quebec (Minneapolis, Minn. 1933). J. SOSIN, Whitehall and the Wilderness (Lincoln, Neb. 1961) ch. 10.

[C. H. METZGER]

QUEDLINBURG, CONVENT OF

Former Benedictine (936) and Lutheran convent (1539–40) in Saxony, Diocese of Halberstadt (patrons, SS. Servatius and Dionysius). It was founded as an imperial Benedictine convent for daughters of noble families by Matilda, widow of Emperor Henry I. Its first nuns came from Wendhausen. It was richly endowed with lands, privileges, and immunities; the abbess bore the title of imperial princess. It nurtured the Ottonian revival; probably WIDUKIND OF CORVEY and later Bp. Thietmar of Merseburg studied there. By the 14th century, the convent was weakened financially and the town of Quedlinburg, asserting its independence of the abbess, was supposed by the bishop of Halberstadt, who was infringing on the convent's ecclesiastical immunity. But under Hedwig, 1477, its lordship over the town and its independence of the bishop were regained. It became a Lutheran convent under Anna II, and remained so until secularization, 1803. Subordinate convents were St. Mary (Münzenberg), St. Andrew at Walbeck, and Brehna; monasteries were St. Wigbert and Michaelstein.

Hyacinthe Louis de Quelen.

Bibliography: Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores (Berlin 1826–) 3:18–90. K. JANICKE, Urkundenbuch der Stadt Quedlinburg, v.2:1–2 of Geschichtsquellen der Provinz Sachsen, 48 v. (Halle 1870–1923). H. LORENZ and S. KLEEMANN, Quedlinburgische Geschichte 2 v. (Quedlinburg 1922). A. BRINKMANN, Beschreibende Darstellung der älteren Bau- und Kunstdenkmäler des Kreises Stadt Quedlinburg, 2 pts. (Berlin 1922–23). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 14.2:2017–19. R. JOPPEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:931.

[D. ANDREINI]

QUELEN, HYACINTHE LOUIS DE

Archbishop of Paris; b. Paris, Oct. 8, 1778; d. Paris, Dec. 31, 1839. The scion of a noble family from Brittany, he entered the Seminary of Saint-Sulpice in 1801. After ordination at Saint-Brieuc (1807), he returned to Paris and was assigned to the Grande Aumônerie, whose titular was Cardinal Joseph Fesch. Appointed vicar-general of the Grande Aumônerie (December 1814), he carried on negotiations for a new concordat with the Holy See. In 1817 he was named auxiliary bishop of Paris, and in 1819, coadjutor with the right of succession. When Cardinal Talleyrand-Périgord died (Oct. 20, 1821), Quelen became archbishop of Paris. He reorganized the seminaries, initiated the practice of ecclesiastical retreats, and ordered the preaching of missions in parishes. He was elected a member of the French Academy (1824). The Revolution of July 1830 was hostile to him because of his relations with the fallen Bourbon dynasty. He was forced into hiding for several months, during which time his episcopal residence was partially demolished. The riot of Saint-Germain-l'Auxerrois (February 1831) was partly directed against him. It culminated with an almost complete rupture between him and the government of Louis Philippe. From temporary residence in various convents, Quelen continued to administer his diocese. In 1832 he demonstrated his courage by visiting persons suffering from cholera. He later founded an orphanage. In 1834 he organized religious conferences at Notre Dame Cathedral, and in 1835 he placed LACORDAIRE in charge of them. He encouraged devotion to the miraculous medal and to Our Lady of Victories. He published several works on the administration of the Sacraments and several funeral orations.

Bibliography: P. I. B. D'EXAUVILLEZ, Vie de Mgr. de Quélen, archevêque de Paris, 2 v. (Paris 1840). M. R. A. HENRION, Vie et travaux apostoliques de Mgr. Hyacinthe Louis de Quélen (Paris 1840). R. LIMOUZIN-LAMOTHE, Monseigneur de Quelen . . . 2 v. (Paris 1955–57). L'Épiscopat français depuis le concordat jusqu'à la séparation 1802–1905 (Paris 1907) 453–456.

[R. LIMOUZIN-LAMOTHE]

QUEM TERRA, PONTUS, SIDERA

Office hymn that was historically prescribed for Matins on feasts of the Blessed Virgin Mary that have no proper hymn. The authorship of FORTUNATUS (c. 530–600) is disputed, but scholars agree that the hymn, written in iambic dimeter and showing an artistic use of rhyme, is the work of a skillful poet. The eight original stanzas of this hymn offer variations on the paradox of the Creator and Ruler of the universe housed in the womb of a simple virgin, and on the notion of Mary acting as the new Eve and as the gateway to heaven.

Bibliography: Analecta hymnica 50:86–87, text. J. CONNELLY, ed. and tr., Hymns of the Roman Liturgy (Westminster, Md. 1957), translation and commentary. S. GASELEE, comp., The Oxford Book of Medieval Latin Verse (Oxford 1928; reprint with corrections 1937). F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (Oxford 1953).

[M. A. MALONE]

QUENSTEDT, JOHANN ANDREAS

Lutheran theologian and dogmatician; b. Quedlinburg, Aug. 13, 1617; d. Wittenberg, May 22, 1688. He was educated at the University of Helmstädt (1637–43), where he came under the influence of Georg Calixtus, whose heterodox ideas he later refuted. From 1644 to the time of his death, Quenstedt held various academic positions at the University of Wittenberg. He published the results of his years of teaching in Theologia didactico-polemica sive systema theologicum (Wittenberg 1685; Leipzig 1715). This represents a type of reaction to the reconstruction of dogma that had been begun by Veit Ludwig von Seckendorf (1626–92) and that was symptomatic of the intellectual revolution taking place throughout Europe. On every subject discussed there is first the presentation of theses, followed by their exposition and proof, and then the discussion of various difficulties and questions that are suggested. Because of this style the work became so thoroughly a systematized treatise on Lutheran theology that Quenstedt has been frequently called “the bookkeeper of Lutheran orthodoxy.” His definitions and theses are, however, constructed almost entirely on an earlier work, entitled Theologia positiva acroamatica, by J. F. Koenig (1619–64).

Bibliography: J. C. ERDMANN, Lebensbeschreibungen und literarische Nachrichten von den wittenbergschen Theologen (Wittenberg 1804). F. A. G. THOLUCK, Der Geist der lutherischen Theologen Wittenbergs (Hamburg 1852). F. LAU, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3rd ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 5:735.

[C. J. BERSCHNEIDER]

QUENTIN, HENRI

Biblical scholar; b. St. Thierry in the Diocese of Reims, France, Oct. 7, 1872; d. Rome, Feb. 4, 1935. He studied in the diocesan seminary in Reims and entered the Benedictine Abbey of MAREDSOUS, Belgium, in 1894, taking his vows there in 1895. In 1897 he went to the Abbey of SOLESMES, France, where he was ordained in 1902. His studies on conciliar history and hagiography brought him, in 1907, an appointment to the Commission for Revision of the Vulgate and he was sent to Rome.

There, Quentin collected a series of photographic copies of all important Vulgate manuscripts, including what is probably the oldest text, viz. that in the Codex Amiatinus. His Mémoire sur l'établissement du text de la Vulgate (Collectanea biblica 6; Rome 1922) was basic for the structural organization of the edition. The method of textual criticism used by Quentin, especially his theories on the relative interdependence of the manuscripts and their subsequent value for the history of the transmission of the text, remained a very controversial issue. In the Vulgate Commission presided over by F. GASQUET, Quentin was editor-in-chief of the Pentateuch (1926–36). In 1923 Quentin became a member of the Pontifical Roman Academy of Archaeology (see PONTIFICAL ACADEMIES), and in 1930 Pope PIUS XI appointed him to the historical section of the Congregation of Rites. Quentin had a substantial part in the creation of the new Sacred Heart liturgy, established by the encyclical Miserentissimus Redemptor in 1928 (see SACRED HEART, DEVOTION TO). In 1933 he was made first abbot of the Abbey of S. Girolamo in Rome.

Bibliography: Works. H. QUENTIN, Jean-Dominique Mansi et les grandes collections conciliaires (Paris 1900); Les Martyrologues historiques du moyen âge (Paris 1908); Essais de critique textuelle (Paris 1926). B. MOMBRIUS, Sanctuarium, seu vitae sanctorum, 2 v. (new ed. Paris 1910). Literature. C. MOHLBERG, “Dom Enrico Quentin,” Rendiconti della Pontificia Accademia Romana de Archeologia 11 (1935): 13–39, bibliog. 34–39. A. MANSSER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:934.

[H. RUMPLER]

QUESNEL, PASQUIER (PASCHASE)

French oratorian, theologian, and spiritual writer, noted for his part in the history of JANSENISM; b. Paris, July 14, 1634; d. Amsterdam, Dec. 2, 1719. A pupil of the Jesuits at Clermont College and later a student at the Sorbonne (Bachelor in Theology in 1657), Quesnel entered the Oratory in 1657, was ordained in 1659, and was first assigned to Oratorian novitiate, rue Saint-Honoré, as master of ceremonies and librarian. Strongly imbued with BÉRULLE's spirituality, he was from that time on devoted to Augustinianism, but he had little regard for Jansen's thought, which he considered too archaic and systematic. He also had no difficulty in signing on four occasions, between 1661 and 1665, the formulary condemning the book AUGUSTINUS.

From 1666 to 1669 he was second director of the Seminary Saint-Magloire. In this environment strongly influenced by Jansenism, he became closely allied with Antoine ARNAULD, who was hiding there. He then began his career as a writer and a polemicist. Having returned to the house on the rue Saint-Honoré, he resumed his teaching and proved to be more and more Augustinian and Gallican, at the same time endeavoring to remain faithful to Thomism in essential points. In 1675 he won the attention of the learned world by a scholarly edition of the works of St. Leo the Great, but the Gallican bias of the notes and essays that accompanied the text caused it to be placed on the Index. In 1678 the archbishop of Paris, F. de Harlay, demanded his withdrawal. He was sent to Orléans, but in 1684 he refused to subscribe to the anti-Jansenist decrees issued by the assembly of the Oratory. He preferred exile and in February 1685 rejoined Antoine Arnauld in his retreat in Brussels. He was his faithful companion until the latter's death in 1694.

Faithful to his moderate Augustinianism and his Thomism, Quesnel tried at first not to arouse the doctrinal controversies then dormant. The three volumes of his Tradition de l'église romaine sur la prédestination des saints et sur la grâce efficace, published from 1687 to 1690, presented grace in an entirely Bérullian perspective as a prolongation of the Incarnation. He also continued to devote himself to the composition of spiritual works; the most famous of these productions continues to be the Prières chrétiennes (1687), reprinted several times. It is imbued with a totally Bérullian spirituality.

Quesnel used these years of relative peace to transform Jansenism into a veritable organized party. Energetic, positive, methodical, and tenacious, he always possessed the qualities of a leader, which Arnauld lacked. Within a few years, he established a vast secret network of communication and information that operated in almost all the large cities of Europe. The awakening of the disputes provoked around 1700 by the intransigent Jansenists attracted attention to his Nouveau Testament avec des réflexions morales (1695), in which he expressed not only his Augustinianism bordering on Jansenism, but also his Richerism, i.e., his attachment to the extreme Gallicanism formerly professed, around 1615, by Edmond RICHER. On May 30, 1703, he was arrested in Brussels by order of the king of Spain, Louis XIV's grandson, and put in the jail of the archbishopric of Malines, whence he escaped on the following September 13. He settled in Amsterdam and reconstructed his network, which had been dispersed when his papers had been seized. He took an increasingly active part in the conflicts aroused by the Cas de conscience affair and by the bull Vineam Domini (1705). In 1710 Quesnel began with Fénelon, an adversary of Jansenism, a bitter dispute that indirectly provoked the condemnation by the bull UNIGENITUS (Sept. 8, 1713) of 101 propositions taken from the Réflexions morales.

In the years that followed, in a multitude of works of every kind, Quesnel did not cease to protest the complete orthodoxy of his thought. After having hoped for an opportunity to return to France at the beginning of the Regency, he preferred to give up the idea, but his authority over the Jansenist party continued to be very great. At the beginning of 1718 he formally adhered to the appeal of the four bishops to the general council. He died in the same sentiments, after a short illness, leaving behind him a very considerable work, for which the bibliography remains to be compiled.

Bibliography: J. CARREYRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 13.2:1460–1535. J. A. G. TANS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:935–936; Pasquier Quesnel et les Pays-Bas (Paris-Groningen 1960), Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique, Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932–) XII–2, col. 2732–2746. L. CEYSSENS and J. A. G. TANS, “Pasquier Quesnel,” Autour de l’Unigenitus (Leuven 1987). J. A. G. TANS and H. SCHMITZ DU MOULIN, La correspondance de P. Quesnel. Inventaire (Leuven 1989); Index analytique, 2 v. (Leuven 1993), bibliography.

[L. J. COGNET/J. M. GRES-GAYER]

QUESNELLIANA COLLECTIO

Shortly after 1670, Pasquier Quesnel, the Oratorian priest and Jansenist, was preparing a complete edition of the works of Pope Leo the Great. In the course of his work he came upon an old, unedited canonical collection that he believed to be the oldest existing code that had been used by the Roman Church. Quesnel published this collection in his compilation of Leo's works, and it thereafter became known as the Collectio Quesnelliana. A printed edition of this work may be found in Migne, Patrologia Latina 56, 358–747.

There have been several studies of this collection since the time of Quesnel. It is presently believed to have been compiled between 494 and, at the latest, 523. There is still considerable discussion as to its exact place of origin. There are some who believe that it originated in Gaul and very likely at Arles. This contention is principally based on the fact that all 15 of the existing manuscripts of this collection originated in France, and Arles is known to have been an important center for Canon Law at that time. However, the more general belief is that this collection originated in Italy, most likely at Rome. The principal reason for this contention is that it is a collection with a universal outlook in contrast to the local collections that emanated from places such as Arles. Moreover there are positive indications that the papal archives were directly consulted in its compilation. There are no positive indications as to the identification of the author of this collection. There is a theory of W. M. Peitz that attributes this collection to Dennis the Little, but this theory has not found general acceptance.

The Collectio Quesnelliana consists of excerpts from various oriental councils—Chalcedon, Nicaea, Ancyra, Neocaesarea (apparently at the same time trying to avoid including anything that might be a source of friction between the Oriental and Roman churches); excerpts from African councils; certain writings in regard to the Acacian schism, Pelagianism, Eutychianism; decretals of Popes Innocent I, Zosimus, Siricius, Leo I; and finally a large number of letters of Leo I. There is no strict logical or chronological order in the arrangement of these materials. The author apparently wished to replace former collections, which contained only one type of these materials, e.g., the Greek councils, with a collection containing a compilation of the various materials available. This was the time of the Gelasian Renaissance, when there was a serious attempt to codify and centralize ecclesiastical discipline.

The Collectio Quesnelliana is important for the history of the sources of Canon Law. In itself it represents an important step in canonical compilation, and it provides valuable information concerning the life of the Church at the time. Furthermore, it was the principal collection used in Gaul until the mid 8th century. Finally, some of its contents passed into later collections that played an important role in the history of medieval Canon Law, such as the HADRIANA COLLECTIO, the HISPANA COLLECTIO, and the Capitularies of BENEDICT THE LEVITE.

Bibliography: L. LEFEBVRE, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 7:434–440. A. VAN HOVE, Commentarium Lovaniense in Codicem iuris canonici I v. 1–5 (Mechlin 1928–) 1:151. H. WURM, Studien und Texte zur Dekretensammlung des Dionysius Exiguus (Bonn 1939). C. SILVA-TAROUCA, “Nuovi studi sulle antiche lettere dei Papi,” Gregorianum 12 (1931) 3–56, 349–425, 547–598, A. M. STICKLER, Historia iuris canonici latini v. 1 Historia fontium (Turin 1950) 41.

[J. M. BUCKLEY]

QUÉTIF, JACQUES

Dominican scholar and literary historian; b. Paris, Aug. 6, 1618; d. there, March 2, 1698. He was professed in the Dominican order in 1635 and ordained in 1642. After spending a few years in the ministry, he returned in 1652 to the priory of the Annunciation, rue Saint-Honoré, Paris, and there spent the rest of his life as librarian.

Quétif's major achievement was the launching of the monumental history of Dominican writers. He traveled widely in France, Italy, Germany, and the Netherlands and corresponded with leading contemporary scholars in his search for materials. At his death he had completed 800 articles and had gathered material on about 2,000 other lives. The work was continued and amplified by Jacques ÉCHARD, who published it between 1719 and 1721 under the title Scriptores ordinis praedicatorum.

Quétif also edited the Vie de Savonarole par Pico de la Mirandole, révélations, épîtres et autres écrits de Savonarole; the Formalis explicatio summae theologiae divi Thomae of Jerome de Medicis; and the canons of the Council of TRENT. He composed a biography of Bartholomew of the Martyrs and one of JOHN OF ST. THOMAS for an edition of his works.

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (New York 1959) 2.2:746–747. R. CREYTENS, “L'Oeuvre bibliographique d'Échard: Ses sources et leur valeur,” Archivum Fratrum Praedicatorum 14 (1944) 43–71. M. GASNIER, Les Dominicains de St. Honoré (Paris 1950).

[J. F. HINNEBUSCH]

QUEVEDO, JUAN DE

Franciscan bishop in Panama; b. place and date unknown; d. Spain, Dec. 24, 1519. In response to the concern of King Ferdinand of Spain, Leo X in a bull dated Sept. 24, 1513, named Quevedo bishop of Darien, Panama, the first bishopric on Tierra Firme. This diocese was the fourth in the New World, preceded in 1511 by those of Santo Domingo and Concepción de la Vega on Hispaniola, and San Juan in Puerto Rico. Quevedo arrived in Darien with Gov. Pedrarias Davila in July 1514. He was accompanied by various other religious destined for the missions.

The episcopal see was established in Santa María la Antigua. His apostolic work was made difficult by the dissension between the two most famous caudillos of the conquest in Darien: Pedrarias and the Adelantado Vasco Núñez de Balboa, discoverer of the Pacific Ocean. The bishop was a consistent critic of the conduct of Pedrarias because of his cruelty to the natives. After Balboa was beheaded in 1519 on orders of Pedrarias, Quevedo returned to Spain where he engaged in a controversy with Bartolomé de LAS CASAS before the Emperor on the methods of the conquest in America.

[E. J. CASTILLERO]

QUICUMQUE CHRISTUM QUAERITIS

Office hymn that was historically prescribed for VESPER and MATINS on the feast of the TRANSFIGURATION. The text of this hymn is taken from the 12th poem of the Cathemerinon, “Hymnus Epiphaniae,” by PRUDENTIUS (348–c.405). It is written in iambic dimeter and urges those who seek Christ to raise their eyes on high and to hear and believe Him who is God, the King of the Nations and of the Jews.

Bibliography: Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 61, Liber Cathemerinon text. J. CONNELLY, ed. and tr., Hymns of the Roman Liturgy (Westminster, Md. 1957), tr. and commentary. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 6.2:2901–28. F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (Oxford 1953) 44–49. J. JULIAN, ed., A Dictionary of Hymnology (New York 1957), s.v. Quicumque.

[M. A. MALONE]

QUIDDITY

English transliteration of the Latin quidditas, meaning “whatness”; in scholastic usage it designates a thing’s ESSENCE taken precisely in its capacity to inform the intellect of the answer to the question “what is it?”

Related Terms. At most a virtual minor DISTINCTION obtains between essence and quiddity: essence is the thing as capacity for existence, whereas quiddity is the thing as capacity to instruct the intellect. The quiddity of a thing, if definable, is analytically expressed in its real DEFINITION by its genus and specific difference. As such it is similar to, but more exact than, NATURE in BOETHIUS’S first sense: “anything that can be grasped (by the intellect) in any way whatever” (De persona et duabus naturis 1; Patrologia Latina, 64:1341BC). Nature, in the more etymological and Aristotelian sense, is closer to essence than to quiddity inasmuch as nature signifies a thing’s principle of operation—effective only through existence.

Such are the comparisons between these terms suggested by St. THOMAS AQUINAS (De ente 1, 3). To these he adds FORM and Aristotle’s phrase “the what was to be” (τὸ τί ἦν εἶναι, quod quid erat esse). He defines the form that is convertible with essence and quiddity as “the complete essential determination” of a thing. This is the “form of the whole” (forma totius, εἶδος) according to the Avicennian interpretation of book seven of the Metaphysics—an interpretation rejected by Averroës but accepted by St. Thomas (In 7 meta. 9. 1467–69). Form in this sense includes the matter as universalizable as well as the “form of the part” (forma partis, μορφή), the substantial form as distinct from matter (see MATTER AND FORM). Form thus expresses the completeness of an essence’s specification in itself with respect both to existence and to intellect, and in the latter respect is synonymous with quiddity. Some modern scholars concur independently in the Averroist interpretation that Aristotle excludes matter altogether from the notion of form or species and its equivalent, “the what was to be.” But St. Thomas insists that Aristotle holds its inclusion necessary in the case of natural substances, since it must be included universally in their definition (In 7 meta. 9.1468; In 1 anim. 1.24–29).

Aristotelian Meaning. The term quidditas, coined in the 12th century in translations of Avicenna into Latin and possibly also in paraphrasing the Topics, stems ultimately from Aristotle’s own phrase “the what was to be.” From its grammar and from the probable places of its earliest appearance (Topica 101b 22, 132a 1), it originated in a context of DIALECTICS and PREDICATION and was designed as a verbal sort of variable representing the full answer to any Socratic question as to what a thing is, for example, man, virtue, the Sophist, etc. The particular reference of the phrase can be specified in any context by adding a dative, for example, “the what was it for a man to be,” or “the being characteristic of man.” This full answer, Aristotle says, is expressed in the definition of the thing in question.

As such the phrase must be distinguished from another Aristotelian one, “the what is it” (τὸ τί ἐστίν, quod quid est), of wider range, since it not only may refer to the complete formula or definition but may also be satisfied by any one of its parts taken separately—genus, matter, difference, or form. Grammatically, the past tense, “was” (ἦν, erat), has a habitual or transtemporal sense, indicating the specifying, or formal, identity of the essence with respect to any individual of that essence at any time (Meta. 1031a 15–32a 11, esp. 32a 5; Aquinas, In 7 meta. 5) or, in the case of the separate substances, beyond time. Accordingly, in virtue of the “what” element the phrase has formally a noetic reference, whereas in virtue of the verbal elements “was” and “to be” it has a basic ontological connotation. Because of its ontological reference, the phrase “the what was to be” is superior to the term quiddity. Among the Christian Aristotelians, who departed from Aristotle on the eternity of the world, this transtemporal character of essences is taken to refer to their self-identity as essences—including their openness to identity with their individuals, when the latter exist—or also to refer to their eternal presence as ideas to the divine mind.

Because it can refer also, by the habitual tense (ἦν, “was”), to separate substances, including God, of which St. Thomas says one knows what they are not rather than what they are (De anim. 16), the Greek phrase and the Latin term coined from it do not necessarily suggest that the truly adequate answer to the implied question of “what” must be rational, analytical and complex, after the fashion of a definition. It may be purely intellectual and intuitive. “It is not of the notion of quiddity that it be composite, for then a simple nature would never be found—which is false at least in the case of God—nor is it of its notion that it be simple, since certain composites are found, such as human nature” (In 2 sent. 3.1.1). Quiddity can thus apply to God and the separate substances, which are undefinable by reason of their simplicity and not in virtue of any defect of unity.

Substituting the term quiddity for the more cumbersome “the what was to be,” one finds that in Meta. 1029b 14, speaking terminologically, Aristotle defines “the quiddity of each thing” as “that which it is said to be in virtue of itself” (καθ’ αὐτό). Excluding things that are only one by accident, such as “white man” or “musical man” and hence indefinable by defect of unity, he says analogically that “quiddity will belong . . . primarily and in the simple sense to substance, and in a secondary way to the other categories also—not quiddity in the simple sense, but the quiddity of a quality or of a quantity” (1030a 29–32). Finally he seems even to allow a definition, in an improper sense, of “white man” as an accidental whole, “but not in the sense in which there is a definition either of white or of substance” (b 13); however, he does not allow the notion of quiddity this improper range.

Modern Relevance. The insistence of G. W. F. HEGEL on the impossibility of philosophically discussing anything in a purely ontological way apart from its relation to mind should be reappraised in view of the convertibility of quiddity and essence and of truth and being (see TRANSCENDENTALS). At the same time, a realistic philosophy must maintain the absolute primacy of being and essence and also their inseparable transcendental relevance, as truth and quiddity, to intelligence on all levels, and first of all to the divine mind. In this connection, the so-called “presuppositionless method” of PHENOMENOLOGY, as proposed by E. HUSSERL, that would suspend judgment on the question of existence and real being, itself makes a supposition inasmuch as it presumes that essence can speak to mind without revealing itself as, first and radically, capacity for existence. Expressed in the above outlined language, this method appears to be an attempt to treat essence as quiddity rather than as essence. The work of the medieval disciples of St. Thomas and of John DUNS SCOTUS on these questions should be brought into dialectical confrontation with the analogous work of modern epistemologists and phenomenologists. Particularly worthy of mention are the Quaestiones disputatae de esse intelligibili of WILLIAM OF ALNWICK (see History of Christian Philosophy, 468, 768–769).

Bibliography: H. BONITZ, Index Aristotelicus (Berlin 1870; photo reproduction 1955) 764a 20–765a 6. M. KAPPES, Aristoteles-Lexikon (Paderborn 1894) 24–25. J. OWENS, The Doctrine of Being in the Aristotelian Metaphysics (2d ed. Toronto 1963) 180–188. E. BUCHANAN, Aristotle’s Theory of Being (Cambridge, Mass. 1962) ch. 4, 5. ARISTOTLE, Metaphysics, rev. Gr. text with introd. essay and commentary, W. D. ROSS, 2 v. (Oxford 1953) 1:xciv–cxi. R. J. DEFERRARI, A Latin-English Dictionary of St. Thomas Aquinas (Boston 1960) 883–884. R. J. DEFERRARI and M. I. BARRY, A Complete Index of the Summa Theologica of St. Thomas Aquinas (Washington 1956) 292. L. SCHÜTZ, Thomas-Lexikon (Paderborn 1895; photo offprint Stuttgart 1958) 675. E. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90).

[J. J. GLANVILLE]

QUIERCY (QUIERZY), COUNCILS OF

Several notable assemblies held at the Frankish royal residence of Quiercy (Kiersy, Carisiacum, or Quiercy-sur-Oise), near Noyon, France. (1) When Pope STEPHEN II went to PEPIN III IN 754, the king met at Quiercy (or at nearby Braine) with his magnates and concluded an alliance with the pope against the LOMBARDS. Moreover, according to the LIBER PONTIFICALIS, it was on this occasion that the promise or so-called donation of Pepin (see STATES OF THE CHURCH) was made: lands in central Italy then held by the Lombards were to be restored to the papacy when conquered by the Franks. In 774 CHARLEMAGNE confirmed this grant, which is a landmark in the growth of the temporal power of the papacy. Although some have doubted that such a grant was ever made, most modern controversy has focused on the interpretation of its terms (see DONATION OF CONSTANTINE). (2) In 838 a council of Frankish bishops was held at Quiercy in conjunction with an imperial diet. Supporters of AGOBARD, exiled archbishop of Lyons, led by FLORUS, sought to discredit the administrator of the diocese, AMALARIUS OF METZ, by obtaining the council’s condemnation of certain errors in his writings. (3) After German bishops had condemned GOTTSCHALK OF ORBAIS’s doctrine of predestination at Mainz 848, he was sent to HINC-MAR OF REIMS to be disciplined. At Quiercy 849, in the presence of Charles II the Bald, the prelates of Reims province, assisted by the archbishops of Sens, Tours, and Lyons, sentenced him to a life of silence and prison after deposing him from the priesthood and having him whipped. (4) Against the teaching of Gottschalk, Hincmar himself advanced four propositions—that God’s predestination is only single, that man’s free will is restored through grace, that God wishes all men to be saved, and that Christ suffered for all men—all of which a council of his province approved at Quiercy in 853. His propositions were in their turn attacked at VALENCE IN 855 and at LANGRES and Savonnières in 859. Councils were also held at Quiercy in 857 and 858.

Bibliography: C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d’après les documents originaux (Paris 1907–38) 3.2:923–924 (754); 4.1:101–103 (838), 150–155; 4.2:1308–10 (849); 4.1:197–199; 4.2:1324 (853); 4.1:212; 4.2:1333–34 (857); 4.1:214; 4.2:1335 (858). A. WERMINGHOFF, ed., Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Concilia 2.2:768–782, 835–853 (838). B. GEBHARDT, Handbuch der deutschen Geschichte (Stuttgart 1954–60) 1:128–131, with bibliog.

[R. KAY]

QUIET, PRAYER OF

The prayer of quiet, a form of contemplation, is an intimate awareness of the presence of God that captivates the will and often fills the body and soul with ineffable sweetness and delight. Being a gift of God, it cannot be acquired through personal effort; at the most, one can dispose oneself for it by fidelity to the practice of mental prayer and by cultivation of purity of life. Writing of it in her autobiography (ch. 14) St. Teresa of Avila says: "This state is a recollecting of the faculties within the soul . . . ; the will alone is occupied in such a way that, without knowing how, it becomes captive; the other two faculties [i.e., intellect and memory] help the will so that it may become more and more capable of enjoying so great a blessing, though sometimes it comes about that, even when the will is in union, they hinder it exceedingly." In the prayer of quiet, therefore, the principal activity of the individual is affective; thus it differs from the prayer of recollection, which usually precedes it and centers its activity in the intellect.

The recollection of the will, characteristic of the prayer of quiet, does not necessarily hinder the activity of the other rational powers of man, so that his response to the demands of the active life is not impeded.

The main effects of this form of contemplation are growth in virtue, particularly in detachment; profound joy and peace; and a sense of the nearness of God, although the last is not always clearly perceived. A possible effect can be the gift of tears.

Very similar to the prayer of quiet is the phenomenon caused by exhaustion of the rational faculties through inordinate concentration upon spiritual matters, especially in prayer. It can be diagnosed by the swiftness with which it passes and the aridity it leaves in the soul.

See Also: CONTEMPLATION.

Bibliography: TERESA OF AVILA, Complete Works, ed. SILVERIO DE SANTA TERESA, and E. A. PEERS, 3 v. (New York 1946) v.2, Interior Castle, "4th Mansions." R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, The Three Ages of Interior Life, tr. T. DOYLE, 2 v. (St. Louis 1947-48). A. F. POULAIN, The Graces of Interior Prayer, tr. L. L. YORKE SMITH (St. Louis 1950).

[S. V. RAMGE]

QUIETISM

The name given to a spiritual doctrine that, as proposed by Miguel de MOLINOS, was condemned as heretical, suspect, etc., by the decree of the Holy Office of August 28 and the constitution Caelestis Pastor of Innocent XI of Nov. 20, 1687 (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [Freiburg 1963] 2201-69). Quietism is best described as an exaggeration of orthodox spirituality. It is, at base, a recurrence of the ultrasupernaturalism that has plagued and stimulated the Church from its earliest years. It is thus akin to and different from every other form of ILLUMINISM and enthusiasm that has existed in the Church in the past.

History. The Messalians of Asia Minor in the fifth and sixth centuries claimed to practice continual prayer and encouraged a spirit of complete indifference. In the 13th century, the monks of Mt. Athos were called "hesychasts," or quietists, but they seem to have been imbued with a more Oriental kind of self-oblivion. In the West, the Brethren of the Free Spirit were said to claim an entire passivity along with an antinomian outlook on morality. The Beghards were condemned in 1312 for holding that meditation on the Sacred Humanity was a descent from contemplation. The Devotio Moderna of medieval Germany, which would rather be able to feel compunction than define it, did much to separate theology from mysticism. As a result, the area of man's highest aspirations was left open to sentimentalists who felt called to contemplation by experiences not transcending their own emotional upheavals, and quietists who neglected everything to drift in their spiritual daydreams became self-proclaimed experts in matters spiritual.

The antecedents, then, of 17th-century quietism in Italy are manifold, but it would be impossible to trace a causal nexus positively influencing Molinos and his adherents. It is true that the aberrations of the ALUMBRADOS of southern Spain were condemned only in 1623; and although many of their confessed tenets are similar to those of Molinos, the movement was vigorously repudiated by him. It was rather the contemporary scene that provided the fertile ground for quietism. The 17th century in European spirituality was devoted to schools and to controversy. The Jansenist crisis was just abating when a new struggle developed between the adherents of the Ignatian method of meditation and those who saw in it the denial of the contemplation espoused by the great Spanish and French mystics of the preceding century. The protagonists exaggerated the approved spiritual doctrines, literalized the symbols and figures of the canonized authors, and in general made man's approach to God in prayer a matter of partisanship.

Foremost in the ranks of those defending the primacy of contemplation were Francis Malaval, the gentle recluse of Marseilles, Pier Matteo Petrucci, later to become a curial cardinal, and the enigmatic figure of Miguel de Molinos; all were to see their writings placed on the Index. Since none of these authors ever claimed to set forth a new conception of the spiritual life, it is only by reference to the orthodox doctrine of approved writers that one can recognize their version as a caricature of Catholic mysticism.

Quietist Teachings. Whereas solid doctrine holds that there is a state of contemplative passivity in which God acts in man by His operating grace and which one reaches normally only after exercising himself in the ascetical life for a long time, the quietists held, paradoxically, that the way of passive contemplation is acquired at will be the very cessation of every operation. Using the language of SS. Teresa and John of the Cross, the quietist opened the door to illuminism, since he looked upon his own intellectual activity as a refusal to adore God in spirit and in truth, for it is God who alone must work in the soul. So avid were they in removing the mental images on which meditation feeds that, for them, even the consideration of the sacred humanity itself was a distraction to be rejected. In the words of Malaval: "Thy Humanity itself, my Saviour, . . . not being regarded as it should have been, deceived the Jews, tempted the apostles and every day keeps people of real devotion away from perfection." This contemplative gaze, then, became the sole measure of true mysticism and was for the quietist a single act unbroken even by sleep.

Granting their error concerning the fundamentals of contemplation, it is therefore not surprising to discover the bizarre nature of their practical moral conclusions. This way of obscure faith offers no consolations, for these are a betrayal; cares nought for the yearnings for perfect happiness, for they would be an expression of self-will and not God's; and despises any reflection on self, for that is a base infidelity to grace. As a result, the movement leaves no opportunities for the acts of virtues; prayers of petition, examinations of conscience, even confession itself become impossible for the soul perfected in the way of darkness and aridity, for these elements necessarily involve conscious activity on the soul's part.

And so the ultimate moral aberration is reached. Molinos implicitly advocated, and in his recantation admitted teaching publicly, that an exterior action objectively sinful could be consistent with the state of contemplation. The history of his arrest, conviction, and punishment can find its explanation only in the conclusion that he practiced, to some degree, what he preached. With this, 17th-century quietism in Italy came to an end. Its doctrine of love, disinterested even to the point of despair, provided the spark for the famous semiquietist debate that rocked the Church in France in the last decade of the 17th century.

See Also: GUYON, JEANNE MARIE DE LA MOTTE; FÉNELON, FRANÇOIS DE SALIGNAC DE LA MOTHE; CONTEMPLATION; HESYCHASM.

Bibliography: P. POURRAT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 13.2:1537–81. P. DUDON, Le Quiétiste espagnol: Michel Molinos (Paris 1921). R. A. KNOX, Enthusiasm (New York 1950) 231–318. R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, The Three Ages of Interior Life, tr. T. DOYLE, 2 v. (St. Louis 1947–48) 2:289–292.

[T. K. CONNOLLY]

QUIMPERLÉ, ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine monastery in the Diocese of Quimper and the department of Finistère, France (Abbey of the Holy Cross; Kemperlegiense). A monastery may have been founded on this site as early as 550 by St. Gunthiern with the aid of Grallon, the legendary king of Brittany. In any case, in 1029, Alain, Count of Cornouailles, installed, at the junction of the Ellé and the Isole, a group of Benedictines whose first abbot was St. Gurloès (d. 1057). St. Vigonien was superior of the monastery from 1059 to 1066. His successor, Benedict (d. 1115), son of Count Alain, enriched the abbey with numerous endowments and in 1083 had the church consecrated. The 13th century saw the monks embroiled in protracted conflict with the bishops of Quimper. Then came a period of decadence, until in the 16th century, the monastery had as abbot the infamous Odet de Coligny, Cardinal of Châtillon (d. 1571), who was divested of his benefices on becoming a Calvinist. At the end of the century only three monks remained at the abbey, assisted by three secular priests. In 1665 the MAURISTS took possession of the abbey and held it until the revolution. The abbey church of the Holy Cross, dating from the 11th century, had a curious rood screen from the Renaissance period framing the main door; it collapsed in 1862, but has been restored according to the original plan. Circular in form, the church imitates the Basilica of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem and is one of the rare specimens of this style in Brittany. The rotunda is flanked on four sides by semi-domes: that on the east is the apse, that on the west is the nave, while the other two form the transept. The 11th-century romanesque crypt under the circular choir contains many tombs, notably that of St. Gurloès. In addition to the church, the cloisters and the 18th-century monastery still survive; the cloisters now serve as the town hall.

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:2390–91. J. MABILLON, Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti, 6 v. (Luca 1739–45) v.1, 4–6. Gallia Christiana, v.1–13 (Paris 1715–85), v.14–16 (Paris 1856–65) 14:900–905. Histoire Littéraire de la France, ed. Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres (Paris 1814–1941) 21:745. A. DE BLOIS, Notice historique sur la ville de Quimperlé . . . suivie d'une histoire particulière de l'abbaye de Sainte-Croix . . . (Quimperlé 1881). P. LE DUC, Histoire de l'abbaye de Sainte-Croix de Quimperlé (Quimperlé 1881). L.

MAÏRE and P. DE BERTHOU, Cartulaire de l'abbaye de Sainte-Croix de Quimperlé (Paris 1896; 2d ed. Rennes 1904).

[J. DAoust]

QUINCTIAN OF CLERMONT, ST.

Bishop; d. 525 or 526. Quinctian (Quintian) was probably a native of Africa who, during the Arian persecutions there, fled to Gaul. In 506 he appeared as the bishop of Rodez at the synod of Agde; he also participated in the synod of Orléans (511). The Arian Visigoths in Auvergne suspected him of collaboration with their enemy, CLOVIS, and Quinctian was forced to flee from Rodez (c. 512). He sought refuge with Bishop Euphrasius at Clermont, where he became bishop in 515. His biographer, GREGORY OF TOURS, extols his goodness and inexhaustible energy, his concern for the needy, and his fearlessness.

Feast: Nov. 13.

Bibliography: GREGORY OF TOURS, Historia Francorum 2:36; 3:2, 12, 13; 4:5, 35; Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum 1.1:84, 98, 108–109, 138, 167. Vitae patrum 4; 6:3; Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum 1.2. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Concilia 1:9. J. MANSI, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio (Graz 1960) 8:337. L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule (Paris 1907–15) 2:35–36, 40. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–36) 11:399–401.

[G. M. COOK]

QUINISEXT SYNOD

A synod convoked in 691 by Justinian II to furnish disciplinary measures for the 5th and 6th (hence Quinisext) Ecumenical Councils of CONSTANTINOPLE II (553) and III (680–681), which had dealt only with doctrine. It was known also as the Synod in Trullo from the hall in the imperial palace in Constantinople where it was held. It was attended by 165 Oriental bishops with no duly appointed Western legates. Of its 102 canons, several were directed against Armenian, Latin, and specifically Roman legislation (3, 12, 13, 16, 29, 30, 55): clerical celibacy was repudiated (3 and 13); canon 28 of Chalcedon, rejected by Pope LEO I as inimical to the patriarchates by giving Constantinople second place after Rome, was reasserted (36); excommunication was prescribed for fasting on Saturdays in Lent (55); and the use of blood and suffocated animals was forbidden (67; Acts 15:29). The majority of canons, however, had a beneficial purpose, reaffirming the true faith and the authority of apostolic ordinances, patristic traditions, and previous canonical legislation and condemning abuses mainly among clerics (3–39), monks, nuns (40–49), and laity (50–102), particularly in regard to superstitions and matrimonial impediments (53–54).

To the signatures of the Oriental prelates, Justinian requested that that of the pope be added. When SERGIUS I (687–701) refused, the emperor sent Count (the protospatharius) Zachary to Rome, but he was maltreated by the papal attendants. Pope JOHN VII (705–707) refused to explain Roman objections. Pope CONSTANTINE I (708–715) journeyed to Constantinople to reach a compromise, and ADRIAN I (772–795) quoted the synod and canon 82 in a letter to Patriarch TARASius OF CONSTANTINOPLE. ANASTASius the librarian attests that JOHN VIII (872–882) approved the canons “except those which were opposed to the good faith, correct morals, and customs of the Roman Church.” Many of the canons are cited by medieval canonists and by Pope SIXTUS V (1585–90).

Bibliography: K. BIHLMEYER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. M. BUCHBERGER (Freiburg 1930–38) 10:312–313. J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio (Graz 1960) 11:921–1006. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux (Paris 1907–38) 3:560–581. P. JOANNOU, Discipline générale antique (Ile -IXe s.) (Rome 1962) 1.1:98:241, a rev. and crit. ed. of fasc. 9, Fonti CICO.

[F. X. MURPHY]

QUIÑONES, FRANCISCO DE

Also called Francisco de los Angeles; Spanish cardinal and reformer, originator of the expedition of the “Twelve Apostles” to Mexico; b. 1480; d. Veroli, Oct. 27, 1540. Quiñones became a Franciscan before 1507, taking the name of Francisco de los Angeles. He was minister general of the order (1523–28), was named cardinal (Dec. 7, 1527), and was bishop of Coria (1531–33). Quiñones was a representative of the Catholic reformation prior to the Council of Trent. As a superior, he stimulated studies, the training of Franciscan youth, and the use of retreat houses as centers of intense spiritual life. His missionary vocation bore fruit in 1523 when he sent the mission of the Twelve Apostles to New Spain. In the obedience and instructions, which have been called the Magna Carta of Mexican civilization, he stressed the qualities of the missionary and referred to the standards of missionary methods.

In 1526 he conceived the project of going to Mexico, with faculties as nuncio and viceroy, to promote evangelization. He did not attain his objective, however, because Clement VII sent him on secret missions to the Emperor between 1526 and 1528. By his representations, he won the freedom of the Pope and prepared the Treaty of Barcelona of 1529. As a cardinal, he defended the interests of Spain and the reform of the Church. In Rome he surrounded himself with humanists and scholars.

Asked by Clement VII to prepare a new BREVIARY, he distributed the Psalms over the days of the week, reduced the Matins to one nocturn consisting of three Psalms and three lessons, and eliminated all elements of a choral character, such as antiphons, responsories, versicles, and hymns. Between 1535 and 1558, 100 editions of that Breviary were issued, amounting to about 100,000 copies. It influenced the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER and was the precursor of 20th-century reforms. The Breviary was vigorously attacked by theologians and suppressed by the Council of Trent.

In 1536 Cardinal Quiñones commissioned Sansovino to make his sepulchral monument in his titular church, the church of the Holy Cross in Jerusalem. He also built a palace in Veroli.

Bibliography: F. QUIÑONES DE LEÓN Y DE FRANCISCO MARTIN [Marquis d'Alcedo], Le Cardinal Quiñones et la Sainte-Ligue (Bayonne 1910). J. M. LENHART, "Quiñones' Breviary, a Best Seller," Franciscan Studies NS 6 (1946) 468. J. MESEGUER FERNÁNDEZ, "Contenido misionológico de la Obediencia e Instrucción de Fray Francisco do los Angeles a los Doce Apóstoles de México," Americas 11 (1954-55) 473-500.

[J. MESEGUER FERNÁNDEZ]

QUINQUE COMPILATIONES ANTIQUAE

Between the Decretum Gratiani (c. 1140-41) and the Gregorian Decretales of 1234, canonical skill was devoted to two main tasks: the systematization of the latest Canon Law, expressed most commonly in decretal letters (see DECRETALS, COLLECTIONS OF) and literary commentary on the Decretum (see DECRETISTS). The five most important decretal collections from that period are the Quinque Compilationes Antiquae, named in sequence of composition as prima, tertia, secunda, quarta, and quinta.

It is established that Compilatio prima itself marked the culmination of a tradition of codification dating from the mid-1170s, and many manuscripts survive revealing the process by which the technical skill of this work was achieved. It is equally clear that other important collections were made contemporaneously with the five: by Gilbert, Alan, and RAINERIUS OF POMPOSA, BERNARD OF COMPOSTELLA THE ELDER, and so forth. Here it is significant that HOSTIENSIS in his Aurea Summa listed eight collections of the period, including these five, when discussing Gregory IX's plan to abrogate the antique compilations, and to reduce what was useful and necessary into a single volume. Nevertheless, the Quinque Compilationes acquired a preeminent reputation, were used as a basis of canonical study at Bologna and provided a standard of reference for commentators on decretals before the promulgation of the Gregorian collection. All five were the subject of important glosses, while the tertia and quinta were promulgated in papal bulls. Compilatio prima (1187-91), or Breviarium extravagantium, of Bernard of Pavia, was composed mainly of post-Gratian decretals and included the canons of the Lateran Council of 1179; it was arranged in five books entitled iudex, iudicium, clerus, connubium, and crimen, dealing respectively with ecclesiastical jurisdiction, canonical civil procedure, the state and rights of the clergy, marriage and related questions, and criminal procedure and penalties. This scheme was later adopted by the other four and taken over in the Decretales. Compilatio tertia, composed by Peter of Benevento for Innocent III, comprised decretals from the first 12 years of Innocent's pontificate; it was promulgated in the bull Devotioni vestrae, Dec. 28, 1210, and sent to Bologna, and its use enjoined "tam in iudiciis quam in scholis." It is thus the first official collection in canonical history. Compilatio secunda was composed by JOHN OF WALES (1210-15); though third in sequence, it is named secunda, or decretales mediae seu intermediae, since it includes decretals issued between those of Compilationes prima and tertia, as well as earlier items omitted in the prima. It drew on the works of Gilbert and Alan. The authorship of Compilatio quarta is uncertain, but may perhaps be attributed to JOANNES TEUTONICUS or to Alan; it contains decretals of the later years of Innocent III and the canons of the Lateran Council of 1215. Though not certainly promulgated, it was promptly used in courts and schools. Compilatio quinta was made at the request of Honorius III from decretals of his own pontificate (from 1216), and promulgated in the bull Novae causarum, May 2, 1226; its authorship is uncertain also, but may possibly be attributed to TANCRED.

The principal permanent significance of these collections lies in their formative influence on the Decretales of Gregory IX, whose author, RAYMOND OF PEÑAFORT, accepted Bernard of Pavia's plan and incorporated 1,771 of the 1,971 chapters of the five collections.

Bibliography: Quinque compilationes antiquae nec non Collectio canonum lipsiensis, ed. E. FRIEDBERG (Graz 1956). J. F. VON SCHULTE, Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des kanonischen Rechts (Graz 1956) 1:76-90. S. KUTTNER, Repertorium der Kanonistik (Rome 1937) 322-385. A. VAN HOVE, Commentarium Lovaniense in Codicem iuris canonici I (1945) 1:355-361. A. VILLIEN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique et al. (Paris 1903-50) 4.1:206-212. R. NAZ, Dictionnaire de droit canonique (Paris 1935-65) 3:1239-41.

[C. DUGGAN]

Vasco de Quiroga.

QUIROGA, VASCO DE

Bishop, social reformer; b. Madrigal de las Altas Torres, Castilia la Vieja, Spain, in the 1470s; d. Pátzcuaro, Mexico, March 14, 1565. Little is known of his early years except that he remained a layman and obtained a licentiate in Canon Law. He entered the royal service and in 1525–26 served as a judge in the North African city of Oran. After his return to the court, his friends Juan Bernal Díaz de Luco and Cardinal Juan de Tavera recommended him to the king for a position of importance.

In 1530 he was named oidor of New Spain, a member of the five-man governing body, or audiencia, which was being sent there to maintain royal authority. After arriving in Mexico City in January 1530, he began to exert all his efforts to bring a rule of justice and charity to the native people. He tried to understand their laws and to apply Spanish law accordingly. He was particularly active in judging cases of Indian slavery, with favor toward the slaves. In 1532, out of commiseration for the plight of the native people, he established near Mexico City a hospital-town, called Santa Fe, to care for the sick and needy and to instruct the natives in the Catholic faith. It was patterned after the plan of society presented in Thomas More's Utopia. In 1533–34 he was sent to the province of Michoacán to visit the area and correct abuses. There he established another hospital of Santa Fe on the model of his previous foundation. The two institutions retained a prime place in his interest throughout his life and he watched over them with fatherly protectiveness.

In 1536 Michoacán was made a diocese, and Quiroga was chosen its first bishop. Probably in December 1538 he was ordained through the whole series of orders and consecrated bishop. One of his first acts as bishop was to move his see from Tzintzuntzan, former capital of the Tarascan kingdom of Michoacán, to Pátzcuaro, which seemed a more suitable location. There he established the Colegio de San Nicolás, intended primarily to train priests who would have a command of the native languages. It was the first such establishment in New Spain. He also began work on his cathedral, planned as a structure with five naves, T-shaped with the fourth and fifth naves radiating from the right angles of the T. This work, on which much money and labor was expended against the opposition of many of the Spaniards, was never completed.

In 1542 Quiroga sailed for Europe to attend the Council of Trent, but was forced to return to Mexico after a near shipwreck. In 1547 he again left Mexico and succeeded in reaching Spain. During his stay he was able to give advice on many problems facing the Spanish crown and the Church in the New World. He also obtained favorable decisions in a number of lawsuits that he had appealed to the Council of the Indies.

Having returned to New Spain in 1554, he took part in the First Provincial Council of Mexican bishops in 1555, which treated matters of great interest to him: the construction of hospitals in every town and the limitation of the privileges of the friars. His last years saw a continuation, perhaps to an increased degree, of the manifold litigations that had absorbed much of his energy throughout his career: boundary disputes with his fellow bishops, suits involving his hospitals of Santa Fe, suits with Indians and Spaniards over the construction of his cathedral and the population of his see city, and suits with the friars, especially the Augustinians, arising from his efforts to limit their privileges and freedom of action in his diocese. His will gave its principal attention to his two hospital-towns and his college, both of which continued their valuable contribution to the diocese of Michoacán for many years.

The ancient monastery at Qumran. The “Dead Sea Scrolls” were discovered here in a nearby cave in 1947. (©Richard T. Nowitz/ CORBIS)

Bibliography: Don Vasco de Quiroga: Documentos, ed. R. AGUAYO SPENCER (Mexico City 1939). F. B. WARREN, Vasco de Quiroga and His Pueblo-Hopitals of Santa Fe (Washington 1963).

[F. B. WARREN]

QUMRAN COMMUNITY

Ascetic sect of Jews who lived in the Judean Desert near the Wadi Qumran, along the northwest shore of the Dead Sea roughly between 150 B.C. and A.D. 68.

Sources. The Qumran community is known principally from the excavation of Khirbet Qumran, 'Ain Feshkha, and 11 nearby caves, as well as from the sectarian Qumran Scrolls, especially the various pesharim, 4QTestimonia, the Community Rule (1QS and its copies 4QS, 5QS), 1QSa., 1QSB, 1QH, 1QM, 4QMMT, and possibly 11QTemple. Data found in the Damascus Document (CD and its copies 4QD, 5QD) must be used with caution; although copies of it were produced at Qumran and found in the caves, it apparently governed the communal life of “camps” in the land of “Damascus” (a code word for related Jews dwelling elsewhere). Inhabitants of such camps apparently followed a mode of life that differed somewhat from that of the Judean Desert.

Origins. The beginnings of the community are obscure, and two explanations are used: (1) The first explanation relates the community to the Hāsīdīm (Pious Ones: 1 Mc 2.42; see HASIDAEANS) of the Maccabean revolt (167–165 B.C.). When the Maccabees developed political tendencies and the high priesthood was assumed by Jonathan (152 B.C.), this community broke off from the Jerusalem priesthood and withdrew to the Judean desert (see MACCABEES, HISTORY OF THE; HIGH PRIEST). It referred to itself as bēnē Sādōq, “the sons of Zadok,” revealing its connection with the old line of ousted but legitimate Za-dokite priestly families. According to its strict interpretation of Levitical rules, it considered the Jerusalem priests to be unclean, for they had been hellenized, had abandoned the old solar calendar for a new one in celebrating the feasts, and were notorious for their worldly pursuit of wealth.

(2) The second explanation relates the community to the “returnees of Israel” (CD 4.2; 6.5), that is, descendants of Jews deported to Babylon in the sixth-century Babylonian Captivity who had remained there until they heard of the success of the Maccabean revolt and then returned to Judah, only to find the form of Jewish life there far from strict enough, and so they broke with the Jerusalem priesthood (as above). In either explanation the conduct of those priests was an abomination to the strict priestly elements of the Qumran community, who refused to share in Temple sacrifice offered by such men. After 20 years of an amorphous existence (“groping,” CD 1.12), the community was shaped by an energetic priest who came to be regarded as its founder and given the title of the “Righteous Teacher”; his identity is unknown. He and his community were persecuted by a “Wicked Priest” (1QpHab 8.8–12.10), who may have been the high priest Jonathan (or a succession of high priests). Later, when Alexander Jannaeus (103–76 B.C.) persecuted the Pharisees, some of them seem to have joined the Qumran community. (See HASMONAENS.)

Identification. Attempts have been made to identify the Qumran community with the PHARISEES (C. Rabin), SADDUCEES (L. H. Schiffman), EBIONITES (O. Cullmann), Jewish Christians (B. Thiering, R. H. Eisenman), or even the medieval Karaites, but none of these attempts are convincing. The best theory, proposed originally by E. L. Sukenik, A. Dupont-Sommer, and the majority of scholars, identifies it with the ESSENES. The main reason for identification is the notice in Pliny the Elder (Natural History 5.15.73) that locates the Essenes on the western shore of the Dead Sea south of Jericho and above 'En-Gedi and Masada. The only spot with Roman-period remains in this area that could be meant is Khirbet Qumran, the site of the community center. Even though some details of the community's mode of life known from the Scrolls do not always agree with the data of ancient writers who tell about the Essenes (Philo, Josephus, Pliny the Elder, Hippolytus), the bulk of them does coincide and suggests that the Qumran community was Essene.

Beliefs and Mode of Life. The Jews of Qumran were called simply yahad, “community” (1QS 1.1, 12, 16), or harabbim, “the Many” (1QS 6.1, 8, 11), or even “the Way” (1QS 9.17–18, 21). Members who joined the community were said to “enter the covenant” (1QS 1.18, 20). Chosen by divine predilection, they were the remnant of Israel (CD 1.4), the new Temple (1QS 8.5), the new plantation (1QS 11.8), the new people of God (1QM 1.5; 3.13), with whom He made a “new covenant” (CD 6.9; 20.12; cf. Jer 31.31). Their retreat to the desert was motivated by Is 40.3, “to prepare the way of the Lord” (1QS 8.14–15). There they lived an ascetic life, nourished by common work, prayer, study and interpretation of the Torah and the Prophets, strict observance of levitical purity regulations, and a conviction that it was already the “end of days” (1QpHab 2.5; 9.6). For the day of God's visitation was imminent; soon He would descend with His angels to do battle on the side of the “sons of light” (i.e., the community) and wipe out all sons of darkness and sinful opposition to them (1QM 1.5–12). Living in the end time, they believed that many savings of the Old Testament Prophets were being verified in the events of their sect. Their Righteous Teacher had received special revelations from God making known to him “all the secrets of the words of His servants the Prophets” (1QpHab 7.5). These formed the community's esoteric interpretation of the Old Testament. They awaited the advent of a Prophet (like Moses, Dt 18.18), and of two Anointed Ones (a priestly MESSIAH of Aaron and a royal Messiah of Israel: 1QS 9.11). A striking DUALISM colored their otherwise orthodox monotheism. God “created human beings to rule the world, and appointed for them two spirits by which they were to walk until the time of His visitation: the spirits of truth and of perversity” (1QS 3.17–19). This ethical dualism is expressed sometimes in terms of light and darkness, the Prince of Light and the Angel of Darkness, or a conflict between God and Belial.

Community life was marked by communal ownership of property. Though one entered the community voluntarily and became a full member only after two-thirds years of probation (1QS 6.13–18), one was expected to turn all property and earnings over to the community's overseer. Communal ownership was partly motivated by a contempt for worldly riches; these were to be left to the men of perdition, whereas the members formed the “community of the poor” (4Qp Ps 37 2.10).

The Community Rule (1QS) envisages a communal life without women; this agrees with the ancient notices about celibate Essenes in Pliny (Nat. Hist. 5.15.73) and Josephus (Bell. Jud. 2.8.2 No. 120). The Rule of the Congregation (1QSa 1.4–8), however, mentions women and children and gives instruction about the proper age for sexual intercourse. The Damascus Document (CD) also speaks of “taking wives according to the Law and begetting children” (7.6; 19.3). Since a few female skeletons were found in an annex to the main Qumran cemetery, the community apparently at some stage had both celibate and married members (see Josephus, Bell. Jud. 2.8.13 No. 160–161).

Besides priests and Levites, there were also laymen in the community, divided into groups of 1,000s, 100s, 50s, and 10s (1QS 2.21–22; cf. Ex 18.21, 25). A nucleus group was composed of 12 laymen and 3 priests, experts in the Law (1QS 8.1). The main affairs of the community were settled democratically in the “assembly of the Many,” but the executive administration of various affairs was in the hands of “a [lay] man appointed at the head of the Many” (1QS 6.14) and an “overseer of the [work of the] Many” (1QS 6.11, 20). The former was a sort of superior, the latter a sort of bursar; they were responsible for the admission of candidates, administration of property, and so on.

Two rites formed the main cultic exercises of daily life: purificatory washings and a common religious meal. The purificatory washings were apparently immersion baths, like those prescribed by the Old Testament for priestly cleanliness; they symbolized a sorrow for sins (1QS 3.4–5, 9; 5.13–14). Such purification was required before one partook of the common meal. The religious meal was presided over by a priest who was to bless the bread and the wine before anyone touched them. He took precedence even over the Messiah of Israel who was thought to be present (1QSa 2.11–20; 1QS 6.20–21).

In addition to these rites, there were also prayers at set hours, in the evening and at sunrise, and a liturgy of the Sabbath used by the community. The community’s Psalter, containing the canonical Psalms in a different order and their own Thanksgiving Psalms (1QH) (hōdāyōt), reveal the piety of the sect. The ancient solar calendar of 364 days regulated the community’s celebration of feasts, and on the Feast of Weeks each year the Covenant was renewed (Jubilees 6.17) and new members were admitted.

Bibliography: P. R. DAVIES, “Hasidim in the Maccabean Period,” Journal of Jewish Studies 28 (1977) 127–44. N. GOLB, Who Wrote the Dead Sea Scrolls? (New York–London 1995). M. GOODMAN, “A Note on the Qumran Sectarians, the Essenes and Josephus,” Journal of Jewish Studies 46 (1995) 161–166. L. H. SCHIFFMAN, Reclaiming the Dead Sea Scrolls (Philadelphia 1994). H. STEGEMANN, The Library of Qumran: On the Essenes, John the Baptist and Jesus (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1998). E. ULRICH and J. VANDERKAM, The Community of the Renewed Covenant (Christianity and Judaism in Antiquity 10; Notre Dame, Ind. 1994). M. A. KNIBB, The Qumran Community (Cambridge 1987). H. RINGGREN, The Faith of Qumran (Philadelphia 1963). For additional bibliography see DEAD SEA SCROLLS.

[J. A. FITZMYER]

The Appian Way, where it is believed Peter met with Jesus.
(©Bettmann/CORBIS)

QUO VADIS

Quo Vadis or Domine, quo vadis?, meaning Lord, where are you going?, a text from the Apocryphal Acts of Peter composed c. A. D. 190, probably in Syria or Palestine. An anecdote based on the text became a legend in patristic times and is referred to by ORIGEN (Comm. in Joan. 20.12; Patrologia Graeca 14:600) and AMBROSE OF MILAN (Sermo Contra Auxentium 13).

Peter is represented in flight from Rome during the persecutions of Nero; he meets Jesus on the Appian Way: “And when he saw him, he said, ‘Lord, whither goest thou?’ And the Lord said unto him, ‘I go into Rome to be crucified.’ And Peter said to him, ‘Lord, art thou being crucified again?’ He said to him, ‘Yes, Peter, I am being crucified again.’ Peter came to himself, and having beheld the Lord ascending up into Heaven, he returned to Rome, rejoicing and glorifying the Lord, because he said, ‘I am being crucified,’ which was about to befall Peter” (James, The Apocryphal New Testament 333).

The Acts of Peter record the condemnation of Peter by the prefect Agrippa, his request to be crucified head downward, and a long sermon that he delivered on the symbolic meaning of the cross. This discourse betrays Gnostic influence, as do certain other passages of the Acts of Peter. About two-thirds of the text have been recovered; small Greek and Coptic fragments and the main body in a Latin manuscript were found at Vercelli (Actus Vercellenses). Ambrose used the anecdote without reference to its Apocryphal character to show that, as Peter stood firmly with the Church, Ambrose would stand with the Church of Milan against the Arians.

Bibliography: M. R. JAMES, The Apocryphal New Testament (Oxford 1953). C. H. TURNER, "The Latin Acts of St. Peter," Journal of Theological Studies 32 (1930–31) 119–133. H. DANNENBAUER, "Nochmals die römische Petruslegende," Historische Zeitschrift 159 (1938) 81–88. J. QUASTEN, Patrology, (Westminster, Md. 1950–) 1:133–135. F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 1050, 1134.

[M. C. MCCARTHY]

QUODVULTDEUS, BISHOP OF CARTHAGE, ST.

Episcopate: 432 or 433 to 454. He acceded to the see in 432 or 433. Shortly after the Vandals seized Carthage in 439, their king Geiseric despoiled Quodvultdeus and placed him and a host of his fellow clergymen "naked on dangerous ships," according to Victor of Vita. Quodvultdeus arrived safely in Naples, where he spent the remainder of his life in exile. He died sometime before October 454, when Deogratias was ordained his successor. Soon after his death Quodvultdeus was honored as a saint and confessor in both Naples and Carthage.

Sometime during the years 445 to 450 Quodvultdeus composed his most substantial work, the Liber promissionum et praedictorum Dei, which until recently was falsely attributed to Prosper of Aquitaine. The tome is meticulously ordered into 153 chapters, based on the number of fish in the miraculous catch (Jn 21:11). Augustine's threefold schema of salvation history inspires the first three parts, each of 40 chapters: "Before the Law," "Under the Law," and "Under Grace." In the first two parts, Quodvultdeus demonstrates how various events, people and institutions of the Old Testament are types or figures of Christ and the Church. The third part consists largely of verbal Old Testament prophecies that he shows to be fulfilled in New Testament times. Next comes a section of 20 chapters titled "The Middle of Time" (dimidium temporis, Dn 7:25, Rv 12:14), which focuses on the three and one-half years during which Antichrist will reign before Christ's triumphant return. Following a pre-Constantinian Christian tradition, Quodvultdeus believes that the fall of the Roman Empire will precipitate the end of the world. Hence he interprets the upheaval of Roman order effected by the Vandals in Africa as a sign that the end is imminent and the apocalyptic period of tribulation is soon to come. The Liber ends with a section of 13 brief chapters entitled "The Glory and Reign of the Saints."

Early in the twentieth century several scholars argued that Quodvultdeus also authored a number of pseudo-Augustine sermons. R. Braun included 13 of these in his critical edition of Quodvultdeus' works. Although it is perhaps impossible to definitively prove that Quodvultdeus authored these sermons, many scholars accept the attributions, notwithstanding the objections of M. Simonetti. Certainly all the sermons come from the milieu of mid-fifth century Africa. In arguing against Judaism, paganism and heresies—especially the Arian heresy of the barbarian invaders—they solidly expound Catholic Christology. Nine of the sermons were delivered as baptismal catechesis; these contain expositions of the Creed as well as valuable information about the African baptismal liturgy. If Quodvultdeus is indeed their author, he must have delivered them in Carthage before being exiled.

Bishop Quodvultdeus is most likely the same person as the Deacon Quodvultdeus who wrote two letters to Augustine and received two responses (Augustine's Epist. 221 to 224) in 428 to 429. In his letters Quodvultdeus implored the Bishop of Hippo to write a treatise against heresies for use in the Church of Carthage. At first hesitating, Augustine finally conceded and composed De haeresibus, dedicating it to Deacon Quodvultdeus.

Bibliography: Clavis Patrum Latinorum E. DEKKERS, ed. (1995) 401–17b. R. BRAUN, Corpus Christianorum Series Latina (1976) v. 60. R. BRAUN, Sources Chrétiennes (1964) v. 101–02. T. FINN, Quodvultdeus of Carthage: Three Homilies on the Creed (Mahwah 2002). R. KALKMAN, "Two Sermons De tempore barbarico Attributed to St. Quodvultdeus, Bishop of Carthage—A Study of Text and Attribution with Translation and Commentary" (Ph.D. dissertation Catholic University of America 1963). R. BRAUN, Dictionnaire de spiritualité (Paris 1986) v. 13.2, 2881–89. T. FINN, Studia Patristica 31 (1997) 42–58. R. GONZÁLEZ-SALINERO, Revue des Études Juives 155 (1996) 447–59. H. INGLEBERT, Revue des Études Augustiniennes 37 (1991) 307–20. L. MÜLLER, The De haeresibus of Saint Augustine: a Translation with an Introduction and Commentary (Washington, D.C. 1956). R. DE SIMONE, Augustinianum 25 (1985) 265–82. M. SIMONETTI, Rendiconti parte generale e atti ufficiali 84 (1944–57) 407–24. W. STROBL, Vigiliae Christianae 52 (1998) 193–203. D. VAN SLYKE, "Quodvultdeus of Carthage: Political Change and Apocalyptic Theology in the Fifth Century Roman Empire" (Ph.D. dissertation Saint Louis University 2000).

[D. VAN SLYKE]

QUR'ĀN

The holy book of ISLAM, containing what are considered by the Muslims the revelations made by God to the Prophet MUḤAMMAD over the approximately 20 years of his apostolate. The English term is derived from the Arabic word qur'ān (from the root qr', to recite aloud, read), which would seem to have been borrowed from Syriac qiryānā, having the specifically religious sense of a recitation or reading of Scripture. The term is used in the work itself alongside a number of other terms [e.g., waḥy, tanzīl, revelation; dhikr, dhikra, tadhkira, calling to mind; furqān, that which separates good from evil (but in Syriac, “salvation”), etc.] to designate the revelation of God’s word, both in the interior experience of Muḥammad and as the expressed form and content of this experience as it was spoken by him and heard by the believers. It is termed “an Arabic Qur’ān” (12.2; 20.112; 39.29; 41.2; 43.2), being a revelation “in the Arabic language” (46.11) as opposed to non-Arabic revelations made to other prophets, viz, those of the Jews and Christians (cf. 16.105 and 41.44).

The Qur'ān (Archive Photos)

Arrangement. The Qur’ān, in its present form, is divided into 114 units or chapters called sūras (Arabic pl. suwar), which, varying in length from two lines to almost 700, are arranged in an order of decreasing length. The opening sūra (Fātiḥat al-kitāb), which is unique in being nothing more than a short prayer, stands outside this order as do the last two, which are imprecations against enchantment and evil spirits. In the earliest texts, following a practice no doubt already begun in the lifetime of the Prophet, the sūras were separated only by the basmala, i.e., the formula “In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful,” standing at the head of each sūra. The formula, however, certainly did not form a part of the earliest revelations but was added consistently throughout only later; and its absence at the beginning of sūra 9 would indicate that sūras 8 and 9 were originally taken to be a single unit. The earliest manuscripts contain simply a blank space between sūras, into which commonly used titles, taken generally from some distinctive element in the sūra, were later added, e.g., 2 is known as The Cow (cf., 2.63); 57, Iron (cf. 57.25); 50, Qāf (from the initial at the beginning); 87, The Most High (87.1). In contrast to the basmala the titles are in no way considered part of the text; they have fluctuated, and particular sūras may have more than one, e.g., 68 = al-Qalam or Nūn, 17 = ’asrā or banī Isrā’īl, while 9 has been known by many names, the most common of which are al-Tawba and al-Barā’a.

The individual sūras are divided into verses called ’āyāt, “signs” or “tokens” (sing. ’āya), a term used in the revelation itself (e.g., 10.1; 12.1; 13.1, “These are the ’āyāt . . .”). These verses do not necessarily coincide with sentence units, but rather form rhetorical pauses marked by a rhyming assonance called fāṣila, in contradistinction to the strict rhyme of poetry, which is called qāfiya. There is considerable variability in the strictness of the rhyme and the number of successive verses over which a single assonance may be maintained; also the length of the verses themselves varies from a single word to many lines. In the latest-written portions of the book, particularly in the legal sections, the lines are quite long with no discernible cadence and a very weak rhyme (most commonly -ūn, -īn, -īm); in contrast, some of the earlier sūras manifest a kind of saj' or cadenced, rhymed prose somewhat similar to that used in the oracular sayings and incantations of the ancient Arabian diviners (kāhin, pl. kahana), something which induced the pagan hearers of Muḥammad to call his utterances “the speech of a kāhin” (cf. 69.42 and 52.29).

Manner of Compilation. The present order of the sūras in no way reflects the chronological sequence of their composition or of the promulgation of their parts, but on the contrary roughly reverses it, the longest ones being for the most part from the Medinan period and the shortest from the earliest. Again, with a few exceptions, chiefly among the shortest, almost none of the sūras in their present form represent integral, primitive units of the revelation. Some sūras show a simple juxtaposition of two or more originally independent pieces of varying length, while frequently single verses have been introduced to qualify or expand the original text. In some cases incomplete fragments would seem simply to have been inserted into an original unit with little regard for its contextual or grammatical integration; but one must always be circumspect in making any such judgment in view of the “disjointed” appearance of much of Arabic literature on the one hand, and of prophetic literature in general. Though in some instances the parts of a particular sūra are from quite different periods of Muḥammad’s career, the majority are made up of elements generally more or less contemporary. Often the combination of originally independent elements is by simple juxtaposition; and though the process of combination could hardly have been as haphazard as some scholars have assumed, it is difficult, if not impossible, to determine what principles and method underlay the process. Whatever these may have been, the grouping must have taken place very early, and been almost, if not entirely, completed during the lifetime of the Prophet, since there is no tradition whatsoever indicating any order of verses within the sūras other than that of the present received text. Certain kinds of systematic arrangement of material would seem to have been consciously avoided; legal ordinances and admonitions, for example, rather than being grouped into a kind of unified code, are to be found in a number of separate sūras, and in each case are combined with homiletic and dogmatic elements, as if to maintain them always within the matrix of the religious and spiritual context that ultimately grounds their meaning. This is most notable in sūra 2, which forms a kind of constitution of the Muslim community at Medina; or in sūra 24, where precepts regarding adultery are juxtaposed with a magnificent passage on God as the light of the world (see also sūras 33, 58, and 65). In other cases there is to be found an intentional arrangement of homiletic material with “historical” narrative and descriptions of the last day.

Historical Setting. Although the Qur’ān, especially in the Meccan sūras, contains few unambiguous references to the historical events in the life of Muḥammad, the ISLAMIC TRADITIONS (ḤADĪTH), Arabic ḥadīth, furnish us with abundant if not always reliable information concerning the circumstances surrounding the revelation of particular verses and groups of verses. The most important sources are the Commentary of al-Ṭabarī and the works on the “occasions of the revelation” (‘asbāb al-nuzūl). Combining this information with a study of the style and content of various sections of the Qur’ān itself, it is possible to establish a general chronology of the sūras, i.e., to assign them to roughly designated periods of the Prophet’s career. To a great extent the parts belonging to the Medinan period are distinguishable by their style and content, the whole historical context of the revelation having altered with the HĪJRA. Here, too, our information concerning the history of the Muslim community becomes much more clear, and the relative chronology of many of the Medinan sūras can be established with some confidence. On the contrary, our information on the detail of the Prophet’s career at Mecca is anything but clear; for the sūras of this period, the most accurate classification that can be discerned is that given by T. Nöldeke, following the pioneer work of G. Weil and grouping them into three rough periods, early, middle, and late. Exact dates simply cannot be established.

Before the Hijra. According to the tradition the first revelation consisted in v. 1–5 of sūra 96 or v. 1–7 of 74, while the last revealed was sūra 9 and precisely, according to some sources, 9.120 (the whole sūra contains 130 v.). The earliest sūras manifest an abrupt and highly elliptical style, set forth in short, heavily cadenced, rhymed verses, the effect being one of terrible intensity and a remarkable rhetorical power. They contain calls to ritual purity before God, increasingly detailed arguments for God’s creative omnipotence, and vivid portrayals of the day of judgment; later one finds increasing threats against the pagans coupled with historical examples of the experience of past prophets and God’s punishment of the people who refused to heed their call. In the following period we find the same themes reiterated with an increasing emphasis on the absolute unicity of God (al-tawḥīd) and the necessity for good works (al-ṣāliḥāt), but the intensity of the style and the weight and variability of the rhyme is rather decreased as the descriptions of heaven and hell and of the last day, as well as the accounts of the prophets of the past, become more elaborated. Further, one begins to find here sūras built in a loose tripartite form that is continued into the following period. Such sūras open and close with a kind of homiletic exhortation or dogmatic exposition; in between, they offer some historical examples of God's judgment, in this world and the next, of those who refuse His commands and the words of His emissaries. Some few sūras may well originally have had this form, others have been so constructed out of smaller independent units. In the third period the same themes continue, set forth ever more explicitly. The theological content becomes denser as it is more expressly elaborated.

Medinan Period. In this period many former themes are continued, such as the attacks against idolatry and polytheism, warnings of the Last Judgment, the proclamation of God's unity and omnipotence. Yet there is a considerable shift in their overall appearance and structure; a number of new elements, reflecting the completely new circumstances of the Prophet and his followers, are introduced. Here one begins to find rather long sections containing legal precepts and regulations concerning diverse aspects of the social and moral life of the community. Then too, numerous passages reflect the conflicts with the non-Muslim inhabitants of Medina, the conflicts with the Jews, and the battles with and the final victory over the Quraysh and the Meccan opposition. The sūras of this period, which vary greatly in length, often seem to have little internal structure; the style varies from the lengthy, prosaic verses of the legal and narrative passages to echoes of the preceding period in passages of dogmatic and homiletic content.

Transmission of the Qur'ān. Though primary reliance had always to be upon memory, because the early Arabic orthography was grossly inadequate, there can be little doubt that various portions of the Qur'ān were reduced to writing quite early.

To the Death of Muḥammad. Tradition has it that some revelations were written down immediately on whatever materials were available, palm leaves, sherds, scraps of leather, shoulder blades of large animals, and the like. We are told according to one tradition that the sister of the future caliph 'Umar, on the eve of his conversion, in about the year 616, possessed a copy of sūra 20 (albeit we cannot know how much of the present sūra such a copy may have contained). Later, after the establishment of the Muslim community in Medina, Muḥammad seems to have dictated various portions of the book to his secretaries, the most important of whom were Zayd ibn Thābit and 'Ubay ibn Ka'b. Though the particular story may well be of doubtful authenticity, we hear also of his supervising Zayd ibn Thābit in the ordering and revision of certain portions of the work. Concerning the state of the text at the time of Muḥammad's death, we can be certain only that a universally accepted order of the verses within the sūras was definitively established. In the case of some of the shorter and earlier sūras this may have come about through their liturgical recitation by the prophet; but in the case of the longer ones, 2 through 5 for example, it is difficult to conceive how a definitive order could have been set and have gained recognition other than by their having somehow received written form under the direction of the Prophet. Exactly how the arranging was done remains, however, altogether uncertain, and any attempted solution must be conjectural. At the death of the Prophet there existed no official, authoritative recension of the entire corpus of the revelation. There did exist a number of private collections of leaves (ṣuḥuf) containing more or less extensive portions of the book, as well as several collections that were complete. In all these, as in the present recension, the order of the sūras, however many the individual collection may have contained, was already one of decreasing length.

Received Text of the Qur'ān. According to tradition, following the death of a number of Qur'ān readers in the battle of 'Aqrabā, Zayd ibn Thābit at the behest of 'Umar (or according to another, less reliable tradition, of Abū Bakr) set about to make a complete written compilation of the revelation. This he accomplished working from such fragmentary materials as were available to him in writing and from recitation by those who had memorized other parts of the book. The exact circumstances surrounding the original draft of Zayd ibn Thābit are quite obscure, but it is certain that it did not constitute an official text, for at the death of 'Umar the leaves passed into the possession of his daughter Ḥafṣa. We know also of other complete collections alongside that of Zayd; some of them enjoyed considerable prestige, most importantly those of 'Abdallāh ibn Mas'ūd, 'Ubay ibn Ka'b, Abū Mūsā al-'Ash'arī, and Miqdād ibn 'Amr, whose readings were long followed at Kūfa, Damascus, Baṣra, and Homs, respectively. Other complete recensions are attributed to 'Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib and Ibn 'Abbās. Finally during the reign of 'Uthmān, the need for a universally authoritative text that would forestall the growing disputes regarding various readings of the Book became more urgent and accordingly, in about A.H. 30–35, the Caliph established a commission to produce an official text. This commission, composed of Zayd ibn Thābit, 'Abdallāh ibn al-Zubayr, Sa'īd ibn al-'Aṣ, and 'Abdarrahmān ibn al-Ḥārith, then procured Zayd's original compilation from Ḥafṣa bint 'Umar and used it as the basis for their work. Upon the completion of the work, according to tradition, a number of copies were made, of which one was kept at Medina, while the others were sent to Damascus, Baṣra, and Kūfa along with the Caliph's orders to destroy all other copies. Whatever may be the truth of this account, the official recension almost immediately gained wide acceptance, despite the determined opposition of 'Abdallāh ibn Mas'ūd, who regarded Zayd ibn Thābit as a kind of upstart.

Variant Recensions. Though no copies of the early recensions have been preserved, some were yet in circulation as late as the 10th Christian century; their readings are widely cited in the commentaries, and they are described in a number of sources. Besides a number of variations in individual verses, the recensions of 'Ubay and Ibn Mas'ūd differ from the received text in the order of the sūras. The general principle of decreasing length is followed in all, but would seem most strict in that of Ibn Mas'ūd, whereas in that of Zayd ibn Thābit, the received text, there would seem to have been some attempt to maintain the integrity of certain groups that may have formed individual blocks of sūras in the partial collections from which he worked. This would be particularly true if we assume that the sūras beginning HM (40–46), LR (10–15), LM (2–3, 29–32), TH and TS(M) (20.26–28) belonged originally to individual collections designated by the initials; no. 32, for example, is notably shorter than 33. Again, the recension of Ibn Mas'ūd lacked the initial sūra (al-Fātiḥa) as well as the last two and combined, probably, 8 and 9 into a single unit, giving a total of 110 sūras. That of 'Ubay, on the other hand, contained, following sūra 103 of the present recension, two short sūras, no longer considered canonical, entitled respectively Sūrat al-Ḥal' and Sūrat al-Ḥafd (text in Nöldeke 2, 34–35), and may have combined into a single unit sūras 105–106 or sūras 93–94.

Teaching of the Qur'ān. The Prophet is not held to be the author of the Qur'ān, but only an emissary and witness who gives warning and announces good news (7.59–60; 48.8; 73.5; et passim); the words of the Qur'ān are fully distinct from Muḥammad's own words (75.16–18; 53.3–5; 69.44–46; 16.15–17; 87.6; 73.5), for the revelation forces itself upon his consciousness from without, coming unexpectedly upon him (17.88–89; 42.52).

Modes of Divine Revelation. The divine message is revealed to Muḥammad by an angel (2.91) or the Spirit of God (44.2) on "The Night of Power" (97), which traditionally is said to have been in the last 10 days of RAMADĀN (cf. 2.181). It is a "mighty Scripture" (41.41), completely overpowering (59.21), which was sent down by God as something preexisting (11.1; 20.99; 27.6; 3.5) in a celestial archetype (50.4; 56.77; 80.11–13), "the well-kept Tablet" (85.21) that is the core of the Scripture (43.3) and embodies God's eternal knowledge and judgment of all things (cf. 10.62; 27.77; 34.3), the total content of which is too great to be contained in any material document (18.108). Ultimately God's universal dominion is manifested in all things, and even the simplest processes of nature are signs or tokens ('āyāt) of His unity and creative power (passim). "In whatever direction you turn, there is the face of God . . ." (2.115), "who created each thing and fixed its measure" (25.2; 5.120) and "who is closer to man than his own jugular vein" (50.15). He manifests His signs within the immediacy of consciousness and in the horizons of the created world (41.53; 51.20–21), showing Himself in the simple alternation of night and day (36.37; etc.), and in the growth of man from conception to senility and death (8.5–7; 16.72; 40.69; etc.). In all things there is an allusion ('ibra) to God's Being (32.21; 16.68) for "those who can see" (24.44), "who will reflect and understand" (45.4, 12; 16.11–13; etc.), and will "perhaps show gratitude and be guided aright" (16.13–15; etc.). His signs are effective for those who have opened themselves to Him in faith (45.2–3; 79.26; 10.6; etc.), but this opening ('iṣrāḥ) and receptivity to God's grace is ultimately worked by God (cf. 6.125–127; 39.23; 94.1–3; 76.29–30; 74.53–55; etc.). Even when Abraham is said, in a famous passage (6.75–80), to have concluded from the observation of natural phenomena that God is One and Almighty, the text notes that "Thus we showed Abraham the kingdom of the heavens and the earth, that he might become one of those who have the certitude [of faith]."

Historical Revelation and the Qur'ān. As a gratuitous act of mercy (rahma, ni'ma) toward the human race (21.84; 45.19; 11.30, 66; 28.46; 29.50; 38.42) God sends His emissaries (rusul) and prophets ('anbiyā', nabiyyīn) to humanity with the Scripture, wherein His signs are set forth explicitly and unequivocally (11.1; 10.38; 41.1; but cf. also 3.5) as a guidance (hudā), admonition, and healing (10.58; 17.74)—a calling to mind (dhikr, 20.99; 74.34; etc.) of His omnipotence, a warning of impending judgment and doom (6.19; 37.69; etc.) and promise of beatitude (39.19; etc.), a call to worship God alone (57.25; 29.2; 6.102; etc.) and to live according to the norms of justice and morality demanded and decreed by Him. The signs ('āyāt) of the Scripture are the signs par excellence, for it is through them that all other signs are brought to man's attention and made intelligible. Recited by God's emissaries (45.24; etc.), they are self-expressing in that they address themselves immediately to the understanding of the hearer in the clear form of articulate language. As opposed to the worldly and self-centered human inclinations (al-'ahwā'), which tend to lead them away from God (10.37; 28.50; 47.15; etc.), the revelation is given from God Himself and is taught by Him (53.3–5; 7.60; 47.16; etc.). In the acceptance of the revelation as the teaching of God lies the only true knowledge ('ilm, cf. 30.56; 34.6; 29.48; etc.) as opposed to merely human opinion (ẓann, cf. 53.39; 49.12; 10.37, 67; 4.156–158; etc.); it is the Divine Truth (ḥaqq, 13.1; 10.94; etc.), which destroys the vanity of untruth (17.83; 8.6–8; etc.), being the manifestation of God who is the ultimate truth (10.33; 22.6, 61; etc.); it is the light that God gives to whom He will (42.52) wherein and whereby men should be guided (6.91; 57.9; etc.) to God, the source, who is “the light of the heavens and the earth” (24.35); wherefore the true believers, when they hear these signs fall prostrate and glorify God (7.108; 32.15; etc.). In the Qur'ān, God Himself reveals Himself, the unknowable and transcendent (al-ḡayb), in His attributes and names ('asmā'uhu al-ḥusnā) and thereby, since He is the maker of all creation and the ground of all being, He makes manifest to the believer the true nature (ḥaqq) of created existence. This notion of the Qur'ān as the supreme self-manifestation of God to His creatures is extremely important to the dogma of the miraculous inimitability (al-'i'jāz) of the Qur'ān and for the development, among the orthodox theologians, of the thesis that it is uncreated (see KALĀM) as well as for an understanding of the place of the book in Muslim piety.

Man's Response to Revelation. According to the Qur'ān, man's response to God's words ought to be immediate, for God has created him and given him all his powers of perception and understanding (32.8; 16.80; 67.23; 76.2), and at the very foundation of his being lies an innate testimony that God is his Lord (7.171). Through the Prophet He calls men to submit themselves completely to Himself, worshiping Him alone and living according to His law. Men, however, are all too frequently distracted by their engagement in the pursuit of the goods of the world (10.7; 77.16–17; 30.6; 6.69; 45.34; etc.), being seduced by their competition in “the ornaments of this life” (57.38; 64.15; 58.18; etc.). They are by nature anxious and grasping (70.19–21; cf. also 41.49–51; 11.12–13; 30.33–35; 42.50; etc.) and do not look beyond their material existence (45.22–23). The Qur'ān recognizes the importance of a number of sociological factors that blind men to God's message—group solidarity, tradition, etc. (7.27, 68; 9.23; 43.21–30; etc.)—and the obstinate pride in social position that characterizes those who refuse God's signs (7.73–75; 40.24; 74.16–23; 71.6; 63.5; 46.19; 16.25), in contrast to the attitude of the God-fearing (16.71; 21.19; etc.), who are willing to abandon these things (59.22).

Sanctions and Determinism. The insensibility to God's signs and the preaching of His word (al-kalām; cf. 2.70; 9.6; 7.141) appears as a kind of spiritual blindness (7.187; 8.22; 2.9; 9.126), realized in a conscious obstinacy and refusal to perceive (see 71.6); and men's perseverance in this refusal to accept God's guidance is ultimately ratified and made permanent by God who so seals their hearts (10.75; 63.3) that, regardless of what the Prophet may say or do, they will never believe (36.9; 7.192; 6.25; 17.45–49; 10.43–44; 18.55; 39.43; 30.51; 43.39). It is as if there were an impediment in their hearing (41.4, 44; 31.6) and a veil between them and the Prophet (17.47). God grants His mercy and guidance to whom He will (24.45; 76.30; 81.27–29; 6.125; 39.23–24) and none can mislead him whom God guides aright (39.38). If He wished, all men would believe (6.107; 32.13), for all creatures are under God's immediate providence (11.59). He refuses, however, to guide the unjust and the sinful and those who refuse Him (9.37, 110; 28.50; 46.9; 16.109; 39.5; 40.29; etc.). In many passages the Qur'ān is deterministic: “There is no guide for those whom God leads astray, but He lets them go, to wander lost in their excess” (7.176–177; cf. also 2.14; 16.110; 6.39; 16.39; 14.4; 13.33; 18.16; 38.24; etc.). On the other hand, the Qur'ān insists at the same time that God does not wrong men, but, rather, that they wrong themselves (16.35, 119; 10.45; 18.47; etc.); He does not punish them until they themselves have done evil (8.55; etc.), each person receiving ultimately in heaven or hell the rewards of what he has done (passim), for this life is a test of their goodness and justice (67.1; 18.6; 16.94; 21.36; 6.165; etc.). God demands of no one more than that of which he is capable (2.233; 6.153; 7.40), for He is “merciful and forgiving” (passim). In the final analysis the Qur'ān does not try to solve the mystery of God's justice; what may be its final statement on the subject is put into the mouth of Jesus: “You know what is in my soul, but I do not know what is in Yours. You, indeed, have complete knowledge of the hidden If You punish them,—they are Your servants; and if you forgive them,—You are the Almighty, the All-wise . . . ; to God belongs the dominion of the heavens and the earth and what is in them; over all things He is Mighty” (5.116–118).

Muḥammad, the Prophets, and Jesus. The Qur'ān contains many accounts, often extremely elliptical, of those whom God sent with His message in the past. With few exceptions [viz, Idrīs, Ṣāliḥ, Ṣu'ayb, Dhû 1-Kifl] all those mentioned are Biblical, though the accounts given show a greater affinity frequently to haggadic and other noncanonical sources than to the Bible itself. According to the Qur'ān, the revelation given to Muḥammad continues a long tradition (3.2; etc.) and has the same content as the “Leaves of Abraham and Moses” (87.19); as he is a Prophet to the Gentiles (nabī 'ummī), God has laid upon him the same injunction as upon “Abraham, Moses, and Jesus” (42.11), though he is, nevertheless, the “seal of the prophets” (33.40), Abraham is the highest example of the purest Islamic faith (37.81–82; 16.124;

22.77; etc.) and a model for all believers (60.4); he was the founder of the faith, the chosen friend of God (4.124), “neither Jew nor Christian” but Muslim and ḥanīf (3.60; 2.134; 16.121; etc.), who founded the sanctuary at Mecca (22.27; 2.118–120; etc.). Moses also, whose encounter with Pharaoh is frequently recalled, was given the Scripture (al-Kitāb, 2.53, etc.), i.e., the Torah (al-Tawrāt), which is considered a single revelation, one book; he belonged to the same faith (42.13). Later John the Baptist (Yaḥyā ibn Zakarīyā’), whose miraculous birth is recounted in sūras 3 (v. 38–40) and 19 (v. 1–3), preached the unity of God (6.83) to the Israelites. To Jesus, the Messiah (al-Masīh, ‘Īsā ibn Maryam) was revealed the Gospel (al-’Injīl), likewise considered as a single book of revelation (3.43). Jesus, like Adam, was created directly by God’s command (3.52) and is called the “word of God” (3.45), i.e., His creative word “which was cast into Mary” (4.169; see also 3.59; 66.12), who was purified and chosen above all women (3.37). He is called “The Spirit of God” (4.169) and “a sign for the human race and an act of mercy from” God (19.21). Though giving Him a place of preeminence and proximity to God in this world and the next (3.40), the Qur’ān nevertheless denies categorically that He is God (5.19, 76–77) or the Son of God (9.30; 19.35–36); both notions Muḥammad considered idolatrous. In this way the Trinity, which is taken to be made up of God, Jesus, and Mary (4.169–170), is denounced as a tritheism; rather Jesus is simply a servant of God (‘abd), an emissary (rasūl), and prophet (nabī; 5.116–118; 19.31), with whom God has made the same pact as with His other prophets, Muḥammad, Noah, Abraham, and Moses (33.7).

Bibliography: The two principal English translations are:

M. W. PICKTHALL, tr., The Meaning of the Glorious Koran (London 1930). A. J. ARBERRY, tr. and ed., The Koran Interpreted, 2 v. (New York 1955). Principal studies include: K. CRAGG, The Event of the Qur’an; Islam in its Scripture (London 1971). A. T. WELCH, ed., Studies in Qur’an and Tafsir (Chico, CA 1979). F. RAHMAN, Major Themes of the Qur’an (Minneapolis 1980). A. RIPPIN, ed., Approaches to the History of the Interpretation of the Qur’an (Oxford/New York 1988). H. GÄTJE, ed. The Qur’an and Its Exegesis: Selected Texts with Classical and Modern Muslim Interpretations (Rockport, Maine 1996). M. A. A. HALEEM, Understanding the Qur’an: Themes and Style (London/New York 1999). A. RIPPIN, The Qur’an: Formative Interpretation (Brookfield, VT 1999). M. A. COOK, The Koran, A Very Short Introduction (Oxford/New York 2000). A. WESSELS, Understanding the Qur’an (London 2000). J. D. MCAULIFFE and B. WALFISH, With Reverence for the Word: Medieval Scriptural Exegesis in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam (New York 2002).

[R. M. FRANK/EDS.]

R

RA (RE)

Sun-god of ancient Egypt and chief god of the pantheon of Heliopolis. The term r' (pronounced rā' or rē') was the Egyptian word for the sun. A large part of the Egyptian religion was connected with the worship of the sun, which was the primary source of existence. Ra, the sun, in the widest and most general sense, was considered the creator of everything. Since the Egyptian state was god-given and established when the world was created, the monarchy was as old as the world, for the creator himself had assumed kingly office on the day of creation. Ra was called the first king of Egypt, and the pharaoh was his descendant and successor. As Ra put order (ma'at) in the place of chaos, so the pharaoh's achievements were described in exactly the same way. From the beginning the king had been the god Horus or Har-akhti (symbolized by a hawk), the son of ISIS and Osiris. During the Fifth Dynasty the king became the son of Ra at Heliopolis (On). A millennium later, the previously obscure creator god AMON of Thebes (No-Amon) was identified with Ra. Pharaoh Amenhotep IV (c. 1364–1347 B.C.) broke with Amonism, changed his own name to AKHNATON (AKH-EN-ATON), moved the capital from Thebes to Tell el-Amarna, and instituted the pure worship of Aton, the sun disc, in an attempt to suppress all other worship. However, throughout Egyptian history there was a tendency toward syncretism, so that the supreme god Ra could be identified with Atum (the god of "all" of the Heliopolis pantheon) and worshiped under the name of Ra-Atum or identified with other gods, so that he had such names as Amon-Ra, Ra-Har-akhti, and Khnum-Ra. This might have led (but did not) to true monotheism.

See Also: EGYPT, ANCIENT, 1.

Bibliography: K. H. SETHE, Amun und die acht Urgötter von Hermopolis (Berlin 1929). J. A. WILSON, The Burden of Egypt: An Interpretation of Ancient Egyptian Culture (Chicago 1951; pa. The Culture of Ancient Egypt 1956). H. FRANKFORT, Ancient Egyptian

Religion (New York 1961). For additional bibliography see EGYPT, ANCIENT, 1.

[H. MUELLER]

RABANUS MAURUS, BL.

Rabanus (Hrabanus, Rhabanus) Magnentius Maurus, Benedictine theologian, Praeceptor Germaniae, abbot of Fulda, archbishop of Mainz; b. Mainz, of a noble family (hence Magnentius?), 776 (784?); d. Winkel (Vinicellum) on the Rhine, Feb. 4, 856. Rabanus received his early education at Fulda, where he was ordained deacon in 801. In 802 he was sent to Tours to study under ALCUIN, from whom he received the sobriquet "Maurus" (a reference to St. Maur, disciple of St. Benedict) in recognition of his scholastic abilities. Recalled to Fulda in 803, he was made director of the monastic school there, which became, under his guidance, one of the most outstanding in Germany, numbering among its pupils such famous personages as WALAFRID STRABO and Otfrid of Weissenburg. Rabanus was ordained on Dec. 12, 814. From 822 to 842, as abbot of Fulda, he furthered the spiritual, intellectual, and temporal welfare of the monastery, erected buildings and churches, collected MSS and art treasures, and continued his own scholarly, literary, and exegetical endeavors. In the political struggle between Louis the Pious and his sons, Rabanus supported Louis and, on Louis' death, gave his allegiance to LOTHAIR I. When the latter was defeated by Louis the German in 840, Rabanus fled his monastery. He returned in 841 but retired in 842 to nearby Petersberg, where he devoted himself to prayer and literary work until he was called in 847 to become archbishop of Mainz. As archbishop he was zealous in instructing clergy and laity, in combating social disorders, and in defending sound doctrine. He held three provincial synods: in 847, to deal with matters of ecclesiastical discipline; in 848, to condemn the monk GOTTSCHALK OF ORBAIS and his doctrine of PREDESTINATION to evil as well as to good; in 852 (851?), to deal with the rights and disciplines of the Church.

Temple of Ramses II, 1257 B.C., Abu Simbel, Nubia. (©Roger Wood/CORBIS)

Rabanus was a voluminous writer. He produced a study on grammar (De arte grammatica), a collection of homilies for the Church year (not all certainly his), two penitentials, a martyrology, and some Latin poetry (the VENI CREATOR SPIRITUS is probably not his), which reveals him as a skilled versifier but a mediocre poet. In addition, he compiled a pedagogical treatise (De institutione clericorum) in three books, composed not later than 819 and relying heavily on Augustine, Gregory the Great, and Isidore; an encyclopedic dictionary (usually entitled De universo, though more properly called De rerum naturis), consisting of 22 books based on the Etymologies of ISIDORE OF SEVILLE; and extensive commentaries on the Bible (among others, on the Heptateuch, Ruth, Proverbs, Jeremias, Ezechiel, Wisdom, Maccabees, Matthew, and the Pauline Epistles). Though a learned and scholarly man (he was probably unequaled in his lifetime for scriptural and patristic learning), Rabanus was by no means an original thinker. His writings, compiled, like those of Alcuin, with the help of pupils, consist in large part of extracts from other sources and are important more for their role in the CAROLINGIAN RENAISSANCE and in the establishment of learning in Germany than for any intrinsic merit of their own. There is no complete critical edition of his works. Rabanus was buried in the monastery of St. Albans at Mainz, but his relics were later translated to Halle by Abp. ALBRECHT OF BRANDENBURG. He is honored as a saint (or beatus) in Mainz, Fulda, Limburg, and Breslau.

Feast: Feb. 4.

Bibliography: Editions. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90), v.107–112, reproduces Hrabani Mauri opera, ed. J. DE PAMELE (d. 1587) 6 v.in 3 (Cologne 1626–27). Rabanus' extensive and important correspondence is in Monumenta Germaniae Historica Epistolae (Berlin 1826–), 5.2:37–533. De institutione clericorum, ed. A. KNOEPFLER (Munich 1900). The poems are in Monumenta Germaniae Historica Poetae (Berlin 1826–), 2:154–258; Analecta hymnica (Leipzig 1886–1922), 50:180–209. The Life by his disciple Rudolfus [Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90), v.107] is unreliable. Literature. W. KOSCH, Deutsches Literatur-Lexikon, ed. B. BERGER in 1 v. (Bern 1963) 189, selected bibliog. to 1960. A. HAUCK, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, 5 v. (9th ed. Berlin–Leipzig 1958), 2:638–659, passim. P. LEHMANN, “Zu Hrabans geistiger Bedeutung,” in Sankt Bonifatius: Gedenkgabe zum zwölfhundertsten Todestag (Fulda 1954) 473–487. H. PELTIER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 13.2:1601–20, good bibliog. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 1:288–302. M. BERNARDS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:499–500.

[M. F. MCCARTHY]

RABBI

Title of a Jewish religious teacher. The word is derived from the Hebrew rabbî (literally, “my master”), which in New Testament times was used only as a term of address. In time the force of the possessive adjective fell away and the word came to be used as title in the third person (cf. monsignor, literally “my elder”).

In the New Testament. Although the term rabbi does not occur in the Old Testament, by the first Christian century it must have become common, for the Gospels frequently show the disciples of Jesus (Mt 26.25, 49; Mk 9.5; 11.21; 14.45; Jn 1.49; 4.31; 9.2; 11.8) and other people (Jn 3.2; 6.25) addressing Him as “Rabbi” (ῥαββί). In Jn 1.38 the term is explained as equivalent to διδάσκαλε (teacher), and this word is often used in the Gospels as a substitute for it in addressing Jesus (Mt 8.19; 12.38; etc.; Mk 4.38; 9.17, 38; etc.; Lk 7.40; 9.38; etc.; Jn 8.4). In Luke, where the word rabbi does not occur, Jesus is often addressed by another Greek equivalent ἐπιστάτα (master: Lk 5.5; 8.24, 45; etc.). A heightened form of Semitic rab (chief, master) is Aramaic rabbān, Hebrew rabbôn, and the latter with the suffix -î (my) is rabbônî; Jesus is thus addressed in Mk 10.51; Jn 20.16 (usually written ῥαββουεὶ in the Greek MSS). Except in addressing Jesus, the term rabbi is used in the Gospels only once in addressing John the Baptist (Jn 3.26) and twice in Our Lord's condemnation of the Scribes and Pharisees, who loved to be addressed by this title (Mt 23.7–8).

In Judaism. In current English, the word rabbi designates the spiritual leader of a Jewish community, Orthodox, Conservative, or Reform. The office of rabbi reached its present development through stages that are not always easy to pinpoint in history. In Talmudic times (roughly from 200 B.C. to A.D. 500) there were two categories of rabbi, the rabbi teachers and the rabbi judges (dayyanim). The former qualified for their teaching function by their learning and ability to interpret. They did not receive a salary for their teaching activity, but supported themselves by the pursuit of some trade or profession. The rabbi judge was empowered by the Palestinian authorities on the basis of his understanding of the law and his personal integrity. He was paid a fee for the time he consumed in adjudicating a case. At times the function of teaching and judging merged in the person of one rabbi.

In the 12th century there emerged a type of rabbi comparable in position and function to the modern rabbi. To permit the rabbi to devote more time to rabbinical activity it became common to pay him for his services to the community and thereby free him from the need of working to sustain himself. In the wake of salaried rabbis it came to be customary to stipulate in writing the specific services that a given congregation anticipated from its rabbi. Among other things, a rabbi was expected to set up and preside over a community court, organize and supervise a lower school and an academy, and to participate in circumcision, BAR MITZVAH, marriage, and other ceremonies. On occasion rabbis have been charged with the performance of civil functions; for example, the collection of taxes for the government. This usage eventually grew into the office of chief rabbi maintained at various times in certain countries of Europe, e.g., Spain, Portugal, and England. The chief rabbi was in effect a government appointee authorized to oversee the taxation of Jews and to represent their interests in the particular country.

In the past the training of a rabbi consisted almost exclusively in Jewish studies. However, from the 19th century on, chiefly under the influence of Leopold Zunz (1794–1886) and Abraham Geiger (1810–74) in Germany, considerably more stress has been put upon the secular sciences. This new emphasis on the profane disciplines was intensified in some instances by civil government; for certain European states, among them France and Austria, began to require a general education of rabbinical aspirants. The main rabbinical seminaries in the United States are the Yeshiva University, New York City (Orthodox), the Hebrew Theological Seminary, New York City (Conservative), and the Hebrew Union College, Cincinnati (Reform).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1974–75. H. ERHARTER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 8:957. E. L. DIETRICH, Die Religion in Gesch- ichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 5:759. M. M. BERMAN, The Role of the Rabbi (New York 1941). A. J. FELDMAN, The Rabbi and His Early Ministry (New York 1941).

Manuscript illustration depicting Rabanus Maurus being presented to St. Martin by Abbot Albinus, from "De Laude Sanctae Crucis," 9th century.

[J. C. TURRO]

RABBINICAL BIBLES

Printed editions of the Hebrew Scriptures with the Masoretic Text and the Targum in parallel columns surrounded by various rabbinic commentaries, such as those of RASHI, ABRAHAM IBN EZRA, NAḤMANIDES, and David Kimchi, in the margins. Termed miqrā'ôt ge dōlōt (large editions of the Scriptures) in Hebrew, they include also the apparatus of the Masora giving variant readings and other reference data. The several editions of rabbinical Bibles may differ from each other in the numbers and types of commentaries included.

The first rabbinical Bible, published by Daniel BOMBERG in Venice in 1516–17, was edited by Felix PRATEN-SIS, a Jewish convert to Christianity. This edition is the first to give the qerê and kefîb variants and to establish the division of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles into two books each, as well as to separate Ezra and Nehemiah. Pratensis was meticulous in his attempt to fix the Biblical text insofar as the MSS at his disposal permitted, even citing the minutest variations in vocalic and accentual notation as well as the peculiar sizes and positions of certain letters.

Bomberg's second edition, 1524–25, was edited by Jacob ben Ḥayyim. It differs from the first in that Ben

Polish Rabbi, ca. 1865-1875. (©Scheufler Collection/CORBIS)

Ḥayyim sought to produce the authoritative form of the scriptural text by collating and comparing material from many manuscripts. For this purpose, he included the Masora magna, parva, and finalis. He also indicated the open and closed sections by the initial letters of the Hebrew equivalents for these terms.

His version of the Masoretic text became the standard for all subsequent editions of the Hebrew Bible, critical and otherwise, well into the 20th century. Modern studies, however, have demonstrated that Ben Ḥayyim was eclectic in his selection of variant readings and his sources were neither old nor necessarily accurate.

After Bomberg's third edition, 1546–48, edited by Cornelius Alkind, there were three subsequent publications of his rabbinical Bible: Treves, Germany (no date); Venice, 1617–19; and Basel, 1618–19. The last, by Johannes Buxtorf, the Elder, possesses a hybrid scriptural text derived from both the text of Ben Ḥayyim and that of the Complutensian Polyglot, 1513–17 (see POLYGLOT BIBLES).

The seventh rabbinical Bible, called Qe'hillôt Mōšeh, was published in Amsterdam by Moses ben Simeon Frankfurter in 1724–27 in four volumes. The Warsaw Rabbinical Bible issued by Abraham Baer Lebensohn in 1860–68 is in 12 volumes and contains 32 commentaries.

Bibliography: R. GOTTHEIL, The Jewish Encyclopedia, ed. J. SINGER (New York 1901–06) 3:158–161. P. E. KAHLE, The Cairo Geniza (2d ed. New York 1960) 120–124, 129–131.

[R. KRINSKY]

RABBULA

Rabbula was a fifth-century Syrian bishop of Edessa and theologian; b. Qennešrīn, near Aleppo, c. 350; d. Edessa, 435 or 436. Son of a pagan father and Christian mother, Rabbula was well educated and knew Greek. He entered the civil service and rose to prefect, but c. 400 was converted and became a monk. In 411 he was elected bishop of Edessa and devoted himself to the reform of the Church, particularly of the clergy and monks. He strongly opposed Jewish, pagan, and Gnostic influences in Syria. At the Council of EPHESUS (431) he took the part of CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA, and in the difficulties that followed he excommunicated Andrew of Samosata and broke with Alexander of Hierapolis, charging them with Nestorian leanings (before Easter 432). At Cyril's request he translated the Alexandrian's De recta fide into Syriac; wrote two series of rules for priests and monks; preached against Nestorius and on the agape for the deceased. He is credited with having written some of the hymns in the Syriac (Jacobite) liturgy, but their authenticity is doubtful. The vita written apparently c. 450 by an Edessan ecclesiastic is only partially trustworthy. His authorship of the Syriac version of the Bible, the PESHITTA, is seriously questioned. He had difficulty with his clergy, and particularly Ibas of Edessa during the last years of his life, and seems to have been in ill health for a long time. Only fragments of his correspondence have been preserved.

Bibliography: J. OVERBECK, ed., S. Ephraemi Syri, Rabulae Episcopi Edesseni . . . Opera (Oxford 1865) 159–209, Vitae, 222–248, homilies and letters; liturgy. A. VÖÖBUS, Investigations into the Text of the New Testament Used by Rabbula (Pinneberg 1947); Early versions of the New Testament (Stockholm 1954); History of Asceticism the Syrian Orient, v.2 (Corpus scriptorum Christianorum orientaliū) (197; Paris–Louvain) 154–158; L'Orient syrien 7 (1962) 297–306, letter to Gemillinos; Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:958–959; ed. and tr., Syriac and Arabic Documents (Stockholm 1960). P. E. PUSEY, Sancti patris nostri Cyrilli . . . de recta fide (Oxford 1877) 1–33. P. PEETERS, Recherches de science religieuse 18 (1928) 170–204. I. ZIADÉ, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 13.2:1620–26.

[P. ROCHE]

RABELAIS, FRANÇOIS

French satirist; b. near Chinon, c. 1483; d. Paris, April 1553. He entered religion as a Franciscan novice probably in 1511; by 1521 he was already a priest at the Fontenay-le-Comte monastery of the Observantine Friars Minor. After difficulties with superiors over the study of Greek, he received an indult from Clement VII to join the Benedictine monastery-cathedral at Maillezais, whose abbot, Bishop Geoffroi d'Estissac, encouraged his studies. Without permission, he matriculated at the Medical Faculty, Montpellier (Sept. 17, 1530) in the garb of a secular priest. His graduation six weeks later was not as unusual as it now seems, but is proof of serious medical studies. In Rome, as personal physician to Cardinal Jean du Bellay, he obtained (1536) absolution from his irregularities and, by an agreed subterfuge, entered the Cardinal's Benedictine monastery at Saint-Maure-les-Fossés, just as it was about to be secularized. He was then named a supplementary prebendary canon. Toward the end of his life (1551) he was nominated to the cure of souls at Saint-Martin-de-Meudon, but never resided. He resigned the living on Jan. 9, 1553. He was the father of a son who died in infancy, and of two other children, legitimated by Paul III. His principal works were: Pantagruel (1532), Gargantua (1534), Tiers livre de Pantagruel (1546), and Quart livre de Pantagruel (partial version 1548, revised and completed 1552). The Cinquiesme livre de Pantagruel (1564), partially published 1562 as l'Isle sonnante, could not as it stands have been by Rabelais. Some scholars accept various parts as his, but their authenticity is not yet proved. His minor works include almanacs and prognostications (mainly evangelical and satirical in intention) and editions of works by Galen, Hippocrates, Manardi, etc. Several of his letters are extant.

Patrons and Persecution. At various times Bp. Geoffroi d'Estissac, Cardinal Jean du Bellay and his brother Guillaume, Margaret of Navarre, and Cardinal Odet de Châtillon protected Rabelais. He corresponded with Erasmus and Budé and had many learned friends, including the humanist lawyer Tiraqueau. Despite this support, all his novels were condemned on publication by the Sorbonne, the Parlement de Paris, or both, with the possible exception of Gargantua (condemned certainly in 1543). Francis I enjoyed his works, considered them free from heresy, and gave a fulsome privilege to the Tiers livre. Some months after the Affaire des placards (October 1534), when posters attacking the "idolatry" of the Mass led to severe repercussions, Rabelais abruptly abandoned his post of doctor to the Hôtel-Dieu at Lyons and for a time "disappeared." Later hostile theological reaction to the Tiers livre caused him to flee to the imperial town of Metz. After the condemnation of the Quart livre, it was rumored that he was imprisoned; this is possible, but unlikely. He was buried with honor in St. Paul's, Paris.

François Rabelais. (Archive Photos)

Rabelais's Ideology. Few scholars now discern hidden atheism in his work, and his "obscenity," though still shocking, is seen to serve a genuine artistic purpose. Pantagruel and, to some extent, Gargantua (both published anonymously) were presented as popular tales of giants, but their serious intent was soon recognized. In them Rabelais satirized the monastic ideal and the superstitious veneration of saints, as well as old-fashioned education and university theology. His liberal evangelism owes much to Erasmus and Lefèvre d'Étaples, and something to Luther, though Rabelais was no Lutheran. He strongly advocated the study of classical languages and thought, including law and medicine, and showed a pronounced preference for Plato over Aristotle. He opposed aggressive wars and the spread of the Gospel by force. His praise of fertile marriage was partly antimonastic in intention, but deeply Christian, indeed scholastic, in exposition. Perhaps under Lutheran influence, he tends at times to equate fides with fiducia ("faith" with "trust"), though in some ways his ideas retain a Franciscan mark.

Both Lutheran and Franciscan influences on his thought, however, have probably been overstressed. In the Tiers livre he exploits the renewed literary interest in matrimony, feminism, and antifeminism as a means of mocking λαυτία (self love), and he does it in the name of Christian Platonism and Stoicism, though with cynical and skeptical undertones. His evangelical propaganda is less overtly aggressive, except in his mockery of the doctrine of contrition and his condemnation of clandestine marriage. He follows the Reformers in denying the validity of ecclesiastical marriage law in the name of equity, natural law, and imperial law, with some reference to the Old Testament. He jests at Galen's opinions on the womb and the nature of semen, and advocates a Platonic-Christian morality that acknowledges the urgency of the sex-instinct in woman, but denies its necessary dominance in man. In the Quart livre, with the support of Cardinal de Châtillon, Rabelais took advantage of the crisis between the Holy See and the French Court (1551) to mock the Council of Trent as the "concile national de Chésil" (Hebrew Kessil, fool).

Under cover of GALLICANISM, he championed extreme evangelical opinions and followed the Reformers in calling the papal party worshippers of a Deus in terris, but without suggesting, as they did, that the pope desired the excesses of such worship. He satirized the DECRE-TALS as Antichrist's parody of the Scriptures, rejecting, as based on their "usurped authority" alone, all monastic orders, papal claims to rights over princes and universities, as well as the doctrines of the Keys, purgatory, and supererogation. He mocked his comic bishop for asserting that we must love our neighbors as ourselves provided they are not heretics. Rabelais was strongly anti-Calvinist, rejecting, in the name of SYNERGISM, both the enslaved will of Lutheranism and Calvinistic predestination. His theology, like that of many Christian humanists, was syncretistic with Pan as its symbol in the Quart livre. The dying Pan of Plutarch was, for Rabelais, no devil but Christ Himself, the Good Shepherd (Πῶν), the Christian's All (Πᾶν). Despite his outspoken satire, the question of his orthodoxy, within the wide tolerance of his day in France, remains to be settled.

Bibliography: Oeuvres, ed. A. LEFRANC et al., 5 v. (Paris 1913–31); v.6 (Geneva 1955–), v.6 contains opening chs. of Le Quart livre; for complete text and recent scholarship, with listed eds. of individual works, see Le Quart livre, ed. R. MARCHEL (Geneva 1947). J. PLATTARD, La Vie et l'oeuvre de Rabelais (Paris 1939). L. P. FEBVRE, Le Problème de l'incroyance au XVI^e siècle: La Religion de Rabelais (rev. ed. Paris 1947). M. A. SCREECH, Rabelaisian Marriage (London 1958); L'Évangélisme de Rabelais (Geneva 1959). A. J. KRAILSHEIMER, Rabelais and the Franciscans (Oxford 1963).

[M. A. SCREECH]

RACCOLTA

An Italian word meaning collection or gathering. It is frequently used in canonical language to signify a collection of documents regarding a particular subject, such as religious, pastors, schools, or the like. It was used in this sense in the title of the 1898 official collection of the now extinct Congregation of Indulgences and Sacred Relics, as it had been in the earliest modern private prototype of such a work, the Raccolta di orazione e pie opere per le quali sono state concesse dai Sommi Pontefici le SS Indulgenze, composed by Telesforo Galli, a consultor of the Congregation of Indulgences in 1807. Two new editions published by Aloysius Prinzivalli, substitute secretary of the congregation, were specially approved by a decree of Dec. 15, 1854, and it was this collection that was translated into English by Ambrose St. John of the Birmingham Oratory, with approval by Cardinal Wiseman Oct. 23, 1856, in virtue of a faculty conceded to him by Pius IX on Feb. 3, 1856. The translation was entitled The Raccolta.

Soon thereafter, however, the congregation itself published an authentic collection, (June 3, 1877). This was in Italian and had the same long title as the original work of Galli, as also did the official authentic collections of 1886 and 1898. The Jesuits at Woodstock made a translation of the first official collection of 1877 with permission of the congregation contained in a letter of Cardinal Oreglia, prefect of the Congregation, guaranteeing the fidelity of the translation. It also used the title Raccolta.

Later official Italian collections (in Latin) were called Collectio Precum Piorumque Operum and were translated in later editions of the Oratory Raccolta, still retaining the Italian name. A revised collection called Preces et Pia Opera Indulgentiis Ditata was promulgated by the Apostolic Penitentiary by order of Pius XI on Dec. 31, 1937. It was translated into English by Joseph P. Christopher and Charles E. Spence and published by Benziger Brothers in 1943. This, too, retained the Italian name "raccolta" as did the edition of 1957, which contained the translations of the "Enchiridion Indulgentiarum" first promulgated by the Sacred Penitentiary on Jan. 30, 1950, by command of Pius XII, but reformed and promulgated anew on March 3, 1952.

[M. T. SMITH/EDS.]

RACINE, JEAN BAPTISTE

French dramatist whose works represent the peak of dramatic art in 17th-century France; b. La Ferté-Milon, baptized Dec. 22, 1639; d. Paris, April 21, 1699. Born of bourgeois parents, Racine was orphaned at the age of three, and raised principally by grandparents. In 1649, through family connections with PORT-ROYAL he entered that important Jansenist school, where he received an excellent education, particularly in the classics. With the exception of two years spent at the college of the city of Beauvais, Racine remained under the guidance of the men at Port-Royal until 1658. He was thus witness to the turbulent period (1656–58) when the Jansenist-Jesuit quarrel was highlighted by the appearance of PASCAL'S Les Lettres Provinciales.

Racine left Port-Royal for Paris in 1658. There, in his desire to succeed, he dedicated to the queen an ode entitled, "La Nympe de la Seine" (1660), which attracted the attention of Colbert, Prime Minister of Louis XIV. However, Racine's two attempts at play writing (L'Amasie and Les Amours d'Ovide) were rejected, and on the possibility of obtaining an ecclesiastical benefice he went to Uzès in Languedoc. Despite the important diocesan post held there by his uncle Antonin Sconin, Racine's efforts were fruitless and he returned to Paris and the stage.

The Young Dramatist. In 1664 Molière's troupe presented the first of Racine's tragedies ever to be performed, La Thébaïde, which was followed in 1665 by Alexandre le Grand. Both plays were in the French classical tradition as practiced by Corneille and Quinault, but neither exhibited more than traces of the genius he was to show in Andromaque and for which he became famous. However, in his drive to satisfy his profound ambitions, Racine made an enemy of Molière by asking a rival theater, the Hôtel de Bourgogne, to present Alexandre in direct competition with Molière's production. It was also during this period that Racine quarreled openly with his former masters at Port-Royal because of their general condemnation of theatrical spectacles.

Andromaque (1667) marked Racine's departure from the tradition of heroic tragedy; for in this play he introduced a new concept of the tragic motive of passion, different from the ennobling sentiment of Corneille and the older generation. Andromaque revealed a violent, destructive love that consumed all in its desire to possess the beloved; it was this intimate rapport between passion and hatred that marked the innovation.

In 1668 Racine turned briefly to the writing of comedy and produced a satire on the legal profession, Les Plaideurs, that owed much to the Wasps of Aristophanes. But he returned to his particular domain in 1669 with Britannicus, in which he displayed his mastery of Corneille's favorite type of drama—tragedy with a Roman background. Yet within the typically Cornelian framework, the same explosive passions are at work that were discovered in Andromaque. A struggle for power forms the basis for an intensely cruel plot in which innocent intermediaries are caught and sacrificed to the needs of the two predatory creatures who seek complete domination—the ruthless Agrippine and her sadistic son Néron.

Jean Baptiste Racine.

Despite the relative lack of success of Britannicus, Racine remained with Roman history for one more play, Bérénice (1670). This time his efforts were crowned with a double triumph; Bérénice was an unqualified success at the box office and Racine saw his own adaptation of the Titus and Bérénice story preferred to Corneille's (Tite et Bérénice), which was first presented only eight days after the première of Racine's version. Despite much bitter criticism, largely based on antagonism toward Racine and personal affection for Corneille, Racine emerged victorious in the public eye.

After the Sophoclean simplicity of Bérénice, with its three characters and bloodless, though definitely tragic, conclusion, Racine once again looked to the active, mobile kind of plot, characterized by passion and death. The result was Bajazet (1672). He also endeavored to profit from the surge of interest in things exotic by having the action of the play performed entirely within the confines of a royal Turkish harem. Racine's personal satisfaction with the public and royal reception of his play may be measured by the fact that in the preface to the printed edition of Bajazet he did not deign to defend at length his creation against the inevitable criticism of rivals. It was a self-assured Racine who composed that relatively short preliminary discourse, free from the acid polemics that characterized earlier Racinian prefaces.

The Master Dramatist. Racine was at the pinnacle of his fame during the years from 1670 to 1677, and two events in 1673 are indicative: his reception to the Académie Française on January 12 and the popularity of Mithridate (Louis XIV's favorite Racinian tragedy), which was performed shortly thereafter. However, in Mithridate himself Racine has attempted to create a hero of Cornelian proportions, and a certain uneasiness about depicting a figure foreign to his own conception of the "fallen" hero—the man endowed with great strength who nevertheless is crushed—may serve to explain the drama's lack of intensity in comparison with preceding Racinian endeavors.

Iphigénie (1674) was the occasion of Racine's return to Greek subjects, particularly as dramatized by Euripides. Racine also wished to profit from the popularity of French opera and the consequent vogue of mythological subjects by producing a work in which not only the strong flavor of Greek fatality but also the very musicality of the verses recalled Greek tragedy with its lyrical moments of choral declamation.

With the death of Molière (1673) and the decline of Corneille, Racine was the undisputed master of the Parisian stage. Nevertheless, two and a half years elapsed before his next production, Phèdre, which stands at the summit of Racinian tragedy. In Phèdre, which owed much of its material to many predecessors, ancient and modern alike, Racine fashioned a drama about an uncontrollable passion that led not only to an event of catastrophic import (the death of Hippolytus), but also to the tragic torment. Phèdre is the culmination of a Racinian tendency to infuse an awful lucidity into the heroine (or hero), so that she is fully aware of her moral degradation. Moreover, by employing a mythological background Racine greatly enlarged the scope of his tragedy. This factor, plus Phèdre's acute self-consciousness, give substance to her cry that she has blackened the universe by an incestuous desire, and that the ritual of her death (on stage) is therefore tantamount to a cosmic rite of purification.

The years from 1677 to 1689, known as his retraite, formed a dramatic pause in the creative life of Racine. Among the most likely reasons for this period of silence are his reconciliation with the Jansenists and principally his appointment, at the same time as Boileau, as historiographer of the King. Racine's advancement in royal circles apparently inspired in him little inclination to continue his association with actors and with his "trade," as dramaturgy was considered in his day. Moreover, it was precisely in 1677 that he began his life as husband, and later, as devoted father of five girls and two boys, in a household where religion and moral principles were closely observed.

At the request of Mme. de Maintenon, Racine composed, in 1689, a play destined for the edification of the students at Saint-Cyr, a school for young girls. This was Esther, a three-act religious tragedy with chorus. Athalie (1691) was also written for the girls under Madame de Maintenon's care; and the title character is one of Racine's most powerful creations. Because of the imposing stature of Athalie, her struggle against God's will assumes titanic proportions. Thus, even when inevitably defeated, she still evokes admiration by the very magnitude of her effort.

Racine was never again strongly tempted to undertake the composition of another dramatic work, but he did continue to write, as the four beautiful Cantiques Spirituels (1694) and his Abrégé de l'Histoire de Port-Royal (not published until 1742–67) attest. It was only, however, in the last two years that remained to him (1698–99) that he irrevocably deserted the mundane existence of the courtier for the scrupulously principled life compatible with the Jansenist point of view. He died in Paris and was buried, according to his wish, in the cemetery of Port-Royal-des-Champs.

The conception of the human condition discovered in Racine's plays is a tragic one: man, deceived into believing that his acts can be efficacious, is frustrated and finally crushed by his collision with a ruthless destiny. Some have referred to this view as Jansenist, because of Racine's background; but this would not seem to be necessarily the case, since, for example, approximately the same tragic conception may be found in the works of Seneca. What is certain, however, is that life as tragedy never has found a more eloquent nor profound expression than in Racinian drama.

Racine's Genius. The most striking elements of any Racinian play are his characters; they are finely nuanced, passionate models of intensity whose very suffering excites sympathy and pathos (le pathétique) while their stature summons admiration. Creations such as Oreste, Hermione, Néron, Athalie, and above all Phèdre are truly unforgettable.

Racinian tragedy is well constructed to incite the many and violent emotional reactions of its characters, because it is composed with crisis at its center. Everything underlines and forces the tension of the crisis to the point of explosion: the location of the action in one defined area, the limitation of the time span to one day, and the strict subordination of details to the central conflict. Unlike Shakespearean theater, Racinian drama uses little scenic effect and employs relatively few physical actions to aid the plot's development; it remains for language to sustain the play, and Racinian verse is celebrated both for its poetical beauty and its functional use in the drama.

Indeed, the whole trend of French classical literature seemed to have paved the way for Racine so that on his arrival he found all the elements in readiness: lucidity, simplicity, concision, intellectuality, and universality. In fact, Racine may be considered as principally responsible for the death of classical French tragedy because of the perfection of his work: his art was inimitable and served only to frustrate the creative efforts of post-Racinian classical dramatists, such as Voltaire. Racinian tragedy thus remains the most exalted form of French art in a century consciously striving for artistic perfection.

Bibliography: J. B. RACINE, Oeuvres Complètes, ed. P. MÉS-NARD, 10 v. (2d ed. Paris 1885–88); Oeuvres Complètes, ed. R. PICARD, 2 v. (Paris 1950–52). A. ADAM, Histoire de la littérature française au 17^e siècle, 5 v. (Paris 1958–61) v.4. R. PICARD, La Carrière de Jean Racine (new rev. ed. Paris 1961). P. MOREAU, Racine: L'Homme et l'oeuvre (Paris 1943). J. GIRAUDOUX, Racine (Paris 1950). T. MAULNIER, Racine (Paris 1958). P. BÉNICHOU, Morales du Grand Siècle (Paris 1948). J. POMMIER, Aspects de Racine suivi de l'histoire littéraire d'un couple tragique (Paris 1954). E. VINAVER, Racine and Poetic Tragedy, tr. P. MANSELL JONES (New York 1959). J. C. LAPP, Aspects of Racinian Tragedy (Toronto 1955). J. D. HUBERT, Essai d'exégèse Racinienne (Paris 1956).

[R. W. TOBIN]

RACLOT, MATHILDE

Missionary and educator of the Ladies of St. Maur; b. Surauville (Vosges), 1814; d. Tokyo, 1911. At 18 years of age she entered the Institute of the Teachers of Charity of the Holy Child Jesus, founded by N. Barré and called the Ladies of St. Maur. She distinguished herself as an educator at Bagnoles and also at Bergiers. In 1852 she left for Malay at the head of a group of her sisters. They debarked at Penang and diligently devoted themselves to the urgent work there, founding orphanages, nurseries, and schools for the poor. Then she went to Japan, where she had been called by the vicar apostolic in 1872. She founded a house in Tokyo in 1875, and in Shidsuoka in 1903.

[J. VERBILLION]

RADBOD OF UTRECHT, ST.

Monk, bishop; b. near Namur, Belgium, c. 850; d. Ootmarsum, Netherlands, Nov. 29, 917. Son of a leading Frankish family, he was educated in Cologne and at the court of Emperor Charles the Bald. In either 899 or 900, Radbod became bishop of Utrecht, but he was driven out the next year by the NORMANS. Retreating only a few miles, to Deventer, he carried on not only the work of the diocese but also the Utrecht tradition of learning, as he wrote poems (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Poetae 4:160–173), homilies (Patrologia Latina 132), and history, and a work on St. Martin (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptorum 15:1239–44). From 1905 to 1923 the present Catholic University of Nijmegen bore St. Radbod's name.

Feast: Nov. 29.

Bibliography: Analecta Bollandiana 6 (1887) 5–15. M. MANI-TIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters 1:603–604. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER 4:446. P. H. WINKELMAN, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (2nd new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:963.

[R. BALCH]

RADEGUNDA, ST.

Queen of the Franks; d. Aug. 13, 587. Radegunda, born a Thuringian princess, fell as booty to the Frankish King Chlothar I (531) who had her educated and eventually married her. The murder of Radegunda's brother occasioned her leaving Chlothar to enter religion (c. 555). Chlothar helped her build a convent at Poitiers where she gathered many highborn converts (200 in 587), assembled a large collection of relics (notably one of the True Cross, which gave the convent its name), introduced the rule of CAESARIUS OF ARLES (c. 570), and, having installed an abbess, strove to live as a simple nun. She maintained excellent relations with her stepsons, though not with the local bishop, and befriended the poet FORTUNATUS. Popular canonization directly followed her death, and pilgrims still seek her tomb in Poitiers.

Feast: August 13.

Bibliography: Sources. GREGORY OF TOURS, Historiarum libri, 3.4, 7; 6.29, 34; 7.36; 9.2, 39–42, Monumenta Germaniae Historica Section: Scriptorum rerum Merovingiarum 1.1; Berlin 1951) 99–100, 103–105, 295–297, 304–305, 358, 415, 460–474; De gloria confessorum 104, ibid. 1 (1885) 814–816. V. FORTUNATUS and BAUDONIVIA, De vita sanctae Radegundis libri duo, ibid. 2 (1888) 358–395. V. FORTUNATUS, Carmina, Monumenta Germaniae Historica. Auctores antiquissimi 4; Berlin 1881); La vie de sainte Radegonde par Fortunat, ed. R. FAVREAU (Paris 1995). Literature. O. M. DALTON, ed. and tr., The History of the Franks . . ., 2 v. (Oxford 1927) 1:67–69. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 2:571–572. R. AIGRAIN, Sainte Radegonde (new ed. Poitiers 1952). B. PISCHEL, Radegunde: zur europäischen Volkskunde (Frankfurt 1997). D. KLEINMANN, Radegunde: eine europäische Heilige (Graz 1998).

[W. GOFFART]

RADICAL THEOLOGY

Radical theology was the name applied in the 1960s to a widely publicized current in American Protestant theology which was fundamentally skeptical about modern man’s ability to speak meaningfully about God. The theologians most prominently identified with the movement were William Hamilton, Paul Van Buren, and Thomas J. J. Altizer. Several other theologians were closely associated with the movement in the popular mind although their works were less radical in character. The British theologian, John A. T. Robinson, and the American theologian, Harvey Cox, shared a good deal of the radical theologians’ skepticism and, like the radical theologians, Robinson and Cox advocated a religion of secular involvement rather than a religion of otherworldly salvation. Gabriel Vahanian, although not one of the radical theologians, shared their preoccupation with the challenge of contemporary secularism to Christian faith.

“Life of Saint Radegunda: Radegunda at Mass.” (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

The theological divergencies among the radical theologians were too great for them to form a school. Nevertheless, their works are marked by a number of common convictions. Faith in the transcendent God of traditional Christian theology is no longer possible for the contemporary man. The theologian can no longer work in the church. His concerns are no longer the classical churchly concerns: liturgy, prayer, otherworldly salvation. He must move out into the world, since, like other contemporary men, his fundamental preoccupation is the struggle to maintain human values in the context of modern secular society. He can no longer speak of a God who has become meaningless to contemporary man but he must still speak of Christ. The Christ of the radical theologian, however, is the purely human Christ who is the man for others. Christ’s function in contemporary society is to serve as a supremely inspiring human example, Christ is “a place to be” in the struggle for human values.

The shift away from theological activism at the end of the civil–rights struggle brought a decline of interest in radical theology. As a movement it did not survive the sixties, but the issues which it brought to prominence in America, e.g., the knowability of God, contemporary Christology, eschatology, and social activity, continue to occupy the attention of contemporary theologians.

See Also: DEATH OF GOD THEOLOGY.

Bibliography: T. J. J. ALTIZER, The Gospel of Christian Atheism (Philadelphia 1966); ed., Toward a New Christianity: Readings in the Death of God Theology (New York 1967). T. J. J. ALTIZER and W. HAMILTON, Radical Theology and the Death of God (Indianapolis 1966). H. COX, The Secular City (New York 1965). W. HAMILTON, The New Essence of Christianity (New York 1961); "The Death of God Theology," Christian Scholar 48: 27–48; "The Shape of Radical Theology," Christian Century 82:1219–22. J. A. T. ROBINSON, Honest to God (Philadelphia 1963); Exploration into God (Palo Alto, Calif. 1967). G. VAHANIAN, The Death of God (New York 1961); No Other God (New York 1966); ed., The God is Dead Debate (New York 1967). P. VAN BUREN, The Secular Meaning of the Gospel (New York 1963); Theological Explorations (New York 1968). L. GILKEY, Naming the Whirlwind: The Renewal of God Language (Indianapolis 1969) 107–145. V. MEHTA, The New Theologians (New York 1966). T. W. OGLETREE, The Death of God Controversy (Nashville 1966).

[G. MCCOOL]

RAFFEINER, JOHN STEPHEN

Pioneer missionary; b. Mals, Austrian Tyrol, Dec. 26, 1785; d. Brooklyn, N.Y., July 16, 1861. His studies for the priesthood, at the Tyrolean Benedictine abbey in Fiecht and later in Rome, were interrupted in 1809 by the Napoleonic wars. He then turned to medicine, obtained his degree in 1813, and conducted a highly successful practice as physician and surgeon in Italy, Austria, and Switzerland. After resuming his theological studies, he was ordained at Brixen in the Tyrol on May 1, 1825. He served as assistant and pastor in his native diocese of Brixen until, in response to an appeal of Bishop Edward Fenwick of Cincinnati, Ohio, through the Leopoldine Association, he volunteered for missionary work in the United States.

Upon his arrival in 1833, he was persuaded by Bishop John Dubois to remain in New York City to minister to the fast-growing colonies of German Catholics there. With personal funds earned in his previous medical career, he rented a carpenter shop as a temporary chapel and later leased a former Baptist church, where he formally organized the first New York City congregation of German Catholics. In 1834 he bought land from John Jacob Astor for St. Nicholas's Church, New York City, which was dedicated in 1836. He visited German congregations at Macopin and elsewhere in New Jersey; at Albany, Utica, Salina, Syracuse, Rochester, Buffalo, and other missions in New York State; and, at the request of Bishop Benedict Fenwick, at Boston, where he founded Holy Trinity Church, dedicated in 1844. In all these visitations he had notable success in settling national difficulties and disputes between congregations and pastors arising from the prevalent system of incorporating church property under boards of lay trustees.

Among the 30 churches he was instrumental in establishing, including the above, were St. John's, New York City (1840), and Holy Trinity, Williamsburg, Brooklyn (1841). In 1843 Bishop John Hughes of New York appointed him vicar-general for the German Catholics of the diocese, an office in which he continued until his death. In addition, he remained pastor of Holy Trinity and acted as vicar-general of Bishop John Loughlin from the time Brooklyn was separated from New York as a new diocese (1853).

Bibliography: M. A. CORRIGAN, "Register of the Clergy Laboring in the Archdiocese of New York from Early Missionary Times to 1885," Historical Records and Studies of the U.S. Catholic Historical Society of New York 7 (June 1914): 201. T. F. MEEHAN, "Very Rev. Johann Stephan Raffener, V. G.," ibid. 9 (June 1916): 161–175. "Documents: The Schwenninger Memorial," American Benedictine Review 10 (1959): 107–135; ibid. 11 (1960): 154–178.

[J. A. REYNOLDS]

RAFOLS, MARÍA, BL.

Virgin, foundress of the Institute of the Sisters of Charity of St. Anne; b. Nov. 5, 1781, Villafranca del Penedés, Spain; d. Aug. 30, 1853, Saragossa, Spain.

Although María was born into a working-class family, her innate intelligence won her a place at a boarding school in Barcelona. Upon graduating she joined 12 other young women in an apostolate of charity under the direction of Father Juan Bonal, administrator of Our Lady of Grace Hospital in Saragossa, which cared for the sick, the disabled, and the mentally ill. Although Bonal appointed María superior in 1804 (age 23), the group made no formal profession until 1825 when Rafols gained formal recognition of the community.

During the devastation of the Napoleonic wars in Spain (1808–13), Rafols rendered heroic service to the sick, wounded, and the children. Imprisoned during the Carlist War, she was released and returned to her founding home, where she died at age 71. A miracle attributed to the intercession of the woman John Paul II called a "Heroine of Charity" was approved by the Vatican, July 6, 1993. That same pope beatified her, Oct. 16, 1994.

Feast: Nov. 5.

Bibliography: G. GROOT, De omstreden heiligheid van madre Maria Rafols, NRC-Handelsblad, Aug. 19, 1987. G. L. BOUE, Moeder Maria Rafols, Catolica (Apr. 28, 2001) v. 6.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

RAFQA DE HIMLAYA, ST.

Maronite nun; also called Rebecca ar-Rayyes, “The Little Flower of Lebanon,” and the “Purple Rose”; b. Himlaya (near Bikfaya, Mten), Lebanon, June 29, 1832; d. Grabta, March 23?, 1914. Born on the feast of St. Peter, her parents named her Boutrosiya (“Petronilla”). Following her mother’s death in 1838, Petra’s father, Mourad Saber Shabaq al-Rayes, remarried (1841). Petra lived and worked as a domestic in Syria, 1843–47.

When it was time to decide her future, her stepmother wanted her to marry her brother (Petra’s step-brother), and an aunt, to marry her son (Petra’s cousin). While the women quarreled, Petra became a Maryamat postulant at the convent of Our Lady of Rescue at Bikfaya. Upon Petra’s acceptance as a novice, Feb. 9, 1855, she was given the name Anissa (“Agnes”).

She was sent to a convent in Ghazir where, while working in the kitchen, she learned to read and write in her spare time. Later she studied at Bait-Shahib, Shuwayr, Hammana, and elsewhere. She was teaching at Dair al-Qamar during the massacre of Christians (1860). When the monastery was attacked, she saved a Christian boy being pursued by armed soldiers by throwing her cloak over him to hide him.

In 1871 her order was united with another to form the Order of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary. Each sister was offered the choice of staying or leaving. After prayer Sister Anissa decided to become a nun in the ascetic Baladiya Order of the Maronites at Saint Simon Convent at El-Qarn, where she was known as Boutrosiya from Himlaya. At the time she made her perpetual vows, Aug. 25, 1873, she chose the name Rafqa (“Rebecca”), after her saintly mother.

Sister Rafqa was transferred in 1897 to the convent, Mar Youssef ad-Daher (Saint Joseph of Grabta). Under obedience to her new superior Mother Doumit, Rafqa related the story of her life. She told how in 1885 after praying to share in Christ’s suffering, she began to suffer loss of sight and a crippling bone disease. By 1907 Sister Rafqa was totally blind, paralyzed, and in constant pain, but in spite of her cross she remained full of joy until her death seven years later. Rafqa was buried at Saint Joseph of Grabata where she died.

Sister Rafqa was beatified in Rome, Nov. 17, 1985, by Pope John Paul II. Following the acceptance of the required miracle on July 1, 2000, Rafqa was canonized as the first female saint of Lebanon on June 10, 2001.

Feast: Nov. 17 (Maronites); March 23.

Bibliography: F. M. ZAYEK, Rafqa, the Blind Mystic of Lebanon (Still River, Mass. 1980).

[R. ABOU MOUSSA]

RAHNER, HUGO

Historian and theologian; b. Pfullendorf, Germany, May 3, 1900; d. Munich, Dec. 21, 1968. He entered the Jesuit novitiate of the North German Jesuit Province in 1919, three years before his younger brother Karl, who was later to become a more widely known theologian. Hugo Rahner studied at the University of Innsbruck, Austria, and received doctorates in philosophy and theology.

From 1935 he taught at Innsbruck, specializing in early Church history and patrology but writing on a wide variety of topics. In Theology of Proclamation (1939; Eng. tr. 1968) he contended that the priest’s most important task was “the reconstruction of our traditional knowledge, the fashioning out of our dogmatic theology what can be of immediate use in performing the great work to which we are called—preaching” (pp. 12–13). In Man at Play (1949; Eng. tr. 1965) he analyzed the significance of play from a religious standpoint. The theme of Mary as a symbol of the Church was developed in his book Our Lady and the Church (1951; Eng. tr. 1961). He set forth a Christian humanism in Greek Myths and Christian Mystery (1957; Eng. tr. 1963), endorsing the action of the early Church in preserving the culture of Greece and Rome. He also sought to show that the piety of the ancient world had been incorporated and sanctified by the Church. The founder of his order was the subject of several of his literary efforts. He wrote The Spirituality of St. Ignatius Loyola (1949; Eng. tr. 1953) and Ignatius the Theologian (1964; Eng. tr. 1968), edited Letters to Women by Ignatius Loyola (1965; Eng. tr. 1960), and with the photographer Leonard von Matt produced St. Ignatius of Loyola: A Pictorial Biography (1956). With his brother Karl he wrote Prayers for Meditation (1962).

Bibliography: J. HOLDT, Hugo Rahner: Sein geschichts- und symboltheologisches Denken (Paderborn 1997). K. H. NEUFELD, Die Bruder Rahner: Eine Biographie (Freiburg im Breisgau 1994). A. P. KUSTERMAN and K. H. NEUFELD, “Gemeinsame Arbeit in brüderlicher Liebe”: Hugo und Karl Rahner; Dokumente und Würdigung ihrer Weggemeinschaft (Stuttgart 1993).

[T. EARLY]

RAHNER, KARL

German theologian; b. Freiburg im Breisgau, Germany, March 5, 1904; d. Innsbruck, Austria, March 30, 1984. One of seven children of Karl Rahner, gymnasium professor, and Luise Trescher. After concluding his secondary education he entered the Society of Jesus’ novitiate at Feldkirch in Vorarlberg, Austria, on April 20, 1922, three years after his brother Hugo. During his philosophical studies from 1924 to 1927, first at Feldkirch, then at Pullach near Munich, he was influenced especially by Joseph MARÉCHAL's Thomistic response to the thought of Immanuel Kant. After teaching Latin at the Feldkirch Novitiate, where Alfred Delp was one of his students, Rahner studied theology at Valkenburg in the Netherlands (1929–33). There his earlier reading of Christian spirituality was deepened through study of the Apostolic Fathers, the patristic period, and medieval thinkers such as BONAVENTURE. He was ordained a priest on July 26, 1932, and pursued his Jesuit tertianship at Saint Andrea in Carinthia, Austria (1933–34).

Early Foundations. Intended by his Jesuit superiors to be a professor of the history of philosophy, Rahner was sent to the University of Freiburg im Breisgau to prepare a doctorate. He attended Martin Heidegger's seminars with other Catholic students such as Max Müller, Gustav Siewerth, Bernard Welte, and Johannes B. Lotz. When his doctoral director, Martin Honecker, rejected his interpretation of Saint Thomas' epistemology, Rahner returned to Innsbruck. In the course of the academic year 1936–37, he was able to satisfy the doctoral and post-doctoral requirements for teaching in the University's faculty of theology and began to lecture the following year. After the Nazis abolished the theology faculty (July 1938) and the Jesuit college (October 1939), Rahner moved to Vienna to work under Karl Rudolph at the Pastoral Institute. For five years he served as a consultant there, also offering courses and occasional lectures. In the final year of World War II he became a pastor at Mariakirchen in Lower Bavaria.

For three years after the war he taught dogmatic theology at Berchmanskolleg in Pullach and then, in August 1948, returned to Innsbruck's faculty of theology, which had just been reopened. Named an Ordinarius the following summer, he remained at Innsbruck through the winter semester of 1964, teaching a cycle of courses on the doctrines of creation and original sin; grace and justification; faith, hope and charity; and the Sacraments of Penance, Anointing of the Sick, and Orders. In the early 1950s his doctoral students included Adolf Darlap, Walter Kern, Herbert Vorgrimler, and Johann Baptist Metz.

In these foundational years of Rahner's theological career his interests ranged from the primary philosophical studies elaborated in his doctoral dissertation and his Salzburg lectures on the philosophy of religion, through classic early publications on prayer and the Christian life, to highly technical re-examinations of questions long considered settled by the neo-scholastic theology that dominated most of Catholic thought at the time, and certainly its major official pronouncements. His Freiburg thesis Geist in Welt (1939) sought a contemporary retrieval of the Thomistic insight into sense experience as the enduring ground for human knowledge. Heidegger's question of Being also helped to guide his understanding of religion in its historical dependence on the transcendent self-disclosure of a personal God (Hörer des Wortes 1941). His first years in Innsbruck saw the publication of the meditations collected in Encounters with Silence (1938) and his Lenten sermons in postwar Munich appeared in an eloquent book On Prayer (1949).

Karl Rahner. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

But it was his probing analyses of human existence in a world permeated by divine grace that gave Rahner's early writings their explosive force. Emphasizing the dynamics of knowledge and freedom yet guided most deeply by the mystery of God's own gift of self, he reconceived the terms of the relationship between nature and grace, took the conciliar definitions as a starting point rather than an end for christological reflection, and renewed ecclesiology by examining the Church in its origin, its sacramental actualization, and its pastoral practice. When his early theological essays were gathered in the first three volumes of the Schriften zur Theologie in 1954, 1955, and 1956 (English translation, Theological Investigations), it was clear that a wholly original dialectic tical mind had appeared on the Catholic scene. During this period his prodigious editorial labors began as well, and he was responsible for four editions of Denzinger's Enchiridion Symbolorum (1952–57) and seven editions of Der Glaube der Kirche in den Urkunden der Lehrverkündigung (1948–65).

Programmatic Years. A second, programmatic phase coincided roughly with Rahner's work as coeditor for the second edition of Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (1957–65) and his contributions to the preparation and course of the Second Vatican Council. Continuing to teach at Innsbruck, he also lectured extensively, undertook new editorial responsibilities, and for a year (1962–63) was subject to a preliminary censorship regulation from Rome. When the University of Munich in 1963 invited him to become Romano Guardini's successor in the Chair of Christian World View and Philosophy of Religion, he received permission from his Order to accept the call and began teaching in Munich in the summer semester of 1964. In that year also, a monumental two-volume Festschrift, Gott in Welt, appeared in honor of his sixtieth birthday.

In view of urgent contemporary questions, Rahner had previously sought to re-appropriate Catholic tradition through a dialectical discussion with scholastic theology and the dogmatic tradition. He probed the implication of these studies and began to write more programmatically on the correlation between theology and anthropology within the historical process. In a world that is always and everywhere invited to union with God (the "supernatural existential,") he argued, responsible theology must conduct a continuing transcendental reflection on the structural conditions of possibility for salvation. In Schriften IV (1960) he published seminal essays on mystery, the Incarnation, the theology of symbol, and the hermeneutics of eschatological assertions. An analogy of transcendence unifies these essays materially, envisaging history as a response to the Holy Mystery that draws the world toward eternity through self-communication in Word and Spirit. In the essays of Schriften V (1962), the analogy was significantly broadened by his discussion of evolutionary science, world religions, and utopian views of the future. Schriften VI (1966) continued his effort to express the Church's new self-understanding in a secularized, pluralistic world.

In these same years Rahner published major essays in pastoral theology (Sendung und Gnade 1959; English translation, Mission and Grace 1963) and gathered a new collection of essays in spirituality (Schriften VII 1967). In 1962 he helped to draft a plan for the Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie, which subsequently appeared in five volumes (1964–72) with Rahner as one of its editors.

With Heinrich Schlier he conceived the series of Questiones Disputatae (1958 ff.) in which appeared some of his own most original contributions on the inspiration of Scripture, the theology of death, the prophetic mission of the Church, the relation between episcopacy and papal primacy, and the renewal of the diaconate. Rahner was a founding member of the editorial committee that planned Concilium, chaired its section on pastoral theology, and with Edward Schillebeeckx edited its first issue in 1965. With Adolf Darlap he planned Sacramentum Mundi and then supervised its German edition (4 v. 1967–69).

Late Development. When it appeared that Rahner would be unable to direct doctoral students in theology at Munich and also that there were hopes for collaborating on serious reform of theological education elsewhere, he accepted the University of Münster's invitation to become Ordinary Professor of Dogmatics and the History of Dogma and moved to the Westphalian capital in the summer semester of 1967. His years at Münster were fruitful ones during which he continued to reflect on Roman Catholicism's efforts to appropriate Vatican II and developed his response to critics who found his own theological anthropology reductionistic (Hans Urs von Balthasar) or politically impractical (Johann Baptist Metz). Reflecting on the historical concreteness of Christianity and its social responsibility, three further volumes of the Schriften (1967, 1970, 1972) offer important insights on theology's place in the human search for meaning; careful situational analysis as a requirement for religious authenticity; the need for a contemporary introduction (mystagogy) to the experience of God; a new understanding of Jesus as humanity's way to God (Christology from below); and reform of the Church as a clericalized, more democratic and socially critical community of service to the world.

Retiring to Munich in 1971, Rahner first lived at the Jesuit writers' residence near Nymphenburg. His major project there was the preparation of his Grundkurs or "Introduction to the Idea of Christianity" (1976; English translation, Foundations of Christian Faith 1978). Though not an adequate synthesis of his thought, the book does present his typical approach to central topics of Christian doctrine. In the years immediately before it, he published several briefer works on Church reform (1972) and on an ecumenical understanding of Church office (1974), as well as Schriften XI (1973), which gathers his early studies on the practice and theology of penance, and Schriften XII (1975), which centers on the doctrine of the Holy Spirit. Having participated in the first planning of Mysterium Salutis (5 v. 1965–76), he continued to contribute major articles to that new, historically conceived dogmatic theology.

Final Dialectic. After moving to the Berchmanskolleg in Munich and living there for several years, Rahner returned again to Innsbruck and made it his final residence (1981–84). Between 1976 and 1984 he lectured and wrote vigorously, publishing four more volumes of the Schriften (v. XII–XVI: 1978, 1980, 1983, 1984); a new edition of his Dictionary of Theology (1976); moving essays on prayer (1977), love of neighbor and love of Jesus (1981, 1982); and a dialogical apology for contemporary faith, co-authored with Karl-Heinz Weger (1979). He was also represented by several anthologies, one of which, The Practice of Faith (1982), also serves well as a general introduction to his thought. He continued his editorial involvements and, fortunately, allowed himself a new candor in his autobiographical reflections.

Although his final years are remarkably consistent with his previous career, significant developments nevertheless do occur in his consolidation of a thoroughly historical Christology; in his proposal for a “universal pneumatology” that might precede Christology in the future; in his arguments for a truly world church and his pleas for ecumenical seriousness; in a series of moral essays on the virtues required of late twentieth-century Christians. Throughout the writings of this last phase, Rahner noted the deepening relativism and skepticism in European culture and attempted to address it. “The old schoolmaster,” as he styled himself, also became disturbingly frank about the climate of the Catholic Church, which he had served all his life and would serve to the end.

Systematic theologian though he was, Rahner’s thought may be better characterized as a lifelong meditation on the correlation between human experience and God’s self-communication. Because of his insistence that theology analyze the conditions of possibility for divine salvific action, he is most often described as a transcendental theologian. Even from the beginning, however, his method required historical research and reflection, since the dynamics of grace always unfold in an unfinished, temporal world where servitude and suffering are all too obvious. In fact, it may be even more exact to see Rahner as a Catholic dialectical theologian. His career presents a personal response to the religious issues of his day and an enduring effort to conceive human history as destined for an eternal communion with God that can only be achieved through the course of time. Thus, a concrete dialectic of transcendence in history characterized his life as well as his thought and influence.

Bibliography: The Theology Department at the University of Innsbruck in Austria maintains the collection of Rahner’s manuscripts and papers at the Karl Rahner Archive. For a complete, chronological listing of Rahner’s publications see: R. BLEISTEIN, ed., Bibliographie Karl Rahner 1969–1974 (Freiburg 1974). R.

BLEISTEIN and E. KLINGER, eds., Bibliographie Karl Rahner 1924–1969 (Freiburg 1969). A. E. CARR, “Karl Rahner,” in D. G. PEERMAN and M. E. MARTY, eds., A Handbook of Christian Theologians (Nashville 1984): 519–542. W. V. DYCH, Karl Rahner (Collegeville, Minn. 1992). H. D. EGAN, Karl Rahner: The Mystic of Everyday Life (New York 1998). P. IMHOF and E. MEUSER, “Bibliographie Karl Rahner 1979–1984,” in E. KLINGER and K. WITSTADT, eds., Glaube im Prozess (Freiburg 1984): 854–871. P. IMHOF and H. TREZIAK, “Bibliographie Karl Rahner 1974–1979,” in H. VORGRIMLER, ed., Wagnis Theologie (Freiburg 1979): 579–597. L. J. O’DONOVAN, ed., A World of Grace: An Introduction to the Themes and Foundations of Karl Rahner’s Theology (New York 1980). C. D. PEDLEY, “An English Biographical Aid to Karl Rahner,” Heythrop Journal 15 (1984): 319–365. H. VORGRIMLER, Understanding Karl Rahner: An Introduction to His Life and Thought (New York 1986).

[L. J. O’DONOVAN]

RAIMONDI, LUIGI

Cardinal, eighth apostolic delegate to the United States; b. Oct. 25, 1912 in Lussito d’Acqui, a small town in the Piedmont region of northern Italy; d. June 24, 1975 in Rome. At a young age he entered the seminary of the Diocese of Acqui where he received his classical, philosophical and theological training in preparation for the priesthood. He was ordained a priest in Acqui, June 6, 1936.

Immediately after ordination, Fr. Raimondi was sent to Rome by his bishop in order to pursue graduate studies leading to doctorates in canon law and theology. He obtained both at the Pontifical Gregorian University in 1938. While pursuing these studies, he also prepared for a career in the diplomatic service of the Holy See as a student of the Pontifical Ecclesiastical Academy (then the Pontificia Accademia dei Nobili Ecclesiastici). In August of 1938, he received his first diplomatic assignment as secretary of the apostolic nunciature in Guatemala.

In 1942, Monsignor Raimondi became the auditor of the Apostolic Delegation in Washington. He served in this capacity throughout World War II until he was named chargé d’affaires of the Holy See’s mission in New Delhi, India. While in Washington, Monsignor Raimondi worked for the then apostolic delegate, Archbishop Amleto Cicognani, and had an opportunity to travel extensively throughout the United States. On Dec. 15, 1953, Monsignor Raimondi was appointed titular archbishop of Tarsus and apostolic nuncio to Haiti. In 1957, he was transferred to Mexico to become apostolic delegate to the church in that country. Ten years later, on June 30, 1967, Pope Paul VI named Archbishop Raimondi the eighth Italian prelate to become apostolic delegate to the American Catholic Church.

During a term of almost six years Archbishop Raimondi ordained 22 new bishops, installed others as residential bishops, and oversaw the establishment of 12 new dioceses and three new archdioceses. His pastoral duties took him to virtually every part of the country and even as far as the Trust Territory of the Pacific and Alaska. Archbishop Raimondi represented Pope Paul VI at the funerals of Senator Robert F. Kennedy in 1968 and former President Dwight D. Eisenhower in 1969. The years of Archbishop Raimondi's tenure were highlighted by the tensions confronting the Church as it groped through the immediate post-conciliar era. As apostolic delegate, Archbishop Raimondi found himself dealing with these situations within the American Catholic Church from his position of papal authority, which he understood to be a function of love and pastoral solicitude.

When Paul VI created 30 new cardinals on March 5, 1973, the apostolic delegate in the United States was among them. Shortly thereafter, Cardinal Raimondi was appointed by the Holy Father to be prefect of the Sacred Congregation for Saints' Causes. In the brief time that Cardinal Raimondi served in this office, he took a very special interest in furthering the canonization process of both Mother Elizabeth Ann Seton, who was to become America's first native saint (1975), and Bishop John Nepomucene Neumann, the fourth bishop of Philadelphia, canonized in 1977. On June 24, 1975, Cardinal Raimondi was suddenly and fatally stricken with a heart attack while at the Vatican.

[J. M. WHALEN]

RAINALD OF BAR, BL.

Abbot; d. Provence, France, 1150. Rainald (Raynald) came from the family of the counts of Bar-sur-Seine and joined the CISTERCIANS at CLAIRVAUX. With the nomination of BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX he was made abbot of CÎTEAUX c. 1133 or 1134, and during his administration, in 1147, the abbeys of OBAZINE and SAVIGNY, with their affiliates, were incorporated into the order. Rainald also participated in the reconciliation of Bernard with ABELARD. The only work presently attributed to him is a part of the Instituta generalis capituli, a collection of statutes published, not as was previously thought in 1134, but c. 1150 or even perhaps as late as 1151 by Rainald's successor, Goswin (d. 1155). The abbot died in Provence in the course of a regular visitation, but he was buried at Cîteaux. He was honored as early as 1491 in the Cistercian martyrology.

Feast: Dec. 16.

Bibliography: Sources. Epistola ad Innocentium II, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 189:671.

PETER THE VENERABLE, Epistola 4.4, ibid. 305. BERNARD, Epistola 270.3, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 182:475. Vita s. Bernardi 4.3, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 185:332. CONRAD OF EBERBACH, Exordium magnum cisterciense 1.34, ed. B. GRIESSER (Rome 1961) 94–95. Literature. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 3:439–441. M. A. DIMIER, Saint Bernard, pêcheur de Dieu (Paris 1953) 191–192. J. B. VAN DAMME, “Genèse des Instituta generalis capituli,” Cîteaux 12 (1961) 28–60. K. SPAHR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:978–979.

[M. STANDAERT]

RAINALD OF DASSEL

Imperial chancellor (1156–59) and archbishop of Cologne (1159–67); b. c. 1118; d. Aug. 14, 1167. He was a younger son of Saxon Count Rainald I, and was educated at Hildesheim and Paris. Subsequently he held posts at Goslar, Hildesheim, and Münster. He showed himself to be an ardent supporter of Emperor FREDERICK I Barbarossa, was a member of the embassy sent to EUGENE III at Rome in 1153, and became chancellor in 1156. Even after his elevation in 1159 he remained a militant statesman. The basic principle of his actions was to strengthen the empire at the expense of the papacy. He was probably responsible for the outburst at the Diet of Besançon in October of 1157, and the schism between ALEXANDER III (1159–81) and the antipopes he supported first Victor IV (1059–64) and then Paschal III (1164–68). The latter action was a mistake and against the wishes and best interests of the empire. He failed to win foreign support for his policies, was excommunicated in 1163, and died on a campaign in Italy. The extent of his influence on Frederick Barbarossa has probably been overestimated.

Bibliography: G. RILL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:979. B. GEBHARDT, Handbuch der deutschen Geschichte (Stuttgart 1954–60). M. MACCARRONE, Papato e Impero, dalla elezione di Federico I alla morte di Adriano IV, 1152–1159 (Rome 1959). R. M. HERKENRATH, “Reinald von Dassel als Verfasser und Schreiber von Kaiserurkunden,” Mitteilungen des Instituts für österreichische Geschichtsforschung 72 (1964): 34–62.

[J. GILCHRIST]

RAINALD OF RAVENNA, BL.

Archbishop; b. Milan, Italy, c. 1250; d. Ravenna, Italy, Aug. 18, 1321. A member of the Concorregi family, he began his career as a papal chaplain, and from 1296 to 1303 he was bishop of Vicenza. During the year 1299 he acted as papal legate entrusted with the task of making peace between England and France, and on March 4, 1302, he became director of spiritual affairs in the Romagna. Rainald was made archbishop of RAVENNA on Nov. 19, 1303, and on Aug. 12, 1308, he was appointed a papal commissioner for the investigation of the TEMPLARS in northern Italy. Later the Templar question and the problem of Church reform occupied his attention at several provincial synods in the years 1310, 1311, 1314, and 1317, as well as at the Council of VIENNE. He was beatified by Pius IX on Jan. 15, 1852.

Feast: Aug. 18.

Bibliography: F. UGHELLI, Italia sacra . . . , ed. N. COLETTI, 10 v. (2d ed. Venice 1717–22) 2:382–388. C. EUBEL et al., Hierarchia Catholica medii (et recentioris) aevi (2d ed. Münster 1913) 1:415. Acta Sanctorum Aug. 3 (1863) 688–696. S. MURATORI, Bollettino d'arte, 2 (1908) 324–337. D. G. MOLteni, Biographia di S. R. Concorrezzo (Monza 1911). J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collection (repr. Graz 1960–) 25:293–296, 449–476, 535–550, 599–628. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. and continued by H. LECLEERCQ, 10 v. in 19 (Paris 1907–38) 6.1:549–551, 629–630, 637–640; 6.2:733–736, 784–787. H. SCHMIDINGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:979. H. FINKE, Papsttum und Untergang des Templerordens, 2 v. (Münster 1907) 1:321–. E. MÜLLER, Das Konzil von Vienne (Münster 1934) 89. A. TORRE, Studi romagnoli, 10 (1959) 112.

[R. E. GEIGER]

RAINYCY, NOTRE-DAME DU

Notre-Dame du Raincy is a Catholic church in the Diocese of Versailles, France, important in the evolution of modern church architecture; designed by Auguste PERRET and built in 1923. This small (63 by 185 feet) church almost single-handedly broke the reactionary grip that eclecticism had held (and to a certain degree still holds) on church building. It is pivotal in 20th-century religious architecture because of its method of construction. For a period of some 150 years prior to Raincy, most of the world's churches were built in revival styles, e.g., neo-classic, neo-Gothic, neo-Romanesque, etc. The church at Raincy, however, engaged contemporary architectural abilities with an intelligence that provided guidelines for the future. Perret, who designed Notre-Dame du Raincy, was one of the great pioneers of reinforced concrete, and he determined to use this "industrial" material throughout the church. Slender columns of reinforced concrete (béton armé) uphold a slightly vaulted concrete nave, while the four walls are composed of precast panels of geometrically pierced concrete whose many interstices are filled with brightly colored glass designed by Maurice DENIS. The simple "one room" of the church is thus surrounded by panels of colored glass and is suffused with light. The revolution initiated with the nave construction has been of inestimable importance in the development of subsequent religious architecture.

See Also: CHURCH ARCHITECTURE, HISTORY OF.

Bibliography: P. COLLINS, "The Doctrine of Auguste Perret," The Architectural Review 114 (1953) 91–98. A. HENZE and T. FILTHAUT, Contemporary Church Art, ed. M. LAVANOUX, tr. C. HASTINGS (New York 1956) 20–27. J. PICHARD, Modern Church Architecture, tr. E. CALLMANN (New York 1962) 34–38. A. CHRIST-JANER and M. M. FOLEY, Modern Church Architecture (New York 1962) 6–13.

[G. E. KIDDER SMITH]

RAINERIUS OF POMPOSA

Benedictine monk and deacon in the Abbey of Pomposa (Diocese of Comacchio) at the beginning of the 13th century; the first to compile a collection of decretals of Pope Innocent III. Nothing is known of his life. A confrere of his by the name of John was a member of the papal household (capellanus papae); to him Rainerius dedicated the collection. The work was compiled in 1201 from the registers of the papal chancery and consists of 41 titles containing 123 decretal letters, most of them dating from the first three years (only 12 of the fourth year) of Innocent's pontificate. The work, known and used by a few canonists in the school of Bologna, was soon replaced by more comprehensive collections and seems to have been forgotten by 1220. The only extant manuscript comes from the Abbey of St. Thierry, near Reims (now Reims MS 692); it was discovered and edited by E. Baluze in 1682. It was likewise in northern France, at Rouen, that an unknown canonist in the early years of the 13th century made an abstract of Rainerius's collection (now Paris MS lat. 3922A).

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 271 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 216:1173–1272. S. KUTTNER, Repertorium der kanonistik (Rome 1937) 71; Studi e Testi (Rome 1900–) 310. S. KUTTNER, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 7:583–584. G. FORCHIELLI, "Rainerio diacono e monaco pomposiano," Pomposia monasterium in Italia princeps: IX centenario del Campanile (Comacchio 1963).

[S. KUTTNER]

RALE, SEBASTIAN

Missionary, lexicographer; b. Pontarlier, France, Jan. 4, 1657; d. Norridgewock, Maine, Aug. 23, 1724. Rale (Rasle) entered the Jesuit novitiate at Dole, France, on Sept. 24, 1675, and taught and studied at Carpentras, Nîmes, and Lyons. In 1689, he was assigned to the Canadian mission and worked for a time in the Christian

Nave of Notre-Dame Cathedral, Raincy, France. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

Abenaki village near Quebec, mastering the language, compiling a catechism, and beginning his Abenaki dictionary. After two years with the Illinois tribe, he was assigned in 1694 to the Abenakis at Norridgewock, Maine, on the Kennebec River. Rale spent the next 30 years with these tribes, but his labors on their behalf have been overshadowed by his involvement in the Anglo-French conflict for the control of Maine. His sympathies were with the French, and, after 1713, Massachusetts authorities were determined to remove him and to scatter or subject the Abenakis. After the failure of conferences and treaties with the tribes, for which Rale was blamed, a surprise attack on Norridgewock was made on Aug. 23, 1724. English soldiers, contrary to orders, killed Rale and returned his scalp to Boston.

The missionary's strongbox, the chapel bell, and other items are in the Maine Historical Society, Portland. His dictionary, seized in the raid of January 1722, was edited by John Pickering in 1833; the manuscript copy is in the Harvard University library. A monument, dedicated in 1833 by Bp. Benedict Fenwick of Boston, Mass., in the presence of descendants of the tribe, marks the site of Rale's heroic labors and death.

Bibliography: J. F. SPRAGUE, Sebastien Ralé: A Maine Tragedy of the Eighteenth Century (Boston 1906). M. D. MULVEY, French Catholic Missionaries in the Present United States 1604–1791 (Washington 1936). H. C. SCHUYLER, "The Apostle of the Abnakis: Father Sebastian Rale, S.J., 1657–1724," Catholic Historical Review 1 (1915–16) 164–174, contains critical list of sources. Jesuit Relations and Allied Documents, ed. R. G. THWAITES, 73 v. (Cleveland 1896–1901; New York 1959–) 66 (1900) 346 and 71 (1901) 157, for biog. data; 67 (1900), for correspondence; 73 (1901) 270, for other references. J. P. BAXTER, Pioneers of New France in New England (Albany 1894), prejudiced but contains documents not found elsewhere.

[W. L. LUCEY]

Exterior of Church of the Holy Child, Shrine of the Infant of Prague, Jacksonville, Diocese of Raleigh (Raleighiensis), North Carolina, dedicated in 1963.

RALEIGH, DIOCESE OF

Established by Pius XI on Dec. 12, 1924, the Diocese of Raleigh (Dioecesis Raleighiensis) originally comprised the territory of the entire State of North Carolina, except for the eight counties assigned to the abbatia nullius diocesis of Belmont Abbey, that had been erected in 1910. In 1944 the jurisdiction of the abbot of Belmont was reduced to one county (Gaston), and in 1960, it was limited to the 827 acres of the monastery grounds. It was entirely suppressed in 1977, six years after the Diocese of Charlotte, which consists of the forty-six western counties of North Carolina, had been erected. Since the creation of a second diocese in the state (in 1971), the Diocese of Raleigh includes the fifty-four counties of the eastern part of the state. In 2001, a total Catholic population of 167,537 was reported, out of a total population of 3,697,588. It was served by 63 active diocesan and 53 religious priests, 23 permanent deacons, and 77 women religious.

The vicar general of the Archdiocese of Baltimore, William J. Hafey, became the first bishop of Raleigh upon his episcopal consecration, June 25, 1925. In 1937 he was transferred to the see of Scranton, PA, where in he died in 1954. Previously, the state of North Carolina had been included in the jurisdiction of the Diocese of Charleston, South Carolina (est. 1820), and it was constituted a vicariate apostolic in 1868. The first vicar apostolic was Bishop James Gibbons (1868–1877), who was followed in turn by Bishops John J. Keane (1878–1881) and Henry P. Northrup (1882–1887). During much of this period North Carolina lacked a resident bishop, as these vicars apostolic often served simultaneously as diocesan ordinaries elsewhere. An attempt was made to solve this pastoral difficulty by naming the abbot of Belmont Abbey, Leo M. Haid, O.S.B., as vicar apostolic in 1887. Haid served as both abbot and vicar apostolic until his death in 1924, after which the diocese was erected.

Hafey endeavored to establish a stronger institutional presence for the Church in North Carolina. He succeeded in establishing thirty new parishes (from 61 to 91), and increasing the number of “stations,” where Mass was at least occasionally celebrated, from 60 to 154. He recruited several religious congregations of men and women to establish themselves in the new diocese, a few of which focused at least some of their efforts on the evangelization of the African-American population. Immigration into the state was not strong in those early years, and the number of Catholics only rose from about 6,000 to about 10,000. But the number of women religious working in the diocese, mostly in the education and health care apostolates, increased from 84 to 199.

Eugene J. McGuinness, the second bishop of Raleigh in (1937–1944), continued many of the pastoral initiatives of Hafey, during a period of modest wartime population growth, until his transfer to the Diocese of Oklahoma City. On April 17, 1944, seven counties that had been assigned to the abbatia nullius diocese of Belmont Abbey (in 1910) were transferred to the jurisdiction of the Raleigh diocese, leaving only Gaston County in care of the abbot-ordinary of Belmont. (Gaston County, save the monastery property itself, was transferred to the diocese in 1960, and the abbatia nullius was suppressed in 1977.) Vincent S. Waters of the Diocese of Richmond, was installed as the third bishop of Raleigh in 1945.

During Waters' thirty years in office, he pursued a vigorous policy of evangelization among his fellow Southerners, and was noted for his socially progressive stances, especially with regard to "the race question." He issued a pastoral letter in 1953 (June 12) ordering the integration of all parishes, schools, and diocesan institutions and organizations, though the vision was not completely fulfilled for many years. After attending the sessions of Vatican Council II, Waters attempted a broad program of education and a cautious implementation of the conciliar and the post-conciliar decrees, which was met with impatience and frustration by a number of the diocesan priests and religious. He died in Raleigh in 1974, in the midst of the celebrations for the diocese's golden jubilee.

The Diocese of Raleigh, which had been a suffragan see of Baltimore was transferred to the Province of Atlanta when that diocese was made an archdiocese in 1962. The Diocese of Charlotte was created with Waters' full cooperation and support in 1971. He also established a diocesan newspaper, the North Carolina Catholic (1946), the North Carolina Laymen's Association, and a creative program for the pastoral training of newly ordained diocesan priests (1945). During Waters' episcopacy, James J. Navagh, Charles B. McLaughlin, and George E. Lynch served as auxiliary bishops in Raleigh, and Joseph Lennox Federal, Joseph L. Howze, and Michael J. Begley, all priests of the diocese, became ordinaries elsewhere. Howze was the first self-acknowledged black ordinary (Biloxi) appointed in the United States.

F. Joseph Gossman, an auxiliary bishop of Baltimore, was appointed the fourth bishop of Raleigh in 1975. In the last quarter of the twentieth century the Catholic population of the diocese rose more rapidly than ever before, as industry relocated workers from the north, immigrants moved into the state from Mexico and Central America, and military facilities expanded, drawing both active-duty and retired military personnel to the region. Retirees from around the country also established themselves in the coastal areas in record numbers. Collegiality, lay ministry, and ecumenical relationships were areas of special concern for Gossman and his administration during these years.

[J. F. GARNEAU]

RALLIEMENT

Term referring to the policy of adhering to the directives given by Pope LEO XIII to French Catholics in 1892. For historical reasons dating from the FRENCH REVOLUTION, the Third Republic (1870–1914) began with most of its supporters hostile to the Church and most Catholics eager for the return of the monarchy. ANTICLERICALISM and LAICISM characterized the outlook of Gambetta and other republicans who gained control in 1879, and legislated the expulsion of religious congregations, restrictions on Catholic education, and other laws inimical to the Church. From the beginning of his pontificate Leo XIII (1878–1903) pursued a prudent, cautious policy toward the Third Republic, illustrated notably by his encyclical Nobilissima Gallorum gens (Feb. 8, 1884), which asked French Catholics to defend the Church without opening themselves to accusations of hostility to established government. After the Boulanger crisis (1888–89) the pope judged that the moment had come to prescribe that Catholic political activity seek to improve the regime, not to destroy it. This policy of rallying to the Republic was launched by Cardinal LAVIGERIE, who, at papal request, pronounced a toast in Algiers (Nov. 12, 1890) in which he praised adherence unreservedly to the existing form of government. These words struck French Catholics as scandalous. The other French cardinals spoke out in favor of neutrality rather than of ralliement. Leo XIII waited until Feb. 16, 1892, before publishing the encyclical Au milieu des sollicitudes, whose contents can be resumed by a comment of the pope himself in a letter to the cardinals (May 3): "Accept the Republic . . . submit to it as representing power come from God."

These instructions provoked in elite Catholic circles a long crisis of conscience. Reactions were diverse and complex. As a rule only the young generation, especially among the clergy, comprehended Leo XIII, who was acting in virtue of his indirect power in temporal matters. Many laymen openly resisted the pontiff, arguing that this matter pertained to the temporal sphere entirely outside the pope's domain. Albert de Mun, Jacques Piou, Étienne Lamy, and Domenico FERRATA, nuncio (1891–96), were the leading ralliés. Leo XIII would have preferred to see Catholics allied with moderate republicans to form a large conservative party; but in the 1893 elections the ralliés won only 35 seats. However, the ralliement triumphed for some years by agreeing with an appeasement policy of the moderate republicans, called “the new spirit.” Then the Dreyfus affair, which saw the great majority of Catholics ranged against Dreyfus, reopened religious conflicts, especially from 1902 to 1906, and led to an expulsion of religious congregations, the rupture of diplomatic relations with the Holy See, and the separation of Church and State. Cardinal MERRY DEL VAL, secretary of state to Pius X, countermanded Leo XIII’s instructions (1909). For the time being the ralliement had collapsed.

Slowly the Republic took root, and monarchical restoration appeared more and more chimerical despite the success in certain quarters of the ACTION FRANÇAISE movement. After World War I, moreover, the former combatants no longer wished to renew religious struggles. Relations with the Holy See were renewed. A measure of agreement was reached in the application of the law separating Church and State. In 1924 a return of anticlericalism hung fire. BENEDICT XV had renewed Leo XIII’s policy, and PIUS XI continued to do so. He overcame the resistance of the assembly of French cardinals and archbishops, condemned Action Française (1926), and renewed Leo XIII’s directives through the secretary of state Cardinal GASPARRI. This is called the second ralliement. It succeeded because the arguments that had blocked the first no longer held. (See FRANCE.)

Bibliography: A. DEBIDOUR, L’église catholique et l’état sous la troisième république, 2 v. (Paris 1906–09), laicist viewpoint. J. TOURNIER, Le Cardinal Lavignerie et son action politique (Paris 1913). J. PIOU, Le ralliement et son histoire (Paris 1928). W. GURIAN, Die politischen und sozialen Ideen des Französischen Katholizismus, 1789–1914 (München-Gladbach 1929). Lecanuet ÉglFrance v.2, 3. J. BRUGERETTE, La Prêtre français et la société contemporaine, 3 v. (Paris 1933–38) v.2–3. Dansette v.2. P. CASTEL, Le P. Picard et le P. Bailly dans les luttes de presse (Rome 1962). A. SEDGWICK, The Ralliement in French Politics 1890–1898 (Cambridge, Mass. 1965).

[A. DANSETTE]

RALPH HIGDEN

English Benedictine chronicler; b. in the west country c. 1280; d. March 12, 1363–64. He became a monk of St. Werburg (Chester) in 1299 and supposedly traveled much in England. His principal claim to fame is the Polychronicon, a universal history, some versions of which end in 1327 and others in 1342. Ralph (Ranulph) gives some 40 authorities for his work, which is chiefly a compilation. It is divided into seven books (after the seven days of creation): the first is concerned with geography and the rest with history. The Polychronicon, of which more than 100 MSS survive, was enormously popular and was considered a standard work for more than 200 years. It is of interest as a compendium of medieval ideas on geography, science, and history; not even the small contemporary portion is of much value as a historical source. It was first translated into English (with additions) by John TREVISA in 1387; the translation (with a further continuation) was printed by Caxton in 1482.

Bibliography: R. HIGDEN, Polychronicon, ed. C. BABINGTON and J. R. LUMBY, 9 v. (Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores 41; 1865–86). C. L. KINGSFORD, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900; repr. with corrections, 21 v., 1908–09, 1921–22, 1938; suppl. 1901–) 9:816–817 for Higden’s other works. J. GAIRDNER, England (Early Chroniclers of Europe; New York 1879). J. DE GHELLINCK, L’Essor de la littérature latine au XII^e siècle, 2 v. (Brussels-Paris 1946) 2:264. W. A. PANTIN, The English Church in the Fourteenth Century (Cambridge, Eng. 1955).

[F. D. BLACKLEY]

RALPH OF DICETO

Angevin historian, theologian, outstanding 12th-century dean of St. Paul’s; b. c. 1120 to 1130; d. Nov. 22, 1202. Most probably Ralph was of French origin and connected with the Belmeis family. He spent two periods of study at Paris, one in his youth and another after he was made archdeacon of London in 1152. In 1180 he became dean of SAINT PAUL’S CATHEDRAL, where he initiated a complete overhaul of the administration of the chapter’s churches and manors, a reform of the statutes, and a vigorous building program.

Between 1180 and 1202 he composed his historical works, of which the most important are the Abbreviationes chronicorum (to 1147) and the Ymages historiarum (from the knightening of Henry of Anjou in 1149 to 1201). Up to 1162 he relied principally on the history of ROBERT OF TORIGNY; thereafter his work becomes an important original source. In spite of his Angevin leanings, he gave a very fair and balanced account of the BECKET controversy, and from c. 1180 the Ymages is a contemporary chronicle with its value enhanced by Ralph’s shrewd political insight and careful choice of documents. He also composed a number of scriptural commentaries.

Bibliography: Opera Historica, ed. W. STUBBS, 2 v. (Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores 68; 1876). The Domesday of St. Paul’s, ed. W. H. HALE (Camden Society; London 1858). M. GIBBS, Early Charters of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, London (Camden 3d Ser. 58; London 1939). F. BARLOW, The Letters of Arnulf of Lisieux (Camden 3d Ser. 61; London 1939) xvii, 35–36. C.

N. L. BROOKE, "The Composition of the Chapter of St. Paul's, 1086–1163," Cambridge Historical Journal 10 (1951) 111–132.

[M. M. CHIBNALL]

RALPH STRODE

English scholastic philosopher and logician; dates of birth and death unknown. He was a contemporary at Oxford of John WYCLIF, with whom he once disputed. From Wyclif's reply (Strode's work is lost), Responsiones ad Rodolphum Strodam, Strode appears to have argued against predestination and to have supported the endowments of the Church. His famed Logica has not survived, but his Consequentiae (on syllogisms) and his Obligations (on scholastic dialectic) were used in Italy and eventually printed at Padua and Venice. His conjectured authorship of the elegiac poem the PEARL is now generally rejected; his identification with a London common sergeant, who lived at Aldersgate and died in 1387, is unlikely, despite A. B. Emden's support. Emden thinks Strode was a fellow of Merton in 1359 and 1360, but the evidence appears inconclusive. Chaucer dedicated his Troilus and Criseyde jointly to the poet GOWER and "the philosophical Strode."

Bibliography: I. GOLLANZ, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London, 1885–1990) 19:57–59. C. F. BROWN, "The Author of The Pearl, Considered in the Light of His Theological Opinions," Publications of the Modern Language Association N.S. 12 (1904): 115–153. H. B. WORKMAN, John Wyclif, 2 v. (Oxford 1926) 2:125–129, 412–414. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 3:1807–1808.

[F. D. BLACKLEY]

RAMADĀN

The ninth month of the Islamic calendar. It would seem that in the ancient Arabian calendar this month fell in the summer; with the introduction by Islam of a purely lunar calendar, however, it may fall at any season of the year. It was in this month, traditionally on one of the last ten days, that the QUR'ĀN was revealed to MUḤAMMAD (cf. Qur'ān 2.181). Beginning from the year A.H. 2 (see HIJRA), with the suppression of the 'āšūrā' fast (on the 10th of al-Muḥarram, the first month of the year), Muslims have been obliged to fast during Ramaḍān (cf. Qur'ān 2.181–183). The fast (ṣawm, probably borrowed in this sense from Jewish Aramaic) is obligatory to all adults who are physically capable of it; but it is relaxed for the aged and infirm, pregnant and nursing women, and travelers; the last are expected later to make up the days that they have omitted. The fast is binding only during the daylight hours, during which the person who is fasting must abstain from all food and drink and from sexual intercourse; menstruation and post-partum bleeding are also considered to break the fast. The nights of Ramaḍān are often spent in various forms of social activity. The feast of the breaking of the fast ('īd al-ḥiṭr) is celebrated with the sighting of the new moon of the next month, Shawwāl.

[R. M. FRANK]

RAMBERT OF BOLOGNA

Dominican Thomist theologian and bishop; b. Bologna, c. 1250; d. Castello or Venice, Nov. 8 or 9, 1308. A son of the influential Primadizzi family, he entered the order at an early age. While still a young man he was sent to Saint-Jacques, Paris, for theological training; he was in Paris during the second regency of St. THOMAS AQUINAS (1269–72). By 1288 he was a bachelor in theology. Returning to Bologna before receiving the degree of master, he occupied various positions of importance. As definitor of the province of Lombardy in 1291, he attended the general chapter of Palencia that deposed the Master General, Munio of Zamorra. In 1300 and 1301 he was considered a likely candidate for the office of master general. Meanwhile, between 1290 and 1295 he returned to Paris to obtain the university's license to incept in theology; he taught as regent master between 1295 and 1299. By April 1299 he returned to Bologna and was appointed consultor to the Holy Office. On Feb. 20, 1303, he was appointed bishop of Castello, near Venice, an office he filled until his death. He is buried in the Dominican church of SS. Giovanni e Paolo in Venice.

In reply to the Correctorium fratris Thomae of WILLIAM DE LA MARE, Rambert wrote an Apologeticum veritatis contra corruptorium (ed. J.P. Müller, Vatican 1943). see CORRECTORIA. This reply was written in Paris before his departure in 1299. It is incomplete, ending abruptly in the middle of a sentence in article 16 instead of at the end of 118 articles. Although it follows the structure of other correctoria and depends noticeably on the Correctorium "Circa" of JOHN (QUIDORT) OF PARIS, it is highly original in that Rambert answers parallel criticisms of RICHARD OF MIDDLETON, HENRY OF GHENT, and GILES OF ROME. He refers also to SIGER OF BRABANT. Apart from this, a lost commentary on the Sentences, and one sermon for Easter, April 22, 1302, other works formerly ascribed to him are now known to be spurious: the Speculum exemplare was written by Petroboni Bentivegne of Bologna; the Determinatio de paupertate Christi et apostolorum was written by a Dominican known as Robert of Bologna; De potestate regia et papali is of unknown authorship. Only the compilation of Quodlibeta 1–9 of Henry of Ghent remains doubtful.

Despite the dearth of his writings, Rambert is a significant witness in the development of early THOMISM. His Apologeticum alone reflects the loyalty and fidelity of Italian Dominicans to Thomas Aquinas even before his canonization.

Bibliography: É. H. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages 414–416. P. GLORIEUX, Répertoire des maîtres en théologie de Paris au XIII^e siècle 1:170–171. J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum 1.2:504. M. GRABMAN, “La scuola tomistica italiana nel XIII e principio del XIV secolo,” Rivista di filosofia neoscolastica 15 (Milan 1923) 127–131. F. CORVINO, Enciclopedia filosofica 3:1845–46.

[P. GLORIEUX]

RAMEAU, JEAN PHILIPPE

Distinguished composer and theorist; b. Dijon, France, Sept. 25, 1683; d. Paris, Sept. 12, 1764. In a long, busy career Rameau was eminent in three musical areas that were much more disparate then than now. In his earlier years he was considered primarily a theorist, and his Traité d'harmonie of 1722 is one of the landmarks of the science. In it he proposed theories of the invertibility of triads, the “fundamental bass” (function of chord roots irrespective of inversions), and the cycle of fifths—theories definitive in virtually all texts on tonal harmony since then. He composed many harpsichord works, both solo pieces (three books: 1706, 1724, 1731) and pieces en concert (with other instruments, 1741). He was also an organist and produced a handful of motets in connection with his church positions. In 1733, already age 50, Rameau began a new career in opera. He produced more than two dozen works, among them Les Indes galantes (1735), Castor et Pollux (1737), and a comedy, Les Paladins (1760). His imaginative instrumentation and characterization caused considerable discussion; his work was always controversial. His contemporaries considered him a philosopher, and he continued didactic writing throughout his life.

Bibliography: Oeuvres complètes, ed. C. SAINT-SAËNS, 18 v. (Paris 1895–1913), now somewhat outdated; the keyboard works have recently been reedited by E. JACOBI; “Traité de l'harmonie,” O. STRUNK, ed., Source Readings in Music History (New York 1950) 564–574, excerpt. P. M. MASSON, L'Opéra de Rameau (Paris 1930). P. BERTHIER, Réflexions sur l'art et la vie de Jean-Philippe Rameau (Paris 1957). C. M. GIRDLESTONE, Jean-Philippe Rameau (London 1957). M. M. KEANE, The Theoretical Writings of Jean-Philippe Rameau (Washington 1961). Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, ed. N. SLONIMSKY (5th, rev. ed. New York 1958) 1303–05. D. J. GROUT, A Short History of Opera, 2 v. (2d, rev. and enl. ed. New York 1965). J.-M. BARDEZ, “Jean-Philippe Rameau: Pièces de Clavecin en Concert,” Analyse Musicale 25 (1991) 77–97. T. CHRISTENSEN, Rameau and Musical Thought in the Enlightenment (Cambridge, England 1993). C. DILL, Monstrous Opera: Rameau and the Tragic Tradition (Princeton 1998). B. HYER, “Sighing Branches: Prosopopoeia in Rameau's Pigmalion,” Music Analysis 13 (1994) 7–50. H. KREBS, “Schenker's Changing View of Rameau: A Comparison of Remarks in Harmony, Counterpoint, and Rameau or Beethoven?,” Theoria: Historical Aspects of Music Theory 3 (1998) 59–72. W. LANDOWSKA, “French Music Of the Past: Jean Philippe Rameau,” in Landowska On Music, ed. and trans. D. RESTOUT (New York 1964) 267–273. P. F. RICE, “Mid-Eighteenth Century Changes in French Opera: The Two Versions of Rameau's Zoroastre,” Recherches sur la Musique française classique 21 (1983) 128–144. P. SABY, “Le travail de la forme dans les chœurs dramatiques de Jean-Philippe Rameau,” Analyse Musicale 20 (1990) 9–15. H. SCHNEIDER, “Rameau et sa famille: Nouveaux documents,” Recherches sur la Musique française classique 23 (1985) 94–130.

Jean Philippe Rameau.

[E. BORROFF]

RAMOS ARIZPE, MIGUEL

Mexican priest and politician; b. Coahuila, Feb. 15, 1775; d. Mexico City, April 28, 1843. He studied at Monterrey and Guadalajara and was ordained in 1803 in the cathedral of Mexico City. In 1808 he received the doctorate in canon law in Guadalajara and in 1810 entered the Colegio de Abogados of Mexico City. During these years he held a number of posts in the bishopric of Linares. From 1811 to 1814 Ramos Arizpe was the representative of Coahuila to the Spanish Cortes. In Cádiz he became a Mason and was widely known for his extreme liberalism. He was accused of conspiracy and arrested on orders of Ferdinand VII, but the successful liberal revolution of 1820 gave him his freedom, after which he was named canon of the Puebla cathedral. In December of 1821 he arrived at Tampico and then went to Saltillo, where he devoted himself to masonic propaganda and engaged in a conspiracy against Iturbide. When Iturbide was overthrown and the republic established, Ramos Arizpe became a deputy for Coahuila and a leader of the federalist group. The Constitution of 1824 was, in part, his work. He founded the Masonic Society, Águila Negra, and collaborated with POINSETT in founding York Rite lodges. He served as minister of justice and ecclesiastical affairs (1826–28), as ambassador to Chile (1830), as a member of the junta that proposed the Plan of Tacubaya in 1841, and as a deputy in congress (1842). Beginning in 1831, he was dean of the cathedral of Puebla. He wrote a number of reports as minister of justice, and Memoria sobre las Provincias Internas de Oriente (Cádiz 1812; Guadalajara 1831; Eng. tr. Philadelphia 1814).

Bibliography: V. ALESSIO ROBLES, "Noticia Biográfica," in M. RAMOS ARIZPE, Memoria sobre el estado de las provincias internas de oriente (Mexico City 1932) 7–54. ,

[E. DEL HOYO]

RAMPOLLA DEL TINDARO, MARIANO

Cardinal, secretary of state; b. Polizzi, Sicily, Aug. 17, 1843; d. Rome, Dec. 16, 1913. Of noble birth, he had to brave paternal hostility to pursue his priestly studies in Rome, receiving ordination in 1866. Following legal studies he became doctor in utroque jure (1870). He then served the secretariate of state in the Congregation for Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs until 1875 when he went to Spain as counselor in the nunciature, becoming chargé d'affaires in 1876. Grave political disturbances were troubling Spain, with Catholics divided between the Carlists and Alfonsists. The representative of the Holy See had to try to pacify these opposing parties.

Msgr. Rampolla was called to Rome (1877) by Pius IX to become secretary for affairs of the Oriental rite in the Congregation for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH. Aided by his grasp of Oriental languages, he sought to end the Armenian schism; he reached a solution in 1879. He served as secretary of the Congregation for Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs from Nov. 16, 1880, until his appointment, Oct. 25, 1882, as nuncio to Madrid. On Dec. 8, 1882, he was consecrated titular archbishop of Heraclea. Msgr. Della Chiesa, the future BENEDICT XV, acted as his secretary. The new nuncio urged Spanish Catholics to distinguish the cause of religion from that of political parties. In dioceses he favored lay associations promoting a rigorously Catholic program. He also contributed to the erection of an episcopal see in Madrid, which until 1885 had been dependent on the Diocese of Toledo. It was to Rampolla that Cardinal JACOBINI, Secretary of State, addressed the important letter (April 13, 1885) on the powers of nuncios. The nuncio's good offices permitted the Holy See to act as mediator between Spain and Germany in the dispute over the Caroline Islands, which was settled in December 1885.

Named cardinal (March 14, 1887), Rampolla succeeded Jacobini as secretary of state, June 1, 1887, and held the post until Leo XIII's death, July 20, 1903. It would be extremely difficult to differentiate the respective roles of Pope and secretary in the conduct of pontifical diplomacy during these 16 years. Their views were identical, according to witnesses. It is significant that LEO XIII, after some months of hesitation, chose Rampolla rather than Luigi Galimberti, who favored a modus vivendi with Italy and good relations with the Central Powers. As matters turned out, hope for a settlement of the ROMAN QUESTION gradually subsided. Italy's association with Germany and Austria-Hungary in the Triple Alliance led Rome to seek an entente with France and Russia. Cardinal Rampolla sympathized with France; interested himself in the southern Slavs who were subject to Austria-Hungary; sought cordial relations with Russia; wished to see the Church endorse democratic aspirations; and favored decidedly the Christian social movement in Austria. These explain Austria's hostility to the secretary of state, manifested most notoriously at the conclave in 1903 when Cardinal Puzyna stifled all chance of Rampolla's election, after he had received 29 votes, by exercising his government's veto power.

Pius X appointed Rampolla secretary of the Holy Office, and also as a member and then president of the PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL COMMISSION. His manner of life was retired, austere, and free of personal ambition.

Bibliography: C. CRISPOLTI and G. AURELI, eds., La politica di Leone XIII da Luigi Galimberti a Mariano Rampolla (Rome 1912). P. SINOPOLI DI GIUNTA, Il cardinale Mariano Rampolla del Tindaro (Rome 1923). B. CERRETTI, Il cardinale Mariano Rampolla del Tindaro (Rome 1929). E. SODERINI, Il pontificato di Leone XIII, 3 v. (Milan 1932–33). F. ENGEL-JANOSI, Österreich und der Vatikan, 1846–1918, 2 v. (Graz 1958–60).

[J. M. MAYEUR]

RAMSEY, ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine monastery in the county of Huntingdon (town of Ramsey) and the Diocese of Lincoln. It was founded c. 969 by Aylwin, Duke of East Anglia, at the prompting of OSWALD OF YORK. Richly endowed by the founder and his kinsfolk, the abbey became known as "Ramsey the rich." Twelve monks came from Westbury to occupy buildings erected by Ednoth. The abbey church was built in 974 and dedicated to Our Lady, St. Benedict, and All Holy Virgins. At Oswald's request, the abbot of Fleury sent ABBO OF FLEURY (c. 986) as a teacher for this new Benedictine community. Abbo wrote his Questiones grammaticales for the instruction of the monks and a Passio sancti Edmundi at their request. One of his pupils composed a life of Oswald, while Byrhtferth, another pupil, wrote commentaries on Bede's mathematical works. Further gifts to support the community of 80 monks came from Aethelric, Bishop of Dorchester, early in the 11th century, whereas an attempt by the Mercian thegn, Aelthere, to replace the monks with seculars failed. In 1143 Geoffrey de Mandeville drove out the monks and used the buildings as a fortress during the Barons' War. After Geoffrey's death Abbot Walter had to restore the abbey. Shrines of the fenland saints, Felix of Dunwich, Ethelred, and Ethelbriht, were added in 1192. Community life was fully restored and high enough standards maintained to stand severe scrutiny by Bp. ROBERT GROSSETESTE in 1239. However, the rich fenland estates of the abbey aroused the jealousy of neighbors, and the monks were involved in expensive lawsuits, which led to their being in debt by 1267. Though discipline seems to have fallen off for a time, the abbey recovered c. 1400, and visitations in the 15th century showed little amiss. Abbot Tichmersh began further building work, while the magnificent library was put to good use by Lawrence Holbeach in composing his Hebrew lexicon. But zeal for the religious life again fell off; and when the crisis came with HENRY VIII in November 1539, the abbey surrendered without a struggle. The monastic community was pensioned. All the buildings, except the gateway, have been destroyed.

Bibliography: W. H. HART and P. A. LYONS, eds., Cartularium monasterii de Rameseia, 3 v. (Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores 79; 1884-93). W. D. MACRAY, ed., Chronicon abbatiae Rameseiensis (Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores 83; 1886). The Victoria History of the County of Huntingdon, ed. W. PAGE et al. (London 1926-) 1:377-385. D. KNOWLES, The Monastic Order in England, 943-1216 (2ed. Cambridge, England 1962); D. KNOWLES, The Religious Orders in England, 3 v. (Cambridge, England 1948-60). D. KNOWLES and R. N. HADCOCK, Medieval Religious Houses: England and Wales (New York 1953). J. A. RAFTIS, The Estates of Ramsey Abbey (Toronto 1957).

[F. R. JOHNSTON]

Mariano Rampolla del Tindaro.

RAMUS, PETER

Pierre de la Ramée, educational reformer and logician, author of many widely used works on philosophy and letters; b. Cuts (Oise), France, 1515; d. Paris, Aug. 26, 1572. Despite straitened family circumstances, Ramus went to study at Paris. The common story that for his inaugural performance as master of arts in 1536 or 1537 he defended a spectacularly anti-Aristotelian thesis is now suspect, but in 1543 his two works, Dialecticae partitiones (The Structure of Dialectic) and Aristotelicae animadversiones (Remarks on Aristotle), did violently attack Aristotle and the university curriculum as confused and disorganized. Condemned by Francis I, Ramus was reinstated by Henry II, who in 1551 appointed him professor of eloquence and philosophy in the body of professors later known as the Collège de France. He embraced the Protestant reform around 1562, retiring to Fontainebleau in 1562-63 and to Rhenish Germany and Switzerland from 1568 to 1570. C. Waddington's often-repeated story that Ramus's murder in the St. Bartholomew's Day Massacre was engineered by the physician Jacques Charpentier is without solid foundation.

Ramus's much edited works, which sparked volumes of controversy, run to 60-odd titles, supplemented by some 13 additional published works of Omer Talon (Audomarus Talaeus, c. 1510–62), his literary collaborator. Besides the pivotal dialectic or logic and its complementary rhetoric, these works include also classical editions and commentaries; lectures on physics, metaphysics, and mathematics; textbooks on grammar, arithmetic, algebra, and geometry; miscellaneous orations and open letters; and the posthumously published Commentariorum de religione Christianae libri quatuor (1576), Ramus's only theological work, basically Zwinglian in orientation.

Ramus's most important work was the Dialectica or Logica (1555, 1556, etc.), a work related to the dialectic of R. Agricola, Ciceronian and humanistic in professed aim, but ultrascholastic in manner and in much of its content. Dialectic or logic, the art of discourse (ars disserendi), made up of inventio and dispositio, was to rule all thought, from mathematics to poetry, to the exclusion of any logics of the probable (such as dialectic and rhetoric had often been made out to be). Ramist rhetoric consisted merely of tropes and figures. Ramus helped set the stage for R. DESCARTES by developing concern about "method," which in 1546 Ramus, almost simultaneously with MELANCHTHON and Johann Sturm, had transplanted into logic from the rhetorical manuals where it earlier appeared. "Method," included under dispositio, meant proceeding from the general to the particular. ("Cryptic method," proceeding from the particular to the general, met special emergencies.) Ramists specialized in dichotomized charts to "analyze" both thought and reality "methodically": a subject was divided into two, the subdivisions again dichotomized, and so on. Ramist method provided the academic tradition of the West a major teachable organization for discursive thought other than that of the classical oration, which from antiquity had been the dominant overall form of discursive organization formally taught, though others were used (the common dialectical organization was not discursive but dependent on attack and rejoinder). Ramist method thus laid the groundwork for the modern encyclopedia article.

Into the late 17th century Ramism had countless proponents, especially in Germany, the British Isles and their American colonies, France, Switzerland, the Low Countries, and Scandinavia. Ramus's theology as such attracted little notice, beyond the condemnation of his proposal for lay church government at the Protestant synod of Nîmes in 1572. But Ramist systematizing appealed to the nonsacramental, methodical Calvinist mind, in both religious and secular matters. Countless writers, including Francis BACON, attacked Ramism as oversimplified, but its heavy reliance, overt or covert, on spatial models in its account of mental activities and extramental actuality, which has discernible antecedents in medieval SCHOLASTICISM, was typical of much of the thought even of its opponents.

See Also: DIALECTICS; DIALECTICS IN THE MIDDLE AGES.

Bibliography: W. J. ONG, Ramus, Method, and the Decay of Dialogue (Cambridge, Mass. 1958), exhaustive bibliog; Ramus and Talon Inventory (Cambridge, Mass. 1958). R. HOOYKAAS, Humanisme, science et réforme: Pierre de La Ramée 1515–1572 (Leiden 1959). W. RISSE, Die Logik der Neuzeit (Stuttgart 1963) v.1.

[W. J. ONG]

RANCÉ, ARMAND JEAN LE BOUTHILLIER DE

Cistercian abbot and reformer of La Trappe, ascetic author and controversialist; b. Paris, Jan. 9, 1626; d. La Trappe, Oct. 27, 1700. He was born of an influential family of government officials and was destined early to an ecclesiastical career. He received the tonsure in 1635 and soon became a canon of Paris and the beneficiary of two priories and three abbeys, among them the Cistercian LA TRAPPE in Normandy. He pursued his studies with brilliance, particularly in patristic theology. Rancé was ordained on Jan. 22, 1651, received the licentiate of theology in the next year, ranking first in his class, and was graduated as doctor of theology from the Sorbonne in 1654. At the Assembly of the Clergy from 1655 to 1657, he defended Cardinal de Retz against Mazarin and signed the anti-Jansenist formulary, although he retained a close relationship with the French Oratory and the circle of Port-Royal. Neither better nor worse than many other worldly prelates of his era, he divided his time between occasional preaching and the fashionable diversions of Paris society.

The turning point of his life came in 1657, when the death of the celebrated beauty of the court, the duchess of Montbazou, terminated their close friendship. He left Paris and spent much time at his country home in reading, reflection, and meditation. Resolving to become a monk, he sold his estates, retaining only La Trappe, and in 1663 began his novitiate at the reformed Cistercian monastery of Perseigne. He made his monastic profession on June 6, 1664, with the intention of assuming the government of La Trappe as regular abbot. A few months after his profession, however, he was delegated by the CISTERCIANS of the Strict Observance, together with Dominic George, abbot of Val-Richer, to plead before Pope Alexander VII for the autonomy for this reformed branch of the order. He remained in Rome until 1666, but the mission was a failure; the Strict Observance remained subject to the abbot of Cîteaux. Rancé submitted to the papal decision with great reluctance. In 1673 he made a direct appeal to Louis XIV for a reversal of the decree, only to fail again. He retired from public life and devoted his energies to the reform of La Trappe, although he maintained a voluminous correspondence and published a number of books and pamphlets in justification of his peculiar monastic ideas.

His chief work was De la sainteté et des devoirs de la vie monastique (2 v., Paris 1683). Ignoring the indulgent character of the Rule of St. Benedict, he insisted that monasticism was basically penitential. Monks should consider themselves criminals doomed to a life of severity. The abbot must create humiliations for his monks and encourage the practice of austerity even at the cost of ruined health. The monks must feel no satisfaction in their works and exercises, must banish intellectual pursuits, and occupy their time in hard manual labor. Rancé's concept of monasticism became the object of vigorous reaction. His most notable opponent was the Maurist MABILLON who defended monastic studies. Under Rancé's administration La Trappe became a populous and much admired community, and he himself was venerated as a saint by many of his contemporaries. His health broken by austerities and exertions, Rancé abdicated as abbot in 1695 and died among his devoted monks after five years of intense suffering. Rancé's heroic asceticism was deeply impressive, though his obvious exaggerations and combative temper leave him always a figure of controversy. His immediate influence was slight, but after the Napoleonic Wars, when the Strict Observance was successfully revived by the monks of La Trappe, he became the guiding genius of the fast-growing TRAPPIST congregation and dominated its spirituality during the 19th century.

Bibliography: L. DUBOIS, Histoire de l'abbé de Rancé et de sa réforme, 2 v. (Paris 1866), considered the standard biography, this is a version of the panegyric 18th-century MS of A. F. GERVAISE. J. MARSOLLIER, La Vie de Dom Arman-Jean Le Bouthillier de Rancé (Paris 1703). F. R. DE CHATEAUBRIAND, Vie de Rancé (Paris 1844). H. BREMOND, The Thundering Abbot, tr. F. J. SHEED (London 1930). A. CHEREL, Rancé (Paris 1930) and E. JEU, M. de La Trappe (Paris 1931), are short and popular. For list of works and full bibliography see J. CARREYRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–), 13.2:1652–56.

[L. J. LEKAI]

RANDOMNESS

Randomness is a term with two principal meanings, one mathematical and the other physical. In the mathematics of probability and statistics, the term can refer to either the notion of “random variable” or the more imprecise concept signified by “random sampling,” “at random,” or “random distribution.” A random variable, best defined as “a function defined on a given sample space” (Feller, 204), is less important than the imprecise “at random” notion it helps to clarify. The latter, in the purely theoretical formulation of probability, is roughly equivalent to the equal likelihood presumed in the basic postulates of probability (ibid. 29). As such, it is a purely theoretical model for the explanation of experimental results that are often neither perfectly random nor truly equally likely.

In the physical world randomness is closely associated with CHANCE and with the data of such theories as quantum and statistical mechanics, which presuppose random motion of particles for the very formulation of their laws. Randomness thus seems to be a given, or datum, in at least some of the most important areas of science; J. von Neumann has attempted to demonstrate the radical character of this randomness. Nevertheless, it is a peculiarity of statistical theory that the most unexpected experimental results—equally probable or not—can be (approximately) reduced to some sort of statistical regularity. For example, consider the relations between Maxwell–Boltzmann, Bose–Einstein, and Fermi–Dirac statistics in theoretical physics (ibid. 38–40). This suggests that there is some sort of ORDER underlying even the most “random” of physical events, whether or not science ever in fact discovers it.

Bibliography: W. FELLER, An Introduction to Probability Theory and Its Applications, v.1 (New York 1957).

[P. R. DURBIN]

RANFAING, ELIZABETH OF, VEN.

Foundress; b. Remiremont (Lorraine), Oct. 30, 1592; d. Nancy, Jan. 14, 1649. Elizabeth (Marie Elisabeth de la Croix de Jesus) had been coerced into marriage with Dubois, an aged nobleman, who treated her brutally. She was a widow, at 24. With her three daughters she opened a refuge for fallen women in Nancy in 1631. The success of this venture, one of many such houses, convinced ecclesiastics of the permanent need for this apostolate. In 1634 the Holy See approved of her congregation under the title of Our Lady of Refuge. It spread rapidly throughout France, particularly in the late 19th century. Several independent houses of refuge became members of the congregation, which had St. Ignatius as patron and the Rule of St. Augustine as a guide. The constitution provided for three types of members: those of unblemished lives, vowed specifically to serve the penitents; penitents of altered lives, equal with the first sisters but ineligible for office; and penitents proper, following the same rule but without vows. To guarantee this apostolate to the pen-itants, the rule specified that the third group always constitute at least two-thirds of the community.

Leopold von Ranke. (Archive Photos)

Bibliography: H. M. BOUDON, Le Triomphe de la croix en la personne de la vénérable mère Marie-Élizabeth de la Croix de Jésus (Liège 1686). L. GIAMBENE, Enciclopedia Italiana di scienze, lettere ed arti, 36 v. (Rome 1929–39; suppl. 1938–) 29:317. M. HEIMBUCHER, Die Orden und Kongregationen der katholischen Kirche, 2 v. (3d ed. Paderborn 1932–34) 1:650. P. HÉLYOT, Histoire des ordres monastiques, 8 v. (Paris 1714–19) 4:344–361. G. ALLEMANG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:818.

[C. LYNCH]

RANKE, LEOPOLD VON

Historian; b. Wiehe (Thuringia), Germany, Dec. 21, 1795; d. Berlin, May 23, 1886. He descended from a long line of Lutheran pastors and studied theology and classical philology at the University of Leipzig (1814–18), where his reading of Thucydides and Barthold Niebuhr turned his main interest to history. After a long period of doubt, Ranke had moved by 1818 toward a synthesis of Lutheran mysticism, Neoplatonism, humanism as propounded by Goethe and Herder, and the pantheism of Fichte. While teaching at a secondary school (gymnasium) at Frankfort on the Oder (1818–25), he completed the first part of his Geschichten der romanischen und germanischen Völker (1824). This won him a professorship at the University of Berlin (1825–71). His accomplishments included the discovery of the invaluable records of the Venetian ambassadors; lectures on the history of Italian poetry (1833), which inspired a new school of historiography; and joint editorship of the Historisch-Politische Zeitschrift, founded in 1833 to combat revolutionary extremism. He was named official Prussian historiographer (1841), served as president of the Munich Historical Commission beginning in 1858, and gained the Prussian prefix of nobility “von” (1865).

Ranke was the most influential and widely read historian of his century, noted for pioneer work in the systematic exploitation of archival sources and in the creation of the modern scientific approach to history. The “Columbus of modern history,” as Lord Acton termed him, took as the apt motto of his extremely industrious life, Labor ipse voluptas. His prodigious scholarly output spanned modern European history and continued for six decades until the eve of his death, which found him, half blind, at work on the sixth volume of a world history, begun in his 82d year. Although many sections of his works are outdated, many of his profound observations in them remain valid. His aim was to write history “as it actually happened,” avoiding political partisanship, nationalistic narrowness, moral judgments, and religious enthusiasm. His universalistic and unitary view of European history was admirable, although not devoid of his conservative Prussian political commitment. To him the driving forces of modern history have been the European states. He was a leading exponent of HISTORICISM and rejected the notion of progress. History to him was a hieroglyph of God, and Christian hope and belief in Divine Providence were dominant in his outlook. Each era, he believed, is directed to God and is fulfilled in itself, not in later generations. He tended, however, to center history too much on great personages and to concentrate on diplomatic questions to the neglect of social and juridical ones.

Chief among Ranke’s books were his three volumes on Prussian history (1847–48), five volumes on French history (1852–61), and seven volumes on English history (1859–68). His five-volume history of Germany in the Reformation period (1839–47) revealed a Lutheran sympathy evident elsewhere in his treatment of religious topics. Ranke first won fame with his three-volume history of the popes during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries (1834–39), which he extended to include Vatican Council I (1869–70) in the 6th edition (1874) and later ones. It was based on extensive archival research, although it did not include the Vatican Archives, which were not then opened to scholars. Although it overemphasized papal political and diplomatic activity, it was a masterpiece of historiography and raised this subject from its hitherto polemical level. Protestants criticized it as too favorable to Catholics; Rome placed it on the Index (Sept. 16, 1841).

Bibliography: Sämtliche Werke, 54 v. (Leipzig 1867–90); ed. P. JOACHIMSEN et al. (Munich 1952–); Das Briefwerk, ed. W. P. FUCHS (Hamburg 1949); Neue Briefe, ed. B. HOEFT and H. HERZFELD (Hamburg 1949). H. F. HELMOLT, L. von Ranke's Leben und Wirken (Leipzig 1921). G. P. GOOCH, History and Historians in the Nineteenth Century (2d ed. London 1952). F. SCHNABEL, Deutsche Geschichte im 19. Jahrhundert, 4 v. (Freiburg 1927–37) 3:86–101. T. H. VON LAUE, Leopold Ranke, the Formative Years (Princeton 1950). H. VON SRBIK, Geist und Geschichte vom Deutschen Humanismus bis zur Gegenwart, 2 v. (Munich 1950–51) 1:239–292. H. HEUSER, L. von Ranke's protestantisches Geschichtsbild (Zurich 1950). C. HINRICHS, Ranke und Die Geschichtstheologie der Goethezeit (Göttingen 1954). F. BAETHGEN, “Zur geistigen Entwicklungsgeschichte Rankes in seiner Frühzeit,” Deutschland und Europa, ed. W. CONZE (Düsseldorf 1951) 337–353. F. MEINECKE, Die Entstehung des Historismus, ed. C. HINRICHS (3d ed. Munich 1959). H. LUTZ, “Ranke und das Papsttum” Rivista di storia della Chiesa in Italia 16 (1962): 439–450. K. KUPISCH, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 5:778–779. S. SKALWEIT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:990–991.

[S. J. TONSOR]

RANSOM

The analogy of the payment of a price is employed in the New Testament to explain the death of Christ: “The Son of Man has not come to be served but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom [Gr. λύτρον] for many” (Mk 10.45). This saying of Christ is an allusion to the fourth Servant Song (Isaiah ch. 53; see SUFFERING SERVANT, SONGS OF THE). The word λύτρον means a payment for the release of a prisoner or a criminal (cf. Septuagint, Nm 35.31). A cognate notion is that of a bondsman, a role that Yahweh plays with respect to Israel (Ex 6.6; Hos 13.14). St. Paul uses this metaphor to remind the people that they do not belong to themselves but to God (1 Cor 6. 19–20; Acts 20.28). St. Peter writes: “You know that you were redeemed . . . not with perishable things, with silver or gold, but with the precious blood of Christ . . .” (1 Pt 1.18).

The condition from which mankind is ransomed is spoken of as captivity to the law of sin (Rom 7.23), as slavery to the Law (Rom 7.1–6), as subjection to the power of darkness (Col 1.13) and to death (Col 2.13). These ideas have a resonance in St. John (Jn 12.31; 1 Jn 3.8) and in Hebrews (2.14–15).

Man's ransom or Redemption has a positive aspect. “Jesus Christ . . . gave himself for us that he might redeem us from iniquity and cleanse for himself an acceptable people, pursuing good works” (Ti 2.14). This text alludes to the deliverance from Egypt and the covenant of Sinai. God freed His people from slavery that He might take them for his own and make them a holy people (Dt 7.6–11; cf. Jer 31.32–33). Similarly, by Christ's death man is acquired or purchased by Christ and becomes His own (1 Cor 7.22–24), but free. He is consecrated to God and made holy. His ransom from bondage terminates in union with God.

The concept of the saving work of Christ as a liberation achieved through ransom led some of the Fathers to picture the devil as the one to whom the ransom was paid. Satan had acquired legal rights over man and the blood of Christ had to be paid him as ransom. Although this theory was ridiculed by some, for example, by Adamantius as early as A. D. 300 (Dialogue 1.27; Patrologia Graeca 11:1756; Van de Sande Bakhuyzen, Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte 55), it was espoused by Origen, Gregory of Nyssa, Ambrose and others and was popular through a good part of the Middle Ages.

Bibliography: S. LYONNET, “De notione redemptionis,” Verbum Donini 36 (1958) 129–146; “De notione emptionis seu acquisitionis,” ibid. 257–269; De peccato et redemptione, 4 v. (Rome 1957—). A. VÖGTLE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1150–51.

[J. M. CARMODY]

RAPHAEL, ARCHANGEL

The angel who is one of the chief figures in the story of Tobit. The Book of TOBIT (Tobias) is the only book in the Bible that mentions him. In Hebrew his name repā'el (cf. 1 Chr 26.7) means “God has healed.”

The stature of Raphael attained in pre-Christian Jewish and Christian belief as an instrument of divine intervention. Raphael appears as God's envoy, sent to answer Tobit's and Sarah's separate prayers by healing Tobit's blindness and by providing a husband for Sarah [Tb 3:16–17 (3.26 in Vulgate)]. Tobias, Tobit's son, is guided to Rages, Media, by Raphael, now disguised as a fellow Israelite. He leads Tobias to a happy marriage with Sarah (thus answering her prayer), collects Tobias' inheritance as a wedding gift, and finally brings the happy couple back to Tobit, whose blindness he then cures. Before returning to the heavenly court, he reveals himself to be “one of the seven Angels who are ever ready to enter into the presence of the Lord's glory” (12.12, 15).

The Bible mentions by name only three angels, Raphael, MICHAEL, and GABRIEL. Apocryphal works supply other names but usually in legendary fashion.

“The Archangel Leaving the Family of Tobias,” painting by Rembrandt, 1637. (©Francis G. Mayer/CORBIS)

A cultus of Raphael appeared rather late and then only infrequently. A Venetian church was dedicated to him in the 7th century. Isolated references appeared honoring him on various dates, but only in the 17th century did Masses in his honor become more numerous. In 1921 Benedict XV instituted a universal feast for him, to be celebrated on October 24. The post-Vatican II reform of the Roman liturgical calendar created a combined Feast of the Archangels Michael, Gabriel and Raphael on September 29. In the Eastern Christian Tradition, the Feast of the Archangels is celebrated on November 8.

Images of Raphael before the 16th century are rare, but since then he has been widely depicted as the patron of travelers.

Bibliography: D. KECK, Angels and Angelology in the Middle Ages (New York 1998).

[T. L. FALLON/EDS.]

RAPID CITY, DIOCESE OF

Established first at Lead, South Dakota in 1902, the seat of the diocese was transferred to Rapid City (Rapidopolitana) in 1930. It is a suffragan of the metropolitan See of St. Paul-Minneapolis. The diocese includes about 43,000 square miles, all of the state west of the Missouri River. The leading Sioux reservations are located in this diocese. The first bishop was John Stariha (1902–1909), who resigned because of ill health and was succeeded by Joseph Busch (1910–1915). John Lawler (1916–1948) became bishop, followed by William T. McCarty (1948–1969), Harold J. Dimmerling (1969–1987), and Charles J. Chaput OFM Cap. (1987–1998), who was appointed archbishop of Denver ten years later. Blase J. Cupich was installed as bishop in September, 1998.

Of the more than 222,000 people in the area, about 32,000 are Catholic. Some 10,000 of these are on the Indian Reservations: Pine Ridge, Rosebud, Crow Creek, Lower Brule and the southern section of Standing Rock. A diocesan Native Concerns Office addresses the needs of the Native Americans on and off the reservations. When Martin Marty, Vicar Apostolic of Dakota Territory in the late 19th century, could find no more Benedictine priest-monks for the reservations, he recruited German Jesuit priests to staff them. They were assisted by Sisters of St. Francis, Daughters of the Heart of Mary, Benedictine nuns, Presentations and Sisters of Charity. The Oblate Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament, was organized at Marty Mission near Wagner by the Benedictine monk-missionary, Father Sylvester Eisenman, in cooperation with Mother (now Saint) Katharine DREXEL and the Pennsylvania Congregation of Blessed Sacrament Sisters who staffed the school that continues to serve the people at Marty as well as staffing Kateri Convent in Rapid City from which the Sisters tend home-bound Native Americans in the area. At Howes, the Mahpiya na Maka Center, staffed by Jesuits, is a spiritual haven for the Sioux. In Eagle Butte, on the Crow Creek Reservation, the Sacred Heart Fathers supervise the Sacred Heart Center which assists almost 1,000 Native Americans. The Chamberlain Indian School is also under the supervision of the Sacred Heart Fathers.

In 2001 the diocese claimed almost 36,000 Catholics in 97 parishes, served by 31 priests, and 27 Permanent Deacons, seven Brothers of religious orders, ten Sisters and 27 lay ministers. About 15 young men are preparing for the priesthood in out-of-state seminaries. Several congregations of Sisters have a presence in the diocese: Dominicans, Notre Dames, Franciscans, Sisters of Charity, Presentations, Sisters of the Divine Savior, and Brothers of St. Francis Xavier. The diocese has a Benedictine monastery originally from Melchtal, Switzerland. In 1888 the nuns arrived in Sturgis where their first monastery was a former wayside tavern. In 1962 the monastics relocated to Rapid City. There are 36 nuns who share their acreage with retreatants, guests, and groups utilizing their community center.

The diocese has Catholic high schools and grade schools educating over 6,000 students. Between 700 and 800 infants are baptized annually, over 90 adults, and 120 are received into full communion in the church each year. Over 500 Catholics are annually confirmed. Interfaith marriages dominate, 116 over 83 Catholic ceremonies in 2001.

Social services of all kinds, educational institutions, as well as religious and spiritual opportunities exist in the diocese for the Catholic population, non-Indian as well as Native American.

Bibliography: C. DURATCHEK, The Beginnings of Catholicism in South Dakota (Washington D.C. 1943); Crusading Along Sioux Trails (St. Meinrad, Ind. 1947). R. KAROLEVETZ, With Faith, Hope and Tenacity (Sioux Falls 1989); Bishop Martin Marty: Black Robe Lean Chief (Yankton 1980). A. KESSLER, "First Catholic Bishop of Dakota," in South Dakota Leaders, eds. H. HOOVER et al. (Vermillion 1989).

[A. KESSLER]

RAPIN, RENÉ

Jesuit theologian, literary critic, and historian of the Jansenist movement; b. Tours, France, Nov. 3, 1621; d. Paris, Oct. 27, 1687. Rapin entered the Society of Jesus in 1639, and taught rhetoric for nine years at Tours and Paris before commencing his career as an author. He wrote many theological and ascetical works, such as L'Esprit du christianisme (Paris 1672), La Perfection du christianisme (Paris 1673), and La Foi des derniers siècles (Paris 1679). His chief importance, however, lies in the prominent part he played against the Jansenists. His lively Histoire du Jansénisme (ed. E. Domenech, Paris 1861) and its sequel, Mémoires sur l'Église . . . (ed. L. Aubineau, 3 v. Paris 1865), despite strong bias, greatly illumine their subject.

As a Latin versifier and literary critic, Rapin enjoyed an even greater reputation among his contemporaries. They acclaimed his Hortorum libri IV (Paris 1665) worthy of the Age of Augustus. This work encouraged the vogue for "Nature" gardens, themselves part of the wider cult of "Nature" that permeated philosophy, literature, and the arts until at least the French Revolution. His influence is also recognizable in the writings of Jean de La Bruyère. Despite Rapin's conservatism, apparent for example in his Réflexions sur la poétique d'Aristote . . . (Paris 1676), in which he champions the "ancients" against the "moderns" in that famous quarrel, his literary criticism reflects originality.

Bibliography: J. ORCIBAL, Les Origines du jansénisme, 5 v. (Louvain 1947–62) v. 3. E. B. O. BORGERHOFF, The Freedom of French Classicism (Princeton 1950). F. COUREL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 8:992–993. P. GALTIER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 13.2:1663. C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 6:1443–58.

[J. Q. C. MACKRELL]

RAPP, JOHANN GEORG

Founder of the Harmony Society; b. Iplingen, Württemberg, Germany, Nov. 1, 1757; d. Economy, Pa., Aug. 7, 1847. He was the son of a prosperous farmer. Although he had little formal education, Rapp was deeply influenced by the writings of J. Böhme, P. J. Spener, E. Swedenborg, and other German mystical theologians, and he gathered some followers into a spiritual family. In 1803 he went to the United States to select a site for a community; his disciples joined him in 1805 to form the Harmony Society at Harmony, Butler County, Pennsylvania. All goods were held in common and after 1807 celibacy was enforced. The community migrated to New Harmony, Posey County, Indiana, in 1814 and in 1825 moved to Economy, near Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. Rapp continued as the group's spiritual leader and virtual dictator until his death. His eclectic theology was expounded in his Thoughts on the Destiny of Man (1824).

Bibliography: C. KNOEDLER, The Harmony Society (New York 1954). J. S. DUSS, George Rapp and His Associates (Indianapolis 1914); The Harmonists (State College, Pa. 1943).

[R. K. MACMASTER]

RAPTURE

The term "rapture," which is derived from the Greek harpazō and the Latin raptus, has the general meaning of something being quickly snatched away or taken by force. Traditionally it was used to describe a particularly elevated kind of mystical experience. More recently it has been used in certain fundamentalist circles with reference to the "end time." In both cases, biblical texts that include forms of harpazō; form a basis for the use of the term in Christian life and literature; the present understanding is also profoundly affected by a long history of extra-biblical developments.

Paul's statement that he was "caught up into Paradise and heard ineffable things, which no one may utter" (2 Cor 12:4) is the most prominent biblical description of mystical rapture. In the later tradition of Christian mysticism, general characteristics of rapture (as distinct from other deep experiences of union with God) include: it comes upon one suddenly, without warning; one has the awareness of being irresistibly acted upon by God; one is completely entranced interiorly, losing some or all of the ability to use one's physical or mental faculties; and blissful supernatural knowledge is infused.

The term "rapture" is applied with different nuances by various mystics, and some use other terms for what appears to be the same phenomenon. Teresa of Avila, for example, names "suspensions," "transports," "flights of the spirit," and "impulses," while the Rhineland and Flemish mystics such as Hadewijch of Antwerp and Jan Ruusbroec speak of a "storm of love." All of these seem to manifest the general features named above. The extreme character of these experiences sometimes leaves the body exhausted, in pain, or out of joint, but if a rapture is genuine its long-term effects will be beneficial. Authentic raptures usually occur at an advanced point in the mystical life, when the mystic is undergoing the final purification before entering the culminating "spiritual marriage." Spiritual teachers agree that these experiences are not to be sought after, especially because of the great danger of "false raptures" induced by causes such as mental illness, emotional or physical stress, overwrought imagination, or malevolent spirits.

Today, certain groups of fundamentalist Christians believe that at Jesus' second coming he will literally "snatch away" all those who have been faithful to him.

He will then wreak destruction upon the remaining sinners, after which he will return to earth with those he has saved and reign for a thousand years before the final annihilation of the earth. The basis of this belief is a literal interpretation of 1 Thes 4:17, which says that believers who are still alive at Christ's coming "will be caught up together with [those who have died] in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air." This form of fundamentalism, which is called "dispensationalist millennialism," was founded by J. N. DARBY (1800–1882) and disseminated through the very popular Scofield Reference Bible (1909).

Many scholars criticize this dispensationalist doctrine of the "rapture" on both biblical and theological grounds. First, the imagery of the Thessalonians text needs to be interpreted in view of its background in Jewish apocalyptic literature, in which it is not uncommon for visionaries to be "snatched up" to heaven. This genre of writing is not intended to provide literal descriptions of past or future events, but rather to offer a mythic framework of hope to communities in crisis. The larger context of 1 Thes 4:17 indicates that Paul's main purpose is to reassure grieving Christians that a day is coming when the dead and the living will be equal and together again as one community with the Lord. The dispensationalist doctrine of the rapture, on the other hand, stresses separation, vengeance, and destruction rather than reconciliation, hope, and constructive activity. An adequate understanding of "rapture" must be approached by careful study of the full range of biblical and post-biblical insights into how God acts powerfully and salvifically within human lives and communities.

Bibliography: Z. HAYES, "Fundamentalist Eschatology: Piety and Politics," New Theology Review 1 (1988) 21–35. R. JEWETT, Jesus against the Rapture (Philadelphia 1979). A. T. LINCOLN, "Paul the Visionary: The Setting and Significance of the Rapture to Paradise in II Corinthians XII.1–10," New Testament Studies 25 (1979) 204–20. E. J. RICHARD, First and Second Thessalonians Sacra Pagina Series 11 (Collegeville, Minn. 1995) 224–48. TERESA OF AVILA, "Spiritual Testimony 59," in The Collected Works of St. Teresa of Avila, v. 1, tr. K. KAVANAUGH and O. RODRIGUEZ (Washington, D.C. 1987).

[M. FROHLICH]

RASH JUDGMENT

An act of mind that, on the basis of insufficient evidence, attributes something morally discreditable to another or denies something morally creditable. As judgment, it is an act that affirms or denies with certainty and without the hesitation that is characteristic of suspicion. In suspicion one is inclined to accept something discreditable as true, but judgment accepts it with firm conviction. Rash judgment differs much more from doubt in a similar context. In doubt judgment is suspended and one hesitates between taking either a favorable or an unfavorable view. As rash, the judgment here in question is essentially imprudent precisely because it lacks a reasonable foundation. This is true even when the judgment happens accidentally to be in accord with fact, for the rashness or temerity of the act does not depend on its disagreement with fact but on the inconclusive nature of the evidence on which it is based.

Rash judgment that goes so far as to judge not merely exterior actions but internal culpability is offensive to God because it usurps His exclusive right to judge the hearts of men (1 Cor 4.5; Rom 14.4). In addition, it does a moral INJURY to the person judged, who has a right, if not to the positive good esteem of others, at least not to be held in disesteem without sufficient reason. This right is a matter of value to him and he should not be despoiled of it unless by his conduct he has forfeited claim to it. Moreover, rash judgment is a form of injustice apt to diffuse itself and result in further injuries. The internal judgment of the mind naturally seeks external expression, which it finds either by communication to others in the form of calumny or in the denial of the marks of respect to which the injured party is entitled.

Rash judgment is contrary to charity, which, according to St. Paul, thinks no evil (1 Cor 13.5). This opposition is apparent in the nature of the act. When the mind goes beyond evidence in its judgments it is the will that supplies for the deficiency of the premises. One believes because he wants to believe. Thus the wish that is father to the kind of thought involved in rash judgment is essentially malevolent and rejoices over wickedness in contradiction to the impulse of charity (1 Cor 13.6). However, the more immediate and specific malice of rash judgment lies in its opposition to justice.

Rash judgment is held by theologians to be a serious sin whenever the conditions necessary for subjective responsibility are fully realized and the judgment is concerned with something more than slight moral shortcomings. The severity with which rash judgment is condemned in the Scriptures is evidence of the gravity of the sin according to its kind (Mt 7.1–5; Lk 6.37). However, in any particular case rash judgment is not held to be mortally sinful unless the following conditions are verified: (1) The judgment must be fully deliberate and must consist of something more than vagrant and abrupt speculation. This condition implies also the necessity of advertence to the sinfulness of the judgment as well as to the fact of its being unsupported by reasonable evidence. (2) The rashness must be notable, that is, there must be a marked insufficiency of evidence. Thus it does not appear that it would be mortally sinful to take as certain something that could reasonably be considered highly probable. (3) The discreditable thing attributed to the person rashly judged must be of a serious nature, either in itself or by reason of the circumstances of the one misjudged, as when a person in a position of dignity and responsibility is rashly judged to be a habitual liar.

It is disputed among theologians whether the same malice attaches to unfounded suspicion and doubt as to rash judgment. Some argue that it does, since the Scriptures appear to make no distinction between these different acts of mind, and ill will among men is more often founded on doubt, suspicion and opinion than upon certain judgment. Others deny this and hold that suspicion and doubt do a lesser injury because, although they diminish one's good esteem for others, they do not extinguish it.

Because one is obliged to avoid rash judgment, suspicion and doubt, it does not follow that it is immoral to take prudent precautions against the possibility that another may be sinfully inclined.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 2a2ae 60.3–4. ALPHONSUS LIGOURI, Theologia moralis, ed. L. GAUDÉ, 4 v. (new ed. Rome 1905–12; repr. 1953) 3:962–965. J. A. MCHUGH and C. J. CALLAN, Moral Theology, 2 v. (New York 1930 2:55–62. H. NOLDIN, Summa theologiae moralis, rev. A. SCHMITT and G. HEINZEL, 3 v. (Innsbruck 1961–62) 2:576–578. D. M. PRÜMMER, Manuale theologiae moralis, ed. E. M. MÜNCH, 3 v. (12th ed. Freiburg-Barcelona 1955) 2:179–181. A. HOUVENIN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed., A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 2:1828–32.

[P. K. MEAGHER]

RASHI (RABBI SHELOMOH BEN YISHAQ)

One of the most famous of medieval commentators on the Bible and the Talmud; b. Troyes, France, 1041; d. there, July 13, 1105. His popular name, Rashi, is formed on the initials of his title and name, R(abbi) Sh(elomoh ben) Y(ishaq), Hebrew for Rabbi Solomon, son of Isaac.

Life. Little is known with certainty of Rashi's life. After his boyhood at Troyes in northwestern France, he studied at Worms under Rabbi Jacob ben Yaqar and at Mainz under Rabbi Isaac ben Judah. At the age of 25 he returned to Troyes, where he remained for the rest of his life. The stories about his extensive travels in Egypt, Persia, Spain, Germany, and Italy to increase his knowledge are legends with no foundation in fact. At Troyes he established a school of Jewish studies, where numerous students attended his lectures. He supported himself, however, not by tuition from his students, but by the income from his vineyard. His last years were saddened by anti-Jewish riots in the Rhineland on the occasion of the First Crusade.

Writings. Besides several minor works, Rashi wrote commentaries on almost all the books of the Hebrew Bible and on most of the tractates of the Talmud. As a biblical exegete he is best known for his commentary on the Pentateuch. Printed at Reggio in 1475, it is the first book printed in Hebrew to bear a date. In its Bologna edition of 1482, the commentary was printed with the Hebrew text of the Pentateuch, the latter in the center of the page, the former in the margin. This way of printing rabbinical commentaries was later followed in the so-called RABBINICAL BIBLES, and the semicursive form of medieval script in which these commentaries are printed in these Bibles is commonly called "Rashi script." Also worthy of note among the Hebrew incunabula are his commentaries on the Song of Songs, Ecclesiastes, Ruth, Esther, Daniel, Ezra and Nehemiah (the last two probably not authentic), which were first printed at Naples in 1487. Both his commentaries on the Bible and those on the Talmud were in turn often commented on by Jewish scholars. The editio princeps of all his commentaries on the Bible was published in Venice in 1525. During the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries several Latin translations of his biblical commentaries were published.

Appraisal. With the exception of MAIMONIDES, Rashi probably exercised a greater influence on Jewish life and thought than any other rabbi of the Middle Ages. His principal contribution was made by his commentary on the Talmud, in which he combined sound judgment and practical sense with an extensive knowledge of rabbinical traditions. While not all his interpretations of Jewish laws were accepted by his contemporaries or by later generations, his opinions on these matters were always respected and in most cases followed.

His biblical commentaries, however, owed their popularity, more to their conciseness and general clarity than to their scientific value. For intrinsic value, the commentaries on the Sacred Scriptures by his grandson Rabbi Samuel ben Meir, popularly known as Rashbam, are superior. Yet Rashi has always been regarded by the Jews as the classical interpreter of the Bible, from whom the ordinary pious as well as students can receive spiritual nourishment. In fact, for centuries his commentaries on the biblical books constituted the manual from which young Jewish students learned to read the Holy Scriptures and obtained their first knowledge of rabbinical literature. "Every educated Jew knows that one must begin with Rashi to enter the world of the Bible" (A. Neher).

In his exegesis Rashi combines an interpretation of the literal sense with personal views and haggadic traditions (see HAGGADAH). At times he does not hesitate to insert fables or allegories into his commentaries. While he thus allows considerable space to such MIDRASH, he tries in general to give a rational exegesis and often repeats the statement of the Talmud: "A text must not be twisted from its natural sense." His commentaries on the Bible were read and studied also by certain Christian scholars of the late Middle Ages and Renaissance, particularly by Nicholas of Lyra, who in turn had considerable influence on Martin Luther's translation and interpretation of the Bible.

The writings of Rashi have proved a boon in another field of study. Although on the whole he wrote in medieval Hebrew, for the sake of clarity he often inserted words or phrases taken from his native French but written in Hebrew script. More than 3,000 of such lā'āzîm (Hebrew for "foreign words") constituting a vocabulary of about 2,000 words occur in his works. Since he is consistent in his method of transcribing foreign words in Hebrew characters, these Old French words he uses are a valuable source for the recovery of the language that was spoken in the eleventh century in the province of Champagne in northern France.

Bibliography: M. LIBER, The Jewish Encyclopedia, ed. J. SINGER, 13 v. (New York 1901–01) 10:324–328. RASHI, Commentary on the Pentateuch, tr. M. ROSENBAUM and A. M. SILBERMANN, 5 v. in 2 (London 1946). American Academy for Jewish Research, Rashi Anniversary Volume (New York 1941). S. M. BLUMENFIELD, Master of Troyes (New York 1946). E. I. J. ROSENTHAL, "Rashi and the English Bible," The Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 24 (1940): 138–167. S. FEDERBUSCH, ed., Rashi, His Teachings and Personality (New York 1958). H. HAILPERIN, Rashi and the Christian Scholars (Pittsburgh 1963). A. DARMESTETER and D. S. BLONDHEIM, Les Gloses françaises dans les commentaires talmudiques de Raschi, 2 v. (Paris 1929, Baltimore 1937).

[A. BRUNOT]

RASKOLNIKS

Raskol'niki, or schismatics, was the term applied to numerous members of the clergy and people of Russia who rebelled against the ritualistic reforms introduced in mid-17th century by the Patriarch NIKON. Nikon was supported by Czar Alexis in an effort to bring the ceremonial of the official church into closer conformity with the Greek usages of Constantinople and the Ukraine. The Ukrainian Rada voted allegiance to Great Russia in the year following the Nikonian reform (1654).

The famous Russian dissenters called themselves Old Ritualists or Old Believers. Their protest of 1653 was a nationalistic reaction against the introduction of foreign elements into Russian religion; it was indicative of the traditional confusion and identification of external rite (obrîad) with the underlying dogmatic truth or faith (vera) symbolized by the outward sign. Thus thousands of Russians were to die as zealous martyrs for the sake of form.

Background. The precise nature of the process involved is not clear, but with the passage of years since the 10th-century conversion of St. Vladimir and his Russia to the Catholicism of Byzantium with its Greek usages, a peculiarly Russian manner of external worship developed, differing in certain details from the Greek way of Constantinople. Differences may have arisen originally with the hasty translation of Greek service books in the attempt to give Russians the Faith in something like the vernacular. The existence of such "errors" in formula had been apparent previously to such churchmen as Maksim the Greek and to the Council of the Stoglav in the days of Ivan IV; but all attempts at modifying the Muscovite practices in favor of the Greek failed. Thus, in their processions during the divine liturgy, priests of the Muscovite patriarchate, unlike those of Constantinople, "marched with the sun." They differed from the Greeks in their spelling of the Savior's name, and intoned the Alleluia twice. The faithful made the sign of the cross with two fingers in honor of the two natures in Christ; the Greeks prescribed the use of three fingers to commemorate the Triune God. The churches of Muscovy were adorned by an eight-pointed cross.

Origin. In 1653, during a period of general unrest and riot following Czar Alexis' legal codification (Ulozhenie of 1649), which made serfdom the law of the land, the Patriarch Nikon issued a pastoral letter decreeing that henceforth Greek usages alone would be permitted in the state Orthodox Church. Many of the minor clergy and their people looked upon the reform as an innovation that violated Moscow's stand on the union reached at the Council of FLORENCE. To them it represented a corruption of the Greek faith, and was contrary to the tradition of Moscow as the Third Rome. The reform seemed also to undermine the position of Moscow as an independent patriarchate. The Nikonian reforms were confirmed three times by the Church Sobor (synod) in Moscow. Opponents of the liturgical changes were anathematized as schismatics (Raskol'niki) in 1666. Bishop Paul of Kolomna was degraded; Neronov, Loggin, Danilo, the Archpriest AVVAKUM, and others were exiled, tortured, and martyred for their recalcitrance.

History. The Russian government continued its oppressive measures against the dissenters until 1900. In the 17th century alone, more than 20,000 Old Ritualists voluntarily surrendered, or burned or buried themselves alive as fanatic martyrs for the sake of form. From the standpoint of political ideology Russia's Raskol'niki have constituted a nationalistic conservative group traditionally hostile to officialdom, government, and the established Church. The opposition of these right-wing revolutionaries to the czar at the time of the break was based not on the czar's assumption of ecclesiastical power at the downfall of Nikon (1666), but rather on the ruler's acquiescence in the abolition of old Russian ceremonials, his betrayal of a Russian national tradition.

Among these revolutionary Old Believer schismatics numerous offshoots and strange religious aberrations developed, and a number of Russian sects evolved: Popovtsy, Bezpopovtsy, Khlysty, Skoptsy, Molokane, Dukhobortsy, etc. In 1917, between 20 and 25 million Old Believers of one variety or another existed in Russia.

Bibliography: P. PASCAL, Avvakum et les débuts du raskol (new ed. The Hague-Paris 1964). S. BOLSHAKOFF, Russian Non-conformity (Philadelphia 1950). V. PLEYER, Das russische Altgläubigentum (Munich 1961). P. HAUPTMANN, Altrussische Glaube (Göttingen 1963); Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 8:993-995. J. LEDIT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903-50; Tables générales 1951) 14.1:292-304.

[F. L. FADNER]

RASOAMANARIVO, VICTORIA, BL.

Lay woman; b. 1848, Tamarive, Madagascar (now Malagasy Republic); d. there Aug. 21, 1894. Born into a leading family headed by her maternal grandfather who was prime minister, Victoria was educated by the Jesuits and St. Joseph Sisters. Victoria was baptized on March 1, 1863, and the following year (March 13, 1864) married her first cousin, a debauched alcoholic who abused her. Despite her unhappy marriage, Victoria refused divorce in the hope of influencing her husband to conversion. She baptized him herself on his deathbed following an accident (c. 1888).

Victoria is revered as the mother of the Malagasy Church for her role in preserving and spreading Catholicism in the absence of priests and missionaries, who had been banished following the overthrow of King Radama II (1883) and the first Franco-Malagasy war. She encouraged young lay Catholics through the Catholic Union, kept Catholic schools open, supported liturgical practice in the absence of pastors, defended imprisoned Catholics, and cared for the poor and lepers. When missionaries returned in 1886, they found the Church still vibrant.

Victoria was declared venerable in 1983 and beatified at Antanarivo, Madagascar by John Paul II, April 30, 1989. Patron of abused spouses.

Feast: Aug. 21.

Bibliography: K. L. WOODWARD, Making Saints: How the Catholic Church Determines Who Becomes a Saint, Who Doesn't, and Why (New York 1990): 210. Acta Apostolica Sedis (1989): 536-39.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

RASPUTIN, GRIGORIĬ EFIMOVICH

Russian religious figure; b. Pokrovskoe, Tobolsk Province, Siberia, c. 1871; d. Petrograd, Dec. 16, 1916. He came of a peasant family surnamed Novykh, received little formal education, and married in 1895. In 1904 he left his wife and three children to lead a wandering life. His pilgrimages to holy places took him to Mt. Athos and Jerusalem. As suited his passionate, superstitious character, he joined the Khlysty (People of God), a pantheistic, blasphemous sect that mingled emotional religion with debauchery. At this time he changed his name to Rasputin (licentious) and advocated the commission of sin in order to gain forgiveness. His excesses and violent acts of repentance impressed the peasants, who regarded him as a holy man with remarkable supernatural powers. Rasputin's reputation as a thaumaturge led to his introduction to the royal family (1907), on whom he made a lasting impression by seeming to cure the czarevich Alexis of hemophilia. Czar Nicholas II and his wife Empress Alexandra were convinced that Rasputin was sent by God, and accepted his advice on matters of state. Soon Rasputin dictated the choice of cabinet ministers and Orthodox bishops. His reputation increased among the populace after an unsuccessful attempt on his life in 1914, engineered by Heliodor, a well-known monk. Rasputin's ignorance of political affairs made him a pawn for reactionaries, who courted his friendship and imparted to him the ideas that he passed on to the Czar. Rasputin was shot to death in an assassination plot led by Grand Duke Dimitry Pavlovich, Prince Yussopov, and other nobles. At Empress Alexandra's orders Rasputin was buried with solemnity near the royal family's chapel in the imperial palace at Tsarkoe Selo (now Pushkin); but after the 1917 revolution a mob dug up the cadaver and burned it.

Bibliography: S. M. TRUFANOV, The Mad Monk of Russia, tr. from Russian (New York 1918). E. RADZIWILL, Rasputin and the Russian Revolution (New York 1918). R. T. M. SCOTT, The Mad Monk (New York 1931). R. FÜLÖP-MILLER, Rasputin, the Holy Devil, tr. F. S. FLINT and D. F. TAIT (New York 1928). H. LIEPMANN, Rasputin and the Fall of Imperial Russia, tr. E. FITZGERALD (New York 1959).

[G. A. MALONEY]

RASSLER, CHRISTOPH

Jesuit moral theologian; b. Constance, Aug. 12, 1654; d. Rome, July 16, 1723. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1669, and from 1685 to 1714 he taught theology at Ingolstadt and Dillingen. He was rector of the college at Dillingen for two years, and in 1716 he was called to Rome to serve as revisor general of the society and prefect of studies at the German college. Ressler was deeply engaged in the theological disputes of his day that revolved around the theory of probabilism and was one of the leading German Jesuits who sought to hold a moderate position against the extremes of rigorism and laxism. After producing a number of works dealing with the subject of probabilism, he summarized his thought well in his Norma recti (Ingolstadt 1713). This work presents a point of view that would later be called EQUIPROBABILISM. By the time that equiprobabilism gained stature in theological circles, the work of Ressler had been forgotten. He apparently, however, influenced the thinking of Eusebius AMORT, to whom St. Alphonsus Liguori acknowledged his indebtedness, and thereby indirectly contributed to the formation of the theory of equiprobabilism.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932; v. 12, suppl. 1960) 6:1461–64. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 5 v. in 6 (3d ed. Innsbruck 1903–13); v. 1 (4th ed. 1926) 4:1298–99. R. BROUILLARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 13.2:1675–77.

[J. C. WILLKE]

RASTELL, JOHN AND WILLIAM

John, printer and brother-in-law of St. Thomas MORE; b. Coventry, 1475; d. London, 1536. John Rastell entered the Middle Temple before 1500, married Elizabeth More before 1504, and was settled in London by 1510, where he added printing to his legal work. Among the earliest books he printed were More's Pico and Linaçre's Latin Grammar. He served in the French war of 1512 and took part in an abortive voyage to the New World in 1517. He helped in the embellishment of the Field of Cloth of Gold and, in later years, of several London pageants. He compiled a number of law books and wrote several interludes. Under the influence of John Frith, he accepted Lutheran notions and campaigned against tithes. In spite of his friendship with Thomas CROMWELL, he was sent to prison where he died.

William, nephew of St. Thomas More; b. London?, 1508; d. Louvain, 1565. William Rastell was probably educated with the More children. He assisted his father, John, in his print shop until 1529 when he set up his own printing press and produced his uncle's controversial writings. After More's death he studied law at Lincoln's Inn and was called to the bar in 1539. He married Winifred, daughter of John and Margaret Clement, in 1544. Forced into exile under the Protestant policy of Edward VI in 1549, they settled at Louvain. After Winifred's death in 1553, William returned to England, published his uncle's English Works in 1557, and became a judge of the Queen's Bench in 1558. Under ELIZABETH I, he again went into exile where he published his uncle's Latin works at Louvain in 1565. He wrote a life of St. Thomas More, but only fragments referring to St. John FISHER are extant.

Grigoriĭ Efimovich Rasputin. (Archive Photos)

Bibliography: A. W. REED, Early Tudor Drama (London 1926). The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 16:746. J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time (London–New York 1885–1902) 5:387–392.

[E. E. REYNOLDS]

RATHERIUS OF VERONA

Benedictine of LOBBES, bishop of Verona (931–968) and Liège (953–956), theologian; b. near Liège, c. 890; d. Namur, Belgium, April 25, 974. Ratherius was restless, ambitious, tactless, well read in the classics and the Fathers, and an accuser and defender of himself; yet he was ever the monk, intransigently set upon immediate reform of his clergy, easily finding protectors among the great, and making enemies among his subordinates. He accompanied his deposed abbot and rejected bishop, Hilduin, to Hugh of Provence, King of Italy (920), and succeeded Hilduin as bishop of Verona (931). Objecting to the king's meddling in ecclesiastical matters, he was imprisoned near Pavia (934–936) where he composed his most important work, Praeloquia, a guide to right living, and was subsequently exiled to Como (936–939).

Upon his release, he stopped in Provence (939–944) on his way back to Lobbes. Recalled to Verona by Hugh (946), he again had to flee to Provence (948). He campaigned with Emperor OTTO I's son Ludolph and with Otto (948–951), was summoned from Lobbes by Otto to teach in the palace school (952), and was made bishop of Liège by Otto's brother, Abp. BRUNO OF COLOGNE (953). When forced to flee after an uprising, he took refuge with Abp. William of Mainz and acted as abbot of AULNE-SUR-SAMBRE (956), where he composed Conclusio deliberativa, Phrenesis, and Excerptum ex dialogo confessionali.

Recalled to Verona by Otto (962), he finally yielded his see (968) after further struggles with his clergy and returned to Lobbes. He intrigued unsuccessfully against Abbot FOLCWIN of Lobbes and was forced to return to Aulne. He died on a visit to the Count of Namur. Besides the works mentioned and a number of pamphlets composed at Verona (962–968) and at Aulne, he left 34 letters and several sermons.

Bibliography: Works. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 136:9–768, on which cf. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 13.2:1679–88. F. WEIGLE, Die Briefe des Bischofs Rather von Verona (Monumenta Germaniae Historica Die Briefe der deutschen Kaiserzeit 1; Weimar 1949); “Die Briefe Rathers von V.,” Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 1 (1937) 147–194; “R. von V. im Kampf um das Kirchengut 961–968,” Quellen und Forschungen aus italienischen Archiven und Bibliotheken 28 (1937) 1–35; “Zur Geschichte des Bischofs R. von V.,” Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 5 (1942) 347–386. A. VOGEL, R. von V. und das 10. Jahrhundert, 2 v. in 1 (Jena 1854). B. SCHWARK, Bischof R. von Verona als Theologe (Königsberg 1916). M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters (Munich 1911–31) 2:34–52. A. ADAM, Arbeit und Besitz nach R. von V. (Freiburg 1927). G. MONTICELLI, Raterio, vescovo di Verona, 890–974 (Milan 1938). G. MISCH, Geschichte der Autobiographie, v.2.2 (3d ed. Frankfurt a.M. 1955) 519–650. H. M. KLINKENBERG, “Versuche und Untersuchungen zur Autobiographie bei R. von V.,” Archiv für Kulturgeschichte 38 (1956) 265–314. C. LEONARDI, “Raterio e Marziano Capella,” Italia medioevale e umanistica 2 (1959) 73–102. G. BILLANOVICH, “Dal Livio di Raterio (Laur. 63, 19) al Livio del Petrarca (B.M. Harl. 2493),” ibid., 103–178.

[J. N. GARVIN]

RATIO STUDIORUM

The abbreviated term for the Jesuit curricular and methods guide, which appeared in 1599 under the title Ratio atque Institutio Studiorum Societatis Iesu.

Organization. This document is a collection of 30 sets of practical regulations for administrators, teachers, and students of Jesuit establishments. When fully developed, these institutions offered instruction in three faculties or curricular areas, and the Ratio's rules referred to one or all of these. In the faculty of letters or classical language studies, the program was divided into five main sections: three grammar classes, whose readings and exercises the Ratio gave in detail; humanities, which emphasized poetry; and rhetoric. The arts faculty provided a three-year course in philosophy together with some science and mathematics. Studies in the theology faculty covered four years and were normally pursued only by candidates for the priesthood. Not every Jesuit college possessed each of these faculties but all had at least the faculty of letters, which constituted a secondary or middle school between the abecadarian exercises of elementary education and professional specialization in such university faculties as theology, medicine, and law. The prestige of 16th- and 17th-century Jesuit educators was chiefly associated with these middle schools, and the Ratio deals principally with their work or that of the arts curriculum.

Origin. An account of the Ratio may conveniently consider its origins and its contents. IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA (1491–1556), founder of the Society of Jesus (see JESUITS), began the process that culminated in the Ratio of 1599. The Fourth Part of the Constitutions, which Ignatius wrote for the Society, dealt with the Jesuits' own training and with their schools. Its 13th chapter called for eventual construction of a “separate treatise” detailing particulars of schedules, curricula, and pupil exercises. During the quarter-century following Ignatius's death, numerous discussions of these matters emerged from Jesuit schools. These have been collected in Monumenta Paedagogica, a volume appearing in Madrid in 1901, as part of the continuing series Monumenta Historica Societatis Iesu. It was Claudio Aquaviva, however, elected fifth general of the Society in 1581, who brought the Ignatian directive to fulfillment. He appointed a six-man delegation that in 1586 produced a trial version of the Ratio. This consisted mainly of essays on the conduct of classes, repetitions, and disputations; on teacher formation and the various curricula, vacations, time-orders, prizes, and degrees. After review by Aquaviva and his advisers together with committees in each province of the order, this draft was revised in 1591. The material remained substantially unchanged but was organized into rules and omitted theoretical discussions. After further experimentation, a final, more polished version was formally promulgated by Aquaviva in 1599.

The 1586 and 1591 drafts are very rare, but the 1586 and 1599 texts were published by G. M. Pachtler, SJ, in the series Monumenta Germaniae Paedagogica as part of a four-volume critical edition of early Jesuit educational documents: Ratio Studiorum et institutiones scholasticae Societatis Iesu. The Ratio guided Jesuit schools until the order's suppression in 1773. After the restoration in 1814, a revision was planned and an experimental emendation, which placed more emphasis on science and vernacular literature, appeared in 1832 but was never definitively promulgated.

Contents. The contents of the Ratio are similar to those of other Renaissance school plans, for it drew from the best contemporary practice and theory. In Ignatius's own day the Jesuit schools had adopted the sequence of studies and the procedures used at the University of Paris, many of them inspired by Quintilian (see PARIS, UNIVERSITY OF). The schools of the BRETHREN OF THE COMMON LIFE were also an influence. The success of the early Jesuit institutions was due not to curricular novelty but largely to four characteristics owed to Ignatius himself. Their teachers were carefully prepared and inspired with an apostolic dedication. The schools charged no tuition fees. In light of available knowledge of methodology and psychology, the course of studies and the pupils' activities were carefully organized to promote learning in graduated steps. But this concern for order did not eliminate innovation and reconstruction, since Ignatius had directed in the Constitutions that all provisions of the anticipated Ratio were to be adapted to places, times, and persons. This made it possible for the spirit of the Ratio to remain influential even when its concrete details became obsolete.

At first sight the letter of the Ratio may appear to obscure its spirit since few theoretical principles are enunciated. The curricular and methodological details, however, imply some theory. The aim is both moral and intellectual formation, with primacy of honor going to the former and most attention to the latter. The letters and arts curricula center on a Renaissance Christianization of the Greco-Roman tradition of literary and philosophical culture directed toward writing Latin like Cicero and thinking like Aristotle. In theology St. Thomas is the prescribed author. The chief methodological emphasis is on student activity, and the Ratio prescribes an abundance and variety of written and oral exercises. One of its few general statements is: Variety is good because satiety is bad. Hence there are provisions for academic contests, the concertatio, pitting individuals or groups against one another; for academies in which gifted students do advanced work; and for dramas, fêtes, games, and vacations. To facilitate teaching, the Ratio recommends dividing large classes into decuriae, groups of ten, each with a captain who has some monitorial duties. The teacher's work includes hearing recitations, correcting exercises, and explaining in a "prelection" (lecture) the problems posed by an assignment. He is advised to motivate pupils not by chastisement but by the attraction of honor and the rewards of scholastic success. This Renaissance accent on glory, however, is counterbalanced by the assertion on the first page of the Ratio that the whole of schooling should be designed to bring students to the knowledge and love of God.

Bibliography: E. A. FITZPATRICK, ed., St. Ignatius and the Ratio Studiorum (New York 1933). F. DE DAINVILLE, La Naissance de l'humanisme moderne (Paris 1940). A. P. FARRELL, The Jesuit Code of Liberal Education (Milwaukee 1938). Monumenta paedagogica Societatis Iesu, ed. C. O. GOMEZ RODELES et al. (Madrid 1901). G. M. PACHTLER, ed., Ratio Studiorum et institutiones scholasticae Societatis Iesu per Germaniam lim vigentes collectae. . . , 4 v. (Monumenta Germaniae paedagogica 2, 5, 9, 16; Berlin 1887-94). B. DUHR, Die Studienordnung der Gesellschaft Jesu (Bibliothek der katholischen Pädagogik 9; Freiburg i.Br. 1896).

[J. W. DONOHUE]

RATIONALISM

A theory or system that exaggerates reason's independence from the senses in philosophy or from supernatural revelation in religion. Although it appears in many forms, in nearly all a doctrinaire insistence on the sovereignty of reason displaces a native trust in the reasonableness of human thought, and an arbitrary insistence is placed on the former as uniquely representative of free scientific inquiry. This article treats first of philosophical rationalism, giving its historical outline and characteristics, and then of religious rationalism, both negatively as denying the supernatural and affirmatively as an aid to understanding revealed truth.

Philosophical Rationalism

Philosophical rationalism is commonly associated with certain philosophers of the 17th and 18th centuries in Continental Europe, notably R. DESCARTES, B. SPINOZA, and G. W. LEIBNIZ. Generally it holds that reason rather than sense experience is the source of knowledge and the ultimate test of truth. Its opposite is EMPIRICISM or POSITIVISM, which maintain that ideas and propositions not directly verifiable by sensory observation are meaningless. Usually rationalistic knowledge is thought to originate in reason itself, being a system of universal and necessary truths based on principles or starting points not discovered in experience.

As an attitude of mind resulting from philosophical positions, rationalism tends to single out and magnify abstract human reason while minimizing other human powers, such as sense, imagination, and free will. Logical ideals of order, procedure, and method predominate over empirical data and experimental technique. As a philosophical position, rationalism usually involves the following theories relating to being and knowledge, methodology, and sufficient reason.

Being and Knowledge. Most rationalist systems rest on Plato's theory of a dual universe, wherein eternal, necessary truths somehow exist apart from the world of human experience but remain accessible to human reason. This concept of a "duoverse" was further developed by Descartes, who considered material substances or extended bodies in mechanical motion as independent units, distinct and separate from spiritual substance or thinking mind. Even in man, the meeting place of the two realms of body and spirit, this separation held.

Hence, for neither Plato nor Descartes could the material world of sense experience be a source of genuine knowledge. Adopting a theory of innate ideas, Plato's epistemological rationalism held that human reason had "seen" in a previous existence the necessary and eternal truths. By recollection of these ideas, the mind obtains real knowledge even though it is surrounded by a shadow world of change that is basically unintelligible. Plato's Socratic dictum, "Virtue is knowledge," also founded a type of ethical rationalism.

Descartes's theory was more complex and did not involve the Platonic notion of recollection. He thought of the human mind as born with the materials of knowledge, e.g., certain fundamental concepts such as "God," "being," "soul," "material substance," "cause," "number," "time," "space," and "motion," as well as general propositions such as "I think, therefore I am"; "Every event has a cause"; and "God is perfect and cannot deceive me." These, as well as the basic truths of ethical obligation, are discovered in the mind itself and not in extramental reality, even though experience may help clarify and make explicit what the mind contains (see INNATISM). Derided by empiricists as empty a priori forms, these, for the rationalist, were the starting points of deductive movements of the mind toward further truths, including the results of applying universal concepts to empirical data. Descartes, for instance, could build on them an argument for the existence of a material world otherwise not known with certainty to exist. For him, the truths of faith were not among the certitudes of reason, but depended rather on the will—a position designed to safeguard the supernatural but later to lead to religious rationalism and the denial of revealed truth.

Some types of rationalism admit that ideas are supplied to reason either from sense experience or in self-reflection. Reason, however, still functions to discover real knowledge by seeing relations and necessary connections or by deducing further consequences from the resulting intelligibility. Some rationalists think of reason as an instrument for bridging the gap between itself and reality. For them, knowledge is attained by applying to experience concepts or meanings discovered in reason. Characteristic of all such rationalism is the tendency to view ideas or concepts rather than things themselves as the objects of thought. For thinkers such as I. KANT and G. W. F. HEGEL, the gap between the meanings of reason and the things of experience stimulated a critical rationalism that ultimately reduced all of reality to reason and absolute mind.

Besides attempting to deduce from fundamental laws of logic the basic propositions of a universal system of knowledge, Leibniz developed a rationalist theory that depended explicitly on the existence and functioning of an infinite intelligence.

Methodology. Mathematics, with its clear and distinct ideas and rigorous demonstration, was the ideal knowledge and method for most rationalists. Seventeenth-century scientists such as J. KEPLER, G. GALILEI, and, later, I. Newton devised physical theories that were heavily mathematical in character. As their new and powerful method for describing the physical universe was perfected, philosophers tried to introduce the rigor of mathematics into every department of knowledge. H. GROTIUS is a good example of this, with his secularization of law. As rationalists, these thinkers tended to narrow their conception of genuine knowledge to that obtained by the methods of physical science, restricted though these may have been.

Spinoza and Leibniz exemplify attempts to solve a crucial problem that immediately came into focus, namely, how to use such methods to construct a rationalistic system that could embrace mind and God as well as matter. Boundless confidence in the power of reason for a time overcame the natural repugnances these systems encountered from common sense. In the end there was no escaping the fact that such methods had nothing to say about the meaning of man, of human values, and of freedom, none of which exhibit mechanical or mathematical characteristics.

But some popularizers of the new learning unreasonably concluded that what these methods could not treat did not exist, and they somehow won for themselves the title of rationalists, combining a valid rejection of prejudice, ignorance, credulity, and superstition with an irrational rejection of revelation and religious authority.

Others refused to straitjacket the mind in the mathematical-physical method, and kept philosophy open to genuine knowledge of man, God, and freedom. This tension continued into the 18th-century Age of the Enlightenment, with its practical applications of rationalism to questions of authority in religion, theories of government in politics, and further developments of method in science. In the common confusion between philosophical rationalism and the new scientific methods, older philosophers and overzealous Churchmen, conscious of the philosophical errors in rationalism, condemned the new science as erroneous philosophy and acted at times to interfere with free scientific inquiry.

Sufficient Reason. One of Leibniz's followers, C. WOLFF, sought to advance philosophical knowledge by transferring the new ideals of method and some of its nonphilosophical procedures into metaphysics, philosophy of man, and ethics. He accepted Leibniz's distinction between "truth of fact" and "truth of reason," and made extensive use of the principle of SUFFICIENT REASON to transform all contingent elements to rational elements, thus attempting to bridge the chasm between experience and reason. This resulted in a rationalistic system wherein each form of empirical knowledge, such as physics or psychology, was supplemented by a corresponding rational form that functioned to raise the former to the level of genuine knowledge by deducing it from the principles of general ontology and cosmology.

Wolff's voluminous work was condensed into handy manuals by his followers, who embodied his basic rationalistic view of a duoverse and the deductive ideal of a system of knowledge. These were widely used in Protestant seminaries and universities and became well known to scholastics. Philosophy textbooks modeled on Wolff's were produced by German Jesuits between 1750 and the suppression of the Society of Jesus (1773), and the work was continued by Franciscans and others who imitated Wolff's scholasticism. Catholic manual writers were to come under the influence of such German rationalism as late as the 20th century. In the absence of adequate historical studies of scholasticism at the time, this type of rationalism was considered to be genuinely scholastic and led many to accept its demolition by Kant as a final destruction of scholastic philosophy [see J. E. Gurr, The Principle of Sufficient Reason in Some Scholastic Systems, 1750–1900 (Milwaukee 1959)]. Many theology manuals followed a similar method, beginning with definitions of theological realities and then seeking a greater insight by relating concepts or by analyzing definitions to discover their full logical implications.

Kant, who was nurtured on this kind of philosophical rationalism, set out to destroy it; at the same time he wished to safeguard ultimate truths about man and God with a new critical, as opposed to a dogmatic, rationalism. His attempts to remove such truths from the sphere of reason, however—since they neglected the native, spontaneous reasoning powers of the human mind—actually dissolved the rational basis of faith and morals and led eventually to advanced forms of religious rationalism.

Religious Rationalism

Religious rationalism has both a philosophical and a social dimension. As derived from philosophical rationalism, it is a negative and limited view of reason as supremely competent in matters of faith and morals. Thus it holds that an adequate theory of man, of his relations with God, and of his destiny can be had from human intelligence alone; it thereby excludes revelation and the evidence of any authoritative witness. As resulting from the positive use of reason to penetrate, understand, and defend truths known by faith, religious rationalism is a form of theological activity.

Negative Aspect. Early Greek thinkers who rejected explanations of the world of experience in terms of the gods and goddesses of mythology to substitute the principles and causes of philosophy were rationalists without being antireligious. Rationalist elements—in the sense of questioning existing institutions and ways of doing or thinking, or of criticizing abuses, real or imagined—are present in the oldest Biblical documents.

But modern religious rationalism—from the Averroists of the late Middle Ages, through the humanists of the Reformation and the philosophes of the Enlightenment, to 20th-century evolutionists—mutilates by its negations the power of reason to range beyond finite personality and the natural world. The present narrow form of this doctrine is SCIENTISM, which teaches that the natural sciences study all of reality and that their methods are the only valid way to knowledge.

As involving practical conflicts between Church authorities and those who confuse scientific method with metaphysics, rationalism is itself an ideology finding expression in a sustained war on prevailing creeds and institutions, whether these be Catholic, Protestant, or Jewish. English deists such as J. LOCKE, whose influence still is felt in freemasonry, and French ENCYCLOPEDISTS such as P. BAYLE and VOLTAIRE personify this ideology. These men were committed to eliminating from Christianity, in the name of sovereign reason, whatever was above human comprehension. Biblical accounts of creation, God's dealings with the Jews, miracles, the Incarnation, the Resurrection, prayer, providence, and a divine teaching authority in the Church were all refused credence. In Germany and France the ENLIGHTENMENT (Ger. Aufklärung, or clearing up) aimed at banishing all mystery and the supernatural, specializing in the application of restricted standards of reason to art, literature, and political and social activity. On Nov. 10, 1793, this practical doctrinaire rationalism culminated in the French National Convention's selecting a Madame Maillard to represent the goddess of reason and enthroning her in the Cathedral of Notre Dame in Paris—designated for a time as the Temple of Reason.

By the end of the 1800s, antireligious rationalism manifested itself in various forms of naturalism, positivism, scientism, secularism, and MATERIALISM. In a less sophisticated form it still survives as a kind of folklore tradition that (1) reason in an age of science has demolished all forms of spiritual and supernatural reality and knowledge; (2) only rationalism inspires hatred of hypocrisy and teaches moral and intellectual honesty, inspiring courage in the fight for social justice; and (3) only those who deny Christianity, and embrace ATHEISM are true rationalists.

Positive Aspect. Religious or theological rationalism may also refer to the fact that the Jewish, Muslim, and Christian religions, although based on divine revelation, expect reason to perform its natural work of inquiry, consideration, and formulation. This results in a theological expression of revealed truth, an organized effort to understand what one believes, sometimes referred to as rationalistic theology. From the early Apologists of the 3d century, through NICHOLAS ORESME to L. E. M. BAUTAIN, the Catholic Church has condemned thinkers who unduly minimize reason; similarly, theological systems holding that revelation has been given man as a substitute for all other knowledge have been rejected. The distinction between reason and faith has been steadily maintained, however, and when these are seen in proper relation, the individual believer is free to use understanding and reason in many ways. St. Paul's reference to inexcusable ignorance of the existence of God (Rom 1.20) itself initiated an untiring effort to blend religious faith with rational speculation. Catholic theology, as a consequence, presupposes the truths of natural reason as pre-ambula fidei.

Medieval Thought. For St. Augustine, the perfect kind of rational knowledge was the philosophy of Plato and Plotinus. St. ANSELM OF CANTERBURY regarded logical knowledge as true rational knowledge, but his Credo ut intelligam implied that, with faith as a necessary condition, a deeper understanding of religious truth could be achieved by the application of reason. His ontological argument for the existence of God was rationalistic, however, in the sense that it proceeded independently of natural experience, although within the context of faith and the truths guaranteed by authority.

Pope Pius IX, in the 19th century, defended the SCHOLASTICISM of the high Middle Ages against the suspicion of rationalism raised by A. BONNETTY, maintaining that "the method which St. Thomas and St. Bonaventure and other scholastics after them used does not lead to rationalism . . ." (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer, 2814). Yet the use of Aristotelian dialectic in medieval scholasticism did give birth to a system of purely rational truth out of which modern philosophy was to be born.

Unlike the Jewish philosopher Moses MAIMONIDES, the Muslim Averroës stressed that philosophy should be kept apart from theology. He justified a complete separation on the rationalistic principle that what was necessarily and genuinely true in philosophy could contradict the teaching of Christian revelation, in his case, the Qur'an (see DOUBLE TRUTH, THEORY OF). Christian theologians such as SIGER OF BRABANT promoted a Latin AVERROISM that the condemnations of 1270 and 1277, by Étienne TEMPIER, Bishop of Paris, could not completely eradicate. This influence continued through the Averroistic Aristotelians at Padua to the libertines of the 17th and 18th centuries.

Reformation. Among Protestants, P. MELANCHTHON developed a Christian rationalism designed to meet the age-old need of understanding what was known by faith. In Italy, SOCINIANISM exemplified a Protestant rationalist position in theology that was destructive of the revealed doctrine of the Trinity. Similarly, in 18th-century Germany, Protestant theologians accepted a distinction proposed by J. S. Semler between religion (understood more as an ethics) and theology, together with a similar separation of religion from theological opinion and religious usage fostered by J. G. HERDER. Such distinctions, made originally to safeguard religion from attacks on theology and Biblical history, led eventually to a disavowal of the true supernatural nature of revelation as the word of God. It left reason and its resources supreme and, by the end of the 19th century, led to the very antireligious naturalism that Protestant theological rationalists had sought to prevent.

Meanwhile, F. D. E. SCHLEIERMACHER maintained that religion consists in neither knowledge nor action, but rather in the consciousness of absolute dependence on God. Thus he replaced the Church by a purely individual commitment and opened the way to a philosophy of power that was fatal to both rationalism and Christianity. These developments provided scriptural exegetes with new critical principles whose application led to extremes of naturalism in such works as the Leben Jesu of D. F. STRAUSS.

Modern Thought. Nineteenth-century Catholic theologians such as G. HERMES and A. GÜNTHER attempted unsuccessfully to relate Catholicism to the pure rationalism of post-Kantian philosophy. But with God, reason, and faith united in the Hegelian system, they could not avoid reducing faith to a work of unaided reason, thereby denying the gratuity of revealed truth. The Danish Lutheran, S. A. KIERKEGAARD, on the other hand, gave attractive expression in his writings to an acceptable position; this regards faith as a personal commitment that neither results from a rationalistic (or historical) mode of argumentation nor is a rational exercise associated with the unfolding of Absolute Mind.

The failure of some contemporary Catholic writers to represent adequately the Catholic view of the relationships between faith and reason and between theology and philosophy has caused reactions against rationalist philosophy to be interpreted as attacks on THOMISM or on other scholastic syntheses. Some of the literature of EXISTENTIALISM augments this confusion, for its horror of the systematized and the objectivized is basically an aversion from the excesses of rationalism.

Critique. Both philosophical and religious rationalism must be criticized for neglect of evidence. Philosophical rationalism fails to take into account prephilosophical and prescientific knowledge, tending to consider specialized attitudes or techniques as the only rational method. Religious rationalism too often simply makes an act of faith in the all-embracing character of a currently successful method of knowing; it refuses even to consider the data of revelation, and thus cuts itself off completely from the highest source of human knowledge.

See Also: REASONING; KANTIANISM; DEISM; THEISM.

Bibliography: F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster, Md. 1946–); v.4, Descartes to Leibniz; v.5, Hobbes to Hume (1959); v.6, Wolff to Kant (1960). C. CONSTANTIN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 13.2:1688–1778. C. MAZZANTINI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 3:1870–83. O. MUCK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1005–06. K. OEHLER and H. HOHLIVEIN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 5:790–800. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 2:579–84. A. W. BENN, The History of English Rationalism in the Nineteenth Century, 2 v. (New York 1962). J. B. BURY, A History of Freedom of Thought (2d ed. New York 1952). É. H. GILSON, Reason and Revelation in the Middle Ages (New York 1961). G. BOAS, French Philosophies of the Romantic Period (New York 1964). J. D. COLLINS, God in Modern Philosophy (Chicago 1959) 55–89. R. DERATHÉ, Le Rationalisme de Jean-Jacques Rousseau (Paris 1948). J. M. F. LAPORTE, Le Rationalisme de Descartes (Paris 1945). P. HAZARD, The European Mind (1680–1715), tr. J. L. MAY (New York 1963). J. S. SPINK, French Free-thought from Gassendi to Voltaire (London 1960). L. I. BREVOLD, The Brave New World of the Enlightenment (Ann Arbor 1961). A. BREMOND, Religions of Unbelief (Milwaukee 1939). M. C. D'ARCY, Belief and Reason (London 1944).

[J. E. GURR]

RATISBONNE, MARIE THÉODORE AND MARIE ALPHONSE

Brothers, co-founders of the CONGREGATION OF NOTRE DAME DE SION and the FATHERS OF SION. Théodore: b. Strasbourg, France, Dec. 28, 1802; d. Paris, Jan. 10, 1884. He was the second eldest son of the most important Jewish family in Alsace and was educated at the Royal College at Strasbourg. He labored to alleviate the social and economic conditions of the Jews in the Strasbourg ghetto. His study of the Bible and Church history led to his conversion (1827). Because of his family's bitter opposition, he was baptized secretly, assuming the name Marie at this time. After ordination (1830) he taught in the minor seminary of the Diocese of Strasbourg until 1840, when he went to Paris and worked in the Archconfraternity of Our Lady of Victories. To promote understanding between Christians and Jews and to bring about the conversion of the Jews, he and his brother Marie Alphonse founded the Congregation of Notre Dame de Sion for women (1843) and the Fathers of Sion (1852). Among his numerous writings the best known are his two-volume Histoire de St. Bernard et de son siècle (1840; 11th ed. 1903); Manuel de la mère chrétienne (1859; 11th ed. 1864); Nouvelle manuel des mères chrétiennes (1870; 22d ed. 1926); and La question juive (1868).

Alphonse: b. Strasbourg, France, May 1, 1814; d. Ain Karim, Palestine, May 6, 1884. The ninth child of the family, he became a lawyer and banker. Like his brother Théodore he was eager to aid his fellow Jews. So bitterly anti-Christian was he that he could not forgive Théodore for becoming a Catholic in 1827. But on his way to the East, he visited Rome, where he was suddenly converted after a vision of the Blessed Virgin Mary in the church of St. Andrea della Fratte (Jan. 20, 1842). At the time of his Baptism (Jan. 31), he took the name Marie. A few months later he joined the Jesuits. After his ordination (1848) he received permission to leave the Society of Jesus and collaborate with his brother in working for the conversion of the Jews. He collaborated with Théodore in founding their two congregations. In 1855 he went to Palestine, where he spent the remainder of his life laboring to convert Jews and Muslims. He established for the Sisters of Sion the Ecce Homo monastery (1856) and later opened two orphanages.

Bibliography: M. J. EGAN, Christ's Conquest: The Coming of Grace to Theodore Ratisbonne (Dublin 1945); Our Lady's Jew, Father M. A. Ratisbonne (Dublin 1953).

[M. R. NÔTRE]

RATRAMNUS OF CORBIE

Theologian; d. after 868. Ratramnus entered the Benedictine abbey of Corbie in Somme, France, about 825, and there became a priest and teacher. Little is known of his life. His writings reveal an independent mind, wide learning, and dialectical skill.

Ratramnus' best known work is on the Eucharist, De corpore et sanguine Domini (c. 850), requested by Charles the Bald, king of the West Franks. It was intended to rectify the tract by Ratramnus's former teacher and abbot, Paschasius Radbertus, whose doctrine Ratramnus found excessively realistic and not consonant with a more symbolic interpretation then in favor. Ratramnus stressed the figurative aspects of the Sacrament and the mysterious mode of Christ's Eucharistic presence, but denied the identity of His sacramental and historical body, as insisted upon by Paschasius. Neither a full treatment nor a devotional piece, the De corpore's unconventional language and subtlety help to explain the conflicting judgments passed upon it. It was condemned as a supposed work of JOHN SCOTUS ERIGENA at the Council of Vercelli (1050). Cited with favor by St. John Fisher in 1527, it was later used by some of the Protestant theologians as a precedent for their doctrine and was widely translated. Partly because of Protestant patronage, it was listed in the first Index of Prohibited Books in 1559 and retained until the 1900 edition. Catholic opinion remains divided, but recent studies have upheld its orthodoxy.

In his De praedestinatione (850), again at the instance of King Charles, Ratramnus opposed Archbishop Hincmar of Reims. Ratramnus set the mystery of predestination in the context of God's governance of the world (bk. 1), and defended the disputed "double predestination" of St. Augustine, i.e., the predestination of the gratuitously elect to salvation and of the culpably reprobate to their just punishment (bk. 2), although, Ratramnus points out, God is neither the author of their evil-doing nor is their perdition His will (Patrologia Latina 121:42).

His last and best dogmatic work, Contra Graecorum opposita, was one result of Nicholas I's letter in 867 urging the Frankish hierarchy to a united defense against the anti-Latin charges of the Byzantine court and the Patriarch Photius, then in conflict with the Roman See. Ratramnus pleaded for unity of faith as the one essential, and for a legitimate diversity of customs; he defended the double procession of the Holy Spirit from Father "and Son" (Filioque) with impressive erudition (bks. 1–3), and defended Latin usages and the Roman primacy with some originality (bk. 4).

His De nativitate Christi, holding that the Blessed Virgin Mary's parturition was entirely natural, was opposed by Paschasius who defended the miraculous birth. Ratramnus wrote two tracts on the nature of the soul. In one he opposed the teaching of Marius Scotus on the universal soul.

Bibliography: Opera Omnia, Patrologia Latina. ed. J. P. MIGNÉ (Paris 1878–90) 121:11–346, 1153–56; De Corpore et sanguine Domine, ed. J. N. BAKHUIZEN VAN DEN BRINK (Amsterdam 1954); Eng. tr. in C. P. FARRAR and A. P. EVANS, Bibliography of English Translations from Medieval Sources (New York 1946) 3267–72; Letters, ed. E. L. DÜMMER, Monumenta Germaniae Historica Epistolae (Berlin 1826–) ser. 18, 6:149–158; Liber de anima ad Odonem Bellovacensem, ed. C. LAMBOT (Namur 1952). J. FAHEY, The Eucharistic Teaching of Ratramn of Corbie (Mundelein, Ill. 1951). I. BACKES, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. M. BUCHBERGER (Freiburg 1930–38) 8:642–643. J. GEISELMANN, Die Eucharistielehre der Vorscholastik (Paderborn 1926). H. PELTIER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 13.2: 1780–87.

[J. J. RYAN]

RAUSCH, JAMES

Bishop, Church official; b. Albany, Minn., Sept. 4, 1928; d. Phoenix, Ariz., May 18, 1981. He was the son of a storekeeper in a small rural community and was educated at Crosier Seminary, Onamia, Minn., and St. John's Seminary, Collegeville. Following his ordination as a priest of the Diocese of St. Cloud, Minn., on June 2, 1956, he fulfilled several parochial assignments while serving as instructor at Cathedral High School. He pursued graduate studies in education at the College of St. Thomas, St. Paul, Minn., and received his doctoral degree in pastoral sociology from the Gregorian University, Rome, in 1969.

In 1967 Rausch was named an associate of the Justice and Peace Commission of the United States Catholic Conference (USCC). At the beginning of 1970, he became its assistant general secretary and was unanimously elected general secretary of both the USCC and NCCB December 1972. He was ordained a bishop by John Cardinal Krol in St. John's Abbey Church, Collegeville, as an auxiliary of the bishop of St. Cloud while continuing to serve as general secretary of the USCC and NCCB.

Rausch brought his direct and incisive leadership ability to his new post. He spoke extensively on the role of the Church in the areas of civil and human rights, political involvement of the Church in moral concerns, and the decisive role of the Catholic laity in both political and ecclesiastical life. He was a leading figure in the "Call to Action" convention of the Catholic laity that met in Detroit in 1979. He was recognized as one of the promising young bishops of the U.S. advocating the major social concerns of the times. In this cause he met opposition from the conservative wing of the Catholic Church of that period, both lay and clerical.

Installed as the second bishop of Phoenix, Ariz. on March 22, 1977, Rausch brought his pastoral zeal to bear on the issues of poverty, discrimination, civil and human rights. He was a vigorous advocate of the underprivileged, resulting in an unfortunate alienation of some of the more conservative and affluent members of his flock.

He died of a sudden heart attack at a shopping center in Phoenix. During his brief tenure as bishop of Phoenix he ordained eighteen priests, established seven new parishes, and supervised the building of six homes for the aged. He performed a prophetic role in providing for the future of the diocese which, unfortunately, was not recognized by many of his clergy and people. In the exercise of his episcopal office he proved to be a man ahead of his time.

[V. A. YZERMANS]

RAUSCHENBUSCH, WALTER

Chief exponent of the SOCIAL GOSPEL in American Protestantism; b. Rochester, N.Y., Oct. 4, 1861; d. Rochester, July 25, 1918. After graduating in 1886 from Rochester Theological Seminary, he served for 11 years as pastor of the Second German Baptist Church on the edge of New York City's notorious Hell's Kitchen. From this ministry and from his reading of Henry George, Tolstoi, Marx, Bellamy, and the Webbs came Christianity and the Social Crisis (1907), a book that challenged the individualism and pietism of 19th-century American Protestantism. In subsequent works, Christianizing the Social Order (1912), The Social Principles of Jesus (1916), and A Theology of the Social Gospel (1917), he preached the theme of the "Kingdom of God," which emphasized social transformation and economic betterment as the purpose for which the church exists. In addition to his writing, Rauschenbusch also served as professor of New Testament (1897–1902) and of church history (1902–18) at Rochester Theological Seminary. He was active in civic affairs until World War I, which left him crushed in spirit. His theology was largely superseded by neo-orthodoxy after the war.

Bibliography: A Rauschenbusch Reader: The Kingdom of God and the Social Gospel, comp. B. Y. LANDIS (New York 1957).

H. F. WARD, Dictionary of American Biography, ed. A. JOHNSON and D. MALONE, 20 v. (New York 1928–36; index 1937; 1st suppl. 1944; 2d suppl. 1958) 15:392–393. D. R. SHARPE, Walter Rauschenbusch (New York 1942). R. NIEBUHR, "W. R. in Perspective," Religion in Life (Autumn 1958).

[E. DUFF]

RAUSCHER, JOSEPH OTHMAR VON

Cardinal, archbishop of Vienna; b. Vienna, Oct. 6, 1797; d. Vienna, Nov. 24, 1875. After studying philosophy, theology, and law at Vienna, he was ordained in 1823. In 1825 he became professor of theology in Salzburg, and in 1832, titular abbot and director of the Oriental Academy in Vienna and adviser for religious affairs to the government. In this capacity he negotiated, at the direction of Emperor Francis II, the conditions under which the Jesuits were permitted to work in Austria. In 1844 he taught philosophy to the later Emperor Francis Joseph I and his brothers. In 1849 he became prince bishop of Seckau and played an important role in the negotiations between the Austrian episcopate and the government concerning the abolition of JOSEPHINISM. He spent two years as the emperor's representative negotiating with the papal nuncio Michele Viale-Prelà the concordat signed on Aug. 18, 1855. Rauscher became prince bishop of Vienna (1853) and cardinal (1855). Later he successfully defended the concordat against the attacks of liberalism in the press and Reichstag, even though his methods were not always approved by other bishops. At VATICAN COUNCIL I he disapproved the definition of papal infallibility as inopportune, and he also opposed the doctrine itself. When his efforts to prevent the definition failed, he left Rome before the final voting, but by Aug. 8, 1870, he published the decree in his archdiocese.

Bibliography: C. WOLFSGRUBER, Joseph Othmar Cardinal Rauscher (Freiburg 1888); The Catholic Encyclopedia, C. G. HERBERMANN, ed., 16 v. (New York 1907–14) 12:660–662. E. C. BUTLER, The Vatican Council, 2 v. (New York 1930). É AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 13.2:1787–1789. F. ENGEL-JANOSI, Österreich und der Vatikan, 1846–1918, 2 v. (Graz 1958–60) v. 1.

[F. MAASS]

RAUTENSTRAUCH, FRANZ STEPHAN

A key figure of Josephinism; b. Blottendorf, Bömisch-Leipa, July 26, 1734; d. Erlau, Hungary, Sept. 30, 1785. He joined the Benedictines in 1750 and was chosen abbot of his monastery at Břevnov (Braunau, 1773); he was appointed director of the theological faculty in Prague (1774) and later served in the same capacity in Vienna, where he was simultaneously imperial-royal counselor and president of the commission for ecclesiastical affairs. Modern attempts to extenuate his aims and activity in state and Church overlook two facts. In 1769 Empress Maria Theresa, urged by her advisers, forced the archbishop of Prague, who had condemned Rautenstrauch's Prolegomena in jus ecclesiasticum (1769), to decorate the Benedictine monk with a gold medal bestowed upon him by the empress for this very same book. In 1776 the monarch decreed that in the future in all public and private ecclesiastical schools of studies only such theological matters might be taught as were contained in Rautenstrauch's Synopsis juris ecclesiastici publici et privati (1769). Important religious truths of the Catholic deposit of faith, such as papal infallibility and supremacy as well as the Immaculate Conception of Mary, were not contained in this book and thus might not be taught any longer.

Bibliography: B. MENZEL, Beiträge zum Wirken des Abtes Rautenstrauch (Diss. Prague 1932). J. MÜHLSTEIGER, Die Wiener Tätigkeit des Abtes Rautenstrauch (Diss. Innsbruck 1960). J. MÜLLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1018–1019. K. G. STECK, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 5:805.

[F. MAASS]

RAVALLI, ANTONIO

Missionary; b. Ferrara, Italy, May 16, 1812; d. Stevensville, Mont., Oct. 2, 1884. He entered the Society of Jesus in the province of Emilia in Italy on Nov. 12, 1827. Prior to ordination he devoted several years to teaching in Turin, Piedmont, and other parts of Italy. Desiring to work in the Native American missions of the Oregon Country, he prepared himself by studying medicine and acquiring mechanical trades. He accompanied Pierre DE SMET, SJ, from Belgium to the Oregon Country, 1843–44. After spending a winter among the Kalispel people on the Upper Columbia River, he was transferred to St. Mary's Mission among the Flathead people in western Montana. He remained there until the mission was temporarily abandoned in 1850 because of hostile Blackfeet. Following assignments with other tribes and at Santa Clara College, California (1860–63), he returned to St. Mary's Mission after it was reestablished in 1866. There he combined priestly endeavors with his ministry of medicine. He lived among the Native Americans for almost 40 years and was held in an esteem that rivaled De Smet's. When he died at St. Mary's, the natives, as he had requested, buried him in their cemetery there. A monument marks his grave, and he is commemorated in Montana by having a station of the Northern Pacific Railroad, located about 40 miles north of Missoula, named after him.

Bibliography: L. B. PALLADINO, Indian and White in the Northwest: A History of Catholicity in Montana (2d ed. rev. Philadelphia 1922).

[J. B. MCGLOIN]

RAVASCHIERI, BALTHASAR, BL.

Franciscan; b. Chiavari, 1419; d. Binasco, Oct. 17, 1492. Ravaschieri was born into a noble family whose ancestors were the counts of Lavagna. His father, Count Cattaneo, died in 1421 shortly after Balthasar's birth. His aunts Ginevra and Tobia, both Franciscan tertiaries, were responsible for instilling in him a sense of piety and morality. He entered a friary of Franciscan Observants, located near his home. He was a model religious, a good theologian, and a zealous confessor. In addition he practiced extraordinary mortifications. He was appointed superior and later vicar provincial. But he spent the best years of his life at Santa Maria del Campo Seminary in Binasco. As early as 1456 he had made a visitation of the Third Order there; he returned there at the conclusion of his duties as provincial because he was attracted to a life of prayer and to the apostolate. At this time he is said to have made some conversions and performed some miracles.

At the general congregation in Pavia in 1478 he came to know BERNARDINE OF FELTRE. Ravaschieri was afflicted with a crippling case of gout, which he accepted as a means to draw him closer to God. In spite of this affliction he preached and heard confessions whenever he could. One winter day someone left the crippled Ravaschieri in the garden during a storm, but the snow fell around him leaving him dry. His cult began immediately after his death, and he is still venerated today. In 1805 his relics were transferred to Pavia and in 1812 to Basilica. His cult was confirmed Jan. 7, 1930, for the Franciscans and for the Dioceses of Pavia and Genoa.

Feast: Oct. 25.

Bibliography: B. DA CARASCO, Il Beato Baldassare Ravaschieri dei Frati Minori (2d ed. Chiavari 1930). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 10:562–563. J. GOYENS, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART (Paris 1912–) 6:428.

[J. CABELL]

RAVENNA

A city in Emilia-Romagna, northeast Italy, seven miles from the Adriatic Sea, with which it is connected by a canal. The Archdiocese of Ravenna has been a metropolitan since the sixth century, and in 1947 Cervia (known in 501) was perpetually united to it. In 2001 it had 208,270 Catholics in a population of 215,570; there were 89 parishes, six churches, 97 secular and 26 religious priests, five permanent deacons, 35 members of men's religious institutes, 237 members of women's religious institutes, 21 educational institutes, and 12 charitable institutes.

Baptistry of the cathedral, Ravenna. (©Gérard Degeorge/CORBIS)

HISTORY

Ravenna is one of the main historical and artistic centers in Emilia. Once surrounded by lagoons and extensive pine forests (praised by Dante and Byron), it was Umbrian in origin and developed under Caesar Augustus, who built the important naval base of Classe nearby. Ravenna was capital of the Italian province of Flaminia and Picenum in the fourth century, before Honorius II made it the capital of the Empire in the West (402). It flourished in the fourth and fifth centuries and was the residence of the empress Galla Placidia (424–450) and Valentinian III (450–455) who saw the clear advantages of its geographical position. The Gothic Odovacer lived there after 476, and the Ostrogoth THEODORIC I established himself there (493–526). Taken by BELISARIUS in 540, it served as the capital of Italy, and was the seat of a Byzantine exarchate until 751. From the ninth to the eleventh centuries the archbishops, supported by German emperors, became great feudal lords and pursued intensive religious and political activity throughout their domain. Ravenna, which had a flourishing school of law before that in Bologna, began to decline with the rise of its commune. Rudolph I of Hapsburg bestowed it on the popes (1276), and it continued in the States of the Church, undisputedly from 1509 to 1859, except for periods under Venice (1441–1509, 1527–29, and 1797–1815). In 1859 it became part of the Kingdom of Italy.

Lateral view of the colonnaded nave of the Church of S. Apollinare Nuovo, c. 504, Ravenna. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

Church History. From c. 150 to c. 400 the episcopal see, suffragan to Milan, was in Classe, a port with merchants and voyagers from the East. When it moved to Ravenna, the clergy in Classe retained much of their autonomy for some time. Under St. PETER CHRYSOLOGUS in 430 Ravenna became metropolitan over Forlì, Faenza, Imola, Bologna, and Modena, all previously under the jurisdiction of Milan. In the thirteenth century all Emilia from Piacenza to Rimini was under the archbishop's jurisdiction. In 1582, however, Bologna and several dioceses in east Emilia were detached, and other jurisdictions have been detached since.

The episcopal list of 137 names is complete and includes 22 saints and one blessed. The oldest list, the Liber pontificalis ecclesiae Ravennatis, compiled by the priest Agnellus under Archbishop George (835–846), was probably derived from older diptychs. The first bishop, Apollonaris (c. 200), is venerated as a martyr. Later accounts made him a disciple of St. Peter, who supposedly sent him to Ravenna. His 11 successors, also buried in Classe, were called Columbine because their election was said to have depended on the intervention of the Holy Spirit; St. Severus attended the Council of (348). Ursus (d.429) moved the see to Ravenna and consecrated the five-nave Basilica of the Anastasis, later called Ursiana. Peter Chrysologus (d. 450), Neon (d. 458), and Ecclesius (d. 534) built splendid Christian monuments. Maximian (546–556), a native of Nola who was consecrated in Patras, Greece, by Pope Vigilius, governed in times difficult for orthodoxy; he was appointed by Justinian to promote the latter's own ecclesiastical policies. An energetic scholar-prelate, he organized his church, reformed the liturgy, and built monuments. The see supported Justinian in the Three Chapters Controversy against Milan and Aquileia, and the archbishop Agnellus (557–578) was rewarded with the property of the Arian Church; the Arian basilica, S. Apollinare Nuovo, was given over to Agnellus and Arianism, which had flourished under Theoderic the Great, came to an end in Ravenna. Agnellus also began the organization of rural parishes, which was completed around 1200.

Belisarius was replaced by Narses, who restored Italy to Byzantium from the Goths (554–567); but the Lombard invasion of 568 caused Justinian I by 584 to replace the civil Praetorian Prefect for Italy with a military exarch, who in the seventh century assumed control also of civil administration. The Exarchates of Carthage and of Ravenna thus straddled the middle Mediterranean. Ravenna, the center of Byzantine power and administration, where army and navy bases and the treasury were located, separated the Lombard duchies of Benevento and Spoleto from the rest of Lombard Italy. Ravenna continued after the sixth century as a center for trade, luxury goods and Latin literary activity, especially liturgy, geography, medicine and hagiography. The Greek monastic presence, however, dwindled, and no Greek works from this period survive.

The Greek Exarchs, with patrician rank, who headed a corps of Greek officials and a Greek colony, confirmed papal elections as representatives of the emperor. However, during the seventh and eighth centuries there were a number of small revolts as Ravenna tried to secure its position between Byzantium, Rome, and the Lombards. In 709 the Emperor Justinian II sent a force to punish the disloyalty of the leading citizens, and in the 720s, with renewed Lombard attacks, increased taxation and the beginning of the iconoclast movement in Byzantium, Ravenna participated in the general Italian revolt of 727. After being captured by the Lombards in 732 and liberated for Byzantium by the Venetians, it fell again to the Lombard king Aistulf in 751 and was subsequently handed over to the popes (754). At the same time its commercial role declined with the silting up of the harbor and the rise of Venice only 75 miles (121 km) to the north. The capture of Ravenna was a key turning point, since it left the way open for complete Lombard domination of Italy.

However, Ravenna remained important as a powerful ecclesiastical center and for centuries Ravenna's archbishops struggled against Rome in defense of their autonomy. Beginning with Maximian (546–556), the claim reached a peak under Maurus (648–671) when Emperor Constans II in 666 recognized his independence of Rome. Reparatus (671–677) reiterated the claim, but the privilege was revoked by the Emperor Constantine IV. The struggle continued intermittently for some time. A schism occurred when Archbishop Guilbert became Antipope CLEMENT III (1080), but from the twelfth century Ravenna was constantly faithful to Rome. Against Milan, its archbishops gained the privilege to sit at the right of the pope in the absence of the emperor (1047). Three prelates of Ravenna became popes: John XII (Pope John X, 914–928), Gerbert of Aurillac (Sylvester II, 999–1003), and Cosmato Meliorato (Innocent VII, 1404–06). Anselm of Havelberg was Archbishop of Ravenna (1155–58). Ravenna had many councils in the tenth and eleventh centuries, some attended by popes, and in the thirteenth century, especially under Philip Fontana (1253, 1259, 1261, 1270).

Christian statue, Ravenna. (©Gérard Degeorge/CORBIS)

From the fourteenth century the prelates turned more to religious activity. Bl. Rainald defended the Templars in synods (1307, 1311). Giulio Feltrio della Rovere (d. 1578) founded the seminary (1567). Cristoforo Boncampagni (d. 1603), Pietro Aldobrandini (d. 1621), and Luigi Capponi (d. 1645) applied the Tridentine reform in pastoral visits and diocesan and provincial synods. Antonio Codronchi (1785–1826) and C. Falconieri (1826–59), friend of Pius IX, had difficult times, the one under Napoleonic rule and the other during the Risorgimento. When Ravenna joined the kingdom of Italy in 1859, a dechristianization marked by violent intolerance was loosed; but a Christian renaissance began with Abp. Pasquale Morganti (1904–21), author of ascetic works.

Ravenna's archives are rich: 13,000 parchments in the episcopal archives and 8,000 in the state archives. The public library Classense continues that of the Camaldolese. Since 1911 the review Ravenna Felix has published historical and archaeological studies. The earliest Christian relic is a funeral stela of c. 200 found at Classe, where excavations are still continuing. Dante died in Ravenna (1321), as did the humanist Cardinal Bessarion (1472). The canal to the sea was begun by Cardinal Alberoni (1736).

St. Apollinare, detail of 6th century Italo-Byzantine mosaic, in the Basilica of Sant' Apollinare, Classe, Ravenna. (©G. E. Kidder Smith/CORBIS)

Monasteries. Many monasteries near famous basilicas fostered religious and cultural life. Eastern monks settled near S. Andrea (fifth century), S. Lorenzo di Cesana, and S. Apollinare in Classe (founded by Bishop John in the sixth century). Benedictines near S. Giorgio (founded by Bishop John V in 750), S. Giovanni Evangelista (ninth century), and S. Vitale (tenth century). King St. Stephen I of Hungary founded the nearby monastery of S. Pietro in Vincoli (1040) as a hospice for Hungarians travelling to and from Rome. In the eleventh century St. Peter degli Oresti founded outside the city S. Maria in Porto, from which Canons exercised a great influence even beyond the province; the monastery was destroyed in World War II. Near the monastery of Classe the hermit revival began under St. Romuald (d. 1027), founder of the Camaldolese. Romuald's fame was celebrated by St. Peter Damian (d.1072), also of Ravenna. Franciscans came to the city in 1261, Dominicans a few years later. Pre-Tridentine reform was fostered by Bl. Margherita da Russi, Bl. Gentile Giusti, and Ven. Gerolamo Malucelli. Most monasteries became inactive after suppression by the French c. 1800.

Bibliography: T. S. BROWN, Gentlemen and Officers: Imperial Administration and Aristocratic Power in Byzantine Italy A.D. 554–800 (London 1984); "The Aristocracy of Ravenna from Justinian to Charlemagne," Corsi di Cultura sull'arte ravennate e bizantina 33 (1986) 135–149. F. W. DEICHMANN, Ravenna, 6 v. (Wiesbaden 1958–1989). A. GUILLOU, "Ravenna e Giustiniano," Corsi di Cultura sull'arte ravennate e bizantina 30 (1983) 333–343. J. HERRIN, The Rise of Christendom (Oxford 1987). R. A. MARKUS, "Ravenna and Rome, 554–604," Byzantion 51 (1981) 556–578. A. MERCATI et al., eds., Rationes decimarum Italiae nei secoli XIII e XIV. Aemilia: I, Ravenna (Vatican City 1932). G. MESINI, Ravenna (Bologna 1954). J. MOORHEAD, Theodoric in Italy (Oxford 1992). A. RANDI, Storia di Ravenna (Ravenna 1952). A. RANDI, Pagine di storia ravennate (Ravenna 1957). O. G. VON SIMSON, Sacred Fortress: Byzantine Art and Statecraft in Ravenna (Chicago 1948, repr. 1976). C. WICKHAM, Early Medieval Italy: Central Power and Local Society, 400–1000 (London 1981). A. VASINA, "Cento anni di studi sulla Romagna 1861–1961," Bibliografia storica nazionale, ed. G. LATERZA (Faenza 1963).

[G. D. GORDINI/F. NICKS]

EXARCHATE

The Exarchate of Ravenna comprised Byzantine Italy after its government was reorganized. This reorganization, like that which occurred simultaneously in North Africa, laid the foundation of the theme system established under the Heraclian Dynasty (610–710).

The Exarchate of Ravenna (or of Italy) was created as a defense against the Lombards who invaded Italy under Alboin. In five years most of north Italy fell, including the greater part of inland Venetai, Liguria, and Tuscany. Anarchy followed the murder of Alboin, and the Lombards broke up into 35 groups led by dukes. Dukes Farwad and Zotto established Lombard duchies beyond the Apennines in Spoleto and Benevento. Fear of a Lombard conquest of all Italy moved Byzantium quickly to reform the government of Italy. Thus, the exarchate emerged. Government offices were rebuilt and a separate palace of the exarch was added to Theodoric's. Emperor MAURICE (582–602) was probably responsible for the reform, since it is first reported in 585; an Exarch Smaragdus is mentioned in a letter of Pelagius II in that year.

Italy was administered by an exarch residing in Ravenna who served as a governor-general and vice-regent of the emperor in Constantinople. He possessed civil and military powers, the right to make war and peace, to act as a supreme judge, and to nominate military officials and perhaps even civil prefects and vicars. At times he confirmed papal elections. The most important member of his staff was the consiliarius, a judge-advocate. The provinces were governed by magistri militum responsible to the exarch; below them were the tribunes who commanded towns and fortresses. Such decentralization of imperial power was unusual in this period but it must have been seen as a measure to reduce problems in governing the reconquered territories and in coping with continued military threats.

The extent of the exarchate varied: c. 600 it included Istria, Maritime Venetia, Aemilia, the Pentapolis (Ariminum, Pisaurum, Fanum, Senigallia, Ancona), and the three duchies of Rome, Naples, and Perugia, Calabria, Bruttium and Maritime Liguria; by 700, however, the exarchate had lost Maritime Liguria and Calabria. Several exarchs fell victim to the period of instability of the seventh and eighth centuries; John I (616), John Rizokopas (710) and Paul (926) were murdered, and usurpers included Eleutherios (619) and Olympios (c.651/2). The of Leo III (717–741), and general dissatisfaction with Byzantium's fiscal policies led to the revolt of Ravenna in 727. The Lombards exploited the disunity by an offensive that ended in the seizure of Ravenna (751).

The fall of Ravenna ended the exarchate and ended Byzantine control of north Italy. The greater part of the area was handed over by PEPIN III to Pope STEPHEN II (III) (756) and incorporated into the States of the Church.

Bibliography: O. BERTOLINI, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi (Bologna 1941). T. S. BROWN, "The Interplay between Rome and Byzantine Traditions and Local Sentiment in the Exarchate of Ravenna," Settimane di Studio del Centro Italiano di Studi sull'alto medioevo (1988) 127–60. C. DIEHL, Etudes sur l'administration byzantine dans l'exarchat de Ravenne, 568–751 (Paris 1888). A. GUILLOU, Régionalisme et indépendance dans l'Empire byzantin: l'exemple de l'Exarchate et de la Pentapole d'Italie (Rome 1969). L. M. HARTMANN, Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der byzantinischen Verwaltung in Italien, 540–750 (Leipzig 1889).

[N. TOBIAS/F. NICKS]

ART

Ravenna was the center of Byzantine influence in Italy until the eighth century (see BYZANTINE ART). Sieges, invasions, and war damage, not to mention the restoration of nineteenth-century enthusiasts, have obliterated much of Ravenna's artistic past; but what remains, particularly of the fifth through eighth centuries, is quite valuable. In no other place in Europe, save perhaps Venice, has the Byzantine style blended with the Western to so great a degree. Although usually classified as Byzantine much of the architecture, colonnades, and mosaics are not so much Byzantine as they are representative of early Christian art with strong Eastern inspiration and resemblances (see ART, EARLY CHRISTIAN). The basilicas and other structures at Ravenna are of special architectural interest, because contrary to what one often finds in Italy, the exteriors have been but slightly tampered with. The rugged brick work as well as the typically round campaniles can be studied to advantage in many buildings.

Early Period, 402 to 455. The time from the transfer of the imperial residence to Ravenna under Emperor Honorius in 402 to the death of VALENTINIAN III in 455 was the first great era of postclassical building activity in Ravenna. Numerous palaces and ecclesiastical buildings were erected; the two outstanding monuments that survive are the Orthodox Baptistery and the Mausoleum of Galla Placidia.

St. Ursus, archbishop of Ravenna under Honorius, constructed the cathedral, which in addition to the main nave had four aisles, but this structure was destroyed (1734–44); only the crypt, the round campanile, and a few inscribed stones remain. The present cathedral museum contains several early Christian sarcophagi, a silver cross of the eleventh century, and the famous wood and ivory throne of Archbishop Maximian (546–556). S. Giovanni Evangelista was erected by Galla Placidia, half sister of Honorius and mother of Valentinian III, in fulfillment of a vow made on her voyage from Constantinople. The present structure has been entirely rebuilt, though the columns are ancient. The Gothic portal is excellent, and the church contains a mosaic pavement (1213) with representations of the ill-famed Fourth Crusade and some frescoes by Giotto painted during a visit to Dante (1317–20).

The so-called Mausoleum of Galla Placidia (440–450) was probably first a chapel dedicated by the Empress to St. Lawrence or SS. Nazarius and Celsus. The plan is that of a Greek cross, its four arms having vaulted ceilings with a dome on pendentives over the central intersection. The exterior conceals the dome with a short square tower. Though the whole chapel appears as a plain brick mass from the outside, the small interior is a gem of color. Covered with mosaics on ceiling and dome and provided with a marble wainscot, the interior is illuminated by small alabaster windows which admit a soft light.

The four windows under the dome are flanked by pairs of Apostles in blue tunics with white mantles. The image of St. Peter is especially notable since it makes use of the key as his symbol perhaps for the first time in iconography. The dome mosaic is of rich blue with golden rosettes and the victorious cross in the middle. The symbols of the four EVANGELISTS adorn the spandrels between the four supporting arches. The total effect is one of richness and regality.

Two important mosaics are to be found in the lunettes of the entrance and back walls. In the first, Christ surrounded by sheep and holding the cross of victory in His hand is seated on a boulder in a meadow with a rocky background interspersed with bushes. But here ends any similarity with the usual Good Shepherd of early Christian portrayal. The beardless Christ here is clothed in a royal purple mantle with a golden dalmatic ornamented with blue clavi, and His head is surrounded with the glory of a golden nimbus. The youthful Christ, as a victorious warrior, gathers His faithful sheep into the fold. The lunette on the back wall depicting St. Lawrence the martyr approaching his gridiron is a lively designed and richly colored composition.

The Orthodox Baptistery (S. Giovanni in Fonte) was built by St. Ursus and decorated by Bishop Neon. It is a tall octagonal structure domed on the inside and encrusted with blue ground mosaics, multicolored marble, and stucco reliefs. The focus of attention is the top of the dome in the portrayal of the Baptism of Christ by St. John. The Apostles stride in an impressive circular zone around the central motif, bearing their crowns of martyrdom. Between each Apostle formalized gold foliage sets off the reiterated figures. The outer zone depicts the interiors of contemporary churches with the Book of the Gospels enthroned on the altar or the jeweled vacant Throne of Judgment awaiting the Second Coming of the Savior. The general color scheme is lively; light and delicate tones are offset by the frequent dark backgrounds of the lower mosaic.

Second Period, 493 to 526. The second great period of Ravenna art was that associated with Theodoric the Ostrogoth (493–526). To this era belong the great Basilica of S. Apollinare Nuovo, part of the octagonal church of S. Vitale, the Mausoleum of Theodoric, the Arian Baptistery, the rebuilt Archbishop's Chapel, and Theodoric's Palace. The last survives only in the famous mosaic portrayal of it in the Church of S. Apollinare Nuovo. The small Archbishop's Chapel is the only remaining portion of the archiepiscopal palace. Rebuilt during Theodoric's reign, the chapel is a simple, square-vaulted building with a small apse at one end and a narrow alcove off the other. The bust portraits in mosaic under the chapel's arches are extremely well done in the classical style and were probably copied from painted portraits of the Greco-Roman or COPTIC school. The Arian Baptistery is a small structure, built by Theodoric on the model of the Orthodox Baptistery. The central theme of the dome mosaic is the Baptism of Christ in the Jordan. Despite the destruction of the lower ring mosaic of the dome, a magnificent series of the 12 Apostles approaching a throne on which is placed a cross remains beneath the Baptism. The Mausoleum of Theodoric is a circular building covered by a low dome of monolithic stone about 33 feet in diameter. It is thought that the dome was intended to suggest a crown and might have been brightly colored and gilded.

S. Apollinare Nuovo, the most important basilica in Ravenna, was built by Theodoric to be the largest Arian church and was originally dedicated to St. Martin. In the ninth century it was rededicated to St. Apollinaris on the occasion of the translation of his relics there. The interior of the hall-like basilica has 24 marble columns with almost uniform capitals. The great mosaics of the life of Christ adorning the walls of the nave represent the best work of the period. In addition to 26 Gospel scenes set high above the windows and large figures of Prophets and Apostles between the windows, are the characteristic processions of virgins and martyrs depicted in mosaic from the church entrance to the apse. Moving from the town of Classe through green meadows and palm trees the cortege of crown-bearing virgins leads to the Virgin Mother enthroned with the Child and being offered gifts by the Magi. Across from the Virgin on the opposite wall the majestic and bearded Lord with four angels awaits on His throne the procession of male saints emanating from the imperial palace of Theodoric and led by St. Martin. It is thought that the original mosaics probably contained portraits of Theodoric, his wife, and retinue, but that after the reconquest by Justinian they were reworked to eliminate any reminder of the Arian king.

Final Period, after 527. The last great artistic period of Ravenna occurred with the reconquest of Italy from the Goths by Justinian, who completed the octagonal church of S. Vitale and was responsible for the building of S. Apollinare in Classe (dedicated in 549), the great basilica which today is all that remains of the ancient port of Classis. S. Apollinare is dominated by its high cylindrical campanile and has a fine narthex. On the interior beneath the great apsidal cross is the heroic mosaic of the martyr St. Apollinaris who was originally buried here.

S. Vitale, begun by Abp. St. Ecclesius (524–534), was completed and dedicated by Archbishop Maximian during the reign of Justinian (547). The centrally planned building is composed of two octagons, one enclosing the other. The dome is over the inner octagon, and between the two a second-story open gallery probably seated the women of the congregation. The sanctuary is situated on one side in a room added to the octagon and terminating the apse. Opposite it the entry hall or narthex is flanked by two cylindrical towers. The brick exterior is bare, with the result that the gorgeous decoration of the interior overawes the viewer.

The Byzantine-inspired plan of this church attracted Charlemagne, who so admired the structure that he built the palace church at AACHEN in the same style. Mosaic work and marble were taken from S. Vitale and other Ravenna buildings to build the church in Aachen. Despite the eighteenth-century redecoration of the central area, a considerable amount of the original decor remains.

The choir-apse area is the most remarkable feature. Here the walls seem to disappear as the mosaicist creates his colorful vision of space. In the apse the beardless, triumphant Christ in Majesty sits upon the sphere of the universe attended by angels who usher into His presence St. Vitalis, the patron of the church, and St. Ecclesius, who presents a model of the building itself. The vault and ceiling are profusely decorated with brilliant floral and animal forms. Moses, Jeremiah, Isaiah, Melchizedek, Abraham, Abel, and the Apostles are among the many figures represented in the choir. The two rectangular panels facing each other on the side walls are the finest surviving works of the period. On the left side stands Justinian surrounded by soldiers, courtiers, and Archbishop Maximian with attendant deacons. The emperor presents an enormous golden vessel, his dedication gift to the church. On the right Empress Theodora, accompanied by courtiers and ladies in waiting, similarly presents a gift. The embroidered Magi on the hem of Theodora's gown continue the theme of donation. Vested in sumptuous robes of brilliant colors, bedecked with jewels and embroidery, the figures present a magnificent scene of an Oriental court. They are true portraits, but beyond that the realism ends. They are weightless, flattened out, and float in mid-air. The abstract rhythmic pattern of shapes and colors is typical of this period of transition from the early Christian to the new Byzantine spirit. The artist now conceives new canons of proportion; uninterested in distance, he expresses in a solemn and hieratic way a vision of the world outside time and space.

Bibliography: I. ANDREESCU-TREADGOLD and W. TREADGOLD, "Procopius and the Imperial Panels of S. Vitale," Art Bulletin 79/4 (1997) 708–723. F. W. DEICHMANN, Frühchristliche Bauten und Mosaiken von Ravenna (Weisbaden, 1958); Rom, Ravenna, Konstantinopel, Naher Osten: gesammelte Studien zur spätantiken Architektur, Kunst und Geschichte (Wiesbaden 1982). C. IHM, Die Programme der christliche Apsismalerei (2d ed. Wiesbaden 1992). M. JOHNSON, "Towards a History of Theodorics' Building Program," Dumbarton Oaks Papers 42 (1988) 73–96. E. KITZINGER, Byzantine Art in the Making: Main Lines of Stylistic Development in the Mediterranean Art, Third–Seventh Centuries (Cambridge, MA 1977). S. KOSTOF, The Orthodox Baptistery of Ravenna (New Haven 1965). H. MAGUIRE, Earth and Ocean: The Terrestrial World in Early Byzantine Art (University Park, PA 1987). C. R. MOREY, Early Christian Art (Princeton 1953). O. VON SIMSON, Sacred Fortress: Byzantine Art and Statecraft in Ravenna (Chicago 1948, repr. 1976). W. F. VOLBACH, Early Christian Mosaics from the Fourth to the Seventh Centuries, Rome, Naples, Milan, Ravenna (New York 1946).

[A. JACOPIN/L. JONES]

RAVIGNAN, GUSTAVE FRANÇOIS XAVIER DE

Jesuit, popular pulpit orator and preacher of conferences and retreats; b. Bayonne, Dec. 1, 1795; d. Paris, Feb. 26, 1858. After an early and distinguished career in law, during which he rose to the rank of deputy attorney general at the Royal Court, Ravignan caused a sensation by retiring to the Sulpician seminary at Issy in May 1822. In November of that same year he entered the novitiate of the Society of Jesus at Montrouge. He was ordained July 25, 1828.

Ravignan taught dogmatic theology at St. Acheul near Amiens for two years, moving with his students during the revolution of 1830 to Brieg in Switzerland, where he continued to teach until 1835. During this time his missions and retreats began to win for him a fame that was augmented by his stirring Lenten sermons in the cathedral at Amiens and at St. Thomas d'Aquin in Paris. In 1836, the Archbishop of Paris, Monsignor de Quelen, called him to succeed Lacordaire in the pulpit of Notre Dame. Ravignan's preaching was characterized more by the magnetism and conviction of his own personality than by the eloquence or imagination of the words themselves.

Gustave François Xavier de Ravignan.

Most of his sermons and conferences were published only posthumously from notes made by listeners, although he was prevailed upon before his death to edit 39 of the conferences given at Notre Dame from 1836 to 1847. These form the bulk of Conférences du R.P. Ravignan (Paris 1860), upon which his oratorical fame is largely based. In 1841 Ravignan began the custom of concluding the Lenten conferences with a retreat during Holy Week. This proved such a success that it was necessary for him to preach several retreats concurrently.

During the quarrels over the Falloux Law and the use of pagan classic literature in secondary schools, Ravignan sided with the party of Dupanloup, Montalembert, and Berryer. He refused, however, to take any active public or political role, such as the post of deputy, which was offered to him in 1848. Dupanloup wanted to associate him with the direction of L'Ami de la Religion, but the general of the Society of Jesus would not allow it. Only to defend his own order against its attackers did Ravignan take to the public forum. His book, De l'existence et de l'institut des jésuites (1844), made its mark, although it had little effect upon the policies of the government of Louis Philippe. His two volumes on Clement XIII and Clement XIV (1854) served at least to bring to light the shameful circumstances that had given rise to the suppression of the Jesuits in the 18th century.

Bibliography: A. DE PONLEVOY, The Life of Father de Ravignan (New York 1869). P. DUDON, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951–) 13.2:1793–1802. C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932; v.12, suppl. 1960) 6:1499–1509.

[J. H. CAMPANA]

RAVOUX, AUGUSTIN

Missionary; b. Langeac, Auvergne, France, Jan. 11, 1815; d. St. Paul, Minn., Jan. 17, 1906. After three years in the minor seminary at Le Puy, France, he entered the major seminary there, receiving the subdiaconate on May 20, 1837. He then transferred to the diocese of Dubuque, Iowa, and completed his studies at Mount St. Mary's, Emmitsburg, Maryland, and at Dubuque. He was ordained on Jan. 5, 1840, and he subsequently ministered to frontiersmen at Prairie du Chien, Wisconsin, for a year and a half. In 1841 he began his missionary labors among the Sioux in the Minnesota River valley. As the first priest to serve the area in almost 100 years, he mastered three native dialects and published in 1843 a catechism and hymnal titled Wakantanka Ti Ki Chanku, or The Path to the House of God. The indigenous peoples had great respect for him; all but five of the 38 Native Americans condemned to be hanged for leading an uprising in 1862 chose him to prepare them for death. He was the only priest in Minnesota from 1844 to 1851, when the first bishop of St. Paul, Joseph Cretin, arrived. In those years Catholics in the St. Paul area required most of his time, but he visited Sioux villages occasionally, and twice he ministered to isolated Catholics as far west as the Missouri River in South Dakota. In 1850 the diocese of St. Paul was created, chiefly through his efforts, and the land that he had acquired became the basis of its material prosperity. He was vicar-general of the diocese from 1857 to 1859. He declined, in 1868, the appointment as first vicar apostolic of the vicariate of Montana. He was made a domestic prelate on March 1, 1887. He lived in retirement at the cathedral rectory in St. Paul, where he wrote Reminiscences, Memoirs, and Lectures (1890; French ed. 1892), Labors of Mgr. A. Ravoux at Mendota, St. Paul, and Other Localities (1897), Catholic Life in St. Paul (1899), and Tempus tacendi et tempus loquendi (1901).

Bibliography: J. M. REARDON, The Catholic Church in the Diocese of St. Paul (St. Paul, MN 1952).

[P. H. AHERN]

RAYMOND MARTINI

Dominican theologian, Orientalist; b. Subirats, Catalonia, c. 1220; d. Barcelona, 1285. He taught in the School of Arabic Studies, Tunis, and the School of Hebrew Studies, Barcelona, founded by his order to Christianize North African Muslims and Spanish Jews. He was adviser to King Louis IX of France on his crusade against Tunis and acted as censor of books for Aragon under James I. His works include Explanatio symboli apostolorum, c. 1256 [ed. J. March, Anuari del Institut d'estudis catalans (Barcelona 1908)]; Pugio fidei, completed 1278 (Paris 1642, 1651; Leipzig 1687), based on Islamic and Jewish works and the Summa contra Gentiles of St. Thomas Aquinas; and Capistrum Judaeorum, written 1267, in MS. His authorship of other works ascribed to him is doubtful.

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (New York 1959) 1.1:396–398. A. BERTHIER, “Un maître orientaliste du XIII(e) siècle,” Archivum fratrum praedicatorum 6 (1936) 267–311.

[P. F. MULHERN]

RAYMOND NONNATUS, ST.

Ransomer of Christian captives; b. Portello, Spain, c. 1204; d. Cardona, Catalonia, probably Aug. 31, 1240. His surname derives from his reputed birth by Caesarean section following his mother's death. In the absence of reliable contemporary sources, it is impossible to establish the events in his career. He is generally credited with noteworthy activity in ransoming Christian captives in Moorish North Africa and in Spain, and his zeal served as a model for the work of the MERCEDARIAN order. The claim that Raymond was created cardinal by GREGORY IX is historically uncertain. His intercession is invoked by mothers in childbirth and by the innocent charged with crime. In 1657 ALEXANDER VII permitted Raymond's name to be entered in the Roman MARTYROLOGY.

Feast: Aug. 31.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Aug. 6:729–776. G. VÁZQUEZ NÚÑEZ, Manual de la historia de la orden de N. S. de la Merced, v.1 (Toledo 1931). B. DE GAFFIER, Analecta Bollandiana 58 (1940) 88. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4v. (New York 1956) 3:449–450.

[O. J. BLUM]

RAYMOND OF CAPUA, BL.

Dominican master general, reformer, hagiographer; b. Capua, Italy, c. 1330; d. Nuremberg, Germany, Oct. 5, 1399. Born of the royal Delle Vigne family, Raymond studied at Bologna, and was especially gifted in Scripture and patrology. He became a Dominican c. 1347, and served as lector from 1358 to 1362 in various Dominican priorities. In 1363 he was assigned as spiritual director to the monastery of Montepulciano. In 1367 he was elected prior of Santa Maria sopra Minerva, Rome. Later, when regent of studies at Siena, Raymond met CATHERINE OF SIENA and was appointed her spiritual director in 1374. Together, the two helped victims of the plague, tried to begin a new crusade, and attempted to reconcile Florence and the Tuscan League with the pope. Raymond collaborated with Catherine in effecting the return of GREGORY XI to Rome, ending the AVIGNON PAPACY.

“St. Raymond Nonnatus Preaching,” painting by Venetian artist Carlo Saraceni.

When the WESTERN SCHISM began in 1378, URBAN VI sent Raymond, once again prior of the Minerva, as papal legate to France to seek the adherence of King Charles V to Urban. The mission failed when Raymond was refused admittance to France. He was elected master general of the DOMINICANS in 1380, and a decade later inaugurated the Dominican reform movement, which sought to restore primitive observance. Raymond is the author of official and personal letters, of biographies of Catherine [Eng. tr. G. Laub (London 1960)] and AGNES

OF MONTEPULCIANO, and of a treatise on the Magnificat. He died while on a visitation to Germany. He is buried at St. Dominic's, Naples. Leo XIII confirmed his cult on May 15, 1899.

Feast: Oct. 5.

Bibliography: RAYMOND OF CAPUA, Opuscula et litterae, ed. H. M. CORMIER (2d ed. Rome 1899). G. GIERATHS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 8:974. A. W. VAN REE, "R. de Capoue: Éléments biographiques," Archivum Fratrum Praedicatorum 33 (1963) 159–241.

[A. DABASH]

RAYMOND OF FITERO, BL.

Abbot of the Cistercian monastery of Fitero in Navarre; d. probably before 1161. He is considered the founder of the military Order of CALATRAVA. In January 1158, King Sancho III of Castile, accepting Raymond's offer to defend Calatrava against the Moors, granted the fortress to him. Raymond transferred most of his monks to Calatrava and welcomed warriors who offered their help. Many of them also assumed the monastic habit. In this way the Order of Calatrava came into being, though it did not receive papal approbation until 1164. Raymond was buried at Ciruelos, "where, as it is said, God worked miracles through him," but his remains repose today in the cathedral of Toledo. He was never formally canonized, but his cult was confirmed in 1719.

Feast: March 15.

Bibliography: J. F. O'CALLAGHAN, "The Affiliation of the Order of Calatrava with the Order of Cîteaux," Analecta Sacri Ordinis Cisterciensis 15 (1959) 178–191. F. GUTTON, "Le Culte de Saint Raymond, Abbé," Cîteaux 14 (1963) 25–32.

[J. F. O'CALLAGHAN]

RAYMOND OF PEÑAFORT, ST.

Canonist; b. Vilefranca de Penades, near Barcelona, 1175–80; d. Barcelona, Jan. 6, 1275; canonized by Pope CLEMENT VIII in 1601. Raymond completed the trivium and quadrivium at the cathedral school in Barcelona, where he then taught rhetoric and logic. After eight years of legal studies at Bologna, he became master of law in 1218. Three years later he returned to Barcelona, where he received the Dominican habit in the convent of St. Catherine of Alexandria.

In 1229 Raymond was associated with the work of the papal legate in Spain, John of Abbeville. The following year GREGORY IX summoned Raymond to the papal court as his confessor and, shortly thereafter, named him chaplain and penitentiary. The pope also entrusted to him the task of collecting the papal decretal letters into one volume. This work, which came to be called the Decretales Gregorii IX, was officially promulgated by the bull Rex Pacificus in 1234. Raymond refused the proffered archbishopric of Tarragona and asked permission to return to Spain. He reached Barcelona in 1236, having relinquished all his offices but that of penitentiary, which he held until 1237–38.

At the general chapter of 1238 he was elected the third master general of the Dominicans. Raymond did not change the customs that had been adopted under St. Dominic, but he did give the constitutions of the Order of Preachers a juridical arrangement.

His task completed, he resigned as general in 1240 and returned to Spain, where he turned his attention to the extirpation of heresy and the apostolate to the Jews and Moors. As a member of the papal household he had been instrumental in establishing the Inquisition in Aragón in 1232. His work at the papal chancery had brought to his attention reports from missionaries to the Moors. He used his influence to inaugurate a school of Arabic studies and to induce St. Thomas Aquinas to compose his Summa contra gentiles, a presentation of the truths of faith adapted to a pagan mentality. Raymond's lifetime of almost a century ended on the Epiphany 1275. His body was first placed in the chapel of his convent of St. Catherine in Barcelona. In 1878 the chapel of SS. John and Paul in the cathedral of Barcelona became his final resting place.

Raymond's writings exercised a vast influence. His Decretales Gregorii IX and his revision of the Dominican Constitutions remained part of the law of the Church and of his order until the present Code of Canon Law was promulgated.

His first canonical treatise, the so-called Summa juris canonici (Barcelona 1945), was interrupted when Raymond left Bologna in 1221 and was never completed. In the only extant manuscript the first two of seven projected parts are found.

His principal literary work was the Summa de casibus poenitentiae, written (1222–29) at Barcelona. The work, which originally was in three books, was reissued by the author in 1235 with the addition of a fourth book, which was really a revision of Tancred's popular Summa de matrimonio. While earlier penitentials had contained little more than lists of sins and corresponding penances, confessors could find in Raymond's work a practical and systematic treatment of doctrinal and canonical matters of interest to them. In Book One, Raymond treated sins committed against God (in 16 titles); in Book Two, sins committed against one's neighbor (in 8 titles); and in Book Three, such questions as irregularities, impediments, dispensations, and sentences (in 34 titles). Hundreds of extant manuscripts and several published editions (Rome 1603, 1619; Avignon 1715; Verona 1744) testify to the Summa's popularity and to Raymond's fame as an authority on the internal forum.

His minor works include a digest of his Summa for the use of Dominican confessors; the Dubitabilia cure responsionibus, containing cases of conscience; and the Diversae consultationes, containing replies to missionary superiors in Tunis. Of interest to the student of medieval canon law are his glosses on the Decretum, and perhaps also on the Compilatio IV, as well as his commentary on the Arbores consanguinitatis et affinitatis.

Feast: Jan. 7 (formerly 23).

Bibliography: T. M. SCHWERTNER, St. Raymond of Penafort, ed. C. M. ANTONY (Milwaukee 1935). F. VALLS TABERNER, San Ramón de Penyafort (Barcelona 1936; Barcelona 1979). F. BALME, et al., eds., Monumenta ordinis praedicatorum historica, v.4 of Raymundiana (Rome 1898–1901). J. RUIS SERRA, Diplomatario San Raimundo de Penyafort (Barcelona 1954). A. COLLELL, "Raymundiana," Analecta Sacra Tarraconensia 30 (Barcelona 1957) 63–95. P. RIBES MONTANÉ, Relaciones entre la potestad eclesiástica y el poder secular, según san Ramón de Penyafort: estudio histórico-jurídico (Rome 1979). J. J. PIQUER JOVER, La vida i els miracles de Sant Ramon de Penyafort segons un gravador flamenc (Barcelona 1980), iconography. V. FORCADA COMINS, San Ramón de Peñafort (Valencia 1994). A. TEETAERT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 13.2: 1806–23. R. NAZ, Dictionnaire de droit canonique (Paris 1935–65) 7:461–464. S. KUTTNER, Repertorium der Kanonistik (Rome 1937) 443–445. S. KUTTNER, "The Barcelona Edition of St. Raymond's First Treatise on Canon Law," Seminar 8 (1950) 52–67; "Zur Entstehungsgeschichte der Summa de casibus poenitentiae des hl. Raymund von Penyafort," Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung 39 (Weimar 1953) 419–434.

[P. STENGER]

RAYMOND OF RODA-BARBASTRO, ST.

Bishop; d. Huesca, Spain, June 21, 1126. The most reliable source for his career is the vita written by a contemporary canon, Elias of Roda. Raymond was prior of the monastery of St. Saturninus in Toulouse before he was made bishop of Roda and Barbastro in northern Aragon. He soon acquired fame as a zealous bishop of outstanding personal virtue, but he could not escape the political and ecclesiastical conflicts of the time. Stephen, bishop of Huesca, with the help of Alfonso I, the warrior king of Aragon, drove Raymond out of Barbastro and annexed the area of this see to his own diocese. Despite Raymond's appeal to Rome and the strong letters addressed to Alfonso and to Stephen by Pope Paschal II, Barbastro was not restored to Raymond. He accepted the situation and, at the request of Alfonso, accompanied him in the campaign culminating in the battle of Cutanda, and in Alfonso's famous expedition as far as Malaga. In returning from this second campaign, Raymond fell ill and died at Huesca. His body was subsequently transferred to Roda. Alfonso made amends for his earlier injustice and restored Barbastro to the jurisdiction of Roda.

Feast: June 21.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 5:110–115. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 2:7074–78. H. FLÓREZ et al. España sagrada, 54 v. (Madrid 1747–1957) 46:149–157, 247–263. A. UBIETO ARTETA, "Disputas entre los obispos de Huesca y Lerida en el siglo XII," Estudios de edad media de la corona de Aragón 2 (Saragossa 1946) 187–240. J. VINCKE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:977–978.

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

RAYMOND OF SABUNDE

Philosopher; b. Barcelona; d. Toulouse, 1436. Having degrees in arts, medicine, and theology, he taught theology at the University of Toulouse, and in time was ordained a priest. His only work is the Theologia naturalis, or Liber creaturarum, written between 1434 and 1436 and widely circulated throughout Europe. According to its author, the aim of this work is to study the nature of man as well as the things prerequisite to this study, i.e., natures subject to man. God has placed at man's disposal two books, created nature and the Bible, the latter being given to him when, blinded by sin, he could not read the former. Since both books come from God, they cannot obliterate, falsify, or contradict each other. As a result, philosophy is the study of nature, especially human nature. Man, then, should be the first object of knowledge, and God should be the end to which all human thoughts and actions are ordered. Because Sabunde's claim that he encountered in the study of nature all the truths contained in Sacred Scripture was taken to be equivalent to saying that revelation is unnecessary, the Council of Trent put the prologue of his work on the Index.

Bibliography: C. C. L. KLEIBER, De Raimundo quem vocant de Sabunde vita et scriptis (Berlin 1856). F. HOLBERG, De theologia naturali R. de Sabunde (Halle 1860). T. and J. CARRERAS Y ARTAU, Historia de la filosofía española: Filosofía cristiana de los siglos XIII al XV, 2 v. (Madrid 1939–43) 2:101–174, with extensive bibliog.

[D. CABANELAS]

RAYMOND OF TOULOUSE

Name of several members of the ruling family of the County of Toulouse.

Raymond IV, founder of the Latin County of Tripoli in the Holy Land; b. c. 1043; d. Tripoli, Feb. 28, 1105. Raymond became Marquis of Provence in 1066 and Count of Toulouse in 1093, upon the death of his elder brother, Count William IV. In 1095, shortly after the Council of Clermont, Raymond took the cross and set out for the Holy Land in October of 1096. After the capture of Antioch (1098), Raymond attempted to gain control of the city on behalf of Byzantine Emperor ALEXIUS I COMNENUS, but he was thwarted by Bohemond I. When the crusaders took Jerusalem (1099), Raymond also attempted unsuccessfully to establish himself there. He then allied himself with the Byzantines and subsequently joined forces with the Crusade of 1101. He escaped the general massacre of that unsuccessful expedition and then returned to Syria, where he took Tortosa and commenced a further campaign against Tripoli. Although Raymond died before the capture of Tripoli (1109), he is usually regarded as the founder of the Latin County of Tripoli (see CRUSADES; CRUSADERS' STATES).

Raymond VI, defender of Provence against the Albigensian Crusade; b. Oct. 27, 1156; d. August 1222. Raymond inherited the County of Toulouse from his father, Count Raymond V (1134–94), and in the early years of his reign secured a settlement of the war begun by his father with RICHARD I, King of England. In 1207 INNOCENT III excommunicated Raymond for protecting and fostering the ALBIGENSES or CATHARI. After the assassination of papal legate PETER OF CASTELNAU by one of Raymond's officers in 1208, a crusade was launched against the Albigenses and against Raymond, as their protector. Following the disastrous battle of Muret on Sept. 12, 1213, Raymond went into exile. He endeavored to clear his name at the Fourth LATERAN COUNCIL (1215) but he was condemned instead to the loss of his lands, which were turned over to SIMON DE MONTFORT L'AMAURY. Raymond then returned to Provence, where he was able to recover a part of his former domains before his death. Although he was married five times, Raymond left only two legitimate children: a daughter, Constance, and a son, Raymond VII, who succeeded him.

Raymond VII, the last Count of Toulouse; b. Beaucaire, July 1197; d. Milhau, Sept. 27, 1249. He continued to fight against the Albigensian Crusade and the Montfort family. After Simon de Montfort's heir, Amaury, transferred his claims in Provence to the French king (1226), Raymond had to face the perils of a renewed campaign. Eventually he made peace with his enemies under the harsh terms of the Treaty of Meaux (1229), which stripped him of most of his possessions. The marriage of his only daughter, Jeanne, to Alfonse de Poitiers, brother of King LOUIS IX of France, assured that at Raymond's death his remaining lands would pass under the control of the French monarchy.

Bibliography: C. DE VIC and J. VAISSETE, Histoire générale de Languedoc, 15 v. (rev. ed. Toulouse 1872–93) v. 3, 4, 6. A. P. MOLINE DE SAINT-YON, Histoire des comtes de Toulouse, 4. v. (Paris 1859–61) v. 2–4. J. H. and L. L. HILL, Raymond IV de Saint Gilles (Toulouse 1959). P. BELPERRON, La Croisade contre les Albigeols (Paris 1942).

[J. A. BRUNDAGE]

RAYMOND OF TOULOUSE, ST.

Patron of Toulouse, France; d. Toulouse, July 3, 1118. Raymond was born a free man of Toulouse and was dedicated by his parents to the service of St. Saturninus. He abandoned the religious life and married. His wife died within a few years, however, and Raymond thereupon devoted himself completely to charitable works. Prominent among these was the building and endowment of a hospital or college for 13 poor clerics, next to the Church of St. Saturninus, which he also rebuilt. Raymond later became a regular canon of this church. His cult was established in 1652, after an epidemic in Toulouse was believed to have been ended through his intercession. His life was apparently written by a regular canon in the 13th century.

Feast: July 8.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum July 1:589–603. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 7:70–72. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 3:43.

[J. A. BRUNDAGE]

RAYNAUD, THÉOPHILE

Jesuit theologian and author; b. Sospello, near Nice (now Sospel, Alpes-Maritimes), Nov. 15, 1583; d. Lyons, Oct. 31, 1663. Raynaud entered the Society of Jesus in 1602 and was ordained in 1613. He taught humanities in Avignon and philosophy and theology in Lyons. An erudite and versatile scholar, he produced 92 separate works covering almost the entire field of theology. He was regarded as the most learned theologian of his time by many, and Cardinal Richelieu sought his assistance when the Spanish Jesuit, Hurtado de Mendoza, attacked the cardinal's political alliance with the Huguenots. In 1645 he was called to Rome to refute Pierre de Marca's De concordia sacerdotii et imperii. Raynaud entered with vigor into the theological disputes of his time, occasionally showing a lack of taste, judgment, and discretion. His style was classical, although often verbose and obscure. His theological works are rarely consulted today, but his writings on the Congregation of the Index remain significant for Church historians.

Raynaud's collected works, which he revised shortly before his death, were published in 19 volumes (Lyons 1665). A 20th volume, entitled Apopompaeus (i.e., the Scapegoat), and containing a number of writings that Raynaud had purposely excluded from his collection, was published, supposedly in Cracow, but actually in Lyons, in 1669 by an anonymous editor; this volume was condemned by the Congregation of the Index. The following list of subjects taken from the Opera suggests the nature and scope of his writings: Theologia Patrum, Christus Deus Homo, De attributis Christi, Moralis disciplina, De virtutibus et vitiis, Theologia naturalis, Opuscula Eucharistica, Marialia, Ascetica, and Polemica.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 6:1517–50. R. BROUILLARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 13.2:1823–29.

[J. G. BISCHOFF]

REA, ALONSO DE LA

Franciscan chronicler; b. Querétaro, Mexico, 1606?; d. place unknown, 1660? He is called also Fray Alonso de Larrea; some bibliographers erroneously call him Roa. He was the natural son of the Spaniards Tomás Angulo and Francisca de la Rea. He took the habit in November 1624, in the convent of Valladolid (today Morelia). He became a lector in philosophy and theology, a definitor of the order, chronicler (1637), and first Creole provincial of the Franciscans of Michoacán (1649). He wrote Crónica de la Orden de N. Seráfico P. S. Francisco, Provincia de San Pedro y San Pablo de Mechoacán en la Nueva España, published by the widow of Bernardo Calderón (Mexico 1643, 1822). Rea was a truthful and precise historian with a clear and concise style. He described the artistry of the Tarascans (natives of the province) in their featherwork mosaics, paintings of indigenous lacquer, religious sculptures of sugarcane pulp, especially their famous "Christs of Michoacán," as well as their ability as metal workers. An eyewitness to the plague that devastated the region, he described the charity of the Franciscan missionaries in curing and burying the native Mexicans and reported that towns of 20,000, such as Tzintzuntzan, dropped to 200 and that in the whole province five out of every six Tarascans died.

Bibliography: J. M. BERISTAIN DE SOUZA, Biblioteca hispano americana setentrional, 5 v. in 2 (3d ed. Mexico City 1947).

[E. GÓMEZ TAGLE]

READING, ABBEY OF

A reformed Benedictine house, County Berkshire, England. It was founded by King Henry I in 1121, and originally colonized by monks from CLUNY and the Priory of LEWES. Reading, liberally endowed with lands and privileges, was one of the ten richest and most important abbeys in medieval England. Throughout the 12th century it had strong links with the Cluniac Order but never became a member of it; by the later 13th century Reading was virtually an ordinary Benedictine house. The first abbot, HUGH OF AMIENS, was appointed in 1123 and made archbishop of Rouen in 1130. The abbey church, which housed the tomb of Henry I, was dedicated in 1164 by Thomas BECKET. Abbot William I (1164–73) became archbishop of Bordeaux and Abbot Hugh II (1186–99) was elected abbot of Cluny. By grant of Clement III in 1191, the abbot was mitered. Reading's most important relics were the hand of St. James the Great, given by Henry I, and the head of St. Philip, given by King John in 1205. The abbey was the scene of John of Gaunt's marriage to Blanche of Lancaster in 1359, and of the announcement of King Edward IV's marriage in 1464. Parliament assembled there in 1453. Dependent houses were Leominster Priory (County Hereford) and, until the late 13th century, May Priory, Scotland. Reading was dissolved in 1539, after the execution of the last abbot, Hugh Cook Faringdon, who denied the royal supremacy. Some ruins remain today.

Bibliography: J. B. HURRY, Reading Abbey (London 1901). J. C. COX, "The Abbey of Reading," The Victoria History of Berkshire, ed. P. H. DITCHFIELD and W. PAGE, 4 v. (London 1906–24) v.2. D. KNOWLES and R. N. HADCOCK, Medieval Religious Houses: England and Wales (New York 1953) 74. D. KNOWLES, The Monastic Order in England, 943–1216 (2d ed. Cambridge, England 1962). L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:2417.

[B. R. KEMP]

READING, SPIRITUAL

Spiritual reading is the reading of those things that help one make progress in the spiritual life, done precisely with the aim of nourishing and strengthening this life. It differs from vocal prayer, meditative reading, and study, inasmuch as it presupposes in the reader a disposition that is more receptive than active. However, insofar as it gives him new matter for consideration, it serves, at least as a moral cause, to bring about a certain actualization of the reader's internal faculties in the direction of contemplation.

Aim. God has given man a share in His own life and has thereby raised him to the supernatural order. Thus, the preservation and constant growth of this divine life, with a view to possessing it eternally in heaven through the direct vision of God, the Supreme Good, is the essential problem of the spiritual life. The aim of spiritual reading, therefore, is to have man know as many aspects of this life as possible and thereby to facilitate the accomplishment of his supernatural destiny. The need and importance of devoting part of his time to spiritual reading, then, arises from human indigence, since man is in constant need of instruction and new impulses if he is to make progress in the life of virtue and apostolic activity. This need grows along with growth in profane culture, since there must be not only an ever more adequate knowledge of the problems and concerns of the spirit, but also a strengthened ability to rebut error and to protect oneself against spiritual loss through absorption in secular interests.

Matter. Books for spiritual reading embrace the Bible primarily, which contains God's own words; then the writings of the Fathers, and Doctors of the Church, who have developed the Biblical expression of God's teaching; and, in general, every work that serves to explain Catholic teaching about human perfection or to manifest its realization in the lives of the saints.

The Bible. The Bible is the principal book for spiritual reading since it contains the principles and rules of Christian perfection, especially as these are exemplified in the life of our Lord. The four accounts of the Gospel, then, comprise the most important part of the Bible for the purpose of spiritual reading, since they contain not only the narration of what our Lord did and taught, but also the manner wherein He fulfilled the prophecies. Moreover, these accounts represent His life, not only with respect to His personal perfection, but also with respect to His perfection as the king and savior of the human race. Yet to appreciate God's whole plan of salvation, one should strive to read the whole Bible, from the first page to the last.

The Fathers. The Fathers of the Church developed their teaching by exploring the content of the Bible. While their writings are in general a rich source for spiritual reading, the organization of excerpted material in St. Thomas Aquinas's Catena Aurea (The Golden Chain) is of special value. There the reader can find the Fathers' own explanation of the social context of Christ's words and actions and can see the relation between this social context and his own, as well as the symbolic meaning of many of Christ's words.

The Doctors of the Church. While many of the Fathers are also Doctors of the Church, there are many Doctors who are not Fathers. They are important for spiritual reading, not only because of their analyses of Christ's teaching, but also because of the discipline in logic contained in their writings. Very few persons have the habit of logic so perfectly as to avoid all the pitfalls of sentimentalism even during the time devoted to spiritual reading. By serving to discipline the mind, then, the Doctors of the Church serve also to discipline the emotions, and this discipline helps to remove the obstacles to thorough penetration of the doctrine presented.

History. Historical accounts, too, can be suitable for spiritual reading. This is true especially of the history of the Church, wherein one can read the history of salvation and the spread of Christ's mystical body throughout the world. Inasmuch as the saints reflect Christ's own perfection and His constant work of sanctifying souls, the accounts of their lives, too, are good sources for spiritual reading. In this regard, however, one must make a careful selection. Extremely poetic and rhetorical reports of the lives of the saints militate against, rather than serve, the purpose of spiritual reading, since they not only misrepresent the true holiness of the particular saint, but also distort the mind of the reader by focusing attention on what is not genuinely holy in this person's life or by emphasizing what can have a sensational appeal.

Dispositions. The personal advantage of spiritual reading presupposes certain dispositions in the reader. First among these are the theological virtues: faith, hope, and charity. Faith is needed so that the reader is ready to accept God's word without questioning its truthfulness. Hope is necessary as a foundation for perseverance in the practice of spiritual reading, as well as for a habitual readiness to rely upon God's help for the penetration of what is read. Charity is needed so that the reading may be motivated by love for God, and that joy and peace may predominate in the course of the reading; a person engaged in spiritual reading must be preoccupied with what is good rather than with what is evil, and must have considerable freedom from both internal and external agitation. Among the moral virtues, piety has a special importance, since the reader must be habitually disposed to accept God as the principal teacher; the Apostles, Fathers, and Doctors as secondary teachers under God; and other authors as teachers who share in a lesser degree the excellence of the foregoing authors. Studiousness causes a person to apply what he reads to himself and inclines him to penetrate what he reads, rather than to read many books without really delving into their meaning. Humility, of course, is a most basic disposition, since it causes the reader to recognize his true spiritual condition and thereby prevents him from adopting an unrealistic view of what he reads, for instance that involved in fantastic comparisons of himself with certain saints, as though he had the same degree of perfection.

Benefits. The two principal advantages of spiritual reading are habitual encouragement to strive for perfection in one's thoughts, words, and actions; and a disposition for frequent meditation based upon what has been read. From meditation, the soul can be raised to contemplation, the most perfect act of man's mind, inasmuch as it involves union with God. Spiritual reading, then, becomes a source of contemplative prayer, wherein charity is inflamed and wherein the soul here contemplates, in the darkness of faith, the Supreme Good, whom it will contemplate forever in the light of glory.

Bibliography: R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, The Three Ages of the Interior Life, tr. M. T. DOYLE, 2 v. (St. Louis 1947) 1:247-55. A. ROYO, The Theology of Christian Perfection, tr. J. AUMANN (Dubuque 1962). J. EUDES, La Vie et le royaume de Jésus dans les âmes chrétiennes (Oeuvres Choisies de Saint John Eudes 1; Paris 1931). E. BERTAUD, "Dialogues Spirituels," Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932-) 3:834-850; "Entretiens spirituels," ibid., 4.1:763-774. E. BERTAUD and A. RAYEZ, "Echelle spirituelle," Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932-) 4.1:62-86. T. CAMELOT, "Lecture et oraison," La Vie spirituelle (Paris 1919-); title varies, 78 (1948) 640-659. J. DE GHELLINCK, Lectures spirituelles dans les écrits des Pères (Paris 1935). A. LEFÈVRE et al., "Écriture sainte et vie spirituelle," Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932-) 4.1:128-278.

[E. BERTAUD]

REALINO, BERNARDINE, ST.

Jesuit humanist, patron of Lecce; b. Carpi (near Modena), Italy, Dec. 1, 1530; d. Lecce, Apulia, Italy, July 2, 1616. Realino studied at nearby Modena and at the University of Bologna, where he was made a doctor in utroque jure in 1556. Because of an argument during which he had wounded an adversary, Bernardino was forced to make his career elsewhere, and he went in 1556 to Milan. The governor, Cardinal Cristoforo MADRUZZO, appointed him to the first of several minor mayoralties and fiscal posts. In May 1564 the Marquis of Pescara brought Realino to Naples to supervise some of his holdings. He was admitted into the Society of Jesus by Alphonso Salmerón and made his novitiate at the Jesuit college in Naples. In 1567 he was ordained and shortly afterward was appointed master of novices by (St.) Francis BORGIA, general of the Jesuits. In 1574 Realino was assigned to Lecce. Here he remained for 42 years, founding a college and building a noble baroque church. Direction of souls soon became his chief occupation, and his winning charity and compassionate skill in the confessional earned him a reputation for sanctity. A sodality for priests, which he inaugurated, seems to have been the first of its kind under Jesuit auspices. Numerous miraculous cures and prophecies were attributed to him, and several visions of the Blessed Virgin and of Jesus crucified. The Bollandists refer to him as notae sanctitatis thaumaturgus. On his deathbed, at the petition of the mayor and council of Lecce, he agreed to be the city's protector in heaven. He was beatified by Leo XIII and canonized June 22, 1947, by Pius XII. In his youth Bernardino was a prolific writer, mainly on the classics, and wrote verses even in the last years of his life. At 21 he had published a commentary on a poem of Catullus, In nuptias Pelei et Thetidis catullianas commentarius (Bologna 1551). Although on becoming a Jesuit he destroyed all the copies he could find, at least 22 survive in the great libraries of the world.

Feast: July 2 (Jesuits).

Bibliography: B. DE REALINO, Lettere spirituali inedite . . . , ed. G. BOERO (Naples 1854). G. GERMIER, San Bernardino Realino (Florence 1943). F. SWEENEY, Bernardine Realino: Renaissance Man (New York 1951); Every Man My Brother (Boston 1976). J. N. TYLEND, Jesuit Saints & Martyrs (Chicago 1998) 195-97. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 3:13-14. Acta Apostolicae Sedis 39 (Rome 1947) 249-253, 391-398. C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890-1932; v. 12 suppl. 1960) 6:1554-56.

[F. SWEENEY]

REALISM

Realism, in the language of modern and contemporary philosophy, is a general theory concerning the relationship between the mind of man and what is commonly called REALITY. Because of this, a doctrine affirming or denying realism pertains to the branch of philosophy known as EPISTEMOLOGY, which treats of the subject of KNOWLEDGE. Although philosophers are not in agreement as to whether epistemology is a philosophical discipline distinct from METAPHYSICS, the nature of the subject under discussion permits one to abstract from this question. In any event, the epistemologist must ultimately square his conclusions about knowledge with his metaphysics of being.

Realism vs. Idealism. In its broadest terms, realism asserts that the ultimate factor or principle in being is not the mind of man, but rather what exists in reality beyond the mind or "outside" the mind. The word "outside" is not here taken in a spatial sense, as though the mind were located within the human brain and reality were situated outside it. Although this may be true in a qualified sense, spatial localization has little to do with the meaning the Western philosophical tradition has given to extramental reality. Nor must realism be taken to imply that the contents understood by the mind are real and the mind itself is not. Realism, in its many forms, does not deny the reality of mind in order to assert the reality of what is not mind. On the contrary, realism maintains that the term of the act of knowing is not to be identified with that very act. Knowledge is always about something that is not itself knowledge. Hence realism attributes an independent existence to the term of knowledge. In a word, realism maintains that there is a world and that the function of the mind consists primarily in coming to terms with that world in order to understand it as it is in itself.

In its most general notion, realism is opposed to IDEALISM. Idealism, prescinding from differences existing between idealist philosophers, maintains that the ultimate principle from which philosophy takes its point of departure is mind, whether mind is differentiated into individual intelligences or is itself an undifferentiated principle. Idealism therefore asserts that reality issues forth from intelligence or from spirit, and is ultimately nothing more than a dimension of that same spirit. The idealist begins with the "I" thinking reality, whereas the realist affirms that thinking or knowing depends upon the reality known or thought.

Absolute Realism vs. Nominalism. Historically, such differences did not arise as a result of the modern idealist-realist controversy but as a result of a controversy that centered around the status of UNIVERSALS. The dispute originated in Greek philosophy, and its underlying presupposition is the evident truth that man possesses universal concepts or networks of meaning that are applicable indifferently to many subjects of judgment. What, precisely, is the status of "man" as predicated of John and of Paul? The answer of PLATO gave birth to what the philosophical tradition of the West calls absolute realism (Soph. 242–264B; Parm.). Reasoning from the data at hand, Plato concluded that both John and Paul participate in a common meaning designated by the word "man." But since no individual man exhausts the meaning of man, this intelligibility or form cannot be identified with either John or Paul. Plato's problem hinged upon his having to discover the status of a predicate that is participated among many subjects. He concluded that meanings or forms (ideas) have an absolute status quite apart from the things that participate in them. He thus postulated two orders of reality: an order of absolutely real being that corresponds to the judgment of identity, "A is A"; and an order of second-rate reality that imperfectly shares in the being of the forms and that corresponds to the judgment of participation, "A is B." In the latter judgment the predicate is not identified completely with the subject. What is most important for an understanding of Plato's absolute realism in his contention that the universal CONCEPT in all its universality is being, and that the role of the mind is reduced to ascertaining this being.

Plato's doctrine entered into early medieval philosophy through the writings of BOETHIUS and through the Isagoge of PORPHYRY; here it was opposed by NOMINALISM, which asserted a position in flat contradiction to that of Plato. Nominalism in its earlier phase is associated with ABELARD, and in its later stages with WILLIAM OF OCKHAM. Whereas Plato had attended to the evident reality of meanings in things, nominalists looked to the evident reality of singularly existing things. Outside the mind there simply are no universal realities. The universal, by definition, is a community of meaning predicable of many singulars. But a community of meaning can never be found in actual existence. Man never encounters the universal. Arguing thus, and urged on by their insistence that only the singular is real, nominalists concluded by denying any reality whatsoever to the universal. The universal was reduced to the spoken or written or imagined word, which itself is singular. Thus all meaning disappeared from the universe. The more sophisticated nominalism of the 20th century, associated with LOGICAL POSITIVISM, states that universals are convenient tools with which man organizes the continuum of sensation. But all nominalists, both medieval and modern, agree that universal meaning has no extramental or metaphysical status whatsoever.

Conceptualism and Scotism. CONCEPTUALISM is a position between that of absolute realism and nominalism. While granting that the mind does in fact possess universal ideas, conceptualism maintains that there is no basis outside the mind for this universality. The universal serves as an instrument for grouping singular objects. Conceptualism thus bears an affinity to both nominalism and to logical positivism.

A late medieval attempt to close the gap between Platonic absolute realism and the nominalistic insistence upon the ultimate reality of the singular was that of JOHN DUNS SCOTUS. While agreeing with Plato that the form or idea has an extramental or metaphysical status, Scotus took account of the irreducibility of the singular to the universal. The form of man, let us say, must receive the additional form of "thisness" (haecceitas) or of individuality that seals reality and binds existent meaning to this concrete singular reality. The difficulty in Scotus's position would seem to reside in the impossibility of conceiving a form that is a form and at the same time individual.

Aristotle's Moderate Realism. The realism of Aristotle, as distinguished from that of Plato, is usually called moderate realism. The Aristotelian critique of Platonic realism can be divided methodologically into two moments, one experimental and the other metaphysical (Cat. 2–10; Meta. 1017–18; Part. animal. 642b–644b). In the order of experience man does not discover universals as he discovers things. Slavery is not experienced, but rather slaves. It follows that Plato's theory of PARTICIPATION is useless in man's search for the universal.

Induction and Abstraction. For Aristotle, the universal emerges in the mind as the result of an accumulation of EXPERIENCE that serves to form an INDUCTION. When the experience in question is sufficient, the universal is produced by an intellectual power or faculty known in the scholastic tradition as the agent INTELLECT. The universal, being the product of an act of mind, is made by the mind; therefore its metaphysical status as a universal is owed strictly to the intellect. But the mind is able to form the universal, and thus predicate it of the singular, because within reality itself there is a basis or foundation for the universal. This foundation is the energizing principle that organizes each thing, giving it consistency and direction or finality. Aristotle called this principle the FORM. Form in extramental reality is always individualized by MATTER, which functions as a passive limitation upon form. Granted that forms are repeated throughout nature, the basis for the universal is reality itself, and reality as form or as ACT.

Ultimately what separates Aristotelian from Platonic realism is Aristotle's insistence that human knowledge is basically abstractive, and that ABSTRACTION depends upon a series of confrontations or experiences with reality through the medium of the senses. For Plato knowledge is basically intuitive, and hence proceeds from the general to the particular, at least ideally.

Objections to Plato. Aristotle's metaphysical objection to Platonic realism rests upon Aristotle's conviction that nature is essentially active or dynamic (Meta. 1013a–1017a). Even if there were Platonic ideas, these could not explain a changing universe. What does not initiate activity does not itself have being. The Aristotelian form not only structures a thing; it is its internal energy or actuality. Since Plato's ideas do not do anything, they are incapable of serving as a basis for such explanation. The Platonic form is, however, a model or an exemplary cause; as such, it does have meaning in a world of art where the carpenter, for example, fashions a chair from the preexistent idea of chair that he entertained (see EXEMPLARY CAUSALITY). In the world of art and technology, the idea precedes the reality; in this order Plato's theory of participation applies with perfect justice. But the world of nature would seem to correspond more closely to the Aristotelian position.

Inherent Difficulties. Aristotle's realism nonetheless contains a number of difficulties that were pointed out by both nominalists and realists during the famous medieval controversy. The chief difficulty in Aristotelian moderate realism is one of explaining how the selfsame form can exist in two orders of reality, in extramental being as actuality and in the mind as universality. The difficulty is rooted in Aristotle's theory of BEING. For Aristotle, being is ultimately reducible to SUBSTANCE, itself a composition of an active principle (form) and a passive principle (matter). Being must serve to answer the question "what is a thing?"; and this "what" (QUIDDITY) or ESSENCE is ultimately the form as related to matter. But if being is substance, and especially substance as form, there is no difference between the being of a man and that man himself (Meta. 1003b 28). How then is it possible that man "be" (i.e., exist) in the mind, if being is defined as identical with substance?

Aquinas's Moderate Realism. The metaphysics of St. THOMAS AQUINAS is probably the most ambitious attempt within Western philosophy to preserve the doctrine of moderate realism by surmounting difficulties of this type. While conserving in its fullness Aristotle's notion of substance as composed of matter and form, as well as the Aristotelian theory of abstraction, St. Thomas Aquinas made important emendations in the Aristotelian doctrine relating to being. His principal contribution in this area was the clear and explicit distinction he introduced between essence and existence (see ESSENCE AND EXISTENCE).

Since essence (and therefore form) is not identically its own existence, nothing prohibits the selfsame form from existing in different individuals. The form remains identically the same within any given species, while it is existentially diverse because of its different acts of existing. Thus the form that exists singularly in the order of being can come to exist within the human intelligence as universal. The latter special mode of existence is known within Thomism as intentional existence [see Y. R. Simon, Introduction à l'ontologie du connaître (Paris 1934)].

Within a Thomistic context, INTENTIONALITY must not be thought of simply as an act of being. Intentional existence does not make a thing exist; rather it makes a thing be known. The knower is thus literally the thing known; yet the union between them is not physical. Neither knower nor thing known loses its proper identity in the world of being. The act of knowledge is thus conceived to be a relational act; the term of the relation is the reality grasped in knowledge.

Critical Realism. The moderate realism of Aristotle and the medievals was challenged first by the nominalism of Ockham and others, and then in the Renaissance by René DESCARTES. The position of Descartes may be identified as a critical realism, an attempt to justify realism on grounds that belong strictly to the intelligence. Strongly influenced by the success of mathematics in reducing the complex to the simple, Descartes professed a systematic and universal doubt about everything he had hitherto accepted as true, and then proposed to remove that doubt through the application of mathematical methods. Fixing upon the irreducible certitude of the ‘I’ or ego, the existence of which cannot be doubted, Descartes wished to proceed from the ego to the world, rather than from the world to the ego. This marked a radical departure from the Thomistic and Aristotelian contention that man’s knowledge of self, as revealed in his CONSCIOUSNESS, is a consequence of the knowledge he already possesses of the world.

Descartes established his realism by direct appeal to divinity; for him, the idea of God, whose existence is guaranteed by an identification of His perfection with the concept of existence or being, combines with the fact of experience to prove the existence of the world. All men reason spontaneously to the being of the world from the sensations they possess. The only adequate cause of these sensations is the things represented by them. God’s veracity guarantees the validity of the reasoning process, because God would not permit the whole human race to be deceived.

Critical Idealism. The critical realism of the late 19th and early 20th centuries was an attempt to improve the Cartesian thesis by transcending its weakness. Nevertheless, Descartes’s realistic intentions were soon absorbed into the idealism of the classical German philosophers of the 18th and 19th centuries. Immanuel Kant affirmed the extramental reality of the world, but he denied that there was any necessary relationship between such reality and the laws of the mind. He admitted that the human intelligence is forced to think in terms of the law of causality, which declares an inexorable link between propositions and ideas. But, for him, CAUSALITY itself is not found in reality; rather, the real is made up of discrete elements that are not related by causal necessity. Nature contains no laws within itself. Law, being universal and necessary, comes from reason and is thus prior to experience. Kant, of course, did speak of a ‘‘thing-in-itself’’ beyond experience. But this escapes the order of judgment, which is restricted, according to him, to the phenomena of experience; the mind ought therefore not to affirm or deny the existence of the ‘‘thing-in-itself.’’ Kant’s critical idealism, itself containing a minimum of realism, was thereupon expanded into the absolute idealism of J. G. FICHTE and G. W. F. Hegel, which denied the ‘‘thing-in-itself’’ as superfluous.

The realist objections to the Kantian position can be stated under two headings. (1) Kant’s sharp opposition between the PHENOMENA, or the events of experience that are always singular, and the NOUMENA, or laws of the mind that are always universal, is itself an opposition between two mental concepts. The universal is not opposed to the singular, except logically; rather the universal is discovered by the mind in the singular. Realism thus denies the basis upon which Kant built his system by denying an existential opposition between singularity and the universality. Universality is grounded in form or actuality; this is always individuated in matter, before the mind abstracts its formal intelligibility and sees it as a complexity of meaning common to many things. (2) The Kantian insistence that human knowledge is restricted to phenomena introduces a distinction between ‘‘things-in-themselves’’ and ‘‘things-in-man’s-sensibility’’ that is purely assumed and in no sense evident.

Nonscholastic Realism. Contemporary nonscholastic realism has taken many forms, most of which reflect the influence of Kant and his insistence that law belongs to the mind and not to things. Thus H. BERGSON and W. JAMES reduce the mind to a tool that is capable of working out human problems but is incapable of coming to grips with reality itself. Reality must be grasped, according to Bergson, by an INTUITION that bypasses the logical structure of the intelligence. A similar philosophy has been developed by George SANTAYANA. Asserting the reality of the idea as of an essence given whole and entire to the human intelligence, Santayana asserts that the reality of the existent is accepted on a purely animal faith. It follows that the less existence an idea or an essence has, or the less it is involved in the world, the more real it becomes. Santayana’s explanation through animal faith, while differing in many respects from the PHENOMENOLOGY of F. BRENTANO, E. HUSSERL, and M. SCHELER, has in common with this doctrine a realism of essence that prescind from a realism of EXISTENCE. From a scholastic point of view the realist philosophies proffered by G. E. MOORE, B. RUSSELL, A. N. WHITEHEAD, S. ALEXANDER, and N. HARTMANN also force an excessive separation between essence and that of existence.

Modern EXISTENTIALISM has attempted to surmount the traditional opposition between realism and idealism by its insistence upon the truth that man always encounters himself within a world. This situation of ‘‘being-in-a-world’’ belongs to the very constitution of man, who, for M. HEIDEGGER, is a project or a ‘‘being-towards-and-in-a-world.’’ It is impossible to conceive of man and of the world in isolation; man and world essentially involve one another.

The criticism leveled against realism by these thinkers is prompted by the basic realist contention that the world is not man. Existentialists deny the supposed opposition, and thus claim to have transcended the dispute between idealism and realism. The strength of the existentialist position would seem to reside in its insistence that man is meaningless apart from the world, a thesis that seems, however, to strengthen rather than weaken the realist position. The ambiguity in the existentialist transcendence of both realism and idealism is located in the concept of world. If this means a related, meaningful whole, actually intelligible or known, then the existentialist notion of world corresponds roughly to the realist. But if world is taken to exclude actual intelligibility, then the existentialist position can be reduced to an idealism, and thus it in no sense transcends the dispute between realism and idealism.

See Also: KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF; AESTHETICS.

Bibliography: F. D. WILHELMSSEN, Man's Knowledge of Reality (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1956). F. VAN STEENBERGHEN, Epistemology, tr. M. J. FLYNN (New York 1949). J. MARITAIN, Distinguish to Unite: The Degrees of Knowledge, tr. G. B. PHELAN (New York 1959). B. J. F. LONERGAN, Insight: A Study of Human Understanding (New York 1957). L. M. RÉGIS, St. Thomas and Epistemology (Milwaukee 1946). E. H. GILSON, Le Réalisme méthodique (Paris 1936); Réalisme thomiste et critique de la connaissance (Paris 1939). I. M. BOCHEŃSKI, Contemporary European Philosophy, tr. D. NICHOLL and K. ASCHENBRENNER (Berkeley 1956). F. H. PARKER, "Realistic Epistemology," The Return to Reason, ed. J. D. WILD (Chicago 1953). M. M. GORCE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 13.2:1833–1910. A. COLOMBO and V. MATHIEU, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 3:1889–1901. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 2:622–25.

[F. D. WILHELMSSEN]

REALITY

Reality denotes the realm of things existing outside of, and independently of, the mind. Derived from the Latin res, "thing," the word is often applied to the world of the SENSES. By contrast, the world of reality is distinguishable from the realm of IMAGINATION or that of intellectual ABSTRACTION. The absolute intelligibility and even the existence of a world of reality have been challenged, most notably in modern philosophy (see KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF).

Two questions might be asked concerning reality: "Are things as they appear?" and "Do they even exist at all?" Light from a white object, passing through a green pane of glass, might convey to an observer behind the glass the impression that the object itself was green. René DESCARTES, in his Discourse on Method, suggested the possibility that the senses themselves transform the impressions they give of objects in a similar manner. In his Critique of Pure Reason, Immanuel KANT answered that one knows reality only as previously transformed by his own senses and intellect. What one knows, therefore, is not things themselves but certain subjectively transformed appearances, PHENOMENA. Hence the philosophy of PHENOMENALISM. A further step would then be to ask if anything at all corresponds outside the mind to the appearance within the mind. A negative answer yields the philosophy of SOLIPSISM, which affirms that internal appearances are all that exist, that oneself is the sole existing reality.

Since the knower has no way of verifying the existence and nature of reality except by the use of his senses and INTELLECT, whose objective validity phenomenism and solipsism call into question, the legitimacy of the foregoing questions must be examined. To question whether other things exist besides oneself, one must imply his own EXISTENCE, which he knows in the same way as he knows the existences called into question. To acknowledge one's own existence, therefore, is equivalent to acknowledging the existence of other things. Similarly, when one asks if things are as he conceives them to be, the question presupposes an awareness of the identity of the senses as distinct from the object of perception. It further presupposes that, with due caution and attention, the mind can forestall any misinterpretation of sense data. To one who has a cold, for example, food may seem tasteless; yet he realizes that it is not the food that has lost its savor, but rather his senses that are not normal. So one may invent questions leading to solipsism and phenomenism, but the mind does not actually raise them. In fact those who profess such doubts do not adhere to them in practical life.

Although the term "reality" as denoting the totality of things existing independently of mind is usually identified with reality as perceived by the senses, one cannot arbitrarily restrict the scope of existing things to the sensible world alone. If immaterial things such as SOUL, ANGELS, and GOD, exist, they too are real and actually constitute, by their plenitude of being, a superior realm of reality.

See Also: DISTINCTION, KINDS OF; KNOWLEDGE; REALISM.

Bibliography: ARISTOTLE, Meta. 1003a.20–1012b.30. THOMAS AQUINAS, In 4 meta. 1–17; De ver. 1.1. V. MATHIEU, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 3:1903–13.

[P. CONWAY]

REASON, CULT OF GODDESS OF

A civic, naturalistic religion of the FRENCH REVOLUTION, dedicated to the worship of Reason and Liberty and intended as a substitute for Christianity. The Paris Commune, under the leadership of Pierre Chaumette, inaugurated the cult with a ceremony in the cathedral of Notre Dame (Nov. 10, 1793), three days after Jean GOBEL, the constitutional bishop of the capital, had been induced to abdicate his priesthood. In the cathedral a shrine was erected in honor of Reason and Liberty. In front of the choir a sacred mountain was constructed, surmounted by a small Greek temple in honor of Philosophy. Surrounding it were busts representing leading figures in the ENLIGHTENMENT (probably Montesquieu, Rousseau, Voltaire, and Benjamin Franklin). A young opera singer, whose name remains uncertain, posed as Liberty and was dubbed "Goddess of Reason." A flame, symbolic of truth, burned on an altar, while white-clad young girls, wearing tricolored sashes representative of allegiance to the Republic, carried torches up and down the sacred mountain. Meanwhile the congregation sang André Chénier's hymn: "Come, Holy Liberty, dwell in this temple; become the Goddess of the French people."

As the cult spread to other parts of France, modifications were introduced. Some temples of Reason recognized the Supreme Being; others venerated Brutus or Jean Marat. The revolutionary extremists, who were trying to dechristianize the country, claimed that Christianity was too otherworldly to oppose tyranny and was nearing extinction. They hoped to speed the process with the new cult. One of their chief vehicles of propaganda was Moniteur du culte de la raison, edited by Pierre Chantreau. Jacobins eagerly adopted the cult, even in the provinces. By order of the commune (Nov. 24, 1793), all churches in Paris were transformed into temples of Reason. The Cult of Reason vanished quickly, after its chief exponents, Chaumette and Jacques Hébert, were guillotined (March 24, 1794); it was supplanted by the Cult of the SUPREME BEING (May 1794).

Bibliography: F. AULARD, Le Culte de la raison et le culte de l'Être Suprême, 1793-94 (Paris 1892). A. SICARD, À la recherche d'une religion civile (Paris 1895). A. MATHIEZ, Les Origines des cultes révolutionnaires, 1789-1792 (Paris 1904); Contributions à l'histoire religieuse de la révolution française (Paris 1907). A. LATREILLE, L'Église catholique et la révolution française, 2 v. (Paris 1946-50).

[M. LAWLOR]

REASON, USE OF

Reason is an individual's possession of a capacity to employ his thinking and volitional powers here and now in the direction and control of his behavior in such a way that his actions can be accounted truly human and morally imputable. It thus differs from the age of reason, or the time in life when a person becomes more or less stably capable of moral judgment.

No doubt consciousness of any kind in a human being involves some operation on the part of his intellect and will, as well (in his earthly mode of existence) as of his sensory powers. But only when these several principles of activity are sufficiently sound in their separate and combined functions to enable a man to formulate a reasonable judgment concerning an end to be pursued (appraised from the point of view of ultimate human values), or the means suitable to its attainment, can he be said to enjoy the "use" of reason, i.e., the capacity to employ it freely in the pursuit of objectives specifically human in their value. If the function of his powers is impeded or impaired in such a way that he is incapable of judgment of this kind, although reason and its associated powers may be operative, a man does not possess the free use of them to human purposes and his actions cannot, therefore be classified either as perfectly human or as perfectly moral.

The use of reason may be lacking or impaired by a variety of defects. The most radical of these is an insufficiency in the development of the power of abstract thinking, or a present incapacity to exercise it, that makes a man unable to distinguish absolute from relative values and to see beyond the particular goods that appeal to his immediate desire. If this capacity is wanting, one is incapable of any truly human or moral activity whatever. Other defects may diminish one's use of reason without destroying it entirely. These may occur in consequence of malfunction of sensory perception (as in hallucinations), or of ignorance or inadvertence on the part of the mind itself, or of turbulent emotional disorder. For the influence of these defects on the use of reason and hence on moral responsibility, see IGNORANCE; HUMAN ACT; VOLUNTARITY.

[P. K. MEAGHER]

REASONING

The process by which the human INTELLECT passes from what it already knows to what it does not yet know, without having recourse to new information. Since KNOWLEDGE is expressed in propositions, reasoning may be characterized also as the process by which the mind passes from two or several propositions, called the premises or the antecedent, to another proposition, called the conclusion or the consequent. It may be noted that passing directly from one PROPOSITION to another, e.g., by conversion, is not considered reasoning because the conclusion has the same content as the premise, differing from it only in form; thus no new knowledge results. Only by bringing together two or more knowledge-contents does the mind grasp a new knowledge-content.

(The direct passage from one proposition to another is sometimes called immediate inference, although the term “inference” is here used in an improper sense.)

Matter and Form. In reasoning there are two aspects to consider, namely, matter and form. The matter is the content with which the reasoning is concerned, i.e., the objects and properties mentioned in the propositions involved in the reasoning. The form is the manner in which the elements of the reasoning are linked together; it is what characterizes the reasoning when abstraction is made from its content. Corresponding to the distinction between form and matter is that between the validity and the truth of a reasoning process; a consideration of validity and truth may thus assist the understanding of form and matter as they are applied to the reasoning process.

Validity of Reasoning. Reasoning is valid, or correct, when the consequent follows necessarily (with a logical necessity) from the antecedent, i.e., when the antecedent cannot be true without the consequent’s being true also. It is then said that the consequent is inferred from the antecedent or that there is an inference (in the strict sense) from the antecedent to the consequent. Valid reasoning thus expresses an inference.

The validity of reasoning depends only on its form. In other words, the validity is independent of the objects and properties about which the reasoning is concerned, and therefore, of the truth or falsity of the propositions involved in it. If, in valid reasoning, each mention of an object or of a property is replaced by the mention of another object or another property, the resulting reasoning also is valid.

Reasoning can be valid even if its conclusion is false, as when one of the premises is false. Again, invalid, or incorrect, reasoning can come to a true conclusion; when this occurs, however, it is by accident and not in virtue of the deductive link the reasoning establishes between true premises and the conclusion drawn. When any given reasoning is incorrect, it is always possible to replace it by another with the same form and with true premises that leads to a false conclusion.

The necessary condition of the validity of a given reasoning process is the following: “in all reasoning having the same form, if the premises are true the conclusion is also true” (Dopp, 15).

Truth of Reasoning. The reasoning process that establishes the TRUTH of a proposition is called DEMONSTRATION. A proposition is demonstrated to be true only if it expresses the conclusion of a valid reasoning process all of whose premises have been previously recognized as true, i.e., as being evident in themselves or as having in turn been demonstrated. According to Aristotelian doctrine, a distinction must be made between demonstration in the strict sense, which concerns what is necessarily true, and demonstration in the improper sense, which concerns what is only probable. The first leads to SCIENCE (scientia) as such, which is knowledge of the necessary, whereas the second pertains to DIALECTICS, which is concerned with probable knowledge.

The study of reasoning can be undertaken from the viewpoint of validity only, which considers form alone, or from the viewpoint of demonstration, which considers form and matter conjointly. The first viewpoint is that of formal logic, the second, that of material logic (see LOGIC).

Evolution of Concept. Various conceptions of reasoning have evolved with the history of logic. According to the scholastic conception, which to a great extent was inherited from Aristotle, logic is the study of acts of the mind that relate to the acquisition of truth. In this view, conditions affecting the validity of reasoning and those affecting its truth are based upon the characteristics of the intellectual acts that are involved in the reasoning process and in demonstration. Since those acts can be attained only through philosophical REFLECTION, logic, in this conception, has a philosophical base.

According to the modern conception, which is at the root of contemporary mathematical logic, formal logic must be considered as a science in the same sense as mathematics and must be developed in abstraction from all philosophical preconceptions. The study of reasoning is there attempted in terms of facts and without reference to acts of the mind; it considers only the properties of the objects of thought. This viewpoint finds its most radical expression in formalism. (See LOGIC, SYMBOLIC.)

Scholastic Analysis. It is common scholastic teaching that reason or intellect has three fundamental operations: simple APPREHENSION, JUDGMENT, and reasoning. In each, a distinction is made between the operation as such, which is an act of the intellect, and the product of the intellect that results from this operation. This product is to be distinguished from its oral or material expression. The term “reasoning” may denote the operation of the mind in apprehending a group of propositions (the antecedent) as inferring another proposition (the consequent) and concluding from the antecedent to the consequent. It may denote also the product of this operation, called ARGUMENTATION, which is the logical whole formed by the antecedent and the consequent: “a group of propositions in orderly sequence one of which (the consequent) is posited as inferred by the others (the antecedent)” (Maritain, 154). The term “argumentation” may denote the product of reasoning either as a mental object or as the oral or material expression of this object.

The consequence (consequentia) is the logical link that the reasoning establishes between the antecedent and the consequent; it is the manifestation of an inference. Reasoning, as an act, is really a motion of the mind, a discursus wherein the mind, perceiving two propositions as true and as standing in some type of mutual relationship, perceives in this very connection the truth of a third proposition, which it itself forms and to which it gives its assent. Thus the mind, put in motion by the antecedent, finds its rest in the consequent. The antecedent may therefore be regarded as a cause of the consequent. The essential law that governs this process is the following: in a correct reasoning, it is impossible that the antecedent be true and the consequent false.

Deduction and Induction. There are two types of reasoning: DEDUCTION and INDUCTION. In deduction, the mind moves only on the plane of the intelligible; it makes manifest “the truth of the proposition in so far as it is contained in the universal truth from which it is derived” (Maritain, 161). The best known and most celebrated form of deductive reasoning is the assertoric SYLLOGISM. This is “an argumentation in which, from an antecedent that unites two terms to a third, a consequent is inferred uniting these two terms to each other” (ibid. 169). Aristotelian and scholastic logicians have considered also other forms of deductive reasoning, in particular those of modal logic and of propositional logic.

In induction, the mind moves from the sensible plane to the intelligible plane. Induction is “an argumentation in which the mind infers an universal truth from sufficiently enumerated singular cases” (ibid. 259).

Analysis and Synthesis. Induction and deduction may be further characterized in terms of analysis and synthesis. ANALYSIS, or DIVISION, is an operation that resolves a complex whole into its parts; it thus passes from the complex to the simple. SYNTHESIS is the reverse of this; it passes from the simple to the complex, from the parts to the whole. Induction may be regarded as a type of analysis: it goes from facts to laws, i.e., to the universal principles upon which the facts depend; these may be regarded as wholes of which the facts are parts. It proceeds by a resolutio materialis, resolving the conclusion into the elements from which the mind has drawn it as from its matter. Deduction, on the other hand, may be regarded as a type of synthesis: it goes from principles to their consequences. It proceeds by a resolutio formalis, resolving the conclusion to the intelligible truths on which it depends and finally to FIRST PRINCIPLES that are self-evident. (It should be noted that not every analysis or synthesis involves reasoning; thus division of a concept is an analysis and judgment is a synthesis.)

Practical Reasoning. Demonstration in the strict sense, founded ultimately on the first principles of intellectual understanding, generates speculative, or theoretical, science. Apart from such science there is also practical science, which has human action and the regulation of this action as its object. Reasoning has a role to play in the practical order because, although human action as such proceeds from the will, the intellect presents the will with its object. And it is the intellect that deliberates, prior to the will’s election, so as to make possible a judgment concerning means that can lead to the end proposed by the will (see HUMAN ACT).

Human action is concerned with the particular and the contingent. But there are first principles in the practical order, as in the speculative, and a corresponding habit that enables man to come to knowledge of such principles, namely, SYNDERESIS. Right reason (recta ratio), starting with the principles furnished by synderesis and using the rules of reasoning (exactly as in the speculative order), establishes conclusions that constitute the rules of morality. CONSCIENCE applies these rules to particular situations, to what must be done by the individual here and now. The judgment of conscience is located between moral science, which is knowledge of the principles and rules of action, and the last practical judgment, which decides the course of action to be taken. The judgment of conscience is directed by PRUDENCE, a habit that enables man to judge rightly the data of a practical problem and choose means adequate to the end in view. It makes use also of the COGITATIVE POWER, an internal sense that enables man to perceive the goodness or harmfulness of an object and thus to make comparisons in the realm of practical knowledge.

Modern Analysis. In recent thought, a clear-cut distinction is made between the philosophical and the formal study of reasoning. Philosophical logic, much like scholastic logic, investigates norms of correct reasoning and the conditions required for the acquisition of truth. But logicians from the 19th century onward, applying mathematical methods to the study of the logical problems, have succeeded in creating a discipline that may be considered as a branch of mathematics, namely, mathematical, or symbolic, logic. H. B. Curry compares the relationship between this logic and philosophical logic to the relationship that exists between geometry considered as a pure mathematical science and geometry considered as a physical theory of real space.

Formal Methods. Mathematical logic investigates certain categories of formal systems considered in themselves and abstracting from particular philosophical positions or problems (see AXIOMATIC SYSTEM). Such formal methods have shown themselves particularly useful in studying the foundations of mathematics; metatheoretical studies of this type likewise make use of the methods of mathematical logic. Using such methods, for example, important work has been done in the elucidation and resolution of paradoxes (see ANTINOMY). Scholastic logic had already contributed considerably to this subject, but modern logic has undertaken the study with more rigorous and strictly formalized methods.

Study of Content. The procedures of mathematical logic can be used also to study the content of reasoning. Since its beginnings, mathematical logic has been preoccupied chiefly with problems of deduction, and a great variety of deductive systems have been elaborated; these offer a much wider field for deductive reasoning than that provided by traditional logic.

Research on inductive reasoning, although less developed, is pursued in the same manner. Here the notion of probability plays a central role; thus investigations of induction are closely related to studies of the foundations of probability. An allied topic of research is the problem of decision. R. Carnap's work is particularly significant for having elaborated a program of inductive logic in the spirit of mathematical logic.

Finally, modern studies of scientific methodology have successfully employed the methods of formalism to study problems pertaining to the acquisition of truth. Studies of induction are partially concerned with such problems. Important studies have examined also the process of VERIFICATION, the notion of explanation in modern science, the structure of scientific theories, the role of models, and special problems raised by the particular sciences.

See Also: METHODOLOGY (PHILOSOPHY).

Bibliography: M. J. ADLER, ed., The Great Ideas: A Syntopicon of Great Books of the Western World, 2 v. (Chicago 1952); v. 2, 3 of Great Books of the Western World 2:546–568. J. MARITAIN, Formal Logic, tr. I. CHOQUETTE (New York 1946). I. M. BOCHEŃSKI, Formale Logik (Freiburg 1956), Eng. A History of Formal Logic, ed. and tr. I. THOMAS (Notre Dame, Ind. 1961). J. DOPP, Notions de logique formelle (Louvain 1965). H. B. CURRY, The Foundations of Mathematical Logic (New York 1963). R. CARNAP, "The Aim of Inductive Logic," in Logic, Methodology and Philosophy of Science: Proceedings of the 1960 International Congress, ed. E. NAGEL et al. (Stanford 1962) 303–318.

[J. A. LADRIÈRE]

REASONING, THEOLOGICAL

The New Testament gives witness to the confidence of the first Christians in the ability of human reason to receive God's self-revelation and to foster its transmission through understanding, articulation, and proclamation. The announcement in the Gospel of John that "the Word became flesh" (1.14) affirms directly the mystery of the Incarnation, but indirectly it also indicates the dignity and efficaciousness of human reason (logos), derived from and reflective of the divine Logos. The Apostle Paul does not hesitate to remind his readers that "invisible realities, God's eternal power and divinity, have become visible, recognized through the things he has made" and so people "certainly had knowledge of God" (Rom 1.20–21). In his letters he uses logic to refute his opponents (e.g., Gal ch. 2), as well as analogies drawn from history (e.g., Rom ch. 4) and experience (e.g., 1 Cor ch. 12).

The confidence of the Church in the ability of human reason in matters divine is well summarized in Vatican I's Dogmatic Constitution Dei Filius (1870). The Council teaches that "God, the source and end of all things, can be known with certainty from the things that were created, through the natural light of human reason" (DS 3004; J. Neuner and J. Dupuis, ed., The Christian Faith [New York 2001], no. 113). But the Council also affirms that "revelation is to be judged absolutely necessary . . . because God in His infinite goodness has ordained us to a supernatural end (DS 3005; The Christian Faith, no. 114). There are, therefore, truths revealed by God not accessible to human reason (e.g., God as Triune, the mystery of the Church, etc.), which human beings accept through the gift of faith. Even in regard to these truths, however, there is a role for human reason, as Vatican I declared: "Nevertheless, if reason illumined by faith inquires in an earnest, pious and sober manner, it attains by God's grace a certain understanding of the mysteries, which is most fruitful, both from the analogy with the objects of its natural knowledge and from the connections of these mysteries with one another and with man's ultimate end" (DS 3016; The Christian Faith, no. 132).

Christians have always discovered fruitful insight into the mysteries of revelation by using analogies drawn from natural knowledge. Some have been quite simple, e.g., comparing the unity of Christians gathered in communion with Christ at the Eucharist to the grains in a loaf of bread. Some have been quite complex, e.g. St. AUGUSTINE's psychological analogy of the human experience of memory, understanding, and will for insight into the mystery of the Trinity.

Throughout the centuries theologians have striven to connect the mysteries of revelation with one another in order to achieve greater understanding through such a synthesis. Since Vatican II, a particularly effective connection has been that of seeing ecclesial communion in the light of Trinitarian communion. In the Middle Ages, the most successful and enduring synthesis was the Summa theologiae of St. THOMAS AQUINAS. In the twentieth century, the most influential systematic work has been the Church Dogmatics of the Protestant theologian Karl Barth, who maintained that the best apologetic was good dogmatics.

The effort to connect the mysteries of revelation with the ultimate destiny of human beings has manifested itself in the twentieth century with the concern to show the coherence of revelation with the structures of human knowing and loving in the quest for transcendence. This has led to the reshaping of fundamental theology from a more anthropological perspective and reflects the modern “turn to the subject.” Investigation into human knowing and loving have been intrinsic to the work of such theologians as Bernard LONERGAN, S.J., and Karl RAHNER, S.J.

Efforts to achieve greater understanding of the mysteries of revelation have to rely on the intellectual resources of a particular culture, especially philosophy. In Western Christianity the philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas, derived from Aristotle but also modified by him to be more consonant with the Christian tradition, was for a long time the dominant force. As Pope JOHN PAUL II noted in his encyclical FIDES ET RATIO of 1998, “The most influential Catholic theologians of the present century, to whose thinking and research the Second Vatican Council was much indebted, were the products of [the] revival of Thomistic philosophy” (no. 57). Many theologians of the twentieth century, however, have also been influenced by other philosophical systems, e.g., existentialism, process philosophy, and phenomenology. Pope John Paul II himself insists that “the Church has no philosophy of her own nor does she canonize any one particular philosophy in preference to others” (Fides et Ratio, no. 49).

Theological reasoning, however, also has a critical function because of “the historical condition that affects the expression of revelation,” as this is described in the Declaration Mysterium ecclesiae from the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith in 1973 (A. Flannery, ed., Vatican Council II: More Post Conciliar Documents [Northport, N.Y. 1982], pp. 433–34). The Declaration notes that dogmatic formulas are conditioned by “the expressive power of the language used at a certain point in time and in particular circumstances,” by incomplete (though not false) formulation at first but fuller expression later “in a broader context of faith or human knowledge,” by concentration on “solving certain questions or removing certain errors,” and by traces of “the changeable conceptions of a given epoch.” The Declaration goes on to define the work of theologians as “seeking to define exactly the intention of teaching proper to the various formulas, and in carrying out this work they are of considerable assistance to the living Magisterium of the Church, to which they remain subordinated.”

Vatican II led to the use of other resources for theological reasoning besides philosophy. In discussing the participation of the People of God in Christ’s prophetic office, the Council states that in adhering to the Christian faith the People “penetrates it more deeply through right judgement, and applies it more fully in daily life” (Lumen gentium, no. 12). This has led to greater theological reflection on the practice of faith by the members of the Church. Praxis has become a source of insight into the implications of the Gospel and the Christian tradition for teaching and action. Thus, for example, liberation theology, insofar as it is theological reflection on the plight of the poor and their Gospel-based actions to improve their condition, underlies the Church’s recognition that “there is a special presence of Christ in the poor, and this requires the Church to make a preferential option for them” (Pope John Paul II, Novo Millennio ineunte, no. 49).

Theologians have also turned to the sciences—empirical and social—either engaging them as conversation partners with the Christian tradition or using them to gain deeper insight into the unfolding of the tradition. Pope John Paul II notes that “reference to the sciences is often helpful, allowing as it does a more thorough knowledge of the subject under study, but it should not mean the rejection of a typically philosophical and critical thinking that is concerned with the universal” (Fides et ratio, no. 69).

Vatican II also encouraged young Churches to “borrow from the customs, traditions, wisdom, teaching, arts, and sciences of their people everything which could be used to praise the glory of the Creator, manifest the grace of the Savior, or contribute to the right ordering of Christian life” (Ad gentes divinitus, no. 22). The Council encouraged theological investigation in each of the great socio-cultural regions so that “the facts and words revealed by God, contained in Sacred Scripture, and explained by the Fathers and Magisterium of the Church, [could be] submitted to a new examination in the light of the tradition of the universal Church” (ibid.). Pope John Paul II notes that the Church of the future “will judge herself enriched by all that comes from today’s engagement with Eastern cultures and will find in this inheritance fresh cues for fruitful dialogue with the cultures which will emerge as humanity moves into the future” (Fides et ratio, no. 72).

In sum, the Church maintains a positive regard toward the role of reason in the relationship of human beings to God. Reason can come to know the existence of God by its own natural light, and it can achieve a deeper understanding of God’s self-revelation through the use of philosophical systems, the sciences, praxis, and dialogue with other cultures.

[J. STRYNKOWSKI]

REBIRTH (IN THE BIBLE)

The concept of a rebirth is one of the ways by which the NT seeks to explain the riches of Redemption that have been communicated to the Christian; before taking up the NT teaching, however, this article will refer to some passages from the OT intertestamental literature that throw light on the subject.

Old Testament and Intertestamental Literature.

The idea of a new birth or rebirth is well represented in the philosophical and religious literature of the Greco-Roman world, but it is absent from Jewish writings prior to Philo. In the OT, Israel—and later its king and people—could be described as “sons of God” (Dt 1.31; 8.5; Hos 11.1; 2 Sm 7.14; Is 30.1, 9; etc.), but this relationship was not thought of in terms of a birth or rebirth. Such ideas had polytheistic and idolatrous associations and were therefore avoided (Jer 2.27). Even those expressions that might suggest a divine generation of Israel or its king [Ex 4.22; Dt 32.18; Ps 2.7; 109(110).3 (Septuagint)] are subject to a moral or “adoptionist” interpretation. To express the idea of a new beginning, which is implied in the term rebirth, the OT speaks of a New Creation (Is 65.17–18; 66.22–23), which was ultimately given a futurist eschatological setting and associated with the inbreaking of the eternal age to come (Ethiopic Henoch 72.1; 91.16–17; Jubilees 1.29; 2 Bar 32.6; 4 Ezr 7.75). This doctrine is reflected also in the Qumran documents (Serek hayyahad (Rule of the Community, Manual of Discipline) 4.25; Hôdâyôt (Thanksgiving Hymns from Qumran Cave 1) 13.11–12), and it is made a present reality for those candidates entering the eschatological community (Hôdâyôt (Thanksgiving Hymns from Qumran Cave 1) 11.10–13); but these events are never described as a rebirth. This concept was foreign to Jewish thought.

New Testament. The concept of a new birth or rebirth is found in a limited number of passages in the NT. In the Johannine literature it is described as a being born of God (Jn 1.13; 1 Jn 2.29; 3.9; 4.7; 5.1, 4, 18) or being born anew or from above (Jn 3.3, 7), terms that stress the source of this new birth. In the other texts the terminology is more elastic, with the noun rebirth (παλιγγενεσία; Mt 19.28; Ti 3.5) or the verbs to regenerate (ἀναγεννᾶω; 1 Pt 1.3, 23) or to bring forth (ἀποκυέω; Jas 1.18) being employed to describe the total process. With the exception of Mt 19.28, which reflects Stoic terminology and refers primarily to the Jewish idea of the renewal of the cosmos in the age to come, all these passages describe a personal rebirth, the reception of a new, spiritual principle of life during the present physical existence. The rebirth concept is not found in the Synoptics, the closest contact being their insistence on the need for a conversion and beginning in life, becoming like a little child, in order to enter the kingdom (Mt 18.3; Mk 10.15). Nor does this notion occur in St. Paul, who remains within the Jewish framework of a general renewal. For him man has become a new creature (2 Cor 5.17; Gal 6.15); the Old Covenant has yielded to the New (2 Cor 3.6); the old man has been put off, the new put on (Col 3.9–10; Eph 4.24; cf. 2 Cor 4.16); all men are created a new man in Christ (Eph 2.10, 15).

In those passages in which this notion of a personal rebirth occurs, it has an eschatological content. The individual's new birth is brought about by God the Father (Jas 1.17–18; 1 Pt 1.3) through the Resurrection (1 Pt 1.3) or glorification of Christ (Jn 3.13–15; Ti 3.6), in the hope of salvation and eternal life (Ti 3.7) in the kingdom of God (Jn 3.3, 5). These are eschatological goods that, according to the “realized” aspect of Christian eschatology, are already present in Christ and His work. [See ESCHATOLOGY (IN THE BIBLE)]. Rebirth is therefore more than a conversion and new beginning; it is the attainment of a new life and salvation by the Christian. It is based on faith; it makes Christians the first fruits of God's creatures (Jas 1.18; cf. Ex 4.22) and the children of God (Jn 1.12–13). It is at present reality communicated to the Christian by the word of God (1 Pt 1.23) and the Spirit (Jn 3.5, 8), the principles of this new birth. The word is the revelation of God found in the gospel. It is planted as a seed in the human heart (Mk 4.1–20), where it remains and confers eternal life (Jn 6.63, 68). This develops the OT themes of the word of God as the law of God (Dt 29.28) put in the hearts of men (Dt 30.11–14; Jer 31.31–34) as a guide for their lives. It is the Wisdom of God (Wis 9.1–2) that itself is the law of God (Sir 15.1–10; 24.23–34); it is a source of life (Wis 7.12) and immortality (Wis 6.17–18; 8.13) to those who possess it. The Spirit is the life-giving power of God that is poured out upon the Christian community (Acts 1.8; 2.1–11). This suggests the OT themes of the Spirit as the principle of physical life (Gn 6.17; Jb 34.14–15) and eschatological life (Ez 11.19; 36.26; Is 32.15; Jl 3.1–2), as well as a means of understanding, interpreting, and expressing the Word in both the OT and the NT. It is at Baptism that the new life of the resurrected Christ is given (Rom 6.3–11) and that the Spirit is communicated to man (Mt 28.19; Acts 2.38), and so it is Baptism that is the moment of rebirth (Jn 3.5; Ti 3.5), the moment when the interacting Word and Spirit of God produce their effect.

Although the terminology used in these passages shows the influence of Greek thought, the ideas expressed are Christian. They develop themes found in the OT and are not merely borrowed from the Greco-Oriental MYSTERY RELIGIONS. This terminology was employed to explain to Gentile converts the true significance of the baptismal event.

See Also: BAPTISM (IN THE BIBLE).

Bibliography: J. DEY, Παλιγγενεσία (Münster 1937). R. REITZENSTEIN, Die Vorgeschichte der christlichen Taufe (Leipzig 1929) 103–126. E. SJÖBERG, “Wiedergeburt und Neuschöpfung im palästinischen Judentum,” Studia Theologica 4 (1950) 44–85; “Neuschöpfung in den Toten-Meer-Rollen,” ibid. 9 (1955) 131–136.

[S. PARSONS]

REBUSCHINI, ENRICO, BL.

Mystic, priest of the Order of Clerics Regular, Servants of the Sick (CAMILLIANS); b. Apr. 28, 1860, Grave-dona on Lake Como, Piedmont, Italy; d. May 10, 1938, Cremona, Lombardy, Italy. Although Enrico was born into a wealthy family, he was always sensitive to the needs of the poor. When his father opposed his priestly vocation, Enrico submitted. He enrolled at the University of Pavia, but found its anticlerical atmosphere intolerable. Remaining docile to his father’s wishes, Enrico entered military service, studied accounting, then joined his brother-in-law’s silk factory for two years. No longer able to dismiss his vocation, he attended the Pontifical Gregorian University at Rome until he fell gravely ill. Upon his recovery, he engaged in rigorous asceticism in order to give himself totally to God. He entered the Camillians, Servants of the Sick, at Verona (1887) and was ordained (1889) by the future Pope Saint PIUS X. He was the hospital chaplain at Verona (1891–99), then assigned to that position in Cremona. He administered the new clinic at Cremona (1903–37), and, for the last 11 years of his life, he was superior of the community. Pope John Paul II, who beatified Rebuschini on May 4, 1997, noted his “extraordinary love for the Eucharist and constant devotion to the sick and suffering” (beatification homily).

Bibliography: L. MIGLIOLI, Il messaggio d’amore di padre Enrico Rebuschini (Milan 1969). Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1997): 599. L’Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 29 (1995): 5.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

RECAPITULATION IN CHRIST

In profane usage recapitulation (Greek, ἀνακεφαλαίωσις; Latin, recirculatio) had the meaning, among other things, of a summary, a restatement of the main point, a repetition. St. Paul used the term of Christ in Eph 1.10: “This his good pleasure he [the Father] purposed in him [Christ] to be dispensed in the fullness of the times: to re-establish all things in Christ, both those in the heavens and those on the earth.” The cognate term head (Greek, κεφαλή; Latin, caput) occurs in the proximate context of Eph 1.22: “And all things he made subject under his feet, and him he gave as head over all the Church, which indeed is his body, the completion [πλήρωμα] of him who fills all with all.”

In Pauline theology recapitulation refers both to the headship of Christ over His body, the Church, and to the unity of all things, the whole cosmos, under Christ: the latter meaning being probably intended in reply to a Gnostic myth of a primitive first man, lord of creation (where κεφαλή was ἀρχή, power, as in Col 2.10).

St. Irenaeus. To St. Irenaeus (d. 202), more than to any other ancient author, belongs the credit for first developing in Christian theology the scriptural teaching of the recapitulation of all things in Christ. He enriched his Christology with various uses of recapitulation.

Historical Recapitulation. Historical recapitulation is the record of the interventions of the Incarnate Word for mankind. This is the salvation history outlook, where the coming of the Word is the last and supreme act of God, condensing all previous interventions. Christ gains salvation for all men (ἐν συντόμῳ). Irenaeus regarded all Biblical events from creation onward as “mysteries,” and this mystery-content in human history is centered and depends for its meaning on Christ. The primordial mysteries are repeated and fulfilled in Him. The fullness of the divinely decisive times is achieved in Christ. The three covenants with Adam, Noah, and Abraham are included and surpassed by the Word made man. Mankind was in its infancy in Adam; hence Christ came as an infant to gather the whole course of human history and raise it up to the vision of God. The faith that comes through Christ is a renewal of the faith of Abraham, Old Testament champion of faith.

Redemptive Recapitulation. The mystery of redemptive recapitulation for Irenaeus is not simply the repairing of a plan that had gone wrong in the fall of man. Even before the world began, all men and indeed all creation were preordained, predestined for the Incarnation of the Logos. In taking up again the substance of the first creation, Christ recreates, renews His creation. He came unto His own. As man He is not only head of the Church but also king of material creation and keystone of the universe. In place of the “earthly man,” Christ the “heavenly man” (1 Cor 15.47) has come to lead humanity back home and with mankind all the cosmos.

Primacy of Christ. The incarnate Word by His human existence reestablished His primacy over all visible beings, especially over men. He joined together again heaven and earth, invisible creation and men. The recapitulation of invisible creation (the angels) has been accomplished already, but the work of the Word, the extending of the primacy of Christ to all men, is an ongoing process of transformation. The recapitulation of man fallen in Adam is realized through renewal in grace and the final full restoration in the resurrection of the flesh (the concept of "recirculation" in Irenaeus). Only they achieve this goal who are one with Christ, the first-born from the dead (Col 1.18), i.e., only those who have followed Him in obedience.

Recapitulation in Irenaeus was part of a unified theological outlook that included likewise continuity (restoration) and transformation (perfection). Irenaeus is often regarded as an early example of the physical theory of redemption, which roots the mystery of redemption in the Incarnation, and his theology of recapitulation (new Adam, new head of humanity, etc.) is offered as evidence. In fact, the death of Christ in obedience is also a core part of Irenaeus's theory of recapitulation, as it is of his redemptive outlook.

Other Early Authors. Recapitulation is explained by other authors also: Hippolytus, Methodius, Athanasius, Hilary, Ambrose, and Augustine. Indeed the theme of recapitulation runs through almost all patristic attempts to explain the redemptive work of Christ; all men were present in the first Adam, all are present too, or can be, in the second Adam. Hippolytus teaches that the Word was born from the Virgin in order to restore and recapitulate in Himself the original Adam. Methodius takes up Irenaeus's recapitulation in attenuated form, to the neglect of the atoning death. Hilary combines the language of recapitulation with a strong stress on the voluntary sacrifice of Christ. St. Ambrose joins recapitulation to substitution: because He shares human nature, Christ can substitute for sinful men, undergo punishment in their place. Greek authors of the 5th century bring out realist theories of redemption in a recapitulation setting, e.g., Theodore of Mopsuestia.

Later Theology. In postpatristic thought the East remained aware of the relationship of the Logos to the cosmos. In the West the accent shifted from the work of Christ to His Person. A Christocentric recapitulation was not a significant concept in scholastic theology, in spite of such exceptions as St. Bernard, Richard of Saint-Victor, Eckhart, and Nicholas of Cusa. The deep piety toward Christ of post-Reformation saints and thinkers (Ignatius of Loyola, Teresa of Avila, John of the Cross, Pascal) had little effect on contemporary theology. Reformed theology did not concern itself with the recapitulation of all things in Christ as God's plan. In K. Barth, Protestant theology of the 20th century has been given a Christocentric emphasis. In recent Catholic thought, through investigation of the Scriptures and the Fathers, there has been an intense revival of interest in recapitulation.

The writings of Teilhard de Chardin are another factor in the reawakened interest in the recapitulation of the cosmos in Christ. It was the peculiar genius of de Chardin, "pilgrim of the future on my way back from a journey made entirely in the past" (as he wrote from China in 1923, where he was exploring traces of primitive man), to capture again the Christocentric concept of recapitulation and to restate it in keeping with the evolutionary dimensions of the universe in contemporary thought.

Bibliography: R. HAUBST, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 1:466-467. H. KÜNG, ibid. 2:1169-74. H. SCHLIER, "Kephale, Anakephalaioimai," G. KITTEL, theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935-) 3:681-682; Der Brief an die Epheser (3d ed. Düsseldorf 1962). J. I. HOCHBAN, "St. Irenaeus on the Atonement," Theological Studies 7 (1946) 525-557. J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster, Md. 1950-) v.1. L. S. THORNTON, "St. Irenaeus and Contemporary Theology," Studia patristica 2 (1957) 317-347. D. UNGER, "Christ's Role in the Universe according to St. Irenaeus," Franciscan Studies 26 (1945) 3-20, 114-137. P. TEILHARD DE CHARDIN, The Divine Milieu (New York 1960); The Phenomenon of Man, tr. B. WALL (New York 1959). C. F. MOONEY, "The Body of Christ in the Writings of Teilhard de Chardin," Theological Studies 25 (1964) 576-610; "Teilhard de Chardin and the Christological Problem," Harvard Theological Review 58 (1965) 91-126.

[E. R. CARROLL]

RÈCHE, JULES-NICOLAS, BL.

Known in religion as Brother Arnould (Arnold), religious of the Brothers of Christian Schools; b. Sept. 2, 1838, Landroff, Lorraine, France; d. Oct. 23, 1890, Rheims, France. Nicolas was the eldest of the eight surviving children of a cobbler, Claude Rèche, and his wife, Anne Clausset. He attended the village school for a few years until he was able to work in his father's shop and run errands to help support his family. When he was old enough to leave home, he worked as a coachman for a wealthy family in Raville-Fouigny, then as a teamster for the construction of Notre Dame Church at Charleville, where he became acquainted with the Brothers of the Christian Schools while attending evening classes. He entered the novitiate on Dec. 23, 1862, receiving the name Brother Arnould, and was solemnly professed in 1871. He taught at the boarding school in Rheims for 14 years, while continuing his own studies in theology, mathematics, science, and agriculture. Brother Arnould was awarded the Bronze Cross for the care he gave the sick and wounded of both sides during the Franco-Prussian War (1870). He was appointed novice master (1877) at Thillois, France, because of his exemplary conduct. He continued in this role when the novitiate was moved (1885) to Courlancy near Rheims. Arnould died soon after his appointment as director general of the formation center. His grave in the cemetery at Rheims became a pilgrimage site. Pope John Paul II beatified Brother Arnould on Nov. 1, 1987.

Feast: Oct. 23 (LaSallian Brothers).

Bibliography: C. LAPIERRE, Si le grain de blé: frère Arnould (Paris 1986). L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 47 (1987): 7–8.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

RECLUSE

Recluse, or an anchorite, or hermit, designates a religious-minded person who embraces the eremitical life in one of its most extreme forms, to retire as far as possible from human society. The earliest-known Christian recluses were the Fathers of the Egyptian desert who inhabited natural cells or abandoned tombs, or sometimes even open deserted areas, to achieve seclusion. Recluses of the Middle Ages often had themselves walled in cells; these were sometimes attached to churches and shrines. Their motive was to do penance and make reparation for sin but, above all, to achieve the greatest possible union with God through uninterrupted prayer.

Inclusion was perpetual, as in the case of St. Paul of THEBAÏD, or for certain long periods of time, as in the case of St. ANTHONY OF EGYPT. Since the life involved severe penances and grave spiritual difficulties, the Church began to regulate this type of asceticism by legislation in the seventh century and required at least previous training in a monastery. Recluses were to be found throughout the Christian world in early Christian and medieval times, but rarely since then. GREGORY OF TOURS describes recluses in Merovingian Gaul; and AELRED OF RIEVAULX wrote a rule for an anchoress in 12th-century England, as did also the anonymous author of the ANCRENE RIWLE (probably of the 13th century).

Bibliography: H. ROSWEYDE, ed., Vitae Patrum (Antwerp 1628) 157:626. J. CASSIAN, Conlationes, ed. M. PETSCHENIG in Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum (Vienna 1866–) 13; 1886. ATHANASIUS, The Life of Saint Anthony, ed. and tr. R. T. MEYER in Ancient Christian Writers, ed. J. QUASTEN et al. (Westminster, Md.–London 1946–) 10; 1950. GREGORY OF TOURS, De gloria confessorum; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 71:828–912. AELRED, De Vita eremitica; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 32:1451–74. J. MORTON, ed. and tr., The Ancren Riwle

(London 1853); The Nun's Rule: Being the Ancren Riwle Modernized (London 1905). J. BESSE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 1.1:1134–41. C. LIALINE, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932–) 4:936–953.

[M. C. MCCARTHY]

RECOLLECTION

A type of attention whereby the individual excludes voluntary distractions, internal and external, to concentrate all his powers on introspection. Although there are various types of natural recollection, in the spiritual life recollection signifies a concentration of one's powers on God or something related to God. It may be a transitory concentration or a habitual practice whereby the individual directs his faculties to God in order to live in the presence of God. Recollection refers also to one of the required dispositions for prayer or to certain species of prayer.

As a spiritual practice, to live in the presence of God or recollected in God consists in recalling as often as possible that God is present in all places and especially in souls in the state of grace; the former is a presence of immensity, and the latter is the indwelling of the Trinity. Two principal methods of rising this practice are to visualize God as seeing all things at every moment and of directing all things by His providence (this is greatly aided by the use of visual symbols such as crucifixes and paintings) and, second, to live with an awareness of God's presence in the soul, either by the presence of immensity or the indwelling through sanctifying grace. This recollection turns the soul inward, not to seek self, but to seek the God who dwells in the self. Such habitual recollection is a great aid in the practice of prayer, in motivating all one's actions supernaturally, and in overcoming temptations to sin.

As a required disposition for prayer, whether vocal or mental, recollection refers to the attention given to the words of the prayer, the meaning of the words, or the one to whom prayer is addressed (St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 83.13). Vocal prayer requires attention to the words spoken; meditation requires attention to the meaning of the words; all prayer requires attention to God, who is the one addressed in prayer. In the higher degrees of prayer there is little attention to words and meanings, but an absorbing recollection in God. Obstacles to recollection in prayer may proceed from a variety of causes: temperament, vivid imagination, weak powers of concentration, uncontrolled passions, sensate nature, physical or mental illness, bad habits, environmental factors, or even diabolical intervention. Moreover, the human mind is not capable of maintaining unwavering concentration over a long period of time.

The prayer of recollection is a special type of prayer classified by St. Teresa of Avila as acquired recollection and called by Bossuet the prayer of simplicity. Other authors refer to it as the prayer of simple gaze, of the presence of God, or the simple vision of faith. It is also called acquired contemplation, to signify that it is the highest degree of ascetical or active prayer and the bridge to mystical or passive prayer. Unlike meditation, which is discursive and intellectual, or affective prayer, which utilizes the will predominantly, acquired recollection is a simple loving gaze upon God or some mystery related to God, and all the powers are recollected in this unified activity.

The prayer of infused recollection, known also as infused contemplation, is the first degree of truly mystical prayer, which operates under the gifts of the Holy Spirit. It is a supernatural prayer that cannot be cultivated by one's own efforts, even with the help of ordinary grace, but is due to the intervention of God, who gathers the soul and all its faculties and concentrates them on Himself. It is accompanied by a sense of God's presence, a vivid illumination of the intellect, and a suspension of the lower powers. All the ascending degrees of mystical prayer are characterized by recollection and passivity. The prayer of infused recollection especially affects the intellect; the prayer of quiet engages the will; the prayer of union captivates all the internal faculties. In the prayer of simple union the external senses are still free; in the prayer of ecstatic union the external senses are recollected in God and withdrawn from their natural objects. The awareness of God's presence becomes so intense that the soul is led at last to the prayer of the transforming union or mystical marriage, which is the immediate disposition for the beatific vision.

Bibliography: A. ROYO, The Theology of Christian Perfection, ed. and tr. J. AUMANN (Dubuque 1962) 505–570. TERESA OF ÁVILA, The Way of Perfection, ch. 28–31; Interior Castle, 4th Mansions, 7th Mansions. J. G. ARINTERO, Stages in Prayer, tr. K. POND (St. Louis 1957). A. F. POULAIN, The Graces of Interior Prayer, tr. L. L. YORKE SMITH, ed. J. V. BAINVEL (St. Louis 1950). G. LERCARO, Methods of Mental Prayer, tr. T. F. LINDSAY (Westminster, Md. 1957).

[J. AUMANN]

RECONCILIATION, MINISTRY OF

The ministry of reconciliation is a phrase that summarizes the economy of salvation. God's design is a "coming from" and a "return" to him. The "let the world be" of creation is at the same time the "let God be all in all" of the eschaton. Salvation history is the story of God committing himself more and more deeply to his creation that it might achieve perfect reconciliation with him. At the center of this plan is the Incarnation. Jesus Christ is the completely comprehensive reality that embraces all of creation. All things achieve their purpose, their right ordering, by being ordered to the Incarnate Word who has become not simply part of creation, but its center (Eph 1.9–10). The "already" of the reconciliation accomplished by Christ must be balanced off by the "not yet" of his second coming. In the time between, the ministry of reconciliation continues and the Church exists as the Sacrament and agent of this redemptive work.

Objectives. The objective of this ministry is more than the juxtaposition of created realities in peaceful co-existence. Rather it is a radical and definitive reordering that can be accomplished only in Christ, the ontological principle of unity. Creatures are reconciled with one another because they are reconciled with God. Paul is clear on this point when writing to the quarrelsome Corinthians. In seeking their reconciliation with one another and with him, he asked that they participate more deeply in the profound reconciliation achieved by Christ (2 Cor 5.16–21).

Vatican Council II speaks of reconciliation in a variety of contexts (unity among Christians, peace among nations, sacrament of reconciliation) but the primary referent is always the fundamental reconciliation achieved by Christ. While it is fully achieved only in relationship to God, this cannot excuse Christians from dealing directly with one another in seeking unity. The commandments to love God and love neighbor are in fact one (Mt 22.34–40). The ministry of reconciliation, then, involves not only an individual's relationship to God, not only bringing others to him, but also the personal relationship with others.

Exercise of Reconciliation. God has taken the decisive initiative in exercising the ministry of reconciliation, and human efforts must always be seen as a participation in this. This means not only passive openness but a positive initiative toward reconciliation. In saying that we should leave our gift at the altar and first become reconciled, the Lord is talking about reconciliation with a person who has something against us (Mt 5.23–24). Christians are called upon to take the initiative in reaching out as salt, light, leaven, ministers of Christ's reconciliation to the world.

Full reconciliation will be achieved only in the Kingdom, but the call is to achieve partial realizations during this time between the Lord's first and second coming. Results may be incomplete and transitory, but they serve as anticipations of the Kingdom. The incomplete and imperfect nature of reconciliation during this present journeying raises a major difficulty. Reconciliation very often seems illogical, premature, prophetic. The logical inclination would be to wait until perfect at-one-ment is achieved, when all things will fit together as they should. Christ, however, called upon his followers to engage in this ministry now, to be forgiving, to build peace and unity even in this imperfect state (contrast the attitude of the brother of the prodigal son). The first Eucharistic Prayer for Masses of Reconciliation carries the reminder that now is the time of reconciliation.

Ministry of the Community. Christian communities, as communities, exercise a ministry of reconciliation partly by being a sign and foreshadowing of the unity of the Kingdom. That is why the current disunity among Christians presents such a monumental problem. Called to be a sign of reconciliation, Christianity has made the world spectator to its own divisions for nearly the last millennium. Given the central place of the ministry of reconciliation, the unity of Christians has to count as one of the highest priorities. Ecumenical developments hold promise. Yet, while interdenominational unity appears to be increasing, intradenominational unity is becoming a serious concern. Disunity is not to be confused with healthy diversity and plurality which actually serve to enhance unity; Christian communities are experiencing fragmentation and polarization at various levels.

These problems have to be taken as seriously as Paul took them at Corinth. The Christian community exercises its ministry of reconciliation most forcefully when its unity has no apparent reason other than Christ, when people worship together celebrating bonds of oneness that go deeper than the differences that normally keep people at odds—differing political views, race, culture, prejudice.

The Ordained Ministry. The ministry of reconciliation exercised by public ministers in the Church brings with it additional considerations. The public minister is called upon to forego certain rights as an individual Christian in order to serve the wider community. The attitude of the Apostle Paul must prevail—the attempt to be all things to all people. This is not to be taken in the sense of having all the answers or holding all the resources, but precisely in the sense of serving the cause of unity. “I became like a Jew to the Jews. . . . To those bound by the law I became like one who is bound. . . . To those not subject to the law I became like one not subject to it. . . . To the weak I became a weak person . . .” (1 Cor 9.20–22).

In its Decree on the Ministry and Life of Priests Vatican Council II says that, in the interest of building the Christian community, priests are never to put themselves at the service of any ideology or human faction (Presbyterorum ordinis 6). The 1971 Synod of Bishops, in its document on the Ministerial Priesthood makes a similar point in reference to political involvement: “But since political options are by nature contingent and never in an entirely adequate and perennial way interpret the Gospel, the priest, who is the witness of things to come, must keep a certain distance from any political office or involvement” (Synod MinPr p. 21).

This “certain distance” from causes that can interfere with the ministry of reconciliation presents various problems. On the one hand, true peace requires justice and development (Paul VI PopProgr 87) and the Church cannot remain silent or removed from all issues. On the other hand the Church cannot claim competence in all secular affairs and specific solutions should not be confused with the Gospel message (Gaudium et spes 54, cf. Synod JustWorld pp. 42–43). In this matter one has but to recall how the Church, at the time of the Reformation, was closely allied with national and political interests, and the effects that this had.

The Church must be conscious of her distinctive role as a reconciler, i.e. ministering a gift that goes much deeper than practical solutions. It is often when the Church is least of the world that it can do most for the world. This must always be motivated not by the self-interest of the Church, but rather in the interests of placing itself more fully at the service of the world in the ministry of reconciliation.

Bibliography: J.-F. COLLANGE, “Appel à la réconciliation,” Énigmes de la deuxième Épître aux Corinthiens (Cambridge 1972) 18:226–80. Y. M.-J. CONGAR, Sainte Église (Paris 1964). R. COSTE, “Le prêtre et la politique,” Nouvelle revue théologique 94 (1972) 912–32. Pro Mundi Vita. New Forms of Ministries in Christian Communities Bulletin 50, (Brussels 1974). PAUL VI, On Reconciliation. Apostolic Exhortation, Paterna cum benevolentia, Dec. 8, 1974 (USCC Publ. Office, Washington, D.C. n.d.).

[K. UNTENER]

RECTOR POTENS, VERAX DEUS

The office hymn that was traditionally prescribed for Sext in the Roman BREVIARY. Its authorship is usually ascribed to St. AMBROSE. It resembles his acknowledged hymns in that it is strictly quantitative, in iambic dimeter, and yet has a well-marked rhythm based on accent. It is found in many of the Ambrosian MSS; it is acknowledged as genuine by Biraghi and is included by Dreves in his list of 18 authentic hymns of Ambrose. However, Walpole defends it as not unworthy of Ambrose in thought and expression, arguing that its brevity (two stanzas instead of the eight usual in the hymns of Ambrose) is evidence against its genuineness. The fact that it is not included in the lists of CAESARIUS OF ARLES and of AURELIAN OF RÉOMÉ or in the MSS of the early hymnaries also militates against Ambrose's authorship. This hymn seems to be by the same author as the Nunc sancte nobis Spiritus (Terce) and the RERUM DEUS TENAX VIGOR (None). Of these three, Raby states that if Ambrose did not compose them, they are the work of a poet of equal genius. Szövérfy, however, feels that Simonetti's dictum that no evidence exists for Ambrosian authorship is not sufficiently supported. Rector potens, sung about noon, invokes God as the mover of day in its course and the source of the changes in nature. Referring to the noonday heat, it asks God to quench the fires of strife and the heat of our passions and to grant us bodily health and peace of heart.

Bibliography: G. M. DREVES, Aurelius, Ambrosius, "Der Vater des Kirchengesanges" (St. Louis 1893). J. JULIAN, ed., A Dictionary of Hymnology (New York 1957) 953. J. MEARNES, Early Latin Hymnaries (Cambridge, Eng. 1913) 72. M. BRITT, ed., The Hymns of the Breviary and Missal (new ed. New York 1948). A. S. WALPOLE, ed., Early Latin Hymns (Cambridge, Eng. 1922) 21–26, 110–111. M. SIMONETTI, "Studi sull'innologia popolare cristiana dei primi secoli," Atti d. Accad. nazionale dei Lincei: Memorie 4 (1952) 341–484. F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (Oxford 1953) 32–44. J. CONNELLY, Hymns of the Roman Liturgy (Westminster MD 1957) 32–33. J. SZÖVÉRFY, Die Annalen der lateinischen Hymndichtung (Berlin 1964–65) 1:51, 214.

[A. J. KINNIREY]

RECTORS

The appointment, functions and removal of rectors are determined by the law for each of the several types of rector.

Rectors of Churches. Rectors of churches are priests who have charge of churches that are neither parochial nor capitular nor annexed to the house of a religious community or society of apostolic life (Codex iuris canonici c., 556; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientantium c., 304). In the case where one has the right according to law to present or elect the rector, the diocesan bishop's approval must be secured. This approval is necessary even if the church belongs to an exempt religious institute. If the Church is connected with a seminary or college under the care of clerics, the superior of the seminary or college is the rector of the church, unless the diocesan bishop makes other provisions (CIC c., 557 §3; CCEO c., 305 §3).

Functions reserved to pastors (CIC c., 530; CCEO c., 290 §2) may not be performed by the rector of a church (CIC c., 558; CCEO c., 306 §1). However, he may celebrate divine services solemnly in his church in accordance with the terms of the legal foundations and without prejudice to parochial rights (CIC c., 559; CCEO c., 306 §2). He possesses the right to give permission to say Mass there, to administer the Sacraments and to perform other sacred functions according to law. The rector is responsible, under the authority of the local ordinary, for the administration of the property of the church, as well as for its maintenance (CIC c., 562; CCEO c., 309). In certain circumstances, the local ordinary may regulate the hours of divine services in the church and he may also require the rector to celebrate certain functions in his church and to make the church available for use by certain persons or groups (CIC c., 560; CCEO c., 307).

The rector may be removed for a just cause. If the rector is a religious, the provision of CIC c., 682 §2 or CCEO c., 1391 §2 is to be applied (CIC c., 563; CCEO c., 310).

Rectors of Seminaries. The rector of a seminary is the immediate representative of the diocesan bishop in the internal government and supervision of the diocesan seminary. The rector is appointed by the diocesan bishop and he may be removed by him.

By virtue of the exemption of the seminary from parochial jurisdiction (CIC c., 262; CCEO c., 336 §2), the rector possesses all the rights of a pastor over those who dwell therein, with the exception of certain restrictions concerning Matrimony and Penance. Only a local ordinary, the pastor of the local parish or his delegate can validly assist at marriages there, and the rector may hear the confessions of his students only when they seek him out for that purpose and freely request it in particular cases (CIC c., 985; CCEO c., 734 §3). He can dispense from the laws of fast and abstinence and from feasts of obligation (CIC c., 1245). The rector also enjoys the right to attend the diocesan synods (CIC c., 463 §1, 6°; CCEO c., 238 §1, 4°).

Rectors of Universities. To qualify as a Catholic university, the institution must be approved by competent ecclesiastical authority (CIC c., 808; CCEO c., 642 §1). Ecclesiastical universities are established through erection by the Holy See or with its approval (CIC c., 816 §1; CCEO c., 649). In the Latin Church, rectors of Catholic and ecclesiastical universities are called to particular councils and have a consultative vote in them (CIC c., 443 §3, 3°).

Bibliography: J. ABBO and J. HANNAN, The Sacred Canons, 2 v. (2d ed. St. Louis 1960) 1:358, 479–486; 2:891, 1368. J. B. COX, The Administration of Seminaries (Catholic University of America Canon Law Studies, 67; Washington 1931). J. J. MARKHAM, The Sacred Congregation of Seminaries and Universities of Studies (Catholic University of America Canon Law Studies, 384; Washington 1957). Codex iuris canonici (Rome 1918; repr. Graz 1955).

[R. J. MURPHY]

RECUSANT

A term coming to mean, in the course of Elizabeth I's reign, a person who refused (Lat. recusare) to attend the services of the Established Church, as commanded by the 1559 Uniformity Act, reinforced by later statutes. The penalty for absence, originally twelvepence for each offense, was increased in 1581 to 20 pounds per lunar month, while later acts empowered the monarch to seize a recusant's goods and two-thirds of his lands in lieu of the fine. Recusants might be prosecuted in both civil and ecclesiastical courts and, if convicted, became liable not only to financial penalties but to expulsion from London, restriction to their own dwelling-places, and excommunication (possibly involving loss of civil rights and refusal of burial). Names of convicted recusants, fined by the county sheriffs, occur first in the Pipe Rolls and then, from 1592 to 1691, in a separate series of Recusant Rolls. Acts of 1593 (35 Eliz. I, cap. 1, 2) distinguish popish from Protestant recusants, but the Rolls rarely indicate religious allegiance and include numerous Protestants, especially in Charles II's reign. The Rolls record fines and forfeitures owed by convicted recusants, not sums paid. Of those convicted, only a very small minority were fully penalized, and many recusants escaped conviction altogether (e.g., because in the initial reports their periods of absence from church were altered to less than four weeks). In 1689 (1 Wm. and Mary, sess. 1, cap. 8, 15) those refusing the oaths of allegiance and supremacy and the Test declaration of 1678 (for wording, see ROYAL DECLARATION) were deemed guilty of "constructive recusancy" and from 1693 onward such persons might be punished by a double land tax, which in practice was exacted only spasmodically, while (by 12 Anne, st. 2, cap. 14) the concept of constructive recusancy was widened to embrace "every Papist or Person making Profession of the Popish Religion." The offense of recusancy was abolished by the Catholic Relief Act of 1791.

Bibliography: M. D. R. LEYS, Catholics in England, 1559–1829: A Social History (London 1961). E. I. WATKIN, Roman Catholicism in England. . . (New York 1957). A. O. MEYER, England and the Catholic Church under Queen Elizabeth, tr. J. R. MCKEE (London 1916). W. R. TRIMBLE, The Catholic Laity in Elizabethan England, 1558–1603 (Cambridge, Mass. 1964). M. J. HAVRAN, The Catholics in Caroline England (Stanford, Calif. 1962). The increasing study of recusancy at the local level is exemplified in H. AVELING, Post-Reformation Catholicism in East Yorkshire (York 1960), and J. A. WILLIAMS, Bath and Rome: the Living Link (Bath 1963). H. BOWLER, "Intro.," in Publications of the Catholic Record Society, v. 57 (1965). J. A. WILLIAMS, "Recusant Rolls," History (1965), in ser. "Short Guides to Records." See also Recusant History (1951—), a journal devoted exclusively to English Recusant history.

[J. A. WILLIAMS]

RECUSANT LITERATURE

Though technically the term "recusant" applied to all who, contrary to the Act of Uniformity of 1559, refused to attend Anglican services (see RECUSANTS), recusant literature is a convenient term covering religious works by English Catholics in penal times. This literature stems from the late medieval and early Tudor religious writers, but increasingly reflects contemporary trends, particularly in Italian and Spanish devotional works, thus acting as a medium for their transmission to the main body of English literature. The highest point in quality and quantity of recusant literature was the late Elizabethan period, when such writings shared in the general richness and variety characteristic of the age and responded with a frequency and force to match the intensity of persecution and controversy. Then came a gradual decline common to all religious writing, the nadir being reached in the 18th century; and it did not receive a fresh impetus until after the Emancipation Act of 1829, the indirect effect of the OXFORD MOVEMENT, and the general Catholic revival. This falling off was mainly the result of Catholics' becoming an underprivileged minority with a weakening cultural tradition and few educational opportunities; and while those who were exiles could obtain a thorough academic training, they tended to lose touch with English thought and idiom. Thus, some of the best writers were converts (permanent or otherwise), such as William Alabaster (1567–1640), Richard Crashaw, and John Dryden, and it was on converts that the literary movement of the "second spring" was mainly dependent.

Publishing Difficulties. In assessing the achievements of recusant writers, it should be remembered that until well into the 17th century a large number of their works were composed in Latin, or if expressly aimed at Continental readers, in one of the European languages. Further, the imperfections sometimes found in their compositions may be attributable not to lack of ability but to necessary haste or the adverse conditions under which most recusant books were printed. Analysis is further complicated because many works are anonymous (mainly for reasons of security) or of composite authorship.

Despite the difficulties in publishing recusant works in the early period owing to lack of funds and the rigorous legislation of the English government, more than 250 books in English alone were printed during the reign of Elizabeth I, some on secret presses at home, but most of them abroad, especially in France and the Low Countries, generally by foreign printers, though sometimes under English supervision. They were then dispatched to the main centers of English Catholic life on the Continent and smuggled into England. Distribution was fairly successful, important polemic and devotional works being eagerly sought after by Protestants as well.

The leading English Catholics, especially Cardinal William ALLEN, Thomas STAPLETON, and Gregory MARTIN, were acutely aware of the value of the written word as a weapon of Catholic action and were themselves among the chief and most successful writers. The Jesuits, however, explored the different fields with the greatest concentration and effect, the foremost being Robert PERSONS, Robert SOUTHWELL, Henry GARNET, and Edmund CAMPION.

Prose Writings. Recusant prose grew and withered with its counterparts in other fields of English. Basically, it derived many of its characteristics from Thomas MORE: its fullness of vocabulary, its relatively plain style, some of its graphic description, its cogency and occasional sleight of hand in argument; but it lacked More's deep sense of humor, and at best rose only to a blatant irony in polemic. For all its virtues, it cannot be claimed as the only true mainstream of English prose between More and Dryden (J. S. Philimore's theory, Dublin Review, 1913, which held currency until very recently), nor can More be accorded the sole paternity of modern English [as R. W. Chambers implied in The Place of St. Thomas More in English Literature and History (London 1937) and in On the Continuity of English Prose (London 1932)].

Early Apologetic Prose. The early phase of recusant prose, mainly apologetic in scope, is characterized by the Louvain group of theologians, chief among them being Thomas Harding, John RASTELL, Thomas Stapleton, and Nicholas SANDER, all of whom participated in the "Great Controversy," a 64-book saga occasioned by Bishop John JEWEL's "Challenge Sermon" of 1559. They all show great intellectual power and scholarship in a style that is formal, lucid, and relatively simple, with a tendency to balanced sentences and syllogisms, especially in the work of Harding, the most distinguished of the group, whom the poet Gabriel Harvey praised as a "thunder and lightning orator in divinity." By the 1580s prose style became infinitely more varied, animated, and vigorous, losing much of its academic rigor in its calculated appeal to the general reader. In the best writers, especially Persons and Southwell, there was a successful blend of native and classical elements in language, syntax, and allusion, but subject matter was never buried by excessive euphuism. The new vigorousness of style resulted partly from a more conversational if not colloquial diction, but it was reinforced also by a vehemence of fury in the face of political and religious oppression. At best, as in Southwell's Humble Supplication (1595), this style has an overpowering cogency, but it can degenerate into a torrent of invective in which no adjective is too base for inclusion, as sometimes happened in the controversies between the secular clergy and the Jesuits, especially in the pamphlets of Antony Copley (see ARCHPRIEST CONTROVERSY; BLACKWELL, GEORGE).

Marked contrasts in this period are to be found not only between, for example, the almost frigidly formal style of Garnet and the vigorous, though rhythmically harsh writing of Campion, but also within a single writer, who might follow a quietly eloquent preface to the "Catholic reader" with an intemperate tirade against the object of his particular aversion. Perhaps the most marked contrasts are to be found in the works of Cardinal Allen, if one compares the graceful and controlled True, Sincere and Modest Defence (1584) with the violent Admonition to the Nobility and People of England (1588). Persons towers above the rest as the most prolific and versatile writer, equally at home in polemic and devotional writing, and, though he lacks geniality, he has many other gifts: clarity, flexibility, conversational ease, and a timelessness justly praised by Swift [Tatler, No. 230 (1710)].

The Rheims New Testament and Devotional Writing. The great achievement of the early period was the Rheims translation of the New Testament (1582) effected mainly by Gregory Martin, and followed by the complete Bible in 1609. Despite its numerous unnatural Latinisms, which resulted from following the Vulgate too literally, it has a fine feeling for phrases and cadences, and was used as a source for nearly 3,000 readings in the Authorized Version (1611).

Whereas until the New Testament was published writers were fully engaged in burning controversies on the origins of the Church in England, the political position of Catholics, the persecution of missionary priests and similar issues, devotional works now made their appearance and soon dominated and renewed the life of recusant prose, while controversial works began to lose their directness and relevance and became clumsy and desiccated in style; there were a few notable exceptions, such as the graceful and penetrating works of Edmund Lechmere (d. c. 1640). The two main types of devotional literature were: first, translations of new and traditional prayers and meditations, including the popular Manual compiled by George Flinton (1583), the Jesus Psalter (1575), and the Primer or Office of the Blessed Virgin published by Richard VERSTEGAN in 1599 and often reprinted until the 18th century; and second, treatises on how to live a good Christian life, among them numerous translations of the IMITATION OF CHRIST, and the writings of Spanish mystics, such as LOUIS OF GRANADA, Diego de Estella, and Gaspar Loarte. Such works were to have a marked influence on English literature, especially because the Protestants, having little similar literature, were heavily dependent on them. The most influential of the English devotional treatises was Persons's Christian Directory (originally published as The First Booke of Christian Exercise, 1582). Based on the Ignatian prayer of self-surrender, it derived much of its material from Loarte and Louis of Granada, but is less baroque and shows affinities with the medieval tradition of ROLLE and HILTON. Skillfully integrated, with a perfect balance of intellectual and emotional appeal, the work proved so popular that it was pirated by the Protestant divine, Edmund Bunny, while writers as diverse as Robert Greene and Richard Baxter bore testimony to its influence.

Southwell also exerted influence, for through his baroque Marie Magdalen's Funeral Teares (which ran to at least 20 editions) and his penitential poems, he introduced from the Continent the post-Tridentine literature of tears and linked the English elegiac temperament to a religious theme. Thomas Nashe and Thomas Lodge are among those who immediately reflect his influence. Other leading devotional writers are the versatile Sir Tobie Matthew (1577–1655), author of two fine original works and nine masterly translations, including that of the Confessions of Saint Augustine, and the two mystics, Benet Canfield, who, in the tradition of Hilton, used a very fundamental and abstract approach, and his disciple, David Augustine BAKER, whose voluminous works combine boundless aspiration for union with God with a sober, practical sense.

Effective prose writers from the late 17th century onward are scarce, the most distinguished being Richard CHALLONER. His devotional works (e.g., Garden of the Soul), with their deep, unostentatious spirituality, long set the pattern for English devotional reading; his other achievements include a competent revision of the Douay-Rheims Bible and the remarkably acute and accurate Memoirs of English Missionary Priests (1741–42). Able controversialists include John Gother, highly praised by Dryden and Butler; Robert Manning, a learned, fair-minded, and fluent writer; and Joseph and Simon Berington, the former having a particularly vigorous and sustained style. There were also two notable historians: the lively but prejudiced Charles Dodd and the scrupulously fair and objective John LINGARD.

Poetry. Much recusant poetry is mediocre and anonymous, scattered in commonplace books. It is devotional in character, and when it deals in apologetics, it normally fails (as in Miles Hoggard's works); the notable exception is Dryden's controlled and artistic Hind and the Panther (1687). The chief theme of the early period was the traditional de contemptu mundi, though usually with a greater emphasis on the joys of heaven than in the medieval period ("Jerusalem, my happy home" being a classic example). Combined with this was the theme of penitence, generally based on the subject of Mary Magdalen or Saint Peter as a starting point for meditations (as in Southwell and Richard Verstegan). While Marian devotion is strongly represented (e.g., in Henry WALPOLE, John Brerely, and Crashaw), Christ dominates, especially in the early 17th century, when particular emphasis was placed upon His Passion—a highly relevant theme in time of fierce persecution. There were also a large number of poems on individual saints, normally grouped in a collection of sonnets (e.g., in William Alabaster, Henry Constable, and Tobie Matthew).

Recusant verse began in a plain native tradition, with a simple, forceful diction but also a rhythmical clumsiness that makes the lyrics seem heavy compared with those of the 15th century. It is at its best in the poems of Thomas More and Thomas Vaux, and in the ballads on stirring subjects such as the PILGRIMAGE OF GRACE and, later, the martyrdom of Campion. The clumsiness, the jog-trot iambic regularity, and the excessive alliteration did not materially, alter until Southwell, Constable, and Alabaster instilled a more classical smoothness, and introduced Petrarchan and baroque elements, especially the conceits. Despite a seeming artificiality, Southwell used language in a highly emotive way particularly fitted to his method of meditation. Typical of his style is The Burning Babe, a poem much admired by Ben Jonson, but the most influential of his meditative poems is the frequently imitated St. Peter's Complaint (1595). Though they employed secular elements, Southwell and his contemporaries strongly believed that poetry should be used only for religious subjects, a feeling echoed by Alabaster and Constable, who signified their change of heart in spiritual sonnets, Alabaster's being founded on scriptural tradition, Constable's based on Tansillo, Tasso, and Jacque de Billy.

Southwell's influence pervaded much of 17th-century religious verse, particularly that of Crashaw, who was, however, even more exuberant in his use of language. Though a poet in his own right, Crashaw was highly derivative; for example, he borrowed from FRANCIS DE SALES, especially from the Treatise on the Love of God, echoing it not only in general spirit but also in the use of metaphor and in the technique of associating the spiritual with everyday life. Apart from the emblematic work of Henry Hawkins, Parthenia Sacra, there was little else of distinction in the 17th century, and the 18th century was in general as barren of good religious verse as of love poetry. The main literary form became the hymn (among the best settings being the translations of Dryden), and it was not until Gerard Manley HOPKINS that a truly great Catholic religious poet again emerged.

Drama and Novel. Recusant literature has practically no drama, for even in the 17th century, when there was a distinguished group of Catholic dramatists, only a handful of plays reflected pronounced Catholic sympathies: Philip Massinger's Virgin Martyr (1622) and The Renegade, which has a Jesuit as a leading character and deals with Penance and baptismal regeneration; and James Shirley's Grateful Servant, which glorifies the Benedictine Order, and his St. Patrick for Ireland. The novel made a tentative Catholic start with Eliza Inchbald's A Simple Story (1791) and Henry Digby Beste's Four Years in France (1826), but it is largely out of the Oxford Movement controversies that the Catholic novel and the new Catholic literature in general developed. This development was stimulated mainly by the work of John Henry NEWMAN.

Bibliography: A. F. ALLISON and D. M. ROGERS, A Catalogue of Catholic Books in English . . . 1558–1640, 2 v. (London 1956). J. B. COLLINS, Christian Mysticism in the Elizabethan Age (Baltimore 1940). J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time, 5 v. (London-New York 1885–1902; repr. New York 1961). L. I. GUINEY and G. BLISS, eds., Recusant Poets (New York 1939). M. HAGEDORN, Reformation und spanische Andachtsliteratur (Leipzig 1934). E. HUTTON, Catholicism and English Literature (London 1942). P. JANELLE, Robert Southwell, the Writer (New York 1935). L. L. MARTZ, The Poetry of Meditation (New Haven 1954; repr. pa. 1962). H. E. ROLLINS, ed., Old English Ballads: 1553–1625 (Cambridge, Eng. 1920). O. SHIPLEY, ed., Carmina Mariana, 1st series (London 1893), 2d series (London 1902). A. C. SOUTHERN, Elizabethan Recusant Prose, 1559–1582 (London 1950). A. WARREN, Richard Crashaw (repr. pa. Ann Arbor 1957). P. CARAMAN, ed., The Other Face (New York 1960).

[A. G. PETTI]

RED MASS

The solemn votive Mass in honor of the Holy Spirit, celebrated annually at the opening of the judicial year. Judges and lawyers attend in a body, joined by public officials and law faculty members. Although this Mass is used at the opening of legislative assemblies and school terms, indications suggest it was first associated with the law profession, and the appellation Red Mass customarily refers to the Mass initiating the legal year.

This venerable custom originated in Europe in the 13th century. From the time of Edward I the Mass was offered at Westminster Abbey at the opening of Michaelmas term. It received its name from the fact that the celebrant was vested in red and the Lord High Justices were robed in a brilliant scarlet. They were joined by the university professors, the doctors among them displaying red in their academic gowns.

Celebrating Red Mass in Westminster Cathedral. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

In France the inauguration of the judicial year was celebrated annually at the famous Sainte-Chapelle. Although the chapel was desecrated during the French Revolution, it was restored by Louis Philippe and dedicated exclusively to the use of the Messe Rouge. In 1906 the Parlement secularized the Chapelle and the celebration of Red Mass was transferred to Saint-Germain-l'Auxerrois.

The Red Mass has also been traditionally identified with the opening of the Sacred Roman Rota, the supreme judicial body of the Catholic Church.

The inauguration of the Red Mass in the United States occurred in New York City on Oct. 6, 1928. This Mass was celebrated at old St. Andrew's Church on Duane Street with Cardinal Patrick Hayes presiding. Other localities followed, e.g., Boston, Chicago, New Orleans, San Francisco, and Washington, DC. In the U.S. not only Catholic but also Protestant and Jewish members of the judiciary and the legal profession attend the Mass.

The Red Mass is offered to invoke divine guidance and strength during the coming term of court. It is celebrated in honor of the Holy Spirit as the source of wisdom, understanding, counsel, and fortitude, gifts which must shine forth preeminently in the dispensing of justice in the courtroom as well as in the individual lawyer's office.

Bibliography: E. R. TIEDEBOHL, "The Red Mass: A Legal and Judicial Tradition," University of Detroit Law Journal 18 (1954) 59–62; "The Votive Mass of the Holy Spirit," Catholic Lawyer 1 (1955) 215–216, 253; "Background of the Red Mass," Ave Maria NS 72 (Oct. 21, 1950) 519–523. H. C. WATTS, "The Red Mass for Judges and Lawyers," America 67 (Oct. 3, 1942) 712–713.

[L. J. HIEGEL/EDS.]

RED SEA

In Greek and Roman times, the Red Sea was located at the northwestern reaches of the Indian Ocean including the Persian and Arabian gulfs. The origin of the term (Heb. yam sūp, "Sea of Rushes"; in the Septuagint, ἡ ἐρυθρὰ θάλασσα, "the Red Sea") is obscure. A plausible suggestion maintains that it was derived from the reddish corals that line the sea's bottom and are visible from its shores.

In the Old Testament the term Sea of Rushes refers to either of the two narrow arms of the Arabian Gulf that embrace the eastern and western shores of the Sinai peninsula, whose modern names are the Gulfs of Aqaba and Suez. In 1 Kgs 9.26 it denotes the Gulf of Aqaba, whence Solomon's ships embarked; probably it has this denotation also in Jgs 11.16. In Ex 10.19, where the locusts are carried into this sea by the west wind, it seems to mean some swampy part of the Suez isthmus, a meaning also likely in Ex 13.18; 15.4, 22. The earliest tradition probably referred to a lake or bay full of reeds, but the later Greek translators understood the Sea of Rushes to be a branch of the Red Sea that was familiar to them.

Exodus does not refer to the Gulf of Suez itself, whose water was as deep then as it is now. What the Israelites crossed was very likely a shallow body of water, a marshy, southern bay of Lake Menzaleh or the northern tip of Lake Timsah. The earliest account of the crossing of the sea, found in the YAHWIST tradition, says that Yahweh caused the sea to recede by a strong east wind—the extremely hot desert wind, the sirocco—which blew all night and dried up the marsh. The chariot wheels of the Egyptians became clogged in the mud, and pursuit of the Israelites, who were afoot, became impossible. By morning, when the wind abated, the waters flowed back to their normal depth. Seeing this marvel, the Egyptians fled, finally convinced that Yahweh was fighting for Israel (Ex 14.21b, 24–25, 27b).

Today the term Red Sea usually signifies the main part of the gulf of the Indian Ocean that separates Africa from Arabia, extending from the Straits of Aden to the Sinai Peninsula and now joined to the Mediterranean by the Suez Canal.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek, 2004–05. A. LUCAS, The Route of the Exodus of the Israelites from Egypt (New York 1938).

[M. J. HUNT]

REDEMPTION (IN THE BIBLE)

The English word “redemption” comes from the Latin redemptio (derived from the verb redemere, to buy back) and signifies literally the process of buying back, liberating by payment of a price or ransom. This article is concerned mainly with the Redemption of humankind wrought by God in Jesus Christ, as set forth in the NT; however, because the “buying back” or “ransoming” involved in the literal meaning of the word can be only an image, it is necessary to investigate the whole background of the concept in the OT in order to arrive at an understanding of the reality that lies behind the image.

The process of redeeming or ransoming was, in the first place, a human act that came to be applied, later, to the dealings of God with humans. This article, therefore, investigates first the biblical concept of redemption as a human act, then redemption attributed to God in the OT, and finally the redemptive work of God in Jesus Christ in the NT. In the first and second sections, the emphasis rests on the development of Hebrew thought that lies behind the NT terms and ideas, for that is where they took their origin; but attention is given also to the Greek words by which Hebrew terms were translated in the Septuagint (LXX), because the usage in the LXX determined to some extent the content of the terms as they were understood by the NT writers.

Human Redemption

The OT concepts of ransom and redemption rest partly on legal, social, and religious customs that are not found in modern cultures. Therefore, only by an investigation of these customs is it possible to arrive at an understanding of what redemption means when transferred to other spheres. With a human as the acting subject, there is reference to redemption or ransom of people from death and slavery, of animals from death, and of property from the possession of another. The Hebrew roots most frequently used are pdh, g'l, and kpr. Because of their significance for this study and because they have different shades of meaning, each of these roots is discussed separately.

The root pdh. The verb pādâ is a legal term in which the accent lies upon an actual substitution for the person or animal delivered; the substitution may be either money or another animal. The object to be redeemed is always a living being, and in almost all cases it would be put to death (at least in theory) if it were not redeemed; the only exceptions to this would seem to be in Jb 6.23; Lv 19.20; and Ex 21.8. An important use of this verb is in the legislation concerning the first-born.

Every first-born male, whether of man or of beast, belonged to Yahweh. In theory, all were to be given to Yahweh by sacrifice; this did, in fact, happen in the case of ritually clean animals, but human first-born and the first-born of ritually unclean animals were to be redeemed (Ex 13.13; 34.20; Nm 18.15–16). In redeeming a first-born son, originally an animal was substituted; later a fixed sum of money was to be paid (Nm 18.16). The firstborn of unclean animals, since they were not acceptable for sacrifice, were either redeemed by the substitution of a sacrificial animal or simply slain (Ex 13.13; 34.20; Nm 18.15).

A person or animal could also become liable to death by sacrifice through being vowed to the Lord. The Mosaic Law did not permit the redemption of persons or clean animals so dedicated, but unclean animals could be redeemed by paying one-fifth more than their value (Lv 27.26–29). A somewhat similar case is described in 1 Sm 14.24–45: Saul laid a curse upon anyone who should eat on the day of a particular battle; and when he learned that his son Jonathan (ignorant of the curse Saul had pronounced) had, in fact, eaten, he bound himself by an oath to put him to death. The people, however, intervened and “ransomed” [pādâ] Jonathan, possibly by substituting an animal (or, less probably, another person) in his place.

Also of interest is a Ps text that says that no person can redeem himself. The context indicates that it would be a question of saving one’s life by paying a ransom to God—something not even the richest would be able to do [Ps 48(49).7–10].

Of the derivatives of pādâ the ones of special interest are peḏūyīm, pidyôm, and pidyôn, substantives that signify money paid in ransom; here, too, the one ransomed is regularly delivered, in theory at least, from death. In Nm 18.16 peḏūyīm designates the money paid to redeem a first-born. It is used in the same sense in Nm 3.46–51, where it is said that Yahweh will take for His service the whole tribe of Levi instead of demanding the Israelite first-born; since, however, the number of the first-born exceeds the number of Levites, a price must be paid to ransom the additional ones. The term pidyôn is used in Ex 21.30, where legislation is given concerning the punishment meted out to the negligent owner of an ox that habitually gores people; normally such an owner would be put to death; “If, however, a fine [kōper] is imposed upon him, he must pay in ransom [pidyōn] for his life whatever amount is imposed on him.” In Ps 48(49).9 the term is used of the price necessary (too high for anyone to pay) to redeem one’s life.

The verb pādā and the substantives discussed, when they refer to human activity, are usually translated in the LXX by λυτρόω or λύτρον. The substantive λύτρον is derived from the verb λύω, to loose, and designates that which must be paid in order to deliver a prisoner, i.e., ransom; it is normally used in the plural. From λύτρον is derived, in turn, the verb λυτρόω, to hold for ransom, to release upon payment of ransom. In both the LXX and the NT, it is regularly employed in the middle voice; in this voice, the basic meaning is to obtain release by the payment of ransom, though it will be seen that other meanings are derived from the basic one. The substantive λύτρωσις is also found, sometimes designating the act of ransoming, sometimes the price paid.

The root g'l. The verb gā'al is a term of family law and suggests the vindication for oneself of some person, property, or right to which one has a previous claim through kinship or prior possession. An important instance of such “redemption” is found in the legislation of Lv 25.47–49: an Israelite who has had to sell himself into slavery because of poverty may be redeemed by a brother, uncle, or clansman; he may also redeem himself. The family aspect is seen also in the case of property that must be sold because the owner has become impoverished; the man’s closest relative has the right (and apparently the obligation) of buying it either from him or from the one to whom he had sold it (Lv 25.24–25; Jer 32.6–9). The object of this law was to keep property within the family. The verb is used also for the buying back of property or goods that have become the possession of God, such as tithes (Lv 27.31), unclean animals (27.13), houses (27.15), and fields (27.19) that have been vowed to God. Although this last usage is similar to that of pādā (and the two verbs are used in a like sense in Lv 27.27), it is clear that the idea of substitution and ransom is absent from gā'al.

Worthy of special note is gō'el, the participle of gā'al. It is often translated “redeemer,” though more exactly speaking the term indicates the person upon whom devolved all the duties, which were very diverse, of the next of kin. These duties would be all of those suggested by the verb gā'al: the redemption of relatives from slavery, of property from foreign possession, etc., as discussed above, as well as the marrying of the childless widow of a near relative in order to fulfill the obligations of the law of LEVITATE MARRIAGES, and the exacting of BLOOD VENGEANCE on the murderer of a near relative. According to the levitate legislation (Dt 25.5–10), only the brother of the dead man had the obligation of marrying the widow and so assuring progeny to continue the name and lineage of the dead man, but the practice reflected in the Book of Ruth indicates that at least in some periods it was extended to more distant relatives. When a murder had been committed, the gō'el fulfilled his duty as next of kin by exacting vengeance on the murderer (Nm 35.16–19; Dt 19.11–13); some see in this a redemption of innocent blood by the spilling of the blood of the guilty.

The LXX usually translated gā'al, when used of human activity, by some form of λυτρόω, though sometimes by ἀγγιστεύω, to be next of kin. The human gō'el is almost always represented by the participle of ἀγγιστεύω.

The root kpr. The basic meaning of the verb kāpar is to cover; in the intensive conjugation (piel) it can mean to cover over sin, atone, make expiation (see EXPIATION (IN THE BIBLE)). Of special interest for this study, however, is the substantive kōper, ransom (it may also mean bribe). In a number of texts, it is translated by λύτρον (sometimes in the plural) in the LXX, and in each of these cases it signifies a price paid for a life that has become forfeit. In a text already discussed, kōper signifies that which the negligent owner of an ox that has killed someone must pay as ransom for his own life (Ex 21.30); in Ex 30.11–16 the money each one pays is considered a “forfeit for his life” to guard against the dangers believed to be involved in taking a CENSUS (see 2 Sm 24.1–17). On the other hand, no such price may be accepted to save a murderer from paying for his crime with his life (Nm 35.31–32), and in Prv 6.35 it is said that an enraged husband will accept no amount in place of the vengeance (viz, of death) that is to be visited upon the defiler of his wife; see also Prv 13.8. When λύτρον (λύτρα) is used to translate kōper in these texts, it is in a sense akin to its proper meaning of ransom; yet here the price paid is not to deliver one person from another who holds him captive, but from a death he would otherwise have to undergo.

God as Redeemer in the Old Testament

The object of God’s redemptive activity is usually the people as a whole, rather than individuals. God is said to “ransom” His people and to be their gō'el. His work of redemption is closely connected with the messianic deliverance the Israelites expected from Him.

Deliverance from captivity. The beginning of God’s redemptive work is seen in the deliverance of His people from the slavery of Egypt; this is often described as a ransoming; e.g., ‘For remember that you too were once slaves in the land of Egypt, and the Lord, your God, ransomed [pādā] you’ (Dt 15.15); ‘I will rescue (gā’al) you by my outstretched arm and with mighty acts of judgment’ (Ex 6.6). Redemption or ransom, as practiced among men, involves the deliverance of someone from the power of another (or from an unfavorable fate) by the payment of a price or by a substitution. When the same terminology is used with God as the acting subject, redemption or ransom is obviously an image: God does deliver, but never by paying a price. ‘The Lord’s are the earth and its fullness’ [Ps 23(24).1]; He should not, would not, pay a price, for no one could ever have such power over any creature of His that His own rights would have to be purchased. Those for whom God was concerned were held captive by the power of a hostile people; God intervened to deliver them, and this was called, not unnaturally, redemption. The texts do not speak of a price being paid (for one apparent exception, see below), but rather stress that God has intervened in might and power, ‘by my outstretched arm and with mighty acts of judgment’ (Ex 6.6); to bring out from slavery and to ransom from Egypt mean the same (Dt 13.6). Once the accounts of the Exodus from Egypt had established the equivalence between redemption and deliverance, the same imagery and terminology were applied to other acts of deliverance, especially to the restoration after the Exile (Is 29.22; 35.10; 43.1; 44.22; Jer 31.11; etc.). Both pādā; and gā’al occur without appreciable difference in meaning; e.g., ‘The Lord shall ransom [pādā] Jacob, he shall redeem [gā’al] him from the hand of his conqueror’ [Jer 31.11; see also Ps 68(69).19]; they are also used in parallel with other verbs that signify deliverance and salvation: ‘I will free [hīl] you from the hand of the wicked, and rescue [pādā] you from the grasp of the violent’ (Jer 15.21); ‘He saved [hōšīā] them from hostile hands and freed [gā’al] them from the hands of the enemy’ [Ps 105–106.10].

It is clear from these examples that the idea of payment of ransom is absent. Sometimes the idea of ransom is explicitly rejected, as in Is 52.3: ‘you were sold for nothing, and without money you shall be redeemed [gā’al]’; the meaning is that the people, taken captive because of their sins, were set free by the power of God when their guilt had been expiated. In one text, it is said that ransom is paid for the exiles who are about to be released from Babylonia: ‘I give Egypt as your ransom, Ethiopia and Saba in return for you. . . . I give men and peoples in exchange for your life’ (Is 43.3–4). But this is clearly an example of poetic imagery. Lands and peoples would, indeed, pass under the control of Cyrus in the series of conquests that would result in the freeing of the Jewish captives; these victories are given him so that he might, according to God’s plan, release God’s people. Yet the riches of conquest are more properly hire than ransom, for the one who received them was not the one who held captive, and he that did received nothing. Elsewhere it is said more accurately, ‘He [Cyrus] Shall . . . let my exiles go free without price or ransom’ (Is 45.13).

The LXX translation reflects the fact that pādā and gā’al have a somewhat altered sense when they refer to God’s activity; although λυτρώω is still used in the majority of the cases, ῥύομαι, to deliver, and σῶζω, to save, and other verbs that have no direct connection with ransom are used as well.

God as gō’ēl. A number of OT passages designate Yahweh as gō’ēl (Redeemer), usually of Israel, though sometimes of pious individuals. The discussion above of this term and the root from which it is derived indicates that it conveys the idea of close family relationship and the rights and obligations that spring from it. When applied to God, the term would suggest the certainty of Israel’s redemption, since it rested in the hands of one who is not only almighty but also had the obligation of the next of kin to redeem those who were otherwise helpless. This usage is found most frequently in Deutero-Isaiah (see ISAIAH, BOOK OF) as the great exilic Prophet consoled the exiles with the assurance of the release soon to come (Is 41.14; 43.14; 44.24; 48.17; 49.7, 26; etc.). Sometimes the term is used along with other expressions that signify God’s power and nearness, such as SAVIOR (49.26), husband, and maker (54.5). Some passages stress the punishment that is to come upon the Babylonians, Israel’s captors, and in these is seen the duty of blood vengeance that is incumbent upon the gō’ēl. The same idea is present in Jer 50.34; see also Prv 23.11.

A passage of special interest is Jb 19.25: ‘But as for me, I know that my Vindicator [gō’ēl] lives, and that he will at last stand forth upon the dust.’ The expectation expressed here is not that Job will be delivered from sin; his trial is, in fact, that he seems to stand convicted of sin, whereas he knows himself to be innocent. God will vindicate him in showing him to be innocent of all charges, even though this should happen after Job’s death; the idea of the next of kin who vindicates innocent blood is present also. Thus, in spite of Job’s many complaints, he here expresses his conviction that God is near and concerned about him.

Redemption and messianism. There is a very close connection between the OT teaching on redemption and Israel’s messianic hope, and the two concepts evolved hand in hand. MESSIANISM, in its broadest aspects, included the conviction that God had chosen Israel in a special way in order to bestow upon it the blessings of salvation and redemption, in which the nations also would share.

What was understood by “salvation and redemption” underwent considerable evolution in the course of OT revelation. The historical beginning of messianic hope for Israel as a people may be dated to the time of the Exodus, for here God demonstrated His special choice of them and that He had a plan for their welfare that would be worked out in history; the patriarchal traditions that Israel had treasured during the centuries since Abraham—the promises of numerous progeny, possession of land, etc.—took on new meaning in the light of the Exodus. It was at this time as well that He revealed Himself as a God of deliverance, a savior who redeems His people. In the beginning, then, redemption was more or less equivalent to the release of the people from Egypt. In later times, in the face of enemy threats or actual captivity, they continued to expect deliverance from their God. When the great Prophets of the 8th and 7th centuries predicted exile and captivity because of the sins of the people, they foretold also deliverance (redemption) and restoration because of the saving plan of God; during the Exile itself Prophets arose (especially Ezekiel and Deutero-Isaiah) who promised restoration. But when the Prophets thus predicted deliverance and restoration, they did not think merely of a freeing from captivity, a return to the land, and a reestablishment of political institutions; such a return to the status quo ante would have had little meaning for them. The restoration to which the Prophets looked forward embraced the final establishment of God’s messianic kingdom, including a fundamental conversion from sin, the establishment of perfect justice, obedience to God, peace among all people, and abundant prosperity. Such expectation is seen in Jeremiah’s promise of a new covenant (Jer 31.31–34) and Ezekiel’s promise of a new heart, purification with clean water, and the gift of God’s spirit (Ez 36.24–32), as well as in the utopia he pictures in ch. 40–48. Much of this passed into the content of the OT terms for redemption.

The connection between messianic redemption and the role of the personal Messiah of the line of David who was expected is not easy to define. Neither Jeremiah nor Ezekiel contains many authentic references to a personal MESSIAH, nor does a Messiah seem to play a significant part in bringing to pass the expected redemption promised in their oracles. When Jeremiah says that “he shall reign and govern wisely, he shall do what is just and right in the land. In his days Judah shall be saved, Israel shall dwell in security” (Jer 23.5–6), he suggests a connection between the restoration and the ideal king without actually attributing it to his activity. Even the more enthusiastic oracles of Isaiah (e.g., 9.1–6; 11.1–9), while closely associating the messianic king with the ideal days to come, do not say that he is the cause of salvation; in general, it is attributed directly to God’s activity (Is 9.6). The least that can be said, however, is that the king, by virtue of his role in their society and of their conception of the function of the royal office, would be the mediator of the blessings God intended to bestow upon them and would have a direct role in the establishment and maintenance of justice. He was not, however, presented as a savior.

Redemption from sin. There is only one OT passage that speaks explicitly of redemption from sin. In Ps 129(130).8 it is said that God “will redeem [pādâ] Israel from all their iniquities.” This isolated passage, however, probably refers to deliverance from captivity or other distress (and so conforms to the meaning of redemption found elsewhere) considered to have been occasioned by sin, rather than from the guilt of sin (see GUILT (IN THE BIBLE)). This conclusion is strengthened by the parallel expression in Ps 24(25).22: “Redeem [pādâ] Israel, O God, from all its distress!” A similar explanation is probably in order for a couple of passages in which redemption is found parallel with forgiveness of sins: “I have brushed away your offenses like a cloud, your sins like a mist; return to me, for I have redeemed [gā’al] you” (Is 44.22); “He pardons all your iniquities, he heals all your ills. He redeems [gā’al] your life from destruction” [Ps 102(103).3–4].

This is not to say, however, that there was no belief in a reconciliation after the estrangement brought about by sin nor in a remission of guilt. The pattern of punishment for sin and messianic restoration described above supposes that sin would be expiated by the punishment of the Exile (Is 40.2), after which the blessings of the messianic era would be conferred by God. That remission of sin and freedom from sin is part of the expected redemption is clear from many texts; see Jer 31.34; 50.20; Ez 36.24–33; Dn 9.24.

Even apart from the remission of sin that would precede and accompany the messianic redemption, the OT authors knew the need for remission of sin and entertained a lively hope that it could be obtained. A high point in OT spirituality is reached in Ps 50(51), a fervent and hopeful prayer for forgiveness by one who is convinced that God will not spurn a contrite and humble heart (v. 19). Another high point is reached in the last of the Servant of the Lord Oracles (Is 52.13–53.12), in which sinful mankind stands aghast and comes a step nearer to obtaining a “contrite and humble heart” in recognizing that the innocent victim suffered because the sins of all had been placed upon him (53.4, 6, 10–12). Not only does the Servant expiate the sins of others in some mysterious way, but his suffering has also a more positive aspect: “But he was pierced for our offenses, crushed for our sins; upon him was the chastisement that makes us whole, by his stripes we were healed” (53.5). The Servant is not identified with the Messiah in this text, nor is there anything to connect him with the Davidic kingship; nevertheless, because his mission is to give “his life as an offering for sin . . . , and the will of the Lord shall be accomplished through him”, his work deserves to be characterized as messianic and redemptive in the highest sense of the words.

Redemption in Christ

The message of the NT is summed up in large part by the assertion that the long-awaited redemption has arrived, that Israel’s messianic hope has been fulfilled in the person and mission of Jesus Christ, who has become mediator of salvation for all people. Because redemption was accomplished through Him, He obtains a far more central and essential role than was accorded the Messiah in the OT or in later Jewish tradition.

New Testament meaning of redemption. No simple explanation of the NT concept of redemption is possible because it is exceedingly rich and complex. However, it can be briefly described as the deliverance, through the death and Resurrection of Christ (Rom 4.25), from the state of estrangement from God (Ti 2.14) that prevailed from the earliest days of human existence (Gn 3.1–11.9), ratified by each person by his own sins (Rom 3.23); this redemption includes all of creation, for it “was made subject to vanity” because of human sin (Rom 8.20); the final stage, to be realized only at the Parousia and the general resurrection, will bring with it the end of all the ills that afflict humankind, but many of the messianic benefits are already enjoyed by the redeemed. In many respects redemption can be identified with SALVATION (σωτηρία).

Some of the elements of this description were already contained in the OT concept of redemption, though not so explicitly expressed. In the OT, however, deliverance of the Jewish nation from political domination was an important element; and popular Jewish expectation, as seen in some of the intertestamental writings, often tended to emphasize this aspect in a narrow, restrictive manner. The NT sometimes speaks of redemption in quite general terms that have more or less the same content as the OT expectation. This is true of the use of the term in the opening of the Benedictus (Lk 1.68; cf. 1.71: “Salvation from our enemies, and from the hand of all who hate us”). Probably nothing other than this is to be seen in the disappointed expectation of the disciples on the road to Emmaus: “But we were hoping that it was he who should redeem Israel” (Lk 24.21). Obviously these men did not at that time regard Jesus’ death as redemptive, nor were they awaiting His Resurrection; the fact that He had been put to death seemed to them evidence that He was not the awaited Redeemer. Their mistaken notions were corrected by Jesus Himself (Lk 24. 25–27), and the concept of deliverance from sin, death, and God’s anger precisely through Jesus’ death and Resurrection is the normal content of NT redemptive terminology.

The NT uses many of the Greek terms found in the LXX, but usually with the specifically Christian content just described. There is but a single passage in which λύτρον occurs (Mk 10.45; Mt 20.28), but it is a very significant one. The verb λυτρόω (in the middle voice) occurs a few times, as does its substantive λύτρωσις much more frequent, but without apparent difference in meaning, is the compound ἀπολύτρωσις. The last two terms usually mean the state of redemption, though they sometimes refer to the act by which redemption is accomplished. Other important terms are mentioned in the course of this article.

Redemptive death of Jesus. Although the total redemptive work of Jesus includes His Incarnation, life, Passion, death, and Resurrection, it cannot be denied that the NT emphasizes His death as the cause par excellence of redemption. The question of how the death of Jesus is redemptive does not find a single, clear, explanation in the NT. Various approaches are used—ransom, sacrifice, expiation, etc.—but none of them can exhaust the mystery. Moreover, these approaches are presented in thought categories largely foreign to the modern Western mind. Nevertheless, it is necessary to investigate the mystery in terms such as these, for they are the only kind the NT presents (see BIBLICAL THEOLOGY).

Jesus’ Conception of His Mission. The NT recognizes Jesus as the Messiah and the bearer of salvation. He Himself generally avoided the title, which was largely associated with the political notions of His contemporaries concerning the type of redemption the Messiah would bring. His ministry was marked by a series of miracles that signified the overthrow of the kingdom of Satan in order to make way for the KINGDOM OF GOD. Near the beginning of His ministry He made clear the moral dispositions required of those who would enter this kingdom, but He fled from an enthusiastic following that wanted to make Him king (Jn 6.15). While avoiding the title of Messiah, Jesus constantly referred to Himself as Son of Man. This title, found in Dn 7.13 and applied to a transcendent, heavenly being in later Jewish writings, notably 1 Enoch and 4 Esdras, did not have the narrow political overtones attached to Messiah in popular Jewish expectation. But even to the title Son of Man Jesus gave a new content by identifying His mission with that of the Servant of the Lord of Deutero-Isaiah. Although Jesus did not explicitly call Himself the Servant of the Lord, sayings recorded in the Gospels explain His mission in terms that were drawn from the description of that OT figure. For example, the pattern of rejection, humiliation, death, and resurrection found in the Passion predictions (Mk 8.31; 9.29–30; 10.32–34; and parallels) follows that of the fourth Servant oracle. In the logia preserved in Mk 9.11 and 14.21 it is affirmed that Scripture foretold the necessity of the suffering of the Son of Man; yet no text of Scripture contains such a prediction (nor do even the non-biblical texts speak of the Son of Man suffering), and it is clear that the sayings apply to Jesus as Son of Man the things said of the Servant of the Lord. In one text He explicitly applied to Himself the words written of the Servant (Lk 22.37). The Evangelists and other NT writers, too, liberally applied to Him the Servant texts and terminology; see, e.g., Mt 8.17; 12.18; Jn 12.38; Acts 4.27, 30; 8.32–35; Rom 15.21; 1 Pt 2.22–25. Another passage that is of special importance for understanding Jesus' conception of His mission, Mk 10.45, requires a fuller investigation.

A Ransom for Many. The logion found in almost identical form in Mk 10.45 and Mt 20.28 is particularly important because in it Jesus characterized His understanding of His whole mission. In order to counter the tendency toward ambitious self-seeking on the part of His disciples, Jesus insisted on the need for humility and readiness to serve others, concluding with the words: “for the Son of Man also has not come to be served but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many.” There is little need to question the authenticity of this saying; the objections made in the past, that this verse is an expansion made under the influence of Pauline teaching or that St. Luke's version of the “service logion” (Lk 22.24–27) is more primitive, have been amply refuted.

The background against which this saying is to be interpreted is, in all probability, Jesus' conception of His mission as Servant of the Lord. This position has been denied by some (e.g., C. K. Barrett), but the arguments in its favor are very strong. It must be admitted that the language of the passage does not approach very closely to the LXX version of the fourth Servant oracle, but the thought expressed is very similar: in each case it is a question of one whose mission can be summed up as service and whose life is given in place of “many” (Is 53.11). Further, if the immediate context in Mark is taken into account, it may be said that the pattern of abasement, death, and exaltation appears in each text, for in Mk 10.43–44 Jesus explains to His disciples that the way to true greatness lies in humiliation and service, and then He goes on (in v. 45) to apply this to Himself: “for the Son of Man also.” When one adds to this the conviction that Jesus interpreted His own mission in the light of the Servant figure, it becomes clear that this also is the background against which must be understood the saying in which Jesus solemnly summarizes the meaning of His life's work.

How, then, should the “ransom” be understood? Some have suggested that the λούτρον recalls the 'āšām of Is 53.10: the Servant is said to give his life as an “offering for sin”; but this is probably incorrect, for 'āšām is never translated by λούτρον. More probably λούτρον represents the idea contained in the occurrences of kōper discussed above: a price given in place of (the proper meaning of ἀντί) a life that is forfeit. The meaning, then, is that Jesus dies in order to deliver “many” (a term that does not necessarily imply any restriction) from a situation in which their own lives were forfeit. The “situation” in question is man's state as sinner and the consequences deriving from it (ultimately death). This corresponds closely to the mission of the Servant. However, the image of a price or ransom cannot be pressed too far; man is held in bondage to sin (and thus liable to death) through the activity of Satan, but it cannot be thought that the price (the life of Jesus) is delivered to Satan; he has no rights over God's creatures. Jesus does die in obedience to the will of the Father and to offer Him a sacrifice on behalf of all, and in this sense His life might be said to be paid to God. Yet this must not be understood in a crudely substitutionary sense, as though an irate God accepted the death of the innocent Jesus in place of that of sinners and thus was appeased. It was the loving Father who initiated His merciful plan of salvation by sending His Son. Moreover, the life of Jesus was given to release sinners from the state of bondage, a state in which they are not kept by God, and to enable them to serve God properly.

Jesus' Death as a Sacrifice. If Jesus interpreted His sufferings and death in the light of the Servant passages, it would appear that He viewed His death as a sacrifice; the same implication is found in the words of institution of the chalice at the Last Supper: “This is my blood of the new covenant, which is being shed for many” (Mk 14.24)—words that allude both to the blood of the Sinai covenant sacrifice (Ex 24.8) and to the Servant oracles. It is not possible to enter here into a full discussion of Israel's concept of sacrifice, but it is helpful to recall certain features that are pertinent to the present investigation. Sacrifice had various functions, some more prominent in certain types of sacrifice than in others. The emphasis was not upon the destruction of the victim, but upon the offering of life made to God. The ends of the offering were worship, reconciliation, and fellowship with God. Sacrifice, when offered in the proper spirit, implied a giving of self; the imposition of the hands of the offerer upon the head of the victim signified his identity with it and so signified total surrender and the desire to be accepted by God as the victim would be. Sacrifice was understood to effect reconciliation by removing the obstacles to union with God caused by sin; this was the function of guilt offerings and sin offerings, which were understood to be effective through the mysterious power of blood (see BLOOD, RELIGIOUS SIGNIFICANCE OF), the shedding of which signified the release of life. It is to be noted that the life thus presented to God was not a substitute for the life of the guilty. The expiation involved consisted in the wiping out of sin so as to restore the relationship of community between the sinner and God, not in placating the anger of God. Sacrifice also effected communion or fellowship with God in two ways: the blood of the victim, with which the offerer was in some way identified, was presented to God by being splashed on the altar; and (in some types of sacrifices) the offerer shared in the victim, now transferred to the sphere of the divine through acceptance by God, by a sacred meal.

These are elevated concepts, but the disadvantages of the OT practice are apparent. The victim itself had no intrinsic value as an offering to God, nor could a dumb animal partake in any way in the free offering that is the essence of sacrifice. The total value, then, derived from the dispositions of the offerer. These, however, were often lacking; the sacrifice could be viewed in a somewhat mechanical way, as effecting something automatically—as the condemnations of the Prophets eloquently indicate.

The sacrificial death of Jesus, however, was not vitiated by these imperfections. The mission He had received from His Father of establishing the kingdom of God and instructing men in its true nature roused against Him the hostility of Satan and wicked men and issued ultimately in His death. That His death would be an outcome of His fidelity to His mission Jesus clearly foresaw; this is explicit in the Passion predictions, implicit in His identification of Himself with the Servant of the Lord. Nevertheless, He adhered to the path that He knew would lead to His death in obedience to the will of His Father, and in so doing became a conscious, willing victim (Jn 10.11, 15–18); the Passion of Christ was not simply a circumstance but a necessity (Lk 12.50; 24.26). Sinless and innocent Himself, Jesus willingly underwent death in obedience to the will of the Father in the full knowledge that in so doing He was accomplishing the redemption of all; by His obedient death as Servant, He offered a sacrifice in which all can share, which all can make their own. Because Jesus freely offered Himself, He was not only victim, but also priest. (The function of the priest in the OT was not to slay the victim but to offer it to God; the slaughter was often carried out by a layman.) This truth became the basis for a theme developed at length in the Epistle to the Hebrews and found in other places in the NT.

It may be asked why God required the sacrifice of Jesus as the price of redemption for all and did not simply forgive sin freely; it might be thought that this would involve a higher conception of God and one that is already found in the OT. In answer it may be said that the OT, even though it sometimes seems to speak of sin being freely pardoned, did recognize and teach the necessity for reparation for sin; this is witnessed by the practice of guilt offerings and sin offerings, the Day of ATONEMENT, the belief that punishment for sin must precede the messianic restoration, the teaching on the mission of the Servant of the Lord, and in many other ways. A proper estimate of sin recognizes it as something that not only offends God but, in a real way, induces a disorder into one's very being, because it perverts one's ordering of oneself to God, in which one's total good as creature consists. The fallen condition, from which springs our need for redemption, is the result of the sin of disobedience (rebellion); this goes back to the origin of the human race (Gn ch. 1–11), in which each individual is inserted and grounded (see ORIGINAL SIN). Only by a definitive rejection of all that is evil, by a new act of perfect obedience in which God would be chosen in preference to self, could a new beginning be made. Yet, paradoxically, this is precisely what human nature, wounded as it now was by sin, was not able to effect; humankind, in the greatest need, found itself in a state of helplessness. It is at this point that God in His merciful design takes the initiative to rescue man, by means of the Incarnation, from a state in which he cannot rescue himself. Jesus, sinless and in no way partaker of man's moral weakness, offers in the name of all His obedience unto death. In so doing, He both undergoes the penalty of death for sin in the name of sinners and repairs the disorder caused by disobedience.

From this it is clear that there is a substitutionary element in the sacrifice of Jesus; this is implied also in the connection of His death as ransom with the OT kōper (see above). The substitutionary element is seen partly in the fact that He has done for man what man could not do for himself. Yet a fuller understanding of Jesus' death as redemptive must go far beyond this; Jesus does not die simply in place of sinful mankind, but must in some way be identified with those for whom He died. This identification proceeds in two directions: Jesus dies in the name of sinners, and sinners, in turn, make Jesus' sacrifice their own. It is not without significance that the only Servant passage that Jesus explicitly applied to Himself (Is 53.12) implied His association with sinful mankind: "For I say to you that this which is written must yet be fulfilled in me, 'And he was reckoned among the wicked'" (Lk 22.37; for the forceful expressions of St. Paul, see Rom 8.3; 2 Cor 5.21; Gal 3.13). Objectively the sacrifice of Jesus, offered in the name of sinners, accomplishes total reparation and redemption; but it does not operate in an automatic way in reconciling the individual sinner to God. Each person must make the sacrifice his own, expressive of his own dispositions of contrition for sin and willingness to make reparation; as in the case of any sacrifice, it avails only for the individual who makes it a vehicle of his own oblation of self. Ultimately this means that the offerer wills to render personally the perfect obedience of Jesus to God, obedience even unto death (Phil 2.5–8; 2 Cor 5.14–15).

That Jesus intended men to appropriate His sacrifice as their own is clear from His institution of the Eucharist. In this rite, the broken loaf and of wine are effective signs of His body slain and His blood “shed for many” (Mk 14.22–24), and the invitation to eat of them is an invitation for each person to make his own the sacrifice of Jesus. The covenant aspect that is present (“This is my blood of the new covenant . . .”; cf. Ex 24.8; Jer 31.31–34) implies that Jesus’ death makes possible fellowship between God and those who share in it.

Teaching of New Testament Writers. There is no possibility of presenting here a complete synthesis of the diverse and complex approaches used by the NT writers in explaining the redemptive nature of the death of Christ; a description of some of the more basic lines of thought is all that is attempted.

St. Mark’s Gospel indicates that the immediate effect of Jesus’ death is reconciliation with God. Whereas in St. Matthew’s Gospel the rending of the veil of the Temple is one of a series of marvels that follows the death of Jesus (Mt 27.51–53), in Mark’s account it stands alone (Mk 15.38) and is sandwiched into the narrative for the sake of what it signifies—the way of access to God is now open. A comparable teaching on access to God through the veil by virtue of the death of Christ is found in Hebrews (Heb 10.19–22). Paradoxically, it is at the moment of Jesus’ death in rejection and apparent abandonment that Mark places the recognition of His divinity (Mk 15.39). When N. Ferré; says that “Calvary shows the depth of God’s redemptive love for man and thus alone is the full revelation of God” [The Christian Faith (New York 1942) 161], he makes explicit something that is implicit in Mark’s account. St. John and St. Paul also see God’s redemptive act in Christ as the supreme manifestation of His love (Jn 3.16; Rom 5.8; 8.32).

The image of redemption accomplished through the payment of a price is reflected in many NT passages. Of special interest is 1 Tm 2.6, for it is clearly a paraphrase of the ransom passage in Mk 10.45: “who [Jesus Christ] gave himself a ransom [ἀντίλυτρον] for all.” By substituting “all” for “many,” the passage excludes any suggestion of a limitation of redemption to some segment of humankind. See also Ti 2.14; 1 Pt 1.18–19. Even when λύτρον and its derivatives are not used, the idea is sometimes expressed in other terms, such as ἀγοράζω, to purchase (1 Cor 6.20; 2 Pt 2.1; Rv 5.9; 14.3); ἐξαγοράζω, to buy back, redeem (Gal 3.13; 4.5); and ἐλευθερέω, to deliver, free, e.g., from sin, death, or slavery (Rom 6.18, 8.2, 21; Gal 5.1). The same concept is present as well in references to the price (sometimes specified as the precious blood of Christ—Acts 20.28; Eph 1.7; 1 Pt 1.18–19; Rv 5.9) by which man is redeemed (1 Cor 6.20). The passages in which these expressions occur allude at least implicitly to the sacrificial nature of the death of Christ; the reference to sacrifice is found also in Rom 3.25: “whom [Jesus] God has set forth as a propitiation [ἱλαστήριον] by His blood “(see EXPIATION (IN THE BIBLE)). See also, e.g., 1 Cor 5.7; Eph 5.2. In 1 Thes 1.10 Paul says that believers have been delivered (ῥύομαι) from God’s wrath. In biblical terminology the wrath of God stands for vindictive punishment to be visited upon sinners through divine judgment on the last day, whereas the justice of God stands for the benign plan of God to save man from sin. In Rom 5.9 salvation (σῶζω) from God’s wrath is attributed to the blood of Christ. (For other aspects of Paul’s distinctive teaching on Redemption, see PAUL, APOSTLE, ST.).

The image of redemption as a buying or a purchase contains another important element, namely, the acquisition of the redeemed for God as His own people—already an important part of OT thought. Thus St. Paul can speak of “the Church of God which he [Christ] has purchased with his own blood” (Acts 20.28) or say that Jesus “gave himself for us that he might redeem us from all iniquity and cleanse for himself an acceptable people” (Ti 2.14). St. Peter can call the Christians “a purchased people” (1 Pt 2.9). In 1 Cor 7.22–24 St. Paul tells his readers, slaves and free, that having been bought at a price, they have been set free (i.e., of the powers that formerly held them) in order to become slaves of Christ. In a similar sense, Jesus had said that when He had been “lifted up” He would draw all to Himself (Jn 12.32) and had compared Himself to a grain of wheat that falls into the ground and dies in order to bring forth much fruit (Jn 12.24–25).

The means by which we can appropriate for ourselves the sacrifice of Christ are set forth in various ways. St. Paul speaks of faith, incorporation into the body of Christ, sacramental participation in the redemptive mystery (through Baptism in Rom 6.3, through the Eucharist in 1 Cor 11.26), etc. Of special import is Paul’s presentation of Christ as Second Adam (Rom 5.12–19; 1 Cor 15.44–49). Just as Adam, the total embodiment of humanity at the beginning, encompassed all of humankind in his fall, so Christ incorporates all of humankind in Himself in His act of perfect obedience on the Cross: “For just as by the disobedience of the one man the many were constituted sinners, so also by the obedience of the one the many will be justified” (Rom 5.19). The same is said more briefly in 2 Cor 5.14: “[S]ince one died for all, therefore all have died.” The conclusion to be drawn from this is that the redeemed are dead to sin and thus able to be the recipients of a new life (Rom 6.2–3; 2 Cor 5.15; Col 3.1–4).

Redemption and the Resurrection. Although Jesus taught the redemptive value of His death, He did not clearly indicate, at least in the authentic sayings that have been preserved, the redemptive significance of His Resurrection. Even the fourth Servant oracle, which was the background of Jesus’ interpretation of His mission, seems to view the Servant’s resurrection almost solely as a vindication of his innocence and the means of making known to others that it was not for his sins but for the sins of “the many” that he died; the emphasis is placed on his death: “through his suffering, my servant shall justify many, and their guilt he shall bear” (Is 53.11).

Yet the NT writers have correctly seen the importance of the RESURRECTION OF CHRIST for a proper understanding of the Redemption. The NT does not emphasize the redemption of souls—a concept that rests upon a Platonic and quite un-biblical view of the human situation (see MAN, 1)—but of the redemption of the person. A correct view extends Redemption to include our bodily nature, society, and all of creation; any redemption that did not include this would be incomplete.

In rising from the dead, Christ did not simply return to the mortal life He had known before, but He was glorified and exalted to the right hand of the Father (Mk 16.19; Acts 2.32–33). Further, the new life He now possessed was something all the redeemed were also to share in. In order to grasp the full meaning of this, it is necessary to understand the force of the concepts of death and life in Scripture. In biblical thought “death” often signifies far more than simply the loss of bodily life. Death entered the world as the result of sin (Gn 3.17–19; Rom 5.12), and the ultimate stage of it is eternal damnation (Jas 1.15; Rom 5.21; 6.21; Rv 20.14); this would be the inescapable fate of fallen man if God had not intervened. As it is, Christ has overcome death through His Resurrection. The raising of Christ from the dead is usually attributed to the Father, just as the initiative in the Redemption is regularly presented as coming from Him; because of Christ’s divine nature and because of His perfect victory over evil in His own life, however, it can be said also that the realm of death had no power to hold Him (Acts 2.24). In His dying and Resurrection, death and the powers of death have been destroyed (2 Tm 1.10; Heb 2.14).

The positive aspect of this victory is the bestowal of life on all those united to Christ; indeed, this gift of life can be considered to be the completion of His redemptive mission: “I have come that they might have life, and have it more abundantly” (Jn 10.10). Life, too, is a pregnant concept in Scripture; just as “death” can describe man’s unredeemed state and all its consequences, so “life” can comprise the totality of the gift of God, including Redemption and supernatural blessedness. This life is conferred on the believer in virtue of the Resurrection of Christ; St. Paul can say that “even when we were dead by reason of our sins, [God] brought us to life together with Christ” (Eph 2.5). Solidarity with Adam brought death; solidarity with Christ brings life: “For since by a man came death, by a man also comes resurrection from the dead. For as in Adam all die, so in Christ all will be made to live” (1 Cor 15.21–22). The Resurrection of Christ and that of the redeemed are so closely linked as cause and effect that to deny the resurrection of the dead is, implicitly, to deny the Resurrection of Christ (1 Cor 15.12–21). Sometimes this link is explained in terms of sacramental action. St. Paul speaks especially of Baptism in this regard: “For you were buried together with him in Baptism, and in him also rose again through faith in the working of God who raised him from the dead” (Col 2.12); “For we were buried with him by means of Baptism into death, in order that, just as Christ has arisen from the dead through the glory of the Father, so we also may walk in newness of life. For if we have been united with him in the likeness of his death, we shall be so in the likeness of his resurrection also” (Rom 6.4–5). St. John sees this effected through the Eucharist: “He who eats my flesh and drinks my blood has everlasting life and I will raise him up on the last day” (Jn 6.55).

The Christian’s share in the Resurrection of Christ includes both the life of grace now (walking “in newness of life”—Rom 6.4) and the resurrection of the body on the last day. The life of grace is granted through the believer’s intimate union with Christ (Eph 2.4–7) and the gift of the Spirit (Rom 8.1–11), which Christ is able to bestow in virtue of His Resurrection and exaltation (Acts 2.33; Jn 7.39, 20.22;). The possession of the SPIRIT OF GOD renders the receivers SONS OF GOD and joint heirs with Christ (Rom 8.14–17).

Bestowal of the Spirit not only restores integrity to the individual, but also brings to an end the divisions within the human community caused by sin and existing since the earliest generations (Gn 11.1–9). The creation of one community for all, long expected by the Prophets as an effect of the messianic redemption (Is 2.2–4; 19.18–25), is realized at least germinally at Pentecost (Acts 2.5–11) and continued in the process of the building up of the body of Christ, the Church, in which all divisions are brought to an end (Gal 3.28; Col 3.11; Eph 2.13–22).

Because man is the crown of creation and because all other creatures were made for him and placed under his dominion (Gn 1.26–28; 2.18–19), all creation shared in man's fall and became subject to the vanity of his sin (Rom 8.20); the earth was cursed because of him (Gn 3.17–18). The Prophets, therefore, looked forward to a redemption in which the disorders introduced by the Fall would be undone and in which all creation would share (Is 11.6–9; Hos 2.20; Am 9.13)—a cosmic redemption calling for the creation of a new heaven and a new earth (Is 65.17–25). This cosmic aspect is seen also in the NT teaching on redemption, even though its completion will be realized only on the last day. St. Paul expects that “creation itself also will be delivered from its slavery to corruption into the freedom of the glory of the sons of God” (Rom 8.21). Something of the same idea is contained in 1 Cor ch. 15, where St. Paul speaks of the day when death and every evil force will be destroyed and all other things will be subject to God in their proper order to the end “that God may be all in all” (1 Cor 15.24–28; see also Eph 1.10). In a sense, this is already accomplished in the Incarnation (Col 1.15–17).

Redemption and eschatology. In many prophetic texts, especially (or perhaps exclusively) in those after the Exile, the fulfillment of the expected messianic redemption is seen to coincide with the end of human history, of the present world, and of the present age, and to introduce a new world in a new age (see, e.g., the “new heavens and new earth” oracle in Is 65.17–25 referred to above). With the exaltation of Christ and the sending of the Spirit, the Apostles recognized that in Christ the decisive act of salvation history (Heilsgeschichte) had been accomplished and the new age had been ushered in; this is a central element of the NT proclamation. Nevertheless, the NT continues to look forward to the Parousia (Second Coming) of Christ as the final act of the redemptive work that, until that moment, must remain, in a sense, incomplete. Until sin, death, and every hostile force is brought to an end, the kingdom of God cannot be considered to be perfectly established; until the redeemed share in the glory of the Resurrection of Christ through the glorification of their own bodies, Redemption will not be complete (see Lk 21.28; Rom 8.23; Eph 1.14; 4.30). This state of affairs leads to a tension between present and future that is inherent in the NT message. Some modern authors would resolve this tension by seeing all the goods of the messianic age already present, with no further extraordinary intervention of God on earth to be expected. Such “realized eschatology” (term of C. H. Dodd), however, is hardly consistent with all the data of the NT. But the theory does contain important elements of truth.

Many of the benefits of Redemption are already possessed in this life: deliverance from God's wrath, reconciliation with God, the gift of the Spirit, adoption as sons of God, and the messianic community (the Church) that is potentially the sphere of salvation and unity of all men (see Rom 3.24; 1 Cor 1.30; Eph 1.7; Col 1.14). Even the gifts that are not yet fully possessed are to a degree already proleptically present for the Christian in virtue of union with the glorified and exalted Christ. The various writers of the NT stress now one, now the other of these two poles, so that only a somewhat mitigated form of “realized eschatology,” sometimes termed “inaugurated eschatology,” truly represents their thought. (see ESCHATOLOGY (IN THE BIBLE)).

Christians have been given the means of bettering the world; they can and must work for justice, equality of opportunity, peace, the extinction of every evil, and the acquisition of every good. But the perfect establishment of the kingdom of God, according to the mind of the NT, will be accomplished not by the gradual success of human endeavors, but only by the return of the Son of Man.

See Also: HOPE OF SALVATION (IN THE BIBLE); JUSTIFICATION.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1994–2003. J. GEWISS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:1016–20. P. VIELHAUER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 2:579–584. H. J. KRAUS and P. VIELHAUER, ibid. 2:586–590. H. SCHLIER, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament, ed. G. KITTEL (Stuttgart 1935—) 2:484–500. O. PROCKSCH and F. BÜCHSEL, ibid. 4:329–359. M. M. BOURKE, Passion, Death, and Resurrection of Christ (Glen Rock, N.J. 1963). D. M. STANLEY, Christ's Resurrection in Pauline Soteriology (Analecta biblica 13, Rome 1961). F. X. DURRWELL, The Resurrection, tr. R. SHEED (New York 1960). L. CERFAUX, Christ in the Theology of St. Paul, tr. G. WEBB and A. WALKER (New York 1959) 69–192. V. TAYLOR, The Atonement in New Testament Teaching (3d ed. London 1958); Jesus and His Sacrifice (New York 1955). C. NOVEL, Essai sur le Développement de l'idée biblique de Rédemption (Lyons 1954). J. DUPONT, La Réconciliation dans la théologie de St. Paul (Paris 1953). A. KIRCHGÄSSNER, Erlösung und Sünde im N.T. (Freiburg 1950). J. BONSIRVEN, L'Évangile de s. Paul (Paris 1948) 144–174. J. J. STAMM, Erlösen und Vergeben im A. T. (Bern 1940). R. G. BANDAS, The Master Idea of St. Paul's Epistles on the Redemption (St. Paul, Minn. 1926). J. WACH, Der Erlösungsgedanke und seine Deutung (Leipzig 1922). S. LYONNET, “The Redemption of the Universe” in H. RAHNER et al., The Church: Readings in Theology (New York 1963) 136–158; Introduction à la Bible, eds. A. ROBERT and A. FEUILLET (Tournai 1959) 2:840–889; “De notionem redemptionis,” Verbum Domini 36 (1958) 129–146. C. K. BARRETT, “The Background of Mark 10:45,” N. T. Essays: Studies in Memory of T. W. Manson, ed. A. J. B. HIGGINS (Manchester, Eng. 1959) 1–18. A. R. JOHNSON, “The Primary Meaning of the Root g'l,” Vetus Testamentum suppl. 1 (1953) 67–77. R. CROUZEL, “Le Dogme de la Rédemption dans l'Apocalypse,” Bulletin de Littérature Ecclésiastique 58 (1957) 65–92. B. VAWTER, “Resurrection and Redemption,” Catholic Bib- lical Quarterly 15 (1953) 11–23. J. JEREMIAS, “Das Lösegeld für viele (Mk. 10, 45),” Judaica 3 (1948) 249–264. J. RIVIÈRE, “Expiation et Rédemption dans l’A.T.,” Bulletin de Littérature Ecclésiastique 47 (1946) 3–22. J. B. COLON, “La Conception du salut d’après les évangiles synoptiques,” Recherches de science religieuse 10 (1930) 370–415; 11 (1931) 27–72, 193–223. B. WARFIELD, “The N.T. Terminology of Redemption,” Princeton Theological Review 15 (1917) 201–249. J. UNTERMAN and G. S. SHOGREN, “Redemption,” Anchor Bible Dictionary (New York 1992) 5:650–657.

[J. JENSEN]

REDEMPTION (THEOLOGY OF)

The term “Redemption” in Christian theology refers to the mystery of God’s deliverance of mankind from the evil of sin and His restoration of man to the state of grace by an act of divine power and merciful love. This redemptive act spans the whole of man’s history from the time of his first sin and fall from grace. “God . . . wishes all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of truth” (1 Tm 2.4).

INTRODUCTION

The salvific act of God as it encounters men has progressive realizations and various manifestations. God works His saving will in history in an ever-expanding power of action and clarity of revelation. In the Old Testament, the first realization and revelation of God’s redemptive act, a Redemption is promised in Gn 3.15 (see PROTO-EVANGELIUM) and has the beginnings of its realization in the call of Abraham, the election of Moses, the Exodus from Egypt, the covenant of Sinai, the life of the people of God in the Promised Land, the exile and the return of the people, and their waiting in hope for the Messiah of God to come and give “help to Israel . . . as he spoke to . . . Abraham and to his posterity forever” (Lk 1.54–55).

Salvation history traces a pattern of God’s redemptive activity and will provide many of the theological categories within which Christian theology will reflect upon the decisive and definitive Redemption that God works in behalf of mankind in and through Christ. Although a complete theology of Redemption must include all that can be known of God’s act of deliverance and restoration, Christian theology has concentrated on the revelation of the New Testament, which marks the “fullness of time” in SALVATION HISTORY when “God sent his Son, born of a woman . . . that he might redeem . . . that we might receive the adoption of sons” (Gal 4.4).

For the NT writers, Redemption may refer to the purpose of Christ’s work in its total accomplishment (e.g., Rom 8.23; Eph 4.30; Rv 5.9) or in its partial accomplishment here on earth (e.g., Eph 1.7; Col 1.14). The term also designates the plan of Christ’s work (e.g., Rom 3.24; Ti 2.14). Finally, Redemption and its cognate forms can refer to the very accomplishing of the work of Christ in terms of what is done and how the work is effective.

This article considers Redemption chiefly as a process in which the redeeming activity of God is mediated in and through the life and death and Resurrection of the Incarnate Word. The investigations are polarized to the side of Redemption as it is something objective. This is to say that the Redemption is considered as the decisive and definite act of God in Christ on behalf of mankind so that, as regards the divine activity in this order of things, Redemption is accomplished “for once and for all.” In the consideration of Redemption as objective, the focus is on God’s efficient activity rather than on man’s reception of and response to the redemptive act of God. The objective of this article is to present a doctrinal survey that indicates the main lines of theological reflection upon this mystery. This article is not an effort to construct an integral theology of the Redemption according to any one soteriological theory. The Redemption is a mystery properly so called. In certain epochs and according to certain schools of theology, different aspects of the mystery have been put in relief while others have been passed over almost unnoticed. No single theory of the Redemption has ever been total or complete. The investigation proceeds, in general, through scriptural themes and dogmatic formulations by the Church, the doctrinal context of the Redemption, and finally, theories of the Redemption considered within the doctrinal context.

SCRIPTURAL THEMES AND DOGMATIC FORMULATIONS

These themes and formulations serve as points of departure for the reflections of the Church and the articles of faith toward which are addressed the theological questions for an intelligence of the mystery.

Scriptural themes. There are seven themes that can be derived from the NT as theological points of departure for the inquiring Christian who asks the question: how and by what means is man delivered from the evil of sin and restored to grace with God? Although not all these themes are equally central in the mystery, each of them, nonetheless, provides a clue for insight into the various aspects of the mystery.

First, Redemption is revealed as achieved by the very fact that the Word of God assumes human nature and becomes the mediator between God and man. The theme is derived from the Fourth Gospel. The sources are also Pauline (e.g., 1 Tm 2.5; Heb 8.6; 9.15). Compare the re-establishment of all things in Christ (Eph 1.10; Col 1.15–20) and the Christ-Adam parallel (Rom 5.12–19; 1 Cor 15.21–22, 45–49).

12th-century apse mosaic of combined Redemption motifs, Church of S. Clemente, Rome.

Second, Redemption is accomplished through Christ's giving His life as a price of purchase, or RANSOM, as it were (Mk 10.45; 1 Cor 6.20; 7.23; 1 Tm 2.6; Ti 2.14; 1 Pt 1.18–19; Rv 5.9).

Third, Redemption is effected through the sufferings and death of Christ undergone because of SIN and in behalf of sinners (Jn 1.29; Rom 4.25; 5.6–21; 1 Cor 15.3; 2 Cor 5.15; Gal 2.20; Eph 5.2; Col 2.13–14).

Fourth, Redemption is performed through the sacrifice of Christ offered on the cross (from the account of the institution of the Eucharist in the Synoptic Gospels; the Epistle to the Hebrews; Rom 3.25; 1 Cor 5.7; Eph 5.2; 1 Jn 4.10). (See SACRIFICE OF THE CROSS.)

Fifth, Redemption is acquired through Christ's victory over the devil (Jn 14.30; Col 1.13; 2.15; 1 Jn 3.8), sin and death (Rom 5.21; 6.6–23; 8.3; 1 Cor 15.20–58).

Sixth, Redemption is attained through the obedience of Christ (Jn 10.18; 14.31; Phil 2.5–11).

Seventh, Redemption is carried out by the RESURRECTION OF CHRIST (Rom 1.4; 4.25; 1 Cor 15; 2 Cor 5.15) and His INTERCESSION in heaven with the Father (Rom 8.34; Heb 7.25).

These themes are scattered throughout the NT. The texts cited are simply some examples in the Scriptures whence these themes can be derived. They converge on the central truth of Christian revelation—man's deliverance from sin and his restoration to union with God by means of Christ's coming, His life, and especially His death and Resurrection. The NT authors scarcely go beyond the statement of the mystery. They illustrate various aspects of the mystery with comparisons to similar things in the world of man.

The Redemption wrought by God in Christ is something absolutely and entirely unique. Faith in the redemption accomplished by Christ was a living experience far richer than their attempted formulations of the experience. The writers formulated their experience not to set out ideas in a system, but rather to set out ideas in various contexts and on different occasions in order to foster the faith and sustain this living experience in the infant Church.

God invites man to participate in the mystery and intends that man read out of his living experience of the mystery some understanding of the reasons why. This is precisely what happened in the Church when these scriptural themes became the points of departure for the subsequent theological reflections made within the living experience of the Redemption [See REDEMPTION (IN THE BIBLE)].

Dogmatic formulations. Definitions of the Church are usually formulated in response to questions raised in controversy or in answer to a heresy.

Before the Council of Trent. There are no salient pronouncements on the subject of the Redemption by the authoritative teaching Church before the Council of Trent. No serious controversies arose in the Church over the redemptive work of Christ before the Council of Trent. It is true that the logic of the early Christological heresies and Pelagianism could have had repercussions in the doctrine of the Redemption, but unorthodoxy did not press its principles into applications in this field of the faith. The Church was satisfied to aim its anathemas at the principles themselves.

The creeds can be considered the earliest formulations of the faith on the Redemption. Employed for catechetical and baptismal purposes, the creeds are statements of the fundamental articles of the faith with a minimum of doctrinal development. In the earliest creeds, the belief in Christ as SAVIOR is professed. There is a recital of the great events of His life: Christ is born, is crucified, is buried, and rising on the third day sits at the right hand of the Father. Forgiveness of sins and life eternal are confessed, at least in an implied manner, as the fruits of the life and death and Resurrection of the Savior (cf. H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1–6).

As such, creeds develop further; one may note that a reason is assigned for the coming of the Savior. Thus in the NICENE CREED: "For us men and for our salvation He came down and was enfleshed, made man, suffered, and rose on the third day, [and] ascended into heaven" (ibid. 125). The Creed of Constantinople (381) goes one doctrinal step further by inserting: ". . . crucified also for us under Pontius Pilate" (ibid. 150).

Until the time of the Council of Trent, the faith of the Church relative to the Redemption appears in certain doctrinal pronouncements, but it does so incidentally, with other subjects. The doctrine is usually expressed in the terminology of the Scriptures or of the creeds and without any real doctrinal advance (cf. ibid. 539, 700, 801, 852). It is in the 14th century that the concept of MERIT as applied to Christ's sufferings and death begins to appear in the ecclesiastical documents (cf. H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1027, 1347).

Council of Trent and After. Significant doctrinal advances were made within the formulations issued by the Council of Trent. In defining the hereditary character of ORIGINAL SIN, the council employed the notion of merit to explain the forgiveness of sins (ibid. 1513). The concept of satisfaction is also adjoined to the notion of merit to explain the manner in which man is redeemed by Christ (ibid. 1529). This notion of satisfaction for sins offered to God in the sufferings of Christ is mentioned again in the council's treatment of the Sacrament of Penance (ibid. 1689–90; cf. 1713). (See SATISFACTION OF CHRIST).

The meaning of merit and satisfaction as applied to the Redemption will be taken up later. Only the employment of these concepts is noted here. J. Rivière remarks: "In these passages there is no question of a doctrinal definition. This was not called for. Nevertheless, by the very fact of being included in the solemn decree of justification the two categories of merit and satisfaction which were already current in the schools as describing the work of Christ acquired a kind of official character" (Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 13.2:1919).

The sacrificial character of the Redemption was affirmed by the council in its defense of the Holy Mass against the objections of the reformers (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1739–42).

While the council was still in session, Pope Paul IV in 1555 condemned the proposition of the Socinians: "Jesus Christ did not submit to the most cruel death of the cross to redeem us from sins and from eternal death and to reunite us with the Father unto eternal life" (ibid. 1880).

This formula affirms the objective character of the Redemption against those who would see in the Passion of Christ only the value of an example—an opinion to be proposed again by certain 19th-century liberal Protestant theologians.

Modern Times. Vatican Council I included in its program a general schema on Christian doctrine in which the doctrine of the Redemption was to have had a prominent place. The schema included a canon that would have declared heretical the affirmation that Christ could not and did not truly and properly satisfy for sins; that vicarious satisfaction of one mediator for all men is repugnant to divine justice. These canons do not have the authority of a pronouncement of the Church, but they manifest the thinking of the Church current at that period.

Summary. In great part these formulations from the magisterium are paraphrases of the themes derived from the text of Scripture. The teaching Church puts particular insistence on the role of the sufferings and death of Christ in the work of Redemption, but not more emphasis than the NT itself does (see 1 Cor 1.23–25; 2.2).

In the mind of the Church, the death of Christ has the value of a supreme lesson for and example to mankind. But more than that. Christ's sacrificial death is objectively and sovereignly efficacious in the work of delivering man from the evil of sin and of re-establishing the union between God and man.

There is a doctrinal advance in Trent's explanation of that efficacy by way of the theological categories of merit and satisfaction. The council did not canonize any particular theory of merit or of satisfaction in relation to the work of the Redemption. Neither did it sanction any theory of sacrifice. The council and the subsequent official teaching of the Church do, however, direct that authentic Catholic theology will explain the manner of the Redemption within some valid conception of merit and satisfaction. That is, the work of Christ somehow earns or acquires the deliverance from sin and the reunion of man with God; Christ in His sacrificial death in some real way compensates for the evil of sin and thereby becomes for man "God-given wisdom, and justice, and sanctification, and redemption" (1 Cor 1.30).

In employing these categories of merit and satisfaction, the Church has interpreted the data of revelation and sanctioned some principal currents of doctrine in tradition.

THE FATHERS ON REDEMPTION

The thought of the Fathers of the Church on the mystery of the Redemption is unsystematic. It is difficult (if not impossible) to summarize their doctrine briefly, accurately, and without distortion. Their thought is not always clear-cut or precise.

Problems in patristic thought and method. The Fathers' doctrine on the Redemption contains fixed elements derived from the Scripture, the creeds, and the liturgy. In the early Church, especially among the Greeks, the decisive moment of the Redemption in the life of the Incarnate Word is never pinpointed. In the West, the sufferings and death of Christ very soon became the events that specially focus the act of Redemption, whereas in the theology of the East, one finds a moving viewpoint according to which it is sometimes the very fact of the Incarnation in which Redemption is accomplished, sometimes the total life of Christ. Yet even in the East there is a marked emphasis on the death of Christ.

In the Scriptures, the Redemption is something God does in and through Christ for the SALVATION of sinful men. But Redemption is also something that Christ, as man, offers to God on man's behalf. The Redemption is a work that takes place in God and in man with an effectivity, apparently, in opposite directions. The Greek Fathers tend to emphasize the first conception; the Latin Fathers, the second. Though both conceptions might be affirmed side by side, an emphasis on one tends to become an underestimation of the other.

Furthermore, a writer's general approach to the Christian religion will exercise a determining influence on his doctrine of the Redemption. If Christianity is conceived of primarily as a code of conduct, Redemption through the teaching, example, and inspiration of Christ will become a key concept. If Christianity is considered a cult rather than a code, Redemption will take place through some religious event or experience in which the faithful are to participate.

In the West, cult is considered generally after the manner of an exchange. Christ offers His humanity in loving obedience to the Father in the event of His sacrificial death to obtain from the Father for sinful mankind forgiveness of sins and eternal life. The faithful participate objectively in this exchange because Christ performs the work in the name of all mankind.

In the East, cult is a mystical transplantation rather than a sacrificial exchange. Man does not so much achieve something as experience something in cultic action. The Word of God is made flesh, and by living in human history He releases into the world of men a new dynamism that is able to effect a moral reorientation and a mystical transfiguration. As a power of moral reorientation, the Christian dynamism is able to rescue man from the power of evil. As a power of transfiguration, it is able to cure him of his involvement in sin, his weakness and death, and all the other deprivations consequent to the Fall. The faithful participate objectively in this power because it has been made available to the experience of all in the life of the Church. Such divergent conceptions will set a theology of Redemption on different courses.

Summary. Historians of doctrine both Catholic and non-Catholic trace different patterns of thought and divergent lines of progress in the development of the doctrine in tradition. Each author can adduce long lists of impressive names and pages of patristic dicta to support his conclusions.

The monumental work of J. Rivière was an effort to defend a fundamental unity of doctrine in tradition against the works of A. Ritschl, L. A. Sabatier, and A. von Harnack. For the theology of Ritschl, see E. Bertrand, Une Nouvelle conception de la rédemption (Paris 1891); for Sabatier, The Doctrine of the Atonement and Its Historical Evolution, tr. V. Leuliette (London 1904); for Von Harnack, History of Dogma, tr. N. Buchanan et al., 7 v. (New York 1961) 3:310–315; 5:55–60.

These authors underlined the discordance between Scripture and tradition, between the Greek and Latin Fathers, and between primitive Christianity and the Middle Ages. The disunity is certainly not so serious and sharp as Rivière's adversaries contend. But neither is there such an obvious unity as Rivière seemed to propose amid the multiplicity of divergent ideas found in the writings of the Fathers [see G. Oggioni in Problemi e orientamenti di teologia dommatica (Milan 1957) 2:312–314, 318].

Rivière ably defended a unity in the tradition of the East and of the West, of the ancient and the modern in exposing a line of doctrinal development that leads to a theory of vicarious moral satisfaction. But he did this at the expense of failing to integrate into a theology of the Redemption other important scriptural themes and significant developments in tradition. In a section entitled "Definitive Organization in the Catholic Church," Rivière wrote, "Upon the basis of the Anselmian system, with some superficial modifications, the Catholic dogma of the Redemption rapidly took the form which it has today" (Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 13.2:1947). Today most Catholic theologians find that judgment deficient and one-sided. There has been an extensive renewal of biblical studies in the Church and a return of theology to a critical study of the sources of the faith. This renewal and return are exerting a full and fruitful influence in the theology of the Redemption. It is being seen with an ever-greater clarity that a theology of the Redemption that pays exclusive attention to the death of Christ and explains its redemptive value chiefly in terms of a moral satisfaction offered God for the sins of men is an unbalanced and impoverished theology. Besides, it is a theology not altogether faithful to the rich data in Scripture and tradition.

DOCTRINAL CONTEXT

The doctrine of the Redemption is presently in the process of an awakened and rapidly unfolding development. The development is the result of an effort to integrate the modern scholarship in Scripture and the more recent critical studies in the history of doctrine. The development is also in terms of an extension of the field of inquiry as new questions, new methodology, and new contexts are introduced into the investigations. In view of this recent theological unfolding, it is not out of place to examine the doctrinal context of the Redemption.

By "context" is meant the galaxy of subjects, issues, and multirelated divine and human facts that are to be related and integrated into a comprehensive theology of the Redemption. By "doctrinal" it is implied that what is said of these matters is verifiable in the commonly accepted doctrines of reputable theologians, biblical exegetes, and other scholars.

There are other reasons to examine this doctrinal context. First, the context provides a framework in which to organize the reflections of the more important Fathers of the Church. Second, the context affords a frame of reference in which to situate the systems of the theologians as well as those areas of present doctrinal development.

The Redemption is the mystery of God's redeeming act in and through Christ whereby mankind is delivered from the evil of sin and reunited in grace with God. This general definition implies three fundamental and distinct subjects related in the mystery: first, the redeeming activity of God in and through Christ; second, the evil of sin; third, the reunion in grace. These subjects in their theological implications are the three dimensions, as it were, of the doctrinal context of objective Redemption.

Divine Redeeming Act. The Redemption must be considered as an act accomplished both by God and by Christ. There are two phases, as it were, in the salvific act of God's merciful love.

Redeeming Act of God through Christ. The origin of the Redemption is the absolutely free love and MERCY OF GOD, who wills to incarnate His Son and send Him into the world and into human history to deliver mankind from the evil of sin and to reunite man with Himself. This statement indicates that the initiative in the redeeming act is with God. The motive is God's free love and mercy offering for man's Redemption, nothing less than the gift of Himself. The means by which the redeeming act is accomplished is the Word made flesh in His human life. The purpose is to deliver man from the evil of sin in order to unite man with God. God's act is a deliverance from something and into something. It is a deliverance-acquisition. God enables Christ as man to undertake and accomplish the work of deliverance and reunion by inspiring Christ with that love and obedience whereby the Word Incarnate freely performs in His life and in His humanity that work of liberation and ATONEMENT.

This affirmation declares that the divine redeeming activity is essentially performed by means of the human acts of the Word Incarnate motivated by love and obedience. As human acts performed in His humanity, these acts operate in the physical order. As inspired by love and obedience, these acts are operative in the moral order. Consequently, there are two parallel effectivities able to be considered in Christ's acts: a physical effectivity and a moral effectivity. As physical, Christ's acts are related to the effects that the very acts themselves produce as a result of their own operative efficiency. As moral, Christ's acts obtain a moral right that God acts to produce some effect. God raises Christ from the dead in order that the crucified and risen Lord might be able to communicate to mankind His grace of deliverance and reunion. This proposition proposes that the act of God resurrecting Christ is an essential part of the activity of God redeeming, so that the sufferings and death of Christ are not to be considered as redemptive independently of the Resurrection. It implies besides that it is by means of the Death-Resurrection event, two aspects of one mystery, that Christ, "who was delivered up for our sins, and rose again for our justification" (Rom 4.25), becomes for mankind "God-given wisdom, and justice, and sanctification, and redemption" (1 Cor 1.30).

Redeeming Act of Christ. Although the divine redeeming activity has its first and eternal origin in the love of the Blessed Trinity for sinful man (Eph 2.4), in a second moment and in "the fullness of time God sent his Son . . . that he might redeem . . . that we might receive the adoption of sons" (Gal 4.4-5). Christ is the mediator of God's redeeming activity, becoming Himself for mankind the cause of their deliverance from sin and the cause of their reunion with God in grace.

The Incarnate Word exercises this function of mediating the redemptive act of God in four ways: first, in the fact of His becoming man; second, in the mediation of His life as messiah-king, as prophet-teacher, and as high priest; third, in the mediation of His death as victor, as redeemer, as priest-victim; fourth, in the mediation of His Resurrection as savior and as intercessor.

In the very fact of the Word of God's becoming man there is an assumption by the Word not only of a human nature but also of a redemptive history. The INCARNATION is an actual and decisive event, an intervention in the current of human history. It is an event capable in itself of interrupting the processes of human history and of setting history on the course of a new direction.

The redeeming activity of God is mediated by Christ as messiah-king. Christ establishes the KINGDOM OF GOD and the new covenant by making disciples and winning their faith, love, and loyalty. In making disciples and in giving them the new law, Christ establishes the lines of that community in which deliverance from the evil of sin and reunion with God might take place and, when realized in the members, might be lived in freedom.

As prophet-teacher, Christ instructs mankind in the way of God's salvific will, in the way of response to God. Christ points out the way of life and the way of death; what is true and what is a lie. Christ becomes for mankind the way, the truth, and the life in order that men might know how they are to be delivered from evil and from what evil they are to be liberated; how to be reunited with God and what the realities and terms of that union are.

As high priest, Christ establishes the new priesthood and the new cult so that by means of the acts of cult, mankind might be enabled and inspired to hate the evil of sin and love the goodness of God.

The redeeming activity is mediated by Christ in His death as victor, as redeemer, and as priest-victim. This area of the doctrinal context bears the burden of the traditional theology of the Redemption. At this point should be set out, along general lines, the doctrine that, as variously interpreted by the theologians, is used to support their doctrinal theories.

Christ is considered as victor in His death from two points of view. In the first place, Christ is seen as victorious over the powers of evil itself. For although the death of Christ was plotted by Jews, pronounced by Pilate, and executed by Roman legionnaires, behind these men were the forces of evil itself. Our Lord Himself speaks not simply of His human assassins but of the “prince of this world” (Jn 14.30) and the “power of darkness” (Lk 22.53). Under this attack of His enemies and even in the agony of His sufferings, Christ is victorious in His supreme resolution lovingly and obediently to do as the Father commanded (Jn 14.31). Christ dies but to rise on the third day.

Second, Christ is victor in His death because by the power of His obedient charity He is able to vanquish the objections and the revulsions of His human nature in the terrors of the CRUCIFIXION. It is in the real and historical circumstances of His death that Christ finds the opportunity for the full expression of His loving obedience (cf. Jn 15.13). It is in the actual circumstances of His sufferings that Christ’s human nature becomes fully actuated by the mighty power of His grace. As redeemer, Christ, in accepting His death out of love and obedience, accomplishes in behalf of mankind that work by means of which man is delivered from his complicity in and his liability to and his oppression by sin and death. As priest-victim, Christ offers Himself in the bloody sacrifice of the cross, thereby reconciling sinful mankind to God.

How Christ as victor, redeemer, and priest-victim mediates the deliverance of man from sin and reunites him with God will be taken up shortly. How the victory affects man, how the work of deliverance is accomplished, and how the sacrifice is a reconciliation—all these questions are answered variously in the theological systems.

The redeeming activity is mediated, finally, by Christ as savior and intercessor. It is the grace of the crucified and risen Savior, the grace formed in Him by the death-Resurrection event, which is to be communicated to the faithful. This grace when shared will make those “in Christ” die to the flesh and be transformed to live to Christ in the grace of His Resurrection and in the grace of the Spirit. Moreover, Redemption is mediated by the risen Christ insofar as it is the risen Christ in the grace of His Resurrection who is the efficient cause of man’s justification (cf. Rom 4.25; 6.1–11; 8.23; St. Thomas, Summa theologiae 3a, 56.1–2).

Summary. The redemptive act is performed by God in and through Christ. The act of redeeming has its origin in God, who loves man and wills to be merciful to him. This act of God is mediated by means of the activity of the Incarnation. The redeeming activity of the Word made flesh is manifold and mediated by His very assumption of human nature, by the redemptive roles He exercised in His life, death and Resurrection and Ascension to the Father. It is this totality that accomplishes once and for all the work that is able to deliver man from the evil of sin and to reunite him in grace with God.

Evil of sin. The second dimension of the doctrinal context is the subject the evil of sin. A theology of Redemption must explain how the salvific activity of God mediated through Christ is directed to the deliverance of man from sin in all the actual or possible aspects of evil in sin (see SIN).

As introduction, it is to be remarked that sin is taken here in a biblical conception that names as sin anything defecting from what God wills to be realized in man. This conception of sin is altogether objective. It prescind from the subject’s attitude toward, or even knowledge of, the fact of this defect. It is assumed, however, that such an objective defect from God’s will enters the world of man by a deliberate abuse of intellect and will. Sin is introduced by man’s knowing and willing refusal to acknowledge God and by his failure to choose the good that God wills for him. It is this conscious and deliberate refusal and failure that introduces the evil of sin into man’s history, into his society, into his person, and consequently into his activity toward his destiny. The evil of sin, therefore, has four main aspects: evil in relation to man’s destiny; evil in relation to his person; evil in relation to his society; evil in relation to his history.

In Relation to Man’s Destiny. The evil of sin is related to man’s destiny as a condition of fallen nature. This condition is caused by man’s alienating himself from God in the act of his free choice. This act of free choice is an act of alienation when man, in his freedom, refuses to love and obey God. This act of alienation causes a state of alienation that implies, first, a loss of the supernatural gifts of GRACE; second, a withdrawal of his life from God as his final destiny; third, a choice of what he determines for himself to be his destiny.

From a moral point of view, man’s act of alienating himself from God can be understood as an act dishonoring God, or as an act violating God’s just will, or as an act injuring God’s supreme majesty, or as an act offending God’s infinite goodness. The state of man’s alienation may be considered as a debt, since man is in default of payment to God of what is His due, or as a fault, inasmuch as man’s refusal of love and obedience is a rupture of the right order between God and man.

It should be noticed that when the evil of sin is described either as the human act and state of alienation or as dishonor, offense, debt, and fault the identical reality is being described. These are two viewpoints on the same thing. God's honor is verified in man's free love and obedience. Man pays his debt to God in retaining his gifts of grace. Man will never default if he seeks God above all things. The act of alienation and its consequent state describe a physical condition of man theologically considered. Dishonor, offense, debt, and fault describe those same realities in a transposition of understanding into the moral order.

In Relation to Man's Person. The evil of sin in relation to man's person is, in the first place, damaging. The immediate result of man's alienation from God is his loss of the gifts of grace. Implied in his act of refusal to love God is a withdrawal of his life from God as his final destiny. In this act of withdrawal there is contained a choice of self. This act of choice in which a man determines for himself what will be good for him introduces within his person a condition of disintegration and disability so that his very nature as man is in a damaged condition.

There is a disintegration, an "infirmity," in what man is, because, having rejected what God wills for him, man is without that principle that must integrate both the various powers of activity within himself and his activity in relation to his fellow men. God's will determines man's nature to be what it is (cf. Summa theologiae 1a, 19.4). It is man's correspondence with that divine will that alone is the principle of social and personal integration. Without this principle, men are left to the devices of their own wills and to the autonomous desires of their own persons. Man is led in life by what St. Paul would call the spirit of the flesh (cf. Rom 7.13–25; 8.5–13). Governed solely by his own will, man is in bondage to sin. He comes to fear himself and his fellow men (cf. Rom 8.15; 7.13–25). The refusal to obey God's will is a refusal of freedom. "Everyone who commits sin is a slave of sin" (Jn 8.34; cf. Rom 6.15–23). The damaged condition of man becomes a disability, a "weakness," besides. Once a man has lost the gifts of grace, he is unable to accomplish what God wills him to achieve. As alienated from God's will, man has cut himself off from the sources of "life" that God grants to those united with Him. Man is left only with the resources of his nature now disintegrated. In Pauline terms, he is reduced to the existence of the "flesh" and his life becomes "death" (cf. Rom 7.13–25; 8.2).

Living without grace and in alienation from God, man has a disabled life. It is unproductive from God's point of view, a succession of nothing to be terminated by physical death without the hope of eternal life. Physical death ratifies and makes final what has been taking place continually: a dying in man's person from the disintegration and the disability. The result of this damage is the fact that a man is without the powers to produce what the very nature of man requires for its own well-being: ordered, purposeful activity that is good for the whole man and for the common good of society. Sin disintegrates and disables man and through him sin disorders society.

In Relation to Society. A society established by men inspired by the "lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life" (1 Jn 2.16) becomes a fallen society. Like the sinful men who compose it, society incorporates within itself the alienation from God and damaged condition of men. Society is alienated from God as it seeks its own self-assigned destiny. Society becomes disintegrated as groups within society are at counterpurposes. The social body becomes disabled in its efforts, by reason of its lack of unity in the quest for the common good. In Johannine terms, this society is the "world" that is "not from the Father" (1 Jn 2.16), that hates Christ (cf. Jn 15.18), that does not know the Word of God (cf. Jn 1.10).

It is such a society, perverted by its sinful members, that in its turn becomes a force of evil to pervert its members. In the dynamism of social influence, man is induced into sinful ways of living as his social milieu endorses his sin and provides him opportunity for the expression of his sinful person. Furthermore, fallen society enforces its mores on its members as it rewards those who adopt its standards and goals. The world loves what is its own (cf. Jn 15.19). "They are of the world; therefore of the world they speak and the world listens to them" (1 Jn 4.5).

Besides inducing its sinful members further into their personal sin, society also seduces its members into sin by engendering its ways of sin, conforming them to this world (Rom 12.2) so that they walk "according to the fashion of this world" (Eph 2.2). This seduction is imperceptible. It happens unconsciously, and without a man's being aware of it he defects from the good God wills for him. Seduced, he becomes like a sheep gone astray (1 Pt 2.25). This seduction also happens previous to the time when a man is competent to exercise his personal freedom. Personal sin mediates sin to society. Social sin and personal sin, as it has a social aspect, mediate sin into history.

In Relation to History. The evil of sin in relation to history is a kind of deviation. This deviation takes place in two historical frames of reference: first, in the history of the race as a whole and, second, in the history of the individual. By history is meant this plain fact: the condition of man and his activity at one point of time in his existence affects his condition and his activity at succeeding points along the line of time.

There is an interlocking of the before and the after in man's historic existence. This interlocking is a process in which the before affects the after in terms of continuity, causality, immanence, and transcendence. There is in the process the effect of continuity, for the after is always, at least in something, contained in the same order of things as the before. What is before is the matrix of what comes after. There is the effect of causality because there is a correlation between the existence of the before and the existence of the after. What is before is the condition of possibility for what comes after. There is the effect of immanence insofar as there is some presence of the before in the after. What is before is a determinant of what comes after. Finally, there is the effect of transcendence inasmuch as the after is able, in something, to go beyond the before by means of the unique contribution of the present, the now.

First, in the actual history of the race, the sin of Adam at the beginning of history causes Adam's condition to be that of fallen man, alienated, damaged in his disintegration and disability. This condition is the beginning of a process in which the before affects the after and in which the after is able to transcend the before.

The first man passes on to those after him a condition like his own. Men are born alienated from God, damaged in view of God's will that man be elevated to grace. Man becomes disintegrated as soon as the choice of self, proceeding from his person deprived of grace and of nature's integrity, becomes actual. This process is repeated as generation follows generation. The process is also transposed to the social order as the social lines of a sinful society at any given point of time are affected by the social dimensions of a previous society in terms of continuity, causality, immanence. The process compounds itself through the effect of transcendence as both men and society make their unique contributions to the alienation and damage of sin. The result is a perpetuation of evil, a process of continual, ever-widening deviation from the will of God.

Second, when the evil of sin is considered in relation to the history of the individual, certain considerations must be introduced. In the context of concrete existence, the human individual may be considered a "person" insofar as he freely disposes of himself by personal decision and possesses his own reality in the act of making a free decision about himself. In this same method of considering man, the individual is also a "nature," that is, all in him that is given and is prior to this personal and free disposal of himself.

Nature is the object-given, the passivity, the reception, the spontaneous in man. Nature is the condition of his possibility. Person is the subject-positing, the activity-determining, the man in his freedom to determine himself as a whole in relation to what is good.

The terms "person" and "nature" with this meaning must be distinguished from these same terms as they have been traditionally used in scholastic theology. The use of the terms here is in the context of the modern metaphysics of existence. Some such terms are necessary because there is a need to distinguish between that in man which is given, which is structured and dynamic within him but without his freely disposing himself as such, and that in man which is such as it is by reason of his free disposition of himself. This is the distinction that common sense sees partially in the division between "what I am" and "what I want to be and try to be."

In the personal history of man and in the context of this dualism, nature is prior to person. Nature is acted upon and has its specific activity before a person acts to posit that which the subject freely wishes to be. This dynamism of nature is the necessary presupposition of the conscious, free decision of the person. And although the free decision of person should comprehend and transform the prior and spontaneous act of nature, the act of nature and the determinations already set up in nature come to affect the act of person.

It happens that before person in man is sufficiently awakened and before he is able to dispose of himself as a whole toward what is good simply, and before the inner core of the subject-person is able to posit what he will be and modify what he actually is, nature has already been determined in a deviation toward sin. Nature has already been determined as born alienated from God, damaged in view of God's will concerning the ELEVATION OF MAN to grace. Nature is potentially disintegrated and disabled because, lacking a positive conversion to God, the man is potentially converted to self.

The potential conversion to self becomes actual from three agencies. (1) The spontaneous dynamisms of "nature" tend to the particular good, not to good simply but to what is good in the here and now for the subject. Such tendencies induce the subject into acts of choice toward particular goods. And such a choice becomes equivalent to a choice of self, given the lack of a "personal" conversion to good simply. These acts lay down habituations and sets of determinations that are dynamic elements within the subject when the person is first called upon to make the free decision of person. Consequently, antecedent to the subject's determination of himself by personal decision, dynamic orientations are already there within the subject's nature toward specific self-related values. In the dynamism of these determinations, freedom of personal choice is jeopardized because the determinations of nature tend to specify the act of person in terms of a continunity with nature, a causality from nature and in an immanence of nature. Person penetrates nature with difficulty. Nature must be reformed and person fortified in its own dynamism before free decision succeeds completely in making its way without being deviated by nature. (2) Personal choice is further deviated by the influence on the subject by other sinful persons. (3) Personal determination is deviated by the influence exerted by sinful society. Until a person is able to take up a stand, command and comprehend its freedom, the human subject is related to others and to his society in a relationship of profound dependency. In this dependency nature is open and a person is susceptible to whatever modifications the external personal and social environment introduces. In the concrete circumstances of his human history, a man's personal freedom is jeopardized so that he is not able to overcome what he is by nature through the free decision of person.

Summary and Conclusions. It is in man and in man's world where sin is situated as something real and concrete. Sin in its reality is fundamentally something (or, to put it more accurately, something missing) in man. But given the facticity of sin in man, one can go on and consider the evil of sin in other categories of intelligibility.

From a moral point of view, the evil of sin is transposed in understanding and is seen as a rupture of the interpersonal relations between God and man. One goes on to speak of how God regards sinful man and how man dares to regard God. One speaks of the rights of the person offended, of the obligation and the manner of making a suitable satisfaction for the offense. The categories of explanation of sin and deliverance from it are contained within the field of amicable, interpersonal relationship.

From a juridical point of view, the evil of sin is transposed into the order of law. Sin is seen as a violation of law incurring the penalties that justice decrees as corrective or vindictive punishments. One speaks of the expiation of crimes, of penalties undergone to avoid the retributive punishments determined by law. The categories of explanation of sin and of man's deliverance from sin are retained within the context of jurisprudence.

These transpositions in the understanding of sin are an enrichment of the conceptions of the fact of sin. The mystery of sin is related to familiar analogies in human affairs. But these conceptions tend to become an impoverishment and, possibly, a distortion of the fact. Sin is a rupture of the relations between God and man. Sin is a violation of law. Nevertheless, the reach and applications of these conceptions fall short of comprehending the totality of aspects in the reality of man's sin. It is never theologically safe to discuss the WILL OF GOD and His law without looking at the reality and seeing it steadily. God's law is God's will. God's actual will is the cause of the reality of things such as they are.

It is necessary to understand sin not only in the moral and juridical orders but primarily in the physical order of man's actual condition. In this physical order, sin is something done to man. Sin is also something happening to man. If the Redemption is to be the deliverance from this evil, then Redemption must be both something done (completed) and something happening (continued) to deliver him from all the aspects of reality in sin.

Reunion in grace. Like the subject of sin, the reunion in grace has several aspects insofar as the realities of this reunion are transposed into various frames of understanding. The reunion in grace may be considered in relation to the physical order, the moral order, the juridical order.

In the Physical Order. The reunion in grace has the aspect of identity with the deliverance from sin when this reunion is considered in the physical order. As God has determined things, there is no deliverance from sin without a reunion in grace (cf. Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 113.2). If sin be an alienation, mankind is delivered from this evil by the gift that will convert him to God and sustain that conversion. If sin be a damage, man is delivered by the gift that restores the integrity and the ability of his nature. If sin be a social perversion, society is delivered by the gift that reforms the lines of perverted society. If sin be a historical deviation, history is delivered by the gift that reorients the processes of human history.

In this frame of reference, theology must explain how the redeeming activity of Christ is related to the grace of conversion for mankind, the grace of personal restoration, the grace of social reform, and the grace of historical reorientation.

In the Moral Order. Sin is conceived, in the moral order, as an offense against God. Offense is given when several wills regard the same object and there is contrariety of choice and conflict of act between those wills. One person wills and acts contrary to the will and act of another person. This other person is offended if he has equal or superior rights over the subject. God wills that man love and obey Him. In sinning, man refuses this love and obedience. God is offended by this will and act of man for God has absolute rights over man. Man has the obligation to reverence his Creator.

To be reunited to God, man must willingly and with love do that which God loves more than He hates the offense. In this moral frame of reference, theology explains how the work of Christ is something God can love more than He hates the sin of mankind, so that by reason of this compensating work of Christ, satisfaction is made for the offense and grace is given man by God.

Another consideration in the moral order understands sin as a fault or a debt. As a fault, sin is a defection destroying the right order that must obtain between God and man. From this aspect, theology shows how the work of Christ accomplishes a mutual reconciliation through the act of propitiation. As a debt, sin is the refusal of man to offer what he owes to his Creator. From a basis in this understanding, theology proposes how the work of Christ offers a payment or ransom so that man, redeemed from his debt and solvent through Christ's work, may avail himself freely of God's grace for a life of love and obedience.

In the Juridical Order. Sin is understood in the juridical order as a violation of the just law of God that demands that the sinner be punished according to his crimes. From this conception, theology will describe how the work of Christ is an EXPIATION for the penalty due to sins so that, God's justice being satisfied, He may freely and lovingly give the grace of pardon to man.

It will be noticed that when the understanding of sin is transposed into the moral and juridical orders, the redeeming activity appears as a work that Christ as man offers to God on behalf of man. The effectivity of Christ's work has a term in (or at least a direction toward) God. Man comes to God in the Redemption achieved by Christ. However, when sin is seen in the physical order, the redeeming activity is a work done by God in Christ and offered to man. Both the term and the direction of the effectivity are immediately related to man. God comes to man in the Redemption performed by Christ.

These two conceptions of the Redemption point up a significant fact. In the moral order, it is man who must reunite himself to God, for God never ceases to love man. In the physical order, it is God who must reunite Himself to man, because, once man loses this supernatural union with God, there is nothing man can do to regain this union.

THEOLOGICAL REFLECTION ON INCARNATION ITSELF

In this section and the corresponding one that follows, the more important theories will be situated within the doctrinal context. The first dimension of the context, namely, the divine redeeming activity in and through Christ, will provide the points of departure in this discussion.

Considered first will be the theories based on the Incarnation itself as redemptive. According to such theories, the Incarnation is like a new act of creation; or better, a new moment in the creational act of God when God purposes to create all things anew in Christ. This doctrine is a theme in the writings of St. John and St.

Paul. In it the very coming of Christ and His life as a totality are understood as redemptive.

Mystical explanation. St. Irenaeus founds his redemptive theory of RECAPITULATION in Christ on this scriptural basis. His insight was to conceive an identity of pattern and a parallelism of action between the course of man's history, beginning with creation and Adam's sin, and Christ's salvific life. Irenaeus traces a pattern of identity and a parallelism of contrasts in these two courses of history with a remarkable ingenuity. For Irenaeus, Christ recapitulates humanity. Christ is a compendium of human history by summarizing in His life the course of human history as willed by God and by reiterating in His life the human processes, being victorious where man fell in defeat. The conception most notable in Irenaeus is the understanding that Christ comes and shares all the experiences of humanity, sin only excepted. Living our life in the circumstances of our history, Christ conquers the forces of evil at work in the world and thereby reverses the processes of human history. Instead of man's history leading him to sin and death, by the work of Christ, those men who are united with Him are brought to divinization and immortality.

Realistic explanation. Modern theology returns to this idea left in tradition by St. Irenaeus and echoed by Tertullian and St. Methodius. In becoming man, Christ entered the world formed by the history of apartness from God. This alienation causes "sin and death" (in the Pauline eschatological sense of definitive separation from God). Although Christ could not be touched by the moral guilt of sin, He took upon Himself the historic conditions of our sinful existence. He came "in the likeness of sinful flesh" (Rom 8.3) and "did not consider being equal to God a thing to be clung to, but emptied himself, taking the nature of a slave and being made like unto men" (Phil 2.7). He became "one tried as we are in all things except sin" (Heb 4.15) and even "learned obedience from the things that he suffered" (Heb 5.8).

In His Incarnation, Christ as man chose a self-emptying, a condition in which the fullness of His grace was not able to have its full effects. It was the very life history of the Incarnation in the actual unfolding of His life that provided, under God's providence, those opportunities permitting the full expression of His grace and those conditions allowing the Spirit of God to penetrate fully and to possess entirely His created nature. In this abasement, Christ accepted a historic solidarity with the sinful human race (see KENOSIS).

F. X. Durrwell writes that "the redemption of human nature is a drama unfolding first of all in Christ. It takes place in him as a sanctifying transformation from the state of sinful flesh to the holiness of divine life which is its direct opposite” (The Resurrection 58). This act of God transforming the humanity of Christ in the circumstances of His lifetime from the state of sinful flesh to full participation in the divine life is the redemptive act mediated by Christ to sinful man for the reorientation of his history. The redeeming act of God is not a single, static act. It is a continual irruption into history: into Christ’s history first, and then through Him into the history of mankind. The Redemption begins from the first moment of the Incarnation and spans the lifetime of Christ, so that the life of Christ as a unit has the aspect of efficiency in relation to the deliverance from the evil of sin and to the return in grace in their historical dimensions.

Moralistic explanation. Another theological viewpoint that conceives the Incarnation in its totality as the cause of man’s Redemption is the so-called moralistic, or exemplarist, theory. This theory considers the life of Christ as the supreme example of how man is to encounter the circumstances of his life and how God is prepared to act to deliver man from sin and to unite man to Himself. In this conception, Redemption is accomplished primarily by God’s grace and only secondarily through the revelation, example, and inspiration in the life of Christ. The life of Christ is a work performed by God in humanity to be seen and considered by man and thereby to become the occasion for faith in God’s redemptive act. Christ’s life is a living lesson of faith and a lesson for living the free gift of faith offered men by God.

The theory stated in such general terms has a scriptural basis and is represented in the writings of the Fathers, particularly: Ignatius, Clement of Alexandria, the apologists in general, Origen, and Augustine. The theory is valid because the example and teaching of Christ are redemptive insofar as there is presented objectively for all mankind the revelation of God’s redemptive will and that source of inspiration to motivate men to respond to God’s saving grace.

No Catholic theologian will question the fidelity of this theory to Scripture and tradition until it is pressed to the conclusion that the life of Christ has the value only of an example, that the efficacy of His life is exclusively that of revelation and inspiration. Abelard seems to have held this conclusion, and later the Socinians. More recently, it has become the preferred theory of many liberal Protestant theologians, who follow the current of 19th-century rationalism or the existentialist interpretations of Christianity fostered by R. Bultmann [see J. Rivière, The Doctrine of the Atonement 1:18–33; L. Malevez, SJ, The Christian Message and Myth, tr. O. Wyon (Westminster, Md. 1958) 67–117].

Christ messiah-king and high priest. Although no redemptive theory has been elaborated on the specific doctrine of Christ messiah-king and high priest, modern theology would insist upon integrating into the theology of the Redemption Christ’s life activity of making disciples and establishing the foundations of that community of life and cult wherein the deliverance from the evil of sin might take place and the reunion, once begun, might be fostered and sustained. It is Christianity as the community formed by Christ that becomes redemptive of society’s perversion. The Christian community by means of the dynamism of social influence counters and corrects the seducing influence of the “world.” This is an area of present doctrinal development.

THEOLOGICAL REFLECTION ON VICTOR, REDEEMER, VICTIM

The redeeming activity of God is mediated by Christ in His death as victor, as redeemer, and as victim. This doctrinal statement embraces five of the seven scriptural themes on Redemption. It is, besides, a doctrinal summary of the greater part of the official teaching of the Church. As well, it is a compendium of the central body of doctrine presented by the Fathers and the theologians and is a foundation for several theories of the Redemption. Only the barest outline of these systems is offered here.

Christ as victor. Christ’s victory over the devil, “sin and death,” is a theme from Scripture, and from the earliest times there was a tradition of developing a theory of the Redemption around this favorite theme or idea. The theme began to be developed as early as St. Ignatius, and it was carried in the current of tradition both in the East and in the West until the time of St. Thomas Aquinas.

Devil’s Rights. The theory of the devil’s rights, as it has been called, has almost as many variations as there are writers handling it. But fundamental to the doctrine is the representation (this is a product of image-thinking) of a contest between Christ and the devil, who holds man in the bondage of “sin and death.” In the theory, sin and death are personifications of the dynamic forces of evil within man’s life and the allies of the devil. Christ conquers sin because the devil cannot tempt Christ from His resolution to obey even in the terrors of the Crucifixion. Christ conquers death in His rising from the dead in divine power. As a result of Christ’s victory, the devil is a vanquished foe of man. God delivers all those united to Christ the Victor from the power of the evil one.

When the theory of the devil’s rights is understood in sympathy with image-thinking, the theory appears to be an effort to explain how the work of Christ delivers man from that evil of sin that is nonpersonal and beyond the evil present only in the disordered and deliberate will of the individual. Such a nonpersonal and transcendent evil is the evil of sin in its social and historical aspects.

Person vs. Nature. A new development in theology would see the victory of Christ in another way. In the actual assumption of the human nature by the Word, Christ's human nature is in the condition of "sinful flesh." This condition allows that, although Christ is personally sinless and although His humanity is endowed with a fullness of grace, He will suffer unto death in His humanity in performing the will of God. This suffering is significant. The very fact that Christ is able to suffer is evidence of the fact that nature in Christ is able to have its own determinations, its own "will" as St. Thomas calls it (cf. Summa theologiae 3a, 18.3–4). St. Thomas also quotes St. John Damascene to the effect that "the divinity of Christ permitted His humanity to do and to be done to in whatever manner is proper to human nature" (ibid. 3a, 46.8).

Therefore in the terrors of the Crucifixion (and even in the less difficult situations of Christ's life) nature in Christ is able to protest. Pain and sorrow are the signs of nature's objections, of the protest that nature does not want that which both external causes and personal decision force upon it. The Crucifixion was the external condition that nature in Christ violently refused, as is apparent in the agony in the garden (Lk 22.39–45). But the mighty act of free decision of Person in Christ, fortified by divine love and obedience, conquers the act of nature in Christ's obedient choice of His death. This act of free decision in Christ has as its first effect a disposition of nature itself. Nature is penetrated by Person, and Person succeeds in having its way. "By sending his Son in the likeness of sinful flesh [that is, with a nature able to object and protest to what is concretely to be performed to fulfill God's will] he has condemned [conquered] sin in the flesh" (Rom 8.3).

Christ as Redeemer. In the present context, redeeming means specifically the act of delivering from sin. There are three general theories explaining the deliverance of mankind from sin by the death of Christ the Redeemer.

Substitutional Penal Expiation. The evil of sin may be conceived primarily in the juridical order, as a violation of the divine law that decrees rewards for virtue and punishment for vice. Analogies from jurisprudence are employed to illustrate this theory. Redemption is accomplished according to this system by the objective fulfillment of divine laws eternally enacted. Divine law decrees that for sins committed there must be punishment equal to the crime. If the sinner does not repent, the punishment is inflicted upon him. Should he repent, he must voluntarily accept punishment to make up for his evil act. As voluntarily accepted, the punishment becomes satisfaction rather than vindictive punishment.

In the case of man's sin, adequate satisfaction is impossible. Deprived of grace, man is forever unable to love God as he ought. Besides, as the crime of a creature against his Creator, man's sin takes on an infinite magnitude. Since God cannot forgive sins according to His justice until an equitable satisfaction is made, man is hopelessly in his sin and under the threat of punishment. Yet because God loves man, even when he is a sinner (Rom 5.9), God decrees in mercy to send His Son, who in His sufferings and death offers the satisfaction that divine justice demands. Christ, as divine and sinless, offers an infinite satisfaction. Christ, as man, takes our place and suffers the punishment divine justice imposes for the sins of mankind.

Such an explanation can be sustained by plausible interpretations of Scripture. It has been proposed in the writings of many Fathers, theologians, and especially orators. The theory was accepted in great part by the reformers, who recast it somewhat in view of their principle of imputed justice. For the leaders of the Reformation, the sins of all mankind are gathered and burdened on Christ. Christ suffers the condemnation and the punishment once and for all so that man might be free of it. Freed from the judgment on sin, men are imputed just by reason of the death of Christ, which cancels the sentence of condemnation and punishment (see IMPUTATION OF JUSTICE AND MERIT).

At its best, this system of penal substitution proposes to the faithful the doctrine of the inexorability of punishment for sin and the necessity of satisfaction. It presents the cross of Christ as the great manifestation of the evil of sin. But when it affirms that Christ assumed the punishment so that man would not have to suffer it, or that Christ offered satisfaction so that men need not make it, the theory is theologically unsound. When it affirms that God delivered Christ to His cross to manifest to the world not only the evil of sin but also how severely sin is punished, this is nothing less than terrorism.

If sin is inexorably punished (and it is), this is because the sinner himself passes a sentence of suffering upon himself and his world in his very sin, which damages himself and contributes to the perversion of his society and to the deviation of history. God need do nothing but let the laws of man work themselves out. If satisfaction is necessary, it is because even after repentance a man must positively do something to compensate for the evil done in his nature by the act of sin, to his society, and to human history. If the cross of Christ is a manifestation of the evil of sin, this is because it was evil men who hated the Person who would save them from themselves.

But the theory has an insight. It can be said that Christ takes away the punishment due to sin and makes satisfaction in man's place because, by reason of Christ's work, man will not have to suffer the kind of punishment from sin that would have been man's fate if Christ had not come to bring grace and truth to the world. It can be said that Christ makes satisfaction for sin in man's place because, by reason of the grace of Christ for man's person, his society, and his history, man is not required to compensate for the evil perpetrated by his sin in the manner that would have been necessary (indeed, impossible) had not Christ come "to serve and give his life as a ransom for many" (Mk 10.45).

Vicarious Moral Satisfaction. In this system, the evil of sin is considered in the moral order as an offense of God, destroying the interpersonal relationship between God and man. The theory intends to explain why God loves sinful man and forgives his sins while he is yet a sinner and offers the grace of restoration.

God sends His Son into human nature and inspires in Him an indomitable charity for and obedience to God and a boundless love for mankind. United to mankind by the bonds of flesh and blood and charity, Christ is willed by God to become the head of humanity, so that what Christ does is done for Himself and also in behalf of His members, who are as one mystical person with Him (Summa theologiae 3a, 48.2 ad 1). Christ, in our name and on our behalf, offers God His love and obedience in His sufferings and death. It is this offering that God can love more than He hates the offense of mankind.

Christ, as head of humanity, is given grace not only for Himself but also for His members, and His works are referred to Himself and to others as the works of another man are referred simply to himself (ibid. 3a, 48.2). Consequently, since God gives as a reward for a man's actions that for which He gave him the power to act (ibid. 1a2ae, 114.1), and since God gives grace to Christ for the attainment of salvation, Christ merits glorification for Himself and salvation for all men (ibid. 3a, 48.1; 49.6).

Such is St. Thomas's doctrine simply stated and without the many doctrinal implications to be drawn out by the application of other principles in his thought. This theory avoids all the improprieties of the theory of substitutional juridical satisfaction. The doctrine centers on the love and obedience of Christ as the cause of man's deliverance from sin and his reunion in grace. The efficiency of Christ's loving obedience in the delivering of man from sin is by way of moral compensation or satisfaction. The efficiency of Christ's obedient love in reconciling man with God is by way of merit. Satisfaction and merit are considered as operative in the moral order. Christ performs the redemptive work not in our place but rather in our behalf, as united to us in a moral solidarity.

Representative Physical Satisfaction. The third theory would transpose the understanding of Redemption from the moral order to the physical order. This transposition is encouraged by St. Thomas's doctrine of "capital grace." This doctrine affirms that it is the very grace resident in Christ in its physical entity that becomes the source and cause of grace for all men (ibid. 3a, 8; De ver. 29.4, 5; Comp. theol. 214). Or to put the same fact in another way, it is the Sacred Humanity in its physical entity as "graced" that is the conjoined instrument of God in the production of grace in all mankind (Summa theologiae 3a, 13.2; 19.1; 62.5).

With this doctrine as the premise, this theory affirms that it is the actual event of the Crucifixion that forms the grace in Christ so as to be the source of grace delivering men from the evil of sin. In other words, it is the historic event of Christ's sufferings and death in which the Sacred Humanity becomes in a fullness the instrument of God for the production of that grace which will deliver man from sin.

The act of person in free decision has as its first effect a disposition of the subject himself. Christ's personal act of loving obedience sustained in His sufferings overmasters the act of nature that as nature refuses the cross. The effect of this act within Christ Himself is a victory of transformation of the nature of Christ Himself, so that nature joins with Person in the cry of victory: "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit" (Lk 23.46). "It is consummated!" (Jn 19.30). This transformation in Christ is real and pertains to what Christ actually is as man. It is in this transformation that the grace of Christ becomes disposed so as to be the grace for all mankind delivering them from sin. What happened to Christ was physical.

What happened in Christ is also satisfactory in the sense that the redemptive power of Christ and His grace more than offset the power of evil in mankind. "Where the offense has abounded, grace has abounded yet more" (Rom 5.20). God can love what Christ does in loving obedience more than He hates the evil of man's sins because Christ's loving obedience when communicated to mankind actually effects more good in the world than sin causes evil.

What happened in Christ is, furthermore, meritorious, for the transformation in the Sacred Humanity is that very effect which God gave Christ the power to accomplish. Merit is not only a right to a reward for an act performed; merit is also the accomplishment and the possession of the actual effects of one's acts.

Finally, Christ in this transformation is representative rather than vicarious or substitutional. The transformation itself is representative in the order of signs, for what happened in Christ manifests what must happen in man in order that he be delivered from sin, namely, a death to the flesh when person, fortified by grace, resists to death the sinful ways of nature. Christ Himself is representative in the order of physical reality, for Christ, in solidarity with human history, is the event that reorients history's deviation; in solidarity with human society, He is that social Person who is able to reshape the form of social living; in solidarity with men, He is that Person who is able to convert man's person and restore his nature.

Christ as priest-victim. Sacred revelation presents the death of Christ in the context of sacrifice. Christ mediates the redemptive activity of God as priest-victim. Scripture reveals simply the fact that the death of Christ is a sacrifice of reconciliation of man to God. The Sacred Text does not reveal precisely how the death of Christ is to be understood as sacrificial. Neither has the Church designated any precise sacrificial theory in which the faithful are to understand this sacrifice.

When theologians attempt to explain the death of Christ in the context of sacrifice, there are two doctrinal controls that guide their explanations. First, the sacrifice of Christ must be explained in some continuity with the ritual of sacrifice in the Old Law, the figure of things to come. Second, the sacrifice of the cross must be explained in a coherence with the doctrine of Christ's death as redemptive in delivering from sin.

Sacrifice of Expiation. If the theory of the redemptive death is cast in the juridical order, the death of Christ will be understood as a sacrifice of expiation. Theologians who hold this theory see Christ's death in an analogy with the expiatory sacrifices of the Old Law in which (so these writers consider) an animal was symbolically loaded with the sins of the people and then ritually slain. The animal is substituted for sinful man, and man, seeing the death of the animal, may understand what his sins deserve and how severe are God's punishments. By means of this sacrifice, God's anger is appeased and His wrath averted.

The theory has had many adherents among both Catholics and Protestants, especially among the reformers themselves. But biblical research has questioned, indeed attacked, this understanding of the death of Christ in terms of such an expiatory sacrifice. It is affirmed in this theory that the sins of mankind are imputed to Christ. God permits, even wills, that Christ be slain both to appease His anger and to manifest to the world the evil of sin and the fact that God will not forgive without satisfaction being made either by the innocent or by the guilty. It does not matter. This is nothing short of amorality, even immorality. In such an understanding of the Redemption, God does not keep His own command to man to forgive without demanding satisfaction (Mt 5.38–48).

Sacrifice of Propitiation. If the redeeming death is understood in the moral order, then the sacrifice of the cross is conceived of as a sacrifice of propitiation or reconciliation. In the OT sacrifices, so this doctrine explains it, there was: a victim (something suitably representing man), an offering (to represent man's gift of himself to God), the act of immolation (some sacred action done to the victim to express man's irrevocable dedication of himself to God), an official priest to offer the sacrifice in the name of the community that participates in the victim offered.

St. Thomas fits these essential sacrificial lines over the offering of Christ on the cross. Christ is a suitable victim representing man, as having His humanity to offer and being the head of humanity. There is an offering in Christ's willingly going to His death. There is an act of immolation in His fatal Crucifixion. Christ Himself is the priest offering what is most acceptable to God. The faithful are able to participate in the victim through Christ's gift of the Eucharist (Summa theologiae 3a, 48.3).

Recent Thought. A more recent trend in Catholic thought finds something more involved in Christ's sacrifice. After investigating the idea of sacrifice in the OT, many theologians are recasting the conception of the immolative act, and in this recasting the significance of sacrifice is somewhat modified. Sacrifice is a ritualistic expression of man's dedication to God. It is, besides, an effort to attain an actual union with the divinity. Man offers himself in sacrifice, and God is understood as actually accepting man by giving him a participation in the divinity in and through the sacrifice itself.

In the moral order the purpose of sacrifice is conceived of as man's effort to please God. In the physical order the purpose of sacrifice is to effect in man what is pleasing to God, to produce in man what is in itself the reconciliation with God.

Transposing the understanding of sacrifice into the physical order, the act of immolation has as its purpose the ending of the form of existence the victim had had hitherto in order that the oblata might become sacred to God. The act of immolation signified a transfer of the profane and human thing to divine ownership. The rite was a sort of consecration, an invitation for God to make it His own and transform it into something divine. The offerers expected God to accept the gift, sanctify it, and impregnate it with His divinity so that all those who partook of it might share in the divine holiness and be in communion with God.

The rite of immolation has two moments. First, there is the act of transfer, when the gift is taken out of the realm of the profane and placed in the realm of the divine. Second, there is the act of transformation, when the gift is sanctified in God's very acceptance of it.

Applying this doctrine to the sacrifice of the cross, the act of transfer is verified in the following manner. Christ's consent to undergo His sufferings is the offering of the victim of sacrifice. The historical event of His Crucifixion presented Christ with that final and full opportunity for the free act of Person to transform nature by bringing nature into full submission to and perfect acceptance of the will of Person. This transformation of nature is the transfer of the Sacred Humanity from the condition of "likeness of sinful flesh." In the death of Christ, the first moment of the immolative act is accomplished.

It is the Resurrection in which the second moment is fulfilled, when God raises Christ from the dead and His humanity is transformed by the fullness of participation in the divine life and the complete possession of the Spirit. "In the light of [this] sacrificial theory, the glorification of Christ appears as a necessary phase of his oblation. It is the completion without which his sacrifice is essentially mutilated and is therefore no sacrifice—just as there can be no movement which does not arrive anywhere, and no gift where there is no one to accept it. His glorification not only completes his sacrifice in itself, but also makes it beneficial; in the divinized victim, God communicates himself to the offerer and to all who eat at the altar" (Durrwell, The Resurrection 76).

Redemption mediated by the risen Christ. One last point of the doctrinal context needs be discussed: the mediation of the Redemption through the Resurrection of Christ. St. Thomas considered the Resurrection, as well as the sufferings and death of Christ, as being an integral part of Christ's redemptive work (Summa theologiae 3a, 56). But St. Thomas's contemporaries and his successors made little of this doctrine as long as the theology of Redemption was dominated by the concepts of merit and satisfaction as understood in the juridical and moral orders.

The contribution of modern biblical research to the theology of the Redemption is the growing understanding of the data demonstrating that in the mind of St. Paul the Resurrection is inseparable from the Passion in the work of salvation. Christ "was delivered up for our sins, and rose again for our justification" (Rom 4.25). Following out the line of thought in which the Redemption is conceived of as something happening in the physical order, the Resurrection is the event in human history that reorients its course of deviation. The risen Christ becomes the redemptive source of social reform and the cause of personal conversion and restoration.

The event of the Resurrection reorients the course of human history, for it is an intervention by God through an event that interrupts the course of continuity, causality, and immanence set up in history by sin. In resurrecting Christ, God establishes Him as a new principle of continuity. By the power of the risen Christ, God sends His Spirit into men to enable them to do the same work in history that Christ Himself performed in His lifetime. A new order of things begins. In the Resurrection, Christ has the power to communicate His nature to men, the nature transformed by grace in His Resurrection. A new form of man's existence begins. Through the Resurrection, Christ is enabled to communicate His Person to men in the mystery of Christ (cf. Col 1.24; Eph 3.17; Rom 16.25–27). A new immanence of God in Christ begins in man's history.

The risen Christ is the source of social reform as being the head of the Church. Christ engenders in it His Spirit, His life, and His Person, enabling it to deliver men from the evil of sin and reunite them to God through its preaching of Him, through its administration of His sacrifice and Sacraments, and through its life for and service of mankind.

The risen Christ is the source of personal restoration and conversion to God, because the grace formed in the Crucifixion and communicated to Christ's members is a grace enabling them to die to the flesh. As a grace filled with the Spirit in the Resurrection, it is a grace enabling men to live unto God in the fullness of the Spirit. "Jesus Christ our Lord was established Son of God in power according to the spirit of holiness by resurrection from the dead, through whom we have received grace and apostleship to bring about the obedience to faith among all the nations" (Rom 1.4–6).

Conclusion. The deliverance of man from the evil of sin and the reunion of man with God are realized in the mystery of the encounter of God's loving act, which in saving man will involve him in his being delivered up for his sins and rising again for justification (cf. Rom 4.25). Redemption for sinful mankind is the reproduction within man's person, within his society, and within his history of the pattern of person and nature and life-purpose that God established in Christ the Savior.

See Also: SOTERIOLOGY; MAN, 3; PASSION OF CHRIST, I (IN THE BIBLE); PASSION OF CHRIST, II (DEVOTION TO), PERSON (IN THEOLOGY).

Bibliography: J. RIVIÈRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 13.2:1912–2004; The Doctrine of the Atonement, tr. L. CAPPADelta (St. Louis 1909); Le Dogme de la rédemption dans la théologie contemporaine (Albi 1948). J. GEWIESS et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:1016–30. A. D'ALÈS, Dictionnaire apologetique de la foi catholique, ed. A. L'ALÈS (Paris 1911–22) 4:542–582. F. BAMMEL et al., Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 2:576–600. C. ANDRESEN, Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum ed. T. KLAUSER [Stuttgart 1941 (1950)—] 6:54–219. J. GNILKA and W. DETTLOFF, Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe, ed. H. FRIES (Munich 1962–63) 1:303–319, A. MÉDEBIELLE, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl., ed. L. PIROT (Paris 1928—) 3: 1–262. A. RICHARDSON, The Interpreters' Dictionary of the Bible, ed. G. A. BUTTRICK (Nashville, Tenn.) 168–181. G. AULEN, Christus victor, tr. A. G. HEBERT (New York 1931). J. BONSRIVEN, The Theology of the New Testament, tr. S. F. L. TYE (Westminster, Md. 1963). F. X. DURRWELL, The Resurrection: A Biblical Study, tr. R. SHEED (New York 1960); In the Redeeming Christ, tr. R. SHEED (New York 1963). R. S. FRANKS, The Work of Christ (New York 1962). T. H. HUGHES, The Atonement (London 1949). B. J. F. LONERGAN, De Verbo Incarnato (3d ed. Rome 1964). S. LYONNET, De peccato et redemptione, v.1–2 (Rome 1957–61); “Conception paulinienne de la rédemption,” Lumière et vie 7 (1958) 35–66; “La Valeur sotériologique de la résurrection du Christ selon saint Paul,” Gregorianum 39 (1958) 295–318; “De notione redemptionis,” Verbum Domini 36 (1958) 129–146. L. MORALDI, Espiazione sacrificale e riti espiatori . . . (Analecta biblica 5; Rome 1956). PHILIPPE DE LA TRINITÉ, What Is Redemption?, tr. A. ARMSTRONG (New York 1961). L. RICHARD, Le Mystère de la rédemption (Tournai 1959). L. SABOURIN, Rédemption sacrificielle (Bruges 1961). V. TAYLOR, The Atonement in New Testament Teaching (3d ed. London 1958); Jesus and His Sacrifice (New York 1955). H. E. W. TURNER, The Patristic Doctrine of Redemption (London 1952). A. VONIER, The Incarnation and Redemption, v. 1 of Collected Works, 3 v. (Westminster, Md. 1952–53). P. DE LETTER, “Theology of Satisfaction,” Thomist 21 (1958) 1–28. P. GRECH, “Protestant Theories Explaining the Redemption,” Theology Digest 5 (1957) 183–188.

[E. L. PETERMAN/EDS.]

REDEMPTOR HOMINIS

Pope JOHN PAUL II's sixth encyclical letter, issued on March 4, 1979. Redemptor hominis (RH) can be viewed, especially in the light of subsequent documents and events, as a programmatic statement revealing many of the themes that have come to define the pontificate. Foremost among these is the anticipation of the year 2000. Already in the first paragraph the Pope announces that the millennial year “will be the year of a great Jubilee.” It becomes clear that John Paul envisions his papal ministry as the continued unfolding and reception of the Second Vatican Council in anticipation of the Jubilee Year 2000. The Church prepares to enter the 21st century precisely by deepening its understanding and implementation of the directions taken at Vatican II.

The encyclical comprises four sections: “Inheritance” (1–6), “The Mystery of the Redemption” (7–12), “Redeemed Man and His Situation in the Modern World” (13–17), and “The Church's Mission and Man's Destiny” (18–22). Although a number of the documents of Vatican II are cited, clearly it is Gaudium et spes that provides the encyclical with a specific point of reference.

John Paul brings his vision of Christian personalism to bear in analyzing the conditions within which men and women live in the late 20th century. Of particular importance is a statement of Gaudium et spes 22: “The truth is that only in the mystery of the Incarnate Word does the mystery of man take on light” (cited in no. 8). This is coupled with the statement of Gaudium et spes 24 that “man can fully discover his true self only in a sincere giving of himself.” The dignity of each person guides the Christian approach to the world, to economics and politics, and to an understanding of the Church itself. So John Paul emphasizes “the primacy of the person over things” (no. 16) and the welfare of the “person in the community” as “the essential criterion for all programs, systems, and regimes” (no. 17).

There is also a striking application of personalism to ecclesiology in RH 21. The Church is portrayed as the “community of disciples” in which “each member has his own special gift,” which is “a personal vocation and a form of participation in the Church's saving work.” Each member of the “deeply personal” society that is the Church receives a “singular, unique, and unrepeatable grace” for the Church's communion and mission. Every human being is “the way” for the Church (no. 14) precisely because Christ, above all in the Incarnation and Redemption, is the way of self-discovery for each unique, “unrepeatable” human being (no. 13).

Another prominent theme of the pontificate is heralded in RH 6—the call to Christian unity. The Church does not have the right to risk being unfaithful to Christ's prayer “that they may all be one.” These words, ut unum sint, become the title of a groundbreaking encyclical on ecumenism published in 1995. Here again, it is a matter of extending the initiatives of the Second Vatican Council in the attempt to overcome divisions with Christians in both the East and the West.

With the publication of the subsequent encyclicals DIVES IN MISERICORDIA (1980) and DOMINUM ET VIVIFICANTEM (1986) it becomes evident that RH is also the first of the “Trinitarian encyclicals” of John Paul. The three documents focus successively on the Son, the Father, and the Spirit. A Trinitarian dimension, spelled out in the apostolic letter TERTIO MILLENNIO ADVENIENTE (1994) likewise accrues to preparations for the Jubilee Year. John Paul draws in particular upon those scenes from the Gospels that take place in the “Upper Room” in order to develop this perspective. His “theology of the Upper Room” begins to take shape in RH and comes to fuller expression in the later documents.

Other significant themes of the pontificate also find their place in RH. For example, the importance of the saints (no. 19) and Mary (no. 22) is underscored. Elements of Catholic social teaching are also referenced. In sum, RH stands as a key that unlocks the vast treasure of documents and events comprising the pontificate of John Paul II.

Bibliography: For the text of Redemptor hominis, see: Acta Apostolicae Sedis, no. 71 (1979): 266–324 (Latin); Origins 8, no. 40 (March 22, 1979): 625, 627–644 (English); The Pope Speaks 24 (1979): 97–147 (English). For commentaries and summaries of Redemptor hominis, see: A. DULLES, The Splendor of Faith: The Theological Vision of Pope John Paul II (New York 1999). R. T. GAWRONSKI, “Redemptor Hominis,” in The Thought of Pope John Paul II: A Collection of Essays and Studies, J. M. MCDERMOTT, ed. 221–230 (Rome 1993).

[M. PELZEL]

REDEMPTORIS MATER

Pope JOHN PAUL II’s sixth encyclical letter, issued on the feast of the Annunciation (March 25) in 1987, presaging the Marian year (Pentecost 1987 to Assumption 1988). In the introduction (nos. 1–6), Pope John Paul emphasizes the fact that the mystery of Christ is indissolubly united with that of Mary as the God-Bearer (THEOTOKOS), solemnly defined at the Council of Ephesus in 431. This dogma is essentially and primarily a christological doctrine in which Mary is portrayed as the “spotless” and perfect archetype of the Church from the moment of her Immaculate Conception. On the threshold of the new millennium or 2,000th birthday of the Son of God incarnate, the Holy Father reflects on the salvation history of the Bible in the light of a meditation on Mary’s unique role in our redemption as a “New Eve” or companion of Christ.

The first of the three sections, “Mary in the Mystery of Christ,” constitutes a biblical reflection upon what Vatican II aptly described as Mary’s “pilgrimage of faith” (LUMEN GENTIUM 58). The pope points out that this “pilgrimage” represents a constant focus for the Church and, in a sense, for all humanity. He pursues the same christocentric and ecclesiotypical Mariology as taught in chapter 8 of Lumen gentium. Just as Christ cannot be contemplated apart from the redemptive activity from which his MYSTICAL BODY originated, so Mary must be considered closely connected with the Incarnation and the Redemption if she is to be viewed as the archetype of the Church uniquely redeemed by her Immaculate Conception and the consummation of the whole Body of Christ in her glorious Assumption. The pope begins by citing the Pauline writings on the divine plan of salvation; the unique relationship between Mary and her Son in this story of grace thus becomes the focus of his meditation on the texts from the Synoptics, John, and Acts that concern Mary.

In the second section, “The Mother of God at the Center of the Pilgrim Church,” the pope speaks of Mary’s indissoluble link to the mystery of the Church born on the first Pentecost, called by Christ to give apostolic witness to all nations (Matt. 28:19–20). He devotes special attention to the ecumenical issues concerning Mary, especially with respect to the East, longing for the time when both the East and the West will be the one Church again breathing with “both lungs” (no. 34). He sees this as also helping the dialogues between the Catholic Church and the churches and ecclesial communities of the West. This will lead to the one Church of Christ singing her Magnificat, which continuously “re-echoes” in her heart as she recites the Canticum of Mary at Vespers each day.

In the third section, “Maternal Mediation,” the pope is careful to affirm Mary’s salutary influence upon each one of us by her maternal mediation and intercession. He develops what Vatican II calls her spiritual motherhood, “a motherhood in the order of grace” (Lumen gentium 62). As in the case of the intercessory role of all the saints in heaven, it is entirely dependent upon and subordinate to the unique mediation of Christ. Mary’s maternal mediation finds its origin in her “fullness of grace,” embodied in her total selfgiving to God at the Annunciation. Perfected through her Assumption into glory, it extends as far as the redemptive work of her Son. Furthermore, since motherhood is always a personal relation, the maternal mediation of Mary is a way for every Christian to enter into a more intimate and immediate encounter with Christ. The special meaning of the Marian Year, beginning on Pentecost and ending on the feast of the Assumption, is that the Church should reflect on what the mystery of Mary reveals about the Church’s mission and hope.

Mary’s mediation is the effective maternal presence sharing in the many complex problems of our lives. She is invoked to transform the Church through her role of relating us more closely to the incarnate and saving Christ.

Bibliography: For the text of Redemptoris Mater, see: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 79 (1987): 361–433 (Latin); Origins 16, no. 43 (April 9, 1987) 745–766 (English); The Pope Speaks 32 (1987): 159–197 (English). For commentaries and summaries of Redemptoris Mater, see: Mary: God’s Yes to Man—John Paul’s Encyclical “Redemptoris Mater,” introduction by J. RATZINGER, commentary by H. VON BALTHASAR (San Francisco 1988). F. M. JELLY, O. P., “Ecumenical Aspects of Redemptoris Mater,” Marian Studies 39 (1988): 115–129.

[F. JELLY]

REDEMPTORIS MISSIO

Pope JOHN PAUL II’s eighth encyclical Redemptoris missio (RM), issued on Dec. 7, 1990, celebrates the 25th anniversary of Ad Gentes (Vatican II's decree on missionary activity) and the 15th anniversary of EVANGELII NUNTIANDI (Paul VI's apostolic exhortation on evangelization). RM has the significant subtitle: "On the Permanent Validity of the Church's Missionary Mandate" the pope sounds a clarion and urgent call to all Church sectors to renew their enthusiasm and commitment to evangelize the world. Composed of eight chapters plus an introduction (nos. 1–3) and conclusion (no. 92), RM has a "doctrinal" section (nos. 4–30) and a "pastoral" section (nos. 31–91), respectively treating the "why" and "how" of contemporary mission.

Miguel Angel Isla Lucio (left), Spanish missionary seen in this undated photo with children in a mission, Zaire, was found dead along with two other missionaries on Nov. 8, 1996. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The pope begins by stating his conviction about "the urgency of missionary activity" (no. 1). The pope asserts: "Missionary activity specifically directed 'to the nations' (ad gentes) appears to be waning . . . a fact which must arouse concern among all who believe in Christ" (no. 2). Missionary evangelization remains urgent because "it is the primary service which the Church can render to every individual and to all humanity in the modern world" (no. 2).

RM's doctrinal section of three chapters affirms the foundations of mission theology from Vatican II; it also clarifies specific "doubts and ambiguities regarding missionary activity ad gentes" (no. 2). Chapter 1, "Jesus Christ, the Only Savior," treats core elements of dogmatic theology in relation to mission (e.g., revelation, faith, christology, and soteriology). Chapter 2, "The Kingdom of God," is biblically based and describes the intimate relationship of Kingdom to Christ and the Church. Chapter 3, "The Holy Spirit, the Principal Agent of Mission," examines the role of the Holy Spirit in the Church's life and its mission. In his strong reaffirmation of these basics of Church teaching, the pontiff continually links mission and faith: "Mission is an issue of faith" (no. 11); "It is only in faith that the Church's mission can be understood and only in faith that it finds its basis" (no. 4; see also nos. 2, 36, 49).

A holistic vision of evangelization underlies all of RM, particularly its second section on concrete approaches to mission. This vision is in continuity with Evangelii nuntiandi (nos. 17–24) and emphasizes what contemporary missiological terminology calls "integral evangelization." "Jesus came to bring integral salvation" (no. 11); "evangelical witness . . . is directed toward integral human development" (no. 42); "action on behalf of integral development and liberation . . . is most urgently needed” (no. 58).

By viewing mission with its various complementary and mutually enriching elements, evangelizers are able to appreciate fully that “Mission is a single but complex reality, and it develops in a variety of ways” (no. 41). “This mission is one and undivided, having one origin and one final purpose; but within it, there are different tasks and kinds of activity” (no. 31). Indeed, integral evangelization is an interpretive key to linking harmoniously the numerous themes and subjects treated in RM.

Several topics are insightfully discussed in RM as they directly relate to mission: Christian family (nos. 42, 80); personal conversion (nos. 47, 59, 60, 81); missionary institutes (nos. 66, 67, 72); youth (nos. 82, 86, 89); local church (nos. 26, 39, 48–52, 62–64, 83–85); interreligious dialogue (nos. 55–57); mission vocations (nos. 32, 65, 66, 79, 84); women (nos. 70, 71); inculturation (nos. 25, 52–54, 76); basic ecclesial communities (no. 51); proclamation (nos. 44–46); mission spirituality (nos. 87–91). This enumeration is much more than a random listing of topics; underlying it is a broad, practical, integral vision for effective evangelization.

The encyclical has several strengths: RM presents solid traditional and biblical theology along with the thought of Vatican II and Evangelii nuntiandi and offers several trult original insights, e.g., the threefold situation of mission (nos. 32–34); mission in various “new worlds” (no. 37); paschal mystery and mission (nos. 6, 10, 28); and pneumatology and mission (nos. 21–30).

RM opens many avenues of theology, spirituality, mission vision, and concrete responses to contemporary problems, as the Church faces the challenge of “bringing the Gospel, by witness and word, to all people and nations” (no. 92). The missionary Church accomplishes its evangelizing task as it “proceeds along the path already trodden by the Virgin Mary” (no. 92).

Bibliography: For the text of Redemptoris missio, see: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 83 (1991): 249–339 (Latin); Origins 20, no. 34 (Jan. 31, 1991): 541, 543–568 (English); The Pope Speaks 36 (1991): 138–183 (English). For commentaries on Redemptoris missio, see: W. BURROWS, ed., Redemption and Dialogue: Reading Redemptoris Missio and Dialogue and Proclamation (Maryknoll, NY 1993). J. KROEGER, Living Mission: Challenges in Evangelization Today (Maryknoll, NY 1994). There are also commentaries to be found in Omnis Terra. They are written by DEGRIJSE (Feb. / Mar. 1993); KROEGER (Dec. 1991 / Jan. 1995); LAVERDIERE (Sep.–Oct. 1991); ODORICO (Feb. 1994 / Jul.–Aug. 1994); WOLANIN (Dec. 1994); ZAGO (Feb. 1991 / Nov. 1991 / Nov. 1992).

[J. KROEGER]

REDEMPTORISTINES

Popular name for the Order of the Most Holy Redeemer, Ordo Sanctissimi Redemptoris (OSSR; Official Catholic Directory #2010), a contemplative order of nuns founded in 1731 in Scala (Naples), Italy, by Ven. Celeste Crostarosa (1696–1755) through the instrumentality of St. ALPHONSUS LIGUORI. Sister Celeste was a member of the community of VISITATION NUNS in Scala and claimed to have received private revelations concerning the foundation of a new religious order devoted exclusively to the perfect imitation of Christ. When St. Alphonsus was convinced that these revelations were authentic, he composed a rule based on them and introduced it into the Visitation community at Scala. This rule received papal approval in 1750.

The Redemptoristines seek to carry on the work of redemption in, with, and through Christ. As a strictly contemplative and cloistered order the Redemptoristines take solemn vows, recite the Liturgy of the Hours in choir, and observe papal enclosure. The habit consists of a red tunic, blue scapular, and blue choir mantle. Attached to the scapular is a picture of the Sacred Heart, and suspended from the cincture is a 15-decade rosary. The veil is black over white.

Each community is autonomous, but in some countries the monasteries have joined into federations for mutual assistance in remunerative work and novitiate training. These federations limit in no way the independence of each community. Each monastery strives to be self-supporting. The type of work varies with the locale. In many houses the nuns manufacture church vestments and banners, altar linens, and habits for the Redemptorists. Painting, writing, mimeograph work, bookbinding and making altar breads are among the other remunerative works.

All Redemptoristines were in Italy until 1831, when a monastery was founded in Vienna and a new era of expansion began. With the opening of the first house in Africa (1963) every continent possessed at least one convent. In the United States there was a community in Esopus, N.Y., founded in 1957, and another in Liguori, Mo., started in 1960.

Bibliography: OSSR, Official Catholic Directory, #2010. J. B. FAVRE, A Great Mystic of the 18th Century, The Venerable Maria Celeste Crostarosa, tr. a Redemptoristine of Chudleigh (London 1935). J. M. SCOTT, Life of the Venerable Maria Celeste Crostarosa (Chudleigh 1949).

[M. M. WILKINSON/EDS.]

REDEMPTORISTS

(CSSR, Official Catholic Directory #1070); the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer (Congregatio Sanctissimi Redemptoris) was founded by Saint Alphonsus Liguori (1696–1787) under the direction of Bp. Tommaso Falcoia (1663–1743) of Castellammare di Stabia, Italy. Moved by the spiritual neglect of country people in the Kingdom of Naples, Liguori founded the Redemptorists “to follow the example of Jesus Christ, the Redeemer, by preaching the word of God to the poor.” The congregation does this “by responding with missionary thrust to the pressing pastoral needs of the most abandoned, especially the poor, by devoting itself entirely to evangelization.” Canonically, it defines itself as “a clerical missionary religious institute of pontifical rite, enjoying the privilege of exemption, and having members belonging to various rites” (CSSR Rule, Constitution 1).

As a community of priests, permanent deacons, and lay brothers ministering in 724 foundations in 73 countries, its total membership in 2001 consisted of 5,556 professed religious: bishops (43); priests (4,160); and deacons, brothers, and students (1,353). Worldwide the congregation is organized into 40 provinces, 26 vice provinces, 11 regions, and 10 mission outposts. The members bind themselves to the work of evangelization by the vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, together with a vow and oath of perseverance in the congregation. An essential law for Redemptorists is to “live in community and to carry out their apostolic work through community” (Constitution 21). To enable them to fulfill their vocation in the Church of preaching the gospel to the most abandoned, Redemptorists, like their founder, cultivate a markedly Christocentric spirituality orientated to “crib, cross, and sacrament.” Devotion to Mary under the title of Our Lady of Perpetual Help is integral to the spiritual life of a Redemptorist. The motto of the congregation is “With Him there is Plenteous Redemption” (Ps 130:7).

History. Liguori established the first community of the Redemptorists in the small town of Scala, near Naples, in 1732. Neapolitan regalism made the beginning extremely difficult. Only after a foothold was gained in the Papal States and the rule and constitutions were approved by Benedict XIV in 1749, was the future growth and success of the congregation assured. A severe crisis was occasioned in 1780 by the Regolamento. This was a rule drawn up by several Redemptorists who were commissioned to seek royal approval for the congregation. In order to placate the Neapolitan regalists, the original rule, approved by Benedict XIV, was so watered down that the nature of the institute was changed in the new document. Alphonsus, already in his 80s and suffering from severe physical handicaps, signed the Regolamento, unaware of the betrayal by his confreres. In an act of reprisal directed at the Neapolitan government, Pius VI withdrew his approval of the Neapolitan Redemptorists. Only those in the Papal States were looked upon with favor by him. Alphonsus thus came under a cloud, since he resided in the Neapolitan area. Only after his death was his good name cleared and his innocence in the matter of the Regolamento established. By 1793 all the Redemptorists were united again.

Sister Maria Celeste Crostarosa.

Development in Italy. The period following the founder’s death (1787) must be seen from two points of view: the one concerns the Redemptorists in Italy, the other centers around the Redemptorists in the vicariate north of the Alps. From the days of Alphonsus down to 1855, the world headquarters of the congregation was in Nocera dei Pagani, in southern Italy, where the superiors general resided. For a period of 70 years the congregation grew at a fair pace in the Kingdom of Naples and in the Papal States. In spite of the Napoleonic invasions and the economic hardship that followed, the number of members grew steadily during the regimes of the superiors general Andrea Villani (1787–92) and Pier Paolo Blasucci (1793–1817). Nineteen foundations were established throughout Italy. Progress in Italy was slower during the administrations of Nicola Mansione (1817–23), Celestino Maria Cocle (1824–31), Giovanni Camillo Ripoli (1832–50), and Vincenzo Trapanese (1850–53). By the middle of the 19th century an effort was being made to have the headquarters moved to Rome in order to free the Redemptorists from the regalistic restrictions of Naples, but the king of Naples refused to countenance this administrative move. As a result, Pius IX in 1853 reluctantly divided the institute again, allowing Neapolitans to have their own superior general and ordering the other Redemptorists to elect a superior general with a residence in Rome. The actual opening of the new Roman headquarters took place in 1855. This dual administration lasted until 1869, when all Redemptorists throughout the world were united under the sole jurisdiction of the superior general in Rome.

Development outside Italy. Meanwhile, a great impetus had been given to the congregation north of the Alps by (St.) Clement HOFBAUER, who after taking his vows as a Redemptorist in the Papal States, moved to Vienna, Austria, in 1785 to establish a branch in northern Europe. Balked in Vienna, Clement moved northward to Warsaw, Poland, in 1787. For 20 years he had extraordinary success there, and as vicar-general of the Redemptorists north of Italy, won many recruits for the congregation until the legions of Napoleon uprooted and destroyed his work. Aware of the danger to his foundation in Warsaw, Clement strove to establish the congregation on German soil, sending his lieutenant, Joseph Passerat (1772–1858), with a group of clerics and their teachers to Jestetten, southern Germany, in 1803. The wanderings of these Redemptorists for 15 years from Warsaw to Bavaria and then to Switzerland form a saga of patience and perseverance. They finally found a home in Valsainte, Switzerland.

When Clement himself was exiled from Warsaw in 1808, he went to Vienna, where he sought once again to establish his congregation. Emperor Francis I of Austria finally consented to a Redemptorist foundation in that city, but Clement, who died shortly afterward, never saw it in operation. At the time of his death in 1820, he had only two precarious foundations to show for his 35 years of labor, one in Switzerland and the other in Romania. There were also some Redemptorists still in Poland. Nevertheless, Clement had gathered together a group of missionaries who, operating out of Switzerland and Vienna, were to spread the congregation into northern Europe and North America.

For 28 years (1820–48) Joseph Passerat was the vicar-general in northern Europe. Thanks to his energy and to the spirit of the men Clement had trained, the Redemptorists advanced successfully across border after border. They went into France in 1820, Portugal in 1826, Belgium in 1831, Bulgaria in 1835, Holland in 1836, Germany in 1841, and England in 1843. During this same period they also came to the United States (1832). The forward movement north of the Alps was temporarily checked by the Revolution of 1848. After two years a new vicar-general was chosen in the person of Rudolf Smetana, who held this post until 1855. During his term of office the Redemptorists were established in Luxembourg in 1851 and in Ireland in 1853.

Uniting of the Two Branches. By mid-century the vicariate had outstripped, in the number of its personnel and of its new foundations, the Italian division of the congregation. Two moves were made that sought to improve the administration of the whole organization. The first was the decree of Rome in 1841 dividing the whole congregation into 6 provinces, 3 in northern Europe and 3 in Italy and Sicily. The second was the effort to bring the headquarters of the entire institute to Rome. Because of the civil conditions of Italy, this effort resulted for a time (1855–69) in the creation of a dual administration. Nevertheless, the establishing of the Roman headquarters and the election of a rector major (superior general) in 1855 favored the growth of the congregation. From that time on it prospered under the successive superiors general: Nicolas Mauron, a Swiss (1855–93); Matthias Raus, a Luxemburger (1894–1909); Patrick Murray, Irish (1909–47); Leonardus Buijs, a Hollander (1947–53); William Gaudreau, American (1954–67); Tarcisio Amaral, Brazilian (1967–73); Josef Pfab, German (1973–85); Juan Lasso de la Vega, Spaniard (1985–97); and Joseph Tobin, American (1997–).

Mauron and Raus increased the foundations in Europe (Czech Republic) and North America and introduced the Redemptorists into South America (1859), Australia (1882), and Africa (1899). During the administration of Murray the number of foundations in these places was increased, and the Redemptorists began to establish themselves in Asia (the Philippines, 1906) so that the congregation became truly worldwide. These advances were made despite many serious setbacks. Like other religious orders, the Redemptorists suffered from suppression and confiscation in Alsace in 1830, Lisbon in 1833, Switzerland in 1847, Austria in 1848, Italy in 1860, Spain in 1868, Germany during the Kulturkampf, France in 1902, Mexico in 1926, and Spain in 1936. During World War II every foundation in one province of Germany was lost, and the whole Redemptorist community of Warsaw was wiped out. Under communist regimes, especially in the Ukraine, Czechoslovakia, and Vietnam, Redemptorists suffered severe persecution, and several shed their blood for the faith.

Government and Apostolate. The Redemptorists are ruled by a superior general known as the rector major.

He is elected for a term of six years by the sole legislative body of the congregation, the capitulars assembled in a general chapter. The chapter elects also a group of regional consultors as the cabinet of advisers to the general. Their term of office terminates with the convocation of the following general chapter. General chapters are held every six years or on the occasion of the death or resignation of the superior general. Two other officials complete the administration, the procurator general and the general economer (bursar). These also are elected by the capitulars. The procurator general is the liaison with the Holy See on official business. The general chapter is composed of the Roman officials, the provincial of each province, and delegates elected by the fathers in their respective provinces and vice provinces. The provincials, provincial vicars, rectors, and local superiors are selected according to the electoral law enacted in each unit, after approbation by the general government.

The main service rendered the Church by Redemptorists is the preaching of missions, retreats, and novenas, the administration of parishes, and foreign missions. It took the Redemptorists almost 40 years to inaugurate their missions in northern Europe, but once established, they became known among the foremost preachers in various countries. Well known for their eloquence were Michael Neubert (1805–82) in Baden and Alsace; Bernard Hafkenschied (1807–65) in Holland; John Furniss (1809–65) in England; Victor DECHAMPS, later Cardinal of Malines in Belgium; Johannes Zobel (1815–93) in Germany; Achille Desurmont (1828–98) in France; and Joseph Wissel (1830–1912), who preached missions for over 50 years in the United States. The eminence of Liguori in moral theology, emphasized by the Holy See in declaring him patron of that study, has naturally interested his followers in that important branch of ecclesiastical learning. Among those who have won recognition by their publications in the field are: Anthony Konings (1821–84), Joseph Aertnys (1828–1915), Cornelius Damen (1881–1953), Willem VAN ROSSUM, Clément Marc, Francis Connell (1888–1967), Bernard Häring (1912–98), Marciano Vidal (1937–), and Brian Johnson (1959–). In 1957 the Redemptorists founded the Academia Alfonsiana, a special institute of moral theology in Rome, which was incorporated into the Pontifical Lateran University in 1960. In 2000 the student body, which annually averages 300, represented 60 countries. To date, 539 doctorates have been granted.

Another special apostolate of the congregation is its work among Ukrainian Catholics. Begun by the Belgian fathers laboring in Galicia, in Poland, this apostolate later spread to Canada and the United States. The Redemptorist fathers and brothers of the Byzantine rite in North America form the Yorkton province. These Byzantine rite houses number seven, with their headquarters in Winnipeg, Canada. In the United States they are established in Newark, New Jersey. In the course of their history the Redemptorists have served the Church in many other ways. Alphonsus fought JANSENISM and strenuously upheld the rights of the Holy See against FEBRONIANISM. Hofbauer worked to save the Church's prerogatives during the Congress of Vienna. Passerat and Friedrich von Held (1799–1881) strove to stem the tide of irreligious liberalism in northern Europe. Redemptorist missionaries promoted the Confraternity of the Holy Family and fostered devotion to the Blessed Virgin under the title of OUR LADY OF PERPETUAL HELP. Dechamps was a leader at Vatican Council I in promoting the declaration of papal infallibility. In all, 131 Redemptorists have been chosen as bishops; five have been nominated cardinals. Four have been canonized: Saints Alphonsus Liguori, Gerard Majella, Clement Hofbauer, and John Neumann. Declared blessed: Peter Donders (Netherlands/Surinam), Kaspar Stanggassinger (Germany), Gennaro Sarnelli (Italy), Francis Xavier Seelos (USA); in 2001 Pope John Paul II beatified five Redemptorist martyrs, four from the Ukraine and one from Slovakia; 16 causes are at various stages of progress.

Development in the U.S. The growth of the Redemptorists in the United States began slowly. For the first seven years they failed to obtain a stable footing, but following the foundation in Pittsburgh in 1839, they grew, rapidly. Answering the appeal of the bishops of the country, they undertook the care of German immigrants. Not all the early Redemptorists came from a Germanic background, however. Many were of French, Dutch, Belgian, and Slavic origin; four of the first six superiors in the United States were non-Germans. By 1850, when the first American province was erected, there were nine foundations stretching from New York City to New Orleans, Louisiana. Their work was not restricted to the Germans, however, since they also established American, French, and Bohemian parishes. A permanent mission band, devoted exclusively to giving missions in English, was organized in 1851 under the direction of Hafkenschied.

Through the years Redemptorists conducted missions, retreats, and other preaching events in English, German, French, Italian, Bohemian, Polish, Spanish, and Portuguese. Today such preaching is conducted mostly in English and Spanish; a number of missionaries minister to the special needs of the hearing challenged. The preaching apostolate is also continued in a number of retreat houses in the states of Arizona, California, Florida, Kansas, Louisiana, New Jersey, New York, Virginia, and Wisconsin. Redemptorists continue their tradition of ministering in large parochial centers, where special stress is placed upon frequent preaching, impressive services, and spiritual and social societies and organizations. This work for the immigrant was instrumental in giving badly needed support to incoming European immigrants, insecure and confused in their new home. Faithful to their charism of seeking out the marginalized and spiritually abandoned, especially the materially poor, Redemptorists today are frequently found in the inner city, working for African Americans, those from a Latin background, and new arrivals.

The Redemptorists' parochial centers have always given much attention to the parochial schools. Since this phase of their activity at first centered on the German immigrant, they were forced to provide Catholic schools using the German language in order to preserve the faith of the immigrant. These in time became schools of both German and English, and then entirely English. A similar effort to attend to the spiritual and corporal works of mercy resulted in the provision of Catholic homes and asylums for orphaned children. In Baltimore, Maryland; Philadelphia and Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; New York, Rochester, and Buffalo, New York; and New Orleans, Louisiana, the Redemptorists undertook this task with notable success. American Redemptorists have continued the apostolate of the pen initiated by St. Alphonsus. Liguorian Publications is one of the largest publishing houses of Catholic literature in the United States and the Liguorian, a periodical aimed at the average American Catholic, is one of the leaders in circulation.

Two Redemptorists served as chaplains in the Civil War. During World War II, the American Redemptorists had 188 chaplains serving the armed forces, and in 1943 the provincial of the Baltimore province, William McCarty, was consecrated bishop to assist the military vicar, Cardinal Francis Spellman. Redemptorists from the United States established their first houses in Canada at St. Patrick's, Quebec, in 1872 and at Ste-Anne-de-Beaupré in 1878. Redemptorist fathers and brothers in the United States are divided into two provinces, Baltimore and Denver, and two vice-provinces, Richmond and New Orleans. There are three provinces in Canada: the English-speaking Edmonton-Toronto province, the French-speaking Ste-Anne-de-Beaupré, and the Ukrainian province of Yorkton.

The foreign mission field has been staffed with many missionaries from these provinces. In the 1900s Redemptorist fathers and brothers from the United States and Canada went overseas on missions to: Puerto Rico 1902; Virgin Islands 1917; Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia 1925; Mato Grosso, Brazil 1929; Asunción, Paraguay 1934; Amazon region 1943; Dominican Republic 1946; Thailand 1948; Japan 1948; Uruguay 1968; Haiti 1980;

Nigeria and St. Lucia 1987. Since 1950 the congregation worldwide has made foundations in: Lebanon 1952; Angola and Guatemala 1954; Nicaragua 1955; Indonesia and Siberia 1956; Malaysia and Zimbabwe 1960; Iraq 1962; Panama 1964; Madagascar 1967; Kenya and Byelorussia 1990; Korea 1991; China (Hong Kong); Russia, Kazakhstan, and the Ivory Coast 1993; Ghana 1994; Congo 1995; and Cuba 2001.

Bibliography: G. BASS Working for Plentiful Redemption: History of the Redemptorist Vice Province of New Orleans, 1952–1995 (New Orleans 1995). J. F. BYRNE, The Redemptorist Centenaries (Philadelphia 1932). F. CHIOVARO, ed. The Origins (1732–1793), v. 1 of The History of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, tr. and ed. R. FENILI (Liguori, Mo. 1996). M. J. CURLEY, The Provincial Story: A History of the Baltimore Province of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer (New York 1963). E. DAY, "The Beginnings of the Redemptorists in the United States: 1832–1840," Diss. CU (Louvain 1948). M. DE MEULEMEESTER, Bibliographie générale des écrivains rédemptoristes, 3 v. (Louvain 1933–39). J. P. DOLAN, Catholic Revivalism: The American Experience 1830–1900 (Notre Dame, Ind. 1978). F. DONLAN, Southeastern Redemptorist Heritage, 1926–1986 (privately printed 1986). J. GAUCI, Redemptorist Apostolates in the Caribbean of the Nineteenth Century (Puerto Rico 1989). P. GEIERMANN, Annals of the St. Louis Province of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, 3 v. (St. Louis 1923). G. LAUENSTEIN, Fully Devoted: the Hispanic Apostolate in the St. Louis Province of Redemptorists (Denver 1996). P. LAVERDURE, Redemption and Renewal: The Redemptorists of English Canada, 1834–1994 (Toronto 1996). N. MUCKERMAN, Redemptorists on the Amazon: The First 50 Years (privately printed 1992). T. SKINNER, The Redemptorists in the West (St. Louis 1933). Spicilegium Historicum CSSR (Rome 1953–). J. WISSEL, The Redemptorist on the American Mission, 3 v. (New York 1978). J. WUEST, Annales Congregationis SS. Redemptoris, Provinciae Americanae, 5 v. in 11 parts (Ilchester, Md. 1888–1924).

[M. J. CURLEY/C. HOEGERL]

REDON, ABBEY OF

A former Benedictine monastery in the Diocese of Vannes, department of Ille et Vilaine, France. It was founded in 823 or 832 by St. Convoyon (d. 868), who became first abbot, on land ceded by a Breton lord, Ratuili. Destroyed by the Normans in 869, it was restored in the 10th century under Abbot Catwallon, who extended its property holdings. Involved in Breton political strife, it was pillaged anew by Duke John of Brittany. In the 13th century, it was refurbished, and in the 14th century it became the center of a small city walled by Abbot Jean de Tréal and was considered by Bretons a sanctuary of national independence. At the request of Duke Francis I (d. 1450) MARTIN V made Redon an episcopal see, a status it retained only briefly. It became the object of favors of LOUIS XI, who visited it c. 1461. Reforms were attempted under a succession of commendatory abbots (see COMMENDATION) such as Cardinal Salviati, Bp. Arthur d'Épinay, who rebuilt extensively and introduced monks of the Congregation of Brittany in 1620, and Cardinal RICHELIEU, who established MAURISTS at Redon in 1628 and continued repairs. Three Choiseul-Praslin abbots governed the monastery in the 17th century, and two cardinals de la Tour d'Auvergne, from 1681 to 1722. The church, which has a notable romanesque tower and 13th-century choir and ambulatory chapels, now serves as a parish church. The abbey was suppressed in 1790, and the cloisters today are used as a school under the direction of the EUDISTS.

Bibliography: G. HEER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1066. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:2422–23. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 14.2:2176–78. A. M. DE COURSON DE LA VILLENEUVE, ed., Cartulaire de l'abbaye de Redon en Bretagne (Paris 1863).

[G. E. GINGRAS]

REDUCTIONS OF PARAGUAY

Jesuit mission establishments that existed in Rio de la Plata from the beginning of the 17th century until the expulsion of the society from America in 1768. They were organized internally according to the Spanish mission system. [See ALDEIAMENTO SYSTEM IN BRAZIL; MISSION IN COLONIAL AMERICA, I (SPANISH MISSIONS), 1.] The reductions, however, took on added importance because of their location on the borders of Spanish and Portuguese colonial claims. They were established among the Guarani, an extensive linguistic group who had developed a culture that included some agriculture, raising of domesticated animals, pottery, weaving, and the use of efficient tools and weapons.

History. At the end of 1609 Hernando Arias (1564–1645), Governor of Asunción, and Bishop Lizárraga requested Jesuit missions for Paraguay. The first Jesuit provincial of the area, Diego de Torres, sent three pairs of missionaries out to start the chain of missions. The first, founded in the southern part of Paraguay, was San Ignacio Guazú. Ultimately more than 50 reductions were founded in the modern areas of southern Brazil, Paraguay, Uruguay, and northeastern Argentina.

From 1612 to 1656 the Paulistas of Brazil harassed the settlements with their slave raids. In 1627 and again in 1631, particularly severe attacks destroyed those nearest São Paulo, and the Jesuits were obliged to move the reductions further west. In the Treaty of Limits of 1750, settling the border dispute between Portuguese Brazil and the neighboring Spanish colonies, Spain ceded to Portugal an area in which seven reductions were located. The reductions were to be moved into Spanish territory, but the native peoples in them rebelled and had to be subjugated by force of arms. On the expulsion of the Jesuits, Spain divided the government of each reduction between a civil administrator and the priest. This began the decline of the missions.

Organization. The reductions were native villages from which European settlers were excluded. The population of each ranged from about 1,000 to 8,000, the average being between 3,000 and 4,000. In the peak period, 1730 to 1740, there were more than 100,000 native peoples in about 30 missions.

The settlements were usually located on or near a river in a fertile area and were grouped around a plaza. On one side were the church, the priests' house, a home for widows and orphans, the cemetery, storehouses, and offices. The other three sides were made up of native homes, long buildings housing many families in separate apartments. Frequently the church, and sometimes the house for the priests, was built of stone or hardwood depending on the materials available in the area. In each reduction were the pastor and at least one other priest, caciques, and the cabildo. Members of the cabildo were elected each year by the outgoing group, except for the chief magistrate who was appointed by the governor on the pastor's recommendation. Save for this slight connection, the reductions remained politically apart from the colonial administration. On occasion the governor of Paraguay visited them, as did visitors sent out by the audiencia of Charcas. Economically, as well, the reductions remained aloof. The Jesuits organized the settlements on a combination of private and collective property. Agriculture was largely a communal project, but each Indian family had its own gardens and sometimes a cow or horse. Domestic industries were encouraged, and their products, as well as agricultural surpluses, were sold by the Jesuits to the outside world to procure any items needed in the mission economy. The natives were taught Christian doctrine, reading, writing, and singing. Their native abilities in painting and sculpture were encouraged and used in decorating the churches. All work and play was tied in with communal religious prayers, songs, and processions.

Consequences. After the expulsion of the Jesuits and the transfer of the control of the reductions to civil and secular authority, the settlements gradually declined in prosperity and population. The natives did not immediately revert to a more primitive life as some critics of the system have charged. Many of them were absorbed into colonial society. The whole concept and operation of the Jesuit reductions has been a subject of controversy: in the 18th century, because of the political overtones; in the 20th century, because of the sociological implications. Cunningham Graham notes that even the most bitter opponents of the system agree that in the reductions the Jesuits “instilled into the Indians that the land on which they lived, with missions, churches, herds, flocks, and the rest, was their own property. Of equal importance, the Jesuits told them they were free, and that they had the King of Spain’s own edict in confirmation of their freedom, so that they never could be slaves.”

Bibliography: A. ARMANI, Ciudad de Dios y ciudad del sol (Mexico City 1996). P. CARAMAN, The Lost Paradise (New York 1975). R. B. C. GRAHAM, A Vanished Arcadia (London 1901). M. DURÁN, “The Reductions,” in Enrique Dussel (ed.), The Church in Latin America, 1492–1992 (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1992) 351–362. G. FURLONG, Misiones y sus pueblos guaraníes (Buenos Aires 1962). E. J. A. MAEDER, Misiones del Paraguay: Conflictos y disolución de la sociedad guaraní (1768–1850) (Madrid, Mapfre 1992). B. MELIÀ and M. A. LIANE, Guaraníes y jesuitas en tiempo de las misiones: una bibliografía didáctica (Asunción, Paraguay 1995). M. MÖRNER, The Political and Economic Activities of the Jesuits in La Plata Region, trans. by A. READ (Stockholm 1955). S. PALACIOS and E. ZOFFOLI, Gloria y tragedia de las misiones guaraníes (Bilbao 1991). F. J. REITER, They Built Utopia: The Jesuit Missions in Paraguay, 1610–1768 (Potomac, Md. 1995). T. WHIGHAM, “Paraguay’s Pueblos de Indios: Echoes of a Missionary Past,” in E. LANGER and R. H. JACKSON (eds.), The New Latin American Mission History (Lincoln, Nebraska 1995) 157–188.

[H. STORNI/J.L. KLAIBER]