

NEW CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

NEW CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

SECOND EDITION

12
Ref-Sep

THOMSON
—★—™
GALE

Detroit • New York • San Diego • San Francisco • Cleveland • New Haven, Conn. • Waterville, Maine • London • Munich

in association with
THE CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA • WASHINGTON, D.C.

The New Catholic Encyclopedia, Second Edition

Project Editors

Thomas Carson, Joann Cerrito

Editorial

Erin Bealmear, Jim Craddock, Stephen Cusack, Miranda Ferrara, Kristin Hart, Melissa Hill, Margaret Mazurkiewicz, Carol Schwartz, Christine Tomassini, Michael J. Tyrkus

Permissions

Edna Hedblad, Shalice Shah-Caldwell

Imaging and Multimedia

Randy Bassett, Dean Dauphinais, Robert Duncan, Leitha Etheridge-Sims, Mary K. Grimes, Lezlie Light, Dan Newell, David G. Oblender, Christine O'Bryan, Luke Rademacher, Pamela Reed

Product Design

Michelle DiMercurio

Data Capture

Civie Green

Manufacturing

Rhonda Williams

Indexing

Victoria Agee, Victoria Baker, Francine Cronshaw, Lynne Maday, Do Mi Stauber, Amy Suchowski

© 2003 by The Catholic University of America. Published by Gale. Gale is an imprint of The Gale Group, Inc., a division of Thomson Learning, Inc.

Gale and Design™ and Thomson Learning™ are trademarks used herein under license.

For more information, contact
The Gale Group, Inc.
27500 Drake Rd.
Farmington Hills, MI 48331-3535
Or you can visit our Internet site at <http://www.gale.com>

While every effort has been made to ensure the reliability of the information presented in this publication, The Gale Group, Inc. does not guarantee the accuracy of the data contained herein. The Gale Group, Inc. accepts no payment for listing; and inclusion in the publication of any organization, agency, institution, publication, service, or individual does not imply endorsement of the editors or publisher. Errors brought to the attention of the publisher and verified to the satisfaction of the publisher will be corrected in future editions.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS CATALOGING-IN-PUBLICATION DATA

New Catholic encyclopedia.—2nd ed.
p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and indexes.

ISBN 0-7876-4004-2

1. Catholic Church—Encyclopedias. I. Catholic University of America.

BX841 .N44 2002
282'.03—dc21
2002000924

ISBN: 0-7876-4004-2 (set)
0-7876-4005-0 (v. 1)
0-7876-4006-9 (v. 2)
0-7876-4007-7 (v. 3)
0-7876-4008-5 (v. 4)

0-7876-4009-3 (v. 5)
0-7876-4010-7 (v. 6)
0-7876-4011-5 (v. 7)
0-7876-4012-3 (v. 8)
0-7876-4013-1 (v. 9)

0-7876-4014-x (v. 10)
0-7876-4015-8 (v. 11)
0-7876-4016-6 (v. 12)
0-7876-4017-4 (v. 13)
0-7876-4018-2 (v. 14)
0-7876-4019-0 (v. 15)

Printed in the United States of America
10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

For The Catholic University of America Press

EDITORIAL STAFF

Executive Editor

Berard L. Marthaler, O.F.M.Conv., S.T.D., Ph.D.

Associate Editor

Gregory F. LaNave, Ph.D.

Assistant Editors

Jonathan Y. Tan, Ph.D.

Richard E. McCarron, Ph.D.

Editorial Assistant

Denis J. Obermeyer

Director of The Catholic University of America Press

David J. McGonagle, Ph.D.

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

John Borelli, Ph.D., Associate Director of Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, Washington, D.C.

Drew Christiansen, S.J., Ph.D., Senior Fellow, Woodstock Theological Center,
Washington, D.C.

Anne M. Clifford, C.S.J., Ph.D., Associate Professor of Theology, Duquesne University, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania

Raymond F. Collins, M.A., S.T.D.,
Professor of New Testament, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

Cyprian Davis, O.S.B., S.T.L., Ph.D.,
Professor of Church History, Saint Meinrad
School of Theology, Saint Meinrad, Indiana

Dennis M. Doyle, Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religious Studies, University of Dayton, Dayton, Ohio

Angelyn Dries, O.S.F., Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religious Studies, Cardinal
Stritch University, Milwaukee, Wisconsin

Arthur Espelage, O.F.M., J.C.D., Executive Coordinator, Canon Law Society of America, Washington, D.C.

Eugene J. Fisher, Ph.D., Associate Director of Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, United States Conference of Catholic Bishops,
Washington, D.C.

Edward J. Furton, Ph.D., Editor-in-Chief,
The National Catholic Bioethics Quarterly,
Brighton, Massachusetts

James F. Garneau, Ph.D., Academic Dean,
The Pontifical College Josephinum,
Columbus, Ohio

J. A. Wayne Hellmann, O.F.M.Conv., Dr.
Theol., Professor of Theological Studies, St.
Louis University, St. Louis, Missouri

Joseph T. Kelley, Ph.D., D.Min., Director of the Center for Augustinian Study, Merrimack College, North Andover,
Massachusetts

Judith M. Kubicki, C.S.S.F., Ph.D.,
Assistant Professor of Theology, Fordham University, Bronx, New York

William P. Loewe, Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religion and Religious Education, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

Rose M. McDermott, S.S.J., J.C.D., Associate Professor of Canon Law, The Catholic University of America,
Washington, D.C.

R. Bruce Miller, M.S.L.S., Head,
Theology/Philosophy, Canon Law Libraries,
The Catholic University of America,
Washington, D.C.

Francis J. Moloney, S.D.B., S.T.L., S.S.L., D.Phil., Professor of Biblical Studies, The Catholic University of America,
Washington, D.C.

Katherine I. Rabenstein, B.S.F.S., Senior Credentialing Specialist, American Nurses Association, Washington, D.C.

Joel Rippinger, O.S.B., M.A., S.T.L., Subprior, Marmion Abbey, Aurora, Illinois

Foreword

This revised edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia represents a third generation in the evolution of the text that traces its lineage back to the Catholic Encyclopedia published from 1907 to 1912. In 1967, sixty years after the first volume of the original set appeared, The Catholic University of America and the McGraw-Hill Book Company joined together in organizing a small army of editors and scholars to produce the New Catholic Encyclopedia. Although planning for the NCE had begun before the Second Vatican Council and most of the 17,000 entries were written before Council ended, Vatican II enhanced the encyclopedia's value and importance. The research and the scholarship that went into the articles witnessed to the continuity and richness of the Catholic Tradition given fresh expression by Council. In order to keep the NCE current, supplementary volumes were published in 1972, 1978, 1988, and 1995. Now, at the beginning of the third millennium, The Catholic University of America is proud to join with The Gale Group in presenting a new edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia. It updates and incorporates the many articles from the 1967 edition and its supplements that have stood the test of time and adds hundreds of new entries.

As the president of The Catholic University of America, I cannot but be pleased at the reception the NCE has received. It has come to be recognized as an authoritative reference work in the field of religious studies and is praised for its comprehensive coverage of the Church's history and institutions. Although Canon Law no longer requires encyclopedias and reference works of this kind to receive an imprimatur before publication, I am confident that this new edition, like the original, reports accurate information about Catholic beliefs and practices. The editorial staff and their consultants were careful to present official Church teachings in a straightforward manner, and in areas where there are legitimate disputes over fact and differences in interpretation of events, they made every effort to insure a fair and balanced presentation of the issues.

The way for this revised edition was prepared by the publication, in 2000, of a Jubilee volume of the NCE, heralding the beginning of the new millennium. In my foreword to that volume I quoted Pope John Paul II's encyclical on Faith and Human Reason in which he wrote that history is "the arena where we see what God does for humanity." The New Catholic Encyclopedia describes that arena. It reports events, people, and ideas—"the things we know best and can verify most easily, the things of our everyday life, apart from which we cannot understand ourselves" (Fides et ratio, 12).

Finally, I want to express appreciation on my own behalf and on the behalf of the readers of these volumes to everyone who helped make this revision a reality. We are all indebted to The Gale Group and the staff of The Catholic University of America Press for their dedication and the alacrity with which they produced it.

Very Reverend David M. O'Connell, C.M., J.C.D.
President
The Catholic University of America

Preface to the Revised Edition

When first published in 1967 the New Catholic Encyclopedia was greeted with enthusiasm by librarians, researchers, and general readers interested in Catholicism. In the United States the NCE has been recognized as the standard reference work on matters of special interest to Catholics. In an effort to keep the encyclopedia current, supplementary volumes were published in 1972, 1978, 1988, and 1995. However, it became increasingly apparent that further supplements would not be adequate to this task. The publishers subsequently decided to undertake a thorough revision of the NCE, beginning with the publication of a Jubilee volume at the start of the new millennium.

Like the biblical scribe who brings from his store-room of knowledge both the new and the old, this revised edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia incorporates material from the 15-volume original edition and the supplement volumes. Entries that have withstood the test of time have been edited, and some have been amended to include the latest information and research. Hundreds of new entries have been added. For all practical purposes, it is an entirely new edition intended to serve as a comprehensive and authoritative work of reference reporting on the movements and interests that have shaped Christianity in general and Catholicism in particular over two millennia.

SCOPE

The title reflects its outlook and breadth. It is the New Catholic Encyclopedia, not merely a new encyclopedia of Catholicism. In addition to providing information on the doctrine, organization, and history of Christianity over the centuries, it includes information about persons, institutions, cultural phenomena, religions, philosophies, and social movements that have affected the Catholic Church from within and without. Accordingly, the NCE attends to the history and particular traditions of the Eastern Churches and the Churches of the Protestant Reformation, and other ecclesial communities. Christianity cannot be understood without exploring its roots in ancient Israel and Judaism, nor can the history of the medieval and modern Church be understood apart from its relationship with Islam. Inter-faith dialogue requires an appreciation of Buddhism and other world religions, as well as some knowledge of the history of religion in general.

On the assumption that most readers and researchers who use the NCE are individuals interested in Catholicism in general and the Church in North America in particular, its editorial content gives priority to the Western Church, while not neglecting the churches in the East; to Roman Catholicism, acknowledging much common history with Protestantism; and to Catholicism in the United States, recognizing that it represents only a small part of the universal Church.

Scripture, Theology, Patrology, Liturgy. The many and varied articles dealing with Sacred Scripture and specific books of the Bible reflect contemporary biblical scholarship and its concerns. The NCE highlights official church teachings as expressed by the Church's magisterium. It reports developments in theology, explains issues and introduces ecclesiastical writers from the early Church Fathers to present-day theologians whose works exercise major influence on the development of Christian thought. The NCE traces the evolution of the Church's worship with special emphasis on rites and rituals consequent to the liturgical reforms and renewal initiated by the Second Vatican Council.

Church History. From its inception Christianity has been shaped by historical circumstances and itself has become a historical force. The NCE presents the Church's history from a number of points of view against the background of general political and cultural history. The revised edition reports in some detail the Church's missionary activity as it grew from a small community in Jerusalem to the worldwide phenomenon it is today. Some entries, such as those dealing with the Middle Ages, the Reformation, and the Enlightenment, focus on major time-periods and movements that cut across geographical boundaries. Other articles describe the history and structure of the Church in specific areas, countries, and regions. There are separate entries for many dioceses and monasteries which by reason of antiquity, size, or influence are of special importance in ecclesiastical history, as there are for religious orders and congregations. The NCE rounds out its comprehensive history of the Church with articles on religious movements and biographies of individuals.

Canon and Civil Law. The Church inherited and has safeguarded the precious legacy of ancient Rome, described by Virgil, “to rule people under law, [and] to establish the way of peace.” The NCE deals with issues of ecclesiastical jurisprudence and outlines the development of legislation governing communal practices and individual obligations, taking care to incorporate and reference the 1983 Code of Canon Law throughout and, where appropriate, the Code of Canons for the Eastern Churches. It deals with issues of Church-State relations and with civil law as it impacts on the Church and Church’s teaching regarding human rights and freedoms.

Philosophy. The Catholic tradition from its earliest years has investigated the relationship between faith and reason. The NCE considers at some length the many and varied schools of ancient, medieval, and modern philosophy with emphasis, when appropriate, on their relationship to theological positions. It pays particular attention to the scholastic tradition, particularly Thomism, which is prominent in Catholic intellectual history. Articles on many major and lesser philosophers contribute to a comprehensive survey of philosophy from pre-Christian times to the present.

Biography and Hagiography. The NCE, making an exception for the reigning pope, leaves to other reference works biographical information about living persons. This revised edition presents biographical sketches of hundreds of men and women, Christian and non-Christian, saints and sinners, because of their significance for the Church. They include: Old and New Testament figures; the Fathers of the Church and ecclesiastical writers; pagan and Christian emperors; medieval and modern kings; heads of state and other political figures; heretics and champions of orthodoxy; major and minor figures in the Reformation and Counter Reformation; popes, bishops, and priests; founders and members of religious orders and congregations; lay men and lay women; scholars, authors, composers, and artists. The NCE includes biographies of most saints whose feasts were once celebrated or are currently celebrated by the universal church. The revised edition relies on Butler’s Lives of the Saints and similar reference works to give accounts of many saints, but the NCE also provides biographical information about recently canonized and beatified individuals who are, for one reason or another, of special interest to the English-speaking world.

Social Sciences. Social sciences came into their own in the twentieth century. Many articles in the NCE rely on data drawn from anthropology, economics, psychology and sociology for a better understanding of religious structures and behaviors. Papal encyclicals and pastoral letters of episcopal conferences are the source of principles and norms for Christian attitudes and practice in the field of social action and legislation. The NCE draws attention to the Church’s organized activities in pursuit of peace and justice, social welfare and human rights. The growth of the role of the laity in the work of the Church also receives thorough coverage.

ARRANGEMENT OF ENTRIES

The articles in the NCE are arranged alphabetically by the first substantive word using the word-by-word method of alphabetization; thus “New Zealand” precedes “Newman, John Henry,” and “Old Testament Literature” precedes “Oldcastle, Sir John.” Monarchs, patriarchs, popes, and others who share a Christian name and are differentiated by a title and numerical designation are alphabetized by their title and then arranged numerically. Thus, entries for Byzantine emperors Leo I through IV precede those for popes of the same name, while “Henry VIII, King of England” precedes “Henry IV, King of France.”

Maps, Charts, and Illustrations. The New Catholic Encyclopedia contains nearly 3,000 illustrations, including photographs, maps, and tables. Entries focusing on the Church in specific countries contain a map of the country as well as easy-to-read tables giving statistical data and, where helpful, lists of archdioceses and dioceses. Entries on the Church in U.S. states also contain tables listing archdioceses and dioceses where appropriate. The numerous photographs appearing in the New Catholic Encyclopedia help to illustrate the history of the Church, its role in modern societies, and the many magnificent works of art it has inspired.

SPECIAL FEATURES

Subject Overview Articles. For the convenience and guidance of the reader, the New Catholic Encyclopedia contains several brief articles outlining the scope of major fields: “Theology, Articles on,” “Liturgy, Articles on,” “Jesus Christ, Articles on,” etc.

Cross-References. The cross-reference system in the NCE serves to direct the reader to related material in other articles. The appearance of a name or term in small capital letters in text indicates that there is an article of that title elsewhere in the encyclopedia. In some cases, the name of the related article has been inserted at the appropriate point as a see reference: (see THOMAS AQUINAS, ST.). When a further aspect of the subject is treated under another title, a see also reference is placed at the end of the article. In addition to this extensive cross-reference system, the comprehensive index in volume 15 will greatly increase the reader's ability to access the wealth of information contained in the encyclopedia.

Abbreviations List. Following common practice, books and versions of the Bible as well as other standard works by selected authors have been abbreviated throughout the text. A guide to these abbreviations follows this preface.

The Editors

Abbreviations

The system of abbreviations used for the works of Plato, Aristotle, St. Augustine, and St. Thomas Aquinas is as follows: Plato is cited by book and Stephanus number only, e.g., Phaedo 79B; Rep. 480A. Aristotle is cited by book and Bekker number only, e.g., Anal. post. 72b 8–12; Anim. 430a 18. St. Augustine is cited as in the Thesaurus Linguae Latinae, e.g., C. acad. 3.20.45; Conf. 13.38.53, with capitalization of the first word of the title. St. Thomas is cited as in scholarly journals, but using Arabic numerals. In addition, the following abbreviations have been used throughout the encyclopedia for biblical books and versions of the Bible.

Books

Acts	Acts of the Apostles
Am	Amos
Bar	Baruch
1–2 Chr	1 and 2 Chronicles (1 and 2 Paralipomenon in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Col	Colossians
1–2 Cor	1 and 2 Corinthians
Dn	Daniel
Dt	Deuteronomy
Eccl	Ecclesiastes
Eph	Ephesians
Est	Esther
Ex	Exodus
Ez	Ezekiel
Ezr	Ezra (Esdras B in Septuagint; 1 Esdras in Vulgate)
Gal	Galatians
Gn	Genesis
Hb	Habakkuk
Heb	Hebrews
Hg	Haggai
Hos	Hosea
Is	Isaiah
Jas	James
Jb	Job
Jdt	Judith
Jer	Jeremiah
Jgs	Judges
Jl	Joel
Jn	John
1–3 Jn	1, 2, and 3 John
Jon	Jonah
Jos	Joshua

Jude	Jude
1–2 Kgs	1 and 2 Kings (3 and 4 Kings in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Lam	Lamentations
Lk	Luke
Lv	Leviticus
Mal	Malachi (Malachias in Vulgate)
1–2 Mc	1 and 2 Maccabees
Mi	Micah
Mk	Mark
Mt	Matthew
Na	Nahum
Neh	Nehemiah (2 Esdras in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Nm	Numbers
Ob	Obadiah
Phil	Philippians
Phlm	Philemon
Prv	Proverbs
Ps	Psalms
1–2 Pt	1 and 2 Peter
Rom	Romans
Ru	Ruth
Rv	Revelation (Apocalypse in Vulgate)
Sg	Song of Songs
Sir	Sirach (Wisdom of Ben Sira; Ecclesiasticus in Septuagint and Vulgate)
1–2 Sm	1 and 2 Samuel (1 and 2 Kings in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Tb	Tobit
1–2 Thes	1 and 2 Thessalonians
Ti	Titus
1–2 Tm	1 and 2 Timothy
Wis	Wisdom
Zec	Zechariah
Zep	Zephaniah

Versions

Apoc	Apocrypha
ARV	American Standard Revised Version
ARVm	American Standard Revised Version, margin
AT	American Translation
AV	Authorized Version (King James)
CCD	Confraternity of Christian Doctrine
DV	Douay-Challoner Version

ABBREVIATIONS

ERV	English Revised Version	NJB	New Jerusalem Bible
ERVm	English Revised Version, margin	NRSV	New Revised Standard Version
EV	English Version(s) of the Bible	NT	New Testament
JB	Jerusalem Bible	OT	Old Testament
LXX	Septuagint	RSV	Revised Standard Version
MT	Masoretic Text	RV	Revised Version
NAB	New American Bible	RVm	Revised Version, margin
NEB	New English Bible	Syr	Syriac
NIV	New International Version	Vulg	Vulgate

R

REFLECTION

From the Latin reflexio (from re-flectere, to bend back), the return of an agent or power upon its own operation or upon itself. Though the concept can apply to any spiritual operation or power (such as the will), it usually refers to knowledge. Four types of cognitive reflection may here be distinguished: (1) psychological, or knowledge one has of one's own operation, power, and self, both in direct singular awareness and in scientific and universal knowledge; (2) epistemological, or consciousness of the grounds for judging, for recognizing the possession of truth, and for certitude; (3) logical, or reflection upon the status of apprehended natures in thought with their consequent properties and relations there; and (4) ontological, or a simple return to the objects of knowledge for further and more detailed inspection and analysis.

Greek and Augustinian Views. Aristotle recognized that there is a certain reflex knowledge even in sense, for man perceives that he sees, hears, etc. (Anim. 425b 12). Self-knowledge more properly belongs to the INTELLECT, which is itself intelligible (430b 24). The highest form of being is pure intelligence, or thought, and its characteristic and exclusive activity is "thinking thought," i.e., knowing itself (Meta. 1074b 33–35; cf. 1072b 19–20, 23).

NEOPLATONISM stressed this self-regarding aspect of intellect, or mind. PLOTINUS said of his second hypostasis, intelligence, that it not only has knowledge, especially of the intelligible world, but that it essentially knows itself and its own act (Enneads 5.3.1–10). It is its own first and proportioned object in which everything else is known. In PROCLUS the doctrine of return upon self becomes more prominent. Everything that returns upon itself must be incorporeal and self-subsistent (Elements of Theology 16–17, 42–43), and such a being returns not only upon its activity but also upon its essence (44), particularly in self-knowledge (83). Every intelligence knows itself immediately (167) and, in knowing anything, by the same act knows that it knows (168). The influence of Proclus reached the Latin West in the late 12th century through the 9th-century Arabian compilation and digest known as the LIBER DE CAUSIS, long attributed to Aristotle. There the schoolmen read that an intelligence, in knowing anything else, at the same time knows itself and its own essence (13) and "returns completely to its own essence" (15).

St. AUGUSTINE, before Proclus but influenced by Plotinus, held for the presence of the soul to itself and a consequent self-intuition (Trin. 9.3.3, 10.7.10, 10.9. 12–13, 14.4.7). There is a habitual self-awareness always with man in "memory," or consciousness (14.6. 8–9, 8.11). Man is aware of his activities of remembering, willing, thinking, and judging (10.10.13, 11.14); and even if he doubts or errs, he knows that he is living (ibid.).

In the Middle Ages the influence of Augustine continued to be strong. St. BONAVENTURE, for example, held that the soul is immediately present to itself and by nature knows itself intuitively (In 2 sent. 19.1.1 sed contra 7; cf. In 1 sent. 3.2.2 ad 1, 2 ad 2; Itin. ment. 3.1–2); for it belongs to the nature of an intellectual substance to know itself in a complete return (De don. Spir. Sanct. 8.20; In Hexaem. 12.16).

Doctrine of Aquinas. The influence of Augustine, of the Liber de causis, and of Aristotle converged in St. THOMAS AQUINAS to produce an elaborate doctrine.

Psychological Reflection. Spiritual substances and immaterial powers, because immaterial, have complete reflection (De ver. 22.12; In 2 sent. 19.1.1). This applies to the WILL as well as to cognition (De ver. 22.12): the will wills its own act and its own good. Even in SENSE KNOWLEDGE there is a certain return, as man knows his own sensing, though not by the external senses but by a distinct internal power (In 3 anim. 2.284–87, 13.391; De ver. 1.9, 10.9). Only the intellect has a complete cognitive return, knowing besides its objects its acts, itself, and its own nature (Summa theologiae 1a, 87.3; In 3 sent. 23.1.2; C. gent. 2.49, 4.11). It also knows whatever is in the soul (ST 1a2ae, 112.5 ad 1), especially its means of knowing such as the intelligible species (ST 1a, 85.2) and its habits (De ver. 10.9). Through his intellectual acts too man knows himself and his own existence (De ver. 10.8; In 9 eth. 11.1908; C. gent. 2.75). In this knowledge there is a determinate order: first the direct object is known, then the act of knowing it, and finally the intellect itself (ST 1a, 87.3, 14.2 ad 3).

The soul's concrete awareness of its own act explains man's intellectual knowledge of material singulars. Knowing directly, by ABSTRACTION, the immaterial and universal, the intellect can know the singular only indirectly. By knowing its act of apprehending the universal nature, and in this the intelligible species and its abstraction from and dependence upon the PHANTASM, which presents a singular object, the intellect sees the universal nature in a singular subject. Thus it is by a certain reflection upon the phantasm (reflexio super phantasma) that the singular is known (De ver. 2.6, 10.5; In 3 anim. 8.712–713; ST 1a, 86.1).

An important distinction is made between the reflection of immediate consciousness and the reflective consideration that yields a quidditative, scientific, and universal knowledge of the soul, the intellect, and its acts (De ver. 10.8, 9; C. gent. 2.75, 3.46; ST 1a, 87.1). In immediate CONSCIOUSNESS, what is primarily given is the existence of one's own singular act currently going on; but implicit in this awareness is the existence of oneself, one's soul, and the intellect, and also the nature of the act, of the power, and of the soul. For what is known is an act of a determinate sort, and it is apprehended concretely, as it is; and consequently the subject and principles of this are also implicitly apprehended as of a determinate sort (De ver. 1.9; In 3 sent. 23.1.2 ad 3). But this knowledge is not explicit; it is in simple APPREHENSION only and not in reflexive judgment; and especially it is not universal, i.e., of the nature of understanding, intellect, and soul as such. In explicit, judgmental, and universal reflection the nature, or QUIDDITY, of the soul is known from that of its power, the intellect; that of the intellect, from its act, UNDERSTANDING; and this, from its object. The soul, for instance, is known to be immaterial because the intellect is an immaterial power; the immateriality of the intellect is known from the "quality," or nature of its act; and that of the act from the immateriality of its object, especially because it is a universal nature (see SOUL, HUMAN 4; SPIRIT). Such quidditative psychological knowledge is not spontaneous and easy but "most difficult" (De ver. 10.8 ad 8 contr.) and the result of a "diligent and penetrating inquiry" (ST 1a, 87.1; cf. 2). (See INTROSPECTION.)

Epistemological Reflection. Spontaneous psychological reflection is the basis of a reflection that gives a knowledge of the possession of TRUTH and consequently yields CERTITUDE. In judging, the intellect affirms or denies something of something else. The JUDGMENT is known to be warranted because what is apprehended about the thing (the predicate) is known to belong to the thing (the subject); for the intellect knows the act of apprehending and its nature, knows that what it has apprehended is derived from the thing and expresses some aspect of the thing, and consequently knows that it is the nature of its act, and of itself as the principle of the act, to come into conformity with the thing that is made its object (De ver. 1.9; In 1 perih. 3.6 and 9; In 6 meta. 4.1236). This is an awareness of truth and the basis of certitude.

Logical Reflection. This differs from psychological reflection in that the "secondary objects of understanding" with which logic is concerned are not the acts, intelligible species, and concepts "according to the existence which they have in the knower," which psychology studies (De ver. 10.4, 2.5 ad 17), but "secondary intentions which follow upon the manner of understanding" (De pot. 7.9; In 4 meta. 4.574; In 1 anal. post. 20.5). They are views of the primary intentions or concepts not considered subjectively but objectively, according to what is represented, that is, the apprehended natures, and the condition that these natures have in the mind as a result of being apprehended, e.g., universality or the fact of being a genus. Formed by the intellect, these intentions are attributed to the natures that are known, not as these natures exist in reality, i.e., in singular things, but precisely as known, i.e., as existing in the mind (De pot. 7.6).

Modern Doctrines. The whole philosophy of R. DESCARTES is built upon self-awareness, or reflection. Its basic principle, which alone is found indubitable, is Cogito ergo sum: "I think, therefore I am" (Discourse 4; Medit. 2; Prin. 1.7). By thinking he means every event of immediate consciousness within man, such as understanding, willing, imagining, and sensing (Prin. 1.9; Medit. 2, 3; Replies 2 Arg. def. 1; 3.2). Thought is known by the mere fact of thinking; and even when all else is doubted, in the act of doubting the fact of thinking cannot be doubted; and at the same time the thinker is known as existing and as a thinking thing (res cogitans), a substance whose whole essence, or nature, is simply to think (Discourse 4; Medit. 2, 3; Replies 2.4; 5.2.4; Prin. 1.7). Descartes even refers to the self simply as thought (cogitatio), meaning, however, not simply the operation but the thing or nature so operating (Replies 3.2; For Arnauld, July 29, 1648). There is accordingly much ambiguity in his usage of the word "thought"; and thinking for him is not distinctively intellectual. The self-awareness that attends it, however, is intellectual and spiritual.

J. LOCKE makes more direct mention of reflection as a principle in his philosophy than does Descartes, for he lays down as the exclusive sources of man's knowledge sensation and reflection (Essay 2.1.2–4). Reflection is “the perception of the operations of our own mind within us, as it is employed about the ideas it has got,” that is, such operations as “perception, thinking, doubting, believing, reasoning, knowing, willing” (ibid.) and “remembrance, discerning, reasoning, judging, knowledge, faith, etc.” (2.6). Simple ideas of these operations are formed, but these ideas as such seem to play relatively little part in the subsequent explanation of knowledge. And reflection has almost no role in the constitution of the objective content of man's knowledge. On the perception of one's own existence Locke sounds almost exactly like Descartes: “If I doubt of all other things, that very doubt makes me perceive my own existence, and will not suffer me to doubt that. . . . If I know I doubt, I have as certain perception of the existence of the thing doubting, as of that thought which I call ‘doubt’. . . . In every act of sensation, reasoning, or thinking, we are conscious to ourselves of our own being” (4.9.3). This self-awareness does not lead Locke, however, to any ample knowledge of the nature of the soul; for man is “in the dark concerning these matters” (2.27.27).

G. W. von LEIBNIZ defines reflection as “an attention to that which is in us” (New Essays, Introd. 4) and holds that it is by reflection, or self-consciousness, that the human soul is distinguished from inferior monads (Monadology 30; cf. 15, 19, 23, 29). The soul or mind, moreover, contains the whole universe within itself and is a mirror of the whole and an image of God (Principles of Nature and of Grace 13–14; Monad. 56–57, 60–62). Thus through reflection upon itself and reasoning it knows everything else. Attractive as this doctrine may be, it takes insufficient account of man's experience of the process of knowing and of the effort and steps involved.

Phenomenology and Existentialism. Reflection of a somewhat different sort plays an important role in PHENOMENOLOGY, a philosophy or method of philosophizing that professes to be a radical, unprejudiced, and detailed description of experience or “pure consciousness,” particularly as propounded by E. HUSSERL. The data of experience are scrutinized precisely as experience; neither the objects nor the subject are considered in their ontological reality but only as exhibited or manifested: objects are viewed only as objects and the subject just as a center of pure consciousness evoked and conditioned by what it is conscious of. This requires a reflection that is called “transcendental” and is distinguished from “natural” reflection, which includes both immediate consciousness of one's acts of perception, recall, and predication as well as the studied introspection of psychology; this new type observes and makes explicit the content of these acts of consciousness (Cartesian Meditations 1.15; Ideas 38, 45, 77–78, 108, 150) from the viewpoint of its formal structure, essence, or “meaning” (Ideas 3–5, 129–131). This would make the reflection ontological rather than psychological, except that it is not concerned with the existence, or reality, of the object. And this reflection reveals the transcendental “I,” which is not “a human Ego in the universal, existentially posited world, but exclusively a subject for which this world has being” (Ideas, Introd. to Eng. ed.; cf. 33, 46, 49, 50, 80, 92, 115; Cartes. Med. 1.11; 4.30–33, 36). The subject is constituted in constituting the object, the world of its own experience. For Husserl himself, phenomenology tended toward idealism, though this does not seem to be a necessary consequence. The faithful acceptance of the data of experience and the careful analysis and description of its contents can prove a solid beginning for philosophy; but its sufficiency for a complete philosophy has been questioned or denied by most of his followers, who have gone on in the various directions of psychology, psychoanalysis, ethical inquiry, and especially existentialism (see M. MERLEAU-PONTY, “What Is Phenomenology?” Cross Currents 6 (1956) 59–70).

In EXISTENTIALISM attention is focused not only on human existence but on the experience of this existence. S. A. KIERKEGAARD stresses the SUBJECTIVITY of the existence of the individual, which is known by direct experience but cannot be expressed to another in universalized and systematized thought. Each one not only knows his own existence but must be himself (Either/Or 2, 150); but the “immediate” man, immersed in other things and without reflection, cannot do this (Sickness unto Death 80–81). Reflection, which is presupposed by consciousness (Johannes Climacus 2.1, 151), is needed to bring out distinctness and individuality (ibid. 150–53) and also to attain the inwardness of a conscious, ethical, and religious man (Postscript 169–224). Existentialist philosophers have tended to place a chasm between subject and object and, in stressing subjective knowledge, to eliminate or minimize essences, thereby abolishing the principle of INTELLIGIBILITY of things. Gabriel Marcel has resisted this tendency. He considers thought as self-transcendence (Being and Having 30) and propounds a twofold reflection. Primary reflection is turned toward the objective content of knowledge as independent of the act of thinking in order to inspect and analyze; it could accordingly be classified as ontological. Secondary reflection, directed toward the primary, considers the content precisely as given in the act of experiencing and, without denying the value of primary reflection, recuperates the original unity and reveals the self-transcendence of the self and finds OBJECTIVITY (Du refus à l'invocation 34; Philosophy of Existence 14).

See Also: INTENTIONALITY; KNOWLEDGE, PROCESS OF; SPECIES, INTENTIONAL.

Bibliography: J. P. RUANE, "Self-Knowledge and the Spirituality of the Soul in St. Thomas," New Scholasticism 32 (1958) 425–442. J. D. MCKIAN, "The Metaphysics of Introspection According to St. Thomas," ibid. 15 (1941) 89–117. G. P. KLUBERTANZ, "St. Thomas and the Knowledge of the Singular," ibid. 26 (1952) 135–166. C. V. PAX, "Philosophical Reflection: Gabriel Marcel," ibid. 38 (1964) 159–177. B. ROMEYER, Saint Thomas et notre connaissance de l'esprit humain (2d ed. Archives de philosophie 6.2; Paris 1932). J. DE FINANCE, Cogito carsésien et réflexion thomiste (ibid. 16.2; 1946); "Being and Subjectivity," Cross Currents 6 (1956) 163–178. J. WÉBERT, "'Reflexio': Étude sur les opérations réflexives dans la psychologie de Saint Thomas d'Aquin," Mélanges Mandonnet, 2 v. (Bibliothèque Thomiste 13, 14; 1930) v. 1.

[R. W. SCHMIDT]

REFLEX PRINCIPLES

A general rule intended to provide indirect or reflex certainty about the morality of a contemplated course of conduct when sufficient direct certainty cannot be obtained from an investigation of the problem in itself. We shall consider: (1) the use of reflex principles in general, and (2) some reflex principles in particular.

The Use of Reflex Principles in General. Frequently a person is in doubt as to the morality of an action that he is thinking of performing. Is there a law forbidding it, or is he morally free to perform it? In other words, which should prevail, law or liberty? His first duty, if he wishes to perform the act, is to seek direct certainty as to its morality. This he can do by examining the nature and circumstances of the action, in the light of reason, faith, and the teaching of the Church or by seeking counsel from one more learned than himself. But even when he has made such an investigation, proportionate in its thoroughness to the importance of the problem, he may still remain in doubt. He finds that there are probable reasons in favor of law and probable reasons in favor of liberty. In such a situation he may sometimes change his practical doubt into indirect or reflex certainty in favor of liberty by the use of reflex principles. (For the exceptions to this rule see MORALITY, SYSTEMS OF). These are general norms of conduct, applicable to all fields of morality, enabling one to act with "the liberty of the glory of the sons of God" (Rom 8.21), without fear of formal sin, even though the action he performs may be a material sin. The basis of this doctrine is the reasonable conviction that the God of mercy and goodness does not always oblige men to obey a law binding them with any degree of probability however slight. There are different schools of thought among Catholic theologians as to the measure of probability an opinion in favor of liberty must possess before one can render it practically certain by the use of a reflex principle, but all admit the use of reflex principles to solve practical doubts of conscience in favor of liberty when the opinion for liberty possesses some particular degree of probability. (These same principles hold when a person doubts whether he is obliged to perform an act or may omit it.)

Some Reflex Principles in Particular. The best known and most widely used reflex principle is "A doubtful law does not bind" (Lex dubia non obligat). This principle is admitted by all theologians, though it is not understood by all in the same sense. The probabilists consider a law doubtful even when the opinion for law is definitely more probable than the opinion for liberty, whereas the probabiliorists and the equiprobabilists believe that in such a case the preponderance of the opinion for law renders it practically certain.

Another reflex principle is "In a doubt the possessor is to be favored" (In dubio melior est conditio possidentis). This principle had its origin in matters of justice, when there was a doubt as to ownership. It is reflected in a more popular form in English as "Possession is nine-tenths of the law." It is used especially in equiprobabilism, when the probabilities for liberty and law are approximately equal. When the doubt concerns the existence of the law (whether there is a law, whether this person is bound by law, etc.), equiprobabilists say, liberty is in possession and may be followed; when the doubt concerns the cessation of the law (whether it has been fulfilled, whether it has been dispensed with, etc.), the law is in possession and must be obeyed.

Other reflex principles are "From what commonly occurs a prudent presumption can be drawn" (Ex communiter contingentibus prudens fit praesumptio), and "Everything done is presumed to have been rightly done" (Omne factum praesumitur rite factum). The former will help a person who regularly repels temptation when he is in doubt as to whether or not he has consented to a particular temptation. The latter will assist one who has made a careful general confession but who now doubts whether he has included a particular sin of the past.

Prümmer says (1:336) that all reflex principles can be reduced to this one: "In a doubt the side having the presumption is to be favored" (In dubio standum est pro quo stat praesumptio).

See Also: DOUBT, MORAL; MORALITY, SYSTEMS OF.

Bibliography: D. M. PRÜMMER, Manuale theologiae moralis, ed. E. M. MÜNCH (Barcelona 1945–46) 1:332–336. B. H. MERKELBACH, Summa theologiae moralis, 3 v. (Paris 1938) 2:85–89. ALPHONSUS LIGUORI, Theologia moralis, ed. L. GAUDÉ, 4 v. (Rome 1905–12) 1:40–89. A. TANQUEREY, Synopsis theologiae moralis et pastoralis, 3 v. (new ed. Paris 1930–31) 2:419.

[F. J. CONNELL]

REFORMATION, PROTESTANT (IN THE BRITISH ISLES)

The English Reformation was intricately bound up with dynastic politics. It began when HENRY VIII (1491–1547), unable to secure a male heir from his 24-year marriage to CATHERINE OF ARAGON, divorced and married Anne Boleyn. Although Henry officially severed ties between the English Church and Rome, the Reformation in England is generally seen as having been completed by Henry's daughter ELIZABETH I (1533–1603). By 1590, Elizabeth had secured England's place within the ranks of Protestant countries and the majority of English men and women were united in their opposition to the re-establishment of Catholicism. The English Reformation had become a fact that was to affect the modern history of Great Britain, Europe, and the West.

The 16th century was a time of quickening change in Europe and the Channel did not keep the effects of these transformations from England. The 95 theses on indulgences, while intended by Martin LUTHER as a routine challenge to formal scholastic debate, were elaborated into a declaration of independence, and neither the Christian Church nor Christendom itself was ever the same again. At the moment when the religious revolution began, other changes already had announced the birth of the modern world. Gunpowder altered the methods of warfare and shifted the centers of political power because no longer could the armored man on horseback count on automatic military superiority. The use of the printing press had demonstrated by 1517 how swiftly and cheaply information might be disseminated. Renaissance HUMANISM had already produced all over Europe a group of critical and restless intellectuals, and the pendulum of European economic preponderance was swinging for the first time in recorded history away from the Mediterranean to the Atlantic seaboard, as Portuguese sailors opened cheaper and safer trade routes to the Orient and Spanish adventurers ransacked the wealth of the newly found continents.

Economic and Political Change in England. The medieval alliance in English economic and political life between static rural feudalism and the protectionist guild-directed towns was fast disappearing. The possibilities of commerce, particularly in wool production, and of small industry, which could escape the restrictions of the local guilds, led to a new partnership between enterprising landlords and provincial business men or London merchants who could provide domestic and foreign markets. In the new economy some vast fortunes were accumulated at the cost of considerable social dislocation. In a land where nine of ten inhabitants were directly engaged in farming, much unrest arose from the practice of enclosure, whereby the landlord fenced off the village common lands, plowed them, and planted wheat, or converted arable land into sheep pasture. The resultant eviction of tenants led to riots, protests, and even statutes in opposition.

The Englishman of Luther's generation witnessed political alterations no less dramatic. The kings of England had enjoyed during the Middle Ages a much greater control over their feudal realms than sovereigns on the Continent, yet in Tudor times, when an absolute monarch could be found in every European capital, it was ironic that whoever wore the crown in Westminster had to remember that the king of England, though below no man, was below the law. Nevertheless, with the Tudors (1485–1603), the English monarchy attained a power and prestige seldom known before and certainly never known since. This achievement was the triumph of Henry VII (reigned 1485–1509), shrewd, grasping, and meticulous, who brought peace and stability to a kingdom harassed for more than a century by foreign and civil wars and general distress; of his son, Henry VIII (reigned 1509–47), who concealed behind a soft, self-indulgent exterior a will of iron and not a small talent for the workings of government; and of his granddaughter, Elizabeth I (reigned 1558–1603), perhaps the most skillful woman politician in the history of the West.

The Tudors, however, were never able to employ fully those absolutist principles of sovereignty contained in the Roman law and so commonly accepted on the Continent. Though they secured an important advantage in that at Henry VII's accession in 1485 large numbers of feudal barons had been killed or discredited by the aristocratic Wars of the Roses, and though they were ingenious in asserting financial independence, still ultimately all had to turn to Parliament for money, usually receiving less than demanded. In the final analysis the Tudor monarchs were allowed more political power because instead of disregarding cherished English institutions, they learned to manipulate them with unmatched skill. The willingness of 16th-century Englishmen to follow their rulers proved the deciding factor when the religious crisis arose. Because it was precipitated not by a theologian but by a ruler, it took a radically different direction from its counterpart on the Continent. Questions of doctrine, matters of primary importance to Luther and Calvin, were secondary in England to personal and political considerations. Henry VIII remained convinced that the sacramental system was the normal efficacious means of salvation for the Christian, and therefore rejected the Continental Reformers' fundamental tenet. Elizabeth, more inclined than her father to treat religion as an abstraction, would probably have kept the Mass in England had she judged it politically advantageous.

Englishmen, however, were not uninterested in the theological controversies raging round them. Not long after 1517, small but intense groups of genuine English Lutherans began to appear in London and environs. Devotees of the new doctrinal views surrounded the Tudors, and during the reign of the child king, Edward VI (reigned 1547–53), were effective in creating a truly Protestant England. But the real architects of the religious change, Henry and Elizabeth, were professionally concerned with politics and economics. In England, therefore, the order of events was rather the reverse of that on the Continent. Henry VIII's primary objective was control over the judicial machinery and the financial resources of the Church, not deviation from traditional doctrine.

Provision of Benefices. The polity of the English Church had few of the features of centralization familiar today. Its finances appeared inextricably bound to the medieval system of land tenure, at a time when that system was being transformed by commercial and monetary revolution. Increasingly, churchmen, like their lay contemporaries, tended to think of their "income" no longer in terms of bushels of wheat, but in terms of money payments. Ancient feudal practice conflicted with newer ideas about financial and constitutional organization, especially in the key issue of appointment of ecclesiastical personnel. Attached to every diocese, parish, or monastic community was a source of income to support the cleric in the performance of his religious functions. Though the bishop possessed sole right to confer sacramental power on a priest, he did not have an unrestricted right to place him in a parish of his diocese. The parish, and no less the diocese and monastery, was an economic as well as a spiritual entity, whose revenue came for the most part from the land.

Hence, besides the ecclesiastical superior, the nobleman whose ancestor had originally endowed the parish with a parcel of land also controlled clerical appointments. Between himself and every priest who enjoyed a living on his land existed a feudal contract to be renewed each time the benefice fell vacant. The nobleman was no less interested in the appointment to the parish when, as the economy changed, its endowment brought cash rents instead of baskets of produce. The protection of that nobleman's rights prompted the legislation that ultimately made possible the kind of reformation Henry VIII brought to England. The 14th-century Statutes of PROVI-

SORS and PRAEMUNIRE checked in England the papacy's attempt to gain more direct control over the appointment to benefices. They made it a crime to invoke papal aid in securing a benefice contrary, to the wishes of the local patron, and defined the king's court as the final legal arbiter in cases involving ecclesiastical appointments. These laws, which, to a large degree, delivered the machinery of the Church into the hands of the king, did not deny the pope's theoretical control over any ecclesiastic anywhere. They simply maintained the feudal principle that centralization was a corruption. Feudal lawmakers could hardly feel otherwise, since the whole structure of their economic and political life was built upon the supremacy of the locality.

Pope and King. The pope's position was equally defensible. Landed patrons disregarded the spiritual qualifications of candidates to benefices, and as a result Christian communities were afflicted with unworthy and uneducated clerics. The nobles retorted that those priests who appeared with a papal license to a benefice were not noticeably better than those who sought the approbation of the landed patron, and that the papacy was really engaged in a money-making venture, since the papal court charged a fee for every petition it satisfied with a benefice. The Statutes of Provisors and Praemunire, in the tradition of MAGNA CARTA, regarded the king as the first feudal baron of the realm. But the English Lords and Commons, particularly after 1485, found that the laws they had passed were rarely enforced, because the king found it more to his advantage to use them as a threat. Clerics continued to secure benefices with papal licenses, but none was named to whom the king objected, and only his candidates became bishops. Thus, for more than 100 years before the accession of Henry VIII, the kings of England were blessed with a clergy, and thus a large part of the literate population, completely submissive. They had at the same time the use of a free civil service, for a clergyman who served the crown could be easily rewarded with a benefice. The popes, on their side, received theoretical recognition of their prerogatives and some concrete financial considerations as well. This latter was attractive to the Renaissance popes with their luxurious tastes and expensive political ambitions.

The Dynastic Marriage. Royal personages ruled by reason of their blood, and one of their favorite tools of diplomacy was marriage. No treaty could be sealed, no war concluded, without such alliances. No prince dreamed of choosing a mate for himself, and often he was betrothed before he had reached the age of reason. Thus it was agreed as early as 1492 that six-year-old Arthur, Prince of Wales (1486–1502) and heir to Henry VII, should wed seven-year-old Catherine (1485–1536), fourth daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella. Nine years later, November 14, 1501, the ceremony was performed at St. Paul's, London, to the delight of King and people. Four months afterward Prince Arthur died. The Spanish-English diplomatic connection, to which the marriage had given expression, still appeared mutually beneficial, and so negotiations were opened between the two courts with a view toward new nuptials between the widowed Princess and her brother-in-law, Henry, now heir presumptive to the English throne. A serious obstacle, however, stood in the way of the proposed union. Catherine and Henry were related to one another by AFFINITY in the first degree, because Catherine had been the wife of Henry's deceased brother. The Church's law on this point was severe, and it was almost unheard of that two Catholics so related would be allowed to marry.

Henry VII and Ferdinand sought a dispensation from this strict law; it was granted in 1503 by Julius II, though six years passed before it was used. Meanwhile, Henry VII followed a devious course, assuring Ferdinand of his constant interest in the Spanish match, and, at the same time, watching for proposals that might be more advantageous politically. The unfortunate Catherine lived on in England, her dreary widowhood made more grim by her father-in-law's miserly restrictions and her father's apparent indifference. At Henry VII's death, the new king immediately announced to his Council his intention to marry Catherine. Any objection based upon affinity was dismissed because of the papal dispensation and Catherine's solemn declaration that her marriage to Arthur had never been consummated. The archbishop of Canterbury witnessed their exchange of vows June 3, 1509, and the coronation followed three weeks later. Henry VIII had just turned 18; his bride was six years older. Most Englishmen were pleased with their vigorous and intelligent young king, the firm alliance with the rising power of Spain against the ancient French enemy, and the new queen whose charm and virtue had already won a devotion from her people that would not be lost even in the days of her deepest troubles.

A Decree of Nullity. Five children were born to the royal couple, only one of whom, the Princess Mary (1516–58), survived infancy. Such domestic tragedy for the head of a ruling family such as the Tudors, who had come to power by conquest only a generation before, presented concern. The survival of his dynasty weighed heavily upon Henry's mind, but that this serves as adequate explanation for the king's extra-marital liaisons may be doubted. One of his mistresses bore him a son in 1519. Another, Mary Boleyn, closely related to the powerful Duke of Norfolk, was married to one of his gentlemen when Henry was tired of her, a fate that provided a ready example for Mary's younger sister Anne, when her own charm infatuated the king. Anne made it clear that if she could not be his wife she would not be his mistress. By 1526 the possibility of making her his wife was absorbing almost all of Henry's attention. Divorce, in the sense of the termination of a marriage validly contracted and consummated, did not then or ever figure in the king's calculations. What he sought, and what finally he gave himself, was a declaration of nullity, a definitive legal statement that his marriage to Catherine had never been valid. Could the dispensation of 1503 be successfully challenged? If Julius II could not or should not have given the dispensation, then the degree of affinity between Henry and Catherine still existed and rendered true Christian matrimony impossible in their case.

Wolsey's Failure. Early in 1527 the king placed his "great matter" in the charge of Cardinal Thomas WOLSEY, Archbishop of York, Lord Chancellor, and papal legate. Wolsey could stand as the archetype of self-seeking churchmen of Renaissance Christendom. As legate Wolsey acted almost independently of Rome, thus providing for his sovereign a useful and ominous precedent. Because Wolsey did not know, at first, that Henry intended Anne Boleyn to be queen, the King's desire for an annulment was not unwelcome. The Tudors, with scanty resources and a small population, could not compete with the continental titans, the Valois of France and the Hapsburgs of Spain and Austria. But an English policy of shifting alliances might give England a position more significant than her means alone could have won. This policy Henry and Wolsey had adopted, though in their hands it had enjoyed a singular lack of success. Now, when Wolsey was in the midst of negotiating a new treaty with the French, the diplomatic possibilities of a marriage between his master, free of Catherine, and a French princess struck him immediately. Two things, however, he did not know: first, that he had once again chosen the losing side in the Continental struggle, for the French cause lay prostrate almost everywhere in Europe; and second, that Henry meant to have Anne Boleyn and his own way, over all obstacles.

From 1527 to 1529 Wolsey exerted pressure on Clement VII, even when he learned that Henry's passion for Anne ruled out a French marriage. He saw now that his career, perhaps his life, depended upon the success of the suit, which had a certain prima facie strength. The dispensation of 1503 was unusual. Henry had given diplomatic support to the papacy, and he could hope, as Defender of the Faith (a title won from Rome in recognition of his book against Luther, Assertio septem sacramentorum in 1521), that he would receive a friendly hearing; Julius II had granted the dispensation on the grounds, among others, that certain international advantages would accompany the marriage. If the phrases of this grant were rhetorical only, then the dispensation was invalid and the marriage, too. He could argue further that Julius, though Vicar of Christ, had no power to permit a man to marry his brother's widow in the face of Scripture. But Wolsey knew how unsound this position was, with one ambiguous Old Testament passage (Lv 20.2) easily balanced by another (Dt 25.5).

Soon after negotiations opened, Clement was further handicapped by imprisonment. From the fateful sack of Rome on May 6, 1527, until November, he was the captive of Catherine's nephew, Charles V. To envoys from the King he made promises, thus hoping that somehow the trouble would go away. After delays, he named Lorenzo CAMPEGGIO as Wolsey's colleague in the trial proceedings. Campeggio arrived in London in October 1528 with secret instructions to keep the business from solution. In January 1529 Henry threatened schism if Campeggio did not speed the proceedings. The pressure on the Pope mounted as Charles, whose armies controlled Italy, reminded him that he expected his aunt to receive unbiased treatment. Catherine appealed to Clement for a fair trial and weakened her husband's case by producing a brief, signed by Julius II, with none of the technical flaws alleged to have invalidated the dispensation in Henry's possession. In the summer of 1529 Clement could procrastinate no longer and recalled the case to Rome for special hearing. Henry, feeling betrayed by Wolsey's assurance and Clement's promises, avenged himself upon his minister. Wolsey was dismissed in 1529, banished in disgrace to his diocese, in which he had never resided, and died November 30, 1530.

Royal Supremacy. The king charged that Wolsey had broken the Statute of Praemunire by exercising in England a foreign jurisdiction, namely, that of papal legate. Henry confronted the Parliament in November 1529. Through his new Lord Chancellor, Sir Thomas MORE, significantly a layman, he requested suitable legislation against the abuses of the clergy. During the next month the members of Parliament passed several acts aimed at clerical practices that had nettled them and their ancestors for generations: arbitrary fees set by bishops for probate of wills; nonresidence, pluralism, and secular business engaged in by clerics; and the mortuary rights exercised against deceased parishioners. The king was not a step closer to his goal, but the anticlerical spirit of this Reformation Parliament placed in his hand an indispensable tool. Since the legal authority claimed by the Church had blocked his way, he would absorb it into the authority of the state. He would become "under God, the Supreme Head" of the Church in England.

To overturn with legality loyalties and procedures 1,000 years old, he needed the support of his high court of Parliament. As a prelude to the new legislation, Henry, by threatening to invoke the penalties of Praemunire, extracted from the clergy, with scarcely a demur, a formal submission on May 16, 1532. This surrender was later confirmed by statute in a series of parliamentary acts that reached flood tide in the two sessions of 1534, when it became the law of the realm that no longer was it heresy to deny the pope's divinely instituted supremacy, that the pope had no more rights than any other foreign bishop with regard to ecclesiastical appointments and dispensations, that the king was the Supreme Head of the English Church, and that to deny this was treason. Finally, in the Succession Acts, it was defined that the marriage between Catherine and Henry, or any like it, was against God's law, "any foreign dispensations notwithstanding," and that the marriage between Anne and Henry was "undoubtedly, true, sincere, and perfect." It was further decreed that every adult should swear an oath in support of the contents of these Acts, with stern penalties for those who refused. For Anne Boleyn was now Queen Anne, after her secret marriage to the king in January 1533, and her coronation on June 1 by Thomas CRANMER, Henry's new archbishop of Canterbury.

Catherine, now styled Dowager Princess of Wales, had been banished to a rural exile. On March 23, 1534, Clement VII, as a last exercise in futility and anticlimax, decreed that Catherine was indeed Henry's true wife and ordered her restoration as queen.

The Suppression of the Traditional Church. Henry VIII accomplished his seizure of the Church's administration with remarkably little resistance, but not without some bloodshed. The servant girl Elizabeth BARTON, the "Nun of Kent," was executed on April 20, 1534, for preaching against the divorce; the priors of the Charterhouses of London, Beauvale, and Axholme, John HUGHTON, Robert LAWRENCE, and Augustine WEBSTER, together with the Brigittine Richard REYNOLDS and the pastor of Islesworth, John Haile, were tortured to death on May 4, 1535; John FISHER, Bishop of Rochester, and Thomas More, after dubious trials, suffered martyrdom on June 22 and July 6, 1535, respectively (see ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF). But the nation as a whole, whether it approved or not, remained quiet. The King's lieutenant was Thomas CROMWELL, a man of keen intelligence and without a trace of scruple. Under his direction the crown explored the possibilities of exploiting the Church. Taxes and fees, once paid to the Roman court, now poured into the royal coffers. The monasteries were suppressed, first the small ones (1536) and then the large (1539), 800 houses in all. Their lands, plate, and other valuables were confiscated, thus setting in motion a massive redistribution of wealth. In October 1536, Robert Aske, a London lawyer, led an insurrection in protest. Calling it the PILGRIMAGE OF GRACE, he marched on York, drove out the King's tenants, and returned expelled nuns and monks to their houses. The pilgrims grew to 35,000, but after Aske's execution on July 12, 1537, they were scattered by forces of the Duke of NORFOLK.

Edward VI. On Henry's death, Jan. 28, 1547, the kingdom passed from his firm hand into that of a child of ten years. Under the reign of the sickly boy, Edward VI, son of Henry's third wife, Jane Seymour, continental Protestantism was able to take hold. During the lifetime of Henry, justification by faith alone and the consequent rejection of the sacramental system stood no chance. His Six Articles Act of June 1539 prescribed hanging or burning for those who denied transubstantiation, Communion under one species, the value of Masses for souls in purgatory, auricular confession, clerical celibacy, or the binding force of solemn vows of chastity. During Edward's reign of six years, however, Protestant divines became influential.

In the summer of 1547 the government placed in the hands of the clergy the First Book of Homilies, much of it composed by Cranmer himself, in which the fundamental Protestant doctrines were thoroughly explained. These dogmatic lessons were to be read as instruction from the pulpit on Sunday. The next spring The Order of Communion appeared, an English adaptation of the Lutheran Communion rite that, as the directives stated, was to be added to the Mass on Communion days. It provided for the reception of Communion under both species, and explicitly dispensed communicants from the prior need of the Sacrament of Penance. Then, on January 21, 1549, Parliament gave its blessing to the most revolutionary venture so far, THE BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER. It replaced the Missal, the Breviary, and all the rest of the old Church's liturgical books. Written in singularly graceful language, it furnished a service of great linguistic beauty and manageable length.

The introduction of the Prayer Book on Pentecost Sunday 1549 provoked riots. But they were put down, and Somerset, blamed for the crisis, was replaced in power by John Dudley, Earl of Warwick (1502?-53). In 1552 Cranmer, with the approval of Dudley, now Duke of Northumberland, produced a revision of the Prayer Book, a catechism for children, and in the next year a formal statement of belief, The Forty-Two Articles of Religion. Edited by Cranmer and the Bishop of London, Nicholas RIDLEY, the articles were to be accepted under threat of severe penalties and were so radically Protestant that an orthodox Lutheran would have rejected much of what they contained. Edward VI died July 6, 1553, and his eldest sister, Mary, daughter of Catherine of Aragon, became the new monarch.

Marian Restoration. The possibility of the accession of Catholic MARY TUDOR led to an attempted coup d'etat. Northumberland, Cranmer, and Ridley succeeded in persuading the Council to declare Lady Jane Grey, Mary's 16-year-old cousin, queen; but their rebellion, lacking public support, collapsed in a few days. Mary Tudor, now queen at 37, had known little but distress since the day, more than 25 years before, that her father had repudiated her mother and had declared Mary herself illegitimate. Now, as queen, she could find few in England whom she could trust. The Council, the bench of bishops, the lay lords had all been involved in one way or another in the assault upon her religion and herself. Her choice of a chancellor, the gifted Stephen Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, was a good one; but Mary knew that Gardiner, though no Protestant in the continental sense, had accepted the Royal Supremacy, and had been an active agent of Henry VIII in the divorce. She turned for guidance to the members of her mother's family, the Hapsburg Emperor Charles V and his son, Philip of Spain, despite their single-minded dynastic interests. On July 25, 1554, a marriage was celebrated between Mary and Philip, 11 years her junior, that proved disastrous for the Queen and the nation. Philip cared little for her and after his father's abdication in October 1555 turned his attention completely to continental politics. Though Philip and his entourage were intensely unpopular in England, Mary loyally supported her husband's anti-French policy and declared war upon France in 1557. In spite of allied successes, the French captured Calais in January 1558. The loss of this Channel port, which had been in English hands for two centuries and which recalled the glorious days of the Black Prince and Henry V, was a blow to English pride from which the Queen never recovered. Against this background of disappointment and failure, Mary worked to undo the religious reformation of her father and brother. By the end of 1554 the religious statutes of the previous 20 years had been repealed. Pope Julius III commissioned Cardinal Reginald POLE (1500-58) legate to England with sweeping powers to restore the Catholic religion. A kinsman of Mary and once her father's intimate, Pole had exiled himself from his homeland at the time of the divorce. He came to his new task with the reputation of an ascetic, scholar, and diplomat. He had been lately legate to the Council of TRENT. But because he was known to oppose the Spanish marriage, Charles V placed every obstacle in his path. Pole did not reach England or assume his duties as legate and archbishop of Canterbury until October 1554. Even after his arrival the work of restoration proceeded with tragic slowness. The chief complication was the new pope, the erratic and bitterly anti-Spanish PAUL IV, who imagined that Pole, since he served a queen wedded to a Spanish husband and Spanish policy, might well be a heretic. He canceled Pole's legatine commission and summoned him back to Rome in April 1557. Though Pole managed to evade the order, much of his effectiveness disappeared.

Ineffective though Pole might have been, the Marian regime is remembered chiefly not for that but for the persecutions. Between February 1555 and November 1558, 273 men and women were burned to death for heresy. This total included the five bishops: Thomas Cranmer, Hugh Latimer, Nicholas Ridley, Robert Ferrar, and John Hooper; 16 other clergymen; and a handful of gentlemen. But for the most part the victims were peasants and artisans. Most suffered in London and the southern counties—nearby under statutes passed 150 years before. The law directed that once it had been determined by a bishop's court that an individual held unorthodox beliefs and refused to abjure them, an officer of the crown should "receive" him and "before the people in a high place cause him to be burned, that such punishment may strike fear into the minds of others" That Queen Mary burned heretics did not shock her contemporaries. Those who condemned her did so because, in their judgment, she burned the wrong people, the very elect of God. Society in those days, as surely in Calvin's Geneva as in Mary's London, considered nobody so dangerous to the commonweal as the heretic. It was also taken for granted that no heretic held his views in good faith, and that he was, therefore, a willful criminal. Add to these social convictions a penal code harsh beyond modern imagination—in England, capital punishment was inflicted for a list of felonies running to several hundred—and a necessary backdrop is drawn behind the infamous "Fires of Smithfield."

Nevertheless, Mary's persecution evidenced elements of unusual horror and futility, unmatched in intensity by anything heretofore in English history. Furthermore, those who suffered belonged largely to a social class that could do Mary or the work of Catholic restoration little harm. The wealthy mostly fled abroad, with little government interference, free to intrigue and to await a fairer day. Finally, general religious sentiment was profoundly damaged by the cynicism of the officers who enforced the statutes. Heresy laws had been framed for the protection of the Catholic community threatened by a hostile minority. But the whole English nation had formally abandoned the Catholic faith 20 years before the first Protestant martyr suffered in 1555. The police who ferreted him out, the bishop who determined the heterodoxy of his views, the sheriff who bound him to the stake had all accepted at least some of the things for which their victim was burned. Farmers and shopkeepers went to their deaths because they had believed what their clergy and lawmakers had been telling them for two decades about the pope and the Mass. In the persecution that brought her unhappy fame Mary demonstrated a typical Tudor ruthlessness and a curiously un-Tudor fanaticism, but at least the charges of hypocrisy and opportunism must be laid at other doors.

Elizabeth I. Mary died on Nov. 17, 1558, and was succeeded by her half-sister, Elizabeth. With each change of government, Elizabeth had had to shift her theological alliances, and during Mary's reign she outwardly practiced Catholicism. For some weeks, therefore, it remained unclear what course she would follow in ecclesiastical affairs. By Christmas, however, all doubts were dispelled, and the Parliament that convened a month later was presented with a government program calling for the reestablishment of Henry's and Edward's religious legislation and the repeal of Mary's. After four months of maneuver the Elizabethan Acts of Supremacy and Uniformity, which once more made the English sovereign a kind of local pope and imposed upon the nation a Protestant form of worship, received the royal assent (May 8, 1559). Resistance to it came immediately from two sides and continued. The Catholics who fought the losing battle in the Parliament of 1559 proved to be more resolute than their ancestors of a generation before. All the bishops and many of the lower clergy now refused to follow the direction of the government. Elizabeth deprived them of their offices and replaced them with men more pliable. Catholic laity who refused to attend the Protestant services she fined and restricted with increasing severity as the years passed. But she made traitors of them, not martyrs as Mary would have done in like circumstances. Not that Elizabeth hesitated to shed blood, and in great quantity, wherever her religious policy went unaccepted; for example, in 1569, after the failure of the Rising of the North, a mismanaged and half-armed protest against the heretical policies of the government, no less than 800 men were executed for their part in a "rebellion" whose military operations had produced five fatalities.

This and similar savage reprisals persuaded most Englishmen of Elizabeth's generation that conformity was necessary for survival. As they attended the Protestant service on Sunday, Catholics could soothe their consciences with the thought that what had been taken away had once been restored and might be restored again. Their sons, however, who did not remember the marching and countermarching between 1534 and 1559, were much more prepared to accept the government's story that acceptance of the settlement was both a religious and a patriotic duty and that it represented no fundamental change in England's traditional faith. But this myth seemed threatened during the later years of the reign by the post-Tridentine Catholic revival, reflected in England by the work of the secular and Jesuit missionary priests. Excommunicated by PIUS V in 1570 through the bull Regnans Excelsis, Elizabeth reacted, especially after 1577, with a brutal determination that sent 183 Catholics to their deaths and many more to torture, mutilation, and exile.

The second source of opposition came from the more radical Protestants, soon to be lumped together under the name PURITANS. They quickly discovered that Elizabeth was not prepared to go nearly so far as they wanted in the task of cleansing the English church of papistry. They disliked her retention of the episcopal structure and sternly disapproved of the continued liturgical use of vestments and ceremonial, all of which, they said, was but an aspect of the pomp and display of the Roman Antichrist. They also had serious misgivings, as did their continental mentors, about the Queen's defined position in the church, "Supreme Governor of this realm . . . as well in all spiritual . . . causes as temporal." The bitter lesson they had to learn in the years after 1559 was that Elizabeth considered the pope not as Antichrist but as a political enemy. She did not share their zeal for the establishment of God's kingdom, as they conceived it, and she abhorred their notions of an evangelical theocracy on the Zurich or Geneva model. It was the political value of her position as head of the English church that Elizabeth prized most highly. To protect this supremacy she used the devoted talents of William Cecil (Lord Burghley, 1520–98), her confidant for 40 years, a ruthless secretary of state who saw that religious unity was a needed prelude to England's movement toward greatness, and Sir Francis Walsingham (1530?-98), an alarmist intriguer who saw spies everywhere and who was largely responsible for bringing about the execution of Mary, Queen of Scots. Conformity Elizabeth demanded, and obedience she insisted upon. However divergent Englishmen's views might be on points of doctrine, they had to conform to the government approved 39 Articles and be content with them. For Elizabeth, as for Henry VIII, reformation of religion in England meant primarily that the State should control the Church.

Bibliography: R. B. MERRIMAN, Life and Letters of Thomas Cromwell, 2 v. (Oxford 1902). J. A. MULLER, Stephen Gardiner and the Tudor Reaction (New York 1926). K. W. M. PICKTHORN, Early Tudor Government: Henry VIII (Cambridge, England 1934). C. H. GARRETT, The Marian Exiles: A Study in the Origins of Elizabethan Puritanism (Cambridge, England 1938). G. MATTINGLY, Catherine of Aragon (Boston 1941). H. M. SMITH, Henry VIII and the Reformation (New York 1962), Anglican view. E. T. DAVIES, Episcopacy and the Royal Supremacy in the Church of England in the XVI Century (1950). J. D. MACKIE, The Earlier Tudors (New York 1952). J. E. NEALE, Queen Elizabeth (New York 1934; repr. 1959); Elizabeth I and Her Parliaments, 2 v. (New York 1959). G. R. ELTON, The Tudor Revolution in Government (Cambridge, England 1953); New Cambridge Modern History (2d ed. London-New York 1957–) 2:226–250. H. F. M. PRESCOTT, Mary Tudor (rev. ed. New York 1953). L. B. SMITH, Tudor Prelates and Politics, 1536–1558 (Princeton 1953). N. SYKES, The English Religious Tradition (London 1953). P. HUGHES, The Reformation in England, 3 v. in 1 (5th, rev. ed. New York 1963), most reliable history of the English Reformation. S. C. CARPENTER, The Church in England, 1597–1688 (London 1954). C. READ, Mr. Secretary Cecil and Queen Elizabeth (New York 1955); ed., Bibliography of British History: Tudor Period, 1485–1603 (2d ed. New York 1959); Lord Burghley and Queen Elizabeth (New York 1960). H. C. PORTER, Reformation and Reaction in Tudor Cambridge (Cambridge, Eng. 1958). D. KNOWLES, The Religious Orders in England, 3 v. (Cambridge, England 1948–60) v.3, best reference for the religious orders. M. D. R. LEYS, Catholics in England, 1559–1829: A Social History (London 1961). W. R. TRIMBLE, The Catholic Laity in Elizabethan England, 1558–1603 (Cambridge, MA 1964). G. BARRACLOUGH, Papal Provisions (Oxford 1935). L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages, 40 v. (London-St. Louis 1938–61) v.9–15. E. G. RUPP, Studies in the Making of the English Protestant Tradition (Cambridge 1947). A. H. THOMPSON, The English Clergy (Oxford 1947). A. G. DICKENS, The English Reformation (New York 1964). W. A. CLEBSCH, England's Earliest Protestants, 1520–35 (New Haven 1964). P. COLLINSON, The Religion of Protestants (Oxford 1982). C. HAIGH, The English Reformation Revised (Cambridge 1987). R. O'DAY, The Debate on the English Reformation (New York 1986). J. J. SCARISBRICK, The Reformation and the English People (Oxford 1984).

[M. R. O'CONNELL]

REFORMATION, PROTESTANT (ON THE CONTINENT)

The term reformation as a restoration of an original form or norm was in common use throughout the Middle Ages. Renovation, restitution, regeneration, rebirth (RENAISSANCE), and many other expressions described the same general concept. The call for reform of the Church became more insistent in the late-medieval period. In part, the popularity of apocalyptic views of history from the twelfth century onward helped fuel the sense of urgency about reform at this time. Prophetic movements promoted the notion that the Church was experiencing a constantly worsening decline and deterioration from its early Christian state. Rising expectations, deepening piety, and the perennial appeal of monastic asceticism also fed the reforming impulse. To understand the onset of the sixteenth-century Reformations, movements more dynamic and transforming than the many medieval reforms that preceded them, we must separate perception from reality. The evidence is scanty to suggest that corruption and abuse were worse in the fourteenth- and fifteenth-century Church than they had been in the twelfth or thirteenth. Throughout Europe there were many places where ecclesiastical functions were efficiently executed and where clerical discipline was widely respected. Yet the Western Church was vulnerable to criticism on a variety of fronts because it was an enormous, international institution that performed cure of souls, but also fulfilled important social, economic, and political functions. To many, these worldly aims seemed in conflict with the institution's religious and sacramental mission.

While the idea of reform was common in Europe around 1500, Martin Luther and the other early evangelical reformers rarely used the term “reformation” to describe the movement they initiated. These early sixteenth-century reformers desired a restoration of the primitive Christian Gospel, which in their view, had been obscured through centuries of human innovation. Luther’s view often discounted the human ability to effect change in the Church, and instead insisted that it was the Word of God that would accomplish reform in God’s own time. Luther’s reserve in adopting the term “reformation” to describe the evangelical movement may help to explain why the word Reformation was not used to describe his work until a century and a half following his death. [see V. L. Von Seckendorf, Commentarius historicus et apologeticus de Lutheranismus seu de reformatione (1688–92)]. In the eighteenth century the term was extended to describe the reform movements that followed the work of John Calvin, and from the nineteenth century onward, the word “Reformation” has commonly been used to designate the rise and growth of Protestantism in the sixteenth century.

Causes of the Reformation

The roots of the Continental Reformation are primarily religious and reach back into the later Middle Ages. Several features of the doctrines of WYCLIF, HUS, the WALDENSES and unorthodox fifteenth-century theologians anticipated the later attacks of Luther and other early Protestant reformers. These included criticisms of transubstantiation, priestly status, the wealth and political power of the Church, and the corruption of biblical teaching. No direct lineage existed, however, between these figures and the later reformers. Instead the early evangelicalism of Luther, Zwingli, and others was the result of their search for religious truths that occurred within an orthodox context.

Philosophical Climate. The scholasticism of the later Middle Ages, particularly in its Ockhamist and nominalist forms, was incisive in the development of Protestant theology (see NOMINALISM). The via moderna, as late scholasticism was called, contrasted with the via antiqua of St. Thomas Aquinas. The reformers accepted some of the new philosophical and theological presuppositions of the nominalists, while disregarding others. The nominalist school denied the validity of universals, insisting instead that theological concepts were mere names created to describe certain ideas and things revealed in the Word of God. Most nominalists drew a sharp distinction between God’s absolute power, the potentia absoluta, and the ordering power, the potentia ordinata, He had displayed in Creation and revelation. By virtue of his “absolute power,” God could have created the world in an infinite number of ways, but His Word revealed the covenant He had established with humankind. The duty of the theologian, according to the nominalists, was not to deploy reason to understand God’s absolute power, but to illuminate the nature of these promises.

Through his education at the University of Erfurt, a center of the via moderna, Martin Luther came in contact with these nominalist teachings. Although he would eventually come to distance himself from Ockham and nominalism in the years after 1515, the school’s emphasis on the limits of human reason and on a covenantal theology left a residue in his work, as it did in other sixteenth-century reformers.

Role of Scripture. There is no doubt of the beginning of a Biblical revival in the later Middle Ages. The scriptures were widely available to scholars in the Vulgate and in a good number of vernacular translations. Further, a movement toward the study of the Scriptures in their original languages can be discerned among the humanists and theologians of the later fifteenth century. This return to the sources could produce controversy, as in the famous Reuchlin Affair that began in 1506 when the humanist Johannes REUCHLIN (1455–1522), author of a Hebrew grammar, attacked the converted Jew Johannes PFEFFERKORN for his attempts to destroy Jewish manuscripts he considered dangerous to Christians. Reuchlin’s persecution by members of Germany’s Dominicans resulted in the championing of his cause by humanists from throughout Europe and did nothing to retard the deepening study of the Bible in its original tongues. It did produce ill feelings, though, that persisted even as the Reformation began. In 1516 ERASMUS published a Greek version of the New Testament, and a subsequent corrected version of the Vulgate. Although Erasmus’s Greek edition may not have been of the same caliber as that contained in the Complutensian Polyglot (1502), edited by Cardinal Francisco XIMENES DE CISNEROS, his commentary emphasized the popular concept of the “philosophy of Christ” and downplayed medieval sacramental theology. His undermining of the scriptural foundations for the sacrament of penance, in particular, would win admirers among early evangelical reformers.

State of Religion among the Laity. The requirements for participation in the late-medieval Church had largely been drawn by the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) and included among their hallmarks annual attendance at the sacraments of penance and the Eucharist. The evidence suggests that in most parts of Europe lay attendance did not exceed the yearly duties of Lent and Easter, the one commonly shared way in which most people came into contact with the Church. Baptism and confirmation were also important events in the life of all Europeans, since they functioned as religious events, but also as important rites of passage that marked off various life stages. Differences of emphasis in religious life have long been identified between the countryside, where the vast majority of the population lived, and Europe's burgeoning cities. Preaching in the towns and the ministrations of the friars meant that city dwellers were probably more effectively indoctrinated in "official" Church teaching than were country people. Urban confraternities, too, provided a way for the laity to practice some of the offices and devotions normally undertaken only by the clergy. In the countryside priests were nevertheless vital members of the village community who were called upon to deliver benedictions, perform exorcisms, lead rogations and other rites that aimed to insure communal life. It is a mistake, though, to draw the distinction between town and country as one of a dichotomy between a ritualistic and superstitious rural religion, and a doctrinal and sacramental urban one. Superstition was common to both spheres. In Europe's towns, moreover, mortality was always high, and in each generation immigrants from the surrounding countryside renewed the population. The religious practices noted in the countryside, with their emphasis on perpetuating and insuring the community, also pervaded Europe's cities.

Other distinctions have been observed between elites and people in the religious life of the later Middle Ages. Again, these differences should not be viewed as hard and fast, since the late-medieval Church held out a variety of ways in which those without means could deepen their devotion. Still, the endowing of anniversary masses, the establishment of religious houses, enrollment in confraternities, the praying of the hours, and the amassing of indulgences—all important signs of late-medieval devotion—could generally only be practiced by those who possessed sufficient financial resources and leisure. The dichotomy between elites and people begins to break down when we realize that many nobles, patricians, and merchants—those possessed of the amenities of time and money—often evidenced little interest in these religious practices.

Scholars have long debated the precise character of late-medieval lay piety and its relationship to the subsequent Reformation. Some have argued that the institutional hierarchy of the Church ignored the needs of Europe's laity, and as a result a low level of knowledge and devotion existed among Europeans at the close of the Middle Ages. In this way the Reformation, and the later Catholic response, the Counter Reformation, have been interpreted as events that accomplished a final, effective "Christianization" of Europe. Others have judged the late-medieval Church to be too intrusive and demanding, an institution that fostered a vigorous, but ultimately unsatisfying piety. Such generalizations prove perilous for several reasons. They evaluate late-medieval religion against the subsequent Reformation. During the sixteenth century Protestant Reformers relied on propaganda and polemic to attack the Church and in the process, they sometimes obscured the character of late-medieval religion. The documentary evidence suggests that many fifteenth-century Europeans found adequate spiritual sustenance within the Church, while others were indifferent to it. For some, like Luther, the Church's teachings produced doubt and anxiety, even as for others, they were a source of consolation. The Church was, in other words, too large and diverse an institution to allow for such generalizations.

Clerical Abuse and Corruption. The papacy. On the eve of the Reformation abuse and corruption continued to exist within the Church, as it had for centuries. From 1309 to 1378 the papacy had resided in voluntary exile in the French city of Avignon, followed by a 40-year schism in which first two, then three, popes had simultaneously demanded the allegiance of Catholic Christendom. In the century between 1417 and 1517 the papacy also became involved in numerous dynastic intrigues, both in Italy and throughout Europe.

The AVIGNON PAPACY, the period that subsequently was dubbed the "Babylonian Captivity," has long been synonymous with a growing worldliness within the papal court. The Avignon popes, though French, did not capitulate to the French monarchy, but by reason of their residence at Avignon (a fief of Naples which since 1228 had acknowledged the papacy as overlord) they were able to maintain feudal independence. The personal lives of the Avignon popes were not scandalous except for nepotism and they did attempt reform. The most significant development of the period was the great increase in the machinery of papal government, that is in the pope's Curia, and the equally large increment in papal taxation, which touched the entire Church and caused irritation. The sums collected helped to sustain the temporal power of the papacy.

The Great Schism (1378–1417) damaged the prestige of the Church hierarchy when it presented the spectacle of rival popes mutually excommunicating each other and their adherents (see WESTERN SCHISM). Eventually, the Council of Constance (1414–1418) acted to heal this breach, but the survival of CONCILIARISM within the Church was the result and this movement continued to be a challenge to papal authority. The most extreme supporters of conciliar theory advocated the establishment of a permanent Church council at Rome, a move that would have, in effect, made the pope a constitutional monarch.

Despite such problems the papacy revived by the second half of the fifteenth century, and its prestige and authority were generally well respected by 1500. If the papal court was a worldly place, filled with pomp and luxury and tolerant of sexual immorality, most Western Christians knew little about these things. The pope, it is also true, was an important Italian prince, who warred and intrigued against other princes and powers in the peninsula. But for most Renaissance Europeans, it seemed natural that the papacy must enjoy its share of political power so that the Church might be safeguarded from the challenges of secular kings and princes.

Ecclesiastical hierarchy. It is not easy to generalize about the conditions of the episcopate on the eve of the Reformation. Sainly, reforming bishops existed alongside corrupt and worldly ones. In many places in Western Europe, admission to a cathedral chapter, the pool from which most bishops were selected, was restricted to those from verifiable noble lineages. In some places one had to demonstrate, not only the noble births of one's parents, but of grandparents and great-grandparents as well. In other places bishoprics were awarded to those who had served royal interests. In these circumstances the episcopacy's goals were often more aristocratic and worldly than spiritual. The households of bishops and cathedral chapters were also seen as a path to professional advancement by humanists and university-educated clergy. Bishoprics could be looked upon primarily as sources of income, and in the inflationary spiral of the later Middle Ages, it was sometimes necessary for churchmen to acquire several sees to support themselves. The Reformation itself may be said to have begun out of just these circumstances. The precipitating Indulgence Controversy of 1517 arose from the pluralism of ALBRECHT of Brandenburg. Upon his election to the Archbishopric of Mainz, Leo X allowed Albrecht to retain the Sees of Magdeburg and Halberstadt at a tax of 10,000 ducats above the pallium fee of 14,000 ducats for the See of Mainz. To reimburse the Fugger banking house, Leo X allowed him to retain half of the returns from the preaching of St. Peter's indulgence in his territory.

In the Holy Roman Empire and in Italy, in particular, many bishops were also temporal authorities as well. These figures, known as prince bishops, were consequently more often concerned with the political interests of their territories than they were with spiritual matters. Often deputies performed the religious functions of their offices. Since these territories were usually quite small, the machinery of state bureaucracy and defense exacted a heavy burden upon their peasant populations, who bore the lion's share of the cost of financing these states. Between 1475 and 1525 a number of peasant rebellions occurred in the Holy Roman Empire and some were protests against the governments of Germany's prince bishops.

Lower Clergy. Below the episcopal government were the members of the secular clergy, who served as parish priests, vicars, and chantrists. Although great differences existed in the living conditions and educational level of priests, the lower clergy was the clerical proletariat of the Church. Seminaries for the training of the clergy would not be created until the post-Tridentine era, and thus most priests learned their craft by apprenticing themselves to those whom already held clerical offices. Many understood relatively little about Church teachings and some priests were illiterate and had learned the Mass merely by rote. This situation was likely most pronounced among the chantrists, who were paid only to say masses for the dead. Since the GREGORIAN REFORM of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, the Western Church had redoubled its campaign against clerical marriage and clerical concubinage (the keeping of mistresses by priests). By the time of the Reformation the ban against clerical marriage had been generally established throughout Europe. The Church had experienced less success, though, in outlawing clerical concubinage, and it persisted unevenly throughout Europe. In some regions—England, the Netherlands, Northern France—the requirement of clerical celibacy seems to have been generally respected. In more remote and mountainous regions, however, many priests kept concubines. Diocesan governments often dispensed priests from their vows of celibacy through the imposition of an annual concubine tax. This casual attitude toward celibacy was a corruption of the standard set by the Gregorian Reform. But in those places where the custom of keeping concubines was widespread, the laity seems to have accepted the practice as the natural state of affairs, preferring priests who had a helpmate and sexual partner to those who were strictly celibate.

Many members of the lower clergy lived in poverty, the revenues of the benefice they held, if there was any benefice at all, went almost entirely to some person or corporation higher in the ecclesiastical power structure for which they were simply vicars. This numerous class of vicars and chantrists—some churches had many—lived on small benefices in exchange for which they were obliged to say Mass and the Office for particular intentions. Still others were unbeneficed and complaints about the sale of the sacraments from these quarters can be found. Many bishops expressed little interest in this category of the clergy and control was a matter of indifference.

Religious Communities. The same breadth of financial circumstances and religious observances as well as problems of oversight that have been noted among the secular clergy prevailed in religious communities. There were both exemplary and lax communities. In many cases monasteries and convents, having amassed rich endowments in previous centuries, admitted their novices primarily from the nobility, the urban patriciate, or the merchant class. Royal abbeys, and in the German Empire imperial foundations, controlled vast tracts of land and exercised temporal rule over thousands of peasants. In these cases conditions were sometimes similar to the territories of prince bishops. Reports of worldly behavior in monasteries and convents—dancing, gaming, and so forth—were common at the end of the Middle Ages. Still the monastic ideal of a life spent in ascetic self-denial was alive and well, too. Numerous “observant” reform movements developed in fifteenth-century Europe with many following a similar pattern of development. A charismatic founder convinced an existing order to take over a rundown or abandoned monastery that he and his followers then built into a model of strict observance of the order’s rule. In time, imitators reformed their houses along similar lines or invited advisers from the initial observant house to reform them. The most successful of these Observant movements occurred among the Augustinians, particularly among the group known as the Windesheim, Congregation, which grew out of the devotional movement known as the Brethren of the Common Life. Founded in 1387 in the Dutch town of Windesheim, the congregation established its control over more than 83 houses. In Germany a similar reform movement also occurred among the Augustinian Eremites, and eventually affected Martin Luther, who was a member of the Eremites’ houses at Erfurt and Wittenberg. It has long been debated whether the piety practiced by these Augustinian reform movements, the Modern Devotion (devotio moderna), influenced the later Reformation. Members of the Brethren of the Common Life wrote numerous devotional tracts that advocated intense self-examination and a life of prayer and Bible reading. Their writings influenced numerous humanists and later reformers, including Erasmus and Luther. In the main, though, the Modern Devotion was extremely traditional and demonstrates that monastic asceticism continued to have great appeal to those seeking to undertake a vocation at the end of the Middle Ages.

Influence of Humanism. The word HUMANISM, a nineteenth-century term derived from the Latin studia humanitatis or “humane studies,” was primarily an educational philosophy, rooted in the study of languages, rhetoric, moral philosophy, and history. While no humanist creed or manifesto existed, many of the generation of Northern Renaissance humanists who came to maturity around 1500 advocated the reform of the Church and biblical and patristic study, even as they criticized clerical corruption, scholastic theology, and popular superstition. These attacks were most widely broadcast through the work of the “Prince of Humanists” Erasmus, who, it was charged in the sixteenth century “laid the egg that Luther hatched.” Erasmus, like many other humanists of his generation, would not admit his relationship to the developing Reformation, but a number of his younger disciples were won over to its cause in the 1520s and 1530s. Many of these, including Philipp MELANCHTHON, Ulrich ZWINGLI, Martin BUCER, and John CALVIN, would come to play dynamic roles in the development of Protestantism. Differences of emphasis and theology continued to separate many humanists from evangelicals. While humanism was an elite and learned movement, for instance, Protestantism appealed to a mass audience. Despite these distinctions, it is difficult to imagine the Reformation’s success without the preparation that humanism provided in its criticisms of the Church or its turn to focus on the study of the Bible.

German Reformation

The Reformation in Germany began with Luther’s campaign against indulgences and would eventually result in the formation of a new evangelical church. Luther was once seen as the great formative personality in the creation of sixteenth-century Protestantism. More recently scholars have come to realize that, while Luther’s influence was important, he was only the first and most prominent of a vast number of evangelical reformers active upon the early sixteenth-century scene.

The Development of Luther’s Doctrine. Luther had entered the monastery of the Augustinian Eremites at Erfurt in 1505 and passed the next decade of his life wrestling with the central problem of his spiritual life: how he could find a merciful God and achieve assurance of his salvation. During this period his study turned, in particular, to the Epistles of St. Paul, particularly those to the Romans and Galatians. By 1516 Luther had emerged as one of Germany’s most brilliant biblical scholars, and now as a professor at the new University in Wittenberg in Saxony, he took on the task of academic reform. During 1516, Luther, a theologian trained in the scholastic traditions of nominalism, began to criticize scholastic theology publicly and to promote a new view of justification. Luther taught that good works did not make a man righteous, but that one who had been made righteous performed good works. While this was a radical departure from late-medieval orthodoxy, Luther’s teachings seem to have gone unnoticed, that is, until he criticized the selling of indulgences during the autumn of 1517. As a priest, Luther had learned of the methods that indulgence sellers were using in nearby territories, and on October 31 he wrote Albrecht of Brandenburg, the Archbishop of Mainz, to warn him that if the abuses did not stop, he would be forced to speak out against them. At the same time he prepared the 95 theses, a document intended to become the subject of an academic disputation. It remains an open question as to whether Luther posted these theses on the door of the castle church at Wittenberg, as legend has long suggested. Certainly, he circulated the theses privately, and although he had not intended to have them published, they soon appeared in unsanctioned editions printed in five cities throughout the empire. By the following spring reaction against the theses grew more intense, as Johannes TETZEL, Albrecht of Brandenburg's chief indulgence preacher, and other members of Germany's Dominicans lobbied Rome for Luther's condemnation. Leo X (1475–1521) responded by dispatching Cardinal CAJETAN (1469–1534) who attempted unsuccessfully to secure Luther's recantation. A staged disputation between Luther, Eck, and Karlstadt, held in June 1519, confirmed Luther's opponents and supporters in their positions, even as it extended Luther's notoriety throughout the empire.

Despite his problems with church authorities Luther remained actively engaged in his academic pursuits during 1520, publishing a number of defenses of his positions. Three of these, in particular, were widely circulated, and were to exercise a profound effect on the subsequent evangelical movement. The first, The Address to the Christian Nobility of the German Nation, advocated that the German nobility should take on the task of reforming the church in their territories. The second, The Babylonian Captivity of the Church, outlined a new theology of the sacraments, arguing that only baptism, communion and perhaps a reformulated penance could be said to have clear scriptural justification. And the third, The Freedom of a Christian, defended his teachings on justification, arguing that those who received faith through God's grace were simultaneously justified and sinful, and that their good works were the product, not the cause, of their justification. These treatises were widely circulated in the early 1520s and spread the Reformer's message far beyond Saxony. These works did not present a systematic theology. Luther's close associate, Philipp Melancthon, undertook the task of ordering Luther's ideas into a definitive statement for the evangelical cause, when in 1521 he published the Loci Communes, the Reformation's first systematic theology. By that date, Luther's denial of the infallibility of Church councils and his burning of the papal bull condemning his heresies had led to his formal excommunication, and he was summoned to an imperial diet at Worms to respond. In Worms, Luther still refused to recant and as a result, he was placed under the imperial ban. This ban would continue to plague Luther for the rest of his life since it limited his travel to Saxony and other neighboring friendly states within the empire. The ban thus prevented Luther from taking a direct role in the many discussions that would aim to heal the breach between evangelicals and Catholics during the coming decades. Luther had been prudent, however, to request a safe conduct to attend the imperial diet, and as he left Worms, he was kidnapped as part of a plan hatched by his protector the Saxon Elector Frederick the Wise. He was spirited away to the Wartburg castle near Eisenach, and there for the next two years he devoted himself primarily to completing a German translation of the Bible.

Diffusion of Evangelical Ideas. The extraordinary events of the years 1517–1521 had transformed a scholastic dispute into an international controversy that resonated far beyond the confines of the academy. At the same time a number of preachers and reformers had appeared who promoted doctrines that were either similar to Luther's or more radical in their implications. This rapid diffusion and multiplication of religious positions made the Reformation difficult to suppress. To the south, Ulrich Zwingli had begun a reform of Zürich's church establishment as early as 1518. By 1522 and 1523, radical reformers like Andreas Karlstadt and Thomas Müntzer came to promote ideas more extreme than either Zwingli's or Luther's. The appearance of ANABAPTISM further clouded the religious landscape. In Germany's semi-autonomous imperial cities the evangelical message spread quickly during the 1520s and 1530s. In the cities of Southern Germany many local reformers emerged, or towns bowed to popular pressure for reform and appealed to Wittenberg or to Zürich for advisors to aid them in their efforts. Nuremberg, Strassburg, and somewhat later Augsburg emerged as the first leaders of this urban evangelicalism, but within the first two decades of the Reformation, upwards of two thirds of the empire's 65 imperial cities initiated reforms of their church establishments. Although their populations were a tiny fraction of the empire's total population, Germany's imperial cities were far more important than mere size would indicate. These towns were one of the backbones of the Holy Roman Empire, providing CHARLES V (1500–1558, ruled 1519–1556) with his major source of revenue for administering his government. Further, these imperial cities were important arenas for debate, centers of commerce, trade, and learning, and markets for agricultural goods. Since 1499, the Empire had been engaged in conflicts with a confederation of its Swiss cantons that had declared their independence in 1495. The fear of appearing disloyal to the emperor helps to explain the essentially conservative nature of many urban reforms during the 1520s and 1530s. While some town's initially turned toward the Zürich reformer Zwingli, most eventually came to favor Luther's more conservative approach. In addition, most town councils modulated their response to growing popular demands for reform, allowing just enough evangelical teaching and innovation to satisfy their populations. This initial stage of the Reformation in the cities aimed to translate the liturgy into the vernacular, reform the sacraments, establish “biblical” preaching, and abolish monastic institutions.

The unfolding events of the 1520s fed the ruling class’s fears of rebellion. Already in 1523, several hundred members of Germany’s imperial knights, a servile order of nobility, had taken up Luther’s charge to reform the Church and initiated a series of raids against several prince bishops. The revolt was soon suppressed, but not without the destruction of more than twenty noble castles. One year later, an outbreak of rural rebellion began in the southwest along the upper Rhine, and quickly spread into the central and southern empire. This “Peasants’ War” came to attract supporters beyond the rural peasantry as Anabaptists and other radicals as well as members of the urban proletariat joined the movement. In March 1525, representatives of the rebellion met in Memmingen and adopted the “Twelve Articles” as their manifesto, and thousands of copies of the document circulated in more than 25 editions printed during the coming months.

In April 1525 Luther responded to the rebellion by publishing his Admonition to Peace, a document that indicted both the nobility for their oppression and the peasantry for their rebellion. As the violence increased, however, Luther reissued the Admonition in June 1525 with a new addendum titled Against the Robbing and Murderous Hordes of the Peasantry. Now Luther advised the peasant movement’s swift and decisive repression. The Reformer’s response, unpopular among many of his supporters including Melanchthon, was to produce a measure of disaffection from the evangelical cause in the German countryside during the coming years.

The Magisterial Reformation. In Germany’s imperial cities the reforming impulse had usually come from the populace writ large, not from the ruling class, and town councils adapted themselves gradually to the demands for Church reform. In the empire’s territorial states, greater distance separated rulers from their people, and princes, fearing reprisals from the empire, were even slower to adopt reform measures. Still in the 1520s the Reformation did make inroads into the important territories of East Prussia, Brandenburg-Ansbach, Electoral Saxony, and Hesse. By 1546, 23 territories had adopted reformed Church ordinances, an impressive number, but still only ten percent of the secular states within the empire. As Luther’s homeland, Saxony continued to take the lead in fashioning the reforming methods many territorial states came to use. Saxon universities at Wittenberg and somewhat later at Jena became important seminaries for the training of Lutheran pastors. In the years following the Peasants’ War, a more authoritarian pattern of reform emerged. In 1527, the Elector Johann the Constant of Saxony introduced the Reformation in his territory by imitating a practice of the medieval Church, the Visitation. Philipp Melanchthon provided the instructions that the state’s Visitors were to use in examining ministers and laity, and a complete inventory of religious practices and beliefs was made in the countryside. The results of this first Saxon Visitation pointed up the low level of religious knowledge, even indifference that existed in the territory, and a scheme for mandatory primary education and catechizing of youth was the eventual result. It remains an open question as to how effective education was as a vehicle for indoctrinating youth in evangelical principles. Lutheran educational schemes, with their heavy emphasis on the rote memorization of catechetical formulas, seem to have been widely unpopular among the populace. Still such measures were to be imitated by the major Protestant and Catholic reform movements of the sixteenth century. The remaining hallmarks of this territorial reformation included the obligatory adoption of Luther’s reformed and translated liturgy and the suppression of the territory’s monasteries and convents, sometimes over the vigorous protests of their religious. In the cities the abolition of benefices and monastic foundations had often been used to establish community chests for social welfare. But in the territories, these resources usually flowed into princes’ coffers. In this and other ways the adoption of the Reformation allowed sixteenth-century princes, who were increasingly jealous of their prerogatives, to establish greater fiscal and political control over their territories. The sixteenth-century Reformations did produce princes who seem to have motivated primarily by these political considerations. It would be a mistake, though, to stress mere political advantage as most rulers’ sole motivation. Most expressed sincere religious convictions while acting on political opportunities.

In addition, politics both hindered and permitted the spread of evangelical teaching within the empire’s territorial states. In the 1520s, the Holy Roman Empire’s religious issues were never more than secondary to Charles V, who was distracted by problems throughout his numerous possessions. These included sporadic revolts from his Spanish and Netherlandish subjects, wars in Italy waged against the French and the papacy, and the threat of the Turks in Eastern Europe. Charles V’s absence from Germany allowed the formation of leagues among the empire’s princes. Under the Emperor’s brother, Archduke Ferdinand of Austria, Catholic princes organized themselves into one such league during the summer of 1524, while a Lutheran alliance followed in 1526. In 1526, both leagues converged to lobby the imperial diet at Speyer. The result was a decree that, while prohibiting religious innovation, left the enforcement of the Diet of Worms's prohibition of 1521 against the spread of Luther's teachings up to the individual consciences of Germany's princes. The religious issue was to be postponed until a national or general council could address it. The Diet of Speyer in 1529 changed these provisions by annulling the earlier decree and prohibiting further innovations. In Lutheran principalities, the Catholic clergy were to retain their rights and incomes, and Catholic worship was to be allowed. Against this measure seven princes and 14 imperial cities protested on April 19, 1529, and thereafter they became known as "Protestants." In the coming decades politics continued to cloud efforts at reconciliation.

Failure of Religious Reconciliation. An attempt was made to heal the religious division at the Diet of Augsburg (1530) presided over by Emperor Charles V. Melancthon prepared an irenic statement of Lutheran doctrine, the Confession of AUGSBURG, which was approved by Luther and signed by seven Protestant princes and two cities. Four southern German cities in opposition produced the Confessio Tetrapolitana, a document influenced by the spiritual and symbolic eucharistic doctrines of Zwingli. Despite earnest negotiations, the attempt at reconciliation failed. The Protestants were called upon to accept the final decree of the Diet, which if enforced would have restored Catholicism. Instead the Protestants in 1531 formed the SCHMALKALDIC LEAGUE, an alliance of seven princes and 11 cities. The Emperor, preoccupied by the Turkish threat, was forced to grant them immunity and toleration until the Peace of Frankfurt of 1532. During the coming nine years, the Emperor was again absent from Germany and the Lutheran cause strengthened through reformations enacted in the territories of Württemberg, Pomerania, Dessau, the Duchy of Saxony (Albertine Saxony), the Electorate of Brandenburg and many more cities. Under the aegis of the Emperor, theological conversations continued at the Colloquies of Regensburg in 1541 and 1546, but without success. The atmosphere of mistrust and bad faith had grown through two decades of bitter polemic, now hindering doctrinal agreement and leading eventually to the Schmalkaldic War (1546–47). But politics also came to aid Charles V in his attempts to suppress the Protestant league, since he was able to secure the support of the evangelical Duke Moritz of Albertine Saxony. Maurice abandoned the Schmalkaldic League in support of Catholicism after he secured a promise from Charles V that he might succeed to control neighboring Electoral Saxony. In 1547 Charles V won a decisive victory against Protestant forces at Mühlberg. The Schmalkaldic League was dissolved, and Charles V was briefly master of the religious situation. He attempted to settle at least provisionally the differences between Protestants and Catholics with a compromise, the Interim of Augsburg of 1548 (see INTERIMS). The Interim's moderate Catholic reform position, however, pleased neither Protestants nor Catholics. His erstwhile ally, Moritz of Saxony, having secured the position of an imperial elector through his previous political maneuvers, now defected again and joined forces with a small band of Protestant princes. In March 1552, the brief Prince's War they staged against the Hapsburg's led to the abandonment of the policies of the Interim. The religious issues were to be resolved through a compromise formulated at the next imperial diet, held at Augsburg in 1555. Through the Peace of AUGSBURG Lutheranism achieved legal recognition, and the princes were allowed to determine the religion of their territories. Lutheranism's growth was to be tolerated within the imperial cities, although the towns were expected to tolerate Catholic worship within their walls as well. No other religious group (e.g. Calvinism) was recognized. A further important provision, the "ecclesiastical reservation," specified that any bishop or abbot who adopted the Augsburg Confession would be required to surrender his territory.

Lutheranism outside Germany. Lutheranism was not to remain a reformation force only within the boundaries of Germany. It spread throughout Northern Europe easily, and even in places where it did not become the dominant reformation settlement, it influenced later reform movements.

France. The importance of the diffusion of Lutheranism in France is not to be found in the persistence of any Lutheran group but rather in the preparation that Lutheran ideas laid for the acceptance of the Reformed Churches of Calvin. Lutheranism spread through the printed writings of Luther, Melancthon, and their followers, and by means of French students who went to Wittenberg, and German and Swiss students who came to the university of Paris. It met opposition, but repression was intermittent due to political reasons and the reluctance of Francis I to stigmatize indiscriminately as heretics all those with reformist ideas. For even before the Reformation, an orthodox reform group (the Circle of Meaux) had appeared with the desire of purifying the Church in France, though some of its members later joined the Reformation. Many other intellectuals imbued with Erasmian ideals were eager for reform. Before the arrival of Calvin, the lines between orthodox and heterodox were not clearly drawn despite condemnations of Lutheranism by the University of Paris.

Netherlands. The Lutheran Reformation also attracted disciples in the Low Countries, especially in urban centers such as Antwerp. It had to compete early on with SACRAMENTARIANISM and anabaptism; eventually the growth of Calvinism supplanted all these movements (see REFORMED CHURCHES; NETHERLANDS REFORMED CHURCH).

Italy. In Italy, the situation was different. Calvinism was less congenial to the Italians than the very moderate form of Lutheranism that began to circulate in many cities, for example, Venice and above all Naples, where a reforming circle gathered around the Spanish humanist Juan de VALDÉS. As in the case of the Circle of Meaux, certain members of this group became Protestants. There were also a number of spectacular conversions of notable Italian clerics to Protestantism: Bernardino OCHINO, Pier Paolo VERGERIO, and Peter Martyr Vermigli, but each of these figures eventually left Italy and thus did not develop a widespread following. After Trent through the agency of the Inquisition, Lutheranism disappeared in Italy. As in Spain, the Inquisition succeeded in preventing almost completely the infiltration of Protestantism.

Scandinavia. In Scandinavia, the state furthered progress of the Reformation. A priest, Olaus PETRI, who had studied at Wittenberg, and who had married a few months before Luther, openly preached Lutheran doctrine in Sweden. King Gustavus I Vasa, who was ultimately responsible for the official acceptance of Lutheranism in his kingdom, approved both his teaching and his marriage. The Riksdag of Västerås in 1527 broke the ties of the Swedish Church with Rome. The moderate Synod of Oerebro in 1529 laid the foundations for the Swedish form of Lutheranism. In 1535 Laurentius Petri, brother of Olaus and an ardent Lutheran, became archbishop of Uppsala; he can justly be called the reformer of Sweden. There was Catholic resistance, even beyond the Riskdag of Västerås in 1544, which had proclaimed the kingdom evangelical, but gradually the entire country adopted a conservative Lutheranism.

The Reformation was likewise introduced into Denmark and established by the agency of the crown. King Christian II, who was deposed in 1523, had encouraged the propagation of Lutheran doctrine. His successor, Frederick I, made Hans TAUSEN, a Wittenberg-trained Lutheran, his personal chaplain. Tausen, “the Danish Luther,” became the leading exponent of the new doctrine in Denmark. The Diet of Odense in 1527 gave protection and recognition to both Catholics and Lutherans, but with the King favoring Lutheranism and the nobles acquiring ecclesiastical properties, the Reformation made rapid progress. The final triumph of Protestantism came following a three-year civil war that began at the death of Frederick I in 1533. Christian III, who became king in 1536, called Luther’s friend Johann BUGHENHAGEN to organize the Danish Church. Though only a priest himself, Bugenhagen undertook to consecrate seven other priests as the new Church’s superintendents. Thus in contrast to the Swedish Church, the episcopacy did not prevail in Denmark, as it had not in Protestant Germany either. The King himself became the head of the Danish Church in a manner similar to the Anglican reforms being worked out in England at roughly the same time. Through the Danish conquest of Norway, the Lutheran Reformation was imported there along the same lines. In Iceland also, once a colony of Denmark, Lutheranism was successfully introduced despite resistance.

Finland, which was under the rule of Sweden, gradually became completely Lutheran. The Lutheran Reformation had penetrated early into the other Baltic states, especially in those cities where there were German-speaking populations. Estonia, Livonia, and Kurland also witnessed forms of Lutheran Reformation. After the collapse of the authority of the Order of the Teutonic Knights in the region, these countries came under the control of Sweden, Denmark, and Poland respectively and their Lutheran Church ordinances were safeguarded.

Elsewhere in Eastern Europe it was not monarchs who introduced Lutheranism, but rather German-speaking burghers. Some members of the nobility in Poland, Lithuania, Bohemia, and Hungary were attracted to Lutheranism, but eventually Calvinism was to attract considerably more adherents in these countries.

The Development of Reformed Christianity

The Reformation in Switzerland and parts of Southern Germany came to develop different theological and political teachings and thus it constitutes a separate chapter in the history of the continental Reformation. The Zwinglian reform and the Calvinist, which virtually supplanted it, belong to that branch of Protestantism customarily called “Reformed,” in contrast to the Lutheran or Evangelical and to the forms of Radical Protestantism.

Zwingli and the Reform at Zürich. While Ulrich Zwingli was theologically indebted to Luther in some respects, he was an independent thinker very much influenced by humanism and the ideas of Erasmus as well. His assessments of the effects of original sin were less pessimistic than Luther’s; he was less tolerant of the medieval Church’s liturgy and ceremonialism. Zwingli’s ideas about the relationship between Church and state tended towards the theocratic. His insistence upon the mere symbolic presence of Christ in the Eucharist could not be resolved with Luther’s retention of the doctrine of the real presence, and the two eventually parted company. (See EUCHARIST.)

Growth of Zwinglianism. Due to the success of the Reformation in Zürich and to the widespread desire of Swiss burghers to be free of episcopal control, Zwinglianism expanded swiftly through the German-speaking cantons of Basel, Berne, and St. Gall, as well as elsewhere. The forest cantons resisted, and were eventually successful in retaining Catholicism, but in 1531 Zwingli was killed on the battlefield during one of these conflicts. The leadership of the church in Zürich passed to Heinrich BULLINGER, who eventually prevailed in establishing the eucharistic doctrine of Calvin throughout the Zwinglian churches of Switzerland. They retained only the Church organization that Zwingli had instituted.

Bucer and Strasbourg. The Confessio Tetrapolitana, presented by the four cities of Strassburg, Constance, Memmingen and Lindau to the Diet of Augsburg in 1530, had been written by Martin BUCER, the leading reformer of Strassburg. Bucer was in general agreement with many of the puritanical features of Zwinglianism and he came to exercise an influence, not only upon his city Strassburg, but upon the ideas of John Calvin too. The Archbishop of Canterbury Thomas CRANMER called him to England in 1549 and in the two years before his death, Bucer helped shape the course of the English Reformation, first by serving as a theological adviser and later as Regius Professor at Cambridge. Both Bucer's and Zwingli's reform programs contributed importantly to the religious life of Southern German and Swiss cities, too. In time, however, their influence was to be overshadowed by the development of the Lutheran Confession in Germany and the advent of Calvinism in Switzerland.

Calvin's Theology

Calvin accepted and codified the theology of Luther, but with a number of shifts in emphases. Calvin embraced the idea of the sinner's sanctification following justification, something that Luther sometimes denied and always tended to downplay. He also rejected Luther's notion of consubstantiation, that is, that the elements of communion were accompanied "with" the physical body and blood of Christ. Calvin came to an imaginative fusion of both Lutheran and Zwinglian ideas concerning the Eucharist. He rejected Zwingli's purely symbolic teachings concerning communion, but agreed that the body of Christ was not made physically present in communion. At the same time Calvin upheld Luther's notion of a real presence, insisting that after the reception of the sacrament, Christ's spiritual presence came to suffuse the believer. While Luther, Zwingli and Calvin all stressed the majesty of God, Calvin's theology came to accentuate the remoteness of the Creator from His creatures. And while both Luther and Calvin stressed the principle of sola scriptura (scripture alone), Luther had been tolerant of customs and traditions that did not expressly violate divine law. Calvin, on the other hand, argued for a more thorough reformation and purification of the Church based upon scriptural warranty for all Church practices. Thus God's law, as well as a rigorous organization of the Christian community, assumes a prominence in Calvin's theology.

The Institutes. In contrast to Luther whose literary output was prodigious, Calvin was a systematic theologian, and the essence of his doctrine can be gleaned from a single book, the Institutes of the Christian Religion. From the first Latin and French editions in six chapters (1536), through successive Latin and French editions constantly augmented, the work became by its last edition in Calvin's lifetime (1564) an ingenious summa of Protestantism that comprised four books and 80 chapters. Translated into a number of other languages, it had an incomparable role in the diffusion of Calvinism. (See INSTITUTES OF CALVIN.)

Calvinism in France. Calvinism gradually replaced Zwinglianism in the Protestant regions of Switzerland. Similarly in France, it tended to supplant Lutheran influences, which had prepared the way for it. The first national synod of the Reformed Church was held in Paris in 1559. Intermittent periods of toleration had permitted Calvinism to grow into a sizable minority. The Wars of Religion (1562–98) in France were of unparalleled ferocity, but eventually gave way to a compromise position. Through the Edict of NANTES (1598), Calvinists were granted a limited degree of religious toleration and civil equality. During the course of the next century these rights were gradually restricted until Louis XIV revoked the Edict in 1685. Under severe harassment, most French Calvinists emigrated or converted to Catholicism. A small minority managed to survive, though, and they were eventually granted religious freedom during the French Revolution.

The Low Countries. Calvinism also replaced Lutheranism as an influence in the northern provinces of the Low Countries. Calvinist Church organization did not rely upon the aid of princes, and thus its institutions penetrated into the Dutch cities quite readily. Calvinism came to play a role in the northern provinces' rebellion against Spanish authority, and once independent, the provinces became the strongest Reformed Protestant power on the continent.

Germany & Eastern Europe. In Germany, Calvinism made inroads in the Electoral Palatinate in 1562 and in several smaller territories thereafter. The presence of Calvinism within the empire provoked bitter controversy and elicited polemical attacks from Lutheran theologians and preachers. By the end of the sixteenth century, Calvinism had won converts in some princely families and even among the Lutheran Confession's theologians and pastors. Calvinism, though, would not be legally recognized until the ratification of the Peace of WESTPHALIA in 1648. In Eastern Europe, the Reformed religion often replaced Lutheranism. In Hungary and Bohemia especially, Calvinists were to develop into strong minorities.

The Radical Reformation. Calvinism, less conservative than Lutheranism in advocating religious change, was itself conservative when compared to the program of the Radical Reformation. Under this term are included many widely scattered and differing groups such as the Zwickau Prophets of Thomas Müntzer (1489–1525), the Swiss Brethren of Balthasar HUBMAIER (1485?–1528), the Jorists of David JORIS (1500–56), the Familists of Hendrick NICLAES (1502–80), the Hutterite Brethren of Jakob Hutter (d. 1536), the Melchiorites of Melchior HOFFMAN (1500–43), and the Mennonites of Menno Simons (d. 1561). This list, however, comprises only a small fraction of the many Radical Reformation sects active in sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Europe. Despite variant doctrines most agreed in their common commitment to the doctrine of “Scripture alone,” and their acceptance of the necessity of resting worldly influences. Most pursued the ideal of a “gathered” Christian community, and most were passive, if not always pacifist. Their refusal to submit to oaths and vows was usually interpreted as a sign of political resistance, and Protestants and Catholics consequently persecuted them alike. Social and economic grievances played a role in the formation of many of these sects, but the leadership of the Radical Reformation included devout humanists, pious biblical Christians, and rationalists, as well as some fanatical extremists.

Three main groups stand out in the history of the Radical Reformation: Spiritualists, Anabaptists, and Rationalists. The first group tended to repudiate the real presence, the efficacy of infant baptism, and outward ceremonies and rites. The second and most important group was derisively called Rebaptizers or Anabaptists. They held that infant baptism was unscriptural, and differed from the Spiritualists mainly in the degree to which they insisted on the rebaptism of adult Christians. The cities of Zürich, Nuremberg, Augsburg, and Strassburg, as well as the Low Countries and Moravia were early centers of their activity. An attempt to set up a millennial New Jerusalem at Münster in Westphalia in 1534–35 led to their brutal repression. There, Bernhardt Rothmann, chaplain of St. Mauritz Church near the city, and Bernhardt Knipperdollink, a prosperous cloth merchant from within the town walls, were won over to Anabaptism. By February 1534 Knipperdollink had been elected Münster’s burgermeister and Anabaptism was made the city’s official religion. Jan Mattyssoon, a former baker from Haarlem, and his disciple, Jan Bokelszoon, a Dutch tailor known as John of Leyden, joined Knipperdollink’s reform program. Their dream of a Christian commonwealth with equality of goods shared in common soon proved untenable. The city’s bishop, Franz von Waldeck, laid siege to the town, recapturing it on June 24, 1535. The final group of radical reformers, the Rationalists, attracted the fewest adherents and was bitterly persecuted. They denied the divinity of Christ, and included the Spaniard Michael SERVETUS, and the Socinians in Poland (see SOCINIANISM).

Consequences of the Reformation

The force of the Reformation was felt in all spheres of society and extended far beyond the geographical boundaries of Europe.

Geographic Divisions. In the resultant religious division of Europe into Catholic, Lutheran, and Reformed, Catholicism’s greatest strength was now to be concentrated in the Latin countries. Significant pockets of Catholic strength persisted in Ireland, Poland, Hungary, and parts of German-speaking Europe. But by the seventeenth century the character of Catholicism was beginning to change because of the dominance of the Mediterranean countries in the life and government of the Church. In addition, the fracture of Europe into three (and if one includes Anglicanism, four) combative religious confessions ended the medieval reality of a united Western Christendom.

Confessional Disputes. The Reformation and subsequent Counter Reformation often bred bitter hatred both within and between the confessions. For more than thirty years after his death, doctrinal infighting ensued between the German theologians who followed Luther. By 1580, the Lutheran Churches throughout the Holy Roman Empire adopted the Formula of CONCORD, Lutheranism’s last great creedal statement. The Reformed churches in Europe generally formulated their confessional statements for communities within their national boundaries, such as the Confessio Czengerina of 1557–58 for Hungary, the Confessio Gallicana of 1559, the Confessio Belgica of 1561, and others (see CONFESSIONS OF FAITH, PROTESTANT). CALVINISM, too, experienced its own internal rivalries and stresses throughout the later sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

As a result of the Reformation, Catholicism weathered a period of theological confusion, a confusion that was in large part resolved by the Council of TRENT (1545–1563). Trent’s decrees did not designate the Protestant reformers by name, hoping to leave open the door for future discussions, but the Council nevertheless condemned Protestant teaching. It helped as well to establish a body of doctrine that would give unity and stability to modern Catholic theology. And its impact on modern Catholic Church government and organization was immeasurable.

Sacramental De-emphasis and Individualism. In many parts of Europe official state forms of Protestantism retained much of their medieval inheritance. In Lutheranism and Anglicanism, in particular, the fabric of medieval ritual and ceremonial continued to live on until the modern period. Yet the Protestant religions of the sixteenth century had also won many adherents through their emphasis on the gospel, the scriptures, and a personal faith as well as their de-emphasis of the sacraments and priestly orders. These were radical departures from the traditions of the Church, and they have been seen as helping to destroy the strongly communal religious experience of late-medieval religion. Certainly, in both the evangelical and Reformed traditions, human salvation was now seen as something that was accomplished individually, worked out “with fear and trembling” between the sinner and God.

Similarities of the Post-Reformation Churches. Scholars of the sixteenth-century Reformations and Counter Reformation have recently realized the many essential political and social similarities that existed among the post-Reformation churches. Through a process of confessionalization Europe came to be carved up into mutually exclusive and competing religions in which states heightened their efforts to control religious beliefs and practices. This enhanced authority of the state over religious life was a reality in both Catholic and Protestant countries. Most states moved to enforce printed confessions and Church ordinances as the standard of orthodoxy. Those who deviated from these norms were often bitterly persecuted. At the same time religious heterodoxy grew in most of Europe during the seventeenth century, pointing up the ultimate failure of state-directed religious policies. Rising literacy rates and improving educational systems meant that more and more people could examine the scriptures and Christian texts on their own. In addition, a growing skeptical climate toward the end of the seventeenth and the beginning of the eighteenth centuries, aided in part by the rise of modern scientific mentalities, was to make it increasingly difficult for the state to enforce a single set of beliefs. Religious heterodoxy increased in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries; at the same time the process of confessionalization had helped to create enduring religious identities and divisions among Europeans, as certain rituals, symbols and beliefs came to be identified with a particular confession’s most firmly held convictions. Calvinism, with its emphasis on biblical law, became identified as a religion of the book whose adherents practiced the most spare and severe style of worship; early-modern Catholicism, on the other hand, emerged in the minds of non-Catholics as a religion of ritual, the sacraments, and the saints.

Movement toward Ecumenism. This identification of religious teachings with cultural identities helped to sustain bitter rivalries between Protestants and Catholics into the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, long after most Westerners had lost a precise knowledge of the Reformation and Counter Reformation’s intricate theological controversies. At the same time, however, Protestant ecumenism emerged as a movement that tried to heal the divisions that existed among its various religious traditions, a movement that would result in the formation of the World Council of Churches in 1948. During the pontificates of Pius XII, John XXIII, Paul VI, and John Paul II, the Catholic Church has again entered into these discussions, although a unified Christendom continues to be more a desire than reality.

Bibliography: P. BLICKLE, The Revolution of 1525, T. A. BRADY and H. C. E. MIDELFORT, ed. and trans. (2nd ed., Baltimore, 1985). J. BOSSY, Christianity in the West 1400–1700 (Oxford, 1985). T. A. BRADY, Turning Swiss (Cambridge, 1985). E. CAMERON, The European Reformation (Oxford, 1991). B. MOELLER, Imperial Cities and the Reformation, H. C. E. MIDELFORT and M. U. EDWARDS, trans. (Philadelphia, 1972). H. OBERMAN, Luther: Man Between God and the Devil (New Haven, 1989). S. OZMENT, The Reformation in the Cities (New Haven, 1975). G. STRAUSS, Luther’s House of Learning (Baltimore, 1978). T. TENTLER, Sin and Confession on the Eve of the Reformation (Princeton, 1978).

[P. SOERGEL/W. S. BARRON, JR.]

REFORMED CHURCHES

Part I: Europe

The term “Reformed Churches” designates those churches that in the early development of Protestantism adopted the tenets and ecclesiastical organization of Huldrych ZWINGLI, Martin BUCER, Heinrich BULLINGER, and John CALVIN. Because Calvin’s doctrinal principles ultimately became dominant, the Calvinist Church is identified with the Reformed Church, although Calvin was not the first but a subsequent influence in its growth. The presbyteral type of church government characteristic of the Reformed Churches affected the progress of Protestantism also in Great Britain and America, so that PRESBYTERIANISM traces its origins to these reformers, although it has developed its own distinctive marks. Originally the word “reformed” was used indiscriminately by all the established churches having common cause against Rome, including Lutherans; but the disputes over Christ’s presence in the elements of the Last Supper, which grew grave in 1529, separated the Lutherans from the Reformed. The Reformed movement began in Switzerland and spread rapidly to Germany, the Netherlands, England, Wales, Scotland, Hungary, Poland, and America.

Switzerland. The Evangelical program of Huldrych Zwingli was already active in Zurich in 1516, thereby antedating that of Martin Luther. Switzerland offered advantages to the reformers because of its political structure, in which all affairs including religious policy were determined by a group elected to govern within each federated canton. Thus success could be facilitated by gaining control of the Council and the votes of the community. This Zwingli achieved through public religious debates with the Catholic clergy preceding elections. Beginning with 1523, Zurich and then Basel voted for the new religion. Bern made the change in 1528 and was followed by other cantons. Calvin, who had his own church firmly established at Geneva by 1536, met with Guillaume Farel and Bullinger in Zurich in 1549. There they formulated the Zurich Consensus concerning the Real Presence, so that by 1580 Zwinglianism and Calvinism became the Reformed Church. This assured the predominance of French Protestantism in the Swiss cantons until the Enlightenment of the 18th century, when German influence grew stronger. In 1920 the Federation of Swiss Evangelical Churches was organized with membership from all 22 cantons. This union with its many commissions and groups such as the Junge Kirche and the Heimstätte allowed the penetration of Evangelical Christianity into all aspects of society.

Germany. The Reformed movement in Germany made its start in the Rhineland, specifically in Strassburg, through the preaching of the Zwinglian Evangelist, Matäus Zell. Its growth there began in 1521 and extended to 1549, when the INTERIM of CHARLES V restored Roman Catholicism. Catholicism continued to dominate through the devastation of the THIRTY YEARS' WAR (1618–48) and the francophile episcopates of Charles Egon and Wilhelm Egon von FURSTENBERG. When Protestantism returned to Strassburg it was in a Lutheran form. From 1521 to 1549, however, Swiss Reformed theology flourished at Strassburg under the protection of Elector Frederick III of the Palatinate. From Heidelberg University issued the HEIDELBERG CATECHISM of 1563, which became the standard creedal expression for all Reformed Churches. From Strassburg as the center, the movement spread along the cities of the Rhine and into the rest of Germany. It suffered reverses during the religious wars but gained explicit recognition at the Peace of WESTPHALIA in 1648, when Switzerland was also accorded independence from the Empire. The large emigration brought on by Louis XIV's revocation of the Edict of NANTES in 1685 also swelled the number of Reformed in Germany, though they never became a serious threat to the influence of Lutheranism on German Protestantism, especially not in the periods of Pietism and the Enlightenment. In the late 19th century and early 20th century, the German Reformed Churches experienced a revival of interest in social works and missionary activity, though they suffered a decline during World War II. Today much of the territory in which they were strongest lies in the eastern part of Germany.

The Netherlands. The Reformed Church came to the Netherlands in about 1560 and gained popularity because of its appeal to the rising middle class and its sympathy with William of Orange in his struggle against the Hapsburgs for home rule. In 1584 when the war for independence was won, Reformed theology was accepted and defended in the Remonstrance by Bisschop, a disciple of ARMINIUS, at the Synod of Dort (see CONFESSIONS OF FAITH, PROTESTANT). Disagreement with its standard of doctrine has brought schisms, so that by the 19th century many Reformed theologians and pastors had departed from the Synod of Dort and regarded Christianity principally as a code of morality. The Netherlands Reformed Church (De Nederlandse Hervormde Kerk) is the oldest and most traditional group today and is generally considered the national church, although there are two influential secessionist branches, the Christian Reformed Church (De Christelijke Gereformeerde Kerken) and the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (De Gereformeerde Kerken in Nederland). In 1944 one-quarter of the congregations and one-third of the clergy of the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands split and formed the Reformed Adhering to Article 31 of the Church Order of Dort (De Gereformeerde Kerkonderhovdende Art. 31 k.o.). (See NETHERLANDS REFORMED CHURCH.)

France. The Reformed Church appeared in France in 1555 and held its first synod in 1559. The impetus came from Geneva, where Calvin, Farel, and Theodore BEZA eyed their homeland as a mission field, sending evangelists to France by the hundreds. The French Reformed Church, whose members were called HUGUENOTS, adopted Calvinism as a basic body of dogmas, but freely altered it. Their history was troubled during the Wars of Religion (1562–94), until Henry IV granted religious tolerance by the Edict of Nantes (1598). Upon the revocation of the Edict (1685), they were forced underground or emigrated. They regained their rights after the Revolution of 1789. France's recovery of Alsace-Lorraine after World War I augmented the number of Reformed, as well as Lutherans within her borders, and furthered the need for strong and unified organization. In 1905 the Reformed Church separated into the orthodox and conservative Église Réformée Évangélique and the Églises Réformées Unies, which were liberal. Mediation between these branches has been attempted. In 1939 a union of Reformed, Methodist, and several Free Churches made up the Églises Reformées de France.

Hungary. After the Battle of Mohács in 1526 and the death of King Louis II in the same year, Hungary became the scene of contest over the succession between Ferdinand of Hapsburg, brother of Charles V, and John Zápolya. In the warfare that followed, Transylvania turned to Calvinism, and by 1563 the Hungarian Reformed Church accepted the Calvinistic Confession, the Heidelberg Catechism, and elements of Puritan belief brought back by ministers studying in England. At the end of the 16th century Hungary was 90 percent Protestant. Through Hapsburg political pressure and the work of the Jesuits, the influence of the Reformed Church was lessened, so that by the 19th century the Reformed numbered less than one-fifth of the population. The Treaty of Trianon on June 4, 1920, further diminished their membership by the transfer of territory to Czechoslovakia, Rumania, and Yugoslavia.

Poland. The Reformation entered Poland in 1518 when James Knade, a monk who renounced his vows, preached Lutheranism. In 1540 Calvinism appeared and caused a breach among Catholic clergy. James Ucháński, Archbishop and Primate of Poland, advised that a national church be established. By 1573 the Reformation had spent its force and through the activity of the Jesuits, the Reformed Church movement diminished.

Other Countries. In Scotland the Reformed faith, known as Presbyterianism, was established by John KNOX in 1560, and 30 years later was recognized as the official religion of Scotland (see SCOTLAND, CHURCH OF). It began its spread also in the Union of South Africa in 1562 and became officially adopted in 1859 as the Reformed Church of South Africa. It is found in Wales and England, Northern Ireland (see IRELAND, CHURCH OF), the republics of former Yugoslavia, the Czech and Slovak republics, Romania, Ukraine, throughout Africa, Oceania, Asia, and the Americas (see REFORMED CHURCHES IN NORTH AMERICA).

Bibliography: J. DILLENBERGER and C. WELCH, Protestant Christianity Interpreted through Its Development (New York 1958). H. J. GRIMM, The Reformation Era, 1500–1650 (New York 1954). K. S. LATOURETTE, Christianity in a Revolutionary Age: A History of Christianity in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries, 5 v. (New York 1958–62) v.2, 4. H. G. HAGEMAN, Pulpit and Table (Richmond, Va. 1962); “Reformed Worship: Yesterday and Today,” Theology Today 18 (1961) 30–40. D. SINOR, History of Hungary (New York 1959) 184–187. I. RÉVÉSZ, History of the Hungarian Reformed Church, tr. G. A. F. KNIGHT (Washington 1956). Cambridge History of Poland, ed. W. F. REDDAWAY et al., 2 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1941–50).

[J. A. LEAHY/EDS.]

Part II: North America

Reformed Churches are descendants of the church of John Calvin, and therefore collateral relations of the Presbyterian bodies in Europe and America. But whereas Presbyterianism is mainly an Anglo-Saxon development through the Scot John Knox, the Reformed groups derive from Calvin directly. Their immediate ancestors are the Calvinists in France, Switzerland, and the Low Countries (see CALVINISM). Although they are concentrated in the U.S., Reformed congregations have been established also in Latin America, principally in Mexico.

History. The Reformed Churches emerged in North America as a direct result of the business migration of Calvinists from Holland, sponsored by the Dutch East India Company. At first they were only scattered groups along the Hudson River, but in 1628 they organized at New Amsterdam what has become the oldest church in America with an uninterrupted ministry. In 1792 they broke away from the parent body in Holland and held their first general synod two years later. Insistence on keeping the Dutch language in preaching and the liturgy retarded the church’s growth and alienated some of its younger members, but no grave doctrinal crisis arose until the 19th century.

To understand this crisis it is necessary briefly to retrace the European origins of the Christian Reformed Church, which, together with the Reformed Church in America, accounts for 90 per cent of the Reformed membership in the U.S. After the troubles of the Napoleonic era in the Netherlands, William I reorganized the Dutch (Calvinist) Church, but in the process took over so much control that a conservative reaction set in. In 1834 a secession of strict Calvinist ministers started a church of their own. Social and economic conditions in the Netherlands forced the secessionists to migrate to the U.S. One group went to Holland, Mich., in 1846, where they were invited to enter into a loose merger with the Reformed Church in America.

Almost from the day the union was effected, some leaders in the conservative party were dissatisfied. Their basic fear was the same that had motivated those who had seceded in the Netherlands 20 years before. Believing themselves to be the true heirs of the Reformed position, they argued that continued association with the Reformed Church in America would entangle them in embarrassing alliances with churches of other beliefs. They felt that instruction in the seminary tended to weaken the Reformed tradition and that the laity needed to be better instructed in their creedal inheritance. But the most crucial factor was the lodge question, i.e., whether members of the Reformed Church may belong to such lodges as the Freemasons and continue in good standing in the church. The Reformed Church in America tolerated lodge membership and, in the eyes of the conservatives, belittled its significance. When the final break came in 1857, grievance over the existence of Freemasonry in the Reformed Church in America was decisive. In 1857 four congregations with about 750 people left the Reformed Church in America to form what eventually became the Christian Reformed Church in America. A steady tide of immigrants from the Netherlands gradually swelled the membership.

Since 1857, each of the two main branches has developed a history of its own. The Reformed Church in America remained concentrated in the East, mainly New York and New Jersey, and in the Middle Western states of Michigan and Illinois. The General Synod meets annually, with headquarters in New York City. An elaborate missions program sponsors operations in the U.S. and in foreign countries. The Reformed Church in America has cooperated actively with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Its representatives have given exceptional leadership in the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A.

With its strong emphasis on doctrinal orthodoxy, the Christian Reformed Church developed along different lines. More concerned with integrating religion and education, and more compact in geographical distribution, the church promoted a system of Christian day schools from elementary through secondary and college grades. The Society for Christian Instruction on a Reformed Basis was organized in 1892 to federate the dozen schools in existence at that time. At its first meeting, the society recommended that all Christian schools should be owned and operated by the parent society. This departure from parochialism is generally credited with having produced the nation's most extensive program (80 percent) of religion-centered education in the Reformed tradition.

Also consistent with its stress on doctrinal integrity, the Christian Reformed Church has engaged in such projects as neighborhood evangelism, home mission work, catechism instruction to children and adult converts, and church publications with an appeal to denominational loyalty. The preamble to the constitution of a national youth organization illustrates this emphasis on distinctively religious values: "recognizing the desirability and necessity of uniting the youth of Calvinistic churches for service in the Kingdom of God, and the need of guidance and direction in this work in order that the youth of the church, as well-prepared servants of the Lord, may recognize Jesus Christ as King and serve Him always and everywhere, the Young Calvinist Federation of North America is established."

Unlike the Reformed Church in America, the Christian Reformed body is centered in smaller cities, mostly in the Middle West but also along the West Coast and in Canada. The largest single contingent is in Michigan, around Grand Rapids, Holland, and Kalamazoo.

Bibliography: W. D. BROWN, My Confession of Faith (New York 1941). H. G. HAGEMAN, Lily Among Thorns (Grand Rapids 1953). Christian Reformed Church Centennial Committee, One Hundred Years in the New World: The Story of the Christian Reformed Church, ed. H. J. KUIPER (Grand Rapids 1957). J. KROMMINGA, The Christian Reformed Church: A Study in Orthodoxy (Grand Rapids 1949). B. KRUITHOF, The Meaning of My Confession of Faith (Grand Rapids 1951). L. NIXON, The Doctrinal Standards of the Reformed Church in America (Grand Rapids n.d.); Reformed Standards of Unity (Grand Rapids 1957). M. SCHOOLAND, Children of the Reformation: The Story of the Christian Reformed Church (Grand Rapids 1958). F. S. MEAD, S. S. HILL and C. D. ATWOOD, eds., Handbook of Denominations in the United States, 11th ed (Nashville 2001).

[J. A. HARDON/EDS.]

REFORMED EPISCOPAL CHURCH

A denomination formed in 1873 as a result of a revolt by a small group of Protestant Episcopalians of Low Church sympathies. Bp. George David Cummins of Kentucky, a former Methodist, became the presiding bishop of the new church. Cummins, who belonged to the evangelical LOW CHURCH faction of the Episcopal Church, had objected to the increased use of liturgical vestments, ornaments and rituals that arose from the Anglo-Catholic Tractarian movement. The immediate occasion for the schism was a union communion service at the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church in New York City in which Bishop Cummins and the then dean of Canterbury, England, participated. Both were severely criticized by fellow Episcopalians for their action. Cummins called a meeting on Dec. 2, 1873, attended by seven clergymen and 20 laymen; the result was the establishment of the Reformed Episcopal Church. This action climaxed a long debate over ritualism and sacramentalism in the Protestant Episcopal Church.

The dissenters held that the episcopal form of church government was an ancient and desirable polity, but did not rest on divine command. They affirmed their adherence, with some reservations, to the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES of ANGLICANISM and rejected the beliefs in TRANSUBSTANTIATION and baptismal regeneration.

The Reformed Episcopal Church recognizes the spiritual authority of ministers of all other Protestant denominations. It receives clergymen from other denominations into its ministry without reordination. At the same time, this church claims to stand in the apostolic succession and to maintain that only bishops have the right to confirm and ordain. Worship is liturgical and is based on the BOOK

OF COMMON PRAYER. However, the Reformed Episcopal Church revised that book, deleting and changing some elements and words that it considered objectionable because of a sacerdotal emphasis. Thus “priest” was changed to “minister” throughout the Book of Common Prayer; prayers for the dead were removed from holy communion and the burial service; and the phrase “now regenerate” was taken out of the baptismal service. Unlike those of the Protestant Episcopal Church, the Reformed Episcopal bishops do not form a separate house at the triennial general council.

Bibliography: F. S. MEAD, S. S. HILL and C. D. ATWOOD, eds., Handbook of Denominations in the United States, 11th ed (Nashville 2001).

[W. J. WHALEN/EDS.]

REFORMKATHOLIZISMUS

Reformkatholizismus is a term coined in 1898 by Josef Müller to describe a loosely united movement within the Catholic Church in Europe, mainly in Germany, that was active from the end of the 19th century to about World War I. It was known also as Critical Catholicism and Present-day Catholicism (Gegenwartskatholizismus). Its leading figures, who did not work in close conjunction with one another, were mostly scholarly priests and ardent Catholics; the best known among them were Hermann SCHELL, Albert EHRHARD, Philipp Funk, Franz X. KRAUS, Josef Müller, Carl MUTH, and Josef Wittig. Their aims were political, social, and cultural as well as pastoral and disciplinary. In general they sought to rid Catholicism of the ghetto mentality ensuing on the KULTURKAMPF and to narrow the chasm between the Church and modern culture by bringing the Church abreast of recent advances in science, history, and Biblical research, by utilizing more fully the methods and accomplishments in these fields, and by assuming a more positive and cooperative attitude toward progress in natural knowledge. Not all agreed on the specific means to attain these ends. Some opposed the trend toward increasing centralization of power in the PAPACY and hierarchical authoritarianism, while demanding, with a certain degree of ANTI-CLERICALISM, greater independence for the laity and a minimum of clerical direction. Others were hostile to NEOSCHOLASTICISM and Neothomism. There were demands to abolish the Index of Forbidden Books and even clerical CELIBACY (a demand prominent in the Diocese of Rottenburg). Reformkatholizismus differed from MODERNISM, at least in the latter's heretical aspects, but its program suffered from the spirit pervading the Church after the condemnation of Modernism and the development of INTEGRALISM. Works of Funk, Müller, and Schell were placed on the Index.

Bibliography: W. SPAEL, Das katholische Deutschland im 20. Jahrhundert (Würzburg 1964). W. VON LOEWENICH, Modern Catholicism, tr. from Ger. by R. H. FULLER (London 1959). Y. M. J. CONGAR, Vraie et fausse réforme dans l'église (Paris 1950). A. HAGEN, Der Reformkatholizismus in der Diözese Rottenburg, 1902–1920 (Stuttgart 1963); *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1085. W. REINHARD, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*¹, ed. M. BUCHBERGER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1930–) 8:705–707. G. MARON, *Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart*³ 7 v. (Tübingen 1957–65) 5:896–903.

[E. J. DUNNE]

REFRIGERIUM

Refrigerium is the Latin equivalent of the Greek ἀνάψυξις (refreshment), used among pagans and early Christians to signify both spiritual solace and the banquet celebrated for the memory or well-being of a deceased person, near his tomb. The word is used in the Old Testament (Ps 65.11; Wis 4.7; Jer 6.16) and in the New Testament story of the rich man requesting of Lazarus that he freshen his tongue (Lk 16.24), as well as by St. Paul, who says that Onesiphorus frequently gave him refreshment (2 Tm 1.16).

A Greek inscription of the 3rd century B.C. speaks of “cold water from the spring of Mnemosyne for the refreshment of the deceased” [Inscriptiones graecae (Berlin 1873–) n.638]; while in an epitaph found at Praeneste a certain Syncretius requests that all his friends refresh themselves in cheerful spirit [Corpus inscriptionum latinorum (Berlin 1863–) 14.3323].

In the late 2nd-century Passio of SS. Felicity and PERPETUA, the martyrs speak of taking refreshment; and TERTULLIAN used the word explicitly of a wife praying that her husband's soul might enjoy eternal refreshment: pro anima eius orat et refrigerium interim adpostulat ei (De monog. 10). Among the inscriptions found in the catacombs, many speak of a soul in pace et in refrigerium [in peace and refreshment; E. Diehl, Inscriptiones Christianae Latinae veteres, 3 v. (Berlin 1925–31) 2722]; in the catacomb of St. Agnes: spiritus in refrigerium (the soul in refreshment; ibid. 3407); and in that of Praetextatus: Deus Christus omnipotens refrigeret spiritum tuum (ibid. 1102). This meaning is also expressed in the memento of the deceased in the Canon of the Mass: Ipsis Domine et omnibus in Christo, quiescentibus locum refrigerii, lucis et pacis ut indulgeas deprecamur (To them, O Lord, and to all resting in Christ, we beg you to grant a place of refreshment, light and peace).

The custom of holding a banquet after the burial of a relative or friend, as well as the celebration of the anniversary of death near the tomb or mausoleum with a commemorative meal, was common among the Greeks and Romans (Tertullian, Apologeticus, 39). It was observed also among the Jews (Tb 4.18). The same custom was followed by the early Christians, as is attested by the discovery in the catacombs of St. Sebastian of a triclia, or banquet room, on the walls of which were graffiti (inscriptions) signifying that pilgrims had satisfied a vow by celebrating a refrigerium there in honor of SS. Peter and Paul, or near Peter and Paul. Between the late 3rd and early 4th centuries hundreds of such graffiti were scribbled on the wall. There are also pictorial representations of a refrigerium in several tombs. Commodianus advises: si refrigerare cupis animam, ad martyres i (if you wish to refresh your soul, go to the martyrs; Inst. 2; Carm. 17.19).

By the end of the 4th century, however, this custom, which earlier had frequently been accompanied by almsgiving to the poor and other acts of piety, had degenerated into an occasion of scandal; and both Ambrose (De Elia 17) and Augustine felt constrained to take measures against it (Epist. 20.10).

Bibliography: H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 14.2:2179–90. R. AUDOLLENT, Mélanges offerts à L. Havet (Paris 1909) 595–599. P. DE LABRIOLLE, Bulletin d'ancienne littérature et d'archéologie chrétiennes 2 (1912) 214–219. F. GROSSI-GONDI, Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumskunde und für Kirchengeschichte 29 (1915) 221–249. A. M. SCHNEIDER, Refrigerium (Freiburg 1928). T. A. KLAUSER, Die Cathedra im Totenkult der heidnischen und christlichen Antike (Münster 1927).

[F. X. MURPHY]

REGALIA

Regalia are royal possessions in general, but in legal contexts those “temporalities” that were held by bishops and abbots as feudal dependents of the secular order, and in virtue of which secular rulers claimed by “regalian right” the patronage of bishoprics and abbeys as well as the revenues of these during vacancies. Regalian rights originated in feudal conceptions and are seen first in France toward the end of the 10th century. Introduced into England by King WILLIAM II Rufus during the vacancy caused by the death of LANFRANC (1089), they were later extended, despite papal opposition, to practically all English bishoprics. In Germany they were claimed and exercised by Emperor HENRY V (1106–25), but ceased in effect after the death of Frederick II (1250); in France they were an abiding source of friction between the king and powerful territorial lords. Regalia, whether lands, towns, castles, or cities, involved bishops in a double alliance; for bishops were in charge of the pastoral care, yet committed to various secular duties such as judgeships or military service. The problem, which was one of the main issues of the INVESTITURE STRUGGLE, was, if anything, made more acute by the Concordat of Worms (1122), since this countenanced an oath of fealty to the emperor as well as imperial investiture. A way out of the dilemma would have been, as Pope PASCHAL II (1099–1118) was convinced, for bishops to renounce temporalities altogether and live off their TITHES; but this was difficult to implement in an era when benefices were no longer viewed solely in relation to the offices they were originally meant to support. In some modern states regalia are now in the hands of the state; in Italy regalian rights passed to the state by law in 1860, but were abolished in the Lateran Pacts of 1929.

Bibliography: EADMER, Historia novorum, ed. M. RULE in Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores, 244 v. (New York 1964–) 81; 27. J. B. SÄGMÜLLER Die Bischofswahl bei Gratian (Cologne 1908). A. DEELEY, “Papal Provision and Royal Rights of Patronage in the Early Fourteenth Century,” English Historical Review 43 (1928) 497–527. M. HOWELL, Regalian Right in Medieval England (London 1962). C. J. CAMPBELL, “Temporal and Spiritual Regalia during the Reigns of St. Louis and Philip III,” Traditio 20 (1964) 351–383.

[L. E. BOYLE]

REGAN, AGNES GERTRUDE

Lay leader; b. San Francisco, Calif., March 26, 1869; d. Washington, D.C., Sept. 30, 1943. Her parents were James Regan, secretary to the first archbishop of San Francisco, and Mary Morrison Regan. After attending St. Rose Academy and the San Francisco Normal School, Agnes taught in the city school system, and was a member of the board of education. In 1920, she went to Washington, D.C., and served until 1941 as first executive secretary of the National Council of Catholic Women. From 1921 to 1943, she was also assistant director of the National Catholic School of Social Service, a major project of the council.

Regan established a practical program for realizing the idea, basic in the founding of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, that the laity should be informed, unified, and encouraged to work actively for Church and country. She saw the freedom of modern women as increasing their obligation to society, and urged Catholic women to organize at the parish, diocesan, and national levels so that they could contribute to social betterment. Under her leadership the council was a sponsoring organization of the National Interracial Conference held in Washington in 1920 to consider race problems.

Out of her active concern for sound family life, she became a staunch supporter of federal housing legislation. She worked for closer relationships with the people of Latin America, and brought young women from these countries to study at the School of Social Service.

Max Reger. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Bibliography: L. R. LAWLER, Full Circle: The Story of the National Catholic School of Social Service (Washington 1951).

[D. A. MOHLER]

REGER, MAX

Late romanticist composer and conductor; b. Brand (Bavaria), Germany, March 19, 1873 (baptized Johann Baptist Joseph Maximilian); d. Leipzig, May 11, 1916. Reger received his early music instruction from his mother, and after three years (1886–89) as organist at the Weiden Catholic church, he continued his training at the Wiesbaden conservatory, where H. Riemann directed his studies to Bach and Brahms, thus laying the groundwork for his apparently complex contrapuntal style. In 1910 he was appointed teacher of composition, theory, and organ at the Munich Akademie der Tonkunst. There he renounced Riemann's influence and declared himself a "progressivist," and so drew critical attacks from all sides. In 1911 he became director of the court orchestra at Meiningen and restored it to its previous distinction under Hans von Bülow. When at the Duke of Meiningen died in 1913 Reger retired to Jena to compose. Although contemporaries considered him a harmonic innovator, he was actually a traditionalist. His extraordinary technical facility led him to produce numerous works of inordinate length, thick texture, and complicated counterpoint; yet there is nothing in his music that is not paralleled in the works of Richard WAGNER and Richard Strauss, and an almost desperate preoccupation with sonority for its own sake betrays his basic lack of inspiration. Reger's output includes no music for the Catholic liturgy, but his attractive organ chorales are frequently heard in Catholic churches. For the Lutheran service he produced chorale arrangements, German motets, and sacred songs for small choir. His gigantic setting of Psalm 100 for chorus, organ, and orchestra is a concert work.

Bibliography: Sämtliche Werke, ed. the Max Reger-Institut, 35 pts. in 18 v. (Bonn 1954–62). F. W. STEIN, Thematisches Verzeichnis der im Druck erschienenen Werke von M. R. (Leipzig 1953). E. REGER, Mein Leben mit und für Max Reger (Leipzig 1930). S. KALLENBERG, Max Reger (Leipzig 1930). E. SEGnitz, Max Reger: Abriss seines Lebens und Analyse seiner Werke (Leipzig 1922). A. WIRTH, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 11:119–132. E. BLOM, Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. E. BLOM 9 v. (5th ed. London 1954) 7:91–99. P. H. LÁNG, Music in Western Civilization (New York 1941). A. SALAZAR, Music in Our Time, tr. I. POPE (New York 1946). I. BREDENBACH, "Zur Agogik in der Orgelmusik des 19. Jahrhunderts, dargestellt an einem Choralvorspiel Max Regers (op. 67, 25)," Musik und Kirch 66 (1996) 234–43. M. DRUDE, "Stichworte und Randbemerkungen zu Regers Harmonik," Musiktheorie 11 (1996) 111–23. D. HARRISON, "Max Reger's Motivic Technique: Harmonic Innovations at the Borders of Atonality," The Journal of Music Theory 35 (1991) 61–92. M. KUBE, "(K)eine Schmonzette: Max Regers Mariä Wiegenlied op. 76/52," Musik und Kirche 69 (1999) 160–63. T. MÄKELÄ, "Zwischen Inspiration und Imitation: Max Regers Streichsextett opus 118 und das Schott-Konzert des Reger-Schülers Aarre Merikanto (1893–1958) im Vergleich," Die Musikforschung 48 (1995) 369–94. B. MEISCHEIN, "Max Regers Orgelwerke und ihre Ausgaben," Ars Organi 45 (1997), 78–84. S. POPP, "Melancholische Konfessionen für Kirche und Konzertsaal zu Max Regers Einsiedler Op. 144a," Kirchenmusikalisches Jahrbuch 75 (1991) 63–77.

[A. MILNER]

REGIMINIS APOSTOLICI

A bull of ALEXANDER VII dated Feb. 15, 1665, that renewed the condemnations previously directed against C. JANSEN and prescribed the signing of a formulary that condemned the five propositions censured by Innocent X in 1653, recognizing that they had been extracted from Augustinus and that they had been condemned in the very sense of Jansen. This signature was demanded of all ecclesiastics, religious women, and members of the teaching profession. In fact, this bull ratified those measures that the Assembly of the Clergy in France had already taken in 1655, 1656, and 1661; it therefore effected little change in the already existing situation. Four bishops, however, who were favorable to Jansenism, of whom the most noted were Nicolas Pavillon, Bishop of Alet, and Henry Arnould, Bishop of Angers and brother of Antoine Arnould, published the bull in their mandates in which they introduced the famous distinction between droit and fait. In 1667 the Holy Office condemned these mandates and named a commission to proceed against the four bishops, an action that provoked violent reactions in the French episcopate.

Bibliography: H. DENZINGER, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. SCHÖNMETZER, (Freiburg 1963) 2020.

[L. J. COGNET]

REGINA CAELI LAETARE

The Marian antiphon traditionally sung at the conclusion of the hour of Compline during Paschaltide; since 1742, by decree of Benedict XIV, it has also been used to conclude the ANGELUS during the same season. Its earliest appearance is as the Magnificent antiphon for the octave of Easter in a MS of the Local Roman chant tradition, dating from c. 1200 [text only in J. M. Thomasius, Opera Omnia, ed. A. F. Vezzosi (Rome 1749), 4]. Its use as a concluding antiphon for Compline dates from about the mid-13th century. Two melodic settings, both in mode VI, are given in current editions of the Roman chant books. The first and more elaborate of these is the one traditionally associated with the text (probably early 13th century); it differs entirely from the melody found in the MS of the local Roman tradition, the music of which seems to have been used only in Rome and its environs. The second, simpler setting emerged during the later decades of the 17th century and probably was composed by Henri Dumont.

Bibliography: W. B. ÄUMKER, Das Katholische deutsche Kirchenlied, v.2 (Freiburg 1883; repr. Hildesheim 1962). S. BÄUMER, Histoire du bréviaire, tr. and rev. R. BIRON, 2 v. (Paris 1905). G. REESE, Music in the Renaissance (New York 1959). G. REESE, Music in the Middle Ages (New York 1940). J. MEARN, J. JULIAN, eds., A Dictionary of Hymnology (New York 1957) 2:954. F. L. HARRISON, Music in Medieval Britain (New York 1958). H. THURSTON, Familiar Prayers, ed. P. GROSJEAN (Westminster, Md. 1953).

[R. J. SNOW]

REGINALD, VALERIUS

Jesuit moral theologian, known also as Regnault and Raynault; b. Usie in the diocese of Besançon, France, in 1543 or 1545; d. Dôle, 1623. After completing his ecclesiastical studies at Paris where he studied under Johannes MALDONATUS and Juan de MARIANA, among others, he entered the society in 1573. Then followed a long and brilliant teaching career in the society's colleges, notably at Dôle, where he taught moral theology for 20 years. His Praxis fori paenitentialis (Lyons 1616) ranks among the classics of CASUISTRY.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL et. al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus 6:1591–96; 9: 798. R. BROUILLARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 13.2:2115–17.

[R. A. COUTURE]

REGINALD OF CANTERBURY

Latin poet and Benedictine monk; b. “Fagia,” probably the present Faye-la-Meuse, Poitou, France, c. 1040; d. soon after 1109. Where he was educated, though supposedly the abbey school of Noyers, is still a matter of conjecture, and it is only probable that he was professed at BEC. He had certainly, however, become a monk of ST. AUGUSTINE'S ABBEY, Canterbury, by 1092. Reginald wrote accomplished Latin verse and was familiar with the work of at least some of the classic poets. His name is associated with that of HILDEBERT OF LAVARDIN, to whom he lent his poems. His principal work is a life of St. Malchus, a Syrian hermit, written in some 4,000 lines of Leonine hexameters.

Bibliography: T. WRIGHT, ed., The Anglo-Latin Satirical Poets and Epigrammatists of the 12th Century 2 v., Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores 59, 1872, 2:259–267. L. R. LIND, The Vita sancti Malchi of Reginald of Canterbury (Urbana, IL, 1936). W. HUNT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 16:863–864. A. SCHMITT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1090.

[P. BLECKER]

REGINALD OF ORLÉANS, BL.

Also known as Reginald of St. Gilles; Dominican preacher; b. Orléans, France, 1183; d. Paris, Feb. 1, 1220. Reginald took the doctorate in Canon Law at the University of Paris in 1206 and taught there for the next five years. In 1212 he was elected dean of the canons of Saint-Aignan, Orléans. St. DOMINIC received him into his order in 1218 after a nearly mortal illness during which Our Lady is said to have appeared and shown Reginald the DOMINICAN habit. On Reginald's return from a pilgrimage to the Holy Land Dominic sent him to Bologna, where he erected a priory at the Church of St. Nicholas of the Vines (now San Domenico). In the summer of 1219 he was sent to Paris to help the young Dominican foundation at the university. He died the following February. Acclaimed for his preaching and holy life, he was beatified by Pius IX in 1875.

Feast: Feb. 17 (formerly Feb. 12).

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum. (Paris 1719–23) 1.1:89–90. H. SCHEEBEN, Der heilige Dominikus (Freiburg 1927). G. GIERATHS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1099. M. H. VICAIRE, Saint Dominic and His Times, tr. K. POND (New York 1965).

[M. MARKOWSKI]

REGINALD OF PIPERNO

Theologian; b. Piperno, Italy; d. Anagni, 1290. After joining the Roman province of the Dominican Order, he met THOMAS AQUINAS in 1259. Reginald became secretary, constant companion, confessor, and intimate friend of Aquinas. He accompanied Aquinas on all his journeys and gave his funeral oration at Fossanova. He finished Aquinas's commentaries on St. Paul's Epistles, the Gospel according to St. John, and the De anima of Aristotle. He is probably also the author of the supplement to the third part of the Summa theologiae of Thomas; this supplement was taken from Aquinas's commentary on the Sentences but arranged in the manner of the Summa. Reginald succeeded his friend in the chair of theology at Naples. Aquinas had dedicated to Reginald the Compendium theologiae, the De substantiis separatis, and the De iudiciis astrorum.

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (New York 1959) 1.1:382. M. GRABMANN, Die Werke des heiligen Thomas von Aquin (3d ed. Münster 1949) 70–76, 265–267, 298–301. A. WALZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1098–99.

[A. WALZ]

REGINO OF PRÜM, COLLECTION OF

Regino was born about 840 probably in Altrip, near Speyer. He entered the monastery of Prüm in the Eifel (Rhine mountains); was elected abbot after the abdication of Abbot Farabert in 892; resigned in 899; and was appointed abbot of St. Martin's in Trier on the initiative of Abp. Ratbod of Trier. He died there in 915.

Regino was the author of three works: (1) De harmonica institutione, preface to a corrected new edition of the Trier Antiphonarium; (2) Chronicon, a universal chronicle from the birth of Christ to 906, dedicated to Bp. Adalbero of Augsburg; (3) Libri duo de synodalibus causis et disciplinis ecclesiasticis, a practical vademecum for episcopal visitations and circuit court, composed at the suggestion of Archbishop Ratbod and dedicated to Archbishop Hatto of Mainz. This work in fact covers the entire area of episcopal diocesan administration and provides a vivid and graphic source for the study of ecclesiastical life of the period because of its detailed treatment of the matters with which it deals. Book one treats of ecclesiastical persons and things. It begins with 96 questions that were to serve as guidelines for the bishop on the occasion of parochial visitations. The following 455 chapters provide the legal basis for the precepts and prohibitions whose contravention is examined in the circuit court. Book two deals with the laity. Its 454 chapters contain procedural regulations, 89 questions, and a copious description of the various delicts and their penalties.

The sources used were generally of Roman origin and those deriving from the Carolingian Reform: canons and decrees from the HISPANA COLLECTIO and especially the HADRIANA COLLECTIO; canons from Frankish councils; 14 fragments from the FALSE DECRETALS; numerous texts from the Fathers of the Church, ecclesiastical writers, and monastic rules; fragments from the Breviarium Alaricianum and its interpretation; and texts from genuine and forged collections of capitularies. Regino altered many of the texts to make them better serve his purposes. He was full of the dominant thought of the Carolingian reform and specially anxious for a close tie with the Roman Church. His work had only limited success in the 10th century, but when BURCHARD OF WORMS used it in the following century, it was assured of a great and lasting influence.

Bibliography: Editions. F. G. A. WASSERSCHLEBEN (Leipzig 1840). Literature. P. FOURNIER, "L'Oeuvre canonique de Régino de Prüm," Bibliothèque de l'École des Chartes 81 (1920) 4–44. P. FOURNIER and G. LEBRAS, Histoire des collections canoniques en occident depuis les fausses décrétales jusqu'au Décret de Gratien, 2 v. (Paris 1931–32) 1:244–268. G. FLADE, "Germanisches Heidentum und christliches Erziehungsbemühen in Karolingischer Zeit nach R. von P.," Theologische Studien und Kritiken 106 (1934–35) 213–240. R. NAZ, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 7:533–536. W. HELLINGER, "Die Pfarvisitation nach R. von P.," Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanoistische Abteilung 48 (1962) 1–116; 49 (1963) 76–137. P. HOFMEISTER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1099–1100.

[G. MAY]

REGIS, JOHN FRANCIS, ST.

Missionary to the French Huguenots; b. Fontconverte, Diocese of Narbonne, southeastern France, Jan. 31, 1597; d. La Louvesc (Ardèche), Dec. 31, 1640. Under the care of his devout parents, Jean, a successful merchant, and Marguerite de Cugunhan, he developed an interest in study and prayer. At 14 he began formal studies at the Jesuit college at Béziers, and, on Dec. 8, 1616, he entered the Society of Jesus; he was ordained at Toulouse in 1631. A tireless missionary, he devoted the ten remaining years of his life to the conversion of the Huguenots, visiting hospitals and prisons, reviving the faith of lax Catholics, assisting the needy, bringing the hope of Christ to wayward women, and preaching to children and the poor. His influence reached all classes and brought about a lasting spiritual revival throughout France. Among the cities and mountain towns that felt his zeal were Montpellier, Le Cheylard, Privas, the Doux valley, Fay-le-Froid, Montregard, Montfaucon, and Le Puy. The numerous miraculous cures effected during his lifetime continued after his death, whereupon he was immediately venerated as a saint by thousands who sought his intercession. John Baptist VIANNEY, Curé d'Ars, ascribed his vocation and his accomplishments to Regis.

In 1712 a Jansenist priest, L. Maille, circulated a report that John Francis Regis had been dismissed from the Society of Jesus just before his death. A commission, appointed by Clement XI, examined the official records and declared the story pure invention. Regis was proclaimed blessed by Clement XI on May 18, 1716, and declared a saint by Clement XII on April 5, 1737. The church of La Louvesc, where his body is entombed, received the title and privileges of a basilica in 1888. Here in 1830, Jean Pierre Étienne Terme (d. 1834), priest of the Diocese of Viviers, and Marie Victoire Thérèse COUDERC instituted a group of women into the Sisters of St. Francis Regis, known today as the Religious of the CENACLE.

Feast: June 16; July 2 (Jesuits).

Bibliography: F. DE CURLEY, Saint Jean-François Régis (Paris 1893). L. J. M. CROS, Saint Jean-François Régis (Paris 1894). L. PIZE, La Perpétuelle mission de Saint François Régis (Paris 1923). J. VIANEY, Saint François Régis (Paris 1914). G. GUITTON, . . . Saint Jean François Régis (Paris 1937). A. S. FOLEY, St. Regis, a Social Crusader (Milwaukee 1941; Mobile, Ala. 1961). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4v. (New York 1956) 2:558–61. J. N. TYLEND, Jesuit Saints & Martyrs (Chicago 1998), 458–60.

[J. G. BISCHOFF]

REGIS, PIERRE SYLVAIN

French Cartesian philosopher, b. La Salvetat de Blanquefort in the Diocese of Agen, 1632; d. Paris, Nov. 1, 1707. Regis attended the Cartesian conferences given in Paris by J. Rohault (1620–75), and then gave some himself at Toulouse (1661), Montpellier (1671), and Paris, but suspended them at the request of the archbishop of Paris in 1680. He waited until 1690 before publishing his Cours entier de philosophie ou système général selon les principes de M. Descartes (3 v. Paris). He defended Descartes against the Censure of P. D. HUET in his Réponse . . . (1691) and against J. B. DU HAMEL in his Réponse aux réflexions critiques . . . (1692). He answered the Réponse of N. MALEBRANCHE to his criticisms in the Système through a few letters in the Journal des Savants (1694). Named to the Academy of Sciences in 1699, he published L'Usage de la raison et de la foi (1704), containing a refutation of Spinoza's ethics, and a Traité de l'amour de Dieu (1705), together with a Latin discourse on history. He influenced Cartesian DUALISM in the direction of EMPIRICISM and defended the real union of body and soul. His physics was mechanistic; he also taught a moral philosophy based on self-love and a political science based on absolute power in the tradition of T. HOBBS.

See Also: CARTESIANISM.

Bibliography: F. C. BOUILLIER, Histoire de la philosophie cartésienne, 2 v. (3d ed. Paris 1868) 1:517–527. N. MALEBRANCHE, Oeuvres complètes, ed. A. ROBINET, v. 17.1 (Paris 1960) 238–255.

[G. RODIS-LEWIS]

REGUERA, EMMANUEL DE LA

Jesuit mystical theologian; b. Diocese of Burgos, 1668; d. Rome, 1747. Reguera entered the Society of Jesus in 1682, and after teaching philosophy and theology for many years he was called to Rome to act as a revisor general for the society. He published a work entitled Praxis theologiae mysticae, opusculum selectum auctore P. Michaelae Godinez . . . hispanice primum editum, nunc vero latine redditum et plenius commentariis . . . illustratum (2 v. Rome 1740, 1745). This was much more than a translation into Latin of Godinez's Práctica de la teología mystica (1681); it added to that small work an extensive and valuable commentary. Reguera's Praxis was one of the finest summae of mystical theology of the 18th century, but its merit was somewhat obscured by the order and method he imposed on himself by electing to construct his treatise on the basis of the work of Godinez. Dominikus Schramm, OSB, in his Institutiones theologiae mysticae (Augsburg 1774 and many times reprinted) provided a résumé of the Praxis that put the doctrine of Reguera in better order. It was through this résumé that the Praxis was best known and exercised its influence. Reguera was among the revisors general appointed to examine the Direttorio mistico of G. B. SCARAMELLI and favored its publication.

Bibliography: J. DE GUIBERT, La Spiritualité de la Compagnie de Jésus (Bibliotheca Instituti Historici 4; Rome 1953), Eng.

The Jesuits: Their Spiritual Doctrine and Practice, tr. W. J. YOUNG, ed. G. E. GANSS (Chicago 1964).

[P. K. MEAGHER]

REGULA MAGISTRI

An anonymous and heterogeneous collection, in two parts, of spiritual precepts and practical legislation governing monastic life. The whole constitutes a regula monachorum or rule for monks that was undoubtedly in actual practice in one or more monastic establishments, as indicated by its bulk: a prologue of 57 lines (in the only complete MS, Paris, Bib. Nat. lat. 12205), and a thema of 314 lines and 95 chapters, many of which exceed 100 lines each. It was most probably compiled in the early part of the sixth century in the region south of Rome (present day Latium).

The Regula Magistri (RM) is a document of great value to the student of monastic institutions and early liturgical observance of the BENEDICTINES. Although St. Benedict is nowhere mentioned in the RM, it is of particular interest to note that certain passages are identical, word for word, with the BENEDICTINE RULE. Hence there arose a great deal of controversy as to which of the two rules is the more ancient. In all probability, both are derived independently from still earlier sources. It should be noted that some of the material appearing in the RM seems to have little relevance to the cenobitic life, and may well be derived from primitive, Eastern, ascetic sources, e.g., the account of the gyrovagi or wandering monks in ch. I, "De generibus monachorum." There are also many echoes of John CASSIAN, who introduced Eastern practice into southern Gaul in the early 5th century. The above Paris MS, is, itself, not later than c. 700, i.e., earlier than any MS we possess of the Benedictine Rule. Furthermore, there are extracts of the RM in Paris, Bib. Nat. lat. 12634, which may date from an even earlier period.

The RM may be studied in the diplomatic edition prepared by H. Vanderhoven and F. Masai, in collaboration with P. B. Corbett, Aux Sources du monachisme Bénédictin I, Publications de Scriptorium III (Brussels-Paris 1953), which has extensive prolegomena (5–123). For a comparison of the the RM and the Benedictine Rule, see T. Fry, ed., The Rule of St. Benedict in Latin and English with Notes (Collegetown, Minnesota 1981); G. Penco, S. Benedicti Regula introduzione, testo, apparati, traduzione e commento (Florence 1958); and A. de Vogüé, La Communauté et l'abbé dans la Règle de Saint Benoît (Bruges 1961). On the language of the RM, see P. B. Corbett, The Latin of the Regula Magistri (Louvain 1958).

Bibliography: M. ALAMO, "La Règle de Saint Benoît éclairée par sa source, la Règle du maître," Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 34 (1938) 740–55. J. PÉREZ DE URBEL, "Le Maître et Saint Benoît," ibid. 756–64. H. VANDERHOVEN, "S. Benoît a-t-il connu la Règle du Maître?" ibid. 40 (1944–45) 176–87. B. CAPELLE, "Le Maître antérieur à S. Benoît?" ibid., 41 (1946) 66–75. A. GENESTOUT, "La Règle du Maître et la Règle de S. Benoît," Revue d'ascétique et de d'archéologie 21 (1940) 51–112. J. FROGER, "La Règle du maître et les sources du monachisme Bénédictin," ibid. 30 (1954) 275–88. F. MASAI, "La Règle de S. Benoît et la Regula Magistri," Latomus 6 (1947) 207–29. M. CAPPUYNS, "L'Auteur de la Regula Magistri: Cassiodore," Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 15 (1948) 209–68. P. BLANCHARD, "La Règle du maître et la Règle de Saint Benoît," Revue Bénédictine 60 (1950) 25–64. B. STEIDLE, ed., Regula Magistri, Regula S. Benedicti: Studia monastica (Studia anselmiana 44; 1959). A. DE VOGÜÉ, La Règle du maître, 2 v. (Paris 1964), Latin text and French tr. L. EBERLE, The Rule of the Master (Cistercian Studies Series 6, Kalamazoo, Michigan 1977).

[P. B. CORBETT/EDS.]

REICHENAU, ABBEY OF

A former Benedictine monastery in the old Diocese of Constance in south-western Germany (Latin, Augia Dives). CHARLES MARTEL founded a Benedictine abbey on the island of Reichenau in Lake Constance in 724 and entrusted it to its first abbot, St. PIRMIN. The nucleus of the present cloisters was the Carolingian cathedral of Mittelzell, built by Abbot Hatto I (806–822 or 823). At the same time, Bp. Egino of Verona (d. 802) erected the second Carolingian basilica for the monastery in Niedertzell, modeling it on S. Maria in Cosmedin in Rome. In 896 Abbot Hatto III (888–913) founded the canonry of Oberzell, where the church was decorated in the third quarter of the 10th century with the famous and still well-preserved Ottonian fresco cycle.

The monastery began to flourish under the fourth abbot, Arnefried, who in 736 became also bishop of Constance. This personal union lasted till 782. Abbot Hatto I was simultaneously bishop of Basel; and Abbot Hatto III, archbishop of Mainz. The ecclesiastical importance of the abbey was still further enhanced by the translation of the relics of St. MARK, which Reichenau obtained in 830 from Bp. Ratold of Verona (d. 847), and of the head of St. GEORGE obtained by Abbot Hatto III. The monastery's period of greatness arrived under Abbot Alawich II (997–1000), who was granted pontifical rights and the privilege of papal abbatial consecration by GREGORY V.

Reichenau's position in the field of scholarship was outstanding. Its library and school, founded by Abbot Wallo (786–806), were especially flourishing under the direction of WALAFRID STRABO (d. 848) and later of HERMANNUS Contractus (d. 1054). Under Abbot BERNO

(1008–48) Reichenau's illumination work attained European fame. The expressionistic Reichenau style was influenced by contemporary BYZANTINE practice and was distinguished by strong animation of ornamentation, disembodiment of figures, and the brilliance of its internal color. About the middle of the 11th century a decline set in as a result of poor economic management of the monastery. In 1535 the abbey was incorporated into the Diocese of Constance, and in 1802 it was secularized. The various churches, however, remain in large part intact.

Bibliography: BERTHOLD VON REICHENAU, Die Briefe des Abtes Bern von Reichenau, ed. F. J. SCHMALE (Stuttgart 1961). K. GRÖBER, Die Reichenau (Karlsruhe 1938). T. MAYER, "Die Anfänge der Reichenau," Zeitschrift für die Geschichte des Oberrheins 101 (1953) 305–352. O. FEGER, Geschichte des Bodenseeraumes, 2 v. (Lindau 1956–58). A. KNOEPFLI, Kunstgeschichte des Bodenseeraumes (Constance 1961–). K. MARTIN, Die ottonischen Wandbilder der St. Georgskirche Reichenau-Oberzell (Constance 1961). L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:2427–30.

[W. GRAPE]

REICHERSBERG, MONASTERY OF

Under Augustinian canons; on the Inn River in the Diocese of Linz (before 1784 part of the Diocese of Passau), Upper Austria; the patron is St. Michael. It was founded in 1084 by Werner of Reichersberg (d. 1086), who entered the cloister after the death of his wife and son, and again by Abp. Conrad I of Salzburg (1105–47), who restored the possessions seized by an antibishop (of Salzburg), built the cloister (1122), consecrated the church (1126), and called in canons from the thriving monasteries of Saxony. Reichersberg was known also for the activity and writings of GERHOH and his brother Arno, who assisted Conrad in the Gregorian reform. Provost Paul Tellenpeck (1415–68) had historical sources collected and a register begun. After a fire in 1624, cloister and church were rebuilt (1625–44) and enlarged (1663–1704); they contain noteworthy frescoes, stucco-work, and sculpture. The provost has been mitred since 1654. The monastery was suppressed (1810–16) and since 1907 has belonged to the Austrian Congregation of Canons Regular of the Lateran; in 1964 it had 20 priests and two clerics and cared for 12 parishes.

Bibliography: G. WEISS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. M. BUCHBERGER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1930–38) 8:731–732; Geschichte und Sehenswürdigkeiten des Stiftes Reichersbergs (Ried 1934). B. F. MITTERER, Die Reichersberger Chorherren (Vienna 1950).

[M. H. SCHMID]

Thomas Reid. (Archive Photos)

REID, THOMAS

Philosopher, founder of the SCOTTISH SCHOOL OF COMMON SENSE; b. Strachan, near Aberdeen, April 26, 1710; d. Glasgow, Oct. 7, 1796. Reid was a professor at the University of Aberdeen from 1752 to 1764, when he succeeded Adam SMITH in the chair of moral philosophy at Glasgow.

The method of observation and analysis limited to sensorial experience is typical of Reid and his school: the mind knows itself by observing and analyzing the various faculties and constitutive principles of man, in order not to go beyond phenomena and thereby to renounce explaining their origins (metaphysical agnosticism). The validity of sensible knowledge, the existence of the perceiving subject, and belief in the existence of external objects are all inexplicable yet basic principles of human nature. "The mind has a certain faculty of inspiration or suggestion . . . to which we are debtors for an infinite number of simple notions, which are neither impressions nor ideas, as well as for a good number of basic principles of belief" (Inquiry 2.7). Sensation and perception are basic acts of knowledge; through them man knows the primary (objective) and secondary (subjective) qualities of things. In perception, the immediate object of the mind is not the idea but the thing. Ideas do not exist, and to admit them is to accept the skeptical consequences of G. BERKELEY and D. HUME that is, to deny matter, spiritual substance, and the principle of causality—truths made indisputable by common sense (Essays 2.9). Sensation is infallible and attests to the objectivity of the qualities existing in an object, the essence of which man does not know, since he cannot know material or spiritual substance; he knows only extension, motion, etc., which are neither ideas nor impressions, nor can they exist without something extended or moved. Perception, moreover, has immediate evidence, not demanding reasoning for its proof. Man perceives an object and immediately there arises in him the invincible belief that he and the object exist. All reasoning is based upon this belief, which is first and independent of reasoning. It is an innate suggestion that, not explaining anything because man cannot explain anything, makes him believe in everything and gives him confidence in his faculties, without which he cannot think or act. Common sense should not conform to philosophy, but the latter to the former.

Thus, Reid thought that he had resolved the problem about the objectivity of knowledge and reality against the idealists or impressionists. Yet, like I. KANT, he made dogmatic assumptions and thereby hardly departed from Kant's apriority.

Bibliography: Works. An Inquiry into the Human Mind, on the Principles of Common Sense (London 1764); Essays on the Intellectual Powers of Man (Edinburgh 1785); Essays on the Active Powers of Man (Edinburgh 1788). Literature. F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster, Md. 1946–) v. 5, Hobbes to Hume (1959) 364–373. M. M. ROSSI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 3:1928–35. M. F. SCIACCA, T. Reid (Brescia 1945); La filosofia di T. Reid (Naples 1935).

[M. F. SCIACCA]

REIFFENSTUEL, ANACLETUS (JOHANN GEORG)

Theologian, canonist; b. Tegernsee, Bavaria, July 2, 1642; d. Freising, May 10, 1703; entered the Bavarian Province of the Franciscan order in 1658. He served as professor of philosophy, theology, and canon law, and held various offices within his order. The bishop of Freising appointed him director of episcopal educational establishments; in this capacity he organized and cataloged the episcopal and capitular libraries of that diocese.

His Theologia moralis, which first appeared in 1692, was published in about 30 editions. Reiffenstuel's most notable work was the Ius canonicum universum, published in 1700, which, following the basic divisions of the Decretals of Gregory IX, provides a clear and scientific explanation of the law. Except for Hostiensis and Durandus, Reiffenstuel did not directly utilize the older decretalists, but primarily those of the 15th century, especially Panormitanus. In a series of questions, the Ius canonicum treats the entire field of canon law, embracing the decrees of the Council of Trent, the papal constitutions issued after the council, and the practice of the Roman Curia. Its principal merit besides its completeness and extent is its excellence, which made it a standard work of reference for later canonists. This work alone accords Reiffenstuel a high place among canonists and scholars. In addition, he is the author of a Vita S. Francisci Solani and a treatise De caeremoniis et ritibus ecclesiasticis.

Bibliography: A. TEETAERT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 13.2:2126–30. J. OBERMAYR, Die Pfarrei Gmund am Tegernsee und die Reiffenstuel (Freising 1868) 388–400.

[D. W. BONNER]

REILLY, WENDELL

Sulpician priest and Biblical scholar; b. North Hatley, Quebec, Canada, March 25, 1875; d. Baltimore, Maryland, Oct. 7, 1950. In 1895 Reilly entered the Grand Séminaire, Montreal and was ordained on July 31, 1898, in Sherbrooke, Quebec. After higher studies in theology and Scripture for two years at the Institut Catholique, Paris, he began his teaching career at St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore. In 1901 he resumed his study of Oriental languages at the Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C. The following year he spent in the Sulpician novitiate at Issy, France, where he received the degree of S.T.D. from the Institut Catholique. From 1903 to 1907 he taught at St. John's Seminary, Brighton, Massachusetts, and then was sent to Jerusalem to continue his scriptural studies at the École Biblique. His studies were completed in Rome where he was awarded the degree of S.S.D. by the Pontifical Biblical Commission, the first American to earn this degree. Returning to the U.S., he taught at St. John's Seminary (until 1911) and then at St. Mary's Seminary again (until his retirement in 1947).

Reilly was one of two Americans chosen to work on the Westminster revision of the Bible, for which he translated and commented on St. John's Gospel. He was also one of the founders of the Catholic Biblical Association of America, a member of its committee on revision, and an editor of the NT translation (1941) published by the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine, for which he translated the Epistle to the Ephesians. He was cofounder and first editor-in-chief (1939–47) of the Catholic Biblical Quarterly, to which he contributed many articles, and cofounder and first moderator (1924–49) of The Voice, a magazine published by St. Mary's Seminary for its students and alumni.

Bibliography: The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 13 (1951) 86.

[C. J. NOONAN]

REIMARUS, HERMANN SAMUEL

Deist exegete; b. Hamburg, Germany, Dec. 22, 1694; d. Hamburg, March 1, 1768. After being an instructor of philosophy at Wittenberg (1719–23) and the rector of a Protestant church in Wismar (1723–27), for the rest of his life he was professor of Oriental languages at the Gymnasium Johanneum in Hamburg. Early influenced by C. WOLFF and the English Deists (see DEISM), Reimarus was opposed both to the French rationalists, such as J. O. de La Mettrie, who scoffed at the idea of NATURAL LAW, and to the defenders of traditional Biblical Christianity, as he showed in his first works, Die vornehmsten Wahrheiten der natürlichen Religion (Hamburg 1754) and Die Vernunftlehre (Hamburg 1756). Although personally pious and attentive to the externals of Protestantism, he based his faith on reason alone, and the only miracle that he admitted was creation itself.

In his endeavor to make Christianity entirely “reasonable,” i.e., totally free of the miraculous and the supernatural, Reimarus spent 20 years on the composition of his most influential work, the Apologie oder Schutzschrift für die vernünftigen Verehrer Gottes, in two voluminous manuscripts, an earlier one and a revised one. Fearing the consequences of publication, however, he left the work unpublished. After his death, his children lent a copy of the earlier manuscript to G. E. LESSING, who published seven abstracts (“fragments”) of it under the title Fragmente eines Wolfenbüttelschen Ungenannten (Berlin 1774–78); (1) On Sufferance of the Deists, (2) On Decrying Reason from the Pulpit, (3) The Impossibility of a Revelation That All Men Could Reasonably Believe, (4) The Passage of the Israelite through the Red Sea, (5) That the Books of the OT Were Not Written to Reveal a Religion, (6) On the Resurrection Story, and (7) On the Aim of Jesus and His Disciples. The publication of the abstracts soon produced the so-called Fragmentenstreit (quarrel about the fragments), in which they were attacked not only by the conservative Protestant J. M. Goeze, but also by the liberal J. S. Semler and others. The main controversy was waged over the seventh abstract. In it Reimarus maintained that Jesus was a mere man who had messianic illusions and preached a simple, practical morality in preparation for the imminent establishment of the kingdom of God; after His death, His disciples stole His body, preached that He had risen, and founded a community with a newly developed Christology. Although most of Reimarus's theories had no lasting influence, the question that he raised concerning the historical value of the Gospels for the life of Jesus is still a live issue.

Bibliography: F. MUSSNER, in Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1137–38. H. HOHLWEIN, in Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 5:937–938. F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 1148. A. C. LUNDSTEEN, Hermann Samuel Reimarus und die Anfänge der Leben-Jesu-Forschung (Copenhagen 1939).

[L. F. HARTMAN]

REIMS

The capital of an arrondissement in the department of Marne, northeast France; since the 3d or 4th century the seat of a metropolitanate. In 2001 the archdiocese had 76 parishes, three churches or mission stations, 168 secular and 14 religious priests, 58 members of men's religious institutes, 306 members of women's religious institutes, and 20 permanent deacons. There were 594,000 Catholics in a population of 608,356; it is 6,931 square kilometers in area.

City. Reims (Gallic Durocortorum) was the capital of the Gallic Remi, a tribe that gave the city its name in the 3d century. It was a major Gallo-Roman civitas at the junction of routes from Lyons to Great Britain and from Paris to Lorraine, but it lost importance when Paris became the capital and crossroads of France. After the ruinous mid-3d-century barbarian invasions, Reims was fortified and became the main defense point against the Germans, the capital of Belgica II, a city of soldiers and officials. Christianity probably appeared there early. Gregory of Tours mentions Timothy and Apollinaris as 3d-century martyrs in Reims, which probably had a bishop by 300. Imbetausius at the Council of ARLES (314), 4th in a later episcopal list, is the first certainly known bishop. The first Christian community and the first basilica were in the southeast suburb.

St. Nicasius, slain by either Vandals (407) or Huns (451), built the first cathedral, within the walls. CLOVIS, to whom St. REMIGIUS had sent a letter on his accession (481), occupied Reims after the battle of Soissons (485–486); and king and bishop became good enough friends for Remigius to be entrusted with Clovis' religious instruction and baptism at Reims (496 or 506?). Reims thus became the religious cradle of the Frankish monarchy, a fact of basic importance in its history.

In the 6th and 7th centuries Reims held within its walls, for reasons of security, the Abbeyes of Saint-

Roman arch dating from the 3rd century A.D., near the church of St.-Remi, at Reims, France. (©Angelo Hornak/CORBIS)

Thierry, SAINT-REMI, Saint-Pierre-les-Dames, and Saint-Pierre in civitate, as well as a hospital. Moreover, there were schools, famous in Gallo-Roman times. To judge from these establishments, the Church seems to have been the largest landowner in the city of 60 to 75 acres. Royal privileges assured the Church's predominance, despite confiscations by CHARLES MARTEL; immunity was accorded (575–583) and confirmed (625, 711–715, 769–794, and after).

Reims's bishops were of major importance in Carolingian times. Gilles, closely involved in the intrigues of the Merovingian kings, was deposed at the synod of Metz (590). St. Nivard (649–672) founded the monastery of Hautivilliers. St. Reolus founded that of Orbais c. 680. Rigobert (698–743), godfather of Charles Martel, became entangled with him later. Abel (743–748) was the first to use the title archbishop. TURPIN (753–800) gave his name to the hero of the Chanson de Roland. EBBO (816–845), a counselor of the rebel sons of Louis the Pious, was expelled from Reims and died as bishop of Hildesheim. HINCMAR (845–882), the most famous of Reims's bishops, rebuilt his cathedral (862). Despite depredations the Church of Reims at this time was rich: 17 basilicas, four abbeys, a hospital, and a cathedral chapter founded c. 800. Several Carolingian kings were consecrated in Reims, which at times became a royal residence. Norman incursions made the bishops rebuild the fortifications (c. 885), torn down at the time of Ebbo. In 940 Louis IV gave the archbishop the comitatus (rights of a count) of the civitas. Thus began the important temporal sovereignty of the archbishop of the city.

In the 10th and 11th centuries arose merchant suburbs (a commune in the 12th, with a charter from the archbishop in 1182), and the famous episcopal school was established. Reims's ties with political life were close. Archbishop Adelbero (969–987) was the great elector of Hugh Capet (987); Gerbert (991–995), formerly director of the episcopal school, later became Pope Sylvester II.

In feudal days Reims was above all the city of consecration of kings. A bull of Sylvester I (999) gave its archbishops a monopoly of the consecration. All the Capetian kings but nine were consecrated at Reims. At Charles VII's consecration (1429), probably the most important, JOAN OF ARC, who sought and obtained the consecration by her victories, was present, standard in hand. Charles X was the last king consecrated (1825). Cardinal de La Roche Aymon, who consecrated Louis XVI in 1775, had baptized, confirmed, married, and given first Communion to the young king—testimony of the marriage of the royalty with the Church of Reims. The consecration comprised four main ceremonies: oaths of the king, consecration, crowning, enthroning with popular acclaim—followed by a Mass at which the king received Communion under both species. The anointings, nine in all, were made with the miraculous chrism of the Holy Ampulla (brought by an angel to St. Remigius for the baptism of Clovis). A banquet at the archbishop's palace followed the ceremony. A day or so later the king would touch the sores of those ill with scrofula (adenitis), of which there were 2,500 at the consecration of Louis XVI. The king, fasting, said "I touch you; may God cure you."

Feudal archbishops came from the foremost families. Two were sons of kings, four others were royal princes; five (1533–1641) belonged to the ducal family of Lorraine. Popes often visited Reims: Stephen V (816), Leo X (1049), Callistus II (1119), Innocent II (1131) who presided at a council attended by St. Bernard, and Eugene III (1148) at another council with St. Bernard. Noteworthy archbishops include GERVAISE (1055–67), SIMON OF CRAMAUD (1409–13), and Robert (1493–97) and Guillaume (1497–1507) BRIÇONNET.

After undergoing 49 months of bombardment that destroyed 12,000 of its 14,000 houses in World War I, Reims suffered again in World War II. But it still has beautiful monuments. The Cathedral of Notre-Dame was built (1211–1311) on the location of the old cathedral of St. Nicasius and Hincmar's cathedral (490 ft long, 201 ft wide at the transept, a nave 125 ft high, and towers 267 ft high). It was restored after World War I, thanks in large part to Rockefeller's contribution. Its statues equal the most beautiful of the Greeks. The Church of Saint-Remi (11th–15th century), formerly the abbey church, is almost as beautiful as the cathedral. Practically nothing remains of the former episcopal palace, destroyed in World War I.

Reims had flourishing schools very early. The College of Good Children, founded c. 1245 to educate clerics, was made a university with four faculties by Cardinal

Charles of Lorraine (1548). The exempt cathedral chapter, which shared seigneurial rights with the bishop, furnished the Church with five popes, 23 archbishops, and 53 cardinals; St. BRUNO the Carthusian belonged to it. St. John Baptist de LA SALLE (1651–1719) was a canon of Reims; G. Marlot (1596–1667) was a historian of the city; Denis PETAU (1583–1652) was professor at the Jesuit College; and Thierry RUINART (1657–1709) was born in Reims.

Archdiocese. The diocese (Remensis) does not compare with the city. Reims has been a metropolitan see since the creation of Belgica II. At the time of the official Notitia Galliarum (c. 400) its suffragans were Soissons, Châlons, SAINT-QUENTIN (or NOYON), Arras, CAMBRAI, Senlis, Beauvais, AMIENS, Thérouanne, and Boulogne. Disrupted by the Germanic invasions, the province gradually restored itself in the 6th and 7th centuries. St. Remigius founded the See of Laon. When diocesan boundaries were redrawn in 1559, Reims lost Cambrai, Arras, and Tournai. At the end of the Old Regime its suffragans were Soissons, Châlons, Senlis, Laon, Noyon, Beauvais, Amiens, and Boulogne. Suppressed by the CONCORDAT OF 1801, the see was restored in 1822 with its present suffragans.

Among its archbishops are Cardinal Thomas Gousset (1840–66, a theologian, revived the tradition of provincial synods (Soissons 1849, Amiens 1853, Reims 1857) and multiplied institutions of Catholic education; J. B. Landriot (1867–74) preached and wrote; Cardinal L. H. Luçon (1906–30) remained calm through the bombardments of World War I; Cardinal Emmanuel Suhard (1930) became archbishop of Paris in 1940. Archbishops of old had the titles of duke, peer, legatus natus of the Holy See, and primate of Belgian Gaul.

Besides Saint-Remi, former abbeys include Saint-Basle (scene of a council in 991), Mouzon (councils in 948, 995, 1147), Saint-Nicaise (founded 6th or 7th century on the tomb of St. Nicasius, suppressed in 1792), and Igny.

The oldest historian of Reims is FLODOARD, canon of Reims (d. 966), who wrote a remarkable Historia Remensis ecclesiae.

Bibliography: G. MARLOT, Histoire de la ville, cité et université de Rheims, 4 v. (Reims 1843–46). F. VERCAUTEREN, Étude sur les civitates de la Belgique seconde (Brussels 1934). G. BOURGEOIS, Le Duché de Reims, première pairie de France (Paris 1944). L. BRÉHIER, La Cathédrale de Reims (Paris 1916). M. RENARD, Notre-Dame royale. Tableaux du sacre de Louis XVI à Reims (Paris 1927). M. L. B. BLOCH, Le Rois thaumaturges (Strasbourg 1924). G. TEISSIER, Le Baptême de Clovis (Paris 1964). G. ALLEMANG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al. (1966) 8:1139–41. G.

A child, believed to be the reincarnation of Kalou-Rimpoche, at a Buddhist temple in Sonada, India. (©Daniel Lainé/CORBIS)

BAILLAT Reims (Paris 1990). R. HAMMAN-MACLEAN, Die Kathedrale von Reims (Stuttgart 1993). P. DESPORTES Diocèse de Reims (Turnhout 1998). FLODOARD OF REIMS Historia Remensis ecclesiae, ed. M. STRATMANN (Hannover 1998). Annuario Pontificio (2001) 500.

[E. JARRY]

REINCARNATION

Belief in reincarnation seems to have originated in India and to have been introduced into HINDUISM from the tenets of the earlier inhabitants in about the 6th century B.C. According to this doctrine the souls of all living beings, plants, animals, men, and even gods, are subject to a perpetual cycle of rebirth (samsāra). By the law of KARMA, the condition of a soul in this life is determined by its action in the past. A soul rises in the scale of being by performance of good deeds and descends by evil deeds, but in either case there is no finality. Even the gods must die when the universe is dissolved and be born again when a new creation begins. This doctrine must be judged, however, in the light of the corresponding beliefs that all creation is māyā, that is, ultimately unreal. The purpose of life is to realize the unreality of the world of becoming and to attain liberation (mokṣa) in the world of absolute Being. This doctrine, common to Hinduism, BUDDHISM, and JAINISM, gradually spread from India to the West.

[B. GRIFFITHS]

REINERT, PAUL C.

Jesuit, educator and university president. b. Boulder, Colorado, Aug. 12, 1910; d. St. Louis, Missouri, July 22, 2001. One of six sons born to Francis and Emma (Voegtler) Reinert, he joined the Society of Jesus in 1927. After receiving an A.B. (1933) and M.A. (1934) from St. Louis University, he served for a time as registrar at St. Mary's College, Kansas. He earned a Ph.D. at the University of Chicago (1944) and that same year was assigned to St. Louis University where he served as dean of the College of Arts and Sciences (1944–48), vice president (1948–49), and president (1949–74). Reinert was instrumental in obtaining the admission of the first African-American students to the university (and thus the first such students admitted to a historically white university in a former slave state).

Reinert's tenure as president spanned 25 years, a seminal period in the history of the university and of all American higher education. Reinert found himself confronted with the challenges of the postwar flood of students into higher education, curricular innovation and expansion, the overlapping roles of university president and rector of the local Jesuit community, and the admission of women as regular students. In addition, the city of St. Louis faced urban decline during these years, accompanied by "white flight" and continued racial tensions. Reinert committed the university to remain in its urban setting and became a leader of efforts to revitalize the inner city of St. Louis, pairing these endeavors with expansion of the university campus and the creation of programs designed to attract minority students.

In 1967, under Reinert's direction, St. Louis University became the first Catholic university to reorganize its board to include lay trustees, initiating a trend that transformed Catholic higher education. While critics complained that, along with the appointment of lay professionals to high ranking university positions, Reinert was diluting the Jesuit character of the institution, others saw a broadening of the university's vision and a reaffirmation of the original Ignatian educational mission, and pointed to the increased national status of the university and its service to the community.

Reinert served as a consultant to several Catholic educational institutions and on many national commissions on education. He was the recipient of many awards and honorary doctorates. Following his retirement as president he served as the university's Chancellor (1974–1991) and Chancellor Emeritus (1991–2001), remaining an articulate spokesman for Catholic higher education and for social justice.

Reinert's publications include The Urban Catholic University (1970), To Turn the Tide (1972), and Seasons of Change: Reflections on Half a Century at Saint Louis University (with Paul Shore) (1996).

[P. SHORE]

REINHOLD, HANS A.

Liturgical innovator; b. in Hamburg, Germany, 1897; d. Pittsburgh, Pa., 1968. He was educated at Freiburg, Innsbruck, Münster, and the Pontifical Institute of Archaeology in Rome. During World War I he served as an artilleryman on both the Eastern and Western fronts, and, after being wounded, in the intelligence corps. He tried his vocation as a Benedictine at Maria Laach, but was advised not to continue, and in 1925 was ordained priest for the Diocese of Osnabrück. In his autobiography he lists as the strongest influences in his formation Romano Guardini, the Jesuits at Innsbruck, and Abbot Ildefons Herwegen, Prior Albert Hammenstede, and Dom Odo Casel of Maria Laach. Assigned to organize an apostolate to German seamen at Bremerhaven and Hamburg, he began such liturgical experimentation (dialogue Mass, Mass facing the people, nocturnal celebration of the Easter Vigil) as was startlingly novel at the time. Not long after Hitler rise to power he was threatened with arrest and prosecution for criticizing Nazi leaders and politics, and escaped to England in 1935. A year later he came to New York to work for the placement in the United States of German Catholic refugees, but found himself under suspicion in ecclesiastical circles because of his alleged sympathy with communism and with liturgical reform. Incardinated at last in the Archdiocese of Seattle (later, when that diocese was erected, in the Diocese of Yakima), he founded a seamen's club, served as a curate, and was pastor at Sunnyside, Washington, from 1944 to 1956. Misunderstandings with his bishop led to his requesting a leave of absence. After long illness and painful sufferings in the spirit, he was received by Bishop John Wright in Pittsburgh.

By temperament Reinhold was timid and sensitive—characteristics which were aggravated by his misfortunes—but seemed unable to evaluate the effect his own outspokenness had on others, especially his superiors. This forthright style, however, was very effective in his writings, which appeared through many years in Commonweal and Orate Fratres (later Worship) and in several books, advocating not only liturgical reform but also social reform as deriving from liturgical awareness and participation, and reaching out to allied topics in catechetics, art and architecture, and theology. He lectured widely, having achieved a mastery of idiomatic English. He served on the first board of directors of the Liturgical Conference and presented a paper at the annual national Liturgical Week for many years. He helped to organize the Vernacular Society of America and attended international meetings of liturgical scholars in Europe, where the reforms that were later adopted by Vatican Council II were first proposed and endorsed.

Bibliography: Works of Reinhold. The Soul Afire: Revelations of the Mystics, ed. (New York 1944). Churches, Their Plan and Furnishing, with P. F. ANSON (Milwaukee 1948). The American Parish and the Roman Liturgy (New York 1958). Bringing the Mass to the People (Baltimore 1960). The Dynamics of Liturgy (New York 1961). Liturgy and Art (New York 1966). H.A.R.: The Autobiography of Father Reinhold (New York 1968).

[W. J. LEONARD]

REISACH, KARL AUGUST VON

Archbishop, cardinal, count; b. Roth, near Eichstätt, Germany, July 6, 1800; d. Contamine (Savoie), France, Dec. 16, 1869. After studying law at Heidelberg, Göttingen, and Landshut, Reisach obtained a doctorate in law (1821). He then attended the German College in Rome (1824–29), was ordained (1828), and received a doctorate in theology (1829). In 1830 he was appointed prefect of studies at the College of Propaganda in Rome. He became bishop of Eichstätt (1836), coadjutor (1841), and then archbishop of Munich and Freising (1846). At Eichstätt he established a minor seminary and also reorganized the major seminary. During the COLOGNE MIXED MARRIAGE DISPUTE, he played an important role as confidant of the pope and of the kings of Bavaria and Prussia.

In Munich after 1846, he became intimately involved in the conflict over the government's use of the placet in Bavaria. He strongly upheld the Church's freedom at the first German bishops' conference in Würzburg (1848) and at the Bavarian bishops' meeting in Freising (1850). The conflict with the Bavarian government led to his transfer to Rome in 1855, when he was raised to the cardinalate.

Because of his agreeable personality, he was chosen to negotiate the concordats with Württemberg (1857) and Baden (1859), which were not ratified by the legislatures of these two states. Reisach became minister of education for the STATES OF THE CHURCH (1862) and a member of several Roman Congregations. In 1865, he was in appointed president of the preparatory commission for VATICAN COUNCIL I and in 1867 president of the commission for Church-State questions. In 1868 he became cardinal bishop of the suburbicarian See of Sabina. He was named a council president (Nov. 27, 1869), but died before exercising this office.

Bibliography: H. RALL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1151–52.

[V. CONZEMIUS]

REITZENSTEIN, RICHARD

Classical scholar and historian of Hellenistic religion; b. Breslau, April 2, 1861; d. Göttingen, March 3, 1931. The major part of his career was spent in his professorships at Strassburg (1893–1911) and at Göttingen (from 1914). At Strassburg the history of Hellenistic religion became his main interest. As a representative of the religio-historical school, he approached all religious phenomena in the ancient world from the viewpoint of comparative religion, and he tended to be extreme in his syncretistic interpretations. In 1904 he published his first major work in the religious field, a study on the Poimandres, the first treatise in the Corpus Hermeticum. He exaggerated, however, the Egyptian influence upon it. His most famous contribution, Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen (Leipzig 1910; 3d ed. 1927), greatly overemphasized the relation of the mystery religions to and their influence on early Christianity. In his Das iranische Erlösungsmysterium (Bonn 1920) he became a champion of Paniranismus, and he continued to maintain this position in his last major work, Studien zum antiken Synkretismus aus Iran und Griechenland (Leipzig 1926).

Bibliography: W. SCHATZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1155. C. COLPE, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 5:951. E. FRAENKEL et al., Festschrift R. Reitzenstein (Leipzig 1931), with list of his publications. K. PRÜMM, Religionsgeschichtliches Handbuch für den Raum der alchristlichen Umwelt (2d ed. Rome 1954) 544–546.

[A. CLOSS]

RELATION

Relation, from the Latin, relatio (referre, relatum), means a reference, bearing, or towardness, and relative signifies the substantive meaning of something so ordered or referred. The Greeks devised a technical phrase for relation to emphasize the preposition “to” or “toward,” viz, πρὸς τι (Lat. ad aliquid), which may be translated as “toward something.” This article treats of the historical development of the concepts of relation and the relative, with emphasis on Greek, scholastic, and modern thought, and then offers a summary comparison of historical and doctrinal interest to thinkers in the scholastic tradition.

Origins in Greek Thought. The principal philosophers in the ancient Greek tradition who contributed to the development of the concepts of relation and the relative were PLATO, Aristotle, and PLOTINUS.

Plato. In the Sophist (esp. 242B–254B) the Eleatic stranger and Theaetetus, personifying the materialist and idealist currents respectively, consider the former's conception of being as “the changing.” Advancing this notion from what resists touch to what naturally possesses a power of acting or undergoing action, thence to power itself—taken for a distinctive sign of being (247B)—the dialectic finally introduces “soul” as a unifying principle (253B). Thus thought, as recognizing both movement and rest without becoming either, affords a principle resolving their opposition. This exposure of the three distinct genera—being, movement, and rest—when linked with the notions of ACTION AND PASSION, returns again to power, the sum of the properties outwardly expressive of the inward, incommunicable nature. Thought, then, provides a reach into something more than the isolated self-identity of the three genera of forms in their mutual distinctiveness and reciprocal relevance. From this emerge two more forms: selfhood or identity and nonselfhood or otherness. This last, grounded on power, is the basis for the Platonic teaching on relation.

The different applications of the πρός (to, toward) of ordinary discourse, summed up in πρός τι (toward something), are gradually unified in the Sophist, through the variant forms πρός ἄλλα and ἕτερου ἀεὶ πρὸς ἕτερον, in the distinct genus θάτερον (255C–D).

Aristotle. In the, Categories, book 1 of the Organon, Aristotle distinguishes τὰ πρὸς τι (relatives) as the third of his CATEGORIES OF BEING. A provisional (6a 36–37) and later revised (8a 32–33) definition of relatives sets forth the distinction between “being said of another” and “being actually related to another,” which for Aristotle are not the same (8a 34). This is made more explicit in the Metaphysics (1020b 25–1021 b 11), where a studied treatment of the relative is given. Here a threefold division of relatives is proposed as complete: (1) that of the double to the half, the triple to the third, and, generally, the multiple to the multiplied and the container to the contained; (2) the “what can heat” to “what can be heated,” the “what cuts” to “what is cut,” and, in general, the active to the passive; (3) the measurable to the measure, the knowable to knowledge, and the sensible to sense.

The first are said “according to number” or “according to unity,” the former giving the proportions derived from any continuous quantity, the latter the unities of SUBSTANCE (same), QUANTITY (equal), and QUALITY (similar). The second also is twofold, based on the distinction of POTENCY AND ACT: “what can heat” to “what can be heated,” potential; “what heats” to “what is heated,” acting. These vary also as to time: past, as father to son; future, as an action referred to what will be done. Even the incapable and the invisible are mentioned here.

The third mode troubles all later commentators, some even correcting the text to read “measure to measurable,” since the parallels, “knowable” and “sensible,” actually are what measure knowledge and sense. Further, whereas the Categories proposes all relatives as reciprocal, even using this as a critical premise (12b 20), in the Metaphysics Aristotle gives a distinct classification of πρός τι that explicitly excludes reciprocity.

Yet, since universal reciprocity is a demand for correlative terms (not mutual relationship), one can hold that in treating of relative terms Aristotle is attending mainly to one aspect of the measurable, the knowable, and the sensible—themselves peculiar terms in that each is so named not from anything intrinsic to it but from an external referent: a dependency in being, relatively named. The other two classes furnish extremes, each incorporating its own entitlement to being relatively named. “Measurable,” by naming only a terminal function for another’s reference, viz, the measure’s, becomes a distinctive relative not signifying like the bilaterally related examples of the other two sets.

Plotinus. In his sixth Ennead, tract. 1–3, Plotinus refutes the Aristotelian genera by attacking their univocities, and exposes the equivocity of relation by applying it beyond any single category. But carrying the Platonic analysis toward Aristotle, he further fixes motion between action and passion, linking the power of Plato with the potency of Aristotle: “. . . arts (like boxing) as dispositions of the soul are qualities, as outwardly orientated they are active, and as directed to an outside object they are relative” (1.12). He also relegates being to the “higher realm” and lists becoming in the categories, thereby reducing the whole “lower realm” to two genera, one comprising matter, form, and composite, and the other relation (3.3).

Scholastic Development. Among the scholastics, relation is generally first distinguished as a distinct category of ACCIDENT, having its being in a subject not absolutely but in respect to another. This they call “predicamental” relation. Then, confronted with other relations no less real but not fitting this accidental category (e.g., means, appetite, creation), they named these “transcendental” in contrast. Still other relations, abundantly used but not explicitly classified by Aristotle (e.g., sign, universal, predicate), remain, and these were standardized as “relations of reason.” The last include all nonreal or logical relations, and thus are distinguished from “real” relations, which embrace both the predicamental and the transcendental.

Transcendental Relations. Christian philosophers, exposed to cases of real relation that could not be classified as accidental, as in the Holy TRINITY and CREATION, enumerated such transpredicamental relations as transcendental. Either they anchored these in tradition as the third mode identified in Aristotle’s Metaphysics, or they based their distinction on the expression relativum secundum dici vel secundum esse (relative as to speech or as to reality), which was formulated from Aristotle’s double definition, but has been abusively wielded to the present day despite the teaching of St. Thomas Aquinas (De pot. 7.10. ad 11). A typical, scholastic manualist definition of this relation calls it “the order included in some absolute essence” [J. Gretd, Elementa Philosophiae Aristotelico-Thomisticae (Freiburg 1937) 1:154–155].

Predicamental Relations. Predicamental relations, whether taken as real secundum esse or as the first two Aristotelian modes based on quantity or on action and passion, are defined as real accidents, distinct from substance, whose whole nature consists in reference to another. Beyond this definition, however, little unanimity obtains.

Foundations of Relations. Most divergencies stem from basic tenets regarding the foundation of relations and the distinction between relations and their foundations. Classical THOMISM distinguishes the relation itself from the extremes (subject and term) and the foundation, sometimes reducing extremes and foundation to the material and formal causes of the reference constituting the relation.

If relations are really distinct from their foundations, then differences in foundation provide causal difference for the kinds of relation; but if relations are really no more than the underlying absolutes, merely viewed and hence named relatively, then relatedness is a being of reason (logical) and the supporting essence the only real entity. On such a basis nominalists generally reject the “ancient” predicamental relation and call the foundation “transcendental relation” (see NOMINALISM).

Persuaded of the real identity of relation with its foundation, F. SUÁREZ is ranged rather with the nominalists and therefore unable to see how St. Thomas or DUNS SCOTUS can distinguish predicamental and transcendental relations (Meta. disp. 2.37.2). (See SUAREZIANISM).

Relation in the Modern Period. For most modern thinkers, theories of relation were reducible to the problem of knowledge of relation, as a result of the dismissal of SUBSTANCE and CAUSALITY from true objectivity. The resulting schools may be conveniently classified under the titles of EMPIRICISM, criticism, and IDEALISM (see CRITICISM, PHILOSOPHICAL).

Empiricism. The empiricism of John LOCKE, reducing knowledge of substance to knowledge of qualities, distinguishes primary and secondary qualities, with only the primary ones known surely, but in a general way, and without any discoverable connections between them and secondary qualities. By making the generality of an IDEA a function of the second operation of the mind, “relating,” Locke reduces signification to nothing but a relation added by mind. Knowledge, defined as only “perception of the connexion and agreement, or disagreement and repugnancy of any of our ideas,” thus shifts from the idea to the relation between ideas. Types of judgment then follow the various relations of agreement or disagreement, yielding two further divisions distinguished as mental and concrete connections. (See KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF.)

These last, ideal relations and relations among matters of fact, become the “invariable” and “variable” relations of HUME, with only the former rendering any strict knowledge, since they alone are purely ideal. Invariable relations are twofold: those belonging to intuition (qualitative), and those to demonstration (quantitative). This makes mathematics the only strict science, and leaves to fallible “moral reasoning” the existential world of matters of fact, thus effecting a dichotomy between ideal demonstration and experimental belief.

Criticism. Kant, marking the two sides of this chasm as the ratio veritatis (explanation of ideal essence) and the ratio existendi vel actualitatis (fact of a thing’s reality), distinguishes analytic method from analytic judgment, and the order of logical relations of ideas from the order of relevance of these to actual relatives. Because Kant holds that up-down and near-far are not really relations between parts of reality, but to us and through us are related to some absolute frame, he is led to space and time as forms of the mind, coordinates for the singular and sensible. Universal concepts of the understanding, on the other hand, have no such frames; hence, for him, there are two irreducible kinds of knowledge. Avoiding Hume’s path to SKEPTICISM, he is led to look to a kind of knowledge independent of experience, hence to pure knowledge, thence to pure reason.

Reversing the relationship of mind and thing, making the former measure rather than measured, Kant fixes the a priori forms of his categories. These, taken either absolutely or relatively, “unschematicized” or “schematicized” by imagination to relate to sense intuition, form the basis for the distinction between phenomenal and noumenal concepts. His list of categories includes quantity, quality, relation, and modality, with relation including substantiality, causality, and interaction. The corresponding judgments show “all the relations of thought in judgment” gathered under relations of predicate-subject (categorical), cause-effect (hypothetical), and of submembership. But instead of the traditional predicate as related to subject, this transcendental method now centers on the pure relations between, whether these be analytic (regressive) or synthetic (progressive).

Following that of Kant, the modern emphasis remains on the relations rather than on the terms treated as correlatives, becoming ever more pronounced in both modern physics and modern mathematics, where the old primacy of substance yields to function, and logic becomes a calculus of relations.

Idealism. SCHELLING declares that both dogmatism (Descartes through Spinoza) and criticism (Kant through Fichte) failed in their attempts: the former to reduce subject to absolute object, the latter to reduce object to absolute subject. Favoring criticism, his solution dissolves the distinction of both subject and object in the absolute. How Schelling's theory of relation directs this may be seen from the first and last of his five metaphysical principles: the law of identity, based on the ubiquitous bond of ground and consequent; and the law of reciprocity, ruling that every nature is revealed in its opposite. The underlying unity of opposition should resolve by ever diminishing distinction into the identity of the ABSOLUTE. A dynamic PANTHEISM results from the two logical functions of the first principle: every relation between ground and consequent produces a predication of identity (so the pantheism); but also conversely, every predication of identity discloses, then, a process from ground to consequent (hence, the EMANATIONISM or DYNAMISM).

HEGEL is disappointed with this indifferent absolute: "calling a cow black because seen at night." For him, three steps involving relation escape the abstractness and vacuity of ordinary universals: (1) the "concrete universals," grasping mutual relations, express the unity in difference and the interrelatedness of actual things; (2) the roles of "negativity" and "mediation" determine otherness, negation exposing relations to what an idea is not (supplementing its abstractness and making it concrete), while mediation relates it to all other points of reference for systematic connections; (3) the positive result by negation-of-negation comes through the triadic dialectic: thesis, first stage of the concrete universal, which negated gives antithesis, which in turn negated completes the mediation in synthesis, itself a new thesis for further development. Hegel sees this system of organic relations of concretion as justified in that this is just the way one must expect Absolute Spirit to be evolving if It is self-developing.

Relation in Logic: A Comparison. The whole of Aristotelian logic concerns relations. Taking "intention" for relation, the intellect's registration of reality can be viewed as "intentional," related to reality as measured to measure. This is St. Thomas's view of the material and formal aspects presented by logical relations. "First intentions" are the (real) relations whereby man variously engages the real. "Second intentions" arise from the subsequent mutual relevance of these concepts for their distinction and ordering: genus-species, subject-predicate, etc. (See INTENTIONALITY; PREDICABLES; CONCEPT.)

LOGIC is both the art of reasoning and the science of second intentions. Rules controlling the intentionalities of reasoning from the formal side are easily mastered as an art; the rules for integrating second intentions with their material ground in first intentions pertain to the more advanced consideration of the science. The first without the other leads to a mere formal RATIONALISM, as history sadly attests; but the latter, fully taken, is so taxing as to be commonly forfeited.

What Hume did to experience (reducing it to relations of ideas), and Kant to the notion of substance (subsuming it under his category of relation) frustrates any retrace of logical intentions to real intentions, thus transforming the nature of logic. If judgments and their expression in propositions be concerned only with the interlinking relations, neglecting the terms, as Locke held, relationality rather than intentionality becomes the new subject of logic. Such relations are commonly distinguished according to symmetry, transitivity, and reflexivity. Symmetrical and asymmetrical differ as the simultaneous and the prior; transitive and intransitive differ as "on the right" and "next to." Rules of inference treat symmetrical statements as convertible (A is simultaneous to B , B is simultaneous to A), and explore the consequences of transitivity and intransitivity as expounded by William JAMES and systematized by Boole, DE MORGAN, RUSSELL, WHITEHEAD, et al.

An adaptation of modern symbols as a shorthand for traditional consequences is often treated in scholastic manuals; however, such algebraic manipulation of symbols seems inadequate by itself to capture and control the intricate causalities required for philosophical demonstration. Although considerable advances have thereby been made in the area of formal logic, and therefore in dialectic, the material logic of demonstration remains concerned with a real, causal level that is itself irrelevant to this relational calculus.

Critique and Evaluation. Plato's identification of the other and its reciprocity with the same or self opens a wedge between his absolutes, which Aristotle notes in commenting that if all the Ideas were absolutes, the idea of relation would itself be repugnant (Meta. 991b 15–18). Aristotle's mind cannot be measured by the Categories alone. His Metaphysics, treating relatives (not relations as such), distinguishes correlatives named for a relatedness from their own standpoint, from others named only because of a relatedness found in their opposite: thus confounding all the commentators who confuse "relation" with the "relative." Plotinus, reverting to Forms, fails to see merit in the Aristotelian categories; but his attack on the univocity of relation highlights its analogous nature, a source of later difficulties and solutions.

Thomistic Doctrine on Relation. Among the scholastics, St. Thomas alone seems to emend Aristotle's teaching with precision. His capital texts, the Commentary on the Metaphysics and the De potentia, qq. 7–8, give a fully developed doctrine of both relatives and relation. Composite substance—that analyzed through the categories—furnishes two basic accidents, quantity (from its matter) and quality (from its form), twin sources of all real relations, which also underlie the causality of action and passion. His reduction of all the real to these two fonts alone is constant, and almost invariably he invokes the authority of the Metaphysics. But he does not exclude real relation from the third mode (nor does he exclude logical relations from the others). Most important is his postponement of any such question until first having indicated the unique relative that is wholly indebted to its correlative even for being named relatively. Whatever relatedness this correlative involves must be reducible, precisely as real, to the real causality founding the other two modes, but now taken transcendently—i.e., not limited to the univocal senses of the categories, where action means transitive action and quantity means corporeal dimensionality. That action, for instance, admits of transpredicamental extension by analogical transference is commonly understood; such relations simply follow this transference. And such correlatives, always in diverse genera or orders, disclose the root of their onesidedness in their basic dependence, itself often springing from a causal reference that makes them real.

The Relatedness of Knowledge. The problem of the knowledge of relation that engages modern thinkers as EPISTEMOLOGY is, for St. Thomas, essentially the relation of KNOWLEDGE, an instance of measurable to measure. The very name and notion of OBJECT demand this specification of the immanent activity of knowledge by some external reality. Crucial to the critical problem, therefore, is the totality of progressively immanent causality from the sensed to its being understood. For all of this the “third mode” alone, since committed to a diversity of orders, hardly suffices. Antecedent causalities in action and passion, and even in quantity, integrate the Thomistic analysis, making a circuit from the physical-physiological immutation by sense qualities, through the relational transition to perceptual-spiritual immutation of the internal senses, to the intellect’s reflexive attainment of this objective content with the relations themselves. (See KNOWLEDGE, PROCESS OF.)

The correlation of the modern primary and secondary sense qualities (the common and proper SENSIBLES) with relatives of the first two modes, and these with the internal and external SENSES, is thus prerequisite to any examination of comprehension by the INTELLECT.

Relation and Analogy. But not only is the study of relatives prior to that of relation; the search for relations also exceeds any limited presentation in terms of “relative terms.” Besides the relationship designated by every preposition, and the order and reference signified by relative terms, sometimes words are intentionally made relational to encompass some observable unity while still allowing for variation.

Such is the nature of analogical signification, basically the naming of correlatives by an identical term to signify their relational community. Denying such a relationship means either taking the name equivocally for the several applications (allowing for no causal connection) or taking it univocally (allowing for no oppositional distinction). Further attention to relations between relations (or proportions of proportions) results in “proportionality,” an analogy reducible to the sharing of a common name on the part of comparable extremes of diverse sets because of relatedness within the sets. (See ANALOGY.)

A further stage of analogical import arises in inferences drawn from this relational interplay between elements in proportionality. Because $a:b::c:d$ (genus is to difference as matter is to form), then by permutation or transumption, $a:c::b:d$ (genus is to matter as difference is to form). St. Thomas frequently uses this dialectical device to set up parallels like the following: just as genus is taken from the matter of the subject, so difference derives from the form, thereby exposing the underlying causality that justifies the permutation.

Current Positions. Later scholastics, lacking critical knowledge of Thomistic texts, seem to have passed on something less. And the modern manualists claiming this tradition usually constrain themselves by their method to excluding necessary but delicate analogies. Their position on relation generally ruins their doctrine of analogy, thus reciprocally spoiling their doctrine on relation also.

Classical modern thinkers, rejecting the Wolffian version of SCHOLASTICISM, sacrificed centuries of attainment to make new starts. But starts that stop short of substance or cause, intelligence or sense, can find only rational relations and logical analogies disassociated from the real, and thus futile for philosophy. This heritage prevails in the current developments of LOGICAL POSITIVISM, as present problems in PERSONALISM keep alive Plato’s “self” and “other.” Enrichment awaits all in the doctrines of PERSON, knowledge, and analogy, as properly explained through the Thomistic notion of relation. But the warning of history is here: not only more, but different doctrine is available in masters like Aristotle and St. Thomas; it is hazardous to substitute their simplifiers.

See Also: RELATIONS, TRINITARIAN; RELATIVISM; ORDER; ACCIDENT; SIMILARITY.

Bibliography: V. MATHIEU, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 4:26–41. A. KREMPPEL, La Doctrine de la relation chez saint Thomas (Paris 1952) reviewed by M. A. PHILIPPE in Bulletin Thomiste 9 (1955) 363–69 and Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques 42 (1948) 265–75. M. J. ADLER and R. M. HUTCHINS, eds., The Great Ideas, 2 v. (Great Books of the Western World 2–3; Chicago 1952). R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 2:668–87.

[B. MATTINGLY]

RELATIONS, TRINITARIAN

Ever since Thomas Aquinas's elaboration of Trinitarian theology (Summa theologiae I, pp. 27–43), scholastic theology structures its tract on the Trinity along four basic concepts: procession, RELATION, PERSON, and mission, in this logical order. By procession is meant the origination of the Son from the Father by way of the intellect (generation) and the origination of the Spirit from the Father and through the Son by way of the will (spiration). These PROCESSIONS are used to explain how God can be one "substance" or "nature" and yet three "persons" at the same time without self-contradiction. These two processions give rise to four "real" relations in the deity but only three "opposed" relations, which are called "persons." The two missions refer to the visible sending of the Son into the economy of salvation in the Incarnation, and the invisible sending of the Spirit at the Pentecost.

Processions of origination presuppose that there is a real distinction between the principle or source from which the term proceeds (e.g., the father) and the term that originates from the principle or source (e.g. the son). "Real" here is opposed to mental or logical. A logical or mental distinction is one that is created by the mind between two realities but does not exist in fact. For example, one can make a distinction in one's mind between Jesus as the Word of God and as the Son of God, but there is no real distinction between the Word of God and the Son of God because both are the same reality. In this case the relation between the Word of God and the Son of God is only mental.

On the other hand, a real distinction is one that exists in the extramental world and is often based on some kind of action between the two realities. For example, the distinction between father and son is a real distinction, just as that between son and father, that is, a distinction between two real objects based on the fact of generation. Consequently, the relations between father and son are real relations. Note that real relations are always reciprocal, that is, between x and y and between y and x.

In summary, real relations imply three things. First, there must be at least two terms that are related to each other. Secondly, there is the ground or basis for this relation which can be of different kinds, the most obvious of which is origination. Thirdly, there is the relationship itself, which is always double, that links the two terms together. This relationship however does not exist in itself and by itself; to use the language of Aristotle, relation is not a substance but an accident. It does not subsist in itself but exists in another. If x and y are really related to each other, the relationship exists both in x and in y. Relations are to be-in (esse in).

Esse in and esse ad. There is an important sense in which relations can be said to be not only to be-in (esse in) but also to be-toward (esse ad). This is particularly true of relations in human beings. Through relationships human persons are open outward to others, have a dynamic orientation toward them, give themselves to them and receive them in return in love and commitment, and in so doing constitute a community of spouses, parents and children, friends, and citizens. In a true sense, humans become fully persons only in and through these relationships. For humans to be person is to be interpersonal.

Applied to the Trinity, the relations between the Father and the Son, between the Son and the Father, between the Father/Son and Spirit, and between the Spirit and Father/Son are real relations because the relations are based on the two processions of GENERATION and SPIRATION. The Father's relation to the Son is termed "Fatherhood" (paternity), the Son's relation to the Father "Sonship" (filiation), the relation of the Father and the Son to the Spirit "active spiration," and the Spirit's relation to the Father and the Son "passive spiration." These four divine relations are real.

Of these four real relations scholastic theology points out that only three are "opposing relations" in the sense that they are set over against one another in terms of origination. These are: fatherhood, sonship, and passive spiration. That is, only the Father and the Son face each other, and together they face the Spirit. The active spiration of the Father and the Son, which originates the Spirit (the passive spiration), does not constitute an opposing relation by itself since it is simply the already existing relation between the Father and the Son. Consequently, there are only three "persons" in God.

Despite illuminating analogies between relations in the Trinity and those in humans, there is a fundamental difference between them. As pointed out above, relations in humans exist not in and by themselves but only in another reality (esse in). They are, in other words, accidents and not substances. Fatherhood does not exist by itself; rather, it is a relation that a person possesses toward another. It is of course an existentially important qualification but does not define what a human person essentially is. Indeed, a person still is human without being a father, and one can cease being a father without ceasing to be human.

In God, however, there is no real distinction between SUBSTANCE and ACCIDENT, between EXISTENCE and ESSENCE. God does not have a relation but is the relation. Relations do not exist in God's substance but are identical with the divine substance. Divine relations are therefore said to be subsistent relations. They are the distinct ways in which God is: the divine nature existing in the relation of fatherhood is God the Father, the divine nature existing in the relation of sonship is God the Son, and the divine nature existing in the relation of spiration (as the Father's and Son's mutual gift and love) is God the Spirit. In God relation is pure esse ad, pure facing-each-other, pure being-oriented-toward-each-other, pure self-giving-and-receiving-another. Divine persons are persons par excellence, the perfect and asymptotic models of "personality" for human persons.

Many modern theologians emphasize the priority of relations over substance in God and consequently in humans as well. The "one God" refers to the Father and not to the common divine substance. It is the relations between the Father and the Son, and the relations between the Father and the Son and the Spirit that constitute who God is. It is the dynamic interrelationship of the divine persons that Greek and Latin theologians refer to when they speak of divine PERICHORESIS and circumincessio (and somewhat more statically circuminsessio) respectively (see CIRCUMINCESSION). In the beautiful words of Augustine: "They [the three divine persons] are each in each and all in each, and each in all and all in all, and all are one" (De Trinitate 6, 12).

Bibliography: K. RAHNER, The Trinity, tr. J. DONCEEL (New York 1974). W. J. HILL, The Three-Personed God (Washington, DC 1982). T. MARSH, The Triune God: A Biblical, Historical, and Theological Study (Mystic, CT 1994). G. O'COLLINS, The Tripersonal God: Understanding and Interpreting the Trinity (New York 1999). C. LACUGNA, God for Us: The Trinity & Christian Life (San Francisco 1991). E. JOHNSON, She Who Is (New York 1993). D. COFFEY, Deus Trinitas: The Doctrine of the Triune God (New York 2000).

[P. C. PHAN]

RELATIVISM

Like many terms ending in "ism," the term relativism is used somewhat loosely in philosophy; a view is generally said to be relativistic if it maintains that there are no absolute principles in some order of knowledge (e.g., epistemology, metaphysics, history, or mathematics), or in the moral order, or in the aesthetic order. It denies that any of some class of statements is absolutely true, or that anything is absolutely right or good, or that anything is absolutely beautiful; and asserts that judgments vary according to the subjects who make them at different times, or in different places, or under some other circumstances. The subject whose judgments are relative may be thought of either as an individual person, or as a universal subject (man); the first usage is generally characteristic of ancient Greek relativism, and the second of various modern relativisms (see SUBJECTIVISM). Relativists are often called skeptics when they deny that what appears true to one subject and false to another can ever be shown to be either absolutely true or absolutely false (see SKEPTICISM).

Apart from a brief sketch of cultural and ethical relativism near the end, this article is limited to a discussion of some of the major philosophers who, in treating of the nature of knowledge and reality, have adopted positions often called relativist. A chronological sequence is followed.

Greek Relativism. In the history of ancient philosophy the idea of "true knowledge" was first made explicitly relative by the SOPHISTS, the most notable figure among whom was Protagoras of Abdera (fl. c. 450–440 B.C.) who enunciated the homo mensura doctrine: "Man is the measure of all things, of things that are that they are, and of things that are not that they are not." This doctrine is based on the "deceitfulness" of the senses and on the fact of disagreement in philosophy and religion. It is generally interpreted as meaning that each man is the measure of all things; that there is no objective truth in virtue of which one man is right and the other wrong, since a man's own peculiar nature is intimately involved in every judgment; and that therefore contradictory statements can be made on any subject and each can be true according to circumstances. (Cf. Plato's Dialogues: Protagoras, Theaetetus, and Sophist.)

The basic error of Sophist relativism is SENSISM, the identification of all knowledge with sense knowledge. While an adequate critique of this position is impossible here, one may point out that the assertion, "What appears true to one person may appear false to another," is not warranted by the typical examples adduced in its support. "Socrates is sitting" and "Socrates is not sitting" may both be true without contradiction. The apparent relativity is due to incomplete formulation of the propositions: when time and place are specified it is easy to see that there is no contradiction between "Socrates is sitting in the kitchen at three P.M." and "Socrates is not sitting in the kitchen at three-fifteen P.M." And the statement, "What is true for me may be false for you" gains its plausibility from the fact that a statement about me may be true while a similar statement about you may be false.

Origins of Modern Relativism. In the genesis of modern relativism the Copernican theory played a role of great importance by showing, contrary to popular belief and to the traditional Ptolemaic system, that the earth revolved around the sun and was thus not the absolute center of the universe. Giordano BRUNO argued that though to man's senses the sun appears to move and the earth does not, motion is relative to the position of the observer: to an observer on the sun the earth would appear to move. To follow sense-bound reason is to take as objective what is really relative from the higher point of view of mystical intuition.

In providing reasons for doubting the value of all previous philosophies, Michel de MONTAIGNE in his Apology for Raimond Sebond (1580) played an important role in setting the stage for modern philosophy. Thus the intellect is untrustworthy, mainly because of its dependence on the utterly untrustworthy human senses, “the greatest foundation and proof of our ignorance”; and to show this he repeats the arguments of classical Pyrrhonian skepticism (see PYRRHONISM). There is no way out of this skeptical intellectual despair; but in practice one ought stoically to rely on “universal reason,” expressed in tradition and the customary social order, as a guide to life; and one ought to cease looking for intellectual support for what is held by faith, since Protestant reliance on reason surely leads to nothing but radical doubt and uncertainty.

One effect of the work of Galileo GALILEI (1564–1642) was to cast doubt on the truths of traditional philosophy, and implicitly to question the value of any nonmathematical methodology in attaining truth. There should be no philosophical investigation of final causes; man cannot penetrate to “the true and intrinsic essence of natural substance”; and only primary qualities (number, motion, rest, figure, etc.), which can be given precise quantitative formulation, are the true and real accidents of bodies and can be studied; secondary qualities (colors, tastes, odors, etc.) have only a subjective reality in the sensing subject. Galileo left the way open to the denial of the possibility of attaining extrascientific truth, a denial found in the radical empiricism of David HUME.

Empiricist and Rationalist Versions. Hume’s philosophy can be seen as an attempt to establish the foundations of a genuinely empirical study of human nature—an investigation equivalent, for Hume, to determining what solutions would be given to traditional problems if the methodological limitations of Newtonian mechanics were imposed on philosophy as a whole. It follows that any book not devoted either to mathematics or to “experimental reasoning concerning matter of fact and existence,” such as a work on metaphysics or theology, can contain “nothing but sophistry and illusion” and one should “commit it then to the flames.” Agreeing with his empiricist predecessors, John LOCKE and George BERKELEY, that the immediate objects of the mind are its own contents or perceptions, he found it impossible to transcend these and found himself holding a radical PHENOMENALISM: man’s perceptions and their subjective connections are all he knows and all he can hope to know. One cannot even know whether there is an external world or a personal self, for any inference from subjective impressions to something beyond has only subjective validity. Both senses and reason are so fallible that no science can possibly be founded on them. “Shall we then establish it as a general maxim that no refin’d or elaborate reasoning is ever to be receiv’d? . . . By this means you cut off entirely all science and philosophy” (Treatise, 1.4.7). Hume thus bore witness to the dilemma of radical EMPIRICISM: throw metaphysics into the fire, and science must follow; save science from the flames, and you cannot but save some metaphysics.

Immanuel KANT attempted in his Critique of Pure Reason (1781) to restore the bridge between sense perception and nonprobable intellectual knowledge, the bridge so effectively cut by Hume with his critique of CAUSALITY. But the Kantian solution, noetic hylomorphism, is itself relativistic in that the forms of sensibility and the categories of understanding are part and parcel of reality as man knows it: intersubjective reality is constituted by the application of a priori forms and categories to the manifold of perception. Kant saw no way of saving REALISM, for if intellect wholly depends on sense, it is forever sense-bound and Humean skepticism is the outcome; he was thus led to adopt a rationalistic position, substituting a priori elements for innate ideas. It is clear that Kant’s “Copernican Revolution,” as he called it, proved too much. Not only is Newtonian physics erroneously made definitive scientific knowledge, but “pure natural science” becomes the necessary result of man’s mental digestive and organizing system and, as Karl Popper has remarked, it becomes impossible to explain why Newton’s discovery had not been made earlier [Conjectures and Refutations (New York 1963) 95].

John Passmore has written, “The main tendency of 19th-century thought was towards the conclusion that both ‘things’ and facts about things are dependent for their existence and their nature upon the operations of a mind. . . . They all agreed that if there were no mind there would be no facts; they disputed, only, about what there would be—the Absolute, sensation, or a stream of experience. . . . Yet none of these writers. . . was prepared explicitly and consistently to assert that facts are merely recognized by a mind, not made by it.” [A Hundred Years of Philosophy (London, Gerald Duckworth & Co. Ltd., 1959) 175.]

Positivism. The relativism of Auguste COMTE is embedded in his positivist thesis that all knowledge consists in a description and correlation of the facts of observation; any attempt at explanation in theological terms or in terms of metaphysical natures and essences should be abandoned as belonging, according to Comte’s historical hypothesis, to one of the earlier and now outmoded stages of man’s evolution to POSITIVISM.

British Relativists. The associationist phenomenalism of J. S. MILL led him to define matter as the permanent possibility of sensation and the external world as the world of possible sensations succeeding one another according to laws (“Berkeley’s Life and Writings,” 1871); even mathematical propositions are generalizations from experience and subsequent experience (see ASSOCIATIONISM). Mill’s opponent, Sir William HAMILTON, was famous as an exponent of “the philosophy of the conditioned” or “the relativity of knowledge.” For him, although man is directly conscious of independently existing qualities of mind and matter, he has no direct acquaintance with mind-in-itself or matter-in-itself; and he knows things only as they are related to his experience of them, not as they exist in themselves. Herbert SPENCER believed that Hamilton was right in asserting that nothing in its ultimate nature can truly be known, and that man has no definitive consciousness of anything but the Relative; but wrong in concluding that man can know nothing of the nonrelative. Spencer held that one could reason to an Unknowable, Incomprehensible Power that is the source of phenomena, which he associated with the law of evolution. He identified evolution and progress in such a way as to claim that “progress is not an accident, not a thing within human control, but a beneficent necessity.”

T. H. Green (1836–82) maintained that all reality lies in relations, and that since relations exist for a thinking consciousness, the real world must be a world made by (external) Mind, yet somehow constituted by man’s mind qua participant in the eternal consciousness. F. H. BRADLEY believed that things are a finite being’s distortion of reality: man’s ordinary judgments are “riddled with contradictions,” and so attain mere Appearance, since Green was right in maintaining that thought is by nature relational; only in the Absolute, “an all-embracing, suprarational . . . experience” are appearances transcended [Essays on Truth and Reality (Oxford 1914) 249].

Pragmatism and Other Influences. For the pragmatist William JAMES both things and facts about things are tools made by the mind to come to grips with the endlessly flowing stream of experience. It is unnecessary to suppose that either things or consciousness, considered as entities, exist: “Consider what effects, that might conceivably have practical bearings, we conceive the object of our conception to have. Then, our conception of these effects is the whole of our conception of the object.” The proponent of secular HUMANISM, F. C. S. Schiller (1864–1937), went beyond James in denying that “there is an external world given independently of us and constraining us to recognize it”; for both truth and reality, are man-made, and Protagoras was perfectly right in maintaining that “man is the measure of all things.”

Today PRAGMATISM is strongest in the writings of social theorists, an application of relativism strikingly found in the writings of John Dewey and his followers. Perhaps the most influential American educational theorist of the first half of the 20th century, Dewey insisted that education be both practical and liberal: devoted to learning how to change the world for the better, though by “better” Dewey means that which is pragmatically relative to what is discovered experimentally.

Three other influences might be considered as leading to the apparent weakening of absolutist positions in the 20th century: (1) the development of modern mathematics, especially of non-Euclidean geometries, which seem to cast the shadow of relativity over what was traditionally regarded as the very paradigm of science; (2) the work of some theorists in logic who tended to identify logic with mathematics; and (3) the fall of classical physics as a result of relativity and quantum theory.

One significant contemporary relativist position is that of Marxist polylogicism, which asserts that the logical structure of a man’s mind is correlated to membership in his socioeconomic class. Another important relativist school of thought is that of LOGICAL POSITIVISM, which develops and refines the phenomenalism of the British empiricists. Its thesis is that a material thing is a group of actual and possible sense data, for to say of a material thing that it exists is to say that it is possible to perceive it.

Critical Evaluation. The various positions that can appropriately be called relativistic are, to that extent, negative in character, involving a denial that such-and-such absolutes can be attained or known. An adequate critique of any of these positions can be given only by showing which absolutes can be successfully defended, and how; such a task obviously cannot be accomplished here. But it may prove useful to indicate briefly some objections to which phenomenalism, a historically important and currently popular form of relativism, is open.

As a theory of perception, phenomenalism is a doctrine about the relations between material objects and sense data, i.e., what one immediately and directly experiences. It maintains, in an ontological form, that a material thing is the permanent possibility of sensation (J. S. Mill), or the class of its appearances (B. RUSSELL); or, in the contemporary linguistic idiom, that statements about material objects are reducible to, or translatable into, statements about sense data. A realist would question: (1) the fundamental assumption that the only immediate objects of perception are sense data; (2) the possibility, even in principle, of carrying out the reductionist translation, both because of the lack of verbal means and because the appearances associated with a given material object are infinitely numerous and complex; (3) the possibility of explaining the causal influence of unobserved material things that are only clusters of possible sense data—e.g., one cluster of possible sense data, the water at the bottom of a well, emits an actual noise when another cluster of possible sense data, an unobserved and so hypothetical stone, strikes it [cf. H. H. Price, Perception (London 1932)]; (4) the possibility of formulating laws of nature as laws of regularity among sense data; and (5) the possibility of a reductionist translation without presupposing the physical order and without using a concept of the physical order in the very translation.

Ethical Relativism. From the time of Herodotus, civilized man has been aware of the existence of what are apparently differing value systems and ethical codes. This awareness was the occasion for the development of what is today called cultural or sociological relativism, defined as the view that different groups of people have different moral standards, and that the same act may be thought right by one group and thought wrong by another. To claim this is not to make the further claim that both groups are equally right: for one might maintain that though each group believes its standards right, this is not to say that both groups are right.

Though the very existence of fundamental moral disagreements is controverted [cf. K. Duncker, "An Enquiry into the Psychology of Ethics," Mind 48 (1939) 39], let us suppose that such disagreements do exist. If one now maintains that conflicting moral principles are equally correct, he will be known as an ethical relativist. An ethical relativist, then, is a cultural relativist who maintains there is no rational method of determining which of any conflicting positions is right, and so neither is rationally preferable and each is equally right. An ethical relativist must maintain that there is no one governing principle that justifies different practices in different societies; a utilitarian, for example, cannot be an ethical relativist because he will maintain that differing moral codes can be tested by the principle of utility and shown to be comparatively better or worse.

A widely held version of ethical relativism maintains that to speak of ethical codes as more or less justified is senseless, on the ground that ethical statements are non-cognitive, being nothing more than expressions of emotion, wishes, exhortations, or commands. Another important relativist position is that of some existentialists, who claim that to think of morality as being a matter of rules or codes is mistaken, for each moral situation so differs from any other that a rationally justified decision is impossible.

An adequate critique of ethical relativism would entail a discussion of NATURAL LAW. But quite briefly, ethical relativist positions are open to the following major objections: (1) all propositions comparatively assessing moral standards and codes whether past, present, or future, would be rendered meaningless; and (2) once the notion of a standard for the whole of humanity is dismissed, there is no logical stopping-place short of separate individual standards arbitrarily adopted, and every judgment to the effect that one man is morally better or morally worse than another becomes meaningless.

See Also: KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF; ETHICS, HISTORY OF; RELATION.

Bibliography: A. ALIOTTA, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 4:1–11. M. J. ADLER, ed., The Great Ideas: A Synoptic of Great Books of the Western World, 2 v. (Chicago 1952); v.2, 3 of Great Books of the Western World 2:569–587. La Relativité de notre connaissance (Louvain 1948). J. A. PASSMORE, A Hundred Years of Philosophy (London 1957). A. ALIOTTA, Il Relativismo, l'idealismo e la teoria di Einstein (Rome 1948). R. H. POPKIN, The History of Scepticism from Erasmus to Descartes (Assen 1960). E. MAY, Am Abgrund des Relativismus (3d ed. Berlin 1943). S. E. ASCH, Social Psychology (New York 1952). P. W. TAYLOR, Normative Discourse (Englewood Cliffs, NJ 1961), esp. ch. 6. G. V. HINSHAW, "Epistemological Relativism and the Sociology of Knowledge," Philosophy of Science 15 (1948) 4–10.

[R. L. CUNNINGHAM]

RELATIVISM, MORAL

The term "relativism" is often associated with certain styles of moral reasoning common in contemporary literature. However, the term, as it is used, has two quite different meanings which should be carefully distinguished.

Relativism as Subjectivism. First, moral relativism can be taken as synonymous with, or at least correlative to, subjectivism, with the moral subject or agent as the sole criterion of right or wrong. A relativistic moral theory, in this sense, would be a theory denying objective morality as a whole for it contends that the sole and exclusive source of moral value is the intention of the agent, the person's inner commitment to behaving out of loving or generous motives. Relativism, then, identifies morality with motivation; it sees the virtues as descriptions of styles of moral intending rather than as characteristics of moral action. Thus it rejects entirely the concept of "intrinsic value" as a constituent of moral judgment.

Relativism of this first sort is identified with the work of Joseph Fletcher who affirms that it is reductively a form of philosophical nominalism for it claims that the objective moral value denominating specific acts does not really reside in those acts, but solely in the intentions. Arbitrarily a "name" (moral classification) is projected onto modes of behavior.

Relativism with Objective Morality. Relativism, however, can have quite a different meaning: in this second meaning it is a moral theory that sees moral value as objective but not unchanging. This sort of relativism affirms that moral value is not solely the product of human intention, that actions have value in and of themselves. But it refuses to conclude that the value of specific actions is always and in all contexts, exactly the same. Rather it affirms that an action wrong in one context might well be right in another. The reasoning involved is that morality precisely requires doing what is truly good; what is good in one context, however, might not be good in another. Thus, for example, responsible use of money would be quite different for the married man of limited means and the wealthy bachelor; proper sexual behavior is quite different for the married woman and the single woman. In these cases, then, it can be said that moral value is “relative,” but relative to the facts of the case, not purely to the intention of the agent.

This second sort of relativism does not reject objective morality; it rejects immutable morality. Its ultimate basis is the belief that the world is a dynamic, not static, reality and that moral value is consequently also changeable, though always objective.

Debates regarding the extent to which morality is relative (in this second sense) are not really debates about morality at all. They are debates about the nature of the world. If the world is static, then moral values will be rather absolute and unchanging. If, however, the world is dynamic and evolving, then moral values will be seen more as objective-but-relative.

Bibliography: C. CURRAN, “Natural Law,” and “Utilitarianism, Consequentialism, and Moral Theology,” Themes in Fundamental Moral Theology (South Bend, Ind. 1977) 27–80, 121–144. J. FLETCHER, Situation Ethics (Philadelphia 1966). J. FLETCHER and H. MCCABE, “The New Morality,” Commonweal, 84 (14 Jan. 1966) 427–440. J. FUCHS, Human Values and Christian Morality (Dublin 1970). R. MCCORMICK, Ambiguity in Moral Choice (Milwaukee 1974); “Notes on Moral Theology,” Theological Studies 32 (1971) 80–97; 35 (1975) 85–100. T. O’CONNELL, Principles for a Catholic Morality (New York 1978).

[T. E. O’CONNELL]

RELICS

The material remains of a saint or holy person after his death, as well as objects sanctified by contact with his body. Only late in its history did the word relics, or reliquiae, assume a religious meaning. The Greek word leipsana and the classic Latin reliquiae originally signified any mortal remains; but the Catholic Church employs the word to distinguish the body or whatever remains of a holy person after death, as well as objects that had actual contact with the saint’s body during his lifetime. Real (or first-class) relics include the skin and bones, clothing, objects used for penance, instruments of a martyr’s imprisonment or passion; while representative relics are the objects placed in contact with the body or grave of a saint by the piety of the faithful or by circumstance.

ORIGIN OF THE VENERATION

Veneration for the dead, or the religion of remembrance, was common among almost all peoples. In many instances some attempt was made to render the departed present by means of an object in which it was believed something of the deceased remained. Among certain ancient peoples this developed into the custom of erecting elaborate funereal monuments and using them for commemorative gatherings, frequently with some religious significance. Though no special honor was paid their relics, care was taken to preserve the ashes or bodies of deceased in graves, tombs, or urns.

Early Christian Practice. Scriptural texts supporting the cult of relics are few and not explicit (Ex 13.19; 1 Kgs 13.21). While the Mosaic Law recognized the veneration of the dead, especially of deceased heroes, it is not certain that this practice had a religious character. The instances of Elisha (2 Kgs 13.21) and Elijah (2 Kgs 2.14) offer certain grounds for such cult; but Jewish fear of contamination by idolatrous practices finally suppressed human representation and material attachment in such matters. One looks in vain to seek a justification for the cult of relics in the Old Testament; nor is much attention paid relics in the New Testament. In the Book of Revelation the author recommends that the faithful and martyrs be left to rest in peace (Rv 11.13). Despite this, although the Apostles inherited Jewish diffidence regarding relics, the new converts in the time of St. Paul disputed about objects that belonged to the Apostles and recognized as miraculous agents clothing that they had touched (Acts 19.12).

St. Polycarp. In the middle of the second century there was an unambiguous instance of the veneration of relics in the history of the martyrdom of St. POLYCARP. The authenticity of this passio is beyond question, for the document was written soon after the martyrdom (156 or 157). As the pagans had great respect for the dead, ordinarily they allowed burial even to condemned criminals. But in the case of a crime against the majesty of the state or its ruler, that is, treason, the magistrates could forbid surrender of the body to claimants. As Christians were accused of this crime in refusing to worship the emperor or other state gods, claimants often had to resort to stealth to obtain the bodies of martyrs for burial. Christians and pagans alike showed respect for the dead, but in the recital of Polycarp's martyrdom a new note appears: from a private and implicit veneration there is a change to a public and explicit cult of the remains of the saint. The citizens of Smyrna proclaimed their devotion to the relics of their holy bishop before the whole Church in the Roman Empire.

The magistrate had refused to surrender the body because he did not think it proper to allow Christians "to create a new Christ." Then, having succeeded in obtaining the remains, the Christians of Smyrna felt required to justify their action; and this they did by underlining the subordinate character of the veneration rendered to the martyrs. Polycarp's relics were honored in a religious context in consideration of his holiness as "a disciple and imitator of Christ." Each year, on the anniversary of his martyrdom, the faithful celebrated his memory in the place where he was buried.

Ritual Development. During the persecutions the veneration of the relics of martyrs spread quickly and does not seem to have been opposed by the Christian hierarchy. However, no liturgy accompanied this development until the third century. Relics were simply collected and piously buried. In the mid-third century CYPRIAN OF CARTHAGE justified the veneration of the instruments of the martyrs' sufferings by saying the bodies of Christ's prisoners sanctified their chains (Epist. 13); and in the fourth century St. BASIL OF CAESAREA described the official ceremonies held on a martyr's anniversary.

The Alexandrian theologians, on the other hand, were reticent about the veneration of relics since their teaching avoided anything having to do with external cult. ORIGEN seems to have regarded the practice as a pagan sign of respect for a material object. At Rome, however, in the course of the persecutions relics were soon associated with liturgical cult. Since the veneration of the dead was the only cult that could be practiced freely at Rome during times of persecution, the Christians assembled near the tombs to render homage to their dead. Occasionally these gatherings were accompanied by a liturgical celebration. After the peace of Constantine I this practice grew, and churches were built over the graves of the martyrs beginning with the basilicas of St. Peter on the Vatican and that of St. Paul on the Via Ostia. It is not known, however, whether the Eucharist was celebrated on the tombs of the martyrs before the end of the third century.

Theological Consideration. In the course of the 4th and 5th centuries the veneration of martyrs' relics grew as a liturgical cult and received theological justification through recourse to the doctrine of the mystical body by MAXIMUS OF TURIN (Sermo 77). At the same time evidence is available for the veneration offered by the faithful to relics that is on a par with modern practices. The tombs of martyrs were opened, and relics were distributed in the form of brandea, or objects that had touched the actual body or bones. These brandea were enclosed in little cases and hung round the neck (see RELIQUARIES).

Woman kissing a relic of St. Ronan, Lacronan, Brittany.
(©Charles & Josette Lenars/CORBIS)

Patristic Doctrine. With SS. Basil and John Chrysostom in the East and SS. Ambrose and AUGUSTINE in the West the theology of the cult of relics received its formal development, but adversaries of the practice were not lacking. A principal attack came from Vigilantius of Toulouse in Gaul, who criticized the basic principles of the cult of relics, declaring that it constituted nothing less than idolatrous adoration, even though Christian authors had already pointed out the explicit difference between the cult of latría (worship) and of douλία (veneration). St. JEROME (347–420) in his Contra Vigilantium answered the main objections, defending the cult of relics with an appeal to Scripture, ecclesiastical tradition, and the miracles worked by God through the relics of the saints.

The Finding of the Relics of St. Stephen, in two registers, fresco painting, 1547. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

After Jerome, the Fathers attempted to clarify the relation between God and the saints and their earthly relics. Four different points of view are proposed in justification of this veneration: The faithful see the saints in the relics they venerate; this is the thought of St. EPHREM THE SYRIAN, THEODORET OF CYR, Maximus of Turin, and many others. As the martyrs were saints on earth, their bodies were likewise sanctified. John Chrysostom and Basil of Caesarea insist rather on the blood of the martyrs and the sensible record of their sufferings as stimuli to the courage of the faithful. The excellence of the martyrs renders their relics precious, and the relics are a reminder that these saints should serve as models for all.

GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS, St. Augustine, Paulinus of Nola, Ambrose, and Pope LEO I (440–461) justify relics on the testimony of the miracles God works through their instrumentality. Glory is to be given to God alone; but since God's power is manifest in relics, they can be venerated. This idea resulted in two opposing developments in HAGIOGRAPHY: the legends that had no other purpose than edification of the faithful; and the notion that the more extraordinary the miracles, the holier were the relics and the more efficacious the intercession of the martyr with God. Historical criticism in the patristic period busied itself with establishing the authenticity of the miracles since the power of the relics rested not so much on the presumed sanctity of the martyrs as on the miraculous signs that God worked in their favor. The final justification rests on a human appraisal of relics: they are the remains of friends who as saints are close to God. Both Augustine and Gregory of Nyssa emphasize this aspect of the cult of relics.

Middle Ages. In the 7th century ISIDORE OF SEVILLE made a résumé of patristic teaching in his De Ecclesiae officiis (1.25.1–6). But in practice, among the barbarian peoples recently Christianized, the principal interest of relics centered on the miracles and prodigies associated with their cult, particularly on the day of a martyr's commemoration, as attested by GREGORY OF TOURS in his De gloria martyrum (31). The Council of Gangra in Asia Minor (A.D. 343) excommunicated those who despised the cult of relics (c.20); and the Council of Carthage (401) counseled the destruction of churches in which no relics were honored (c.14). But in 675 the Council of Braga called the attention of the bishops to abuses connected with relics.

Eastern Christian Practice. The care for the relics of martyrs and saints differed considerably in the West and East. In the Christian East the holy bodies were exhumed, dismembered, and transported from place to place, as in the case of the transfer of relics of St. Babylas in 351. Already in the 4th century such translations were surrounded with solemn ceremonies; and emperors desired to have their reigns marked by such occasions. The great cities of Constantinople, Alexandria, and Antioch were enriched with relics taken from lesser sanctuaries. By the fifth century the dismemberment of body and of bones became an accepted practice.

Western Practice. In the West a different development took place. The Theodosian Code contained severe penalties against the spoliation of graves. Hence transfer of remains was considered the equivalent of the violation and profanation of tombs, and the popes became strong advocates of this point of view. Hence translation of the remains of a saint was an exceptional happening and had to be dictated by strong reasons or effected clandestinely, as in the case of the FOUR CROWNED MARTYRS brought from Pannonia in the 5th century. Certain churches in Italy, however, did not accept the strict Roman discipline in this matter, and at Brescia St. GAUDENTIUS enriched his church with a treasury of relics (Patrologia Latina 20:959–971).

In the 8th century Roman severity was relaxed and Paul I (757–767) and Paschal I (817–824) authorized a large number of translations. This practice quickly spread through Italy and beyond and resulted in the dismemberment and dispersal of the bodies of the saints. Outside Italy, where martyrdoms had been rare, the matter became complicated by a proliferation of brandea or substitute relics in private and public cult until the Carolingian Age, when the cult of relics of confessors or non-martyr saints became frequent. Likewise the acclaim of relics that accompanied the translations in the East was achieved by pilgrimages in the West and had a great influence on the economic, cultural, and social development of Western Europe.

John Damascene. With the outbreak of ICONOCLASM, the diversity of thought and practice in the Christian East and West became more marked. In the East, after the theological settlement of the Iconoclastic dispute at the Council of NICAIA II (787), the cult of relics as well as of images had a considerable development. St. JOHN DAMASCENE brought stability to the doctrine of the veneration of relics in the East. He taught that God gave the relics of saints to the Church as a means of salvation and that it was necessary to give them honor as representing the saints, the friends of Christ, the sons and daughters of God. So the cult of relics was actually an extension of the honor due to God alone. This became the viewpoint of orthodox theologians generally, and the remains of the saints received an honor secondary to the cult due to God. Only the sects springing from MANICHAEISM thereafter attacked the principle involved in this veneration. In the 11th century, however, the cult of icons in Byzantium became more important than that given to relics, and the theology of relic veneration, as well as the folklore, poetry, and homiletic development, received no further stimulus. Not until the 17th century did an Orthodox theologian, Stephan Yavorsky, show an interest in the question of relics.

Translations and Dispersals. In the West the cult of relics advanced with the development of the Middle Ages. Relics were multiplied by division of larger pieces, by the discovery of new relics, and by falsifications. In the 11th century the Church was forced to protect relics by legislating for the authorization of translations, particularly in consideration of the Norman and Mongol invasions. This dispersal occasioned an increasing number of relics as is illustrated by the case of St. Philibert of Beau-lieu, whose remains were carried by the monks fleeing before the Norman invasion and parceled out in the various monasteries they founded before coming to rest at Tours. It likewise gave rise to an extraordinary commerce. Translations of relics at times assumed the proportions of an export enterprise, then of a regular trade, particularly as regards Rome.

Pilgrims and Princely Visitors. During the eighth and ninth centuries guidebooks for pilgrims in Rome gave visitors indispensable indications for their visits to the city’s all but abandoned suburban cemeteries. Visitors to the CATACOMBS were led to believe by their own piety or the suggestion of charlatans that they stood in the midst of great collections of the bodies of the saints. The catacombs were thus considered an inexhaustible mine for relics, which until the time of GREGORY I (590–604) had been protected by the civil laws. This reserve was succeeded by great audacity. Popes now gave royal and important visitors whole bodies of the martyrs, and monastic founders were convinced that the stability and celebrity of their foundations depended on the relics in their treasury. Likewise it was considered necessary to strengthen the faith of new nations, such as the Saxons, recently won to the faith by introducing the cult of relics among them as a stimulus to their piety and a preventative against their reversal to the cult of their old idols.

“Procession of the Relics of Saint Benedict through the Streets of Valladolid,” Spanish ceramic tiles. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

Papal authority made an effort to prevent or control this dispersal, but popes frequently were powerless to prevent such phenomena as the formation, in the ninth century, of a corporation that specialized in the discovery, sale, and transport of relics to all parts of Europe. This was possible because the ancient Roman cemeteries had been abandoned at this epoch and were visited only occasionally by pilgrims. One of the more successful of these entrepreneurs of relics was the deacon Deusdedit, who showed a deep sympathy for the importunings of barbarian princes and ecclesiastics so desirous of possessing relics that were evidently misprised in Rome. Deusdedit had the administration of the third cemeterial region of Rome, which covered the areas of Casalina (Labicana), Prenestina, and Tiburtina, with the cemetery of SS. Peter and Marcellinus. In 827 he made his first journey through the Germanic countries with a listing of the relics possibly transferable. EINHARD and RABANUS MAURUS were among his more important clients.

But Deusdedit and his brothers who continued the practice did not always have honest partners or imitators. Thus in the case of the martyr St. HYACINTH, whose bones were considered a primary treasure in the Abbey of Seligenstadt for over 1,000 years, it was discovered in 1845 that the true Roman martyr's remains were still intact in a grave in the cemetery of St. Hermes. Paschal I finally ordered the abandonment of the catacombs and the transfer of relics to the churches of Rome; but the transport was not conducted with proper care and many of these bones are now unidentifiable.

Crusaders. During the Crusades the commerce in relics reached a new high. In 1204, with the taking of Constantinople, a great number of relics were captured by the Latin army; and successively, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Edessa were sacked, and the relics sent back to enrich the churches and cathedrals of medieval Europe. Actually the Crusaders were more interested in the possession of the relics themselves than in their commercial value. This is evidenced by the fact that frequently they did not carry off the rich reliquaries in which they discovered the relics. But false relics were also multiplied in increasing numbers, both by enterprising charlatans and in the course of transport, theft, and exchange of captured relics. To offset this practice, horror stories and legends concerning the fate of relic falsifiers were put into circulation. In 1274 the Council of LYONS prohibited the veneration of new relics without the approbation of the pope.

Late Medieval Practice. Once a relic was discovered and authenticated it was placed as close as possible to the altar in a church or chapel. The tombs of the martyrs were actually considered altars; and the bodies of saints were no longer buried but exposed to be seen and touched in tombs made into sumptuous reliquaries and placed above or behind the altar. It soon became indispensable for the dedication of an altar that it contain relics of the martyrs; and the proprietor of a new church had to request of the pope or the bishop of the place the relics of the saint in whose honor the church was to be dedicated (Liber diurnus romanorum pontificum).

The cult of relics in the Middle Ages was dependent on the great stock put in their efficacy. Celebrated shrines gave rise to gigantic pilgrimages with the arrival of immense crowds on certain feast days or during the whole course of the year. The pilgrimages to St. James of Compostela in Spain are a key to the literary, artistic, and cultural understanding of the Middle Ages, in the opinion of the art historian É. Mâle.

Not only PILGRIMAGES but PROCESSIONS with the relics of saints in the streets gave rise to special feasts, fairs, and events that attracted crowds of people and had a great effect on the exchange of ideas, information, styles, and customs. And almost all civic events were activated with an appeal to the city's relics, from the taking of oaths to the conclusion of pacts and treaties. Likewise in the case of saints called upon as protectors against disease, their relics were frequently applied to the parts of the bodies of the sick. Abuses were inevitable; but theologians recognized the impossibility of controlling them and paid more attention to the doctrine than to the practice of the faithful.

Abuses. Denunciatory voices were not entirely lacking, however. At the very time when enormous churches were being erected and Masses organized in honor of the saints, Guibert of Nogent attacked the superstitions connected with relics in his De pignoribus sanctorum. St. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX denounced the pride in their relics and the bad faith of the Cluniac monks, while PETER THE VENERABLE contented himself with explaining the traditional teaching that justified the cult of relics (Sermo 4). The LATERAN COUNCIL IV recognized the problems raised by both clergy and laity in this matter and repeated the teaching of the Council of Nicaea II.

Liturgy. In the liturgy the action of the hierarchy proved more effective, and the Roman rituals never included a feast in honor of the relics of a saint even though Rome permitted certain dioceses and religious orders to celebrate the feast of Sancta Maria ad martyres. In the 10th century a salutation was directed to the altar relics at the beginning of Mass; but allusions to relics are rare in the prayers of the canonical hours or in the antiphonaries and lectionaries. On the contrary, triumphal hymns and homilies honoring saints and martyrs were tolerated, while the great veneration of relics was indicated by the position that was assigned them on the altars.

Scholastic Theology. The teaching of the scholastic theologians does not differ greatly from that of the Fathers. The first redactors of summae gave no special attention to relics, mainly because PETER LOMBARD had not treated them in his Sentences. The commentators contented themselves with protests against abuses; but THOMAS AQUINAS dedicated a question in his Summa theologiae to the problem (3a, 25.6). Summing up John Damascene, he took as point of departure the vivid sense of the human element involved. The saints belong to Christ; they are the sons and daughters of God and as a consequence serve as intercessors with God for the living. Every relic is thus a record of the saint. As God works miracles through relics, relics have a direct relationship with the saints, with Christ, and with God. It is thus the saints who are the direct object of honor, of which their relics are but the sensible signs.

St. Thomas thus concluded that relics in themselves have no sanctifying power; but they do “excite to love, by signifying the love that is achieved through the relic.”

On second consideration, he tended to accept a certain extrinsic value by way of the physical proximity of a relic in its relation to the body of a saint. Saints are the temples and instruments of the Holy Spirit in their whole person. They continue to be so in a secondary fashion in the remains of their bodies still on earth. Thus the body of a saint deserves honor for itself; and it follows that relics deserve more veneration than do images. The miracles worked by God are irrefutable proofs of this fact. God is the principal and primary object of worship (latría), while the saints and their relics deserve veneration (douλία). Thomas finally sought to justify the so-called representative or substitute relics that have been in true contact with actual relics; but he stressed the necessity of avoiding every semblance of superstitious practice.

This last consideration was taken up by later scholastics whose principal consideration was the axiom in medio virtus. At the same time, however, the precursors of the Protestant reform began to raise voices against the cult of relics. John HUS considered the practice idolatrous; and his criticism was repeated by John Wyclif and, a century later, by all the reformers. Luther considered the cult of relics as mainly a lucrative invention of the Roman Church and contrary to the Word of God as manifest in the Scriptures. Calvin proved more moderate and confined his attack to false relics.

Responding to Protestant criticisms, the Council of TRENT in a decree issued in its 25th session made no reference to Scripture but appealed to the Apostolic tradition and the constant practice of the Church. Trent repeated the condemnations of previous councils against those who denied the licitness and legitimacy of the veneration of relics.

Suárez. After Trent F. SUÁREZ was the first theologian to return to the question of relics (Sum. theol. 18.654). He collected the common teaching and added his critical observations particularly regarding the traditions of the churches of Rome, Constantinople, Antioch, and Milan. He found proof of the excellence of relics in the dignity invested in the bodies of the saints, an argument built on that of St. Augustine. Contrary to St. Thomas he held that the relation between the saint and his relics is not to be sought in physical continuity or in actual contact with the remains but in the reason on which the moral dignity of the relic is based. He likewise gave diverse value to relics in accordance with their relative importance. When they are reduced to specks of powder, it is unbecoming to preserve them.

Bellarmino and Billuart. Some 17th- and 18th-century theologians felt that the veneration of relics was inferior to the cult of the saints; still others put the two on a par, distinguishing between relative douλία to the relics and absolute to the saint in heaven. This was the opinion of Robert BELLARMINE in his De Ecclesia triumphantis (2.3; 3.203–211). The most interesting observations in this period were made by Cardinal Billuart (1685–1757) in his De Incarnationis diss. (23.4). He made a distinction between relics, based on his discussion of images. Materially considered, relics have no right to veneration; but in their formal aspect, as representative of the saint whose remains they are, they are worthy of the same veneration that is due to the saint. They are only distinguished from the saint whom they represent by the modality of being immobile and inanimate; but actually they constitute one sole entity with the saint. Hence the dignity of the relic is the same as that of the saint.

The relic in itself as an object, however, does possess value of sanctification in so far as it was once in direct contact with the saint. The dignity with which the Church invests a relic thus has a true foundation, and the veneration is based on a true autonomous title. This last consideration was advanced to justify the veneration of relics whose title to authenticity could no longer be ascertained but whose cult was both ancient and venerable. But such cult is not the same as that offered to a saint and can be considered douλία only in an improper sense.

MODERN CARE OF RELICS

While the piety of the faithful and the zealous care of curators preserved the greater number of relics handed down from the past, the revolts and sequestration of churches and monasteries that swept Europe in the wake of the French Revolution and continued to the end of the 19th century caused the disappearance of large collections of relics. But the wars of religion, the revolutions, and occasional uprisings in missionary territories occasioned many martyrdoms among both missionaries and converts, thus providing modern relics whose authenticity cannot be questioned. Likewise the progress achieved by Christian archaeology has enabled scholars to provide means for controlling the study of ancient relics. In this process certain ancient relics have been excluded, such as those of St. PHILOMENA, whose name was removed (18 April 1961) from the Calendar of Saints by the then Congregation of Rites. An excellent guide in this connection is provided by the Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists. In the preface to the life of each saint information is provided concerning the principal sites where the holy person's relics are preserved, and an attempt is made at identifying the value of the tradition involved.

Bibliography: S. DITCHFIELD, "Martyrs on the Move: Relics as Vindicators of Local Diversity in the Tridentine Church," Martyrs and Martyrologies (Oxford 1993) 283–94. C. DOHERTY, "The Use of Relics in Early Ireland," Ireland and Europe (Stuttgart 1984) 89–101. P. J. GEARY, "The Ninth-Century Relic Trade: A Response to Popular Piety," Religion and the People, 800–1700 (Chapel Hill, North Carolina 1979) 8–19. T. JOHNSON, "Holy Fabrications: The Catacomb Saints and the Counter-Reformation in Bavaria," Journal of Ecclesiastical History 47 (1996) 274–97. G. LENHOFF, "The Notion of 'Uncorrupted Relics' in Early Russian Culture," Christianity and the Eastern Slavs, Vol. 1 (Berkeley, California 1993) 252–75. B. R. MCCANE, "Bones of Contention: Ossuaries and Reliquaries in Early Judaism and Christianity," Second Century 8 (1991) 235–46. J. M. MCCULLOH, "The Cult of Relics in the Letters and Dialogues of Pope Gregory the Great: A Lexicographical Study," Traditio 32 (1976) 145–84. O.F.A. MEINARDUS, "A Study of the Relics of Saints of the Greek Orthodox Church," Oriens Christianus, Vol. 54 (Wiesbaden 1970) 130–279. P. C. MILLER, "'Differential Networks': Relics and Other Fragments in Late Antiquity," Journal of Early Christian Studies 6 (1998) 113–38. D. W. ROLLASON, "Relic-Cults as an Instrument of Royal Policy c. 900–c. 1050," Anglo-Saxon England, 15 (Cambridge 1986) 91–103. W. TABBERNEE, "'Our Trophies Are Better Than Your Trophies': The Appeal to Tombs and Reliquaries in Montanist-Orthodox Relations" Studia patristica 31 (1997) 206–17. A. THACKER, "Cults at Canterbury: Relics and Reform under Dunstan and His Successors," St Dunstan (Woodbridge, England 1992) 221–45; "Saint-Making and Relic Collecting by Oswald and His Communities," St Oswald of Worcester (London 1996) 244–68.

[F. CHIOVARD/EDS.]

RELIGION

This article is concerned with the basic nature of religion as such and with the common elements found in the various religions of mankind.

Problems of Definition

A precise but comprehensive definition is difficult. The problem can be examined best by considering religion from several different points of view or under several distinct aspects.

Nominal Definition and the Universal Fact of Religion. The etymology of the Latin word religio is disputed. Some have tried to connect religio with other Latin terms (relegere, religare, reeligere, relinquere), but each scholar has been influenced by his personal ideas, and no accord has been reached. Philological investigation of the use of the word has revealed some interesting aspects of Roman religiosity, which was characterized by a scrupulous attention to all signs or manifestations of invisible powers or forces. But the problem becomes much more complicated when one wishes to examine the phenomenon of religion in cultures that do not use the Latin word. The languages that have an equivalent general term are rare, and the terms selected for comparison have turned out, ordinarily, to be descriptions merely of one of the duties considered essential by the respective civilization. In fact, there are very few cultures in which the question of the essence of religion has been formally raised; as a general rule, each takes its own religion as an obvious norm. Furthermore, the same thing happened in the development of the science of religions itself. In the 19th century some scholars maintained that there were peoples without religion, until it was recognized that such investigators had simply failed to find religion, as they themselves conceived religion, among certain primitive tribes.

Empirical Definition. Even when it was once admitted that all peoples have a religion, the question remained: how could investigation be carried on if the investigators had no precise idea of the object of their research? This was a purely theoretical question, which in practice did not hamper scholarly investigation. As in the case of other sciences, the science of religions began with working hypotheses, which were more or less exact and which were gradually corrected in the process of research itself. In the end it was possible for this science to isolate and delimit empirically a specific object proper to it.

In the totality of human experiences and activities the religious phenomenon presents itself as irreducible to any other category save its own and as definitely and always belonging to its own category and no other. At the same time every religion implies a choice that is so total and exclusive, affecting as it does the personal destiny of every human being in irrevocable fashion even where no clear notion of a transcendent absolute exists, that no religion seems able to tolerate its inclusion in the cadre of a general definition. Therefore, for the religious man, the definition of religion could be only that of his own religion. Actually the disagreement or diversity is such that the outsider can operate only with a selection of a minimum of statistical religious data that will be admitted by any of the existing religions.

Religious-minded men, concerned with the problem of general accord, will appeal instinctively to a revelation. It is clearly established that there are civilizations, however, among which it is necessary to include all the "primitives" and also the major polytheistic groups, that profess theoretical and practical relativism in matters of religion and affirm that no one religion in particular, but all religions together, fulfill the religious function of mankind in the world and before God. And those who, like Plato and the Aztecs, awaited a future revelation adopted the same attitude regarding their contemporary world. Accordingly, to come to closer grips with the problems, it seems necessary to distinguish between the religions founded on a revelation in the strict sense and other religions.

Theological Definition. In the case of revealed religions, which are at the same time religions of salvation, the problem of definition seems simple, for it is given by REVELATION itself, at least implicitly. Revelation indicates specifically under what conditions a man can fulfill his destiny and be saved. The theology of the SALVATION of unbelievers indicates precisely under what conditions the individuals who do not know the revelation can participate in salvation. But the interpreters of the revelation do not say whether there are really any nonrevealed religions that deserve the name of religion. The special polemical character of the inspired writings that criticize the pagan religions do not permit on the basis of their arguments a definitive judgment to be passed on the religions in question.

The revealed religions, however, do not make salvation the primary end and immediate object of religion. From the subjective point of view, religion is a virtue that leads man to render to God the homage that is due to Him. As an objective manner of behavior and concrete manifestation of virtue, it comprises belief in one God, personal and infinite in His attributes; an attitude of absolute respect and submission; exterior acts that express this belief and this attitude in worship; and, as required by all exterior human activity, institutions to regulate that activity.

Historical Definition. There is a science of religions, however, that is a branch of anthropology. This science does not teach the norms of the true religion, and it is not occupied solely with the institutions that have come from revelation. It includes within its scope what men have come to employ, so to speak, as substitutes for revelation, along with many contradictions that baffle science itself. Yet it is precisely the tentative efforts of science in themselves that make possible a better grasp of the whole amplitude of the problems of man and religion.

On the level of the collection of documents to be studied, science ought to begin, then, with a very broad conception of its object and thus let nothing escape it that may sometime be able to clarify an aspect of the religious phenomenon. The definition of the latter, accordingly, will be entirely pragmatic, and will embrace belief, rite, and institution that occupy in a group the place that revelation reserves for religion. Furthermore, it is well known how difficult it is to enter into the spirit of an environment in which one has not been reared. Hence it is rash to try to decide too quickly whether this or that conception is closely connected or not with what other religions believe and practice. This kind of judgment and distinction can be made only after long work and study.

Phenomenological Approach

It is possible, it seems, to employ a criterion that is less pragmatic, negative, or exterior, for marking out or defining the object of research. A specific domain may be circumscribed, once that is distinct, e.g., from metaphysics and techniques, by a characteristic aspect inherent in all that is religious in the broadest sense of the term and that is proper to itself. This is the concept of "the sacred."

The Sacred. The SACRED is opposed to the profane. Although the majority of primitive and ancient peoples never separated the two domains in their interpretations and usages, they distinguished them sharply enough by their different psychological reactions. The sacred, as distinct from the profane, represents an order of reality, the presence of which commands man's attention and at the same time escapes him; it is simultaneously desired and regarded with awe. In other words, it possesses an essentially ambivalent character, which makes man feel at once irresistibly attracted by its grandeur and frightened by its superiority.

This double character of the sacred, which R. Otto called fascinans and tremendum, is one of the keys to the discovery and interpretation of religious phenomena. But research becomes science only from the moment it occupies itself with putting order into the material collected and when it succeeds, by comparison and distinction, in producing a classification. It is then necessary to select from the categories obtained that which should be called religion. The discussions that have agitated the science of religion for more than a century demonstrate clearly that all that was believed "to take the place of religion" cannot be included in its essence and its history. Many essential facts of history have changed category as progress has been made in understanding.

Religion and Magic. One of the facts to emerge clearly from the constant revision of ideas mentioned is this: two kinds of phenomena exist that can indeed occupy the place of religion but that assume conceptions of the world and of the position of man that are diametrically opposed, namely, religion and MAGIC. The fact that so many theories have been advanced to explain the hypothetical passage of one to the other by an evolutionary process and the fact also that the civilizations that claim to include magical practices in religion had to invent myths to explain this inconsistency show that both science and religions perceive an essential difference between religion and magic.

The opposition between them is clearly evident from both their respective conceptions of the order of the world and of man's attitude in this world. Magic believes in an ensemble of automatic forces that gives the man who knows their techniques an unconditional efficacy or power independent of every other will except his own. Religion, on the other hand, acknowledges a universe that always remains, and one in which man always remains, dependent on a good will that is absolutely beyond the reach or power of techniques effective in themselves. Even if man, in order to reconcile the two conceptions, claims that he has received his knowledge and power from the divinity, who then loses control over them in such cases, there is an implication that the feeling of an ultimate dependence that one tries to avoid is still present. This distinction made, the inductive work required to determine the constituent elements of religion becomes feasible.

Double Usage of the Term "Religion." The science of religions always studies religion and magic together because their opposition clarifies problems. For the sake of simplification, the two continue to be studied under the one heading, religion, and the specific religion studied is even defined according to the proportion and combination of the two in the theory and practice of its environment. This is the pragmatic usage, the broad sense of the term, and it is so employed in the expression science of religions.

But on a different level of research, science is not merely concerned with each "religion." It tends to make comparisons and then to distinguish and establish constants in order to define religion more precisely as a system of coherent phenomena, distinct from other concurrent phenomena, and in opposition to magic in particular. It is not yet a philosophy of religion but rather a synthesis of historical data. Few peoples have produced a conscious and critical elaboration of these elements. Therefore, it is precisely the function of the science of religions to explain in their name, without misrepresenting them, what they conceive implicitly, namely, the precise content and trends of their religious feeling, which is often complex but coherent in practice—their religion in the strict and exact sense.

Content of Religions

At the outset it is essential to consider a matter of basic importance, namely, the object of religion and the conception of this object.

Object of Religion. Religion is opposed to the anarchy of magic by an attitude of dependence that is felt and accepted within definite limits. This attitude itself, therefore, assumes a certain conception of its object. Investigation shows that this attitude is always directed to a reality superior to man, a reality that is beyond the control of man's will and all the forces of nature. Those who maintain that this reality is merely the projection of the attitude itself emphasize at least that such an attitude and such an object are connected and that man does not have the choice or decision.

This reality belongs to the category of the sacred, with its characteristic ambivalence. But while magic tries, in spite of the fear it provokes, to make itself master of the sacred in order to use its power, religion sees in fear a reason for respect because it sees in the attraction of the sacred a reason for acknowledgment or surrender. This is accepted dependence. The difference, however, is not only in the subjective attitude, but in the object itself, because it is conceived in a different manner.

Specialists in the science of religions believed for some time that there were two successive attitudes in the history of religion. According to this view man first tried to control the sacred by "incantation," and often-repeated failure then forced him to resign himself to "invocation." This is the theory of "From Spell to Prayer," according to the formula of R. R. Marset (1866–1943). A knowledge of the facts, which was less distorted by evolutionary theory, then suggested that man in all periods felt inclined to try one method or the other—a procedure that is closer to the historical and psychological truth. But invocation, PRAYER—the religious act par excellence—assumes that the sacred is conceived as having ears for hearing, a heart for understanding, and a freedom to reply—in brief, that the sacred is regarded as a person. Furthermore, it may be noted in passing that an act such as prayer implies that man by his reason did not merely construct an object of thought as a logical response to a question on existence, a first principle. It was necessary also that, in some manner, he should "feel" it as living, for otherwise, he would not have prayed to it. As U. von Wilamowitz-Moellendorff (1848–1931) once said, "Zu einem Begriff betet kein Mensch" (No man prays to a concept).

Vagueness in the Concept of Divinity. It must be kept in mind, however, that religion finds expression not only in prayer but also in sacrifice, purifications, and consecrations, whose mechanism of efficacy and objective presuppositions are much more ambiguous than in the case of prayer. They can leave the personal character of the divine very vague. Likewise, the much Divine (Θεῖον), the One, the Logos, the Brahman, etc., may well inspire a strong feeling of complete dependence; but all these seem to be limited to the representation of a transcendent order that is hardly favorable to dialogue, but an order that men seek to recognize and to venerate by a strict submission.

In this case, however, one notes quickly a discord between speculative conceptions and the religious attitude in which the personal representation unflinchingly reappears. Whether this situation results from psychological need or is due to the power of religious experience is not clear. Yet this Absolute, the alleged impersonal divine force, is prayed to in moving fashion by the Sioux as Wakonda, by the emperor of China as Heaven, or by the Stoic Cleanthes as Zeus. Perhaps this inconsistency exists only for modern Westerners, who find difficulty in thinking of the personal except in anthropomorphic terms. More deeply, however, it is perhaps the religious sense itself that perceives that this lofty Reality is so different from all other human experiences that it cannot be included in any of the contradictory categories of Western thought. On the other hand, the knowledge that man has of this Reality is so closely connected with the immensity of the universe and its order—impressive even for a primitive in his own little universe—with this All that is at once calm and agitated, that man, as the whole history of religions bears witness, is led to hesitate constantly between the personal and the impersonal, looking now at the one and now at the other according to the circumstances in which he believes that he encounters, or desires to approach, the one or the other. The religious sense itself influences him to respect what he knows of the nature of the sacred reality without imposing his own ideas upon it. Nevertheless, a historical description of the manner in which men conceive the object of their acts of submission and homage cannot assume a rigorous and exclusive precision. In any case, the inclusion of a strict notion of person would limit to an extreme degree the range of a historical definition of the object of religion. On the other hand, the personal aspect always makes itself felt.

Transcendence and Unicity of the Object of Religion.

The same ambiguity marks the question of the transcendence and unicity of the object of religion. These are two interdependent aspects, and in their regard the majority of religions are uniformly vague. Just as very few cultures are concerned about the absolute origin of the universe, although they consider it vitally important to fit man into the totality of the universe that actually exists, so also, like the ancient philosophers, they are much more conscious of the sovereignty of divinity than of the need of defining its internal nature. The chief preoccupation of religions that are not strictly and aggressively monotheistic is the multiplicity of the elements or relations that mark man's dependence. Concrete expression is given to these relations under the form of spirits or gods.

At first sight it would seem rather easy to oppose polytheism and monotheism. But when one begins to interpret images and names, this opposition between the one and the many frequently eludes precise analysis. The Great Gods of many African peoples can bear collective names and not belong to the grammatical class of animate beings, and yet they are treated as persons. Similarly, in the most highly developed religions of the Greco-Roman world and the ancient East there is a constant intermingling of notions of many individual gods and of unique divinity. One gets the impression that the sovereignty of the gods, which is their essential prerogative, is a collegiate sovereignty, with or without hierarchy, in which each god is absolute ruler of a part of reality, and all the gods together are absolute Master of the universe in its totality. In worship each god, when he is invoked, seems to be regarded as the momentary expression of all divinity (Kathenotheism), and in popular piety one god is in practice given a place above all others as the equivalent of all (HENOTHEISM). Accordingly, many ethnologists in dealing with very primitive peoples do not hesitate to state that some of their gods appear as "hypostases" of the cosmic God, as a remote foundation or beginning from which they do not separate themselves completely. Perhaps a total manifestation of Divinity, always identical with itself, is beyond the range of human experience. In fact, the knowledge of the divine that men have is always acquired through perception in depth of particular aspects of the universe. Hence the TRANSCENDENCE of the divine is never perceived except through its immanent manifestations.

Philosophy is primarily concerned with examining thoroughly and describing precisely each and every aspect of experience. Religion, on the other hand, is concerned essentially with taking a thing just as it thinks that it perceives it, and it adopts practical behavior to it in accordance with this perception. But even the ancient philosophers, although deliberately remaining very close to myth, which among ancient peoples gave expression to constructions of reality actually experienced, were always tempted by the idea that impersonality and indeterminateness were characteristic of transcendence, while its manifestations in the universe could only be limited and therefore multiple.

On the basis of historical investigation, apart from revelation, it must be concluded as very probable that transcendence and a certain unicity are consciously present even when a multiplicity of gods is recognized and that, in spite of its various manifestations in the universe, divinity remains entirely other and, above all, sovereign.

It is only as a result of reactions of very complex origin that the monotheistic religions rejected other systems and thus opposed in a consistent and strict manner every tendency that would lead to involvement in cosmic manifestations—especially biological and immanent manifestations—of the absolute Reality, transcendent and unique, and regarded before all as sovereign.

Attitudes. It is easy to see that the manner in which religion is conceived determines man's attitude toward it. As a matter of fact there is necessarily a reciprocal reaction between religious representations and attitudes, and scientific observation can hardly do more than note a complex ensemble in which it is difficult to distinguish what is tendency or trend and what is experience. But to suppose that everything in religion is merely a subjective projection is an opinion that is not based on science but reflects rather philosophical criticism. On the contrary, the fact that the divine is represented as personal, endowed with consciousness, freedom, and initiative, seems to indicate clearly that men feel themselves really at grips with objective forces of a spiritual character: religiously minded men have thought even that God is not so much the object of religion as its subject, the active agent who determines even man's own initiative. In revealing Himself in a certain manner, He actually directs even man's reaction. It is very likely for this reason that in religions that are strictly theistic there is recourse also to divination in order to know exactly in a given case what the Divinity expects of man or will, on His side, accept.

Submission to a person considered as superior and free necessarily includes respect in the state of dependence. But some pagans have gone even further. Sometimes they give feminine titles to God without, however, making him a mother goddess. But the great majority of those who believe in a Sky God, i.e., the most transcendent form of the divine, call him Father. This name, however, does not allude to creation or to any kind of filiation but rather to the nature of his general comportment toward man and that of man toward him. Again, fear can be dominant when the transcendence of the divine is associated with cosmic manifestations like the great calmness of the sky and its violent storms. Yet one should not forget that a terrible mother goddess, such as the Hindu goddess Kali, is at the same time a beloved mother. Reasoning is certainly not the determining factor in such cases, but rather man's experience in his daily life in the world. At a lower level, yet very close to the one just mentioned, God can be conceived in a manner little different from the spirits of nature, those manifestations of multiple and contradictory forces that are anthropopathic, i.e., having the same feelings or passions as man. In this case even respect disappears, and transcendence is reduced to a low level. Magic can take the upper hand.

These last phenomena mark the limit of religious facts and go even beyond it. If there were not other nuances and other conceptions, which come into play at the same time, it would no longer be possible in these instances to speak of religion in the strict sense of the term.

Expression by Religious Rites. An interior attitude, especially if it is felt with at least some intensity, is expressed normally by gestures, words, or actions. These manifestations should be the starting point for the observer who wishes to study the spiritual content of religions. At any rate, they are of prime importance for verifying the affirmations obtained by questions, discussions, or literary speculations in which the presence of the stranger and the judgments that are unconsciously suggested by his attitudes exercise a marked influence on the spontaneity and sincerity of statements made.

It is well established that there are no civilizations without religious rites. These rites may be reduced to the minimum, even to the point that many inexperienced observers do not perceive them, especially if they are spontaneous, and have little that is formalistic or ceremonial about them. Such is the case in the majority of the religions of the primitives with regard to the Supreme Heavenly Being.

Prayer. Prayers are found everywhere and range from spontaneous invocations without fixed formulas to hymns of literary character, which cannot always be successfully distinguished from incantations. They are addressed to all entities that a religion conceives as representing the divine in any manner. They relate to all needs and desires and may include moral and spiritual values. Even among the pagans, and perhaps especially among the primitives, there are prayers stressing social justice, individual virtues, and unity.

Sacrifice. But the rite that is most significant and at the same time most difficult to analyze is sacrifice. The term is often employed to designate rites that are very dissimilar and ambiguous. But in such a phenomenon, since it is a human act, what ought to be decisive respecting a definition is the interior attitude of the subject and then, indirectly, the nature of the Being to which appeal is made. The sovereign gods only, either alone or on a sharing basis, are objects of sacrifices. These sacrifices are direct offshoots of the primitive offerings of first fruits of the chase or gathering. Accordingly, they are acts whereby man deprives himself of his goods in order to recognize by so doing the absolute rights of divinity over his property and over himself. But when excessive anthropomorphism enters into the representation of the divine or when the destruction of goods is made to satisfy inferior beings, eventually there is no longer any idea of true sacrifice. There is then a question rather of gifts that are sent on their way by death or fire to the world of spirits. Between these two extremes all ambiguities are possible. If the same word is applied to all cases in which there is destruction of property or offering, it loses all precise meaning and designates an aspect that is merely exterior and material. Hence it is necessary to distinguish sacrifices, offerings, gifts, presents, contracts (do ut des), magic, blackmail, etc.

Passage Rites. Another rich category of rites comes from the ambivalence of the sacred, namely, passage rites, i.e., purifications, consecrations, and other precautions that are intended to protect the man who approaches the sacred or who leaves the domain of the sacred to return to the profane world. In this case, especially, it is difficult to draw the line between religion and magic because the interested parties themselves do not try to define precisely their interior attitude. This is the situation particularly respecting “confessions,” “taboos,” or interdicts, the meaning of which depends entirely on the circumstances and on the mentality of the milieu.

Feasts and Ceremonies. Finally, the extremely important category of rites, or rather of cycles of rites, namely, that of feasts and ceremonies, is difficult to classify as religious in the strict sense. But these rites must be studied carefully if one wishes to get a precise idea of the religious phenomenon. They are passage-rites in one of their aspects, but the passage in question is no longer that from the sacred to the profane or vice versa. They celebrate and effect rather the passage of an individual or of a group, or of all nature, from one state to another—age, religious or social function, or season. Their internal structure leads scholars to classify them more and more as mystery rites because of the parallel with the Hellenistic mysteries. From the religious point of view it is to be noted that these rites disregard, but do not exclude, the idea of homage or invocation to a divinity. On the other hand, they express a deep and strongly felt submission to a superior cosmic order, which is often characterized by greater intensity than submission to God. Their function is to subject all growth in man and nature to a process of total renewal of being. This process is carried out ordinarily under the form of various symbols of death and rebirth. The complete acceptance of the conditions of human existence exhibits subjectively all the characteristics of the religious attitude. But, objectively, these rites are marked by the absence of the worship of divinity, for the sovereign will and intervention of divinity are not evoked. The “gods,” if mentioned at all, are only models who were the first themselves to experience the operation of the cosmic law of renewal.

These rites, despite their aspect of dependence, are easily exposed to magic interpretations and deformations, which are all the more dangerous because they corrupt a highly spiritual element. Their danger is inherent in the fact that the universal structure to which man recognizes that he belongs and to which he wishes to be closely joined is not explicitly represented as an order willed by God. On the other hand, it seems that religious life can gain in depth only where, as in Christianity, the mystical rite is an integral part of the worship of God. There is then no longer question of mysteries but of sacraments.

Mythology. A separate place must be given to mythology. At the outset it is necessary to understand “myth” in the correct sense that has only recently become clear. MYTH is the normal form for expressing the content of religion before the elaboration of philosophical definitions, and even side by side with them. Myth is also rite. It cannot be said that a myth is always the explanation of a rite or that every rite postulates a myth. The recitation itself of the myth is a rite, as is shown by the conditions required for communicating it: secrecy, night, ceremonies, etc. The myth seeks to give expression to religious experience without separating it from the concrete elements of that experience. To maintain this connection is properly the function of symbols. Only the myth projects this experience beyond actual and profane time in order to emphasize the absolute value attributable to it.

Religion in Relation to the Individual and Society

After the explanation of the objective elements (representations) and subjective elements (attitudes) of religion, which are both expressed by exterior acts (rites), it must now be emphasized that because of the importance of the social factor in the life of men, especially in the realm of expression, religions necessarily have a social aspect. The significance of the social expression of religion is brought out by the latest classification of types of religion into tribal, national, and universal. The first two types show clearly that the religious experience of individuals, which is the basis of all religious life, becomes a religion, i.e., an institution that leaves a trace in history, only if other individuals participate in it. This participation is the guarantee and necessary sanction of the objectivity and authenticity of the private experience. In the two types mentioned the collectivity whose sanction is decisive is the natural collectivity (cultural or political) whose exclusive solidarity encompasses strictly the life of the individuals concerned.

But the need of collective sanction, even outside the revealed religions, is much more evident in the universal religions that rise in some way on the ruins of the natural collectivities whose authority has been shattered by the contact and mingling of cultures. Religious experience and its exigencies remain, but they seek their collective guarantee in a collective organization proper, founded on the one religion only, and with its specialized officers.

Priesthood. Priesthood, however, is earlier than the universal religions. It is not found, it is true, at the tribal stage, at which there are specialists for the efficacious rites of magic and ANIMISM, while the relation with the supreme divinity remains the prerogative of tribal members, each acting for himself and for the natural groups for which he is responsible. Priesthood appears first in the national religions as a specialization of all religions functions, after the manner of specialization of political functions. Just as the nation develops out of the political centralization occasioned by foreign aggression or by the initiative of individuals who, in order to assure their domination over their group and neighboring groups, make use of a power that was acknowledged in their case as needed for the protection of tribal territory, so this new unity embraces generally a nonhomogeneous collection of cultural groups that had traditionally been independent.

This new situation calls for a religious justification in accordance with the mentality of tribal cultures. Political power, which is of profane origin, seeks an alliance with the natural representatives of these groups. These representatives are stripped of their political functions, but by way of compensation they are invested, in the name of these groups, with the specialized religious function. A universal reflex is to be noted in ancient civilizations in this respect: a religious solidarity is reestablished when the cultural solidarity is destroyed. At the tribal stage secret societies then have their birth. At the national stage, the sacerdotal function comes into being. In the universal religions the priesthood becomes completely independent, at least in essence, of the political power, and vice versa. Even in these religions, however, some mutual understandings are necessary and are deliberately sought in order to take into account the religious mentality of the masses and to regulate the conflicts of authority and interest between specialists.

Prophetism. Yet in this evolution of the sociology of religions toward specialization of functions, reactions in an opposite direction are not lacking. On the religious plane prophetism makes its appearance, and its characteristic note is universality. PROPHECISM may be described as a protest of the individual conscience against the excesses of specialization. The PROPHET himself, however, needs collective sanction. If he gets it within his own group, he becomes a reformer; if not, he will become the founder of a new religion more independent of the cultural or political structures of his milieu.

But in this connection it is necessary to correct the sociological classification of religions since the term “universal religion” is ambiguous. In fact, universality is inherent in genuine religious experience. Hence, even in the most primitive religions, as soon as they give an important place to the personal Sky God, universality is present, since they consider, often in a touching manner, that their cult is necessary for the maintenance of the whole universe, including other religions and cultures. This kind of thinking, however, does not limit itself to the creation of a single universal religion, but it continues to regard every religion as charged with a function in the whole. It has a prophetic tendency, but this confines itself to stressing the necessity of individual religious experience by visions (Native North Americans) or by ecstasy (shamanism; see SHAMAN AND MEDICINE MAN).

The prophet is not only universal in his outlook but tends to pass beyond the national religion into a single universal religion by the deepening of his experience in respect to the transcendent Creator or Sky God. Such a universal religion is opposed to the utilitarian or egoistic preoccupations of the specialists or of societies closed in upon themselves.

Morality. The problem of the relations between religion and morality must be situated in a similar perspective (see RELIGION AND MORALITY). If morality is identified with fidelity to the individual conscience to the point of excluding all collective sanctions and all objective norms, one may be tempted to consider tribal or national religions as completely amoral. Correspondingly, universal religions will be relegated to the domain of strictly private life. But if it is considered that tribal and national religions arise in groups in which the individual feels that he is truly himself, both in security and defined by function only in the perfect solidarity of the group, it follows that the group’s religion and its morality are completely identified. The one expresses and effects the desired integration of the individual into the human group; and the other, his integration and that of the group into the universe. Man and society regard themselves as members of this universe. It should be noted, furthermore, that the individual desires this integration intensely, for it gives him a meaning. And this integration is not purely passive or impersonal, since even in the most strictly clannish religions the protest of the individual expresses itself in his belief—so surprising to the ethnologist—in the “distant god,” who is invoked in precise terms as a recourse against the community that has become unjust. There is no effective revolt but solely an appeal to the transcendent witness because the experience of life teaches daily the necessary reality and practical primacy of group solidarity.

On the other hand, if it is true that the apparent history of human societies is that of a “progressive laicization,” there are grounds for questioning the rationalistic optimism of the 19th century and for observing, furthermore, that the so-called rational system of morality influences consciences only to the extent that they are sustained, however unknowingly, by religious values still widespread in the milieu that follows it. Such a system of morality collapses as soon as individuals change their milieu without taking their religion with them, just as every detribalized individual finds himself without moorings and lost.

Salvation. The sociological classification of religions and the corrections required have been covered sufficiently. It is necessary to pass to other distinctions that, strictly, concern aspects only of religions. These aspects are wrongly regarded as being capable in themselves of defining a religion, such as monotheism, polytheism, and animism. They are only ingredients, however, the combination of which characterizes each particular religion. Yet there is one aspect that appears to be more specific, namely, the idea of salvation. Some think that every religion is a salvation religion, while others hold that only universal religions can be salvation religions. The former, however, can find the idea of salvation in all religions only on condition that they recognize that, in tribal religions in particular, the idea of salvation is entirely implicit. The tribal religions do not have a pessimistic metaphysics that would teach the necessity of a savior since they propose and effect a perfect integration of individuals into their group and into their universe, in order that they may participate in their values, without separating the sacred and the profane. The attitude of these religions is not one of preoccupation with saving or transforming their world but of maintaining it, and themselves with it, by adhering scrupulously to its actual structures.

It is to be emphasized that Christianity does not belong in either category. It is not solely a religion of salvation, but a religion of redemption.

Origin and Evolution of Religion

The analysis presented above has eventually led to the question—at least in simplified form—of the origin and historical variations in religion. Since the prehistoric documentation is obviously inadequate by its very nature, it is necessary to employ ethnological comparisons as much as possible to clarify origins. It may be stated without qualification that no culture, however primitive and backward, has been found that does not have ideas on divinity, spirits, human survival, and supernatural forces, along with corresponding rites. The problem of religion seems indeed to be identical with the problem of man (hominization).

The whole evolution of religion seems to be summed up in a diversification of syntheses and proportions of the same universal elements. Apart from a few notable exceptions, a certain parallelism is evident between the inordinate development, on the one hand, of magic, animism, fertility rites, and finally, polytheism, and on the other, the cultural changes that have produced civilizations that became more and more complex in their economic and political techniques. The great civilizations belong to general history rather than to the history of religions since they, in particular, have only developed further a political and philosophical heritage that was constituted in its entirety before history. Revealed religions alone pose specific problems, since they constitute conscious reactions against the tendencies of evolution. The Bible, and to some extent Zarathushtra, go very definitely against the trend of their contemporary milieus. All else that can be said on these subjects falls in the sphere of philosophy and theology, and not in that of sciences such as anthropology and sociology.

See Also: RELIGION (IN PRIMITIVE CULTURE); RELIGION, PHILOSOPHY OF; RELIGION, SOCIOLOGY OF.

Bibliography: General works. H. PINARD DE LA BOULLAYE, L'Étude comparée des religions, 3 v. (3d ed. Paris 1931). G. MENSCHING, et al., Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 5:961–975, 986–991, with good bibliog. F. KÖNIG, ed., Religionswissenschaftliches Wörterbuch (Freiburg 1956). F. KÖNIG, ed., Christus und die Religionen der Erde: Handbuch der Religionsgeschichte, 3 v. (2d ed. Vienna 1961). P. TACCHI VENTURI, Storia delle religioni, 2 v. (4th ed. Turin 1954). M. BRILLIANT and R. AIGRAIN, eds., Histoire des religions, 5 v. (Paris 1953–56). F. HEILER, Erscheinungsformen und Wesen der Religion (Stuttgart 1961). A. BRUNNER, Die Religion (Freiburg 1956). M. ELIADE, Patterns in Comparative Religion, tr. R. SHEED (New York 1958). M. ELIADE and J. KITAGAWA, eds., The History of Religions: Essays in Methodology (Chicago 1959). J. WACH, The Comparative Study of Religions (New York 1958). P. SCHEBESTA, Der Ursprung der Religion (Berlin 1961). W. SCHMIDT, Der Ursprung der Gottesidee, 12 v. (Münster), v. 1 (2d ed. 1926), v. 2–12 (1925–55). Special works. R. CAILLOIS, L'Homme et le Sacré (2d ed. Paris 1953). B. HÄRING, Das Heilige und das Gute (Freiburg 1950). M. ELIADE, The Sacred and the Profane, tr. from Fr. W. R. TRASK (New York 1959); Myths, Dreams, and Mysteries, tr. from Fr. P. MAIRET (New York 1960); Birth and Rebirth, tr. from Fr. W. R. TRASK (New York 1958). R. OTTO, The Idea of the Holy, tr. J. W. HARVEY (2d ed. New York 1958). R. ALLIER, Magie et religion (Paris 1935). C. H. RATSCHOW, Magie und Religion (2d ed. Gütersloh 1955). T. OHM, Die Liebe zu Gott in den nichtchristlichen Religionen (Krailling, Ger. 1951). A. KIRCHGÄSSNER, Die mächtigen Zeichen: Ursprünge, Formen und Gesetze des Kultes (Freiburg 1959). B. MALINOWSKI, Magic, Science and Religion (New York 1955). R. WILL, Le Culte, 3 v. (Paris 1925–35). F. HEILER, Das Gebet: Eine religionsgeschichtliche und religionspsychologische Untersuchung (5th ed. Munich 1923). A. VORBICHLER, Das Opfer auf den uns heute noch erreichbaren ältesten Stufen der Menschheitsgeschichte (Mödling 1956). A. E. JENSEN, Myth and Cult among Primitive Peoples, tr. M. T. HOLDIN and W. WEISSLEDER (Chicago 1963). J. DE VRIES, Forschungsgeschichte der Mythologie (Freiburg 1961). P. RADIN, The World of Primitive Man (New York 1960).

[J. GOETZ]

RELIGION (IN PRIMITIVE CULTURE)

Investigations in cultural anthropology and the comparative study of RELIGION have led scholars to advance numerous and varied theories to account for the origins and universality of religious phenomena in human societies. This article presents a brief review of the main trends in the development of these theories and a consideration of some of the principal religious ideas and practices found in primitive societies.

Theoretical Interpretations

Mid-20th-century investigations of religion in pre-literate or barely literate societies reveal a renewed emphasis on the nature and meaning, rather than on the origin and social function, of religion. Interpretative studies of religious SYMBOLISM, MYTH AND MYTHOLOGY, ritual, SACRAMENTS, and SACRIFICE, made by reputable anthropologists, have appeared with increasing frequency. This shift in emphasis can be explained partly in terms of the sociology of knowledge and partly as reflecting a growing realization of the inadequacy of theoretical frameworks once considered as established.

Evolutionist Hypothesis. Many early students of primitive religion were savants belonging to the 19th-century European middle class, from whose perspective the socioeconomic history of mankind appeared to be a triumphal march toward ever-greater material prosperity and rational enlightenment. It was natural for them to regard Charles DARWIN and T. H. Huxley as their major prophets and to view the history of thought as an evolutionary process of emancipation from magical and religious categories, through those of increasing philosophical refinement, to unchallenged scientific RATIONALISM.

Tylor. Sir Edward Tylor, for example, in Primitive Culture (2 v. London 1871) held that religion began with universal belief in ghosts and spirits (animism) and that by degrees men arrived at the notion of one universal Spirit animating all things. Tylor's scheme left no room for revelation but only for progressive generalization as human society embraced ever-wider social aggregates.

Frazer. Sir James George Frazer, in the manner although not with the matter of his positivist predecessor

Auguste COMTE, claimed in The Golden Bough (2 v. London 1890) that mankind had passed through three broad intellectual stages: MAGIC, religion, and SCIENCE. According to Frazer the earliest men thought that by magical procedures, imitating natural processes or utilizing the "law of sympathy," they could compel events to comply with their desires. It was when such procedures did not work that they invented religion. They conceived religion not as the manipulation of impersonal supernatural powers immanent in phenomena but as the supplication of supernatural persons. Spell became prayer, and the kill became the sacrifice. Religion explained more cogently than magic why its practices sometimes failed to bring about the desired results. Since deities and spirits were persons, they possessed the attributes of persons; they had likes and dislikes toward mortals, they could give or withhold favors at will. Ethically, Frazer argued, religion was on a higher level than magic, since the success or failure of a prayer might hinge on the moral state of the petitioner. Nevertheless, religion also failed men, since their attempts to persuade the divine beings to give them benefits were frequently uncertain in their outcome. Finally, the vanguard of mankind, having learned all too slowly from past errors, had discovered the scientific method, which gave understanding of the real causes of events, by which the events could be controlled. Religion for Frazer, like the state for Marx, was to wither away in the sun of this scientific enlightenment. This was a doctrine that scientists of Frazer's time found flattering.

Freud and Durkheim. In the early 20th century scientific humanists such as Sigmund FREUD and Émile DURKHEIM continued to speculate about the origin and evolution of religion. Freud's etiological myth is well known. He derived religion (and even culture) from the dominance of the father in a postulated primordial horde and from remorse (commemorated in sacramental rituals of many types) when the father was murdered, out of sexual jealousy, by the young males. This was the origin of the Oedipus complex and of all subsequent religious development. Durkheim found in TOTEMISM of the Australian aboriginal variety "the earliest form" of religion. The animal eaten by the totemic group was in his view the master symbol of that group itself. Through its consumption each member of the group partook of its unifying power, and all became "members of one another" instead of a mere assemblage of separate individuals. For Durkheim totemism was a stage of social evolution through which all more advanced societies had passed. Successive religious refinements, such as animism, polytheism, and monotheism, were but modalities of the totemic principle: all man's gods are but man-created symbols of society itself.

All these theories, and others too numerous to mention, had one common feature: they treated religion as an illusion that originated in “the childhood of the race” and passed through successive stages until men had either outgrown it completely or so tinged it with philosophical and ethical elements as to make it a “religion of humanity” divested of its supernatural “errors.”

Functionalist Hypothesis. Scientific cultural evolutionism—which was inconsistent with the Marxist view that “force is the midwife of progress”—received a sharp setback in the West as a result of World War I and its consequences. It recovered somewhat in the materialistic evangelism of Leslie White and his school of American neoevolutionists. But the millions of dead and the mutual barbarities wrought by “civilized” men in the war made progress appear less inevitable than the earlier Darwinians had supposed.

Practical Interest in Cultural Anthropology. It became apparent that change was not always “progressive” but might lead to anarchy and anomie. Those Western nations especially that governed large impoverished colonial populations became concerned to maintain their stability rather than encourage radical changes that might have a violent outcome. Great Britain, in particular, developed the notion of “indirect rule” in its overseas territories, whereby a share of political and judicial authority was delegated to indigenous leaders, to chiefs, headmen, and religious functionaries. In order to rule through these authorities it became necessary to understand to some extent the structure of the social systems in which they operated. Consequently some encouragement was given to anthropological research.

Interdependence of Religion and Society. Anthropologists came to see their task as “exhibiting the systematic interconnections” in the social relationships and social institutions found in the tribal societies at any given time. Emphasis was laid on the “social function” of a given institution in contributing to the “cohesion” of the total system. Students of primitive religion sharing this bias, such as Bronislaw Malinowski and A. R. Radcliffe-Brown, saw religion, especially in its ritual aspect, as what has been described as “a sort of all-purpose social glue,” for cementing together fractured social relationships or for binding together different types of institutions. In the Trobriand Islands of the western Pacific Malinowski endeavored to show how magical ritual served to coordinate and regulate cooperative human behavior in a variety of hazardous and uncertain social and economic undertakings, such as open-sea fishing, agriculture, and overseas trading expeditions. Radcliffe-Brown argued that ritual expresses in its symbolism certain values, upon the acceptance of which the proper functioning of society depends.

Functionalist analyses stressed the close interdependence of society and religion, the latter being regarded as a kind of servomechanism to the former. The question asked was always: what is the “function” of a given religious belief, or ritual performance, or myth in the maintenance of “social solidarity”? In such an intellectual climate it was not considered “meaningful” to inquire about the meaning but only about the function of such phenomena. Differences between religions, as expressed in doctrine, symbolism, and liturgical forms, were reduced to the single functional requirement that “religion makes for social cohesion (or social solidarity).”

“Meaning” Versus “Function.” Anthropologists have begun to concede a greater degree of autonomy, and even validity, to religious systems. This has been due partly to the study of religion in pluralistic and changing societies, in which its function in maintaining social solidarity is by no means so obvious as in isolated traditional communities. The proliferation of new sects, the rise of millenarian movements, the persistence of religious forms in groups undergoing rapid changes in social structure—all these have underlined the need for a new approach based on a consideration of what is meant by religious beliefs and symbols. The work of such philosophers and sociologists as A. N. WHITEHEAD, Ernst CASIRER, Suzanne Langer, and P. A. Sorokin in the field of symbolism, and the anthropological field studies of E. E. Evans-Pritchard, Godfrey Lienhardt, and Clifford Geertz have been crucial in restoring to its former prominence the notion that “ritual is a language for saying things which are felt to be true and important but which are not susceptible of statement in scientific terms” [J. Beattie, Other Cultures (London 1964) 239].

Religion in Multifunctional Communities

The preoccupation of earlier scholars with functional aspects of religion may well be attributable to certain features of social organization in small-scale communities living close to the margin of bare subsistence and possessed of only limited technological equipment. The major types of human purposive activities that are broadly classified as religious, political, legal, economic, etc., in preliterate societies are hardly specialized as separate associational structures (each with its appropriate sets of beliefs, aims, concepts, techniques, and procedures) but remain, as it were, embedded in the total community.

Multiplex Character of Social Relations. Social relationships in such communities tend to be multiplex, i.e., each serves a plurality of interests at the same time. Thus an elder may be at once head of a lineage (in the kinship system), headman of a village (in the politicojurial system), overseer of the village’s productive and distributive activities (in the economic system), and priest of the ancestral cult (in the religious system). These aspects of life overlap, interpenetrate, and concern the same persons. Thus all types of activities are saturated, as it were, with religious and moral implications, at any rate more fully than in modern societies characterized by a complex division of labor, in which social relationships, increasingly associational in type, tend to serve single interests. Objective comparative study of religious systems indicates that a major note of religious belief and practice is the achievement of what might be called subliminal unity. This type of unity is quite distinct from the reconciliation of interests, rational and utilitarian, that may be brought about by legal, political, or economic institutions. It relates rather to the establishment, through prayer, liturgical action, sacrifice, communion rites, and the use of symbolism, of a state of rapport or corporate solidarity between Deity or Spirit (whether singular or conceived of as a unanimous group) and a congregation-in-worship, on the one hand, and between the individual members of that congregation, on the other. When the congregation is identical with the kin group, the local community, the polity, and the economic unit, the function of its religious institutions may easily be mistaken for "the promotion or maintenance of social solidarity." Yet it is not the fact of unity but the nature, or quality, or dimension of unity that is in question. At what level of being or experience do the participants in ritual seek to be bound together? What is the meaning, rather than the function, of their joint worship? There are many dimensions of "solidarity," and it is this crucial multiplicity that Durkheim and his followers did not adequately comprehend, or else tried to reduce to the single mysterious essence "the social sui generis."

Varieties of Religious Ideas and Behavior. In multifunctional communities the quintessentially religious tends to be tinted with evaluations, imagery, sentiments, rules, customs, life styles, etc., derived from experience in economic, political, domestic, legal, and other types of situations—in each instance colored by a particular natural, social, and ecological environment. The great catalytic sentence "Render, therefore, to Caesar the things that are Caesar's and to God the things that are God's" (Mk 12.17) is not heard so as to be understood in such communities. God, or the gods, are translated into Caesarean terms and take on the attributes of power figures in political, domestic, economic, and legal situations where the utilitarian interests of the group and its component individuals tend to be paramount. Nevertheless, as even such an agnostic humanist as Paul Radin has often pointed out, it is possible to discern in very many "primitive" religions traces of mystical and philosophical thought that appear to be unalloyed by Caesarean considerations, as in cases of prayers and myths of a monotheistic cast set in polytheistic religious contexts.

In societies with a low degree of technological development and division of labor, with multiplex social relationships, with total personal involvement in almost every relationship, and in which kinship is an irreducible principle of social organization, it is perhaps not surprising to find close interdependencies between the system of religious beliefs and practices and other cultural systems. It should also occasion little astonishment that the powers of nature and of human and animal disease should figure predominantly in religion. With poor technological control over the environment and inadequate knowledge of empirical causation, everyday existence is surrounded by unpredictable and menacing hazards that cannot be effectively dealt with or curbed. Such perils appear to be autonomous entities and are conceived of as arbitrary and capricious personalities. The tendency to personify natural powers may well be connected with the personal character of multiplex social relations, whereas the tendency to spiritualize almost every force that can affect human beings may be linked with man's inability to bring practical resources to bear against them. Spiritual personalities may be coped with by entreaty, sacrifices, and the symbolic activities of ritual, where forces known to be impersonal and uncontrollable would evoke only despair and helplessness.

Cults of the Dead. There are manifold varieties of what Tylor called ANIMISM (to which he assigned a pivotal position in his treatment of the origin of religion; his "minimal definition" of religion was indeed "a belief in spiritual beings"). These varieties may be reduced to two main categories: beliefs about the spirits of the dead and beliefs about nature spirits (including those of disease). Cults of the dead take many forms but, again, may be broadly regarded as falling under two heads: ghost placation and ancestor veneration. In the former the spirits of the dead are regarded as inimical ghosts who bring illness or other misfortune on the living. Such spirits are not thought of as genealogically interlinked with the living but as the supernatural residues of powerful, rich, or important individuals. What is left after death is not usually the humane aspect of personality but the individual's accumulated grudges against the living. The aim of ritual in this case is to detach the living victim from his dead persecutor by propitiation or exorcism.

In many societies in Africa, China, and elsewhere, however, the cults of ANCESTOR WORSHIP are addressed to the congregation's known and named forebears whose links of kinship to the living and to each other are not only remembered but are of structural importance to the living in their daily interactions. Such cults are found especially in societies that attach a high value to unilineal descent as a vertebral principle of social organization. They assign beneficent as well as punitive characteristics to the dead; indeed, when the dead punish it is to remind their living kin to "live well" and morally together. The aim of many rites performed on behalf of ancestral "shades" is to "cause the ancestors to be remembered," as the Ndembu of Zambia phrase it. The importance of commemoration may be structural and jural as well as exemplifying piety. For in such societies lineage ancestors several generations back may constitute indices of the distinct lineage subdivisions of which the community is composed. The segmentation of society into its jural and economic subgroups may thus be validated and sustained by regular performances of ancestral ritual.

Not all societies with strong lineage-organization have ancestral cults, however, while others lacking lineages of any depth venerate their immediate forebears. Examples of the former may be found in the Nuer and Dinka tribes of the Sudan; of the latter, among the Thai-Lao of Thailand. Thus it is by no means inevitable that lineage-based societies should possess ancestral cults, although there is a marked tendency for this to be the case.

The High God. Cults of the dead may coexist with beliefs in a creator spirit, or High God, as in many parts of Africa, e.g., among the Lunda and Luba of the Congo; Ila, Bemba, and Tonga of Zambia; Fon, Nupe, and Ashanti of West Africa; Zulu and Basuto of South Africa. Not infrequently the term for the High God is of wide provenience, cutting across tribal boundaries, e.g., Nzambi and Kalung'a in West Central Africa, Mulungu in East Africa, and Leza in East Central Africa. Sometimes, as among the Interlacustrine Bantu, the ancestors are regarded as intermediaries between their living kin and the High God. Although the Supreme Being is often regarded as "otiose," as having refrained from intervening in the cosmos after having created it, it is sometimes held, as among the Nupe, that He gave men a set of automatically efficacious rituals to set right breaches and disturbances of the moral, social, and natural orders. Even in societies without cults of the dead, including many with crude and presumably very ancient cultures, such as those of the Bushmen of southwest Africa and some Australian aboriginal tribes, research by Wilhelm SCHMIDT, Wilhelm Koppers, and others of the Vienna school has demonstrated fairly conclusively that beliefs in High Gods, if not positive monotheism, are well established.

Polytheism. Polytheism tends to flourish in societies relatively well endowed technologically and especially where the natural habitat is diversified. Each god is associated with a province of nature and may also become the representative of a cluster of ideas and sentiments relating to certain culturally defined aspects of social and psychological life. Or the gods may be connected with man's attempts to control his physical environment. As Raymond Firth has written, "The departmental gods of the Maori are invoked each in his own sphere—the god of the sea for fishing and ocean voyaging, the god of the forests for bird-snaring and canoe-building, the god of agriculture for successful planting and harvests" [Human Types (London 1941) 177]. Often the gods are arrayed in a hierarchy, forming a pantheon. Such a hierarchy may closely replicate in its structure the political structure of the state, as in the case of the Fon of Dahomey, described by M. J. Herskovits and Paul Mercier.

Cults of the dead, ancestral veneration, and polytheistic hierarchies can be shown to be closely interconnected with kinship, political, and economic structures. High Gods, however, whether they are found in association with these religious phenomena or alone, are less easily related to their sociocultural context. Rather they provide protophilosophical explanations of the origins of the cosmos and of mankind. Where there are myths about them such myths attempt to answer the following kinds of question: Why are we here? Where do we come from? For what purpose? Why do we act in this way? Why do we die? Very frequently no formal worship is paid to the High God, no prayers are offered to Him. He remains, as it were, a latent Deus absconditus in a religious system largely conceived and symbolically expressed in a set of analogies with human social and economic orders. Primitive monotheism or the concept of an otiose High God (Deus otiosus) in the background of a system of active lesser deities or ancestral shades or both represents a qualitatively distinct stratum of religious belief. The passive High God foreshadows the active High God of the Judeo-Christian monotheistic tradition.

Syncretism and Revelation in the Ancient East.

These two strands of religious development, the gods of embodied society and the God of faith, remain distinct but interwoven in many religious systems. Their significant separation may best be traced by examination of the religions of ancient MESOPOTAMIA, Asia Minor, Syria, the Iranian plateau, and EGYPT, the seed beds of the ancient civilizations and, indeed, as modern scholarship is coming to realize, of many complex West and East African societies. It was in these areas that the higher living religions first appeared in nuce. In the ancient state systems of Egypt and Mesopotamia the later neolithic emphases on female fertility and, later still, bull symbolism, which probably appeared first in an animistic context, have clearly developed into the worship of mother goddesses and their spouses—universal gods of the sky and fertility in taurine guise.

Syncretist Cults. In Egypt the male solar deity, as the heavenly father of the pharaoh, took precedence over the mother goddess as life giver. This stood, as E. O. James has memorably demonstrated, in marked contrast to the religious beliefs of Mesopotamia, where the mother goddesses were regarded as the actual source of life. In the course of time, as the ancient agricultural civilization spread from southwestern Asia to Egypt, western Europe, and India, the Goddess, the Magna Mater, tended to become an increasingly syncretistic deity, incorporating many local goddesses of maternity and fertility. For example, Isis, the "goddess of many names," became the most popular of Egyptian deities in the Hellenistic period and was identified with the allied foreign goddesses, Sylene and Io, Demeter, Aphrodite, and Pelagia (see ISIS AND OSIRIS). In the Roman Empire her worship spread everywhere until she lost her original Egyptian character. Other composite deities of that period in the Near East included a virile Young God, regarded as both the son and husband of the Goddess, who united in a single figure the properties of what were once local gods, such as Baal, Adonis, Tammuz, Hadad, Aleyan, and El. He combined the attributes of a storm god, a weather god, a bestower of fecundity, a vegetation deity, a sky god, and a sun god. These syncretistic cults of Goddess and Young God, paired or separate, were associated with much ritual license, goaded by such sensory stimuli as frenzied dancing, wild music, and sexual symbolism, in the hope of obtaining communion with the source of life and vitality in a condition of ecstatic abandonment and mystical communion. On account of their disorderly character such rites were frequently condemned officially in the Greco-Roman world, although they had such deeply entrenched popular support that during the Roman imperial period the cult of the Goddess, in a rather more decorous and restrained form, compelled state recognition.

Relation to Mundane Order. It has been noted that, in societies with multiplex social relationships, there is a high degree of consistency between mode of subsistence, social and political structure, and religious system. Indeed, one can go a long way in the analysis of a religious system if one accepts Radin's hypothesis that religion is "one of the most important and distinctive means for maintaining life-values." "As these vary," he asserts, "so will the religious unit vary." Among the most prominent "life-values" Radin places the desire for success, for happiness, and for long life. Religion, since it is concerned with maintaining these and the secular institutions that also promote them, is not a thing apart from mundane life nor is it essentially a philosophical inquiry into the nature of being and becoming. "It only emphasizes and preserves those values accepted by the majority of a group at a given time" [Primitive Religion: Its Nature and Origin (New York 1937) 5].

There is evident support for this position in the vast literature on primitive and prehistoric societies, with their rites to ensure the fertility of crops, animals, and men and to maintain the institutions of secular society. The cults of ancient Egypt and Mesopotamia, too, exemplify Radin's hypothesis. James, in his discussion of the Tammuz cultus in Syria, explicitly relates its main features to ecological factors. "Behind the cultures," he writes, "lay the emotional needs of everyday life, created by the environmental conditions, in which rain was the principal necessity in the absence of an effective system of inundation and irrigation as in the Nile Valley. Without an adequate rainfall the land could not give her increase, and the social and religious structure of Mesopotamia and Syria was very largely determined by the need of rain and fertility" [The Ancient Gods (London 1960) 306].

Uniqueness of Judaism. But the external differences between primitive and ancient religions, largely determined by ecological and political conditions, resolve into substantial identity when these religions are compared with JUDAISM. This strongly monotheistic religion stands out in marked contrast to the polytheism and syncretic monolatry of all the other Semitic- and Hamitic-speaking peoples of the ancient East. James has characterized succinctly the contribution made by the Hebrew prophets: "They insisted on a standard of conduct that would satisfy the demands of an ethically righteous God who had shown man what is good, and what is required of him: to do justice and to love mercy and to walk humbly with his God The transcendent majesty of God inspired awe, loyalty and obedience, which introduced a new standard of the good life Moral goodness was a quality that had to be won in conflict with evil, whether evil be interpreted theologically in terms of sin, biologically as an inheritance from man's forebears, human or animal, or sociologically as a result of the demoralization of society and its institutions, beliefs and customs" (ibid. 275). This was not a religion that would change radically with alterations in the economic and social structures with which it would be associated. It was destined to preserve its basic principles and ethical and legal precepts throughout innumerable historical vicissitudes and in a variety of economic and social milieus. It is no mere reflection or expression of the way men organize themselves in the pursuit of "human life-values" but rather the voice of God Himself, speaking to and through His prophets. It is what C. H. Dodd has described as "the entry into history of a reality beyond history" [History and the Gospel (London 1938) 181].

See Also: RELIGION; RELIGION, SOCIOLOGY OF.

Bibliography: J. BEATTIE, Other Cultures: Aims, Methods and Achievements in Social Anthropology (New York 1964). J. M. COOPER, "The Origin and Early History of Religion," Primitive

Man 2 (1929) 33–52. E. DURKHEIM, The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life, tr. J. W. SWAIN (London 1915; repr. Glencoe, IL 1954). M. ELIADE, Patterns in Comparative Religion, tr. R. SHEED (New York 1958). E. E. EVANS-PRITCHARD, Nuer Religion (Oxford 1956). J. G. FRAZER, The Golden Bough, 12 v. (3d ed. London 1911–15). S. FREUD, Totem and Taboo (New York 1918). C. J. GEERTZ, “Ritual and Social Change: A Javanese Example,” American Anthropologist 59 (1957) 32–54. E. O. JAMES, The Ancient Gods (New York 1960). B. MALINOWSKI, Magic, Science and Religion (Boston 1948; repr. New York 1954). A. R. RADCLIFFE-BROWN, “Religion and Society,” Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute 75 (1945) 33–43. P. RADIN, Primitive Religion: Its Nature and Origin (New York 1937). W. SCHMIDT, The Origin and Growth of Religion, tr. H. J. ROSE (2d ed. London 1935). E. B. TYLOR, Primitive Culture, 2 v. (London 1873; New York 1958).

[V. TURNER]

RELIGION, PHILOSOPHY OF

The title of courses taught mainly in non-Catholic colleges and universities, dealing with a variety of topics ranging from the history, sociology, and psychology of religion to problems in epistemology and metaphysics; also, in modern schools of philosophy since the time of Kant, commonly regarded as a branch of philosophy concerned with a critical evaluation and analysis of religion. This article presents a historical survey of the thought of modern philosophers on the subject of religion, and then gives a systematic analysis of the meaning of “philosophy of religion” when used to designate a category of knowledge.

Historical Survey

Immanuel KANT (1724–1804), influenced by the ENLIGHTENMENT and by D. HUME, rejected traditional metaphysics and natural theology as transcending the proper limits of human reason. For traditional metaphysics Kant substituted a metaphysics based on the moral law that exists in the minds of all people. Man’s awareness of the moral law and his duties under it enable him to postulate the existence of God and the immortality of the soul. Thus religion is based on an autonomous ethics; religious faith is a trust in the promises of the moral law. Kant was more or less indifferent to other aspects of religion, e.g., religious practices and dogmas, except as they could be brought within the limits of practical reason and subordinated to ethics. Mysticism received little sympathy, since for him the divine presence exists only in man’s awareness of his freedom and obligations under the moral law.

Post-Kantian Idealism. Following Kant, J. G. FICHTE (1762–1814) also associated religion closely with ethics. Religious faith is faith in a moral order and obedience to the moral law. In The Vocation of Man (1800), Fichte identified the moral world order with the Absolute as infinite will and reason. The religious man is aware that the divine life exists within him; his true and moral vocation is a love for the divine rather than for the finite and sensible. As infinite, God lacks personality—for personality implies finitude. Traditional theism is rejected for a kind of ambiguous pantheism. The more significant contribution of Fichte is his ethical idealism.

F. SCHELLING (1775–1854), although a disciple of Fichte, argued in his Philosophy and Religion (1804) for a personal God revealed to the individual consciousness. Creation was regarded as a kind of cosmic fall away from the Absolute. The end of creation is the historical triumph of good over evil. In history Schelling found an empirical confirmation of a religious philosophy. God reveals himself to man in the history and development of the religious consciousness. Christianity is the culmination of historical religion and mythology, for the truth and aim of mythology is revelation, especially as known through Christ.

F. D. E. SCHLEIERMACHER (1768–1834), a Protestant clergyman and theologian, separated religion radically from ethics and metaphysics. He held that the essence of religion and the basis of faith lies in a feeling of dependence. The intellectual element is not entirely excluded, for it is the function of philosophical theology to conceptualize the religious side of self-consciousness. God transcends human concepts, however, and religion remains fundamentally a matter of the heart rather than of the understanding. As a liberal theologian, Schleiermacher considered theology to be more symbolical than doctrinal.

G. W. F. HEGEL (1770–1831) set forth his basic religious ideas in the Phenomenology (1807) and the Lectures on the Philosophy of Religion (1832). God, the Absolute, is identified with Spirit or Reason. Religion is one form of knowing the Absolute, and in the dialectic it passes through three principal stages: natural religion, artistic religion, and revealed or spiritual religion. To these correspond the religions of the Orient, of Greece and Rome, and of Christianity. Although it is the highest form of religion, Christianity is not absolute truth. Philosophy is a higher manifestation than religion in the dialectical development of the Absolute. Religion is thus subordinated to philosophy. Both philosophy and religion are concerned with God, but the concern is expressed differently—philosophy is a manifestation of reason, whereas religion is a manifestation of the religious consciousness through faith and love.

Later Development. Later idealism is represented principally by John Caird (1820–98), a British philosopher, and Josiah ROYCE (1885–1916), an American philosopher. Caird declared that the primary concern of religion is with objects of devotion and spiritual enjoyment, while philosophy's aim is intellectual knowledge. Religious knowledge is concerned with revelation and authority; beyond the competence of reason it is identified with feeling and faith. In The Religious Aspect of Philosophy (1885) Royce distinguishes between the theological and the ethical. The former is a theory of faith that requires a critical and even a skeptical approach. The latter has for its objective a morality of harmony that requires only the Biblical precept "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." The justification of religion as an ethical idealism led Royce to develop a system of absolute idealism in which the partial finite self finds the fulfillment of its experience in an Absolute Experience, identified with God as Absolute Person and Infinite Self. The impact of idealism on American philosophies of religion is apparent also in the work of such men as W. E. Hocking (1873–1966) and W. M. Urban (1873–1952).

Personalism. The personalist movement represents a modification of absolute idealism. Originating with G. H. Howison (1834–1916), it has been represented by such philosophers as Borden P. Bowne (1847–1910), E. S. BRIGHTMAN (1884–1953), and Ralph Flewelling (1871–1960). Its principal characteristics are a spiritual pluralism, an emphasis upon God and finite individuals as persons, and the notion of a finite theology and its implications for the problem of evil (see PERSONALISM).

Materialism. L. A. FEUERBACH (1804–72), a materialist and leader of left-wing HEGELIANISM, argued in Essence of Christianity (1841) that religion is an illusion, a dream of the human mind. God is no more than the attributes man finds in himself and hence the proper worship of man is man. This form of religious humanism had considerable influence on Karl MARX.

Positivism. Auguste COMTE (1798–1857), the founder of POSITIVISM, held that human knowledge passes through three stages: the theological, the metaphysical, and the scientific or positive. Truth and certitude are attained only in the last stage, where the religion of humanity is conceived as replacing the worship of God in the first stage. Humanity is the sum total of all dead, living or future beings who in one way or another have worked for the progress and happiness of man. Positivist dogmas, religious rites, and even a religious calendar were worked out by Comte for this worship of humanity.

Phenomenology. PHENOMENOLOGY is largely a method for describing the experiences or data of CONSCIOUSNESS. It was employed in philosophy by Edmund HUSSERL, and its expression in the philosophy of religion has been well represented by Rudolph OTTO (1869–1937), and Max SCHELER (1874–1928). In Idea of the Holy (1917), Otto argues in Kantian fashion that the holy is an a priori category. It is impressed upon the religious consciousness and makes possible a religious interpretation of experience. Such an experience is characterized by a numinous feeling, an emotional state leading to an intuition of the manifestations of eternity. The numinous also signifies the mysterium tremendum et fascinans, the Wholly Other, the feeling of awe and fear contributing the promise of an exaltation similar to the experiences of the mystics.

Scheler's phenomenology is directed to the affective life of man, to the a priori structure of feelings. As the basis of feelings, values are arranged hierarchically from the sensible, vital, and spiritual to the religious values that include the holy and the unholy. The notion of religious value is further developed in On the Eternal in Man (1921), where it is brought out that man as a person transcends nature and his religious experience is perfected in God as the source of love. Moral values constitute, for Scheler as for St. Augustine, the ordering of human love to the highest values.

Existentialism. S. A. KIERKEGAARD (1813–55), the father of modern EXISTENTIALISM, sought to replace the Absolute of Hegel with the existential reality of the individual. Existence is prior to essence; truth is subjective and to be achieved in the inner experience of the individual rather than by reason and objective knowledge. Faith is the encounter of the existing individual with God. Faith is a venture and a risk for the individual rather than a doctrine. The truth of Christianity is not to be found in theoretical knowledge or in argumentation, but is something to be appropriated in the passionate inwardness of the individual.

Martin Buber (1878–1965) argues in his Eclipse of God (1953) that religion is based on the "I-Thou" relationship whereas philosophy is based on the "I-It" relationship. Religious faith begins with the "fear of God," with the dread uncertainty man has of his existence. Through faith man establishes an existential relationship with God, an "I-Thou" relationship in which he can meet with God as a Person. The philosophical relationship is wholly objective and can result only in the eclipse of God.

Pragmatism. William JAMES (1842–1910) rejected any intellectual approach to religion. The truth of religious beliefs rests for him upon the values they contribute to humanity's concrete everyday experience. Religious ideas are true if they make human lives more meaningful. In The Varieties of Religious Experience (1902), James held that there is an empirical confirmation of religious experience and ideas. He himself believed that deity is finite and can only be considered as a "something" greater than man.

Henri BERGSON (1859–1941) has been termed an “intuitionist pragmatist.” He claimed that God is a creative life force that one may intuit within his experience. In Two Sources of Morality and Religion (1932), he declared there is a closed religion, that of myth and ritual, which is static and defensive; contrasted to it is the open or dynamic religion, the religion of the mystic whose religious genius leads him to an intuitive grasp of God and effects the union of the soul with God.

Maurice BLONDEL (1861–1949), although associated with modernism, remained a loyal Catholic. In his philosophy of action he developed a dialectic that necessitated the supernatural. God is both immanent and transcendent, but man can bridge the gap between the natural and the supernatural through God’s grace and His action toward man. Only in action that is not mere will but the whole of man’s activity can God be affirmed and attained by the individual. It is action that gives reality to the intellectual arguments for God’s existence and to any understanding of God.

American Naturalism. George SANTAYANA (1863–1952) maintained that the supernatural is merely an extension of the natural. Nature is materialistic and mechanistic and religion is merely “human experience interpreted by human imagination.” Religious beliefs are not to be taken literally; they belong to the sphere of poetry and their function is to express human moral ideals in mythical and poetical images. God is only a symbol for human ideals.

A. N. WHITEHEAD (1861–1947), an “idealistic naturalist,” maintained that God has both a primordial and a consequent nature. By the former He knows the eternal objects that serve to mediate between Himself and the world. God is neither infinite nor omnipotent; He is the final but not efficient cause of all things. In his consequent nature, God is immanent in, and develops with, the world. God as a principle of concretion overcomes the Platonic dualism in the metaphysics of Whitehead; involved in becoming and the struggle to overcome evil, God is “the great companion, the fellow sufferer who understands.”

John Dewey (1859–1952) rejected the supernatural completely and was extremely critical of traditional religion. His book, A Common Faith (1934), is essentially a plea for a divine reality as a symbol representative of all human ideals. The function of religious faith is that of unifying men in the pursuit of the highest ideals.

Charles HARTSHORNE (1897–2000) was both a disciple of Whitehead and an original thinker. He rejected any conception of “Other-Worldliness” and claimed that God must be found within the world process; here He realizes and perfects His unchanging essence within the context of a developing experience. This relationship of God with the world is described as a PANENTHEISM. Religious humanism is rejected; Hartshorne argued that a true humanism must be based on a recognition of God and an awareness of God’s love and His total involvement with His creatures.

Systematic Analysis

What kind of knowledge the “philosophy of religion” may depend in part upon the meaning of “philosophy of.” Through analysis, possible meanings are here considered in order to discover whether the philosophy of religion can be identified with one of them.

Possible Meanings. In the “philosophy of X” the reference may be to X as a kind of being. It is in this sense that one speaks of the philosophy of nature or the philosophy of history. In this case there is a kind of knowledge that is a synthesis of two other kinds of knowledge, one of which is an ontological discipline, e.g., metaphysics or theology based upon revelation. If the reasoning by which a proposition of the philosophy of nature is obtained may be thought of as the conclusion of a syllogism, then the minor premise would be a proposition of the natural sciences and the major premise would be a philosophical (or metaphysical) proposition. Evidently the philosophy of religion is not this kind of knowledge, for the term religion refers to neither being nor existence.

The “philosophy of X” may refer to knowledge about a kind of knowledge. Reference may be to a group of philosophical disciplines, the group being defined in terms of the relevance of philosophical principles to some other kind of knowledge. An instance of this would be the “philosophy of science.” In this case the X refers to the kind of knowledge known as positive science. The term philosophy refers to the logical, epistemological, and metaphysical principles that are implied by, or presupposed to, the positive sciences. It is evident that the philosophy of religion cannot be identified with this meaning.

In the “philosophy of X” the X may refer to a kind of human activity, and philosophy then has reference to the philosophical principles that function normatively or regulatively for this kind of activity. The “philosophy of education” would be an example of this kind of meaning. Education is not a kind of knowledge, but rather a kind of human activity. The philosophy of religion can hardly be identified with this meaning, for what usually goes under that name pretends to be at least concerned with the existential. Furthermore, religion is not to be associated with human activity in the sense that education is.

Natural Theology. The conclusion thus far would seem to be that the philosophy of religion must be, and yet cannot be, identified with any one of the three aforementioned meanings. A solution might be suggested by reconsidering the first meaning, in which case the X is existential. If so, then the philosophy of religion becomes identical with the “philosophy of God,” which in turn means what has been called “natural theology.” However, certain difficulties attend this interpretation. A systematic analysis of the meaning of the philosophy of religion can neither be arbitrary nor completely nonhistorical. Depending upon the possible relations of faith and reason to each other, there have been three interpretations of the meaning of natural theology.

(1) After the Reformation some Protestants considered natural theology to be the kind of knowledge about the finite, natural world that could be secured as the result of a deduction from the teachings of revelation. In this case natural theology was neither an autonomous subject nor one that was a synthesis of other kinds of knowledge. It was really a name for an aspect of the theology of revelation. The philosophy of religion can hardly be identified with this movement of thought.

(2) Stemming from the realistic theism of St. THOMAS AQUINAS is the view of natural theology as a relatively autonomous discipline on the level of reason, but presupposing revelation and open to suggestions from it (see THEOLOGY, NATURAL; CHRISTIAN PHILOSOPHY). In this view natural theology is the completion of metaphysics, yet in content dependent wholly upon human reason. Natural theology, in this meaning of the phrase, is a kind of knowledge about being, namely, God. If the philosophy of religion is identified with this meaning, then it becomes merely a synonym. However, it would be at least historically inaccurate to make the philosophy of religion synonymous with natural theology. Moreover, it would be an easy way of escaping the problem at hand.

(3) Natural theology may also be considered not only to be autonomous, but also to be a substitute for theology based upon revelation. Such it was for DEISM, sometimes called the “religion of reason.” However, this product of the Enlightenment was itself ambiguous and took two forms, the one Kantian and the other pre-Kantian. In the pre-Kantian form the argument was not from a metaphysical analysis of finite things to God, but rather from a false analogical view of the physical world to God. This view of the religion of reason tended to be unstable and negative. Its chief value seems to have been that of a weapon against the Church, a kind of anticlericalism.

Religion of Reason. In the Kantian form the religion of reason became a kind of agnosticism and skepticism. Certainly the religion of reason in terms of Kant’s Die

Religion innerhalb der Grenzen der blossen Vernunft is not a kind of knowledge. In fact, neither of these forms of the religion of reason is compatible with the notion of natural theology. This was later demonstrated in the development of religious thought, although one could have known on rational grounds alone that the denial of a theology based upon revelation would ultimately lead to a denial of any kind of theology at all.

The conclusion would now seem to be that the philosophy of religion cannot be identified with any movement of thought before Kant, nor even with KANTIANISM itself. Even the expression “philosophy of religion” itself came into being after the age of Kant, and hence can be understood only in terms of the kind of IDEALISM that is based upon the philosophy of Kant.

There were two main constituents in the Kantian revolution. In the first place, there was a blurring over of the distinction between making and knowing. A real world was still assumed by Kant, but it cannot be known. The phenomenal world can be known—but only because, in the process of knowing it, man helps to make it. In the second place, metaphysics in any realistic sense was eliminated once and for all as impossible. In terms of strict Kantianism there could be no place for the philosophy of religion, which is not possible unless acceptance of metaphysics is possible. The same can be said for all of the post-Kantian movements of a positivistic nature that were current throughout the 19th century.

However, the matter was somewhat different with the development of post-Kantian idealism of the Hegelian kind. No longer was reason considered to be “pure,” because in a sense it helps to fashion its own content; in fact, it helps to make the world. In the second place, one has a clear view of the meaning of the priority of reason over faith—a clear view in the sense that there was a consistency in the Hegelian thesis that enabled it to avoid the instability of the pre-Kantian position. Also, one can find a clear meaning of the philosophy of religion. For Hegel the philosophy of religion investigates the process of the Absolute. If so, the question may now be asked whether the philosophy of religion is a kind of knowledge. The language remains the same, but the concepts were radically changed. Two instances may be cited.

(1) If reason helps to make the world, rather than to discover truths about it, then the meaning of revelation, as the object of faith, could hardly find a place in the new idealistic system. And equally incompatible would be the traditional theistic conception of God.

(2) Implicit, and often explicit, in the new idealism was the notion of man and God cooperating in making the world. Because of the use of the word “idealism,” it is sometimes forgotten that this idea was essentially new. The philosophy of LEIBNIZ is called "idealistic," but this label is accurate only as regards the "stuff" of reality. Leibniz did not break down the distinction between making and knowing. The same can be said for the old idealisms in the Orient. Even classical Hinduism was relatively realistic. With respect to being, knowing, and making, Oriental idealism can accurately be called a "religious philosophy," but not "a philosophy of religion" in the Hegelian sense.

An Ideological Substitute. The conclusion must be drawn that, insofar as the expression "philosophy of religion" is to have any reference at all, it is as the post-Kantian idealistic substitute for natural theology in pre-Kantian realism. If this is what the philosophy of religion is, then it is not a kind of knowledge—unless one is prepared, in the name of Hegelian idealism, to repudiate all past philosophy. This may seem to be an exaggeration. However, Hegelianism, just as much as the later philosophy of Feuerbach and Marx, was the ultimate philosophy to deny philosophy. Philosophy is unique among all the disciplines in that only it can deny itself. Nevertheless a "metaphysics" that denies the possibility of metaphysics cannot, without pure equivocation, be called by the same name. Hence, it is not the case that the Judaic-Christian God and the Absolute are merely different conceptions of the same referent. Rather, they are radically different in conception because they do not refer to the same "thing."

The Kantian revolution, however, requires a similar inversion in the meaning of other terms, e.g., reason, revelation, philosophy, theology, logic, nature, essence, and existence. Hence, it is not at all an arbitrary act to designate the philosophy of the 19th century by some new term, as Henry Aiken has done when he calls the 19th century the "Age of Ideology." A more accurate statement, then, as to what the philosophy of religion is would be to say that it is an ideological substitute for a natural theology—understanding, of course, the universe of discourse which is that of idealistic Weltanschauungen. The "philosophy of religion," then, became an expression reflecting a contradiction: it was presumably a category in the order of knowing, and yet it did not refer to any kind of systematic knowledge. A kind of knowledge is opened and developing, and is that to which various thinkers make contributions. Idealistic Weltanschauungen, on the contrary, are closed and final and confined to the individual "systems" of the thinkers. As such, ideologies can be compared only by way of similarities, or studied developmentally by ways of showing, in a literary fashion, the various personal influences. In this case the history of philosophy becomes the "history of ideas."

Curricular Category. With the decline of Hegelian idealism and realistic Protestant theologies, and with the concomitant rise of liberal Protestantism, secularism, and government-owned schools, the expression "philosophy of religion" has taken on a quite different meaning in the 20th century. It has often become a category of "the order of teaching and learning." All curricular categories are of this order. They are institutional categories, and as such they may or may not refer to any kind of knowledge.

See Also: RELIGION; RELIGION, SOCIOLOGY OF.

Bibliography: F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy v.6, Wolff to Kant (Westminster, Md. 1960); v.7, Fichte to Nietzsche (Westminster, Md. 1963). G. GRANERIS, Enciclopedia filosofica (Venice-Rome 1957) 4:43–59. J. B. METZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1190–93. N. H. SØE and W. TRILLHAAS, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 5:1010–21. J. A. MOURANT, ed., Readings in the Philosophy of Religion (New York 1954). W. O. MARTIN, The Order and Integration of Knowledge (Ann Arbor 1957); Metaphysics and Ideology (Milwaukee 1959). J. MACQUARRIE, Twentieth Century Religious Thought (New York 1963).

[W. O. MARTIN]

RELIGION, SOCIOLOGY OF

The study of the relationship of RELIGION to social structures and social processes. It includes the study of the relation of religion to social stability, to social change, and to the functional problems of a SOCIETY. It includes also the study of the internal structure, development, and functional problems and dilemmas of religious organizations and institutions, and their relation to other social institutions. The term thus designates a specialized field of sociology, wide in scope, in which results and findings are reported in works of great variety.

Scope

Until recently the sociology of religion did not attract great scholarly attention. Although important and even basic works had been published in Europe in an earlier period, American research in the sociology of religion did not begin on any real scale until the time of World War II. Since then, interest in the field has grown considerably, whether measured in terms of number of workers involved, number of studies published, or number of courses offered at American colleges and universities. This growth reflects the growing popularity of sociology and of the social sciences generally in American thinking, education, and policy formation in business and government. It reflects also an increase in scholarly concern with religion in academic life. Finally, it represents an increasing appreciation by people in religious organizations and church work generally of the potential contribution of the social sciences in the confrontation and solution of contemporary problems by religious bodies.

Sources of Interest in the United States. In the United States, two groups of workers have made important contributions to the field, academic sociologists who have approached religion with predominantly sociological interests and concerns, and men in religion, often in Protestant seminaries, who have used sociology to further their understanding of the religious situation and its problems both past and present. A number of Catholic sociologists, clerical, religious, and lay, have shared with those in Protestant seminaries an interest in sociological research and sociological theory as means of enriching their understanding of religious problems and developments. In methods and in aims these groups have tended to converge, to influence each other, and to unite in one body of scientific workers in the field. In Europe some attempt has been made to distinguish "religious sociology," as an empirical study ancillary to the pastoral work of the Church, from the "sociology of religion," as an objective scholarly study of religious behavior uncommitted to immediate practical ends viewed in terms of commitment to a particular faith. Such a distinction has not gained acceptance in America.

Catholic Participation. In an earlier period American Catholic sociologists were often concerned with clarifying for themselves the relation between the basic assumptions of sociological theory as the conceptual framework of an empirical social science, and Catholic philosophical and theological views of the nature and meaning of man. The early issues of the American Catholic Sociological Review, which first appeared in 1940, as well as a number of books and theses from this period testify to the significance of this effort for those involved. Although the issue is still discussed among Catholic sociologists, the development of events has solved many of the earlier problems. Within sociology the spread of the influence of Max WEBER has led to a view of human action that recognizes the significance of meaningful and normative elements and repudiates narrow behaviorism and dogmatic POSITIVISM. On the Catholic side, a more mature appreciation of the problems involved and a greater involvement in the general intellectual life of the discipline have prevented earlier sectarian tendencies from becoming dominant. As a result there has not developed any attempt to create a "Catholic sociology" or a "Catholic sociology of religion"; Catholic workers in the field share with others significant common elements in their understanding of the discipline, its theory, and its methods.

Diversity of Interests. The sociology of religion has produced a vast spectrum of studies, and it exhibits a variety of concerns and emphases. Works in the field include Émile DURKHEIM's study of elementary religious forms among Australian aborigines; anthropological monographs on nonliterate cultures, such as that of Bronislaw Malinowski on the Trobriand Islands or A. R. Radcliffe-Brown on the Andamans; Max Weber's work on the importance of religious ideas in economic development; Ernst TROELTSCH's study of the relation between Christianity and the world, and its sociological consequences; H. Richard NIEBUHR's study of denominationalism in America; the work of Liston Pope and Bryan Wilson on sects; Will Herberg's analysis of Protestantism, Catholicism, and Judaism in the United States; monographs on Mormonism by Thomas F. O'Dea and on Conservative Judaism by Marshall Sklare; Robert N. Bellah's work on Japanese religion; Joseph Fichter's study of a southern United States parish, John Donovan's study of the role of the Catholic priest, and Scherer's of the Lutheran minister; the studies of Gabriel Le Bras and Fernand Boulard on the geography of religious practice among French Catholics; Andrew Greeley's study of religion and social mobility; and Seymour Lipset's concern with religion and politics. This list is merely suggestive, but its variety is striking indeed.

Nature of Sociological Investigation. All these studies have in common a concern with an empirical study of some aspect of religious life; each of them, to one degree or another, represents an attempt to apply the analytical methods and practical research techniques of sociology to the study of religious phenomena. Approaching religion as observable human activity, meaningful in that it is infused with and influenced by ideas and attitudes, the sociologist of religion employs explicit concepts and propositions in the analysis of observed empirical data. The concepts used comprise a conceptual scheme or body of theory in the scientific sense; this is useful in formulating problems, designing empirical studies, and analyzing the data obtained from such studies for the purpose of understanding and prediction. Whereas such a body of theory makes empirical work more significant by relating it to central interests shared in the discipline, the empirical work checks, reforms, deepens, and develops the theoretical structure itself. Although this conceptual instrument is in a comparatively early stage of development, some degree of sophistication has been reached. The main outline of this body of concepts presented here is drawn chiefly from the work of a minority of significant contributors, especially from Durkheim, Weber, Troeltsch, Joachim Wach, and Talcott Parsons.

Relative Autonomy of Social Systems. Sociology is the study of those uniformities of human behavior that cannot be understood simply as effects of the motivation of individual actors or of the ideas and values of the CULTURE of a society. There is a relatively autonomous level of social structure, related to and integrated with both individual motivation and cultural elements, but best understood in terms of its own relative autonomy. This social structure displays a systematic quality; it is revealed as a social system whose integration is patterned and orderly, and whose elements have functional significance for each other and for the system as a whole. One important element in sociological analysis is investigation of the functional significance of various kinds of social institutions and human behavior. In presenting the theoretical body of concepts in the sociology of religion, it is well to begin with this fundamental aspect—functional theory and functional analysis. Moreover, in its application to the study of religion, functional analysis indicates with considerable salience one important characteristic of the role of religion in social life and underlines its inherent character and operational importance in the human situation. Finally, acknowledgment of the limitations of functionalism leads directly to consideration of a more sophisticated model, which utilizes the insights of Weber and others and makes possible a more adequate approach to the sociological study of religion.

Sociology and Religious Values. Sociology is a value-free science and does not claim competence to judge the validity of religion in general or of particular religions. The sociology of religion commences with the study of religion as one kind of observable meaningful human activity; it attempts to understand the content and point of view of the religion being studied; and focusing upon the level of social structure, it examines the problems and dilemmas characteristic of this realm of human life. Among the empirical disciplines, sociology is but one, although an important one, among those relevant to the study of religion. It stands in close relation to both history and psychology: to history, because structural analysis must be understood in the context of the unique course of events in which a social system is formed, and social change must be seen in the setting of long-term historical trends; to psychology, since human motivation and human propensities to respond and to adjust are significant elements in the functioning of social structures as well as in their emergence and dissolution. The sociology of religion is also enriched by those disciplines that study the content of religious beliefs, since a sociology of meaningful behavior must appreciate the definition of the situation of action held by the groups being observed and studied. Hence, for the sociology of religion, theology and the content of commitments of faith are data that must be understood to the extent that they enter into human action by affecting both men's definitions of situations and their motivational structure (although their validity is beyond the competence of sociological analysis).

Functional Theory and Analysis

Sociological functionalism presents an analytical model in which human societies are seen as social systems, that is, as on-going, patterned equilibria of social institutions. Through such institutions human behavior is patterned on the basis of normative consensus, and such consensus is itself integrated into the world view of the culture and internalized in the motivational structure of individuals. The social system is made up of subsystems or institutional complexes that involve a patterned and legitimated allocation of functions, resources, facilities, and rewards, both material and nonmaterial. The social institutions, resting upon normative consensus, pattern and restrain human activity, including force and violence. Such institutions are interdependent with each other and with the social system as a whole. Thus functional analysis does not seek simplified cause and effect relationships, but rather recognizes multiple causation and the feedback of effect upon cause in a systemic frame of reference. Within such a model the functional questions arise: what is the contribution of each part, each institutional complex or aspect thereof, to maintenance of the structure of the whole, and what is the reciprocal relationship between the parts themselves and between them and the whole?

Functional Significance. In these terms religion is seen as one kind—a strategically important and unique kind—of institutionalized behavior having functional significance for the social system. This functional significance may be manifest, that is, recognized by the human actors themselves, or it may be latent, i.e., unrecognized by them. Although functional theory has given more emphasis to positive contributions to the functioning of the social system, it has also recognized that elements of the system may be dysfunctional as well. Hence functional theory raises the question: what is the contribution of religion to the functioning of the social system?

Functional theory also distinguishes two kinds of needs that characterize men in society. Men must act in a practical manner to ensure group survival; human action must be instrumental or adaptive to some degree. But men also have expressive needs, needs to act out emotions and to enter relationships. In the course of their problem-solving activities, their instrumental or adaptive behavior, men also express basic needs and characteristics. Thus out of their interaction there emerge relationships, patterns of expectations, forms of respect and deference, and expressive rituals that are valued in themselves, and not simply as means to ends. With respect to them, too, the functional question may be asked: what is the contribution of religion to the satisfaction of the expressive and adaptive needs of men?

Men act in terms of what W. I. Thomas called their definition of the situation, the existential and normative attributes of their condition as they understand them. In so acting men develop culture, a fabric of existential and value meanings, central to which is a basic definition, explicit or present by implication, of the structure and meaning of the human condition. Culture is integrated with social structure and with individual motivation in terms of the goals and ends valued and the norms patterning the proscriptions and prescriptions of the social order. The functional question arises again: what is the contribution of religion to culture and its integration?

Religion and the Human Situation. These three versions of the functional question bring into the purview of sociological theory certain of the most central characteristics of the human situation, characteristics that are of strategic significance for the development and maintenance of social systems. First, it is seen that religion is concerned with something beyond the empirical, that it transcends empirical adaptive experience. Second, it is recognized that religion is not only beyond empirical knowledge in a cognitive and problem-solving sense, but is concerned with relationship rather than problem-solving, with the acting out of attitudes and responses rather than with adaptation in the face of environmental challenges. Thus religion transcends instrumental action; it allows expression and patterns the realization of important expressive needs. Human life confronts men with aspects of reality and with problems and dilemmas that cannot be handled in terms of adaptive empirical knowledge alone. Moreover, in solving adaptive problems men establish patterns of allocation and function—in the development of political and economic institutions, for example—that demand discipline and inhibition, cause deprivation, and inflict frustration on various strata of society that are differentiated in the process. Often such difficulties cannot be changed, for some measure of inequality and differential allocation appears inescapable; indeed, it seems to be an analytical element of the very conception of social order. Yet such hardships must be rendered acceptable and legitimated in terms of a larger understanding of the human situation and its attributes and ends.

Contexts of Uncertainty and Impossibility. The most crucial of the aleatory and frustrating elements that are derived from the insufficiency of adaptive techniques and from the inherent consequences of the functioning of social systems—elements that transcend tested empirical knowledge and practical control—are those associated with contexts of uncertainty and impossibility. The uncertainty context refers to the inherent and fundamental contingency characteristic of human existence. Even with advanced technology and increasing control over conditions of life, men find the possibility of disappointment lurking everywhere, and often in situations in which human interests are deeply involved—“the best laid plans of mice and men gang aft agley.” The impossibility context refers to the fact that certain misfortunes are humanly unavoidable; they include suffering, illness, death, and the evils that human beings intentionally or unintentionally inflict upon each other. These are the phenomena that theology classically has discussed as the “problem of evil”; they are considered sociologically in terms of their functional consequences for human society.

Functional theory recognizes the way in which both the uncertainty and impossibility contexts lead men beyond the everyday life of the workaday world. At such a beyond men come to confront the deeper—the ultimate—meaning of the human condition. Here human knowledge and mundane forms of social relations are proved totally insufficient either for providing solutions to problems or as modes of adjustment to unavoidable evils. Thus men are propelled to “breaking points” in mundane experience, and questions are raised that can be answered only by going beyond the empirical world of mundane experience.

Religion and the Sacred. Further, since man is not simply homo faber, since men are not beings that simply adapt to their environment for survival’s sake, expressive needs require satisfaction and men must enter into relationships and act out responses. Such needs find outlets in the everyday world, but they also point beyond it. Durkheim has shown that men respond to reality not simply as something profane and mundane, but that they perceive another aspect of what they experience and react to it in a different modality of response. Men respond to an aspect of reality as sacred; they experience it as radically heterogeneous from the profane and give it intense awe and respect. The sacred, despite its localization in a tremendous variety of vehicles and occasions, is felt to lie beyond the appearances of things. It is something that not only elicits awe but also attracts and nurtures the worshiper. Sacred forces are seen as both propitious and dangerous, as powers that lie behind appearance and sustain being and life. The response to the sacred is the religious response, and in religion human experience breaks beyond the everyday. Thus, both in responses to the sacred and in reactions at the breaking points of personal life there is transcendence of the everyday in attitude and relationship. The religious response originates in a limit situation that transcends empirical knowledge and everyday social forms, and involves an awareness of a sacred ground of experience that elicits reaction in a relational rather than manipulative mode of response.

Implications for Social Systems. The problems of men when they are propelled into limit situations beyond everyday experience have great functional significance for societies. If the questions raised by the impossibility and uncertainty contexts are not answered meaningfully, the worth and value of human effort are rendered doubtful.

At these breaking points, what Weber called the problem of meaning is raised in its sharpest and most poignant form. It is not simply an intellectual problem, but one in which many-sided human involvement and concern are necessarily implicated. If no mode of adjustment to the frustrations and deprivations inherent in the allocations fundamental to every society is found, the established goals and norms of the society are called into question. This means that individual morale founders, the meaning of life is lost, the legitimacy of norms and the worth of ends are undermined, and society can no longer exist. Life raises for men questions that go beyond the limits of empirical knowledge and confronts them with problems that cannot be met adequately within the context of everyday relationships and modes of adjustment. Religion provides an answer, a relationship, and a mode of adjustment precisely in this limit situation.

If in this limit situation men can enter into a relationship with a sacred ground of existence and experience, and if a view of empirical reality can be developed in terms of that transcendent and sacred relationship, then both security and meaning, both adjustment and hope, can be found and maintained. Then the threat to human action and human association that life presents in limit situations can be met. Then indeed all is not in pieces and all coherence is not gone. Then are disappointment, injury, and tragedy rendered meaningful and acceptable. In relation to the deeper sacred ground men can act out their needs for a deeper relationship on which both security and worth can be based. Thus religion solves a fundamental functional problem for human societies by relating men to a supraempirical, sacred beyond. However this sacred is conceived and conceptualized in different cultures and religions, in pointing to it as the highest common factor in the relation between religion and society Durkheim has supplied an insight of great sociological significance.

Functions of Religious Rites. Functional theory calls attention not only to the attempts of men to enter into a relationship with the sacred realm, but also to their efforts to manipulate the sacred forces and bend them to human will in the service of human aspirations. Such manipulation of the sacred comprises the sphere of MAGIC. In distinguishing religion from magic Malinowski and others have shown that men resort to magic in those endeavors that lie outside the range of human control in any secure sense and in which danger is great. Thus the Trobriand

Islanders were found to utilize magic in deep-sea fishing with its combination of personal danger and uncertainty of results, but not in lagoon fishing, which was both safe and predictable. Malinowski also showed that, although magic is a manipulative affair, religion and the religious rite involve an acting out for its own sake and not for the sake of manipulation and control.

Both the cultural anthropologists and Durkheim point out that religious rites reassert the basic value consensus of the group, act out its solidarity, and thus reenact and renew the cohesiveness of the group itself. Durkheim indeed went so far in stressing this important function of the religious cult as to see the object of worship—the sacred realm itself, or in the higher religions, God—as the projection and hypostatization of society itself. Thus Durkheim thought that in worship a society worships itself and thereby renews itself. Sociological theory today recognizes the great importance of the functional insight of Durkheim. Religious ritual in acting out and expressing attitudes toward the sacred reasserts norms and values that are often strategic to the integration of society, and it reinforces and strengthens social solidarity. There is much profundity in Durkheim's stress on the social character of much of religious activity. Yet his formulation of religion as group self-worship is crude and unacceptable.

Evaluation of Functionalism. Seen from the perspective of functional theory, religion maintains the social system by providing an answer to the problem of meaning, by justifying socially accepted goals, by renewing solidarity through ritual and cult, by deepening the acceptance of norms through their sacralization, and by providing some catharsis for frustration and making it understandable in the context of a larger religious view and a deeper religious relationship to the sacred beyond. To paraphrase the anthropologist Edward Sapir and the sociologist Durkheim, in the religious relationship human consciousness is secured and human association made possible.

Contributions. In brief, functional analysis calls attention to two fundamental aspects of the social role of religion. It shows the functional significance of religion to society in terms of its relation to the impossibility and uncertainty contexts. It shows how religion answers the problem of meaning in terms of its ramified implications for the continued functioning of societies and how it reinforces norms and strengthens solidarity. Thus functional explanations mark a distinct advance in the social sciences over those theories, based on and influenced by a naïve implicit positivism, that were common at the beginning of the 20th century, in which religion was viewed as absurd prescientific fantasy, characteristic of the ignorance and error of underdeveloped peoples or unenlightened strata. Such explanations also mark a considerable advance in comparison with theories that propounded or sought simple and sovereign causal factors to explain social phenomena.

Limitations. Yet functional theory alone presents an incomplete and inadequate sociological model for the analysis of the relation of religion to social structure and processes. Its fundamental insights were derived largely from studies of nonliterate societies at least a generation ago and are consequently inadequate for the study of the world religions and of the situation and condition of religion in complex societies. It throws little light on the problems involved in the developmental sequences or the internal functioning of the world religions, or on the complicated relationships between religious and other institutions in complex societies—e.g., between church and state, church and education—that have been the cause and occasion of severe conflict in many countries.

Moreover, while functional theory provides insights of indisputable importance into the structure and function of human groups, it has never refined these insights to provide any criteria for estimating or measuring the degree of positive or negative functionality to be accorded to religious phenomena under various societal conditions. Although it has recognized that there are dysfunctional as well as functional consequences of religious phenomena for human societies, it has emphasized the latter. It tends to direct attention to the contribution of religion to stability and to resistance to change, and to neglect the importance of religion as the setting of innovation and as an element promoting change.

Functional theory does not provide any significant insights into the process of the SECULARIZATION of culture, which has been so markedly developed in modern times and which is the fundamental characteristic of the current religious situation. Consequently it has not directed attention to the study of religion surrogates in secular movements of a social or national character. Such movements perform in contemporary societies many of the functions formerly performed by religion and attributed to religion in the functionalist model, although they are based on less than ultimate experience in which the sacral elements are often disguised or latent. Prophetic religion and its creative consequences and the functional equivalent of prophecy in secular religion-surrogate movements are both neglected.

Importance. Yet the importance of functional theory cannot be denied. It formulates and makes explicit certain fundamental characteristics of the relation of religion to society—religion as concerned with the sacred, as a relational mode of orientation, as a transcendent phenomnon made functional in the limit situation, as providing an answer to the problem of meaning and a mode of adjustment for frustration, and as sacralizing norms and legitimating institutions. These fundamental dimensions must be included in any analytical model for the sociological study of religion. All analytical models must be constructed on this groundwork. Functional theory has provided the basis on which more sophisticated models of analysis can be built. The quite justifiable emphasis on function has unfortunately tended to keep some sociological investigators from paying sufficient attention to the content of the religious experience and the doctrines and institutions derived and secondarily developed from it. Such a foreshortening of the sociological view results in a failure to recognize and comprehend many significant functional problems internal to religious organization and its development.

Developmental Theory

There exists in sociological theory a body of concepts more adequate for the analysis of religion in complex societies and of the problems involved in the development of the founded religions. The works of Weber, Troeltsch, Wach, and Parsons, among others, are the chief sources for these ideas.

Role of Religion in Social Change. Weber recognized the seriousness and importance of man's religious interests and activities, and the causal significance of religious ideas affecting human action and historical development. Unlike the functionalists who emphasized the contribution of religion to social stability, Weber investigated the role of religion in social change and the development of societies. He saw religious experience and religious thought as the sphere in which men broke through to more rational, more profound, and more adequate definitions of the human situation. This interest was the source of his concern with the charismatic leader and the prophet and his work on charisma and prophecy as sociological factors.

Charisma and Institutionalization. Weber saw charisma as characteristic of leaders who exhibit unusualness, creativity, and spontaneity in specific ways and who either through their preaching or their mode of being, or both, issue calls that attract followers and form the nucleus of religious movements. Such movements stand in important ways outside the everyday, the traditional and established forms of social life. Religious charisma possesses a sacred character and is specifically alien to routinized forms of social relations and to economic life. As recognized by Weber, charisma in the pure state is inherently unstable; therefore, the requirements of continuity result in the establishment of new social forms and new social institutions. Weber called attention to the importance of succession crises in this kind of development. After the originating charismatic moment there develops, in Weber's phrase, a routinization of charisma in which the charisma of status and office replaces the earlier unroutinized dynamic forms. This transformation is both a diminution and containment of the charisma within structured roles, rites, and procedures. The routinization of charisma may proceed in either a rational direction, giving rise to social structures of a gesellschaftliche, or modern, kind, or in a traditional direction characterized by more diffuse gemeinschaftliche social organization. It may develop in a way that combines both of these, as may be seen in the early Church with its emphases on both rationality and tradition.

Religion as a Causal Influence in History. Troeltsch's treatment of the relation between Christianity and the societies and cultures in which it existed in Europe developed further generalized categories of sociological analysis. Both Weber and Troeltsch insisted on the reality of religious interests and their causal influence in human history, in contrast with contemporary Marxist writers who reduced religious interests to socioeconomic interests and saw religion as an epiphenomenon. Troeltsch showed religious interests, religious ideas, and the social conditions in the context of which the Church exists and develops, as all exerting causal influences. The adjustment of the Church to classical society is seen as the result of Christian ideas and values, of the propensities and needs of the social strata that Christianity attracted, and of the need of the developing organization of the Church. Thus he produced a sociological model of analysis that gives adequate weight to both external and internal views of development, and recognizes the multiplicity of factors involved.

Religion and Complex Societies. In his monographs on the world religions, Weber showed that religious orientations, ideas, and values must be reckoned with as one factor involved in economic development, and under certain circumstances, as the crucial factor. He attempted to show that some Asian societies, such as China and India, were in important economic and material respects at least as prepared for the development of modern capitalism as was Europe. He explained the priority of capitalistic development in Europe by the presence in European society of certain elements in its religious outlook that fostered ethical and economic rationality.

Further, Weber explored the multiple relations characterizing religion and social structure, the differential appeal of different religious ideas to different social strata, and the importance of the inner differentiation of the religious community itself. He saw lower classes showing a tendency to embrace religious doctrines promising salvation, whereas ruling and successful classes desired doctrines legitimating their functions and justifying their status. He showed that lower middle classes, especially artisans, tend to develop rational ethical religion, whereas peasants and warriors show a much greater affinity for magical phenomena. Yet he emphasized that these were tendencies or propensities for affinity and not causally determining in any definitive sense, for a religious doctrine once established is capable, because of the elements of universality it contains, to appeal to various and diverse social strata; and even in its initial state its appeal may be widespread among varied social strata. With respect to the internal differentiation of religious bodies themselves, Weber stated that the development of rational theology must await as its necessary, though not necessarily its sufficient, condition the development of a priesthood enjoying a status apart from the laity. He also recognized the significance of the secularization of culture and of such movements as 19th-century socialism and 20th-century nationalism as religion surrogates.

Thus there is developed a scheme of analysis that deals adequately with ideas, interests, and social structure, both in the religious community and in the general society, and also with the relations between the society and the religious body, with a degree of adequacy for studying complex situations. It is a scheme that eschews reductionism and simple causal hypotheses of the single factor variety, and that makes possible the delineation of complex empirical phenomena. The content of religious doctrines, both their world views and their ethics, the social setting of religious groups and their social composition, and the internal structure of religious bodies are all seen as important factors.

Typologies of Religious Groups. Troeltsch explored the types of adjustment Christianity made to its social world in four spheres of experience: family life, economic activities, political power, and intellectual endeavor. He found in the Christian value system a basis for both acceptance and rejection of the "world" in this sense. Both responses are also found empirically, each in its own particular sociological form. Troeltsch saw the "church" form as the embodiment of an acceptance, however qualified, of society and culture, and the "sect" form as the embodiment of revolt against such a compromise. These concepts have been widely used in sociological research and have been refined in the writings of R. E. Park and E. W. Burgess, Georg Simmel and Leopold von Wiese, Niebuhr, Wilson, and others. The church form is characterized by membership in fact on the basis of birth, administration of the means of grace and its sociological concomitants, hierarchy and dogma, inclusiveness of social structure often coinciding with ethnic or geographical boundaries, universalist orientation to the conversion of all, and a tendency to compromise with and adjust to the world. The sect is a more exclusive and ascetic group characterized by separatism from the world and often defiance of it, exclusiveness in social composition and in attitude, emphasis upon a conversion experience previous to membership, and voluntary election or joining.

Although sectarianism is a protest against the compromise with the world made by churches, the sect itself tends to become routinized with time. The term denomination has been used in a technical sense to apply to such a routinized sect. Wilson has shown how sects may successfully resist routinization and accommodation over a long period of time. Wiese and Howard Becker have introduced another type of religious grouping, the cult, in which religion is more private and personal and which does not itself achieve secure viable long-term establishment. Wach has introduced another type called by him the independent group, a semiecclesiastical body that begins as a sect but develops in a churchlike direction. Although Wach suggested the Mormon Church as an example of this type, O'Dea has shown that the Mormons, acting on the model of Biblical Israel, under propitious American 19th-century conditions, produced a new religious quasiethnicity and became a "people" possessing both identity and homeland.

Although the concepts "church" and "sect" developed by Troeltsch have been fruitfully utilized and considerably refined in American sociology, his concern with more individualized responses has been neglected. Troeltsch did not propose simply a church-sect dichotomy, but a church-sect-mysticism trichotomy with reference to the response of religion to the world. Troeltsch saw mysticism as an individualized response capable of expressing indifference or revolt with respect to established religious forms. Its importance in religious history has been enormous. Today secular analogues of this response are also important, as may be seen in certain philosophical movements, such as EXISTENTIALISM. The neglect of this aspect of Troeltsch's work is a loss to the sociology of religion.

Developmental Sequences. Wach has developed the insights presented above in delineating the developmental sequence for founded religions. Starting with Rudolf OTTO's treatment of the holy in the religious experience, which in important ways parallels and complements that of Durkheim, Wach proposed a scheme of analysis that shows the religious movement proceeding from its charismatic moment of origin to the full development of an ecclesiastical structure on three levels—ideational, cultic, and organizational. Thus religious ideas, religious rites, and religious organizations are seen as three interpenetrating aspects of a single developing entity. Wach introduced the idea of "protest" as a universal category of analysis for the understanding of religious movements. Adjustments to the world, specifications of doctrine, and developments in liturgy and in church organization are of differential significance to various strata of society and of the religious body itself. Some groups are unable to accept these developments and are moved to protest against them. Protest may develop into movements that secede from the parent body, or it may be organized and directed from within the parent body.

Parsons has done much to emphasize and make highly explicit the assumptions and implications of functional theory and to emphasize the role of ideas, and of religious ideas particularly, in social life. He has been an important figure in promoting the assimilation of Weber's contributions in American sociology, both through his early translations of Weber and his own later theoretical work. The work of Weber, Troeltsch, Wach, and Parsons has been supplemented by that of a host of others who have tested, refined, and developed a body of concepts that today equips the sociology of religion with considerable theoretical sophistication and empirical skill.

Implications

Wach's paradigm of the developmental sequence in the world religions opens up great possibilities of integrating work in the sociology of religion with that done by students in a number of fields. One example may be seen with respect to the studies of symbolism and myth by Ernst CASSIRER, Andrew Lang, Mircea Eliade, Gerardus van der LEEUW, the school of Carl JUNG, and others. This work is closely related to sociological concern with the development of doctrine and the practice of cult and their functional significance.

Relation to Special Fields of Sociology. Moreover, specialists in other areas of sociological interest have contributed both in their theoretical construction and in their empirical findings materials of great utility to the sociology of religion. The institutionalization of religion produces formal organizations, often with a hierarchical structure. Much of the sociological study of formal organizations in economic, political, and military spheres offers models of analysis and empirical generalizations of utility to the study of religious organization. The study of social disorganization and its effects on societies and personality structures has added to knowledge of the role of religion as a factor reintegrating social life. The study of the accommodation, assimilation, and conflict involved in intergroup relations and in the Americanization of immigrants and their descendants provides models for the study of religious conflict, and often considerable data as well, since in America ethnic and religious groups are closely interrelated. The study of politics and voting behavior reveals the importance of religious identity as a factor in general political alignments and offers significant material to the sociology of religion. The same may be said for studies of achievement and social mobility that have been concerned with the religious factor. A similar relation exists between the sociology of religion and the sociology of KNOWLEDGE, as Durkheim early recognized. Finally, the sociology of religion makes complementary contributions to the sociological study of movements and institutions other than religion that are based upon situationally transcendent ideals, such as the many religion surrogates in contemporary society.

Relation to Theology. The general relationship between the sociology of religion and theology has been indicated above. Sociology is an empirical social science that does not make judgments concerning the substance of theological matters or commitments of faith. The content of theology is treated as a source of data insofar as the sociological investigator must become familiar with the world view of the religion being studied and its ethical position. For theology, the sociology of religion offers data on the development of religious movements and the role and function of religion in various societal contexts; hence it contributes to theology data both on religion as a human phenomenon and on human behavior generally.

Like all empirical sciences, sociology assumes its own angle or perspective of vision and develops in its own autonomous fashion its methodology and techniques. The 19th-century idea of formulating “hierarchies of sciences”—itself received from earlier periods of Western thought—has tended to lose relevance and consequently to lose favor in the intellectual climate of scientific endeavor. The relationship of various sciences is one rather of cross fertilization and dialogue than of subordination or subsidiarity. Although many problems of concern to the philosophy of knowledge remain, the older idea that empirical sciences were ranged under and worked in terms defined by philosophical or theological views and positions has been progressively abandoned.

It is significant in this respect that the declaration on the relationship of the Catholic Church to non-Christian religions approved by VATICAN COUNCIL II is based first of all on a historical and sociological interpretation of empirical facts: “Men expect from the various religions answers to the unsolved riddles of the human condition, riddles that move the hearts of men today as they did in olden times: What is man? What is the meaning, what is the purpose of our lives? What is the moral good and what is sin? What are death, judgment and retribution after death? What, finally, is the ultimate, inexpressible mystery which encompasses our existence, which is the fountain as well as the destiny of our being?” This basic core of religion comprises what sociologists have been concerned with in terms of the problem of meaning and its functional significance for human society. The declaration continues: “Ever since primordial days, numerous peoples have had a certain perception of that hidden power which hovers over the course of things and over the events that make up the lives of men” (De Ecclesiae Habitudine ad Religiones Non-Christianas). Here the sociologist recognizes the content of the sacred treated by Durkheim and accepted in sociological theory as central to an understanding of religion on the sociological level.

Generalization and Findings. What has been presented above, in addition to the chief interests and scope of the sociology of religion, is its theory in the sense of analytical models providing contexts for the conduct of empirical investigations. What is to be said about generalizations concerning religious behavior based on the findings of such studies? This is the second important aspect of theory. It is clear that a number of generalizations—concerning the probable sequence of development, the functional significance of religion to social stability, its role in influencing innovation and change, the relationship between religious ideas and historical developments, the possible options open to religious movements and their probable consequences, to name the most important—have been integrated into theory as a result of empirical study. They stand as probable bases for drawing conclusions and formulating hypotheses for empirical study. They are significant and important. It remains true, however, that insufficient attention has been given to systematization of theory with respect to the empirical generalizations of various degrees of validity found in the literature of the field. The field stands in need not only of more and better empirical studies, but also of a more systematic and critical integration of theory, especially through the incorporation of empirical generalizations derived from past empirical work into the theoretical model for future use in analysis and for further testing, verification, and refinement.

See Also: RELIGION; RELIGION (IN PRIMITIVE CULTURE); RELIGION AND MORALITY.

Bibliography: General Theoretical Background. E. DURKHEIM, The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life, tr. J. W. SWAIN (London 1915; repr. Glencoe, Illinois 1954). C. Y. CLOCK, “The Sociology of Religion,” Sociology Today, ed. R. K. MERTON et al. (New York 1959) 153–177. B. MALINOWSKI, Magic, Science and Religion (Boston 1948; repr. New York 1954). T. PARSONS, The Structure of Social Action (2d ed. Glencoe, Illinois 1949); “The Theoretical Development of the Sociology of Religion," Essays in Sociological Theory (2d ed. Glencoe, Illinois 1954) 197–211. L. SCHNEIDER, ed., Religion, Culture and Society (New York 1964). E. TROELTSCH, The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches, tr. O. WYON, 2 v. (New York 1931; repr. 1956). J. WACH, Sociology of Religion (London 1947). M. WEBER, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism, tr. T. PARSONS (London 1930); The Theory of Social and Economic Organization, tr. A. M. HENDERSON and T. PARSONS (New York 1947); The Religion of China, ed. and tr. H. H. GERTH (Glencoe, Illinois 1951); Ancient Judaism, tr. H. H. GERTH and D. C. MARTINDALE (Glencoe, Illinois 1952); The Sociology of Religion, tr. E. FISCHOFF (Boston 1963). O. R. WHITLEY, Religious Behavior: Where Sociology and Religion Meet (Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey 1964). J. M. YINGER, Religion, Society, and the Individual: An Introduction to the Sociology of Religion (New York 1957). Special Substantive Treatments. R. N. BELLAH, Tokugawa Religion: The Values of Pre-Industrial Japan (Glencoe, Illinois 1957). F. BOULARD, An Introduction to Religious Sociology, tr. M. J. JACKSON (London 1960). J. J. KANE, Catholic Protestant Conflicts in America (Chicago 1955). G. E. LENSKI, The Religious Factor (Garden City, New York 1961). R. LEE and M. E. MARTY, eds., Religion and Social Conflict (New York 1964). H. R. NIEBUHR, The Social Sources of Denominationalism (New York 1929). T. F. O'DEA, The Mormons (Chicago 1957). M. SKLARE, Conservative Judaism (Glencoe, Illinois 1955). K. W. UNDERWOOD, Protestant and Catholic (Boston 1957). B. R. WILSON, Sects and Society (Berkeley 1961). T. F. O'DEA, The Sociology of Religion (Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey 1966).

[T. F. O'DEA]

RELIGION, TEACHER OF

Charged with the instruction and formation of others in religious doctrine and practice, the religion teacher differs from other teachers not simply in the subject with which the teaching is concerned, but also by possession of a particular charism from God and a derivative authority in the religious assembly. This article confines its attention to the teacher of the Judeo-Christian religion.

Old Testament. In the OT, Israel, as a community taught by Yahweh, never forgot its patriarchal origins in its emphasis on parents as the first teachers of religion (Dt 4.9; 6.6–7; 11.19; 32.46). While the mother gave the rudiments of the moral education that might extend even into the adolescence of the child (Prv 1.8; 6.20; 31.1), the father, having marked his son with circumcision as the sign of the covenant (Gn 17.12; Lv 12.3; cf. Lk 2.21), performed the sacred duty of communicating the history of salvation (Ex 10.2; 12.26–27; 13.8). The paternal role in religious education was so marked that it explains how priests, who were also teachers of sacred doctrine, came to be called father (Jgs 17.10; 18.19). The familial character of the religious teacher is stressed as well in the liturgical setting; the sacrifice was offered in the temple, but it was at the domestic table during the Passover meal that the child asked and the father responded on the meaning of the sacred event commemorated.

Fathers and the Patriarchs, however, were not the sole teachers of religion in Israel. Moses' mission as law-giver involved the teaching of religion and indeed divine assistance in that sacred task (Ex 4.12). The teaching apostolate was likewise confided to Aaron and his Levites, i.e., to the priesthood (Lv 10.11). The Prophets were in a rather special sense teachers of religion; without hierarchic office, their teaching authority apparently was derived from some direct, charismatic experience of the divine with a consequent mandate to communicate the divine message. Then the sages of Israel, whose religious teachings are preserved in the Wisdom literature of the Old Testament, were teachers not only of purely religious doctrine, but of secular prudence as well. Finally, Israel had its rabbis as interpreters of the Torah. In the DIASPORA, especially after the destruction of the Temple, Jewish teachers had formal schools (the elementary house of the book and the more advanced house of study for adolescent boys) besides the synagogue or house of prayer. The elementary teacher was a voluntary worker whose pay was poor, but who was ennobled so by the glory of the divine word that the Talmud wanted him venerated as God Himself was venerated.

New Testament. The logia reserved the title of teacher for the Christ alone (Mt 23.10), and the Disciples were forbidden the title of teacher (Mt 23.8). Moreover, other NT writers (1 Jn 2.27; 1 Pt 2.9; cf. Heb 8.11; Jn 6.45) see in the advent of the Spirit the fulfillment of the prophecies that there would no longer be need of teachers (Is 54.13; Jer 31.34). Yet Jesus permitted others to call Him teacher (Jn 13.13) and sent His disciples to teach all men to observe the things He had commanded them (Mt 28.19). The early Church also recognized distinct persons as teachers of religion (Acts 13.1; 1 Cor 12.28; Eph 4.11). St. Paul, who sees his own apostolate as teaching (2 Tm 1.11), admonishes parents on their role as teachers of religion (Eph 6.1–4) and instructs Timothy and Titus on their task of teaching (1 Tm 4.11, 13, 16; 2 Tm 1.13; 4.2; Ti 1.9; 2.1, 7).

The paradox may be resolved by a consideration of the response of faith to the Christian teacher. Jesus is the Teacher as the complete Word of the Father (cf. Heb 1:1–2). While His spoken word reached only the few of His time and place, His Spirit teaches all truth (Jn 16.13) to all united to Him in Baptism and in faith. The Cenacle on the Pentecost after the Resurrection is only the first and visible advent of the Spirit. The activity of Christ through His spirit continues forever throughout the world until His return. Nevertheless, just as the Sacraments are needed for the visible extension of Christ's sanctifying mission throughout the ages to all nations, so also the proclamation of His word by preachers and deeper instruction in the meaning of that word require other teachers of religion.

Primitive church. This work of teaching the religion of Christ (magisterium) is the responsibility of the Church, especially the Apostles (not just the Twelve) who are themselves both disciples and witnesses of Christ. The appointed successors of the Apostles in the primitive Church were called names other than teacher (e.g., overseers, comforters), which were not altogether synonymous but are now almost impossible to distinguish. As the Church assumed more definite organizational structures, sharper distinctions gradually emerged. These teachers (didaskaloi; see Didache 13.2; 15.2; Epistle of Barnabas 1.8; 4.9; Hermas, Visiones 3.5.1; Similitudines 9.15.4) seem to have been soon absorbed into the clergy, the bishop taking the duty of principal teacher, a role he most often performed in a liturgical context, that is, in homilies on the Gospel and other Scripture texts. Some of the teaching of the great bishops and Fathers is preserved in catechetical discourses and sermons, e.g., the instructions delivered by St. Cyril of Jerusalem to those preparing for Baptism and to those who had just been baptized [see F. L. Cross, St. Cyril of Jerusalem's Lectures on Christian Sacraments (London 1951) and The Great Catechetical Discourse of St. Gregory of Nyssa, tr. J. R. Shawley (London 1917)]. Even in this period of a more or less formal catechesis in the Church, the parental teacher of religion was not forgotten. St. John Chrysostom's Address on Vainglory and the Right Way for Parents to Bring Up Their Children (tr. M. L. W. Laistner, Ithaca 1951) not only insists on the obligation but instructs parents in method. [See CHURCH, II (THEOLOGY OF).]

Teachers of theology. From the beginning, there appears some distinction between the catechist who prepared the catechumen for Baptism and the teacher of a more advanced and deeper study of the faith already received. The problem of a Christian gnosis, a confrontation and harmony of the Christian message and human, secular knowledge in the same teacher, is etched more sharply in the catechetical school of Pantaenus at Alexandria and in its derivatives at Antioch and Edessa. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA in his Paedagogus (tr. Simon P. Wood, Christ the Educator, New York 1954) shows this development from persuasion and formation to instruction. Origen, like his predecessors, began as a catechist, but as sophisticated converts returned for further instruction after Baptism, he and others turned to a more refined, often subtle and allegorical exegesis of Scripture and to the uses of philosophy. The Eastern Fathers, especially the two Gregories, expected the teacher of religion to be well versed in non-Christian culture; Western Fathers, such as Jerome and Gregory the Great, not to mention Tertullian, were suspicious of pagan learning. The significant historical fact is that Christian teachers remained in pagan schools, and the Christian teachers of religion did not yet attempt to teach in their own schools anything but religion.

St. AUGUSTINE (354–430), in his earlier career as teacher and later life as bishop, as well as in his writings, both theoretical and practical, on teachers, represents the acme of patristic teaching, at least in the West. To leave aside his own observations in the Confessions and in the De magistro as only indirectly pertinent, careful attention should be given to his De doctrina christiana (tr. John Gavigan, New York 1947) and De catechizandis rudibus for important insights into the character and function of the teacher of religion. The latter is addressed to the deacon Deogratias of Carthage, who had requested from the bishop of Hippo some advice on first instructions for the catechumens. The reply concerns itself with the catechist himself, who is always being taught even as he teaches. He is especially warned against discouragement with the rudes (the very young and the very simple under instruction). The teacher of religion is to be cheerful in countenance and bearing as he presents sacred history to the catechumens, who may be variously disposed. The De doctrina christiana is more concerned with the formation of the teacher than with the art of pedagogy. A program for the exploitation of every human means possible to understand the sacred text is proposed, and there as in other places, such as the Enchiridion de fide, spe et caritate, St. Augustine provides models for religion teachers.

Monastic teachers. Among the monks of the 4th century, the apa (the Coptic term for father) was first of all the teacher of other solitaries and cenobites who came to him as one experienced in the ways of asceticism and mystical experience. At times in the later development of monasticism, children were taken in to be taught by the monks, but this practice was generally discouraged except under the legal fiction of preparation for the monastic life. The monks for a long time were laymen and unlettered; any presumption on their part to assume a teaching office in the Church was sternly rebuked by the bishops. However, as the institution of monasticism developed, especially in the West, into a more lettered and erudite society, and as more monks received Holy Orders, it was quite natural for the monks to become teachers to the unlettered. A further evolution of religious life provided the Church with a new type of religion teacher; the friars of the high Middle Ages were apostolic in character. They derived their way of life not simply from the monks but from the canons regular, the cathedral clerics who were often teachers, and ultimately from the primitive Christian community described in the Acts of the Apostles. The friars, although they began with popular preaching, quite naturally gravitated toward the newly founded universities.

Teachers of religion in universities. The masters and doctors of the medieval institutions of learning owed much of their ancestry to their Greco-Roman predecessors; the teacher of Catholic truth, whom St. Thomas Aquinas mentions in the first sentence of his Summa, owes more to St. Paul and to Christ. The theologians with their precision based on Scripture and common sense carefully distinguished their own role. Private exhortation, that personal admonition that is a call to repentance, is every Christian's business. The university teacher of sacred doctrine, however, must be scientifically competent to carry on a purely objective and intellectual teaching (St. Thomas, Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 177.2; 3a, 55.2; IV Sent. 6.2.2 ad 2; In 1 Cor. 11.2; 14.7; In 1 Tim. 2.3; In Tit. 2.3). Moreover, the instruction of the little ones was carried on not only by devoted parish priests but by the ambient culture of stone and stained glass. The prescriptions concerning the teaching of religion in the constitutions of John Peckham, who became archbishop of Canterbury in 1279, may at times have been more honored in the breach, but there were good Christian parents, devoted parsons, and the marketplace preaching of the friars. Like St. Augustine, the scholastic teachers theorized on the nature of their operation (e.g., Hugh of Saint-Victor's Treatise on the Pursuit of Learning; John of Salisbury's Policraticus and Metalogicon; Aquinas, Summa theologiae 1a, 1; 117.1; De Ver. 11.1), seeing the teacher as an external principle assisting the principal and divine Teacher acting from within.

Post-Tridentine period. A partial cause of the Reformation was the paucity and poor quality of teachers of religion. While the earlier humanists and the later Protestant reformers attempted to ameliorate the situation on their terms, the Church drew on its own resources. Besides Tridentine decrees on the teaching of religion, there were new religious orders devoted in particular to this work of mercy. St. Ignatius for one was quick to see that the Church needed a learned body of disciplined teachers who would not only teach the humanities but order them to the greater glory of God in the souls of the pupils. The emphasis that the RATIO STUDIORUM of the Jesuits put on the teacher of religion bore fruit in the work of such men as St. Peter Canisius. The Brothers of the Christian Schools (1695) founded by St. John Baptist de la Salle were most influential as teachers of religion to poor and ignorant boys, not only in France but throughout the world. Numerous congregations of women also were founded for the specific purpose of the religious education of children and young women. The Confraternity of Christian Doctrine (1562) used lay teachers for the instruction of children in Sunday schools. Protestants also used lay instructors, and the Bible teacher represented an important contribution to the teaching of the Protestant religion.

Twentieth century. In the years leading up to the Second Vatican Council, greater emphasis was put on the teaching role of parents. Although the council emphasized the obligation of parents to educate their children in faith, it recognized the importance of schools in religious education and those who undertake a teaching career in the name of the Christian community (Gravissimum educationis 3, 5). The words of the council echo in "guidelines for reflection and renewal" published by the Congregation for Catholic Education (1988). The congregation describes the religion teacher as "the key, the vital component, if the educational goals of the [Catholic] school are to be achieved." Because their effectiveness is closely tied to their personal witness, teachers of religion "must be men and women endowed with many gifts, both natural and supernatural." They must have "a thorough cultural, professional, and pedagogical training, and they must be capable of genuine dialogue" (n. 96). The distinction made by the Congregation between religious instruction and catechesis (n. 68) is repeated in the General Directory for Catechesis (1997) which further describes the characteristics of religious instruction and the need for interdisciplinary dialog (n. 73–74).

Bibliography: The teacher of religion is usually treated indirectly and in passing in works on Christian education, catechesis, etc. For OT, see R. DE VAUX, Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions, tr. J. MCHUGH (New York 1961). NT. Y. M. J. CONGAR, Lay People in the Church, tr. D. ATWATER (Westminster, Md. 1957). The Fathers. H. I. MARROU, A History of Education in Antiquity, tr. G. LAMB (New York 1956) 419–465. General. G. SLOYAN, ed., Shaping the Christian Message (New York 1958; pa. 1963). R. MASTERSON, ed., Theology in the Catholic College (Dubuque, Iowa 1961). M. SAUVAGE, Catéchèse et Laïcité (Paris 1962). U. VOLL, "The Teacher in the Church" (Proceedings of the North American Liturgical Week; Philadelphia, Pa. 1964); "The Sacred Teacher," in Proceedings of the Society of Catholic College Teachers of Sacred Doctrine 10 (1964) 7–138. CONGREGATION FOR CATHOLIC EDUCATION, The Religious Dimension of Education in a Catholic School: Guidelines for Reflection and Renewal (Rome 1988). P. W. CAREY and E. C. MULLER, eds., Theological Education in the Catholic Tradition (New York 1997).

[U. VOLL/EDS.]

RELIGION, VIRTUE OF

The supernatural, infused, moral habit that inclines us to give to God the worship that is due Him as Supreme Being and as Creator and Lord of the universe.

Nature of the Virtue. The virtue of religion is a potential part of the virtue of justice. That is, while not being justice strictly so-called (strict justice between God and creatures, as also between children and parents, is not possible), religion is a virtue annexed or akin to justice. Justice is the virtue that gives to each his due. Religion gives to God the homage and service that are His due.

While there has been much discussion of the question whether or not religion is a theological virtue, theologians are in general agreement with St. Thomas Aquinas that religion is not a theological but a moral virtue. Some criticize Aquinas's argumentation, and many seek to give religion a preeminent position in the catalogue of virtues; but all are agreed that it is not to be ranked with faith, hope, and charity. F. Suárez places the virtue of religion immediately after his study of the theological virtues and makes it head the list of moral virtues. While St. Thomas prefers to place the virtue of religion within his study of justice, he does admit that the virtue of religion holds a special rank among the moral virtues (see Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 81.5–6, 8).

Further, St. Thomas holds that the supernatural virtues are not hermetically compartmentalized. Rather, they interpenetrate one another. Thus the virtue of religion can use faith and hope as materials subservient to the ends of religion as, e.g., when one believes something out of reverence for God. On the other hand, charity can command the virtue of religion, as when one performs a religious duty out of love for God.

Perhaps more insistence might be given to the fact that, in the exercise of the supernatural virtue of religion, the virtue of piety has an important part to play. Man's relationship to God, even when religion is concerned, is not that of servant to master. It is rather that of son to father; or more correctly, it is that of both son and servant. While these two roles are simultaneous, they are governed by two distinct, though interpenetrating, virtues. While combining them in daily living, it is good not to confuse them in theological discussion.

Although it is itself a moral virtue, religion has a preeminent role among the virtues of that kind. Every just man is religious because justice demands that the rights of God be respected before those of any others. Without proper attention to the duties of religion, one cannot be properly oriented toward the duties to neighbor or to self. It is rather the fulfillment of this primary duty that ensures proper balance and perspective for carrying out other duties required by justice.

Its Acts. The acts of the virtue of religion are both interior and exterior. The modern liturgical revival has made much of this. God, who is Creator of both body and soul, must be acknowledged by the whole man. This acknowledgment is not something that God needs, but rather it is a demand of justice and human psychology. In every aspect of human life, both body and soul have their share. It would indeed be strange if man were to be only half human in the worship of God.

The reason for interior worship is given by the Gospel: "God is a spirit and they who worship Him must worship in spirit and in truth" (Jn 4.24). The reason for exterior worship is a psychological one. Whatever man experiences fully he expresses in some exterior way. Exterior expression is the means of both manifesting and fostering the interior experience. There are two interior acts of the virtue of religion: DEVOTION and PRAYER. Devotion is the very heart of religion, and prayer is the surrender of the mind to God in a service of contemplation. Devotion is of special importance to the virtue of religion since it acts as a prime mover, setting into motion the religious activity dependent upon it. Devotion is nothing else but readiness to serve God. This disposition of the will is what inclines a man to worship. Prayer is an activity of the practical intellect, which seeks the achievement of certain effects through certain causes. In the case of prayer, the favor for which one prays is sought through the power of God. The causality of prayer lies ultimately in its being a submission to the ordination of Providence to give certain spiritual favors only when they have been requested in humble prayer.

There are three kinds of exterior acts of the virtue of religion: gestures of the body, gifts made to God, and the use of sacred things. Gestures of the body St. Thomas specifically calls ADORATION, and he points out that these gestures would have no worth at all except in virtue of the interior devotion that prompts them. Among gifts made to God, Aquinas numbers offerings and VOWS. Of special importance among offerings is sacrifice, which is reserved to God alone; it is the outward sign of man's dependence upon God for all things, and especially for the gift of life itself. Oblations and TITHES are other forms of offerings. The use of Sacraments and the use of the Sacred Name (e.g., in OATHS, invocations, and adjurations) constitute the use of sacred things St. Thomas had in mind. He does not devote space to a discussion of the use of Sacraments in his treatment of religion, but he does lay down a principle that has inspired many a liturgist: God is worshiped not only by what is given to Him, but also by man's reception of things from God. To receive a Sacrament is to profess one's faith. The use of Sacraments can therefore be considered an act of homage to God.

An age that has rediscovered the meaning of worship and its place in the Christian life must of necessity rediscover the importance of the virtue of religion, for it is "the inner life of worship." Without a deep practice of this virtue, liturgical worship is reduced to mere formalism.

Bibliography: J. W. CURRAN, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932–) 3:716–727. C. M. MAGSAM, The Inner Life of Worship (St. Meinrad, Ind. 1958). F. SUÁREZ, Opera omnia (Vivès ed. v.13–14) De religione. THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 81–100.

[E. R. FALARDEAU]

RELIGION AND MORALITY

It is often claimed that morality became connected with religion only at a relatively late date. But H. Bergson has shown that ancient religions may be called amoral only “if religion such as it was at first is used for a comparison with morality in the form that it assumed later,” and that, inversely, men have been able to claim success in constructing an independent morality only in milieux where religion continued to exercise an influence on consciences without their owners’ being aware of the fact.

Group morality. In primitive civilizations the sacred and the profane, although they are distinguished, are never separated; but conscience seems entirely merged in the collective conscience. The sense of good and evil is completely socialized in this case, and social solidarity includes relations with the dead, the invisible powers, and the elements of the cosmos. As an example, incest is universally forbidden, but it is also deeply feared as inevitably entailing catastrophes in all nature. Actions that do not produce confusion or harm in the human and cosmic solidarity are not regarded as bad, and, conversely, any action that disturbs their order is blameworthy, even if it is involuntary. Thus, cosmic morality is completely identified with cosmic religion. Natural law in the modern sense does not seem to apply, because nature is thought of in a different manner.

Yet here it is necessary to make a slight qualification in this statement. It is more just to say that primitive man submits to the sanction demanded by the collectivity. He agrees with the collectivity if it declares that he is blameworthy or guilty, even if he has no knowledge of having committed the act charged. This, however, does not prevent protest on the part of the individual conscience. It is precisely at this moment that the idea of God as the supreme judge naturally reappears: “God sees me” or this is “God’s business.” But even that leads to a fatalistic submission to the verdict of the group. The latter, moreover, does not act to punish a guilty member, but to suppress a danger.

In primitive societies, the person is not a subject of rights and duties. He is rather a member of a whole, and his reason for existence is his function in the whole. The individual does not pass judgment on advantages or disadvantages; he fulfills his function and in that way gives full meaning to his existence. He is an individualist but not in the modern sense. He seeks to be distinguished from others, but this is accomplished by attracting attention through his conformity to the patterns of his society. A right such as that of property is thought of as legal only if it is put at the service of the community. And the feeling of existential solidarity is so strong through daily experience, that each accepts his function, even if it should be to serve as a victim in a human sacrifice. Protest expresses a kind of astonishment and a hope, but such protest does not lead to revolt.

Development of individual morality. The individual begins really to be distinguished from his function only in heterogeneous civilizations, where he can pass from one group to another within a complex collectivity, or dream of a different society because he has some vague knowledge of other existing civilizations. Then, however, in order to justify his protest and to orient his conduct and leave his group, he has to establish his existence upon an absolute norm, God, or even reason, if indeed reason is conceivable as a norm without God. In other words, reference to the All is no longer identified with the human group and its milieu but is situated beyond it.

A choice can be made between religion and reason. However, the apotheosis of Reason showed what it could do in the days of Robespierre, and again in the early 20th century, when supporters of reason thought that it could resume the antireligious battle “with greater spirit than Voltaire” (S. Reinach). There is no question, meanwhile, of the individual’s returning to the morality of the group, race, party, or raison d’état. The protest of Antigone was representative of an advance in ethics, but it was not the first. On the other hand, morality itself needs a collective sanction that is none other than religion. One appeals from a collective order to another collective conscience and gets an inkling of what the universal religions offer to man, namely, a court that judges both individuals and collectivities. And the tension between the socialized collective conscience and a more profound collective conscience has made equilibrium in human societies possible and disposed humanity for its movement forward.

See Also: MORALITY; RELIGION, VIRTUE OF.

Bibliography: H. BERGSON, Les Deux sources de la morale et de la religion (Paris 1932). L. LÉVY-BRUHL, L’Expérience mystique et les symboles chez les Primitifs (Paris 1938); Les Carnets (Paris 1949) 80–85, 182–184. P. RADIN, The World of Primitive Man (New York 1953; reprint 1960). B. HÄRING, Das Heilige und das Gute (Freiburg 1950).

[J. GOETZ]

RELIGIONS, COMPARATIVE STUDY OF

“Comparative religions” is understood here in the broader, nondisciplinary sense in order to include some important contributions of the past two decades. While the concept of function, which focused on the relation of religious phenomena to their social and cultural contexts, was a prominent tool in the study of religions throughout the first half of this century, in recent research it has been eclipsed by a concern with “structure,” the logical relationships obtaining among religious phenomena within a specific context.

Though he did field work in South America, C. Lévi-Strauss, the leading proponent of structuralist anthropology, is interested primarily in the universal structures of the human mind. He seeks the unconscious framework of relations which underlies superficial facts. Lévi-Strauss characterizes primitive thought, not by its intellectual poverty, but by its demand for order, and has pursued the “logics of myth” in his four volumes of Mythologiques by showing “not how men think in myths, but how myths operate in men’s minds without their being aware of the fact.” His slighting of context has been criticized, but Lévi-Strauss’ bold comparative endeavor merits serious attention.

Mary Douglas, though less concerned with universal structures, has illuminated the conceptions of order which inform beliefs about pollution and taboo in societies as diverse as those of ancient Israel and contemporary Africa. Building on the idea that “dirt” is essentially something that is out of place, she has shown that those beliefs “have as their main function to impose system on an inherently untidy reality.” She also argues, in Natural Symbols, that particular visions of the social order will be expressed in characteristic attitudes toward the body in a given culture.

Like Douglas, Victor Turner proposes a theoretical approach which facilitates comparisons of a broad range of data. Enlarging upon A. van Gennep’s observation that most rituals display a threefold structure of separation-transition-reincorporation. Turner has concentrated on the qualities of the middle phase. During that “limited period,” all structures typical of daily life are suspended; the actors become a homogeneous group, and the feeling of communitas which the ritual engenders confirms both the underlying sentiment of essential equality and the necessity for role- and status-differentiation in society. Turner also discusses how particular symbols can be manipulated to convey ideological messages in rites de passage and other cultural situations.

Georges Dumézil echoes the concern with system in his work on Indo-European mythology. An adherent of la méthode sociologique, Dumézil has found a remarkable coherence of outlook in the mythical literature of ancient India, Iran, Italy, Germany, Scandinavia, and Ireland. He identifies as the principle of coherence the tripartite division of human and divine society into royal, warrior, and cultivator strata. Although the specifically Indo-European character of that ideology has been questioned, the main lines of Dumézil’s challenging synthesis remain unshaken.

Among others in sociology, B. Wilson, through his studies on various contemporary religious movements, has influenced comparative studies of religions. Others might be mentioned, but those examples from several disciplines serve to confirm the persistence of a long-standing task for Religionswissenschaft. Despite its periodic claims to autonomy, it has always had and must continue to incorporate the findings of any discipline which seriously attempts the study of religions.

See Also: RELIGION, SOCIOLOGY OF; RELIGION (IN PRIMITIVE CULTURES).

Bibliography: M. DOUGLAS, Natural Symbols (London 1970); Purity and Danger (London 1966); ed., Rule and Meanings (Harmondsworth, England 1973). G. DUMÉZIL, L'idéologie tripartite des Indo-Européens (Brussels 1958); Mythe et épopée 1 (Paris 1968); 2 (Paris 1971); 3 (Paris 1973). E. LEACH, Claude Lévi-Strauss (New York 1970). C. LÉVI-STRAUSS, The Savage Mind (Chicago 1966); Structural Anthropology 1 (New York 1963); 2 (New York 1976). C. S. LITTLETON, The New Comparative Mythology (rev. ed., Berkeley 1973). J. Z. SMITH, “Birth Upside Down or Right Side Up?” History of Religions 9 (1970) 281–303; “Adde Parvum Parvo Magnus Acervus Erit,” History of Religions 11 (1971) 67–90. V. TURNER, The Forest of Symbols (Ithaca, N.Y. 1967); The Ritual Process (Chicago 1969); Dramas, Fields, and Metaphors (Ithaca, N.Y. 1975). B. WILSON, Sects and Society (London 1961); Magic and the Millennium (London 1973); Contemporary Transformations of Religion (London 1976).

[E. V. GALLAGHER]

RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN)

A religious is a member of the Christian faithful who follows the evangelical counsels of poverty, chastity, and obedience by profession of vows, living a life in common in an institute of consecrated life in a manner of life approved by the Church. Those who are members of secular institutes, which are also institutes of consecrated life, differ from religious in that they do not necessarily live a life in common and they do not give the same manner of public witness. Members of societies of apostolic life live a style of life that resembles religious, but the former do not profess vows.

Before the Second Vatican Council, many religious lived rather similar lives with similar schedules, customs, spirituality, prayer, and the like. With the Second Vatican Council, there came a directive to institutes to rediscover their roots and to return to the charism of their founder or foundress. With the 1983 Code of Canon Law, there came a new emphasis on proper law and subsidiarity. Thus, religious life began to manifest a variety of forms based upon the unique charism, mission, and situation of each religious institute.

Nonetheless, all religious in whatever institute they may live do live lives with important elements in common. Most notably, all are bound by the three evangelical COUNSELS: OBEDIENCE, POVERTY, and CHASTITY. The evangelical counsels are a means to the most important goal of a religious, following Christ. While many of the externals and practices surrounding these counsels have changed, their essentials continue to form the foundation of religious life.

Religious Vows (c. 607). Religious profess a vow of obedience recognizing that the competent religious superior has the right to exercise authority. Superiors are to exercise this authority in a spirit of dialogue, treating the religious as a member of a family rather than a subject. Religious find their model of obedience in Christ who always fulfilled the will of the Father. The religious and the superior are to collaborate in discerning God's will, considering the good of the religious and the institute. This collaboration ends with the decision of the superior if the two cannot reach a common agreement. The living of this counsel is a challenge to a secular need for autonomy and individualism.

Religious profess a vow of chastity which is meant to free the religious for a greater love of Christ and others. Again, the model for this counsel is Christ who gave away his life in love for all persons. While the essence of living this counsel has not altered, much of its rationale has deepened; the emphasis is not on a denial of self but rather on being available to others and being free for apostolic work. Some externals associated with this practice have been discarded; for example, the principles that religious must always be together and should not have close friendships with persons of the other gender. It is recognized that healthy celibates should have authentic friendships with women and men. Following this counsel sets the religious apart from a secular society that sees love solely from a physical or romantic perspective or as a commodity.

The vow of poverty means that religious cannot use property for their own benefit. Whatever a religious acquires, with some exceptions, is acquired for the institute. The model for this counsel is Christ who was rich but for our sake became poor. It is also following the gospel command of Christ to the rich young man to go, sell everything, give it to the poor and follow Christ. Religious who follow a solemn vow tradition renounce both the acquisition and the use of property. Religious who follow a simple vow tradition renounce only the use, such that any property to which they may be entitled is still owned by them, but is administered by another. In following this counsel, religious should be like Christ who depended on the providence of God. The practice of poverty probably seems less strict than it had been; since most religious have apostolates and duties outside their religious houses, and since many must from time to time travel significant distances, most religious must use credit cards and they have access to larger amounts of cash than previously. Nonetheless religious making use of such community funds are expected to live a simple lifestyle. There is also a communal dimension to this counsel since the institute and its members are to be concerned about the poor and work to alleviate their needs. Living out this counsel is a challenge to the consumerism and materialism of society.

Rights and Obligations (cc. 662–72). Most religious live a life in common. Some religious for reasons of apostolate or study or health do not live in a community, but this is not intended as a permanent situation. Small local communities are less institutional, with greater likelihood that there may be few, if any, members home at any one time. This is frequently accompanied with less emphasis on community liturgy and prayer.

Religious houses must have a cloister or enclosure, an area that is reserved to the religious alone. This is done so that religious may have space and quiet for prayer and study. The superior may allow others to enter the enclosure on occasion. Often, areas that may have once been commonly enclosed such as dining rooms and community rooms may now be open to visitors. For many institutes, their charism of HOSPITALITY means inviting others into their houses so that they are not so separated from neighbors and those whom they serve.

It is traditional for religious to wear a habit or a distinctive medallion or logo that identifies their affiliation to a particular institute. The constitutions of the institute define the distinctive garb.

Religious are expected to have a strong life of prayer. The living of the evangelical counsels is rendered much more difficult if the religious does not have a strong relationship with God through prayer.

Many religious institutes are CONTEMPLATIVE, which means that their members spend much of their day celebrating the liturgy of the hours, participating in Mass, and engaging in private prayer. Most of these groups are cloistered and do not as a rule have apostolates outside the enclosed area. Other institutes have what may be called an active apostolate, such as teaching, health care, or parish work. The nature of the apostolate very much affects the nature and way of life within the institute.

The religious institute is obligated to provide its members with what they need to live and fulfill their vocations. What is necessary may vary from institute to institute depending on its proper law.

Recent Trends. Among the more recent trends in religious life is a decline in vocations among most institutes. This is coupled with an increase in the average age of the membership. Many institutes have had to give up many apostolates and change the way that the charism of the institute is expressed in the apostolates that it retains. The decline in numbers also can affect the quality or manner of community life.

Since the Second Vatican Council many religious and religious institutes have manifested a deep concern for SOCIAL JUSTICE. In many cases they believe that it is not enough to provide charitable assistance to the needy, but that they must also work to counteract systemic injustice and inequality in the societies in which they minister. A number of religious work to raise the consciousness of members of their institute and society at large about matters of peace, justice, and the environment.

Religious Clerics. Consecrated life is neither clerical nor lay; nonetheless many religious orders are clerical or lay. Many orders of religious men consist of either clergy alone or priests and lay brothers, the latter being members who profess the vows but are not ordained. These clergy are incardinated in their orders, not in a diocese; the major superior is usually a local ordinary under canon law. Religious clergy often work within a diocese and so are subject to the diocesan bishop in terms of their ministry to the people in the diocese, as well as being subject to their religious superiors in terms of living their religious life. A clerical order is ordinarily under the supervision of clerics; ordinarily the priests and brothers in such orders are essentially equal but the lay brothers cannot hold certain offices.

Bibliography: VATICAN II, “Decree on the Up-To-Date Renewal of Religious Life” (Perfectae caritatis), Oct. 28, 1965 (in Acta Apostolicae Sedis 58 [1966] 702–12). JOHN PAUL II, apostolic exhortation Vita consecrata, March 25, 1996 (in Acta Apostolicae Sedis 88 [1996] 377–486). D. FLEMING and E. MCDONOUGH, eds., The Church and Consecrated Life—The Best of the Review (St. Louis 1996). P. PHILIBERT, ed., Living in the Meantime (New York 1994). C. YUHAUS, ed., Religious Life: The Challenge for Tomorrow (New York 1994).

[P. SHEA]

RELIGIOUS, CANON LAW OF

Religious Institutes are one of the two forms of consecrated life delineated in the Code of Canon Law (cc. 573–731). The code first treats both religious institutes and secular institutes (cc. 573–606), then each separately (religious institutes in cc. 607–709 and secular institutes in cc. 710–730). Canon 573 describes life consecrated through the profession of the evangelical counsels of poverty, chastity and obedience as a stable form of life by which the Christian faithful strive to follow Christ more closely through the Holy Spirit and are entirely dedicated to God for building up the Church and the salvation of the world; those so consecrated seek perfection of charity in furtherance of the kingdom of God and are an outstanding sign in the Church of heavenly glory to come.

Canon 607 describes the nature of religious life as a manifestation to the whole Church of a marriage brought about by God and a sign of the future age through the consecration of the whole person. By this consecration, religious bring to perfection a complete gift of themselves to God through which their entire life becomes a continuous worship of God. This canon describes a religious institute as an organization in which its members, according to its proper law, pronounce public religious vows, either perpetual or temporary; if the latter, the temporary vows are to be renewed before their expiration. The members of the religious institute are to lead the life of brothers or sisters in common.

Historically, the fundamental concept of religious life can be traced to the response of the early Christians to the urging of Christ to strive after evangelical perfection. In the desert, in hermitages, in individual homes and in monasteries, they sought to put his teachings into practice in their lives, and ultimately this led to acknowledgment of their religious way of life by the law of the Church. The first official recognition of the general law came in the Council of Chalcedon (451) when it was decreed that no religious institute could be established without the permission of the local bishop. Consecrated life gradually developed, was adapted throughout history and received a new impetus for renewal from the Second Vatican Council which in the document Perfectae caritatis urged the various institutes to return to their roots and their original charism. In doing this, they were to revise their particular law according to their true charism and the teachings of the council.

Religious institutes are either pontifical or diocesan, depending on the ecclesiastical authority that erected them and has authority over them. Some institutes are clerical, having entirely or primarily clerics as members and consequently certain rights and restrictions concerning their leadership. Other institutes are lay, having solely lay members. Institutes in which the members are both cleric and lay but are not subject to the certain of the rights and restrictions that apply to clerical institutes are recognized as “mixed.” Monastic institutes are the subject of certain unique provisions. Institutes are also described as contemplative or apostolic depending on the type of apostolate or purpose that they have.

Consistent with the principle of subsidiarity, great importance is paid to the proper law of the institute in the form of constitutions and statutes for the entire institute and individual provinces if the institute organizes itself this way. The code leaves many matters for proper law to delineate. This means that the law applicable to an individual religious institute can better reflect its charism, mission and unique situation.

Governance (cc. 617–640). The code describes the authority that all superiors are to exercise in terms of service, providing that they should treat those under their authority as children rather than subjects, promoting voluntary obedience and displaying a willingness to listen. Nonetheless, the superiors have the authority to act for the common good of the institute if a superior and subject cannot agree on an issue.

Monastery, convent, priory and friary are among the various names used to indicate a religious house which must be erected in accordance with canon law and consequently is the subject of certain rights. Individual religious are ordinarily assigned to a specific religious house under the authority of a local superior. This local superior is in turn subject to the authority of a major superior called a provincial, if the institute is divided into provinces, or a major superior called a general superior or supreme moderator, if the institute is not so divided; if the institute is divided into a province, all the provincials are subject to the authority of a general superior or supreme moderator. Major superiors and supreme moderators or general superiors are each to be advised by a council. The general chapter of an institute holds supreme authority in the institute according to the proper law of the institute; the general chapter meets every few years to elect leadership, determine policies, propose amendments in proper law and decide matters of greater importance.

All religious are subject to the supreme authority of the Church and are bound to obey the pope as their highest superior in virtue of the vow of obedience. Ordinarily, the pope leaves the government of an institute to its own superiors. If the Holy See is involved in a decision affecting religious, this is ordinarily done through the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and for Societies of Apostolic Life which is the administrative office of the Holy See that handles issues related to religious life.

While institutes, provinces and houses can acquire and administer temporal goods, they must do so according to the requirements of canon law; they are to avoid any appearance of wealth. There are specific rules governing the alienation of temporal goods and depending on the value of the goods involved, permission of various superiors and even of the Holy See may be required. There are similar laws governing mortgages and the encumbering of property.

Membership and formation (cc. 641–661). The code sets forth several qualifications for membership which include that a candidate must have completed seventeen years of age, not be bound by vows of matrimony, not already be a member of another institute of consecrated life or society of apostolic life and not be under the influence of force, grave fear, or malice. The proper law of the institute may set other qualifications, many of which may deal such matters as physical and mental health.

The code provides for a period of formation before a candidate may eventually make perpetual profession of vows. Proper law covers the preparation for entering novitiate, often called postulancy. NOVITIATE is a period of at least a year during which the novices begin their life in the institute by means of a program so they can understand the vocation proper to the institute, experience life within the institute, and form their minds in its charism; it is a period during which the novices and those entrusted with their formation discern their intentions and suitability for life in the institute. A novice can freely leave novitiate or be dismissed. At the end of novitiate, if a novice is judged fit for religious life, then the novice may make temporary profession. A major superior can also extend the duration of novitiate of a novice but not beyond six months.

By religious profession, members are committed to follow the evangelical counsels by public vow and are incorporated into the institute. Temporary profession lasts a limited period of time defined in the law of the institute: not less than three years nor more than six. Competent authority can extend this period in individual cases but not beyond nine years. During this time the member in temporary vows lives the life of the institute but is still undergoing formation during which the member and those in charge of formation determine the religious’s suitability for the institute. Temporary profession is renewed from time to time. With the approval of the competent authority according to the law of the institute, a member may make perpetual profession providing, among other requirements, that the religious is at least twenty-one years old and has been in temporary vows for at least three years. The code makes it clear that formation does not end when one takes perpetual vows, but continues throughout the life of the religious.

Obligations and rights (cc. 662–671). The supreme rule of life for religious is comprised of following Christ as found in the Gospels and as delineated in their proper law. It follows that their primary duty is prayer by such means as the Mass, Eucharistic devotions, reading of scripture, liturgy of the hours, the marian rosary, an annual retreat, private prayer, an examination of conscience and frequent confession. Religious must use discretion regarding communications media and they are to avoid what may be harmful to their vocation.

Religious are to live in their own religious house, but they may be absent with permission for periods exceeding a year for reasons of health, studies or apostolate. All houses are to have an area of enclosure or cloister—always reserved to members alone—which must be adapted to the character of the institute. Monasteries of nuns entirely devoted to contemplative life must observe papal cloister according to the norms of the Holy See.

Before first profession religious are to cede administration of what goods they may own to another. Before perpetual profession religious must renounce their goods fully and they must make a will. There are two traditions with regard to the vow of poverty, the solemn vow tradition and the simple vow tradition. In institutes which follow a solemn vow tradition, the religious must renounce ownership and use of all property. In institutes which follow a simple vow tradition, the religious may retain the ownership of their goods, but they must renounce the use of goods and cede the administration of the goods to another; the goods that such a religious continues to own but not use are sometimes called patrimony. Whatever religious acquire by means of their own effort or by reason of their work on behalf of the institute is acquired for the institute.

Religious are to wear the habit of the institute, which is specifically designated garb, as a public witness to their consecration and poverty. Clerics of an institute which does not have a proper habit are to wear clerical dress according to the norm of canon law. Religious are not to accept offices or duties outside the institute without the permission of the appropriate superior. All religious are also bound by specified obligations of clerics.

The institute has an obligation to supply its members with all those things necessary to fulfill their vocation according to the proper law of the institute.

Apostolate (cc. 673–683). The primary APOSTOLATE of all religious consists of their witness of consecrated life. The code emphasizes that contemplative institutes hold a distinguished place in the Church and their members are not to be summoned to serve in more active apostolates. Institutes dedicated to the works of the apostolate are to be imbued with an apostolic spirit, and a religious spirit must influence their apostolic action; apostolic action must always be carried out in communion with the Church. The code also stresses the value of lay institutes.

Religious ordinarily work within a diocese and must obey the bishop in those matters that concern care of souls, public exercise of divine worship and other works of the apostolate. Religious who serve in an apostolate outside the institute must also obey their own religious superiors and remain faithful to the discipline of the institute. Given the potential for some conflict in this area, bishops and religious superiors are to cooperate and organize apostolic works through mutual consultation. If a religious is to serve in a diocesan apostolate, the diocesan bishop is to appoint the religious after the religious superior has proposed or presented the religious for appointment. The diocesan bishop may conduct visitation in apostolates of the religious institutes in which the Christian faithful are ordinarily served, but they do not have this right with regard to schools that serve exclusively the institute's own students.

Separation (cc. 684–704). If religious desire to transfer from one institute to another, they must have the consent of the supreme moderator and council of each institute and they must undergo a period of formation before joining the new institute. If a religious wishes to transfer from a religious institute to a secular institute or a society of apostolic life, or vice versa, then the consent of the Holy See is also required. A religious in temporary vows can freely depart when the period of the vows expires. Otherwise, the consent of the competent authority is required.

If a religious for a serious reason wishes to leave the institute for a temporary period, then the supreme moderator can grant a decree of exclaustation for not more than three years with the consent of the council. If exclaustation is sought for more than three years, then the Holy See for institutes of pontifical right and the diocesan bishop for institutes of diocesan right must grant it. Only the Holy See can grant exclaustation for nuns. For grave reasons the Holy See (for institutes of pontifical right) or the diocesan bishop (for institutes of diocesan right) can impose exclaustation on a member of the institute upon the petition of the supreme moderator and council. A religious on exclaustation remains a member of the institute and remains dependent upon the religious superiors and also the local ordinary, especially if the religious is a cleric, but the religious is freed from obligations that are inconsistent with the situation of being on outside the community on exclaustation.

For serious reasons, a religious can petition for an indult of departure from the supreme moderator and the council; departure must be approved by the Holy See for institutes of pontifical right and by the diocesan bishop of the house to which the religious is assigned. If the religious seeking departure is a cleric, then he must first find a bishop who will incardinate him or receive him experimentally.

An institute may dismiss a member for a serious reason; the institute must either show a violation of certain canons or a continuing incorrigibility in violating other obligations of religious life. A religious may only be dismissed after the institute has followed a prescribed process of dismissal, which includes a right of defense of the religious. The supreme moderator must issue the decree of dismissal after obtaining the consent of the council and it must be confirmed by the Holy See or diocesan bishop of the house to which the religious is assigned, depending on whether the institute is pontifical or diocesan.

Eastern law code (cc. 410–572). In the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches, monastic life provides the pattern for religious orders and congregations. The Eastern code appears to approach religious institutes more from a historical paradigm, recognizing the historic influence of monasticism, while the Latin code seems to have a more abstract organization for religious institutes. The Eastern code tends to legislate in more detail, whereas the Latin code seems to allow more topics to be handled under proper law. The Eastern code necessarily differs because of the different hierarchical structure, so that, for example, there are institutes of pontifical, patriarchal or eparchial right. The Eastern code also seems to give more authority over the internal life within monasteries to the Apostolic See, patriarchs and eparchs than the Latin code gives to the Holy See and bishops.

Bibliography: VATICAN II, “Decree on the Up-To-Date Renewal of Religious Life” (Perfectae caritatis), Oct. 28, 1965 [in Acta Apostolicae Sedis, 58 (1966) 702–712]. New Commentary on the Code of Canon Law, eds., J. BEAL et al., (New York 2000). Selected Issues in Religious Law—Bulletin on Issues of Religious Law 1985–1995, ed., P. COGAN, (Washington 1997). A Handbook on Canons 573–746, eds., J. HITE et al., (Collegeville, Minn. 1985). R. MCDERMOTT, “Two Approaches to Consecrated Life: The Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches and the Code of Canon Law,” Studia Canonica, 29 (1995) 193–239.

[P. SHEA]

RELIGIOUS, CONSTITUTIONS OF

Constitutions (or constitution) are the fundamental code of the proper law of a religious institute, drawn up by the members and sanctioned by competent ecclesiastical authority (Codex iuris canonici c. 587 §2). The constitutions of religious institutes provide constitutive or essential norms that reflect the sacred patrimony of the institute (c. 578). Some constitutions draw upon the inspiration of the holy founder contained in the institute’s rule (Augustinian, Basilian, Benedictine, Franciscan) that guides the spirituality of the members. The Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life (CICL) approves the constitutions for religious institutes of pontifical right (c. 587 §2; 593), and the diocesan bishop of the principal seat approves those of diocesan right after he has consulted any other bishops to whose diocese the institute has spread (c. 587 §2; 594; 595 §1). In some clerical exempt religious institutes, it is required and sufficient that the changes be approved by the general chapter of the institute which has ecclesiastical power of governance (c. 596 §2). Constitutions supplement the universal law for a particular religious institute, inasmuch as they protect its vocation and identity (c. 587 §1). The constitutions of a religious institute should not be contrary to the universal law, unless the variance is authorized by the Apostolic See.

The constitutions contain the designs of the founder or foundress regarding the nature, purpose, spirit, and character of the institute, as well as its sound traditions approved by competent ecclesiastical authority (c. 578). Besides norms that explicate the spiritual patrimony of the institute, this fundamental code includes principal norms of governance, discipline of the members, formation, incorporation, and the object of the sacred vows (c. 587 §1). Both spiritual and juridic elements can be joined in the constitutions, but there should not be a multiplication of unnecessary norms (c. 587 §3). Norms established by the competent authority of an institute and collected in other codes (directories, statutes) are also part of the proper law of the religious institute. These lesser or complementary norms should be reviewed periodically and adapted by the competent authority of the institute in accord with the needs of places and times (c. 587 §4).

Changes or amendments in constitutions are approved by ecclesiastical authorities only after they have been recommended by a two-third vote of the general chapter of the particular religious institute. While the diocesan bishop of the principal seat approves the constitutions, confirms changes, and dispenses from the disciplinary norms of the constitutions in particular cases for an institute of diocesan right, he cannot approve nor confirm changes reserved to the Apostolic See (c. 595).

At religious profession, members assume the observance of the three evangelical counsels by public vow and are incorporated into the institute with rights and obligations defined by law (c. 654). All religious have as their supreme rule of life the following of Christ (sequela Christi) as proposed in the gospel and expressed in their constitutions (c. 662). Superiors fulfill their function and exercise their power in accord with the norm of universal and proper law (c. 617). Constitutions often incorporate divine or ecclesiastical laws; likewise, they contain fundamental norms pertaining to the religious life. A religious who would transgress the constitutions in a grave, external, imputable, and juridically proven matter could, after formal canonical warnings and the administrative process set forth in the universal law, be dismissed from the religious institute (c. 694–701). Ordinarily, the disciplinary norms of the constitutions which are not precepts of God or the Church or the essential obligations of the evangelical counsels do not of themselves bind under pain of sin. However, the habitual transgressions of disciplinary norms out of contempt or laxity would certainly be blameworthy.

Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches. In the CCEO the fundamental code of a monastery is the typicon (c. 414 §1, 1°), while that of a religious order or congregation is referred to as statutes (c. 414 §1, 1°; 511 §1). The competent ecclesiastical authority who approves these laws and changes, or dispenses from the norms in a particular case and for a single occasion, is the eparchial bishop with respect to monasteries and congregations of eparchial right (c. 414 §1 1°). If a congregation of eparchial right has extended to other eparchies, the eparchial bishop of the principal house is bound to consult with the eparchial bishops in whose eparchies the houses are located (c. 414 §3). A patriarch has this authority with respect to orders and congregations of patriarchal right which have their headquarters within the territorial boundaries of the Church over which he presides (c. 414 §2). The Congregation for the Eastern Churches has authority over all other orders, monasteries, and congregations that are not of eparchial right (c. 414 §2). However, approval of changes or amendments to norms approved by a higher authority cannot be approved by a lesser ecclesiastical authority (c. 414 §1, 1°). Superiors of monasteries, orders, and congregations are bound by a grave obligation to see that the members committed to their care direct their lives in accord with the proper typicon or statutes (c. 421). Likewise, each religious is obliged to tend to perfection in arranging his or her life in accord with the typicon or statutes in fidelity to the intention and determinations of the founder (c. 426).

[R. MCDERMOTT]

RELIGIOUS, EXEMPTION OF

The exemption of religious, in the 1983 Code of Canon Law, refers to the possibility of the pope exempting a religious or secular institute or a society of apostolic life from the governance of local ordinaries and subjecting it to himself alone or to another ecclesiastical authority (cc. 591, 732). Thus far, this is a mere theoretical possibility, because the pope has not used this provision since the 1983 code took effect. This code eliminated all remaining distinctions in law between exempt and non-exempt religious that had developed over many centuries and was codified in the 1917 Code of Canon Law.

The Former Law. In the 1917 code, religious exemption was granted by law or by pontifical privilege. All the religious orders of “regulars” (those with solemn vows) were exempt by law, namely, the orders of monks, canons regular, mendicants, and the Jesuits. Some congregations of simple vows were granted this privilege by the pope. Monasteries of cloistered nuns were exempt from the local ordinary’s jurisdiction, provided they were accountable to a male superior of the order, but even then they had fewer rights than the male orders and were subject to the local ordinary in more respects. The 1917 code granted various powers and rights to the exempt, but none of these is unique to the old exempt orders anymore.

In the law of the 1917 code, superiors and chapters in clerical exempt institutes had the power of jurisdiction; the other institutes did not (c. 501, §1). The major superiors of clerical exempt institutes were ordinaries, which gave them all the powers of an ordinary in the law. In 1964, Pope Paul VI granted several faculties, formerly reserved to the exempt, to the general superiors of non-exempt, pontifical, clerical institutes and societies, including the power of jurisdiction (Cum admotae, Nov. 6, 1964, AAS 59 [1964] 374–79). The 1983 code removed all other distinctions among clerical major superiors. All clerical major superiors of pontifical right are ordinaries and exercise the power of governance. All have equal powers in the universal law (cc. 134, §1; 596, §2).

In the former law, major superiors of clerical exempt institutes could establish semipublic oratories in their houses, as well as secondary oratories in the house or an institution connected with it (1917 c. 1192). Non-exempt religious needed the permission of the local ordinary to establish a semi-public oratory. In the 1983 code, this difference is abolished; any ordinary can establish an oratory (c. 1223).

Under the law of the 1917 code, houses of regulars were completely exempted from the canonical visitation of the local ordinary. In 1966, Paul VI gave the right to local ordinaries to conduct the visitation of churches of exempt religious and of their semi-public oratories that were regularly used by the faithful (Ecclesiae sanctae, I, Aug. 6, 1966, AAS 58 [1966] 757–75, no. 38). In the 1983 code, all religious are subject to the same provisions on visitation by the bishop (c. 683). The bishop has no right to visit the houses of any pontifical right institutes for matters concerning internal governance and discipline. The bishop is obliged to conduct a visitation of their churches; their oratories, if the faithful regularly come to them for the liturgy; their works of religion or charity; and their schools, except for schools open only to their own members (c. 683).

In the former law, exempt religious had to observe special judicial procedures for the dismissal of a member in perpetual vows (1917 cc. 654–68). The non-exempt followed a simpler procedure. In 1974, a decree of the Sacred Congregation for Religious and Secular Institutes determined that exempt religious were to observe the same dismissal process as the non-exempt (Processus judicialis, Mar. 2, 1974, AAS 66 [1974] 215). The 1983 code likewise has only one procedure for all institutes (cc. 694–704).

Other differences between exempt and non-exempt religious in the 1917 code included laws on the superior who could punish violations of the cloister, grant faculties for preaching and hearing confessions, issue dimissorial letters, dispense from non-reserved private vows, grant permission to a priest to perform an exorcism, and remit censures reserved to the bishop or to the ordinary (1917 cc. 1338; 875; 964, 2^o; 1313, 2^o; 1151; 2253, 3^o). None of these differences between exempt and non-exempt institutes exists in the current law.

Exemption Today. Except for the hypothetical possibility in c. 591 of the pope granting an exemption, nothing remains in the current universal law of the traditional differences between exempt and non-exempt religious. The changes in the law began at Vatican II, with the council decreeing that exemption “does not prevent religious being subject to the jurisdiction of the bishops in the individual dioceses in accordance with the general law, insofar as is required for the performance of their pastoral duties and the proper care of souls” (Christus Dominus 35). In 1966, Pope Paul VI established new laws governing the relations between local ordinaries and religious, and the exempt and non-exempt were treated alike (Ecclesiae Sanctae I, 22–40). The 1978 document of the Sacred Congregations for Religious and Secular Institutes and for Bishops, Mutuae relationes, spoke of a “renewed awareness of exemption.” The exempt were not to be thought of as subject to the pope alone, but they “should cultivate above all special attachment to the Roman Pontiff and to the bishops . . .” (Directives for the Mutual Relations Between Bishops and Religious in the Church, May 14, 1978 [Washington: USCC], no. 22).

During the process of revising the 1917 code in the 1970s, the commission (coetus) on religious law stated its intention to eliminate obsolete norms and those that treated men’s and women’s institutes unequally. It specifically mentioned exemption and its juridical consequences as being obsolete and inappropriate (Pontifical Commission for the Revision of the Code of Canon Law, Schema of Canons on Institutes of Life Consecrated by Profession of the Evangelical Counsels [Washington: USCC, 1977] 11). Accordingly, the 1983 code no longer distinguishes between the regular orders with solemn vows and the congregations with simple vows, between the exempt and the non-exempt. The law continues to differentiate between clerical and lay institutes (c. 588). Only clerical major superiors are ordinaries and have the powers of ordinaries in law.

Exemption is not an operative principle in the 1983 code. It has been replaced by “the rightful autonomy of life” of all religious and secular institutes and societies of apostolic life (cc. 586, 732). This means that members of these institutes and societies have considerable freedom in controlling their own internal governance and discipline in keeping with their nature, purpose, spirit, character, and sound traditions (c. 578). All members of these institutes and societies, whether of pontifical right or diocesan right, are subject to the diocesan bishop in three areas: the care of souls, the public exercise of divine worship, and other works of the apostolate (c. 678, §1). Institutes and societies of diocesan right are additionally subject to a closer supervision by the diocesan bishop in the same ways that pontifical institutes and societies are subject to the Holy See (cc. 593–95).

Bibliography: E. FOGLIASSO, “Exemption des Religieux,” Dictionnaire de droit canonique, v.5 (Paris 1953) colls. 646–65. G. GHIRLANDA, “Iusta autonomia et exemptio Institutorum religionum: fundamentum et extensio,” Periodica 78 (1989) 113–42. J. M. HUELS, “The Demise of Religious Exemption,” The Jurist 54 (1994) 40–55. D. J. KAY, Exemption: Origins of Exemption and Vatican Council II (Rome 1990).

[J. M. HUELS]

RELIGIOUS BROTHERS CONFERENCE

Founded as the National Assembly of Religious Brothers in 1971. The name was changed to the National Association of Religious Brothers in 1996, and the present name in 2000. The Religious Brothers Conference is the only organization in the American Church designed specifically to be of service to religious brothers. The organization is composed of individual memberships from brothers throughout the U.S. and from other parts of the world. The Conference is directed by a national board and elected office. An executive Secretary conducts the daily business of a national office.

Brothers' Voice, a newsletter of the Conference is published five times a year for its members. An annual national meeting is sponsored in different parts of the U.S. The organization seeks to project a strong national image for the religious brother, and maintains a close working relationship with every Catholic organization.

In relation to the needs of the Church and the needs of religious brothers for their continued growth in their religious life and their service to the Church, the Conference seeks to encourage the development of the spiritual life of all brothers; to promote increased awareness among brothers of their ministerial power for good; to publicize the unique vocation of brothers; to provide a means for brothers to help shape the direction of their religious life; to heighten brothers' concerns with and involvement in the needs of the Church and society; and to improve communication among brothers and to provide liaison with the various organizations of the Catholic Church. The headquarters of the Conference is in Chicago, Ill.

[W. BILTON/EDS.]

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION (ARTICLES ON)

The articles in the New Catholic Encyclopedia under the headings RELIGIOUS EDUCATION, RELIGIOUS EDUCATION ASSOCIATION, and RELIGIOUS EDUCATION MOVEMENT use religious education as a generic term descriptive of a range of activities associated with learning about religious beliefs and practices. Related to these entries is a cluster of articles that in some cases overlaps and complements the above, and in some cases describes religious indoctrination that for some is incompatible with true religious education. This latter cluster is grouped under some cognate of catechesis. They include three entries on the history of catechesis, CATECHESIS (EARLY CHRISTIAN); CATECHESIS (MEDIÉVAL) and CATECHESIS (REFORMATION). Important in the history of catechesis are the CONFRATERNITY OF CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE and MUNICH METHOD IN CATECHESIS. The article CATECHISMS is complemented by entries describing specific catechisms, CATECHISM OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, CATECHISM OF THE COUNCIL OF TRENT, and CATECHISMS IN COLONIAL AMERICA. Another genre of catechetical works is described under the headings GENERAL DIRECTORY FOR CATECHESIS and CATECHETICAL DIRECTORIES, NATIONAL. The general entry describing the role and tasks of the CATECHIST is complemented by biographies of a large number of individuals, some canonized and some beatified, who authored catechisms and worked as catechists. A number of associations to assist catechists in their work include the INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL FOR CATECHESIS and the NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF CATECHETICAL LEADERSHIP. Another cognate, CATECHUMENATE traces the history of that institution and describes the modern form that is closely related to the liturgy, the sacraments of initiation, and sacramental practice in general. This relationship is explored in detail under the heading LITURGICAL CATECHESIS and to some extent FIRST COMMUNION and INFANT BAPTISM.

[B. L. MARTHALER]

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION

Religious education is understood in several ways. As a generic term it serves as an umbrella for a variety of pedagogical activities associated in one way or another with religion, e.g., formation, instruction, socialization, schooling, moral development, catechesis, bible study, teaching theology. In recent years it has also acquired a specific meaning, describing a particular field or discipline of academic study which investigates the theory and practice of the activities mentioned. In this latter sense religious education is perceived as "a special work demanding focused scholarship, unique training programs, and personnel" (Lee 8).

Origins of the Discipline. Several factors caused scholars to take a more systematic and theoretical approach to religious education. By the end of the 19th century the public school, a firm support of the Protestant tradition in the U.S., was well on its way toward secularization. The burden of religious education, therefore, fell more and more on the family, churches, Sunday and vacation schools, and similar institutions. Such Protestant writers as George Albert Coe, Paul Vieth, William Clayton Bower, Luther Weigle, Lewis Sherrill, H. Shelton Smith, and James Smart subjected religious education endeavors to a critical examination. In Roman Catholic circles a certain dissatisfaction with the conventional method of rote memorization of the catechism, the emergence of kerygmatic theology in the 1930s, and the blossoming of the liturgical movement in the 1950s raised theoretical questions about the nature and purpose of religious education. The need to address theoretical issues became more clearly defined in the 1960s when The Catholic University of America, Marquette, Fordham, Notre Dame, and other Catholic universities began to offer graduate programs.

Theoretical Approaches. It is possible to identify four theoretical approaches to religious education among contemporary Roman Catholic writers.

The Theological Approach. This accepts the premise of the 1972 General Catechetical Directory that religious education is a form of the ministry of the Word (1972 GCD 17). The nature and purpose of religious education are defined in terms of transmitting creed, code, and cult. Religion is carried on under the direction of the Church's teaching authority.

The Social Science Approach. The designation describes religious education as the process by which religious behavior is facilitated. It argues that religious education must be grounded in learning theory and the empirical research of the social sciences. It emphasizes teaching or instruction which is defined as a prime means "of promoting learning more rapidly, of helping to effect the retention of learned behaviors for a longer period, and facilitating the translation of learned behaviors into the personal lifestyle of the student" (Lee 8).

The Socialization Approach. A third approach sees religious education as a process of socialization. The term is used, by different authors, to mean: (1) the nurture of a personal religious identity and integrity; (2) the process whereby a person is initiated and assimilated into a particular religious community; or (3) the acquisition of a religious symbol system. The first understands socialization as it is used by psychologists; the second as in sociology; and the third as in anthropology, where it is also called acculturation. Religious educators who take this approach insist to a greater or lesser degree on all three aspects. The Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults is based on a socialization model of catechesis.

The Educational Approach. This theory holds that education is essentially religious. In this context education is carefully distinguished and sometimes totally dissociated from schooling. Education is understood as the systematic planning of experience for growth in human understanding. It is religious insofar as it examines the deepest meaning of the origin and destiny of the world and finds its expression in social gestures—symbols and behaviors.

Evaluation. The differences in these four approaches can be most readily seen in the way they define the relationship of religion to education. The theological model takes religion—creeds, code, and cult—as the content to be taught; its educational philosophy and procedures are largely unexamined. The social-science model puts religion and education in dialogue with one another so that religious education is responsive to psychology, sociology, and anthropology, as well as to theology. The socialization model takes creed, code, and cult not so much as the content but as the means whereby individuals and communities acquire religious identity in a particular tradition; they create what they represent. The educational model separates institutional religion from education so that while Christian education and catechesis are legiti-mate ministries of the Church, they are not properly speaking dimensions of religious education.

While this taxonomy is based on the works of contemporary Catholic authors, there are also Protestant scholars who advocate each of the above approaches. Whatever must be said of the philosophical assumptions and theories which underlie them, in practice these approaches are not mutually exclusive.

Bibliography: H. W. BURGESS, An Invitation to Religious Education (Mishawaka, Ind. 1975). J. M. LEE, The Shape of Religious Instruction (Dayton 1971). M. J. TAYLOR, ed., Foundations for Christian Education in an Era of Change (Nashville 1976). P. O'HARE, ed., Foundations of Religious Education (New York 1978). T. GROOME, Christian Religious Education (San Francisco 1980). K. R. BARKER, Religious Education, Catechesis, and Freedom (Birmingham, Ala. 1981). M. HARRIS, Fashion Me a People: Curriculum in the Church (Louisville, Ky. 1989). I. V. CULLY and K. B. CULLY, Harper's Encyclopedia of Religious Education (San Francisco 1990). T. H. MORRIS, The RCIA: Transforming the Church: A Resource for Pastoral Implementation, rev. and updated ed. (New York 1997).

[B. L. MARTHALER]

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION ASSOCIATION

The Religious Education Association (REA) was founded in 1903 as part of a larger progressive movement to improve education in the United States. The background to the movement was the alliance that had been formed in the 1840s between the common (public) school and the Sunday school. Major social and economic changes at the end of the nineteenth century brought increasing doubts about the effectiveness of the Sunday School. Many Protestant leaders saw the need for a realignment of efforts.

The main leadership in founding the REA was provided by William Rainey Harper, president of the University of Chicago. The intellectual leader of the movement was unquestionably George Albert Coe. The first meeting of the REA brought together 400 college presidents, political leaders, church administrators and religious thinkers. The keynote address was given by John Dewey on the importance of the new field of psychology. This first meeting generated great optimism that the time was ripe for educational change. The REA had three ambitious aims: 1) To create cooperation among Catholic, Protestant and Jewish educators in the United States and Canada 2) To bring the teaching of religion into the public school 3) To professionalize church education in the local congregation.

In this same decade, the NATIONAL CATHOLIC EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION was founded, a sign that the Catholic church had reservations about the REA. Only a few Reform Jews became active members of the Association. Most Protestants, especially the Evangelicals, did not join. As a result, the REA became mostly identified as a liberal Protestant organization.

The REA has never really flourished even while it continued to hold national conferences. Its most notable achievement has been the journal Religious Education which has been continuously published throughout the century. The hope to professionalize church education was frustrated by the Depression of the 1930s. The viability of a church position called Director of Christian Education suffered a setback from which it has never recovered in most denominations. In addition, the theological shift in Protestant theology after the Second World War called into question the liberal aims of religious education. In the public school, Bible reading and the recitation of the Lord's Prayer continued until the 1960s, but any attempt to introduce religious instruction faced formidable opposition.

The REA received a big boost in 1965 with the entrance of large numbers of Roman Catholics. The largest national conferences of the Association occurred in the late 1960s and early 1970s, and there were also regional conferences. At that time a related organization, the Association of Professors and Researchers in Religious Education, was founded. Although APRRE evolved from within the structure of the National Council of Churches, it has functioned as a professors' section of the REA, contributing to the journal and co-sponsoring national conferences.

Compared to many Catholic and Evangelical organizations, the REA always had a small membership that continues to provide an ecumenical setting for educational discussion and the hope of greater cooperation among religious groups in the future.

Bibliography: G. A. COE, A Social Theory of Religious Education (New York: 1920). S. SCHMIDT, History of the Religious Education Association (Birmingham: 1983).

[G. MORAN]

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION MOVEMENT

A movement that emerged in the United States in the 1890s. As the Sunday School movement began to wane, Protestant educators attempted to reconfigure their educational efforts. The RELIGIOUS EDUCATION ASSOCIATION was formed with the ambitious intention of bringing religion and education into a dynamic, new relation.

The choice of the term religious education was a sign of the ecumenical intentions of the Protestant founders of the movement. Catholic and Jewish educators were invited to join the movement but only a small number did. The more conservative part of Protestantism was also wary of the movement and evangelical Protestants retained their own separate organizations. Very quickly, therefore, religious education became the equivalent of liberal Protestant education.

A separate religious education movement in the Catholic church had its beginnings in the 1930s. The focus of this movement was the life of Jesus as recounted in the New Testament. In Europe, a biblical and liturgical movement had been launched at the beginning of the century. The effects of this movement were not apparent in the United States until the 1950s. Dissatisfaction with the question-answer approach of the traditional catechism led to the "kerygmatic movement" with its emphasis on salvation history in the Old Testament and the announcement of the gospel in the New Testament. Textbooks for religion classes in Catholic schools showed this new emphasis in the early 1960s.

With the founding of graduate programs of religious education at Catholic universities and colleges before and after the Second Vatican Council, religious education became recognized as an area of academic study. At the CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA, the graduate program of Religious Education, under the leadership of Gerard Sloyan, provided direction for this movement in the 1960s. Similar programs were started at Fordham University, Marquette University, Manhattan College, the University of Notre Dame, Boston College, and more than a dozen other Catholic colleges.

When the Catholic school system began to shrink in the late 1960s, a movement was begun to professionalize parish-based education. Parishes began to hire men and women who had earned degrees in religious education. For the first ten years, the role had various names. The 1975 publication of The DRE Book by Maria Harris helped to establish the name of the position as Director of Religious Education. This movement quickly became a significant part of the church's educational work.

As a result of these developments, religious education in the Catholic church came to be closely identified with parish education. Many parishes replaced the term Confraternity of Christian Doctrine with religious education. New efforts in adult education were also included under religious education. Somewhat illogically, the Catholic school and religious education were often seen to be alternatives that were in competition for financial support.

At the same time that religious education was coming into general use in the Catholic church it was declining in use among Protestant churches. The 1950 book The Clue to Christian Education by Randolph Crump Miller is often cited as signaling the end of the religious education movement. Henceforth, Protestant seminaries and congregations would call their educational work by the name of “Christian education,” a title that has continued to the present.

In English-speaking countries outside the United States, religious education usually takes its meaning from a movement that began in England during the 1940s. Under the leadership of Archbishop William Temple, religious education was given a legal standing. Every county (state) school in England and Wales was to provide religious education. The Education Act of 1944 defined religious education as comprised of two parts: a daily exercise of collective worship and religious instruction according to an agreed syllabus. The requirement of prayer was controversial from the start and schools often downplayed its observance. One result has been that religious education became equivalent to the religious instruction element, and most commonly the term refers to the subject taught in the state schools.

In the United States the courts have almost never referred to religious education; courts usually refer to “religious instruction” as the sectarian activity that is forbidden by law. But it is usually assumed by editorial writers, politicians and textbook makers that religious education is unconstitutional. When the United States Supreme Court in the 1960s outlawed religious exercises in public schools, it encouraged the study of religion. However, the movement to include religion in public schools has always distanced itself from religious education, even though academic instruction in religion could be logically included in religious education.

At the beginning of the 21st century, the pattern of religious education shows no signs of coalescing into a single, logical meaning. Catholic, Protestant, Jewish and other religious groups continue to refer to their educational activities with terms that are thought to be more specifically appropriate to the group. In the Catholic church, catechesis, initiation and formation have particular connotations that are related to sacramental life. Nevertheless, Catholics are the most frequent users of the term religious education both in referring to parish based programs and to the general field of study.

Protestant churches nearly always refer to Christian Education, except in settings where there is conversation with Catholics and Jews. There has been a great deal of conversation between Protestants and Catholics since 1965 and cooperation in publishing ventures. The Religious Education Press, founded by James Michael Lee, published the works of Protestant and Catholic scholars.

Thomas Groome’s Christian Religious Education in both its title and its content provided a meeting place for discussion by Catholics and Protestants.

Jews occasionally use the term religious education, especially when in conversation with Christians. Jews in Israel use the term more often than do Jews in the United States. The only groups that use religious education as their usual way to refer to education are those outside the mainstream, either to the left or the right. Unitarian-Universalists have consistently used the term for over a century; more recently the Unification church speaks of religious education. The point of convergence of such disparate groups is their aim to transcend traditional differences among religions and achieve for the first time a universal religion.

Despite the limitations in its hundred-year history, religious education has often provided an umbrella term for interreligious dialogue. In the United States, Roman Catholics, Jews, Protestants, Orthodox Catholics, and recently some Buddhists and Muslims have been able to converse about religious education and at times engage in cooperative educational projects. The Association of Professors and Researchers in Religious Education has provided a forum for Catholic, Protestant and, in recent years, Jewish academics.

In England the ecumenical possibilities of religious education, which was the reason for Archbishop Temple’s choice of the term in the 1940s, began to be realized in curriculum developments of the 1960s. John Hull at the University of Birmingham spearheaded the development of school curricula that include study of the major religions of the world. This ecumenical approach to religious education in schools is now present in parts of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and Ireland. It has also had some influence in Norway, Sweden, the Netherlands, Germany and Eastern Europe. An International Seminar on Religious Education, with members from 25 nations, has been meeting regularly since 1978.

Bibliography: T. GROOME, Christian Religious Education (San Francisco 1980). M. HARRIS, The DRE Book (New York 1975). J. HULL, New Directions in Religious Education (London 1982). G. MORAN, Religious Education as a Second Language (Birmingham 1989). M. ROSENAK, Commandment and Concern: Jewish Religious Education in Secular Society (Philadelphia 1987). P. SCHREINER, ed., Religious Education in Europe (Munich 2000). I. V. CULLY and K. B. CULLY, Harper’s Encyclopedia of Religious Education (San Francisco 1990).

[G. MORAN]

RELIGIOUS HABIT

A religious habit is the distinctive attire or dress proper to a particular religious institute. From early times the basic religious habit generally consisted of a tunic that was secured by a cincture or belt; a scapular; and a hood. Most religious women wore a veil and wimple instead of the hood. This remained the model of religious attire until the rise of apostolic religious congregations in the sixteenth century, and still obtains in some of the contemplative, cloistered orders.

From the outset, the habit adopted by any religious institute served several purposes. First, and most basically, it identified the individual wearing it as a member of a particular group. Then, very often within an institute, differences in the habit distinguished those in leadership positions from the others, or distinguished brothers from clerics or those in solemn vows from those in simple vows. The habit was also worn as an expression of spirituality that reflected the values and charism of the institute and its separation from the world. Finally, the habit was an essential piece of the common life of religious, and a means of assuring the observance of poverty.

History. Saint Pachomius (294–346), who introduced cenobitical monachism in Egypt, was the first to establish definite provisions regarding monastic attire. The Pachomian habit consisted of a sleeveless linen tunic, held together by a cincture, a tanned goatskin or sheepskin cloak, and a small thin cape to which was connected a hood bearing a special badge of the monastery. Saint Basil the Great (329–79), who observed the conditions of monastic life while journeying in Egypt, succeeded in adopting a special garb for the monks of the Eastern Church. For Saint Basil the habit was an effective instrument to make a monk realize his station in life and to keep him from indecorous conduct. John Cassian (350–447) gives a detailed description of the monk's garb. While insisting on the utility of dress appropriate to monastic life, he explains the mystical significance of each item—cincture, hood, tunic, scarf, cape and goatskin.

Fourth-century writers record many testimonies on the ceremony of veiling virgins and the garb of female religious. Saint Ambrose related that his sister Marcellina received the "robe of virginity" from the hands of Pope Liberius (352–366) in Rome. Elsewhere, Saint Ambrose recounted that many young women came to be veiled in Milan.

The first pontifical directive dealing explicitly with the wearing of the religious habit is the epistle of Pope Celestine (423–32), written in 428. Celestine reprimanded clerics who attempted to introduce the monastic garb as a distinctive garb for the clergy of Gaul. Saint Benedict (480?–543), the father of Western monasticism, summarized his directions regarding the monk's clothing in chapter 55 of his Rule. Their attire was to be dictated ac-ording to the circumstances of the place and the nature of the climate in which they live according to the discretion of the abbot. In a temperate climate a cowl and a tunic were deemed sufficient plus a scapular for work and stockings and shoes. The color and texture of the clothes were not a concern except that they be such as can be bought cheaply.

Carthusian Nun in a Novice's habit, 18th century. (©Gianni Dagli Orti/CORBIS)

According to early monastic custom the habit was not usually assumed until the novitiate was over; consequently, the practice of the Congregation of Cluny in having its novices wear the entire habit, with the exception of the hood or cowl, was a deviation from previous monastic practice. Later the Regula Bullata of Saint Francis (1223) describes the "habit of probation" given to candidates. It consisted of two tunics without the capuche (hood); the cord, trousers, and cape. Franciscans did not wear a scapular and the habit, modelled on the pilgrim's garb, substituted a cord for the belt (cincture). Professed friars—those who had "promised obedience"—wore the capuche and "in case of necessity" shoes. In the Middle Ages color became a distinguishing feature of the habits worn by mendicants. In England, Franciscans were known as the Grey friars, Dominicans as Black friars and Carmelites as White Friars.

The apostolic congregations that developed in the sixteenth century modelled their attire on the dress of clerics rather than the habits of monks or mendicants. The Jesuit Constitutions, for example, set down only three conditions for clothing: that it be appropriate, that it conform to clerical dress in the locality, and that it be in keeping with the vow of poverty. In practice this meant, the Jesuits wore cassocks but there was a certain latitude in color. Most wore black or grey, but in Aragon some wore violet and possibly brown.

Similarly, the newer congregations of women usually adapted the contemporary dress of the locality, in some cases dressed as ordinary women of the countryside. Saint Vincent de Paul, carefully distinguishing the Daughters of Charity from cloistered nuns does not speak of a habit except to say their veil is to be “holy modesty” (The End and Fundamental Virtues of the Institute, ch. 1). Both Elizabeth Seton, in the United States, and Cornelia Connelly, in England, adopted the simple black “widow’s weeds” common at the time (nineteenth century). Thus many did not adopt a habit in the monastic sense, but a style of dress that only became uniform with the passage of time because it was not changed or adapted. The distinctive garb of the Missionaries of Charity founded by Mother Teresa of Calcutta in the twentieth century is an adaptation of the cotton sari worn by women in India.

Legislation. Among the papal and conciliar enactments, the Fourth Council of Constantinople (869–70) may be the first to have regulated the wearing of the habit. According to canon 27 monks who were raised to the episcopate were liable to the severe penalty of deposition for laying aside the monastic habit. The Fourth Council of the Lateran (1215) reaffirmed canon 27, but it was the constitution Ut Periculosa in the time of Pope Boniface VIII (1294–1303) that had the force of universal law by reason of its inclusion in the Liber Sextus. Ut Periculosa forbade regulars to remove their religious garb under pain of excommunication latae sententiae. It remained the fundamental source of law and served as the basis for the various disquisitions on the habit up to, through and after the Council of Trent. Commentators continued to discuss the conditions required to incur the excommunication of Boniface VIII for the temerarious removal of the religious garb.

At the end of the 19th century Pope Leo XIII published the Constitution Conditae a Christo that gave bishops the legal right to found new religious institutes, and shortly afterward the Congregation of Bishops and Regulars published its Normae, or directives, for the foundation of institutes of simple vows. These latter directed that a detailed description of the habit adopted by any new institute be included in constitutions sent for approbation to Rome. After application had been made to the Holy See for approval of constitutions, alterations in the form of the habit were prohibited without authorization from the Congregation of Bishops and Regulars. It was the desire of the Holy See to curb the odd forms of religious habit that were being adopted. Notwithstanding the Normae, adequate control was not attained over the practices of the religious institutes. Consequently, Pope Saint Pius X (1903–14) issued the motu proprio Dei Providentis, demanding that bishops consult the Holy See before they founded institutes. Explicit information had to be transmitted to Rome regarding the name, founder, purpose, scope, and religious habit of prospective institutes. The Pontiff wished to check the establishment of new congregations that would have no specific difference from extant ones but would merely employ a new name or new form of religious habit.

In the 1940s Pope Pius XII (1939–58) counseled a prudent modification of the garb of sisters in keeping with the demands of reason, hygiene, and well-ordered charity. At the time his exhortations went unheeded for the most part, and it was not until Vatican Council II 20 years later that religious heeded the call to modify, and in many instances, discard the habit entirely, except for some type of sign or symbol which would identify the wearer as a member of a particular congregation. This was the result of the interpretation of Perfectae Caritatis, the Vatican document on the renewal of religious life, which stated “The religious habit, as a symbol of consecration, must be simple and modest, at once poor and becoming. In addition, it must be in keeping with the requirements of health and it must be suited to the times and place and to the needs of the apostolate. The habits, both of men and of women, which are not in conformity with these norms ought to be changed” (number 17). Renovationis Causam, the Instruction on the Renewal of Religious Life dealing with formation, issued in 1969, stated only that “As for the habit of the novices and other candidates to the religious life, the decision rests with the General Chapter.”

The Code of Canon Law of the Latin church, promulgated in 1983, states that religious are to wear the habit of the institute, made according to the norm of proper law, as a sign of consecration and as a witness to poverty. Clerical religious, that is, priests who are religious, if they belong to an institute which does not have a proper habit, are to wear the clerical dress mandated by the episcopal conference norms and legitimate local custom (c. 669).

The Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches has similar norms for monks and other religious, stating that they should wear the monastic habit in and outside of the monastery or the house, in accord with their statutes and the norms of the eparchial bishop.

Bibliography: D. M. HUOT, "Summus Pontifex Pius XII et accomodata renovatio in statibus perfectionis," Apollonaris 32 (1959) 360–68. G. ROCCA, ed., La Sostanza dell'Effemero: gli abiti degli Ordini religiosi in Occidente (Rome 2000).

[R. M. SERMAK/C. BARTONE]

RELIGIOUS OF JESUS AND MARY

A religious community of women (RJM, Official Catholic Directory, #3450) with papal approbation, founded in Lyons, France, in 1818, by Claudine Thévenet (Mother Mary St. Ignatius, 1774–1837). The Religious of Jesus and Mary (RJM) devote themselves principally to Christian education and to mission work. The constitutions of the congregation, based on the Rule of St. Ignatius of Loyola, received papal approval in 1847. The motherhouse was transferred to Rome in 1903. The community spread successively to Spain, England, Canada, the U.S., Switzerland, Ireland, Argentina, Germany, Mexico, and Cuba. In 1842 the sisters opened their first foreign mission in India, where they later expanded to Pakistan. Subsequently other missions were founded in Canada, Algeria, Spanish Guinea, Gabon, Colombia, Bolivia, Uruguay, New Zealand, Haiti and Mexico.

After coming to the U.S. in 1877, the sisters established themselves at Fall River, Mass. The U.S. provincialate is in Mt. Rainier, MD. In the U.S., the sisters are engaged in academic education, catechetics, pastoral ministries and social outreach.

[M. B. A. HAMELIN/EDS.]

RELIGIOUS ORDERS, ANGLICAN-EPISCOPALIAN

In 16th-century England an act of Queen ELIZABETH I dissolved the religious houses refounded by MARY TUDOR. An Anglican mixed community, founded by Nicholas Ferrar, existed at Little Gidding, Northamptonshire, between 1625 and 1646. Several attempts were made to establish Anglican so-called Protestant monasteries and Colleges of Maids during the 17th and 18th centuries, but none succeeded.

The modern revival of the religious life in the Anglican Communion started with the foundation of the Sisterhood of the Holy Cross (London 1845). After 1848, more than 100 female communities were established in Great Britain and Ireland, the majority devoted to active works of mercy and charity or to teaching. Approximately 30 male communities were founded in Britain after J. H. NEWMAN's short-lived "monastery" at Littlemore, Oxford (1842). While many of the Anglican religious orders in Great Britain witnessed a declining number of vocations, this was compensated by the growth of religious orders in the worldwide Anglican communion, especially in Africa.

According to the 2002–03 Anglican Religious Communities Year Book, there were about 2,500 religious (950 men and 1,550 women) in the worldwide Anglican Communion, distributed as follows: 420 in Africa (50 men, 370 women); 95 in Asia (25 men, 70 women); 825 in Australasia and the Pacific (600 men, 225 women); 800 in Europe (175 men, 625 women); 360 in North America and the Caribbean (100 men, 260 women). The accompanying table shows the breakdown of international orders.

Bibliography: P. F. ANSON, The Call of the Cloister (rev. ed. London 1964), full bibliog. for Anglican religious communities. A. M. ALLCHIN, The Silent Rebellion: Anglican Religious Communities 1845–1900 (London 1958). F. BIOT, The Rise of Protestant Monasticism, tr. W. J. KERRIGAN (Baltimore 1963). S. C. HUGHSON, An American Cloister (6th ed. West Park, N.Y. 1961). A Directory of the Religious Life. . . in the Church of England (2d ed. Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge; 1957). Guide to the Religious Communities of the Anglican Communion (3d ed. London 1963). Religious Communities in the Episcopal Church and in the Anglican Church of Canada (3d ed. West Park, N.Y. 1964). Anglican Religious Communities Year Book 2002–2003 (Norwich, England 2001).

[P. F. ANSON/EDS.]

RELIGIOUS TEACHERS FILIPPINI

A congregation of women religious (MPF; Official Catholic Directory #3430) with papal approbation. One of the earliest teaching communities of sisters in Italy, it was founded by St. Lucy FILIPPINI and Cardinal Marc' Antonio BARBARIGO, Bishop of Montefiascone, a city north of Rome, Italy. In 1692 the Cardinal asked Lucy to head the schools he had organized for the education of young girls. Twelve years later he devised a set of rules to guide Lucy and her followers in the religious life. The sisters were to be dedicated to providing Christian training for the children of the common people. As the community grew, it attracted the attention of Clement XI who, in 1707, called Lucy to Rome to found schools there.

In 1910, five sisters arrived in the U.S. Their destination was St. Joachim parish, Trenton, N.J., and their mis-

AFRICA
	Anglican-Episcopalian Religious Orders
Lesotho	Community of the Holy Name, Lesotho Province (CHN, estb. 1962, women) Society of the Precious Blood, Priory of Our Lady, Mother of Mercy (SPB, estb. 1905, women)
Madagascar	Fikambanan'ny Mpanompoavin I Jesoa Kristy (FMJK, Society of the Servants of Jesus Christ, estb. 1985, women)
Mozambique	Community of St Paul (CSP)
South Africa	Community of Jesus' Compassion (CJC, estb. 1993, women) Community of St John the Baptist (CSJB) Community of St Michael & All Angels (CSM&AA, estb. 1874, women) Community of the Holy Name, Zulu Province (CHN, estb. 1969, women) Community of the Resurrection of our Lord (CR, estb. 1884, women) Society of St John the Divine (SSJD, estb. 1874, women)
Swaziland	Community of St Peter (CSP)
Tanzania women)	Chama Cha Mariamu Mtakatifu (CMM, Community of St. Mary of Nazareth and Calvary, estb. 1946,
Zimbabwe	Chita che Zita Rinoyera (CZR, Holy Name Community, estb. 1935, women) Chita che Zvipo Zve Moto (CZM, Community of the Gifts of the Holy Fire, estb. 1977, mixed community of nuns and friars) Community of the Blessed Lady Mary (CBLM, estb. 1983) Community of the Divine Compassion (CDC, estb. 1986) Community of the Holy Transfiguration (CHT, estb. 1982, women)
ASIA
Bangladesh	Brotherhood of the Epiphany (BE, estb. 1879, men) Christa Sevika Sangha (CSS, Handmaids of Christ, estb. 1970, women) Sisterhood of St Mary (estb. 1929, women)
India	Brotherhood of the Ascended Christ (BAC, estb. 1877, men)
Japan	Community of Nazareth (CN, estb. 1936, women)
Malaysia	Community of the Good Shepherd (CGS, estb. 1978, women)
South Korea	Daughters of St Francis (DSF) Korean Franciscan Brotherhood (KFB, estb. 1994, men) Order of St Benedict, Pusan (OSB, estb. 1993, women) Society of the Holy Cross (SHC, estb. 1925, women)
EUROPE
Ireland	Community of St John the Evangelist (CSJE, estb. 1912, women)
UK	Alton Abbey, Benedictine Community of Our Lady & Saint John (OSB, estb. 1884, men) Community of All Hallows (CAH, estb. 1855, women) Community of St Andrew (CSA, estb. 1861, women) Community of St Clare (OSC, estb. 1950, women) Community of St Denys (CSD, estb. 1879, women) Community of St Francis (CSF, estb. 1905, women) Community of St John Baptist (CSJB, estb. 1852, women) Community of St John the Divine (CSJD, estb. 1848, women) Community of St Laurence (CSL, estb. 1874, women) Community of St Mary the Virgin (CSMV, estb. 1848, women) Community of St Peter (CSP, estb. 1861, women) Community of St Peter of Horbury (CSPH, estb. 1858, women) Community of the Companions of Jesus the Good Shepherd (CJGS, estb. 1920, women) Community of the Glorious Ascension (CGA, estb. 1960, men and women) Benedictine Community of the Holy Cross (CHC, estb. 1857, women) Community of the Holy Family, St. Mary's Abbey (CHF, estb. 1898, women) Community of the Holy Name—UK Province (CHN, estb. 1865, women) Community of the Reparation to Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament (CRJBS, estb. 1869, women) Community of the Resurrection (CR, estb. 1892, men) Community of the Sacred Passion (CSP, estb. 1911, women) Community of the Servants of the Cross (CSC, estb. 1877, women) Community of the Servants of the Will of God (CSWG, estb. 1953, men and women)

EUROPE (cont.)

UK
 Community of the Sisters of the Love of God (SLG, estb. 1906, women)
 Ewell Monastery (Anglican Cistercian, estb. 1966, men)
 Oratory of the Good Shepherd (OGS, estb. 1913, men)
 Order of St Benedict, Burford Priory (OSB, estb. 1941, men and women)
 Order of St Benedict, St. Mary of the Cross, Edgware (OSB, estb. 1866, women)
 Order of St Benedict, Elmore Abbey (OSB, estb. 1914, men)
 Order of St Benedict, Malling Abbey (OSB, estb. 1891, women)
 Order of the Holy Paraclete (OHP, estb. 1915, women)
 Sisterhood of the Epiphany (SE, estb. 1902, women)
 Sisters of Charity (SC, estb. 1869, women)
 Society of All Saints Sisters of the Poor (ASSP, estb. 1851, women)
 Society of Our Lady of the Isles (SOLI, estb. 1984)
 Society of Our Lady St Mary (SLSM)
 Society of St Francis, European Province (SSF, estb. 1921, men)
 Society of St John the Evangelist, Cowley Fathers (SSJE, 1866, men)
 Society of St Margaret (SSM, estb. 1855, women)
 Society of the Franciscan Servants of Jesus & Mary (FSJM, estb. 1935)
 Society of the Holy Trinity, Ascot Priory (SHT, estb. 1848)
 Society of the Precious Blood, Burnham Abbey (SPB, estb. 1905, women)
 Society of the Sacred Cross (SSC, estb. 1914, women)
 Society of the Sacred Mission (SSM, estb. 1893, men)
 Society of the Sisters of Bethany (SSB, estb. 1866, women)

NORTH AMERICA

Canada
 Sisterhood of St John the Divine (SSJD, estb. 1884, women)

USA
 Community of St John Baptist (CSJB, estb. 1874, women)
 Community of St Mary (CSM, estb. 1865, women)
 Community of the Holy Spirit (CHS, estb. 1952, women)
 Community of the Transfiguration (CT, estb. 1898, women)
 Order of Julian of Norwich (OJN, estb. 1985, men and women)
 Order of St Anne, Bethany Convent (OSA, estb. 1910, women)
 Order of St Benedict, Servants of Christ Priory, Phoenix, AZ (OSB, estb. 1968, men)
 Order of St Benedict, St. Gregory's Abbey, Three Rivers, MI (OSB, estb. 1939, men)
 Order of St Helena (OSH, estb. 1945, women)
 Order of the Holy Cross (OHC, estb. 1884, men)
 Order of the Teachers of the Children of God (TCG, estb. 1935)
 Sisterhood of the Holy Nativity (SHN, estb. 1882, women)
 Society of All Saints Sisters of the Poor (ASSP, estb. 1872, women)
 Society of St Francis, American Province (SSF, estb. 1919, men)
 Society of St John the Evangelist, Cowley Fathers (SSJE, estb. 1866, men)
 Society of St Margaret, Boston, Mass. (SSM, estb. 1873, women) Society of St Paul (SSP, estb. 1958, men)

OCEANIA-PACIFIC

Australia
 Benedictine Community of Christ the King (CCK, estb. 1933, women)
 Community of the Holy Name (CHN, estb. 1888, women)
 Order of St Benedict, St. Mark's Priory, Camperdown (OSB, estb. 1975, men and women)
 Little Brothers of Francis (LBF, estb. 1987, men)
 Australia Sisters of the Incarnation (SI, estb. 1911, women)
 Society of the Sacred Advent (SSA, estb. 1892, women)

Australia/New Zealand
 Society of St Francis (SSF, estb. 1921, men)

Melanesia
 Community of the Sisters of Melanesia (CSM, estb. 1980, women)
 Melanesian Brotherhood (MBH, estb. 1925, men)

New Zealand
 Community of the Sacred Name (CSN, estb. 1893, women)

Papua New Guinea
 Congregation of the Sisters of the Visitation of Our Lady (CVL, estb. 1964, women)

Solomon Islands
 Society of St Francis, Pacific Province (SSF, estb. 1921)

sion was to serve the needs of neglected Italian immigrants. Had it not been for Thomas Joseph Walsh, then bishop-elect of Trenton, the difficult circumstances of the early years would have constrained the sisters to return to Italy. In 1918 Mother Ninetta Ionata, the leader of the group and later superior general, appealed to him for help. In 1920 he purchased Villa Victoria, on the banks of the Delaware River in New Jersey, to serve as a motherhouse and novitiate. Ten years later, Villa Walsh, an estate on Tower Hill in Morristown, N.J., became the new motherhouse and novitiate for the U.S. province of St. Lucy, and the site of the community's high school, school of music, and college.

Over the years in the U.S., the sisters have become engaged in academic education, catechetics, daycare centers, parish ministries, retreats, pastoral ministries, social outreach and foreign mission work. There are two American provinces: St. Lucy Filippini Province (headquartered in Morristown, NJ) and Queen of Apostles Province (headquartered in Bristol, CT). The generalate is in Rome.

[M. MARCHIONE/EDS.]

RELIQUARIES

Containers for safeguarding and exhibiting the relics of saints; they first appeared with the development of the veneration of RELICS. Among the oldest known are small casket-form boxes of silver found in the church of St. Nazarius in Milan and the famous ivory Samagher reliquary of Pola, Yugoslavia. The façade of the latter shows the confessio and apse of the fourth-century Constantinian basilica of St. Peter, enabling modern archeologists to reconstruct the interior lineaments of the original church. An earlier example (c. 315) of an ivory casket-type reliquary, preserved in the Reliquary Museum at Brescia, is decorated with a cycle of Old and New Testament scenes.

Rings and Crosses. The discovery of the true cross in Jerusalem by St. Helena, of the relics of St. Stephen the Protomartyr, the bodies of SS. Gervasius and Protasius at Milan, and those of the Forty Martyrs frozen to death under Licinius (c. 320) in the East, as well as the wide dispersal of relic particles of the true cross, said by PAULINUS OF NOLA to cover the whole world (Epist. 32.11), caused the rapid appearance of many types of reliquaries, including rings, amulets, and encolpia (small round containers suspended on a chain about the neck and worn upon the breast). Crosses of gold, silver, or crystal were used to contain pieces of the true cross (Peregr. Aether. 37.1–2), such as the silver-plated copper cross of Justinian (sixth century) in the Treasury of St. Peter's, Rome, and the cross of Gregory I (603) in the Theodolinda Treasury at Monza. The use of precious metals for reliquaries is attested in the late fourth century by St. Jerome (Adv. Vigil. 5) and at the start of the fifth by Prudentius (Perist. 11.184–8).

Table and "Speaking" Reliquaries. Between the seventh and ninth centuries various forms of reliquaries came into existence. Among the Merovingians a burse-form reliquary was made of cloth with the relic woven into it. An example of this type can be found in the National Museum of Nürnberg, Germany. There were, too, pocket reliquaries of rich metal, conveniently carried on one's person. A seventh-century example is in the Abbey of Saint Moritz, and one from the eighth century is in the former State Museum in Berlin. Reliquaries were also constructed in table form, that is, the relics were imbedded in small tables decorated with enamel, jewels, or paintings. Table reliquaries containing a piece of the true cross are to be found at the cathedral of Limburg (c. 950), the palace of Henry II in Munich (c. 1024), and the church of St. Matthias in Trier (c. 1220).

So-called "speaking reliquaries" were fashioned to symbolize the relics they contained. Examples are the hornshaped reliquary of St. Hubertus, patron of the hunt, in the church of St. Servatius in Maastricht, Holland, and the nail-shaped and the crown-of-thorns-shaped reliquaries in Trier. In the early 12th century, reliquaries were often shaped like parts of the body: a leg, an arm, or especially a head or bust. There are famous bust reliquaries of the Apostles Peter and Paul at the Lateran in Rome, of St. JANUARIUS in Naples, and of St. Zenobius in the cathedral of Florence. A famous head reliquary of St. John the Baptist (15th century) adorns the cathedral of Aosta, Italy; and the silver head reliquary of St. Andrew, brought to Rome for safekeeping under Pope Pius II (1464), was returned to the cathedral at Patras by Pope Paul VI (1964).

In the Form of Buildings. A few notable reliquaries took the form of gabled buildings or shrines and reflect the architectural patterns of the period of their construction. Following the Maas-Rhein school of architecture with Godefroid of Claire, Nicholas of Verdun, and Hugo of Oignies, there is the Shrine of the Three Kings in the treasury of the cathedral of Cologne (c. 1200), constructed after the supposed relics of the Magi were captured in the storming of Milan (1162) and carried off to Cologne. This is a magnificent silver shrine (nearly six feet long and four-and-a-half feet wide) that resembles a church with a nave and two aisles. Of slightly later date (c. 1230) and of Gothic design is the resplendent Marienschrein at Aachen. Towers and other building forms were used during the late Middle Ages, and the Renaissance artists bent their talents to the construction of finely jeweled reliquaries. In the baroque period glass casings for bones reconstructed in bodily form became common, and the relics were exhibited beneath the altar in the full clothing of a bishop, monk, or nun. The form of modern reliquaries is a modest capsule with a glass lid, although ostensorial types are still common, usually for exhibiting large relics or groups of relics on an altar.

Bibliography: H. S. CRAWFORD, Journal of the Royal Society of Antiquarians of Ireland, 53 (1923) 74–93, 151–176. M. S. BYNE, Forgotten Shrines of Spain (Philadelphia 1926). J. BRAUN, Die Reliquiare des christlichen Kultes und ihre Entwicklung (Freiburg 1940), bibliog. A. GRABAR, Martyrium, 2 v. and portfolio (Paris 1943–46). A. LIPINSKY, Münster 15 (1962) 353–375, Bologna reliquaries. F. J. DÖLGER, Antike und Christentum, v.3 (Münster 1932) 81–116.

[J. M. FARNIK/EDS.]

REMBERT OF BREMEN-HAMBURG, ST.

Monk, second archbishop of Bremen-Hamburg; d. Bremen, Germany, June 11, 888. At an early age Rembert (or Rimbart) entered the monastery of Turholt near Bruges in Flanders, where he first met St. ANSGAR, first archbishop of Hamburg, and became his constant companion. Rembert, consulted by Ansgar on the choice of his eventual successor, was asked to accept the archbishopric himself. Although he refused at first, Rembert finally accepted, and his consecration after Ansgar's death (865) was approved by Louis II the German. Pope Nicholas I conferred the PALLIUM on him. Soon thereafter—as Ansgar had desired—Rembert was formally received as a monk at CORVEY. Tradition holds that Rembert made missionary journeys as far north as Sweden during his many years as archbishop, but this is disputed. Because of a foot ailment he accepted ADALGAR OF BREMEN as his coadjutor. He was buried near the cathedral church in Bremen. A life of Rembert was written c. 900 (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 2:765–775). Rembert's biography of Ansgar (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 2:683–725) is a valuable historical document and character sketch.

Feast: Feb. 4.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis Feb. (Rome) 1:559–571. O. H. MAY, Regesten der Erzbischöfe von Bremen, v.1 (Hanover 1928) 15–19. A. HAUCK, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands (Berlin-Leipzig 1958) 2:708. G. G. MEERSSEMAN, Rembert van Torhout (Brugge 1943). ADAM OF BREMEN, History of the Archbishops of Hamburg-Bremen, tr. F. J. TSCHAN (New York 1959). Geschichtsschreiber der deutschen Vorzeit v.22 (1939), v.44 (1962), lives of Rembert and Ansgar. A. RÖPCKE, Pro memoria Remberti (Husum 1990).

[V. A. SCHAEFER]

“Reliquary Bust of St. Donato” by Donadino da Brugnone.
(©Elio Ciol/CORBIS)

REMESAL, ANTONIO DE

Dominican chronicler; b. Villa de Allariz, Galicia, Spain, date unknown; d. probably Zacatecas, Mexico, after February 1627. He was a member of a noble family and studied at the Colegio de San Sebastián, Salamanca. There he became a distinguished linguist, proficient in Greek, Latin, and Hebrew. He came to America in 1613 with Alonso de Galdo, bishop of Comayagua. On his arrival in Guatemala, Remesal settled at the Dominican convent in Santiago de los Caballeros. He apparently began his historical investigations at once, but also gained a reputation as a preacher and a scholar. He encountered the animosity of the dean of the cathedral, Felipe Ruiz del Corral, who was also commissary of the Inquisition. Remesal's major work, the Historia de la Provincia de San Vicente de Chiapa y Guatemala, was finished in Oaxaca, and the author then went to Spain, where he received a royal cedula authorizing its publication June 1, 1619. The work met with resistance in Guatemala, where Ruiz del Corral tried to prevent its circulation by denouncing it to the Inquisition as branding all priests as bastards and all nobles as adulterers and traitors to the king. The Holy Office eventually found no cause to destroy the history, but in the meantime Remesal underwent two periods of confinement.

A 14th-century Venetian reliquary, detail showing St. Erasmus in relief with border of diamonds and rosettes, gold and silver, located in the treasury, Cattedrale di Santa Eufemia, Grado, Italy. (©Elio Ciol/CORBIS)

The history is an extensive chronicle, patiently and exactly done. Remesal used archival materials and oral tradition and reproduced both civil documents, including royal cédulas, and ecclesiastical ones. The work is divided into 11 books. It begins with the conquest of Mexico and Central America and the pioneer missionary activities that accompanied it. Book 5 has much material on the natives of Chiapas, as does book 7, which discusses native character and rights, ways of life, and the problems involved in conversion. In addition to the history of the Dominicans, the work contains also much information on the Mercedarians in Chiapas and Guatemala.

Bibliography: A. DE REMESAL, Historia general de las Indias occidentales y particular de la gobernación de Chiapa y Guatemala, 2 v. (2d ed. Guatemala City 1932). F. FERNÁNDEZ DEL CASTILLO, Fray Antonio de Remesal (Mexico City 1920).

[J. HERRICK]

REMIGIO DE' GIROLAMI

Dominican theologian and preacher; b. Florence, 1235; d. there, 1319. Known also as Remi of Florence, he came from one of the foremost families of the city, the Chiaro Girolami. While studying arts at the University of Paris, he entered the Dominican Order at Saint-Jacques c. 1268. He is thought to have been a disciple of St. THOMAS AQUINAS, whom he certainly knew at Paris and whose doctrine he later followed. Before 1275, while still a deacon, he began his long teaching career as lector at Santa Maria Novella in Florence. In 1284 he was preacher general for Florence, and in 1294 he was prior of Santa Maria Novella. During his second assignment to Paris, he read the Sentences (1300–02) before receiving license to incept directly from BONIFACE VIII in 1302. Two Quodlibeta date from his regency, which continued at least until 1304, when BENEDICT XI invited him to lecture in the curia in Perugia. He was provincial of the Roman province (1309–10) and again prior of Santa Maria Novella in 1313. He lived to celebrate his 50th anniversary as a Dominican.

The bulk of his writings, 24 treatises, of which only one has been edited, are preserved in Florence (Bibl. Naz. 910 C. 4). Among the more important treatises are De modis rerum, De bono communi, De peccato usurae, De via paradisi, and an alphabetically ordered Quaestiones theologicae (Bibl. Naz. G. 3. 465). His lectures on Romans and 1 Corinthians are preserved in Florence (Bibl. Naz. G. 4. 936). There is some evidence for considering him one of the “teachers” of DANTE ALIGHIERI in the sense that Remigio’s lectures were open to Florentine citizens, and Dante’s Convivio seems to have been inspired by Remigio.

Bibliography: P. GLORIEUX, Répertoire des maîtres en théologie de Paris au XIII^e siècle 1:177–179. C. VASOLI, Enciclopedia filosofica 4:63. M. GRABMANN, “Fra Remigio de’ Girolami O.P., discepolo di S. Tommaso d’Aquino e maestro di Dante,” Scuola cattolica 5–6 (1925) 267–281, 347–368; Mittelalterliches Geistesleben, v.1 (Munich 1926) 361–373, 10:764–765.

[P. GLORIEUX]

REMIGIUS OF AUXERRE

Carolingian humanist and theologian; b. c. 841; d. Paris, 908. Remigius (Remi) became a Benedictine at the monastery of Saint-Germain at Auxerre where HEIRIC OF AUXERRE was his teacher. When Heiric died, Remi assumed his teaching post. He later taught at Reims (after 862) and at Paris, where he had ODO OF CLUNY as his pupil.

Remi’s labors, the fruit of earlier Carolingian learning, continued the work of reviving classical letters begun by ALCUIN, “Dunchad,” and JOHN SCOTUS ERIGENA. Since he was trained in the methodology of Laon, Reims, and Auxerre, which called for compiling, commenting, and writing glosses, Remi was the author of numerous glosses and commentaries on Latin authors (Cato, Terence, Vergil, Juvenal, PRUDENTIUS, Sedulius, Persius, and BEDE), on several late ancient grammarians (Priscian, Donatus, Phocas, and Eutyches), and on the liberal arts, especially the De Nuptiis of Martianus Capella. John, the biographer of Odo of Cluny, appears to be the source for the claim that Remi also wrote glosses on the pseudo-Augustine's Dialectica (cf. Manuscript in Paris Bib. Nat. Lat. 12949, f. 12–22 v).

As a theologian Remi expounded the Opuscula Sacra of BOETHIUS, wrote a commentary on Boethius's De consolatione philosophiae, explained Genesis and the Psalms, and wrote homilies on St. Matthew. It is not clear just where Remi stood on the much-disputed question concerning UNIVERSALS, but his glosses on Martianus Capella suggest a position inclining to and influenced by that of Erigena. The latter's influence is also pronounced in Remi's exposition of Boethius's Opuscula Sacra.

Bibliography: Opera, J. P. MIGNE, ed., Patrologia latina, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 131:52–970. “Epistolae,” Monumenta Germaniae Historica, (Berlin 1826–) 7.2:635–640. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literature des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 1:504–519; 2:808–809; 3:1063. C. E. LUTZ, ed., Remigii Autissiodorensis Commentum in Martianum Capellam, Libri I–II (Leiden 1962). M. CAPPUYNS, “Le Plus ancien commentaire des Opuscula Sacra. . .” Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale (1931): 237–272. J. R. GEISELMANN, “Der Einfluss des Remigius von Auxerre auf die Eucharistielehre des Heriger von Lobbes,” Theologische Quartalschrift 114 (1933): 222–244. A. VACCARI, “Il genuino commento ai Salmi di Remigio di Auxerre,” Biblica 26 (1945): 52–99. P. COURCELLE, “Étude critique sur les commentaires de la Consolation de Boèce,” Archives d'histoire doctrinale et littéraire du moyen-âge 14 (1939): 56–65; “La Culture antique de Remi d’Auxerre,” Latomus 7 (1948): 247–254. R. B. C. HUYGENS, “Remigiana,” Aevum. Rassegna di scienze storiche linguistiche e filologiche 28 (1954): 330–344. C. E. LUTZ, “Remigius’ Ideas on the Classification of the Seven Liberal Arts,” Traditio 12 (1956): 65–86. M. L. W. LAISTNER, Thought and Letters in Western Europe, A.D. 500 to 900 (New York 1957). L. SCHEFFCZYK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8: 1223–1225.

[L. E. LYNCH]

REMIGIUS OF LYONS, ST.

Archbishop of Lyons; d. Lyons, France, Oct. 28, 875. He was chaplain of the Emperor LOTHAIR I and of King Charles II, and became archbishop of Lyons in 852. His episcopacy was marked by lengthy involvement in controversies with civil authorities over church property and with ecclesiastical authorities over doctrinal issues. Remigius was particularly active in the PREDESTINATION issue, and it is in that connection that his name is most frequently mentioned. Though not sympathetic to the theories of GOTTSCHALK, Remigius opposed also Gottschalk's famous adversary, Abp. HINCMAR OF REIMS, for he felt that neither writer had done full justice to the thought of St. AUGUSTINE on the subject. Remigius, something of a reformer, took an active part in the Councils of Valence (855), Langres and Savonnières (859), and Thuzey (860). The authenticity of the works ascribed to Remigius has been seriously doubted. In 1287 his relics were translated to the cathedral in Lyons.

Feast: Oct. 29.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Oct. 12:678–699. B. LAVAUD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables généraux 1951–) 12:2901–35. H. PELTIER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables généraux 1951–) 13:2379. É. BROUETTE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1225–26.

[J. F. FAHEY]

REMIGIUS OF REIMS, ST.

Also known as Remi or Remy, bishop, “Apostle of the Franks”; b. either at Cernay or Laon, France, c. 437; d. Reims, France, Jan. 13, c. 533. He was the scion of an influential Gallo-Roman family, his mother being St. Cilinia (feast: October 21) and his younger brother St. Principius (feast: September 25); his father was Aemilius, count of Laon. He was educated at Reims, and his learning and sanctity were such that he was chosen bishop of the city in his 22d year. The most notable event of his nearly 100-year life was the conversion of CLOVIS, the pagan king of the Franks. As a result of his territorial aggrandizements in Gaul, the king had come into conflict with the Alamanni. Hard pressed by this people, Clovis had vowed to embrace the faith of his wife, St. CLOTILDE, if the God of the Christians would grant him victory. He prevailed in 496 at the battle of Tolbiac (Tolbiacum or Zülpich, near Cologne), and was baptized by Remigius on Christmas 498 or 499, with the aid of Clotilde and St. VEDAST. Clovis became known as the eldest son of the Church and was of inestimable influence in the subsequent history of Christianity in the West. Remigius himself seems throughout his career to have been a distinguished administrator and missionary, for with papal approval he set up bishoprics at Tournai, CAMBRAI, Therouanne, Arras, and LAON. Illustrative of his influence is the oft-told story of how he successfully interceded with Clovis for the return of the sacred vessels stolen from the church of Soissons. He is credited with four Letters (Patrologia Latina 65:963–970); a Testament (Patrologia Latina 65:970–976), appearing in a longer and interpolated form and a shorter form in metrical prose; and a Vita from shortly before his death, not extant. Two of the four Letters are to Clovis, a third has to do with Remigius's defense of his own actions regarding an offending priest named Claudius, and the fourth is to the bishop of Tongres. His Sermones (not extant) won the admiration of SIDONIUS APOLLINARIS (9.70). The account of the baptism of Clovis is found in GREGORY OF TOURS' Historia Francorum (2.3), and lives of the saint were written by HINCMAR OF REIMS (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum 3:239–349) and Venantius FORTUNATUS [Acta Sanctorum Oct. 1(1765) 128–1301]. His relics were translated by Pope LEO IX to the Abbey of SAINT-REMI in 1049.

Feast: Oct. 1 (translation); Jan. 13 (Reims).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Oct. 1 (Venice 1765) 59–187. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 7150–73. H. JADOT, Bibliographie des ouvrages concernant la vie et le culte de saint Remi (Reims 1889–90). É. D'AVENAY, Saint Remi de Reims, apôtre des Francs (Lille 1896). A. HAUDECOEUR, Vie populaire de Saint Remi, évêque de Reims et apôtre des Francs (Abbeville 1896). L. LEVILLAIN, "La Conversion et le baptême de Clovis," Revue d'histoire de l'Église de France 21 (Paris 1935) 161–192. A. VAN DE VYVER, "La Victoire contre les Alamans et la conversion de Clovis," Revue Belge de Philologie et d'Histoire 15 (1936) 859914; 16 (1937) 35–94; 17 (1938) 793–813. ABBÉ DESSAILLY, Authenticité du grand testament de Saint Remi (Paris 1996). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie (Paris 1907–53) 14.2:2231–37, L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétienne (Paris 1955–59) 3:1144–47. É. BROUETTE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al. (1966) 8:1226–27.

[W. C. KORFMACHER]

REMIGIUS OF ROUEN, ST.

Frankish archbishop; d. Rouen c. 772. A natural son of CHARLES MARTEL, he was educated at Court and created archbishop of ROUEN in succession to Rainfroi c. 754. His brother, PEPIN III, sent him on a political mission to Pope PAUL I in 760, during which he visited also King DESIDERIUS OF THE LOMBARDS. One result of this mission was the introduction of the Roman chant and liturgy into the French Church, under Pepin and then CHARLEMAGNE (see GALLICAN RITES). Remigius brought Roman monks back with him to instruct his diocese in GREGORIAN CHANT and liturgical practice. A legend says that Remigius was entrusted with the task of transferring the relics of St. BENEDICT from Fleury (SAINT-BENÔIT-SUR-LOIRE) to MONTE CASSINO, but that he was prevented from doing so by a miracle. He was present at the council at ATTIGNY in 765. His body was transferred from Rouen cathedral to Saint-Médard of Soissons, and then back to Saint-Ouen at Rouen in 1090, subsequently disappearing in the sack of that abbey by the Huguenots, 1562. His name was inserted in the calendar of saints of the Rouen Breviary on Jan. 19, 1627.

Feast: January 19.

Bibliography: E. MARTÈNE and U. DURAND, Thesaurus novus anecdotorum, 5 v. (Paris 1717) 3:1665–70. B. DE GAIFFIER, Analec-ta Bollandiana 23 (1904) 197, for a 13th-century vita. Acta Sanctorum Jan. 2:599–600. A. R. COLLETTE, Histoire du bréviaire de Rouen (Rouen 1902). H. NETZER, L'Introduction de la messe romaine en France sous les carolingiens (Paris 1910). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by the Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56); v. 13, suppl. and table générale (1959) 1:384–385.

[P. B. CORBETT]

REMIREMONT, ABBEY OF

Chapter of noble women in the town of Remiremont, France, former Diocese of Toul, modern Diocese of Saint-Dié. The abbey was founded c. 620 by St. Romary (Romaricus) on the summit of "Saint Mont" in the southern Vosges. Originally it was a double MONASTERY in the filiation of LUXEUIL, following the Rule of St. COLUMBAN and practicing the Laus perennis, i.e., continuous chanting of the Office by alternating choirs. The men's monastery disappeared fairly early, perhaps during the 9th century. The women's monastery was transferred to the valley between 814 and 821, about the same time it adopted the BENEDICTINE RULE. During the 11th century the abbey was transformed into a chapter of CANONESSES that accepted only the daughters of the highest nobility. Common life and vows disappeared; only the abbess promised to observe celibacy. There were several attempts at reform, especially under the Abbess Catherine of Lorraine c. 1620, but all failed. The chapter was suppressed during the French Revolution. When the women's monastery was transferred to the valley in the 9th century, "Saint-Mont" was occupied by hermits who became CANONS regular c. 1100 and gave the place to the BENEDICTINES in 1623.

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:2442–43. A. DIDIER-LAURENT, "L'Abbaye de Remiremont . . .," Mémoires de la Société d'archéologie Lorraine et du musée historique Lorrain 47 (1897) 259–498. G. DURAND, L'Église Saint-Pierre des Dames de Remiremont, 2 v. (Epinal 1929–31). E. HLAWITSCHKA, Studien zur Äbtissinnenreihe von Remiremont (Saarbrücken 1963). V. A. BERGEROT, "L'Organisation et le régime intérieur de chapitre de Remiremont du XIIIe au XVIIIe siècle," Annales de l'Est 13–17 (1899–1903), passim.

[J. CHOUX]

REMONSTRANTS

The name given to the followers of Jacobus ARMINIUS, who continued to propound the less rigid views of Calvinism that Arminius had upheld in his theological writings and disputes. After his death, these disciples met in convention at Gouda (1610) and succeeded in producing in written form the substance of Arminius's teaching. The five articles in this petition became known as the Remonstrantie, and those who adhered to these articles became known as Remonstrants.

They stressed that the atonement was intended for all men, that man needs grace, yet is able to resist it and can even lose it. Those who opposed such views, known as Gomarists after their leader, Franciscus Gomarus, met the Remonstrantie with a Contra-Remonstrantie, in which they renewed their staunch adherence to the strict doctrines of Calvinism and likewise condemned their adversaries for heretical tendencies.

The Remonstrant group was under the leadership of Simon Episcopius (Biscop), a former pupil of Arminius and later a professor of theology at the University of Leyden (1612–18). Both sides took part in conferences held at The Hague and at Delft, but they found no solution. In fact, the dissensions led to further disturbances forcing the States-General to prohibit continents or sermons on such doctrines. Yet despite efforts of the government to maintain mutual tolerance, matters grew worse. Riots ensued.

Eventually, Maurice of Orange openly championed the cause of the Contra-Remonstrants and arrested and even executed some of the Remonstrant leaders. Finally, in 1618–19 a national synod met at Dort (Dordrecht) with representatives of the Dutch Reformed Churches and those of the REFORMED CHURCHES from other parts of Europe present. Instead of being allowed to sit as equals, the Remonstrants were practically placed on trial for their advocacy of doctrines unfavorable to the majority of the ministers and people of Holland. The members of the synod drew up 93 canonical rules and confirmed the authority of the Belgic Confession and the Heidelberg Catechism. In accordance with the judgment of the synod, 200 Remonstrant ministers were deprived of office and 80 were exiled by the States-General.

About 1622 Simon Episcopius had written a confessio, which embodied the doctrine of the Remonstrants. By 1630 the Arminians were allowed to live in any part of Holland and to build churches and schools, having already founded the town of Friedrichstadt in Schleswig. It was not until 1795 that they first received official recognition. Although numerically small today, the Arminians have been influential insofar as their teaching is especially evident in the doctrines of groups of Baptists, Methodists, and Calvinists, as well as other evangelical bodies.

Bibliography: D. NOBBS, Theocracy and Toleration: A Study of the Disputes in Dutch Calvinism from 1600–1650 (New York 1938). J. REGENBOOG, Geschichte der Remonstranten, 2 v. (Lemgo, Germ. 1781–84). P. SCHAFF, Bibliotheca symbolica ecclesiae universalis: Creeds of Christendom, 3 v. (New York 1877). P. GEYL, The Netherlands Divided 1609–1648, tr. S. T. BINDOFF (London 1936).

“Virgin and Child,” detail of High Renaissance painting attributed to Raphael. (©Burstein Collection/CORBIS)

[L. F. RUSKOWSKI]

RENAISSANCE

The term used to designate the period of European history beginning in Italy in the 14th century and extending into the 16th. Since it originated in connection with what was considered a “rebirth” of letters and art, those fields have often been emphasized in the study of the Renaissance, and some would prefer to confine the term to such usage. There was, however, a general cultural transition at this time, and historians therefore have concerned themselves also with the period’s political, religious, economic, and social changes. They have felt justified in using the term Renaissance to refer to the transitional period as a whole. In France, England, and Germany, the movement in question began in the latter half of the 15th century rather than in the 14th. The Renaissance beginning in Italy in the 14th century brought about fundamental changes in the course of which many ideals, attitudes, and institutions that had been predominant during the medieval period were modified or replaced. This article is concerned with describing the nature of those changes in the cultural, political, and religious areas, with emphasis upon the role of the Church in this transitional age, and upon the impact of the age upon the Church.

"Guidobaldo della Rovere," oil on canvas painting by Bronzino.

DEVELOPMENT OF THE RENAISSANCE CONCEPT

To understand the nature of the Renaissance, a necessary first step is to see how the term came into existence and the circumstances of its development. It is immediately apparent that the rise of the concept of the Renaissance is closely connected with the rise of the concept of the Middle Ages. It is likewise apparent that the writers of the 14th and 15th centuries who first developed these concepts were thinking primarily of conditions and changes in the realms of literary style and the visual arts, though they did occasionally make remarks about religious, political, and other factors as being also involved.

Petrarch. PETRARCH (1304–74) seems to have been the first to refer to the period between his own times and ancient Rome as the "Dark Ages." He designated as "ancient history" the period before the adoption of Christianity by the Roman emperors, and as "modern history" the events "from that time to the present." He declined to write about this "modern period" from the 4th to the 14th century because it offered "so few famous names," because it was simply a period of "darkness." [See T. E. Mommsen, "Petrarch's Conception of the 'Dark Ages'" Speculum 17 (1942) 226–242.]

Boccaccio and Villani. BOCCACCIO (1313–75) considered that his age was witnessing a great increase of illustrious men, who wished to "raise up again . . . the oppressed art of poetry." The first of these was Dante (1265–1321), though he reached the sacred spring of poetry "not by the path that the ancients had followed, but by certain byways entirely unknown to our ancestors." After him came Petrarch, who did "follow the ancient path," and thus "opened the way for himself and for those who wished to ascend after him" (Ross and McLaughlin 123–126). Filippo Villani (1325–1405) expresses views similar to those of Boccaccio. He states in his Liber de civitatis Florentiae famosis civibus that Claudian (d. c. 408) was perhaps the last of the poets of the ancient world. After him, "almost all poetry decayed, because of the weakness and avarice of the emperors, and also because art was no longer prized, since the Catholic faith began to abhor the figments of poetic imagination as a pernicious and vain thing." The revival of poetry came with Dante, "who recalled it from an abyss of shadows into the light" [quoted in W. K. Ferguson, "Humanist Views of the Renaissance," (American Historical Review 4) 19]. In a parallel way, Villani held that painting had been "almost extinct" until Cimabue (1240–1302) recalled it to natural similitude, and Giotto (d. 1336) "restored painting to its ancient dignity and greatest fame" (ibid. 20).

Leonardo Bruni. With Bruni (c. 1370–1444) the political factor is more fully developed: the decline and subsequent revival of poetry are directly attributed to the decline and the revival of political liberty. In his Vita di Messer Francesco Petrarca he states that "after the liberty of the Roman people had been lost through the rule of the emperors . . . the flourishing condition of studies and of letters perished, together with the welfare of the city of Rome." Then, connecting the recovery of liberty with the recovery of literature, he observes that "when the liberty of the Italian people was recovered, by the defeat of the Lombards, the cities of Tuscany and elsewhere began to revive, and to take up studies, and somewhat to refine the coarse style." He considered that the recovery was feeble and slow until the time of Dante, and that the really significant recovery had begun only with Petrarch. Petrarch's style was not perfect, but he opened the way to perfection by recovery of the works of Cicero (see Ross and McLaughlin 127–130). It is apparent that there is a considerable chronological divergence in regard to his views as to the time of the recovery of liberty and that of the recovery of literature.

Bearing upon this matter also are references in Bruni's Historiarum Florentini populi libri xii, in which he states that the recovery of liberty by the Italian cities came when the emperors confined their attention in Italy to only brief campaigns, allowing the cities to concern themselves more with freedom and less with imperial power. This suggests the 12th-century victories of the Italian communes over the emperors—a considerable time before the literary revival that he sees in Petrarch. One of the basic problems in interpreting the Renaissance is essentially connected with this divergence. The 12th and 13th centuries, which saw the rise of relatively free, self-governing communes, produced literature that the humanists disliked, while the literary revival they praised took place in 14th- and 15th-century Italy, when most of the free communes had come under despotic princes or small oligarchies of wealthy businessmen.

Vasari. Giorgio Vasari (1511–74), who coined the word rinascita (rebirth), expressed views similar to those of Bruni in his famous Lives of the Painters, first published in 1550. Although beginning with Cimabue, he gives an introductory section explaining his views on earlier art, describing its rise and perfection in the ancient world, and then its decline, beginning about the time of Constantine. For him, medieval art was unworthy because it was unclassical. He wished to discuss art before Cimabue in an introductory way merely in order that the readers might see that, just as it is with human beings, so also it is with the arts: they “have their birth, growth, age, and death.” He hoped his readers would thereby “be enabled more easily to recognize the progress of the renaissance [rinascita] of the arts, and the perfection to which they have attained in our own time” (quoted in Ferguson, The Renaissance in Historical Thought, 62).

Luther. It is understandable that the deprecatory view of the Middle Ages among the humanists and art historians would continue in the historical opinions of the leaders of the Protestant Reformation especially in the light of Luther's theological objections to medieval philosophy and theology. Luther also saw the literary Renaissance as preparing the way for his religious revival. It is perhaps understandable, too, that the 18th-century Enlightenment, in view of the hatred of the Church that is evident in many of its leaders, would continue the deprecatory view of medieval civilization.

Voltaire. In his Essai sur les moeurs et l'esprit des nations, et sur les principaux faits de l'histoire, depuis

“Etienne Chevalier and St. Stephen,” painting by Jean Fouquet, 1450. (©Francis G. Mayer/CORBIS)

Charlemagne jusqu'à Louis XIII, published in 1756, Voltaire expressed his strong dislike of medieval Latin (which he considered barbarous), of medieval religion, and of the culture of the period in general. Scholasticism, he considered as a “bastard off-spring of the philosophy of Aristotle, poorly translated and poorly understood, which had done more harm to reason and to polite studies than had the Huns and Vandals.” In contrast to that darkness, he held that human intelligence began to revive in Italy about the end of the 13th century and the beginning of the 14th. As a cause for this, he noted the wealth of Italy, coming from the commerce of her cities. He emphasized the importance of Florence in this revival, and spoke with great praise of the Medici rule there.

Voltaire noted not only the revival in intelligence, but also the moral shortcomings of Renaissance men, the widespread assassinations, poisonings, and such; but this did not disturb him, for he viewed Renaissance irreligion as a factor in the destruction of Christianity; he held this to be a gain, since he considered the loss of religion as a necessary step for the progress of reason.

Hegel. The interpretation of the Renaissance in G. W. F. Hegel's Philosophie der Geschichte (1837) and Geschichte der Philosophie (1833–36) is similar to that of Voltaire. For HEGEL the Middle Ages meant a period of despiritualization of religion through emphasis upon mere externals of ceremony and scholastic thought, so that life in this world was devoid of spiritual content. The medieval Church and feudalism made freedom impossible. An antithesis to this came at the end of the Middle Ages, as men became free again, “having the power of exercising their activity for their own objects and interests.” It is at this time, also, that there was a new birth, a “revival of the arts and sciences which were concerned with present matter, the epoch when the spirit gains confidence in itself and its existence, and finds its interest in its present.” Hegel’s interpretation was reflected in the dramatic phrase used by Jules Michelet in his Histoire de France. In the seventh volume of this work, which he entitled La Renaissance (1855), he said that the 16th century must be considered as the age that brought about, more than any previous age, “the discovery of the world and the discovery of man.”

Interior courtyard of Collège de France, Monument of Bude, c. 19th Century, by Jean-François Chalgrin, Paris. (©Paul Almasy/CORBIS)

An echo of Hegel’s interpretation is found also in Georg Voigt’s Die Wiederbelebung des classischen Altertums (1859), which noted “the corporative tendency” as the characteristic that especially distinguished the Christian Middle Ages, when the great men who arose “—seem so only as representatives of the system in which they lived.” In contrast, he saw Petrarch as the example of the Renaissance humanist who broke through the bonds of the corporative tendency, and in whom “individuality and its rights stood forth strong and free with a claim to the highest significance.”

Burckhardt. The full development of this line of interpretation, coming down from the Renaissance humanists themselves, through Voltaire, Hegel, and others, was presented in 1860 in Jacob Burckhardt’s work, Die Kultur der Renaissance in Italien. He credited the Renaissance with the beginning of individuality, and the beginning of the objective treatment of this world. He granted that there had been some examples of “free personality” in medieval Italy, but for the most part, he saw the Middle Ages as a period when a “ban” had been “laid upon human personality.” But, “at the close of the 13th century Italy began to teem with individuality.” Medieval men had been “dreaming or half awake” under a veil woven of “faith, illusion, and childish prepossession.” Then, in Renaissance Italy this veil first melted into air, and “an objective treatment and consideration of the state and of all the things of this world became possible.” Burckhardt considered that the chief cause for the birth of individualism and objectivity was the political condition in Italy, which had developed from the conflicts between emperors and popes. In 14th-century Italy the state became a “calculated, conscious creation . . . a work of art.” The illegitimacy of the princely governments and the conflicts within the republics provided the possibility of success to the man who could “make good his claims by personal merit.” If he were sufficiently resourceful, able, and unscrupulous, he would succeed, no matter what his other shortcomings—the illegitimacy of his birth, the illegality of his position, the flaunting of tradition or accepted conventional morality.

In “the character of these states, whether republics or despotisms, lies not the only but the chief reason for the early evolution of the Italian in the modern man,” As to the moral crisis that he considered a part of this movement, he did not welcome it in the same way that Voltaire did, but considered that the “excessive individualism” of the Renaissance Italian came upon him not “through any fault of his own, but rather through an historical necessity.” And so, it was in itself “neither good nor bad, but necessary.” Hence, he considered the political situation in Italy rather than the revival of antiquity as the chief cause for the Renaissance. Indeed, though he admitted that Renaissance developments were “colored in a thousand ways by the influence of the ancient world,” yet the “essence of the phenomena might still have been the same without the classical revival.”

MODIFICATIONS OF THE BURCKHARDT INTERPRETATION

Burckhardt’s interpretation in many of its aspects had been developing from the age of the Renaissance humanists. A different view, however, already began to appear in the Romantic school in the early 19th century.

One may or may not agree with these Romantics in their glorification of chivalry, Gothic architecture, and medieval life in general. But, after F. CHATEAUBRIAND's Le Génie du Christianisme (1802), and works of others of this school, such as F. SCHLEGEL, Mme. de Staël (1766–1847) and Walter Scott, there was a growing consciousness that there was another point of view than that which insisted upon the absolute superiority of classical literature and art. Chateaubriand insisted upon the superiority of medieval culture because he was convinced that Christianity gave a truer, more fruitful basis for understanding human nature and emotions, and for the depiction of them in literature and art than had the beliefs underlying the literature and art of the classical world.

20th-Century Reevaluations. In addition to the reaction of the Romantics, 20th-century historians, such as C. H. Haskins, J. de Ghellinck, L. Thorndike, É. GILSON, C. DAWSON, and others provided convincing evidence that the medieval period, and especially from 800 on, cannot be correctly described as "Dark Ages." Nor can it be maintained that medieval men were blind in regard to the nature of man or the world about them. Medieval men had a much better understanding of and appreciation for classical Latin literature than the Renaissance humanists suspected. One who reads the works and letters of Alcuin (d. 804), Lupus of Ferrières (d. c. 862), and John of Salisbury (d. 1180) is impressed not only with the extent of their knowledge of ancient literature, but also with their enthusiasm and understanding of the importance of such studies. One who investigates medieval architecture and sculpture and reads the studies that É. MÂLE, among others, has made of them, will hardly fail to be impressed with medieval man's consciousness of the world about him, as reflected in the exact depiction of plants in the details of Gothic sculpture. The profundity of Dante's understanding of human nature could hardly have come about if Dante and the men from whom he drew his intellectual and spiritual roots had been separated from reality by the "veil . . . woven of faith, illusion, and childish prepossession" of which Burckhardt spoke.

Consequently, a study of the works of medieval men and of recent historians who have devoted themselves to the intellectual history of the Middle Ages makes it clear that the Michelet-Burckhardt formula of attributing to the Renaissance the discovery of the world and of man is an exaggeration that is false. It is, nevertheless, true that the men of the Renaissance placed a much greater and more exclusive emphasis upon man and this world than had medieval men. This tendency is discernible first, perhaps, in the works of the 14th- and 15th-century humanists.

RENAISSANCE HUMANISTS

At the outset it should be noted that there were links of a professional nature between the Renaissance humanists (see HUMANISM) and their medieval predecessors. P. O. Kristeller has stated that the Renaissance humanists were "the professional heirs and successors of the medieval rhetoricians, the so-called dictatores. . .," the professional writers of the Middle Ages, who wrote letters and prepared documents of various kinds in accordance with the ars dictaminis ("Humanism and Scholasticism in the Italian Renaissance," in Kristeller 100–103). Thus, there is a marked similarity in function between Petrus de Vineis, who served the Emperor Frederick II as dictator, and Coluccio Salutati, the humanist chancellor of Florence from 1375 to 1406. When Salutati was given Florentine citizenship in 1400 he was cited as one skilled in the ars dictaminis (see Hay 121 n.3).

Christ on the cross, detail from Italian Renaissance Processional Cross. (©Elio Ciol/CORBIS)

As R. Weiss has pointed out (The Dawn of Humanism in Italy), it must be noted, too, that a large proportion of the early humanists were connected with the legal profession in some way. Thus, Lovato dei Lovati (d. 1309), who made a study of the meters of Seneca's tragedies, was a Paduan jurist, and Geri d'Arezzo (d. c. 1339), whom Salutati considered an important precursor of Petrarch, was a doctor of civil law. Albertino Mussato (1261–1329) of Padua, the most important of these early humanists, who wrote the Senecan tragedy, Ecerinis, and who was crowned poet laureate in 1315, was also connected with the law. The Ecerinis deals with the 13th-century tyrant Ezzelino da Romano, and apparently Mussato hoped to influence the Paduans to oppose the aggressive moves of the Can Grande della Scala. It would be unwise, however, to attempt on this basis a generalization respecting the political aspirations of these early humanists, because a great deal more research work still remains to be done concerning them (Weiss Il primo secolo dell'Umanesimo, 10).

Petrarch. Difficulties in the interpretation of the works of Francesco Petrarca, or Petrarch (1304–74) are of a different type. He wrote a great deal, and some of his statements are confused and contradictory. But there does seem to be in him, in spite of his egocentrism, a charitable concern to help his fellow men. He believed that effective communication was essential, the right word must be found, and for this purpose the works of classical Latin literature were the perfect models. He was convinced that men should help their fellow men, and that the spirits of men can be helped especially through effective discourse. Learning how to use right words comes from study of the classics. This was the objective, the studia humanitatis, for Petrarch, and to pursue such studies was the justification he would probably offer for his life of retirement, for the solitude he loved. (See Garin 27–31.) His emphasis upon the importance of classical Latin rhetoric is seen in his work On His Own Ignorance and That of Many Others, in which he agrees that in Aristotle's Ethics he sees virtue “egregiously defined and distinguished by him and treated with penetrating insight,” all of which causes him to know a little more than he knew before. But, he says, “I myself remain the same.” The trouble with Aristotle is that “his lesson lacks the words that sting and set afire the urge toward love of virtue and hatred of vice or, at any rate, does not have enough of such power. He who looks for that will find it in our Latin writers, especially in Cicero and Seneca . . .” (tr. H. Nachod, in Cassirer 103).

There is nothing in Petrarch's attitude that is anti-Christian; on the contrary, he seems to be inspired by sincere Christian charity. But he is not satisfied with the medieval emphasis upon the theological. When his friend, Luigi Marsili, an Augustinian, was going away to study theology, Petrarch wrote to him, urging him to follow the example of Lactantius and St. Augustine in conjoining the studia humanitatis with studia divinitatis, and thus to continue working for the construction of a pia philosophia (see Garin 36). His conviction of the superiority of classical literature was such that it was natural enough for him to consider the civilization that produced medieval literature, different as it was, the “Dark Ages.”

As to his political views, Petrarch centered all his hopes in Rome, believing that the world had never seen such peace and justice as it had when it had one head, and that head was Rome. He was enthusiastic about Cola di Rienzo until the more fantastic aspects of his activities began to be demonstrated. It seems, too, that Petrarch expected the papacy to make of the Pax romana, a pax christiana, and the fact that the popes were in Avignon, removed from Rome—where he thought they should be—disturbed him greatly. One historian has even gone so far as to suggest that “Humanism was forged in the Catholic pathos generated by the seventy years of Babylonian captivity” (G. Toffanin 112).

In regard to dictatorship, as opposed to republicanism, Petrarch had been critical of Caesar in his Africa, but praised him in his later Historia Julii Caesaris. He even became friendly with the Visconti tyrants of Milan, and decided to reside there in 1353. Boccaccio, the devoted follower of Petrarch in so many matters, nevertheless reproached him for this. Boccaccio lived long enough in Florence to become attached to its republican traditions, as Petrarch had not.

Boccaccio. Giovanni Boccaccio (1313–75) had moved to Florence in 1340, after having spent some time in Naples. He entered into the cultural life of the city, and served as an important link in emphasizing the contribution of Petrarch. In addition to his Decameron and other productions of a similar nature, Boccaccio did very serious scholarly work in classical Latin literature and culture and was one of the first to promote the study of Greek. He devoted himself especially to the preparation of treatises that would assist readers in understanding classical authors, such as his work on mythology, De genealogiis deorum gentilium.

Salutati and Civic Humanism. In 1375, the year of Boccaccio's death, Coluccio SALUTATI (1331–1406) the disciple of Petrarch and Boccaccio, became chancellor of Florence, and continued to foster their influence in that city. His writing reveals the development of the humanist movement into the civic humanism that was so important in Florence. His humanist attitude is seen in an exchange of letters he had with the Dominican Giovanni DOMINICI on the values and dangers of the new humanistic trends. Dominici was a formidable opponent, for he was well informed and fully aware of the value of the classics for mature students, but was opposed to placing so much emphasis upon them in the education of the young. Salutati was in agreement that Christianity came first, and had no intention of saying anything contrary to the Faith. But he was convinced of the value of the new attitudes. He maintained that the studia humanitatis and studia divinitatis were interrelated, and a true and complete knowledge of the one could not be had without the other (see Emerton 341–377).

In one of his letters he expressed his conviction on the superiority of the active life, in behalf of family, friends, and the state. In writing to a friend who was planning to become a monk he said: “Do not believe . . . that to flee from turmoil, to avoid the view of pleasant things, to enclose oneself in a cloister, or to isolate oneself in a hermitage, constitute the way of perfection. . . . Without doubt you, fleeing from the world, can fall from heaven to earth, while I, remaining in the world, can raise my heart to heaven.” Consequently, Salutati advised his friend to do those things “necessary for the family, pleasing to friends, salutary for the state . . .” (tr. in Brucker 35–36). As in the case of Petrarch, there is here no rejection of Christian doctrine as such, but there is a rejection of the ascetic ideal that had held so high a place in the medieval period.

Civic Humanism of Bruni. The trend toward civic humanism, which is evident in Salutati, reached perhaps its fullest expression in the works of Leonardo Bruni. Although born in Arezzo, Bruni spent most of his mature years in Florence. He studied Greek under Manuel Chrysoloras there, and came also under the influence of Salutati. After service in the Roman Curia from 1405 to 1415, Bruni returned to Florence, where he became chancellor in 1427, a post he held until his death. The numerous Greek works translated by him included the Ethics and the Politics of Aristotle. These works very likely confirmed him in his belief that the study of politics must have a central place in the educational process, since that study is connected with the bringing of happiness, not just to one man but to the entire population. He considered that the study of politics should be a part of moral philosophy, and that in the classics of the ancient world one could obtain knowledge of those things that concern life and morality, and which, therefore “are called humanitatis studia, inasmuch as they perfect and elevate man” (quoted in Garin 53). Cicero was recommended for such studies, but Lactantius, St. Augustine, and the other Fathers were mentioned also.

Boccaccio had praised Petrarch, together with Dante, for the restoration of poetry. Bruni went further and hailed Petrarch as the founder of a new discipline of literary studies. While these 15th-century humanists had progressed sufficiently to realize that Petrarch’s Africa could not match the poetic achievements of Vergil’s Aeneid, Bruni nevertheless praised Petrarch as the one who restored the humanities to life when they were already extinct, and “opened for us the path upon which we could cultivate learning” (quoted from Dialogi ad Petrum Paulum Histrum, in Baron 1:237).

Perhaps the most remarkable presentation of his civic humanism is found in the funeral oration that Bruni composed in 1428, eulogizing Nanni degli Strozzi, a general who had been important in the Florentine coalition that prevented the Visconti tyranny from dominating northern Italy. The oration is a Renaissance counterpart of the funeral oration in which Pericles—as reported in Thucydides—had praised the free institutions of Athens. Florence, said Bruni, had “revived and rescued from ruin Latin letters, which previously had been abject, prostrate, and almost dead.” It had been Florence, too, that had brought back knowledge of Greek letters, which for more than 700 years had fallen into disuse in Italy. “Finally, the studia humanitatis themselves, surely the best and most excellent of studies, those most appropriate for the human race, needed in private as well as public life, and distinguished by a knowledge of letters befitting a free born man—such studia took root in Italy after originating in our city” (quoted in Baron 1:362–363).

Reflections of Humanism in Renaissance Art. Some observers consider that the paintings of Masaccio (c. 1401–28), such as the “Tribute Money” and the “Expulsion of Adam and Eve” in the Brancacci Chapel in Florence, reflect an emphasis upon man, parallel to that which is found in the writings of these humanists. It would seem, too, that the interior of the Chapel of San Lorenzo, designed by Brunelleschi (1377–1446), the Florentine architect, emphasizes the dominance of man in this world, just as clearly as the high nave of Chartres Cathedral emphasizes the otherworldliness of medieval civilization. Theophilus (10th century), in writing about the nature of art, stated that the achievement in art is “in glorifying the Creator in His Creature, in causing God to be admired in His works.” [See E. De Bruyne, Études d’esthétique médiévale 2 (Bruges 1946) 413–417.] There is no trace of such a view in Leon Battista Alberti (1404–72), who in his Della Pittura wrote that “The object of painting is to earn favor and goodwill and praise.” It is man, the artist, not the Creator, who has become important in this 15th-century view (see Chabod 182–183).

Filelfo. It should be realized that not all Renaissance humanists advocated civic humanism in the same way as Salutati and Bruni. There were those also who served the tyrants and princes, and there were those who did not place emphasis upon the active life. When Cosimo de’ MEDICI returned from exile in 1434, Francesco Filelfo (1398–1481) left FLORENCE and then spent much of his time writing in opposition to Florence and the Medici. He went to Milan, where he placed his scholarly services at the disposal of the Visconti tyrants. He served the Ambrosian republic during its short life in Milan, and then Francesco SFORZA, after he gained control of the government in 1450. In his earlier life Filelfo had spent seven years in Constantinople, and when he returned to Italy in 1427, brought back a large number of Greek manuscripts, as well as a member of the Chrysoloras family as his first wife. Nevertheless, in his De morali disciplina libri quinque, he did not emphasize the active life or civic humanism of Salutati and Bruni, but praised wisdom, which he defined as knowledge of things divine. Wisdom contemplates the eternal and immutable, rather than the temporal and mobile (see Rice 50—53). Bruni had praised the republican freedom of Florence, but Filelfo wrote his epic poem, the Sfortias, to glorify the most successful of the condottieri, Francesco Sforza, who had gained control of Milan solely by military ability, unscrupulousness, and force.

Pontano. Pontano (1426–1503) was similar to Filelfo in many respects. He had served the tyrannical Aragonese kings of Naples, and received many favors from them. Yet, when the Aragonese were overthrown by the French in 1494–95, Pontano was ready with an oration in honor of Charles VIII of France. Also, in contrast to Bruni and Salutati, in his De prudentia, Pontano insisted that the prudent man, skilled in civic affairs and business cannot be the wise man who concerns himself with investigating the principles and causes of things (see Rice 53–57).

POLITICAL DEVELOPMENTS IN ITALY

It would seem, then, that Bruni's civic humanism cannot serve as a general definition of Renaissance humanism, though it certainly was a very important development within that movement (see Kristeller, in Helton 35). That Bruni's thought developed in the way that it did must be considered as due in large part to the historical actuality of Florence, which had taken the lead in the later 14th and earlier 15th century in defending central Italy and preventing it from falling completely under the domination of the Visconti tyrants of Milan (see Baron passim). It may well be that "the Renaissance would have been nipped in the bud if Florence had become a provincial town within an Italian kingdom under despotic Viscontean rule" (Baron 383–384).

However, throughout Italy, except for Florence and Venice, the trend of the 14th century was from relatively free communes to one man rule of the signorie and princes. And, although there is much to be said in favor of the government of Florence or Venice when compared with tyrannies like those of the Visconti, it is nevertheless true that from the early 14th century, Florence and Venice were ruled by small oligarchies of wealthy businessmen rather than by the citizens generally. Furthermore, however much the Florentines might complain about the aggression of the Visconti, the Florentines themselves were little different, as they brought the other areas of Tuscany under their control.

Milan. The Visconti had gained control of Milan in 1278, and, except for about ten years in the early 14th century, had held it constantly until 1447. After the short-lived Ambrosian republic, Francesco Sforza (d. 1466) gained control in 1450, and he and his descendants ruled, except for the period of French control in the early 16th century, until 1535. The Della Scala family, which controlled Verona, had by 1335 reached out to gain also Vicenza, Treviso, Padua, Parma, Reggio, and Lucca. Other princes and despots of the 14th and 15th centuries included the Este family of Ferrara, the Malatesta of Rimini, and the Bentivoglio family of Bologna. The House of Anjou, which had ruled the Kingdom of Naples since the 13th century was replaced by Alfonso the Magnanimous of Aragon (d. 1458) in 1442, and it would be difficult to imagine a government more tyrannical than that of his illegitimate son Ferrante (d. 1494).

Florence under the Medici. In Florence the executive power was in the hands of a kind of city council—the eight priors and the gonfalonier of justice. The priors were selected by the guilds, but from the early 14th century, a majority of places were allotted to the Seven Greater Guilds, made up of the very wealthy, such as the bankers and great merchants. The Lesser Guilds, including lower tradesmen such as bakers and shoemakers, were allotted only a minority of places. Furthermore, from the 1320s, the priors were picked by lot, their names being pulled out of an election bag at two-month intervals. The trick in controlling the government was to have charge of the committee that determined which names would be allowed to go into the election bag, and which would be excluded on one pretext or another. In this way the oligarchy could see that enemies did not become priors and that friends did. In 1378 there was a revolt of the ciompi, as the wool carders were called, and this led to lower-class control of the government for a short time. But, by 1382 the wealthy oligarchy, led by the Albizzi family, was back in control, which it maintained until 1434, when Cosimo de' Medici (d. 1464) returned from exile.

Cosimo de' Medici held public office for only three terms of two months each, but in effect he was in complete control as the dictator of the city from 1434 to 1464: On the one hand, he was able to see to it that only names of Medici supporters got into the election bags, and that enemies of his regime had their taxes raised so high that they had no alternative but to move out of the city, as happened to Giannozzo Manetti. On the other hand, Cosimo spent much of his great wealth in the patronage of arts and letters, so that Florentines could be proud of their city and thank the Medici for making it so beautiful and famous. It appears to have been Cosimo's money and influence that caused the general council that had opened in Ferrara in 1438 to be moved to Florence in 1439. One of the Greek delegates was Georg Gemistos Plethon, whose lectures on Plato were important in initiating the great interest in Platonic philosophy among the Florentines. This interest led to Cosimo's patronage of Marsilio Ficino (1433–99), who later was provided with a monetary allowance and a home near the Medici Villa Careggi.

Important also in the maintenance of Cosimo's position was the successful foreign policy he pursued. In the years following his return from exile in 1434 he continued the alliance with Venice, for protection from the aggression of Filippo Maria Visconti of Milan (1412–47). But after the death of this last of the Visconti, Cosimo broke the link that had existed with Venice and allied himself with Francesco Sforza. Cosimo realized that Venice was now more of a menace than Milan. He perceived, also, that Sforza would make an excellent ally, since he would need Cosimo's financial support, whereas Venice would not. Venice soon saw the wisdom of coming to terms with Milan (Peace of Lodi, 1454) and of joining in a league with Florence and Milan. By 1455 the papacy and Naples joined with the above three states. The Italian League thus formed was able to keep out foreign invaders and maintain comparative peace within the peninsula. Historians have usually given Cosimo de' Medici chief credit for the formation and maintenance of this system, though recent studies have held that Francesco Sforza and Pope Pius II (1458–64) were equally important, if not more so, in keeping up a steadfast opposition to French interference [see V. Ilardi, "The Italian League, Francesco Sforza and Charles VII (1454–61)," in Studies in the Renaissance, 6 (1959) 129–166].

Cosimo had been willing to maintain his control by such indirect methods, and without changing the constitution of the city, but his grandson Lorenzo the Magnificent (d. 1492), who directed affairs after the death of his father Piero (1469), made changes assuring his dictatorial power. In 1480 Lorenzo established a Council of Seventy. This Council, which included Lorenzo and friends of the Medici, and which had the right to fill its own vacancies as they occurred, had the power to appoint committees from its own members, to handle foreign affairs, defense, internal security, and finance. Lorenzo's power became constantly more dictatorial until the time of his death. There are indications that he helped his declining financial position by tapping the treasury of the state, and there were murmurings that he dipped into various savings funds, such as the state dowry fund, which the citizens had built up.

Later Florentine Cultural Developments. Florence's later chancellors—Marsuppini, appointed in 1444, Poggio in 1453, and Benedetto Accolti in 1458—became merely ornamental, while Bartolomeo Scala, appointed in 1464, devoted himself chiefly to praising the Medici. In contrast to Salutati, who had insisted upon the importance of the active life in preference to the ascetic ideal, Marsilio FICINO (1433–99), an ardent student of Plato and the founder of the Platonic Academy in Florence, insisted upon the superiority of the mind and spirit of man over the body and all things material. He was convinced that the farther behind the mind can leave the body, the more perfect it is. As man goes about his intellectual activities, studying the liberal arts, astronomy, music, and poetry, "in all these arts the mind of man despises the service of the body, since the mind is able at times, and can even now begin, to live without the help of the body" (tr. J. L. Burroughs, in Ross and McLaughlin 387–392). PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA (1463–94) was a member of this group in Florence, but his interests did not stop with Platonism or Neoplatonism; he was interested also in Aristotle as well as in Arabic and Hebraic works. Because of his conviction of the unity of truth, he believed that apparently contradictory philosophies really share in a common truth. Paralleling Ficino's emphasis upon the spirit, Pico explains, in his Oration of the Dignity of Man, that man is the only creature whose life is determined not by nature, but by his own free choice. Ficino's desire to get away from the material is probably best reflected in the paintings of Sandro Botticelli (d. 1510), with his stress upon unembodied line and movement (see Berenson 111–112).

THE PAPACY AND THE RENAISSANCE

The Renaissance confronted the papacy with a difficult political problem: the aggressive expansion of the nearby Italian states would be achieved at the expense of the Papal States, unless adequate means of defense could be found by the militarily weak popes. In this crisis some popes resorted to means that were too much like those in vogue at the time and which have been labeled "Machiavellian."

Nicholas V. The cultural development of the Renaissance presented a much more subtle danger and one that was not immediately apparent. NICHOLAS V (1447–55) was a leading patron of Renaissance humanists and artists. Understandably, he considered that the center of the religious world should look the part and should also be the center of the cultural world. His wholesale patronage, however, resulted in his bringing of certain humanists into the papal service whose personal lives and writings left much to be desired on moral grounds. Among them was Lorenzo Valla mentioned above. In his dialogue De voluptate, Leonardo Bruni defended the Stoic point of view; Antonio Beccadelli (Panormita; 1394–1471), author of the immoral Hermaphroditus, defended the Epicurean view; while Niccolò de' Niccoli (d. 1437), the famous collector of manuscripts, defended the Christian view. Niccoli's defense of the Christian view won out in the debate, but Valla presented the Epicurean view so vividly that some have considered that it represented his personal belief. If this work is read together with Valla's De professione religiosorum, in which he attacks the whole idea of monasticism, it appears that Valla's position is that whatever comes from nature is good and praiseworthy. On the other hand, he considered continence unnatural and therefore wrong. He seems to have considered pleasure man's highest good.

Immediate Successors of Nicholas V. Ludwig von Pastor considered that within the Renaissance there were two tendencies, the Christian and the pagan (Geschichte der Päpste 1:14–15), and he emphasized the fact that despite the immorality, obscene literature, and Machiavelian diplomacy of the age there were also a great many remarkable saints. PIUS II (1458–64) understood the pagan tendency in the movement better than had Nicholas V, who had been something of a dilettante; Pius II had himself been a leading humanist writer. Consequently, Pius was not quite so lavish in his patronage. Under PAUL II (1464–71) some of the worst pagan aspects of the movement began to appear in the Roman Academy, led by Pomponius Laetus. Paul understandably looked upon this development with disfavor, and in the quarrel that resulted, a political conspiracy was planned and was said to include a plot to murder the Pope. After discovery of the plot, however, Pomponius Laetus and Platina were arrested.

SIXTUS IV (1471–84) has been criticized because of his extensive NEPOTISM. Actually, it was imperative for him to gain control of the cities throughout the Papal States that were held by local despots who allied themselves with enemies of the papacy at will. It seemed to Sixtus that his only safe course was to install his nephews in such cities. When Lorenzo de' Medici, who was interested in expansion toward the Adriatic, tried to interfere, the Pazzi conspiracy of 1478 to overthrow the Medici was planned by a nephew of the Pope, but with the Pope's knowledge. Pastor provided ample documentation to prove that Sixtus directed that murder should not be employed, but Giuliano, the brother of Lorenzo, was nevertheless killed.

Alexander VI. Innocent was followed by the worst of the Renaissance popes, ALEXANDER VI (1492–1503). The immorality of his personal life is indisputable. It was Alexander VI's ruthless, immoral son, Cesare Borgia, whom MACHIAVELLI (1469–1527) praised in The Prince. Machiavelli maintained that a prince who tries to be good in the midst of so many who are not good is bound to fail. Hence he warned that a prince who insists on keeping his promises will not be successful. Some historians have attempted to explain away what Machiavelli wrote in The Prince, claiming that he meant it only as a satire, and that his true, democratic thought is to be found in his Discourses on the First Decade of Livy. Actually, the same basic principles are to be found in the Discourses. For example, in book 1, ch. 9, he praises Romulus for killing his brother, insisting that it should be put down as a general rule that "reprehensible actions may be justified by their effects, and when the effect is good, as it was in the case of Romulus, it always justifies the action."

Julius II and Leo X. The last great popes in the Renaissance tradition were JULIUS II (1503–13) and LEO X (1513–21). Despite the brilliance of their reigns from the cultural point of view, the Renaissance in Italy was beginning to be overshadowed by developments elsewhere in Europe. The sack of Rome in 1527 and the momentous happenings north of the Alps marked the beginning of a new age, especially in politics and religion.

RENAISSANCE IN SPAIN AND NORTH OF THE ALPS

The Renaissance in the strict sense was an Italian movement. In its spread to Spain and to the countries north of the Alps, it encountered new political, cultural, and religious conditions and accordingly took on a somewhat different aspect. It should be observed also that it was the later Italian Renaissance that exercised the major influence outside Italy.

Printing and the Renaissance. The art of printing was developed in Germany c. 1450 and therefore antedated the impact of the Renaissance in that area. The new art was soon carried into Italy, and presses were established at Rome, Venice, and other cities. It was not received with any great enthusiasm by certain humanists at first, and was opposed, understandably, by the professional scribes, but long before 1500 the printed book replaced the manuscript as the normal form of book production. The invention of printing created a revolution in the dissemination of learning, the effects of which would be difficult to exaggerate. The spread of Renaissance writings and ideas within Italy and outside Italy was now rapid and effective and the whole program of education at all levels was put on a new foundation. A careful study of the printed books before 1500 reveals concretely both the spread of the new learning and, at the same time, the vitality of the late medieval cultural tradition.

Spain. The Renaissance crossed the Pyrenees when such Italian humanists as Pomponio Montovano, Lucio Marineo Siculo (d. 1533), and Pietro Martire d'Anghiera (d. 1526) were welcomed as lecturers in Castile. Owing to the inclusion of the Low countries in the Spanish empire, there were intimate contacts also between Spanish humanism and northern humanism. Enthusiasm for the new learning produced the great scholar Antonio de Nebrija (1444–1522). The Complutensian Polyglot Bible was prepared at the University of Alcalá under the patronage of Cardinal Francisco XIMÉNEZ DE CISNEROS. Juan Luis VIVES of Valencia challenged the medieval dialecticians and composed new rules of literary style and influential theories of education.

Renaissance in the North. France and England, although among the first kingdoms to feel their growth into nationhood, largely as a result of the 100 Years' War, resisted humanism and other features of the Renaissance longer than other areas of Northern Europe. Like Germany, they were governed by a rural nobility that clung to the traditions of courtly chivalry. However, clerics and officials of the crown in their visits to Italy occasionally brought back an enthusiasm for the new learning. Hence, some humanists were invited into the employ of wealthy patrons or into the schools and universities. But it was not until the last quarter of the 15th century that cultural contacts were extensive. Besides literary interest in the classics, the northern Renaissance developed a practical and pedagogical character that included a critical study of the manuscripts of Scripture, patristic literature, and a corresponding impatience with scholastic method. Moreover, they were strong advocates of ecclesiastical reform.

England. In England, William Grocyn, student of the two greatest Greek stylists, Angelo Poliziano (1454–94) and Demetrius Chalcondyles (1424–1511), brought his own knowledge of Greek to a perfection that won praise even from the refugee scholars from Constantinople. The lectures of John COLET (1467?–1519) at Oxford witness the new insistence upon textual studies and historical exegesis of the New Testament, especially of St. Paul's letters, rather than upon the prevailing allegorical interpretation. Colet founded St. Paul's School in London as a center of the new theology. What Colet was doing for theology, Thomas LINACRE (1460?–1524) achieved in medicine. His Greek he had learned in the household of Lorenzo the Magnificent, where he was tutored with Giovanni, the future Pope Leo X. He translated some of his treatises of the Greek physicians, especially Galen, into Latin and later founded the Royal College of Physicians. It was Linacre who taught Greek to St. Thomas MORE, whose own mastery of classical and English prose produced some of the finest examples of Renaissance writing, especially the Utopia, where wit and gravity vie in an indictment of society.

Germany. The decentralized political structure of Germany favored the academic rivalry out of which several centers of humanism emerged. The Rhenish scholar Rodolphus Agricola and Johann von DALBERG, Bishop of Worms, promoted a classical revival at Heidelberg. Ludwig Dringenberg (d. 1490) made Schlettstadt the humanistic axis of the Upper Rhine. Nürnberg, long known as a trading market, was becoming the "Florence of Germany" through the scholarly reputations of Herman (1410–85) and Hartman (1440–1514) Schedel and the patronage of Willibald PIRKHEIMER. The generous favor of Emperor Maximilian I led to the formation of literary academies by Conrad Celtis and Johannes Cuspinian and the rise of such scholars as Conrad Peutinger, leading antiquary and epigraphist of Augsburg. Jakob Wimpfeling of Schlettstadt, the "Schoolmaster of Germany," was surrounded by a growing circle of scholars at Strassburg, as was Maternus Pistoris (d. 1534) at Erfurt.

Investigation of Latin and Greek texts soon included scriptural and exegetical writing. Johannes TRITHEMIUS, Abbot of Sponheim, among his copious writings, dealt with the Fathers and with Scripture; Johann REUCHLIN of Pforzheim (1455–1522), professor at Ingolstadt and Tübingen, traced philological errors in earlier transcriptions of the Bible. Ridicule was heaped upon the techniques of the scholastic theologians in the Epistolae obscurorum virorum and in the Narrenschiff of Sebastian Brandt.

ERASMUS of Rotterdam was the greatest and most influential representative of the new learning in the north. Outstanding as a classical and patristic scholar, he made important contributions in the textual study of the Bible. He was a severe critic of the contemporary Church and of scholastic theology, and an ardent advocate of reform, but he regarded Luther's revolt as a calamity and refused to support it.

France. Guillaume Budé (1468–1540), a friend of Erasmus and distinguished Hellenist and specialist in antiquities, was a founder of the new learning in France. He was appointed royal librarian by Francis I and was largely responsible for the founding of the Collège de France (1530) by that king. Patristic and scriptural studies were given a new and critical direction by Lefèvre d'Étaples (c. 1450–1537) and other scholars influenced by him.

The Renaissance in Recent Historical Work. Scholars continue to explore the cultural, artistic, and intellectual legacies of the Italian Renaissance and the national movements it helped produce in Northern Europe. In recent decades historians have returned again to debate humanism's precise influence upon the cultural life of Renaissance cities. Following the work of Hans Baron some have stressed the decisive role that "civic humanism" played in shaping the values of Renaissance culture. Others have seen humanism's penetration of the world of the Renaissance as more problematic and diffuse. The researches of Paul Kristeller, Charles Trinkaus, and others have stressed that the studia humanitatis was primarily an educational and rhetorical movement. As such, they have stressed that humanism's influence was often more conservative and traditional than dynamic or modern. Despite these ongoing debates about the precise character of Renaissance humanism, few would deny that the Renaissance did produce new approaches to art, literature, learning, and politics. Above all, a new view of humankind and its place and role in the world seems to have been one of the era's most distinctive contributions to the modern world.

Bibliography: W. K. FERGUSON, The Renaissance in Historical Thought (Boston 1948); Europe in Transition: 1300–1520 (Boston 1963). P. O. KRISTELLER, Renaissance Thought (New York 1961). H. BARON, The Crisis of the Early Italian Renaissance: Civic Humanism and Republican Liberty in an Age of Classicism and Tyranny, 2 v. (Princeton 1955). E. GARIN, L'Umanesimo italiano: Filosofia et vita civile nel Rinascimento (Bari 1952). G. TOFFANIN, History of Humanism, tr. E. GIANTURCO (New York 1954). H. RÖSSLER, Europa im Zeitalter von Renaissance, Reformation und Gegenreformation, 1450–1650 (Munich 1956). D. HAY, The Italian Renaissance in Its Historical Background (Cambridge, England 1961). G. A. BRUCKER, ed., Renaissance Italy (New York 1958). J. B. ROSS and M. M. MCLAUGHLIN, eds., The Portable Renaissance Reader (New York 1953). E. CASSIRER et al., eds., The Renaissance Philosophy of Man (Chicago 1948). E. EMERTON, Humanism and Tyranny: Studies in the Italian Trecento (Cambridge, MA 1925). M. P. GILMORE, The World of Humanism, 1453–1517 (New York 1952). F. CHABOD, Machiavelli and the Renaissance, tr. D. MOORE (Cambridge, MA 1958). B. HATHAWAY, The Age of Criticism: The Late Renaissance in Italy (Ithaca, NY 1962). E. F. JACOB, ed., Italian Renaissance Studies (New York 1960). G. SAITTA, Il pensiero italiano nell' Umanesimo e nel Rinascimento, 3 v. (Bologna 1949–51). E. F. RICE, The Renaissance Idea of Wisdom (Cambridge, MA 1958). B. BERENSON, The Italian Painters of the Renaissance (5th rev. ed. New York 1959). A. RENAUDET, Humanisme et Renaissance (Geneva 1958). R. WEISS, The Dawn of Humanism in Italy (London 1947); Il primo secolo dell'Umanesimo (Rome 1949). B. L. ULLMAN, Studies in the Italian Renaissance (Rome 1955). T. HELTON, ed., The Renaissance: A Reconsideration of the Theories and Interpretations of the Age (Madison, WI 1961). A. SAPORI, L'età della rinascita, secoli XIII–XVI (Milan 1958). L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages, v.1–3 (London–St. Louis 1938–61). R. AUBENAS and R. RICARD, L'Église et la Renaissance, 1449–1517 (Histoire de l' église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours v.15; 1951). G. BRUCKER, The Civic World of Early Renaissance Florence (Princeton 1977). L. MARTINES, Power and Imagination (New York 1979). A. RABIL, JR., Renaissance Humanism, 3 v. (Philadelphia 1988). C. NAUERT, JR., Humanism and the Culture of Renaissance Europe (Cambridge 1995). J. SIEGEL, Rhetoric and Philosophy in Renaissance Humanism (Princeton 1968). C. TRINKAUS In Our Image and Likeness (Chicago 1970).

[W. W. WILKINSON]

RENAISSANCE PHILOSOPHY

While historians continue to debate when the Renaissance began or whether it began at all, there is no doubt that the style of philosophy was rather different in 1600 than it had been in the middle of the 14th century. There is no single philosopher of this time who compares in importance to Plato, Aristotle, Augustine, and Aquinas, or Descartes, Hume, and Kant; yet the period is significant as the time of transition when the medieval world ceased to be and the modern secular world began. The word secular is important. The leading thinkers of the Renaissance were for the most part believing, practicing Christians; nevertheless, they contributed to the development of a way of thinking not opposed to theology but no longer in the service of theology. Their problems were still the traditional problems of the Christian tradition: God, man's immortality, morals, predestination, and free choice; but their treatment indicated a difference of style that was no longer medieval, yet not quite modern. While they must be studied as individuals, it can be conceded that, if they have anything in common, it is their HUMANISM.

As P. O. Kristeller has often noted, the term "humanism" has been used in a wide, not too discriminating sense, whereby every appreciation of any human value has been stamped humanistic. Actually the word "humanism" is derived from the phrase studia humanitatis, which refers to the study of the humanities; and in the slang of the 15th century a student of the humanities was a humanista. Five subjects especially composed the educational curriculum of the humanista: grammar, rhetoric, poetry, history, and moral philosophy. Such a course of study was not entirely unlike that of the cathedral schools of the Middle Ages, but there were differences. The humanista was less concerned with the logic, natural science, and metaphysics of the scholastic curriculum; and with the passing of time, increasing attention was paid to the classical authors of Greece and Rome, whose works served both as models of expression and as objects of analysis. In this respect Francesco Petrarch is considered a leading figure of the Italian Renaissance.

Petrarch. Although he knew little Greek, PETRARCH was aware of Rome's debt to Greek learning. He was an enthusiastic manuscript hunter, and he integrated his love of classical learning with his own hunger for fame. Still he was religious, and in his reflections in his Ascent of Mont Ventoux he reprimanded himself in Augustinian fashion for his weakness and vanities. As a transitional figure from the medieval to the Renaissance world, he forecasts the shape of trends to be developed by others.

Valla. If Petrarch may be considered the most outstanding humanist of the 14th century, Lorenzo VALLA would be a strong contender for that title in the 15th. Valla's wide-ranging contributions to history, philology, and rhetoric mark him as a Renaissance man of many abilities: he wrote De elegantia linguae latinae (1444), exposed the so-called DONATION OF CONSTANTINE as a fake, translated Herodotus and Thucydides, and applied some of the newer philological techniques to the study of Scripture. In addition he made worthwhile contributions to philosophy with his dialogues On Pleasure (1431), in which the Christian position wins out but the Epicurean view is treated with sympathy; Dialectical Disputations (1439), in which his rejection of the current Aristotelian school is apparent; and On Free Will (1435–43), in which the key problem of God’s foreknowledge, human freedom, and predestination is explored. Later, in their disputes on the same topic, Erasmus and Luther were to refer to Valla’s treatment of the question. Valla held that God’s foreknowledge and man’s freedom were not incompatible, but when pressed that God’s knowledge expressed His predestination, he retreated from the question as an unresolvable mystery.

Cusa. Cardinal NICHOLAS OF CUSA combined in his life work the activity of a papal diplomat busy with the problems of Church councils and the contemplation of a mystic philosopher. His thought on God and the universe reflects the Neoplatonic tradition previously expressed by JOHN SCOTUS ERIGENA and Meister ECKHART, which Cusa integrated with a mathematical imagery that dwells on the paradoxes of the infinite. The title of his main work, De docta ignorantia (1440), indicates the combining of opposites that is his key to understanding reality. Just as a straight line can be regarded as the circumference of a circle of infinite radius, so God is the maximum and minimum of all things. Cusa presents something more than the medieval negative theology; he breaks with the Aristotelian categories, which judged the universe to be a closed sphere with the earth at the center. For him the universe is an infinite sphere whose circumference is nowhere and whose center is everywhere. While he made no scientific discovery himself, his high ecclesiastical rank and his emancipation from the categories of contemporary scholasticism encouraged his readers in the next century, e.g., Copernicus, to express themselves in ways that did lead to scientific breakthroughs. Though he wrote many treatises, Cusa is most famous for his expression of learned ignorance.

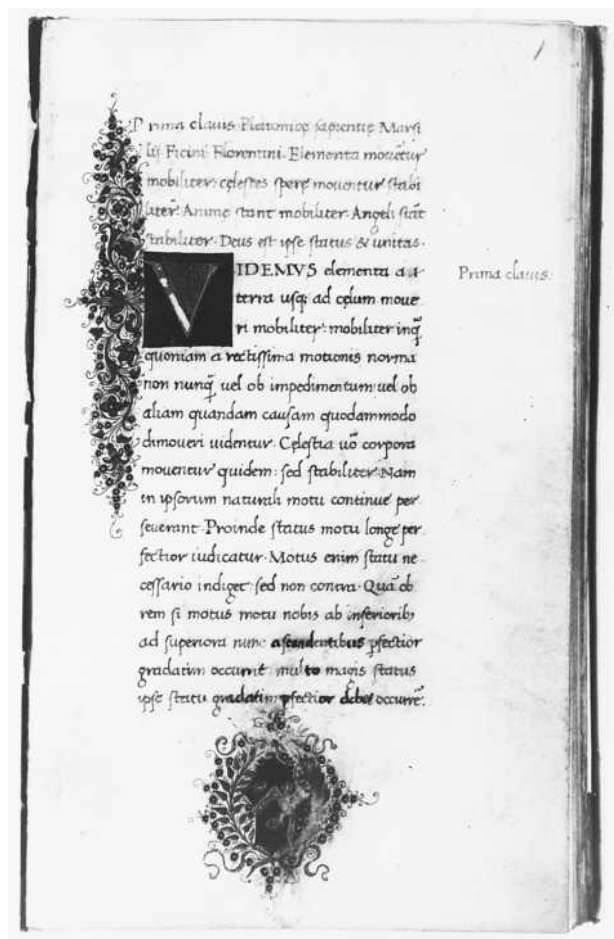

Ficino. Renaissance PLATONISM centers around Florence and the gentle figure of Marsilio FICINO. Trained in the humanities, philosophy, and medicine, Ficino was encouraged in his research on Plato by Cosimo de’ Medici, who donated a villa at Careggi for the “Platonic Academy.” After translating from Greek to Latin the writings of Hermes Trismegistus (1463), Ficino began the translation of Plato’s Dialogues, which he completed before 1469, the year he wrote his commentary on the Symposium. He later translated some writings of Porphyry and Proclus, as well as of Pseudo-Dionysius and Plotinus. In addition to the tremendous contribution Ficino made to Western learning by making so much Platonic thought available in Latin, he presented his own philosophy, a blend of Christian wisdom and Platonism, in his Theologia Platonica, which he wrote between 1469 and 1474. Ficino attempted an elaborate description of a hierarchical universe ranging from God to primary matter and focusing on man at the center. Preoccupied with man’s immortality, Ficino stressed that man’s happiness comes when he is freed from his mortal body and attains God. He recognized that the Christian doctrine of the resurrection of the body will return the soul to a temperate immortal body far different from the one in which it now dwells. This argument for immortality made a profound impression on some of the 16th-century philosophers and is thought to have been influential in leading to the pronouncement of personal immortality as a dogma by the Lateran Council in 1513. Ficino’s theory of friendship, his doctrine of Platonic love, was influential, especially in Renaissance literature. Friends should be united in a mutual respect that has its binding element in their common love of God. The true lover loves the other for the sake of God. Here is reflected the Christian Platonism of Ficino, who was honored with a monument in the cathedral of Florence after his death.

“Peter Paul and Philip Rubens with Justus Lipsius and John van Woverius,” painting by Peter Paul Rubens. Also known as “The Four Philosophers.”

Pico della Mirandola. Although associated with Ficino’s Platonic Academy, Count Giovanni PICO DELLA

Manuscript folio, first page, from "Claves Platonicae Sapientiae," c. 1480, by Marsilio Ficino.

MIRANDOLA was more interested in discovering the truth that underlay or was common to Platonism, Aristotelianism, ARABIAN PHILOSOPHY, and the Jewish CABALA. Pico believed that different systems expressed different parts of the truth. By studying mystical Jewish writings and attempting to show their harmony with Christian thought, he prepared the way for the studies of J. REUCHLIN. In his famous Oration, prepared for delivery on what was to be a debate on some 900 theses he had proposed, Pico began by a special affirmation of the dignity of man and went on to stress the harmony among his philosophical predecessors. Whereas Ficino was more committed to Platonism, Pico appreciated Aristotle as well and defended his scholastic interpreters. Though Pico did not achieve his ideal of the intellectual reconciliation of Plato and Aristotle, later generations have honored him for his work in philosophy and Scripture commentary, the Heptaplus, an analysis of Genesis.

Pomponazzi. Just as contemporary philosophy resists characterization by a word or by one movement, so too Renaissance philosophy is a strand composed of many threads. While Platonism was enjoying a revival through the work of Ficino, the universities remained the stronghold of a secular ARISTOTELIANISM concentrated on its natural and biological aspects. Various schools of interpretation flourished side by side: AVERROISM, THOMISM, SCOTISM, and Alexandrianism. In such a milieu Pietro POMPONAZZI prided himself on his attempt to express the real Aristotle. Thus, while accepting the Church's teaching on personal immortality, he argued in On Immortality (1516) that such a doctrine could not be established on philosophical, i.e., Aristotelian, principles. The intellectual soul's need for phantasms precluded it from ever functioning as a separated soul after death. To the objection that mortality required immortality, Pomponazzi replied, like the Stoics, that virtue was its own reward and evil its own punishment. Pomponazzi was concerned also with predestination and free choice; he attempted to analyze these questions in a naturalistic fashion that led him to conclusions different from those of his professed faith. He took care, however, to accept as a matter of faith the teachings of the Church; but this did not prevent the condemnation of his work. Something of the vitality of Renaissance Aristotelianism is to be seen in the controversies in which such philosophers as Giovanni Crisostomo JAVELLI, Tommaso de Vio CAJETAN, Gasparo CONTARINI, Alexander Achillini (1463–1512), and Agostino NIFO participated.

Telesio. While the Aristotelian tradition flourished in 16th-century Italy, it continued to engender reactions against itself. Such philosophers as Telesio, Patrizi, and Bruno repudiated the shortcomings they believed they saw in Aristotle and attempted to correct his mistakes with their own analyses. In De rerum natura (Naples 1565) Bernardino TELESIO rejected matter and form and tried to explain nature in terms of matter and force, hot and cold. He asserted that man has a material spirit that vivifies his body and, in addition, a soul created by God and infused into the body. He attempted to break with Aristotle and build another natural philosophy on an empirical basis.

Patrizi. Whereas Telesio's interests were physical and biological, the interests of Francesco Patrizi were literary and mathematical. He wrote treatises on history, Della historia (1560), and on poetics, Della poetica (1586), and lectured in Rome on Platonic philosophy. He translated Philoponus's commentary on Aristotle's Metaphysics (1583), Proclus's Elements of Theology and Elementatio physica (1583), and various treatises attributed to Hermes Trismegistus. He edited in Latin the so-called Theology of Aristotle (1591), accepting as genuine this work judged by Thomas Aquinas to be Neoplatonic. In mathematics he wrote works on geometry and on physical space, Nova de universis philosophia (1591). In general, Patrizi preferred Plato to Aristotle, and his achievement in having a chair of Platonic philosophy in Rome went against the contemporary trend at the universities.

Bruno. The tragic and dramatic circumstances surrounding the death of Giordano BRUNO, executed for heresy after a long investigation by the Inquisition, have made him a martyr to the cause of free thought. "One of the leading and most influential thinkers of the Renaissance" (Copleston), he combined Cusa's Neoplatonism and the Hermetic tradition with the implications of the new astronomy of Copernicus into a philosophy that approached pantheism but never bluntly asserted it. For Bruno there was an infinite number of solar systems giving one infinite universe in which God vivified the matter as the soul principle vivifies the body. Bruno anticipated Spinoza by making God immanent in the material substance of the universe yet somehow transcendent as its cause. In this system man loses his substantiality, except in the sense that he is a particular manifestation of the infinity of God. In his reaction against Aristotle, Bruno anticipated developments in modern philosophy and science, but it is doubtful that he caused them.

Agricola. What Petrarch was to Italian humanism, Rodolphus Agricola was to German humanism. More of a rhetorician than a philosopher, Agricola preferred Cicero to Aristotle; in De inventione dialectica (1479) he stressed discovery rather than judging. Along with his contributions to educational reform, he concerned himself with history and translations. Sacred Scripture was his interest when he died at age 41, a religious person faithful to his Church and unaffected by events on the eve of the Reformation.

Reuchlin. Johann Reuchlin, called Capnion by his associates, is regarded as the seed from which the strong tradition of Hebrew studies in Germany grew. A thorough humanist, Reuchlin became intrigued with the magic symbolism of the Jewish CABALA while studying in Italy. Like Pico, he sought to use this tradition in support of Christianity, combining number wisdom with the strong Neoplatonic tendencies he inherited from Nicholas of Cusa. When overly zealous Christians proposed destroying Hebrew books in order to promote the conversion of the Jews, Reuchlin bravely defended the value of Hebrew knowledge in Angenspeigl (1511). Both Luther and Erasmus appreciated Reuchlin's learning; but when the crisis of the Lutheran break came toward the end of his life, he chose to remain Catholic rather than join the reformers.

Erasmus. Desiderius ERASMUS is rightly regarded as the greatest figure of the Northern Renaissance, but his contribution to philosophy was slight. A tremendous worker at humanistic studies, he ardently applied his learning to the service of religion with an edition of the New Testament in Greek, editions of Church Fathers, such as St. Jerome, and a moral treatise, Enchiridion militis christiani (The Handbook of the Christian Soldier, 1501). His collection of classical proverbs, Adagia, was a best seller, and his Praise of Folly (1509) was both a tribute to his friend Thomas More and a satiric comment on the foibles and failings of the churchmen of his day. Because he had been caustic toward various religious practices that detracted from Christian piety as he envisioned it, many expected him to favor Martin Luther at the time of the latter's break with Rome. But Erasmus attacked Luther's denial of free choice in Diatribes de libero arbitrio (1524).

Bernardino Telesio.

Reflecting somewhat the position of St. Thomas Aquinas on free choice, Erasmus went beyond that and argued that, since man really cannot settle these matters of freedom and foreknowledge, he must assume freedom, because the consequences of assuming determinism would be disastrous. The general public, never too well behaved in the first place, would abandon all moral restraint if it no longer feared being held responsible for its actions. Erasmus then struggled with difficult scriptural passages that seemed to indicate that God "hardened the hearts'' of some and caused others to repent. This work provoked Luther to reply with his polemical De servo arbitrio (1525). Erasmus is not to be measured in terms of his philosophical ability but by the scholarship he accomplished.

Paracelsus. One of the thinkers most difficult to classify in 16th-century thought is the strange Swiss physician-philosopher who called himself Philippus Aureolus Paracelsus. He was born Theophrastus Bombastus von Hohenheim and was trained by his father in medicine, alchemy, and astrology. His bombastic writings challenged accepted medical knowledge but mixed magic and the occult with an appreciation of differences in chemical compounds and elements and their effect upon health. He is thought to have served as one of the models for Faust.

Böhme. Jakob BÖHME, German mystic and philosophical theologian, attempted through his devotional writings to resolve the problem of good and evil in reality. He was remarkably productive, writing books on religious devotion (The Way to Christ) and works of speculative philosophy that sought to understand how the multiplicity of the world arose out of the unity of God (On the Three Principles, 1619). Later philosophers, as diverse as A. Schopenhauer, M. Heidegger, and N. A. Berdîaev, acknowledge his influence; and such church groups as the Quakers are part of his legacy in religious practice.

Machiavelli. Though scholars vary in their estimates of the political morality of Niccolò MACHIAVELLI, they agree on his significance as a political thinker. When a change of political power in Florence forced Machiavelli into early retirement, the world of humanistic learning gained a reporter, historian, and shrewd analyzer of political power. In his commentary on Livy's History, Discorsi sopra la prima deca di Tito Livio (1515–19?), Machiavelli combined a sense of the appropriate historical anecdote with an ability to delineate the political troubles of contemporary Italy. He longed for his country to achieve the national unity that was growing in France, England, and Spain, but he grieved over the impossibility of this task so long as the Church ruled the central section of Italy. His social comments were caustic and cynical, but his patriotism is unquestioned. In Il Principe (written 1513, first published 1532) Machiavelli provided future rulers with a handbook that described the technique of grasping and retaining power in predatory society. While the book is in the tradition of the medieval treatises On the Governance of Rulers, it is unlike them in its frankly amoral character. J. Maritain argues that the techniques of Il Principe can promise only short-term success and its ruthless pragmatism cannot be the basis of promoting a stable society, for Machiavelli's virtù is an aggressive daring, a talent for opportunism, not a form of justice.

In all his writings, the political treatises, the Art of War, and Florentine Histories, Machiavelli regards human nature as brutal, avaricious, power hungry, and collectively cowardly. He appears to be echoing in the political sphere the corrupted man of the Reformers.

Bodin. While Machiavelli is associated with amorality in political thinking, the French political philosopher Jean Bodin is associated with the reapplication of natural law to political questions. Living and writing in the context of civil wars arising out of the post-Reformation religious disputes, Bodin strongly emphasized the need of a sovereign power as the ultimate source of authority in society, but for him the sovereign remained subject to moral law. In Six livres de la République (1576) Bodin maintained that the family is the foundation of society and that certain fundamental rights of liberty and property belong to the subject. Bodin reflected also on the nature of history in Methodus ad facilem historiarum cognitionem (1566). This attention to the nature of historical writing and study is a mark of the emerging modern mind in contrast to the medieval chronicler, who was not so time conscious. Another modern note was the element of biblical criticism Bodin displayed in the colloquy Heptaplomeres (written toward the end of his life but not published until 1841), wherein a Catholic, a Calvinist, a Lutheran, a Muslim, a Jew, a Deist, and an Epicurean discuss religious questions, seeking some common denominator. Their agreement lies in rejecting atheism; tolerance of religious differences is implied to be the solution to the divisions plaguing the sixteenth century.

Vives. Juan Luis VIVES was the Spanish contemporary of Erasmus and, like him, was concerned with education and man. He is famous for a functionalist approach to psychology. In De anima et vita libri tres (Basel 1538), he sought to study man's actions rather than to follow the classical writers who explained man's nature. His analysis of memory and forgetfulness represents a contribution to Renaissance psychology. Like Erasmus, Vives employed his humanistic gifts in the service of Christian learning, for example, in De veritate fidei Christiane (1543).

Ramus. Pierre de la Ramée, or Peter RAMUS, is noted for his opposition to Aristotle and his criticism of scholasticism. His thesis at the College of Navarre was "Everything Aristotle Taught Is False" (1536), and in Aristotelicae animadversiones (1543) and Dialecticae partitiones (1543) he revised the approach to the teaching of logic. Ramus emphasized logic as part of the arts of expression; and while it is said that his dialectic cannot be taken seriously by any competent logician, his influence on the teaching of rhetoric and dialectic in the late 16th and the 17th century, in Europe and then in America, was tremendous. Hundreds of editions of his Dialecticae were published, and it is through his influence as a textbook author that he is significant rather than from any intrinsic merit in his system. Appointed by Francis I in 1551 to be regius professor of eloquence and philosophy (a title he designed himself), he enjoyed the life of controversy he engendered. However, becoming a Protestant sometime after 1562, he suffered disqualification from his official position. He was murdered in the rioting of the St. Bartholomew's Day Massacre.

Lipsius. While Pomponazzi and Montaigne used Stoic themes in their philosophy, Justus LIPSIUS (or Joest Lips, as this Flemish humanist and philologist was also called) is considered the most thoroughgoing student and expositor of STOICISM in the Renaissance. Born a Catholic, Lipsius accepted Lutheranism and Calvinism at times when the conditions of his employment as a teacher required it. He returned to Catholicism during his later years as a professor at Louvain, but some of his contemporaries found it difficult to forgive what they regarded as religious inconstancy. The truth seems to be that Lipsius was not theologically minded; rather, he concentrated on the exposition of Stoic thought integrated with the Christianity he had inherited.

In De Constantia (1584), Politicorum (1589), Manuductio ad stoicam philosophiam (1604), and Physiologia stoicorum (1604), Lipsius showed his growth in the understanding of Stoic belief, which, as J. Saunders has shown, he reconciled with Christianity: "Living according to Nature came to mean living according to Right Reason, or according to Virtue, and hence to mean seeking after God, who himself becomes the all important Object or End." In situations where Stoic practice tended to conflict with Christianity, for example, in accepting suicide, Lipsius preferred the Christian position. In his revival of Stoicism, Lipsius greatly influenced Montaigne, P. CHARRON, and Francis BACON.

Montaigne. Michel Eyquem de MONTAIGNE is almost a distillation of Renaissance philosophy. While only in his late thirties, he retired to his estate in Bordeaux to study himself. He published his reflections, observations, and his conversations about his reading and experience under the title Essais (3 v. 1582–88); these thoughts represent the reaction of a learned and cultivated man to the confusion and suffering brought on by the Reformation and the wars of religion that followed it. Montaigne expressed the Renaissance's preoccupation with man; "I study myself more than any other subject; that's my metaphysics; that's my physics." In his relaxed musings, he expressed the humanistic learning he had acquired from his boyhood by calling on a wide range of classical authors as witnesses in support of his insights. But the controversies of the time made him skeptical of the conflicting philosophies, and he rejected their dogmatism. His motto Que scay-je? (What do I know?) states his philosophy; in The Apology for Raymond Sebond he brought to bear his most critical comments to show the poverty of human reason and the uncertainty resulting from the conflict of authorities about the fundamental problems of life. Montaigne was no revolutionary: "Wherefore it will become you better to confine yourself to the accustomed routine, whatever it is, than to fly headlong into this unbridled license"—given man's inability to know what is better, he should conserve what he has. As Gilson remarked, Montaigne's humility is the wisdom of the acceptance of oneself. This is an indication also of his Stoicism, and the tranquillity it promises is the Pyrrhonian ataraxia.

The essential characteristics of Renaissance philosophy consist in its being a period of transition. By the time the thinkers surveyed in this article had exerted their influence, medieval thought had come to its end and the setting was provided for the beginning of modern philosophy.

See Also: PHILOSOPHY, HISTORY OF, 4; ARISTOTELIANISM; PLATONISM.

Bibliography: P. O. KRISTELLER, Eight Philosophers of the Italian Renaissance (Stanford, Calif. 1964). L. W. SPITZ, The Religious Renaissance of the German Humanists (Cambridge, Mass. 1963). F. C. COPELSTON, History of Philosophy, v. 3. (Westminster, Md. 1953). J. D. COLLINS, A History of Modern European Philosophy (Milwaukee, Wis. 1954), on the Renaissance background with bibliog. A. MAURER, Medieval Philosophy (New York 1962), studies on Ficino, Pico, and Pomponazzi. É. H. GILSON and T. D. LANGAN, Modern Philosophy: Descartes to Kant (New York 1963), on Montaigne. J. H. RANDALL, The Career of Philosophy from the Middle Ages to the Enlightenment (New York 1962). A. R. CAPONIGRI, Renaissance to the Romantic Age (A History of Western Philosophy v. 3; Chicago, Ill. 1963). F. CHABOD, Machiavelli and the Renaissance, tr. D. MOORE (New York 1965), with extensive bibliog. chapter. J. O. RIEDL, ed., A Catalogue of Renaissance Philosophers, 1350–1650 (Milwaukee, Wis. 1940). W. J. BOUWMA, The Interpretation of Renaissance Humanism (Service Center for Teachers of History, Amer. Historical Assoc. pamphlet 18; Washington 1959). M. P. GILMORE, The World of Humanism, 1453–1517 (New York 1952). The Renaissance Philosophy of Man, ed. E. CASSIRER et al. (Chicago, Ill. 1948). G. DE SANTILLANA, ed., The Age of Adventure (New York 1956). E. GARIN, La cultura filosofica del Rinascimento italiano (Florence 1961). G. SAITTA, Il pensiero italiano nell'Umanesimo e nel Rinascimento, 3 v. (Bologna 1949–51). R. POPKIN, A History of Scepticism from Erasmus to Descartes (rev. ed. New York 1964). J. SAUNDERS, Justus Lipsius: The Philosophy of Renaissance Stoicism (New York 1955). F. A. YATES, Giordano Bruno and the Hermetic Tradition (Chicago 1964). D. M. FRAME, Montaigne: A Biography (New York 1965).

[D. J. FITZGERALD]

RENAN, JOSEPH ERNEST

Orientalist and philosopher; b. Tréguier, Brittany, France, Feb. 28, 1823; d. Paris, Oct. 2, 1892. When Ernest (as he was ordinarily called) was only five years old, the corpse of his fisherman father was found on the sea-shore at Esqui. Thereafter the youth owed much to the devoted interest that his sister Henriette, 12 years his senior, took in him. Through her intervention, after his early education in the parochial school at Regier, he received a scholarship to study at the Sulpician minor seminary of St. Nicolas da Chardonnet, then recently founded by F. DUPANLOUP. He continued his studies for the priesthood at the major seminaries of Issy and Saint Sulpice, Paris. In the latter place he studied Scripture, Hebrew, and Syriac under A. M. Le Hir. But in 1845 he gave up the idea of becoming a priest. After a short stay at the Oratorian college in Stanislas, he took the post of prefect of studies at the school of M. Crouzet. There he began his lifelong friendship with one of the students who was to become an illustrious chemist, P. E. M. Berthelot. Meanwhile, he continued his university studies and received the degree of fellowship in philosophy.

In 1848 he published his first work, the Histoire des langues sémitique, which won for him the Prix Volney and made him known as an Orientalist in the scientific world. It was at this time also that he wrote the Avenir de la Science, which, however, was not published until 1890. The period of October 1849 to June 1850 he spent on an archeological mission in Italy. In 1851 he was appointed to a post in the manuscript department of the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris, and in 1852 he received the doctorate in literature. In 1856 he married the niece of the artist Ary Scheffer. From 1860 to 1861 he was engaged in an archeological expedition in Phoenicia. There he began his famous Vie de Jésus (Life of Jesus), and there also his sister Henriette, who had urged him to write this work, died. Appointed a professor of Hebrew at the Collège de France in 1862, he made bold in his opening lecture to speak of Jesus as merely "an incomparable man." The scandal and protestations caused by this cost him this professorship until 1870, when, at the fall of the Empire, he was reinstated. After a second archeological expedition in the East from 1864 to 1865, he was chosen in 1879 to take the place of Claude Bernard in the Académie Française, and in 1879 he became the director of the Collège de France. His funeral, held at the expense of the state, was a purely civil affair.

Among his abundant literary production, his chief work is L'Histoire de origines du christianisme in seven volumes, embracing (1) Vie de Jésus (1863), (2) Les Apôtres (1868), (3) Saint Paul (1869), (4) L'Anté-christ (1873), (5) Les Évangiles et la seconde génération chré- tienne (1877), (6) L'Église chrétienne, and (7) Marc-Aurèle et la fin du monde antique (1881). The style of Renan's language was largely responsible for the attraction that his works held for his contemporaries and later generations; his writings are always clear and smooth, rhythmic and interesting. While he made lasting contributions as a Semitic philologist, his value as a historian and exegete is much less—mostly that of a dilettante. Dazzled by the new science of the 19th century and the novel higher criticism of the Bible, Renan exchanged his Christian faith for skepticism, rationalism, and romanticism. Although he often changed his opinions on many points, he remained steadfast on one—the denial of the supernatural, the divinity of Christ, and the existence of a transcendent God.

Bibliography: Oeuvres complètes, ed. H. PSICHARI, 9 v. (Paris 1947–60). J. CHAIX-RUY, E. Renan (Paris 1956), with full bibliog. of Renan's works. W. F. BARRY, Ernest Renan (New York 1905). L. F. MOTT, Ernest Renan (New York 1921). M. J. LAGRANGE, Christ and Renan: A Commentary on Ernest Renan's 'The Life of Jesus,' tr. M. WARD (New York 1928).

[A. M. MALO]

RENAUDOT, EUSÈBE

Orientalist, historian of liturgy; b. Paris, July 20, 1648; d. Paris, Sept. 1, 1720. The oldest of 14 children, and son and grandson of prominent physicians, Renaudot entered the ORATORIANS but withdrew and remained in minor orders, deeply religious and somewhat austere. With his knowledge of Syriac, Coptic, and Arabic, he combined an interest in theology and Church history. Part of his time was taken up with consultations on diplomatic affairs at the French court, and from 1680 he was editor of the Gazette de France, a family property by royal privilege.

Elected to the French Academy in 1689, he was 62 when he began to publish his materials on Oriental Church teaching and practice in liturgy and ritual. His Liturgiarum orientalium collectio (2 v. Paris 1715–16) provided the West with a large repertory of liturgical texts of the various Eastern rites in Latin translation. There is in it some mixing of Maronite and West Syrian (Jacobite) materials, and most of the liturgies have been critically studied since his day; but this work and his volumes on the Perpetuité de la foi catholique de l'Église (between 1708 and 1713) were important reference works in the fields of liturgy and sacramental theology. He also published a history, drawn from Arabic sources, of the Coptic Church of Alexandria, and the text and translation of early Arab seafarers' accounts of India and China. He left his library to the Benedictines of Saint-Germain-des-Prés. Some of his unpublished translations were later employed in H. Denzinger's Ritus orientalium (2 v. Würzburg 1863–64).

Bibliography: A. RAES, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1236. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 14.2:2369–72. J. CARREYRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 13.2:2381–83. A. VILLIEN, L'Abbé Eusèbe Renaudot (Paris 1904).

[P. W. SKEHAN]

RENO, DIOCESE OF

The diocese of Reno, NEVADA (Dioecesis Renensis), which encompassed the entire state of Nevada, was originally established in 1931 during the pontificate of Pope Pius XI. In 1976, during the time of Pope Paul VI, it was redesignated as the diocese of Reno-Las Vegas. In 1995 Pope John Paul II divided the diocese into the diocese of Reno in the western part of the state and the diocese of LAS VEGAS in the southern part. The first bishop of Reno was Thomas K. Gorman, who served from 1931 until 1952 when he was appointed coadjutor bishop of Dallas. His successor, Robert J. Dwyer served from 1952 to 1966 when he was named archbishop of Portland, Oregon, and he in turn was succeeded in 1967 by Bishop Joseph Green who resigned for reasons of health at the end of 1974. It was during the time of Bishop Norman F. McFarland who first served as apostolic administrator (1974–76) that Pope Paul VI redesignated the diocese Reno–Las Vegas. McFarland served until he was transferred to the diocese of Orange, California in 1987. Bishop Daniel F. Walsh, first named bishop of Reno–Las Vegas in 1987, became bishop of the newly established diocese of Las Vegas in 1995, and Bishop Phillip F. Straling, the bishop of San Bernardino, California, was installed as the sixth bishop of Reno.

At the time of the division, Catholics in Nevada numbered about 432,970, the largest single religious group in the state. The Reno diocese covers the twelve northern counties in the state. The diocesan newspaper is the Northern Nevada Catholic. It is a suffragan see of the Archdiocese of San Francisco.

[J. FILTEAU/EDS.]

RENZI, ELISABETTA, BL.

Foundress of the Sisters of Our Lady of Sorrows (Istituto Maestre Pie dell'Addolorata); b. Nov. 19, 1786, Saludecio (near Rimini), Italy; d. Aug. 14, 1859, Coriano, Italy. Elisabetta's wealthy, noble parents sent her to the Poor Clare monastery at Pietrarubbia for her education. Upon completing her studies, she entered the same convent with their permission (1807). Renzi and her sisters were exlaustrated when the monasteries were suppressed by Napoleon before she could make her vows. From that time until 1824, Elisabetta engaged in charitable activities while living at home. Recognizing the need to provide youth with a Christian education in a society increasingly hostile to religion, she began teaching at a school for girls in Coriano near Rimini (April 1824). When Saint Maddalena CANOSSA declined to assume responsibility for the school and suggested that Elisabetta was the better candidate, Renzi gathered a group of women to undertake the task (1828). The association eventually became a religious congregation, approved by the Holy See, Dec. 10, 1839, dedicated to education and care of the neglected in the villages of Romagna. Elisabetta, who was declared venerable in 1988 and beatified by John Paul II, June 18, 1989, is buried in the chapel of the mother house at Coriano.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1989): 764. L'Osservatore Romano, English ed. July 10, 1989, 4.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

REORDINATION

The question of reordinations reflects one of the great theological issues from the 3rd and 4th centuries onward. Essentially the debate concerned the power of the Church over Sacraments administered outside the Church. Were they valid Sacraments? Should Baptism and Orders administered by heretics and schismatics be repeated? This use of the term "reordination" should be distinguished from two other possible uses: (1) the view of some theologians of the reformed churches that the power of orders can be lost and so validly reputed, and (2) reordination in cases where the first ceremony was clearly null, e.g., lack of proper form or matter. This article is not concerned with these uses.

The traditional teaching of the Catholic Church, defined by the Council of Trent [H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer (32d ed. Freiburg 1963) 1622], is that Orders once validly conferred cannot be reiterated, for the character is indelible. In the case of unworthy ministers, the traditional view, the one that has been the "common and certain" doctrine of all approved authors since the 13th century (St. Thomas, Summa theologiae, Suppl. 38.2; Cappello, 275), is that Orders conferred by heretics, provided due matter, form, and intention are observed, are valid. Thus the mere fact of heresy or unworthiness in the minister does not invalidate the Sacrament. Hence there can be no reordination unless, of course, other factors intervene. Thus, if Anglican orders are excluded, it is because Catholic teaching insists that there is some defect of form and intention, considered indispensable by the Council of Trent (ibid., 1624). Eastern Orthodox Churches generally stress more strongly the connection between right faith and right Sacraments.

The history of the Church records a number of occasions, and certainly many doubtful ones, when Orders conferred in a proper manner, but by an unworthy minister, have been condemned as useless and were therefore repeated. The doctrine behind this attitude is identified with St. CYPRIAN's (d. 258) teaching (see Saltet 11–34). It had some strong adherents in the Middle Ages, e.g., HUMBERT OF SILVA CANDIDA (d. 1061) in his Libri tres adversus simoniacos (1054–58). The majority, however, opposed the invalidity theme, and their arguments were identified with the doctrine of St. AUGUSTINE (d. 430) recognizing the validity of orders conferred by heretics [Contra epist. Parmeniani, 2.28; Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum (Vienna 1866–) 51:79–80]. Such ministers on being reconciled to the Church were not to be reordained. (Whether they would be allowed the exercise, i.e., lawful use, of their Orders, was a different matter.) Conciliar legislation supported this view, which was held by the majority throughout the period of controversy.

The number of reordinations was not, in fact, very large, if we bear in mind the period of time involved (see Saltet or Amann). We shall consider only the problem of cases in which the popes ordered ministers to be reordained whose Orders would today be regarded as valid. Thus the Roman Synod of 769 declared null the ordinations conferred by the false pope Constantine II; and Stephen IV (d. 772) reordained the bishops. Sergius III (d. 911) ordered all those ordained by FORMOSUS (d. 896) to be reordained. In 964 the ordinations conferred by Leo VIII, who had usurped the papacy, were annulled by John XII (d. 964). During the 11th century reordination was particularly associated with the “heresy” of SIMONY. The validity of simoniacal orders was greatly discussed from Leo IX (d. 1054) onward. Hence Leo IX ordered certain simoniacs to be reordained. HUMBERT and St. PETER DAMIAN (d. 1072) expressed opposite viewpoints, but it was the latter who set the general tone for the 11th century. Despite some opposing views, especially among the canonists of Bologna, the doctrine of the validity of Sacraments independent of the probity and faith of the minister became universally admitted by the 13th century.

How is one to explain these “reordinations”? Three solutions have been suggested. The first assumes them to be examples of a “temporary deformation of doctrine”; the second holds that reordinations were valid because the Church has the power to determine the conditions in which the power of Orders may be validly exercised. Neither explanation is satisfactory, especially the second, which is against accepted teaching. The third and more likely solution is that the significance of the term “reordination” has not been sufficiently examined. Moreover, the term commonly used to describe unworthy Orders (irritae) is too often mistakenly translated as “invalid” when it really meant “illicit.” Again there are few recorded instances of reordination. Where there are such instances, they usually occurred in times of political and ecclesiastical conflict, e.g., at the time of the INVESTITURE STRUGGLE. In some cases reordination obviously referred not to the Sacrament but to the canonical institution. Certain popes, e.g., Leo IX, acted unwisely under pressure, but it is clear that the magisterium and infallibility were not involved. Despite Saltet's fundamental work, there is need today for the whole question to be reexamined.

Bibliography: L. SALTET, Les Réordinations (Paris 1907). J. TIXERONT, Holy Orders and Ordination, tr. S. A. RAEMERS (St. Louis 1928). V. FUCHS, Der Ordinationstitel von seiner Entstehung bis auf Innocenz III (Bonn 1930). É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 13.2:2385–2431. F. M. CAPPELLO, Tractatus canonicomoralis de sacramentis iuxta codicem iuris canonici, v. 4 (3d ed. Rome 1951), 4. H. LENNERZ, De sacramentis Novae Legis in genere (Rome 1950). B. LEEMING, Principles of Sacramental Theology (Westminster, Md. 1956). A. VANNESTE, “La Sainteté et la foi du ministre et du sujet des sacrements,” Ephemerides theologicae Lovanienses 39 (1963) 5–29. J. GILCHRIST, “Simoniaca haeresis and the Problem of Orders from Leo IX to Gratian,” Proceedings of the 2d International Congress of Medieval Canon Law Held at Boston, August 1963 (Vatican City 1964).

[J. GILCHRIST]

REPARATION

The term reparation lends itself to a variety of meanings in both the profane and religious contexts. It may signify the action of repairing or keeping in repair, and when so used by a theologian or religious writer it designates the whole work of restoring men to the FRIENDSHIP OF GOD. This usage is close to the root meaning of the word, yet it is not as common as that in which reparation designates compensation for an injury. This is the usual meaning given reparation by theologians. In moral theology its use implies restitution for a personal injury for which the compensation cannot be measured exactly. In ascetical theology or devotional writing reparation designates the effort to make amends for insults given to God by sin, one's own or another's. In dogmatic theology the idea of reparation enters into the attempt to find a theological explanation of Redemption or, more specifically, to clarify the notion of satisfaction.

Related to Sin. In the history of dogma the concept of reparation is intimately bound to the notion of sin as a personal injury or insult to God (see SIN, THEOLOGY OF). Adam had been constituted the moral head of the human race, and his sin not only alienated mankind from God but was also a personal injury or insult to God because it deprived Him of what is His by strict right. By sinning, Adam offered the supreme insult to God and accomplished the downfall of mankind. These effects of Adam's sin have, moreover, been compounded by the sins of his descendants.

Man is subject to the consequences of sin, which is a reality of his history. The first consequence of sin is guilt (called reatus culpae), which separates man from God and makes him an enemy of his Creator. The second consequence is a penalty (reatus poenae) for the injury done to God. Sin in the nature of things is enmity to God and must therefore be abandoned before one can be restored to His friendship. It also appears clear from the history of God's relationship to man that sin is followed by a penalty that must be paid (see e.g., Gn 3.16–19). That is to say, to obtain forgiveness reparation must be made; one must restore to God what he has deprived Him of and make amends for the insult done to Him (see, e.g., 2 Sm 24.10–25).

God's reaction to sin is often described in terms of anger and the punishment of sin as His revenge. One is face to face with a mystery that Scripture presents in metaphors. These anthropomorphic expressions are indispensable but are not meant to carry the whole burden of God's message. Misunderstanding of this has led to serious distortions of the idea of satisfaction and reparation for sin. The reformers, certain Catholic preachers, and popular spiritual writers taught that Jesus Christ became the object of the wrath of His Father and suffered the torments of the damned to satisfy retributive justice as a penal substitute for sinful man. In reaction to this distorted and exaggerated view of God's wrath, liberal Protestant theology has denied any idea of reparation.

The consideration of God's infinite holiness and His eternal immutability precludes the imperfections of retributive justice. God's love initiates all movements of reconciliation; it is not caused by them. In spite of this it is clear from the first pages of Genesis that sin is hateful to God and is punished. Even after sin was forgiven and the sinner turned again to God, punishment was often inflicted to expiate for the offense against God. The Old Testament especially points to a close connection between sin and a penalty (see Nm 16.25–35; 2 Chr 29.6–9; Ps 77(78) and 108(109); Jer 15.1–9).

Sin is a personal offense against God; it makes the sinner an enemy of God; it is the death of the soul and delivers the sinner into the slavery of Satan. Added to these effects, which follow upon sin, there is a debt of the sinner to God. Because the original state of friendship was completely gratuitous, its restoration when lost was completely beyond man's power. The initiative had to come from God. God planned the restoration in Jesus Christ, who for His part embraced His Father's will perfectly. Thus as the second Adam He restored all things in Himself and reversed the course of action taken by the first Adam. Further, whatever debts had been incurred were wiped out by the humble and obedient submission of Jesus to His Father's will in His Passion and death.

An Attempt to Explain. The introduction of the notion of reparation is an attempt to explain how the Passion and death of Christ effected man's Redemption. The organization and synthesis of this theology took place first in the Cur Deus Homo of St. ANSELM OF CANTERBURY. For him reparatory satisfaction became necessary from the fact of sin. While rejecting this note of necessity, Catholic theology has followed St. Anselm's lead in explaining the redemptive work of Christ. In the past there often was an overemphasis on the penal aspects of the material sufferings involved. The Son of God became the substitute of His fellow men as the object of the wrath of His Father. These ideas are not contained in St. Anselm nor in the works of the great scholastics, who adopted and modified his theory. Satisfaction is not punishment, nor is reparation found in the sufferings themselves but in the humility and love and obedience found in submission to the sufferings.

The Redemption is God's love in operation. The Son of God became the Son of Man to wipe out the decree against men by reversing the pride and disobedience of Adam in His humble and obedient death. In this there was vicarious satisfaction and reparation made possible by the Redeemer's identification and solidarity with the redeemed rather than by substitution. There is a judgment upon sin that Jesus Christ took upon Himself and removed from mankind. The themes of the Suffering Servant (Is ch. 53; Acts 8.32–35), the LAMB OF GOD (Jn 1.29; 1 Pt 1.19), obedience restoring what had been lost by the disobedience, all point to reparation. There is more to men's Redemption than reparation; however, there is an aspect of this saving work that can hardly be explained in any other way.

Duty. Reparation is a wider notion than that of EXPIATION in that its burden is not only the removal of sin and guilt and penalty, but the reestablishment of all things in Christ. The duty of reparation, then, is the obligation of a Christian to share in the redemptive mission of Jesus Christ, who, by His obedience to the will of His Father in Heaven, especially by the offering of His life on the cross, merited eternal salvation for all men. Every Christian is personally involved in Christ's sacrifice, for he is baptized in his death (Rom 6.3–4), and those who are spiritually alive through that death may not live only for themselves (2 Cor 5.15). St. Peter, therefore, offered the suffering Jesus as an example to be followed not only by the chosen few but by all who are Christians (1 Pt 1.18–2.20).

This duty of sharing in the Savior's work of Redemption may be fulfilled in many ways. Such reparation is contained, actually or virtually, in the mere carrying out of the Commandments of God and of the Church. By reason of one's association in the priesthood of Christ by Baptism (see St. THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa Theologiae, 3a, 62.2), all of the day's actions can be merged with Christ's redemptive action. In this connection, recent popes have recommended the offering of the day's activities as a way to share in the reparation achieved by the Savior on the cross (e.g., Pius X, April 9, 1911, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 3:345; Pius XII, Sept. 27, 1956, ibid. 48:674–677, and May 19, 1957, ibid. 49:415). Also, attendance at Mass with the intention, even obscure, of being united to Christ's sacrifice is a special means for sharing in His work of reparation.

In modern times, especially by the renewal of the ancient devotion to the humanity of Christ (see SACRED HUMANITY, DEVOTION TO), in the symbol of His love for man, the Sacred Heart, the Church has promoted among the faithful the practice of reparation. Many prayers of reparation, several acts of reparation, and the morning offering mentioned above have been richly indulgenced. Also, the canonization of saints, such as Rose of Lima, Thérèse of Lisieux, and Gabriel Possenti, who devoted their lives to reparation, has furthered this spirit.

See Also: RESURRECTION OF CHRIST, 2; SATISFACTION OF CHRIST; SOTERIOLOGY; REDEMPTION.

Bibliography: J. RIVIÈRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951) 13.2:1912–2004; The Doctrine of the Atonement, tr. L. CAPPADelta, 2 v. (St. Louis 1909). L. HÖDL, ibid. 4:683–685. H. F. DAVIS et al., A Catholic Dictionary of Theology (London 1962) 1: 189–198. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 167–175, 2032–40, 2218–32. J. BONSIRVEN, The Theology of the N.T., tr. S. F. L. TYE (Westminster, Md. 1963). L. CERFAUX, Christ in the Theology of St. Paul, tr. G. WEBB and A. WALKER (New York 1959). W. F. HOGAN, Christ's Redemptive Sacrifice (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1963). S. LYONNET, De peccato et redemptione (Rome 1957–), “Conception paulinienne de la rédemption,” Lumière et vie 7 (1958) 35–66. PHILIPPE DE LA TRINITÉ, What is Redemption? tr. A. ARMSTRONG (New York 1961).

M. MELLET, “The Redemption” in The Historical and Mystical Christ, ed. A. M. HENRY, tr. A. BOUCHARD (Theology Library 5; Chicago 1958) 147–207. G. OGGIONI, “Il mistero della redenzione,” Problemi e orientamenti di teologia dommatica, v.2 (Milan 1957) 236–343. E. F. SIEGMAN, “The Blood of Christ in St. Paul's Soteriology,” in Proceedings of the Second Precious Blood Study Week, 1960 (Carthage, Ohio 1962) 11–35. E. TESTA, “La sotereologia de s. Paolo causa della sua cattività,” Studii biblici francescani 8 (1957–58) 113–214. PIUS XI, “Miserentissimus Redemptor,” Acta Apostolicae Sedis (Rome 1909–) 20:165–178. PIUS XII, “Caritate Christi Complusi,” Acta Apostolicae Sedis (Rome 1909) 24:177–194. C. MARMION, Christ in His Mysteries (London 1939) 248–265. R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, The Three Ages of the Interior Life, tr. M. T. DOYLE, 2 v. (St. Louis 1947–48) 2:497–510. Enchiridion Indulgentiarum (Vatican City 1950) 178–179, 256–257.

[A. A. MAGUIRE/P. F. MULHERN]

REPENTANCE

Repentance and penance are imperfect and unsatisfactory equivalents of μετάνοια of the Greek New Testament and poenitentia of the Latin Vulgate. The Greek form directly signifies the change of mind or of heart that occurs in conversion. The Latin poenitentia, with which the Vulgate (often joining with it some form of the verb agere) translates the Greek term, connotes regret for one's past sins as well as penalties undertaken on their account; it represents penance as something to be done, a work to be performed. By contrast, Protestant insistence upon the idea of μετάνοια (translated by “repentance” in the AV) in the sense of the beginning of a new life, a new way of looking at things and feelings about them, has often been understood as requiring no special attitude with regard to moral lapses of the past. For the teaching of Catholic theology that sorrow and regret for past sins is always included in true conversion, see CONTRITION.

See Also: CONVERSION, I (IN THE BIBLE); PENANCE, SACRAMENT OF; REPARATION.

[T. A. PORTER/EDS.]

REPETTO, MARIA, BL.

Sister of Our Lady of Refuge of Mount Calvary; b. Nov. 1, 1807, Voltaggio, northern Italy; d. Jan. 5, 1890, Genoa, Italy. Maria, the eldest child of Giovanni Battista Repetto and his wife Teresa Gozzola, helped raise her siblings. Of the nine children, five girls became religious sisters and one boy a priest. At age 22 Maria became a cloistered nun of Our Lady of Refuge in Genoa. There she served the community in various offices (infirmarian, laundress, laborer), but became known as a portress of unwearying charity and wisdom. She nursed the sick of Genoa through the cholera epidemics of 1835 and 1854.

A nun marks the forehead of a child on Ash Wednesday ceremonies marking Lent, the opening of 40 days of contemplation and repentance before Easter, Mexico City Cathedral. (AP/WideWorld Photos)

Revered for her holiness while she lived, her body was interred in the chapel of Our Lady of Refuge of Mount Calvary.

During Repetto's beatification (Oct. 4, 1981), Pope John Paul II recalled her words: "Jesus must be contemplated, loved, and served in the poor, at all moments of our life." Patroness of Genoa.

Feast: Jan. 5.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1982): 1100-03. L'Osservatore Romano, English ed. 41 (1981): 1, 12.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

REPINGTON, PHILIP (REPYNGDON)

Former Wyclifite, bishop; d. Lincoln, 1424. A CANON REGULAR of St. AUGUSTINE and a doctor of theology (1382), he emerged from obscurity as a supporter of John WYCLIF's Eucharistic teaching. In 1382 Archbishop William COURTENAY became dissatisfied with the dilatoriness of the Oxford chancellor Robert RYGGE in dealing with Wyclif and ordered the Oxford Carmelite Peter Stokes to promulgate a condemnation of 24 theses drawn from Wyclif's writings. At this invasion of the university's freedom, Rygge defiantly invited Repington to give the university sermon on the Feast of Corpus Christi. In his sermon Repington stoutly maintained Wyclif's orthodoxy. Rygge was immediately hailed before the Blackfriars' synod and the king's council, and he abjectly submitted: he published the condemnation of Wyclif's theses and suspended Wyclif, Nicholas HEREFORD, and Repington until they should be purged of heresy.

Repington and Hereford both appealed to John of Gaunt, but without success. Before the synod they were evasive in their answers and were given a week to state their position unequivocally. On failing to appear, they were excommunicated; they then protested and appealed to Rome. Courtenay ignored the appeal and solemnly excommunicated them on July 13. Repington made his abjuration in November of 1382, and one cannot doubt the sincerity of his change of mind. He became a close friend of the orthodox King Henry IV. In 1404 he was made bishop of Lincoln. He was chancellor of Oxford in 1397, and from 1400 to 1403. In 1408 he was made cardinal. He resigned his see in 1419. His sermons are unedited.

Bibliography: C. L. KINGSFORD, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 16:912–914. K. B. MCFARLANE, John Wycliffe and the Beginnings of English Nonconformity (New York 1953). J. H. DAHMUS, The Prosecution of John Wyclif (New Haven, Conn. 1952). A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 3:1565–1567.

[J. E. HEALEY]

REPROBATION

Reprobation is the withdrawal by God of SUPERNATURAL gifts during life or of glory after death. The latter is meant here. So understood, reprobation includes God's knowledge of those who will be lost and His decree to damn them. This decree supposes final sin and its permission by God. Reprobation is God's supernatural providence over those who are lost. The reprobate are called "foreknown," not "predestined," for no one is destined to sin. The term reprobation is used only of adults in Catholic theology, they only being capable of personal sin.

Reprobation is conceived either positively, the intention to punish, or negatively, the intention to deny a person glory, as an undue gift, expressed in three ways: the intention to exclude one from glory, or not to elect one, or to omit one from it.

Positive reprobation of adults in the order of time consequent on their death in personal mortal sin is theologically certain, for it is a dogma of faith that sinners are punished in time [H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer (Freiburg 1963) 1002], and what God does in time He decrees in eternity. All who admit divine providence admit this positive reprobation. It follows also from the description of the Last Judgment, which is found in Mt 25.41–46.

But the theological problem concerns the eternal order of intention. Does God first, antecedently to the foreseen death of some, absolutely intend to punish them and consequently will that they die in sin (antecedent positive or negative reprobation)?

SUPRALAPSARIAN (antelapsarian) Calvinists held that God always intended to punish some. INFRALAPSARIAN (sublapsarian, postlapsarian) Calvinists and Jansenists held that God did so after He foresaw men merely contracting ORIGINAL SIN. Catholic theologians unanimously reject these doctrines as false, being in contradiction with God's will to save all, even fallen men, prior to some foreseen condition.

Catholic theologians raise a like question about negative reprobation in the order of intention. Does God absolutely intend to deny glory to some, as an undue gift, and consequently refuse them final efficacious GRACE, permitting their death in sin?

Most non-Molinists hold God absolutely intends to deny some men glory, as an undue gift, because this fits the divinely preestablished order of the universe and the degree in which He wills His glory manifested; they disagree whether this occurs before or after the contraction of original sin. Some, who otherwise follow Molina, hold the same absolute divine intent, but that it is for other reasons known to God alone, it being a necessary sequel to God's absolute choice of the elect. Strict Molinists reject any form of antecedent reprobation.

The effect of consequent reprobation can be only punishment after death; that of antecedent reprobation can be also privation of efficacious grace and permission of sin during life.

Catholic theologians all agree that God antecedently to some condition wills to save all men. They disagree whether in the order of intention this be simply death in sin or some prior consideration; hence their disagreement concerning antecedent negative reprobation.

See Also: MOLINISM; BÁÑEZ AND BAÑEZIANISM; PERSEVERANCE, FINAL; PREDESTINATION OF GOD; PROVIDENCE OF GOD.

Bibliography: H. LENNERZ, De Deo Uno (Rome 1955). R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, The One God, tr. B. ROSE, (St. Louis 1943).

[F. L. SHEERIN]

REPUTATION, MORAL RIGHT TO

Reputation is the esteem in which a person is held by his fellows for praiseworthy qualities that he is considered to possess. Praiseworthy qualities consist in moral, intellectual, physical, or merely external perfections. A person is said to have a right to his reputation in the same way that he has a right to his other possessions. Any violation of a person's right to his reputation constitutes a violation of the moral order. Because "a good name is more precious than great riches" (Prv 22.1), it is a more serious offense to deprive a person of his good name than to rob him of his other possessions. All theologians agree that a person has a moral right to his reputation. They all agree that violations of the person's rights are sins of injustice.

There is disagreement over the reasons for a person's right in justice to his good name, especially when the good name is not based on reality.

Kinds of Good Name. Theologians make certain distinctions concerning a person's good name. One disinction has reference to the way in which a person's fellows have come to esteem him. If the person is admitted to ordinary social relationships in business and other fields as an honest person, simply because nothing dishonest is known about him, he possesses a good reputation in a negative sense. If, on the other hand, the person is esteemed as honest because his honest actions have become publicly known, he possesses a good reputation in a positive sense.

Applying the notion of moral right to the way in which a person attains a good name, there is no difficulty in concluding that everyone has a right to his good reputation in the negative sense, or the right to be admitted to ordinary social relationships, until at least there is clear evidence that he is undeserving of this. On the other hand, we are not obliged to grant anyone a good reputation in the positive sense unless his actions have merited or produced this exceptional esteem.

A second and more important distinction pertains to the factual basis for a person's good reputation. If a man is considered honest and in reality is honest, he has a true good name. If, however, a man is considered honest and actually is dishonest, he has a false good name. A storekeeper, for instance, who is accepted in business relationships as honest but who has secretly doctored his scales has a false good name. In applying the notion of moral right to the factual basis for a good name, theologians agree that a person whose good name is based on factual qualities has an unconditional right to his good name. Thus, an honest judge has an unconditional right to his reputation for honesty. There are no circumstances that would justify a person's deliberately declaring the judge dishonest.

Right to a False Good Name. Disagreement arises concerning the reason why a person who has a false good name possesses a right in justice to his public reputation. The difficulty has long troubled theologians. Various solutions have been proposed, in both former and recent times.

Earlier Thought. Earlier theologians pointed out that the discord, strife, and countless other harmful effects resulting from unnecessary revelations of the crimes of others would be detrimental to the common good; the very existence of society would be threatened if such revelations were not forbidden. There is no doubt that these things are true, but the fact that society would suffer countless bad effects unless this act were forbidden does not establish the individual's right in strict justice to his good name. The most that the argument proves is that unnecessary revelations of blackening truths would be a violation of one's obligation to promote the common good. This obligation, however, pertains to the virtue of legal justice rather than to commutative justice. Hence, the argument does not show that the person's right in justice to his good name is violated. In like manner, the argument maintaining that "one who has a false good reputation is in peaceful possession of his good name and to deprive him of it without reason would be a violation of the virtue of justice" does not establish a reason for the action's being contrary to justice. Peaceful possession certainly does not give one the same rights as ownership.

Later Thought. The later arguments give a more adequate solution to the problem. One view maintains that certain rights are conferred by God and are based on the nature of man. According to this view, one has a right to those things necessary for him to live in accordance with his human nature. By nature, man is a social being, and to live as such, nothing is more necessary to him than at least ordinary acceptance in his social encounters. Ordinary acceptance by one's fellows is, in reality, nothing more than a good reputation, in the negative sense. Hence, everyone has a God-given, natural right to a good name in this negative sense of the term. This theory has the advantage of establishing a moral right in strict justice for a good name.

The more difficult problem is whether this natural right is lost by a grave sin or crime. According to this same view, the right to a good name is not lost by any grave sin or crime, but only by certain offenses. Since the right to a good name consists in being admitted to ordinary social relationships, one forfeits his right to this acceptance whenever the offense committed has been such that harm could come to society if he were freely admitted to certain relationships at this time. Thus, one who is secretly a swindler would constitute a danger to society if he were admitted to normal relationships in business. By reason of the nature of his conduct he has forfeited (at least for the time being) his right to be accepted as an honest man. However, in other instances in which a person's conduct has been sinful, but not of a nature that makes his ordinary acceptance a danger to society, he retains his basic right to his reputation. Thus, someone who knows some gossip about another may not reveal it, unless it can be said that continued ignorance of the facts could make the person a danger to society. In other words, the person retains his right to ordinary social relationship because his offense in no way conflicts with this relationship.

Another view differs somewhat from the above in that it attempts to establish a more proximate title to ownership of a false good name. According to this view, reputation, in one way or another, is a product of one's personal industry. Just as a man is esteemed for his honesty because his actions have become a matter of public knowledge, so also a person obtains a right to his good name if he has deliberately refrained from any public act that would adversely affect his good reputation. In this view the person retains his right to his good name not simply because the truth is unknown but because he has refrained from public actions that would have a detrimental affect on his reputation. The right of the person is conditional, being forfeited only when the continued ignorance of his sinful act could make his normal acceptance in social relationships harmful to society (see DETRACTION).

The advantage of these recent solutions is that there are reasons that establish a person's right in strict justice to his good name, even when the good name is not based on reality. At the same time, it is shown that the right is conditional and ceases to be operative when it would conflict with moral rights of an equal or greater moral urgency.

Bibliography: D. M. PRÜMMER, Manuale theologiae moralis, ed. E. M. MÜNCH (Freiburg-Barcelona 1955). B. H. MERKELBACH, Summa theologiae moralis (Paris 1949). THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa Theologiae 2a2ae, 73–74. H. DAVIS, Moral and Pastoral Theology, rev. and enl. ed. by L. W. GEDDES (New York 1958). K. B. MOORE, The Moral Principles Governing the Sin of Detraction (Washington 1950).

[K. B. MOORE]

REQUIEM MASS

Requiem Masses, or Masses for the dead, are celebrated as suffrages for the souls of the deceased. The name Requiem Mass is derived from the first words of the entrance antiphon: Requiem aeternam dona eis Domine.

Origin. From earliest times Christians have celebrated Masses for their dead. Several second-century sources mention this celebration of the Eucharist, for example, the Apology of Aristides [H. J. M. Milne, "A New Fragment of the Apology of Aristides," Journal of Theological Studies 25 (1923–24) 75] and the apocryphal Acts of John [M. J. James, The Apocryphal New Testament (3d ed. Oxford 1945) 245]. Tertullian repeatedly refers to the celebration of the eucharist on the anniversary of death (De Corona 3, Patrologia Latina 2:79; De Castitate 11, ibid. 2:926; De Monogamia 10, ibid. 2:942).

During the first centuries Masses were celebrated on certain days after the death and burial. Masses on the third day and on the anniversary were common and remained so in all rites. Masses on the 7th and 30th days were traditional in the Latin rite, while the Eastern churches observed the 9th and 40th days. In the fourth century, funeral Masses were celebrated in Rome, as was noted by St. Augustine (Conf. 9.12.32; Patrologia Latina 32:777), but the celebration of Masses on the days after the burial continued to be the general practice. Funeral Masses were never customary in the East, but they became general in the West during the early Middle Ages. In time, they came to be considered the principal part of the burial rite and were prescribed by liturgical law.

Liturgical research has not yet determined the precise date when a special formulary was first adopted for Masses for the dead. The use of the apocryphal 4 Esdras indicates that this took place not later than the sixth century. The Leonine Sacramentary already contained five sets of prayers for the dead; the Gelasian, 13 sets. During the early Middle Ages formularies increased rapidly. From among this wealth of texts the reform of Pius V selected a single formulary, that used by the Roman Curia, offering a limited variety of readings and prayers.

Older texts of the Requiem Mass can be understood correctly only if it is remembered that the early Christians saw in death primarily the final identification of the Christian with Christ in His death and Resurrection and the beginning of the life of glory. The "eternal rest," for example, of the Introit and Gradual (4 Esdras 1.34; this verse, like the entire first two chapters, is considered a Christian addition) intimates eternal happiness and the vision of God. The Preface for the dead, which had its origin in the fifth-century Mozarabic liturgy and was inserted into the Roman Missal in 1919, emphasizes the joyful aspects of the Resurrection. In keeping with the piety of the High Middle Ages, the twelfth-century Sequence DIES IRAE, however, stresses fear of judgment and condemnation. Its traditionally accepted authorship by the Franciscan THOMAS OF CELANO (d. c. 1250) was disproved by the discovery of an earlier, somewhat different twelfth-century version. The Offertory antiphon with its plea for deliverance from hell is best explained as a prayer that was originally recited before death.

Previous to the Missal of Pius V (1570), a great variety of texts for the Proper was in use; since that date only one set of texts for all Masses for the Dead is prescribed. The texts assigned by the Missal of Pius V were Introit, Requiem aeternam (Eternal Rest); Gradual, Requiem aeternam (Eternal rest); Tract, Absolve, Domine (Absolve, O Lord); Sequence, Dies irae (Day of Wrath); Offertory, Domine Jesu Christe (Lord Jesus Christ); Communion, Lux aeterna (May Light Eternal).

Origin of the Requiem. The Introit text is probably the most ancient component of the currently used requiem Propers. The fact that it is taken from the Apocryphal Fourth Book of Esdras, which was held as canonical until the late fifth century, indicates that it must have been inroduced into the liturgy no later than c. 490. Certain of the other texts currently used may have been introduced in the sixth and seventh centuries. The earliest preserved complete sets of Propers for Masses of the Dead, however, date only from the tenth century, when, through the monastic influence of the Abbey of Cluny, the cult of all the dead was established under the form of a solemn commemoration on November 2.

The rapid spread and growth of this cult resulted in the creation of a great number and variety of formularies. Well over 100 different texts, including some Alleluias, can be found assigned to Masses for the Dead in the medieval chant manuscripts of the tenth through the fourteenth centuries. Slightly more than half of these texts were written specifically for use in connection with the cult of the dead. The others were simply borrowings from Mass formularies assigned to Sundays or to weekdays in Lent.

Thus the Gradual Si ambulem, for example, which was widely used, was borrowed from the Saturday of the third week of Lent. These borrowed texts retained their original chant melodies; for new texts either entirely new music was composed (the most frequent procedure) or a preexistent melody was adapted. For example, the Introit Si enim credimus utilized the melody of the Introit Sicut oculi for the Monday of the first week of Lent; and the Gradual Qui Lazarum, that of the Gradual Beata gens, from the seventeenth Sunday after Pentecost. The vast majority of these texts gradually fell into disuse during the fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries, and hardly more than a dozen were in general use during those years of the Renaissance that preceded the Missal of Pius V.

Polyphonic Versions. The earliest polyphonic settings of the Requiem Mass date only from the last third of the fifteenth century. The first of these seems to have been composed by Guillaume DUFAY; it has not been preserved, however, and the only knowledge of it comes from a reference to it in the composer's will. The earliest preserved setting, that of Okeghem (c. 1485–90), consists of all of the sung items then used in France, both Proper and Ordinary, from the Introit through the Offertory; it is not known whether the remaining three items were lost or simply never written. Some anonymous and isolated items, apparently from about the same time, are found in certain Italian sources.

Of some 40 settings of the Requiem Mass surviving from the sixteenth century, the most notable are those by Brumel, La Rue, Fevin, G. Fogliano(?), Prioris, Richafort, Sermisy, Clemens, Morales, Certon, Bonifont, Clereau, Guerrero, Kerle, Vaet, Monte, Du Caurroy, Lassus, Mauduit, Asola, Palestrina, and Victoria, in addition to certain anonymous settings. Several of these composers produced two or more Requiem Masses, and in several cases their Requiem Masses were among their most inspired works. Most of these share certain characteristics, such as the tendency to create music for both the Ordinary and the Proper and to incorporate the original chant melodies into the polyphonic texture.

Three essential traditions evolved in the selection of texts: the Italian, Spanish, and French. In general, all three adopted the same Introit (Requiem aeternam), Offertory (Domine Jesu Christe), and Communion (Lux aeterna) texts. There were, however, consistent variants in certain phrases of the Offertory text. The chief distinguishing features of the traditions are to be found in the Lesson chants. The Italian tradition usually chose the Gradual Si ambulem, the Tract Absolve, Domine, or Sicut cervus, and almost always included the Sequence Dies irae. The Spanish tradition favored the Gradual Requiem aeternam and the Tract Sicut cervus, and omitted the Sequence. In France, also, the Sequence was omitted, the Gradual selected was Si ambulem, and the Tract was Sicut cervus. It did not become customary to add a polyphonic composition for the Responsory Libera me, Domine until after the Missal of Pius V.

Baroque Requiems were composed in the new stile concertato and the stile antico. The first setting to utilize all of the features of the new style was that of Monteverdi, Grillo, and Usper, performed on May 25, 1621, in memory of Cosimo II, Grand Duke of Tuscany; it exerted great influence on later works, such as those by Biber, Kerll, and C. Strauss, all of which call for a large chorus and orchestra. As a general rule, neither the Requiems in the stile concertato nor those in the stile antico (e.g., the outstanding work by A. Scarlatti) made use of material derived from the traditional chant melodies; the few exceptions are limited to the Sequence Dies irae. Important French baroque composers of Requiem Masses or portions thereof are Lully, Charpentier, Campra, and Gilles. In the late baroque and early classic Austrian tradition, the most significant version is that by Mozart.

Another period opened with the Requiem setting by Gossec (1760). Highly romantic in concept, it led the way for nineteenth-century composers who intended their Requiems more for the concert hall than for the church. To this group belong Cherubini (1836), Berlioz (1837), Verdi (1874), Fauré (1887), and Dvořák (1890). Nineteenth-century composers who wrote primarily for liturgical purposes include Bruckner (1845), Liszt (1868), and Saint-Saëns (1878). One of the most significant twentieth-century settings intended for liturgical use is that of Duruflé (1947). There are also several important nonliturgical works of the nineteenth century that derive their inspiration from the Requiem in some sense and are analogous to it in purpose. These include Brahms' Deutsches Requiem (1867), Ravel's Tombeau de Couperin (1914–17), Berg's Violin Concerto (1935), Honegger's Symphonie liturgique (1946), and Britten's Sinfonia da Requiem (1940) and War Requiem (1963).

Bibliography: A. C. RUSH, Death and Burial in Christian Antiquity (Washington 1941). T. MAERTENS and L. HEUSCHEN, Doctrine et pastorale de la liturgie de la mort (Bruges 1957). "Les Funérailles chrétiennes," Maison-Dieu 44 (1955).

[A. CORNIDES/R. SNOW/EDS.]

RERUM DEUS TENAX VIGOR

The office hymn that was historically sung at the hour of None in the Divine Office. It shows in form and language that it was by the same author who composed RECTOR POTENS, VERAX DEUS (Sext) and Nunc Sancte nobis Spiritus (Terce). All three are possibly the work of St. AMBROSE. This hymn, like Rector potens, is so correct in form that it suffered the change of only one word for the 1632 revision of the Roman BREVIARY. C. Blume questions the attribution of these hymns to St. Ambrose and classifies them under what he calls Hymnodia Hiberno-Celtica. Accentual rhythm, alliteration, and rhyme are characteristics that suggest a Celtic origin. Simonetti denies that the three hymns are Ambrosian, but Szövérfy disagrees. As in Rector potens, the first verse of the Rerum Deus is an invocation; the second, a petition. None (3 o'clock), the traditional hour of the Lord's death, may have suggested the reference to death. God is invoked as unchanging yet guiding the day in its course; He is begged to grant light in the evening of life so that eternal glory may be the reward of a holy death. Mearns studied the manuscript tradition; Julian gives some account of the MSS and lists 18 translations.

Bibliography: H. T. HENRY, "Hymns of the Little Hours," American Ecclesiastical Review 3 (Sept. 1890) 204–209. Analecta hymnica 50:19–20; 51.xx–xxii. V. ERMONI, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 1.1:1347–52. J. JULIAN, ed., A Dictionary of Hymnology (New York 1957) 956. J. MEARNES, Early Latin Hymnaries (Cambridge, Eng. 1913) 74. A. S. WALPOLE, ed., Early Latin Hymns (Cambridge, Eng. 1922) 111–112. M. SIMONETTI, "Studi sull'innologia popolare cristiana dei primi secoli," Atti dell'Accademia nazionale dei Lincei: Memorie Classe di scienze morali, storiche e filologiche, ser. 8, 6 (1952) fasc. 6. F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (Oxford 1953) 131–140. J. SZÖVÉRFY, Die Annalen der lateinischen Hymnendichtung (Berlin 1964–65) 1:51.

[A. J. KINNIREY]

RERUM NOVARUM

Encyclical letter of LEO XIII issued May 15, 1891; the first of the great social encyclicals. Its appearance marked the bestowal of significant papal approval on the then emergent Catholic social movement. Its formulation of Catholic social principles owed much to the work of the Fribourg Union, established in 1885 by Cardinal G. MERMILOD. But there is considerable evidence that Leo's approach was also affected by the practical attitudes toward labor and agrarian problems of Cardinals James GIBBONS in the U.S. and Henry Edward Manning in England, and Abp. William Joseph WALSH of Dublin. First drafted by Cardinal Francesco Zigliara, the encyclical was revised according to the pope's instructions by his secretaries, further corrected by Zigliara, and finally by Leo himself. The English translation was prepared by Manning and circulated in America, Ireland, and all other English-speaking countries. Despite the descriptive title "On the Condition of Workers," Rerum novarum is in fact a social charter of the broadest scope.

The encyclical may be divided into five parts. The first is an examination of the solution to the social question advanced by socialism, which was currently attracting much support in the working class. In rejecting it Leo developed a classical set of arguments establishing the natural right to private property. Four in number, they were derived in turn from man's power of self-direction in virtue of his intelligence and foresight, his personal independence, his mastery of his energies, and finally his right to found a family and his duty to care for it. The second part outlines the role of the Church in social affairs, without which, the pope said, no practical solution could be found. It is the task of the Church to keep ever before men's minds the truths that certain inequalities are inevitable, that to suffer and endure is the lot of man, and that man's final end is not here but hereafter. The third part is devoted to a positive exposition of the social action of the Church, which is concerned not alone with the soul of man but indirectly also with the body. Poverty is not a good in itself and every effort should be made to alleviate it through the practice of charity and the promotion of justice. The role of the state in the matter is outlined in the fourth part, in which the Pope rejected laissez faire. The state has functions in relation to the protection of private property; the forestalling of strikes, insofar as possible; the regulation of conditions of work; the seeing to it that employees receive a just wage; and the encouragement by the law of a wide distribution of property. A final part emphasized the beneficial activity of voluntary organizations, such as trade unions and Church bodies of various kinds devoted to social action.

Bibliography: Official Latin text in Acta Leonis XIII, 4 (1894) 177–209. English translation in D.J. O'BRIEN and T.A. SHAN-NON, eds., Catholic Social Thought: The Documentary Heritage (Maryknoll, NY 1992) 14-39. L. WATT, A Handbook to Rerum Novarum (Oxford 1941). J. MÍGUEZ BONINO, "Rerum novarum: One Hundred Years," Ecumenical Review 43 (1991) 392-442. D.J. O'BRIEN, "A Century of Catholic Social Teaching: Contexts and Comments," in J.A. COLEMAN, ed., One Hundred Years of Catholic Social Thought (Maryknoll, NY 1991) 13-24. J.A. COLEMAN and G. BAUM, eds., Rerum novarum: A Hundred Years of Catholic Social Teaching (Philadelphia 1991). E.L. FORTIN, "'Sacred and Inviolable': Rerum novarum and Natural Rights," Theological Studies 53 (1992) 203-33. F.P. MCHUGH, et al., eds., Things Old and New: Catholic Social Teaching Revisited (Lanham, MD 1993). P. FURLONG and D. CURTIS, The Church Faces the Modern World: Rerum novarum and Its Impact (Hull, Eng. 1994). T.O. NITSCH, et al., eds., On the Condition of Labor and the Social Question One Hundred Years Later (Lewiston, NY 1994).

[J. NEWMAN]

RESCH, PETER ANTHONY

Author; b. Chicago, IL, Feb. 27, 1895; d. Kirkwood, MO, April 29, 1956. He received his B.A. (1919) from the University of Dayton, Ohio, and was ordained and received the S.T.D. at Fribourg, Switzerland (1926). He was superior of MARIANIST seminarians (1943-46) and provincial of the St. Louis province (1946-56). His publications include Marianist Meditations (2 v. Kirkwood 1936), Our Blessed Mother (Milwaukee 1947), Shadows Cast Before (Kirkwood 1948), The Prayer Life of a Religious (New York 1948), A Life of Mary, Co-Redemptrix (Milwaukee 1954), One Hundred Years of Educational Foundations by the Brothers of Mary in America (Kirkwood 1949), and La doctrine ascétique des premiers maîtres égyptiens de quatrième siècle (Paris 1931). He translated Henri Lebon's The Marianist Way (2 v. Kirkwood 1951) and Emil Newbert's Our Mother (St. Meinrad 1953), contributed articles to Catholic periodicals, and wrote numerous religious pamphlets.

[G. J. RUPPEL]

RESCRIPTS

Rescripts are written replies from competent ecclesiastical authorities in answer to requests for privileges, dispensations, favors, or information. The use of rescripts dates back to the early Church, but the legal institute took form in the 12th century and derives from Roman law.

Although requests may be oral, they are expected to be in writing, and the answer will also be written. Rescripts from the Roman Curia are issued in the form of apostolic bulls, briefs, or simple rescripts. Generally, they contain a summary of the petition, an outline of the reasons why they are being issued, and a third section in which the actual response concerning some point of law is given or the favor requested is granted or denied. To this last section may be appended any conditions that are to be observed. The present law deals mainly with the right to request, validity, interpretation, execution, and revocation of rescripts.

All who are not explicitly forbidden by law may freely petition rescripts (Codex iuris canonici c. 60). Rescripts may be sought and obtained for another, even without the latter's knowledge and consent (Codex iuris canonici c. 61; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 1528). Unless otherwise stated, the validity of such a rescript does not depend upon its acceptance; but the recipient is under no obligation to make use of the favor received.

Validity. Whenever conditions are added to rescripts, the nature of the subject matter, the requirements of law, or the very force of the words used may make it clear that such conditions are essential for validity. Otherwise, only those conditions are essential for validity that are introduced by such expressions as "if," "provided that" (si, dummodo), or words of similar meaning. Truth in the recitals (preces) of the petition is an implied condition for the lawfulness of every rescript. Misrepresentation of the truth by suppression (subreptio) or positive falsification (obreptio) of the facts and circumstances may not render a rescript invalid or ineffective (Codex iuris canonici c. 63; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 1529). Accidental errors in the name of the recipient, his or her place of residence, or subject matter invalidate a rescript only when, in the judgment of the ordinary, there is serious doubt regarding the identity of the person or the matter in question (Codex iuris canonici c. 66).

Before a favor refused by one congregation or office of the Roman Curia can be granted validly in a rescript by another congregation or office, or by the another competent authority, the consent of the congregation or office with which the matter was first taken up must be obtained, without prejudice to the rights of the Sacred Penitentiary in matters involving the internal forum (Codex iuris canonici c. 64). A favor denied by the vicar general cannot be obtained validly from the bishop without mention of the refusal, and should the bishop refuse a favor, his consent is necessary before a valid rescript granting the said favor can be obtained from the vicar general (Codex iuris canonici c. 65 §3; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 1530). One is not to seek from another ordinary a favor denied by one's own ordinary without mention of refusal, and, before granting the favor, the second ordinary should ask of the first the reasons for the refusal (Codex iuris canonici c. 65 §1).

Interpretation. When the meaning of the words of a rescript is clear, no interpretation is really necessary. An initial attempt must be made to understand every rescript according to the proper meaning of its terms. Common usage, or the use a term receives in law, generally determines the proper, ordinary meaning of the words. Rescripts are not to be extended to include persons, cases, or things not expressed in the proper meaning of the words. Before the meaning of a rescript is considered objectively doubtful, it should be read carefully and every reasonable effort made to comprehend the meaning intended.

In real doubt, rescripts that pertain to legal suits and the administration of justice, those that restrict a person's rights, those adverse to the acquired rights of others, and those contrary to the law in such a way as to favor private persons are to be strictly interpreted. All other doubtful rescripts are to be given a broad interpretation, and the words are to be understood in the widest sense of their proper meaning (Codex iuris canonici c. 36; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 1512 pp. 1–2).

Execution. Rescripts are issued directly to the recipient (in forma gratiosa) or through the medium of an executor (in forma commissaria). When no executor is used, rescripts take effect the moment they are issued. Rescripts requiring execution become effective from the time of the execution.

The executor must inspect the rescript and satisfy himself regarding its authenticity and integrity. He must proceed according to his instructions, fulfill all conditions, and follow the proper form of procedure. At times the decision whether a rescript should be executed is left to the prudent and conscientious discretion of the executor. When the executor is without such discretionary power, he must proceed to the execution of the rescript, unless it is clear that the rescript is invalid for some reason (e.g., subreptio or obreptio), that the conditions appended have not been fulfilled, or that the rescript cannot be upheld because of another grave reason. In any of these cases the executor shall immediately suspend execution and inform the grantor (Codex iuris canonici c. 41; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 1522). The executor is free, according to his prudent judgment, to substitute another for himself, unless substitution is forbidden, some person has been designated substitute, or the executor has been chosen for his personal qualifications (Codex iuris canonici c. 43; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 1524). The successor in the executor's dignity or office may execute all rescripts except those for which the executor was chosen by reason of his special skills (Codex iuris canonici c. 44; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 1525). A mistake made in the execution of a rescript may be remedied by executing the rescript anew (Codex iuris canonici c. 45; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 1526).

Cessation. Rescripts may be permanent or they may cease by the lapse of the specified time for which they were given, by the fulfillment of a resolutive condition, by renunciation by the recipient, or by revocation through a special act of the grantor. A revoked rescript remains in force until the recipient has been informed of the revocation. A law contrary to a rescript normally does not revoke it (Codex iuris canonici c. 73; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 1513 §1). The vacancy of the Holy See or a diocese does not cancel or nullify a rescript, unless the contrary is made clear (Codex iuris canonici c. 46; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 1513 §2). If a rescript contains a privilege or dispensation instead of a simple favor, the canons on dispensations and privileges must also be observed (Codex iuris canonici c. 75).

Bibliography: R. NAZ, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–64) 7:607–635. T. L. BOUSCAREN and A. C. ELLIS, Canon Law (3d rev. ed. Milwaukee, WI 1957) 56–63. A. G. CICOGNANI, Canon Law (2d rev. ed. Westminster, MD 1947). G. MICHIELS, Normae generales iuris canonici. Commentarius libri I. Codex iuris canonici, 2 v. (2d ed. Paris-Turnai-Rome 1955) 2:279–479. D. E. ADAMS, The Truth Required in the 'Preces' for Rescripts (Catholic University of America, CLS 392; Washington 1960). B. C. GERHARDT, Interpretation of Rescripts (Catholic University of America, CLS 398; Washington 1959). W. H. O'NEILL, Papal Rescripts of Favor (Catholic University of America, CLS 57; Washington 1930). A. VAN HOVE, Commentarium Lovaniense in Codicem iuris canonici I, v.1–5 (Mechlin 1928–); v.1, Prolegomena (2d ed. 1945) 1.4.

[B. C. GERHARDT]

RESPECT

Esteem, reverence, or honorable regard. In the New Testament this attitude is frequently recommended as desirable among Christians in general, and special emphasis is assigned to it with reference to those in authority. James is vigorously opposed to the undue deference given to the rich man by the rest of the Christian community, perhaps because he noted in his time that the primitive democracy of the spirit taught in the Acts of the Apostles and alluded to in St. Paul was disappearing.

Moral theologians speak of respect with reference to persons of outstanding goodness and dignity, and as a part of the virtue of piety which involves reverence to family and country. Thus it is associated more with justice and the external respect seasonably accruing to persons, than to charity, which involves an attitude of love based on divine goodness and kinship with God.

Respect is concerned positively with the exhibition of appropriate signs of respect and negatively with the avoidance of discourtesy, offensive words, and actions which would have the effect of dishonoring another. Normally, offenses of this type would be considered of slight moral importance. However, on the grounds that honor and dishonor are to be estimated in terms of the dignity of the one so treated, it is possible that disrespect could be serious. The more common type of disrespect in modern society appears in the inhuman attitude of employers to employees and of racial groups for one another.

See Also: PIETY, FAMILIAL.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 102. F. ROBERTI et al., comps., Dictionary of Moral Theology, ed. P. PALAZZINI et al., tr. H. J. YANNONE et al. from 2d Ital. ed. (Westminster, Md. 1962).

[W. HERBST]

RESPIGHI, OTTORINO

20th-century composer famed for his orchestral colorism; b. Bologna, July 9, 1879; d. Rome, April 18, 1936. Following musical studies at the Liceo Musicale of Bologna (1891–99), he was active until 1908 as violinist, but continued to study composition, first under Rimsky-Korsakov in St. Petersburg (now Leningrad), then under Max Bruch in Berlin. From 1913 on he taught composition at the conservatory of Santa Cecilia in Rome, for two years as its director. In 1932 he was elected to the Italian Royal Academy. Eclectic in his approach, he was associated for a time with the movement around Casella and Malipiero to revive Italian neoclassic instrumental music, and he produced a number of transcriptions of 17th- and 18th-century works. In his most successful style, notably in the symphonic poems The Fountains of Rome (1917) and The Pines of Rome (1924), he used a more conservative harmonic language and the sumptuous orchestration identified with Richard Strauss. At the same time his interest in Gregorian chant (encouraged by his wife and former pupil, the composer Elsa Olivieri Sangiacomo), emerges in the modal melodies of many works from c. 1920. The opera Lucrezia (1935) and Concerto a cinque (1934) tend toward linear structure and reduced performing media, thus approaching the progressive features of style prevailing among his contemporaries. Among his operas, Maria Egiziaca (1931), first produced at Carnegie Hall, New York City, is probably the best known.

Bibliography: E. RESPIGHI, Ottorino Respighi, tr. G. MORRIS (London 1962). R. DE RENSIS, Ottorino Respighi (Turin 1933). P. ALVERÀ, Portraits of Greatness: Respighi (New York 1986). L. BRAGAGLIA and E. RESPIGHI, Il Teatro di Respighi: Opere, Balli e Balletti (Rome 1978). A. CANTÙ, Respighi Compositore (Torino 1985). D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge 1996). N. SLONIMSKY, ed. Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (8th ed. New York 1992). J. C. G. WATERHOUSE The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980).

Ottorino Respighi.

[H. BRAUNLICH]

RESPONSA, JEWISH

The responsa literature consists of published answers to written questions directed to rabbinic authorities over a span of 17 centuries. The term responsa is the Latin word for ‘answers’; in Hebrew this literature is called š’e’ zĕlôt uš’šûbôt, ‘questions and answers.’ It is the practical supplement to the two other types of rabbinical literature—the explanatory commentaries and novellae on the TALMUD (such as those of RASHI and other commentators) and the codes that summarized the law in the maze of debate and coordinated the related laws found in separate places. In the early days, before the compilation of the Talmud, the oral law was a mass of tradition passed down by word of mouth through the generations. When a particular case required expert advice on a specific interpretation of the law, a written request for a ruling was directed to the distant central authority. At first the place of authority was Palestine. Later, after completion of the Talmud, the center of learning and authority shifted to Babylonia, where the Geonim (see GAON) headed the academies of Sura and Pumpedita (from the 6th to the 11th century). The Gaonic responsa were brief, concise, and authoritative. In the middle of the 11th century the Gaonic period came to an end, and the era of the Rishonim (early rabbinic authorities) began. As the academies and books spread Talmudic knowledge and understanding over a broader area, responsa correspondence evolved to an intrascholarly legalistic level, resulting in full rabbinic essays and monographs.

The general structure included: (1) statement of the case; (2) indication of the relevant law, as recorded in one of the codes; (3) discussion of such contradictory opinions on a subject in the codes that compel reexamination of the basic Talmudical discussion from which the law is derived; (4) an analysis of passages in the Talmud containing principles possibly relevant to a case at hand. The principle is tested by being subjected to seemingly contradictory opinions in the Talmud. Having withstood the test, the principle is then applied to the case. This pattern, with variations according to time and place, was regularly followed.

The spotlight of importance highlighted the respondents of first one country and then another as the centers of learning shifted with the progress of history. Spain and its logical, scientific school produced men such as Solomon ben Adret (1235–1310), the author of 7,000 responsa. In France the grandson of Rashi, Rabbenu Tam (1100–71), achieved great fame. In Germany Rabbi Meir of Rothenburg (1220–93) answered questions of concern to entire communities. In 15th-century Turkey, the haven for emigrants from Spain after the expulsion, Joseph CARO was prominent. Remnants of many responsa from this era and the previous Gaonic era were discovered in the Cairo GENIZA. At the end of the 15th century the era of the later rabbinic authorities (Aharonim) began. The religious community in Poland was being developed; Talmudic schools were set up. Solomon Luria (1510–73) was famous in this period, as was Moses Isserles (1525–72). The responsa of this era were lengthier, for they quoted extensively from the responsa of the Rishonim.

In the 19th and 20th centuries, as emigration to America began and the emigrants found themselves facing a different life, they wrote to their familiar rabbis in eastern Europe for advice on how to proceed. Isaac Elhanan Spektor (1817–96), Rabbi of Kovno, became world-renowned for his responsa. New inventions and circumstances in the modern era raised new questions. Railroads brought up questions regarding travel on the Sabbath. Tobacco posed a problem as to whether smoking is permitted on the holidays. Electric dishwashers, radios, telephones, doorbells, microphones all raised questions concerning usage on the Sabbath. Prayers in the vernacular were questioned, mixed seating, etc. There have been rulings in every field: philosophy of religion, astronomy, mathematics, chronology, and geography, as well as interpretations of difficult passages in the Bible, MISHNAH, and Talmud. Side remarks inserted regarding historical circumstances through the ages have become valuable as source material for Jewish and general history, customs, moral climate, etc. Case law has come to carry as much weight as code law. The Jewish legal system is still flexible and adaptable due to the responsa of the past and present.

Bibliography: S. B. FREEHOF, The Responsa Literature (Philadelphia 1955). J. Z. LAUTERBACH, Jewish Encyclopedia 11:240–250. M. ELON, Mavo Lemishpat Halvri (Jerusalem 1963) 317–338. B. COHEN, Kuntres Hateshubot (Budapest 1930).

[E. SUBAR]

RESPONSIBILITY (IN THE BIBLE)

In the ancient Semitic world, collective responsibility was often practiced in its cruder forms; and, as part of a common heritage, it became a significant basis for society and law in the world of the Old Testament. With the insight gained from revelation and experience, the concept of collective responsibility was refined; and this was effected especially by due recognition of individual responsibility. In the New Testament it is explicitly revealed that the principle of the solidarity of the human race, an instance of collective responsibility, stands at the center of the economy of salvation.

This article will treat in order: the common Semitic attitude of collective responsibility; instances of collective responsibility in the Old Testament, the growth of the concept of individual responsibility in the Old Testament, and, finally, the solidarity of the human race in salvation history.

Common Semitic Attitude. In the ancient Near East, a man was looked upon more as a member of his social group than as an individual person. This was due especially to the fact that in nomadic communities the tribe's fight for subsistence bound its members so closely together that each member was filled with the same community spirit. The ideas, engendered by such community spirit, when applied to criminal law, held a man responsible for the deeds of another of his group, particularly of his family. Perhaps the best example of this was the law of blood vengeance. In the Code of Hammurabi there are noteworthy examples: "If a man struck another man's daughter and caused her to have a miscarriage . . . if she died, they shall put his daughter to death” (209–210); “If a builder built a house for a man but did not make his work strong and as a result the house collapsed . . . if this cause the death of the son of the owner of the house, they shall put to death the son of the builder” (229–230); “If a man held another man’s son as pledge for a debt and the son dies from beating or abuse, they shall put to death the son of the distrainer” (115–116).

Primitive notions about collective responsibility were slow in changing. Even in postexilic times the popular idea that the presence of a great sinner on a ship endangered all the travelers was commonly accepted (Jon 1.7); and among the Medes and Persians it was customary for the children to be punished for the sins of their parents (Dn 6.25; Est 9.10, 14). That such primitive notions were still current in Christ’s time is seen in the narrative about the man born blind (Jn 9.2).

Collective Responsibility in Old Testament. In the Old Testament there are many examples of God punishing or rewarding a group for the acts of one individual. The sin of Adam is most noteworthy. Although the Old Testament does not explicitly teach the doctrine of ORIGINAL SIN, it does teach a certain solidarity with Adam; all men share in punishment for Adam’s sin. Implicit in the punishment of Cain is the punishment of his offspring (Gn 4.13–14). The curse brought forth by the shameless behavior of Ham falls on his son Canaan (Gn 9.18–27). Because of the unwilling fault of Pharaoh, his whole house is struck (Gn 12.15–20). Their wives and children share in the punishment of Dathan and Abiram (Nm 16.27). The family of Achan, although they did not share in his sinful violation of the ban, shared his punishment (Jos 22.20). In the Book of Judges it is in accordance with the idea of collective responsibility that the stereotyped formula of sin, punishment, repentance, and liberation sums up current history. In Exodus 20.5 the punishment of children for their parents’ violation of the First Commandment is threatened: “I the Lord, your God, am a jealous God, inflicting punishment for their fathers’ wickedness on the children of those who hate me down to the third and fourth generation; but bestowing mercy on the children of those who love me and keep my commandments” (Ex 20.5–6; 34.7; Nm 14.18; Dt 5.9)

As stated in the passage just quoted from Ex 20.6, God blesses the descendants of a virtuous individual for many generations. There are many instances of this: Noah’s family shares his salvation in the ark (Gn 7.1); Lot’s family accompanies him out of Sodom (Gn 19.12); and, the descendants of Caleb share in his blessings in the land (Dt 1.36). If ten just men could have been found in Sodom and Gomorrah, God would have spared the city (Gn 18.22–32).

The covenant relationship to God, whereby the Israelites stood as one body before God, i.e., as a church (qāhāl), made the people all the more conscious of collective responsibility. Until the time of the Exile, the Israelite considered his reward or punishment from God not so much a response from God to his individual actions, but as common participation in the response given by God to the whole people.

Individual Responsibility. Yet, the correct understanding of collective responsibility does not exclude a strong feeling of individual responsibility; indeed, some of the oldest stories in the Old Testament show clearly that God punished or rewarded the individual as an individual for his deeds. There are many punitive laws in the Pentateuch based on the principle of individual responsibility. In Dt 24.16 (dealing with human, not with divine justice as in Ex 20.5), there is a protest against the punishment of the children for their parents’ sins: “Every one shall die for his own sin.”

But it was the preaching of the Prophets that emphasized individual responsibility, thus correcting the cruder notions of collective responsibility common to their world. During the Exile, the inherited view whereby children suffer full punishment for the sins of their parents began to be questioned. The older theology had been synthesized into a proverb: “Fathers have eaten green grapes, thus their children’s teeth are on edge” (Ez 18.2). Ezekiel, in response, answers that any sinner can be saved, if he does penance, and that if “Noah, Daniel, and Job were in it [the land], as I live, says the Lord God, I swear that they could save neither son nor daughter; they would save only themselves by their virtue” (14.20). Thus Ezekiel becomes the champion and, so to say, the theorist of individual responsibility. A similar reaction against the more primitive notions of collective responsibility is found in Jer 31.30 (although perhaps not written by him, but a later addition based on Ez 18.2): “Through his own fault only shall anyone die: the teeth of him who eats the unripe grapes shall be set on edge” (Prv 24.12; Sir 16.14).

Solidarity in Economy of Salvation. Considering the Exile experience in the light of collective responsibility, it is not surprising that the concept of vicarious suffering of the future Messiah, based on the principle of solidarity, should be explicitly expounded in the SUFFERING SERVANT SONGS (Is 52.13–53.12). For Pauline theology in the New Testament, although the role of Christ as the Servant of the Lord was recognized (Phil 2.7), the central Old Testament text used for explaining the reality of human solidarity in Christ’s redemption was the fall of Adam (see Rom 5.12–19; 1 Cor 15.22). For the Christian religion, the whole of theology ultimately is summed up in the intervention of two persons: the one (Adam) in whom all men fell, and the other (Jesus Christ) in whom alone man can be saved. The New Testament, insisting on a solidarity with the risen Christ through personal faith, satisfies both the demand of individual retribution and the law of human solidarity in sin and salvation (see Rom 5.19; 1 Cor 15.21–22; Eph 4.25; 1 Cor 12.26; etc.).

See Also: RETRIBUTION.

Bibliography: L. V. A. BOURGEOIS, . . . Solidarité (3d ed. Paris 1902). J. LAROCHE, La Rétribution sous l'ancienne alliance (Cahors 1904). H. BÜCKERS, "Kollektiv und individualvergeltung im Alten Testament," Theologie und Glaube 25 (1933) 273–286. H. W. ROBINSON, "The Hebrew Conception of Corporate Personality," Beiträge zur Wissenschaft vom Alten (und Neuen) Testament 66 (1936) 49–62. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 2032–36.

[M. RODRÍGUEZ]

RESPONSORIAL PSALM

The name applied in the General Instruction on the Roman Missal (GIRM) to the psalm after the first (Old Testament) reading in the 1969 revision of the Roman Rite of the Mass. Originally, the psalm was performed by cantor and assembly in alternation, in the following fashion: a cantor sang verses of the psalm, and the assembly responded to them with a fixed refrain. As the music became more elaborate, the refrain consisted only of the final part of the responsory and was called the repetenda. The musical and textual form was as follows: R, V¹, R, V², R, etc. Its liturgical function was that of a meditative assent to the preceding scriptural reading. Thus, the GRADUAL and ALLELUIA were originally responsorial chants. By the middle ages, the ancient responsorial psalm evolved into a highly stylized musical piece that was sung by the choir or cantor without any congregational response.

The 1969 revision of the Roman Rite of the Mass restored the ancient practice of singing the responsorial psalm as "integral part of the liturgy of the word." (GIRM 19). GIRM 20 insists that "as a rule the responsorial psalm should be sung." It goes on to explain that there are "two established ways of singing the psalm after the first reading: responsorially and directly. In responsorial singing, which, as far as possible, is to be given preference, the psalmist, or cantor of the psalm, sings the psalm verse and the whole congregation joins in by singing the response. In direct singing of the psalm there is no intervening response by the community; either the psalmist, or cantor of the psalm, sings the psalm alone as the community listens or else all sing it together" (GIRM 20). To reinforce the understanding that the responsorial psalm is "an integral part of the liturgy of the word," the General Instruction prescribes that the responsorial psalm "is sung or recited by the psalmist or cantor at the ambo" (GIRM 22).

[R. G. WEAKLAND/EDS.]

REST

(GR. μονή, ἡρεμία; Lat. quies, mansio, status), the opposite of motion. It is the privation of motion in that which is receptive of motion but is not actually being moved. Rest in an initial state (terminus a quo) is contrary to the motion that proceeds from it, but there is no strict contrariety between motion and rest in a terminating state (terminus ad quem), since rest is the end and perfection of motion, the state of actuality to which motion tends. Likewise, motion is the cause of rest, and something is not the cause of its contrary. Motion and rest are in the same subject, although not both together.

There is a rest corresponding to each type of motion, so that a being may be in motion in one respect and simultaneously at rest in the possession of some state acquired by a different kind of motion. SUBSTANTIAL change is not only absence of change.

Rest is measured by TIME, not by the indivisible now. Strictly speaking, only motion is measured by time, since time is the number of motion according to before and after. A body in the state of rest is a mobile being, and its repose has come about as the result of a motion and will cease when a contrary motion occurs. The duration of the repose between two such motions is measured by means of the duration of the motion of some other body.

Like motion, rest can be either natural and according to nature or unnatural and forced. Rest can be understood in an extended sense. When an agent ceases acting, it is said to come to rest. The mind rests in contemplation of truth and the appetites in the possession of good. The state of equilibrium is not so much rest as the balancing off of opposite forces. Homeostasis is a state of dynamic equilibrium that tends to maintain itself in living beings.

See Also: MOTION; REALITY.

Bibliography: ARISTOTLE, Phys., bk. 5, ch. 6. THOMAS AQUINAS, In 5 phys. 9–10.

[M. A. GLUTZ]

RESTITUTION

From the Latin restituere, meaning to restore something, to set it up where it had been. In moral theology restitution is an act of commutative justice whereby property is restored to one who has been deprived of it by unjust damage or theft. Not every giving back of something can be called restitution. The restoration of a thing to a person who once owned it but who for some reason lost ownership of it for a time is not restitution. It could be an act of charity, kindness, or liberality, but it would not, in the strict sense, be restitution, not being an act of commutative justice nor presupposing a violated right.

Restitution, then, is the repairing of an injury, the righting of a wrong. The wrong in question could be either theft of something belonging to a person or the damaging of his property. There are, therefore, two grounds of restitution: (1) the possession of something belonging to another and (2) damage done to the property of another. That stolen property no longer exists because it has been exhausted in use by the thief is not a circumstance that excuses from restitution; for in using, spending, or giving away what he has stolen, the thief has spared his own property and thus continues to be “richer” and in virtual possession of his unjust gain.

The obligation to make restitution is founded on natural law. Given ownership as a true right, if a person is deprived by theft or unjust damage of what is his, what he has lost must be restored to him to balance the scales of justice. To deny that this is morally necessary is to deny the inviolability that is a property of true rights. A thing is said to cry out for its owner—res clamat domino. The injustice continues until it is repaired. Not just the original theft of a thing is wrong, but the retention of it by the thief is equally unjust and is, in effect, a prolongation of the act of injustice.

This obligation of natural law is enforced by the Seventh Commandment of the Decalogue: “You shall not steal” (Ex 20.15). To the obligation of restitution there was added in the Old Law the further obligation of satisfaction: “When a man steals an ox or a sheep and slaughters or sells it, he shall restore five oxen for the one ox, and four sheep for the one sheep” (Ex 21.37). This disposition of Hebraic law points to two elements in an act of theft or damage: there is an imbalance of justice caused by the act; and there is guilt of the crime incurred by its performance. Restitution of what was taken remedies the inequity; punishment—in the instance cited, the exaction of more than was taken—is to make amends for the guilt of the crime.

An obligation to restitution may be modified by the good, bad, or dubious faith of one in possession of something belonging to another.

Circumstances of Restitution. The general rule is that restitution should be made to the person who has been injured and that it should be made as soon as is morally possible. The inequity arising from the injustice is not remedied by giving the property to one who was not the owner; unnecessary delay in making restitution prolongs the act of injustice; it might possibly do further harm to the injured party. Restitution need not be made openly or in a way that might cause the offending party’s guilt to become known. It can be made secretly, anonymously, or even in the form of a gift, provided this can be done without causing the one to whom restitution is made to feel obligated to give a gift in return. An employee can make restitution to an employer by doing extra work for which he is not compensated.

When the injured party or his whereabouts is unknown, restitution should be made to the poor. This is not an exception to the general rule that restitution should be made to the person who has been injured. It is rather a way of disposing of the property according to the wishes of the rightful owner, who is presumed to want his property to be used in the interests of the poor if it cannot be restored to him personally.

Causes Excusing from Restitution. Certain reasons will justify the deferring of restitution, either for a time or permanently. Impossibility, physical or moral, is the chief cause justifying a temporary postponement. It is physical when restitution simply cannot be made; it is moral when it cannot be made without grave hardship, provided the hardship involved in making the restitution is notably greater than that which would be suffered by the injured party in being made to wait for the return of his property. When the impossibility has passed, restitution must be made without further delay. The causes that permanently absolve from the obligation are: (1) condonation, which is the remission of the debt granted expressly or tacitly by the one to whom it is owed; (2) compensation, which occurs when what one owes another is counterbalanced by what the other owes him; (3) composition, which is the remission of the debt granted by the Holy See where restitution is owed for ecclesiastical property or where the creditors are unknown.

Restitution Owed by Cooperators in Injustice. Not only the perpetrator of an injustice, but those who cooperate with him may also be bound to restitution. Moralists distinguish two general kinds of cooperation, positive and negative.

Positive Cooperation. This can take different forms. (1) If one cooperates by inducing another by counsel or persuasion to do an injustice, he is bound, if the principal agent does not do so, to repair all the harm done in consequence of his counsel or persuasion. If he retracts his counsel before the act has been committed, he is not obligated to restitution. Cooperation by way of praise, flattery, ridicule, etc., is reducible to cooperation by counsel, and the same general rule regarding restitution is applicable to it. (2) If one cooperates by commanding or ordering a subordinate to do an injury, he is bound, even before the actual agent, to repair all the harm done under his orders. (3) A cooperator by consent is bound to restitution to the extent to which the consent contributed effectively to the perpetration of the injustice. (4) One who cooperates by sheltering an evil doer or receiving stolen goods is bound to restitution so far as his cooperation results in preventing the injured party from receiving the compensation that is due to him. (5) A cooperator by actual participation is obligated to make restitution for the harm of which he was the efficacious and culpable cause. If his cooperation was essential to the injury, he is obligated equally and in solidum with the other essential cooperators for the whole harm done, i.e., he is bound only to his proportionate share in the repair of the harm if the others are prepared to shoulder their responsibility, but he is bound to repair the whole wrong himself if the others refuse to make restitution. If the different cooperators act in a conspiracy aimed at effecting the whole damage, each conspirator is bound in solidum with the others to repair the total damage, and each, if the others default, must take full responsibility. But if the cooperators act without conspiracy and each independently of the others effects some harm, each is obligated only to the repair of the harm he has done individually.

Negative Cooperation. The negative cooperator, i.e., one who is bound in justice to prevent injury to another and fails to do so, is bound to restitution if he could have prevented the injustice without incurring unreasonable risk or difficulty. A person may be bound in justice to prevent an injury either by reason of his office or of some contractual obligation, e.g., a parent with respect to the controllable behavior of his children, a policeman, a watchman. A negative cooperator, however, is bound to restitution only when the actual perpetrator of the act, or others more positively implicated in it, fail to meet their obligation.

Order in Which Cooperators Are Bound. In the case of theft, the obligation to restitution rests primarily upon the unjust possessor of the stolen thing, and he must restore it to its owner. He has a right to expect compensation from the one from whom he bought it, provided he acquired it in good faith. If the thing no longer exists, the person who profited most by the theft is considered the possessor. After the possessor, the obligation falls upon the mandans, i.e., the one under whose orders or command the theft was committed. Effective persuasion is considered equivalent to command. Next are bound the actual thief and those actively associated with him in the commission of the act. Among these there may be a priority of responsibility depending upon the nature of the participation of each. Some may be leaders or may contribute to the crime in an essential way. Finally responsibility falls upon the negative cooperators. Except for the unjust possessor, the order is substantially the same in the case of unjust damage. The above order is applicable in ordinary cases. Extraordinary circumstances may alter it in particular cases.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 62. N. JUNG, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 13.2:2466–2501. H. NOLDIN, Summa theologiae moralis, rev. A. SCHMITT and G. HEINZEL, 3 v. (Innsbruck 1961–62). B. H. MERKELBACH, Summa theologiae moralis, 2:284–342. H. DAVIS, Moral and Pastoral Theology, rev. and enl. ed. by L. W. GEDDES (New York 1958) 2:284–323.

[A. DOOLAN]

RESTITUTION, EDICT OF

Proclamation of FERDINAND II (1619–37), Mar. 6, 1629, apex of imperial power and Catholic reaction during the THIRTY YEARS' WAR. Following the defeat of Frederick V, Elector Palatine, and the failure of Danish intervention in the struggle between the Hapsburgs and the Protestant Union, Emperor Ferdinand II seized the opportunity to restore Catholic influence and strengthen Hapsburg control throughout the Holy Roman Empire. Without consulting the imperial diet (Reichstag), Ferdinand issued an edict nullifying the alienation of all church lands since the Convention of Passau in 1552, calling for restitution to their rightful owners. The emperor also authorized the new proprietors to expel all those who would not embrace the religious preference of the ruler of the territory, thus reaffirming the principle of cujus regio ejus religio. All Protestant sects except Lutherans of the AUGSBURG CONFESSION (1530) were outlawed, especially that of the Calvinists. Ferdinand's unconstitutional decree relaxed Protestant control of the archbishoprics of Magdeburg and Bremen; the bishoprics of Minden, Verden, Halberstadt, Lübeck, Merseburg, Naumburg (these last three, however, were retained by the Elector of Saxony), Brandenburg, Havelberg, Lebus, and Kammin; and many monasteries and smaller foundations. Enforced by imperial commissioners from whom there was no appeal, the decree expelled thousands of peaceful citizens from their homes. The edict also stiffened Protestant resistance and encouraged Swedish intervention against Hapsburg religious and absolutist policies.

Bibliography: C. V. WEDGWOOD, The Thirty Years' War (New Haven 1939). C. J. FRIEDRICH, The Age of the Baroque, 1610–1660 (New York 1952). K. REPGEN, LexThK2 8:1257–58.

[P. S. MCGARRY]

RESURRECTION, GRECO-ORIENTAL

Resurrection is the act on the part of a being, human or divine, whereby he rises again from the dead, with or without the body, as the same individual. This doctrine of resurrection is therefore distinct from that of TRANSMIGRATION OF SOULS.

Greco-Roman paganism found resurrection difficult to accept. The two chief characteristics that distinguished Greek gods from men were happiness and immortality; man was regularly regarded as the union of two discrete entities, a soul and a body, of which the former, but not the latter, was often believed to survive death. The dissolution of the body was regarded, with resignation, as inevitable. This view of man is quite different from that found in the Old Testament, where man is regarded not as a duality, but as an animated body (a unity). This concept of man is more hospitable to belief in resurrection.

Accordingly, Greco-Roman ideas on resurrection were quite different from those of the Christian. The chief Greek god who was believed to die and live again was DIONYSUS, and he was recognized to be of non-Greek origin. When he was introduced into the Orphic Mysteries (see MYSTERY RELIGIONS, GRECO-ORIENTAL), the result was belief in transmigration, not resurrection in the proper sense. In the later mystery religions, resurrection was often referred to, but only in a metaphorical sense. In the Mysteries of Isis, for example, the initiate experienced a symbolic death, followed by a moral rebirth in this world (quodam modo renatos, Apuleius, Met. 11.21). The new life began, not with physical death, but at the time of initiation, and so is analogous to Christian Baptism. Physical death thus ceased to be significant, compared to spiritual rebirth. Similar doctrines, symbolizing a complete break with the initiate's previous life, occur in the Mysteries of Attis and in the rite of TAUROBOLIUM. The Mithraic doctrine of immortalization, ἁπαθανατισμός, refers only to a temporary union with the divine during a rite [see A. Dieterich, Eine Mythrasliturgie (3d ed. Leipzig 1923) and M. P. Nilsson Geschichte der griechischen Religion (Munich 1955–61) 2: 658]. It is thus analogous to ὁμοιωσις θεῶν, the effort to make oneself like the gods, first mentioned by Plato (Theaetetus 176b) and elaborated in NEOPYTHAGOREANISM and the Hermetic documents. In later Greco-Roman antiquity, the corporeal aspect of death was pushed more and more into the background: punishments and purifications of the dead were no longer said to take place within the earth, but in the upper air.

Gods who were believed to have died and been reborn were more common in the Near East. In Babylon there was the vegetation god Tammuz, and possibly Bel-Marduk, but there was no belief in personal resurrection. In Egypt the soul was believed to leave the dead body for limited periods. This was clearly not the work of gods, but of men, who enabled the soul to continue its life by proper care of the body. There was no expectation of bodily resurrection in this world. Similarly, in the cult of the vegetation god Adonis, whose worship spread from Byblus to Cyprus and to the Greco-Roman world at large, there is no evidence of belief in personal resurrection.

In at least two striking aspects, these Oriental beliefs differ from biblical teachings. First, several dying gods were associated with the annual death and rebirth of vegetation. The hymns to Tammuz, for example, often associate his death with the withering of plants in summer; in fact, the month Tammuz was in midsummer. Second, most of these gods were associated with a goddess who mourned her favorite's death and assisted his resurrection: Tammuz with Ishtar, Osiris with Isis, Adonis with Astarte (Aphrodite), and Attis with Cybele. In these respects, and in its strong moral emphasis, the fully developed Christian doctrine is quite unlike the so-called Greco-Oriental parallels.

The closest real parallel occurs in later portions of the AVESTA. There the soul is judged for the first time three days after death and is then rewarded or punished. After thousands of years there will be a general resurrection of soul and body and a second judgment, after which the evil, now purified, and the good will live in a new world. This doctrine probably goes back to the time of the Achaemenids, and was certainly in existence when 2 Maccabees was written, with its explicit reference to resurrection of the body. However, the Jewish concept is not borrowed from Persian religion, but is to be regarded as a parallel phenomenon.

Bibliography: G. BERTRAM and A. OEPKE, Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum (Stuttgart 1941) 1:919–938. G. J. BOTTERWECK et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:1042–52. W. VON GODEN et al., Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 1:688–698. M. P. NILSSON, Geschichte der griechischen Religion (Munich 1955–61) 2:610, 657–664. F. NÖTSCHER, Altorientalischer und alttestamentlicher Auferstehungsglauben (Würzburg 1926). A. T. NIKOLAINEN, Die Auferstehungsglauben in der Bibel und ihrer Umwelt, 2 v. (Helsinki 1944–46). J. LEIPOLDT, Sterbende und auferstehende Götter (Leipzig 1923).

[H. S. LONG]

RESURRECTION OF CHRIST

1. In the New Testament

Faith in the resurrection of JESUS of Nazareth as the divinely caused aftermath of his ministry and crucifixion that established him as Jewish Messiah and reigning Lord

RESURRECTION OF CHRIST

“The Resurrection of Christ,” oil painting by Giovanni Bellini, 1475–1479, collection of the Staatliche Museen, Berlin. (©Francis G. Mayer/CORBIS)

"The Resurrection," fresco painting by Piero della Francesca, 1463–1465, the Pinacoteca Comunale, Sansepolcro, Italy. (©Archivio Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

of the universe permeates the thought of the NT. Apart from the resurrection-faith, there would have been no Christian community, no NT, and scarcely any historical memory of Jesus of Nazareth. The NT contains a variety of literary formulations of this resurrection-faith: discourses, termed “kerygmatic speeches” (Acts 2.14–36; 3.12–26; 4.8–12; 5.29–32; 10.34–43; 13.16–41) that assert and substantiate the resurrection-claim; confessional formulae (Phil 2.11; Rom 10.8b–9; 1 Cor 12.3; Rom 8.34; 1 Thes 1.9–10; Rom 1.1–5) expressing the Christian community’s conviction of the resurrection; a tradition of the original apostolic witness (1 Cor 15.3–5) not only testifying to the resurrection but explaining its religious significance; Christological hymns (Phil 2.6–11; Col 1.15–20; Eph 1.20–22; 1 Tm 3.16; 1 Pt 1.18–22; Heb 1.3–4) inspired by the resurrection-faith; prophecies of death and resurrection (Mk 8.31; 9.31; 10.32–34 and parallel places) ascribed to Jesus himself; and finally narratives concerning the resurrection that form the conclusion of each GOSPEL (Mk 16.1–8, 9–20; Lk 24.1–53; Mt 28.1–28; Jn 20.1–29; 21.1–23).

The resurrection narratives with which each Gospel closes contain material not present in the kerygmatic speeches, confessional formulae, traditional apostolic testimony, Christological hymns, and Gospel prophecies. This narrative material invariably follows the same pattern—a visit of women to the tomb of Jesus followed by accounts of appearances of the risen Christ. The accounts of the women’s visit differ considerably in detail, and the appearance stories in each Gospel are entirely different from the same type of stories in the other three Gospels.

The differences between the resurrection narratives and other formulations of the resurrection-faith in the NT have presented a persistent challenge to NT scholarship. Vatican Council II encouraged biblical scholars to pursue their research for the purpose of bringing the religious meaning of the Scriptures into ever sharper focus (Dei Verbum 23). With this objective in view, contemporary NT scholarship has undertaken a critical reassessment of the NT material bearing on the resurrection of Christ. This article concerns itself first with Paul’s use of the apostolic tradition in 1 Cor 15.1–8 and second with the kerygmatic speeches in Acts. Consideration of this material supplies the actual NT foundation for the understanding of the resurrection narratives. Finally, the article makes an assessment of the resurrection narratives themselves.

First Cor 15.1–8 and the resurrection narratives.

From the standpoint of the chronology of NT literature, 1 Cor 15.1–8 is the earliest written statement concerning the apostolic testimony to the resurrection of Christ. Writing about 54 to 56 A.D., St. Paul uses the apostolic tradition to address himself to the question of the resurrection of the dead, in which some Corinthian Christians had lost faith (1 Cor 15.12). He reminds them that the resurrection-faith that created their community did not involve the acceptance of a marvelous display of divine power simply in favor of the crucified Jesus of Nazareth by means of which a personal glorious afterlife was granted him. What was proclaimed to them and what they accepted was that Christ “died for our sins according to the Scriptures,” i.e., Christ accepted the death of the cross as God’s will for the remission of sins of which all peoples throughout human history are guilty, as the OT makes clear (1 Cor 15.1–3); and that Christ “was raised . . . according to the Scriptures,” an event that occurred and was made known in time (“on the third day”), 1 Cor 15.4, i.e., the manifestation of the resurrection of Christ had for its purpose God’s communicating to people like themselves that in Christ’s death and resurrection he was carrying to completion his plan to save humanity from the disastrous effects of sin, of which death is the chief (1 Cor 15.54–57). To deny the resurrection of the dead as the beginning of an everlasting afterlife in the full integrity of the person is to remove all religious significance from God’s act in raising Christ and to render Christian faith in his person meaningless: “If there is no resurrection of the dead, Christ himself has not been raised” (1 Cor 15.13), i.e., if the dead are not restored to a life with God as the final result of the remission of their sins, neither was Christ himself restored to a life with God, for it was the prevalence of sin itself that caused his death. If Christ did not overcome the sins that caused his death, he did not overcome death and consequently was not raised.

But according to the apostolic testimony, Christ was in reality raised from the dead (1 Cor 15.20), the divine sign that he did overcome sin and death. That God in fact raised him from the dead was manifested to Cephas and to the Twelve (1 Cor 15.5). To this testimony of the original apostles, the Twelve, Paul adds a list of others who had a similar experience of the risen Christ through which they understood his overcoming of sin and death: the five hundred brethren (1 Cor 15.6); James, the administrator of the Jerusalem community; and “all the apostles,” probably a different group from the Twelve, who because of their experience of the risen Christ were mandated apostles by the Twelve. Paul concludes by adding himself to the list of apostolic witnesses to Christ’s resurrection and its religious significance, a fact of which, no doubt, he had already informed the Corinthians when he established their community.

Scholars disagree as to whether 1 Cor 15.3–5 alludes to, or shows that, Paul was aware of the tradition of the empty tomb. His text certainly makes no clear allusion to this tradition. The fact that the Jewish conception of the human person required both body and spirit and that on this basis the Apostle would naturally have assumed an empty tomb, does not constitute an argument for a reference in 1 Cor 15.4 (“he was buried”) to the specific tradition of the empty tomb in the resurrection narratives. It seems to be a necessary inference that in Paul’s understanding, the apostolic preaching of the resurrection of Christ did not incorporate the datum of the empty tomb.

Although in 1 Cor 15.5–8 Paul insists that the resurrection-faith is based upon the testimony of witnesses to the risen Christ, he makes no reference to accounts of the experiences of the witnesses. The Greek verb ōphthē used successively in each verse of the passage to designate a particular, personal, and special encounter with the risen Christ by Cephas, the Twelve, the five hundred brethren, James, all the apostles, and Paul can be translated as “was seen by” or “appeared.” Even if with the majority of NT scholars one prefers “appeared,” one cannot deduce the nature of the appearances from this verb. The most that can be concluded from it is that the experience of the risen Christ to which the verb makes reference had both objective and subjective elements, i.e., the verb implies more than a mere internal visionary experience, but does not necessarily imply the same kind of objective presence of Christ that was the recipients’ experience of the objective presence of the historical Jesus. From the fact that the experiences of the risen Christ were apparently different in nature from their experience of the historical Jesus, it does not follow that they were any less intense and meaningful than the encounter with the Jesus of the ministry. The effect upon Paul of his experience of the risen Christ on the road to Damascus (Acts 9.1–9; 22.6–11; 26.12–18)—the intensity of his apostolic life (1 Cor 9.1–27) and his steadfastness in the face of extreme hardship (2 Cor 11.22–29)—shows that the encounter with the risen Christ could be more intense and meaningful than even a daily relationship with the Jesus of the ministry.

The lack of reference to accounts of the appearances of the risen Christ in 1 Cor 15.5–8 indicates that the original apostolic proclamation of the resurrection did not include a narrative form recapitulating these appearances. Since in the final analysis the apostolic preaching of the resurrection rested on the authority of God (cf. 1 Cor 15.15), the recital of appearances of the risen Christ would add nothing substantial to the assertion of his resurrection. Such recitals would have diverted attention away from the risen Christ to the Twelve and the phenomenon of their experiences of him.

Kerygmatic speeches in Acts and the resurrection narratives. Luke’s Gospel and Acts contain the perimeters of the NT resurrection-faith without any attempt on the author’s part to fuse them. Luke’s Gospel ends with the narrative form of the women’s visit to the tomb followed by appearance narratives (Lk 24.1–53). Although Acts 1.3 speaks in strong terms of the appearances of the risen Christ to the Twelve, the kerygmatic speeches (cf. the listing above) make no mention of actual appearances. Nor do they make any reference to the empty tomb.

The material of the kerygmatic speeches coheres with the Pauline formulation of the apostolic proclamation in 1 Cor 15.3–5. Each of the speeches contains the same central assertion: “God raised Jesus” (Acts 2.32; 3.15; 4.10; 5.30; 10.40; 13.30). In 1 Cor 15.4 the formulation in the passive mood (“was raised on the third day . . .”) is the Jewish way of avoiding the use of the divine name while clearly attributing the action to God. Thus in the kerygmatic formulations of both Paul and Luke, the resurrection of Christ is placed outside the sphere of human observation and investigation. Its reality is declared to be knowable only if one accepts it as a communication of God, its author.

In Acts, Luke chooses the Greek term martyres, witnesses, to characterize the role of the Twelve toward the risen Christ. In the Greek world the term martyrs, witness, carried both the sense of “eyewitness,” or of one who could testify to a fact from personal experience, as well as the meaning of expert testimony in the case where testimony concerned truths not empirically verifiable and requiring special knowledge or education. Utilizing this twofold meaning of martyrs, Luke depicts the Twelve as witnesses to the risen Christ from divinely given personal experience of him and from divinely endowed insight into the religious meaning of his resurrection (Acts 2.32–36; 3.15–23; 5.32; 10.40–43; 13.31). In 1 Cor 15.3–8 Paul combines ōphthē, “appeared,” with use of the dative case for the persons to whom the manifestation of the risen Christ was made. Thus he clearly has the idea, though not the language, of witnesses to the risen Christ. When in 1 Cor 15.3 he observes, “I handed on to you what I also received” concerning Christ’s death for sin and his resurrection, both according to the Scriptures, he is referring to the divinely endowed insight of Cephas and the Twelve as a group into the religious meaning of Christ’s resurrection. In substance, the concept of the apostolic preaching in the Lucan speeches and in Paul’s formulation of it in 1 Cor 15 are in harmony. Whereas Paul, aiming in 1 Cor 15.1–8 to focus attention on the personal relationship created by Christ’s death and resurrection between Christ and every human being, contents himself with a sweeping reference to the OT Scriptures as manifesting God’s will fulfilled in Christ, Luke, whose purpose in Acts is to describe the apostolic address to nonbelievers, cites the OT Scriptures explicitly (e.g., Ps 16.8–11 in Acts 2.25–28; Ps 110.1 in Acts 2.34–35; Dt 18.15–16 in Acts 3.22–23).

Conclusion. According to 1 Cor 15.1–8 and Luke’s presentation of the kerygmic speeches in Acts, the resurrection-faith of the NT Christian communities originated from the authoritative assertion of the Twelve, of Paul, and of other apostles that they had been the recipients of a divinely caused experience of the risen Christ. The salient thrust of their testimony was that the risen Christ reigned in the realm of God, a vantage point from which he demanded the faith and adherence of humanity. The orientation of the apostolic preaching was toward the otherworldly status and power of the risen Christ. It did not direct attention to the actual experiences of the witnesses who were the recipients of God’s self-communication concerning his action toward the crucified, dead, and buried Jesus of Nazareth.

Nonetheless, Paul’s use of ōphthē and Luke’s use of martys to convey the connection between the apostolic assertion of the resurrection and the experience on which the assertion was based imply a relationship between the original preachers of the resurrection-event and the person of the risen Christ. This terminology of Paul and Luke has traditionally led theologians to conclude that a real experience of the risen Christ was the root cause of the apostolic testimony to his resurrection. The experience itself was the creative force that produced the resurrection-faith, first in the apostles, next through them in others who became the Christian community. In recent years, some exegetes and theologians have proposed a different interpretation of the NT data: that it was the teaching of the historical Jesus that produced the resurrection-faith, either by way of theological reflection upon his historical teaching and person together with a factor of divine revelation somehow associated with the theological reflection, or simply by way of theological reflection upon the memory of Jesus of Nazareth and his religious significance. This interpretation of the NT data, while in some respects worthy of further discussion, is not as yet sufficiently well founded or developed to be given serious consideration here. Its principal value is that it points to the usefulness of taking seriously the question of the interaction between the resurrection-faith of the apostles and their experience of the historical Jesus. It remains to be seen whether this particular avenue of research will succeed in contributing to the understanding of the origin of the resurrection-faith in the NT.

Resurrection narratives. It is already clear that these narratives, as well as their component parts, did not originate for the purpose of creating a faith-community centered on the risen Christ. As is the case with the four Gospels as a whole, the resurrection narratives are adressed to Christian communities whose faith in Jesus Christ is established, and, in the particular instance of his resurrection, on the ground of the apostolic testimony. The evangelists composed the four Gospels in order to support the faith of Christians. In general they have the same objective in the resurrection narratives.

The Women’s Visit to the Tomb of Jesus. The visit is narrated in Mk 16.1–8; Lk 24.1–10; Mt 28.1–8; Jn 20.1–2. The differences of detail in each evangelist’s presentation of the women’s visit to Jesus’ tomb are remarkable. In Mk 16.1 they proceed to the tomb “to anoint him”; in Lk 24.1 they bring “spices” or “aromatic oils,” but for what particular purpose is not stated; in Mt 28.1 they come to “view” or possibly “to observe” the tomb; in Jn 20.1 Mary Magdalene simply “comes” to the tomb. In Mk 16.3 the women are concerned about the difficulty of rolling back the heavy stone sealing the tomb, a detail not included in the other three accounts. In Mk 16.4 and Lk 24.2, when they find the tomb open, they enter it; but in Jn 20.1–2 Mary Magdalene, making the same discovery, does not enter it. In Mt 28.1–4 the women’s entrance to the tomb is blocked by an angel, who subsequently, however, invites them to determine for themselves that it is empty (Mt 28.6).

The dress of the angels varies from one Gospel to another. Mk 16.5 describes a young man dressed simply in white—a figure unconvincingly explained by some NT scholars as a representative of the risen Christ or of a Christian neophyte; Lk 24.4 speaks of two angels in shining garments, while Mt 28.3 depicts a figure whose facial features are like lightning and whose clothing is snow-white; Jn 20.12 laconically notes the presence of two angels dressed simply in white.

The function of the angels varies in the four Gospel accounts of the women’s visit to the tomb. In Mk 16.6 and Mt 28.6 the angel informs the women of the empty tomb, whereas in Lk 24.3 and Jn 20.11–13 the women make the discovery themselves. In Mk 16.7 and Mt 28.7 the angel instructs the women to inform Jesus’ disciples of his resurrection and that they will see him in Galilee; in Lk 24.6–7 the women are reminded of Jesus’ prophecies of his crucifixion and resurrection on the third day as if these prophecies in Lk 9.22; 9.43–44; 18.31–34 were directed to the women. In Jn 20.13 the angels make no response to Mary Magdalene’s plaint that Jesus’ body had been stolen from the tomb.

The women’s reaction to the angelic message at the tomb varies from Gospel to Gospel: in Mk 16.8 they flee from the tomb in fear and astonishment and “say nothing to anyone”; in Lk 24.9–10 they report their experience at the tomb to the apostles; in Mt 28.8 they leave the tomb in a holy fear but with joy and set out to report to Jesus’ disciples; in Jn 20. 13–14 Mary Magdalene poses no question to the angels concerning the whereabouts of Jesus' body, her main concern.

The variations among the evangelists in their depiction of the women's visit to Jesus' tomb, remarkable as they are in themselves, become even more astonishing in the light of the fact that Luke and Matthew availed themselves of the Gospel of Mark as a source and guideline for the composition of their own Gospels (a literary relationship among the synoptic evangelists that the majority of contemporary NT scholars consider to be established). On this supposition, it follows that neither Luke nor Matthew viewed their variations from Mark as anything other than instructive for the faith of the Christian community.

The single constant in the four Gospel accounts of the women's visit to the tomb is their discovery that it was open and empty. In John's Gospel, Mary Magdalene eventually verifies the emptiness of the tomb, her original inference (Jn 20.1–2), by personal inspection (Jn 20.11–13). Contemporary NT scholars continue to debate the historical veracity of the tradition of the open-empty tomb. Unlike the resurrection of Christ and the apostolic experience of the person of the risen Christ, the tradition of the open-empty tomb is a direct object of historical assessment.

Since the tradition was not put forward by the apostolic preaching as a basis for the resurrection-faith, its origin cannot be accounted for out of such a purpose. In all four Gospels the open-empty tomb is linked with the accounts of Jesus' burial. Although it was Roman practice to leave the corpse of the crucified to decompose on the cross or to be devoured by animals, the Roman authority, having regard for Jewish sensibilities concerning the respect due a human corpse (cf. Dt 21.22–23), permitted immediate burial of crucified Jews. Jn 19.31 has certain (unnamed) leaders of the Jews requesting Pilate to have the crurifragium, the breaking of the legs, performed upon Jesus and the two men crucified with him, so as to hasten their deaths and permit their burial before the Sabbath (in Jn, also the feast of the Passover). It was perhaps as a member of this delegation from the Sanhedrin that Joseph of Arimathea sought and received from Pilate charge of Jesus' corpse. At least in Judea it lay within the jurisdiction of the Roman procurator to grant the corpse of the crucified Jew to relatives or friends for the purpose of interment.

Joseph was not a relative or friend of Jesus (in Mk 15.43 he is a "prominent counsellor"; in Lk 23.50 he is a "counsellor, a good and just man"; in Mt 27.57 he is a disciple of Jesus; in Jn 19.38 he is a secret disciple). On what precise grounds he won custody of the corpse from the procurator can only be conjectured, for the evangelists supply no information on this point. In the case of one executed for a political offense, as was Jesus on suspicion of sedition, the procurator ordinarily refused such a request when it was made by one who was not a relative of the deceased. Perhaps the fact that Pilate acceded to Joseph's petition is one of the reasons why the evangelists emphasize Pilate's judgment that Jesus was innocent of sedition (Mk 15.12–15; Lk 23.13–16; Mt 27.18–19, 23–24; Jn 19.4–6). Since the Jews considered the burial of their dead, even of those executed in connection with violations of the OT Law, to be a sacred duty, it is not surprising that Joseph, as a member of the Sanhedrin, a man of stature and, as a Jew, a man of religious concern, (Mk 15.43) assumed a responsibility that Jesus' relatives and friends were unwilling or unable to undertake. Those adjudicated to be violators of the OT Law, as was the case with Jesus (Mk 14.62–64 and parallels) and the two robbers crucified with him (Lv 19.13), were normally interred in a burial ground reserved for them and located at some distance from the city where executions took place. Among the Jews, burials on the Sabbath were strictly forbidden: Joseph's choice of his own tomb (Mt 27.59–60) provided a site close enough to Golgotha that permitted interment before the Sabbath. The two robbers may have been buried with Pilate's consent by relatives or friends also near Golgotha.

The Gospel depiction of Jesus' burial is in accord with both Roman and Jewish practice concerning the final disposition of the corpse of a crucified Jew. The opinion that the burial took place in the burial ground reserved for criminals, advanced by a minority of NT scholars, lacks substantiation in the evidence. Further, on this hypothesis the women's presence as witnesses to the burial in Joseph's tomb (Mk 15.47; Lk 23.55; Mt 27.61) becomes difficult to explain, since women's testimony was not considered of value either in Jewish or Roman culture. Their testimony was simply inadequate to supplant the supposed fact of burial in a common graveyard in favor of an honorable interment in Joseph's tomb.

From a historical point of view, there is no reason to dispute the accuracy of the statements in the Synoptic Gospels attributing to the women knowledge of the location of Jesus' tomb (Mk 16.1; Lk 24.1; Mt 28.1; cf. also Jn 20.1) with which each evangelist begins his account of the women's visit. The differences among the evangelists on the women's motives for visiting the tomb may well be due in part to an actual difference of motives among them and in part to the discrepancies of detail among witnesses with which historians are familiar. It was established Jewish custom to honor the tombs of the dead. Since Jesus had in fact received honorable burial, but without any marks of affection or respect from his followers, it is not unnatural that these women, who had witnessed the humiliation of the cross (Mk 15.40; Lk 23.49; Mt 27.55–56; Jn 19.25), were determined somehow to compensate for this deficiency, whether by placing aromatic materials at the tomb or, should it have turned out to be possible, around the enshrouded corpse of Jesus. Each evangelist's mention of the women's motives serves to concentrate attention upon the unexpected drama of their visit: their objectives could not be carried out, for the tomb was open and empty. Only Mt (28.2) offers the explanation that it was an angel who opened the tomb. The other evangelists leave the reader to share in the women's mystification at this turn of events (Mk 16.3–4; Lk 24.2; Jn 20.1–2).

In the Synoptic Gospels, the explanation for the open-empty tomb is made by an angel or angels: the crucified Jesus has been raised by God. The angelic announcement then looks backward to prophecies ascribed to Jesus (in Lk and Mt to the passion-resurrection prophecies; in Mk to the reunion in Galilee spoken of in 14.28) and forward to his appearances to his disciples (Mk 16.6–7; Lk 24.5–7; Mt 28.5–7). The tradition of the women's discovery of the open-empty tomb (upon which the resurrection narrative of the Fourth Gospel at first centers its entire attention, Jn 20.1–13) is interpreted in the Synoptic Gospels by use of the apostolic proclamation that the crucified Jesus was buried and raised by God (cf. 1 Cor 15.4). The Twelve, the original proclaimers of this divine act, are replaced by angels: whether the proclamation be apostolic or angelic, it is the message of God. On this note Mark's Gospel, whether by design or by accident, originally concluded (Mk 16.1–8). The evangelist's stress on the women's silence (Mk 16.8; “. . . they said nothing to anyone . . .”) need not be understood in a sense so absolute as to exclude “the disciples and Peter” (Mk 16.7). Neither Luke (24.9) nor Matthew (28.8) took Mk 16.8 to mean that the women did not report their experience at the tomb to the disciples and Peter. For Mark the women are witnesses to the burial of Jesus and to the open-empty tomb, but they are not among the original apostolic witnesses to Christ's resurrection, a function reserved to the disciples and Peter (cf. Mk 13.9–11).

Luke's inclusion of a reaction of skepticism in response to the women's report (Lk 24.9, 11, 22–24) may be in part theologically motivated (to exclude the discovery of the open-empty tomb as a basis for the apostolic proclamation of Christ's resurrection) and in part a literary technique to introduce the reader to the lengthy account of the appearance of the risen Christ to the two disciples on the way to Emmaus. Jn 20.3–10 presents a favorable reaction to Magdalene's report: in consequence of it Peter and the beloved disciple visit the tomb and are impressed by the fact that the cloths that had enshrouded

Jesus' corpse are lying neatly in place. Lk 24.12 (a passage that contemporary textual critics incline to accept as authentic) reflects the same tradition, but told of Peter alone. Matthew's Gospel does not include a reaction of Jesus' disciples to the report intended by the women (Mt 28.8).

Mt 28.4 interweaves the story of the guarding of Jesus' tomb (Mt 27.62–66) with the women's visit. This evangelist's portrayal of the women's visit is set in the context of apocalyptic, a literary technique that emphasized the revelatory aspect of an event and intimated its special importance for the future. Apocalyptic features in Matthew's portrayal of the women's visit are the earthquake, the descent of the angel of the Lord, the OT representative of Yahweh (Mt 28.2), the lightning-like appearance of the angel's facial features (Mt 28.3), and the paralysis of the guards (Mt 28.4). The address of the apocalyptic angel to the women, appointing them emissaries to Jesus' disciples (Mt 28.5–7), places greater emphasis on their function as witnesses than is the case in the other three Gospels. Perhaps Matthew intended to contrast the women's acceptance of the resurrection-proclamation and its rejection by certain leaders of the Jewish community.

The guarding of the tomb (requested by a Jewish leadership unaware of Jesus' passion-resurrection prophecies, and not until the day after his burial), the defeat of the guards by the apocalyptic angel (a pre-Matthean or Matthean figure depicted to interpret the open-empty tomb), and therefore the payment of the guards to secure their silence (Mt 28.11–15) cannot be understood as historical data. Since this material, however, is taken seriously in Mt, the possibility suggests itself that neither the Christian story of the guarding of the tomb, nor the Jewish story of the disciples' theft of the corpse, nor the Christian story of the payment of the guards were originally historical assertions but forms of theological debate, probably (but not necessarily) over the religious significance of the open-empty tomb. But what precisely such a theological debate might have centered upon is not presently ascertainable.

The Christophanies. Appearances of the risen Christ are described in Mk 16.7; Lk 24.13–53; Mt 28.9–10; 16–20; Jn 20.11–18; 19–29; 21.1–23.

(a) Mk 16.7. Some contemporary NT scholars interpret the “seeing” of the risen Christ by the disciples and Peter (Mk 16.7a) as a reference to the parousia to occur in Galilee. The text, however, refers the reader to Mk 14.28: “But after I am raised I will go before you into Galilee.” When Mk 16.7 observes, “. . . there,” i.e., in Galilee, “you will see him as he told you,” the reference is simply to Christ now risen from the dead. Parousiapassages speak of “seeing” the Son of Man (Mk 14.62; 13.26), i.e., the risen Christ, in the role of judge. Before the judgment at the parousia is to take place, the disciples’ function is to preach the risen Christ who demands faith now (Mk 13.9–11), a situation that is to be evaluated when he appears as the Son of Man of Dn 7.13–14 for the final judgment (Mk 13.26). Mk 16.7 speaks of the disciples and Peter seeing the risen Christ as the prelude to their mission of Mk 13.9–11. The language of Mk 16.7 has at least one christophany in view, as is also the case with each person or groups of persons mentioned in 1 Cor 15.5–8 and in the kerygmatic speeches in Acts. It is not possible to determine whether or not Mark intended to record a christophany as the conclusion to his Gospel. However peculiar it may seem that his Gospel does in fact conclude without a christophany, this omission accords with the form of the apostolic proclamation in 1 Cor 15.5–8 and in the kerygmatic speeches in Acts, where it is sufficient for the audience to know that christophanies have occurred. It has also to be kept in mind that Mark’s readers could easily have been in possession of a tradition of one or several christophanies to which the evangelist simply chose to allude.

(b) Lk 24.13–32. The Appearance to the Disciples on the Way to Emmaus is a narrative quite skillfully written. It is linked to the women’s visit to the tomb (the two disciples discount the women’s report on the ground that no one has seen Jesus alive, Lk 24.22–24) and to the appearance to Peter from which the Eleven and others have learned of Jesus’ resurrection (Lk 24.33–34). Paradoxically, the disciples who refuse the women’s report because Jesus has not been seen alive do not recognize him (Lk 24.16). Their surprise that the traveler who now accompanies them is apparently unaware of the importance of the crucifixion and death of Jesus of Nazareth (Lk 24.18–21) is matched by the traveler’s surprise that they have not understood the tragedy of this prophet in terms of the OT Scriptures (Lk 24.25–27). The disciples’ sadness (Lk 24.17) begins to dissipate as a result of their confrontation with the Scriptures under the guidance of the traveler (Lk 24.28–29). The meal to which they had been looking forward in his company terminates when bread is broken and given them by the traveler: the mysteriousness of non-recognition becomes the mysteriousness of recognition; but with recognition he vanishes from their sight (Lk 24.30–31). Their report in Jerusalem is overshadowed by the announcement of the Eleven and others that “the Lord has really been raised and has appeared to Simon” (Lk 24.34).

In this narrative of Luke the experience of the two disciples surpasses that of the women, who do not see the risen Christ but have a vision of angels affirming “that he was alive” (Lk 24.23). But it falls short of the experience of Simon to whom “the Lord . . . appeared” (Lk 24.34). Luke uses the verb ōphthē of the appearance, as does Paul in 1 Cor 15.5–8 of all the appearances he mentions. In Paul this verb supposes that Christ appears as one who has received a glorious afterlife from which he reigns over the Christian community. The two disciples discover at Emmaus that Jesus of Nazareth (Lk 24.19) is indeed alive. But Peter discovers that he is alive and raised by God as “the Lord.” The two disciples recognize him; Peter understands also his identity.

The Emmaus narrative has to be understood within the limitation placed upon it by Luke. The two disciples only begin to perceive that the suffering of Jesus possesses religious meaning when the traveler explains the Scriptures to them (Lk 24.25–27). Even when they did not recognize him, his explanation cast the suffering of Jesus of Nazareth in a new and impressive light (Lk 24.32). Their recognition of him at “the breaking of the bread” (Lk 24.30–31, 35) is certainly a Eucharistic allusion, but it does not imply the fullness of understanding. Rather the fullness of understanding is a requirement for a share in the Eucharistic meal. It is this understanding they begin to acquire from the declaration of the disciples at Jerusalem that “the Lord . . . has appeared to Simon.”

As NT scholars have shown, Luke composed the Emmaus narrative from at least two sources. He also reworked these sources to highlight the historical ministry of Jesus (Lk 24.19), the passion-resurrection prophecies (Lk 24.20, 21b), the Christian use of the OT Scriptures (Lk 24.25–27), the Eucharist (Lk 24.35), and the apostolic proclamation of the resurrection of Christ (Lk 24.34). Thus his Emmaus narrative presents a compendium of factors that are essential to the formation of Christian faith. Luke was more interested in the religious significance of the Emmaus appearance than in the phenomenon of the appearance itself.

(c) Lk 24.36–53. The Appearance to the Eleven is a narrative composed of three distinct parts: the appearance of the risen Christ (Lk 24.36–43); the mission mandate (Lk 24.44–49); and the departure of Christ (Lk 24.50–53). To maintain the literary continuity of his resurrection narrative as a whole, Luke places this appearance-story in the context of the report of the Emmaus disciples (Lk 24.36). The story is concerned with the disciples’ recognition of Christ as corporeally risen and objectively present before them: it is not his spirit or a phantom that they see (cf. Acts 23.9), as the marks of his wounds attest (Lk 24.39a); nor are they undergoing a subjective vision, for they can touch him if they wish (Lk 24.39b). Jesus eating broiled fish before them (Lk 24.41–43) is obviously intended by Luke to indicate his bodily resurrection, but how this implication follows is unclear unless one supposes that as the host he shared the fish with them (cf. Acts 10.41). Since the story as a whole is introduced by mention of the disciples' panic and fright, a strange reaction in view of their knowledge of two appearances of Jesus, it becomes all the more clear that Luke wishes to emphasize the corporeal and objective reality of these appearances of the risen Christ, especially because he has had to acknowledge the Emmaus disciples' passage from non-recognition to recognition.

The mission mandate is a compressed summary of the kerygmatic speeches in Acts, followed by mention of the gift of the Holy Spirit enabling the disciples to perform the mission (Lk 24.49; cf. Acts 1.5 for the meaning of the "promise of the Father"). The departure scene seems to be introduced with the priestly blessing of the risen Christ (cf. Heb 8.1; Sir 50.19–21). Whether there is explicit mention of an ascension in Lk 24.51 ("he was taken up to heaven") depends upon the authenticity of this clause in the Greek text. The reading has the support of good MSS, of Acts 1.2, and Lk 24.52a ("they fell down to do him reverence"), which is consistent with it.

(d) Mt 28.9–10. The Appearance to the Women seems, from a literary standpoint, a poorly placed christophany. Mary Magdalene and "the other Mary" (Mt 28.1) have been instructed by the angel to inform the disciples of Jesus' resurrection and of a meeting with them in Galilee. As they are on their way to fulfill this commission, Jesus appears to them. Two observations may be made on the literary location of this brief narrative. In both Luke and John the appearance of Christ to the Eleven (or Twelve), Jesus' chosen disciples, is preceded by a christophany to others that prepares the Eleven for the experience of the risen Christ: the Emmaus disciples in Luke, who report to the Eleven and Mary Magdalene in John, who also makes a report (Jn 20.18). It seems then that Matthew's literary location of the appearance to the women follows a tradition that christophanies were first experienced by those outside the group constituting Jesus' chosen disciples and reported to them. Second, the instruction of the risen Christ to the women speaks of "my brethren" (Mt 28.10), not of the "disciples" as in Mt 28.7. "Brethren" is the common Christian term in the NT for a fraternal relationship. Consequently, the message of the risen Christ from the women to the disciples implies his forgiveness of their desertion of him. As in Luke and John, a prior christophany in Matthew prepares for the appearance of the risen Christ to his chosen disciples.

(e) Mt 28.16–20. This Appearance to the Eleven in Mt presents the most solemn christophany in the resurrection-narratives. It takes place on an undesignated mountain in Galilee (a favorite place for significant events in Mt: Jesus' temptation, 4.8; the Sermon on the Mount, 5.1; Jesus' prayer after the feeding of the five thousand and before the sea-walking, 14.23; Jesus' healing of a multitude of sick, 15.29; and the Transfiguration, 17.1). What precise symbolism, if any, the evangelist attached to the mountain is undetermined. Strangely, at the appearance of Christ the Eleven worship him but some "doubted." The majority of NT scholars no longer interpret this doubt by translating "had doubted" (impermissible in view of the aorist tense of the Greek verb). Some consider it to be a reference to earlier doubts among the Eleven; but if such was the evangelist's viewpoint, it is difficult to understand why he did not indicate that the doubts were now dissipated. A plausible explanation is that Matthew makes use of the tradition of doubt among Jesus' disciples concerning his resurrection to criticize the doubts of the Christian community of his own time, a point that may also be made in Mk 16.14.

The words of the risen Christ portray a structure of the Christian community that combines divine and human authority: the full authority of the risen Christ residing in the realm of God is shared in history by the Eleven. In turn they are to share it by making disciples in all nations. These disciples are to be united to the triune God through Baptism; and, beginning with the Eleven, whatever Jesus has taught (as recorded in Mt) is to be carried out by the Eleven and by the disciples in all the nations. In this very mission, the risen Christ will be mysteriously present as long as human history endures. The text of this mandate in Mt 28.18–20 is related to Dn 7.13–14 and probably also to Ps 110.1. The exact conceptual relationship between these OT passages and this passage in Mt remains, however, uncertain.

(f) Jn 20.11–18. The Appearance to Mary Magdalene is a christophany in which the theme of non-recognition occurs. But unlike Luke's Emmaus-narrative, it is given a practical explanation: Magdalene takes Jesus for the gardener because she assumes that he is dead and that his corpse has been taken from the tomb and buried elsewhere (Jn 20.11–15). Her recognition occurs when Jesus calls her by name (Jn 20.16). Since there has been a previous conversation, it is not simply the sound of Jesus' voice that causes the recognition but his knowledge of her. While in Luke the mysteriousness lies in the non-recognition, in John it lies in the recognition. Evidently, Magdalene assumes that the risen Christ is to resume his past relationship with his disciples (probably, the import of "Don't cling to me," Jn 20.17). Jesus corrects her assumption by instructing her to inform his disciples that he is ascending to his Father. By focusing attention on the ascension, the evangelist prepares the way for Jesus' gift of the Spirit to the Twelve.

(g) Jn 20.19–29. The Appearance to the Disciples and to Thomas concludes the Fourth Gospel. In the narrative of the appearance to the disciples (Jn 20.19–23), their recognition of the risen Christ results from the perception of his wounds, at the sight of which the disciples rejoice (Jn 20.20). Their recognition and rejoicing are theologically based: in John the cross is the beginning of Jesus' glorification (Jn 13.31–32), and by means of it he will attract the world to himself (Jn 12.32). With his appearance to them, the disciples begin to understand the truth of his words and rejoice that he is about to achieve this goal. However, the achievement is to be brought about in history by themselves. Having understood the religious significance of the cross and resurrection, they are capable of receiving and exercising the mission mandate (Jn 20.21–23): they are given the Spirit so that they might exercise discernment and authority to forgive men's sins or to withhold forgiveness in the name of Christ, a power that the evangelist leaves unspecified and therefore probably conceives broadly. The fact that he makes no mention of Jesus' departure suggests that he wishes to give particular prominence to the mission mandate.

The narrative of the appearance to the unbelieving Thomas (Jn 20.24–29) is a dramatic conclusion to the Gospel, which has been written in support of Christian faith: “. . . that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the . . .” (cf. Jn 20.30–31). The drama results from his absence when the christophany occurred. He refuses the disciples' testimony to the christophany and its religious significance, taking the position that unless he has the opportunity to judge for himself and on his own terms, he will not believe (Jn 20.24–25). The occurrence of the subsequent christophany with the disciples again behind locked doors (Jn 20.26; cf. Jn 20.19) does not mean that the risen Christ physically passed through locked doors, but that the physical construction of things does not preclude his objective presence. The reality and communicative force of Christ's presence are so compelling, that Thomas makes the supreme confession: “My Lord and my God” (Jn 20.28).

In the opinion of contemporary NT scholars, the story of the unbelieving Thomas was inspired by the tradition of the doubt among the Twelve (Lk 24.41; Mt 28.17; Mk 16.14) and the difficulties of some Christians in holding to the resurrection-faith at a time when the original witnesses to the risen Christ had died out. It was, of course, always known that actual witnesses were few in number and that the resurrection-faith arose out of the apostolic testimony. The story of the unbelieving Thomas dwells upon the latter fact: that it was through the apostolic word, accepted as the word of God (cf. 1 Thes 2.13), that the Christian community originated. Although the original witnesses are no longer with the community, the power of their word remains with it. The blessing or macarism (a Jewish way of speaking of one's good fortune in having accepted God's word, cf. Lk 1.45; 10.23) that concludes the story (Jn 20.29) does not contrast those who believed as the result of a christophany with those who believed without having experienced a christophany. The blessing is an instruction that both groups of believers are equally fortunate. The resurrection-faith lies at the heart of the Christian community, and both groups enjoy the same understanding of it. The double manner of its origin is the work of God.

(h) Jn 21.1–23. The narrative of the Appearance to the Disciples at the Sea of Tiberias is an addition to the Fourth Gospel, made (unlike Mk 16.9–20) before its publication, as its universal presence in the MS tradition shows. Generally speaking, its purpose is to reflect upon the roles played by Simon Peter and the beloved disciple of the Fourth Gospel (Jn 13.23; 19.26; 20.2) in the development of the Christian community. The supposition of the narrative is that both Simon Peter and the beloved disciple are dead. It is composed of two parts: an account of the appearance of the risen Christ on the shore of the Sea of Tiberias—a later name for the Sea of Galilee—(Jn 21.1–14); and an account of a conversation between Christ and Simon Peter on this occasion (Jn 21.15–23).

The appearance of Christ is set in the context of a fishing scene and in the framework of the disciples' non-recognition of him. When he suggests where they should cast the net, they do not recognize him. But after a strikingly large catch (Jn 21.6), the beloved disciple realizes that the person on the shore is “the Lord” and so informs Simon Peter (Jn 21.7). Once on shore and breakfasting at Christ's invitation, the group of disciples recognize him (Jn 21.12). The principal point of the story is that the beloved disciple leads Simon Peter to the recognition of the risen Christ. NT scholars recognize a Eucharistic allusion in Jesus' giving of the bread and fish to the disciples (Jn 21.13), but perhaps the allusion occurs by way of reference to Jn 6.11, where Jesus performs the same action for the purpose of the feeding of the five thousand. After the feeding, an instruction of Jesus follows, ending in a confession by Simon Peter (Jn 6.68–69). An instruction of Jesus now follows that focuses on Simon Peter.

The instruction is a mission mandate directed to Peter alone as in Mt 16.18–19. Three times Jesus requires him to confess his devotion, now to the risen Christ (almost certainly an allusion to the insistent tradition of his triple denial); and three times Jesus commands him to care for those who believe in him—imaged as “lambs” and “sheep”—(Jn 21.15–17). Since the leading function here given Peter is conveyed in symbolic language, its exact nature and extent cannot be set out in neat, concrete terms. It is acknowledged that his performance of the role of shepherd given him led to his martyrdom (Jn 21.18–19). The role of the beloved disciple, on the other hand, was to serve Christ in another way, one that involved preaching and teaching, but not martyrdom. It is probable that the conversation between Jesus and Peter in Jn 21.21–23 has the purpose of presenting John the Apostle as one who, like Peter, but without Peter's specific mandate from Christ, exercised a pastoral ministry of preaching and teaching that is of enduring significance for the Christian community and to which the Fourth Gospel stands as the lasting witness.

Concluding observations. The resurrection narratives contain no allegations or claims that in themselves constitute an object of historical research. From beginning to end the narratives are theological statement. Behind them lies an assumption of divine action in history. But this assumption is neither systematic nor unsystematic philosophical or theological speculation. It is an assumption unrelated to any religious thought, whether philosophical or theological, including the thought of the OT Scriptures and of Judaism itself, that preceded it. The assumption is specific: that God raised Jesus of Nazareth who was crucified, died, and was buried as a seditious under Pontius Pilate and manifested him to be reigning in his own realm as the salvific Lord of creation. The assumption itself is historically undemonstrable: only its context, the crucifixion of Jesus of Nazareth on grounds of sedition, is an object of historical evaluation. Although the assumption itself was not the net result of religious speculation of any kind and was not presented in terms of the historically demonstrable, it was not without its own historical context: the assertions of specific people to be the divine appointees to witness to the risen Christ and to his religious reign. Except on the assumption of the divine action in history testified to by specific people as divinely appointed witnesses, a testimony that is presumed to be accepted, the resurrection narratives carry neither conviction nor intelligible meaning.

Once the presupposition of the resurrection narratives is accepted, however, they acquire meaning that is both forceful and challenging. The sequel to the burial of Jesus of Nazareth in accordance with the customs of the time is the natural mystery of the open-empty tomb. But the resurrection narratives do not permit this natural mystery to hold the field of thought. It is elevated to the plane of the resurrection itself by angelic messengers: a natural explanation for this natural mystery is denied from the outset. Even in John's Gospel, the empty tomb is not a cause for weeping (Jn 20.13). The resurrection narratives show no interest in supplying data that leave no room for doubt about the empty tomb. They reflect a point of view that it was more important to provide a theological explanation for this phenomenon, than to supply historical information guaranteeing the emptiness of the tomb. The fact that a theological explanation was invariably offered shows at least that it was the Christian conviction that the tomb was found to be empty.

The variety of the christophanies reveals the same theological preoccupation as the variety of the accounts of the empty tomb: a phenomenon occurred that also required interpretation. In the instance of the christophanies, the phenomenon was the personal manifestation of the risen Christ to chosen witnesses. The content of the christophanies as they exist in the resurrection narratives seems to be due in part to the function carried out in their lifetimes by at least some of the recipients and in part to the catechetical needs of the Christian community. There is no need to assume that the risen Christ parceled out specific directions to a variety of people who then compared notes. St. Paul asserts that after his experience of the risen Christ on the road to Damascus, he felt no need to consult with the apostles in Jerusalem (Gal 1.15–17). That some form of communication took place between the risen Christ and the chosen witnesses is plausible and is indicated by Luke (Acts 1.3; 10.41). But such communication could bear only upon the immediate future and would in itself require interpretation in the course of time. The fact that the resurrection narratives offer a variety of interpretations of christophanies indicates that the appearances of the risen Christ took place, but in such a way as to require interpretation.

The literary classification of the christophanies remains unsettled. They have been categorized according to their setting (Jerusalem or Galilee), according to their content (recognition or mission), and according to their purpose (personal or apostolic).

Bibliography: P. BENOIT, Passion et Résurrection du Seigneur (Paris 1966). J. BLINZLER, "Die Grablegung Christi," in E. DHANIS, ed., Resurrexit: Actes du Symposium International sur la Résurrection de Jésus (Rome 1974) 56–107. E. L. BODE, The First Easter Morning (Rome 1970). R. E. BROWN, The Virginal Conception and Bodily Resurrection of Jesus (New York 1973); The Gospel according to John, XIII–XXI (New York 1970). C. H. DODD, "The Appearance of the Risen Christ: A Study in Form-Criticism of the Gospels," More New Testament Studies (Grand Rapids, MI 1968). R. H. FULLER, The Formation of the Resurrection Narratives (New York 1971). J. P. GALVIN, "Resurrection as Theologia crucis Jesu: The Foundational Christology of Rudolf Pesch," Theological Studies 38 (1977) 513–524. X. LÉON-DUFOUR, Résurrection de Jésus et message pascal (Paris 1971). W. MARXSEN, The Resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth (Philadelphia, PA 1970). C. F. D. MOULE, ed., The Significance of the Message of the Resurrection for Faith in Jesus Christ (Naperville, IL 1968). B. RIGAUX, Dieu l'a ressuscité: Exégèse et théologie biblique (Gembloux, Belgium 1973). L. SCHENKE, Auferstehungsverkündigung und leeres Grab (Stuttgart 1968). P. SEIDENSTICKER, Die Auferstehung Jesu in der Botschaft der Evangelisten (Stuttgart 1967). H. STRATHMANN, "Martyrs," G. KITTEL, Theological Dictionary of the New Testament 4:474–508.

P. DE SURGY, P. GRELOT, et al., La Résurrection du Christ et l'exégèse moderne (Paris 1969).

[C. P. CEROKE]

2. Theology of

The meaning of the Resurrection has never been so fully understood as during apostolic times. The Resurrection was the source and the object of faith; the theology of the time was a theology of the paschal mystery. It is not the purpose of the present section to follow the evolution of the early ideas and to determine what is peculiar to each author of the New Testament but, in keeping with the demands of theology, to endeavor by a proper arrangement of the Scripture texts to grasp the very mystery of the Resurrection. The elements of synthesis furnished by Scripture are grouped under two main heads.

RISEN CHRIST, UNIVERSAL SAVIOR

Some texts concern Christ constituted universal savior by the Resurrection (objective Redemption). They show in the Resurrection the fulfillment of eschatological SALVATION and determine the relations between the Resurrection and the death of Christ, between the Resurrection and the INCARNATION.

Resurrection and the Final Coming of the Kingdom. Jesus had announced the KINGDOM OF GOD, that is, the final advent of the dominion of God. He had taken the title of SON OF MAN, which, in the evocation of Daniel chapter 7 and the connections that Jesus established between this title and “the Day,” appears to be an eschatological title: it characterizes Jesus as the perfecter of the world (Mt 10.23; 19.28; 25.31; 26.64; Mk 8.38; 13.26; Lk 11.29–32; 12.8–9, 40; 17.24, 26–30; 18.8; 21.36). It is certain that, according to the Synoptic tradition, the coming of the kingdom is connected with “the coming” of Jesus [see K. H. Schelkle, Die Passion Jesu in der Verkündigung des NT (Heidelberg 1949) 199]. It would take place when the Son of Man “would come” with power [R. Schnackenburg, God's Rule and Kingdom, tr. J. Murray (New York 1963) 177]. Between the kingdom and the Son of Man in His coming there exists a real identity, so much so that the two terms, kingdom and Son of Man, can be interchanged (cf. Mk 8.39 and Mt 16.28; Lk 18.29 and Mt 19.28; Mt 25.34 and 41). The power and the glory whose sudden appearance in the world constitutes the eschatological coming of God are proper to Jesus in His “coming.” This final coming of the kingdom, which is also that of the Son of Man, is already contained in germ in the miracles (Lk 10.18, 23–24; 11.20), and it is certain that Jesus spoke of it as being very near (Mt 10.23; Mk 8.38–39; 13.30; Lk 12.54–56; 22.16–18).

In saying “But first he [the Son of Man] must suffer many things and be rejected by this generation” (Lk 17.25), He links the final coming (verse 24) with His death, not as to something merely presupposed but by an internal bond (see Mk 10.37–38; Lk 19.12, 15). The announcement of the death and the Resurrection of the Son of Man (Mk 8.31; 9.9–12, 30; 10.32–34) pertains to the preaching of the eschatological kingdom: it means that it is through death and then in a Resurrection that Jesus will enter into the glory of the kingdom (Luke 24.26, 46). Jesus thus fulfills the prophecy of Daniel chapter 7 on the heavenly coming of the Son of Man through that of the Suffering Servant.

The account of the Last Supper (see Lk 22.14–20) is the summit and point of crystallization of the Synoptic thought on the kingdom: here this appears imminent (verses 16–18, 29–30), like a meal, but one that will be a pasch and a completed pasch (v.16), a repast in the joy of a new world (Mk 14.25). In this narrative, kingdom and Eucharist are placed in the same perspective and thus receive mutual clarification one from the other. In the light of the Eucharist, which is image and mysterious realization of the kingdom, one discovers that the nourishment of the eschatological banquet is none other than Christ in His oblation for the multitude. Here, then, again the kingdom is linked with the Person of Jesus and His death pertains to the mystery of this kingdom.

Before His Passion, Jesus said: “. . . hereafter you shall see the Son of Man sitting on the right of the Power and coming upon the clouds of heaven” (Mt 26.64). The reference to Daniel chapter 7 is evident, where the advent of the Son of Man means the advent of an eternal empire. The Son of Man “comes” henceforth through death, into the glory (Lk 24.26) and the omnipotence (Mt 28.18) that in the eyes of the early Church are synonyms for the coming of the kingdom (cf. Mk 10.37 and Mt 20.21; Mk 8.38 and 8.39; 1 Thes 2.12).

Unique Coming. Scripture does not say explicitly that the kingdom has come in the Resurrection. But it is certain that the coming was considered very near, linked with death and identical with the coming of Jesus in glory and power. It is also certain that primitive thought knew only one coming of the kingdom, in the one and final “coming” of Christ. The later transformation of “the coming” into a “return” and the notion of successive PAROUSIAS is not in keeping with early thought and beclouds it. Theology has the right to conclude that the coming of the kingdom in which is the eschatological fullness of salvation is identical with the mystery of the Resurrection.

For Saint John, more explicitly than for the Synoptics, the Hour of Christ is at the same time that of His Passion and that of His final consummation (Jn 12.31–32; cf. 5.25 and 17.1–3).

It is significant that after the Resurrection the Apostles no longer announced the kingdom to come, but the risen Christ. The Resurrection is considered as the advent of salvation; it forms the principal object (Acts 2.22–36; 4.8–12), indeed the only object (4.33), of the message of salvation. It is no longer the preparation for eschatological events (Acts 17.31; 1 Thes 1.10), but the termination of history (Acts 13.32–33), the final accomplishment (Acts 13.34) of every promise of salvation (Acts 13.32; 26.6, 22–23) from that made to Abraham (Acts 3.25–26) to that made to David (Acts 2.31). The coming of the Son of Man is henceforth a reality (Acts 7.55–56). Jesus has become the Messiah-Lord (Acts 2.36), elevated to the throne of David (Acts 2.30–31), at the right hand of God (Acts 2.33–34). All salvation is in Him (Acts 4.11–12).

Kyrios and Pleroma. The characteristic title of the risen Christ is that of Kyrios (Lord). It was given to Christ with the same meaning it had when applied to God (Phil 2.9; Jn 20.28) in the fullness of His sovereignty. It is the Resurrection that has established Jesus in this Lordship (Acts 2.24–36; Mt 28.18; Rom 10.9; Phil 2.9–11). In view of the realism the Semites attached to the name, the granting of the sovereign Name means that the Resurrection was not merely a vivification but rather a divinization, the total assumption of the man Jesus in God and in His attributes [see Saint Ambrose, De excessu fratris sui Satyri 2.91, Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 73:299; Summa theologiae 3a, 55.2]. Such an affirmation contains an unfathomable mystery that justifies the most surprising assertions of the New Testament on the risen Christ's manner of being and acting.

It seems also that Saint Paul was thinking of the Resurrection and not of the Incarnation in the beginning when he said that “it has pleased God the Father to make dwell in him the fullness” (Col 1.19), to make it dwell there “bodily” (Col 2.9), that is, it seems, in the body of the risen Christ [see L. Cerfaux, Christ in the Theology of St. Paul, tr. G. Webb and A. Walker (New York 1959) 427]. The term fullness (πλήρωμα, pleroma), borrowed here from popularized Stoicism [see J. Dupont, Gnosis (Bruges 1949) 453–76], designates the whole plenitude of being and of creative and saving power that is in God and, through God, in the world [see Theodori episcopi mopsuesteni in ep. b. Pauli commentarii, ed. H. B. Swete (Cambridge 1880 1:275–76)]. This divine and cosmic totality God was pleased to concentrate in Christ in raising Him from the dead [see P. Benoit, “Corps, tête et plérôme dans les ép. de la captivité,” Revue biblique 63 (1956) 31–44]. In this plenitude, Christ has become the summit and term of creation, but also the root where all begins (1 Cor 8.6; Col 1.16). For all men the end and salvation consist in participating in this plenitude (Col 2.9; Eph 1.23; 4.10, 13, 15).

This Lordship and plenitude make the Resurrection the eschatological event. It has already been seen that the power and the glory of the Lordship (Rom 1.4; 2 Thes 2.14) are eschatological attributes (1 Thes 2.12; 2 Thes 2.14). The divinization by the granting of the Name and the universal acclamation of the Resurrected (Phil 2.9–11) express the Parousia triumph of Christ. The text of Isaiah 45.23 used in Phil 2.10 to describe the paschal exaltation describes in Rom 14.11 the last judgment. The submission of the cosmic powers obtained in the glorification of Christ (Eph 1.20–21) is, according to 1 Cor 15.24–25, the effect of the final triumph. Thus it is established that the Resurrection constitutes the advent of the kingdom of heaven that Jesus had announced as near.

Scripture, however, recognizes multiple effects, ranged in time, of the unique Parousia—coming with Easter; in the Church (Jn 14.18–20); coming manifested by the destruction of Jerusalem, of the adversary who is already at work in Paul's time (2 Thes 2.6–8); etc. The theologian concludes from this that the final mystery, already realized in all its power in the sole Person of Christ, ought henceforth to be communicated to the Church and imposed on the world.

Spirit-Flesh Antithesis. The difference between the new being of Christ and His earthly being is expressed in the antithesis Spirit and flesh. The Spirit is the heavenly reality (Jn 3.3–5; 1 Cor 2.12; 1 Pt 1.12); in it resides the sanctity and power of God (Lk 1.35; Acts 1.8; 10.38; Rom 15.13, 19; 1 Thes 1.5); it is the vivifying “glory” of God, while carnal man deprived of the Spirit is said to be “deprived of the glory of God” (Rom 3.23). Glory, strength, Spirit are associated in many texts (see 1 Cor 15.43–45) and constitute one and the same reality. All that which defines God [power, life, holiness, spirituality (Jn 4.24), love] is proper to the Spirit: it is the expression of the divine transcendence and, for man, the gift of the Spirit is eschatological salvation (Rom 8.11, 23; Eph 1.13–14). The flesh, on the contrary, denotes man in an existence closed to God, deprived of the Spirit, a stranger to the kingdom (1 Cor 15.50).

Christ, then, who had lived according to the flesh (Rom 1.3) and “died by the flesh” and by its weakness, God has raised up by the power that is the Spirit (2 Cor 13.4; 1 Pt 3.18; Rom 8.11), by His glory (Rom 6.4) that is the Spirit. The divine resuscitating action is the total effusion of the Spirit, into which Christ was entirely transformed to the point of becoming Himself “a vivifying spirit” (1 Cor 15.45), in some way identified with the Spirit: “Now the Lord is the spirit” (2 Cor 3.17). Not that Christ, in the eyes of Saint Paul, would henceforth be an ethereal impersonal substance, as a liberal exegesis has claimed. It is the same Christ, previously asleep in death, who has “been awakened” (cf. Greek of Rom 4.25) and who “arose again” (ἀνάστασις). But the Spirit has communicated to Christ His own manner of divine being, and that is a profound mystery. In the context of 2 Cor 3.17, the Spirit was opposed to a written document (γράμμα), that is, to the ancient economy, devoid of vivifying substances (2 Cor 3.6); Christ who “is the spirit” is presented because of this as the concentration of all the vivifying, sanctifying, celestial reality that is the Spirit and of whom the rest, according to Col 2.17, was but a shadow projected by the body. Here is found the reaffirmation of the assumption of Christ in God, that “the plenitude” is in Him, that He has become the total and final reality; but with a more immediate reference to the salvation of men, for the Spirit is communication (2 Cor 13.13) and sanctification (2 Thes 2.13; 1 Cor 6.11). In this Christ-spirit, the vivifying action is essential to His being; he is the “vivifying spirit” (1 Cor 15.45), the communicative fullness (2 Cor 3.18). The unique effusion of the Spirit, concentrated on Christ, ought to reach all men, as the Resurrection of Christ was for them (2 Cor 5.15).

According to Saint John, the gift of the Spirit depends on the exaltation of Jesus (Jn 7.39; 16.7); for, on the one hand, the Spirit is the reality from on high (Jn 3.3, 5), and, on the other, it is the corporal humanity of Jesus that is the means of communion with celestial reality (the body is the rock from which springs forth the water of the Spirit, Jn 7.37–39; the bread of heavenly life, Jn 6.51; the temple of the New Testament, Jn 2.21). It was necessary that Jesus, even in the body, be exalted in the Father that from His immolated and celestial body there might spring forth the waters of the Spirit (see Jn 7.37–39; 19.34 and 20.22). On Easter, He gave the Spirit (Jn 20.22).

Relationship between the death and Resurrection. The glory of Christ is linked with His death by a necessary bond: it is the end of a movement accomplished in His death. Saint Luke speaks of a departure (Lk 9.31), of a taking up (Lk 9.51) to God; the Resurrection is the purpose of the death (Lk 24.26; Jn 10.17). For Saint John, the death is a passage (Jn 13.1, 3; 14.12; 16.5, 10, 28), a lifting up above the earth (Jn 3.14; 12.32), an ascension into heaven (Jn 3.13; 6.63; Rv 12.5). This ascension is not local, it is a transformation. Saint John mentions the points of departure and arrival: Jesus passed “from this world to the Father” (Jn 13.1). During His earthly existence, Jesus became adapted to this world, deprived of His glory (Jn 17.5), and, because of this, far removed from the Father. By His death, He entered into the bosom of His Father (Jn 13.32), into His glorious sanctity (Jn 17.1, 5, 19). The redeeming death is essentially divine exaltation of Jesus.

Justification. Saint Paul points out that the earthly existence of Jesus was in relation to sin. For this was an existence according to the flesh (Rom 1.3); and the flesh, closed to the spirit (Gal 5.17) and therefore to the vivifying holiness of God, is for this reason “a flesh of sin” (Rom 8.3) and of death (Rom 7.24). Although of a divine condition, Christ had been a man like others (Phil 2.7), subject to slavery (Phil 2.7), to that of the Law (Gal 4.4), in a flesh like to that of sin (Rom 8.3). “Made sin for us” (2 Cor 5.21) because of His flesh, He needed the holiness of the Spirit in which man is “justified” (1 Tm 3.16). His death was a death to the flesh, to sin (Rom 6.10), and to the Law (see Gal 2.19), because through it He entered into the holiness and power of the Spirit (Rom 1.4). The redeeming act constitutes a process of justification in Christ as well as of divinization (Rom 6.10).

Sacrifice. Considered as a sacrifice, Redemption appears as a giving by Christ of Himself (Eph 5.2). The Epistle to the Hebrews sees this giving as a movement that carries Christ from the earthly sphere (Heb 9.11–12) through the veil of His flesh (10.20) into the divine sanctuary. His entrance into the sanctuary and His sitting at the right hand of God (12.2) expresses a divinizing transformation that the Epistle calls “the consummation” (Heb 2.10; 5.9). According to Jn 17.19, the sacrifice is a “sanctification,” which transfers the victim from a profane existence into divine holiness. The glorification, then, pertains to the sacrifice: it is its result, the acceptance in God of the victim offered in death. It ought to be concluded that death for Christ constituted the entrance into total communion with God.

Summary. Consequently, the death is essentially related to the glorification, without which it would have no redemptive meaning, nor be a sacrifice; for a giving does not exist if it is not accepted, and a movement without a term is inconceivable. One understands, therefore, 1 Cor 15.17, “If Christ has not risen . . . you are still in your sins.”

Salvation was a personal drama with Christ. The effect of His death, the total object of His merit, was His Resurrection. It was He who, thanks to His death, was “saved from death” (Heb 5.7). For others, the death of Christ is advantageous because of the glory to which it leads (Heb 2.9; 5.9).

Redemptive merit is not understood according to the law of do ut des, but (cf. Saint Thomas, De ver. 29.7) as the physical and moral disposition to receive the gift of God. The death was total submission (Phil 2.8; Rom 5.19), complete disponibility for the divine plenitude; the purpose of the sufferings was to prepare this receptivity (Heb 2.10; 5.8). Thus the merit is in the death (Phil 2.9; Heb 2.9), and the Resurrection is the divine gift that corresponds to this receptivity. That is why, even in Saint John (Jn 12.28; 13.32; 17.1), the Resurrection is almost always the work of the Father.

The redemptive act was not a gift offered to God to appease Him. Since He is love, God took the initiative in saving (Jn 3.16; Eph 1.9). It is Jesus who welcomed the gift of God. Even if the sacrifice was a giving, it was a giving of self, that is, acceptance of the dominion of God. For sin means opposition to God, the refusal of His saving justice (Rom 10.3); the sinner is characterized by his withdrawal (Lk 15.4–20) and by the absence of God's glory in him (Rom 3.23) [see S. Lyonnet, De peccato et redemptione, v.1, De notione peccati (Rome 1957) 81–82, 90]. Christ satisfied divine justice, offended by the refusal to receive it, when He allowed Himself to be filled with it to the point of “becoming justice” (1 Cor 1.30). Expiation does not consist of compensatory suffering; according to Scripture, it is God who expiates, that is, wipes out sin [see L. Moraldi, Espiazione sacrificale e riti espiatori nell'ambiente biblico e nell'AT (Rome 1956) 265–66]. The Spirit of the Resurrection is the expiation of the sins of the world; He frees the flesh of sin (Jn 1.29 and 20.22–23).

In a theological system where Redemption is understood as a gift of infinite value made by Christ in compensation for offenses, the death is not necessary; it is even declared useless, since every action of Christ is of infinite value. If, because of scriptural evidence, one attributes salvation to death, it is not so much to death itself as to the circumstances that preceded it (suffering, etc.). In paschal theology, the death appears necessary, in keeping with Sacred Scripture; for salvation is God who gives Himself, and it is by death that Christ opened Himself to this infinite gift.

Relationship between the Resurrection and Incarnation. To say that the death was an entrance into total communion with God is to affirm that the Incarnation began in Christ a history whose termination was the Resurrection. The glory pertains to the definition of the Incarnation (Jn 1.14); now, although Christ experienced passing glorification on earth (Jn 2.11; 11.4), only the Hour brought Him the glory that was His (Jn 17.1–5). The definition of the Incarnation given in Jn 10.36 comprises two elements: the consecration by which Jesus is in God, and the mission that brought Him among men.

Now according to Jn 17.19, it is by death that Christ is consecrated in God; for, if by an initial consecration He is already in heaven, one with the Father (Jn 3.13; 10.30, 38), He must, nevertheless, still go to the Father (Jn 14.12) and ascend into heaven (Jn 6.63). On earth He is not then in His full truth, which is to be: “the Son in the bosom of the Father” (Jn 1.18).

As regards the mission: it is simultaneously to the world and to the death in which He is lifted up that, according to Jn 3.14–16, Christ is delivered up. His coming includes a departure: “I go away and I come” (Jn 14.28). He goes away in order to come.

In the same manner, the effects of salvation, proper to the Incarnation, are produced only in glory: by the Incarnation Jesus is the light that gives life to the faithful (Jn 8.12), but in His exaltation (Jn 3.14–15; 8.28; 17.1–3); by the Incarnation, He is the living font, bread from heaven, resurrection of the dead, but in His exaltation (cf. Jn 4.14 and 7.37–39; 6.33 and 6.63–64; 11.25 and 17.1–3). Scripture recognizes therefore a development of the mystery of the Incarnation in Christ.

Saint Paul says in turn that Christ “was constituted Son of God in power by the resurrection” (Rom 1.4); the resurrecting act of the Father is a divine generation (Acts 13.33). The Epistle to the Hebrews calls Christ Son of God, high priest according to the order of Melchizedek; it sees Him in His “consummation” (glorification). The affirmations of the Epistle to the Hebrews about the Incarnation concern in general Christ glorified (cf. Heb 5.5–6 and 5.9–10; 6.20).

It is therefore in the history of the Incarnation that Redemption was achieved: salvation is communion with God, by divine Incarnation, realized in its plenitude in the Resurrection. It would be the duty of theology to define this real progress of the Incarnation, in such a way that the truth of the divinity of Christ on earth would in no way be weakened.

Resurrection and Death Eternal Realities. Although because of its circumstances (empty tomb, apparitions, etc.) the Resurrection was included in history (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer, 3436; cf. 1 Cor 15.4), it is in itself an eschatological fact that remains ever present. For it is an action of divine plenitude [the granting of the Name (Phil 2.9), of the pleroma (Col 1.19; 2.9)]; it is the final consummation (Heb 2.10; 5.9), and therefore eternal. The texts that show in the Resurrection the blossoming of the divine filiation permit the theologian to understand Acts of the Apostles 13.33 in the deepest sense: “He has raised up Jesus, as it is written . . . ‘Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee.’” The Resurrection proceeds from the mystery of the eternal generation. Thus it is made clear that every follower who is united in Christ is “raised up with” Him (Col 2.12–13; Eph 2.5–6). For he is united to Him the moment the Father engenders Him; he becomes a new creature (2 Cor 4.16; 5.17; Col 3.10), he is born (Ti 3.5), because Christ, to whom he is united, is placed at the original point of His newness, in the filial beginning that is the Resurrection.

To this permanent vivification by God there corresponds a simultaneous permanence of the death. For Saint John, the term for “the exaltation above the earth” is the cross (Jn 12.32–33; 3.14); this is the eternal place of glorification [W. Thüsing, Die Erhöhung und Verherrlichung Jesu im Johannesevangelium (Münster 1960) 31–33]. It is then in death that Christ is glorified. The Hour when Christ’s destiny is accomplished is simultaneously death and glorification. The death is the moment of plenitude when “all is consummated” (Jn 19.30). In Jn 19.31–37 the image of the eternal Christ is presented. He is pierced through (v.37; 20.27), the lamb of which no bone is broken—for He is upright in death (Rv 5.6)—nevertheless, a lamb forever immolated (ibid.). From His side flow together the blood of immolation and the water, symbol of the Spirit of glory (Jn 7.37–39). It is thus that He will be eternally seen (Jn 19.37; Rv 1.7; 5.6). Never has Christ been healed of His mortal wounds (Jn 20.20, 27); the faithful steep their garments in His blood (Rv 7.14), receive the sprinkling of His blood (Heb 12.24; 1 Pt 1.2). In the narrative of the Last Supper, the heavenly banquet, celebrated in the joy of a new wine, is illustrated by the Eucharist, where the immolated Christ is offered as food. Heb 8.1–5 supposes an eternal sacrifice. According to Saint Paul, whoever enters into communion with Christ dies with Him (Rom 6.3) and also “rises with” Him. All this proves that death is integrated into the glory of Christ.

The perdurance of the death is explained by the connection of the death to the Resurrection. The death is meritorious of glory, disponibility in relation to the divine plenitude; it is a gift made to God at the moment that this giving becomes a reality, that is, in God’s glorifying acceptance of it; it is the end of Christ’s carnal state through its transformation into the spiritual state. That is why it does not precede, in time, glorification but coincides with it (first of all with the glorification of His soul, into which His body is then drawn). Now the glorification is a permanent actuality; it therefore maintains Christ in the redemptive death with which it coincides, in His disponibility for glory, at the summit of His giving.

Fullness of Incarnation. The paschal mystery is in every sense the fullness of the Incarnation. Even in His corporal humanity, Christ is entirely begotten by the Father; He is relation to the Father, situated as He is at the height of His offering; He is transformed into the Spirit in which the divine attributes are expressed, and even in His humanity He is the font of the Spirit (Jn 7.37–39). Because the death and Resurrection are the affirmation of the divine filiation, it is there that Jesus is beloved of the Father (Jn 10.17); it is there (Acts 13.33) or in the anticipation of the paschal mystery (baptism, Transfiguration) that He is proclaimed the beloved Son. It seems that the death was virtually included in the Incarnation from the beginning; according to Phil 2.7–8, it was the ultimate expression of the initial despoilment. For since this despoilment meant submission to God, it pertained to the Incarnation. At its end, but also, it seems, at its beginning, the Incarnation is a mystery of death and glory.

SALVATION COMMUNICATED TO MEN

In addition to the texts concerning Christ as constituted universal savior by the Resurrection (objective Redemption, treated above), there are other texts concerning the integration of men into this principle of salvation (subjective Redemption). Salvation is realized in Christ alone, with whom it is identified (1 Cor 1.30); men will not be saved except by communion with Christ in this salvation. These texts show that the paschal Christ has become communicable to men, that the Church is the Body of Christ in the paschal mystery, that salvation is attained by means of communion with the paschal mystery, that the eschatological realities are the plenitude of communion with the paschal mystery, and that all creation takes part in the paschal mystery.

Christ Glorious in condition of communicating Himself. The Resurrection that brought about salvation in Christ also puts this salvation at the disposal of men. While remaining an individual being, Jesus henceforth is continually communicating Himself. In the Synoptic Gospels, He appears in His glorious coming as a “corporate personality,” in the strongest sense of the term; He contains in Himself the kingdom (cf. Mt 26.64 and Dn chapter 7). The narrative of the Last Supper shows this kingdom united in a paschal repast, of which the Eucharistic communion is the Sacrament on earth. Less explicit, the Acts of the Apostles says, however, that Christ is risen for men and sent to men (Acts 3.26; 26.23), that He has become the author of life (Acts 3.15) and cornerstone of the house (Acts 4.11). According to Saint Paul, Christ was raised up for men (2 Cor 5.15), “for our justification” (Rom 4.25), which seems to mean that the resuscitative action of God was destined to effect men’s salvation. Formerly limited by His body to one race, Jesus became a universal being, capable of uniting the multitude in Himself (Gal 3.28; Col 3.11), a new Adam, father of eschatological humanity (1 Cor 15.45–49). His Lordship is ordered to the Church (Eph 1.22). The title Head comes to Christ through the Resurrection (Col 1.18) and refers to an organic bond with the Church. The Spirit is communion; transforming Christ, it makes Him “a life-giving spirit” (1 Cor 15.45), of which the essence is to give life.

According to Saint John, Christ “comes” hereafter to His disciples; He draws them to Himself in His exaltation (Jn 12.32). Formerly a solitary grain, now a full ear of wheat (Jn 12.24), He becomes the temple of the new people (Jn 2.19–21). He is open to the faithful by His very being, just as the being of the Father is open to the Son (Jn 14.20). His transcendence, which is expressed in the formula "I Am" is salutary in itself. Ordinarily this divine name was coupled with a predicate that emphasized its soteriological character: "I Am the resurrection (Jn 11.25), the bread of life (Jn 6.35), the true vine (Jn 15.1). . . ." But it is in the lifting up that this (Jn 8.28) and its salutary character are affirmed. It is then that Jesus is the bread eaten (Jn 6.51, 63–64) and that the vine bears those fruits in which the glory of God takes concrete form (cf. Jn 15.5 and 8; 12.24–28). Henceforth His disciples are His brothers, sons of His Father (Jn 20.17). The glorious Christ is savior by His very being.

Church, Body of Christ Dead and Risen Again.

The resuscitating action of God that makes Christ communicable is thus creative of the Church. The latter is like the space in which Christ exists and lives; it is filled with Him (Eph 1.23; Col 2.9; 3.11), so much so that it is identified with His risen humanity and is called the "body of Christ." The interpretation that sees in 1 Cor 12.12–13 (cf. Rom 6.3; Gal 3.27–28); 1 Cor 6.15–17; 10.16–17; and also Eph 1.23; 5.28–32 a union identifying the faithful with the physical and "spiritual" body of Christ appears exegetically certain and is in accord with patristic thinking, especially when it considers the Church, as does Saint Paul [1 Cor 10.16–17; 11.25: "this cup is the New Establishment (see Jer 31.31; Is 42.6; 49.8)] in the perspective of the Eucharist. It is the Spirit (Rom 8.9–10; 1 Cor 12.13) of the Resurrection that integrates the faithful with the Body of Christ, in one communion of being (Rom 6.5; 12.5; Gal 3.27–28) and of life (Rom 6.11, 23), which Saint Paul ordinarily designates by the phrase "in Christ" or "Christ in us." Having become one Body with Christ, they are also "one spirit" (1 Cor 6.17) with Him who is "spirit," benefiting by the effusion of the Spirit that has resuscitated Him. They are sons of Abraham through incorporation in his Offspring, inheriting His blessing actualized in the Resurrection (Acts 3.25–26), which is the Spirit (Gal 3.14). Thus salvation realized in Christ becomes in turn personal for them.

This incorporation is also an association with the salvation present in its actuality in Christ. The believer is seized by the resuscitating action of God (Eph 2.5; Col 2.13). He is overcome by it in communion with the very death of Christ (Rom 6.3–4; Col 2.12). He communes with the redeeming act that historically is placed in the time of Pontius Pilate and that he encounters in its actuality in Christ glorified. While distinguishing between objective and subjective Redemption, paschal theology considers the latter as a communion with the former.

Christian existence is thus located in the mystery of the Redemption (Rom 6.3–11; 8.17; 2 Cor 4.10–12; Gal

2.19–20; Phil 3.10; 2 Tm 2.11); the Church is the Body of Christ in the redemptive mystery.

Man saved is a new creature (2 Cor 5.17; Eph 2.15; 4.24) created in the Resurrection of Christ. This means that he belongs to a new genus: a child of God (Gal 3.26–27) in Christ made "the Son of God by the Resurrection" (Rom 1.4), dead to the flesh (Rom 8.9) and freed from sin (Rom 8.1), because he has been given life in the Spirit (Rom 8.2). This also means that he is a brand-new creature, in a fresh newness of being, his newness being the opposite to his old self (Rom 6.4–6; 7.6). Christian by birth in the Spirit (Ti 3.5), who is absolute newness and plenitude, he does not swerve from what he is by his birth, as he is under the action of God, who raised up Christ; he advances in this newness (2 Cor 4.16) unto the day when he arrives at adulthood by total birth, in the Resurrection of Christ.

The ethical situation of the believer is also new. Incorporated in the risen Christ, he is freed from the earthly Law and subjected to the source of the risen life, the Spirit (Rom 7.1–6); this is the moral law of the New Testament (Rom 8.2; Saint Thomas Aquinas, In epist. ad Rom. 8 lect. 1; Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 106.1). While containing both the Mosaic and the natural law, this law is different: contrary to the Mosaic Law, imposed from outside, it is immanent in the faithful (Rom 5.5); contrary to the law of nature, it is transcendent, being the holiness of God; contrary to both one and the other, it is a law of evolution, of a physical supernatural transformation, for it is a law of resurrection in the death of the flesh (Rom 6.2–5; Col 3.1–4). The moral effort roused by the Spirit of the Resurrection (Rom 8.13; Gal 5.16) seeks to extend through "the earthly members" the mysterious transformation realized in Baptism (Col 3.1–5) and prepares the final resurrection (Rom 6.2–8). Before being an obligation, this law is a salutary gift; it is therefore beatifying in itself. Since it is the Holy Spirit, it is the love and power of God; that is why moral effort is not the affirmation of man but his gift of self and acquiescence with the resuscitating action of God. Charity is the adequate expression of this law; it expresses communion with Christ in one Body, death to selfish flesh, the life of the Spirit of love. It is "the new commandment," i.e., eschatological, "the law of Christ," who, in death to Himself, has been given to God for the multitude in the love of the Spirit.

Means of communion with paschal mystery. To give to men the salvation that exists in Him, Christ has created means of communion with the paschal mystery.

The Apostles are created as such in the paschal mystery (Jn 17.19; 20.21–22; Gal 1.1); they are sent forth from the time Christ is glorified (Mt 28.18–19; Lk 24.46–47), and filled with the Spirit (Acts 1.8; Jn 20.22; cf. 7.37–39), they proclaim the risen Christ (Acts 1.22; 2.32; 4.33) and His death (1 Cor 1.23). While Christ, pre-eminent Apostle (Heb 3.1), is no longer connaturally present in the world (cf. Acts 10.41), precisely from the moment of His essential sending through His Resurrection (Acts 3.26; 26.23), the Apostles become by their word and their person the organs of His presence in the world and of His contact in the death and Resurrection (2 Cor 4.6–12; 13.4). Through them, men enter into communion with Christ dead and risen again (Rom 10.8–10; 2 Cor 2.15–16; Col 1.25–29).

All the Sacraments draw their strength from the paschal mystery [Vatican II, Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy 61; Acta Apostolicae Sedis 56 (1964) 116–17]. The two Sacraments of which Scripture speaks more explicitly, Baptism and the Holy Eucharist, sanctify insofar as they are means of communion with Christ in His paschal mystery. By Baptism man submits to the action of the Spirit (1 Cor 6.11), of whom the water is the symbol (Is 32.15; 44.3–4; Jn 3.5; Ti 3.5). This Spirit is given in union with Christ (cf. Jn 9.7 and 7.37–39) in one Body (Rom 6.3, 5; Gal 3.27; 1 Cor 12.13) and by participation in His Resurrection in one same death (Rom 6.3–11; Col 2.11–13; the sprinkling of His blood, spoken of in 1 Pt 1.2 and Heb 10.22 is related to Baptism).

The Eucharist is, from all evidence, paschal communion. The faithful eat the body of Christ and turn into it (1 Cor 10.16–17). This body is immolated (1 Cor 11.24–26; Jn 6.52) but also glorified in the Spirit (a spiritual food, 1 Cor 10.3–4; Jn 6.63–64), every sacrificial repast supposing the preliminary “sanctification” of the victim. Since Christ, because of His glorification, continues in an enduring way in the supreme moment of His sacrifice (for His death coincides with this always actual glorification and is eternalized by it), the Eucharistic celebration is the very sacrifice of Christ, the unique sacrifice, made sacramentally present to the Church. Thus the Church, which communicates with the body of Christ, becomes itself the Body of Christ in His sacrifice.

These Sacraments, and especially the Eucharist, which, as Sacrament of the kingdom, throws light on all Christian reality, place before the theologian the question of whether all the Sacraments do not act except as means of communion in the paschal mystery. The remission of sin, for example, is achieved, according to Scripture, not by the application of the merits of Christ (with application understood in a juridic sense), but by communion with Him in His death and Resurrection.

Man engages himself by faith in the paschal mystery that is offered to him by means of the Apostles and the Sacraments. The object of faith is not in the first place a complex of doctrines but rather God, who has raised up Jesus for men (Rom 4.24; 10.9; Col 2.12; 1 Pt 1.21), and the risen Christ, in whom is revealed (Jn 17.1–3; Col 1.15) this God who saves. As regards the doctrinal complex, it is developed by reflection on the paschal mystery in which it is contained [cf. O. Cullmann, Les Premières confessions de foi chrétiennes (Paris 1948)]. The believer confesses that “Jesus is Kyrios” (Rom 10.9; 1 Cor 12.3; Phil 2.11). Christ, in His Resurrection, is so truly the essential object of faith that if the Resurrection had not taken place faith would be without content and efficacy (1 Cor 15.14); its efficacy stems from its content, and the latter is the Resurrection that justifies men (Rom 4.24–25). The believer says yes to God, who reveals Himself by resuscitating Christ for men, and thus submits to the action of God, who raises him up with Christ (Col 2.12) in the death of the flesh (Phil 3.8–11). Faith is itself the effect of this glory (cf. Jn 3.14–16 and 12.32) that justifies men (Rom 4.25), making believers of them.

This assent to salvation is continued by moral effort. The ultimate means of receiving strength from the Resurrection are, according to Saint Paul, weakness (2 Cor 12.9), suffering (2 Cor 4.10–12), and death (2 Tm 2.11). The faithful die with Christ (2 Tm 2.11), “leaving the world for God” (Saint Ignatius of Antioch, Pros Romanios 2.2, cf. 6.1; The Fathers of the Church: A New Translation, ed. R. J. Deferrari et al., 109, 110).

Full realization in the Church of paschal mystery.

At the Parousia, the Church will participate in the fullness of salvation realized in the Resurrection of Christ (2 Thes 2.14). The difference between Easter and the Parousia is not to be found in Christ, to whose power the latter adds nothing, but in the Church, for which Easter was a beginning and a hope, and the Parousia the full realization. All eschatological events are to be found ontologically in the mystery of the Resurrection.

Resurrection of the Faithful. Constituting the inevitable consequence of the resuscitating action of God in Christ is the resurrection of the faithful. The glory of Christ has such necessary ecclesial dimensions that to deny the resurrection of the faithful would be to deny that of Christ (1 Cor 15.13). The glorification of the faithful does not demand a new display of power: they are risen by INCORPORATION IN CHRIST (Rom 6.5), “together with” Him (2 Tm 2.11). For the resuscitating intervention of God is unique and applies to Christ. In Baptism, the faithful have been “resuscitated with” by an initial gift of the Spirit that calls for the complete gift, the Redemption of the body (Rom 8.11, 23; Eph 1.13–14). Now they are subjected according to their whole being to the “power [that effects] the resurrection of Christ” (Phil 3.10), absorbed in the eschatological mystery.

With the resurrection of the faithful, the action of God in Christ has attained its effects. For the end of this action is the salvation of the Church (Rom 4.25; 2 Cor 5.15; Eph 1.18–23). This salvation, then, is henceforth complete: the filiation is perfect (Rom 8.19, 23); formerly hindered by the body (1 Cor 15.50), the sons have entered into their heritage; the Church realizes in perfection its definition as the Body of Christ, the repository of His riches (Eph 1.23; cf. 4.13). By His victory over “the last enemy,” death, Christ has imposed His dominion on the entire world (1 Cor 15.25–26).

Cosmic Unity. The other effects of the Parousia are obtained by this resuscitating action that bestows final salvation on the faithful. The material universe is freed from “corruption,” thanks to the “revelation of the sons of God,” for its Fall was in man, and its Redemption consists in enjoyment of the “liberty of the glory of the children of God” (Rom 8.19–22). The harmful Powers have been overcome (1 Cor 15.24), for it was in men and their universe incompletely saved that these Powers were able to set themselves against the Lordship of Christ. In Christ, cosmic unity (Col 1.20) and submission of the Powers (Eph 1.21–22) were already realized; they remained incomplete, however, because the resurrection of the Church was not achieved. The Church is, with Christ, the crucible of the eschatological transformation of the world; the Parousia that determines the destiny of the world is the paschal mystery totally communicated to the Church.

Judgment. It seems that the last judgment should be included in this ultimate saving intervention of God. This judgment had been announced as an event to be realized at the coming of Christ (Mt 3.11–12). Several texts suggest or affirm that it was pronounced in the coming of Christ, which is nothing else than His glorification. In Mt 26.64, Jesus announces His glorification while evoking Daniel chapter 7 and Psalms 109 (110).1, where the judgment of God is described; Acts of the Apostles (10.41–42; 17.31) brings the Resurrection of Jesus and the final judgment together; for John (12.31) Jesus’ Hour is that of His exaltation and last judgment. In fact, according to Scripture, the JUSTICE OF GOD is His holiness and saving power (in the New Testament it is, in the final analysis, the Holy Spirit Himself who is holiness and saving power); it does not operate according to legal procedure but by creating justice, that is, by creating salvation in men. In the Resurrection, all the justifying power of God has burst forth, so that “justified in the Spirit” (1 Tm 3.16), Christ Himself becomes the justice of God (1 Cor 1.30). Henceforth the justice of God is also exerted over other men: it makes them just in their union with Christ (Rom 3.21–26; 8.1). It is exerted at the present time (Rom 3.21), but the fullness of this salvation is reserved for the end (Gal 5.5). It is exerted by vivification, as in Christ; the believer is always judged by passing from death to life (Jn 5.24). That is why Saint John does not separate justifying power from the vivifying power of Christ (5.21–29). According to Saint Paul, the justice of the Day effects final salvation (Gal 5.5) that, as is known, is identical with the Resurrection. To account for these elements (the last judgment realized in the glorification of Christ, the vivifying effect of justice, the saving character of the Day for the faithful), theology does not look upon the judgment of the faithful as if it were a human trial; theology situates it in the justifying action of God, who raises up the dead together with Christ (see JUDGMENT, DIVINE).

Punishment and Reward. Those who have “rebelled against justice” (Rom 10.3) are condemned by this justice of salvation—by being excluded from justice, from the Spirit, and from the kingdom (cf. Gal 6.8; 1 Cor 15.50). This condemnation is not merely privation; the Lord has subdued all with His power (1 Cor 15.25; 2 Thes 1.8–9), leading the world toward its end, the risen Christ (cf. Col 1.16, 20). It is in His redeeming Lordship, in the power of His saving Resurrection (Summa theologiae 3a, 56.1 ad 3), as Son of Man (Jn 5.27) who has no power of condemnation (Jn 3.17; 12.47), that Christ raises up those “who have done evil” (Jn 5.29). For them the effect of the supreme action of salvation will be a resurrection of damnation (Jn 5.29; cf. Dn 12.2): opposed to the salvation of which they will nevertheless be created by the resuscitating power of Christ, they will exist in total contradiction to their own being. Thus hell would appear to be an effect of the salvific power of the risen Christ and of the refusal set against this power.

The theology of heaven ought to be developed beginning with the notion of the kingdom. The latter is a personal reality to Christ, who did not enter there as into a place; His entry into heaven is identical with His glorification. Men’s heaven is in Christ glorified. They enter into it through the paschal communion. Thus the kingdom appears in the narrative of the Last Supper: a paschal banquet of the faithful with Christ (Lk 22.15). This explains why Saint Paul and Saint John do not distinguish the Ascension of Christ from His glorification; why men could not enter heaven before Christ’s glorification (Heb 11.40), but do enter it as soon as they participate in His glory (Lk 23.43; cf. Saint Ambrose, Expositio in Lucam 10; Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 32.4:500). They are “in heaven” insofar as, living “in Christ,” they have “risen with him” (Eph 2.6). Already in the Church, particularly in the Eucharistic celebration, they participate in this banquet of the immolated and glorified body that without a veil they will celebrate in the heavenly kingdom (cf. Enchiridion symbolorum 1649; Ignatius of Antioch, Pros Romaious 7.3).

Resurrection of Christ and creation of the world.

In its eschatological form, the world is then created by the action of God who raises up Christ. Being all fullness Himself (Col 1.19), Christ "fills" the Church to the highest degree (Eph 1.23; Col 2.9) and beyond it the universe (Eph 4.10). This dominion over the world is exerted over the being of things, His Lordship being that of God Himself (Phil 2.9). Saint Paul expressly recognizes in Christ a creative causality (1 Cor 8.6). This is not exerted only on the world at its term, but also in its progress toward its term. "The beloved Son . . . image of the invisible God, firstborn of all creation, in whom and for whom all is created" (Col 1.14–16), is not the Word in His preexistence but Christ in His glory. If it is true that "all fullness" of being and of power has come to abide in Him (Col 1.19), nothing then could exist except in dependence on Christ. This causality does not include any chronological priority over creation; the glorified Christ is, on the contrary, the final term of the world. The theologian ought to understand the creative action of God in Christ after the manner of a call, of an attraction to final plenitude. We have recognized in the Resurrection the mystery of the Incarnation in its achievement. Dependent on Christ's glory, creation depends on the mystery of the Incarnation; it is in His divine glorious birth, where He is entirely assumed into the mystery of the Word, that Christ is the primordial source of the world. We also know that the glory of Christ is essentially redemptive, that the cosmic Lordship is affirmed in death. It seems, then, that the mystery of creation is to be found in that of Redemption.

Conclusion. The study of the Resurrection has taught us that salvation is none other than God who communicates Himself. He communicates Himself in Jesus by the Incarnation and when this Incarnation has arrived at its plenitude through the death. This salvation realized in Christ is extended to men in their union with Christ. Man's work is to consent, with Christ in His death, to the saving gift of God.

Mystery of communion, the Resurrection is also a ferment of unity for Christian thought. Source and center of the theology of apostolic times, it very soon lost its central place because there was not seen in it the eschatological event, the plenitude of salvation; furthermore the death of Christ began to be considered as a payment of debt and not as an entrance into communion; it was isolated from the Resurrection and had imputed to it alone a redemptive role. The role attributed to the Resurrection reduced it henceforth to prolonging the mediatory existence of Christ, to being an exemplary cause of justification and the motive of credibility of faith [cf. D. M. Stanley, Ad. historiam exegeteos Rom. 4.25, Verbum Domini 29 (1951) 261, 258, 274]. To Saint Thomas belongs, nevertheless, the credit for seeing in the Resurrection the instrumental efficient cause of the resurrection of souls and bodies (In epist. ad Rom. 4 lect. 3; Summa theologiae 3a, 56.1–2). The misunderstanding of the central reality was no doubt the cause of the parceling out of theological thought, and it will no doubt be one of the benefits of the theology of the Resurrection to restore this thought to unity. "There are many things," says Saint Thomas, "to be meditated on in Him [Christ] but especially the Resurrection; everything is ordered to it, particularly the whole economy of the Christian religion" (In epist. 2 ad Tim. 2 lect. 2).

See Also: ESCHATOLOGY, ARTICLES ON; JESUS CHRIST, ARTICLES ON; MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST; PASSION OF CHRIST, II (THEOLOGY OF); REDEMPTION; RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD; SACRIFICE OF THE CROSS; SATISFACTION OF CHRIST; SOTERIOLOGY.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique: Tables générales, ed. A. VACANT et. al. 2:2553–54, 2598–2655. J. SCHMITT and K. RAHNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 1:1028–35, 1038–41. R. MARLÉ and A. KOLPING, Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe, ed. H. FRIES 1:130–45. J. COMBLIN, La Résurrection de Jésus-Christ (Paris 1959). C. DE CONDREN, The Eternal Sacrifice, tr. A. J. MONTEITH (London 1906). F. X. DURRWELL, The Resurrection: A Biblical Study, tr. R. SHEED (New York 1960). N. FUGLISTER, Die Heilsbedeutung des Pascha (Munich 1963). G. KOCH, Die Auferstehung Jesu-Christi (Tübingen 1959). W. KÜNNETH, Theologie der Auferstehung (4th ed. Munich 1951). A. M. RAMSEY, The Resurrection of Christ (Philadelphia 1946; rev. ed. London 1961). K. H. RENGSTORF, Die Auferstehung Jesu: Form, Art und Sinn der urchristlichen Osterbotschaft (Witten 1952). J. SCHMITT, Jésus ressuscité dans la prédication apostolique (Paris 1949). D. M. STANLEY, Christ's Resurrection in Pauline Soteriology (Analecta biblica 13; 1961). "Christus victor mortis," papers of the third Theology Week at the Gregorian University, in Gregorianum 39 (1958) 201–524. F. HOLTZ, "La Valeur sotériologique de la résurrection du Christ selon s. Thomas," Ephemerides theologicae Lovanienses 29 (1953) 609–45. K. RAHNER, "Dogmatische Fragen zur Osterfrömmigkeit," in Schriften zur Theologie 4 (Einsiedeln 1960) 157–72. B. VAWTER, "Resurrection and Redemption," The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 15 (1953) 11–23.

[F. X. DURRWELL]

RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD

This article discusses the resurrection of the dead as it is taught in the Bible and in theology.

1. IN THE BIBLE

In the Apostles' Creed the Christian professes faith in the resurrection in two distinct, but intimately connected, articles: “the third day He arose again from the dead;” and “I believe . . . the resurrection of the body.” The latter is the subject of this section, which discusses: (1) the biblical use of the term “resurrection”; (2) the basis and background of this belief in the Old Testament (OT); (3) the OT doctrine on the resurrection; and (4) the faith of the New Testament (NT) in the resurrection of the dead.

“The Raising of Lazarus” by Rembrandt van Rijn. (©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

Biblical Use of Term. The teaching of the OT on man rests upon the definition of him given in the creation narrative of Gn 2.7. A creature whose life is the exclusive gift of God, whose body and spirit come from God, man remains always for the Israelite mind a “living being,” a total whole. Consequently, man in the Bible is not thought of as that composite entity so familiar to Greek anthropology, but is viewed rather as a totality.

A normal consequence of this totality is the fact that the biblical notion of the resurrection is in no way comparable to the Greek idea of immortality. It was precisely the Hebrew conception of the body and the Hebrew notion of life that provided a favorable soil for the later development of the doctrine of the resurrection. In the biblical framework of ideas, the whole person falls into the power of death; and, if there is any possibility of deliverance from its power, then the formulation of such a possibility would have to be not in terms of the natural immortality of the soul but in the affirmation of a belief in a supernatural deliverance of the whole person from the implacable dominion of death.

To investigate such a belief in the OT, it must be borne in mind that there is no one biblical term reserved for resurrection and that such words actually used to convey the idea are often ambiguous, particularly so in the Hebrew of the Masoretic Text. Thus, for example, the NT uses two basic verbs for resurrection: ἀνιστάναι and ἐγείρειν. Both verbs do occur in the Septuagint (LXX); the former as an equivalent of no less than 14 and the latter of some 17 various Hebrew verbs or verb forms. The use of the substantive ἀνάστασις is quite frequent in the NT (occurring 42 times there as against six times in the LXX) and gives us some indication of the preponderance and importance of the notion in Christian revelation. Such statistical indications, however, could be misleading, especially in the OT, where, aside from the fact that we have to deal with both the Hebrew of the Masoretic Text and the Greek of the LXX, we have to keep constantly in mind that a hope, as it arises and hesitantly seeks precision, rarely, if ever, finds distinct, technical formulations to express its object.

Basis and Background of the Belief. The vernal rebirth of nature and the cyclic succession of death and life formed the basis of naturalistic cults in the ancient Near East. It is not surprising to see among the cultic elements that constituted the celebration of the seasonal pattern in the ancient world the element of the return of a dead god to life. This is so, for instance, in the cults of TAMMUZ in Babylon, of Osiris in Egypt (see ISIS AND OSIRIS), of the Hittite Telipinu and the Canaanite BAAL. The communal import of such rituals in agricultural and pastoral communities is readily understandable; for, in the mind of their peoples, the religious dramatization of seasonal recurrences assured the very efficacy of the cycle of death and life that was so essential for survival.

Dying and Rising Gods. Of course, it is not at all surprising that Israel, living in such close contact with its neighbors, should have known of the cults of a god who died and rose annually. Israel’s history bears all too unmistakably the marks of such abominations as the idolatrous service of “the Baals and the Ashtaroths, the gods of Aram, the gods of Sidon, the gods of Moab, the gods of the Ammonites and the gods of the Philistines” (Jgs 10.6; see also 11.30–40).

The terebinths and the groves (Is 1.29), the pagan plants and the foreign vine slips (Is 17.10), the cakes for the queen of heaven and the libations poured out to strange gods (Jer 7.18), consort with harlots and the offering of sacrifice with prostitutes (Hos 4.14), the women who weep for Tammuz (Ez 8.14), and the god in whom women delight (Dn 11.37)—all bear eloquent witness to the noxious extent of Israel’s contact with its neighbors, to say nothing of the compelling fascination that fertility cults exerted upon the Israelites. Nor were the trials of the Babylonian Exile sufficient to exorcize that “rebellious people, who walk in evil paths . . . offering sacrifices in the groves and burning incense on bricks, living among graves and spending the night in caverns” (Is 65.2–4).

Israel’s Reaction. But the very abomination of such practices is guarantee against the adoption of their underlying beliefs as a basis for the formulation of a doctrine on the resurrection. It seems a truism to say that the errant ways of Israel were not enshrined into a theological doctrine by the sacred authors. However intimate Israel’s contact with its neighbors, the possibility of their resurrection myths directly influencing OT doctrine on the subject seems quite remote. The prophets’ vigilant fulminations against idolatry, the periodic purges of religious cult and practice, and the grim procession of national tragedies do not make such direct influence on the actual doctrine very likely. Nevertheless, the possibility of a negative influence by way of reaction against the idolatrous cults, by a greater stress on Yahweh’s dominion over life and death, is more likely and cannot be dismissed. Nor, of course, can linguistic borrowings be wholly discounted.

From the very beginning, OT monotheism makes a clear break with the ambient mythologies and their accompanying rituals. Too hasty identification of similarities in expression, too facile establishment of causal nexus between Israel's faith and its neighbors' beliefs cannot but be disastrous. (See P. Follet's mordant but hardly unjustified criticism of T. Gaster's Thespis in Biblica 33 [1952] 139–142.) The immutable principle of the OT is the unique God's total dominion over life and death: "I alone am God. . . . It is I who bring both death and life" (Dt 32.39; and see 1 Sm 2.6 and the triumphant monotheism of the "Book of Consolation," Is 40–55). This principle is defended against the almost irresistible onslaught of idolatry and idolatrous practices; and its defense could well have been the basis of a still more important assertion for our purpose, namely, Yahweh's power over Sheol itself. "The nether world and the abyss lie open before the Lord" (Prv 15.11; Jb 26.5–6; Am 9.2; Ps 138[139].8; and cf. Jer 23.23–24).

Persian Influence. There is yet another source of influence that, though perhaps quite real and direct, is not at all easy to assess. The relations of the Jews with their Persian rulers were excellent, as is attested by Ezra and Nehemiah. Moreover, although preexilic texts favoring subsequent development are not altogether lacking, still OT doctrine on the resurrection does show remarkable progress after contact of the Jews with the Persians. Of them it has been said, "Outside of Judaism and Christianity, it is impossible to find in antiquity so true, so noble, so ideal a belief in the resurrection of the body . . . as is to be found in the scriptures of Ancient Iran" (A. V. W. Jackson, Zoroastrian Studies: The Iranian Religion and Various Monographs [New York 1928] 3). At the start of the twentieth century, W. Bousset judged Iran's influence on Jewish belief in the resurrection as primordial (Die Religion des Judentums [Göttingen 1902; 3d ed. 1926] 507–517); and, at mid-century, H. Birkeland asserted the same opinion. (See PERSIAN RELIGION, ANCIENT.) The question, however, is not as simple today as it seemed to Bousset; and the problem at present is by no means solved.

It is quite easy to see in Zoroastrianism, for example, the mortal combat between the good principle, AHURA MAZDA, and the evil spirit, Ahriman, ending on the last day in the triumph of good, the annihilation of evil, and the general resurrection of the dead. (See ZOROASTER [ZARATHUSHTRA].) What is not easy at all to determine is the time at which various parts of Iran's religious corpus were written or the exact religion of the Achaemenian monarchs to whom the Jews were subject (see H. S. Nyberg, Die Religion des alten Iran [Leipzig 1938]; J. Duchesne-Guillemin, La religion de l'Iran ancien [Paris 1962]; E. Herzfeld, "Die Religion der Achaemeniden," Revue de l'histoire des religions 113 [1936] 21–41). Until such questions receive the precise answers they deserve, a greater caution must be exercised in determining the extent of Jewish borrowings from the Iranian doctrine of the resurrection.

Old Testament Doctrine. The life of man, prized as a good above all goods, was acknowledged by Israel as God's gift to man, a gift totally dependent upon Him. Though death was accepted as a normal fact, as man's appointed end, it was no less under God's dominion than life itself, for "the Lord killeth and maketh alive: he bringeth down to hell and bringeth back again" (1 Sm 2.6; see also Dt 32.39 and Tb 13.2). This dominion of Yahweh was manifested in Elijah's raising of the widow's son to life (1 Kgs 17.17–24), the similar miracle worked by Elisha (2 Kgs 4.31–37), and the more marvelous one worked by Elisha's bones (13.21).

God as Savior. Yahweh's dominion over life and death was no less evident in His power to heal man's illness, to cure his ills, and to deliver him from his enemies. Various Psalms uttered in times of distress and sickness call upon this power of God (Ps 3; 31 [32]; 37 [38]; 101 [102]). They acknowledge His might that brings up from the netherworld and preserves from going down into the pit, rescues from the depths of Sheol and redeems life from destruction, bestows upon man the gifts of life and health (Ps 29 [30].4; 85 [86].13; 102 [103].3–4; and see Is 38.17). Yet, however wondrous those divine deeds were, they remained but a temporary reprieve from the dark and inevitable reign of death. A far more beatific lot was that of Enoch who "walked with God and was seen no more, because God took him" (Gn 5.24; cf. Hb 11.5), and that of Elijah who was taken up to heaven in a fiery chariot (2 Kgs 2.11).

Union with Yahweh remained an end desired by the just: "with you I shall always be . . . in the end you will receive me in glory" (Ps 72 [73].23–24). "God will redeem me from the power of the nether world by receiving me" (48 [49].16). From the midst of his distress, the Psalmist calls upon Yahweh and is delivered from "the breakers of death . . . the destroying floods . . . the cords of the nether world . . . the snares of death" (17 [18].5–7). Upon this might of Yahweh was founded the hope of final union with Him, the expectation of being always "before his face." The Psalm that best expresses this confidence in Him who "will not abandon my soul to the nether world, nor will you suffer your faithful one to undergo corruption" (15 [16].10) proves in its Greek version to be an invaluable aid for the Apostolic preaching of the Resurrection of Christ (Acts 2.25–31; 13.34–37).

It will be noted, especially in the Psalms cited above, that this divine tutelage over life and death is a soteriologic-ical function. Just as sickness and death are seen in a larger context of sin, so too healing and life are seen in a context of salvation. This salvation was generally regarded in the beginning as the deliverance of a people, a communal event; and, understandably enough, the initial attempts to express this people's hope in the resurrection exhibit the same characteristics. (See SALVATION HISTORY [HEILSGESCHICHTE].)

Resurrection in the Prophets. The OT employs a series of prophetic texts to translate this collective hope of Israel into some sort of comprehensive image. Thus, Hosea's "on the third day he will raise us up, to live in his presence" (6.2; and see 13.14) can rightly be described as a völkisch-nationale Wiederherstellung (Botterweck in Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 1:1044), for it does see this recall to life as a national conversion to Yahweh. Similarly, death and destruction are seen as the nation's afflictions for its sins and infidelities toward Him (see Is 1.5–9). The hope of a future and permanent restoration rests on Yahweh's promise to "raise up the fallen hut of David . . . wall up its breaches, raise up its ruins, and rebuild it as in the days of old" (Am 9.11). "He who remains in Sion and he that is left in Jerusalem will be called holy: every one marked down for life in Jerusalem" (Is 4.2–6).

The seed of this hope of final deliverance lies in that "scanty remnant" (Is 1.9) whose return to the land is Israel's return to life. After the Exile, Yahweh raises His people even as in Ezekiel's vision He brings the dry bones to life (Ez 37.1–14). The Lord's promise that "your dead shall live, their corpses shall rise" (Is 26.19; see also 51.17 and 60.1) is a promise of national deliverance from death and extinction. The notion of a resurrection remains, at this stage in Israel's history, at the service of the hope for the reestablishment of an unending reign and a definitive prosperity of the Chosen People. Even should the faithful remnant fall prey to the powers of Sheol, a day will come when, like Yahweh's faithful servant, it "shall see the light in fullness of days" (Is 53.11; although most exegetes of this passage agree that here there is no explicit reference to the resurrection).

The ideas of the so-called Apocalypse of Isaiah (Is 24.1–27.13) on this point are still the subject of dispute among exegetes (see Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 1:1043; Sutcliffe, 126–128; and Dictionnaire de la Bible, 4:680). But such passages as "your dead shall live, their corpses shall rise" (Is 26.19) and "he will destroy death forever" (25.8) cannot be wholly discounted as stages in the development of the doctrine on the resurrection. Though it is difficult to determine whether the value of such passages is in their being an image or an affirmation, they do contribute this important note to the evolution of the doctrine: they set it within an eschatological framework. The eschatological banquet and the banishment of death, the end of sorrow and tribulation are images of the end of time (Is 25.6–8; cf. Rev 7.17 and 21.4) and of the advent of salvation.

In the Postexilic Period. In the centuries that followed the Exile, what had previously been an expression of hope in a national restoration became a clear assertion of the eventual resurrection of the individual. Yahweh's might could surely snatch the dead from Sheol; His mercy will not let His own languish there always, but will call them to be before His face forever. Divine justice will be satisfied in this world or the next. It was reflection on this divine justice, setting forth the problem of the suffering just, particularly in the Book of JOB, that contributed so much to the eventual evolution of the OT doctrine on the resurrection.

Although the original Hebrew text of Jb 19.25 is poorly preserved, this passage hardly refers to individual resurrection, as is clear from the context of the whole book. Yet in its yearning for justice and its conviction that this justice will be ultimately satisfied, it did serve as a prelude to the explicit affirmation of the resurrection in Daniel and 2 Maccabees. Faith in the resurrection of the dead seems to have been Yahweh's gift to a people who had become a nation of martyrs.

The violent persecution of Antiochus IV Epiphanes raised the question of the lot of the saints martyred for the faith. The apocalypse of DANIEL gave the response that thenceforth became a common, though not universal, possession of Israel: "Many of those who sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake; some shall live forever, others shall be an everlasting horror and disgrace" (Dn 12.2). Daniel thus uncovered the profound sense latent in the Torah and the Prophets, affirming a resurrection that was no longer merely the restoration of a nation but the individual recompense of personal merit.

The author of 2 Maccabees reiterates this conviction, giving it, as it were, its historical setting in the glorious martyrdom of the brothers: "the King of the world will raise us up, who die for his laws, in the resurrection of eternal life . . . the Creator of the world that formed the nativity of man and that found out the origin of all, he will restore to you again in his mercy, both breath and life, as now you despise yourselves for the sake of his laws" (2 Mc 7.9, 23).

Finally, the Book of WISDOM, written shortly before our era, not only presupposes this doctrine throughout, but attempts to give it, in its third part (ch. 11–19), a solidly reasoned basis. In a midrash on the wonders of Exodus, as "subtle" as it is "luminous," the author of Wisdom sets forth a cosmoteriology implicit in Exodus. He erects upon it an argument that probably, upon close literary analysis of the chapters, would have to be linked with the author's theory of the salvation of the body, if the last section of his book is to make any sense at all. (See P. Beauchamp, "Le Salut corporel des justes et la conclusion du livre de la Sagesse," Biblica 45 [1964] 491–526.)

In the apocalyptic literature and the pseudepigrapha that proliferated around the Christian era, the doctrine of the resurrection of the body (at least, of the just) became an established one (see Jubilees 23.30–31; Enoch 22.13; 91.10; 100.5; Testament of Juda 25.1, 4; of Zebulun 10.2; and of Benjamin 10.6–8). It appears in the writings of the Qumran sectaries (see Hôdâyôt [Thanksgiving Hymns] 3:19–23; 11:10–14; 8:26–30), though there it is rather ambiguous because of the heavy admixture of tenets on the immortality of the soul. The doctrine occurs frequently also in rabbinic literature. (For abundant testimony see in Kommentar zum Neuen Testament, 4:2, the excursus on "Allgemeine oder teilweise Auferstehung der Toten?" especially pp. 1172–98.) The well-known division of opinion on it between the Pharisees and the Sadducees is recorded by Flavius Josephus (B.J. 2.8.14; Antiquities 18.1, 3) and recalled in the NT: "For the Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, and that there are no angels or spirits, whereas the Pharisees believe in both" (Acts 23.8; see also Mt 22.23).

Faith of the New Testament. The Book of Acts bears witness to the focal position occupied by the Resurrection of Christ in the primitive catechesis and the KERYGMA of the early Church. Peter's discourses proclaimed God's might that raised up Christ, "having loosed the sorrows of hell" (Acts 2.24; 3.15). Paul's disputations with the Epicureans and the Stoics of Athens centered around the "resurrection of the dead" (17.18, 32); and before his Pharisee and Sadducee accusers, he flatly stated, "it is about the hope and the resurrection of the dead that I am on trial" (23.6).

What was a final milestone in revelation in the OT becomes in the NT the foundation of Apostolic preaching and the basis of Christian faith. Here the idea of the resurrection of the dead takes on a hitherto unsuspected precision and assumes capital importance in the life of the Christian community, both in its cultic expression and its creedal formulations. The NT doctrine of the resurrection is in continuity with what preceded it and rejoins the initial intuition of the OT in asserting God's dominion over life and death. That is why St. Paul is at pains to stress the "according to the Scriptures" before undertaking his exposition in 1 Corinthians ch. 15. Throughout the NT, however, all affirmations on the resurrection radiate as from one luminous source: the fundamental event of the RESURRECTION OF CHRIST, "the first-fruits of those who have fallen asleep" (1 Cor 15.20).

In the Synoptics. The Gospel of St. Mark records a verity fundamental to all subsequent understanding of the true meaning of the resurrection: God is not the God of the dead but of the living (12.27). By citing Ex 3.6 in this context, the argument for the resurrection not only is based upon a central text of the OT, but it is also linked with a fundamental revelation of the Old Covenant that is perfected in the New. All error on the resurrection, therefore, is ultimately attributable to ignorance of the Scriptures and of the power of God (Mk 12.24).

Jesus' reply to the question put to him by the Sadducees (Mt 22.23–33 and parallels), in addition to setting forth the basic principle for the correct understanding of the doctrine of the resurrection, presupposes the all-important fact of the identity between the dead and the risen person. Without this identity of person, the very question put to Jesus by the Sadducees would be meaningless. The Resurrection narratives are at pains to highlight this identity in the case of the risen Lord Himself. This is an essential aspect of the doctrine because it affirms the reality of the individual's destiny. That is why, in this context, St. Luke speaks of "those who shall be accounted worthy of that world and of the resurrection of the dead" (20.35–36). Ultimately, the divine JUDGMENT on the last day derives its personal significance and its urgency from this fact.

As the Synoptic narratives advance toward the events of the Passion and the Resurrection, they mark a progress toward the final victory over death itself; and it is in the eschatological perspective of this victory that the closing events of Christ's life on Earth must be viewed. Moreover, all the healing narratives of Christ's public ministry are an anticipation of the final victory. They are incursions into the domain of death, no less than the raising of Jairus's daughter (Mk 5.21–23, 35–43) and of the widow's son (Lk 7.11–15) are signs that herald its definitive overthrow.

The faith context of the MIRACLES in the Bible should help us understand why the NT, when it speaks of the resurrection of the dead, stresses the resurrection of the just and of the believers. Life is God's gift to the believing just; death is the lot of the unrighteous. It was by no means easy for Jesus' contemporaries to comprehend how the unjust and the unbelievers could really rise to life. Nevertheless, the NT not only presupposes this resurrection of the unrighteous as well as of the just (e.g., Mt 11.24; Rev 20.12–13), but asserts it quite clearly in Acts 24.15 and Jn 5.29: "They who have done good shall come forth to the resurrection of life; but they who have done evil unto the resurrection of judgment."

In the Pauline Epistles. Aware of his fidelity to the tradition he received (1 Cor 15.3–4), Paul sets Christ's Resurrection as the foundation of his teaching, indeed as the very foundation of Christian belief: "Now if Christ is preached as risen from the dead, how do some among you say there is no resurrection of the dead? But if there is no resurrection of the dead, neither has Christ risen; and if Christ has not risen, vain then is our preaching, vain too is your faith" (1 Cor 15.12–14). There is an intimate interdependence between the resurrection of the dead and the Resurrection of Christ; our faith in the latter must include our faith in God's power to accomplish the former, "for if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, so with him God will bring those also who have fallen asleep through Jesus" (1 Thes 4.14; 2 Cor 13.4). The Resurrection of Christ and that of the Christian are both worked not only by the same power of God (1 Cor 6.14) but also by the same Spirit who dwells in us (Rom 8.11). "For we know that he who raised up Jesus will raise up us also with Jesus" (2 Cor 4.14). The link between the two is so close that to deny one is to deny the other, "for if the dead do not rise, neither has Christ risen" (1 Cor 15.16).

St. Paul emphasizes the Resurrection of Christ and, consequently, that of the Christian as the work of the Father: "Now God has raised up the Lord and will also raise us up by his power" (1 Cor 6.14; 1 Thes 1.10). Christian witness is a witness to God the Father who raised Jesus from the dead (Gal 1.1; 1 Cor 15.15). Christian faith is faith in Him who "raised Jesus our Lord from the dead" (Rom 4.24; 10.9). The Resurrection, moreover, is a manifestation of the power of God: Christ "lives through the power of God"; and, by implication, so too will the Christian (2 Cor 13.4). It is the expression of God's will that calls sinful men from the power of death to take part in the new life of the resurrection.

Through baptism Christians are even now called to this new life of the resurrection, called "to walk in newness of life" (Rom 6.4–11). In this basic Sacrament of Christian life, the Christian is buried with Christ and in Him rises again "through faith in the working of God who raised him from the dead" (Col 2.12; Eph 2.1 and 5). Though he is even now "a new creature" (2 Cor 5.17), though he is at present spoken of as raised and seated together in heaven in Christ Jesus (Eph 2.6; Col 2.12; 3.1–4), the Christian must nevertheless await the total and definitive triumph at the final consummation, "the end when he delivers the kingdom to God the Father" (1 Cor 15.12, 23–28).

Having set forth the fundamental elements of our faith in the resurrection, St. Paul turns to the question of its mode: "How do the dead rise? with what kind of body do they come?" (1 Cor 15.35–55). The answer to this question remains, in the final analysis, a mystery; and, even though to answer it Paul marshals his own peculiar vocabulary (vv. 46–49), calls forth nature's imagery (vv. 36–38), has recourse to the physics of his day (vv. 40–41), and cites the Prophets (vv. 47, 55), nevertheless, he concludes with a true theologian's only attitude before a mystery: "Thanks be to God who has given us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ" (15.57). One thing, however, must be insisted upon throughout St. Paul's exposition: no matter how true and how great the difference is between what is "sown" and what "rises," there is true and real identity.

Were this identity between the body that is "sown" and the body that "rises" not true, the Christian's participation in the life of the risen Christ would be meaningless here and hereafter. The paschal character of Christian life and the certitude of the hope that impels it forward (Col 3.1–2) dominate the moral life of Christians (3.5–4.6). Because he already bears within him the pledge of this future life, the Christian is secure in his hope of the final resurrection (Rom 8.22–25; Phil 3.11–14). He awaits eagerly the Lord "who will re-fashion the body of lowliness, conforming it to the body of his glory" (Phil 3.20–21). On the last day that life that is now "hidden in Christ with God" will appear in the clarity of glory (Col 3.4).

In St. John's Gospel. For the author of the fourth Gospel, Christ's work is ζωοποίησις: "In him was life" (Jn 1.4), and He was sent into the world "that those who believe in him may not perish; but may have life everlasting" (3.16). He can, with sovereign power, say, "Thy son lives" (4.50); "Rise, take up thy pallet and walk" (5.8); "Lazarus, come forth!" (11.43); for "as the Father raises the dead and gives them life, even so the Son also gives life to whom he will" (5.21). It is the Father's will that He should raise up those whom the Father had given Him (6.39, 40, 44). He is the living bread; and those who eat of this bread will not die (6.50), for they have life everlasting, and He will raise them up on the last day (6.55).

Even though, unlike St. Paul, John emphasizes the resurrection as the work of the Son, his whole Gospel bears witness to the fact that all the work of the Son, including the resurrection, is in obedience to the Father's will. God gave His only-begotten Son, "that those who believe in him may not perish, but may have life everlasting" (3.16). This life is Christ's gift to men; it is, ultimately, the gift of Himself to them; for He is not only the life by which they live now, but also the resurrection: "I am the resurrection and the life" (11.25).

In the fourth Gospel the narrative of the raising of Lazarus constitutes a high point in the revelation of the mystery of resurrection. The actual event constitutes both a sign and a fulfillment of “thy brother shall live” (11.23). Its fulfillment was in the coming forth of him who was dead; but that coming forth was symbolic of a future life, a sign of a resurrection unto life everlasting. The whole narrative reveals a peculiar modality of the gift of life by presenting it as a triumph over death. It is, as it were, an exegesis of “he who believes in me, even if he die, shall live” (11.25). Nowhere in the NT is this total reversal of the order of our mortality more clearly revealed than here. This whole section (11.1–44) is fundamentally a sign of Christ’s triumph in the Resurrection: His victory over death through death itself. It was indeed expedient that “one man die for the people” (11.50; see also 11.15).

“For this is the will of my Father who sent me, that whoever beholds the Son, and believes in him, shall have everlasting life, and I will raise him up on the last day” (6.40). Henceforth, Christian life here on Earth is an anticipated resurrection, a life of faith in the risen Christ, a life of hope in the final triumph of living and reigning with Him (Rev 20.4). According to the life they lead here on Earth they will be judged (20.12, 13). Only then, on that last day, will they behold “a new heaven and a new earth” (21.1). They will then hear a loud voice proclaiming the end of things past, the final fulfillment of all promises, and the realization of all signs: “Behold the dwelling of God with men, and he will dwell with them. . . . And they will be his people, and God himself will be with them as their God. And God will wipe every tear from their eyes. And death shall be no more” (21.3–4; see also Ex 25.8 and Jn 1.14).

Bibliography: A. OEPKE, “ἀνίστημι,” G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 1:368–372. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 2022–32. J. SCHMID, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 1:1042–48. H. BIRKELAND, “The Belief in the Resurrection of the Dead in the Old Testament,” Studia Theologica 3.1 (1949) 60–78. E. F. SUTCLIFFE, The Old Testament and the Future Life (Westminster, MD 1947). R. MARTIN-ACHARD, De la Mort à la résurrection d’après l’Ancien Testament (Paris 1956). C. LARCHER, “La Doctrine de la résurrection dans l’Ancien Testament,” Lumière et vie 3 (1952) 11–34. J. GUILLET, “Les Sources scripturaires de la foi en la résurrection de la chair,” Bible et vie chrétienne 2 (1953) 40–54. B. VAWTER, “Resurrection and Redemption,” Catholic Biblical Quarterly 15 (1953) 11–23.

[S. B. MARROW]

2. THEOLOGY OF

Even though the tenet of the Creed, “I believe in the resurrection of the dead,” has been an integral element in the Christian faith from the very beginning, yet a more ready response from Christians for many centuries to the question of man’s fate after death has been, “I believe in the immortality of the soul.” This response appears to be the outgrowth of two factors that have played major roles in the development of the belief in the resurrection of the dead.

The first of these elements is traceable to a questionable approach to NT eschatology [see ESCHATOLOGY (IN THE BIBLE)]. Christians for too long have tended to look merely to the future, to the things “of the other world,” counting the things of earth as nothing, as mere shadows of the true realities to come and valueless when the perfect heavenly things shall have arrived. The vision of this world’s destruction has led Christians to reject it as far as possible, and where not possible, to put up with it in a spirit of renunciation, penance, and mortification. The true sense of eschatology, therefore, is lost, for the NT (especially St. John) insists that the kingdom of God is present, that Jesus never really left, but represents the definitive intervention of God. The risen Christ is present and active through the Sanctifier, the HOLY SPIRIT, in the Church. The end time (ἔσχατον), therefore, has already come (see INCARNATION; TEMPORAL VALUES, THEOLOGY OF).

The second element entering into the formation of “traditional” theology of the resurrection has been the influence of Platonic and Neoplatonic thought, and its insertion into the very core of Christian theology. The gradual development of an eschatology that looked too longingly to the future was possible in the measure that Platonism furnished an understanding of the SOUL-BODY RELATIONSHIP that allowed the Christian to speculate freely about the separated soul, without impelling him simultaneously to make provisions for the material principle in man (see PLATONISM; NEOPLATONISM).

Gradually, therefore, the eschatological structure arose: DEATH was the separation (liberation) of the soul from the body. The body reverted to the earth from where it had originated; the soul was judged either worthy of eternal union with God if at death it were in the state of GRACE and needed no purification (or punishment) before seeing God, or else, deserving of eternal punishment because of mortal sin, its state at death. Even though the doctrine thus presented spoke only of the soul, and not the person, yet theologians affirmed “essential” beatitude for the just at death, since the BEATIFIC VISION in its totality could be enjoyed by the soul whose potentialities for knowledge and love were enormously enhanced through its separation from the body. They could likewise speak of the separation of the soul from God as the essential element of hell. The destiny of the body in this whole other-world existence, whether it contributed to the glorification of the just, or made some sense out of physical torture for the damned, was generally considered something secondary and accidental in the total picture. Possible difficulties about the fate of the human person the whole while were solved by perhaps too facile references to the transcendental relationship of soul to body after death.

In such a context the resurrection of the body, albeit a professed truth of the Christian faith, gradually faded out of the forefront of the eschatological picture. The emphasis in Catholic theology for many centuries has been simply to explain how it comes to pass. Experience of aspects of death has taxed the theological imagination to explain God's restoring bodies that have been totally corrupted through cremation, cannibalism, etc. In other words, the questions in theology have dealt more with the philosophic-scientific aspects of the resurrection of the body than with its place in the harmonious totality of Christian revelation. There is, therefore, a much needed reemphasis on the resurrection of the dead, or the body, as an indispensable event in the economy of SALVATION. The person in Christian reality is the object of Redemption and salvation; the full Christian HOPE is in the resurrection-glorification of the person (enfleshed SPIRIT). [See PERSON (IN THEOLOGY).] Until such time as this comes to pass every man in some sense is in a state of expectation. The basis of this Christian hope is the faithful conviction that salvation is a share in the Christ-life and the Christ-event. The paschal mystery, therefore, forms the core of the understanding of Christian revelation: just as Christ's redemptive action included death-resurrection-glorification, so man's share in the Christ-life involves him in the same necessary transition or passage (pasch) through death (transformation) to resurrection-glorification. An eschatology that sets its sights exclusively on the soul as the immortal element in man runs the risk of misconceiving these fundamental Christian truths. The resurrection of the body must not be considered an adjunct to the Christian's destiny; it cannot be an afterthought to the salvation of the soul.

Doctrine of the Teaching Church. In many ways over the centuries the Church in conciliar and other official pronouncements has proposed the resurrection of the dead as a truth revealed by God (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 11, 30, 76, 150, 801, 859). The language used is not always uniform: sometimes profession of faith is in the resurrection of the flesh, sometimes in the resurrection of the body, and at times in the resurrection of the dead. The later conciliar assemblies accentuate the identity of the risen body. A general conclusion from the documents of the teaching Church is that there will be a resurrection, that it will be for all men, and that all men will arise with the same bodies they now have. It is to this resurrection that the Church from the very beginning has been the believing witness.

Witness of Christian Tradition. It can be said quite definitely that there is hardly any truth of Christian revelation that is so openly and clearly taught by the Fathers and Christian writers as the resurrection of the body. Indeed, it is the very keystone of Christianity, mirroring as it does the Resurrection of the Lord. By the time of Lateran Council IV (1215) the developed teaching of Christian tradition regarding the resurrection of the body received definitive formulation in its essential elements, that is, that there will be a resurrection, that it will be universal for the just and unjust alike, and that all men will rise with the same bodies they now possess (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 801).

The fact of the resurrection and its universality not only formed an integral part of the Christian's profession of faith from the very beginning, but was defended ex professo in various writings of the early Fathers and Church writers (Didache, St. Polycarp, St. Athenagoras, Theophilus of Antioch, Tertullian). The later insistency on the identity of the resurrected body grew out of the Christian reaction in the 4th and 5th centuries to Origen's earlier assertions that resurrected bodies were composed of ethereal matter.

Theological Reflections. It must be affirmed with deliberate insistence before all else that man's continuance in existence forever cannot be proved from, neither is it derived from, nor supported by, philosophy. Philosophy might prove the immortality of the soul, or spiritual element, in man (arguments from its spirituality to its simplicity, from its independence of matter, from the culmination of an evolutive process in spirit existence, etc.), but Christianity professes faith in the resurrection of the body, of the man, the enfleshed spirit, and this can come only from God's revealed Word and man's immersion into Christ's own death-resurrection. Once this is clear, then it is valid and, within limits, useful and necessary to inquire into the manner of this resurrection and related problems.

The most general approach of the theologian must be to demonstrate that the mystery of the resurrection introduces a certain fulfillment into the Christian conscience. The man who is committed to God in Christ Jesus through the Sanctifier, the Holy Spirit, is assured through his commitment that he will live forever. It is God's love for man, therefore, that guarantees the resurrection of that body which at death appears to fade out of the eschatological perspective. If forced to formulate an argument for his faithful conviction, the Christian might respond: God loves me. But God is eternal. Therefore I will live forever (not my soul, but I). The great movement of the whole of creation toward Christ, the New Adam, after its progressive decline through the Old Adam, is crowned by the resurrection of the body, the final victory of each individual (through Christ's death-resurrection) over death, which gained dominion in the person of the first Adam. By the same token the resurrection of the damned seals forever their totally free movement away from Christ and the Christian community. The existence of the resurrection of the body, then, lends universal harmony to the totality of Christian revelation.

The question, finally, of the manner of the resurrection is truly the object of speculative theology. Perhaps no explanation is completely satisfying. As prototypes, of course, the Resurrection of Christ and the ASSUMPTION OF MARY heighten one's expectation, but add little enlightenment as to the exact manner of the Christian's resurrection. The fact is that men will arise with their own bodies in a glorified state (see GLORIFIED BODY). The general principle to be accentuated here is that man is a composition of both a material or visible element and a spiritual or angelic element, that is, flesh and spirit; man represents a unique relationship between spirit and matter. This will continue forever, but still man will be changed, since at the resurrection a new and different relationship between spirit and matter (glorification in the case of the just) will exist. But he will still be this individual, this human being. It is the traditional view in theology that the spiritual principle in man is responsible for the identity that characterizes him as this man forever. Whatever the speculative analysis of the resurrection, the risen body guarantees man, as man, an eternal existence in union with, or separated from, God through Christ in unity with the Holy Spirit.

See Also: ESCHATOLOGY, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 13.2:2501–71. W. VON SODEN et al., Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 1:688–698. H. CORNÉLIS et al., The Resurrection of the Body, tr. M. JOSELYN (Notre Dame, IN 1964). K. RAHNER, On the Theology of Death, tr. C. H. HENKEY (Quaestiones Disputatae 2; New York 1961). R. TROISFONTAINES, I Do Not Die, tr. F. E. ALBERT (New York 1963) 279–295. H. KÜNG, Eternal Life?: Life after Death as a Medical, Philosophical, and Theological Problem, tr. E. QUINN (New York 1991, c1984). G. A. MALONEY, The First Day of Eternity: Resurrection Now (New York 1982). V. KESICH, The First Day of the New Creation: The Resurrection and the Christian Faith (Crestwood, NY 1982). T. PENELHUM, Immortality (Belmont, CA 1973). P. BENOÎT and R. MURPHY, eds., Immortality and Resurrection (New York 1970). J. RATZINGER, Eschatology: Death and Eternal Life, tr. M. WALDSTEIN (Washington, DC 1988).

[H. M. MCELWAIN]

RESURRECTIONISTS

The Congregation of the Resurrection (CR, Official Catholic Directory #1080) received its name from the original members who pronounced their first vows on the feast of the Resurrection, 1842, in the catacombs of St. Sebastian in Rome. The founders were three young Polish scholars, Bogdan Janski, Peter Semenenko, and Jerome Kajsiewicz, who had returned to the practice of their Catholic faith only a few years earlier. Inspired by the French Catholic lay apostolate movement headed by Count Charles MONTALEMBERT, Jean LACORDAIRE, and Frédéric OZANAM, the three founders attempted a similar work among their compatriots in Paris. There in 1836 with a few companions, they began leading a common life under the direction of Janski. Never ordained, he died in Rome before his community made first vows and before Semenenko became the first superior general. The three cofounders, Janski, Semenenko, and Kajsiewicz, are buried in the Church of the Resurrection adjacent to the mother house in Rome.

Although the congregation encountered many reverses, its members were soon working in Italy, France, Canada, Turkey, Bulgaria, the U.S., Poland, and Austria. They received the decree of praise in 1860; final approval of the constitutions was granted in 1902. Later, at the request of Pius XII, the Resurrectionists established missions in Bermuda, Bolivia, and Brazil. The motherhouse is in Rome.

In 1857 Father Eugene Funcken left Rome for Canada and began work in the Catholic settlement of St. Agatha, Ontario. Headquarters were later moved to a neighboring town then called Berlin, later the city of Kitchener. Work in the U.S. began in 1865 at Parisville, MI, and spread the following year to Texas. In 1870 a permanent mission was established in Chicago, IL, and in 1871 the Canadian Resurrectionists, complying with an earlier request of Bp. William McCloskey of Louisville, assumed control of St. Mary's College, founded in 1821 by Rev. William Byrne. The U.S. provincialate is in Chicago, IL.

Bibliography: L. LONG, The Resurrectionists (Chicago 1947).

[A. A. RUETZ/EDS.]

RETRIBUTION

Repayment for moral guilt or virtue. Recompense for injustices was exacted by human custom and law in Biblical history, just as rewards were allotted by human agents in return for good actions. This article's main concern, however, is to examine the evolution of Biblical thought and expression concerning divine retribution, or how the Judeo-Christian God was considered to reward virtue and to punish vice.

Old Testament Retribution

Israelite ideas about God's rewards and punishments for moral actions were limited, almost until the Christian Era, to sanctions given in this world (see AFTERLIFE, 2) and, for the most part, they focused on divine recompense to the whole group rather than to individual persons.

RETRIBUTION IN THIS WORLD

OT rewards were mainly material, and, even when they were spiritual, e.g., a closer friendship with God, they ceased with death. [See DEATH (IN THE BIBLE).] In SHEOL (abode of the dead) the dead could no longer praise God; the just who died were united with the unjust in a common lot (Jb 3.13–19). Observers of the Mosaic LAW would enjoy a long and prosperous life in the promised land and would die surrounded by their numerous progeny (Dt 5.16; 6.1–3, 10–15). Pentateuchal and prophetic doctrine proclaimed only earthly rewards or punishments for those who fulfilled or transgressed the obligations of God's COVENANT (Jet 11.1–12). In the SAPIENTIAL BOOKS rewards for good conduct were all of a temporal nature—wealth and honor, land and possessions, and healthy, numerous children, whereas the folly of wickedness brought sudden and early death (Prv 8.17–21; 10.27; 22.22–23). Only in the latest OT books was the notion of reward connected with life after death.

Repayment for the crime or virtuous act of an individual affected the group to which the person belonged. Hebrew tribal background was a source of this idea, but a more important reason was that God had chosen the Israelites and made a religious pact with them, not as individuals, but as a collective entity, His holy people (see ELECTION, DIVINE). Consequently, God was conceived of as punishing the group for one person's sin and as rewarding it for another's good action.

Collective Punishment for Individual Fault. The obvious example of solidarity in punishment is the story of the fall of man (Gn ch. 3), but there are many others. Cain's murder brought a crescendo of corruption on his whole line. Simeon and Levi, by their violent revenge (Gn 34.25–31), were the remote causes for the dispersion of their tribes throughout Israel (49.5–7). Achan's violation of the ban (anathema) led to the obliteration of his whole family (Jos 6.27–7.1, 24–26). Even King DAVID, by his adultery followed by murder, doomed the son of the adulterous union to death and his royal line to perpetual warfare and violence (2 Sm 12.7–14). Not only a person's descendants but even the whole nation could be punished for the sin of one of its members, as in the cases of Achan (Jos 22.20), Saul (2 Sm 21.1), and David (2 Sm ch. 24).

The classical statement of punishment meted out by Yahweh on the presumably innocent children of evil men is found in Ex 34.7, in a context, however, that makes sure to highlight His mercy and forgiveness "for a thousand generations." One is confronted here with thought patterns of a nomadic, tribal solidarity in fortune and misfortune, good and evil, merit and guilt. The custom of BLOOD VENGEANCE, which found its excessive expression in Lamech's savage poem (Gn 4.23–24), is another example of such solidarity. A society without a police force or courts of law needed such a custom as a deterrent to crime. Its origin was even attributed to God in the story of Cain; very likely, the token or mark given Cain by God made it apparent to anyone who wished to harm him that he belonged to a tribe that would avenge his murder severely (Gn 4.15–16). Later in Israel's history the law of exact retaliation (Ex 21.24) introduced a wise control over indiscriminate vengeance that could decimate whole tribes and families. By demanding in Israel a compensation exactly equal to an injury, this law, which seems so harsh now, curbed excessive revenge and concentrated the people's attention on the precise crime and its perpetrator rather than on the whole group to which the criminal belonged. It was a step toward the separation of the innocent from the guilt brought upon a group by a single offender and affected the Israelite idea of the JUSTICE OF GOD in avenging sin. [See SIN (IN THE BIBLE).] As tribal influences gradually died out with the coming of the monarchy and more developed government by statute (see ISRAEL, 3), collective retribution gave way to a more discriminating justice that found its expression in Dt 24.16 and its application in 2 Kgs 14.6, where Joash refrains from slaying the children of his father's murderers. The advanced principle had been stated, "Only for his own guilt shall a man be put to death" (Dt 24.16), but the older customs continued to be practiced, and what was of timeless value in the basic idea of the contagion of sin and solidarity in guilt continued to evolve [Ps 108 (109). 9–16; Sir 41.5–9; Wis 3.16–19].

Collective Reward Merited by an Individual. Group solidarity in the achievements and rewards of just individuals was the logical converse of solidarity in an individual's punishment. This happier aspect of a person's involvement with his family, tribe, and nation was exemplified by the Deluge and the common lot of his family with the just NOAH, by the blessings promised to the Patriarch ABRAHAM for his posterity, and, through it for all mankind, by the immunity granted Rahab's family (Jos 2.17–18), and by many other examples. In fact, God's willingness to show mercy and forgive sins because of the loyalty of a few or only of one person revealed His nature more accurately to the Israelites than did His punishment (Ex 32.11–14; 33. 12–17; 34.6–7a). Thus, in Jer 5.1 and Ez 22.30, God would forgive and spare Jerusalem, were only one just man discovered there. The bargaining between Abraham and God over Sodom was based not on the personal value of each just man, but on how few just men would be needed to win pardon for all their wicked compatriots; Abraham did not even ask that the just men be spared individually, although God later spared Lot's daughters because of their just father (Gn 18.23–33; 19.12–15). Finally, the suffering of one man, described in the Songs of the SUFFERING SERVANT, was going to save the whole nation (Isaia ch. 53). Here the solidarity of God's people in punishment for one man's sin is paradoxically reversed; the mysterious servant of the Lord, an innocent individual, at least in the author's description of him, receives the punishment due the many—and thereby, justifies the many by bearing their guilt. God's mercy and forgiveness, in view of one man's loyalty, is granted the whole group. This oracle was the OT's deepest delving into the mystery of God's collective reward in consideration of the good actions and faithfulness of one individual; it is no wonder that the prediction was not understood until it had been realized in Christ's salvific death and Resurrection.

Retribution for a Whole Group's Guilt or Virtue. The judgment of God [see JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THE BIBLE)] upon mankind in general for its collective sinfulness is described in the etiological stories of the flood and the TOWER OF BABEL. (See ETIOLOGY.) Smaller groups were punished for collective guilt, e.g., the people of Sodom and Gomorra, the tribe of Benjamin (Jgs ch. 19–20), CANAAN and the Canaanites (Dt 9.5), and the Israelites themselves (Jer ch. 2; Is 1.2–9). The Prophets from Amos to Ezechiel constantly warned God's people of their collective infidelity to the covenant, which would bring upon them, first, the destruction of the Northern Kingdom and, then, of JUDAH. Only a small REMNANT OF ISRAEL would eventually be saved (Am 3.12; 5.15; 9.8–10; Is 10.20–23; Ez ch. 9). Editorial additions of the DEUTERONOMISTS to their great collection (Joshua to 2 Kgs) can be easily distinguished by the theme that all the catastrophes that ever afflicted Israel were due to God's punishment for its collective infidelity to His pact (Jos 24.19–20; Jgs 2.11–15; 1 Kgs 8.33–40; 2 Kgs 17.7–18; Dt 28.15–46). That just men were caught in this collective retribution was accepted with difficulty and without an adequate explanation (Gn 18.25; Ez 21.1–10). This problem led, especially in Ezechiel and the wisdom literature, to a greater emphasis on individual guilt and merit.

Individual Retribution. The Hebrew words for retribution came from the basic experience of a man earning wages or gain as the result of a pact or contract entered into with someone who desired his services. When this concept was transferred to the relationship between God and man, it was adapted to Israel's experience with God, and retribution became the result of God visiting His people to reward or punish His servant in consideration of the way His bondsman fulfilled his service. In this way the principle was evolved that God would repay every man according to his works (1 Sm 26.23; Prv 12.14; Is 59.18; Sir 51.30; Rom 2.6). That this principle involved the individual in its collective horizon from the very beginning is evident from the most ancient Mosaic penal codes that were sanctioned by God and often adjudicated by ORDEAL (Nm 5.11–31). That an individual's crime or virtuous act affected the group to which he belonged only tended to heighten his concern for the results of his actions. There were, however, many cases in which the individual was repaid for his own action, without any apparent retribution for his group. So, Er and Onan died because of their wickedness (Gn 38.7–10); whereas Shiphrah and Phuah were rewarded by God for protecting Hebrew infants (Ex 1.15–20).

Both during and after the period of the scourge of the Exile of Israel the idea of collective punishment evolved so that greater concern was given to an individual's responsibility for his actions before God. If one was to live or die (the perspective was still limited to this side of the tomb), it was to be the result of one's own virtuous or evil deeds. The sinner could repent, do good, and live; the just man could turn to sin and die (Ez ch. 18). What had already been clearly expressed in the story of Abraham's bargaining with God over Sodom, "Far be it from you to do such a thing as kill the just with the wicked, treating just and wicked alike!" (Gn 18.25), became with Ezechiel and the wisdom writers a common teaching for enticing individual Israelites to return to God and act justly so that they might receive, as individuals, His rewards. God had "no pleasure in the death" of the sinner; He wanted everyone to "return and live" (Ez 18.32). When such a principle was applied solely to temporal sanctions without any hope of a retribution beyond the tomb, it soon became evident that it ran contrary to man's experience. The just man did not always live; in fact, for the most part, the just were oppressed and downtrodden by evil men, while God remained aloof in His heavens. The stage had been set for the revelation of God's plan for rewarding and punishing men beyond the confines of their mortal life.

RETRIBUTION IN THE FUTURE WORLD

The greatest advance toward conceiving that human justice or evilness had to wait until after death before being requited by God was made by a remarkable man whose name has not been recorded, the author of the book of JOB.

The Problem in Job and Ecclesiastes. The author of the Book of Job attacked frontally a traditional teaching because it gave rise to more problems than it answered. Job's innocence is affirmed by God Himself before He allows Satan to test him by taking away every shred of temporal reward. As a result the consequent dialogue between Job and his friends clearly indicates the author's problem: just men who are miserable in this life (and most of them are) must of necessity encounter God Himself whom they know is just but whom they also feel in their flesh is acting unjustly. The author eventually capitulates to the traditional view by having Job vindicated by God with twice as many material blessings than before, but this is only because he cannot formulate a solution to his basic problem, except the unfathomable mystery of God. God alone knows the answer to the obvious injustices to which the innocent succumb. With Job the author makes every innocent man confronted with a death he did not deserve desire to stand up on some vague day beyond his death to receive a human awareness of God's vindication (Jb 19.23–29). He does not say that such an event will ever happen, but he knows that such a desire is in the heart of every just man faced with an unwarranted death. God's benign creativity seems to be canceled out by His cruel governance of human destiny in which the just are never fully vindicated for their service to Him. Yet God is just. What, then, is the solution? It is, at least, God Himself who hides Himself in a whirlwind and from it demands man to submit to His mysterious plans.

The anthologist who composed the Book of ECCLESIASTES faced more bitterly and less profoundly the same problem. He was very much aware that the just suffered in life while the wicked prospered (Eccl 7.15; 8.10, 14). Death above all, death and oblivion, is the common lot of all men, good and evil alike (8.16–9.10). A concrete horror of death is his contribution to the evolution of retribution; everything in life, all the rewards held up to the Israelite have no meaning when confronted by death; everything flattens out and there is no lasting pleasure. A Christian is startled not so much at Qoheleth's bitterness as at the fact that the Israelites had to wait so long a time to hear it expressed. From about the time of Ecclesiastes the thought of Jews took another turn and longed for the never ending happiness hidden behind all their concrete symbols for the happy life with their God.

Intimations of a Resurrection of the Dead. A few intimate friends of God had already attempted to pierce these symbols in order to reach God Himself. They knew God was good, full of loving loyalty to His promises, but, oppressed and suffering as they were, they never experienced the concrete pleasures contained in the traditional symbols for happiness. Yet their faithful Lord had held out to them these rewards; the only solution was to hope, blindly, in His goodness. Their return of filial loyalty to God and the joy in sorrow that it made them experience led them to desire to be with Him forever, despite the frustration of their human experience. Thus Jeremiah, at his loneliest, when he complains most bitterly against the degradation brought on him by his faithful service to God, still realizes that God is with him and will, somehow and at sometime, reward him (Jer 15.10–21; 20.11–13). The sapiential poet of Psalm 72(73) penetrates, with Jeremiah, God's mystery and affirms confidently, against his experience, that God will, Himself, be the just person's reward, his "portion forever," even though his flesh now groans in pain; while he is with God, he has no desire for earthly pleasures, and to be apart from God is to perish [Ps 72(73).23–28]. Psalm 15(16) clarifies this teaching by expressing a trust that the just man's close friendship with God will be prolonged beyond the threat of the grave and he will enjoy a happy life at God's side indefinitely [Ps 15 (16).8–11]. Perhaps this Psalmist did not have so clear an insight into the blessed afterlife reserved for the just as has been claimed by some, but his longing to be with God has nothing material connected with it, and he fears death only because it will destroy his friendship with God. His is a definitive step toward a belief in the resurrection of the just. Almost as an answer to the bitterness of Ecclesiastes and his reluctant satisfaction with this world's pleasures the sage of Psalm 48(49) concludes that wealth and earthly splendor are traps that lead men to be content with this life and the death that must follow it, while the poor but wise and upright man is much better off, for God will redeem him from the power of the abode of the dead, snatching him away from death's rule [Ps 48(49).14–16]. The need of the impoverished and oppressed upright man for God's vindication, therefore, evoked from him a blind but confident cry that God would, indeed, prove His fidelity and justice despite death's universal reign.

A resurrection of Israel as a whole had already been conceived by Ezekiel in his Vision of the Dry Bones (ch. 37) and, later, by the Apocalypse of Isaiah (Is 26.19), but this was only a figure for God's restoration of the Israelite people after the Exile. Yet, the images were there in their tradition, and when the poor of Yahweh were suffering the terrible persecution of the second century B.C., they recalled the images from the depths of their need for Yahweh's vindication, and one of them shouted out at his executioner that the King of the world would raise all of them up to an eternal life for having died for His laws (2 Mc 7.9). Daniel's message, given about the same time, contains a more explicit teaching: those who are asleep in the dust will awaken, some to receive eternal life, the others to live in eternal horror. (See RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD, 1.)

Immortality in the Book of Wisdom. Because of the Biblical concept of man as a unit and not as a composite made of body and soul, the Israelites did not conceive of the soul as a subsistent element of man, destined to have a separate existence after the death of the body. [See MAN, 1; SOUL (IN THE BIBLE).] It was only very late in their history that Greek psychological influences on Alexandrian Judaism led the author of the Book of WISDOM to postulate some kind of happy and vital existence for the just who died prematurely and after an unhappy mortal life. Yet this author is still thoroughly Jewish in his monistic ideas and does not classify the body as the soul's prison from which the best that is in man escapes at death. The immortality that he offers as the just person's reward is one that is based essentially on the Israelite God's creative power and His hatred of death (Wis 1.12–15); it is an immortality that comes to the total man so that he may enjoy God's friendship forever in the traditional Israelite context of the DAY OF THE LORD (Wis ch. 3–5). Here the desire of the Psalmists [Ps 15(16).10; 48(49).16; 72(73).24] has received a more explicit statement in terminology redolent of Jewish eschatology and only slightly akin to Greek ideas about immortality; yet, it is remarkable that this somewhat Hellenized Jew of Alexandria says nothing about a resurrection of the just or of the wicked, although such a belief had already been stated in the Book of Daniel a century before he wrote and had been carried to Alexandria from Palestine by 2 Maccabees. Perhaps, already, a resurrection of dead, just men for their reward had become a laughingstock to certain elements of Hellenized Judaism as it was for the SADDUCEES and for Paul's audience at Athens (Acts 17.32). A definitive doctrine about retribution after death had to wait for the proclamation of Christ's victory over sin and death before it could evoke a longing response of faith from those who saw in Christ the fulfillment of OT desires.

Retribution in the New Testament

The problem of temporal reward and punishment did not disappear as soon as Christians believed that the ultimate retribution for just and wicked alike would come at the PAROUSIA of the Lord Jesus.

TEMPORAL RETRIBUTION

The recompense for following Jesus was nothing other than the possession of the kingdom of God (Mt 5.1–11). This kingdom, however, was to have two stages in its existence, one in this world, governed by the Lord Jesus through the Holy Spirit, the other in heaven, the final kingdom that would come only after the Son had submitted everything, which had been subjected to Him in His kingdom, to the Father (1 Cor 15.24–28; Mt 16.27–28; 10.23; 24.30, 34; 26.64).

In the first stage it would be a sufficient reward for Christ's disciple to be like His master in suffering and service (Mt 10.24–25, 37–39; Mk 10.41–45). In fact, a disciple's happiness on earth was to consist in being insulted and persecuted as Christ had been, for then he knew that his recompense was great in heaven (Mt 5.11–12; Acts 5.40–41; 21.13; 1 Pt 4.13–19; Rom 5.3–4; 2 Cor 12.9–10). Earthly rewards, even the honor accorded holy persons by others, were not to be desired by the Christian whose repayment for virtue was being stored up for him in the secrecy of the Father's realm (Mt 6.1–6). The unjust rich, however, would find that they were completely bankrupt on the Last Day (Jas 5.1–6; Lk 12.16–21; 16.19–26). In the matter of temporal need Christ's disciple must abandon himself completely to God's loving concern; after all, the kingdom itself has been given to him (Lk 12.22–32; Mt 6.25–33). Luke, especially, emphasized that the basic principle of Christian foresight and prudence was the complete detachment from earthly wealth (Lk 14.28–33; 16.1–13). When he prays, the Christian should ask not for what other men are anxious to gain but for whatever good things the Father, who is good, wants to give him, above all, the Holy Spirit (Mt 7.7–11; Lk 11.9–13). The only passage in the NT that seems to offer earthly rewards to Christ's disciples is Mk 10.30: those who have left all to follow Jesus will "receive now in the present time a hundredfold as much, houses, and brothers, and sisters, and mothers, and children, and lands—along with persecutions . . ." However, the obvious parabolic overstatement of this saying, combined with the "along with persecutions," indicates that Christ promises His disciples not a superabundance of material wealth or mere human relations but the supereminent spiritual benefits that will accrue to them even in the present age from being conformed to Him in suffering and poverty, in other words, the graces of Redemption and justification.

Temporal punishment for evil was a more apparent form of retribution for the first stage of God's kingdom. An incestuous Corinthian was delivered to Satan to suffer pain in his physical life so that his spiritual life might be saved on the Day of the Lord (1 Cor 5.2–5). Paul interpreted that the diseases and deaths among the Corinthians were punishments for their irreverent and selfish practices at the celebration of the LORD'S SUPPER (1 Cor 11.30–34). He also warned them against false worship by recalling the sudden punishments meted out to idolaters in the OT (1 Cor 10.6–10, 22). Testing the Holy Spirit by a lie brought instant death to an early Christian couple (Acts 5.1–11).

Jesus, Himself, foretold that the coming of the Son of Man with power would bring about the destruction of Jerusalem before the generation He was addressing passed away (Lk 21.5–36, especially v. 32; Luke, more clearly than Matthew or Mark, distinguished between the coming of the Son's kingdom through the retributive destruction of Jerusalem, the definitive closing of the old order, resulting from its rejection of the Messiah, and the Son's coming on the Last Day to establish His Father's kingdom, described in Lk 17.22–37). Punishment for sin on earth remained, therefore, an important Christian theme that found its fullest expression throughout the book of Revelation, whereas earthly material reward for good actions was hardly, if at all, put forth as a legitimate Christian motive for virtue.

RETRIBUTION AND THE CHRIST MYSTERY

The solidarity of Jesus Christ with the sinfulness of, and the punishment due, all mankind, revealed by the mystery of His salvific death and Resurrection, changed forever humanity's concept of repayment from God for services rendered. Henceforth, mankind was forced to admit, in order to attain happiness, that eternal reward was not due to it apart from Jesus' action. Man's ultimate happiness depended on the acceptance of God's favor manifested to him in Christ's propitiatory death, i.e., on his acceptance by faith of the justifying value and gratuitous nature of Jesus' submission to the Father's will (Rom 3.21–26). Retribution, then, takes on a meaning that identifies it more with Redemption and reconciliation than the just repayment for service given. [See REDEMPTION (IN THE BIBLE)]. A completely innocent man had become sin on behalf of all sinners, i.e., the rest of mankind (2 Cor 5.21). As a result, the Christian can no longer conceive that his ultimate happiness is something due him, except in so far as he is united to Christ, the perfect servant of God. Christ's reward, His Resurrection, exaltation, and His eternal human life with God, is strictly due Him, in accord with the contract He entered into with His Father (Phil 2.5–11). By His obedience the Son freely submitted to the Father's demand for justice in view of mankind's sinfulness, and by being lifted up on the cross He drew to Himself a new human race that could perfectly serve the Divinity through Him (Jn 12.32–33; Rom 5.12–19). The service offered the Father by this new humanity in and through the Son is being and will continue to be rewarded by the life of the Spirit, by which Christians work out their ultimate salvation while on earth (Rom ch. 8); and ultimately, it will be rewarded by the resurrection to an incorruptible life with Christ (1 Cor ch. 15) for each individual. In the world the Christian's union with Christ is already, in a true sense, a participation in the life Christ now leads (Rom 6.1–11; Col 3.1–4). A Johannine theme bears the same message: those who believe in God's Word, who come to the Light and accept Jesus' death as the glorification of the Son of Man, have already been reborn from on high and possess, already, eternal life. For those others who do not accept Him there is only darkness, and the wrath of God already rests upon them (Jn 3.16–21, 31–36). Reward and punishment have become the acceptance or refusal of God's gift in Christ Jesus.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. By L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 2032–40. C. WIÉNER, in Vocabulaire de théologie biblique, ed. X. LÉON-DUFOUR (Paris 1962) 919–925. P. E. DAVIES, The Interpreters' Dictionary of the Bible, ed. G. A. BUTTRICK (Nashville 1962) 4:71–74. E. WÜRTHWEIN, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament, G. KITTEL, (Stuttgart 1935–) 4:710–718. J. GUILLET, Themes of the Bible, tr. A. J. LAMOTHE (Notre Dame, Ind. 1960) 24–170. F. HORST et al., Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 6:1343–49. W. STÄRK, Vorsehung und Vergeltung (Berlin 1931). A. M. DUBARLE, Les Sages d'Israël (Paris 1946) 46–173. E. F. SUTCLIFFE, Providence and Suffering in the Old and New Testaments (London 1953). P. VAN IMSCHOOT, Théologie de l'Ancien Testament, 2 v. (Tournai 1954–56) 303–314.

[J. E. FALLON]

RETZ, JEAN FRANÇOIS PAUL DE GONDI DE

Prelate, controversial churchman and politician, rival and opponent of Cardinal MAZARIN; b. Montmirail, Sept. 20, 1613; d. Paris, Aug. 24, 1679. Paul, as well as others of the De Gondi children, was tutored by Vincent de Paul. Against his inclinations, Paul was marked for the priesthood at an early age, being given a canon's stall at Notre Dame when he was 13 years old. His intelligence and excellent education were attested when at age 18 he published a book called La Conjuration du Comte Jean-Louis de Fièsque, which disclosed his love of intrigue. His subsequent support of the Count of Soissons in his plots against RICHELIEU indicated the turn his career was to take.

Ecclesiastical Career. In 1643 he was appointed coadjutor to his uncle, Archbishop Gondi of Paris, and he was consecrated as titular archbishop of Corinth. As coadjutor of Paris he continued his political activities, became the power behind the Fronde, and openly patronized the Jansenist party. He hoped to supplant Cardinal Jules Mazarin, and so the two churchmen were involved in mutual hostilities for some 20 years. In the contest with Mazarin, he showed his "fine Italian hand," taking delight in Machiavellian tactics, intrigue, and clandestine meetings, and appealing to the emotions of the Parisians, with whom he was very popular. Despite his excessive involvement in politics, Retz's opposition to Mazarin did endear him to Pope Innocent X, who offered him in 1650 the opportunity to become cardinal. His efforts to obtain approval of the French court for the cardinalate forced him into a temporary rapprochement with Mazarin. This Retz accomplished by siding with Mazarin against Prince Louis II de Condé, leader of the Fronde, who was pressing for a final test of strength with the crown. On Sept. 21, 1651, Retz's actions bore fruit; the council, under Mazarin's control, approved his nomination as cardinal.

The expected allegiance of Retz in the feud with Condé was not forthcoming, for he now resumed his opposition to Mazarin despite the fact that he continued to revile Condé at court. Matters were brought to a head when Mazarin was exiled temporarily to appease the Fronde and the populace. Upon his return in late 1652, Mazarin became more powerful than ever; he broke the power of the Fronde and turned to the disposal of Retz. The ambitious Cardinal de Retz was offered the post of representative to Rome, a type of face-saving exile, but he delayed too long in making up his mind and Mazarin had him imprisoned on Dec. 19, 1652. The years of Retz's imprisonment paradoxically proved to be two very important years of his life. During that time, while he languished in the dungeons of Vincennes, he was championed by Pope Innocent X, who knew it was Retz's colleague, Mazarin, who had imprisoned him. Innocent X urged Louis XIV to free Retz, but meanwhile he referred the matter to the College of Cardinals. Protests from French bishops and from Rome failed to move Mazarin, who was now firmly established in power. Mazarin at one point offered Retz freedom if he would resign as coadjutor of Paris, an offer Retz declined, saying he would rather die in prison than resign. The imprisoned cardinal became the subject of a new controversy between Mazarin and the Jansenists, who expressed sympathy for Retz. The situation was radically changed when on March 21, 1654, the archbishop of Paris died, and Retz automatically became archbishop. Retz was then pressed by Louis XIV to resign and was offered in recompense the income of seven abbeys yielding 120,000 livres. Retz resigned but Innocent X refused to accept the resignation knowing it was under pressure.

On Aug. 8, 1654, Retz succeeded in breaking out of prison and escaping to Spain. The pope approved of his escape and assured him of his protection. Mazarin, on the other hand, ordered the rearrest of Retz and took measures to deprive him of the archiepiscopal see of Paris, but Pope Innocent X in November of 1654 received the exiled cardinal with full honors in Rome. Retz then retracted his resignation of the Paris see and took up residence in Rome, whence he assailed Paris with letters that were publicly burned by Mazarin. While in Rome between 1654 and 1662 Retz continued to engage in ecclesiastical affairs and in European politics.

Last Years. After Mazarin's death on March 9, 1661, Retz wished to return to France, but Louis XIV refused to receive him unless he resigned the archbishopric of Paris. This he did in 1662; he then received the previously mentioned income and took up residence at the Abbey of Saint-Denis. His career became one of loyal service to Louis XIV, especially in the latter's relations to the Holy See. He succeeded in warding off condemnations and excommunications resulting from the Gallican controversy. As cardinal, he traveled to Rome for three conclaves, those that elected Clement IX in 1667, Clement X in 1670, and Innocent XI in 1676. Retz received eight votes at the last-mentioned conclave. The last four years of his life gave evidence of a remarkable spiritual conversion. In 1675 he became a penitent at the Benedictine Monastery of Saint-Mihiel, and that same year he resigned his cardinalate. In a letter to the pope he stated that he wished by becoming a monk at Saint-Mihiel to make up for the harm done to the Church by his evil conduct in the past. Pope Clement X refused his resignation, but Retz remained in isolation at Saint-Mihiel for three years, scarcely leaving the monastery. He spent the last year of his life at Saint-Denis. During his last years he founded an institute for young girls attached to the Ladies of Charity. He also completed his Mémoires, a valuable source of information about court and ecclesiastical life during his times.

Bibliography: H. R. GUGGISBERG, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 5:1073. F. ALBERT-BUISSON, Le Cardinal de Retz: Portrait (Paris 1954). L. BATIFFOL, Le Cardinal de Retz (Paris 1927). F. R. DE CHANTELAUZE, Le Cardinal de Retz et l'affaire du chapeau, 2 v. (Paris 1878); Le Cardinal de Retz et ses missions diplomatiques à Rome (Paris 1879). A. GAZIER, Les Dernières années du Cardinal de Retz (Paris 1875). P. G. LORRIS, Le Cardinal de Retz, un agitateur au XVII^e siècle (Paris 1956). D. OGG, Cardinal de Retz (London 1912). J. T. DE CASTELNAU, Retz et son temps (Paris 1955).

[J. W. BUSH]

REUHLIN, JOHANN

German humanist, Hebrew scholar; b. Pforzheim, Feb. 22, 1455; d. Bad Liebenzell, Germany, June 30, 1522. He studied liberal arts at Freiburg im Breisgau, Paris (beginning Greek there), and Basel, and then law at Orléans and Poitiers (licentiate, 1481). Next he accompanied Duke Eberhard of Württemberg to Italy, where he met Marsilio FICINO. He received a Doctor of Laws degree from Tübingen and remained in the service of Duke Eberhard. In 1490 he made a second Italian trip, meeting PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA. On a mission to the imperial court at Linz (1492), he continued his study of Hebrew. The accession of an unfriendly duke drove Reuchlin to Heidelberg (1496), where he associated with humanists such as Jakob Wimpfeling. In 1498 he made his third Italian trip. He next became judge of the Swabian League (1502–13). Later he held professorships at Ingolstadt (1520–21) and Tübingen (1521–22). Despite his busy public career, Reuchlin was always the humanist. In 1475 he published a Latin dictionary, and later he made translations from Greek. At Heidelberg he wrote two Latin comedies, Henno and Sergius. He was seeking to recover ancient wisdom, but in his view all true wisdom stemmed ultimately from the Hebrew revelation. Hence he was one of the first to attempt mastery of Hebrew. He not only succeeded in learning it, but also produced the books that firmly established Hebrew studies in Germany: De rudimentis hebraicis (1506) and De accentibus et orthographia linguae hebraicae (1518). He was seeking ancient wisdom and thought he had found it in Jewish CABALA, which inspired his De verbo mirifico (1494) and De arte cabalistica (1517). These two works, though tending toward a potentially dangerous syncretism, aimed to demonstrate the truth of Christianity with the aid of Cabala. The most famous episode in Reuchlin's life was his controversy with the converted Jew Johannes PFEFFERKORN and the Dominicans of Cologne. Pfefferkorn had urged the destruction of all Hebrew books. Consulted by the emperor, Reuchlin argued (1510) that such a measure would be both unjust and disastrous for Christian scholarship. Pfefferkorn denounced him in Handspiegel, and Reuchlin replied bitterly in Augenspiegel (1511). The issue broadened when the inquisitor Jacob van Hoogstraten, OP, tried to convict Reuchlin of heresy. In 1516 Pope Leo X suspended the case and enjoined silence. After the Reformation had created a new mood, Leo issued a mandate (June 20, 1520) condemning the Augenspiegel. Long before this, however, the case became the symbol of a bitter struggle between conservative scholastic theologians and defenders of the new humanistic studies. Reuchlin called the humanists to his support (see HUMANISM, CHRISTIAN). The result was a flood of pamphlets, of which the most famous was the savage satire EPISTOLAE OBSCURORUM VIRORUM. Despite his difficulties with the theologians, Reuchlin was consistently obedient to Rome and cool toward Luther and toward his own nephew MELANCHTHON.

Bibliography: J. REUCHLIN, Briefwechsel, ed. L. GEIGER (Tübingen 1875). L. GEIGER, Johann Reuchlin: Sein Leben und seine Werke (Leipzig 1871). L. W. SPITZ, The Religious Renaissance of the German Humanists (Cambridge, Mass. 1963) 61–80. M. KREBS, ed., Johannes R., 1455–1522: Festgabe seiner Vaterstadt Pforzheim zur 500. Wiederkehr seines Geburtstages (Pforzheim 1955).

Johann Reuchlin, woodcut engraving. (Archive Photos)

[C. G. NAUERT, JR.]

REUSCH, FRANZ HEINRICH

Ecclesiastical historian and theologian; b. Brilon in Westphalia, Germany, Dec. 4, 1825; d. Bonn, March 3, 1900. Reusch attended the Universities of Bonn (1843–45), Tübingen (1845–46), and Munich (1846–47), studied privately at Brilon (1847), then entered the seminary in Cologne (1848) where he was ordained (1849). After serving as chaplain at St. Alban's in Cologne (1849–53), he went to Bonn as a lecturer (1854–58) and became professor of Old Testament exegesis in 1858.

He played a prominent part in the foundation of the Kölnische Blätter (Kölnische Volkzeitung from 1869). From 1866 to 1877 he was editor of the Theologisches Literaturblatt, which provided critical surveys of theological publications. Apart from newspaper articles and translations of works by NEWMAN and WISEMAN, Reusch's writings before 1870 dealt with Old Testament exegesis, chiefly with the deuterocanonical books. His Einleitung in das Alte Testament appeared in 1859. In 1862 his account of the final chapters of Genesis and their relation to contemporary natural sciences appeared as Bibel und Natur (Eng. tr., 2 v. 1886). Catholics regarded these two works highly, but Protestants found little in them to praise.

Reusch refused to accept the definition of papal infallibility by VATICAN COUNCIL I and was excommunicated by the archbishop of Cologne (1872). He joined the OLD CATHOLICS, took charge of their parish in Bonn, and served as vicar-general to Joseph Reinkens, the first Old Catholic bishop. Reusch was not an extremist and limited his protest to what he termed "Romanism" in the Catholic Church. The reformist trend among the Old Catholics displeased him. When they abolished clerical celibacy in 1878, he resigned his offices and joined DÖLLINGER in passive protest against papal infallibility, but did not return to the Church.

Modern Church history, rather than exegesis, was Reusch's major scholarly interest in the second half of his life. He produced a work on Luis de LEÓN in 1873 and another on Galileo Galilei in 1879. His famous two-volume study of the Index, Index der verbotenen Bücher (1883–85), has not been superseded. In conjunction with Döllinger, he published Geschichte der Moralstreitigkeiten in der römisch-katholischen Kirche seit dem 16. Jahrhundert (2 v. 1889), which remains the sole comprehensive explanation of the modern disputes among Catholics concerning moral theology. Reusch also published two collections of articles by Döllinger after the latter's death. Reusch was a profound scholar, an untiring worker, and a zealous, morally upright priest. His convictions concerning papal infallibility were sincere.

Bibliography: L. K. GOETZ, Franz Heinrich Reusch (Gotha 1901). J. E. B. MAYOR, Franz Heinrich Reusch (Cambridge, Eng. 1901). F. H. MENN, "Reusch als Schriftsteller," Revue internationale de théologie 14 (1906) 38–72, 462–468, 729–744; 15 (1907) 75–93, 462–480. R. BÄUMER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 8:1267.

[V. CONZEMIUS]

REVELATION, BOOK OF

The Book of Revelation, generally placed last in the New Testament canon, is known in many Catholic Bibles as the Book of the Apocalypse, which in Greek means "revelation." This article treats the book's authorship and canonicity, occasion, date of composition, contents, unity, the character of the visions, and methods of interpretation, but first it addresses the question of the Book's literary genre.

Apocalyptic Genre. One of the most debated points has been the literary genre of Revelation. It has traditionally been assumed that Revelation belongs to the genre of Apocalyptic works. It exhibits many characteristics of this genre: mythological influences, dualism, the role of angels and Satan, a rich symbolic matrix and an emphasis on the eschaton.

In spite of these similarities, Revelation lacks one of the most critical elements of APOCALYPTIC works: pseudonymity. Apocalyptic works are normally attributed to famous individuals of antiquity. To explain the time lag between when they were supposedly written and when they appeared, the author posits a sealing up of the book until the author's day (Dn 12.9). The author of Revelation, however, openly calls himself John and never speaks of a sealing (in fact, the opposite in Rv 22.10). The suggestion that the author might be attributing the book to John, the apostle, is discounted by some (A. Yarbro Collins) who argue that the author never gives identifying information such as genealogies (as in 2 Ezr 1.1–3) or historical references to the apostle John's life (as is done with Paul's role in the PASTORAL EPISTLES). These arguments, although impressive, are not entirely conclusive. The reference to Patmos in Rv 1.9, for example, might be a reference to a contemporary tradition in the early Church concerning John. Furthermore, the book expresses a certain urgency because the events described are already in process. The fact that the revelation was not sealed might be due to the urgency of proclaiming it in light of the impending eschaton.

Many of those who argue that the book is not apocalyptic suggest that it belongs to a prophetic genre (Aune, Hill, Schüssler-Fiorenza). The author describes his work as a prophecy (1.3; 22.7, 10, 18, 19), and in this prophetic role he affirms and corrects the seven churches of Asia Minor (2–3). He contrasts his true prophetic status to that of the false prophets Jezebel and Balaam. Finally, the seven angels of the seven churches could be local prophets who were to communicate and interpret the message to their communities.

The question remains, however, whether the author of Revelation wanted to make a distinction between the apocalyptic and prophetic genres. He shows tendencies of both, as well as influences from Wisdom literature (Vanni) and Greek drama (Blevins). He is similarly eclectic with his theology. In addition to the traditional attribution of the book to Johannine theology, Schüssler-Fiorenza has documented considerable Pauline influences. Thus, while accepting elements from the various genres and theologies, the author seems to have been producing his own original synthesis which defies easy classification.

Authorship and Canonicity. When giving his name as John (1.1, 4, 9, 22.8) the author identifies himself as a Christian prophet (22.6, 9; see also 1.3; 10.11). An early tradition equates him with John the Apostle: the Gnostic Apocryphon of John (c. A.D. 150 or earlier), Justin Martyr (c. 160), Irenaeus (c. 175), the MURATORIAN CANON (c. 200), Tertullian (c. 200), and Clement of Alexandria (c. 200). Despite this persistent tradition, nowhere does the author claim the identification JOHN THE APOSTLE. About this time the ALOGOI, led by the Roman priest Caius, in reaction to the abuse of Apocalypse by the Montanists, ascribed both the Gospel according to St. John and Revelation to the heretic Cerinthus and denied their canonicity. Though St. DIONYSIUS OF ALEXANDRIA (d. 264) considered Revelation an inspired writing, he questioned its apostolic authorship because of literary and theological considerations similar to those that prompt most modern scholars to posit different authors for the Fourth Gospel and Revelation. Dionysius' arguments are reproduced by Eusebius (Ecclesiastical History 7:25; Sources Chrétiennes 41:204–210), who also credits John the Presbyter with the writing of Revelation (ibid., 3.39.5; Sources Chrétiennes 31:154–155). Between A.D. 300 and 450 a number of the Fathers of the Church in the East, especially of the Antiochian School, excluded Revelation from the Canon. During the same period, however, it was accepted in the West and in the East by Athanasius, Cyril of Alexandria, Basil, Gregory of Nyssa, and others, all of whom assumed apostolic authorship of the book. In final analysis it seems hardly probable that both the Fourth Gospel and the Book of Revelation were authored by the same person.

An illustration of a scene from Revelation Chapter 16. (©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

Occasion. Like other APOCALYPTIC literature, John's was occasioned by a religious crisis. He wrote to encourage Christians, in the first instance those of Asia Minor, to be steadfast even to martyrdom in the face of the social, economic, and legal pressures that made it increasingly difficult to avoid taking part in pagan religious practices, especially emperor worship. Many had become disheartened and disillusioned because the glorious return of Christ, His PAROUSIA, which they had been eagerly expecting, seemed to recede farther and farther from the horizon of their hope.

John himself had been exiled to the penal island of Patmos for having borne witness to the word of God (Rv 1.9–10), probably for preaching Christianity and refusing to participate in the state religion. Intensely worried over the fate of the churches (5.4), he was caught up in rapture on a certain Sunday and received supernatural assurances from the glorified Jesus, whom he saw; these he was commanded to write on a scroll and send to seven important churches of Asia Minor (1.10–20). The visions and auditions granted him reminded the Christians that Jesus is Lord of all history, both as Son of God and as Redeemer; He is as truly present in the churches even now, though invisibly, as He will be in His Parousia, which is certain to come. The trials that Jesus' followers are suffering have been foreseen and foreordained; many more will be called to suffer martyrdom before the end. Pagan Rome, however, is doomed to destruction, and a glorious future of unending happiness awaits all those who suffer with patient endurance.

Date of Composition. Most commentators, ancient and modern, think that the Book of Revelation received its present form in the last years of the reign of Domitian (81–96). Internal evidence can be adduced that confirms this external consensus. Some scholars, however, believe that the historical background of Revelation was the reign of either Nero [54–68; the cryptograph 666 in Rv 13.18 is probably the name Nero by gematria; see NUMEROLOGY (IN THE BIBLE)] or Vespasian (69–79). The simplest explanation of the enigmatic statement in 17.9 that “five [emperors] have fallen” indicates the reign of Vespasian.

A combination of both views is proposed by several authors: either the present Revelation resulted from the fusion of two earlier apocalypses (see below), or John resorted to the popular apocalyptic device of antedating his work, i.e., though writing under Domitian he adopted the standpoint of the time of Nero or Vespasian.

Contents. The introduction (1.1–20) includes a superscription (1.1–3); an epistolary introduction (1.4–6), like those of the Pauline Epistles; a solemn assurance of the Parousia (1.7–8); and the historical occasion of the work; the first prophetic investiture of John (1.9–20). The body of the book contains two main sections of unequal length: (1) the letters to the seven churches of Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamum, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea (ch. 2–3); and, (2) the main section that recounts a number of visions that are sometime referred to as “the apocalypse of the future” (ch. 4–22). An epilogue (22.6–21) confirms in Christ's words what has been previously promised.

The Seven Letters. The letters to the seven churches of Asia Minor provide an opportunity for the author to address specific problems in these communities. They are a type of examination of conscience conducted by Jesus. Ephesus is commended for its faithfulness and scolded for its lack of charity, possibly referring to an over zealous attempt to preserve orthodoxy which has led to judgmentalism and division. Smyrna and Philadelphia are encouraged to remain faithful in the face of persecution organized by the Jews. Sardis and Laodicea are warned that they must give clear witness to the truth and not allow themselves to be complacent. The Christians of Ephesus, Pergamum, and Thyatira are warned about those with Gnostic tendencies who visit or reside in their communities.

The call in all seven of these letters is to faithful endurance. It is a theme which forms the core of the message of Revelation: trust in God and be faithful to him until the end.

The Church and Judaism. The visions of the main section are partly parallel and fall into two clearly defined sections: the Church and Judaism (ch. 4–11), and the Church and the ANTICHRISTS. The preparatory vision in heaven (ch. 4–5) serves as a second prophetic investiture for the revelation of God's interventions from the Resurrection of Christ to the fall of Jerusalem, including the rejection of the Jews and assurance of their ultimate conversion. Transported to the heavenly temple, John sees in God's hand a seven-sealed scroll, containing the divine decrees that govern all history. Only Christ as Redeemer can open and disclose the contents of the scroll. As the first four seals are successively broken (ch. 6), four horsemen appear—white [representing either the victory of the Gospel (cf. Mk 13.10) or imperialism], red (war), black (famine), and pale green (pestilence and death); the scene is like that in Jesus' apocalyptic discourse (Mk 13.5–8 and parallels, especially Lk 21.8–11). The opening of the fifth seal discloses the martyrs praying for a hastening of divine judgment and vengeance upon their persecutors, while the sixth introduces upheavals in nature, described in current apocalyptic clichés. An intermediate vision (ch. 7) shows how the elect, both Jewish and Gentile Christians, are preserved from the punitive aspect of the plagues.

The seventh seal, silence in heaven (8.1), ushers in the seven apocalyptic trumpets, introduced by a vision that depicts them as the answer to the prayers of Christians (8.2–6). The first four trumpets (8.7–12) herald calamities reminiscent of the PLAGUES OF EGYPT, though it is futile to ask what specific realities the seer had in mind. An eagle (8.13) warns that the last three trumpet blasts are to be special woes. The fifth shows a huge infernal invasion, while the sixth summons a vast demonic horde from the Euphrates to destroy a third of mankind (9.1–20). S. Giet here finds apocalyptic allusion to different phases of the Jewish War of A.D. 66–70.

A second intermediate vision (10.1–11) prepares for the universal character of the revelations to follow and includes a third prophetic investiture of John, that to the Gentiles, symbolized by the eating of a small scroll (10.8–11). This vision, however, anticipates (as frequently in Revelation), since John has not yet finished his predictions regarding Judaism.

The measuring of the Temple and the preaching, death, and resurrection of the two witnesses (11.1–14) depict parabolically the temporary rejection of the Jews, the witness of the Church through “Moses and the Prophets” to Christ in the face of Jewish opposition to Him, and the final conversion of the REMNANT OF ISRAEL, referred to also in Rom 9–11, especially 11.25–29. The seventh trumpet depicts the culmination of the covenant in the opening of heaven (11.15–19).

The Church and the Antichrists (ch. 12–19). Seven “signs” seen by John portray various aspects of the conflict between the Church and anti-God forces, as incarnate initially in pagan, emperor-worshipping Rome. The Church is presented as the WOMAN CLOTHED WITH THE SUN, who gives birth to the Messiah, whom the great red dragon, Satan (cf. Gn 3.15), tries in vain to destroy; the Church is driven underground (12.1–6). The heavenly counterpart of this battle shows Michael casting Satan to earth (12.7–12), where he pursues the woman, divinely protected in the desert (12.13–18). Satan calls up two lieutenants: the “beast from the sea,” the political anti-christ, the Roman Empire with its emperor worship (13.1–10); and the “beast of the earth,” the philosophical and theological antichrist (13.11–18).

As in 7.1–17, an intermediate vision portrays the heavenly security of the faithful with the Lamb (Christ) on Mount Sion (14.1–5). Three angels successively warn all mankind to fear God, predict the fall of Babylon-Rome, and threaten eternal damnation (14.6–11). A heavenly voice proclaims that the faithful who have died even now enjoy their reward (14.12–13). An anticipatory vision shows the Last Judgment, the reprobation of the wicked, and the ingathering of the elect (14.14–20).

After a brief introductory scene (15.1–8), the final septenary of plagues is hurriedly described as the outpouring of the wrath of God from seven bowls. The effects that follow remind the reader, though in heightened form, of the Egyptian plagues and the first four trumpets (16.1–12). Probably they create a dramatic effect rather than specify concrete happenings of the future. Between the sixth and seventh bowls three frog-like evil spirits summon the kings of the earth for the great final battle with the forces of God (16.14–16). After the last bowl, Babylon-Rome falls amid great upheavals in nature (16.17–21).

Once more the fall of Babylon is depicted, now under the image of the great harlot who leads the world astray and persecutes the Christians (17.1–18). Her destruction is dwelt upon with relish (18.1–24) and hailed by heavenly songs of triumph (19.1–10). Seated upon a white horse, Christ appears, His garments red with His own blood, or, according to many interpreters, with the blood of His enemies (19.11–16). Again the destruction of the beasts is proclaimed (19.17–21).

Next Satan is chained, the millennium (see MILLENNARIANISM) is rapidly mentioned, and Satan is unloosed but summarily defeated along with his followers and cast into hell after the judgment (20.1–15).

The Consummation (21.1–22.5). The new heaven and the new earth (21.1–8) and the heavenly Jerusalem, of which God and the Lamb are temple and sun, with the river and tree of life, are the figures used to disclose final glory, which the elect enjoy for all eternity.

Unity. The inconsistencies and repetitions in the Book of Revelation have often raised the question: Is this a single composition or a conflation of more than one writing? Impressed by the uniformity of style and vocabulary and the closely knit character of the work, most scholars judge that Revelation is the work of one author. M. E. Boismard has revived and modified the opinion of R. Charles that both divergences and unity of style can be accounted for by distinguishing two apocalypses, both written by the same disciple of John the Apostle. Boismard dates what he calls Text 1 from a time toward the end of Vespasian’s reign; Text 2, the reign of Nero; the letters of ch. 2–3, that of Domitian. The fusion of the three parts was made by another writer, who slightly retouched his sources [M. E. Boismard, “L’Apocalypse ou les Apocalypses de saint Jean?” Revue biblique 56 (1949) 507–541].

Character of the Visions and Literary Form. Do the visions of Revelation purport to be a precise description of what John actually saw and heard? Or are they merely a literary device, as in the case of the noncanonical apocalyptic writings and probably also of the Book of DANIEL? The first alternative must be ruled out because of the inconsistencies and contradictions, the improbable images that this would involve. The second alternative, while it would not militate against the admittedly inspired nature of the book, yet fails to account for the realism of the descriptions and the impression conveyed that the writer seriously intended to report a supernatural mystical experience.

Accordingly, many students of Revelation today hold that John actually had a supernatural vision (or visions) with accompanying revelations from Christ that he was told to write down. When he carried out this order, he naturally resorted to the apocalyptic literary form, because it was the best-known vehicle, using symbols and imagery of every kind, to report as best he could experiences that defied the limitations of human speech.

One characteristic of the Book of Revelation that must be stressed is its use of the OT. It has been computed that in the 404 verses of Revelation, 518 OT citations and allusions are found, 88 of them from Daniel; 278 of the 404 verses are made up of reminiscences of Scripture, especially (besides Daniel) Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Zechariah, Psalms, and Exodus. Revelation is, then, a re-reading of the OT in the light of the Christian event. There is also good reason to surmise, with Origen, that the scroll that John saw (5.1–8) is the OT. Christ alone could open it because it finds in Him its ultimate meaning. The Christological reading of the Scriptures is, in the last analysis, the answer to the anguished questions and problems that faced the churches in John's day and in all times.

Methods of Interpretation. A. Feuillet has classified the systems of interpretation relevant to this study ("Les diverses méthodes d'interprétation de l'Apocalypse . . .," Ami du Clergé 71 [April 27, 1961] 257–270). The labels he attached to the five different systems summarized here indicate emphasis of each.

Recapitulation. This method goes back to VICTORINUS OF PETTAU (martyred under Diocletian); it was adopted by Tyconius, Augustine, and other commentators, medieval and modern. In its most developed form, that of E. B. Allo, it may be summarized thus: the septenaries of the seals (6.1–8.1) and the trumpets (8.2–9.21) describe the future of the world from the glorification of Christ to the Last Judgment, mentioned as early as 11.15–18, with emphasis upon world events. The section 12.1–21.8 covers the same period, but centering on the role of the Church. The millennium describes the same period from another viewpoint (20.1–15), and even the description of the heavenly Jerusalem (21.1–22.5), though it offers a transcendent image of the Church, takes in the Church both on earth and in heaven, under the regime of grace as well as of glory.

While there is much truth in this reading of Apocalypse, the evidence of chronological progression rules out the sweeping nature of Allo's parallelism. It seems true, nevertheless, that while alluding to specific events of his time and of the past and predicting the future to the end of the world, John has in mind some succession of events, which he sees, perhaps, less as individual facts than as "laws" that mark God's dealing with mankind and the Church through all ages.

World History. JOACHIM OF FIORE (d. 1201) popularized the system that sees in the septenaries of Revelation seven periods in the history of the Church; Nicholas of Lyra (d. 1340) systematized this exegesis and gave it a stricter chronology. Again and again, in various forms, it has been proposed, even in modern times, especially in popularizations. Because it was based upon a misunderstanding of prophecy and of the apocalyptic genre, it has had to be revised and corrected whenever events belied previous conclusions drawn from it.

Eschatological. The originator of this interpretation was Francisco de RIBERA, whose commentary appeared in 1591; it has been called the beginning of scientific study of Revelation. Ribera held that only the first five seals refer to the primitive Church down to the reign of Trajan. The last seals and the rest of the book have to do with the end-time. Since then this system has been favored by many commentators, some of whom assume that John thought the Parousia near and did not reckon with the possibility of a long future for the Church.

Historicizing. To some extent this method is at opposite poles from the eschatological. Inaugurated by J. Henten in the middle of the 16th century, it holds that at least part of Revelation refers to contemporary or past events. Henten interpreted ch. 6–11 as referring to the abrogation of Judaism, ch. 12–19 as referring to the destruction of paganism. Modern proponents of this view differ in regard to the amount of contemporary or past material they find in Revelation.

Liturgical. John intended his work to be read in the liturgical service of the churches (1.3). Revelation is admittedly full of references and allusions both to the liturgy of the OT and to the Christian Eucharistic service. John receives his inaugural vision on a Sunday, possibly during the liturgical service. He is invited up to heaven (ch. 4), where a cosmic service of praise and adoration takes place that is reminiscent of OT inaugural visions (cf. Isaiah ch. 6, where the vision takes place in the Temple, and Ezekiel ch. 1–3) as well as the Christian service (the throne of the bishop surrounded by the 24 elders suggesting the sanctuary setting of the ancient Eucharistic service). The description of the heavenly Jerusalem (ch. 20–21) is also cast in liturgical forms. Again, the hymns scattered throughout Revelation are probably echoes of Christian hymns at the seer's time. That the structure of Revelation itself was modeled upon the early liturgy has been argued by M. H. Shepherd, The Paschal Liturgy and the Apocalypse, Ecumenical Studies in Worship 6 (Richmond, Va. 1960).

See Also: APOCALYPSE, ICONOGRAPHY OF; APOCALYPTIC MOVEMENTS.

Bibliography: A. FEUILLET, L'Apocalypse: État de la question (Bruges 1963), introductory problems to date and thorough bibliog. E. B. ALLO, Saint Jean: L'Apocalypse (3rd ed., Paris 1933); Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928) 1:306–325. E. LOHSE, Die Offenbarung des Johannes (Das Neue Testament Deutsch 11; 8th ed. Göttingen 1960). S. GIET, L'Apocalypse et l'histoire (Paris 1957). J. BLEVINS, "The Genre of Revelation," Review and Expositor 77 (1980) 393–408. G. CAIRD, A Commentary of the Revelation of St. John the Divine (New York 1966). D. HILL, "Prophecy and Prophets in the Revelation of St. John," New Testament Studies 18 (1971–72) 401–418. J. LAMBRECHT, ed., L'Apocalypse johannique et l'Apocalyptique dans le Nouveau Testament (Louvain 1980). R. MOUNCE, The Book of Revelation (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1977). E. SCHÜSSLER-FIORENZA, The Book of Revelation: Justice and Judgment (Philadelphia 1985). J. SWEET, Revelation (Philadelphia 1979). U. VANNI, "La Riflessione Sapienziale come atteggiamento ermeneutico costante nell'Apocalisse," Rivista Biblica Italia 24 (1976) 185–197; La Struttura letteraria dell'Apocalisse (Rome 1971). A. Y. COLLINS, Crisis and Catharsis: The Power of the Apocalypse (Philadelphia 1984).

[E. F. SIEGMAN/J. WINKLER]

REVELATION, CONCEPT OF (IN THE BIBLE)

Primarily, revelation is the act of God, seen in the progressive unfolding of His eternal plan of salvation in Christ, by which He manifests and communicates Himself to people, calls the Church into being, and invites the loving response of assent and obedience; secondarily, it is the body of truth that is made known through God's unfolding plan. The nature of revelation can be seen both in the OT and in the NT.

Revelation in the OT

Under this heading will be considered the hidden God and His revelation of Himself through His word and through His entrance into history.

The Hidden God. God is, above all else, holy (Is 6.3), which means that He is entirely "other," exalted above men, transcendent, inaccessible. He dwells in the heavens (Gn 28.12–13; Dt 26.15; 1 Kgs 8.30); no one can see His face and live (Ex 19.21; 33.20; Dt 18.16); He is shrouded in darkness in the Holy of Holies and even in theophanies (Ex 20.21; Dt 4.11; Ps 80[81].8; 1 Kgs, 8.12); He is a hidden God (Is 45.15). The NT concurs (see Mt 11.27; Lk 10.21–22; Jn 1.18; 6.46; 1 Tm 6.16; 1 Jn 4.12).

The author of Wisdom (1st century B.C.) is the first to assert clearly that men can come to know God through reason—but he then blames them for not worshipping Him (Wis 13.1–9). St. Paul, in the NT, argues in much the same way (Acts 14.15–17; 17.22–31; Rom 1.18–32); the Gentile may have the law of God in his heart (Rom 2.14–15), but all have sinned (Rom 3.23); before the time of revelation in Christ the Gentiles lived in "times of ignorance" (Acts 17.30), for the world did not come to knowledge of God by human wisdom (1 Cor 1.21). Thus biblical authors admit the possibility of a knowledge of God derived by reasoning from creation, but assert that, historically, it had not led to a personal knowledge, i.e., one expressed by worship and moral commitment. Much less was God's particular plan of salvation known through reason; it was somewhat hidden even from the Angels (1 Pt 1.12). The Israelites did, in fact, believe that creation revealed God (Ps 18[19].2–5; 103[104]), because it was viewed as subservient to His will and as controlled directly by Him: the phenomena of creation were looked upon as acts of God. Thus, a storm could be a theophany (Ps 28[29]); calamities such as famine (2 Sm 21) or plague (2 Sm 24) manifested His anger; a flight of quail (Nm 11.31), a timely wind (Ex 14.21), or a hail-storm (Jos 10.11—"the Lord hurled great stones") marked His providential intervention. This approach was valid for the Hebrew who had already met God the Creator and now contemplated Him in His works, even though it did not distinguish between the natural and the supernatural.

Revelation through God's Word. The transcendent invisible God who can be known but imperfectly by reason shows merciful condescension by revealing Himself to man. God's will to reveal is attested by specific texts (Am 3.7; Is 45.19; Nm 12.6; Dt 18.15–18; Dn 2.47; Sir 42.19) and by a wide variety of terms and expressions. God uncovers or reveals (gālā) some truth or quality (in qal or piel) or Himself (niphāl); He makes Himself known (niphāl of yāda') or causes another to know (hiphil); He appears (is seen—niphāl of rā'ā) or makes someone to see a fact, His glory, a vision (hiphil); He causes someone to hear His word, voice, judgment (hiphil of šāma'); He announces (higgîd); He speaks (dibbēr); He says ('amar); His word (dābār) comes to the prophets. The niphāl of the verb often has some divine force or quality as subject, such as word, glory, arm, or salvation.

It is God, acting as a person, who takes the initiative in communicating Himself to men. To seek revelation through divination, necromancy, and other forms of magic was strictly forbidden (Dt 18.9–14), though one might seek (dāraš, šā'al) an answer from a qualified spokesman of God, such as a priest or prophet.

Revelation is accomplished primarily by means of God's "word." Even when God came to man in dream, vision, or THEOPHANY, it was still, often enough, His word that clarified the event's meaning (Jer 1.11–14; Am 7.7–9; Dn 7.15–18; Ex 19.9–11). Priest, PROPHET, and sage spoke God's word, but in differing manner and degree (Jer 18.18).

The Word of the Law. The Ten COMMANDMENTS in particular are called words (Ex 34.28; Dt 4.13; 10.4), but the term includes also other legislation (Dt 4.2). By a prophetic experience Moses understood the response that God required of the people He had called out of Egypt, and the laws he mediated were for them a valid expression of God's moral will. Much of the legislation of the Pentateuch came from later times and was evolved in priestly circles, where it continued to develop, in the spirit of the Mosaic legislation, into a law code that would ever more perfectly reveal God's moral will. In this further development, the influence of prophetic teaching was incalculable.

The Prophetic Word. For the Hebrew mind, the word had a dynamic reality (Is 40.6–8; 55.10–11). The word that was spoken by the prophet was the Lord's word (e.g., the formula "the word of the Lord came to X"; Is 38.4; Jer 28.12) and partook of all the might of His will. But how did this word come to them? One should not think of an audible message; much less can it be imagined that the word was literally placed in Jeremiah's mouth (Jer 1.9). These expressions indicate the prophet's conviction that he was speaking the message of the Lord. The prophet had experienced the holiness, personality, and will of God in an inexpressible way (Is 6; Jer 1; Ez 1–2), a way that set him apart from his fellows; he was conscious of having been admitted to the council of God (Jer 23.18, 22). It was in the light of this experience that he viewed the concrete historical situation and pronounced God's judgments and promises to the men of his time.

Unlike the word of the false prophet (Jer 23.16–32), the true prophet's message cannot be explained as the product of inclination, environment, or political insight. He was a man under compulsion to speak a message not his own (Jer 1.6–7; 20.7–9; Am 3.8) to men who would gladly have been rid of him (Jer 26.7–15; Ez 3.4–11; Am 2.11–12; 7.10–13) and from whom his vocation cut him off (Is 8.11–15; Jer 15.17). If he foretold doom to a naive, optimistic, conscienceless people, it was not that he had less faith than they in the mighty power of the Lord to deliver, but because he knew His will. The objective validity of the prophet's conviction that he spoke the word of God was often established in part, at least, by the criteria that led many to accept his message even in his own day: conformity to a mature and truthful conception of God's nature, His demands, and Israel's own inspired tradition (Dt 13.1–6), fulfillment of prophecy (Dt 18.15–22; Jer 28.5–9), and, rarely, miracles (1 Kgs 18.30–39). The final guarantee of their validity, however, rests on the inclusion of their collected oracles in the canon of inspired Scripture.

The Word of Wisdom. Especially in later passages of the sapiential books, wisdom is seen as something much deeper than mere practical advice and is presented as divinely revealed: it belongs to God alone and is hidden from the eyes of man (Job 28), is given to men as a gift (Prv 2.6; Jb 32.8–9; Sir 1.1), and has divine qualities (Wis 7.25–27). Although wisdom, understood in this sense, came to be identified with the Law (Sir 24.22), the development of its meaning owed a great deal to prophetic teaching with which the wisdom writers were deeply imbued. In fact, wisdom was often an application of prophetic teaching (concerned largely with the nation) to the individual.

God's Revelation through History. The secular historian may not feel compelled to admit any special intervention of God in the history of Israel; the escape of slaves, conquest, exile, and restoration are events that can be analyzed and understood, especially since many of the miracles that made them possible are susceptible to naturalistic explanations. The biblical authors, however, believed that in these events the hand of God was revealed. But because such knowledge is by faith, it rests, not upon the events alone, but upon a divinely inspired interpretation of them.

Because the Judeo-Christian revelation is historical in nature, it rests upon the historical event as upon the very material of which it is composed. Yet the external event, no matter how impressive, needs the word before it can adequately reveal God's action and plan; this word is supplied by prophets, i.e., God's spokesmen. The biblical texts in which the events are described already bear the (spokesmen's) interpretation of the events. To describe the deliverance from Egypt as accomplished by the mighty hand of God (Ex 6.1; 32.11) is already an interpretation that refuses to view the events as merely natural phenomena (e.g., the ten plagues). The origin and validity of the interpretation is, of course, all important.

Israelite tradition named Moses as the great leader and first prophet through whom the new faith was mediated, for it was he who explained to the chosen people the significance of the events of the Exodus and even of the fiery theophany on Mt. Sinai (Ex 19.3–21; 20.18–21; Dt 5.22–27). What was affirmed in the accounts of Moses' ascent into the mountain (Ex 19.3, 20; 24.12–18) and his intimate association with the Lord (Ex 33.7–23; Nm 12.6–8; Dt 34.10) was the religious experience that enabled Moses to know and to communicate to the chosen people the significance of what the Lord had done for them. The prophets, in their interpretation of events, were led by God in the same path trodden by Moses. They gave interpretation not only of events past and present but even of those they confidently predicted. From the whole there emerged God's plan of salvation, to be completed only in the NT.

Prophetic interpretation of Israel's history of this kind was incorporated into the historical books of the Bible (see 2 Kgs 17.7–23; 21.10–15). The fact that revelation proceeded by way of God's unfolding plan meant that revelation itself was a progressive thing and that there was a constant, objective increase in its content. This included an ever deeper awareness of God's nature, of His mercy, power, wisdom, and justice. Individual elements of the plan already foreshadowed the whole, e.g., the Exodus, which began the constant theme of deliverance through God's mighty acts (Is 10.25–27; 40.3; 41.17–20; 43.16–21; Jn 8.12; 1 Cor 10.1–12; Rv 15.2–3). The action was irreversible, not cyclical, and would move to a climax understood as "the Day of the Lord" by the prophets (Is 11.11; 12.1; Am 9.11; Jl 3.1–5; Is 26.20–27.13); it would mark the establishment of the kingdom of God on Earth.

Revelation in the NT

God's word in Christ, the Spirit of truth in the Apostles, and human response, referred to in the NT, give further insight into the nature of revelation.

The Word of God in Christ. God, who had formerly spoken through the prophets now spoke through His Son (Heb 1.1–2), whom God sent in the fullness of time (Gal 4.4) and in whom all the promises found their "Yes" (2 Cor 1.20). With the coming of Christ the final age is initiated, the redemptive act of God is accomplished. In His person and work Christ is the perfect revelation and supreme condescension of the transcendent God. It is He whom the prophets foretold (1 Pt 1.10–12).

In the Synoptics. Christ is presented as prophet and as Son of God, whose coming both heralds and inaugurates the kingdom of God, the final age in God's plan of salvation. His exorcisms and cures indicate that the dominion of Satan has been brought to an end and has given place to that of God (Mt 12.25–28; Mk 3.23–26; Lk 11.17–20), while His preaching and parables reveal the nature of the kingdom (Mt 5–7; 13.1–51). His true nature is known only to the Father, who reveals it to the humble, particularly to the Apostles; and the Father is in turn revealed by Jesus (Mt 11.25–27; 16.17; 17.1–5). He foretells His death, Resurrection (Mk 8.31–33; Mt 16.21–23; Lk 9.22), and return in glory (Mk 14.62) and interprets the meaning of His work (Mk 10.45; Lk 24.25–27, 44).

In St. Paul. As in the Synoptics, the advent of Christ marks the final age in God's plan of salvation, but Paul is more concerned with the "mystery" of Christ than with His visible earthly career. By the term "mystery" (μυστήριον) Paul means the unfathomable truth of salvation in Christ, a truth formerly hidden, though foretold by the prophets, and which has now been revealed by God (Rom 16.25–26; 1 Cor 2.7, 10; Eph 1.9–10; Col 1.26; cf. 1 Pt 1.10–12). Basically it refers to God's saving act in Christ and can be equated with Paul's gospel (Eph 6.19), though often it is applied to partial aspects of it (1 Cor 15.51; Eph 3.4–6; 5.32). It is identified with the wisdom of God (1 Cor 1.23–25; 2.7; Col 2.2–3).

God Himself reveals the mystery of Christ: cf. the use of ἀποκαλύπτειν (to reveal—Eph 3.5) and ἀποκάλυψις (revelation—Rom 16.25; Eph 3.3), used always with God as the agent, or in the passive—a reverential way of indicating the divine activity. Other verbs are used in a sense close to that of ἀποκαλύπτειν (sometimes with the Apostles as grammatical subject, as God's agents): γνωρίζειν (to make known—Eph 1.9; 3.3; 6.19; Col 1.27); φωτίζειν (to enlighten—Eph 3.9); φανεροῦν (to manifest—Col 1.26).

This revelation takes place in two stages that mark the beginning and end of the final age, which is now present: the beginning, known by the elect through faith, is accomplished in the Passion and Exaltation of Christ (Rom 1.16–17; 3.21–22; Gal 1.16; Eph 3.3, 5; Col 1.26; 2 Tm 1.10); the end will be manifest to all in the PAROUSIA (παρουσία, ἀποκάλυψις, ἐπιφάνεια), which will be preceded by the revelation of antichrist (2 Thes 2.3, 6, 8). This "Day of the Lord," expected by the prophets, will reveal Christ's glory and the glorious salvation of the faithful (Rom 8.18, 23; 2 Cor 4.13–14; Col 3.4; 1 Thes 4.14–18; 2 Thes 1.10) as well as God's wrath against sinners (Rom 2.5, 8; 1 Thes 1.10)—realities that in fact are already present in a partial and hidden manner.

The conception of revelation as a deposit (παράθηκη) that is to be guarded is found also in 1 Tm 6.20; 2 Tm 1.14; see also the insistence on "sound doctrine" in 1 Tm 1.10–11; 6.3; 2 Tm 1.13.

In St. John. Although St. John does not use ἀποκαλύπτειν except in an OT citation, many other significant terms do occur. He presents Christ as the visible revelation of the invisible Father and makes significant use of φανεροῦν (to manifest—Jn 1.31; 2.11; 3.21; 9.3; 17.6), φῶς (light), φωτίζειν (to enlighten—1.9), γνωρίζειν (to make known—15.15; 17.26).

God has never been seen (Jn 1.18; 6.46; 1 Jn 4.20); it is precisely to reveal Him that Christ has come (1.18; 17.2–3—where knowledge of the Father is identified with eternal life, the gift Jesus has come to confer). Jesus is able to manifest the Father because, divine and preexistent with Him (1.1–2, 18), He came into the world (1.9; 3.2, 19, 31; passim), having been sent by the Father (4.34; 5.23; passim). The mission of Christ is attested by the witness of John the Baptizer (1.7, 15, 32–34; 5.33), by His own works (5.36), by the Scriptures (5.39), and especially by the Father (5.37; 8.18). Christ is able to bear witness to Himself (8.14, 18) and to the truth (18.37), and the words He speaks are God’s words (3.34; 7.17; 8.26, 28, 38, 40). He reveals the Father because He is the visible embodiment of God’s work. He sees the works of the Father, works when He works, and, just as the Father does, He gives life and He judges (5.17–22, 27; cf. 9.3). His miracles are signs because of the deep meaning they carry (2.11, 23; 4.54; passim). His glory is the very glory of the Father (1.14, 51; 2.11; 12.41; 17.5, 22, 24). So fully is He the manifestation of God among men that all must honor Him as they do the Father (5.23). To see Him is to see the Father (14.9), for He and the Father are one (10.30). So perfectly does He reveal the Father that He can be called simply “the Word” (1.1, 14; 1 Jn 1.1).

The Spirit of Truth and the Apostles. Only by the preaching of divinely commissioned agents can people enter by faith into the saving work of Christ (Rom 10.14–15). Yet even at the time of the Ascension the Apostles were far from understanding the true nature of the kingdom established by Christ that was still to be evolved to its full stature (Acts 1.6). Their baptism by the Holy Spirit sent by Christ was needed before they could begin the work entrusted to them (Acts 1.5, 8; 2.1–41). As Christ had promised (Jn 14.26; 16.13), by the guidance of the Spirit the Apostles took important new steps (Acts 10.19–48; 13.2–3) whose significance they fully understood through the Spirit’s enlightenment (Acts 11.15–18; cf. 1 Cor 2.10–16; Eph 3.3–6). By the sending-forth of the Apostles directed by the Holy Spirit, witness was given to enable people to believe (Acts 5.32; cf. Jn 15.26–27); by it, too, the Church was established to carry on the same work for all time and to make universal the revelation that until then had been confined to one nation (Mt 28.19–20; Mk 16.19–20).

Man’s Response. God does not speak in a vacuum but to human beings, and a response is expected. If God “makes to hear” and “makes to know,” then we are expected to “hear” and to “know”—but in the biblical sense of these words. “To hear” is not restricted to audition; it includes loving obedience as well (Ex 3.18; Is 28.12; Jer 11.10; Ez 2.5; Mt 18.17; Lk 16.31). “To know” is a word that summarizes biblical spirituality and includes love and election on God’s part, love, obedience, and faithful adherence on man’s (Is 19.21; Jer 31.34; Hos 2.21–22, 13.4; Am 3.2 “favored”; Jn 10.14–15; 17.3; Phil 3.10; 1 Jn 2.3). This response of loving assent and obedience is termed “faith.” It is a challenge that faces each generation, each individual (Dt 5.3); the choice is free but is by no means presented on a take-it-or-leave-it basis (Dt 30.19; Is 7.9; Jn 6.29–50; 8.24). The clearest example of what is meant by the challenge of revelation and the response of faith is St. Paul’s conversion. When the mystery of Christ was revealed to him (Gal 1.15–16), he considered that he had been “laid hold of” by Christ and pressed on to lay hold of the divine prize (Phil 3.12–14).

See Also: DREAM; MYSTERY (IN THE BIBLE); NECROMANCY; ORACLE (IN THE BIBLE); PROPHETISM (IN THE BIBLE); SALVATION HISTORY (HEILSGESCHICHTE); URIM AND THUMMIM; WORD OF GOD.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 2040–46. M. VERENO and R. SCHNACKENBURG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1104–09. S. H. HOOKE, Alpha and Omega: A Study in the Pattern of Revelation (London 1961). W. PANNENBERG, ed., Offenbarung als Geschichte (Kerygma und Dogma, Beiheft 1; Göttingen 1961). W. BULST, Revelation, tr. B. VAWTER (New York 1965). H. D. McDONALD, Ideas of Revelation: An Historical Study A.D. 1700 to A.D. 1860 (London 1959); Theories of Revelation: An Historical Study, 1860–1960 (London 1963). J. BAILLIE, The Idea of Revelation in Recent Thought (New York 1956). H. SCHULTE, Der Begriff der Offenbarung im Neuen Testament (Munich 1949). H. W. ROBINSON, Inspiration and Revelation in the Old Testament, rev. L. H. BROCKINGTON and E. A. PAYNE (Oxford 1946). C. H. DODD, The Bible Today (Cambridge, Eng. 1947) 98–121. H. E. BRUNNER, God and Man, tr. D. CAIRNS (London 1936) 103–135. J. J. O’ROURKE, “Romans 1, 20 and Natural Revelation,” Catholic Biblical Quarterly 23 (1961) 301–306. R. E. BROWN, “The Pre-Christian Semitic Concept of ‘Mystery,’” ibid. 20 (1958) 417–443. E. O’DOHERTY, “The Organic Development of Messianic Revelation,” ibid. 19 (1957) 16–24. J. L. MCKENZIE, “The Word of God in the Old Testament,” Theological Studies 21 (1960) 183–206. O. G. LORETZ, Die Wahrheit der Bibel (Freiburg 1964). J. J. COLLINS, “Natural Theology and Biblical Tradition: The Case of Hellenistic Judaism,” Catholic Biblical Quarterly 60 (1998) 1–15. D. PATRICK, The Rhetoric of Revelation in the Hebrew Bible (OBT; Minneapolis 1999). L. G. PERDUE, “Revelation and the Problem of the Hidden God in Second Temple Wisdom Literature,” Shall Not the Judge of All the World Do What Is Right? Studies in the Nature of God in Tribute to James L. Crenshaw, ed. D. PENCHANSKY and P. L. REDDITT (Winona Lake, Ind. 2000) 201–222.

[J. JENSEN]

REVELATION, FONTS OF

“Fonts of revelation” is a technical term used by theologians of recent centuries to designate the authoritative sources of Christian doctrine. Although the Church Fathers and medieval theologians regularly treated Scripture and tradition as authentic sources, the problem of their respective dignity and mutual connection did not become acute until the time of the REFORMATION. LUTHER, followed by many other PROTESTANTS, took the position that Scripture alone was the final authority, and that the tradition of the Church, as expressed in creeds, dogmas, liturgy, and the like, had to be tested against Holy Scripture. The Epitome in the Lutheran Book of Concord (1580) begins with the lapidary statement: “We believe, teach, and confess that the prophetic and apostolic writings of the Old and New Testaments are the only rule and norm according to which all doctrines and teachers alike must be appraised and judged.” The Anglican William Chillingworth in 1638 asserted: “The Bible, I say, and the Bible only, is the religion of protestants!” (Works [Philadelphia 1844], 480–81).

Responding to Lutherans and other Protestants, the Council of TRENT taught in 1546 that the gospel promised of old through the prophets in the Sacred Scriptures and promulgated by Jesus Christ was “the source [fontem] of every saving truth and rule of conduct.” This truth and this rule, the council then declared, were received by the apostles either by word of mouth from Jesus Christ or by inspiration of the Holy Spirit and are contained “in the written books and in unwritten traditions” that have come down to us from the apostles. The books of Scripture and the apostolic traditions, since they alike come from Christ and the Holy Spirit, are to be received “with the same sense of loyalty and reverence” (DS 1501).

During the next several centuries, Catholic theologians, apologists, and catechetical writers commonly professed a “two-source” theory, namely, that the revelation of Christ is contained partly in Holy Scripture and partly in sacred TRADITION. Perhaps this was the meaning intended by the Fathers at Trent, but the council did not actually teach that any revealed truth was contained either in Scripture alone or in tradition alone. A previous draft of Trent’s decree had stated that the truth of the gospel is contained “partly in written books and partly in written traditions,” but the words “partly” were stricken from the final text. To satisfy the demands of Trent it would therefore be sufficient to say that the word of God is accessible in two ways. It is transmitted both through Scripture and through apostolic tradition, two channels that are to be held in the same reverence insofar as both attest with divine authority to the same gospel.

In the ecumenical climate of the 20th century the cleavage between the Catholic and Protestant positions became less sharp. Protestant Scripture scholars recognized that Holy Scripture depends heavily on a prior oral tradition, of which it is a privileged sedimentation. Protestants also recognized that they themselves read Scripture in the light of tradition, and that it is practically impossible to bypass tradition and approach Scripture, as it were, for the first time. In the words of Paul Tillich, “the radical biblicistic attitude is a self-deception. No one is able to leap over two thousand years of church history and become contemporaneous with the writers of the New Testament, except in the spiritual sense of accepting Jesus as the Christ” (Systematic Theology, 1:36).

The WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, through its Faith and Order Commission, responded to this more positive attitude toward tradition on the part of Protestants. It was affected also by the traditionalism of the Orthodox, since several important Orthodox churches had been admitted to membership in 1951. Finally, it was influenced by the new climate of cooperation with Roman Catholic scholars. The Faith and Order Commission accordingly launched in 1954 an in-depth study of the problem, and as a result produced an important report on “Scripture, Tradition, and traditions,” accepted at the Fourth World Conference on Faith and Order in Montreal in 1963. Acknowledging the indispensability of tradition, this report stated: “We exist as Christians by the Tradition of the gospel (the paradosis of the kerygma) testified in scripture, transmitted in and by the church through the power of the Holy Spirit. Tradition taken in this sense is actualized in the preaching of the word, in the administration of the sacraments and worship, in Christian teaching and theology, and in mission and witness to Christ by lives of the members of the Church.” By this declaration the Montreal statement distanced itself from those Protestants who thought it possible to appeal to “Scripture alone,” but the statement did not provide a clear rule for distinguishing between merely human traditions and divine or apostolic Tradition (which it spelled with a capital T).

On the Catholic side the Second VATICAN COUNCIL manifested the effects of the ecumenical movement on Catholic theology. The first draft of the Constitution on Revelation began with a chapter on “The Two Sources of Revelation” (De duplici revelationis) that was sharply criticized at the first session in November 1962 and was withdrawn by order of Pope John XXIII. The new text, composed in 1963 and several times revised, became in November 1965 the dogmatic constitution Dei Verbum. It insisted on the inseparability of Scripture and tradition, which together “form one sacred deposit of the word of God” (DV 10). In line with previous Catholic teaching, however, the constitution affirmed: “It is not from sacred Scripture alone that the Church draws her certainty about everything that has been revealed” (DV 9). In other words, even if all revealed truth is in some way contained in Scripture, tradition is needed to grasp it with the required assurance.

Tradition, therefore, has an intimate relationship with sacred Scripture. Vatican II viewed both Scripture and tradition not statically, as depositories containing particular truths, but rather dynamically, as ways in which God converses with his People (DV 8 and 21). Scripture itself is actively handed down (“traditioned”) in the Church. Tradition, moreover, consists not simply in oral and written statements but in the total life and practice of the praying and believing Church. Tradition in this sense is viewed as necessary, not least for the identification of the canonical Scriptures. “Through the same tradition the Church’s full canon of the sacred books is known, and the sacred writings themselves are more profoundly understood and unceasingly made active in her” (DV 8).

Regarding the relative dignity of Scripture and tradition, Vatican II repeated the assertion of Trent that the two are to be received with the same sense of devotion and reverence (DV 9), inasmuch as apostolic tradition is, like Scripture, a form of the word of God. On the other hand, Scripture enjoys a certain priority, since the very text of Scripture is the word of God (DV 24), whereas tradition is a more elusive reality. Particular traditions, which may be thought to be apostolic, have to be sifted and evaluated in order to determine their authenticity. Scripture, as the divinely guided expression of God’s word in human language, has a certain critical function over against all other expressions. Thus there is a sense in which Catholics, as well as Protestants, can speak of Scripture as being finally normative. But while tradition cannot contradict the true meaning of Scripture, Scripture cannot be confidently identified or authoritatively interpreted without the help of tradition.

In answer to the question raised at Montreal about how to distinguish genuine tradition from merely human and possibly distorted traditions, Catholics refer to a variety of tests, such as conformity with Scripture, coherence with Catholic tradition as a whole, harmony with the norms for worship (the lex orandi), acceptability to the community of believers (the sensus fidelium), agreement with the past teaching of popes and councils, and the approval of the contemporary magisterium. Exegetes and theologians by their preparatory study help the judgment of the Church to mature (DV 12). According to Vatican II, the task of authentically interpreting the word of God, as found in Scripture or tradition, is entrusted to the living magisterium, which exercises its authority in the name of Jesus Christ (DV 10).

Some theologians look upon Scripture as the true source and regard tradition as a succession of commentaries upon it. Although unexceptionable in what it affirms, this position tends to be reductive. Tradition does not first arise from the study of Scripture. Having existed even before Scripture was written, it accompanies Scripture at every stage of history as a kind of surrounding atmosphere. Tradition, therefore, gives a perspective for biblical interpretation deeper than merely philological exegesis. Some elements of Christian faith, barely hinted at in Holy Scripture, may be more vividly attested by tradition.

In the early centuries it may have been possible to identify certain particular traditions as coming from the apostles by word of mouth. Theologians speculate that doctrines such as infant baptism and the perpetual virginity of Mary may have been transmitted in this way. But at the distance of many centuries scientific history can no longer establish the apostolic origin of these doctrines. Thus the concept of tradition as a source of factual information, parallel with and alongside of Holy Scripture, has been losing favor.

In recent centuries the theology of tradition has been taking on new features. Authors such as Johann Adam MÖHLER, John Henry NEWMAN, and Maurice BLONDEL have propounded the thesis that authentic tradition is sustained and illuminated in the Church by the Holy Spirit, and gives rise to a “sense of the faith” on the part of committed members of the Church. Vatican II adopted this dynamic concept of tradition. “This tradition which comes from the apostles develops in the Church with the help of the Holy Spirit. For there is a growth in understanding of the realities and the words that have been handed down. . . . As the centuries succeed one another, the Church constantly moves forward toward the fullness of divine truth until the words of God reach their complete fulfillment in her” (DV 8).

In the 16th century the burning question was whether the finally decisive authority was single or double. Was it Scripture alone or Scripture together with apostolic traditions? In the 20th century theologians asked how best to use both Scripture and tradition in order to find the word of God in them. Christians of many different ecclesial affiliations involved themselves in the effort to reexamine Scripture in the light of their own traditions, and to evaluate their traditions in the light of Scripture. Protestants, Catholics, and Orthodox have been engaged in similar pursuits and have come to understand each other better. As Christianity enters the third millennium, the churches may hope to be further enriched both by their own traditions and those of other ecclesial bodies as they listen to one another and prayerfully read the Scriptures they hold in common.

Bibliography: J. P. MACKAY, The Modern Theology of Tradition (New York 1963). K. RAHNER, ed., “Scripture and Tradition,” Encyclopedia of Theology: The Concise Sacramentum Mundi (New York 1975), 6:54–57, with bibliog. Y. M.-J. CONGAR, Tradition and Traditions (New York 1967). A. DULLES, The Craft of Theology, 2d ed. (New York 1995). H. C. SKILLRUD and others, eds., Scripture and Tradition: Lutherans and Catholics in Dialogue IX (Minneapolis 1995).

[A. DULLES]

REVELATION, PRIMITIVE

The term primitive revelation has generally meant a body of supernatural truths revealed to man at the beginning of the human race and passed down over the centuries, with remnants of this revelation embedded in primitive religions. This conception of primitive revelation, most closely associated with the name of H. F. R. de LAMENNAIS, arose in the 19th century in reaction to rationalism. In the 20th century it was given support by the work of Wilhelm SCHMIDT, whose aim was “to describe the first glimmering of SUPERNATURAL Revelation, more properly referred to as primitive revelation; and to show its obscuration by the Fall of Man, together with its subsequent fate” [W. Schmidt, Primitive Revelation, tr. J. Baierl (St. Louis 1939) 3].

Primitive revelation, however, may have a wider significance, namely all pre-Judaic revelation of God. Catholic theology must accept this kind of primitive revelation because: (1) the first chapters of Genesis testify to it; (2) God wills all men to be saved, and the existence of such a salvific will implies the possibility of FAITH in a supernatural revelation. That there was supernatural revelation before the Patriarch ABRAHAM is a necessary conclusion; but the origin, form, and content of such revelation is far from clear. The first definition stated above finds practically no defenders in mid-20th century. A better understanding of the Biblical story opens other possibilities, and the findings of anthropological sciences make the passing down of truths from the first man all but inconceivable.

Although this question has yet to receive adequate treatment by theologians, the following principles would seem to be the basis for a solution. The supernatural revelation to the first man need not have taken place through verbal utterances of God or through extraordinary events. That ADAM had a PRETERNATURAL gift of knowledge does not imply that he had more than a fragmentary knowledge of revelation. Furthermore, the existence of revelation at later periods of history need not stem from this first revelation. Both the first man and subsequent men may have attained divine revelation by the GRACE of God through their own experiences.

Because man lives in an order of grace and is directed to a supernatural DESTINY, it is possible that his moral experience could indicate to him a more than natural ideal, thus bringing about an implicitly supernatural knowledge of divine things. The natural and supernatural orders must not be confused, but neither are they to be separated; and all man’s experiences are in a world of sin and grace. The pointers to such a revelation, arising in the life of the individual, could be preserved and developed in religious institutions and myths so that the possibility of supernatural faith would not depend entirely on the isolated experience of the individual. Christianity thus recognizes that primitive religion may be the vehicle of true religious, even supernatural, knowledge, though such knowledge is in constant danger of being distorted or destroyed.

See Also: RELIGION (IN PRIMITIVE CULTURE); SYMBOL IN REVELATION.

Bibliography: “Uroffenbarung,” *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65): suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokument und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) v.10. G. GLOEGE, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 7 v. (Tübingen 1957–65) 6:1199–1203. H. VORGRIMLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1115–16. M. VERENO et al., ibid. 7:1104–15. J. R. GEISELMANN, H. FRIES, ed., Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe, 2 v. (Munich 1962–63) 2:242–250. A. LANG, Religions-Wissenschaftliches Wörterbuch, ed. F. KÖNIG (Freiburg 1956) 604–607. W. KOPPERS, ibid., 189–203. K. RAHNER and H. VORGRIMLER, Kleines theologisches Wörterbuch (Freiburg 1961) 372–373.

[G. MORAN]

REVELATION, THEOLOGY OF

The English word is derived from the Latin revelare, meaning to unveil or disclose. In common usage, even outside a religious context, revelation means a sudden and unexpected receipt of knowledge of a profoundly significant character, especially that which gives the recipient a new outlook on life and the world. It frequently designates the free action whereby one person confides his inner thoughts and sentiments to another, enabling the latter to enter into his spiritual world. In theology the term generally denotes the action by which God communicates to creatures a participation in His own knowledge, including His intimate self-knowledge. Such a communication is SUPERNATURAL since it transcends all that a creature could discover by its native powers. Some authors use the term in a wider sense to include “natural” or “general” revelation, that is, the knowledge of divine things that God imparts through nature and conscience. This usage has the advantage of making it clear that all man’s knowledge of God depends on God’s free initiative. But to avoid repeating what is said elsewhere (see THEOLOGY, NATURAL), we shall here speak only of supernatural revelation.

No adequate theology of revelation can be derived by mere analysis of the formal, abstract notion. The Christian view emerges from a concrete consideration as presented in Scripture and tradition (see TRADITION [IN THEOLOGY]). Building on the biblical idea of revelation, this article first surveys the main statements of the Catholic magisterium and then sketches a general theory of revelation as understood in modern Catholic theology.

Documents of the Church

Until recent centuries the existence and knowability of revelation were taken for granted by Christians; little was therefore said concerning revelation as such.

Refutation of error. Church decisions were concerned rather with specifying the contents of revelation in answer to particular heresies. In the Middle Ages it was repeatedly declared against Manichaean denials that the same God had spoken in the Old Testament and in the New Testament (e.g., H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [32d ed. Freiburg 1963] 685, 790, 854). Lateran IV, amplifying this point, affirmed in 1215 that God had given His “salutary doctrine” to the human race “through Moses and the holy Prophets and His other servants, according to a most orderly disposition of times,” culminating in the action by which “the only-begotten Son of God, Jesus Christ . . . more evidently disclosed the way of life” (ibid. 800–801).

The Council of Trent touched incidentally on the nature of revelation in its discussion of the divinely authoritative sources of doctrine. The Christian gospel, said the council, having been “previously promised by the Prophets in the Holy Scriptures,” was first promulgated by Jesus Christ with His own lips. Then it was disseminated by the Apostles on the basis of what they had heard from Jesus Christ and been taught by the Holy Spirit (ibid. 1501).

In the nineteenth century, a number of fundamental errors concerning revelation and faith were condemned. The fideists were censured for their view that FAITH was not solidly supported by the evidences of credibility (cf. ibid. 2751–2756, 2765–2769) (see FIDEISM). The rationalists and agnostics were reprobated for denying respectively the possibility and knowability of revelation (cf. ibid. 2901–2907) (see RATIONALISM; AGNOSTICISM). Likewise rejected was the semirationalist position, which maintained that once human reason had developed to full maturity all the Christian dogmas could be established by human science and philosophy, without appeal to authority (cf. ibid. 2856, 2909) (see SEMIRATIONALISM).

Positive teaching. The Church’s doctrine regarding the possibility, existence, and nature of revelation was most authoritatively set forth by Vatican I, which canonized the doctrine that human knowledge is of two distinct orders: natural knowledge—reason—and supernatural knowledge—revelation (ibid. 3004, 3015). Although human reason is able to attain some knowledge of God by its natural light, God has graciously consented to reveal Himself and His eternal decrees in a supernatural way (ibid. 3004). This revelation has a twofold aim. First, it permits the most important naturally knowable truths of religion to be grasped by all, with full certitude, and without admixture of error. Secondly, it enables man as an intelligent creature to orient himself to the supernatural end for which God has destined him (ibid. 3005). (See DESTINY, SUPERNATURAL.) If man had a merely natural destiny, revelation would be only morally necessary, but in view of man’s gratuitous call to the intuitive vision of God, revelation is absolutely necessary for SALVATION. The revealed object accordingly contains not only truths that human reason could discover by its own efforts, but also, more importantly, divine mysteries that could by no means be grasped without revelation (ibid. 3015, 3041). These mysteries, even after their revelation, remain so hidden in God that man can apprehend them only obscurely in this life (ibid. 3016) (see MYSTERY [IN THEOLOGY]).

Vatican I dealt with the relations between revelation and reason. Reason, it affirmed, can discern no absurdity in the fact or contents of Christian revelation (ibid. 3017, 3027). Indeed it can establish the reasonableness of believing, thanks to the abundant signs of credibility, notably miracles and prophecies (ibid. 3009, 3014, 3019, 3033). Once the act of faith has been made, reason can ponder fruitfully on the data of revelation. If this meditation is made with due diligence, piety, and modesty, reason can achieve a very profitable, though limited, understanding of mysteries themselves. Such an understanding can arise from comparing the revealed mysteries with one another, with man’s last end, and with things naturally known (ibid. 3016).

The Modernist heresy at the opening of the twentieth century gave occasion for further clarifications. The Roman magisterium declared that revelation is not a mere emotion or sentiment welling up from the depths of the subconscious; it has a definite intellectual content accepted not on the basis of intrinsic evidence, but on the authority of the revealing God (ibid. 3542). Such acceptance is commended by the external signs of credibility, especially miracles and prophecies, which have not lost their efficacy for the modern mind (ibid. 3539). Revelation, moreover, was complete in apostolic times (ibid. 3421). The Dogmas of the Church are revealed truths (ibid. 3422); they do not evolve in the course of time into dogmas having another sense (ibid. 3541) (see MODERNISM).

Vatican II devoted an entire dogmatic constitution, Dei Verbum, to the subject of revelation. The doctrine of that council will be closely followed in the exposition that follows.

Theological Reflection

From the time of the ENLIGHTENMENT until the mid-twentieth century, a heavily apologetic slant was given to the treatise on revelation. Primary attention was focused on what reason, unaided by faith, could demonstrate concerning the possibility, fittingness, and knowability of revelation. Contemporary theology is more concerned with exploring from a position within faith the nature and attitudes of revelation. This inquiry is favored by the interests and achievements of the twentieth century with regard to the theory of language, communication, symbolism, and interpersonal relations (see APOLOGETICS, 2).

Modern Protestant scholarship has given added impetus to the study of revelation. Biblical scholars such as C. H. Dodd, Oscar Cullmann, and Alan Richardson have called attention to the historical dimension of revelation, as witnessed by the mighty deeds of God recounted in Scripture. Dialectical theologians such as Karl Barth and Emil Brunner have stressed the mysterious attributes of God's word to man, which cannot be fully captured in human concepts and language (see DIALECTICAL THEOLOGY). Existential theologians such as Rudolf Bultmann and Paul Tillich have pointed out the value of revelation in liberating man from the anxieties and pettiness of ordinary existence (see EXISTENTIAL THEOLOGY). In general it may be said that recent Protestant theology tends to look on revelation primarily as event and experience. Catholic theologians, without ignoring these aspects, are more concerned with safeguarding the doctrinal and transmissible features, as accentuated in the documents of the Church.

The contemporary theologian will find valuable elements for a theory of revelation in the Greek Fathers and in St. Augustine. Among the scholastic doctors St. Thomas Aquinas has contributed most importantly to the field in his treatises on faith and prophecy (Summa Theologiae 2a2ae, 1–16; 171–178).

Aspects of revelation. The Judeo-Christian revelation, which primarily concerns us here, is the noetic component of God's total work of REDEMPTION. Through revelation man becomes a sharer in the knowledge proper to God, inchoatively on earth, definitively in the life after death. Revelation therefore introduces man into the blessedness of God's own life. If he is to view reality, as it were, through God's eyes, man's mental horizons must be enlarged; otherwise he would reduce God's message to purely human perspectives. Therefore, revelation has a subjective aspect, consisting in the inner transformation of man's apprehensive faculties. This modification, however, occurs when the divine message comes from without through a definite intervention of God in history. The subjective and objective aspects of revelation are inseparable, but the former are more explicitly treated under the headings of GRACE and FAITH. We shall therefore focus primary attention on the objective side, considering first the process by which revelation comes to man and then the inner structure of the revealed datum.

Process of revelation. Two phases may be distinguished—the original communication of God's message to man and its subsequent transmission.

Immediate Revelation. According to Christian belief, immediate revelation was given in biblical times to the Prophets and Apostles (see PROPHECY [THEOLOGY OF]; APOSTLE.) The prophetic experience sometimes involved external sensation, dreams, visions, imaginary words, and even the direct infusion of new ideas, but none of these elements, according to St. Thomas, is essential. The primary and indispensable element is the illumination of the Prophet's understanding, giving him a divine insight into the meaning of what is presented to his mind (Summa Theologiae 2a2ae, 173.2; C. gent. 3.154).

The Apostles received revelation through the spoken words of Christ, in the context of His conduct. But in order for these words to take on the value of revelation, the recipients had to be inwardly attracted and enlightened by grace (Mt 16.17; Jn 6.64, 66). Some of the Apostles were later favored by ecstatic experiences (Acts, ch. 9 and 10; 2 Cor 12.1), but such experiences are not constitutive of apostleship as such, which depends rather on personal association with the risen Lord and on a special commission from Him.

According to the Bible, revelation comes primarily through the word of God. The word may be spoken or written symbol, or it may be an interior utterance whereby God articulates His message in the consciousness of the recipient. But the word of God, in Hebrew thinking, is not merely a vehicle of knowledge. Besides being noetic, it is dynamic: it effects what it signifies (cf. Is 55.10–11; Heb 4.12).

Even human words, as understood in modern speech-theory, are not devoid of efficacy. When one person addresses another or opens up his heart to him, the other becomes personally involved. If he responds appropriately in faith and trust, a new interpersonal relationship is established. God's revelatory word opens up to the believer a salutary communion with God and with his fellow believers. St. John of the Cross, in his Ascent of Mount Carmel (2.31), connects the sanctifying power of God's word with its dynamic efficacy [E. Allison Peers, ed., The Complete Works of St. John of the Cross (London 1934–35) 1.218–219].

The word of God, in its full biblical sense, includes God's revelatory deeds. The early books of the Bible describe numerous THEOPHANIES (e.g., the burning bush, the pillar of fire) in which God visibly manifests His presence. The whole Bible bears witness to the salvific and punitive actions by which God intervenes in history. These deeds have value not simply as confirmatory signs, bearing out the Prophets' declarations, but also as significant gestures. They are themselves revelatory, at least when accompanied by the commentary of prophetic interpretation. Words and deeds are closely interconnected; only in their mutual union do they constitute the full event of revelation. In the words of Vatican II, "the deeds wrought by God in the history of salvation manifest and confirm the teaching and realities signified by the words, while the words proclaim the deeds and clarify the mystery contained in them" (DV 2).

Mediated Revelation. The Prophets and Apostles received revelation not for their own sake but for the people of God. They were conscious of a divine mandate to hand on the message faithfully. This they did primarily through their preaching; and authorized preaching in the Church continues to be a vehicle of revelation. Like the original divine word, the preached word is charged with mysterious power. Besides its objective reality, it has a spiritual dimension which gives it value as God's word. The Fathers (Augustine, Gregory the Great) and St. Thomas (De ver. 27.3 ad 12) look upon Christian preachers as instruments or disposing causes in the transmission of revelation. Their human words became revelatory when the grace of God fecundates the minds of their hearers (see PREACHING, III [THEOLOGY OF]).

The inspired words of Scripture likewise convey revelation. Not all the biblical writers were immediate recipients of revelation. Some of them merely wrote down what they had learned from ordinary experience or from the testimony of others. Many statements in the Bible, taken in themselves, are merely secular pieces of information, and in that sense not revelation. But the entire Bible, according to Catholic faith, was composed under a divine impulse (or charism) known as inspiration. Therefore it constitutes a divinely guaranteed objectification of the religious consciousness of God's people in its supernaturally guided existence, lived out under the impact of progressive revelation. In this sense, the whole

Bible is revelatory. Some theologians hold that the Bible, like the preached word, has quasi-sacramental value; that is, that one who reads or hears it under favorable circumstances receives grace to enter into a new relationship with God in faith. The Bible becomes in fullest actuality the word of God when it is being read in a spirit of faith.

The same combination of word and deed already noted in the original communication of revelation is characteristic of its further transmission. The Prophets often preach by dramatic actions (e.g., ch. 20 of Isaiah; ch. 27 of Jeremiah; Hos 1.2–9). So too, in the Church the Christian revelation is transmitted not only by spoken and written sentences but by the liturgy and by the whole conduct of Christians, which reflects the teaching of Christ and visibly incarnates His grace at definite points of space and time.

Stages of revelation. The Judeo-Christian revelation was given progressively in the course of centuries. St. Thomas distinguishes three great periods of sacred history—before the Mosaic law, under the law, and under grace; these he connects with the great revelations made respectively to ABRAHAM, MOSES, and the Apostles (Summa Theologiae 2a2ae, 174.6). The revelation was from its inception public; it was addressed not simply to individuals but to a whole people. The Israelite revelation in the Old Testament period was particular, being directed to a single nation, rather than, like Christianity, to all mankind. Moreover, it was preparatory for it pointed forward to a later fulfillment. From a Christian point of view, the Old Testament revelation appears as totally ordered toward Christ and the Church by way of type and prophecy. Christ Himself is depicted in the New Testament in terms borrowed from the Old Testament. He is the second Adam, the new Moses, the SON OF DAVID, the MESSIAH, the Servant (see SUFFERING SERVANT, SONGS OF THE), SON OF MAN, SON OF GOD. Jesus Himself declares that the great personages of the Old Testament looked forward to His coming (Mt 13.16–17; Jn 5.45; 8.56).

Vatican II stated that Christ is "the Mediator and at the same time the fullness of all revelation" (DV 2). This full revelation is present in Christ not only objectively but subjectively. Revelation should not be thought of as merely objective, existing outside of human minds. At its most perfect, it exists in the human intellect of Christ, which grasps the divine as fully as a finite mind can grasp it. Because Jesus as man was totally receptive to God's word and perfectly faithful to His vocation as witness, He gave supreme expression to God's message for mankind. And this He did by both words and deeds. "Because Christ Himself is the Word of God, the very deed of the Word is a word to us" [Augustine, In evang. Ioh. 24.2 (Corpus Christianorum. Series latina 36:244)].

Through the teaching and life of Christ—including His Passion and glorification—God communicates in an unsurpassable way His message of pardon and reconciliation, manifesting His eternal attributes and freely chosen attitudes toward man. When it is said that the DEPOSIT of faith was closed with the Apostles, this does not have the merely negative meaning that God decides to say nothing more. It has a positive aspect inasmuch as God has so completely expressed Himself in the Christ-event that any real addition would be superfluous. Whatever comes later has no function except to illumine the meaning of what Christ said and did and was.

Although Christians await no further public revelation within history (Vatican II, DV 4), much remains to be done by way of clarification. To penetrate more deeply the meaning of the deposit is the ceaseless task of theologians and of the Church (cf. H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [32d ed. Freiburg 1963] 3020, quoting St. Vincent of Lerins). But since mystery is the very heart of revelation, theological understanding does not aim to remove the essential obscurity of faith or render the revealed datum evident to reason (see DOGMATIC THEOLOGY). So long as man remains on earth, he must be content to walk by faith, reverently inclining his mind and will before the Word of God. At the end of time, faith will issue into vision, and the revelation will be clearly perceived by the help of the LIGHT OF GLORY.

Contents of revelation. The contents are described by Vatican I as “God Himself and the eternal decrees of His will” (ibid. 3004). Vatican II teaches that “God chose to reveal Himself and to make known to us the hidden purpose of His will” (DV 2). The mighty deeds of God are the central theme of the confessions of faith found in the Old Testament (e.g., ch. 7 and 26 of Deuteronomy) and in the earliest Christian preaching (e.g., ch. 2 and 10 of Acts). The focal message of the Old Testament is the liberation of Israel from the slavery of Egypt through Moses; that of the New Testament, the deliverance of mankind from the death of sin through Jesus Christ. In the course of centuries, this “recital theology” was gradually supplemented by more abstract, ontological formulas, as needed to settle questions that came up at a later stage of reflection. The successive creeds and dogmatic declarations of the Church exhibit this trend. The intelligible content of the Church’s dogmas, according to the Catholic view, is not an addition to revelation, but is an authentic aspect of the revealed datum itself (cf. ibid. 3011).

In the final analysis, one believes in neither the salvific events nor the doctrines for their own sake, but in God who manifests Himself through these. The primary object of revelation is God Himself in His gracious approach to man. Because revelation includes this element of divine encounter, it can never be fully contained in dogmatic propositions (cf. ibid. 3886). Thanks to his faith-relationship to the Light of the World (Jn 8.12), the Christian is inwardly renewed in his mind (Rom 12.2).

Church and revelation. The Apostles hold a unique status in SALVATION HISTORY by reason of their immediate contact with the Incarnate Word (1 Jn 1.1) and their Pentecostal experience. The post-apostolic Church receives revelation dependently on them, through Scripture and tradition. The Church is commissioned to preserve, defend, and interpret the contents of faith, adapting the presentation to the capacities and needs of successive ages. As this process continues, the implicit contents of the deposit are progressively unfolded. The explication is not a mere matter of logical deduction from the primitive formulas. Thanks to the Spirit of Christ that animates it, the Church enjoys a kind of “connaturality” with the revealing God and a privileged insight into His word. In proclaiming dogmas, the Church therefore speaks with prophetic authority (see DOCTRINE, DEVELOPMENT OF).

Revelation outside the Church. Judaism continues to profess the revelation given under the Old Testament. Islam accepts certain elements from Judaism and Christianity. Non-Catholic Christian communities retain and teach large portions of the Christian revelation and can, to that extent, communicate authentic revelation to their adherents. Through the inspirations of the Holy Spirit, who is operative among them, non-Catholic Christians can achieve valid insights into the Gospel and in this way contribute to the development of doctrine. Since the whole patrimony of Christ, according to Catholic belief, was passed on to the Catholic Church, the presence of revealed truth in these other confessions is a bond between them and Catholicism (see Vatican II, Decree on Ecumenism, 2-3).

Can revelation be present in other religions, independently of any influence upon them of biblical religion? Formerly it was widely believed that elements of the primitive revelation made to Adam or Noah had been kept alive in these religions, but this theory, in the light of what is now known about the antiquity of man, has been largely abandoned (see REVELATION, PRIMITIVE). However, few would deny that God in some way reveals Himself to the unevangelized. Since supernatural faith is absolutely necessary for salvation, no other view seems fully compatible with God’s universal salvific will. St. Paul seems to take it for granted that God has revealed Himself to the pagans of Paul’s time (Acts 14.16; Rom 1.19–20; 2.14–15). And St. Thomas, as is well known, maintained that every man can make an act of justifying faith when he reaches moral maturity (cf. Summa Theologiae 1a2ae, 89.6). It is therefore probable that the non-Judaic religions embody certain reflections of a supernatural experience of God. Vatican II, in its Declaration on Non-Christian Religions, speaks of them as being based on a certain perception of the divine (NA 2). Unlike the biblical revelation, these religious expressions are not protected against serious distortion. But thanks to the elements of truth they contain, the non-biblical religions may be providential channels of grace for those who have had no opportunity to hear an accurate and persuasive presentation of the gospel.

Private revelation. Since it is the object of a separate article, private revelation requires only a brief mention here to point out how it differs from the public revelation of which we have been speaking (see REVELATIONS, PRIVATE). Whatever God has communicated since apostolic times to privileged souls can add nothing to the deposit of Christian faith. Private revelations of this character may be granted for the personal good of individuals and also to stir up among Christians a more faithful adherence to the gospel. St. Thomas holds that prophetic revelation, insofar as it is ordered to doctrine, ceased with the Apostles, but that such revelation, insofar as it is directive of human action, will always continue (Summa Theologiae 2a2ae, 174.6 ad 3). In view of the dangers of delusion, fraud, exaggeration, and the like, reports of private revelations should be treated with caution. The Church never teaches that their contents must be accepted on a motive of divine faith, but sometimes it certifies that they contain nothing contrary to sound faith and morals.

Demonstrability of revelation. As declared by Vatican I and by John Paul II in his encyclical FIDES ET RATIO, God has furnished sufficient external signs to render the assent of faith fully reasonable. Without being able to give apodictic proofs of the truth of Christianity, reason can prepare for, and support, the decision of faith. Philosophy can show that the idea of revelation contains no absurdity. Why should God not be able to communicate with man? Considering man's actual condition, as attested by human history and personal experience, a revelation would unquestionably be a great source of encouragement and guidance to man on his earthly pilgrimage; it seems entirely worthy of a beneficent God.

The philosophy of religion can specify to some extent the form that a divine revelation might be expected to take. God would undoubtedly accommodate His revelation to man's nature; He would speak so that man could hear. But man is by nature a historical and social being. He fulfills himself through free personal actions unfolding in time, interrogating the experience of his contemporaries and forbears. It seems likely, therefore, that God would communicate to man in a social and historical manner—through spatio-temporal symbols (words) given and transmitted in history. The religious inquirer, therefore, should turn to history to look for signs of whether God has spoken.

Apologetics can carry the investigation a stage further. It can assess the value of the various signs of credibility and exhibit the prudence of believing. But in view of the complexity of the evidences, the astounding and mysterious contents of the Christian message, and the heavy demands that it makes on fallen nature, apologetics will hardly be able to bring a man to the point of professing Christianity. The firm assent of salutary faith does not directly result from the arguments of credibility but from the grace of God.

See Also: SYMBOL IN REVELATION; REVELATION, CONCEPT OF (IN THE BIBLE); FAITH AND REASON; MIRACLES (IN THE BIBLE); MIRACLES (THEOLOGY OF); REVELATION, VIRTUAL.

Bibliography: Catholic Literature. R. LATOURELLE, Theology of Revelation (Staten Island, N.Y. 1966). E. SCHILLEBEECKX, Revelation and Theology, 2 v. (New York 1967–1968). K. RAHNER, Hearers of the Word (New York 1969). A. DULLES, Revelation Theology: A History (New York 1969); Models of Revelation (Garden City, N.Y. 1983). A. SHORTER, Revelation and Its Interpretation (London 1983). H. DE LUBAC, La Révélation divine (Paris 1983). Protestant Literature. J. BAILLIE, The Idea of Revelation in Recent Thought (New York 1956). H. D. MCDONALD, Ideas of Revelation: An Historical Study, A.D. 1700 to A.D. 1860 (London 1959); Theories of Revelation: An Historical Study, 1860–1960 (London 1963). H. R. NIEBUHR, The Meaning of Revelation (New York 1941). H. E. BRUNNER, Revelation and Reason, tr. O. WYON (Philadelphia 1946). P. TILLICH, Systematic Theology, 3 v. (Chicago 1951–63) v. 1. W. PANNENBERG et al., Revelation as History (New York 1968). G. FACKRE, The Doctrine of Revelation (Edinburgh 1997).

[A. DULLES]

REVELATION, VIRTUAL

Truths of FAITH and morals that are not formally revealed either explicitly or implicitly but that are necessary to guard and to explain the deposit of revealed truth. Although distinct from the truths of the revealed deposit, they are said to be “revealed” because they possess an objective connection with revealed truth. The magisterium determines the extent of the connection and indicates it by the solemnity with which it proposes the truth, e.g., by papal bull, or by the censure attached to its denial, e.g., excommunication.

Revelation is “virtual” because deduced from formally revealed truths of faith and morals by means of a naturally known proposition in virtue of some relationship of causality or fittingness: e.g., the Church, in order to guard the supernaturalness of revelation, has defined that faith gives a different and higher knowledge of God than does natural science (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer, 3015). Also, a revealed proposition may be applied to a particular fact: e.g., Saint Peter has successors who possess supreme teaching authority in the Church, and Pius XII was such a successor with this authority.

The Church has traditionally taught, and consistently practiced doctrinal intervention in defining, truths of faith and morals that are not directly and formally revealed but that are necessary for the integrity of the Christian message. Especially does it condemn errors that imperil revealed truth, and it declares as true those facts and truths that are connected with the preserving and explaining of Christian DOGMA. Nicaea I (325) declared that a heretic could be the minister of valid Baptism (Enchiridion symbolorum 127), while Pius XII defined the matter and form for Holy Orders (Enchiridion symbolorum 3859). Many truths have been defined that do not pertain directly and immediately to the DEPOSIT OF FAITH. They are propositions that express a concept not formally and immediately contained in the terms of a revealed proposition but that the Church expects its members to accept on divine faith. In this sense they are conceptually and propositionally distinct from the revealed deposit. This is possible because revelation contains mysteries that the intellect cannot fully comprehend. Since the time of the Apostles there has been no new public revelation; it is “closed,” yet the revealed mysteries are “open” to a deeper understanding and avoidance of misunderstanding. Pius XII did not “reveal” anything by determining the matter and form of Orders, but he did determine for the future what part of the ceremony would essentially constitute the Sacrament.

Saint Thomas Aquinas, one of the first to do so, distinguished a double object of faith (Summa theologiae 1a, 32.4; 2a2ae, 11.2.): one composed of truths directly and principally believed, e.g., articles of the Apostles’ Creed, the other composed of truths indirectly and secondarily believed insofar as their denial would lead to a denial of a revealed truth, e.g., faith gives a higher knowledge of God than does natural science. Sixteenth- and seventeenth-century theologians such as D. Báñez, Gregory of Valencia, and J. de Lugo applied this distinction to the magisterium, later theologians adopted it, and ecclesiastical documents expressed it, e.g., Syllabus of Errors of Pius IX (Dec. 8, 1864). Present-day theologians distinguish formally revealed truth, i.e., directly and immediately revealed, from that which is virtually revealed, i.e., indirectly and mediately. Modern emphasis on development of dogma has necessitated a greater precision in terms to clarify the limits of formally revealed truth.

Divisions. Virtual revelation is divided according to its connection with revealed truth, a relationship of either necessity or fittingness.

Necessity. Certain truths or facts are connected to formal revelation by a relationship of absolute necessity insofar as they are needed to preserve its very sources, e.g., the determination of the canon of Scripture. Others are connected by moral necessity insofar as they are needed for the Church to attain its primary end of guarding and explaining the deposit of faith, e.g., the condemnation of J. Hus’s error that neither Peter nor his successors are head of the Church (Enchiridion symbolorum 1207, 1210). It includes: the condemnation of statements directly or indirectly contrary to revealed truth, and contingent facts that happened after the close of revelation but that are necessary to guard or explain the truths of faith and morals as particular applications of a universal revealed proposition, e.g., Pius XII was truly Pope.

Fittingness. Other truths and facts are not directly connected to revelation, yet to reason illuminated by faith they appear connected with eminent fittingness, e.g., the theological conclusion that the human soul of Christ always enjoyed the beatific vision. The pope, using his full authority as head of the Church, may approve them as matters of faith, morals, or worship that are suitable for leading souls to the truth and holiness of God, or he may condemn propositions contrary to them. His authority guarantees infallible safety to these pronouncements, though not infallible truth. So Pius XII denounced the hypothesis of polygenism as applied to man’s origin, since it is not apparent how it can be reconciled with the Church’s teaching on original sin and hence cannot safely be held by Catholics (Enchiridion symbolorum 3897). This is the secondary teaching message of the Church, and the truths pertain more remotely to virtual revelation. They are accepted on ecclesiastical, or mediate, faith.

Some truths are even further removed from direct connection with the deposit of faith, e.g., various problems of the moral life of spouses, rights and obligations of workers and employers, peace among nations. In teaching such truths the pope may not intend to apply the full force of his prudential authority in a universal manner, and then such truths are not proposed infallibly nor are they a part of virtual revelation.

Opinions. Are the truths connected to formal revelation by a relationship of absolute necessity an intrinsic part of the revealed deposit or annexed to it from outside, i.e., are they really part of formal or of virtual revelation? The Church has irrevocably and infallibly declared the truth of these propositions and expects its members to accept them on faith. It has not declared that they are revealed but leaves it to the theologians to determine just how these truths may be connected to the revealed deposit. There are three principal opinions. (1) All truths that have been infallibly and irrevocably declared as true are, and always have been, a part of the formally revealed deposit, as the implicit is contained in the explicit. It suffices to analyze the extension of the subject or the comprehension of the predicate of the revealed proposition. Hence, all truths defined irrevocably and infallibly are an intrinsic part of the revealed deposit and demand divine faith, e.g., the necessity of confessing all mortal sins committed after Baptism; Vatican Council I was an ecumenical council (C. Vollert). (2) Truths infallibly and irrevocably declared by the Church may be a part of virtual revelation insofar as they have an intrinsic connection with the formally revealed deposit, but are conceptually distinct from it and are obtained by means of some other naturally known truth, e.g., Christ, as true God and true man, had two wills (Enchiridion symbolorum 500). It is accepted on divine faith and may be declared as revealed by the Church (F. Marín-Sola). This also applies to an individual under a universal revealed proposition, e.g., Christ died to save all men, therefore He died to save me (C. Journet, K. Rahner). (3) A third position differs from the second by expressing the connection between formal and virtual as one that is necessary for the proper preserving and explaining of revealed truth, rather than as an intrinsic one: e.g., determination of the canon of Scripture, determination of the matter and form of Orders, solemn canonization of saints. Nor may the Church declare such truths to be revealed, though it may and does oblige its members to accept them on divine, or theological, faith (L. Ciappi).

Conclusion. Virtual revelation is distinct from formal revelation. Both dogmatic facts and theological conclusions pertain to virtual revelation and may be defined as infallibly true on divine faith, infallibly safe to follow on ecclesiastical faith, or recommended as fitting.

See Also: REVELATION, THEOLOGY OF; DOCTRINE, DEVELOPMENT OF.

Bibliography: E. DUBLANCHY, "Dogme," Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 4.2:1639–47; "Église," ibid. 2199–2200. C. JOURNET, The Church of the Word Incarnate, v.1, tr. A. H. C. DOWNES (New York 1955) 338–53. B. J. F. LONERGAN, Divinarum personarum conceptionem analogicam (Rome 1959) 28–51. F. MARÍN-SOLA, L'Évolution homogène du dogme catholique, 2 v. (2d ed. Fribourg 1924) v.1. K. RAHNER, "The Development of Dogma," Theological Investigations, tr. C. ERNST, v.1 (Baltimore 1961) 39–77. R. RICHARD, "Rahner's Theory of Doctrinal Development," Catholic Theological Society of America. Proceedings, 18 (New York 1963) 157–89. C. VOLLERT, "Doctrinal Development," ibid. 12 (1957) 45–74.

[A. E. GREEN]

REVELATIONS, PRIVATE

Besides the public revelation that was completed at the death of the last Apostle and that gave to the Church the deposit of faith, there were in the course of Christianity private revelations. Their meaning and their role in the life of the Church can be understood from their history and theology.

History. The Prophets of the Old Testament generally exercised a public function and a permanent ministry as Yahweh's spokesmen for the public revelation. There is little evidence of private revelations in the Old Testament, though there may have been instances among the groups of Prophets mentioned, e.g., in 1 Samuel 10.10–13. In the New Testament, even during the lifetime of the Apostles, Saint Paul testifies that there were in the nascent Church CHARISMS, which are more or less extraordinary gifts of grace granted for the common good of all to persons with no official function in the Church (1 Cor 12.7–11; 28–30; Rom 12.6–8; Eph 4.11–13). Among these gifts is mentioned that of prophecy, or of speaking in the name of God (1 Cor 12.10; Rom 12.6; Eph 4.11). Those receiving such a gift were inspired preachers and may be considered bearers of a revelation in the proper sense of the term. This is what is now called private revelations.

In post-Apostolic times also there is evidence for the existence of such Prophets, (e.g., in Didache 15.1 or in the Pastor of Hermas 11.7). The visions in the Pastor bear witness to the belief of the early Church in such revelations. Overconfidence in these charisms led, in the 2d century, to the formation of the Montanist sect, which advocated the guidance of the Paraclete (and this included so-called private revelations) in preference to the direction of the Church authorities. TERTULLIAN is a well-known example of the type of deviation that was to recur periodically in the shape of illuminist movements, for example, the Alumbrados in Spain (16th and 17th centuries) and the Illuminati of Bavaria (18th century). (See ILLUMINISM.) Even apart from these extremes, tension in relations between the hierarchy and the charismatics is a feature not only of early Church history but, in varying degrees, of all times.

The Church was never for long without saints or holy persons who received from God authentic private revelations. In medieval times there were great mystics like Saint HILDEGARDE (d. 1179), Saint GERTRUDE THE GREAT (d. 1301), and Saint BRIDGET OF SWEDEN (d. 1373), who wrote books of revelations. More spectacular, in a way, were those persons called by private revelation to a mission in the Church, such as Saint CATHERINE OF SIENA (d. 1380) who brought about the return of Pope Gregory X from Avignon to Rome. Others commissioned by private revelation to work for the erection of a liturgical feast were Blessed Juliana of Cornillon (d. 1258) for the feast of Corpus Christi, and Saint Margaret Mary ALACOQUE (d. 1690) for the Feast of the Sacred Heart. In another class of private revelations, also generally involving a mission, are the modern Marian apparitions, among which Lourdes and Fatima are best known. There are also the “revelations” of the mystics and saints, often unconnected with any visible mission but providing spiritual guidance for the Church, such as the two Carmelite mystics, Saint Teresa of Avila and Saint JOHN OF THE CROSS.

An important fact in ecclesiastical history, easily explained by the possible and actual harm connected with questionable revelations, is the control that the Church authorities have tried to exercise over these charismatic phenomena. In medieval times, the writings of many persons favored with visions and revelations were approved by Church authorities. In modern times the hierarchy gave its approval to some well-known private revelations such as those concerning the Miraculous Medal (1830), La Salette (1846), Lourdes (1858), and Fatima (1917). That approval is sometimes withheld. In a series of 22 Marian apparitions between the years 1931 and 1950, only two were approved (Beauraing and Banneux, Belgium), six remained undecided, and the remaining 14 were rejected [Clergy Monthly 17 (1952) 271–72]. There have been cases of wholesale fraud and pathological self-delusion. Examples of this are Miguel de MOLINOS, Madame GUYON, the Illuminati and Alumbrados, and Mère Marie Yvonne [d. 1951; see Études 307 (1960) 106–07]. Moreover, even in the case of genuine private revelations, it often happens that in the writings relating them, truth and error so blend that the discrimination between authentic and spurious elements becomes difficult. Augustin POULAIN, in Graces of Interior Prayer, examines 32 cases of saints and mystics in whose authentic revelations, approved by the Church, human error and illusion are mixed; and he includes such saints as Catherine of Siena, Gertrude, and VINCENT FERRER. Moreover, there are, in the writings of genuine charismatics, besides the divine message, particulars of time and place that do not belong to the message but were added by the writers. They themselves are generally unable to make a distinction between the divine and the human element.

Theology. The existence of authentic private revelations is, from the facts of history and the Church’s approval, beyond doubt. The number of spurious revelations, which may well be greater than that of the recorded authentic ones, does not disprove this. There were always private revelations among the charismatic graces that the Holy Spirit bestows on some members of the Church for the common good. These revelations are called private not because they were intended only for the individual persons to whom they were granted (for every charismatic grace is “communal”), but because they are not part of the public or official revelation. As for their nature, so far as they are “revelations”—a formal communication from God infusing into the minds of the charismatics the supernatural knowledge that He wants them to transmit to the Church—the essence of private revelations does not differ from that of the public revelation. The same kind of divine inspiration or prophetic light, elevating the minds of the chosen persons and enabling them to perceive and know what is naturally above the power of their reason, is operative in the charism of prophecy, whether in private or in public revelations (see Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 2a2ae 171.1–2). The difference between the two lies elsewhere.

Role in the Church. Private revelations have no bearing on the deposit of faith. They do not, theologians are agreed, contain new doctrine for belief by divine and Catholic faith (see FAITH). When it is further asked: Can and must these revelations be believed privately by divine faith? the answer is generally: Only those to whom these revelations are addressed can, and when they have sufficient certainty of the facts, must give an assent of divine faith. As for other people who come to know the revelations from the charismatics, the more common opinion is that they are not obliged and are not able to believe them by divine faith. This opinion was challenged by Karl Rahner, on the ground that no greater guarantee can be required for divine faith in private revelations than for faith in the public revelation: in both cases the moral certainty of the fact is sufficient. The question is perhaps more academic than practical, considering the specific purpose of private revelations. Though they are not meant to present new doctrines, private revelations do play a positive role in the life of the Church. They are a part of the normal, if more or less extraordinary, guidance of the Church by the Spirit of Christ, not unlike that which the same Spirit provides through the inspirations of grace for the life of individual Christians. Their purpose is to point out and to urge a practical manner of applying, in the particular circumstances of the changing times, some one or other teaching of faith or morals. Rahner explains that while the public revelation is meant to teach a doctrine expressed in a statement, private revelations transmit a command. The first is to be believed, the second to be done. This is evident, for example, from the revelations of the Sacred Heart to Saint Margaret Mary that led to the establishment of the feast, or from the Lourdes apparitions that introduced the pilgrimages to that shrine.

Attitude of the Church. The Church’s attitude toward private revelations confirms this view. Her great caution, not to say diffidence, in the face of new and extraordinary phenomena, is well known; and it is justified by the all-too-frequent error, illusion, and even fraud that steal into them. But the Church does believe that there are genuine private revelations. If after due examination she is satisfied that the facts are trustworthy and the probability of error or fraud is excluded, she gives her official approval. This, however, does not entail any obligation for the faithful; nor is it a direct invitation to believe these revelations. It does not guarantee the truth of the facts but “means nothing more than the permission to publish [these divine communications] after due examination, for the instruction and spiritual benefit of the faithful. . . . These revelations demand an assent of human belief according to the rules of prudence, when these rules present them as probable and devoutly believable” (Benedict XIV). Accordingly, theologians conclude, the Church’s approval implies that the revelations considered contain nothing contrary to the faith and to morality, that they may be made known in publications, and that the faithful are given permission to believe them with caution.

There is, however, a more positive side to this approval. The very fact that the approval is given after careful examination by experts in such matters is a guarantee that humanly speaking there is sufficient reason for a prudent assent. There is no rashness in so believing. Yet, even then it is well to remember that the reports on the revelations may contain, beside the genuine divine message, inaccuracies and misinterpretations; the Church’s approval does not guarantee the truth of every detail.

The Church goes beyond mere approval; she also takes account of private revelations in her pastoral guidance of the faithful and in her liturgy. This is only natural. Charismatic graces such as private revelations are a normal manifestation of the presence of the Spirit of Christ in the Mystical Body and of His continued guidance of the Church. Naturally they are adapted to the varying needs of the Church. Without bringing anything new to the Catholic faith, they draw attention to what in the faith is likely to meet the particular needs of the times. Thus the Church instituted the liturgical Feasts of the Sacred Heart of Jesus and of the Immaculate Heart of Mary at the prompting of private revelations. These revelations, nonetheless, were only a secondary motivation of the Church’s action. The doctrinal foundations of the new devotions are found not in the new, but in the ancient public revelation. Pius XII made this clear as regards the devotion to the Sacred Heart, in his encyclical Haurietis aquas (May 15, 1956).

Attitude of the Faithful. The theology of private revelations and of the Church’s approval provides clear pastoral guidance for the faithful. Their attitude should be the same as that of the Church. First, it should be one of caution, of awareness that illusion and error easily enter into the writings of even genuine and approved mystics and saints. To sift the wheat from the chaff is a delicate task better left to experts in the theology and psychology of mystics. When reading books of revelations or reports on visions and apparitions, the wise rule is not to draw on them for spiritual guidance, unless it be something the Church has approved and teaches independently of them. What is singular and not in keeping with the common teaching of spiritual and theological writers must inspire caution and distrust, as also what tends to satisfy unnecessary curiosity. One should beware of overeagerness for extraordinary facts. A craving for the marvelous and the sensational is not in keeping with the mind of the Church. It exposes one to the danger of not heeding her decisions in these matters, although she has the right and the duty to judge of their nature and truth. Such eagerness for the marvelous must not be mistaken for a sign of a true Catholic sense, which lies in following the Church’s official guidance. Nor is there any need for one to desire these charismatic graces for himself. Private revelations of themselves do not sanctify those who receive them; they are meant for the common good of the Church and are no sure sign of personal holiness. A desire for private revelations is generally unhealthy and, as history shows, leads to pitiful or disastrous deviations. But when private revelations have been recognized as authentic by the Church and have proved their genuineness in the fruits for the spiritual life of her members, then it is right, after her example, to heed their message and to learn the practical lesson that the Spirit of Christ teaches through them. Not to do so would be to neglect a grace given for the spiritual good of the members of the Church. However, even while accepting them we should keep a discriminating mind, subordinating these directives to the teaching of the deposit of faith proposed by the Church. This is and remains the doctrinal foundation of Catholic life and spirituality. “Guided by the Magisterium of the Church, the sensus fidelium knows how to discern and welcome in these revelations whatever constitutes an authentic call of Christ or his saints to the Church” (CCC 67).

See Also: REVELATION, THEOLOGY OF; FAITH; MYSTICAL PHENOMENA.

Bibliography: BENEDICT XIV, De servorum Dei beatificatione et beatorum canonizatione, v.1–7 of Opera omnia, 17 v. in 20 (new ed. Prato 1839–43) 2:32; 3:53. A. F. POULAIN, The Graces of Interior Prayer, tr. L. L. YORKE SMITH (10th French ed. St. Louis 1950) 299–399. GABRIELE DI SANTA MARIA MADDALENA, Visions and Revelations in the Spiritual Life, tr. by a Benedictine of Stanbrook Abbey (Westminster, Md. 1950). K. RAHNER “Les Révélations privées,” Revue d’ascétique et de mystique 25 (1949) 506–14; Visionen und Prophezeiungen (2d ed. enl. Quaestiones disputatae 4; Freiburg 1958). L. LOCHET, Apparitions of Our Lady: Their Place in the Life of the Church, tr. J. BOYLE (New York 1960). H. HOLSTEIN, "Les Apparitions mariales," Maria 5 (1958) 755–78. P. DE LETTER, "The Meaning of Lourdes," Clergy Monthly 22 (1958) 3–16.

[P. DE LETTER/EDS.]

REVERENCE (OBSERVANTIA)

A term used here, not in its general meaning, but as a somewhat less than satisfactory translation of the Latin observantia of Catholic moral theologians. It is the proper name of the virtue inclining a man to satisfy his obligation of RESPECT and submission toward those superior to himself in dignity and authority. It is like piety, which disposes one to render the debt of reverence and submission to his parents, except that the persons revered by this virtue are those endowed with an official dignity and authority. A person in a position of authority in the state, for example, shares according to the measure of his office in the excellence and principality of the state itself, and on account of this, respect and, when he commands within the limits of his authority, submission are due to him—respect because of his official position and dignity; submission because of his authority.

Observantia is closely associated with OBEDIENCE, but differs from it in being concerned more with securing a general attitude of submission, while obedience has for its object the execution of specific commands. It is also associated with the virtue of respect (DULIA), differing from it in requiring the tribute of respect for the specific excellence of authority, while dulia pays respect to any excellence or superiority.

As is the case with other moral virtues, failure by way of either defect or excess is possible. Defect consists in the withholding of due respect or submission; excess, in their exaggeration.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 102.

[W. HERBST]

REVISIONIST THEOLOGY

In the broadest sense, "revisionist theology" refers to such recent theological movements as process theism and various forms of political and LIBERATION THEOLOGY (i.e., feminist, black and Third World as well as the work of other individual theologians. What is characteristic of and common to such diverse forms of theological reflection is their attempt to reformulate from various critical perspectives the meaning and truth-claims of the Christian tradition's central theological and Christological affirmations.

In the narrowest sense, revisionist theology refers to a specific formal model of the method of fundamental theology. The term itself was first put forward by David Tracy in Blessed Rage For Order and this text remains the primary source for the most refined and detailed exposition of the model. For Tracy, a revisionist fundamental Christian theology is best described as philosophical reflection on the meanings present in common human experience and those present in the Christian tradition. The broad and the narrow senses of the term are not unrelated. Revisionist theology as a formal model of theological method is characterized by a specific understanding of the web of commitments which define the standpoint of the individual theologian's approach to the Christian faith. This methodological commitment at the level of fundamental theology finds its embodiment in the sphere of systematic theology, and to a greater or lesser extent, in the theological movements noted above.

For revisionist theology the primary commitment of the Christian theologian as theologian is to the community of scholarly inquiry and its respective canons of inquiry (i.e., philosophical, historical, literary-critical, ideological-critical, etc.) and the morality of critical inquiry: a resolve to defend methodological canons in a public manner, to assert only that for which warrants are provided, and a willingness to follow the evidence wherever it may lead in the spirit of open inquiry. The theologian's primary loyalty to the tradition as Christian theologian lies in a commitment to the investigation of the present meaning and defensibility of the truth-claims of that tradition.

Critical Corrective. This understanding of the task of the theologian is aptly called revisionist because it represents a critical corrective to the dominant neo-orthodox understanding of the task of theology described by Paul Tillich through the "method of correlation." According to Tillich, the task of the theologian is to show that the Christian message contains answers to the questions implied in the human situation. The revisionist maintains that such a correlation is insufficiently critical—indeed, it is simply a juxtaposition—as it derives the questions for theology from one source (the human situation) and its answers from another (the Christian message) and does not allow for a correlation and interplay of the principal questions and answers of each source.

In this criticism revisionist theology reaffirms the commitment to the principal values, cognitive claims, and existential faiths of classic liberal theologies. Yet revisionist theology affirms these through the correctives of post-liberal neo-orthodox and radical theologies. Revisionist theology self-consciously acknowledges first, the naiveté and optimism of liberal theology regarding the reconciliation of Christian faith and modern culture. Second, it accepts the description of the cognitive, ethical, and social ambiguity of the contemporary world as articulated by both neo-orthodoxy and post-Enlightenment schools of secular thought. Third, given the criticism of the method of correlation, revisionist theology remains disenchanted with the final neo-orthodox defense of theism through a retrieval of God as the “Wholly Other.” The revisionist therefore accepts the criticisms—which is not to say the conclusions—of a radical theology which rejects orthodox, liberal and neo-orthodox defenses of theism as incompatible with the affirmation of an authentic, illusionless secularity. Fourth, it seeks to preserve within theological reflection the polyvalent nature of the dominant symbols of Christian faith along with an acknowledgement of the hermeneutical and social conditions of all human understanding. Revisionist theology is thus defined by its commitment to the articulation and critical correlation of both a reinterpreted post-modern consciousness which recognizes the antinomies of the Enlightenment and a reinterpreted Christianity which recognizes the crisis of the meaningfulness of Christian faith today.

In the execution of this task, revisionist theologians have especially relied upon the resources of the process thought of Whitehead and Hartshorne, hermeneutical theory, deconstructive structuralism and various schools of ideology-critique in an attempt to formulate a reconciliation and critical correction of both modernity and the Christian tradition.

See Also: DECONSTRUCTIONISM.

Bibliography: D. TRACY, Blessed Rage For Order (New York 1975); The Analogical Imagination (New York 1981); Plurality and Ambiguity (San Francisco 1987). S. OGDEN, The Reality of God (New York 1966). V. A. HARVEY, The Historian and the Believer (New York 1966). G. KAUFMAN, God the Problem (Cambridge 1972). J. L. SEGUNDO, The Liberation of Theology (New York 1976). L. GILKEY, Reaping the Whirlwind (New York 1976). J. B. COBB and D. R. GRIFFITY, Process Theology: An Introductory Exposition (Philadelphia 1976). J. METZ, Faith in History and Society (New York 1980). R. R. REUTHER, Sexism and God-Talk (Boston 1983). E. S. FIORENZA, Bread Not Stone (Boston 1984). C. BOFF, Theology and Praxis (New York 1987).

[J. A. COLOMBO]

REVIVALISM

An approach to religion designed to stimulate interest by appealing principally to the emotions. It was a characteristic feature of 17th-century German PIETISM and 18th-century English Methodism (see WESLEY, CHARLES; WESLEY, JOHN; WHITEFIELD, GEORGE). This method of religious instruction was brought to colonial America, where Jonathan EDWARDS made religious emotion theologically and intellectually respectable during the GREAT AWAKENING. During the Second Awakening in the early years of the 19th century, revivalism grew to maturity.

The Second Awakening began as a Presbyterian movement, but eventually it was the METHODISTS and BAPTISTS who found its techniques appropriate to their goals and doctrines. Most characteristic of this movement were the camp meetings and the circuit riders. On the frontier, particularly in the West, people gathered from miles around to spend a few days coping with their religious problems and, incidentally, enjoying the rare opportunity of social life so lacking because of their isolation. The first planned camp meeting was held in Logan County, Ky., in July 1800 as the result of the activity of Rev. James McGready. Born of Scotch-Irish parents in Pennsylvania, McGready was licensed to preach in 1788, when he was about 30 years old. He moved to North Carolina, and then to Kentucky in 1798. Described by contemporaries as ugly and uncouth, he nevertheless attracted wide attention by his earnestness, zeal, and impassioned preaching. In 1824 revivalist Charles Grandison FINNEY began a notable 20-year preaching career in the area north of the Ohio and Potomac Rivers. Although ordained by the Presbyterians, he pursued his own way both theologically and otherwise.

The camp meeting generally took place in August or early fall at a cleared location in the forest. The participants came prepared to camp out for several days. The natural confusion of so many adults and children, along with the necessary animals, added to the effect of the impassioned preaching of the ministers and resulted in a scene of emotional chaos. The “falling exercise,” in which the subject lost consciousness, was generally considered a clear manifestation of the power of God in the hearts of man. Other physical phenomena, of more questionable efficacy, were “the jerks,” “the laughing exercise,” “the barking exercise” in which the sinner treed the devil, and “the singing exercise.” Despite the many abuses connected with these meetings and the ridicule they inspired, they nevertheless served as a social and religious outlet for the frontiersman. Camp meetings continued through the 19th century, but after the Civil War the locations generally became summer resorts or were used for sedate religious conferences. Supplementing the camp meetings was the effort of the circuit rider, who went anytime and anywhere sinners were in need of being saved. With their saddle bags stuffed with Bibles and tracts, these missionaries visited nearly every hovel on the frontier and were a key factor in the spread of the Methodist Church.

MAIN SQUARE OF THE DUCK CREEK METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH CAMP MEETING, DURING SERVICE, NEAR CINCINNATI, OHIO.

Preacher delivers sermon to the crowd in the main square of Duck Creek Methodist Episcopal church, near Cincinnati, Ohio.
(©CORBIS)

The great U.S. revival, which followed the financial panic of 1857, launched Dwight Lyman MOODY, the greatest of the professional revivalists, who worked under the Young Men's Christian Association during the Civil War. His major evangelistic career began immediately after the war, and included very successful tours of Great Britain as well as of the U.S. With the aid of his hymn leader, Ira David Sankey, Moody brought to the rapidly growing cities the revivalist methods of frontier religion. Leadership next passed to William Ashley (Billy) SUNDAY, a reformed baseball player with a great talent for dramatization. World War I was followed by a new type of revivalism, which featured physical as well as spiritual healing; no meeting was complete without its "miracles." At mid-20th century the leading revivalist was William Franklin (Billy) Graham (1918–), whose gigantic, organized cooperative meetings were designed to increase the membership of the local churches.

Bibliography: B. A. WEISBERGER, They Gathered at the River (Boston 1958). C. A. JOHNSON, The Frontier Camp Meeting (Dallas 1955). W. W. SWEET, Revivalism in America (New York 1944).

[E. R. VOLLMAR]

REVIVISCENCE, SACRAMENTAL

A validly administered Sacrament of the Church, if it is unproductive of grace because of some impediment or obex in the recipient, is said to revive when the obstacle is subsequently removed; that is, the Sacrament confers the grace by virtue of the initial validly administered rite. Reviviscence of sacramental power requires: that the obstacle be removed, for example, by sincere contrition; that the Sacrament have been validly administered; that the rite have left in the recipient some real effect; and that God will in His mercy that this be the sacramental action. This is the general teaching of theologians with respect to Baptism, Confirmation, Orders, Anointing of the Sick, and Matrimony. Some theologians extend the doctrine to the Eucharist and Penance.

The belief implicit in this teaching, that Sacraments confer some real effect other than grace, is derived from the early Church's practice of not repeating some Sacraments, notably Baptism and Orders, once validly administered. From this practice St. Augustine (d. 430) derived and developed his teaching of the sacramental character. His frequent assertions that although Sacraments received unworthily do not avail for salvation, yet do so immediately upon the recipient's repenting, are the clearest expression of reviviscence in the teaching of the Fathers of the Church.

With the renewal of interest in sacramentology in the Middle Ages, given impetus by disputes about simoniacal ordinations, the Church approved theologians' distinguishing in a Sacrament the external rite (sacramentum tantum), the symbolic reality (sacramentum et res), and the grace (res tantum). Some theologians think that the symbolic reality that the recipient receives as a real effect from a validly administered Sacrament causes the giving of grace after the obstacle has been removed; others speak of the real effect left in the soul as a disposition for grace; others, as an impression in the faculties of the soul; still others, as a modification of the baptismal character.

Theologians usually assign the symbolic reality, i.e., the character of Baptism, Confirmation, and Orders, and the vinculum, or interior sacramental bond, of Matrimony, as the cause of grace in reviviscence. They deduce the will of God from this, that if reviviscence were not His will, original sin could never be removed in one who receives Baptism validly, but unworthily. Moreover, the faithful would never receive the grace of those states of life into which Confirmation, Orders, and Matrimony admit them. Most theologians reason that the real effect of the Anointing of the Sick is a consecrating of the sick to God's mercy during a particular illness; and the ritual for conditional administration seems to confirm this opinion. Much less agreement exists among theologians as to whether the Eucharist and Penance also in some sense "revive."

Bibliography: B. LEEMING, Principles of Sacramental Theology (new ed. Westminster, Md. 1956). F. SOLÁ, "De sacramentis initiationis Christianae," Sacrae Theologiae Summa (Biblioteca de autores cristianos 4; 1953) 183–185. A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 13.2:2618–19.

[P. L. HANLEY]

REVIVISCENCE OF MERIT

The question of the reviviscence of MERIT is really a question of the extent of God's forgiveness of sinners. Does God restore to a repentant sinner all the merit that had been acquired during previous years of faithful service or not? It is a question of condign merits, not of congruous, which may be likened to a gratuity given in consideration of service. Does God's mercy extend so far as to restore previously acquired merits, which had been lost through mortal sin? The question depends entirely upon the free will of God. How extensive is His forgiveness?

Restoration of Merit. The restoration of past merits together with the forgiveness of mortal sin has always been the unanimous and certain teaching of theologians.

A positive argument in favor of reviviscence is found in the Council of Trent (Enchiridion symbolorum, 1545, 1582), which declared that supernatural good works, performed in the state of grace, lead the just person who dies in the state of grace to eternal life. There is no requirement that sanctifying grace be never lost in the meanwhile.

Again there is the teaching of Pius XI, in his apostolic letter of May 29, 1924, The Infinite Mercy of God, which announced the Holy Year of 1925. In it he teaches: "For all who by doing penance carry out the salutary commands of the Apostolic See, during the great jubilee, regain and receive entirely the abundance of merits and gifts that they had lost by sin . . ." (Enchiridion symbolorum, 3670). This statement is certainly not restricted to the occasion of the jubilee.

The revival of merit thus seems to be well established by the Church. It does not regard God, offended by sin, as bearing any grudge against or being ungenerous to repentant sinners. But it is difficult to find any specific teaching on this precise point in Scripture. Ez 18.21 and 33.12, Gal 3.4, and Heb 6.9–10 are sometimes cited. But the words of Ezechiel are not about the recovery of merit lost by sin; the passages in Galatians and Hebrews refer to merit formerly acquired, but it is not clear that they refer to believing sinners. The Parable of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15.11–32), and various texts of the Fathers, speak of the restoration of goods lost by sin but not clearly of goods acquired by personal merit. It seems that, as often happens, Scripture and the Fathers have left no clear evidence; this evidence must come instead from other sources.

Evidently the question of the revival of merit depends on the free will of God; it can therefore be settled only by an authentic interpreter of that, such as the Church, clarifying the attitude of God toward forgiven sinner as He has revealed it. But once this has been done theological reason can show the reasonableness of the revival of merit. This was accomplished by St. Thomas (Summa theologiae 3a, 89.5), who developed the idea that merit lost by sin can revive, for the only obstacle to its revival is removed by repentance. The works that gave rise to it have passed, but they remain in the acceptance of God. Man's subsequent sin does not efface this acceptability but only impedes its execution for as long as the impediment to the revival of merit remains.

Measure of Restoration. The question of the measure of the restoration of merits, whether they be restored in whole or only in part, is a disputed one. Three opinions, which have been diversely described, are current among theologians and may be stated as follows. The first opinion holds that a sinner, newly justified, does not receive any essential reward beyond what is due to his disposition when repentant, but that the reward is now due both to his conversion and to his previous merit. The second opinion holds that merits revive not in their original fullness but only in a degree proportionate to one's disposition at the time of repentance. This proportion is computed differently by different theologians. The third opinion asserts that merits revive in their totality, so that a penitent, dying immediately after repentance, receives not only the reward proportionate to the actual disposition at the time of repentance but also all that was due in the past in previous states of grace.

When these three opinions are compared with one another, it seems that the first practically does away with the act of reviviscence, the second preserves it, but arbitrarily restricts it, while the third really does honor to the generosity of God and the completeness of His forgiveness. Such seems to be the generosity of a forgiving God.

See Also: GOOD WORKS; IMPUTATION OF JUSTICE AND MERIT; SALUTARY ACTS.

Bibliography: B. BERAZA, De gratia Christi (2d ed. Bilbao 1929). C. BOYER, Tractatus de sacramento paenitentiae . . . (Rome 1942). S. GONZÁLEZ, Sacrae theologiae summa, ed. FATHERS OF THE SOCIETY OF JESUS, PROFESSORS OF THE THEOLOGICAL FACULTIES IN SPAIN, 4 v. Biblioteca de autores cristianos (Madrid 1945) 3.3:347–352. L. LERCHER, Institutiones theologiae dogmaticae (5th ed. Barcelona 1951).

[F. L. SHEERIN]

REVOLUTION OF 1688 (ENGLAND)

The events of 1688–89, when William and Mary replaced James II on the English throne, produced a decisive shift in the relationship between monarch and parliament. Hitherto the latter had owed its existence to the former; henceforth the obligation was reversed. William and Mary were granted the crown only after agreeing to conditions laid down in the DECLARATION OF RIGHTS, made statutory in the Bill of Rights and underlined by a remodeled coronation oath, pledging them to govern “according to the Statutes in Parliament agreed on.” These limitations sought to curb conduct such as that by which James II had undermined parliament’s legislative power and the position of the established Church. These encroachments were added to personal grievances that prompted their victims to a more ardent opposition than they might otherwise have undertaken. James brought his downfall upon himself largely through his headlong drive for religious equality, heedless of the warnings of the Pope, the papal nuncio, Louis XIV, Cardinal Howard, and leading Catholic laymen.

Mary II (1662–1694), Queen of England, Ireland and Scotland. (Archive Photos)

James compelled many of those most disposed to be loyal to him, Anglican Tories whose watchword was “Church and King,” to choose between their Church and their King; when they chose the former, his cause was lost. Many grievances, some unreasonable, some self-interested but some well founded, were awakened: distaste for a standing army and disquiet at its quota of Catholics, anger among the nobility over their loss of command of the militia, anxiety at inconvenient enquiries into the handling of recusancy revenues (which were ordered to be refunded), resentment at dismissal from administrative positions, and the subsequent appointment of Catholics and nonconformists. Many disapproved of James's attempt (by means of a questionnaire in the autumn of 1687) to make potential M.P.'s commit themselves on the question of penal law repeal; and indignation arose at the King's treatment of the universities (especially his imposition of a Catholic president and fellows upon Magdalen College, Oxford). In addition there was fury at the prosecution of seven Anglican bishops who refused to promulgate the second Declaration of Indulgence, granting religious toleration to Catholic and Protestant dissenters. James may have been aiming at general toleration and not at a Catholic despotism, but his methods lent themselves all too readily to the latter construction, particularly at a time when Irish massacres of Protestants, the "Popish Plot," and Louis XIV's revival of the persecution of Huguenots (culminating in the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685) were in all men's minds. Such additional factors as the opening of Catholic chapels and schools, the wearing of religious garb by Catholic clergy, the preaching of a sermon at a court of assize by a Jesuit (at Hertford), the use of Bath Abbey for Catholic ceremonies, and the occasional anti-Protestant sermon intensified the impatience and suspicion with which James's rule was regarded and made for a general acceptance of the Revolution. It was not, however, until after the birth of an heir to the throne on June 10, 1688 (characteristically, James announced that the Pope was to be his godfather), that positive action was taken against the King. Hitherto, mounting indignation had been tempered by the knowledge that both his immediate successor, his elder daughter, Mary, and her sister Anne were devout Anglicans; the rule of the Catholic King was accepted as a temporary and probably short-lived aberration (by 1688 James had already attained the age at which his predecessor had died.) The prince's birth, however, augured a succession of Catholic monarchs.

On June 30, the day that the seven bishops were acquitted amid tumultuous rejoicing (in which the army, significantly, participated), seven men—neither representative nor, at that time, politically important—invited William of Orange to invade England to uphold the "religion, liberties and properties" of the people. On November 5, William landed in Devon; James marched westward to meet him, but defections among those he most trusted (e.g., John Churchill and Princess Anne) so disheartened him that he returned to London, sent the Queen and baby prince to France, and followed them on December 23. In the last months of 1688 anti-Catholic feeling showed itself in nationwide attacks on Catholics and on their property, and three of the four vicars apostolic and numerous priests were imprisoned.

Legislation of 1689 subjected Catholics to fines and imprisonment for refusing the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, expelled them from London, confined them to their dwelling places, authorized the search of their homes for weapons, and ordered the sale of papists' horses worth over £5. After the immediate crisis had passed, however, these laws were enforced only spasmodically and the same applied to the levying of the double land tax, imposed on Catholics in 1692. William III's claim that he came not to persecute Catholics but to protect Protestants, although only a minor motive (his principal purpose was to gain English support against Louis XIV) was, on the whole, borne out by events. Catholics were, nevertheless, subject to numerous political disabilities, which produced apostasies among the Catholic nobility and gentry during the ensuing century.

Bibliography: G. DAVIES, ed., Bibliography of British History, Stuart Period, 1603–1714 (Oxford 1928). C. L. GROSE, A Select Bibliography of British History, 1660–1760 (Chicago 1939). G. N. CLARK, The Later Stuarts (2d ed. Oxford 1955). D. OGG, England into the Reigns of James II and William III (Oxford 1955). J. P. KENYON, The Stuarts (London 1958), brilliant and perceptive; The Nobility in the Revolution of 1688 (Kingston upon Hull, Eng. 1963); Robert Spencer, Earl of Sunderland (London 1958). F. C. TURNER, James II (New York 1948). M. P. ASHLEY, "Is there a Case for James II?" History Today 13 (1963) 347–352. L. PINKHAM, William III and the Respectable Revolution (Cambridge, Mass. 1954). G. M. STRAKA, Anglican Reaction to the Revolution of 1688 (Madison 1962). D. C. DOUGLAS, ed., English Historical Documents (London 1953–) v. 8 1660–1714, ed. A. BROWNING. W. C. COSTIN and J. S. WATSON, comps., The Law and Working of the Constitution: Documents, 2 v. (London 1952) v.1 1660–1783. G. M. STRAKA, ed., The Revolution of 1688. . . . (Boston 1963). H. E. BELL and R. L. OLLARD, "King James II and the Revolution of 1688: Some Reflections on the Historiography," Historical Essays, 1600–1750 (London 1964).

[J. A. WILLIAMS]

REX GLORIOSE MARTYRUM

The office hymn which was formerly sung at Lauds in the common office for several martyrs. The author is unknown, but Walpole thinks that this hymn, the DEUS, TUORUM MILITUM, and the JESU, REDEMPTOR OMNIUM are all by the same person because they are similar in language. They are written in iambic dimeter, yet with a strong accentual rhythm; this feature, and particularly the sophisticated use of rhyme, point to Celtic origin. The verses of each strophe are in rhyming couplets, the rhyme sometimes of two syllables, yet often inexact, a style characteristic of the 6th century. In the 1632 revision of the Roman BREVIARY, this hymn suffered several changes (six words). The hymn invokes Christ, the glorious king of martyrs, reward of confessors, who guides to eternal life those who despise the things of earth. He is asked to lend a kindly ear to our petitions as a reward for the celebration of the martyrs' triumph.

Bibliography: Analecta hymnica 51:128–129. A. S. WALPOLE, ed., Early Latin Hymns (Cambridge, Eng. 1922) 384–385. J. MEARNs, Early Latin Hymnaries (Cambridge, Eng. 1913) 75. F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (Oxford 1953) 131–140. J. SZÖVÉRFY, Die Annalen der lateinischen Hymnendichtung (Berlin 1964–65) 1:214; 2:453. J. CONNELLY, Hymns of the Roman Liturgy (Westminster MD 1957) 148–149.

[A. J. KINNIREY]

REX SEMPITERNE CAELITUM

The office hymn that was historically prescribed for Matins at Easter time. This hymn is the Rex aeternae domine cited by BEDE as an example of rhythmical rather than metrical verse. He describes it as beautifully composed, with a resemblance to iambic verse. It seems to have been composed in the 5th or early 6th century, since it is prescribed by CAESARIUS OF ARLES and AURELIUS OF RÉOMÉ. Its rhythmical character and use of assonance and rhyme suggest Celtic origin. The hymn is part of a longer composition celebrating the whole redemptive work of Christ. From the 10th century, the first seven stanzas were taken to form an Easter hymn. The text of these stanzas underwent extensive revision in the 1632 revision of the Roman BREVIARY.

Bibliography: Analecta hymnica 51:5. BEDE, De arte metrica in Grammatici latini, ed. H. KEIL, 7 v. (Leipzig 1857–80) 7:258. S. G. PIMONT, Les hymnes du bréviaire romain, 3 v. (Paris 1874–87) 3:93–100. J. JULIAN, ed., A Dictionary of Hymnology (New York 1957) 958. J. MEARNs, Early Latin Hymnaries (Cambridge, Eng. 1913). A. S. WALPOLE, ed., Early Latin Hymns (Cambridge, Eng. 1922) 211–217. C. S. BALDWIN, Medieval Rhetoric and Poetic (New York 1928) 107–118. F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (Oxford 1953) 131–140. J. CONNELLY, Hymns of the Roman Liturgy (Westminster, MD 1957) 92. J. SZÖVÉRFY, Die Annalen der lateinischen Hymnendichtung (Berlin 1964–65) 2:453.

[A. J. KINNIREY]

REY, ANTHONY

Educator and chaplain in the Mexican War; b. Lyons, France, March 19, 1807; d. near Ceralvo, Mexico, Jan. 19, 1847. Although Rey had first prepared himself for a business career, he entered the Jesuit college of Fribourg, Switzerland, and in 1827 he joined the society. After his ordination, he taught at Fribourg and at Sion in Valais. In 1840 he was sent to the U.S. and appointed professor of metaphysics and ethics at Georgetown College, Washington, D.C. Three years later he was transferred to St. Joseph's Church, Philadelphia, Pa., and subsequently served as assistant to the Jesuit provincial of the Maryland province, pastor of Trinity Church in Georgetown, and vice president of Georgetown College (1845). During the Mexican War (1846–48), Rey was appointed a chaplain in the U.S. Army and assigned to serve on the staff of Gen. Zachary Taylor, where he frequently exposed himself to enemy fire in order to minister to the wounded and dying soldiers. After the successful siege at Monterrey, he preached to the rancheros of the area and, against the advice of experienced U.S. officers, set out on a mission to Matamoros. He was last known to have preached to a mixed Mexican-American congregation at Ceralvo. Within a few days of his sermon at Ceralvo, Rey's body was discovered, pierced with lances; it is conjectured that he was murdered by a band of guerrillas.

[J. Q. FELLER]

REYES SALAZAR, SABÁS, ST.

Martyr, priest; b. Dec. 5, c. 1879–83, at Cocula, Jalisco, Archdiocese of Guadalajara, Mexico; d. Apr. 13, 1927 (Wednesday of Holy Week), Tototlán, Guadalajara, Diocese of San Juan de los Lagos. Sabás came from a poor family, studied in Guadalajara's seminary, then transferred to the diocese of Tamaulipas, where he was ordained (1911). At the beginning of the revolution, he returned to Guadalajara to minister in various parishes, primarily forming catechists. Despite the outbreak of anti-clerical persecution, he continued working in Tototlán. When federal troops attacked as he was returning from a baptism, he found refuge for two days before he was discovered by Izaguirre's troops. In vain they tortured him with fire to elicit the hiding places of Francisco Vizcarra and other priests, then riddled his body with bullets. His body rests in the church at Tototlán. Fr. Reyes was both beatified (Nov. 22, 1992) and canonized (May 21, 2000) with Cristobal MAGALLANES [see GUADALAJARA (MEXICO), MARTYRS OF, SS.] by Pope John Paul II.

Feast: May 25 (Mexico).

Bibliography: J. CARDOSO, Los mártires mexicanos (Mexico City 1953). J. DÍAZ ESTRELLA, El movimiento cristero: sociedad y conflicto en los Altos de Jalisco (México, D.F. 1979).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

REYNOLDS, RICHARD, ST.

English Bridgettine priest, martyr; b. Devon, c. 1487; hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London),

May 4, 1535. At the age of 16 he went to Cambridge, where, receiving his A.B. (1506) and his M.A. (1509), he became a fellow of Corpus Christi College. His particular interest in the Scriptures led to the D.B. in 1513, when he was also appointed University Preacher. This same year he became a Bridgettine monk at Syon Abbey, Isleworth, the last of the large medieval monastic foundations and the only house of the order in England. Little is known of his next 20 years beyond his reputation as a preacher and spiritual counselor. When Henry VIII began his divorce proceedings, Reynolds was consulted by many who were perplexed about the "King's great matter," as well as about the prophecies of Elizabeth BARTON, the Holy Maid of Kent. Barton was executed in April 1534, but before her arrest she had visited Syon several times; according to the depositions of St. Thomas More, Reynolds had distrusted her. Anxious to secure the backing of Syon, the King sought its submission, but agents of Cromwell failed.

Sometime before April 20, 1535, Reynolds was arrested and with three Carthusian priors, John HOUGHTON, Robert LAWRENCE and Augustine WEBSTER, was imprisoned in the Tower, where, when visited by Cromwell, he spoke fearlessly against the king's supremacy over the Church. On April 28 he was indicted on the charge of high treason at Westminster, and found guilty by a jury that had been intimidated by Cromwell and the king's secretary. On May 4 all four were hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn. From the window of his cell Thomas MORE watched them passing to their execution, and remarked to his daughter, "Lo, dost thou not see, Meg, that these blessed fathers be now as cheerfully going to their deaths as bridegrooms to their marriage."

Reynolds was beatified by Pope Leo XIII on Dec. 29, 1886, and canonized by Paul VI on Oct. 25, 1970 as one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

Feast: May 11 (Archdiocese of Westminster, Bridgettine nuns); Oct. 25 (Feast of the 40 Martyrs of England and Wales); May 4 (Feast of the English Martyrs in England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: D. KNOWLES, The Religious Orders in England 3:214–218. F. R. JOHNSTON, Bl. Richard Reynolds (Postulation Pamphlet; London 1961). A. HAMILTON, The Angel of Sion (n.s. 1905). R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). B. CAMM, ed. Lives of the English Martyrs . . . , 2 v. (New York 1904–14). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 2:277–280. J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time (New York 1961) 5:408–409.

[G. FITZHERBERT]

RHAZES (RAZES, AL-RĀZĪ)

Rhazes is the Latin for al-Rāzī, physician, scientist, and philosopher whose full name in Arabic was Abū Bakr Muḥammad ibn Zakarīya al-Rāzī. The details of his life and the dates of his birth (c. 865) and death (923 or 925) are not well established.

Life and Works. His ethnic name, al-Rāzī relates to the city of Rayy, once Rages (Rhagae), which was important in the eastern caliphate under Islam; it was situated near Teheran, the present-day capital of Iran. Until the age of 30 (some say 40), Rhazes was interested in music and chemistry (alchemy). Thereafter, he became interested in medicine. According to some, this interest was brought about by the weakened condition of his eyes, variously attributed to his chemical experiments or to a lash of the whip. But according to his admirer, the great scientist al-Bīrūnī, Rhazes' blindness was due to deficiencies in his diet and to excesses in his way of life. This may explain the marked interest Rhazes had in matters of diet, as evidenced by the writings preserved in manuscript that he has left on this subject. Rhazes enjoyed a wide reputation as a physician; he was made head of a hospital in Rayy and later held a similar position in Baghdad.

Rhazes is the author of more than 100 works of various sizes, of which a work on alchemy, Kitāb al-Asrār, and three on medicine, Kitāb al-Ḥāwī, Kitāb al-Ṭibb al-Manṣūrī, and Kitāb al-Jadarī wa'l-Ḥaṣba, were widely known during the Latin Middle Ages. Kitāb al-Asrār (The Book of Secrets) was translated in the twelfth century by Gerard of Cremona. The Ḥāwī "Continens," was translated in the thirteenth century by Sālim ibn Faraj, under the title Liber Elhavi. The Manṣūrī, "Liber Almansoris," so called because it was dedicated to a prince of the Sāmanid dynasty, Manṣūr ibn Iṣḥāq, has had several editions since the last part of the fifteenth century. The Kitāb al-Jadarī wa'l-Ḥaṣba was translated into Latin, Greek, French, and English; the last-named translation was by W. A. Greenhill, A Treatise on Smallpox and Measles (Sydenham Society, London 1848). Rhazes' treatise on stones in the bladder and kidneys was edited and translated into French by P. de Koning (Leiden 1896).

The following medical aphorisms are among those attributed to Rhazes: "Whenever you can treat medically with foods, do not use medicines; and whenever you can treat by using a simple medicine, do not use a compound." "When the physician is learned and the patient obedient, how short the malady's persistence!" "Let your treatment of an incipient illness be such that it will not cause the patient's strength to fail."

Philosophy. To the Arabs, Rhazes was known as al-ṭabīb, "the physician," and not so much as a philosopher. This may be due to the fact that his writings belong overwhelmingly to the field of medicine; this in turn may account for the fact that the study of his philosophy was neglected until very recently. [See Schraeder, Zeitschrift der deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft 79 (1925): 228–235; S. Pines, Beiträge zur islamischen Atomenlehre (Berlin 1936) 34–36; Abu Bekr Muhammedis fil. Zachariae Rhagensis opera philosophica fragmentaque quae supersunt, ed. P. Kraus, Fuad I University, Faculty Publications, fasc. 22 (Cairo 1939)].

In Rhazes' metaphysics there are five eternal principles: the creator, the soul, matter, time, and space. Against the prevailing doctrine of the Muslim philosophers, and in agreement (though not intentional) with the Muslim theologians, he denies the eternity of the world. Metempsychosis, for which he was criticized by the Andalusian theologian Ibn Hazm (d. 1064), was a central doctrine in Rhazes' philosophy. The liberation of the soul from the body is brought about by the creator who endows the soul with intelligence ('aql') enabling it to study philosophy, the only means it has of liberating itself from the body. The end of the world will come about once all the individual souls have liberated themselves from their bodies. Rhazes' metaphysics manages to put him in simultaneous conflict with both philosophers and theologians in Islam.

Rhazes' cosmology is characterized by an atomic theory close to that of DEMOCRITUS, but differing from that of the later atomists of the Ash'arite school of Moslem theology [see ASH'ARĪ, AL-]. For Rhazes, atoms have extension, and the void has a positive character. The elements (five in number) come into being from the different proportions in which the atoms and the voids have combined. The property of a body depends on the number of the atoms in proportion to the number of voids.

Rhazes' ethics commends a full life. While avoiding excesses, one need not condemn the passions. Pleasure does not have a positive character; it is merely the normal state after pain, as health after sickness. The highest form of living belongs to the philosopher, who, like the creator, treats men with justice and kindness. In contrast to the later AVERROËS (IBN RUSHD), Rhazes saw no possibility of conciliation between philosophy and religion. In the former he saw a supreme way of life, and in the latter the cause of wars.

See Also: ARABIAN PHILOSOPHY.

Bibliography: L. LECLERC, Histoire de la médecine arabe, 2 v. (Paris 1876). E. G. BROWNE, Arabian Medicine (Cambridge, Eng. 1921). G. SARTON, Introduction to the History of Science, 3 v. in 5 (Baltimore 1927–48) 1:609. F. M. PAREJA, Islamologia (Rome 1951) 697. For fuller bibliog., C. BROCKELMANN, Geschichte der arabischen Literatur, 2 v. (2d ed. Leiden 1943–49) 1:267–271; suppl. 1:417–421. J. D. PEARSON, Index Islamicus (Cambridge, Eng. 1958) 167–168, studies by P. KRAUS, M. MEYERHOF, J. RUSKA, and others. AL-RĀZĪ, The Spiritual Physick of Rhazes, tr. A. J. ARBERRY (London 1950), a popular ethical work.

[G. MAKDISI]

RHEINAU, ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine abbey on an island in the Rhine River, Zurich, Switzerland. Founded probably in the early 9th century, Rheinau had extensive possessions by 852 and in 858 came under royal protection with the right to elect its abbot. New lands were received, and the abbey's immunity was confirmed by Otto I (972) and Henry III (1049); Henry IV placed it under the bishop of Constance (to 1067). Bishop GEBHARD III (1088–1110) introduced the HIRSAU reform. The three-nave, three-apsed basilica of Our Lady and St. Peter and the chapel of St. FINTAN (an Irish monk at Rheinau 851–878) were completed in 1114. The scriptorium flourished in the 12th century. The decline of the abbey in the 13th and 14th centuries was associated with economic difficulties and feudal lords; in 1455 the abbey came under the Swiss Confederation. Abandoned for a while (1529–31) during the Reformation, Rheinau joined the Swiss Benedictine Congregation (1602) under Gerold I Zurlauben (1598–1607). Its peak was reached under Gerold II Zurlauben (1697–1735), when scholarship flourished and a baroque church (1707) and a conventual building and library (1717) were built. Moritz HOHENBAUM VAN DER MEER, the historian, was at Rheinau (1734–95). Suppression by the French Revolution (1799–1803) was followed by a prohibition to accept novices (1836) and secularization by Zurich (1862). The abbey was converted to use as a mental institution; its library and archives went to Zurich.

Bibliography: R. HENGGELER, Monasticon Benedictinum Helvetiae 2 (Einsiedeln 1933) 163–402. H. FIETZ, ed., Die Kunstdenkmäler des Kantons Zürich, v.1 (Basel 1938) 225–362. H. G. BUTZ, Die Benediktinerabtei Rheinau im Zeitalter der Gegenreformation (Diss. Zurich 1954). G. HÜRLIMANN, Das Rheinauer Rituelle (Fribourg 1959). W. HILDEBRANDT, in Dictionnaire historique et biographique de la Suisse, v.5 (Neuchâtel 1930) 465–467. U. ENGELMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1274. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:2457–58. O. L. KAPSNER, A Benedictine Bibliography: An Author-Subject Union List, 2 v. (2d ed. Collegeville, MN 1962) 2:253–254.

[A. MAISSEN]

RHEINBERGER, JOSEF GABRIEL VON

Composer, organist, teacher; b. Vaduz, Lichtenstein, March 17, 1839; d. Munich, Nov. 25, 1901. Rheinberger revealed precocious musical talent when he began his piano studies at five years of age. At seven he served as church organist and at eight composed a three-part Mass with organ accompaniment. After harmony studies under P. Schmutzer at Feldkirch, in 1851 he enrolled at the Munich Conservatory, where he studied organ with Herzog, piano with Leonhard, and counterpoint with J. J. Maier. Thereafter he taught at the conservatory from 1855 to 1859, and then at the Royal Music School, and was assistant director of the court opera from 1865 to 1867. In subsequent years he was a royal professor and inspector of school music, director of the court chapel, and director of the oratorio society. He was named to the nobility of Bavaria in 1894, and received a doctorate from the University of Munich in 1899. Employing his solid background and mastery of composition, he wrote prolifically for both instrumental and vocal media, much of his output comprising Masses, motets, cantatas, and other religious forms. His organ works, especially the sonatas, rank among the best for that instrument from the romanticist period. A renowned and much sought-after teacher, he influenced many younger composers. His American pupils included George W. Chadwick (1854–1931) and Horatio Parker (1863–1919), both of whom became distinguished members of the Boston group of composers.

Bibliography: T. KROYER, Joseph Rheinberger (New York 1916). H. GRACE, The Organ Works of Rheinberger (London 1925); Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. E. BLOM 9 v. (5th ed. London 1954) 7:145–149. J. A. FULLER-MAITLAND, Masters of German Music (London 1894). A. WÜRZ, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 11:377–381. D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge 1996) 741–742. N. SLONIMSKY, ed. Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, Eighth Edition (New York 1992) 1504. H. WANGER, ed., Rheinberger: Sämtliche Werk Supplement 2, Leben und Werk in Bildern (Stuttgart 1998). M. WEYER, Die Orgelwerke Josef Rheinbergers: Ein Handbuch für Organisten (Wilhelmshaven 1994). A. WÜRZ, “Joseph (Gabriel) Rheinberger” in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, vol. 15, ed. S. SADIE, (New York 1980) 791–792.

[I. WORTMAN]

RHETORIC

The discipline, traditionally enumerated among the LIBERAL ARTS, concerned with persuasion or engendering credence. Since it has no proper subject matter and no inherent restrictions on what means it can or should employ, its notion tends to vary with the philosophy with which it is associated. Sometimes, however, rhetoric itself is taken as the basis of entire philosophy (M. Nizolius, 1498–1576), and at others it is excluded from philosophy as a hallmark of sophism (Plato).

Various Views. The verbal and the mental are two aspects of rhetoric that may be taken as poles between which the variations assumed by the discipline are to be apprehended. When the verbal aspect predominates and the rhetorician's emphasis is on effective speech, criticism is characteristically moral. Either rhetoric is dismissed as a somewhat empty concern with verbal ornamentation; or, if the rhetorician is a figure to be reckoned with, it is argued that man is not “the measure of all things” (Protagoras) and that true self-knowledge leads to principles transcending the merely human. When a cosmological identification of such principles takes place, rhetoric shares with poetry the condemnation of being inferior to philosophy, this frequently accompanied by paradoxical use of poetic devices, such as Plato's, to express a philosophy that excludes poets. The refutation by rhetoric of this attempt to devalue its importance has ordinarily been to urge the human irrelevance of cosmological speculation—the mistake of Socrates, according to Cicero, was separating wisdom and eloquence—and at the same time to dissociate the rhetorician's active participation in human affairs from the fancies and falsehoods of the poet.

Christian thinkers have evaluated the verbal aspect of rhetoric somewhat differently. The preeminence in so many senses of the Word of God accounts for the subordination of the rhetoric of human words—in the thought of the converted professor of rhetoric, St. AUGUSTINE—not to a cosmological, but to a personal Principle (confer, Doctr. christ. 4.1.1–4.7.11; Mag. 3.5–6, 11.36–12.46). The change from belief to Christian faith, the development of theology and the issuing forth of the independent scientific certitudes of philosophy provide the background against which the vicissitudes of rhetoric, conceived in relation to the other liberal arts, can be traced through the intellectual history of the Middle Ages. For St. THOMAS AQUINAS, for example, rhetoric is a part of LOGIC leading the mind to a state that is neither full-blown opinion or conviction on the one hand, nor estimation based almost wholly on manner of representation on the other. These are the offices of DIALECTICS and POETICS respectively, whereas rhetoric induces a kind of suspicion that does not exclude the contrary possibility (In anal. post., proem. 6).

Throughout the history of Western thought rhetoric or some of its devices has been a part of logic or dialectics. This is not so much because the verbal aspect is pre-empted or devalued by wisdom, philosophy, science, or some other discipline as because the devices of rhetoric belonging to its mental aspect prove attractive to some philosophers at certain critical junctures. When the larger analogical contexts become doubtful or subject to dispute, or when univocal definitions become difficult to establish, rhetoric has often seemed to offer appropriate resources.

Rhetorical Devices. The rhetorical distinction between definite and infinite questions, the former having a name and time attached and the latter arrived at by removal of these (Cicero, Partitiones oratoriae 9, 18, 30), has sometimes been invoked as a means of first approach to otherwise resistant data, or has been used along with its subdistinctions to order transcendental considerations in metaphysics.

Once the kind of question has been settled on by a rhetorician, his most characteristic device, namely, place or topic (locus, topos), can be brought into use. Places can be characterized as sets of recurrent patterns that oratorical encounters are likely to embody. Running over these in preparing his case, the orator can locate both his opponent's position and possible lines of argument and his own most effective lines of argument and refutation. Lists of places in the rhetorical tradition are customarily divided into common places, that is, those common to all situations and proper places, those appropriate either to kinds of questions (Cicero) or to kinds of oratory (Aristotle) and distinguished according to type of audience as forensic, deliberative, or epideictic (display). A familiar example of both questions and places in a short, though mixed, list is the set of CIRCUMSTANCES—quis, quid, ubi, cur, quomodo, quando, quibus auxiliis—that has a long history of use in Canon Law, moral theology and journalism.

The notion of rhetorical place can be presented by contrasting the treatments of DEFINITION in rhetoric and dialectics. Dialectics in many of its versions (for example, Aristotle's or Agricola's) employs places, not infrequently taking over those to be found in the lists of rhetoric; but even when dialectics does not use places, its characteristic movement, often rather far ranging, is centripetal with regard to definition or some approximation of this. For rhetoric, definition is one of the places or topics, along with others, such as cause, consequences and contrary. Rhetoric proceeds to definition by explication rather than by narrowing. Unfolding parts or divisions carries out defining (Cicero, Topica 5), the idea being that definition in some matter or affair may provide some room for possible argument in the course of presentation.

Rhetorical Argument. It is in argument that the interest of the great classical rhetorics of Aristotle and Cicero lies. Their predecessors had devoted too much attention either to the verbal side of the art (Aristotle), or to the judging of statements (Cicero), whereas the prior or more important aspect is the invention of arguments. The arguments, for which the places serve as a means of inventing, are for example, corresponding to INDUCTION in logic or dialectics, and enthymeme, the counterpart of DEDUCTION. While manuals of logic have for centuries described enthymeme as a SYLLOGISM with some unexpressed member, for Aristotle it is what is in the mind (Gr. ἐνθυμητισθαί, to keep in mind) of the judge or the audience, and for Cicero, what is in his forensic opponent's mind, that dictates what the argument should be.

Treatises on rhetoric, however much they may emphasize the invention of argument, do not neglect the further elements on whose proper synthesis effective rhetorical practice depends. Collocation or arrangement of introduction (exordium), division of the issue (partitio), the argument (confirmatio), the refutation of the opponent's argument and peroration need to be looked after. Elocution or the choice of effective language and memorization require attention. Above all, in the view of the greatest orator of antiquity, Demosthenes, the speech needs delivery (actio).

The dependence of rhetoric for its persuasive effect is traditionally not confined to the words or the thought or to the combining of the two. Rhetoric relies on the confluence of these with the character of the orator and the emotions (motus animi) of his audience. The chief rhetorical fallacy would be ineffectiveness. On the other hand, the union in mutual appropriateness of so many elements—thoughts, words, actions and men—in rhetorical practice at its greatest has sometimes suggested itself as a moral ideal. For Quintilian, moral education would be moral training; and in Cicero's dictum, the good life would be like a good speech.

Recent Interest. Contemporary attention to rhetoric has largely concentrated on the history of the discipline (R. McKeon). Sometimes it is said that many of the matters included in the classical treatises on rhetoric have been absorbed by the subject matters of psychology and the social sciences. In recent decades, however, the question has been raised whether closer study and adaptation of the devices of rhetorical theory might not contribute to the considerations of problems in literary theory (K. Burke), poetics (J. Paulhan), linguistic theory (I. A. Richards) and ethics, politics and jurisprudence (C. Perelman).

See Also: ARGUMENTATION.

Bibliography: C. S. BALDWIN, Ancient Rhetoric and Poetic (New York 1924; reprint Gloucester, Mass. 1959). K. BURKE, A Rhetoric of Motives (New York 1950). I. A. RICHARDS, The Philosophy of Rhetoric (New York 1936). R. MCKEON, "Poetry and Philosophy in the Twelfth Century: The Renaissance of Rhetoric," Critics and Criticism: Ancient and Modern, ed. R. S. CRANE (Chicago 1952) 297–318; "Rhetoric in the Middle Ages," ibid. 260–296. P. A. DUHAMEL, "The Function of Rhetoric as Effective Expression," Journal of the History of Ideas, 10 (1949) 344–356. C. PERELMAN and L. OLBRECHTS-TYTECA, Rhétorique et philosophie: Pour une théorie de l'argumentation en philosophie (Paris 1952). J. PAULHAN, Les Fleurs de Tarbes: ou, La Terreur dans les lettres (Paris 1941).

[G. F. DRURY]

RHO, GIACOMO

Jesuit missionary, mathematician, and reformer of the Chinese calendar; b. Milan, Italy, Jan. 29, 1592; d. Beijing, China, April 27, 1638. Rho entered the Society of Jesus Aug. 24, 1604, and was ordained by Cardinal Robert Bellarmine at Rome. He taught mathematics at Milan until his departure for the Far East in 1620 with 44 companions. His arrival at Macau coincided with an attack on the city by the Dutch, who were driven off by artillery directed by Rho. In 1624 he entered China and soon gained a firm command of the language. His religious writings in Chinese embraced such topics as fasting, the corporal works of mercy, and prayer. In 1631 his knowledge of mathematics led to his being appointed to the Imperial Bureau of Astronomy in Beijing where he labored with Father Johann Adam SCHALL VON BELL on the calendar reform until his death. Rho's contribution to this vast project was some 17 tracts on astronomical subjects. His work was in the tradition of Father Matteo RICCI, who hoped to convert the Chinese to Christianity by the means of science.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus (Brussels–Paris 1890–1932) 6:1709–18; 9:803–804. L. PFISTER, Notices biographiques et bibliographiques sur les Jésuites de l'ancienne mission de Chine 1552–1773 (Shanghai 1932–34) 1:188–191.

[J. V. MENTAG]

RHODE ISLAND, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Rhode Island is the smallest state in the United States (1,212 square miles) and the eighth smallest in population (1,048,319). It is the most Catholic of states, however, with 635,590 Catholics making up 61 percent of its population. Founded by Roger WILLIAMS (1603–83) as an enclave of religious tolerance, and confirmed as such by the royal charter of 1663, Rhode Island became a haven for every sort of religious dissenter, even a few Catholics. However, by a statute of the General Assembly in 1719, not removed until 1783, Catholics were excluded from full citizenship. The first public Mass said in Rhode Island was at Newport in 1780 for the funeral of the commander of the French fleet sent to help the colonists in the War of Independence.

Rhode Island was first under the jurisdiction of Bishop CARROLL of Baltimore and then under the bishops of Boston, first Jean CHEVERUS (1808–23) and then Benedict FENWICK (1825–44). In 1844 the Vermont-born convert, William Barber Tyler, was created the first bishop of Hartford (which included all of Connecticut and Rhode Island) with his cathedral and residence at Rhode Island's capital of Providence. With Tyler's death in 1849, Irish-born Bernard O'REILLY became the second bishop, but his ship was lost at sea on a return trip from Europe in 1856. Francis P. MCFARLAND, a native-born son of Irish immigrants, became the third bishop of Hartford in 1858. When in 1872 the diocese of Providence was created, it included all of Rhode Island and, until 1904, southeastern Massachusetts. Thomas F. Hendrickson (1827–86), a zealous Irish-born priest who once dreamed of being a missionary in the Far East, was its first bishop.

Until the 1820s Catholics were few and far between, with priests making periodic trips to the scattered Catholic population. The first permanent church in Rhode Island, now St. Mary's, was founded in Newport in 1828; the second, also St. Mary's, was erected in 1829 in Pawtucket; and in 1837 the parish of SS. Peter and Paul, which would become the cathedral, was established in Providence. The growth of the Church was primarily due to the transformation of the state from a mercantile and agrarian economy to one based primarily on manufacturing in metals and textiles, and the need for cheap labor to maintain it. The factories and mills of Providence and the Blackstone and Pawtuxet valleys in the northern half of the state drew mostly Catholic immigrants in great numbers, with the Irish being the first and largest group.

The influx of the Irish, which would become a flood in the late 1840s, led to a transformation of the state's population so that the Irish made up nearly three out of every eight people by 1865. This led to the growth of anti-immigrant and anti-Catholic feeling. The constitution of 1843, by retaining property requirements for voting by naturalized foreign-born citizens while removing them for the native-born, was designed to disfranchise Irish Catholics. In the 1855 elections the nativist Know-Nothings swept the state, winning five of every seven votes. Their anti-Catholicism seems to have been based primarily on religious and cultural issues, lacking the economic aspect that was so important, for example, in Massachusetts. The Know-Nothings (see KNOW-

Providence College, Providence, Rhode Island. (©Bob Rowan; Progressive Image/CORBIS)

NOTHINGISM) were soon eclipsed by the newly born Republican party which, while eschewing the Know-Nothings' anti-Catholic sentiments, absorbed most of their supporters. While the old English stock became the pillar of the Republican party, the Irish became wedded to the Democratic party. In 1888, with the Bourn Amendment, the property qualification was removed. By then the Republicans saw the virtue of using newer immigrants, particularly the French Canadians, as a counter to the Democratic Irish. While the first Catholic governor was the Irish Democrat, James H. Higgins (1906), the second was the French Canadian Republican Aram J. Pothier (1908). While the sectarian violence that was seen in other places never occurred in Rhode Island, the divisions were deep and long-lasting, and anti-Catholic bigotry continued well into the next century.

The demands of the Civil War led to an expansion of mills and factories and the need of workers to fill them. This was the beginning of the next great immigration, the French Canadians: between 1860 and 1910 over 35,000 came to Rhode Island. The city of Woonsocket became the "Quebec of New England." They were like the Irish both in the firmness of their Catholicism and their nationalism, and in their fusion of the two, creating their own national parishes, schools and organizations to preserve their language and culture. However, they did not get along well with the Irish, who considered them a threat to their jobs, or with the Irish-dominated Church, which pushed for much greater centralization and Americanization.

Other major Catholic immigrant groups followed: from the late 1880s, the Italians, and from 1900, Poles and Lithuanians. The Portuguese long had a presence in the state, especially from the whaling days, but in the 1870s, and particularly after 1890, they came in great numbers. The Portuguese were divided by their place of origin: the Azores, Cape Verdes, and mainland Portugal. Syrians (Melkite and Maronite) and Ruthenians also immigrated to the state, though in much smaller numbers. National parishes were created for all these groups. The enactment of the national origins quota system (1924) and the decline of the mills (from 1923) led to a great decline in immigration. In more recent years, however, there has been some Catholic immigration, though not to the high degree of the earlier groups, from the Portuguese islands, Hispanics from Latin America, and to a lesser extent refugees from Southeast Asia. Except for the Portuguese from Cape Verdes, for whom a national parish was created in 1979, these groups have been cared for within already existing parishes.

In its early years Rhode Island was missionary country and depended on the financial support of foreign missionary societies and from priests from Ireland. By the late 1860s the Church was able to maintain itself, to start building churches and schools on their own, and to find vocations among themselves. This was less true for the newer immigrant groups, and finding priests for them was often difficult and a source of friction. Even if priests could be found who spoke their language, national pride or cultural differences could get in the way. While Catholics were at the bottom of the social ladder, and the overwhelming majority of Catholics were laborers whose jobs depended on the vagaries of the business cycle, some had prospered and had become professionals and businessmen themselves. The growing wealth and security of the Church was manifested by Bishop Hendricken's beginning the construction of a magnificent new cathedral in 1878. While only consecrated in 1889, its first Mass was for Hendricken's funeral in 1886. Another manifestation of stability was Hendricken's founding of the Weekly Visitor in 1875, which would eventually become the diocesan newspaper under the name the Providence Visitor—and which has become the state's second largest newspaper with a circulation of 40,000.

The death of Hendricken led to the appointment of Matthew Harkins (1845–1921), whom Archbishop John Ireland once called “my ideal type of bishop.” He was a learned and able Boston priest, under whose tenure the diocese experienced phenomenal growth. On his arrival there were 39 parishes and 63 diocesan priests in Rhode Island, and when he gave up the administration of the diocese in 1919 to his coadjutor, Bishop William A. Hickey (1869–1933), there were an additional 62 parishes (a majority of them national parishes) and 207 diocesan priests, all but one of whom were ordained during his episcopacy. He also created an extensive system of charitable institutions. To better serve the non-English speaking faithful he brought in the Scalabrini Fathers, the Marist Fathers, the Holy Ghost Fathers, and the Missionaries of the Sacred Heart. The Brothers of the Sacred Heart and 20 different congregations of women religious entered the state, joining the Sisters of Mercy, the Society of the Sacred Heart, the Ursulines, the Religious of Jesus and Mary, and the Christian Brothers in the work of education. Following the decrees of the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore (1884) which mandated parochial schools, Harkins created a Diocesan School Board and pushed for the construction of schools wherever feasible. By 1921 there were 41 parish schools, three academies for young men and five for young ladies. As the capstone of this educational system Harkins wished to create a Catholic college. The Jesuits had taken on a parish in Providence (1876) in the hope that they would eventually open a college, but when they left the state in 1899, Harkins had to look elsewhere. Eventually the Dominican friars agreed to staff such a college, and in 1919 Providence College opened with 71 students. It has become a flourishing co-educational school, still run by the Dominicans, of some 3,600 students on a 105-acre campus in the city of Providence. Harkins also cared for the educational quality of his priests. He raised the standards for accepting young men as seminarians and sent many of his young priests for further studies to universities in Europe and America. He was an early supporter of The Catholic University of America, in Washington, D.C., and became a trustee in 1903.

Among the other orders that entered the diocese at this time were also the Trappists (1900) and the Benedictines (1919). The Trappists moved from Nova Scotia to Lonsdale on land donated by Harkins but moved to Spencer, Massachusetts, after their monastery burned down in 1949. The Benedictines of Portsmouth Priory (raised to an abbey in 1969) have remained and direct a flourishing, coeducational, preparatory school, first opened in 1926. Harkins had studied with the English Benedictines for a year in the English College at Douai, France, before going to train with the Sulpicians in Paris. When Father Leonard Sargent, a convert priest on his way to join an English abbey, broached the subject of founding a Benedictine house in the state, Harkins was enthusiastic, and when Sargent returned, Harkins not only gave him permission to set up a house at Portsmouth but also supplied $5,000 to make the foundation possible.

At Harkins's death, his coadjutor, Hickey, immediately became the ordinary, and while some 16 parishes were created during his tenure, he gave greater emphasis to the consolidation and improvement of already existing institutions. He was extremely active, however, in the area of education, creating 14 parish schools, and expanded the size of already existing schools. He also reorganized the establishing and funding of the high schools. He was an aggressive fundraiser, raising a million dollars for his high school fund and vast sums for diocesan charitable institutions in his centralized annual Catholic Charty Fund Appeal. With the beginning of the Great Depression, Hickey speeded up church construction work so as to provide jobs, and in order to relieve immediate needs for food and clothing he directed that branches of the St. Vincent de Paul Society be established in every parish.

It was Hickey's centralization of Catholic high schools and their funding that led to a rebellion of the ultranationalists among the French Canadians, led by Elphege Daignault of Woonsocket, who saw it as a threat to their separate existence, customs, and way of life. In 1924 they began a French-language newspaper, La Sentinelle, to promote their views and be "on the watch" against assimilationist trends. In 1925 they appealed to Rome against Hickey's "illegal assessment" of parish funds. When their petition was denied, they appealed in 1927 to the civil courts (unsuccessfully) and began a boycott of all contributions to the Church. All those who had appealed to the civil courts were excommunicated by Hickey in April 1928, and La Sentinelle was put on the Index. The controversy gained national attention and led to much bitterness and division in the French Canadian community. By February, 1929, virtually all of those excommunicated, including Daignault, had capitulated and the conflict was over.

The 1930s were a turning point for Rhode Island Catholics, for it marked their ascent to political power. From the 1850s till the 1930s the state had been dominated by a Yankee Republican oligarchy supported by wealthy businessmen and rural voters. From the 1920s, a disenchantment among French Canadians and Italians began toward the Republicans. This was partly due to the negative Republican reaction to the major strikes that punctuated this period. It was also due to the revival of nativism. This nativism was seen in the rise of the avowedly anti-Catholic KU KLUX KLAN (even in Rhode Island), in the immigration restriction laws of 1922 and 1924, and in the Peck Act passed by the Republican General Assembly in 1922, which prohibited school instruction for the basic subjects in languages other than English. The Peck Act was never enforced and it was repealed in 1925, but it intensified the distaste for the Republicans. The presidential election of 1928 was the political "coming of age" for Catholics in the state. The Catholic Al Smith was only the second Democrat to have carried the state since the founding of the Republican party. But the voting showed a polarized electorate, with Smith doing very badly in the Yankee areas and extremely well in the Catholic ethnic ones. Also, there was a substantially larger turnout in the Catholic ethnic districts. In 1928 the restrictive qualifications for voting in city council elections were also removed. While the Great Depression and New Deal continued the political transformation of the state, it was not until the "Bloodless Revolution" of 1935, when the Democratic administration forced through the General Assembly a massive reorganization of the state government, that the structures that kept the Yankee minority in power were removed and the triumph of the Catholic ethnics was made complete.

Francis P. Keough (1890–1961), a priest of Hartford, was made bishop at Hickey's death in 1933 and remained until he was made archbishop of Baltimore in 1947. When he arrived there were 328,528 Catholics, 270 diocesan priests and 95 religious priests, and when he left there were 427,364 Catholics, 344 diocesan priests and 145 religious priests. In his time 15 new parishes, four high schools, and 14 elementary schools were founded. In 1939 he founded a minor seminary in Warwick Neck, and in 1947 the Sisters of Mercy founded Salve Regina College in Newport which is now a successful coeducational school of some 1,800 students.

Russell J. McVinney (1898–1971) was named the fifth bishop of Providence in 1948—the first Rhode Island native to hold that position. The first part of his tenure witnessed a period of remarkable growth, with the construction of 28 parishes and 40 schools, especially in the suburbs and the growing rural areas of the state. The school system reached its peak at this time with 106 out of 154 parishes having a parish school. The expansion in education, however, led to the need for lay teachers and tuition payments for the first time. He opened a new hospital, Our Lady of Fatima, in 1954, a diocesan retreat house at Narragansett in 1952, and a youth retreat center at Peace Dale in 1954. He also expanded the seminary and he founded a diocesan congregation of Sisters, Sisters of Our Lady of Providence (1955), and a society of diocesan brothers, Brothers of Our Lady of Providence (1959).

The final decade of his tenure was as tumultuous and painful as the first part was stable and prosperous. It coincided with the profound social changes of the 1960s and early 1970s as well as the Civil Rights Revolution, the Vietnam War and its protests, and the changes occasioned by the Second Vatican Council. Even before this, with the decline of ethnic enclaves and the movement to the suburbs, Catholics had become far more assimilated to American middle-class life and its mores. Bishop McVinney, while he was essentially politically and religiously conservative, took a leading role in the movement for political and economic rights of minorities and the poor, and was a strong advocate of the Fair Housing laws passed by the General Assembly in 1965. He also dutifully implemented the changes following the Council, always attempting to be faithful to a proper understanding of the Council and the postconciliar directives. In this period there began a profound decline in religious and priestly vocations, with many religious leaving their orders (the Sisters of Our Lady of Providence were dissolved at this time) and even many priests leaving the active ministry. Among those leaving was McVinney's auxiliary since 1964, Bishop Bernard M. Kelly, who resigned on June 14, 1971. Two months later McVinney died, and in December, 1971, Louis E. Gelineau (b. 1928), the vicar general of the Diocese of Burlington, Vermont, was appointed bishop.

Bishop Gelineau reorganized the administrative structures of the diocese so as to emphasize the pastoral dimension of his office, to increase participation of the clergy and people in its running, and to develop strategic planning. The decline in Mass attendance and in priestly and religious vocations continued, as did resignations from the priesthood and religious life. With the decline in numbers of teaching religious, more lay faculty had to be hired and schools became much more expensive. From 1968 schools started to close: some 65 elementary schools and 12 high schools either closed or merged with other schools. Enrollments continued to decline until 1980 when the first increase appeared since 1963. The seminary also experienced declining enrollment: in 1989 the high school seminary closed, and in 1975 the college seminary began sending its students to Providence College, the college seminary itself moving to Providence in 1983. While a few new parishes were established, changing demographics also led to the merging of some: in the late 1990s a number of parishes were merged in Warwick, Central Falls, and Woonsocket. In 1995 Bishop Robert E. Mulvey (b. 1930), bishop of Wilmington, Delaware, was appointed coadjutor, and in 1997, with the retirement of Bishop Gelineau, he became the seventh bishop of Providence.

The statistics for 2000 show that the state had 157 parishes, 307 diocesan priests (of which 202 are active in the diocese), 133 religious priests, 96 permanent deacons, 688 sisters, 133 brothers, 12 Catholic high schools, and 46 Catholic elementary schools.

Bibliography: P. T. CONLEY and M. J. SMITH, Catholicism in Rhode Island: The Formative Era (Providence 1976). R. W. HAYMAN, Catholicism in Rhode Island and the Diocese of Providence: 1780–1886 (Providence 1982); Catholicism in Rhode Island and the Diocese of Providence: 1886–1921 (Providence 1995).

[P. SCOTTI]

RHODES, ALEXANDRE DE

Jesuit missionary to Indochina, b. Avignon, March 15, 1593; d. Nov. 5, 1660. Shortly after his ordination in 1618, de Rhodes was granted by Superior General Mutio Vitelleschi the permission to go to the mission in Japan. De Rhodes's dream of being a missionary in Japan was not to be realized. Because of persecutions in Japan, de Rhodes's superiors thought it wise not to send him there. Instead, they dispatched him to Cochinchina.

With regard to the political situation of VIETNAM in the 17th century, although there was a king of the Lê dynasty, he was in fact nothing more than a puppet, and real power lay in the hands of two clans; the north, known to the West as Tonkin, was under the Trinh clan, and the center, known then as Cochinchina, under the Nguyen clan. Continuous warfare was conducted between the two rival clans for total control of the country with no definitive results. De Rhodes's entire ministry in Vietnam was carried out during this struggle for power between Tonkin and Cochinchina.

De Rhodes's First Mission in Cochinchina (1624–1626). There were three Jesuit residences in Cochinchina when de Rhodes arrived in the country—Hoi An, Thanh Chiem, and Nuoc Man (Qui Nhon). He was assigned to that of Thanh Chiem to study the language under the guidance of Francisco de Pina. Meanwhile Andrea Palmiero, the Jesuit visitor, was planning to send missionaries to Tonkin. In July 1626, de Rhodes and Père Marques were recalled to MACAU to prepare for their mission in Tonkin.

De Rhodes's Mission in Tonkin (1627–1630). On March 1627, the two missionaries embarked a Portuguese merchant ship for Tonkin and arrived at Cua Bang (today Ba Lang) on March 19, 1627. Shortly afterwards, they met Lord Trinh Trang, who was on his way to wage war against Cochinchina. When Lord Trinh Trang returned in defeat from his military expedition, the missionaries accompanied him to Thang Long (modern Hanoi), the capital, and there began their mission in earnest. The great number of conversions aroused the opposition of eunuchs, Buddhist monks, and the concubines dismissed by their husbands who decided to become Christian. One of the monks accused the missionaries of joining in a plot against Lord Trinh Trang. As a result, on May 28, 1628, Lord Trinh Trang issued a decree forbidding his subjects, under pain of death, to meet with the missionaries and to embrace the religion they preached.

However, the lord tolerated the presence of de Rhodes and Marques in the hope that they would attract Portuguese traders. When the Portuguese ships had not come during the sailing season, the lord expelled the missionaries. In March 1629, they left for the south with the plan to return to Macau. However, in November, when two Jesuits, Gaspar do Amaral and Paul Saito, arrived, de Rhodes and Marques returned to the capital in their company. At first, Lord Trinh Trang tolerated their presence, but after six months, when the Portuguese ship returned to Macau, he ordered them to embark the ship and leave the country.

In May 1630, de Rhodes left Tonkin, never to return. He had worked there for more than three years. By numerical standards alone, his mission had been a huge success: when he left, there were 5,602 Christians. Banished from Tonkin, de Rhodes returned to Macau and stayed there for ten years during which he taught theology at the Madre de Deus College and looked after Chinese Christians. However, in 1639, events in Cochinchina once again made de Rhodes's missionary experience highly desirable. There were then some 15,000 Christians and 20 churches in central Vietnam. In 1639, the lord of Cochinchina, Nguyen Phuoc Lan, who suspected that the missionaries had assisted his brother's rebellion against him, ordered the seven Jesuits to leave the country.

De Rhodes's Second Mission to Cochinchina (1640–1645). Eager to continue the mission in Cochinchina, the new visitor Antonio Rubino canvassed for someone to send there. De Rhodes volunteered and was accepted. De Rhodes's second mission to Cochinchina was divided into four trips and lasted a total of 50 months from 1640 to 1645. As a whole, it was far more difficult and eventful than his mission in Tonkin. Four times he was exiled from the country. During that time, he baptized some 3,400 people, not counting the baptisms administered by his catechists. Compared with his mission in Tonkin which produced 5,602 conversions, de Rhodes's second mission in Cochinchina produced significantly fewer, though it was much longer and much more strenuous (50 versus 38 months). On July 3, 1645, sentenced to perpetual exile from Cochinchina, de Rhodes left Vietnam for Macau.

Return to Rome and the Establishment of the Hierarchy in Vietnam. De Rhodes's superiors in Macao decided that a man of his experience could render a vast service to the missions by going back to Europe to fetch spiritual and temporal help. In December 1645, de Rhodes began his return journey to Rome. Immediately after his arrival on June 27, 1649, he set out to realize his plan of having a hierarchy established in Vietnam. On Sept. 11, 1652, de Rhodes left for Paris where he found three priests of the Société des Bons Amis who were judged worthy candidates for the episcopacy, among whom was François PALLU. On learning that Rome was about to send French bishops to Vietnam, Portugal voiced fierce opposition. Meanwhile the Jesuit General, believing that de Rhodes's presence in the project of establishing a hierarchy in Vietnam would prevent it from being realized, decided to make him superior of the Jesuit mission in Persia. On Nov. 16, 1654, de Rhodes left Marseilles for his new mission where he died on Nov. 5, 1660.

Achievements. Though not the first to arrive in Vietnam, de Rhodes is often proclaimed the founder of Vietnamese Christianity. No doubt he deserves this accolade. First, he carried out a highly successful mission in both parts of Vietnam, Tonkin and Cochinchina. Secondly, besides two priceless memoirs on the Vietnamese society in the seventeenth century and on the beginnings of Vietnamese Christianity, he published the earliest Vietnamese books in Romanized script (quoc ngu)— the Dictionarium annamiticum, lusitanum, et latinum ope Sacrae Congregationis de Propaganda Fide in lucem editum ab Alexandro de Rhodes è Societate Jesu, ejusdemque Sacrae Congregationis Missionario Apostolico (Rome 1651), and the Catechismus pro iis, qui volunt suscipere Baptismum, in Octo dies divisus. Phep giang tam ngay cho ke muan chiu phep rua toi, ma beao dao thanh duc Chua Bloi. Ope sacrae Congregationis de Propaganda Fide in lucem editus. Ab Alexandro de Rhodes è Societate Jesu, ejusdemque Sacrae Congregationis Missionario Apostolico (Rome 1651). Thirdly, he successfully lobbied for the establishment of a hierarchy in Vietnam. Thanks to his persistent efforts, on Sept. 9, 1659, two bishops, Pallu and Pierre Lambert DE LA MOTTE, were appointed apostolic vicars of Tonkin and Cochinchina respectively.

Bibliography: Q.C. DO, La mission au Viet-Nam 1624–30 et 1640–45 d'Alexandre de Rhodes, S.J. avignonnais. (Diss., Sorbonne, 1969). P.C. PHAN, Mission and Catechesis: Alexandre de Rhodes and Inculturation in seventeenth-century Vietnam (Maryknoll 1998).

[P. C. PHAN]

RIARIO

Family of papal nipoti that originated in modest circumstances at Savona in Liguria and rose to prominence through the marriage of Paolo Riario to Bianca, sister of Francesco della Rovere, later Pope SIXTUS IV. Elected pope in 1471, Sixtus promoted the careers of his Riario and DELLA ROVERE nephews, partly through excessive family feeling, partly to strengthen his difficult political position at Rome.

Pietro, cardinal; b. 1445; d. Rome, Jan. 5, 1474. Son of the pope's sister, Pietro followed his uncle into the FRANCISCANS. He was made cardinal Dec. 16, 1471, aged only 25. He accumulated benefices (including bishoprics and abbacies) of great value and lived in lavish ostentation. While his patronage of artists and scholars offers a partial mitigation, his personal immorality was notorious.

Girolamo, brother of Pietro; b. 1443; d. Forlì, April 14, 1488. Girolamo remained a layman, but also profited from NEPOTISM. The first step was his marriage (1477; betrothal 1472) to Caterina, natural daughter of Galeazzo Maria SFORZA, Duke of Milan. Sforza created him Count of Bosco, and Sixtus conferred the lordship of Imola on him. After Pietro's death, Girolamo became the closest adviser of his uncle. He was a prime mover of the infamous PAZZI conspiracy against the MEDICI and the ensuing war. In 1480, taking advantage of a disputed succession among the Ordellaffi dynasty, he made himself lord of Forlì. He became deeply involved in the feuds of aristocratic factions at Rome, siding with the ORSINI against their enemies the COLONNA. After his uncle's death, his influence waned, but he survived as lord of Imola and Forlì until conspirators murdered him. His widow preserved the throne for their son Ottaviano until 1500 when Cesare BORGIA overthrew her and she fled to Bologna.

Raffaele, cardinal; b. 1461; d. Naples, July 9, 1521. Raffaele was the son of Valentina Riario (niece of Sixtus IV) and Antonio Sansoni, but bore the Riario name. The pope made him cardinal (Dec. 10, 1477) when he was only 17. He nearly perished in the popular reaction against the Pazzi conspirators at Florence in 1478, being there innocently at the time. He was a notorious pluralist, accumulating bishoprics and other high offices. Under Pope Alexander VI he avoided Rome, but the election of JULIUS II, his uncle, ended his period of disfavor. In 1517 he was implicated in Cardinal Alfonso Petrucci's conspiracy against Pope LEO X, but he was pardoned after paying a heavy indemnity.

Alessandro, cardinal; b. 1543; d. Rome, July 18, 1585. One of the Riario-Sforza of Bologna, Alessandro was notable for his piety and legal learning, becoming an uditore in the apostolic CAMERA and patriarch of Alexandria (1570). Pope GREGORY XIII created him cardinal in 1578, and in 1580 sent him as legate to Portugal in a vain attempt to prevent the annexation of that country by PHILIP II OF SPAIN.

Bibliography: L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London-St. Louis 1938–61) 4:231–255, 300–330, 348–388; 5–8 passim; 19:227, 359–361; 21 passim. K. A. FINK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 8: 1280–81. A. CAMPANA, Enciclopedia Italiana di scienze, lettere ed arti (Rome 1929–39) 29:200. G. B. PICCOLI, ibid. 200–201.

[C. G. NAUERT, JR.]

RIBADENEYRA, PEDRO DE

Historian, ascetical writer, and disciple of IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA; b. Toledo, Nov. 1, 1526; d. Madrid, Sept. 22, 1611. When in Rome as a page of Cardinal Alexander Farnese, he entered the Society of Jesus (Sept. 18, 1540). After studies at the University of Padua (1545–49), he taught at Palermo and at the Germanicum, Rome. Having been ordained in 1553, he was in the Netherlands from 1556 to 1560, where he consolidated the society and made a name as a preacher. He was in England in the winter of 1558–59. Between 1560 and 1572 he filled many important administrative offices in the society in Italy, but ill health compelled his return to Spain in 1573. From then until his death he was chiefly occupied in writing. Best known of his classic Castilian works are his life of St. Ignatius, a history of the schism in England, and the Flos Sanctorum (Lives of the Saints).

Bibliography: Obras escogidas del padre Pedro de Ribadeneira, ed. V. DE LA FUENTE (Madrid 1868). Historias de la contrarre-forma, ed. E. REY (Madrid 1945). Monumenta historica Societatis Jesu (Madrid 1894–; Rome 1932–), esp. Monumenta Ribadeneira. C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932; v. 12, suppl. 1960) 6:1724–58. J. M. PRAT, Histoire du Père Ribadeneira, discipline de saint Ignace (Paris 1862). A. ASTRAIN, Historia de la Compañía de Jesús, 7 v. (Madrid 1902–25). Enciclopedia de la Religión Católica, ed. R. D. FERRERES et al., 7 v. (Barcelona 1950–56) 6:730–732.

[F. COURTNEY]

RIBERA, FRANCISCO DE

Exegete and professor of Sacred Scripture; b. Villacastín near Segovia, Spain, 1537; d. Salamanca, Nov. 24, 1591. In 1570, when he was already a priest and doctor in theology, he entered the Society of Jesus. He dreamed of imitating St. Jerome's eremitic dedication to the sacred sciences, but his life as a Jesuit in Spain was spent in missionary activity and scholarship, including 16 years at Salamanca teaching Scripture. His renowned Biblical exegesis, prayerfulness, penance, and zeal for souls gained the attention of St. Teresa of Avila, and he became her confessor and first biographer.

His commentaries demonstrate wide patristic erudition and, for his century, pioneered in proposing the unique literal sense of a scriptural passage. They include principally: In librum XII prophetarum minorum commentarii sensum . . . historicum moralem et persaepe allegoricum complectentes (Salamanca 1587); In librum XII prophetarum commentarii selecti historici (Salamanca 1598); In epistolam ad Hebraeos commentarii (Salamanca 1598); and In evangelium secundum Iohannem commentarii (Lyons 1623). In addition, the University of Salamanca library possesses many manuscripts of his exegesis. His one biography, La vida de la madre Teresa de Jesús (Salamanca 1590), has often been reproduced.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932; v. 12, suppl.

1960) 6:1761–67. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 5 v. in 6 (3d ed. Innsbruck 1903–13) 3: 238–240. A. AS-TRAIN, Historia de la Compañía de Jesús en la Asistencia de España, 7 v. (Madrid 1902–25) 4:48–50. F. STEGMÜLLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1282.

[T. T. TAHENY]

RIBET, JÉRÔME

Mystical theologian and writer; b. Aspet, Haute-Garonne, France, Jan. 16, 1837; d. Algiers, May 29, 1909. After entering the seminary at Toulouse in 1859, he completed his studies at the College of Saint-Sulpice in Paris, where he entered the Sulpicians and was ordained in 1863. For 20 years he taught philosophy and then theology at Clermont, Lyons, Rodez, and Orléans. In 1885 he left the Sulpicians to act as secretary to the bishop of Châlons and then returned to his diocese, where he was curé at Saman for about ten years. He spent his last years in retirement and writing, residing at various places.

Ribet accepted without question, as did his contemporaries, the essential distinction between asceticism and mysticism and the particular vocation to mystical states. In his principal work, La mystique divine distinguée des contrefaçons diaboliques et des analogies humaines (3 v. Paris 1879–83), he treats mystical contemplation and its stages, mystical phenomena distinct from and external to contemplation, such as visions and revelations, and examines their causes. Although sometimes insufficiently critical, Ribet's discussion of the discernment of phenomena was an important contribution in his day. His other writings include L'ascétique chrétienne (Paris 1887).

Bibliography: E. LEVESQUE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 13.2:2659–60. P. POURRAT, Christian Spirituality, tr. W. H. MITCHELL et al., 4 v. (Westminster, Md. 1922–55) 4:506–507.

[J. C. WILLKE]

RICCARDI, PLACIDO, BL.

Benedictine priest; b. Trevi, Italy, June 24, 1844; d. Rome, March 14, 1915. He was baptized Tommaso. After studying philosophy at the Angelicum in Rome, he joined the Benedictines in Rome at the Abbey of SAINT PAUL-OUTSIDE-THE WALLS (1867) and took the name Placido. In 1870 he was arrested for not presenting himself for military service, and was sentenced by a military tribunal in Florence to a one-year imprisonment as a deserter. The following month he was released from prison and placed in the army. After a month's service he was declared incapable of military service and dismissed. Thereupon he returned to his abbey and was ordained (1871). After spending several years there in various positions, he became in 1884 vicar for his abbot at S. Magno d'Amelia, a convent of Benedictine sisters juridically dependent on St. Paul's. In 1885 he returned to Rome as master of novices. He went again to S. Magno in 1887 as spiritual director for the sisters, and became highly esteemed as confessor for the clergy of that area. In 1895 he became rector of the ancient basilica in Farfa. His zealous labors there as pastor for the local faithful and his care for the pilgrims to Farfa gained him the title of apostle of the Sabine region. Serious illness caused him to spend his last three years in Rome. He was beatified in 1954.

Feast: March 14.

Bibliography: P. GRANFIELD, "Blessed Placid Riccardi," American Benedictine Review 5 (1954) 299–305. I. SCHUSTER, Profilo Storico del beato Placido Riccardi (Milan 1954). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by the Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56); v. 13, suppl. and table générale (1959) 228–234.

[V. A. LAPOMARDA]

RICCI, LORENZO

Eighteenth general of the Jesuits at the time of the expulsion of the society from the Bourbon states and its suppression by Clement XIV (July 31, 1773); b. Florence, Aug. 2, 1703; d. Castel Sant' Angelo, Rome, Nov. 24, 1775. The Ricci family was among the oldest and most renowned in Florence. One of Lorenzo's brothers was canon of the cathedral and another served as chief magistrate of the Grand Duchy of Tuscany.

Early Life. Lorenzo attended Cicognini College, conducted by the Jesuits at Prato near Florence, and entered the novitiate of Sant' Andrea in Rome (1718). His extreme youth proved no disadvantage to his pursuit of learning or his practice of religious discipline, and after distinguishing himself in philosophy as well as the humanities, he was assigned to teach rhetoric and philosophy at the Jesuit College in Siena. After resuming his studies in Rome in 1731, he was selected for a public defense of the entire field of theology, an assignment in which he acquitted himself brilliantly.

After his ordination and his completion of formal studies, Ricci was appointed to the theological faculty of the Roman College, and there he pronounced the four vows of solemn profession Aug. 15, 1736. He continued teaching theology until 1751, when he was appointed spiritual director of the Roman College; he served in that capacity until 1755. In that year he became secretary to the newly elected general, Aloysius Centurione, and after the latter's death (Oct. 7, 1757), while Marquis Sebastião POMBAL was preparing the first devastating attack on the society from Lisbon, Father Ricci was chosen general on May 25, 1758, by the 19th General Congregation. Announcement of the choice was received with mixed reactions. One group of those conspiring to destroy the Jesuits is reported to have exulted, "Ricci, Ricci, now we have them!" Many members of the order and apprehensive friends thought that someone more active in public affairs and more alert to the Bourbon menace should have been chosen. Whatever the merit of these opinions, the selection of a general was to prove notably less significant than the choice of the next two popes.

Ricci and the Papacy. CLEMENT XIII became pope just six weeks after Ricci's election, and during the 11 years of his pontificate the two worked unremittingly to protect the Church and the society from their common enemies. Clement XIII, besides issuing the brief "Apostolicum Pascendi," vigorously defending the order and adding an impressive endorsement to those of his predecessors, directed to rulers and ministers 150 letters that carried additional support and served notice to Voltairian agitators and the Bourbon states that he would not be forced into suppressing the order. The pope counseled Ricci to be "silent, patient, and prayerful," evidently judging that reticence and meekness would best counteract the fierce hostility that bold missionary ventures, zealous aggressiveness, and daring rebukes of dissolute kings had occasioned. Ricci not only observed the pope's admonitions as faithfully as his responsibilities would permit, but made silence, patience, and prayer the prevailing theme of his letters to his fellow Jesuits. Annoying instances of interception of, or tampering with, his mail and the use of clumsy forgeries by enemies discouraged his use of the normal channels of communication. Despite these difficulties, he managed to deliver some stern remonstrances to those intent on destroying the order, and to refute each new or reedited diatribe as it appeared. The famous response "Sint ut sum ant non sint" (Let them continue as they are or cease to be), which peremptorily rejected the French proposal that an autonomous aggregation of Jesuits be formed for France, although mistakenly credited at times to Ricci rather than to Clement XIII, expresses a tenacity of purpose that was a notable attribute of both men.

Even when his subjects had been driven from Portugal, from France, and finally from Spain and Naples by the Bourbon conspiracy, Ricci cherished the hope that the order would continue to flourish elsewhere, even if this were to require preternatural intervention. The assistant for Italy, Father Timoni, an indomitable optimist, did much to sustain a hope that was destined to be verified only by the remnant of the order that survived in White Russia, where CATHERINE II refused to promulgate the brief of suppression.

Clement XIII died on Feb. 2, 1769, as the result of the shock caused by a vicious threat of removal from the papacy, seizure of the Papal States, and schism if he delayed the suppression any longer.

Suppression by Clement XIV. Disquieting rumors that the factional tensions in the electoral conclave centered on the fate of the Jesuits severely tested Ricci's hopes, and the memory that he had personally sponsored Fra Giovanni Ganganelli for the cardinalate ten years before did not carry any reassurance when it was announced that he was to be consecrated as CLEMENT XIV. The demands that had hastened the death of Clement XIII then assailed the more pliant Clement XIV, and to appease the clamorous Bourbon governments, he became harsh toward those Jesuits exiled in, or seeking sanctuary in, the Papal States. His publication of statements about the necessity of maintaining Church-State amity even at the cost of certain "sacrifices" was obviously designed to serve as a prelude to the suppression ordered by the brief "Dominus ac Redemptor," which was presented to Ricci on Aug. 16, 1773.

Father Ricci and his assistants were arrested and held for a day at the Roman College before their removal to CASTEL SANT' ANGELO on Sept. 23, 1773. There Ricci was to spend the two remaining years of his life under such close confinement that word of the death of his secretary, imprisoned nearby, did not reach him for six months. The tedious hearings to which he was subjected to satisfy the vindictiveness of the Bourbon courts not only exonerated him but thoroughly discredited the canards about buried treasure and dark conspiracies that had been fabricated to justify the suppression. Despite Ricci's advanced age and broken health, which made his narrow confinement and the boarding-up of his cell window superfluous precautions, Clement XIV refused any relaxation of custodial vigilance, explaining that it was maintained for "reasons of safety."

PIUS VI, who succeeded Clement after a conclave that again centered on the attitudes of candidates toward the Jesuits, had several years earlier detected and exposed one of the forged letters originating in Spain but purporting to have come from Ricci in Rome. Pius VI was considering a plea for the release of Ricci when death freed the prisoner. The pope arranged an elaborate funeral in S. Giovanni de' Fiorentini, where the body lay in state until the funeral Mass and burial in the church of the Gesù in the vault reserved for generals of the order.

Bibliography: G. C. CORDARA, De suis ac suorum rebus . . . usque ad occasum S. I. commentarii, ed. G. ALBERTOTTI (Turin 1933). J. CRÉTINEAU-JOLY, Clément XIV et les Jésuites (Paris 1847). B. DUHR, Geschichte der Jesuiten in den Ländern deutscher Zunge, 4 v. in 5 (St. Louis 1907–28); “Lorenzo Ricci,” Stimmen der Zeit 114 (1928) 81–92. C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., eds., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 6:1785–92. L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London-St. Louis 1938–61) v.36, 37, 38. L. KOCH, Jesuiten-Lexikon: Die Gesellschaft Jesu einst und jetzt (Loovain-Heverlee 1962) 1535–39.

[R. F. COPELAND]

RICCI, MATTEO

Italian Jesuit, eminent missionary scientist, founder of the modern Chinese Church, and pioneer of cultural relations between Europe and China; b. Macerata, March of Ancona, Oct. 6, 1552; d. Beijing, China, May 11, 1610. When 16 he was sent to Rome for higher studies, but instead of embracing the legal profession as intended by his father, he entered Sant' Andrea novitiate on Aug. 15, 1571, and a year later began university courses at the Roman College, where his professor of mathematics was the celebrated Christopher CLAVIUS. Having had his mind long set on the order's expanding Asian missions, he set out for Portugal on May 18, 1577, and the following spring sailed from Lisbon with the annual fleet to the East Indies, reaching Goa on Sept. 13, 1578. There he applied himself to theology until the early months of 1582 and was ordained at midpoint of his studies (at Cochin on July 25, 1580).

Conquest through Learning. By this time there was in process a radical change in mission policy respecting the Middle Kingdom, hermetically sealed off to outsiders beyond a periodic mercantile fair at Canton. Alessandro VALIGNANO, the Jesuit visitor in the Far East, had matured a bold, farsighted plan to break through China's isolationism by engaging the Chinese intelligentsia on its own level of language, social customs, and superior talent. To prepare himself for this master enterprise, Ricci's fellow Jesuit in Rome and Goa, Pompilio (Michele) Ruggieri, was summoned to Macao in 1579. After intensive language study, he conducted several exploratory conversations in nearby Guangdong Sheng cities. No sooner had Ricci completed his theology than he too was ordered to Macao to help Ruggieri. He reached the Portuguese colonial outpost on Aug. 7, 1582, and the following year, on September 10—a date thereafter memorable in China mission annals—the two pioneer missionaries settled at Chaoking (Chao-ch'ing), seat of the friendly Tsung-tu or viceroy of the two provinces of Guangdong Sheng and Guangxi, who had in fact welcomed them there. It was at the prefect's insistence that, to lessen suspicions of their intent, the foreign immigrants adopted the garb of Buddhist monks. Two years later, in May 1585, they dedicated a small church and residence.

Matteo Ricci. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Honored Scientist. “Blue-eyed and with a voice melodious like a bell,” as a Chinese gazette of the day described him, Ricci instantly made his reputation as a scientist of astonishing versatility. Demonstration of such novelties as Venetian prisms, European books, paintings and engravings, sundials, clocks, and projection of maps attracted a steady stream of the educated. Further, designed and displayed there for the first time, his remarkable World Map, “Great Map of Ten Thousand Countries,” perfected by later retouches, effected a revolution in traditional Chinese cosmography by delineating China's proper area relative to global dimensions. It was the first of a series of what became Ricci's major contribution to China, namely, the composition of works in Chinese on various subjects—mathematics, apologetics, literature, catethetics—comprising altogether more than 20 during his years of fruitful activity. Of his many works, the treatise T'ien-chu shih-i (The True Meaning of the Lord of Heaven) stands out as his magnum opus and a lasting contribution to Confucian-Christian dialogue.

Thus was set the pattern of evangelization that Ricci would unflinchingly pursue to the end. His vision was to win the intellectual masters of Confucian society, using the ascendancy of learning as a magnet. To critics at home who clung to old-fashioned concepts of mission objectives, Ricci wrote that the scientific apostolate he and his associates had initiated in China was worth far more than making thousands of piecemeal converts, for it was the means that would eventually lead to the “universal conversion of the whole kingdom en bloc”—mighty China as a Christian unit. His role in the reciprocal transmission of European-Chinese cultures, praised by all students of history, must be viewed in this spiritual perspective.

Western Mandarin. Ousted from Zhaoqing through a replacement of viceroys, the two fathers settled at Shaochow, farther north in Guangdong Sheng (Aug. 26, 1589). There Ricci made his most significant move to that date. Discarding Buddhist attire, which had proved a hindrance in his dealings with Confucian students, he moved directly into the social stratum of the professional literati. From then on he was “Doctor from the Great West Ocean,” wearing the ceremonial square bonnet and the silk robes of the Confucian scholar. Ricci could accordingly lecture authoritatively to his numerous clientele from a position of equality and receive for himself and the Christian culture he represented the amenities of the mandarin bureaucracy. The timing of this move was providential. Valignano, the ever-vigilant strategist, had all along been urging his protégé to strike out to the chief administrative and scholastic centers of the country, the southern capital of Nanjing, and after that, imperial Beijing itself, the residence of the Ming court. Greater responsibility, as well as freedom of action, was accorded Ricci by his appointment on Aug. 4, 1597, as superior and director of Jesuit personnel and works in China, which thus were freed from links with Macau that had become undesirable. At last, with considerable personal fame, influential contacts, and a singular mastery of Chinese thought and action, Ricci felt himself equipped for the high adventure Valignano wanted him to undertake. His determined march northward to the seat of empire and the decade of impressive service he there rendered Church and adopted country under the shadow of the appreciative Wan-li sovereign constitute China mission history's most dramatic chapter.

Entrance to Imperial Beijing. There were two milestones in Ricci's progress. Starting out from Nanchang, metropolis of Jiangxi, where three years earlier he had founded a permanent midway post, Ricci reached the walls of Beijing for the first time on Sept. 7, 1598, but, his entrance blocked by intriguing officials, he was forced back to Nanjing, his new headquarters; then, two years later, accompanied by the youthful Spaniard Diego Pantoja, he was again at the gates seeking admission. Spectacularly, and armed with an imperial summons, the two pilgrims from the West Ocean rode into the capital on Jan. 24, 1601, presented their gifts to the throne, were granted right of residence, and were allotted a subsidy for their avowed exploration of mathematics and astronomy. Helped by these natural aids, they would bring the Gospel to the highest non-Christian civilization in that age.

Last Years. Once securely established in Beijing and hard at his academic work, Ricci had only a brief span of life left to pursue his transcendent objective of a China turned Christian vertically, from the top down. Despite his mounting prestige at court, the noble friendships he formed, and the undeniable authority he commanded in the circles of the learned, these terminal years were burdened with toil and tensions that undermined his constitution and, as he himself confessed, made him old and white-haired before his time. Forewarned by this condition, he reflected on how best to secure permanency for the project on which he had so long concentrated his moral and intellectual energies. Shortly before the fatal decline of 1610, he confided to the fathers that he felt that his death at the height of his career would be the greatest benefit he could render the fledgling China Church. He meant, it seems, that he envisioned his tomb standing forever visible to the Chinese people he loved. It was a prophetic sentiment. His grave outside the city walls was the gift of the Emperor, the Son of Heaven, and was honored with imperial consecration. Known throughout the realm as Li Mat'ou, this missionary scholar from the West became and has remained one of the most respected foreign figures in Chinese history.

Western students of Chinese science and civilization acknowledge in Matteo Ricci a rare combination of endowments: Renaissance humanism brought to its finest and illumined by unusual qualities of mind and heart, a rich Italian temperament in which the disciples of Confucius admired their own ideal of suavity and tact, profound appreciation of Chinese cultural and moral values and the possibility of their integration with the European heritage under the aegis of Catholic philosophy, and an exemplary priestly and apostolic commitment that inspired unbounded zeal. This combination was the key to his life's splendid vocation and ranks him as “one of the most remarkable and brilliant men in history” [J. Needham, Sci- ence and Civilization in China (2d ed. Cambridge 1961) 1:148].

See Also: CHINESE RITES CONTROVERSY.

Bibliography: For a Chinese-English critical edition of Matteo Ricci's T'ien-chu shih-i (True Meaning of the Lord of Heaven) see: The True Meaning of the Lord of Heaven, tr. D. LANCASHIRE and P. HU KUO-CHEN, ed. E. J. MALATESTA (St. Louis 1985). For other collections of his writings, see: Opere storiche . . ., ed. P. TACCHI-VENTURI, 2 v. (Macerata, Italy 1911–13), memoirs and extant correspondence; Fonti Ricciane, ed. with notes by the sinologist P. M. D'ELIA 3 v. (Rome 1942–49), lacks the correspondence; before these works the memoirs were known through the Latin, De christiana expeditione apud Sinas . . ., tr. N. TRIGAULT (Augsburg 1615) or later vernacular versions. Eng. from Trigault's Latin, China in the 16th Century, tr. For studies of his life and work, see: L. J. GALLAGHER (New York 1953). G. H. DUNNE, Generation of Giants (Notre Dame, Ind. 1962) E. DUCORNET, Matteo Ricci (Paris 1992). D. E. MUNGELLO, The Chinese Rites Controversy: Its History and Meaning (Nettetal 1994). J. D. SPENCE, The Memory Palace of Matteo Ricci (New York 1984). J. D. YOUNG, East-West Synthesis: Matteo Ricci and Confucianism (Hong Kong 1980).

[F. A. ROULEAU/EDS.]

RICCI, SCIPIONE DE'

Bishop of Pistoia; b. Florence, Italy, Jan. 9, 1741; d. Rignano, near Florence, Dec. 27, 1809. During his studies at the Roman College he became acquainted with persons of Jansenist tendencies. As a student later at the University of Pisa he came under the influences of the ENLIGHTENMENT, the GALLICANISM of the French APPELLANTS, and rigid AUGUSTINIANISM. After ordination (1766) he returned to FLORENCE and frequented the company of men interested in religious studies but opposed to the Roman Curia. As vicar-general of the Archdiocese of Florence (1775–80) he did not hide his sympathies, similar to those of Count Dupac de Bellegarde, a French abbot and an adherent of the schism of UTRECHT; of Giovanni Lami, a disciple of Freemasonry and the Enlightenment; and of Pietro Tamburini, professor of theology at Pavia; and other promoters of JANSENISM in Italy. Because of his friendship with Leopold I, Grand Duke of Tuscany, Ricci became bishop of Pistoia, then united with the See of Prato (1780). Heeding the advice of French appellants and the schismatic bishops of Utrecht, he introduced into his diocese radical changes in ecclesiastical discipline, studies, administration, and liturgy. He also caused writings of Italian and foreign Jansenists to be printed and widely diffused. He condensed in 57 propositions the ecclesiastical changes that found expression in the Synod of PISTOIA (1786). At the ensuing national assembly of the bishops of the Grand Duchy held in Florence (1787), Ricci sought to create a schismatic church, but the bishops disavowed the decrees of Pistoia. Popular reaction against these innovations caused Ricci to flee and then to resign his diocese (1791).

Scipione de' Ricci.

After Pius VI condemned the Synod of Pistoia in the apostolic constitution AUCTOREM FIDEI (1794), Ricci was evasive but finally submitted “purely and simply.” His submission to Pius VII in 1805 he considered “a grammatical sacrifice.” He was a friend of the French constitutional priests GREGOIRE, Mouton, and Clement; but this did not prevent his leading an irreproachable and pious private religious life. During his final years, spent in confinement in Rignano, he composed his memoirs, which testify to his ambivalent personality. Although he lacked a solid theological training and was somewhat mediocre culturally, he was animated by grandiose reform aspirations. His prestige was due to his episcopal dignity and to his friendship with Leopold, who desired social reforms and changes favorable to his absolutist aims. Ricci was influenced by Jansenism, Gallicanism, FEBRONIANISM, and JOSEPHISM. His outlook revealed also the anticlerical spirit of SARPI, the ardor of SAVONAROLA, and the zeal for reforming religion common in 18th-century Italy and found in men such as MURATORI and Lambertini (Benedict XIV). Aspirations for modernization, hagiographical and liturgical revisions, ecclesiastical and cultural reforms, and desires to purify even legitimate forms of piety found in Ricci a heretical and schismatic deviation and a lack of discipline that rendered precarious such innovations as translations of the Missal and prayers, new norms for a just distribution of ecclesiastical goods and honors, and changes in clerical education and in catechetical instruction.

Bibliography: Memorie di S. de' Ricci vescovo di Pistoia e Prato scritte da lui medesimo e pubblicate con documenti, ed. A. GELLI, 2 v. (Florence 1865). N. RODOLICO. Gli amici e i tempi di S. de' R. (Florence 1920). B. MATTEUCCI, S. de' R.: Saggio storico teologico sul giansenismo italiano (Brescia 1940), with full bibliog. I. CARREYRE, "Synode de Pistoie," Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951–) 12.2:2134–2230. L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes From the Close of the Middle Ages, 40 v. (London–St. Louis 1938–61): v.1, 6th ed.; v.2, 7th ed.; v.3–6, 5th ed.; v.7–8, 11–12, 3d ed.; v.9–10, 4th ed.; v.13–40, from 1st German ed. Geschichte der Päpste seit dem Ausgang des Mittelalters, 16 v. in 21. (Freiburg 1885–1933; repr. 1955–) v. 39. L. WILLAERT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:524–525.

[B. MATTEUCCI]

RICCI, VITTORIO

Dominican missionary, prefect apostolic of Formosa (Taiwan) and southern China; b. Fiesole, near Florence, Italy, Jan. 18, 1621; d. Parian, near Manila, Philippines, Feb. 17, 1685. After studying at Fiesole and after later studies and teaching in Rome, Ricci met Juan Bautista MORALES, who interested him in the missions. As Morales's procurator in Rome, he obtained the CHINESE RITES decree (1645) and aided him in establishing the University of Manila. In 1648 Ricci went to the Philippines, where he carried on missionary work among the Chinese of Parian. In July 1655 he moved to Amoy (Fukien), China, where he served as procurator of the Spanish Dominicans. There he gained the confidence of Koxinga, "lord of the seas," a pirate who sent Ricci to the Philippines to demand their submission to his rule. Ricci did not return to Amoy until after Koxinga's death (1661). As prefect apostolic of Formosa and southern China, he performed many delicate missions in China, Taiwan, and the Philippines in an effort to establish peace among the Spanish, Dutch, and natives, all of whom were vying for control of the area. After one such mission in 1666, Ricci was seized by Governor Salcedo of Manila and imprisoned for treason. After Salcedo's removal, Ricci was freed and resumed his important religious tasks. The manuscript of his principal work, Hechos de la Orden de Predicadores en el Imperio de China, was completed in 1667.

Bibliography: B. M. BIERMANN, Die Anfänge der neueren Dominikanermission in China (Münster 1927). J. M. GONZÁLEZ, Un Misionero diplomático: Vida del padre Vittorio Ricci (Madrid 1955).

[B. M. BIERMANN]

RICE, EDMUND IGNATIUS, BL.

Married educator, founder of the Irish Christian Brothers and the Presentation Brothers; b. June 1, 1762, near Callan (Westcourt), Co. Kilkenny, Ireland; d. Aug. 29, 1844, at Mount Sion, Waterford.

The fourth of the seven sons of the wealthy farmer Robert Rice and his wife Margaret, Rice attended the Catholic school at Moat Lane, Callan, which despite the provision of the iniquitous penal laws, the authorities suffered to exist. After preparing at Kilkenny for a business career, he went to Waterford in 1778 to serve as apprentice to his uncle, Michael Rice, a successful export and import trader, and, after the latter's death, became sole proprietor. Edmund married in 1785, but his wife, Mary Elliot, died suddenly in 1789 during a hunting trip.

The death of his wife was a turning point in Rice's life. At first he thought of entering a contemplative order on the Continent or the nearby Cistercian monastery at Mellary, but his brother, an Augustinian who had but just returned from Rome, discountenanced the idea. Rice, thereupon, devoted himself to the extension of his business. Some years later, however, he again desired to become a religious, then decided that his vocation was among the oppressed, poverty-stricken, and uneducated Irish Catholics. He provided for his only daughter and gave up his business career in order to dedicate himself to the service of God.

In 1796, he sought authorization from Pius VI to create a society to provide free education for poor boys. With papal encouragement and the permission of the bishop, Rice and three disciples opened a school in Waterford (1803). In 1809 they took vows and formed a religious society following the rule of the Presentation Sisters of Cork. This arrangement proved unsatisfactory, because each house was autonomous as to personnel and finances and subject directly to the local bishops. At the urging of Daniel Murray, then auxiliary bishop of Dublin, Rice successfully petitioned Pius VII to permit the adoption of the rule of the Christian Brothers, founded by St. John Baptist de La Salle. Rice made his religious profession once more, this time as Brother Ignatius (1821). He was then elected the first superior general of the Irish Christian Brothers.

As a citizen he was distinguished for his probity, charity, and piety; he was an active member of a society established in the city for the relief of the poor. He was known to be an intensely committed yet modest and spiritual man. Following his peaceful death, Rice was interred in the monastery cemetery (Mt. Sion) in Dublin and marked with a simple stone. Since then a chapel was erected on the site.

At Rice's beatification (Oct. 6, 1996), John Paul II called him "an outstanding model of a true lay apostle and a deeply committed religious. The love which he first gave to his young wife and which, after her untimely death, he always showed for his daughter, blossomed into a host of spiritual and corporal works of mercy, as he helped the clergy of his parish meet the pressing needs of his fellow citizens oppressed by poverty and the weight of anti-Catholic legislation."

Feast: May 5.

Bibliography: L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 27 (1996): 12–13. A Time of Grace—School Memories: Edmund Rice and the Presentation Tradition of Education, ed. by J. M. FEHENEY (Dublin 1996). A CHRISTIAN BROTHER, Edmund Ignatius Rice and the Christian Brothers (New York 1926). D. BURTON, Edmund Rice, Merchant Adventurer (London 1964). J. D. FITZPATRICK, Edmund Rice (Dublin 1945). D. KEOGH, Edmund Rice (Portland, Oregon 1996). D. RUSHE, Edmund Rice: The Man and His Times (Dublin 1981). P. R. WILSON, Educating Street Kids: A Ministry to Young People in the Charism of Edmund Rice (New York 1991).

[J. H. VAUGHAN]

RICE, LUTHER

Founder of the General Missionary Convention of the Baptist Denomination; b. Northboro, Mass., March 25, 1783; d. Edgefield, S.C., Sept. 25, 1836. He prepared for the Congregational ministry at Williams College and Andover Seminary, Massachusetts, where he was instrumental in awakening interest in foreign missions. In 1812 he was ordained and sailed for India as one of the first group of American missionaries. Arriving independently at the same conclusions on faith before Baptism as those of a colleague, the Rev. Adohiram Judson, Rice was rebaptized at Calcutta by English Baptist missionaries. Returning to America in 1813, he persuaded local Baptist associations to unite in a nationwide missionary society. The General Missionary Convention, meeting at Philadelphia, Pa., on May 18, 1814, established the Baptist Board for Foreign Missions and agreed to reconvene every three years. Since the convention was the only centralized Baptist agency, Rice sought to make it responsible for home missions and educational activities. He won its support for a theological school (now Andover Newton) and for Columbian College (now George Washington University, founded in 1822 at Washington, D.C.). Baptist financial troubles forced Rice to resign as treasurer of Columbian College in 1826, and thereafter the work of the convention was confined to foreign missions.

Bibliography: J. B. TAYLOR, Memoir of Rev. Luther Rice . . . (Richmond 1843; 2d ed. Nashville 1937). R. G. TORBET, A History of the Baptists (rev. ed. Valley Forge 1963).

[R. K. MACMASTER]

RICH, RICHARD

Lord chancellor; b. St. Laurence Jewry, London, 1496?; d. Rochford, Essex, June 12, 1567. A student at Cambridge and the Middle Temple, Rich seems to have led a dissipated youth. He was a good lawyer, however, and served on several royal commissions. He also represented Colchester in the "Reformation Parliament" (1529–36). Knighted and appointed solicitor general in 1533, Rich loyally supported Henrician policies. His evidence, based on private interviews with Thomas MORE and John FISHER, was instrumental in securing their conviction. More accused Rich of perjury, a charge history has sustained. Henry VIII rewarded Rich with honors, especially the chancellorship of the court of augmentations. Speaker of the parliament that met in 1536, he was second to Thomas CROMWELL in his influence and assisted him in suppressing the monasteries.

Rich grew wealthy on these spoils. He also managed to survive Cromwell's demise in 1540 and quickly adapted his policies to fit his sovereign's mood. Created a baron and lord chancellor (1548), he soon deserted the Protector Somerset for the cause of John Dudley, Earl of Warwick. Resigning the chancellorship in 1551, Rich retired to Essex. A halfhearted supporter of Lady Jane Grey, he soon declared for Queen Mary, thus surviving another change of regime. Rich fostered Catholic practices in Essex and persecuted Protestants. At Elizabeth's accession, he swore his loyalty, but refused to accept the Act of Uniformity (1559). An ambitious and greedy politician, Rich has been criticized by historians as a man of skill who was also an unscrupulous timeserver.

Bibliography: A. F. POLLARD, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 16:1009–12. P. HUGHES, The Reformation in England (New York 1963). R. W. CHAMBERS, Thomas More (Westminster, Md. 1949). H. F. M. PRESCOTT, Mary Tudor (rev. ed. New York 1953).

[P. S. MCGARRY]

RICHARD, GABRIEL

Missionary; b. Saintes, France, Oct. 15, 1767; d. Detroit, Sept. 13, 1832. He entered the Society of Saint-Sulpice and was ordained in October 1791 at Issy, near Paris. For a very brief period, he taught at the Sulpician seminary there, but the anticlerical policies of the French Revolutionary government forced him and three of his confreres, Ambrose Maréchal, François Ciquard, and François Matignon, to leave France. On June 24, 1792, the group arrived in Baltimore, where the Sulpicians staffed the newly established St. Mary's Seminary. Because he was not needed in Baltimore, Richard was given missionary assignments at Prairie du Rocher and Kaskaskia, Illinois, where he labored for six years. After his transfer to Detroit in 1798, he was responsible also for the missions of Wisconsin and Michigan. So successful were his efforts that in 1801 more than 500 persons were ready for Confirmation when Bishop Pierre Denaut of Quebec visited Detroit.

In 1804 Richard established an academy for girls and a seminary at Detroit, but a fire the following year destroyed both institutions, as well as Richard's church and rectory. Within three years the church was rebuilt and six primary schools and two girls' academies were erected. Always interested in education, Richard was instrumental in the founding of the University of Michigan in Ann Arbor in 1817 and served there as vice president and professor. He is remembered also for a series of lectures on religious subjects given in 1807 at the request of the governor and other officials of the Michigan Territory.

In 1808 Richard visited Baltimore, where he secured a printing press and type. The next year, he published the Michigan Essay or Impartial Observer, the first paper in Michigan. During the next three years, he published seven books dealing with education and religion. After the British victory at Detroit in the War of 1812, Richard was taken to Canada and imprisoned at Sandwich, although he was given many liberties. When released, he returned to Detroit and rebuilt his missions. In 1823 he was elected as a representative to the U.S. Congress, the only Catholic priest ever to hold a seat in the House of Representatives. He was befriended by Henry Clay, who often translated the Sulpician's faulty English for the benefit of the House. Richard lost his bid for reelection in 1826 mainly because of the opposition of several of his parish trustees. A year later, when the Holy See issued a brief erecting the Diocese of Detroit, Richard was named first bishop. But his nomination was suppressed, and Detroit remained without a bishop until 1833, six months after Richard's death during a cholera epidemic.

Bibliography: G. PARÉ, The Catholic Church in Detroit, 1701–1888 (Detroit 1951). P. GUERIN, Le Martyr de la Charité ou Notice sur Mr. G. Richard, Missionnaire (Paris 1850), with excerpts from R.'s letters. F. WOODFORD and A. HYMA, Gabriel Richard: Frontier Ambassador (Detroit 1958). D. MAST, Always a Priest: The Life of Gabriel Richard, S.S. (Baltimore 1965). L. COOMBS and F. BLOUIN, JR., Intellectual Life on the Michigan Frontier: The Libraries of Gabriel Richard and John Monteith (Ann Arbor 1985). L. TENTLER, Seasons of Grace: A History of the Catholic Archdiocese of Detroit (Detroit 1992).

[J. Q. FELLER]

RICHARD DE LA VERGNE, FRANÇOIS MARIE

Cardinal, archbishop of Paris; b. Nantes, March 1, 1819; d. Paris, Jan. 28, 1908. After theological studies at Saint-Sulpice, Paris, he was ordained (Dec. 21, 1844) and made graduate studies in theology in Rome (1846–49). Returning to Nantes, he became secretary to the bishop and vicar-general (1850–69). After Bishop Jacquemet's death (1869) he preached parish missions. As bishop of Belley (1872–75) he began the beatification process for the Curé of Ars. He became coadjutor to Cardinal Guibert (May 7, 1875), succeeded him as archbishop of Paris (July 8, 1886), and was named cardinal (May 24, 1889). In this post he showed no favor toward the Third Republic or the RALLIEMENT, but in the face of an anticlerical government he zealously defended the religious congregations threatened with expulsion, the cause of Catholic education, and that of the Church itself at the time of the law separating Church and State (1905). This law caused him to be expelled from his see some months before his death. The foundation and organization of the Institut Catholique in Paris owes much to him. He was one of the first to oppose LOISY. The Roman decree LAMENTABILI contains 18 propositions taken almost verbatim from Richard's memorial to the Holy See concerning Modernism. Richard was known for his asceticism, modesty, and mildness joined to firmness. Besides pastoral letters he published several works.

Bibliography: H. L. ODELIN, Le Cardinal Richard: Souvenirs (2d ed. Paris 1922). M. CLÉMENT, Vie du Cardinal Richard (Paris 1924). J. RUPP, Histoire de l'Église de Paris (Paris 1948). R. SCHERER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1294–95.

[R. LIMOUZIN-LAMOTHE]

RICHARD DE MORES (RICARDUS ANGLICUS)

Important English canonist, priest, and Augustinian canon; b. Lincolnshire, date unknown; d. Dunstable (Diocese of Lincoln), Apr. 9, 1242.

Life. He was the first canonist of English origin to teach at the school of Bologna, where he also published a number of influential writings in the last decade of the twelfth century. In the tradition of the schools, he was known merely as "Richard the Englishman," and many wrong guesses as to his identity have been made over the centuries by historians and bibliographers of canon law. It is now established that he was Richard de Mores (or Morins), prior of the Augustinian canons at Dunstable from 1202 to his death, and author of a substantial portion of the Dunstable Annals. He left a record of his long tenure as prior, but of his early years we know only what can be deduced from his canonistic writings. He first studied the arts before turning to law. His first canonical treatise places him in a group of Anglo-Norman canonists in Paris (c. 1186–87); given the date of his death, he would not have been much older than 25 at that time. About ten years later he was regent master in Bologna. During the interval he may or may not have taught for some time in England, but in all probability he had connections with the civil law glossators of the Vacarian School in Oxford. In Bologna he completed within a brief span of years a surprising number of works. Since none of these contain any reference to the decretals of INNOCENT III (1198–1216), we may presume that Richard was back in England by 1198. He was a canon of the Augustinian house of Merton when elected prior of Dunstable in 1202. He was ordained to the priesthood on Sept. 21, 1202. Matters of administration, visitations, and commissions entrusted to him by pope and king, by legates and bishops, filled the second half of his life, except for one brief interval. On his way back from the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) he remained in Paris for a year to attend courses in theology. In 1239, three years before his death, and when he was close to 80 years of age, he acted as one of the judges in a controversy between London and Canterbury on the metropolitan's right of visitation.

Writings. The canonistic works of Richard de Mores all antedate his long years in office as prior of Dunstable; with the exception of his Summa de ordine iudicario, they exist only in manuscript tradition. In 1965 critical editions of the other canonistic works were in preparation for the Monumenta Iuris Canonici under the general editorship of the Institute of Medieval Canon Law. Summa questionum, written in Paris (c. 1186–87), probably represents a formal course of questiones given on Fridays (questiones veneriales in one of the manuscripts); this book of his youth is closely related to the anonymous Anglo-Norman summa, Omnis qui iuste (Lipsiensis) and the Summa questionum of master HONORIUS, both of the same period and school. Later, in Bologna, Richard did not include it in the list he gave of his writings in the prologue to the Distinctiones (below). The works of his Bolognese years were all completed c. 1196 to 1198, although they were probably much longer in preparation. They are Summa brevis, an elementary introduction (consisting partly of mnemonic verse) to GRATIAN'S Decretum; Distinctiones decretorum, one of his most important works (at least 16 manuscripts are preserved today), systematically presenting the concepts and problems contained in the Decretum in the form of analytical diagrams; Argumenta or Notabilia decretorum, probably lost; Summa de ordine iudicario, a treatise on canonical procedure that was widely read and annotated in its day (for editions, see bibliography); Casus decretalium, a summary of the contents, chapter by chapter, of Bernard of Pavia's Breviarum extravagantium—the compilation of decretals that had just then been adopted in Bologna as a new subject in the curriculum (known later as Compilatio I); Apparatus decretalium, one of the first and most influential commentaries of glosses on the new compilation and an important source for TANCREDO'S Glossa ordinaria on Compilatio I and, indirectly, for BERNARD OF PARMA'S Glossa ordinaria on the decretals of GREGORY IX; and Generalia or Brocarda, general maxims and commonplaces drawn from the texts of the new compilation, each rule presented with a string of pros and cons and a dialectical solution of the antinomies. Richard published his Generalia both as part of the Apparatus decretalium and as a separate collection.

Bibliography: Magistri Ricardi Anglici ordo iudicarius ex codice Duacensi . . ., ed. C. WITTE (Halle 1853). L. WAHRMUND, ed., "Die Summa de ordine iudicarius des Ricardus Anglicus," in Quellen zur Geschichte des römisch-kanonischen Processes im Mittelalter, v. 2.3 (Innsbruck 1915). "Annales prioratus de Dunstaplia" in Annales Monastici, v. 3, ed. H. R. LUARD, Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores, 244 v. (London 1858–96; repr. New York 1964–) 1866. F. GILLMANN, "R. A. als Glossator des Compilatio I," Archive für katholisches Kirchenrecht 107 (1927): 575–655. S. KUTTNER, Repertorium der Kanonistik (Rome 1937) 222–227, 323–325, 398, 417–418. J. C. RUSSELL, Dictionary of Writers of Thirteenth-Century England (New York 1936) 111–113, the first to identify the canonist as Richard de Mores. S. KUTTNER and E. RATHBONE, "Anglo-Norman Canonists of the Twelfth Century," Traditio 7 (1949–51): 329–339, 353–358. C. LEFEBVRE, "Recherches sur les manuscrits des glossateurs de la Compilatio I: L'Oeuvre de R. A.," Congrès de droit canonique médiéval . . . 1958 (Louvain 1959). E. M. MEIJERS, Études d'histoire du droit, ed. R. FEENSTRA and H. F. FISCHER, v. 3 (Leiden 1959) 278–279. S. KUTTNER, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 7:676–681, full bibliog.

[S. KUTTNER]

RICHARD FISHACRE

English Dominican theologian; b. Diocese of Exeter; d. Oxford, 1248. The first Dominican to study theology at the University of Oxford, he incepted under ROBERT BACON, his master and intimate friend, before 1240, and continued to teach there until his death. He introduced a new method of teaching, separating theological questions from moral instruction, using the Sentences in his magisterial lectures (lectiones ordinariae) and relegating moralitates to the Biblical course. This innovation displeased Bp. ROBERT GROSSETESTE [Epistolae, ed. H. R. Luard (London 1861) 346–347], but INNOCENT IV requested that Fishacre be encouraged, not hindered, from lecturing ordinarie on the Sentences. His unpublished commentary on the Sentences, the first to issue from Oxford, manifests considerable skill in theological, philosophical, scientific, and medical matters. Although he frequently quoted Aristotle and the "Aristotelians," he followed the current Augustinian tradition on knowledge, divine illumination, and the hylomorphic composition of spiritual substances. On plurality of forms and other difficult problems he did not commit himself, but rather attempted to reconcile Aristotle with Augustinianism. His principal sources were St. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, ALEXANDER OF HALES, HUGH OF SAINT-CHER, and Grosseteste. His influence was great both at Oxford and at Paris, notably on SIMON HINTON, ROBERT KILWARDBY, RICHARD RUFUS OF CORNWALL, WILLIAM OF MELITONA, St. BONAVENTURE, and indirectly on St. ALBERT THE GREAT. He was a remarkable preacher. Besides several sermons, which have survived, he is credited by NICHOLAS TREVET with Postillae on the first 70 Psalms, "most beautiful, intermingled with sweetest moralities" (Trevet, Annales 230); Quodlibeta; two treatises De paenitentia; and De fide, spe et caritate.

Bibliography: D. A. CALLUS, "Introduction of Aristotelian Learning to Oxford," Proceedings of the British Academy 29 (1943) 229–281. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500 (Oxford 1957–59) 2:685–686. F. PELSTER, "Das Leben und die Schriften des Oxforder Dominikanerlehrers Richard Fishacre," Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 54 (1930) 518–553. D. E. SHARP, "The Philosophy of Richard Fishacre," The New Scholasticism 7 (1933) 281–297. W. A. HINNEBUSCH, The Early English Friars Preachers (Rome 1951) 364–369. F. STEGMÜLLER, Repertorium biblicum medii aevi (Madrid 1949–61) 5:7266–69; Repertorium commentariorum in Sententias Petri Lombardi (Würzburg 1947) 1:718.

[D. A. CALLUS]

RICHARD FITZRALPH

Archbishop, theologian, controversialist whose views influenced John WYCLIF; b. Dundalk, Ireland, c. 1300; d. Avignon, Nov. 10, 1360. After studies at Oxford, Fitzralph spent a short period at Paris. He was chancellor of Oxford University (1332–34). Thereafter he held a series of benefices, and in 1346 became archbishop of Armagh. He was well known at Avignon (see AVIGNON PAPACY), preached several times before the papal court, and took part in current controversies about the BEATIFIC VISION, the Armenians, and the privileges of the MENDICANT ORDERS. As archbishop he quarreled with the friars and was cited to Avignon after a series of outspoken sermons against them in London (1356–57), but he died before the case was decided. A canonization process, begun in 1399, was dropped, but a shrine and cult to "St. Richard of Dundalk" are found as late as 1545.

Bibliography: Sources. R. FITZRALPH, Defensorium curatorum (Louvain 1475?); Summa . . . in questionibus Armenorum

(Paris 1512); De pauperie Salvatoris, in Iohannis Wycliffe de dominio divino, ed. R. L. POOLE (London 1890). Literature. R. L. POOLE, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 7:194–198. E. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 13.2:2667–2668. A. GWYNN, Studies 22 (1933): 389–405, 591–607; 23 (1934): 395–411; 24 (1935): 25–42, 558–572; 25 (1936): 81–96; 26 (1937): 50–67. L. L. HAMMERICH, The Beginning of the Strife between R. Fitzralph and the Mendicants (Copenhagen 1938). A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 2:692–694. G. LEFF, R. F.: Commentator of the "Sentences" (Manchester, Eng. 1964).

[M. B. CROWE]

RICHARD GRANT OF CANTERBURY

Archbishop, also known as Le Grand or Wethershed; date of birth unknown; d. Aug. 3, 1231. Chancellor of Lincoln cathedral (1221–29), he was provided to Canterbury by GREGORY IX on Jan. 19, 1229, and was consecrated on June 10. The bull of provision refers to his reputation in the schools, which was known at the Papal Curia. Possibly he is to be identified with the "Ricardus Anglicus" who was regent in theology at Paris in 1218. As archbishop he was engaged in a sharp dispute with the justiciar, Hubert de Burgh; he went to Rome to plead his case, but died on the way home and was buried in the house of the Friars Minor at S. Gemini (Umbria).

Bibliography: J. C. RUSSELL, Dictionary of Writers of 13th-Century England (New York 1936) 115–116. M. GIBBS and J. LANG, Bishops and Reform, 1215–1272 (London 1934; repr. 1962). P. GLORIEUX, Répertoire des maîtres en théologie de Paris au XIII siècle (Paris 1933–34) 1:118.

[C. H. LAWRENCE]

RICHARD KNAPWELL (CLAPWELL)

English Dominican, known variously as Cnapwell, Klapwell, etc., famous for his role in the Oxford controversies over THOMISM; b. Knapwell, Cambridgeshire, date unknown; d. Bologna, c. 1288. He was baccalaureus sententiarum c. 1280 and master of theology at Oxford in 1284. His Notabilia (or notes) in 1 sententiarum attest to his hesitation to accept Thomism fully, but also to his adoption of some of its theses, for example, the simplicity of the soul; his Correctorium Corruptorii "Quare" shows him as one of its staunchest defenders.

Correctorium "Quare." Scholars now agree on Knapwell's authorship of the correctorium "Quare," although F. Pelster ascribed it to the Dominican THOMAS OF SUTTON. It is the most complete of all the CORRECTORIA. From Aquinas's own writings Knapwell proved that the Franciscan "correction" was based on a failure to grasp the Thomist doctrine, which, correctly understood, is philosophically and theologically sound. On Oct. 29, 1284, JOHN PECKHAM confirmed the prohibition (1277) of ROBERT KILWARDBY and proclaimed the unicity thesis a dangerous error (see FORMS, UNICITY AND PLURALITY OF). Following the suggestion of his provincial, WILLIAM DE HOTHUM, that philosophical problems in which neither opinion is inconsistent with Catholic teaching should be defined in solemn disputation rather than by condemnation or prohibition, Knapwell discussed the vexed question "Whether faith about the essence of human nature united to the Word requires us to posit plurality of forms." He advanced 42 arguments for the pluralist opinion and 41 for the unicity view. In his solution he stated first the difficulty of the problem, viz, the difference of opinion between famous masters, especially between the two most famous (Aquinas and Kilwardby). Since both were Catholics and neither was a heretic, he defended them both; at the outset, however, he declared that the unicity thesis as understood by Aquinas was not erroneous. Next, he proposed three principles on which the solution depended and on which all disputants should agree: the nature of dimensive quantity, of symbolic quality, and of transformation. He then examined the evidence advanced for and against, explained each argument objectively and impartially, tried to reconcile both opinions, and, proclaiming both solutions equally Catholic, concluded: "all this is said without dogmatizing, and without detriment to a better opinion."

Reaction. A report of the proceedings was sent to Peckham. Twelve propositions were chosen from Knapwell's question and declared heretical. Knapwell was personally charged with teaching heresies and particularly with preferring as a more probable opinion that "no difficulty follows if there were in Christ, as man, one form." Knapwell did not appear, but his provincial entered a formal protest as to the incompetence of the court and appealed to the pope. On April 30, 1286, the archbishop, with his suffragans, withdrawing Knapwell's name and reducing the 12 articles to eight, pronounced them heretical in themselves or in their implications. The thesis of the unicity of form was expressly condemned as heretical and as a source of heresies (art. 8). Its supporters were excommunicated. Knapwell was accused of having asserted that "in these matters one is not bound to follow the pope's, or the Fathers' authority, but only the Bible, or necessary reason" (art. 7). This he vigorously denied [see Godfrey of Fontaines's Quodlibet 3.5, ed. M. de Wulf and A. Pelzer (Louvain 1904) 198; for the identity of Knapwell with magister valens, see P. Glorieux, Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 12 (1940): 143–145]. Knapwell left for Rome, and his appeal was heard, as one may gather from Peckham's letter to the bishop of Lincoln (March 28, 1287) requesting urgent information about it. But before the matter was settled, the pope died, and his successor, Nicholas IV, a Franciscan, silenced Knapwell on Feb. 15, 1288. Knapwell went to Bologna, where he died. Peckham's action was considered by his contemporaries as harsh and ultra vires, and he knew it. On his own confession, the matter was reserved to the Holy See.

Against Peckham's expectations and pressures, Rome never condemned the unicity thesis. On the contrary, St. Pius X declared in 1914, almost in the same terms of the condemnation (cf. art. 8), that this thesis is one of the fundamental tenets of the Thomist synthesis, and as such is to be held and taught in the schools as tuta and secura [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 6 (1914): 385].

Bibliography: For Knapwell's writings, F. J. ROENSCH, Early Thomistic School (Dubuque 1964) 39–40. D. A. CALLUS, The Condemnation of St. Thomas at Oxford (2d ed. Oxford 1955); "The Problem of the Unity of Form and Richard Knapwell," Mélanges offerts à Étienne Gilson de l'Académie française (Toronto 1959). F. STEGMÜLLER, Repertorium commentariorum in Sententias Petri Lombardi, 2 v. (Würzburg 1947) 716. W. A. HINNEBUSCH, The Early English Friars Preachers (Rome 1951) 342–356, 389–391. F. PELSTER, Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 52 (1928): 473–491. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500 (Oxford 1957–59) 2:1058.

[D. A. CALLUS]

RICHARD OF BURY

Bishop, royal official, bibliophile; b. near Bury-St.-Edmunds, Jan. 24, 1287; d. Durham, April 14, 1345. Born of a landowning family, Richard of Bury or Richard Aungerville studied at Oxford from 1302 to 1312, when he received the first of the enormous number of ecclesiastical benefices that he was to enjoy during the rest of his life, many of them being held in plurality by virtue of royal favor and papal PROVISION. In the same year (1312) his appointment as clerk in the royal treasury set him on a career of service to Edward II and Edward III as a financial expert and diplomat. As diplomat he constantly visited the courts of Europe, including the papal court at AVIGNON (1333) where he met PETRARCH. Even after becoming bishop of DURHAM in 1333 he was continuously engaged in the King's affairs (e.g., he served as chancellor, 1334–35), yet proved himself a kindly and conscientious pastor in his diocese. During his last years, he was able to devote himself more completely to collecting books, the real passion of his life, as witness his Philobiblon, a work remarkable in its use of the CURSUS, every clause being laced together in a concatenation of some 19,000 clausulae. He also compiled a Libor epistolaris, a formulary of belles lettres collected by Richard and including treatises of otherwise unknown Italian dictatores.

Bibliography: R. AUNGerville, The Philobiblon, ed. A. TAYLOR (Berkeley 1948); Liber epistolaris, ed. N. DENHOLM-YOUNG (Oxford 1950). N. DENHOLM-YOUNG, "Richard de Bury," Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, 4th ser., 20 (1937) 135–168. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the Scholars of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 1:323–326.

[D. NICHOLL]

RICHARD OF CAMPSALL

English secular theologian of Oxford; b. c. 1285; d. Oxford, c. 1350. Originally a fellow of Balliol College, he became a fellow of Merton College by 1306. Receiving his degree of master of arts by 1308, he studied theology and became regent master in theology by 1322. Throughout his life he was active in academic affairs as proctor and frequent delegate of the university. Present at the excommunication of the mayor of Oxford by the chancellor on Dec. 19, 1325, he was empowered by the chancellor to absolve the mayor on Jan. 10, 1326. He wrote questions on the first three books of the Physics, as well as Notabilitates on the whole Physics; these are not known to be extant. Existing works are Quaestiones super librum Priorum Analyticorum, a Logica valde utilis et realis contra Ocham, and 16 Dicta on contingency and divine foreknowledge. Campsall reacted to the influences of both DUNS SCOTUS and WILLIAM OF OCKHAM, but he remained an independent thinker. He was buried in the choir of Merton College chapel.

Bibliography: E. A. SYNAN, "Richard of Campsall, an English Theologian of the 14th Century," Mediaeval Studies 14 (1952): 1–8; "R. of C.'s First Question on the Prior Analytics," Mediaeval Studies 23 (1961): 305–323; "Sixteen Sayings by R. of C. on Contingency and Foreknowledge," Mediaeval Studies 24 (1962): 250–262; "The Universal and Supposition in a Logica Attributed to R. of C.," Nine Mediaeval Thinkers: A Collection of Hitherto Unedited Texts, ed. J. R. O'DONNELL (Toronto 1955). A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 1:344–345. G. C. BRODRICK, Memorials of Merton College, with Biographical Notices of the Warden and Fellows (Oxford 1885) 175.

[E. A. SYNAN]

RICHARD OF CANTERBURY

Or Richard of Dover, Benedictine monk, successor to Abp. Thomas BECKET; d. Feb. 16, 1184. Richard, a Norman by birth, was of considerable importance in the development of Canon Law in England (see CANON LAW, HISTORY OF, 4). Educated at Christ Church, Canterbury, where he became a monk, he was later chaplain to Abp. THEOBALD OF CANTERBURY. From 1157 he was prior of St. Martin's, Dover. His election to the See of Canterbury on June 3, 1173, though canonical, was contested; after a successful appeal, he was consecrated by Pope Alexander III on April 7, 1174, and appointed legate in his own province. Though he believed in cooperation with the lay power and was never extreme in his defense of the liberties of the Church, he was efficient and active in ecclesiastical administration and resolutely upheld the rights of his see. At Westminster in 1175 he presided over one of the earliest English provincial councils and promulgated some important canons. As judge delegate, legislator, and promoter of an influential decretal collection, he helped to build up a corpus of decretal law of permanent value.

Bibliography: Materials for the History of Thomas Becket, ed. J. C. ROBERTSON, 7 v. (Rerum Britannicarum mediæ aevi scriptores 67; 1875–85) 7:561–564. W. HUNT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 16:1077–80. R. FOREVILLE, L'Église et la royauté en Angleterre sous Henri II Plantagenet (Paris 1943) 371–387, 517–524. C. R. CHENEY, From Becket to Langton (Manchester, Eng. 1956). C. N. L. BROOKE, "Canons of English Church Councils in the Early Decretal Collections," Traditio 13 (1957) 471–479. C. DUGGAN, Twelfth-Century Decretal Collections and Their Importance in English History (London 1963).

[M. CHIBNALL]

RICHARD OF CONINGTON

English Franciscan theologian; d. Cambridge, 1330. His name is first mentioned in a document of 1300 when, along with John DUNS SCOTUS and 20 other Franciscans, he was presented to the bishop of Lincoln for faculties to hear confessions. A doctor of theology, he incepted at Oxford (c. 1305–07) and then became lector at the Cambridge friary (1308–10). He was the 16th provincial minister of the English province of Franciscans (1310–16). He assisted at the Council of VIENNE (1311–12) and with Martin of Alnwick took part in the great debate with the Franciscan SPIRITUALS. At this time also he wrote his treatise on evangelical poverty, Beatus qui intelligit, a work that brought an ironic reply from UBERTINO OF CASALE (see POVERTY CONTROVERSY). In 1322 Richard prepared his Responsiones ad conclusiones domini papae, a dialogue between friar and pope regarding difficulties that could arise from the papal bull Ad conditorem cartonum (see JOHN XXII, POPE). No trace of Richard's Commentary on the Sentences remains (though L. WADDING referred to a copy in the Vatican Library). V. Doucet drew attention to eight Quaestiones disputatae and two Quodlibeta attributed to Richard that include questions on creation, knowledge of God, univocity and equivocity, beatitude, will, intellect, etc. Doctrinally, Richard seems to stand midway between Aristotelianism and Augustinianism. He is quoted by WILLIAM OF ALNWICK, Godfrey of England (Cornwall?), Robert of Walsingham, JOHN BACONTHORP, and PETER THOMAE. Richard spent his last years at Cambridge, where he is buried.

Bibliography: S. DUMONT, "William of Ware, Richard of Conington, and the Collationes Oxonienses of John Duns Scotus," in John Duns Scotus (Leiden 1996) 59–85. S. BROWN, "Richard of Conington and the Analogy of the Concept of Being," in Festgabe für P. Dr. Valens Heynck, OFM zur Vollendung des 60 Lebensjahres, Franziskanische Studien 48 (1966) 297–307.

[T. C. CROWLEY]

RICHARD OF GRAVESEND

Bishop of Lincoln; d. Stow Park, Lincolnshire, England, Dec. 13, 1279. A native of Kent, he became dean of Lincoln, 1254, and then bishop, 1258. Gravesend assisted Simon de Montfort in negotiations for Anglo-French peace (1258). He supported the Provisions of Oxford, sided with Montfort against King Henry III in the Barons' War, and represented Montfort in negotiations leading to temporary peace (1263). The papal legate Ottobuono Fieschi, later Pope ADRIAN V, suspended him for supporting Montfort (1266), but Gravesend, already reconciled with Henry, visited Rome and obtained absolution from Pope CLEMENT IV. Archbishop JOHN PECKHAM rebuked him (1279) for instituting overly harsh measures against pluralists in Lincoln diocese, and taking advantage of constitutions issued by Peckham in order to do so. Gravesend, whom MATTHEW PARIS calls "worthy" and "useful," was closely associated with ADAM MARSH. He is buried in Lincoln Cathedral.

Bibliography: Annales Monastici, ed. H. R. LUARD, 5 v. (Rerum Britannicarum mediæ aevi scriptores 36) v. 1, 3, 4. M. PARIS, Chronica majora, ed. H. R. LUARD, 7 v. (Rerum Britannicarum mediæ aevi scriptores 57; 1872–83) v. 5. Rotuli Ricardi Gravesend, diocesis Lincolnensis, ed. F. N. DAVIS (London 1925). C. L. KINGSFORD, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 8:441–442. F. M. POWICKE, King Henry III and the Lord Edward, 2 v. (Oxford 1947). A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the Scholars of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 2:803–804. M. GIBBS and J. LANG, Bishops and Reform, 1215–1272 (London 1934; repr. 1962).

[R. W. HAYS]

RICHARD OF GRAVESEND

Bishop of London; b. Kent, England; d. Fulham, London, Dec. 9, 1303. He was the nephew of RICHARD OF GRAVESEND, bishop of LINCOLN from 1258 to 1279, in whose household he began the church career during which he advanced from protégé of Henry of Sandwich, bishop of LONDON (1262–73), to become bishop of London himself (May 1280). During his 23 years in that important see, he could be counted on to oppose the metropolitan claims of JOHN PECKHAM, archbishop of CANTERBURY, challenging especially the court of Canterbury's jurisdiction over any case arising within the bounds of the London Diocese. When other suffragan bishops found themselves in opposition to Peckham, they could expect the support of Gravesend, who aligned himself with Thomas of Cantelupe, bishop of Hereford, in 1281–82 and with GODFREY GIFFARD, bishop of Worcester, in 1284 and 1289. As for his cathedral, ST. PAUL'S, Gravesend instituted the office of subdean as an officer to fulfill the dean's duties during the dean's absences, and, being a man of some scholarly tastes, he ordered that the chancellor of the cathedral must be a bachelor or doctor of theology and must lecture on theology or at least engage such a lecturer. Gravesend's library, which further indicates his scholarly interests, is listed in what is probably the earliest extant priced book catalogue. On the political scene, the bishop was commissioned by the Synod of Canterbury (Feb. 5, 1281) to persuade King Edward I to release from prison the litigious son of Simon de Montfort of Barons' War fame, Amaury de Montfort, a cleric whom Edward had held prisoner since 1275. From 1289 to 1290 Gravesend was abroad on the King's business; in 1293 he was Edward's envoy to King PHILIP IV OF FRANCE concerning attacks on French shipping from the Cinque Ports; in 1294 and 1296 he attended royal weddings abroad; and in 1297 he was one of the councilors of Prince Edward (II) while the king was in France. The bishop was buried in St. Paul's, but his tomb has been destroyed. He was able to advance the ecclesiastical careers of his nephew, Richard of Gravesend, who became treasurer of St. Paul's in 1310, and of his nephew, STEPHEN OF GRAVESEND, who succeeded him as bishop of London (1319–38).

See Also: LONDON, ANCIENT SEE OF.

Bibliography: C. L. KINGSFORD, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 8:442–443. K. EDWARDS, The English Secular Cathedrals in the Middle Ages (Manchester, Eng. 1949) 152, 203. D. L. DOUIE, Archbishop Peckham (Oxford 1952), passim. F. M. POWICKE, The Thirteenth Century (2d ed. Oxford 1962) 330–331; 486–487. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500 2:804–805.

[M. J. HAMILTON]

RICHARD OF KILVINGTON

English philosopher, theologian, and controversialist; b. Diocese of York; d. London, by 1362. He was educated at Oxford (M.A. by 1331; B.Th. by 1335; D.Th. by 1350); canon of York, 1353; canon of St. Paul's, London, 1354; and dean of St. Paul's, 1354. In July of 1339, he was one of the envoys sent to negotiate with King Philip

VI of France; between 1342 and 1344 he was, with his friend RICHARD FITZRALPH, a member of the household of RICHARD OF BURY, Bishop of Durham. As Fitzralph's ally in the antimendicant campaign of 1356 and 1357, he took a leading part in his controversy with the Franciscan Roger of Conway on evangelical poverty, but the treatises on this subject attributed to him seem to be no longer extant (Pro Armachano contra fratres, Contra Rogerum Conway, Contra mendicitatem otiosam). Also attributed to him are Questiones de generatione et corruptione, a Commentary on the Sentences, Tractatus de intencionibus et remissionibus potenciarum, Sophismata, Sermo de adventu Domini, and probably Decem questiones morales super X libros Ethicorum Aristotelis. He is buried at St. Paul's.

Bibliography: A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 2:1050–1051. C. L. KINGSFORD, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 11:353; F. STEGMÜLLER, Repertorium commentariorum in Sententias Petri Lombardi, 2 v. (Würzburg 1947) 1:347, where he is wrongly described as an Austin friar. On Kilvington's part in the antimendicant controversy, see A. GWYNN, "Archbishop Fitzralph and the Friars," Studies 26 (1937): 50–67. On Kilvington as philosopher, see A. LANG et al., eds., Aus der Geisteswelt des Mittelalters, 2 v. (Münster 1935).

[T. P. DUNNING]

RICHARD OF MIDDLETON (MEDIAVILLA)

Franciscan philosopher and theologian, honored with the title of Doctor solidus; b. c. 1249; d. Reims, March 30, 1302. Some hold that he is of English origin; others hold that he is French. On Sept. 20, 1295, he was elected provincial minister of the province of France [see H. Lippens, Archivum Franciscanum historicum 37 (1944) 3–47], a fact, however that does not settle the question of his nationality.

The earliest certain date in his life is 1283, when, together with other theologians, Richard was appointed to examine the writings of PETER JOHN OLIVI. In that year he held the degree of bachelor, but by the following year he had become a doctor of theology. He probably studied at Paris under Pietro Falco, WILLIAM DE LA MARE, and MATTHEW OF AQUASPARTA. From 1284 to 1287 he was magister regens of the Franciscan studium in Paris. He is last heard of in 1296 when he was near Naples in the company of St. Louis of Toulouse.

Richard's principal work is his commentary on the Sententiae of PETER LOMBARD. He wrote also 45 Quaestiones disputatae, mostly unpublished, and three series of Quodlibeta that reflect the problems discussed by HENRY OF GHENT, GODFREY OF FONTAINES, GILES OF LESSINES, and GILES OF ROME. Four of his sermons are extant. Richard's interest in the experimental sciences may be indicative of an English background. He often uses arguments drawn from experience and favors induction. In general, he remains faithful to Augustinian-Bonaventurian views, but on some points he tends toward Thomism or proffers personal opinions. He held that intellectual knowledge proceeds from abstraction, through the work of the intellectus agens, without a special divine illumination. He also attributed to matter the smallest degree of actuality so that, if God willed, matter could exist even without a form.

See Also: FORMS, UNICITY AND PLURALITY OF.

Bibliography: S. BROWN, "Richard of Middleton. OFM on Esse and Essence," Franciscan Studies 8 (1976) 49–76. P. VAN VELDHIJSEN, "Richard of Middleton on the Question Whether the World Could Have Been Eternally Produced by God," in J. B. M. WISSINK, ed., The Eternity of the World in the Thought of Thomas Aquinas and His Contemporaries (Leiden 1990), 69–81. M. HENNINGER, "Hervaeus Natalis and Richard of Mediavilla," in J. J. E. GRACIA, ed., Individuation in Scholasticism (Albany 1994) 299–318. L. COVA, Originale Peccatum e Concupiscentia in Riccardo di Mediavilla (Rome 1984), bibliography. A. PEREZ-ESTEVEZ, La Materia, De Avicena a la Escuela Franciscana: Avicena, Averroes, Tomas de Aquino, Pecham, Marston, Olivo, Mediavilla, Duns Escoto (Maracaibo 1998), bibliography.

[G. GÁL]

RICHARD OF SAINT-VICTOR

Theologian, mystical writer; b. probably Scotland, date unknown; d. March 10, 1173. A Regular Canon of the Abbey of Saint-Victor, Paris, Richard of Saint-Victor was a major mystical writer of the second half of the twelfth century, who contributed also to theology, exegesis, and school and homiletic literature. Like all of the leading figures in the early years of the Abbey's history, little is known of Richard's life; he was probably from Scotland and most likely entered the Abbey near the middle of the twelfth century. He was subprior and became prior in 1161. He played an important role in the interior life of the Abbey of Saint-Victor as prior and as its leading spiritual guide in the third quarter of the twelfth century. His influence was strongest in the literature of contemplation. BONAVENTURE'S Itinerarium mentis in Deum shows Richard's influence, as does Bernardino of Laredo's Ascent of Mount Sion. The author of the Cloud of Unknowing draws upon passages from The Twelve Patriarchs (Benjamin major).

Richard was strongly influenced by the effective founder of the Victorine school of exegesis, theology, and mysticism, HUGH OF SAINT-VICTOR (d. 1141). Richard's Liber Exceptionum is based on Hugh's Didascalicon and Chronicon, while his mysticism builds on Hugh's practice of using biblical images, such as Noah's Ark, as symbolic structures to represent the mystic's path to contemplative ecstasy. In exegesis, Richard gave attention both to allegory and to the literal sense of Scripture. Like other Victorine exegetes, Richard consulted Jews and Jewish sources for the literal sense of Hebrew Scripture, but in De Emanuele Richard strongly criticizes what he sees as Andrew of Saint-Victor's Judaizing literal interpretation of Isaiah 7:14. Richard's treatise on Ezekiel's visions of the Jerusalem Temple (In visionem Ezechielis) contains a strong justification for interpreting Ezekiel's description of the Temple literally (as opposed to the exegesis of Gregory the Great) and also presents in the manuscripts some of the first medieval architectural drawings showing the elevation of a building. His commentary on the Revelation of John analyzes four kinds of vision (ordinary [trees, the sea]; the deeper meaning of scripture [the burning bush symbolizing Mary's virginity]; images in visionary experience; imageless visionary experiences) and situates John's visions in the Apocalypse as falling into the third kind. In theology Richard developed a distinctive argument for the necessity of God as a Trinity, based on an analysis of the nature of love (De Trinitate). In the Revelation commentary and elsewhere Richard shows a knowledge of the ideas of DIONYSIUS THE PSEUDO-AREOPAGITE, a knowledge mediated through the writings of Hugh of Saint-Victor.

Richard's two major contemplative treatises are The Twelve Patriarchs (Benjamin major) and The Mystical Ark (Benjamin minor). In The Twelve Patriarchs Richard takes the patriarch Jacob, his two wives, their two handmaidens, and the 12 sons and one daughter of the four women to symbolize the rational soul (Jacob), the faculties of the mind (the four women; will, sensation, imagination, reason) and the stages of discipline of body and mind that lead to contemplative ecstasy (the 13 children). The dynamic progression of the narrative of births, etc., provides Richard with a rich canvas on which to unfold his ideas concerning the development and psychological dynamics of the spiritual life. In The Mystical Ark (the Ark of the Covenant) Richard again uses a set of biblical images to explore both structure and development in the mystical life. The "construction" of the Ark and the two accompanying Cherubim presents the materials to develop a six-stage division of the mind's "ascent" to contemplative ecstasy, or "alienation of mind" (alienatio mentis) which is an experience of divine presence, mediated in the "emptiness" in the space above the Ark and between the two Cherubim in the visualization of biblical images. Richard made extensive spiritual commentaries on Psalms. But again and again he was drawn back to the dynamics of the spiritual life in works such as: De exterminatione mali et promotione boni (using the symbol of the 12 stones on which the Hebrews crossed the Jordan into the Promised Land), De eruditione interioris hominis (using the dream of Nebuchadnezzar to explore again the dynamics of the spiritual life) and De quatuor gradiabus violentae charitatis (a brilliant exploration of the centrality and transforming power of love in the mystical quest). All address the subtle processes and culmination of the life of discipline in quest of divine presence.

See Also: VICTORINE SPIRITUALITY.

Bibliography: Works. RICHARD OF SAINT-VICTOR, Omnia opera. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 196. De Trinitate, ed. J. RIBAILLIER, TPMA 6 (Paris 1958). De statu interioris hominis, ed. J. RIBAILLIER, Archives d'histoire doctrinale et littéraire du moyen-âge 34 (1967) 7–128. L'Édit d'Alexandre ou les trois processions, ed. J. CHATILLON and W.-J. TULLOCH, TPMA 5 (Paris 1958). Liber exceptionum, ed. J. CHATILLON, TPMA 5 (Paris 1958). Opusculum théologiques, ed. J. RIBAILLIER, TPMA 15 (Paris 1967). Selected Writings on Contemplation, tr. C. KIRCHBERGER (New York 1957). The Twelve Patriarchs, The Mystical Ark, and Book Three on the Trinity, tr. G. A. ZINN (New York 1979). Les quatre degrés de la violente charité, ed. G. DUMEIGE (Paris 1955). Les douze Patriarches ou Benjamin Minor, tr. J. CHATILLON and M. DUCHET-SUCHAUX, Sources chrétiennes 419 (Paris 1997). Studies. M.-A. ARIS, Contemplatio: Philosophische Studien zum Traktat Benjamin Maior des Richard von St. Victor: Mit einer verbesserten Edition des Textes, Fuldaer Studien (Frankfurt am Main 1996). S. CHASE, Angelic Wisdom: The Cherubim and the Grace of Contemplation in Richard of St. Victor, Studies in Spirituality and Theology 2 (Notre Dame and London 1995). J. CHATILLON, "Les quatre degrés de la charité d'après Richard de Saint-Victor (I)," Revue d'ascétique et de mystique 20 (1939) 237–264; "Les trois modes de la contemplation selon Richard de Saint-Victor," Revue du moyen-âge latin 4 (1948) 23–52, 343–366; "Richard de Saint-Victor," Dictionnaire de Spiritualité, 13.593–654. G. DUMEIGE, Richard de Saint-Victor et l'idée chrétienne de l'amour (Paris 1952). R. JAVELET, "Thomas Gallus et Richard de Saint-Victor mystiques," Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 19 (1962) 206–233. G. A. ZINN, "Personification Allegory and Visions of Light in Richard of St. Victor's Teaching on Contemplation," University of Toronto Quarterly 46 (1977): 190–214; "Book and Word: The Victorine Background of Bonaventure's Use of Symbols," S. Bonaventura (1274–1974), 2.143–169 (Grottferrata 1973).

[G. A. ZINN]

RICHARD OF SWYNESHED

Oxford philosopher, fl. 1340–55; also known as Swineshead, or Suisseth, and sometimes confused with ROGER OF SWYNESHED. Richard was a secular master, a native of the Lincoln Diocese, born probably in Swineshead, southeast of Lincoln. He was certainly a fellow of Merton College by 1344, and in 1349 was involved in the tumultuous election of John Wyllyot to the chancellorship. On March 29, 1354, he was ordained deacon to the title of fellowship, and was still a member of the college in 1355. His fame rests mainly on the often-printed Liber calculationum, written before 1355. Within a few decades the author, whose name was lost in confusion, was known as “the Calculator.” His renown was greater among mathematicians than among philosophers or humanists. The mathematician G. Cardano (1501–76) included him among the 12 greatest thinkers of all time; and LEIBNIZ wrote (1696): “I would also like to edit the writings of Suisset, commonly known as the Calculator, who introduced mathematics into scholastic philosophy.” In scholastic thought his concern was not with traditional problems of Aristotelian physics, nor with linguistic problems of NOMINALISM. Rather, it was with problems of proportionality in accelerated motion, density, rarity, gravity, heat, and other divisible qualities. His work prepared the way for infinitesimal calculus. See SCIENCE (IN THE MIDDLE AGES).

Bibliography: P. DUHEM, Études sur Léonard de Vinci 3 v. (Paris 1955) 3:412–417, 451–460 and passim. M. CLAGETT, The Science of Mechanics in the Middle Ages (Madison, Wis. 1959). A.B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 3:1836–37.

[J. A. WEISHEIPL]

RICHARD OF WALLINGFORD

Abbot, inventor; b. Wallingford, Berkshire, c. 1292; d. May 23, 1336. He was the son of William, a smith in Wallingford; he studied at Oxford, first in the arts faculty and then in theology. Having entered the BENDICTINES at ST. ALBANS c. 1315, he was appointed abbot in 1328 by papal provision, a year after his first election to the office was declared invalid. As abbot, a position he held until his death, he was a stern disciplinarian and was concerned with the improvement of the finances of the abbey. He is famous for his invention of an astronomical clock, “Albion,” which indicated the times and seasons as well as the movements of the sun, moon, and other planets, and for his writings on mathematical and astronomical subjects, several of which are still in manuscript. These include a treatise on the Albion, Exafernon pronosticorum temporis, De eclipsi solis et lunae, De computo, De sinibus et arcibus, Quadripartitum, and Rectangulum. He also wrote a treatise on the general statutes of the Benedictine Order. He died of leprosy.

Bibliography: C. L. KINGSFORD, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, (London 1885–1900) 16:1091–93. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 vol. (Oxford 1957–59) 3:1967. L. THORNDIKE and P. KIBRE, A Catalogue of Incipits of Mediaeval Scientific Writings in Latin (new ed. Cambridge, Mass. 1963).

[P. KIBRE]

RICHARD RUFUS OF CORNWALL

Franciscan theologian and philosopher; b. England; d. Oxford, c. 1260. Richard entered the order in Paris in 1238, already a master of arts, and was ordained in England the next year. He commented on the Sententiae of Peter Lombard, first at Oxford (1250–53) and later at Paris. For his Oxford commentary, which covers the first three books, Richard had at hand the respective commentaries of ALEXANDER OF HALES, HUGH OF SAINT-CHER, and RICHARD FISHACRE. The Paris commentary is a critical condensation of St. Bonaventure’s commentary. It is likely that Richard wrote also a voluminous commentary on Aristotle’s Metaphysics (Cod. Vat. Lat. 4538). In 1256 he left Paris for Oxford to serve as magister regens of the Franciscan studium there.

Richard possessed an acute and critical mind and an excellent knowledge of Aristotle. On more than one point he anticipates John DUNS SCOTUS. The universal has for him a double aspect: species abstracta, which exists in the mind, and natura communis, which exists extramentally in individuals. All of creation demonstrates the existence of the Creator. Richard denies the validity of the ONTOLOGICAL ARGUMENT, but admits (as Duns Scotus did later) that from the possibility of ens a se one can conclude to its existence. He professes a pronounced VOLUNTARISM. He introduces among the powers of the soul a distinction that is considered to be the first indication of Scotus’s formal distinction. Theses common to the Augustinian-Franciscan school, such as divine illumination and the hylomorphic composition of spiritual creatures, are also found in his writings.

Bibliography: T. NOONE, “Roger Bacon and Richard Rufus on Aristotle’s Metaphysics,” Vivarium 35 (1997) 251–65. R. WOOD, “Angelic Individuation according to Richard Rufus, St. Bonaventure, and St. Thomas Aquinas,” in Individuum and Individualität im Mittelalter (Berlin 1996) 209–29. P. RAEDTS, Richard Rufus of Cornwall and the Tradition of Oxford Theology (Oxford 1987). G. GÁL, “Opiniones Richardi Rufi Cornubiensis a censore reprobatae,” in Franciscan Studies Annual 8, 1975 (St. Bonaventure, N.Y. 1976) 136–93.

[G. GÁL]

RICHARDSON, LAURENCE, BL.

Priest and martyr; vere Johnson; b. Great Crosby, Lancashire, England; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London), May 30, 1582. Laurence, the son of Richard Johnson, was a fellow at Brasenose College, Oxford (c. 1569–72) before beginning his seminary studies at Douai. He was ordained at Cateau-Cambresis (March 23, 1577), then left for the mission field in Lancashire (July 27, 1577). En route to France he was arrested in London and held in Newgate Prison until his indictment on Nov. 16, 1581. Thereafter he was committed to the Queen's Bench Prison and condemned (Nov. 17, 1581) on the trumped up charge of conspiring against the Crown in Rome and Rheims. Following his sentencing, he was held in the Tower of London where he had no bedding for two months. He was beatified by Pope Leo XIII.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: B. CAMM, ed., Lives of the English Martyrs, (New York 1905), II, 500–35. R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969), I, nos. 12, 13, 14. J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

RICHARDSON, WILLIAM, BL.

Priest, last martyr under Elizabeth I; alias Anderson; b. Wales (Vales), near Sheffield, West Riding, Yorkshire (per Challoner) or in Lancashire (per Valladolid diary), England; hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London), Feb. 17, 1603. He studied for the priesthood (1692–94) at Valladolid, Spain, and was ordained at Seville in 1594. He was betrayed by a trusted friend, arrested at Clement's Inn, imprisoned at Newgate, and prosecuted hastily. At his execution about a week after his apprehension, he prayed for the queen, then died cheerfully. He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

RICHELIEU, ARMAND JEAN DU PLESSIS DE

Cardinal, minister, and head of the royal council of Louis XIII from 1624 to 1642; b. Paris, Sept. 9, 1585; d. Paris, Dec. 4, 1642. He prepared the way for absolute monarchy in France and for French predominance in Europe.

His father, Francois du Plessis, was at the court of Henry III and died in 1590 in the service of HENRY IV.

Armand Jean Du Plessis de Cardinal Richelieu, engraving.

His mother, Suzanne de la Porte, was the daughter of a lawyer in Parlement and lady in waiting to the queen. On his father's death Richelieu's mother withdrew from Paris to begin the education of her five children. In 1597 Armand began his studies in the humanities at the University of Paris and then, after studies in philosophy, went to the military academy to prepare for a military career. In 1605 his older brother Alphonse, destined for the bishopric of Luçon, which Henry IV reserved to the family, became a Carthusian, and Richelieu began studies in theology to prepare himself for the bishopric. In 1606 he went to Rome and obtained his bulls of institution with a dispensation for his age (21). After being consecrated bishop on April 17, 1607, he returned to defend a thesis in theology at the Sorbonne. The next year he left for Luçon, where he worked to restore the material and moral ravages of the Wars of Religion. He convoked a synod, began a seminary, called in the Capuchins and Oratorians, and wrote his Instruction du chrétien, with lessons on the articles of the Credo to be read by pastors in Sunday instructions and notes for the clergy as well. He was elected deputy of the clergy for the Estates General of 1614 and gave the concluding address to the King, calling for acceptance of the Council of Trent, the naming of ecclesiastics to the royal council, and religious toleration for Protestants. After gaining the good graces of the queen mother, MARIE DE MÉDICIS, he became secretary of state in 1616. With the fall of her favorite, Concini, Richelieu was exiled to Avignon but then recalled to work for her reconciliation with King Louis XIII. He received the cardinal's hat in 1622 for his success. In April 1624 Louis XIII yielded to his mother's request and reappointed Richelieu to the council, of which he became head a few months later, coming into the trust and esteem of the King. The first successes of his policy strengthened his position, which at first was uncertain, but also aroused the ill will of the queen mother, who in 1630 asked the King to choose between Richelieu and her. Richelieu was on the point of being dismissed when he definitely regained the confidence of Louis XIII (Nov. 11, 1630, journée des dupes). Marie de Médicis went abroad and Richelieu governed without a rival.

Although his health suffered from his work and his excessive nervous tension, Richelieu brought to the King's service an incomparable intelligence and an adamant will. When he took office, France was threatened with internal division and confronted abroad by the House of HAPSBURG and its gains in Europe. In 18 years these dangers were overcome.

Domestic Policy. Henry IV had to give Protestants not only freedom of conscience but considerable political privileges as well, in particular garrisoned fortresses, such as the port of La Rochelle. The Protestants constituted a kind of federated republic within the monarchy and prepared to receive foreign help. In 1628, after a 14-month siege that he personally directed, Richelieu took La Rochelle, and the next year occupied the last Protestant strongholds. The Edict of Alais in 1629 abolished the political privileges of the HUGUENOTS while leaving them religious freedom.

The fight against the rebellious nobility took longer. Richelieu and the King mercilessly eradicated the plots of discontented nobles, which often were supported by the King's brother, Gaston d'Orléans. Chalais in 1626 conspired against Richelieu, Montmorency in 1632 raised a rebellion in Languedoc, Cinq-Mars in 1642 signed a treaty with Spain, and his friend, de Thou, failed to denounce him—and they were beheaded. Richelieu also had the King enforce laws that made duelling punishable by death (Montmorency-Bouteville was executed in 1626). Apart from the punishment of conspiracy, in the provinces, where commissaires en mission or intendants kept an eye on governors, parlements, and provincial Estates, several castles were razed in conformity with the wishes of the Estates General. Crushing taxation frequently gave rise to popular revolts fostered or tolerated by local notables. In 1639 Chancellor Séguier himself was dispatched to Normandy to put down the revolt of the va-nu-pieds, and for a while the parlement of Rouen was suspended. Finally the Parlement of Paris, which tended to control royal authority by its remonstrances and the modification of royal laws, had to yield. An edict of 1641 placed strict limitations on Parlement's traditional right of remonstrance.

Foreign Policy. Amid this tension of national energies Richelieu began the fight to bring to a halt Hapsburg successes. His aim was to weaken the house of Austria and restore equilibrium in Europe to the advantage of France and her allies—not, as one often reads, to give France a frontier on the Rhine. He began by giving diplomatic support and subsidies to all the enemies of Spain. In England in 1625 he arranged the marriage of Louis XIII's sister and Charles I, who earlier had sought a Spanish Infanta. In Switzerland, Richelieu restored Protestant Grisons to power in the Valtelline, where Catholic inhabitants had rebelled with Spanish support. Valtelline Pass gave Milan communications with Spanish possessions to the north. In Italy, Richelieu sought to unite all the independent states, including the papacy, in an anti-Spanish league, and he forced a passage through the Duchy of Savoy to assure the duke of Nevers the inheritance of Mantua, which the Emperor Ferdinand II contested (1629–30). He supported the Dutch against Spain, and Mansfeld and Christian IV, King of Denmark, against the Emperor. He loosed the King of Sweden, Gustavus II Adolphus, against the Emperor (Treaty of Bärwald, January 1631). At the same time he sought to detach Catholic Bavaria from the Emperor's cause (Treaty of Fontainebleau, May 1631). The incursion of Gustavus into Germany with his consequent victories put an end to FERDINAND II's efforts for monarchical centralization and Catholic restoration. Gustavus's death at Lützen (November 1632) freed Richelieu of an ally who had become dangerous but forced him to go to war openly. Louis XIII had already occupied Lorraine when the Swedish defeat at Nordlingen forced Richelieu to send French armies not yet prepared into combat (war declared on Spain, May 19, 1635). Burgundy was invaded and Paris threatened (1636). For several years victory and defeat alternated on land and sea. But Richelieu reorganized the army and gradually built a navy, which was nonexistent when he came to power. Military success came after 1640: Spain was busied with revolts in Portugal and Catalonia, and French armies advanced in Artois to the north and in Rousillon to the south. The treaties of WESTPHALIA and the Pyrenees, concluded by Jules MAZARIN, later brought to fulfillment the political work of Richelieu.

These successes were not the result of armed force alone. The cardinal's diplomacy probably played a greater role. Richelieu as a matter of principle negotiated ceaselessly. His agents crossed Europe constantly on all kinds of missions: to strengthen old alliances and gain new ones and to bring back reports. His most noteworthy aide in this was Father Joseph (LE CLERC DU TREMBLAY).

Richelieu's political work was not limited to Europe. The navy allowed him to send expeditions overseas and to found French settlements in the Antilles, Senegal, Madagascar, and especially in Canada. England had taken advantage of the break with France at the time of the capture of La Rochelle to occupy French settlements in the St. Lawrence Valley. Richelieu regained them in 1632 and founded the Company of 100 Associates to develop the new lands (New France). He sent Capuchins and Jesuits to convert the natives, who were to be treated as Frenchmen.

The World of Letters. Richelieu's respect for public opinion and the power of the press was still more modern. He was concerned with the press and himself wrote works and accounts of events to defend his policy before France and the world. The Mercure François and the Gazette under his control and with his collaboration became quasi-official journals. His concern for French letters was more disinterested. He founded and was the first protector of the Académie Française. In 1622 the Sorbonne made him guardian, and he rebuilt all its buildings and endowed it with the chapel in which he is buried.

Religious Character. The religious character of the cardinal, the ally of Protestants, has been much debated. As bishop of Luçon, he was a model pastor. When he became minister, he resigned his see but considered himself somewhat the head of the Church in France. One of his first concerns was to reunite the Protestants. Devout Catholics were disappointed in his religious policy, for Richelieu felt that in matters of conscience, constraint should be avoided, and he maintained the religious liberties of the Edict of NANTES. But he worked, and had others work, to win Protestants by persuasion, fostering missions in Calvinist areas and protecting the controversialist Veron. After publishing in 1618 Les principaux points de la foi catholique défendus contre . . . les quatre ministres de Charenton, he worked through his whole ministry at his Traité . . . pour convertir ceux qui se sont séparés de l'Église, which appeared only after his death and in which he sought to convert Protestants with the help of Scripture, the Fathers, and Protestant authors as well. His relations with Rome were at times strained, due to his Protestant alliances, his attempts to obtain a cardinalate for Father Joseph and later for Mazarin, his attempt to consolidate the orders of Cluny, Cîteaux, and the Premonstratensians under one head, his plan to dominate the French clergy by obtaining a long-term legate in Paris, and the taxation he imposed on the clergy.

He was fortunate to have to deal with Urban VIII, who was favorable to France and only reluctantly put up with Spanish hegemony in Italy. Besides, Richelieu had given testimony of his faith. He made E. RICHER retract his anti-Roman theses, he made peace between the bishops and the religious orders, and he looked for a middle way in the dispute between Gallicans and Ultramontanes. He ordered the imprisonment at Vincennes of the abbot of Saint-Cyran, a reformer with imprecise and suspect doctrines. Richelieu's Traité de la perfection du chrétien (a rather dry expression of the traditional doctrine of Catholic asceticism) and the consecration of France to the Blessed Virgin (by Louis XIII in 1637, but inspired by Richelieu) open perspectives on his religious character, which remains to be studied.

Richelieu left a Political Testament (ed. Paris 1947); Memoirs (3 v. 1837–38, 10 v. 1907–31); and letters, instructions, and papers (8 v. 1853–77).

Bibliography: G. HANOTAUX and DE LA FORCE, Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu, 6 v. (Paris 1893–1947). H. BELLOC, Richelieu: A Study (Garden City, N.Y. 1929). K. J. BURCKHARDT, Richelieu: Der Aufstieg zur Macht (Munich 1936). V. L. TAPIÉ, La France de Louis XIII et de Richelieu (Paris 1952).

[P. BLET]

RICHER, EDMOND

French canonist and theorist of Gallicanism; b. Chesley, near Chaource, then in the Diocese of Langres, Sept. 15, 1559; d. Paris Nov. 29, 1631. From a poor peasant family, he worked as a domestic at the Collège du Cardinal Lemoine during his studies there. Attaining his doctorate at the Sorbonne (c. 1590), he was named rector of the Collège du Cardinal Lemoine in 1595, and in 1602, syndic of the Sorbonne. In defending the rights of the university against the encroachments of the religious orders, especially the Jesuits, he professed a basic and intransigent GALLICANISM. The publication of his treatise De ecclesiastica et civili potestate (Paris 1611) earned him the hostility of the nuncio Ubaldini and of Cardinal du Peron, who procured the condemnation of his book and had him deposed from his office (1612). The controversies continued, and Richer by way of many booklets had to defend his positions, especially against the ultramontanist professor André Duval. Finally, RICHELIEU intervened and forced Richer to sign a half-retraction of his book on Dec. 7, 1629. In his various works, Richer claims the superiority of the councils over the popes; the pope is only the ministerial head of the Church; the deposit of revelation should be confided to the faithful, as well as the hierarchy; the bishops should have immediate jurisdiction, independent of the pope; and temporal governments should be absolute masters in their own domain. These ideas were adopted by the Jansenists of the 18th century.

Richer is the author also of an edition of Jean Gerson (Paris 1606) and a Historia conciliorum generalium (Cologne 1880).

Bibliography: E. PUYOL, Edmond Richer, 2 v. (Paris 1876). H. RAAB, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1299. H. R. GUGGISBERG, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 6 v. (Tübingen 1957–63) 5:1093. J. CARREYRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 13.2:2698–2702, bibliog.

[L. COGNET]

RICHTER, FRANZ XAVER

Prominent composer of the Mannheim school; b. Hollerschau (Moravia), Dec. 1, 1709; d. Strasbourg, Sept. 12, 1789. After musical studies, probably in Vienna and Italy, Richter became concurrently vice chapelmaster to the prince-abbot of Kempten (Allgäu) and Elector Karl Theodor of the Palatinate in 1740, from which year dates his productive career as composer and teacher. After 22 years at the Mannheim court chapel (1747–69), he became cathedral choirmaster in Strasbourg. His early compositions were for the church; at Mannheim his creative activity naturally centered upon orchestral and chamber music in the current of the Bohemian-Mannheim development; and at Strasbourg he returned to his first genre, creating a sacred style similar in form, texture, and sonority, in sweetness and expressivity, to the Bohemian symphonic style (as in the work of V. J. Tomášek, J. L. Dusek, A. Gyrowetz, and J. A. and L. A. Koželuch), but also related to the Viennese baroque church tradition, especially in the aria movements of his cantata Masses. Together with these characteristics of the newer music, a stricter style along the principles of J. J. FUX may also be found, and his Missa Laetare in contrapuncto posita (1744) is a masterpiece of stile antico, heavily laden with canons, fugues, mirror fugues, and multiple counterpoints. In all he composed more than 40 Masses and 50 motets, as well as many cantatas, Office music, and other vocal works. In his theoretical works he followed Fux and M. Spiess, who placed the resources of stile antico and stile moderno at the service of an intensified mode of expression for church music.

Bibliography: W. BARTH, Die Messenkomposition Franz Xaver Richters 1709–1789 (Munich 1941). W. GÄSSLER, Die Sinfonie von F. X. Richter (Munich 1941). F. X. MATTHIAS, "Thematischer Katalog der im Strassburger Münsterarchiv aufbewahrten kirchenmusikalischen Werke F. X. Richters," Riemann-Festschrift, ed. C. H. MENNICKE (Leipzig 1909). R. MÜNSTER, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 11:455–460. Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, ed. N. SLONIMSKY (5th, rev. ed. New York 1958) 1338. D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge 1996) 743. J. REUTTER, Studien zur Kirchenmusik

Franz Xaver Richters (1709–1789) 2 vols. (Frankfurt am Main 1993). N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, Eighth Edition (New York 1992) 1507–1508. R. WÜRTZ, "Franz Xaver Richter" in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, vol. 15, ed. S. SADIE, (New York 1980) 846–847.

[K. G. FELLERER]

RICKABY, JOSEPH

Jesuit philosopher and theologian; b. Everingham, Yorkshire, Nov. 20, 1845; d. North Wales, Dec. 18, 1932. He studied at the University of London prior to entrance into the Society of Jesus at Manresa, then lectured in ethics and natural law at Stonyhurst from 1879 to 1896. His work there led him to write Moral Philosophy in 1888, a sharp, polemical defense of the doctrine of Aquinas against EMPIRICISM and HEGELIANISM. Between 1896 and 1899 he served the society in both Oxford and London, and in 1899 joined the staff at Campion Hall, Oxford, where he remained until 1924. In 1905 he published an annotated translation of St. Thomas's Summa contra gentiles, which proved to be his most representative work. After 1926 Rickaby retired to St. Bueno's College, North Wales. His last work was a translation of Rodriguez's Christian Virtues and Perfection. Between 1870 and 1930 he published 60 articles in the Month and wrote nearly 30 books. (See SCHOLASTICISM)

Bibliography: Month 161 (1933) 170–175. J. J. DELANEY and J. E. TOBIN, Dictionary of Catholic Biography (Garden City, N.Y. 1961) 991.

[F. J. ROENSCH]

RICKE, JODOCO

Franciscan missionary, builder and educator; b. of a noble family of Ghent, Belgium, 1495; d. Popayan, New Granada, 1575. According to Diego de Trujillo, he came to Peru from Nicaragua while Pizarro was still at Tumbes waiting to go to Cajamarca to meet the Inca. Ricke came to Quito with his fellow citizen Pedro Gosseal, in the retinue of Don Pedro de Alvarado. Although he is not included in the list of those who took up domicile in Quito, his name appears among those to whom ground-plots were distributed. About 30,000 square meters were assigned to the Franciscans for the church, monastery, and garden, on the site where the palace of the Inca had been located. Friar Jodoco drew up the plan of the church and the buildings and directed construction until most of the work was finished. He was the leader in the founding and operation of the Colegio de San Andrés, which trained the native peoples in all types of crafts and trades. In both educational and construction work, he had as collaborators his fellow countrymen Pedro Gosseal, Germán de Alemán, and Jácome Flamenco, and he was helped by educated natives headed by Jorge de la Cruz Mitima and his son Francisco Morocho. Civezza says that Friar Jodoco taught the natives to plow with oxen, to make yokes and carts, to do arithmetic, to read and write in Spanish, to play musical instruments, and to sing both with the pipe organ and unaccompanied.

Bibliography: J. M. VARGAS, Arte quiteño colonial (Quito 1944). J. G. NAVARRO, Artes plásticas ecuatorianas (Mexico City 1945).

[J. M. VARGAS]

RICOEUR, PAUL

Philosopher; author and lecturer; b. Valence, France, Feb. 27, 1913. Baptized into the Reformed community, Ricoeur's early life is bound up with the loss of both his parents, his mother six months after his birth, his father during World War I. His early philosophical education at the University of Rennes brought him into contact with the reflexive philosophy of Lachelier and Lagneau with their concern for the grounds of authentic subjectivity. This concern was to become the touchstone of his later philosophy.

At the Sorbonne for doctoral studies Ricoeur became part of the Friday sessions of Gabriel MARCEL, the Christian existentialist philosopher, who introduced him to the works of Edmund HUSSERL and PHENOMENOLOGY. After becoming agrégé in 1935, he married his childhood friend, Yvonne Lejas, and began to teach first in Colmar, then in Lorient. Ricoeur was drafted into the army in the general mobilization and became a prisoner of war in the early stages of the Second World War. He was interned in several camps in Pomerania until 1945. There he read the works of Karl JASPERS, translated in the margin Ideen I of Husserl, and taught philosophy to his fellow prisoners. The results were published in the postwar years: Karl Jaspers et la philosophie de l'existence (with Mikel Dufrenne) (1947), Gabriel Marcel et Karl Jaspers: philosophie du mystère et philosophie du paradoxe (1948), and the translation of Ideen I (1950). During the same time his interest in political philosophy led him to read Hegel. Between 1945 and 1948 he taught at Cévenol college in Chambon-sur-Lignon during which time he became known as an expert in Husserl's phenomenology [see his collection of articles in Husserl (1967)]. In 1948 he was awarded the chair of philosophy at the University of Strasbourg. While there, he defended his doctoral thesis on the phenomenology of the will [Le volontaire et l'involontaire (1950); Freedom and Nature (1966)] and contributed frequently to the periodicals Christianisme social and Esprit.

Toward Hermeneutical Phenomenology. In his doctoral dissertation Ricoeur projected his life's work. Guided by the famous Husserlian epochē, a bracketing-out procedure in order to arrive at the roots of phenomena, he understood the task of such a phenomenology of the will as (1) a pure phenomenology of the will abstracted from the question of the fault (negation, evil) and transcendence [Le volontaire et l'involontaire]; (2) a phenomenology of evil as seen through human fallibility [L'homme faillible (1960), Fallible Man (1965)] and through the myths and symbols of evil, sin, and guilt [La symbolique du mal (1960), The Symbolism of Evil (1967)]; (3) a poetics of the will: a reflection on the human self as responsible, fragile, between sameness and ipseity, as other, and as grace and gift of freedom [see Ricoeur's most recent works on textual and practical hermeneutics, temporality, narrativity, metaphor, imagination, action/passion and the self, and the Bible].

In 1956 Ricoeur accepted a position at the Sorbonne and began to live in a commune (Murs Blancs), inspired by the social mission of Christianity. Experiencing deeply the malaise of the university, he transferred in 1966 to Nanterre, briefly accepting the post of dean (1969–70). In the turmoil of the democratization movement at Nanterre, he was physically attacked and the leftist philosophical community was so violent in their rejection of him that he expatriated himself to the University of Louvain. Three years later, he returned to Nanterre, but he also began to commute to North America (Montreal, Yale, and especially Chicago). Philosophically these were fruitful years. He kept up a constant dialogue with the major currents of thought in the 60s and 70s such as Freudian psychoanalysis, STRUCTURALISM, DECONSTRUCTION, and Anglo-American analytic philosophy. His own philosophical roots became more firmly established in the erstwhile reflexive philosophy (Nabert), the hermeneutical phenomenology configured out of Husserl, GADAMER, and HEIDEGGER, the action theory of Habermas, and analytic philosophy. These gave rise to a number of books: De l'interprétation (1965), Freud and Philosophy (1970); La métaphore vive (1975), The Rule of Metaphor (1977); Temps et récit, volumes 1–3 (1983, 1984, 1985), Time and Narrative, volumes 1–3 (1984, 1985, 1988), and Soi-même comme un autre (1990), Oneself as Another (1992); Amour et justice. Liebe und Gerechtigkeit (1990); and an avalanche of articles, the most important of which are collected in Histoire et vérité (1955, 1964, 1990), History and Truth (1965); Le conflit des interprétations (1969), The Conflict of Interpretations (1974); A l'école de la phénoménologie (1986); Du texte à l'action (1986), From Text to Action (1991); Lectures 1: Autour de la politique (1991); Lectures 2: La contrée de la philosophie (1992); Lectures 3:

Aux frontières de la philosophie (1994); Le juste (1995); Réflexion faite (1995); Penser la Bible (with A. Lacocque) (1998), Thinking Biblically (1998).

Distinctive Traits. First among the distinctive traits of Ricoeur's philosophy must be mentioned his respectful dialogue with conflicting philosophies. Ricoeur believes strongly in the dialectic process of truth. Truth, he believes, is not immediately available. It can be searched out in terms of the traces found in the writings of those who have most intensely struggled with the question of truth. Conflicting philosophies are probed not to execute a coup de grâce, but to exploit their sometimes unspoken, constructive potential. His philosophy forges its own path in debate with the foremost philosophers of the second half of the 20th century: Heidegger, Husserl, Lévinas, Sartre, Lévi-Strauss, Lacan, Althusser, Gadamer, Habermas, Derrida, and Davidson.

Second, interpreters of Ricoeur have found it difficult to uncover a unifying theme. Ricoeur has compared himself to an intellectual bricoleur, answering questions left unanswered by his previous writings or occasioned by the themes of congresses and symposia. This so-called tinkering with a wide range of topics has led commentators to understand Ricoeur through such themes as the hermeneutical method, the imagination, the subject, language, ethics, literary theory, meaningful action. However, aided by Oneself as Another, it is possible to trace an underlying trajectory of a practical philosophy. From his earliest project of a philosophy of the will, Ricoeur has consistently sought, however great the detours, to outline the possibilities of authentic subjectivity. This search for a practical philosophy led him originally from phenomenology to hermeneutics and later from primacy of language to primacy of action. Although subscribing to an intense suspicion of the deceptive claims of rationality and despite the current privileging of negation and nothing, Ricoeur upholds the possibility of the affirmation of life, the desire and effort of human existing, and the human projection of truth, happiness, and pleasure. His is a philosophical witness to Augustinian hope. This renewed practical philosophy is at core an ethical venture: the search for the good life lived in just institutions with and for others. In Oneself as Another this leads to a hermeneutics of the self: a search for what remains after the demise of the Cartesian self-constituting ego and of the proclaimed death of the self by deconstructionism in the 20th century.

A third trait is Ricoeur's disavowal of any attempt to totalize. He renounces Hegel's great narrative of the final synthesis. In his early writings he fulminates against the violent totalizations of state and church. Human knowing and action in history are only mediately available and demand the endless detours by way of its signs and traces. For Ricoeur philosophy is hermeneutical. Its epistemology and ontology are attestations of belief and conviction in the truthfulness of the self. Its politics is a politics of fragility. Its religious witness is a testimony to the "available believable" in the face of the ravages of evil and suffering in the 20th century. This capacity to engage the current intellectual climate with suspicion but without skepticism may well be Ricoeur's enduring attraction.

Ricoeur's prodigious activity and his brilliant engagement of the philosophical debate gained for him the recognition in France as one of the foremost contemporary philosophers. Elsewhere, particularly in North America, Ricoeur steadily increased his influence particularly among theologians and literary critics.

See Also: HERMENEUTICS.

Bibliography: P. ANDERSON, Ricoeur and Kant: Philosophy of the Will (Atlanta 1993). S. H. CLARK, Paul Ricoeur (London 1990). B. DAUENHAEUR, Paul Ricoeur: The Promise and Risks of Politics (Lanham, Md. 1998). F. DOSSE, Paul Ricoeur: Le sens d'une vie (Paris 1997). D. JERVELINA, The Cogito and Hermeneutics: The Question of the Subject in Ricoeur (Dordrecht 1990). D. E. KLEMM and W. SCHWEIKER, eds., Meanings in Texts and Actions: Questioning Ricoeur (Charlottesville 1993). O. MONGIN, Paul Ricoeur (Paris 1994). J. PUTTI, Theology as Hermeneutics: Paul Ricoeur's Theory of Text Interpretation and Method in Theology (San Francisco 1994). J. VAN DEN HENGEL, The Home of Meaning: The Hermeneutics of the Subject of Paul Ricoeur (Lanham 1982). K. J. VAN-HOOZER, Biblical Narrative in the Philosophy of Paul Ricoeur (Cambridge 1990). F. D. VANSINA, Paul Ricoeur: A Primary and Secondary Bibliography (1935-1984) (Leuven 1985).

[J. VAN DEN HENGEL]

RICOLDUS DE MONTE CROCE

Missionary and writer; b. Florence c. 1243; d. Florence, Oct. 31, 1320. He entered the Dominicans at S. Maria Novella, Florence, in 1267 and taught at Pisa, Prato, and Florence (1272-88). In 1288 he began his journey to the East, traveling to Acre, to Galilee, and as far as Baghdad. He worked for the reunion of the JACOBITES in Mosul, and of the NESTORIANS in Baghdad, where he disputed also with the Muslims. While in the capital (1291) he received the news of the fall of Acre and saw booty from the captured city pass through the markets of Baghdad. The fall of Acre occasioned his Epistolae ad ecclesiam triumphantem, a series of letters of lamentation addressed to Our Lord, the Blessed Virgin Mary, and the saints, and to Nicholas of Hunnapes, the patriarch of Jerusalem, who had just been killed in the defense of Acre. While in the East he wrote also an Itinerarium, in which he left an account of his journeys and of his reflections on the various peoples and customs he had encountered. This work contains the first Western Christian account of the MANDAEAN sect. The date of his return to Europe is uncertain, but he was back in Florence by Oct. 10, 1301. His Impugnatio Alcorani dates probably from the period 1301–11 and was widely used by later Catholic apologists against the errors of ISLAM. It was published with slightly varying titles in a number of the late 15th- and early 16th-century editions. In 1315 Ricoldus was given the title of preacher general by his order. Five years later he died at S. Maria Novella.

Bibliography: Works. Epistolae V ad ecclesiam triumphantem, ed. R. RÖHRICHT in Archives de l'Orient latin 2 (1884) 258–296; Confutatio Alcorani, Gr. tr. D. KYDONES in Patrologia Graeca 154:1035–1152; Itinerarium, ed. J. C. M. LAURENT in Peregrinatores medii aevi quatuor (Leipzig 1864). Literature. P. MANDONNET, Revue biblique 2 (1893) 44–61, 182–202, 584–607. U. MONNERET DE VILLARD, Il Libro della peregrinazione nelle parti d'oriente di frate Ricoldo da Montecroce (Rome 1948). J. QUÉTIF and S. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (Paris 1719–23) 1.2:504–506. H. C. PUECH, Revue d'histoire des religions 135 (1949) 250–254. A. WALTZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 8:1303–04. Archivum Fratrum Praedicatorum 8–30 (1938–60), passim.

[P. M. STARRS]

RIDDER, CHARLES H.

American journalist and publisher; b. New York City, June 11, 1888; d. Poughkeepsie, N. Y., Oct. 10, 1964. He was the son of Henry and Lena (Croker) Ridder and was related on the maternal side to Robert Emmet, the Irish patriot; his father had been cofounder of the New York Catholic News. After graduation from De Witt Clinton high school (1905) and Packard College (1908), he entered journalism and joined the staff of the Catholic News (1910) to gain experience in all phases of publishing. In 1914 he married Alice Lytle; they had four sons and a daughter. At his father's death (1936), Ridder, who was general manager of the News, became its publisher, a post he retained until his death.

He was a member of the Catholic Press Association (CPA), which he served as treasurer and from 1938 to 1940 as president, and he aided materially in the establishment of the National Catholic Welfare Conference (NCWC) News Service, which developed out of the CPA News Service. Active in organizing and supporting lay charitable work in New York, he was one of the founders of the first Catholic boys' club in that city. When this organization later developed into the Catholic Youth Organization, Ridder was a member of its original board of directors. He was also a member of the board of the Casita Maria Settlement in East Harlem, founded by Elizabeth Sullivan, whom Ridder married (1944) three years after the death of his first wife.

Ridder's historical interests were extensive. He was treasurer of the U.S. Catholic Historical Society (1943–53) and its two-term president (1954–56); he contributed to its Historical Records and Studies. Twice knighted by Pius XII—Knight of Malta (1950) and Knight of the Holy Sepulchre (1952)—he was honored again by John XXIII, who made him Knight of the Holy Sepulchre with Star in 1959.

[L. GILHOOLEY]

RIDLEY, NICHOLAS

Bishop of Rochester and London and prominent English reformer; b. Unthank Hall near Willemoteswick, Northumberland, c. 1500; d. Oxford, Oct. 16, 1555. As a descendant of an ancient family of knights, he was educated at Cambridge, where he received the master of arts (1516). After further study at the Sorbonne and at Louvain, he returned to Cambridge as a fellow of Pembroke Hall (c. 1530); chaplain to Thomas CRANMER, Archbishop of Canterbury (1537); vicar of Herne, Kent (1538); master of Pembroke Hall (1540); and chaplain to Henry VIII (1540). As proctor to Cambridge (1534), Ridley had signed the decree against papal supremacy; and a few months after the accession of King Edward VI, he was made bishop of Rochester (1547) through Cranmer's influence. He was one of the principal theologians among the English reformers and was instrumental in establishing Protestantism at Cambridge. He assisted in compiling the Book of COMMON PRAYER. Upon becoming bishop of London (1550), he ordered all altars in his diocese removed and replaced with tables. He denied the doctrine of transubstantiation. He supported Lady Jane Grey in 1553 as King Edward's successor, and soon after Queen Mary's accession, he was arrested. He was tried for heresy and convicted, and with Hugh LATIMER he was burned at the stake before Balliol Hall, Oxford.

Bibliography: Works, ed. H. CHRISTMAS (Cambridge, Eng. 1841), with biographical sketch. P. HUGHES, The Reformation in England, rev. ed., 3 v. in 1 (New York 1963). L. B. SMITH, Tudor Prelates and Politics, 1536–1558 (Princeton 1953). M. SCHMIDT, Die Religion und Geschichte und Gegenwart, 6 v. (Tübingen 1957–63) 5:1099. S. LEE, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 16:1172–1175.

[D. J. GUNDERSON]

RIEVAULX, ABBEY OF

Former English Cistercian abbey (Rievallis, Rievalensis abbatia), founded in 1131 by Walter Espec with monks from CLAIRVAUX, sent by St. BERNARD with his secretary, William, at their head. It lay three miles north of Helmesley in the Archdiocese of York. It soon made foundations at Wardon in Bedfordshire (1135), MELROSE in Scotland (1136), DUNDRENNAN in Scotland (1142), Revesby in Lincolnshire (1143), and Rufford in Nottingham (1146–48). Under its third abbot, AELRED, the community grew until it numbered 150 monks and 500 lay brothers: the buildings soon became too small, and new ones were erected, the old church forming the transept of the new. A strong literary tradition, formed by the first abbot, William, was fostered by Aelred, who wrote historical, philosophical, and theological works; it was continued into the 13th century by Walter Daniel, Aelred's biographer, by Thorald, Maurice of Durham, and Matthew of Rievaulx. The library catalogue mentions others also who left behind glossed psalters. Historical writing was discouraged by Ernardus, eighth abbot, though he stimulated WILLIAM OF NEWBURGH, a neighboring Augustinian, to undertake such work; poetry, though condemned by the general chapter of 1199, lingered on a little longer.

Ruins of Rievaulx Abbey, North Yorkshire, England. (©Eric Crichton/CORBIS)

Rievaulx always held a commanding place among the Cistercians of the north of England, and its abbots were constantly called upon to carry out commissions both for the general chapter and for the king. Its period of greatest expansion covered the 12th and 13th centuries. At the beginning of the 14th century it suffered greatly from depredations by the Scots, particularly in 1322 when King Edward II, surprised during a meal there, fled to York for safety, leaving his silver plate and treasures at the monastery. The pursuing Scots plundered and destroyed the abbey, its buildings, and belongings. During the 15th century the abbots shared with the abbots of FOUNTAINS the office of reformer for the northern province; reports of their activities, sent annually to the abbot of CÎTEAUX, are preserved in the archives at Dijon. They fostered the studium of St. Bernard at OXFORD, and a monk of Rievaulx, John Pomfret, was supervisor there

c. 1456. At the time of the Dissolution, Edward Kirkby, the abbot, not being well disposed toward the impending religious changes, was removed from his post by the royal commissioners. The community would not accept this as a canonical deposition and refused to elect a successor. The abbot of Byland was ordered by the king to install another abbot; when only seven out of 23 monks would agree to vote, Richard Blyton of Rufford was intruded. The house finally surrendered Dec. 3, 1538, its value being £278 10s.

Bibliography: W. DUGDALE, Monasticon Anglicanum (London 1655–73) 5:274–286. Cartularium abbatiae de Rievallae ordinis cisterciensis, ed. J. C. ATKINSON (Surtees Society 83; Newcastle 1889). Yorkshire Star Chamber Proceedings (Yorkshire Archaeological Society 45; 1911). J. M. CANIVEZ, ed., Statuta capitulorum generalium ordinis cisterciensis, 8 v. (Louvain 1933–41). The Victoria History of the County of York, ed. W. PAGE, 4 v. and index (London 1907–13) v.3. C. H. TALBOT, ‘‘The Centrum Sententiae of Walter Daniel,’’ Sacris erudiri, 11 (Bruges 1960) 266–383.

[C. H. TALBOT]

RIGBY, JOHN, ST.

Serving man, lay martyr; b. Harrock, near Wigan, Lancashire, England, c. 1570; d. St. Thomas’ Watering’s, Southwark, June 21, 1600. He came from a family of respected lineage, though impoverished through its years of loyalty to Catholicism. His lack of formal education and his destitution forced him to enter domestic service. While in the employ of a Protestant household, he occasionally conformed by attending their religious services. Later as a gentleman servant of the Catholic Huddlestons of Sawston Hill, near Cambridge, he came in contact with Father John GERARD, then a prisoner in the Clink. Gerard’s influence and the example of the Huddlestons effected a reconciliation of Rigby with the Church, either through Gerard or St. John JONES. Rigby desired to become a Jesuit lay brother, though there is no record of any formal entrance into the Society of Jesus. This desire may have been inspired by the example of St. Nicholas OWEN, who built a hiding hole at Sawston. About two years after Rigby’s reconciliation, he was sent to the Middlesex sessions of the Old Bailey to plead the illness of his master’s widowed daughter, Mrs. Fortescue, as the reason for her nonappearance on a recusant charge. His firm answers impressed the aldermen; and when asked about his own religion, Rigby in his direct way replied that he had been reconciled to Catholicism, which was a capital offense. He was sent to Newgate prison, and after interrogations in which he rejected pardon on the condition of his attendance in the queen’s church, he was sentenced to death. On his way to execution he was met by the Earl of Rutland, who admired his courage and counseled him in vain to conform. In his execution, which was performed with barbarity, his strong physique prolonged the agony. After the hangman had cut him down he stood dazed, and when pushed over was heard to say distinctly ‘‘God forgive you. Jesus, receive my soul.’’ A man standing by pressed his heel on Rigby’s throat to stop further speech. Rigby was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929, and canonized by Paul VI on Oct. 25, 1970 as one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

Feast: June 21; Oct. 25 (Feast of the 40 Martyrs of England and Wales); May 4 (Feast of the English Martyrs in England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: J. GERARD, The Autobiography of a Hunted Priest, tr. P. CARAMAN (New York 1952). Seven Lancastrian Martyrs (Postulation Pamphlet; London 1960). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 2:611–612. R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969), 238–45. T. WORTHINGTON, A Lancashire Man: The Martyrdom of John Rigby of Southwark, ed. C. A. NEWDIGATE (London 1928). J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time (New York 1961) 5:420. J. E. PAUL, Blessed John Rigby (Postulation Pamphlet; London 1964).

[G. FITZHERBERT]

RIGGS, THOMAS LAWRASON

First Catholic chaplain at Yale University, New Haven, Conn.; b. New London, Conn., June 28, 1888; d. New Haven, April 26, 1943. He was the son of Elisha Francis Riggs, known for his charitable works and for his advocacy of a restored Gregorian chant. After his early education at home, Riggs was prepared for college at Westminster School in Simsbury, Connecticut. At this Episcopal institution, his religious instruction was cared for by Father Maurice McAuliffe, later bishop of Hartford and close friend and spiritual counselor of Riggs.

After receiving an A.B. from Yale (1910) and an M.A. from Harvard University, Riggs returned to Yale as an instructor in English. During World War I, he joined the Yale Ambulance Corps and became an officer in Intelligence Interallié to do work at the peace conference. His awareness of the impact of war upon Europe’s Christian cultural tradition prompted his choice of a priestly vocation. He began theological studies at the Catholic University of America in 1919, and he completed them under McAuliffe at St. Thomas Seminary in Hartford.

After ordination in 1922, Riggs received episcopal approval for residence near Yale and a limited chaplaincy there. In 1934, when McAuliffe became bishop of Hartford, the situation was reviewed and permission given for the construction of More House as a chapel and cultural center for Catholics at Yale. Meanwhile, Riggs had been active as a lecturer in behalf of the liturgical movement. He was a founder and contributor to Commonweal, a Catholic weekly published by laymen, and a participant in the interfaith work of the National Conference of Christians and Jews. But his greatest enthusiasm was for the design and construction of More House.

In his last years Riggs was a fellow of Calhoun College at Yale. Although without regular faculty status, he was in frequent demand as an authority in matters relating to Catholic belief and tradition. In 1963, Yale honored Father Riggs by establishing the T. Lawrason Riggs Professorship of Religion, the first endowed chair for Roman Catholic studies in a nonsectarian American university for a professor on permanent appointment.

[J. T. FARRELL]

RIGORISM

Rigorism is the moral system according to which, in every doubt of conscience as to the morality of a particular course of conduct, the opinion for law must be followed. In other words, one may act for liberty only when the arguments for this course are certain. The view was defended in the 17th century by the Jansenists, particularly by John SINNICH, an Irishman who taught at Louvain, in his book Saulus ex-Rex. The system eliminates the use of reflex principles and hence cannot be called a moral system in the present-day sense. Rigorism exaggerated the adage: "In a doubt the safer side is to be followed." This is correctly applied only to a practical doubt, not to a speculative doubt that can be resolved into practical certainty for liberty by the prudent use of reflex principles. Rigorism was condemned in 1690 by Alexander VIII, who listed among Jansenistic teachings the doctrine of Sinnich: "It is not lawful to follow a probable opinion, even if it is most probable among probable opinions" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [32d ed. Freiburg 1963] 2303).

See Also: MORALITY, SYSTEMS OF; DOUBT, MORAL; REFLEX PRINCIPLES; CONSCIENCE.

Bibliography: D. M. PRÜMMER, Manuale theologiae moralis, ed. E. M. MÜNCH, 3 v. (10th ed. Barcelona 1945–46) 1:338. J. AERTNYS and C. A. DAMEN, Theologia moralis, 2 v. (16th ed. Marietti 1930) 1:101. M. ZALBA, Theologiae moralis compendium, 2 v. (Madrid 1958) 1:673.

[F. J. CONNELL]

RIMED OFFICE

The designation "rimed office" has come into use only in recent years and is somewhat inexact. It refers to the series of ANTIPHONS and RESPONSORIES used at Vespers, Matins, and the daily hours of a liturgical feast (see DIVINE OFFICE, ROMAN). The texts involved are written in verse and set to music in a more florid style than that of GREGORIAN CHANT. The expression "rhythmic office" is broad, suggesting not only rhymed texts, but also texts that may be written in metrical or accentual verse without rhyme. The term historia also has been used for such offices, since most of them utilize "historical" texts, such as the vita or passio of a saint. Each series of antiphons and responsories is composed in the order of the modes from I to VIII. For the ninth piece, mode I is used again. This apparent organization is superficial, for only the last notes of the pieces obey the modal system, and everything else in them seems closer to tonal music, or even folk song.

Origin. Rimed offices appeared toward the end of the ninth century and were used to provide texts for newly established feasts. As the practice spread, new offices were composed to replace others already in use, and even for some parts of the temporal cycle, such as Trinity Sunday. In general the "historical" text employed was divided into antiphons and responsories and slightly changed to fit into a poetic scheme such as metrical verse, accentual verse, or rhymed prose. Sometimes the text was taken whole without any additions, but more often it was mixed with material from many sources.

Sources and Editions. Rhythmic offices, being perfectly liturgical, were included in numerous breviaries and antiphonaries containing the night hours, as well as in other sources. G. M. Dreves devoted nine volumes of his Analecta Hymnica to texts of rhythmic offices (v.5, 13, 18, 24, 25, 26, 28, and 45a). Although this edition is incomplete, it remains the only source for a methodical study. An analysis of these volumes was made by U. Chevalier in his Repertorium Hymnologicum, but the two works taken together still reveal many lacunae and errors.

History and Earliest Evidence. The Offices of St. Stephen and St. Lambert, written by Stephen of Liège, are generally regarded as the oldest evidence of the practice of composing rimed offices; the MS containing them is of the tenth century and seems to have been written during Stephen's lifetime or soon after his death in 920 (A. Auda). Some efforts along this line, such as an Office of St. Peter by HUCBALD OF SAINT-AMAND, were certainly made earlier (R. Weakland). This office used the vita of the saint without any modifications; that of St. Stephen transformed it into metrical verse with some assonance. Metrical offices can be found that span more than a century; it appears that composition in this genre was concluded, toward the beginning of the 11th century, with the series of antiphons attributed to Robert the Pious, Pro fidei meritis (S. Corbin, Essai sur la musique . . . 339), and the compositions of Fulbert of Chartres (Y. Delaporte). Accentual verse appeared in the 11th century, bringing with it rhyme and a style that became more and more studied, and even affected, especially under the influence of Leonine verse. During the next two centuries there was an immense proliferation of these series, but when the religious orders with strong centralized organization appeared (the Dominicans in particular), a sort of sclerosis afflicted the rhythmic office. Among the Dominicans, offices were still composed, but from the 13th century forward they were based on the offices for St. Dominic and St. Peter Martyr and introduced no new music (S. Corbin, "L'Office de la conception de la Vierge . . ." 62). Rhythmic offices were removed from the Roman rite by the Council of Trent, but they survive in the liturgy of the orders.

Research Methods. In the past these offices were edited one by one, without reference to other offices and even without a study of previous editions of the same office. Yet they had often undergone certain alterations in passing from church to church. The order of responsories might be changed, disturbing the order of the modes, or pieces might at times be replaced. Such alterations are historically useful in their own way, and sometimes permit identification of the church where they originated. Also, melodies were borrowed from other offices, as in the Office for Corpus Christi, for which the adaptations were meticulously indicated in one of the earliest texts: Paris, Bibliothèque National, fonds latins 1143 (L. M. J. Delaissé, 235; pl. 27 has indications in the margin of the borrowed melodies). It would be impossible to discuss the rited office without considering such borrowings. On the other hand, the offices may be sorted, according to certain norms of compositions not yet investigated, into a Norman group, an Alsatian group, and a Flemish group.

Bibliography: Analecta hymnica (Leipzig 1886–1922) v.5, 13, 18, 24, 25, 26, 28, 45a. U. CHEVALIER, Repertorium hymnologicum (Louvain-Brussels 1892–1921). L. EISENHOFER and J. LECHNER, The Liturgy of the Roman Rite, tr. A. J. and E. F. PEELER from the 6th German Edition, ed. H. E. WINSTONE (New York 1961). G. REESE, Music in the Middle Ages (New York 1940). W. APEL, Gregorian Chant (Bloomington, Ind. 1958). A. AUDA, L'École musicale liégeoise au X^e siècle: Étienne de Liège (Brussels 1923). S. CORBIN, Essai sur la musique religieuse portugaise au moyen âge (Paris 1952); "L'Office de la conception de la Vierge . . . dominicain d'Aveiro," Bulletin des études portugaises 13 (1949) 105–166. R. WEAKLAND, "The Compositions of Huchbald," Études grégoriennes 3 (1959) 155–163. Y. DELAPORTE, "Fulbert de Chartres et l'école chartraine de chant liturgique au XI^e siècle," ibid. 2 (1957) 51–81. L. M. J. DELAISSÉ, "A la recherche des origines de 'office du Corpus Christi,'" Scriptorium 4 (1950) 220–239.

[S. CORBIN]

RINALDI, FILIPPO, BL.

Salesian priest; b. May 28, 1856 at Lu near Monferrato, Piedmont, Italy; d. Dec. 5, 1931, Turin, Italy.

The eighth of the nine children of the farmers Cristoforo Rinaldi and Antonia Brezzi, Rinaldi attended the Salesian school at nearby Mirabello for a short time in 1866. Rinaldi became a priest because of the persistence of (St.) John BOSCO, who recognized his vocation. Rinaldi began religious studies with the Salesians at Sampierdarena in spring 1877 and proved to be an outstanding student. From Sampierdarena he went to the novitiate at San Benigno Canavese (1879), where the novice master chose him as his assistant. Rinaldi pronounced his vows in 1880, then continued his studies of philosophy and theology, and was ordained priest in 1882. Immediately thereafter he was placed in charge of late vocations at Mathi (1883–88), then Turin.

Father Rinaldi was sent to Sarria, Spain (1889–92), to assist the rector. There he established schools and two new houses (Gerona and Santander), and attracted many vocations, including that of the future saint St. Joseph CALASANCTIUS. Thereafter he was provincial for Iberia (1892–1901), during which he set up sixteen houses in Spain and three in Portugal; founded Lecturas Catolicas, a weekly newspaper for youth, as well as a library for students; and fostered the expansion of the Daughters of Mary Help of Christians in Spain.

In 1901, Rinaldi returned to Turin when he was chosen prefect general, an office he held for twenty years under Rectors General Michael Rua and Paul Albera. He spurred the spiritual development and the commitment of Salesian cooperators by promoting congresses and organizing reunions of past pupils. In spite of his other work, Rinaldi was a popular confessor and spiritual director and taught regularly at the Foglizzo seminary.

On May 24, 1922, Father Rinaldi was elected the third successor of John Bosco. He directed the Salesians with perspicacity in answer to the appeal of Pope PIUS XI, with special reference to the Asian and Eastern missions. He opened the Cardinal Cagliero Institute (1922 at Ivrea) to train new missionaries, and similar training centers at Penango (1925), Foglizzo (1926), Astudillo, Spain (1928), Shrigley, England (1929), and elsewhere, and fostered missionary vocations in various ways to staff the new missions in Porto Velho, Brazil (1926), Madras and Krishnagar, India (1928), Japan (1928), and Ratburi, Siam (Thailand, 1930).

He also served as apostolic delegate to the Daughters of Mary Help of Christians and encouraged their expansion, as well as that of the Don Bosco Union among teachers. During his tenure as rector general, Don Bosco was beatified (June 2, 1929). The order grew from 6,000 to 10,000 members during Rinaldi's tenure and added over 250 new houses.

This dynamic leader of the Salesians died at age seventy-five. His cause was initiated in 1947 and ended in his beatification by John Paul II, April 29, 1990.

Feast: Dec. 5 (Salesians).

Bibliography: Works. Quaderno Carpanera, verbali redatti da Luigina Carpanera, Documenti e testi V, (Rome 1980). Don Rinaldi ci parla ancora (Palermo 1984). Literature. Lo spirito di Don Bosco nel cuore del beato Don Rinaldi, ed. S. MAGGIO (Turin 1990). R. ALBERDI, Don Filippo Rinaldi en Barcelona-Sarriá (1889–92) (Barcelona 1990). A. L'ARCO, Il Beato Filippo Rinaldi (Castellammare di Stabia, Italy 1990). J. M. BESLAY, Le Pere Rinaldi (Lyons 1950). T. BOSCO, Profili di santità (Turin 1977). Die Güte Don Boscos in Person, tr. R. DAFELMAIR (Vienna 1990). L. CÀSTANO, Don Rinaldi. Vivente immagine di Don Bosco (Turin 1980). Beato Don Filippo Rinaldi (Turin 1990). E. CERIA, Vita del Servo di Dio Sac. Filippo Rinaldi terzo successore di San Giovanni Bosco (Turin 1951). M. COLLINO, Il beato Filippo Rinaldi e l'Istituto delle Figlie di Maria Ausiliatrice (Rome 1990). E. DAL COVOLO, Il beato don Filippo Rinaldi, maestro di profondità interiore, testimone di vita (Rovigo 1990). L. DALCERRI, Un maestro di vita interiore (Rome 1990). A. FANTOZZI, Un uomo di fede Don Filippo Rinaldi (Rome 1990). P. M. RINALDI, Sospinto dall'amore (Turin 1979, 1990). By Love Compelled: The Life of Blessed Philip R., Third Successor of St. John Bosco (New Rochelle, N.Y. 1992). Droga milosci (Krakow 1992). P. SCHINETTI, La spiritualità di Don Filippo Rinaldi e la Volontaria di Don Bosco oggi (Rome 1986). Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1990) 578.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

RINALDI, ODORICO (RAYNALDUS)

Oratorian priest and historical scholar; b. Treviso, Italy, June 1594; d. Rome, Jan. 22, 1671. He pursued his studies in Parma and Padua and in 1618 entered the Oratory in Turin. He was twice elected superior general of that congregation. Rinaldi was distinguished for his scholarship as well as for his personal piety, and through his historical work he rendered inestimable services to the Church. At the request of Pope Innocent X he undertook the continuation of the Annales Ecclesiastici inaugurated by his fellow Oratorian, Cardinal Caesar BARONIUS, in the previous century as a refutation of the errors and calumnies against the Church in the well-known Lutheran CENTURIATORS of Magdeburg. The work of Baronius had ended with the accession of Pope Innocent III in 1198 (v. 1–12); Rinaldi, who is generally recognized as the ablest continuator of Baronius, extended the work from 1198 to 1565 (v. 13–22) in a series of volumes published in Rome (1646–77). His work marks an advance over that of Baronius in the publication of new and important documentary materials. He also published excerpts from his own work and that of Baronius in Latin and Italian. An abridgment of his own work, in three volumes, was published in Rome in 1670. Rinaldi declined Pope Innocent X's offer of the directorship of the Vatican Library. The significance of the work of Baronius and Rinaldi is reflected in their careers as historiographers who pioneered in the critical evaluation and use of source materials.

Bibliography: A. MARCHESAN, Lettere inedite di Oderico Rinaldi (Treviso 1896). W. WERBECK, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 6 v. (Tübingen 1957–63) 5:807.

[A. M. CHRISTENSEN]

RINGS, LITURGICAL USE OF

Rounded ornaments, mainly of metal or precious stone, usually worn on the finger, lip, neck, nose, ankle, arm, or ears as a symbol of religious or magic power, or used for exchange or value and adornment among ancient peoples, as well as a pledge of loyalty and trust. Ancient rings of marble, ivory, crystal, and metal have been discovered in almost every culture. Many were ornamented with gems, jewels, stones, pearls, and enamel. In ancient Egypt, Mycenae, Cyprus, and among the Celts, golden rings with markings for dismemberment were used as instruments of exchange or money; later, in Egypt particularly, the facing on a ring was used as a seal for the authentication of documents. This last practice was common in Israel and Greece and was adopted by the Romans, from whom the Christians borrowed it; this use has continued to the present day.

Bible and Early Church. The OT frequently refers to the use of gold or metal rings as ornaments, and many have been discovered in ancient Palestinian tombs. Arm, foot, and nose rings are mentioned in Genesis (24.22), Isaiah (3.18–21), Ezekiel (16.11–12), and Ecclesiastes (11.22). Pharaoh invested Joseph with a ring to signify his dignity (Gn 41.42), and Saul's arm ring was evidently a sign of rank (2 Sm 32.2). Women wore earrings, but the custom was also indulged in by men (Nm 31.50). The ancient Romans at first limited the use of finger rings to senators and high officials, but by 216 B.C., knights could wear them, and in the republic, it became general custom to wear signet, betrothal (anulus pronubus), wedding, and birthday (anulus natalicius) rings.

Tertullian complains about the luxurious use of rings by Christians (De cultu fem. 1.9), and Cyprian (De hab. virg. 21) and Jerome (Epist. 107.5) caution against this vanity. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA distinguishes between the images on rings that were of pagan or immoral character and those permitted to Christians, such as the fish or dove as signs of Christian hope, the ship and anchor as symbols of heavenly security, and the lamb, lion, Orans, and Monogram of Christ as laudable symbolism. Later, pictures of Christ and the saints adorned Christian rings, and some were fitted with RELIQUARIES and worn round the neck. Gnostic rings usually carried a magic or religious formula and were considered amulets. Costly rings have been found in the tombs of Germanic and Frankish nobles of the 7th century, and during the Renaissance, artists prided themselves on turning out precious and luxuriously ornamented rings.

Liturgical Rings. St. Augustine speaks of the bishop's ring as a seal (Epist. 127.59), and it is probably from this practical usage that rings became a sign of the episcopal office. Isidore of Seville mentions the bishop's ring and staff in the course of the consecration and installation ceremonies (De eccl. off. 2.5.12; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1878–90] 83:783), and so does the Council of Toledo IV in 633 (28; Patrologia Latina, 84:374–375). It was used in Gaul in the 9th century, according to a letter from Charles the Bald in 867 to Nicholas I (Patrologia Latina, 124:874). Rings eventually became a sign of the bishop's marriage to his see, and in the 10th century, the wearing of rings by bishops became an accepted custom. Innocent III tells us that bishops use the ring as a fidei sacramentum, that is, as a contract of love and faith between them and their church. The use of a ring was granted to the abbot of Monte Cassino by Leo IX (Patrologia Latina, 182:832).

The pope has three official rings: one for ordinary usage, the pontifical ring for ceremonies, and the ring of the Fisherman. The latter, the anulus piscatoris, is the gold seal ring that the cardinal camerlengo places on a new pope's finger. On it is the pope's name and an engraving of St. Peter in a boat fishing (Lk 5.10). It has been used for sealing briefs from the 15th century and is ceremoniously destroyed by the camerlengo on the death of the pope. The cardinal's ring is presented to him by the pope in the first consistory the cardinal attends after his elevation. Abbots wore rings from the 12th century with papal permission, and more generally from the 15th century. Some cathedral chapters and, since the 10th century, clerics in orders having doctoral degrees in theology, philosophy, or Canon Law may wear a ring designating their office or achievement. St. Ambrose witnesses to the right of consecrated virgins to wear a ring; and since the 14th century, many orders of professed nuns and sisters wear rings as a sign of their complete dedication to Christ.

Wedding Rings. The Christian use of wedding rings developed from the Roman custom of betrothal rings.

15th-century papal ring. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

They are mentioned by GREGORY OF TOURS in the 6th century (Vitae patrum 20) and were widespread among the Visigoths and Lombards. In later times, husband and wife gave each other rings in pledge of their union and fidelity. In the old Roman Ritual, however, there is only the ceremonial for the ring given to the bride by the groom. Custom in this matter differed widely. Wearing the wedding ring on the third finger of the left hand seems to be connected originally with pronouncing the Trinitarian formula over the thumb and first two fingers so that the Amen was pronounced on the third finger.

Other Uses. In the 15th century, rosary rings with ten beads for each decade came into use, and this type of ring has been revived in modern times.

Bibliography: H. BATTKE, Geschichte des Ringes (Baden-Baden 1953). J. A. MARTIGNY, Des Anneaux chez les premiers chrétiens (Mâcon 1858). G. F. KUNZ, Rings (Philadelphia 1917). J. R. MCCARTHY, Rings Through the Ages (New York 1945).

[F. X. MURPHY/J. NABUCO/EDS.]

RINUCCINI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA

Archbishop of Fermo, papal nuncio to Ireland; b. Rome, Sept. 15, 1592; d. Fermo, Dec. 13, 1653. Rinuccini was born of noble Florentine stock. He was educated by the Jesuits and later studied law at Bologna and Perugia, obtaining his doctor's degree at Pisa. He entered the papal service, and at the age of 33 became archbishop of Fermo in the Marches (1625). Twenty years later, when Innocent X decided to send a fully accredited nuncio to the Irish Confederate Catholics, he chose the experienced and devoted Rinuccini.

The Irish Catholics had taken arms in 1641 to defend their political and religious rights, and the following year they had formed a political confederacy to which Urban VIII had accredited a papal envoy, Pier Francesco SCARAMPI. When Rinuccini arrived on Oct. 22, 1645, a serious crisis had arisen because some of the Anglo-Irish leaders among the Catholics were pressing for a political agreement with King Charles I that would grant very limited toleration to the Catholic religion, with no public recognition or adequate guarantees.

On the advice of Scarampi and the Irish bishops, Rinuccini decided on strong measures. At the synod of Waterford in August of 1646, all supporters (mostly Anglo-Irishmen) of the agreement with the king were declared excommunicated. By this bold stroke Rinuccini secured the rejection of the proposal and the imprisonment of those who had attempted to negotiate its acceptance. Shortly afterward, however, on the advice of some of the bishops, but against that of Scarampi, he agreed to their release and readmission to the political life of the Catholic confederates.

During the next two years the confederate armies were unsuccessful, and by 1648 their only effective military force was the army of the "Old Irish" (intransigent opponents of compromise) under Owen Roe O'Neill. The Anglo-Irish leaders, unwilling to accept O'Neill's hegemony, gradually maneuvered Rinuccini into a position whereby his demands for adequate guarantees for the Catholic religion could be identified with political support for the "Old Irish" party in the Confederation. Rinuccini tried hard to avoid such an identification, but he made some serious misjudgments in the spring of 1648, culminating in another excommunication of the Anglo-Irish leaders on May 27, and this time they did not succeed in winning sufficient public support.

Rinuccini was forced to retire to Galway, while at the headquarters of the Confederation in Kilkenny events developed outside his control. In January of 1649, a peace agreement was signed between the Confederates and the Marquis of Ormond, the king's representative. It included a hard-fought and, in the end, ambiguous agreement on terms for the Catholic religion, that, even if more favorable, would not have satisfied Rinuccini. He sailed from Galway on Feb. 25, 1649.

His mission was unsuccessful, but it may be doubted if anyone could have imposed a satisfactory solution on the complicated question of religious and political allegiances in 17th-century Ireland. On his return to Italy he retired to his see of Fermo where he died.

Bibliography: M. J. HYNES, The Mission of Rinuccini (Dublin 1932). T. L. COONAN, The Irish Catholic Confederacy and the Puritan Revolution (New York 1954). S. KAVANAGH, ed., Commentarius Rinuccinianus, 6 v. (Dublin 1932-49).

[P. J. CORISH]

RIORDAN, PATRICK WILLIAM

Archbishop of SAN FRANCISCO; b. Chatham, New Brunswick, Canada, Aug. 27, 1841; d. San Francisco, Dec. 27, 1914. His parents, Matthew and Mary Riordan, of Kinsale, Ireland, moved to Chicago, Illinois, when Patrick was seven years old. He attended St. Mary of the Lake University and graduated from the University of Notre Dame in 1858. Selected as one of the first 12 students of the North American College in Rome, Riordan left for Europe in 1859 to enter the Propaganda Seminary with the understanding that he would transfer to the American College when it opened on December 7 of the same year. For reasons of health he left Rome and studied first at the College of the Holy Ghost, Paris, and then at the American College, Louvain, Belgium, where he received his licentiate in sacred theology in 1866, having been ordained at Mechlin, Belgium, on June 10, 1865.

Riordan served at St. Mary of the Lake as professor of canon law and dogmatic theology until 1868 when he became pastor at Woodstock, Illinois, and successively at Joliet and at St. James in Chicago in 1871. In 1883 he was named coadjutor archbishop of San Francisco with the right of succession to Archbishop Joseph S. Alemany and succeeded to the see on Dec. 28, 1884.

Riordan participated actively in the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore in 1884 and spoke against the establishment of irremovable rectors in the western states as a premature move for missionary territory. He was named president of the commission of prelates for the Native American and African American missions and served on the commission for the study of secret societies. He supported the establishment of national churches wherein immigrants could hear their mother tongue and in his own archdiocese formed Italian, Spanish, Slavonian, Portuguese, French, and German churches. He built St. Mary's Cathedral in 1891.

Riordan led the campaign to exempt churches from the taxation that had been imposed by the State of California in 1868. By a narrow margin the churches were granted tax exemption on Nov. 6, 1900, although church schools remained taxable. The problem of the PIOUS FUND had vexed the bishops of California since 1869 when the Mexican government defaulted on its payment of indemnities to the Catholic Church in California. Riordan was named to bring the case before the Hague Tribunal, where he and Garrett McInerney won a unanimous decision in favor of the Church in the first case of international arbitration brought before that tribunal. The Mexican government defaulted in 1913 and has ignored the Hague decision ever since.

Riordan initiated an archdiocesan fund drive for St. Patrick's Seminary, Menlo Park, entrusting it to the Sulpician Fathers from Baltimore. This mother seminary opened in 1898, serving the entire West as the only diocesan major seminary for more than a quarter of a century.

Riordan constantly appealed to clergy and laity to work together in close harmony for the salvation of souls, particularly to effect the conversion of non-Catholics. His sermons were marked by an irenic spirit and his public statements on moral and social matters attracted attention in the daily press. His fluency in six languages endeared him to the immigrants flocking to California.

Bibliography: T. J. BRENNAN, "Archbishop Riordan," Records of the American Catholic Historical Society of Philadelphia 26 (1915): 47-54.

[M. J. HURLEY]

RIPA, MATTEO

Missionary, educator; b. Eboli (Salerno), Italy, March 29, 1682; d. Naples, March 29, 1746.

Matteo Ripa, son of a noble family, began his studies in 1697 at Naples. In 1701 he became a cleric; after his ordination (1705) he went to Rome to prepare for the foreign missions. Clement XI, in 1707, named him one of a group sent to take the red hat to Monsignor de Tournon, legate a latere to the Chinese emperor. Ripa arrived in Macau in 1710, remained there some months after the death in July of de Tournon, and then studied Chinese at Canton until the next year, when he went to the imperial court at Beijing. He found favor with the emperor, Hsüan-yeh, and was able, while acting as court painter, to perform some missionary work in spite of the general curtailment of Catholic missionary activity because of the Chinese rites controversy. He was in regular correspondence with the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith during these years, and in 1717 he was named a prothonotary apostolic in recognition of his services. He acted as intermediary between the Emperor and Monsignor Mezzabarba, newly appointed papal legate, when he arrived in 1720.

When Hsüan-yeh died (1722), court intrigue intensified and Ripa was the victim of harassment by the Chinese and discrimination by some of the missionaries. Discouraged, he returned to Italy in 1723 with five Chinese, who became the first students in a school Ripa founded in Naples for the education of missionaries. In 1732 Clement XII formally approved the school and made Ripa's group a congregation of secular priests. The school came to be known as the Chinese College; there Ripa, called the Chinese Apostle, died. His foundation prepared priests for the missions until it was suppressed by the government in 1860. Ripa's valuable account of his work was published posthumously.

Bibliography: Storia della fondazione dalla Congregazione e del Collegio de' Chinesi sotto il titolo della S. Famiglia de G. C., scritta dallo stesso fondatore M. Ripa e dei viaggi da lui fatti, 3 v. (Naples 1832). A. S. ROSSO, Apostolic Legations to China of the 18th Century (South Pasadena 1948). A. THOMAS, Histoire de la Mission de Pékin (Paris 1923).

[P. F. MULHERN]

RIPALDA, JUAN MARTÍNEZ DE

Jesuit theologian; b. Pamplona, Navarre, 1594; d. Madrid, April 26, 1648. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1609. After the usual course of studies, he began his teaching career in 1619 at Monforte, where he lectured in philosophy for four years. He then went to Salamanca, where for many years he held the chair of dogmatic theology with great renown. From Salamanca he was summoned by royal decree to teach moral theology at the Imperial College of Madrid. He was later appointed censor to the Inquisition, and confessor of Philip IV's favorite, De Olivares, whom he followed upon his exile from Madrid in 1643. Ripalda was a good religious, noted for his innocence. A keenness of mind and clarity of expression made up for his lack of physical strength. He is ranked with Lugo among the best theologians of Spain at the time, and perhaps of all Europe. Some of his more notable theological opinions are: (1) Prescinding from the actual Divine Law and considering only natures, faith obtained by contemplation of created things would be sufficient for salvation, although assent comes only through grace. (2) The formal object of faith is God's faithfulness, constancy of will, and efficacy of power. (3) The sense BAIUS gave his propositions was condemned as well as the words. (4) God can create a being to whom supernatural grace is due. (5) Supernatural grace is conferred for every good act; thus every good natural act is accompanied by a supernatural act. (6) The Divine maternity of Mary is itself formally sanctifying.

Ripalda's principal work is De ente supernaturali disputationes in universam theologiam (v.1 Bordeaux 1634; v.2 Lyons 1645; v.3 Adversus Bajanos, Cologne 1648). This work includes many questions not treated in standard texts. The last volume elicited an anonymous attack, attributed to Sinnich, P. Joannis Martinez . . . Vulpes capta per theologos . . . Academiae Lovaniensis. His other published works are: Expositio brevis literae Magistri Sententiarum (Salamanca 1635), and the Tractatus theologici et scholastici de virtutibus, fide, spe et charitate (Lyons 1652). There are two collections of his works: Vives (8 v. Paris 1871–73), Palmé (4 v. Rome 1870–71). Another work, Discurso sobre la elección del successor del pontificado en vida del pontifice (Seville), is attributed also to him. Several other writings are preserved in manuscript at Salamanca and at the Biblioteca Nacional.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL et al, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels–Paris 1890–1932; v. 12 suppl. 1960) 5:640–643. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 5 vol. in 6 (3d ed. Innsbruck 1903–13) 3:928–930. P. DE RIBADENEIRA, Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesu (Rome 1676). A. ASTRAIN, Historia de la Compañía de Jesús en la asistencia de España, 7 v. (Madrid 1902–25) v.5. G. R. DE YURRE, “La teoría de la maternidad divina, formalmente santificante en Ripalda y Scheeben,” Estudios Marianos 3 (1944) 255–286. A. ARBELOA EGÜES, La Doctrina de la predestinación y de la Gracia eficaz en Juan Martínez Ripalda (Pamplona 1950). N. ANTONIO, Bibliotheca hispana nova, 2 v. (Madrid 1783–88) 1:736–737. P. DUMONT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 13.2:2712–37.

[J. E. KOEHLER]

RIPOLL, ABBEY OF

An important former Benedictine monastery dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, situated in north Ripoll (Rivipolli, Rivipullo) in Catalonia, Diocese of Vich. It was founded (c. 880) by Count Wilfrid I of Barcelona, who subsequently enriched the monastery with gifts of books, silver, gold, and jewels for liturgical vessels. The abbey was expanded in the 10th century by the addition of cells, enclosure wall, scriptorium, and a mill, and MONTERRAT became a daughterhouse. Agapetus II gave Ripoll papal protection (951), and in 1011 Sergius IV granted full exemption. It reached its greatest material and intellectual development under the noble Abbot Oliva (1008–46), who was bishop of Vich (1018–46). A new church was built (1032) and consecrated; the cloisters were enlarged and scholarship was encouraged. Count Bernard II of Besalù, a relative of Oliva, made Ripoll a dependency (1163–72) of SAINT-VICTOR IN MARSEILLES after Oliva’s death. Perhaps disagreement over this step was instrumental in the Count’s decision to transfer the family burial place to Poblet. At any rate, the change caused Ripoll’s fame to decline. In the early 16th century the abbey joined a congregation of 30 Benedictine houses in Aragon and Roussillon. Further decline set in as a result of the appointment of commendatory abbots (among them the future ALEXANDER VI) and on account of the sufferings caused by the wars of the 17th and 18th century. In 1835 during the Carlist wars the monastery was destroyed, and whatever MSS of its famous archival collection had not been sent to Paris or Barcelona were burned. The abbey church, reconstructed as a parish church (1887) on the old plans, retains the original great Romanesque doorway, the cloisters, and sections of the seven apsidal chapels.

Bibliography: P. F. KEHR, ed., Papsturkunden in Spanien, 2 v. in 4 (Berlin 1926–28) 1.1:120–125. R. BEER, “Die Handschriften des Klosters Santa Maria de Ripoll,” Sitzungsberichte der Akademie der Wissenschaften in Wien 155.3 (1908); 158.2 (1908). R. ABADAL, Analeccta Montserratensia 9 (Montserrat 1962). J. J. BAUER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1319–20. Enciclopedia de la Religión Católica, ed. R. D. FERRERES et al., 7 v. (Barcelona 1950–56) 6:757–759.

[C. M. AHERNE]

RIPOLL MORATA, FELIPE, BL.

Priest, martyr of the Spanish civil war; b. Sept. 14, 1878, Teruel, Spain; d. Feb. 7, 1939, “Can Tretze” of Pont de Molins (near Gerona), Spain. Felipe, son of a poor family, was educated and ordained a priest for the diocese of his birth. He then served consecutively as professor, spiritual director, and rector of the seminary. Upon the elevation of Anselmo POLANCO to bishop of Teruel (1935), Father Ripoll was appointed his vicar general. The following year the Spanish Church experienced its most severe persecution. Undaunted, the bishop of Teruel and Father Ripoll remained with their flock. In 1938 Bishop Polanco was arrested for refusing to withdraw his name from a document signed by his brother Spanish bishops that condemned the persecution of the Church by the Republican Army. Father Ripoll joined him in jail for thirteen months, until the Republican forces were in retreat. The two were taken as hostages and shot in a gorge near Gerona. Fr. Ripoll’s body rests in the cathedral of Teruel together with those of his bishop. They were beatified by John Paul II, Oct. 1, 1995.

Feast: Feb. 7.

Bibliography: V. CÁRCCEL ORTÍ, Mártires españoles del siglo XX (Madrid 1995). J. PÉREZ DE URBEL, Catholic Martyrs of the Spanish Civil War, 1936–1939, tr. M. F. INGRAMS (Kansas City, Mo. 1993). L’Osservatore Romano, English ed. 40 (1995): 1–3.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

RIPON, ABBEY OF

Early English monastic foundation about 20 miles northwest of York (Latin, Ad Ripam; OE, In Hrypum). The foundation of the abbey is credited to a group of Celtic monks from MELROSE, led by Abbot Eata, on land given by Alcfrith, subking of Deira, c. 651. CUTHBERT OF LINDISFARNE was a member of this early community and his famous "miracle of the heavenly loaves" occurred at Ripon. Declining to institute the Roman practices demanded by Alcfrith, the Celtic monks abandoned the house (c. 661), which was then given to WILFRID OF YORK, who established the BENEDICTINE RULE there. One of Wilfrid's first disciples at Ripon was the later "Apostle of Frisia," WILLIBRORD. Although Wilfrid soon after became bishop of York, Ripon remained the place he "loved better than any other place" during his stormy career, and it was there that he passed his last years and was later to be buried (709). The first abbey church, dedicated to St. Peter, was built by Wilfrid before 678, and its crypt, called "Wilfrid's Needle," is still extant under the present cathedral, which was commenced in the second half of the 12th century. The original monastic buildings and church were destroyed c. 948 during King Edred's wars against the Danes. The abbey was rebuilt and populated with monks later in the century by Abp. OSWALD OF YORK as part of the monastic revival. Before the Norman Conquest, however, the monks were replaced by CANONS REGULAR. This foundation was dissolved under HENRY VIII. In 1604 Ripon was refounded as an Anglican collegiate church; in 1836 the church became the cathedral of the Anglican Diocese of Ripon.

Bibliography: BEDE, Ecclesiastical Historiography 3.25; 4.12; 5.19. EDDIUS, The Life of Bishop Wilfrid, ed. and tr. B. COLGRAVE (Cambridge, England 1927), passim. A. H. THOMPSON, "Collegiate Church of St. Peter and St. Wilfrid, Ripon," The Victoria History of the County of York, ed. W. PAGE, 4 v. and index (London 1907-13) 3:367-372. R. L. POOLE, "St. Wilfrid and the See of Ripon," English Historical Review 34 (1919). F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 1167.

[R. D. WARE]

RISORGIMENTO

Nationalist movement in 19th-century Italy culminating in the unification of the country by 1870. Its origins can be traced to the intellectual ferment of the 18th-century ENLIGHTENMENT and to the influence of the FRENCH REVOLUTION. Ignoring the liberal and national aspirations of many Italians, the Congress of Vienna in 1815 gave Austria a dominant position over an Italy divided into seven states. This settlement caused widespread antagonism. After many failures and disappointments, Austrian control was finally ended and a national Italian state achieved. The risorgimento falls into two distinct periods: 1815 to 1848 and 1849 to 1870.

EARLIER PERIOD

Revolutionary unrest characterized these years. Immediately after the Congress of Vienna, Italians began vain demands for liberal reforms and constitutional guarantees. From 1831 the idea of unifying the peninsula gained support among intellectuals. Secret societies, such as the CARBONARI and Mazzini's Young Italy, organized conspiratorial activities and prepared the revolutions of 1820 1821, 1831, and 1848. The 1820s were dominated by the Carbonari and the 1830s and 1840s by the extreme, revolutionary, republican followers of Mazzini, but the 1840s witnessed the emergence of a moderate, liberal, Catholic group that looked to the papacy for leadership in a future confederation of Italian states. Among the leaders of this group were Manzoni, Capponi, Cattaneo, Ricasoli, ROSSI, Mamiani, Tommaseo, VENTURA, Balbo, and GIOBERTI. It was composed mostly of devout, practicing Catholics, who were trying to reconcile their religious sentiments and loyalty to the Church with their desire for political liberty and representative government. When Cardinal Mastai-Ferretti became Pope Pius IX in 1846, they turned to him for leadership. "Viva Pio Nono" became the cry of many Italian patriots, especially after the papal allocution (Feb. 10, 1848) that concluded with the words, "God bless Italy." Until 1848 it was widely believed that Pius IX supported the cause of Italian independence. In fact, his policies added impetus to a movement that later the pope was unable to control or to stop.

Revolutions erupted across Europe in 1848 and reverberated throughout Italy. Popular pressure forced rulers to grant constitutions. An effort was made to form an Italian coalition against Austria, but Pius IX and Ferdinand II of Naples withdrew their troops, and the small army of Piedmont-Sardinia was defeated by Austria at the battles of Custoza and Novara. Subsequently the independent revolutionary governments in Milan, Venice, and Rome were suppressed one by one. By 1849 Austria was victorious. It had reestablished its rule over Lombardy and Venetia and had restored to Tuscany, Modena, and Parma rulers subservient to its policies. The recent constitutions were quickly revoked everywhere, except in Piedmont-Sardinia.

LATER PERIOD

A decrease in revolutionary activity and the emergence of the Kingdom of Piedmont-Sardinia as leader in the drive for unity marked the later period. The 1848 debacle influenced subsequent developments. Its violence impressed on Pius IX the incompatibility between his role as head of the universal Church and his support of Italian liberal national aspirations. These events created a rift between the Church and the risorgimento, which was henceforth anticlerical and openly in favor of unification. A realignment of forces occurred throughout the peninsula as Mazzini's influence waned. Piedmont-Sardinia initiated a program of internal political and economic reforms and became the haven for political exiles from all parts of Italy. Moreover, the able leadership and diplomacy of Camillo Benso di CAVOUR, its prime minister, who held power almost uninterruptedly from 1852 until his death in June 1861, gained the support of most Italian liberals and patriots, with the exception of Mazzini and a few of his diehard followers. In 1858 the Italian National Society, organized by many of the former republican leaders of the 1848 revolts, espoused the monarchical leadership. Cavour's diplomacy disavowed revolution and gained recognition abroad for Italy's national aspirations. In 1855 Piedmont-Sardinia entered the Crimean War against Russia and sent a small army to fight in the Crimea. This enabled Cavour to attend the Congress of Paris in 1856 with the great European powers. After the Pact of Plombières, which assured Cavour French support against Austria, war broke out in 1859 between Austria and Piedmont-Sardinia. Austria was defeated and ceded Lombardy. Within a few months Piedmont-Sardinia succeeded in annexing most of central Italy, including parts of the STATES OF THE CHURCH. The expedition of GARIBALDI added the southern part of the peninsula. Early in 1861 the new kingdom of Italy (with Turin as its capital) was officially proclaimed, although Pius IX retained control of the Eternal City with the protection of French troops. Austria still held Venetia. Most Italian patriots agreed that the risorgimento would remain incomplete until Rome became part of the new kingdom and until Austria relinquished Venetia. The latter event occurred in 1866, when Italy allied with victorious Prussia against Austria. Rome fell into Italian hands in 1870, after France recalled its soldiers to meet the threat of Prussian attack. By 1870 the risorgimento could be considered finished, even though some claim that its completion did not occur until the acquisition of Italia irredenta (Italian territory still in Austrian hands) after World War I.

"The Proclamation of the Republic of Venice in 1848," 19th-century painting by V. Giancomelli. (©Archivo Iconografico S.A./CORBIS)

The risorgimento was mainly a political movement, but it can be interpreted also as a national revival that made Italy part of the 19th-century Western state system and civilization. As such, the movement posed serious religious problems, for with few exceptions all who participated in it were practicing Catholics, from the leaders of the 1821 revolts to General Cadorna, who occupied Rome in 1870. The split between the Church and the national and liberal movement began in 1848 and gained momentum after 1855, when the first Piedmontese anti-clerical laws were passed. From then on, Catholics who were also patriots were faced with a serious crisis of conscience. This created many problems for the new state and had serious consequences for Italy and its people until the schism was healed by the LATERAN PACTS of 1929 (see ROMAN QUESTION).

Bibliography: A. MONTI, Pio IX nel Risorgimento italiano (Bari 1928). R. ALBRECHT-CARRIÉ, Italy from Napoleon to Mussolini (New York 1950). E. P. NOETHER, Seeds of Italian Nationalism 1700–1815 (New York 1951). D. MACK SMITH, Cavour and Garibaldi, 1860: A Study in Political Conflict (Cambridge, Eng. 1954). R. GREW, A Sterner Plan for Italian Unity: The Italian National Society in the Risorgimento (Princeton 1963). A. C. JEMOLO, Chiesa e stato in Italia negli ultimi cento anni (Turin 1948); Church and State in Italy, 1850–1950, tr. D. MOORE (Philadelphia 1960). D. MASSÈ, Cattolici e Risorgimento (Milan 1961). E. ROTA, ed., Questioni di storia del Risorgimento e dell'unità d'Italia (Milan 1951). Nuove questioni di storia del Risorgimento e dell'unità; d'Italia (Milan 1962). L. SALVATORELLI et al., "Il problema religioso del Risorgimento," Rassegna storica del Risorgimento 43 (1956) 193–345, 413–589, proceedings of the 33d Congresso di Storia del Risorgimento, 1954. E. ARTON et al., "Il problema politico del cattolicesimo nel Risorgimento," Rassegna storica Toscana 4.3–4 (1958), proceedings of the 11th Convegno of the Società toscana per la storia del Risorgimento, 1958. R. AUBERT, Le Pontificat de Pie IX (Fliche-Martin 21; 2d ed. 1964).

[E. P. NOETHER]

RIST, VALERIUS

Franciscan missionary to Indochina; b. Neuburg, Jan. 6, 1696; d. Nhatrang, Cochin China, Sept. 15, 1737. In 1712 he joined the Reformed Franciscans of Bavaria. In 1721 he entered the S. Pietro in Montorio missionary college, Rome, and in 1722 left to found a mission in Johore, Malaya. When he was refused entry on May 11, 1724, he went to Cambodia, where he worked from October of 1724 to August of 1728. He was sent by the Congregation de Propaganda Fide to Kuang-chou, China, enduring a shipwreck on the way. In July of 1730 he became pro-vicar of Cambodia and Laos. On Oct. 1, 1735, he was named titular bishop of Mindonium and coadjutor to Bishop Alessandro Alessandri, vicar apostolic of Cochin China and Cambodia, and was consecrated by him on April 28, 1737, at Hué. He was buried at Nhatrang, center of his apostolate. Despite conflicts of jurisdiction with missionaries of other institutes, he converted many pagans, almost completed a catechism in Cambodian that has since perished, and compiled an itinerary of his travels.

Bibliography: E. SCHLUND, Nach Cochinchina (Trier 1911). B. LINS, Geschichte der bayerischen Franziskanerprovinz (Munich 1926). B. H. WILLEKE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1321–1322.

[F. MARGIOTTI]

RITA OF CASCIA, ST.

“Saint of Desperate Cases”; b. Roccaporena near Cascia, Umbria, 1377; d. May 1447. After her husband had been murdered and her children had died, she entered the new Augustinian convent of Santa Maria Magdalena (now S. Rita) in Cascia. A mystic of the cross, she bore Christ’s bloody thorn in her forehead for 15 years before her death. Because of her reputation for sanctity and miracles, her body and original coffin were transferred in 1457 to a decorated sarcophagus that still exists. Inside this sarcophagus is traced the bishop’s recognitio cultus of 1457. She was beatified July 16, 1626, and canonized May 24, 1900. The sources for her life include the short versified life on the sarcophagus of 1457, the biographical introduction of the original list of miracles after 1457 included in her beatification process, and the authentic 15th-century painting with six medallions portraying some events of her life. This painting was described in the beatification process. The iconography of the saint is based on the 15th-century painting as well as on two pictures on the sarcophagus. A new basilica containing the body of the saint was erected in 1946. It is combined with a monastery, school, hospital, and orphanage and is a pilgrim center.

Feast: May 22.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum May 5:224–234. A. MORINI, “La cassa funebre di S. Rita da Cascia,” Archivio per la storia ecclesiastica dell’Umbria 3 (1916) 75–80. F. CAMPO DEL POZO, Vida de S. Rita de Cascia (Zamora 1998). A. GORINI, La devozione a S. Rita de Cascia in Liguria (Cascia 1997).

[F. ROTH]

RITES, CONGREGATION OF

On Jan. 22, 1588, Sixtus V established a Congregation of Sacred Rites and Ceremonies as a part of his systematic arrangement of the Roman congregations. Before long the distinct Ceremonial Congregation assumed responsibility for the ceremonial of the papal court and from that time the Congregation of Sacred Rites remained practically unchanged until the end of the 19th century.

The work of the Congregation fell naturally into two categories: (1) worship in general, including supervision over rites, restoration and reform of ceremonies, reform and correction of liturgical service books, solution of controversies, concession of feasts of saints; and (2) the processes of beatification and canonization. Once the liturgical books authorized by the Council of Trent were published, the Congregation did not substantially reform them until the 20th century, so that its liturgical activity is represented principally by decrees and responses to difficulties rather than by revision of the liturgy.

In order to balance the Congregation's traditional preoccupation with beatification and canonization, Leo XIII added two commissions: (1) the Liturgical Commission (1891) to codify past decrees and to advise the Congregation on liturgical questions; and (2) the Historico-liturgical Commission (1902) to settle historical questions, with special reference to the eventual reform of the liturgical books. Pius X added a third commission, for ecclesiastical music, in 1904.

In the general reform of the Curia by Pius X (1908), the Congregation of Rites was restricted in its competence to matters directly related to sacred worship (in addition to the cult of the saints, as before). Questions of precedence and of the discipline of the sacraments (as distinct from the rite of the sacraments) were transferred to other congregations.

A further reorganization was decreed by Pius X in 1914. He suppressed the three attached commissions and set up two sections of the Congregation itself, one for beatification and canonization, the other for sacred rites. Still later, Pius XI strengthened the Congregation by establishing a third, historical, section in 1930. Its purpose is to engage in historical research necessary for beatification and canonization processes and for the emendation of the liturgical books.

In order to resume the liturgical reform initiated by Pius X, Pius XII in 1948 established a new body attached to the Congregation, the Pontifical Commission for the General Restoration of the Liturgy. This commission undertook a partial revision of the Roman Missal, Breviary, and Pontifical. The reform of all the liturgical books of the Roman rite, which was decreed on Dec. 4, 1963, by Vatican Council II, was entrusted by Paul VI to a new body, the Consilium for the Implementation of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy rather than to the Congregation of Rites (motu proprio Sacram liturgicam, Jan. 25, 1964). The general reform of the Roman Curia by Paul VI in 1967 left the Congregation of Rites relatively unaffected. In the apostolic constitution, Sacra Rituum, dated May 8, 1969, the Congregation of Rites was divided into two separate entities: the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Congregation for the Causes of Saints.

See Also: DIVINE WORSHIP AND THE DISCIPLINE OF THE SACRAMENTS, CONGREGATION FOR.

Bibliography: F. R. MCMANUS, The Congregation of Sacred Rites in Catholic University of America Canon Law Studies 352 (Washington 1954). Decreta authentica Congregationis Sacrorum Rituum, 7 v. (Rome 1898–1927).

[F. R. MCMANUS/EDS.]

RITSCHL, ALBRECHT

German Protestant theologian; b. Berlin, Mar. 25, 1822; d. Göttingen, Mar. 20, 1889. Son of Carl Ritschl (1783–1858), bishop and general superintendent of the Evangelical Church in Pomerania, Albrecht Benjamin Ritschl von Hartenbach studied philosophy and theology at Tübingen and other German universities and became lecturer (1846) and then professor (1852) of New Testament studies and patristics at the University of Bonn. In 1864 he moved to the University of Göttingen as professor of theology and served for a time as chancellor. Ritschl's thought and writings came to exercise an immense influence upon the German theological faculties at Giessen, Tübingen, Marburg, Berlin, and Leipzig, and upon Protestantism throughout the world. A Ritschlian school emerged in the second half of the nineteenth century.

Originally Ritschl subscribed to HEGEL'S interpretation of the early Church's development as presented by the TÜBINGEN SCHOOL, particularly by F. C. BAUR, Ritschl's former teacher. In the second edition of Die Entstehung der altkatholischen Kirche (1857; 1st ed. 1850), in which it was evident that his patristic studies had led him to distrust the speculative-idealistic understanding of history and theology and to advocate instead a nonmetaphysical exposition of sacred scripture and dogma. Ritschl was the first theologian to take seriously and to utilize fully the philosophy of I. KANT, especially the Critique of Practical Reason. According to Ritschl, ontological statements in theology should give way to value judgments, since theology must focus on ethical and moral realities; it cannot operate with deductions from the Ding an sich. After abandoning all forms of natural theology, Ritschl based his system on the revelation in Jesus Christ as the perfect manifestation of the love of God. Ritschl would not permit ontological or metaphysical questions about the natures of Jesus. Instead he proposed a personalistic and moral query about the meaning of Christ for men. Consistent with this viewpoint, Ritschl criticized harshly the ontological Christology and soteriology of the early Fathers of the Church. His approach influenced Adolf von HARNACK, Friedrich Loofs, and other Protestant historians, as well as some Catholic theologians.

The notion of JUSTIFICATION was central in Ritschl's theology. In this regard he followed Luther and anticipated Rudolf Bultmann. Justification, in Ritschl's opinion, should not be conceived in juridical terms, but as the divine act of lifting the "guilt-consciousness," which is simultaneously sin and punishment. This "lifting away" does not mean that God merely forgets sin, for it causes men to believe that God is no longer to be "distrusted" as if his wrath were on man. The result of this trust is reconciliation, full harmony between God and man. Ritschl stressed that God justifies the sinner, not the righteous; yet he emphasized also that God's sole purpose with mankind is moral perfection as revealed by Jesus. This ideal of a moral rule over the entire world Ritschl called the kingdom of God. The realization of divine love in men's lives should be manifested in love for the neighbor; this in turn should be exercised by fulfilling the duties of one's state in life (Beruf). These ideas found their mature expression in Die christliche Lehre von der Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung (3 v. 1870–74; 3d ed. 1888–89; Eng. tr. 1872–1900).

Many conservative theologians and some liberal ones understandably assailed severely Ritschl's theology, whose impact was most noticeable on later theologians, who did not fully agree with it. Among them were Wilhelm Herrmann, Ernst Troeltsch, and perhaps Karl Barth, who was Ritschl's sternest critic.

Bibliography: Genealogisches Handbuch des Adels, v. 26 (Limburg 1961) 307–314, origin and history of Ritschl family. O. RITSCHL, Albrecht Ritschls Leben, 2 v. (Bonn 1892–96), with full bibliog. J. ORR, The Ritschlian Theology and the Evangelical Faith (2d ed. London 1898); Ritschlianism (London 1903). R. MACKINTOSH, Albrecht Ritschl and His School (London 1915). K. BARTH, Die protestantische Theologie im 19. Jahrhundert (2d ed, Zollikon-Zurich 1952). H. O. WÖLBER, Dogma und Ethos: Christentum und Humanismus von R. bis Troeltsch (1950). C. WALTHER, "Der Reich-Gottes-Begriff in der Theologie R. Roth's und A. Ritschl's," Kerygma und Dogma 2 (1956) 115–138. D. L. MUELLER, An Introduction to the Theology of Albrecht Ritschl (Philadelphia 1959). E. SCHOTT, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3rd ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 5:1114–17.

[D. RITSCHL]

Albrecht Ritschl.

RITTER, JOSEPH

Cardinal; b. New Albany, Indiana, July 20, 1892; d. St. Louis, June 10, 1967. Ritter attended St. Meinrad Seminary and was ordained to the priesthood at the Abbey Church on May 30, 1917. He served as rector of the Cathedral of Saints Peter and Paul in Indianapolis until he was ordained an auxiliary bishop of the diocese on March 28, 1933. He succeeded to the diocese on March 24, 1934, and became first archbishop of Indianapolis on Dec. 19, 1944. He was appointed archbishop of St. Louis to succeed the late Cardinal John Joseph Glennon on July 20, 1946. In the consistory of Jan. 16, 1961, he was created cardinal priest of the Church of the Holy Redeemer and St. Alphonsus.

During the first year of his tenure as archbishop of St. Louis, Ritter instructed his pastors to end segregation in Catholic schools for the opening of the 1947 school term. He turned aside the objection of dissenting Catholics who threatened to obtain a court injunction against integration with the warning that they risked automatic excommunication under canon law for impeding an ordinary in the exercise of his pastoral office. He supported and encouraged organizations of the laity and the lay retreat movement and became a leading spokesman for liturgical renewal, twice hosting the National Liturgical Conference meeting at St. Louis (1948 and 1964).

Appointed to the Central Preparatory Commission for the Second Vatican Council, Ritter attended every session of the council and was elected vice president of the Commission for the Clergy. In the aftermath of the council, Ritter was appointed by Pope Paul VI to the Consilium on Sacred Liturgy to help prepare the norms for implementation of the Council's liturgical directives. He spent the final years of his life working to make Vatican II a living reality in his archdiocese, laboring for the establishment of human and civil rights and providing vigorous ecumenical leadership.

[J. W. BAKER]

RITUAL, ROMAN

The Ritual (Rituale) is the liturgical book containing texts for several non-eucharistic liturgies intended generally for presbyteral use, some other sacramental celebrations (e.g. baptism, matrimony, penance, anointing of the sick) and other services (e.g. funerals).

The development of the Ritual as a separate liturgical book was a complex one in late antiquity and the medieval period. As was the case with the sacramentary and the pontifical, early rubrics for the celebration of some ritual services were preserved as individual ordines, or in collections of the ordines romani. Again like the sacramentary and the pontifical, individual ritual celebrations were next recorded in libelli, small booklets prepared for specific services. These libelli were later collected and bound together in more complete volumes for use at specific churches. However, the ritual material was often bound with other liturgical services that in later centuries would be separated into distinct volumes. There were several kinds of these "hybrid" books: one can find many examples of early medieval pontifical-rituals, collectar-rituals, sacramentary-rituals, and even breviary-rituals. The development is further complicated by the presence of ritual material in liturgical books intended for monastic use (especially monasteries involved in the wider cura animarum) as well as books prepared for cathedral and parochial churches. Even the titles of these volumes varied: sacerdotale, manuale, or agenda, among others, are all terms used for this volume, until the name rituale became the standard among the printed editions of the sixteenth century.

The Council of Trent (1545–1563) called for papal supervision in the preparation of revised liturgical books. An earlier volume by Albert Castellani (the Liber Sacerdotalis, 1523) and a revision project already substantially underway (1575–1602) both supplied the groundwork for the Tridentine Rituale Romanum (RR). One of the last of the Tridentine books to appear, the RR was published in 1614 and recommended for adoption by all Roman Catholic dioceses. However, many of these in Europe chose to retain their own ritual books, and it was not until the nineteenth century that the adoption of the RR was more strictly mandated. The volume itself contained twelve "titles," or sections; the sacraments of baptism, confirmation, penance, extreme unction (and funeral liturgy), and matrimony were all included, as well as a section containing various blessings, another on processions, and a final title on exorcisms.

The RR was retained, with two expansions/revisions (1752, 1925) until the middle of the twentieth century. The liturgical reforms mandated by the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965) included a reform of the other sacramental rites and services contained in the old Ritual. The editiones typicae of these rites were published as follows:

Ordo Baptismi parvulorum (1969; editio typicae altera 1977), Ordo celebrandi matrimonium (1969, editio typicae altera 1990), Ordo exsequiarum (1969) Ordo professionis religiosae (1970), Ordo initiationis christianae adultorum (1972), Ordo unctionis infirmorum eorumque pastoralis curae (1972), Ordo paenitentiae (1973), De sacra communione et cultu mysterii eucharistici extra missam (1973), Ritus ad deputandum ministrum extraordinarium sacral communionis (1973), De benedictionibus (1984), De Exorcismis et Supplicationibus Quibusdam (1999).

In addition to the Roman Ritual, other ritual material can be found in the PONTIFICAL, the liturgical book used when a bishop presides, e.g. confirmation and ordination.

Bibliography: P.-M. GY, "Collectaire, rituel, processionnel," Revue des Sciences Philosophiques et Théologiques 44 (1960) 441–469. E. PALAZZO, A History of Liturgical Books: From the Beginning to the Thirteenth Century, trans by M. BEAUMONT (Collegeville, MN Liturgical Press, 1998). C. VOGEL, Medieval Liturgy: An Introduction to the Sources, trans and rev W. G. STOREY and N. K. RASMUSSEN, O.P. (Washington, DC 1986).

[J.M. PIERCE]

RITUAL STUDIES

Ritual studies, sometimes called "ritology," is an emerging field which attracts scholars from such diverse disciplines as anthropology, psychology, religious studies, psychiatry, biology, sociology, and the performing arts. In Beginnings in Ritual Studies (1995), Ronald Grimes, a major authority in the new field, indicated that its originality consists not in the fact that people are studying ritual, but in their attempt to do so in a way which brings a variety of methodological perspectives into dialogue within a cross cultural and comparative context. The American Academy of Religion (AAR) has provided a forum for that discussion; in 1977 the AAR held the first Ritual Studies Consultation as part of its annual meeting.

Ritual studies is a field of some complexity, a factor due largely to its interdisciplinary nature. In an attempt to identify and classify works in the field. Grimes collected 1,600 sources and grouped them under four major categories: ritual components, ritual types, ritual descriptions, and general works in various field clusters (1984, 1985). The sub-headings under each of the first two categories illustrate the great number of topics open to exploration. Under ritual components Grimes lists the following: action, space, time, objects, symbol and metaphor, group, self, divine beings, and language. Among ritual types he includes: rites of passage, marriage rites, funerary rites, festivals, pilgrimage, purification, civil ceremonies, rituals of exchange, sacrifice worship, magic, healing rites, interaction rites, meditation rites, rites of inversion, and ritual drama. Although action is one among many ritual components, Grimes assigns it a place of primacy in the study of ritual. Theodore Jennings agrees and emphasizes the role played by bodily action in the knowledge attained by people through their participation in ritual. Much work remains to be done in elaborating methods to facilitate the study of ritual action.

Relation to Liturgical Studies. While the study of liturgy engages scholars in the exploration of questions from a variety of theoretical and methodological standpoints, it has been suggested that the unifying principle and distinguishing characteristic of liturgical theology is its focus on the living worship of the Church. Since liturgy is a form of ritual action which embodies that worship, it would seem that liturgical scholars have a place within the broader field of ritual studies. The dialogue between liturgy and cultural anthropology emerged in North America, in the wake of the liturgical reforms initiated by the Second Vatican Council. Criticism of some aspects of the reformed Roman Catholic liturgy by such anthropologists as Mary Douglas and Victor TURNER has revealed a certain lack of sensitivity to the nature of ritual in the process of reform. A growing desire on the part of some liturgical scholars to investigate such topics as ritual celebration, ritual symbols, and the process of ritual change led them to venture into the field of cultural anthropology. This interdisciplinary move was supported within the NORTH AMERICAN ACADEMY OF LITURGY.

Until recently liturgical scholars engaged in the study of rites centered their attention on liturgical books or texts as their chief source material. There is a growing recognition among scholars of the need to expand this focus to include liturgical/ritual performance as a source for liturgical theology, liturgical spirituality, and pastoral liturgy. Several attempts to study liturgical performance have already been made. Phase Two of the Notre Dame Study of Catholic Parish Life (1983) included empirical descriptions of liturgical celebrations as part of its data. Also, the Ritual/Language/Action Study Group of the North American Academy of Liturgy has pursued an interest in the study of ritual first expressed in 1976. In recent years the group has been concerned with the question of methodology. Instruments designed by members of the group for the purpose of studying liturgical performance have been used in actual field research and reports have been made at the annual meetings. The experience has provoked a number of questions which are being studied by those engaged in the project.

Diversity of Approaches. Many students of ritual have directed their attention to the study of symbols, but the diversity of symbol theories has made this a difficult task. There is an emerging criticism of the overdependence of symbol theory on linguistic models and a realization that more attention must be directed to symbolic action. Although the study of symbolism occupies a place of primacy in the field, there are some who would challenge this and who question the attention given to the quest for symbolic meaning.

The study of ritual in relation to society remains an area of great interest, and the works of Mary Douglas and Victor Turner continue to command attention. In Natural Symbols (1970) Mary Douglas argued that the propensity for ritual and the body symbolism inherent in ritual are factors that can best be understood when placed in correlation with a more basic set of social relationships. She offered a formula for classifying those relationships that attempted to discern the relative strength or weakness of a society in terms of "group," recognized by boundaries, and "grid," the rules regulating the relationship of an individual with others in the group. Much of her research since then has been directed toward working with and refining this group-grid diagram as a tool to be used in cultural analysis.

Victor Turner's contribution to the field of ritual studies is manifold. This becomes especially apparent when one attends to the development that took place in his own thought. A brief description of this journey can be found in the prologue to On the Edge of the Bush: Anthropology as Experience, a collection of Turner's essays edited posthumously by his wife and collaborator, Edith Turner. Turner began his field work after having been trained within the British structural-functionalist school of anthropology. That gave him a predisposition to view ritual symbols as the reflection or expression of social structure. However, his own experience of studying ritual within its social context persuaded him of the inadequacy of this approach.

Turner's investigation led him to formulate a theory of society as a dynamic process which incorporates dimensions of structure and anti-structure. He presented ritual as a process within the larger social process and emphasized the creative and transformative capabilities of ritual symbols. Turner credited Arnold van Gennep's identification of the liminal or transitional stage of rites of passage with providing inspiration for his own processual view. The notion of drama was central to his understanding of the social process, and he even ventured into the field of theater in pursuit of a richer understanding of performance.

Before he died in 1983, Turner had found a new area of interest in the work of those who were investigating the neurobiology of ritual. He discovered there some possible biological foundations for his hypothesis about the manner in which ritual symbols operate. This encounter also led him to see a need for further dialogue between those involved in brain research and those engaged in the study of culture. Turner's own work presents a good illustration of the complexity of the field of ritual studies.

Methodological Considerations. Those who venture into the field and attempt to study ritual performance face the tasks of gathering, reporting, and interpreting data. Each has its own problems. Should one approach the ritual with a list of categories or questions for the purpose of focusing one's attention, or should one go without such a framework? If one chooses the former approach, on what basis does one choose the categories and questions? What is the balance between participation and observation in one who is attempting to be present as a participant-observer? The task of reporting is equally complex because it means choosing an appropriate style and making decisions about content and degree of detail. Finally, the work of interpretation calls for the choice of a particular theoretical framework and engages one in the exploration of such problems as the meaning of interpretation and the role of the interpreter in the whole process.

The Journal of Ritual Studies promotes interdisciplinary collaboration among scholars engaged in the study of ritual. It is concerned with such topics as theories of ritual, the biological bases of ritual, methods for studying ritual, ritual and myth, ritual texts, and specific types of ritual. Such a forum provides a stage for a new phase in the development of the field.

Bibliography: C.M. BELL, Ritual Theory, Ritual Practice (New York 1992). Ritual: Perspectives and Dimensions (New York 1997). M. COLLINS, "Critical Ritual Studies: Examining an Intersection of Theology and Culture," The Bent World: Essays on Reli- gion and Culture, ed. R. MAY (1981) 127–147. E. G. D'AQUILI, "The Myth-Ritual Complex: A Biogenetic Structural Analysis," Zygon 18 (1983) 247–269. M. DOUGLAS, Cultural Bias (London 1978). R. L. GRIMES, Beginnings in Ritual Studies (Columbia, SC 1995); Research in Ritual Studies: A Programmatic Essay and Bibliography (Metuchen 1985); "Sources for the Study of Ritual," Religious Studies Review 10 (1984) 134–145; Reading, Writing, and Ritualizing: Ritual in Fictive, Liturgical, and Public Places (Washington, D.C. 1993); Readings in Ritual Studies (Upper Saddle River, N.J. 1996); Ritual Criticism: Case Studies in its Practice, Essays on its Theory (Columbia, S.C. 1990). T. W. JENNINGS, "On Ritual Knowledge," The Journal of Religion 62 (1982) 111–127. M. SEARLE, "The Notre Dame Study of Catholic Parish Life," Worship 60 (1986) 312–333. E. L. B. TURNER, "Encounter With Neurobiology: The Response of Ritual Studies," Zygon 21 (1986) 219–232. TURNER, ed., Celebration: Studies in Festivity and Ritual (Wash., D.C. 1982); On the Edge of the Bush: Anthropology as Experience, ed. E. L. B. TURNER (Tuscon 1985).

[M. M. KELLEHER]

RIVADAVIA, BERNARDINO

Argentine political figure; b. Buenos Aires, May 20, 1780; d. Cádiz, Spain, Sept. 2, 1845. Rivadavia studied philosophy and for two years theology in his native city. After backing the revolution in 1810, he rose the following year to the position of secretary of war in the Second Triumvirate, in which he was the leading spirit. In 1820 he was appointed minister of government and foreign affairs of the province of Buenos Aires. In 1826 he attained the presidency of the republic but lost it in 1827.

Rivadavia was an outstanding civic leader and originator of Argentine institutions. He was a reformer by temperament and sought to reform the Church. Having been steeped in Bourbon regalism and influenced by GRÉGOIRE and De Pradt, whom he encountered in France, Rivadavia maintained a religious policy that tended to make the Church dependent upon the state. According to his concept, whatever pertained to discipline fell within the province of the State. Gallican and semi-Jansenist ideas, then very much in vogue among the clergy of repute around him, supported this position and allowed him to limit papal interventions in support of episcopal powers and, still more, in powers of the state. On the basis of these principles, while minister he introduced in the legislature of Buenos Aires a plan of ecclesiastical reform that included (1) abolition of ecclesiastical judicial power, (2) replacement of tithes by a Church budget, (3) reduction and reorganization of the cathedral chapter, (4) suppression of monasteries and confiscation of their property, and (5) prohibition of the taking of vows thereafter in the two convents of women religious. The opposition of the legislature, which sought reform but not suppression of the religious orders, succeeded in saving one of the three largest monasteries in Buenos Aires, the Franciscan, which thus kept alive the mendicant tradition in the province.

It was not Rivadavia's idea, at its most extreme, to create a schismatic church, separate from Rome. He maintained, however, that before entering upon official relations (he tolerated private ones) with the Vatican and drawing up a concordat with it, the country should erect its own ecclesiastical institutions and acquire abroad some degree of standing that would permit it to obtain from the Holy See recognition of its legislation on religious matters.

Bibliography: A. TONDA, Rivadavia y Medrano: Sus actuaciones en la reforma eclesiástica (Santa Fé, Argentina 1952); El deán Funes y la reforma de Rivadavia (Santa Fé, Argentina 1961). G. GALLARDO, La política religiosa de Rivadavia (Buenos Aires 1962).

[A. TONDA]

RIVER BRETHREN

Popular name for the Brethren in Christ Church, so named because its members first met at a point along the Susquehanna River in Lancaster County, Pa. In 1710 groups of Swiss MENNONITES began to settle near the Susquehanna; later other German sectarians, such as the German Baptist Brethren (Dunkers), arrived. [See CHURCH OF THE BRETHREN (DUNKERS)]. Influenced by pietistic REVIVALISM, members from these religious communities, along with some German Lutherans and Reformed, grouped informally as UNITED BRETHREN and began to conduct fellowship meetings in various parts of Lancaster County. The "brotherhood down by the river," or River Brethren, ultimately broke away from the other United Brethren because of differences over the form of baptism and rituals.

The River Brethren followed a way of life similar to that of the Mennonites or Dunkers. Their churches were loosely organized; however, when the Civil War draft began to take members of the sect into the army, the River Brethren were forced to devise a more formal organization to protect conscientious objectors. The sect took the name Brethren in Christ in 1863. Their theology represents a synthesis between PIETISM and the Anabaptist-Mennonite heritage. They stress the necessity of an immediate assurance of salvation through personal experience. Early in the 20th century the sect adopted the Wesleyan doctrine of entire sanctification. With these doctrinal positions, the Brethren in Christ allow only adult baptism; the candidate for baptism is immersed three times. The sect stresses simplicity of life and plain dress, anoints the sick with oil, opposes secret societies, and emphasizes pacifism.

Bernardino Rivadavia, painting.

Bibliography: F.S. MEAD, S.S. HILL and C.D. ATWOOD, eds., Handbook of Denominations in the United States, 11th ed (Nashville 2001).

[W. J. WHALEN/EDS.]

RIVIER, MARIE-ANNE, BL.

Also known as Anne-Marie or Marinette, foundress of the Sisters of the Presentation of Mary; b. Dec. 19, 1768, Montpezat-sous-Bauzon, France; d. Feb. 3, 1838, Bourg-Saint-Andéol, Diocese of Viviers, France; beatified by Pope John Paul II, May 23, 1982.

Marie-Anne Rivier, who had been crippled by a fall as a toddler, was miraculously healed through the faith of her mother and the intercession of the Blessed Virgin Mary (1774).

By age 18, Rivier had opened a parish school, tended abandoned children, and engaged in evangelization. After the outbreak of the French Revolution, Rivier organized secret assemblies on Sundays.

On Nov. 21, 1796, the feast of the Presentation of Mary in the Temple, when the French Revolution was dissolving existing congregations, Rivier and four companions founded a community in the small village of Thueyts, Ardèche, France. With the assistance of Father Pontannier, they consecrated themselves to God and to the education of youth. Neither the Reign of Terror nor the absence of human assistance prevented them from spreading and expanding their apostolate to include adult education and, in 1814, orphanages. The motherhouse was established at Bourg-Saint-Andéol (1819). At the death of Marie-Anne Rivier, who was known for her faith, expansive joy, and courage, the congregation had 141 houses.

The sisters arrived in Canada, Oct. 18, 1853, at the invitation of the first bishop of St. Hyacinthe, Jean-Charles Prince, and began their first mission in the United States at Glens Falls, New York, in 1873.

Bibliography: A.-C. PELLESCI, Une parole de feu (Paris 1983). T. REY-MERMET, In the Strength of Her Vision, tr. G. DAN-SEREAU (Manchester, NH 1978). A. RICHOMME, Marie Rivier (Paris 1967). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 78 (1986): 707–710. L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 24 (1982): 6–7.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

RIVIÈRE, JEAN

Theologian; b. Montcabrier, Tarn, Nov. 12, 1878; d. Bourg-Saint-Bernard, Haute Garonne, May 3, 1946. Jean, the son of a farmer, studied at the seminary of Lavaur, at the major seminary of Albi (1896–1901), and at the faculty of theology in Toulouse (1901–03), where he was a favorite disciple of the rector, P. Batiffol. He was ordained in 1901. He soon became professor of dogma at the seminary of Albi (1903–19). When the Holy Office censured Rivière's opinion on Christ's knowledge, the archbishop discreetly removed him from the seminary. With Batiffol's help Rivière was named by the French government to the chair of fundamental theology at the University of Strasbourg (1919–46). Through his writings he acquired a reputation as an authority in the history and theology of the dogma of Redemption. His principal works are: his doctoral dissertation, Le Dogme de la Rédemption: Étude historique (Paris 1905); Le Dogme de la Rédemption: Etude théologique (Paris 1914); Le Problème de l'Église et de l'État au temps de Philippe le Bel (Paris 1926); Le Modernisme dans l'Église: Étude d'histoire religieuse contemporaine (Paris 1929). His articles appeared especially in the Bulletin de littérature ecclésiastique (Toulouse) and the Revue des sciences religieuses (Strasbourg), and were compiled in a posthumous work, Le Dogme de la Rédemption dans la théologie contemporaine (Albi 1948).

Bibliography: R. BÄUMER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1334. "In Memoriam Mgr Victor Martin et M. Jean Rivière," Revue des sciences religieuses 21 (1947) 5–16. Jean Rivière, bibliographie et souvenirs (Albi, France 1952).

[M. BÉCAMEL]

ROBERT, ANDRÉ

Old Testament exegete; b. Courseullesur-mer, France, Nov. 9, 1883; d. Paris, May 28, 1955. He was ordained on June 29, 1908, became a Sulpician in 1909, and subsequently received the doctorate in theology and the licentiate in sacred scripture at Rome (1911–12). Successively he taught fundamental and moral theology (1912), philosophy (1919), and Sacred Scripture (1922), at the seminary of Issy-les-Moulineaux. In 1928 he became Old Testament Professor at the Institut Catholique of Paris. Thereafter, he devoted himself to personal biblical research, assuming the management of the Supplément au Dictionnaire de la Bible (1940) and the partial editorship of the Bible de Jerusalem and the well-known biblical manual, Initiation Biblique (3d ed. Paris 1954–55). Besides substantial personal contributions to the above works, he published numerous articles on the Old Testament, especially in the field of literary genres. His Le Cantique des Cantiques (Paris 1963) was edited and supplemented by R. Tournay and A. Feuillet after his death.

Bibliography: Mélanges bibliques rédigés en l'honneur de André Robert (Paris 1957) 1–10.

[P. F. CHIRICO]

ROBERT BACON

First Dominican theologian at the University of Oxford and earliest Dominican writer; b. after 1150; d. Oxford, England, 1248. He studied probably at the University of Paris c. 1210 under John of Abbeville, became master of theology in 1219, and was exercising his functions as professor when he joined the Dominicans sometime before 1234. A close associate of St. EDMUND OF ABINGDON and RICHARD FISHACRE, he was active in Church, royal, civic, and university affairs. Most noteworthy was his public denunciation of PETER DES ROCHES before Henry III in his sermon before the Parliament of 1233. As a theologian Bacon was of the Augustinian tradition, conservative in content and method. Few of his works survive, but it is known that he composed a commentary on the Psalms, scriptural glosses, treatises in moral theology and in philosophy, sermons, and homilies. It was long believed he had composed an early life of St. Edmund, but this theory is now rejected.

Bibliography: B. SMALLEY, "Robert Bacon and the Early Dominican School at Oxford," Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, 4th ser. 30 (1948) 1–19. W. A. HINNEBUSCH, The Early English Friars Preachers (Rome 1951) 360–363. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500 (Oxford 1957–59) 1:87.

[J. F. HINNEBUSCH]

ROBERT COWTON

English Franciscan theologian; fl. Oxford, 1300 to 1313. He was a FRANCISCAN at the Oxford friary in 1300 at a time when his fellow friars there included John DUNS SCOTUS, under whom he undoubtedly studied. He is known to have incepted in theology at the University of OXFORD by c. 1313. One of the foremost disciples of Scotus and his successor as lecturer on the Sentences (see SENTENCES AND SUMMAE) at Oxford, Cowton wrote a commentary on the Sentences, which was much in demand in England in the 14th and 15th centuries. The text shows that this commentary was based directly on Scotus's classes at Oxford between 1300 and 1302 and that it was written before Scotus drafted his final version of the Opus oxoniense. Cowton must have worked from Scotus's unedited notes or first draft, undoubtedly between 1303 and 1308. The commentary proves that Cowton was a SCOTIST of high order. Like Scotus, Cowton criticized HENRY OF GHENT, whose work he probably knew only through his teacher. Cowton has often been likened to his contemporary Franciscan, WILLIAM OF NOTINGHAM. About 1400 John Sharp and Richard Snetisham of Oxford made an abbreviated version of Cowton's commentary, which enjoyed a wide circulation, but the basic work remains unedited.

Bibliography: H. THEISSING, Glaube und Theologie bei Robert Cowton OFM (Aschendorff 1970). S. F. BROWN, "Robert Cowton, O.F.M. and the Analogy of the Concept of Being," Franciscan Studies 31 (1971) 5–40. A. G. LITTLE, "The Franciscan School at Oxford in the Thirteenth Century," Archivum Franciscanum historicum 19 (1926) 873–874. O. LOTTIN, Etudes de morale histoire et doctrine (Gembloux 1961) 27–46.

[M. J. HAMILTON]

ROBERT GROSSETESTE

English scholastic, translator, and bishop; b. Suffolk, c. 1168; d. Buckden, Huntingdonshire, Oct. 9, 1253. Although born of humble parentage, he studied at Oxford and most certainly at Paris, where he heard JACQUES DE VITRY, STEPHEN LANGTON, and ROBERT OF COURÇON. He became a master in arts between 1186 and 1191. While lecturing in arts, he wrote an Introitus to the study of the liberal arts, the treatise De generatione sonorum, and a commentary on Aristotle's Sophistici elenchi and Poste- rior Analytics (Venice 1494), in which he laid the foundation for all his later philosophical and scientific works. By 1214 he had become a master in theology either at Oxford or at Paris. Shortly after 1214 he was magister scholarum at Oxford, but the bishop of Lincoln would not allow him the title of chancellor. However, by 1221 this title was recognized at the Roman Curia; hence Grosseteste seems to have been the first chancellor of the University of Oxford (see OXFORD, UNIVERSITY OF). Of his lectures as regent master in theology there survive his commentary In epistolam Pauli ad Galatas, his Moralitates super evangelia, glosses on Psalms 1–100, and especially his Hexaameron, which embodies materials from his lecture notes. He obtained several prebends, but after a grave illness he resigned all except a canonry at Lincoln in 1231. After the Franciscans enlarged their house in Oxford, they prevailed upon Grosseteste to lecture to them. This he did from c. 1232 until Lent 1235. Under him "within a short time they made incalculable progress both in scholastic discussions and in the subtle moralities suitable for preaching" [Eccleston, De adventu fratrum minorum in Angliam, ed. A. G. Little (Manchester 1951) 48]. Having great love for the order and sympathy with the Franciscan spirit, he profoundly influenced the Oxford Greyfriars through his theology and scholarship. While continental Franciscans disputed over the advantages of learning, the Oxford Greyfriars were firmly established in the tradition of learning. He was a teacher and intimate friend of ADAM MARSH, the first Franciscan regent master at Oxford, and he exerted considerable influence on later English Franciscans, notably on ROGER BACON. The majority of Grosseteste's scientific treatises were written after 1230. While he was still lecturing to the Franciscans, he began serious study of Greek, which bore fruit in later years in many translations into Latin from the Greek. He also began the study of Hebrew but never acquired the same proficiency.

Episcopal Career. He was elected bishop of Lincoln in Lent 1235, received royal assent on April 5, and was consecrated at Reading on June 3, 1235. Immediately he began a visitation of his diocese, the largest in England. Zealous and uncompromising in maintaining his ideal of the Church, he deposed many abbots and priors who were lax in their office. Their chief fault was neglecting to staff adequately the parish entrusted to them. In 1237 he witnessed the confirmation of MAGNA CARTA. From 1239 to 1245 he was at odds with the dean and chapter of his cathedral church, who claimed the right of exemption from episcopal visitation. This dispute, in which the dean was suspended and deprived of office, was settled by INNOCENT IV in a bull of Aug. 25, 1245, which gave the bishop full jurisdiction over the chapter. In 1245 he attended the Council of LYONS. During a visit to the papal court at Lyons in 1250, he spoke de corruptelis ecclesiae, denouncing the custom of appointing Italians, ignorant of the language and country, to rich English benefices. Although deeply committed to the doctrine of the plenitude of papal power, he opposed papal taxation of the clergy on behalf of the king in 1251 and 1252, and the appointment of the pope's nephew to a canonry of Lincoln in 1253. As a bishop, zealous in the service of the Church, he denounced ignorance among the clergy and did everything in his power to improve the state of learning. He continued the study of Greek, employed the service of Greek scholars, and obtained numerous Greek manuscripts. He himself translated Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics, De lineis indivisibilibus, a part of De caelo and De virtute; works of St. JOHN DAMASCENE and PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS; and the scholia of St. MAXIMUS THE CONFESSOR, the letters of St. IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH, and the Testamenta 12 patriarcharum. Although other translations have been ascribed to him, their authenticity has not been firmly established. While he was bishop, he also commented on the four major works of Pseudo-Dionysius. His Commentarius in octo libros Physicorum Aristotelis (ed. R. C. Dales, Boulder, Colo. 1963) seems to have been written after 1230, while he was teaching the Franciscans or serving as bishop.

Many of his sermons are extant, at least in draft form. About 80 were collected by a student c. 1230 (Durham, Cath. Libr. MS A. III. 12); others belong to his episcopal period. Grosseteste often reworked his notes into a theological discourse. His Dicta were collected and arranged by himself from sermons and lectures; this work was highly popular in the 14th and 15th centuries. Passages from his Biblical commentaries were extensively quoted by Thomas Gascoigne in Liber de veritatibus collectis (Oxford, Bodl. Libr. Lincoln College MS 117–118).

Teaching and Influence. Grosseteste is important not only as an outstanding churchman, indefatigable in his service to the Church, but also as an independent thinker and scholar who influenced many generations of Englishmen. As a philosopher he was a pioneer in introducing the new Aristotelian learning to Oxford. However, he interpreted ARISTOTLE through AUGUSTINE and Arab Neoplatonists, taking over especially the Augustinian doctrine of LIGHT and ILLUMINATION. For him, light is a very subtle corporeal substance and the first form to be created in primary matter: "Formam primam corporalem, quam quidam corporeitatem vocant, lucem esse arbitror" (De luce; ed. Baur, 51). This first form of light multiplies its own likeness (multiplicatio specierum) in all directions, begetting corporeal dimensionality and specific powers (virtutes) according to determinable laws of mathematical proportionality. Grosseteste did not identify the first form called lux with visible light, which is only one manifestation. Natural philosophy studies the propagation of species and powers, but not the essence of lux itself, the cause of propagation; this is reserved to metaphysics. Since the multiplication of species follows geometrical laws, the whole of natural philosophy is subalternated to mathematics. A clear example of this kind of subalternation is to be seen in optics, the science of visible light: experiments and experimental knowledge provide the facts (quia), but mathematics is required to provide the reason for the fact (propter quid). While mathematics as such abstracts from corporeal phenomena, natural philosophy, optics, and other mathematical-physical sciences must study corporeal phenomena with the aid of mathematics.

The human soul is a special manifestation of light, for it can study the nature of light itself. However, in all knowledge the soul needs to be illumined by God, the source of all light. Thus the existence of God is immediately knowable, even though His existence can also be demonstrated from motion. God, moreover, is the exemplary cause of all things, as well as the efficient and final cause. Grosseteste gave support to the Franciscan school in teaching the primacy of will over intellect and the primacy of divine omnipotence.

The basis for Grosseteste's metaphysics of light is found in Gn 1.1–3, where God is described as having first created primary matter (materia prima), then light (lux). Similarly, the doctrine of divine illumination is established in Jn 1.9: "It was the true light that enlightens every man who comes into the world." Thus the whole of philosophy is subalternated to revelation.

Several attempts to secure his canonization came to nothing. He has always been highly regarded in England. His body is buried in Lincoln Cathedral.

Bibliography: A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 2:830–833. D. A. CALLUS, ed., Robert Grosseteste: Scholar and Bishop (Oxford 1955); "The Oxford Career of Robert Grosseteste," Oxonienia 10 (1945) 42–72. S. H. THOMSON, The Writings of Robert Grosseteste (New York 1940). L. BAUR, "Die philosophischen Werke des Robert Grosseteste, Bischofs von Lincoln," Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie und Theologie des Mittelalters 9 (1912) 1–143. Roberti Grosseteste episcopi quondam Lincolnensis epistolae, ed. H. R. LUARD (Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores 25; 1861). A. TOGNOLO, Enciclopedia filosofica 4:170–172. F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 592–593. É. H. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (New York 1955). A. C. CROMBIE, Robert Grosseteste and the Origins of Experimental Science (Oxford 1953).

[J. A. WEISHEIPL]

ROBERT HOLCOT

English Dominican theologian; b. Holcot, Northamptonshire, c. 1290; d. Northampton, 1349. Known as Doctor firmus et indefatigabilis, he studied and taught at the University of Oxford from c. 1326 to c. 1334, becoming master in theology in 1332. An early version of his commentary on the Sentences of PETER LOMBARD was completed during his years as bachelor: this he revised and amplified in 1336, adding the Sex articuli. In his Sermo finalis, given at Oxford, he alluded to the disturbances that caused the secession of masters to Stamford in 1334. Possibly a regent master at Cambridge, he was one of the scholars encouraged and engaged by RICHARD OF BURY, Bishop of Durham. By 1343 he was assigned to Blackfriars, Northampton, and was licensed to hear confessions in the archdeaconry. He died during the Black Death and was buried in the church of his order at Northampton.

Works. The numerous manuscripts and early editions of his writings testify to his popularity both in England and on the Continent. He was particularly famous for his commentaries on Scripture that compensated for the excessive subtleties of decadent SCHOLASTICISM. His Postilla super librum sapientiae, which, according to two Paris MSS, was written at Cambridge, “made its author famous overnight and his fame held throughout the next two centuries” (Wey, 219). It brought together the traditional teaching of Scripture and a type of prehumanist study deriving from Richard of Bury and his circle. The same combination of learning was expressed in his commentaries on Proverbs (Paris 1510), Song of Songs (Venice 1509), and the Book of Sirach (Venice 1509), which ends abruptly at ch. 7, perhaps because of his death. For the use of preachers, he composed Liber de moralizationibus (Basel 1586) and a set of sermon outlines. This widely used collection of moralized exempla is notable for its classical allusions and for its technique of moral illustrations in stories. Most of his Quodlibeta are unedited. His Quaestiones super libros Sententiarum (Lyons 1497, 1505, 1518) enjoyed a popularity among nominalists.

Doctrine. As a Dominican, Holcot was bound to follow the doctrine of St. THOMAS AQUINAS, and he claimed to do so. But in fact he often disagreed with St. Thomas, adopting the new ideas of WILLIAM OF OCKHAM. Separating philosophy from theology, he insisted that theology has its own logica fidei, not conformable to the natural logic of Aristotle. He was skeptical about man’s ability to know the existence and attributes of God through logica naturalis. Since all human knowledge comes through the senses, man cannot be certain of spiritual beings or form an idea of them. Man’s knowledge of God and angels comes from revelation. Admitting the utility of reasoning in theology to make faith more explicit, Holcot did not admit that this produced a scientific habit distinct from faith.

Stressing the absolute freedom and power of God, he distinguished God’s absolute power (potentia absoluta) from His chosen power (potentia ordinata). Although God has chosen the present plan of salvation, He could dispense with grace, supernatural virtues, the moral code, and accept man’s natural actions as meritorious for salvation. THOMAS BRADWARDINE criticized this view as a form of Pelagianism. Conceiving God and man as partial causes of human acts, Holcot held that God can be called the cause of man’s sin but not its author. This doctrine was condemned at Paris in 1347. For him, the principle of causality (A is the cause of B, if B occurs every time it is preceded by A) is not self-evident, but, at best, only probable.

Bibliography: R. HOLCOT, “Utrum theologia sit scientia: A Quodlibet Question,” ed. J. T. MUCKLE, Mediaeval Studies 20 (1958) 127–153. É. H. GILSON, A History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (New York 1955) 500–502. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500 (Oxford 1957–59) 2:946–947. J. C. WEY, “The Sermo finalis of Robert Holcot,” Mediaeval Studies 11 (1949) 219–224.

[A. MAURER]

ROBERT KILWARDBY

Cardinal, Dominican theologian; b. Leicestershire, England, c. 1215; d. Viterbo, Italy, Sept. 10, 1279. As a student (c. 1231) and later a master in arts at Paris (c. 1237–c. 1245), just as the new Aristotelian learning invaded the university, Kilwardby gained a notable reputation as grammarian, logician, and author of philosophical commentaries. Before 1250 he became a Dominican, probably in England, and studied theology at Oxford. Asked to compose a summary of the origin, nature, and extent of all human sciences for beginners, he wrote De ortu scientiarum, which is extant in many manuscripts. Except for this philosophical work, he dedicated himself entirely to the sacred sciences. After lecturing on the Sentences (1252–54) and the Bible, he became master in theology in 1256, fulfilling his office as regent until 1261. To encourage serious study of patristic sources, he painstakingly composed alphabetical indices (tabulae), analytical indices (concordantiae), and chapter summaries (intentiones) of important patristic writings.

Administrative Positions. In 1261 he was elected provincial of the English Dominicans “because of his sanctity and observance of the rule.” During his provincialate, he eschewed political involvements and devoted himself entirely to his order, establishing at least seven new priories. Having governed the province “most wisely” for 12 years, he was absolved from office by the general chapter of the order in 1272 with the request that he not be reelected immediately. However, his province did reelect him that same year at Northampton, but this term lasted only a few months. Appointed archbishop of Canterbury by Gregory X on Oct. 11, 1272, he was consecrated by William Button, Bishop of Bath and Wells, on Feb. 26, 1273, and enthroned on September 17. Even as archbishop he avoided politics, preferring to be a pastor of souls. In 1273 he called the first full diocesan synod to plan ecclesiastical reform. In 1274 he attended the Council of Lyons, and in his metropolitan visitations he conscientiously enforced its decrees of reform. In his first visitation of Oxford (1276), he issued beneficial injunctions for Merton College, founded two years before by his friend WALTER OF MERTON.

Condemnation of Thomism. The incident for which he is best known took place during his second visit to Oxford. On March 18, 1277, just 11 days after TEMPIER condemned 219 theses at Paris, he issued a condemnation of 30 propositions in grammar, logic, and natural science, some of which had been maintained by THOMAS AQUINAS. Defending his action against criticism of his confrere Peter of Conflans, archbishop of Corinth, he wrote that he did not intend to declare the propositions heretical, but only to prevent their being taught, because “some of them are philosophically at variance with truth, since some are close to intolerable error, and others patently iniquitous, being repugnant to the Catholic faith” [Denifle-Ehrle Arch 5 (1889) 614]. Of the 16 propositions in natural philosophy, five bear directly on the Thomistic doctrine of unicity of substantial form in natural bodies, and six presuppose or follow from it. To Kilwardby the new view was “fantastic,” “false and impossible,” and “repugnant to the Catholic faith.” What he imagined to be consequences of the Thomistic doctrine were certainly contrary to faith; hence he aimed at suppressing the doctrine entirely.

On April 4, 1278, he was appointed cardinal bishop of Porto and Santa Rufina. By February 1279 he arrived in Rome, but on September 10 he died at Viterbo, where he was buried in the church of his Order. An outstanding theologian, he saw an incompatibility between certain fundamental views of pagan ARISTOTELIANISM and the Christian PLATONISM of the Fathers. Although he knew and taught the works of Aristotle, he interpreted them under the Platonizing influence of AVICENNA, AVICBRON, and St. AUGUSTINE. Consequently he could view only with grave concern the innovations of ALBERT THE GREAT and Thomas Aquinas.

Bibliography: É. H. GILSON, A History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (New York 1955) 355—359, 703—705. J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores ordinis praedicatorum (New York 1959) 1.1:374—380. E. M. F. SOMMER-SECKENDORFF, Studies in the Life of Robert Kilwardby, O.P. (Rome 1937). A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500 (Oxford 1957—59) 2:1051—52. R. SCHENK, “Christ, Christianity, and Non-Christian Religions” Christ among the Medieval Dominicans, ed. K. EMERY, JR. and J. P. WAWRYKOW (Notre Dame 1998).

[J. A. WEISHEIPL]

ROBERT OF ARBRISSEL, BL.

Founder of the Order of Fontevrault; b. Arbrissel, Brittany, France, c. 1055; d. Orsan, France, Feb. 25, 1117. He studied at Paris under ANSELM OF LAON, was archpriest of Rennes from 1085 to 1090, taught at Angers from 1090 to 1092, and then withdrew to the forest of Craon in Anjou to live as a hermit. Here he met BERNARD OF TIRON and VITALIS OF SAVIGNY, and attracted a number of disciples whom he formed into a community of canons regular at La Roë. In 1096 Pope URBAN II visited Angers and enjoined on Robert the work of itinerant public preaching, commending him as “second only to himself as a sower of the Word of God in men’s hearts” (Mt 13.3–8). Robert resigned as abbot of La Roë and spent the rest of his life in preaching. He enjoyed a particular success with the poor, prostitutes, and lepers, and converted many men and women to the religious life. In c. 1100 he built a double monastery at FONTEVRAULT and later founded additional priories, until at the time of his death the congregation numbered about 3,000. In 1116 he drew up a constitution for the order and placed it under an abbess, Petronilla (d. 1150), in accordance with the gospel precept (Jn 19.26–27). Robert was buried at Fontevrault. He was praised by his contemporaries for his sanctity and for the apostolic simplicity of his life, and although many miracles were attributed to him, the efforts to bring about his CANONIZATION came to naught.

Feast: Feb. 25.

Bibliography: Writings ascribed to Bl. Robert, Patrologia Latina 162:1079–88 and Bibliothèque de l’École des Chartes 15 (1853–54) 209–235. Lives by Baldric of Dol and Andrew the Monk, in Acta sanctorum 3:608–613. S. HILPISCH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 8:1335–36. L. A. PICARD, Le Fondateur de l’Ordre de Fontevrault: Robert d’Arbrissel (Saumur 1932). R. NIDERST, Robert d’Arbrissel et les origines de l’ordre de Fontevrault (Rodez 1952). Histoire de l’ordre de Fontevrault, 1100–1908, 3 v. (Auch 1911–15). A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum 1:254–255. Bibliographica hagiographica latina 7259–60. B. M. KERR, Religious Life for Women c. 1100–1350: Fontevraud in England (Oxford 1999).

[B. HAMILTON]

ROBERT OF BRUGES, BL.

Abbot; b. Bruges, Belgium, end of 11th century; d. Clairvaux, France, April 29, 1157. He was teaching at LAON when BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, in the course of a journey to LIÈGE, convinced him to accept the monastic vocation. Together with about 30 companions, the so-called captura leodiensis, he followed the abbot and entered the CISTERCIAN Order at the Abbey of CLAIRVAUX in 1131. Bernard had a high regard for Robert, and in 1138 he installed him as first Cistercian abbot at LES DUNES, in Flanders, near his birthplace. On the death of Bernard in 1153, Robert succeeded him as second abbot of Clairvaux. Two letters are preserved that Bernard had written to his disciple before his death (Patrologia Latina, 182:530). He was early honored by the Cistercians, and he is mentioned in the martyrology of 1491, as well as in the Missal of 1526. He was buried at Clairvaux.

Feast: April 29.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Oct. 13:91–96. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, Epistolae 324, 325, Patrologia Latina 182:530. HERBERT, De miraculis 1.8, Patrologia Latina 185:1285–86, CONRAD OF EBERBACH, Exordium magnum cisterciense bk 1.21–23, ed. B. GRIESSER (Rome 1961) 118–123. Biographie nationale de Belgique 19:416–422. U. CHEVALIER, Répertoire des sources historiques du moyen-âge. Biobibliographie, 2 v. (2d. ed. Paris 1905–07) 2:3987. A. DIMIER, Saint Bernard, pêcheur de Dieu (Paris 1953) 57, 192. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 2:123–127. W. BÖHNE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1336. Vita la S. Bernardi 5.3, Patrologia Latina 185:361.

[M. STANDAERT]

ROBERT OF BURY SAINT EDMUNDS, ST.

Reputed martyr; b. 1171; d. 1181, Edmundsbury, England. Ten-year-old Robert is said to have been killed on Good Friday, a victim of ritual murder. Although he was never canonized, his cultus was strong. His relics were translated to the abbey church at Bury St. Edmunds. In his honor Jocelin of Brakelond wrote Miracles of St. Robert.

Bibliography: T. ARNOLD, ed., Memorials of St. Edmund's Abbey, Rerum Britannicarum mediæ aevi scriptores (London 1858–96; rpr. New York 1964) i, 223; iii, 6. WILLIAM OF WORCESTER, Itineraries, ed. J. H. HARVEY (1969), 163.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ROBERT OF COURÇON

Theologian, cardinal; b. Keddleston?, England c. 1158–60; d. Damietta, Egypt, February 1219. Having been a student of arts in Paris from c. 1180 to 1190, Robert also studied theology there between 1190 and 1195 under PETER CANTOR. From 1204 to 1210 he taught theology in Paris, was a canon of Noyon (1204) and Paris (1209), and took part in the process against AMALRIC OF BÈNE and his followers. In 1212 Pope Innocent III raised him to the cardinalate, and on April 19, 1213, he was made legate to France; in this office he was often severe and not always prudent in his decisions. He reorganized studies at the University of Paris in 1215, and he drew up a set of statutes for the arts faculty and theologians, repeating, with additions, a previous prohibition against the teaching of Aristotle (see SCHOLASTICISM, 1). In February of 1216, he returned to Rome; then in August of 1218 he accompanied the Crusaders to Egypt, and died during the siege of Damietta. As a scholastic, Robert was a theologian of a primarily practical bent; his Summa, written between 1204 and 1208, contains many canonico-moral questions and medical cases. According to some catalogues, he also commented on parts of the Sentences of PETER LOMBARD.

Bibliography: M. and C. DICKSON, "Le Cardinal Robert de Courçon: Sa vie," Archives d'histoire doctrinale et littéraire du moyen-âge (1934): 53–142. M. GRABMANN, I divieti ecclesiastici di Aristotele sotto Innocenzo III e Gregorio IX (Rome 1941). A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 1:498–499. V. L. KENNEDY, "Robert Courçon on Penance," Medieval Studies 7 (1945): 291–336.

[I. C. BRADY]

ROBERT OF FLAMBOROUGH

Canon penitentiary at the Abbey of SAINT-VICTOR, Paris, author of a Penitential that was forerunner of the summae casuum and so of later manuals of moral theology; b. probably Flamborough, Yorkshire, c. 1135–80; d. Paris, c. 1219–33. His Penitential, or Liber poenitentialis, completed between 1208 and 1213, is a small book of instruction for the confessor. The first two-thirds is a dialogue in which extensive use is made of commentaries on the Decretum of GRATIAN, especially that by HUGUCIO, and of decretals of popes from ALEXANDER III to INNOCENT III. His uncritical use of these sources resulted in excessive legalism. The last third consists of old penitential canons copied from the Penitential of BARTHOLOMEW OF EXETER and from the Decretum of IVO OF CHARTRES. These canons, already obsolete in their literal application, were intended as a basis for the apportioning of penance. The author was criticized by his contemporaries for his reliance on these old canons; yet some continued to copy and annotate them for practical use even a century later.

Bibliography: ROBERT OF FLAMBOROUGH, Summa de matrimonio et de usuris, ed. J. F. SCHULTE (Giessen 1868), a partial ed.

of the Penitential; complete ed. is being prepared by F. FIRTH. P. MICHAUD-QUANTIN, "À propos des premières Summae confessorum," Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 26 (1959) 276–283, 292–296. S. KUTTNER, "Pierre de Roissy and Robert of Flamborough," Traditio 2 (1944) 492–499. F. FIRTH, "The Poenitentiale of Robert of Flamborough," ibid. 16 (1960) 541–556; 17 (1961) 531–532; Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1338–39.

[F. FIRTH]

ROBERT OF MELUN (HEREFORD)

English theologian, bishop of Hereford from 1163; b. c. 1100; d. Feb. 27, 1167. Beginning in 1142 he taught theology in Melun, France, enjoying great renown as a teacher. He criticized the teachings of Peter ABELARD on original sin and Christ's person and of GILBERT DE LA PORRÉE on Trinitarian doctrines, and the claim of PETER LOMBARD that the power to sin was a true power coming from God. Robert's best theological elaboration is in his Sentences (1152–60), invaluable as a source of contemporary theological doctrines. In this work he criticized current theological teaching for superficiality, lack of synthesis, overuse of glosses, failure to search for truth, and excessive cult of literature. Though his exegesis was in the Platonic spirit of the school of Chartres, he also relied on St. Augustine. His writings were widespread, although they never became manuals as did the works of Peter Lombard. Nor, because of the excellence and popularity of Lombard's school and his own departure for England, did Robert ever become the head of a school. His is the glory of having made a notable advance in theological method. Of philosophical interest is his opposition to the NOMINALISM of ROSCELIN. He also followed the then-common interpretation of Boethius's distinction between quod est and quo est, or esse., whereby the quo est is the form of the whole (forma totius).

Bibliography: Oeuvres de Robert de Melun, ed. R. M. MARTIN, Spicilegium sacrum Lovaniense, 3 v. in 4 (Louvain 1932–52) v. 1 Quaestiones de divina pagina, v. 2 Quaestiones (theologicae) de epistolis Pauli (1938) v. 3: 1–2 Sententiae (1947–52), ed. with R. M. GALLET. J. DE GHELLINCK, Le Mouvement théologique du XII^e siècle (Bruges 1948); L'Essor de la littérature latine au XII^e siècle (Brussels-Paris 1946). 1:55–57, with bibliog. F. ANDERS, ed., Die Christologie des Robert von Melun (Paderborn 1927). F. P. BLIEMETZRIEDER, "Robert de Melun und die Schule Anselms von Laon," Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 53 (1934): 154–163. A. M. LANDGRAF, "Familienbildung bei Paulinenkommentaren des 12. Jahrhunderts: Robert von Melun und seine Schule," Biblica 13 (1932): 169–193. R. M. MARTIN, "Pro Petro Abaelardo: Un Plaidoyer de Robert de Melun contre s. Bernard," Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques 12 (1923): 308–333. P. W. NASH, "The Meaning of Est in the Sentences (1152–1160) of Robert of Melun," Mediaeval Studies 14 (1952): 129–142. U. HORST, Die Trinitats- und Gotteslehre des Robert von Melun (Mainz 1964); Ge- setz und Evangelium: Das Alte Testament in der Theologie des Robert von Melun (Munich 1971).

[P. W. NASH]

ROBERT OF MOLESME, ST.

Founder of CÎTEAUX; b. near Troyes in Champagne, France, c. 1027; d. Molesme, 1110. He was the Benedictine prior of Moutier-la-Celle, near Troyes, when he was elected abbot of Saint-Michel-de-Tonnerre, near Langres. Unable to effect the much-needed reform of discipline, he left. From 1072–73 he was prior of Saint-Ayoul in Provins. But a group of hermits at Collan, near Tonnerre, wanted him as their spiritual director, and with Pope ALEXANDER II's approval he took up residence with them. Their place of abode was most unhealthy so they moved to MOLESME in 1075. But Molesme, originally poor in wealth, but rich in regular observance of the BENEDICTINE RULE, in a short time became rich in property and correspondingly poor in its regular life. The community split and monks under the leadership of Robert who desired the strict monastic observance withdrew from the community. They went to HUGH OF DIE, the legatus natus, who was prominent in the GREGORIAN reform movement and thus welcomed Robert's request for the opportunity to live according to the strict interpretation of the Benedictine rule. In his letter confirming the demands made by Robert, Hugh mentions the laxity of observance at Molesme and the impossibility of Robert and his monks attaining their objectives there. Thus they were given permission to seek another place. Twenty-one monks joined Robert in the exodus from Molesme to Cîteaux, which was then a swamp. The bishop of Chalon-sur-Saône canonically installed Robert at Cîteaux, or, as it was called, "New Monastery" (1098). On Robert's departure the monks at Molesme elected Godfrey as their abbot, but he was uneasy about his status and journeyed to Rome. It was at his request that the pope directed Hugh of Die to see that Robert returned to Molesme. A provincial council was called, and it decided that Robert should return to his former abbey. Robert had been at Cîteaux only a year and a half. Henceforth the two abbeys remained peacefully independent. Thus, although Robert founded the abbey, it was Alberic, STEPHEN HARDING, and St. BERNARD who respectively built, organized, and propagated the CISTERCIANS. Robert was a part of the 11th-century movement that sought not only to reform but to renovate monasticism. This same century produced the Carthusians, Camaldolese, and Vallombrosans as well as such congregations as Tiron, Bec, and Savigny.

The basic document concerning Robert's place in the foundation of Cîteaux is the Exordium parvum.

Feast: April 29.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum April (Paris 1863–) 3:670–685. Exordium parvum in Les Monuments primitifs de la règle cistercienne, ed. P. GUIGNARD (Dijon 1878). U. BERLIÈRE, “Les Origines de Cîteaux,” Revue d’histoire ecclésiastique 1 (1900) 448–471; 2 (1901) 253–290. W. A. PARKER MASON, “The Beginnings of the Cistercian Order,” Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, NS 19 (1905) 169–207. J. LAURENT, Cartulaires de l’abbaye de Molesme, 2 v. (Paris 1907–19); “Le Problème des commencements de Cîteaux,” Annales de Bourgogne 6 (1934) 213–229; 12 (1940) 31–36. J. OTHON DUCOURNEAU, “Les Origines cisterciennes,” Revue Mabillon 23 (1933) 153–189. W. WILLIAMS, Journal of Theological Studies 37 (1936) 404–412. K. SPAHR, Das Leben des hl. Robert von Molesme (Fribourg 1947). S. LENNSEN, “S. Robert, fondateur de Cîteaux,” Collectanea ordinis Cisterciensium Reformatorem 4 (Rome–Westmalle 1937–38) 2–16, 81–96, 161–177, 241–253. F. DELAHAYE, “Un Moine: S. Robert . . .,” ibid. 14 (1952) 83–106. J. A. LEFÈVRE, “S. R. de Molesme dans l’opinion monastique . . .,” Analecta Bollandiana 74 (Brussels 1956) 50–83. N. KINSELLA, “S. R.: A Monk in a Changing World,” ibid. 24 (1962) 3–10. J. B. VAN DAMME, Les trois fondateurs de Cîteaux (Roybon 1966). M. RAYMOND, Three Religious Rebels: The Forefathers of the Trappists (Boston 1986).

[J. F. O’SULLIVAN]

ROBERT OF NEWMINSTER, ST.

Abbot; b. Yorkshire; d. Newminster, June 7, 1159. After studies in Paris he returned to England and was active as a secular priest, then as a Benedictine monk at the Abbey of WHITBY. In 1132 Robert joined the CISTERCIANS, participated in the foundation of the Abbey of FOUNTAINS, and in 1139 founded and became the first abbot of Newminster, near Morpeth, Northumberland. Under Robert, Newminster grew phenomenally, establishing three daughterhouses, Pipewell, Roche, and Sawley, in less than 10 years. Robert’s tomb at Newminster became the scene of numerous miracles and was a popular pilgrimage shrine until the Reformation. He was never formally canonized, but in 1656 the Cistercian Order approved his cult.

Feast: June 7.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 2:46–49. J. D. DALGAIRNS, The Cistercian Saints of England (London 1844). G. MÜLLER, “Der hl. Robert, Abt von Newminster,” Cistercienser-Chronik 5 (1893) 321–328. S. LENNSEN, Hagiologium cisterciense, 2 v. (Tilburg 1948–49; suppl. 1951) 1:97–99.

[L. J. LEKAI]

ROBERT OF ORFORD (DE COLLETORTO)

English Dominican theologian; d. probably before 1300. Variations of his name include Tortocollo, Hereford, and Orphordius. Almost nothing is known of his life; it has been speculated that he may be a confusion of two scholars, or a Franciscan writer, or the Dominican WILLIAM MACCLESFELD. What is known of Robert is culled chiefly from his works, which show great depth; though written in defense of THOMISM, they are relatively mild in their polemic. Robert defended the teachings of St. THOMAS AQUINAS and his school in Impugnatio Henrici de Gandavo, aimed at the quodlibets of HENRY OF GHENT. He directed another work against GILES OF ROME, the Reprobationes dictorum a fratre Aegidio in sententiarum libros. Most likely he wrote the Correctorium “Sciendum” against WILLIAM DE LA MARE. He also composed a commentary on the second book of the Sentences, a work on the unity of forms, and a commentary on Aristotle’s De somno et vigilia.

Bibliography: D. A. CALLUS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1337. W. A. HINNEBUSCH, The Early English Friars Preachers (Rome 1951) 391–396. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500 (Oxford 1957–59) 2:1401. P. BAYERSCHMIDT, “Robert von Colletorto, Verfasser des Correctorium ‘Sciendum’,” Divus Thomas (Fribourg) 17 (1939) 311–326. P. GLORIEUX, “Les Correctoires: Essai de mise au point,” Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 14 (1947) 287–304.

[J. F. HINNEBUSCH]

ROBERT OF SOLETO, BL.

Celestine monk (also known as Robert of Sala, Salle), b. Sala, Italy 1273; d. Morrone, July 18, 1341. He received the monastic habit from Peter of Morrone in 1289. When the latter was elected Pope CELESTINE V in 1294, Robert declined the cardinal’s hat, for which PETRARCH commended him in his De vita solitaria (2.3, ch. 18). As prior and general procurator of the CELESTINES, Robert was the founder of monasteries and hospices for the sick and orphans. Contemporaries revered him for his mortification and devotion to the Sacred Passion.

Feast: July 18.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum July 4:498–509. A. M. ZIMMERMAN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 4 vol. (Metten 1933–38) 2:470–471, 473. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l’ordre du calendrier avec l’historique des fêtes, 12 vol. (Paris 1935–56) 7:408.

[V. GELLHAUS]

ROBERT OF TORIGNY

Known also as Robertus de Monte, abbot and chronicler; d. June 24, 1186. He was a BENEDICTINE at the Abbey of BEC from 1128 and became prior there (1154) and then the most celebrated abbot of MONT-SAINT-MICHEL, where he promoted monastic discipline, learning, and physical expansion. ALEXANDER III invited him to participate in the Synod of Tours in 1163. A man of high culture, he revised the Gesta Normannorum ducum of William of Jumièges, adding it as book eight of the Historia Henrici I regis Anglorum; his continuation of the chronicle of SIGEBERT OF GEMBLOUX is an important source of Anglo-French history. He was also interested in the history of the East, in the translation of the works of ARISTOTLE, and in the history of the episcopal sees of France, for which he drew up an important catalog.

Bibliography: Chronica, ed. L. DELISLE, 2 v. (Publication de la Société de l'histoire de normandie; Rouen 1872–73), also ed. L. C. BETHMANN, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores (Berlin 1826–) 6:475–535; Tractatus de immutationibus ordinis monachorum, ed. L. DELISLE, op. cit. 2:184–206. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 3:346, 442–445. J. DE GHELLINCK, L'Essor de la littérature latine au XII^e siècle, 2 v. (Brussels-Paris 1946) 2:96–97. K. SCHNITH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1343.

[O. J. BLUM]

ROBERT OF WINCHELSEA

Archbishop of Canterbury; b. probably Winchelsea, Sussex, England, c. 1240; d. Otford, Kent, May 11, 1313. He studied arts at Paris, possibly for a time under THOMAS AQUINAS, and became rector of the university in 1267. He then studied theology at Oxford, became a doctor of theology, and was chancellor by 1288. He delivered a series of quaestiones on the Trinity at St. Paul's Cathedral. Elected archbishop of CANTERBURY in 1293, he was forced by a vacancy in the papacy to wait 18 months before being consecrated at Aquila in 1294. He thus entered his office with enormous debts and was immediately faced with King Edward I's demands for clerical subsidies for the war with France. The archbishop struggled constantly to scale these down and was further embarrassed by the issue in 1296 of CLERICIS LAICOS, which he delayed publishing for a year. Upon refusing to make the king further grants, he and most of his clergy were punished by outlawry and the confiscation of their revenues. Robert had to live on charity for five months. Then, to ease his clergy's difficulties, he allowed each to follow his own conscience. A truce with France, invasion by the Scots, and the compromise offered by Etsi de statu allowed him to reach an accommodation with the king, but he continued to insist on all his other prerogatives. Pope BONIFACE VIII's death and the election of Edward I's vassal as CLEMENT V deprived Robert of any papal support, and in 1306 he was suspended from office and left England. After Edward I's death (1307), he was recalled by the new king but was soon at odds with him, particularly over Gaveston, whose banishment Robert supported in 1308. In 1310 he was chosen as one of the lords' ordainers to supervise Edward II's conduct of the government, and he was their guiding spirit until his death. Ascetic and generous, he also loved power; defending the Church against royal encroachments, he punctiliously upheld his own rights within the Church, conducting a prolonged feud with the archbishop of York and the royal treasurer, Bishop Walter Langton.

Bibliography: R. WINCHELSEY, Registrum . . ., ed. R. GRAMHAM (Canterbury and York Society, 123; London 1956). The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 21:626–632. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 3:2057–2059.

[B. S. SMITH]

ROBERT PULLEN

English theologian and cardinal (also Pullus, Polanus, or Pulein); b. c. 1080; d. Viterbo, September 1146. He studied at Paris under WILLIAM OF CHAMPEAUX after 1103, according to F. Courtney. In 1133 he came from Exeter to Oxford and lectured for about five years on Scripture, "which had fallen into neglect among the scholastics"; he also gained renown for his sermons. He was appointed archdeacon of Rochester in 1134. A letter of St. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX speaks of a journey to Rome by Robert before or during 1142, and mentions Bernard's advice that Pullen spend some time in Paris "because of the sound doctrine he is acknowledged to possess" (Epistles 205, Patrologia Latina 182:372–373). This marks the beginning of his teaching at Paris, a fact confirmed by JOHN OF SALISBURY (Metalogicon 2.10, Patrologia Latina 1:99:869). Pullen was called to Rome by Lucius II (1144–45) and made the first English cardinal. After the election of Eugene III, Bernard exhorted Pullen to counsel and support the new Cistercian pope (Epistles 362, Patrologia Latina 182:563–564). Pullen's death probably occurred at Viterbo, not Rome, before Sept. 18, 1146. His extant and known writings include a number of sermons and the Sententiarum libri VIII (Patrologia Latina 186:639–1010), written in Oxford, perhaps before 1142. While many questions parallel the Sentences of PETER LOMBARD, it appears to have had no influence on Lombard (See SCHOLASTICISM).

Bibliography: F. PELSTER, "Einige Angaben über Leben und Schriften des Robertus Pullus," Scholastik 12 (1937): 239–247. F. COURTNEY, "Cardinal Robert Pullen: An English Theologian of the 12th Century," Analecta Gregoriana 64 (Rome 1954).

[I. C. BRADY]

ROBERT WALDBY OF YORK

Augustinian opponent of Wyclif, archbishop; b. Yorkshire; d. Jan. 6, 1398. His elder brother or cousin was the celebrated Augustinian JOHN OF WALDBY. Robert was ordained at York in 1362. Studying first at the Oxford Convent, he earned his doctorate in theology at Toulouse, perhaps in the early 1370s. He had a long connection with Aquitaine; he was there probably with the Black Prince between 1363 and 1367, and was duchy chancellor in 1386 and bishop of Aire (1386–90). Prominent in the sermon and pamphlet war against John WYCLIF, he attended both the 1382 Black Friars synod of Archbishop William COURTENAY at London, and the 1392 council at Stamford that tried Henry CRUMPE and condemned Wyclif's teachings. Waldby is said to have written a work Contra Wiclevistas. As archbishop of Dublin (1390) he was a loyal supporter of King RICHARD II, holding the post of Irish chancellor in 1392. Richard obtained his translation to Chichester (1395) and, reputedly against the wishes of the monks, to the archbishopric of York (1396). The king had Robert's body buried in Westminster Abbey. He is reputed to have studied medicine as well as theology and to have been physician to Richard II.

Bibliography: J. TAIT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 20:469–470. A. O. GWYNN, The English Austin Friars in the Time of Wyclif (London 1940) 115–116, 270–272. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 3:1958.

[F. D. BLACKLEY]

ROBERTS, JOHN, ST.

Welsh Benedictine priest, martyr; b. Trawsynydd, Merionethshire (now Gwynedd), Wales, 1576 or 1577; hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London), Dec. 10, 1610. Nothing is known of his parentage or his early education. On Feb. 26, 1593, he entered St. John's College, Oxford. Before taking his degree, he left the university to study at the Inns of Court, London. In 1598, while visiting Paris, he was received into the Church at Notre Dame. From Paris he went to Valladolid and there entered the English College on Sept. 15, 1598. Convinced that he had a vocation to the monastic life, he later joined the Benedictine monastery of S. Martino de Compostella, Valladolid. He was ordained in 1602; he left for England, reaching London (April 1603) where he became very famous among the English papists, and many resorted to him, some out of curiosity to see a Benedictine monk once again in England. Roberts was arrested and then released (1603), and exiled with Sigebert Buckley, a priest aged 86, a prisoner for 30 years and the last survivor of the pre-Reformation English Benedictine congregation. The same year Roberts was back in England ministering to the plague-stricken in London.

During the next seven years Roberts was arrested four times and banished at least twice; on one occasion he escaped from Gatehouse Prison, Westminster. His final arrest occurred on Dec. 2, 1610, the first Sunday of Advent, while he was finishing Mass at a house in Holborn. On Dec. 5, he was brought for trial before George Abbot, bishop of London, and Edward Coke, chief justice. He defended himself eloquently. When accused of being a "deceiver of the people," he turned on Bishop Abbot: "I do not deceive, but try to lead back to the right path those poor wandering souls whom you and your foolish ministers have led astray and infected with a thousand deceits and heresies"; then he told Abbot: "You had done much better, my Lord, to remain in your palace and in your church and chapter, reforming the dissolute conduct of your clergy than to come and sit on this bench, while matters of life and death are being decided." Roberts was found guilty. When three days later he was taken again before the bench to hear the sentence, he spoke nobly. On December 10 he was dragged from Newgate to Tyburn, where he was executed along with (Bl.) Thomas Somers, a Douai priest who had stood trial with him. He was beatified on Dec. 15, 1929, and canonized by Paul VI on Oct. 25, 1970 as one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales. Roberts is honored as the proto-martyr of St. Gregory's Abbey, now Downside.

Feasts: December 10; October 25 (Feast of the 40 Martyrs of England and Wales); May 4 (Feast of the English Martyrs in England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: W. PHILLIPSON, Blessed John Roberts (Postulation Pamphlet; London 1961). R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). B. CAMM, A Benedictine Martyr in England: The Life and Times of Dom John Roberts (London 1897). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 4:534–536. T. P. ELLIS, Catholic Martyrs of Wales (London 1933). J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time, 5 v. (London-New York 1885–1902; repr. New York 1961) 5:431–432.

[G. FITZHERBERT]

ROBERTS, THOMAS D'ESTERRE

Archbishop of Bombay (1937–50), outspoken defender of the importance of personal CONSCIENCE and intelligent obedience; b. March 7, 1893 in Le Havre, d. Feb. 28, 1976 in London. He was the son of a British consul descended from a line of French Huguenots. His father became a Catholic in 1900 and Thomas was educated at the Jesuit college in Liverpool. He entered the Society of Jesus Sept. 7, 1909 and was ordained to the priesthood Sept. 20, 1925. After teaching at Jesuit colleges at Preston and Beaumont, followed by a term as rector of St. Francis Xavier's College, Liverpool, he was appointed archbishop of Bombay in 1937, an appointment he first learned about from reading a local newspaper.

The See of Bombay at the time of his appointment had a long history of ecclesiastical divisions. The Portuguese, the original colonizers, had received from the Holy See the privileges of padroado protectorate, the government's right to approve ecclesiastical appointments. With Bombay under British rule, an agreement was reached that the archbishop would be alternately English and Portuguese. The sharp rivalries among the different factions within the archdiocese Abp. Roberts sought to overcome first, by personal diplomacy with the Portuguese government in Lisbon and then by reorganizing parish boundaries. He initiated a wide-ranging program of social services with particular emphasis on the needs of women, soldiers, and sailors. He also wrote a series of letters to children in the local newspaper that became an effective vehicle of instruction for young and old.

Above all, Abp. Roberts recognized that at a time of nationalistic aspirations for independence, the Church in Bombay should eventually be guided by an Indian archbishop. He pressed this view on the Holy See and, in 1946, an Indian, Valerian Gracias (later Cardinal), was appointed auxiliary. Bp. Gracias quickly assumed the day-to-day administration of the archdiocese as Abp. Roberts deliberately absented himself. When, in 1950, Bp. Gracias was officially named archbishop, Roberts returned to England.

In the next 25 years he became known as an unconventional churchman who labored indefatigably for such causes as disarmament and world peace, for a rethinking of Church teaching on artificial CONTRACEPTION, and for the rights of personal conscience. In 1954 he published Black Popes—Authority: Its Uses and Abuses, a small volume which attracted attention for its frank criticism of secular and ecclesiastical authoritarianism. He urged the need for "intelligent obedience," which he understood to be a characteristically Jesuit and Ignatian ideal. One of the most painful episodes in his life was his delation to Rome (1960) by the apostolic delegate for his views and public statements. Abp. Roberts, insisting that most of the charges were untrue, urged a full and impartial hearing. Although Pope John XXIII promised such a hearing, it never was held. Roberts was not satisfied with assurances that he had been vindicated simply because the matter had not been pursued. Instead, he contrasted the standards of fairness found in English Common Law with the secrecy of ecclesiastical procedures, where there was never reparation of the damage done to personal reputation.

Through the years of VATICAN COUNCIL II (1962–65), Abp. Roberts called for reform of the Roman CURIA. Although he never did speak in the formal sessions of the council (despite his request to do so), he became a popular figure at the press briefings outside of the formal sessions. He sought to have the council issue a strong condemnation of all nuclear weapons, to support the rights of conscientious objectors to war, and urged re-examination of the teaching on artificial contraception, since he was convinced that the absolute ban on all contraception imposed heavy burdens on many Catholic families. The last issue brought him into conflict with members of the English hierarchy, in particular, Cardinal John Heenan, in 1964. Abp. Roberts had admitted publicly that he simply could not understand the rational arguments for the prohibition of all artificial contraception, Cardinal Heenan defended the traditional ban and lamented the fact that the faithful were being misled by some of their shepherds. The establishment of a special commission by Pope Paul VI to study the question was seen by some as a vindication of the questions raised by Roberts. The encyclical HUMANAE VITAE, issued in 1968, however, reiterated the traditional teaching.

Although considered by some to be a "maverick bishop," Abp. Roberts was a man with a rare sense of the ridiculous and the absurd, and his sense of humor appealed even to those who disagreed with him. He was also a pastor of extraordinary warmth and sensitivity to human suffering, and many who came in contact with him through retreats in England and the United States, and also through personal counseling at the Jesuit residence in Farm Street in London, found him a great source of faith. In addition to Black Popes, he wrote a foreword to Nuclear Weapons and Christian Conscience (1961) and contributions to Problems of Authority (1962), Objections to Roman Catholicism (1963) and Contraception and Holiness (1963). His last book was The Diary of Bathsheba (1970).

Bibliography: D. A. HURN, Archbishop Roberts, SJ—His Life and Writings (London 1966).

[J. A. O'HARE]

ROBERTSON, JAMES

Canadian Presbyterian leader; b. Dull, Perthshire, Scotland, April 24, 1839; d. Toronto, Canada, Jan. 4, 1902. His parents, James and Christina (McCallum) Robertson, immigrated to Canada with him in 1855. After education at the University of Toronto; Princeton University, N.J.; and Union Theological Seminary, New York City, he was ordained (1869) a minister of the Presbyterian Church in Canada. He served at Norwich, Ontario (1869–74), and was minister of Knox Church at Winnipeg (1874–81) before being appointed (1881) superintendent of the Presbyterian missions in western Canada. He held this post until his death, gaining a reputation for his ability to deal effectively with the problems of his farflung missions. In 1895 he was elected moderator of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, which in 1913 established the Robertson Memorial Lectureship, consisting of eight lectures to be given annually in the eight theological colleges of the United Church of Canada. One of the lectures must deal with some aspect of Dr. Robertson's life or with the territory in which he worked. He married (1869) Mary Anne Cowing; they had two daughters.

Bibliography: C. W. GORDON, The Life of James Robertson, Missionary Superintendent in the Northwest Territories (New York 1908). J. T. MCNEILL, The Presbyterian Church in Canada, 1875–1925 (Toronto 1925).

[E. DELANEY]

ROBESPIERRE, MAXIMILIEN FRANÇOIS DE

French Revolutionary leader; b. Arras, May 6, 1758; d. Paris, July 28, 1794. Orphaned at nine, he studied law and became a judge in criminal cases. He was elected to the Estates-General (1789) and later to the National Convention. His rise to prominence during the FRENCH REVOLUTION was gradual. A champion of the rights of the people and of natural virtue, he espoused the reforms of Aug. 4, 1789, and advocated confiscation of ecclesiastical property and the death sentence for Louis XVI. When the revolution deteriorated toward extremism after June 1792, Robespierre upheld the constitution of 1791 and opposed war and military dictatorship. In the power struggle after the king's execution (Jan. 21, 1793), Robespierre conceived the Committee of Public Safety. Under his Jacobin leadership it prevented foreign invasion; established peace and prosperity; instituted republican government; and purged the Girondins, the radical Hebertists, and the conservative Dantonists, thereby placing the Jacobins in supreme control. Mounting problems necessitated stern legislative measures to further the distribution of state-appropriated lands and the expedition of justice; but these measures increased the savagery of this period of terror.

As a believer in natural religion and a follower of Jean Jacques ROUSSEAU, Robespierre instituted the Republic of Virtue (June 1794) and the cult of the SUPREME BEING as an alternative to Catholicism, atheism, and the cult of the goddess REASON; but popular enthusiasm was slight. Instead, the innovation precipitated a reaction and a conspiracy among the deputies that culminated in Robespierre's downfall and execution by guillotine.

Bibliography: Oeuvres complètes, ed. E. DÉPREZ et al. (Paris 1910–). L. E. HAMEL, Histoire de Robespierre, 3 v. (Paris 1865–67). A. MATHIEZ, Études robespierristes, 2 v. (Paris 1917–18); The Fall of Robespierre, and Other Essays, tr. from Fr. (New York 1927). J. M. THOMPSON, Robespierre, 2 v. (Oxford 1935); Robespierre and the French Revolution (New York 1953). G. WALTER, Robespierre, 2 v. (def. ed. Paris 1961). R. R. PALMER, Twelve Who Ruled (Princeton 1941). H. BELLOC, Robespierre (2d ed. London 1927). M. BOULOISEAU et al., eds., Discours de Maximilien Robespierre, 4 v. (Paris 1950–59).

[R. J. MARAS]

ROBINSON, CHRISTOPHER, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. at Woodside (near Carlisle), Cumberland, England; hanged, drawn, and quartered Aug. 19, 1598 at Carlisle. He studied at Rheims (1589–92), where he was ordained (1592) before entering the English Mission. In 1594, he witnessed the condemnation and execution of St. John BOSTE at Durham, of which he has left a graphic account (Catholic Record Society's Publications, v. 1, London 1905, 85–92). He labored primarily in Westmoreland and Cumberland until his arrest and imprisonment at Carlisle. During his confinement, the Protestant Bishop Robinson of Carlisle unsuccessfully engaged him in several disputations in an effort to persuade him to save his life by conforming to the new faith. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ROBINSON, PASCHAL

Author and apostolic nuncio to Ireland; baptized Charles; b. Dublin, Ireland, April 26, 1870; d. Dublin, Aug. 26, 1948. While Charles was still a boy, his family left Ireland for the U.S., where he entered the novitiate of the Order of Friars Minor in New York on Aug. 2, 1896. He received the name Paschal, pronounced his solemn vows in Rome, Oct. 4, 1900, and on December 21 of the following year was ordained. The next ten years were devoted to study, research, writing, and teaching. Paul Sabatier's book on St. Francis was the occasion for his own work, The Real St. Francis (1903). Other books followed in rapid succession: Some Pages of Franciscan History (1905), The Writings of St. Francis (1906), and The Life of St. Clare (1910). During this same period he was a contributor to many reviews and wrote a number of articles for the old Catholic Encyclopedia. In 1908, Paschal was appointed associate editor of the international Franciscan Review, the Archivum Franciscanum Historicum.

From 1913 to 1919, he taught medieval history at the Catholic University of America. In 1914 he was named a fellow of the Royal Historical Society of England. At the end of World War I, he was nominated by the U.S. government to assist its educational and economic commission at the Versailles Conference. There he presented a paper outlining the position and work of the Catholic Church and of the Franciscan Order in Palestine, which the British had received in the form of a mandate upon the dissolution of the Ottoman Empire. Subsequently he was employed by the Holy See in various missions to the Near East. He served as apostolic visitor to the Custody of the Holy Land in 1920; and five years later, to the Latin Patriarchate in Jerusalem and the Eastern Catholic Churches in Palestine, Transjordan, and Cyprus. In the meantime he had been appointed consultor to a number of Roman Congregations, including the Congregation of Propaganda (1925). In recognition of his work in behalf of the Holy See, he was created titular archbishop of Tyana, May 24, 1927.

After acting as mediator between the sacred and civil authorities on the island of Malta, where he once again earned the respect and gratitude of both the Holy See and the British government, Robinson was appointed papal nuncio to Ireland, Nov. 27, 1929, and served there until his death.

Bibliography: Archives of the New York Province, Order of Friars Minor.

[D. MCEL RATH]

ROBLES HURTADO, JOSÉ MARÍA, ST.

Martyr, pastor, founder of the Victims of the Eucharistic Heart of Jesus; b. May 3, 1888, Mascota, Jalisco, Diocese of Tepic, Mexico; d. June 26, 1927, Jalisco, Diocese of Autlán. At age 12, he entered the seminary at Guadalajara, where he distinguished himself by his intelligence and dedication to both his studies and catechesis. While he was still in the seminary, the bishop of Tehuantepec invited him to work in his diocese. He ministered in various parishes after his ordination (1913), hearing confessions and caring for the sick. As pastor of Tecolotlán, Jalisco, he founded the Victimas del Corazón Eucarístico de Jesús, now called the Sisters of the Sacred Heart of Jesus (Religiosa Hermanas del Corazón de Jesús Sacramentado). Because of his fervent love of the Sacred Heart, he wrote pamphlets to propagate the devotion. Robles hid himself during the persecution but did not abandon his flock. He was taken prisoner as he was preparing to celebrate Mass in a private home. He was hanged in the Quila mountain of Jalisco, Diocese of Autlán. Robles' mortal remains lie in the novitiate of the congregation he founded. He was both beatified (Nov. 22, 1992) and canonized (May 21, 2000) with Cristobal MAGALLANES [see GUADALAJARA (MEXICO), MARTYRS OF, SS.] by Pope John Paul II.

Feast: May 25 (Mexico).

Bibliography: J. CARDOSO, Los mártires mexicanos (Mexico City 1953). J. DÍAZ ESTRELLA, El movimiento cristero: sociedad y conflicto en los Altos de Jalisco (México, D.F. 1979).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ROBOT, ISIDORE

Missionary, abbot; b. Tharoiseau, France, July 18, 1837; d. Dallas, Tex., Feb. 15, 1887. Robot entered the Benedictine monastery of Sainte-Marie, Pierre-qui-Vire, France, a recent foundation that emphasized Trappist-like discipline and foreign missions. He was ordained in 1862, and served as military chaplain in the Franco-Prussian War. Having left France (1873), accompanied by Brother Benedict Lambert, he was welcomed at New Orleans, La., by Abp. Napoleon Joseph Perche. While laboring briefly in northern Louisiana, Robot investigated the status of neglected native tribes. The Jesuits in Kansas informed him of the recent removal of Catholic natives, especially the Potawatomi Citizen Band, southward to Indian Territory. Bp. Edward Fitzgerald of Little Rock, Ark., authorized him to enter the territory, where no priest resided. On Oct. 12, 1875, Robot arrived at Atoka, Choctaw Nation. During early 1876 he explored the territory and held conferences with Choctaw and Potawatomi chiefs. In Sept. he received his appointment, dated July 9, 1876, as the first prefect apostolic of Indian Territory. Concluding an agreement with the Potawatomi, he selected as his headquarters the site of Sacred Heart Mission.

During 1877, with the arrival of recruits from France, a monastic community, with novitiate, began activities. A school for native boys was opened and upon the arrival of nuns, a girls' school (1880). Leo XIII conferred the abbatial dignity on Robot on Sept. 1, 1878. He attended the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore, Md., in 1884 and resigned his prefecture while visiting Rome in 1885. He had laid the groundwork for the later Vicariate and Diocese of Oklahoma.

Bibliography: Annals, Sacred Heart Mission, Okla.

[J. F. MURPHY]

ROCCA, ANGELO

Humanist and historian; b. Rocca Contrada, Italy, 1545; d. Rome, April 7, 1620. In 1552 he entered the Augustinians in Camerino, studied at Padua where he received his doctorate in 1577, and became in 1585 editor of the Vatican Press for the Bible, general councils, and Patristic works. In 1605 he was made titular bishop of Tagaste. With his excellent book collection he founded the first public library in Rome, the Biblioteca Angelica, named for him. In 1614 he placed it in the care of the convent of St. Agostino, which directed it until 1873 when the state assumed ownership. Rocca wrote more than 60 works and participated in the edition of the Vulgate under Sixtus V and Gregory XV. Many of his ascetical, liturgical, and historical writings were published in an incomplete Opera omnia (2 v. Rome 1719, 1745). He edited five volumes of works by Augustinians, wrote two volumes on St. Augustine and free will, and two volumes on the building activities of Sixtus V.

Bibliography: Cenni biografici di Angelo Rocca (Fabriano 1881). D. A. PERINI, Bibliographia Augustiniana, 4 v. (Florence 1929–38) 3:126–133.

[F. ROTH]

ROCCACASALE, MARIANO DA, BL.

Baptized Domenico, Franciscan lay brother; b. Jan. 14, 1778, Roccasale (Aquila), Abruzzi, Italy; d. May 31, (Feast of Corpus Christi) 1866, Bellegra, Italy; beatified by John Paul II, Oct. 3, 1999.

Mariano's life was characterized by simplicity and poverty. He was one of six children of Gabriel de Nicolantonio and Santa de Arcangelo. In tending the family flocks in the Morrone mountains as a young boy, he grew to love silence and reflection. He entered Saint Nicholas Friary at Arischia, Abruzzi, took the name Mariano (Sept. 2, 1802) and pronounced his solemn vows the following year. For 12 years he engaged in prayer and work, as a carpenter, gardener, cook, and porter, at Arischia. In 1814, Mariano asked and received permission to transfer to the more austere Saint Francis Friary at Bellegra, where he served as porter for 40 years, welcoming pilgrims, other travelers, and the poor. Among those he greeted and inspired was Diego Oddi, who later became a Franciscan in the same friary. A miracle attributed to Blessed Mariano's intercession was approved by the pope, April 6, 1998, opening the way for his beatification.

"Saint Roch," 15th century painting by Giovanni Santi. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

Feast: May 30 (Franciscans).

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 19 (1999): 965. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed. 40 (1999): 1–3; 41 (1999): 2.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ROCH, ST.

Miracle-worker; b. Montpellier, France, c. 1350; d. Angera, Lombardy, c. 1378–79 (feast, August 16, 17, or 18). A historical figure, Roch is the unfortunate victim of incompetent biographers. The Acta breviora, sincere but poorly done, and the Vita s. Rochi by Francis Diedo (1478), more complete but chronologically impossible and of doubtful value, are today considered the best biographies available. Roch was the son of a rich Occitanian merchant and of a Lombard mother. In 1367, when Roch was about 17, Pope Urban V visited his home town. Since his parents were dead, he decided to go to Rome as a pilgrim. Roch became known for his love of poverty and for his charity toward the sick, and from these activities stemmed his gift of healing, which he began exercising first in Acquapendente and later in Cesena. In Rome he cured Cardinal Anglic, the Pope's brother. He left Rome in 1371 for Rimini, Novara, and Piacenza, where he remained for a time because of illness. He was arrested in Angera (c. 1374) on the shores of Lake Maggiore and imprisoned on charges of being a spy. He died there following a reunion with his maternal uncle. He was later honored (from c. 1410) in Montpellier because of his fame as a miracle-worker. His veneration in Italy is associated with the arrest of the plague in Ferrara in January 1439, attributed to his intercession. His relics were taken in 1485 to Venice where his most important shrine was erected. In 1629 his cult was approved for the many churches dedicated to him and in 1694 for the Franciscan Observants. Roch's membership in any religious order is doubtful. If he was a tertiary, it seems more likely that he was a member of the Third Order of St. Dominic.

Bibliography: A. FLICHE, "Le Problème de Saint Roch," Analecta Bollandiana 68 (Brussels 1950) 343–361. L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, 6 v. (Paris 1955–59) 3.3:1155–61. J. OSWALD, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al. (1966) 8:1347–48.

[J. CAMPBELL]

ROCHEFORT SHIPS, MARTYRS OF, BB.

Also known as Martyrs of La Rochelle, 64 priest martyrs of the French Revolution; d. 1794; beatified by John Paul II, Oct. 1, 1995.

In 1790 the authorities of the FRENCH REVOLUTION passed legislation requiring all priests to swear to the CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY, which was intended to separate the Church of France from Rome. The following year the state considered as suspect those who would not take the oath, and began deporting them to French Guyana, South America (1792). A total of 827 priests and religious, who considered taking the oath an act of apostasy, were imprisoned to await deportation on hulk ships in the harbor of Rochefort (La Rochelle), particularly the Deux-Associés and the Washington. Departure was delayed by the British blockade of the French coast. Meanwhile conditions worsened aboard the hulks, which were previously used for storage or to house slaves, as more detainees were added. In addition to the physical hardships of hunger, thirst, and lack of sanitation was added the confiscation of all religious goods from the priests. The majority of the prisoners (542) died in captivity from maltreatment between April 11, 1794, and Feb. 7, 1795, and were buried in the sand of Île d'Aix (226) or the Île Madame (254). The survivors testified to the heroism of some of their fellows, including these beatified as martyrs for whom there was sufficient testimony as to their manner of death.

Feast: Aug. 18.

Adam, Louis-Armand-Joseph, OFMConv., Franciscan priest of Rouen; b. Dec. 19, 1741; d. July 13, 1794.

Ancel, Charles-Antoine-Nicolas, C.J.M., priest; b. Oct. 11, 1763; d. July 29, 1794.

Auriel, Antoine, pastor of Calviat, Diocese of Cahors; b. April 19, 1764; d. June 16, 1794.

Bannassat, Antoine, parish priest in Saint-Fiel, Diocese of Limoges; b. May 20, 1729; d. July 18, 1794.

Beguignot, Claude, O. Cart., Carthusian priest; b. Sept. 19, 1736; d. July 16, 1794.

Bourdon, Jean, OFMCap, Capuchin priest; b. April 3, 1747; d. Aug. 23, 1794.

Brigéat de Lambert, Scipion-Jérôme, deacon of the cathedral of Avranches (joined in 1854 to the Diocese of Coutances); b. June 9, 1733; d. Sept. 9, 1794.

Brulard, Michel-Louis, O.C.D., Discalced Carmelite priest; b. June 11, 1758; d. July 25, 1794.

Brunel, Gervaise-Protase, OCist, Cistercian priest and prior of the monastery at Mortagne; b. June 18, 1744; d. Aug. 20, 1794.

Charles, Paul-Jean, OCist, Cistercian priest, abbot of Sept-Fons Monastery, Diocese of Moulins; b. Dec. 29, 1750; d. Aug. 25, 1794.

Collas du Bignon, Charles-René, P.S.S., Sulpician priest, superior of the seminary in Bourges; b. Aug. 25, 1743; d. June 3, 1794.

Conte, Noël-Hilaires le, priest from the cathedral of Bourges; b. Oct. 3, 1765; d. Aug. 17, 1794.

CORDIER, Jean-Nicolas, SJ, Jesuit priest; professor of theology; b. Dec. 3, 1710, near Souilly, Lorraine, France; d. Sept. 30, 1794, Île Madame, La Rochelle, France.

Desgardin, Augustine-Joseph, OCist, Cistercian lay brother in Sept-Fons Monastery, Diocese of Moulins; b. Dec. 21, 1750; d. July 9, 1794.

Dumonet, Claude, priest, Diocese of Autun; b. Feb. 1, 1747; d. Sept. 13, 1794.

Dumontet de Cardaillac, Florent, vicar general of the Diocese of Castres (joined in 1922 to the Diocese of Albi); b. Feb. 8, 1749; d. Sept. 9, 1794.

Dupas, Jacques-Morellus, priest, Diocese of Poitiers; b. Nov. 10, 1754; d. June 21, 1794.

Duverneuil, Jean-Baptiste, O.C.D., Discalced Carmelite priest; b. 1737; d. July 1, 1794.

Faverge, Pierre-Sulpice-Christophe, F.S.C., in religion Brother Roger, Lasallian lay brother; b. July 25, 1745, Orléans, France; entered novitiate 1767; d. Sept. 12, 1794.

François François, OFMCap, Capuchin priest; b. Jan. 17, 1749; d. Aug. 10, 1794.

Gabilhaud, Pierre, parish priest in Saint-Christophe, Diocese of Limoges; b. July 26, 1747; d. Aug. 13, 1794.

Gagnot, Jacques, O.C.D., Discalced Carmelite priest; b. Feb. 9, 1753; d. Sept. 10, 1794.

Guillaume, Jean-Baptiste, F.S.C., in religion Brother Uldaric, Lasallian lay brother; b. Feb. 1, 1755, Fraisans, France; entered novitiate Oct. 16, 1785; d. Aug. 27, 1794.

Hanus, Charles-Arnaud, deacon and canon of Ligny cathedral; Diocese of Verdun; b. Oct. 19, 1723; d. Aug. 28, 1794.

Hunot, François, canon of Briennon, Archdiocese of Sens; b. Feb. 12, 1753; d. Oct. 8, 1794.

Hunot, Jean, canon and parish priest of Briennon, Archdiocese of Sens; b. Sept. 21, 1742; d. Oct. 9, 1794.

Hunot, Sebastian-Loup, canon of Briennon, Archdiocese of Sens; b. Aug. 7, 1745; d. Nov. 17, 1794. Brother of Bl. Jean Hunot.

Huppy, Louis Wulphy, from the Diocese of Limoges; b. April 1, 1767; d. Aug. 29, 1794.

Imbert, Joseph, SJ, Jesuit priest, apostolic vicar for the Diocese of Moulins; b. c. 1720; Marseille, France; d. June 9, 1794, on the Deux-Associés.

Jarrige, Barthélémy, from the Diocese of Limoges; b. March 18, 1753; d. July 13, 1794.

Jarrige, Jean-François, canon of Saint-Yrieix, Diocese of Limoges; b. Jan. 11, 1752; d. July 31, 1794.

Jarrige, Pierre, canon of Saint-Yrieix, Diocese of Limoges; b. April 19, 1737; d. Aug. 10, 1794.

Jean-Baptiste de Bruxelles, canon of Saint Leonard and pastor of St. Stefan's, Diocese of Limoges; b. Sept. 12, 1734; d. July 18, 1794.

Jouffret de Bonnefont, Claude-Joseph, parish priest in Saint-Sulpice; b. Dec. 23, 1752; d. Aug. 10, 1794.

Juge de Saint-Martin, Jean-Joseph, canon of the cathedral of Limoges; b. June 14, 1739; d. July 9, 1794.

Labiche de Reignefort, Marcel-Gaucher, priest of the Societas Missionarium Lemovicensium; b. Nov. 3, 1751; d. July 26, 1794.

Laborier du Vivier, Jean-Baptiste, deacon and cathedral canon of Mâcon (joined in 1853 to the Diocese of Autun); b. Sept. 19, 1734; d. Sept. 26 or 27, 1794.

Labrousche de Laborderie, Pierre-Yrieix, canon of Auvergne, Diocese of Limoges; b. May 24, 1756; d. July 1, 1794.

Laplace, Claude, parish priest in Saint-Bonnet, Diocese of Moulins; b. Nov. 15, 1725; d. Sept. 14, 1794.

Lebrun, Louis-François, O.S.B., priest of the French Benedictine Congregation of Saint-Maurus (Mauristene); b. April 9, 1744; d. Aug. 20, 1794.

Legroing de la Romagère, Pierre-Joseph, priest of the Societas Navarrae and vicar general of the Diocese of Bourges; b. June 28, 1752; d. July 26, 1794.

Leymarie de Laroche, Élie, prior of Saint-Jean, Diocese of Verdun; b. Jan. 8, 1758; d. Aug. 22, 1794.

Loir, Jean-Baptiste Jacques Louis Xavier, OFMCap, Capuchin priest; b. March 13, 1720; d. May 19, 1794.

Lombardie, Jacques, parish priest in St. Hilarius, Diocese of Limoges; b. Dec. 1, 1737; d. July 22, 1794.

Marchand, Michel-Bernard, pastor of Vaurouy, Archdiocese of Rouen; b. Sept. 28, 1749; d. July 15, 1794.

Marchandon, André-Joseph, parish priest in Marsac, Diocese of Limoges; b. Aug. 21, 1745; d. Sept. 22, 1794.

Mascloux, Claude-Barnabé de Laurent de, canon in Dorat, Diocese of Limoges; b. June 11, 1735; d. Sept. 7, 1794.

Mayaudon, François, vicar general in the Diocese of Soissons; b. May 4, 1739; d. Sept. 11, 1794.

Menestrel, Jean-Baptiste, canon of Remiremont, Diocese of Saint-Dié; b. Dec. 9, 1748; d. Aug. 16, 1794.

Mopinot, Jean, FSC, in religion Brother Léon, Lasallian lay brother; b. Sept. 12, 1724, Rheims, France; entered novitiate Jan. 14, 1744; d. May 21, 1794.

Noël, Pierre-Michel, associate pastor of Pavilly, Archdiocese of Rouen; b. Feb. 23, 1754; d. Aug. 9, 1794.

d'Oudinot de la Boissière, François, canon of Saint-Germain in Masséré, Diocese of Limoges; b. Sept. 3, 1746; d. Sept. 7, 1794.

Papon, Philippe, priest of Coutigny, Diocese of Moulins; b. Oct. 5, 1744; d. June 17, 1794.

Pergaud, Gabriel, OSA, Augustinian priest; b. Oct. 29, 1752, Saint-Priest-la-Plaine (Creuse), France; d. July 21, 1794.

Petiniaud de Jourgnac, Raymond, vicar general of the archdeacons of the Diocese of Limoges; b. Jan. 3, 1747; d. June 26, 1794.

Rehm, Jean-Georges, OP, Dominican priest; b. April 21, 1752; d. Aug. 27, 1794.

René, Georges Edme, canon of Vézelay, Archdiocese of Sens; b. Nov. 16, 1748; d. Oct. 1, 1794.

Retouret, Jacques, OCarm, Carmelite priest; b. Sept. 15, 1746, Limoges, France; d. Aug. 26, 1794, Île Madame, La Rochelle, France (age 47). Renowned as a preacher.

Richard, Claude, OSB, priest; b. May 19, 1741; d. Aug. 9, 1794.

Savouret, Nicolas, OFMConv., Franciscan priest and spiritual director for the Poor Clares of Moulins; b. Feb. 27, 1733; d. July 14, 1794.

Souzy, Jean-Baptiste, priest of the Diocese of La Rochelle; b. Nov. 19, 1734, La Rochelle, France; d. Aug. 27, 1794. He was named vicar general of the deported. He died after 10 months of abuse and was buried on Madame Island.

Tabouillot, Nicolas, parish priest of Méliny-le-Grand, Diocese of Verdun; b. Feb. 16, 1745; d. Feb. 23, 1795.

Tiersot, Lazare, OCist, Cistercian priest; b. March 29, 1739; d. Aug. 10, 1794.

Vernoy de Montjournal, Jean-Baptiste Ignace Pierre, canon of Notre-Dame in Moulins; b. Nov. 17, 1736; d. June 1, 1794.

Bibliography: I. GOBRY, Les martyrs de la Révolution française (Paris 1989). J. N. TYLEND, Jesuit Saints & Martyrs, 2d ed. (Chicago 1998) 165–167. Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1995) 923–926. L'Osservatore Romano, no. 40 (1995) 3–5; Documentation Catholique, 19 (1995) 923–26.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ROCHESTER, ANCIENT SEE OF

The smallest and least important of the medieval English dioceses, located in West Kent, England; its cathedral church is dedicated to St. Andrew. It is the oldest suffragan see of the province of CANTERBURY, founded by AUGUSTINE OF CANTERBURY, who consecrated its first bishop, JUSTUS (OF CANTERBURY), in 604. The cathedral chapter was composed of secular canons until the Norman Conquest. In 676 the original cathedral was severely damaged by marauding Mercians, and the incumbent bishop, Putta, fled from the diocese and never returned. It is indeed likely that he became the first bishop of HEREFORD. Most of the Anglo-Saxon bishops were undistinguished since the see was relatively poor and under the patronage, if not actual lordship, of the archbishops of Canterbury. The last Saxon bishop, Siward (1058–75), unlike some of his kind, was allowed to remain in office until his death, when he was succeeded by Bishop Gundulf (1077–1108), who began the new (present) cathedral on the old Saxon foundation, and replaced the secular canons by BENEDICTINE monks, from whom a significant number of later bishops were drawn. The cathedral was consecrated in 1130, but was damaged by fire at the time. Ultimately in 1343 the choir was rebuilt and the central tower added, though the cathedral remains to this day largely Norman in appearance. Most of the post-Norman bishops except Arnulf of Beauvais (1115–24), a student of LANFRANC and historian of Rochester (Patrologia Latina v. 163), were undistinguished; the few who were outstanding, e.g., Bp. John ALCOCK (1472–76), were generally translated elsewhere. Most were regular clergy, primarily Benedictines or friars. In the 16th century the diocese had its most notable bishop and saint, John FISHER, who was both a scholar and a patron of scholars, a person of international reputation for piety and learning; in Holbein's drawing one sees a man of infinite human compassion and concern. He was executed under HENRY VIII in 1535. Henry re-founded Rochester as a diocese of the Church of England when he replaced the monastic chapter with a dean and secular canons.

Bibliography: A. I. PEARMAN, Rochester (Diocesan Histories; London 1897). R. C. FOWLER, in The Victoria History of the County of Kent, ed. W. PAGE, v. 2 (London 1926) 121–126. R. GARDINER, The Story of Rochester Cathedral (Blandford Forum, England 1978).

[H. S. REINMUTH, JR./EDS.]

ROCHESTER, JOHN, BL.

Carthusian priest, martyr; b. ca. 1498, Terling (?), Essex, England; hanged in chains at York, May 11, 1537. Cambridge-educated John Rochester, the third son of John Rochester of Terling and Grisold Writtle of Bobbingworth and brother to Sir Robert Rochester (1494–1557), joined the Carthusians of the London

Charterhouse as a choir monk. After his arrest for opposing the Act of Supremacy, he was placed under house arrest at the Hull Charterhouse, then moved to York where he was manacled with Bl. James Walworth. He was beatified by Pope Leo XIII on Dec. 9, 1886.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. MORRIS, ed., The Troubles of Our Catholic Forefathers Related by Themselves (London 1872). I. J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891). E. M. THOMPSON, The Carthusian Order in England (New York 1930). W. WESTON, Blessed Carthusian Martyrs (London 1962).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

RODAT, ÉMILIE DE, ST.

Foundress of the Sisters of the HOLY FAMILY OF VILLEFRANCHE; b. Druelle, near Rodez (Aveyron), France, Sept. 6, 1787; d. Villefranche-de-Rouergue (Aveyron), Sept. 19, 1852. Émilie's parents, who belonged to the upper class, entrusted their daughter, at the age of 18 months, to the care of her maternal grandmother Mme. de Pomayrols, who lived in her chateau at Ginals. During the next 15 years, under her grandmother's direction, Émilie developed into a pious girl devoted to daily prayer and visits to the poor. In 1803 Mme. de Pomayrols retired to a house in Villefranche-de-Rouergue established by Mother Saint-Cyr, an Ursuline, for religious women who had been dispossessed during the FRENCH REVOLUTION. Émilie returned to Druelle until 1804 when she rejoined her grandmother at Villefranche. There she became acquainted with Abbé Antoine Marty (1757–1835), a former professor of philosophy in Paris who had suffered exile rather than subscribe to the CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY. Under his spiritual guidance Émilie aided the poor and taught catechism classes. In 1809 she entered the novitiate of the Sisters of Charity and Christian Instruction of Nevers, but soon left.

In search of her vocation, she joined for a time the Picpus Sisters, then the Sisters of Mercy of Moissac. To satisfy the complaints of many persons who bemoaned the disappearance of the schools formerly run by the Ursulines, Émilie gathered three companions and in 1815 opened a school for poor children in Villefranche. From this humble beginning developed her religious congregation, whose purpose was the education of girls, the care of the sick, and other charitable works. Abbé Marty, who collaborated in the founding of the institute, composed the rule, modeled on that of St. Augustine, and approved by the bishop of Rodez (1832).

Émilie and her first companions pronounced perpetual vows in 1820. As superior general, Émilie was instrumental in the rapid growth of the congregation, which by 1852 had five cloistered convents, 32 houses connected with schools, and many orphanages. During these years Émilie was afflicted with many spiritual trials because of severe temptations to abandon faith and hope. She was beatified Jan. 9, 1940, and canonized April 23, 1950.

Feast: Sept. 19.

Bibliography: L. AUBINEAU, Vie de la révérende Mère Émilie (Paris 1855; 6th ed. Lyons 1891). É. BARTHE, L'Esprit de la révérende Mère Émilie de Rodat, 2 v. (3d ed. Paris 1897). R. PLUS, Sainte Émilie de Rodat (Toulouse 1950). G. BERNOVILLE, La Sainte de Rouergue: Émilie de Rodat (Paris 1959). H. DELATTRE, Dictionnaire de spiritualité et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932–) 4:610–614.

[V. A. LAPOMARDA]

RODRÍGUEZ, ALFONSO

Jesuit spiritual writer; b. Valladolid, April 1538; d. Seville, Feb. 21, 1616. After studying philosophy and arts at the University of Valladolid, and theology at Salamanca for two years, Rodríguez entered the Society of Jesus in Salamanca in July 1557. He was novice master in Salamanca in 1564, in Montilla from 1585 to 1597, and in Seville in 1607. He held also the posts of rector in Monterrey (1570–76) and moral professor and ‘resolver’ of cases of conscience in Monterrey (1567–79) and in Valladolid (1579–85). From 1598 to 1607 he was in Córdoba engaged in the apostolic ministry. Rodríguez participated as a delegate for his province in the fifth general congregation at Rome. His contemporaries described him as a man of regular observance, mildness, and spiritual discretion, and, by nature, shy. His fame is due to his work the Ejercicio de perfección y virtudes cristianas (The Practice of Perfection and of Christian Virtues, Seville 1609). There are about 50 complete and 15 partial Spanish editions of this treatise. It was fully or partially translated into 23 languages. This work is a revision of the sermons he had given to the novices in Montilla [see I. Iparraguirre, Répertoire de spiritualité (Rome 1961) n.324]. In some places one can see the influence of the sermons of Gil González Dávila. The work is primarily a practical treatise, although it contains abundant spiritual doctrine, set forth with marvelous clarity through the use of Scripture and the Fathers, as well as medieval and contemporary authors. Emphasis is put upon the practice of the virtues and the specific means for acquiring them. The tone is that of a work intended for novices, with frequent illustrations and examples, of which many are historically inaccurate; however, they are always correct in style, and charming. The work lacks unity in its theological concepts.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus 6:1946–63. J. DE GUIBERT, La Spiritualité de la Compagnie de Jésus, ed. E. LAMALLE (Rome 1953).

[I. IPARRAGUIRRE]

RODRÍGUEZ, ALPHONSUS, ST.

Jesuit lay brother and mystic; b. Segovia, Spain, July 25, 1532; d. Majorca, Oct. 31, 1617. This third son of the successful wool merchant Diego Rodríguez was instructed for his first Communion by Father Peter FABER during a mission in Segovia. When 14 years old, he was sent to the Jesuit college at Alcalá, but the death of his father prevented him from completing the first term. He returned home and assisted his mother in conducting the family trade, and in 1558 he married Maria Suarez, by whom he had a daughter, Maria, and two sons, Gaspar and Alonzo. His married life was content and devout, and he was impressed by the sermons of Jesuits passing through Segovia, especially Louis Santander and St. Francis Borgia. After financial failure and his great sorrow at the deaths of his daughter, his son Gaspar, his wife, and his mother in quick succession, he sold his business, and with his remaining son Antonio, retired to the house of his maiden sisters, Juliana and Antonia. There he learned habits of prayer and the practice of austerity. At the death of Antonio, he asked admittance into the Society of Jesus, but was refused because of his ill health, his age (he was nearly 40), and his insufficient education for the priesthood. Still hoping to become a priest, he tried to learn Latin, but without success, and for a time he considered the life of a hermit. On Jan. 31, 1571, against the advice of official Jesuit consultants, he was accepted as a lay brother, and after a six-month novitiate at Valencia, was sent to the college at Montesone on the island of Majorca. There he was house porter for 46 years, and is remembered particularly for his patience and humility in that office, his entire obedience to superiors, his mystical absorption in prayer, his welcome advice to the students, including St. Peter CLAVER, Apostle of the Negroes, and his devotion to the Mother of God. Though not the author of the Little Office of the Immaculate Conception, as has been wrongly alleged, he popularized its use. He was beatified on June 12, 1825, by Leo XII, and canonized on Jan. 15, 1888, by Leo XIII.

Feast: Oct. 30.

Bibliography: A. RODRÍGUEZ, Obras espirituales, ed. J. NONELL, 3 v. (Barcelona 1885–87); Autobiography, ed. W. YEOMANS (London 1965). P. DUDON, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932–) 1:395–402. C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932; v. 12 suppl. 1960) 6:1943–46. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THUR-

TON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 4:225–227. M. DIETZ, Zeitschrift für Ascese und Mystik 30 (Würzburg 1957) 418–425. E. M. RIVIÈRE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 2:751–752. L. KOCH, Jesuiten-Lexikon: Die Gesellschaft Jesu einst und jetzt (Paderborn 1934) 1552–53.

[E. D. MCSHANE]

RODRÍGUEZ DE MENDOZA, TORIBIO

Peruvian priest, educator, and politician; b. San Juan de la Frontera (Chachapoyas), April 15, 1750; d. Lima, June 10, 1825.

His early education was in his home with a tutor. He soon went to the seminary of San Carlos of Trujillo, and in 1766 he entered the seminary of Santo Toribio of Lima. He was a brilliant student, and on Sept. 22, 1770, he received the degree of doctor of theology in the Real y Pontificia Universidad de San Marcos. A year later, while still a student, he was named professor of philosophy and theology in the Colegio Mayor de San Carlos in Lima. On Feb. 5, 1773, he was made regent of the Cátedra del Maestro de las Sentencias. He was ordained on July 18, 1778 and became curate in Marcaval, a lowly town in the district of Huamachuco, where he carried out his duties as pastor and teacher of the indigenous peoples. On Feb. 3, 1785 he was named vice rector of the Convictorio de San Carlos in Lima; and on Aug. 16, 1786 he became rector, a position he held for 30 years.

Rodríguez de Mendoza is famous, first of all, in the field of education. He took a new approach to teaching, with the advice of Diego Cisneros and the help of Mariano Rivero and Juan Ignacio MORENO. They formed a triumvirate that transformed San Carlos by revising the curriculum. They did not make any substantial change in the courses of philosophy, rejecting the methodic doubt of Descartes and the analysis of Condillac as the definitive way for philosophical studies. Mathematics was added to the curriculum. Jurisprudence included natural law, international law, and constitutional law. The courses they settled on for the curriculum of the Convictorio were philosophy, theology, law, mathematics, and humanities. Rodríguez was to teach philosophy and theology; Rivero, natural law, international law, Newtonian physics, and Peruvian law; and Moreno, mathematics. The innovations brought a slow transformation in the education at San Carlos. Lecture halls were filled more and more, for not only the sons of the old conquistadores and the nobility of Lima and Peru came to study, but “from distant lands of all America students came to be instructed in literature, law, and to get new ideas.” Rodríguez in later years said: “The Convictorio is a light that brightens the whole continent.” It produced a galaxy of intellectual and patriotic leaders: Sánchez Carrión, Mariátegui, Pérez de Tudela, Olmedo, Muñoz, Pedemonte, Figuerola, Cuellar, Colmenares, Herrera, Oricaín, León, and Andueza.

[V. TRUJILLO MENA]

RODRÍGUEZ SANTIAGO, CARLOS MANUEL CECILIO, BL.

Lay founder of the Círculo de Cultura Cristiana (Circle of Christian Culture); b. Nov. 22, 1918, Caguas, Puerto Rico; d. there, July 13, 1963. Chali (Charlie), as he was known to his friends, was the second of the five children of Manuel Baudilio Rodríguez Rodríguez and Herminia Santiago Esteras. The home environment was indisputably pious: one sister became a Carmelite nun and his only brother a Benedictine monk and the first Puerto Rican abbot. He attended Catholic schools and earned a high school commercial diploma in 1939 despite frequent interruptions due to the chronic ulcerative colitis, which he suffered from age 13. In 1946, after working as an office clerk, he enrolled at the University of Puerto Rico, but continued illness forced him to leave school during his sophomore year. Nevertheless, he continued to study on his own, expanding his knowledge on a variety of topics.

While holding an administrative position at the Agricultural Experimental Station of the University of Puerto Rico at Río Piedras, he promoted his love of the Easter Vigil, the Paschal Mystery, and the liturgy within the Catholic University Center. There he founded the Circle of Christian Culture to enliven the faith of students and faculty, and the Te Deum Laudamus parochial choir in Caguas. Chali dedicated his salary to the poor, the funding of the circle, and publishing Liturgy and Christian Culture to promote understanding of the sacred liturgy.

During the last year of his life, while suffering rectal cancer, Chali experienced the “dark night of the soul”—a sense of abandonment by God; nevertheless, he clung to his faith in the Resurrection till the end. Uniquely his cause for beatification was initiated (Dec. 8, 1992) and propelled forward by the laity. Pope John Paul II declared him venerable (July 7, 1997), approved the miraculous cure of Deli Santana de Aguiló’s non-Hodgkins malignant lymphoma attributed to Charlie’s intercession (Dec. 20, 1999), and beatified him (April 29, 2001). He is the first blessed from the Caribbean.

Bibliography: L’Osservatore Romano, Eng. Ed. 18 (2001), 1, 6–8; 19 (2001), 7, 10. Information from the Círculo Carlos M.

Rodríguez, Centro Universitario Católico, 10 Mariana Bracetti, San Juan, PR 00925-2201.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

RODRIGUEZ TÇUZU, JOÃO

Jesuit missionary, interpreter at the Japanese Court, and author; b. Cernancelhe, vicinity of Lamego, Portugal, c. 1562; d. Macau, Aug. 1, 1633. In 1577 Rodríguez (not to be confused with a contemporary Japanese missionary João Rodríguez Giram) came to Japan as a youth and entered the Society of Jesus, probably in 1580. There he studied the liberal arts, philosophy, and theology, and in 1594 he went to Macau to complete his theological course, was ordained, and returned to Japan (1596). Nagasaki, where he made his solemn profession on June 10, 1601, and was appointed province procurator, became his principal abode until 1610. Not only until the death of Toyotomi Hideyoshi (1598), but also during the reign of his successor, Tokugawa Iyeyasu, Rodríguez was official Portuguese interpreter at court; hence his name Tçuzu or Tçuxi (modern Tsuzu, Tsuji) or the Portuguese “O Interprete.” He was therefore often at court, and at the wish of Iyeyasu he was for some years supervisor of the harbor of Nagasaki, which had been established by Christians (1571) and was in the possession of the Church (1580–87) until seized by Hideyoshi. Political pressure against the Jesuits forced Rodríguez’s retirement to Macau in 1610. Between June 1613 and June 1615 he spent much time in the interior of China, and afterward many years at Macau. During this period Rodríguez sought the correct interpretation of the ancient Chinese name for God, and his study convinced him that the prevalent view was in error. Thus he was involved in a legitimate discussion of a question that later degenerated into the bitter CHINESE RITES CONTROVERSY. From 1628 onward he was again, with interruptions, in Inner China, accompanying Portuguese troops who were to support the Chinese Emperor against inroads of the Tartars.

The historical importance of João Rodríguez Tçuzu stems from his achievements as an influential interpreter and intermediary at the court of Japan, a philologist, and a historian and author. He is regarded as the best European authority on the Japanese language and culture in the 16th and 17th centuries. In place of M. de Couros, who was originally commissioned with this task, Rodríguez found time to write a history of the Church of Japan, História da Igreja de Japam. This enterprise was started c. 1620, and by 1628 a large part was finished. The work is significant for its descriptive chapters based on the personal experience of the author. In 1624 he added to the História an account of the bishops of Japan. João Rodriguez is believed to have taken part in compiling the Vocabulário da Lingoa de Japam (Nagasaki 1603–04). There also he printed the large Arte da Lingoa de Japam (1604–08), and in Macau, a smaller edition for beginners under the title Arte breve da Lingoa japoã (1620). His multivolume geographical work with its wealth of maps of the Far East is lost.

Bibliography: G. SCHURHAMMER, "P. Johann Rodrigues Tçuzu als Geschichtschreiber Japans," Archivum historicum Societatis Jesu 1 (1932) 23–40; repr. in his Gesammelte Studien (Rome 1962–65) 2:605–618. J. F. SCHÜTTE, "A História inédita dos 'Bispos da Igreja do Japão' do Padre João Rodrigues Tçuzu, S.J.," Congresso Internacional de História dos Descobrimientos, Acta 5.1 (Lisbon 1961) 297–327. The História da Igreja do Japão has been pub. by J. DO AMARAL ABRANCHES PINTO (Macao 1954–56). T. DOI has pub. the large Arte in Jap. (Tokyo 1955) and is now preparing a Jap. ed. of the História; for helpful information on the tr. of the Arte, see the review in Archivum historicum Societatis Jesu 26 (1957) 315.

[J. F. SCHÜTTE]

RODRÍGUEZ ZORRILLA, JOSÉ SANTIAGO

Chilean bishop and politician; b. Santiago, 1752; d. Madrid, 1832. He studied with the Jesuits in Santiago and at the universities of San Felipe in Santiago and San Marcos in Lima. He was ordained and received the doctorate in theology in 1775, and in 1802, the doctorate in both civil and canon law. He was a professor in the University of San Felipe and twice held the post of rector (1788–90, 1803–05). Before ordination he had accompanied Bishop Alday to the provincial council at Lima (1771–73); and since he kept the confidence of succeeding bishops, he held a number of ecclesiastical positions, being appointed vicar capitular in 1807. When he opposed the formation of the junta in 1810 and did not recognize the appointment of Bp. MARTÍNEZ DE ALDUNATE, his own appointment as vicar was not renewed. Rodríguez Zorrilla objected to the elimination of the word "Roman" in reference to the title of the Church in the constitution of 1812, and the government of Chile retaliated by refusing to recognize his designation as bishop-elect of Santiago, which had been made by the Spanish council of regency. Upon the restoration of Spanish power, he was consecrated in 1816. However, he took part in the persecution of the Chilean patriots (1814–17); and although he supported the peaceful entrance of the victorious Chileans into the capital in 1817, he was exiled until 1821. He returned to his see in 1822 and managed to hold it for two years, although the various governments were suspicious of his loyalty. He did not cooperate with the unsuccessful MUZI mission of 1824, and the civil authorities took over the government of the see, exiling Rodríguez Zorrilla to Spain in 1825. He lived in Madrid, bereft of income, while the Holy See appointed an administrator for his diocese, leaving him his rights as bishop. Just before his death, he had obtained restoration of his income and his civil rights and was preparing to return to Chile. His remains were taken home in 1852. Because of his great involvement in politics, he had left the diocese practically without guidance for many years during a crucial period of Chilean history.

Bibliography: C. SILVA COTAPOS, Don, José Santiago Rodríguez Zorrilla (Santiago de Chile 1915). L. F. PRIETO DEL RÍO, Diccionario biográfico del clero secular de Chile (Santiago de Chile 1922).

[W. HANISCH]

ROE, ALBAN (BARTHOLOMEW), ST.

Benedictine martyr; b. Suffolk, 1583; executed at Tyburn, Jan. 21, 1642. As an undergraduate at Cambridge he was an ardent Protestant. A visit to a recusant named David in St. Alban's prison, ostensibly to convert him, instead unsettled Roe's own Protestant convictions; he returned to Cambridge very disturbed. After reading, and conferring with Catholic priests, he was received into the Church. In November 1607 Roe applied for admission to the English College at Douai; he was accepted in February 1608. The college was going through a difficult period, and perhaps there was still something of the conceited undergraduate about Roe. In any event, he was dismissed for insubordination in January 1611. Still determined to be a priest and armed with a testimonial from his fellow students, Roe arrived in 1613 at Dieulouard (later Ampleforth) to try his vocation as a Benedictine. He was professed in October 1614, taking the name Alban. The following year he was ordained, and the same year he left for Paris to help found the community of St. Edmund (Woolhampton).

By now Father Alban was no longer a brash undergraduate, and his superiors judged him ready for the English mission. He was caught in 1618, fairly soon after his arrival in England, and imprisoned. Roe was kept in New Prison, Maiden Lane, until 1623, when the Spanish ambassador procured his release. He was banished and warned that if he returned he would die as a traitor. Nevertheless, after a short stay at St. Gregory's, Douai (later Downside), he returned. Within two years he was again apprehended and, by a strange turn of fate, committed to jail in St. Albans, the same prison in which his encounter with the recusant had occurred. Friends succeeded in obtaining his transfer to the Fleet Prison in London. He then began a long prison apostolate. Charles I was a relatively lenient monarch, and the Fleet, a lax prison, so that Roe was able not only to minister to the Catholics inside the prison but to go out on parole. This arrangement ended at the time of the anti-Catholic Long Parliament. Roe was transferred to Newgate Prison and brought to trial on Jan. 19, 1642. After an initial refusal, Roe consented to be tried by a jury and was charged as a priest and seducer of the people. He was sentenced to be hanged, drawn, and quartered. On January 21 he said Mass before the other prisoners and made a short speech to them before his execution. He was beatified on Dec. 15, 1929 and canonized on Oct. 25, 1970, as one of the ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Feast: May 4; Oct. 25.

Bibliography: B. CAMM, Nine Martyr Monks . . . (London 1931). R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. MCCANN and C. CARYELWES, eds., Ampleforth and Its Origins (London 1952). J. FORBES, Blessed Alban Roe (Postulation Pamphlet; London 1960). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[G. FITZHERBERT]

ROEMER, THEODORE

Historian; b. Appleton, Wis., Jan. 19, 1889; d. Mt. Calvary, Wis., Jan. 7, 1953. He attended St. Joseph School, Appleton, and the preparatory seminary, St. Lawrence College, Mt. Calvary, Wisconsin. Professed in the Capuchin Order in 1907 and ordained by Archbishop Sebastian G. Messmer on July 13, 1913, he began teaching at St. Lawrence College in 1915. From 1919 to 1921 he taught canon law at St. Anthony Seminary, Marathon, Wisconsin. After several years of pastoral activity in the Milwaukee archdiocese, he entered the Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., where he specialized in American Catholic church history. Upon the completion of his master's thesis, The Leopoldine Foundation and the Catholic Church in the United States (1829–1839), he devoted a year to study at the University of Louvain, Belgium, and to research in Germany and Italy. Returning to the Catholic University of America, he was awarded a doctorate in 1933. His doctoral study, The Ludwig-Missionverein and the Church in the United States (1838–1918), traced the historical contribution made by the Ludwig Missionverein of Munich to the progress of the Catholic Church in the United States. From 1933 until his death, Roemer taught at St. Lawrence College. He was the author of Pioneer Capuchin Letters (1936), Ten Decades of Alms (1942), St. Joseph in Appleton (1943), The Alumni, St. Lawrence College (1946), and a textbook, The Catholic Church in the United States (1950).

[R. DUSICK]

ROGATION DAYS

By ancient tradition in the Roman rite, the historical days on which a procession of penance and supplication was held. Because the LITANY of the Saints was sung during the procession, the name for these days in ancient documents is Major or Minor Litanies.

The title Major Litany is not given in opposition to the Minor Litany, but because of the greater solemnity of the occasion, the feast of St. Mark, (April 25). Neither the origin nor the theme of the rogation observance has anything to do with St. Mark. Of strictly Roman origin, the Major Litany was instituted to supplant an already existing pagan ceremony called the Robigalia held on this day. The pagan Romans went in procession down the via Flaminia as far as the Milvian Bridge and there offered the entrails of a dog and a sheep to the god Robigus. The objective they sought was to protect the sprouting crops from blight caused by rust (robigo). Chanting the Litany of the Saints, Christians followed the same processional route but ended it at St. Peter's basilica. The name Major Litany appeared for the first time during the pontificate of Gregory the Great (d. 604).

The Minor Litanies were begun around 470 by Mamertus, bishop of Vienne, France. Several days of penitential procession were held to invoke divine protection against a recurrence of the earthquake that had recently wrought such havoc in the city. This custom soon spread to other French localities and even to Rome under Leo III (d. 816). These processions were held on each of the three days that immediately precede Ascension Thursday.

See Also: PROCESSIONS, RELIGIOUS.

Bibliography: A. ADAM, The Liturgical Year: Its History and Meaning after the Reform of the Liturgy (Collegeville 1981). A. NOCENT, The Liturgical Year, 4 v. (Collegeville 1977). T. J. TALLEY, The Origins of the Liturgical Year, rev. ed. (Collegeville 1992). I. H. DALMAIS, P. JOUNEL, and A. G. MARTIMORT, The Liturgy and Time: The Church at Prayer v. 4 (Collegeville 1992).

[J. H. MILLER/EDS.]

ROGER BACON

English Franciscan scholastic philosopher and experimentalist; b. Ilchester, Somerset, before 1220 (according to some, 1214); d. c. 1292.

Life. He came of minor nobility. Having learned the rudiments of grammar and logic, probably at Oxford, he received his degree in arts from the University of Paris by 1237. In Paris he lectured on the new Aristotelian learning "longer than any other master," at least until

Roger Bacon. (Archive Photos)

1247. Most of his commentaries and lecture notes from this period have not survived, but to this period probably belong the published notes on the Physics and Metaphysics of ARISTOTLE, the De plantis and De causis of pseudo-Aristotle, and the Summulae logicales of JOHN XXI (Opera hactenus inedita, ed. R. Steele, Oxford 1905–40). In 1247 he relinquished his teaching position in Paris to devote considerable time and money to experiments, languages, “secret” books, instruments, and astronomical tables. For the next ten years (1247–57) he studied and promoted these branches of learning, which he felt were being neglected by contemporaries of greater influence and prestige. The intensity of his labors and the peculiarities of his own personality brought him near to a physical breakdown. He entered the Franciscan Order in England probably in 1257. In the order he did not have the prestige he had expected or the freedom he had desired to write and lecture. Finding it impossible to communicate, he gave up in despair (Op. tert. 13). Return of illness necessitated a two-year respite from all serious work. When his health improved, circumstances worsened, for he seems to have become an advocate of the eschatological views of Abbot JOACHIM OF FIORE.

Having made the acquaintance of Raymond of Laon, a cleric in the service of Cardinal Guy le Gos de Foulques, later CLEMENT IV, Bacon insisted that the whole of current education needed to be revised and intimated that the necessary revision could be found in his writings. These views were related to the cardinal, who, on becoming pope in February 1265, demanded to see these writings. Bacon had been misunderstood, for he spoke not about works already completed but about those he could write if he had the necessary freedom, leisure, and money. On June 22, 1266, Clement again wrote to Bacon commanding him to send without delay and as secretly as possible the writings previously requested, notwithstanding contrary commands of any prelate or constitutions of his order. Bacon was unable to clarify the situation either by direct letters or by his messenger, William of Bonecor. Clement was still under the impression that all that had to be done was to make a legible copy of an existing work, a major contribution to knowledge and to the welfare of the Church. Since secrecy was imposed and funds were unavailable, Bacon used various subterfuges to obtain funds to compose, single-handed and without knowledge of his superiors, an encyclopedia of all the sciences, called Opus maius (ed. J. H. Bridges, 3 v. Oxford 1897–1900), which he sent to Clement in 1267 through his favorite pupil, John (see Little, Grey Friars 211). The manuscript was in four separate packets, including multiple diagrams, a map of the world (now lost), and a concave lens made at great expense. The work was divided into seven parts: causes and remedies of human ignorance and error; the services that sane philosophy can render to theology; necessity and nature of languages, mathematics, optics, and experimental science; and a discussion of moral philosophy. This was followed, prior to November 1268, by the Opus minus and Opus tertium (ed. J. S. Brewer, London 1859), which are synopses and developments of various sections of the main work.

For Bacon, languages, mathematics, and experimental sciences were of far greater importance to theology and the Church than the four popular sciences of grammar, logic, natural philosophy, and metaphysics, cultivated by the “moderns.” For him, nothing could be known without a knowledge of Greek, Hebrew, Arabic, and Chaldaean; many Latin words currently used could not be understood without a knowledge of Greek. In later years Bacon even wrote Greek and Hebrew grammars to overcome what he called an abysmal ignorance in the schools. Similarly, he considered mathematics a key to all the sciences and scorned all who failed to recognize this, even though Bacon himself was no mathematician. He made many suggestions concerning Biblical studies, chronology, reform of the calendar, geography, apologetics, ALCHEMY, and ASTROLOGY. Deeply influenced by the pseudo-Aristotelian treatise Secretum secretorum, he ardently defended alchemy and astrology. Although an ardent advocate of optics and the experimental sciences, his contribution to these sciences was negligible.

For many years Bacon idolized ROBERT GROSSETESTE and ALEXANDER OF HALES because the former cultivated mathematics and languages and the latter gave up all worldly possessions to become a Franciscan friar. Later he blamed both for bringing about a deterioration in theology. He was also severely critical of BONAVENTURE, minister general of the Franciscans. He was particularly resentful of ALBERT THE GREAT and THOMAS AQUINAS, who “presumed to investigate philosophy by themselves without a teacher” and became “masters in theology and philosophy before they were disciples.” In his Compendium philosophiae (c. 1272) he returned to the treatment of his cherished languages, mathematics, optics, alchemy, and experimental sciences. The “moderns” with few exceptions, he wrote, especially the “boy” theologians of the Dominican and Franciscan Orders, despised and persecuted these sciences, for they entered religious life before the age of 20 without the benefit of a proper university training. At that time Bacon seems to have enjoyed considerable freedom to begin an encyclopedic work, only partially completed, comprising grammar, logic, mathematics, natural philosophy, metaphysics, and moral philosophy. The surviving sections, Communia naturalia and Communia mathematica, are the maturest expression of his thought.

Whatever freedom he did enjoy was brought to an end by Jerome of Ascoli (Pope NICHOLAS IV), minister general of the order (1274–79), who, prompted by many reports, condemned the teachings because they contained certain suspect novelties (propter aliquas novitates suspectas). These novelties were undoubtedly Joachite. Jerome even wrote to the Pope, Nicholas III, so that by his authority this dangerous doctrine (illa doctrina periculosa) might be completely extirpated. According to the Chronicle of the 24 Generals (Archivum Franciscanum historicum 3:360) Bacon himself was imprisoned, probably between 1277 and 1279. In the last of his writings, Compendium studii theologiae (1292), Bacon castigated the vices and defects of the whole of Christendom as well as the decline of theological studies in the schools of his day. A long tradition claims that he was buried in Oxford.

Teachings. Bacon was one of the earliest masters to teach the text of Aristotle in Paris. Like his Parisian master, ROBERT KILWARDBY, he interpreted Aristotle with the aid of Platonic sources, notably AVICENNA and AVICBRON. Therefore Bacon never appreciated the true nature of Aristotelian philosophy (see ARISTOTELIANISM). Repeatedly insisting that “without mathematics no science can be had” (Opus tertium, ed. Brewer, 35, 64, 57), Bacon believed that the principles of natural science are to be found in mathematics. He considered the study of mathematics second in importance only to that of languages (Opus maius 1:97–108; Opus tertium 105–120); he even called it prima scientiarum. His view of the hylo-morphic composition of all creatures, spiritual and corporeal, by a succession of forms is identical to that of Kilwardby and other Platonizing Aristotelians of the 13th century (see SCHOLASTICISM, 1). Bacon identified the agent intellect with God and adapted the illumination theory of AUGUSTINE to his own view of Aristotle. While retaining the basic views of AUGUSTINIANISM, insisting on the dynamic and normative role of universal ideas (virtus regitiva universi), he emphasized more than most 13th-century schoolmen the primacy of the individual, the natural termination of knowledge. This led him to appreciate the importance of experimental science. Hence in Bacon’s philosophy natural phenomena are to be studied sedulously with experimentation and the aid of mathematics. Mathematics itself leads to metaphysics and the study of God.

Although Bacon was not a theologian, he rightly denounced the use of Peter Lombard’s Sentences by masters in theology. Instead of lecturing on the Bible, as had been the custom, Alexander of Hales and RICHARD FISHACRE began to lecture on the Sentences. Bacon rightly saw this as a deterioration of sacred science. Moreover, he encouraged the study of languages indispensable for understanding the sacred text.

Influence. Bacon had no disciples to continue his work either inside or outside the Franciscan Order. Immediate posterity all but forgot his name. However, with the origin of modern science in the 17th century and renewed pride at Oxford for medieval Mertonians, Bacon acquired new though unfounded fame as an inventor, experimentalist, and precursor of modern experimental science. Fantastic legends grew rapidly and were repeated by countless authors. For this reason it is difficult to separate fact from fiction in historical accounts of Bacon’s life.

Bibliography: J. AERSTEN and A. SPEER, eds., Raum and Raumvorseellungen im Mittelalter (Berlin 1998). G. JEANMART, “La théorie baconnienne du langage est-elle augustienne,” Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques 82 (1998) 415–30. J. HACKETT, “Roger Bacon,” in Individuation in Scholasticism (Albany 1994) 117–139; “Averroes and Roger Bacon on the Harmony of Religion and Philosophy,” in A Straight Path: Studies in Medieval Philosophy and Culture (Washington, D.C. 1988) 98–112. J. LONG, “Roger Bacon on the Nature and Place of Angels,” Vivarium 5 (1997) 283–314. G. MOLLAND, “Roger Bacon and the Hermetic Tradition in Medieval Science,” Vivarium 31 (1993) 140–60.

[J. A. WEISHEIPL]

ROGER DE PONT L'ÉVÊQUE

Archbishop of YORK and supporter of HENRY II in the great quarrel with Thomas BECKET; d. York, England, Nov. 21, 1181. Of Norman birth, Roger was a contemporary of Becket in the household of THEOBALD, archbishop of Canterbury. He became archdeacon of Canterbury (1148), and a royal chaplain entrusted with business on King STEPHEN's behalf at the papal Curia, before being consecrated archbishop of the northern province in 1154. Toward Becket, Roger was personally antipathetic, and his antagonism as archbishop led him to support King Henry II and to revive the claims of York as against CANTERBURY, notably in his coronation of the young King Henry in 1170. For this act Becket secured from Pope ALEXANDER III a bull suspending Roger from his office for infringing the prerogative of Canterbury. Following the murder of Becket, Roger was reinstated as archbishop after being absolved from complicity in the saint's death. A persistent champion of the rights of his see, Roger renewed the jurisdictional quarrel with the new archbishop, RICHARD OF CANTERBURY, and pressed, unsuccessfully, for recognition of the primacy of York over the Church in Scotland.

Bibliography: J. C. ROBERTSON, ed., Materials for the History of Thomas Becket, 7 v. in Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores (also called Rolls Series) 244 v. (London 1858–96) 1875–85, passim. W. H. HUTTON, The Dictionary of National Biography from Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 17:109–111. D. KNOWLES, The Episcopal Colleagues of Archbishop Thomas Becket (Cambridge, Eng. 1951).

[R. S. HOYT]

ROGER LE FORT, BL.

Bishop and confessor; b. Ternes, Limousin; d. March 1, 1367 or 1368. He studied law at the University of Orléans. He became a canon at Rouen (1316), and was cathedral dean in Bourges (1317) and later professor of civil and canon law at Orléans. Successively bishop of Orléans (1321) and of Limoges (1328), he was finally appointed archbishop of Bourges in 1343. Zealous in the administration of his office and austere in his personal life, he established a hospital at Bourges and founded the Celestine priory at Ternes. He authorized the exhuming of the relics of ODILO OF CLUNY (1345). A benefactor of the poor, he ordered that his goods be distributed to them on his death. He is buried in Bourges cathedral. He is the author of sermons and juridical commentaries.

Feast: March 1.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum March 1:119–122. J. B. L. ROY-PIERREFITTE, Études historiques sur les monastères du Limousin et de la Marche (Guéret 1865) 67–80, 85–91. A. A. THOMAS, Mélanges d'archéologie et d'histoire 4 (1884) 31–34. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by the Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 3:26.

[D. ANDREINI]

ROGER MARSTON

Franciscan theologian; b. c. 1245; d. c. 1303. Marston studied at Paris under JOHN PECKHAM, probably between 1269 and 1272. There, c. 1270, he was present with THOMAS AQUINAS and Peckham at a vehement theological disputation presided over by GERARD OF ABBEVILLE at the inception of the preceptor of Peronne. He was the 13th minister of the English Franciscan province, probably between 1292 and 1298. He was buried at Norwich.

Among his works are: (1) Commentarius in Sententias, date not yet identified; (2) Quaestiones disputatae, c. 1282–84; De emanatione aeterna, qq. 7; De lapsu naturae humanae, qq. 2; De anima, qq. 10 [ed. Quaracchi 1932; cf. De humanae cognitionis ratione (Quaracchi 1883) 197–220]; and (3) Quodlibet 1–4, c. 1282–86 (see Glorieux L, 2.264–269). Of these, Quodl. 3.25 (De privilegiis O.P. et O.F.M. audiendi confessiones) is edited by F. Delorme, Studi Francescani 31 (1934) 331–335; Quodl. 4.15–17 (De dilectione, gaudiis et doloribus B. M. V.), by A. Emmen, Franziskanische Studien 39 (1957) 210–214.

Marston's teachings are representative of English Augustinianism with borrowings from Arabic philosophers, principally from AVICENNA. He quotes Aristotle's De anima in the Arabic-Latin translation. Defending traditional Augustinian doctrines against the growing Aristotelianism, on almost all contested points he takes up an energetic, sometimes even reactionary, position against Aquinas. In his Quodl. 4.15–17, he shows a strong dependence on the De excellentia B. V. M. (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1878–90] 159:557–580) of EADMER OF CANTERBURY, which he ascribes to ANSELM OF CANTERBURY. Though D. L. Douie is too severe in his judgment [Archbishop Peckham (Oxford 1952) 13, 284–285], the truth seems to be that Roger was conservative, somewhat small-minded, and somewhat unoriginal as a theologian; yet his doctrine is valuable in understanding many points of Duns Scotus's system.

Bibliography: A. PEREZ, La Materia de Avicena a la Escuela Franciscana: Avicena, Averroes, Tomas de Aquino, Beunaventura, Peckham, Marston, Olivo, Mediavilla, Duns Escoto (Maracaibo, Venezuela 1998) bibliography, 463–77. R. HISSETTE, "Esse-Essentia Chez Roger Marston," in Sapientiae Doctrina; Melanges de Theologie et de Litterature Medievales Offerts a Dom Hildebrand (Leuven 1980) 110–118. R. MARSTON, Quodlibeta Quatour ad Fidem Codicum nunc Primum Edita Studio et Cura (Rome 1968).

J.A. MERINO, Historia de la Filosofía Franciscana (Madrid 1993) 383–84.

[A. EMMEN]

ROGER OF ÉLAN, BL.

English Cistercian; d. Jan. 4, 1162–75. He joined the Cistercians at Lorroy-en-Berry, Diocese of Bourges, France, some time after 1129. In 1148 he was made first abbot of Élan, founded by Withier, Lord of Rethel, in the Diocese of Reims. His vita, written some time after his death, is based merely on tradition. It records that Abp. Henry of Reims (1162–75), brother of King Louis VII, not liking the bread offered to him on a visit to the abbey, granted as much land in Attigny as could be plowed by five yoke of oxen in a year to provide better grain. Miracles apart, no precise details of Roger's life or death are available. His relics, although partly dispersed during the French Revolution, are still the object of pilgrimage.

Feast: Jan. 4.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Jan. 1:182–185. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 vol. (Brussels 1898–1901) 2:7288. Cistercienser-Chronik 27 (1915) 13. G. MÜLLER, ibid. 33 (1921) 161–164. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, 12 vol. (Paris 1935–56) 1:73.

[C. H. TALBOT]

ROGER OF NOTINGHAM

Franciscan theologian; fl. 1343–58. A member of the Oxford friary, Roger was a bachelor in theology by 1343. Around the feast of SS. Peter and Paul (June 29) of that year, he completed a logical work on insoluble propositions, Insolubilia (Brit. Mus., MS Harley 3243, fol. 49–50v). According to him all true “insolubles” are false, although many propositions are only mistakenly considered to be “insolubles.” While it is certain that he lectured on the Sentences, only an “introitus” or introduction to the second book is extant. Since he is not listed among the first 67 lecturers of the Oxford friary, it is probable that he became master in theology after 1350. In 1358 he was one of the five FRANCISCANS of that friary licensed by SIMON ISLIP to preach in the Archdiocese of Canterbury. The extant theological fragment suggests that he followed the tradition of ROBERT GROSSETESTE, BONAVENTURE, RICHARD RUFUS, and DUNS SCOTUS.

Bibliography: A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A. D. 1500 (Oxford 1957–59) 2:1377. E. A. SYNAN, “The ‘Introitus ad sententias’ of Roger Notingham, O.F.M.,” Mediaeval Studies 25 (1963) 259–279.

[J. A. WEISHEPL]

ROGER OF SALISBURY

Bishop, chief minister and regent of Henry I and Stephen; d. Salisbury, England, December 1139. This obscure Norman clerk attached himself to the Conqueror's son, Henry, and administered his finances so well that the prince made him one of his principal advisers. After his coronation in 1100, HENRY I appointed Roger chancellor of England, then bishop of SALISBURY in 1101. Although Roger strengthened the landed endowment and educational facilities of his diocese and founded a number of priories, his tight control of other monasteries and his domination of the Canterbury archiepiscopal elections in 1114 and 1123 caused contemporary monastic chroniclers to hold him in low esteem. Yet his undoubted executive abilities pleased Henry, who designated him justiciar of all England. As justiciar, “second only to the King,” he administered the legal and financial apparatus of the government and encouraged such innovations as the system of itinerant justices, the Board of Exchequer, the Pipe Rolls, and an improved coinage. After 1120 he also acted as regent during Henry's visits to Normandy. Roger swore in 1126 to support the Empress Matilda as heir to England's crown, but in 1135 he helped Stephen of Blois seize the throne. At first, King STEPHEN handsomely rewarded Roger, but finding himself badly in need of funds, he captured the aged prelate in June 1139 and confiscated his great castles and wealth. Roger, failing to obtain redress in a church council, returned to Sarum (Salisbury) shorn of his power and died there a broken man. He was one of the first of those ecclesiastical statesmen who, like Cardinals Wolsey and Richlieu, used their priestly position as a buttress for political power.

Bibliography: WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY, The Historia novella, tr. K. R. POTTER (New York 1955). C. L. KINGSFORD, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 17:103–106. E. J. KEALEY, Roger, Bishop of Salisbury and Chief Justiciar of All England (Doctoral diss. unpub. Johns Hopkins U. 1962). Gesta Stephani: The Deeds of Stephen, ed. and tr. K. R. POTTER (New York 1955).

[E. J. KEALEY]

ROGER OF SICILY

Roger I, Great Count of Sicily and Calabria from 1072 to June 22, 1101; b. 1031; d. Mileto (Calabria). He was the youngest son of the Norman TANCRED. Roger joined his brother Robert Guiscard in Apulia and took part in his expeditions against Arab Sicily. After the fall of Palermo (1072), he carried on alone and brought the conquest to a successful end (1091), becoming the true organizer of the new Sicilian state. When he returned Sicily to the Roman Church, Pope URBAN II granted him the apostolic legateship for Sicily, later called the Monarchia sicula. Roger introduced feudal landholding cautiously. He did not interfere with existing laws and customs. He granted religious freedom to Greek Christians, Jews, and Muslims. He enriched the treasury by making the export of grain to the Muslim state of North Africa a state monopoly.

Roger II, count, King of Sicily, 1101 to Feb. 26, 1154; b. 1095; d. Palermo. He was the son of Roger I and Adelaide. He effectively united Sicily with the Norman mainland possessions (1128). In the papal schism of 1130, he supported the antipope Anacletus II, who crowned him King of Sicily, Apulia, and Calabria on Christmas Day, 1130, at Palermo. He defeated the European coalitions against him and gained the recognition of Pope INNOCENT II (1139). Instead of participating in the second crusade, he raided Byzantium and founded a short-lived colonial empire in Tunisia. He introduced a new code of law (the Assizes of Ariano, 1140), centralized finances, and named agents of the central government for all districts of the mainland and island. His statesmanlike qualities, his rational approach to problems of government, and his genius for diplomacy and strategy marked him as "the first modern ruler." He is credited with that fusion of Western, Byzantine, and Arabic culture found in the Norman art of southern Italy and Sicily.

Bibliography: Sources. GAUFREDUS MALATERRA, De rebus gestis Rogerii Calabriae et Siciliare comitis, ed. E. PONTIERI. L. A. MURATORI, Rerum italicarum scriptores, 500–1500 (Città di Castello 1900). ALEXANDER OF TELESE, De rebus gestis Rogerii Siciliae regis, in G. DEL RE, ed., Cronisti e Scrittori, 2 v. (Naples 1845–68) 1:85–146. M. AMARI, Biblioteca Arabo-Sicula, 2 v. (Turin & Rome 1880–81). Literature. For extensive bibliography see P. F. KEHR, Regesta Pontificum Romanorum. Italia Pontificia, 8 v. (Berlin 1906–35) 8:1–5 and H. WIERUSZOWSKI, "The Norman Kingdom of Sicily and the Crusades," History of the Crusades, ed. K. M. SETTON, 2 v. (Philadelphia 1962) v. 2.

[H. WIERUSZOWSKI]

ROGER OF SWYNESHED

English Benedictine, logician, and natural philosopher; d. Glastonbury Abbey, Somerset, shortly before May 12, 1365. He has been confused with the Merton mathematician, RICHARD OF SWYNESHED. Roger had no known connection with Merton College, but he attended Oxford early in the 1330s. He was probably a regent in arts (1330–35) and then became a master of theology, presumably of Oxford. Since it is not known when he became a Benedictine monk, he may have incepted as a secular master. He wrote De obligationibus et insolubilibus, two treatises on logic often found together, some time before 1335. These were used as textbooks at some Contimental universities in the late Middle Ages (see LOGIC, HISTORY OF). Between 1328 and 1338 he wrote a work on physics, De motibus naturalibus, concerned in part with "the possible proportions of velocities in moving bodies," which had an importance in medieval science that is not yet fully appreciated. He is supposed to have written a work entitled De consequentiis, on the logic of consequences. If he wrote any works on theology they have not yet been identified. Friar Richard Trevytlam, in his defense of the mendicant friars against the monks, De laude universitatis oxoniae (c. 1367–70), upholds Roger, "subtilis Swynshed" of good memory, as an ideal monk.

Bibliography: J. A. WEISHEIPL, "R. Swynshed, O.S.B., Logician . . .," Oxford Studies Presented to Daniel Callus (Oxford 1964) 231–252, differentiates between Richard, John, and Roger Swynshed and corrects A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the Scholars of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 3:1837.

[F. D. BLACKLEY]

ROGER OF TODI, BL.

Franciscan; b. Todi (Umbria), Italy; d. Jan. 5, 1237. Roger, one of the earliest companions of St. FRANCIS OF ASSISI, was received into the FRANCISCANS by Francis himself in 1216. He distinguished himself as one of the first Franciscans in Spain. Francis then assigned him as spiritual director of the convent in Rieti, Italy, where (Bl.) PHILIPPA MARERI and her companions established themselves under the rule of (St.) CLARE OF ASSISI. Roger was with Philippa when she died and he pronounced her eulogy. While Roger was still alive, his friend, Pope GREGORY IX, called him a saint; Gregory also approved Roger's cult for the city of Todi, where his remains were enshrined. Francis characterized Roger as an exemplar of charity (Speculum perfectionis, ch. 85); Thomas of Pavia, in his Dialogus written c. 1245, assigned 16 miracles to him. In 1751, Benedict XIV approved his feast for the Franciscan order though today it is celebrated only by the Franciscans in the province of Umbria.

Feast: Jan. 14.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum (Antwerp 1643–; Venice 1734–; Paris 1863–) March 1:415–417. B. MAZZARA, Leggendario francescano, 12 v. (Venice 1721–22) v.1. LÉON DE CLARY, Lives of the Saints . . . of Saint Francis, 4 v. (Taunton, Eng. 1885–87) 1:442–443. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York, 1956) 1:88.

[J. J. SMITH]

ROGER OF WORCESTER

Bishop; b. c. 1133; d. Tours, France, Aug. 9, 1179. He was the son of Earl Robert of Gloucester (d. 1147) and grandson of HENRY I of England. He was educated at Bristol with his cousin (later HENRY II) and at Paris under ROBERT OF MELUN. Roger doubtless owed his swift promotion to his royal connections, but was Thomas BECKET's choice for the See of WORCESTER, and was consecrated by him at CANTERBURY on Aug. 23, 1164. The most spiritual, steadfast, and courageous of Becket's supporters, "the morning star which illuminates our sad story," he was uniquely loyal to his consecrator without entirely losing the favor of King Henry II. From 1167 he shared the archbishop's exile, and was absent from England in 1170 when Becket was murdered, returning only in 1172. Before and after Becket's martyrdom, he unswervingly upheld the principles for which the archbishop contended, but with moderation and concern for the authority of the king. His work as bishop and canonist was of outstanding importance, and he was an eminent judge-delegate who, with BARTHOLOMEW OF EXETER, was described by Pope ALEXANDER III as one of "the twin lights" illuminating the English Church. Roger left a striking record of his judicial activities in the primitive English DECRETAL collections from the mid-1170s, whereas his surviving acta throw light on his concern for his diocese. He was present at RICHARD OF CANTERBURY's synod at Westminster in 1175 and possibly at the Third LATERAN COUNCIL of 1179.

Bibliography: A. MOREY, Bartholomew of Exeter: Bishop and Canonist (Cambridge 1937). M. G. HALL (Mrs. M. Cheney), Roger of Worcester: 1164-79 (B. Litt. diss. unpub. Oxford 1940). M. CHENEY, "The Compromise of Avranches of 1172 and the Spread of Canon Law in England," English Historical Review 56 (1941): 177-197. D. KNOWLES, The Episcopal Colleagues of Archbishop Thomas Becket (Cambridge, Eng. 1951). C. DUGGAN, Twelfth-Century Decretal Collections and Their Importance in English History (London 1963).

[C. DUGGAN]

ROGERS, MARY JOSEPH, MOTHER

Foundress of MARYKNOLL SISTERS of St. Dominic; b. Boston, Massachusetts, Oct. 27, 1882; d. New York City, Oct. 9, 1955. Mary Josephine Rogers ("Mollie"), the daughter of Abraham and Mary Josephine (Plummer) Rogers, grew up in a closely knit family of eight children. Following her public schooling in Boston, Massachusetts, she attended Smith College in Northampton, Massachusetts, graduating in 1905.

During her college years, she was struck by the missionary zeal of the Protestant students involved in the Student Volunteer Movement. After graduation, she returned to Smith College on a teaching fellowship in the college's biology department. A Protestant colleague urged Mollie to form a Bible Study Class for the Catholic students, and following the deeper yearnings of her own heart, she chose to do a Mission Study Class. Her search for mission materials led her to Fr. James A. Walsh at the Society for the Propagation of Faith Office in Boston, Massachusetts. She left her academic post at Smith in 1908 and began teaching in the Boston public schools. This enabled her to give all her spare time to collaborating with Walsh in the publication of the new mission magazine, The Field Afar.

In 1911, Walsh and Rev. Thomas Frederick Price founded the Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America (see MARYKNOLL FATHERS AND BROTHERS). Mollie organized a group of women who offered their services as secretaries to this new mission society in 1912. Mollie was chosen leader, and within a few years the number of women had grown. By 1920 they received canonical recognition as "The Foreign Mission Sisters of St. Dominic." A year later, the first group of sisters went to South China. As foundress of the community, Mollie, now known as Mother Mary Joseph (Rogers), became the first mother general of the congregation and remained in office until 1946.

Mission shaped every facet of life. In the early 1930s Rogers founded a teachers' college for her sisters at the motherhouse in Maryknoll, New York. A contemplative community was firmly established within the congregation; she held out the ideal that every Maryknoll Sister be a contemplative in the midst of an active mission life and encouraged the gifting of each sister. Cooperating with Bp. Francis X. FORD's plan of using sisters to carry the gospel message to the village women of Kaying, South China, she was also active in establishing centers to train indigenous personnel as catechists, nurses, teachers, and religious women. Impelled by her missionary spirit and charism, the congregation established international missions with a wide range of educational, medical, social and pastoral ministries. At the time of her death on Oct. 9, 1955, the congregation was actively serving the missions in nineteen countries in Africa, Asia, Latin America, the Central Pacific Islands, and the U.S.

Bibliography: C. KENNEDY, To the Uttermost Parts of the Earth: The Spirit and Charism of Mary Josephine Rogers (Maryknoll, NY 1980). P. LERNOUX, Hearts on Fire: The Story of the Maryknoll Sisters (Maryknoll, NY 1993). J. M. LYONS, Maryknoll's First Lady: The Life of Mother Mary Joseph, Foundress of the Maryknoll Sisters (Garden City, NY 1967). M. J. ROGERS, Discourses of Mother Mary Joseph, Rogers, M.M., Foundress, Maryknoll Sisters, compiled by Sr. Mary Coleman and staff, 4 vols.

(Maryknoll, NY 1982). J.-P. WIEST, Maryknoll in China: A History, 1918–1955 (Armonk, NY 1988).

[J. M. LYONS/C. KENNEDY]

ROGUE, PIERRE RENÉ, BL.

Martyr; b. Vannes, northwestern France, June 11, 1758; d. there, March 1, 1796. After ordination (1782), he joined the VINCENTIANS (1786) and taught in their seminary in Vannes from 1788. During the FRENCH REVOLUTION he refused to take the oath supporting the CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY. Although the government forbade him to exercise his priestly functions, he engaged secretly in apostolic work and rendered signal service during a typhus epidemic. While carrying the viaticum to the dying, Rogue was apprehended and imprisoned (Dec. 25, 1795). When offered an opportunity to flee, he refused to take it, and spent his days in prison helping fellow prisoners until he was guillotined. His remains are enshrined in the cathedral at Vannes. He was beatified by Pope Pius XI on April 29, 1934.

Feast: March 1.

Bibliography: L. BRÉTAUDEAU, Un Martyr de la Révolution à Vannes: Pierre-René Rogue (Paris 1908). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'histoire des fêtes, (Paris 1935–56) 13:114–119.

[M. LAWLOR]

ROHRBACHER, RENÉ FRANÇOIS

Ecclesiastical historian; b. Langatte (Moselle), France, Sept. 27, 1789; d. Paris, Jan. 17, 1856. After ordination in 1812, he served as chaplain at Insming and Lunéville, and in 1823 he became superior of the diocesan mission of Nancy. In 1826 he joined Hugues Félicité de LAMENNAIS at La Chesnaie and in 1828 entered the Congregation of St. Peter. From 1828 to 1835 he taught philosophy to the novices at Malestroit. He also collaborated on the publication of L'Avenir. When Lamennais, condemned by Rome, refused to submit, Rohrbacher broke with him (1835) and taught Church history and exegesis in the seminary at Nancy (1835–49). Partly in reaction against the views of Lamennais, Rohrbacher studied the relationship between faith and reason, the basis of certitude, and the place of the Catholic Church in the history of mankind. His most significant works, Catéchisme du sens commun (1825) and Histoire universelle de l'Église catholique (28 v. 1842–49; 9th ed. 1899–1903; Eng. tr.), attempted to rectify some ideas advanced by Lamennais. Hence the Catéchisme contended, with Louis de BONALD, that the first principles of knowledge and reason rest upon divine revelation. His Histoire universelle refuted the contention of Lamennais that the modern Catholic Church had become decadent. This work attacked the ecclesiastical history by Claude FLEURY, which was deeply imbued with GALLICANISM. Rohrbacher, an ultramontane, sought also to glorify the papacy's role in history, and he had considerable influence in the rapid growth of ULTRAMONTANISM among the French clergy. While Rohrbacher evidenced a commendable cosmic vision of the Catholic Church and an acquaintance with the vast literature on his subject, he relied solely on secondary sources, lacked critical sense, and was unduly polemical and apologetic. His works brought him both fame and opprobrium. His ultramontanism led to his dismissal from his professorship in 1849. He spent his last years in retirement as a guest of the Holy Ghost Fathers in Paris.

Bibliography: Histoire universelle . . . (9th ed. Paris 1899–1903) 1:1–138, biog. of the author. L. FINOT, L'Abbé Rohrbacher (Sainte-Marie-aux-Mines 1893). L. MARCHAL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 13.2:2767–2774. R. AUBERT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1363. Biographie universelle, ed. L. G. MICHAUD, 45 v. (Paris 1843–65) 36:347–348.

[M. H. QUINLAN]

ROJAS, JOSÉ RAMÓN

Franciscan missionary, defender of the rights of the Church, known as El Padre Guatemala; b. Quetzaltenango, Guatemala, Aug. 31, 1775; d. Ica, Peru, July 23, 1839. An older priest brother was his first teacher. In 1794 he entered the Franciscan Order at the Mission College of Cristo Crucificado of Guatemala, made famous by Father Margil. He was ordained there in 1798. The period from his ordination to about 1820 he spent for the most part in the missions of Costa Rica and Nicaragua, either as simple missionary or as superior. Two reports written in 1813 and 1814 attest his zeal and farsightedness. In 1819 he founded the Mission College of León in Nicaragua and there received into the Franciscan Order Juan José de la Trinidad Reyes, later the founder of the present University of Honduras. Several villages begun by Rojas have grown into thriving centers. The emancipation of Central America brought with it the attempt of the new rulers to dominate the Church. Rojas, as official theological consultant to both the archbishop of Guatemala and the bishop of León, was quick to resist these efforts, especially the plan to intrude the priest José Matias Delgado as bishop of Honduras without the consent of Rome. For his resistance he was once sentenced to be shot and was twice exiled, the last time on April 15, 1831. Peru gave him refuge and Jorge Benavente, Archbishop of Lima, became his close friend. Rojas built the chapel of Guadalupe in Callao with an annexed hospital for sailors, and a retreat house in Ica. For his kindness and zeal he is still known in Peru, and each year the faithful gather to celebrate his memory.

Bibliography: E. D. TOVAR Y RAMÍREZ, El apóstol de Ica, fray José Ramón Rojas, el Padre Guatemala (Lima 1943). J. V. CORA, Oración fúnebre (Lima 1839).

[L. LAMADRID]

ROJAS, SIMON DE, ST.

Trinitarian priest, founder of the Congregation of the Servants of the Most Sweet Name of Mary (a secular institute); b. Oct. 20, 1552, Valladolid, Spain; d. Sept. 28, 1624, Madrid, Spain. The third of the four children of the noble Gregorio Ruiz de Navamanuel and Costanza de Rojas, Simon joined the Trinitarians at age twelve. He made his profession in Valladolid (1572) and was ordained priest upon completing his studies at Salamanca (1577). Thereafter he served the order in many capacities, including superior of the order; he became a famous preacher of missions; and, later in life, was appointed chaplain to the Spanish court of Philip III and tutor to the future King Philip IV (reigned 1621–65). He was offered, and declined, two bishoprics. His intense Marian devotion caused him to advocate for the liturgical inclusion of the feast of the Holy Name of Mary, promote the total consecration to the Blessed Mother throughout Germany and Spain, and found the Servants of the Most Sweet Name of Mary for the relief of the poor. When the priest affectionately known as “Padre Ave Maria” (“Father Hail Mary”) died, he was given royal honors. Although Simon was beatified in 1766, political turmoil delayed his canonization until July 3, 1988.

Feast: Sept. 28.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1988): 847. F. DE LA VEGA Y TORAYA, Vida del venerable siervo de dios, y finissimo capellan de Maria santissima padre maestro fray Simòn de Roxas (2d ed. Madrid 1760).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ROLAND, NICOLAS, BL.

Priest and founder of the Sisters of the Child Jesus (Holy Child) (Soeurs du Saint-Enfant Jésus de Reims); b. Rheims, France, Dec. 8, 1642; d. Rheims, April 26 or 27, 1678. Roland was educated by the JESUITS in Rheims. When he discerned his priestly vocation, he went to Paris (1861) to study philosophy and theology. Upon returning to Rheims (1665), he was provided with a rich cathedral canonry. Roland was probably ordained in 1667 or 1668; the records were lost or destroyed during the French Revolution. Following his ordination, he went to Saint-Amand's in Rouen, where he lived in complete poverty.

Here Roland's life entwined with that of Nicolas Barré, who had established the Sisters of Providence in Rouen for the education of poor girls. When Roland returned to Rheims, he was entrusted with a poorly maintained orphanage that he transformed into a school. In 1670, Roland convinced Barré to send two women from Rouen, who were trained in his methods and acquainted with community life, to establish a similar foundation at Rheims. This became the Congregation of the Child Jesus that provides girls with free education designed to instill Christian values in both the children and their parents. The incipient congregation attracted criticism for teaching Christian doctrine, usually reserved to the ordained; however, Roland so convinced Archbishop Maurice Le Tellier of the efficacy of the approach that schools were opened throughout Rheims. Roland also served as spiritual director to, and encouraged the vocation of, Jean Baptiste de la Salle.

Roland died from a fever contracted while ministering to victims of an epidemic. Before his death, he charged de la Salle with executing his last will and testament: to seek approbation for the Sisters of the Child Jesus (given May 9, 1678) and ensure the growth of the congregation. The sisters took their first vows in 1684.

Nicolas Roland was beatified at Rome by Pope John Paul II on Oct. 16, 1994.

Feast: April 27 (LaSallian Brothers).

Bibliography: L. AROZ, Nicolas Roland, John Baptist de la Salle and Sisters of the Child Jesus of Reims (Rheims 1972); The Succession of Nicolas Roland, Canon Théologal of the Notre Dame Church of Reims (Rheims 1995). É. RIDEAU, Nicolas Roland, 1642–1678: hier et aujourd'hui (Paris 1976).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ROLAND OF CREMONA

Philosopher and theologian; b. Cremona, toward the end of the 12th century; d. Bologna, 1259. In 1219, as professor of philosophy at the University of Bologna, he entered the Dominican Order. He founded the Dominican priory at Cremona in 1226. After receiving the doctorate in theology at the University of Paris in 1228, he remained there, and in 1229 was the first religious to occupy the chair of theology. He strenuously defended the rights of the Church against heretics, including the famous Ezzelino da Romano, even to the extent of placing his own life in jeopardy. His last years were devoted to teaching in the Dominican house of studies at Bologna.

His Summa theologica, which is the fruit of his teaching at Paris, is preserved as codex 795 in the Bibliothèque Mazarine of Paris. The third book of this Summa, once thought lost, is preserved in the Civic Library of Bergamo (Cod. Δ9, 13). A commentary on the Book of Job is also extant (Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale, Cod. Lat. 405). These works have great importance both for a knowledge of the author's character and scientific attitude and for the history of medieval thought.

Roland marked the transition from the old to the new scholasticism, of which THOMAS AQUINAS was the chief exponent. Not only did Roland know ARISTOTLE, who was for him "the great philosopher," but he showed his genuine Aristotelianism in his love for scientific research, spirit of observation, and logical rigor of argumentation. In addition to his knowledge of Scripture, Roland manifested a vast and sure store of information in philosophy and physical science, and spoke with competence in medicine, geography, astronomy, meteorology, magic, and witchcraft. Anything knowable was of interest to him, because he considered every science to lead to truth, and every truth to serve theology. Grammar, rhetoric, mathematics, and, in general, all the liberal arts, were necessary, in his judgment, for a serious study of theology. He was drawn more to an empirical study of phenomena than to pure conceptual speculation. Roland possessed an encyclopedic mind very much like that of ALBERT THE GREAT. He had a sharp critical sense, ready to condemn error and anyone fathering it—Augustine and his favorite philosopher not excluded.

Bibliography: G. DE FRACHET, Vitae fratrum ordinis praedicatorum (Louvain 1896) 26, 38, 168, 275. J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores ordinis praedicatorum (New York 1959) 1.1:125–127. F. EHRLE, "S. Domenico, le origini del primo studio generale del suo ordine a Parigi e la somma teologica del primo maestro Rolando da Cremona," Miscellanea dominicana, ed. I. TAURISANO (Rome 1923) 85–134. E. PRETO, "La posizione di Rolando da Cremona nel pensiero medioevale," Rivista de filosofia neoscolastica 23 (1931) 484–489; "Un testo inedito: la Summa theologica di Rolando da Cremona," ibid. 40 (1948) 45–72. E. FILTHAUT, Roland von Cremona O.P. und die Anfänge der Scholastik im Predigerorden (Vechta 1936). O. LOTTIN, "Roland de Crémone et Hughes de St-Cher," Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 12 (1940) 136–143. A. DONDAINE, "Un Commentaire scripturaire de Roland de Crémone: 'Le Livre de Job'," Archivum fratrum praedicatorum 11 (1941) 109–137. A. D'AMATO, "L'origine dello Studio domenicano e l'Università di Bologna," Sapienza 2 (1949) 245–268.

[A. D'AMATO]

ROLDÁN LARA, DAVID, ST.

Martyr, lay youth; b. March 2, 1902, Chalchihuites, Zacatecas, Archdiocese of Durango, Mexico; d. Aug. 15, 1926, Puerto de Santa Teresa near Zacatecas. After the death of his father while David was still quite young, he became his mother's favorite and helped care for his siblings. Family poverty required Roldán, the eldest son, to leave the Durango Seminary. He was known as a joyful and generous companion, an understanding coworker, and an honorable employee of the mining company. In 1925 he was elected president of Catholic Action for Mexican Youth. At the beginning of the religious conflict, he was named vice-president of the National League and worked for the reversal of anti-ecclesial laws. Accused of plotting an armed revolt with (St.) Luis BATIZ SAINZ, he was arrested at home by General Ortiz. Although money was offered for their release, they were taken to a place near Zacatecas. He and his cousin (St.) Salvador LARA were shot after witnessing the execution of Batiz and Manuel MORALES. David was both beatified (Nov. 22, 1992) and canonized (May 21, 2000) with Cristobal MAGALLANES [see GUADALAJARA (MEXICO), MARTYRS OF, SS.] by Pope John Paul II.

Feast: May 25 (Mexico).

Bibliography: J. CARDOSO, Los mártires mexicanos (Mexico City 1953). V. GARCÍA JUÁREZ, Los cristeros (Fresnillo, Zac. 1990).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ROLDUC, MONASTERY OF

Called also Kloosterrade, former abbey of CANONS REGULAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE in Rolduc, Limburg, the Netherlands; in the old diocese of Liège. Rolduc was founded in 1104 by Ailbert d'Antoing (d. 1122), a canon of Tournai and founder of Claire-Fontaine, who became its first abbot. The immunity granted it in 1108 was confirmed by Pope CALLISTUS II in 1122; after 1136 the abbey came under the protection of the counts of Limburg, who were buried there. Thirty-eight abbots, drawn for the most part from the aristocracy of Limburg, followed Ailbert. Abbot Wynand Lamberti saved Rolduc from suppression after the Peace of WESTPHALIA, but it was secularized in 1797. Repurchased by the exiled canons, it became a minor seminary for Liège in 1831 and then for the Diocese of Roermond, Netherlands, after 1843. From 1123 a flourishing school had existed in the monastery. Its book catalogue in Chartularium Rodense (c. 1230) lists more than 200 theological, philosophical, and classical works, ranking it among the largest of medieval monastic libraries. Deeply influenced by the school of Liège, it became AUGUSTINIAN in theology while showing a preference for allegory and mysticism. The crypt of the monastery church was built by Ailbert and consecrated in 1108. The church itself, dating from 1209, was restored in the 19th century and contains Ailbert's remains discovered at Sechten in 1771.

Bibliography: H. DUBRULLE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART (Paris 1912–) 1:1144. F. SASSEN, “L’Enseignement scolastique à l’Abbaye de Rolduc au XII^e siècle,” Revue néo-scholastique de philosophie 36 (1934) 78–100. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:2496. A. F. MANNING, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:350–351.

[G. E. GINGRAS]

ROLENDIS, ST.

Also known as Rollandis, virgin who lived in the seventh or eighth century. Her vita, composed probably in the 13th century, relates that Rolendis was the daughter of a Gallic king (J. Molanus and F. Zutman claim that she was a daughter of the Lombard King Desiderius; J. Roland identifies her as the princess divorced by CHARLEMAGNE). She was supposed to marry a Scottish prince. To escape this marriage she fled to the convent of St. Ursula in COLOGNE, but died en route in Villers-Poterie near Gerpennes (Hainaut), Belgium. In 1103 her relics were exhumed by Bishop Othbert of LIÈGE. Her cult developed early in the Gerpennes area around the relics contained in her eighth-century sarcophagus, rediscovered in 1951. Annually on Whitmonday a solemn procession is held, in which her relics, in an early 17th-century reliquary, are carried.

Feast: May 13.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum May 3:241–244. C. PARADIS, La Vie de S. Rolandis (Namur 1620). F. ZUTMAN, La Princesse fugitive (Liège 1667). J. L. ROLAND, S. Rolende, vierge royale (Namur 1933). M. COENS, “La Vita Rolendis dans sa recension gerpinoise,” Analecta Bollandiana 78 (1960) 309–335; Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:1367–68. J. MERTENS, Bulletin de la Commission royale des monuments et des sites 12 (1961) 1–72. É. LEMPEREUR, ed., Gerpennes: bouquet de textes inspirés par Gerpennes, sainte Rolende et sa “marche,” depuis des siècles (Loverval 1973).

[M. CSÁKY]

ROLEVINCK, WERNER

Carthusian author of more than 50 works on historical, biblical, and theological subjects; b. Laer bei Horstmar, Westphalia, 1425; d. Cologne, Aug. 26, 1502. He was a renowned figure in the celebrated Charterhouse of St. Barbara, Cologne, from 1447 until his death. He was highly esteemed by J. TRITHEMIUS and other scholars of the day for the sanctity of his life, his scholarship, and his gifts as a spiritual counselor. He died, a victim of charity, while ministering to seven of his brethren stricken by the plague. His most popular work was the Fasciculus tem- porum (Cologne 1470), a brief chronicle of world history from the coming of Christ to his own day, which went through 50 editions and was translated into numerous languages. Equally successful, and more lasting, was his De laude veteris Saxoniae nunc Westphaliae dictae (Cologne c. 1478; ed. H. Bücken, Münster 1953). It gives a lively and valuable account of the manners and customs of his homeland. His awareness of contemporary social problems is evident from the De origine nobilitatis (Cologne 1472), the De regimine rusticorum (Cologne c. 1427), and the De contractibus (Cologne c. 1475). Other works attest to his relation to the DEVOTIO MODERNA and his concern for monastic and clerical reform, for example, the Quaestiones duodecim ss. theologiae studiosis (Cologne 1475). Most of his writings, which are chiefly biblical commentaries, still remain in manuscript form.

Bibliography: H. WOLFFGRAM, Zeitschrift für vaterländische Geschichte und Altertumskunde 48.1 (1890): 85–136; 50.1 (1892): 127–161.

[F. COURTNEY]

ROLL AND CODEX

Two distinct types of book format used in antiquity and during the Middle Ages.

Roll. The ancient papyrus roll (Gr. τόμος, τεῦχος Lat. volumen; also βύβλος, βίβλος prior to the appearance of the codex) or the epistolary and documentary roll (Gr. κύλινδρος, κυλιστός; medieval rotulus) has been known in some detail from the 3d century B.C. It is uncertain whether the stability it enjoyed as an institution was an Alexandrian tradition. Records were written along the length or width of the roll without columnization; in the older Ptolemaic, Byzantine, Coptic, and early Western medieval period the charta transversa (script parallel to the width) was popular. Books were written along the roll's length, which varied greatly, though a manageable size was favored. Pliny assumed rolls up to 20 sheets (about 5 meters) to be normal, but there were shorter and longer ones, often up to 10 meters in length. Birt's conjecture of “great rolls” for the older classical authors (e.g., Herodotus in one roll) is rejected today. The literary division, called the book, was not developed under the influence of the roll. Such divisions of larger works by the author was a Hellenistic practice.

The basic unit in the production of the book was not the individual sheet (Gr. σελίς, Lat. pagina), but rather the complete roll, onto which any desired number of additional sheets could be pasted. The roll was inscribed preferably on the inner side (recto), where the papyrus fibers run vertically to the sutures (Gr. κόλλημα), i.e., mostly horizontal for the copyist and so render unnecessary any ruling on the sheet. In earlier times, an obliquely cut rush or an unsplit reed was used for writing; from the 3d century B.C. reeds were split and sharpened (Gr. κόλαμος Lat. calamus, canna), and a deep black India ink (Gr. μέλον) was used. Ink was made of a mixture of gums, lampblack, and water and was washable. The text was arranged in columns, whose width (in harmony with the height of the roll) was determined by considerations of legibility; it amounted often to about 7.5 to 9 centimeters, the limit of length being that of the epic hexameter, which, like the iambic trimeter, filled the line. The columns of any given roll were of equal width; in the later lyric verse the lines were indented and adapted according to length. The length of the column depended on the height of the roll and was uniform throughout; it ran from less than 20 to as many as 70 lines (generally 20 to 30 lines). Between the individual columns was a blank space or intercolumniation (not identical with the suture), in which later marginal notes, commentaries, and glosses were often written.

The roll was not given a title, but was cited by its opening words, the incipit; from the 3d century B.C. it often carried a portrait of the author. The exact title came at the end of the work, on the blank tailpiece of the roll, the ἄγραφον. Only incomplete remnants of illustrated book rolls have been preserved. Originally (6th to 4th century B.C.) book rolls were stored in chests; the content of the roll was noted in the ἐπίγραμμα, a vertical external inscription written on a protective sheet of papyrus that reinforced the roll, or on a parchment strip, the πρωτόκολλον, pasted onto the first sheet of the roll. When the rolls were later (examples from Athens, 415 B.C.) kept in cupboards or bookcases, the upper edge of the rolls, which were arranged in a flat position, extended outward toward the viewer; a parchment streamer (σίλλυβος, σίττυβος, Lat. index, titulus) was attached, which hung down over the edge and gave the title of the work. This brought the ἄγραφον to the inside of the roll between the outer left edge and the beginning of the text. The original boxlike container (Gr. κιβώτιον, Lat. capsa) gradually assumed, in virtue of the use of the tituli, the shape of an elongated cylindrical receptacle into which the rolls were inserted. The rolls of any one work were numbered and were thus recorded in ancient library catalogues; from the time of the Alexandrians notations were added concerning origin, former owners, author, etc.

The roll was held in both hands by the reader and was read by unrolling it parallel to the length from the left, rolling it up again to the right, and usually rerolling it. Deluxe rolls appear to have been unrolled with the aid of a rolling rod (Gr. ὀμφαλός, Lat. umbilicus) that was usually placed loose inside the roll. The roll was held together by a band or cord (lora).

Unlike Egypt, the Near East preferred to use leather, which in Egypt was as old as papyrus but was rapidly supplanted. There is evidence of the use of leather rolls down to the Byzantine period. Rolls preferably of parchment were used in the Middle Ages. They are well exemplified by the south Italian Exsultet rolls, the English Pipe rolls, the Metz juridical rolls—trial records consisting of many individual pieces of parchment sewn together into rolls—necrology rolls, etc.; all comparable to the official documentary rolls (Gr. τόμος συγκολλήσιμος) and land registers of antiquity. Medieval rolls differed, however, in various ways from those of antiquity, especially in being unrolled parallel to the width (with the exception of the Torah scrolls).

Codex. The terms codex and caudex (tree trunk, piece of wood) were used by the Romans to designate by metonymy anything made out of several wooden boards, especially the writing tablet (δέλτος, δελτίον, δελτίδιον, Lat. tabula, tabella; waxed tablet, tabula cerata; tablet whitewashed with lime, tabula cerussata). The tablet had already been brought to the Greeks via the Phoenicians as early as the time of Homer and was early in general daily use in Rome. There the tabulae—since the time of Cato the Censor (d. 149 B.C.) synonymous with codex—were used also for official certificates and texts of laws, and it was customary to bind several tablets together into a notebook (codex, codicillus, pugillaris, pugillare, pugillus). In the stricter sense, codex accepti et recepti meant a debt register or cash book, and codex rationum, a levy book. By the 1st century B.C. at the latest, wood was replaced in notebooks by the thinner, finer, more pliable parchment (membrana) that was more suitable for longer texts, so that membranae and codex were practically synonymous with parchment notebook, as opposed to the Greek διφθέρα, Lat. volumina in membrana (parchment roll). The first reliable evidence of the publication of a literary work in codex format is found in a reference by Martial (Epigr. 14.184–192; 84–85 A.D.), who recommends the pocket-size parchment copybook (pugillares membranei) to the Romans for traveling. The earliest example of the use of codex as a book is in Commodian (Carmen apologeticum 11; 2d half of the 3d century A.D.). The early Christians were especially instrumental in developing the notebook into the codex book. The first disciples of Christ may well have noted down the words of the Lord just as the Jews inscribed their rabbinical writings on small tablets or leather leaves. In Rome during the 1st century they became acquainted with the pugillares membranei, i.e., the parchment notebook. In the further development of the parchment notebook into the codex, the Gospel of St. Mark, written in Rome and very probably inscribed in codex format, and the Acta s. Petri, were decisive contributing factors, because of their authority, to the use of the codex format for later Biblical MSS. Further evidence for this view is attested by the Biblical MSS of the first 3 centuries of the Christian era, which almost exclusively use parchment and the codex format, and by the Coptic MSS from the mid-3d century. The genesis of the book in codex format in the West and the original use of parchment and not papyrus is evidenced by the Latin expressions, codex and membranae, which have no Greek equivalents, even in the 4th century σωμάτιον (body, corpus), πυκτίον (tabula), and κῶδιξ; by the predominance of parchment over papyrus in the oldest Biblical MSS found mostly in Egypt; and finally, by the technical perfection of even the earliest parchment codices in comparison with the bungling execution of the most recent papyrus codices. The codex format remained limited almost exclusively to the Bible in the first 3 centuries, whereas the Christian authors of the 2d and 3d centuries followed the Hellenistic-Roman custom in preferring the roll format for their works. Toward the end of the 3d and the beginning of the 4th century, the triumph of the codex over the roll was assured. A contributing influence was the publication in codex format of the great codes of laws having authoritative force, for example, the Codex Gregorianus and the Codex Hermogenianus. The decisive factor may have been the fact that, with the triumph of Christianity under Emperor CONSTANTINE I, the canon of the Bible, handed down in codex format, became the leading sacred book of the new society, the codex being virtually identified with the Libri sancti. This, and not the fact that the parchment codex was more durable and convenient to read, explains its ultimate supplanting of papyrus and roll. The codex replaced the customary book of the pagan world and became the accepted format of the Christian West. The result was an immense program of transcribing the writings of antiquity from roll to codex. This work accompanied the decline of ancient culture and preserved for the Christian world and for posterity the intellectual treasure of the pagan past.

Bibliography: T. BIRT, Das antike Buchwesen in seinem Verhältnis zur Litteratur (Berlin 1882); Kritik und Hermeneutik nebst Abriss des antiken Buchwesens (Handbuch der Altertumswissenschaft 1.3; 3d ed. Munich 1913). A. BÖMER, "Träger der Schrift und Schreibgerät," Handbuch der Bibliothekswissenschaft, ed. F. MILKAU and G. LEYH, 3 v. in 4 (Leipzig 1931–40) 1:52–. A. BÖMER and A. MENN, ibid. (2d ed. Wiesbaden 1952–61) 1:100–105. H. BRESSLAU, Handbuch der Urkundenlehre für Deutschland und Italien, ed. H. W. KLEWITZ, v.2 (2d ed. Leipzig-Berlin 1931; repr. 1958). F. G. KENYON, Books and Readers in Ancient Greece and Rome (2d ed. Oxford 1951). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie (Paris 1907–53) 9.2:1754–72; 13.1:1370–1520; 15.1:1027–35. J. MALLON, Paléographie romaine (Madrid 1952). H. I. MARROU, "La Technique de l'édition à l'époque patristique," Vigilae christianae 3 (1949)

208–224. M. NORSIA, La scrittura letteraria dal secolo IV. a. C. all'VIII d.C. (Florence 1939). R. A. PACK, The Greek and Latin Literary Texts from Greco-Roman Egypt (2d ed. Ann Arbor 1965). C. H. ROBERTS, "The Christian Book and the Greek Papyri," Journal of Theological Studies 50 (1949) 155–168. W. SCHUBART, Das Buch bei den Griechen und Römern (3d ed. Heidelberg 1962); Griechische Paläographie (Handbuch der Altertumswissenschaft 1.4.1; Munich 1925). K. WEITZMANN, Illustrations in Roll and Codex (Princeton 1947). C. WENDEL, "Geschichte der Bibliotheken im griechisch-römischen Altertum," Handbuch der Bibliothekswissenschaft, v.3 (Leipzig 1940). C. H. ROBERTS, "The Codex," Proceedings of the British Academy 40 (1954) 169–204.

[A. BRUCKNER]

ROLLE DE HAMPOLE, RICHARD

English hermit, author of Latin and English devotional treatises and poetry; b. North Yorkshire, c. 1300; d. Hampole, Sept. 29, 1349. Richard, probably of humble stock, seems to have studied at Oxford, but not to have graduated. There is no indication that he received even minor orders, and he was certainly not ordained. While still a young man, he felt a vocation to the solitary, but not enclosed, life of a hermit.

Many of his early works are marred by a querulous, at times rancorous, resentment of his opponents, whom he is not slow to call persecutors. This appears clearly in the chief treatise of his youth, the De Incendio Amoris, which has little plan or nexus, but is a series of passionate rejoinders. The editor of De Incendio Amoris, Margaret Deanesly, has described it as "the vindication of the life of the hermit or solitary, not merely from the charge of laziness or vagabondage, but of inferiority to the busy and active prelate or the devout monk." Yet if we set aside all the scornful and bitter railings against empty and unspiritual academic learning, against the worldliness and frivolity of those who wear the garb of humility and mortification, we can discern other more attractive traits; and this book contains evidence of his claim to be treated seriously as a contemplative and ecstatic.

He describes in detail the circumstances under which, after years of perseverance in solitary prayer, he first experienced those consolations that constituted both his perceptions of the divine nature and his assurance that he was divinely inspired. He calls them canor, the heavenly melodies of praise he had heard around the throne of God; calor, the sensations of heat in which he felt his heart consumed in love; and dulcor, the overwhelming sweetness with which his whole being was suffused. To experience these consolations, his own preparations—a complete renunciation of the world, a perfect purgation, a total love of God for Himself alone—were prerequisite; and these joys would follow. We shall know perfectly in

Rycharde Rolle hermyte of Hampull in his contemplacyons of the drede and loue of god With other dyuerse tytles as it the Weth in his table.

Title page of "Rycharde Rolle hermyte of Hampull in his Contemplacyons of the drede and loue of God, with other dyuerse tytles," woodcut, ca. 1529, by W. de Wrode.

Heaven; on earth we can only love, and it is love that makes us perfect and brings us to the heights of contemplative life. "Whoever receives this joy, and glories so in this world, is inspired by the Holy Spirit. He cannot err; let him do what he will, he is safe, for no mortal can give him the salutary counsel which he receives from Immortal God." The seeming arrogance of this is tempered in other places: he concedes that the favors he has gained, especially the canor he heard on one occasion, came not through his merits but through grace.

De Incendio Amoris shows how Richard's thought was permeated by the Psalms and the Pauline Epistles, as one would expect of a beginner in theology. As his career progressed, he evidently learned from other late, affective, popular writers, but evidence of much quickening or deepening of his first perceptions was lacking.

The later English writings, it is true, showed less of the introspection and self-absorption that characterized his early productions. Toward the end of his life he seemed to have seriously applied himself to systematizing his teachings for the instruction of others; and, doubtless under the same necessity, he abandoned the insufferable preciousness that made the Melos unreadable to write a simpler prose interspersed with his own poems of divine love. But even when we admit his superficial use of the categories of growth in contemplation that he found in Richard of Saint-Victor, his ideas still remain rudimentary, and his whole system is marked by a lack of intellectual perception and curiosity. He is as indifferent to the classical authorities in his own subject as he is impatient with every other form of restraint; and it is this impatience that made later writers, such as Walter Hilton and the author of The Cloud of Unknowing, distrustful of him. They thought him a guide who would be likely to lead astray those beginning their search for immediate perception of the divine nature; and they observed in his unwary followers superstitious veneration of self-induced "consolations" and a dangerous contempt for the counsel of authority.

Rolle's popularity and the best of his work, Ego Dormio, The Commandment, The Form of Perfect Living, and such independent lyrics as A Song of the Love of Jesus, point to his true achievement. This was not at all in the field where he himself claimed pre-eminence, but in writing songs of the love of the crucified Savior with a depth of sincerity and an artless fervor unequalled even in the great medieval English tradition. He was at his best when writing as a simple man for an unsophisticated audience.

Bibliography: R. ROLLE, Incendium amoris, ed. M. DEANESLY (New York 1915); Melos amoris (Oxford 1957). The English Writings (Classics of Western Spirituality; New York 1988). H. E. ALLEN, Writings Ascribed to Richard Rolle (New York 1927).

[E. COLLEDGE]

ROMAGNÉ, JAMES RENÉ

Missionary; b. Mayenne, France, July 10, 1762; d. Sacé, France, Nov. 19, 1836. During the French Revolution, Romagné refused to take the oath required by the Civil Constitution of the Clergy, and in August 1792 he fled to England, where he spent six years, partly on the Isle of Wight. Summoned to Boston in 1799 by Rev. John Cheverus, he devoted 18 years to serving the Abenaki people and Catholics of Maine.

As an Indian agent, he secured land from the Massachusetts legislature in 1801 for the tribes on Passamaquoddy Bay, and later he was granted $300 for a permanent church at Point Pleasant. Hoping to stabilize the Native American population, he taught the women to spin and weave, and the men to enclose fields for agriculture. In 1804, he completed a prayer book in tribal language for the Penobscot and Passamaquoddy tribes (The Indian Prayer Book, 1834). He also introduced vaccination among the Native Americans. In 1811 he and William Jenks headed a Massachusetts government commission to encourage the Penobscots to settle on and cultivate their lands. During the War of 1812, he persuaded the tribes to remain neutral and was treated considerably by the invading British.

In addition to his Native American missions, Romagné served the Catholics of Newcastle, Whitefield, Hallowell, Gardner, Bath, Waldoboro, Portland, and Boston. On Aug. 13, 1818, he exercised his ministry for the last time in Boston and sailed for France. Appointed parish priest of Sacé, France, he died there in 1836, leaving the church of Boston 4,000 francs.

Bibliography: Archives, Archdiocese of Baltimore, Letters of James Romagné to Bishop John Carroll. R. H. LORD et al., History of the Archdiocese of Boston . . . 1604-1943, 3 v. (New York 1944) v. 1. E. DE L'EPINE, Bulletin de la Comm. Hist. . . . de la Mayenne, 2^e série, 10 (1895): 223.

[A. M. MELVILLE]

ROMAINMÔTIER, ABBEY OF

A former Benedictine monastery in the Diocese of Lausanne and the Canton of Vaud, Switzerland (Latin, Monasterium ss. Petri et Pauli Romanense). The monastery was founded by SS. ROMANUS (d. 463 or 464) and Lupicinus (d. 480) from the motherhouse of Condat c. 450. It was destroyed by the Alamanni in 610-611, but was restored by Duke Rammelenus (646), who put it under the rule of St. COLUMBAN with Siagrus as abbot. It was visited by St. WANDRILLE sometime before 650 and by Pope STEPHEN II, who in 753 consecrated the abbey church to SS. Peter and Paul and granted it autonomy, directly dependent on the Holy See. Temporarily deserted, it became a royal abbey of the Kingdom of Burgundy in 888 and passed under the rule of CLUNY in 929 as a donation of Adelaide of Burgundy to Abbot ODO OF CLUNY. Its prosperity, begun under Abbot ODILO, continued down through the 15th century. When it was suppressed in 1536, the church was taken over by a CALVINIST congregation and the cloister buildings were secularized. Some monks withdrew to the Franche-Comté, where the community continued until the Revolution under a "prior of Romainmôtier." The abbey church is from the 11th century with 13th-century additions and an ambo dates from the 7th century.

Romainmôtier Abbey. (©Josi F. Poblete/CORBIS)

Bibliography: P. LADNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 9:9. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:2497–98. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 5.2:2280 (fig. 4650), 2347 (fig. 4681); 6.2:2168–74. J. P. COTTIER, L'Abbaye royale de Romainmôtier et le droit de sa terre (Lausanne 1948).

[G. E. GINGRAS]

ROMAN CATHOLIC

This qualification of the name CATHOLIC seems to have been first introduced by those reformers who resented the Roman claim to any monopoly of CATHOLICITY. In England many of the reformers thought of themselves as catholic. So the term Roman Catholic became accepted as a useful designation of those who owed allegiance to the pope, and it passed into legal usage. English Catholics resented the appellation Roman insofar as it implied that they were but a part of the one true catholic church that also included the Anglo-Catholics and the Orthodox.

On the other hand, Roman is an apt designation of the true Church. Peter was given a PRIMACY in the Church by Christ; his successors continue this office; and as these successors are in fact the succeeding bishops of Rome, the Church of Christ is by this token Roman. Theologians discuss whether the connection with Rome is simply an accident of history or whether it was divinely intended from the beginning that Peter should set up his see in Rome, but all agree that there has been a special disposition of Providence that up to this moment has always connected the primacy with Rome, and so a condition of one's succeeding Peter is election to the See of Rome. This leaves open the question as to whether at some future date the pope himself could sever the connection with Rome. Up to now there has been an unbroken line since Peter. This connection with Rome does not necessarily involve actual residence in the city; it is sufficient that the pope should be bishop of Rome, but it is desirable that he should be in residence there.

There is a further aspect of the term Roman Catholic that needs consideration. The Roman Church can be used to refer, not to the Church universal insofar as it possesses a primate who is bishop of Rome, but to the local Church of Rome, which has the privilege of its bishop being also primate of the whole Church. This local Church has its own customs and rites; consequently one must not confuse these particularities with the practice of the universal Church. Historical circumstances have meant that the ROMAN RITE and law have won acceptance in many parts of the world, and this has been a potent factor in maintaining unity. Nevertheless one has to distinguish between the particular Roman elements that could be dispensed with, and the faith itself centered on the primacy, which is an essential element in the structure of the Church. There is always the danger that sufficient attention will not be paid to local cultures and the Church will become too closely bound up with western European thought. That is why Vatican Council II was anxious to decentralize on several matters and allow more scope to the local episcopate.

See Also: APOSTOLIC SEE; BRANCH THEORY OF THE CHURCH; CHURCH, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: C. JOURNET, The Church of the Word Incarnate, tr. A. A. C. DOWNES (New York 1955) 1:427–438. Sacrae theologiae summa, ed. Fathers of the Society of Jesus, Professors of the Theological Faculties in Spain (Madrid 1962), Biblioteca de autores cristianos 1.3:439–448. H. THURSTON, The Catholic Encyclopedia ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al. (New York 1907–14) 13:121–123.

[M. E. WILLIAMS]

ROMAN EMPIRE

The greatest and most influential multicultural empire in world history to date. It is of particular importance for Christianity, because Christ was born under the reign of Augustus, and the early Church developed in the milieu of Greco-Roman civilization within the Roman Empire and was subject to its government. Indeed, the New Testament is an important source for the life of the common people in the first century of the Empire. In Late Antiquity, the Roman Empire collapsed in Western Europe, and the year 476, when the last emperor of Rome was de-throned, has become a date of convenience for the fall of the Roman Empire. In the eastern Mediterranean, however, the Roman Empire continued, developing seamlessly into the Byzantine Empire which lasted until Constantinople fell to the Ottoman Turks in 1453. Up into the nineteenth century, Greeks still called themselves ‘Romaioi’ (Romans).

The Establishment of the Principate

Gaius Octavius, b. in Rome, Sept. 23, 63 B.C., was the son of Gaius Octavius, who was born into the equestrian order but who achieved senatorial rank, reaching the praetorship. His second wife, Atia, was the daughter of Julius Caesar’s sister. Julius Caesar, who had no son of his own (he never acknowledged his son by Cleopatra, Caesarion, who would in any case have been illegitimate under Roman law) showed a marked liking for the young Octavius. He enrolled him among the patricians, and at the time of his assassination he was about to add Octavius to his staff for a campaign aimed first against the Dacians and then the Parthians. Julius Caesar’s will left Octavius three-quarters of his estate and adopted him as his son, thereby giving him the name ‘Gaius Julius Caesar d(i)vi f(i)lius Octavianus.’

It was, however, nearly a decade and a half before Octavian became master of the Roman world. Mark Antony and Cleopatra were defeated at the naval battle of Actium (31 B.C.) and the following year Octavian annexed Egypt. The royal treasury of Egypt made him rich enough to discharge the claims of his soldiers and veterans; 120,000 veterans were settled in colonies, each with a donative of 1,000 sesterces. Some two years after the victory at Actium, he returned to Italy and celebrated his triumph (Aug. 13, 29 B.C.). It now remained for him to regularize his position.

It is hardly correct to say, as many historians do, that he set about fulfilling a promise to restore the pre-Civil War ‘Roman Republic.’ In the first place, the term res publica he claimed to restore, which is translated as ‘Republic,’ does not have quite the same connotations as the English word, ‘republic.’ It is a more equivocal word, meaning something like ‘state’ or ‘commonwealth.’ Second, the authority which Octavian possessed had two main bases. One was the charisma he enjoyed as the heir of Julius Caesar, reinforced by a personal oath of loyalty taken by the cities of Italy, Gaul, Spain, Africa, Sicily, and Sardinia to himself and his descendants (late 33 or early 32 B.C.). The other was the consulship; Octavian took up his third consulship (Jan. 1, 31 B.C.) in the year of Actium, and until his sixth consulship (28 B.C.) he had all 24 lictors attend himself, leaving none for his colleague. The symbolism was pointed. In Octavian’s sixth consulship with his colleague the able general and his friend from his schooldays, Marcus Vipsanius Agrippa, the former custom of having 12 lictors to attend each consul was restored, but Octavian got the powers of a censor for himself and Agrippa. The census they conducted registered 4,063,000 citizens. He also tried to reduce the numbers in the Senate which had ballooned to over a thousand, and expelled some 150, but he failed to bring the number down to the Sullan figure of 600.

The following year (27 B.C.) Octavian, who had just begun his seventh consulship, again with Agrippa as colleague, met the Senate on the Ides of January (January 13) and resigned his extraordinary powers, placing his provinces at the Senate’s disposal, though he remained consul with imperium: an office he continued to hold every year until 23 B.C. However the senate demurred; Octavian was promptly offered Spain (except Baetica), Syria, Cilicia, Cyprus and Gaul, and he accepted them with apparent reluctance. Egypt he also kept, and a prefect appointed by him administered it as a successor of the Ptolemaic kings. The Senate also voted him new honors, chief of them the appellation ‘Augustus’ (the revered one). Octavian took a new name: ‘Imperator Caesar Augustus.’

Halfway through his term as consul in 23 B.C., however, Augustus resigned the consulship and from this time on held the office only twice. He was granted, instead, tribunician power (tribunicia potestas), which henceforth became so important an element of imperial control that emperors dated their rule by the number of years they held it. The tribunician power gave him a tribune's right to convene the Senate and the popular assembly, submit proposals, as well as veto any item of public business or action of a magistrate, and the right to compel obedience to his demands. As well, he was granted proconsular imperium maius for life, valid even within the boundaries of the city of Rome, and superior to the imperium held by any other proconsul. This made up a bundle of powers which gave Augustus extraordinary authority, although at the same time the machinery of constitutional government did not cease to operate. Elections continued to be held; Rome continued to have consuls, praetors, tribunes, aediles, and quaestors. One could argue that the Augustan settlement was a façade: autocracy masked by precedents borrowed from the republican constitution as it had existed before the Civil Wars. Yet Augustus respected Roman traditions. He avoided any suggestion of monarchy where it might grate on Roman sensibilities, and preferred the informal title of princeps which had Roman precedents, whence the term "principlate" which we apply to his constitutional settlement. In the East, however, which was accustomed to Hellenistic monarchy, he was called autokrator (autocrat).

Column of Trajan, marble sculpture, attributed to Apollodorus of Damascus, A.D. 113. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY.)

In 12 B.C. Augustus was elected to another honor. After the assassination of Julius Caesar, who was pontifex maximus, the triumvir Marcus Aemilius Lepidus had acquired the office and held it until his death in 13 B.C. Augustus had made no move to shove Lepidus aside. Yet no doubt he wanted the office and now he acquired it. Emperors continued to hold the office of pontifex maximus until the emperor Gratian (375–383 A.D.), who declined it as unbecoming a Christian ruler.

There was an aura of ambiguity about the principate. Augustus was both princeps (first citizen) and imperator (generalissimo); the first title denoted prestige and influence within the customary constitution of Rome, and the second denoted military power. He enjoyed the confidence of the masses; when there were floods, a food shortage, and an epidemic in 22 B.C., they rioted to make him accept a dictatorship. The army was loyal. The commanders Augustus appointed were men whom he could trust; when he could, he chose members of the imperial family. The provinces were better governed, and had no reason to regret the passing of the old republic. The people accepted peace after a generation of civil war with relief and gratitude.

Military Reorganization

One of Augustus' most striking achievements was the organization of a professional military force which was efficient and economical. It was to last with little change for two centuries. The great army which had defeated Mark Antony was demobilized, and what Augustus kept was a force of 28 legions of 6,000 men each, if at full strength, made up of Roman citizens, supplemented by auxilia of about the same number, and recruited from non-citizen provincials. In 9 A.D., three legions were destroyed in a disaster in Germany when Arminius, chief of a German tribe known as the Cherusci, ambushed the Roman commander Publius Quinctilius Varus in the Teutoburg Forest, and the legions remained at 25 until the end of the emperor Tiberius' reign (37 A.D.). Under the emperor Vespasian (69–79 A.D.) there were still only 29.

It was the 60 centurions in every legion who maintained discipline. The centurions were professional officers who rose through the ranks, and they might rise as high as centurion of the first rank (primipilus), but no higher. The higher officers belonged to the senatorial order. Legionary soldiers served for 20 years and received 225 denarii a year, from which rations and equipment were deducted. Until Septimius Severus (193–211), legal marriage was disallowed until discharge, when they received land grants in colonies in Italy or in the provinces. This was the general practice until 6 A.D., when Augustus established a bonus fund for the soldiers (aerarium militare) financed by an initial grant of 170 million from his personal fortune, and the revenue from a one percent sales tax (centesima venalium) and a five percent inheritance tax (vicesima hereditarium). Thereafter a veteran generally received a cash gratuity on discharge, set at 3,000 denarii, though veterans' colonies were still occasionally founded. Auxiliary troops were commanded by Roman citizens of the equestrian order; they served 25 years and were given Roman citizenship when they were discharged. A diploma (a certificate inscribed on bronze, of which a number have been found) was given to an auxiliary on discharge. It conferred citizenship on him, his children and descendants, and the wife he had at the time of discharge, or whom he might marry later, if he were single. Presumably auxiliaries also received a bonus but at a much more modest level than the legionaries received. The Romans relied on the auxiliaries for their cavalry and light infantry, and they provided specialties that the Roman arsenal lacked, such as archers, especially mounted archers.

In Italy, the only regular army corps was the Praetorian Guard of nine cohorts, each of 1,000 troops. It was an elite force commanded by two praetorian prefects and received special treatment: guardsmen served for only 16 years, their pay scale was triple that of the legionaries, and when they retired they received more generous gratuities. Augustus never allowed more than three praetorian cohorts to remain in Rome at one time, and even they lacked a permanent camp; the remainder he quartered in neighboring towns. It was Tiberius who established the Praetorian Camp (Castra Praetoria) on the Via Tiburtina, within a built-up part of the city, though outside the pomerium, and thereafter the praetorian prefects came to exercise ominous authority in the imperial government.

The Administrative Corps of the Empire

The Senate. Augustus' accomplishment displays a nice balance between respect for senatorial traditions and eagerness to harness the abilities and loyalty of new blood. He chose his highest civil and military officers from among the senators, and three times (29/8, 18, 13 B.C.) he purged the rolls of the senate to rid it of undesirable members. For the first time he set a property qualification: either 800 thousand sesterces, according to Suetonius or 400 thousand (Cassius Dio) but he raised it periodically and at the start of Tiberius' reign it stood at one million. The republican magistrates continued to be elected. The consuls had little to do except preside over the Senate, but the consulship was still prestigious, and it opened the door for military commands and the governorship of senatorial provinces. Competition for the consulship was keen, and c. 5 B.C. the number chosen each year was doubled by introducing suffect consuls: the two consuls would resign office after six months and their places would be taken by two suffects. The praetors, eight until 23 B.C. then ten, and in Augustus' last years, 12, still had judicial duties; two of them became treasury officials after 23, managing the aerarium, and the next year they took over from the aediles the attractive duty of giving public games. The tribunes had nothing left to do, and the office became so unattractive to senators that in A.D. 12, Augustus opened it to the equites. Aediles had little to do except to repair streets and act as a small claims court in commercial cases, so there was, understandably, a dearth of candidates. The quaestorship gave admission to the Senate. Twenty quaestors were elected each year and about half served in the provinces. Elections in the Centuriate Assembly for the praetors and consuls were lively, and Augustus had to take steps to control corruption. He had another control as well: by virtue of his proconsular imperium he could reject nominees, and present his own preferred list of candidates for the consulship and the praetorship. Other consuls could also commend nominees, and Roman politicians regularly canvassed for their candidates, but when Augustus canvassed, his commendation carried particular weight. It would be too much to say that the elections in the Centuriate Assembly were entirely free. The emperor Tiberius abolished them, and henceforth magistrates were elected in the Senate.

The Equestrians

The term "equestrian order" (ordo equestris) is used in two senses. Strictly speaking, it was the 18 centuries of equites equo publico which once made up the cavalry of the Roman army, but their military function had been lost long ago and now they were only voting units in the Centuriate Assembly. Augustus tried to revitalize the equites equo publico, enlarging its number from 1,800 to 5,000 and reviving the annual march past, where the consuls inspected them. But in popular parlance and, in due time, officially as well, all freeborn citizens assessed at a minimum of 400,000 sesterces were equites, enjoying equestrian privileges such as the equestrian gold ring and the first 14 rows of seats in the theater. Augustus drew a number of his officials from their ranks. Augustus recruited his prefects from the equites with the exception of the urban prefect, the chief constable of Rome and commander of the three urban cohorts of security police, who was a senator and ex-consul. There were the two prefects of the Praetorian Guard, the prefect of Egypt, which Augustus ruled directly, the prefects of the Roman fleets, one based at Misenum on the Gulf of Naples and the other at Ravenna, the prefect of the night patrol (vigiles), and the prefect of the grain supply (praefectus annonae). Also recruited from the equites were Augustus' deputies, the procuratores, who might act as his private financial agents or govern small provinces. Small provinces in Alpine districts or Judaea were governed initially first by prefects but later by procurators. Pontius Pilate is designated a procurator in the Gospels, but in fact his title is proved to have been "prefect" by an inscription found in Jerusalem. It can hardly be true, however, that Augustus established a cursus honorum for the equites which paralleled that of the senators, for we can discern no regular path of promotion.

Beneath the equestrians in the Roman social hierarchy was the plebs urbanus, "the common people of city of Rome" who were entitled to a free distribution of grain every month until 2 B.C., when this privilege was restricted to a fixed group, the plebs frumentaria numbering eventually about 150,000. But beyond the city, the population of the empire was made up of freeborn citizens, freedmen, and provincials. All Italians were now citizens and increasing numbers of provincials were beginning to acquire it as well. Freedmen, that is, manumitted slaves who bore the family names of their former masters, were citizens with qualifications: they were, for instance, excluded from public office and military service. Augustus retained the disabilities for freedmen; yet the corps of 7,000 night watchmen (vigiles) which he instituted in A.D. 6 were all freedmen, and in the crises of Pannonian revolt of A.D. 6 and the disaster in the Teutoberg forest in A.D. 9, he recruited them into special cohorts in the army. But they did not become legionary soldiers. However, he allowed many Italian towns to institute the seviri Augustales, an annual board of six freedmen who looked after the cult of the Lares Augusti; contributions from them for public works and spectacles were expected in return. Later, under the emperor Claudius (81–54) freedmen were to capture positions of great power in the imperial bureaucracy, but under Claudius' successors, a shift in favor of equestrians began again, culminating with the emperor Hadrian.

Government in Italy and the Empire

1. Rome and Italy. In Rome, the three urban cohorts of 1,000 men each under the urban prefect's command kept law and order. The city was divided into 14 regions (regiones) which were subdivided into precincts (vici). There were 265 vici. Seven cohorts of vigiles, established in A.D. 6, combined the duties of a night watch and a fire brigade. Augustus also found that the people expected him to ensure adequate supplies of water and food and eventually he appointed a prefect of the grain supply.

Italy, which now included Cisalpine Gaul, was divided into 11 administrative regions, but these remained more important geographically than politically. Begun by Julius Caesar, the reform of the municipal constitutions—there were 474 municipalities in the peninsula—was completed by Augustus, and it set the model for new foundations and for incorporated towns in the provinces. The municipal governments were modeled roughly on Rome's; there were chief magistrates (duoviri or quattuorviri) and a senate (curia). A large number of young men of the leading families in the Italian municipalities were incorporated into the senatorial and equestrian orders at Rome and furnished a supply of new recruits for administrative careers. Augustus wanted Rome and Italy to enjoy a favored position in the empire, and unlike Caesar, he granted the franchise citizenship to provincials.

2. The Provinces. The agreement between Augustus and the Senate in 27 B.C. instituted a sort of dual governance for the provinces: some, generally those not threatened by enemies or internal disturbance, would be ruled by the senate, and Augustus governed the remainder, appointing legates to administer them. Governors of senatorial provinces would be chosen from the ranks of ex-consuls or ex-praetors; their term was one year, and they were accompanied by quaestors as financial officials. For the imperial provinces, Augustus chose his legates from senators who were ex-consuls or ex-praetors, and they held office at his pleasure. They could be moved from one province to another without any interruption in their career. Therefore, senatorial provinces were theoretically governed in the same way as they were in the Roman republic before the Civil Wars, and Augustus had republican precedent for this procedure as well. Although Pompey had become governor in Spain in 53 B.C., he remained in Rome and ruled through legates in his provinces. However, Augustus could use his maius imperium to lay down rules in senatorial provinces if he wished. This is made dramatically clear by the Cyrene Edicts (SEG ix, 8). An inscription found in Cyrene in 1927 gives us four edicts of Augustus, (7/6 B.C.), which set forth regulations relating to friction between Greeks and Romans: the first specifically gives instructions to the provincial governor in the senatorial province of Crete and Cyrene and his successors.

The borders of the Augustan empire were not clearly marked, and beyond the provinces were the client states. In Germany beyond the Rhine, the Roman government manipulated the German tribes by tying friendly chiefs to them, rewarding them with Roman citizenship and subsidies, and fostering divisions where it was to Rome's advantage. Until the disaster of the Teutoberg Forest in A.D. 9, Rome intended to subdue the territory between the Rhine and the Elbe rivers, and after that objective had to be abandoned, Rome still sought to establish a control mechanism over the German chiefs. In the east, client kings were manipulated ruthlessly. Unsatisfactory kings were removed. Even generally satisfactory ones could fall at the whim of an emperor. Gaius Caligula (37–41) who was free-handed at bestowing kingdoms on his friends, deposed and executed Ptolemy of Mauretania, a descendant of Antony and Cleopatra, and annexed his kingdom. It is hard to discover a rational reason for his action. Client kingdoms had advantages: they masked the reality of the Roman yoke, and they conserved the army's manpower by relieving it of police duties in border areas. But the client-state system was in full decline by the end of the first century.

The Succession

Succession was to present the gravest problem for the well-being of the empire. How could one emperor succeed another peacefully? Augustus was in theory a magistrate and hence could not have a successor in a formal, dynastic sense. Nonetheless, it is clear that he wanted to transfer his charisma to a successor chosen by himself, and it was equally clear that he wanted an heir who would carry the genes of the Julian family. Though the principate was not a hereditary monarchy, still there was a certain ambivalence about it from the beginning. Augustus, like any Roman noble, took pride in his family and wanted to secure the position he had won for his descendants.

1. The Julio-Claudians. Augustus sired only one child, Julia, a daughter by his third wife, Scribonia, whom he had married for political advantage and divorced quickly. His last marriage was for love. Livia was a scion of one of the great Roman families, the Livii, and she had already been married once, to Tiberius Claudius Nero by whom she already had a son, and she was pregnant with another, Drusus, when she married Octavian in 38 B.C. They were to introduce the blood line of the Claudian gens, and hence the ruling family is labeled the Julio-Claudians in history books. But Livia had no more children. Augustus was left with Julia.

He married her to his nephew Marcellus, and, after Marcellus' death, to his right-hand man, Marcus Agrippa, whose military talent had served Augustus well in the Civil Wars. Agrippa sired five children in less than ten years, three of them sons, Gaius, Lucius, and finally Agrippa Postumus, born after his father's death and mentally unsound. But Gaius and Lucius died young, and Augustus was left with his stepson, Tiberius. In A.D. 4, Augustus adopted him and gave him tribunician power for a ten-year term, which was renewed when the term was up and the imperium proconsulare was added to it. But at the same time as Augustus adopted him, he made him adopt Germanicus, the grandson of Augustus' sister who was married to Julia's daughter, Agrippina. When Augustus died, it was clear that if Augustus was to have a successor, it would have to be Tiberius, a Claudian, but on his death the succession would revert to Augustus' own descendants.

In fact, it did, but not as Augustus intended. Germanicus died young, leaving three sons, and Tiberius' own son, Drusus, died not long afterwards. When Tiberius died in A.D. 37, it was Germanicus' youngest son, Gaius Caligula, who succeeded, and he was the great-grandson of Augustus. When Caligula was killed Jan. 24, 41, after four years of misrule, his uncle Claudius was found hiding behind an arras. Claudius had been considered feeble-minded and harmless, and his reputation had saved his life under Caligula. He was rushed off to the praetorian camp and proclaimed emperor, while the Senate was still deliberating the succession, and some spoke for "liberty," that is, government by the Senate without an emperor. But they reached no decision. The people demonstrated for Claudius, and the Senate had little choice but to accept him. He owed the imperial office to the praetorian guard, and acknowledged his debt by giving the guardsmen handsome gratuities: a prudent move under the circumstances, but it set a hurtful example that later emperors had to follow. It made brief reigns profitable. On Claudius' death, his successor was Nero (54–68). Whatever his failings, and they were many, he was a descendant of Julia though his mother, Agrippina the Younger, and the rank-and-file of the army was loyal. When Nero died, the Julio-Claudian family became extinct.

2. The Flavian. Who should succeed? The army decided. The year 68 was the year of the four emperors. The emperor who emerged victorious was Titus Flavius Vespasianus (69–79), the commander of the legions who were suppressing a Jewish revolt in Judea that had broken out in 66. With Vespasian, the family name of the Julio-Claudians, "Caesar," became an official title and was used as such by the emperors who followed him. Vespasian's ambitions were dynastic. He determined to found an imperial family, and the succession did pass smoothly to his two sons, first the elder, the much-liked Titus (79–81), and then Domitian (81–96), a truculent despot to the Senate, but admired by the soldiers, whose pay he raised by one-third, and whom he led personally on five campaigns on the Rhine and Danube. Domitian lost his life to a plot (Sept. 18, 96) by members of his household, including his wife, Domitia and one of the praetorian prefects. Having no candidate of their own, the assassins left the selection of a successor to the Senate. The Senate made a cautious choice: an elderly senator named Marcus Cocceius Nerva (96–98).

3. The Five Good Emperors (96–180) and Commodus (180–192). Within a year, Nerva found himself facing an insubordinate Praetorian Guard and swiftly adopted as his son and successor Marcus Ulpius Traianus (Trajan), an experienced soldier who was governor of Upper Germany. He became co-emperor immediately (October of 97), and on Nerva's death three months later he peacefully became emperor.

Nerva had found a method of peaceful succession. Trajan (98–117), who was adopted by Nerva, in turn adopted Hadrian (117–138) on his deathbed, and Hadrian adopted Antoninus Pius (138–161) and insisted at the same time that Antoninus adopt Marcus Aurelius (161–180) and Lucius Verus (161–169) as co-emperors. Marcus Aurelius, however, had a son, Commodus, and thus faced a dilemma. If he were to pass him over and adopt someone better qualified as his heir, the new emperor would regard Commodus as a threat and almost certainly put him to death. Thus he made Commodus co-emperor in 178, and in 180, when he died, Commodus (180–192) became sole emperor at the age of 18. His reign was disastrous.

The successful conspirators who murdered Commodus nominated Publius Helvius Pertinax, the urban prefect, as emperor, and he was taken to the Praetorian Camp where he received a half-hearted endorsement. But in less than three months, the praetorians killed him and auctioned the office to the man who gave the guardsmen the largest donative. The winner was a senator, Didius Julianus (March–June of 193). Rival candidates rapidly emerged: Decimus Clodius Albinus, put forward by the army in Britain, Gaius Pescennius Niger, backed by the Syrian legions, and Lucius Septimius Severus, supported by the legions on the Rhine and the Danube. Severus (193–211) reached Rome in early June of 193 and was confirmed as princeps by the Senate. In 193 and 194 he campaigned against Niger, who was defeated and killed. Albinus and Severus at first made a pact to cooperate, but after Severus disposed of Niger, he designated his own son to succeed him, thus making it clear that there would be no place for Albinus in his future plans. Albinus put up a fight, but Severus moved quickly against Albinus' forces, which were based in Lugdunum (Lyon) and defeated them in two battles. Albinus killed himself and Severus had his body thrown into the Rhine, his wife and children killed, and his supporters hunted down. With Severus the emperor emerges as autocrat. His power was rooted in the army's loyalty and he knew it: he increased the pay of the soldiers by half. When he died in 211, his last words to his sons Caracalla and Geta were "Do not quarrel with each other, enrich the soldiers and scorn everyone else."

Life under the Pax Romana

The expansion of the empire continued under Augustus though at a more measured pace than hitherto. The conquest of Spain, which had taken 200 years, was finally completed, the Balkan peninsula right up to the Danube was brought under Roman control, and by 9 B.C. Roman troops had reached as far as the Elbe River. Except for the unforeseen debacle of Varus in the Teutoberg Forest in A.D. 9, Augustus would have brought the region between the Rhine and the Elbe into the Empire. The accepted view is that he intended to make the Elbe and the Danube the imperial frontier, but an alternative view has been suggested recently that he was not thinking in terms of delimited frontiers, which, given the maps available, was not a concept that a contemporary Roman could easily grasp, but rather was pursuing the dream of world conquest. The idea of the "frontier" as a line to be defended arrived with Domitian. However, Tiberius abandoned the conquest of Germany, and except for the addition of Britain under the emperor Claudius and Dacia by Trajan, the great period of expansion was over.

The empire covered a vast area, and in the first two centuries, it was a generally peaceful and prosperous area. Pliny the Elder, who died in the eruption of Mt. Vesuvius in 79, coined the phrase: "the immeasurable majesty of the Roman peace," and the "Roman peace" (pax Romana) became almost a cliché, but not an inaccurate one. There were military operations and rebellions, but the Roman army dealt with them efficiently and the even tenor of life was undisturbed. The pay scale of the legionary soldiers remained unchanged until the emperor Domitian raised it by one-third, but even so the treasury found it a burden, and Nero started an evil practice of adulterating the silver denarius with ten percent base metal, thereby stretching the available silver bullion to cover the payroll. Yet emperors felt it necessary to spend lavishly on public buildings that affirmed the power and majesty of Rome and advertised their own magnanimity.

Various calculations have been made of the number of people living in Rome, Italy, or the empire in general, but most scholars still generally accept the estimates made by K. J. Beloch in 1886: between 750,000 and 1 million for the city of Rome in the early empire, between five and eight million for Italy, and between 50 and 60 million for the empire as a whole.

The Cities. The empire was made up of civitates (or, in the Greek-speaking east, poleis), that is, territories with their political and administrative centers in their chief town. In the east, Rome found poleis or "city-states" already well established with their own laws and customs, and Rome allowed these to continue. Life in the Hellenistic cities in the east continued with little change. Rome continued to foster cities as the Hellenistic kings had done before they were overtaken by Roman imperialism. In the west, cities and Romanization went hand in hand, and the Italian municipality provided the model for new city foundations. The city was responsible for administering its own territory. Egypt was the exception: except for Alexandria, the old capital of the Ptolemaic kingdom, cities were foreign to Egypt. The prefect ruled as the Ptolemaic kings had done before him until the Severan period, when municipalities were established there, too.

The members of the city councils (curiae) were chosen from the wealthy notables of the city, and during the great period of the pax Romana they considered it an honor to serve. The curiae were responsible for collecting the taxes, the tributum soli, a tax on land, and the tributum capitis, a poll tax. These were the empire's chief source of revenue, though in addition there were customs dues at the frontiers and at provincial boundaries as well as the aurum coronarium, which began as a voluntary offering of a gold crown by a city to an emperor on his accession and evolved into a supplementary tax that was demanded with increased frequency. Wealthy notables were also generous donors and paid for many of the public amenities out of their own pockets. The ruined cities of Roman Africa in particular bear mute witness to the euergetism of their citizens, who grew rich from the production of wheat and olive oil for export. However, most of the population lived in the countryside, in the territories belonging to the cities, and earned their livelihood from agriculture. The cities lived off the profits of the countryside. The great aqueducts that supplied the cities are indicative of the situation: they carried in water for baths and fountains from the countryside, where in many cases it might better have been used for farming.

It is convenient to classify farms as smallholdings, consisting of 10-80 iugera (a iugerum is a parcel 240' x 120'), medium-sized estates (80-500 iugera) and latifundia (over 500 iugera). Smallholdings were particularly common in central and south Italy in the fourth and third centuries B.C., and these small landholders had been the backbone of the Roman republican army. From the late Republican period on, latifundia grew in importance. They varied from ranches to large mixed farms. The small freeholder would probably work his own land with his family's help, but land was considered the best of all investments: hence the rise of large estates which might be worked by slaves with a slave overseer (vilicus), or by sharecropping, or by leasing to tenants (coloni) for a rent in cash. Sharecroppers on the large imperial estates in Africa in the second century A.D. normally paid one-third of their produce, but elsewhere the proportion might vary. Leasing to coloni for cash rent was the simplest method, and it lingered on in Italy until the sixth century A.D. But it involved problems, for in bad years a colonus might be unable to pay his rent, and if a landlord seized his goods in lieu of rent, the colonus would become even less able to pay in the future.

Commerce. Cities had markets on regular market days, and a farm close to a city (fundus suburbanus) would gear its production to the market. Timber, firewood, orchard fruit, dessert grapes, flowers, poultry and eggs were all in demand. Vineyards and olive orchards were profitable, and so was sheep ranching, which produced wool, hides, meat, and cheese. Cities were centers of small-scale manufacturing and service industries, and commerce was lively: we find shoemakers, weavers, fullers, silver workers who might combine their trade with some money-lending, millers, and bakers, and a whole host of other tradesmen, who generally passed on their trades from father to son. In the imperial period, however, we find that large estates would often set up their own workshops and produce their own jars, iron implements, cordage, tiles, and pots. This must have had an inhibiting effect on commerce in the cities.

Transport overland was slow and expensive. On sea it was cheap, but slow and risky in the winter. Yet bulky goods had to be carried by ship or riverboat, owned generally by a shipowner (navicularius) who sailed his own vessel, carrying cargoes of such goods as marble, timber, produce, firewood, or jars (amphorae) of wine or olive oil either on his own account or on consignment for others. Because the imperial government needed private shippers to carry supplies to Rome and to the army, the collegia of navicularii (leagues of shipowners) were the first trade alliances to be granted official recognition and privileges, for it was more efficient for the government to contract with them than with individual ship owners. Collegia of navicularii are first known in great numbers in the time of Hadrian, and they remained free agents until the third century, when they were brought under the aegis of the imperial service. The largest vessels belonged to the Alexandrian grain fleet, which brought wheat from Egypt to Rome. Lucian of Samosata (The Ship i-ix) describes one ship of between 1,200 and 1,300 tons that was blown off course and reached the harbor of Piraeus after 70 days at sea. Grain shipments had to be suspended in winter. St. Paul's voyage to Italy on a grain transport (Acts 27.1-28) illustrates vividly the danger of trying to sail too late in the sailing season on the Mediterranean.

Foreign trade was extensive. The Romans imported amber from the Baltic Sea, slaves, hides, timber for shipbuilding, hemp, wax and pitch from northern and eastern Black Sea ports, frankincense from Yemen, spices from India, and silk from China. Much of the silk was imported via India and followed a route from Indian ports up the Persian Gulf and from there by caravan to Mediterranean ports, but there was an alternative silk route from China to Black Sea ports in the Crimea. Roman mariners discovered the monsoons towards the end of the first century, and convoys of merchantmen began to sail directly from Red Sea ports to Sri Lanka and India. Fairs, both regional and local, assumed great importance in foreign trade, particularly in Late Antiquity, for merchants would come to these fairs, which were held periodically, to buy and sell their goods there. It has been argued that an unfavorable trade balance with the east drained the empire's gold supply, but the evidence is slight. Many Roman gold coins have been found in India; silver denarii up to the time of Nero have also been found, but after Nero debased the denarius it was no longer accepted in India.

The Importance of Slavery. Slaves were also an important item of trade. When the Romans captured a town, its inhabitants were considered part of the booty, and those unable to pay ransom would be sold to a slave dealer who would take them to market. A successful campaign could bring in a flood of slaves. After Vespasian's son, Titus, suppressed the revolt in Judea in A.D. 70, large numbers of Jewish slaves were brought to Rome, where they helped build the Flavian amphitheater (Colosseum). But as Rome's expansion ceased and the wars she fought became defensive, warfare provided the markets with fewer slaves. Piracy was another source of slavery, though the imperial fleet tried to keep it under control. Another source was unwanted children exposed by their parents. Slavers would pick them up, raise them, and then sell them as slaves. Slaves might also be bred: fertile slave women could be rewarded for bearing three or four children with exemption from work or freedom.

Slaves were an important item of foreign trade. The less civilized fringe regions of the empire sold surplus population to pay for merchandise from the empire. In particular, when Hadrian banned male castration within the empire, he created an import market for eunuchs, who were in demand particularly in the later period. Abasgia on the Black Sea became an important source of eunuchs until the emperor Justinian (527–56) put a stop to it; the king of Abasgia would seize handsome boys, castrate them and sell them to dealers.

Slaves were found in all areas of the Roman economy. They were used on farms, ranches, mines, and factories. Both the state and the imperial household owned slave crews to maintain the aqueducts. Slaves used in mining, which was an imperial monopoly, suffered terribly. Slaves had no rights; they could be flogged and subjected to physical or sexual abuse with impunity. If they ran away, they might be crucified if caught or sold to a producer of spectacles in the amphitheater where they would have to fight wild beasts. Household slaves generally got the best treatment, but even they were subject to harsh laws: if a slave killed his master, all the slaves in the house might be killed as punishment on the theory that protecting their master was their joint obligation and they had failed. The fear of slave revolt was always present, and harsh penalties were intended to enforce obedience.

One of the remarkable features of the Roman system of slavery was the frequency with which slaves were freed. It was not motivated simply by generosity. The prospect of freedom kept a slave docile and motivated him to serve his master faithfully. Manumission could also be profitable, for some owners would free their slaves only if they bought their freedom with their savings, thus allowing their owners to recoup the purchase price. A manumitted slave (libertus) was given a freedman's cap, a felt cap shaped like half an egg that fit close to the head, as a sign of freedom; the slave took the family name of his former master, who was now his patron, and became a Roman citizen. But a freed person was not free of obligations to his or her former master. The system was not without advantages for the libertus, who became a member of his former owner's familia and could be buried in the family plot. Moreover, he might go into business with his patron's backing and become wealthy. The Satyricon of Petronius describes a banquet offered by a freedman, Trimalchio, which is a vulgar display of new wealth, and freedmen like him cannot have been too uncommon.

Slavery thus fed the citizen body with new blood; it brought in new immigrants and assimilated them. They made a significant contribution to Roman culture: the poet Horace was the son of a freedman, and Phaedrus was a Thracian slave who lived in Rome as a freedman in the house of Augustus, where he wrote his collection of fables. By the end of the second century, the great majority of Roman citizens must have had at least one slave in their family tree.

Literature and Art. The reign of Augustus was the Golden Age of Latin literature. Gaius Maecenas, Augustus' chief diplomatic agent during the Civil War with Mark Antony and his confidante until his wife's brother was involved in a conspiracy (c. 22 B.C.), gathered about him a circle of poets, chief of them VERGIL (Publius Vergilius Maro, 70–17 B.C.). Vergil first published the Eclogues, a collection of pastoral poetry, and then the Georgics, four well-crafted books on farming, and finally his great epic, the Aeneid, which became the national epic of the empire. The chief archetypes of the Aeneid were the Iliad and the Odyssey attributed to Homer. The Aeneid told how Aeneas escaped the fall of Troy and wandered over the Mediterranean, visiting Carthage, where he had an ill-starred affair with the queen, Dido, and finally reaching Italy, where he had to fight to establish a settlement. It is a poem that celebrates Roman imperialism, but it is not without compassion for Rome's victims. HORACE was five years Vergil's junior and the son of a freedman. Vergil introduced him to Maecenas, who gave him his Sabine farm, which Horace made famous in his poetry. He wrote odes, epistles, satires and a didactic poem on the art of poetry, but he declined to try an epic. Tibullus (c. 54–19 B.C.) wrote graceful elegies on his love for Delia, as well as for peace and for country life. Propertius (c. 50–c. 16 B.C.) was a member of Maecenas' circle like Vergil, whom he admired, and Horace, whom he disliked. He left four books of elegies, whose chief theme is his love for Cynthia. Ovid (43 B.C. to c. A.D. 17) was an immensely talented and facile poet who wrote with wit and narrative skill and loved the fashionable society of Rome. His medley of myths of transformation called the Metamorphoses is his greatest work, but his Art of Love was his most notorious. For reasons that are unclear, in A.D. 8, Augustus banished him to Tomi on the Black Sea, where he spent the rest of his life. Livy (59 B.C.–A.D. 17) wrote an immense history of Rome which has partially survived. His style is mellifluous, but his accuracy is sometimes questionable.

The next generation produced authors such as Phaedrus (c. 15 B.C.–A.D. 50), who wrote a collection of fables in verse drawn from the Greek. Seneca the Younger (c. 4 B.C.–A.D. 65) was known chiefly as an essayist and playwright, Petronius (c. A.D. 20–66), the "Arbiter", so-called for having been the arbiter of taste for the emperor Nero, is the presumed author of a long picaresque novel, the Satyricon, which survives in fragments, the longest of which describes a banquet given by a rich freedman Trimalchio. Silius Italicus (A.D. 26–101) wrote an epic in the Vergilian style, the Punica, which is about the Second Punic War, the war with Hannibal. Lucan (39–65), was the nephew of Seneca the Younger, and his Pharsalia on the civil war between Julius Caesar and Pompey is the greatest Latin epic after the Aeneid. Persius (34–62) is the author of a slim volume of six satires that strike a high moral tone, but his Latin is the language of the streets. Statius (c. 45–c. 96) is the author of the Thebaid, an epic on the myths of Thebes, and the Silvae, occasional poems, which were much admired in the Middle Ages but are little read now. Martial (c. 40–c. 104) is the most famous of all writers of epigrams, and his friend Juvenal (c. 60–c. 140) is the author of satires that comment bitterly on Roman life, though it is noticeable that his attacks are on people who were dead by the time he wrote. A writer's life was not without perils; both Seneca and Lucan killed themselves at Nero's command, and Petronius did likewise in anticipation of Nero's order.

The same period produced a clutch of notable writers in Latin prose. Little is known about Vitruvius, but his Ten Books on Architecture, which were written about 27 B.C., served the Renaissance as an invaluable textbook. Pliny the Elder (24–79) was the prefect of the Roman fleet at Misenum when Mt. Vesuvius erupted, and he died investigating it. He was a prolific author but only one work survives: his Natural History, a great treasury of interesting information in thirty-seven books. His nephew Pliny the Younger (61–114) left a panegyric on the emperor Trajan and ten books of carefully crafted letters. Two from his tenth book are of great interest, for Pliny writes to Trajan from Bithynia, where Trajan sent him as curator, to ask for the correct legal procedures for the prosecution of a cell of Christians. Trajan assures him that Christianity is a capital crime, but he cautions against any witch-hunt. Tacitus (55–120) is the greatest of the Latin historians; he wrote Annales, covering the Julian-Claudian period, and History, covering the period to the death of Domitian in 96. He also wrote the Agricola, a laudatory biography of Julius Agricola, Tacitus' father-in-law, who had a successful career as governor of Roman Britain until he fell under Domitian's displeasure. Tacitus's Germania concerns the geography and ethnology of the Germans and was written, like the Agricola, in 98. His Dialogue on Orators was at one time considered Tacitus's earliest work, but now it is generally dated after the Germania and the Agricola. Of the Annales, the books dealing with Caligula's reign and the first six years of Claudius are lost, as well as the material dealing with the last two years of Nero's reign. The History breaks off in A.D. 70, and the remainder is lost. Tacitus claims in the proem of his Annales to be writing with neither bitterness nor partiality, but in fact he displays both. However, he consulted good sources and if his bias is separated from his evidence, he is a reliable historian. The rhetorician Quintilian (35–96), teacher of Pliny the Younger, Suetonius (75–150), and Apuleius (fl. 160) also deserve mention. The last wrote a novel, the Metamorphoses, popularly known as the Golden Ass, a ribald tale that turns out to have a pious intention: Lucius, who is turned by witchcraft into a donkey, is saved by the intervention of the goddess Isis and becomes a devotee. Suetonius' Lives of the Twelve Caesars is a gossipy source for the emperors of the first century.

During these first two centuries, Greek literature produced after the death of Augustus was more extensive than the Latin and included works on history, biography, geography, medicine, grammar, rhetoric, and philosophy. This was the period of the Second Sophistic when writers favored the Attic style, consciously taking as models the great authors of the classical period. Dionysius of Halicarnassus (fl. 30–8 B.C.) came to Rome in 30 B.C. and worked there for 22 years. He produced works on literary criticism and an Ancient Roman History (Romaike archaiologia), published in 7 B.C., in twenty books, of which the first ten are completely preserved and there are fragments of the eleventh. He was an uncritical admirer of Roman virtus, a word which encompasses not only "virtue" but also hardihood. Flavius JOSEPHUS (37–c. 95) wrote a History of the Jewish War against the Romans, describing the revolt of Judea (66–70). He wrote it first in Aramaic and then translated it into Greek. His next work was the Antiquities of the Jews, a history from Adam down to the eve of the revolt of Judea. The first half, which reaches the Babylonian Captivity of 587 B.C., merely summarizes the Biblical account. His last work, known popularly as the Contra Apionem, is an impassioned defense of the Jews against anti-Semitic detractors. The "Apion" of the title was an anti-Semitic scholar in Alexandria a generation earlier whose calumnies Josephus refutes in the first half of Book Two of his work. Plutarch of Charonea (c. 46–c. 120), who wrote the Parallel Lives, biographies of famous Greeks each coupled with a life of a famous Roman, was immensely admired in the eighteenth century; his other writings, collected under the unfortunate title Moralia, represent a wide range of interests. About one-third of his writings have survived. Aelius Aristides (129–189) was the star orator of the second century, a period when public orators received the homage that great opera singers do nowadays. His Roman Oration, a panegyric on Rome, is the best witness to how an educated provincial viewed the Empire in the second century. Appian of Alexandria, who was a lawyer in Rome under Hadrian and eventually secured the post of procurator, probably in Egypt, wrote a history of Rome in his old age, finishing it c. 160. Claudius Ptolemy (c. 100–178) produced a geocentric astronomy which was generally accepted until the Copernican system overthrew it; Galen (c. 129–199), who wrote on medicine, continued to be accepted as an authority until the Renaissance, and Lucian (c. 125–200) from Samosata on the upper Euphrates, a Syrian who learned Greek in school, made a reputation first as an orator and then turned to impudent dialogues and essays. Lucian laughs at human follies; popular philosophy and popular religion equally excited his amusement.

Flavius Arrianus of Nicomedeia in Bithynia made his model Xenophon, who lived 500 years earlier. Like Xenophon he flirted with philosophy in his youth and associated with EPICETUS. After Epictetus' death, Arrian published the notes he made: the Diatribes in eight books, of which four survive, and a summary of Epictetus' ethics (Enchiridion). They preserve all we know of Epictetus' philosophy. Then Arrian began a career in the imperial civil service and published works of a different kind: a Periplus Ponti Euxini (Mariner's Chart for the Voyage round the Black Sea), dedicated to the emperor Hadrian, a manual on tactics, and, after he retired to Athens, a treatise on hunting that was a commentary of sorts on Xenophon's essay on the same subject, and most important, his Anabasis of Alexander the Great, valuable because he relied on two reasonably reliable sources, now lost: Ptolemy Soter, who became king of Egypt, and Aristobulus, son of Aristobulus. Both men accompanied Alexander on his campaign.

Art and architecture flourished. In the Roman Republic, the patrons had been private individuals, politicians vying for popular esteem, but with the principate the emperors used art and architecture to advertise their virtues. Augustus claimed that he found Rome brick and left it marble. His two greatest projects, his temple of Apollo on the Palatine Hill and his great mausoleum, were planned before the Battle of Actium. Later emperors followed his example, and the cities of the first and second centuries were filled with public buildings in the classical style. Augustus borrowed the models he favored from the Greek Classical Period, and Hadrian, who was a fervent philhellene, sparked a second period of Classicism. Perhaps the most original Roman monument was the Column of Trajan, constructed A.D. 106–113, which presents 150 scenes from Trajan's Dacian War on a continuous scroll wound around the shaft of the column on top of which stood a statue of the emperor himself.

Religion and Public Morality. Religion was pervasive in Roman society. A visit to the remains of an ancient town like Pompeii makes us aware of it. At one end of the forum is the temple of Jupiter on its high podium, adjacent to west flank is the Temple of Apollo, and on the east side is the Temple of the Genius Augusti, the sanctuary of the imperial cult, which was built by the public priestess Mamia. Vitruvius recommends that a city should find an elevated site for the temple of the Divine Triad of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva, a site in the forum or the market place for Mercury, Apollo, and Bacchus near the theater, Isis and Serapis in the market, Hercules at the gymnasium or amphitheater if the city has one, or otherwise at the circus, Mars and Venus outside the city, Mars at the trooping ground, and Venus by the harbor if the city is on the sea. In the houses of Pompeii we find small shrines to the Lares and the Penates, and the Genius of the household where the householder might make a small sacrifice of salted meal. Paganism was a religion of sacrifices, performed with rituals that adhered to rigid formulas and festivals that marked the yearly calendar.

The gods and goddesses were numerous, and there was always room for new imports. Immigrants, whether freemen or slaves, brought their native gods with them. Paganism was tolerant, but there were limits. Judaism was a religio licita, that is, an "approved religion" which had been accorded certain rights and privileges by Julius Caesar, but Rome punished the Jewish rebellion (66–70) by destroying the temple in Jerusalem and bringing the temple treasure as loot to Rome, where it remained until the Vandals looted it once again when they sacked Rome in 451. Yet Rome was to protect the rabbinical school at Jamnia and later at Tiberias, and its head, the nasi, would be given the status of an honorary prefect. Anti-Judaism was not imperial policy. Christianity was different: it was a crime. The Druids whom the Romans found in Gaul and Britain were exterminated. Rome also frowned on self-mutilation: by the second century it was unlawful to practice self-castration with flint knives that was once a feature of the "Day of Blood" in the Attis festival. The Roman sense of propriety should not be offended, but Rome had a marked respect for piety, which might be defined as honoring one's divinities according to ancestral custom.

Among the cults imported into the pantheon was a number of "MYSTERY RELIGIONS," so called because they admitted worshippers by an initiation ceremony where they were revealed a "mystery". Examples are the cult of Isis and Serapis from Egypt, Mithras with Iranian roots, Attis and the Great Mother from Asia Minor, Sol Invictus (the Unconquered Sun), Jupiter Dolichenus, and others. Mithraism centers on MITHRAS, a deity borrowed from Persian Zoroastrianism, but in Iran there was no such cult, which seems to have developed towards the end of the first century A.D. within the Roman Empire itself. It may have begun as the royal cult of the client kingdom of Commagene where Mithras was identified with Sol Invictus, and moved to Rome when the last king, Antiochus IV, was deposed in A.D. 72, perhaps with a group of devotees. It became popular in the Roman army, but how universal it was is hard to say. Women were not admitted. Yet in the later third century the Sol Invictus/Mithras cult emerged as a rival for Christianity, counting among its devotees the emperor Aurelian (A.D. 270–275). Paganism had many facets. Dream interpretation, oracles, and theurgy fascinated growing numbers. Yet for most of the pagan cults, eternal salvation does not seem to have been the ultimate goal.

The reforms of Augustus extended to public morality. One receives the impression from Ovid, whose racy Art of Love depicts a society where sexual conquest was the chief aim of life, and from Juvenal, whose satires portray an amoral Rome and declare that the old-fashioned morality once found in Roman society had broken down, but we should take this evidence with a grain of salt. The erotic poetry of Horace, Tibullus, Propertius, and Ovid drew as much on literary convention as on real life situations. Still, Augustus attempted to regulate private life. To check the extravagance that was sapping the fortunes of the old Roman families, he passed a sumptuary law to limit the money spent on banquets, gold and silver plate, clothes, and the like. It failed. Roman law had always prescribed penalties for adultery, but it was not enforced; Augustus revised the law, making it less severe but trying to enforce compliance. He passed the lex Iulia de maritandis ordinibus to encourage marriage and the bearing of children. It mulcted the unmarried and the childless, whether male or female, by making them ineligible for legacies except from close relations and gave various privileges to persons with children. The inheritance restriction of this law was greatly disliked by the upper classes, and in A.D. 9 Augustus modified it with the lex Papia Poppaea. Augustus placed limits on the manumission of slaves and was chary of granting citizenship to provincials, because, Suetonius claims, he did not want the Roman people contaminated by foreign or servile blood. Later emperors were more tolerant and Roman citizenship was steadily extended: the emperor Claudius intervened personally with the Senate to admit men from the Gallic provinces to the citizenship (Tacitus, Ann. xi, 24), and an inscription found in Lyon in 1528 preserves part of the speech Claudius gave in the Senate on this occasion.

The Majesty of Rome

The legacy of Augustus was a period of general peace and prosperity that lasted two centuries. The period was not completely free of rebellion in the provinces.

There was a revolt in Pannonia in A.D. 6, which required the attention of Tiberius. There was the revolt in Judea at the end of Nero's reign, which is described by Josephus, and in 115–117 there was another Jewish revolt that started in Cyrene sparked by the appearance of a "Messiah." It spread to Egypt, Cyprus, and Mesopotamia and led to great loss of life. A third revolt, led by BAR KOKHBA, broke out in Judea in 132 that caused heavy losses to the Roman army and according to the historian Cassius Dio 580,000 Jews were slain. After the revolt was suppressed, Hadrian changed the name of the province from Judea to Syria Palaestina. There was a revolt in Roman Britain (60 A.D.) led by Queen Boudicca of the Iceni, which broke out when the Romans plundered the kingdom of the Iceni after its client king died and maltreated the queen and her two daughters. The northern regions of Roman Britain was a turbulent area in the Antonine period. There was also low-level resistance: brigands and robber bands, who fed on the discontent of the under classes, often made travel overland unsafe. Yet the revolts of Rome's subjects were relatively few. In general, we may agree with Edward Gibbon's appraisal in his Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire (ch. 2): "But the firm edifice of Roman power was raised and preserved by the wisdom of the ages. The obedient provinces of Trajan and the Antonines were united by laws and adorned by arts. They might occasionally suffer from the partial abuse of delegated authority, but the general principle of government was wise, simple, and beneficent." Gibbon goes on (ch. 3) to make a judgment which is much quoted: "If a man were called to fix the period in the history of the world, during which the condition of the human race was most happy and prosperous, he would, without hesitation, name that which elapsed from the death of Domitian to the accession of Commodus."

Trajan was the last great conqueror. He reduced Dacia to a province in two wars, ending in 106: an exploit that is commemorated by Trajan's column, which still stands in Rome. Dacia's importance was strategic: as a province it was not worth having, but it sustained Rome's control over the German and Sarmatian tribes across the Danube. Trajan's Parthian War (A.D. 114–117) conquered Mesopotamia, but the province was in revolt at his death. Hadrian withdrew and consolidated. The empire switched to a new strategy of defending fixed frontiers. Hadrian's Wall in Britain, built 122/3–c. 133 between the estuary in the east and the Solway Firth in the west, is mute evidence of this strategy. It was built to control traffic over the northern frontier of Roman Britain, and Hadrian's successor, Antoninus Pius, considered it necessary to secure the frontier even more by building another wall further from the Firth of Forth to the Clyde. In Germany and Pannonia, the Rhine-Danube line was the frontier, but in the region between the two rivers, where the Neckar valley and the Black Forest offered an invasion route, Domitian had already a chain of small forts and watchtowers. Under the Antonines this system of fortification was completed with walls or palisades linking the forts, towers, and auxiliary bases.

The army was stretched thin. Moreover, the civil war after Nero's death, which ended with Vespasian's accession (69 A.D.), had revealed the dark secret of the empire: the army could make or unmake an emperor, and troops fighting to install an emperor could not defend the frontiers at the same time. When Clodius Albinus took most of the Roman army from Britain for his ill-starred contest with Septimius Severus, the northern tribes invaded, breaking down Hadrian's Wall. Severus spent the last years of his life (208–211) campaigning there, and after he died at York, Caracalla conducted another successful campaign and then reestablished Hadrian's Wall as the frontier. Yet the army also played a role in the transformation of Roman society. Its corps of engineers provided a pool of expertise for building roads and bridges and even purely civilian projects like amphitheaters. Until Severus' principate, legionaries could not marry, but they did form alliances with women living near their camps, and they might wed them when they retired with their gratuities and savings and settle into civilian life with their families. Their sons not infrequently followed the example of their fathers and became soldiers. Auxiliary troops received citizenship when they retired. Thus the army was constantly feeding the citizenship roll.

It was not alone. Provincials might acquire citizenship through the generosity of emperors or patrons. Leading families in provincial cities might have citizenship conferred on them. The allure of citizenship, and the upward mobility it made possible, was one of the instruments that kept the provincials loyal. Finally, the emperor Caracalla brought the process to an end in 212 A.D. with the Constitutio Antoniniana which conferred citizenship on everyone in the empire except the dediticii: probably barbarians who were settled on deserted land in the empire. How large this group was at this point in time is not known.

Roman society became less Roman, if we can identify citizens by their origins. By the time of the Severi, the proportion of senators of known Italian ancestry is less than half, and there was only one senatorial family that could trace its family tree back to the pre-Augustan republic. The writers Lucan, Martial, and the Senecas were all Spaniards; so were the emperors Trajan and Hadrian. Africans become prominent in the senate from the time of Hadrian. Septimius Severus was born in Lepcis Magna in modern Libya and his unlucky rival, Clodius Albinus was also an African. Severus' wife, Julia Domna, was a Syrian. By the second century's end, the legions were recruited almost entirely from the provinces. The city of Rome was still the heart of the empire, but Italy was no longer its heartland.

The Third Century: A Time of Troubles

Septimius Severus (193–211). The Empire reached a nadir in the third century and came close to breaking up. That it did not do so shows the extent to which the idea of a Roman Empire had been accepted by the peoples of the Mediterranean. Septimius Severus felt no great reverence for Augustan tradition and determined to found a dynasty. He assumed the persona of Marcus Aurelius' son, and made the Senate deify his "brother" Commodus. He deliberately excluded the Senate from active participation in the government, and for that matter downgraded the importance of Italy. The old praetorian guard which was still mostly Italian was disbanded and replaced with a new guard recruited from Septimius' own legions, and he appointed two new Praetorian Prefects, one of them an African. He raised three new legions after he had disposed of Albinus and put equestrian prefects in command of them, thus breaking with the Augustan tradition of choosing legates to head the legions from the ranks of the senate. Then, when he left Rome for the East to wage war on the Parthians (A.D. 195), he left one of his new legions behind, stationed a mere 20 miles from Rome. When Severus, having defeated Parthia, annexed Upper Mesopotamia and set up a new province, he put an equestrian governor in charge of it.

The office of Praetorian Prefect acquired increased importance. One prefect was commander of the armed forces in Italy, and the other was given jurisdiction in all criminal cases in Italy beyond the 100-mile radius of Rome and deputized for the princeps in hearing appeals from provincial courts. He took over the more important duties of the prefect of the grain supply (praefectus annonae) and chaired the Consilium Principis when the princeps was absent. Because of the judicial duties attached to the Praetorian Prefect's office, we find distinguished jurists like the great Papinian appointed to the prefecture, and after Papinian lost his life for criticizing Caracalla's murder of his brother Geta, Ulpian and Paul held the office successively. Once citizenship was made universal by the Constitutio Antoniniana, Roman law applied to everyone, but from the time of the Severi we find it recognizing a distinction between citizens of higher status (honestiores) and those of lower status (inferiores), with more severe penalties for the same offense imposed on the inferiores. The emperor became the source of law, not only in practice, for this had arguably been true earlier, but also in theory. Ulpian put it simply, “What the emperor decides is law.”

Recruits for the army now came almost exclusively from the provinces. Poor administration by provincial governors, now called praesides, was sternly punished. Wars, the increased pay for the army, and the imperial building program all increased government outlays, and Severus depreciated the denarius by a further 20 percent. The ratio of silver to base metal in the silver denarius had been drifting downwards in the second century, but under the Severi the trend gathered pace. Severus also made sweeping confiscations of the property belonging to Albinus’ supporters, which was assigned to a special treasury, the res privata.

Caracalla, Geta, Macrinus, Elagabalus and Severus Alexander. Septimius’ sons, Geta (211–212) and Aurelius Antoninus, better known by his nickname “Caracalla,” succeeded him, but their joint rule ended when Caracalla murdered his brother and obliterated his portraits and inscriptions. Edward Gibbon, influenced by the hostility to Caracalla of our main source, Cassius Dio, called him a “monster,” and he may have deserved it. He gave the army generous donatives and increased pay, and he relaxed discipline in order to curry favor. While leading an offensive against Parthia, he was assassinated by his Praetorian Prefect, Opilius Macrinus, who became emperor himself to the dismay of the Senate, for he was only an equestrian. Macrinus recognized the need to relieve the stress on the economy, and though he did not dare revoke Caracalla’s pay increases to the army, he recruited new soldiers on the old pay scale of Septimius Severus, which provoked discontent.

Meanwhile, Julia Maesa, the sister of Septimius’ widow, Julia Domna, got the Syrian legions to support her grandson Varius Avitus Bassianus. He was a boy of 14, better known as Elagabal, for he was a priest and devotee of the sun god Elagabal that was worshipped at Emesa. Maesa launched a rumor that Bassianus had been sired by Caracalla, and he took the name Marcus Aurelius Antoninus. Macrinus marched out from his base at Antioch against the young pretender and was defeated. Elagabal, however, proved incapable and his devotion to his god, whose cult he tried to introduce into Rome, shocked Roman tradition so much that his grandmother transferred her support to another grandson, Marcus Aurelius Aurelianus Alexander, son of Julia Mamaea. Elagabal was killed and was succeeded by Alexander, who added “Severus” to his name.

Severus Alexander emerges dimly from the sources, but he appears an attractive figure. Julia Maesa soon died, so his mother, Julia Mamaea, acted as his advisor. But he was faced with a difficult situation. In the east, the Parthian dynasty, the Arsacids, was overthrown in 226 by Ardashir, founder of a new Iranian dynasty, the Sassanids, and Ardashir, taking the name Artaxerxes, was crowned king of a revived Persian Empire. In 230, Ardashir invaded Mesopotamia and threatened Syria. Alexander apparently mounted a successful defense. He returned to Rome and then on to the Rhine to meet a German threat. There he was murdered by his troops who were, it seems, disgusted when Alexander tried to defend the frontier by diplomacy and paying indemnities to the Germans. His successor, Maximinus the Thracian (235–238), was a great brute of massive size and barbarity, who visited neither Rome nor Italy during his three-year reign and introduced a half century of anarchy.

Anarchy and Recovery (235–284). There followed a rapid succession of emperors: Gordian I, the elderly governor of Africa and his son Gordian II, who lasted only a little longer than a month, two appointees of the senate, Pupienus Maximus and Balbinus (assassinated July 29, 238), Gordian III (238–244), a boy of thirteen who was the grandson of Gordian I, and Philip the Arab (244–249). Philip and his brother Priscus, who came from a village in Roman Arabia some 55 miles south-southeast of Damascus, were praetorian prefects at Gordian’s death, which Philip may have arranged, and he was proclaimed emperor by the army. He faced revolts in the East from Iotapianus, who claimed kinship with Severus Alexander, and on the Danube by Pacatianus. Both were suppressed, but when Philip sent Decius to restore order in the Danubian legions, they proclaimed him emperor. Once Decius defeated Philip, he had to face a massive invasion of the Goths, who crossed the Danube led by their king, Cniva, and lost his life in battle as he campaigned in modern Dobruja. Decius’ successor, Trebonianus Gallus (251–253), negotiated the withdrawal of the Goths, who were allowed to take their loot with them. Valerian (253–260), who associated his son Gallienus (253–268) with him as co-emperor, was captured by Shapur I, shahanshah of Persia, outside the walls of Edessa. Valerian was the first emperor to be taken captive. His army decimated by plague, Valerian was trying to negotiate a peace when Shapur seized him and killed him. Gallienus ruled on alone until his murder in 268.

This was the nadir of the empire. In Syria, it was the sheik of the caravan city of Palmyra, Odenathus, who drove back the Persians and provided some law and order, and after his murder, his widow, Zenobia, continued to rule his empire independent of Rome. Spain and Gaul broke away under emperors of their own. In c. 263 A.D., a horde of Goths swept down from the Black Sea into Asia Minor as far south as Miletus, and the Milesians sought refuge behind the great walls of the Temple of Apollo at Didyma. Gallienus was left in secure control only of Italy, Africa, and Illyricum. The silver denarius was debased until it had only a trace of silver in it, and it appears that much of the economy was carried on by barter. The army had to be paid largely through requisitions in kind. German tribes invaded Gaul, and the GOTHs raided the Balkans and Asia Minor. In 267 a barbarian tribe known as the Herulians took advantage of a Gothic invasion of the Balkans to sack Athens. There followed a plague epidemic which caused serious loss of life. The nature of the illness is not known, though it was probably not bubonic plague. In the cities of the empire the burden of taxation fell heavily on the curiae. The town councils, which were staffed by the well-to-do citizens (curiales), who were responsible for collecting the taxes and serving on a council, which was once an honor, became something to be avoided by anyone who wanted to preserve his wealth. Pagan cults with expensive festivals could no longer rely on private euergetism. Private donors who had once built public buildings and kept them in repair became scarce. However, it is hard to generalize, since euergetism was largely a thing of the past in Britain, Gaul, and Italy by the end of the third century, though in Africa, which escaped the worst of the turmoil of the third century, it lasted to some degree up to the VANDAL conquest of the early fifth century.

Gallienus maintained control as best he could in the face of rebellion after rebellion. Senators were excluded from military commands, and an elite cavalry unit was created and based in Milan, under an equestrian commander. Army generals could now rise from the ranks, and a cadre of new officers recruited in Illyricum emerged. After Gallienus was murdered in 268, they provided a series of able soldier-emperors. It is too easy to dismiss Gallienus as a failure. Without his tenacity in the face of disasters, the empire might have disintegrated.

Claudius Gothicus (268–270) was the first of the Illyrian emperors. He first defeated the Alamanni, who had invaded Italy. The Goths were again threatening the Balkans in spite of Gallienus' victories over them in 267, and Claudius moved against them with his general Aurelian and defeated them decisively at Naissus (268), whence his title "Gothicus." He died of plague at Sirmium, the only emperor in this period to die a natural death.

His successor, Aurelian, commander of the Balkan army, was a tough and able soldier who completed the restoration which Claudius had begun. His first challenge was an invasion of Italy by the Alemanni, who defeated Aurelian near Placentia, but Aurelian recovered to wipe out the Alemanni invaders. He then turned eastward, where Zenobia's empire extended over Syria, Egypt, and most of Asia Minor. He defeated the Palmyrene army in a pitched battle, took the city, and captured the queen, who had attempted flight. But news reached him as he left for Rome that the Palmyrenes had risen in his rear; he returned swiftly, recaptured Palmyra, and laid it waste. Zenobia was exhibited in Aurelian's triumph and ended her life in elegant detention in Rome. In the west, a brief campaign was enough to put an end to the "Gallic empire" under Tetricus and restore imperial rule in Gaul. It was a brilliant achievement. Yet two other actions of his are symptomatic of the times. He gave up the province of Dacia, which Trajan had conquered. Its defense was now too difficult. And he fortified the city of Rome with a circuit wall which still stands and is named after him: the "Aurelian Wall." Rome itself was no longer secure from attack.

Aurelian lost his life to a petty military plot. He was followed by the elderly Tacitus (275–276) and then by one of Aurelian's generals, Probus, who continued the work of restoration. His program included the settlement of large numbers of barbarians inside the frontiers and more extensive drafting of barbarian war captives into the Roman military forces. This policy, which later emperors also followed, was once considered a major cause of the Empire's decline, but barbarian recruits who were integrated into the army fought as well as recruits from the provinces, and the settlers were needed to bring land depopulated by pestilence and invasion back into production. Probus, a strict disciplinarian like Aurelian, was murdered by his troops. His successor, Carus (282–283), captured the Persian capital, Ctesiphon, but was killed ostensibly by a bolt of lightning, though conspiracy is not improbable. Carus' son, Numerian, led the retreat, but he died on the road under suspicious circumstances. In the rivalry for the imperial office that followed, Diocles was proclaimed emperor at Nicomedia by his soldiers (November of 284), and his first act was to slay the praetorian prefect, Aper, accusing him of murdering Numerian. He then took the name DIOCLETIAN. There followed a struggle with Carus' surviving son, Carinus (283–285), but after his defeat and death, Diocletian became undisputed emperor and undertook a major reorganization of the empire.

The Tetrarchy

Diocletian had risen from a modest background in Dalmatia to become commander of the domestici, the imperial guard. He was a competent soldier and a great organizer with an original mind, and in particular he was a dominant personality who knew how to assert his authority over his colleagues. He swept away what was left of the Augustan principate. He was no longer princeps (First Citizen) but Dominus Noster (our Lord and Master). The Senate had already been relegated to a minor role; Carus, for instance, had not bothered with the formality of having the Senate confer imperium on him. In Diocletian's reorganization, the Senate did not matter. Not that he excluded senators altogether from public administration: the evidence of inscriptions makes it clear that some senators were still to be found governing provinces, and they continued to be used as regional governors of Italy (correctores), but for a career in public service, senatorial status did not matter much under Diocletian. The trend towards absolute monarchy, which started as far back as Augustus, reached its final development with Diocletian.

In 285 Diocletian appointed a colleague, another Illyrian soldier named Maximian, as Caesar, then adopted him as his son, and then the next year named him Augustus. He was made responsible for the west, where Carausius had just had himself proclaimed Augustus in Britain, where he reigned six years (287–293) before his chief financial officer murdered him. Then in March of 293, Diocletian took a second step in the creation of the Tetrarchy. He gave Maximian and himself assistants with the title "Caesar": Constantius Chlorus became Caesar for Maximian and Galerius for himself. Diocletian took the divine title Iovius and Maximian the title Herculeus. The symbolism was clear: Jupiter was king of the gods and Hercules his muscular assistant. The basis of their power was still military, but Diocletian was seeking to cloak it with pomp and circumstance.

The size of the army was increased. How much is hard to judge, for although Diocletian created new legions, they were much smaller than they once were. Typically they were made up of 1,000 men, compared with 6,000 in the first century if they were at full strength, which was never the case. Special detachments (vexillationes) would number about 500, give or take a few. The general consensus of scholars nowadays estimates the total size of the armed forces at not much more than 400,000. New forts were built on the frontiers; surviving examples look much the same, as if there was a standardized fort plan.

Diocletian's tax system did not represent a major break with the past. It was based as before on capitatio, that is, individual tax liability, and a land tax. However to calculate the land tax he introduced an elaborate system of tax units (iuga) as a basis of assessment. A iugerum varied with the fertility of the land. It might vary from five iugera (1 iugerum = 5/8th acre) of vineland in Syria, or as much as 40 iugera of poor quality land. Assessments were to be made by a regular census, organized by five-year periods known as indictions: the first was in 287 A.D., and indictions thereafter provided Late Antiquity with a gauge of chronology, with calendar years expressed as "Year x, Indiction y." Yet taxation consisted as before in munera (public services performed by the taxpayer for free) and payments in money or in kind. The collection of taxes continued to be a public service performed by the civitates, and the curiales (or decuriones) were held responsible for it. Tax collection became the chief function of the municipal councils (curiae); by the time of Constantine it was almost their only function, and personal liability for it was placed upon the decaproti, a council committee of the ten (sometimes twenty) wealthiest citizens. The burden became insupportable in the turmoil of the third century, and curiales attempted to escape it by any means possible. The imperial government tried to enforce fair distribution of the burdens but would not release the curiales from their duties. In the prosperous days of the early empire, the status of decurion had often been de facto hereditary; now in the grimmer economic climate of Late Antiquity, it was made hereditary by law.

The currency was in desperate need of reform, and in A.D. 296 Diocletian introduced new gold and silver coinage. It seems to have triggered a new wave of inflation, the root cause of which may have been the enormous government expenditures. Diocletian attempted to remedy the situation by setting price ceilings: he issued an Edict on Maximum Prices early in A.D. 301, which fixed price ceilings on a long list of merchandise and prescribed draconian penalties for noncompliance. The Edict was published throughout the empire; all of the numerous epigraphic fragments of it come from the East save one from Italy, but this does not necessarily mean that it was unevenly applied. However, it was a fruitless effort. Constantine was to reform the currency again with greater success.

Provinces were reduced in size, and they in turn were grouped into twelve dioceses, each headed by a deputy (vicarius) who represented the praetorian prefect. Thus, for example, Roman Britain now had four provinces making up one diocese; the diocese of Spain had six provinces. Within these new, smaller provinces, civil and military government were separated; the military commander was a "duke" (dux), and the praeses was in charge of civil affairs. The praetorian prefects, three in number for much of the fourth century and four after 395, were the emperor's second-in-command under Diocletian. They were in charge of administrative, financial, legislative, and military affairs, but under Constantine they were to lose their military duties to the "Masters of the Soldiers" (magistri militum) to whom the dukes in the provinces were made answerable. A new bureaucracy blossomed that was to develop under Diocletian's successors to become one of the strengths, and curses, of Roman government in Late Antiquity.

The new masters of the empire lived in style. Each tetrarch had his own court and staff of officials who moved with him as he went from one residence to another. A typical tetrarchic residence had an impressive audience hall and a hippodrome for chariot-racing where the Augustus or the Caesar might show himself to his subjects in the imperial loge. Diocletian built palaces at Nicomedia (Izmir) and Antioch; Galerius built palaces at Thessaloniki (the Rotunda that survives there was probably intended as his mausoleum), and Serdica (Sophia), Maximin's headquarters was Milan and Constantius Chlorus built a palace at Trier. Rome was not on their circuits. The great palace built by the emperor Domitian on the Palatine Hill stood empty, and the city itself was becoming more and more a magnificent museum of historical monuments.

In February of 303 Diocletian initiated the last great persecution of the Christians. Persecutions had lapsed since the end of the emperor Valerian's reign, and for 40 years Christianity had enjoyed unofficial toleration. Christian tradition called this period the "Peace of the Church." Christians began to construct church buildings unmolested. Two years before his abdication, Diocletian brought this tolerance to an end.

The Christian Persecutions. The first evidence we have that the Roman state took notice of Christianity is an ambiguous reference in Suetonius' Life of the emperor Claudius, which reports rioting in the Jewish community in Rome, the cause of which was "Chrestos." But by the reign of Nero, Christians were clearly recognized as a sect separate from mainline Judaism, and after the Great Fire in Rome, Nero sought to deflect blame from himself by persecuting them. Some Romans suspected the Christians of setting the fire, and possibly some Christian millenarians were impolitic enough to rejoice at seeing Rome burn, thinking this was a sign of the Second Coming. The emperor Domitian executed a cousin, Flavius Clemens, for "atheism, for which offense a number of other also, who had been carried away into Jewish customs, were condemned . . ." (Cassius Dio, 67.14), and historians have suspected that Clemens may have been a Christian. However, it was not until the reign of Trajan that Rome's official position was spelled out. Pliny the Younger addressed a letter (Epist. 10.96) to Trajan from Bithynia in 110 to report that he had found a cell of Christians in his province and asked what the proper legal procedure was. Specifically, he wanted to know if Christianity was a crime per se, or was it necessary to prove crimes attached to Christianity, for there were rumors of immoral rites practiced by Christian sects, but the worship Pliny unearthed was innocuous. Yet Trajan ruled that Christianity was a crime per se. But he would not sanction anonymous denunciations or witch-hunts.

It is difficult to understand why the Christians were persecuted. The charge commonly made against them was atheism, for they denied the pagan gods, and atheism did arouse dread in pagan society. It was feared that if the gods were disregarded, they would take offense and might visit revenge on the community, thereby harming pagan and Christian alike. Judaism also denied the pagan gods and yet it remained a religio licita: a "permitted religion" with certain legal rights. The difference seems to have been that Judaism was an ancient religion and the Romans respected it as such, whereas the Christians worshipped a provincial crucified for maiestas (treason), for that seems to have been the indictment against Jesus for which Pontius Pilate put him to death. The Christians were also intransigent in their refusal to take part in the cult of the emperor which was an integral part of Roman state religion. Jews would not say prayers to the emperor either, but they were willing to say prayers for him. Christians, it seems, would not even do that. Christianity was also universal: it assembled congregations of believers without regard for different ethnicities, thus destroying the barriers that separated different national religions. The authorities seem to have perceived Christianity as a mass movement and found it threatening. Pliny, in his letter to Trajan about the Hetaeria congregation he found in Bithynia, terms it a "hetaeria," that is, a political club.

Yet persecutions were sporadic, sparked often by local disasters, or even a shortage of criminals for the wild beast fights in the arena, until the time of the emperor Decius (249–251). The empire was in peril, the Goths were invading, and Decius believed it necessary to make peace with the gods. He required all Roman citizens across the empire to make sacrifice and get a certificate to prove they had done so. Christians were dismayed, and the persecution might have done real damage to the faith, except that Decius was killed in battle in 251. Valerian (253–260) renewed the persecution, but after Valerian's death, Gallienus addressed a rescript to the Christian bishops (261 A.D.) granting the Church liberty to perform its duties and ordered Christian places of worship and cemeteries left free for Christian use. In the "Peace of the Church" that followed, Christians openly erected purpose-built churches; hitherto they had worshipped in houses adapted for the purpose, an example of which has been excavated at Dura-Europos on the Euphrates. We find Christians serving on municipal councils. Christianity began to permeate all classes, including the Roman army. Then came the persecution of Diocletian.

Apparently there was an incident in 299 when diviners at an imperial sacrifice failed to find the right omens and blamed the presence of some Christians who, it was alleged, made the sign of the cross. The first step was a purge of Christians in the army. Then on Feb. 23, 303, as the emperor watched from his palace, the church at Nicomedia was destroyed by the praetorian prefect leading a group of officers. Then followed Diocletian's three edicts of increasing severity. The persecution was directed particularly against the clergy, though Christians in the imperial service were to be stripped of their rank and imperial freedmen would be reduced to slavery if they did not recant. But the decrees got uneven compliance. Maximian was a not unwilling persecutor, but he lacked enthusiasm for it, and Constantius gave nominal acquiescence. But Galerius was a convinced pagan, and after Diocletian abdicated in 305 he continued to persecute Christians until just before his own death in 311. His Caesar Severus administered the persecution in Italy and Africa until the revolt of Maxentius, and his other Caesar, Maximinus Daia, was particularly zealous. At last, in 311 Galerius, now seriously ill, issued an edict of toleration but restored no confiscated church property and imposed a rather vague limit of "discipline" on Christianity, by which he meant something like law and order.

The Empire of Constantine

The Struggle for Supremacy. Diocletian abdicated in 305, and Maximian followed suit, though with reluctance. In the east GALERIUS inherited Diocletian's position as senior Augustus, and in the west Constantius Chlorus took over Maximian's position and title. As Caesars, Galerius appointed his nephew Maximinus Daia in the east and Severus in the west. Maximian's son Maxentius was passed over. Constantius Chlorus' eldest son, Constantine, was with Diocletian and Galerius when the abdications took place, but he soon rejoined his father in Gaul. There is a tradition that Galerius did not want to let him go, and when Constantine finally did get leave, he left speedily and killed the post horses along the road to prevent pursuit. He joined his father who was on the point of crossing the Channel to Britain. When Constantius died at York in 306, his troops proclaimed his son Augustus, and though Galerius refused to accept him as Augustus, he did accept him as Caesar. But CONSTANTINE's elevation moved Maximian's son, Maxentius, to imitation. He revolted, and when Severus tried to suppress him, his troops deserted him rather than fight the son of old Maximian for whom they still felt residual loyalty. Galerius fared no better himself when he invaded Italy to avenge Severus' death. He was forced to retreat.

But rather than recognize Maxentius, he appointed Licinius in Severus' place. The Tetrarchy had broken down. Diocletian was persuaded to come out of retirement and chair a conference at Carnuntum, where Licinius was made Augustus, and old Maximian, who had attempted a comeback, was persuaded to retire again, though only briefly (He died at Marseilles in May of 311, either by natural death or suicide forced on him by Constantine). On Galerius' death, Licinius and Maximinus Daia, who had been proclaimed Augustus by his troops, shared the eastern empire. In 312 Constantine decided it was time to strike. He moved swiftly into Italy, taking Turin, Milan, and Verona and marching south to Rome, where Maxentius met him outside the walls at the Milvian Bridge and was defeated and killed (October 28).

Constantine was now master of the west. In February of 313 he and Licinius met at Milan and made a pact, and Licinius sealed it by marrying Constantine's sister Constantia. They agreed on freedom for all religions. The so-called "Edict of Milan" (A.D. 313) that survives, which freed Christianity from persecution and restored confiscated Church property is, in fact, a rescript issued by Licinius from Nicomedia to a provincial governor, authorizing him to issue an edict of toleration in his province. But it expresses the agreement of both Augusti, and by convention it bears both their names. Licinius had to leave Milan quickly for word came that Maximinus Daia was making a power grab. But a few months later Daia was defeated and Licinius and Constantine shared the empire.

It was a fragile alliance. Constantine's ambitions were soon apparent. In 314–315 he wrested Pannonia from Licinius and moved his court to Sirmium and in 318 moved it again to Serdica. In 323 he defeated Licinius at Adrianople and forced him back to Byzantium, where Constantine's son, Crispus, defeated Licinius' fleet at the north entrance to the Hellespont. Licinius retreated to Asia Minor, where he was defeated again. In 324 Constantine was master of the Roman world, and though he granted clemency to his defeated rival whose wife, Constantia, pleaded for his life, he put him to death a few months later for reasons that are unknown.

Tradition has it that before the night before the Battle of the Milvian Bridge, Constantine had a vision that resulted in his conversion to Christianity. The earlier and simpler version comes from Lactantius, writing within four years of the event, but in Eusebius' Life of Constantine, published shortly after Constantine's death, there is a more elaborate version, which Eusebius claims to have heard from Constantine himself. His account relates that "about noon, when the day was already beginning to decline, he saw with his eyes the trophy of a cross of light in the heavens, above the sun, and bearing the inscription, 'Conquer by This.'" (Vita Const. 1.28). That night, the figure of Christ bearing the same symbol visited him and told him to use it in the coming battle. Indeed Constantine may well have thought a divine power was guiding his fortune, for if Maxentius had stayed within the massive walls of Rome and forced Constantine to lay siege, the outcome of the contest could have been different. But Maxentius chose to do battle outside the walls. Constantine won, entered Rome a victor, and began a policy of generosity to the church. He gave Pope Melchiodorus the Lateran Palace, which had belonged to his wife, Fausta, and only a fortnight after the Battle at the Milvian Bridge, on November 9, we have the traditional dedication date of the first church he built in Rome, the Lateran Basilica. The Roman Senate, which was to be a stronghold of paganism until the century's end, dedicated an arch in Constantine's honor (315–316) and its attic bore an inscription attributing his victory neutrally to “instinctu divinitatis” (the prompting of divinity). By the same year, the basilica which Maxentius had been building for secular use, a massive fragment of which still stands in the Roman Forum, had been dedicated to Constantine and in it was a great statue of him holding a spear shaped like a cross. Constantine's Christianity can hardly be doubted, but he treated pagans with tact. The majority of the population was still pagan.

Constantine's Settlement. On May 11, 330, the Empire got a new capital city, CONSTANTINOPLE, now modern Istanbul. The inauguration ceremonies lasted 40 days. There was a city on the site before Constantine's new foundation, Byzantium, which was founded by the Greek city-state of Megara in 659 B.C. according to tradition. Unlike Rome, it had few monuments of its pagan past. There were temples to Artemis, Aphrodite, and the sun god Helios on its acropolis, which survived until the emperor Theodosius I turned them to secular uses, but Constantinople was to be a Christian city filled with churches. The Great Palace that Constantine began in the southeast section of the city was to grow into an immense complex of pavilions, churches—at least 20 of them—residential quarters and reception halls, and it was joined by a private passageway to the imperial loge in the Hippodrome that flanked the palace. In the middle of the Forum, oval-shaped and markedly different from the traditional rectangular forum of a Roman town with a temple of Jupiter at one end, stood a great porphyry column 100 feet high, bearing a statue of Constantine with the radiate crown usually associated with the Sun God: indeed, it may have been a recycled statue of Apollo. This new foundation was to be a worthy capital. The grain ships which had carried their cargoes from Egypt to Rome were diverted gradually to Constantinople, and Rome was left to get its grain from Africa and Sicily.

For the patriarch, Constantine built a noble patriarchal church, Hagia Eirene, and his son CONSTANTIUS II added a better one, HAGIA SOPHIA, served by the same clergy. The bishop of Byzantium had been only a suffragan bishop of the see of Heraclea Pontica, but now he became the patriarch of Constantinople, with the prestige of the new capital behind him: the third canon of the Second Ecumenical Council of 381 which met at Constantinople was to state that the bishop possessed “prerogatives of honor after the Bishop of Rome, because Constantinople is New Rome.” The pope in old Rome heard the news without pleasure and would not recognize the patriarch's claims. Nor did they sit well with the see of St. Mark in Alexandria which claimed second place itself.

A few pagan temples were closed. A temple of Aphrodite at Efge in Lebanon, where transvestites and women prostituted themselves, was razed. At Heliopolis (Ba'albek) where there were only women prostitutes, Constantine urged restraint on the people and built a church, but otherwise did not interfere. The town of Hispellum in Italy petitioned him towards the end of his life to allow the building of a temple dedicated to his family, and he consented with the proviso that there be no sacrifices (C.I.L. xi, 5265). He confiscated treasure from temples, some of which housed a wealth of dedications, no doubt to the success of his currency reform. He issued a gold coin, the solidus, which was valued at 72 to a pound of gold, and which was used until the fall of the Byzantine empire. He may have banned pagan sacrifices, though the law has not survived. His son Constantius II did pass such a ban (Cod. Theod. 16.10.2) and refers to one his father passed. Sacrifices were at the core of paganism and the pagan cults would be severely damaged if they were prohibited.

Constantine's personal life was not unblemished, but it was no worse than that of many later Christian monarchs. In 326, two years after his son Crispus had defeated Licinius' fleet at the Hellespont, Constantine put him to death, and shortly afterwards he put to death his wife, Fausta, who was Maxentius' sister. The reason why has eluded researchers, but the question has used up a great deal of scholarly ink. There is a harsh tone to his social legislation, particularly on marriage. If a husband is a murderer, his wife may divorce him and keep her dowry; otherwise not. A slave nurse who helps abduct a girl with a view towards marriage is to be killed by pouring molten lead down her throat. But slaves were not to be branded on the forehead for they, too, were made in God's image. The laws penalizing celibacy which went back to Augustus were repealed, which no doubt conduced Christian asceticism.

The church enjoyed favor. Most clergy supported themselves partly by farming or crafts, and Constantine ruled that they should be exempt from compulsory labor (sordida munera). (In 330, rabbis and heads of synagogues were also freed from compulsory public services involving physical labor). Constantius II extended the privileges of the clergy to their wives, children, and servants. But most of all Constantine shows his favor by building and endowing churches. In Rome his greatest church was St. Peter's, built over a necropolis where tradition had it that St. Peter was buried. In Jerusalem he built the church of the Holy Sepulchre, and Constantine's mother, St. HELENA, also built churches on the Mount of Olives and at Bethlehem. They set a pattern: in Late Antiquity private euergetism was to be directed towards building and endowing churches, and the secular public buildings it had once sustained were left to crumble.

Having accepted Christianity, Constantine found himself immersed without delay in the disputes of the Church. In Carthage, the Catholics were under attack by the followers of a certain DONATUS. In the persecution which had only recently ended, some clergy had surrendered the Scriptures, and the Donatists took a hard line, arguing that these traditores who had handed over sacred books should not be readmitted to the church. They appealed to Constantine, who referred the question to a caucus of bishops in Rome, and when the Donatists refused to accept its verdict, to a council with wider representation at Arles. The Donatist arguments failed again, whereupon the Donatists demanded to know what business the matter was of the emperor's. Constantine attempted a round of persecution to bring the Donatists to heel, but without success, and the Donatist schism endured well into the next century.

Once Constantine eliminated Licinius, he encountered a more serious contention centering on the doctrine of Arius, a presbyter in Alexandria who argued that in the Trinity the Son must be secondary to the Father. To solve this dispute, Constantine in A.D. 325 convened a council of bishops at NICAEA, the first of seven recognized ecumenical councils of the church. The minutes of this council have not survived, and we are dependent on the eyewitness account of EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA in his Life of Constantine (3.7–14). Many of the bishops had experienced persecution less than a couple decades before, and it must have been a heady experience for them to meet with the emperor and have him defer to their opinions. Yet Constantine took an active role: he seems himself to have suggested the controversial nub of the Nicene Creed which emerges from the Council, that the Son was of joint substance (homoousios) with the Father.

In Late Antiquity it was common for Christians to postpone baptism as long as possible for it was believed that baptism wiped away all stain of sin, and a believer who was baptized on his deathbed would approach the Last Judgment spotless. In 337, Constantine, even as he was planning an expedition against Persia, felt death approaching and was baptized at Nicomedia by its bishop, Eusebius, and died, May 22, 337.

The Age of Transition: From the Sons of Constantine to Theodosius the Great

After the massacre of all male family rivals, except for Gallus and Julian, the three sons of Constantine succeeded their father. CONSTANTINE II attempted to eliminate his youngest brother, CONSTANS I, in 340 and died in battle in Italy. Constans himself was murdered ten years later by his troops in Gaul, who acclaimed a barbarian officer, Magnentius, as his successor. Constantius II eliminated Magnentius in a costly battle at Mursa in modern Croatia and became sole Augustus. But having no children of his own, he turned first to Gallus and then to Julian, the son of Constantine I's half-brother, made him Caesar, and sent him to Gaul, where he fought with success against the Franks. In 360 Constantius II, who was preparing for war against Persia, demanded reinforcements from Julian's army. The result was an insurrection, and Julian's soldiers acclaimed him Augustus. Constantius treated the action as a rebellion and marched westwards to suppress it, but at Tarsus he took ill and died.

JULIAN THE APOSTATE (361–363) was the last pagan emperor, and during his brief reign he attempted to breathe life into paganism. But the interrupted war against Persia called him to the eastern frontier, and Julian's strategic errors led to disaster. As he was retreating with his army, the Persians launched a sudden attack, and Julian was killed. The army chose a relative unknown, Jovian (363–364) to succeed him, and Jovian made a peace treaty with Persia by which he gave up Nisibis and Singara and agreed not to help the king of Armenia against any attack by Persia. In effect he negated the gains won by Galerius I in 297 while he was still Caesar. His victory was commemorated in the Arch of Galerius, a fragment of which still stands in Thessaloniki. Jovian headed back to Constantinople but died before he reached it.

The army chose a soldier from Pannonia, VALENTINIAN (364–375) as next emperor. He in turn chose his brother VALENS (364–378) as co-emperor to rule the east with his capital in Constantinople, while Valentinian ruled the west with his base in Milan. In 367 Valentinian made his seven-year-old son, GRATIAN, co-emperor, and when he died the army made Gratian's four-year-old half-brother, Valentinian II, co-emperor (375–392) as well. Gratian was 16 at his father's death, and he and his half-brother reigned on in the west until Gratian was overthrown and killed by a usurper, Maximus, Aug. 25, 383. In the east, however, Valens' reign ended in disaster. Visigoths, who had been driven out of the Russian steppe by the Huns, arrived at the Danube and sought new homes within the empire. Valens granted them entry, persuaded by the promise that they would supply recruits for the Roman auxiliaries. But local authorities in Thrace maltreated and robbed them, and in the summer of 377 they rose in rebellion. Valens went into battle without waiting for the reinforcements that Gratian was sending him and was crushed at Adrianople in August of 378: two-thirds of his army was destroyed and he himself was killed. It fell to Valens' widow, Domnica Augusta, to organize the defense of Constantinople and provide direction in the emergency.

Gratian turned to THEODOSIUS, who was living in retirement in his native Spain. His father, Count Theodosius, had been an able "Master of the Soldiers" in Britain, where he restored order after a concerted attack on the diocese (367) by the Picts, the Scots, and the Saxons, and rebuilt Hadrian's Wall for the third time. But he had fallen from favor for some reason and had been executed at Carthage (376). Theodosius I (379–395), whom Gratian proclaimed co-Augustus (January of 379), made Thessaloniki his headquarters while he restored order in Thrace. It was not until Nov. 24, 380, that he made a formal advent, or ceremonial entry (adventus) into Constantinople. Theodosius made peace with the VISIGOTHS (382), granting them land across the Danube in Moesia in return for service as auxiliaries under the command of their own leaders. They were to be foederati, translated misleadingly as "federate troops." They served under terms of a treaty that exempted them from taxation and gave them a yearly subsidy, but they did not have the right of intermarriage with Roman citizens. They were not to be assimilated. Taking recruits for the Roman armed forces from foreign sources was by no means new, but these "barbarian" soldiers had been integrated into the army, where they would become familiar with Roman culture and loyal to the empire. These new federate troops owed their loyalty first and foremost to their tribal chiefs. But the settlement served as a stop-gap during Theodosius' lifetime. It was after his death in 395 that problems arose with the emergence of an aggressive Visigothic leader, Alaric.

Life and Society in Late Antiquity

Social Structure. After the division of the empire between the sons of Theodosius, east and west increasingly went their own ways, though in law the empire was still one, and the consulship which conferred great social prestige if nothing else, was divided: one consul would hold office in Rome and the other in Constantinople. In the west, society came to be dominated by a small group of great land-owning aristocrats. Their great estates were worked by unfree coloni (tenants), tied to the land by a law of Constantine, and landowners were reluctant to supply them as recruits for the army. They liked lives of cultivated leisure, but they were also eager to hold the high offices of the empire, such as the praetorian prefecture, the urban prefecture, or the powerful post of "Master of the Offices," which brought status and wealth. A senator bore the title "illustris"; lesser grades of order which now did not imply senate seats were "spectabilis" (distinguished), and "clarissimus" (honorable). The title "Patrician" indicated immense prestige.

Free peasants survived better in the eastern empire. Constantius II founded a Senate in Constantinople in the 350s, and it expanded rapidly from barely 300 to 3,000 members before he died. The attraction was that achieving senatorial status made a man a citizen of the capital, and thus he could escape the curial duties of his own civitas. High offices in the bureaucracy were coveted for they were a road to prestige and wealth, and since a good classical education was necessary for entry to the civil militia, schools flourished, and though elementary education was left to private enterprise in both East and West, higher education was subsidized. Knowledge of Latin was necessary for the study of law, but in everything else, the language of culture in the East was Greek. The linguistic divide sharpened: the Greek-speaking East had never shown much interest in Latin except for professional reasons, but since Greek had been widely taught in the west, the ruling class in the early empire had been largely bilingual. Now the West was turning its back on Greek. At the same time Syriac in the patriarchate of Antioch and Coptic in the patriarchate of Alexandria were emerging as written languages with literatures of their own.

Literature and Art. There was an apparent dearth of literature in the third century, though it produced one Greek historian of note, Cassius Dio, a Greek from Bithynia who wrote a Roman History under the Severi. With the fourth century there comes a blossoming. The last great Latin historian is Ammianus Marcellinus, a Greek from Antioch, who served as a soldier before he turned to history. Although his History began where Tacitus left off, the first 13 books which are lost must have moved through the years swiftly, and he begins to write in detail in 353, when he joined the staff of Ursicinus, the Master of Soldiers in the East. He ends with the Battle of Adrianople. His great hero was the emperor Julian the Apostate, though he remains aloof as he witnesses the last struggles of paganism. But we cannot say with certainty that he was not a Christian. We can have no doubt about the paganism of Zosimus, who wrote in Greek under Anastasius, and whose New History attempted to show that Rome had declined because it had abandoned the faith of its founders. The traditions of classical literature lived on, and authors working within them take various stances towards the Christian faith. Claudian, a poet and panegyrist at the court of Honorius, who came from Egypt but wrote in Latin, ignored Christianity; he wrote about mythological subjects as if it did not exist. On the other hand, Rutilius Namatianus, a member of the old Gallo-Roman aristocracy who was urban prefect of Rome in 414, was bitter. His On His Return, which describes his journey from Rome back to Gaul in 416, is vituperative on the subject of Christian ascetics. Yet as time went on artifice took over. Procopius of Caesarea, historian and panegyrist under Justinian, wrote as if he were addressing Greek readers of the classical period, even in his Anekdotia or Secret History which purports to relate the scandals he could not reveal in his published work. Yet he was a Christian.

Macrobius in the late fourth century gives us a picture of the pagan aristocracy of Rome in the eve of Alaric's sack of 410. In his Saturnalia he represents their leading members as spending the pagan festival of the Saturnalia together with learned discussions in the morning and lighter conversation at dinner. They are elegant connoisseurs of recondite knowledge, unconcerned by the growing crisis of the state. Chief among them was Symmachus, whose paganism was rooted in a love of the past. His friend, Ausonius, (c. 310–c. 395) the tutor of the emperor Gratian, belonged to the Indian summer of Gallo-Roman civilization in southern Gaul, before the Visigoths moved in and established a Visigothic kingdom. He wrote charming Latin poems in his old age at Bordeaux. One feels he wore his Christianity lightly. He cannot understand his old pupil Paulinus (c. 353–431), who after a brilliant civil career left to live the ascetic life at Nola in Spain. Paulinus, who wrote Christian poetry in classical forms, tried to explain, but the mentalities of the two men had grown apart.

It was in historiography that Christianity left its mark. EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA, whose Life of Constantine is mentioned above, invented two new Christian genres: ecclesiastical history and chronicles. The subject of ecclesiastical history was the church. Whereas history written in the classical tradition avoided citing documents, and it invented speeches where the author could display his rhetorical skill, ecclesiastical history cited documents and excluded speeches. Eusebius' History of the Church was continued by Sokrates, who covered the years 309–439. He was followed by SOZOMEN, who covered 324–425, and Evagrius Scholasticus, who discussed the years 431–594. RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA introduced the genre into Latin; he wrote a digest of Eusebius and added two books to cover the years 324–395.

The World Chronicle was not a completely new invention: Eusebius looked back to the work of Sextus Julius Africanus (c. 160–c. 240). The motive behind the chronicle was the belief that the world would last 6,000 years and that Christ was born 5,500 years after Creation. St. Jerome took over Eusebius' chronicle, and it is through St. Jerome's translation that we know it. The genre continued past the year 500 A.D.; one of the most useful is the chronicle of JOHN MALALAS written under Justinian. For first centuries of Roman history it is evidence only of how indistinct early Rome had become, but for his own period, Malalas is valuable.

Late Antiquity is also the period when the submerged ethnic groups found a voice. Literature in Coptic and Syriac is available: mostly hymns and saint's lives, but also the works of one valuable ecclesiastical historian, John of Asia, who wrote Lives of the Eastern Saints, 58 chapters telling the stories of Monophysite ascetics in Syria and Mesopotamia, and a Church History in three parts which he wrote in prison at the end of his life. The third part survives almost in its entirety, as well as some of the second part, notably his description of the onslaught of bubonic plague in 542.

Art under the emperor Marcus Aurelius turned its back on the classicism of Hadrian. Marcus Aurelius' column imitates Trajan's, but the style of the sculpture is anti-classical Expressionism. War is shown as brutish and cruel, and the soldiers are degraded puppets. Gallienus favored classicism, but the portraits of the period fix their gaze in the distance, as if they seek something beyond the travails of the present. But with the Tetrarchy portrait sculpture is brutish, and figures in reliefs assume hieratic frontality. Classicism revives somewhat under Constantine, but the mood of the age devalued the human body and placed its emphasis on the life of the spirit.

The Last Days of Paganism. The pagans, known as the Hellenes in the Greek-speaking east and the pagani in the west, found themselves under increasing pressure. Constantius II outlawed pagan sacrifices (341), which his father may have done before him, and in 356 he ordered all temples closed and sacrifices to cease. In 359 he visited Rome for the first and last time, and while there removed the Altar of Victory from the Senate House. Julian the Apostate attempted a revival. He tried to give paganism a priestly hierarchy analogous to that of the Christian Church and to inject some theology taken from Neoplatonism, but his brand of paganism lacked popular appeal. Presumably he restored the Altar of Victory to the Roman Senate House for the emperor Gratian removed it again.

With Theodosius I paganism became an outlawed religion. Sacrifices and divination were forbidden again on pain of death (381), and Christians who converted to paganism were denied the right to make legal wills (383). A law of 392 again banned all sacrifices or even visiting a pagan temple. Yet paganism persisted into the reign of Justinian (527–565), and a few pockets survived even his vigorous effort to wipe it out. On the popular level, monks spearheaded the battle, and famous ascetics such as St. Symeon the Elder, who lived for 40 years (A.D. 419–459) on top of a pillar northeast of Antioch, were charismatic figures who attracted pilgrims by the thousands. The pagan gods lacked this popular appeal, once sacrifice was banned, and such festivals as remained were emasculated. Yet in rural areas there were still hallowed caves and sacred trees and springs that inspired religious awe. On the intellectual level as well, a modest revival took place: at the end of the fourth century the Neoplatonic Academy in Athens was re-founded as a kind of pagan monastery practicing theurgy, but at the same time continuing the intellectual heritage of Plato. It produced one brilliant philosopher, PROCLUS (412–485), who wrote commentaries on Plato's dialogues as well as treatises, notably Platonic Theology and Elements of Theology. Emperor Justinian finally closed the school in 529; at least we hear no more of it, although it has been argued that it continued to exist a little longer.

The Fall in the West and Survival in the East

Theodosius died at Milan (Jan. 17, 395) and left his ten-year-old son, Honorius (395–423), as ruler of the western empire with Stilicho, a Vandal, as his guardian and "Master of the Soldiers," and his older brother, Arcadius (395–408), became emperor in Constantinople. The first threat was from Alaric, who rebelled (395) and ravaged Illyricum, where Stilicho's effort to mount a defense roused the hostility of Arcadius' court, which considered Illyricum under its jurisdiction. Alaric then invaded Greece and took Athens, where there is archaeological evidence for looting. There is evidence for the pillaging of Corinth as well. He was granted land in Epirus, but nonetheless invaded Italy (401–403) to then be expelled by Stilicho. On the last day of the year 406, a wave of Alans, Vandals, and Suevi under Vandal leadership crossed the frozen Rhine and ravaged Gaul for three years before moving to Spain. It was during this period of turmoil that the western court moved from Milan to Ravenna, which was easier to defend. Rome itself fell in 410. After Stilicho's death (408), Alaric and his Visigoths had Rome at his mercy. He sacked it in 410, and though Rome no longer had any military significance, the sack sent shock waves through the Empire. It was in the same year that the western emperor Honorius sent letters to the civitates of Roman Britain urging them to undertake their own defense, which marks the end of a Roman military presence in Britain.

Alaric died soon after the sack of Rome, and his brother Athaulf led the Visigoths into southern Gaul, taking with him Honorius' half-sister, Galla Placidia. A Visigothic kingdom lasted in southern France until it was overthrown by the king of the FRANKS, CLOVIS (486). In 414 the Visigoths invaded Spain and a Visigothic kingdom lasted there until it was overthrown by the Muslim Arabs.

The Vandals were to deal the western empire a mortal blow by capturing Africa. The Asding Vandals were not numerous, but they were led by a leader of genius, Gaiseric, who crossed over from Spain to Africa in 429 and began the conquest. Galla Placidia, who provided what direction there was for the western empire from Ravenna as regent for her young son, Valentinian III, failed to coordinate an adequate defense. Carthage fell in 439. Africa was one part of the western empire that had remained prosperous and its wheat fields fed Rome. Now Vandal conquerors displaced Roman landlords, and since the Vandals adhered to the Arian heresy, Catholics were deprived of their churches after 454 and persecuted. Italy had its own problems. Attila, who made himself leader of the Hunnic horde in 446, ravaged Gaul until the Master of the Soldiers, Aetius, met him in 451 with a combined Roman-barbarian force and worsted him at the Battle of the Catalaunian Fields (Châlons). Driven from Gaul, Attila invaded Italy the next year and reached Rome, but he withdrew after a meeting with Pope Leo the Great. He was to die on his wedding night in 453, and after his death his horde disintegrated. Yet Rome was to endure another sack. In 455 Gaiseric and his Vandals took the city, and the looting that followed lasted two weeks, compared to which Alaric's sack had been comparatively mild.

Between 455 and 472 there was a series of short-lived weak emperors who were made and unmade by the "Patrician" Ricimer, who was the power behind the throne until his death in 472. Yet one of Ricimer's choices, Majorian (457–461), was able enough to show that with vigorous leadership something might still have been saved. The last emperor was Romulus Augustulus, the young son of the Master of the Soldiers, Orestes, and he was dethroned by Odoacer, a warlord leading a mixed group of barbarians whom he settled in Italy, seizing one-third of the large estates of the landowners for the purpose. Odoacer sent the imperial insignia to Constantinople with the message that the empire needed only one emperor. But the emperor Zeno regarded Odoacer as an illegitimate ruler and encouraged THEODORIC the Ostrogoth to invade Italy in 488. After defeating and killing Odoacer, he established an Ostrogothic kingdom.

The year 476, when Romulus Augustulus was dethroned, is the conventional date for the fall of the Roman Empire. In fact little changed that year. The great landowners were still rich, though they had lost one-third of their estates, and there were still consuls and prefects. But in Constantinople, the last emperor of Theodosius' family, Theodosius II (408–450), though he was anything but vigorous, did provide continuity and stability. The east still had a good recruiting ground for the army in Asia Minor, and Leo I (457–474) rid himself of Aspar, the "First of the Patricians" by counterbalancing his followers with loyal recruits from Isauria. He married his daughter to an Isaurian chief, Tarasis, who became emperor and took the name Zeno (474–491). Thus the eastern empire passed through its time of crisis and survived.

The reign of Anastasius (491–518) was a period of growth and recovery. The Danube frontier was reestablished. Anastasius was followed by Justin I (518–527) and then by Justin's nephew, Justinian (527–565) under whom Africa and Italy were recaptured, as well as a foothold in Spain. Nonetheless the past could not be restored. Italy was left prostrate by Justinian's war, which destroyed the Ostrogothic kingdom. Moreover, bubonic plague visited Europe in the years following 542, when it first appeared in Constantinople, and it provides as good a date as any for the beginning of the so-called "Dark Ages."

Bibliography: C. WELLS, The Roman Empire (2nd ed. Cambridge 1992). E. A. JUDGE, "Res Publica Restituta: A Modern Illusion?" in J. A. S. EVANS, ed., Polis and Imperium: Studies in Honour of Edward Togo Salmon (Toronto 1974) 279–311. A. H. M. JONES, Augustus (London 1970). A. GARZETTI, trans. J. R. FOSTER, From Tiberius to the Antonines. A History of the Roman Empire, A.D. 14–192 (London 1974). R. SYME, The Roman Revolution, rev. ed., (Oxford 1952); The Augustan Aristocracy (Oxford 1986). K. R. BRADLEY, Discovering the Roman Family (Oxford 1991). D. FISHWICK, The Imperial Cult in the Latin West (Leiden 1987). E. N. LUTTWAK, The Grand Strategy of the Roman Empire (Baltimore and London 1976). R. K. SHERK, The Roman Empire: Augustus to Hadrian (Cambridge 1988). M. HAMMOND, The Antonine Monarchy (Rome 1959). F. MILLAR, The Roman Near East (Cambridge 1993). J. E. LENDON, Empire of Honour: The Art of Government in the Roman World (Oxford 1997). F. MILLAR, The Emperor in the Roman World (31 B.C.–A.D. 337) (Ithaca 1977). C. ANDO, Imperial Ideology and Provincial Loyalty in the Roman Empire (Berkeley 2000). R. L. FOX, Pagans and Christians (New York 1989). A. WATSON, Aurelian and the Third Century (London 1999). P. HEATHER, Goths and Romans 332–489 (Oxford 1991). G. FRIELL and S. WILLIAMS, Theodosius: The Empire at Bay (London 1994). A. K. BOWMAN, Egypt after the Pharaohs 332 B.C.–A.D. 642 (Berkeley 1989). T. F. CARNEY, Bureaucracy in Traditional Society (Lawrence, Kansas 1971). A. LESKY, A History of Greek Literature trans. J. WILLIS and C. DE HEER (London 1966). A. CAMERON, The Later Roman Empire (Cambridge 1993); The Mediterranean World in Late Antiquity, A.D. 395–600 (London/New York 1993). A. H. M. JONES, The Later Roman Empire. A Social, Economic and Administrative Survey, 2 vols., (Norman, Oklahoma 1964).

[J. A. S. EVANS]

ROMAN QUESTION

An expression referring to the politicoreligious conflict between the papacy and the Kingdom of Italy (1861–1929).

Origins. Italian political unification dates from the work of Mazzini and the foundation of Young Italy (1831, but the Roman Question arose when the Italian Chamber of Deputies proclaimed Rome as capital of the new kingdom, though the city was then part of the STATES OF THE CHURCH (March 27, 1861). Only then did the termination of the papal temporal power become an unavoidable and urgent question for European chanceries. The Austrian Empire confessed its inability to aid Pius IX (1846–78), and during the ministry of the Lutheran Count Friedrich von Beust (1867–71) pursued a friendly policy toward Italy. England, Russia, and Prussia favored Italy for religious and political motives. Pius IX's sole protector was NAPOLEON III, acting under pressure from French Catholics; but after France's defeat at Sedan (Sept. 1, 1870), the pope lacked all international help. This made it possible for Italy to resolve the problem in a radical and violent manner by invading and occupying the Eternal City (Sept. 20, 1870).

The peaceful solutions, favored by many moderate Italians, which would have continued papal temporal power on a more restricted scale, were always disdainfully rejected by Pius IX because he considered it impossible for him to dispose of territory belonging to the Church, of which he was merely the custodian. He also foresaw that concessions to the Italian state would inevitably stimulate further demands and spoliations and lead to the inglorious doom rather than to the salvation of his 1,000-year-old state. The final attempts at peaceful solution, implying Italian annexation of Rome except for the Leonine city, made by the government from Florence (September 1870) met the pope's adamant refusal. So did the proposal by GLADSTONE, supported by the Austrian chancellor Beust, of convoking a European congress, because Pius IX feared that this gathering might sanction spoliation while partially restoring his temporal power. Thereupon Pius IX issued the encyclical Rescriptes ea omnia, excommunicating all who had ordered or executed the usurpation, but without specifically mentioning VICTOR EMMANUEL II (Nov. 1, 1870).

Law of Guarantees. Without delay the Italian government sought to reassure Catholics throughout the world of its intent to ensure free communication between the Holy See and the diplomatic corps, the hierarchy, and Catholics in general. Details of the manner in which this promise was to be kept appeared in the Law of GUARANTEES (May 13, 1871). This unilateral solution, which contained no permanent definition of papal rights, was solemnly declared unacceptable by Pius IX (May 15), who voluntarily became a prisoner in the Vatican, spurned the financial offer, and abstained from any act that might have implied, even indirectly, acceptance of the spoliation of his states. LEO XIII (1878–1903) maintained the same intransigent position and repelled all attempts at conciliation.

Progress toward Solution. Developments in France, notably the rupture of diplomatic relations with Rome, the abolition of the Concordat of 1801, and the passage of the law separating Church and State, along with mounting social problems and the growth of socialism, induced PIUS X (1903–14) to seek a rapprochement with Italy. This led to a softening of the NON EXPEDIT policy, thus authorizing Italian Catholics to participate in political elections (June 11, 1905), and to the Gentiloni pact (1913), which encouraged Catholics to support constitutional candidates favorable to conciliating the Church. World War I accentuated this trend, because of Catholic civil loyalty and the Holy See's scrupulous neutrality, which frustrated a tremendous German press campaign by declaring through Cardinal GASPARRI, Secretary of State to BENEDICT XV (1914–22), that it awaited "the appropriate settlement of its situation not by foreign arms but by the triumph of those sentiments of justice which fortunately spread ever more widely among the Italian populace in conformity with its true interests" (June 28, 1915).

After World War I, Msgr. Bonaventura Cerretti, Secretary of State for Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs, discussed the Roman Question in Paris with Vittorio Orlando, the Italian Premier, and presented to him a solution composed by Cardinal Gasparri, that would have attributed to the enclosed Vatican the character of a sovereign state (May 1919). This led to a projected concordat, but the fall of Orlando's cabinet (June 1919) ended these discussions. In 1919 Italian Catholics founded under the leadership of Don Luigi STURZO the Popular party. Alfredo Rocco declared in Parliament: "It does not seem to me impossible to find a point of agreement which conciliates the teachings of the Holy See concerning complete independence with the domestic and international needs of the Italian state" (June 21, 1921). Official state mourning for a pope, decreed for the first time upon the death of Benedict XV, and the solemn blessing imparted by PIUS XI (1922–39) from the external loggia of the Vatican after his election symbolized the changed climate, which continued to improve.

The LATERAN PACTS (1929), which set up VATICAN CITY as a fully independent and sovereign state, concluded a concordat regulating Church-State relations, arranged a financial settlement, abrogated the Law of Guarantees, and definitively and irrevocably terminated the Roman Question, as stated in article 26 of the treaty.

Bibliography: Documents. H. BASTGEN, Die römische Frage, 3 v. (Freiburg 1917–19). P. PIRRI, ed., Pio IX e Vittorio Emanuele dal loro carteggio privato, 5 v. (Rome 1944–61). N. MIKO, Das Ende des Kirchenstaates, 2 v. (Vienna 1961–64). A. PIOLA, La Questione Romana nella storia nel diritto (Padua 1931). Literature. G. MOLLAT, La Question romaine de Pie VI à Pie IX (2d ed. Paris 1932); EncCatt 10:400–403. L. M. CASE, Franco-Italian Relations (1860–1865): The Roman Question and the Convention of September (Philadelphia 1932). S. JACINI, La politica ecclesiastica italiana da Villafranca a Porta Pia (Bari 1938). S. W. HALPERIN, Italy and the Vatican at War (Chicago 1939). Schmidlin v.2, 3, 4. A. C. JEMOLO, La questione romana (Milan 1938); Church and State in Italy, 1850–1950, tr. D. MOORE (Philadelphia 1960). V. DEL GIUDICE, La Questione romana e i rapporti tra Stato e Chiesa fino alla Conciliazione (Rome 1947). F. ENGEL-JANOSI, Österreich und der Vatikan, 1846–1918, 2 v. (Graz 1958–60). S. LENER, La formazione dell'unità d'Italia e i cattolici (Rome 1962). The Roman Question: Extracts from the Despatches of Odo Russell from Rome, 1858–1870, ed. N. BLAKISTON (London 1962). R. MORI, La Questione romana 1861–65 (Florence 1963). R. AUBERT, Le Pontificat de Pie IX (Fliche-Martin 21; 2d ed. 1964).

[R. MORI]

ROMAN RELIGION

The history of Roman religion before the 5th century B.C. is obscure, and it is likewise complex, because Roman religion from an early stage exhibits a fusion of Italic and Etruscan elements with the Roman core proper. However, Roman religious institutions were remarkably conservative and persistent, and with the data furnished by Roman calendars, antiquarians, historians, archeology, and comparative religion, it is possible to get a reasonably clear and reliable idea of the basic religious concepts and institutions at least from the 6th century B.C. The Roman calendars, in particular, are of the greatest value in the reconstruction of early Roman religion. At the outset it may be stated that Roman religion was predominantly agrarian in character and that even the later calendars still stress the agrarian cycle of feasts and ritual.

Early Roman Religion (to 218 B.C.). The Latin word religio is best explained as meaning a "feeling of awe" or "anxiety" toward supernatural powers or forces (numina). These numina were regarded as dwelling in natural objects and in specific localities and as having a decisive role in every aspect of human life and activity. They were not thought of originally as personifications of natural forces but, primarily, as "spirits." This animistic character of early Roman religion helps to explain the striking fact that the Romans never created a mythology of their own. The primary concern of Roman religion was, by prayer, sacrifice, and scrupulous observance of ritual, to establish friendly relations with the numina governing the myriad activities of life, and thus to have reasonable assurance of their help and protection. Magic also played a very important role in Roman religion. It was regularly employed in both public and private life to discover the will of numina and to make certain of their help or, on the other hand, to obtain effective protection against the harmful actions of malevolent spirits.

Caesar Augustus (Octavius).

Family Religion. Family worship was centered in the house, fields, and boundaries of the farmstead. A host of numina or spirits presided over the various parts of the house and the activities of house and farm. The Penates guarded the pantry; and Janus, the door. Vesta, the spirit of fire, was present in the hearth. The pater familias had an indwelling Genius; and the mater familias, an indwelling Juno. The Lares protected the fields. All these spirits were the object of cult, and the pater familias was the priest of the household—which included slaves as well as members of the family proper. A special festival, the Terminalia, was held in honor of the boundary stones, and in May the Ambarvalia was celebrated to insure the fertility of the fields. It included a solemn procession, prayers, and the sacrifice of a pig, sheep, and ox (suovetaurilia). Other feasts, likewise connected with agriculture, were celebrated throughout the year, and magic practices of various kinds were employed to ward off evil spirits or diseases. The spirits of the dead, the Di Manes, were honored at the feast of the Lemuria, which was held in May. At first, the spirits of the dead were feared, and the rites were intended to propitiate them or drive them away. At the later feast of the Parentalia, however, relatives decorated the graves of their dead without fear and out of a feeling of duty and affection. Family religion in country areas remained at once relatively primitive and vital to the end of antiquity.

Religion of the State. According to Roman tradition King Numa established the Roman calendar with its cycle of feasts and its listing of days on which public business could or could not be conducted (dies fasti et nefasti). The king himself was chief priest. He was assisted primarily by two collegiate priesthoods, the College of Pontiffs, and the College of Augurs. After the establishment of the Republic (c. 509 B.C.), the two colleges mentioned became the two most important religious bodies in the state. The chief pontiff, the Pontifex Maximus, was the head of the state religion, with supervisory control over religion in general. A rex sacrorum continued, to some extent, the religious functions of the Roman kings. In the absence of a priestly caste, Roman magistrates served in these colleges and performed the priestly functions. The College of Pontiffs kept the calendar and were the guardians and interpreters of ius divinum and ius humanum, retaining a monopoly over the legis actiones or forms of pleading until the late 4th century B.C. The main business of the pontiffs was to maintain the pax deorum, the proper relations between the divine powers and the state. The College of Augurs, by observing the flights of birds and other phenomena, indicated whether the omens were favorable or unfavorable regarding a public action to be taken. In matters of grave concern the Romans made use of the Etrusca disciplina, or hepatoscopy. A priesthood, the flamines, performed certain rites in honor of Jupiter, Mars, and Quirinus; the Salian brotherhood were devoted to the worship of Mars; and the VESTAL VIRGINS spent the greater period of their lives in the cult of Vesta as symbolized in the sacred hearth fire of the state. A special college of priests, the Fetiales, carried out magico-religious ceremonies connected with the declaration of war. The Roman TRIUMPH after victory was a solemn religious act of thanksgiving.

The Romans honored their divinities with sacrifices of animals, first fruits, libations, and prayers. The animals sacrificed were chiefly pigs, but sheep and oxen also were immolated. Every five years a solemn lustratio or purification of the city was held, consisting of a procession, sacrifices, and prayers. Of the early Roman temples, that erected to Jupiter Optimus Maximus on the Capitol was the most important. It should be noted also that the ludi, or public games of the Romans, were religious in origin and long maintained their religious character. The religious rites of the state had to be carried out with scrupulous exactness. They inculcated a spirit of discipline and order, but they had little emotional appeal.

Foreign Cults and Spread of Anthropomorphism. The Italic cults of Diana, Fortuna, Venus (a vegetation divinity), and Minerva (a goddess of weaving) were introduced very early. The worship of the triad, Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva, was probably of Etruscan origin. Greek influence came through the Etruscans or through increasing contacts with the Greek South. Among the Greek divinities introduced at Rome before the Second Punic War were Apollo, Hercules, Castor and Pollux, Ceres, Liber, and Libera (Greek Demeter, Dionysus, and Persephone), Mercury (Hermes), Neptune (Poseidon), and Aesculapius. A collection of the SIBYLLINE ORACLES was in use by the early 4th century B.C. and was entrusted to a special college, the Decemviri sacris faciundis. Greek divinities were worshiped with a ritual adapted from the Greek (Græacus ritus). The carrying of gods on couches (lectisternia) in procession, and processions of supplication (supplicationes) in times of grave crisis, were also of Greek origin. By the late 3d century, anthropomorphism had made great progress. The more important old Roman numina had acquired or were acquiring human form and were being assigned the attributes of their approximate Greek counterparts. Vesta, however, remained immune from anthropomorphism, and her temple contained no statue.

From the Second Punic War to the End of the Republic (218–231 B.C.). The long and terrible war with Hannibal caused an outburst of all kinds of superstition and led the state to resort to alien cults that seemed more effective. The Ludi Magni were celebrated with great pomp in 217; the Ludi Apollinares were instituted in 212; and the Ludi Megalenses, in 204. These games were intended primarily to honor the gods, but, by furnishing entertainment at the same time, they lessened anxiety and tension. After Cannæ (216), the Romans buried alive two Gauls and two Greeks in the Forum Boarium to appease the angry gods. Later a supplicatio was decreed and a lectisternium in which 12 Greek and Roman gods were carried side by side, thus indicating that the Roman religion had really become Greco-Roman.

In 205, on the advice of the Sibylline Books, the cult of Cybele, the Great Mother of Asia Minor, was introduced at Rome, and her fetish, the black stone of Pessinus, was brought with all solemnity to Rome and placed in the Temple of Victory on the Palatine. Subsequently, the Romans restricted the cult of Cybele as much as possible, but it had come to stay. The orgiastic cult of DIONYSUS or Bacchus spread to Rome from South Italy, but in

Arch of Trajan, detail showing Hercules, Minerva, Bacchus, Jupiter, Ceres, Juno, and Mercury, Beneventum, A.D. 114–117. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

186 it was suppressed by the Roman Senate, whose stern decree, Senatus consultum de Bacchanalibus, is extant. On the other hand, from the early 3d century the state itself fostered the cults of abstract personifications, as that of Victory mentioned above. Thus Libertas, Pietas, Concordia, Salus, Pax, among others, were the object of cult. Caesar himself received divine honor indirectly by the erecting of a temple to his Clementia.

Vitality of Oriental Cults and Decline of the State Religion. Despite the vigilance of the state regarding the introduction of foreign cults and its refusal to give them full or even partial official recognition, the great influx of Greeks and Orientals into Rome in the 2d and 1st centuries led to the spread not only of new Greek cults but, especially, of Oriental cults that were highly emotional. They had elaborate liturgies and a professional priesthood, and promised an afterlife to their devotees. The Mysteries of ISIS AND OSIRIS, for example, came to Rome c. 100 B.C., a century after the introduction of the worship of the Great Mother of Asia Minor. Along with Oriental religions came astrology and other forms of magic and superstition.

The official cults of the state had lost all emotional appeal for the masses, but they continued to be maintained—if in a neglected way—as a part of the governmental machinery by men who no longer held the old beliefs. They were even exploited by more or less unscrupulous candidates for high office, who used them merely to serve their political ambitions. Caesar, for example, although one of the confirmed agnostics of his age, sought and obtained, the office of Pontifex Maximus, the highest religious office in the state.

Egyptian priests celebrating the Mysteries of Isis, fresco, Pompeii, 1st century A.D.

Impact of Greek Literature and Philosophy. The influence of Hellenism on Rome began in the 6th century B.C., but it became especially intense and all but overwhelming from the last half of the 3d century. A formal Latin literature was created under the direct influence of Greek models, and Latin antiquarians and poets connected Roman origins and Roman religion with Greek traditions and divinities as far as possible. Anthropomorphism now reached its full term, and Greek mythology was taken over by Latin writers and adapted to serve literary ends. The mythology of the Latin poets is simply Greek mythology in Latin dress. Aeneas the Trojan became the founder of Rome, and Caesar traced his ancestry back through Aeneas to Venus and Anchises. This religion of the poets reflects literary sophistication and convention rather than genuine belief, and it was so regarded by the small educated class for which it was written.

The rationalistic outlook of poets had its foundation in the rationalism of the Hellenistic Age as exemplified by Euhemerus, who was translated by Ennius, the father of Latin poetry. Under the impact of Hellenism, educated Romans became familiar not only with the older and contemporary Greek literature, but also with the various schools of Greek philosophy, especially with EPICUREANISM and STOICISM, which were the most influential. While Epicureanism led to the repudiation of traditional religion as superstition, Stoicism gave an allegorical interpretation of the old myths, and its religiophilosophical teachings offered intellectuals an attractive and meaningful way of life. However, through Posidonius especially, Stoicism found a place for astrology and astral religion in its system. The typical rationalistic attitude of the educated Roman is well exemplified in the pertinent writings of Cicero and Varro.

Under the Empire. Octavian began a systematic revival of the old state cults in the years before Actium (31), and then, as Augustus, founder of the Principate, he carried out this policy on a much wider scale. He instituted the Ludi saeculares in 17 B.C., and in 12 B.C., after the death of Lepidus, he assumed the office of Pontifex Maximus—held subsequently by all his successors until it was relinquished by Gratian, A.D. 382. He rebuilt temples throughout Rome, restored the old priesthoods, and required them to celebrate the rituals of their respective cults with the earlier regularity and pomp. He enlisted the help also of the great contemporary poets Horace, Vergil, and Ovid in his program of restoring the Old Roman cults and their celebration.

But the most important of his religious innovations was the imperial cult. It was in part Hellenistic, but the emphasis on the public worship of the Genius of the emperor, especially in Rome and Italy, gave it a Roman character as well. It was intended to serve as an effective symbol of unity in the universal empire of Rome and also to promote a deeper loyalty on the part of the army to its imperator, or commander in chief. Gradually, the imperial cult and its priesthoods lost much of their appeal, but they enjoyed a marked revival in the period from Aurelian to Diocletian. Under the influence of the central administration and the model set by Rome, the religious cults of the Roman provinces, despite local aspects, assumed more and more the Roman pattern, at least in external form.

Mystery Religions and the Spread of Superstition. The most vital forms of religion under the Empire were the Greco-Oriental MYSTERY RELIGIONS, especially the Mysteries of Isis, of Cybele (Magna Mater Deorum), and of MITHRAS. Their highly organized emotional cults and their promise of salvation and afterlife to their devotees appealed to all classes of society. The cult of Mithras was essentially a religion for men and was very popular in the legions; Mithraic shrines are found from Syria to Britain. Pagan religious credulity and superstition reached its high point under the Principate. Oracles, dreambooks, and other forms of divination had a wide vogue. Men like Apollonius of Tyana and Alexander of Abonoteichos acquired great celebrity as miracle workers, although the latter was a notorious charlatan.

Philosophy and Religion. With the exception of Epicureanism, which was in rapid decline in the 2d century A.D., philosophy in general became progressively more occupied with religion. Stoicism, Middle PLATONISM, and NEO-PYTHAGOREANISM were really religions, or at least religious philosophies. Astral religion, with its accompanying fatalism, had numerous adherents in this period also and, as already noted, had found a place within Stoicism. The supposed revelations of Hermes Trismegistus and other Gnostic teachings, derived from Oriental as well as Greek sources, combined philosophy, religion, and magic in more or less fantastic ways. Syncretism was a marked feature in all these philosophical religions. Furthermore, philosophy was regarded as a religious way of life. Hence there is frequent mention of “conversion,” as in a strictly religious sense.

The last great philosophy of antiquity, NEOPLATONISM, founded by Plotinus (fl. 250–270), was a religion as well as a philosophy. With modifications by Porphyry (223–305) and Iamblichus (d. c. 330), Neoplatonism was able to include all pagan beliefs in its system. Thus, late paganism acquired a systematic theology, and in this form it became much more formidable to Christianity. Its refutation demanded the new kind of Christian philosophical and theological apologetic that is evident in St. Augustine’s treatment of the major tenets of Porphyry in his City of God. Philosophical paganism was a conspicuous feature of Julian’s attempted revival and of the circle of Macrobius. It had a continued life in the philosophical schools of Athens until their closing by Justinian in A.D. 529.

Persistence of Old Roman Religion. Despite the decay of the old Roman religion in Rome and other large urban centers in the West and the triumph of the mystery religions, and subsequently that of Christianity in these same centers, the old Roman agrarian cults and magic practices retained their vitality in the more remote municipalities and, above all, in country districts. The popular sermons of St. Augustine, Maximus of Turin, and other Christian preachers of the late 4th and early 5th centuries refer repeatedly to the continued observance of old pagan feasts and the resort to magic practices. Even as late as the 6th century MARTIN OF BRAGA and CAESARIUS OF ARLES found it necessary to condemn by name pagan superstitions and practices mentioned in the calendars of the late Republic and early Empire.

See Also: AFTERLIFE, 3; GREEK RELIGION; GREEK PHILOSOPHY (RELIGIOUS ASPECTS).

The theophany of Dionysus, Roman fresco, Pompeii or Herculaneum, before 79 A.D. (©Mimmo Jodice/CORBIS)

Bibliography: P. BILDE, “The Meaning of Roman Mithraism,” in Rethinking Religion (Copenhagen 1989) 31–47. R. GORDON, “Religion in the Roman Empire: The Civic Compromise and Its Limits,” in Pagan Priests (Ithaca, N.Y. 1990) 235–55. M. BARNETT and M. DIXON, Gods and Myths of the Romans (London 1996). H. CANKIK and J. RÜPKE, Römische Reichsreligion und Provinzialreligion (Tübingen 1997). J. SCHNEID, La religion des Romains (Paris 1998). J. CHAMPEAUX, La religion romaine (Paris 1998). E. BISPHAM, et al., eds., Religion in Archaic and Republican Rome and Italy: Evidence and Experience (Edinburgh 2000). J. A. NORTH, Roman Religion (Oxford 2000). R. TURCAN, The Gods of Ancient Rome (Edinburgh 2000). J. RÜPKE, Die Religion der Römer: eine Einführung (Munich 2001). A. TRIPOLITIS, Religions of the Hellenistic-Roman Age (Grand Rapids, Mich. 2001).

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE/EDS.]

ROMAN RITE

The term Roman Rite, sometimes mistakenly called the Rite of St. Peter, is here taken to mean the entire complex of liturgical prayers and practices in the Mass, Office, and Sacraments, etc., which originated in, or were adopted by, the Diocese of Rome and later imposed on almost the entire (Western) Church. Here are discussed its history, its chief characteristics, and its main variants.

History. The beginnings of the Roman Rite in Latin from the Greek are obscure. Many scholars have questioned the long-held assumptions about the date, origins, and authorship of the Apostolic Tradition, a church order that was traditionally associated with the Church of Rome by virtue of its supposed author, HIPPOLYTUS of Rome. The earliest extant manuscript evidence suggests that around 270 (parallel to the same occurrence in northern Africa) the Greek liturgy of the Roman Rite was gradually translated into Latin.

Roman Catholic Archbishop of New York, Edward Michael Egan, holds up the chalice as he delivers Communion during the Mass of Installation at St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York City, June 2000. (©Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS)

One characteristic feature of the ancient Roman Rite was its solemn prayers—a series of prayers, each beginning with a bidding by priest or bishop, followed by silent prayer and ending with a concluding collect by the priest or bishop. Geoffrey Willis and Paul De Clerck have suggested that the biddings are older than the collects. During the season of Lent, the deacon would instruct the faithful to kneel (flectamus genua) for silent prayer, and rise (levate) for the concluding collect. The solemn prayers fell into disuse and survive only on Good Friday.

Another feature of the early Roman Rite was the litanies known as the Deprecatio Gelasii, traditionally attributed to Pope GELASIUS (492–6). The Litanies are very similar to those in the Divine Liturgy of the Christian East, with the bidding of the deacon and the assembly's responding “Lord have mercy” (Kyrie eleison). Over time, the Litanies disappeared. While older scholarship thought that the Litanies were abbreviated into the KYRIE ELEISON we know of today, many scholars now hold that they were simply dropped in favor of processional litanies.

The reforms carried out by several popes affected especially the prayer formulae, rituals, and chants. Under the Oriental influence of successive Eastern popes (from c. 640 to c. 750) certain texts (e.g., the Agnus Dei, inserted into the Roman Rite by Pope Sergius I, which was originally a Confractorium) and certain feasts (e.g., the Annunciation, “Dormition,” and Nativity of the Blessed Virgin) were introduced.

The Ordo Romanus Primus gives us a detailed description of an 8th century papal mass at a stational church. By this time, the Solemn Prayers and the Deprecatio Gelasii had long disappeared. What was once a simple eucharist has evolved into an ornate and elaborate ritual complete with processions from the papal palace to the STATIONAL CHURCH.

Sometime after 754 the Roman Rite was officially introduced into Franco-German areas by the Carolingian monarchs, replacing the GALLICAN RITES. The Roman Rite succeeded in supplanting the liturgical forms of the old Frankish empire, not by abolishing them, but by assimilating them. Both Pepin (d. 768) and Charlemagne (d. 814) authoritatively introduced the liturgy of Rome into their realms; Alcuin, and later Amalarius, combined old Gallican elements with the Roman usage, thus achieving a new form which was practicable outside the city of the popes. It was this Gallicanized liturgy, embellished with new forms, that returned to Rome from the Rhineland (Cologne and Mainz) around 950. Important in this connection were the Germanic emperors and popes who brought back with them the Frankish Ordinals and especially the Romano-Germanic Pontifical of Mainz. After the year 1000 the smelting process began in Rome itself, especially under Gregory VII and Innocent III, who had service books made for the Roman Curia. These were used in turn by the Franciscans, who introduced them far and wide.

Between 1568 and 1614, Rome, at the behest of the Council of TRENT, created a uniform liturgy for almost the whole Latin Church, based principally on the Roman Curial books, themselves a mixture of Roman and Franco-Germanic elements. The books issued were the Roman Breviary (1568), Missal (1570), Pontifical (1598), Ceremonial of Bishops (1600), and Ritual (1614).

On Dec. 4, 1963, at the end of the second session of Vatican Council II, Paul VI approved and promulgated the conciliar Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy and implemented it with a special motu proprio on Jan. 25, 1964. The conciliar Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy crowned the reform work of the 20th-century popes beginning with Pius X, who gave the liturgical movement a decidedly pastoral orientation. The document contained not only many well-ordered pastoral admonitions, but pointed decrees for reform, the most important of which had to do with the translation of the Roman Rite into the vernacular, and adaptations to the genius of the diverse cultures throughout the world.

Though originally local in character and circumscribed in use, the Roman Rite became the most widespread in Christendom. It is found almost universally in western Europe and in every country evangelized by western Europe, including those that have native European liturgies.

Although the beginnings of a distinctly Roman liturgy are dim and uncertain, it seems to be an entirely native growth, though it was undoubtedly influenced by outside forces, particularly in its later development. No one any longer takes seriously the numerous conjectures of 19th- and early 20th-century scholars. The Roman Rite bears clear marks of its local origin: the Missal indicates the Roman stations, and the Canon of the Mass honors the Roman martyrs with special solemnity.

Chief Characteristics. The traits of the present Roman Rite are many and varied. But the sober, not to say somber, earnestness of the ancient Roman liturgy, with its clear, compact, and controlled style, is in strong contrast to the dramatic exuberance and prolixity of the Gallican liturgies and the poetry and volubility of the Oriental. However, the present Roman liturgical books contain an admixture of other styles, indicative of their long and complicated history. In fact, the Roman form was really incomplete as far as the development of many of the Sacraments and sacramentals was concerned, and the work of completion and enrichment was done in the Frankish realms and drawn from many sources, native and foreign.

Variants. The centuries before the Council of Trent were times of great liturgical diversification even within the framework of the Roman Rite. During the Middle Ages the rite developed a vast number of derived uses which were, for the most part, abolished by St. Pius V, in the bull Quo primum, July 14, 1570. Many dioceses and religious orders that had developed their own variants of the Romano-Frankish liturgy took advantage of a stipulation in the document Quo primum. Only Braga, Lyons, the CARMELITES, CARTHUSIANS, CISTERCIANS, DOMINICANS, and PREMONSTRATENSIS have retained remnants of their own rite until the liturgical renewal of Vatican Council II.

See Also: BRAGAN RITE; LYONESE RITE; SARUM USE; CARMELITE RITE; CARTHUSIAN RITE; CISTERCIAN RITE; DOMINICAN RITE; PREMONSTRATENSIS RITE.

Bibliography: A. A. KING, Liturgy of the Roman Church (Milwaukee 1957). J. A. JUNGSMANN, The Mass of the Roman Rite, tr. F. A. BRUNNER, 2 v. (New York 1951–55); The Early Liturgy to the Time of Gregory the Great, tr. F. A. BRUNNER (South Bend, Ind. 1959). B. BOTTE, La Tradition apostolique de saint Hippolyte: Essai de reconstitution in Liturgiegeschichtliche Quellen und Forschungen (Münster 1909–40; 1957–) 39; (1963). S. J. P. VAN DIJK and J. H. WALKER, The Origins of the Modern Roman Liturgy (Westminster, Md. 1960). E. BISHOP, Liturgica historica (Oxford 1918; repr. 1962), T. KLAUSER, The Western Liturgy and Its History: Some Reflections on Recent Studies, tr. F. L. CROSS (New York 1952). G. G. WILLIS, Essays in Early Roman Liturgy (London 1964), and Further Essays in Early Roman Liturgy (London 1968). P. D. CLERCK, La Prière Universelle dans les liturgies latines anciennes (Münster 1977). G. P. JEANES, The Origins of the Roman Rite (Bramcote, Nottingham, Eng. 1991). P. F. BRADSHAW, “Redating the Apostolic Tradition: Some Preliminary Steps,” in Rule of Prayer, Rule of Faith: Essays in Honor of Aidan Kavanagh, OSB, eds. N. MITCHELL and J. F. BALDOVIN (Collegeville, Minn. 1996), 3–17. T. J. TALLEY, “Roman Culture and Roman Liturgy,” in Rule of Prayer, Rule of Faith: Essays in Honor of Aidan Kavanagh, OSB, eds. N. MITCHELL and J. F. BALDOVIN (Collegeville, Minn. 1996), 18–31.

[F. A. BRUNNER/EDS.]

ROMANIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Located in southeastern Europe, Romania (formerly “Rumania”) is bordered on the north by Ukraine, on the east by Bessarabia and the Black Sea, on the south by the Danube River and Bulgaria, and on the west by Serbia and Hungary. While Romania contains portions of the Carpathian Mountains and the Transylvanian Alps, much of the country’s landscape is characterized by rolling hills and fertile farmlands. Romania’s natural resources include timber, natural gas, coal, iron and a declining reserve of petroleum. Occupied by a communist regime between 1947 and 1989, the nation’s barren industrial base was in the process of regeneration by 2000, with the mining, timber and construction materials industries among the nation’s major exporters.

Romania has its roots in the ancient Roman province of DACIA. Although a Latin people through the early influence of Bulgar invaders most Romanians adopted the Byzantine tradition that would ultimately evolve into the Romanian Orthodox Church. Meanwhile, Latin Catholicism developed strong roots in Transylvania while that area was under the domination of the Austro-Hungarian Hapsburgs, although many Transylvanian Catholics went on to convert to Protestantism under Turkish rule. The Turks also sent Greek princes to rule in Walachia and Capital: Bucharest.

Size: 91,699 sq. miles.
Population: 22,411,121 in 2000.
Languages: Romanian, Hungarian, German.
Religions: 15,687,784 Romanian Orthodox (70%), 1,161,942 Romanian Greek-Catholics (5%), 1,344,667 Roman Catholics (6%), 1,433,500 Protestants and other denominations (6%), 2,783,228 without religious affiliation.
Ecclesiastical organizations: The Roman Catholic Church has an archdiocese in Bucharest, with dioceses in Iași, Oradea Mare, Satu Mare, and Timișoara.

Moldavia, establishing a Greek-Catholic presence through relations with monasteries in Greece. As a result of these diverse political influences, several churches evolved in Romania: the Latin or Roman Catholic Church, the Byzantine or Greek-Catholic Church, and the autocephalous Romanian Orthodox Church. The essay following this introductory section presents discussion of these churches within several historical epochs.

Early History to World War II

Christianity first came to the region in its Latin form and by the 3d century had penetrated the region near the Black Sea (modern Dobruja), which later formed the ecclesiastical province of Scythia, with Tomi (now Constanta) as metropolis. To the west, on the right side of the Danube, there existed the Diocese of Remesiana (near modern Palanka), whose bishop, St. NICETAS, a renowned Latin Christian writer, was venerated as the apostle of the Romanians. Christianity all but disappeared from these regions during the Bulgar invasions and the subsequent migration, which began in the 6th century and lasted for several centuries. During the Bulgarian rule that began in the 8th century, the Slavonic language spread and the BYZANTINE CHRISTIANITY became the predominant faith among the Romanians. Even after Bulgarian supremacy ceased, Slavonic remained the official language for the liturgy and also for the chanceries of Walachia and Moldavia.

Hungarians moved into the Transylvania region c. 1003. In the 14th century Walachia and Moldavia arose as independent principalities, but from the 16th to the 19th centuries they served as vassals to Turkish overlords while still retaining much of their autonomy. In 1859 these various principalities united under Prince Alexandru Ioan Cuza and in 1861 adopted the name Romania. After suffering a land shift during the Russo-Prussian War of 1877, Romania gained complete independence in 1878 and became a kingdom in 1881. At the start of World War II the country was ruled by Michael I, who remained king until his abdication in 1947.

Development of a Byzantine Tradition. During the 17th century the Romanian Church in Transylvania experienced pressure by Hungarian Protestant princes, especially those of the Rákóczy family. To resist this threat, a synod met in Iași in 1642 and condemned the Romanian catechism published by Prince George Rkóczy because it contained Calvinist doctrines. Union with the Catholic Church was also attempted at this time. In 1690 Austrian armies liberated Transylvania from Turkish domination and established Hapsburg rule. After negotiations with Romanian bishops Theophilus and Athanasius, a general synod of the Romanian clergy met in Alba Iulia (Oct. 7, 1698) and agreed to unite with the Catholic Church on the basis of the Ecumenical Council of Florence. While it was hoped that this union would include all the faithful of the Romanian rite, it did not turn out that way: a large part of the clergy and laity remained Orthodox. The Council of Florence marked the division of the region's Byzantine-rite Catholics into Romanian Orthodox and Greek-Catholics.

The Rise of the Romanian Orthodox Church. Because of the influence of the Bulgarian Church, Romanians had begun to embrace the Byzantine rite by the 10th century. They also imitated their Bulgarian rulers by adhering to the EASTERN SCHISM. When the Danubian principalities of Walachia and Moldavia were formed in the 14th century, the rulers requested the patriarch of Constantinople to erect a metropolis in their country. In 1359 Walachia received a metropolitan, who resided in Arges (later in Bucharest). Moldavia gained a metropolitan c. 1400; his residence was in Suceava (later in Iași). During the 15th century the Romanian principalities battled the Turks, and Pope Sixtus IV dubbed Prince Stephan the Great (1457–1504) an "athlete of Christ" for his valiant defense of Christianity during this period. While attempts were made to unite the Romanian Orthodox and the Latin-rite Church prior to the Ecumenical Council of FLORENCE they were ultimately unsuccessful.

Under the protection of the powerful Turkish princes of Walachia and Moldavia, Orthodox Christianity flourished during the 17th and 18th centuries. Rich gifts and foundations enabled monasteries at Tismana, Voditza, Neamt, Putna and elsewhere to become religious and cultural centers. From 1711 to 1821 the Turks sent Greek princes (phanariots) to rule Walachia and Moldavia; these men became generous benefactors of the Patriarchate of Constantinople and of the Greek monasteries at Mt. Athos, Mt. Sinai, Jerusalem and elsewhere. On the whole, Greek influence in the Romanian principalities increased under the phanariots, and by 1863 Greek monasteries possessed one-fifth of the land; their holdings were later secularized (see CONSTANTINOPLE, PATRIARCHATE OF; ORTHODOX CHURCH OF; ROMANIAN RITE).

In 1721 the Diocese of Făgăraș was erected for Romanian-rite Catholics. Its seat was transferred to Blaj in 1738, under Bishop Innocent Micu-Klein (1728–51), who also worked for the political and cultural emancipation of the Romanian people. He and his successors founded several schools that would become centers of the Romanian national renaissance. In 1777 the Diocese of Oradea Mare (which had been a ritual vicariate since 1748) was erected. In 1853 Pius IX created an ecclesiastical province for Catholics of the Romanian rite. FĂGĂRAȘ (with the addition of the historical name Alba Iulia) became the metropolitan see, with Oradea Mare, Gherla and Lugoj newly founded as suffragan sees.

The Romanian Orthodox Church declared itself autocephalous and independent of the Patriarchate of Constantinople in 1865, and this status was finally acknowledged in 1885. The metropolitan of Bucharest thenceforth held the title of primate. At that time Romanian-rite churches existed in Transylvania and Bukovina, which were part of Austria-Hungary. After the Kingdom of Romania was formed following World War I, the ecclesiastical union of the region quickly followed. On May 4, 1925 the Romanian patriarchate was erected, composed of five metropolitanates embracing 18 dioceses. The head of this autocephalous church was called archbishop of Bucharest, metropolitan of Ungrovalachia, and patriarch of Romania.

Latin Catholics. During the Middle Ages, following the slavonisation of the Bulgarian overlords, attempts were made to reintroduce the LATIN CHURCH into Romania. Franciscan and Dominican missionaries worked there from the 13th century. While several bishoprics were established, including Milcovia (1228), Severin (1369), Sereth (1371), Arges (1380), Civitas Moldaviensis (Baia, 1420) and Bacău (1611), these sees were short-lived, and some never had resident bishops. In the 17th century care of the Latin Catholic minority residing in Moldavia was entrusted to Conventual Franciscans under a vicar apostolic, and care of those in Walachia, to Passionists. A Catholic bishop resided in Bucharest from 1792. In 1883, after emigration from Austria-Hungary, Italy and other countries had increased the numbers of Latin Catholics in Romania, the Archdiocese of Bucharest for Walachia and Dobruja and the Diocese of Iași for Moldavia were erected.

Roman Catholic Church of Jassy, Romania. (©Hulton-Deutsch Collection/CORBIS)

In Transylvania, which was part of Hungary after 1003, Latin Catholicism was solidly rooted. The region's Hungarians, Siculs (Székelyek) and other related ethnic groups were joined in the 13th century by Germans from Saxony. For these Latin Catholics the Diocese of Transylvania was erected in 1103 with its seat in Alba Iulia. When Transylvania became a vassal principality under Turkish rule in the 16th century, most of Transylvania's Catholics embraced Protestantism: the Germans became Lutherans; the Hungarians, Calvinists; and the Siculs, Unitarians. In 1558 the Catholic bishop was exiled. In the provinces of Criana and Banat (in the southwestern part of modern Romania), Csanad became a diocese in 1035, and Oradea Mare, in 1077. The See of Satu Mare was erected in 1804.

The hierarchical structure for all Latin-rite dioceses was eventually reorganized according to the Romanian Concordat (1927) by the papal bull Solemni conventione (June 5, 1930). The Diocese of Timișoara was created for Romanian Banat. The Dioceses of Satu Mare and Oradea Mare were united, with the episcopal residence in the former city. Bucharest became a metropolitan see, with Alba Iulia, Iași, Satu Mare, Oradea Mare and Timișoara as suffragans.

World War I and After

During World War I Romania fought on the side of the Allies. Although suffering many human losses, a decision reached through regional assemblies (1918) and international treaties following the war (1919–20) gave Romania Transylvania, Bukovina, Bessarabia, southern Dobruja and eastern Banat. Pressured by political allies to join the Axis powers during World War II, Romania was invaded by the USSR in 1944, and withdrew from the war. The loss of Bessarabia, northern Bukovina and southern Dobruja preceded the country's adoption of a new constitution on Dec. 30, 1947 as the Communist People's Republic. In 1965 it became the Romanian Socialist Republic, with political power in the hands of Nicolae Ceaușescu as first secretary until he assumed the title of president in 1974.

Romania Suffers Communist Repression. Both through the new constitution of 1948 and subsequent laws, the special privileges enjoyed by the country's churches were abolished. The communist government ended all church control in schools, and mandated that all churches must secure statutory approval before being allowed to function. The Concordat with the Vatican (July 17, 1948) was unilaterally abrogated, and in 1949 all religious orders were suppressed. Even more dramatically, the government decreed that the Romanian Greek-Catholic Church was illegal; its membership was incorporated into the Romanian Orthodox Church and its property either destroyed, put under state control, or transferred to the ORTHODOX CHURCH.

Romania's Communist government continued its antireligious policies unabated until December of 1989, affecting each of the nation's churches in different ways. All churches, even those in favor with the state, were closely supervised by the Department of Cults and were subjected to the brutal methods of the dreaded Securitate, the Romanian secret police.

The Romanian Orthodox Church. On May 24, 1948 Justinian Marina (1901–77) became patriarch of the Romanian Orthodox Church. Well known for his socialist views and a personal friend of the first secretary of the Romanian Communist Party, Justinian guided the Orthodox Church through an initial period of vicious Stalinist persecution which saw the nationalization of church property, the imprisonment of thousands of clergy, a reduction of the number of Orthodox dioceses to 12, and a reduction of the numbers of monks and nuns in the monasteries from over 7,000 in 1956 to 2,200 by 1975. Justinian later worked with communist leaders to establish a modus vivendi known as “The Romanian Solution.”

Justinian accepted the narrow boundaries drawn around his church by the state in return for government toleration of a certain level of ecclesial activity. Even under a repressive political regime, he was able to oversee monastic reforms, improve the level of education of the clergy, and preserve many important historic churches, monasteries and other monuments.

Justinian led the Orthodox Church in a policy of accommodation during the Ceaușescu regime because Ceaușescu, who came to power in 1974, promoted a nationalist form of communism that included a role for the church in the life of the nation. Indeed, many Communist officials considered themselves Orthodox Christians.

Following Justinian’s death in 1977, Justin Moisescu was elected patriarch of the Romanian Orthodox Church. More academician than politician, Justin was criticized for bowing to the government’s decision to demolish some 24 churches and three monasteries in central Bucharest and for his handling of the defrocking and imprisonment of certain Orthodox priests opposed to the Ceaușescu regime. Even so, by 1985 the Romanian Orthodox was the most vigorous church in Eastern Europe, boasting 17,000,000 faithful (80 percent of the Romanian population). There were six seminaries and two theological institutes, one in Bucharest and one in Sibiu. High-quality theological journals were published, including three by the patriarchate itself and one by each of the five metropolitanates. In addition, the patriarchate was able to publish several volumes in a series of Romanian translations of the Philokalia, more than 30 in a projected series of 90 volumes of translations of patristic writings and an assortment of Bibles and other liturgical and theological works. In addition, the church published the theological contribution of Dumitru STĂNILOAE (1903–93), one of the most prominent Orthodox theologians of the 20th century.

Following Justin’s death in 1986 Teoctist Arăpașu, was elected patriarch. Teoctist had to contend with not only the destruction of more churches in Bucharest but even the government’s desire to demolish the patriarchal complex in the capital and transfer the see to Iași. Teoctist was able to direct the republication of the 1688 Bucharest Bible, an event that illustrated the central role the church played in standardizing the Romanian language and influencing Romanian culture. Making several trips abroad, Teoctist became the first Romanian patriarch in history to visit a Roman pontiff when he met John Paul II in Rome on Jan. 5, 1989. (It was later revealed that the patriarch had acted against the wishes of the government in meeting with the pope.)

Latin Church Suffers under Communism. While the Orthodox Church managed to prosper under communism, such was not the case with the Latin Church. The declaration of the Communist People’s Republic in Romania on Dec. 30, 1947 was quickly followed by repressive policies focused against all minority religions, among them the Latin Church. Stalinist policies included abrogating the Concordat of July 17, 1948, closing down all Latin dioceses but Alba Iulia and Iași, and engaging in a policy of religious persecution. Five of the six Latin bishops were immediately imprisoned, with the last sentenced to 18 months in prison in 1951; several would die while incarcerated. Priests refusing to convert to the Orthodox faith were first imprisoned, then freed and dispersed. By 1965 Alba Iulia would be the sole diocese with a Latin bishop, and many Romanian Catholics had fled abroad, 7,000 making their way to the United States. To provide pastoral care for these refugees, a titular bishop resident in Rome was appointed in 1960.

Although the government severely restricted its activity, it continued to tolerate the Latin Church because of Romania’s need to maintain good relations with its communist neighbors, countries to which most Roman Catholics were ethnically linked. The diocese of Timișoara in the Banat comprised predominantly ethnic Germans, while dioceses in Transylvania (Alba Iulia, Oradea Mare and Satu Mare) were mostly Hungarian. The Latin Catholics in the Archdiocese of Bucharest and the Diocese of Iași were mostly ethnic Romanians or, according to some theories, Romanianized Hungarians called Ceangai.

The predominantly German diocese of Timișoara faced special problems because of the Ceaușescu government’s decision to allow the emigration of ethnic Germans from Romania upon payment of a price by the West or East German government. Between 1977 and 1992 the number of ethnic Germans living in Romania fell from 359,000 to 119,000, drastically reducing the number of Roman Catholics in the diocese. Of the 210 diocesan priests present in 1967 only 89 remained by 1992.

Many of the problems plaguing the Roman Catholic Church were related to the situation of the Hungarian minority in Transylvania: catechisms and prayer books in Hungarian were unavailable until 1976, and Bibles until 1980. In spite of Vatican II's sanction of the use of the vernacular in the liturgy, Mass in Romanian was forbidden by the government outside Moldavia and Bucharest until 1978.

In line with its efforts to persecute the Church, the government prevented Catholic bishops from leaving Romania to attend Vatican II, and banned access to the conciliar documents for many years. Limited contacts with the Holy See were resumed only after a 1967 visit to Romania by Cardinal König of Vienna. Still, Romania was the only Eastern bloc government to decline sending an official delegation to the installation of John Paul II in 1978.

During the four decades of communist rule, government-sponsored repression occasionally eased. Closed seminaries in Alba Iulia and Iași were reopened in 1952 and 1956 respectively, and by the mid-1970s they were allowed to receive as many students as they wished. However, such permissiveness was only temporary; in 1982 the government imposed a limit that required 20 of the 192 students at Alba Iulia to be expelled. In 1948 there were 1,180 Latin priests in Romania; by 1988 there were only 800, 60 percent of them over the age of 60. Besides three small, token communities that were not allowed to receive novices, religious orders were banned during the communist years.

After the repressive Ceaușescu regime took power in 1974, limited progress was made on the appointment of Latin bishops (Alba Iulia was the only Catholic diocese with an ordinary by 1965). In 1972 Antal Jakab was ordained coadjutor with right of succession to Bishop Aaron Marton of Alba Iulia; he succeeded in 1980. In 1981 Lajos Balint was appointed auxiliary; he became bishop after Jakab's retirement in 1991. In 1983 the Holy See was allowed to appoint priests as ordinaries ad nutum Sanctae Sedis of the dioceses of Timișoara and Oradea Mare, and later for Iași. In 1984 the pope was able to name a Latin bishop for Romania for the first time since 1950 when he appointed Bishop Ioan Robu as apostolic administrator of the Archdiocese of Bucharest.

Romanian Greek-Catholic Church Outlawed. The fate of the Byzantine-rite Greek-Catholic Church under Romania's Communist government was much worse than it was for the Latin Church. A mock Greek-Catholic synod was staged that abolished the Church's union with Rome on Oct. 21, 1948. On Dec. 1, 1948 communists issued a decree formally dissolving the Greek-Catholic Church and confiscated all its property, turning most of its 2,588 churches within 1,794 parishes over to the Romanian Orthodox Church. All six Greek Catholic bishops were arrested on the night of Dec. 29–30 1948. Five of them died in prison; the sixth, Bishop Juliu Hossu of Cluj-Gherla, was released from prison in 1964, but placed under house arrest at Caldarusani Orthodox monastery near Bucharest, where he died in 1970. In 1973 Pope Paul VI announced that he had created Hossu a cardinal in pectore in 1969.

A Greek-Catholic hierarchy continued, however, in the underground. Before he was expelled from the country in 1950, the last papal representative, U.S. Archbishop Gerald Patrick O'Hara, secretly ordained five Greek-Catholic bishops. However, the communist Securitate broke into the nunciature, obtained a list of these bishops, and later imprisoned all of them. Some were released in 1964 and three were still alive in 1989.

Until 1989 Communist authorities maintained the position that the Greek-Catholic Church had freely and spontaneously asked for reunion with the Orthodox Church, and that it had simply ceased to exist. The Romanian Orthodox Church officially supported this position. In reality, the brutal suppression of the Greek-Catholic Church was strongly resisted and even occasioned heroic defiance of the regime.

Although a few Greek Catholics attended Latin liturgies, most continued to frequent their former parishes where, although they had officially become Orthodox, little had changed. There were also a few clandestine priests with secular jobs who met secretly with small groups to celebrate the sacraments, mostly in private homes, throughout the persecutions. The Securitate knew the existence of these groups, but as time went on they were tolerated as long as they stayed out of public view. The underground bishops even succeeded in training and ordaining a few men to the priesthood. Early in Ceaușescu's regime the surviving bishops made repeated requests for the reinstatement of their church, and in 1980 they even appealed to the Madrid Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe.

The Fall of Communism. In December of 1989 Romania's communist government toppled, the political overthrow of Ceaușescu signaling the end of four decades of repressive rule. The new Romanian Constitution, adopted in December of 1991, guaranteed religious freedom. Article 29 prohibited any restriction of religious beliefs, guaranteed freedom of conscience and stated that "all religions shall be free and organized in accordance with their own statutes, under the terms laid down by law.” It also forbade all forms of enmity among religions and declared that while religious cults are autonomous from the state, they also enjoy support from it, “including the facilitation of religious assistance in the army, in hospitals, prisons, homes and orphanages.” The right of parents to provide for the religious education their children was also assured.

While communists would continue to hold political offices in Romania for several more years, their power was greatly diminished, and their increasingly liberal social policies ushered in a new era for Romania’s churches, allowing them to function freely for the first time in decades. However, these new freedoms also led to interchurch conflicts, some of which would remain unresolved into the next century.

Orthodox Church Issues Apologies. The end of Ceaușescu’s regime triggered a mixed response in the Romanian Orthodox Church. While the Church began the difficult task of rebuilding, it also had to deal with strong criticism over its public support of the Communist government. The Holy Synod met on Jan. 10, 1990, apologized for those “who did not always have the courage of the martyrs,” and expressed regret that it had been “necessary to pay the tribute of obligatory and artificial praises addressed to the dictator” to ensure certain liberties. It also annulled all ecclesiastical sanctions it had been compelled to impose on members of the clergy for political reasons. In the face of harsh criticism for his collaboration with the Communist regime—it was even alleged that he oversaw an information exchange between confessional priests and the communist Securitate—Patriarch Teoctist resigned his office on Jan. 18, 1990. However, in early April Teoctist was asked to resume his duties by unanimous decision of the Holy Synod, which reasoned that his presence was valuable in maintaining continuity in the face of political change.

A few days after the fall of the Ceaușescu regime, a “Reflection Group for the Renewal of the Church” was established in Bucharest. Its seven clerical and lay members set out to interpret what they saw to be a growing desire among the Orthodox faithful for change and renewal in the life of the church, and to initiate a dialogue with the Church leadership to help it overcome the current “spiritual impasse.” On June 7, 1990 a member of this group, 38-year-old auxiliary bishop of Timișoara, Daniel Ciobotea, was elected metropolitan archbishop of Iași, the second-ranking post in the Romanian Orthodox hierarchy. His election to the see from which all previous Romanian patriarchs had been taken was part of an effort to reform the Church and provide it with new and more vigorous leadership.

In September of 1990 the Holy Synod approved important modifications to the basic statutes of the Patri-archate. It removed those sections providing for state interference in the Church’s affairs and declared the full autonomy of the Church from the State. At a meeting in January of 1993 it re-established two jurisdictions in areas that had been part of Romania before World War II: northern Bukovina (later in Ukraine) and Bessarabia (most of which became the independent republic of Moldova). This move sparked a confrontation with the Moscow patriarchate to which the Orthodox dioceses in those regions had belonged since World War II. Most Orthodox in those areas remained in newly established autonomous jurisdictions associated with the Russian Orthodox Church.

Communist Support Bolsters Demographics. In 1948, just prior to the country’s communist takeover, Romanian Orthodox Catholics had numbered close to ten million; Greek-Catholics, as the country’s second largest religion, 1,560,000; Latin Catholics 1,175,000; and Armenian Catholics 5,000. In 1992 a government census showed membership in the Romanian Orthodox Church at 19,802,389; Latin Catholics at 1,161,942, Greek-Catholics at 223,327, and Armenian Catholics at 2,023. By early 1993 the number of Orthodox seminaries in the country had risen to 18, while the theological institutes that had been allowed to function in Bucharest and Sibiu were reintegrated into their respective university faculties and ten other theology faculties were set up around the country. Monastic life once again thrived and, for the first time since 1948 churches began to engage in organized charitable activity, such as administering orphanages, hospitals and retirement homes. By the year 2000 1,628 parishes administered to Romania’s Catholic faithful, while between the Byzantine and Latin Catholic Churches 1,590 priests, 180 brothers and 1,196 sisters served their faith.

Another result of the fall of Communism was the reactivation of banned Orthodox lay movements. Among the most important of these was the Oastea Domnului (Army of the Lord). Founded by Josif Trifa in 1923, this renewal movement emphasized evangelization, personal morality, an experiential relationship with God and Bible study. It grew quickly, and was absorbed into the structures of the Orthodox Church in the 1930s. During the Communist years the movement maintained a secret membership of perhaps as many as 500,000. While it again received the blessing of the Orthodox Church after resurfacing in 1990, some of its members had established connections with Protestant evangelical groups.

Latin Church Works to Rebuild. The downfall of the Ceaușescu regime affected the Latin-rite and Orthodox Churches differently. With sanctions against it now lifted, the Holy See acted quickly to provide a new hierarchy for the Latin Church in Romania. On March 14, 1990 the pope named bishops for all six dioceses in the country and a new auxiliary for Alba Iulia. On Sept. 29, 1991 the diocese of Alba Iulia was made an archdiocese immediately subject to the Holy See. Romania and the Holy See announced the re-establishment of diplomatic relations on May 15, 1992. Archbishop John Bukovsky was nominated apostolic nuncio on August 18, and the building of the apostolic nunciature was returned and officially reopened three months later. The statutes for a Romanian Catholic Bishops' Conference that included Latins and Greeks were approved ad experimentum on March 16, 1991, and Greek-Catholic Metropolitan (later Cardinal) Alexandru Todea was elected its first president.

The new freedoms given the Roman Catholic Church in Romania allowed an increasing number of vocations to take place. Seminaries at Alba Iulia (for Hungarian- and German-speaking candidates) and Iași (for Romanian-speakers) experienced a major influx of students. The same was true for the various male and female religious orders that resumed activity in the country. As had been its tradition, the majority of Latin Catholics continued to be Romanians of Hungarian descent living in the Transylvania region.

Greek-Catholic Repression Ends. The repression endured by the Greek-Catholic Church finally came to an end after the downfall of the Ceaușescu regime. A few days after the revolt, on Jan. 2, 1990, the new Romanian government abrogated the 1948 decree that had outlawed the Greek-Catholic Church. The three surviving underground bishops, Ioan Ploscaru, Ioan Chertes and Alexandru Todea, emerged from hiding, and 540 priests also came forward, about 100 of them elderly.

On March 14, 1990 Pope John Paul II reconstituted the Greek-Catholic hierarchy by naming bishops to all five dioceses. Todea, named metropolitan archbishop of Făgăraș and Alba Iulia, would be created a cardinal in June of 1991. Ploscaru became Bishop of Lugoj, while Chertes, by now advanced in years, bore the personal title of archbishop until his death on Jan. 31, 1992. In official documents the Greek-Catholic Church became the "Romanian Church United with Rome." In 1997 the Church held a provisional council in which Greek-Catholic leaders worked to set up formal statutes, and worked to heed the Pope's call to all Eastern churches to "respond to the new needs of the faithful, who have finally been delivered from the hands of oppression, but now are assailed with new mirages and must answer new challenges."

In January of 1994 the Congregation for the Eastern Churches sponsored a meeting of the bishops and other representatives of the Romanian Greek-Catholic Church in Rome. A final document was adopted treating the organization of the eparchies, the formation of the clergy, the liturgy, catechetics, religious life and ecumenical relations. The participants unanimously called for the speedy canonization of those martyred for the faith during the persecutions. On July 20, 1994 Pope John Paul II accepted the resignation of 82-year-old Cardinal Todea and appointed Bishop Lucian Mureșan of Maramureș to succeed him as Greek-Catholic metropolitan.

Religious Rebirth Sparks Inter-Church Controversy. The resurgence of the Greek-Catholic Church in particular was accompanied by a confrontation with the Romanian Orthodox Church. Although the government had abolished the 1948 decree dissolving the Church and now promised to return all church property in state hands, it did not resolve the issue of ownership of churches that had been given to the Orthodox Church. In 1990 a joint Orthodox and Greek-Catholic committee was formed to oversee these property disputes.

The Greek-Catholic Church insisted that all 2,600 church properties confiscated in 1948 be returned as a matter of justice, a position they called restitutio in integrum. However, the Romanian Orthodox Church held that since the demographic situation had changed substantially since 1948, any redistribution of churches must allow for the pastoral needs of both communities, based on the results of a census and the deliberations of a joint commission. The hardening of positions created such an impasse that by March of 1993 the Greek-Catholic Church had regained only 66 of its former churches. The situation was complicated by the Greek-Catholic rejection of the results of the 1992 census, according to which only one percent of the population (228,377) belonged to this church. Statistics published in the 1993 Annuario Pontificio indicated a total of 1,842,486, while some Greek-Catholic sources claimed almost 3,000,000 members.

Although Greek Catholics later reduced their demands to under 300 properties, an atmosphere of mistrust and mutual recrimination grew between the two churches. The Orthodox portrayed Greek Catholics as less than fully patriotic and recalled the traditional identity between the Romanian people and the Orthodox Church. Some even drew a connection between the existence of the Greek-Catholic Church and a sinister effort to "magyarize" the Romanian population of Transylvania. For their part, Greek Catholics accused the Orthodox of willful collaboration with the Communists, of wholesale corruption and of perpetuating the Stalinist oppression of their church. The Greek-Catholic hierarchy also expressed fierce opposition to the work of the international commission for dialogue between the Catholic and Orthodox Churches that attempted to overcome the misun-understandings that arose in the wake of the re-emergence of the Greek/Byzantine Catholic Churches in Eastern Europe.

Romania Moves into New Millennium

In spite of the problems faced during its country's recovery from communist repression, the Romanian Orthodox Church was able to preserve the close links that traditionally existed between it and the majority of the Romanian people and remained the church chosen to preside over government ceremonies requiring prayer. Although its activity was hindered by the catastrophic economic conditions that followed the fall of Ceaușescu, the freedom of religion insured by Romania's new constitution enabled the Orthodox Church to reassert its prominent role in the country. While its spokesmen expressed concern over the "aggressive proselytism" of various minority Protestant faiths, the Romanian Orthodox Church has sought to establish the kind of relationship with the state, as well as with other churches, that would benefit a postcommunist and increasingly westernized nation.

Disputes over property continued to shadow Romania into the new millennium. Although by February of 1999 an agreement had been reached between competing church claimants that disputed buildings would be shared until the court resolved their ownership, fights and lock-outs continued sporadically. Not only Greek Catholics, but also Roman Catholics, Protestants and other faiths looked to the government for help in the restoration of church structures that had been closed by the former communist regime. By 2000 most of these sites, still in the hands of the government, had yet to be restored. In addition, secular structures that had been converted into schools, post offices and other public buildings under the previous government, remained in the hands of the government despite requests either for monetary compensation or for their return to church ownership.

By the mid-1990s Pope John Paul II had become an active supporter of the Catholic Church's efforts to regain confiscated property. On May 7, 1999 he visited Bucharest and called upon Catholic bishops to be "builders of communion" in an effort to rebuild Romanian society. The Pope's visit to Bucharest marked the first papal visit to a predominately Orthodox nation.

Anger toward the Romanian Orthodox Church for its collaboration with Communist oppressors gradually healed over time, in part due to the intervention of Pope John Paul II. In February of 2000 Patriarch Teoctist also made a public apology that acted to heal the breach between Orthodox and Greek Catholics, noting "I personally ask for forgiveness and I am doing it now because I didn't have enough courage before.'" The Romanian Greek-Catholic Church began to regain its footing. Seminaries appeared in Cluj, Baia Mare and Oradea, and Greek-Catholic theological institutes were established in Cluj, Oradea and at the historic center of the church at Blaj. The cathedral at Blaj, along with the episcopal residence and seminary complex, was regained in October of 1990. By 2000, 142 of the 300 churches requested to be returned from control of Orthodox congregations had reverted back to Greek-Catholic ownership.

Romanian Prime Minister Mugur Isarescu and the republican government in place in 2000 worked to maintain religious freedom within Romania, and also offered tangible support to minority churches in their efforts to restore their infrastructure. In 1999 over a million dollars in governmental grants were awarded to the country's Roman Catholic and Greek-Catholic Church to aid in church construction efforts. Although the government continued to support Romania's Catholic churches, many minority faiths continued to battle for recognition under the requirements imposed by the State Secretariat for Religious Cults.

See Also: EASTERN CHURCHES; ORTHODOX CHURCHES; CATHOLIC CHURCH (EASTERN CATHOLIC).

Bibliography: R. W. SETON-WATSON, A History of the Romanians (Cambridge, Eng. 1934). N. IORGA, Histoire des Roumains et de la Romanité orientale, 4 v. (Bucharest 1937); Istoria Bisericii românești, 2 v. (2d ed. Bucharest 1929–32). J. ZEILLER, Les Origines chrétiennes dans les provinces danubiennes (Paris 1918). A. TĂUTU et al., Biserica Română unită (Madrid 1952). G. ROSU and M. VASILIU, comps., Romania: Churches and Religion, ed. v. GSOVSKI (Mid-European Law Project, New York 1955). F. POPAN and Č. S. DRAŠKOVIC, Orthodoxie heute in Rumänien und Jugoslawien, ed. K. RUDOLF (Vienna 1960). Rom und die Patriarchate des Ostens, eds., W. DE VRIES et al. (Freiburg 1963). T. BEESON, Discretion and Valour: Religious Conditions in Russia and Eastern Europe (London 1982). J. BROUN, "The Latin-rite Roman Catholic Church of Romania," in Religion in Communist Lands, 12 (1984) 168–184. V. GEORGESCU, The Romanians: A History (New York 1991). M. PACURARIU, Istoria Bisericii Ortodoxe Române, 3 v. (Bucharest 1980–81). A. SCARFE, "The Romanian Orthodox Church," in Eastern Christianity and Politics in the Twentieth Century, ed. P. RAMEY, (Durham, NC 1988) 208–31. B. SPULER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 5:1211–15. E. HERMANN and O. BĂRLEA, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, eds., J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 9:95–99. Bilan du Monde. Encyclopédie catholique du monde chrétien, 2 v. (2d ed. Tournai 1956) 2:744–751.

[M. LACKO/R. G. ROBERSON/EDS.]

ROMANIAN CATHOLIC CHURCH (EASTERN CATHOLIC)

Officially known as "The Romanian Church United with Rome." Although there had been small but unstable unions of the Romanian Orthodox with the Church of Rome, such as the brief union brought about by Ioanitză Asan in 1204, a stable union between part of the Romanians and the See of Rome was realized only at the end of the 17th century, when the Romanians of Transylvania embraced the holy union together with their bishops, Theophilus (1697) and Athanasius (1698–1713). Various historical and social circumstances determined this union. After the withdrawal of the Turks from central-eastern Europe, Transylvania fell under the domination of Catholic Austria in 1688. The Jesuit Fathers, who had been expelled at the time of the Protestant supremacy, returned to their houses in Cluj and Alba Julia and thus approached the local Romanian bishop. The economic and social conditions of the Romanians of Transylvania were very poor. They were overburdened with taxes for war expenditures, deprived of civil and social rights while their Orthodox faith was spurned, and humiliated by Protestant proselytism. In order to avoid this situation, they saw no solution other than that of turning toward communion with the Apostolic See, hoping that, by the new union, they and especially the clergy would enjoy the rights and privileges that were reserved by the constitution of the Transylvanian principality to the four privileged religions (Catholic, Lutheran, Calvinist, and Unitarian). Emperor Leopold I, by a decree issued on April 14, 1698, promised that the privileges of the four religions would be granted to those who joined one of them. The outcome was that, in the general synods of 1697 under Bishop Theophilus and of 1698 under Bishop Athanasius, the clergy decided in favor of communion with the Roman Church. The synod of Sept. 5, 1700, in which about 2,000 members of the clergy and laity took part definitively, ratified the union and accepted the four dogmatic points of the Council of FLORENCE: primacy, unleavened bread as a legitimate matter for the Holy Eucharist, existence of purgatory, and the doctrine of the filioque. In liturgical and disciplinary areas they kept their own (Romanian) rite. In particular they were authorized to elect their own bishop-metropolitan as did the Romanian ORTHODOX CHURCH and to keep the Romanian vernacular as the liturgical language.

Opposition to the union came from the Transylvanian landlords who suffered heavy economic losses by the emancipation of the Orthodox priests and peasants. But the fiercest opposition came from the hierarchy of the Orthodox Church of Serbia, especially from the archbishop of Karlovitz, who wanted to keep the Romanian Orthodox Christians of Transylvania under his jurisdiction. Notwithstanding all these difficulties, the holy union did not perish but, thanks to the zeal and courageous activity of its bishops, became stronger.

Organization. The Catholic Romanians in 1700 numbered 200,000. To organize these faithful into an ecclesiastical diocese, Pope Innocent XIII in 1721 established the first Romanian Catholic Diocese of Făgăraș, which later was transferred to Blaj, where it is today. Bishop Innocent Micu-Klein (1728–51) strove heroically to gain for his people political, social, and cultural rights. He was forced to abandon his see and finally abdicated. Both he and his successor, Petru Pavel Aron (1752–64), raised the intellectual level of their people by opening secondary schools and a diocesan seminary and by maintaining a printing press that published liturgical, theological, and historical books. Thus the clergy and people were well organized through solid instruction received through schools and published literature. This fostered in the people a militant patriotism that yearned for the day of liberation from their Hungarian masters and complete reunion with their fellow Romanians. When the Austrian-Hungarian Empire was dissolved in 1918, the Romanians Catholics found themselves nationally united with the Romanian Orthodox but religiously a minority. Yet in spite of opposition from the Orthodox, the Romanian Catholic Church grew steadily.

Canonical Structure. The Romanian Catholic Church was once one of the most prosperous and well organized of the Eastern Catholic Churches. Its discipline and canonical structure are regulated by the decrees of three provincial councils held at Blaj in 1872, 1882, and 1900. The First Council of Blaj treated in ten chapters: the Catholic faith and the union that had as its basis the union of Florence (1439) and the unionistic synod at Alba Julia (1700); the Church, including the primacy of the Roman pontiff, the rights and duties of metropolitans, bishops, priests and cathedral chapters, rural deans, protopopes protopriests, and pastors; ecumenical, provincial, and diocesan synods; ecclesiastical benefices and their conferment; the Sacraments; divine worship and the liturgy; life and discipline of the clergy; the Order of Saint Basil; schools of various types; and ecclesiastical processes and tribunals. The Second Council of Blaj treated in six chapters: the Catholic faith, reproducing the formula prescribed by Urban VIII and Benedict XIV; statutes of the metropolitan chapter approved with the bull of erection of the province; religious orders of men and women; a detailed instruction on the procedure to be followed in matrimonial cases, as well as procedural norms for civil and penal processes; and norms on the administration of schools and ecclesiastical goods. The Third Council of Blaj reaffirmed the rights and integrity of the Province of Alba Julia and Făgăraș, considered as autonomous and independent, subject only to the Roman Apostolic See; the council also established norms concerning divine worship, insisting on the modern Romanian language as the approved liturgical language, and other norms regarding liturgical ceremonies, sacred buildings, and sacred vestments. The Holy See approved these enactments.

[L. TAUTU/R. ROBERSON/EDS.]

Romanian Catholic Church in the Communist and Post-Communist Years. The fate of the Romanian Byzantine Catholic Church in Romania under Communism was much worse than it was for the Romanian Latin Catholics. The government staged a mock Greek Catholic synod that abolished the union with Rome on Oct. 12, 1948. On Dec. 1, 1948, the government issued a decree that formally dissolved the Greek Catholic Church and confiscated all its property, turning most of its 2,588 churches within 1,794 parishes over to the Romanian Orthodox Church. All six Greek Catholic bishops were arrested on the night of Dec. 29 to 30, 1948. Five of them died in prison. The sixth, Bishop Iuliu Hossu of Cluj-Gherla, was released from prison in 1964, but placed under house arrest at Caldarusani Orthodox monastery near Bucharest, where he died in 1970. In 1973 Pope Paul VI announced that he had created Hossu a cardinal in pectore in 1969.

A Greek Catholic hierarchy continued, however, in the underground. Before he was expelled from the country in 1950, the last papal representative, the American Archbishop Gerald Patrick O'Hara, had secretly ordained five Greek Catholic Bishops. However, the government Securitate broke into the nunciature, obtained a list of these bishops and later imprisoned all of them. Some were released in 1964 and three were still alive in 1989.

Until 1989 the Communist authorities held the absurd contention that the Greek Catholic Church had freely and spontaneously asked for reunion with the Orthodox Church, and that it had simply ceased to exist. The Romanian Orthodox Church officially supported this position. In fact, the brutal suppression of the Greek Catholic Church was strongly resisted and even occasioned heroic defiance of the regime.

Although a few Greek Catholics attended Latin liturgies, most of them continued to frequent their former parishes where, although they had officially become Orthodox, little had changed. However, there were a few clandestine priests with secular jobs who met secretly with small groups to celebrate the sacraments, mostly in private homes, throughout the persecutions. The existence of these groups was known to the Securitate, but in the later years they were tolerated as long as they stayed out of public view. The underground bishops even succeeded in training and ordaining a few men to the priesthood. In the late 1970s the surviving bishops made repeated requests to President Ceaușescu for the reinstatement of their church, and in 1980 they even appealed to the Madrid Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe.

This situation changed only after the downfall of the Ceaușescu regime. A few days after the revolt, on Jan. 2, 1990, the new Romanian government abrogated the 1948 decree that had outlawed the Greek Catholic Church. The three surviving underground bishops, Ioan Ploscaru, Ioan Chertes, and Alexandru Todea, emerged from hiding, and 540 priests also came forward, about 100 of them elderly.

On March 14, 1990, Pope John Paul II reconstituted the Greek Catholic hierarchy by naming bishops to all five dioceses. Todea was named metropolitan archbishop of Făgăraș and Alba Iulia (he was created a cardinal in June 1991), and Ploscaru Bishop of Lugoj. Chertes, an elderly man in retirement, was given the personal title of archbishop. He died on Jan. 31, 1992. In official documents the Greek Catholic Church now calls itself "The Romanian Church United With Rome."

The Congregation for the Eastern Churches sponsored a meeting of the bishops and other representatives of the Romanian Greek Catholic Church in Rome from Jan. 17 to 22, 1994. A final document was adopted treating the organization of the eparchies, the formation of the clergy, the liturgy, catechetics, religious life, and ecumenical relations. The participants unanimously called for the speedy canonization of those martyred for the faith during the persecutions. On July 20, 1994, Pope John Paul II accepted the resignation of 82-year-old Cardinal Todea and appointed Bishop Lucian Mureșan of Maramureș to succeed him as Greek Catholic metropolitan.

The rebirth of the Greek Catholic Church was accompanied by a confrontation with the Romanian Orthodox Church. This was due to the fact that although the government abolished the 1948 decree dissolving the church and promised to return its former property now in state hands, it did not resolve the issue of ownership of churches given to the Orthodox Church.

The Greek Catholic Church insisted that all the property confiscated in 1948 be returned as a matter of justice, a position they called restitutio in integrum. However, the Romanian Orthodox Church held that since the demographic situation had changed substantially since 1948, any redistribution of churches must allow for the pastoral needs of both communities, based on the results of a census and the deliberations of a joint commission. The hardening of positions created an impasse, such that by March 1993 the Greek Catholic Church had regained only 66 of its former churches. The situation was complicated by the Greek Catholic rejection of the results of the 1992 census, according to which only 1% of the population (228,377) belonged to this church. The 1948 figure had been 1,560,000. Statistics published in the 1993 Annuario Pontificio indicate a total of 1,842,486, while some Greek Catholic sources claim almost 3,000,000 members.

An atmosphere of mistrust and mutual recrimination exists between the two churches. The Orthodox portray the Greek Catholics as less than fully patriotic and recall the traditional identity between the Romanian people and the Orthodox Church. Some even draw a connection between the existence of the Greek Catholic Church and a sinister effort to “magyarize” the Romanian population of Transylvania. For their part, the Greek Catholics accuse the Orthodox of willful collaboration with the Communists, of wholesale corruption, and of perpetuating the Stalinist oppression of their church. The Greek Catholic hierarchy has also expressed fierce opposition to the work of the international commission for dialogue between the Catholic and Orthodox Churches that has attempted to overcome the misunderstandings that arose in the wake of the re-emergence of the Byzantine Catholic Churches in Eastern Europe.

Because of these tensions, the Catholic Church in Romania has been reluctant to engage in ecumenical projects that include the Orthodox. In late 1990, a Romanian Council of Churches was created, but neither the Latin nor Greek Catholic Churches took part in the initiative.

The Greek Catholic Church has set up seminaries in Cluj, Baia Mare, and Oradea, and there are now Greek Catholic theological institutes in Cluj, Oradea, and the historic center of the church at Blaj. The cathedral at Blaj along with the episcopal residence and seminary complex was regained in October 1990.

The Romanian Catholic Church suffered greatly under communist rule. It was forcibly dissolved in 1948, its bishops arrested and jailed, and its property handed over to the Orthodox Church of Romania. It survived underground, emerging only after the fall of the Ceaușescu regime. The 1948 dissolution of the Romanian Catholic Church was set aside on Jan. 2, 1980, and the underground church was able to emerge into public life. The hierarchy of the Romanian Catholic Church was reestablished on March 14, 1990. The 1990s was a period of conflict between the Romanian Catholic and Orthodox Churches over return of churches and other properties that were seized in 1948.

Bibliography: D. ATTWATER, The Christian Churches of the East, v.1 Churches in Communion with Rome (Milwaukee 1961). E. IVÁNKA, “Romanian Catholics of the Byzantine Rite,” The East- ern Churches Quarterly 8 (1949–50) 153–62. I. RATIU, “The Communist Attack on the Catholic and Orthodox Churches in Romania,” ibid. 163–97. R. ROBERTSON, The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey, (6th ed. Rome 1999).

[R. ROBERSON]

ROMANO OF ROME

Dominican theologian; d. before May 28, 1273. Born of the noble Orsini family, he was a younger brother of Cardinal Matthew, nephew of the future NICHOLAS III, and cousin of Latino Malabranca. He probably entered the order in Rome and was later sent to Paris in 1266 to complete his theological studies. One sermon of his is dated Feb. 6, 1267. He studied under THOMAS AQUINAS during the latter’s second regency at Paris. He read the Sentences under Aquinas from 1270 to 1272, and succeeded him as master in 1272. From his unedited commentary on the Sentences it is evident that Romano was influenced by others besides St. Thomas, notably by St. BONAVENTURE, HANNIBALDUS DE HANNIBALDIS, and ROBERT KILWARDBY; he did not follow Aquinas, for example, in repudiating the Augustinian thesis of divine ILLUMINATION. He in turn influenced GILES OF ROME and JOHN (QUIDORT) of Paris.

Bibliography: P. GLORIEUX, Répertoire des maîtres en théologie de Paris au XIII^e siècle (Paris 1933–34) 1:129. J. QUÉTIF and ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum, 5 v. (Paris 1719–23); continued by R. COULON (Paris 1909–); repr. 2 v. in 4 (New York 1959) 1.1:263–264. G. SANTINELLO, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice–Rome 1957) 4:186. J. BEUMER, “Romanus de Roma, O.P., und seine theologische Einleitungslehre,” Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 25 (Louvain 1958) 329–351.

[P. GLORIEUX]

ROMANS, EPISTLE TO THE

The longest and theologically most significant epistle of the Pauline corpus. This article will discuss the epistle’s purpose and provenance, its authenticity and integrity, and its addressees; an outline and an analysis of its contents will then be given, followed by an explanation of its significance.

Purpose and provenance. The Epistle to the Romans is the least like a real letter of all the Pauline epistles because of its developed, treatise-like exposition of the gospel of Jesus Christ. It was written at the end of Paul’s third missionary journey, probably during the winter of c. A.D. 57–58, just before he was about to return to Jerusalem with the collection for the poor of the Jerusalem mother church (Rom 15.25–26) taken up in various Gentile churches that he had founded (in Macedonia, Achaia, and Galatia). This return to Jerusalem was for Paul the end of missionary work in the eastern Mediterranean area (15.19–20,23). The gesture of help from the Gentile churches where his work had been successful was intended to convince the Jewish Christians of Judea of the solidarity of Gentile Christians in the same spiritual blessings that they enjoyed and of the Gentiles' recognition of the debt owed by them. Having desired for some time to evangelize the West, Paul turned his gaze toward Spain and hoped to visit Rome en route (15.23–24). After the journey to Jerusalem, his hopes were to be realized at last. Accordingly, he was emboldened to write this letter, from Corinth, to introduce himself to the already existing Christian community of Rome in view of his impending visit. As he wrote, he was aware that the Roman Church had already been founded by someone else (15.20). He hoped, nevertheless, that even a brief sojourn there would have some salutary effect among the Christians of the capital, even as it had had among heathens elsewhere (1.13). However, conscious of his apostolic commission, he fashioned his letter of introduction into an extended exposition of his understanding of the GOSPEL (1.16–17), which he was eager to preach to people in Rome too.

Romans is not a summary of Christian doctrine, or Paul's "last will and testament," or even a complete sketch of his teaching, because some of his characteristic teachings are significantly absent from it (Church, Eucharist, resurrection of the body, eschatology). It is rather a presentation of his missionary reflections on the historic possibility of salvation now offered in the gospel to all human beings. Through faith in Christ Jesus, whose death and resurrection are proclaimed as the means that opened up a new mode of salvation, people can now be justified in God's sight—by grace and without any concern for "deeds of the Law" (3.20–24). In Romans Paul presents the vast implications of the gospel that have dawned on him as a result of his recent missionary endeavors in that phase of his apostolate now coming to a close. Romans resembles Galatians (see GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THE) in that it treats of justification and faith, of the relation of Christ to the Mosaic law (see LAW, MOSAIC), and of God's gracious and salvific uprightness. But while Galatians is a vehement letter, written in the heat of combat against a Judaizing error, Romans is an irenic, reflective presentation of much of the same doctrine with a slightly different emphasis and in a context devoid of polemics. Analogously, Galatians is to Romans as Colossians is to Ephesians.

Authenticity and integrity. Just as in antiquity, the Pauline authorship of Romans is almost universally admitted today. The few dissenting voices of the nineteenth century are no longer given serious consideration. Only in the case of the final doxology (16.25–27) is there a problem today. Its authenticity has been questioned (1) because of the uncertain, varying position it has in several manuscripts of Romans [after 16.23 in the Hesychian tradition and manuscript D; after 14.23 in the Koine tradition; after 15.33 in P⁴⁶ (oldest manuscript of Romans); after both 14.23 and 16.23 in manuscripts A, P; completely lacking in manuscript G and Marcion's text]; (2) because of its style—a long periodic sentence with vocabulary typical of liturgical hymns; (3) because of the mention of the divine "mystery" [see MYSTERY (IN THE BIBLE)] applied to the salvation of the Gentiles—an expression characteristic of later Pauline letters. Certainty in this matter is impossible; but one cannot exclude the possibility that the doxology is a later addition, added at the time of the formation of the Pauline corpus [J. Dupont, Revue Bénédictine 58 (1948) 3–22].

Literary illustration, "Epistle to the Romans: Saint Paul Preaching," 1526. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

A more problematic part of Romans is 16.1 to 16.23 (16.24 is not in the best Greek manuscripts and only repeats a part of 16.20). While the Pauline authorship of verses 1 to 23 is not normally contested, the question is often raised whether it belonged to the original form of Romans, since Marcion's text omitted chapters 15 and 16, and the oldest manuscript of Romans (P⁴⁶) puts the final doxology after 15.33. Furthermore, 16.1 to 16, or at least 16.1 to 16.2, reads like a letter of recommendation that Paul wrote for Phoebe, a DEACON of the church at Cenchreae (port of Corinth); it resembles ancient letters of introduction preserved in Greek papyri that begin abruptly with “I recommend” [see A. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East (London 1910) 226]. But are the greetings in 16.3 to 16.16 sent to the Roman community—or to the Ephesian church? According to a number of modern commentators (e.g. D. Schulz, R. Bultmann, E. Käsemann, G. Bornkamm, K. Lake, J. Moffatt), Rom 16.1 to 16.23 is really a fragment of a letter written by Paul to Ephesus, since Paul greets in it Prisca and Aquila, who had settled in Ephesus (Acts 18.18, 26; cf. 1 Cor 16.19; 2 Tm 4.19). He also salutes Epaenetus, “the first convert for Christ in Asia” (Rom 16.5), and at least 23 others by name. He is familiar with the groups that meet in various house-churches (16.5, 14, 15). Hence such commentators ask: Would Paul have known so many people in Rome and be so familiar with conditions there? Finally, the admonition in 16.17 to 16.20 is so different in tone from the rest of Romans that another group of people seems to be addressed here. None of these considerations, however, are strong enough to convince the majority of interpreters that Paul has written these verses with the Ephesian church in view. In particular, H. Gamble has shown that Romans would be a strange epistle in the Pauline corpus if 16.1 to 16.23 were not considered part of it (The Textual History of the Letter to the Romans, Studies and Documents 42; Grand Rapids, Mich. 1977).

Addressees. The problematic end of Romans (chap. 16) and the fact that the phrase “at Rome” (ἐν Ῥώμῃ, 1.7, 15) is missing in a few manuscripts (mainly G) have led some modern scholars to propose the view that Romans was really composed as a “circular letter” destined for more than one church [T. W. Manson, Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 31 (1948) 224–240; J. Munck, Paul and the Salvation of Mankind (London, 1959) 197–200]. Chapters 1 to 15 would have been sent only to Rome (with the doxology as in P⁴⁶), but the form with chapter 16 would have been sent to Ephesus. However, the omission of ἐν Ῥώμῃ in relatively unimportant text-witnesses and the other reasons advanced for this hypothesis have not been generally accepted.

The character of the Roman church was once much discussed as an important element in the understanding of this letter. Was it predominantly Jewish-Christian (T. Zahn, F. Leenhardt) or predominantly Gentile-Christian (Sanday-Headlam, M. J. Lagrange, S. Lyonnet, O. Michel)? Much of this discussion is idle, once it is realized that Paul writes to introduce himself to a community that he does not know personally. The only specific problem of the Roman church that apparently has been reported to him is that of the “weak” and the “strong” in 14.1

to 15.13. Otherwise he is presenting his reflections on the gospel that have been derived from his recent missionary endeavors and conflicts in the East. He writes as “an apostle” (1.1), as one “commissioned to urge all heathens to the obedience of faith” (1.5), as the “apostle of the Gentiles” (11.13). Consequently, he considers the Roman addressees as Christians converted mainly from paganism (1.6, 11–15; 11.13, 16–32), although he is aware of the mixed character of the community (4.1, 12; 9.10).

Outline.

- I. Introduction (1.1–15): Address and Greeting (1.1–7); Thanksgiving (1.8–9); Paul’s desire to come to Rome (1.10–15).
- II. Part I (1.16–11.36): Doctrinal Section: God’s gospel of Jesus Christ Our Lord.
 - A. Through the gospel God’s uprightness is revealed, justifying people of faith (1.16–4.25).
 1. The theme announced (1.16–17): The gospel is the powerful source of salvation for all disclosing God’s uprightness.
 2. The theme negatively explained (1.18–3.20): Without the gospel God’s wrath is manifested against all people.
 - a. Against heathens (1.18–32).
 - b. Against Jews—indeed, against all human beings (2.1–3.20).
 3. The theme positively explained (3.21–31): God’s uprightness toward all sinners is shown graciously through Christ and apprehended in faith.
 4. The theme illustrated in the Old Testament (4.1–25): Abraham was justified by faith, not by deeds.
 - B. The love of God assures salvation to those justified through faith (5.1–8.39).
 1. The theme announced (5.1–11): The justified Christian is reconciled to God and will be saved, sharing, with hope, in the risen life of Christ.
 2. The theme explained (5.12–8.39): The new Christian life brings a threefold liberation.
 - a. Freedom from sin and death (5.12–21).
 - b. Freedom from sin and self through baptism and union with Christ (6.1–23).
 - c. Freedom from the Law (7.1–25).
 3. The theme developed (8.1–39): Christian life is empowered by the Spirit.
 - C. Justification and Salvation through faith do not contradict God’s promises to Israel of old.
 1. Israel’s failure is not contrary to God’s control of human history (9.1–29).
 2. It comes from Israel’s own culpable refusal (9.30–10.21).

3. It is partial and temporary (11.1–36).
- III. Part II (12.1–15.13): Hortatory Section: The demands of upright life in Christ.
- A. Christian life must be a Spirit-guided worship paid to God (12.1–13.14).
- B. The duty of charity owed by the strong to the weak (14.1–15.13).
- IV. Personal News (15.14–33): Paul's apostolate and plans. Final blessing (15.33).
- V. Conclusion: Letter of Recommendation for Phoebe and greetings to various Roman Christians (16.1–23). [Doxology (16.25–27)]

Analysis of Contents. The opening formula, customary in a Pauline letter, incorporates phrases typical of the primitive KERYGMA (1.2–4) and key ideas of the letter itself (divine election, faith, gospel, salvation by Christ's death and resurrection). After invoking upon the Roman Christians his usual blessing of "grace and peace" (1.6–7), Paul apologizes in the "Thanksgiving" and prelude (1.8–15) for not having visited Rome earlier. He promises to come and preach God's gospel there too. Chapter 1.16 to 1.17 formulates Paul's main proposition: The gospel is God's power effecting the salvation of everyone who believes, Jew first and then Greek, for in it God's salvific uprightness is disclosed.

In the first part of the doctrinal section, the theme of the revelation of God's uprightness in the gospel is developed—at first antithetically. For those without the gospel, God's wrath is manifested against the universal impiety of human beings (1.18–3.20). Heathens, who have suppressed the truth about God and failed to honor and acknowledge Him who has made Himself perceptible in creation, incur this wrath inexcusably. They have been handed over consequently to the degrading pursuit of unnatural vice and indecent conduct (1.18–32). The Jew who listens to this indictment of heathen conduct may applaud, but he is really no better (2.1–3.9), for despite his possession and knowledge of the Mosaic law, he too incurs God's wrath for not observing it. God, indeed, shows no partiality. When at times pagans instinctively do some of the things that the Mosaic law prescribes, these are known to them, being written on their hearts. But then it would seem that the Jews are at a disadvantage despite their privileged heritage (3.1). Paul reassures them, but he quickly turns again to accuse them of infidelity, for "Jews and Greeks alike are under sin" (3.9), as Old Testament TESTIMONIA show. No one can boast, because in the sight of God no one becomes upright by observing the Mosaic law (3.20).

The first theme is now positively developed (3.21–28). God's uprightness has been disclosed quite independently of the Law—through faith in Christ. For though all people have sinned and are deprived of God's resplendent presence, God Himself has exposed Christ publicly as the means of expiating human sin [see EXPIATION (IN THE BIBLE)], and this justification takes place out of sheer benevolence [see GRACE (IN THE BIBLE)]. God did this to manifest His uprightness, to show that He was upright in making people of faith upright.

This theme is now illustrated from Scripture (4.1–25). A reflection on the Genesis story of Abraham, which differs from contemporary Jewish understanding of the patriarch's observance of the Mosaic law, explains how he became upright in God's sight through faith. He was justified, even before he was circumcised; and the promises God made to him were uttered long before the Mosaic law. So Abraham is the father of all those who come to justification through faith. The chapter ends with a significant proclamation of the role played by both the death and the resurrection of Christ in the justification of human beings.

A new theme is announced in 5.1 to 5.11: Justified Christians are reconciled to God and will be saved through the love of God made manifest in Christ. Through the Spirit poured into human hearts, the Christian is assured of the glory he or she will share. This theme is explained, first of all, in terms of a threefold freedom. As sin entered the world and affected all human beings through the transgression of one man (Adam), and death came in its wake, so through the obedience of one man (Christ, the Adam of the eschaton) came freedom from sin and death (5.12–21). In refuting an objection—that if this is so, then one should sin, so that God's grace might abound the more—Paul asserts the second freedom: freedom from sin and self through union with Christ Jesus (6.1–23). By Baptism the Christian has been identified with the death and resurrection of Christ. Risen now to a new life, the Christian cannot submit himself (his body, his flesh) to the reign of sin. The Christian's whole outlook is centered now on God alone. The third freedom is from the Mosaic law (7.1–25). Having died with Christ in Baptism, the Christian is one to whom the Mosaic law no longer applies. Despite its basic goodness, the Mosaic law never gave people the wherewithal to overcome the conflict that they sense within them. For while the mind acknowledges God's law, the ego, dominated by indwelling sin, does not follow its directives. So the Mosaic law only made people more conscious of their conduct as a formal transgression, thus aggravating the offense and serving as an instrument of sin. From this bondage to the Mosaic law, Christ has freed those who come to faith (7.25–8.2).

The positive development of the new theme follows (8.1–39): Christians live a life in union with God through the indwelling Spirit of God. The Spirit is the dynamic principle of the new life, making Christians adoptive children of God and co-heirs of Christ, destined to share his risen glory. To this status even the groaning material universe, Christian hope itself, and the Spirit testify. A hymn to the bounteous love of God manifested in Christ concludes the chapter.

How does Israel of old fit into this new mode of salvation based on faith? With the aid of Old Testament passages, Paul discusses the “rejection of Israel,” that is, its failure to accept Christ. Paul is pained at the condition of his former coreligionists, privileged of old, but now excluded by their obstinacy from Christ (9.1–33). Israel’s failure is not contrary to God’s direction of human history, however, for it conforms to the pattern of divine ELECTION manifested in the Old Testament toward the patriarchs and even the pharaoh. “God’s message has not failed” (9.6). However, physical descent from Abraham is not enough for salvation. Now that pagans through faith have attained the uprightness for which Israel was striving, they have been incorporated into Israel and are children of Abraham. If Israel has failed to accept Christ, this is not due to God, but only to itself (10.1–21). However, this rejection is only partial and temporary. God has not repudiated His people, for a remnant of it has come to faith. Yet because of the failure of many in Israel, salvation has been extended to pagans—a thing in itself providential. “So all Israel shall be saved” (11.26). Gentile Christians are not to look down on the Jews, for their salvation depends on the Jews. Gentile Christians are only a wild olive shoot grafted into the trunk of salvation history identified long ago with Israel’s history; a place is still left on it for Israel to be grafted back in, into its own true place (11.1–36).

In the hortatory section Paul proposes various demands of the Christian life. Christian existence, as an act of Spirit-guided worship paid to God in the unity of the Body of Christ, must overcome evil with good (12.1–21). Civil rulers must be respected as ministers of God (13.1–7). For Christians, the epitome of the Mosaic law is, “Love your neighbor as yourself” (13.8–14). The weak (Jewish Christians of Rome) are to be helped by the strong (Roman Gentile Christians); neither is to judge the other, for both are members of God’s household (14.1–15.13).

Paul appends personal news (15.14–33), explaining his apostolate, his journey to Jerusalem with the collection for the poor, and his desire to come to Rome en route to Spain. His farewell blessing is given in 15.33. Paul concludes with a letter of recommendation for Phoebe, in which he greets many Roman Christians (16:1–13) [Doxology (16.25–27)].

Significance. Romans heads the Pauline corpus because of its length, but that primary place also reflects the renown it has enjoyed in the Christian Church, for its influence on Christian life and theology has been inestimable. Though addressed to a particular church and reflecting a specific conflict in Paul’s ministry, the solution proposed in it lends itself easily to application to similar problems in the lives of all Christians. Romans influenced the composition of other New Testament books (1 Peter, Hebrews, James); it was widely quoted by Church Fathers (beginning with Clement of Rome); patristic commentaries on it abound (e.g., Origen, Chrysostom, Ambrosiaster). This letter played a large part in the controversies of Pelagius and Augustine and in the work of the Protestant reformers (Luther, Melancthon, Calvin). Finally, many parts of it have provided the starting point for dogmatic development in the tradition of the Church (e.g., Original Sin, Grace and Justification, Trinity, Baptism).

Bibliography: Commentaries. O. KUSS (3 pts., chpts. 1–11; Regensburg 1957–1978). F. LEENHARDT, Commentaire du Nouveau Testament 6 (2d. ed., Neuchâtel/Paris 1981). J. HUBY, Verbum Salutis 10 (rev. S. Lyonnet; Paris 1957). C. E. B. CRANFIELD, International Critical Commentary, 2 v. (Edinburgh 1975, 1979). H. SCHLIER, Herders theologischer Kommentar zum Neuen Testament 6 (Freiburg im B. 1977). J. A. FITZMYER, Anchor Bible 33 (New York 1993), with extensive bibliog. D. J. MOO, (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1996). T. R. SCHREINER (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1998); B. BYRNE, Sacra Pagina 6 (Collegeville, Minn. 1996). E. KÄSEMANN (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1980). U. WILCKENS, Evangelisch-Katholischer Kommentar zum Neuen Testament 6/1–3 (Einsiedeln/Neukirchen-Vluyn 1978–1982). P. STUHLMACHER, Das Neue Testament Deutsch 6 (14th ed. Göttingen 1989; English, Louisville 1994).

[J. A. FITZMYER]

ROMANTICISM, PHILOSOPHICAL

The process of conceptualizing the romantic intuition of man and being, and the doctrines resulting therefrom; also the movement, with its witnessing documents, in which this process transpired historically. Romanticism views man as pure, vital activity, generative of self and of the world, and as a finite principle open to an infinite revealing itself interiorly as the inexhaustible self-generative force of life, which is deployed through determinate expressive forms that can always be transcended. Romanticism views reality as the immanent determination of such activity. Historically, romanticism has been the expression of this vision in the complex culture succeeding to, and reacting against, the ENLIGHTENMENT and embracing all aspects of life: literary, artistic, political, social, religious, and scientific.

Characterization. Romanticism may be contrasted with classicism, which views man as possessing a deter-minate nature—defined as much by its limits as by its powers and achieving its perfection within these limits. It may be contrasted also with RATIONALISM, which, though conceiving man as open to the infinite, limits this openness to one power—reason or intellect. In romanticism, the integral, existing human principle is itself open, and it is open to an infinite that is not abstract but concrete.

The complex, expressive forms of romanticism give rise to the distinction between practical, or sentimental romanticism, and philosophical romanticism. The latter conceptualizes the basic intuitions of romanticism, whereas the former is characterized by its spontaneity and lyricism.

Philosophical romanticism may be characterized negatively as a reaction against the Enlightenment. Opposing the analytical method of the latter, it advocated the synthetic or speculative method. Against excessive intellectualism, it stood for a total reconstruction of human presence with renewed emphasis upon the positive power of the imagination, the senses, and the passions in attaining and witnessing to reality. Against mechanism, it stood for spontaneity and finality. Assigning limits to the natural sciences, it gave fresh vitality to history, the historical method, and the sciences depending on historical data.

The positive character of philosophical romanticism becomes apparent in its anthropology, whose basic note is integralism. The life-presence of man is a unity and totality, within which all powers conspire to a pure, transcendental consciousness. All dualisms, as between body and spirit, sense and reason, etc., are eliminated. The immediate, nonreflective operations of the human principle—passion, sense, imagination, will, and intuition—are recognized as positive elements of this synthesis. Integralism is extended also to the expressive forms. Art, as expression, is assigned the status of a principle of transcendental unity for consciousness. AESTHETICS, as the general theory of expression, becomes a fundamental discipline among the philosophical sciences. The social bond, earlier seen as contractual, becomes organic and historical; it rests upon spontaneous and affective processes as much as upon reflection and volition.

Historical Survey. Historically, philosophical romanticism is polarized between the figures of Giambattista VICO (1668–1744) and G. W. F. HEGEL (1770–1831). Its progress falls into three stages: protoromanticism, the critique of Kantianism, and the system of reason.

Protoromanticism. This movement is represented by Vico, whose Scienza Nuova (successive versions 1724–44) anticipates all the basic lineaments of philosophical romanticism. By the doctrine of “poetic consciousness,” it achieves a total reconstruction of human presence; by the deployment of human presence through chronological time on the basis of ideal time (the latter determined by the constitutive modifications of the human mind), it establishes the order of history in the romantic sense; by the theory of “ideal and eternal history” informing every particular history, it establishes the openness of human history to the eternal and transcendent, in the manner of the romantic philosophy of history.

Critique of Kantianism. Although Kant is not included among the romantic philosophers, the speculative enterprise of philosophical romanticism takes form through criticism of the Kantian achievement. This formation exhibits two aspects: the dissolution of the thing-in-itself and the transformation of the synthetic a priori from a formal to a dynamic dialectical principle for the speculative construction of reality.

Numerous thinkers contributed to the process of the dissolution of the thing-in-itself. F. H. JACOBI (1743–1819) pointed out the dilemma in which this concept involved Kantian criticism, and J. F. Fries (1773–1843), advancing Jacobi’s criticism, emphasized the unity of the noumenal world revealed in the Critique of Practical Reason as contrasted to the division of phenomenal and noumenal in the Critique of Pure Reason. K. L. Reinhold (1758–1823), a confirmed Kantian who wished to systematize his master’s doctrine, substituted an order of objective consciousness for both the ego and the thing-in-itself. Both J. G. von HERDER (1744–1803) and J. G. HAMANN (1730–88) censured the Kantian division among the forms of cognition and sought some principle of unity for consciousness. They reintroduced the Leibnizian notion of a gradual transformation of sensibility into ideality, thus adumbrating both the system of reason and the phenomenology of spirit or mind. G. E. Schulze (1761–1833), in his Aenesidemus, offered a negative but important critique; Salomon Maimon (1754–1800) pointed out that the entire notion of the thing-in-itself demands a fresh analysis of consciousness; while J. S. Beck (1761–1840) drew the entire process to a focus by noting that it is the relation of thought and being that demands rethinking.

The process of dissolution, being negative, could not reveal adequately its own implications; these became clear, however, with the ideal construction of a unitary structure of intelligible existence through a dialectical interpretation of the synthetic a priori. This project corresponds completely with the principle of philosophical romanticism—that reality is a living process generating alike self and world, world-in-itself, self-in-the-world, and the complete in-and-for-itselfness of intelligible existence. The synthetic a priori, transformed from a formal to a dialectical principle, is the instrument of construction of the system of reason.

System of Reason. The construction of the system of reason is associated principally with J. G. FICHTE (1762–1814), F. W. J. von SCHELLING (1775–1854), F. D. E. SCHLEIERMACHER (1768–1834), and, principally, Hegel.

For Fichte, the structure of the system of reason rests upon the categorical imperative, the pure form of the rational will; the world becomes the matter of duty, the content of that imperative in sensuous form; the world is there (dasein) as the theater of human moral activity. The “ought” is the pure and ultimate form of reason and the ground of the world (subjective IDEALISM).

For Schelling, the system of reason rests on the ground of nature (objective idealism). The question thus arises: How does the self-conscious process of reason generate the order of objects in which it is (ostensibly) negated? That it must generate order follows from the previously established notion that rational activity is autonomous, i.e., it does not arise in the presence of a “given,” as Kant had supposed, but generates even the “given” as a dimension of its own activity. Schelling replies: Nature, the order of objects, is the self-generative process of consciousness in its concreteness, in the process of becoming self-commensurate and wholly present to itself. Without the order of objects, nature would remain abstract and in alienation from itself.

Schleiermacher introduces a religious element into the system of reason. A tendency to make the ultimate unity of the noumenal and phenomenal orders the object of faith had long existed; Schleiermacher continued this into the construction of the system of reason. The faith of Schleiermacher resembles the activity that Kant discusses in the Critique of Judgment; it establishes an aesthetic relation between man and the world and manifests itself concretely as a feeling of dependence in man.

The construction of the system of reason culminates in Hegel, who judged the efforts of his predecessors negatively because they rested on partial principles of presence, namely, will, nature, etc. Logic alone can generate the system of reason by generating the Idea; in the Idea all the partial modes of presence are synthesized and transcended. This process is illustrated in the Phenomenology of Spirit; its principles are established in the System of Logic and elaborated in the Encyclopedia of the Philosophical Sciences. Through this process Hegel establishes in principle the totality of intelligible being and existence in its complex structure of being-in-itself, being-for-another, and being-for-itself as the pure synthesis of being-in-and-for-itself.

Influence. The resonances of philosophical romanticism are widespread. They may be traced in TRADITIONALISM in France (though this has other sources as well); in the works of A. ROSMINI-SERBATI and V. GIOBERTI, as well as of others in Italy; and in TRANSCENDENTALISM in England and the United States. In its own right, the position that philosophical romanticism assumed has entered into the permanent philosophical heritage of the Western world.

Bibliography: V. MATHIEU, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 4:187–203. A. R. CAPONIGRI, Time and Idea: The Theory of History in Giambattista Vico (London 1953). J. G. ROBERTSON, Studies in the Genesis of Romantic Theory in the Eighteenth Century (Cambridge, Eng. 1923). H. I. C. GRIERSON, Classical and Romantic (Cambridge, Eng. 1923). G. BOAS, French Philosophies of the Romantic Period (Baltimore 1925). A. O. LOVEJOY, The Great Chain of Being (Cambridge, Mass. 1936). M. JOACHIMI, Die Weltanschauung der deutschen Romantik (Jena 1905). E. KIRCHER, Philosophie der Romantik (Jena 1906). O. F. WALZEL, Deutsche Romantik (Leipzig 1908). R. HAYM, Die romantische Schule (5th ed. Berlin 1928). W. SCHULZ, Die Vollendung des deutschen Idealismus in der Spätphilosophie Schellings (Stuttgart 1955).

[A. R. CAPONIGRI]

ROMANUS, POPE

Pontificate: July or August to November 897. A Roman priest of the Church of St. Peter in Chains, Romanus became pope amid the disorder following the assassination of Pope STEPHEN VI in 897 and held the see four months. The clergy and people of Rome were torn with strife between the parties who supported the “cadaveric” council held by Stephen in judgment on the corpse of Pope FORMOSUS and those who wished to rehabilitate the memory of the ill-fated pontiff. The body of Formosus was rescued from the Tiber and buried, but it was left for the successors of Romanus to restore the remains of the Pope to the tomb in St. Peter’s and to revalidate the Orders conferred by him. The successor of Romanus, THEODORE II, was pope for only two weeks but in the subsequent pontificate JOHN IX nullified the acts of the council-of-the-corpse.

Bibliography: Liutprand, Antapodosis, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Germanicum (Berlin 1826–) v.41. AUXILIUS OF NAPLES, “In defensionem sacrae ordinationis papae Formosae libellus,” in Auxilius und Vulgarius, ed. E. L. DÜMLER (Leipzig 1866). Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92) 2:230. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d’après les documents originaux, tr. and continued by H. LECLERCQ (Paris 1907–38) v.4. L. DUCHESNE, Les Premiers temps de l’état pontifical (2d ed. Paris 1904). H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32)

4:86–87. A. FLICHE, L'Europe occidentale de 888 à 1125 (Paris 1930). A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds. Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935) 7:25–26. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon des Mittelalters 7 (Munich-Zurich 1994–95). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 116.

[P. J. MULLINS]

ROMANUS, SS.

The name of numerous saints in the ecclesiastical calendar, particularly in antiquity and the Middle Ages. The acta of St. LAWRENCE speak of a Romanus Ostiarius as a martyr at Rome on the Via Tiburtina (d. 258). EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA mentions a deacon Romanus of Caesarea who was martyred at Antioch with a young boy named Barulas under Diocletian (Historia ecclesiastica 8.2); a sermon of JOHN CHRYSOSTOM at Antioch mentions this same Romanus as a martyr c. 303. GREGORY OF TOURS speaks of Romanus of Le Mans as a priest of Blaye in the Gironde (Gaul) and as a saint (d. 380). Romanus the Hermit, a native of Cilicia, is mentioned by THEODORET OF CYR because of his modesty and his charity; cures attributed to his prayers caused him to be named Thaumaturgus, or miracle-worker. The founder of the abbey of Condat in the Jura was also a Romanus, who lived first as a solitary under the direction of the abbot of Ainay (Lyon) before gaining the esteem of his contemporaries by his goodness (d. 463). The Roman MARTYROLOGY lists Romanus of Subiaco (d. c. 560) who was an early companion of St. BENEDICT. Also recorded as saints were Bishop Romanus of Reims (d. c. 535); Bishop Romanus of Auxerre (d. c. 550); Bishop Romanus of Rouen (d. c. 640). Pope BENEDICT XIII approved the celebration of the feast of the martyrs (d. 1010) SS. Romanus (Boris) and David (Gleb) for Russian Catholics. This Romanus, called Boris in Russian, is the patron of Moscow.

The lives of these saints were embellished by numerous legends. Some of them seem to have been the victims of duplication as in the case of the Roman priest of Mans, who is very similar to the one at Blaye. The existence of a Romanus, disciple of a certain Ptolemy, and bishop of Nepi, is recorded by a questionable vita. Many of these saints are honored with special feasts in particular localities.

Romanus Ostiarius's feast day: Aug. 9.

Romanus of Caesarea's feast day: Nov. 18.

Romanus of Le Mans's feast day: Nov. 24.

Romanus the Hermit's feast day: Feb. 9.

Romanus (founder of the abbey of Condat in the Jura) feast day: Feb. 28.

Romanus of Subiaco's feast day: May 22.

Bishop Romanus of Reims's feast day: Feb. 28.

Bishop Romanus of Auxerre's feast day: Oct. 6.

Bishop Romanus of Rouen's feast day: Oct. 23.

Romanus (Boris) of Moscow's feast day: July 24.

Bishop Romanus of Nepi's feast day: Aug. 24.

Bibliography: Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911), 7297–7321. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. BENEDICTINES OF PARIS, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56); v. 13, suppl. and table générale (1959). H. QUENTIN, Les Martyrologes historiques du moyen âge (Paris 1908). H. DELEHAYE, S. Romain, martyr d'Antioche (Brussels 1932). E. M. DUPEYRON and G. REICHER, Une chronique chrétienne du IV^{me} siècle; saint Romain d'Afrique et de Blaye (Blaye 1946). R. AIGRAIN, L'Hagiographie (Paris 1953) 29, 226, 260, 265. The Life of the Jura Fathers: The Life and Rule of the Holy Fathers Romanus, Lupicinus, and Eugendus, tr. T. VIVIAN, K. VIVIAN, and J. B. RUSSELL (Kalamazoo, Mich. 1999).

[P. ROCHE]

ROMANUS I LECAPENUS, BYZANTINE EMPEROR

Reign: Dec. 17, 920, to Dec. 16, 944; b. Lakape, Armenia, c. 870; d. Prote, June 15, 948. He was the son of an Armenian peasant, Theophylactus Abastactus, who had become an officer by saving the Emperor Basil I's life. Romanus was befriended by Emperor Leo VI, who appointed him strategos of the naval theme of Samos in 911. Shortly afterward he was promoted, probably by Emperor Alexander, to droungarios (Admiral) of the Fleets. According to a hostile account (Theophanes Continuatus), Romanus failed to ferry Byzantine allies across the Danube, resulting in a resounding defeat by the Bulgarians at the river Acheloos in 917. In May 919, Romanus married his daughter Helen to the young Emperor CONSTANTINE VII PORPHYROGENITUS, in contravention of an arrangement brokered by Patriarch NICHOLAS I MYSTICUS with the Bulgarian Tsar Symeon. He took the basileopator; became caesar (September 24, 920); then, besting the general Leo Phocas, a rival candidate, became emperor (December 17, 920). To solidify his regime and marginalize the legitimate emperor, Romanus had his own son Christopher crowned basileus, i.e., given the imperial title (May 20, 921), and his two younger sons, Constantine and Stephen, later received the same dignity (Dec. 25, 924).

Romanus eventually achieved a peace with the Bulgarian King Symeon, reluctantly recognizing him as emperor of Bulgaria and spiritual brother (pneumatikos adelphos). Upon Symeon's death in 927, Romanus married his granddaughter, Maria, to the new Tsar Peter; Peter recognized Romanus as his spiritual father. Romanus restrained Arab depredations in southern Italy; entered an alliance with Caucasia and Armenia; deflected a Russian assault on Constantinople in 941; and through his general John Curcuas, forced Edessa to surrender the hagion mandylion, the picture of Christ supposedly painted for King ABGAR by the Savior himself. Romanus was the first emperor to legislate in favor of the poor (penetes): his novels were intended to defend small landholders against annexation of their lands by the powerful (dynatoi), and thus also strengthen imperial authority and the fisc in the face of aristocratic expansionism. Interventions in Church affairs saw Romanus issue a Tomos of Union in 920, and appoint his 16-year-old son Theophylactus Patriarch of Constantinople in 933.

Romanus's designated heir, Christopher, died in 931. On December 16, 944, his two other sons, Constantine and Stephen, rebelled and drove out their father; but they were in turn expelled by the Porphyrogenitus, who became sole emperor on Jan. 27, 945. Romanus was exiled to the island of Prote, where he died a penitent. Works produced under Constantine besmirched the deeds of the late usurper, but a sympathetic, almost hagiographical account of Romanus's reign is preserved in the chronicle of Symeon Logothete.

Bibliography: A. CAMERON, "The History of the Image of Edessa: the Telling of a Story," Harvard Ukrainian Studies 7 (1983) 80–94; eadem, "The Mandylion of Edessa and Byzantine Iconoclasm," in The Holy Face and the Paradox of Representation, ed. H. L. KESSLER, G. WOLF (Bologna 1998) 33–54; R. JENKINS, "The Peace with Bulgaria (927) Celebrated by Theodore Daphnopates," Polychronion. Festschrift F. Dolger (Heidelberg 1966) 287–303; R. MORRIS, "The Powerful and the Poor in Tenth-century Byzantium: Law and Reality," Past and Present 73 (1976) 3–27. New Cambridge Medieval History, v.3. S. RUNCIMAN, The Emperor Romanus Lecapenus (Cambridge, Eng. 1929). Théodore Daphnopates, Correspondance, ed. & tr. J. DARROUZÈS, L. WESTERINK (Paris 1976). Theophanes continuatus, Ioannes Caminiata, Symeon Magister, Georgius Monachus continuatus, ed. I. BEKKER (Bonn 1825). M. WHITTOU, The Making of Byzantium, 600–1025 (Berkeley 1996) 340–348.

[M. J. HIGGINS/P. STEPHENSON]

ROMANUS MELODUS, ST.

Preeminent religious poet of the Eastern Church; b. Emesa, Syria, c. 490; d. Constantinople, c. 560. Legendary evidence indicates that Romanus was of Jewish origin. He served as a deacon in Beirut, Lebanon, before arriving in Constantinople during the reign of ANASTASIUS I (491–518). According to hagiographic sources, the Virgin Mary appeared to him in a dream on Christmas Eve and, upon handing him a piece of paper, instructed him to swallow it. After awakening, Romanus mounted the pulpit in the Church of the Virgin Mother and sang his most famous work, On the Nativity I. Of the 1,000 poems that legend attributes to Romanus, only 85 have survived, and the authenticity of a number is doubtful. His possible authorship of the monumental AKATHISTOS hymn is an open question.

The verse form employed by Romanus is the Kontakion, a term derived from the staff around which the inscribed scroll was wrapped. Every Kontakion is organized in an intricate strophic system, most frequently consisting of 24 stanzas. Each stanza is a perfect structural imitation of the first. The metrical system, unlike classical quantitative patterns, is based on stress-accent, whose rhythmic arrangement was undoubtedly influenced by the melody to which the poem was originally sung. His honorific title, The Melodist, indicates that Romanus also composed the music, none of which survives.

A short prefatory stanza, the koukoulion, though metrically and melodically independent of the rest of the poem, introduced a refrain with which every stanza concludes, but it does not contribute to the initial-letter acrostic that signs the work. The language of Romanus is the standard literary koine, strongly influenced by the usages and vocabulary of scriptural Greek.

The Kontakion was sung after the reading of the Gospel in the morning Office, and its themes and techniques are characteristic of its liturgical function, that of a verse sermon. Most probably a preacher chanted the work, while the choir or the congregation sang the refrain. Themes suggested by the life and ministry of Christ, Old Testament events, and the deeds of martyrs and saints are woven together with flamboyant exegetical displays and elaborate antiheretical digressions to inspire and instruct the congregation. Romanus frequently dramatized his Biblical and patristic source material by exploiting suggestions of soliloquy, interior monologue, and dialogue and by paying careful attention to scene and plot arrangement and to adroit transition and climax.

There is no evidence that the Kontakia were ever theatrically produced. Rather, the poetically pregnant biblical phraseology and rhetorical figures, such as antithesis, parallelism, anaphora, paradox, and various types of wordplay, situate the Kontakion in the tradition of the great rhythmic prose homilies of the fifth and early sixth centuries. In this historical context the direct and indirect influence of Syriac literature, and especially of EPHREM THE SYRIAN, is considerable.

The sweeping grandeur of such Kontakia as the Nativity poem and some of the Passion–Resurrection cycle justifies the critical opinion that rates these works as masterpieces of world literature and their author as perhaps the greatest religious poet of all time.

Miniature detail of St. Romanus Melodus, 11th century, from "Menologion of Basil II."

Feast Day: Oct. 1.

Bibliography: P. MAAS and C. A. TRYPANIS, eds., Sancti Romani Melodi Cantica, v.1, Genuina (Oxford 1963), v.2 Dubia, Spuria et Fragmenta (in press). H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 425–428. M. CARPENTER, Speculum 7 (1932) 3–22. L. PATON, ibid. 553–555. E. WELLESZ, A History of Byzantine Music and Hymnography (2d ed. Oxford 1961). J. GROSDIDIER DE MATONS, ed., Romanos le Mélode, 3 v. (Sources Chrétiennes, ed. H. DE LUBAC et al. (Paris 1941–) 99, 110, 114; 1964–65), v.1 Hymnes I–VIII, v.2 Hymnes IX–XX, v.3 Hymnes XX–XXXI. J. GROSDIDIER DE MATONS, Romanos le Mélode et les origines de la poésie religieuse à Byzance (Paris 1977). W. L. PETERSEN, The Diatessaron and Ephrem Syrus as sources of Romanos the Melodist (Louvain 1985). R. J. SCHORK, Sacred Song from the Byzantine Pulpit: Romanos the Melodist (Gainesville, FL 1995).

[R. J. SCHORK]

ROME

Ancient capital of the Roman state and empire, center of Christendom, episcopal see of the pope, and capital of modern Italy. The city is located on a series of hills that fortuitously surround a wide bend in the Tiber River not far from its entrance into the Mediterranean Sea, at an almost central point on the west coast of the Italian Peninsula. Rome's primitive history is dominated by legend, but archeological evidence and solid tradition point to village settlements by the Sabines and inhabitants of Latium that go back at least to the 10th century B.C. Ancient Roman historians differed in calculating the date of the city's legendary founding by Romulus, but M. Terentius Varro's estimate of 753 B.C. has become standard. In the course of five centuries B.C., the city of Rome became a great religious, economic, political, and cultural center, as is attested by archeological remains of its temples, cemeteries, monuments, and public buildings, as well as by its literature and art.

Rome is dealt with here as the center of Christendom in relation to: (1) early Christianity; (2) the Constantinian era; (3) papal rule in late antiquity and in the Middle Ages; (4) the Renaissance; (5) the post-Reformation period; and (6) modern and contemporary Rome.

EARLY CHRISTIANITY

Rome first entered directly into the history of Israel with a request for her aid against Syria made by the Mac-

Saint Peter's Church, St. Peter's Square, Vatican City. (©Reinhard Eisele/CORBIS)

cabees c. 161 B.C. After the conquest of Palestine by Pompey in 63 B.C., Rome dominated Jewish civil affairs; Christ was born under Roman rule (Lk 2.2) and put to death under Pontius Pilate, the Roman procurator of Judea (Lk 23.1–5, 13–25). While Rome is not mentioned directly in the Gospels, its presence is felt by the dominance of its emperors (Mk 12.13–17; Mt 22.15–22; Lk 20.20–26), and in certain New Testament writings the city receives explicit recognition. An edict of Claudius in A.D. 49 banishing the Jews from Rome is mentioned in Acts 18.2 as the occasion for the departure from Rome of Aquila and Priscilla and their meeting with St. Paul at Corinth.

Early Roman Christians. There is no evidence for the arrival of the first Christians in Rome, but a flourishing Christian community existed there in A.D. 58 when Paul wrote his Epistle to the Romans, and it is almost certain that Suetonius had this Christian settlement in mind when he stated that Claudius Judeos impulsore Chresto tumultuantes Roma expulsi—“expelled the Jews from Rome as a result of a tumult caused by Chrestus,” or Christ (Claud. 25.4). Paul arrived in Rome between A.D. 59 and 61 and was met outside the city at the Forum Appii and ad Tres Tabernas by a group of Christians (Acts 28.15). He remained there two years under guard in a private dwelling and was allowed to receive visitors and discuss the gospel with whoever came to him. It is possible that Luke wrote the Acts to the Apostles in Rome and that the Pauline Captivity Epistles originated there, as well as 1 Peter. Paul was brought to Rome a second time as a prisoner, probably after his arrest at Troas (cf. 2 Tm 1.16–17; 4.13), but there is no evidence as to the time of St. Peter's arrival. However, early tradition (1 Clem. 6) testifies that Peter and Paul were martyred in Rome during the Neronian persecution, recorded for the year 64 by Tacitus (Annal. 15.44), while Eusebius stated that they were put to death in 67 (Hist. eccl. 2.25.1–8). Nothing proves that they were not martyred in the same year.

Alongside a large Jewish settlement, the Christian colony grew during the reigns of Vespasian (69–79) and Titus (79–81). Despite persecution under Domitian (81–96), there is evidence that some patricians were Christians, including Flavia DOMITILLA (d. c. 100), granddaughter of Vespasian, wife of Titus Flavius Clemens, and a first cousin of Domitian. Clemens was put to death probably in the Domitian persecution against Christians and Jews (95–96), and Domitilla was banished to the island of Pandateria, while her property outside Rome on the Via Ardeatina seems to have been used in the 1st century as a Christian place of burial, later the cemetery or catacombs of Domitilla.

Second-century Popes. Despite minor discrepancies, the names of the early Roman bishops have been preserved in a reliable list (Liber pontificalis), but the first bishops of whom positive information exists are St. CLEMENT I (c. 88–97), who probably composed the Epistle to the Church of Corinth; the martyr St. TELESFORUS (126–136); and St. PIUS I, brother of the author of the Shepherd of HERMAS. Evidence is supplied for the Christian importance of Rome by the Epistle to the Romans of IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH (c. 110–117), who praised the charity of its Christians and begged them not to prevent his martyrdom through political influence (Ad Rom. 2). In the course of the 2d century, Rome was the object of visits from Christian leaders seeking confirmation of the unity of the Church, as is attested by the Epitaph of ABERCIUS, by HEGESIPPUS, and by heretics such as MARCION (fl. 135–160), the Gnostic VALENTINUS, and the Monarchian Theodore, who sought confirmation of their unorthodox teachings.

The description of the Church as a populous community, containing a segment of the rich and numerous poor, with a mixture of saints and sinners, provided by the Shepherd of Hermas (Sim. 8.4–11), probably refers to Rome (c. 150); it was, besides, a well-organized institution with bishops, priests, and deacons. JUSTIN MARTYR (c. 100–165) conducted a school of Christian philosophy in Rome, directed his Apologiae to the Roman authorities, and died a martyr there with some of his disciples in the persecution of Aurelian (161–180). POLYCARP OF SMYRNA visited Pope ANICETUS (c. 155–166), and IRENAEUS OF LYONS visited Pope ELEUTHERIUS (c. 177) to discuss the QUARTODECIMAN problem, which Pope VICTOR IM (189–199), the first Latin-speaking pope, tried to settle in a Roman synod. Victor threatened to excommunicate Polycrates of Ephesus and the bishops of Asia Minor who followed the Jewish reckoning for the date of Easter. With Victor, who wrote several encyclical letters ordaining that synods be held by groups of bishops in other regions, the predominance of the Church at Rome was assured.

Central portion of the façade of the Church of San Marcello al Corso, Rome, designed by Carlo Fontana, built 1682–83. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

Title Churches. Roman Christians down to the late 2d century held their liturgical gatherings in the houses of richer members and used their burial places. Justin Martyr's evasive answers under imperial interrogation regarding Christian places of worship indicate that this practice was still in vogue c. 165 (Acta Sanctorum April 2:104–119). But archeological evidence and the tradition regarding Rome's title churches point to the existence in the late 2d century of edifices for Christian cult.

Excavations beneath the churches of St. Clement, St. Anastasia, and SS. John and Paul have unearthed foundations of the late 2d and early 3d century that had undergone great changes before the 4th century and indicate the enlargement and even the building over of the earlier edifices. Beneath the church of SS. Silvestri e Martino ai Monti Christian paintings have been discovered on the walls of a building that goes back to the Severian emperors (c. 195–235), and excavations beneath the churches of St. Sabina and St. Chrysogonus reveal similar early emplacements. Evidence exists also for pre-4th-century edifices on the sites of the churches of SS. Crescentia and Pudens (or Pudentiana), as well as of St. Cecilia and St. Callistus. The Basilica Apostolorum on the Via Appia seems to have been built in imitation of the mausoleum erected by Maxentius for his son Romulus, immediately after the emancipation granted by Galerius in 311. The construction of these churches reflects the basilica-type, large building common to Roman architecture of the age.

Pantheon, c. 128–125 B.C., Rome. (©Michael Maslan Historic Photographs/CORBIS)

These pre-Constantinian churches seem to have been located close to the ancient wall of Servius Tullius within the city, except for St. Marcellus near the Campus Martius and S. Lorenzo in Lucina beside the obelisk of Augustus, close to the Via Flaminia in a quarter that had a Jewish colony (Calcarenses) housing the wine and marble merchants. The placement of these churches formed a crosslike pattern covering the poor, more populous parts of the city from the Quirinal Hill (SS. Susanna and Cyriacus) to Trastevere (SS. Chrysogonus, Cecilia, and Callistus), and as a transverse bar between the valley of the Viminal (St. Pudentiana), the Esquiline (St. Praxedes, SS. Silvestri e Martino ai Monti), the Caelian (St. Clement, SS. Peter and Marcellus, St. Sixtus, SS. Nereus and Achilleus, the Four Crowned Martyrs, and SS. John and Paul), the Aventine (St. Prisca, St. Sabina), and, finally, the area near the Forum Boarium (St. Anastasia). Before the 4th century these churches were known only by the title of their emplacement or the donor of the property; only between the 4th and 6th centuries were they connected with the names of saints or early martyrs.

Catacombs and Persecutions. Some 40 distinct catacombs have been discovered outside the city on the main roads running northeast and south. Until the 4th century they were used primarily for burial, followed by the celebration of anniversaries that gradually assumed a liturgical form in honor of a martyr saint; but only some 25 such commemorations are recorded in the first Christian calendar in the mid-4th century. In the 4th and 5th centuries, the catacombs became regular places of assembly for Eucharistic cult. In them were likewise preserved the earliest examples of Christian art and symbolism, particularly in the stucco paintings on the walls and in designs on sarcophagi.

Fourth-century epitaph of the child Agathemerus, inscription contains the words “ANIMA TUA ΨΥΧΗ ΚΑΛΗ” Cemetery of Praetextatus, Rome.

As the persecutions were intermittent, followed by long periods of peace, Christians gradually acquired property, and, though they were not given legal recognition as religious corporations, they could occasionally vindicate their rights through judicial action, as in the case of an appeal to the Emperor Alexander Severus (222–235), who decided in favor of a Christian church near the Forum instead of a tavern (Lampridius, Vita Alex. Sev. 49.6—if this statement is reliable). Under the Severi, Pope CALLISTUS I (217–222) likewise attempted to regulate the ownership of church property and cemeteries, as is indicated by the attachment of his name to both the cemetery on the Appian Way and a sanctuary in Trastevere. St. Augustine reported having read that at the end of the persecutions, Pope Miltiades (d. 314) sent the deacon Strato to receive the ecclesiastical property restored to the Church by the prefect of Rome (Brev. coll. Donat. 18.34–35); and in the Constantinian peace of 313, it was ordered that “the places where Christians were accustomed to assemble should be given back to the corporate body or conventicle” (Lact., De mortibus persec. 48).

At the close of the Decian persecution, Pope Cornelius had held a synod of 60 bishops in Rome (251) to deal with the NOVATIAN schism; his own clergy consisted of 154 clerics, including 46 priests, seven deacons, and seven subdeacons. The number of Christians in Rome was thus considerable, justifying TERTULLIAN’s statement at the end of the 2d century: “We Christians are but of yesterday; yet we fill your world and all that you have, cities, houses . . . , the palace, senate, forum. All we leave to you are the temples” (Apol. 37.4).

CONSTANTINIAN ERA

No statistics exist for the number of Christians in Rome immediately before the peace of the Church established by CONSTANTINE I and Licinius (313), nor is there a reliable estimate of the number of martyrs. What is significant, however, is the fact that on accepting the Christian faith Constantine erected three great churches within the city: the basilica close to the palace of Fausta at the Lateran (later named St. John’s by Pope Hilary I in 461), which the emperor gave to the bishop of Rome as his residence near the imperial gardens; the nearby basilica of the Holy Cross in Jerusalem, one of the results of the dowager Empress Helena’s benefactions; and the immense construction for the emplacement on the Vatican of the basilica anchored on the site venerated as the grave of St. Peter. Constantine built another church outside the walls on the Via Ostia, where tradition placed the burial of St. Paul.

These imperial benefactions were deliberately made on the periphery of the city in order not to awaken the hostility of the pagan Romans, who still predominated, and whose civic life was centered on the Senate and the Forum with its temples, markets, and administrative buildings. Constantine imitated the largesse of his predecessors by adorning the city with public monuments and baths before deciding to move his capital to the newly erected city of CONSTANTINOPLE on the Bosphorus. By the beginning of the 4th century the population of Rome had reached its greatest density; it was provided with 11 major and 856 minor public baths, 27 libraries, some 1,352 fountains, eight athletic fields, five naumachiae for water spectacles, 11 large public fora, ten major basilicas, 19 aqueducts, 36 triumphal arches, three theaters, and eight bridges crossing the Tiber. The city had been enclosed within a wall by Aurelian in the 270s; it was 19 km in circumference, with 383 towers and 14 major and five minor gates.

Christian Asceticism. To accommodate the increase of Christian converts, Pope Julius I (337–352) built several churches, of which two within the city were at first known simply under his name but were later called the basilicas of the Twelve Apostles and of St. Mary in Trastevere. He is also credited with constructing basilicas at the catacombs of St. Felix, St. Valentinus, and Calpodius. Liberius (352–366) built St. Mary Major on the Esquiline; it was rebuilt by Pope Sixtus III (432–440). Both these popes were caught in the maelstrom of doctrinal disputes that disturbed the empire following the condemnation of Arianism at the Council of Nicaea in 325 and the rise of subsequent schisms and heresies that brought to Rome innumerable appeals from both orthodox and heretical prelates and occasioned the holding of Roman synods and visits by many of the parties concerned.

Athanasius of Alexandria stopped in Rome in the course of his exile to Treves (339–342) and gave further impulse to the ascetical movement that flourished under Pope Damasus (366–384) and his successors. Rufinus of Aquileia, Bonosus, and Jerome were students there in the early 360s. Jerome returned under Damasus, began his revision of the Latin Bible, and served as papal secretary and as spiritual director to a group of well-to-do ascetics on the Caelian and Aventine Hills, who included Paula, Eustochium, Blesilla, and the senator Pammachius. Augustine taught in Rome for a year before going to Milan and attested to the existence of a strong Manichaean faction.

Though the Western emperors resided at Milan rather than at Rome, they continued their benefactions, particularly toward the erection and decoration of churches. Damasus “discovered and gave honor to the bodies of many saints, decorating their burial places with verses” (Lib. pont. 1.212). He likewise erected a titular church of S. Lorenzo in Damaso close to the papal archive, giving impetus to the cult of the martyrs within the city by the inscriptions he composed and to the subsequent erection of new titular churches, such as that of the Apostles (later, St. Peter in Chains) on the Esquiline, situated between the baths of Titus and Trajan, and that of St. Eusebius near the Livian market.

Papal Authority. The authority of the popes gradually increased despite the exile of Liberius, the rise of the antipope Felix (355–365), and the strife that accompanied the elections of Damasus and Boniface (418–422). The canons of Sardica (343) recognized the traditional position of the bishop of Rome as a court of final appeal in doctrine and disciplinary matters, and this fact was embodied in the legislation of Gratian (375–383) and Theodosius I (379–395). Gratian removed the Altar of Victory from the Senate (382), and, despite the opposition of a strong faction led by Symmachus, Prefect of the city, Theodosius I and Honorius I (395–425) legislated against paganism.

In exercising their authority, the popes supported orthodoxy with an insistence on traditional beliefs, common sense, and a distrust of theological niceties, as is attested by the Tractatus de gratia produced under Pope Celestine. Pope Siricius issued the earliest known decretal: and Innocent I (401–417) condemned Pelagianism; Celestine (422–432), Nestorianism; and Leo I (440–461), Eutychianism with his famous Tome, whose explanation of the Incarnation prevailed at the Council of Chalcedon (451). During the 5th century, Rome frequently settled affairs of the Churches in Gaul, Spain, Africa, and the East; and it saw the coming and going of emissaries, prelates, heretics, and imperial officials. The city was sacked by Alaric the Goth (410), menaced by Attila and the Huns (452), and ravaged by Geiseric and the Vandals (455). As the imperial control of Italy declined, the provision and administration of the city, the protection of the poor and destitute, and the restoration of its churches became the function of the popes.

In the 3d and 4th centuries the work of the deacons had increased in importance as they cared for widows, orphans, the ill, and the aged. In the 5th and 6th centuries they managed the revenues from properties in Sicily and Italy, given to the bishops of Rome by imperial officials or inherited from rich benefactors. Leo I reorganized this papal patrimony, held yearly synods for the government of the Roman (Italian) patriarchate, and wrote frequently to regulate ecclesiastical affairs throughout the Church. During his pontificate also, the liturgical effectiveness of the Church was manifest in the spirited observance of the paschal and Christmas cycles, which he described with zest and classic propriety in his sermons. He bore witness to the assemblies of bishop, clergy, and people at stationary or titular churches, particularly on a vigil or during Lent, for a Eucharistic celebration in honor of a sacred mystery or a saint, and he attempted to regularize Christian cult all over the empire.

Upon the abandonment of the pagan temples under the Christian emperors, they were pillaged of their decorations and materials for new constructions of both private and public buildings, despite decrees of Valentinian and Valens (376) and of Majorian (458) against such depredations. During the 5th century, however, the prefects of the city made heroic efforts to reconstruct and repair the buildings of the Fora, many of which had been destroyed by the fire that followed the city's capture by Alaric (410). After the earthquake of 442 the prefect Quadratianus repaired the Baths of Constantine, and in 450 Epitynchianus restored the Forum Esquilinum. Even under the Ostrogothic King Theodoric (475–526), orders were given to preserve the city's monuments. However, in the building of churches, these regulations were not always observed. Under Pope Simplicius (468–483), the churches of St. Bibiana and St. Stephen (Rotundo) were built, and the schola domestica of the Goth Theodobius was changed into an oratory honoring St. Andrew. Ricimer the Goth (459–470) built a church to St. Agatha for Arians in Rome.

Despite difficulties with Theodoric caused by the antipope Laurentius, Pope Symmachus (498–514) attached a church honoring St. Silvester to the old edifice of S. Martino ai Monti. Felix IV (526–530) invaded the Forum, building the basilica of SS. Cosmas and Damian on the Via Sacra and decorating its apse with a mosaic of Christ receiving a model of the church from the two saints. Near the palace of Caligula he reconstructed an old building and decorated it with frescoes as the church of Santa Maria Antica. While the art of the earlier period had been more or less impressionistic, by the close of the 6th century, the Byzantine style prevailed in the mosaics and other plastic representations in the churches.

PAPAL RULE IN LATE ANTIQUITY AND IN THE MIDDLE AGES

Between 536 and 555 Belisarius was entrusted with the Byzantine reconquest of Italy by Justinian I (527–565). The general entrenched his army in Rome, and in 536 Vitiges and his Goths besieged the city, cut its aqueducts, and by investing the port (Porto) near Ostia, prevented the provisioning of Rome with wheat from Sicily and Africa.

In 544 Totila attacked Rome; he finally took the city on Dec. 17, 546. Pope VIGILIUS (537–555), however, had been taken to Constantinople, and the Deacon Pelagius attempted to revive life there after the departure of the Goths. On becoming pope, PELAGIUS I (556–561) utilized the Pragmatic Sanction granted by Justinian on Aug. 13, 554, to restore the main churches and buildings, but his ecclesiastical difficulties with the churches in the West over the condemnation of the THREE CHAPTERS hampered his efforts.

In 568 Italy was invaded by the Lombards. They frequently menaced Rome, whose actual government was by then almost completely in the hands of the popes. In 554 Justinian had also agreed to continue the public provisioning of Rome from Sicily, and the governor of the island sent wheat to Rome in the fall each year. This annona was stored in the ancient granaries (horrea Agrippina) and in the old market places and was distributed by papal horrearii. When the Arab incursions interfered with Mediterranean shipping, Popes John V (685–686) and Conon (686–687), in reorganizing papal finances, obtained fiscal exemptions for the Church's patrimonies in Sicily, Calabria, Lucania, and Brutium (Lib. pont. 1:366, 369). Later Emperor Leo the Isaurian seized these properties to punish Roman opposition to ICONOCLASM under Gregory III (731–741). Pope Zachary (741–752) then organized nearby Latium and the Roman Campagna as districts to supply Rome with needed agricultural products.

Evidence for the division of Rome into seven ecclesiastical districts is supplied by the 7th-century Liber diurnus. Popes Agatho (678–681) and Leo II (682–683) are credited with distributing money to the Greek monasteries, whose establishment in Rome was encouraged by a series of popes, evidently of Byzantine origin, for the care of the poor. Pilgrims were housed in special hostels known as scholae founded by national groups such as the Saxons, Frisians, Franks, and Lombards. Inscriptions found in the churches of S. Maria in Cosmedin and St. Agnes, as well as the 8th-century Itinerarium or "Pilgrim's Book of Einsiedeln," indicate the main streets of Rome. They passed 18 diaconiae all located in connection with the main and titular churches: nine were on the Vicus Tuscus, Argiletum, and Clivus Suburanus; and another nine were in connection with the roads that led from the gate of St. Peter to that of St. Paul. A diaconia consisted of a church where the people of a district gathered to hear daily Mass; an administrative office in a rebuilt public building; and a monastery of monks, who controlled the distribution of food and alms. Four depots for wheat were located on the sites of ancient Rome's granaries or market places. Roman church building, confined mainly to the reconstruction of ancient edifices, continued despite the political difficulties: Pelagius II (579–590) rebuilt St. Lawrence, Honorius I (625–638), St. Agnes and the church of the Four Crowned Martyrs. With PASCHAL I (817–824) a new style was introduced in the rebuilding of the churches of St. Praxedes, S. Maria in Domnica, St. Cecilia, and St. Mark.

Carolingian Period. In 806, when Pope Leo III marked the 10th year of his pontificate upon his return from the court of Charlemagne at Treves, he decided on a special distribution of alms to the churches of Rome and had a record made of the 25 recipients in the Liber pontificalis. Beside almost each of the churches there was a monastery for the celebration of the Liturgy or the care of the diaconia. Leo's journey had been preceded by the Pope's coronation of Charlemagne as Roman emperor in St. Peter's on Christmas Day 800. This event had been prepared for in 753 when Stephen II (752–757) appealed to the Frankish King Pepin for support. In 773 Adrian I (772–795) called upon CHARLEMAGNE to destroy the Lombard power in Italy. Charlemagne gave the Exarchate of Ravenna and the Roman Duchy not to the Byzantine Emperor, but to the Pope as his estate.

During the 9th and 10th centuries the struggle between the leading families of Rome to control the papacy was marked by schisms, insurrections, imperial interventions, and synods. The Arabs sacked the city (846) and plundered the tombs of St. Peter and St. Paul, after which Pope Leo IV (847–855) built a wall to enclose the district surrounding St. Peter's, known since that time as the Leonine city. The election of Pope Benedict III (855–858) was disputed by ANASTASIUS THE LIBRARIAN, but the commissioners of Louis II of Germany decided ultimately in favor of Benedict. Because of his competence in Greek and his wide knowledge, Anastasius was selected papal librarian by Pope NICHOLAS I (858–867); he attended the last session of the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE IV and participated in the discussions involving Photius and his actions. Pope John VIII (872–882) chose Charles the Bald of France over Louis the German as the new Roman emperor and crowned him in Rome on Christmas Day 875. John also organized a fleet to contain the Arabic invasions and fortified St. Paul's against Saracen depredations from Naples, Gaeta, and the Campagna. He was murdered by his local enemies on Dec. 16, 882.

Lateran Councils. John IX (898–900) stemmed the local anarchy but only temporarily. For 60 years Rome was ruled by a single family who made and unmade popes at will. Under Prince Alberic (931–954), St. Odo of Cluny reformed the monasteries of Subiaco and Monte Cassino, founded a Cluniac monastery on the Aventine, and began a religious revival in Rome. In 962 Otto I, King of Germany, was crowned emperor in Rome by the Pope. He deposed John XII (955–964) and eventually installed Leo VIII (963–965) as pope. Chaotic conditions prevailed, with a brief interval after the election of Silvester II (999–1003), until the archpriest of St. John's became pope as Gregory VI (1045–46) and brought the monk Hildebrand from the Benedictine monastery on the Aventine to be his secretary.

Pope Leo IX (1049–54) inaugurated a vast reform movement in Rome through LATERAN COUNCIL I (1049), which was followed by synods in Italy and northern Europe and prepared the way for Alexander II (1061–73) and Gregory VII (1073–85), who were elected in accord with a decree promulgated at Lateran Council II (April 1059). This decree established the right of the cardinals alone to elect the pope.

Under Alexander and Gregory, the bishop of Rome took a leading part in vitalizing the spiritual well-being of the city and of Christendom. Yet despite basic reforms and the attempt to destroy lay control of the Church in the INVESTITURE STRUGGLE, two families, the Pierleoni and the Frangipani, succeeded in violating the peace for another hundred years. Rome was invaded by the Normans, saw the rise of a republic that restored the Senate, reformed the "equestrian orders" (probably the lower nobility and higher citizens), elected a patrician, Arnold of Brescia, as consul with absolute power over the city, and witnessed the crowning of FREDERICK I BARBAROSSA (1152–89) as emperor by the English Pope ADRIAN IV (1154–59). Under Clement III in 1188 the Senate was brought under ecclesiastical control, following the struggle for political dominance between Barbarossa and Alexander III (1159–81). The republic experienced some success in expanding its territory and entering into commerce with the rising northern republics, but political tension with the popes and disagreements between the papacy and the emperors prohibited internal development. Despite the growth of economic power through minor industries, the continual visits of princes, clerics, and prelates on ecclesiastical affairs, and a swelling influx of pilgrims, little political stability was achieved.

Late Middle Ages. Innocent III (1198–1216) inaugurated the 13th century with a renovation of the politico-civic structure of the Church. However, between 1232 and 1235 a great civil rebellion began that had as its first objective the control of the territory outside the city. With the reestablishment of the republic, both ecclesiastics and laymen were placed under complete control of the law and were subjected to taxation but were promised free election of senators, the coinage of money, and even the payment of imposts by the pope. A two-year period, during which the Papal See was vacant (November 1241–June 1243), gave this movement further impetus and allowed the first families to take control. They summoned the senator Brancaleone degli Andalò from Bologna and gave him dictatorial powers, which he used judiciously to reorganize the city and restore public safety. Popes Innocent IV (1243–54) and Alexander IV (1254–61) had no choice but to concur. Both these popes established theological schools in the city, and, despite a great influx of students between 1263 and 1284 under Charles of Anjou, Rome enjoyed a true period of peace, strengthened by the French Pope Martin IV (1281–85).

Under Nicholas III (1277–80), the Orsini family had come to power, and under Nicholas IV (1288–92), the Colonna. Thereafter the two families vied to rule, with their sons as senators, cardinals, and popes. With Boniface VIII (1294–1303), the Caetani family from Anagni entered upon the Roman scene. Boniface presided over the Jubilee of 1300, which brought visitors from all over Christendom; he contributed to the embellishment of the Roman churches and founded the Sapienza as the university of Rome. Despite his exaggerated claims regarding papal supremacy and his final humiliation at Anagni by William of Nogaret, Philip of France's emissary, Boniface contributed much to the well-being of the city.

The Popes in Avignon. Under Clement V (1305–14) the papal residence was transferred to Avignon, and Rome lost much of its importance. For more than 70 years it was embroiled in the rivalries of the Colonna-Orsini houses, and experienced the rise of Cola di Rienzo (1313–54), whose attempt to restore order and the ancient splendor of Roman imperialism aborted. Rome returned to the rule of papal legates such as the rigid Cardinal Albornoz. Pope Urban V attempted to reestablish papal residence in Rome (October 1367–April 1370), but this was accomplished only by Gregory XI (Jan. 17, 1377). Boniface IX (1389–1404) fortified the Campidoglio, the ancient seat of the civil government, and renewed papal rule. He was followed by weak popes, however, and once more the city became prey to internecine rivalry, declining to the lowest ebb in 1415, when wolves roamed the cemetery of the Vatican.

Late Medieval Art. Roman devotion to building and the decorative arts was not neglected even during this disturbed period, and almost all the larger churches were provided with square bell-towers, thus evidencing a return to the architectural styles of both the 5th and the 8th centuries. The church of SS. John and Paul was furnished with an ornamental loggia outside the apse, and the basilicas of the Lateran and of St. Paul were provided with marble cloisters between the abbey and church, whose painstaking ornamentation was the work of the Vassalletto family. The polychrome sculpture and mosaics of the age took their name (cosmatesque) from the Cosmati artists. Gothic influence is shown by the church of Santa Maria sopra Minerva, built by the Sisto and Ristoro brothers of Florence. Arnolfo di Cambio ruled the world of sculpture from Rome for the last two decades of the 13th century with his monuments to Charles of Anjou on the Campidoglio, the ciboria in St. Paul and in St. Cecilia, and the crib in St. Mary Major. Giotto, Pietro Cavallini, and Jacopo Torriti dominated painting and mosaic with their popular and narrative scenes mainly of spiritual motivation.

THE RENAISSANCE

With the pontificate of the Colonna Pope, Martin V (1417–31), who was elected at the Council of CONSTANCE and entered Rome in 1420, the restoration of the city's churches and public buildings was begun in earnest. Aided by his family, he achieved political hegemony and turned his attention to world affairs, preparing the way for the temporary reunion with the Greeks accomplished by Eugene IV (1431–47) at the Council of Ferrara-Florence (1439–41).

Art and Scholarship. During the 15th and 16th centuries, Rome was the center on which descended the great artists of the period in ever-increasing numbers. Martin V had invited the painters Masolino, Masaccio, Gentile da Fabriano, and Pisanello, along with Donatello the sculptor, to assist in the decoration of his reconstructed churches, and Nicholas V (1447–55) called upon Fra Angelico to decorate the chapel of St. Lawrence in the Vatican. He celebrated the Jubilee of 1450 and followed this attempt at spiritual renewal in Rome with a series of decrees, against ecclesiastical and moral abuses, that were carried to Germany by Cardinal NICHOLAS OF CUSA and JOHN CAPISTRAN and to France by Cardinal d'Estoutville. In an attempt to pacify Bologna and tighten his control over the Papal States, Nicholas sent Cardinal BESSARION as his legate-governor and put down an insurrection under Porcaro (1453). He likewise proved to be a discriminating patron for the revival of Greek and Latin studies, commissioning the translation of both classic and patristic works and encouraging members of the Curia, such as POGGIO, as well as the Greek refugee scholars, in their search for ancient MSS.

This policy was followed with personal variations by his successors from Pius II (1458–64) to Leo X (1513–21) in the period that saw Rome as the center of European art and scholarship. The Papal Curia was infiltrated by foreigners, who helped bring a wider outlook on the Church's participation in world affairs, faced as it was particularly with the necessity of stemming the Muslim drive in the western Mediterranean. The leading Roman families turned their attention from founding principates to amassing enormous wealth and prestige as cultivators of the arts.

Leo X brought to a close Lateran Council V (1512–17), whose reform decrees were issued as papal bulls. They dealt with preaching, with the laws of residence for cardinals in Rome and for bishops in their dioceses, and with simony and concubinage. If observed, these reforms might have done much to stave off the impending Protestant revolt. Instead, political and nationalistic considerations, as well as family ambition, entered into both the creation of cardinals and the election of popes. The local nobles built great palaces for protection as well as for ostentation: the Palazzo Venezia, by Pietro Barbo; the Palazzo dei SS. Apostoli, by Sisto and Raffaele Riario; the palace at the Governo Vecchio, by Stefano Nardini; the palace at the Penitenzieri, by Domenico della Rovere; the palace in the Borgo, by the Cesi; the palace of Andriano Castellesi; and especially the palace of the Farnesi. They were imitated by the Aldobrandini, Borghese, Barbarini, Altieri, Panfilii, and Braschi families, who filled Rome with great buildings that still dominate parts of the city, and who built magnificent villas in the suburbs or the nearby Castelli Romani. The Medici, Spannocchi, and Chigi families became the papal financiers, and a class of papal ambassadors and representatives was formed among both the Romans and the foreigners who circled in and out of the Curia, employing the numerous lesser artisans whose presence in Rome rapidly increased its population.

Religious Life. On the strictly religious plane, Rome was the center of a new development in popular, religious art that sprang from the development of new devotions such as the Stations of the Cross and the Five Wounds. It witnessed also the multiplication of third orders and of guilds, whose corporate life was built around prayer, the Sacraments, and works of charity. The rich endowed colleges, schools, hospitals, and homes for the unfortunate, including the destitute and repentant prostitutes. The Bible was translated into Italian by the Camaldolese monk Nicolò Malerbi and collections of simple sermons and books of popular instructions, such as the Libretto della dottrina cristiana, vied with the learned translations of scholars for attention by printers and publishers. From the heart of the Curia under Julius II (1503–13) rose St. Cajetan, who founded the Order of the Theatines, provided Italy with a new episcopate, and helped to introduce to Rome (1519) the Oratory of Divine Love, a brotherhood of priests and laymen pledged to prayer and charity.

THE POST-REFORMATION

During the Renaissance period Rome, as a result of the upsurge of political, economic, artistic, and scholarly endeavors, had developed bifurcating mores that manifested themselves in great religious movements and at the same time in a return to the cultivation of man's natural interests, as well as in indulgence in vices of all kinds. Rome's worldly ostentation was denounced with mounting fury by the preachers, especially by monks such as SAVONAROLA in Florence and by the lower clergy. But lip service on the part of the majority of the higher clergy and a failure of the Renaissance popes to achieve a thorough reform, particularly in regard to financial administration, nepotism, and the teaching of theology, occasioned the outbreak in Germany of the Protestant Reformation, which quickly spread through northern Europe. Martin Luther (1483–1546) had defected soon after his return from Rome in 1511, where he had been scandalized by the extravagances and abuses rampant in the papal court, and he began to teach doctrines that were not in accord with Catholic theology. Rome's answer was slow in formulation but finally started with the reorganization of the University of Rome and the founding of the Collegio Romano by Ignatius Loyola. Out of Rome finally came the impetus for the Council of TRENT (1545–63), whose reforming decrees governed the Church's development down to the mid-20th century.

The Sack of Rome. Rome's security in an age of bandetti and condottieri had been the concern of Alexander VI (1492–1503), who fortified the Castel Sant' Angelo (the ancient tomb of Hadrian) by strengthening the wall connecting it with the Vatican palaces and building a tower to dominate the bridge of approach over the Tiber. Clement VII (1523–34) confided to Antonio da Sangallo the fortification of the city proper, since the old Aurelian wall no longer served as a defense against a possible European or Saracen siege. He built new towers on the Aventine and at the Porta Ardeatina and fortified the wall between the Vatican, the Janiculum Hill, and the bastion of the Belvedere. But these new edifices proved useless when Cardinal Pompeo Colonna joined forces with Emperor Charles V, entered Rome by stealth through the gate of St. John Lateran, and besieged the Vatican Palace on Sept. 20, 1526. Clement VII surrendered and signed a peace pact (September 22).

The following year, Rome was sacked by an unpaid band of imperial soldiers, despite the heroic resistance of the Pope and the local soldiery, and the city was held captive until 1528. Some 30,000 of its citizens lost their lives, and four-fifths of its houses were deserted. The Pope, who had escaped to Viterbo in 1528, on his return set about the rebuilding of the city, using its destruction as a warning and calling for reform "in head and members" of the Church and Christian society.

Under Paul IV (1555–59) Rome again suffered a setback when Emperor Charles V prepared to besiege the city. On the pope's death (Aug. 18, 1559) his enemies burned the palace of the Inquisition and destroyed the statue of the pope on the Campidoglio. Sixtus V (1585–90) displayed a strong hand in controlling the unruly elements of the city's population, and Urban VIII (1623–44) refortified the Castel Sant' Angelo as a center of local power. Great difficulty for the safety of the city was caused by the claims of foreign diplomats to immunity not only for their persons and palaces but for the piazzas and streets surrounding their residences, since their servants sheltered criminals and evil-doers of all types in the shadow of their masters' pennants. Innocent XI (1676–89) attempted to end this abuse by convincing the King of Spain to renounce the privileges (1677) claimed by his ambassador. Venice ceded in 1679; Spain, in 1682, and the cardinals, who had attempted to imitate this procedure, were forced to desist. After long opposition on the part of the French ambassadors, the Count of Lavaradin finally submitted to a show of force by Alexander VIII (1689–91).

Urbanization. Julius II (1503–13) implemented the plans of Nicholas V for a complete renovation of the Vatican, and the execution of this great architectural and artistic work continued to the end of the 16th century. Julius also began the rearrangement of Rome's main streets with the Via Giulia, the Via Repetta, and the Via del Babuino as prongs of a trident off the Corso, running from the Piazza del Popolo to the center of the city. This work was brought to fruition by Domenico Fontana for Sixtus V (1585–90), when he arranged to have roads connecting S. Maria Maggiore with the Trinità dei Monti, with S. Giovanni Laterano, S. Croce in Gerusalemme, and S. Lorenzo, with the Forum of Trajan, and with S. Susanna in a starlike pattern. The pope also erected the obelisks in the piazzas of S. Maria Maggiore, S. Giovanni, S. Pietro, and the Piazza del Popolo as guidelines for further expansion of the inhabited area of the city, which was so cramped from the early Middle Ages in a great pocket of the Tiber in the shadow of the Vatican. Sixtus encouraged expansion by bringing aqueducts with water to other parts of the city, thus acknowledging the large population growth, which, from a few thousand in the late Middle Ages, rose to 130,000 during the Renaissance, and which, from less than 40,000 after the sack of Rome in 1527, had by the end of the 16th century reached 100,000 inhabitants.

In the 17th century an almost organic development saw the creation of the great piazzas, such as that fronting the Palazzo dei Barberini, the Piazza Navona, the Piazza S. Pietro, the Piazza di Spagna, and the reconstruction of the ancient Porto di Repetta by Clement XI (1700–21).

MODERN AND CONTEMPORARY ROME

After the first infiltration of baroque art into Rome during the 17th century, a classic reaction set in with the buildings of F. Duquesnoy and Alessandro Algardi and with the paintings of Nicolas Poussin, A. Sacchi, and C. Maratta supported by the theories of G. Bellori. In the 18th century the late baroque was represented by the Spanish Stairs, the Ripa Grande, the Trevi Fountain, the Piazza di S. Ignazio, and the facades of the Lateran (1735), S. Maria Maggiore, and S. Croce (1743) under Popes Clement XII (1730–40) and Benedict XIV (1740–58). The latter, a Bolognese and a learned canonist, as well as humanist, was elected in a conclave that lasted six months; he did much to recommend Rome to the Enlightenment, as well as to the courts of Europe, both Catholic and Protestant. The pope wrote definitive works on the process of canonization and the holding of synods and, in his letters, frequently discussed scientific subjects. He founded several academies of learning in Rome, thus attracting the erudite of many countries. Clement XIV (1769–74) introduced measures for the development of trade and industry in the Papal States, but his bad relations with the Roman nobility and with the Catholic states determined on suppressing the Jesuits, prevented his realization of projects for the betterment of the city itself.

French Revolution. Rome became a victim of the French Revolution, when on Dec. 28, 1797, Joseph Bonaparte intervened in its internal affairs and occupied Castel Sant' Angelo on Feb. 10, 1798. On the 15th he proclaimed the end of the papal power and the inauguration of the Roman Republic. The city suffered from internal disruption and was cut off from outside assistance for two years, until an army from Naples liberated it on Sept. 30, 1799. Pius VII (1800–23) was taken prisoner in 1809 by NAPOLEON I, and Rome was proclaimed an imperial city with whose restoration General de Tournon was charged. He began with a rearrangement of Monte Pincio, but met with considerable resistance on the part of the Roman nobility. Pius reentered the city on May 24, 1814, but had to flee a year later before the army of General Murat. He returned in June 1815 after the defeat of the Napoleonic forces at Tolentino (May 3–4).

In his efforts to revitalize Roman life, Gregory XVI (1831–46) encouraged an artistic and architectural resurgence and promoted the excavations of the Roman Forum, opening three museums to house the Etruscan, Egyptian, and ancient Roman discoveries (now located in the Lateran). In executing the urban renewal planned by Tournon, the Pope carried forward the realignment of the borghi or heavily populated sections of the city, ordered the creation of public parks, opened the cemetery of Verano, and proposed a revised approach to the Piazza del Popolo. New sections of the city opened to habitation included the borgo of Mastai and the region between S. Maria degli Angeli and the slope of the Quirinal Hill, now crossed by the Via Nazionale.

The Republic of 1849. The new spirit of the age in public affairs and the desire for a popular share in government prevailed on Pius IX (1846–78), soon after his election, to proclaim amnesty for political exiles and prisoners (July 16, 1848) and to create a municipal council with the right to elect nine magistrates and a senate for the city's public affairs. The attempt aborted upon the assassination of the papal prime minister, Pellegrino Rossi (Nov. 15, 1848). Ten days later the Pope fled to Gaeta. He prorogued the Senate and named Cardinal Castracane head of a new provisional government (Nov. 27 and Dec. 7, 1848).

On Feb. 9, 1849, a new republic was proclaimed that immediately repudiated the temporal power of the pope. It proceeded to confiscate ecclesiastical properties, take control of the schools, abolish the privilege of clerical immunity and the tribunal of the Holy Office, and cancel censorship of the press. But the ensuing financial crisis in particular made the new republic an easy target for the intervention of the French army under General Oudinot, dispatched to Rome by Louis Napoleon (III) at the request of Cardinal Antonelli, the pope's chancellor. After considerable fighting within the city itself, the French forces took full possession (July 3, 1849), and Pius returned to Rome on April 12, 1850.

The pope set about modernizing Rome, providing new administrative and social ordinances, introducing telegraph and railroad facilities, and encouraging new construction. Under French supervision the city enjoyed relative calm until 1867, when Garibaldi attempted to organize a revolution from outside, but he was defeated at Mentana (Nov. 3–4, 1867). The recall of the French troops for the Franco-Prussian War, however, left Rome defenseless, and on Sept. 20, 1870, the city was occupied by the Garibaldian troops. A truce was made by papal representatives, which included respect for the independence of the Vatican and the Leonine City. After a plebiscite on October 2, Rome was annexed by the Kingdom of Italy. In 1871 the Italian government transferred its capital from Florence to Rome and set about transforming the city into a modern metropolis.

Population and Urbanization. Between 1846 and 1870 the population of Rome had doubled to over 200,000 inhabitants, and it continued to increase, making a reordination of the city's inhabitable parts imperative. The plan published by P. Camporese and Alessandro Viviani in 1873, following the commission of General Cadorna, gradually made possible the spread of population from the tight quarters of Trastevere. The destruction of landmarks such as the villae principesche in favor of new quarters on the Esquiline, Boncompagni Ludovisi, and the Salario, helped to inflame political differences but proved an absolute necessity. Likewise, the creation of a net of streets and avenues, such as the Via Nazionale, Corso Vittorio Emanuele, Via Arenula, and Via Tritone, caused great resentment among conservative property owners and antiquarians. But in the end the city was provided with new architectural monuments, proper housing for its inhabitants, and hotels and conveniences for an ever-increasing stream of visitors, while historians and archeologists were given new insights into the city's ancient topography and buildings. Calderini's monument to Victor Emmanuel II on the Piazza Venezia (since 1921, the tomb of the unknown soldier) and the palace of justice by Sacconi were begun before 1890 and completed in 1911. They represented two types of architectural sentiment prevailing at the turn of the 20th century, almost totally alien to contemporary tastes.

Amid the feverish efforts at building and expansion, an anticlerical wave was created by political extremists and capped by the attempt to throw the body of Pius IX into the Tiber in the course of its removal from the Vatican to the cemetery of Verano (1882). The erection of a statue to Giordano Bruno in the Campo de' Fiori almost caused an insurrection on the part of the extreme clerical faction in 1887. However, with the accession of Victor Emmanuel II and the election of Pope LEO XIII (1878–1903), attempts were made to heal the political schism. The pope desired to make Rome an intellectual center for ecclesiastical studies; he prescribed the renewal of Thomistic philosophy and theology in the Roman seminaries and ecclesiastical colleges and encouraged the scientific pursuit of history and humane studies. But following the policy of Pius IX, he stayed strictly within the confines of the Vatican, refused to recognize the kingdom of Italy officially, and prohibited Catholics from participating in the civil government.

“Partito popolare” and Fascism. This policy was continued under St. Pius X (1903–14) and Benedict XV (1914–22), yet it proved impossible to implement, and gradually, with Vatican assent, Catholics entered administrative offices and participated in local Roman elections. In 1919 Luigi STURZO founded the Partito popolare, whose intent was to prepare the way for a government in which all the citizenry could be properly represented. While Italy's participation in World War I (1915–18) brought great hardships on the city, the efforts of Pope BENEDICT XV (1914–22) to put an end to hostilities and his charitable efforts in aiding the people of Rome did much to break down the last signs of enmity between the Vatican and the civil authorities.

At the beginning of his pontificate, Pius XI (1922–39) gave his blessing Urbi et Orbi—to the City and to the World—from the balustrade of St. Peter’s, an ancient custom that had not been honored since 1870. Eight months later, the black-shirt army marched on Rome (October 1922) and brought Benito Mussolini’s Fascist party into power, provoking a series of incidents that kept the city in turmoil for the next 20 years. Gradually the Fascist dictatorship destroyed popular liberties, persecuted the leaders and wrecked the centers of Catholic Action in Rome, dissolved the Partito popolare, and exiled Luigi Sturzo. Its one accomplishment was the signing of the LATERAN PACTS (Treaties) and Concordat on Feb. 11, 1929, whereby Vatican City was recognized as an independent state and the pope, as an independent sovereign ruler. The compensation made by the Italian government for the spoliation of the Papal States was made partly in monetary payments and partly in property, which the Vatican used to benefit the city of Rome as well as the Vatican State. Pontifical ecclesiastical institutes in Rome and other specified properties were given immunity as belonging directly to the Vatican, while transport, postal, and other Vatican necessities were assured safe passage through the city.

“Non abbiamo bisogna.” Relations between the Vatican and Fascist Rome, despite the Concordat and pro-Fascist sympathies of certain ecclesiastical officials, were difficult. The Pope permitted the blessing of Italian troops during the Abyssinian War (1935–36) and spoke encouragingly to the Roman people, but he showed no sympathy for the regime’s policies and insisted on the freedom of sale in Rome of l’Osservatore Romano, the Vatican paper. With the encyclical Non abbiamo bisogna, Pius condemned the racism and exaggerated nationalism of the Fascist political philosophy. Catholics in Rome, as well as statesmen and Jews, who were the objects of persecution, received shelter in the Vatican. When Hitler visited Rome, Pius pointedly left the city for his summer residence in Castelgandolfo.

World War II. The imminent approach of World War II brought Pius XII (1939–58) to the papacy, and during the war he exerted his energies in protecting the persecuted in the city and allaying the worst features of the Fascist defeat (July 25, 1943) and the German occupation (Sept. 10, 1943). Through his efforts Rome was considered an open city, and when the sectors of Tiburtino and Prenestino were bombed (July and August 1943), Pius hurried to the scene to condole with the people. The Pope made a great effort to provision the city and to prevent the deportation of its citizens, and he bewailed the massacres perpetrated in the Via Rasella and the Fosse Ardeatina (March 1944).

With the liberation of Rome by Allied troops on June 4, 1944, Rome became an official sight-seeing objective for millions of the military seeking an audience with the Holy Father, who had been hailed by the Romans as the defensor civitatis, or defender of the city. In the postwar period, Pius was an acknowledged world figure and received visits by heads of state and world leaders, as well as by pilgrims and learned societies of every persuasion, bringing to Rome millions of tourists each year. In 1950 Pius proclaimed a Holy Year, which was celebrated with great religious splendor, and the Pope left the Vatican on several occasions to participate in religious functions. His death and the subsequent papal election focused the eyes of the world on Rome and attracted over 1,000 radio and television reporters.

Modernization. The second half of the twentieth century brought enormous changes to the city of Rome. Pope John XXIII (1958–63) immediately gained Roman and world popularity by his joviality, simple religious faith, and frankness. Taking his office as bishop of Rome as a genuine pastoral responsibility, he frequently left the Vatican to visit infirm friends, institutions, and the various parishes of Rome, most especially those in the poorer quarters or on the periphery of the city. He held a Roman diocesan synod in his cathedral at the Lateran (1960) in preparation for Vatican Council II (1961–65). Pope John’s convocation of the Council led to an increase of international attention on the city of Rome as witnessed by the arrival of many media personnel, as well as ecumenical and interfaith representatives. Catholics from around the world continued to arrive as pilgrims in large numbers and those at home followed the news from Rome eagerly during the Council. Following Pope John’s beatification in 2000, his body was moved to the side altar dedicated to St. Jerome in St. Peter’s Basilica and is displayed there for the veneration of the faithful. It is a popular shrine for Italian pilgrims as well as the many from afar who flock to the Eternal City.

Pope Paul VI (1963–78) built upon the work of his predecessor in the reform of the Church. Sadly, his reign coincided with a time of great turmoil within Italy. He was faced with political problems in secular affairs as well as the ecclesiastical realm. The Catholic governing body of Italy, the Christian Democratic Party, was the subject of numerous scandals and waning popularity. During the mid-1970s his close personal friend, Prime Minister Aldo Moro, was kidnapped by the Italian communist insurgent Red Brigade and assassinated despite personal pleas from the pope. The Mafia was also very active during this period, though their greatest civil disturbances were reserved for the 1990s. Despite the increased internationalism of the ecclesiastical institutions present in Rome, the dwindling numbers of religious vocations throughout much of the world greatly reduced the numbers of seminarians, priests, and religious in the city—often leaving them with enormous and half-empty buildings scattered throughout the historic center of Rome. This prompted further tension with the burgeoning population that demanded “less churches and more houses” as Rome struggled to put an ever-greater number of inhabitants and workers into a museum-like ancient city center. The Holy Year of 1975 provided an additional influx of pilgrims into the city and the realization of Rome’s permanent status as annual host to millions of foreign visitors.

Pope John Paul I (1978) had a minimal impact on the city due to his short, month-long reign. He ventured from the boundaries of the Vatican City State into Rome only once as pope, but his winning smile endeared him to the people. A single red rose is often to be found on his tomb in the crypt of St. Peter’s Basilica as a poignant sign of continuing affection.

Pope John Paul II (1978–) brought a new and international vigor to Rome. The Romans were skeptical of a non-Italian pope, especially since he was becoming the bishop of their city. He quickly allayed their fears as he initiated an ambitious plan to visit every parish in the diocese and actively sought to build new churches in suburban areas to accommodate population growth. His pastoral solicitude for his diocese reached a highpoint in the door-to-door campaign of evangelization and outreach that he personally inaugurated as a preparation for Rome’s special role in the Great Jubilee. The pope’s efforts are met by continued resistance in a city that regards the Church somewhat cynically and where Mass attendance has been estimated at ten percent of a population that is ostensibly Catholic in name and culture.

Pope John Paul II also had to deal with complications in Church-state relations caused by a wide-ranging financial scandal implicating Vatican-owned corporations and by the all-encompassing bribery and corruption probes, which led to the defeat and dissolution of the Christian Democratic Party, with its subsequent crisis of defining how Italian Catholics should best contribute to the political welfare of their nation. He became the outspoken leader of opposition to the Mafia in the face of murders of Italian priests and the bombing of his own cathedral of St. John Lateran and of the ancient church of St. George.

Pope John Paul II’s success in international diplomacy led to the further prestige of Rome as a center of global politics. The peaceful end of the communist regimes of Eastern Europe, the resolution of Panamanian General Manuel Noriega’s fate, and numerous other hidden initiatives occurred in this ancient capital due to papal skill in diplomacy. Continuing negotiations for peace in the Middle East often refer back to Rome, as witnessed by the frequent visits of Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat.

The international character of Rome continues to grow with many refugees and immigrants from the former Soviet-bloc and lesser-developed countries in Africa and Asia. As in the ancient world, Rome is truly a global crossroads. The pastoral challenges posed by this influx have been valiantly met by new Church outreaches to the poor such as the large Roman presence of Mother Teresa’s MISSIONARIES OF CHARITY and the efforts of local lay movements such as the Community of SANT’EGIDIO. There has also been a general rise in the number of new religious orders and ecclesial movements from around the world that have established houses in Rome. An encouraging fruit of Vatican Council II is the increased number of international lay students of theology at the various pontifical universities.

Pope John Paul II’s charisma and world travels have elicited great interest in Rome and increased the desire of people around the world to visit the Eternal City. His travels have also led to the posing of the previously unnecessary question: “Is the Pope at home?” The Wednesday general audiences with the pope draw thousands of pilgrims each week, and the record number of beatifications and canonizations have drawn further millions of the faithful to these special religious ceremonies in Rome. The apex of these visits was the Great Jubilee of 2000 that led to a wholesale refurbishing of the city and updating of its infrastructure. Vast public works projects achieved what has generally been acclaimed as the restoration of Rome to its baroque splendor while making it more “user-friendly” for modern, international visitors. The facades of nearly every important church and prominent building were meticulously cleaned and historic markers posted. Sadly, due to the terrible air pollution in Rome, some of the newly uncovered brilliant white travertine facades noticeably darkened soon afterward. The emergence of internet cafes and of fast-food restaurants also reflects the social changes, for better or worse, in the traditionally slow-paced life of Rome. The subway system (Metropolitana) was greatly extended and connected with an expanded and renovated Leonardo da Vinci airport—both projects meant to facilitate the movement of Jubilee pilgrims. The traffic patterns of Rome were reconfigured to ease tourist buses away from the congested narrow streets of the city center and new city bus lines between the major pilgrimage churches were added. An ambitious underground parking garage was built under the Janiculum hill adjacent to the Vatican and traffic tunnels and pedestrian zones added. The Great Jubilee completed an intense, half-century project to bring Rome into the modern world. Pope John Paul II used the Great Jubilee as an opportunity for close and harmonious collaboration between the Vatican and the Italian government as they strove together to better the city and reconciled their inter-dependence with their independence

Bibliography: Istituto di studi romani, Storia di Roma (Bologna 1938–). F. GREGOROVIVS, Geschichte der Stadt Rom im Mittelalter, ed. W. KAMP, 3 v. (new ed. Basel 1953–57), Eng. tr. from 4th Ger. ed. History of the City of Rome in the Middle Ages, tr. A. HAMILTON, 8 v. in 13 (London 1894–1902). H. GRISAR, History of Rome and the Popes in the Middle Ages, ed. L. CAPPADDELTA, 3 v. (London 1911–12). S. B. PLATNER, A Topographical Dictionary of Ancient Rome, cont. and rev. T. ASHBY (Oxford 1929). R. VIELLIARD, Recherches sur les origines de la Rome chrétienne (Mâcon 1941; repr. Rome 1959). R. KRAUTHEIMER, Corpus Basilicarum Christianarum Romae (Vatican City 1937–). M. ARMELLINI, Le chiese di Roma dal secolo IV al XIX, ed. C. CECHELLI, 2 v. (new ed. Rome 1942). P. DUCATI, L'Arte in Roma dalle origini al secolo VIII (Bologna 1938). F. HERMANIN, L'Arte in Roma dal secolo VIII al XIV (Bologna 1945). E. HUTTON, The Cosmati (London 1950). J. KLACZKO, Rome and the Renaissance, tr. J. DENNIE (New York 1903). R. WITTKOWER, Art and Architecture in Italy, 1600–1750 (Baltimore 1958). C. CESCHI, Le chiese di Roma dagli inizi del Neoclassico al 1961 (Bologna 1963). P. HUGHES, A History of the Church, 3 v. (rev. ed. New York 1947–49). G. MOLLAT, La Question romaine (Paris 1932). S. DE GRADA, “Sviluppo demografico e topografico di Roma negli ultimo cento anni,” Rivista diocesana di Roma (1961) 259–266, 327–333. Prima romana synodus (Vatican City 1960). E. CLARK, Rome and a Villa (2d ed. New York 1974). M. VASI and A. NIBBY, Roma nell'Ottocento (Rome 1976). G. BARACCONI, I rioni di Roma (Rome 1971). R. KAUTHEIMER, Rome. Profile of a City, 312–1308 (Princeton 1980). G. MASSON, The Companion Guide to Rome (6th ed. Englewood Cliffs, NJ 1983). R. KRAUTHEIMER, The Rome of Alexander VIII, 1655–1667 (Princeton 1985). C. D'ONOFRIO, Visitiamo Roma nel Quattrocento: La città degli umanisti (Rome 1989). D. J. BIRCH, Pilgrimage to Rome in the Middle Ages: Continuity and Change (Rochester, NY 1998). Roma nell'alto Medioevo: 27 Aprile–1 Maggio 2000 (Spoleto 2001). I. DEGUTTRY, Guide to Modern Rome: Architecture 1870–2000 (Rome 2001). R. M. SAN JUAN, Rome: A City Out of Print (Minneapolis 2001).

[F. X. MURPHY/J. JOHNSON]

ROME, LEGENDS OF CHRISTIAN

Originally, the passages in the lives and passions of the martyrs and confessors that were to be read (Latin legenda) for edification or as part of the liturgy. Only later did the word legend come to signify the stories and tales connected with poetic, religious, and folkloristic traditions. In Rome, with the rise of the veneration of martyrs and their relics, and particularly the ritualistic visitation of the catacombs and the translation of relics that began in the 4th century, embellishments were added to the original Acta or Passiones of the martyrs, and stories were created to explain the designations of localities or churches and to identify saints unknown but for their names.

A primary source of Roman Christian legends was the continuity between the Old and New Testaments based on Christ's words: “It is necessary that all things be fulfilled, that Moses and the prophets have written of me” (Lk 24.44). In the catacombs and earliest churches this was illustrated in the so-called Cycle of the Concordance of the Old and New Testaments; for example, Adam driven from paradise was replaced by the incident of the good thief; Joseph sold into Egypt, was paralleled in the incident of Christ sold by Judas; and Jonas escaping from the whale's belly, with Christ rising from the tomb. In the NT apocryphal literature details of the life of Christ not mentioned in the Gospels and the fate of the Apostles were supplied to illustrate theological beliefs or satisfy curiosity. Realism was achieved, e.g., by portraying the Magi as three kings carrying a crown of gold, globules of incense, and a phial of myrrh, even marked with the price in denarii (Roman currency). The lure of heresy is likewise depicted by adapting the story of Ulysses tied to the mast to avoid the sirens, to a Christian fastened to a cross that is the yardarm of a ship representing the Church. The Pseudo-Clementine literature attests the popularity of legends concerning SS. Peter and Paul with, in the beginning, considerable stress on the Prince of the Apostle's human weakness overcome by Christ's immediate assistance, as in the QUO VADIS story and in elaborations of the motif of the crowing of the cock after his denial of Christ (Mt 26.74–75).

In the acts of the martyrs realistic dialogue and scenes of heroic defiance, as well as humble submission to death, such as that of SS. LAWRENCE and CECILIA, seem to have been an early Roman contribution that is further illustrated by the stories connected with Rome's title churches. During the 5th century the original names of donors or locations of these churches were changed into saint's names and equipped with corresponding legends. This phenomenon was given impulse by the lives of the desert fathers, brought to the Eternal City; for example, St. ATHANASIUS (340) brought his Life of St. Anthony and PALLADIUS his Historia Lausiaca (420), which were quickly translated into Latin. Ancient myths and romances, Roman traditions, and Oriental tales were plagiarized for details and settings, and a specifically Christian type of legend came into being in Rome and grew to uncontrollable proportions during the Middle Ages.

Constantinian legends were connected with the emperor's vision of the cross and the words “In hoc signo vinces” (in this sign you will conquer); his Baptism by Pope SILVESTER I and his cure from leprosy; St. HELENA and the finding of the true cross; and the politically directed Constantinian DONATION. This series was continued with the CHARLEMAGNE legends of the Middle Ages. There were stories of divine intervention for the guidance of the popes from the appearance to Pope LIBERIUS of snow on August 5 to indicate the location for the basilica of St. Mary Major, the correction of the Tome of Pope LEO I laid on Peter's tomb, to Pope PASCHAL II'S discovery of the relics of St. AGNES, and the depiction of Sylvester II as a magician.

One of the most popular legends of the Middle Ages was supported by the displaying of Veronica's veil with the picture of the face of Christ on the way to Calvary. Another was the Scala Sancta, the staircase up which Christ was led for judgment before Pilate, that was said to have been brought to Rome from Jerusalem by St. Helena. In like manner, Vergil's Fourth Eclogue was considered a prophecy referring to the birth of Christ. With his preaching of pietas and propaganda in favor of virtue, VERGIL was considered a paragon of the ANIMA NATURALITER CHRISTIANA and used by DANTE as a guide in his Divina Commedia, a work that embodied a corpus of Roman Christian legend. A summation of the legends of the early Church had been contained in the Gloria Martyrum of GREGORY OF TOURS (538–594) and in the Dialogues of Pope GREGORY I (590–604). Those of the Middle Ages were embodied in the Legenda Aurea of JAMES OF VORAGINE and the Vitae Patrum of Rosweyde. During the Middle Ages every church and almost every ancient ruin, building, or statue had its legends, many of them a fantastic blending of Biblical stories with the lays of ancient Rome.

After a period of rejection during the Reformation; of complete cynicism during the Enlightenment; of an attempt to dechristianize the lives of the saints by tracing their origin and objectives to Celtic, Germanic, Oriental, and Buddhistic myths on the part of such scholars as P. Lucius, H. Usener, and R. Reitzenstein; modern investigation has returned to an appreciation of the value of Christian legends. They witness both to a kernel of historical fact regularly preserved in the legend and to the mentality and beliefs of the people among whom they were popularized. This reevaluation has been a contribution of the BOLLANDISTS in particular, with the Acta Sanctorum; but it has been due also to the increasing interest on the part of specialists in folklore, cultural anthropology, philology, and popular psychology.

Bibliography: H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 8.2:2309–2460. W. BÖHNE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 6:876–878. H. DELEHAYE, Cinq leçons sur la méthode hagiographique (Brussels 1934); Étude sur le légendier romain (Brussels 1936). H. F. R. ROSENFELD, Der hl. Christophorus (Leipzig 1937). R. AIGRAIN, L'Hagiographie (Paris 1953). G. PARIS, Poèmes et légendes du moyen-âge (Paris 1900). H. THURSTON, The Holy Year of Jubilee (London 1900; repr. Westminster, Md. 1949).

P. LUCIUS, Die Anfänge des Heiligenkults (Tübingen 1904). E. MUSATTI, Leggende popolari (3d ed. Milan 1904). H. GÜNTHER, Legenden-Studien (Cologne 1906); Die christliche Legende des Abendlandes (Heidelberg 1910); Psychologie der Legende (Freiburg 1949); The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al., 16 v. (New York 1907–14; suppl. 1922) 9:128–131. F. LANZONI, Genesi, svolgimento e tramonto delle leggende storiche (Studi e Testi 43; 1925). E. E. MALONE, The Monk and the Martyr (Washington 1950).

[F. X. MURPHY]

ROME, PATRIARCHATE OF

The division of the fourth-century Church into PATRIARCHATES for ecclesiastical government was the result of comparable divisions of the Roman Empire. The organization of individual patriarchates was subject to many local and historical factors, which accounts for the many differences among the patriarchates of Rome, CONSTANTINOPLE, ALEXANDRIA, ANTIOCH, and JERUSALEM.

The pope is the patriarch of Rome, or patriarch of the West as he is sometimes called, while at the same time holding other offices. He is the bishop of Rome and rules the See of Rome just as any other bishop rules his diocese. He is also the metropolitan who presides over the ecclesiastical Province of ROME and is primate of the bishops of Italy while exercising primacy and fullness of jurisdiction over the universal Church as POPE.

Division of the Empire. The lines for the future patriarchate of Rome were first drawn by Emperor Diocletian in 293 when he divided the Roman Empire into four prefectures: Gaul, Italy, Illyricum, and the Orient. After the death of Emperor Theodosius (395), a definitive division of the Empire into the Occident and the Orient was made. The Prefectures of Gaul and Italy constituted the Occidental Empire. Gaul was made up of three dioceses (a term originally used for civil administration): Spain, with seven provinces; Gaul, with seventeen; and Britain, with five. Italy was also made up of three dioceses: Africa, with seven provinces; Illyricum (Occidental), with seven; and Italy, with seventeen. In the Diocese of Italy there were seven provinces of the north dependent on the vicarius of Italy; the other ten were administered by the vicarius of Rome. This jurisdiction was divided and administered by the prefect of the city of Rome and the prefect of the suburban areas.

The ecclesiastical divisions coincided with the civil administrative divisions, thus, the pope of Rome enjoyed a gradually increased jurisdiction over the above-described area. The Council of Nicaea (325) gave the first hint of any ecclesiastical jurisdictional provinces in canon 6: "The ancient custom is to be observed throughout Egypt, Libya and Pentapolis wherein the bishop of Alexandria has power over all of these areas since he exercises a similar power as that exercised by the bishop of the city of Rome” (J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio [Florence-Venice 1757–98] 2:670). Thus the extent, at least, of the pope’s jurisdiction in his ecclesiastical area can be known from the civil division of administration.

As to the nature of the jurisdiction exercised, historical documents are not clear. The pope did not consecrate the bishops for Gaul, Spain, and Africa; neither did he call the synods for these churches. Latin Africa seemed to be highly centralized in Carthage, whereas Spain and Gaul gave no indication of any consistent centralization under the bishop of Rome. There are indications that the pope intervened occasionally (such as in the cases of Marcian of Arles and of two bishops in Spain, Merida, and Astorga), but the centralization of the well-defined future Roman patriarchate is not observable.

Under Pope St. Leo the Great in the fifth century, the Church of Rome made strides toward centralization. Emperor Valentinian III confirmed the pope’s right to force bishops of all of the Italian provinces to appear before his tribunal. The greatest advance in papal centralization resulted from the expanding missionary activity emanating from Rome to Germany, the Frankish Empire, and England.

Legislation. Emperor Justinian (d. 565) codified in his civil and ecclesiastical laws the five chief patriarchates as the primary units of ecclesiastical administration: “We decree therefore the most blessed archbishops and patriarchs, that is, of more venerable Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch and Jerusalem . . .” (Corpus iuris civilis, Novellae [Berlin] 126). In Corpus iuris civilis, Novellae 131 he fixed the order of precedence: “The most holy Pope of ancient Rome, the first priest of all; the most blessed archbishop of Constantinople of New Rome has the second place.” Thus, with Justinian’s laws the Patriarchate of Rome and the four Oriental patriarchates became an officially recognized ecclesiastical organization with dignities, rights, duties, and areas of jurisdiction defined by law. It must be kept in mind, however, that the actual exercise of these jurisdictional rights within a given province varied because of factors peculiar to a given patriarchate.

The pope exercises his patriarchal jurisdiction over all of Western Europe, Africa west of Egypt, all other “diaspora” lands evangelized by missionaries from Europe—such as North and South America, Australia, and the major portion of India—and the Latin Christians in the Near and Far East of the Roman rite. He may call a patriarchal synod or simply choose by written decree to enact laws of discipline and liturgical usages applicable for the Roman or Western patriarchate only.

Bibliography: P. BATIFFOL, La Paix constantinienne et le catholicisme (2d ed. Paris 1914); Le Siècle apostolique, 359–451 (Paris 1924). L. DUCHESNE, Histoire ancienne de l’Église, 3 v. (Paris 1906–10), v.1. H. BURN-MURDOCH, The Development of the Papacy (New York 1954). C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d’après les documents originaux, tr. and continued by H. LECLERCQ (Paris 1907–38) v.1. F. MAASSEN, Der Primat des Bischofs von Rom und die alten Patriarchalkirchen (Bonn 1853). Y.M.J. CONGAR, “Le Pape comme patriarche d’Occident: approche d’une réalité trop négligée,” Istina 28 (1983) 374–390.

[G. A. MALONEY/EDS.]

ROMERO, JUAN

Jesuit missionary and theologian; b. Marchena, Seville, 1559; d. Santiago, Chile, March 31, 1630. He entered the Jesuits in Montilla in 1580, and in 1589 went to Lima, where he completed his ecclesiastical studies. After ordination he was professor of theology in Lima. He received his training for the missions at Juli, Puno, Peru. From 1593 to 1598 he was superior of the Tucumán (Argentina) mission, did missionary work in Asunción, Salta, Jujuy, Córdoba, Santa Fé, and Corrientes. In 1597 he was the theologian for the diocesan synod of Santiago del Estero; in 1608, as reporter of his province to the Jesuit general, he went to Rome. He was superior of Buenos Aires, Santiago del Estero, Santiago de Chile, and Concepción. In 1625 he was the first vice provincial of Chile. His work was threefold: as missionary he worked in the areas of the Chaco-Santiagueno, Guaraní, Araucana, and Quechua native cultures; as superior he organized active missions and schools; as theologian and canonist he published a two-volume work, De praedestinatione. In 1610 as a result of his experience in Tucumán, he sent the Council of the Indies a memorial on future administrative policy for the port of Buenos Aires.

Bibliography: E. TORRES SALDAMANDO, Los antiguos jesuitas del Perú (Lima 1882).

[A. DE EGAÑA]

ROMERO, OSCAR A.

Archbishop of San Salvador, El Salvador (1977–80); b. Ciudad Barrios, Aug. 15, 1917; d. San Salvador, March 24, 1980. Romero is remembered for his courageous preaching and leadership of the San Salvador archdiocese. His efforts toward the creation of a more just society led to his assassination.

Ordained to the priesthood in 1942, Romero returned to his native El Salvador, where he served as pastor to a church in the city of San Miguel and earned a reputation as a radio preacher. In 1967 he was appointed secretary of the Salvadoran bishops' conference, and in 1970 he was made an auxiliary bishop of San Salvador. He became bishop of the rural diocese of Santiago de María in late 1974 and archbishop of San Salvador on Feb. 22, 1977.

At the time of his elevation to the rank of archbishop, wealthy landowners were attacking the Church's pastoral practice in the countryside. Peasants were forming small ecclesial communities in which they learned to discuss the gospel and apply it to the unjust social conditions that dominated their own lives. Many of them joined peasant organizations to seek social and political change. Controlling the mass media and the government, the oligarchy kept Romero under constant pressure and frequent attack. During his years as archbishop, six priests and numerous lay ministers were assassinated, but the archbishop was never intimidated. A compelling preacher, Romero reached large audiences through his use of the archdiocesan radio station, where he worked for the Church by defending the poor and calling for social justice.

Foreseeing his own assassination, he intensified his message in his final weeks. On March 23, 1980, he pleaded with the government to stop the repression of dissent, calling on soldiers not to obey orders to murder peasants. The next day, an assassin's bullet felled him while he preached in the chapel of the cancer hospital that also served as his residence. He is widely venerated as a martyr, and his tomb in the San Salvador cathedral is a popular shrine.

Bibliography: O. A. ROMERO, Mons. Oscar A. Romero: Su Pensamiento, extant homilies in eight projected volumes (San Salvador 1980). La Voz de los Sin Voz: La Palabra Viva de Monseñor Romero (San Salvador 1980); English translation: Voice of the Voiceless: The Four Pastoral Letters and Other Statements (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1985). The Church Is All of You, ed. J. R. Brockman (Minneapolis 1984). J. R. BROCKMAN, Romero: A Life (New York 1990). J. SOBRINO, Archbishop Romero: Memories and Reflections (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1990).

[J. R. BROCKMAN]

ROMO GONZÁLEZ, TORIBIO, ST.

Martyr, priest; b. April 16, 1900, at Santa Ana de Guadalupe, near Jalostotitlán, Jalisco, Diocese of San Juan de los Lagos, Mexico; d. Feb. 25, 1928, Tequila, Jalisco, Archdiocese of Guadalajara. At thirteen he began studying at the minor seminary of San Juan de los Lagos. He participated in Catholic Action while attending Guadalajara's seminary (1920–22), and was ordained 1922. His ministry in various parishes (Sayula, Tuxpan, Yahualica, Cuquío, and Tequila) concentrated on preparing catechesis, assisting workers, and promoting Eucharistic devotion. Forced into hiding with St. Justino ORONA, he made his headquarters in an abandoned factory and conducted his ministry in Tequila at night. Soldiers broke in and shot him. In 1948, his body was enshrined in a chapel built for it at Jalostotitlán. Fr. Romo was both beatified (Nov. 22, 1992) and canonized (May 21, 2000) with Cristobal MAGALLANES [see GUADALAJARA (MEXICO), MARTYRS OF, SS.] by Pope John Paul II.

Feast: May 25 (Mexico).

Bibliography: J. CARDOSO, Los mártires mexicanos (Mexico City 1953). J. DÍAZ ESTRELLA, El movimiento cristero: sociedad y conflicto en los Altos de Jalisco (México, D.F. 1979).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ROMUALD, ST.

Founder of the CAMALDOLESE; b. Ravenna, Italy, c. 952; d. hermitage at Val di Castro, near Fabriano, Italy, June 19, 1027. The son of a nobleman named Sergius, Romuald entered the monastery of San Apollinare in Classe when he was 20 years old to do penance on behalf of his father, who had killed a kinsman. He became a monk there after seeing St. Apollinaris in a vision. Three years later he went to the mainland near Venice in search of a more austere way of life and became the disciple of a hermit named Marinus. In c. 978 Romuald and Marinus, together with Guarin, abbot of the Abbey of CUXA in the Pyrenees, who was visiting Venice, persuaded the Doge PETER ORSEOLO to abdicate, and all three returned to Cuxa with Guarin. Romuald and Marinus lived an eremitical life there near the monastery. After ten years Romuald returned to Italy to strengthen the vocation of his father, who had become a monk, and he remained there for the rest of his life. Emperor OTTO III greatly revered Romuald for his sanctity of life, and in 998 appointed him abbot of San Apollinare in Classe, but at the end of a year Romuald resigned the office and went to live in a hermitage at Pereum in the nearby marshes. This became an important center for training clergy, e.g., BRUNO OF QUERFURT, for the Slavonic mission field. Romuald wanted to die a martyr's death and set out to preach to the Magyars, but was forced to abandon the journey on account of his age. He spent the rest of his life founding eremitical congregations in northern and central Italy, among them, VALLOMBROSA. But the most important of these was CAMALDOLI near Arezzo, founded in 1023–27, which later became the motherhouse of the Camaldolese Order. Romuald left no written rule for his monks. When his body was exhumed in 1466 it was found to be incorrupt. It was transferred to Fabriano in 1481.

Feast: June 19 and Feb. 7 (translation).

Bibliography: PETER DAMIAN, Vita beati Romualdi, ed. G. TABACCO (Fonti per la storia d'Italia 94; Rome 1957); La Vie du bienheureux Romuald, tr., L. A. LASSUS (Namur 1962). W. FRANKE, Quellen und Chronologie zur Geschichte Romualds von Camaldoli (Halle 1910); Romuald von Camaldoli und seine Reformtätigkeit zur Zeit Ottos III (Berlin 1913, 2d ed. Vaduz 1965). P. CIAMPELLI, Vita di s. Romualdo abate, fondatore dei Camaldolesi (Ravenna 1927). J. LECLERCQ, "Saint Romuald et le monachisme missionnaire," Revue Bénédictine 72 (1962) 307–323. G. TABACCO, "La data di fondazione di Camaldoli," Rivista di storia della Chiesa in Italia, 16 (1962) 451–455. A. PAGNINI, Vita di S. Romualdo abate, fondatore dei camaldolesi (2d ed. Camaldoli 1967). T. MATUS, ed., The Mystery of Romuald and the Five Brothers (Trabuco Canyon, CA 1994). L. VIGILUCCI, Camaldoli: A Journey into its History & Spirituality, tr. P.-D. BELISLE (Trabuco Canyon, CA 1995).

[B. HAMILTON]

RONAN, ST.

Missionary bishop in Brittany c. seventh century. The legend that an Irish saint, called Ronan (Rumon or Ruan), labored and died in Brittany may have its origin in the cult of his relics there. He is possibly to be identi-

Stone carving of Saint Ronan, sculpture by Ken Thompson. (©Jacqui Hurst/CORBIS)

fied with one of the many saints of that name, about whom practically no historical details survive and who are mentioned in the Irish MARTYROLOGIES, e.g., Ronan of Lough Derg on the Shannon (January 13); Bishop Ronan of Lismore, County Waterford, whose obituary remains in doubt in spite of the effort of the Annals of Inisfallen to provide him with one at the year 763 (February 9); Ronan son of Fergus (April 8); Ronan of County Louth (April 30); Ronan of Lann Ronain in County Down (May 22); Ronan son of Máge (July 15); Ronan Find son of Berach of Druminiskin, County Louth (November 18); and Ronan Find son of Aíd of Achad Farcha in County Meath (December 23). The most famous of these was the Ronan son of Berach, who died 661 or 664, for his relics were carefully preserved in Ireland, and it is known also that his cult spread abroad, perhaps even as far as Brittany. The various feasts in Ireland and Brittany present a great but not insurmountable difficulty against identification, and it may well be asked what connection, if any, had these Ronans with the homonym venerated in Scotland under the form of the name Mo-Rónóc. The efforts of early glossators and some modern scholars at differentiating and identifying have been more ingenious than enlightening.

Feast: June 1.

Bibliography: Rónán of Drumiskin. Vita, ed. A. PONCELET in Analecta Bollandiana 17 (1898) 161–166, has little historical value but became the basis for the literary tradition of the saint. “Fledh Dúin na nGéd,” ed. C. MARSTRANDER, Videnskabselskabets skrifter, II Hist-Filos. Klasse, 1909, No. 6 (Oslo 1910). J. G. O’KEEFE, ed., Buile Suibhne (Dublin 1952), where he is identified with Rónán of Lann Rónáin. Rónán of Brittany. Vita, tr. into Fr. by F. PLAINE in Bulletin de la Société archéologique de la Finistère 16 (1889) 263–318, where he is also called Renan but this vita is fictitious. Rónán (or Rumon) of Tavistock in Devon. Vita, ed. P. GROSJEAN in Analecta Bollandiana 71 (1953) 359–375, based almost entirely on that of Rónán of Brittany. Literature. P. GROSJEAN, op. cit. L. GOUGAUD, Les Saints irlandais hors d’Irlande étudiés dans le culte et dans la dévotion traditionnelle (Louvain 1936) 159–166. A. P. FORBES, Kalendars of Scottish Saints (Edinburgh 1872) 441–442. J. GAMMACK, A Dictionary of Christian Biography, ed. W. SMITH and H. WACE, 4v. (London 1877–87) 4:554. L. BIELER, in Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 9:38. R. E. DOISE, Saint Ronan de Locronan (Châteaulin 1973).

[C. MCGRATH]

RONCHAMP, NOTRE-DAME DU HAUT

Notre-Dame du Haut Ronchamp is a pilgrimage shrine chapel situated on the hill of Ronchamp (Haute-Saône) in eastern France, dedicated on June 25, 1955 and an important achievement in 20th-century church architecture.

The present structure was preceded by two churches: the first, probably a Romanesque structure dedicated to Our Lady of September (month of pilgrimages), was given an extension in the 19th century and was destroyed by fire in 1913; a second church (Neo-Gothic) was raised in its place, but in September 1944 the hill became a battlefield between French and German troops, and the church was reduced to crumbling walls.

Le Corbusier (Charles Édouard Jeanneret, architect, painter, writer), engaged by a diocesan committee animated by Canon Ledeur, drew plans for a new chapel that were approved by Archbishop Dubourg of Besançon on Jan. 20, 1951. Construction began in the spring of 1953 and ended in 1955.

The chapel has a human scale of modest dimension with the nave varying in height from about 15½ feet at its lowest to 33 feet at its highest over the main altar. The nave can accommodate about 200 people (seating designed for 48) and serves well for small groups or for individual worship. It houses also three side chapels. Utilizing the natural site of the hillside, an outdoor sanctuary with altar and pulpit is permanently installed to serve the exceptional crowds on pilgrimage days.

The east, north, and west walls and chapel towers are built of reclaimed stones, are curved for greater stability, and are covered with cement gun plaster (white-washed gunite concrete); the south wall, mostly hollow, is a gunite shell structured with concrete posts and beams. The roof is composed of two thin concrete shells (about two inches thick) held apart by seven beams (each different) that rest on columns contained in the walls. The inner surface of the roof does not touch the walls, permitting a thin horizontal shaft of light to enter. The enameled panels of the main doors and the windows were all designed by Le Corbusier. Other elements are: pews, which have concrete supports with wooden backs, seats, and kneelers executed by Savina; communion table of cast iron; altar in dressed stone from Burgundy; floor paving of stone in the sacred places and concrete elsewhere.

The chapel derives its spatial order from the action of the liturgy giving each space its relative spiritual value. Thus the nave, walls, floor, and roof expand space toward the sanctuary with an easy orchestration of natural shapes. The inner space is animated with pure light, skillfully and precisely managed through many shafts that create a dimmer nave, lighten the concrete roof, and intensify the sanctuary spaces. The exterior curved walls reveal the shape of interior volumes; the whole structure derives strength from a sensitively designed correspondence with its natural setting.

Bibliography: E. N. ROGERS, “Il metodo di Le Corbusier e la forma della ‘Chapelle de Ronchamp,’” Casabella continua No. 207 (1955) 2–6. C. E. JEANNERET-GRIS, The Chapel at Ronchamp (New York 1957); Le Corbusier: Chapelle N.-D. du Haut à Ronchamp (Paris 1957). J. PETIT, Le Livre de Ronchamp, Le Corbusier (ibid. 14; Paris 1961). P. MERKLE et al., Ein Tag mit Ronchamp (Einsiedeln 1958). J. PICHARD, Modern Church Architecture, tr. E. CALLMANN (New York 1962). G. MERCIER, L’Art abstrait dans l’art sacré (Paris 1964) 85–87. G. E. KIDDER SMITH, The New Churches of Europe (New York 1964) 86–97.

[A. TAVES]

RONGE, JOHANN

Founder of the “German Catholics” sect; b. Bischofswalde (Silesia), Oct. 16, 1813; d. Vienna, Oct. 26, 1887. Ronge, a man inclined to religious scrupulosity, studied theology at Breslau, was ordained (1840), and acted as curate in Grottkau. His bishop rebuked him privately for unpriestly behavior (Oct. 29, 1841) and suspended him (Jan. 30, 1843) after he wrote an article in 1842 condemnatory of Rome. Ronge then became headmaster of a private school at Laurahütte. On Oct. 13, 1844, he issued a public letter vigorously attacking Bp. Wilhelm Arnoldi of TRIER for exhibiting (for the first time since 1810) the relic of the Holy Coat. The letter created a sensation, and Ronge was excommunicated and degraded from the priesthood. Protestants sympathized with Ronge and encouraged him to start a German Catholic movement that would draw together nationalistically inclined persons who were dissatisfied with the Church's position on dogmatic questions and on disciplinary matters, such as mixed marriages and celibacy. Ronge founded in Breslau a dissenting congregation that rejected most of the doctrines previously denounced by another ex-priest, Johann CZERSKI; however, Ronge's group was more rationalistic and nationalistic. To a council in Leipzig (1845) 15 autonomous congregations sent delegates. By 1847 the movement of Deutschkatholizismus reached its high point of 80,000 members. At a second council, held in Berlin (1847), 259 communities sent representatives, 88 of whom had formerly been priests. Despite intensive propaganda, directed to German Catholics even in the U.S., the movement declined after 1848. In 1850 the "German Catholics" joined the Protestant Free Congregations, and in 1859 they united with the Friends of Light to form an anti-Christian sect. By 1900 there were scarcely 2,000 "German Catholics." In 1921 the remnant joined the antireligious Volksbund für Geistesfreiheit. Because of his active part in the revolution of 1848, Ronge had to seek asylum in London until 1861. Upon his return to Germany he dwelt in Breslau, Frankfurt am Main, and Darmstadt. He died a freethinker.

Notre-Dame du Haut Ronchamp, built by Le Corbusier between 1950 and 1955. (©Marc Garanger/CORBIS)

Bibliography: H. J. CHRISTIANI, Johannes Ronges Werdegang bis zu seiner Exkommunikation (Berlin 1924). W. LEESCH, Die Geschichte des Deutschkatholizismus in Schlesien (Breslau 1938). L. W. SILBERHORN, "Der Epilog eines religiösen Reformers," Zeitschrift für Religions- und Geistesgeschichte 6 (1954) 114–138. K. ALGERMISSEN, Konfessionskunde (4th ed. Hanover 1930) 181–221. K. ALGERMISSEN, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*² 3:279; 9:38. G. MARON, *Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart*³ 2:112–113; 5:1181.

[V. CONZEMIUS]

ROOTHAAN, JOHANN PHILIPP

Superior general of the JESUITS; b. Amsterdam, Nov. 23, 1785; d. Rome, May 8, 1853. His parents were former Calvinists who had emigrated from Frankfort. After guidance from A. Beckers, a former Jesuit, classical studies under D. van Lennep, and serving as aide to his surgeon-father, at 18 he went to Dvinsk (Dunaburg) in White Russia, where in 1804 he joined the Jesuits who had survived the suppression. He taught classics there (1806–09). After studying philosophy and theology at Polotsk, he was ordained (1812). He was at Pusza when Pius VII restored the Society of Jesus throughout the world (Aug. 7, 1814). When Russia later expelled most Jesuits in 1820, Roothaan was sent from Orsza to Brig, Switzerland, where he taught rhetoric, preached missions, and aided the vice-provincial of Germany, Belgium, and Holland. Roothaan was founder and rector of a college at Turin (1823). Elected in 1829 superior general of the order, he was dismayed at the defiance confronting papal civil government and at the inadequate formation of the flood of post-restoration candidates (Lighthart, 71). He issued 11 letters to the Society to organize energetically, if sternly, worldwide Jesuit efforts to regain presuppression prestige and efficiency. He displayed courage in imposing a carefully studied but somewhat monolithic interpretation of IGNATIAN SPIRITUALITY, the RATIO STUDIORUM, and THOMISM. In his efforts to build the Church in the U.S., he appealed for volunteers to work there; made Maryland into a viable Jesuit province (89 members); and later detached the St. Louis province from it. He refused the offer of a college at Notre Dame, Ind., but sent Anton Anderledy, the later superior general, and other European Jesuits who were exiled in 1848, to found Marquette University in Milwaukee. During his term as superior general he saw the order double in numbers to 5,000.

Bibliography: J. P. ROOHTAAN, Epistolae, 5 v. (Rome 1935–40). C. J. LIGTHART, The Return of the Jesuits: The Life of Jan Philip Roothaan, tr. A. NAZE (London 1978). R. NORTH, The General Who Rebuilt the Jesuits (Milwaukee 1944).

[R. NORTH]

ROPER, WILLIAM

Biographer of St. Thomas MORE; b. c. 1495; d. Jan. 4, 1578. He was the eldest son of John Roper of Eltham, Kent, a prothonotary of the King's Bench and a friend of Sir John More, father of Sir Thomas.

William entered Lincoln's Inn in 1518 and came to live with the Mores in Bucklersbury. Three years later William married Margaret, the eldest and favorite daughter of Thomas More. About this time Roper became a Lutheran but later returned to the Catholic faith. When his father died in 1524, William succeeded him as prothonotary. He was called to the Bar in 1525. By then the Ropers had moved with the Mores to Chelsea. After More resigned as Lord Chancellor in 1532, he made a gift to the Ropers of a portion of his Chelsea estate known as Butclose. William and Margaret took the Oath to the Succession, but were not present at More's trial on July 1, 1535. William's account of the last meeting between Margaret and her father is so vivid that it suggests he was there. Margaret was present at her father's burial and she retrieved his head from London Bridge. The Council questioned her about her father's papers but took no further action.

A dispute in 1541 between Roper and Dame Alice More about Sir Thomas's lands in Battersea was settled by arbitration. His name is found in the reports of the opposition in Kent about 1542 to Cranmer but he escaped trouble. He was in the Tower for a period in 1543 for having aided an opponent of the supremacy, but he was released on paying a fine and resumed his position as prothonotary. Margaret died at Christmas 1544 and was buried at Chelsea. William did not marry again. He gave up Butclose in 1547 and with William RASTELL took the tenancy of Crosby Place in London.

During the reign of Edward VI Roper remained in England but sent his eldest son, Thomas, to Louvain University. After the accession of Mary Tudor, Roper became sheriff of Kent and a member of Parliament for Rochester in 1554. In the following year, he and William Rastell were made freemen of Canterbury, which they represented in Parliament in 1555 and 1558. While Rastell was editing the English Works of Thomas More, Roper helped financially with the publication in 1557. He also wrote down his recollections of More as an aid to Nicholas Harpsfield, who was writing a full biography. The small book by Roper is an imperishable portrait without which we should lack much of our knowledge of More as a person. It is also a tribute to Margaret Roper for she plays a leading part in the narrative. The book was first published with the title The Mirrour of Vertue in Worldly Greatness; it bore the imprint of Paris but was printed at the English College, St. Omer.

Among Roper's friends was Sir Thomas White who founded the College of St. John Baptist at Oxford in 1555; he appointed Roper one of the life visitors.

Roper was a generous man. He made an endowment for the relief of prisoners; he supported Nicholas Harpsfield during his 12 years in prison under Elizabeth; he contributed to the cost of publishing books by the Catholic exiles in defense of their religion; for this he was summoned before the Council in 1568 and was reprimanded. He also supported financially the English College founded at DOUAI in 1568. The first record of his recusancy is dated 1569 when he was reported for not attending his parish church, and a return of the Inns of Court in 1577 names him and his two sons for not receiving Communion. His official position no doubt protected him but he must have taken the oath to Elizabeth. In 1577 he attempted to relieve Bl. Thomas Sherwood in the Tower. He was a shrewd man of business for, at his death, he left property in six counties. His wish to be buried at Chelsea with his wife was not observed; he was buried in the Roper vault at St. Dunstan's, Canterbury, where the head of Thomas More rests.

Bibliography: W. ROPER, Lyfe of Sir Thomas Moore, Knighte, ed. E. V. HITCHCOCK (Early English Text Society 197; London 1935). E. E. REYNOLDS, Margaret Roper (New York 1960); Saint Thomas More (New York 1953); Trial of St. Thomas More (New York 1964). R. W. CHAMBERS, Thomas More (Westminster, MD 1949).

[E. E. REYNOLDS]

RORE, CIPRIANO DE

Renaissance composer famous for his madrigals; b. Low Countries (Mechlin or Antwerp), 1516; d. Parma, Italy, 1565. He studied with WILLAERT in Venice, and his early madrigals (1542–44) already show unusual talent. By 1546 he was maestro in Ferrara at the court of Ercole II, succeeding VICENTINO. In 1561 he joined the court of Ottavio Farnese in Parma, and he remained there until his death, except for a brief stay in Venice as Willaert's successor at St. Mark's. His Masses are in traditional style; the motets mediate between this and the madrigals. He relied for texts on Petrarch (e.g., the Vergine bella) but later turned to contemporary sonnet writers, such as Parabosco, Spira, and Molino. Despite the danger that such expressive poetry might dominate the music, compositional unity was artfully maintained. Stylistically he was influenced by Willaert; his own influence on Lasso, Monte, Palestrina, and even on Monteverdi was so great that he might safely be called the precursor of the seconda prattica.

Bibliography: Opera omnia, ed. B. MEIER, Corpus mensurabilis musicae, ed. American Institute of Musicology v.14 (Rome 1959–). J. MUSIOL, Cyprian de Rore (Breslau 1932). A. EINSTEIN, The Italian Madrigal, tr. A. H. KRAPPE et al., 3 v. (Princeton 1949). A. PIRRO, Histoire de la musique (Paris 1940). A. H. JOHNSON, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 11:897–901. "The Masses of Cipriano de Rore," Journal of the American Musicological Society 6 (Boston 1953) 227–239. G. REESE, Music in the Renaissance (rev. ed. New York 1959) 309, 329–. A. CAMBIER, "Hoe de herkomst van Cypriaan de rore ontrafeld werd," Musica Antiqua 5 (1988) 124–29. A. H. JOHNSON, The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980). S. LAVIA, Cipriano de Rore as Reader and as Read: A Literary-Musical Study of Madrigals from Rore's Later Collections (1557–1566) (Ph.D. diss. Princeton University, 1991). A. J. LLOYD, Modal Representation in the Early Madrigals of Cipriano de Rore (Ph.D. diss. Royal Holloway College, University of Cipriano de Rore, miniature painting by Hans Müllich, from a 16th-century Codex Monacensis.

London, 1996). J. OWENS, "The Milan Partbooks: Evidence of Cipriano de Rore's Compositional Process," Journal of the American Musicological Society 37 (1984) 270–98. D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge, Massachusetts 1996). J. STEELE, "Marenzio: From Mannerist to Expressionist," Miscellanea Musicologica 11 (1980), 129–131.

[F. J. SMITH]

ROSA Y FIGUEROA, FRANCISCO DE LA

Archivist and historian of the Franciscan province of the Holy Evangelist in New Spain; b. place unknown, 1697; d. probably Mexico City, end of the 18th century. He was of noble lineage, probably a Creole, and related to the Priego, Arcos, and Feria families. From 1717 to 1724, as a secular priest, he roamed through the episcopates of Michoacán, Puebla, and Oaxaca and mastered the Mexican language, on which he wrote Arte de Artes in 1752. In 1724 he entered the Franciscan order; he was curate of Santa María la Redonda, vicar in the convent of Nativitas, and minister coadjutor in Tepepan and Xochimilco. In 1735 he went to the convent of Cuernavaca. In 1772 he held the titles of preacher general, notary apostolic, and notary or censor of books for the Holy Office, and, from 1748, archivist of his Franciscan province. As archivist he classified and catalogued the very rich archives, publicizing the important documents: in 1756, on the first confraternity in New Spain; in 1772, on the will and the legacies of Hernán Cortés; in 1774, on the convent of Santa María la Redonda and the family of the Condes de Orizaba. Thus he corrected such famous chroniclers as Juan de TORQUEMADA and VETANCURT. In 1773 he wrote some Discursos humildes against a royal decree of Charles III, inspired by Bishop LORENZANA, to the effect that “the different languages in the dominions of his majesty should be outlawed, and only the Spanish tongue should be spoken.” Rosa y Figueroa made an erudite and ardent defense of the native languages and stressed the necessity for teaching them.

Bibliography: F. OCARANZA, Capítulos de la Historia Franciscana, ser. 1. (Mexico City 1933).

[E. DEL HOYO]

ROSAL VÁSQUEZ, MARÍA VICENTE, BL.

Baptized Vicenta, known in religion as María Encarnación del Corazón Jesús (Mary of the Incarnation of the Heart of Jesus); reformer of the Institute of Bethlehemite Sisters; b. Quetzaltenango, Guatemala, Oct. 26, 1820; d. near Tulcán, Ecuador, Aug. 24, 1886. Vicenta recognized her religious vocation at age fifteen, as she reflected on the mystery of the Incarnation. On Jan. 1, 1837, she entered the BETHLEHEMITES, founded by Pedro de San José BETANCUR (1670). Distressed by the laxity of the Beatario de Belem—which drifted from its original charism—Vicenta (now Sister María Encarnación) migrated to the convent of the Catalinas. Finding that convent also unsatisfactory she returned to Belem resolved to reform it. She had her opportunity when she was elected prioress in 1855. She revised the constitutions; the older sisters, however, refused to accept them. After her continued attempts at disciplinary reform were resisted, she founded a new beatario in Quetzaltenango (1861). Her devotion to the Sacred Heart led to the tradition within the order of dedicating the twenty-fifth of each month to prayers of reparation. The Bethlehemites are now active in Africa, Costa Rica, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, India, Italy, Nicaragua, Panama, Spain, the United States, and Venezuela.

While endeavoring to reform her congregation, Mother María Encarnación founded two schools in Quetzaltenango (1855).

When Justo Rufino Barrios expelled various religious orders from the country (1873–85), she continued her work of reformation of the order and evangelization abroad. Arriving in Costa Rica in 1877, María Encarnación established the first women’s college in Cartago, about fourteen miles from San José. She was a refugee again in 1884 when the Costa Rican government unleashed a persecution against religious groups, but returned to found an orphanage in San José (1886). She continued to Pasto, Colombia, to start a home for abandoned children. Untiring in her travels, she established the Bethlehemites in Tulcán and Otavalo, Ecuador.

On a trip from Tulcán to Otavalo, Mother María Encarnación fell from her horse and died. Her incorrupt body was translated to Pasto, where it is enshrined. After her cause for beatification was introduced, April 23, 1976, María Encarnación was declared venerable on April 6, 1995. On Dec. 17, 1996, the decree was signed approving a miracle attributed to her intercession. When she was raised to the altars by John Paul II on May 4, 1997, Mother María Encarnación became the Guatemalan beata.

Feast: April 18.

Bibliography: L’Osservatore Romano. 18 (1997): 2–3, 21 (1997): 4. Acta Apostolicae Sedis 12 (1997): 599.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ROSALES, ROMÁN ADAME, ST.

Martyr, priest; b. Feb. 27, 1859, Teocaltiche, Jalisco, Diocese of Aguascalientes, Mexico; d. Apr. 21, 1927, Yahualica, Guadalajara. After completing his seminary studies at Guadalajara, Román was ordained priest (Nov. 30, 1890) and assigned to various parishes. He concentrated his energies on catechesis, popular missions, the construction of chapels in the surrounding areas (and St. Joseph’s Church), the care of the sick, and the education of children. He founded an association of the Daughters of Mary and encouraged nocturnal adoration of the Blessed Sacrament. As pastor of Nochistlán, Zacatecas, Archdiocese of Guadalajara, this profoundly humble priest secretly administered the sacraments during the persecution until his hiding place was betrayed. He was arrested at night and tortured. Later he was imprisoned at Yahualica, where he was deprived of food and water for several days. On the day of his execution, he was taken to the church cemetery, where a grave had already been opened for him, and shot. Román’s body was exhumed and returned to Nochistlán. He was both beatified (Nov. 22, 1992) and canonized (May 21, 2000) with Cristobal MAGALLANES [see GUADALAJARA (MEXICO), MARTYRS OF, SS.] by Pope John Paul II.

Feast: May 25 (Mexico).

Bibliography: J. CARDOSO, Los mártires mexicanos (Mexico City 1953). J. DÍAZ ESTRELLA, El movimiento cristero: sociedad y conflicto en los Altos de Jalisco (México, D.F. 1979). V. GARCÍA JUÁREZ, Los cristeros (Fresnillo, Zac. 1990). Y. PADILLA RANGEL, El Catolicismo social y el movimiento Cristero en Aguascalientes (Aguascalientes 1992).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ROSALIA, ST.

Patroness of Palermo, Italy; d. 1160. All information about her before 1624 is purely legendary. An inscription, seemingly composed by Rosalia herself, was not found until 40 days after her body was discovered and has no serious claim to authenticity. According to the inscription and legend, she was the daughter of Count Sinibaldi, lord of Quisquina and Rosa, in Sicily. Apparently she was a Basilian nun at first, then retired to live as a recluse on Monte Coschina and later in a grotto on Monte Pellegrino near Palermo. In the great plague of 1624, her body was discovered and brought in solemn procession to Palermo, and since then she has been venerated as the patroness of the city. Pope URBAN VIII placed her name in the Roman MARTYROLOGY in 1630. Her cult has had a wide diffusion in Sicily and Italy and has been carried overseas by Italian emigrants. The caves in which she lived have been transformed into chapels, and her body rests in a splendid chapel in the cathedral of Palermo. A rich folklore has developed around St. Rosalia.

Feast: Sept. 4 and July 15 (the finding of her body).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Sept. 2:278–414. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 3:15. L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, 6 v. (Paris 1955–59) 3.3:1170–71. C. CIVELLO, Santa Rosalia (Rome 1967). I. SUCATO, Santa Rosalia, patrona di Palermo (Palermo 1976). P. COLLURA, Santa Rosalia nella storia e nell'arte (Palermo 1977). J. BARGALLÓ VALLS and R. G. MINGUELLA, La festa major de Torredembarra a la segona meitat del segle XIX (Torredembarra, Spain 1988), cult. V. PETRARCA, Di Santa Rosalia, vergine palermitana (Palermo 1988).

[M. R. P. MC GUIRE]

ROSARY

The term usually refers to the so-called Dominican Rosary, a pious exercise composed of both vocal and mental prayer. It consists in the recitation of 15 decades of Hail Marys, each preceded by an Our Father, followed by a Glory be to the Father, and accompanied by a meditation, called a mystery. Its 15 mysteries, focusing attention on the Incarnation, sufferings, and glorification of Christ are a compendium of the life of Jesus and Mary and a summary of the liturgical year. Like the liturgy, the Rosary presents Christian truth comprehensively and graphically, and possesses great power to sanctify those who pray it. A prayer to Jesus and His Mother, it leads through Mary to Jesus, the source of all grace.

A rosary. (©Zeva Oelbaum/CORBIS)

The Rosary is begun and terminated in various ways. In the United States, it commences with the recitation of an Our Father, three Hail Marys, and a Glory Be to the Father, and ends with the recitation of the Hail Holy Queen and the prayer from the Feast of the Rosary. Dominicans start the Rosary with the verses that open Matins of the Divine Office. Neither these introductory and concluding prayers nor the Glory Be to the Father following the decades are integral parts of the Rosary. While he recites the vocal prayers, the worshipper does not direct his attention to them but dwells on the mystery assigned to the decade he is reciting. The meditation may be made immediately before or after the decade. It may take a general form or may consider a distinct point of each mystery at successive Hail Marys. The mysteries are divided into three sets of five, namely, the Joyful Mysteries—the Annunciation of Christ's Incarnation to Mary, her visit to Elizabeth, the birth of Christ, His presentation in the temple, His being found in the temple; the Sorrowful Mysies—the agony of Christ in the garden, His scourging, His crowning with thorns, the carrying of the cross, the crucifixion and death of Christ; the Glorious Mysteries—the Resurrection of Christ, His Ascension into heaven, the sending of the Holy Spirit, the Assumption of Mary into heaven, her coronation as Queen of Heaven. In public recitation of the Rosary, the leader of the prayer announces the mystery before beginning the decade. In German-speaking countries, however, the mystery is referred to in each Hail Mary after the phrase, “thy womb, Jesus.” Thus, at that point throughout the fifth sorrowful mystery, the leader adds, “who was crucified for us.”

“Institution of the Rosary,” ceiling fresco by Giovanni Battista Tiepolo, Church of the Gesuati (Jesuits), Venice, 1738–39.

Origin. The origin of the Rosary, especially St. Dominic’s connection with it, has been the subject of much debate. According to pious tradition, Mary appeared to Dominic when he was working among the Albigenses, giving him the rosary and instructing him to preach it. She promised that much success would attend his apostolate, should he do so. This tradition has been current since the end of the 15th century and is traceable to ALAN DE LA ROCHE. It gained general acceptance owing to the widespread propagation of the Rosary Confraternity and to its insertion into papal bulls granting various indulgences for saying the Rosary.

Those who have favored the tradition have not succeeded in mustering convincing proofs to support it. All their evidence directly linking Dominic to the Rosary, when traced back, ends with Alan de la Roche. Their other arguments refer to the various elements that constitute the Rosary and prove only, as is generally admitted, that parts of the Rosary were practiced as independent devotions before or during the lifetime of Dominic. The most telling proof offered for the tradition is its inclusion by at least a dozen popes in bulls or encyclicals. However, the popes issued those documents to foster devotion, not to teach historical truth. They made no claim to have verified the tradition but cited it as piously believed. It was first mentioned in an indulgence bull granted to the Rosary Confraternity by Alexander VI, July 13, 1495. In preparing such bulls the papal chancery justified the grant of the indulgence by reviewing the reasons alleged by the petitioners. In the early Rosary bulls, the chancery inserted cautionary phrases such as, “it is piously believed” or “it is said,” to indicate that it passed no judgment on the historicity of the material presented by the petitioners. Later chancery clerks failed to insert the cautionary phrases. Thus, papal documents seem to vouch for the veracity of the tradition.

It has also been alleged that the Rosary originated in Dominic’s style of preaching. Inspired by Mary, he expounded the truths of the faith successively. To bring down grace upon his audience, he invited the listeners to recite the Lord’s Prayer and the Hail Mary between his different expositions. This version of the Rosary’s origin is unsupported by the sources. It reduces Dominic’s share to the vanishing point and proves only that any great preacher who interlarded his sermons with prayer was the founder of the Rosary.

Militating against the tradition is the long silence about Dominic until the end of the 15th century. In his Apology, Alan de la Roche allegedly asserted that Dominic’s connection with the Rosary is proved “both from tradition and from the testimony of writers,” but justification for this broad claim has not been found. In all the sources where a reference to Dominic and the Rosary might be expected, there is absolute silence: in the acts of his canonization, in his early biographies, in sermons preached on his feast, in medieval art, notably his tomb and the paintings of Fra Angelico, in Dominican chronicles and collections of sermon materials, in the official records of the order, such as the Constitutions, the acts of general and provincial chapters, and letters of the masters general.

The most satisfying explanation of the Rosary’s origin is that it developed gradually as various Christological and Marian devotions coalesced. The origins are traceable to the tender devotion to Jesus and Mary that arose in the 12th century, and to the desire to give the unlettered faithful closer participation in the liturgy. It appears that the recitation of 150 Our Fathers emerged as a substitute for the recitation of the psalms. The Our Fathers were often divided, as were the psalms of David, into sets of “three fifties.” Strings of beads, called “paternosters,” were used to count these prayers. Marian devotion followed a similar trend. Mary’s clients celebrated her joys by saluting her with liturgical antiphons, especially the salutation of the Archangel Gabriel, believing that when they did so she relived the joy of the Annunciation. Hence they multiplied their Hail Marys, especially in “chaplets” of 50 (mystical crowns placed on Mary’s brow), groups of 100, or psalters of 150. Because Mary experienced her joy in intimate association with Jesus, the words of Elizabeth, “Blessed art thou among women,” were added to the Hail Mary in the early 12th century. During the next century the name of Jesus was added to the Hail Mary.

The development of the Rosary mysteries followed a parallel course. Psalters of Our Lord Jesus Christ or of the Blessed Virgin Mary, applying the psalms to Christ or His Mother, were formed by adding to each psalm a phrase that referred it to Jesus or Mary. In a later stage the psalms were omitted and the phrases evolved into brief lives of Jesus or Mary extending from the Annunciation to their glorification in heaven. Commemoration of Mary’s joys also influenced the formation of the mysteries. At first only the Annunciation joy was recalled, but soon sets of 5, 10, 15, or 20 other joys, often in connection with the liturgical feasts, were fashioned, either by using liturgical antiphons or by composing brief phrases, often rhymed, recounting the joys. This devotion coalesced with the recitation of the Hail Mary. During the recitation of a chaplet of Hail Marys, the Annunciation joy would be considered. During a second or third 50, a second or third joy would be taken up. As devotion to Mary’s sorrows arose during the 14th century, the second chaplet was dedicated to them. Logically, the third chaplet was set aside for her heavenly joys. Along with this development, chains of 50, 100, or 150 phrases, referring to as many joys, were composed or drawn from the lives of Jesus and Mary that had evolved from the Psalters of Jesus or Mary and were attached to the recitation of the Hail Marys, one phrase to each Hail Mary. The Carthusian DOMINIC OF PRUSSIA popularized this practice soon after 1409, when he linked 50 phrases referring to Jesus and Mary to 50 Hail Marys, undivided by the Lord’s Prayer. Such a series of 50 points was called a rosarium (a rose garden), a common term used to designate a collection of similar material. In preempting this term, Mary’s clients applied the rose, the symbol of joy, to Mary. The name was later transferred to the recitation of 50 Hail Marys; “psalter” was reserved for 150 Hail Marys.

Meanwhile, the method of using the vocal prayers of the Rosary was evolving. First, the psalter of 150 Hail Marys was united with the psalter of 150 Our Fathers, a Hail Mary following each Our Father. Early in the 15th century, Henry Kalkar (d. 1408), Carthusian visitor on the Lower Rhine, bracketed the Hail Marys into decades by inserting 15 Our Fathers between them. It was a logical next step to separate chaplets of 50 Hail Marys by inserting five Our Fathers.

Thus, from the early 15th century, the Rosary was recognizable and its elements had amalgamated: Our Fathers, Hail Marys, and mysteries, though these latter, and the mode of attaching them to the vocal prayers, were still far from standardized.

So long as the Rosary meditations consisted of multiples of 50, the Rosary had to be a “read” prayer; the worshipper had to have a book before him listing the points. The Rosary could not become a universal devotion or a communal prayer until it was simplified. As early as 1480, Rosaries of 50 mysteries were reduced to five, one for each decade. In 1483, a Rosary book written by a Dominican, Our Dear Lady’s Psalter, cut down the 150 points to 15, all of which, except the last two, corresponded to the present mysteries. The Coronation was combined with the Assumption and the Last Judgment was the 15th mystery. The Dominican Alberto da Castello, in 1521, in his book The Rosary of the Glorious Virgin Mary, united the old and the new form of the mysteries (a term he was the first to apply to the meditations). To each Our Father he attached a mystery, but kept the old series of 150 in connection with the Hail Marys. These became submysteries for the mystery of the Our Father. During the 16th century, the Rosary of 15 mysteries gradually prevailed.

The vocal prayers of the Rosary were completed during the same century with the addition of the Glory Be to the Father and the second half of the Hail Mary: “Holy Mary, Mother of God, etc.” Since the apparitions of Our Lady of Fatima in 1917, the prayer taught by Mary to the children has often been added to each decade: “O my Jesus, forgive us our sins, save us from the fires of hell, lead all souls to heaven, especially those in greatest need.”

A Rosary bull of Pius V, in 1569, and the introduction of the Feast of the Rosary in 1573, helped to standardize the Rosary by presenting it as a combined vocal and mental prayer and regarding the meditations as essential parts of the devotion.

Spread of the Rosary. Though the Carthusians had made significant contributions to the development of the Rosary, the Dominicans did most to propagate it and render it a general, community prayer. They accomplished this with their Rosary books, preaching, and promotion of the Rosary Confraternity. Other orders soon joined them, and great saints, notably Peter Canisius, Philip Neri, and Louis de Montfort became Rosary advocates. Beginning with Leo XIII, the "Pope of the Rosary," the popes worked to maintain the Rosary as a traditional, popular prayer and to propagate it. The many indulgences that enrich its use, especially the plenary indulgence granted by Pius XI in 1938 for reciting it in the presence of the Blessed Sacrament, enhance its appeal to the faithful. Even while extolling the liturgy, Pius XII did not neglect to commend the Rosary and other venerable devotions.

Bibliography: F. M. WILLAM, The Rosary: Its History and Meaning, tr. E. KAISER (New York 1953). J. G. SHAW, The Story of the Rosary (Milwaukee 1954). M. WARD, The Splendor of the Rosary (New York 1945). H. THURSTON, "The Rosary," Month 96 (1900) 403-18, 513-27, 620-37; 97 (1901) 67-79, 172-88, 286-304. A. DUVAL, "Les Frères Prêcheurs et le rosaire," Maria, ed. H. DU MANOIR DE JUAYE (Paris 1949-) 2:768-82. M. MAHÉ, "Aux Sources de notre rosaire," La Vie spirituelle Supplement 4 (1951) 100-20. Works favorable to the St. Dominic tradition. W. G. MOST, Mary in Our Life (3d ed. New York 1959) 228-33, 279-87. D. MÉZARD, Étude sur les origines du rosaire (Caluire, France 1912). M. M. GORCE, Le Rosaire et ses antécédents historiques (Paris 1931).

[W. A. HINNEBUSCH/EDS.]

ROSATI, JOSEPH

First bishop of St. Louis; b. Sora, Naples, Jan. 12, 1789; d. Rome, Italy, Sept. 25, 1843. At the age of nine, Rosati began his studies for the priesthood in his native village. He later entered the seminary of the Congregation of the Mission (Vincentian Fathers) at Monte Citorio in Rome where he was ordained Feb. 10, 1811. During the next four years he engaged in parish missions in the vicinity of Rome and Naples. In September of 1815, he accepted the invitation of his former theology professor, Felix de Andreis, CM, to go with him to the U.S. to assist Louis Dubourg, Apostolic Administrator of Upper and Lower Louisiana.

They arrived at Baltimore, Maryland, in July of 1816. A month later they moved to Bardstown, Kentucky, where they studied English and taught theology in St. Thomas Seminary. In 1818 they were summoned by Bishop Dubourg to Perryville, Missouri, to establish St. Mary's Seminary. Although Rosati was rector of the seminary, pastor of the parish, and superior of the Vincentian

Joseph Rosati.

Community, he found time to visit the missions throughout the state of Missouri. Dubourg requested that Rosati be named coadjutor bishop of New Orleans, in charge of the northern portion of the Louisiana Territory, and he was consecrated on March 25, 1824. Three years later, he was named the first bishop of St. Louis.

As bishop, Rosati erected a cathedral in St. Louis and devoted himself to the works of the missions from the Mississippi Valley to the territories of Texas and Oregon. He invited a number of religious communities to share in his missionary activities. The Jesuits came and established St. Louis University, and he brought the Sisters of St. Joseph from France to found the first of their many establishments in the U.S., at Carondelet, Missouri. The Sisters of the Visitation, at Georgetown in the District of Columbia, accepted his invitation to open a monastery at Kaskaskia, Illinois; the Daughters of Charity came from Emmitsburg, Maryland, to begin St. Louis Hospital. Prior to this he had assisted the Religious of the Sacred Heart in starting a school for native girls at Florissant, Missouri.

Rosati was a prominent member of the first four Councils of Baltimore, for which he wrote many of the major documents. Following the Fourth Provincial Council, he returned to Rome in the interest of his diocese. During the visit, Gregory XVI commissioned him apostoxic delegate to the Republic of Haiti to reconcile Church–State difficulties in that country. In April 1842, after completing a concordat with the Haitian government, he returned to Rome. Illness prevented his return to St. Louis, and he died in Rome.

Bibliography: Archives, Kenrick Seminary, Webster Groves, Mo. F. J. EASTERLY, The Life of Rt. Rev. Joseph Rosati (Catholic University of America, Studies in American Church History 33; Washington 1942). J. ROTHENSTEINER, History of the Archdiocese of St. Louis (St. Louis 1928).

[F. J. EASTERLY]

ROSAZ, EDOARDO GIUSEPPE, BL.

Bishop, secular Franciscan, founder of the Secular Franciscan Missionary Sisters of Susa; b. Feb. 15, 1830, Susa (near Turin), Piedmont, Italy; d. there May 3, 1903. Edoardo's parents were hard working, devout refugees of the French Revolution. Because of his frailty, Edoardo was tutored at home until he was ten. He then attended the Gianotti di Saluzzo school in Turin from 1840 to 1845, until his family returned to Susa following the deaths of his father and brother. Edoardo entered the diocesan seminary in 1847, joined the Third Order of Saint Francis in 1853, and was ordained June 10, 1854. Thereafter, he dedicated himself to preaching, catechesis, social work, the ministry of reconciliation, and the spiritual direction of the Saint Joseph Sisters. His pastoral enthusiasm, which he shared with his friend (St.) John BOSCO, led to Rosaz's appointment as director of Susa's seminary in 1874. Three years later (Dec. 26, 1877) he was consecrated as bishop of Susa, a position he held until his death. Immediately upon assuming the cathedra Bishop Rosaz began to renew the spirituality of the diocese, to institute charitable programs, and to establish educational institutions for the young. He founded the Secular Franciscan Missionary Sisters of Susa to assist with these ministries. In addition to his works, Bishop Rosaz is remembered for his pastoral zeal, dedication to the good of his clergy, his self-mortifications, and love of the poor. Pope John Paul II beatified Rosaz in Susa, July 14, 1991.

Feast: May 3 (Franciscans).

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1991), 814.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ROSCELIN OF COMPIÈGNE

French dialectician and reputed founder of early medieval NOMINALISM; b. c. 1050; d. 1125. He studied at Soissons and Rheims, taught at Compiègne, Loches (where Abelard was his pupil), Besançon, and Tours. In 1092 at the synod of Soissons he was accused of tritheism. Although he denied holding tritheism, he nevertheless recanted. Nothing remains of his writings except an abusive letter to Abelard on the Trinity; our knowledge of his thought is derived almost entirely from his adversaries, St. Anselm and Abelard. In the controversy on UNIVERSALS, he appears as an extreme antirealist. In nature only the individual subsists; genera and species are not realities, but verbal expressions in general form (voces, flatus vocis). This may mean that universals have no kind of objective reality except a verbal one, or it may simply be an emphatic repudiation of the formal subsistence of universals, which does not exclude some form of conceptual universal. His theory was later described as that of the nomina, whence arose the term "nominalist." JOHN OF SALISBURY interpreted him as having held the crude form of nominalism (sententia vocum). Roscelin's tritheism is based partly on the Boethian definition of a person as rationalis naturae individua substantia, and partly on his nominalism. The three divine persons are three realities or substances (res per se), like three angels or souls. Were they but one reality, he argued, all three persons would have become incarnate. He concluded that, if usage permitted, they could well be called three gods. To save the dogma, Roscelin allowed that the divine persons were one in will and power.

Bibliography: Roscelin's letter to Abelard in J. REINERS', "Der Nominalismus in der Frühscholastik," Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie und Theologie des Mittelalters 8.5 (1910) 62–80 (literature). PETER ABELARD, Ep. 14, Patrologia latina 178:355–358; Dialectica, ed. L. M. DE RIJK, (Assen 1956) X, 554–555. ANSELM OF CANTERBURY, Epp. 128, 129, 136, 147 in Opera omnia, ed. F. S. SCHMITT, 6 v. (Edinburgh 1946–61) v.3; Ep. de Incarnatione Verbi, 1–2, ibid., v.2. JOHN OF SALISBURY, Metalogicon, bk. 2.17, ed. C. C. J. WEBB (Oxford 1929), ed. and tr. D. D. MCGARRY (Berkeley 1955); Policraticus, ed. C. C. J. WEBB 2 v. (Oxford 1909). Literature. F. J. PICAVET, Roscelin: Philosophe et théologien, d'après la légende et d'après l'histoire (2d ed. Paris 1911). M. M. GORCE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 13.2:2911–15. M. M. C. DE WULF, History of Mediaeval Philosophy, tr. E. C. MESSENGER, 2 v. (3d ed. New York 1935–38) v.1. F. CORVINO, Enciclopedia filosofica 4:205–206.

[F. COURTNEY]

ROSCELLI, AGOSTINO, ST.

Founder of the Institute of Sisters of the Immaculata; b. July 27, 1818, Bargone di Casarza, Liguria, Italy; d. May 7, 1902, Genoa, Italy.

Agostino's family was poor, but the deep faith and peace that filled his home produced an introspective, contemplative soul open to the workings of God. He first felt called to the priesthood during a parish mission in 1835, but poverty made schooling difficult. With financial assistance, prayer, and hard work, he completed his seminary studies in Genoa and was ordained to the priesthood in 1846.

He began his parish work at St. Martin d'Albaro, then in 1854 he was assigned to the Church of Consolation. In addition to spending countless hours hearing confessions and providing spiritual counsel, Roscelli established residential centers to provide moral and educational support for young women.

In 1876, he founded the Institute of Sisters of the Immaculata to care for women at risk because of their poor circumstances. Beginning in 1874, he served 22 years as chaplain to the provincial orphanage, in addition to working with prisoners, especially those condemned to death.

Throughout his life Roscelli's contemplative spirit and mystical experiences spurred him to action for love of God. Pope John Paul II, who beatified Roscelli on May 7, 1995, cited Roscelli as a special model for pastors on the World Day of Prayer for Vocations. A second miracle was approved on July 1, 2000, opening the way for his canonization, June 10, 2001.

Feast: May 7.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1995): 564. L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 19 (1995).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ROSCREA, ABBEY OF

An Irish monastery located in County Tipperary, Ireland, Diocese of Killaloe. It was founded by St. Crónán (d. c. 665) on one of the ancient highways called the Slige Dála. By the beginning of the 9th century it had been given in COMMENDATION to a lay abbot. There was an abbot-bishop there in 918 and again in 1045, and some of its abbots held office also at the monastery of CLONMACNOIS in 839 and 1043. It was declared part of the Diocese of Killaloe in 1111, but was recognized as a separate diocese, suffragan of Cashel, in 1152. Around the end of the 12th century it was reduced to the status of a deanery of Killaloe. From its scriptorium came the Book of Dimma, which dates from the 8th century, the Annals of Roscrea, of which only one 17th-century fragmentary copy survives, and the Rule of Échtgus Úa Cúanáin, a tract on the Eucharist, from about the 12th century. The abbey's architectural remains are of various dates and include a round tower from c. the 9th century and the porch of the old church of Crónán in the Hiberno-Romanesque style from the middle of the 12th century.

Bibliography: A. GWYNN and D. F. GLEESON, A History of the Diocese of Killaloe (Dublin 1962) 60–78, 169. D. F. GLEESON, Roscrea (Dublin 1947) 5–17, 150–154. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:2535.

[C. MCGRATH]

ROSE OF LIMA, ST.

Patron of Peru; b. Lima, Peru, April 20, 1586; d. there, Aug. 24, 1617. She was the daughter of a conquistador from Puerto Rico, Gaspar de Flores, who had arrived in Peru in 1548, and the young María de Oliva. She was baptized Isabel de Flores, May 25, 1586, the Feast of Pentecost. The maid in the house, startled by the extraordinary beauty of the baby, exclaimed that she looked like a rose. The mother agreed and ordered that the child should be called Rose, despite the baptismal name. She was confirmed with this name by Abp. (St.) Toribio de MOGROVEJO when she was 14. Later, because of the special role the Virgin Mary played in her life, she took the name Rosa de Santa María.

Rose took as her model St. CATHERINE OF SIENA. While still a child she undertook fasts and other mortifications. She wished to enter a cloister, but denied this, she remained at home, contributing to the support of the family by selling the flowers she grew with such success. When she was 20, she found an answer to her desire for some solitude even within the family by joining the Third Order of St. Dominic. She chose to wear the habit from then on. Under the veil she wore a crown of thorns, but over it a crown of roses to please her mother. Rose lived a secluded life, spending as much time as she could in the hermitage she had built in the garden as a child. In one room of the house she set up a little infirmary where she cared for destitute children and infirm elderly people. This work was a beginning of social service in Peru. Her activities, secluded though they were, were brought to the attention of the Inquisition. Interrogators could only announce that she was directed by "impulses of grace." She had great mystical gifts, though she did not have the gift of writing about her experiences. The people of Lima believed that she saved them from pirates. She was widely known and beloved by rich and poor in Lima. At her death, which she had prophesied exactly, it was impossible to hold the funeral for several days because of the crowds, and finally the body was buried privately in the cloister of St. Dominic's Church as she had requested. The body was later moved into the church and is now buried under an altar in the crypt. The cause for her canonization was presented in Rome, July 1634. On March 12, 1668, CLEMENT IX decreed her beatification. She was canonized April 12, 1671, by CLEMENT X and proclaimed patron of Peru, all of America, the Indies, and the Philippines.

Ruins and doorway of Saint Cronan's Church, c. 1865–1869, Roscrea, County Tipperary, Ireland. (©Sean Sexton Collection/CORBIS)

Feast: Aug. 23.

Bibliography: R. VARGAS UGARTE, Vida de Santa Rosa de Santa María (2d ed. Lima 1951). F. P. KEYES, The Rose and the Lily (New York 1961). L. MILLONES, Una partecita del cielo (Lima 1993). J. F. ARAOZ et al., Santa Rosa de Lima y su tiempo (Lima 1995). L. M. GLAVE TESTINO, De Rosa y espinas (Lima 1998).

[J. M. VARGAS]

ROSE OF VITERBO, ST.

Third order FRANCISCAN; b. Viterbo, Italy, c. 1233; d. Viterbo, March 6, 1252. Although few details are extant regarding Rose's life, much can be gleaned from both the environment in which she lived and from the two separate, anonymous vitae written to initiate the process of her canonization. Shortly after Rose's birth, Viterbo found itself both socially and geographically central to the battles between the Ghibelline supporters of the Emperor Frederick II and the supporters of the papacy. Mendicant friars are credited with championing the latter cause and preaching loyalty to the papacy. To combat the Mendicant influences, the emperor supported and offered protection to the Waldensians and Humiliati. This debate made its way to the streets and piazzas of Viterbo

Vita I, written shortly after her death in 1253, is the most contemporary testimony to the magnitude of Rose's impact on her community. This hagiographical account reveals Rose as having a pious upbringing. Around the age of 11, she experienced a vision of the Virgin Mary somewhere outdoors, and thus felt called to praise Christ publicly and to wail mournfully through the streets. Because of her vision, Rose quickly gained followers and led processions through the streets of Viterbo, cross in hand, encouraging others to join her. Although unfinished, Vita I emphasizes the public nature of her preaching, her practice of virtuous living, and her talent for drawing followers. She also demonstrated the ability to prophesy.

Coronation of Saint Rose of Lima, 17th-century painting by Carlo Cignani. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

Vita II was written for the canonization process begun by Pope Calixtus III in 1457. This second Vita emphasizes the public nature of her apostolate, which was not the norm for women in this period in history. Her ability to preach Christ and the Good New daily to the people is emphasized. She also rages against the heretics supporting the emperor. While Rose was renowned for her miraculous cures and prophetic visions, she was followed because of her passionate preaching. Vita II also expands on her expulsion from Viterbo and hails her triumphant return from exile upon the fulfillment of her prophecy of the emperor's death. It is clear that Rose had a major role in defending the Church against the emperor.

Feast: Sept. 4.

Bibliography: D. PRYDS, "Proclaiming Sanctity: Rose of Viterbo," in Women Preachers and Prophets through Two Millennia of Christian History (Berkeley 1998) 159–72. A. VACCA, La Menta

e la Croce (Rome 1982). J. WEISENBECK and M. WEISENBECK, "Rose of Viterbo: Preacher and Reconciler," in Clare of Assisi: A Medieval and Modern Woman, Clare Centenary Series 8 (St. Bonaventure, N.Y. 1996) 145–55.

[R. D. HARSHMAN]

ROSELINE, ST.

Virgin, known also as Rossolina; b. Chateau d'Arcs (Fréjus), France, 1263; d. Celle-Roubaud (Provence), Jan. 17, 1329. Roseline, of the noble family De Ville-neuve, entered the Carthusians in Bertrand about age 15–16 and was honored even during her lifetime for her severe penances and miracles. She became prioress in Celle-Roubaud c. 1300. When her coffin was opened in 1334, her body was found incorrupt. Her veneration was approved for Fréjus in 1851, for the whole of France in 1857. She is pictured in iconography as a Carthusian nun with maniple and stole.

Feast: Jan. 17; Oct. 16 (Carthusians); July 11 (translation of relics).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 2:484–498. J. E. STADLER and F. J. HEIM, Vollständiges Heiligen-Lexikon, 5 v. (Augsburg 1858–82) 5:147. L. LIOTARD, Vie édifiante et populaire de Ste. Roseline de Villeneuve (2d ed. Draguignan, France 1873). M. C. DE GANAY, La Vie spirituelle 19 (1928–29) 420–433. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by The Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 1:358. The Book of Saints (4th ed. New York 1947) 517. D. ATTWATER, A Dictionary of Saints (new ed. New York 1958). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:112–113. G. SPAHR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 9:45.

[M. CSÁKY]

ROSELLI, SALVATORE MARIA

Dominican philosopher and theologian; b. Naples, date unknown; d. Rome, 1784. He taught at the College of St. Thomas at Rome (Minerva), and while there he furnished the basis for the Thomistic reconstruction of the 19th century. Personally reacting against the philosophy of DESCARTES, Roselli supported the directives of the masters general of the order to promote the philosophy of St. THOMAS. He wrote a Summa philosophiae (6 v. Rome 1777–83; Madrid 1788; 4 v. Bologna 1857), in which he presented authentic scholastic philosophy "ad mentem Angelici Doctoris." It was widely disseminated in Italy and Spain and frequently reprinted. A compendium of the work (3 v.) appeared at Rome in 1837. Roselli gave evidence of a comprehensive knowledge of ancient, medieval, and modern philosophy. In his Summa he offerred, in the form of a dialogue, a comparison between the classical THOMISTIC philosophy and modern systems of empiricism, rationalism, Cambridge Platonism, and naturalism. He wisely substituted contemporary questions for the minutiae and subtleties characteristic of the medieval writers and their commentators. Because of the number of sources that Roselli employed in his Summa, some historians question his adherence to St. Thomas, suggesting that he might be better described as eclectic. In general, Roselli's work can be said to have marked the beginning of everything in the movement that goes by the name of neothomism.

Bibliography: H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae (Innsbruck 1903–13) 5.1:259. I. E. NARCISO, "Tomismo e filosofia moderna nella Summa philosophiae del Domenico Salvatore Roselli," Aquinas 7.2 (1964) 203–237. A. WALZ, Dottrina e scuola (Rome 1943) 11–12. A. MASNOVA, Il neo-tomismo in Italia (Milan 1923).

[F. J. ROENSCH]

ROSETTA STONE

The Rosetta Stone is a slab of black basalt, approximately 3 feet 9 inches long, 2 feet 4½ inches wide, and 11 inches thick, bearing a bilingual inscription in Egyptian and Greek. The top right- and left-hand corners and the right-hand bottom corner are missing. The stone was found in 1799 by a French officer named Boussard (sometimes given as Bouchard), near Rosetta (Rashid) in the Nile Delta. It passed into British possession when the French surrendered Egypt in 1801.

The inscription is divided into three sections, each in a different form of writing: Old Egyptian hieroglyphic, demotic (the ordinary Egyptian handwriting), and Greek. The first studies of the demotic text were those of Sylvestre de Sasy and J. D. Åkerbald in 1802. An Englishman, Thomas Young, demonstrated that the royal name "Ptolemy" occurring in the Greek text was found in the hieroglyphic version surrounded by an oval. This discovery provided Young with a clue to the phonetic values of the Egyptian symbols. In 1822, the alphabetic Egyptian characters provided by Young were corrected and enlarged by Jean François Champollion. This French scholar formulated a system of general deciphering that has been the foundation upon which all Egyptologists have worked. The deciphering of proper names provided the key to the Egyptian writing, but an understanding of the languages could not have been accomplished without the assistance of Coptic, the liturgical language of the Christian descendants of the ancient Egyptians.

The inscription is the decree of the Egyptian priests assembled at Memphis in 196 B.C. to celebrate the first commemoration of the coronation of Ptolemy V. It proclaims the king's piety, his love of the Egyptians, the benefits he had conferred upon Egypt, and resolutions of gratitude to honor him. The stone is in the British Museum.

Rosetta Stone. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Bibliography: E. A. W. BUDGE, The Rosetta Stone in the British Museum (London 1929). H. HARTLEBEN, Champollion: Sein Leben und sein Werk (Berlin 1906).

[J. J. O'ROURKE]

ROSICRUCIANS

An occult sect of obscure origin that, according to one account, was organized in 1413 by Christian Rosencreuz, a German scholar. He is supposed to have visited (c. 1410) Cyprus, Damascus, Egypt, Fez, and Spain and to have garnered from the Muslim physicians and teachers of the different centers of learning a knowledge of medicine, philosophy, science, and religion beyond the understanding of the medieval West. On arriving in Austria (1413), he is alleged to have formed the Society of the Rose and Cross with three companions, who devoted themselves to study and acts of benevolence. These first Rosicrucians lived in common at a hospice called Domus Sancti Spiritus and went about curing the sick, free of charge. The Rosicrucian account goes on to relate that Rosencreuz composed a book, Chymische Hochzeit (1457), containing hermetic and occult secrets. He died, according to this version, in 1484, leaving instructions that his tomb was to be sealed for 120 years and then opened. Successive brethren of Rosicrucian fraternity kept the secret, and in 1604 the tomb was opened and a number of books important to the Rosicrucian movement were found within.

Seventeenth-century Developments. The more generally accepted version of the Rosicrucian genesis begins the story in 1610, when Johann Valentine Andrea (1586–1654) composed a work entitled Fama fraternitatis. This document, published at Cassel in 1614 and, in a slightly revised version, at Frankfurt am Main in 1615, was apparently an elaborate hoax, in which Andrea gave a lengthy history of the brotherhood formed by Christian Rosencreuz. The work ascribed to Rosencreuz himself, Chymische Hochzeit, first appeared at Strasbourg in 1616 and was acknowledged by Andrea as his own composition. If the entire concept of a brotherhood of Rosicrucians existing from 1413 to his own day, as Andrea claimed, was a pure fabrication, the intellectual climate of the early 17th century was nevertheless friendly to such an organization. In 1615 Julius Sperber issued a tract on the Brotherhood of the Rosy Cross at Danzig; and Michael Maier, a German physician, carried the idea to England. The fraternity of educated men interested in medicine, science, and occult lore that emerged was loosely organized; and in many cases, a knowledge of the promise of a universal reformation of the world through the Orden des Rosenkreuzes, promised in Andrea's book, may be presumed to have been their only link.

Robert Fludd (1574–1637) began to issue works similar to the original manifesto with his Apologia compendaria (Leyden 1616). His second work on Rosicrucianism appeared as Tractatus apologeticus integritatem societatis de Rosea Cruce defendens (Leyden 1617). A third apologetic work, addressed to King James I in behalf of the Rosicrucian brotherhood, Declaratio brevis, remained in manuscript. A copy in the British Museum includes a number of letters from Continental Rosicrucians; one composed by a Julius Helt insists that the brotherhood is not tainted by either Catholic or Lutheran doctrine, but asserts that “the theology of the Calvinists is the theosophy of the Fraternity.” Some inkling of the purpose and intellectual outlook of the early Rosicrucians may be found in Fludd's writings, in which it is apparent that he regarded all true natural science as rooted in revelation. He opposed both Aristotelian science and Copernican astronomy, denying the diurnal revolution of the earth. His thought was Neoplatonic, viewing “all things as complicitly and ideally in God,” with a marked pantheistic tendency. Other early adherents of the Rosicrucian idea shared Fludd's approach, using the language of alchemy, medicine, and the occult to transmit their philosophic speculations.

Sir Kenelm Digby (1603–65) may have taken part in the early Rosicrucian movement, but the evidence for Francis Bacon as a member, or even as the founder, of the brotherhood rests on a very dubious basis. The appearance of a Rosicrucian lodge, under the leadership of Elias Ashmole (1617–92), at London in 1646 is equally difficult to substantiate, but an English translation of the Fama fraternitatis was issued at London in 1652 and an English version of The Chemical Wedding at Cambridge in 1690. The subsequent history of this early Rosicrucian fraternity is equally vague, and it is improbable that it survived in any recognizable form after the late 17th century.

Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries. Rosicrucianism, as it now exists, was organized by Robert Wentworth Little in 1866. The General Statutes of the Order of Knights of the Red Cross of Rome and Constantine was published at London in 1868. A somewhat revised version of The General Statutes now identifies the order as a branch of FREEMASONRY. Control of the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia passed from Little to William Wynn Westcott, who published a history of the order in 1885. Rosicrucian colleges, as local units are designated, were formed in the United States and various parts of the British empire between 1875 and 1885. The system was extended to Continental Europe in 1890. The Ancient Mystical Order Rosae Crucis (AMORC) has U. S. headquarters at San Jose, Calif.; the Rosicrucian Brotherhood (Fraternitas Rosae Crucis), at Quakertown, Pa.; and the Society of Rosicrucians (Societas Rosicruciana in America), at New York City.

Bibliography: A. E. WAITE, The Brotherhood of the Rosy Cross (London 1924; repr. New Hyde Park, N.Y. 1961); Emblematic Freemasonry (London 1925); Real History of the Rosicrucians (London 1887); The Secret Tradition in Freemasonry, 2 v. (London 1937). W. W. WESTCOTT, The Rosicrucians (London 1885). C. MCINTOSH, The Rose Cross and the Age of Reason: Eighteenth-century Rosicrucianism in Central Europe and its Relationship to the Enlightenment (Leiden-New York 1992). S. ÅKERMAN, Rose Cross over the Baltic: The Spread of Rosicrucianism in Northern Europe (Leiden/Boston 1998).

[R. K. MACMASTER/EDS.]

ROSKOVÁNYI, AUGUSTUS

Bishop; b. Szenna, Hungary, Dec. 7, 1807; d. Feb. 24, 1892. He was ordained in 1831 after studies at the college of the Piarists at Kis-Szeben (1817–22), and at Eger (1822–24), and his theological studies at Pesth and the Augustineum in Vienna. In 1839 he received the Abbey of Saar as a benefice and in 1841 was appointed rector of the seminary at Eger. He was consecrated auxiliary bishop in 1847 and named bishop of Waitsen in 1851. In 1859 he was named bishop of Neutra. His works are noted for the documents they contain. Among his more notable works are De primatu Romani Pontificis eiusque iuribus (Augsburg 1839; 2d ed. Agram 1841); De matrimoniis mixtis (5 v. Funfkirchen 1842; Pesth 1854, 1870–71); De matrimoniis in ecclesia Catholica (2 v. Augsburg 1837–40); Monumenta catholica pro independentia potestatis ecclesiasticae ab imperio civili (14 v. Funfkirchen 1847; Pesth 1856, 1865, 1870–71); Coelibatus, et breviarium: duo gravissima clericorum officia . . . (11 v. Pesth 1861; Neutra 1877–81); Romanus Pontifex tamquam primas ecclesiae . . . (16 v. Neutra and Comaromii 1867, 1878); Beata Virgo Maria in suo conceptu immaculata (12 v. Budapest 1873–74; Neutra 1877).

Bibliography: J. SZINNYEI, Magyar írók, 14 v. (Budapest 1891–1914) 11:1188–90. J. VÁGNER, Adatok a nyitra-városi plébániák történetéhez (Nitra 1902).

[L. R. KOZLOWSKI]

Antonio Rosmini-Serbatì.

ROSMINI-SERBATI, ANTONIO

Founder of the Institute of Charity, philosopher, theologian, and patriot; b. Rovereto, Trentino (then under Austrian domination, now part of Italy), 1797; d. Stresa (Lago Maggiore), 1855. Against the initial objections of his parents, he was ordained in 1821. His retired life until 1826 can be considered as a preparation for his work. During this period, his studies embraced mathematics, political theory, education, medicine, natural sciences, Oriental languages, and all branches of philosophy and theology. The History of Love, an early work of Rosmini on holy Scripture, bears witness to his intense application to the word of God and to his great talent for synthesis.

Rosmini's deliberate aim, in an age characterized by liberal ideas and revolt against established order, was to achieve a balance between old and new by showing how true development in every science depends upon growth from basic and unchangeable principles. On the advice of Pius VII he devoted himself to this task, principally in philosophy.

Rosmini's personal traits were defined and established in these early years. Prayer and devotion to the will

