

NEW CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

NEW CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

SECOND EDITION

13
Seq–The

THOMSON
—★—™
GALE

Detroit • New York • San Diego • San Francisco • Cleveland • New Haven, Conn. • Waterville, Maine • London • Munich

in association with
THE CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA • WASHINGTON, D.C.

The New Catholic Encyclopedia, Second Edition

Project Editors

Thomas Carson, Joann Cerrito

Editorial

Erin Bealmear, Jim Craddock, Stephen Cusack, Miranda Ferrara, Kristin Hart, Melissa Hill, Margaret Mazurkiewicz, Carol Schwartz, Christine Tomassini, Michael J. Tyrkus

Permissions

Edna Hedblad, Shalice Shah-Caldwell

Imaging and Multimedia

Randy Bassett, Dean Dauphinais, Robert Duncan, Leitha Etheridge-Sims, Mary K. Grimes, Lezlie Light, Dan Newell, David G. Oblender, Christine O'Bryan, Luke Rademacher, Pamela Reed

Product Design

Michelle DiMercurio

Data Capture

Civie Green

Manufacturing

Rhonda Williams

Indexing

Victoria Agee, Victoria Baker, Francine Cronshaw, Lynne Maday, Do Mi Stauber, Amy Suchowski

© 2003 by The Catholic University of America. Published by Gale. Gale is an imprint of The Gale Group, Inc., a division of Thomson Learning, Inc.

Gale and Design™ and Thomson Learning™ are trademarks used herein under license.

For more information, contact
The Gale Group, Inc.
27500 Drake Rd.
Farmington Hills, MI 48331-3535
Or you can visit our Internet site at <http://www.gale.com>

While every effort has been made to ensure the reliability of the information presented in this publication, The Gale Group, Inc. does not guarantee the accuracy of the data contained herein. The Gale Group, Inc. accepts no payment for listing; and inclusion in the publication of any organization, agency, institution, publication, service, or individual does not imply endorsement of the editors or publisher. Errors brought to the attention of the publisher and verified to the satisfaction of the publisher will be corrected in future editions.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS CATALOGING-IN-PUBLICATION DATA

New Catholic encyclopedia.—2nd ed.
p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and indexes.

ISBN 0-7876-4004-2

1. Catholic Church—Encyclopedias. I. Catholic University of America.

BX841 .N44 2002
282'.03—dc21
2002000924

ISBN: 0-7876-4004-2 (set)
0-7876-4005-0 (v. 1)
0-7876-4006-9 (v. 2)
0-7876-4007-7 (v. 3)
0-7876-4008-5 (v. 4)

0-7876-4009-3 (v. 5)
0-7876-4010-7 (v. 6)
0-7876-4011-5 (v. 7)
0-7876-4012-3 (v. 8)
0-7876-4013-1 (v. 9)

0-7876-4014-x (v. 10)
0-7876-4015-8 (v. 11)
0-7876-4016-6 (v. 12)
0-7876-4017-4 (v. 13)
0-7876-4018-2 (v. 14)
0-7876-4019-0 (v. 15)

Printed in the United States of America
10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

For The Catholic University of America Press

EDITORIAL STAFF

Executive Editor

Berard L. Marthaler, O.F.M.Conv., S.T.D., Ph.D.

Associate Editor

Gregory F. LaNave, Ph.D.

Assistant Editors

Jonathan Y. Tan, Ph.D.

Richard E. McCarron, Ph.D.

Editorial Assistant

Denis J. Obermeyer

Director of The Catholic University of America Press

David J. McGonagle, Ph.D.

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

John Borelli, Ph.D., Associate Director of Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, Washington, D.C.

Drew Christiansen, S.J., Ph.D., Senior Fellow, Woodstock Theological Center,
Washington, D.C.

Anne M. Clifford, C.S.J., Ph.D., Associate Professor of Theology, Duquesne University, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania

Raymond F. Collins, M.A., S.T.D.,
Professor of New Testament, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

Cyprian Davis, O.S.B., S.T.L., Ph.D.,
Professor of Church History, Saint Meinrad
School of Theology, Saint Meinrad, Indiana

Dennis M. Doyle, Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religious Studies, University of Dayton, Dayton, Ohio

Angelyn Dries, O.S.F., Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religious Studies, Cardinal
Stritch University, Milwaukee, Wisconsin

Arthur Espelage, O.F.M., J.C.D., Executive Coordinator, Canon Law Society of America, Washington, D.C.

Eugene J. Fisher, Ph.D., Associate Director of Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, United States Conference of Catholic Bishops,
Washington, D.C.

Edward J. Furton, Ph.D., Editor-in-Chief,
The National Catholic Bioethics Quarterly,
Brighton, Massachusetts

James F. Garneau, Ph.D., Academic Dean,
The Pontifical College Josephinum,
Columbus, Ohio

J. A. Wayne Hellmann, O.F.M.Conv., Dr.
Theol., Professor of Theological Studies, St.
Louis University, St. Louis, Missouri

Joseph T. Kelley, Ph.D., D.Min., Director of the Center for Augustinian Study, Merrimack College, North Andover, Massachusetts

Judith M. Kubicki, C.S.S.F., Ph.D.,
Assistant Professor of Theology, Fordham University, Bronx, New York

William P. Loewe, Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religion and Religious Education, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

Rose M. McDermott, S.S.J., J.C.D., Associate Professor of Canon Law, The Catholic University of America,
Washington, D.C.

R. Bruce Miller, M.S.L.S., Head,
Theology/Philosophy, Canon Law Libraries,
The Catholic University of America,
Washington, D.C.

Francis J. Moloney, S.D.B., S.T.L., S.S.L., D.Phil., Professor of Biblical Studies, The Catholic University of America,
Washington, D.C.

Katherine I. Rabenstein, B.S.F.S., Senior Credentialing Specialist, American Nurses Association, Washington, D.C.

Joel Rippinger, O.S.B., M.A., S.T.L., Subprior, Marmion Abbey, Aurora, Illinois

Foreword

This revised edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia represents a third generation in the evolution of the text that traces its lineage back to the Catholic Encyclopedia published from 1907 to 1912. In 1967, sixty years after the first volume of the original set appeared, The Catholic University of America and the McGraw-Hill Book Company joined together in organizing a small army of editors and scholars to produce the New Catholic Encyclopedia. Although planning for the NCE had begun before the Second Vatican Council and most of the 17,000 entries were written before Council ended, Vatican II enhanced the encyclopedia's value and importance. The research and the scholarship that went into the articles witnessed to the continuity and richness of the Catholic Tradition given fresh expression by Council. In order to keep the NCE current, supplementary volumes were published in 1972, 1978, 1988, and 1995. Now, at the beginning of the third millennium, The Catholic University of America is proud to join with The Gale Group in presenting a new edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia. It updates and incorporates the many articles from the 1967 edition and its supplements that have stood the test of time and adds hundreds of new entries.

As the president of The Catholic University of America, I cannot but be pleased at the reception the NCE has received. It has come to be recognized as an authoritative reference work in the field of religious studies and is praised for its comprehensive coverage of the Church's history and institutions. Although Canon Law no longer requires encyclopedias and reference works of this kind to receive an imprimatur before publication, I am confident that this new edition, like the original, reports accurate information about Catholic beliefs and practices. The editorial staff and their consultants were careful to present official Church teachings in a straightforward manner, and in areas where there are legitimate disputes over fact and differences in interpretation of events, they made every effort to insure a fair and balanced presentation of the issues.

The way for this revised edition was prepared by the publication, in 2000, of a Jubilee volume of the NCE, heralding the beginning of the new millennium. In my foreword to that volume I quoted Pope John Paul II's encyclical on Faith and Human Reason in which he wrote that history is "the arena where we see what God does for humanity." The New Catholic Encyclopedia describes that arena. It reports events, people, and ideas—"the things we know best and can verify most easily, the things of our everyday life, apart from which we cannot understand ourselves" (Fides et ratio, 12).

Finally, I want to express appreciation on my own behalf and on the behalf of the readers of these volumes to everyone who helped make this revision a reality. We are all indebted to The Gale Group and the staff of The Catholic University of America Press for their dedication and the alacrity with which they produced it.

Very Reverend David M. O'Connell, C.M., J.C.D.
President
The Catholic University of America

Preface to the Revised Edition

When first published in 1967 the New Catholic Encyclopedia was greeted with enthusiasm by librarians, researchers, and general readers interested in Catholicism. In the United States the NCE has been recognized as the standard reference work on matters of special interest to Catholics. In an effort to keep the encyclopedia current, supplementary volumes were published in 1972, 1978, 1988, and 1995. However, it became increasingly apparent that further supplements would not be adequate to this task. The publishers subsequently decided to undertake a thorough revision of the NCE, beginning with the publication of a Jubilee volume at the start of the new millennium.

Like the biblical scribe who brings from his store-room of knowledge both the new and the old, this revised edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia incorporates material from the 15-volume original edition and the supplement volumes. Entries that have withstood the test of time have been edited, and some have been amended to include the latest information and research. Hundreds of new entries have been added. For all practical purposes, it is an entirely new edition intended to serve as a comprehensive and authoritative work of reference reporting on the movements and interests that have shaped Christianity in general and Catholicism in particular over two millennia.

SCOPE

The title reflects its outlook and breadth. It is the New Catholic Encyclopedia, not merely a new encyclopedia of Catholicism. In addition to providing information on the doctrine, organization, and history of Christianity over the centuries, it includes information about persons, institutions, cultural phenomena, religions, philosophies, and social movements that have affected the Catholic Church from within and without. Accordingly, the NCE attends to the history and particular traditions of the Eastern Churches and the Churches of the Protestant Reformation, and other ecclesial communities. Christianity cannot be understood without exploring its roots in ancient Israel and Judaism, nor can the history of the medieval and modern Church be understood apart from its relationship with Islam. Inter-faith dialogue requires an appreciation of Buddhism and other world religions, as well as some knowledge of the history of religion in general.

On the assumption that most readers and researchers who use the NCE are individuals interested in Catholicism in general and the Church in North America in particular, its editorial content gives priority to the Western Church, while not neglecting the churches in the East; to Roman Catholicism, acknowledging much common history with Protestantism; and to Catholicism in the United States, recognizing that it represents only a small part of the universal Church.

Scripture, Theology, Patrology, Liturgy. The many and varied articles dealing with Sacred Scripture and specific books of the Bible reflect contemporary biblical scholarship and its concerns. The NCE highlights official church teachings as expressed by the Church's magisterium. It reports developments in theology, explains issues and introduces ecclesiastical writers from the early Church Fathers to present-day theologians whose works exercise major influence on the development of Christian thought. The NCE traces the evolution of the Church's worship with special emphasis on rites and rituals consequent to the liturgical reforms and renewal initiated by the Second Vatican Council.

Church History. From its inception Christianity has been shaped by historical circumstances and itself has become a historical force. The NCE presents the Church's history from a number of points of view against the background of general political and cultural history. The revised edition reports in some detail the Church's missionary activity as it grew from a small community in Jerusalem to the worldwide phenomenon it is today. Some entries, such as those dealing with the Middle Ages, the Reformation, and the Enlightenment, focus on major time-periods and movements that cut across geographical boundaries. Other articles describe the history and structure of the Church in specific areas, countries, and regions. There are separate entries for many dioceses and monasteries which by reason of antiquity, size, or influence are of special importance in ecclesiastical history, as there are for religious orders and congregations. The NCE rounds out its comprehensive history of the Church with articles on religious movements and biographies of individuals.

Canon and Civil Law. The Church inherited and has safeguarded the precious legacy of ancient Rome, described by Virgil, “to rule people under law, [and] to establish the way of peace.” The NCE deals with issues of ecclesiastical jurisprudence and outlines the development of legislation governing communal practices and individual obligations, taking care to incorporate and reference the 1983 Code of Canon Law throughout and, where appropriate, the Code of Canons for the Eastern Churches. It deals with issues of Church-State relations and with civil law as it impacts on the Church and Church’s teaching regarding human rights and freedoms.

Philosophy. The Catholic tradition from its earliest years has investigated the relationship between faith and reason. The NCE considers at some length the many and varied schools of ancient, medieval, and modern philosophy with emphasis, when appropriate, on their relationship to theological positions. It pays particular attention to the scholastic tradition, particularly Thomism, which is prominent in Catholic intellectual history. Articles on many major and lesser philosophers contribute to a comprehensive survey of philosophy from pre-Christian times to the present.

Biography and Hagiography. The NCE, making an exception for the reigning pope, leaves to other reference works biographical information about living persons. This revised edition presents biographical sketches of hundreds of men and women, Christian and non-Christian, saints and sinners, because of their significance for the Church. They include: Old and New Testament figures; the Fathers of the Church and ecclesiastical writers; pagan and Christian emperors; medieval and modern kings; heads of state and other political figures; heretics and champions of orthodoxy; major and minor figures in the Reformation and Counter Reformation; popes, bishops, and priests; founders and members of religious orders and congregations; lay men and lay women; scholars, authors, composers, and artists. The NCE includes biographies of most saints whose feasts were once celebrated or are currently celebrated by the universal church. The revised edition relies on Butler’s Lives of the Saints and similar reference works to give accounts of many saints, but the NCE also provides biographical information about recently canonized and beatified individuals who are, for one reason or another, of special interest to the English-speaking world.

Social Sciences. Social sciences came into their own in the twentieth century. Many articles in the NCE rely on data drawn from anthropology, economics, psychology and sociology for a better understanding of religious structures and behaviors. Papal encyclicals and pastoral letters of episcopal conferences are the source of principles and norms for Christian attitudes and practice in the field of social action and legislation. The NCE draws attention to the Church’s organized activities in pursuit of peace and justice, social welfare and human rights. The growth of the role of the laity in the work of the Church also receives thorough coverage.

ARRANGEMENT OF ENTRIES

The articles in the NCE are arranged alphabetically by the first substantive word using the word-by-word method of alphabetization; thus “New Zealand” precedes “Newman, John Henry,” and “Old Testament Literature” precedes “Oldcastle, Sir John.” Monarchs, patriarchs, popes, and others who share a Christian name and are differentiated by a title and numerical designation are alphabetized by their title and then arranged numerically. Thus, entries for Byzantine emperors Leo I through IV precede those for popes of the same name, while “Henry VIII, King of England” precedes “Henry IV, King of France.”

Maps, Charts, and Illustrations. The New Catholic Encyclopedia contains nearly 3,000 illustrations, including photographs, maps, and tables. Entries focusing on the Church in specific countries contain a map of the country as well as easy-to-read tables giving statistical data and, where helpful, lists of archdioceses and dioceses. Entries on the Church in U.S. states also contain tables listing archdioceses and dioceses where appropriate. The numerous photographs appearing in the New Catholic Encyclopedia help to illustrate the history of the Church, its role in modern societies, and the many magnificent works of art it has inspired.

SPECIAL FEATURES

Subject Overview Articles. For the convenience and guidance of the reader, the New Catholic Encyclopedia contains several brief articles outlining the scope of major fields: “Theology, Articles on,” “Liturgy, Articles on,” “Jesus Christ, Articles on,” etc.

Cross-References. The cross-reference system in the NCE serves to direct the reader to related material in other articles. The appearance of a name or term in small capital letters in text indicates that there is an article of that title elsewhere in the encyclopedia. In some cases, the name of the related article has been inserted at the appropriate point as a see reference: (see THOMAS AQUINAS, ST.). When a further aspect of the subject is treated under another title, a see also reference is placed at the end of the article. In addition to this extensive cross-reference system, the comprehensive index in volume 15 will greatly increase the reader's ability to access the wealth of information contained in the encyclopedia.

Abbreviations List. Following common practice, books and versions of the Bible as well as other standard works by selected authors have been abbreviated throughout the text. A guide to these abbreviations follows this preface.

The Editors

Abbreviations

The system of abbreviations used for the works of Plato, Aristotle, St. Augustine, and St. Thomas Aquinas is as follows: Plato is cited by book and Stephanus number only, e.g., Phaedo 79B; Rep. 480A. Aristotle is cited by book and Bekker number only, e.g., Anal. post. 72b 8–12; Anim. 430a 18. St. Augustine is cited as in the Thesaurus Linguae Latinae, e.g., C. acad. 3.20.45; Conf. 13.38.53, with capitalization of the first word of the title. St. Thomas is cited as in scholarly journals, but using Arabic numerals. In addition, the following abbreviations have been used throughout the encyclopedia for biblical books and versions of the Bible.

Books

Acts	Acts of the Apostles
Am	Amos
Bar	Baruch
1–2 Chr	1 and 2 Chronicles (1 and 2 Paralipomenon in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Col	Colossians
1–2 Cor	1 and 2 Corinthians
Dn	Daniel
Dt	Deuteronomy
Eccl	Ecclesiastes
Eph	Ephesians
Est	Esther
Ex	Exodus
Ez	Ezekiel
Ezr	Ezra (Esdras B in Septuagint; 1 Esdras in Vulgate)
Gal	Galatians
Gn	Genesis
Hb	Habakkuk
Heb	Hebrews
Hg	Haggai
Hos	Hosea
Is	Isaiah
Jas	James
Jb	Job
Jdt	Judith
Jer	Jeremiah
Jgs	Judges
Jl	Joel
Jn	John
1–3 Jn	1, 2, and 3 John
Jon	Jonah
Jos	Joshua

Jude	Jude
1–2 Kgs	1 and 2 Kings (3 and 4 Kings in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Lam	Lamentations
Lk	Luke
Lv	Leviticus
Mal	Malachi (Malachias in Vulgate)
1–2 Mc	1 and 2 Maccabees
Mi	Micah
Mk	Mark
Mt	Matthew
Na	Nahum
Neh	Nehemiah (2 Esdras in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Nm	Numbers
Ob	Obadiah
Phil	Philippians
Phlm	Philemon
Prv	Proverbs
Ps	Psalms
1–2 Pt	1 and 2 Peter
Rom	Romans
Ru	Ruth
Rv	Revelation (Apocalypse in Vulgate)
Sg	Song of Songs
Sir	Sirach (Wisdom of Ben Sira; Ecclesiasticus in Septuagint and Vulgate)
1–2 Sm	1 and 2 Samuel (1 and 2 Kings in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Tb	Tobit
1–2 Thes	1 and 2 Thessalonians
Ti	Titus
1–2 Tm	1 and 2 Timothy
Wis	Wisdom
Zec	Zechariah
Zep	Zephaniah

Versions

Apoc	Apocrypha
ARV	American Standard Revised Version
ARVm	American Standard Revised Version, margin
AT	American Translation
AV	Authorized Version (King James)
CCD	Confraternity of Christian Doctrine
DV	Douay-Challoner Version

ABBREVIATIONS

ERV	English Revised Version	NJB	New Jerusalem Bible
ERVm	English Revised Version, margin	NRSV	New Revised Standard Version
EV	English Version(s) of the Bible	NT	New Testament
JB	Jerusalem Bible	OT	Old Testament
LXX	Septuagint	RSV	Revised Standard Version
MT	Masoretic Text	RV	Revised Version
NAB	New American Bible	RVm	Revised Version, margin
NEB	New English Bible	Syr	Syriac
NIV	New International Version	Vulg	Vulgate

S

SEQUENCE

In the Roman rite, a musical setting of rhymed poetry with paired lines, occurring after the Alleluia verse and before the Gospel in the Mass for certain solemnities and important feasts. The revision of the Lectionary that was promulgated by Paul VI in 1969 brought about some changes in the use of the Sequence. Prior to the revision, five sequences were used: Easter, Victimae paschali laudes (obligatory for the feast and its octave); Pentecost, Veni, Sancte Spiritus (obligatory for the feast and its octave); Corpus Christi, Lauda Sion (obligatory on the feast, optional during the octave, suppressed since 1960); Requiem Masses, Dies irae; Friday after Passion Sunday and September 15, Feast of Our Lady of Sorrows, Stabat Mater (obligatory on both days). The Council of Trent had suppressed thousands of sequences in its reform of the liturgy, salvaging only the first four for liturgical use. The fifth, Stabat Mater was reinstated by Benedict XIII in 1727.

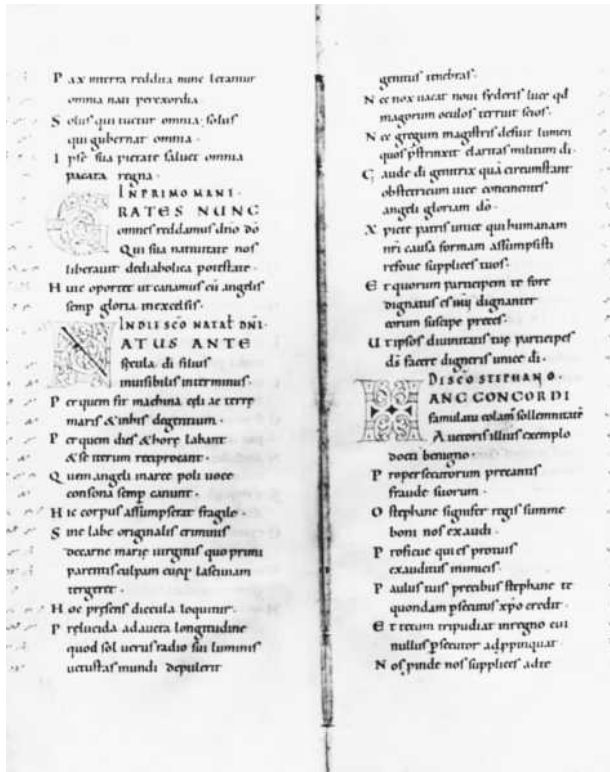

The General Instruction of the Roman Missal says quite simply: "Except on Easter Sunday and Pentecost the sequences are optional" (GIRM 40). This means, in practice, that the Easter Sequence is optional during its octave; the calendar has eliminated the Pentecost octave, leaving the Sequence for the feast alone; the Lauda Sion is optional for the feast of Corpus Christi; the calendar revision has eliminated duplicate feasts, leaving the feast of Our Lady of Sorrows to be celebrated only on September 15, with its Sequence also optional; the Dies irae has been dropped completely from Masses for the Dead. In the 1969 revision, the Sequence is now placed before the Alleluia, since this acclamation properly belongs to the Gospel proclamation.

Musical structure. Musically the Sequence does resemble the hymn in its monophonic, syllabic structure, but it differs from it in structure and liturgical function. Whereas all the strophes of the hymn are constructed according to the same poetic plan and are sung to the same music in all verses, the Sequence displays progressive repetitions consisting of successive paired lines (double versicles), both of which have the same melody, and often includes a single line at the beginning and end. The conventional diagram is: The x and y represent the optional unpaired introduction and postlude.

The Sequence process consists essentially in underlying a limited number of well-known tunes with new texts. These texts are freshly created verse lines consisting of words whose succession contains the same or nearly the same number of syllables as there are individual tones in the collective neumes or melismas of the pre-existent melody. In the process the shape of the original tune is literally preserved, but its musical identity is transformed. The striking parallel between this process and the cantus firmus procedure of medieval polyphony should not be overlooked. Unlike the tradition of classical plainchant, moreover, the lyricism of the new text results from the meaning and the representation of individual syllables, and the syntax and shape of the new text are derived from the slower-moving succession of heightened pitches borrowed from a neumatic or melismatic melody. The new text, derived from a transformed melody, has abdicated its own poetic canons and obeys a new kind of syllabic organization.

Emergence of the sequence. The term "Sequence" appeared first in the ninth century, when it signified an extended series of tones. Scholars are uncertain whether the precise etymology of the word is to be viewed as essentially musical (i.e., to describe the quality of a melody as an indifferent succession of tones) or liturgical (to describe the function of a melody to follow a liturgical text). Usage of the term was much less clearly defined than in later writings; yet in all these ninth-century sources, the series of tones it designated was in some way related to the Alleluia and its verse, as is indicated in an Antiphonale Missarum from Mount Blandin, a text from the De ecclesiasticis officiis of AMALARIUS, and a famous dedicatory preface by NOTKER BALBULUS of the Abbey of St. Gall (Sankt Gallen). The Antiphonale contains the phrase cum sequentia at the end of the text for several Alleluia verses. Amalarius describes the Alleluia verse as a jubilation that the singers called Sequence (haec jubilatio quam cantores sequentian vocant). These early references seem to suggest that at the end of chants whose texts already conveyed a mood of enthusiasm and exaltation, melodies were at times added to extend in temporal quantity the joyful mood of the liturgy. This extension was accomplished by a sonorous repetition of the word alleluia by the entire choir. The volume, pace, and character of the responsorial chant were, however, modified by this choral repetition of the Alleluia, as was demanded by the rubrics. This repetition, being collective rather than individual, could not be improvised; yet there was an improvisatory spirit to these added Alleluias—no doubt psychologically engendered by the difference between spontaneous textless jubilations and the set, controlled texts of the other chants.

Manuscript folios showing Notker Sequences, “Natus ante saecula,” for Christmas feast, “Hanc concordi famulatu,” for St. Stephen’s Day, from the Abbey of St. Emmeran.

The dedicatory letter of Notker accompanied a group of these elongated melodies underlaid with texts, which he sent to Bishop Lieutward of Vercelli c. 885. In this letter, in which he referred to the melodies as Sequences, he confessed that his creative imagination had been stirred when he first beheld compositions of this type in a Norman antiphonary brought to St. Gall by a refugee from the recently devastated Abbey of JUMIÈGES. Some verses for the long melodies in this antiphonary were written out; and Notker, who explained that as a young man he had had difficulty remembering the very long additions (melodiae longissimae) to the Alleluia verses, decided to imitate this practice as a memory aid, reducing groups of wordless melismas to syllabic units he could remember. His first efforts, however, must not have been entirely syllabic melodies, for, as he states, it was his master, Yso, who suggested that he adopt a completely syllabic style and praised the results when he did so. It was a collection of these praiseworthy pieces that Notker wished to share with his episcopal friend. The prevailing tone of his document is more psychological than musical, for in reducing larger rhythmical groups (neumes and melismas) to smaller units (syllables and notes) he recognized a solution to his memory problem.

Notker claimed that he had improved upon an existing technique of text adaptation and also suggested that he was a creator and not a mere imitator. Accordingly, certain historians have mistakenly attributed the invention of the Sequence form to him. The title of his collection, Liber hymnorum, does indeed indicate his belief that a new musical as well as liturgical style had been invented, for although the Church’s hymn tradition was very old, the hymn as a form was assigned to the Divine Office, not to the Mass. Perhaps Notker was conscious of having contrived a musical form with both popular appeal and liturgical precedent, besides being usable in the Mass, and was intimating to Bishop Lieutward that there was need for just such a form. Whatever artistic refinements Notker and his St. Gall confreres added to the sequence as a liturgical form, most scholars now agree that he did not innovate it. Besides Jumièges, which Notker himself mentions, Saint-Benoît sur Loire, Toul, and Lâon have been cited as possible sources. Southern France, despite the rich resources of the library at Saint-Martial Abbey at Limoges, contributes most to the literature of the Sequence only after the rise of Aquitanian notation (c. 1000).

Development. Between Notker’s memory aids and the five present-day Sequences with their parallel structure, their regularity in textual strophic construction, and their use of textual rhyme, there intervened a long and complicated development. Musicologists distinguish between early Sequences and later Sequences and also divide the Sequence repertory into two independent but not separate traditions—an Anglo-French and an Italo-German. These same traditions are observed in the trope, which emerged in the same centers at about the same moment, though its life span was much shorter than that of the Sequence. Stylistically the creative periods of Sequence composition have been designated as the early pe-

x
 Psal - lat ec - cle - si - a ma - ter il - li - ba - ta et vir - go si - ne ru - ga ho - no - rem hu - ius ec - cle - si - ae. 1. Haec do - mus au - lae cae - le - stis pro - ba - tur par - ti - ceps. 1. Et lu - mi - ne
 2. In lau - de re - gis cae - lo - rum et ce - re - mo - ni - is. 2. Et cor - po - ra con - ti - nu - o ae - mu - lans ci - vi - ta - tem si - ne te - ne - bris 1. Quem dex - tra pro - te - gat in gre - mi - o con - fo - vens a - ni - ma - rum quae in cae - lo vi - vunt. 2. Ad lau - dem ip - si - us De - i 1. Hic no - vam pro - lem gra - ti - a par - tu - rit fe - cun - da Spi - ri - tu Sanc - to di - u. 2. An - ge - li ci - ves vi - si - tant hic su - os et cor - pus su - mi - tur Je - su.
 1. Fu - gi - unt u - ni - ver - sa cor - po - ra no - cu - a 7a. Hic vox lae - ti - ti - ae
 2. Pe - re - unt pec - ca - tri - cis a - ni - mae cri - mi - na. b. Hic pax et gau - di - a per - so - nat re - dun - dat. Hac do - mo Tri - ni - ta - ti laus et glo - ri - a sem - per, re - sul - tant.

“Psallat ecclesia mater,” musical sequence by Motker Balbulus.

riod (850–1050), transitional period (1050–1100), and later period (1100–1300). For the early period, there are three extant manuscript sources from the second half of the ninth century: Munich, Bayerische Staatsbibliothek, Clm. 14823; Verona, Biblioteca Capitolare XC; and Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale, fonds Lat. 1154. These contain texts, mostly without neumes, that are scattered among other paraliturgical forms. In the second half of the tenth century appeared the first cycle of Sequences and texts arranged according to the Church year, the Congregatio prosarum; and this earliest sequentiary—that is, the section of the manuscript containing this cycle—is bound with a troper as Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale, fonds Lat. 1240. With the exception of these specific items, the sources for early Sequences and tropes are identical.

As for the two traditions posited by scholars, Anglo-French sources consistently apply the word “Sequence” for a melismatic extension of an Alleluia melody without text; prosa for the text to be underlaid to an extended Alleluia melody, printed with or without the syllabic melody; sequentia cum prosa for an extended Alleluia melody whose neumes have been dissolved by syllables or words; and prosula for a text set to an extended, similarly dissolved melody of some chant other than the Alleluia. The Gradual, the Alleluia verse, or the Offertory verse of the Proper, or the Kyrie, Sanctus, or Benedicamus Domino of the Ordinary contained such extended melodies sometimes underlaid with prosula texts. Italo-German sources, however, consistently apply the word “Sequence” for both text and melody, written together on a single page. The melismatic extension of an Alleluia melody is written in the margin around the text. In this tradition, the term implies the total picture of words and music as they appear on a manuscript page. The practice of referring to both text and tune by the collective term apparently began in the Italo-German tradition shortly after the time of Notker, who, as noted above, called his compositions hymns. English scholars often use the term sequelae to describe the extended and wordless melismas of the Alleluia at the end of the Alleluia verse. As a pedagogic device, this usage is sometimes convenient, since it obviates the double meaning for the word “sequence.” There is no evidence that it was ever employed in such official books as the gradual and antiphony containing canonical texts, or such unofficial books as troper and sequentiary containing paraliturgical texts.

Manuscript folio 21 of "Congregatio Prosarum," sung during Feast of the Holy Innocents, earliest noted sequentiary, late 10th century.

Prosa, Prosula, Sequence. Prosula texts, as was indicated above, are intended as an underlay to certain texts of the official repertory, the official texts being set in a musical style that is neumatic, with occasional melismatic extensions. Something of the nature of the new prosula may be discovered by comparing it with its liturgical model. Numerous examples have been published, including the prosula text Non vos homines for the Alleluia verse; Non vos me elegistis, in Analecta hymnica (Leipzig 1886–1922) 49:252, ed. C. Blume; or the prosula text and melody Mirabilis atque laudabilis for an Alleluia verse, Mirabilis Dominus, cited by P. Evans. The prosula text is asymmetrical; it is free rhythmic prose with irregular accents, and assonance seems to be the only poetic device employed. The structural canons of its poetry come to light when compared with the poetry and music of the original. The prosula is a melody-orientated verse. Its high points are dictated by the canons of melody, not by those of poetry. The number of syllables corresponds generally to the number of notes occurring in a given melisma between melodic high points. The placing of end assonance is occasioned by the position of certain vowel sounds in the melodic pattern of the official text. The number of individual notes in the neumes and melismas of the original liturgical piece being underlaid determines the length of the new verse. While there is indeed craftsmanship displayed here, it is of a different order from that which characterizes the official chant, for the phraseology and tone groupings of the classical chant have been transformed into the sounds and individual notes of a new musical texture. Volumes 7 and 53 of Analecta hymnica contain texts of the earliest Sequences. While these texts display many of the same characteristics as prosula texts, assonance is less prevalent in them. Without an official text with given sounds at given pitch levels to be matched by the same sounds in the new text, the prosula composer was freer in his choice of syllabic succession than the composer of the prosula. Anglo-French texts frequently began with the word "Alleluia." In the subsequent prosula, the assonance "a" was prevalent. An "e" assonance, generated from the same introductory Alleluia, characterizes Spanish texts of the same Anglo-French tradition. Italo-German texts, on the other hand, begin directly without the word "alleluia" and display less assonance.

Melodic extension by phrase repetition is freer in the Sequence than in the prosula melody. Literal repetition of shorter antiphons to prolong the solemnity of a feast is mentioned in John's life of Odo of Cluny (Patrologia Latina, 217 v. [Paris 1878–90] 133:43–68). This may have been the liturgical reason for the repetition by phrase in the longer Sequences. It is usually indicated by letter abbreviations: d (duplex, duplitter), t (trahere), and s (semel). Musical content of the Sequence extensions permitted greater freedom of invention than corresponding continuations of prosalae. The latter extensions returned to the melodic line of the official melody, while the Sequence melody apparently did not. EKKEHARD, in the Casus Sancti Galli (Patrologia Latina, 217 v. [Paris 1878–90] 131:1003), praises some of Tuotillo's tunes invented on the rolla or psalterium. Melodies invented to extend the spirit of a liturgical feast and to be participated in by a community of modest musical ability may have displayed corresponding ties with folk idiom, as this liturgical folk style developed.

Whatever their differences in terminology for the early period of Sequence writing, modern scholars agree on the artistic process involved: It was a procedure of text underlay to an already existing melody. Inventing a new text to a familiar tune is not an uncommon practice in any period and seems to have been fairly common in the liturgy during this period. A collection of new texts, apparently for liturgical use, exists in the earliest sequentiary (Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale, fonds Lat. 1240) under the collective heading Congregatio prosarum. Two forms of a melody for some of these texts are included in different parts of the book: one, a syllabic form written over a prose text; the other, a neumatic or a melismatic form written either with the official text if it is neumatic, or as one of a group of Sequences if it is melismatic. This is the ordinary method of notation for books of the Anglo-French tradition.

Transitional period. With the emergence of the cathedral as a parochial entity, the character of the liturgy was modified; this change in liturgical structure occasioned concomitant changes in the forms that were expressions of this structure, the Sequence among them. While retaining an organic relation with the past, the Sequence became a different kind of artistic form.

The Victimae Paschali laudes, attributed to Wipo, a diocesan priest of Burgundy, is an example of a Sequence from the transitional period. The text, while retaining elements of the unrhymed and irregular earlier Sequences, presages the regular form of the Sequences of ADAM OF SAINT-VICTOR and the later composers. In its terseness and brevity, it employs at times regular alternation of accented and unaccented syllables, as well as rhyme. The melody, while borrowing its Incipit from an Alleluia currently assigned to the fourth Sunday after Easter, continues freely as a melody. It has been called the perfect musical expression of Easter. The clarion melody of the Sequence has a character different from the continuation of the Alleluia melody. Moreover, the dialog form characterizing the second part of the Sequence was a purposeful artistic nuance, not the result of a process of text underlay, and was achieved by a play of motives in different ranges.

Later Sequences. The final period in the development of the Sequence was reached with the Victorine poets, particularly Adam. With them the form as it is known today was defined and fixed, and the musical style became relatively consistent. The musical style in general is logogenic, that is, the tunes follow the words and are musically comparable to those of a popular folk style of the period. In the late period, an irregular folk style discovered in an existing liturgical practice had become a regular folk style with fixed criteria for both its poetry and its music. Some of these later Sequence melodies were at times eminently suited to the musical expression of sentiments already contained in the words of the Sequence texts. As musical expressions in themselves or as expressions of the period of which they were a part, however, they were by no means sophisticated or progressive. Like similar examples in earlier or perhaps even ancient musical tradition, the better examples of this repertory were often merely good renderings in song of a collective sentiment. Hence they were destined by their very nature to be modest and conservative. Their symmetry was predictable, their range limited, and their stress on the individual word. This primitive style was suitable for active participation—appealing to an audience of modest competence and to a performer or group of performers without virtuoso skills.

In the literary purview, even in the refined texts of Adam there are features reminiscent of more primitive early processes. His terraced rhymes, which gain in weight and frequency as the climax approaches, elicit a musical response to the mounting tension. His word play and word coinage are sometimes at the level of the common pun. Limerick-style prosody, as well as poetic effects derived from the canons of music, were features of the Sequence of the early period. Adam's verse was in a metrical mold already popular in the hymn. It consists of a group of rhymed trochaic lines of eight syllables with a caesura after the fourth syllable at the end of a word closing with a seven-syllable line. Each of these three-line stanzas is set to identical music, thus preserving the rhyming and parallel structure.

Bibliography: P. AUBRY and E. MISSET, eds., Les Proses d'Adam de Saint-Victor (Paris 1900). C. BLUME et al., eds., Analecta Hymnica v. 49. (Leipzig). W. H. FRERE, ed., The Winchester Troper (London 1894). H. M. BANNISTER, Anglo-French Sequelae, ed. A. HUGHES (London 1934). A. SCHUBIGER, Die Sängerschule St. Gallens (Einsiedeln 1858). P. EVANS, "Some Reflections on the Origin of the Trope." Journal of the American Musicological Society 14 (1961) 119–130. H. HUSMANN, "Alleluia, Vers und Sequenz," Annales musicologiques 4 (1956) 19–53; "Sequenz und Prosa," ibid. 2 (1954) 61–91; "Die Alleluia und Sequenz der Mater-Gruppe," International Musicological Society: Report of the Congress 5 (1956) 276–284; "Die älteste erreichbare Gestalt des St. Galler Tropariums." Archiv für Musikwissenschaft 13 (1956) 25–41; "Die St. Galler Sequenz-tradition bei Notker und Ekkehard," Acta musicologica 26 (1954) 6–18. P. DRONKE, "The Beginnings of the Sequence," Beiträge zur Geschichte der deutschen Sprache und Literatur 87 (1965) 43–73. R. CROCKER, "Some Ninth-Century Sequences," Journal of the American Musicological Society 20 (1967) 367–402; The Early Medieval Sequence (Berkeley 1977).

[E. LEAHY/L. DURST, EDS.]

SERAPHIM

Plural noun probably derived from Hebrew transitive verb meaning to burn. It designates celestial beings of the court of Yahweh in the vocational vision of Isaiah (6.2–6), which is the only occurrence of the word in this sense in the Bible. Commonly they are called the burning ones, not to indicate their intransitive flame of charity toward Yahweh, but rather referring to purifying mission of one seraph to Isaiah, preparing him for his prophetic vocation.

Carved sculpture of Seraphim adorning top of wall plaque, Santa Caterina a Formiello Church, Naples, Italy. (©Mimmo Jodice/CORBIS)

Various opinions identify seraphim with winged griffons of Egypt, CHERUBIM, and Akkadian–Canaanite genii associated with divine majesty. But Isaiah clearly presents them as humanlike beings with faces, hands, feet, and equipped with six wings. With one pair of wings they veil their faces lest they see Yahweh (Ex 33.20); with a second pair they “hovered aloft”; with the third pair they veiled their feet (euphemism for pudenda). They may have been well known in Israelite lore because Isaiah mentions them without preparation or explanation. Unwarrantedly, some have associated seraphim with the saraph (burning) serpents of Nm 21.4–9; Dt 8.15; Is 14.29, 30.6, whose bite caused a burning sensation; or with the Nohestan (bronze serpent) of 2 Kgs 18.4. As to their number, while some say choirs of seraphim are indicated, the text favors the opinion that just two seraphim cry the Trisagion “one to the other.”

Unliteral acceptance of “burning” intransitively as of the flame of love, together with seraphim choirs praising thrice holy Yahweh, have led Christian speculation, piety, and art to place seraphim as the highest and most ardent of the angelic orders.

Bibliography: J. STEINMANN, Le Prophète Isaïe: sa vie, son oeuvre et son temps (2d ed. Paris 1955) 36–38. E. LACHEMAN, “Seraphim of Isaiah 6,” Jewish Quarterly Review 59 (1968) 71–72. J. D. SAVIGNAC, “Les seraphim,” Vetus Testamentum 22 (1972) 320–325. J. DAY, “Echoes of Baal’s Seven Thunders and Lightnings in Psalm 29 and Habakkuk 3:9 and the Identity of the Seraphim in Isaiah 6,” Vetus Testamentum 29 (1979) 143–151.

[T. L. FALLON/EDS.]

SERAPHINA (FINA), ST.

Virgin; b. San Gimignano, Tuscany, 1238; d. there, March 12, 1253. She led a religious life in her parental home and was an example of piety, charity, mortification, and patience during a long serious illness. She was buried in the village church of San Gimignano.

Feast: Mar. 12.

Bibliography: G. COPPI, La storica vita e morte di s.F. di S. Gimignano (Florence 1575). Acta Sanctorum March 2:231–238. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901) 1:2978. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l’ordre du calendrier avec l’historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 3:279–280. J. BAUR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:132.

[K. NOLAN]

SERAPHINA SFORZA, BL.

Abbess; b. Sueva Montefeltro, Urbino, Italy, 1434; d. Pesaro, Sept. 8, 1478. After being orphaned quite young, she was reared in Rome by her uncle, Prince Colonna. She married Alexander Sforza, Duke of Pesaro, at 16. After a short time this marriage was made unhappy, first by her husband’s long absence on military campaigns, and then by his involvement with a mistress. When he expelled Sueva from his house in 1457, she was sheltered by the POOR CLARES. She later entered this convent at Pesaro and became abbess in 1475 after her husband’s death. Her cult was approved in 1754.

Feast: Sept. 9.

Bibliography: B. FELICIANGELI, Sulla monacazione di Sueva Montefeltro-Sforza (Pistoia 1903). F. VAN ORTROY, Analecta Bollandiana 24 (1905) 311–313. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York, 1956) 3:517–518.

[N. G. WOLF]

SERAPHINO, ST.

Capuchin lay brother; b. 1540; d. Ascoli, Oct. 12, 1604. Seraphino (of Montegranaro) spent his early youth as a shepherd, returning to his home upon the death of his parents. He first desired to be a hermit, but hearing of the Capuchins, he applied for admission to the order at Tolentino. After repeated refusals, the provincial finally accepted him. He received the habit at Jesi in 1556 and was professed a year later. He progressed rapidly in the spiritual life, but he was a failure at the ordinary duties of a lay brother, and received many rebukes and complaints about his awkwardness. Because of his fidelity to the Franciscan rule, his miracles, and his practice of charity to all, he won the devotion of the people. He was beatified in 1729, and canonized by Clement XIII in 1767.

Feast: Oct. 12.

Bibliography: Lexicon Capuccinum (Rome 1951) 1583–84. Bullarium O.F.M. Cap., v.1–7 (Rome 1740–52), v.8–10 (Innsbruck 1883–84). v.7, 10. D. SVAMPA, Vita di San Serafino da Montegrano, laico capuccino (Bologna 1904).

[E. SCHMIDT]

SERAPION OF THMUIS, ST.

Monk, theologian; consecrated bishop of Thmuis (Lower Egypt) before 339; d. after 362 (feast, March 21; Coptic Church, March 7). Scrapion had been superior of a colony of monks and was an intimate friend of St. ANTHONY OF EGYPT (the Hermit). He received a number of letters from St. ATHANASIUS of Alexandria, among them the four Concerning the Holy Spirit, the first formal treatise ever written on this subject. In 356 Athanasius sent Serapion with four other Egyptian bishops to the court of Constantius II to refute the calumnies of the Arians (Sozomen, Hist. eccl. 4.9). It was under the same Emperor that Serapion was ousted from his see by the Arian usurper Ptolemaius (359); and Jerome calls him a “confessor” (De vir. ill. 99). The same source states that Serapion was given the title scholasticus on account of his great learning.

Sozomen (loc. cit.) calls him “a prelate distinguished by the wonderful sanctity of his life and the power of his eloquence.” Jerome mentions among his works “an excellent treatise Against the Manicheans, one on the titles of the Psalms, and useful Epistles to various persons.” The work on the Psalms is lost, but that against the Manichaeans was published in 1931 by R. Casey who discovered it in a 12th-century manuscript of the Monastery of Vatopedi on Mount Athos. It gives ample evidence of the rhetorical, philosophical, and theological erudition of the author. Serapion does not refute the entire Manichaean system, but limits himself to a criticism of the main points, especially of the dualistic theory of a good and bad principle.

Though there existed at one time a collection of 23 of his letters, only three are extant, two in Greek discovered by Cardinal Mai (the first addressed to Bishop Eudoxius; the second, to monks at Alexandria), and one in Syriac recently published by R. Draguet, addressed to some disciples of St. Anthony the hermit on the occasion of his death. Jerome does not mention the Euchologion, discovered by A. Dimitrijewskij (1894) in an 11th-century manuscript of the Laura Monastery of Mount ATHOS. There is no doubt that Serapion is the author of this Sacramentary, which has great importance in the history of the liturgy. It consists of 30 prayers, 18 connected with the Eucharistic liturgy, seven with Baptism and Confirmation, three with Ordination, and two with the blessings of the oils and funerals. It contains the earliest certain evidence for the Sanctus in the Mass. Most striking is the prayer for the union of the Church drawn from the DIDACHE and inserted between the words of the Institution for the bread and the cup, and the EPICLESIS of the Logos, rather than the Holy Spirit, which seems to be Serapion’s contribution. The author is a compiler of traditional material, but shows a bold independence that leads to the creation of new prayers and revisions of early Christian forms.

Bibliography: R. P. CASEY, Serapion of Thmuis against the Manichees (Cambridge, Mass. 1931). Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1857–66) 40:923–942. R. DRAGUET, Muséon 64 (1951) 1–25, with Fr. tr. A. DIMITRIJEWSKIJ, ed., Euchologium (Kiev 1894). G. WOBBERMIN, Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur N5 2.3b (Berlin 1898). F. E. BRIGHTMAN, Journal of Theological Studies 1 (Berlin 1900) 88–113, 247–277. F. X. FUNK, ed., Didascalia et constitutiones apostolorum, 2 v. (Paderborn 1905) 2:158–195. J. QUASTEN, ed., Monumenta eucharista et liturgica vetustissima (Bonn 1935–37) 7.1:48–69. J. WORDSWORTH, tr., Bishop Serapion’s Prayer-Book (London 1899). G. BARDY, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 14.2:1908–12. H. DÖRRIE, Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. Suppl. 8 (Stuttgart 1956) 1260–67; J. QUASTEN, Patrology (Westminster, Md. 1950–) 3:80–85. G. DIX, The Shape of the Liturgy (2d ed. London 1945; repr. 1960) 162–172. P. E. RODOPOULOS, Theologia 28 (1957) 252–275, 420–439, 578–591; 29 (1958) 45–54, 208–217, Sacramentary. K. FITSCHEN, Serapion von Thmuis : echte und unechte Schriften sowie die Zeugnisse des Athanasius und anderer (Berlin; New York 1992). M. E. JOHNSON, The Prayers of Sarapion of Thmuis: A Literary, Liturgical, and Theological Analysis (Rome 1995).

[J. QUASTEN]

SERBIA AND MONTENEGRO, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The joint government of Serbia and Montenegro, formerly part of the self-proclaimed Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, is located in southeastern Europe, on the Balkan Peninsula. The region is bound by Hungary on the north, Romania on the northeast, Bulgaria on the east, Macedonia and Albania on the south, the Adriatic Sea on the southwest, and Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia on the west. Encompassing the former Yugoslavian provinces of Vojvodina, Kosovo, Serbia and Montenegro, the region is characterized by fertile plains in the north, rising to rolling hills and mountains in the south, while the eastern area is predominated by limestone outcroppings and ranges. Petroleum, natural gas, coal, antimony, copper, lead and nickel are among the wealth of natural resources in the area.

As the most populous and most dispersed nationality, ethnic Serbs exerted great influence on the former federated Yugoslavian republic. Although concentrated in Serbia proper, in 1981 they also accounted for substantial portions of the remainder of Yugoslavia, a result of their migration to avoid oppression during the Ottoman occupation. Attempting to limit Serbian domination, Yugoslavia's communist government immediately redrew the region's federal units to achieve political recognition of Macedonian and Montenegrin ethnic individuality and the mixed populations of Vojvodina, Kosovo and Bosnia-Herzegovina. Ethnic rivalries continued to simmer, coming to a head following the break up of Yugoslavia in the early 1990s, and resulting in mass genocide in the region of Kosovo.

Early Church in Serbia. Using the Drina and Zeta rivers as lines of demarcation, in 379 the Roman Empire divided Illyricum in half. Greek Byzantine culture predominated within Eastern Illyricum, which included the region that eventually became modern Serbia and Montenegro, while the Latin rite developed in the west. The eastern region was joined to the Rome Patriarchate until 732, when it became subject to the Patriarchate of CONSTANTINOPLE.

The first Serbian bishopric was established near the Raška River, and by 1020 was a suffragan to the Archdiocese of Ohrid. The founder of the independent medieval Serbian state was Stephen Nemanja, who emancipated it from Byzantine rule in 1183. Stephen abdicated in 1196 and gave to Vukanus, his eldest son, Dioclia (now Montenegro), and to his younger son Stephen, Raška. Afterward he and his youngest son, St. Sava Nemanja, founded the monastery of Hilandar. Stephen ultimately became the ruler of all his father's dominions and requested a royal crown from Honorius III. The pope granted his petition and sent a special legation to Serbia for the coronation c. 1220 that won Stephen the surname Prvo-venčani ("first-crowned") and united Serbia with the Holy See and the Catholic Church. However, the union was undermined by Sava, who was negotiating with the patriarch of Constantinople in Nicaea to establish an autocephalous archepiscopate in Serbia. In 1219 the patriarch consecrated Sava as the first archbishop of Serbia. After founding ten dioceses, consecrating their bishops and promoting religious instruction and monastic life, Sava died in 1235.

The Serbian Orthodox Church developed in the Byzantine rite amid a thriving Serbian culture. The most important ruler of medieval Serbia, Dušan the Great (1331–55), convoked an ecclesiastical national synod in 1346 and established the first Serbian Patriarchate, with its seat in Peć. After Dušan's death Serbia was defeated by the Ottoman Turks, who occupied the region in 1389. The Church attempted to preserve Serbian culture during this period, canonizing medieval Serbian kings as fresco painters preserved their images and priests recited a litany of their names at daily masses. Under Turkish domination Orthodox Christians suffered greatly. Particularly onerous was the human tax exacted by the Turks, who carried away the most promising youngsters, educated them as Muslims, and trained them as soldiers in the elite detachment in the Turkish army called janizaries. By chance a janizary of Serbian origin named Mehmed Sokolović (or Sokoli), became grand vizier. Cognizant of his ancestry, he reestablished the Serbian patriarchate in 1557 and appointed his brother first patriarch of this second patriarchate (1557–1766). After the Christians vanquished the Turks at Vienna (1683) and their armies arrived in South Serbia, the Serbs joined in a losing battle against the Turks. Fear of reprisals caused many Serbs to leave their country in 1690 under the leadership of the Patriarch Arsenius III Crnojević and to migrate to Croatia and Hungary. In 1766 the Greeks induced the Turks to suppress the second Serbian patriarchate and subject it to Constantinople.

The independence movement of the 19th century, while sparking further uprisings against the Turks, also saw significant cultural changes, including the creation of a modern Serbian literary language based on ordinary speech. In 1880 the patriarch of Constantinople granted to Serbia the status of autocephalous church; in 1920 the third Serbian Orthodox patriarchate would combine the formerly autonomous Serbian metropolitans of Belgrade, Karlovci, Bosnia and Montenegro, and the Diocese of Dalmatia. Before 1918 a very small number of immigrant Croats and other foreigners represented the Roman Catholic Church in Serbia. In 1924 the Archdiocese of Belgrade was established.

Early Church in Montenegro. Montenegro lies south of Serbia and borders on the Adriatic, the Zeta River serving as its western border. Slavs settled here in the 7th century and later adopted the Byzantine rite. Along the Adriatic coast, however, a small minority belonging to the Latin rite still exists, and belongs to the Archdiocese of BAR. The Montenegrins considered by some as Serbs and by others as a special South Slav nationality, put up heroic resistance to the Turks who occu-ped Montenegro in 1499. The Turks entrusted some civil responsibilities to the Orthodox metropolitan at Cetinje. After 1697 the metropolitans were elected from the family of Petrović-Njegoš. They also functioned as ethnarchs and as such created and headed the principality of Montenegro. In 1918 the kingdom merged with Yugoslavia, and in 1920 the Orthodox Church of Montenegro merged with the Serbian patriarchate, thus losing its autonomous status.

United Within Yugoslavia. The Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes—later Yugoslavia (“South Slavia”)—was constituted on Dec. 1, 1918 and became the Kingdom of Yugoslavia in 1929. During World War II Germany invaded the region and caused it to be divided (April 10, 1941). Germany and Italy occupied Slovenia; Hungary, Bachka (Bačka); Bulgaria, Macedonia; and Italy, Montenegro. Croatia proclaimed its independence, while Serbia remained nominally independent but was actually under German control.

When Serbia and Montenegro united in 1918 as part of Yugoslavia, their merger created a single Eastern Orthodox church; the Macedonian Orthodox Church would later split from the Serbian church, while the Romanian Orthodox Church was a small sect present only in Vojvodina. An estimated 11.5 million Yugoslavs, primarily Serbs, Montenegrins and Macedonians, were Eastern Orthodox by family background. The Serbian political elite of the interwar Kingdom of Yugoslavia was unwilling to share power. The Army officer corps and the civilian bureaucracy were dominated by Serbs, reflecting the hegemony that triggered a backlash during World War II as Croat nationalist fanatics butchered Serbs, Jews and Gypsies with a brutality that appalled even the Nazis.

In the Kingdom of Yugoslavia Serbs had great political and cultural influence, a situation that caused resentments to build among other ethnic groups. While the constitution gave equality to all religions, the Serb-controlled government gave special concessions to the Serbian Orthodox Church, causing many to join that church as a way to social betterment. In 1922 the Yugoslav government began negotiations with the Holy See, and reached agreement in 1935. This concordat would have regularized the Catholic Church’s organization to create corresponding diocesan and state borders: Belgrade would be the metropolitan see for Serbia; Ljubljana, for Slovenia; and Split, for Dalmatia. The Roman-Slavonic liturgy was to prevail in all parts of Yugoslavia where Catholics so desired. However, the Yugoslavian Parliament heeded the opposition of the Orthodox Church and refused ratification.

Communists seized power after World War II and established the Federal People’s Republic of Yugoslavia under Josip Broz Tito in 1945. Although the Nov. 30, 1946 constitution guaranteed religious liberty, the government demonstrated its opposition to all religions in many ways, even the Orthodox, and persecuted them openly. The Orthodox Metropolitans Barnabas of Sarajevo and Arsenius of Montenegro were condemned to 11 years in prison, sharing the fate of many other religious leaders. Catholic schools were closed, and Church buildings and lands confiscated. It was only after the friction between Tito and Soviet leaders began in 1948 that the Yugoslav government sought a modus vivendi with religious groups, hoping it would win them good will among Western powers. In 1956 the Communists inaugurated a policy of limited cooperation, permitting the Holy See to appoint new bishops, freeing imprisoned clergy, opening minor seminaries and permitting Yugoslav Catholic bishops to attend Vatican Council II in 1962. On June 25, 1966 the Vatican and the Yugoslavian government signed an agreement under which Yugoslav bishops could remain subject to the spiritual jurisdiction of Rome through regular contact.

The Serbian, Bulgarian and Greek Orthodox hierarchies recognized no distinct Macedonian nation or independent Macedonian Orthodox Church until 1958, when the Serbian Orthodox hierarchy consecrated a Macedonian bishop. Shortly thereafter the Macedonian Orthodox Church came into official existence, but it remained under the authority of the Serbian Orthodox Church. In 1967 Macedonian clergymen proclaimed their church independent. Aware that a self-governing Macedonian church would enhance the sense of Macedonian nationhood within the Yugoslav federation and help balance Serbian hegemony, political authorities gave the church their full support. The Serbian Church hierarchy refused to recognize the Macedonian Orthodox Church when it was granted autonomous status by the Yugoslav state. Without recognition from the Serbian hierarchy, the Macedonian church remained isolated from the international Orthodox community.

Tensions Rise in Kosovo. In the mid-1980s, a few years after Tito’s death, a wave of Serbian nationalism swept through Yugoslavia. Among those fearing the ramifications of this resurgence was Kosovo, an impoverished region located south of Serbia. Between 1948 and 1990, the number of Serbs living in Kosovo had dropped from 23 percent to less than 10 percent, while ethnic Albanians increased, a democratic shift caused by immigration as well as by a postwar Serbian exodus which escalated when the Kosovar government fell under Albanian control in 1966. In an effort to regain control over the region, in 1989 the Serbian government began a resettlement program in Kosovo. As few former Kosovar Serbs desired to return, this program proved unsuccessful.

On April 11, 1992, following declarations of independence from Croatia, Slovenia, Bosnia-Herzegovina and Macedonia, Serbia and Montenegro proclaimed themselves the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, although several governments, including the United States, refused to recognize them as a continuation of the former communist state. The appointment of nationalist Serbian president Slobodan Milosevic as president of the new federation in July of 1997 sparked protest from Montenegrins, as did the government's radical policies. In 1999 the Serbian government began a program of "ethnic cleansing" in Kosovo as a way to eliminate the Albanian majority in the region, a policy it had attempted in Bosnia in 1992 before being repulsed by UN troops. Leaders from Muslim, Catholic and Orthodox faiths joined together in condemning the horrors perpetrated by Serbian forces, and dedicated their efforts to aiding the thousands of refugees who survived the mass killings and fled Kosovo. Pope John Paul II also appealed for peace, asking that "political and military leaders . . . pursue every possible initiative that might lead to just and lasting peace." NATO and Russian peacekeeping forces entered the area following the bombing of Serbia. A U.N. Interim Administration Mission remained in Kosovo into the next decade, dealing with outbreaks of violence that continued to be directed toward Albanians, although on a smaller scale than before.

Into the 21st Century. By 2000 the Catholic Church included 238 parishes tended by 157 secular and 37 religious priests, with seven brothers and over 300 sisters administering schools and attending to medical and humanitarian needs. In contrast, the Serbian Orthodox Church included about 2,000 parishes, over 2,500 religious, numerous monasteries and convents, four seminaries and a school of theology. It also published ten periodicals. Completed in 1985, the Cathedral of St. Sava in Belgrade became the largest Eastern Orthodox Church in the world. Most Roman Catholics were ethnic Hungarians who lived in Vojvodina.

Unlike Montenegro, within the constituent Republic of Serbia, while the constitution provided for freedom of religion, the government did not uphold this right in practice. Although not named as the state religion, the Serbian Orthodox Church had access to state-run television and received other benefits from the government. Despite this, Orthodox leaders remained outspoken in their condemnation of Milosevic and his ethnic policies. Unlike other European nations affected by communist confiscations of property, Serbia had yet to make restitution to any religious group within its borders. While acts of violence were reported against Catholics in Vojvodina during the 1990s, the incidents of such acts had declined by 2000. Following the start of the conflict in Kosovo in the late 1990s, Serbian Orthodox churches in the region became the target of retaliatory violence by Albanians, and 80 churches had been desecrated or destroyed by 2000. Tensions between Montenegrin Orthodox and Serbian Orthodox members were also reported due to efforts taken to undermine or otherwise cancel certain religious services. In 2000 the Pope's private charity, Cor Unum, donated $115,000 to help refugees of Kosovo, and the following year the Vatican supported the formation of an International Tribunal to prosecute violators of humanitarian law.

Bibliography: Monumenta spectantia historiam Slavorum meridionalium (Zagreb 1868–) 46 v. to 1951. M. SPINKA, A History of Christianity in the Balkans (Chicago, IL 1933). R. RISTELHUEBER, Histoire des peuples balkaniques (Paris 1950). P. D. OSTROVIĆ, The Truth about Yugoslavia (New York 1952). W. MARKERT, Jugoslawien (Cologne 1954). F. DVORNIK, The Slavs: Their Early History and Civilization (Boston 1956); The Slavs in European History and Civilization (New Brunswick, NJ 1962). K. S. LATOURETTE, Christianity in a Revolutionary Age: A History of Christianity in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries, 5 v. (New York 1958–62) v.1, 2, 4. F. MACLEAN, The Heretic: The Life and Times of Josip Broz-Tito (New York 1957). J. K. JIREČEK, Istorija Srba (2d ed. Belgrade 1952). J. MOUSSET, La Serbie et son Église 1830–1904 (Paris 1939). D. M. SLIJEPEVIĆ, Istorija Srpske Pravoslavne crkve, v.1 (Munich 1962). S. P. RAMET, Nihil Obstat: Religion, Politics, and Social Change in East-Central Europe and Russia (Durham, NC 1998). J. MATL, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², eds., J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1191–94. B. SPULER and H. KOCH, *Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart*³, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:1054–60. Bilan du Monde, 2:914–928. Annuario Pontificio has annual data on all dioceses and apostolic administrations.

[P. SHELTON]

SERGEANT, JOHN

Secular priest, controversialist, and informer; b. Barrow-upon-Humber, Lincolnshire, 1622; d. London, 1707. He entered St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1639 and graduated in 1642. For a short time he was secretary to Thomas Morton, Bishop of Durham, and he then became converted to Catholicism. He entered the English College, Lisbon, in November 1643, was ordained in 1650, and fulfilled various offices in the college. He returned to England in 1652 and became secretary of the English Secular Clergy Chapter. Sergeant hoped for toleration of Catholics on the basis of the acceptance of the Oath of Allegiance and the banishment of the Jesuits from England. He maintained that the Chapter was the organ of ecclesiastical authority for Catholics in England, and that the only alternative to the Chapter was the appointment of a bishop with ordinary jurisdiction. Sergeant's intransigence led to his resignation as secretary of the Chapter in 1667. In 1673 he was in Paris, where he engaged in controversy with Peter TALBOT, Archbishop of Dublin, who, with the support of John Warner, SJ, had delated some of Sergeant's writings to Rome as being heretical on the subject of the prolegomena fidei.

In common with certain other English and Irish priests who supported the Oath of Allegiance, Sergeant was under "protection" from the English government from about 1671 onward. At the outbreak of the Titus OATES PLOT, October 1678, a special Privy Council order was made restricting him to his house, but in June 1679 he left England for Flanders. There he came in contact with the apostate Rookwood, who introduced him to the English envoy at The Hague, Henry Sidney, as being willing to make a “discovery” concerning the Jesuits and the Plot. In October 1679 Sergeant made his deposition to the Privy Council, which was printed by the Oxford Parliament in March 1681. For this he received a salary from Secret Service funds. In 1681 he wrote to Henry Hyde, Second Earl of Clarendon, offering to act as informer against the Jesuits. In the reign of James II he was secretary to the Duke of Perth, and to the very end of his life he tried to assert his authority over the English Secular Clergy Chapter. His controversial and philosophical writings are voluminous and turgid. Like Kenelm Digby and Thomas WHITE (alias Blacklow), he was one of the few 17th-century English Catholic writers who tried to adapt his epistemology to the new philosophical tendencies of the age. Method to Science (1696) is anti-Cartesian; Solid Philosophy (1697) is an early critique of Locke—Locke’s own annotated copy is in St. John’s College, Cambridge.

Bibliography: T. COOPER, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900; reprinted with corrections, 21 v., 1908–09, 1921–22, 1938; supplement 1901–) 17:1189–91. J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present time, 5 v. (London–New York 1885–1902 repr. New York 1961) 5:491–498. M. V. HAY, The Jesuits and the Popish Plot (London 1934). J. WARNER, The History of the English Persecution of Catholics and the Presbyterian Plot, tr. J. BLIGH, ed. T. A. BIRRELL (Publications of the Catholic Record Society 47–48; 1953–55). T. A. BIRRELL, “English Catholics without a Bishop 1655–72,” Recusant History 4.4 (1957–58) 142–178.

[T. A. BIRRELL]

SERGEANT, RICHARD, BL.

Priest, martyr; alias Lee, Lea, or Long[e]; b. in Gloucestershire, England; hanged, drawn, and quartered April 20, 1586 at Tyburn. He was the son of Thomas Sergeant of Stone and his wife Katherine Tyre of Hardwick. After earning his baccalaureate at Oxford (c. 1570–71), he entered the English College at Rheims and was ordained priest at Laon (1583). He left for England on September 10, working for several years in the mission prior to his indictment at the Old Bailey on April 17, 1586, as Richard Lea, alias Longe. He suffered with Bl. William THOMSON, who was also executed as an unlawful priest. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: Harleian Soc. Publ. xxi (London, 1885), 258. R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924) 1, nos. 32, 33. J. FOSTER, Alumni Oxonienses (Oxford 1892). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

SERGIUS, PATRIARCH OF MOSCOW

Patriarch of Moscow; b. Arzamas, Nizhni Novgorod region, Jan. 11, 1867; d. Moscow, May 15, 1944. Ivan Nikolaievich Stragorodsky (later Sergius) became, like his father, a priest in the Russian Orthodox Church after theological studies in Novgorod and St. Petersburg. In 1890 he became a monk and was sent, at his request, as missionary to Japan for three years, until recalled to St. Petersburg to teach the Old Testament. He was rector of the St. Petersburg Theological Academy, and became bishop of Yamburg (1901), archbishop of Finland and Vyborg (1905), member of the HOLY SYNOD (1911), and metropolitan of Novgorod (1917).

When Patriarc TIKHON was imprisoned (1922–23) for denouncing the Soviet antireligious campaign, Sergius supported the “Living Church,” which was subservient to the Communists; but he publicly confessed his error after Tikhon’s release. During 1925 Tikhon died and Metropolitan Peter of Krutitsky, the patriarchal administrator, went to prison. Sergius, his deputy, went into exile (1925–27). Soon after his release he issued a declaration, as acting head of the Orthodox Church, that all the faithful were duty-bound to support the Soviet regime, and that all the clergy must take this pledge of loyalty or lose their positions.

Despite mounting persecutions, Sergius denied in 1930 the existence of religious persecution in the U.S.S.R. The 1927 declaration by Sergius caused a split in the Russian Orthodox Church outside Russia, up to then loyal to the Moscow patriarchate. When Sergius tried to deprive Metropolitan Eulogy of Paris in 1930 of his western European bishopric, Eulogy placed this section of the Church under the patriarch of Constantinople. In 1934 Sergius became metropolitan of Moscow. During World War II he supported the Soviet government. Stalin rewarded him in 1943 by allowing a synod to convene, which elected him patriarch, contrary to the election regulations approved in 1917. Sergius was also reputed for his writings on theology and the missions

Bibliography: J. S. CURTISS, The Russian Church and the Soviet State, 1917–1950 (Boston 1953). M. SPINKA, The Church in Soviet Russia (New York 1956).

[G. A. MALONEY/EDS.]

SERGIUS I, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

April 18, 610, to Dec. 9, 638. Of Syrian provenance, Sergius proved one of the most effective and individual personalities ever to head the Patriarchate of CONSTANTINOPLE. He took the patriarchal throne at the very time Emperor HERACLIUS began his rule, and patriarch and emperor maintained the closest of ties throughout their long reigns. On the political level, for example, Heraclius formed a regency of Sergius and a civil official to rule Constantinople while he fought the Persians from 622 to 628. It was in this position that Sergius galvanized Byzantine resistance to beat the AVARS back effectively from the capital in 626. In religious affairs Sergius's all-pervading problem was the reconciliation of the continuing split between orthodox, or Chalcedonian, Christology and the Monophysitic viewpoint (see MONOPHYSITISM), which was very strongly represented in the eastern provinces of the BYZANTINE EMPIRE—provinces contemporarily being recovered from the Persians. With the strong support of Cyrus, patriarch of Egypt, Sergius first produced (c. 633) a formula that attributed to Christ two natures with but one energy. This was temporarily tolerated by Pope HONORIUS I, but the Orthodox spokesman Sophronius, the recently appointed (634) patriarch of Jerusalem, strongly denounced it. Thus before he died in 638, Sergius was instrumental in formulating a compromise that took cognizance of the objections of Honorius and Sophronius and deemphasized the single Energy, taking the position that Christ had two natures but one will (see MONOTHELITISM). This compromise, which was incorporated in Heraclius's Ecthesis, was ineffective: it was rejected completely by the Monophysitic opposition and by the new patriarch of Jerusalem, and was not acceptable to the Roman See. Sergius, together with his successors the Monothelite patriarchs PYRRHUS I and PAUL II, was declared anathema by the Latin Church in 649 and again by both East and West in the General Council of CONSTANTINOPLE III (681). In both the Eastern and Western Churches, Sergius became the symbol of cooperation between Church hierarchy and emperor and also, to an extent, a symbol of the independence of the patriarch of Constantinople vis-à-vis the patriarch of the West.

Bibliography: J. PARGOIRE, L'église byzantine (Paris 1905). V. GRUMEL, "Recherches sur l'histoire de monothélisme," Échos d'Orient 27 (1928) 6–16, 257–277; 28 (1929) 19–34, 272–282; 29 (1930) 16–28. V. GRUMEL, Les Regestes des actes du patriarcat de Constantinople. G. OSTROGORSKY, History of the Byzantine State, tr. J. HUSSEY from 2d German ed. (Oxford 1956); American ed. by P. CHARANIS (New Brunswick, N.J. 1957) 90–98. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 292–295.

[D. A. MILLER]

SERGIUS II, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Reigned June 1001 to July 1019; d. Constantinople. Sergius belonged to the family of PHOTIUS, and became a monk and hegoumenos, or abbot, of the Monastery of Manuel. He received a synodical letter from Pope SERGIUS IV (1009–12) upon the latter's election; according to later tradition, because of the pope's use of the term FILIOQUE, Sergius excommunicated him, removing his name from the diptychs. This action was first cited by Cerularius after 1054, and is repeated thereafter in numerous theological tracts against the Latins.

In asserting the right of the patriarch to decree public honors for a saint, Sergius condemned SYMEON THE NEW THEOLOGIAN to banishment when he attempted to organize public veneration for his deceased master Symeon Eulabes, the Elder. The patriarch had permitted a private cult after reading the justifying reasons, but had forbidden all festivity. Sergius supported the great landowners against Emperor Basil II in the matter of the allelengyon, or collective responsibility, for the payment of taxes by the community when, to preserve the peasantry, Basil put the burden of furnishing taxes for the impoverished on the dynatoi, the powerful. However, in 1016, he accepted the charistikion, whereby monasteries were deeded to lay people or to other monasteries, which was opposed by his predecessor SISINNIUS II. Sergius asserted his right to the title Ecumenical Patriarch. His synodal tome on the profane alienation of monastic property and his canonical decisions on marriage have been preserved.

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1857–66) 119:741. T. NIGGL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 9:687. V. LAURENT, Échos d'Orient 33 (1934) 301–305; 35 (1936) 73–75. A. MICHEL, Humbert und Kerullarios (Paderborn 1924–30) 1:1629; 2:17–24; Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumskunde und für Kirchengeschichte 41 (1933) 133–137; 141–147; Historisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft 70 (1951) 53–55. J. DARROUZÈS, Les Regestes des actes du Patriarcat de Constantinople, ed. V. GRUMEL, v.1, fasc. II–III (Paris 1989) 815–25. V. GRUMEL, Revue des études byzantines 10 (1952) 5–23. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 94, 136, 274, 599. J. KODER, "Normale Mönche und Enthusiasten: der Fall des Symeon Neos theologos" in Religiöse Devianz, ed. D. SIMON (Frankfurt am Main 1990) 97–119. J. P. THOMAS, Private Religious Foundations in the Byzantine Empire (Washington, D.C. 1987) 155, 164–5, 217, 228, 233.

[F. CHIOVARO]

SERGIUS I, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: Dec. 15, 687 to Sept. 7, 701; b. Palermo, Sicily; d. Rome. Sergius, born of a Syrian family from Antioch living in Palermo, went to Rome under Pope AD-EODATUS, was ordained, and under Leo II became titular priest of St. Susanna. After Pope CONON'S death, a triple election of the archdeacon Paschal, the archpriest Theodore, and Sergius, was resolved in Sergius's favor (December of 687). Theodore submitted but Paschal died in prison five years later, unrepentant. The exarch John Platyn demanded the gold promised him by Paschal if elected, and Sergius was forced to pay before Platyn would permit his consecration. Sergius rejected the reforming decrees of the QUINISEXT or Trullan council (692) that opposed Roman practices and laws: canons 3, 13, and 30 sanctioned a married clergy; canon 36 called for the exaltation of Constantinople as had the Councils of Constantinople I and Chalcedon; and canons 52 and 55 differed sharply from western Lenten practices. Papal legates in Constantinople signed the acts, but Sergius disavowed their action. Emperor Justinian II arrested two councilors of the pope and tried to capture the pope himself, but the militias of Ravenna, the Pentapolis, and Rome prevented this. Schismatic Aquileia, alienated by the THREE CHAPTERS controversy, was restored to unity through the Lombard King Cunipert and the pope. Sergius baptized King CAEDWALLA OF WESSEX (689), sent the pallium to Abp. BRITHWALD OF CANTERBURY, ordered WILFRID OF YORK restored to his see, and granted the privileges ALDHELM had requested. He wrote to JARROW ABBEY asking that a learned monk (BEDE?) be sent to aid the curialists in Rome. Sergius was also on good terms with the Frankish kingdom, and it was he who blessed and encouraged WIL-LIBRORD'S mission to the Frisians. Sergius added the Agnus Dei to the Mass and introduced processions on the four great feasts of Our Lady.

Feast: Sept. 9.

Bibliography: P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. P. EWALD (repr. Graz 1956) 1:244–245. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92) 1:371–382. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. H. LECLERCQ (Paris 1907–38) 3.1:560–581. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32) 1.2:77–104. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935) 5:316–323, 407–409. G. BARONE ADESI, Monachesimo ortodosso d'Oriente e Dritto romano nel tardo antico (Milan 1990). É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 14.2:1913–16. O. BERTOLINI, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi (Bologna 1941); "I papi e le relazioni politiche di Roma con i ducati Longobardi . . .," Rivista di storia della Chiesa in Italia 8 (1954) 1–22. R. M. CHOLU, Married Clergy, and Ecclesiastical Continence in Light of the Council in Trullo (691) (Rome 1986). J. HERRIN, "'Femina byzantina' The Council in Trullo on Women," Dumbarton Oaks Papers (1992) 97–105. H. OHME, "Das Concilium Quinisextum. Neue Einsichten zu einem umstrittenen Konzil," Orientalia Christiana Periodica 58 (Rome 1992) 367–400. C. G. PITSAKIS, "Le droit matrimonial dans les canons du concile in Trullo," Annuaire Historiae Conciliorum 24 (1992) 158–185. M. VAN ESBROECK, Aux origines de la Dormition de la Vierge. Études historiques sur les traditions orientales (1995). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 82–83.

[C. M. AHERNE]

SERGIUS II, POPE

Pontificate: Jan. 25, 844 to Jan. 27, 847; b. Rome. He was a member of the Roman nobility, who were responsible for his election and who overcame the opposition of the popular antipope John, a deacon, who very briefly held the Lateran palace after the death of GREGORY IV. Sergius was consecrated in St. Peter's (January 844) without informing the Emperor LOTHAIR I as prescribed in the Constitutio Romana (see EUGENE II). Thereupon the Emperor sent his son LOUIS (II) to call the pope to account; Sergius received Louis on condition that he swear not to attack Rome, and then on June 15, 844, anointed and crowned him king of the Lombards. Thereafter an altercation arose when Louis's adviser, DROGO, Bishop of Metz, insisted that the Romans swear fidelity to Louis, a plan that Sergius rejected; instead he had the Romans swear such an oath to the Emperor Lothair in accord with the Constitutio.

Sergius later appointed Drogo his legate to the Franks. EBBO, deposed archbishop of Reims, also received support from Sergius. The pope's intervention in the dispute between the patriarchs of Grado and Aquileia was interrupted by his sudden death. Sergius is accused of failing to provide Rome with adequate protection against the Saracen attack of Aug. 23, 846, despite advance warning. The extensive building program of Sergius's reign was carried out largely by his brother, Benedict. The Marcian aqueduct was restored and the Lateran basilica enlarged "according to Sergius's own design." The fact that the pope suffered from a crippling gout may have been the reason for his brother's prominence and his own allegedly testy disposition.

Bibliography: Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92) 2:86–105. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. P. EWALD (repr. Graz 1956) 1:327–329. L. DUCHESNE, The Beginnings of the Temporal Sovereignty of the Popes, tr. A. H. MATHEW (London 1908). H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32) 2:232–257. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935) 6:275–281. J. HALLER, Das Papsttum (Stuttgart 1950–53) 2.1:27–30. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon des Mittelalters, 7 (Munich-Zurich 1994–95). D. TRESTIK, [Die Taufe der tschechischen Fürsten im Jahre 845 und die Christianisierung der Slawen—tschechisch]: Český časopis historycký 92, (Praha 1994). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 103–104.

[C. M. AHERNE]

SERGIUS III, POPE

Pontificate: Jan. 29, 904 to April 14, 911; b. Rome; d. Rome. A Roman deacon, bishop of Cere, and partisan of Pope STEPHEN VI, he made an abortive attempt to seize the papacy in 897. In 904, however, with the aid of Alberto I of Spoleto, he succeeded. His two immediate predecessors, Pope LEO V and antipope Christopher, were strangled in prison. A Roman synod again invalidated the Orders conferred by Pope FORMOSUS, much to the confusion of the Church. Sergius's decision in favor of the fourth marriage of Emperor LEO VI weakened the prestige of the papacy in the East. In Rome he was supported by the THEOPHYLACTUS family, by one of whose daughters, MAROZIA, he is supposed to have had a son (later Pope JOHN XI). Sergius must be given credit for the restoration of St. John LATERAN, which had been heavily damaged by an earthquake at the time of the Formosus trial. The authors of the narrative sources for Sergius's life are patently subjective. To AUXILIUS OF NAPLES, Sergius is a criminal, whereas the grammarian EUGENIUS VULGARIUS praises him immoderately. LIUTPRAND OF CREMONA's opinion is entirely negative.

Bibliography: P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD (repr. Graz 1956) 1:445–447. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92) v. 2. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. H. LECLERCQ (Paris 1907–38) v. 4. P. F. KEHR, Regesta Pontificum Romanorum, Italia Pontificia (Berlin 1928) 1, 2, 3, 5, 6.2, 7.1, 7.2, 8. L. DUCHESNE, "Serge III et Jean XI," Mélanges d'archéologie et d'histoire 33 (1913) 25–55. J. BECKER, ed., Die Werke Liutprands von Cremona, Monumena Germaniae Historica: Scriptorum rerum Germanicarum (Berlin 1826) 38. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–53) 14.2:1918–21. V. BRAGA, Dizionario biografico degli italiani 43 (Rome 1993). G. FASOLI, I re d'Italia, 888–962 (Florence 1949). F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (Munich 1954–59) v. 2. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32) v. 4. C. GNOCCHI, "Ausilio e Vulgario. L'eco della 'Questione formosiana' in area napoletana," Mélanges de l'École Française de Moyen Âge. Temps Modernes (Rome 1995) 1, 65–75. R. POKORNY, "Eine Kurzform der Konzilskanones von Trosly (909). Zur Reformgesetzgebung in der ausgehenden Karolingerzeit," Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 42 (1986) 118–44. A. PRATESI, "Un controverso privilegio di papa Sergio III," Archivio dell Società Romana di Storia Patria 108 (1985) 5–36. R. SCHIEFFER, Lexikon des Mittelalters 7 (Munich-Zurich 1994–95). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 119–120.

[V. GELLHAUS]

SERGIUS IV, POPE

Pontificate: July 31, 1009, to May 12, 1012; b. unknown. d. May 12, 1012. Sergius was the son of Peter the shoemaker of the Ad Pineia district in Rome. He was originally named Peter, but he received the nickname Pig's snout (Bucca porci) presumably because of his peculiar appearance. From approximately 1004 to 1009 Sergius served as the bishop of Albano. The following year, he was elected to the papacy but the details of the event are not clear. In all probability, his election was secured through the influence of John II, head of the Crescentii. Contrary to tradition, Sergius was not the first pope to change his name but he is still credited with having made the practice common. Also, the story that Sergius touched off the Eastern Schism by sending Patriarch Sergius of Constantinople the Synodicon containing the filioque clause is erroneous. Finally, his authorship of a manifesto for a crusade against the Muslim power is almost certainly spurious. The few known details of Sergius's reign are vague. There is some evidence that he exempted several monasteries from episcopal jurisdiction and that he was a friend of the poor during a time of famine. Apparently Sergius also had the trust of some nobles who put their lands under his protection. The fact that Sergius died just six days prior to Crescentius coupled with the violent political upheaval and the rapid election of a Tusculan candidate for the papacy suggests foul play to most historians. Sergius was buried in the Lateran Basilica.

Bibliography: P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD et al., 2 v. (2d ed. Leipzig 1881–88; repr. Graz 1956) 882–1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD, 1:504–505. L. DUCHESNE, ed., Liber pontificalis, v. 1–2 (Paris 1886–92) 2. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304, 18 v. (London 1902–32) 5. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 14.2:1921–22. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935–) 7. A. GIEYSZTOR, "The Genesis of the Crusades: The Encyclical of Sergius IV (1009–1012)," Medievalia et humanistica 5 (1948) 3–23; 6 (1950) 3–34. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. v.1, 2, 4, 5 (Leipzig 1931–41) 2. B. SCHIMMELPFENNIG, The Papacy, tr. J. SIEVERT (New York 1992) 113, 115–116. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (Oxford 1986) 139.

[J. A. SHEPPARD]

SERGIUS OF RADONEZH, ST.

Russian monk and ascetical master; b. Rostov, May 3, 1314; d. Radonezh, Sergian monastery of the Trinity (near Moscow), Sept. 25, 1392. Sergius came from a once rich family, and his early years, as recorded by his biographer and disciple, Epiphanius the Wise, were filled with marvelous incidents. As a child he played truant rather than learn to read and write, until one day a mysterious monk changed his life. He then began to read the Bible, the books of the liturgy, and the Fathers, and visited the nearby monasteries. In spite of a desire for solitude, he remained with his parents until their death (1334). He retired to the forest of Radonezh (1336), became a priest, and built a chapel in honor of the Trinity that by 1354 became a monastic center (the TROITSKAYA LAURA) at the request of the patriarch of Constantinople. Austere with himself, Sergius showed great humanity toward others, and in humility refused the Patriarchate of Moscow (1378).

Epitaph for Pope Sergius IV, in St. John Lateran, Rome.

His reputation of sanctity based on the miracles and visions with which he was credited caused his monastery of the Trinity to become a center of religious attraction for all Russians. He went on missions of peace to the various Russian princes with the hope of consolidating Russian hegemony under the principality of Moscow against the ravages of the Tatars. On his advice Prince Dimitri resolved to repel the attack of the Mongols in 1380. While Sergius left no literary heritage, his disciples founded many monasteries and spread his teaching in such fashion that his monastery of the Trinity became a principal influence in Russian spirituality.

Feast: Sept. 25.

Bibliography: Life by EIPHANIVS THE WISE in Monuments de l'ancienne littérature 58 (St. Petersburg 1885). N. ZERNOV, Saint Sergius, Builder of Russia (Society for Promoting Christian Know-edge; London 1939). P. KOVALEVSKY, Saint Serge et la spiritualité russe (Paris 1958). L. MÜLLER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957-65) 5:1712-13. S. STASIEWSKI, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 9:689. I. KOLOGRIWOF, Das andere Russland (Munich 1958) 93-123. I. SMOLITSCH, Russisches Mönchtum (Würzburg 1953). E. BENZ, Russische Heiligenlegenden (Zurich 1953) 292-362.

[P. ROCHE]

SERGIUS OF RESAINA

Sixth-century Syrian physician and translator; d. Constantinople, 536. A Christian, in early life probably a Monophysite, Sergius may well be the grammarian Sergius with whom SEVERUS OF ANTIOCH exchanged letters between 515 and 520. He studied in Alexandria, became a physician, and later may have become a monk and priest. Sergius is one of the fathers of Syriac literature. Besides composing several short philosophical treatises of his own in Syriac, he translated more than 20 Greek philosophical, medical, and horticultural works into Syriac; he also translated the treatises of PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS the Areopagite (for the first time) and perhaps, too, the Gnostic Centuries of the Origenist EVAGRIUS PONTICUS, with which he was familiar. About 535 he went to Antioch, where he so impressed the patriarch Ephraem that Ephraem sent him to Rome as legate to ask the support of Pope Agapetus against the rising tide of Monophysitism in Constantinople. Sergius accompanied Agapetus on his visit to Constantinople in 536, and died soon after.

Bibliography: A. BAUMSTARK, Lucubrationes Syro-graecae (Leipzig 1894) 358–384, 405–470; Geschichte der syrischen Literatur (Bonn 1922) 167–169. K. GEORR, ed., Les Catégories d'Aristote dans leurs versions syro-arabes (Beirut 1948) 17–23. P. SHERWOOD, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 9:687–688; “Sergius of Reshaina and the Syriac Versions of the Pseudo-Denis,” Sacris erudiri 4 (1952) 174–184; L'Orient syrien 5 (1960) 433–437. A. GUILLAUMONT, Les “Kephalaia gnostica” d'Evagre le Pontique (Paris 1963) 222–227. I. HAUSHERR, Orientalia Christiana periodica 2 (1936) 488. J. M. HORNUS, Revue d'histoire et de philosophie religieuses 41 (1961) 35–38.

[D. B. EVANS]

SERIPANDO, GIROLAMO

Theologian and cardinal legate at the Council of TRENT; b. probably at Naples, Oct. 6, 1492; d. Trent, March 17, 1563. Seripando entered the Neopolitan Convent of San Giovanni a Carbonara of the Hermits of St. Augustine in 1507, was named secretary of the order in 1514 by the superior general, and began in 1517 to serve as rector of the order's house of studies at Bologna. In 1524 he returned to Naples as vicar of the Congregation of San Giovanni a Carbonara. In 1530, stimulated by the members of the Academia Pontaniana, he composed his 109 Quaestiones, in which he espoused a Christian Platonism with Thomistic modifications. In 1538 he was named vicar-general of his order upon the death of the general, G. A. Aprutino; and the following year, upon the request of Paul III, he was elected general during the general chapter held at Naples. During his visitation of the order's houses in Italy, France, Spain, and Portugal, he fought the Lutheranism that had penetrated his order and worked for the reform of his religious. Since 1530 Seripando had been drawn into the quarrel over Italian evangelism; he rejected the spiritualism of Juan Valdés, while his own spirituality and his teaching on justification took on a Biblical-Augustinian character.

At the Council of Trent, Seripando tried to prevent tradition from being put on the same level as Holy Scripture and worked for the study of biblical languages. His ideas about concupiscence, the meaning of faith, and the justice of Christ were not incorporated into the decrees on original sin and justification, although as counselor of the legate, Cardinal M. Cervini, he had had a very influential part in the formulation of those decrees. After the transfer of the Council of Trent to Bologna, he continued to participate in the deliberations, but because of a stroke (1551), he was forced to resign as general of the Augustinians.

Seripando subsequently regained his health. In 1553, after the death of the viceroy, Pedro de Toledo, he accepted the city of Naples's commission to negotiate with the emperor in Brussels for a moderation of certain of the dead viceroy's measures. Elected archbishop of Salerno on March 30, 1554, Seripando convoked a diocesan synod the same year and conducted a visitation of the entire diocese between 1556 and 1558. He tried also to fulfill the Tridentine ideal of a bishop as preacher and pastor. The death of Marcellus II prevented Seripando from collaborating in that pope's plan of Church reform, for Paul IV deprived him of influence. However, Pius IV made him a cardinal on Feb. 26, 1561 and entrusted him with a revision of Paul IV's Index.

Having been named legate to the Council of Trent by Pius IV, Seripando directed chiefly the work on the dogmatic decrees during the council's third period. In the spring of 1562, however, he fell into disgrace in Rome, and his recall was considered because of his alleged support of the thesis that a bishop's obligation to reside in his own diocese is of divine law. During the conciliar crisis of the winter of 1562 and 1563, he tried to mediate the conflict between the Zelanti, on the one hand, and the French and Spanish party, on the other; he failed, however, because of Cardinal L. Simonetta. Though Seripando died at the height of the crisis, he went down in history as one of the most influential of the council Fathers.

The voluminous collection of Seripando's manuscripts was transferred from the library of the Convent of San Giovanni di Carbonara to the Biblioteca Nazionale in Naples. During his lifetime only his Oratio in funere Caroli V was printed (Naples 1559), but after his death many of his works appeared in print: Commentarius in epist. Pauli ad Galatas (Antwerp 1567), bound together with a commentary on Romans (Naples 1601); Doctrina orandi sive expositio orationis Dominicae (Louvain 1661); Prediche sopra il simbolo degli apostoli (Venice 1567); Diarium de vita sua 1513–62 [ed. D. Gutiérrez, Analecta Augustiniana 26 (1963): 5–193]; Commentarii in Concilium Tridentinum (Concilium Tridentinum, 13 v. [Freiburg 1901–38] 2:397–488); and numerous treatises (ibid. 12:483–496, 517–521, 549–553, 613–636, 824–849).

Bibliography: H. JEDIN, Papal Legate at the Council of Trent: Cardinal Seripando, tr. F. C. ECKHOFF (St. Louis 1947); “Seelenleitung und Vollkommenheitsstreben bei Kardinal Seripando,” Sanc-tus Augustinus, vitae spiritualis magister, 2 v. (Rome 1959) 2:389–410. E. STAKEMEIER, Der Kampf um Augustin auf dem Tridentinum (Paderborn 1937). A. BALDUCCI, Girolamo Seripando ar- civescovo di Salerno (Cava 1963). A. FORSTER, Gesetz und Evangelium bei Seripando (Paderborn 1964). F. CESAREA, A Shepherd in Their Midst: The Episcopacy of Girolamo Seripando (Vilanova 1999); “The Reform of the Diocese of Salerno during the Episcopacy of Girolamo Seripando,” Analecta Augustiniana 61 (1998): 97–124.

[H. D. JEDIN]

SERMISY, CLAUDE DE

Celebrated Renaissance polyphonist, often called Claudin; b. c. 1490; d. Paris, 1562. A cleric (1508) and later canon at Sainte Chapelle (1533–62) and Notre Dame de la Ronde, Rouen (to 1524), he sang in the French royal chapel before 1515, and became its sous maître in 1532 under Cardinal François de Tournon and its director before 1554. During the Spanish occupation he lent his Paris house to refugee canons from Saint Quentin for deliberations (1559). His admirers included the Duke of Ferrara, recipient of his motet Esto mihi, and Certon, who composed a déploration for him. He composed 13 Masses, some 80 motets, Lamentations, a Passion, and about 160 chansons, frequently transcribed or quoted in fricassées. The principal poet for his texts was Clément Marot. His sacred works portray their texts reverently, in spite of a trace of chanson patterns (e.g. his brief and simple polyphonic Masses). In the realm of the predominantly homorhythmic lyrical chanson, he is unexcelled.

Bibliography: G. G. ALLAIRE, The Masses of Claudin de Sermisy (Doctoral diss. microfilm; Boston U. 1960). I. A. CAZEAUX, The Secular Music of Claudin de Sermisy, 2 v. (Doctoral diss. microfilm; Columbia U. 1961). J. HAAR, ed., Chanson and Madrigal, 1480–1530 (Cambridge, Mass. 1964). G. REESE, Music in the Renaissance (rev. ed. New York 1959). Histoire de la musique, ed. ROLAND-MANUEL (Paris 1960–63) v.1. C. STAINER and M. L. PEREYRA, Grove’s Dictionary of Music and Musicians ed. E. BLOM, 9 v. (5th ed. London 1954) 7:709–710. G. G. ALLAIRE, “The Masses of Claudin de Sermisy” (Ph.D. diss. Boston University, 1960). J.-P. OUVARD, “Du narratif dans la polyphonie au 16th siècle, Martin menoit son pourceau au marché: Clément Marot, Clément Janequin, Claudin de Sermisy,” Analyse Musicale 9 (1987), 11–16. D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music 826 (Cambridge, Massachusetts 1996). N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker’s Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, Eighth Edition 1686 (New York 1992). R. STEVENSON, “Claudin de Sermisy” in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, vol. 17, ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980) 171–177.

[I. A. CAZEAUX]

SERMON

In Catholic usage, a term generally applied to any discourse or address given in connection with an ecclesiastical function. Thus, it is taken to include the homily, a commentary on Sacred Scripture; instruction, given from the pulpit, on matters of faith, morals, liturgical practice, etc.; the panegyric, a talk, generally given on a great feast, on the virtues of a saint; the eulogy, a funeral speech extolling the life and accomplishments of a dead person; the “occasional” sermon, an address to honor a special event, such as the dedication of a Church, or the consecration of a bishop. In popular usage, it is often used interchangeably with the term HOMILY.

For further discussion and bibliography, see under: HOMILY.

[P. MULHERN]

SERPENT (AS SYMBOL)

This article considers the symbolism behind the snake that seduced Eve to eat of the forbidden fruit of the TREE OF KNOWLEDGE in the Garden of EDEN.

The Serpent’s Actions and Fate. The serpent is introduced at the very opening of Genesis ch. 3, where it is given the epithet in Hebrew of ’ārûm, variously translated as “crafty,” “sly,” “wily,” “cunning,” etc., with an obvious reference back to Gn 2.25, where man and woman live in perfect bliss and are unashamed of being naked (’ārummîm). The epithet is also a foreshadowing of Gn 3.7, where the term ’êrûmmîm describes the naked man and woman, now ashamed of their condition. The serpent is described as a creature (3.1), but the slyest of all the “wild beasts” (H. Orlinsky) that God had made. The serpent (who speaks!) may possibly be described as a “had been” (pluperfect tense) in the Hebrew verb (3.1), but it is nonetheless shrewd enough to strike up a subversive conversation with the woman rather than with the man; and in the lively narrative style of the YAHWIST, it takes but a moment for the serpent to make the woman see everything in a new light. Soon she has transgressed the very precept that she had explained in an excessively stringent manner to the serpent. The narrator does not allow the serpent to escape when its destructive work is complete. Rather it stays during the arrival of Yahweh and the interrogation scene, and it hears the woman state that “the serpent deceived me” (3.14–15).

The sentence pronounced over the serpent is highly significant, reflecting a religious and moral outlook of the greatest importance. Against E. A. Speiser, who, despite the parallel with 3.17, translated ’ārûr as merely “banned,” the serpent is generally understood as being cursed by God and in a way that no other wild animal (literally, beast of the field) is cursed. It must crawl on its belly (with the possible assumption, supported by ancient illustrations, that it once stood erect); it must eat dirt (or dust)—a thing associated with its horizontal and slithering mode of locomotion; it and its “seed” (usually indicating progeny, but possibly having the nuance here of “genus”) are to be at perpetual strife with woman(kind), and while it snaps at her heel, she aims at crushing its head (though the precise sense of the same verb that is translated in one case as “striking” and in the other as “crushing” is not certain). The serpent is, then, completely humiliated in 3.14, and this may aid in seeing in 3.15 more than a mere struggle to the finish without any references to victory. Although such scholars as S. R. Driver and Speiser see nothing eschatological in this conflict, most Catholic authors (and some of them perhaps excessively) see some kind of victory in the future over the serpent.

Question of the Serpent’s Reality. The question of the nature of the serpent and its identity is one of considerable importance. Bound up with this is the equally important question of why it should be a serpent that leads the attack on man and woman. It may be well here to note that later Jewish theology, reflected in Wis 2.24 and the NT (especially in Jn 8.44; Rv 12.9), easily makes the identification of the serpent with the DEVIL or SATAN, and this matter was taken up with further precision by the PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL COMMISSION, which declared (June 30, 1909) that there is question in Genesis of the transgression of a divine precept diabolo sub serpentis specie suasore (the devil acting as persuader under the form of a serpent). The decree, however, led to further discussion.

Was the serpent merely a symbol, not real? This question, which apparently betrays a historicizing attitude toward the Yahwist narrative that really spoils much of its unique literary character and fails to grasp the methodology of this most clever writer, was answered more or less affirmatively by so great a scholar as M. J. Lagrange and more or less negatively by A. Bea (though one is hardly justified, especially in the latter case, in saying that this remained the unaltered viewpoint of either author). The view that the serpent is a symbol, i.e., not really a serpent, is the common present-day outlook, but it is usually presented in a way that reflects the whole literary workmanship and genius of the Yahwist. The Yahwist, working in these chapters on matters that are highly illusive and out of all normal historical reach, had little choice but to “theologize” along lines that were both in keeping with his genius and, at the same time, suited to a subject so remote from, and yet so close to, him and us. Hence, there is a heavy and most effective use of symbolism: garden, trees, rivers, rib, and a host of others, all of them clearer in the 10th and 9th centuries B.C. than to the present-day reading audience, whether largely or in no wise familiar with the background of those times. The more that is known of the Yahwist, however, and the more the ancient Near Eastern background of Genesis ch. 2–3 is discovered, so much the more does it become apparent that the symbolism of these chapters is loaded with reality. It is not empty symbolism or mere symbolism, but highly effective symbolism.

Pope John Paul II delivers a sermon in Los Angeles, California, 1987. (©Jacques M. Chenet/CORBIS)

Thus one may refer to the serpent as real, but of a special nature. The narrative entails much more than an individual serpent, miraculously endowed with speech, with razor-sharp wit, and with ability to beguile woman both quickly and completely. Behind the serpent lies a whole ideology about serpents and their significance and about man and woman and what has made them as they are today.

Mythological Monster. The notion, therefore, that the serpent was a mythological monster has been invoked; in Is 27.1 reference is made to LEVIATHAN, the fleeting serpent and the twisting serpent, which is mentioned in strikingly similar language in the Ugaritic literature (see UGARIT) as Lōtān (see C. H. Gordon, Ugaritic Manual [Rome 1955] 2.011); and in both Am 9.3 and Jb 26.13 mention is made of a serpent that presumably dwells in the sea. It may be noted that in Rv 12.9 the serpent is equated with a dragon. Although this equation need not be conclusive and it may be presumed that there were no sea serpents in the Garden of Eden, there could nonetheless be a lurking and partial reference to such a monster in the Yahwist's imagery; so, McKenzie, 563–564. The argument that Lōtān was hostile to man from the beginning but that the serpent in Paradise was at first friendly is entirely gratuitous in the second part. Everything points precisely to his hostility, though, as the narrative runs, it is neither suspected by the woman nor manifested by the serpent as hostility.

Hezekiah ordering destruction of pagan idols, 17th century, Judah. (©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

Natural Snake Regarded as Having Magical Powers. The notion of the serpent as having magical powers may already be seen in description of the creature in Gn 3.1 as cunning or crafty. Then, too, in the preliminaries to the Exodus from Egypt there is a description of how both Moses and the Egyptian court magicians changed their wands into serpents and again back into wands (Ex 7.8–12). Even the standard Hebrew word for serpent, nāḥāš, is used, whether by authentic etymological connection or not, as a verb form niḥēš meaning both to practice divination and to seek an omen. The link may be only through folk etymology, but the identity of the nominal and the verbal roots cannot be denied. The phrase in Mt 10.1.6, “as shrewd as serpents,” also conveys a notion that must have remained prevalent into the time of Christ. The words of Prv 30.19, though less telling, at least point to the mysterious aspect of the serpent. If the serpent symbolizes magic to some degree, its humiliating sentence in Gn 3.14–15 would, at the same time, be the condemnation of and polemic against magical practices only too prevalent in Israelite history (Ex 22.18; Lv 19.31; 20.6, 27; Dt 18.10–14; 1 Sm 28.3; 2 Kgs 17.17; 21.6; 23.24; Is 8.19; Ez 13.17–23). (See MAGIC [IN THE BIBLE].) Such a symbolism attached to the serpent would be in keeping with the therapeutic powers attributed to the bronze serpent (still venerated during Hezekiah's reign: 2 Kgs 18.4) in Nm 21.8–9, but explained as symbolizing God's healing powers in Wis 16.6–8 and as typifying Christ's salvation of mankind through His being raised up on the cross in Jn 3.14–15. One may note in this, as far as the serpent of Genesis ch. 3 is concerned, a probable polyvalent symbolism: magic power, illicit acquisition of knowledge, healing, and hence life itself.

Fertility Symbol. In keeping with this same rich background of the serpent's imagery in the ancient Near East, a number of scholars have stressed the notion of fertility. This is not merely because the serpent shows some affinity to fertility by shedding its skin, thus taking on new life, but also because there is some connection with the sexually oriented fertility rites as practiced, among other places, in Canaan. There is, of course, a danger of making out of Genesis ch. 2–3 little more than a mysterious sex story and passing over other factors of the highest importance. But there is the danger also of missing what was obviously a grave concern of the guardians of pure Yahwism while the Israelites were gradually settling down in Canaan, where the fertility cults were widely practiced. One may note that, at least indirectly, the serpent led the woman toward motherhood in tempting her, for the fruit of the tree of knowledge is obviously linked to an awakening of sexual desire and to the explicit mention of carnal knowledge in Gn 4.1, an act that may have taken place before the expulsion from the garden (as the story goes), since the verb may well be translated as: "Now the man had known Eve, his wife." It is of interest, too, that the Talmud, Philo Judaeus, and Clement of Alexandria all identified the serpent with concupiscence or evil thoughts. Their reasons for this were probably drawn from their own experience with mankind as well as from the texts of the Bible. In an age of archeology and of the discovery of ancient texts, however, there are added reasons for seeing in the serpent, in addition to other things, a symbol of fertility and hence of sex.

Symbol of Life. Closely bound up with these notions is the concept of the serpent as the symbol of life. It should be stressed that these notions often overlap, for the Semites were inclined to universalize, to see things as a whole, rather than to departmentalize or neatly categorize. One may assume from figurines found at such famous Canaanite sites as Megiddo, Thaanack (Taanach), Tell Beit Mirsim, and Gezer, not only that the reproductive function of the human female was greatly stressed, but also that the serpent served either as a phallic symbol (its position with relation to the figurines can hardly be regarded as accidental) or as a symbol of fertility and life. The evidence amassed by Canon Joseph Coppens of Louvain in this regard is highly indicative, although some outstanding Catholic scholars have not been influenced by it; see R. de Vaux; H. Renckens, Israel's Concept of the Beginning, tr. C. Napier (New York 1964) 272–282. Nevertheless, even apart from extrabiblical sources, Gn 3.7, 16 and the so-called sexual milieu of the account (placed against the Yahwist's contemporary background) have seemed sufficient to other leading scholars for the admission of an inclusively sexual interpretation of the serpent. The figures in S. H. Langdon's Semitic Mythology are extremely interesting in this regard, as are those in J. B. Pritchard, The Ancient Near East in Pictures Relating to the Old Testament (Princeton 1954), No. 469–474, 480, and others (see SERPENT). In Egypt the serpent called 'nh is pictured with the plant of life in its mouth, thus bringing out the symbolism of both life and wisdom (mouth).

Eve handing Adam the apple while serpent watches.
(Popperfoto/Archive Photos)

From what has been said it may be seen that to speak of a "real serpent" or to confine one's analysis of the serpent to one phase of symbolism is to fail to exhaust the rich background that such an image plays in the Yahwist's account, which is so cleverly organized and has so many fine nuances of thought. Whatever line of interpretation is followed, one may say, judging from the sacred text and from these few representative artifacts and texts from the ancient Near East, that the Yahwist had ample reason to present the tempter under the guise of a serpent.

Bl. Junípero Serra.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 2174–79. O. BIEHN et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 9:408–409. L. F. HARTMAN, “Sin in Paradise,” Catholic Biblical Quarterly 20 (1958) 26–40, esp. 39–40. J. COPPENS, La Connaissance du bien et du mal et le péché du Paradis (Louvain 1948), and the important though partially dissenting review of R. DE VAUX, Revue biblique 56 (1949) 300–308. J. L. MCKENZIE, “The Literary Characteristics of Genesis 2–3,” Theological Studies 15 (1954) 541–572, esp. 563–572. E. A. SPEISER, Genesis (Garden City, N.Y. 1964) 21–28.

[I. HUNT]

SERRA, JUNÍPERO, BL.

Founder of Franciscan missions of California; b. Petra de Mallorca, Spain, Nov. 24, 1713; d. Carmel, Calif., Aug. 28, 1784; beatified Sept. 25, 1988, by Pope John Paul II. His parents, Antonio Nadal and Margarita Rosa (Ferrer) Serra, were farmers. José Miguel, as he was baptized, joined the Franciscan Order in Palma de Mallorca, Sept. 14, 1730, taking the name Junípero. Even before his ordination in 1738, he was assigned to teach philosophy in his province. Later he received his doctorate in theology from Lullian University, Palma, and in 1743 was appointed to the Duns Scotus chair of philosophy there. In 1749 he sailed for Mexico to enter the Apostolic College of San Fernando, Mexico City. En route he preached his first American mission at San Juan, Puerto Rico. From 1750 to 1758, he worked successfully in the missions of the Sierra Gorda, built the central mission of Santiago de Jalpan, supervised the mission district for three years as president, and learned the Otomí language. In 1752 he was appointed commissary of the Holy Office of the Inquisition. After returning to Mexico City in 1758, Serra was employed for the next nine years in administrative offices at the Apostolic College and as a missionary in the dioceses of Mexico, Puebla, Oaxaca, Valladolid, and Guadalajara.

In 1767, when the Spanish government exiled the Jesuits, Serra was designated presidente (administrator) of the Baja California missions, with headquarters at Loreto. When the conquest of Alta California was undertaken by Spain in 1769, Serra accompanied the military expedition under Don Gaspar de Portolá to San Diego where he founded his first mission in the territory on July 16. In June 1770 he established his permanent headquarters at San Carlos Mission at Monterey-Carmel. Under his administration nine missions were founded in Alta California where Junípero served as presidente until his death. These missions were San Diego, San Carlos Borromeo (1770), San Antonio (1771), San Gabriel (1771), San Luis Obispo (1772), San Francisco (1776), San Juan Capistrano (1776), Santa Clara (1777), and San Buenaventura (1782).

In his California foundations, Serra insisted on the full activation of the Spanish mission system, which had been in use for several centuries. Frequent conflicts with the military and civil authorities over their treatment of Native Americans prompted him, in 1773, to present a Representación of 32 points for the better conduct of mission affairs to Viceroy Bucareli in Mexico City. Serra visited all the missions a number of times, administering the sacrament of confirmation after 1778. Contrary to legend, he did not travel exclusively by foot. Though he walked thousands of miles during his mission career, he did, at times, travel by packet boat, carriage, or mule, at times accompanied by a military guard or a page.

The writings of Serra, confined almost exclusively to mission affairs, varied from factual reports to commentary that afford insight into his character. Though fundamentally robust, he suffered from an ulcerated leg and foot during his years in Mexico and California. His apostolate was characterized by a devotion to the natives that resulted in over 6,000 baptisms and 5,000 confirmations, and in a marked improvement in their standards of living. Under his administration, agriculture and domestic animals, as well as European trades, were introduced to the indigenous peoples of California.

After his death, Junípero Serra was buried with military and naval honors in the sanctuary of San Carlos Mission, Carmel; his remains were identified in 1943. Since the middle of the 19th century, the literature on Serra has reached great proportions in both Europe and America. Many monuments and memorials have been erected in his honor. The most significant distinction came in 1931 when his statue was placed in the Statuary Hall in the Capitol at Washington, D.C. His cause was opened in 1934 at the request of the bishop of Monterey-Fresno and of the Franciscan provincial of the Province of St. Barbara.

Feast: July 1.

Bibliography: F. WEBER, A Bicentennial Compendium of Maynard J. Geiger's: The Life and Times of Fr. Junipero Serra (Santa Barbara 1988). B. FONT OBRADOR, Fr. Junipero Serra: Mallorca, Mexico, Sierra Gorda, California (Palma 1992). A. XAVIER, Junipero Serra (Barcelona 1986). M. MORGADO, Junipero Serra's Legacy (Mount Carmel 1987), bibliography. M. GEIGER, Franciscan Missionaries in Hispanic California 1769–1848: A Biographical Dictionary (San Marino 1969), 239–45.

[M. GEIGER/T. RUSCIN/F. WEBER]

SERRA INTERNATIONAL

An association of local Serra clubs to foster vocations to the priesthood and religious life. The Serra movement, named after the Spanish Franciscan Junípero SERRA, Apostle of California, began in Seattle, WA, in 1935 and soon gained episcopal approval. On July 2, 1938, five Serra clubs federated and the name Serra International became official. The Serra movement spread rapidly and remained dedicated to the achievement of a better understanding of the nature and the mission of the consecrated priesthood, and the promotion of religious vocations.

At the beginning of the 21st century, there were over 13,000 Serrans in 318 Serra Clubs in 13 regions within the United States. Worldwide, there were about 768 Serra Clubs in 35 countries in the Americas, Europe, Africa and Asia. Individual clubs sponsor programs promoting vocations to the priesthood and religious life, as well as assist local bishops in support of seminary programs. In the U.S., the association publishes a quarterly review, the Serran, and maintains its headquarters at Chicago, IL.

[J. J. KORTENDICK/EDS.]

SERTILLANGES, ANTONIN GILBERT

Dominican preacher, apologist, and philosopher; b. Clermont-Ferrand, France, Nov. 16, 1863; d. Sallanches (Haute-Savoie), July 26, 1948. In 1883 Sertillanges entered the order (then exiled from France) in Belmont, Spain, taking the name of Dalmatius. He was ordained in 1888 and in 1890 was assigned to teach theology in Corbara, Corsica. Named secretary of the Revue Thomiste in Paris (1890), he taught moral theology at the Catholic Institute from 1900 to 1920. At the same time he gave an important series of conferences that was uninterrupted by the expulsion of religious in 1903. From then on he published books and articles that numbered more than 700 by the time of his death. His principal theological works include La preuve de l'existence de Dieu et l'éternité du monde (Fribourg 1898), Les sources de la croyance en Dieu (Paris 1903), S. Thomas d'Aquin (2 v. Paris 1910), La philosophie morale de S. Thomas d'Aquin (Paris 1916), and L'idée de création et ses retentissements en philosophie (Paris 1945). In religious sociology he wrote Le patriotisme et la vie sociale (Paris 1903), La politique chrétienne (Paris 1904), Socialisme et christianisme (Paris 1905), and La famille et l'état dans l'éducation (Paris 1907). In Christian aesthetics his works include Un pèlerinage artistique à Florence (Paris 1895), Art et apologétique (Paris 1909), and Prière et musique (Paris 1930). One of the most famous and inspirational of all Sertillanges's works, however, was La vie intellectuelle (Paris 1921).

World War I increased his preaching activity; the three series of La vie héroïque (Paris 1914–18) contain the most important sermons of this period. The political tenor of one sermon in 1917 led to his suspension from the ministry after 1922 and to his successive exiles in Jerusalem in 1923, in Rijckholt (Holland) in 1924, and in Saulchoir (Belgium) from 1928 to 1939, when he was permitted to return to France.

Although he had already published such works as Jesus (Paris 1897), moral suffering intensified his output of spiritual books: Ce que Jésus voyait du haut de la Croix (Paris 1924); L'église (2 v. Paris 1926); Les plus belles pages de S. Thomas (Paris 1929); and the four volumes Recueils, Affinités, Devoirs, and Spiritualité (Paris 1935–38). His open-mindedness and respect for the opinions of others made him an outstanding apologist. This is evident more particularly in Le catéchisme des incroyants (Paris 1930) and in Dieu ou rien (2 v. Paris 1933). He was elected as a philosopher to the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences in 1918. He made a close study of Henri BERGSON, with whom he was intimately associated, in Avec Henri Bergson (Paris 1941); Henri Bergson et le catholicisme (Paris 1941); and Lumière et périls du bergsonisme (Paris 1943). He studied also Claude Bernard in La philosophie de Claude Bernard (Paris 1944), and wrote the synthesis Le christianisme et la philosophie (2 v. Paris 1939–41) and La philosophie des lois (Paris 1946). His last work, interrupted by his death, was Le problème du mal (2 v. Paris 1948).

Bibliography: M. F. MOOS, Le père sertillanges: maître de vie spirituelle (Brussels 1958); Cahiers S. Dominique 44 (1964) 172–177. The introductions of H. LELONG to A. D. SERTILLANGES, De la mort (Le jas du Revest-Saint Martin; 1963) 13–56; De la vie (ibid.; 1964) 13–50.

[M. H. VICAIRE]

SERVANTS OF MARY

This title embraces various congregations of sisters who are members of the Servite Third Order (OSM) and who were known traditionally also as Mantellate by reason of the long veil worn by some of these religious (see SERVITES). According to their tradition, they were founded in Florence, Italy, in the 13th century by (St.) Juliana FALCONIERI. Juliana received the habit in 1284 from (St.) PHILIP BENIZI, Servite prior general, who also formulated a rule of life for her and the first convent she established in 1287. Detained by the care of her aged mother, Juliana did not live with the community she had founded until after the death of her mother, Ricordata, in 1306. Juliana then entered the convent and was at once elected prioress. One of her first cares was to establish the sisters as members of the Servite Third Order Regular, for although they lived a communal life and wore a monastic habit, they were until then secular tertiaries. Juliana's uncle, Alexis Falconieri, one of the Seven Founders of the Servite Order, helped her effect this transformation.

Documentation concerning the Servite Sisters prior to the approval of the third order rule by Martin V in 1424 is practically nonexistent. Innocent VII had already given this same rule, with slight modifications, to Dominican tertiaries in 1405. New convents of Servite Sisters were founded or aggregated to the order as a result of the work of the Servite Congregation of the Primitive Observance that came into existence early in the 15th century. Very little, however, is known of these sisters, and it is often difficult to distinguish the convents of the sisters of the third order from the monasteries of the nuns of the second order.

By mid-20th century there were 24 congregations and four independent convents of Servite Sisters distributed throughout the world. Of these, 11 were pontifical institutes and 13 were diocesan institutes. Convents were located in Italy, Austria, Germany, Hungary, France, Belgium, Spain, England, Albania, Canada, the U.S., Mexico, and Brazil. Missionary work was carried on in India, Burma, the Republic of South Africa, Swaziland, Chile, and Brazil.

Four congregations of Servite Sisters are represented in the U.S., with motherhouses in Omaha, NE (Official Catholic Directory #3580); Ladysmith, WI (Official Catholic Directory #3590); Plainfield, OR (Official Catholic Directory #3572); and Blue Island, IL (Official Catholic Directory #3570) (see MANTELLATE SISTERS).

The sisters of the Omaha motherhouse (Official Catholic Directory #3580) constitute an American province that pertains to the Franco-Anglo-American Servite branch with headquarters in Begbroke, Oxford, England. The first permanent foundation of this province was made by Mother Mary Gertrude in 1893 at Mt. Vernon, IN. The sisters of the Ladysmith congregation (Official Catholic Directory #3590) are a diocesan institute. They were founded in 1912 through the joint efforts of John Sheahan, a Servite priest, and Mother Mary Alphonse, first prioress general. The work of the sisters is in education, healthcare, parish ministry, social outreach and care of the aged and infirm.

[J. M. RYSKA/EDS.]

SERVANTS OF MARY, SISTERS

(SM, Official Catholic Directory #3600); also known as the Handmaids of Mary, or Ministers to the Sick (Servas de María, ministras de enfermos), a religious congregation founded in 1851 in Madrid by (St.) María Soledad TORRES ACOSTA primarily to care for the sick in hospitals and private homes. In its early years the congregation nearly foundered because of the large percentage of defections, the state's unwillingness to recognize the rule composed by the foundress, and the serious slanders against María Soledad, which resulted in her removal as superior general. In 1867 the Holy See issued a decretum laudis and gave temporary approval to the constitutions. The first foundation in the U.S. was in New Orleans (1914). The U.S. provincialate is in Kansas City, KS. The generalate is in Rome.

Bibliography: J. A. ZUGASTI, La madre María Soledad Torres Acosta y el Instituto de las Siervas de María, 2 v. (Madrid 1916).

[J. F. BRODERICK/EDS.]

SERVANTS OF OUR LADY QUEEN OF THE CLERGY

(SRC, Official Catholic Directory #3650); a diocesan congregation of sisters whose purpose is to assist the clergy by performing domestic work. The congregation was founded on Dec. 8, 1929, at Salmon Lake, Matapédia County, Canada, by the Rev. Alexandre Bouillon (1873–1943) and Mother Mary of St. Joseph of the Eucharist. With the approval of Rome, granted on Jan. 25, 1936, the community was canonically established by George Courchesne, bishop (later archbishop) of Rimouski. The sisters perform kitchen and domestic services and care for sacristies in seminaries and clerical residences. They came to the U.S. in 1936. The motherhouse is in Quebec, Canada.

[M. S. T. ROY/EDS.]

SERVANTS OF THE PARACLETE

(Official Catholic Directory #1230, S.P.); a pontifical congregation of men ministering to priests and religious brothers; founded, Jemez Springs, N. Mex., 1947 by Rev. Gerald Michael Cushing Fitzgerald. The congregation was granted papal approbation on the feast of the Pentecost, June 1, 1952, with Rev. Fitzgerald named the first Servant General. Its original therapeutic program, "Via Coeli," in Jemez Springs, gained a reputation for its ministry to priests troubled by addictions and other problems, being one of the first to offer specialized treatment for the clergy. Dioceses and religious orders from across the country sent priests to the center located at Jemez Springs for treatment of addictions and problems of various kinds, including pedophilia. A number of priests were rehabilitated and returned to the active ministry in their home dioceses; some stayed to work in New Mexico; and some relapsed. It was this last group that created serious problems for the congregation, the archdiocese and the archbishops of Santa Fe. Subsequently, the Servants of the Paraclete closed the therapeutic program at Jemez Springs, concentrating instead on retreats and spiritual renewal. The congregation continues to offer holistic therapeutic programs for priests and religious in Jemez Springs, New Mexico; St. Louis and Dittmer in Missouri; and Stroud, England. A retreat ministry is also offered at Fitzgerald Center in Jemez Springs. The U.K. foundation of the congregation (Our Lady of Victory) was established, 1959, in Brownhill, Stroud, Gloucestershire. The generalate is in Jemez Springs, N. Mex.

[EDS.]

SERVETUS, MICHAEL

Anti-Trinitarian theologian, physician; b. Villanueva, Spain, probably 1511; d. Geneva, October 27, 1553. Servetus was born of a pious family; he studied law at Toulouse. He early developed radical theological ideas that stemmed from a concern for the conversion of Moors and Jews, which had been made difficult by the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity. Servetus decided that parts of that doctrine were erroneous, particularly the dogma of the eternity of the Son. He developed this argument in books, published in 1531 and 1532, which were sharply criticized by orthodox theologians. Their attacks led him to adopt a disguise and begin a second career as a physician and student of science. In this role he was among the first to describe the pulmonary transit of the blood; he also worked on geography and astrology. Servetus returned to the study of theology, however, not only repeating his earlier attacks on the definition of the Trinity, but also rejecting infant Baptism and advancing an extreme view of the immanence of Christ. Publication of these views in 1552 led to his arrest and condemnation as a heretic by an inquisitorial court in Vienne, France. He escaped but was arrested and condemned again, at John Calvin's insistence, by a secular Protestant court in Geneva. He was then burned. His execution provoked an extended controversy over the toleration of religious dissent.

Michael Servetus.

Bibliography: R. H. BAINTON, Hunted Heretic: The Life and Death of Michael Servetus (Boston 1953). E. M. WILBUR, A History of Unitarianism, 2 v. (Cambridge, Mass. 1945–52); Bibliography of the Pioneers of the Socinian-Unitarian Movement . . . (Rome 1950). B. BECKER, ed., Autour de Michel Servet et de Sébastien Cas-

Basilica of Our Lady of Sorrows, American motherhouse of the Servite order, Chicago, Illinois.

tellion: Recueil (Haarlem 1953). G. H. WILLIAMS, The Radical Reformation (Philadelphia 1962). H. BORNKAMM, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3rd ed. Tübingen 1957–65)³ 5:1714.

[R. M. KINGDON]

SERVITES

The Order of Friar Servants of St. Mary (OSM, Official Catholic Directory #1240) is a religious family that embraces the following forms of membership: friars (priests and brothers), contemplative nuns, religious sisters, a Secular Order and two secular institutes for unmarried women: the Servite Secular Institute founded in England and the Regnum Mariae founded in Italy. Servites lead a monastic life in the tradition of the MENDICANT ORDERS and undertake various apostolic works. The friars' present habit consists of a black tunic, scapular, cowl with hood attached, and a leather belt. Some sisters and nuns have a long veil and for this reason are called Mantellates; several monasteries of nuns are disclaced.

Foundation, Organization, and Growth. Servites trace their origins to a group of seven companions, cloth merchants of Florence, Italy, who left their native city, their families, and profession to retire outside the gate of Balla in an area known as Cafaggio for a life of poverty and penance. The names of only two of these men is known with certainty, although the Bull of Canonization of Leo XIII provides the following list: Bonfilius, John Bonagiunta, Gerard Sostegni, Bartholomew Amidei, Benedict dell'Antella, Ricoverus Ugucione, and Alexis FALCONIERI. They are known collectively and venerated as the Seven Founders.

There was at first no intention of beginning an order but only an ardent desire to fulfill a common longing for a life in the spirit of the primitive Church. They wore the grey habit of the Brothers of Penance, followed their rule, and also belonged to a Marian society whose members ministered at a hospital at Fonte Viva and called themselves Servants of Mary.

During Advent and Lent (1244 to 1245), (St.) PETER MARTYR, a Dominican, was visiting Florence, and with his help the first steps were taken toward founding an order. The seven withdrew to the heights of Monte Senario, some 12 miles from Florence, taking with them for their exclusive use the name Servants of Mary. Those members of the society who remained behind were then known as the Greater Society of Our Lady. At that time the seven began to wear a habit identical with that of the DOMINICANS, except that it was black, and adopted the Rule of St. Augustine (see AUGUSTINE, RULE OF ST.). It was there on the mountain that they drew up their first legislation and received from Ardingus, Bishop of Florence (1231 to 1247), his approval. In 1249 the papal legate in Tuscany, Raynerius Capocci, received the Servites under the protection of the Holy See, and on March 23, 1256, Alexander IV solemnly approved them as an order of friars living in strict corporate poverty.

About 1253 (St.) PHILIP BENIZI entered the order. While superior general (1267 to 1285), he brought together the various tendencies of the nascent years and gave a second legislation that provided a framework for the future. In 1274 the order was suppressed by the Second Council of Lyons, but because of the diplomatic intervention of Philip in the Roman Curia, the fact that the Servites no longer professed their original strict poverty, and their small number, the decree was not carried out. In the definitive approval of the order by Benedict XI in 1304 no mention is made of its strict mendicancy.

Servites have always followed the Roman liturgy, adding their own usages. The first chapter of the earliest constitutions (c.1295) prescribes certain reverences in honor of the Mother of God for the choir and Mass. During the generalate of (Blessed) Lothar (1285 to 1300) the number of German priories increased to seven, but in Italy the precarious juridical position caused many to abandon the order. At the close of the 13th century there were three provinces: Tuscany, Umbria, and the Romagna, with a total of about 40 priories and some 350 friars.

The long generalate of Peter of Todi (1314 to 44) brought new vigor and growth. There was a great desire on the part of the prior general and of many in the order for a return to its primitive simplicity and poverty. Peter made many new foundations in the North of Italy and thus moved the order outside its traditional center. To effect his desire for a real poverty he alienated the possessions of various priories and incurred the wrath of the friars in Tuscany who excommunicated both him and his secretary in 1334. The earliest writing on the origins of the Servites comes from Peter of Todi; in it one can discern his ideals. Peter died at the hermitage of St. Ansan, near Bologna, in 1344. During his time numerous men and women attained renown for their sanctity. At Siena there were (Bl.) Joachim (d. 1305) and (Bl.) Francis (d. 1328); at Forlì, (St.) Peregrine Laziosi; at Florence, (St.) Juliana Falconieri; and in Germany, (Bl.) John of Frankfurt (d. 1345).

Studies received little if any attention during the first century of the order because of its eremitical character; they are not mentioned in the earliest constitutions. Toward the close of the 13th century lectures were given at the priory in Bologna on the metaphysics of Avicenna, and students were sent to Paris. The general chapter of 1318 was the first to legislate regarding studies. That same year the order had its own studium at Paris, but as theological faculties were opened in Italy, the number of Servites attending Paris lessened considerably. From the priory of Bologna came the two most famous Servite scholastics of the period: Lawrence (d. 1400), called Opimus, who wrote a treatise Commentarius in quatuor libros sententiarum, and Urban (d. 1434), called Urbanus Averroista, who wrote In commenta Averrois super librum physicorum Aristotelis interpretatio.

Reform Movement. The general chapter of Ferrara in 1404 decreed the revitalization of the eremitical life at Monte Senario and sent (Bl.) Anthony of Siena there as prior with several friars. A novitiate was established in 1412, and the reconstruction of the church was completed in 1418. At the general chapter of Pisa in 1413 the hermitage was withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the Tuscan province and placed under the prior general. The renewal that took place at Monte Senario caused a rebirth in the order, both in Italy and beyond the Alps. Through the energetic support of an outstanding general, Nicholas of Perugia (1427 to 1460), the restored eremitical life at Monte Senario gave rise to the Congregation of the Observance. The year of his election the hermits made three foundations as a starting point for the new reform. Near Bologna they reentered St. Ansan and founded St. Margaret; at Modena they began the hermitage of St. Saviour. In June 1430 Francis of Florence and ten others left the hermitage of St. Margaret for Brescia.

Eugene IV in 1431 delegated Ludovico Barbo, the Abbot of St. Justina, Padua, to grant to the Servites the church and monastery of St. Alexander, which formerly belonged to the Austin Canons (see CANONS REGULAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE). In 1435 the sanctuary of St. Mary at Monte Berico, Vicenza, was relinquished by the Order of St. Saviour to the Servites. In 1439 they again replaced the Austin Canons, this time at Cremona in the church and monastery of St. Catald. Eugene IV in June 1440 granted the members of the Observance canonical approval and exemption from the authority of the Servite conventuals (the nonreformed), except that of the prior general, with permission to elect their own vicar. At this time the members of the Observance numbered about 40 friars.

In 1463 the observant friars entered the priory and shrine of St. Peregrine at Forlì, which had formerly belonged to the conventuals. This became one of their chief centers, and the saint became their special patron. There was a gradual breaking away from the hermits of Monte Senario because the observant friars tended to undertake the works of the active ministry. The influence of the DEVOTIO MODERNA is evident in their monastic spirit and apostolate. The fraternal character and simplicity of the Rule of St. Augustine were emphasized, poverty and common life were enforced, and preaching was the principal activity. They were devoted to the Holy Name and the crucified Savior. The observant movement continued its semi-independent existence until May 5, 1570, when Pius V reunited its members to the conventuals.

With the suppression of the observants the need was again felt for a stricter life, and in 1593 Clement VIII reestablished the hermitage of Monte Senario and decreed that the life there was to be according to the primitive observance. Several Servite friars spent a period of time at Camaldoli in order to acquire the eremitical spirit (see CAMALDOLESE). Until this time the Servite hermits had followed the constitutions of the order with the addition of their own usages, but in October 1609 Paul V approved constitutions designed specifically for Monte Senario. A new aspect of the life was soon developed when several hermits became recluses. In 1617 an eremitical congregation was formed, and two years later the first general chapter was convoked. The hermits, custodians of the relics of the Seven Founders, propagated this cult throughout the order. In September 1778 Pius VI suppressed the hermitage at Monte Senario and two daughter hermitages for political reasons, at the request of Peter Leopold the Grand Duke of Tuscany and brother of the Emperor JOSEPH II. The two remaining hermitages in the Papal States near Tolfa continued a meager existence for a short while.

Leaders of the Reform. These various reform movements were strengthened by the activity of vigorous priors general: Stephen of Borgo (1410 to 1424), Nicholas of Perugia (1427 to 1460), Christopher of Istria (1461 to 1485), and Anthony of Bologna (1485 to 1495). Some Servites renowned for holiness were: (Bl.) James Philip of Faenza (d. 1483), (Bl.) Bonaventure of Forlì (d. 1491), (Bl.) John Angelo of Milan (d. 1506), and (Bl.) Elizabeth of Mantua (d. 1486).

In 1503 the constitutions of the order were printed for the first time; this edition was followed by five others in that century. The edition of 1580 was the most important for it not only applied the legislation of Trent, but also served as the juridic norm for many years to come. Two Servite generals distinguished themselves at the Council of Trent: Agostino Bonucci (1542 to 1553) and Lorenzo Mazzochio of Castelfranco (1554 to 1557). Bonucci, the last superior general to be elected for life, is known principally for his vehement opposition to the theory that revelation is contained partly in Scripture and partly in tradition. He promoted studies in the order and adhered to the traditional attachment to the school of Augustine and Scotus (see AUGUSTINIANISM). Mazzochio, a doctor from Paris, is remembered for his intervention on justification and on the Sacraments.

The eremitical spirit of the order was given prominence by Angelus Maria Montursius (1574 to 1600), who withdrew to a cell in his priory as a recluse to recall the friars of his community to a better observance. He occupied himself with the study of the Scriptures and the Fathers and wrote five volumes on the Bible entitled Elucubrationes, several volumes of spiritual exercises, and other ascetical works. He is remembered especially for his Lettera spirituale of 1596 (an admonition to a more fervent conventual life). After almost nine years of solitude, he was appointed by Clement VIII as vicar-general in May 1597, and a month later, general. After a short but effective government he died in February 1600.

Spain and France. Although the province of Spain was listed as the eighth in numerical order in 1493, there is no mention of the number of friars or priories. Later, the prior general, Giacomo Tavanti, made a concerted effort to spread the order in the Iberian Peninsula. In 1577 a Spanish Servite was sent to the region of Valencia, and another to Aragon. In 1578 an unsuccessful attempt was made to found the order in Portugal. In the 17th century Servite priories were situated mainly in Valencia and Catalonia, where the center of activity was Barcelona. At that time the friars in Spain numbered about 200. Until 1774 Spanish delegates were present at the general chapters. By the end of the 19th century only one Servite foundation remained in Spain, a monastery of nuns. The first priories in France, founded in the late 15th century, constituted the Province of Narbonne in 1533. At that time there were eight houses, all in Provence. The religious wars of the 16th century worked serious harm in the province, but the 17th century witnessed a rebirth from the few remaining foundations near Marseilles. Before the plague of 1720 the province again had eight priories and about 100 friars. In 1740 the order was forbidden by the civil government to receive novices, and several years later half of the foundations were closed. Suppression of the order in France was decreed by Louis XV in 1770.

Central Europe. In May 1611 Anna Katharina Gonzaga, the Archduchess of Austria, requested the assistance of the Servites for the monastery of nuns, St. Mary of the Virgins, which she was building at Innsbruck. Thus began the most important reform in the history of the order, Nikolaus Barchi, a Capuchin and confessor of the Archduchess, was soon clothed as a Servite at Anna Katharina's request. The Archduchess herself was received into the Servites and called Sister Anna Juliana. On the day of her profession, Nov. 21, 1613, she ordered the friars to put aside the habit of the conventuals for that of the new reform movement then taking place among the hermits of Monte Senario. The Servite general, Dionisio Bussotti, approved the Germanic reform in 1634, and Clement IX gave papal approbation in 1668. The priories of the reform in Austria, Germany, and Bohemia were erected into a province in 1657 and were ruled over by a vicar-general appointed by the general of the Servite conventuals. Clement XI approved the constitutions of the reform in 1709. In the years prior to the French Revolution the Germanic observant friars attained their greatest development and numbered about 450 in three provinces. The Revolution and the policies of Emperor Joseph II seriously affected them, for the Bohemian province disappeared completely, and the other provinces were left in a weakened state. The observants continued until 1907, when the new constitutions of the conventuals were made obligatory also in those provinces. The Germanic Servite reform contributed much to both the order and the Church, especially through the many theologians and spiritual writers at the University of Innsbruck. It was the only movement in the history of the order to have developed a school of spirituality.

Marian Devotion. During the 16th century there arose a type of devotion to Our Lady that viewed her isolated under one title and in a sense separated from the great Christological unity of a previous age. In this climate the Servite Order gradually developed its particular cult of her Sorrows. At first this devotion was encouraged by the order for the lay people frequenting its churches. From 1600 on, a rapid literary production propagated this devotion and it gradually became a principal characteristic of the Servites. The general chapter of 1660 decreed that there should be a statue of Our Lady of Sorrows in all churches of the order; the chaplet of the Seven Sorrows was ordered to be worn on the habit in 1674. The Servites received permission to celebrate the feast of Our Lady of Sorrows in 1668, and that of Passiontide in 1714. Finally, the church of Monte Senario, previously dedicated to the Assumption, was rededicated in 1717 to the Sorrows of Our Lady.

In this period of Servite history the figure of Paolo SARPI, theological advisor to the senate of the Republic of Venice and historian of the Council of Trent, is the most famous. Arcangelo Giani published the Annales Ordinis Servorum between 1618 and 1622. This valuable work is the culmination of the industry of Servite historiographers of the 15th and 16th centuries who developed into full narratives the meager and simple elements of the primitive legends of the 14th century. In 1666 a studium generale was founded in Rome in the priory of St. Marcellus under the title of HENRY OF GHENT, who was erroneously thought to have been a Servite.

Modern Renewal. In 1839 the order undertook its first mission work. This was at Aden in Arabia and at Mindanao in the Philippine Islands. Unhappily, within ten years both of these promising undertakings were abandoned. Previously, Renaissance chroniclers attributed a grand missionary expansion to Philip Benizi and his successors, along with numerous foundations in Europe, but their accounts are not true. The alleged missionary expansion might be explained by the existence of a priory in Crete in the 14th century.

The modern rebirth began in 1864 when two Italian priests left Florence for London to act as chaplains at the motherhouse of the Servite Sisters. From this developed the present English Province. In 1870 Austin Morini, with three other friars, departed from England for the United States to work in the Diocese of Green Bay, Wisconsin, at St. Charles Church, Doty's Island, near Menasha. Early ministry centered in this area, but in the spring of 1874 Morini was invited by Bishop Thomas Foley of Chicago, Illinois, to make a foundation in that city. The result was the parish of Our Lady of Sorrows, which soon became the center and motherhouse for the order in America. The priories in the United States were under the jurisdiction of a vicar-general until 1901, when they were formed into a commissary province. In March 1909 the first province was erected with its motherhouse in Chicago, and in 1952, the second, with its motherhouse at Denver, Colorado. There are 27 foundations in the United States belonging to these provinces, and some 325 friars.

In 1964 the order counted 1,683 friars in 12 provinces: Tuscan, Roman, Bolognese, Venetian, Piedmontese, Neapolitan, Tyrolese, Hungarian, English, Our Lady of Sorrows (United States), St. Joseph (United States), and Brazilian; two rectorates, Belgium and Spain; and six commissariates, comprising the following—France, Germany, Sicily, Venezuela, central Chile, Bolivia, Uruguay, Argentina, and Mexico. There were also foundations in Switzerland, Ireland, Scotland, and Western Australia and missions in Africa, and in Chile and Brazil.

Following the Second Vatican Council (1962 to 1965), the order undertook a revision of its constitutions, which began with the General Chapter of 1965 under the leadership of the first American Prior General, Joseph Loftus. The new text was drawn up and authorized by the General Chapter of 1968. It was approved by the Congregation for Religious and Secular Institutes in 1987. The liturgical books of the order were also revised; the Proper of Masses in 1971 and the Liturgy of the Hours in 1975.

In 1983 the Order celebrated its 750th anniversary of foundation. The General Chapters of 1983, 1989, and 1995, in the light of diminishing numbers and the aging of the friars, focused their efforts on restructuring the various jurisdictions, some of which were founded in the intervening years between 1964 and 1995. This restructuring involved also the creation of regional conferences: the North American Conference (NAC) embracing Canada, Mexico and the United States; Cono Sur comprising Chile, Bolivia, Peru, Argentina and Brazil; Serviteur involving the province of the Isles (Great Britain and Ireland), France and Belgium; the Federation of Italy, Tyrol and Spain (FITES); the Inter South African Conference (ISAC) which includes Swaziland, Zululand, Mozambique and Uganda, and, finally, the Conference of Australia and Asia (CASA) which is made up of Australia, India and the Philippines. In 2001 there were nine provinces: Brazil, Province of the Isles, Lombardo-Veneto, Romagna-Piemonte, Annunziata (Tuscany, Rome, Naples), Spain, Austria, Mexico and the United States; one vicariate: Chile-Bolivia-Peru; and seven delegations: Argentina, Australia, France-Belgium, India, Philippines, Swaziland, and Zululand. There are also foundations in Hungary, the Czech Republic, and Albania.

The motherhouse of the order is the hermitage of Monte Senario, and the generalate is at St. Marcellus, Rome. The order maintains its own Pontifical theological faculty "Marianum" in Rome with an institute for advanced studies in Mariology.

Bibliography: Monumenta Ord. Servorum S. Mariae, ed. A. MORINI et al. 20 v. (Brussels-Rome 1897-1930). A. GIANI and A. M. GARBI, Annales Sacri Ordinis Fratrum Servorum B. Mariae Virginis, 3 v. (2d ed. Lucca 1719-25). Studi storici sull'Ordine dei Servi di Maria, 4 v. (Rome 1933-42). Bibliotheca Servorum Veneta (Vicenza 1963-).

[J. M. RYSKA/P. M. GRAFFIUS]

SESTO AL RÉGHENA, ABBEY OF

A former Benedictine monastery in the Diocese of Concordia, in northern Italy. It was founded about mid-8th century by Erfo and Marco (or Anto) about six miles from Concordia, on the banks of the Réghena (Veneto), under the title of Sancta Maria in Sylvis. In 775 Charlemagne granted it the privilege of exemption. Destroyed by the barbarian invasions at the end of the 9th century, it was rebuilt under Abbot Adolph (960–965), and castles and farms were built on lands given by benefactors and were granted as fiefs to vassals. At the same time, the monks organized the gradual reclamation of the marshy and unwholesome areas fronting the Tagliamento River. In 967 Otto I presented the monastery to the patriarch of AQUILEIA, to whom it remained subject for two centuries, always disputing with the patriarch questions of revenues and jurisdiction. The 13th century already brought with it a decline, hastened by the molestations and devastations of Ezzelino da Romano, discord with its vassals, disorders and strife among the religious themselves, and finally the practice of COMMENDATION, instituted by EUGENE IV in 1431. At first protected by the Congregation of St. Justina, the monastery was later placed directly under the control of the Republic of Venice. In 1441 Pietro Barbo, later Pope PAUL II, was named commendatory. The previous year, however, the monastery had been abandoned by the BENEDICTINES, who were succeeded in turn by the AUGUSTINIANS, the DOMINICANS, and the FRANCISCANS. In 1612 PAUL V intervened to give it to the VALLOMBROSANS. In 1790 both the monastery and its commendam were suppressed and the holdings were sold at auction. In 1921 the temporary pastor of the church received the honorary title of abbot. Of the buildings of this imposing monastery almost nothing remains; but some of its library holdings are preserved in Udine, Venice, and Portogruaro (see of the bishop of Concordia). The basilica, which still stands as a distinguished monument from the 9th century, preserves the bell tower, formerly a tower of the monastery, an interesting entrance hall, and the crypt, all romanesque, and also several remarkable frescoes of the 11th and 12th centuries and others of the school of Giotto and of the later Renaissance.

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:3020. G. B. PERESSUTTI, L'Abbazia di Seato al Réghena (Udine 1937). T. GEROMETTA, L'Abbazia benedettina di Santa Maria in Sylvis (Portogruaro, Italy 1957).

[I. DE PICCOLI]

SETON, ELIZABETH ANN BAYLEY, ST.

Convert to Roman Catholicism, foundress of the American Sisters of Charity, a wife, mother, widow, sole parent, educator, social minister, and spiritual leader, b. Aug. 28, 1774, New York City; d. Emmitsburg, Md., Jan. 4, 1821.

Elizabeth Ann Bayley Seton was the first person born in the United States to become a canonized saint (Sept. 14, 1975). Of British and French ancestry, Elizabeth was born into a prominent Anglican family in New York and was the second daughter of Dr. Richard Bayley (1744–1801) and Catherine Charlton (d. 1777). The couple's first child, Mary Magdalene Bayley (1768–1856), married (1790) Dr. Wright Post (1766–1828) of New York. Catherine Bayley (1777–1778), the youngest child, died the year after the untimely death of her mother, which was probably a result of childbirth.

Native of New York. The Bayley and Charlton families were among the earliest colonial settlers of the New York area. Elizabeth's paternal grandparents were William Bayley (c.1708–c.1758) and Susannah LeCompte (LeCompte, b.1727), distinguished French Huguenots of New Rochelle. Her maternal grandparents, Mary Bayeux and Dr. Richard Charlton (d.1777), lived on Staten Island where Dr. Charlton was pastor at Saint Andrew's Episcopal Church.

After the death of his first wife, Dr. Bayley married (1778) Charlotte Amelia Barclay (c. 1759–1805), of the Jacobus James Roosevelt lineage of New York, but the marriage ended in separation as a result of marital conflict. The couple had seven children, three daughters and four sons. Among them was Guy Carleton Bayley (1786–1859), whose son, James Roosevelt Bayley (1814–1877), converted to Roman Catholicism and became the first bishop of Newark (1853–1872) and eighth archbishop of Baltimore (1872–1877).

Elizabeth and her sister were rejected by their stepmother. On account of her father's travel abroad for medical studies, the girls lived temporarily in New Rochelle, New York, with their paternal uncle, William Bayley (1745–1811), and his wife, Sarah Pell Bayley. Elizabeth experienced a period of darkness around the time when her stepmother and father separated. Reflecting about this period of depression in later years in her journal entitled Dear Remembrances, she expressed her relief at not taking the drug laudanum, a opium derivative: "This wretched reasoning—laudanum—the praise and thanks of excessive joy not to have done the 'horrid deed'—thoughts and promise of eternal gratitude." Elizabeth had a natural bent toward contemplation; she loved nature, poetry, and music, especially the piano. She was given to introspection and frequently made entries in her journal expressing her sentiments, religious aspirations, and favorite passages from her reading.

Elizabeth wed William Magee Seton (1768–1803), a son of William Seton, Sr., (1746–1798) and Rebecca Curson Seton (c. 1746–c. 1775), Jan. 25, 1794, in the Manhattan home of Mary Bayley Post. Samuel Provoost (1742–1815), the first Episcopal bishop of New York, witnessed the wedding vows of the couple.

Socially Prominent. William Magee, a descendant of the Setons of Parbroath, was the oldest of 13 children of his father's two marriages. The elder Seton married (1767) Rebecca Curson (c. 1746–1775) and the year after her death he married (1776) his sister-in-law, Anna Maria Curson (d.1792). William Magee, educated in England, along with his father and brother James, was a founding partner in the import-export mercantile firm, the William Seton Company, which became the Seton, Maitland and Company in 1793. He had visited important counting houses in Europe in 1788 and was also a friend of Filippo Filicchi (1763–1816), a renowned merchant of Livorno, Italy.

Socially prominent in New York, the Setons belonged to the fashionable Trinity Episcopal Church. Elizabeth was a devout communicant there under the influence of Rev. John Henry Hobart (1775–1830, later bishop), who was her spiritual director. Elizabeth, along with her sister-in-law Rebecca Mary Seton (1780–1804), her soul-friend and dearest confidant, nursed the sick and dying among family, friends, and needy neighbors. Elizabeth was among the founders and charter members of The Society for the Relief of Poor Widows with Small Children (1797) and also served as treasurer of the organization.

Happily married, Elizabeth and William Magee Seton had five children: Anna Maria (1795–1812), William (1796–1868), Richard Bayley (1798–1823), Catherine Charlton (1800–1891), and Rebecca Mary (1802–1816).

Anna Maria, who had accompanied her parents to Italy in 1803, became afflicted with tuberculosis as an adolescent and made her vows as a Sister of Charity on her deathbed. Rebecca fell on ice sometime before 1812, causing a hip injury which resulted in lameness and early death, also from tuberculosis. Both Anna Maria and Rebecca are buried in the original cemetery of the Sisters of Charity at Emmitsburg, Maryland. After joining the United States Navy (1822), Richard died prematurely off the coast of Liberia on board the ship Oswego.

Catherine Charlton (also called Josephine), was beautiful and witty. She distinguished herself by her linguistic and musical talents, developed at Saint Joseph's Academy, Emmitsburg. She was the only Seton present at her mother's death. Catherine later lived with her brother William and his family and traveled to Europe with them several times before entering the Sisters of Mercy in New York City (1846). As Mother Mary Catherine, she devoted herself for more than 40 years to prison ministry in New York. William received a commission as lieutenant in the United States Navy in February 1826 and married (1832) Emily Prime (1804–1854). Seven of their nine children lived to adulthood, including Archbishop Robert Seton (1839–1927) and Helen (1844–1906), another New York Sister of Mercy (Sister Mary Catherine, 1879–1906).

Elizabeth Seton. (Archive Photos)

Change of Tide. After the death (1798) of William Seton, Sr., her father-in-law, responsibility was thrust on Elizabeth's husband for both the Seton, Maitland and Company and the welfare of his younger half-siblings. About six months pregnant with her third child at the time, Elizabeth managed the care of both families in the Seton household. There she enjoyed her initial teaching experience with her first pupils, Charlotte (1786–1853), Henrietta (Harriet) (1787–1809), and Cecilia (1791–1810), her youngest sisters-in-law.

During their monetary crisis Elizabeth tried to assist her husband at night by doing the account books of his firm, but the company went bankrupt (1801), and the Setons lost their possessions and the family home at 61 Stone Street in lower Manhattan. William Magee began to show evidence of tuberculosis as their financial problems escalated.

Faith-filled Journey. Elizabeth, William Magee, and their oldest daughter Anna Maria made a sea voyage (1803) to the warm climate of Italy in a desperate effort to restore her husband's health. Italian authorities at the port of Livorno feared yellow fever then prevalent in New York. As a result the officials quarantined the Setons in a cold, stone lazaretto. The Filicchi family did all they could to advocate for them and to provide some relief during their month of isolation. Two weeks after his discharge, William Magee died in Pisa, December 27, and was buried in the English cemetery in Livorno, leaving Elizabeth a widow at age 29 with five young children.

The experiences in Italy of Elizabeth and her daughter transformed their lives forever. Antonio Filicchi (1764–1847) and his wife, Amabilia Baragazzi Filicchi (1773–1853) provided gracious hospitality to the widow and child until the Setons returned to the United States the next spring. Filippo and his wife, the former Mary Cowper (1760–1821) of Boston, along with Antonio and Amabilia Filicchi, introduced Elizabeth to Roman Catholicism. Elizabeth came upon the text of the Memorare, and began to inquire about Catholic practices, first from her lack of familiarity with the religion, then her inquisitiveness arose out of sincere interest. She asked about the Sacred Liturgy, the Real Presence in the Eucharist, and the Church's direct unbroken link with Christ and the apostles. The Italian Journal, her long memoir written for her sister-in-law Rebecca Seton, reveals the intimate details of Elizabeth's heart-rending personal journey of inner conflict and conversion (cf., Bechtle and Metz, p. 243). Antonio, who had business interests in America, accompanied the Setons back to America, and instructed Elizabeth about the faith and offered wise counsel during her indecision. Elizabeth felt deeply for Antonio, who provided not only emotional support but also substantial financial resources to her.

Although Elizabeth left the United States a firm Protestant, she returned to New York with the heart of a Roman Catholic in June 1804. Immediately opposition and insecurity threatened her resolve. Elizabeth's religious inclinations incurred the ire of both family and friends. Their hostility coupled with the death of her beloved Rebecca, her sister-in-law and most intimate confidant, caused Elizabeth deep anguish. She was also troubled by her strained financial situation. Her five children were all less than eight years of age. As their sole parent Elizabeth faced many challenges and frequently had to relocate into less expensive housing.

While Elizabeth was discerning God's will for her future, the Virgin Mary became her prism of faith. In her discernment she relied on several advisors among the clergy, especially Rev. John Cheverus (1768–1836), the first bishop of Boston, and his associate Rev. Francis Maignon (1753–1818). After wrestling with doubts and fears in her search for truth, Elizabeth resolved her inner conflict regarding religious conversion and embraced Roman Catholicism.

Rev. Matthew O'Brien (1758–1815) received Elizabeth's profession of the Catholic faith at Saint Peter's Church, Barclay Street in lower Manhattan, March 14, 1805. Elizabeth received her First Communion two weeks later on March 25. Bishop John Carroll (1735–1815, later archbishop), whom she considered her spiritual father, confirmed her the next year on Pentecost Sunday. For her Confirmation name Elizabeth added the name of Mary to her own and thereafter frequently signed herself "MEAS," which was her abbreviation for Mary Elizabeth Ann Seton. Accordingly the three names, Mary, Ann, and Elizabeth, signified the moments of the mysteries of Salvation for her.

Elizabeth's initial years as a Catholic (1805–1808) in New York were marked by disappointments and failures. Rampant anti-Catholic prejudice prevented her from beginning a school, but she secured a teaching position at the school of a Protestant couple, Mr. & Mrs. Patrick White but they failed financially within a short time. Elizabeth's next venture was a boarding house for boys who attended a school directed by Rev. William Harris of Saint Mark's Episcopal Church, but disgruntled parents withdrew their sons. Seton family members also distrusted Elizabeth's influence on younger family members. Their fears were realized when Cecilia converted to Catholicism (1806), then Harriet also made her profession of faith (1809). During Cecilia's struggles as a new convert, Elizabeth wrote an instructive Spiritual Journal (1807) for her, offering her wise counsel.

Although Elizabeth was frustrated in establishing herself to provide for the welfare of her children, she remained faith-filled. She was convinced that God would show her the way according to the Divine Plan. In considering her future and examining alternatives, Elizabeth remained a mother first and foremost. She regarded her five "darlings" as her primary obligation over every other commitment.

Maryland Mission. Rev. Louis William Dubourg, S.S., (1766–1833), was visiting New York when Elizabeth met him quite providentially about 1806. Dubourg had desired a congregation of religious women to teach girls in Baltimore since 1797. He, with the concurrence of Bishop John Carroll, invited Elizabeth to Baltimore with the assurance that the French priests belonging to the Society of Saint Sulpice (Sulpicians), who were émigrés in Maryland would assist her in forming a plan of life which would be in the best interests of her children. The Sulpicians wished to form a small school for religious education of children.

After her arrival in Maryland, June 16, 1808, Elizabeth spent one year as a school mistress in Baltimore. The Sulpicians envisioned the development of a sisterhood modeled on the Daughters of Charity of Paris (founded 1633), and they actively recruited candidates for the germinal community. Cecilia Maria O'Conway, (1788–1865), of Philadelphia, was the first to arrive, Dec. 7, 1808. She was followed in 1809 by Mary Ann Butler (1784–1821) of Philadelphia, Susanna Clossey (1785–1823) of New York, Catharine Mullen (1783–1815) of Baltimore, Anna Maria Murphy Burke (c. 1787–1812) of Philadelphia, and Rosetta (Rose) Landry White (1784–1841), a widow of Baltimore. Only Elizabeth pronounced vows of chastity and obedience to John Carroll for one year in the lower chapel at Saint Mary's Seminary, Paca Street, March 25, 1809. The archbishop gave her the title "Mother Seton." On June 16, 1809, the group of sisters appeared for the first time dressed alike in a black dress, cape and bonnet patterned after the widows weeds of women in Italy whom Elizabeth had encountered there.

Samuel Sutherland Cooper, (1769–1843), a wealthy seminarian and convert, purchased 269 acres of land for an establishment for the sisterhood near Emmitsburg in the countryside of Frederick County, Maryland. Cooper wished to establish an institution for female education and character formation rooted in Christian values and the Catholic faith, as well as services to the elderly, job skill development, and a small manufactory, which would be beneficial to people oppressed by poverty. Cooper had Elizabeth in mind to direct the educational program.

Emmitsburg Foundation. Their stone farmhouse (c. 1750) was not yet ready for occupancy when Elizabeth and her first group arrived in Emmitsburg, June, 1809. Rev. John Dubois, S.S., (1764–1842), founder of Mount Saint Mary's College and Seminary (1808), offered his cabin on Saint Mary's Mountain for the women to use until they would be able to move to their property in the nearby valley some six weeks later. According to tradition, Elizabeth named the area Saint Joseph's Valley. There the Sisters of Charity of Saint Joseph's began July 31, 1809 in the Stone House, the former Fleming farmhouse (c. 1750). In mid-February, 1810, Elizabeth and her companions moved into Saint Joseph's House (which became known as the White House.) Elizabeth opened Saint Joseph's Free School Feb. 22, 1810. It educated needy girls of the area and was the first free Catholic school for girls staffed by sisters in the country. Saint Joseph's Academy began May 14, 1810, with the addition of boarding pupils who paid tuition which enabled the Sisters of Charity to subsidize their charitable mission. Saint Joseph's Academy and Free School formed the cradle of Catholic education in the United States.

Divine Providence guided Elizabeth and her little community through the poverty and unsettling first years. Numerous women joined the Sisters of Charity. During the period 1809–1820, of the 98 candidates who arrived in Elizabeth's lifetime, 86 of them actually joined the new community; 70 percent remained Sisters of Charity for life. Illness, sorrow, and early death were omnipresent in Elizabeth's life. She buried 18 sisters at Emmitsburg, in addition to her two daughters Annina and Rebecca, and her sisters-in-law Harriet and Cecilia Seton.

The Sulpicians assisted Elizabeth in adapting the 17th-century French Common Rules of the Daughters of Charity (1672) for the Sisters of Charity of Saint Joseph's in accord with the needs of the Catholic Church in America. Elizabeth formed her sisters in the Vincentian spirit according to the tradition of Louise de Marillac (1591–1660) and Vincent de Paul (1581–1660). Eighteen Sisters of Charity, including Elizabeth, made private, annual vows of poverty, chastity, obedience, and service of the poor for the first time, July 19, 1813; thereafter they made vows annually on March 25.

Elected by the members of the community to be the first Mother of the Sisters of Charity, Elizabeth was re-elected successively and remained at its head until her death. The Sulpicians, who had conceived and founded the community, filled the office of superior general through 1849. Elizabeth worked successively with three Sulpicians in this capacity: Rev. Louis William Dubourg, S.S., Rev. Jean-Baptiste David, S.S., (1761–1841) and Rev. John Dubois, S.S.

The Sisters of Charity intertwined social ministry with education in the faith and religious values in all they undertook in their mission. Elizabeth dispatched sisters to Philadelphia to manage Saint Joseph's Asylum, the first Catholic orphanage in the United States in 1814. The next year she opened a mission at Mount Saint Mary's to oversee the infirmary and domestic services for the college and seminary near Emmitsburg. In 1817 sisters from Saint Joseph's Valley went to New York to begin the New York City Orphan Asylum (later Saint Patrick's Orphan Asylum).

The Seton Legacy. Rev. Simon Gabriel Bruté, S.S., (1779–1839), of Mount Saint Mary's served as the chaplain to the Sisters of Charity and Elizabeth's spiritual director until her death. He was her principle guide along the path to sanctity. He, along with DuBois, actively inculturated the spirit of Vincent de Paul and Louise de Marillac among the Sisters of Charity. Bruté advised Elizabeth to read and translate the lives of Louise and Vincent and some of their spiritual writings.

The work of education and charity lives on in Elizabeth's spiritual daughters around the world. James Gibbons (1834–1921, later cardinal), archbishop of Baltimore, initiated her cause for canonization in 1882. Officially introduced at the Vatican in 1940, it made steady progress. Blessed John XXIII declared Elizabeth venerable Dec. 18, 1959, and also beatified her March 17, 1963. Pope Paul VI canonized Saint Elizabeth Ann Seton Sept. 14 during the Holy Year of 1975 and the International Year of the Woman. The Holy See accepted three miracles through her intercession. These included the cures of Sister Gertrude Korzendorfer, D.C., (1872–1942), of Saint Louis, of cancer; a young child, Ann Theresa O'Neill, (b.1948), of Baltimore, from acute lymphatic leukemia; and the miraculous recovery of Carl Kalin, (1902–1976), of New York, from a rare form of encephalitis.

The extraordinary manner in which Elizabeth lived an ordinary life flowed from the centrality of the Word of God and the Eucharist in her life. These strengthened her enabling her to be a loving person toward God, her family, her neighbor, and all of creation. She undertook works of mercy and justice. Not only did she and her Sisters of Charity care for orphans, widows, and poor families, but they also addressed unmet needs among persons oppressed by multiple forms of poverty. Elizabeth had a special concern for children who lacked educational opportunities, especially for religious instruction in the faith.

Her life-long response to God's will throughout her life led her to sanctity. Her holiness developed from her early religious formation as an Episcopalian. Her longing for Eternity began at a young age. Throughout her earthly journey of 46 years, Elizabeth viewed herself as a pilgrim on the road of life. She faced each day with eyes of faith, looking forward to eternity.

Dominant themes in her life and writings include her pursuit of the Divine Will, nourishment from the Eucharist and the Bible, confidence in Divine Providence, and charitable service to Jesus Christ in poor persons. From her deathbed in Emmitsburg she admonished those gathered about her: "Be children of the Church, be children of the Church."

She prayed her way through life's joys and struggles using sacred scripture. This enabled her to live serenely come what may. Psalm 23, which she learned as a child, remained her favorite treasury of consolation throughout her life of suffering and loss. Elizabeth's pathway to inner peace and sanctity flowed from her way of living the Paschal Mystery in her own life.

She moved from devotional reception of Holy Communion as an Episcopalian to awe as a Roman Catholic and often ecstatic adoration of the Real Presence. Her Eucharistic devotion and faith in God's abiding presence nourished her imitation of Jesus Christ, the source and model of all charity. As she established the Sisters of Charity in their mission of charity and education, she adopted The Regulations for the Sisters of Charity in the United States (1812). The choice of the Vincentian rule reflects how Elizabeth understood her mission as one of apostolic service honoring Jesus Christ through service to poor persons. Elizabeth's spiritual pathway involved other people—her advisors, friends, collaborators, and those she served. The relational aspects of her spirituality were a natural gift which she used as a religious leader and animator in community.

Seton Writings. Elizabeth was a prolific writer. Extant documents are published in Elizabeth Bayley Seton Collected Writings (New York). Also in her hand are some of the primitive documents of the Sisters of Charity of Saint Joseph's and her own last will and testament. In addition to voluminous correspondence, Elizabeth also wrote meditations, instructions, poetry, hymns, notebooks, journals, and diaries. Her journals include both spiritual reflections and chronicle accounts, like The Italian Journal. Dear Remembrances is an autobiographical retrospective memoir or life review. Her meditations deal with the liturgical seasons, sacraments, virtue, biblical themes, and the saints, including Vincent de Paul whose rule of life the Sisters of Charity adopted. Among her instructions are those used in preparing children for their First Communion, and formation conferences for the Sisters of Charity on such topics as service, charity, eternity, the Blessed Sacrament, and Mary, the Mother of God.

Elizabeth rendered the prototypical English translation of their first biographies, The Life of Mademoiselle Le Gras (Nicolas Gobillon, 1676) and The Life of the Venerable Servant of God Vincent de Paul (Louis Abelly, 1664). Elizabeth also translated selections from the Conferences of Vincent de Paul to Daughters of Charity and Notes on the Life of Sister Françoise Bony, D.C., (1694–1759). Also included among the Seton translations are excerpts from selected conferences of Francis de Sales, portions of works by Saint Theresa of Avila, meditations by Rev. Louis Du Pont, S.J., and the beginning of the life of Saint Ignatius of Loyola. Elizabeth had a habit of copying meaningful passages from books she was reading and of making marginal notes in her bible. Her copybooks containing notes from A Commentary on the Book of Psalms (1792) by George Horne, and notes on sermons of Rev. John Henry Hobart. Bibles containing her jottings and marginal notes are preserved in the Rare Books and Special Collections, Hesburgh Library, University of Notre Dame, Indiana, and in the Simon Bruté Collection of the Old Cathedral Library, Vincennes, Indiana.

The Sisters of Charity as a community grew and blossomed into independent new communities in North America: The Sisters of Charity of Saint Vincent de Paul of New York (1846); the Sisters of Charity of Cincinnati (1852); the Sisters of Charity of Saint Vincent de Paul of Halifax (1856); the Sisters of Charity of Saint Elizabeth, Convent Station, New Jersey (1859); and the Sisters of Charity of Seton Hill, Greensburg, Pennsylvania (1870). As a result of mandates from their General Assembly (1829 and 1845) requiring the Sulpicians to return to their founding charism of the education and formation of priests, the Sulpician superiors arranged for the Sisters of Charity of Saint Joseph's to join (1850) the Daughters of Charity of Saint Vincent de Paul of Paris, France. These communities formed (1947) the Conference of Mother Seton's Daughters which developed into The Sisters of Charity Federation in the Vincentian and Setonian Tradition (1996) with member congregations from the United States and Canada. All Federation members are rooted in the rule of Vincent de Paul and Louise de Marillac.

Elizabeth left an enduring legacy, which makes Catholic education available for needy pupils. Popular devotion acclaims Saint Elizabeth Ann Seton as a patron of Catholic schools because of her pioneer role in values-based education.

Elizabeth's vision of faith remains relevant for all ages. Her journey of faith presents an outstanding model for all people. In a letter to her lifelong friend Julia Sitgreaves Scott (1765–1842), Elizabeth summarized her way of life: "Faith lifts the staggering soul on one side, hope supports it on the other, experience says it must be and love says let it be" (March 26, 1810). Saint Elizabeth Ann Seton died Jan. 4, 1821, in the White House at Saint Joseph's Valley, near Emmitsburg, Maryland. Her remains repose there in the Basilica of Saint Elizabeth Ann Seton.

Bibliography: Excerpts from Elizabeth Bayley Seton Papers courtesy of Archives Saint Joseph's Provincial House, Daughters of Charity of Saint Vincent de Paul (Emmitsburg, Maryland). Elizabeth Seton in Dialogue with Her Time and Ours, papers from The Seton Legacy symposium of 1992, Vincentian Heritage 14, no. 3 (1993). Elizabeth Seton: Bridging Centuries Bridging Cultures, papers from The Seton Legacy symposium of 1996/1997, Vincentian Heritage 18, no. 2 (1998). J. I. DIRVIN, C.M., The Soul of Elizabeth

Seton—A Spiritual Portrait (San Francisco 1990). J. I. DIRVIN, C.M., Mrs. Seton: Foundress of the American Sisters of Charity (New York 1962). R. BECHTLE, S.C., and J. METZ, S.C., eds., E. M. KELLY, mss.ed., Elizabeth Bayley Seton Collected Writings, v. 1 (New York 2000). R. BECHTLE, S.C., and J. METZ, S.C., eds., E. M. KELLY, mss.ed., Elizabeth Bayley Seton Collected Writings, v. 2–3 (forthcoming). E. M. KELLY, ed., Elizabeth Seton's Two Bibles. Her Notes and Markings (Huntington, Indiana 1977). E. M. KELLY, Numerous Choirs, v. 1 (Evansville, Indiana 1981). E. M. KELLY and A. MELVILLE, Elizabeth Seton Selected Writings (New York 1987). A. M. MELVILLE, Elizabeth Bayley Seton. 1774–1821, (New York 1951). R. M. LAVERTY, S.C., Loom of Many Threads. The English and French Influences on the Character of Elizabeth Ann Bayley Seton (New York 1958).

[B. A. MCNEIL]

SETON, ROBERT

Archbishop, author; b. Pisa, Italy, Aug. 28, 1839; d. Convent Station, N.J., March 22, 1927. He was the fourth of William and Emily (Prime) Seton's seven children, the grandson of St. Elizabeth Bayley SETON, and cousin of Abp. James Roosevelt BAYLEY. He spent his childhood at Cragdon, the family estate in Westchester County, N.Y. In 1850 he entered Mt. St. Mary's, Emmitsburg, Md., but two years later accompanied his parents to Pau in southern France where he continued his schooling. After his mother died there in 1854, Seton traveled on the Continent and studied in Spain and Germany. In 1857 he went to Rome and entered the Urban College of the Propaganda to study for the priesthood, transferring in 1859 to the North American College as its first student. In 1861 he was enrolled in the Pontifical College of Noble Ecclesiastics and was ordained under the title of patrimony on April 15, 1865. Seton was named a papal chamberlain by Pius IX in 1886 and a prothonotary apostolic in 1867, the first American to be given these honors. In 1867, after receiving his D.D. degree, he returned to the U.S.

Seton became an assistant at the cathedral in Newark, N.J., for a short time and then, because of his health, was given the chaplaincy of St. Elizabeth's, Convent Station, N.J. He was inordinately proud of his name and his distinguished American and Scottish ancestry and considered his role as chief notary at the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore inadequate American recognition of his merits, although he was also chosen to deliver a paper at the Parliament of Religions in 1893. Seton always upheld the authority of Bp. Winand WIGGER, even though he had little personal sympathy with Wigger, whom he considered too German. Although fond of Europe and traveling, he considered himself thoroughly American and thought the church in the U.S. should, wherever possible, accommodate the customs and educational system of the country. He wanted immigrants to learn English and to be thoroughly Americanized.

Seton's belief that there were deliberate efforts to overlook him in the U.S. led him in 1901 to resign his parish of St. Joseph, Jersey City, where he had been since 1876, and go to Rome. The next year he asked Cardinal James Gibbons, whose seal he had designed, to recommend him for a titular archbishopric. On July 5, 1903, he was consecrated titular archbishop of Heliopolis. Archbishop Seton was active in Roman society, but financial reverses reduced his patrimony, forcing him to leave Rome in 1914 because he could no longer live there in the manner to which he was accustomed and which he thought proper to his name and rank. The next years were spent mainly in Europe until 1921, when he returned to St. Elizabeth's Convent where he had been chaplain.

His published works include Essays on Various Subjects Chiefly Roman (1862); Memoir, Letters and Journal of Elizabeth Seton (1869); An Old Family, or the Setons of Scotland and America (1899); Memories of Many Years, 1839–1922 (1923). In Rome he acted as correspondent for the New York Times under the pen name of Fyvie.

Bibliography: J. B. CODE, Dictionary of American Biography, ed. A. JOHNSON and D. MALONE, 20 v. (New York 1928–36; index 1937; 1st suppl. 1944; 2d suppl. 1958), 16:597–598.

[C. D. HINRICHSEN]

SETTIMO, ABBEY OF

Benedictine monastery in the Diocese of Florence in northern Italy. It was founded about the middle of the 10th century by Lothar of Cadolo and was located seven miles outside of Florence (hence the name Settimo, seventh). The Cluniacs were brought in almost immediately and obtained such rich endowments in Tuscany and Emilia that in 1048 the title of count was conferred on the abbot. During this period the monastery was deeply influenced by St. JOHN GUALBERT, but does not appear to have become a VALLOMBROSAN monastery as such. On Feb. 12, 1068, the Vallombrosan monk PETER (IGNEUS) ALDOBRANDINI here sustained the famous ORDEAL by fire. He passed unharmed through a corridor of fire to demonstrate the truth of the accusations of simony made by the monks against the Florentine Bishop Peter of Pavia, called the Mezzabarba (Halfbeard), who was later deposed, but died reconciled to the Church in this same monastery. In 1236 GREGORY IX entrusted the monastery to the Cistercians of SAN GALGANO near Siena, who had the primitive Romanesque church dedicated to Our Lord decorated with frescoes and enlarged the monastery. The monastery achieved its greatest development in the first half of the 14th century, soon followed by decline: for as early as 1435 EUGENE IV had introduced the practice of COMMENDATION. Among the commendatories, who were usually fairly efficient at looking after the well-being of the monastery, was Cardinal Domenico CAPRANICA, founder of the college in Rome that bears his name. In the Renaissance period the monastery buildings were remodeled and enlarged on a grand scale, but spiritually the monastery was of no further substantial importance down to its suppression in 1783. In 1944 the remaining buildings, which had been restored in 1931, suffered severe damage in air raids.

Bibliography: C. C. CALZOLAI, La storia della Badia a Settimo (Florence 1958), with bibliog.

[I. DE PICCOLI]

SEVEN LAST WORDS

Of the seven last words of Jesus from the cross, only the cry of dereliction is found substantially in more than one Gospel (Mt 27.46; Mk 5.34); three are reported independently by Luke (23.34, 43, 46); three others by John (19.26–27, 28, 30). These words are listed here in the order in which they usually appear in the harmonies of the Gospels, since the chronological order in which they were spoken cannot be determined with certainty. Each Evangelist, depending on the Passion narrative found in the early catechesis, has selected, arranged, and elaborated on his material according to his specific plan.

First Word. "Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing" (Lk 23.34). Though not found in a number of important manuscripts, it is almost certainly an authentic word of Jesus. For, as echoed in Acts 7.59–60, forgiveness is one of the most typically Christian themes in the gospel tradition. According to Lk 23.35–37, both Jewish rulers and Roman soldiers see in the Crucifixion the refutation of Jesus' claim to a divine purpose in life. Our Lord's prayer for forgiveness is motivated by their respective ignorance. Basically, ignorance is applicable only to the Roman soldiers who unwittingly carry out the execution. However, from the aspect of SALVATION HISTORY, both Jew and pagan (Acts 3.17; 13.27; 17.30) were blinded to the supreme revelation of God's omnipotence and wisdom in the cross (1 Cor 1.23–24). Biblically, therefore, their combined ignorance is sinful and incurs guilt. But, the ignorance of both Jew and pagan, which serves as a motive for forgiveness, becomes inexcusable after the Resurrection (Acts 17.30–31).

Second Word. "Amen I say to thee, this day thou shalt be with me in paradise" (Lk 23.43). One of the crucified criminals, acknowledging the justice of his condemnation, confesses the innocence of Jesus, thereby eliciting an act of faith in the claim for which Christ dies.

Adopting what is probably the correct reading of Lk 23.42, “Lord, remember me when thou comest in thy kingly power,” the penitent malefactor appeals for pardon at judgment when Jesus returns as king to inaugurate His kingdom. To this request, which looks to the future, Jesus opposes His “today,” promising that the thief would be with Him in paradise.

In early Hebrew thought, to die meant to descend into SHEOL, where the just and the wicked alike endured a miserable existence. Later, when belief arose in retribution even before the Resurrection, divisions appeared in Sheol; a place called GEHENNA was reserved for the wicked, whereas ABRAHAM’S BOSOM (Lk 16.22) became the abode of the just. Although paradise in Jewish thought at the time is not equivalent to heaven, in this context of Christ coming immediately in His royal power, the penitent is assured of happiness by being with Him.

Third Word. “Woman, behold thy son. . . . Behold thy mother” (Jn 19.26–27). John, who has put meaningful Old Testament words on Jesus’ lips or has seen deeper meaning in what Jesus endured (19.24, 28, 36, 37), certainly intended to have Jesus express by these words something more than filial piety. Here, as well as in 2.1–11, Mary is addressed by her Son as “woman.” The strangeness of the address is due to John’s theological intentions. The word, “woman,” aptly portrays Johannine symbolism with regard to Mary’s role in giving life to the “Life-giver.” As Adam calls his wife “Life” (Ζωή) in Gn 3.20, because she is the “mother of all living,” similarly John suppresses Mary’s name, calling her simply “woman,” in order to present her as the new Eve, the mother of all whom Jesus loves in the person of “the disciple whom he loved.” John also never mentions this Disciple’s name in order to emphasize his symbolic role. Thus, John proclaims the spiritual motherhood of Mary, the new Eve, with regard to the faithful represented by the beloved disciple.

Fourth Word. “Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani?” In the Greek transliteration of their Semitic form, the words of Jesus, “My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me” (Mt 27.46; Mk 15.34), appear differently in Matthew (ἦλὶ ἦλὶ λεμὰ σαβαχθάνι) and Mark (ἐλωὶ ἐλωὶ λαμὰ σαβαχθάνι). Mark’s is a more Aramaic rendition of the opening words of Psalm 21(22): ’ēlî ’ēlî lāmâ ’ăzabtānî, while Matthew’s is a mixture of Aramaic and Hebrew. Palestinian tradition would naturally have preserved the saying in Aramaic; but because the bystanders in Mt 27.47 and Mk 15.35 appear to have confused the first words with the Hebrew form of Elia’s name (’ēlîyâ), it is more likely that Jesus Himself uttered the cry in Hebrew, not Aramaic.

Totally unacceptable are the interpretations that treat the saying as a cry of despair and see in Christ’s abandonment a dissolution of the HYPOSTATIC UNION, a withdrawal of grace from His soul, or a cessation of the beatific vision. These views are inconsistent with the love of God and with a proper understanding of the hypostatic union, and they are without foundation in Scripture. Much more acceptable is the view that, in the light of Psalm 21(22) as a whole, sees in the cry a final utterance of unshaken faith in God. Though the Psalmist, perplexed by God’s abandoning him to his enemies, begins with a lament (v. 2–22), he does not despair. Rather, anticipating deliverance, he moves to a hymn of thanksgiving, calling upon all that fear God to join in adoration (v. 23–27). Finally, the conclusion (v. 28–32), which has points of contact with Deutero-Isaia, triumphantly proclaims that the suffering and vindication of the just will bring others to acknowledge God’s mercy, thereby hastening the establishment of God’s kingdom on earth.

That the interpretation of the saying lies in this direction is supported by the inspired witness of the early Church. Jesus Himself probably uttered only the opening words of the Psalm, whereas the Evangelists used the entire Psalm as an OT “testimony” (see TESTIMONIA) to line Passion. Thus, the godless who “wag their heads” (v. 8–9) are mentioned in Mk 15.29, their words of mockery being placed in the mouths of the chief priests in Mt 27.43; in Jn 19.24 the dividing of Christ’s garments is clearly understood as a fulfillment of Ps 21 (22).19; lastly, in Heb 2.12 the same words of thanksgiving (v. 23) are put on Christ’s lips.

Although the allusions to the Psalm correspond to the historical facts, it was used primarily to indicate that all had taken place according to God’s will as revealed in Scripture. Consequently, if Christ’s lament is recorded at all, it is not meant to describe His collapse, but rather to show that God’s eternal counsel of salvation was being fulfilled. This fulfillment far transcends the prophetic outline presented in the Psalm: the conversion of nations follows, not only because of the manifestation of God’s justice in the sufferer’s deliverance, but in consequence of his suffering. Only in the Suffering Servant (Is 52.13–53.12), i.e., in Jesus Himself, is the full redemptive mission of suffering accomplished (see SUFFERING SERVANT, SONGS OF THE); only through Him is God’s kingdom definitively established.

Fifth Word. “I thirst” (Jn 19.28). John records Jesus’ thirst to bear witness to His humanity against DOCETISM and to show the fulfillment of God’s plan. Vinegar or sour wine, the soldiers’ ordinary drink, is given Christ. John intends to teach a deeper meaning in this reference to Ps 68(69).22: “In my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink.” Since the Psalm describes the just oppressed man, typical of the poor lowly ones whose prayers God hears (v. 33–35), Jesus on the cross fulfills the Father’s plan of salvation for His poor by drinking the cup that the Father has given Him (Jn 18.11; cf. Lk 24.25–27, 44–46).

Sixth Word. Having received the bitter wine, “Jesus said: ‘It is consummated,’ and, bowing his head, he gave up his spirit” (Jn 19.30). Instead of the first two Gospels’ cry of dereliction, John uses the highly significant word τετέλεσται, whose dominant meaning is “to bring to completion,” “to fulfill.” The completion of the work entrusted by the Father to Jesus is defined as the disclosure of God’s “name” and the deliverance of His words to the Disciples (17.3–8). His mission is accomplished by transforming mankind and by opening up to it a truly spiritual or divine life through His death. The completion of His self-oblation (17.19) is the means of man’s rebirth into eternal life. In this context, the unusual phrase “he gave up his spirit,” emphasizes John’s theme that through Jesus’ death His Spirit was given to men to take away the sin of the world and to make all those who believe in Him God’s sons (1.29–34; 1.12–13).

Seventh Word. “Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit” (Lk 23.46). Luke substitutes for the cry of dereliction an expression of trust and faith [Ps 30(31).6]. Jesus’ supreme surrender is made not in anguish and desolation, but in the confident submission of the Son of Man to His heavenly Father’s plan of redemption. He willingly entrusts His life to His Father, crowning a life of obedience with His sacrifice of supreme love.

Bibliography: H. CONZELMANN, Theology of St. Luke, tr. G. BUSWELL (London 1960). C. H. DODD, The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge, England 1953). F. M. BRAUN, La Mère des fidèles (Tournai 1953).

[S. MAKAREWICZ]

SEVEN SLEEPERS OF EPHEBUS

According to a pious legend, stemming perhaps from the 6th century, seven early Christian Ephesians who were walled up in a cave near their city when taking refuge from the persecution of Decius. Their names, with certain variations, were Maximian, Malchus, Marcion, Denis, John, Serapion, and Constantine. To shield them from the wrath of the emperor, according to the story, God put them to sleep. Some 200 years later the seven Ephesians awakened and found that their city had become Christian. Discovered by the astonished citizenry of Ephesus, the seven sleepers promptly died and were venerated as saints. BARONIUS, in the 16th century, challenged the authenticity of the story, which, as recorded by Jacob of Serugh and GREGORY OF TOURS, had enjoyed great popularity in the East and the West. H. Thurston and D. Attwater describe it as a Christianization of a pagan or Jewish legend closely akin to the tale of Rip Van Winkle.

Bibliography: H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d’archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 15.1:1251–62. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 3:193–196. F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 1246.

[E. DAY]

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS

The Seventh-Day Adventists is the largest of the ADVENTIST groups stemming from the preaching of William MILLER (1782–1849).

Origin. When Miller’s predictions of the Second Coming of Christ in 1843 and 1844 failed to materialize, most of his followers returned to their former churches or abandoned religion. A few continued to believe that the end of the world was near. One group restudied the Biblical prophecies regarding time and concluded that they indicated mother event—the beginning of the final judgment—and that the Second Coming was still imminent, but the day and hour unpredictable. Through the persuasion of a Seventh Day Baptist, a group of Adventists in Washington, N.H., became convinced that Saturday, not Sunday, was still the Sabbath commanded by God. This belief was accepted by Joseph Bates, Joshua Himes, Hiram Edson, and James and Ellen White, who formed the nucleus of what is now known as the Seventh-day Adventist Church. James White later served as president of the general conference of Seventh-day Adventists after the denomination was organized at Battle Creek, Mich., in 1863, although the first president was John Byington, a former Methodist minister. Mrs. Ellen G. White (1827–1915) exercised a dominant influence on the sect for many years. Much of the instruction Mrs. White gave the church derived from visions that she experienced while in a state of trance. Such instruction is considered by this church as inspired. She related one such vision in which the commandment to keep holy the Sabbath was surrounded by a halo to indicate its paramount importance; according to her, the change to Sunday was introduced by the anti-Christ or papacy. Under her guidance the tiny band of dispirited Adventists grew into a strong, organized body.

A unique practice that sets Seventh-day Adventists apart from other Christian churches is the observance of the Sabbath from sundown Friday to sundown Saturday. All unnecessary work, including cooking, is avoided as in Jewish households during these hours. Members attend church and Sabbath school on Friday evening and Saturday morning.

Bibliography: L. E. FROOM, The Prophetic Faith of Our Fathers, 4 v. (Washington 1946–54). F. D. NICHOL, The Midnight Cry (Washington 1944). A. E. LICKEY, Highways to Truth (Washington 1952). B. HERNDON, The Seventh Day (New York 1960). Seventh-Day Adventists Answer Questions on Doctrine (Washington 1957). A. W. SPALDING, Captains of the Host, 2 v. (Washington 1949).

[W. J. WHALEN/EDS.]

SEVENTY-FOUR TITLES, COLLECTION OF

A compilation of 315 capitula or ordinances distributed unequally under seventy-four titles, the whole entitled Diversorum patrum sententie. The important titles are: 1, 2, on the primacy of the Roman Church; 3, 4, on monastic and ecclesiastical privileges; 5–14, clerical immunity, accusation, and trial; 15, unworthy clergy; 16–21, entry to the priesthood and episcopacy; 22, 23, the Roman pontificate; 59–61, prohibition of lay control of church property. Seventy-four Titles is a well-ordered collection down to title 28, chapter 202. One group of manuscripts, known as the Swabian group, contains 15 additional titles (chapters 316–330) on excommunication. The author of this addition was probably BERNOLD OF CONSTANCE (c. 1090).

This collection was probably compiled about 1074 at Rome. The unknown author belonged to the circle of reformers influenced by the ideas of Cardinal HUMBERT OF SILVA CANDIDA (d. 1061). The collection had three main influences: (1) it spread the notion of Roman primacy and clerical independence of secular power; (2) it presented a convenient text for papal legates, abbey, and churches that opposed lay influence or wanted to reform lax clergy; (3) it was a model and main source of many later collections, including those of St. ANSELM II OF LUCCA, St. IVO OF CHARTRES, the unpublished Collection in Four Books, the Polycarpus, and possibly the Decretum of GRATIAN. The Seventy-four Titles exists in some form or other in more than 60 manuscripts: the best text is given in the Namur 5 and Monte Cassino 522.

The majority of the capitula come from papal sources or were papal oriented. The FALSE DECRETALS was the formal source of some 259 chapters. This helped to popularize the False Decretals in Italy and elsewhere. Burchard of Worms was not used as a source, although later collections combined the Seventy-four Titles, Burchard, and canons of the councils.

The Seventy-four Titles' influence in the period c. 1076–1141 was not merely in canonical collections already listed, but upon ideas and in polemical writings, e.g., BERNOLD OF CONSTANCE and MANEGOLD OF LAUTENBACH. In 1525 Johannes COCHLAEUS printed title 1, and thereafter there were spasmodic references until Theiner (1836), Thaner (1878), and the important article by Fournier (1894). In recent years the work of Anton Michel, especially Die Sentenzen des Kardinals Humbert: Das erste Rechtsbuch der päpstlichen Reform (Leipzig 1943), has created a new interest and controversy about the Seventy-four Titles.

William Miller, founder of the Seventh-Day Adventists. (Archive Photos)

Bibliography: A. M. STICKLER, Historia iuris canonici latini: Vol. 1, Historia fontium (Turin 1950) 1:170–172, 187. J. AUTENRIETH, “Bernold von Konstanz und die erweiterte 74-Titelsammlung,” Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 14 (1958) 375–394. J. T. GILCHRIST, “Canon Law Aspects of the Eleventh Century Gregorian Reform Programme,” The Journal of Ecclesiastical History 13 (1962) 21–38.

[J. T. GILCHRIST]

SEVENTY WEEKS OF YEARS

A term given to the cryptic passage of Dn 9.24–27 in which such a period represents the length of Judah's afflictions. Jeremiah (25.11; 29.10), in God's name, foretold that, after 70 years (to be taken as a round number) of exile, the people of Judah would be restored to prosperity in Palestine. The prophecy was really fulfilled by their repatriation under Cyrus in 538 B.C. (2 Chr 36.20–22; Ez 1.1–2; see also Is 40.2), yet only in an imperfect manner (Zec 1.12). After the return from Exile came trials and, under Antiochus IV Epiphanes, persecution, so that it was felt that a deeper meaning was implied by the prophecy of Jeremiah. In the apocalyptic passage of Dn 9.24–27, composed c. 164 B.C., the prophecy is reinterpreted midrashically, but in conformity with a fundamental idea of Hebrew religion (cf. Lv 26.18, 24, 27–28) as meaning, not 70 years, but 70 weeks of years, i.e., 490 years. Three theories that have been proposed to explain the final week of Daniel’s apocalyptic vision would place it respectively in the Maccabean, the Roman, or the eschatological age.

Maccabean age. Some scholars understand the final week to refer to the period and persecution of the Syrian King ANTIOCHUS IV Epiphanes (170–164 B.C.). The 70 weeks are divided in Daniel as composed of three distinct periods of 7 + 62 + 1. According to this theory the first period, “the utterance of the word” (v. 25), would begin in 587 B.C. when the prophetic word to Jeremiah began to take effect at the beginning of the exile rather than in 605 (Jer 25.11) or 598 (29.10) when Jeremiah uttered the prophecy. The first period (49 years), i.e., the Exile, ends with “one who is anointed and a leader,” who could have been CYRUS (cf. Is 45.1), or JOSHUA son of Josedech, or Zerubbabel (Hg 1.1; Zec 3.1), all from c. 538 B.C. The second period of 62 weeks (434 years) runs from c. 538 to “the cutting down of an anointed one” (v. 26), i.e., the treacherous murder of the pious high priest Onias III at Daphne, near Antioch, in 170 B.C. (2 Mc 4.30–38; cf. Dn 11.22). Daniel’s 434 years are actually 66 too many. The 62 weeks, like Jeremiah’s 70 years, may be a round number, or the author might have been working with some current, though inexact chronology for the Persian period. Even the Jewish historians Demetrius (c. 200 B.C.) and Josephus (Ant. 20.10.2) err respectively by excess of 70 and 60 years. The final week covers the relations of Antiochus with the Jews (170–164 B.C.) in a manner similar to that of Dn 7.7–8, 23–26; 8.8–25; 11.28–39. In the middle of the week, i.e., in 167 B.C., the Temple was desecrated by the “horrible abomination” (Dn 7.25; 11.31).

The Maccabean chronology, then, is that which is indicated by the general context of the book of Daniel and is, in fact, the oldest attested interpretation of his apocalyptic vision, since it is that of 1 Mc 1.54, 59 (c. 100 B.C.), of the Septuagint rendering of Dn 9.24–27 [see Fraidl, 4–27; A. Bludau, Die alex. Uebersetzung des B. Daniel, Biblische Studien 2 (Freiburg 1897) 104–130], and probably of 1 Enoch ch. 85–90, esp. 89.59; 90.14 (see Fraidl, 11–15). It is the view now almost universally defended.

Roman Age. Another view is that Daniel’s apocalyptic vision was fulfilled in the events of the beginning of the Christian Era. Jewish exegesis saw the fulfillment in the Jewish wars of A.D. 67–70 (attested already in Josephus; see Fraidl, 18–23, and cf. Mt 24.15; Mk 13.14) and A.D. 132–135. Traditional Christian exegesis, traceable back only to the end of the 2d Christian century, though varying in details, would take Dn 9.24–27 as a prophecy of the advent, ministry, and death of Christ. This Christological exegesis has affected the PESHITTA and Vulgate renderings of the passage. In general its supporters take 7 + 62 weeks as one period of 483 years, which is made to begin with some Persian decree, e.g., that of Artaxerxes I in 458 B.C. This is exactly 483 years before Christ’s ministry, and the prophecy is considered to contain an exact chronology of the life and death of Jesus. The theory, unfortunately, explains Dn 9.24–27 outside the general Maccabean context of the book; it takes 7 + 62 less naturally as one period and views the entire 70 weeks as beginning at a different date from Jeremiah’s 70 years. If the vision is an exact prophecy of the date of Christ’s ministry, it is surprising that no use was made of it in the NT or in early Christian apologetics. This “traditional” exegesis, challenged from the 16th century onward, is now rarely defended; see, however, G. Cloesen, Verbum Domini 18 (1938) 47–56, 115–125.

Eschatological Age. Some would see in the vision a prophecy of the end of the world; cf. 2 Thes 2.4. Though the theory was defended by certain Church Fathers (see Bigot, 76–77), it is now universally abandoned. Some of the images of the passage, can, of course, be taken as types of eschatological events.

Bibliography: Commentaries on Dn 9.24–27. J. A. MONTGOMERY (International Critical Commentary 22; 1927) 390–401. S. R. DRIVER (Cambridge, England 1901) 143–150. G. RINALDI (4th ed. Milan 1962) 131–135, bibliog. 33–34. F. FRAIDL, Die Exegese der siebenzig Wochen Daniels in der alten und mittleren Zeit (Graz 1883). L. BIGOT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 4.1:75–103. M. G. GRUENTHNER, “The Seventy Weeks,” The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 1 (Washington 1939) 44–54. J. T. NELIS, Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, translated and adapted by L. HARTMAN (New York, 1963) 2569–72.

[M. MCNAMARA]

SEVERIAN OF GABALA

Bishop of Gabala, Syria, opponent of St. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM; b. 4th century; d. after 408. Although he was bishop of Gabala, Severian’s ambitions demanded more than provincial success. Inspired by the good fortune of Antiochus of Ptolemais at CONSTANTINOPLE, he went to the imperial capital c. 401. Well received by Chrysostom, Severian won popularity with the people and the imperial court by his oratory; and when Chrysostom visited Asia in 401, he left nominal authority with Severian, although he gave real power to Serapion, his archdeacon. Severian reacted angrily to Serapion's report that he had been attempting to undermine Chrysostom. On his return, Chrysostom induced Severian to leave for his own diocese; but the imperial court recalled him to Constantinople, and the Empress Eudoxia forced Chrysostom to receive him, although no genuine reconciliation was effected.

Severian served as accuser and judge of Chrysostom at the Synod of the OAK, charging him with stirring clerical leaders against himself, and he was in part responsible for Chrysostom's first exile. This gained him general unpopularity; and when Chrysostom returned from exile, Severian and his friends fled from the capital.

Severian accused Chrysostom a second time, contending that he had burned his own church, and warned Emperor Arcadius (June 404) that there would be no peace in Constantinople until Chrysostom was removed. Working with Acacius of Beroea, Paul of Heraclea, Antiochus of Ptolemais, and Cyrinus of Chalcedon, he finally effected the second exile of Chrysostom. His last recorded act is his demand that Chrysostom be removed from Cucusus, which he considered too mild as a place of exile (407). Severian left Constantinople probably after 408 and returned to his diocese of Gabala; there is no evidence concerning his subsequent life.

Severian was a productive writer, influenced by the theology of the school of ANTIOCH. Many of his works have survived, ironically, under the name of his enemy, John Chrysostom. While Severian was no great thinker, his writings indicate that he knew the Scriptures well, was an able Biblical exegete, and was a popular speaker of at least moderate talents, although he possessed a slightly rough voice and a pronounced Syrian accent. He is remembered not for the importance of his writings, but for his struggle against Chrysostom.

Severian's homilies have survived in Greek, Syriac, Armenian, Arabic, and Coptic versions. Among the Greek homilies are Orationes sex in mundi creationem; Hom. in illud Abrahæ dictum Gen. 24, 2; Hom. in dictum illud Matth. 21, 23; Hom. de ficu arefacta; Hom. de sigillis librorum; Hom. de pace; In Dei apparitionem; De serpente quem Moyses in cruce suspendit; and Contra Judæos. In addition, fragments of his commentary on the Epistles of St. Paul have been preserved.

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1857–66) 56:411–564; 59:585–590; 63:531–550. J. QUASTEN, Patrology (Westminster, Maryland 1950–) 3:484–486. G. BARDY, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 14.2:2000–06. H. D. ALTENDORF, Untersuchungen zu Severian von Gabala (Diss. U. of Tübingen 1957). C. BAUR, John Chrysostom and His Time, tr. M. GONZAGA, 2 v. (Westminster, Md. 1960) 2:155–164. B. MARX, Orientalia Christiana periodica 5 (1939) 281–367, works attributed to Chrysostom.

[W. E. KAEGI, JR.]

SEVERIN, SS.

The name of several saints in the early Church.

Severin, abbot and apostle of Noricum; d. Jan. 8, 482. He was an Oriental monk of Latin origin, who for 30 years evangelized the lands surrounding Comagene and Astura (modern Stockerau and Hainburg on the banks of the Danube and Inn rivers in modern Bavaria). He founded a monastery at Boiotro near Passau and another at Faviana, where he died. When Odoacer repatriated the Romans, the monks transported Severin's body to Luculanum, near Naples (488), and later his relics were placed in the Benedictine monastery of S. Severino in Naples (910). Eugippius wrote his life.

Feast: Jan. 8.

Severin, sixth-century bishop of Septempeda in the Marches of Ancona; d. Ancona, 540. The town of Ancona changed its name to San Severino.

Feast: June 8.

Severin, abbot and confessor; d. Chateau-Landon, near Sens, France, 507. He is the abbot of the Monastery of Agaunum credited with a miraculous cure of CLOVIS I, King of the Franks, and is probably identical with the St. Severin, hermit (feast, Nov. 27), after whom the church in Paris takes its name.

Feast: Feb. 11.

Severin, fifth-century bishop of Treves. He replaced (St.) Amand as bishop of Bordeaux and died there. In 587 Venantius Fortunatus wrote his life.

Feast: Oct. 23.

Severin, venerated as an ancient protector of Cologne. GREGORY OF TOURS praises him for his virtue. Legend made him an opponent of Arianism in Tongres and placed his death in Bordeaux, whence his relics were translated to Cologne.

Feast: October 10.

Bibliography: EUGIPIUS, Vita, ed. P. KNOELL (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 9.2; Vienna 1886). V. FORTUNATO, Vita, ed. W. LEVISON (Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum 7.1; Berlin 1919) 205–224. G. PELLOSO, A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico, 3 v. (Turin 1954–58) 3:833–834. M. HEUWEISER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. M. BUCHBERGER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1930–38) 9:506–507.

[A. DANET]

SEVERINUS, POPE

Pontificate: May 28 to Aug. 2, 640; b. unknown; d. August 640. Very little is known about him. He was Roman and the son of a man named Avienus, but there is no other information relating to his early life. Also the short duration of his reign makes his pontificate virtually impossible to assess. It is clear, however, that he was of an advanced age when he was elected to the chair of Peter and that his consecration as pope was hampered by his refusal to sign a Monothelite declaration of faith called the Ekthesis.

After the required three days had elapsed following the death of Honorius I, Severinus was elected pope in mid-October 638. Yet he had to wait nearly 20 months for his consecration because Emperor Heraclius demanded that the pope-elect must adhere to the Ekthesis. Since Severinus was perhaps better informed than his predecessor was about the eastern objections to monothelitism, he refused to sign the document. Since Isaac, the exarch of Ravenna, refused to allow his consecration, papal envoys were sent to Constantinople, where they began protracted negotiations for Severinus's confirmation.

While the papal envoys were being detained by the emperor, Severinus weathered a series of attacks that may have been intended to force his adherence to the Ekthesis. The violence began when Isaac's military registrar, Maurice, incited a mob of angry soldiers to attack the Lateran Palace. Apparently, the soldiers had not been paid for some time and Maurice took advantage of the situation by convincing them that their arrears of pay were held in the papal treasures. The rumor had its effect, and although Severinus himself was not hurt, the disaffected troops besieged the palace for three days. The situation did not improve with the arrival of Isaac. Ostensibly, his presence was meant to alleviate the situation, but upon gaining access to the Lateran Palace, he plundered the papal treasures and divided it among his soldiers, his officials, and Emperor Heraclius.

The papal envoys in Constantinople obtained confirmation for Severinus in June, but it came too late as the aged pope would only live for two more months. It is not at all clear as to whether Severinus found the time to officially condemn the Ekthesis and reports that he did so should be viewed cautiously. Apparently, Severinus opposed the pro-monastic policies of Gregory I, and he held the secular clergy in high regard. In the Liber pontificalis Severinus is described as, "holy, kind to all men, a lover of the poor, generous, and the mildest of men." Severinus was buried in St. Peter's, the apse of which he is credited with having rebuilt.

Bibliography: Patrologia latina ed. P. MIGNE (Paris 1844–1864) 129:583–586. Liber Pontificalis ed. L. DUCHESNE

(Paris 1957). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (Oxford 1986). F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste 2 (Munich 1955) 56–57.

[J. A. SHEPPARD]

SEVEROLI, ANTONIO GABRIELE

Cardinal, diplomat; b. Faenza, Italy, Feb. 28, 1757; d. Rome, Sept. 8, 1824. The count of Severoli was bishop of Fano (1787–1801), titular archbishop of Petra (1801), and nuncio to Vienna (1801–16), where relations with the Holy See were strained because of persistent JOSEPHINISM at the imperial court. After Severoli made known the papal brief deploring the secularization of ecclesiastical states in Germany and disapproved the monarchy's exercise of jurisdiction in Church affairs, the minister Count Cobenzl, who was particularly opposed to him, sought his removal. Rome refused. His position improved after the fall of Cobenzl and the accession of Metternich as foreign minister (1809). Severoli was one of two nuncios who remained at their posts during the captivity of PIUS VII. He was active in the reorganization of the Church in Germany and strove to prevent excessive Austrian influence in the States of the Church, but a coldness eventually developed between him and Cardinal CONSALVI, secretary of state. Created cardinal in 1816, he directed zealously the see of Viterbo (1817–24), to which he had been appointed in 1808. At the conclave in 1823 Austria vetoed his candidacy when he was only six votes short of being elected pope.

Bibliography: G. MORONI, Dizionario de erudizione storico-ecclesiastica, 103 v. in 53 (Venice 1840–61); index, 6 v. (1878–79) 65:48–54. M. PETROCCHI, La restaurazione: Il cardinale Consalvi e la riforma del 1816 (Florence 1941).

[A. RANDALL]

SEVERUS IBN AL-MUKAFFA'

Arabic-writing Coptic author of the mid-tenth century. After occupying certain public offices, Severus became a monk and was later (in 987) named bishop of Ushmunein in Upper Egypt. With him began, strictly speaking, the second period of Coptic literature, that is, literature written by Copts in Arabic. He composed many theological and polemical works, most of which are still unedited and some now lost. He is especially known for his History of the Patriarchs, i.e., the patriarchs of Alexandria from the legendary first patriarch, St. Mark, to the contemporary, Philotheus (976–979). The principal sources used for the early period were the writings of Eusebius of Caesarea, a Sahidic–Coptic history of the patri-archs, and the biographies written by George and by John of Nikiu. Severus's work was continued by other historians, until it formed a sort of official history of the patriarchate of Alexandria, not unlike the Liber pontificalis of the Roman Church. Despite its critical defects, the work of Severus is of much value for its information on the church, not only in Egypt, but also in Nubia and Ethiopia. Some of his writings have been translated into Syriac and Ethiopic.

Severus's History of the Patriarchs was published by C. F. Seybold in Corpus scriptorum christianorum orientaliū, Script. Ar. Ser. 3, v.9 (Paris 1904–10) and by B. Evetts in Patrologia Orientalis 1.2–4, 5.1, 10.5; the latter edition was continued by Yassā 'Abd al-Masiḥ, 'Aziz Suryal 'Aṭīya, and O. H. E. Burmester (Cairo 1943–59); a Latin translation of the work by E. Renaudot was published at Paris (1713). Other works of Severus are: The Book of the Councils, ed. P. Chébli, Patrologia Orientalis 3:121–242; The Second Book of the Councils (completed in A.D. 955), ed. L. Leroy, Patrologia Orientalis 6.4 (1900), with a study by S. Grebaut of the Ethiopic version (ibid. 601–639); The Book of the Exposition (14 treatises on the Christian religion), ed. Murkus Girḡis (Cairo 1925).

Bibliography: G. GRAF, Orientalia Christiana periodica 3 (1937) 49–77; Geschichte der christlichen arabischen Literatur 2:300–318. J. ASSFALG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 9:703.

[P. BELLET]

SEVERUS OF ANTIOCH

Monophysite theologian, patriarch of Antioch (512–518), honored in the Coptic Church as a saint and martyr; b. Sozopolis in Pisidia, c. 465; d. Xoīs, Egypt, 538. Considered the founder of MONOPHYSITISM as a theological system, Severus was of Greek parentage and studied rhetoric in Alexandria and law at Beirut. A companion of Zachary the Rhetor, he was baptized in 488 at Leontinum in Libya. He then devoted himself to a strict life of asceticism, first in a Monophysite monastery near Maiuma, Palestine, then as a solitary, finally founding his own monastery near Gaza. He was ordained by the exiled Bishop Epiphanius of Magydos in Pamphilia.

Originally opposed to the HENOTICON, Severus journeyed to Constantinople in 509 to complain of persecution by the converted Chalcedonian, Nephalius, agent of Patriarch ELIAS OF JERUSALEM, and became a confidant of the Emperor ANASTASIUS I, accepted the Henoticon, and wrote against the EUTYCHES, the Messalians, and Chalcedonians. Rejected by the populace as successor to MACEDONIUS of Constantinople, he was consecrated patriarch of Antioch on Nov. 6, 512, by the metropolitans of Tarsus and Mabbugh (PHILOXENUS) after a council at Laodicea had deposed the Catholic Patriarch Flavian. As a moderate Monophysite, he was repudiated by both the Catholics and the extreme Monophysites; however, by his oratory, writing, and asceticism he achieved a reputation for profound learning and holiness among the clergy and the people of both Syria and Egypt.

Upon the accession of JUSTIN I in 518, he fled to Egypt. There he organized resistance to the imperial policy and served as leader of the Monophysite movement. Secretly supported by Empress Theodora, he returned to Constantinople in 535 and entered into close relations with the Patriarch ANTHIMUS until the latter was deposed by Pope AGAPETUS I in 536. Severus, when his writings were condemned by Justinian (in the Edict of Aug. 6, 536), fled once more to Egypt.

His vast literary output, written in Greek, has been preserved only partially in ancient Syriac. His Philalethes (509 or 511) was a commentary on 244 chapters of St. CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA's Christological doctrine, quoted against Severus by an anonymous Chalcedonian. He wrote a tract, the Contra impium grammaticum, against JOHN THE GRAMMARIAN OF CAESAREA (fl. A.D. 500), and the two Orationes ad Nephaliū directed against the Catholic interpretation of patristic Christology. His four letters to Sergius were anti-Eutychian polemics. In his Antijulianistica, he composed four works against the teaching of JULIAN OF HALICARNASSUS on the incorruptibility of Christ's body (Aphthartodocetism).

Of his sermons as patriarch of Antioch, 125 cathedral homilies have been preserved, as well as 4,000 of his letters in Syriac along with liturgical writings, hymns and an Octoechos, or collection of prayers, including the Marian oration Sub tuum praesidium. He is the first author to mention the writings of PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS. His biography was written by Zachary the Rhetor (early life to 512) and John of Beit-Aphthonia.

A polemicist in all his writings, Severus professed to follow incontestably the doctrine of St. Cyril, and he demonstrates an exceptional knowledge of Scripture and the writings of the early Fathers. His book against John the Grammarian contains an extremely rich florilegia of patristic texts (1,250 citations). Inconsistent in the use of the terms physis, hypostasis, and prosopon (nature, substance, and person), he admits the two natures in Christ: "When the hypostatic union which is perfected of the two [natures] is confessed, there is but one Christ without admixture; one person, one hypostasis, one nature, that of the Word Incarnate" (Ep. ad Sergium, in Lebon, 243). But if, on the contrary, in thought, one asserts that Christ is in two natures, one has not only two natures, but also two hypostases and two persons (Patrologia Graeca, 161 v. [Paris 1857–66] 86:908). “There is but one sole complete being, one sole hypostasis composed of two [natures]” (Contra imp. gram. 2.6).

In the final analysis, the thought of Severus on the person of Christ and the COMMUNICATION OF IDIOMS is compatible with that of Pope LEO I and the Council of Chalcedon, although Severus had rejected the Chalcedonian terminology as Nestorian while totally opposing the extreme Monophysitism of the Eutychians.

Bibliography: SEVERUS OF ANTIOCH, Liber contra impium grammaticum, ed. J. LEBON, 3 v. in 6 in Corpus scriptorum Christianorum orientalium (Paris-Louvain 1903) 93–94, 101–102, 111–112, Scriptores Syri ser. 4.4–6; 1929–38; Orationes ad Nephaliu: Eiusdem, ad Sergii Grammatici epistulae mutuae, ed. J. LEBON, 2 v. in ibid. 119–120, Scriptores Syri ser. 4.7; 1949; Antifilianistica, ed. A. SANDA (Beirut 1931). R. DRAGUET, “Une Pastorale antijulianiste des environs de 530,” Muséon 40 (1927): 75–92. M. A. KUGENER, “Allocution prononcée par Sévère après son élévation le trône patriarcal d’Antioche,” Oriens Christianus 2 (1902): 265–282. B. ALTANER, Patrology (New York 1960) 610–612. G. BARDY, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 14.2:1988–2000. R. HESPEL, ed., Le Florilège cyrillien réfuté par Sévère d’Antioche: Étude et édition critique (Bibliothèque du Muséon 37; Louvain 1955); ed. and tr., Sévère d’Antioche: Le Philalèthe in Corpus scriptorum Christianorum orientalium (Paris-Louvain 1903) 133–134, Scriptores Syri ser. 68–69; 1952.

[A. PENNA]

SEWAL DE BOVILL

Archbishop, champion of the rights of the English church against the papacy; d. York, May 10, 1258. Having been a contemporary of EDMUND OF ABINGDON at OXFORD where he studied theology and Canon Law, Sewal became chancellor of the university on May 11, 1244, archdeacon of York from 1245 to 1247, and then dean in 1247. He was elected archbishop of YORK in 1255 and consecrated in 1256 after obtaining papal dispensation on account of his illegitimacy. The writings attributed to him by Bishop Bale “are probably plausible creations of Bale’s imagination” (A.B. Emden), while the synodal statutes attributed to him were probably those of his successor, Abp. Godfrey Ludham. He resisted the pope’s intrusion of an Italian as his successor in the deanery of York and suffered papal excommunication. He thereby won the approval of the antipapal, contemporary chronicler, Matthew PARIS, who said that as much as he was cursed by the pope he was blessed by the people. He refused to collate the prebends of his cathedral to foreigners at the pope’s will; thus, like Bp. Robert GROSSETESTE, he set himself against what many Englishmen regarded as an abuse of papal authority (see PROVISION). His correspondence with the Franciscan, Adam Marsh in 1256 further suggests that he belonged to the party that viewed with disfavor papal taxation and royal support for it.

Bibliography: M. PARIS, Chronica majora, ed. H. R. LUARD, 7 v. (Rolls Series 57; 1872–83) v.5. C. L. KINGSFORD, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 17:1217. A.B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 1:233–234. M. GIBBS and J. LANG, Bishops and Reform, 1215–1272 (London 1934; repr. 1962).

[H. MAYR-HARTING]

SEX

Viewed at the biological level, sex is a differentiation that occurs in animals of the higher types and renders each individual either male or female. The same hormones (in different proportions for male and female) are responsible for both the sex characteristics and the development of the spermatozoa and ova that together generate new life. In some lower animals, known as hermaphrodites, male and female characteristics can be exhibited by one and the same individual. In humans, the differences are determined at the time of fertilization and are recognizable, through life, by distinctive physiological, biochemical, and psychological features.

This article is not concerned primarily with the biology, psychology, or sociology of sex, but rather with its philosophy and theology as these are viewed by Catholics. It explains the sex urge in man, its peculiarly human character, its place in marriage, and its inseparable link to the procreation of the human race.

Sexual Urge. An unprejudiced analysis of the biological phenomenon of sex reveals its radical difference from other instincts. In man it is more an urge than an instinct since, although it arises in man without his conscious will, unlike animals he has the capacity to direct it. This is true of instincts such as hunger, thirst, and the need for sleep but there is a more comprehensive dimension to the sex urge. The fact that every human is either male or female, means that a person’s whole being is oriented in a particular way within as well as outward to persons of the opposite sex. The need men and women have for each other shows that the sexual urge does not arise from the attraction of the sexes; rather, masculinity and femininity are for the sake of the sex urge. It is a manifestation of the contingent nature of the human person who can fulfill himself only through encountering another person (Wojtyła, Love and Responsibility, 45–49).

The normal sexual urge is always directed to a person of the opposite sex not just to the sexual attribute of the person. It is this personal dimension of the sexual urge, which provides the framework for love. The sexual urge is also supra-personal and has an existential value because it is the vehicle for prolonging the species (Wojtyła, Love and Responsibility, 51–53). The love that grows out of the sex urge is not purely biological or even psychological. It is given its defining form by acts of the will, which is the property of the person. Since each human person is sui iuris, that is, no one can will for him, it violates the person's nature to treat him simply as an object, especially a sexual object.

The total nature of sexual love is revealed in sexual ecstasy, which goes to the very depth of bodily existence. It has in its overwhelming power something extraordinary, to which terrible bodily pains are alone a counterpart. Apart from its depth, sex possesses an extraordinary intimacy. Every disclosure of sex is the revelation of something intimate and personal; it is the initiation of another into one's secret. In a sense, sex is the secret of each individual; it is for this reason that the domain of sex is also the sphere of SHAME in its most noble sense. This again explains the central position of sex in the human personality. It is a voice from the depths, the utterance of something central and of utmost significance. In and with sex, man in a special sense gives himself.

Complementarity and Conjugal Love. Man and woman have different and complementary parts to play in sexual intercourse. The man takes the initiative in response to the physical attraction of the woman. The woman, aroused by his caresses, surrenders to him, receiving him with his seed into herself. Both give and receive in the sex act. "Male sexuality is an emphasis on giving in a receiving sort of way, whereas female sexuality is an emphasis on receiving in a giving sort of way" (May, Marriage: The Rock on Which the Family Is Built, 26).

Because of these characteristics, sex is able to become an expression of conjugal LOVE and to constitute an ultimate personal union. It is not only able to do so, but it is meant to become incorporated into this love; it is destined to serve the mutual self-donation to which spousal love aspires. Indeed, to understand the true nature of sex, its meaning, and its value, one must start with the glorious reality of the love between man and woman, the love of which the Vulgate says: "If a man gave all the substance of his house for love, he would despise it as nothing" (Sg 8.7).

Just as it is wrong to reduce all types of love to sex, as pansexualist psychologists attempt to do, so it is also erroneous to think that love between man and woman differs from other types of love only through its connection with sex. The specific quality of this love is apparent even before one takes note of the sexual urge.

It is true that spousal love can exist only between men and women. Yet man and woman are not only different biologically or physiologically—the sex hormones affect every cell of the human body—they are also different expressions of human nature. The specific feminine and masculine features of human personality show the same complementary character that is evident in sexual intercourse. Man and woman are spiritually ordered toward each other, being created for each other. They possess not a "fractional" complementarity as two halves of a whole but an asymmetrical or "integral sex complementarity," in which "the whole is always more than the sum of its parts" (see Allen, "Integral Sex Complementarity"). Each becomes more him or herself in the encounter with the other.

In this love, the beloved is more thematic than in any other love, becoming in fact the great human theme. Such a theme expresses itself also in the intentio unionis; although common to all categories of love, this assumes in man its highest tension and its furthest extension. The lover longs for union with the very being of the beloved; he longs for a common life, and the requital of his love assumes an incomparable importance.

Of this spousal and enamoured love Pope Pius XII said: "The charm exercised by human love has been for centuries the inspiring theme of admirable works of genius, in literature, in music, in the visual arts; a theme always old and always new, upon which the ages have embroidered, without ever exhausting it, the most elevated and poetic variations" (Address to newlyweds [Oct. 23, 1954] Pope Speaks, 21). Such love, aspiring to bodily union as a specific fulfillment of total union, is a unique, deep, and mutual self-donation. If someone loves another person with this love, he realizes fully the mystery of the bodily union and aspires to it simply because he loves the beloved.

Sex in Marriage. But one must also realize the tremendous commitment implied in this union. It is a self-donation that cannot be separated from marriage, from the will to enter into lasting union with the beloved. The will to be permanently united in marriage results organically from the very nature of spousal love. In sex man gives himself. The conjugal act involves so deep and radical a self-donation that it itself actualizes the indissoluble union to which spousal love aspires. The becoming "one flesh," of the very nature of this reciprocal gift, clearly presupposes not only love, but consensus, i.e., the solemn will of the spouses to bind themselves forever.

The role of sex in spousal love extends, however, much farther than the conjugal act. It manifests itself in the entire realm of intimacy granted to the spouses, in a symphony of effusions of tenderness culminating in this act. The fact that sexual desire often arises without being embedded in spousal love, and that sex can also, when isolated, exert a tremendous fascination, is no argument against its intrinsic relation to spousal love and to marriage. As a consequence of ORIGINAL SIN, the sphere of sex can become a pure actualization of CONCUPISCENCE and assume a completely different aspect. Yet the possibility of abuse and perversion of a thing in no way alters its true meaning and essence. For example, it is no proof against the mission, nature, and essence of man's intellect to grasp truth that many are attracted by intellectual activity as a mere display of dexterity or to satisfy pride. Similarly the tendency to isolate sex is no objection against its authentic mission and meaning.

Sex in Isolation. Sex possesses a tender, mysterious, and ineffably uniting quality only when it becomes the expression of something more ultimate, namely, wedded love. As soon as sex is isolated and sought for its own sake, its qualities are reversed. The depth, the seriousness, the mystery disappear, to make room for a fascinating, exciting, and befuddling charm that excludes anything beyond. Wherever sex is encountered in an unlawful form as a temptation, there is heard the siren song of lust, with its honeyed poison. The sublime joy of ultimate surrender—touching, chaste, intimate, and mysterious—that accompanies sex under other circumstances, is then completely absent. Sex is always extraordinary, but its characteristic extraordinariness assumes diametrically opposite forms. At one time, it is awe-inspiring, mysterious, noble, chaste, and free; at another, illegitimate, intoxicating, and befogging.

In sex, there is an element of promise, linked with a vague expectation of happiness. As long as this promise does not tend toward isolated satisfaction but remains in a reverent submission, awaiting its future as embedded in deep, spousal love, it itself is true. As soon as it is detached from such love—as when one expects the delights of paradise from sex as such—the promise becomes a treacherous one. Those who treat sex as the primary reality that can be understood in itself without recurring to spousal love thus fall prey to a fatal error. They are blind both to the nature of love and to the nature of sex. Ironically enough, in trying to reduce everything to sex, they fail to understand the nature of sex itself.

Sex and Revelation. This union, which is the sphere of such a sublime love as well as the conception of a new human person, Christ has raised to the level of a sacrament. The one-flesh union of Adam and Eve has been called the “primordial sacrament” because it made visible the destiny of man and woman to participate in divine Trinitarian communion—the mystery hidden from all ages. It was man's body that made visible invisible realities. The body in its masculinity and femininity possesses the nuptial attribute or the capacity for expressing love, which John Paul II calls the “nuptial meaning of the body.” Even in his body man in some way images God. Man and woman image God alone but even more they image God as a communion of persons (John Paul II, The Theology of the Body, Feb. 20, 1980).

With the Fall, sacramental grace was lost. Separated from God, man became divided within himself and this disorder affected especially the sexual relationship. A tendency toward lust, toward treating the person of the opposite sex as an object of use instead of a “disinterested” gift, now distorts relations between men and women. Christ came to restore human nature. He not only called the human heart, where concupiscence arises, to conversion, but through His death and Resurrection He enabled its transformation through grace. The one-flesh union of marriage is once again an image of divine realities, the total self-giving love of Christ for His Church. This is the source and ultimate reason for its indissolubility. As a result of original sin concupiscence can be overcome only through grace and effort but man and woman are called to their original destiny of divine Trinitarian communion. Redemption, which brought this about, also made possible another way of living the nuptial meaning of the body, celibacy for the kingdom. It, too, is a spousal relation and points toward the resurrected state where there will be no marriage. Masculinity and femininity will remain as the basis for a new and perfect realization of interpersonal communion in our glorified bodies deriving from face-to-face communion with God (John Paul II, The Theology of the Body, Jan 13, 1982).

Sex and Procreation. To the sublime union of marriage God has confided the coming into being of a new man, a cooperation with His divine creativity. Such deep mystery calls for reverence and awe. It is no accident that God has invested an act of this kind with creative significance. As God's love is the creative principle in the universe, so love is everywhere creation. Thus there is profound significance in the nexus—at once symbol and reality—whereby, from the creative act in which two become one flesh, both from love and in love, a new human being proceeds. This mystery of the profound link between love and procreation sets forth the gravity of artificial birth control in a new light.

The capacity to generate life is intrinsically united to the sexual constitution of the human person. The encyclical Humanae vitae speaks of the inseparability of the unitive and procreative dimensions of sexual intercourse (Humanae vitae, no. 12). When a couple seek to unite and at the same time withhold their procreative powers during the fertile period, they are not “reading” the language of the body in truth. Conjugal love, which Paul VI describes as human, total, faithful, and exclusive, ceases to be total. When a couple, with serious reasons to postpone a pregnancy make use of the infertile times of the cycle for sexual intercourse they are doing nothing to impede the natural consequences of the act. Their love remains total.

Parenthood also rightfully belongs to marriage alone. Only those who have committed themselves totally to each other in marriage have made themselves fit to receive and to nurture life. Since they have given each other the identity of husband and wife, they are able to give the unconditional love necessary for the sustained care of offspring. Those who are not married have failed by their own choices to fit themselves to be parents.

Christian View of Sex. The Christian perceives the true mystery of sex; he perceives its depth, its seriousness, and its intimacy. He understands implicitly its ordination to serve the ultimate union in marriage, and the coming to be of a new human being. He is aware of the high value that it embodies as effecting mutual self-donation in wedded love, and as source of procreation. He clearly perceives the fearful profanation that every abuse of sex represents, the deadly poison defiling the soul and separating it from God; this is what sexual pleasure generates when treated as its own end. He shrinks from any contact with sex as soon as it is thus isolated and rendered poisonous. He possesses a deep reverence for its mystery, remaining at a respectful distance when not called by divine vocation to enter its domain. His is not a Puritanical or Manichean despicability of sex; for him, the conjugal act is neither something lowly, tolerated in marriage for the sake of procreation; nor is it merely a “normal” claim of the body finding in marriage its legitimate outlet.

The Christian understands that an ultimate interpenetration of sex and conjugal love takes place in mutual self-donation; sexual experience is thus not something parallel to love, but is absorbed and elevated by this love. Moreover, the Christian understands that sex belongs in a special manner to God, and that he may make such use of it only as explicitly sanctioned by Him. Only with God’s express permission may he eat of the fruit of this tree. The awareness of this fact engenders a reverence that pervades his approach to sex even within the marriage bond. This enables him clearly to understand the sinfulness of artificial birth control, with its irreverent severing of the deep link between the ultimate love union and procreation. He understands the tremendous dignity with which the conjugal act is endowed by marriage’s being a Sacrament. This implies that his very love calls for being transformed in Christ. He is aware of the fact that only in Christ and through Christ can he live up to the full glory and depth to which this love by its very nature aspires. As Pius XII has stated:

But what new and unutterable beauty is added to this love of two human hearts, when its song is harmonized with the hymn of two souls vibrating with supernatural life! Here, too, there is a mutual exchange of gifts; and then . . . through natural affection and its impulses, through a spiritual union and its delights, the two beings who love each other identify themselves in all that is most intimate in them, from the unshaken depths of their beliefs to the highest summit of their hopes. [Ibid.].

See Also: CHASTITY; CONTINENCE; MODESTY; VIRGINITY

Bibliography: D. VON HILDEBRAND, In Defense of Purity (New York 1931; repr. Baltimore 1962). W. E. MAY, Marriage: The Rock on Which the Family Is Built (San Francisco 1995). JOHN PAUL II, The Theology of the Body: Human Love in the Divine Plan (Boston 1997); Familiaris Consortio. PAUL VI, Humanae Vitae. P. M. QUAY, The Christian Meaning of Human Sexuality (Evanston, Ill. 1985). M. SHIVANANDAN, Crossing the Threshold of Love: A New Vision of Marriage in the Light of John Paul II’s Anthropology (Washington, D.C. 1999). K. WOJTYŁA, Love and Responsibility (San Francisco 1981). P. ALLEN, “Integral Sex Complementarity and the Theology of Communion,” Communio 17 (Winter 1990) 523–544.

[D. VON HILDEBRAND/M. SHIVANANDAN]

SEX (IN THE BIBLE)

The Apostle Paul and the evangelists, Mark and Matthew, referred to God’s creative will in responding to issues regarding human sexual conduct during the second half of the first century A.D. The creation stories to which they alluded appear at the beginning of the Bible in Gn 1–2. Although these stories are the first in the Torah, they were written after Israel’s legal tradition had begun to take its form. These etiological narratives include theological reflection on the reality and purpose of human sexuality. At the outset they affirm that the existence of humanity in two genders results from God’s creative activity. Jewish monotheism precluded any suggestion that human sexuality was a means by which men or women could enter into communion with the gods. Israel did not abide any form of ritual prostitution nor did it allow the practice of fertility rites.

Traditions lying behind the creation story in Gn 2 appear to be older than those in Gn 1. Gn 2:18–25 is a simple etiological narrative that seeks to “explain” human sexuality. Its modestly metaphorical language speaks of sexual intercourse and sexual desire. It proclaims that human sexuality is an integral element of the human condition intended to alleviate loneliness and provide an impetus for lasting companionship. The focus of this early tradition is on the male-female relationship.

The narrative in Gn 1 places the relationship between man and woman in a cosmic perspective. In the widest possible view of things, humans are the crown of God's work of creation. He has created them "male and female" (Gn 1:27). In God's cosmic plan of creation, humanity exists in male and female genders. Human fertility results from the divine initiative. Created by God, the two human genders are blessed so that humanity itself may "be fruitful and multiply" (Gn 1:27).

The inspired texts of Gn 1–2 provide a vision of gender, procreation, sexual attraction, sexual intercourse, and companionship which offered Paul and the evangelists a perspective on the basis of which to develop responses to particular questions of sexual ethics.

New Testament. Paul's First Letter to the Thessalonians is the oldest Christian text that speaks about human sexuality. In the context of an exhortation on holiness (1 Thes 4:3–8), Paul encouraged the Christians of Thessalonica to shun sexual immorality (porneia). He offers further specifics as to what this means reminding them not to act lustfully as Gentiles were wont to do. This negative comparison with the sexual conduct of Gentiles reflects a traditional Jewish bias with regard to the sexual mores of those who did not acknowledge the God of Abraham. The Jewish character of Paul's exhortation on sexuality is also apparent in that he addresses the responsibilities of men. He urges them to be married and to refrain from adultery. The metaphorical and imprecise way in which Paul's exhortation in 1 Thes 4:4–6 has, however, led some interpreters to translate his words as meaning self-control with regard to sex and propriety in business affairs.

The NT's only extended consideration of human sexuality is provided in 1 Cor 5–7. The matter to which Paul initially responds is a concern that some member of the community is having a sexual relationship with his father's wife, i. e., a second wife. Paul expresses his outrage that the community had tolerated this aberration and reminds them that although they cannot avoid some association with non-Christians whose sexual mores are not acceptable, they should shun members of the community who are engaged in sexual misconduct, idolatry, drunkenness, and robbery (1 Cor 5:7–13).

After a digression on Christians' taking other Christians to secular courts, Paul examines a slogan that seems to have been invoked by some members of the Corinthian community, "all things are lawful for me" (1 Cor 6:12). Affirming that not everything which is lawful is beneficial and that the Christian should not be enslaved to anything, Paul offers an anthropological reflection that provides the ground for a Christian understanding of human sexuality. He views the Christian person as one who, in his embodied existence, is a member of the body of Christ in which the Spirit of God dwells. His citation of Gn 2:24 (1 Cor 6:16) indicates that the biblical [Jewish] view of human sexuality is very much part of his reflection. Paul offers the case of a Christian man having sex with a prostitute. His introduction of this topic should not be construed as an indication that Christians' visits to prostitutes were a particular concern. The case is rather that sex with a prostitute was the typical example by Hellenistic moralists reflecting on sexual ethics. Paul's reflections on human sexuality would have been inadequate had he not treated this subject.

A second concern to which Paul responds is a troubling slogan about which some Corinthians had written, "It is well for a man not to touch a woman" (1 Cor 7:1). Earlier generations of scholars considered that this slogan was advice that Paul was offering to the Corinthians; subsequent scholarship has concluded that the slogan sums up the problem to which Paul must respond. Paul offers his reaction in a series of five responses. For the married, the normal state for adult Christians, he encourages an active sexual life with mutual responsibility and authority on the part of husband and wife. To the widowed, he proclaims, as did some contemporary moralists, the virtue of remaining faithful to one's deceased spouse but he counsels that the sexual drive must be taken seriously. To those contemplating divorce, whether on the wife's or the husband's initiative, he recalls the forbidding "word of the Lord." To those married to non-Christians he urges fidelity to their spouse for the sake of their own happiness, the holiness of the spouse, and the sake of their children.

Finally, Paul addresses those not yet married (1 Cor 7:25–38). Having reflected that Christians ought not to change their social status, Paul's words addressed to the unmarried reflect his expectation of an imminent Parousia. From this perspective, Paul urges that they remain in their unmarried condition but, he says, if their sexual drive is strong "let them marry" (1 Cor 7:36). First Corinthians' extensive consideration of human sexuality is rich in its practicality, its Christian anthropology, its reflection of the Jewish tradition, and the kind of ethical appeal similar to that found in Hellenistic moralists contemporary with Paul.

With these moralists Paul shares the hortatory use of catalogues of vices (1 Cor 5:10, 11; 1 Cor 6:9–10). In the context of First Corinthians, Paul's lists contain several sexual vices, the generic vice of sexual immorality (porneia), adultery (moicheia), and two terms that are rendered “male prostitutes and sodomites” (1 Cor 6:9). The latter term appears to be a term invented by Paul, and not used elsewhere in his correspondence (cf. 1 Tm 1:10), to refer to a practice prohibited by Lv 18:22. The meaning of the Greek word translated “male prostitutes” is unclear. The term may refer to people who have a soft life and disdain manual labor.

Paul’s only extensive treatment of homosexuality is in Rom 1:24–32. The passage appears in Paul’s carefully crafted appeal to Christian Jews in Rome intended to convince them that Gentiles and Jews alike are sinners who need justification by Christ. He appeals to the Jewish bias about the sexual mores of Gentiles by reminding them of their conviction that voluntary homosexual activity (Rom 1:26–27) was an abomination. He shared with his readers the Jewish conviction that homosexuality and other forms of sexual immorality were a consequence of idolatry (cf. 1 Cor 6:9). With this his audience would agree, convinced as they were that the Gentiles were sexually reprobate. Having appealed to this Jewish prejudice to proclaim that Gentiles were sinners, Paul went on to list an additional 21 vices of which Gentiles were “guilty” (Rom 1:29–31). Then came his punch line, “you [Jewish Christians], the judge, are doing the very same things” (Rom 2:1).

Paul’s treatment of homosexuality derives from his Jewish convictions. He and his contemporaries would have known nothing about what is currently called “sexual orientation.” With his ancestors, he shared the view that incest, sex with a menstruant, child sacrifice, homosexual activity, and bestiality were symptomatic of Egyptian and Canaanite culture, the mores of people who did not know God (Lv 18:2–5). Ancient peoples were very attentive to distinctions of race, class, and gender. The Bible’s penalty of death for homosexual activity (Lv 20:13), its prohibition of cross-dressing (Dt 22:5), and the ban on bestiality (Lv 18:23) are an indication of a desire imbedded in their cultures to maintain categories intact.

The biblical sanction of homosexual activity by death was a departure from the practices of contemporary Near Eastern soldiers. Later, the Greco-Roman world in which Paul lived tolerated and sometimes even encouraged male homosexual activity, particularly between an older man and an adolescent. Paul’s rhetoric opposed the sexual toleration of the world in which he lived. His biblical tradition nurtured his attitude on voluntary male homosexual activity but did not directly address homosexual activity among females (cf. Lv 18:22–23; 20:15–16). Paul held that men and women were similarly responsible for their sexual activity (cf. 1 Cor 7). Thus, the diatribal rhetoric of Rom 1 includes a mention of voluntary sexual activity between females (Rom 1:26). With this inclusion, Paul seems to have been the first Hellenistic moralist to censure same-sex sexual activity among women whose nature would normally lead them to sexual activity with males.

Divorce and Adultery. Paul (cf. 1 Cor 6:16; 11:8–9, 11–12) was not alone among early Christian writers in appealing to the biblical stories of creation as warrants for proper sexual relationships. In his reflection on the church, the author of the Epistle to the Ephesians cites the encomium of Gn 2:24 (Eph 5:31) to metaphorically speak of the relationship between Christ and his church. In Matthew and Mk’s story of Jesus teaching about divorce, use is made of both the Yahwistic (Gn 2) and Priestly (Gn 1) narratives of creation. Mark’s version (Mk 10:1–12), the earlier of the two, offers the story of a group of Pharisees coming to Jesus and asking about the legitimacy of a man divorcing his wife. Rather than respond to their legal question, Jesus answers with a vision of the relationship between man and woman based on Gn 1:27; 2:24. He dismisses the allowance of divorce provided by Dt 24:1 as a result of men’s hardheartedness. Jesus’ response concludes with a prophetic challenge, “what God has joined together, let no one separate” (Mk 10:9).

In Mark’s version of this story, Jesus did not respond to the question of law but offered a vision of the man-woman relationship. Hence, the disciples queried him further about the legal matter (Mk 10:10–12). In his version of Jesus’ response, Mark has reprised the traditional saying of Jesus on divorce (Mt 5:32; 19:9; Lk 16:18; 1 Cor 7:10–11) with two significant emendations. He presents a man’s divorce as an act of adultery against the aggrieved wife and adds that the situation of a woman who divorces her husband is likewise an act of adultery.

Mark’s references to women show that his gospel was written for a Hellenistic readership. In the Greco-Roman world it was possible for a woman to divorce her husband, something that was virtually impossible in the Jewish world. Mark’s reflection on the creation narratives indicates that an issue regarding the relationship between man and woman must be considered primarily not from a legal perspective but from the perspective of the creative will of God who created them “male and female.”

Matthew rewrote the Markan story for a Jewish audience. His version of the story (Mt 19:1–12) is tailored for that audience. The question posed by the Pharisees raises the issue not of the legitimacy of divorce in itself, but of the situation that warrants a divorce. Matthew concludes the story of the repartee between Jesus and the Pharisees on a legal note, “whoever divorces his wife, except for unchastity (porneia, a word whose specific meaning in this context is a matter of debate among scholars) and marries another commits adultery” (Mt 19:9). In Matthew, the disciples are taken aback by the severity of Jesus’ response and suggest that it is better not to marry. Not so: only those to whom God gives the gift of celibacy are called not to marry.

Matthew’s consideration of human sexuality from the perspective of Jewish law similarly appears in the Sermon on the Mount. In his exposition of precepts of the Decalogue, Matthew teaches that the commandment “you shall not commit adultery” requires that the disciples of Christ should shun lusting after a woman, masturbation, and divorce (Mt 5:27–32). The way that Matthew deals with the commandment is similar to the way that rabbis extrapolated halakah, instructions on conduct, from biblical texts. The wording of his teaching on lust and masturbation is similar to a tradition of Jesus’ words found in Mk 9:42–48 which speak of the serious moral evil of the sexual abuse of children, masturbation, adultery, and lust.

In the biblical era, the prohibition of adultery (Ex 20:14; Dt 5:18) was sanctioned by death (Lv 20:10; Dt 22:23–24), but it is more likely that adultery was more often punished by divorce and the woman being stripped of the clothing provided by her husband. Adultery was understood to be sexual intercourse between a married woman and a man who was not her husband. The man’s own marital status was not an issue. The issues were paternity, inheritance of property, and family ties. The rights of the male Israelite were of paramount importance. The right of an Israelite male to marry and to enjoy sexual intercourse with his wife is expressed in the Deuteronomic stipulation that young husbands be exempt from military service for a year after their marriage (Dt 20:7; 24:5).

An aggrieved husband generally had the right to impose the penalty for adultery on his wife in the Ancient Near East. He was required to mete out the same penalty to her paramour. It was his rights that had been violated by adultery. Israel, however, gradually came to the conviction that sexual practices were not only a private matter; they were also a matter of public concern. The presence of the prohibition of adultery in the Decalogue, a covenantal text, was a sign of public concern and control. Another indication of Israel’s developing realization that sexual mores were a matter of public concern is the way in which Ex 22:14–16 and Dt 22:28–29 respectively regulate the seduction of an unmarried virgin. The earlier law required that the seducer offer the bride price (māhōr) to the young woman’s father. Deuteronomy mandates that the seducer who has paid the bride price and married the woman is forever forbidden to divorce her. The seducer had not followed the proper arrangements in acquiring his wife.

As the biblical tradition on sexuality developed, it was the ethos of Israel that was ultimately at stake in the way in which men and women expressed their sexual identities. Hence, Paul’s strong condemnation of a Christian community which tolerated incest (1 Cor 5). A prohibition of incest is found in all cultures although there are varying definitions of what actually constitutes incest. Is, for example, marriage to one’s half sister a case of incest? In the Holiness Code, the Book of Leviticus spells out a list of the forbidden sexual relationships in Israel (Lv 18; cf. Lv 20; Dt 27). Surprisingly, none of the biblical lists specifically prohibits a man from having a sexual relationship with his own daughter. Nonetheless, the expectation that a young woman be a virgin at the time of her marriage implies that Israel’s ethos precluded a man having sexual intercourse with his daughter. The death penalty was prescribed for the crimes of incest with one’s father’s wife or one’s own mother-in-law or daughter-in-law (Lv 20:11, 12, 14), as it was for homosexual activity among men (Lv 20:13) and copulation with an animal, whether by man or woman (Lv 20:15; cf. Lv 18:23). Rape of a betrothed woman was punishable by death of the perpetrator, “because this case is like that of someone who attacks and murders a neighbor,” but the violated woman was considered innocent (Dt 22:25–27). If, however, a woman was raped in the city and did not cry out for help it was presumed that she consented to the adulterous liaison.

Sexual Mores. Concerns for ritual purity entered into Israel’s sexual mores. Men were enjoined from sex with a menstruating woman. They could not enter the temple until a day after sexual intercourse or wet dream, perhaps even after three days (cf. Ex 19:15; Lv 22:4–6; 1 Sm 21:4–5). The earnings of a prostitute were not acceptable as a temple offering. Priests were not allowed to marry a prostitute or a divorced woman (Lv 21:7).

In its injunction that a young married man have a year to spend and be happy with his wife before leaving for a military campaign (Dt 24:5), Israel’s legal tradition shows its awareness of the role of healthy sexual relationships within marriage. Such awareness would be echoed in later rabbinic pronouncements that spoke of a husband’s obligation to pleasure his wife and of her right to have pleasure with her husband. Israel’s wisdom tradition treats human sexuality in a matter-of-fact way and in all its practicality. Thus it speaks of the roles of men and woman in a household (e. g., Prv 31:10–31). It speaks of the seductive attraction of the whore (Prv 5:3–4; 7:6–27; Sir 19:2) and warns against a man wasting his money on prostitutes (Prv 29:3; Sir 9:6). Israel’s sapiential literature speaks glowingly of the importance of erotic love. The Book of Proverbs describes the intoxication of erotic love (Prv 5:15–20; cf. Sir 36:27). The Song of Songs is an erotic love song whose place in the biblical canon attests to the significance of the physical and emotional aspects of human sexuality in God's creative will and salvific plan. This is true notwithstanding the tendency of some later commentators to see in the eroticism of the canticle merely an allegory of the love between God and Israel or Christ and the church.

Inspired, and normative for the faith of the church, the biblical texts constitute a legacy on the basis of which the church and its members continue to respond to issues in sexual ethics.

Bibliography: W. A. M. BEUKEN, "The Human Person in the Vision of Gn 1–2" (LS 24 [1999] 3–20). R. F. COLLINS, "The Bible and Sexuality," Biblical Theology Bulletin 7 (Rome 1977) 149–67; 8 (1978) 3–18; Divorce in the New Testament (GNS 38; Collegeville: 1992); "Male and Female He Created Them," Chicago Studies 32 (1993) 9–18; Sexual Ethics and the New Testament: Behavior and Belief (Companions to the New Testament; New York 2000). W. DEMING, Paul on Marriage and Celibacy: The Hellenistic Background of 1 Cor 7 (SNTSMS 83; Cambridge 1995). T. FRYMER-KENSKY, "Law and Philosophy: The Case of Sex in the Bible," Semeia 45 (1989) 89–102. M. SATLOW, Tasting the Dish: Rabbinic Rhetorics of Sexuality (BJS 303; Atlanta 1995).

[R. F. COLLINS]

SEXISM

Sexism refers primarily to the belief that persons are superior or inferior to one another on the basis of their sex. It also refers to attitudes, value systems, and social patterns which express or support this belief. It is a contemporarily coined term, rising out of the women's movement, and not ordinarily used neutrally in its application to men or women. Rather, it indicates almost always the belief that it is men who are superior and women who are inferior because of their sex. As an evaluative term it includes the judgement that this belief is false and that the formal and informal social patterns which support it are unjust.

There is dispute regarding the labeling of certain social patterns as sexist. Some argue that what is called sexist is merely the differentiation of social roles for men and women. Others argue that such role-differentiation is always culturally biased and is sexist because such culturally determined gender characteristics involve an inevitable inequity in the assignment of roles to persons on the basis of sex. Whatever the articulated beliefs regarding "different but equal" roles for women and men, women's gender-assigned roles have invariably been subordinate, passive, and/or restricted to the private sphere.

Christian Theology. Christian theology has played an important part in both establishing and challenging sexist beliefs and structures. Centuries of Christian theology continued to justify cultural patterns of hierarchy and subordination in relationships between men and women. Though early Christian experience had offered a glimpse of equality between the sexes, the order of inequality was too entrenched to be changed. Primitive Christian insights that "in Christ there is neither Jew nor Greek, slave nor free, neither male nor female" (Gal 3.28) were soon obscured by their transposition into the dominant patterns of the time and into theologies of an eschatological future.

Two strains of thought within Christian theology have served to undergird sexism in particularly enduring ways. On the one hand, women have been associated with symbols of evil; on the other hand, the innate inferiority of women has been affirmed, even to the point of denying to them full identity as human images of God. Ancient myths associating woman with chaos, darkness, mystery, matter, and sin found echoes in Christian interpretations of concupiscence, of sexuality as a dangerous source for evil, and thence of woman as temptress, as a symbol of sin. The texts of Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Tertullian, of Origen, Augustine, Jerome, of Thomas Aquinas, and Bonaventure, of Luther, John Knox, and the Puritans, all bear witness to the fact that woman appears throughout the centuries as a special agent of evil. Instead of losing an identification with pollution and evil through the development of Christian thought, the notion of woman became theoretically intertwined with theologies of original sin and anthropological dualisms of higher and lower nature, mind and body, rationality and desire.

The identification of woman with evil has perhaps been overshadowed as a cause of the practical inequality between the sexes by the refusal of Christian theology to attribute the fullness of the imago Dei to women. It is not only in the order of sin but in the order of nature and the order of grace that women have been declared lesser humans. Though all persons were considered to have been created in the image of God, men partook of that image primarily and fully, while women shared in it only derivatively and partially.

Contemporary Theological Evaluation. In the 20th century theology has generally ceased to affirm explicitly the inferiority of women. No longer is it argued that women are intellectually inferior to men or that wholly passive roles should be assigned to women either biologically or theologically. Doctrines of creation that place persons in graded hierarchies according to sex have been challenged and generally revised. The dignity of the human person, which Christian theology has always affirmed, grounds the principle of equality as a fundamental principle of justice. Gaudium et spes, Vatican II's pastoral constitution on the Church in the world, states that “every type of discrimination, whether social or cultural, whether based on sex, race, color, social condition, language, or religion, is to be overcome and eradicated as contrary to God’s intent” (GS 29). When commenting on how biblical texts are to be interpreted, the Pontifical Biblical Commission writes: “Clearly to be rejected also is every attempt at actualization set in a direction contrary to evangelical justice and charity, such as, for example, the use of the Bible to justify racial segregation, anti-Semitism or sexism whether on the part of men or of women” (The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church, 4.A.3). Popes Paul IV and John Paul II also condemn sexism in their writings and homilies (e.g. Octogesima adveniens 16, Christifideles laici, 49), as have many bishops and episcopal conferences (e.g. Strengthening the Bonds of Peace: A Pastoral Reflection on Women in the Church and Society, USCC, 1994).

Despite these magisterial statements condemning sexism, some theologians see a latent form of sexism in those contemporary Christian anthropologies that describe men and women as complementary. Proponents of such theories say that gender-role differentiation does not violate the principle of equity since such differentiation is based on the special nature of the woman’s role in bearing children. Those who disagree with theories of gender complementarity point out that traits ascribed to one gender or another vary considerably from one society to another and from one historical era to another; efforts to apply certain traits exclusively to one sex are thus culturally conditioned and subject to many exceptions. They also point out that such schemes often revert to the same dualisms (passive/active, bodily/spiritual, emotional/rational) that have been used in previous eras to justify women’s oppression. The relationship between gender roles and physical sexual characteristics, and whether or not their determination is colored by a culture’s latent sexism, continues to be a topic of sometimes heated debate at the beginning of the 21st century.

Bibliography: E. K. ABEL and M. L. PEARSON, eds., Across Cultures: the Spectrum of Women’s Lives (New York 1989). S. BUTLER, ed., Catholic Theological Society of America, Research Report: Women in Church and Society, 1978 (Bronx, NY 1978). Center for Concern, Comments on the Second Draft, NCCB Pastoral Letter “One in Christ Jesus: A Pastoral Response to the Concerns of Women for Church and Society” (Washington, DC 1990). J. CORIDEN, ed., Sexism and Church Law (New York 1977). D. H. CURRIE and V. RAOUL, eds., Anatomy of Gender: Women’s Struggle for the Body (Ottawa 1992). J. ENGLISH, ed., Sex Equality (Englewood Cliffs, NJ 1977). M. FARLEY, “Sources of Sexual Inequality in the History of Christian Thought,” Journal of Religion 56 (1976) 162–176. K. K. FITZGERALD, “Sexism as Sin: Essential Spiritual Considerations,” Orthodox Women Speak (Geneva 1999) 190–199. A. L. HAGEMAN, ed., Sexist Religion and Women in the Church (New York 1974). M. KOLBENSCHLAG, ed., Women in the Church I (Washington, DC 1987). M. L. KRIER MICH, Catholic Social Teaching and Movements (Mystic, CT 1998). C. E. MCENROY, Guests in Their Own House: The Women of Vatican II (New York 1996). R. RUETHER, ed., Religion and Sexism (New York 1974); “Gender Equity and Christianity: Premodern Roots, Modern and Postmodern Perspectives,” Faith and Praxis in a Postmodern Age (London 1998) 60–74.

[M. FARLEY/L. HARRINGTON]

SEXTUS, SENTENCES OF

Greek maxims (451) on moral and spiritual perfection, compiled c. 180–230, partly from Neo-Pythagorean aphorisms (see NEO-PYTHAGOREANISM) by Sextus, an otherwise unknown author. Origen cited them as Christian, and RUFINUS, ascribing them to Pope St. SIXTUS II, translated them into Latin. They are extant in part in Syriac, Armenian, and Georgian. There is a citation of the Sentences of Sextus in the Rule of St. Benedict (7).

Bibliography: SEXTUS PYTHAGORAEUS, Sentences, ed. H. CHADWICK (New York 1959). G. DELLING, “Zur Hellenisierung des Christentums in den ‘Sprüchen des Sextus,’” Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 77 (1961) 208–241.

[H. CHADWICK]

SEYCHELLES, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Republic of Seychelles encompasses an archipelago of 92 islands (33 inhabited) located in the Indian Ocean 970 miles east of Kenya. Mahé and the surrounding islands to the northeast are granite, their hilly terrain dropping to narrow lowlands at the coast. The 52 southern islands are coral reefs. A tropical climate predominates, although the region avoids severe storms. Natural resources include copra and fish, while agricultural products consist of coconuts, cinnamon, vanilla, sweet potatoes and bananas.

The region was uninhabited when the British East India Company arrived in 1609, and for over 150 years the islands provided a haven for pirates on the Indian Ocean. The French claimed the region in 1756 as part of the colony of Mauritius and made the first permanent settlement in 1768 to establish spice plantations. In 1814, under the Treaty of Paris, they became a British dependency, and in 1903 a separate colony, along with the widely scattered Amirante, Cosmoledo and Aldabra groups. In 1976 the region became an independent republic. Most Seychellois are descendants of French colonists, Africans brought from Mauritius as slaves or from East Capital: Victoria, on the island of Mahé.

Size: 156 sq. miles.
Population: 79,325 in 2000.
Languages: English, Creole French.
Religions: 71,395 Catholics (90%), 6,350 Anglicans (8%), 1,580 follow other faiths or are without religious affiliation.
Diocese: Port-Victoria, immediately subject to the Holy See.

Africa as freed slaves, or are of Indian and Chinese ancestry. The majority of the population lives on the island of Mahé.

Education in the region was entirely in the hands of the Catholic missionaries, which included the BROTHERS OF CHRISTIAN INSTRUCTION OF PLOËRMEL and the St. Joseph Sisters of Cluny, until 1954. After that time the government paid and named the teaching personnel, leaving to the mission a right of veto over nominations. In 1958 the region's 50 Catholic schools educated about two-thirds of all schoolchildren. The island gained independence from Great Britain on June 29, 1976, but continued under one-party socialist rule into the early 1990s, when Bishop Felix Paul joined those in favor of instituting a multi-party democracy. Free elections were held in the country in 1993, and a new constitution was promulgated on June 18 of the same year. The region, which relied heavily on the tourism industry during much of the 20th century, sought to diversify its economy into agriculture and small-scale manufacturing. This move was encouraged by the Vatican, which viewed tourism as a threat due to the introduction of crime and consumerism that it fostered.

By 2000 there were 17 parishes tended by 11 diocesan and four religious priests. Other religious included approximately five brothers and 60 sisters, who served in the island's parochial schools. The Church was allowed tax-free status and its services were broadcast weekly on the government-sponsored radio service. It was estimated that close to half the population of the islands regularly attended mass in 2000.

Bibliography: Bilan du Monde, 2:788–789. Annuario Pontificio (1964) 349. For additional bibliog. see AFRICA.

[J. BOUCHAUD/EDS.]

SFONDRATI

A noble Milanese family, originally from Cremona, that flourished in the 16th and 17th centuries. Among its members were many prominent ecclesiastics, including:

Francesco, cardinal; b. Cremona, Oct. 26, 1493; d. there, July 31, 1550. He received his doctorate at Pavia in 1520 and taught at Padua, Bologna, Rome, and Turin. He held public offices under Charles V, who made him Count of Riviera di Lecco on Oct. 23, 1537. After the death of his wife, Anna Visconti (1538), Francesco, a senator of Milan, entered religion; Paul III named him cardinal in 1544. He served in the Curia as a member of the Inquisition. As legate to the Emperor Charles V from Dec. 19, 1544, he dealt with the affairs of England on the death of Henry VIII; he was recalled from Germany June 10, 1548. Francesco governed the Diocese of Capaccio from March 23, 1547, to Nov. 9, 1549, when he was transferred to Cremona. Francesco was the father of Niccolò.

(Niccolò; for his biography, see GREGORY XIV, POPE.)

Paolo Camille (also Emilio), cardinal, grandson of Francesco; b. 1561; d. Feb. 14, 1618. He lived in Rome, where he associated closely with (St.) Philip Neri and the Oratorians. He was a man of artistic taste, but had little knowledge of practical affairs. On Dec. 19, 1590, he was named cardinal and secretary of state by his uncle, Gregory XIV. He misused his uncle's confidence, abandoned his early high ideals, and became interested in wealth. During his uncle's pontificate he was in almost complete control of both religious and civil affairs. Under his direction the body of St. Cecilia was found on Oct. 20, 1599, in his titular church, where he interred her with great solemnity. He ruled the Diocese of Cremona until his death.

Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception in Victoria, Seychelles.
(©Nik Wheeler/CORBIS)

Celestino, prince-abbot of St. Gall and cardinal; b. Milan, Jan. 11, 1644; d. Rome, Sept. 4, 1696. On April 26, 1660, he took the Benedictine habit at St. Gall, where he became professor, master of novices, vicar-general, and abbot. From 1679 to 1682 he taught Canon Law at the University of Salzburg; he was appointed bishop of Novara in 1686 by Innocent XI, and then prince-abbot of St. Gall on April 17, 1687. For his learning, piety, and monastic discipline, he was named cardinal of St. Cecilia by Innocent XII on Dec. 12, 1695; he died nine months later and is buried in his titular church. Besides various philosophical and theological works he wrote on the prerogatives of the Holy See. Among the more noted are: Tractatus regaliae (St. Gall 1682); Gallia vindicata (St.

Gall 1688); Legatio Marchionis Lavardini eiusque cum Innocentio XI dissidium (St. Gall 1688); Nodus praedestinationis ex sacris litteris, doctrinaque sanctorum Augustini et Thomae . . . dissolutus (posthumous, Rome 1697), which accepted the doctrine on predestination as explained by LESSIUS. It was attacked by Bossuet, but defended by Cardinal Giovanni Gabrielli (1654–1711).

Bibliography: H. JEDIN and V. REDLICH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. M. BUCHBERGER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1930–38) 9:517. L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes From the Close of the Middle Ages, 40 v. (London-St. Louise 1938–61), v.13–40, from 1st German ed. Geschichte der Päpste seit dem Ausgang des Mittelalters, 16 v. i 21 (Freiburg 1885–1933; repr. 1955–) v. 22–24, passim.

[R. L. FOLEY]

SFORZA

Northern Italian noble family. Muzio Attendolo, its founder; b. in the village of Cotignola in the Romagna, 1369; d. 1424, in the river Pescara, attempting to save the life of a page. As a boy he joined a band of mercenaries and later served under the condottiere Alberico da Barbiano, who gave him the name of Sforza, adopted by his descendants. As a leader of mercenary troops and a shrewd soldier he acquired wealth and fame. Several of his numerous illegitimate sons founded princely houses. Most famous among them was Francesco, first of the Sforza dukes of Milan; b. 1401; d. 1466. A condottiere like his father, he married (1441) Bianca Maria Visconti, illegitimate daughter of Filippo Maria, last Visconti duke of Milan (d. 1447). Francesco claimed his state and succeeded him in 1450. An outstanding statesman, he played an important role in Italian politics, concentrating on the maintenance of peace and order in his territories. Humanists at his court included Filelfo and Decembrio.

Among his more than 30 legitimate and illegitimate children, the following were outstanding. Ascanio Maria, legitimate; b. 1455; d. Rome, 1505. He became a cardinal in 1484 and held many benefices, including the bishopric of Pavia. A partisan of Cardinal Roderigo Borgia, he supported his election as Pope ALEXANDER VI in 1492 and helped to bring about the marriage of Lucrezia Borgia, the Pope's daughter, with his own nephew Giovanni Sforza di Pesaro. A worldly prelate involved in politics, he kept a brilliant court in his Roman palace, Ippolita Maria, legitimate; b. 1445; d. 1488. She married Alfonso, Duke of Calabria, in 1465. Educated by humanists, she was famous for her learning and the fine library she collected. Sforza Secondo, illegitimate; b. 1435; d. 1491; founded the collateral branch of Sforza di Borgonovo. Francesco's successor as duke of Milan was his oldest legitimate son, Galeazzo Maria; b. 1447; who was assassinated by three youths for personal motives in 1476. Galeazzo's children included Bianca Maria, legitimate; b. 1472; d. 1510; who was married to the Emperor Maximilian I in 1493. Caterina, illegitimate; b. c. 1463; d. 1509; was famous for her involvement in politics and military affairs. Descendants of her marriage to Girolamo Riario (1477), the nephew of Pope SIXTUS IV, were the princes Riario-Sforza. Her third husband, Giovanni di Pierfrancesco de' Medici, was the ancestor of the grand dukes of Tuscany. Galeazzo Maria left as his heir his son Gian Galeazzo; b. 1469; d. 1494. After a short regency by his mother, Bona of Savoy, and her adviser Cicco Simonetta, the rule of Milan was usurped in 1478 by Ludovico il Moro; b. 1452; d. 1508; legitimate son of Francesco, and uncle of the young duke. As regent and, after the death of Gian Galeazzo (1494), as duke of Milan, he kept a brilliant court and was famous as patron of the arts. His appeal to King Charles VIII of France in 1494 led to the French invasion of Italy and to his ultimate defeat. He died in a French prison in Loches. Ludovico's two sons ruled Milan for a brief time. Massimiliano; b. 1493; d. 1530; was duke from 1512 to 1515. His brother Francesco II; b. 1495; d. 1535; reigned from 1521 until his death under the supervision of the Spanish, to whom Milan fell in 1535.

Other branches of the Sforza family founded by illegitimate sons of Muzio Attendolo were the Sforza di Santafiora, descended from Bosio; b. 1411; d. 1476; and the Sforza di Pesaro, going back to Alessandro; b. 1409; d. 1473. A third branch, the Sforza di Caravaggio, descended from Giampaolo; b. 1497; d. 1535; illegitimate son of Ludovico il Moro.

Bibliography: G. B. PICOTTI et al., Enciclopedia Italiana di scienze lettere ed arti, 36 v. (Rome 1929–39) 31:5711–577. C. M. ADY, A History of Milan under the Sforza, ed. E. ARMSTRONG (London 1907). L. COLLISON-MORLEY, The Story of the Sforzas (New York 1934). N. VALERI, L'Italia nell'età dei principati, dal 1343 al 1516 (Milan 1949). Storia di Milano (Milan 1953–) v.7–8, for bibliog. G. PEYRONNET, "Il ducato di Milano sotto Francesco Sforza (1450–1466): Politica interna, vita economica e sociale," Archivio-storico italiano 116 (1958) 36–53.

[E. G. GLEASON]

SGAMBATI, ANDREAS

Theologian; b. Naples, about 1735; d. Rome, July 17, 1805. Little is known of his early life. He was awarded a doctorate in theology at the Roman College of St. Bonaventure in 1763. He was assigned to assist in the compilation of the Bullarium Franciscanum, and in 1771 was appointed professor of theology and rector of the university college of the Conventual Franciscans in Naples.

"Monument of Cardinal Paolo Sfondrati," sculptural group by Carlo Maderno, in the Church of S. Cecilia, Rome. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource)

His De theologicis institutis (14 v., Naples 1775–82; 2d ed. Madrid 1833) became the prescribed text in seminaries of the Conventuals, was adopted by other religious orders, and in 1830 was made the official text in the seminaries of the Spanish Observants. A second work, De praecipuis locis theologicis, appeared in Naples (2 v. 1785). In this year Sgambati was appointed professor at the Roman College of St. Bonaventure and named a consultant to the Congregation of Rites. Unlike many of his Conventual contemporaries, he was inspired more by Bonaventure than by Scotus. He made special efforts to eliminate every trace of enlightenment philosophy from his works. This was, perhaps, the chief source of his popularity among the adherents of a more traditional orthodoxy.

Bibliography: D. SPARACIO, Frammenti bio-bibliografici di scrittori ed autori minori conventuali (Assisi 1931). H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 5 vol. (3rd ed. Innsbruck 1903–13) 5.1. A. TEETAERT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 vol. (Paris 1903–50) 14.2:2018–19.

Ludovico il Moro Sforza, engraving. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

[P. D. FEHLNER]

SHABBATAÏSM

A widespread messianic movement among the Jews of the 17th and 18th centuries, named after one of the principal pseudo-Messiahs of this period, Shabbatai (Sabbatai) Sevi (Zevi). It is known also as Shabbataianism (Sabbataianism) after the Shabbataians (Sabbataians), or followers of this man.

MAIMONIDES (1135–1204) formulated one of the 13 basic principles of Judaism as follows: “I believe with perfect faith in the coming of the Messiah, and, though He tarry, I will wait daily for His coming.” Ever since the destruction of Jerusalem, Jewish history records a great number of messianic movements, none of which can compare in importance with Shabbataïism. With the expulsion of the Jews, toward the end of the 15th century, first from Spain and then from Portugal, with the great sufferings in the wake of the Thirty Years’ War, with the Chmielnicki massacres between 1648 and 1658 in Poland and the Ukraine, in which approximately 100,000 Jews perished and countless refugees sought asylum throughout Europe, messianic expectations among Jews came to a climax. The horrible sufferings seemed to be the ḥablê šel māšîah, the birth pangs of the messianic age, as foretold by tradition. Even the Christian world was in expectation, and the main argument put forward by Manasseh ben Israel (1604–57) in his petition for the readmission of Jews in England, submitted to the Parliament in 1650, was that unless the Jews were introduced into the British Isles, the Dispersion would not be complete and thus the messianic deliverance would be unattainable.

Background. The outbreak of Shabbataïism must be understood against the background of the resurgence of the cabalistic speculations in Safed, Upper Galilee, in the 16th century. But for the revival of cabalism (see CABALA) by Isaac LURIA (1534–72) of Safed, Shabbataïism would have been deprived of theological foundation. According to the Lurianic doctrine, Israel’s exile is only an aspect of the cosmic fall of the creation and the whole cosmos is in desperate need of salvation. The task of mankind, viz, of its elect portion Israel, consists in taking an active part in the great work of saving the world by a life of sanctity, mystical concentration, and the fulfillment of the divine commandments, which are mystically related to the structure of the cosmos. The restoration (tiqqûn) of the divine sparks (niššûšîm) imprisoned in the “shells” (qelîpôt), i.e., fallen matter and fallen souls, or the repair of the “broken vessels,” is the aim of the initiates of Safed. All this religious fervor and asceticism was focused on the coming of the Messiah and the eager expectation of the deliverance.

Climax. This expectancy reached its peak when Shabbatai Sevi, the messiah of Smyrna, arose. Born in 1626 of a family exiled from Spain, young Shabbatai attended the Talmudic school of Rabbi Joseph Escapa, but apparently the casuistical teaching did not appeal to him. His favorite studies were the cabalistic writings, especially the practical cabala, and his way of life was modeled on the ascetic principles of the masters of Safed. G. Scholem, the foremost authority on Jewish mysticism, has shown conclusively that Shabbatai suffered from manic-depressive personality troubles, melancholic depression alternating with ecstatic exaltation. In 1648, a year considered by cabalistic circles as the year of the manifestation of the Messiah, Shabbatai revealed his claim to messiahship to a small group of followers by pronouncing the sacred tetragrammaton (the divine name) in Hebrew. The elders of the Jewish community of Smyrna put him and his followers under ban; Shabbatai himself left his home town and started a wandering life through the Orient, without friends or real disciples and without doing anything for the furtherance of the messianic aspirations that dominated him at periods of exaltation.

The second and definitive awakening of Shabbatai's messianic consciousness was a result of an ecstatic vision of the cabalist Nathan of Gaza (1644–80), who announced in 1665 that the messianic age was to begin in the following year and that Shabbatai was the messiah. It was Nathan who dispelled Shabbatai's doubts and prevailed upon him to proclaim himself the messiah. The declaration was made in the synagogue of Smyrna on Rosh Hashanah (New Year's Day), amidst the blowing of horns and the multitude shouting: "Long live our King, our Messiah!"

"Letters were sent broadcast throughout Europe, Asia, and Africa announcing the good tidings. Everywhere the approaching deliverance was hailed with jubilation. Prayers were offered up in all the synagogues on behalf of 'Our Lord, King and Master, the holy and righteous Shabbatai Sevi, the anointed of the God of Israel.' The frenzy of the masses knew no bounds. Chaste matrons fell into trances and prophesied, in tongues of which they had previously had no knowledge, the marvels that were soon to take place. There was a wave of penance and ascetic exercises. Special liturgies poured from the printing presses. The merchant princes of the community of Amsterdam, men whose signature would have been good for almost any amount on the bourse, prepared a petition to forward to the pretender assuring him of their implicit faith" [C. Roth, A Short History of the Jewish People (rev. ed. Oxford 1943) 329].

All the Jewish communities from Persia and Yemen to England and Holland were involved in the tremendous upheaval and even Gentiles expected the return of the Jews to the Holy Land within a short time. Shabbatai Sevi became a figure of legend, seldom attained by a person still living.

When the Sultan judged that things were going too far, Shabbatai was summoned to Constantinople and imprisoned in the fortress of Abydos on the Gallipoli peninsula. There he established a sort of court, receiving delegations and sending out messengers. Relatives and friends were given provinces of his future kingdom. His birthday, the fast of the 9th day of the month of Ab in memory of the destruction of the Temple, was proclaimed a day of rejoicing. The enthusiasm of the Turkish Jews knew no limits, and warnings from some opponents and disbelievers were not heeded. Finally, faced with death or conversion to Islam, Shabbatai made the latter choice and, since he continued to make trouble, was exiled to Dulcigno in Albania, where he died in 1676.

The emotional impact was so deep and the belief in the legitimacy of the messiah struck such firm roots that even the apostasy of their master did not shake the faith of his followers. Nathan of Gaza, who possessed the secret of interpreting ancient texts, succeeded in elaborating a theory justifying Shabbatai's defection: the messianic deliverance requires the liberation of the sparks of holiness out of the reign of the uncleanness; the messiah would save the world from sin through sin; for the sake of redemption, he would accept worse than death, the disgrace of sin—and the worst of sins, apostasy; this, however, was not real, only apparent: the descensus ad inferos would be followed by the ascension to heaven.

Aftermath. Even the death of Shabbatai did not change the belief of his followers. They held that the messiah did not really die; he was "carried off." The doctrine of the reincarnation held by the cabalists justified this interpretation. The believers were faced with the alternative, either to follow Shabbatai in his apostasy or to remain, as a heretical underground, within the framework of Judaism. A minority were converted to Islam and formed the group of the Doenmeh ("apostate" in Turkish), who even today, after 300 years, are aware of their Jewish descent. The Doenmeh constituted a compact group in Salonica that broke up only in 1924, in the wake of the exchange of populations between Greece and Turkey. The Shabbatian underground continued in some circles of European Jewry for over 150 years, disappearing only in the early 19th century.

After Shabbatai's death, a number of pseudo-messiahs claimed to be his successor, having inherited a portion of his messianic soul. The last in this line was Jacob FRANK of Galicia (1726–91), an unscrupulous adventurer, who, with his followers, temporarily entered the Catholic Church.

After the Shabbatian conflagration, rabbinical circles tried to minimize its extent and to suppress the evidence concerning it. It is the merit of the scholars of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, outstanding among them Professor Gershom Scholem, to have established on the grounds of a thorough study of manuscript material available, the significance of the Shabbatian movement.

Bibliography: G. G. SCHOLEM, Sabbatai Zvi and the Sabbatean Movement during His Lifetime, 2 v. (New York 1957); "In Search of Sabbatai Zevi," in Hadassah (June 1961), magazine published in NY; Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (3d ed. London 1955), ch. 8; "Die krypto-jüdische Sekte der Dönme (Sabbatianer) in der Türkei," Numen 7 (1960) 93–122. I. BEN-ZEVI, The Exiled and the Redeemed, tr. I. A. ABBADY (Philadelphia 1957.). J. H. GREENSTONE, The Messiah Idea in Jewish History (Philadelphia 1906). A. H. SILVER, A History of Messianic Speculation in Israel: From the First through the Seventeenth Centuries (Boston 1959). R. J. Z. WERBLOWSKY, "Crises of Messianism," Judaism 7 (1958) 106–120.

[M. J. STIASSNY]

SHADDAI

No fully satisfactory explanation has been found for the divine epithet, Shaddai (šaddai), which appears chiefly in the Pentateuch and Job (where it is used in imitation of the ancient style). The Hebrew verb šādad, which it resembles, means “to lay waste or to destroy”; it is unacceptable because Shaddai is invariably associated with a blessing (Gn 17.1–2; 28.3; 35.11; etc.). Under the title of Shaddai God revealed Himself to Patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (Ex 6.3) as the God who protected and watched over them. Shaddai also connoted strength to ancient translators. The Septuagint (LXX) translates it as God, or Lord, or the all-powerful; Aquila and Symmachus use “the sufficient one”; while St. Jerome construes it as “the Almighty.” The Akkadian šadū, mountain, suggests grandeur and power; other texts describe God as a rock or fortress [Gn 49.24; 2 Sm 22.2; Ps 77(78).35; Ps 90(91).2]. El-Shaddai may have been the ancestral name for God acquired by Abraham’s family during its sojourn in Haran, not far from the north Mesopotamian mountains; later Yahweh was associated with Mt. SINAI. Shaddai was not merely a local deity whom the Hebrews made their own; rather, he was a manifestation of the supreme God, EL. The name Shaddai therefore marks a step in God’s progressive revelation of Himself (Ex. 6.3).

See Also: ELOHIM; YAHWEH.

Bibliography: B. W. ANDERSON, Interpreters Dictionary of the Bible, ed. G. A. BUTTRICK et al. (Nashville 1962) 2:412. R. DE VAUX, Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions (New York 1961). W. EICHRÖDT, Theology of the Old Testament, tr. J. A. BAKER (London 1961–).

[R. T. A. MURPHY]

SHAHAN, THOMAS JOSEPH

Bishop, historian, educator; b. Manchester, N.H., Sept. 11, 1857; d. Washington, D.C., March 9, 1932. His parents, Maurice Peter and Mary Anne (Carmody) Shahan, were Irish immigrants. He attended the public schools of Millbury, Mass., and the Sulpician College, Montreal, Canada (1872–78). From 1878 to 1882 he studied at the North American College, Rome, where he was ordained on June 3, 1882, having earlier earned a doctorate in theology. After beginning his priestly work at St. John’s, New Haven, Conn., he was appointed in 1883 chancellor of the Diocese of Hartford and secretary to Bishop Lawrence McMahon. Serving in this capacity until 1888, he gained experience in organizing the chancery and building the cathedral.

Scholarship and Writing. Monsignor John J. Keane invited him to teach at The CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA, Washington, D.C.; Shahan prepared for his assignment by graduate study at the University of Berlin (1889–91), under Adolph Harnack, and at the Sorbonne and Institut Catholique, Paris (1891), under Louis Duchesne. In 1891 he joined the faculty of The Catholic University as professor of church history and patrology; he kept this post until 1909. He was an effective teacher of ecclesiastical history and, after 1895, of Roman law, but his primary interest was in research and publication. As a productive scholar, he contributed for more than 40 years to Catholic periodicals on both sides of the Atlantic. His influence on American Catholic thought was perhaps exerted chiefly through the Catholic University Bulletin, a journal noted for its scholarly standards during his editorship (1895–1909). Among other achievements was his work as associate editor of the old Catholic Encyclopedia, for which he wrote over 200 articles, and rewrote or translated more than 100 others. The prestige of The Catholic University of America was further advanced by Shahan’s books: The Blessed Virgin in the Catacombs (1892), Giovanni Baptista de Rossi (1900), The Beginnings of Christianity (1903), The Middle Ages, Sketches and Fragments (1904), St. Patrick in History (1904), The House of God (1905), and a translation of Bardenhewer’s Patrologie (1908). Shahan’s scholarship brought him rare honors. In 1923 the University of Louvain, Belgium, by the unanimous vote of its Faculty of Theology, conferred on him its infrequently bestowed doctorate of theology, while in 1926 he was elected a fellow of the Medieval Academy of America, an honor reserved for the outstanding mediaevalists of America and Europe. Other awards, in 1928, included a doctorate in canon and civil law from Georgetown University, Washington, D.C., and appointment as assistant at the pontifical throne.

Rectorship. In 1909 Shahan was appointed a domestic prelate and rector of The Catholic University of America. Five years later, he was named titular bishop of Germanicopolis and consecrated by Cardinal Gibbons on Nov. 15, 1914, in the Baltimore Cathedral. Shahan’s administration as head of The Catholic University was inspired by his conception of the university’s mission in the United States. He envisioned a national university that would be the source of leadership for the American Church. Such preeminence, of which critics both within and without the Church were skeptical, could, he believed, be attained only by developing at the highest level, the graduate schools, an institution comparable in learning, faculty, plant, and academic atmosphere to the best American universities. He enlarged the size of the faculty fourfold, gathering eminent scholars and protecting their academic freedom, even in controversial fields. Tenure became secure, the endowment was tripled, and the departments of theology, canon law, and oriental studies were improved. A number of religious communities were induced to establish houses of study near the university, while an earlier recommendation for extensive affiliation of Catholic educational institutions with the university was put into operation (see SHIELDS, THOMAS EDWARD). Shahan also inaugurated the first university summer session under Catholic auspices, the beginning of a significant movement in American Catholic education.

Shahan's concern for the intellectual advancement of the university was matched by his appreciation of the need for adequate buildings. Known as the "rector scholar," he may also be called the "rector builder." The John K. Mullen Memorial Library attested his desire to give his faculty all the library facilities needed, and the Martin Maloney Chemical Laboratory reflected his stress on modern methods and sciences. Additional housing and the central power and heating plant were also his achievements. He built Cardinal Gibbons Memorial Hall to house lay students and Graduate Hall, with its university dining hall, to provide for the increasing number of graduate students. To these he added St. Thomas Hall, occupied by the Paulist Fathers before the erection of St. Paul's College, and St. John's Hall, erected by the Catholic War Council for rehabilitation work after World War I. No structure was more central to his thought, however, than the university church, which he conceived as a national shrine to the Mother of God (see NATIONAL SHRINE OF THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION). He was unusually devoted to the Blessed Mother, and he hoped that the Catholic people of the United States would visit Mary's church and become acquainted with the university supported by their annual collection. Shahan had even more ambitious building plans, but the lack of funds, which was a chronic problem during his rectorship, always stood in the way.

Shahan's activities extended beyond the university campus to affect the cultural life of American Catholicism. Archbishop John T. McNicholas called him "the Apostle of Enlightenment." In this role he shared his bibliographical knowledge with fellow scholars and inspired many educational organizations. He was one of the founders of the Catholic Education Association, which he served as president from 1909 to 1928; the National Conference of Charities, of which he was a member from 1910 to 1928; the Catholic Sisters College (1911); the American Catholic Historical Association (1917); the International Federation of Catholic Historical Associations (1917); and the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception, in whose crypt he is buried. In 1928 he retired from the rectorship and spent his remaining years at Holy Cross Academy, Washington.

Bibliography: P. J. MCCORMICK, "Bishop Shahan: American Catholic Educator," The Catholic Educational Review 30 (1932): 257-265.

[R. J. DEFERRARI]

SHAKERS

Popular name of the members of the United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Appearing, also called the Alethians, or the Millennial Church. This most successful of the communistic societies of 19th-century America originated from the conversion of Ann Lee at a Quaker revival under Jane and James Wardley in Manchester, England. Ann Lee was born in Manchester, England, in 1736, converted in 1758, and married in 1762; her unhappy marital experience, coupled with severe illness, brought about a conviction that concupiscence was the basic cause of human depravity and the world's wrongs. Public confession was the key to regenerate life; celibacy, its rule and cross. Under her leadership the meetings of the group in England were characterized by shaking, whirling, shouting, prophesying, dancing, and singing in strange tongues. In 1773 Ann Lee and some of her followers so disturbed the morning services in Christ Church that they were imprisoned; during this time she claimed visions regarding the manifestation of Christ, "the male principle." She called herself "Ann of the Word," or the "female principle in Christ"; her followers gave her the title of "Mother Ann." In 1774, after release from prison, she immigrated to America with seven of her followers and settled in the woods near Albany, N.Y. After her death (Sept. 8, 1784), she was succeeded by Joseph Meacham and Lucy Wright, under whom a number of Shaker communal societies were founded, of which the one at Mount Lebanon, N. Y. (1787), is considered the mother community. During his 12 years, Meacham gave the Shakers their effective organization. For the next 25 years the leadership again devolved on a woman, a fact of importance in the peculiar development of the group.

In their religious tenets the Shakers deny every specific Christian doctrine; the underlying principle is rather a strange form of dualism. Mother Lee taught that since Adam and Eve as male and female are essentially made in the image of God, God must exist as the Father and Mother. This dualism is extended even to the plant and mineral kingdoms. The Shakers believe the history of the world is divided into four cycles, that of Noah, Moses, Jesus, and the fourth reaching its culmination in Ann Lee who, as the female counterpart of Jesus, the bride of Jesus, and the mother of all spiritual things, is worthy of the same honor as Jesus. The Shakers spread from New

Interior of the Shaker Meetinghouse, designed by Moses Johnson, built in 1794. (©Michael Freeman/CORBIS)

York to New England and with the Second Awakening into Ohio, Kentucky, and Indiana (see GREAT AWAKENING). The sect reached its zenith in the middle of the 19th-century with a membership made up of about 6,000 adults, enjoying great prosperity based principally on agriculture. By 1905, however, the membership had dwindled to less than 1,000; in the 1950s there were fewer than 29 members, and by the 1960s the sect was practically extinct.

Bibliography: M. F. MELCHER, The Shaker Adventure (Princeton 1941). E. D. ANDREWS, The People Called Shakers: A Search for the Perfect Society (Dover; New York 1953; rev. Gloucester, Mass. 1963). R. B. TAYLOR, Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, ed. J. HASTINGS (Edinburgh 1908–27) 3.781–783. H. C. DESROCHES, Les Shakers américains (Paris 1955).

[E. R. VOLLMAR/EDS.]

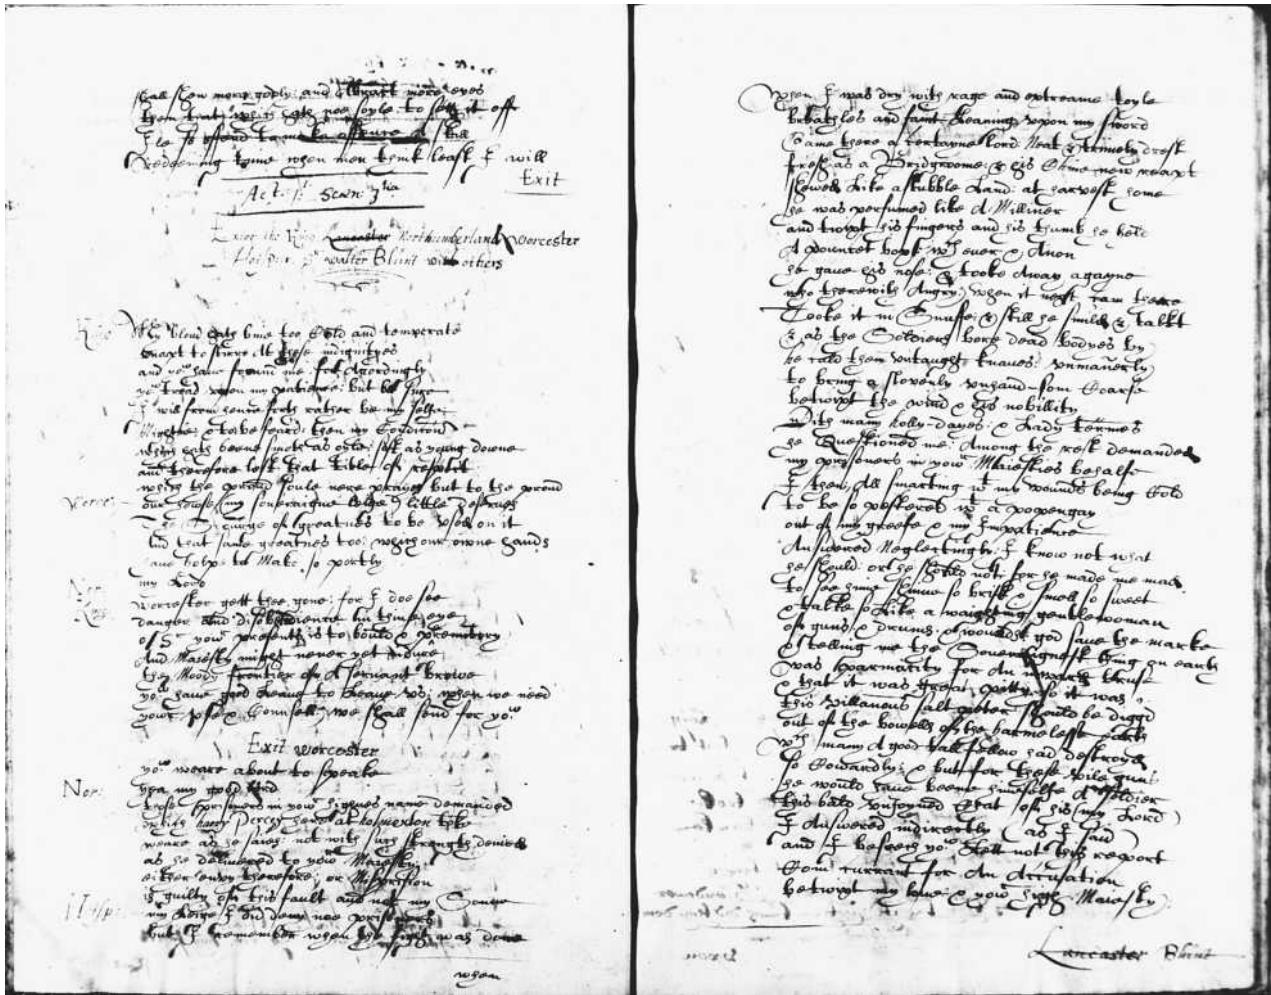

SHAKESPEARE, WILLIAM

Dramatist, poet, actor; b. Stratford-on-Avon, April 1564; d. there, April 23, 1616. The facts of Shakespeare's life, preserved in authentic records, are considerable. Unfortunately he left no diaries or personal letters nor did he attract the notice of gossips or notetakers, so that all attempts to write an intimate life must rely on guesswork.

The Biographical Record

The records show that he was the son of John Shakespeare, yeoman and glover, a leading citizen of Stratford, and of Mary Arden of Wilmcote, whose family were staunch Catholic gentlefolk. William was baptized April 26, 1564.

According to Nicholas Rowe (1674–1718), who published the first short biography in 1709, Shakespeare was educated at the Stratford grammar school. The masters of the school during and after his boyhood—all graduates of Oxford—were Walter Roche, 1569 to 1571; Simon Hunt, 1571 to 1575 (when he went overseas to Douai and was later admitted into the Society of Jesus in 1578); Thomas Jenkins, 1575 to 1579; John Cottam, 1579 to 1581; and Alexander Aspinall, 1581 to 1624. At Elizabethan grammar schools, boys were subjected to an elaborate memory training in Latin (and to a lesser degree in Greek) and read a fair selection of the greater classics. All this fostered in brighter boys a keen interest in language and its use as well as a general knowledge of classical mythology and history.

Manuscript pages, "Henry IV," Part 1, II, Act I, Scene 3, by William Shakespeare.

On Nov. 28, 1582, a license was issued by the Bishop of Worcester to "William Shagspere" to marry "Anne Hathwey" of Stratford after one reading of the banns. According to the inscription on her gravestone, Anne Shakespeare died on Aug. 6, 1623, aged 67 years, and was thus eight years older than her husband. Their three children were baptized in Stratford church—Susanna on May 26, 1583, and Hamnet and Judith (twins) on Feb. 2, 1585. Nothing is certainly known of Shakespeare's early manhood; traditions that he was forced to flee Stratford for stealing deer from Sir Thomas Lucy, the local magnate, and that he was for some time a schoolmaster in the country are disputed and unverifiable but may have some foundation in fact.

Actor and Playwright. From 1592 onward the outline of Shakespeare's life is clear. He had become an actor and playwright in London. On March 3, 1592, Philip Henslowe, owner of the Rose playhouse, noted in his account book the first performance of "harey the vj" (presumably I Henry VI), which was the most successful play of the season. Shakespeare was now attracting attention. In August he was venomously attacked by Robert Greene in A Groatworth of Wit (published posthumously). His first poem, Venus and Adonis, was entered for printing on April 18, 1593, with a signed dedication to Henry Wriothesley, Earl of Southampton, to whom Shakespeare also dedicated The Rape of Lucrece in May William Shakespeare.

1594. By the end of the year he was a leading sharer in the Lord Chamberlain's company of players, and was mentioned with Richard Burbage and William Kempe as receiving payment for court performances during the Christmas holidays. Shakespeare's son Hamnet was buried Aug. 11, 1596. In October a grant of arms was issued by the College of Heralds to Shakespeare's father, whereby father and son were entitled to call themselves gentlemen. In November, Shakespeare and others were quarrelling with one William Wayte who craved a surety of the peace against them. This record was discovered and published by Leslie Hotson in 1931, but no details of the affair have come to light. On May 4, 1597, Shakespeare was able to purchase for £60 a large house known as New Place in the center of Stratford.

Established Dramatist. By 1598, Shakespeare's reputation as a dramatist was established. Francis Meres in his Palladis Tamia: Wits' Treasury (a book of commonplaces entered for printing Sept. 7, 1598) added a "comparative discourse" of English poets in which Shakespeare was mentioned more often than any other writer, as poet and writer of comedy and tragedy. Meres also recorded the names of 12 of Shakespeare's plays: Two Gentlemen of Verona, Comedy of Errors, Love's Labour's Lost, Love's Labour's Won (apparently lost), A Midsummer Night's Dream, The Merchant of Venice, Richard II, Richard III, Henry IV, King John, Titus Andronicus, and Romeo and Juliet. In September 1598, Shakespeare acted a part in Jonson's Every Man in His Humor. At the end of the year he, with six other members of the Chamberlain's Company, shared in the expense of erecting the new Globe playhouse on the bankside. On May 1, 1602, he bought 107 acres of arable land in Stratford for £320.

Queen Elizabeth I died on March 24, 1603. Her successor, James I, soon after arriving in London, appointed the Chamberlain's Company to be his own players—The King's Men, as they were henceforward known—and in the license of appointment, Shakespeare's name stands second. Thereafter the King's Men prospered; in the new reign they acted at court four times as often as under the old Queen. About this time Shakespeare was boarding in the house of Christopher Mountjoy, a Huguenot tire-maker, near St. Olave's Church in Cripplegate. Mountjoy's daughter married an apprentice named Stephen Bellot, and Shakespeare aided the negotiations. In 1612, Bellot sued his father-in-law for failing to provide his daughter with the promised portion. Shakespeare was a principal witness in the case. On July 24, 1605, Shakespeare was able to invest £440 in the right to tithes in and about Stratford, which yielded him an income of £60 a year; and in March 1613, he bought for £140 a dwelling house erected over the gatehouse of the old Blackfriars monastery in the city of London.

Final Years. The last years of Shakespeare's life were spent at Stratford, and his name is several times mentioned in local records. On March 25, 1616, he made his will, a lengthy document of three large parchment sheets, now preserved in Somerset House, London. He died on April 23, 1616, and was buried on the 25th in the chancel of the church at Stratford. Soon afterward a tablet with a memorial bust within an ornate arch was erected on the north wall overlooking the grave. A far more important memorial was provided in 1623 when Heminge and Condell, surviving members of the original Chamberlain's Company, sponsored the publication of 36 of Shakespeare's plays in one large volume known as the First Folio. It preserved 22 plays that would otherwise have perished.

These and other similar records show that William Shakespeare was born at Stratford-on-Avon, married at 18, and after a manhood spent no one knows how and where, became a successful dramatist in London; that he prospered and invested his gains; that he died and was buried in his native town (to the great profit of subsequent inhabitants). The lack of heroic or romantic anecdotes has proved so disappointing to some that they have even denied that William Shakespeare of Stratford was indeed the author of his own plays—a doubt which no reputable scholar has ever endorsed.

During Shakespeare's lifetime, 16 of his plays were printed (and reprinted) separately in quarto form; of these some were issued without any author's name. (Those editions in which Shakespeare's name is given on the title page are marked with an asterisk.) Titus Andronicus, 1594 (reprinted 1600, 1611); Richard II, 1597 (reprinted 1598* twice, 1608*, 1615*); Richard III, 1597 (reprinted 1598*, 1602*, 1605*, 1612*); Romeo and Juliet, 1597 (a pirated text, 1599—good text, reprinted 1609); Love's Labour's Lost, 1598*; Henry IV, pt. I, 1598 (reprinted 1599*, 1604*, 1608*, 1613*); Henry IV, pt. II, 1600*; Henry V, 1600 (corrupt pirated text reprinted 1602); The Merchant of Venice, 1600*; A Midsummer Night's Dream, 1600*; Much Ado about Nothing, 1600*; The Merry Wives of Windsor, 1602* (corrupt pirated text); Hamlet, 1603* (corrupt pirated text), 1604* (complete text, reprinted 1611*); King Lear, 1608*; Troilus and Cressida, 1609*; Pericles, 1609* (reprinted 1611*), not included in the Folio.

The Plays

Shakespeare came to the theater at just the right time. The Theater—the first playhouse erected in London solely for plays—had been built in 1576; theater-going was increasingly popular; professional actors had gained competence and were prospering; and although the art of drama had not yet fully matured, most of the major problems of play writing had been resolved. Shakespeare's immediate predecessors—especially Marlowe and Kyd—were learning how to construct a plot with a theme, how to create character, and to write effective dramatic speeches and quick, lively dialogue. Moreover, the London theater was just becoming a national institution that, as never before or since, expressed the feelings of a nation. In addition, Shakespeare had to earn his living by writing plays that would please mixed audiences, so that he was not tempted to appeal solely either to the intellectuals or to the groundlings. Ben Jonson quipped that Shakespeare had little Latin and less Greek, but this could be an advantage. When Shakespeare wanted a metaphor or a simile, he was less inclined to borrow from the classics or the commonplace book; instead he used those direct experiences that came to him through his five senses, with the result that his words have a unique and permanent vitality.

Shakespeare's working life falls into four periods of activity, broken by intervals when the playhouses were shut because of outbreaks of the plague in London. These occurred in 1592 to 1594, 1603, and 1609 to 1611. In each period there were notable developments in his dramatic skill and technique.

The First Period—to 1594. To the period before 1594 belong the three parts of Henry VI, which begins with the funeral of Henry V and ends with the murder of the saintly but ineffectual Henry VI by Richard of Gloucester. Their general theme is the anarchy that befell England during the Wars of the Roses (1455–85) when the descendants of Edward III fought each other for the throne—a theme very close to Englishmen of the 1590s who feared that the death of Elizabeth I without an acknowledged heir would again lead to a disputed succession and general anarchy. In this period Shakespeare also wrote The Taming of the Shrew (a recasting of an old play), The Comedy of Errors (another version of Plautus's comedy of mistaken identities, The Twin Menechmi), The Two Gentlemen of Verona (a romantic story of the treachery of Proteus toward his friend Valentine), and the brilliant society play Love's Labour's Lost (which abounds in witty topicalities, most of which are now unintelligible). He also wrote one tragedy, Titus Andronicus, an accumulation of horrors—rape, mutilation, murder, and unwitting cannibalism—one of his most popular plays.

In all these early plays Shakespeare showed considerable facility with words and a conscious concern with literary art: alliteration, wordplay, puns, variety of meter, rhetorical devices of every kind, and an excess of elaborate, obvious poetic imagery used more for its own sake than to illumine meaning. At first Shakespeare was the clever amateur showing off his skill in entertaining an audience rather than a serious dramatist.

The Second Period—1594 to 1603. After the plague of 1592 to 1594, the playing companies were reorganized and Shakespeare became a full sharer in the Chamberlain's company. In Romeo and Juliet, his first great play (and the finest drama produced in English to that time), he had become a serious professional writer who saw significance behind the story, for the theme of the tragedy is not only the useless deaths of two passionate young lovers but the futility of family hatred. Similarly, in Richard III, which concluded the story of the Wars of the Roses with the death of Richard and the establishment of the Tudor dynasty, Shakespeare concentrated on the character of a man morally warped by physical deformity. Evil deeds bring inevitable retribution. In The Merchant of Venice he first showed complete mastery of dramatic technique. Shakespeare had considerable understanding of Shylock's wrongs and in the trial scene he touched, though not very deeply, on the fundamental issue of justice versus mercy.

About the same time as Romeo and Juliet, Shakespeare had returned to history in Richard II to show how the civil wars started; some two or three years later he wrote the two parts of Henry IV, which are concerned partly with the education of Prince Hal but even more with the disreputable adventures of Sir John Falstaff, the greatest comic character in English drama. Shakespeare ended the series with Henry V, the portrait of a great soldier-king. In these plays Shakespeare revealed deep understanding of the lonely responsibility, everlasting anxiety, and ruthlessness essential to a successful ruler of men. He also stressed the moral that, in dethroning the anointed King Richard II, Henry of Bolingbroke was the direct cause of the long agonies of the Wars of the Roses.

To this second period also belong the three most popular comedies: Much Ado about Nothing, which combines the romantic story of the wronging of Hero and the realistic comedy of how Benedick the vowed bachelor and Beatrice the sworn manhater are tricked into love; As You Like It, a pastoral romance with a considerable vein of mockery; and Twelfth Night, another story of the mistakes caused by twins, but so exquisitely wrought that it is the most frequently acted of all Shakespeare's comedies. The Merry Wives of Windsor, though still actable, is not one of the greater comedies; the attempt to show Falstaff in love (by royal command of Queen Elizabeth) was beyond anyone's powers, for Falstaff is essentially a man's man. In 1599, Shakespeare wrote also the Roman tragedy of Julius Caesar, a straight, competent dramatization of the story told in Plutarch's Lives; Antony's speech delivered at Caesar's funeral showed that Shakespeare had a full understanding of the arts of demagoguery. Hamlet, the most fascinating and most controverted play ever written, and Othello, the best constructed of all the tragedies, were written at the turn of the century, as was Troilus and Cressida, a bitter comment on false and romantic notions of love, honor, and war.

The art of drama had advanced very rapidly in the last years of the old queen, and Shakespeare now had rivals, chief among them Jonson, Marston, Chapman, and Dekker. Playgoers had become keen, critical, and sophisticated in their demands. At the accession of James I in March 1603, the prospects of Shakespeare's company improved, especially after the king had made them his own players; but in May the worst outbreak of plague for many years again interrupted playgoing until the end of the year.

The Third Period—1603 to 1616. In the third period, Shakespeare's first play was the "dark comedy" Measure for Measure; it reflects the newer moods of the public but is not one of his best. In it he states a stark problem in ethics—whether Claudio's life should be saved at the price of Isabella's chastity—but offers no other solution than darkling assignations, substituted lovers and heads, and a melodramatic happy ending. The play has, however, continued to intrigue modern critics.

The Tragedy of King Lear, the deepest of all the tragedies, was written in 1605–06. In it Shakespeare offers a vision of how the good is powerless against absolute evil, and how, ultimately, man can but "endure his going hence even as his coming hither." Macbeth was written about the same time; it dramatizes a story of ambition and murder and the subsequent degeneration of Macbeth and his ruthless wife. There are some signs that the play was written in haste to please King James. In both Lear and Macbeth the language is difficult because of its excessive concentration of phrase and image; the thought has become too overwhelming for clearly logical expression. Antony and Cleopatra followed, continuing the story of Antony to his ruin through his fatal passion for Cleopatra, a play which Shakespeare obviously wrote with zest; it abounds in his finest dramatic verse.

The last of the tragedies was Coriolanus, a political play in which the balance of antipathy (rather than of sympathy) is held evenly between the arrogance of a proud patrician and the opportunism of the tribunes of the people; but the major theme is the dominance of Volturnia over the son whom she has so disastrously molded. The last of the series was Timon of Athens, probably never finished, in which the misanthropy that had been accumulating in Shakespeare's plays reached its depth. By this time (1609) the taste of playgoers was turning from serious drama to the more facile kind of tragicomedy popularized by the two young dramatists Beaumont (1584–1616) and Fletcher (1579–1625).

Another long interruption occurred between 1609 and 1611. When Shakespeare resumed playwriting, his themes and methods changed. The next four plays were the comedies of the "final period." Shakespeare was only part author of Pericles; Cymbeline, a fantastic mingling of a story by Boccaccio of a bet on the chastity of a faithful wife and dubious Romano-British history, was dubbed by Dr. Johnson "unresisting imbecility." In The Winter's Tale, a dramatization of a story by Greene, the fatal suspicion of Leontes that his wife Hermione has committed adultery with his friend Polixenes is finally purged when the son of Polixenes is betrothed to Hermione's long-lost daughter Perdita.

The last of the comedies was The Tempest, which some regard as the finest and greatest of the poetic dramas. Shakespeare's last surviving play, Henry VIII (in which he may have collaborated with Fletcher), was a return to English history. As an oblique comment on the Reformation in England and its causes, the play is enigmatic, for, as the events are shown, the author's sympathies are all with Katherine, Henry's much wronged wife and Queen. To Shakespeare's contemporaries, for whom the Reformation was still a vital issue, the play would have been most remarkable for what it left unsaid.

Shakespeare also wrote two long narrative poems, Venus and Adonis and The Rape of Lucrece, and The Sonnets. Venus and Adonis (1593) tells how the goddess Venus hotly but vainly wooed the love of young Adonis, who was slain by a wild boar. The poem was regarded by contemporaries as lascivious; it was very popular. The Rape of Lucrece is a versifying of the sad story of how Lucrece, treacherously outraged by Tarquin, killed herself to redeem her lost honor. The Sonnets (published in 1609, but probably written in the 1590s) are mostly written to a beautiful young man. If they are autobiographical, they reveal a story of Shakespeare's relations with a young man of better fortune than himself, of quarrels and rivals, of the theft of the poet's mistress by the young friend, of reconciliation. A small group of the sonnets is addressed to the faithless mistress—the Dark Lady. Various candidates for the post of the young man have been proposed, of whom the two favorites are Henry Wriothesley, Earl of Southampton, and William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke; but for neither is the evidence as yet conclusive.

Shakespeare's Religion

Shakespeare has been claimed by Catholics, Anglicans, Puritans, and agnostics. For the Anglican claim, it can be pointed out that he and his children were all baptized in the Anglican church at Stratford, in which he was also buried. In his plays he echoes the English Bible and the Anglican Book of Common Prayer. But he shows equally a considerable knowledge of Catholic teaching, doctrine, and practice; and there is good evidence that his father, John Shakespeare, was a zealous Catholic, for in 1592 his name appears in a list of 42 who were reported to the Bishop of Worcester as "recusants."

His Father's "Will." More significant is a little-known document called "John Shakespeare's Will." The original, long since destroyed, was found hidden in the tiles of his house in Henley Street at Stratford. A transcript was made by a local antiquary, John Jordan, and published in The Gentleman's Magazine in 1783. The document was accepted as genuine by Edmund Malone, who reprinted it in his edition of Shakespeare's works in 1790. The will is a profession of the Catholic faith in the form of a spiritual testament in 14 clauses, each beginning with "I, John Shakespeare." The testator declares that at the time of writing he may die unprepared by any sacrament, and if so he prays that he may be spiritually anointed. This form of spiritual testament was drawn up by St. Charles BORROMEIO and was especially designed for times of religious persecution. Versions are known in Spanish, Italian, and the Swiss dialect. It is a sign of John Shakespeare's steadfastness that he hid rather than burnt so dangerous a document, especially after the troubles that befell his wife's family in 1583–84.

The senior member of the Arden family at that time was Edward Arden of Park Hall, who maintained a priest, Hugh Hall, to say Mass. In 1583, when the mission of St. Edmund CAMPION was still disturbing the Privy Council, Edward Arden's son-in-law, John Somerville, oppressed by private and religious troubles, went out of his mind, eluded his family, and made for London where he was heard to utter wild threats against the life of Elizabeth. As a result the whole family was involved in a charge of high treason. Edward Arden was condemned to death and executed by quartering at Smithfield on Dec. 26, 1584. His wife and Hall were also condemned. Mrs. Arden was subsequently pardoned; the priest and Somerville died in prison. Edward Arden was a cousin of Shakespeare's mother. Shakespeare was 20 at this time. In Warwickshire the chief agent in the persecution of the Ardens was that Sir Thomas Lucy who, according to the legends of Shakespeare's early manhood, was the cause of his flight from Stratford. When Shakespeare reemerged from obscurity, he dedicated his Venus and Adonis to the young Earl of Southampton, whose family was Catholic.

Catholic Sympathies. It is thus likely that Shakespeare was brought up in a Catholic home, but there is no evidence that he practiced the faith in his maturity. His sympathies in the plays—so far as the plays can be used as evidence—are generally Catholic. His priests, such as Friar Laurence in Romeo and Juliet, Friar Francis in Much Ado, the priest in Twelfth Night, are grave, patient, well-meaning men whom everyone respects. In Measure for Measure, the Duke, for worthy motives, disguises himself as a friar, and even hears confessions—an action which no one seemed to question.

The few Protestant ministers who appear in the plays are less admirable. Sir Hugh Evans in The Merry Wives is amusing; Sir Nathaniel in Love's Labour's Lost is a worthy man and a good bowler though an indifferent actor; in As You Like It, Sir Oliver Martext is a poor specimen. It is also relevant that in his version of King John, Shakespeare wiped out the hearty anti-Catholic propaganda of the old play he recast. In Hamlet there are several instances of Catholic doctrine and sentiment. The Ghost of Hamlet's father, for example, comes back from Purgatory (and not, as was more usual with returned ghosts in Elizabethan dramas, from a classical Hades), whither he was suddenly dispatched "unhousel'd, disappointed, unanealed"—without absolution, preparation or Extreme Unction; but to Hamlet, death is a consummation devoutly to be wished only if it leads to the annihilation of a dreamless sleep. Hamlet himself is more interested in man than in God.

While the early plays are sprinkled with Christian sentiments, orthodox and often quite conventional, the later plays, especially the tragedies, seem to indicate that Shakespeare had lapsed into an almost Greek belief in fate. Finally in The Tempest where—if ever—Shakespeare speaks out of part through Prospero, he sees the universe dissolving to leave not a rack—a wisp of cloud—behind.

We are such stuff
As dreams are made on; and our little life
Is rounded with a sleep.

Until further evidence is available, the question of Shakespeare's religious convictions and practice must remain unsolved. There is no record that he ever suffered for his faith either in purse or in person; unlike his father or Ben Jonson, he is not known to have been delated as a recusant or fined for failure to attend the services of the state Church. Nevertheless there is the flat statement of Archdeacon Richard Davies (d. 1708), a Warwickshire antiquary, that "he died a papist."

Bibliography: The bibliography of Shakespeare is enormous and increases yearly by more than 200 items. The best general guide is F. W. BATESON, ed., The Cambridge Bibliography of English Literature, 5 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1940–57). New work is recorded annually in Year's Work in English Studies (London 1919–), Shakespeare Survey (Cambridge, Eng. 1948–), and Shakespeare Quarterly (New York 1950–). The following is but a very short selection. General and reference. E. K. CHAMBERS, William Shakespeare: A Study of Facts and Problems, 2 v. (Oxford 1930) includes all relevant records and documents concerning Shakespeare. J. BARTLETT, A New and Complete Concordance . . . to the Dramatic Works of Shakespeare (London 1894, 1896, 1922, 1927, 1937). C. M. INGLEBY, The Shakespeare Allusion-Book, ed. J. J. MUNRO, 2 v. (London 1932). T. W. BALDWIN, William Shakespere's Small Latine and Lesse Greeke, 2 v. (Urbana, Ill. 1944) comprehensive account of Elizabethan education. H. GRANVILLE-BARKER and G. B. HARRISON, eds., A Companion to Shakespeare Studies (New York 1934). Stage conditions. E. K. CHAMBERS, The Elizabethan Stage, 4 v. (Oxford 1923). W. W. GREG, ed., Henslowe's Diary, 2 v. (London 1904–08); Henslowe Papers, idem. (London 1907). J. C. ADAMS, The Globe Playhouse (Cambridge, Mass. 1942). C. W. HODGES, The Globe Restored (London 1953). A. HARBAGE, Shakespeare's Audience (New York 1941). Sources of the plays. G. BULLOUGH, ed., Narrative and Dramatic Sources of Shakespeare (New York 1957–) in progress; 4 v. issued. Study of the text. W. W. GREG, The Shakespeare First Folio: Its Bibliographical and Textual History (Oxford 1955). Shakespeare's religion. (Catholic), H. MUTSCHMAN, Shakespeare and Catholicism (New York 1952). (Protestant). E. I. FRIPP, Shakespeare, Man and Artist, 2 v. (London 1938), very full about Shakespeare's Stratford background. Criticism. The best of the early criticism is included in D. N. SMITH, ed., Shakespeare Criticism (London 1916), beginnings to Carlyle. Of the established critics, the most important are: S. T. COLERIDGE, Coleridge's Shakespearean Criticism, ed. T. M. RAYSOR, 2 v. (London 1930). W. HAZLITT, Characters of Shakespeare's Plays (London 1917). E. DOWDEN, Shakespeare: A Critical Study of His Mind and Art (London 1875). A. C. BRADLEY, Shakespearean Tragedy (New York 1904). H. GRANVILLE-BARKER, Prefaces to Shakespeare, 5 series (London 1923–1947). Representative of modern approaches are G.

W. KNIGHT, The Wheel of Fire (London 1930). E. E. STOLL, Shakespeare Studies (New York 1927). C. F. E. SPURGEON, Shakespeare's Imagery, and What It Tells Us (New York 1936). R. B. HEILMAN, This Great Stage (Baton Rouge 1948). E. JONES, Hamlet and Oedipus (Garden City, N.Y. 1949). W. CLEMEN, The Development of Shakespeare's Imagery (Cambridge, Mass. 1951). Annotated texts. S. JOHNSON, ed. The Plays of William Shakespeare, 8 v. (London 1765). H. H. FURNESS, ed., A New Variorum Edition of Shakespeare (Philadelphia 1871–). U. ELLIS-FERMOR, ed., The Arden Shakespeare (new ed. Cambridge, Mass. 1951–). A. QUILLER-COUCH and J. D. WILSON, eds., The New Shakespeare (New York 1921–). G. B. HARRISON, ed., Shakespeare: The Complete Works (New York 1952). G. M. PINCISS, Forbidden Matter: Religion in the Drama of Shakespeare and His Contemporaries (Newark, Del.; London; and Cranbury, N.J., 2000). S. MARX, Shakespeare and the Bible (Oxford and New York 2000). H. FISCH, The Biblical Presence in Shakespeare, Milton, and Blake: A Comparative Study (Oxford and New York 1999). D. D. WATERS, Christian Settings in Shakespeare's Tragedies (Rutherford, N.J.; London; and Cranbury, N.J. 1994). R. W. BATTENHOUSE, ed., Shakespeare's Christian Dimension: An Anthology of Commentary. (Bloomington, Ind. 1994). J. DOLLIMORE, Radical Tragedy: Religion, Ideology, and Power in the Drama of Shakespeare and His Contemporaries (Durham, N.C. 2nd ed., 1993). R. R. REED, Crime and God's Judgment in Shakespeare (Lexington, Ky. 1984).

[G. B. HARRISON]

SHAMAN AND MEDICINE MAN

The Tungus term shaman, probably derived from the Sanskrit śramana (ascetic) via the Pali samana (Buddhist monk) is used by anthropologists for that class of male and female religious practitioners who acquire or purchase supernatural power to be used primarily in causing, diagnosing, or curing disease, but also in DIVINATION, rainmaking, communication with the dead, finding lost objects, and in hunting, war, and fertility MAGIC. Shamans are differentiated by social scientists from priests in that they do not study a specific body of doctrine, but acquire their powers as the result of a "vision quest" or other contact with the spirit world, while others pay to learn these skills through apprenticing themselves to famous practitioners. Also, shamans do not follow prescribed rituals, as priests do, but are free to develop individual "performances" that may involve narcotically induced trances, singing, dancing, drumming, sleight of hand, and such theatrical effects as the "shaking lodge" of the Salteaux or the private "angakok" language of Eskimo shamans. In early reports of travelers, and still in the popular press, shamans are often described as "medicine men," but this term and its synonyms, "conjurer," "witch doctor," "wizard," and "magician," are too imprecise for scholarly use.

Shamanism in its most developed form exists in eastern Siberia and Manchuria among the Tungus, Koryak, Ostyak, Chuckchee, Yakut, and Samoyed, where the sha-man maintains his position as spiritual leader by acting as intermediary between the ethnic group and the unseen world of gods, demons, and ancestral spirits. Related magical curing practices extend across northern Asia to the Lapps and Finno-Ugrian communities of Europe, and have been incorporated into popular BUDDHISM in Sri Lanka, Southeast Asia, Tibet, China, Korea, and Japan.

Shamanistic practices vary so widely throughout the New World that some may have resulted from independent invention rather than from diffusion from Asia. For instance, only Eskimo shamans are thought actually to be possessed by their spirit helpers during trances, as in Siberia, while elsewhere in the New World the spirits merely communicate their wishes through the entranced shaman as medium. Because shamans are paid for their services, they often become the richest members of their groups, and because their power is feared, they usually become politically powerful. In at least three areas, the American Southeast, among the Guarani of central South America, and in Sumatra, shamans have exercised effective political control. Thus, although a manifestation of epilepsy, transvestism, crippling disease, or other physical and mental disorder is often interpreted as a call to become a shaman, the evidence suggests that most shamans are fully in touch with their own cultural realities.

Like fetishism, shamanism has sometimes been used as a general category of primitive RELIGION, stressing the role of the magic practitioner in controlling spiritual forces. But such attempts to classify religions systems on the basis of one or more criteria have been superseded principally by studies that show how a religious system is integrated with its social and cultural matrix.

Bibliography: H. N. MICHAEL, ed., Studies in Siberian Shamanism (Toronto 1963). M. CZAPLICKA, Aboriginal Siberia (Oxford 1914) pt.3. S. M. SHIROKOGOROV, Psychomental Complex of the Tungus (London 1935), pt.4. M. ELIADE, Shamanism: Archaic Techniques of Ecstasy, tr. W. R. TRASK (Bollingen Series 76; rev. ed. New York 1964).

[D. J. CROWLEY]

SHAME

Shame is the painful feeling of finding oneself exposed, uncovered, and vulnerable. Shame takes different forms and serves different purposes. Shame anxiety relates to what is anticipated and is what people experience when they are suddenly exposed and sense the threat of rejection. The state of being ashamed, a complex cognitive and affective pattern, is a reaction to something which has already happened. The sense of shame serves to restrain a person's behavior and is sometimes referred to as a sense of discretion or modesty.

Female shaman mixes potion in Balinese village, Bali, Indonesia. (©Buddy Mays/CORBIS)

Distinctions between Shame and Guilt. Shame and guilt are closely related and yet are distinct phenomena. Some affect theorists see guilt as part of the shame family of emotions, arguing that guilt is at least shame about action. However, the two terms seem to refer to different experiential worlds. Experiences having to do with shame typically include embarrassment, humiliation, disgrace, ridicule, dishonor, and weakness. Guilt seems to touch on the experience of transgression, injury, debt, obligation, and wrongdoing. Shame involves more of a physiological response than guilt does. From a psychoanalytic perspective, shame is a response to the self's shortcomings or failure whereas guilt is a response to some transgression. Shame has a more global character while guilt typically points to something specific.

Anthropological Perspectives. There is a tendency in contemporary society to minimize, if not deny, the role of shame in adult life. To bolster this position, reference is sometime made to the distinction in anthropology between shame cultures and guilt cultures. According to this distinction, ancient and traditional societies maintain social control through shame because they depend on external sanctions, whereas modern societies that employ internal sanctions depend on guilt. Modern society is seen as having advanced beyond shame. As a result of such a perspective the role of shame in creating and maintaining certain pathologies, as well as the positive contribution shame makes to maintaining a healthy sense of self, is often overlooked.

A more balanced anthropological perspective on shame is willing to acknowledge its positive dimension. By sustaining the human need for privacy, shame functions as a protective covering for the process of self-integration. The sense of shame connects here with awe, that religious feeling elicited in the presence of the holy whose mystery must be respected. An appropriate sense of shame indicates that one has a proper estimation of the mystery of oneself as well as of the surrounding world and knows one's place within it. Shame is like the protective covering over the tremendum of which Rudolf Otto spoke in his analysis of the experience of the holy.

The other side of shame, better known by most people, is one's uncomfortable awareness that one falls short of what one should be. It is the feeling that there is a major discrepancy between the ideal and the reality of oneself. In some significant way the self is perceived to be wanting, to be defective. The efforts to block the pain of this type of shame explain a number of behavioral problems and interpersonal difficulties.

Dynamics of Shame as a Painful Affect. Affect theorists see shame as a feeling that functions to increase awareness so that a person is more attuned to whatever activated shame and the varied mental and physical responses that stimulus elicited. Shame as a sense of defectiveness begins in significant interpersonal relationships such as a child has with its parents. One way of thinking about the shame-inducing process is to focus on the interpersonal bridge that exists between a person and significant others in his or her life. Such a bridge is built on expectations that the other will respond in an appropriate way to particular needs that are expressed, such as the need for affirmation. Shame originates when that bridge is severed and the other fails to respond. Basic expectations of that other are suddenly revealed as wrong.

Shame is an alienating affect in which the sharp awareness that the self is in some way deficient as a human being affects how one lives and operates. It is not a trivial experience, for there seems to be no way to change the situation of one's basic deficiency. Shame impacts on the whole self; it is a soul sickness. A process of internalization further insures that a given shame experience has lasting influence through the beliefs and attitudes about the self as defective that come to shape one's sense of identity.

As a painful affect shame invites certain defending strategies. Contempt for others, blaming, rage, or perfectionism are strategies which are designed to help a person cope with shame. However, employing such strategies leads to distorted relationships with others. People can come to disown those parts of themselves which have provoked the shame experience. Addictions can emerge to further mask and hide the shame-producing aspect of the self. Twelve-step programs such as Alcoholics Anonymous seek to address the issue of shame as well as to guide people in forming more adequate images of self.

Shame and Culture. Culture is itself an interpersonal bridge that holds people together. It deems certain activities and behaviors as appropriate, and consequently shields those who engage in such activities and behaviors from the discomfort of shame which they might experience in a different culture. At the same time, culture can subtly dictate the way people are to act and respond, providing them with a cultural "script" to be followed in the course of their life. So, for instance, in American society there are proposed scripts which, when ignored, bring shame to those who do not adhere to them. Three such scripts are commonly described as prominent on the American scene. The success script proposes that success through accomplishments is the way to declare one's worth; not to succeed is to reveal one's inadequacy. The independence script suggests that a cause for pride is one's self-sufficiency; a cause for shame is one's neediness. The popularity script underscores the importance of conformity; it is shameful to be different.

In the face of such cultural forces, the Christian theological tradition reminds people of their innate dignity and value as persons made in the image of God. It urges an acceptance and indeed a celebration of human finitude and limitations before a God who is infinite. Finally, the cross, an ancient instrument of shame and now the Christian symbol, reminds believers of how Christ has embraced all of human suffering and liberated humanity from all that weighs it down.

Bibliography: R. H. ALBERS, Shame: A Faith Perspective (New York 1995). G. KAUFMAN, Shame: The Power of Caring, 3d ed., revised and expanded (Rochester, Vt. 1992). D. L. NATHANSON, Shame and Pride: Affect, Sex, and the Birth of the Self (New York and London 1992). C. D. SCHNEIDER, Shame, Exposure, and Privacy (New York 1977). The Widening Scope of Shame, ed. M. R. LANSKY and A. P. MORRISON (Hillsdale, N.J. 1997). L. WURMSER, The Mask of Shame (Northvale, N.J. 1981).

[R. STUDZINSKI]

SHARBEL MAKHLOUF, ST.

Maronite hermit (see MARONITES); b. in the mountain village of Biqa-Kafra, Lebanon, May 8, 1828; d. Dec. 24, 1898. The youngest of five children born to a poor Maronite family, he was christened Joseph. At the age of 23 he entered the monastery of Our Lady of Mayfouk (north of Byblos). After two years of novitiate, in 1853, he was sent to St. Maron monastery in Annaya where he pronounced the monastic vows and took on the name of an early Eastern martyr, Sharbel. He then studied philosophy and theology in the monastery of Kfifan where his teachers, one of whom was Bl. Neemtallah El Hardini (1808–1858), nurtured within him a deep love for monastic life. After he was ordained to the priesthood in 1859, Sharbel was sent back to the St. Maron monastery where he lived for the next 16 years.

In 1875 Sharbel asked for and was granted permission to take up residence in St. Peter and Paul hermitage, located on a hill near the monastery. He lived there for the last 23 years of his life. Although he did not leave behind any writings, his life and love for God became an open book read by many people, and God granted him the gift of performing miracles even during his lifetime. He suffered a stroke during the Holy Liturgy, Dec. 18, 1898, and died a week later at the age of 70. His tomb in the Monastery of Saint Maron in Annaya, Lebanon, is a place of pilgrimage.

On the evening of St. Sharbel's funeral, his superior wrote, "Because of what he will do after his death, I need not talk about his behavior." A few months after his death a bright light was seen surrounding his tomb. When his superiors opened it, they found his body still intact. Pope Paul VI beatified Sharbel at the closing of the Second Vatican Council, Dec. 5, 1965, and on Oct. 9, 1977 he canonized him.

Feast: Dec. 24.

Bibliography: P. DAHER, A Miraculous Star in the East, Charbel Makhlof (Beirut 1952). J. EID, The Hermit of Lebanon (New York 1955). J. P. HADDAD, Charbel un saint du liban (ed. Maisonneuve 1978).

[D. ASHKAR]

SHAUGHNESSY, GERALD

Fourth bishop of Seattle, Wash., diocese (now archdiocese); b. Everett, Mass., May 19, 1887; d. Seattle, May 18, 1950. He was the son of Joseph and Margaret (Colwell) Shaughnessy, and attended Boston College on a Cronin scholarship, graduating in 1909. From then until 1916 he taught in Maryland, Montana, and Utah, where he became acquainted with the Society of Mary. He entered their novitiate Sept. 7, 1916, taking perpetual vows May 10, 1918. After theological studies at Marist College in Washington, D.C., he was ordained there June 20, 1920, by Abp. (later Cardinal) John Bonzano, Apostolic Delegate to the U.S. In addition to earning baccalaureate, licentiate, and doctoral degrees in theology at the Catholic University of America, he was a member of the apostolic delegation from 1919 to 1932, professor at Marist College from 1920 to 1923 and 1928 to 1930, member of the original staff of Notre Dame Seminary, New Orleans, La., from 1923 to 1924, and a member of the Marist Mission Band from 1924 to 1928. On completion of his second novitiate at Lyons, France, from 1930 to 1931, he did special literary work in Rome, and the next year became master of the Marist second novitiate in Washington. On July 1, 1933, he was named to the see of Seattle and was consecrated on September 19 by Abp. Amleto G. Cicognani, then Apostolic Delegate, at the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception, Washington, D.C.

Beginning his episcopate during the Great Depression, he put the precarious finances of the diocese on a firm footing and launched a strenuous program of building and consolidating. In 1938 he convoked the Fifth Diocesan Synod of Seattle. In addition to his fiscal and pastoral activities he was given charge of the Missionary Servants of the Most Holy Trinity and approved the SERRA INTERNATIONAL for priestly vocations. He contributed to the (old) Catholic Encyclopedia supplement and to various reviews, and published an often quoted statistical study, Has the Immigrant Kept the Faith? (1925). He also adapted from the French two works of Julius Grimal, published under the English titles To Die with Jesus (1925) and With Jesus to the Priesthood (1932).

Richly endowed intellectually, he was also an energetic worker, spending himself with unstinted devotion until November 1945 when he suffered a serious stroke from which he never completely recovered. On Feb. 28, 1948, the coadjutor he had requested was granted him in the person of Thomas A. Connolly, Auxiliary Bishop of San Francisco, who succeeded him on his death.

Bibliography: Archives of the Society of Mary: General, in Rome; Provincial, in Washington, D.C.

[N. A. WEBER]

SHEA, JOHN DAWSON GILMARY

Historian; b. New York City, July 22, 1824; d. Elizabeth, N.J., Feb. 22, 1892. His father, James Shea, emigrated from Ireland to New York City to become principal of the Columbia College grammar school, which John attended, and a leader in local Democratic politics. His mother, Mary Ann (Flannigan) Shea, was from an old Boston family and a descendant of Nicholas Upsall, who came to America with Gov. John Winthrop in 1630. Shea early evidenced an interest in Catholic history; he obtained work with a Spanish merchant in order to acquire a knowledge of the language, and at the age of 14 he published a biography of Cardinal Alvarez Carrillo de Arbornóz in the Young People's Catholic Magazine (1838). Although he turned to the study of law and was admitted to the New York bar (1846), Shea continued his interest in Catholic history with a number of articles in the U.S. Catholic Magazine. He joined the Society of Jesus (1848), taking the name Gilmary; he studied at St. John's College, Fordham, N.Y., and St. Mary's College, Montreal, Canada, until 1852, when he left the Society to resume his historical work. His Discovery and Exploration of the Mississippi Valley (1852) brought favorable notice from non-Catholic scholars and launched a career during which he wrote or edited more than 250 titles. His articles appeared in popular Catholic serials, notably the Catholic World, the American Catholic Quarterly Review, and the Boston Pilot, and also in popular encyclopedias.

John Dawson Gilmary Shea.

In 1854 he married Sophie Savage and thereafter engaged in numerous endeavors to support his family. He contracted with publishing firms for such well received school histories as A General History of Modern Europe (1854), An Elementary History of the U.S. (1855), and The Catholic Church in the U.S. (1856). He contributed also to Justin Winsor's noted history, acted as historiographer of the Archdiocese of New York, and served as editor of D. and J. Sadlier's General Catholic Directory and Almanac (1859–90), of the Historical Magazine (1859–65), and of the Catholic News (1889–92). None of this interfered with his labor in American Catholic history. His early interest in Catholic missions among the natives led in 1854 to the History of the Catholic Missions among the Native American Tribes of the U.S., 1529–1854 and to the 26-volume Cramoisy Series of Jesuit explorations in North America (1857–87). His reputation as an authority on the Native Americans was advanced by his editing of the 15-volume Library of American Linguistics (1860–74), a collection of grammars and dictionaries. Shea's great work, however, was his four-volume History of the Catholic Church in the U.S. (1886–92), on which he was working at his death.

Shea's research received some support from Georgetown University, Washington, D.C., whose centennial history he wrote in 1891, and from the Plenary Council of Baltimore in 1884. Nevertheless, he failed to win an appointment at The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., and there was little market for his works in Catholic schools and colleges. He was a pioneer in his work, arousing interest as cofounder and first president of the U.S. Catholic Historical Society (1884) and laboriously collecting the sources for future historical research. He left a large collection of Americana and a tradition of careful scholarship, reliability, and bibliographical diligence. Recognition of his primary position in American Catholic historiography came from Fordham and Georgetown, which gave him honorary degrees, and from the University of Notre Dame, Ind., which awarded him its Laetare medal (1883).

In addition to the works already mentioned. Shea's best-known books include his Hierarchy of the Catholic Church in the U.S. (1886), as well as Early Voyages up and down the Mississippi (1861), The Operations of the French Fleet under Count de Grasse (1864), a translation of P. F. X. Charlevoix's History and General Description of New France 6 v. (1866–72), The Life of Pius IX (1877), The Catholic Churches of N.Y.C. (1878), The Catholic Church in Colonial Days (1883), and The Story of a Great Nation (1886).

Bibliography: R. J. PURCELL, Dictionary of American Biography, ed. A. JOHNSON and D. MALONE (New York 1928–36) 17:50–51. P. K. GUILDAY, John Gilmary Shea: Father of American Catholic History, 1824–1892 (New York 1926). J. D. THOMAS, "A Century of American Catholic History," U.S. Catholic Historian 6 (Winter 1987) 25–49.

[J. L. MORRISON]

SHECHEM

Shechem was an important city in ancient Palestine. It was named (Heb. šekem, shoulders) because of its position in the valley between the “shoulders” of Mt. Ebal to the north and Mt. Gerizim to the south. It has been identified as Tell Balâṭah, east of Nablus and partially covered to the south by the modern Arab village of Balâṭah. Between 1913 and 1934, five expeditions of German archeologists dug at the site; their work was corrected and completed by five American expeditions between 1956 and 1964 under the direction of G. E. Wright. Although the archeological findings, Biblical testimony, and pertinent extra-Biblical texts do not always clearly agree with one another, they have shed sufficient light on each other to afford a substantially reliable history of this Canaanite-Israelite city.

Early History. The site bears scattered evidence of encampments in the Chalcolithic Period (c. 4000 B.C.), but the first real building activity dates from the Early Middle Bronze Period (c. 1800 B.C.) and was perhaps the work of the AMORRITES, whose great migrations are generally assigned to the latter period. Two Egyptian texts from this time are the earliest extra-Biblical references to Shechem, and they suggest that the city was even then a center of opposition to Egypt.

The Hyksos Period in its earliest phase (1750–1650 B.C.) has revealed a large wall separating the acropolis from the lower city, and also a courtyard structure similar to a Hittite courtyard temple. This apparently sacred area was abandoned for a time (perhaps because of a wave of later Hyksos invaders, known as the Hurrians or Horrites) and, in the Hyksos Period in its later phase (1650–1550 B.C.), was covered with an artificial mound upon which a mighty temple-fortress was built. The city fortifications were expanded to the north, and a new city wall was constructed, with two gates built into it on the northwest and the east; this latter gate was destroyed three times within the 50 years that marked the end of the Shechem of the Hyksos and Middle Bronze Period. This destruction is usually attributed to the Egyptian reconquest of Canaan. The next extra-Biblical witnesses to Shechem picture its king as a vassal of Egypt: in letters found at Tell el-Amarna in Egypt Lab'ayu, King of Shechem, protests to the Pharaoh against the charge that he is in league with the marauding bands of the Habiri (possibly including the HEBREWS) who had been causing great disturbance in Canaan (Late Bronze Period, c. 1375 B.C.).

Patriarchal Period. The Israelite traditions of the Patriarchs refer to the Shechem of the Early Middle Bronze Period, but their historical value is very difficult to assess. Several of them give the impression of a peaceful settlement in and around the city. Abraham's first stop in Canaan is at the sanctuary (māqôm) of Shechem, by the sacred terebinth, where God appears to him. He builds an altar there and then passes on to build an altar near Bethel (Gn 12.6–8). Jacob also comes to Shechem, where he buys land near the city from the “sons of Hemor.” There he erects a memorial pillar (or perhaps an altar). After burying the family idols under the sacred terebinth, he commands that his family perform rites of purification in preparation for the journey to Bethel, where he then constructs an altar to God (Gn 33.18–20; 35.1–5). Later, Jacob sends Joseph to visit his brothers who are pasturing their flocks at Shechem (Gn 37.12–14). There is much in these traditions, however, that seems to reflect later history. The building of a sanctuary by the patriarchs seems to be a later justification for Israelite worship at a formerly Canaanite shrine. The journey from Shechem to Bethel, especially in the Jacob narrative, has the characteristics of a pilgrimage, which may reflect a later transfer of the ark from Shechem to Bethel (note the “great fear” in Gn 35.5, like the terror in the ranks of Israel's enemies when the ark was carried into battle). Jacob's renunciation of idolatry may reflect the later covenant ritual performed by Joshua at Shechem (Jos 24.15). Joseph's visit to Shechem, as well as the entire tradition of a peaceful settlement at Shechem, seems to reflect the arrival of the Josephite tribes Ephraim and Manasseh under Joshua, who was able to take possession of Shechem without a notable struggle.

Such an interpretation is further urged by the very ancient pre-Mosaic tradition of a violent capture of Shechem by the tribes of Simeon and Levi (Gn 34.1–31), achieved through a treachery that was later held to be the cause of their dissolution (Gn 49.5–7). This tradition concerning a pact made with Shechem, the son of Hemor (Heb. ḥāmôr), as well as the tradition of Jacob's purchase of land from the sons of Hemor (Gn 33.19), may well point to covenants between the Israelites and an Amorrite-Horrite population of Shechem. The Amorrites and Horrites (not always clearly distinguished in the Biblical traditions, and sometimes confused also with the Hevites) are known to have included the slaughter of an ass as part of their covenant ritual. Since ḥāmôr is the Hebrew word for ass, the original sense of “sons of Hemor” may well be “sons of the Ass Covenant.” That Shechem was known as such a covenant center is indicated also by the name of the city's god Baal-berith (Lord of the Covenant: Jgs 9.4). Since the Hurrians formed part of the later Hyksos migration, it seems that these traditions concerning the sons of Hemor have preserved elements from Israel's first contacts with the native population of Shechem. It is impossible to determine historically the origins of the Simeon-Levi tradition, nor can one refer the archeological data to a particular event in the scriptural traditions with any certitude; still, the Simeon-Levi tradition may illumine the historical background of the expanded fortifications at Shechem during the Hyksos Period, and perhaps even the destruction of the city at the end of this period, while others see it as reflecting the later unrest of the Tell el-Amarna Period. In either case, the tradition may partially explain how a previous Israelite occupation of Shechem prepared the way for JOSHUA, SON OF NUN, to gain peaceful control of the city.

Period of Joshua and the Judges. After the Hyksos Period, Shechem went into decline. There was some reconstruction, however. A new temple, with much slighter walls, was built on the site of the former great temple, and a large memorial stone (maṣṣēbâ) was set at its entrance. Also, the East Gate was refortified, although the city defenses were now much weaker than before. The layers at the area of the East Gate make it clear that the transition from Late Bronze to Early Iron (c. 1200 B.C.) was made peacefully. There is no clear evidence of a destruction of the temple throughout the Iron I Period even into the period of the divided monarchy, although several pits dug into the temple site in the 8th century B.C. contained debris from a great fire.

The Biblical testimony agrees with the archeological in suggesting Joshua's peaceful acquisition of the city. Nowhere is Shechem listed among the cities conquered by Israel. The ancient tradition of the Shechem covenant (Jos 24.1–28) suggests rather that the immigrating Josephite tribes settled peacefully with the former inhabitants of the city (Jos 24.15; Gn 48.22, where memories of past struggles are combined with the peaceful acquisition by the Josephite tribes). Some regard this tradition as the basis for an ancient covenant feast at Shechem. In its present position, it forms a second conclusion to the book of Joshua, and seemingly also a conclusion to a postexilic Deuteronomic edition of the HEXATEUCH. The content of the treaty, as well as the ritual followed, are noticeably absent from the text, but are possibly contained in the code of the BOOK OF THE COVENANT (Ex 20.22–33) and the Sinai ritual of Ex 34.3–8, both the code and the ritual having been transposed to an ancient Sinai context by the DEUTERONOMISTS lest they detract from the later Deuteronomic material. Sometime after the occupation of Shechem by the Josephite tribes, a site there became known as the tomb of Joseph (Jos 24.32). As a shrine, Shechem was now gradually eclipsed by Siloe.

The rise and fall of Abimelech (Jgs 9.1–57) centers around Shechem. He was crowned king at the terebinth (9.6), surely to be linked with the sacred tree in the Abraham, Jacob, and Joshua stories, and perhaps identical with the "Terebinth of the Diviners" (where oracles were received) in Jgs 9.37. The Beth-Mello (House of the Filling) of this story (9.6) is most likely the acropolis of the city, which had been filled in with earth and separated by a wall from the lower city. Magdal-Shechem (Fortress of Sicheim, 9.48) may be the same area, but is more likely the temple-fortress itself, also called the Temple of Baalberith (9.46). The debris piled into the pits later dug into the temple area is thought to date from Abimelech's destruction of the temple (9.49), but there is no clear evidence of a destruction of the temple itself in the Early Iron Age. The topography of Shechem in the Abimelech narrative would also correspond well to that of a much earlier date, as would the mention of the "men of Hemor" (9.28). Perhaps the Abimelech story has its roots in the turbulent Hyksos Period and only secondarily has been inserted into the lists of the Judges.

Monarchical Period and Final Stages. That Shechem was still relatively important is clear: David could rejoice in possessing it [Ps 59(60).8—an ancient oracle quoted in a postexilic Psalm]; Roboam came here to be crowned (1 Kgs 12.1); after the kingdom was divided, Jeroboam made Shechem his capital for a time (1 Kgs 12.25). As a shrine, however, Shechem was now still further eclipsed by Bethel. It appears to have remained an important administrative center, however, as a Samaria ostrakon indicates, and as may be reflected in the construction of a granary upon the former temple site. A clear division between upper and lower class dwellings appears, the former having suffered more serious damage in the Assyrian conquest (c. 724 B.C.).

Shechem remained very sparsely inhabited and for a time was totally abandoned until the Hellenistic rebirth of the city in the 4th century B.C. It seems to have been rebuilt by the Samaritans, who were no longer able to settle in thoroughly paganized Samaria, and who then sought refuge in the city beneath their mighty temple on Mt. Garizim. The Jewish high priest John Hyrcanus devastated the city in 127 B.C., though it lingered on for a few years afterward. In the Roman Period, New Testament SICHAR was most likely on this site.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 2204–08. E. F. CAMPBELL, JR. and J. F. ROSS, "The Excavation of Sicheim and the Biblical Tradition," The Biblical Archaeologist (New Haven 1938–) 26:2–27. J. L'HOUE, "L'Alliance de Sicheim," Revue biblique (Paris 1892–) 69:5–36, 161–184, 350–368.

[P. J. KEARNEY]

SHEED, FRANCIS JOSEPH

Writer, lecturer, publisher, Catholic activist, and lay theologian; b. Sydney, Australia, March 20, 1897; d. Jersey City, N.J., Nov. 20, 1981. Sheed's mother was Mary (Min) Maloney, a Roman Catholic who emigrated from County Cork by herself at age 14, and his father was John Sheed, a Marxist from a staunch Scotch-Irish Presbyterian family. At age six, for two years, while his father's job took him elsewhere, and under his mother's influence, Sheed practiced Catholicism and was sent, at age eight, to the parish school run by Sacred Heart nuns. After two weeks, his father ordered him to attend public school and for the next six years, the Methodist Church. In The Church and I (1974), Sheed details the variety of "brain-washings" in his childhood: "Methodism three times every Sunday, Marxism at breakfast and dinner . . . confession at a local Sacred Heart Fathers' mission one Saturday morning each month, daily Mass and communion during the two weeks of my father's annual vacation."

Sheed earned a law degree from Sydney University after a four-year break during his studies for a trip to England, to which he later returned. In London, he joined the Catholic Evidence Guild, which had been founded in 1918, with the encouragement of Cardinal Bourne, to train lay speakers for outdoor platforms in Hyde Park and at London street corners. Sheed became one of the most able speakers in the guild, ultimately giving 7,000 soap-box speeches during his lifetime. According to the London Times (Nov. 24, 1981), "He had a remarkable gift for the lucid exposition of doctrine of which he had a considerably deeper knowledge than is acquired by the average layman, a simple, effective platform style, [and] a sense of humour that won the goodwill of his hecklers." In 1926, he married fellow guild member, Maisie Ward, and together they founded the publishing house of Sheed & Ward (on Pater Noster Row next to Ave Maria Lane), with the purpose of publishing authors of the English Catholic Revival. Hilaire Belloc, G. K. Chesterton, Christopher Dawson, and Edward I. Watkin became advisers and writers for the early company and were soon followed by other English authors: Christopher Hollis, Ronald Knox, "Sheed & Ward's lead Englishman" (W. Sheed, Frank and Maisie), Caryll Houslander, and numerous others. Translations of continental authors soon followed: Jacques Maritain, Paul Claudel, François Mauriac, Léon Bloy, Romano Guardini, and Sigrid Undset.

In 1933, Sheed & Ward opened a New York branch with little capital and without "statues, altarpieces, vestments . . . or Catholic textbooks" (The Church and I). For 40 years, the aim would be to publish books "just above the middle of the brow." Dorothy DAY and Catherine de HUECK, American Catholic activists, would have works published, as well as would more controversial writers: Henri de LUBAC, Hans Küng, Charles Davis, and Karl ADAM.

Sheed, after commuting across the Atlantic for six years, moved his family (wife Maisie, daughter Rosemary—later a translator for Sheed & Ward—and son Wilfrid—later the novelist and critic) to Jersey City in 1940, but he would continue to travel between the United States, London, and Australia for the rest of his life.

The early works of Sheed, the writer, were translations: Etienne GILSON's The Philosophy of St. Bonaventure (1938), The Confessions of St. Augustine (1942), Oreste Ferrara's The Borgia Pope, Alexander the Sixth (1942), and numerous lives of the saints by Henri Gheon. Sheed's street corner speeches led him to write his own books, beginning with Nullity of Marriage (1931), followed by A Map of Life (1933), Ground Plan for Catholic Reading (1937), in 1938, Communism and Man (used in some communist study groups), Theology and Sanity (1947), Society and Sanity (1953), To Know Christ Jesus (1962), God and the Human Condition (1966), and Genesis Regained (1969). After Vatican II, Sheed wrote Is It the Same Church? (1968) and generally concluded that "the Church will re-shape itself, more or less ideally" and "only the innocent would prophesy" (The Church and I).

In 1973, Sheed & Ward was sold to the Universal Press Syndicate and the firm name was changed to Andrews & McNeel, with the Sheed & Ward imprint used to reissue "Sheed & Ward classics."

In the years following the sale of Sheed & Ward, Sheed continued his speaking at universities and elsewhere. He was no longer the "flaming radical" who had "dared to poach the clerical preserve and assert the layman's right to think" [Wilfrid Sheed, Current Biography (1981) 373]. This self-taught lay theologian, whose humor was noted by all, received "during the . . . post-war [period], an honor that no lay Catholic had ever come close to: a doctorate in sacred theology from Rome itself, entitling him to wear a four-pointed biretta (priests only rate three)" (W. Sheed, Frank and Maisie, 202).

Bibliography: Contemporary Authors, v. 105 (Detroit) 447. S. G. KENNEDY, New York Times (Nov. 21, 1981). Newsweek (Nov. 30, 1981) 110. Publishers Weekly (Dec. 4, 1981) 16. F. SHEED, The Church and I (New York 1974). W. SHEED, Frank and Maisie: A Memoir with Parents (New York 1985).

[M. MAHONEY]

SHEEHAN, LUKE FRANCIS

Capuchin missionary, pioneer of the Church in Oregon; b. Feb. 28, 1873, Cork City, Ireland; d. Feb. 11, 1937, Hood River, Oregon. After his ordination in 1896 and teaching philosophy for six years in the Capuchin house of formation in Kilkenny, Sheehan volunteered to work in Aden, the British colony on the Southwestern coast of the Arabian peninsula. Illness forced him to return to Ireland. In 1910 he went to Hermiston, Oregon after Bishop Joseph O'Reilly of the Diocese of Baker City asked the Irish Capuchins to come to the United States. Leaving a confrere to care for Hermiston, Sheehan moved to reconnoiter Crook County, Oregon, and the barely developed town of Bend where there were only one hundred and fifty Catholics scattered over an area of eight thousand square miles. When the railroad came to Bend in 1916, Sheehan began building a new church and, shortly thereafter, a clinic that became what is today St. Charles Medical Center. Twenty years later he succeeded in opening a parish school. In addition to suffering innumerable physical hardships, he endured the bigotry of many of Crook County's residents, especially members of the Ku Klux Klan. In 1935 he courageously challenged the Klan at one of their meetings and was instrumental in their decline in Oregon. Sheehan died twenty-seven years after his arrival in Bend. His Capuchin confreres praised him as "the greatest missionary of them all whose life bore great fruit, for he was a man of single purpose."

Bibliography: C. DONOVAN, "The Irish Capuchins in the United States of America," Capuchin Annual (1973), 249-289.

[R. J. ARMSTRONG]

SHEEN, FULTON J.

Radio preacher, television personality, bishop; b. El Paso, Illinois, May 8, 1895; d. New York, N.Y., Dec. 9, 1979. He was one of the four sons of Newton Morris and Delia (Fulton) Sheen. Baptized Peter, he took the name of John at confirmation and later adopted his mother's maiden name. While still a small child, he moved with his family to Peoria where he attended Saint Mary's Cathedral School and then went on to Spalding Institute, a Peoria high school then conducted by the Brothers of Mary where he graduated in 1913. It was at Saint Viator College, Bourbonnais, Illinois, that young Sheen's forensic talents as a member of the debating team, which for the first time defeated Notre Dame, foreshadowed his future fame. He was likewise on the editorial staff of The Viatorian, the journal of his college that had been founded in 1865 by the Clerics of Saint Viator.

Having received his A.B. in 1917, along with his classmate and fellow diocesan, Charles A. Hart, a future professor of philosophy in the CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA, the two pursued their theological training in the Saint Paul Seminary, Saint Paul, Minnesota, which ended with ordination to the priesthood on Sept. 20, 1919. After receiving S.T.L. and J.C.B. degrees at The CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA in 1920 Sheen was sent by Edmund M. Dunne, Bishop of Peoria, himself a Louvain alumnus, to The Catholic University of LOUVAIN where he earned his Ph.D. degree, winning in 1925 for his scholarly volume, God and Intelligence in Modern Philosophy, Louvain's coveted Agrégé en philosophie, the first American to receive this distinction. Further studies at the Sorbonne and Rome's Collegio Angelico brought the S.T.D. degree, whereupon the young priest returned to Peoria where for a year he served as a curate at Saint Patrick's Church.

Called to the faculty of The Catholic University of America in 1926, Sheen taught theology and the philosophy of religion there until 1950 when he was appointed National Director of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith with residence in New York. By this time he had attained a national reputation for his broadcasts on the Catholic Hour, a reputation that was enhanced by his "Life Is Worth Living" telecasts begun in 1951, as well as for his preaching, notably in Saint Patrick's Cathedral, New York. Many of these religious discourses were later published and constituted a majority of the nearly 70 books that appeared under his name. Meanwhile he instructed an uncommon number of converts from those of humble station such as his devoted housekeeper, Fanny Washington, to nationally known figures such as the journalist Heywood Broun, Clare Boothe Luce, et al. As the years passed Fulton Sheen was the recipient of numerous honors in the form of awards and honorary degrees, along with ecclesiastical distinctions from that of papal chamberlain (1934) to the rank of bishop in 1951 and titular archbishop of Newport in 1969. For three less-than-happy years (1966-1969) he served as the sixth bishop of Rochester, N.Y.

Influence. Fulton Sheen's influence was unquestionably widespread: from groups of priests and members of religious orders and congregations to whom he frequently recommended a practice of his own life, namely, a daily hour of prayer, to vast audiences of lay persons, both Catholic and non-Catholic, to whom he brought a religious perspective on life and its meaning, as well as eloquent and forceful addresses on world problems such as the dangers of communism.

The present writer lived with Sheen for three years (1938-41) in his residence on Cathedral Avenue in Washington, where he was a daily observer of the dynamic churchman's notable generosity to those in need, and his unflinching consideration for and courtesy to those around him. It can be said that with the sole exception of a strain of vanity over his prowess as a public speaker it would be difficult to think of any serious defect in the man. And in this regard his extraordinary gift of a beautiful and compelling voice, a marked flair for the dramatic, along with normally well-reasoned content, humanly speaking, the vanity was understandable. The bishop was a man of deep conviction, and when he felt he was in the right he withstood all opposition, for example, in his difference with Cardinal Francis SPELLMAN, Archbishop of New York, over the disposition of the funds of the Society for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.

As he once told me, he consciously abandoned the life of a scholar for that of the preacher, realizing in a realistic way that it was impossible to serve both simultaneously. All things considered, it was a wise decision, for there can be no doubt that Sheen possessed unique gifts for public address, gifts that were employed with telling effect as thousands of his immense audience would bear testimony.

It is owed to the memory of this remarkable churchman to state that in his hey-day almost literally millions called his name blessed for the religious inspiration, the kindling of renewed hope, and the spiritual enrichment that he brought to their lives.

Bibliography: Treasure in Clay. The Autobiography of Fulton J. Sheen (Garden City, N.Y. 1980). J. T. ELLIS, Catholic Bishops: A Memoir (Wilmington, Del. 1984) 78–84. K. RILEY, Bishop Fulton J. Sheen: An American Catholic Response to the Twentieth Century (Ph.D. diss., Notre Dame 1988). M. MASSA, Catholics and American Culture: Fulton Sheen, Dorothy Day, and the Notre Dame Football Team (New York 1999).

[J. T. ELLIS]

SHEEN CHARTERHOUSE

Or House of Jesus of Bethlehem, former Carthusian priory, founded by King Henry V on a royal manor at Richmond, Surrey, England, in 1414. Endowed with land for the most part from alien priories, Sheen was the object of protests, notably those from SAINT-EVROULT (1416) and Saint-Pierre, Ghent, which were carried to the Council of BASEL. Later, King Henry VI endowed it (1442), as did Edward IV (1461). King James IV of Scotland was reputedly buried there after Flodden Field (1513). Dean Colet lodged and died there. HENRY VIII's Oath of Supremacy (1534) caused a rift in the community; but Prior Henry Man submitted, and the monastery was dissolved (1539). In 1557 it was refounded by Queen Mary Tudor, only to be dissolved again by Queen Elizabeth I (1559). No trace remains.

Bibliography: W. DUGDALE, Monasticon Anglicanum (London 1655–73); best ed. by J. CALEY, et al., 6 v. (1817–30) 6:29–34.

Fulton J. Sheen. (Archive Photos)

The Victoria History of the County of Surrey, ed. H. E. MALDEN (Westminster, England 1902–) v. 2. E. M. THOMPSON, The Carthusian Order in England (New York 1930), passim. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:3026.

[V. I. J. FLINT]

SHEERAN, JAMES B.

Confederate chaplain; b. Temple Mehill, County Longford, Ireland, 1819; d. Morristown, N.J., April 3, 1881. He immigrated to Canada at the age of 12 and went to New York City in 1833. From there he moved to McConnellsville, Pennsylvania, then to Monroe, Michigan, where he worked as a tailor and taught at a boys' school conducted by the Redemptorists. He married (c. 1842), but became a widower in 1849 and resumed his teaching until 1855, when he entered the Redemptorist Congregation. He was ordained on Sept. 18, 1858, and was sent that year to the Redemptorist church in New Orleans, Louisiana, where he adopted Southern views in the secessionist crisis and volunteered as a chaplain with the Confederate Army. Assigned to the Army of Northern Virginia on Sept. 2, 1861, Sheeran kept a journal of his wartime experiences and observations from August 1862 until his return to New Orleans in 1865. The journal affords insight into the duties of a Civil War chaplain, the attitudes of a Southern patriot, and the life of the Confederate soldier, and contains eyewitness accounts of such major engagements as Antietam and Gettysburg. Sheeran was often critical of Confederate troop commanders and Congressmen. Seized by Gen. P. H. Sheridan's forces in the Shenandoah Valley in September 1864, Sheeran was imprisoned at Winchester, Virginia, and then transferred to Ft. McHenry, Baltimore, Maryland, where he was released on December 5. He returned to New Orleans as the war ended and helped care for the victims of the yellow-fever epidemic in 1867. Soon thereafter, he was released from his vows as a Redemptorist and joined the Diocese of Newark, New Jersey, where he was made pastor of the Church of the Assumption, Morristown. There he built a new church and school, and labored on behalf of Catholic education until his death from a stroke.

Bibliography: J. B. SHEERAN, Confederate Chaplain: A War Journal, ed. J. T. DURKIN (Milwaukee 1960).

[J. L. MORRISON]

SHEHAN, LAWRENCE J.

Twelfth archbishop of Baltimore; cardinal; b. Baltimore, Maryland, March 18, 1898; d. there, Aug. 26, 1984. The son of Irish immigrant parents, Thomas P. and Anastasia (Schofield) Shehan, young Lawrence was educated in parochial schools of Baltimore. He attended St. Charles College, Catonsville, Maryland (1911–17), St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore (1917–20), and North American College, Rome, Italy (1920–23). Ordained in Rome, Dec. 23, 1922, Shehan engaged in pastoral work in the Archdiocese of Baltimore (1923–47), serving as pastor of St. Patrick Church, Washington, D.C. (1941–47). He held several offices in the diocesan curia from notary in 1934 to official of the archdiocese of Baltimore and Washington (1938–45). Pope Pius XII named him a papal chamberlain (1939), and a domestic prelate of the papal household (1945).

In 1945 Pius XII appointed him to the Titular See of Lydda, and as auxiliary bishop of Baltimore and Washington. When in 1947 the Archdiocese of Washington was separated from the Archdiocese of Baltimore, Bishop Shehan was named vicar-general of the Archdiocese of Baltimore until he was installed as ordinary of the newly erected See of Bridgeport, Connecticut, in 1953.

Shehan was president of the National Catholic Education Association (1958–59), episcopal moderator of the National Welfare Conference Bureau of Information (1945–49), and episcopal chairman of the Department of Education in the National Catholic Welfare Conference (1959–62). He was named vice president of the International Eucharistic Congresses (1960), and served as a member of the Episcopal Committee on Motion Pictures, Radio and Television. He was also the National Chaplain of the Ancient Order of Hibernians.

Promoted by Pope John XXIII to the Titular Archiepiscopal See of Nicopolis ad Nestum, July 10, 1961, he was appointed Coadjutor Archbishop of Baltimore, Maryland, and was installed Sept. 27, 1961. On the death of Archbishop Francis B. Keough he became the 12th archbishop of Baltimore on December 8 of the same year. Pope Paul VI elevated Archbishop Shehan to the cardinalate on Feb. 22, 1965. His titular church was San Clemente in Rome. In March of that year the new cardinal was appointed to the Consistorial Congregation. During the Second Vatican Council Pope Paul appointed Cardinal Shehan to the Body of Presidents of the council on July 9, 1965. Later that month he was made a member of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.

Cardinal Shehan was an outstanding ecumenist. In 1962 he established the nation's first Commission for Christian Unity. In November 1963 he was named to the Vatican Secretariat for Christian Unity, and a year later became head of the U.S. Bishop's Committee for Ecumenical Affairs. In December 1965 the National Conference of Christians and Jews conferred upon him its highest honor, the National Brotherhood Award, in recognition of his outstanding achievements in the field of ecumenical relations and religious understanding. As the Vatican Council drew to a close, Cardinal Shehan went to Istanbul as the delegate of Paul VI to deliver an historic document to Patriarch Athenagoras, spiritual leader of the Eastern Orthodox Church, revoking the excommunication imposed 900 years before. At precisely the same moment Metropolitan Meliton handed to Paul VI a similar document lifting the excommunication of the papal legate by Constantinople.

In March 1963 Cardinal Shehan issued his famous pastoral letter on "Racial Justice," calling for an end to discrimination of any kind based upon color, strictly forbidding it in the Catholic hospitals, schools, and other institutions of the archdiocese. In succeeding years, as racial tensions mounted and violence flared in many places, the cardinal never relaxed his efforts to assure justice and equal opportunity for blacks and the nation's other minority groups. He defended the right of priests and nuns to march in civil rights demonstrations, and flew to Montgomery, Alabama, to take part in the funeral ceremonies for Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., after the black leader was assassinated there in April 1968.

Cardinal Shehan died on Aug. 26, 1984, and was interred beneath the sanctuary of the Cathedral.

Bibliography: L. J. SHEHAN, A Blessing of Years: The Memoirs of Lawrence Cardinal Shehan (Notre Dame 1982).

[T. A. MURPHY]

SHEIL, BERNARD J.

Known as “apostle of youth,” “labor’s bishop,” “apostle of the poor,” and “apostle of the underdog”; b. Chicago, Feb. 18, 1886; d. Tucson, Arizona, Sept. 13, 1969. At St. Viator College, Bourbonnais, Illinois, “Benny” Sheil’s athletic prowess was so outstanding that major-league baseball clubs made tantalizing offers, but he chose instead to enter St. Viator Seminary. After his ordination on May 21, 1910, by Archbishop James E. Quigley, he was assigned to St. Mel parish in Chicago, remaining there until World War I when he was transferred to Great Lakes Naval Training Center as chaplain. He left the navy in 1919, and was assigned to Holy Name Cathedral with additional duties as chaplain at Cook County jail. In 1924 he was appointed assistant chancellor and in 1928 chancellor and auxiliary bishop of the Chicago archdiocese. Later that same year he was named vicar general, a post he held until 1939. While vicar general he was appointed pastor of St. Andrew parish (1935–1966). In 1959, Sheil was named titular archbishop by Pope John XXIII.

Following a directive of Cardinal Mundelein, Sheil established the Catholic Youth Organization (CYO) in 1930. Drawing upon his experiences as jail chaplain and his own interests in sports, Sheil drew up a program designed to keep young people out of trouble by offering them recreational activities, free medical and dental services, and theater workshops. Twenty-four years later and after the organization had been established nationally, Sheil resigned as its general director. Also in 1930, Sheil founded the Lewis School of Aeronautics, which is now known as Lewis College.

Although at the beginning boxing and basketball were the chief attractions at the CYO building, other programs were introduced. The Sheil Lecture Forum led to the formation of the CYO Educational Department in 1942 and a year later the Sheil School of Social Studies. The school had no requirements of previous education, race, color, creed, or money and was free and open to all. The subjects taught fell into three main classifications: (1) theology and philosophy, (2) social studies, and (3) liberal studies. Some additional by-products of the CYO programs were: the Pilot Dog Foundation for the blind, the Newman Center at Northwestern University in Evanston, Illinois, the national Legion of Decency, the national scouting program, labor education schools, and the Catholic Salvage Bureau. In 1949, Sheil established radio station WFJL for broadcasting Catholic news; next to the Vatican station this was the most powerful Catholic radio outlet.

In 1939, when labor unions were struggling for recognition, Sheil emerged as “labor’s bishop.” That year a battle developed between the meat industry and the Congress of Industrial Organizations, which wanted to organize the stockyard laborers. Sheil supported the union, despite threats from the opposition, until it was victorious. That same year he cooperated with Saul Alinsky in forming the Chicago Back-of-the-Yards Neighborhood Council.

Breaking with tradition, Sheil attended many inter-faith meetings. He fought discrimination, publicly opposing the anti-Semitism of “radio priest” Charles E. COUGHLIN. At a forum on Christian-Jewish relations he was confronted by a woman who after calling him “rabbi” concluded her tirade by spitting on him. The bishop replied, “That is what they called our Lord.” Though an American patriot, he was not an extremist. Speaking before the international educational conference of the United Automotive Workers in Chicago in 1954, he dared to challenge the anticommunism of Senator Joseph McCarthy of Wisconsin. After declaring McCarthyism was no way to combat communism, he condemned the Wisconsin senator and his methods.

Bibliography: Chicago Archdiocesan Archives. The New World (Chicago) Sept. 19, 1969. R. L. TREAT, Bishop Sheil and the CYO (New York 1951). A. WARD, Chicago’s Tribute to Bishop Sheil on the 25th Anniversary of His Consecration (1953).

[M. J. MADAJ]

SHEKINAH

A post-biblical Hebrew word meaning Divine Presence, used mostly in the TALMUD as a substitute for the name of YAHWEH. In the Old Testament growing reverence for God’s transcendent holiness had already led to a reluctance to refer directly to Him. Thus the introduction of various roundabout expressions: the angel of God (Ex 14.19; cf. 13.21); Yahweh’s face (Dt 31.11; “to appear before” is literally “to behold the face of”); Yahweh’s spirit (Is 63.14), Yahweh’s word [Ps 32(33).6], etc. The rabbis later preferred the word šekinâ, whose Hebrew root šākan, to pitch a tent, was suggestive of the TENT OF MEETING in the wilderness where God’s GLORY abode. Various allusions in the New Testament draw on this notion and connect Jesus with the Shekinah. In Mt 18.20 there seems to be an allusion to a sentence in the MISHNAH: “If two men are met together and words of the Torah are spoken between them, the Shekinah dwells among them” (Ob 3.2). Also, Jn 1.14 may be translated “and the Word was made flesh and pitched his tent among us,” a clear reference to the Tent of Meeting. Paul seems also to have the Shekinah image in mind in Col 2.9: “For in him dwells all the fullness of the Godhead bodily.”

Bibliography: W. J. PHYTHIAN-ADAMS, The People and the Presence (New York 1942). J. ABELSON, Immanence of God in Rabbinical Literature (London 1912). S. TERRIEN, The Elusive Presence: Toward a New Biblical Theology (1978, 1984).

[J. T. BURTCHAELL]

SHELLEY, EDWARD, BL.

Lay martyr; b. ca. 1528–38, Warminghurst, Sussex, England; hanged at Tyburn (London), Aug. 30, 1588. Edward was well born. His father, also named Edward, was a master of the king’s household and the settlor in “Shelley’s case.” The future martyr was living in East Smithfield, London, at the time of his arrest in April 1584 for possessing a book entitled My Lord Leicester’s Commonwealth and assisting an illegal priest, Bl. William DEAN. Thereafter he was imprisoned in the Clink, condemned for his “crimes”, and executed. He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

SHEN JIHE, ST.

Lay martyr, servant, member of the Third Order of St. Francis; b. 1851, Ankeo, Hughan Xian, Shanxi Province, China; d. July 9, 1900, Taiyüan, Shanxi Province. Thomas Shen Jihe (sometimes written as Sen or Sen-Ki-Kuo), the son of Peter Shen Buniu and Maria Guo, was raised as a Catholic. He was footman to Paul Zhang and went with him to Dongergou (1875), where he served Fr. Peter Jiang. For the final decade of his life, Thomas was a servant in the household of Bp. Gregorio GRASSI. Thomas was among the innumerable Christians martyred during the Boxer Rebellion and among the several dozen trapped inside the Taiyüan cathedral, arrested, and beheaded several days thereafter. He was beatified by Pope Pius XII (Nov. 24, 1946) and canonized (Oct. 1, 2000) by Pope John Paul II with Augustine Zhao Rong and companions.

Feast: July 4.

Bibliography: L. M. BALCONI, Le Martiri di Taiyuen (Milan 1945). Acta Apostolica Sedis 47 (1955) 381–388. Vita del b. A. Crescitelli (Milan 1950). M. T. DE BLARER, Les Bse Marie Hermine de Jésus et ses compagnes, franciscaines missionnaires de Marie, massacrées le 9 juillet 1900 à Tai-Yuan-Fou, Chine (Paris 1947). Les Vingt-neuf martyrs de Chine, massacrés en 1900, béatifiés par Sa Sainteté Pie XII, le 24 novembre, 1946 (Rome 1946). L. MINER, China’s Book of Martyrs: A Record of Heroic Martyrdoms and Marvelous Deliverances of Chinese Christians during the Summer of 1900 (Ann Arbor 1994). J. SIMON, Sous le sabre des Boxers (Lille 1955). C. TESTORE, Sangue e palme sul fiume giallo. I beati martiri cinesi nella persecuzione della Boxe Celi Sud-Est, 1900 (Rome 1955). L’Osservatore Romano, Eng. Ed. 40 (2000): 1–2, 10.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

SHENOUTE OF ATRIPE

Shenoute or Schenoudi, second abbot of the famous White Monastery, called also the Deir Auba Chenouda (Monastery of Shenoute) after him; b. c. 348; d. 466. He was a strict disciplinarian and had a towering temper. He ruled the monastery for 83 years, from 383 until his death. His pupil and successor Besa says that Shenoute had under his rule 2,200 monks and 1,800 nuns. An outstanding organizer, Shenoute did not hesitate to modify the rule of Pachomius, which Shenoute held in many places to be too lax. Shenoute forced his monks to sign a monastic profession in which they swore to obey the inflexible rule he had drawn up. On one occasion he killed with his own hand a monk guilty of a theft and a small lie. He gave permission to individual monks to withdraw to the desert after a few years of cenobitic life without completely severing their ties with the monastery. Shenoute made numerous lengthy journeys to combat heretics and pagans; notably, he accompanied CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA to the Council of EPHESUS in 431. His prolonged absences destroyed the continuity of his influence over his monks, and he often complained of their refractoriness and disciplined them severely for it. Though little liked by his monks, he enjoyed great prestige in Egypt, where he was regarded as a saint, though the church has never given him that title.

Shenoute wrote many letters and sermons that have been preserved. The letters, mostly addressed to monks and nuns, deal with monastic questions; some are polemics against pagans and heretics. The sermons are vivid in language and eschatological in character. Several apocalypses and visions are attributed to him. There are presently Ethiopic, Arabic, and Syriac versions of his works, but it has been difficult to distinguish the authentic writings from the spurious.

Bibliography: J. LEIPOLDT and W. E. CRUM, eds., Sinuthii archimandritae vita et opera omnia, Lat. tr. H. WIESMANN, 3 v. (Cor- pus scriptorum Christianorum orientalium 41–42, 73, 1906–13; repr. as v. 96, 108, 129; 1951–54), v.1, 4–5 of Scriptores Coptici, ser. 2; repr. as v. 8, 12, 16. J. LEIPOLDT, Schenute von Atripe und die Entstehung des nationalägyptischen Mönchtums (Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 25.1; 1903). L. T. LEFORT, “Athanasie, Ambroise et Chenoute: Sur la virginité,” Muséon 48 (1935) 55–73, use of Athanasius; “La Chasse aux reliques des martyrs en Égypte au IV^e siècle,” La Nouvelle Clío 6 (1954) 225–230. K. H. KUHN, “The Observance of the ‘Two Weeks’ in Shenoute’s Writings,” Studia patristica v.2 (Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 64; 1957) 427–434.

[A. G. GIBSON]

SHEOL

A Hebrew word (šē'ōl) that occurs more than 60 times in the Old Testament to signify the nether world. Its etymology is very uncertain, being variously derived from šā'al, “ask, inquire,” [thus, a place that keeps asking for more (Prv 27.20; 30.15–16) or a place of interrogation of the dead], from šā'āl, “be hollow, deep,” from šwl, “be low,” from šā'ā, “be desolate,” plus an archaic suffix l, or from various Akkadian roots.

In the Bible it designates the place of complete inertia that one goes down to when one dies whether one be just or wicked, rich or poor.

See Also: AFTERLIFE, 2; GEHENNA; ABRAHAM'S BOSOM.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, translated and adapted by L. HARTMAN (New York, 1963) 2196.

[H KÖSTER]

SHEPEY, JOHN DE

English canonist, dean of Lincoln Cathedral; d. early 1412. The son of Jordan de Shepey of Coventry, England, Shepey was a doctor of civil law by 1367, when he was still an advocate of the court of Canterbury. In 1368 he was appointed the official of the court of Winchester. From 1363 to 1376 he was chancellor of Lichfield; then canon of York; and from 1378 to his death, dean of Lincoln cathedral. In this sensitive post he served under Bp. John Buckingham (1363–98); the young Bp. Henry BEAUFORT (1398–1404), half brother of King Henry IV and later cardinal; and under Bp. Philip REPINGTON, Lollard-suspect become cardinal. A king's clerk, Shepey was an envoy to the Flemings concerning a treaty in 1372, an envoy to the court of AVIGNON in 1373; to Bruges in 1375; and one of two envoys appointed to treat with the king of Scotland in 1397. RICHARD II summoned him to a council at Oxford (1399) to advise him about future English policy in the WESTERN SCHISM. Shepey's notes for 12 Oxford lectures on the decretals are extant (London, British Museum, Royal MS.9.E.viii). He is buried in Lincoln Cathedral.

Bibliography: J. H. DAHMUS, ed., The Metropolitan Visitations of William Courteney: Archbishop of Canterbury, 1381–1396 (Urbana, Ill. 1950) 47, 161. K. EDWARDS, The English Secular Cathedrals in the Middle Ages (Manchester, Eng. 1949). A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the Scholars of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 3:1683–84.

[M. J. HAMILTON]

SHEPTYTS'KYĪ, ANDRIĪ

Ukrainian metropolitan and apostle; b. Prylbyči, July 29, 1865; d. Lvov, Nov. 1, 1944. Sheptyts'kyĭ was born of an aristocratic family. After studying in Breslau, he joined the Basilian Order (May 23, 1888), changing his Christian name from Roman Alexander to Andriĭ. He was ordained in 1892; Pope Leo XIII named him bishop of Stanislav (Galicia) on June 17, 1898, and metropolitan of Lvov on Jan. 16, 1901. By visitations of his vast archdiocese and by his charity—manifested in the establishment of orphanages, hospitals, and homes for the aged and poor—as well as by some 150 pastoral letters, he reinvigorated Catholicism in the western Ukraine. He founded minor and major seminaries in both Stanislav and Lvov. By founding an Ecclesiastical Academy (1928) and a theological journal in Lvov, Sheptyts'kyĭ revived the study of theology in the Ukraine. He also restored the order of the monks of St. Basil, and by revising the ancient rule of St. THEODORE THE STUDITE, he revived Oriental monasticism among Catholics. He persuaded the general of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer to establish a Byzantine-Slav branch (approved by the Congregation of the Propaganda Fide on April 27, 1913). Although this Redemptorist vice province, brought to Galicia by Belgians, was suppressed by the U.S.S.R. in 1948, a branch founded in Canada and the U.S. is still flourishing.

As metropolitan, Sheptyts'kyĭ defended his people vigorously against Russian subversion and was imprisoned by the Czar during World War I (1914–17). In his zeal for the protection of the Byzantine-Slavic rite in Russia before the Revolution, he had pursued reunion movements, particularly among the Catholics and Orthodox of the Ukraine, and had visited Moscow in 1907. After the Revolution, he held a provincial synod and suggested the naming of Leonidas Fedorov as Catholic exarch for Russia. He also rebuilt the churches and ecclesiastical institutions destroyed during the war, and opposed both the Communists in Russia and the Latinizing policies of the Polish government in 1938 and 1939.

Sheptyts'kyi translated the ascetical works of St. BASIL OF CAESAREA into Ukrainian and published De Sapientia Dei (Lvov 1932). He visited the Ukrainian immigrants in North and South America and arranged for their spiritual welfare by persuading the Holy See to erect a hierarchy for them in the U.S. (1907); after his attendance at the Canadian Eucharistic Congress (1910), Canada obtained a Ukrainian hierarchy (1912). For the furtherance of his ecclesiastical policies, he founded a Ukrainian National Museum and gave encouragement to the pursuit of Ukrainian art and scholarship. His cause for beatification has been introduced in the Congregation of Rites.

Bibliography: B. STASIEWSKI, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 9:1265–66. Analecta Ordinis S. Basilii Magni, Ser. 1 (Zhovkva 1924–1935) Ser. 2 (Rome 1949–) 2:268–284. G. PROKOPTSCHUK, Der Metropolit: Leben und Wirken des . . . Andreas Szeptyckyj (Munich 1955), Beatificationis et canonizationis Servi Dei Andreae Szeptyckyj (Rome 1958). A. HERMAN, De fontibus iuris ecclesiastici Russorum (Vatican City 1936). M. GORDILLO, La civiltà cattolica 112.3 (1961) 474–483. PIUS XII, Orientalis omnes Ecclesias (Letter, Dec. 23, 1945). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 38 (1946) 33–63.

[F. X. MURPHY]

SHERBORNE, ABBEY OF

Originally a house of secular canons in Sherborne, Dorset, England. Its establishment is attributed to St. ALDHELM, at the time of the foundation of the See of Sherborne in 705, though it may already have existed in the time of King Cenwalh (643–674). It was rebuilt and converted into a BENEDICTINE monastery c. 993, the bishop remaining head of the house until it was raised to the dignity of an abbey in 1122. The abbey was rebuilt after the greater part of it was destroyed by fire in 1436 during a riot between the monks and townspeople over rights in the abbey church. The abbey was dissolved in 1539 under Henry VIII, and in the next year for 100 marks (about £67 of the period) the parishioners purchased the church, which has been the town's parish church ever since.

Bibliography: J. HUTCHINS, The History and Antiquities of the County of Dorset, ed. W. SHIPP and J. W. HODSON, 4 v. (3d ed. Westminster, England 1861–74) v.4. D. KNOWLES, The Monastic Order in England, 943–1216 (2d ed. Cambridge, England 1962). The Victoria History of the County of Dorset, ed. W. PAGE (London n.d.) v.2.

[J. L. GRASSI]

SHERIDAN, TERENCE JAMES

Jesuit writer and editor, b. Dublin, Ireland, Sept. 16, 1908; d. Manila, Philippines, Dec. 11, 1970. Educated at Belvedere College, Dublin, Sheridan entered the Jesuit novitiate in 1927. During juniorate and philosophy studies, he began his lifetime career as a writer of plays and topical sketches. Assigned to Hong Kong in 1934, he studied Cantonese at Shiuhing, got his first taste for the Cantonese opera, and wrote for The Rock, a Hong Kong literary periodical. From 1935–37, he was on the teaching staff of Wah Yan College, Hong Kong. After studying theology in Dublin, he was ordained to the priesthood in 1940 and stayed to give missions and retreats in Ireland till he returned to Wah Yan in 1946.

He became involved almost immediately in the cultural life of post-war Hong Kong. He began working on his annual series of Cantonese operas in English, witty translation-adaptations of the well-known themes of Cantonese opera. His productions were always alive, exciting, and very colorful; the most famous was A Lizard Is No Dragon. In 1951 he launched both a Chinese magazine for young people and Outlook, a literary and current affairs magazine. A leading member and producer for the Hong Kong Stage Club, he wrote a number of religious plays, film scripts, and scenarios, as well as pageants for the Marian Year and about the history of Hong Kong and Macao.

In the early 1960s, Sheridan was assigned to Singapore to edit the Malaysian Catholic News, which became a lively paper in his hands, and he was quickly involved in radio, drama, and TV in the city. In 1966, after difficulties about his editorship of the newspaper, he resigned from the post and was sent to Manila to work toward an Overseas Program in Radio Veritas. After some months he left that job and joined the staff of the East Asian Pastoral Institute. He lectured in the Philippines and in Chicago (Loyola Institute of Pastoral Studies) on the study, evaluation, and use of film. He was working on the official film record of Pope Paul's visit to Manila when he died suddenly of cardiac failure.

Bibliography: T. J. SHERIDAN, Letters to Bart (London 1938); Seven Chinese Stories (London 1959); Four Short Plays (London 1960). J. HOFINGER and T. J. SHERIDAN, eds., The Medellín Papers (Manila 1969).

[T. O'NEILL]

SHERMAN, THOMAS EWING

Missionary, educator; b. San Francisco, Calif, Oct. 12, 1856; d. New Orleans, La., April 29, 1933. He was the son of William Tecumseh Sherman, the famous Civil War general, and Ellen (Ewing) Sherman, a Catholic. After a Catholic upbringing by his mother, he was sent to Georgetown University, Washington, D.C., where he graduated with an A.B. in 1874. He continued his education at Yale University (B.S., 1876) and at Washington University, St. Louis, Mo., where he studied law until 1878. At Roehampton, England, he entered the Society of Jesus on June 14, 1878, served his novitiate in England, and then returned (1880) to study philosophy at Woodstock College, Md., until 1883. After spending several years as an instructor in physics and classics at St. Louis University (1883–85) and the University of Detroit, Mich. (1885–87), he took his theology at Woodstock and was ordained in Philadelphia, Pa., by Abp. Patrick J. Ryan on July 7, 1889. He was assigned to St. Louis University (1891), where he soon acquired a reputation as a pulpit orator and a Catholic spokesman. His lecture tours drew large audiences, and after 1895 he was freed from other duties to concentrate on missionary preaching. His Chicago, Ill., Music Hall speech on Feb. 4, 1894, was an outstanding defense of the Church and the Jesuits. His lectures were discontinued in 1896, and he left the mission band to seek complete rest. When the Spanish-American War began (1898), Sherman enlisted as a chaplain with the Fourth Missouri Volunteers and later served as post chaplain at San Juan, Puerto Rico. Returning to the U.S. in 1899, he was assigned as a traveling missionary, with headquarters at Chicago. During the next decade he delivered a memorable plea for the education of Catholic women and directed the activities of the Catholic Truth Society of Chicago, which he founded in 1901. In 1911 Sherman suffered a nervous breakdown and was confined to a private sanitarium near Boston, Mass. Partially recovered by 1915 and jointly supported by his family and his society, he traveled through Europe and America until 1929, when he settled at Santa Barbara, Calif. He became ill again in 1931 and was taken to De Paul Sanitarium, New Orleans, where he died.

Coat of Arms at Sherborne Abbey. (©Tom Bean/CORBIS)

Bibliography: J. T. DURKIN, General Sherman's Son (New York 1959)

[J. L. MORRISON]

SHERT, JOHN, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. Shert Hall, near Macclesfield, Cheshire, England; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London), May 28, 1582. After earning his baccalaureate at Brasenose College, Oxford (1566), John Shert was a schoolmaster in London. At some point he became convicted of the truth of Catholicism and converted. Thereafter he was a servant, perhaps a tutor, in the household of Dr. Thomas Stapleton at Douai. He entered the English College there in 1576, and completed his seminary studies in Rome. Following his ordination in Rome (1576), he returned to Rheims, then England (Aug. 27, 1579). Shert served two years in the missions of Cheshire and London before his arrest and imprisonment in the Tower of London (July 14, 1581). He was condemned on a fictitious charge of conspiring against the king in Rheims and Rome. He was beatified by Pope Leo XIII.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

SHERWIN, RALPH, ST.

Priest, martyr; b. Roddesly, Derbyshire, England, c. 1550; d. Tyburn, Dec. 1, 1581. In 1568 Sir William Petre, the second founder of Exeter College, Oxford, nominated Sherwin, along with Richard Bristow, one of the translators of the Douay Bible, to a fellowship. Probably Sherwin owed this favor to the influence of John Woodward, his uncle, a Marian priest, formerly rector of Ingatestone and chaplain to the PETRE family. At Oxford he enjoyed much influence and the attention of the queen's favorite, the Earl of Leicester. Reconciled to the Church in 1574, he left the following year for Douai. After ordination there on March 23, 1577, he went to the English College, Rome, where he took a leading part in the dissensions between the English and Welsh students. He was one of the four who petitioned Gregory XIII to place the college under the direction of the Jesuits. On April 18, 1580, he left for England in a company that included (St.) Edmund CAMPION and (St.) Luke KIRBY. They landed in England early in August, and Sherwin was arrested the following November while preaching in the house of Nicholas Roscarrock in London. After a month in chains in the Marshalsea prison, he was sent to the Tower, where on December 15 he was cruelly racked, left to lie in the snow, racked a second time, and deprived of food for five days and nights. It was said that he was offered a bishopric if he would apostatize. After his trial and condemnation with Edmund Campion, (St.) Alexander BRIANT, and others, he wrote to his uncle: "Innocencie is my only comfort against all the forged villanie which is fathered on my fellow priests and me." He is the protomartyr of the English College, Rome, where his portrait, discovered at Darlington in 1962, now hangs. Sherwin was beatified by Leo XIII on Dec. 29, 1886, and canonized by Paul VI on Oct. 25, 1970 as one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

Feast: Dec. 1; Oct. 25 (Feast of the 40 Martyrs of England and Wales); May 4 (Feast of the English Martyrs in England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: B. CAMM, ed., Lives of the English Martyrs Declared Blessed by Pope Leo XIII in 1886 and 1895, 2 v. (New York 1904-14) 2:358-396. M. WAUGH, Blessed Ralph Sherwin (Postulation Pamphlet; London 1962). R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969).

[G. FITZHERBERT]

SHERWOOD, THOMAS, BL.

Lay martyr; b. London, England, 1551; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London), Feb. 7, 1578. After leaving school (1566), Thomas assisted his father, a London wool draper who himself had been imprisoned for the faith. Discerning a vocation to the priesthood, Thomas was arranging to attend the English College at Douai when he was recognized in Chancery Lane and betrayed by George Marten, son of Lady Tregonwell. When questioned about his opinion of the excommunication of the queen, he acknowledged his ignorance of Pius V's bull, but stated that if she were indeed excommunicated, her rule could not be lawful. Thus, he was detained at Westminster for further examination and committed to the Tower of London by the Privy Council (Nov. 17, 1577). He was repeatedly examined, threatened with the horrors of the dungeon, and twice racked to betray other Catholics, but he remained steadfast. Eventually he was cast naked into the fetid dungeon without food and without permission for visitors to supply his needs. He was tried on Feb. 3, 1578, and condemned for denying the Act of Supremacy. He died at the age of 27. He was beatified by Pope Leo XIII on May 13, 1895.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

SHIBBOLETH

Hebrew, šibbōlet, ear of grain or flowing stream. The common meaning of shibboleth, "test-word" or "criterion," has its origin in Jgs 12.4–6. In the 11th century B.C., a group of Ephraimites sought to escape a band of Galaadites by attempting to cross the Jordan back into Palestine. The fugitives pretended to be Galaadites when they were halted at the Jordan. However, they betrayed themselves by their inability to pronounce the chosen test-word in the Gileadite manner. The telltale element was the initial sound of the word shibboleth. The accepted theory is that the dialectal peculiarity was with the West-Jordanian Ephraimites who used the Amorrite "s" instead of the Canaanite "sh." E. A. Speiser, however, believes that the dialectal peculiarity was with the Galaadites in whose dialect the initial sound in shibboleth was "th" instead of "sh." Thus, not only the Ephraimites, but Judeans or Galileans, had they been in the same predicament, would have likewise betrayed themselves. Whichever theory is accepted, the result was the same: the Ephraimites failed the phonetic test and execution followed, although the alleged number of victims is probably exaggerated.

Bibliography: E. A. SPEISER, "The Shibboleth Incident (Judges 12:6)," The Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 85 (February 1942) 10–13. R. MARCUS, "The Word Šibboleth Again," ibid. 87 (October 1942) 39.

[J. MORIARITY]

SHIELDS, THOMAS EDWARD

Educator; b. Mendota, MN, May 9, 1862; d. Washington, DC, Feb. 15, 1921. The son of Irish immigrants, he was somewhat unruly as a child and finished his formal schooling late. He was admitted to St. Francis Seminary, Milwaukee, WI, in 1882, and to St. Thomas Seminary, St. Paul, MN, in 1885. At St. Thomas he published his first book, Index Omnium (1888), which was designed to help professional men correlate data gathered from wide reading. After his ordination on March 4, 1891, he studied for his Ph.D. at the Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, MD. His dissertation, The Effect of Odors Upon the Blood Flow (1895), influenced psychological research, and in 1902 he joined the faculty of The Catholic University of America, Washington, DC, as an instructor in psychology.

Shields soon transferred his interest to education. In 1905 he set up a correspondence course, supplemented by diocesan summer institutes, for sisters in the expanding Catholic school system. He established the university's department of education in 1909 and served as its first chairman. The following year he founded the Catholic Educational Review. In 1911 he conducted the first Summer Institute for Catholic Sisters at the university, and he founded the Sisters College, of which he was dean. In 1912 he was instrumental in securing the adoption of the University Affiliation Program. To correlate the curriculum of the Catholic school, Shields wrote a series of four widely used texts in religion. He was also the author of The Education of Our Girls (1907), a dialogue; The Making and Unmaking of a Dullard (1909), a description of his youth; and The Philosophy of Education (1917), the first Catholic book of its kind in English. He was perhaps the leading Catholic educator in the U.S. during the first quarter of the 20th century.

Bibliography: J. WARD, Thomas Edward Shields (New York 1947).

[J. W. EVANS]

SHĪ'ITES

One of the two main branches of Islam, the other being the SUNNITES.

The initial Arabic phrase shi'atu 'Ali, "Partisans of Ali," was used to refer to a number of early Muslims who backed Ali ibn Abi Talib (the cousin of the Prophet MUḤAMMAD to whom his daughter Fatima was married) in the matter of the succession of the Prophet. The Shi'a claim that the Prophet appointed Ali as his successor, an important act which the community ignored by recognizing Abu Bakr as the first caliph (Arabic "khalifah," i.e., "successor"), 'Umar I as the second, and 'Uthman as the third. Upon the murder of 'Uthman, Ali was invited to be the fourth caliph (35–40 A.H., 656–661 A.D.). His appointment only resulted in increased tension between his supporters and his detractors, leading to the first civil war within the Islamic community that ultimately gave rise to the division of Islam into the Shi'a and Sunni branches.

Shi'a Islam is distinguished from Sunni Islam mainly in its interpretation of the role of the IMAM in the Islamic social order. The essential distinction between Shi'a and Sunni Islam is the doctrine of the imamate, which is essential for all Shi'a. The Shi'a believe that the human race needs divinely guided leaders and teachers, who are the imams who continue the mission of the prophets in every respect, except bringing new scriptures. The imams are endowed with 'isma, i.e., immunity from sin and error in order to fulfill their divine mission. All Shi'a believe that without the imams the world would cease to exist, yet they are divided over the question of the number of the imams, leading to the emergence of different branches within Shi'a Islam.

Al Hussein Mosque, Karbala, Iraq. (©Francoise de Mulder/CORBIS)

Twelver Shi'a. The Twelver Shi'a, Ithna 'Ashariya, or Imamiyah, constitute the largest group within the Shi'a, and believe in the following 12 Imams:

1. 'Ali ibn Abi Talib (d. A.H. 40/661 A.D.)
2. Hasan ibn 'Ali (d. A.H. 49/669 A.D.)
3. Husayn ibn 'Ali (d. A.H. 60/680 A.D.)
4. 'Ali ibn al-Husayn, Zayn al-'Abidin (d. A.H. 95/714 A.D.)
5. Muhammad al-Baqir (d. A.H. 115/733 A.D.)
6. Ja'far al-Sadiq (d. A.H. 148/765 A.D.)
7. Musa al-Kazim (d. A.H. 183/799 A.D.)
8. 'Ali al-Rida (d. A.H. 203/818 A.D.)
9. Muhammad Jawad al-Taqi (d. A.H. 220/835 A.D.)
10. 'Ali al-Naqi (d. A.H. 254/868 A.D.)

11. Al-Hasan al-'Askari (d. A.H. 260/874 A.D.)
12. Muhammad al-Mahdi, al-Qa'im (major occultation in A.H. 329/941 A.D.)

For the Twelvers, the imam possesses a divine light which guides him in interpretation and legislation. The shrines of the imams, especially that of Imam Hussain in Karbala (Iraq), Imam Ali in Najaf (Iraq), and Imam Rida in Mashhad (Iran) are pilgrimage sites. The imams are not only the religious teachers, they also have an eschatological significance, for they can intercede for believers on Judgment Day. Therefore, knowing the imam is necessary for salvation. This point is especially emphasized by the messianic belief in the hidden imam, Muhammad al-Muntazar al-Mahdi, who is alive and in occultation. Beginning in 872 A.D. and during the minor occultation the imam would communicate with his followers through four direct representatives from among them. Since 941, he has been in major occultation and will only reappear when the world is filled with injustice and oppression in order to establish justice and to prepare the second coming of Christ. This messianism within Shi'a doctrine has revealed itself in both political and non-political forms, leading at times to quietism and at others to activism.

While the Twelvers have their own distinct school of law founded by the sixth Imam, Ja'far al-Sadiq (d. A.H. 148/765 A.D.) (hence called the Ja'fari school), it is considered as the same sacred law; shari'ah with little difference in matters of ritual worship from any of the four major Sunni schools of Islamic jurisprudence. In matters of transactions the difference can be summarized in the Shi'i acceptance of temporary marriage (mut'a) as well as an additional tax (khums) to the regular religious tax (zakat). Also important in Shi'a doctrine are the principles of justice ('adl) and intellect ('aql). The latter plays a significant role, not only in their attitude towards intellectual sciences, but also in the continuous reinterpretation of the law and the ongoing task of Ijtihad, independent analysis, that remains open within Shi'a Islam. In contrast, after the establishment of the four Sunni schools of law a thousand years ago, the gates of Ijtihad within the Sunni world were considered closed.

Isma'ilis. It is to Isma'il the son of Ja'far al Sadiq that the Isma'ilis trace their line. As the elder son of the Imam, Isma'il was his designated successor, but he predeceased him. Those who viewed this designation irreversible either denied the death of Isma'il proclaiming his return as the Qaim (this group was later known as 'pure Isma'iliya') or accepted his son Muhammad as the rightful imam after Ja'far (known at the time as Mubarakiyah). The two groups came to hold Muhammad ibn Isma'il as the legitimate Imam in the absence of Isma'il. It was not until the middle of the ninth century that the Isma'iliya appeared as a well organized, secret movement with revolutionary principles and elaborate doctrine. There is little certainty about the early history of the Isma'ilies since the available sources are with few exceptions anti-Isma'ili.

The Isma'ili doctrine can be identified as possessing a gnostic nature with a structure that maintains emphasis on a distinction between the outer, exoteric (zahir) or the accessible meaning of the scriptures and the religious law brought by the prophets and the inner, esoteric (batin) of religion which are unchangeable truths hidden in all scriptures and can be revealed by ta'wil, esoteric interpretation. While the Isma'ili groups from early da'wa (Isma'ili missionaries) to the Fatimid dynasty and the Qaramatah movement propagated same aspects of religious doctrine, in political and social matters they cannot be identified with each other. At times appearing as a political movement and at others identifying with mystical elements and coming together with Sufi orders, they were nevertheless, a strong source of activity in arts and sciences. Today, the two branches of Isma'ilis of the Mongol invasion era, the Nizaris and the Musta'lis, continue to live as religious communities in Indo-Pakistani subcontinent, Syria, East Africa, and other regions.

Zaydis. The Zaydis were found mainly in Yemen. Zayd, a grandson of Ali's son Husayn, revolted against Umayyad rule at Kufa in 740 A.D. Although the revolt was defeated, his followers kept his memory alive. More than a century later, they established two principalities, one in Tabaristan, which was short-lived, and the other in Yemen, which lasted until the Imam was overthrown in 1962. Among the various Shi'a groups, the Zaydis are the closest to Sunni doctrine and practice, distinguished from the Sunnis by common Shi'i features such as a distinctive call to prayer, the five-fold funerary prayers, and the rejection of certain minor Sunni practices. Unlike the other Shi'a groups, the Zaydis reject temporary marriages, succession by inheritance, child Imams, and hidden Imams.

Bibliography: M. H. TABATABA'I, Shi'ite Islam, ed. and trans. S. H. NASR (London 1975); Ideals and realities of Islam, 2nd ed. (London 1975); "Ithna 'ashariyya" in The Encyclopedia of Islam, new ed. (Leiden 1960). A. A. SACHEDINA, Islamic Messianism: The Idea of Mahdi in Twelver Shi'ism (Albany 1981). N. R. KEDDIE, ed., Religion and Politics in Iran: Shi'ism From Quietism to Revolution (New Haven 1983). D. M. DONALDSON, The Shi'ite Religion (London 1933). W. C. CHITTICK, trans. and ed., A Shi'ite Anthology (Albany 1981). S. A. ARJOMAND, The Shadow of God and the Hidden Imam (Chicago 1984).

[B. DAVARY]

SHIMAZAKI, TŌSON

Japanese novelist and poet; b. Nagano Prefecture, March 25, 1872; d. Aug. 22, 1943. He achieved stature as one of modern Japan's leading writers chiefly as a master of shi shōsetsu, a genre peculiar to Japanese literature, partially paralleled in the West by the Ich Roman.

Shimazaki was born in the mountain district of central Japan into a family that traced its ancestry back 200 years, and reared under the sharp discipline of his father, who was a scholar of Chinese and Japanese classics. He first went to Tokyo as a boy of ten; at 16 he entered a Tokyo mission school, Meiji Gakuin, and here first encountered Christianity. In the next year, 1888, he was baptized by Pastor Kumaji Kimura at the Daichō Church. After graduation in 1892, he joined the faculty of Meiji Girls' School, also a mission school, where he came under the influence of his colleague, the Christian critic Tōkoku Kitamura. These two joined several other friends in founding Bungaku kai (The World of Literature), the magazine that developed as the fountainhead of the Romantic movement in Japan, and which frequently reflected the impact of Christian thought.

Like many Japanese literateurs, Shimazaki gradually drifted away from Christianity. Although he lacked any definite consciousness of his apostasy, the severance seems to have been complete by 1893. Nevertheless his work clearly points to the influence of Christianity at considerable depth.

His first book, Wakana shu (1897, Young Herbs), was a collection of early poems in colloquial style with minimal use of Chinese characters; the movement is graceful and fluid after the mode of certain hymns to which he was at that time deeply attached. The poem, for example, that begins, "Yūgure shizuka ni . . ." ("Quiet is the evening . . .") is plainly fashioned after a hymn. Hakai (1906, The Breach of the Code) launched his career as a novelist. The novel's main theme, in which Christian influence appears, is compassionate indignation over the treatment accorded the burakumin ("the outcast-community"). One of his later major works, Shinsei (1919, New Life), treats delicately the problem of incest.

Bibliography: Collected works. Shimazaki Tōson zenshū, 31 v. (Tokyo 1956-57). K. KAMEI, Shimazaki Tōson ron (Tokyo 1956). K. HIRANO, Shimazaki Tōson (Tokyo 1957).

[M. HYODO]

SHINTOISM

Shintō denotes the whole complex of religious and ethical ideas that existed in Japan before the introduction of religious elements from the high cultures of China and India. Shintō, like the racial origin of the Japanese people, goes back to many different sources. It is generally acknowledged that the Japanese are of mixed racial composition. People were living in Japan at the end of the Paleolithic Age or, at the latest, by the Mesolithic Age. They were hunting tribes from North Asia and food-gathering and hunting people from the tropical forests. Later new peoples came from South China, Southeast Asia, Oceania, and also from East Asia. Sometime between the third and fourth centuries A.D. the last and most powerful tribes of Altaic stock came to Japan by way of the Korean Peninsula, conquered the farming people who had settled in the Japanese islands, and established their dynasty. Shintō assimilated various religious elements from these racial components.

Shintō Festival at a Japanese Meiji shrine. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Early History. The religion of ancient Japan was not called Shintō. The term Shintō first appeared in the Nihonshoki, or “Chronicles of Japan” (edited in A.D. 720). Shintō means “the way of the Gods” (shin is a Chinese character representing the Japanese word kami, which means god or deity). Shintō as the way of the gods came into existence when it was necessary to distinguish the old religion of Japan from the newly introduced Butsudō, “the way of Buddha.” Kami is the essential object of Shintō worship. Though there are doubts among scholars concerning the etymology of the word kami, many agree that kami, “god,” is connected with a word of similar form that means “above us.” According to this theory, kami means “High Being.” In ancient Japanese cosmogony, the making of the universe was explained by the ascent of heaven from the earth. Until that moment, heaven and earth were united and mixed in one chaos. In another myth, the god Izanagi, representing heaven, married the goddess Izanami, the earth. They produced lands, islands, seas, rivers, mountains, trees, animals, etc. The sun, moon, and storms were also the offspring of their marriage. When Izanami died of severe burns after giving birth to fire, the parents of the universe had to be separated; Izanagi, the sky father, ascended to heaven, while Izanami, the earth mother, descended to the Lower World to become its goddess.

Essential Elements. The two essential elements of Shintō are nature worship and ancestor worship, and shamanistic trails are widespread. Vestiges of the worship of the Supreme Being also are found. In its most primitive stage Shintō worship was confined to natural phenomena. Later the idea of spirits and demons entered Shintō. The sun is considered a benefactor who bestows upon the people the special favor of good crops. The sun was also worshiped with special respect as the Emperor’s divine ancestress, Amaterasu. The role of the sun in ancestor worship is a later development, fostered by political considerations. The Emperor's daughter was selected to be the high priestess to serve the sun-god. The Emperor, apparently, worshipped a sky god, but one not identical to the primitive sun-god. Among the divine animals worshipped in Shintō, the fox has an important role. The fox, at first, was the food god's messenger, although in later periods the fox came to be regarded as a god himself.

Between heaven and earth, spirits and demons live everywhere in mountains, trees, and in all animals. When angry, spirits and demons send unhappiness, sickness, and disasters to plague the people. Therefore, various rites are performed to calm the spirits and demons, and prayers are offered to secure their favors.

The main purposes of the Shintō cult in general are positive ones, to gain good crops or successful fishing. Shintō worship is practiced today at particular shrines. In ancient times, however, people performed the ceremonies not in special buildings, but in the mountains and woods or on the banks of rivers, where spirits and demons were thought to dwell. The woods, especially, were very likely the original sites of these religious rites. Originally, there were no professional priests, and a layman was elected by divination to carry out each ceremony. Women played important roles in worship. At one time the Emperor himself, the ruler of the nation, acted as the chief priest. The phallic aspect of Shintō worship reflects its connection with fertility cults in general.

In the Heian Period (794–1192) Shintō was combined by force with Buddhism (which was introduced in 552), but no genuine union of the two religions was ever realized. Generally speaking, Buddhism expresses belief in the hereafter, whereas Shintō is the religion of the present world and exhibits little concern for the world beyond the grave.

Bibliography: W. T. DE BARY et al., comps., Sources of Japanese Tradition (Records of Civilization 54; New York 1958). H. HARDACRE, Shinto and the state, 1868–1988 (Princeton, N. J. 1989). D. C. HOLTOM, The National Faith of Japan: A Study of Modern Shinto (London/New York 1938, 1995). J. BREEN and M. TEEUWEN, eds., Shinto in History: Ways of the Kami (Honolulu 2000).

[F. K. NUMAZAWA/EDS.]

SHIPMAN, ANDREW JACKSON

Lawyer, author; b. Springvale, Fairfax County, VA, Oct. 15, 1857; d. New York City, Oct. 17, 1915. He was the son of John James and Priscilla (Carroll) Shipman. After private tutoring he attended Georgetown College (now University), Washington, DC, graduating in 1878. He joined the Catholic Church while he was a student at Georgetown. After moving to Hocking Valley, OH (1880), where he became superintendent of W. P. Rend & Company, a coal mining firm, he displayed unusual interest in the Eastern-rite Catholics, who were numerous among the miners and whose religious needs were inadequately met. In 1884 he became a clerk in the New York Customs House, and two years later he obtained a law degree from the University of the City of New York. After his marriage to Adair Mooney in 1893, he established Blandy, Mooney, & Shipman, a law firm specializing in cases involving Greek-rite Catholics and ecclesiastical law; it handled the St. Stephen's Church cases (1890–1900) and the Hopkins will cases (1902–06).

In addition to his law practice, Shipman was active in civic and charitable affairs. He supported the MARQUETTE LEAGUE for Indian missionaries and promoted the Catholic Theater Movement. He served as delegate to the New York constitutional convention (1915), director of the Sevilla Home for Children and the Mohansic State Hospital, and member of the New York Board of Regents. His principal concern, however, was the welfare of Greek, Slavic, and Ruthenian Catholics. His knowledge of their life and language was intimate; he labored to interest the bishops in their problems, helped to promote their cultural assimilation, and acted as their most effective propagandist, seeking to make Catholics aware of them, explaining their rites, and dispelling Catholic fears about their orthodoxy. He wrote about them in such popular publications as McClure's Magazine and in the Catholic Encyclopedia, of which he was a director. He also translated their rite into English in The Holy Mass according to the Greek Rite (1911), participated actively in their local affairs, helped establish a Ruthenian Catholic Church, organized a Ukrainian choir, and assisted the Syrian Church of St. Joachim. He was an adviser to Bp. Stephen S. Ortynsky, who officiated at a Greek rite funeral service for him in St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York City.

Bibliography: C. B. PALLEN, ed., A Memorial of Andrew J. Shipman (New York 1916).

[J. L. MORRISON]

SHIRWOOD, JOHN

Bishop of Durham; b. York, England; d. Rome, Jan. 14, 1493. He received degrees from Cambridge University and a doctorate in theology from Oxford (by 1460). Proficiency in Latin letters helped him win the favor of George Neville, Bishop of Exeter, later Archbishop of York. This association existed in 1460, when Shirwood became chancellor of Exeter cathedral. In 1484 he received the bishopric of DURHAM by papal provision. His preferment to high Church office reflects the favor not only of Neville but also of King Edward IV. Beginning in 1477, he served as king's advocate at the Curia. He enjoyed also the favor of King Richard III. His career suffered from the victory of King Henry VII (1485), but eventually he won the new ruler's confidence, again becoming advocate at Rome in 1492. Shirwood first attracted Neville's attention through his humanistic scholarship (see HUMANISM). He was one of the first English humanists to master Greek. His Latin poetry is lost, but his Liber de ludo arithmomachia, describing a board game, was printed in 1482. He made an important collection of manuscripts and printed books, emphasizing the Greek and Latin classics.

Bibliography: A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the Scholars of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 3:1692–93. E. I. CARLYLE, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 18:146. R. WEISS, Humanism in England during the Fifteenth Century (2d ed. Oxford 1957). P. S. ALLEN, "Bishop Shirwood of Durham and His Library," English Historical Review 25 (1910) 445–456. B. BEHRENS, "Origins of the Office of English Resident Ambassador in Rome," English Historical Review 49 (1934) 640–656.

[C. G. NAUERT, JR.]

SHOWBREAD

Term having reference to the Israelite practice of keeping specially prepared bread or cakes constantly "set before" Yahweh in His Temple. The antiquity of this custom is attested by 1 Sm 21.1–6: the priest at Nob gave David and his men, all ritually pure, the consecrated or "holy bread," for he had no other bread than the "bread of the Presence" (leḥem happānīm, literally "bread of the face"), which had been removed from "before Yahweh" and replaced with "hot" bread. This passage implies that the bread was called "bread of the Presence" because it was always in the presence or sight of Yahweh. (See articles cited in the bibliography for other Hebrew terms for this bread.) Jesus cited the episode at Nob in one of His Sabbath controversies (Mt 12.1–8 and parallels). The legislation in Lv 24.5–9 provides that each Sabbath day 12 freshly baked cakes must be placed in two equal piles on a gold-plated table standing in front of the Holy of Holies and some pure incense placed on each pile. This bread was to serve as a perpetual memorial of Israel's covenant with Yahweh. The 12 cakes may have symbolized the 12 tribes of Israel. One of the duties of the Levites was the weekly renewal of the showbread (1 Chr 9.32; 23. 27–29; 2 Chr 13.11). Only the priests had the right to eat the bread set out the previous Sabbath (Lv 24.9; but cf. 1 Sm 21.1–6: either the law was not yet enacted or it could be nullified by an exceptional circumstance). The "table of showbread" is described in Ex 25.23–30; 37.10–16; for its location in the TENT OF MEETING and presumably also in the Temple, see Ex 40.22–23. Ten such tables are mentioned in 2 Chr 4.8, 19, but only one in 29.18. The Arch of Titus (Rome) contains a relief of the table of showbread from Herod's Temple.

Bibliography: A. PELLETIER, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 6:965–976. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, translated and adapted by L. HARTMAN (New York, 1963) 12202–03.

[D. DIETLEIN]

SHRINES

The term shrine refers to a place, usually the object of pilgrimages, where a relic, miraculous statue or picture, or other holy object receives special veneration; also to a spot designated to foster some Catholic belief or devotion. In Latin scrinium meant a box to contain manuscripts. Anglo-Saxon writers used scrin for a coffer or ark (arca in Latin) in which sacred relics were preserved, by analogy with the Biblical ARK OF THE COVENANT ('ārôn in Hebrew), which was a chest of acacia wood overlaid with gold, holding the Tables of the Law, Aaron's rod, and a golden pot of manna (Heb 9.4). The ark was set in the Temple, in the Holy of Holies, a true shrine honored with religious ceremonial (2 Chr 5.6).

The sarcophagi in the Roman CATACOMBS were arcae containing the bodies of the dead. The arcosolium developed, together with the tomb beneath an arch with a width equal to that of the tomb slab. This slab served as an altar table where Christian martyrs were interred. As in the case of St. POLYCARP, local cult established a solid tradition concerning the burial places of the martyrs and the authenticity of their relics (Martyrdom of Polycarp 18.2).

The translation of Christian relics began in the East at the time of Emperor Constantine I. Thus, in 356 relics believed to be those of St. Timothy and in 357 those of Saints Andrew and Luke were placed amid great ceremony in the Basilica of the Apostles in Constantinople. In the West, however, civil law and Christian sentiment forbade removal of relics. For some centuries these remained in marked tombs. Pope Honorius I (625 to 638) reversed a ruling by Pope Gregory I (590 to 604) when he had the head of St. AGNES brought to the greater safety of the Lateran in Rome. The history of the shrines devoted to her indicates clearly what was happening in many other places.

Four types of shrines will be noted, according as they honor objects of Our Lord's Passion, the Blessed Virgin Mary, the saints, or Catholic beliefs and devotions.

Interior of the Church of Santo Domingo, Oaxaca, Mexico. (©Kelly-Mooney Photography/CORBIS)

Shrines of Relics of the Passion. The instruments of the Passion came to be regarded as symbols of the supreme martyrdom and to be treated as major relics. Constantine I in 327 had the Holy SEPULCHER excavated (Eusebius, Vita Constantini 3.28). Eusebius does not mention the finding of the cross; but St. Ambrose states with some authority that the cross, title, and nails were unearthed (De obit. Theodosii 46, 57). (See CROSS, FINDING OF THE HOLY.) The title would identify the cross. In normal Roman usage, which the Gospels indicate was followed, the title consisted of a wooden board, then called album, gouged with the words of indictment and painted black or red. It is feasible that a title of this kind, fixed to a wooden cross which was flung hastily into a disused cistern, could have been preserved more than three centuries. Archeologists have recorded many such survivals.

Dispersal of what was regarded as true relics of the Passion began immediately. Parts of the cross and its title remained in Jerusalem, where they were venerated by Aetheria in 385. St. Cyril of Jerusalem, age seven when the holy sepulcher was located, wrote c. 347: "All the world is full of the particles of the cross" (Catecheses 4). St. HELENA is said to have sent to Constantine I, her son, parts of the cross and title.

The Jerusalem relic of the cross suffered many hazards. Chosroes II (590 to 628) captured it, but Heraclius regained it in 629 and subdivided it into 19 parts, which were distributed to great churches at Antioch, Alexandria, Edessa, and elsewhere. Four parts remained in Jerusalem and were in turn divided many times. During the period of the CRUSADES the crusaders removed portions, which thereby lost their tradition of origin. Some were authentically derived from the main deposit. Many particles consisted of mere splinters. When Rohault de Fleury made a detailed study of all relics of the cross then known, he showed that far less than one-fortieth was accounted for, although he overestimated the size and cubic content of the cross (Mémoire sur les Instruments de la Passion, 1870).

Church of Santa Croce in Gerusalemme, Rome. Constantine I sent part of the cross and title to Rome, where it was deposited in a chapel annexed to the Sessorian basilica subsequently dedicated to the holy cross. This remains the most important shrine of relics of the Passion and is the prototype of several later European shrines.

The relics at first were kept in a chamber behind the apse. This is the memoria, situated behind the martyrium at Golgotha and other Constantinian foundations, but not elsewhere in Rome, where relics remained beneath altars, not behind them. Other ancient European shrines, such as the one at Saragossa, placed the relics behind the altar. The feretory of St. Edward the Confessor still remains in a distinct chamber behind the high altar of Westminster Abbey, London. The Santa Croce relic of the cross, reduced to three pieces no longer than six inches, are currently encased in a silver reliquary.

The interior of Our Lady of Guadalupe Chapel, a shrine built on the site where Juan Diego claimed to have seen the Virgin Mary in 1531, Guadalupe Hidalgo, Mexico. (©Archive Photos)

It is the relic of the title at Santa Croce that is unique. Confronted by Visigoth attacks, the clergy (c. 455) hid the title high above the main arch behind a marble slab inscribed "Hic est titulus crucis." Here it was found in 1492 and enclosed in glass by Innocent VIII. A nail and two thorns from the crown of thorns are also venerated at Santa Croce.

Notre Dame Cathedral, Paris. This shrine claims a relic of the CROWN OF THORNS. The crown was shown to pilgrims in Jerusalem until about 810 and was then removed to the imperial chapel in Constantinople. Previously some of the thorns had been given away, notably to Aachen, Germany. Otto I in turn donated in 937 part of the Aachen relic to Athelstan, King of Wessex. After St. LOUIS IX, King of France, settled the war debts of Baldwin II of Constantinople, he received the sacred crown, a nail, and some of the wood of the cross. These were brought to Paris in an enormous procession, met by the King at Sens, where he bestowed several thorns on princes who were present. One of these is enshrined in the cathedral at Barcelona. Another later was brought to Scotland by Mary, Queen of Scots, and eventually came to Stonyhurst College in Lancashire.

St. Louis IX built the Sainte Chapelle in Paris to house the crown of thorns, translated it there (March 21, 1248), and enshrined it above the baldachino of the high altar. The relic was damaged in the process of concealing it during the French Revolution. In 1806 it was placed in Notre Dame Cathedral. There it is kept, along with the fragment of the cross and the nail, in a gilded bronze ark in resplendent cases. The relics are exposed every Lent and then returned to the cathedral treasury at the end of Holy Week.

Cathedral at Trier, Germany. The ark of relics that tradition claimed were sent to this imperial city by St. Helena remained sealed until 1101, when it was opened and revealed a large relic of the cross, a nail, and a garment, supposedly Christ's and since then called the holy coat of Trier. Argenteuil, near Paris, also claimed to possess the holy tunic, as did other places. The authenticity of the relics has given rise to much controversy. Trier and Argenteuil have been centers of pilgrimage whenever these relics were exposed (see TRIER).

Cathedral at Turin, Italy. The holy shroud was brought in 1578 to Turin, where it has since been kept in a silver casket inside an iron chest in a great marble urn in its own chapel in the cathedral. This chapel, approached by 37 steps behind the high altar, is a magnet for daily throngs of pilgrims. The shroud is exposed for veneration every 33 years.

Sancta Sanctorum Chapel, Rome. This is one of the most frequented of all shrines since it possesses what have been claimed to be relics of the cross, Christ's sandals, a portrait of Our Lord "not painted by mortal hands," and the holy stairs (scala sancta). These 28 white marble steps, which once led to the praetorium of Pilate at Jerusalem according to tradition, are mounted by pilgrims on their knees.

Other Shrines. The holy thorn given to King Athelstan remained in GLASTONBURY ABBEY until 1539 and is now preserved at STANBROOK ABBEY in England. The cathedral at Ghent enshrines one of the largest fragments of the cross. In Florence the cathedral retains a relic of the nail.

Shrines of Our Lady. The earliest shrines of the Blessed Virgin Mary were in the places related to the life of her son, Nazareth and Bethlehem. By the 4th century there was a church near the probatica pool in Jerusalem on the site of her supposed birthplace. At Ain Karim, four miles distant, is the church of the Visitation; and at Mt. Zion, the church of the dormition. (See PALESTINE, 9.)

Modern excavations at Ephesus have revealed an important 4th-century chapel on the site of a much older building. In 1950 it was restored as a shrine in the belief that Mary lived there with St. John. The nearby ruins of the church of St. Mary, scene of the ecumenical council in 431, ranked as a great Marian shrine. Loreto, Italy, claims the house of the Holy Family, said to have come from Nazareth.

Catholic priest blessing the congregation during Mass at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception, Washington, D.C. 1997, photograph by William Philpott. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Shrines with Cloth Relics. In the absence of corporeal relics, veneration attached to the Blessed Virgin's cloak, veil, and cincture, which emerged as relics somewhat later than those of the Passion. THEODORE LECTOR mentions that Eudocia sent to Constantinople (c. 450) an icon painted by St. Luke and refers to oratories possessing the cincture, cloak, or veil. The dispersal of these relics was gradual.

The cathedral in CHARTRES claims the veil of Mary, long misnamed her tunic, and said to have been given to King Charles the Bald in 876 by Constantine V. The ark, or châsse, covered with gold and richly jeweled, remained unopened until 1712. When opened it was found to contain not a tunic but a silken veil 16 feet long. During the French Revolution the reliquary was looted, but the relic was preserved, being cut into pieces and dispersed. These pieces were reassembled (1806 to 1818) and restored to veneration.

AACHEN, Germany, where Pope Leo III consecrated the basilica of St. Mary in 804, is the depository of Marian relics dating from this period. The swaddling clothes of Our Lord and Mary's cloak or veil are encased in a silver Marienschrein dating from 1237, and exposed every seven years.

The cincture, calchopratea, may have been distributed widely. Tortosa, Spain, claims a portion, said to have arrived miraculously at the altar in 1278. Prato in Tuscany has a relic of the cincture, which was long kept beneath the altar; and in 1320 it was taken to a new chapel designed by Pisano and adorned by Agnolo Gaddi, Bruno Mazzei, and Pisano and was encased in a remarkable reliquary made by Maso di Bartolomeo.

Shrines Possessing Icons. The ICON mentioned by Theodore Lector as painted by St. Luke was almost certainly the one known as hodegetria, the guide of the way, enshrined in a monastery rebuilt by Emperor Michael III (842 to 867). This, the prototype of many shrine icons and the palladium of Constantinople, was hacked to pieces when the city fell in 1453. The notion once prevailed that the Evangelist painted these icons. Confusion may have arisen among the uncritical because all these pictures, similar in iconography, were called Lucan and attributed to St. Luke on the strength of Theodore Lecter's remark.

Shrines that honor greatly venerated Lucan-type icons include St. Mary Major, Rome, whose "Salus populi romani" icon is kept in the Borghese chapel and has many times been carried through the city in time of plague. Bologna possesses a "Madonna di S. Luca" from Constantinople in the sanctuary of the same name founded in 1193. The cathedral in Bari has an icon, "S. Maria di Costantinopoli." Monte Vergine, near Avellino, honors the "Madonna Schiavona" enshrined in 1310. Poland has a famous shrine honoring Our Lady of CZE-STOCHOWA. In the Levant the most important Marian shrine is at Dair as-Sagura, Syria, where Orthodox nuns preserve the "Saidnaia Madonna."

Many other shrines have become famed for icon-type pictures stemming from Byzantine or Greco-Italian sources. Their main theme is the hodegetria or a variant of it, such as the eleousa, or tender caress. Thus in Rome is found the madonna of "S. Maria in Portico" in the church of S. Maria in Campitelli, transferred there in 1659. The Redemptorist church of S. Alfonso holds the world-famous icon "Our Lady of Perpetual Help," of mid-15th-century Cretan origin. The "Madonna della Strada" in the Jesuit church of the Gesù has always been intimately connected with the history of this order. There is at Genazzano an extremely popular shrine to Our Lady of Good Counsel. In the Eastern rite monastery at Grottaferrata, near Frascati, is the icon "S. Maria di Grottaferrata," dating from the early 11th century. Castel di Leva honors the 14th-century "Madonna del Divino Amore." At Monte Nero in Livorno the shrine has a Greek icon, "Plena Gratia." Montallegro in Rapallo honors the madonna "Stella Maris," dating from 1557, possibly of Dalmation origin. The church of the Consolata in Turin is the shrine of Our Lady of Consolation, dating from 1104. There is an affiliated daughter shrine at West Grinstead, England, crowned in 1893, which possesses an excellent facsimile of the icon. Shrines with icons of the hodegetria type tend to locate along those portions of the Mediterranean coast where Greek or Byzantine influence was strong. Eastern rite churches, Catholic or Orthodox, have innumerable shrines, each with its holy icon.

Shrines of Celebrated Images. These images, as distinct from icons, have become distinguished by some phenomenon or prodigy or miracles believed to have been granted at their sanctuaries. They can be found in many lands and have been noted in every century since, perhaps, the 4th. St. Irenaeus records a heretical sect in Alexandria which was honoring images c. 160 (Adv. haer. 1.25.6). The total number of shrines, as distinct from lady altars, to which pilgrimages are made defies precise enumeration. J. E. B. Drochon has supplied details concerning 1,300 in France alone, 75 of which have been honored with papal crowning, 200 with papal indulgences. Italian shrines are even more numerous. More than 200 of them have been crowned, many by the popes. Their numbers are small only in formerly Catholic countries where iconoclastic Calvinism eliminated them or in regions where Catholicism has not penetrated. In Holland some 60 Marian shrines survive or replace others which have been destroyed. A. E. de Staercke has recounted the essential facts about 250 Belgian shrines. Croatia has more than 50 such sanctuaries.

England had 65 Marian pilgrimage shrines before 1538, when their destruction was ordered by government edict. Some of the more notable historic centers have been revived in the 20th century, namely, those at Aylesford, Caversham, Doncaster, Evesham, Glastonbury, Osmotherley (Mount Grace), Truro (Our Lady of the Portal), Willesden. The shrine of Our Lady of Pewe (Power) is now in Westminster Cathedral. Surpassing all is Walsingham (see below).

Wales also has enjoyed similar revivals. At Penrhys the site of the shrine favored by the ancient Welsh bards was regained in 1939. At Cardigan near the former national pilgrimage center a statue of Our Lady of the Taper was reenshrined (1956).

In the United States 106 pilgrimage shrines of Our Lady have been listed [The Marian Era 4 (1963) 140-43]. Some of these are small, but others rank with historic European shrines. Santa Fe cathedral has a shrine honoring Our Lady of the Conquest (La Conquistadora), established in 1625. St. Augustine, Florida, had the shrine of Nuestra Senora de la Leche in 1620. The present statue is a replica. Canada possesses an important sanctuary at Cap-de-la-Madeleine, in a small chapel founded by Jesuits in 1659. The tiny chapel is now surrounded by a large Marian park with a basilica-type church. The statue was crowned in 1904.

In Latin America Bolivia has a shrine to Our Lady of Copacabana built in 1583. In Luján, Argentina, there is a national shrine honoring Our Lady of Luján, patroness of Argentina, Paraguay, and Uruguay. Since 1929 Brazil has placed itself under the patronage of Our Lady, "Aparacida," whose statue dates from the early 17th century. At Quinche, Ecuador, "La Pequeñita" (The Little Loved One) is one of the most beautiful of shrine statues.

Shrines Honoring Apparitions of Mary. In recent times ecclesiastical authorities have been cautious about giving credence to accounts of apparitions of Mary and permitting cult at these spots. In 1830 St. Catherine LA-BOURÉ received at the Rue de Bac, Paris, the first of her VISIONS, which were substantiated by episcopal inquiry. Since then 186 reports of such phenomena have been investigated, but only the following 10 have received canonical sanction and have become the location of shrines. First was the apparition to Marie Alphonse RATISBONNE in the church of S. Andrea delle Frate, Rome (1842). In 1846 the apparition at LA SALETTE occurred, and in 1858, those at LOURDES; both places have become world-famous sanctuaries. A large shrine was built at Ilaca, Croatia, after the apparitions to a peasant and other persons (1865 to 1867). A basilica was erected in 1871 in Philippsdorf, Bohemia, after the apparition to 30-year-old Magdalena Kade (1866). The vision to four children in a starlit sky at Pontmain, Normandy (Jan. 17, 1871), resulted in the construction of a basilica as a national votive offering since it also marked the start of withdrawal of Prussian invading forces. The shrine of Our Lady at Knock, Ireland, arose after the visions to a number of persons there (Aug. 21, 1879). FATIMA, Portugal, has become a world-renowned shrine since the apparitions there in 1917. Visions to five children at the May-tree in Beauraing, Belgium (1932 to 1933), were subjected to long ecclesiastical inquiries. The spot has become the center of international pilgrimages. After the appearances to a small girl in Banneux, Belgium, in 1933, episcopal recognition was granted in 1949, and a chapel was erected there.

Cult is permitted at the shrine in Pellevoisin, France, where Estelle Faguette, a maidservant, enjoyed an amazing cure and claimed to receive apparitions; but no official pronouncement has been made concerning their authenticity. Neither has there been official approval of the cult at Tre Fontane, near Rome, where Bruno Cornacchiola claimed visions in 1947; but devotional visits are not forbidden.

In earlier centuries apparitions of the Blessed Virgin have been honored with numerous shrines. Among the most famous is the French national shrine at Le Puy, which originated in the 3d century according to tradition and whose church was begun in 493. The sanctuary at Evesham, England, originated after the visions of Eoves, a swineherd, and Bishop Egwin in 700. After its destruction in 1538, a new shrine was erected in 1939 and became the goal of many pilgrimages.

WALSINGHAM, England, became one of the most popular places of pilgrimage in Europe subsequent to a vision in 1061. The shrine was demolished in 1538, but devotion rekindled c. 1894 and increased when the English hierarchy in 1934 reestablished the shrine in the 14th-century Slipper Chapel, the sole pilgrim chapel that had remained intact. The new statue was crowned in 1954 in accordance with a brief of Pius XII.

Aylesford, England, now commemorates the disputed apparition of Mary with the scapular to St. SIMON STOCK, which occurred at Cambridge (1251). In 1949 the CARMELITES regained their medieval monastery at Aylesford, home of St. Simon and resting place of some of his relics since 1951. A new pilgrims' church was completed in 1962.

GUADALUPE, near Mexico City, has become one of the most popular shrines in the world since the apparitions in 1531.

France and Italy are the most common locations of shrines resulting from apparitions. French ones, with dates of apparitions, include those at Celles (1686), Garaison (1500), La Vange (1800), Le Laus (1664), and Vinay (1656), which honors "Notre-Dame de l'Osier."

In Italy the following shrines are marked by magnificent sanctuaries and attract numerous pilgrims: Caravaggio (1432); Crema (1490); Genoa (1490), which honors Our Lady "della Guardia" on Monte Figogna; Monte Berico (1426); Monte Nero in Livorno province (1345); Montallegro in Rapallo (1537); and Savona (1536), where the basilica is a national architectural monument.

Shrines of the Saints. So numerous are the shrines that are still centers of cult that they cannot even be listed here. It must suffice to say something about the location of shrines and arrangement of their relics and to mention a few of the more famous sanctuaries.

Arrangement of Shrines and Relics. In the early Church the normal arrangement was to place shrines in vaults beneath altars. This derived from the custom of building churches directly over the tombs of the saints there venerated. Later, when shrines were transferred to churches already erected, the arks were placed beneath altars above ground, and then usually in sealed chests. But in western Europe and England, following a pattern seen in Jerusalem, the relics were commonly translated to chapels directly behind the high altar, raised on catafalque-type structures of costly marbles. Or the relic chests were enclosed in the normal tomb space in the bases of these shrine monuments, with apertures that allowed pilgrims to touch the casket within. The shrine of St. ALBAN, protomartyr of Britain, in the abbey church dedicated to him, was such a structure. It was demolished in 1539, but the pieces have been reassembled and rebuilt in situ so that visitors can see what the arrangement was, but without the wealth of adornment that once enriched the shrine. The relics were scattered. Even so, a number of pilgrims, especially among Anglicans, visit the now empty shrine. The abbey church is now the Anglican cathedral of St. Albans.

Later still, under Renaissance influence, it became the practice to dress relics in sacerdotal or episcopal vestments, or religious garb, sometimes with silver or waxen masks, all enclosed within crystal-fronted caskets so that the apparent corpse could be seen. This was done as recently as 1925, when the remains of St. Bernadette Soubirous were translated to the resplendent reliquary in the convent chapel at Nevers. It has also been done at the shrines in Paris of St. Vincent de Paul and St. Catherine Labouré. In the latter case the heart, removed from the body, is enclosed in a separate crystal heart reliquary. This practice exists also outside France. In 1930 the relics of St. John Southworth were translated to Westminster Cathedral and covered with crimson Mass vestments and deposited in a bronze casket with crystal sides. Silver masks cover hands and face.

Shrines of the Apostles. The tombs of Saints Peter and Paul, Apostles, in Rome have for centuries received special honor. The venerable sanctuary of St. James, son of Zebedee, at Santiago de Compostela in Spain retains its great popularity. At Toulouse, which used to be on the famous pilgrim route to Santiago, the crypt in the basilica of St. Sernin honors supposed relics of eight apostles. Most popular here is the shrine of St. Jude as patron of lost causes. St. Bartholomew is honored in the church dedicated to him on the island in the Tiber, Rome, where a porphyry urn contains relics, thought to be his when Otto III removed them from Benevento (983). An elaborate shrine in Amalfi, Italy, contains relics claimed to be those of St. Andrew. The head was removed to St. Peter's Basilica, Rome (1462), but Pope Paul VI ordered its return to Patras, Greece (1964). St. Thomas is greatly venerated at Mylapore, India, by Malabar rite Christians, and also at Ortona, Italy, which retained the reliquary intact after the destruction of the cathedral (1943). St. John was honored at Ephesus by a chapel in the 2d century and by a basilica in the 6th, which became a mosque (1330) before its destruction by Tamerlane (1402). Excavations in 1926 made it possible to visit the tomb, now empty, in a vault beneath the altar.

Founders of Religious Orders. Saints who have founded religious orders, particularly the larger ones, are revered in several shrines. That of St. Benedict at Monte Cassino, Italy, is of immense historic interest. St. Dominic is enshrined in the church of San Domenico, Bologna, in a marble arca, the head being preserved apart in a silver head reliquary. The relics of St. Francis are the object of immense devotion in the crypt beneath the lower church at Assisi. St. Ignatius of Loyola is venerated in the church of the Gesù, Rome, where his remains repose in an urn of gilt bronze beneath an altar of lapis lazuli, above which is a statue of the Jesuit founder in solid silver. The shrine of St. Philip Neri in the Chiesa Nuova is very popular with Romans.

Missioners. Shrines honor also saints who have evangelized various countries or effected religious revivals. Thus St. Boniface, apostle of Germany, is enshrined at Fulda Abbey in an elaborate tomb. St. Chad, apostle of Mercia, was honored at the cathedral in Lichfield, England, until the Reformation, when his relics were rescued and hidden. Pugin designed the shrine that now contains them in St. Chad's cathedral, Birmingham. St. Willibrord, apostle of the Frisians, was buried in the abbey of Echternach in Luxembourg, which soon became a very popular pilgrimage center. Still surviving is the ancient dancing procession each Whit Tuesday, when thousands of pilgrims perform a curious dance step along an established route while reciting centuries-old litanies. This custom of walking along routes (Bidweggen, prayer ways) fixed by tradition is found at such Belgian and Dutch shrines as those at Hal, Maastricht, Roermond, and Walcourt. One of the most popular shrines in the United States is that of the North American Martyrs at Auriesville, New York.

The classic example of a famous medieval shrine that continues to function in the 20th century as it did in the 11th is that of St. Nicholas of Myra, patron of sailors and children and prototype of Santa Claus. His remains are in the crypt of the basilica at Bari, Italy, where the altar, tomb, statue, and lamps are in solid silver and the icon is a rich, 14th-century gift from King Mosario of Serbia.

Sanctuaries of Honor. Desire to honor Catholic beliefs or devotions accounts for another group of sanctuaries. They are called shrines although they do not necessarily contain relics or miraculous images. One of the most celebrated shrines of this type is in the Convent of the Visitation, Paray-le-Monial (Saone-et-Loire), France, place of the revelations granted to St. Margaret Mary Alacoque, associated with the devotion to the Sacred Heart. In Paris the basilica of Sacré-Coeur on the summit of Montmartre was built by national subscription as a manifestation of contrition and hope after the Franco-Prussian War (1870 to 1871). The National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington, D.C., was given this designation by the hierarchy of the United States and built in honor of the patroness of the United States. Great numbers of parish churches and other sacred edifices, some enjoying more than local fame, are called shrines and serve as stimuli to devotion.

See Also: ICON; IMAGES, VENERATION OF; MARTYRIUM; PILGRIMAGES; RELICS; RELIQUARIES

Bibliography: Treatments of a general kind are lacking, although works on individual shrines or types of shrines abound. F.

PHILIPIN DE RIVIÈRES, Holy Places: Their Sanctity and Authenticity (London 1874). J. K. CARTWRIGHT, The Catholic Shrines of Europe (New York 1955). P. KINSEL and L. HENRY, The Catholic Shrines of the Holy Land (New York 1951). H. M. GILLET, The Story of the Relics of the Passion (Oxford 1935); Famous Shrines of Our Lady, 2 v. (London 1949); Shrines of Our Lady in England and Wales (London 1957). E. WATERTON, Pietas Mariana Britannica (London 1879). Z. ARADI, Shrines of Our Lady Around the World (New York 1954). M. J. DORCY, Shrines of Our Lady (New York 1956). J. E. B. DROCHON, Histoire illustrée des pèlerinages français de la très sainte Vierge (Paris 1890). I. COUTURIER DE CHEFDUBOIS, Mille pèlerinages de Notre-Dame, 3 v. (Paris 1954). A. SALVINI, Santuari Mariani d'Italia (Rome 1940). A. GABRIELLI, Saints and Shrines of Italy (Rome 1950). G. RODRIGUE, Les Sanctuaires de Marie en Belgique (Renaix, Belgium 1924), A. E. DE STAERCKE, Notre-Dame des Belges (Brussels 1954). J. A. F. KRONENBURG, Maria's Heerlijkheid in Nederland, 8 v. (Amsterdam 1904–14). I. ALLARDYCE, Historic Shrines of Spain (New York 1912). D. MANFREDI CANO, Santuarios de la Virgen María en España y América (Madrid 1954). R. VARGAS UGARTE, Historia del culto de María en Ibero-américa y de sus imágenes y santuarios más celebrados (3d ed. Madrid 1956). B. CAMM, Pilgrim Paths in Latin Lands (St. Louis 1923); Forgotten Shrines (St. Louis 1910). J. C. WALL, Shrines of British Saints (London 1905). B. C. BOULTER, The Pilgrim Shrines of England (London 1928). C. HOLE, English Shrines and Sanctuaries (London 1954). D. D. C. POCHIN MOULD, Irish Pilgrimage (New York 1957). F. G. HOLWECK, A Biographical Dictionary of the Saints (St. Louis 1924). R. L. and H. F. WOODS, Pilgrim Places in North America: A Guide to Catholic Shrines (New York 1939). F. B. THORNTON, Catholic Shrines in the United States and Canada (New York 1954). A. M. BOZZONE, A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico, 3 v. (Turin 1954–58) 3:714–15.

[H. M. GILLET]

SHROUD OF TURIN

The Shroud of Turin, an aged, patched and scorched rectangular piece of linen that has been preserved since the late 16th century in the Cathedral of St. John at Turin, is perhaps the best-known artifact in the Christian West. The entire fabric, woven in a fine three-to-one herringbone twill, measures 14.25 feet long by 3.58 feet wide, including a 3.5 inch matching linen strip that at some point was attached to one of the long sides. On one side of this cloth can be seen faint images, sepia-yellow in color, of the front and back of a naked human body, the body of a 5 foot, 11 inch bearded male Caucasian weighing about 170 pounds. Because these images are oriented on the cloth in a head-to-head fashion, the object appears to be a burial shroud. If indeed such, the body would have been placed on one half of the cloth and the other half would have been drawn over the head and upper body of the corpse and then down over the feet to enshroud the dead person completely.

Many wounds and bruises are visible on the body images, some in association with apparent bloodstains. The conformity of this evidence with the gospel accounts of Jesus' crucifixion is striking. For example, bloodstains flow from the base of the man's left hand—his right wrist, covered by the left hand, is not visible—and from both of his feet. Furthermore, at his rib cage on the right side there is also a wound with a large blood stain around it (see Jn 19.31–37). Visible around the man's head are smaller lesions from which blood has trickled downward, a detail corresponding to Jesus's crowning with thorns (Mt 27.29 and parr.). Also visible are numerous small wounds covering the entire body, front and back, from the shoulders downward, and these accord with the account of Jesus' scourging by Roman soldiers preparatory to his crucifixion (Mt 27.26 and parr.). Given the many points of agreement between the gospel narratives and the evidence of the shroud, scholars agree that this object can only be either Jesus' actual burial shroud or a well-crafted later imitation.

Facial impression, believed to be that of Jesus Christ, from the Shroud of Turin. (©David Lees/CORBIS)

History of the Shroud. The whereabouts of this object is well attested back to the mid-14th century but not earlier. While Ian Wilson and other investigators have proposed various theories about the shroud's history prior to that date, these, because of the lack of hard evidence, have not enjoyed universal scholarly support. There is clear evidence, however, that about 1357 the shroud was exhibited in Lirey, a village near Troyes in northeastern France. The Musée de Cluny in Paris still preserves a pilgrim's medallion from this exhibition, and this object attests that the shroud was then in possession of Geoffrey de Charny and his wife, Jeanne de Vergy. In 1460 its ownership passed from the de Charnys to the House of Savoy. They at first kept the shroud in a silver reliquary chest in the chapel of their castle at Chambéry, France, where it narrowly escaped destruction in a serious fire that broke out in 1532. Although the reliquary was daringly rescued from the flaming chapel, a drop of melting silver burned right through the shroud's many folds, and the entire cloth, which had also suffered extensively from scorching and water damage, required two years of patching and repair work. Despite all this, the body images on the shroud remained generally intact. In 1578 the Savoy family decided to move the shroud from Chambéry to the Royal Chapel in the Cathedral at Turin, and there it is still preserved. Only in 1983, however, did actual legal title to the shroud pass from the House of Savoy to the Holy See.

Authenticity. Church authorities have been generally reserved, or even quite negative, about the shroud's authenticity. When the de Charny family displayed the shroud at Lirey in 1357, the bishop of Troyes, Henry of Poitiers, objected strongly, claiming that the shroud was a fraudulent invention. In 1389 a later bishop of Troyes, Pierre d'Arcis, wrote a letter to Pope Clement VII at Avignon in which he expressed strong agreement with his predecessor's concerns. Because the shroud, said Bishop D'Arcis, is "a product of human handicraft" (manufactus) and "an artificial painting or depiction" (artificialiter depictus), the pope should act to put an end to its public display. While the pope in his response chose a more cautious route, he did insist that when the shroud was displayed, there should be no liturgical ceremony or pomp. Furthermore, he ordered that on each occasion a priest was to announce to those present "in a loud and intelligible voice, without any trickery, that the aforesaid representation [the shroud] is not the true burial cloth (sudarium) of our Lord Jesus Christ but only a kind of painting or picture made as a form or representation (in figuram seu representationem) of the burial cloth." While later Church leaders were more receptive to the shroud—in 1578, for example, Charles Borromeo, then the archbishop of Milan, journeyed on foot to Turin in order to venerate the shroud—they avoided making any affirmation of the shroud's authenticity. Although in 1670 a papal congregation granted an indulgence to those who would come and pray before the Shroud, it carefully specified that those who did so would receive the indulgence "not for venerating the cloth as the true Shroud of Christ but rather for meditating on the Passion," a neat sidestepping of the question of authenticity.

During the whole of the 20th century, and particularly after 1969 when it became possible for scientists and other researchers to study the shroud in greater detail, debate has raged about its authenticity as Jesus' actual burial cloth. While at this point the preponderance of evidence would seem to suggest a medieval date for the origin of this object, there are still scholars who would strenuously argue for its authenticity. The matter is made all the more complicated because there is no agreement whatsoever as to how the body images came to exist on the cloth.

Particularly damaging to any theory of authenticity were the Carbon-14 tests separately conducted in 1988 by laboratories in Tucson, Oxford, and Zurich on small fragments taken from a single portion of the shroud clear of any patching or charring. Although each laboratory utilized its own methods for eliminating possible contaminants from its sample and checked its results against control samples of known origin and date, their results with respect to the shroud accorded closely. The Research Laboratory of the British Museum did a statistical analysis of these results and reported that, within 95 percent confidence limits, the date for the linen of the shroud had to range somewhere between 1260 and 1390 AD, not earlier. These findings have been vigorously contested by the defenders of the shroud's authenticity. They argue, for example, that the fire of 1532 may well have added carbon isotopes to the linen and that the shroud's fibers over time became coated with bacteria and fungi, a factor which also could have added C-14 to the cloth and so have produced an inaccurate later dating. While debate continues about such issues, C-14 dating is hardly a new technology and scientists at this point have extensive familiarity with the problem of contaminants and methods for dealing properly with them in this sort of analysis.

There are other problems as well, particularly with the bloodstains. Questions remain, first of all, as to whether these stains were produced by actual human blood or even by blood at all. The team of scientists who examined the shroud in October 1978 at the close of its public display found albumin, porphyrinic material and iron associated with these stains and concluded that they had to have been produced by genuine human blood rather than by paint or some other substance. W. McCrone and others have questioned these findings. They link the iron discovered to the iron-oxide of artist's paint and raise difficulties about the red color of the stains, very odd for such ancient blood. On the other hand, the scientists involved in the 1978 study found no evidence whatever of brush strokes or other "directional" markings that would indicate that either the blood stains or the body images as a whole had been painted on the cloth.

Whatever is to be said about the medium that caused these bloodstains, there is a further and much more serious difficulty. These stains, clear in outline and unmudged, show a downward trend in their flow. Such would have been the direction taken by blood flowing from Jesus' various wounds while he hung vertically on the cross but not while his body lay prone in the tomb, if such flows could still have occurred at that point. Assuming the authenticity of the shroud, this state of affairs required that when Jesus' friends drew the nails from his hands and feet, took his body from the cross, carried it for some unknown distance to the tomb, and then laid it on the cloth of the shroud, they did all these things without smearing or disturbing the bloodstains on his body, an impossible supposition. F. Zugibe, who supports the authenticity of the shroud, has argued that Jesus' body was washed before being placed upon his burial shroud and that the shroud preserves a post-mortem oozing of blood from the various wounds. But in saying this, he fails to address the directionality of the blood flows seen on the shroud.

The hand of an artist may also be betrayed by the way in which the body of Jesus appears on the shroud. If Jesus' dead body actually produced the images seen on the shroud, those bodily areas closer to or touching the cloth should be delineated very clearly while those further away should be less distinct. In fact, however, Jesus' hands and face, including even the recessed areas around his eyes, are quite distinct (as one would expect in portrait art) while other areas of his body such as his buttocks and his navel are faintly outlined or even invisible. A pious concern for modesty may well account for this discrepancy. Very likely such a consideration also explains why the right arm and hand of the figure on the shroud are abnormally elongated. This permitted Jesus' genital area to be covered in modest fashion by his hands, an arrangement physically impossible for an ordinary dead body lying relaxed and prone. A further oddity is that no wrinkles or other irregularities distort the shroud's images, an improbability if this cloth had actually covered the irregular form of Jesus' body. Finally, the very fact that the man of the shroud looks just like our typical devotional images of Jesus raises questions since this so familiar iconographic convention can only be traced with certainty back to the Byzantine period. Earlier representations of Jesus in the catacombs of Rome, for example, depict him as beardless, and the canonical Gospels provide no description whatever of Jesus' physical appearance.

In terms of chronology, all efforts to situate this cloth in 1st century Palestine have so far proven inconclusive. Both its three-to-one herringbone weave and the presence of cotton fragments amid its linen threads as easily point to medieval Europe as to the Greco-Roman world. Pollen from Palestinian flora found trapped in the weave could well be contaminants carried by the wind or deposited by other means. Some think that they can discern a coin from the administration of Pontius Pilate covering Jesus' right eye. Yet the photographs of this "coin" are very blurred, and the use of coins to cover the eyes of the dead is not attested for 1st century Palestine.

In short, while many unanswered questions still remain, not least that of how the images came to appear on the cloth in the first place, it is most unlikely that this object is the authentic burial shroud of Jesus. Instead, while possibly a forgery deliberately intended to deceive the faithful, it very well could have been produced to serve as a devotional object, a pious reminder of how Jesus gave up even his own life for the salvation of humanity.

Bibliography: N. CALDARARO, "The Status of Research into the Authenticity of the Shroud," Approfondimento Sindone 1.1 (1997) 51–66. P. E. DAMON et al., "Radiocarbon Dating of the Shroud of Turin," Nature 337, 6208 (1989) 611–15. J. H. HELLER, Report on the Shroud of Turin (Boston 1983). J. IANNONE, The Mystery of the Shroud of Turin: New Scientific Evidence (New York 1998). R. WILD, S.J., "The Shroud of Turin—Probably the Work of a 14th-Century Artist or Forger," (Biblical Archaeology Review) 10, 2 (March–April 1984) 30–46. I. WILSON, The Shroud of Turin (New York 1978); The Mysterious Shroud (Garden City, N.Y. 1986); The Blood and the Shroud (New York 1998).

[R. A. WILD]

SHROVE TUESDAY

As the last day before Lent, which begins on Ash Wednesday, Shrove Tuesday ended the traditional period set aside for celebrating the Sacrament of Reconciliation and receiving canonical absolution in preparation for the great 40-day fast. The adjective shrove is derived from the Old English verb "to write" or to shrive (related to the German schreiben or the Dutch schrijven) and denotes the medieval English practice of giving, "writing down," or designating penance. The penance having been prescribed, the penitent was considered shriven, a practice referred to in Abbot Aelfric's translation of Theodolphus' Ecclesiastical Institutes c. 1000 A.D.

The term Shrove tide is the old English equivalent of Carnival referring to the final weeks before Lent. Rooted in the Latin phrase carnem levare—to withdraw or take away meat—households used this time to prepare rich pastries containing eggs, milk, and sugar, then, frying them in butter or fat and in this manner removing from the home foods forbidden during Lent. Herein lies the origin of "Fat Tuesday" or the respective French Mardi Gras. Throughout these days the English consume pancakes, Austrians and Germans various forms of fast- nacht cakes, and central Italians frappe. Polish Americans share jelly doughnuts, called paczki, or light-pastry “angel wings,” called chruściki. Local supermarkets in the Detroit, Michigan, area distribute specialty yeast-raised doughnuts from ethnic bakeries in Hamtramck, a town which holds an annual Paczki Day Parade. These dessert delicacies are traditionally made of foods which needed to be used up before the next seven weeks of Lenten abstinence.

Present day Carnival or Mardi Gras celebrations are held across the world, the most famous being in New Orleans, Louisiana, and Venice, Italy, and Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. In the United States, the streets of Old New Orleans, particularly Bourbon Street, celebrate a parade organized by social clubs called Krewes. The Krewes at one time were instruments through which the daughters of New Orleans citizens were introduced to society. A unique Krewe begun among the poorer blacks during the days of segregation is the Krewe of Zulu, which is famous for tossing almonds or gilded coconuts from their floats. Other Krewes throw plastic beads, play jazz music, host dance receptions, with the characteristic “King Cake” tradition, where the person who discovers a small baby-like figurine in their cake sponsors next year’s party.

The “city of canals built on the sea,” Venice, annually hosts a captivating masquerade parade, where costumed residents stroll the enchanting streets and bridges, the final destination being a civic gala held on the Piazza in front of St. Mark’s Basilica. Wearing of masks and costumes is common to many cultures during the early spring and autumn (Halloween in North America). It is a traditional manner of ritually “protecting” oneself from cosmic crisis or of “hiding” from evil spirits, which were once believed to emerge during the tenuous passage from the familiar “old” to the unknown “new” (New Year’s Eve costume balls) or seasonal transitions from the dark, late winter to the ever increasing warmth and light of spring. The Venetian Carnival is characterized by a spectacular display of colorful costumes. Many people dress in elaborate period gowns from the 18th century. Others masquerade as characters of the Venetian theater, the commedia dell’arte of Goldoni et al., still others as forms of nature or cosmic forces. A symbol of death frequently appears in the form of a mimed funeral reminding the frolickers that the sobering days of Lent are near. Each night during the final days before Ash Wednesday celebrations culminate as choral renditions, music, and dancing fill St. Mark’s Square, turning the city into a great masked ball.

At times, the carnival season is an occasion for excessive behavior as recently noted in Rio de Janeiro. Various forms of erotic behavior in the Brazilian capital has warranted pastoral letters from the local conference of bishops. Across the centuries civil and church authorities have responded to various abuses surfacing during these late winter days. In 1466, the Venetian-born Pope Paul II organized alternative civic pageants and horse races reminiscent of the splendor of the chariots of ancient Rome. These festivities gave the name to the famous Via Del Corso (“The Street of the Races”), the former Via Lata (Broad Street), connecting the Piazza Venezia with Piazza Del Popolo. Municipal authorities in Vienna (1654) issued a first-annual edict threatening with fines and possible arrest anyone who participated in indecent behavior or carried dangerous weapons. In an effort to dissuade participation in potentially immoral activity, Pope Benedict XIV in 1747, issued a special constitution, Super Bachanalibus, granting a plenary indulgence to all who took part in Eucharistic adoration during the days of Carnival.

Byzantine Churches call the two weeks prior to Lent, respectively, meatfare and cheesefare week. The faithful “bid farewell” by consuming it to the end of the first or meatfare week. Dairy products, on the other hand, are eaten until the end of the second or cheesefare week. In the capital of Ukraine, Kiev, the famous Pecherska Lavra monastery holds a ceremony of mutual forgiveness, every Cheesefare Sunday. Mirroring the penitential practices of Shrovetide, both the faithful and monks prepare for the 40-day journey to Easter by begging each other for forgiveness. Having reconciled differences, they embrace each other with the kiss of peace and sing the Resurrection verse: “Today, Christ, our Pasch, is revealed, a sacred Pasch, a new holy, and mystical Pascha, sanctifying all believers Let us embrace one another in joy and say ‘Bretheren and enemies too: we forgive everything on the Resurrection day!’”

Alleluia Tuesday is another name given to this day, as the Roman Catholic Church symbolically “buries” the Resurrection outcry, chanting it the for the last time before Easter. Responsorial verses are replaced with a sung alleluia and the mass of the day frequently ends with the solemn Easter dismissal. Understanding the alleluia as a Resurrection chant, and as such, inappropriate to the penitential nature of Lent, may be traced to sixth-century Spain as well as Pope Gregory the Great. Tenth-century pontificals attest to this practice deeming it a “celestial hymn.” Two centuries later at Rome, the presider himself breaks the somber silence of forty days by intoning the first alleluia at the Easter Vigil.

Bibliography: J. JUNGSMANN, The Mass of the Roman Rite, (Westminster, Maryland: Christian Classics Inc., 1986). J. KATRIJ, A Byzantine Liturgical Year, (Detroit, Michigan: Basilian Fathers Publication, 1983). H. THURSTON, Lent and Holy Week, (London 1904).

[C. M. KRYSA]

SHUSTER, GEORGE N.

American journalist, author, and educator, b. Lancaster, Wis., 1894, d. South Bend, Ind., 25 Jan. 1977. Editor of COMMONWEAL 1928–40, president of Hunter College, assistant to the president of the University of Notre Dame, and director of the Center for the Study of Man in Contemporary Society, Shuster was a towering Catholic figure of the 20th century. In World War I he served as a sergeant in Army intelligence. He was later educated at Notre Dame, the Universities of Poitiers and of Berlin, and at Columbia. He was head of the English department at Notre Dame (1920–24), then taught at Brooklyn Polytechnic Institute and St. Joseph's College for Women (1924–34). When he began his 20-year tenure at Hunter (1940), it was the largest public college for women in the world. He returned to Notre Dame as assistant to the president (1961–71), then as professor emeritus of English. In his early career he was interested in the Catholic influence in English literature, a concern reflected in Catholic Spirit in Modern English Literature (1922), English Literature: a Textbook (1926), Catholic Church in America (1927), and Catholic Church in Current Literature (1930). He edited The World's Great Catholic Literature (1942; rev. ed. 1964). In the 1930s he became alarmed at the rise of Hitler, as reflected in his Germans: An Inquiry and an Estimate (1932), Strong Man Rules (1934), Like a Mighty Army: Hitler versus Established Religion (1935), and, with Arnold Bergstraesser, Germany, a Short History (1944). He was a United States delegate to the United Nations Conference on International Education (1945) and thus helped create UNESCO. His book Cultural Co-operation and the Peace (1953) was a sympathetic account of UNESCO's failures and successes. Shuster's chagrin at aspects of the Communist regimes in Eastern Europe is reflected in his Religion behind the Iron Curtain (1954) and in his account of the ordeal of Cardinal Mindzenty, In Silence I Speak (1956, in collaboration with Tibor Horanyi). Shuster's reflections on a lifetime career in education are found in Education and Moral Wisdom (1960) and The Ground I Walked on; Reflections of a College President (1961). He wrote numerous topical articles in the confusion following Vatican Council II. Special mention, however, should be made of two works he edited, containing the results of conferences held at Notre Dame: Freedom and Authority in the West (1967); and Evolution in Perspective: Commentaries in Honor of Pierre Lecomte du Noüy (1968). More controversial was his Catholic Edu- cation in a Changing World (1967), his reflections on the results of surveys conducted by Notre Dame and the National Opinion Research Center as part of a study of Catholic education. He recommended that elementary schools be abandoned in order to strengthen other parts of the system and that parochial schools be seen as a matter of lay rather than of clerical concern. At about the same time, he was chairman of a group of 37 scholars who conducted the first population-control research done under Catholic auspices. The group gave qualified endorsement to the use of contraceptives and suggested a change in the church's traditional position on the subject.

Bibliography: G. N. SHUSTER, On the Side of Truth: George N. Shuster, an Evaluation with Readings, ed. W. P. LANNIE (South Bend, Ind. 1974).

[E. J. DILLON]

SIBERT OF BEKA

Carmelite theologian; b. Beka, Gelderland (lower Rhineland); d. Cologne, Germany, Dec. 29, 1332. He entered the Carmelites at Cologne, c. 1280. Instrumental in founding the Carmelite house in Geldern (1300), he was prior there (1312–15) and then at Cologne (1315–17). He became a master in theology at the University of Paris (c. 1316–17), where he was regent of theology (1318–20). He served as provincial prior of Germany (1317; 1327–32), and of lower Germany (1318–27). While at the Curia in AVIGNON, he had the bull Super cathedram extended to the Carmelites, granting them the privileges of preaching and hearing confessions (1326). He was head of the commission investigating the complaint of the archbishop of Cologne against Meister ECKHART (1327). Active in the struggle between Pope JOHN XXII and Emperor Louis IV the Bavarian, he composed a tract refuting the six errors of the Defensor pacis of MARSILIUS OF PADUA (1326–27). Other writings (mostly unedited) included an ordinal (c. 1312) adopted by the Carmelite general chapter in 1315 and in use for 200 years, Considerationes super regulam ordinis Carmelitarum, Summa censurarum novi juris, Bullarium ordinis sine privilegia Carmelitarum, two Quodlibeta, Commentarius in sententias, and Annotatio capitulorum generalium. Sibert's thought is, in general, traditional, often following THOMAS AQUINAS's, but more often similar to that of GODFREY OF FONTAINES, whose influence may possibly have been transferred to Sibert through Guy Terrena of Perigean.

Bibliography: SIBERT OF BEKA, Tract against Defensor in R. SCHOLZ, Unbekannte kirchenpolitische Streitschriften aus der Zeit Ludwigs des Bayern, 1327–1354, 2 v. (Rome 1911–14) 1:3–12; 2:3–15; Ordinaire de l'ordre de Notre-Dame du Mont Carmel, ed.

B. ZIMMERMAN (Paris 1910). Chartularium universitatis Parisiensis 3:661. B. M. XIBERTA Y ROQUETA, "Duo quolibet inedita Siberti de Beka," Analecta Ordinis Carmelitarum Calceatorum 4 (1922) 305–341; De scriptoribus scholasticis saeculi XIV ex ordine Carmelitarum (Louvain 1931) 142–166. P. GLORIEUX, Répertoire des maîtres en théologie de Paris au XIII^e siècle 2:344–345.

[D. ANDREINI]

SIBYLLINA BISCOSSI, BL.

Dominican tertiary; b. Pavia, 1287; d. Pavia, March 19, 1367. While still a child, she worked as a servant. At 12, having become blind, she was received into a house of Dominican tertiaries. Three years later she began to live as a recluse in a cell next to the Dominican church. A companion died after three years, and Sibyllina lived alone for the remaining 67 years of her life, practicing severe penances. Many persons consulted her and asked for her prayers; she is said to have had the gifts of prophecy and clairvoyance. Sibyllina's special devotions were to the Eucharist and the Holy Spirit; she regarded Pentecost as the greatest feast. She died in 1367. When her cult was confirmed in 1853, her body was found incorrupt. Plus IX beatified Sibyllina, who is the patron of servant girls in Italy.

Feast: March 23.

Bibliography: Année Dominicaine, 23 v. March 2:475–485. M. C. DE GANAY, Les Bienheureuses dominicaines (4th ed. Paris 1924) 177–191. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York, 1956) 1:665–666. Acta Sanctorum March 3:67–71. I. TAURISANO, Hierarchia Ordinis Praedicatorum (Rome 1916) 31. G. GIERATHS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 9:725.

[M. J. FINNEGAN]

SIBYLLINE ORACLES

A Sibylline oracle is synonymous with a rebus or riddle. The Sibyl, a prophetess, usually preferred, in fact, to give obscure responses or responses with double meanings. According to popular etymology (see Varro in Lactantius Inst. 1.6.7), the name signified "one who announces the counsels or plans of the gods" (ὄθεοβύλη). Proper originally to a Sibyl in Asia Minor, the name passed to a whole class of female seers, the most famous being the Sibyls of Delphi and Cumae, two places in which there was a special worship of Apollo.

Pagan Sibylline Books. The Sibyl of Delphi had a rival in the Pythia. The Cumaean Sibyl, according to Pseudo-Aristotle (Mirab. 1188) was identical with the Sibyl of Erythrae. The collection of her oracles was given official recognition at Rome from the period of the monarchy, and was one of the most efficacious instruments in Hellenizing Roman religion. The Sibylline books were lost when the Capitol was destroyed by fire in 83 B.C.

Earlier than these two Sibyls, Cassandra, the daughter of Priam and the beloved of Apollo, had provoked Heraclitus to write: "With lips inspired, she utters words that were mirthless, without ornament, and without perfume, but through the power of the god her voice reaches down a thousand years." (Frg. 92, in H. Diels, Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker: Griechisch und Deutsch.) Cassandra foretold the fall of Troy and the death of Agamemnon. In general, on the basis of the later tradition as found, e.g., in Vergil (Aen. 6), the Sibyl foretold an end and a new beginning. Interpretations respecting the date of the fatal day exhibited a constant and wide divergence, and on numerous occasions men believed that the end of the world was near.

Judeo-Christian Sibylline Books. The Judeo-Christian collection of Sibylline Oracles, which is extant, goes back, in its oldest part (bk. 3) at least, to the end of the Machabean period (2d half of the 2d century B.C.). The Sibyl "foretells" post factum the history of the world from its origin to the present. Book 8, which is violently anti-Roman, predicts the fall of the Empire. The author of the great medieval sequence, the Dies irae, will place the Sibyl beside David (Teste David cum Sibylla), and she will be honored, as numerous sculptures and paintings bear witness, for having foretold not only the Last Judgment, but also the coming of our Savior.

See Also: GOLDEN AGE.

Bibliography: Editions. J. GEFFCKEN, ed., Oracula sibyllina (Die Griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte 8; Leipzig 1902). A. KURFESS, Sibyllinische Weissagungen (Munich 1951). Studies. J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster, MD 1950–) 1:168–170. F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 1252–53, with good bibliography. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 12.2:2220–44. E. BEVAN, Sibyls and Seers (London 1928). A. RZACH, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA, et al. (Stuttgart 1893–) 2.2:2073–2183.

[E. DES PLACES]

SICARDUS OF CREMONA

Bishop, canonist, historian, and liturgist; b. Cremona, c. 1150; d. Cremona, June 8, 1215. Having studied in the schools of Bologna, Sicardus went to Paris about 1170 and taught canon law and theology there until about 1180. In that year he was collated to a prebend at Mainz,

“The Tiburtine Sibyl.” (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

where he taught in the cathedral school and fashioned his Paris lectures into a Summa decretorum. After his appointment as bishop of Cremona on Aug. 23, 1185, he successfully defended the rights of the city against Brescia and Milan, won independent status for the city from Frederick I Barbarossa, and pushed forward a great scheme of fortifications (1186). From 1202 until 1205 he took part in the papal mission of Cardinal Peter of Capua in Armenia and at Constantinople; in 1212 he welcomed Frederick II to Cremona and obtained from him the confirmation of Barbarossa’s privileges.

Writings. The following works represent only a part of the varied output of Sicardus, for certain early treatises of which he himself speaks are no longer extant. Mitræ (1200) is one of the most important liturgical treatises of the Middle Ages, and a source of much of the famous Rationale of William DURANTI, the Elder, almost a century later. The Mitræ consists of nine books (printed in Patrologia Latina, 217 v. [Paris 1878–90] 213:13–434):

bk. 1, churches and church fittings; bk. 2, sacred orders and vestments; bk. 3, the Mass; bks. 4–8, the liturgical year; bk. 9, Sanctorale. (2) Chronica universalis (1213). This, the first Italian example of a history from the beginning of time, was completed to 1201 when Sicardus left for the East in 1202, and on his return, continued to 1213 [printed in L. A. Muratori, Rerum italicarum scriptores, 500–1500, 25 v. in 28 (2d new ed. Città di Castello 1990—) 7:521–626, whence in Patrologia Latina 213:441–540; Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 31:22–103]. Because it was chiefly valuable for recent or contemporary events, especially those of the Fourth Crusade, it was a prime source of the early part of the Chronicle (c. 1283) of SALIMBENE of Parma. (3) Summa decretorum. This most important work of Sicardus was put together, or at least completed, in Mainz between 1179 and 1181 (see the “apology” attached in many manuscripts: “Ego vero Sychardus . . .”); it follows the plan of the Decretum of GRATIAN (ministers, discipline, Sacraments), and owes something to various predecessors of Sicardus, particularly to SIMON OF BISIGNANO and to the French school of DECRETISTS. It has not been printed, but a list of manuscripts, with a view to an edition (now in the hands of P. J. Kessler of Münster, Westphalia), will be found in S. Kuttner, "An interim checklist of manuscripts," Traditio 12 (1956): 562; see also ibid. 13 (1957): 470 and ibid. 15 (1959): 499.

Manuscript folio from "Summa Decretorum," by Sicardus of Cremona, containing the apology "Ego vero Sychardus."

Contribution. Although there is no radical departure from Gratian's sequence of topics, it is the merit of Sicardus that he loosened up the formal divisions of the Decretum. There is a marked attempt to be systematic that is enhanced by a use of distinctiones (dramatic pauses in order to view a point as a whole—an oral technique originally) and of quaestiones. The latter are not the quaestiones disputatae, or the classroom exercises of a slightly later period. Originally they were answers to problems that cropped up in the course of teaching, but as employed by glossators as a literary device they became known as quaestiones decretales and first made their appearance in the last quarter of the 12th century. Although the Summa of Sicardus possibly reflects techniques already in use in Paris, there seems to be no doubt that the Summa, with its novel arrangement into quaestiones principales (problems occurring as such in the Decretum) and quaestiones incidentales (problems suggested by a text), promoted the spread of the quaestio decretalis.

If Sicardus is thus an early example of an emerging decretist genre littéraire that is not narrowly along the lines of Gratian's Decretum, he is no less a witness to a breakthrough from the canonico-theological tradition of Gratian and his immediate successors. Although trained in that atmosphere at Bologna, Sicardus significantly abandons "to the theologians" a whole group of questions relating to the Eucharist, and he has no discussion whatsoever of Gratian's long De poenitentia. Apart from a material dependence on Sicardus of EVERARD OF YPRES (denied by some authors) and a more obvious debt of the anonymous Summa "In eadem civitate," some of the specific teaching of Sicardus was adopted toward the end of the century by the Summa lipsiensis and the Summa coloniensis, while HOSTIENSIS (Lectura II, VII, 1, v. divinae et humanae, n. 7) subscribed to his view that canon law was of divine origin.

Bibliography: J. F. VON SCHULTE, Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des kanonischen Rechts, 3 v. in 4 pts. (Stuttgart 1875–80; repr. Graz 1956) 1:143–145. O. HOLDER-EGGER, "Einiges zur Quellenkritik der Chronik Sicards," Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde 26 (1900) 471–555; 29 (1903) 177–245. A. FRANZ, Die Messe im deutschen Mittelalter (Freiburg 1902) 448–453. J. BRYD, De dispensatione in iure canonico (Bruges 1925) 101, 104, 107, 108, 117, 120, 136, 139. J. JUNCKER, "Summen und Glossen: Beiträge zur Literaturgeschichte des kanonischen Rechts im zwölften Jahrhundert," Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung 14 (1925): 384–474. S. CAVALCABÒ, La Famiglia del Vescovo Sicardo (Cremona 1931). S. KUTTNER, Repertorium der Kanonistik (Rome 1937) 150–153, 187–190; "Zur Biographie des Sicardus von Cremona," Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung 25 (1936): 476–478; "Réflexions sur les brocards des glossateurs," Mélanges Joseph de Ghellinck, 2 v. (Gembloux 1951) 2:783–788. J. DE GHELLINCK, Le Mouvement théologique du XII^e siècle (2d ed. Bruges 1948) 460–462, 504. E. BROCCIERI, Sicardo di Cremona e la sua opera letteraria (Cremona 1958). C. LEFEBVRE, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 7:1008–1111.

[L. E. BOYLE]

SICILY

Ancient Tinacria, the largest island in the Mediterranean, to the south and west of Italy, having an area of 9,926 square miles.

History. The physical partition into western and eastern Sicily is reproduced in its history. Greek writers of the 5th century B.C. speak of two nuclei of inhabitants: the Siculi in the east and Sicani in the west. Its position in the Mediterranean basin subjected Sicily to invasion by all the seafaring nations, and it was frequently the object of wars between different peoples. Phoenicians founded their first commercial base in Sicily in the 8th century B.C.; and with the consolidation of the Greek colonies in the 7th century, two zones of interest and cultures formed: Semitic to the west and Greek to the east. The Greek colonies reached an advanced culture; and though not generally given to colonial imperialism, they concentrated on founding autonomous city-states having close ties with the mother country. The rise of vast personal holdings (the Tirraneans) modified this situation. Gelonus, ruler of Syracuse (485 B.C.), held hegemony over Magna Graecia until a democratic revolution by municipal opponents was sustained by demands for liberty on the part of the mercantile classes. With the first Punic War (264–241) Sicily became a Roman colony. It was the theater for the Slave War (135–100), and after the Battle of Actium (31 B.C.) Augustus made it a senatorial province governed by a Proconsul.

Christianity. No precise evidence exists for the penetration of Christianity into Sicily. St. Paul stopped at Syracuse on his journey to Rome (Acts 28.12); but it was only when the Church possessed a solid organization that it thought of tracing its origins to the Apostles. A late legend suggests evangelization from Antioch, which may explain the Oriental derivation of Sicily's Christianity; this is supported by epigraphic and monumental artifacts. Its links with Rome are indicated in the letter of Pope INNOCENT I to the bishop of Gubbio (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne 20:552). Several episcopal sees existed in 251, as is signified in a letter of the Roman clergy to St. CYPRIAN (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 3.2:553), and the Church of Sicily took an active part in the 4th-century Donatist and Arian disputes and in the 5th- and 6th-century Christological troubles.

It was disturbed by the barbarian movements when the Vandals took control in 455, and the Church was subject to the vexations of their intolerance. In 491 Theodoric the Goth (493–526) conquered the island; it fell into the hands of Belisarius and the Byzantines (535) and remained under their control for three centuries. During this period the Church in Sicily attempted to rebuild and it entered into close relations with Rome, which held vast possessions there: under Gregory I (590–604) there were two papal patrimonies with more than 400 properties. As a result, the cults of St. AGATHA and St. LUCY were extended to Rome, and in the 7th century several popes were Sicilians.

Political Vicissitudes. The ecclesiastical institutions changed under Leo the Isaurian, who desired to break papal resistance by sequestrating the Church's patrimony in 732; he subjected the bishops of Sicily to the Patriarchate of Constantinople. But Greek penetration into Sicily was of long standing. The fall of Syria to the Arabs in 636 and of Egypt in 640 forced many Greeks, particularly monks, to emigrate to the island of Sicily. The Arabs took control after a war that endured from 827 to 902; sad conditions of the Church under Islam were made worse by Byzantine attempts at reconquest.

William II of Sicily presents a model of his church (the Cathedral) to the Virgin, 12th-century mosaic in the choir, the Cathedral at Monreale, Sicily.

Despite a wide culture the Arabs did not have deep roots there, and the Normans seized a propitious moment in 1061 to initiate the conquest at Messina, which they completed in 1091 at Noto. In the plan for the reorganization of the island they favored Greco-Italian monasticism, which under the Normans reached its golden age. Roger I obtained the right of apostolic legate for himself and successors from Pope Urban II (July 5, 1098). This privilege caused great conflict between the papal and political powers and was finally abrogated with the bull Suprema (Jan. 28, 1864; published Nov. 10, 1867).

With William II (d. 1189) the Norman dynasty was extinguished and the Hohenstaufens took control under Emperor Henry VI. The Hohenstaufens were ousted by Charles I of Anjou (1266). The Sicilian Vespers (1282) began a general anti-Frankish revolt on the island and resulted in a federation of cities under popular control (Communitas Sicilae), which eventually offered the crown to Peter III of Aragon.

In 1415 Viceroy governments were introduced by Aragon, then by Spain. Here the story of the island virtually ends; and its destiny forms part of the history of Spain and Italy. There was no lack of uprisings due to the loss of autonomy. To forestall centrifugal tendencies, the absentee sovereigns reserved ecclesiastical offices for their relatives and fellow nationals. Only with Charles V did the Sicilians obtain equality with the Spaniards: for every vacancy in a benefice, a Spaniard and a Sicilian were named alternately. But this system did not last long. In the end Charles III of Bourbon reserved the bishoprics, abbacies, and canonicates for Sicilians (1738).

Sicily passed to Savoy in 1713; to Austria in 1720; and at the end of the War of the Polish Succession (1733–1738) to the Bourbons of Naples, who held it until it was annexed to the Kingdom of Sardinia following the legendary campaign of Garibaldi's One Thousand.

Archeology. Of notable importance are the archaeological remains, and particularly the complex of cemeteries, found in Syracuse (pre-Constantinian), Agrigento, Palermo, Selinute, Noto, and Termini Imerese, which stem from at least the 4th and 5th centuries. Inscriptional discoveries abound particularly in Syracuse and Catania and form the most consistent nuclei for Christian epigraphy outside Rome; they are of considerable importance for HAGIOGRAPHY and ecclesiastical history, going back to the 3d century. Ruins of 4th- and 5th-century churches are found in Palermo, Priolo, Palagonia, Catania, Malvagna, and Syracuse.

Bibliography: J. BERARD, La Colonisation grecque . . . de la Sicile (Paris 1941). I. SCATURRO, Storia di Sicilia, 2 v. (Rome 1950). G. AGNELLO, Gli studi di archeologia cristiana in Sicilia (Catania 1950). S. L. AGNELLO, Silloge di iscrizioni paleocristiane della Sicilia (Rome 1953). A. FERRUA, "Epigrafia sicula pagana e cristiana," (Revista di archeologica Cristiana) 18 (1941) 151–243. F. MILONE, Sicilia: La natura e l'uomo (Turin 1960). O. GARANA, Le catacombe sicilane e i loro martiri (Turin 1963). Encyclopedia of World Art (New York 1959–) 8:736–738.

[G. ORLANDI]

SIDONIUS APOLLINARIS, ST.

Fifth-century bishop of Clermont; b. Lyons, France, Nov. 5, 431 or 432; d. Clermont, between 487 and 489. As a son of a well-to-do family, he completed his classical studies and in 452 married Papianilla, daughter of the Emperor Avitus whose panegyric he pronounced before the senate in 456. When Avitus was deposed in favor of Majorian, Sidonius delivered Majorian's panegyric. On his return to Gaul he lived with his wife and three children close to Lyons or at Aydat in Auvergne. In 468 his panegyric honoring the new Emperor Anthemius gained him the prefecture of Rome. On his return to Gaul he was elected bishop of Clermont (471 or 472). He organized the resistance to the Arian Visigoths when they invaded Auvergne in 474 and was exiled to Carcassone by Euric; however, he obtained a pardon and returned to his bishopric where he died. His name, inscribed in the MARTYROLOGY OF ST. JEROME, was retained in the Roman MARTYROLOGY. His cult was active in Aydat until the French Revolution. Provençal legends of Lazarus made Sidonius out to be the man born blind and cured by Christ in the Gospels (Jn 11.1–53). As the author of 24 carmina modeled on Virgil and Claudianus, three panegyrics, and verse letters, he manifests a considerable knowledge of prosody and an authentic poetic sentiment. While bishop he wrote some 147 letters, which though not theological in content contain historical, political, social, and literary information on fifth-century Gaul.

Feast: Aug. 23.

Bibliography: Opera omnia, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 58:435–751; ed. P. MOHR (Bibliotheca scriptorum Graecorum et Romanorum Teubneriana; Leipzig 1895); Poems and Letters, v.1 ed. and tr. W. B. ANDERSON (Loeb Classical Library; London-New York-Cambridge, Mass. 1936). H. RUTHERFORD, Sidonius Apollinaris (Clermont 1938). C. E. STEVENS, Sidonius Apollinaris and His Age (Oxford 1933). G. BARDY, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 14.2:2033–35. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 15.1: 1423–27. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF from 5th German ed. (New York 1960) 598–599.

[L. VEREECKE]

SIEDENBURG, FREDERIC

Pioneer in Catholic social work; b. Cincinnati, Ohio, Jan. 28, 1872; d. Detroit, Mich., Feb. 20, 1939. A graduate of St. Xavier's College (now Xavier University), Cincinnati, Ohio, he entered the Society of Jesus, received his seminary training at St. Louis University (M.A., 1899), and was ordained June 26, 1907. After further work in sociology and economics at the universities of Innsbruck, Berlin, and Vienna (1909–11), he established in 1914 the first American Catholic school of social work at Loyola University, Chicago, and served as dean from 1914 to 1932. He lectured and preached widely to promote understanding of social problems and the application of Catholic social principles. He was a director of the National Catholic Welfare Council, and an influential member of the National Conference of Catholic Charities, the National Conference of Social Work, and the Illinois Board of Public Welfare Commissioners. He was also vice president of the Committee on Cultural Relations with South America, and founder and president of the Illinois Catholic Historical Society. As executive dean of the University of Detroit, he established the College of Dentistry, became chairman of the Detroit Regional Labor Board, and president of the Michigan Conference of Social Service. He visited the Soviet Union. Siedenburgh was dedicated to improving conditions for the underprivileged and establishing professional standards in Catholic social work; he worked also to create an appreciation of the constructive mission of the Catholic Church among his fellow citizens.

Bibliography: J. A. RYAN, Social Doctrine in Action (New York 1941). M. SHEEHAN, "A Catholic School of Sociology," Catholic Charities Review 5 (June 1921) 196–198. A. J. MURPHY, "Father Siedenburgh, S.J.," Catholic Charities Review 23 (1939) 85–86.

[R. C. HARTNETT]

SIEDLISKA, FRANCISZKA, BL.

Religious name: Mary of Jesus the Good Shepherd; foundress of the Sisters of the Holy Family of Nazareth (Congregatio Sororum Sacrae Familiae de Nazareth [CSFN]); b. Roszkowa Wola, Poland, Nov. 12, 1842; d. Rome, Nov. 21, 1902, Rome. Frances Siedliska was born into a noble family; yet as a child she was gifted with a deep spiritual sensitivity that grew into an intense longing for God. She realized her call to religious life at age 12, but her father was deeply disappointed by her rejection of the family's wealth and social status. She struggled courageously with his disapproval and her own poor health before finally fulfilling her vocation to become a nun at age 30 (1872).

Siedliska's first spiritual advisor, Leander Lenzian, OFM Cap, recognized the uniqueness of her vision and discerned that she was called to establish a new religious community. In 1875 she founded the Sisters of the Holy Family of Nazareth in Rome. She discovered within the Holy Family the perfect model for loving surrender to God. Committed to extending the reign of God's love on earth through ministry to families, she and her sisters established 29 foundations across Europe and the United States before her death in 1902.

After authenticating a miracle attributed to her intercession, Pope John Paul II beatified Frances Siedliska on April 23, 1989.

Feast: Nov. 21.

Bibliography: F. SIEDLISKA, Autobiography (preface by M. T. JASIONOWICZ, trans. M. P. KRASOWSKI) (Pittsburgh 1997). K. BUR-

Blessed Mary of Jesus the Good Shepherd (Franciszka Siedliska). (Courtesy of the Sisters of the Holy Family of Nazareth)

TON, Where There is Love: The Life of Mother Mary Frances Siedliska of Jesus the Good Shepherd (New York 1951). M. MICHAEL GECEWICZ, Love Finds a Way: The Life of Mother Mary of Jesus the Good Shepherd, illustrated by M. RITA KOBIEROWSKA (Philadelphia 1986). M. DECHANTAL, Out of Nazareth: A Centenary of the Sisters of the Holy Family of Nazareth in Service of the Church, foreword by JOHN CARDINAL KROL (New York 1974). A. RICCIARDI, His Will Alone: The Life of Mother Mary of Jesus the Good Shepherd, trans. R. N. BARWIG (Oshkosh, Wisc. 1970). M. I. STRZALKOWSKA, Blessed Mary of Jesus the Good Shepherd Frances Siedliska, trans. M. J. BASIEWICZ, M. R. BRADLEY et al. (Rome 1989). M. I. STRZALKOWSKA, For Me to Live is Christ, trans. M. P. KRASOWSKI, illustrated by G. DE SILVA (Pittsburgh 1995).

[L. V. MIKOLAJEK]

SIENA

City south of Florence in Tuscany, Italy, known for its late medieval art. Originally an Etruscan colony, it became the Roman Sena Julia in 29 B.C. The archdiocese, metropolitan since 1459, had 98,000 Catholics, 119 secular and 70 religious priests, 90 men in 11 religious houses, and 324 women in 37 convents in 1963; it was 367 square miles in area. Its four suffragans, having 373,800 Catholics, 309 priests, and 527 sisters, are Chiusi-Pienza

Niccolò Pisano, the blessed in paradise, marble pulpit in the Cathedral at Siena, 1265–68. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

(established in the 4th century), Grosseto (1238), Massa Marittima (first-known bishop in 501), and Sovana-Pitigliano (first-known bishop in 680).

Bishopric and the city. Christianity was introduced by St. Ansano, a young Roman noble martyred at Arbia in 303; he became chief patron of the diocese and his relics were translated to Siena in 1107. The first-known bishop, Eusebius, attended a synod in Rome in 465. Little is known of Roman Siena; but the city, a refuge easily defended, grew during the barbarian invasions. Under the Lombard King Rotharis (636–653) the see became important. Bishops Maurus and Vitalian attended councils in Rome in 649 and 680. Several parishes long in dispute with the bishop of Arezzo were awarded to that see by King Liutprand in 715, but under Louis II (844–875) they were returned to Siena. The Benedictine monastery of S. Eugenio was founded in 730, but the Abbey of S. Salvatore del Monte Amiata, founded c. 750, was more important in Siena's history. From c. 900 the cathedral chapter had a life in common with the religious school for boys, several masters of which are known. The canons, who to the end of the 14th century elected the bishop, founded a hospital for pilgrims run by laymen.

The Lombard gastaldo, who ruled Siena in the name of the king, was replaced in the city under the FRANKS by the count, who later gave way in the city government to consuls. The political power of the bishops, already evident in the 9th century, slowly increased, as documents show, through the 11th century. Under their tutelage the commune came into being, and, with the consuls, they are mentioned as the chief magistrates of the city. During the dispute between Alexander III and Frederick I, Bishop Ranieri (1129–67), who compiled the obituary calendar of Siena c. 1140 and excommunicated the consuls for imprisoning clerics, had to flee Siena until his death in 1170. Through the 11th and 12th centuries the commune fought the powerful nobles of the country, making them build houses in the city and live there part of the year. The podesta, a higher official for military government and criminal judgments, was introduced in 1199. In 1186 Siena had obtained from Emperor Henry VI the right to elect its own consuls, to coin money, and to extend its jurisdiction over the county, reserving cases of final appeal to the judges and missi of the emperor. This official recognition of the commune by the emperor was called the Magna Carta of Siena. Thereafter the city had good relations with the empire and regularly followed a Ghibelline course (see GUELFs).

Siena Cathedral, Siena, Italy. (©Stephanie Colasanti/CORBIS)

Sienna was Ghibelline, moreover, because of the antagonism of her commercial rival and neighbor, rich and powerful FLORENCE, which never missed a chance to obstruct Siena's trade. Siena dominated the main roads to Rome, and a large part of the Via Francigena passed through its territory. Along this road went much of the trade across the Alps; and so Florence, seeking control of the road, waged a 50-year war with Siena, until Siena, aided by Manfred's cavalry, defeated her in the battle of Montaperti in 1260. The preaching against this war by Bishops Bruno (1189–1215) and Buonfiglio (1216–52), who had to deal also with ALBIGENSES, was in vain, as was the activity of the new mendicant orders toward the same end. Siena failed to gain lasting results from the victory, however, and began to decline. When Alexander IV excommunicated all of Siena for its obstinate Ghibelline policy, many debtors of the Siena banking company defaulted in their payments, and the bankers found themselves in serious difficulty. After 1252 Florence coined the florin, a well-struck gold coin of stable value, while Siena kept a coin of silver mixed with baser metal. Siena's trade in cloth also suffered from competition with the better cloth of Florence. Finally, the death of Manfred (1266) and the tragic end of Conrad of Swabia (1268) deprived Siena of imperial protection and led to its defeat in the battle of Colle Val d'Elsa (1269) and to a suit for peace with Florence.

Consequently, Siennese Ghibellinism faded away in favor of the Guelf Monte dei Nove government (1292–1355). Important public works were built, but family feuds developed and a number of catastrophes hastened the decline of the city. In 1304 the Gran Tavola, an important banking firm of the Buonsignori, failed. The Black Death of 1348 cost Siena 65,000 of its population of 80,000. Faced with crisis, Siena replaced the government of the Nine with a new one of 12 citizens from the lesser merchants, assisted on specific occasions by a college of the nobility. But the new government, the result of party rivalries, was worse than the preceding government—arbitrary, partial, and incapable. Companies of adventurers devastated the land, taking so large a tribute in coin that the treasury was depleted. Florence resumed its expansionism, and for protection Siena turned to Gian Galeazzo Visconti, giving him lordship of the city in 1399. When Gian Galeazzo died in 1402, Siena regained its liberty. At this time Sovana and the seaports became swamps.

In 1319 Bl. Bernard Tolomei (1272–1348) founded the Congregation of the Olivetani. In 1321 students from Bologna migrated to the University of Siena, begun before 1200 from the 10th-century cathedral school and made a studium generale by Charles IV in 1357. Bishop Donusdeo (1313–50), known for his charity and his firmness with the FRATICELLI, in 1339 blessed work done at the order of the commune on the present Gothic cathedral (begun c. 1200, façade by Giovanni Pisano 1284–99). The JESUATI were founded in Siena c. 1360. St. CATHERINE (1347–80) sought to make peace in Siena's internal discord and to promote reform in the Church, causing the popes to return to Rome from Avignon. St. Bernardine (1380–1444) preached penance and the reform of morality against a prevailing material comfort. The Church council that moved to Siena from Pavia in 1423 was without result.

In 1459 Siena was made a metropolitan see by Pius II, previously Bp. Enea Silvio Piccolomini of Siena (1450–58). Other PICCOLOMINI prelates of Siena were Antonio (1458–59), Francesco (1460–1501, Pius III), Giovanni (1503–29), Francesco Bandini (1529–88), Ascanius I (1588–97), Ascanius II (1628–71), and Celio (1671–82). Pandolfo Petrucci seized power in Siena in 1487, ruling wisely and favoring arts and letters until his death in 1512. His heirs were expelled in 1524 for incapacity. Protestantism did not affect religious life, except for the isolated case of Bernardino OCHINO, fourth general of the Capuchins, who became a Protestant in 1542. In 1533 Charles V took Siena under imperial protection, putting a Spanish garrison there. Siena rebelled and expelled the Spanish in 1552, but an imperial army besieged the city (1553–55), and after its capitulation Siena passed from an independent state to a small part of a large dominion. Philip II gave it to Cosimo I de' MEDICI in 1557 and it was incorporated in the Grand Duchy of Tuscany, whose fate it shared until in the plebescite of 1860 it joined the kingdom of ITALY. The diocese was hardly touched by JANSENISM.

Illustrious sons of Siena include Pope Alexander III, the jurist Cardinal Riccardo Petroni (c. 1250–1313), Pope Paul V, Pope Alexander VII, the poet and theologian Ambrose Caterino (1487–1553), the poet philologist Claudio Tolomei (1480?–1555), the converted Jew and biblical exegete Sixtus (1520–69), and the economist Salustio Bandini (1677–1760). Cardinal M. Bichi (1612–14) founded the seminary, which now has major and minor seminarians. La Voce del Popolo is a weekly Catholic newspaper.

Bibliography: G. A. PECCI, Storia del vescovado della città di Siena (Lucca 1748). E. G. GARDNER, The Story of Siena and San Gimignano (2d ed. London 1904). F. SCHEVILL, Siena: The History of a Medieval Commune (New York 1909; pa. 1964). R. L. DOUGLAS, History of Siena (London 1902). P. DU COLOMBIÈRE, Sienna et la peinture siennoise (Paris 1956). A. GAROSI, Siena nella storia della medicina, 1240–1555 (Florence 1958). T. BURCKHARDT, Siena, City of the Virgin, tr. M. M. BROWN (New York 1960). R. VALENTI, Storia di Siena (Siena 1963). Bulletino Senese di storia patria (1894–). W. BRANDMÜLLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–65) 9:742–744. Annuario Pontificio (Rome 1964) 418, 1413.

[E. SCOZZAFAVA]

Art. With major buildings from the 13th and 14th centuries demonstrating a living synthesis of northern Gothic and local Romanesque of Lombard origin, Siena outwardly remains a medieval city. The typically Siennese style, manifested throughout most of Tuscany as well as in Siena, found its prototype in the 13th-century Cistercian Abbey of S. Galgano, in the Valle della Merse. The abbey, now in ruins, leaves the cathedral, with its free-standing campanile and baptistery (derived from early Christian tradition), as the best-preserved example of Siennese style. The monastic churches (St. Francis, St. Dominic, St. Augustine) offer less splendid renditions of the same style. During these years some of the most important palaces were built: Palazzo Tolomei (the oldest), the Chigi-Saracini, the Buonsignori, the Salimbeni, the imposing Palazzo Pubblico with its Torre del Mangia, and some of the majestic city gates. In the 15th century, a strong Florentine influence appeared with Bernardo Rossellino (Palazzo delle Papesse) and Giuliano da Maiano (Palazzo Spannocchi). The most famous Siennese architects, Francesco di Giorgio and Peruzzi, distinguished themselves chiefly outside Siena.

The cathedral pulpit, by Niccolò PISANO (c. 1205–78), in a lofty epic style derived from antiquity, and the passionately expressive Gothic-like statues by his son Giovanni (c. 1250–1320) on the cathedral façade (also by Giovanni) are the first great monuments of Siennese and Italian sculpture. Almost a century later, Jacopo della Quercia (1374–1438) vigorously revived the Pisanesque tradition, as in his Fonte Gaia in the Piazza del Campo. Jacopo's later style was influenced by the Florentines Ghiberti and Donatello, with whom he had worked on the baptismal font of S. Giovanni. His powerfully plastic bas-reliefs in Bologna certainly influenced MICHELANGELO. Antonio Federighi followed Jacopo, and Francesco di Giorgio emulated Donatello. In the 16th century, the aestheticizing classicism of Lorenzo Mariano, called Marina, was anything but Siennese; similarly, the well-known 19th-century sculptor Giovanni Dupré recalls little of his native Siennese tradition.

Siena's glory is its painting, which best embodies the noble and refined soul of this profoundly mystical city. The traditions of Byzantium and of early Siennese illuminations formed the lofty style of the 13th-century croce dipinta and the panels by the oldest known Siennese painter, Guido da Siena (fl. c. 1250–75). Characterized by rhythmic line and glowing color upon a gold ground, this style reached its perfection in Duccio, whose iconic Maestà (1308–11) and scenes from the life of Christ express an intensely contemplated inner vision. Duccio's follower, Simone Martini (1284–1344), influenced by his friend Petrarch, developed a lyrical linear style, disdainful of prosaic feelings. The brothers Pietro and Ambrogio Lorenzetti assimilated the Giottesque influence and created a narrative style best seen in Ambrogio's frescoes showing "Good and Bad Government." But the Siennese school reached a crisis during the 15th century: Sassetta (fl. 1423–50), who tried to fuse Siennese abstractionism with Florentine naturalism; Domenico di Bartolo (1400–49); Vecchietta (1412–80); and Matteo di Giovanni (1435–95), in whom Florentine influence is felt still more decisively. However, at the end of the 15th century the elegant, spiritualized, traditional style enjoyed a final revival in the work of Neroccio de' Landi (1447–1500). The last major Siennese painter is the mannerist Beccafumi (1485–1551), whose ambiguous space, morbid sfumato, and capricious subject matter could not be further from the once great Siennese tradition. Since the 16th century, except for Francesco Vanni and the Caravaggiesque Rutilio Manetti in the 17th century, Siena has produced no painters who could be considered great.

Bibliography: E. CARLI, Scultura lignea Senese (Florence 1951). G. H. and E. R. CRICHTON, Nicola Pisano and the Revival of Sculpture in Italy (New York 1938). G. H. EDGELL, A History of Siennese Painting (New York 1932). M. MEISS, Painting in Florence and Siena after the Black Death (Princeton, N.J. 1951). W. HEYWOOD and L. OLCOTT, Guide to Siena: History and Art (2d ed. Siena 1924). J. POPE-HENNESSY, Introduction to Italian Sculpture, 3 v. (London 1955–62); Siennese Quattrocento Painting (New York 1947). A. VENTURI, Storia dell'arte italiana, 11 v. in 25 (Milan 1901–40). C. H. WEIGELT, Siennese Painting of the Trecento (New York 1930).

[I. GALANTIC]

SIERRA LEONE, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Republic of Sierra Leone is a tropical, largely agricultural country on the west coast of Africa, bordered on the southeast by LIBERIA, on the south and west by the North Atlantic Ocean, and on the north and northeast by the Republic of GUINEA. Hot and humid through most of the year, the region is characterized by coastal swamps rising to wooded hills, thence to a plateau region and mountains in the far east. Natural resources include diamonds, titanium, bauxite, iron ore, gold and chromite. Agricultural production, which is threatened annually by dusty harmattan winds blowing westward from the encroaching Sahara, include rice, coffee, cocoa, palm, peanuts, livestock and fish.

A British colony from 1808 and protectorate from 1896, Sierra Leone became an independent and sovereign Capital: Freetown.

Size: 27,925 sq. miles.
Population: 5,232,625 in 2000.
Languages: English, Mende (south), Temne (North), Krio (lingua franca).
Religions: 156,980 Catholics (3%), 2,354,680 Muslims (45%), 366,285 Protestants (7%), 2,354,680 follow indigenous beliefs.
Archdioceses: Freetown and Bo, with suffragans Kenema and Makeni (created 1961).

member of the British Commonwealth of Nations in 1961. A settled government became established by 1970, although as a result of the famine, ethnic tensions and government corruption that characterized the 1980s, a military coup under General Valentine Strasser gained power in April of 1992. After working to end corruption and reform the region's economy, the government removed the ban on political parties in 1995. The first democratic elections were held in 1996 and a civilian president elected. The region's mineral wealth—particularly its diamond mines—prompted a decade of civil war in an effort to unseat the government by the Revolutionary United Front. In addition to the negative impact on the economy as a result of the forced closure of mines, thousands were killed and another 2,000,000 made refugees by 2000 as a result of the continued violence. A peace agreement signed in 1999 and the deployment of U.N. peacekeeping forces in the region boded well for a return to peace.

History. After the Portuguese exploration of the region's coast c.1462, there followed many attempts at evangelization among the Temne and other tribes that left little permanent trace. The depredations of pirates and a flourishing slave trade kept mission efforts at bay through the 16th and 17th centuries. In 1858 the vicariate apostolic of Sierra Leone was detached from the vicariate of the Two Guineas and confided to the Society of the AFRICAN MISSIONS, whose founder MARION-BRÉSILLAC came to start the mission, but soon died of yellow fever, along with his four companions. The HOLY GHOST FATHERS then assumed charge, and sent two missionaries in 1864. The St. Joseph Sisters of Cluny arrived soon after. The mission made modest but steady progress, but did not gain converts in the same manner as British Protestants, who had established a haven for destitute British slaves along the Sierra Leone coast in 1787 and continued to work to abolish slavery as well as to evangelize. After 1815, as British colonization of the area increased, British warships sent ashore at Freetown all slaves captured on foreign ships.

By the mid-20th century the Catholic mission gave much attention to education, which was supported by the British government. The hierarchy was created in 1964, at which time there were no native priests. The diocese of Makeni was entrusted to the Xaverians of Parma.

By 2000 there were 37 parishes tended by 52 diocesan and 70 religious priests. Other religious included approximately 40 brothers and 60 sisters, who ran the country's 386 primary and 48 secondary Catholic schools. Although freedom of religion was guaranteed under the constitution promulgated on Oct. 1, 1991, that changed during a short-lived military coup took control of the government in 1998 and Catholic missionaries became the target of kidnapers and other violence. In January of 1999, five months before a peace agreement was reached between the government and rebel leaders, Freetown Archbishop Joseph Ganda was taken in a rebel raid, although he managed to escape shortly thereafter. Church leaders remained active in efforts to free hostages and orchestrate a lasting peace in the region, and joined Caritas International in that organization's efforts to return the 330,000 refugees who fled the country to their homes. Three thousand rebels turned over their weapons to the government in June of 2001, signaling the potential for a lasting peace in Sierra Leone. Diplomatic relations with the Holy See were established in 1996.

Bibliography: K. S. LATOURETTE, A History of the Expansion of Christianity, 7 v. (New York 1937–45) v.3. Bilan du Monde 2:790–792. Annuario Pontificio has information on all diocese. For additional bibliog. see AFRICA.

[J. BOUCHAUD/EDS.]

SIFFRIN, PETER

Liturgist; b. Bildstock (Saar), Germany, Oct. 1, 1886; d. Trier, June 6, 1963. He studied the humanities at Prüm, and philosophy and theology at the seminary of Trier. He was ordained Aug. 1, 1912, and was named curate at Kyllburg. In 1913 he joined the Benedictine monastery of St. Joseph, Gerleve (Westfalen); he moved to Dormition Abbey, Jerusalem, in 1928; and he lived at St. Matthias Abbey, Trier, until 1941 when it was suppressed by the Nazis. In 1949 he went to Rome and was subsequently appointed a consultor of the Congregation of Rites and for Vatican Council II; at the same time he taught liturgy and served as a member of the Liturgical Institute at St. Anselmo, Rome, and as an extraordinary member of the Abt-Herwegen Institute for liturgical and monastic research at the Abbey of Maria Laach, Germany. He was awarded an honorary doctorate in theology by the theological faculty of Trier in 1960. He created a complete alphabetical index of the initia of the Latin prayers of medieval liturgical books, especially the Sacramentaries. He collaborated with K. MOHLBERG in editing the Leonine and Gelasian Sacramentaries, the Missale Francorum, Missale Gallicanum Vetus, and the Missale Gothicum. Very useful are his concordances to these Sacramentaries and his word index to the Leonianum. He wrote numerous articles on liturgical subjects in Ephemerides Liturgicae, Jahrbuch für Liturgiewissenschaft, Enciclopedia Cattolica, and the second edition of the Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche.

Bibliography: L. EIZENHÖFER, Ephemerides liturgicae 78 (1964) 63–65.

[L. EIZENHÖFER]

SIGEBERT OF AUSTRASIA, ST.

Merovingian king, b. 631; d. Feb. 1, 656. The son of Dagobert I, Sigebert became king when he was three years old. Precise sources for his reign are lacking. It was marked by a war against Duke Radulphus, to whom Dagobert had entrusted the defense of Thuringia and who had revolted. Sigebert was defeated and barely escaped massacre. He was baptized by St. AMANDUS and in general showed deference toward the Church, but he resisted the bishops when he felt his royal prerogatives were at stake. He showed particular favor to the two abbeys of St. Remaclus, STAVELOT and MALMEDY. He was buried at Saint-Martin-devant-Metz, a monastery whose benefactor he had been. In 1552–53, his relics were transferred to Nancy; he became patron of the city. His vita was written by SIGEBERT OF GEMBLOUX. He is invoked for protection against inclement weather.

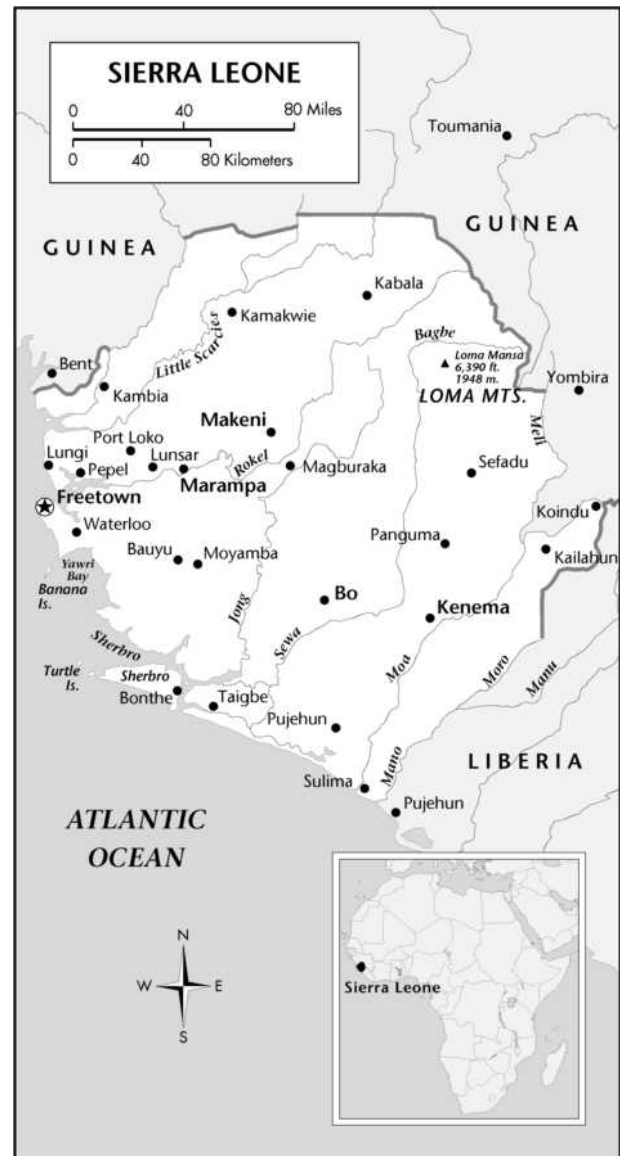

Feast: Feb. 1.

Bibliography: Sources. Acta Sanctorum (Paris 1863–) Feb. 1:231–242. “Historia Francorum,” Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1826–) 2:215–328. “Chronica Fredegarii,” Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1826–) 2:1–193. Literature. E. LAVISSE, ed. Histoire de France, 9 v. (Paris 1900–11) 2.1:163–165. U. CHEVALIER, Répertoire des sources historiques du moyen-âge. Bibliographie, 2 v. (2d ed. Paris 1905–07) 2:4241. B. KRUSCH, “Der Staatsstreich des fränkischen Hausmeiers Grimoald I,” Historische Aufsätze Karl Zeumer zum sechzigsten Geburtstag als Festgabe (Weimar 1910) 411–428. Cambridge Medieval History, 8 v. (London-New York 1911–36) v.2. ABBÉ GUISE, Saint Sigisbert (Paris 1920). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:229.

[É. BROUETTE]

SIGEBERT OF GEMBLOUX

Teacher, hagiographer, historian; b. c. 1030; d. Gembloux, Oct. 5, 1112. He entered the Benedictine monastery of GEMBLOUX as a child and was trained by Abbot Olbert (d. 1048), who conducted a good school and systematically built up an excellent library. At the request of Folwin, Abbot of St. Vincent's, Sigebert went to Metz, where he was schoolmaster for 20 years and where his long literary career began with composing the Lives of the saints of Metz, of the Passion of St. Lucia, and the Sermon on her translation. Late in 1070 Sigebert returned home. He then began a series of hagiographical and historical works for his own monastery, Gembloux, and his diocese, Liège. The lengthy Passion of the Theban Martyr Legion, in hexameters, shows not only his vast acquaintance with classical and Christian literature but also some genuine poetic expression. Sigebert's Life of Wicbert, founder of Gembloux, and the lives of other local notables are found in the Gesta of the Abbots of Gembloux. Although Sigebert wrote only three tracts (Monumenta Germanica Libelli di Lite 2:436–464) during the 30 years the INVESTITURE STRUGGLE was at its height, his position is made clear through his extant letter of 1075 in which he charges Pope GREGORY VII with the ills produced by his innovations. Further, Sigebert's letter directed against Pope PASCHAL II (1103) upholds the clergy of Liège and supports royal and imperial investiture against usurping popes. It was in his last decade that he produced two major works to crown his scholarly career. The Chronica (Monumenta Germanica Scriptores 6:300–374) attempted to establish a correct chronology of historical events from 381 to 1111 (but failed), while the De viris illustribus sought to provide a compendium of all important ecclesiastical writers as had the similar works of St. JEROME and GENNADIUS. Sigebert's De viris illustribus is one of the most important works of its kind in the Middle Ages and ranks with the summae of ABELARD and GRATIAN.

Children practice prayer songs before a live performance at Flaming Bible Children's Church, Freetown, Sierra Leone. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina 160:57–834, works. Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters 3:332–350. É. DE MOREAU, Histoire de l'Église en Belgique (2d ed. Brussels 1945) 2:95–99, 156–158, 277–281. Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter 1.4:727–737. A. BOUTEMY, Deutsches Archiv für Erfor- schung des Mittelalters 10 (1953) 534–535. J. LECLERCQ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 9:746.

[S. WILLIAMS]

SIGER OF BRABANT

Aristotelian and Averroist philosopher; b. Duchy of Brabant, c. 1240; d. Orvieto, between 1281 and 1284. He was a secular cleric and canon of St. Paul in Liège.

Life. After studying the liberal arts in Paris, Siger became master of arts and taught philosophy at the university. In 1266 he was cited by the papal legate, Simon of Brion, as the leader of a rebellious faction in the arts faculty. At about the same time he became the leader of a group of professors, among whom were BOETHIUS OF SWEDEN (Dacia) and Bernier of Nivelles, who taught an ARISTOTELIANISM influenced by Averroës and on some points contrary to the Christian faith. In 1270 the bishop of Paris, Étienne TEMPIER, condemned some of their teachings. Despite the official action against his doctrines, Siger's influence at the university grew. In 1271 he was again involved in a dispute in the faculty of arts, this time over the election of the rector of the university. On Nov. 23, 1276, Simon du Val, the inquisitor of France, summoned Siger of Brabant, Bernier of Nivelles, and Goswin of La Chapelle to appear before him to answer the charge of heresy. On March 7, 1277, the bishop of Paris condemned 219 propositions, among which are the heterodox teachings of Siger's Latin Averroism. Siger fled to the papal curia at Orvieto, where he died, stabbed by a demented secretary.

Siger was a philosopher of importance in the thirteenth century. He was called Siger the Great (Magnus), and Dante placed him among the wise men in paradise, with St. Thomas Aquinas speaking his eulogy. According to A. NIFO, writing about 1500, Siger was the founder of the Averroist school of philosophy.

Teaching. Like Averroës, Siger separated philosophy from religion. While accepting the truth of the Catholic faith, he insisted on the right of the philosopher to follow human reason to its inevitable conclusions, even though, in his view, it sometimes contradicts revelation. For example, he taught the eternity of the world as a necessary conclusion of philosophy, though it is contrary to faith. He did not acknowledge a double truth, one for philosophy and another for religion; however probable or even necessary he thought philosophical conclusions contrary to faith may be, he never called them true. The aim of the philosopher, he said, is not so much to discover the truth but what the great philosophers of the past, and especially Aristotle, thought (De anima intell. 7, ed. P. Mandonnet 2:164). St. Thomas opposed this conception of philosophy: "It is not the aim of philosophy," he wrote, "to know what men have thought but what the truth of things is" (In 1 cael. 22.8).

Siger's doctrine of being or reality is that of Aristotle as interpreted by Averroës. Opposing St. Thomas, Siger denied a composition of essence and existence in creatures. Existence, he said, is of the essence of creatures; for example, it is essential for man to exist. All species are eternal and necessary; individuals in the species are alone contingent. Siger granted a distinction between the terms "thing" (res) and "being" (ens), but in his view they signify the same reality in different ways. When one says that something is a being or exists, he means that it enjoys actuality; when he calls it a reality, he means that it possesses being in a stable manner.

Siger's notion of man and the human soul is also derived from Averroës's interpretation of Aristotle. According to Siger, each man is a substance composed of matter and a form, or soul, endowed with vegetative and sense powers. The intellect is an eternal, spiritual substance, separate from matter, and possessed in common by the human race. It is composed of two parts, the agent and possible intellects. This intellect may be said to belong to each man because it operates in him and uses his sense powers. The will, a faculty of the separate intellect, is passive and determined by motives presented to it by the intellect. The intellect is immortal, but individual souls of men are not. There are moral sanctions in the present life but not in a future one; good deeds are their own reward; evil ones bear their own punishment.

In a lost work, De intellectu, Siger later held that God is the agent intellect. The human intellectual soul is composed of the possible intellect, which is one for all men, and the human cogitative power. Because of this union, the intellect is multiplied and diversified, and it can be said to be the substantial form of man, giving him his specific rational being. In another lost treatise, De felicitate, Siger, following Averroës, held that man's supreme happiness in this life consists in the possible intellect's knowledge of the essence of the agent intellect, or God.

Works. Commentaries on Aristotle: Quaestiones in physicam, in metaphysicam, in tertium de anima; Compendium de generatione et corruptione. Questions on Aristotle's Libri naturales and Politics are lost. A collection of seven other commentaries on Aristotle in manuscript Munich 9559 is of disputed authenticity. Independent treatises are as follows: Quaestiones logicales; Quaestio utrum haec sit vera: homo est animal, nullo homine existente; Impossibilia; Sophisma "Omnis homo de necessitate est animal"; Quaestio de necessitate et contingentia causarum; Quaestiones naturales; Quaestio de aeternitate mundi; Tractatus de anima intellectiva; Quaestiones morales. Lost treatises are as follows: De intellectu; De motore primo; Liber de felicitate.

See Also: AVERROISM, LATIN; DOUBLE TRUTH, THEORY OF.

Bibliography: Editions. P. F. MANDONNET, Siger de Brabant et l'averroïsme latin au XIII^e siècle, 2 v. (2d ed. Les Philosophes belges 6-7; Louvain 1908-11). F. VAN STEENBERGHEN, Siger de Brabant d'après ses oeuvres inédites, 2 v. (ibid. 12-13; Louvain 1931-42). De aeternitate mundi, ed. W. J. DWYER (Louvain 1937). Questions sur la métaphysique, ed. A. GRAIFF (Louvain 1948). Literature. F. VAN STEENBERGHEN, "Nouvelles recherches sur Siger de Brabant et son école," Revue philosophique de Louvain 54 (1956): 130-147. A. MAIER, "Nouvelles questions de Siger de Brabant sur la Physique d'Aristote," ibid. 44 (1946): 497-513. A. ZIMMERMANN, Die Quaestiones des Siger von Brabant zur Physik des Aristoteles (Doctoral diss. U. of Cologne 1956). J. J. DUIN, La Doctrine de la Providence dans les écrits de Siger de Brabant (Louvain 1954). G. DA PALMA, La dottrina sull'unità dell'intelletto in Sigeri di Brabante (Padua 1955). B. NARDI, Sigeri di Brabante nel pensiero del Rinascimento italiano (Rome 1945). A. MAURER, Medieval Philosophy (New York 1962). É. H. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (New York 1955). F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy, v. 2. Medieval Philosophy, Augustine to Scotus (Westminster, Md. 1950). L. HÖDL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957-65) 9:746-747.

[A. MAURER]

SIGFRID, ST.

Missionary bishop in Sweden and Norway; fl. first half of the 11th century. The near-contemporary chronicler Adam of Bremen reported that Sigfrid came to the North from England. Later legends and chronicles embellished this fact by adding that he baptized King Olaf (Skötkonung) and that he was the first bishop of Växjö (southern Sweden), where he had labored with his three nephews (Ss.) Unaman, Sunaman, and Vinaman, who were killed by the pagan population and whose heads he carries in icons. Two Offices for his feast have survived: one is partly prose and partly rhythmical, the other is more properly a historia rhythmica; three sequences were also composed in his honor. His feast, observed throughout Sweden, is also celebrated in other Scandinavian countries, especially in Roskilde, Denmark, and in lands to which the Bridgettines had spread. In art, Sigfrid is depicted in bishop's attire, usually carrying the three heads of his martyred nephews.

Feast: February 15.

Bibliography: T. SCHMID, Den helige Sigfrid (Lund 1931); "Till Sigfrids officiets utveckling," Nordisk tidskrift för Bok- och Biblioteksväsen 20 (1933) 34-; "Trois légendes de Saint Sigfrid," B. DE GAIFFIER, Analecta Bollandiana 60 (1942) 82-90. Scriptores rerum Suecicarum Medii Aevi, 3 v. in 6 (Uppsala 1818-76) v.2.1. Analecta hymnica (Leipzig 1886-1922) v.25, 42. M. RYDBECK, Den helige Sigfrid (Lund 1957). A. ÖNNERFORS, Die Hauptfassungen des Sigfridoffiziums (Lund 1968). J. GALLÉN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 9: 742.

[T. SCHMID]

SIGILLOGRAPHY

The study of SEALS, sigillography or sphragistic(s) was originally a branch of DIPLOMATICS, with which it still shares much of its subject matter, though the sigillographer's approach is primarily technical and archaeological.

Sealing, as a means of authenticating written matter, has been practiced from remotest antiquity: in western Europe it enjoyed its greatest vogue between the 12th and the 15th century, when the principals in most transactions could not (or at least did not) validate their acts by signature. During this period seal owners were to be found at every level of society, and the great had needs and functions for which one seal might be insufficient.

The matrix by means of which the seal impression was made was most commonly metal: latten, a brasslike alloy, was normal, with precious metals used by the rich and lead by the poor. Jet, engraved gems (often survivals from classical antiquity specially mounted in metal), ivory, bone, and even wood were also used. The device and its circumambient legend were incised in reverse on the matrix, the back of which (on a single-sided seal) was shaped to form a handle, with or without a ring. The matrices of a double-sided seal were flat slabs, sometimes hinged but oftener having projecting pierced lugs through which pins were passed vertically to secure correct register.

In the papal Curia (imitated in this respect by some other Mediterranean chanceries) the impression took the form of a bulla, a ball of lead squeezed flat between two matrices. So-called bulls of gold and silver, used for documents of exceptional ceremoniousness, are seldom or never true seals; when they are not casts, they consist of thin leaves of metal stamped in shallow relief and soldered together. But the overwhelming majority of surviving medieval seal-impressions are in a material normally composed of roughly two parts of beeswax to one of resin. Chalk or ashes might be added to this mixture to harden it and to combat warmth later. Apart from white, which occurs before 1100, red and green were the earliest and the commonest variations on the natural color of this compound; but black, brown, and (rarely) blue are also found. Impressions in natural wax were sometimes coated with a dark varnish. Colors were occasionally combined in a single seal, as when the impression is borne on a layer of wax set in a "saucer" of wax of another color. There may be significance in the color used; for example, in both England and France royal grants in perpetuity were sealed in green.

The commonest shapes for medieval seals are the circle and the oval, the latter frequently pointed at top and bottom and especially affected by ladies and ecclesiastics, who were conventionally portrayed on their seals in a standing position. Other shapes are rare: even the "Gothic shield," which lent itself to the much-favored armorial device, is seldom found.

Within any one country the great seal (or seal of majesty) of the sovereign tends to be at any given time pre-eminent in size and to grow progressively larger, reaching a diameter of about 4 ½ inches in France at the end of the 15th century; the seals of subjects were ordinarily much smaller. Privy or "secret" seals were smaller still; they were used either to warrant the employment of the owner's great seal or to make a counter-impression in the back of a single-faced great seal and thus identify the seal owner personally with his act.

The devices on medieval seals are so diverse that the most thorough classification leaves a large category of "arbitrary" or "miscellaneous" charges outside the more readily defined types, such as the enthroned monarch, the patron saint, the mounted knight, the standing figure, the coat of arms, or the stylized castle. But all alike provide a rich source for the study of medieval art in general.

Legends, usually in Latin but occasionally in the vernacular, run clockwise around the circumference from a point right of top center. They generally proclaim the ownership and nature of the seal in formal language, but allusive, punning, and pious mottoes may also be found. The lettering develops from crude Roman capitals to "Lombardic" in the late 12th century and from Lombardic to "black letter" about 200 years later.

Wax seals might be applied directly to the surface of the document, which was often prepared by incisions or other means of fully engaging wax and parchment. Applied seals of the 15th century are frequently covered by a layer of paper interposed between matrix and wax at the moment of sealing. Bullae and double-sided wax seals were necessarily pendent. They hung either on a tongue, provided by almost severing the bottom margin of the document, or on tags, strings, or laces passed through slits or holes in the margin. The papal bulla was borne on hempen strings on letters of justice and by silk on letters of grace. Pendent wax seals are sometimes protected by woven bags or small boxes of wood or metal known as skippets.

Bibliography: H. JENKINSON, Guide to Seals in the Public Record Office (London 1954). J. H. ROMAN, Manuel de sigillographie française (Paris 1912). H. BRESSLAU, Handbuch der Urkundenlehre für Deutschland und Italien, ed. H. W. KLEWITZ, 2 v. (2d ed. Leipzig 1912–31) v. 2. A. DE BOÛARD, Manuel de diplomatique française et pontificale (Paris 1929) 333–351, an admirably clear and concise summary. M. TOURNEUR-NICODÈME, Bibliographie générale de la sigillographie (Besançon 1933), for sigillographic works pub. in Europe, particularly strong on the copious French literature. Y. METMAN, in L'Histoire et ses méthodes, ed. C. SAMARAN (Paris 1961) 393–446.

[L. C. HECTOR]

SIGISMUND, ST.

King of Burgundy (France), reputed martyr; d. ca. 524. The son of King Gundebald of Burgundy, an Arian, Sigismund was converted ca. 499 to the orthodox faith by Bp. AVITUS OF VIENNE, even though he persisted for some time longer in his old ways of life. He succeeded to the Burgundian throne in 516. In remorse for having ordered his own son strangled to death in a fit of anger (522), Sigismund became the effective founder of the monastery of SAINT-MAURICE in the present-day Valais canton of Switzerland. He sent for monks from LÉRINS, Gigny, Ile-Barbe, and SAINT-CLAUDE, endowed the community liberally, and initiated there the laus perennis, i.e., the continuous chanting of the Divine Office. About 523 Sigismund was defeated at the Battle of Agaune by the three kings of France, all sons of CLOVIS, who were intent on gaining the Kingdom of Burgundy and on revenging their maternal grandfather, King Chilperic, who had been put to death by Sigismund's father. Sigismund escaped to the vicinity of Saint-Maurice, where he became a hermit, but he was soon captured by King Clodomir and, despite AVITUS's remonstrances, was drowned in a well. Tradition ascribes miracles to Sigismund; his cult spread in southern France and among the West Franks. His body was taken to Saint-Maurice; in 676 his skull was taken to St. Sigismund's in Alsace (today in Matzenheim). Since 1354 part of his relics have been preserved in the cathedral at Prague, while others were taken to the Diocese of Freising in Germany and to the cathedral in Plock, Poland.

Feast: May 1.

Bibliography: Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1826–) 2:333–340; 7.2:775–776. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. and continued by H. LECLERQ, 10 v. in 19 (Paris 1907–38) 2.2:1017–22, 1031–42. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:209–210. R. FOLZ, "Zur Frage der heiligen Könige: Heiligkeit und Nachleben in der Geschichte des burgundischen Königtums," Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelaltars 14 (Cologne-Graz 1958) 317–344. J. M. THEURILLAT, L'Abbaye de St-Maurice d'Agaune, des origines à la réforme canoniale, 515–830 (Sion Switz, 1954); Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al. (1966) 9:748–749.

[B. B. SZCZESNIAK]

SIGISMUND, HOLY ROMAN EMPEROR

King of Hungary, 1387; King of the Romans, 1410; King of Bohemia, 1419; Holy Roman Emperor, May 31, 1433; b. Nuremberg, Germany, Feb. 12, 1368; d. Znojmo, Czechoslovakia, Dec. 9, 1437. The son of Emperor Charles IV and Elizabeth, daughter of Boguslav, Duke of Polish Pomerania, Sigismund was educated chiefly at the Hungarian Court. In 1385 he married Maria, daughter of King Louis the Great of Poland-Hungary and heir to Hungary; he had been rejected by Hedwig, the young Queen of Poland. In 1378 he had succeeded his father to the Mark of Brandenburg; on March 31, 1387, he was crowned King of Hungary. He also claimed the Mark of Moravia, which was under the rule of Duke Jobst, his cousin. His Hungarian reign was marked by domestic wars and failures in foreign policy (e.g., his defeat by the Turks at Nicopolis in 1396). Because of his involvement in the political skirmishing of German and other European princes for the Roman imperial crown, Sigismund lost any real influence in Hungary after 1396; but upon the forced resignation of Emperor WENCESLAUS IV, his stepbrother, he became vicar of the Holy Roman Empire in 1400. However, Rupert III, elector palatine of the Rhine, received the German crown despite Sigismund. These defeats precipitated new domestic wars with his Hungarian magnates, who “deposed” and actually imprisoned him for a short time in 1401. These skirmishes were followed by wars with Venice and with King Ladislaus of Naples, who sold the Dalmatian cities claimed by Hungary to the Republic of Venice. In 1401 Sigismund imprisoned Wenceslaus, who was still King of Bohemia, but was able to rule there in his stead for only 19 months before Wenceslaus escaped and returned. In 1410, after the death of Emperor Rupert, Sigismund was finally elected German king, that is, king of the Romans. Coronation was impeded by the wars among factions of German princes; but finally, on Nov. 8, 1414, he was crowned king at Aachen.

In his new role Sigismund attempted to achieve the unity of the Empire and the Church. To end the disorder of the Church occasioned by the WESTERN SCHISM and particularly by the election of antipope John XXIII at the Council of PISA, he pressured the convocation of the Council at CONSTANCE (1414–18). Later, with Pope MARTIN V, he convoked the Council at BASEL (1431). As imperial protector of the Church, Sigismund exercised a dominant influence in the councils; with his support, the contesting popes at Constance resigned, and reunion under Martin V was achieved. Sigismund was popularly held responsible for the Council’s condemnation of John HUS, Bohemian religious reformer and agitator, to the stake.

In 1419 Sigismund became king of Bohemia also, but the actual ruler was the widow of Wenceslaus, Queen Sophie.

The HUSSITE wars in Bohemia (c. 1420–36) and the second victory of the OTTOMAN TURKS, who were invading Hungary’s Danubian province (1426–27), considerably augmented Sigismund’s difficulties in uniting all German princes under his rule. To strengthen his camp of princely supporters, Sigismund made Frederick I, a Hohenzollern, the burgrave of Nuremberg, margrave of Brandenburg, and an elector of the Empire (1415); but in 1424 Frederick joined the opposition. With this Sigismund lost any real authority over the German princes; however, he was able to retain control of the Italian domains. On Nov. 25, 1431, he was crowned king of the Lombards at Milan; on May 31, 1433, Pope Eugene IV crowned him Holy Roman Emperor. Finally, the estates of Bohemia formally recognized him as their king.

When Sigismund died (he was buried at Oradea, Rumania), he had not achieved the basic goal of his life, the unification of Christendom under his authority to fight the Turks, who constituted the gravest danger to the existence of the Byzantine Empire and Western Christendom. Upon his death, the house of Luxembourg became extinct; his only daughter, Elizabeth, from his second wife, Barbara of Cile, married the Hapsburg Duke Albert V of Austria, the future German King Albert II, Sigismund’s successor.

Bibliography: J. VON ASCHBACH, Geschichte Kaiser Sigismunds, 4 v. (Hamburg 1838–45). W. BERGER, Johannes Hus und König Sigmund (Augsburg 1871). E. WINDECKE, Denkwürdigkeiten zur Geschichte des Zeitalters Kaiser Sigismunds, ed. W. ALTMANN (Berlin 1893). A. MAIN, The Emperor Sigismund (London 1903). M. SPINKA, John Hus and the Czech Reform (Chicago 1941). L. R. LOOMIS, tr., The Council of Constance, ed. J. H. MUNDY and K. M. WOODY (New York 1961). A. POSCH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 9:749–750.

[B. B. SZCZESNIAK]

SIGN

A sign is anything that represents to a knowing power something other than itself. For example, the color white, which is not itself joy, is a sign of joy in the Latin rite. A sign, then, is always distinguished from the thing signified; it is not a matter of the volitional or emotional orders, but of the cognitive. Nevertheless, the knowing power need not be the INTELLECT; the sign is a reality of the brute-animal world as well as of the human.

Types of Sign. There are six traditional types of sign: natural or artificial, instrumental or formal, imaging or nonimaging. A natural sign receives its significative force from nature itself, as smoke is a sign of fire. An artificial or arbitrary sign, on the other hand, receives its significative force from those using the sign, as a white color signifies joy for some people. When an artificial sign is imposed by tradition, it is sometimes called a customary sign; otherwise, it is a conventional sign. An instrumental sign is one that must be known apart from and before the thing signified. Thus one must first learn of the connection between smoke and fire, between white and joy, before smoke and white can become signs. When a sign is known together with the thing signified, on the other hand, it is a formal sign. An example is a bird’s danger cry, which conveys its meaning at once, even though it may never have been heard before. An instrumental sign requires previous education and experience; a formal sign is grasped intuitively. An imaging sign is one that pictures the thing signified, as in picture writing; a nonimaging sign is one that does not picture the thing signified, as in writing employing an alphabet.

Uses of Sign. The sign plays a role in philosophy and theology, as well as in formal disciplines. In philosophy, realists consider the CONCEPT or IDEA as the natural and formal sign of extramental reality, and the TERM or WORD as the artificial and instrumental sign of the concept. For this reason the universal term is called universale in significando, i.e., the universal as it is a sign (see UNIVERSALS). In theology, sign is indispensable for discussing the SACRAMENTS and the LITURGY, although for the latter SYMBOL is frequently used as synonymous with sign. Modern mathematicians and logicians restrict their use of symbol to artificial, nonimaging signs, usually written, such as “p,” or “q,” (see LOGIC, SYMBOLIC). In linguistic analysis, discussions of meaning are basically discussions of signs and what they signify (see SEMANTICS; SEMIOTICS).

[E. BONDI]

SIGNS OF THE TIMES

The Biblical expression “signs of the times” has been used with a general meaning of significant events and trends in many languages for centuries. It was given a specific theological meaning at Vatican II in the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in Today’s World: Gaudium et spes (art. 4). There it refers to those events in history characteristic of an epoch, which, if properly read, can reveal the presence or the absence of God.

History of the Term at the Council. “Signs of the times” was first used in a theological context by Pope John XXIII in the Bull Humanae salutis (Dec. 25, 1961), in which he convened the Vatican Council, to meet in the next year. After dismissing those who see only darkness burdening the face of the earth, the Pope stated:

We renew our confidence in our Savior who has not left the world he redeemed. Instead we make our own the recommendation that one should know how to distinguish the signs of the times (Mt 16:4) and we seem to see now in the midst of so much darkness a few indications that argue well for the fate of the Church and humanity (sec. 3).

While the Council was in session, Pope John published the encyclical letter Pacem in terris (April 13, 1963) in which the term “Signs of the Times” was used three times, not however in the text of the letter, but as the sub-titles to three distinct sections (par. 29, 126, 142). Under this heading the pope noted three events in particular as being significant for the knowledge of God and religion: the progressive development of the working classes, the growing role of women in public life, and the gradual disappearance of colonialism.

A year later, Pope Paul VI used the term in Ecclesiam suam (Aug. 6, 1964), where he spoke of the “signs of the times” as part of a dialogue between the Church and the world.

From the time of Pacem in terris the term “signs of the times” was used in successive drafts of sections of the pastoral constitution. “Signs of the Times” was the name given to a subcommission preparing the Introductory Statement of the Constitution.

Origin and Meaning. The origin of the term “signs of the times” is the Gospel (Mt. 16.1.3):

The Pharisees and the Sadducees came along; and as a test asked Jesus to show them some sign in the sky. He gave them this reply: ‘In the evening you say “Red sky at night, the day will be bright” but in the morning, “Sky red and gloomy, the day will be stormy.” If you know how to interpret the look of the sky can you not read the signs of the times (semeia tou kairon)? An eager faithless age is eager for a sign but no sign will be given it except that of Jonah.’ With that he left them (NAB).

In this context, the “signs of the times” are the person and activity of Jesus which signify that these days are decisive for repentance and judgment. They are clear indications of the coming of the Kingdom, signs which should be able to be read by all. In a more general context, the “signs of the times” could be said of events which, by qualities within the events themselves, manifest the presence and activity of God and call the Church to faith and deeper understanding.

The Biblical context is both christological and eschatological. World Council of Churches observers and some fathers of the Council objected to the use of the term for contemporary events. For this reason, the subcommission removed the term from the text submitted to the third and fourth sessions of the Council. It was inserted in the final text without, however, its Biblical citation; the term was to be understood only in the sense in which Popes John and Paul had used it.

Understood sociologically the “signs of the times” are those events in human history which, by their widespread or frequent appearance, or by some dramatic quality so characterize an era that in them the needs, achievements, and aspirations of men and women present themselves. Reflected in the light of the Gospel, they are signs of the divine saving will in history. From these “signs of the times” the Church is able to understand its teaching better, to express it more clearly and fully, and to adapt its pastoral action.

The most telling weakness in any theory of interpreting events as signs of God’s presence is its optimism: it fails to take into account the ambiguity which baffles any interpretation of human history. Pastor Lukas Vischer, a World Council of Churches observer at Vatican II, wrote the subcommission:

. . . to recognize the signs of the times one ought to distinguish the voice of God from any other voice no matter how persuasive it might be. Furthermore, the world is ambiguous and evil is mixed up with the good . . . evil is powerful in this moment of history; and when we compare it to the proclamation of the Reign of Christ it has an extraordinary power

The Council suggested no criteria for this prophetic task except study, discussion, prayer, and the assistance of the Holy Spirit in the Church (art. 44). Nor was this ever assumed to be easy.

Motivated by this faith it labors to decipher authentic signs of God's presence and purpose in the happenings, needs, and desires in which this people has a part along with other men of our age. . . . The Council wishes to assert in the light (of faith) those values which are most highly praised today and to relate them to their divine source. For insofar as they stem from endowments conferred by God on man, these values are exceedingly good. Yet they are often wrenched from their rightful function by the taint in man's heart and we stand in need of purification (art. II).

In the years that have followed the Council the phrase "signs of the times" has been applied frequently to descriptions of contemporary events which have an impact on the life of faith or on the Church. Papal letters and statements of the Synod of Bishops offer an analysis of contemporary events in the manner of Gaudium et spes as a preface or introduction, especially if the document deals with questions of social doctrine. However the term "signs of the times" is rarely used of this description. Almost nothing has been written about "signs of the times" as a font of revelation or a source of theology since the studies published in 1967–69 immediately after the Council, by the theologians who played a role in the preparation of the Pastoral Constitution when the concept was new and exciting.

Bibliography: C. MOELLER, "History of the Constitution" and "Preface and Introductory Statement," Commentary on Documents of Vatican II, v. 5, Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (New York 1969) 1–114. M.-D. CHENU, "Les Signes des Temps," 87 Nouvelle Revue Theologique, 29–39.

[M. HEATH]

SIKHISM

An indigenous Indian religion, found predominantly in the Punjāb region of India; founded by Gurū Nānak (1469–1538), a Hindu raised under Muslim rule and influence, who combined Hindu and Islamic beliefs to achieve religious and social harmony. According to his doctrine, there is but one True God (Ik Onkar), a transcendent and almighty Creator. Everything on earth is determined by the will of God (hukam). God can be approached from the interior of one's heart, without the need for elaborate rituals and ceremonies. Sikhism emerged as a distinct religion because of Gurū Nānak's personal rejection of pilgrimages, his stress on living the good life on earth, and his appointment of a successor as the master (guru) for his disciples (sikhs).

Of the succeeding gurus, Angad (1539–52) developed the Gurmukhi script in which to record Nānak's life and doctrine; Amar Dās (1552–74) fixed Sikh funeral and marriage rites, forbade intoxicants and cruel Hindu customs, and established 22 centers of worship and missionary activity; Rām Dā (1574–81) built the most famous Sikh shrine, the Amritsār; and Arjun (1581–1606) compiled the Ādi Granth (First Book), the canon of hymns and sayings of Gurū Nānak and his successors, to be revered by the Sikhs. Gobind Singh (1675–1708), the 10th and last guru, completed the transformation of the Sikhs into a militant community to defend against Muslim incursions. In 1699, he established the Khālśa, the sworn brotherhood of fighting Sikhs, with its initiation, distinctive marks, and sanctions. Having lost his sons in war, he provided for the succession to the guruship by prescribing obeisance and offering to the Granth Sāhib (Sacred Book; an enlargement of the Ādi Granth with his own writings), as "the visible guru" and by exalting the Khālśa as the embodiment of the guru.

A long period of internal strife ended under Ranjīt Singh (1780–1839), who founded the Sikh kingdom in the Punjāb. At his death, however, the Sikhs rapidly declined in power and deviated from the teachings of the gurus by tolerating widow burning (satī), cow veneration, and caste division among Sikhs. In 1848 they fell under British rule. Later, when Christian and Hindu missionaries became active, the Singh Sabhā society was formed to foster education and teach the Granth Sāhib, missionaries were appointed, and the Khālśa Tract Society was organized to distribute religious literature.

Bibliography: G. SINGH, The Religion of the Sikhs (New York 1971). W. O. COLE, Sikhism and Its Indian Context, 1469–1708: The Attitude of Guru Nanak and Early Sikhism to Indian Religious Beliefs and Practices (London 1984). W. H. MCLEOD, The Sikhs: History, Religion, and Society (New York 1989). M. MACAULIFFE and K. SINGH, The Sikhs: Their Religion, Gurus, Sacred Writings, and Authors (Oxford 1989). G. R. THURSBY, The Sikhs (Leiden-New York 1992). W. COLE and P. S. SINGH, Sikhism and Christianity: A Comparative Study (New York 1993). K. SINGH, A History of the Sikhs (Oxford 1999). J. P. SINGH UBEROI, Religion, Civil Society and the State: A Study of Sikhism (New York 1996). W. H. MCLEOD, Sikhs and Sikhism (New York 1999). W. H. MCLEOD, Exploring Sikhism: Aspects of Sikh Identity, Culture and Thought (Oxford 2000). G. S. MANN, The Making of Sikh Scripture (Oxford/New York 2001). C.

Gilded Plaque at the Golden Temple. A scene of Gurū Nānak accompanied by Mardana, Amritsar, India. (©Michael Freeman/CORBIS)

SHACKLE, G. SINGH and A.-P. SINGH MANDAIR, Sikh Religion, Culture and Ethnicity (Richmond, Surrey, England 2001).

[A. S. ROSSO/EDS.]

SILAS (SILVANUS)

Important figure in the apostolic Church and frequent companion of St. Paul. The two names, Silas (used throughout Acts) and Silvanus (found in the Epistles: 2 Cor 1.19; 1 Thes 1.1; 2 Thes 1.1; 1 Pt 5.12), assuredly belonged to the same man. Either he had two names, as Paul (who is also called Saul), or Silas is a Greek form of the Latin Silvanus.

Silas enjoyed Roman citizenship (Acts 16.37). He is first mentioned as one of the "leading men" of the Church at Jerusalem (15.22). After the Council of Jerusalem he was selected, together with Judas Barsabbas, as the bearer of the decree of the Council to Antioch (15.27). At Antioch they encouraged the Christians in their faith and exercised the office of "prophets" (15.32). Silas remained there, while Judas returned to Jerusalem (15.34–35). Some time later, Silas was chosen to accompany Paul on his second missionary journey, after the disagreement between Paul and Barnabas over John Mark (15.40). At Philippi, because they exorcised a girl possessed by a divining spirit, Paul and Silas were treated badly by the citizens and beaten with rods. They were imprisoned, but a midnight earthquake opened the doors of the jail. Instead of escaping, they calmed the jailer and converted his whole family. When the magistrates of the city wanted to release them secretly, Paul and Silas demanded redress for the unjust treatment accorded them even though they were Roman citizens (16.19–40). They went on to preach the gospel in Thessalonica, but soon the jealousy of the Jews forced them to go on to Berea (Acts 17.4, 10). Silas stayed there with Timothy while Paul went on to Athens (17.14). Later they joined Paul in Corinth and were with him when he wrote the two letters to the Thessalonians (1 Thes 1.1; 2 Thes 1.1). There is no record of Silas's further activity with Paul. He must have joined St. Peter at some later time, however, for he served as St. Peter's secretary or even as coauthor of 1 Peter (1 Pt 5.12).

Legend says Silas was the first bishop of Corinth and died in Macedonia.

Feast: July 13.

Bibliography: A. STEGMANN, Silvanus als Missionar und "Hagiograph" (Rottenburg 1917). L. RADERMACHER, "Der erste Petrusbrief und Silvanus," Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche 25 (1926) 287–299.

[S. MUSHOLT]

SILOAM INSCRIPTION

A six-line Hebrew inscription accidentally discovered in 1880 in the rock wall of the lower entrance to the tunnel of King Hezekiah that connects the Virgin's Pool ('Ain Sitti Maryām), outside Jerusalem, with the pool of Siloam (Birket Siloam; Siloe: Jn 9.7), inside Jerusalem. The inscription had been chiseled out of the rock about 19 feet from the Siloam end. Above it the rock was dressed for a considerable space as though it had been prepared for more text. In 1890 the inscribed rock was hewn out to be brought to the museum, but it broke into six or seven pieces; the restored inscription is in the Museum of the Ancient Orient in Istanbul.

The text describes an incident in the boring through of the tunnel: the crews of miners that started from opposite ends successfully effected a junction that permitted the flow of water from the spring to the pool. The several lacunae in the text and an obscure hapax legomenon preclude a full understanding of the contents, but the following version does not differ in substance from others that have been proposed (brackets indicate words missing from the text; parentheticals are explanatory):

[When] it (the tunnel) was being bored through, this was the manner in which it was bored through. While . . . the pick-axe, each man toward his fellow, and while there were still three cubits to bore through, [there was heard] the voice of a man calling to his fellow, for there was a fissure(?) in the rock on the right [and on the left]. And when it was bored through, the quarrymen struck toward each other, pick-axe against pick-axe, and the water flowed from the spring toward the reservoir for 1,200 cubits. And the height of the rock above the heads of the quarrymen was 100 cubits.

Among scholars there is agreement that the tunnel was the work of King Hezekiah (c. 715–686 B.C.), who, according to 2 Chr 32.2–4, as a precaution against a possible siege, brought water from the only natural spring near Jerusalem by a channel through the rock to a secure place within the city. In 2 Kgs 20.20 it is stated that he "made a pool and a conduit and brought water into the city" (see Sir 48.17). Hence, both the aqueduct and the inscription must date c. 700 B.C. The orthography points to the same conclusion. The forms of the letters are more cursive than those of the MESHIA INSCRIPTION (c. 840 B.C.), and some of the letters are palpably different. Final vowels are represented by consonants, but internal long vowels are not written fully unless they come from diphthongs, e.g., 'wd, from 'aud. Written in good Hebrew prose, the inscription reads like a passage of the Old Testament.

Bibliography: D. DIRINGER, Le iscrizioni antico-ebraiche palestinesi (Florence 1934) 95–102, with extensive bibliog. up to 1932. W. F. ALBRIGHT, tr., J. B. PRITCHARD, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament (Princeton 1955) 321. H. DONNER and W. RÖLLIG, Kanaanäische und aramäische Inschriften, v.2 (Wiesbaden 1964) 186.

[M. J. DAHOOD]

SILOS, ABBEY OF

Santo Domingo de Silos, Spanish Benedictine monastery in southern Burgos founded by Fernán González on July 3, 954. It was almost deserted and in ruins in 1041, when Ferdinand I sent DOMINIC OF SILOS to restore it. Dominic made arrangements for the material needs, built the church, began the cloister, enriched the library, and instituted a scriptorium that produced such codexes as the MS of the Etymologies of ISIDORE OF SEVILLE, now in the Paris Bibliothèque Nationale, and the wonderfully illuminated MS of the Commentary on the Apocalypse of BEATUS OF LIÉBANA, now in the British Museum. Dominic was buried in the cloister at the time of his death (Dec. 20, 1073). The translation of his relics to the church in 1076 by King, prelates, and people was equivalent to canonization. The name of the monastery was then changed from San Sebastián to Santo Domingo, and the tomb became the most important pilgrimage center in Castile.

As a result, the monastery prospered. A splendid transept was added to the church c. 1100, the cloister was expanded, and throughout the 12th century the library was increased. From Silos came Grimaldus, who wrote an account of Dominic's life and miracles c. 1088, and the historian in León who wrote the chronicle known as Silense. Donations from princes and the faithful brought Silos dozens of churches, towns, and priories—such as San Frutos in Segovia. In 1118 Pope Gelasius II made Silos immediately subject to the Holy See. When Paschasius was abbot (1170–84), St. DOMINIC (GUZMÁN), who was named for the founder of Silos and educated in the monastery, was born nearby. Rodrigo Iñiguez Guzmán, Silos's most illustrious abbot of the 13th century (1242–76), came from the same family. In this period Gonzalo de Berceo wrote a life of St. Dominic of Silos in Castilian verse, and Pero Marín composed an enchanting account of the saint's miracles. A visitation ordered by Benedict XII (1338) showed that Silos had 30 monks and a revenue of 39,000 maravedis. Several nearby hermits, the sick in the hospital of San Lázaro, eight lay brothers, 60 servants, and two women in seclusion (or confinement) depended on the abbey, which in the years just previously had suffered great losses. There was a material and spiritual decline until Silos joined the Congregation of Valladolid in 1512. Thereafter it prospered in all aspects for 300 years. During the Napoleonic Wars, Dominic Moreno, later bishop of Cadiz, saved Silos from ruin, but it could not survive the suppression of religious orders in 1833. Its rich collection of medieval MSS was scattered, mostly to London and Paris, but the buildings were preserved, thanks to French monks who began a restoration under Abbot Guépin in 1880.

Silos in 1964 was a flourishing abbey of the Congregation of SOLESMES with some 20 old MSS in its archives, several excellent gold treasures (such as the chalice St. Dominic had made), and the Romanesque altar front of wrought copper. One wing of the old transept remains with its excellent original art. The rest, however, was ruined in the 18th century when the monks raised over it a baroque church after the plans of Ventura Rodriguez. Fortunately the Romanesque cloister, one of the most beautiful in the world, is intact with its two stories, 74 capitals, and eight corner reliefs that offer, in some of the most striking sculpture of the Middle Ages, a complete survey of Romanesque art in the late 11th and early 12th century. The upper cloister and the reliefs of the Annunciation and the tree of Jesse date from the early 12th century. The realistic ceiling decoration of the lower cloister, with its assorted paintings by a mudéjar of few scruples, is from the late 14th century.

Bibliography: Enciclopedia universal ilustrada Europeo-Americana (Barcelona 1908–30) 54:377–393. M. FÉROTIN, Histoire de l'abbaye de Silos (Paris 1897); ed., Recueil des chartes de l'abbaye de Silos (Paris 1897). L. DELISLE, "Les Manuscrits de Silos dans la Bibliothèque Nationale de Paris," Mélanges de paléographie et de bibliographie (Paris 1880) 53–116. E. M. THOMPSON, ed., Catalogue of Additions to the Manuscripts in the British Museum in the Years 1876–1881 (London 1882). W. M. WHITEHILL and J. PÉREZ DE URBEL, "Los manuscritos del real monasterio de S. Domingo de Silos," Bolotín de la Real Academia de la Historia 95

(1929) 521–601. E. ROULIN, L'Ancien trésor de l'Abbaye de Silos (Paris 1901); "Les Claustrés de l'Abbaye de Silos," Revue de l'art chrétien 59 (1909); 60 (1910). A. M. HUNTINGTON, ed., Initials and Miniatures of the IXth, Xth, and XIth Centuries From the Mozarabic Manuscripts of Santo Domingo de Silos in the British Museum (New York 1904). R. DE PINEDO, Ensayo sobre el Simbolismo Religioso en las construcciones eclesiásticas de la Edad Media (Burgos 1924). J. PÉREZ DE URBEL, El Claustro de Silos (Burgos 1930); Historia del condado de Castilla, 3 v. (Madrid 1945). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed., F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 15.1:1452–54. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés (Mâcon 1935–39) 2: 3036–37.

[J. PÉREZ DE URBEL]

SILVA, ATENÓGENES

Mexican archbishop and preacher; b. Guadalajara, Aug. 26, 1848; d. there, Feb. 26, 1911. He was the son of a Portuguese father, Joaquín Silva, and a Mexican mother, Ignacia Alvarez Tostado. Silva was ordained in 1871, received the doctorate in theology in 1878, then served for several years as professor and vice rector of the seminary. In 1880 he was sent to the parish of Zapotlán el Grande and in 1884, was named theologian of the cathedral of Guadalajara. He was made bishop of Colima in 1892, and in 1900, archbishop of Michoacán. This important diocese was made famous in its early days by the saintly sociologist Vasco de QUIROGA, whose name and works are still revered by the people and admired by scholars four centuries later. Silva was outstanding for his apostolic zeal, keen understanding, wide knowledge, generous and charitable spirit, and unusual talent for oratory. A notable sermon that he preached before a select audience in the Church of La Profesa in Mexico City, on the third centenary of St. Philip Neri in 1895, earned him an appointment to the Mexican Academy of the Language. He was made an Arcadian of Rome with the name Egeneo Senopeo. He promoted and took part in the Plenary Council for Latin America (Rome 1899). There, in the church of San Nicolás in Carcere before all the council fathers, he delivered a sermon on the Virgin of Guadalupe, the papacy, and the Mexican nation. Silva was devoted to the miracle of Tepeyac, and on another solemn occasion in 1904, in the Basilica of Guadalupe, he preached on the influence of the Virgin of Guadalupe on Mexican civilization. The same year, in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the proclamation of the Immaculate Conception, Archbishop Silva organized a great religious celebration and announced a literary contest. The prize went to a Catholic layman, Francisco ELGUERO, for his important work La Inmaculada: Disertación histórico-filosófica, (Mexico 1995). The archbishop was instrumental in having the Holy See elevate to the rank of collegiate church the secular sanctuary of Pátzcuaro, where a statue of Our Lady of Good Health had been venerated since the time of Vasco de Quiroga. The solemn dedication was celebrated in 1908. The royal family of Spain sent gifts to mark the occasion, and Alfonso XIII awarded the Grand Cross of Isabella the Catholic to Archbishop Silva. Many sermons, letters and other writings of the archbishop are found in separate pamphlets. A collection of his works appeared as Obras literarias, pastorales y oratorias (Guadalajara 1898). It contains two academic addresses, three funeral eulogies, ten sermons, eight pastoral letters and edicts, five allocutions, and six circular letters. Nothing seems to have been published later except for a few pastoral letters that are not readily available.

See Also: GUADALUPE, OUR LADY OF.

Bibliography: E. VALVERDE TÉLLEZ, Bio-bibliografía eclesiástica mexicana, 1821–1943, 3 v. (Mexico City 1949).

[A. JUNCO]

SILVEIRA, GONÇALO DA, VEN.

Jesuit missionary of the Far East and Africa; b. Almeirim, Portugal, between 1521 and 1524; martyred, Africa, March 11, 1561. His parents were Luis da Silveira, first Count of Sortelha, and Beatrice Coutinho, daughter of Fernando Coutinho, Marshal of the Kingdom of Portugal. On June 9, 1543, Gonçalo entered the Society of Jesus at the University of Coimbra. He brilliantly completed the course of studies. In 1556 (St.) Ignatius of Loyola confirmed his appointment as provincial of the Jesuits in India. Silveira managed the Jesuit mission in the Far East until Antonio de Quadros relieved him in 1559. Shortly afterward he departed for Africa, where he founded a mission among the Monomotapa on a tributary of the Zambesi River. He converted their chief and many tribesmen, but Arabs from Mozambique convinced the chief that he should be killed. On March 11, 1561, he was strangled. No one came to take his place, and his work among the Monomotapa died with him.

Bibliography: H. CHADWICK, Life of Ven. Gonçalo da Silveira (New York 1911). F. RODRIGUES, História da Companhia de Jesus na Assistência de Portugal (Porto, Port. 1931–). B. LEITE, D. Gonçalo da Silveira (Lisbon 1946). L. KOCH, Jesuiten-Lexikon: Die Gesellschaft Jesu einst und jetzt, (Paderborn 1934) 1645–46. C. SOMMEVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 vol. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 7:1731–33.

[G. R. AVELLAR]

SILVERIO OF ST. TERESA

Writer, general of the Discalced Carmelites; b. Julian Fernández Gómez, Escóbados de Arriba, Burgos, Spain,

March 8, 1878; d. Mazatlán, Mexico, March 10, 1954. He was the first of 13 children, eight of whom entered the Discalced Carmelite Order. After finishing his philosophical studies in the diocesan seminary of Burgos, he was professed in the Discalced Carmelites in Larrea (July 5, 1896) and was later ordained in Burgos (July 27, 1902). He became editor of the review El Monte Carmelo, and was appointed general historian of the Discalced Carmelites in 1912.

This work was interrupted by the preparation of his critical editions of the works of St. Teresa (1915–25) and St. John of the Cross (1927–30). Father Silverio then dedicated himself to his Historia del Carmen Descalzo en España, Portugal y America. His strenuous literary labors did not free him from the burden of administrative office. At various times he was prior, provincial of Burgos, general defensor, vicar-general, and finally (1947–54), general of the Discalced Carmelites. During his generalate he sought to improve studies in the order, built the new International College in Rome, and visited almost all the provinces of the order. While visiting Mazatlán, Mexico, he died; his remains were transferred to the International College (1955).

The complete list of his writings, which Father Simeon de la Sgda. Familia compiled in Zelo Zelatus Sum (Rome 1952, 65–152), numbers 565 titles. His literary work centered on three major enterprises: Biblioteca Mística Carmelitana (20 v.); Historia del Carmen Descalzo (15 v.); La Carmelita Perfecta (3 v.). He gathered a large number of documents related to the history of the Discalced Carmelites. These are preserved in Burgos under the title Archivo Silveriano.

Bibliography: VALENTIN DE LA CRUZ, Fr. Silverio de Sta. Teresa: Su vida, su obra y su gobierno (Burgos 1962). N. J. OTILIO, “Bodas de oro de la profesión religiosa de N. M. R. P. Silverio de Sta. Teresa, Vicario General,” El Monte Carmelo 50 (1946) 408–412.

[O. RODRIGUEZ]

SILVERIUS, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: June 8, 536 to 537, d. Palmaria, probably Dec. 2, 537. When Rome learned of the death of Pope AGAPETUS I, King Theodatus imposed the son of Pope Hormisdas, the subdeacon Silverius, on the Roman clergy as a means of thwarting Byzantine intrigue by means of a pro-Gothic pope. The clergy who opposed him acquiesced reluctantly with the king’s decision. The council for which Pope Agapetus had called before his death was duly held in Constantinople under the presidency of Patriarch Mennas and with the pope’s suite in attendance. ANTHIMUS was condemned, as were the Monophysites SE-

VERUS OF ANTIOCH and Peter of Apamea. The disappointment of the Empress THEODORA (1), who saw her desire for a restoration of the Monophysites undone, apparently led her to bargain with the Roman deacon Vigilius, papal apocriary in Constantinople since 533, for the election of a pope who would depose Mennas and restore Anthimus. It is not known what kind of agreement was reached, but some plan seems to have been agreed upon between the two, for Vigilius was ambitious. Theodora at first tried to win over Pope Silverius; but when he refused to restore Anthimus, she sent Vigilius to Italy with orders for the general BELISARIUS to find an excuse for deposing the pope and installing Vigilius in his stead. Vigilius arrived in Rome shortly after Belisarius entered the city; but soon Belisarius found himself besieged in turn by the Ostrogothic King Vitiges, who invested Rome for a whole year, cutting off the aqueducts and doing considerable damage to the catacombs and cemeterial basilicas outside the walls.

Belisarius was at first reluctant to carry out the orders of the empress, for he had been kindly received by Silverius, who had convinced the civic authorities to admit the Byzantine army into Rome to avoid blood shed. But the general's wife, Antonina, a confidante of Theodora, saw to it that the imperial will prevailed. Letters were forged to implicate Silverius in an attempt to deliver the city to the Goths, and the unfortunate pope was summoned to appear before Belisarius in the latter's palace on the Pincian Hill.

What appears to be an authentic version of the facts states that, accompanied only by the deacon Vigilius, Silverius penetrated to an inner chamber, where he found Antonina reclining on a couch with Belisarius at her feet. She upbraided him for attempting to betray them to the Goths; and while she was speaking, a subdeacon ripped off the pope's pallium and took him into another room, where his clothes were removed and replaced by a monk's garb. It was then announced that the pope had been deposed and a new election would be necessary (March 537). Vigilius's complicity in this affair cannot be excused. Silverius was secretly taken out of the city and banished to Patara, in Lycia. Evidently the emperor, Justinian I, was not accurately informed by his wife about what had taken place. When he found out from the bishop of Patara, he ordered the pope returned to Rome and tried. If he had been guilty of writing the traitorous letters, he was to be free to live as a bishop in exile in any city of the empire; but if the letters were forgeries, he was to be restored to his see.

Silverius was accordingly brought back to Italy; but when he arrived at Rome, Vigilius, now pope, had him dispatched to the island of Palmaria (Ponza), in the Tyrhenian Sea. His resignation was extorted on Nov. 11, 537; and he died shortly thereafter, probably of starvation. The Byzantine historian Procopius reports that Antonina was also involved in this plot, reasoning that Silverius's death on the island would obviate any embarrassing trial. There is no trace of any veneration being paid to him in Rome before the fourteenth century. He is first listed among the saints in the eleventh century. His remains, apparently, were never removed from the island of Palmaria.

Feast: June 20.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 66:85–88, spurious letters. L. DUCHESNE, Liber pontificalis (Paris 1886–92) 1:290–295; 3:91–92. E. CASPAR, Geschichte de Papsttums von den Anfängen bis zur Höhe der Weltherrschaft (Tübingen 1930–33) 2:229–233, 769. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie (Paris 1907–53) 13.1:1218–20. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 9:757. R. U. MONTINI, Le tombe dei papi (Rome 1957). H. JEDIN, History of the Church (New York 1980) 2:452. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 59–60. J. RICHARDS, Popes and Papacy the Early Middle Ages (London 1979) 128–133. W. KOHL, Biographisch-Bibliographisches Kirchenlexikon 10 (Herzburg 1995).

[J. CHAPIN]

SILVESTER GUZZOLINI, ST.

Abbot, founder of the Sylvestrine Benedictines; b. Osimo, Italy, 1177; d. Montefano, Nov. 26, 1267. Silvester, born of the noble Guzzolini (or Gossolini) family, studied law at Bologna and Padua and then was ordained. In 1227 he renounced his benefice and became a hermit. Many disciples joined him, and in 1231 he built a monastery at Montefano, near Fabriano, Italy, founding the so-called Blue or Sylvestrine BENEDICTINES, who were approved by Innocent IV in 1247. At the death of the founder when he was about 80 years old, the new congregation had at least 11 monasteries. Later there were as many as 56 in Italy, Portugal, and Brazil. The Sylvestrine Congregation still exists in Italy (152 monks) and in Ceylon (43 monks), where they have charge of the missionary Diocese of Kandy (Ann Pont 1963). Silvester was canonized by Clement VIII in 1598.

Feast: Nov. 26.

Bibliography: His life, written between 1275 and 1280 by his successor Abbot ANDREW DE GIACOMO, was printed 1772 in Jesi, Italy, in Vita di S. Silvestro Abate by C. S. FRANCESCHINI. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 3:358–360. A. M. CANCELLIERI, S. S. Abate . . . (Matelica, Italy 1942). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4v. (New York 1956) 4:422–423.

[M. A. HABIG]

SILVESTRELLI, BERNARD MARIA OF JESUS, BL.

Baptized Cesare, Passionist priest; b. Nov. 7, 1831, Rome, Italy; d. there Dec. 9, 1911, in Morricono Monastery.

Cesare was born into Roman nobility, the third of the seven children of Gian Tommasso and Teresa Silvestrelli. Cesare attended Jesuit schools, including the Collegio Romano. Although he entered the Passionist novitiate on Monte Argentaro (1854), he was forced to leave because of ill health. He continued his studies and was ordained a secular priest (1855). Four months later he asked and was given permission to re-enter the Passionists at Morrovalle, where he was given the name Bernard Maria of Jesus (Apr. 28, 1857) and studied with St. Gabriel Possenti.

Following the completion of his studies, Father Bernard Maria served the Passionists in various capacities: novice master (1865–69) and rector of the new Scala Santa (“Holy Stairs”) monastery next to the Lateran (1869–75); provincial consultator (1875–76); and vice-provincial (1876–78). Silvestrelli was elected and re-elected superior general (1878–84, 1884–89, 1893–99, 1899–1905, 1905–07) and instituted a number of reforms within the order.

To maintain the order’s ideals, he published the vitae of the companions of St. Paul of the Cross. Additionally, he established preparatory schools to form future candidates for the novitiate. As superior general, he expanded the congregation into Spain, Mexico, and Latin America, established a novitiate in Bulgaria, and founded the international house of studies at Saints John and Paul in Rome. Silvestrelli visited all the Passionist provinces, including those in northern Europe, Spain, and, in 1896, the United States to better understand the difficulties pursuant to Passionist life in these localities. He was a man known for his prudence, gentleness, and charity.

Pope John Paul II beatified Silvestrelli on Oct. 16, 1988.

Feast: December 9 (Passionists).

Bibliography: F. GIORGINI, Bernardo Maria Silvestrelli Passionista (Rome 1988); English tr. P. ROGERS (Rome 1990). F. G. ZICCHETTI, Padre Bernardo M. Silvestrelli Passionista (Recanati 1988).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

SIMEON BARSABAE, ST.

Martyr, bishop of Seleucia-Ctesiphon, Mesopotamia; d. Karkha de Ledan, Mesopotamia, April 17, 344.

Bar sabb'ē signifies the son of a dyer, but Simeon is first mentioned in the acts of a synod under Dadischo in 424 as an opponent of Papa bar 'Aggai, Bishop of Seleucia. Although elected to succeed the deposed Aggai, he took office only upon the latter’s death. He is possibly the object of the denunciation in St. APHRAATES’ demonstration (14.8.9.25). As bishop Simeon faced internal difficulties and the persecution of Sapor II, who suspected him of Byzantine leanings on religious grounds, imprisoned him under penalty of paying ransom, and eventually put him to death together with two priests, Abdhaikla and Hania; the eunuch, Gushtahazad; Simeon’s sister, Tarbo; and the chief of the royal artisans, Puseik; who formed the first group of Persian martyrs under the Sassanid dynasty. The passio supplying the details of his death seems authentic in both the simplicity of its narration and the absence of miraculous happenings. The date of his death, between 341 and 344, is disputed, and SYNAXARY of CONSTANTINOPLE varies between April 14 and 17 for his feast.

Feast: April 14.

Bibliography: J. P. KIRSCH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. M. BUCHBERGER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1930–38) 9:574. MARUTA, Acta sanctorum martyrum orientalium, ed. S. E. ASSEMANI, 2 v. (Rome 1748) 1:10–36. P. BEDJAN, ed., Acta martyrum et sanctorum, 7 v. (Paris 1890–97) 2:123–130. M. K MOSKO, tr. and ed., Martyrium Beati Simeonis Bar Sabba'e (Patrologia syriaca), ed. R. GRAFFIN et al., 3 v. [Paris 1894–1926] 2; 1907) 715–960. J. LABOURT, Le Christianisme dans l'empire Perse (Paris 1904). P. PEETERS, “La Date du martyre de S. Syméon,” B. DE GAFFIER, Analecta Bollandiana (Brussels 1882–) 56 (1938) 118–143.

[A. PENNA]

SIMEON OF DURHAM

English chronicler; d. c. 1130–38. He entered the Benedictine monastery at JARROW probably soon after 1071. When Jarrow was transferred to Durham (1083), Simeon made his profession there, in 1085 or 1086. He eventually became precentor. According to the monastery’s obituary, Simeon died on October 14, between 1130 and 1138. Between 1104 and 1108 Simeon compiled the Historia Ecclesiae Dunelmensis. This work traces the history of the See of DURHAM from its beginnings to 1096, when Abbot William of St. Cerilef died. It depends on BEDE’s Ecclesiastical History of the English People and Life of St. Cuthbert. Simeon’s history of England, Historia Anglorum et Dacorum, is divided into three sections. The first covers the period from 732 to 957, and is based primarily on the Annales Alfredi of ASSER; it contains valuable information on the north country. The second section extends to 1119, and utilizes the Chronicon of FLORENCE OF WORCESTER. The third section (covering 1119–29) is an original work on contemporary history. Some minor works and letters are now lost. All his works have been edited by Thomas Arnold; his historical writings have been translated into English by Joseph Stevenson.

Bibliography: Symeonis Monachi opera omnia, ed. T. ARNOLD, 2 v. (Rerum Britannicarum mediæ aevi scriptores; 1882–85). J. STEVENSON, “S. of D.,” The Church Historians of England, v.3.2 (1855). C. GROSS, The Sources and Literature of English History (2d ed. London 1915). C. L. KINGSFORD, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 18:254–255. F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 1256. P. H. BLAIR, “Some Observations on the Historia . . .,” Celt and Saxon: Studies in Early British Border, ed. K. H. JACKSON et al. (Cambridge, Eng. 1963) 63–118.

[M. A. MULHOLLAND]

SIMEON OF POLIRONE, ST.

Hermit, later a Benedictine; d. Polirone, near Mantua, Italy, July 26, 1016. According to a legendary vita, published soon after his death, Simeon was originally from Armenia (hence he is sometimes called Simeon the Armenian). Abandoning his wife and family, he became a Basilian monk and hermit. He undertook many arduous pilgrimages throughout Palestine, France, and Spain, and came to Rome (c. 983), where he was charged with being a heretic. By order of Benedict VII he was examined and found to be orthodox. He was renowned for his piety and heroic charity, and for numerous miracles performed during life and after death. His cult was approved by Benedict VIII (1024) and Leo IX (1049). In 1913 his relics were solemnly exposed.

Feast: July 26.

Bibliography: P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD et al., 2 v. (2d ed. Leipzig 1881–88; repr. Graz 1956) 1:4055, 4310, 4729. Acta Sanctorum July 6:319–337. G. D. GORDINI, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 9:762. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4v. (New York 1956) 3:190. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zwiige, 4. (Metten 1933–38) 2:500–501.

[F. D. LAZENBY]

SIMEON OF SYRACUSE, ST.

Byzantine monk, recluse at Trier, Germany; b. Syracuse, Sicily, ca. 970; d. Trier, June 1, 1035. At the age of seven he moved to Constantinople, where his father, a Greek, held a military position. After considerable success in studies, he journeyed to Jerusalem and at Bethlehem was ordained deacon. He then entered the monastery of Mt. Sinai. In 1027 his abbot sent him to collect alms promised by Duke Richard of Normandy. Near Alexandria he was almost killed by pirates, but he escaped to Antioch, where he was well received by the patriarch. There he met Richard, Abbot of VERDUN-SUR-MEUSE, on his way to the Holy Land. On Richard's return, Simeon traveled with him to Rome and then arrived in Verdun about the end of October 1027. After visiting the Duke of Normandy, he went to Trier with Eberwin, abbot of Saint-Martin in Trier, whom he had also met in Antioch. In 1028 he accompanied Abp. Poppo of Trier to the Holy Land. On their return, ca. 1030, Simeon established himself as a hermit in a tower near the Porta Nigra in Trier. There he died, and according to letters of Pope Benedict IX to Abp. Poppo, he seems to have been canonized about Christmas of that same year. His life, written by Abbot Eberwin, is noted for its authenticity, and is a valuable historical source for precrusade pilgrim routes (see ITINERARIA).

Feast: June 1.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 1:85–104. P. THOMSEN, “Der heilige Symeon von Trier,” Zeitschrift des deutschen Palästinavereins 62 (1939) 144–161. H. DAUPHIN, Le Bienheureux Richard: Abbé de Saint-Vanne de Verdun (Louvain 1946). M. COENS, “Un Document inédit sur le culte de S. Syméon moine d'Orient et reclus à Trèves,” B. DE GAIFFIER, Analecta Bollandiana 68 (1950) 181–196.

[G. T. DENNIS]

SIMILARITY

Similarity or likeness (Gr. ὁμοίωσις Lat. similitudo) denotes some agreement between two or more things, something short of absolute identity, a partial sameness, as in “not exactly the same but similar.” Thus similarity indicates some shared unity of entities somewhat the same, and similitude means any relative sameness. This article sketches, in successive paragraphs, various uses of the notion in epistemology, metaphysics, patristic theology, and Thomistic theology.

In KNOWLEDGE, the distinction of the knower and the known is more evident than their relative sameness. Yet a similitude of the thing somehow present to the knower re-presents the thing, and the comparison of the knower's possession and the thing's offering furnishes the known identity called TRUTH. SCIENCE itself is based on the causality of this likeness as provided by objects and present in subjects, and thus explains how man knows something to be so, and also why it is so—such explanation also accounting for his CERTITUDE. (See EPISTEMOLOGY.)

In distinguishing the properties of the basic CATEGORIES OF BEING (Cat. 11a 15–19), ARISTOTLE shows likeness to be the first feature of QUALITY. With further precision, in the Metaphysics (1018a 15–19; 1021a 10–14; 1054b 51055a 2) he coordinates “the similar” with the basic traits of all “being,” “one,” and “same,” and thus discloses various degrees of UNITY. “One” applied to such variations of being as substance, quantity, and quality renders the basic notions of “same,” “equal,” and “similar,” respectively. But since “same” extends beyond things substantially one (or numerically the same: as Plato and “the author of the Timaeus”), a further distinction may be made between things specifically the same (Plato and Socrates), those generically the same (Plato and his dog), and finally, those analogically the same (Plato and Pluto)—with greatest identity in the first and the least in the last. Thus, a second view of “similar,” under the title of sameness, escapes the limits of the accidental unity of quality to apply to three degrees of relative sameness that depart from the absolute, or numerically self-same. So Aristotle provides two usages: the univocal, based on quality, and the analogical, based on any formal qualification. The latter furnishes the basic intentional unities: SPECIES naming similitude in nature or form (disregarding the numerical diversity of individuals); GENUS denoting a more remote similitude (by pre-scinding from specific differences); and the analogical unity of those not so obviously alike intrinsically, but manifesting similitude in acting alike or affording a basis for being understood similarly (see ANALOGY).

The Greek Fathers seem to have read with Philo’s eyes the creation account of man as made “to the image and likeness” of God (Gn 1.26–27; Septuagint εἰκωνόμοιως). IRENAEUS took image for nature, and likeness for grace; ORIGEN, with most Platonists, gave image a dynamic character terminating in assimilation to God by likening, thus contrasting image and likeness as beginning and end of human life. This likening by resemblance assumes in St. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA the function of grace in Irenaeus, supplying the supernatural perfection lacking to nature. GREGORY OF NYSSA sees here two aspects of the same reality: εἰκόν naming the static terms of beginning and end; ὁμοίως giving the dynamic advance from the one to the other, the progressive retrieving of the divine image once had, but lost by sin.

St. THOMAS AQUINAS finds image (Summa theologiae 1a, 35) the proper title for the Son; he sees man created to image the Trinity just by being human, in knowing and loving (1a, 93) and fulfilling (1a2ae, prol.)

his destiny by assimilation (i.e., with increasing likeness to God) through a life of virtue, aided by the exemplarity of Christ (3a, prol.). The various facets of likeness are brilliantly displayed in the view of beings unequally sharing in the absolute perfection of existence (1a, 4), inherently seeking greater realization of that perfection (1a, 5–6), and tending toward reunion with their principle (1a, 42–46) by imitating their cause (1a, 50.1; 103.4; 1a2ae, 109.6; etc.), with similitude as the cause of love (1a2ae, 27.3) and all delight (32.7). The patterns of similitude measured between model and copy are disclosed in the tracts on ideas (1a, 15) and exemplarity (1a, 44.3); the dynamism of assimilation is seen in C. gent. 3.19–21.

See Also: EXEMPLARISM; IMAGE OF GOD; JESUS CHRIST, ARTICLES ON; RELATION.

Bibliography: V. MIANO, Enciclopedia filosofica (Venice-Rome 1957) 4:784–786. P. T. CAMELOT, “La Théologie de l’image de Dieu,” Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques 40 (1956) 443–471. C. FABRO, Participation et causalité selon S. Thomas d’Aquin (Louvain 1961).

[B. M. MATTINGLY]

SIMON, APOSTLE, ST.

One of the TWELVE chosen by Jesus. In the lists of the 12 APOSTLES, Simon (Σίμων, a genuine Greek name, but used by the Jews as a Hellenized form of the Hebrew name šim’ōn, Simeon) is named in the 11th place in Mt 10.4 and Mk 3.18, in the 10th place in Lk 6.15 and Acts 1.13. In the first two Gospels he is called “the Cananean” (ὁ Καναναῖος), in Luke and Acts, “the zealot” (ὁ ζηλωτής). These titles were apparently added for the purpose of distinguishing him from the chief Apostle Simon Peter. The word ζηλωτής is the Greek translation of the Aramaic word qan’anai, which is merely transliterated in Mt 10.4; Mk 3.18 as ὁ Καναναῖος, both words meaning zealot. Some MSS in Mt 10.4 and Mk 3.18 have incorrectly ὁ Κανανίτης, which has been understood as meaning the man from Cana (so, e.g., by St. Jerome, Patrologia Latina 23:763; 26: 63), and therefore Simon was identified by some of the Church Fathers with the unnamed bridegroom of Jn 2.9. In any case, neither Καναναῖος nor Κανανίτης has anything to do with the word Canaanite. It is not certain why Simon was given this epithet; it was probably either because he had belonged to the Jewish party of the ZEALOTS before he became an Apostle, or because of his zeal for the Mosaic Law (cf. the use of the term in Acts 22.3; Gal 1.14).

Very little is known about this Apostle. Many would identify him with Simon the brother of Jesus (Mt 13.55; Mk 6.3), but this identification does not seem likely. The latter is the same as Simon son of Clopas who succeeded

James, “the brother of the Lord,” as bishop of Jerusalem (A.D. 62) and was crucified under Trajan c. A.D. 107; see Hegesippus as quoted by Eusebius (Historia Ecclesiastica 3:11; 32.1–2). According to later legends, particularly in the apocryphal Acts of Simon and Jude, Simon the Apostle preached in various parts of the Near East and was martyred by being sawed in two (a motif borrowed from the apocryphal Martyrdom of Isaiah). In iconography he is usually represented with a saw, the supposed instrument of his martyrdom, though sometimes with a book, probably in reference to his zeal for the law. In legend and in iconography he is generally associated with St. JUDE THADDEUS.

Feast: Oct. 28 (Western Church); May 10 (Eastern Church).

Bibliography: J. BLINZLER, “Simon Zelotes,” Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 9:772–773; “Simon, Bruder Jesu,” ibid. 9:765; “Simon der Apostel, Simon der Herrenbruder, und Bischof Symeon von Jerusalem,” Passauer Studien: Festschrift für Bischof Dr. Simon Konrad Landersdorfer, OSB (Passau 1953) 25–55.

[J. A. LEFRANÇOIS]

SIMON, RICHARD

Often referred to as the “father of Biblical criticism”; b. Dieppe, May 13, 1638; d. there, April 11, 1712. Simon, of a middle-class working family, completed the course of studies at the collège of Dieppe with distinction, lived some time in Paris, and then, in 1662, entered the Congregation of the Oratory. He became regent of philosophy at the collège of Juilly, was ordained on Sept. 20, 1670, and then took up residence at the Oratory in Paris on the Rue Saint-Honoré. After a period in which he applied himself to the study of the Eastern Churches and Judaism, he published his Histoire critique du Vieux Testament (Paris 1678). This work provoked the opposition of J. B. BOSSUET and of many other theologians, both Catholic and Protestant, and led to his expulsion from the Oratory. In retirement, first at Bolleville (in the Diocese of Rouen), he published several works under pseudonyms: Histoire de l'origine et des progrès des revenus ecclésiastiques (Frankfort 1684), Histoire critique du texte du N.T. (Rotterdam 1689), Histoire critique des versions du N.T. (Rotterdam 1690), Histoire critique des principaux commentateurs du N.T. (Rotterdam 1693), Le N.T. de N.S.J.-C. traduit sur l'ancienne édition latine, avec des remarques littérales et critiques (Trévoux 1702), and others.

Exceptionally learned in a number of fields (Biblical criticism, Eastern languages and literature, history of ecclesiastical institutions), Simon was clearly gifted with rare genius for critical study. Working independently of B. Spinoza and animated by a quite different spirit, he alone of the Christians of his time discovered and attempted to resolve the problem of the composition of the Pentateuch. In spite of his deep and genuine attachment to the Catholic faith, many regarded his views with suspicion. He had no disciples, and his work had no influence on the history of exegesis.

“The Apostle Simon,” painting by Nicolaus Alexander Mair von Landshut, 1496. (©Alexander Burkatowski/CORBIS)

Bibliography: A. BERNUS, “Richard Simon” in Essai de bibliographie oratorienne, ed. A. INGOLD (Paris 1880–82). J. STEINMANN, Richard Simon et les origines de l'exégèse biblique (Bruges 1960).

[P. AUVRAY]

SIMON, YVES RENÉ MARIE

Catholic philosopher; b. Cherbourg, France, March 14, 1903; d. South Bend, Ind., May 11, 1961. Yves, the son of Auguste Simon and Berthe Porquet la Ferrière, received his secondary education at Cherbourg. After one year at the Lycée Louis-le-Grand, he continued at the University of Paris and at the Catholic Institute of Paris to receive his doctoral degree. Among his distinguished professors were Abbé Lallement and Jacques Maritain.

Although a man of enormous erudition, it is safe to say that the works of St. Thomas Aquinas and of P. J. Proudhon (1809–65) exerted a profound influence on Simon. In 1930 he married Paule Dromard, who was studying Thomism at Paris. His concern with the growth of the intellect in the service of moral life are evident in Philosophy of Democratic Government (Chicago 1951) and A General Theory of Authority (Notre Dame 1962), both of which may be regarded as classics in political philosophy. In purely speculative philosophy his greatest work is Introduction à l'ontologie du connaître (Paris 1934). After eight years at the University of Lille, he went to the U.S. to serve as professor of philosophy at the University of Notre Dame and at the University of Chicago. Most of his students would agree with Simon's widow: "A non-specialized philosopher by principle, he, nevertheless, made his mark principally in metaphysics, logic, and political philosophy" [The New Scholasticism 37 (1963) 501]. Her comment is in an article, "The Papers of Yves R. Simon," that analyzes Simon's philosophical inquiries and proposes the posthumous publication of several major works in varying stages of readiness when death overtook him.

Bibliography: M. HOEHN, ed., Catholic Authors (Newark 1948). Data on Simon's manuscripts are available at the Maritain Center, University of Notre Dame, Ind.

[G. J. MCMORROW]

SIMON BALLACHI, BL.

Dominican; b. c. 1258; d. c. 1329. He entered the Dominican house at Rimini as a lay brother at the age of 27. Biographers in the 17th century identified him as the son of Count Rodulfus de Ballochi of S. Archangelo, a town near Rimini, but no local document or historian of the period confirms this information. Simon, employed principally in the monastery garden, also taught catechism to the young children. He lived a life of great humility and disciplined his body with corporal penances for the conversion of sinners. As a result of his penances, he became blind at 59. He lived thus with such courage and cheerfulness for 12 years that from the day of his death he was regarded as a saint. His body was buried in the Dominican church of St. Cataldus at Rimini. After several translations, Simon's relics were finally interred in the church of S. Archangelo on July 3, 1817. PIUS VII in 1820 confirmed his cult for the Diocese of Rimini and for the Dominican Order.

Feast: Nov. 3.

Bibliography: Summarium probationum ad cultus confirmationem obtinendam (Rome 1820). Acta Sanctorum Nov. 2.1:209–212. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by the Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 11:101. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York, 1956) 4:254–255. G. LÖHR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 9:574.

[M. G. MCNEIL]

SIMON DE GHENT

English medieval scholar and bishop; b. London; d. London, April 2, 1315. He was born of Flemish merchant stock. The first record of Simon is from 1268 when Abp. WALTER GIFFARD of Canterbury admitted him to the rectory of Wilford (Nottinghamshire) to help defray his educational expenses, presumably at Oxford. From 1284 to 1297 he was archdeacon of Oxford. He incepted at Oxford as doctor of theology probably c. 1290–91 and was regent master there when elected chancellor of the university (1291–93).

He was consecrated bishop of SALISBURY in 1297 and devoted himself with indefatigable zeal to the spiritual and temporal administration and reform of his diocese. His itineraries alone fill almost 20 pages (xxvii–xlvi) of the introduction to his Registrum. He called a synod to reform his cathedral statutes; its work covered the whole field of cathedral legislation and is still recognized (V. C. H. Wiltshire 3:172–173). He made provision for the housing and teaching of the choristers. He established a guildhall for the city of Salisbury (as bishop he held the lordship of the city) and licensed its fortification by ditch and walls. He dealt vigorously with the many abuses that were rampant within the diocese, e.g., unrepaired and unconsecrated churches, absenteeism, pluralism, etc. Outside his diocese, he was frequently called upon to act as arbitrator. He took the side of the barons in their war against King EDWARD II and proclaimed the "Ordinances" in St. Paul's churchyard in 1311. In the last years of his life, his health failed rapidly and his activities were much reduced.

Of his scholastic work, little has survived beyond a few notes in the Assisi MS; a sermon preached when he was chancellor, Ash Wednesday, Feb. 11, 1293 (ed. F. Pelster, Oxford Theology . . ., 205–215); a short Meditatio de statu praelati; and his Latin translation of the ANCRENE RIWLE (ed. F. M. Powicke). His reputation for sanctity is evidenced by pilgrimages to his tomb (in Salisbury cathedral).

Bibliography: Registrum Simonis de Gandavo, ed. C. T. FLOWER and M. C. B. DAWES, 2 v. (Canterbury and York Society 40–41; 1934) v.1, introd. The Victoria History of the County of Wiltshire, ed. R. B. PUGH and E. CRITTALL (London 1953) v.3. A Bio- graphical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500 2:759–760.

[T. C. CROWLEY]

SIMON DE LONGPRÉ, MARIE CATHERINE OF ST. AUGUSTINE, BL.

Baptized Catherine, virgin of the Hospitallers of Mercy of St. Augustine; b. May 13, 1632, Saint-Sauveur le Vicomte, France; d. May 8, 1668, Québec, Canada. Catherine's vocation was awakened by her grandparents, who lovingly tended the sick and poor in their own home. She joined a new order of Augustinian hospitaller sisters and received the habit, Oct. 24, 1646, the same day her biological sister pronounced her vows. Marie Catherine made her own vows on May 4, 1648. The two sisters were among the first to respond to the call for women religious to minister in New France (now Canada). Marie Catherine set sail the day before her sixteenth birthday. Despite the hardships of colonial life, the young sister remained cheerful as she cooked for and tended the sick, sharing with them her medical knowledge and spiritual wisdom. Before her death at 36, she was novice mistress for her community (1665–68). Pope John Paul II beatified Sister Marie Catherine on Apr. 23, 1989.

Feast: May 8 (Canada).

Bibliography: G. BOUCHER, Dieu et Satan dans la vie de Catherine de Saint-Augustin, 1632-1668 (Tournai 1979). A. MERLAUD, L'épopée fantastique d'une jeune Normande: Catherine de Longpré (Paris 1981).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

SIMON FIDATI OF CASCIA, BL.

Augustinian friar, preacher, and spiritual author; b. Cascia, Umbria, 1295; d. Florence, Feb. 2, 1348; buried in Cascia. Simon first studied natural philosophy in Cascia. As a result of a conversion experience that probably was occasioned by the Franciscan spiritualist Angelo Clareno, Simon turned to theology and joined the Augustinians. Until Clareno died in 1337, he remained Simon's spiritual advisor. Simon was an active and successful preacher, traveling between Florence and Rome, helping the persecuted Clareno maintain contact with his spiritual followers by transmitting messages between them. On Sept. 6, 1338, he moved to Rome, and from that time until almost the end of his life he worked on a commentary on the Gospels under the title De gestis domini salvatoris. His version of the life of Christ contain treatises on John the Baptist, Mary, the sermons and miracles of Jesus, the testament of love, and the suffering and resurrection of Jesus, as well as commentaries on Christian justice and rule. This work was circulated widely outside of Italy and exercised a continuing influence on the spirituality of the late middle ages.

In his writings, Simon urged his readers to a life modeled on Christ (crisiformitas). His interpretation of the Scriptures had a devotional, rather than a academic, goal. Simon strongly emphasized Jesus Christ, faith, grace, and Holy Scripture as the norms of theology. He also rejected mixing quotes from Scripture with philosophical propositions. Simon influenced Martin Luther's Aristoteleskritik, and probably Luther's general theological approach, although the latter has not been proved.

Feast: Feb. 16.

Bibliography: W. ECKERMANN, ed., De gestis domini salvatoris: Erstveröffentlichung durch Johannes con Salerno Nach dem Tode Simons (kritische Edition) (Wurzburg and Rome 1998). N. MATTIOLI, Epistolarium: Briefsammlung in lateinischer und italienischer Sprache (Rome 1898) 259–519. Literature. W. ECKERMANN, "Simon Fidati con Cascia, Europäische Theologie im lateinischen Mittelalter," Augustiniana 47 (1997) 339–356. G. CASCIANO, Beato Simone Fidati (Tern 1993). W. ECKERMANN and F.-B. STAMMKOTTER, "Die Rezeption des S. Fidati con Cascia," Analec-ta Augustiniana 55 (1992) 221–246.

[W. ECKERMANN]

SIMON HINTON

English Dominican theologian. He received a bachelor's degree at Oxford by 1239, the doctorate in theology c. 1248, and until 1250 or 1254 acted as master at the Oxford Dominican priory, probably succeeding RICHARD FISHACRE. He served as provincial of the English Dominicans (1254–61), but was removed from office by the general chapter for failure to comply with regulations of the order. The issue involved a refusal to accept foreign students at the studium of the order at Oxford. When sent to lecture at the Dominican school at Cologne, he was permitted to return to England within a year. A theologian of the Augustinian school, Hinton was not an outstanding thinker. His works, however, are useful in shedding light on instructional methods at mid-13th-century Oxford. His writings include scriptural treatises, theological works, and a manual for study. Besides several Quaestiones disputatae, he has left scriptural commentaries and glosses, and postils on the Minor Prophets. The Summa ad instructionem iuniorum was a manual of practical theology and enjoyed wide usage from the 13th to the 15th century.

Bibliography: A. DONDAINE, "La Somme de Simon de Hinton," Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 9 (1937)

5–22, 205–218. B. SMALLEY, “The Quaestiones of Simon of Hinton,” Studies in Medieval History Presented to Frederick Maurice Powicke, ed. R. W. HUNT et al. (Oxford 1948) 209–222. A. WALZ, “The Exceptiones from the Summa of Simon of H.,” Angelicum 13 (1936) 283–368. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500 (Oxford 1892–1921) 2:937.

[J. F. HINNEBUSCH]

SIMON ISLIP

Archbishop of Canterbury; b. probably at the village of Islip, near Oxford, England; d. Mayfield, Sussex, April 26, 1366. He prepared himself in both canon and civil law at Oxford and entered into a career as a lawyer in the ecclesiastical courts. He served the court of the bishop of Lincoln and later the Court of ARCHES, whose principal officer he became in 1344. He held canonries in Lincoln, Lichfield, and London cathedrals as well as other benefices. When both JOHN DE OFFORD and THOMAS BRADWARDINE were successively struck down in the plague of 1349 shortly after their appointments to the See of Canterbury, Islip was provided at the King's request; his consecration took place on Dec. 20, 1349. He took action to remedy the dislocations caused by the plague epidemics and earned the unpopularity of the secular clergy by keeping their salaries at the preplague level. In 1361 Islip founded Canterbury Hall at Oxford to be supervised by the monks of Christ Church, Canterbury. Its charter of 1363 provided for a warden and 11 fellows, both secular and regular (including four monks of Christ Church). In 1365 Islip's statutes altered the college's nature and made it a secular college, and Master John WYCLIF became its new warden. Moreover, Islip settled by amicable agreement the long-standing controversy between Canterbury and York over the latter archbishop's carrying his cross in the southern province. Authorship of the Speculum regis Edwardi was at one time attributed to Islip but is now more properly attributed to Abp. SIMON MEFHAM. Two years before his consecration Islip was in the King's service as keeper of his privy seal and, as archbishop, he was used on several diplomatic missions by Edward III. His body was buried before the rood in Canterbury cathedral not far from the body of his nephew, Abp. William Whittlesey.

Bibliography: W. F. HOOK, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, 12 v. (London 1860–84). J. TAIT, “On the Date and Authorship of the Speculum Regis Edwardi,” English Historical Review 16 (1901) 110–115. T. F. TOUT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, (London 1885–1900) 10:511–514. J. R. L. HIGHFIELD, “The English Hierarchy in the Reign of Edward III,” Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, 5th ser., 6 (1956) 115–138. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500 (Oxford 1957–59) 2:1006–08. M. MCKISACK, The 14th Century, 1307–1399 (Oxford 1959).

[F. D. LOGAN]

SIMON LANGHAM

Archbishop of Canterbury; b. probably Langham, Rutlandshire, England; d. Avignon, July 22, 1376. By 1339–40 he was a monk of Westminster Abbey, and from 1346 to 1348 he studied at Oxford. He was elected prior and then abbot of Westminster in the spring of 1349, the year of the Black Death. His economic skill was quickly shown by his reorganization of the abbey's finances, which was so successful that he was able to rebuild the cloisters. In 1360 Edward III appointed him treasurer of England. Elected bishop of ELY in 1361 he refused to change to London, to which he was also elected in the same year. Soon he was appointed chancellor of England (1363), an office he resigned in 1366 on his election to Canterbury, but not before he had begun the custom whereby the chancellor's speech at the opening of Parliament is delivered in English. As primate of England, Langham introduced legislation against pluralism, though ironically he was to become an extreme exponent of it. He removed WYCLIF from the headship of Canterbury Hall, Oxford. Since Langham had offended the king by accepting the title of cardinal priest in 1368 without the king's permission, he resigned his archbishopric and became a leading diplomat of the AVIGNON PAPACY. He was rewarded with many preferments in England and the title of cardinal bishop of Palestrina (1373). By the time of his death he had accumulated books, plate, and ornament calculated as equivalent to $840,000 in 1955 currency (Knowles). He left everything to Westminster Abbey, hence his title as the second founder of the abbey and his remarkable tomb designed by Henry Yevele.

Bibliography: A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500 2:1095–97. J. A. ROBINSON, “S. L., Abbot of Westminster,” Church Quarterly Review 66 (1908) 339–366. D. KNOWLES, The Religious Orders in England 2:54–56. C. L. KINGSFORD, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 11:540–541. M. MCKISACK, The Fourteenth Century, 1307–1399 (Oxford 1959).

[D. NICHOLL]

SIMON MAGUS

A magician of Samaria converted to Christianity by PHILIP THE DEACON (Acts 8.9–24). The title Magus, given him in tradition, is from the Greek μάγος (a loanword from Persian) meaning an astrologer, diviner, sorcerer. While μάγος is not found in the account in Acts, Luke writes that Simon was “practising magic” (μαγεύων) and that many were “bewitched” by his “sorceries” (μαγείαις). See MAGIC.

The conversion of Samaria was a significant development in the early Church. It marked an important step in the fulfillment of the Lord's promise, "You will be witnesses for me in Jerusalem and in all Judea and Samaria and even to the very ends of the earth" (Acts 1.8). After the death of Stephen, which marked the beginning of a period of persecution for the Church, Philip preached the gospel to the SAMARITANS with extraordinary success. This was impressive in view of the fact that the people of Samaria were much given over to sorcery under the leadership of a certain Simon, who had previously astounded everyone by his magical powers. Luke tells us that "Simon also himself believed, and after his baptism attached himself to Philip; and at the sight of the signs and exceedingly great miracles being wrought, he was amazed" (Acts 8.13).

When the Apostles in Jerusalem heard of Philip's success in preaching to the Samaritans, who were not regarded as belonging to the Jewish community, they sent Peter and John to them. On their arrival, "they laid hands on them, and they [the converts] received the Holy Spirit" (v. 17). When Simon saw that the Apostles had this special power, he offered Peter and John money so that they would give it to him also; they refused and judged him worthy of God's wrath (v. 20). Simon thereupon repented and asked their prayers that God might not punish him. The story of Simon's attempt to buy spiritual power has produced the word SIMONY, traffic in sacred things.

From the NT we know nothing more of Simon Magus. Justin Martyr (2d Christian century) goes beyond the story in Acts, stating that Simon claimed to be a god and attracted many disciples in a false sect that endured until Justin's time (I Apol. 26). After Justin, later writers, especially Irenaeus (Adversus Haereses 1.23), describe him as the founder of the Simonians, a gnostic sect, and as the archetype of heretics. Some even portray him as the Antichrist. Several legends are told of him in apocryphal literature, e.g., of his dispute with Peter and Paul before Nero, in which Simon, to prove his divinity, tries to fly to heaven but falls to his death (Pseudo-Marcellus).

Bibliography: É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT et. al. 1:499–500. G. KLEIN, *Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart*³ 6:38–39.

[J.A.GRASSI]

SIMON MEPHAM

Archbishop of Canterbury; b. Mepham, Kent, England; d. Mayfield, Sussex, Oct. 12, 1333. He studied at Oxford, acquiring his M.A. by 1295 and becoming a doctor of theology by 1315. Consecrated archbishop of Canterbury in June 1328, he held provincial councils at St. Paul's, London, January–February 1329 (where he proclaimed the Feast of the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION); at Winchester March 11, 1330, and at Mayfield, Sussex, July 27, 1332. In 1329 he refused to install Annibale da Ceccano, Archbishop of Naples, as rector of Maidstone, was subsequently cited to the Curia, and was suspended by Pope JOHN XXII. A visitation of his own diocese in 1329 led to a conflict with the Abbey of SAINT AUGUSTINE, Canterbury. The nuncio adjudicated the case in favor of the abbey after Mepham refused to comply with the citation of the nuncio. As a result, Mepham was suspended from office in 1330 and excommunicated. Politically, Mepham had been one of the key figures in 1328–29 when King Edward III attempted to assert his independence at the court still dominated by Mortimer. His own appointment as archbishop, engineered by Henry, Earl of Lancaster, had been directed against Bp. Henry Burghersh of Lincoln, who was Mortimer's choice. Mepham was instrumental in bringing about Lancaster's submission to the young King's grace at Bedford, in January 1329. Mepham died excommunicate, but his body received absolution Oct. 26, 1333, and was buried in Canterbury cathedral, in St. Peter's chapel in the south ambulatory of the choir.

Bibliography: J. TAIT, "On the Date and Authorship of the Speculum Regis Edwardi," English Historical Review 16 (1901) 110–115, work of Mepham? T. F. TOUT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 13:260–263; Chapters in the Administrative History of Mediaeval England, 6 v. (New York 1920–33). A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the Scholars of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 2:1261.

[V. MUDROCH]

SIMON OF AULNE, BL.

Cistercian lay brother; b. c. 1145; d. Aulne (Belgium), Dec. 6, 1229. Although he was related to the counts of Geldern, Simon joined the abbey of AULNE-SUR-SAMBRE as a simple lay brother and was believed to possess the extraordinary gifts of discernment of spirits and prophecy. According to tradition, he was consulted by INNOCENT III. Simon was buried at Aulne and his relics soon became objects of veneration, although he has never been canonized.

Feast: Feb. 24.

Bibliography: S. LENSSEN, Hagiologium cisterciense, 2 v. (Tilburg 1948–49; suppl. 1951) 1:297–299.

[L. J. LEKAI]

SIMON OF BISIGNANO

Canonist; b. early 12th century, Bisignano in Calabria; date and place of death unknown. He was a student at Bologna, quite possibly of Gratian, and magister there. In addition to numerous glossae on the Decretum of GRATIAN he left a Summa covering all parts of that work except the De poenitentia. It belongs to the late 1170s (possibly 1177–1179). It is a work of great originality and the product of a competent and mature canonist. Simon is responsible for introducing an extensive use of the newer papal legislation since the time of Gratian. On more than 175 occasions he cites excerpts from the decretals of which more than 60 are of Alexander III. Simon seems to have regarded the Decretum of Gratian as the ancient law that could be and must be brought up-to-date by present and future legislators. Abrogations, derogations, modifications to the law of the past are to be expected. In this he was followed by SICARDUS OF CREMONA, the Summa Lipsiensis, HUGUCCIO, and all later canonists. It is interesting also to note that by more than 50 references to the Decretum of BURCHARD OF WORMS he testifies to the continuing use of that work and also indicates the view that Gratian did not contain all the ancient law. Though he made use of the teaching of earlier DECRETISTS he rarely refers to them by name. The Summa exercised considerable influence upon the development of the canonical method and has survived in at least eight manuscripts. An edition is being prepared.

Bibliography: S. KUTTNER, Repertorium der Kanonistik 148–149. J. F. V. SCHULTE, Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des kanonischen Rechts 1:140–142. J. JUNCKER, “Die Summa des Simon von Bisignano und seine Glossen,” Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Germanistische Abteilung 15 (1926) 326–500. T. P. MCLAUGHLIN, “The Extravagantes in the Summa of Simon of Bisignano,” Mediaeval Studies 20 (1958) 167–176. W. HOLTSMANN, “Zu den Dekretalen bei Simon von Bisignano,” Traditio 18 (1962) 450–459.

[T. P. MCLAUGHLIN]

SIMON OF CRAMAUD

Cardinal; b. Diocese of Limoges, France, c. 1360; d. Dec. 14, 1422. He first studied law at Orléans and was licensed there; later he received a doctorate of jurisprudence from Paris and became a noted canonist and influential orator. He greatly admired the University of Paris and championed its cause in connection with the WESTERN SCHISM. He served as chancellor for the Duke of Berry for ten years. His was a brilliant career: on May 30, 1382, he was named bishop of Agen; in 1383, bishop of Béziers; in 1385, bishop of Poitiers, and finally on May 27, 1390, archbishop of Sens. On March 17, 1391, he was raised to the rank of titular patriarch of Alexandria and was made administrator of Avignon by Pope CLEMENT VII, whom he served during the Western Schism. In 1409 he was made archbishop of Reims and was elected president of the Council of PISA, where he proclaimed that both BENEDICT XIII and GREGORY XII should be deposed and championed the election of ALEXANDER V. In a council at Rome convoked in 1413 by John XXIII, he was named a cardinal. There he assisted in condemning the writings of J. HUS and J. WYCLIF. He was a forerunner of Gallicanism in that he staunchly supported temporal authority. At the Council of CONSTANCE he showed himself violently opposed to the Hussites. After MARTIN V was elected pope in 1417, Simon lost his influence in Church affairs, and for the rest of his life was the administrator of the diocese of Poitiers. His tomb was found in the cathedral of Poitiers in 1859.

Bibliography: K. A. FINK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 9:765–766. L. SALEMBIER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 3.2:2022–26. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. and continued by H. LECLERCQ, 10 v. in 19 (Paris 1907–38) 6.2:1193–95; 1210–26.

[F. D. LAZENBY]

SIMON OF SAINT-QUENTIN

French Dominican missionary, fl. mid-13th century, author of Fratris Simonis historia, an account of a journey to Tataria. He is known only through VINCENT OF BEAUVAIS. Simon's Historia is lost but its substance has been preserved in the Speculum historiale of Vincent (29.69–89, 95; 30.26, 32–50; 31.2) who supplements Simon's information with extracts drawn from the work of the Franciscan, JOHN DA PIAN DEL CARPINE. After the Council of LYONS (1245), Innocent IV sent six missionaries into Tataria: two Franciscans, Carpine and Benedict the Pole; and four Dominicans: the Lombard ASCCELLINO, the Poles Alexander and Alberic, and the Frenchman Simon, almost certainly a native of Saint-Quentin. The Franciscans traveled by way of Bohemia, Poland, and Russia, while the Dominicans took the Acre, Armenia, Georgia, and Persia route. When the Dominicans arrived at the court of the prince of the Tatars, Bajothny (Bacin, Bochyn, or Batu Khan), they would not offer presents and thus earned bitter reproaches. They also refused to accord him divine honors and would have been massacred, had not one of the prince's six wives interceded for them. Simon's account gives the letter of Bajothny to the pope and dwells on the sufferings and bad treatment the Dominicans had to endure, but it is vague in its description of the country and its inhabitants. This mission to Tataria lasted from 1245 to July 1248 or 1249 and the friars are believed to have spent two years and six weeks in the country.

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores ordinis praedicatorum (New York 1959) 1.1:122. J. A. FABRICIUS, Biblio- theca latina mediae et infimae actatis, 6 v. in 3 (Florence 1858–59) 3:586. M. DAUNOU, Histoire littéraire de la France 18 (1835) 400–402. B. ALTANER, Die Dominikanermissionen des 13. Jh. (Habelschwerdt 1924). Bibliotheca missionum (Freiburg 1918–) 4:9–10.

[J. DAOUST]

SIMON OF SUDBURY

Archbishop of Canterbury, chancellor of England; b. Sudbury, Suffolk; d. London, July 14, 1381. Simon studied in Paris where he graduated as doctor of laws. Having been appointed chaplain to Pope Innocent VI, he proved his skill as a diplomat when sent as nuncio to EDWARD III in 1356. As a reward for this and similar services, he was made bishop of London in 1361 by papal PROVISION. For the next 20 years he took a leading part in English politics, siding with John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, and incurring the accusation of being too lenient toward Gaunt's protégé, John WYCLIF. In 1375 Sudbury was transferred by papal bull to Canterbury. As archbishop he crowned Richard II (1377); as chancellor (1380–81) he helped shape royal policy, yet he was overshadowed constantly by the energetic William COURTENAY, his successor as bishop of London. It was Courtenay who forced him to examine Wyclif at Lambeth Palace in 1378. When the peasants revolted in 1381, Sudbury was a target of their hatred. They released their priest, John BALL, from the archbishop's prison at Maidstone, then seized the archbishop in the Tower of London and executed him. Before dying Sudbury granted absolution to the headsmen.

Bibliography: W. HUNT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 19:146–149. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the Scholars of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 3:2218. W. L. WARREN, "Reappraisal of S.S.," Journal of Ecclesiastical History 10 (1959) 139–152.

[D. NICHOLL]

SIMON OF TOURNAI

Theologian; b. Tournai c. 1130; d. c. 1201. If he was the reporter of the second half of Odo of Soissons' (Ourscamp's) Quaestiones, as seems likely from the language and technique, he was doubtless the master of Odo's school and his successor in the chair of theology from 1165. Before that he taught the arts for ten years. He used Aristotle's Physics, Metaphysics, and De anima, newly translated from the Arabic, and admired Abelard and Gilbert de la Porrée. He excelled in dialectics and in clarifying and classifying concepts. Accusations of blasphemy, heresy, and incontinence, made some years after his death, have been discredited. The chronology and relationship of his works with those of other Porretani, especially Alain of Lille and Raoul Ardent, and with Peter of Poitiers are not yet established. His following works have been printed: Disputationes, Expositio super Simbolum, a sermon on the antiphon O Sapientia (by J. Warichez, Louvain 1932); Expositio Symboli S. Athanasii [in Bibliotheca Casinensis. Florilegium, 4 (Montecassino 1880) 322–346]; and the Trinitarian portion of his Institutiones in sacra pagina [M. Schmaus, Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale, 4 (1932) 59–72, 187–198, 294–307]. The sacramental portion of the latter was copied from Ps.-Hugh, Speculum ecclesiae (Patrologia latina 177:335–380), and the Summa decretorum of Rufinus.

Bibliography: D. VAN DEN EYNDE, "Deux sources de la Somme théologique de Simon de Tournai," Antonianum 24 (1949) 19–42. P. GLORIEUX, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 14.2:2124–30. A. M. LANDGRAF, Einführung in die Geschichte der theologischen Literatur der Frühscholastik (Regensburg 1948); revised as Introducción a la historia de la literatura teológica de la escolástica incipiente (Barcelona 1956). J. N. GARVIN, "Peter of Poitiers and Simon of Tournai on the Trinity," Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 16 (1949) 314–316. P. S. MOORE et al., eds., Sententiae Petri Pictaviensis, 2 v. (Notre Dame, Ind. 1943–50) v.2. M. CAPPYNS, Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 49 (1954) 564–565.

[J. N. GARVIN]

SIMON (SIMEON) OF TRENT

Alleged boy martyr; d. Trent, Italy, March 23, 1475. Son of a tawer, he was found murdered near his home at the age of 20 or 30 months, allegedly by Jews during the celebration of the Pasch on Maundy Thursday. Upon discovery of the body, a trial was instigated; the proceedings, assembled by Bp. John Hinderbach and approved by Pope Sixtus IV on June 20, 1478, who suspended Simon's cult, are not considered reliable inasmuch as torture was employed to exact testimony. Numerous miracles were attributed to the boy (curing of the dumb, the blind, and the paralyzed, and restoration to life of the dead), which led to the Pope Sixtus V's authorization for the continuation of his cultus (1588). He was probably considered a saint, and his feast day was celebrated annually at his tomb in the church of St. Peter at Trent, until the cult was forbidden by order of Abp. A. M. Gottardi of Trent (Oct. 28, 1965) and his name removed from the Roman Martyrology. This is the unique example of ritual child murder recognized in the Martyrology; it was first listed as a commemoration in a missal in 1487 and picked up in a martyrology dated 1584. The incident still awaits critical historical investigation.

See Also: MEDIEVAL BOY MARTYRS.

Bibliography: J. M. TIBERINUS, Die Geschichte vnd Legend von dem seylygen Kind vnd Marterer genant Symon, von den Juden zu Trientt gemarteret vnd getötet (Augsburg after April 4, 1475) U. PUSCULUS, Brixieñ duo libri Symonidos (Augsburg 1511). B. BEN A. ANAU, Sefer Masa ge hizayon (s.l. 1965). L. DONATI, L'inizio della stampa a Trento ed il beato Simone (Trent 1968). E. S. TESSARDI, L'arpa di David: storia di Simone e del processo di Trento contro gli ebrei accusati di omicidio rituale (Milan 1974). A. ESPOSITO and D. QUAGLIONI, Processi contro gli ebrei di Trento (1475–1478) (Padua 1990). R. P. HSIA, Trent 1475: Stories of Ritual Murder Trial (New Haven 1992). W. TREUE, Der Trienter Judenprozess: Voraussetzungen, Abläufe, Auswirkungen (Hannover 1996). Acta Sanctorum March 3:493–500. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 2:7762–72. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:671–672. Analecta Bollandiana 23 (1904) 122–124. I. ROGGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 9:772.

[F. D. LAZENBY]

SIMON STOCK, ST.

General of the Carmelite Order; b. England; d. Bordeaux, France, May 16, 1265. The only contemporary evidence seems to be a notice in Vitae fratrum (ca. 1260) of Gerard of Frachet; “Simon, the prior of this Order, a religious and veracious man”; it seems to indicate also that he was in the Holy Land (1237). Two 14th-century necrologies attest to his English origin, his generalate, his death, and his reputation for sanctity. In the earliest redaction of the Catalogues of Saints of the Carmelites about the same time, he is called Simon of Gascony; his generalate is not mentioned, but the reference is undoubtedly to Simon Stock. The earliest (ca. 1400) list of Carmelite generals by John Grossi, places his generalate from 1200 to 1250, but Grossi’s chronology has no historical basis. The commonly accepted report that Simon was elected general at the chapter of Aylesford in 1247 (or 1245) cannot be maintained, because in 1249 a certain Geoffrey was general; consequently the change of the Carmelite rule from eremitical to mendicant in 1247 was not the work of Simon. He was perhaps elected at the chapter of the order in London in 1254. The year of his death as 1265 is first recorded at the end of the 15th century but is corroborated by the foundation of the convent of Bordeaux shortly before and by the election of his successor in 1266. In iconography and from the Catalogues of Saints, Simon is chiefly known for his famed scapular vision. While he was praying to Our Lady for privileges for his order, she appeared to him, holding the Carmelite SCAPULAR in her hand and saying: “This is your privilege: whoever dies in it, will be saved.” The obvious sense is that whoever lives and dies as a Carmelite, will not be lost. This account helped spread the devotion of the scapular among the faithful, especially from the 16th century onward. The so-called documents of Swanyngton concerning this vision are a 17th-century fabrication. Other particulars of Simon’s life, such as his living in a hollow tree, his joining the Carmelite Order in England, and performing various miracles, can be discarded as 15th-century legends. During the Middle Ages his feast was celebrated in several Carmelite convents; the whole order accepted it only in 1564, when the feast was approved by the Vatican. He has not been officially canonized; however, his relics are venerated in the cathedral of Bordeaux and in the Carmelite monastery of Aylesford, England.

Feast: May 16.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum May 3:650–651. B. M. XIBERTA Y ROQUETA, De visione Sancti Simonis Stock (Rome 1950).

[A. STARING]

SIMONETTA

A noble family, originally from Calabria, that played a prominent part in Milanese and papal affairs during the 15th and 16th centuries.

Francesco, humanist and statesman; b. Caccuri, Catanzaro, Italy, 1410; d. Milan, Aug. 30, 1480. He served on the Royal Council of Naples before entering the service of the Sforzas. During the regency of Bona of Savoy, widow of Galeazzo Maria, Duke of Milan, and the minority years of Gian Galeazzo Sforza, Francesco served as minister of state (1476–79). The accession of Ludovico il Moro, which brought about a new regime, led to Francesco’s capture and decapitation.

Giovanni, brother of Francesco, historian and statesman; b. Caccuri, Catanzaro, Italy, c. 1415; d. Rome, 1491. He entered the service of Francesco Sforza, first as his secretary (1444) and later as chancellor of Milan (1453). He wrote a Latin account of Milanese history from 1421 to 1466, which paid tribute to Francesco and which was entitled Commentarii rerum gestarum Francisci Sfortiae It is generally considered an excellent example of Italian humanistic history. With the accession of Ludovico il Moro (1479), Giovanni was forced to flee into exile, where he died.

Bonifacio, nephew of Francesco and Giovanni, abbot of San Stefano in Corno; b. unknown; d. San Stefano, 1492. He is remembered chiefly for his works on the early Christian persecutions, Christianae persecutiones (Milan 1496).

Giacomo, son of Giovanni, cardinal; b. Milan 1475; d. Rome, Nov. 1, 1539. A lawyer in the Roman Consistory, he served as an auditor of the Rota during the Fifth Lateran Council (1512–17). Appointed bishop of Pesaro in 1529 by Clement VII, he was raised to the cardinalate by Paul III (1535). He also administered, at different times, the Dioceses of Perugia, Lodi, and Nepi. He was sent as legate a latere, with Cardinals Lorenzo Campeggio and Girolamo Aleandro, to a council, summoned at Vicenza, that was eventually prorogued (1538).

Ludovico, nephew of Giacomo, cardinal; b. Milan, 1500; d. Rome, April 30, 1568. His uncle Giacomo renounced the See of Pesaro in Ludovico's favor in 1537. He was referee of the papal segnatura (1540), and was present at the Council of Trent (1546–47). He was appointed bursar of the Vatican in 1560. A year later he was named cardinal and papal legate to Trent by Pius IV. At Trent he frequently led the opposition to the theological proposals of Cardinal Girolamo Seripando, president of the Council.

Bibliography: H. JEDIN, History of the Council of Trent, tr. E. GRAF, v.1–2 (St. Louis 1957–60); Geschichte des Konzils von Trient, 2 v. (Freiburg 1949–57; v.1 2d ed. 1951). H. JEDIN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. M. BUCHBERGER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1930–38) 9:580–581; Papal Legate at the Council of Trent: Cardinal Seripando, tr. F. C. ECKHOFF (St. Louis 1947).

[P. S. MCGARRY]

SIMONY

The term simony is derived from Simon Magus, who tried to buy the gift of the Holy Spirit from the Apostles (Acts 8.18–24).

Theology. Modern authors usually adopt the definition of THOMAS AQUINAS: “A deliberate design of selling or buying something spiritual or annexed to the spiritual” (Summa Theologiae 2a2ae, 100 ad 1). This definition covers simony of divine law but not of ecclesiastical law (1917 Codex iuris canonici c. 727). We are concerned here with the former, which constitutes a real SACRILEGE. The gravity of the offense lies in equating spiritual with temporal goods. Also, insofar as an element of belief is involved, those who commit simony become suspect of heresy.

To commit the sin of simony, the intention alone suffices. However, for the delict of simony (a crime subject to ecclesiastical penalties) there must be some external agreement with one or more persons (1917 Codex iuris canonici cc. 2195, 2218, 2228), although this may be tacit or implied. The temporal price can be other than money. The traditional definition originated with GREGORY I (cf. Corpus iuris canonici c.1 q.1 c. 114): munus a manu, i.e., a monetary gift or one that is calculable in monetary terms; munus a lingua, i.e., praise, promises, recommendations; munus ab obsequio, i.e., the rendering of undue services. “Spiritual” refers to those things that exist for the good of the soul, such as grace, the Sacraments, prayer, sacramentals, indulgences, ecclesiastical authority and jurisdiction. “Annexed” objects are such things as church benefices, sacred vessels, relics, and the right of patronage. To sell these things is simony of divine law. Slightness of matter is not admitted—except in simony of ecclesiastical law; thus the sin is mortal in every instance.

Sixteenth-century wooden statue of St. Simon Stock receiving scapular from Virgin Mary, holding Infant Jesus.

There are numerous practices that are not simoniacal (Iorio, 37–39). Thus it is lawful and proper for a priest to receive a stipend or offering on the occasion of performing his sacred duties, e.g., Mass offerings, marriage and burial fees, and he may demand such where permitted (Lk 10.7; 1 Cor 9.13). Blessed objects, such as rosaries, chalices, and crucifixes, may be sold provided the price is not increased on that account. Nor is it simony to give someone a gift to persuade him to accept some spiritual advantage. However, scandal should be avoided.

History. In the first three centuries simony was uncommon. But after the Edict of Milan (313), when the Church began to accumulate wealth and power, positions were eagerly sought. Despite attempts at suppressing this abuse, it continued throughout the Middle Ages. The worst period was from the 9th to the 11th century when simony pervaded the monasteries, the lower clergy, the episcopacy, and even the papacy. Thus GREGORY VI (1045–46) was accused of simony and NICHOLAS II's famous decree on papal election (1059) was directed at simony principally. In the later Middle Ages the abuse, especially the traffic in indulgences and relics, was attacked by WYCLIF and other reformers. Lay princes as well as churchmen were responsible for these practices.

Simony did not go unchallenged. Countermeasures consisted of theological tracts and conciliar, papal, and synodal legislation, much of which passed into the canonical collections. An important canon was CHALCEDON (451), cap. 2, which ordered bishops who ordained for money to be deposed (Jedin, Conc. Oec. Dec. 63; Corpus iuris canonici C.1 q. 1 c.8). Papal letters, especially of LEO I (P. Jaffé, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum hatum 1198, ed. F. Kaltenbrunner 410, 544), INNOCENT I (the famous Ventum est, ibid. 303), and Gregory I (ibid., ed. P. Ewald, 1743, 1744, 1747, 1859), imposed deposition and excommunication, but with little success.

The commonest form of simony was the buying and selling of Holy Orders. From Gregory I onward this was referred to as the heresy of simony (simoni aca haeresis) but simony was not held to be a HERESY simpliciter, certainly not in the 11th century when the phrase was most used. Yet this discussion raised the question of whether simoniacal orders and sacraments were valid. Some modern authorities have argued that the doctrine was defective from the 10th to the 12th century. The opinion of the author is that simoniacal orders were regarded as valid but illicit. Some of the GREGORIAN reformers may have followed the extreme views of HUMBERT OF SILVA CANDIDA, but not the majority. The orthodox view was expressed by PETER DAMIAN and generally adopted (see REORDINATION).

Although the theological and canonical treatment of simony (the Paris school) continued on sound lines down to Aquinas, we should note that the Bolognese school taught differently about simoniacal ordinations, that is, debating whether they were valid or not. The disputes were generally settled by the 13th century.

Elimination of the abuse, however, was not so successful. Injunctions and prohibitions continued. Thus in 1464 PAUL II in his bull Cum detestabile decreed excommunication latae sententiae against those guilty of simony in granting benefices, together with their mediators. Yet simony remained a major abuse down to and after the Council of TRENT. However, the council legislated against the worst of the simoniacal transactions that had been common (cf. Session 21, De Reform. can. 1, 9; Session 24, De Reform. can. 14, 18). This together with the renewal of the inner life and the increasing separation of Church and State made possible the eventual elimination of all simony.

Bibliography: N. A. WEBER, A History of Simony in the Christian Church (Baltimore 1909). R. A. RYDER, Simony (Washington 1931). H. NOLDIN and A. SCHMITT, Summa theologiae moralis, v. 2 De Praeceptis (28th ed. Heidelberg 1944–). J. LECLERCQ, "Simoniaca Heresis," Studi Gregoriani 1 (1947) 523–530. D. M. ROSATI, La teologia sacramentaria nella lotta contro la simonia e l'investitura laica del secolo XI (Tolentino 1951). T. A. IORIO, Theologia moralis (5th ed. Naples 1960–) v.2. H. G. KRAUSE, "Das Papstwahldekret von 1059 und seine Rolle im Investiturstreit," Studi Gregoriani 7 (1960). J. GILCHRIST, "Simoniaca Haeresis and the Problem of Orders from Leo IX to Gratian," Proceedings of the Second International Conference of Medieval Canon Law Held at Boston, August 1963 (Vatican City 1964).

[J. GILCHRIST]

SIMOR, JÁNOS

Cardinal, primate of Hungary; b. Székesfehérvár (Stuhlweissenburg), Hungary, Aug. 23, 1813; d. Esztergom (Gran), Jan. 23, 1891. Son of a wealthy family, he was ordained (1836), taught theology (1839–50) in Budapest, Vienna, and Esztergom, and became court chaplain (1850) and counselor for Hungarian affairs in the ministry of public worship and education in Vienna (1851). He became bishop of Győr (March 19, 1857), archbishop of Esztergom and prince-primate of Hungary (Feb. 22, 1867), and cardinal (Dec. 22, 1873). He was outstanding for his pastoral, organizational, and building activities and still more for his work to restore his diocese and clergy to closer union with the pope and the Roman Curia after JOSEPHINISM had alienated so many. Also, as leader of the Hungarian ecclesiastical autonomy movement, he sought to free the Church in Hungary from traditionally strong royal influence, which after 1868 was exercised mainly by liberal ministers. At VATICAN COUNCIL I he opposed as inopportune the definition of papal infallibility, but later supported and publicized the conciliar decrees in his diocese and throughout Hungary, and contravened attempts to submit them to the royal placet.

Bibliography: J. KÓHALMI-KLIMSTEIN, Johann Simor (Bratislava 1886). C. BUTLER, The Vatican Council, 2 v. (New York 1930). C. GREINZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. M. BUCHBERGER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1930–38) 9:583–584. T. VON BOGYAY, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 9:776.

[F. MAASS]

SIMPLICITY, VIRTUE OF

In ordinary speech the word “simplicity” sometimes designates an undesirable characteristic, namely, an incapacity for dealing with ideas or situations of any complexity, an inadequacy that stems from either a defect of intelligence or a want of native shrewdness. In reference to the spiritual life, however, simplicity has two uses, in both of which it signifies commendable qualities. One of these is necessary to the virtuous man, and the other is of counsel. As a necessary quality, it is a disposition firmly opposed to deceit, double-dealing, hypocrisy, dissimulation, and duplicity of every kind. Jesus noted this trait in Nathaniel (Jn 1.47; for other scriptural references, see Jb 1.1; Prv 2.21–22). As a counsel of perfection, simplicity signifies the indivision of heart and the singleness of purpose of those who are free from voluntary imperfection and who seek God with great purity of INTENTION. By those who lack this quality, God is not loved perfectly, ex toto corde; the eye of the soul is not full of light (Mt 6.22); and intentions that are less worthy, even if they are not strictly opposed to the love of God, clutter the heart.

[P. K. MEAGHER]

SIMPLICITY OF GOD

The divine attribute that excludes from God’s being all composition, whether physical, metaphysical, accidental, or merely logical. The Catholic Church, whose tradition finds expression in the Scriptures, in the witness of the Fathers, in the liturgy, and in the exercise of her teaching prerogative, has ever maintained that the being of God is, in the deepest sense of the term, simple. This article explains the Church’s teaching in two stages: the first is devoted to establishing the fact of God’s simplicity, the second to exploring theologically its significant meaning. Procedure on this latter point relies largely upon philosophical considerations (appropriated in a ministerial function by theology) and involves determining the nature of simplicity, then arguing that God is intrinsically simple, and finally establishing the consequential truth that God cannot enter into the composition with the world.

Fact of Simplicity. Yahweh’s revelation of Himself to the Israelites as “Who Is” focuses upon His oneness and His “otherness.” The latter attribute is presented largely in terms of God’s holiness (agios), which renders Him inaccessible and separate from the world. In this it is strongly suggested that God is spirit and is incorporeal, though such concepts are not sufficiently clear to include explicitly the concept of simplicity. Indeed, the Old Testament abounds with corporeal metaphors employed for the most part to establish beyond doubt the concrete actuality of God. On the other hand, God’s command to Moses prohibiting graven images of Himself (Ex 20.4) can readily be seen as expressive of His immateriality. The New Testament expressly speaks of God as a “spirit” (Jn 4.24; 2 Cor 3.17), who “has not flesh and bone” (Lk 24.39) and is thus “invisible” (Jn 5.38; 6.46). He is not located and worship of Him does not depend upon place (Jn 4.20–24). Further, He is His own truth and life (Jn 14.6) by way of a real identity and does not merely possess these.

If the concept of simplicity is not explicitly stated, the Fathers of the Church remedy this. Origen speaks of God’s “perfect simplicity,” which “excludes all addition and all intrinsic diversity” (Periarch. 1.1.6); Athanasius calls it “absolute simplicity which excludes every quality and every kind of composition properly so called” (Epist. ad Afros episcopos 8, Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 26:1043); Gregory of Nyssa sees the divine nature as so one and simple in itself that man cannot conceive of it (Contra Eunom. 12.2, Patrologia Graeca 45:1069, 1077, 1104). Much of the concern of the Fathers is directed to showing how neither the Incarnation of the Word nor the real distinction of the divine Persons is in any wise injurious to God’s simplicity.

The liturgy for the Mass of Trinity Sunday refers to the Trinity as “a simple Unity.” In due time, the teaching authority of the Church gave express formulation to this attribute of God, especially in the Councils of Toledo (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer, 566), Rheims (Enchiridion symbolorum 745), Lateran IV (Enchiridion symbolorum 800), and Vatican I—the last council condemning, in particular, various forms of pantheism as implying composition between God and the world (Enchiridion symbolorum 3001, 3023–24).

Notion of Simplicity. Everything confronting man in experience admits of composition of some kind; thus one’s procedure in arriving at the notion of simplicity is necessarily negatory. The concept itself signifies a negation of composition: a simple thing is something that lacks parts or really distinct elements. Simplicity likewise implies indivisibility, since only composites admit of division.

There is truth to the observation that in the created order the complex is more perfect than the simple, as man is more perfect than a stone. This, however, is a simplicity of imperfection or of lack of being. The simplicity of God is rather a simplicity of perfection; it consists in being all perfections, not distinctly, but by way of real identity.

Arguments for God's Simplicity. The demonstration of God's simplicity is effected by the successive elimination of all forms of compositions: first, real composition, either substantial (physical or metaphysical) or accidental; and second, rational or logical composition.

Physical Simplicity. The most obvious composition is that proper to bodies and radicated in matter as necessarily subject to EXTENSION. Three characteristics are verifiable of all corporeal substance: mobility, quantitative divisibility, and (in terms of mere corporeity as such) inanimation. For, (1) no body as such can be the cause of its own motion, since what is only capable of motion must receive its motion extrinsically; (2) every body as extended must admit of the possibility of division; and (3) mere corporeity cannot be explanatory of life, else every body would necessarily be animate.

Each of these characteristics of body is, however, incompatible with the authentic concept of God—as unmoved mover, as totally actual, as pure perfection. God is not receptive of motion, not passive to division, not lifeless but living. These nominal definitions of God are not presupposed, moreover, but are arrived at by a true deductive process originating with external phenomena. They are conclusions to the classical “five ways” whereby Saint Thomas establishes God's existence (see GOD, PROOFS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF). The human intellect then is logically constrained to deny body of God, to conceive Him as transcending the structure necessary to the very notion of body. The metaphors of Sacred Scripture must therefore be understood as metaphors, and not as implying that God is truly possessed of a body.

The foregoing argument does not merely remove from God material composition of parts in space; it implicitly precludes any notion of God as a form-matter composite (see MATTER AND FORM). For a material element in God would still imply POTENCY; it would merely participate in the perfection of the form, and God would not be a pure agent cause, since matter is operative only in virtue of its form.

Metaphysical Simplicity. The denial of matter in God leads readily to the removal of another form of composition—that between nature, or essence, and individual. God is His own nature by a real identity and cannot be thought of as a subject who has a common nature in which others may possibly share in individually distinct ways. Any nature involved in matter (as man's) is thereby necessarily subject to individuating determinations so that the individual is something over and above, and thus distinct from, the nature it shares in common with many (see INDIVIDUATION). The immateriality of God means that His essence is individuated of itself, and not in virtue of a composition with really distinct singularizing elements. God does not possess His Godhead (as a man does his humanity), He is that Godhead.

Profounder still is the identification in God of essence and existence (see ESSENCE AND EXISTENCE). God's “being-ness” is not to be thought of as the emergence, or “standing out” (ex-sistentia) of a prior essence. This would necessarily contract His being to that of the finite order and make it univocal with creaturely existence. There is always and necessarily a real distinction between the ESSENCE (that which is) and the EXISTENCE (the act of existing) of a creature; indeed in this does its very creatureliness consist. But such a distinction itself implies that the existence in question is a caused one, that it is an ultimate perfecting of the nature to which it accrues, and that the nature realizes its own being by way of a PARTICIPATION in pure, unreceived Being. But nothing in God is caused—indeed there are no causes prior to Himself; His totalness of being is such that it admits of no further perfecting; and as absolutely first Being He cannot participate any being prior to Himself. God is thus the very act of being itself in its absolute purity. This is His very essence; His name is “He Who Is.”

Accidental Composition. Catholic faith ascribes to God perfections without number—intelligence, will, power, justice, mercy, operation, the whole array of divine attributes. Their inclusion in Him is real and authentic. Yet these perfections are not to be conceived as really distinct qualities that are accidentally added to the divine being, enriching God, as it were, from without. Every finite essence is receptive not only of the substantial perfection of existence but also of multiple accidental qualifications that enjoy existence in the essence as its various modifications. Yet these accidents are necessarily posterior (in nature, if not in time) to the essence they modify and are caused either by an extrinsic agent or by the intrinsic principles of the essence whence they emanate, the latter in the case of properties. To have such accidental modifications is in direct opposition to God's primacy of being and to His being the uncaused cause of all.

A more ultimate reason for this impossibility lies in the recognition of God as pure subsistent Being. [See ASEITY (ASEITAS); SUBSISTENCE.] Speaking precisely, no essence as such admits of additions to itself; the very supposition of such intrinsic addition would mean the destruction of the essence in question and the origin of a new essence. To add a unit to the number five is to eliminate the number five and substitute a new mathematical essence, that of the number six. Accidents, then, do not reside in, and belong to, the essence; they are modifications of the individuals who possess the essence. Baldness happens not to humanity but to certain individual males. But God is not a subject having his nature and thus capable of receiving further accidental qualifications. Rather He is His intelligence, His will, His mercy, etc. Accidental composition is as repugnant to Him as substantial composition.

It follows from this that God cannot bear in Himself any real RELATION to the world, for a real relation is an accidental being. He is not a being among beings, subject to the inevitable and limiting complexus of interrelationships and dependencies. This is not to deny that God is really Creator, Provider, etc., but only to deny that such real causality implies any real intrinsic accidental mutation of the divine transcendence.

Logical Composition. So total is the divine simplicity that the human mind cannot (without falsifying its object) impose upon that simplicity a composition entirely of its own making. And any placing of God in logical categories proper to rational thought amounts to just such a composing. As long as there is some foundation in God Himself for so doing, the mind can and indeed must employ distinctions not really found in God. To compose generic and specific elements, however, in fashioning the very concept of God has no such justification. For one thing, a GENUS must be prior to what it contains, but God's primacy of being (not so much a primacy in time as in excellence) means that nothing can be prior to Him, either really or in meaning. Also if God were to be considered as in a genus, this would have to be that of "being." But, as Aristotle observes, being cannot be a genus since the difference of a genus must lie outside it and outside being there is only nothingness. Even more cogent, perhaps, is the necessity of distinguishing the QUIDDITY from the existence of whatever is contained within a genus—a distinction nowise allowable in God. Each SPECIES has the same generic quiddity as every other species of the same genus, but obviously must have its own distinct act of being. This is only to say that logical composition is dependent upon prior metaphysical composition. The impossibilities here cannot be avoided by saying that God belongs to a genus reductively—i.e., not as contained therein but as an external principle thereof—for in such a case the principle cannot extend beyond the genus it principles, and God is much more than any category of being that might be excogitated.

Since definitions are arrived at by establishing the generic elements and then discerning the specific difference, it follows that there can be no proper DEFINITION of God. This, in its turn, accounts for the impossibility of an a priori demonstration of God's existence.

Extrinsic Simplicity. It is further impossible for God to enter into composition with other things. He cannot be in any fashion the formal principle of the world; even less plausibly can He be its material principle. The decisive reason for this is that a cause cannot be confused with its effect. Could God truly be composed with the world either He would become His own effect or the world would become its own cause—all of which is a denial of the notion of God as first cause. It must be noted well that this is no denial of the possibility of union between God and creature. The INCARNATION is precisely a union with a created humanity, indeed a substantial union. Accidental unions are numberless and varied, occasioned by every exercise of divine causality and creaturely mutation. Union is a relation to God as a totally extrinsic agent or term. Composition, by contrast, renders God an intrinsic part of something—potency or act, matter or form, substance or accident. God is present to and in the universe, but He is nowise a part of it.

The transcendental theism of Christianity, then, is at a far remove from PANTHEISM of whatever kind—either that which sees God becoming the world, as does Eastern religion, especially HINDUISM, and classical pantheism extending from PARMENIDES and HERACLITUS down to B. SPINOZA, or that which sees the world becoming God, as does the materialistic pantheism of E. Haeckel or the idealistic pantheism of G. W. F. HEGEL (see the condemnations of Vatican Council I, H. Denzinger Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer, 3023–25). Equally inimical to Catholic faith is the more prevalent PANENTHEISM of such moderns as C. S. PEIRCE, A. N. WHITEHEAD, W. JAMES, M. Buber, A. Schweitzer, and P. Weiss, which represents God as including the world in His own actuality (see C. Hartshorne and W. L. Reese, Philosophers Speak of God, Chicago 1953).

Ultimately, the Christian position rests upon a concept of God as the PURE ACT of being, transcending His creation.

See Also: GOD, ARTICLES ON

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 1a, 3, Eng. ed. v.2, Existence and Nature of God, ed. and tr. T. MCDERMOTT (New York 1964); C. gent. 1.17–27, tr. A. C. PEGIS, On the Truth of the Catholic Faith, book 1 (New York 1955). R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, God: His Existence and His Nature, tr. B. ROSE, 2 v. (St. Louis 1934–36) v.2. E. MANGENOT et al., Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 4:948–1300. K. JÜSSEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:745–46.

[W. J. HILL]

SIMPLICIUS, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: March 3, 468 to March 10, 483. "Born at Tivoli, his father Castinus" (Liber pontificalis), Simplicius seems to have been chiefly a spectator of events, in contrast to his immediate predecessors. During his tenure, the last shadowy emperor of the West was relegated to a comfortable villa at Naples and the imperial insignia sent to Constantinople by Odoacer, who assumed the title of king of Italy, under the vague suzerainty of the Eastern emperor (476). A series of barbarian kingdoms, all Arian, had established themselves on the ruins of the Western Empire. The Church's relations with the new rulers were generally good; only in Spain and Africa was there real persecution.

The unsuccessful attempt by Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople, to win the pope's approval for canon 28 of Chalcedon colored Acacius's later attitude toward the Roman Church. In spite of the imperial government, the Monophysites succeeded, for a time, in gaining control of the important Sees of Alexandria, Jerusalem, and Antioch. Under the usurper Basiliscus (475–476), who needed their support, they were openly favored. The encyclical issued by Basiliscus, in an attempt to reconcile the orthodox and the Monophysites, condemned Chalcedon and Leo's Tome. Acacius, afraid of the usurper and angered by the pope's attitude toward canon 29, failed to keep him informed about events. Simplicius wrote to both Basiliscus and Acacius expressing concern about the restoration to Alexandria of the Monophysite Patriarch TIMOTHY AELURUS, but to no avail.

The return to power of the Emperor ZENO seemed to assure the triumph of Chalcedonian orthodoxy. Although the pope obtained an imperial decree banishing Timothy, who died before it arrived in Alexandria (477), he could not obtain the support of either Zeno or Acacius for the removal of Timothy's successor, the Monophysite Peter Mongus. The Monophysite Peter the Fuller was also obliged to leave Antioch, but only for a time.

Both the emperor and patriarch were intent on pursuing a policy of religious conciliation. The skillfully drawn up HENOTICON, prepared by Acacius with the help of Peter Mongus and issued as an imperial edict in 482, was superficially orthodox, but it failed to cover the main point at issue: it was silent on Chalcedon and Leo's Tome. Peter Mongus was recognized as the lawful patriarch of Alexandria following the death of the orthodox Timothy Salophaciolus (February 482). Acacius left the pope in ignorance of the latest developments, in spite of repeated appeals for information from Rome. Simplicius died, after a long illness, before any action could be taken about the Henoticon.

The policy of delegating papal authority was extended to Spain, when Bishop Zeno of Seville was appointed papal vicar for that country and charged with seeing that the decrees of the Apostolic See were observed there. Under Simplicius occurred the first instances of adapting public buildings in Rome for use as churches. A hall on the Esquiline, erected by the consul Junius Bassus, was dedicated to St. Andrew (S. Andrea in Catabarbara). The most important foundation of the reign was the construction on the Coelian hill of the architecturally interesting round church of S. Stefano in Rotondo, formerly thought to have been an earlier building transformed into a church. Recent examination and restoration have shown that it was erected in one building about this time. In addition, a small basilica was erected to St. Bibiana in the gardens of Gallienus (S. Bibiana).

The Liber pontificalis records that Simplicius designated priests from certain of the Roman titular churches to assist with the services at the greater basilicas of St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. Lawrence on a weekly rotation basis. The system was later extended to the basilica of St. Mary Major, while the Lateran Basilica was served by the suburbicarian bishops. Simplicius was the first pope to be portrayed with a square nimbus, indicating that he was still living at the time (in a mosaic in the apse of S. Bibiana, no longer extant). He was buried in the portico of St. Peter's. The 9th-century Martyrology of Ado was the first to commemorate him (the date of his death is wrongly given in the Roman Martyrology as March 2, following the Liber pontificalis).

Feast: March 10.

Bibliography: Clavis Patrum latinorum, ed. E. DEKKERS (Strasbourg 1961) 1664, and Patrologiae cursus completus, series latina, suppl., ed. A. HAMMAN (Paris 1957—) 3:443–444, editions. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 58:35–62. A. THIEL, ed., Epistolae romanorum pontificum (Braunsberg 1868—) 1:175–2:14. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92) 1:249–251; 3:86–87. E. CASPAR, Geschichte de Papsttums von den Anfängen bis zur Höhe der Weltherrschaft (Tübingen 1930–33) 2:14–25, 746. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie (Paris 1907–53) 13.1: 1210–11. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 14.2:2161–64. O. BERTOLINI, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi (Bologna 1941) 19–30. T. G. JALLAND, The Church and the Papacy (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, 1944) 314–317. E. SCHWARTZ, Publizistische Sammlungen zum Acacianischen Schisma [Abhandlungen der Akademie (Gesellschaft, to 1940) der Wissenschaft NS 10; 1934]. R. U. MONTINI, Le Tombe dei papi (Rome 1957) 104. W. ULLMANN, The Growth of Papal Government in the Middle Ages (New York 1962). G. B. LADNER, Die Papstbildnisse (Vatican City 1941–) 1:60–61. R. VIELLIARD, Recherches sur les origines de la Rome chrétienne (Rome 1959) 89–91. M. REDIES, "Die Usurpation des Badiliskos (475–476) im Kontext der aufstiegender monophysitischen Kirche," Antiquité Tardive. Revue Internationale d'Histoire et Archéologie (IV^e-VIII^e siècle) 5 (Paris 1997) 211–221. J. RIST, Biographisch- Bibliographisches Kirchenlexikon 10 (Herzberg 1995). G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon des Mittelalters (Munich-Zurich 1994–1995).

[J. CHAPIN]

SIMPSON, RICHARD, BL.

Priest, martyr; alias Highgate; b. c. 1553 at Well, Ripon, Yorkshire, England; hanged, drawn, and quartered July 24, 1588 at Derby. After a short time as a Protestant minister, his journey to the Catholic Church caused him to be imprisoned. Released (or exiled) he began his studies for the priesthood at Douai in 1577, where he was ordained a priest. Thereafter Simpson was sent to England. He labored in the mission field for almost ten years prior to his arrest and banishment. He returned furtively, but was caught passing from Lancashire to Derbyshire. He was reprieved at the Lenten assizes of 1588 and almost conformed. His fellow inmates, Nicholas GARLICK and Robert LUDLAM, comforted and encouraged him to hold fast to the faith. He repented of his inconstancy and was condemned for high treason because he was an unlawful priest. All three were beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

SIMULATION

Simulation is a special form of untruthfulness. It is an acted lie; for while the lie, properly speaking, is untruthfulness in speech, simulation is untruthfulness in deed.

Simulation is sinful, having the same kind and degree of malice as a lie; i.e., in itself it is venially sinful, but according to circumstances (e.g., when it causes another person grave injury) it can be mortal. However, its sinfulness is not quite so obvious as that of the lie. Words have definite meanings; and so if certain words are used that are contrary in meaning to what one has in mind, it is evident that a lie is being told. But actions are not so definitely significative. Except for a few conventional gestures, actions have no set meaning. Here it is the intention that counts. A woman may dye her hair, not wishing to deceive anyone or to appear what she is not, but simply to beautify herself, which, within certain limits, she has every right to do. Another may do exactly the same thing, but with the definite intention to deceive, e.g., to be taken for another woman. Here the intention vitiates the act, and the result is a sin of simulation.

Simulation can manifest itself in a variety of ways and spring from a multiplicity of motives. A man by affectations in demeanor or speech or dress may pretend to a culture or knowledge or wisdom that is not his own. Another may simulate a professional competence, as in the case of the quack or even of the legitimate doctor who poses as a specialist in areas of medicine other than his own. Another may simulate spiritual gifts and virtues, as does the fortune-teller, the clairvoyant, or the hypocrite. Still another may protest a love and respect for one whom in reality he despises. All of this may be from motives of monetary gain, reputation, power, or simply from uncontrolled feelings of inferiority. Ignorant of his own worth and potential, a man puts on a mask that he might appear in the power and worth of another.

It may seem that there are cases in which simulation is legitimate and even virtuous. For instance, one who is sick may act as though he were quite well so as not to cause inconvenience to others; or he may affect ignorance when he feels that a display of knowledge might embarrass another. These are cases not of simulation but of dissimulation. There is no real pretense here springing from a desire to deceive, but simply silence in order to keep one's secret. In ordinary circumstances one need not speak all one knows, and has no obligation to declare to others the state of his body or soul. By the same token one has a right to dissemble, i.e., to act in such a way as to ward off the curiosity of others. However, if being sick, one should simulate health in order to get a job in which health is required, or if one should pretend ignorance to avoid an obligation, which otherwise would be legitimately imposed upon him, then he would be committing the sin of simulation. For he would not simply be forestalling the curiosity of others, but actually and positively deceiving them.

Bibliography: J. A. MCHUGH and C. J. CALLAN, Moral Theology, rev. E. P. FARRELL, 2 v. (New York 1958) 2:2403–04.

[S. F. PARMISANO]

SIN (IN THE BIBLE)

The concept of sin, which underwent a gradual change toward increasing clarity and refinement, can be understood in the meanings of the term in the books of the Bible. Sin will be treated as it is described in the Old Testament, and in various sections of the New Testament.

“Temptation of Adam and Eve,” painting c. 1550 by Titian.
(©Francis G. Mayer/CORBIS)

Sin in the Old Testament

Sin in the Old Testament is portrayed rather graphically and concretely without recourse to theological speculation. It will be treated under four headings, its nature, causes, effects, and in its later development in Judaism.

Nature of Sin in the Old Testament. The words used for sin have generally to do with human relations. The most commonly used root is ḥaṭṭā, meaning to miss the mark (morally, to be deceived, fall short of the goal). In sin the goal is a person, and hence it is a failing toward someone, a violation of the bond uniting persons to one another. Sin is therefore a personal failing as regards God, a failing of Him, a falling short of the mark God sets for us. The less frequent but more theological word peša indicates defiance toward God. It denotes a transgression, the violation of the rights of others, setting the rebellious sinner against God as it sets people one against another. It is a word reserved for Israel’s sin.

Ancient Dynamistic Notion. Once Israel came to know God, sin was taken as a personal offense, rebellion or revolt against the covenant God. Yet before Israel became the people of God, it shared the attitude of its neighbors toward God and sin, regarding sin as a violation of the domain of the numinous, and it took a long time before this dynamistic concept of sin died out or was reinterpreted. This taboo-consciousness is patently present in older sections of the Old Testament. For instance, when “Oza put forth his hand to the ark of God, and took hold of it because the oxen kicked and made it lean aside . . . and he [God] struck him for his rashness. And he died there before the ark of God” (2 Sm 6.6–7). Thus, even though sin was considered a violation of the will of God, contact with God or what belonged to Him (holy things) was dangerous, and the notion of sin was still considered a material violation, something outside oneself, not spiritualized. The prohibition of blood meat, the distinction between clean and unclean animals, the rules for ritual purification probably stem from dynamistic backgrounds. Following upon these are the notions of immediate retribution (mentioned above), of collective guilt (Nm 16.32), of guilt for involuntary transgressions of ritual (Lv 4.3), and the notion of ḥērem—claimed exclusively for YAHWEH (Joshua 6.17–18). Yet as the Israelite’s understanding of God grew, so did his awareness of sin as first of all “against God” [Ps 50(51).6].

Sin as a Personal Offense against God. The word of-fense itself is rare in the Old Testament as well as in the New Testament. When it is found, however, as in the book of Job, the notion of God’s transcendence is more than safeguarded: “If you sin, what injury do you do to God? Even if your offenses are many, how do you hurt him?” (Job 35.5–6). By sin man may despise or contemn the precepts of God and in a sense God Himself. It follows that the sinner acts against God but cannot do anything to God. St. Thomas wisely comments that the sinner acts against God insofar as he contemns His commandments and injures himself or another who is under God’s protection.

Alongside the notion of offense against God can be considered that of saddening God within the wider context of SALVATION HISTORY (HEILSGESCHICHTE). The background for this seems to be the above mentioned primitive notion of sin whereby something is actually taken away from the divinity by a sinful act, whatever it be. Vestiges of this can be found in 1 Samuel 5.7–9; 6.19–20; 24.7, 11, 13; 2 Samuel 1.14–16. The authentic notion of sin as an offense against God, however, cannot be drawn from these taboo-breaking narratives.

The personal character of sin as an offense against God is brought out by the sacred writer in his account of David’s sin (2 Sm 11–12) and in the Judaic tradition regarding Psalm 50(51). David shows himself ungrateful to God, despising His word, even despising God Himself (2 Sm 12.7, 9–10). David finally acknowledges: “I have sinned against the Lord” (12.13). The King thought that it was only against a man, and one who was not even an Israelite, and consequently it was not a grave sin; he did not realize that God identifies His cause with every man, in this case, that of Uria.

But despite his confession, David's punishment follows according to the lex talionis (12.14); i.e., the child is to die (see RETRIBUTION). Thus sin reaches God insofar as it hurts man, whom God loves.

In God's design it was left to the prophets to inculcate the proper sense of sin, not as a simple violation of a taboo or external transgression, but rather as a personal offense against God: “. . . it is your sins that make him hide his face so that he will not hear you” (Is 59.2). They made the people of God aware of the personal relationship between God and them. Within the pattern of the COVENANT, Israel became more aware of the refusal involved in sin, its hardness of heart (Is 46.12; Ez 2.4), its ingratitude: “An ox knows its owner, and an ass, its master's manger; but Israel does not know, my people has not understood” (Is 1.3).

By breaking the covenant, Israel offended against God personally, for the prophets often expressed the covenant relationship as that of a marriage between God and His people. In graphic terms the prophet Hosea's marriage to a harlot wife represented the relation of God to Israel: just as a man is offended by his wife's infidelities, so Yahweh is offended by the infidelities of Israel, who was betrothed to Him. Israel's infidelity takes the form of idolatry and oppression of the poor. Hosea (ch. 11) expresses God's love and its frustration in a most tender manner: “When Israel was a child I loved him, out of Egypt I called my son. The more I called them, the farther they went from me, sacrificing to the Baals and burning incense . . . yet, though I stooped to feed my child, they did not know that I was their healer” [Hos 11.1–2, 4; cf. Is 5; Jer 2.2; 3.1–5, 20; Is 50.1; 54.6; Ps 44(45); Ez 16].

Notion of Sin in Primeval History. The first chapters of Genesis emphasize the spiritual degeneration of man as a result of the sin of Adam. Man was made in God's image; he lived in communion with Him. Adam's sin was essentially one of disobedience or breaking the covenant law, consciously and deliberately opposing the will of God; it was an external act of rebellion proceeding from within according to the suggestion of the serpent: “. . . you will be like God, knowing good and evil” (Gn 3.5). Doubting His infinite generosity, man defied God in striving for something above himself and thus perverted the notions of man, a creature, and of God who lacks nothing and can only give. When he lost access to the tree of life as well as his Father-son relationship, death followed as a result.

Man's sinfulness increased according to the following chapters of Genesis. His insubordinate pride set man against man, splitting the family and leading to fratricide (Gn 4.3–8), to mass murder and brutality (Gn 4.23–24). The evil was conceived as growing unbearable to God and reaching its climax in the wickedness that brought about the deluge (Gn 6.5–7). After the flood story the sacred editors used the TOWER OF BABEL episode to express man's continued pride and its consequent disunity (Gn 11.1–9). Thus did primeval history present the universality of sin (see PRIMEVAL AGE IN THE BIBLE). Sin and unhappiness go together. The first sin separated man from God, aroused shame, drew punishment, multiplied pain and suffering.

Sin as a Revolt against God. Adam's act makes it clear that sin is a revolt (peša). This term provides the theological depth of the Biblical notion of sin. It is a revolt against God and His covenant. It is not a mere mistake or failure since it involves willful disobedience. The verb and noun forms are also used to express rebellions against nations or transgressions against men (1 Kgs 12.19; Am 1.3). The word takes on the idea of trampling on the rights of another, going beyond the limits set for one.

Although missing in Genesis, this word appears in Exodus to denote a new quality of sin in God's people. It is a revolt, a direct attack on God, who by His covenant makes Israel His special possession, His people. The word is later reserved for Israel's sin, especially in the Prophets; e.g., “Woe to them, they have strayed from me! Ruin to them, they have sinned against me!” (Hos 7.13; cf. 8.1–2); “Your first father sinned; your spokesman rebelled against me . . .” (Is 43.27; cf. Mi 1.5; Jer 2.8; Ez 2.3; etc.). Although peša does not occur as frequently as other terms, e.g., ḥattā, it is the strongest word for sin and its meaning is adopted by the New Testament.

The depth of revolt is magnified by the notion of Israel as the spouse and Yahweh, the faithful husband: “. . . she played the harlot. And I thought, after she has done all this she will return home. But she did not return. . .” (Jer 3.6–7); “Return, rebel Israel, says the Lord, I will not remain angry with you. . .” (Jer 3.12). Thus it was the deepest meaning of the covenant that the prophets developed as opposed to sin. The covenant morality was the mind and heart responding to the will and the law of Yahweh. Eventually, with a new mind and heart the true Israelite would be able to live according to God's word, to return to God with a covenant loyalty prompted by God's covenant love and fidelity.

Causes of Sin. The Old Testament generally accuses man as the cause of sin, but other factors outside him also are indicated.

Origin of Sin within Man. The Old Testament as a whole presents evil as beginning in man himself. The OT authors did not speculate but rather traced the source of sin existentially in human life. Sin came from the corrupt heart of man: “. . . this people draws near with words only and honors me with their lips alone, though their hearts are far from me. . . .” (Is 29.13). From man’s evil heart came all sin: “When the Lord saw . . . that man’s every thought and all the inclination of his heart were only evil, . . .” (Gn 6.5). Only when God gave man a new heart would he be able to live by His statutes and carefully observe His decrees (Ex 36.26–27). For the Israelites, it was the heart, the seat of the understanding and will, that had rebelled against God. They said: “. . . we will follow our own devices; each one of us will behave according to the stubbornness of his evil heart!” (Jer 18.12).

Outside Influence. Gn (ch. 3) clearly states that sin came upon earth at the instigation of a superhuman power. The serpent was no mere animal; it was the incarnation of a fundamental element of disorder, the source of revolt and insubordinate pride. He enticed Eve to judge that God’s command was not absolute, and thereby caused her to doubt God’s word and to suspect that the command was not for man’s good but for God’s jealously guarded excellence [Gn 3.5; see SERPENT (AS SYMBOL)].

In 1 Chronicles 21.1 Satan moved David to sin: “And Satan rose up against Israel and moved David to number Israel” (but cf. 2 Sm 24.1). He also tried to make Job blaspheme God (Job 2.5–8). The Satanic origin of sin is mentioned in the Old Testament, however rarely. The latest Old Testament book, obviously commenting on Genesis 3, states it clearly: “But by the envy of the devil, death entered the world . . .” (Wis 2.24).

Possible Allusions to Concupiscence. Although there is no mention in the Old Testament of a state of personal sin having been inherited from Adam, the inclination to sin is evident: “Indeed in guilt was I born, and in sin my mother conceived me” [Ps 50(51).7]. Concupiscence or tendency to evil comes with the uncleanness of birth. It is ascribed to the children of Adam and Eve. Its result is murder, attempted deception of God, revenge, polygamy, revolt, and complete apostasy from God.

A noticeable change appears in man immediately following his sin before any explicit punishment; though man and woman were naked before the sin, they felt no shame; but after the sin they were ashamed. Previously man had conversed familiarly with God; now he fled from Him (Gn 2.25 and 3.7–8).

Analysis of Sin. Beyond the account of Genesis 3, the Old Testament does not analyze sin psychologically. As mentioned above, the Old Testament writers approach sin concretely as it appeared in human life. Yet, the Old Testament certainly provides distinction between sins. Besides sins of thought, word, and deed there are sins of omission and commission, e.g., Heli’s sin by not correcting his sons (1 Sm 3.13). More important, however, is the distinction between serious sins, e.g., sins committed “with an uplifted hand,” i.e., defiantly (Nm 15.30), and slight sins; between crimes and hidden sins, i.e., those done with full deliberation in open revolt against God and those incurred by human weakness and inadvertence. Some of the more serious sins were: IDOLATRY (Ex 22.19), MAGIC (Ex 22.17), DIVINATION (Lv 19.26; etc.), and BLASPHEMY (Lv 24.11–16). Some sins punishable by death were: murder (Ex 21.12–14), striking or cursing parents (21.15, 17), kidnapping (Ex 21.16), ADULTERY, INCEST, homosexuality, and bestiality (Lv 20.10–16). Other sins, serious though not punishable by death, were: stealing (Ex 21.37–22.3), slandering one’s wife (Dt 22.13–19), seducing a virgin (Ex 22.15–16), etc. Sins of youth were considered lesser sins because of inexperience [Job 13.26; Ps 24(25).7].

Effects of Sin. Sin left its mark on the sinner, on nature itself, and on all men universally.

Guilt. As a result of revolt against God, a sense of guilt arose. The Old Testament generally did not distinguish between sin and resultant guilt. The most frequent term for expressing guilt was ’awōn denoting all the disorder, deviation, and falseness that sin involves. Its most common note is the burden whose weight bears down on the sinner. Another word ’āšām (to be guilty) could also mean guilt offering. In Leviticus and Numbers it refers to becoming guilty as a result of cultic transgressions and reflects the dynamistic background of sin. In some places the root conveys the notion of moral guilt (Prv 30.10; Gn 26.10; Jer 2.3; 51.5; etc.).

Evil Effect on Creation. Creation manifests God’s power and wisdom (Is 40.12; Job 28.23–27; 38–39); His majesty shines through His creation [Ps 8; 18 (19).1–7; 103(104)]. Yet after Adam’s sin the ground was corrupted because of man:

Cursed be the ground because of you; in toil shall you eat of it all the days of your life; Thorns and thistles shall it bring forth to you, and you shall eat the plants of the field. In the sweat of your brow you shall eat bread, till you return to the ground, Since out of it you were taken; for dust you are and unto dust you shall return (Gn 3.17–19).

What was intended for man’s good and happiness now became his chastisement. Calamities involving creation itself followed man’s sin: the Deluge, the plagues of Egypt, and the curses on unfaithful Israel (Dt 28.15–46). In the end nature would undergo total transformation and renewal (Is 11.6–9; 65.17–25; 66.22).

Universality of Sin. The Hebrew tradition was firm: all men were considered sinners. Although just and wicked men were always distinguished, the universality of sin was the cause of the Flood (Gn 6.5–8), and man's heart was inclined to evil from his youth (Gn 8.21). The prophets considered the nation as a whole sinful, evil, laden with wickedness (Is 1.4; Ez 2.5; Mi 7.2; Jer 5.1). The psalmists and sages proclaimed this universality: "All alike have gone astray; they have become perverse; there is no one who does good, not even one" [Ps13(14).3]; ". . . yet there is no man on earth so just as to do good and never sin" (Ecc 7.20). The wisdom writers especially emphasized the universality of sin. The antithesis of the just and the wicked occurred frequently in their works (Prv 11.21; 21.29; etc.). Job, although his innocence was necessary to establish the author's point, realized that he could not be sure of his sinlessness (Job 9.21). In fact, the whole of the Old Testament is a massive denunciation of sin as an offense against God.

In Judaism. In JUDAISM the Law was especially important in determining the notion of sin. Every transgression of the Law was a sin, a rebellion against God's will. There was some effort, however, to maintain the Old Testament distinction of sinning defiantly and sinning through ignorance. Since the 6th century B.C., because of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, the tendency was to put the burden of guilt on the individual as well as on the community. Generally Judaism considered sin as universal and coextensive with mankind having had its origin in the sin of Adam and Eve. Sin was a controlling power over the world. By observing the Law man could overcome the inclination to sin. Following upon sin was punishment including sickness, death, and eternal damnation. Repentance and return to God, however, was always possible because of God's mercy.

Sin in the New Testament

The most prominent word for sin in the New Testament is ἁμαρτία, which renders ḥattā' in the Septuagint, indicating deviation from the good. In the classical authors it indicated "missing of a target." It could refer to wrong done to man, but above all it expressed sin against God. ἁμαρτία itself referred to a single act, a characteristic of human nature, or a personal power. In the Synoptics and Acts this word is almost always used as the object of forgiveness, more often in the plural. John and Paul employed the plural especially in formulas referring to remission of sins and to Christ's death for sins. The singular often indicates the sinful state of the world (John) or the power of sin (Paul).

A related term is ἀνομία, meaning lawlessness, iniquity, or a lawless deed. The term usually indicates a state of hostility toward God and His salvific revelation, and reveals the depth of sin. In this sense the one who sins rejects his Christian vocation and communion with God and submits to the devil's domination.

In the Synoptics. Every vestige of the taboo notion of sin has vanished together with the legalistic and impersonal notion (Mk 7.1–23; cf. Mt 15.1–20).

In Matthew 7.23, 13.41, and 24.12 the word ἀνομία (iniquity) is used in an eschatological context: "Depart from me, you workers of iniquity!" Christ refers to the Pharisees as full of iniquity (Mt 23.28). Sin is usually, however, presented in the context of forgiveness. In the parable of the prodigal son (Lk 15.11–32) the sin consisted in the son's leaving his father to enjoy a life of debauchery. The offense was a desertion of the father along with a squandering of the father's wealth in loose living. In forgiving, the father showed mostly his joy at his son's return and never even mentioned the injuries he suffered. The son recognized his sin as an offense against heaven and his father whereby he destroyed his own sonship. The miserable servitude he suffered was the natural consequence of his sin. His father recognized that by his return the son has passed from death to life. Sin then was slavery and death as well as an offense against God.

Christ's life and mission destroyed Satan's reign of slavery and death and replaced it with freedom and life in the Father's house. Following His victory over the devil in the desert, Jesus drove out devils from the possessed, cured ills caused by unclean spirits, and restored the health of a paralytic to prove He had the power to forgive sins (Mt 9.2–8). Sin then was considered as the source of all these ills of mankind.

In the Pauline Epistles. Paul usually referred to sin as something internal and stable in man. Except in certain formulas, ἁμαρτία does not usually signify an act of sin, but almost a personal force in man that acts through his body. It entered into the world with Adam's sin and exercised its deadly work by means of the Law. Thus in Paul sin is similar to what iniquity means in 1 John 3.4. Paul also used iniquity in the Johannine sense in the phrase, "the mystery of iniquity" (2 Thes 2.7). Sin then was not just an act of disobedience to God's will and law; it was open revolt against Him, the result of which was a state that was inimical to God and would lead to death. For the act of sin, other terms were generally used, literally signifying transgression or overstepping.

In Romans (ch. 5) Paul showed that sin permeates the whole human race through death, but its power is not equal to Christ's grace and justice: "For if by reason of the one man's offense death reigned through the one man, much more will they who receive the abundance of the grace and of the gift of justice reign in life through the one Jesus Christ. . . ." (5.17). By being baptized into Christ's death and Resurrection man is freed from sin and begins to live by Christ's life. "For we were buried with him by means of Baptism into death, in order that, just as Christ has risen from the dead through the glory of the Father, so we also may walk in newness of life" (6.4). Thus through Baptism the Christian is conformed to Christ so that after Baptism the "old man" and the "body of sin" cease to be the instruments of sin. Now the Christian has a new "mode of being," a new "mode of acting." He is no longer in the service of sin; the Holy Spirit is present in him. The new man is inspired, motivated by the Spirit to fight against the flesh; he passes from the carnal state to a spiritual state. The opposition between the flesh and spirit indicates the nature of sin, for sinful flesh is thus described as God's enemy while the spirit is God's gift. Sin, then, is a personal force by which man is opposed to God, and sinful deeds are its works.

These principles concerning the nature of sin are concretized in Romans 1.18–3.20, 23, where Paul speaks of the sin of all mankind, Jew and Gentile alike. The Gentile refuses to acknowledge God as the author of all good. Hence he no longer cares to depend on God, the invisible source of all visible things; he turns away from Him, excites His wrath, and is delivered by Him to all kinds of sinful passions. And the Jew is no better; although he knows God and His Law, he does not honor Him by keeping it. In fact, because of the Law, he becomes more conscious of sin and guilt, and should be more conscious of his need for justification, whereas he is not. Paul sums up his doctrine on the role of sin in the mystery of salvation in Romans 3.22–23: "For there is no distinction [between Jew and Greek], as all have sinned and have need of the glory of God" (cf. Rom 7.7–25). Even sin plays its role in God's plan: it makes man cry out in his misery, "Who will deliver me from the body of this death?" (Rom 7.24).

In Johannine Writings. Although the Synoptics generally speak of sin in the plural, John speaks of it more often in the singular (13 times; three times in the plural). John's notion of sin is that of a separation from God ending in hatred of God and servitude to the devil.

By way of opposition, the nature of sin is seen in the Lord's way of destroying it. Christ takes away the sin of the world (Jn 1.29; 1 Jn 3.4–10) by cleansing with the Holy Spirit (Jn 1.33), by a rebirth from on high, from the Spirit (Jn 3.3–8; 1.12–13), by giving His disciples the freedom of the Son (Jn 8.31–36), by giving them His peace through His return to the Father by way of the Cross (Jn 14.27–31). Christ can take away sin because He is the light of the world (Jn 8.12; 12.35–36); in contrast, sinners and sin belong to the realm of darkness (Jn 3.19–21; 9.3–5). According to 1 John sinners are the devil's children (3.8, 10; cf. Jn 8.38–47). Christ has come: "that he might destroy the works of the devil" (1 Jn 3.8). The Christian, born of God, does not commit sin because God's seed, Christ, abides in him. The sinner is the devil's son, the devil's slave, a murderer as he was from the beginning, he who "has not stood in the truth because there is no truth in him." When he tells a lie he speaks from his very nature, for he is a liar and the father of lies (Jn 8.44). Jesus, in contrast, is the truth (8.45; 14.6; 1.14, 17–18) and the life (14.6; 3.14–16, 36; 5.21, 24–29; 6.48–60; 11.25). He opposes the devil who brings sin and death (8.21–21; 44) and casts him out by His own death (12.31–33).

Sin is also hatred: "For everyone who does evil hates the light, and does not come to the light, that his deeds may not be exposed" (Jn 3.20). This hatred leads the Jews to hate Christ and to have Him killed. Consequently, "now they have no excuse for their sin. He who hates me hates my Father also" (Jn 15.22–23). Thus they do the work of their father, the devil (Jn 8.41).

By counteracting sin, hatred, and the devil, Jesus gives the supreme revelation of the New Testament: that God is love (1 Jn 4.8). Jesus' one command to His disciples, then, is to love one another as He has loved them (Jn 13.34–35; 15.12–17). Whoever hates his brother is still in darkness; he is a murderer and a liar (1 Jn 2.11; 3.15; 4.20).

John presents the Passion as instigated by the devil (Jn 13.2, 27; 14.30); but Christ overcomes the devil and sin: "Now is the judgment of the world; now will the prince of the world be cast out" (12.31; cf. 16.7–11; 14.30–31). Revelation puts it this way: "And that great dragon was cast down, the ancient serpent, he who is called the devil and Satan, who leads astray the whole world. . . ." (12.9). Thus Jesus in the very act of laying down His life for His sheep cries out: "It is consummated!" (Jn 19.30; 10.17–18). His peace has come to the world through the Holy Spirit and the power to forgive sins for all who believe (20.20–23, 29–31).

Characteristics of Sin in the New Testament. The New Testament writers generally understand sin as a concrete reality. Christ mingles with its perpetrators like a physician among the sick (Mk 2.15–17; Lk 7.34). For Jesus those who commit sin are the lost whom He seeks to find and save (Lk 19.9–10; 15.1–10); they are the dead to whom He offers life and merriment (Lk 15.22–24, 31–32). Sin is a canker of the heart and from the corrupt heart come all sorts of evil deeds: "For from within, out of the heart of men, come evil thoughts, adulteries, immorality, murders, thefts, covetousness, wickedness, deceit. . . . All these evil things come from within and defile a man” (Mk 7.21–23). The new law goes more deeply into man to root out the hidden causes of sin (Mt 5.21–48). The greatest sin is to reject the Spirit, to refuse the light (Mt 12.31–32; Jn 9.39–41). Sin, then, is a real disease that demands a radical cure and a complete change in one’s way of thinking (μετάνοια, change of mind, REPENTANCE, Mk 1.15).

For Paul sin is so real that it acts as a force conditioning the world. This idea stems from Paul’s profound experience described in Romans 7.13–25. There he saw that sin’s only cure was the “grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord.” Paul personifies the notion of sin and portrays its tyranny over mankind, as that of a master over his slave with death as the sinner’s wages. Only Christ can destroy the effect of sin, a sting that brings death (1 Cor 15.55–57). In Baptism the Christian dies with Christ to sin and rises with Him to life (Rom 4.25); he becomes a new being (Rom 6.4), a new creation: “If then any man is in Christ, he is a new creature: the former things have passed away; behold, they are made new!” (2 Cor 5.17). He is no longer in the flesh but in the Spirit (Rom 7.5; 8.9). The mystery of divine wisdom is that God made the sinless Christ to be “sin” so that man might become God’s justice (2 Cor 5.21).

Besides tracing all sin back to Adam, the New Testament considered SATAN a source of sin. He tempted Christ Himself (Mt 4.3–11); he tempts Christians: “Be sober, be watchful! For your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, goes about seeking someone to devour” (1 Pt 5.8; cf. Eph 6.12; Jn 13.2; Acts 5.3).

The immediate cause of sin, however, is man himself: “All these evil things come from within, and defile a man” (Mk 7.23). St. Paul speaks of an inner tendency to evil expressed by the term “flesh.” The flesh sets man against what good reason or the Law prescribes. It leads man to evil and to death: “For the inclination of the flesh is death, but the inclination of the spirit, life and peace” (Rom 8.6; cf. 6.19; 13.14; Gal 5.16–17, 24). Paul speaks of sinful flesh (Rom 8.3) and the body of sin (Rom 6.6); “I am carnal, sold into the power of sin” (Rom 7.14). Hence man is in sin’s power as long as he has not received Christ’s Spirit. All men are subject to the “power of sin” because of Adam’s sin (Rom 5.19).

The flesh, then, is the internal factor for sin, while the Law is an external factor making man aware of his sinfulness. The Law cooperated with the flesh to bring man to sin consciously. Even though the Law expressed God’s will, it was incapable in itself to effect salvation. When sinful flesh clashes with the Law that prohibits sin, sin abounds the more (Rom 5.20). Yet in the plan of God the Law, by its increasing of transgressions, serves His purpose; His justice and glory is proclaimed by His Son’s sacrifice and all human self-glorification is destroyed: “By sending his Son in the likeness of sinful flesh as a sin-offering, he has condemned sin in the flesh in order that the requirements of the Law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not according to the flesh but according to the spirit” (Rom 8.4).

Sin, then, is the normal human situation: “If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us” (1 Jn 1.8). But John also says: “Whoever is born of God does not commit sin, because his [God’s] seed abides in him and he cannot sin, because he is born of God” (1 Jn 3.9). The Christian therefore cannot remain in the state of sin and continue to be God’s son. His divine sonship is directly opposed to the state of lawlessness. It follows that while man is still in the world, still in the body, he must war against sin. Likeness to Christ and spiritualization come by justification, but the battle is not over; one must still put to death one’s sinful inclinations (Col 3.1–5). Only in the heavenly Jerusalem will the threat of sin be no more (Rv 21.27; 22.14–15). Hence the Sacrament of Penance, having the permanent power of Christ’s Blood and infinite mercy, is given for the remission of sins: “Receive the Holy Spirit; whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them; and whose sins you shall retain, they are retained” (Jn 20.23). The need for a continual source of forgiveness is indicated in Luke’s version of the Lord’s prayer: “Forgive us our sins, for we also forgive everyone who is indebted to us” (Lk 11.4). The Christian, once he shares in Christ’s victory over sin, must still work out his salvation “with fear and trembling” and manifest God’s works in him by will and performance (Phil 2.12–13).

With the coming of Jesus, God made His ultimate intervention in salvation history, and the salvation brought by Him was from sin: “. . . and thou shalt call his name Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins” (Mt 1.21); “And thou, child, shall be called the prophet of the Most High, for thou shalt go before the face of the Lord to prepare his ways, to give his people knowledge of salvation through forgiveness of their sins . . .” (Lk 1.76–77); “Behold, the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world!” (Jn 1.29). Since there is no sin in Him, He is its conqueror (1 Jn 3.5). Jesus overcame the world and the devil (Jn 12.31; 16.33). His birth, life, death and Resurrection were for this purpose: the conquering of sin and the giving of life: “I came that they may have life, and have it more abundantly” (Jn 10.10).

Although He did not make sweeping statements concerning the universality of sin, Christ considered all men sinful. He saw sin in the hearts of the strict observers of the Law and denounced them (Mt 12.34–35; 16.4; 23.33). Even His disciples were included in this perverse generation (Lk 9.41). Christ Himself showed His solidarity with man's sinfulness in accepting baptism and the cross although He was sinless (Mt 3.13–15; 2 Cor 5.21; Rom 8.3; Gal 3.13; Heb 4.15; 7.26–27; 1 Pt 1.19; 2.21–25; 1 Jn 3.5; Is 53.6–8).

Following the pattern of the Wisdom literature, Paul clearly portrays the universality of sin: "For we have argued that Jews and Greeks are all under sin. . . ." (Rom 3.9; cf. 6.16–23; Tm 3.3). Hence all men are sinners and in need of Christ's redemption.

According to John, Christ came to take away the sin of the world (Jn 1.29). That all are subject to sin is implied in the use of the singular, "sin" of the world. "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us," but man's universal problem has a solution, for "If we acknowledge our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all iniquity" (1 Jn 1.8–9).

See Also: GUILT (IN THE BIBLE); ORIGINAL SIN

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 2218–32. S. J. DE VRIES, G. A. BUTTRICK ed., The Interpreters' Dictionary of the Bible, 4 v. (Nashville 1962) 4:361–76. J. HASTINGS and J. A. SELBIA, eds., Dictionary of the Bible, rev. in 1 v. ed. F. C. GRANT and H. H. ROWLEY (New York 1963) 916–22. G. KITTEL, ed., Bible Key Words (New York 1951). P. RIGA, Sin and Penance (Milwaukee 1962). X. LÉON-DUFOUR, ed., Vocabulaire de théologie biblique (Paris 1962) 774–87. P. DELHAYE et al., Théologie du péché (Tournai 1960). S. LYONNET, De notione peccati, v.1 of De peccato et redemptione (Rome 1957–). J. GUILLET, Themes of the Bible, tr. A. J. LAMOTHE (Notre Dame, Indiana 1960). J. GIBLET, The God of Israel: The God of the Christians, tr. K. SULLIVAN (New York 1961) 149–63. H. RONDET, The Theology of Sin, tr. R. W. HUGHES (Notre Dame, Indiana 1960). C. R. SMITH, The Bible Doctrine of Sin and the Ways of God with Sinners (London 1953). L. MORALDI, Espiazione sacrificale e riti espiatori . . . (Analecta biblica 5; Rome 1956).

[J. LACHOWSKI]

SIN (PHENOMENOLOGY OF)

Sin is a notion that indicates most emphatically disruption of what is religiously sanctioned or required. Although as a rule the disruption takes place through man, sin always indicates the result of a power of evil that exceeds man's capabilities or it indicates that power itself; hence, special care is needed to avoid or to free from sin (see PURIFICATION; EXPIATION). Sin implies more or less strongly an ethical notion. Everywhere words for sin occur that denote moral transgressions, and the ethical nature of sin depends on the religious tradition of a community. At the same time, notions of sin imply impurity or religious defilement; "sinful" and "impure" are synonymous concepts in all civilizations with a cultic tradition. The contents of the notions for sin depend on their opposites—purity, justice, wholeness, sanctity, the sacred. Because of their peculiarly religious character and function within a religious setting, notions of sin are, as a rule, more comprehensive than an exclusively ethical notion of "bad" or "unacceptable," or any other specialized concept. This is particularly clear in most primitive religions where the same words can be rendered by "to heal" (a wound) or "to liberate" (from a magic spell), and the evil that makes purification imperative relates to what for us would be distinct realms—the physical, moral, spiritual.

The polarity between sin and its opposite is related to the inner ambivalence of the sacred itself. Greek ἅγιος, meaning consecrated, pure, or holy, occurs also in the opposite sense of dangerously desecrated, impure, damned. Latin sacer shows a comparable ambivalence. Different, but not unrelated, the polarity of impurity (sinfulness) and purity functions in the Brahmanic ritual; special ceremonies dissolve the sins of the sacrificer, thus preparing him for the sacred rite. Yet similarly, a ceremony takes place at the end for his return to ordinary life, as if it were an equally necessary desanctification.

Origin of Awareness of Sin. Generally held views on concepts of sin in the history of religions have been unduly affected by evolutionistic presuppositions. First, the assumption was too often made that personal awareness of right and wrong and a corresponding consciousness of guilt were late phenomena in the history of man. Secondly, until very recently, little or no sense of sinfulness was ascribed to primitive religions, other than for specific moral transgressions. Both views have proved to be erroneous. The former has been refuted in recent ethnology (especially by Jensen). Many hunter cultures naturally honor the successful hunter; yet the act of killing the game is regarded as a sin which requires special purification. The latter view has been opposed by a more careful study of myths; paradise and fall myths are widespread among the primitives and indicate a consciousness not only of individual wrongdoings, but more generally an awareness of man's sinful state.

Forms and Aspects of Sin. The various concepts and forms of sin in various philological contexts, and on different cultural levels, cannot be distinguished as stages in a historical process. However, we may discern aspects that are of greater clarity in some settings than in others.

Moral Sins. These are fundamental to the religions of most primitive societies because of the idea of physical results. Thus barren women may confess their moral infidelities in order to stop their barrenness, which is attributed to their transgressions. The typically Greek concept of sin, ὕβρις, known particularly as “pride” (or rather “wanton overestimation of oneself” or “disproportionate good fortune”) is used also (in Homer and even later, e.g., in Theognis) in reference to moral offenses. Religions that have developed elaborate cults and theological acumen never abandon the religious notion of moral sins. In the Egyptian Book of the Dead (ch. 125) a long list of sins is mentioned, which the (deceased) king declares that he has not committed. Manichaeism also produced lists of sins; they occur in confessional forms used in the liturgy. Here and elsewhere, however, moral and doctrinal transgressions are mentioned side by side.

The Breaking of a Taboo. This is regarded as particularly sinful. The sense of this type of guilt is by no means limited to primitive cultures, in which, for instance, a man is not allowed to speak to his mother-in-law. Modern Western man considers some offenses, such as grave-robbing, particularly heinous, although the moral reason why they would be worse than many other offenses is obscure. The reason for such sense of guilt at the breaking of a taboo is to be sought in a commonly held profound reverence (as expressed by German, Ehrfurcht).

Mythical and Cultic Aspects. Almost all religious traditions recall in some sense a state of perfection at the beginning of creation; creation myths are often interwoven with paradise myths. Hence the cultic forms in which sins or man’s sinful state play a role are connected with cosmogony. A sinful deed—or the breaking of a taboo—is to be understood as the forgetting of the divine, mythical process, which is the model for rightful human activity. Often the sinner is required to perform an expiatory sacrifice, which is modeled on the primordial sacrifice—in that divine mythical process—in order to bring to mind precisely that which was forgotten (Jensen). Likewise, the mythical origin of evil may be related to man’s sin or sinfulness. Egypt portrayed the prototype of evil in the harm done by Seth to Osiris in mythical time. This evil (dw-t) is more than individual transgression, but the same word occurs also in that sense. In Egypt and many other places the ultimate measure of sin or evil is associated with the powers of chaos that are overcome by the creator; this victory is preserved in the justice of the king. For that reason breaking the king’s law is a religious and cultic offense. A close connection of religious and moral sin is particularly striking in the cults of the mystery religions (see MYSTERY RELIGIONS, GRECO-ORIENTAL).

Speculative and Theological Reflections. In religious systems with great emphasis on individual efforts to attain sacred liberating knowledge, sin is regarded principally as obstructing impurity [see ASCETICISM; GNOSTICISM] or demerit (see BUDDHISM; JAINISM; HINDUISM). In classical Indian YOGA the aspirant must master first of all five “restraints” yamas (not to kill, not to lie, not to steal, sexual abstinence, not to be avaricious). In all ascetic and gnostic life certain “sins” must be conquered, even if they are such as are tolerated in common life. In all ascetic and gnostic systems, a strong awareness exists of an evil greater than any individual transgression. A precosmic fall is an object of theological reflection both in Gnosticism and in MANICHAISM. The Indian religions emphasize impurity and its results as a generally human conditioning (see INDIAN PHILOSOPHY). In Bhakti and other forms of devotional religion in which God’s grace is supreme, man’s relation to God is sometimes longed for or exulted in to such an extent as to make the sinful and imperfect state seem of no significance by contrast.

See Also: SIN (IN THE BIBLE); SIN (THEOLOGY OF).

Bibliography: H. FRANKFORT, Ancient Egyptian Religion (New York 1948). H. ABRAHAMSSON, The Origin of Death: Studies in African Mythology (Uppsala 1951). M. ELIADE, “Nostalgia for Paradise in Primitive Traditions,” in his Myths, Dreams, and Mysteries, tr. P. MAIRET (New York 1960); Yoga: Immortality and Freedom, tr. W. R. TRASK (New York 1958). A. E. JENSEN, Myth and Cult among Primitive Peoples, tr. M. T. CHOLDIN and W. WEISSELER (Chicago 1963); “Über den sittlichen Gehalt der primitiven Religionen,” Paideuma 3 (1949) 241–256. H. JONAS, The Gnostic Religion (2d ed. rev. Boston 1963). R. CAILLOIS, L’Homme et le Sacré (2d ed. Paris 1953). O. F. BOLLNOW, Die Ehrfurcht (Frankfurt a.M. 1958). G. MENSCHING, Die Idee der Sünde, ihre Entwicklung in den Hochreligionen des Orients und Okzidents (Leipzig 1931). H. BAUMANN, Schöpfung und Urzeit des Menschen im Mythos der afrikanischen Völker (Berlin 1936). L. J. CAZEMIER, “Het begrip zonde in de Pyramideteksten,” in G.v.d. Leeuw Festschrift Pro Regno Pro Sanctuario (Nijkerk 1950) 101–113. É. DES PLACES, “Péché, dans la Grèce Antique,” Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. 7 (Paris 1962) 471–480. H. B. ALEXANDER et al., J. HASTINGS, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion & Ethics, 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908–27) 11:528–570, old, but still useful.

[K. W. BOLLE]

SIN (THEOLOGY OF)

Sin is an evil human act. But an act is evil, bad, or wanting in the goodness or perfection it should have, because it is out of conformity with its proper norm, or standard. With regard to the human act, the norm, or standard, from a philosophical point of view, is man’s rational nature; and from the theological point of view, God’s nature and the eternal law. This article, being concerned with the theology of sin, considers sin mainly as an offense against God, and can therefore take as its starting point St. Augustine’s classical definition of it as a word, deed, or desire in opposition to the eternal law of God (C. Faust. 22.27).

"Sloth," in kitchen, mid-19th-Century drawing by Louis Boilly. (©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

This definition applies primarily and univocally to personal, mortal sins, a mortal sin being a fully deliberate act involving a sinner's choice of some created good as a final end in preference to the Supreme Good, with a consequent loss of sanctifying grace if, prior to the sinful act, the sinner possessed that grace. In other uses the term is analogical, and as such is applied to: (1) venial sin, in which the idea is not fully realized, either because the act is imperfectly deliberate or because the matter with which it is concerned involves no disruption of man's orientation toward his final end and is therefore compatible with sanctifying grace; (2) original sin, which is not an act, but an inherited defect of sanctifying grace and is antecedent to and independent of personal voluntary action; (3) habitual sin, which is not an act, but a state in which the sinner is without grace because of his personal sin; and (4) concupiscence, which is not an act, but a tendency or imbalance in the psychological integrity of the human composite, and which is not, in the words of the Council of Trent, "sin in the true and proper sense, but [is called sin] only because it is from sin and inclines to sin" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer, 1515).

Material and Formal Sin. There are two ways of looking at an action that is in disaccord with God's law.

It can be considered objectively and in its kind or subjectively, as it is in the consciousness of the individual who performs it. From the objective point of view, the act of feeding poison to another is out of accord with the eternal law, but a person doing so could be innocent of subjective fault if he is inculpably ignorant of the fact that the food he offers is poisoned and hence is unaware of the true nature and consequences of his act. The performance of an objectively evil act is called by theologians a material sin; when all the conditions necessary to subjective imputability are present, the act is said to be a formal sin. The determination of the objective sinfulness of an action is made on the basis of divine revelation as interpreted by the magisterium of the Church and also on the basis of the rational analysis of the nature of the act. This is properly a theological or a philosophical question. The determination of subjective responsibility is more immediately a psychological question. Contemporary interest, with its existential orientation, tends to center more on the latter question than on the former, and an anti-intellectualism that fails to distinguish between the two problems leads to moral relativism and situational ethics. It also brings confusion to any discussion of the role of conscience in moral activity. Although all are acutely conscious of the problem of the erroneous conscience and the obligation (not the right) to follow its dictates, the contemporary existentialist tends to be blind to the prior obligation to form an upright conscience, the only kind, according to reason and revelation, that confers the right to follow its dictates.

Sin as an Act. Sin is to be distinguished not only from the morally good act and habit to which it is opposed, but also from the morally bad habit, or VICE, which is not uncommonly its habitual source. Properly speaking, vices are not sins, but habits, whereas a sin is a voluntary act and does not necessarily demand a vicious habit any more than a good moral act demands a virtue for its source. Otherwise the vicious man could never perform a good act, nor could the virtuous man ever sin, an error condemned by the Council of Trent (Enchiridion symbolorum 1540). Moreover, a sin is a HUMAN ACT, and precisely as such requires the exercise of both intellect and will. When this is lacking, a man's act is amoral and cannot be described as human, or virtuous, or vicious, or sinful. Basically, therefore, sin is a deliberate and voluntary act. Even in the so-called sin of omission, the omission to be sinful must be traceable to a positive act of will, the object of which is either not-to-act or to do something incompatible with the omitted obligation. And in either case there is an act marked by a want of conformity with the law of God.

Reference to God. The elaboration, therefore, of the theological notion of sin must begin not with the sinner, but with God. Pius XII decried as one of the errors of modern times the misrepresentation of “the whole nature of original sin, and indeed of sin in general, considered as an offense against God . . .” (Enchiridion symbolorum 3891). Since the theologian is concerned with creatures only inasmuch as God is their principle and goal, human activity becomes theologically significant in accordance with its orientation to God. Man is made to pursue his happiness, and ultimately this can be achieved only in the attainment of the Supreme Good, which is God. His human activity must be directed to this goal, and even such part of it as has other more immediate and proximate objectives must be ultimately subordinated to the ultimate, supreme goal, which is desirable above all things and answers objectively to the full amplitude of human desire.

But man’s end in reaching toward happiness and God’s purpose in creating man are really identical. For God, who is perfect, complete, self-contained in Himself, was not urged or drawn to the creation of man by the hope of acquiring new perfection for Himself, for there is nothing good or desirable that was not already contained in His own infinite goodness. It was not, then, for the sake of increasing but of diffusing His goodness that He created. On His part, the object of creation could be nothing but the giving of Himself, the communicating of His goodness. The gain had necessarily to be on the part of the creature. In the ultimate communication of a participation in His own happiness, the extrinsic glory of God that is said to be the purpose of creation is realized. [See GLORY OF GOD (END OF CREATION).] It follows that man, by nature a rational being and a free agent with the power of selective activity, must deliberately and consciously direct himself to the attainment of God, or to the glory of God, as his ultimate end. Deliberately to choose some other goal than God as an ultimate is to take something from God that is due Him, to twist the whole order of creation, and to usurp God’s place by substituting a human will and a human order for the divine. In this way every sinner imitates in his own fashion the sin of Lucifer.

A further precision, providing a more profound insight into the nature of mortal sin, is possible to theologians who take, as most Catholic theologians have taken, the intellectualist position of St. Thomas Aquinas with respect to divine law. This, however, is beyond the grasp of those such as Calvin and voluntarists generally, who in their concern to preserve the transcendent and even autocratic supremacy of God, have held that the ultimate norm of what is right and wrong is simply the good pleasure of God. The eternal law, as seen from the intellectualist position, is not arbitrary or whimsical, nor can it be divorced from the nature of things. The eternal law is reducible ultimately not to the divine will but to the divine intellect. It is the plan and pattern of created nature as God’s intellect sees this in His vision of Himself. Consequently, the sinner who deviates from the eternal law does violence to his individual nature and to the created order of things of which he is a part. For the voluntarist, the eternal law is a barricade or a leash confining the liberty of individual men who are constrained through fear to observe it. It is much easier from the intellectualist position to love God’s law because the intellectualist sees in it a sorely needed gift that God in His mercy has dispensed to men. It is easier to see sin not only as a violation of God’s law, but as an act of self-mutilation and self-destruction. Man reaches his perfection and fulfillment in an orderly way by taking his place within God’s plan of love, which is manifest to him by the natural and the positive divine law. The voluntary act by which he withdraws from God’s plan and substitutes one of his own is sinful because it is the rejection in fact and in deed of God’s love. Thus the proportionate remedy for sin, whether it be described as repentance, reconciliation, remission, or justification, is the appreciative love of God, the act of perfect love, which also effects the restoration of the sinner to his proper place in creation, or to the state of grace.

It is possible to express the malice involved in mortal sin in various ways: it breaks the ties of love binding man to God and is the rejection of the divine goodness; as an aversion from God and a conversion to some created good in His place, it is a kind of idolatry; it involves contempt of God and of His precepts; it is an injustice to Him in denying Him His rights; it breaks the new covenant of mercy and love made by God through Jesus Christ (cf. Hebrews 10.28–29); it is an act of base ingratitude to God, who has been so good and generous to man.

The Question of the Philosophical Sin. The distinction between sin as an offense against God and sin as a violation of nature makes it possible for one to ask whether a sinner can be guilty of sin in the theological sense of the term if in sinning he is conscious only that his act is out of harmony with his rational nature. Such a person, according to an opinion advanced by François Musnier in 1686, would be guilty only of a philosophical sin, but not of an offense against God. This opinion was proscribed by Alexander VIII in 1690 as scandalous, temerarious, offensive to pious ears, and erroneous (Enchiridion symbolorum 2291). All theologians are agreed that, objectively speaking, all sin is sin in the theological sense. Whether this is also true of all sin, considered from the point of view of subjective responsibility, has been disputed by some authors. In the opinion of most theologians, who see the authority of God as the proximate basis of moral obligation, every sin, even when considered subjectively, must be a sin in the theological sense because in their opinion no true moral obligation can exist for one who does not know himself to be bound to the observance of moral law by the authority of God. Thus, if one can suppose that a man is invincibly ignorant of God's existence, he would not, in this view, be capable of moral action in the proper sense of the word, and however advanced he might be in years, he would be morally in the condition of a child who has not yet reached the age of reason. This was, for example, the opinion of L. Billot, who was willing to admit that there are many of adult age in that situation [De Deo uno (Rome 1931) 50]. However, the recognition of the authority of a divine lawmaker who is offended by sin need not be clear and explicit. It seems to be implicit in all true moral judgment.

Constitutive Elements. In every sin it is possible to distinguish two elements, one positive and the other negative, or, more exactly, privative. The positive element consists in the sinner's conversion to some created good, "good," that is, in the sense that it so attracts him that he prefers the satisfaction to be found in it to the divine good. Converting thus to a created good, the sinner by the same act turns away from God and is deprived of his orientation to God along with sanctifying grace and its attendant gifts. This "aversion" from God constitutes the privative element in sin. Which of the two elements is more formal in sin has been debated by theologians, the Thomists generally making the "conversion" the constitutive element and the Scotists holding that the privation is more formal. However, the more common Thomist opinion does not deny that the privative element belongs essentially to the sinful act, which would not indeed be a sinful conversion to a created good if it did not entail aversion from God and the privations associated with such aversion.

The distinction of these two elements helps to clarify the psychology of the sinful act, which would be difficult to explain if sin were simply the choice of evil and nothing else. Moreover, it provides an answer to the protest of the sinner who declares that he did not think about offending God when he gave himself up to his sinful deed. But he did seek an illicit good, one to which a privation is inseparably attached, and in doing this he indirectly intended the privation.

Distinction of Sins. The practice of sacramental confession, as required by Canon Law (1917 Codex Iuris Canonici c.901) and the Council of Trent (Enchiridion symbolorum 1679–81), requires the confession of all mortal sins committed after Baptism according to their kind and number. This practice makes the specific and numerical discrimination of sins a matter of practical importance to the Catholic theologian. The species of a sin is the kind, or class, into which sin falls, whereas the numerical distinction of sins is simply the number of distinct occurrences. Theologians distinguish two kinds of species: the moral and the theological. Moral species depends on the specific type of malice manifest in a sin and distinguishing it from other kinds of sin, as for example, theft is distinguished from blasphemy. The difference of theological species is based on the gravity of sins. There is one essential difference between sins in this respect, and thus there are two theological species, namely, mortal and venial.

The essentially distinguishing factor in the determination of the moral species for those who hold that the formal constitutive of sin is not the privative element but the positive conversion of the sinner to something illicit, is the object considered in the moral order, that is from a moral point of view. This includes not merely what is done (the finis operis), but also the sinner's purpose in doing it (the finis operantis), as well as the CIRCUMSTANCES that give a new kind of moral quality to what is done. That is not to say, however, that the motive or the circumstances change the moral character of what is done; blasphemy is blasphemy, and murder is murder, whatever be the motive. But the motive (or finis operantis) is itself an object of the will, and circumstances can so modify an object that it acquires a new kind of morality in addition to that which it has of itself. An act that is single in its physical entity can be multiple from a moral point of view. Thus the theft of a sacred object is at once an act of theft and an act of sacrilege. A lie told for the purpose of seduction is an offense against both veracity and chastity. For those who see the essence of sin to consist more formally in a privation, other norms had to be found to differentiate one sin from another. Some have based the distinction on opposition to different virtues, others on the difference of the laws or precepts violated.

The numerical distinction of sins, though relatively simple in principle, is sometimes complicated in the application of the principle, especially with regard to internal sins of thought and desire. The basic principle is that there are as many sins as there are morally distinct acts of the will.

Connection of Sins. Vices and a fortiori sinful acts are not interconnected in the same way as are the virtues. The acquired moral virtues, in their perfect state, are all connected in prudence, and the infused virtues are connected in charity, so that the possession of any one perfect virtue guarantees the possession of the others as well. Such is not the case where sins are concerned. Virtue tends to unify and focus all activity upon moral goodness; vice and sin, on the contrary, scatter and dissipate man's moral act. The morally good act is in conformity with the moral law. The possibility of variety in nonconformity or difformity is endless.

Some sins are opposed to others by a relationship of contrariety, for example, prodigality and miserliness, and one therefore is exclusive of the other. Moreover, the intention of the sinner is not directly to depart from the rule of reason or the law of God, but to realize something that he sees as good to himself. Sins would be interconnected if their objects were connected, but manifestly they are not.

Nevertheless, it must be admitted that there is some connection between sins. In some cases, what are virtually different sins are joined in the same act, as an offense against justice and one against chastity in the sin of adultery. Sometimes one sin can dispose a man to the commission of another of a different kind, as when drunkenness leads to quarreling. Some sins are the effects of other sins, as when pride begets envy, and in this way all the capital SINS have a numerous progeny. Again, by grievous sin the infused virtue of prudence is lost and acquired prudence is weakened, and because of this one becomes less capable of virtuous action and less able to stand firmly and constantly against the temptation to other sin. Furthermore, one who cuts himself off from the love of God and has overcome the fear of being separated from Him is deprived of a most effective motive against any sin, and may the more readily fall victim to temptation. Still one sin cannot be said to contain all others except in the sense that it disposes more or less remotely to their commission (St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 73.1).

Comparative Gravity of Sins. Not all sins are equal in their gravity. This is the teaching of the Scriptures (Jn 19.11; Ez 16.44–58; Jer 7.26; Lam 4.6) and of all Catholic theologians. Although sin consists in a privation, it is not a pure or total privation, but one that admits of more or less. The gravity of sin is measured objectively and specifically by the extent of the disorder and aversion caused by the sinful object and its consequences, and subjectively by the intensity of the will's act and the dispositions of the sinner.

First and foremost, the gravity of sin is measured against a scale of values in which God is highest; the substantial good of man, intermediate; and external goods, lowest. These values are secured and protected by the virtues, the comparative excellence of which is judged by reference to the same scale. It is possible and convenient, therefore, to measure the gravity of a sin by considering the comparative excellence of the virtue to which it is opposed and the manner of its opposition (e.g., by excess or by defect). Generally speaking, spiritual sins are more serious than carnal sins because the element of aversion from God is more pronounced in them and because they involve more directly the good of the soul, which is greater than the good of the body, and because, being less influenced by passion, they are less excusable. Whatever weakens the judgment of reason or lessens a sinner's liberty of action diminishes the gravity of a sin because it makes the act less voluntary.

Harmful consequences, to the extent that they are foreseen, also aggravate the gravity of a sin; and the dignity, character and reputation of the person sinning, as well as the person sinned against, may have a bearing on the seriousness of a sin. For example, other things being equal, venial sins, when indeliberate, are less serious in a person of greater, as compared with a person of lesser, virtue, because they have a greater element of the involuntary in them. Deliberate sins, however, are worse in a person of greater virtue, partly because they are less excusable, since virtue should make resistance to sin easier, and partly because there is more ingratitude to God and scandal to neighbor in them. The sin of defamation, on the other hand, committed by one known to be a liar, does less harm than it would if it were committed by a person with a reputation for veracity.

Subject of Sin. Under this heading theologians discuss the faculty or power to which sin is attributed as to a source or principle. It is, of course, the person who sins, not the part, or member, or faculty of the human composite. Nevertheless, an act proceeds from a person through the operation of some power or faculty; and inquiring into the subject of sin, theologians seek to identify the powers in which the sinful act can originate. Sin is found primarily in the will, which is the principle of all human action; when it is attributed to other powers, it is only as they are subject to voluntary control and yet retain in themselves a capacity for disordered activity. Sin is not attributed to the external members of the body that move in complete subjection to the will, for they are simply the instruments through which the commands of the will are put into effect. Besides the will itself, the sense appetite and reason qualify as subjects of sin inasmuch as in their activity they are subject to disorder that could and should be controlled. [See EMOTION (MORAL ASPECT); THOUGHTS, MORALITY OF.]

Internal Causes of Sin. Sin can be considered in two ways: materially, in its physical entity, or formally, in its defectiveness, its disorder, its disaccord with moral law. Sin viewed in its physical being must have a direct efficient cause, but the identification of the cause of what is formally evil in it is more difficult. Since the disorder of sin is not mere negation, but a privation of something that should be present, it requires a cause. Because evil as evil is not per se appetible, the activity of its cause will not be directed immediately to the evil, the disorder, of the sin, but rather to some positive goal that entails the privation and disorder. As a human act, sin must proceed from the will as from a cause. The will, “lacking the direction of the rule of reason and of the divine law, and intent upon some mutable good, causes the act of sin directly and the inordinateness indirectly and without intending it. The lack of order in the act results from the lack of direction in the will” (Aquinas, Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 75.1). This defect in the direction of the will can be caused by the defect in the will itself that is called malice, or by a defect of knowledge in the intellect called ignorance, or by a defect in the sense appetite called weakness.

Psychologically, choice by the will follows a judgment of reason on the goodness of the proposed object. This judgment may be vitiated by ignorance either of general principles or of the right application of principles. Very often, however, it is not in its speculative but its practical role that the mind fails. The judgment that precedes sin is a practical judgment, and it is influenced by factors operative here and now, existential in the truest sense of the word. Whatever colors the practical judgment influences the will and is in that sense a cause of sin. In particular, the emotional state of a man at any particular moment unconsciously and even consciously affects his estimate of the value of a proposed action. An angry or terrified man does not think and act like a tranquil one. He judges a thing according to the advantages it appears to offer him here and now, and this judgment so occupies his mind that he is distracted from the use of his moral knowledge.

Sins arising from neither passion nor ignorance are traceable to the malice of a will prepared deliberately to choose the disorder and spiritual loss involved in sin rather than forego some temporal satisfaction. Malice makes a sin graver, because it is a disposition of the will itself and is a more enduring source of disorder than passion.

External Causes. Factors external to the sinner himself may also contribute to his sin. In their consideration of the mystery of iniquity, theologians have given much attention to the question of God’s causality with respect to the sinful act of the creature. God, the Supreme Good, wills indirectly physical evil incidental to the total perfection of creation and the penal evil that is incidental to the fulfillment of divine justice, because these evils are not directly opposed to His honor and glory; but He cannot will the moral evil of sin in any way, because it is contradictory to His love. Just as He cannot make anything hating it, neither can He make anything to hate Him. All things come from Him, and are made to return to Him, not to move away from Him. Yet men do sin, and they could not do this without God’s help. Theologians distinguish between the physical entity of a sin, which comes from God as does the whole of created being and all its modes; and what is human in the sin, which is from God and from the free will; and what is defective, which is not from God in any way but from the defect of the creature. A radical defectibility is inevitable in the creature precisely because it is not an absolute. But God could preserve the creature from all sin. He has not willed to do this, but this fact cannot be understood to make Him the cause of what is formal in sin, because He does not owe such preservation to the creature. Moreover, the privation that is formal in sin requires for its explanation not an efficient but a deficient cause; in a sense it is something not caused rather than something caused. But God, as First Cause, lacks nothing. From no point of view can He be conceived as the cause—efficient, exemplary, or final—of the sinful disorder of the act of the will. (For the treatment of this problem in its proper context, see EVIL.)

The devil cannot be considered the cause of sin in the sense that he directly moves man’s will to sin. At most he is able to tempt men to sin by operating upon their internal senses, causing them to think of sinful things and to focus their attention on the desirability of illicit pleasures. Not all temptation need be explained in terms of diabolical activity, however; the world and the flesh can account for most of the temptations that men experience. In a general sense, nevertheless, because the devil was instrumental in causing original sin, which has left men prone to evil, he can be considered an indirect and partial cause of all sin.

Man can be the cause of sin in another by inducing him to sin by means of persuasion, suggestion, command, example, etc. (see SCANDAL), or by cooperating in his sin (see SIN, COOPERATION IN; for the causal influence of certain kinds of sin upon other sins, see DEADLY SINS).

Effects of Sin. The act of sin produces certain psychological, spiritual, and even physical effects, which, although foreseen, are not intended by the sinner. Theologians speak of the loss of both natural and supernatural good.

Man’s essential natural good, his existence, the integrity and essential capacity of his natural powers, is not lost in consequence of either original or personal sin. But the human good that consists in an inclination to virtue, a natural characteristic of a rational being, is lessened, but not completely destroyed, by sin. Some diminution of this good is a result in man of original sin. This wound in nature is not healed in man’s present state by sanctifying grace. Personal sin aggravates and deepens this wound, making further sin easier to commit and virtue more difficult to practice.

The principal effect of sin, however, is the loss of supernatural good and the incurrance of guilt. Mortal sin deprives the soul of sanctifying grace; and with the deprivation of grace, its attendant supernatural gifts, capacities, and privileges are lost. It is because of this that mortal sin is referred to as the “death” of the soul, which, in effect, ceases to have being on the supernatural level. GUILT is the state or condition of being at fault (reatus culpae) and so deprived of supernatural life, the absence of the splendor of which is a stain (macula peccati) on the soul, and also the state or condition of being liable to the penalty due in punishment for the fault (reatus poenae).

Venial Sin. The words “mortal” and “venial” in connection with sin are not found in the Scriptures, but the distinction between the two types of sin is clearly affirmed. There are sins that exclude from the kingdom (Eph 5.5; Gal 5.19–21) and sins that do not exclude from it (Jas 3.2; 1 Jn 1.8; Eccl 7.21). In the 4th century Jovinian claimed that all sins were equal and therefore deserving of the same punishment. St. Augustine took a strong stand against this doctrine [see J. Mausbach, Die Ethik des hl. Augustinus (Freiburg 1909)]. Wyclif, and after him Martin Luther, Calvin, and others among the Reformers, rejected the distinction so far at least as it supposed a difference in the sin rather than the sinner. Pius V in 1567 condemned a proposition of Baius repudiating the distinction (Enchiridion symbolorum 1920). The Council of Trent spoke of mortal sin, which the just man can avoid, and venial sin, which he cannot avoid without special grace (Enchiridion symbolorum 1573); of mortal sin that must be confessed in the Sacrament of Penance and venial sin that need not be confessed (Enchiridion symbolorum 1707); of mortal sin by which one falls from justice and venial sin by which the sinner does not cease to be just (Enchiridion symbolorum 1537).

According to St. Thomas Aquinas, the difference between mortal and venial sin follows upon the diversity of the disorders that constitute the essence of the sin. There are two kinds of such disorder, one that destroys the very principle of order and one that leaves the principle but introduces inordinateness among things consequent to it. The principle of the entire moral order is the last end. Hence when a soul is so disordered that it turns away from its last end, which is God, to whom it has been united by charity, there is mortal sin; and when there is disorder in the soul without its turning away from God, there is venial sin. St. Thomas likened the aversion from God in mortal sin to death, in which the principle of life is lost, and the disorder of venial sin to sickness, which is a repairable condition because the principle of life remains (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 72.5).

From this it is evident that the term sin is not applied univocally to mortal and venial sin as to two species contained under a common genus. The disorder involved in venial sin is different, and so also the offense to God, and it makes a man liable to quite a different penalty.

St. Thomas thought that venial sin was not so much against the law of God (contra legem) as outside the law (praeter legem) (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 88.1 ad 1). St. Thomas wanted, as did other outstanding theologians of his time, to include under the heading of sin as defined by St. Augustine only those acts in which the idea of sin was fully realized. The restrictive interpretation of these theologians was due to the severity of the early scholastics who thought that any voluntary and deliberate transgression of the divine will was worthy of eternal punishment. The later scholastics sought to get around the rigor of this doctrine by finding formulas that made venial sin seem something less than an outright violation of the divine law. Thus Scotus, for example, is alleged by some, although this is disputed by others, to have taught that venial sin is a violation of a counsel rather than a precept. St. Bonaventure and St. Albert the Great used the same formula as St. Thomas and declared that venial sin is not contra but praeter legem. However, they did not mean this in the sense that it was opposed to no law, but that it was not opposed to the law of charity that obliges one to love God above all things and to seek Him alone as a final end. A venial sin does not make it impossible for one to be intent upon God as an ultimate end. It disorders a man, not with respect to his end, but with respect to the means employed in the pursuit of his end. But if the law of God is understood in its full amplitude as it regards not only end but means, venial sin cannot be said to be only praeter legem.

Venial sin differs from mortal sin in the punishment due to it: it merits a temporal rather than an eternal penalty. It may be declared in confession, but need not be, for it can be expiated by many other remedies (Enchiridion symbolorum 1680). Venial sins dispose a man to mortal sin because, by inordinate preoccupation with means, he can become so attached to them that they begin to assume a major importance in his life, or because, being undisciplined in little things, he can grow bolder and become less ready to subject himself to God’s law in graver matters (Aquinas, Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 88.3). Nevertheless, venial sin does not directly cause a diminution of charity or of sanctifying grace (op. cit. 2a2ae, 24.10).

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 71–89; De ver. 15, 25, 28; De malo 2–5, 7–8. Commentaries on Thomas Aquinas, especially C. R. BILLUART, Summa Sancti Thomae, 10 v. (new ed. Paris 1874–86). Manuals of moral theology, especially B. H. MERKELBACH, Summa theologiae moralis (8th ed. Paris 1949) v.1. Various dissertations on special points. B. A.

BROWN, Numerical Distinction of Sins in Franciscan Schools (Washington 1948). E. F. DURKIN, The Theological Distinction of Sins in the Writings of St. Augustine (Mundelein, Illinois 1952). J. R. MALONEY, The Formal Constituent of a Sin of Commission (Somerset, Ohio 1947), bibliography. E. MOORE, Los principios constitutivos de la materia leve (Granada 1956). P. V. O'BRIEN, Emotions and Morals (New York 1950). V. RIMSELIS, Natura et peccatum (Rome 1952). W. E. ORCHARD, Modern Theories of Sin (London 1909). J. G. MCKENZIE, Guilt: Its Meaning and Significance (London 1962). Special treatises. P. LUMBRERAS, De vitiis et peccatis (Rome 1935). E. J. MAHONEY, Sin and Repentance (New York 1928), reprinted in the Teaching of the Catholic Church, ed. G. D. SMITH, 2 v. (New York 1948) 2:919–54. M. ORAISON et al., Sin, tr. B. MURCHLAND and R. MEYERPETER (New York 1962). J. REGNIER, What is Sin?, tr. U. MORRISSY (Westminster, Maryland 1961). H. RONDET, The Theology of Sin, tr. R. W. HUGHES (Notre Dame, Ind. 1960). P. PALAZZINI, Sin: Its Reality and Nature, tr. B. DEVLIN (Chicago 1964), 2 more v. by various authors proposed. For a survey, see P. SIMON, La Littérature du péché et de la grâce . . . depuis 1880 (Paris 1957). T. DEMAN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 12.1:140–275. For additional bibliography, see F. ROBERTI et al., Dictionary of Moral Theology, ed. P. PALAZZINI et al., tr. H. J. YANNONE et al. From 2d. Italian edition (Westminster, Maryland 1962) 1313–52.

[I. MCGUINNESS]

SIN, COOPERATION IN

Cooperation is an action or operation carried out jointly with another or others. Cooperation in sin consists in being a cause with another of a sinful action. A cooperator in sin gives aid to the sinful action of another. Cooperation in sin is not the same thing as giving scandal, for scandal does not give aid to the sinful action of another but rather merely influences his will, moving him to will something sinful (see SCANDAL). A scandalized person makes up his mind to sin only after scandal has been given; cooperation is given to one who has already decided to commit sin.

Cooperation in sin, then, is the action of aiding another in carrying out his sinful purpose. It presupposes the other's evil will and helps him to put it into execution. When the cooperation is in the sinful act itself of another, it is immediate cooperation. If the cooperation merely provides aid through other acts or objects not so immediately connected with the sin of another, the cooperation is said to be mediate. Mediate cooperation can be either proximate or remote. It is proximate when the action or aid given to the sinful action of another is intimately connected with that action, as is the help given by an anesthetist to a doctor performing a sinful operation. When the action is not so closely connected with the sin committed, it is remote cooperation. Thus, for example, the cooperation of a nurse who prepares the instruments to be used in the surgery is remote.

Moral theologians consider it important to distinguish also between formal and material cooperation. Cooperation is formal when the cooperator shares in some way in the intention and purpose of the sinner whom he assists. He can do this either by wanting the evil act performed and doing something to help bring it about or by making an unambiguous contribution to the performance of the act, that is, by contributing help that of its nature has no other purpose than to make the sin possible or to facilitate its commission, for example, to fetch and set up a ladder when a burglar asks this help in order to gain entrance to a house. In this case the cooperator cannot reasonably disavow a part in the intention of the thief.

Cooperation is material when it avoids participation in the evil intention of the sinner. The material cooperator does not want the sinful action to take place, and there is an ambiguity about what he actually does. His assistance may in fact contribute to the sin, but it is not of its nature or in the circumstances exclusively ordained to the commission of the sin. To sell a bottle of whiskey may contribute to the drunkenness of the one who buys it; but whiskey has other than sinful uses, and the shopkeeper does not necessarily enter into the intentions of his customers who want to intoxicate themselves.

Formal cooperation in the sin of another is always sinful because it involves, virtually at least, a sharing in a sinful purpose. Material cooperation, on the other hand, is considered permissible under certain conditions, namely, that the action of the material cooperator is not evil in itself, that his intention is good, and that he has a proportionately grave reason for doing something that may contribute in some way to the sin of another. The rendering of any aid whatever to the commission of sin is a thing to be avoided; but if the aforesaid conditions are verified, the principle of DOUBLE EFFECT is applicable, and an action can be performed even though it is foreseen that an evil effect may ensue. If it were obligatory to avoid material cooperation in such circumstances, it would be because of the duty in charity to prevent another's wrongdoing; but one is not bound to this at the cost of serious inconvenience to himself.

In estimating the proportionate gravity of the reason for cooperating materially in the sin of another, the immediacy or mediacy, the proximate or remoteness, of the influence of the cooperation upon the sin should be taken into consideration, as well as the necessity of the cooperation to the commission of the sin. Obviously it requires a less grave reason to justify the doing of something that only mediately and remotely lends aid in the commission of sin than something that is proximately and immediately involved in the sinful act. Similarly, a form of cooperation readily available from other sources would be easier to justify than cooperation that no other could supply.

Although it is possible to justify material cooperation in sin in some circumstances, it is not always clear in concrete cases that the conditions necessary for licit cooperation are verified. The goodness of a particular action may be open to doubt, and the sufficiency of the reason that calls for cooperation may be questionable. Moreover, it sometimes requires wisdom and prudence to determine how closely the cooperation touches the sinful action, how necessary the cooperation is to the commission of the sin. Because personal interest may intervene to distort an individual's judgment upon such a matter, it is generally advisable for one who finds himself perplexed with a problem regarding cooperation to seek the advice of a prudent counselor, e.g., his confessor.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa Theologiae 2a2ae, 78.4. ALPHONSUS LIGUORI, Theologia moralis, ed. L. GAUDÉ, 4 v. (new ed. Rome 1905–12) 2.59–80. D. M. PRÜMMER, Manuale theologiae moralis, ed. E. M. MÜNCH, 3 v. (Freiburg-Barcelona 1955). N. NOLDIN, Summa theologiae moralis (Innsbruck 1961–62) 2:116–129. H. DAVIS, Moral and Pastoral Theology (New York 1958) 1:341–352. E. DUBLANCHY, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 3.2:1762–70.

[F. E. KLUEG]

SIN, OCCASIONS OF

An occasion of sin is circumstance of person, place, or thing, extrinsic to the potential sinner involved, that draws him to sin and gives him an opportunity of committing it. Inclinations toward sin found within a man, such as bad habits and passions, because they are intrinsic to himself, are thus not what a moral theologian would call occasions of sin. Nor is an occasion to be confused with a danger of sin. A danger of sinning is more general and includes various internal dispositions, such as temptations, natural weakness, and the like, that can exist independently of any "occasion" as the term is here understood.

An occasion of sin is said to be remote or proximate, according to the degree of influence it exercises on the person whose sin it may occasion. If the attraction it exerts is not strong, or there is only a relatively small probability of its leading to sin, the occasion is remote; if the attraction is powerful, or the probability of sin is serious, the occasion is proximate. Remote occasions abound in the lives of most people, and there is no obligation to try to avoid them. An occasion of sin can be proximate for everyone and in that case is called an absolute proximate occasion. Other occasions are proximate only for certain individuals because of their weaknesses and particular dispositions, and these are said to be relative.

The relative frequency of lapses in the exposure to a certain occasion that requires its classification as proximate is a matter of dispute among theologians. Some are of the opinion that one must fall more frequently than not in a particular type of occasion before it becomes proximate. Others hold that fewer lapses would suffice to make the occasion proximate, agreeing with St. Alphonsus that if an individual sins four out of ten times in a given situation, that situation should be considered a proximate occasion of sin for him. All agree, however, that it is imprudent for a person to place himself in an occasion in which he frequently sins.

A proximate occasion of sin may be freely and voluntarily entered upon, or it may be necessary in the sense that it cannot be avoided, or at least cannot be avoided without serious difficulty. Thus, if they are occasions of sin, reading certain books, frequenting particular places, associating with particular people would, generally speaking, be considered voluntary occasions. Military service, living at home or in prison, on the other hand, may be necessary or unavoidable occasions.

Everyone is under a grave obligation to avoid proximate occasions of grave sin as far as that is possible. To remain without sufficient reason in a proximate occasion of serious sin implies a willingness to commit that sin. As long as a person freely remains in, or will not undertake to avoid such an occasion, he is not properly disposed for absolution, for he lacks the firm PURPOSE of amendment essential to CONTRITION. Just as it is evil to expose oneself needlessly to the risk of grave injury or physical death, so is it seriously sinful to expose oneself needlessly to spiritual death through mortal sin.

As to necessary or unavoidable occasions, it should be noted that the necessity that characterizes them is not a necessity of sinning but a necessity of remaining in the physical situation that has been or could be a proximate occasion of sin. When a person is confronted with such a necessity, he should take steps to reduce the probability of sin by arming himself against the dangers inherent in the situation. This course can so alter the occasion that it ceases to be proximate and becomes remote. Spiritual means of effecting this change include a frequent reception of the Sacraments of Penance and the Eucharist, prayer, mortification, and reflection that tends to activate one's love of God and to increase one's awareness of the evil of sin and of its consequences. In addition to these spiritual countermeasures, ingenuity can often discover physical means of one kind or another, depending on the nature of the occasion, to make the danger of sin more remote.

Bibliography: E. THAMIRY, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 11.1:905–915. B. MERKELBACH, Questiones de variis poenitentium categoriis (Liège 1928). M. FÁBREGAS, “De obligatione vitandi probabile periculum peccandi,” Periodica de re morali canonica liturgica 30 (1941) 20–45. J. C. FORD and G. A. KELLY, Contemporary Moral Theology, v. 1 (Westminster, MD 1958) 141–173.

[F. E. KLUEG]

SIN AGAINST THE HOLY SPIRIT

Unlike all other sins and blasphemies (Mk 3.28), the “blasphemy against the Holy Spirit” that is mentioned in Mt 12.31–32; and Lk 12.10 is characterized by Jesus as unforgivable (Mk 3.29). According to Mark’s explanation (Mk 3.30), certain scribes committed this sin by attributing the works that Jesus had done by the Holy Spirit’s power to an unclean spirit. The same saying is found in Lk 12.10b among a group of disconnected sayings, addressed, however, not to the scribes, but to the disciples (Lk 12.1). Matthew, in a context similar to Mark’s (cf. Mt 12.24), has two versions in tandem; cf. Mt 12.31 with Mk 3.28–29 and Mt 12.32 with Lk 12.10.

The Fathers of the Church and later the theologians were concerned to identify this blasphemy or sin, to apply the concept to sins analogous to it, and to account for the unforgivableness of these sins. St. Augustine, who found great difficulty in the scriptural passages referring to this sin (see Sermo 2 de verbis Domini, 5), understood the irremissibility to be absolute. Now the only sin to which absolute irremissibility can be attributed is final impenitence; even God cannot forgive an unrepented sin, and this Augustine understood to be the sin against the Holy Spirit. Subsequent theologians followed him in this to the extent that they generally admitted that final impenitence is a sin against the Holy Spirit, although they usually added others to the category. This view, however, need not be understood in contradiction to a more literal interpretation of the specific malicious act that Jesus called blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, i.e., the insult to the Holy Spirit committed by those who attributed His works to an unclean spirit. St. Augustine was more concerned with explaining why the sin was unforgivable, and the reason for this was that the Pharisees would have no change of heart, but would obdurately continue in their sin until death. However, the final impenitence of one dying with other kinds of sin unrepented would also be a sin against the Holy Spirit in the sense that it would frustrate the remission of sins, a work appropriated to the Holy Spirit.

Later theologians extended the concept of this sin by including under the heading certain sins that are unforgivable only in the sense that they put an obstacle in the way of forgiveness, but they do not make its attainment impossible because the obstacle is not such that it cannot be overcome by the grace of God. The obstacle arises from one of two sources.

(1) Some sins are committed with no extenuating circumstances to call for or to make appropriate a remission of the penalty. They leave the sinner, so to speak, with no grounds for appeal to the divine clemency. Three inner sources or causes of sin were recognized by the medieval scholastic theologians: ignorance; passion or weakness; and deliberate malice (certa malitia). Sins caused by human weakness or frailty, and those caused by ignorance have a certain element of excusability lacking to the sin that comes of pure malice. Sins of weakness, because weakness is opposed to power, were said to be against the Father, to whom power was appropriated; sins of ignorance were against the Son, to whom, as the Word of God, wisdom and knowledge were appropriated; and sins of malice were against the Holy Spirit, to whom goodness was appropriated. Thus sins ex certa malitia came in medieval theology to be associated or even identified with the sin against the Holy Spirit, but they were thought to be unforgivable only in the sense that no extenuating circumstance appealed to the divine mercy for forgiveness; but this by no means made it impossible for the divine mercy to move the sinner gratuitously to repentance and so to pardon.

(2) Other sins were accounted unpardonable (in a limited sense) because, of their nature, they choked off or put a stop to efforts on the part of the sinner that might bring him to repentance and forgiveness, or cut him off from access to God. Thus, just as an illness would be fatal if it impeded one from taking the measures necessary to stay alive, so presumption and despair, or the deliberate rejection of divine truth, or the repudiation of the workings of grace, can be considered irremediable in the sense that they close the way to God through whom forgiveness could be had. Such a sin is “against the Holy Spirit” because it opposes the working of the Spirit.

Thus in medieval theology the sin against the Holy Spirit came to be considered as a genus containing, in the listing of Peter Lombard, six species. These are: despair, presumption, impenitence or a firm determination not to repent, obstinacy, resisting divine truth known to be such, and envy of another’s spiritual welfare.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa Theologiae 2a2ae, 14.3; In 2 sent. 43.1.2. T. DEMAN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 12.1:199. G. MANISE, F. ROBERTI et al., Dictionary of Moral Theology, ed. P. PALAZZINI et al., tr. H. J. YANNONE et al., from 2d Ital. Ed. (Westminster, MD 1962) 1138.

[P. K. MEAGHER/C. BERNAS]

SIN OFFERING (IN THE BIBLE)

A form of expiatory sacrifice prescribed by the Pentateuchal PRIESTLY WRITERS of the Old Testament (Heb. ḥattā't). The date of its origin is not known with certainty, but Ezekiel mentions it as a familiar practice (Ez 40.39; 42.13), a fact that disproves a postexilic origin. Its purpose was to make expiation [see EXPIATION (IN THE BIBLE)] for material, not formal, sin [see SIN (IN THE BIBLE)], i.e., infractions against God's commandments or against the laws of ritual purity (see PURE AND IMPURE). For a sin committed with a "high hand" (defiantly) there could be no atonement by a sin offering. The distinction between a sin offering and a guilt offering (Heb. 'āšām) was not always clear (cf. Lv 5.17–19 with Nm 15.22–29), and at times the expiatory rite was called indifferently either a sin offering or a guilt offering (e.g., Lv 14.10–20; Nm 6.9–12).

Chapters 4 and 5 of Leviticus enumerate the different victims to be offered by various classes of the people. A priest and the whole community must offer a bull (Lv 4.3, 14); a ruler, a male goat (4.23); the ordinary citizen, a female goat (4.28); the poor, two turtledoves or two pigeons (5.7); and the destitute, a very small amount of flour (5.11). No one was exempt from offering at least some small sacrifice in expiation for his sin.

The place for expiatory sacrifice was the forecourt of the TENT OF MEETING on the north side of the altar. The slaughtering was performed by the offerer (an indication of the primitiveness of the practice), except for national offerings (2 Chr 29.24). The offerer's action of placing his hands on the head of the victim was not intended (contrary to an opinion that has now been almost universally abandoned) to signify the transfer of the sin to the victim, for this would only have made the victim impure and, therefore, unsuitable for sacrifice. The action signified rather that the offerer initiated the sacrificial rite and thus confessed his guilt and sorrow. The manipulation of the sacrificial blood (see BLOOD, RELIGIOUS SIGNIFICANCE OF) formed the most important part of the sin offering, since Yahweh Himself had designated it as a proper means for cleansing the person, place, or thing made unclean even by inadvertent sin, thus for reestablishing communion with the holy God (Lv 17.11). On the Day of ATONEMENT (Yom Kippur) the Holy of Holies was entered and the sacrificial blood of the national sin offering was sprinkled on the ark of the covenant, where Yahweh was invisibly enthroned, in order to have it come as close to Him as possible in its cleansing power.

In the New Testament Christ is identified as the ultimate sin offering in Rom 8.1–4; 2 Cor 5.20–21, and especially throughout the Epistle to the Hebrews (see Heb 10.1–18).

See Also: SACRIFICE, III (IN ISRAEL); SACRIFICE, IV (IN CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY).

Bibliography: R. DE VAUX, Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions, tr. J. MCHUGH (New York 1961) 418–421. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, translated and adapted by L. HARTMAN (New York, 1963) 2239–41. L. MORALDI, Espiazione sacrificale e riti espiatori. . . (Analecta Biblica 5; Rome 1956) 133–157.

[R. J. KUJAWA]

SINAI, MOUNT

The mountain of revelation, called Mt. HOREB in the Deuteronomic source, where Moses received the revelation of the Law and the people of Israel entered into solemn covenant with Yahweh. It is traditionally located at the southern end of the Sinai Peninsula.

The origin and meaning of the name Sinai (Heb. sînai) is uncertain. Some scholars connect it with the Hebrew word sneh, which is translated as bush in the account of the vision that Moses had of the bush that was aflame but not consumed by the fire (Ex 3.1–4). Actually, in this passage the place of the vision is not called Sinai, but "Horeb, the mountain of God." Other suggestions are that the name Sinai is connected with that of the Babylonian moon-god Sin or that it is related to the Desert of Sin to the northeast. Not only the mountain but the surrounding desert is called Sinai in the Old Testament. The name is now used also for the peninsula or triangle of desert land that lies between the south of Palestine, the Suez arm of the Red Sea, and the Gulf of Aqaba. This peninsula, an area of about 10,000 square miles, was the scene of most of the 40-year wandering of the Israelites after the Exodus from Egypt. At its southern point is a group of dominating peaks, the highest of which are Jebel Serbāl (6,759 feet), Jebel Katerîn (8,652 feet), Jebel Mûsā (7,497 feet). The Egyptians considered these mountains sacred from antiquity.

Although most scholars agree that the traditional identification of Mt. Sinai with Jebel Mûsā (Mountain of Moses), attested as early as c. A.D. 400 by the pilgrim Silvia, is correct, the location has been doubted by some. Because of Moses' dealings with the Midianites and because of the volcanic activity of the mountain El Bedr in Midianite territory to the east of the Gulf of Aqaba, J. Garstang identified Sinai with this mountain. J. Wellhausen, relying on his interpretation of Dt 33.2, "The Lord came from Sinai and dawned from Seir upon us," as well as for other reasons drawn from literary criticism, put the place of the revelation of the Law at Cades, and not at Sinai. Some, therefore, have identified Mt. Sinai with Jebel Helal, a hill to the west of Cades. Most scholars, however, agree on regarding Rās es-Şafşafeh (6,937 ft), one of the twin peaks of Jebel Mûsâ, as the mountain of the Ten Commandments. Râs es-Şafşafeh accords well with the data found in Exodus. The mile-and-a-half plain at the foot of the mountain would have been ideal for the year's encampment that the Israelites, with their herds and flocks, made at Sinai.

Moses receiving the Ten Commandments. (Archive Photos)

In the 6th century, the Byzantine Emperor Justinian the Great had the Monastery of St. Catherine built on the shady northern slope of Jebel Mûsâ, the traditional site of the burning bush. This monastery, with its ancient manuscripts and priceless works of art, still remains as a relic of an age long passed. Because of the monastery's isolation, its icons escaped the iconoclastic ravages of the 8th century. Its collection of manuscripts, more than 3,000 of them, are written in Greek, Arabic, Syriac, Georgian, Slavonic, and other languages. The renowned Bible manuscript, Codex Sinaiticus, dating from the 4th century, was found there by C. Tischendorf in 1844.

Bibliography: G. E. WRIGHT, The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible (Nashville 1962) 4:376–378. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, translated and adapted by L. HARTMAN (New York, 1963) 2232–33. M. J. LAGRANGE, “Le Sinâï biblique,” Revue Biblique 8 (1899) 369–392. F. M. ABEL, Géographie de la Palestine, 2 v. (Paris 1933–38)1:391–396. D. BALY, The Geography of the Bible (New York 1957) 5–6. E. G. KRAELING, Rand McNally Bible Atlas (2d ed. New York 1962) 107–113. M. DU BUIT, Géographie de la Terre Sainte (Paris 1958) 111–115. G. H. FORSYTH, “Island of Faith in the Sinai Wilderness,” National Geographic Magazine 125 (1964) 82–106.

[C. MCGOUGH]

SINGAPORE, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Singapore is an island republic in Southeast Asia located at the tip of the Malay peninsula. The capital, Singapore City, is a major commercial center and one of the world's busiest ports. Written accounts of ancient Singapore are sketchy. It is featured in Javanese chronicles as an uninhabited island called Temasek. Its Sanskrit name, Singapura ("Lion City") had come into common use by the end of the fourteenth century. Sir Stamford Raffles gained possession of the island for the British in 1819 to secure its merchant fleet and forestall further advance of the Dutch in the area. The British developed the uninhabited island into a major entrepot harbor and military base. During the Second World War it was occupied by the Japanese; but in 1946, after the war, it became a British crown colony. In 1959 it became a self-governing state. In 1963 Singapore joined the Federation of Malaysia, but withdrew in 1965, becoming an independent republic within the British Commonwealth.

The history of the Catholic Church in Singapore began with British colonization in 1819. In 1821 a missionary in transit found some 12 Catholics, and in 1829 there were about 200. By the time the first bishop established a residence there in 1838 there were about 500. Portuguese missionaries arrived in Singapore in 1825, and a few years later the Paris Foreign Mission Society (MEP) sent missionaries who established places of worship and educational centers. One of them, Jean-Marie Beurel (1813–72), became known as the founder of Catholic Singapore. He built the Cathedral of the Good Shepherd, a school for boys staffed by the Brothers of the Christian Schools, and one for girls run by the Sisters of the Infant Jesus. From the beginning the Catholics came under two jurisdictions: Catholics of the Portuguese mission were under the Padroado archbishop of Macau, and those of the French mission under the the Vicar Apostolic of Ava and Pegu (Burma). In 1888, Singapore became part of the re-established Diocese of Melaka, with the exception of the existing Padroado mission in Singapore, which remained under the archbishop of Macau. In 1972 Pope Paul VI made Singapore a separate archdiocese under the direct jurisdiction of the Holy See. In 1977, the Bishop of Macau agreed to relinquish his authority over the Padroado mission in Singapore to the archbishop of Singapore, a decision which the Holy See ratified in 1981. Singapore belongs to the Catholic Bishops' Conference of Malaysia-Singapore-Brunei, itself a part of the Federation of Asian Bishops' Conferences. Religious congregations with the archdiocese support many schools, a hospital and a hospice, several nursing homes and a children's home. In 1989, at the direction of the Vatican, the St. Francis Xavier Major Seminary for the training of local clergy was officially opened. Pope John Paul II visited Singapore on Nov. 20, 1986. A multiracial crowd of 63,000 attended the Mass he celebrated in the National Stadium.

Capital: Singapore.

Size: 225 sq. miles.

Population: 4.3 million. About three-fourths of the population are ethnic Chinese, followed by Malays, Indians, Eurasians and others.

Languages: Chinese (official), Malay (official and national), Tamil (official), English (official).

Religions: More than half of the population observe a mix of Buddhism, Taoism and Confucian ancestor worship. Almost one-fifth of the population are Muslims, predominantly of the Sunni School. Hinduism and Sikhism are practiced mainly by the small ethnic Indian community. Christians constitute a small but significant minority, counting about one-tenth of the population as adherents. Almost 90% of the Christians are ethnic Chinese. Protestants outnumber Catholics by two-to-one.

Archdiocese: Singapore.

Bibliography: CATHOLIC BISHOPS' CONFERENCE OF MALAYSIA-SINGAPORE-BRUNEI, Official Catholic Church Directory (published annually).

[J. FERNANDEZ/EDS.]

SINGIDUNUM, MARTYRS OF

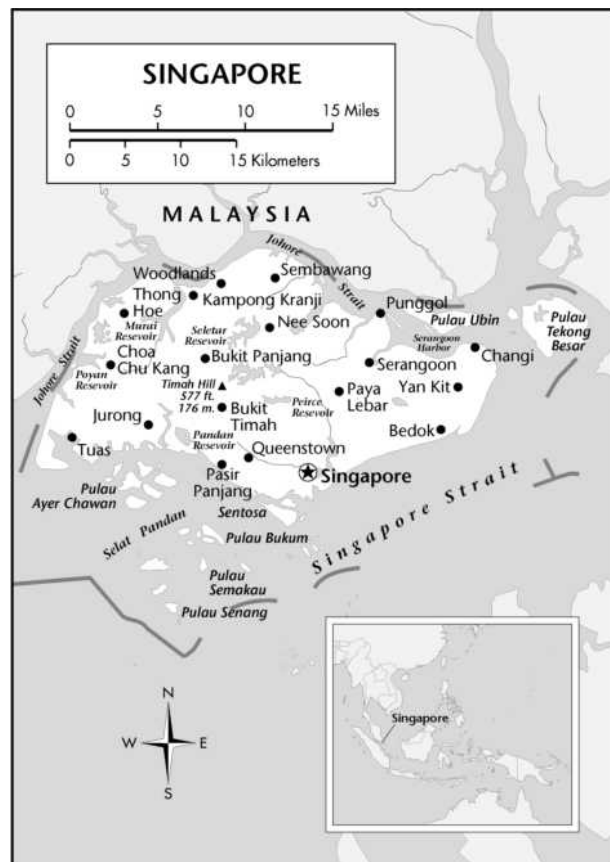

SS. Hermylus and Stratonicus are connected with the ancient city of Singidunum near Belgrade and were martyred during the persecution of Licinius (308–323). The passio narrating their ordeal is untrustworthy except as a source for their names and as witness to their early cult. Two further martyrs, Montanus and Maxima, are associated with Singidunum, but they were decapitated in SIRMIUM. A church in Constantinople was erected in honor of St. Stratonicus. Among the Greeks, Hermylus and Stratonicus are commemorated on January 13; but the Martyrology of St. Jerome mentions St. Hermylus on August 2.

Bibliography: Analecta Bollandiana 31 (1912) 254–257. H. DELEHAYE, Les Origines du culte des martyrs (2d ed. Brussels 1933).

[A. PENNA]

SINNER, HABITUAL

One who has a habit of committing a specific sin and, by repeated lapses, has developed a strong inclination to it. The presence of a habit is indicated by frequent and regular moral failures of the same kind. It is impossible, however, to classify a person as a habitual sinner simply on the basis of the number of lapses, because circumstances make each individual case different. Moralists agree that as a general rule sins committed once a week are to be considered habitual, except where grosser sins are concerned, in which case a sin committed as often as once a month might be considered habitual. A habit of sinning can be contracted more easily in some matters than in others; for example, where gluttony, lust, blasphemy, or cursing are concerned, notable pleasures or strong emotions may be involved that cause the habit to be formed more quickly and to resist more stubbornly the breaking of it.

The effect of habit upon the morality of the vicious act that comes of it may be either to mitigate or to aggravate its malice. As a consequence of the force of passion that often plays a part in habitual sin, the sinner's freedom and responsibility is often diminished, and so also the malice of what he does. When the sinful habitual disposition, voluntarily acquired, is voluntarily retained, even the impetus of passion does not lessen the malice of the act, for this is itself voluntary, and as such indicates a will bent with greater determination upon evil. In this sense St. Thomas Aquinas could say that whoever sins out of habit sins ex certa malitia (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 78.2).

Since habit is something learned, i.e., acquired by learning, it can be unlearned. That is to say, it can be reduced or even eliminated by learning. Since a sinful habit is a cause of sin, a penitent has an obligation to rid himself of the habit, or at least to have the sincere intention of doing so. This intention should include the purpose of taking whatever steps are necessary to overcome the inclination to sin that he has acquired. Hence, the habitual sinner may be absolved if he shows signs that he is truly contrite and has a firm purpose of amendment. Repeated lapses after repentance are not a certain indication that these necessary conditions were lacking. Just as a sinner's repudiation of his sin is possible, so also is his later repudiation of a repentance that was sincere at the time it was made. Moreover, when a sinful habit has been sincerely repudiated by the will, the disposition to repeat the sinful act that may remain after repentance is involuntary, and as such is no longer a vice, or a sinful habit, in the full sense of the term. If the penitent through weakness falls back into his sin, the existence of the involuntary disposition is a mitigating circumstance unless he also falls back into a voluntary acquiescence in his inclination to sin.

In dealing with a habitual sinner, and in distinguishing him from a recidivist, a confessor will look especially for a willingness on the part of the penitent to use the means by which the habit can be broken.

Bibliography: H. DAVIS, Moral and Pastoral Theology, rev. and enl. ed. by L. W. GEDDES (New York 1958) 3:286–288, D. M. PRÜMMER, Manuale theologiae moralis, ed. E. M. MÜNCH, 3 v. (Freiburg-Barcelona 1955) 1:62. N. HALLIGAN, The Administration of the Sacraments (New York 1963) 260–261. T. ORTOLAN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 6:2.2016–19; 2019–26.

[F. E. KLUEG]

SINNICH, JOHN

Jansenist theologian at Louvain; b. Cork, 1603; d. Louvain, May 8, 1666. He matriculated at Louvain in 1624, received his master's degree on Oct. 2, 1625, and his doctorate in theology on Sept. 27, 1639, at the time of the printing in Louvain of Jansenius's Augustinus. Sinnich collaborated in this publication, providing the table of contents, and indices for the three volumes. He was a Jansenist from the inception of the movement, and profited by this fact. In 1641 he became president of the College of the Holy Spirit; and was made a member of the faculty of theology in 1642. In 1643 he became semestral rector of the university, and was several times dean of the faculty of theology. His Augustinian convictions strengthened his stubborn defense of Jansenius. To this end he spent three years in Rome (1643–45). He also took part in the Jansenist controversy through pamphlets, often published anonymously. His best-known work is the Sanctorum Patrum Trias (series 1; 1648). In Goliathismus profligatus (Louvain 1657), he became an apologist against Protestantism. His Saulus Exrex (2 v. Louvain 1666–67) is a sort of manual for Catholic princes. In volume one, he inserted a long diatribe against laxism. His name occurs several times in the Index librorum prohibitorum.

St. Andrews Cathedral, Singapore. (©Robert Holmes/CORBIS)

Bibliography: F. DEININGER, Johannes Sinnich: Der Kampf der Löwener Universität gegen den Laxismus (Düsseldorf 1928). H. WILLEMS, “Les Publications du Père Lucien Ceyssens concernant le jansénisme,” Augustiniana 13 (1963) 55–56. J. CARREYRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 14.2:2165–66.

[L. CEYSSENS]

SINZIG, PEDRO

Editor in Brazil; b. Linz, Germany, Jan. 29, 1876; d. Düsseldorf, Sept. 12, 1952. Having completed his studies in the humanities, he went to Brazil in 1893, was ordained (1898), and as a member of the Franciscan province of the Immaculate Conception began an intense apostolate throughout Brazil. Sinzig was a pioneer in all Catholic cultural activities in his adopted land. He founded or edited 12 periodicals, including A Resposta, A Tela, Vozes, Beija Flor, and A União (with Felício dos Santos). Another journal, Música Sacra (1941), which he founded and edited, was one of his contributions to music; others were his Dicionário Musical (1947), Sei Compor (1946), and O Organista. He also organized and taught influential summer courses in the Pro-Arte Brasil. Sinzig’s novels, among them Não desanimar (1912) and Pela Mão de uma Menina (1913), are noteworthy, as are such critical studies as Caricatura na Imprensa Brasileira (1911), Em Plena Guerra (1912), and Através dos Romances (1928). In 60 years of intense apostolic activity, this authentic Christian humanist made unique contributions to the religious and cultural life of Brazil.

Bibliography: P. SINZIG, Reminiscências d'um Frade (Petrópolis 1911). L. L. BEUTENMUELLER, Frei Pedro Sinzig, O.F.M. (Petrópolis 1955). R. KOEPE, "Em memória de Frei Sinzig, O.F.M.," Música Sacra 13 (1953) 2–4. F. M. KOHNEN, "Frei Sinzig Pedro Sinzig, O.F.M., o pionero," Vozes de Petrópolis 11 (1953) 1–18.

[A. STULZER]

SIOUX CITY, DIOCESE OF

The diocese of Sioux City (Sioupolitana), Iowa, was established Jan. 15, 1902. A suffragan of the Metropolitan See of Dubuque, it embraces the 24 northwest counties of Iowa, an area of 14,518 square miles.

History. Catholics first settled in the area around the middle of the nineteenth century. The first Catholic service was celebrated in November of 1850 by a Jesuit missionary, Father Christian Hoecken. Dubuque's first bishop, Mathias Loras, assigned the first resident pastor to northwest Iowa in 1857 at Corpus Christi Parish of Fort Dodge. From 1850 to 1920, as the agricultural frontier moved across the Midwest, Northwest Iowa received many thousands of European immigrants. The earliest were Irish, and about 75 Irish-born priests served during the era. The numbers of Irish were rivaled only by the Germans, and several towns contained both English-speaking and Germanic parishes. Other nationalities of Catholic immigrants, several of which formed ethnic parishes, were French, Bohemian, Polish, Italian, Syrian, Lithuanian, Croatian, and Luxembourger. After the 1980s, the diocesan Catholic population became more diverse, with the immigration of significant numbers of Vietnamese, Laotian, Cambodian, and Hispanic immigrants.

Bishops. The first bishop of the Diocese of Sioux City, Philip Joseph Garrigan (1840–1919), an Irish immigrant, had served as the first vice-rector of The CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA, Washington, D.C., before being named as the first Bishop of Sioux City, May 25, 1902. The newly established diocese had a Catholic population of about 50,000 served by 116 parishes (84 with resident priests). During his administration, the number of schools doubled, and three of every four children were enrolled in Catholic schools.

Irish-born Bishop Edmond Heelan (1868–1948) spent nearly his entire priestly life in Sioux City. He was appointed auxiliary to Bishop Garrigan in 1918 and succeeded to the See on March 8, 1920, after Garrigan's death. Bishop Heelan witnessed the slowing of the flow of immigrants and the hardships brought by world and national events in the wake of World War I, but carried on the expansion of parishes, missions, and schools begun by Garrigan. He also helped establish Briar Cliff College in Sioux City in 1929.

Joseph Maximilian Mueller (1894–1981), a native of St. Louis, was named coadjutor in 1947 and became the Ordinary of the diocese on Sept. 20, 1948. Bishop Mueller was widely recognized for the bold and highly successful consolidation of high schools, and a tremendous building campaign of parish plants. He also founded the diocesan newspaper, The Globe.

Frank Greteman (1907–1987) was consecrated as auxiliary bishop of Sioux City on May 26, 1965, at the Cathedral of the Epiphany in Sioux City, and became the Ordinary in 1970. Born in Willey, Iowa, he was the first priest native to northwest Iowa to become a bishop and the first Iowa priest to serve his home diocese as bishop. Bishop Greteman completed the consolidation of the diocesan high schools and carried out re-organization of the diocesan elementary schools.

The Episcopal ordination of Bishop Lawrence Soens (born 1926), a native of the Diocese of Davenport, took place on Aug. 17, 1983, at the Cathedral of the Epiphany. He established and expanded many religious programs in the diocese. Upon Soens' retirement, Bishop Daniel DiNardo (born 1949), a native of the Diocese of Pittsburgh, was ordained for the diocese on Oct. 7, 1997, and became the sixth Ordinary in 1998.

[R. RODER]

SIOUX FALLS, DIOCESE OF

The diocese of Sioux Falls (Siouxormensis) comprises about 35,000 square miles lying east of the Missouri River in the state of SOUTH DAKOTA. It is a suffragan of the metropolitan See of ST. PAUL-MINNEAPOLIS. In the 1880s, the Benedictine missionary bishop, Martin Marty, OSB, who had served as vicar apostolic of Dakota Territory since 1879, left Yankton for Sioux Falls, choosing the latter as his See because he rightly assumed that it would become and remain the state's largest city. The diocese was erected in 1889 when the Territory was divided into and admitted to the Union as North and South Dakota. Ill health prompted Marty's transfer to the bishopric of St. Cloud just over a year before his death in 1896 at the age of 62. He had burned out as a circuit rider throughout the Territory's vast expanse (77,000 square miles) where he traveled constantly by horseback and wagon in all kinds of inclement weather to visit the far-flung Indian reservations, and the 150 towns and villages where his parishioners needed his attention.

Marty was succeeded in Sioux Falls by Thomas O'Gorman, who died in 1921. Bernard J. Mahoney then served the diocese until his death in 1939 when William O. Brady succeeded him. Brady became Archbishop of St. Paul in 1956, dying in 1961 in Rome while preparing for Vatican Council II as one of the papal consultants. Lambert Hoch served as bishop from 1956 until his retirement in 1978 when he was succeeded by Paul Dudley. His successor, Robert J. Carlson was consecrated in 1994.

The diocese has 144 priests, and 35 permanent deacons serving 151 parishes and nine Catholic hospitals. A record 33 men are studying in out-of-state seminaries. There are two Catholic colleges, Mount Marty, in Yankton, sponsored by the Benedictine Sisters who opened the school in 1936, made it co-ed in 1969 and now boasts over 1,000 students on three campuses and in classes at Yankton's Federal Prison Camp. The Presentation Sisters first opened a junior college in Mitchell in 1922, transferring it to Aberdeen in 1951 where it became a four-year college. Courses are also offered in a branch school on a reservation.

Several motherhouses of women and one of men are located in the diocese. The Benedictines in the Yankton monastery (150 nuns) were a Swiss group who had settled first in Maryville, Missouri. They had responded to Marty's call to assist him in the Native American ministry in what became North and South Dakota. Their novitiate was moved from Zell to Yankton where it opened in 1887. Later Bishop O'Gorman asked them relocate in Vermillion so that the first Catholic hospital, Benedictine-sponsored, could be opened in their Yankton monastery. Eventually the nuns returned in 1908 to their permanent residence on Mount Marty—continuing to staff Sacred Heart Hospital and dozens of parish schools, their own high school and later also a college. In 1961 a daughter-house (Mother of God Monastery) was opened in Pierre, which later transferred to Watertown.

The Presentation Sisters originated in Ireland. They came to the Territory originally in 1880, later transferred to Fargo, North Dakota. Some Sisters returned when, in 1882, Bishop Marty and a pastor, Father Robert Haire, requested their assistance in Aberdeen. They opened a school there and later a hospital when, continuing the health care they had begun when an epidemic prompted them to minister to the sick brought to their convent. They also staffed a nursing school there, admitting the first men to enroll in 1942 during World War II. A four-year School of Nursing is now a department in their college.

Franciscan Sisters from North Dakota opened a convent at Gettysburg in 1970. They later transferred to Mitchell. The community of Oblates of the Blessed Sacrament, a branch of Mother Katharine Drexel's Pennsylvania congregation, was established in 1935 by the Benedictine missionary, Father Sylvester Eisenman, who arranged the admission of seven young Native American women to be admitted as postulants to the new religious community at Marty Mission near Wagner. It was 1949 before it was formally established as a religious congregation. The Oblates also serve the Native American population in Rapid City where home visits to those in need constitute their ministry. Other schools for Native American children are located in Chamberlain—under the supervision of the Sacred Heart Fathers from Hales Corners, Wis., and Stephan, formerly staffed by the Benedictine nuns and monks. The Benedictine nuns of Yankton and the Presentation Sisters of Aberdeen have recently united in co-sponsoring the major Catholic hospitals and care centers in the diocese, institutions which they had established and formerly community-sponsored. They operate under the umbrella of the Avera Health organization. Contemplative nuns are at Alexandria—a recent foundation.

In the mid-19th century, the Benedictine monks of St. Meinrad, Ind., built a monastery near Marvin, to enable them to be closer to the reservations and facilitate their ministry to the Native Americans. Before the close of the 20th century, however, the Sioux Falls diocese assumed the obligation of filling the vacancies left by the monks who are no longer in that apostolate. Jesuits still minister at the Rapid City Diocesan reservations traditionally filled by them when Marty, the first bishop, could no longer recruit Benedictine monks from the abbeys in Indiana and Missouri.

Although the numbers are relatively small, the areas huge, the Catholics of the diocese, overwhelmingly of German, Irish, Czech, or Polish ancestry, are committed to furthering Catholic education for their children, health care for those in need, social services of all kinds, and reconciliation with the fast-growing Native American population.

Bibliography: R. KAROLEVETZ, With Faith, Hope and Tenacity (Sioux Falls 1989); Bishop Martin Marty: Black Robe Lean Chief (Yankton 1980). A. KESSLER, "First Catholic Bishop of Dakota," in South Dakota Leaders, H. HOOVER et al., eds. (Vermillion 1989); "Mount Marty College," in From Idea to Institution, eds. H. HOOVER et al. (Vermillion 1989); Benedictine Men and Women of Courage (Yankton 1996); "Valiant Women," with S. PETERSON in South Dakota Leaders, H. HOOVER et al. eds. C. DURATSCHKEK, Beginnings of Catholicism in South Dakota (Washington, D.C. 1943); Crusading along Sioux Trails (St. Meinrad, Ind. 1947); Under the Shadow of His Wings (Yankton 1971); Builders of God's Kingdom (1985).

[A. KESSLER]

SIRACH, BOOK OF

The name of one of the Wisdom books of the OT in many Bibles. The book is now generally called WISDOM OF BEN SIRA.

[A. A. DI LELLA]

SIRICIUS, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: Dec. 15 or 22 or 29, 384 to Nov. 26, 399. Siricius, a Roman by birth, was ordained a lector, then deacon by Pope LIBERIUS. On the death of Damasus (December 11, 384) he was elected pope despite the candidacy of Ursinus, who during the election of Damasus 18 years earlier, had incited bloody strife, and that of (St.) JEROME, who had enjoyed the favor of Damasus and seemed to cherish the hope of being raised to the Roman See (Epist. 45.3).

Letters. The papacy of Siricius is not well documented, nor does it appear to have been particularly distinguished. In 390 the Pope consecrated the newly reconstructed basilica of St. Paul on the Ostian Way, and several of his letters contain "the first papal decrees" that are listed as pontifical documents in canonical collections. On February 10, 385, Siricius wrote to Himerius of Tarragona, who had referred several points of discipline to Damasus (Epist. 1; P. Jaffé Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, 255). On January 6, 386, he wrote to the bishops of Africa on the decisions of a council that had met in Rome "above the relics of St. Peter." This is the first known "council of the Vatican" (Epist. 5; P. Jaffé 258). In 386 he wrote to Anysius of Thessalonica on the subject of episcopal ordination in Illyricum (Epist. 4; P. Jaffé 259). About 390, in an address to "the orthodox in the provinces," apparently the Italian bishops, he points out certain abuses that had been creeping into the rite of ordination (Epist. 6; P. Jaffé 263). In 390 (St.) Ambrose replied (Epist. 42) to a circular, addressed to the Church of Milan, that forwarded the decision of a Roman council condemning Jovinian and the others who denied the perpetual virginity of Mary (Epist. 7; P. Jaffé 260). Letter 9 in this collection, dealing with the case of Bonosus, belongs to Ambrose, and Letter 10, ad Gallos, was written by Damasus.

These letters are of importance in the history of ecclesiastical discipline. They settle pastoral problems, stating, for example, that heretics, both Arians and Novatians, are not to be rebaptized, but should be reconciled by the laying on of hands (Epist. 1.1.2). Except in cases of necessity or for infants, Baptism is to be bestowed at Easter or Pentecost, not on Christmas (Epist.

1.2.3). Episcopal consecration may not be bestowed by a single bishop; there must be several consecrators (Epist. 5.2.1). A bishop should not ordain a cleric of another church, nor accept one deposed by another church (Epist. 5.2.6, 7). Very precise regulations concern the age of those being ordained (Epist. 1.8) and, especially, the continence of clergymen: priests and deacons are bound "by the everlasting law of continence" (Epist. 1.6, 7-7.8, 9); severe punishments are set for the guilty, as also for monks and nuns who fall into incontinence. Clerics should not live with women except in circumstances mentioned by the Council of Nicaea (Epist. 1.10). Other regulations concern the discipline of Penance, which remained harsh (Epist. 1.4, 12). A baptized man who embraced the "cingulum militiae saecularis" (civil office as well as more explicit military service) could not be admitted to the clerical state (Epist. 5.2.3).

Papal Authority. More important than their content is the testimony of these decrees regarding the growing authority of the Apostolic See, particularly in the West. Siricius is the first pope to claim that the Apostle Peter spoke through him: "We bear within us the burdens of all who are weighed down, but it is rather the Blessed Apostle Peter who bears these burdens in us, since, as we trust, he protects us in all the matters of his administration and guides us as his heirs" (Epist. 1.1). References to the double foundation of Rome (Peter and Paul) fade away as only the Petrine foundation is seen to be important. The bishops should address the Roman Church as head of their body (Epist. 1.15.20). The pope replies to their queries: rescriptissimus (a technical term of the imperial chancellor) with complete authority; i.e., we command, we decree (jubemus, decernimus). His decisions are the Statuta Sedis Apostolicae and have the same authority as those of the revered councils (Epist. 1.15.20); bishops who do not obey them separate themselves from the solidity of the apostolic rock, on which Christ built the universal Church (Epist. 1.2.3).

This authority was imposed at first upon the bishops of rural Italy over whom Siricius had immediate supervision: no episcopal election could be accomplished "without the knowledge of the Apostolic See" (Epist. 5.2.1). Beyond that area, Siricius forwarded the decisions of the Roman council to the Church of Milan and addressed the bishops of Gaul, Spain, and Africa with full authority, but the Gauls had reservation and the Africans typically accepted only what they agreed with. He intervened likewise in the problems over PRISCILLIANISM and sided with the bishops who had refused communion with Ithacus and Idacius after they had persuaded the usurper Maximus that it was legitimate to put Priscillian to death (P. Jaffé 262; Mansi 3:1005). He made Anysius of Thessalonica his vicar in Illyricum to protect the province from the influence of Constantinople. No episcopal ordination could take place there without the consent of Anysius (Epist. 4). At the request of Ambrose (Epist. 56.7) Siricius attempted to solve the schism of Antioch but failed.

Siricius was a strong personality but not a thinker. He distrusted the new breed of ascetic intellectuals. He acquiesced in the expulsion of Jerome from the city of Rome, and he distanced himself from Paulinus of Nola. His approach to theological questions was to cite Roman tradition and authority. Yet this firmness often placed him in good stead. Siricius played an important part in the promotion of the authority of the Apostolic See. He was buried in the basilica of St. Silvester in the cemetery of Priscilla, where pilgrims were still venerating his tomb in the seventh century (Martyrologium Romanum 547).

Feast: November 26.

Bibliography: SIRICIUS, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 13:1131–1202. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 14.2:2171–74. P. JAFFÉ Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD et al., 2 v. (2d ed. Leipzig 1881–88, repr. Graz 1956) 1:40–42. A. DIBERARDINO, Patrology (Westminster, Md. 1986) 4:580–581. E. FERGUSON, ed., Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (New York 1997) 2:1064. H. JEDIN, History of the Church (New York 1980) 2:254–256. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 35–36. C. PIETRI, Roma Christiana (Rome 1976) 468–474, 888–909. J. CURRAN, “Jerome and the Sham Christians of Rome,” The Journal of Ecclesiastical History 48: 213–29. R. GIULIANI, “Un’interessante novità epigrafica della catacomba della ex vigna Chiaraviglio sulla via Appia Antica. Ancora sull’attività dei presbiteri Proclino e Urso a S. Sebastiano,” in ‘Domum Tuam Dilexi’. Miscellanea in onore di Aldo Nestori (Vatican City 1998) 375–97. P. LAURENCE, “Rome et Jérôme: des amours contrariées,” Revue Bénédictine 107: 227–49.

[P. T. CAMELOT]

SIRLETO, GUGLIELMO

Cardinal, Tridentine scholar, Vatican librarian; b. Guardavalle, Calabria, Italy, 1514; d. Rome, Oct. 7, 1585. After studying at Naples, where he became proficient in Greek, he continued his researches at the Vatican Library. Here he made the acquaintance of Cardinal Marcello Cervino (later Pope MARCELLUS II), presiding official at the initial phases of the Council of Trent. While remaining at Rome, Sirleto prepared extensive memoranda on many of the important questions discussed at the council. He similarly collaborated with the other cardinal legates, particularly Cardinal Girolamo Seripando, at the later phases of the council. As head of the Vatican Library, he catalogued all its Greek manuscripts. In 1565 he was made a cardinal; in 1566, bishop of San Marco, Calabria; and in 1568, bishop of his native diocese of Guglielmo Cardinal Sirleto.

Squillace. However, even after his episcopal consecration he almost always resided in Rome. Here he was the central figure in editing the publications decreed by the council: the revised Missal and Breviary, the Roman Catechism, the Corpus Iuris Canonici, and the official texts of the Latin Vulgate and the Greek Septuagint.

Bibliography: H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 5 v. in 6 (3d ed. Innsbruck 1903–1913); v.1 (4th ed. 1926) 3:258–261. J. MERCIER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 14.2:2174–75. W. KOCH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. M. BUCHBERGER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1930–38)¹ 9:596–597. G. TACCONE GALLUCCI, Monografia del cardinale Sirleto nel secolo 16 (Rome 1909). S. MERKLE, “Kardinal Sirleto,” Beiträge zur Geschichte des christlichen Altertums und der byzantinischen Literatur: Festgabe, Albert Erhard (Bonn 1922).

[L. F. HARTMAN]

SIRMIUM

Ancient city of Pannonia on the River Sava, the site of modern Hovatzka Mitrovitza in Bosnia. The city was conquered by the Romans under Caecina Severus in the 1st century A.D. and became the capital of Pannonia II under Diocletian. Its early Christian colony included the FOUR CROWNED MARTYRS, Pollius the lector, and Irenaeus of Sirmium (d. 309). In the 4th century it served as the metropolitan see for western Illyricum. In the Arian quarrel its bishop, Photinus (d. 343), made himself the champion of the radical Arianism of Eunomius of Cyzicus (Anomoeanism): "The Word is dissimilar to the Father." This doctrine was condemned, along with Photinus, at Antioch (344), Milan (345), and Sirmium (348, 351); the last-named synod deposed Photinus. His successor, Germinius, held a synod (summer of 357) and with Valens of Mursa and Ursacius of Singidunum adopted the "Second Formula of Sirmium," which held that the Son was inferior and subordinated to the Father, that the Holy Spirit existed through the Son, a statement that Hosius of Córdoba signed, and that became for a time the official doctrine of Imperial orthodoxy. It was condemned by the Emperor Gratian (378), by Pope DAMASUS I (375), and by the Synod of Aquileia (381).

Destroyed by the Avars (582), the city was rebuilt around the Oriental monastery of St. Demetrius and was called Dmitrovica, while Sirmium (Croatian Srijem) became the name of the region between the Sava and the Danube Rivers. Pope ADRIAN II in 869 attempted to form an archdiocese of Sirmium with jurisdiction over the central Danubian area, but political intrigue frustrated the project. In 1229 GREGORY XI made it a diocese, with the former Benedictine monastery at Bonostar as its seat. It was troubled with heretical movements from the so-called Bosnian heresy of the PATARINES to Calvinism, and counted many apostates to Islam.

Bibliography: W. KOCH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. M. BUCHBERGER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1930–38) 9:597–598. D. FARLATI, Illyricum sacrum, 8 v., v. 5–8 ed. G. COLETI (Venice 1751–1819) 7:449–571. J. ZEILLER, Les Origines chrétiennes dans les provinces danubiennes (Paris 1918).

[P. JOANNOU]

SIRMOND, JACQUES

Jesuit historian and patristic scholar; b. Riom, Auvergne, France, Oct. 12, 1559; d. Paris, Oct. 7, 1651. He studied at the Jesuit college of Billom, and became a Jesuit (1576) and a priest. From 1581 to 1590 he taught literature at Pont-à-Mousson and Paris (where SS. Francis of Sales and Peter Fourier were his students), and from 1590 to 1608 he was secretary to the Jesuit general C. Acquaviva in Rome, also aiding Cardina Baronius in his historical works. In 1608 he returned to Paris and in 1617 became rector of the college of Clermont there. From 1637 to 1643 he was confessor to Louis XIII. As one of the most learned men in France in his day, he edited the texts of many early authors, especially those pertaining to the history of France, such as texts of Geoffrey of Ven-dome, Flodoard of Reims, Sidonius Apollinaris, Paschasius Radbertus, Avitus of Vienne, Hincmar of Reims, and Theodulf of Orleans; the lives of Leo IX and Charles of Flanders; the capitularies of Charles the Bald, and the Concilia antiqua Galliae. His editions of works of Eusebius of Caesarea, Theodoret of Cyr, and FULGENTIUS OF RUSPE are noteworthy. He also discovered and edited the ecclesiastical constitutions of the Theodosian Code. Many of his texts were later adopted for the collections of LABBE, MANSI, and MIGNE. Sirmond's distinction between Dionysius the Areopagite and PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS was an important correction of traditional opinion. He wrote or published other works of interest in the history of dogma and theology, e.g., on predestination, public penance, and the Sacraments of Confirmation and the Eucharist.

Bibliography: Opera, ed. J. DE LA BAUME, 5 v. (Paris 1696, Venice 1728), including a biography. C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 7:1237–61, 11:1910–11. P. GALTIER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 14.2:2186–93.

[F. X. MURPHY]

SISINNIUS, POPE

Pontificate: Jan. 15 to Feb. 4, 708; b. Syria, date unknown; d. Rome. His exact birthplace is unknown, but the Liber pontificalis states that he was a native of Syria, the "son of John." There is no information on his education. He seems to have been a man of both practical ability and noble generosity. In January 708 Sisinnius was elected successor to JOHN VII by the clergy and nobility of Rome, as was the custom. His pontificate of 20 days was complicated by the exactions of the Byzantine exarch at Ravenna, the encroachment of the LOMBARDS, and the menace of the Moslem advance from the south. As pope, his first act was to order the reinforcement of the walls of Rome. He held one ordination and consecrated a bishop for Corsica. He was buried in St. Peter's.

Bibliography: L. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. P. EWALD 1:247. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE, (Paris, 1958) 1:388. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1930–32) 1.2:124–126. E. CASPAR, Geschichte de Papsttums von den Anfängen bis zur Höhe der Weltherrschaft (Tübingen 1930–33) 2:620. G. H. BAUDRY, Catholicisme hier aujourd'hui demain, 14 (Paris 1994). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 85–86.

[M. A. MULHOLLAND]

SISINNIUS I, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Episcopacy: 426 to 427, saint; d. Constantinople, Dec. 24, 427. Sisinnius, a priest working in the suburb of Elaia in Constantinople, was selected patriarch on Feb. 26, 426 by popular acclamation. The people recognized his piety and love for the poor, and preferred him to the clergy's candidates, Proclus, secretary of the deceased Patriarch Atticus, and Philip, presbyter of Side, who later criticized Sisinnius in his Christian History. In a synod held soon after his consecration, Sisinnius condemned the lax discipline with which the Messalians were treated by Beronicianus of Perga. He also vindicated the reputation of Proclus by selecting him as bishop of Cyzicus, but the people of Cyzicus claimed the right to elect their own bishop and chose Dalmatius instead. Upon Sisinnius' sudden death, at a time when the Church was divided over the nature of Christ, the bishops, clergy and monks could not decide on a successor. The decision was left to the Emperor Theodosius II, who selected the Antiochian priest Nestorius. Pope Celestine I praised Sisinnius' simple faith and orthodoxy.

Feast: Oct. 11.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Sedis 627–629. SOCRATES SCHOLASTICUS, Historia ecclesiastica (Patrologia Graeca 67) 7:26–28; tr. A. C. ZENOS (A Select Library of the Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers 2.2; 1890) 1–178. MARCELLINUS COMES, The Chronicle of Marcellinus, tr. B. CROKE (Sydney 1995) 14, 77. THEODORE LECTOR, Theodore Anagnostes, Kirchengeschichte, ed. G.C. HANSEN (Berlin 1971) 324–326. THEOPHANES, The Chronicle of Theophanes Confessor, tr. C. MANGO and R. SCOTT (Oxford 1997) 136–137. L. DINDORF, ed., Zonaras (Leipzig 1868–75), 13.22. G. BARDY, Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours, ed. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN (Paris 1935) 4:161–162. G. DAGRON, Naissance d'une capitale, Constantinople et ses institutions de 370 à 451, (Paris 1974) 470, 492. A. DI BERARDINO, ed. Encyclopedia of the Early Church, tr. A. WALFORD (Cambridge 1992).

[F. NICKS/A. PENNA]

SISINNIUS II, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Reigned 996 to 998; d. Constantinople, Aug. 24, 998. Distinguished for his medical knowledge and his eloquence, Sisinnius succeeded the Patriarch Nicholas II after a four-year interval. He was responsible for at least three synodal decisions on marriage, one of which extended the impediment of affinity to the fifth grade, while the second and third dealt with impediments and second marriages. Some doubt exists regarding the authenticity of the latter two. He opposed the abuse called the Charismaticariate, whereby monasteries were deeded to lay people or to other monasteries, which practice was originally intended as a means of preserving their financial stability. He wrote a treatise on the apparition of St. Michael the Archangel (Acta apparitionis in Chonis) and a panegyric in honor of the martyr SS. Kerykos (Cyriacus) and Julitta, as well as a controversial Tome on Marriage (Feb. 21, 997). His part in renewing difficulties between Rome and Constantinople by the republication of an anti-Latin encyclical of PHOTIUS is disputed.

Bibliography: H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 88–89, 136, 554. V. GRUMMEL, ed., Les Regestes des actes du Patriarcat de Constantinople, v.2 (Constantinople 1936) 231–239; "L'Encyclique de Photius . . . et Sisinnius II . . .," Échos d'Orient 34 (1935) 129–138. V. LAURENT, "Réponses canonique inédites," ibid. 33 (1934) 302–305; "Charismaticariat et commende à Byzance," Revue des études byzantines 12 (1954) 100–113. E. HERMAN, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 3:611–617.

[A. PENNA]

SISTER FORMATION MOVEMENT

An international movement, founded to promote the spiritual, intellectual, social and professional development of women religious by providing a program of advanced education for them comparable to, though of shorter duration than, the formation given to candidates for the priesthood.

Early Formation of Apostolic Women Religious.

Prior to Vatican Council II, the advanced education of women religious committed to Catholic education and/or health care was highly restricted by the Church authorities and was dependent primarily upon the limited resources of the individual religious congregations. The founding of The Catholic Sisters' College at The Catholic University in 1911 (discontinued in 1950) provided one of the earliest opportunities for major superiors to obtain advanced education for their members within a Catholic environment. Catholic universities at this time were almost exclusively male oriented—administration, faculty, staff and student body. Most of them offered a few classes for women, both religious and lay, in the late afternoon or evening and during the summer.

After state and regional certification requirements in 1918 gave impetus to what was already a deeply felt need, some major superiors were able, with the special permission of their bishops, to send their sisters to secular universities to obtain certification and/or advanced degrees. For the next two decades, the higher education of women religious in both secular and Catholic colleges experienced slow if steady growth.

The publication in 1941 of The Education of Sisters, the doctoral thesis of Sister Bertrande Meyers, DC, drew attention to the effects on women religious of what had become large-scale attendance at Catholic and secular colleges and universities. The book revealed widespread dissatisfaction of major superiors with the education of their sisters, which was still obtained for the most part by attending late afternoon, Saturday and summer classes while working full time in schools or hospitals, and with the marked dichotomy between the sisters' spiritual and intellectual maturation. Meyers proposed a plan for integrating the four facets of a sister's formation—the spiritual, intellectual, social and professional—through the founding of colleges specifically designed for the needs of sisters.

National Catholic Education Association. At the National Catholic Education Association (NCEA) convention in 1949, a symposium entitled “The Education of Sister Lucy” included a paper by Sister Madeleva Wolff, CSC, entitled “The Education of Young Religious Teacher” that decried the piecemeal education of sisters. This event marked an early national, public acknowledgement of a growing concern among many members of apostolic congregations.

In December 1950, the Holy See called an international congress of men and women religious to discuss mutual concerns, among them the programs of education for sisters. The following year Pius XII in his Discourse to the Teaching Sisters stated:

Many of your schools are being described and praised to us as being very good. But not all. It is our fervent wish that all endeavor to become excellent. This presupposes that your teaching Sisters are masters of the subjects they expound. See to it, therefore, that they are well trained and their education corresponds in quality and academic degrees to that demanded by the State.

At the NCEA convention of 1952, Sister Mary Emil Penet, IHM, led a panel that addressed Pius XII's concern for better Catholic schools and better-trained teachers. The first Congress of Major Superiors, held at Notre Dame University in South Bend, Indiana, the following summer focused on ways of accomplishing this ideal.

The following year, SFC was officially launched as a committee within the College and University Department of NCEA. After holding more than 250 regional meetings, the leaders of the movement developed a plan for establishing postnovitiate houses of study to be known as “juniorates.” These programs would comprise three years of formative study intended to ensure the development of a well-integrated, mature, holy and effective religious, prepared for active ministry.

Sister Formation Conference. By 1957, the organization of the Sister Formation Conference was completed with a national chairman, vice-chairman, executive secretary, and a national leadership group of sisters and a consultative committee of priests. They now operated under the aegis of the Conference of Major Superiors of Women Religious (CMSW), and in 1964 they achieved the status of a separate committee within the CMSW. At this time their staff status within NCEA was terminated.

In addition to sponsoring in-service workshops for teachers and administrators, the Sister Formation Conference published a quarterly bulletin. The Sister Formation Bulletin (1955–1972) under the leadership of Sister Rita Mary BRADLEY, SFCC, exerted a formidable influence upon the lives of most American women religious in the second half of the twentieth century.

In addition to providing for the education of American women religious, SFC made an outstanding contribution to the universal church by arranging for qualified sisters from Africa, India and South America to be accepted into juniorates and Catholic women's colleges throughout the United States.

In 1971, SFC became a separate national conference independent of LCWR (formerly CMSW). The leadership of the SFC adopted a new set of bylaws by means of which they hoped to widen the sphere of their influence. SFC now admitted as members both men and women, individuals and groups, non-canonical communities and secular institutes from within and outside the United States. Five years later, in 1976, the conference changed the name of the organization to the Religious Formation Conference to reflect the new makeup of its membership.

The RFC retained its commitment to initial formation while expanding efforts to include ongoing formation and continuing education. One outgrowth of their dedication to religious life has been their effort to foster and nourish a vital community life in which new members may find daily support and encouragement.

Bibliography: Proceedings of the Sister Formation Regional Conferences. The Mind of the Church in the Formation of Sisters (New York 1956); Spiritual and Intellectual Elements in the Formation of Sisters (New York 1958); Planning for the Formation of Sisters (New York 1958); The Juniorate in Sister Formation (New York 1960). B. MEYERS, DC, Sisters for the 21st Century (New York 1965). A. WALTERS, CSJ, “Religious Life: Yesterday and Tomorrow,” New Catholic World (March/April 1972) 74–75; H. M. MALONEY, SC, “Formation: Where Has It Been?” Sister Formation Bulletin, 18(4) (summer 1972) 5. Papers of SFC/RFC are held in Marquette University Archives, as are the personal papers of pioneers Sister R. Bradley, SFCC (1917–2000) and Sister A. Walters, CSJ (1910–1978).

[M. R. MADDEN]

SISTERS, FAITHFUL COMPANIONS OF JESUS

(FCJ, Official Catholic Directory #4048); a congregation with papal approbation, founded in Amiens, France, in 1820 by Marie Madeleine Victoire de Bonnault d'Houet, née De Bengy. Following the death of her husband in 1805, Madame d'Houet devoted herself to raising her son and contemplated founding a religious community for the education of children. With the help of three companions, her plan began to materialize in 1820. By the time of her death in 1858, 20 houses had been established, and her community gradually spread to England, Switzerland, Italy, Scotland, Ireland, and Belgium. At the end of the 19th century the sisters had extended their work to North America and Australia. From Canada, where the sisters were working in the native missions of the Northwest, they came to the U.S. in 1896 and established themselves in Fitchburg, MA. Two more foundations were later made in Rhode Island. The generalate is in Broadstairs, Kent, England. The U.S. provincialate is in Portsmouth, RI.

[Z. O'CONNELL/EDS.]

SISTERS ADORERS OF THE PRECIOUS BLOOD

(APB, Official Catholic Directory #0110); a cloistered, contemplative community with papal approbation, founded in Canada in 1861 for the twofold purpose of adoration of the Precious Blood and the salvation of souls. The foundress, Catherine Aurélie Caouette, and three companions began the congregation at St. Hyacinthe, Quebec Province, with the approval of Bp. Joseph LaRocque (1860–65) and under the direction of Msgr. J. S. Raymond. Mother Catherine Aurelia of the Precious Blood, as she was known in religious life, died July 6, 1905. The constitutions of the community were approved by Leo XIII in 1896, after several foundations had been made in Canada and one in the United States, in Brooklyn, NY (1890).

The sisters pray the Liturgy of the Hours in common, and participate in prayers for reparation of the world and special hours of adoration before the Blessed Sacrament. The sisters also engage in making altar breads, vestments, and altar linens and in doing art work.

At the beginning of the 21st century, there were nineteen monasteries of the Precious Blood: six autonomous houses belonging to the American Federation; four houses belonging to the French Generalate of Canada, seven belonging to the English Generalate of Canada, and two independent monasteries in Japan.

Bibliography: The Life of Mother Catherine Aurelia of the Precious Blood (St. Louis 1929).

[M. M. RYAN/EDS.]

SISTERS FOR CHRISTIAN COMMUNITY

Founded, 1970 in response to Vatican II and to the desire of a number of committed women for a flexible lifestyle to facilitate ministry. The Sisters For Christian Community (SFCC) is an international community with a committed membership in all continents of the world. The sisters seek to be present wherever there is a need for Christian love and community witness. The community reflects the journey of women called to be co-foundresses, co-equals, and co-responsible for all aspects of this form of religious life, which is non-canonical and ecumenical, with a self-supporting membership.

The vision of the community was formulated by Lillanna Kopp, Ph.D, then Sister Audrey Kopp, a sociologist and member of the Sisters of the Holy Names (SNJM), who had been teaching at Maryhurst College and who was very active in the renewal of religious communities of women during the 1960s. Her vision was of a new form of religious life that would embody the values and principles of the Second Vatican Council. She was urged by several bishops who were involved in the renewal of religious communities to carry out this vision. A number of women religious, leaders in their congregations, encouraged her to be the catalyst in forming the community and, with Lillanna, became the founding group of the Sisters for Christian Community.

The mission and goals of the Sisters for Christian Community are clearly stated in the SFCC Profile. The apostolic goal of SFCC is to promote and witness Christian community; and, the sisters strive through all means available to forward the realization of Christ's prayer, ". . . that all may be ONE . . ." that they may be Community. To achieve this goal, they seek to bring together into a community Christ-committed women who give witness to collegial community with the mission of building the body of Christ through helping to build dynamic Christian community wherever they live their calling. Each sister determines her own ministry on the basis of her personal call within the community, her training and interests, and the movement of the Spirit.

The vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience (expressed in terms of serving and sharing; celibate love; and listening to the guidance of the Spirit) are lived in accord with the special ministry of the sister. The sisters are found in nearly every professional field in faith-based ministries; in public, private, and corporate organizations; in university, diocesan, and parish settings; in such works areas as education, social work, and health; with the homeless, the elderly, the poor, and the sick. All are concerned with issues of social justice and the bonding of women.

The organizational structure of the community is simple. The sisters live alone or with others. Community transcends distance. It is experienced through personal contacts, local, regional, and international gatherings, and newsletters. Community decisions are made collegially, through a process of consensus. Mutual support and accountability are most tangibly experienced at the regional and local levels.

Since its inception in 1970, SFCC has been a community in process, refining its international communications network under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. By the end of the 20th century, membership exceeded 470 and had expanded into 19 regions, each with a regional communications coordinator who is selected through a process of discernment whereby the sisters call forth a member to assume the service role. SFCC numbers over 470 members and the sisters are currently exploring new forms of membership at the Annual International Assemblies.

[M. V. JOSEPH]

SISTERS OF CHARITY, FEDERATION OF

A number of Roman Catholic Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life are inspired by the charisms of St. VINCENT DE PAUL (1581–1660), St. LOUISE DE MARILLAC (1591–1660) and, in the United States, St. Elizabeth Ann Bayley SETON (1774–1821). In 1965 several took the first steps in forming the predecessor to the Sisters of Charity Federation, a voluntary association of sisterhoods that share the common Vincentian heritage of the Common Rules of the Daughters of Charity (Paris, 1672). The founding communities trace their roots to the Sisters of Charity of Saint Joseph's founded by Mother Seton near Emmitsburg, Maryland. This article describes the origin of the Vincentian Tradition in France, its adaptation by Mother Seton in United States and the communities she inspired, the development and structures of the federation, and finally brief descriptions of each of the member congregations.

French origin of the Vincentian tradition. In his Conferences to the Daughters of Charity, St. Vincent explained on Sept. 29, 1655, that he and Saint Louise co-founded the Confraternity of the Charity of the Servants of the Sick Poor of the Parishes (whose members the people of Paris called Daughters of Charity) “to honor the great charity of Our Lord Jesus Christ” through service to persons who were sick and poor [Joseph Leonard, ed., trans., Conferences of Vincent de Paul to the Daughters of Charity, 4 v. (Westminster, Md. 1939) 3:98]. The Company of the Daughters of Charity, founded on Nov. 29, 1633, developed from the parish-based Confraternities of Charity and became the first successful institute of non-cloistered religious women to serve in the active apostolate in France. As such, the Common Rules of the Daughters of Charity became a prototype. The rule developed by Louise de Marillac and Vincent de Paul was first explained to the sisters on July 31, 1634, and refined over time on the basis of the lived experience of the sisters who sought to live a lifestyle for mission characterized by humility, simplicity, and charity. According to Saint Louise, “If humility, simplicity, and charity which gives support are well-established among you, your little Company will be composed of as many saints as there are persons in it” [Louise Sullivan, trans., Louise de Marillac Spiritual Writings (New York 1991) 532].

Saint Vincent invited the sisters to sign the Act of Establishment of the Company on Aug. 8, 1655. His immediate successor as superior general, Very Reverend René Alméras, CM, (1613–1672; superior general 1661–1672), reorganized the original text of 43 articles that constituted the primitive rule. Alméras arranged them into chapters, with the assistance of Sister Mathurine Guérin (1631–1704) and included some unpublished oral traditions. This edition, in effect for the Daughters of Charity from 1672 until after Vatican II, reflects the thinking and collaboration of both Saint Louise and Saint Vincent.

In imitation of Saint Vincent's first Daughters of Charity, many congregations throughout the world carry the title “Sisters of Charity” and seek to live in their time the Vincentian mission having what Vincent de Paul described on Aug. 24, 1659, “for cloister the streets of the city, for enclosure obedience, going only to the homes of the sick and to places necessary for their service” (Leonard 4:264). The mission of the Company of Charity required a structure and lifestyle that circumvented the 17th-century requirement of enclosure for religious women. Louise explained in a letter to the Abbé de Vaux on June 29, 1649 that she and Vincent established the Daughters of Charity as “just a secular family” (Sullivan 293), “for whoever says religious says cloistered, and Daughters of Charity should go everywhere,” as Saint Vincent explained to the Company of Charity on June 29, 1649 (Leonard 4:261).

The Daughters of Charity confirmed their commitment to mission through annual, private vows of poverty, chastity, obedience, and service of poor persons. The cloister would have prevented the sisters from doing their mission, which, according to Saint Vincent's explanation on May 30, 1659, called them to a state of charity through ministry among the sick poor, rather than a state of perfection through perpetual, public vows. The Daughters of Charity of Saint Vincent de Paul first received (1646) ecclesiastical approval by the archbishop of Paris, but that approbation, together with the royal letters patent, were inexplicably lost. Louise de Marillac wished to preserve the integrity of the Vincentian charism and to protect the Company of the Daughters of Charity from ecclesiastical interference. At her insistence, the substitute document was revised to place the Daughters of Charity under the perpetual direction of Saint Vincent and his successors as superior general of the Congregation of the Mission. Cardinal de Retz, archbishop of Paris, gave his approval on Jan. 18, 1655. The statutes of the company were confirmed in the name of Pope Clement IX by his legate, Cardinal Louis de Bourbon, duke de Vendôme, on July 8, 1668.

American origin of the Setonian tradition. Reverend Louis William Dubourg, SS (1766–1833), had desired to expand educational programs for girls in Baltimore since 1797. He met Elizabeth Bayley Seton about 1806 in New York and invited her to that city, where she served for one year as school mistress. She established (1808) a small boarding school for girls beside the Sulpician institution Saint Mary's College & Seminary on Paca Street. This plan enjoyed the enthusiastic support of John Carroll (1735–1815), first bishop of the United States and first archbishop of Baltimore (1789–1815). Carroll's primary concern was to provide educational opportunities for lay leaders and to develop native clergy for the Catholic Church in America.

The Sulpician priests of Baltimore offered to assist Elizabeth in formulating plans that would be beneficial to the welfare of her children. They expected women to join Elizabeth in forming a sisterhood modeled on the French Daughters of Charity under their direction. Elizabeth entrusted such a project to Divine Providence. In a letter dated Feb. 20, 1809 to Rose Stubbs of New York, Elizabeth explained that she would be forming apostolic women who "choose to lead a Religious life devoted to the education of poor children in the Catholic faith . . . [with] the prospect of receiving many [spiritual] daughters." Describing her vision of mission to Julia Sitgreaves Scott of Philadelphia in a letter dated March 23, 1809, Elizabeth exclaimed enthusiastically about "the joy" of her "soul at the prospect of being able to assist the Poor, visit the sick, comfort the sorrowful, clothe little innocents, and teach them to love God!" Two days later on March 25, Elizabeth pronounced vows of chastity and obedience to Bishop Carroll for one year in the lower chapel at Saint Mary's, after which the archbishop bestowed the title "Mother" on her.

The Sulpicians actively recruited the first candidates who joined the germinal community named at Baltimore between December 1808 and June 1809. Among them were the Misses Cecilia O'Conway (1788–1865), Anna Maria Murphy-Burke (c. 1787–1812), and Mary Ann Butler (1784–1821) all of Philadelphia; Susan Clossey (1785–1823) of New York; and Catherine (Kitty) Mullen (1783–1814), and Mrs. Rosetta (Rose) Landry White (1784–1841), a widow, of Baltimore. Elizabeth's youngest sisters-in-law arrived from New York and accompanied her to Emmitsburg in June of 1808. Cecilia Seton (1791–1810) was already a convert, and by September that year Harriet Seton (1787–1809) was also received into the Catholic Church.

Samuel Sutherland Cooper (1769–1843), a wealthy convert and seminarian at Saint Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, wished to address the needs of poor persons. Cooper donated $6,961 to purchase 269 acres of land from Robert Fleming for Mother Seton and her new community. Cooper designated the property, near Emmitsburg in Frederick County, Maryland, for education, care of the elderly, and employment training. Initially Elizabeth considered naming the community the Sisters of Saint Joseph but in recognition of the Vincentian tradition, she expanded its title to be the Sisters of Charity of Saint Joseph's.

The Sisters of Charity of Saint Joseph's. The community of the Sisters of Charity of Saint Joseph's was founded July 31, 1809, at the Stone House in Saint Joseph's Valley near Emmitsburg, Maryland, and from there launched their apostolate of education and charity, trusting all to Divine Providence. The Provisional Regulations for Saint Joseph's Sisters (1809) was the primitive governing documents of the new community. In mid-February of 1810 the sisters moved into the newly constructed Saint Joseph's House (the White House). There 86 candidates joined the new sisterhood during Elizabeth's lifetime. The women were courageous in their mission despite the ravages of illness and premature death, which first claimed her sisters-in-law, Harriet and Cecilia Seton, then her oldest and youngest daughters, Anna Maria (1795–1812) and Rebecca (1802–1816). Elizabeth also buried 18 young Sisters of Charity during the 12 years she lived in Saint Joseph's Valley.

Under the guidance of Archbishop Carroll and the Sulpicians, Mother Seton and the early members of the Sisters of Charity of Saint Joseph's shaped the first native sisterhood in the United States, creating a truly American community. Despite their humble beginning, the American Sisters of Charity launched multi-faceted ministries and became trailblazers in many fields, especially in education. They established the first free Catholic school for girls staffed by sisters in the United States (Emmitsburg, 1810). As the prototype of the Catholic school, Saint Joseph's Academy and Day School laid the foundation for a national network of quality Catholic education through the parochial school system, which developed later in the century. After Mother Seton's death, the Sisters of Charity of Saint Joseph's also began the first Catholic hospital in the United States (St. Louis, Mo. 1828).

The second Sulpician superior of the Sisters of Charity of Saint Joseph's, Reverend John Baptiste David, SS (1761–1841), commissioned (1810) Benedict Joseph Flaget, SS, (1763–1851), bishop-elect of Bardstown, Kentucky, to obtain French Daughters of Charity during his trip to Paris. David's goal was for the French sisters to establish themselves at Emmitsburg and train the American women in the Vincentian way of life, incorporating them as members of the Company of the Daughters of Charity of Saint Vincent de Paul. Mother Seton expressed her grave concerns about the implications of David's plans in a letter dated May 13, 1811, to Archbishop Carroll. "What authority would the [French] Mother they bring have over our Sisters (while I am present) but the very rule she is to give them? — and how could it be known that they would consent to the different modifications of their rule which are indispensable if adopted by us . . . How can they allow me the uncontrolled privileges of a Mother to my five darlings? — or how can I in conscience or in accordance with your paternal heart give up so sacred a right."

Mother Seton and Dubois modified the original French rule to address the urgent needs of the Church in early nineteenth-century America. Their rule was based on a manuscript copy of the Alméras edition of the Common Rules of the Daughters of Charity (Paris, 1672), which Flaget had brought when he returned to America. John Carroll approved The Regulations for the Society of the Sisters of Charity of America (Emmitsburg, 1812).

The Sisters of Charity responded to the urgent need for female education in America and initially made it their primary ministry. The American rule is the root foundational document of the majority of the congregational members of the Sisters of Charity Federation. Article Four of The Constitutions of the Sisters of Charity in the United States of America (1812) specified membership criteria and outlined stipulations regarding parental obligations of widows with minor children. In the same letter to Carroll, Mother Seton expressed her sentiments about the exemption granted her as a mother with five dependent children, then ranging from 10 to 16 years old.

"The constitutions proposed have been discussed by our Rev. Director [Dubois] and I find he makes some observations on my Situation relative to them but surely an Individual is not to be considered where a public good is in question— and you know I would gladly make every sacrifice you think consistent with my first and inseparable obligations as a Mother."

Eighteen Sisters of Charity pronounced private, annual vows for the first time on July 19, 1813. They committed themselves to "Poverty, Chastity, and Obedience to God and our Reverend Superior General until the 25th of March next" and engagement in "the corporal and spiritual service of the poor sick . . . [and] the instruction of those committed to our charge." The vow day was the feast of the Annunciation each year.

Mother Seton seemed pleased to give progress reports to Antonio Filicchi on the missionary efforts of the Sisters of Charity in Philadelphia and New York and at Mount Saint Mary's College and Seminary near Emmitsburg. In October of 1814 she first sent Sister Rose White, accompanied by Sister Susan Clossey and Sister Theresa Conroy (1780–1823), on mission to Philadelphia to manage Saint Joseph's Asylum, the first Catholic orphanage in the United States. The next August, Sister Bridget Farrell (1765–1847), Sister Ann Gruber (1779?–1840), and a novice, Sister Anastasia Nabbs (1788–1823), began supervision of the infirmary and domestic services at Mount Saint Mary's near Emmitsburg. In August of 1817, Sister Rose White, Sister Cecilia O'Conway, and Sister Felicitas Brady (1784–1883) launched the New York Catholic Benevolent Society, which became the New York City Orphan Asylum (later Saint Patrick's Orphan Asylum).

Reverend Simon Bruté, SS (1779–1839, later first bishop of Vincennes, Indiana, 1834–1839) first came to Mount Saint Mary's (1811). He became chaplain to the Sisters of Charity and spiritual director for Mother Seton. Bruté guided the inculturation of the Vincentian charism among the Sisters of Charity, advising Mother Seton to read and translate the lives of Vincent de Paul and Louise de Marillac and their spiritual writings. Elected the first Mother of the new community, Elizabeth Bayley Seton remained in office until her death on Jan. 4, 1821.

Change. By 1830 the sisters had begun the care of young male orphans on an emergency basis. As a result of recurring problems, however, the council at Emmitsburg made several unsuccessful attempts to limit the age and length of time boys would be in care, but they finally concluded (1845) that the sisters would no longer have boys in their institutions. This decision paved the way for conflict between Louis-Regis Deluol, Sulpician superior general of the Sisters of Charity of Saint Joseph's, and John Hughes (1797–1864), archbishop of New York. The result was the withdrawal of 30 Sisters from Emmitsburg to establish an independent congregation of diocesan right, the Sisters of Charity of Saint Vincent de Paul of New York.

Regis Deluol, fearing that the New York separation could set a precedent for other bishops, continued his pursuit of a union between the French Daughters of Charity and the Sisters of Charity of Saint Joseph's. These efforts were also precipitated by directives (1829 and 1845) from Sulpician major superiors in Paris that the Sulpicians in America divest themselves of any ministry not directly connected with their mission of formation and education of candidates for the priesthood. After meeting with Reverend Mariano Maller, CM (1817–1892), visitor of the Vincentian province of the United States (1846–1850), Deluol wrote in his diary on April 26, 1849 that a decision had been made to unite the Emmitsburg community with the Daughters of Charity in France in order to obtain the assistance of the Congregation of the Mission "Vincentian priests" for the Community.

In her formal request to Father Etienne, CM, on June 19, 1849, Mother Etienne Hall stated that the pending union was "the wish of the kind and venerable Superior [Deluol] who for so many years has labored at the welfare of our Community, and he it is who at this present time continues to make all the efforts in his power to bring about the union so important and so necessary for us." The earliest reference to the union with France occurs in The First Council Book, after arrangements had already been finalized: "On this day [March 25, 1850] the renewal of the Vows has taken place . . . The Sisters have used the same Formula which is used yearly by the Daughters of Charity throughout the world . . . have . . . consummated the Union with the Daughters of Charity of Saint Vincent de Paul" (§324). Almost 100 years later the Daughters of Charity of the United States convened the first meeting of the Conference of Mother Seton's Daughters, which later became the Sisters of Charity Federation in the Vincentian and Setonian Tradition.

Development of federation. The apostolic delegate to the United States, Amleto Giovanni Cardinal Cicognani (1883–1973), recommended that the spiritual daughters of Elizabeth Bayley Seton collaborate to further the cause for canonization of this convert, who was a wife, mother, widow, sole parent, foundress, and spiritual leader. Despite growing pains the Sisters of Charity continued to develop and blossom into independent new congregations in North America: New York (1846), Cincinnati (1852), Halifax (1856), Convent Station (1859), and Greensburg (1870). The conflict-ridden circumstances surrounding the initial separations from Emmitsburg were a source of pain for all involved, especially after French émigré priests belonging to the Society of Saint Sulpice (Sulpicians) of Baltimore arranged for the Sisters of Charity of Saint Joseph's to join (1850) the Company of the Daughters of Charity of Saint Vincent de Paul (DC) of Paris, France.

In a spirit of reconciliation, Sister Isabel Toohey, DC (1893–1979), provincial of the Eastern Province of the Daughters of Charity in the United States, visited the major superiors of the congregations that developed historically from the 1809 Emmitsburg foundation. Sister Isabel asked pardon of them for any role the Sisters of Charity of Saint Joseph's and the Daughters of Charity at Emmitsburg may have had in contributing to strained relations among the spiritual daughters of Elizabeth Bayley Seton over the years. She invited them to meet and discuss collaborative strategies for the Seton cause for canonization.

Historical Perspective. The historic first meeting of the Conference of Mother Seton's Daughters, held at Emmitsburg, Maryland, from Oct. 28 to 29, 1947, proposed: "to strengthen the bond of union among the member congregations and to work together in advancing the cause of Mother Elizabeth Ann Seton." John Michael McNamara (1878–1960), auxiliary bishop of Baltimore (1928–1948) and Washington, D.C. (1948–1960), served as moderator and invited attendees to work together "through a unity of charity in the spirit of Christ." A zealous supporter of the Seton cause, McNamara presided during future sessions as long as his health permitted.

Beginning with the third meeting of the conference, when possible, the vice-postulators for the cause, who were Vincentian priests (Congregation of the Mission), also participated in the meetings: Reverend Salvator M. Burgio, CM (vice-postulator, 1939–1959); Reverend John P. McGowan, CM (vice-postulator, 1959–1968); and Reverend Sylvester A. Taggart, CM (vice-postulator, 1968–1975). The vice-postulators, appointed by the postulator general of the Congregation of the Mission and the Daughters of Charity, updated members about reported miracles and issues regarding the Seton cause.

Purpose. The Conference of Mother Seton's Daughters functioned (1947–1965) with minimal organizational structure until it became the Federation of the Daughters of Blessed (later Saint) Elizabeth Ann Seton (1965). This change responded to the directive of Vatican II (Perfectae Caritatis, §22) that congregations possessing the same general spirit and origin should form a federation for mutual support and development. Members shortened the name of the organization to The Elizabeth Seton Federation (1990), which remained its legal title when incorporated in the state of New York (1995). They adopted the following purposes and a new name, the Sisters of Charity Federation in the Vincentian and Setonian Tradition (1996):

To support the commitment of its members to the mission of Charity expressed through the diversity of their specific congregational charisms.

To foster ongoing study and reflection on the Tradition of Charity.

To facilitate collaboration in projects related to ministry and other areas of common concern.

To foster ongoing study and reflection on the charism and Tradition of Charity in its seventeenth-century origin and in its flowering in many congregations founded in North America.

Until 1975 the federation focused almost exclusively on promoting the Cause of Elizabeth Bayley Seton for sainthood. Many of these projects were publicized by the Mother Seton Guild, an organ of the Postulation, which helped to spread devotion to Elizabeth Bayley Seton and raise funds to advance the cause.

Cause. The Seton cause was introduced in Rome in 1940. Blessed John XXIII declared Mother Seton venerable on Dec. 18, 1959, and also presided at her beatification on March 17, 1963. Pope Paul VI canonized her as Saint Elizabeth Ann Seton on Sept. 14 during the Holy Year of 1975 and the International Year of the Woman. The Holy See accepted three miracles through her intercession: the cures of Sister Gertrude Korzendorfer, DC (1872–1942), of Saint Louis, of cancer; a young child, Ann Theresa O’Neill (b. 1948), of Baltimore, from acute lymphatic leukemia; and Carl Kalin (1902–1976), of New York, from a rare form of encephalitis. Exhumed prior to the beatification, the remains of Saint Elizabeth Ann Seton repose in the Basilica of the National Shrine of Saint Elizabeth Ann Seton, in Emmitsburg, Maryland.

Pope Paul VI announced Elizabeth Seton’s canonization on Dec. 12, 1974. At that time, Sister Hildegarde Marie Mahoney, SC, major superior of the Sisters of Charity of Saint Elizabeth (1971–1979) and chair of the Federation of Blessed Elizabeth Ann Seton, remarked that “Elizabeth Seton now belongs to all people. Her life speaks to all those who seek sincerely to follow God’s Will—in whatever faith; to all who have known human love of husband, wife, family and friends—and the inevitable suffering that is part of that love.” Sister Katherine O’Toole, SC (1935–1990), then superior general of the Sisters of Charity of Halifax (1972–1980), reflected on Elizabeth’s final admonition to her sisters, “Be children of the Church,” with the comment: “When there are so many questions and such confusion . . . the words are a timely reminder of the solidarity that is needed among all of us . . . religious, priests and lay people . . . who are involved in the ongoing process of redemption.”

In planning for the event, federation members, keenly conscious of the needs of the starving people of the world, desired that the canonization festivities be marked by simplicity. Among the gifts the federation presented to Pope Paul VI on this occasion was a contribution of $200,000 to a World Hunger Fund, drawn on the Bank of New York with which Elizabeth’s husband William Magee Seton (1768–1803) and his father William Seton (1746–1798) had been associated, and a calligraphy manuscript of Saint John’s Gospel. Sister Hildegarde Marie had the honor of being a lector at the liturgy of canonization, the first woman to ever read at a papal Eucharistic celebration. Lectors representing the various stages of the life of Elizabeth Bayley Seton read the general intercessions. International media covered the event and U.S. President Gerald R. Ford, in accordance with Senate Joint Resolution 125, designated Sunday, Sept. 14, 1975, as National Saint Elizabeth Seton Day, and he called for such memorials and other observances as are appropriate to the occasion. She was the first person born in the United States to be canonized a saint.

Federation focus. After their successful collaboration on the cause for canonization, the federation focused on joint projects related to charism, formation, and mission. Member congregations explored the triadic base of renewal recommended by Vatican II—the Gospel, the signs of the times, and the original spirit of the founders—and came to a new awareness of and appreciation for their shared heritage and stewardship responsibility for the Vincentian and Setonian charism expressed through the Tradition of Charity (Cf., Perfectae Caritatis, §1–2).

Charism. Members focused on the Seton legacy of education as a springboard for exploring collaborative possibilities through annual conferences of Setonian colleges (1967). The federation also used special anniversaries to promote Seton celebrations in conjunction with the bicentennial year of the birth of Elizabeth Ann Seton (1974), and the bicentennial of the United States (1976).

Among its earliest intercongregational projects were a newsletter, observances of the feast of Blessed Elizabeth Ann Seton, special gatherings at professional meetings, and the publication of reports related to social justice advocacy and local ministries among persons oppressed by poverty. Members assisted the Mother Seton Guild with public relations and promotion of the Seton cause (1969) and served as docents at the Seton Shrine in Emmitsburg. Members also launched drives to seek approval for a Seton stamp from the Citizens Stamp Advisory Committee of the United States Postal Service (1977). Representatives gathered informally as Charity Connections to share reflections and to write occasional essays on the charism, later published (1988) in booklet format, Living the Charity Charism.

The federation has also undertaken some major publication projects. Sister Hildegard Marie Mahoney, SC (New Jersey), was commissioned in 1991 to prepare a manuscript on the history of the Federation, but failing eyesight necessitated her withdrawal from the project. Sister Geraldine Anthony, SC (Halifax), completed A Vision of Service (1997), which was published during the fiftieth anniversary of the federation.

In order to make the writings of Saint Elizabeth Ann Seton more available, the federation appointed (1996) Sister Regina Bechtle, SC (New York), and Sister Judith Metz, SC (Cincinnati), as co-editors for the publication of the corpus of the Seton papers found in numerous archives in the United States and Canada. Ellin M. Kelly, Ph.D., transcribed these documents and served as the manuscript editor along with federation representatives who comprised an advisory committee for the three-volume work, Collected Writings/Elizabeth Bayley Seton (Hyde Park, N.Y. 2000).

Federation members desired to forge links with other groups in the Vincentian Family and appointed (1969) Sister Mathilde Comstock, DC, (1901–1997) and later (1984) Sister Rosemary Fleming, SC (Greensburg), as the official representatives of the group to serve on the national board of the Ladies of Charity of the United States. The Ladies of Charity, begun in Paris (1634), developed from the first foundation by Vincent de Paul at Châtillon-les-Dombes, France (1617). Louise de Marillac was actively involved with the Ladies of Charity from which the Daughters of Charity developed. Over time an awareness of the extended Vincentian Family evolved along with the federation's desire to strengthen intercongregational networking and collaboration. Sister Theresa Capria, SC (New York), represented the federation at the 1998 General Assembly of the Congregation of the Mission in Rome.

Formation. The mistresses of initial formation were the first group invited to convene through the federation (1966). This led to the ongoing discussion about formation practices and sponsorship of formation programs (1985), The Roots Program (1986), Roots on-the-Road (1987), Roots Revisited, and a final vow retreat (1989). Later the Sisters of Charity of New York and the Sisters of Charity of Saint Elizabeth established a joint novitiate (1990), which became (1992) a collaborative novitiate with the additional involvement of the Sisters of Charity of Seton Hill, the New York and Boston Provinces of the Sisters of Charity of Halifax, and later other federation members. An annual gathering of formators evolved (1989) into the Company of Charity Formation Personnel (CCFP), which affiliated (1992) with the federation as a formal subgroup.

During the annual meetings of the federation, members considered strategies to make their shared charism more effective in the modern world, especially in the areas of social justice, spirituality, and renewal programs (1974). One result was the initiation (1988) of Charity: A Shared Vision, an ongoing formation program. A later outcome was the first of several scholarly symposia to explore the historical and theological relevance of The Seton Legacy (1992). The Vincentian Studies Institute collaborated with the federation and published the proceedings of the symposia and annotated listings, by repository, of the writings of Elizabeth Bayley Seton in The Vincentian Heritage.

Mission. Federation members committed themselves to seeking effective strategies for human development, to promoting investment in minority enterprises, and to making corporate responses to social justice issues as early as 1973. Subsequently, members sought ways to study unmet human needs and resources (1979) with the goal of coordinating and networking among already existing ministries which respond to neighbors in need (1987). In order to be more effective advocates on peace and justice issues, the Federation gained recognition as a Non-Governmental Organization (NGO) at the United Nations in 1997. Sister Maria Elena Dio, SC (Halifax), was the first representative of the Federation to the Department of Public Information at the United Nations.

Organizational structure. The canonization in 1975 marked the achievement of the federation's founding purpose. After again revising the statutes and bylaws (1976), the federation adopted a new purpose: "to bring together in love and friendship the various congregations that are inspired by the charism of their common foundress, Saint Elizabeth Ann Seton; and thus be enabled to discover more fully the life and mission of a Sister of Charity today."

The bylaws were amended (1982) to allow for two categories of membership: full membership for those with common origin in the Emmitsburg foundation and associate membership for those that derive their spirit and inspiration from Saint Elizabeth Ann Seton. These were later modified (1985, 1988) to allow equality of status among members and to admit congregations within the Tradition of Charity that do not have a direct connection to Elizabeth Seton.

The federation continued updating and refining its structure and restated (1991) its purpose as follows: To bring together "in love and friendship" congregations that trace their roots to Emmitsburg; have a Seton connection and share her spirit; or share the spirit of Vincent de Paul and Louise de Marillac through adaptation of the Common Rules of the Daughters of Charity. The American Sisters of Charity inculcated the Vincentian charism in North America by modifying the seventeenth-century French rule of Louise and Vincent to suit the needs of the nineteenth-century Church in the United States. The Setonian tradition developed from the Vincentian tradition.

In 1996 the Sisters of Charity Federation in the Vincentian and Setonian tradition adopted a new name and clarified that congregations must meet one of two key criteria for membership: trace their characteristic spirit and charism to the Tradition of Charity of Vincent de Paul, Louise de Marillac, and Elizabeth Ann Seton; and trace the influence of the Vincentian Rule (Common Rules of the Daughters of Charity) in their documents and in their lifestyle.

The Sisters of Charity of the Immaculate Conception (1979) and Les Religieuses de Notre Dame du Sacré-Coeur (1986), both of Canada, were the first additional communities to seek admission as associate members. In 1988 the associate status was deleted in favor of full membership and the following congregations were admitted: Vincentian Sisters of Charity of Pittsburgh (1989); Vincentian Sisters of Charity of Bedford (1990); Sisters of Charity of Nazareth (1991); Sisters of Charity of Our Lady of Mercy of Charleston (1994); and Sisters of Charity of Leavenworth (1995).

Membership. Daughters of Charity of Saint Vincent de Paul (DC) of the United States (Official Catholic Directory #60) was founded in 1633 in Paris by Vincent de Paul and Louise de Marillac as a lay confraternity to serve Jesus Christ in persons who are poor and marginalized. Today in the United States this society of apostolic life traces its roots to the 1809 foundation by Elizabeth Bayley Seton under the direction of the French Sulpicians of Baltimore. After receiving orders for the Sulpicians to return to their principal work of conducting seminaries, Deluol accelerated strategies to unite the Sisters of Charity of Saint Joseph's with the Company of the Daughters of Charity of Saint Vincent de Paul of Paris, France. The Sisters of Charity of Saint Vincent de Paul of New York (1846) and the Sisters of Charity of Cincinnati (1852) developed directly from the Emmitsburg foundation. The Daughters of Charity of the United States was one of six congregations that were founded (1947) by the Sisters of Charity Federation in the Vincentian and Setonian tradition.

Sisters of Charity (SC) of New York. It (Official Catholic Directory #0650) originated in the 1809 foundation by Elizabeth Bayley Seton and began (1817) in New York City as a mission from Emmitsburg to educate and care for children and perform other works of charity. It became autonomous (1846) under the sponsorship of Bishop John Hughes of New York (1797–1864) with Mother Elizabeth Boyle (1788–1861) as the first superior (1846–1849). She had been formed by Mother Seton in the Emmitsburg community and in a letter dated Oct. 25, 1820, Mother Seton referred to Elizabeth Boyle as “dearest old partner of my cares and bearer of my burdens.” This congregation is rooted in the Regulations for the Society of the Sisters of Charity of America, which it modified to allow for the care of male orphans. This congregation later assisted in establishing the Sisters of Charity of Saint Vincent de Paul of Halifax, the Sisters of Charity of Saint Elizabeth, and the Sisters of Charity of the Immaculate Conception. This institute of diocesan right was a founding member of the Sisters of Charity Federation.

Sisters of Charity (SC) of Cincinnati. It (Official Catholic Directory #0440) originated in the 1809 foundation by Elizabeth Bayley Seton and began (1829) in Cincinnati, Ohio, as a mission from Emmitsburg. It became an independent institute (1852) under Archbishop John Baptist Purcell (1800–1883). Mother Margaret Cecilia Farrell George (1787–1868) was the first superior (1853–1859). She had also been a prominent member of the Emmitsburg community. Mother Seton wrote her a prophetic letter dated May 28, 1819, in which she told Margaret George: “You have so much to do for our Lord.” The Cincinnati community retained the Regulations for the Society of the Sisters of Charity of America but added the care of male orphans. This congregation assisted with the establishment of the Sisters of Charity of Saint Elizabeth and the Sisters of Charity of Seton Hill. It became a pontifical institute (1927) and was a founding member of the Sisters of Charity Federation.

Sisters of Charity (SC) of Saint Vincent de Paul. It (Official Catholic Directory #0640) was founded in 1856 in Halifax, Nova Scotia, Canada, by William Walsh, bishop of Halifax (1844–1858), with the assistance of the Sisters of Charity of New York, who had established (1849) a mission in Halifax and supplied the first sisters and officers for the new institute. Mother Basilia McCann (1811–1870), who had formerly belonged to the Emmitsburg community (1830–1847), was the first superior (1849–1855; 1855–1858). Their rule, derived from the Regulations for the Society of the Sisters of Charity of America and based on that of the New York institute, was modified for Canada. This congregation became a pontifical institute (1913) and was a founding member of the Sisters of Charity Federation.

Sisters of Charity (SC) of Saint Elizabeth. It (Official Catholic Directory #0590) was founded in 1859 in Newark, New Jersey, by James Roosevelt Bayley (1814–1877), bishop of Newark and a half-nephew of Elizabeth Bayley Seton. Sister Margaret George, who had lived with Mother Seton, directed the formation of the first novices, who were trained in Ohio by the Sisters of Charity of Cincinnati. The Sisters of Charity of Saint Vincent de Paul of New York sent Sister Mary Xavier Mehegan (1825–1915, superior 1859–1915) and Sister Mary Catherine Nevin (d. 1903, mother assistant 1859–1903) to organize the new institute in New Jersey. They both later opted to join the Sisters of Charity of Saint Elizabeth when it became autonomous (1859). The institute is rooted in the Regulations for the Society of the Sisters of Charity of America. This congregation was a founding member of the Sisters of Charity Federation and later became a pontifical institute (1957).

Sisters of Charity (SC) of Seton Hill. At the request of Bishop Michael Domenec, CM (1816–1878), bishop of Pittsburgh, the Sisters of Charity of Seton Hill (Official Catholic Directory #0570) was officially established (1870) as a separate congregation for the Pittsburgh diocese. Mother Regina Mattingly (1826–1883) of the Sisters of Charity of Cincinnati installed Mother Aloysia Lowe (1836–1889, superior 1870–1889). The first novices were trained by the Sisters of Charity of Cincinnati. Originally the Sisters of Charity of Cincinnati had anticipated that their sisters who were sent to Altoona would eventually return to Ohio; gradually, most of them were recalled. In 1888, however, upon the advice of Bishop Richard Phelan (1828–1904) of Pittsburgh, Mother Aloysia and Sister Ann Regina petitioned the superiors of the Cincinnati motherhouse for permission to remain permanently with the new foundation. The permission was granted. This congregation is rooted in the rule from Cincinnati derived from the Regulations for the Society of the Sisters of Charity of America. It was a founding member of the Sisters of Charity Federation and later became a pontifical institute (1957).

Sisters of Charity of the Immaculate Conception (SCIC). It (Canadian Religious Conference 119) was founded in 1854 in Saint John, New Brunswick, Canada, by Honoria Conway (Sister Mary Vincent, 1815–1892) to care for children left orphaned after a cholera epidemic. The foundress, a novice with the Sisters of Charity of Saint Vincent de Paul of New York, volunteered to go to Saint John at the urgent request of Bishop Thomas Connolly, OFM (1815–1876). Sister Ermelinda Routanne (1822–1894), who previously had belonged to the Sisters of Charity of Saint Joseph's at Emmitsburg (1842–1848?), became a founding member of this congregation (1854) and was known as Mother Mary Frances (second superioress, 1862–1865). This congregation is rooted in the Regulations for the Society of the Sisters of Charity of America. This congregation became a pontifical institute (1908) and joined the Sisters of Charity Federation in 1979.

Les Religieuses de Notre Dame du Sacré-Coeur (NDSC). It (Canadian Religious Conference 177) was established in 1871 as a mission at Bouctouche in New Brunswick, Canada, of the Sisters of Charity of the Immaculate Conception to minister to French-speaking Acadians in order to help them preserve language, culture, and faith. Encouraged by Bishop Edward Alfred LeBlanc (1870–1935), Suzanne Cyr (Soeur Marie Anne, 1850–1941), an Acadian, and 52 other Sisters of Charity of the Immaculate Conception formed (1924) an independent congregation. This congregation is rooted in the Regulations for the Society of the Sisters of Charity of America and was founded as a pontifical institute. It joined the Sisters of Charity Federation in 1986.

Sisters of Charity of Nazareth (SCN). It (Official Catholic Directory #0500) was established 1812 in Nazareth, Kentucky, by Reverend John Baptist David, SS (second bishop of Bardstown, Kentucky, 1832–1833), and cofounder Mother Catherine Spalding (1793–1858, superior 1813–1819; 1824–1831; 1838–1844; 1850–1856) to minister to Catholic families on the frontier. Simon Bruté, SS, made a handwritten copy of the Regulations for the Society of the Sisters of Charity of America for the Nazareth community. Six sisters withdrew (1851) to establish a new congregation, the Sisters of Charity of Nashville, Tennessee, which later became the Sisters of Charity of Leavenworth, Kansas. This congregation became a pontifical institute (1911) and joined the Sisters of Charity Federation in 1991.

Sisters of Charity of Our Lady of Mercy (OLM). It (Official Catholic Directory #0510) was established in 1829 at Charleston, South Carolina, by Bishop John England (1786–1842) to teach young girls, instruct African-American slaves, and care for the sick and infirm. Bishop England obtained the Regulations for the Society of the Sisters of Charity of America. His successor Bishop Ignatius Reynolds (1798–1855), who had served previously as chaplain and second superior of the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth (1833–1835), modified the rule according to England's recommendations. This institute of diocesan right joined the Sisters of Charity Federation in 1994.

Sisters of Charity of Leavenworth (SCL). It (Official Catholic Directory #0480) developed from a mission of the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth at Nashville, Tennessee, under Bishop Pius Miles, OP (1791–1860), and initially became the Sisters of Charity of Nashville (1851). After a misunderstanding, the sisters left Nashville and went to Leavenworth at the invitation of Bishop John Baptist Miège, SJ (1815–1884), vicar apostolic of Indian Territory, Kansas, and continued to follow the same constitution under the title of the Sisters of Charity of Leavenworth (1858). Mother Xavier Ross (1813–1895), formerly of the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth, was the first superior (1858–1862; 1865–1877) of the Leavenworth community. The institute received the Regulations for the Society of the Sisters of Charity of America through Bishop John Baptist Purcell of Cincinnati. This congregation became a pontifical institute (1915) and joined the Sisters of Charity Federation in 1995.

Vincentian Sisters of Charity (VSC) of Pittsburgh. It (Official Catholic Directory #4160) was established 1902 in Braddock, Pennsylvania, as a foundation from the Sisters of Charity of Saint Vincent de Paul of Satu-Mare, Romania, by Mother Emerentiana Handlovits (1869–1935, superior 1902–1935) to serve immigrant peoples from Eastern (now Central) Europe. Voted (1938) to become independent from the parent congregation in Romania and received pontifical status (1951). Traces its roots through the Sisters of Charity of Satu-Mare (1842), Vienna (1843), Zams (1823), and ultimately Strasbourg (1734). John Francis Regis Canevin (1852–1927), bishop of Pittsburgh, renamed this institute, giving it the current title since the Sisters of Charity of Seton Hill were already in the same diocese. This congregation joined the Sisters of Charity Federation in 1989.

Vincentian Sisters of Charity (VSC) of Bedford. It (Official Catholic Directory #4170) was established in 1928 in Bedford, Ohio, by Joseph Schrembs, (1866–1945), bishop of Cleveland, to minister to Slovakian immigrants in that diocese with the intention of starting a new province from the foundation at Pittsburgh. Sister Mary John Berchmans Fialko (1898–1959) was the first superior (1933–1959). This congregation became autonomous (1939) from Pittsburgh as an institute of diocesan right and joined the Sisters of Charity Federation in 1990.

Conclusion. The Federation honors the particular history of each member congregation and their common charism rooted in the founding spirit of Louise de Marillac and Vincent de Paul who instructed the early servants of the poor on Nov. 24, 1658: “How consoled you will be at the hour of death for having consumed our life for the same purpose as Jesus did! It was for charity, for God, for the poor” [Marie Poole, ed., trans. et al., Vincent de Paul Correspondence, Conferences, and Documents, v. 1–8 (New York 1983–2000) 7:397]. In instructions and meditations, Elizabeth Seton reminded her companions of the significance of their name, Sisters of Charity, exhorting them to be faith-filled women of mission. “No personal inconvenience should prevent Sisters of Charity [from] doing what duty and charity require” (Council, Aug. 20, 1814). The members of the federation provide mutual support to one another in living their mission of charity in the modern world through their shared legacy of the Vincentian and Setonian tradition.

Bibliography: Excerpts from Elizabeth Bayley Seton Papers and community documents are due to the courtesy of Archives Saint Joseph’s Provincial House, Daughters of Charity of Saint Vincent de Paul (Emmitsburg, Maryland) and the Archives of the Archdiocese of Baltimore, Maryland. G. ANTHONY, A Vision of Service (New York 1997). R. BECHTLE and J. METZ, eds., Collected Writings/Elizabeth Bayley Seton v. 1 (Hyde Park, N.Y. 2000); v. 2–3 (forthcoming). P. COSTE, Vincent de Paul Life and Works (New York 1987). JOSEPH DIRVIN, Louise de Marillac (New York 1970). A. DODIN, Vincent de Paul and Charity (New York 1992). T. O. HANLEY, ed., The John Carroll Papers, 3 v. (Notre Dame, Ind. 1976). R. P. MALONEY, The Way of Vincent de Paul (New York 1992). J. LEONARD, ed., trans., Conferences of Vincent de Paul to the Daughters of Charity, 4 v. (Westminster, Md. 1939). A. M. MELVILLE, Elizabeth Bayley Seton, 1774–1821 (New York 1951). B. A. MCNEIL, The Vincentian Family Tree: A Genealogical Study of Institutes of Consecrated Life, Societies of Apostolic Life, Lay Associations, and Non-Catholic Religious Institutes (Chicago, Ill. 1996). M. POOLE, ed., trans. et al., Vincent de Paul: Correspondence, Conferences, and Documents, v. 1–8 (New York 1983–1999); v. 9–14 (forthcoming). L. SULLIVAN, trans., Louise de Marillac Spiritual Writings (New York 1991).

[B. A. MCNEIL]

SISTERS OF CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE, MARTYRS OF, BB.

Angeles Lloret Martí and companions; religious of the Institute of Sisters of Christian Doctrine; d. Paterna, Valencia, Spain, September to November 1936; beatified Oct. 1, 1995, by Pope John Paul II.

The third decade of the twentieth century in Spain was characterized by a social and political turmoil and antagonism toward the Catholic Church. The Sisters of the Institute of Christian Doctrine, founded by Mother Micaela Grau in 1880, devoted themselves to teaching catechism even in the midst of the difficult political climate. Dedicated to evangelization, the sisters followed the poor Christ by living in poverty and working arduously to alleviate the anguish of the poor.

While some of the sisters had been able to take refuge with their relatives, others who had no families, the elderly sisters, and their caretakers remained in the Mother House. The sisters who remained kept correspondence with the dispersed sisters during years 1931 to 1936, which intensified in the latter months. These letters witness that they were conscious of the events happening and the imminent danger.

On July 19, 1936, they were forced to abandon the Mother House in Valencia. They remained a community led by Mother Angeles de San José and supported one another. Mother Amparo Rosat and Sister María del Calvario were executed on Sept. 26, 1936, having been incarcerated at Carlet. During the month preceding their death, the sisters continued to trust in God and do works of charity, even knitting jerseys for their captors. On Nov. 20, 1936, a bus came to collect the sisters, ultimately taking them to their death. They are:

Angeles (Francisca D. H. Lloret Martí), superior general; b. Villajoyosa, Alicante, Jan. 16, 1875.

María del Safragio (Antonia María del Sufragio Orts Baldó); b. Altea, Alicante, Feb. 9, 1888; vicar general and novice mistress.

María de Montserrat (María Dolores Llimona Planas), b. Molins de Rey, Barcelona, Nov. 2, 1860; superior general from 1892 to 1931; advisor general in 1936.

María Teresa de San José (Ascensión Duart y Roig); b. Benifayó, Valencia, May 20, 1876; novice mistress and local superior of the Generalate when the revolution broke out.

Isabel (Isabel Ferrer Sabriá); b. Vilanova y la Geltrú, Barcelona, Nov. 15, 1852. Inspired by the ideals of the foundress Mother Micaela, she collaborated in the foundation of the Institute.

Amparo (Teresa Rosat Balasch); b. Mislata, Valencia, Oct. 15, 1873. Superior of the Colegio de Carlet, Valencia; martyred with María del Calvario on September 26, in the station at Llosa de Ranes, Valencia.

María de la Asunción (Josefa Mangoché Homs); b. Ulldecona, Tarragona, July 12, 1859.

María Concepción (Emilia Martí Lacal); b. Carlet, Valencia, Nov. 9, 1861.

María Gracia (Paula de San Antonio); b. Valencia, June 1, 1869.

Corazón de Jesús (María Purificación Gómez Vives); b. Valencia, Feb. 6, 1881.

María del Socorro (Teresa Jiménez Baldoví); b. San Martín de Provençal, Barcelona, March 13, 1885.

María Dolores (Gertrudis Suris Brusola); b. Barcelona, Jan. 17, 1899.

Ignacia del Santísimo Sacramento (Josefa Pascual Pallardó); b. Valencia, 1862.

María del Calvario (Josefa Romero Clariana); b. Carlet, Valencia, April 11, 1871.

María del Rosario (Catalina Calpe Ibáñez); b. Sueca, Valencia, Nov. 25, 1855.

María de la Paz (María Isabel López García); b. Turía, Valencia, Aug. 12, 1885.

Marcela de Santo Tomás (Aurea Navarro); b. Provincia de Albacete; a novice.

Feast: November 20.

Bibliography: V. CÁRCEL ORTÍ, Mártires españoles del siglo XX (Madrid 1995). J. PÉREZ DE URBEL, Catholic Martyrs of the Spanish Civil War, tr. M. F. INGRAMS (Kansas City, Missouri 1993). L'Osservatore Romano, Oct. 29, 1995.

[A. ROS]

SISTERS OF DIVINE PROVIDENCE

(CDP, Official Catholic Directory #0990); founded in 1851 by Bishop Wilhelm Emmanuel von KETTELER of Mainz, Germany. Amelia Fanny de la Roche, one of the original group of five members, became the first superior of the community, which adopted the title of Sisters of Divine Providence. In 1873, during the KULTURKAMPF, the German government prohibited their teaching in government schools and forbade the acceptance of new members. Three years later six sisters made the first United States settlement in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. The congregation's rules and regulations, drawn up by Ketteler and modeled on those of St. Vincent de Paul, were later revised and received papal approbation in 1935. The members bind themselves by the three vows of religion and exercise their apostolate primarily through educational and nursing activities.

At the beginning of the 21st century, there were three provinces in the United States: St. Peter's (established 1876) with headquarters at Allison Park, Pennsylvania; St. Louis (established 1930), at Hazelwood, Missouri; and Our Lady of Divine Providence (established 1957), at Kingston, Massachusetts. The generalate of the congregation is in Rome, Italy.

[M. A. WINSCHHEL/EDS.]

SISTERS OF DIVINE PROVIDENCE OF KENTUCKY

(CDP, Official Catholic Directory #1000); established in 1889 at Newport, KY, by members of the Congregation of the Sisters of Divine Providence, founded in Lorraine, France, in 1762, by John Martin MOYË, parish priest of the Diocese of Metz. Moyë desired "to form Sisters who would go alone into the hamlets and isolated country places, there to teach school and catechism to neglected children." His plan became effective Jan. 14, 1762, when Marguerite Lecomte opened the first school in Vigy, near Metz. When the French Revolution disrupted the schools, Moyë and a group of about 30 sisters under Sister Rose Methains, Superior General of the congregation, became exiles in Trier, Germany. After the Revolution the sisters returned to France and opened a novitiate in Insming (1803), Hommarting (1812), and St. Jean de Bassel (1827), the present motherhouse general of the Sisters of Divine Providence of Metz. Despite disturbed political conditions, the congregation grew steadily and in 1888, Rev. Mother Anna Houlné, Superior General (1885–1903), became interested in extending the congregation's work to the U.S. With the approval of Bp. Camillus Paul Maes of Covington, KY, the first house of the congregation in the new world was established at Mt. St. Martin Convent, Newport, KY. Subsequently, an academy and a novitiate were opened there. Under the constitutions, definitively approved by the Holy See in 1943, teaching and nursing are the principal works of the congregation.

Since 1919, St. Anne Convent, Melbourne, KY, has served as provincial house and novitiate. In the U.S., the sisters are engaged in the fields of academic education, catechetics, homes for working women, retreat centers, parish ministry, pastoral ministry, healthcare and social services.

Bibliography: Archives, Sisters of Divine Providence of Kentucky, St. Anne Convent, Melbourne, Kentucky. R. PLUS, Shepherd of Untended Sheep, tr. J. ALOYSIUS and M. GENEROSA (Westminster, MD 1950).

[M. S. BRAUCH/EDS.]

SISTERS OF DIVINE PROVIDENCE OF TEXAS

(CDP, Official Catholic Directory #1010); a congregation of pontifical rite engaged in teaching, nursing, and social service work in the southwest United States and Mexico. It is a branch of the institute founded (1762) by John Martin Moyë in Lorraine, France, for the education of poor children, particularly in country places.

In 1866, in answer to Bishop Claude Dubuis's appeal, two Sisters of Divine Providence of the Congregation of St. Jean-de-Bassel, Lorraine, arrived in Texas to staff a parochial school in Austin, erected to comply with the decrees of the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore. A provincial motherhouse of the American group was established at Castroville (about 20 miles west of San Antonio) and received both natives and European vocations until 1886, when it became an independent diocesan congregation. In 1898 the motherhouse was transferred to San Antonio. The sisters also engaged in work among the African-Americans in Louisiana (1887); the Native Americans in Oklahoma (1902); and the Spanish-speaking population of the Southwest, whose need for organized catechetical instruction resulted in the founding of the Missionary Catechists of Divine Providence (MCDP). This branch of the congregation received papal approval in 1946. The congregation has been pontifical since 1907.

Bibliography: M. G. CALLAHAN, The History of the Sisters of Divine Providence, San Antonio, Texas (Milwaukee 1955); The Life of Blessed John Martin Moyë (Milwaukee 1964).

[M. G. CALLAHAN/EDS.]

SISTERS OF MERCY

The title Sisters of Mercy (RSM) pertains to a number of religious congregations of women which were founded by and embrace the charism of Catherine McAuley (1778 to 1941) and whose constitutions can be traced to the original (1841) Sisters of Mercy Rule and Constitutions. With one exception, the Diocesan Sisters of Mercy of Portland, Mercy congregations are of pontifical jurisdiction. Characteristic of the Sisters of Mercy is their fourth vow of service to the poor, sick and ignorant. The three principal groupings of Sisters of Mercy in the United States are:

Sisters of Mercy of the Americas (Official Catholic Directory #2575); Religious Sisters of Mercy of Alma, Michigan (Official Catholic Directory #2519); Diocesan Sisters of Mercy of Portland, Maine (Official Catholic Directory #2655).

Historical Foundations

The Institute of Our Lady of Mercy was established in Dublin, Ireland, on Dec. 12, 1831, by Catherine Elizabeth MCAULEY; in the 20th century her followers formed the largest English-speaking group of religious women in the world, embracing various unions and independent congregations of Sisters of Mercy.

Institute of the Sisters of Mercy (RSM). As early as 1822 Catherine McAuley had worked out a successful system of distributing food and clothing to the needy, of instructing and training poor girls, and of performing other works of mercy. In 1824, on a site in south Dublin, she planned a center for her charitable endeavors, which, designated by Archbishop Daniel Murray as the House of Mercy, opened on Sept. 24, 1827, the feast of Our Lady of Mercy. Although its personnel consisted mainly of women of means who felt an attraction to the religious life, Miss McAuley herself had no desire to be a religious. She did, however, place her estate in a trust, with the proviso that the Baggot Street property should be under the control and management of the archbishop of Dublin.

St. Mary's Boarding School, Sacred Heart Mission, Macon, Illinois.

Moreover, for the sake of economy and uniformity, she sanctioned the adoption of a uniform dress and the observance of a horarium modeled on that of religious communities. Some of the clergy and laity of Dublin opposed this charitable organization as unorthodox and regarded it as an unfriendly rival of the Irish Sisters of Charity, an institute founded by Mary AIKENHEAD. As prejudice and opposition to her House of Mercy mounted, Miss McAuley expressed her willingness to turn the institution over to the Sisters of Charity. In an effort to resolve the situation, Archbishop Murray insisted that she either embrace the religious life or determine to continue the work along secular lines.

Despite her personal antipathy to the idea of starting a religious congregation, Miss McAuley finally selected the Presentation Convent at George's Hill, Dublin, as the place where she and two companions would receive their canonical training in preparation for the founding of a new institute. Her choice was influenced by the fact that Nano NAGLE, foundress of the Presentation sisters, had held ideals similar to her own with regard to work among the sick poor. After 15 months of preparation, during which the future foundress of the Institute of Our Lady of Mercy was subjected to many trials, the first three Sisters of Mercy pronounced the simple vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience on Dec. 12, 1831. Returning to the House of Mercy, Mother Catherine McAuley, Sister Elizabeth Harley, and Sister Anne Doyle were welcomed by the seven women who had continued the work of serving the poor in their absence and who in turn were eager to receive the religious training that would qualify them to become Sisters of Mercy.

Rules and Constitutions. In drawing up the rules and constitutions for the institute, the foundress used the rule of the Presentation sisters, which was based on that of St. Augustine as adapted by St. Thomas of Villanova. She composed two original chapters that dealt with the visitation of the sick and the care of distressed women. Since the Presentation sisters' rule adhered to the monastic form, it was necessary to make some modifications with regard to enclosure. Gregory XVI approved the institute on March 24, 1835; he gave final confirmation to its rule in June 1841.

Growth. Mother McAuley personally directed the establishment of 12 convents in Ireland and two in England, where uniformity of observance was practiced. After her death on Nov. 11, 1841, however, each house became independent. The first overseas foundation was made from the Convent of Mercy, Dublin, in 1842, when Sister Frances Creedon, a native of Newfoundland, and two other sisters left Ireland to begin work in Newfoundland under Bishop Michael Fleming. The following year Mother M. Francis Xavier WARDE and six companions from Carlow made the first foundation in the United States at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. Within the next 15 years other foundations were made at New York (1846) from the parent house, Dublin; Little Rock, Arkansas (1851), from Naas; and San Francisco, California (1854), and Cincinnati, Ohio (1858), from Kinsale. These, together with the foundation at Middletown, Connecticut, made from Ennis in 1872, were the centers of subsequent American growth.

Sisters of Mercy collecting money, 1941. (©Hulton-Deutsch Collection/CORBIS)

In 1846 Mother Ursula Frayne (who had been one of the three to undertake the Newfoundland mission) arrived at Perth in western Australia with six sisters from Baggot Street to make a foundation in that newly developing country. Sisters of Mercy also reached New South Wales in the 1850s; they made foundations from Westport, Charleville, Ennis, Rochford Bridge, and Callan in Ireland, and also from Liverpool, England. From Perth a group was sent to Victoria in 1857, and three years later a group from Baggot Street under Mother Xavier Maguire sailed for Geelong. When additional sisters were needed in Victoria, the houses of Swinford, Carlow, and Carrick-on-Shannon, Ireland, responded generously. After Queensland became a separate colony from New South Wales (1859), its capital Brisbane received a contingent of Baggot Street sisters under the able leadership of Mother Vincent Whitty. Others went from Athy, and London supplied many more. South Australia and Tasmania also benefited by foundations in their emerging urban centers. The bishops in the areas to which the sisters went, most of whom were Irish-born, were convinced that the growth of the Church was dependent on the education of youth.

The first foundation in Scotland was made in 1849 from Limerick under Mother Elizabeth Moore, but its growth was less rapid and extensive than elsewhere. In 1850 Mother Cecelia Maher and four sisters from Carlow made the first of several foundations at Auckland, New Zealand. In 1856 Mother Evangelist Fitzpatrick and eight sisters from Dublin went to Buenos Aires, Argentina, where they worked until they were expelled in 1880, only to be recalled a decade later. A foundation made at Barbados, British West Indies, by sisters from Middlesex, England, was relinquished in 1894 to the Ursulines, when the Sisters of Mercy went to Charlestown, Demarara, British Guiana. In 1883 Belize, British Honduras, welcomed its first Sisters of Mercy from the United States, when Mother Teresa Austin Carroll and five companions from New Orleans, Louisiana (founded in 1869 from St. Louis, Missouri, which had been established from New York in 1856), went to assist the Jesuit missionaries. Sisters from Bermondsey, England, opened a mission at Jamaica, British West Indies, in 1890; and in 1897 a group from Strabane, Ireland, went to Mafeking, South Africa.

The Sisters of Mercy from Pittsburgh took up missionary activities in San Juan, Puerto Rico, in 1941. In 1946 sisters from Belmont, North Carolina, inaugurated a successful apostolate on Guam, where native sisters soon extended the works of the institute. First among Mother McAuley's daughters on the continent of Asia were the sisters from Merion, Pennsylvania, who established Mater Misericordiae Hospital at Jamshedpur, India. Sisters from St. Maries-of-the-Isle, Cork, Ireland, and from Buffalo, New York, engaged in missionary endeavors in the Philippine Islands. In 1959 the province of Providence, Rhode Island, sent sisters to La Ceiba, Honduras, and a year later missionary activity, sponsored by the province of Chicago, Illinois, was initiated in Sicuani, in the Peruvian Andes.

Apostolate. Throughout the history of the institute, the Sisters of Mercy have undertaken a variety of works to extend the interests of the Church. The outbreak of Asiatic cholera in Ireland in 1832, and again in the 1850s in Ireland, England, and the United States, provided many opportunities for the sisters to relieve the afflicted. During the Crimean War (1854 to 1855), sisters from England and Ireland served in British military hospitals at Scutari and Koulali in Turkey and at Balaclava in Russian terrain, caring for sick and wounded soldiers. Sisters from communities in New York; Chicago, Illinois; Baltimore, Maryland; Cincinnati, Ohio; Little Rock, Arkansas; Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; and Vicksburg, Mississippi, ministered to both Union and Confederate soldiers during the American Civil War (1861 to 1865). Many victims of the Chicago fire of 1871 were aided by the Sisters of Mercy, whose hospital became a house of refuge. During the Boer War (1899 to 1902), sisters at Mafeking, who diverted their efforts from education to hospital care, ministered to Boer and Briton alike.

The Sisters of Mercy bind themselves to observe the three simple vows of religion and the requirements of their constitutions. The characteristic works of the institute include the education of the young, the visitation of the sick in homes, the care of the sick in hospitals, the care of girls and of women, of the aged, and of orphans. The spirit of the institute is mercy, theologically defined as love in the face of misery; it permits such an extension of the works of mercy as human needs may necessitate. The importance of a collective approach through service was emphasized by Mother McAuley, who stressed also the careful observance of the constitutions so that her followers, nourished through the liturgy and private prayer, would express their love for Christ in His Mystical Body through service to everyone.

Sisters of Mercy of the Union in the United States.

During the period of rapid growth and development, the institute was characterized by close adherence to its rule and spirit among the many scattered communities. Until the promulgation of the 1917 Code of Canon Law, legislation promulgated by the then Congregation of Religious, particularly with regard to the training of postulants and novices, was not always followed; pioneer life frequently led to irregularities. In 1902 and 1905 attempts were made to urge the Sisters of Mercy in the United States to consider the adoption of general government as a means of more effective fulfillment of their religious purpose. In 1907 the Sisters of Mercy in Victoria and Tasmania amalgamated; they received approval of their revised constitutions in 1918. A similar revision, submitted by the sisters in the Dioceses of San Francisco, Monterey-Fresno, and Los Angeles, California, and of Tucson, Arizona, received approval in 1922. In 1929, under the guidance of Archbishop Pietro Fumasoni-Biondi, then Apostolic Delegate, 39 of the 60 independent motherhouses in the United States amalgamated to form the Institute of the Religious Sisters of Mercy of the Union in the United States of America, with Mother Carmelita Hartman as first mother general. The number of provinces grew from the original six to more than three times that number in the ensuing decades. In 1931 the generalate was located at Bethesda, Maryland (near Washington, D.C.). Revised constitutions were approved by Pius XI in 1931 and confirmed by Pius XII in 1940.

By the mid-1960s, more than 7,000 Sisters of Mercy belonged to the Union and there was almost an equal number attached to 17 independent motherhouses, each enjoying papal approbation. In the same period, the total world membership of the Sisters of Mercy was more than 27,000, including approximately 5,000 in Ireland, 4,000 in Australia, 2,500 in Great Britain, and 1,000 in New Zealand.

Developments since Vatican II

Since the Second Vatican Council, the Mercy Sisters, both in the United States and worldwide, have expanded the range of their ministries, most still connecting with both the spiritual and corporal works of mercy. The Sisters both promote systemic social change and respond in more immediate ways to current needs by establishing and/or staffing emergency housing shelters, food banks, soup kitchens, and centers for housing assistance, as well as developing ministries focused on persons with AIDS, chemically dependent persons, those in prison, and immigrants for whom English is a second language. The Sisters of Mercy of the Americas sponsor ministries such as the McAuley Institute, an organization that provides technical assistance, advocacy, and funding for groups nationwide working to provide low-income housing. In 1971, the Sisters of Mercy established Mercy Action, Inc., as a funding resource corporation. Its purpose is to empower people in ministry with the poor to carry on the works of mercy that improve the quality of life, effect positive changes in attitudes, and change structures that perpetuate inhuman and unjust conditions.

Many of the congregations have members ministering in developing nations: the Irish, in several African and South American nations; North Americans, in the Caribbean, Central, and South America, and the Pacific; Australians and New Zealanders, in the Pacific and Southeast Asia. Catherine McAuley's preferential concern for women continues to motivate the Sisters of Mercy as they strive to promote the dignity of women and their full participation in both Church and society.

Amalgamation and Consolidation. Although the Mercy congregation was founded as a pontifical institute, because of the social and ecclesial considerations of the times Catherine McAuley established new foundations as autonomous houses with direct ties to local diocesan bishops. This practice prevailed throughout the remainder of the nineteenth century wherever the sisters went. During the early twentieth century, because of the perceived need for a stronger organization, more uniform discipline, regularized novitiates, and a higher quality leadership, Church authorities and many congregational superiors encouraged unification on diocesan and eventually national scales.

As noted above, the most comprehensive union prior to the Second Vatican Council occurred with the 1929 formation of the Religious Sisters of Mercy of the Union of the United States of America. It involved some 42 autonomous congregations, over two-thirds of the number of Mercy congregations then in existence in the United States.

The Second Vatican Council's decree on the renewal of religious life, Perfectae caritatis, exhorted religious institutes to rediscover the spirit of their founders; it further directed congregations belonging to the same family to form federations and possibly unions. This decree, together with the growing realization that the Mercy Sisters' trend toward autonomy in its foundations was not tied inseparably to Catherine McAuley's original inspiration but rather was the method that suited well the time of expansion, sparked worldwide movements toward restructuring.

Initially, in North America this renewed sense of commonality resulted in the 1965 establishment of the Federation of the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas, replacing the less inclusive and less structured Mother McAuley Conference formed some ten years earlier. The Federation strengthened bonds between the autonomous congregations of the United States and Canada and the Sisters of Mercy of the Union. The 1967 establishment of the non-governmental Conference of the Sisters of Mercy of Australia encompassed sisters in two other groupings: the Australian Union (formed 1953) and the Australian federation (formed 1957). In 1968, the establishment of the Federation of the Sisters of Mercy of New Zealand encompassed that nation's four existing congregations: Auckland, Wellington, Christchurch and Dunedin. Renamed as the Federation of the Sisters of Mercy of Aotearoa New Zealand, these Sisters of Mercy serve in Aotearoa-New Zealand, Western Samoa, Fiji, Tonga, Vietnam, South Africa, Chile, Jamaica and Australia.

Comprehensive Restructuring Efforts. The experience of various national groupings of Sisters of Mercy during the late 1960s and 1970s and the rapidly changing demographics compelled leadership to initiate movement toward more comprehensive restructuring.

Great Britain. In 1976, a new religious Institute was formed, the Union of the Sisters of Mercy of Great Britain, comprised of the Birmingham Amalgamation (formed 1932) and the Westminster Amalgamation (formed 1922) and governed by a General Superior and Council. In addition to serving in England, Scotland and Wales, Union Sisters of Mercy served in Peru.

In 1983, the Institute of the Sisters of Mercy, with houses in England, Peru and Kenya came into existence with a governance structure comprised of a Superior General and a Council with four provinces. In 1996, the governance structure was altered with the provinces being dissolved and an Institute Leader and Leadership Team designated to govern the entire Institute. Over the years a non-governmental Federation type structure has also been attempted. The first Federation formed in 1969 yielded to a second formed in 1988 that presently is comprised of approximately 16 percent of the Mercy Sisters in Great Britain.

Australia. Between 1975 and 1980, the Conference of the Sisters of Mercy of Australia conducted extensive consultations with membership concerning the formation of a governmental structure to unite the Australian Union of the Sisters of Our Lady of Mercy (formed 1953) and the Australian Federation of the Religious Sisters of Mercy (formed 1957). On Dec. 15, 1981, with the convening of its inaugural chapter, the Institute of the Sisters of Mercy of Australia came into existence. This new entity, with each of the 17 congregations remaining autonomous, and with foundations in Papua New Guinea and Pakistan had membership extending to sisters in the Australian Aboriginal settlement on the edge of the Great Sandy Desert, Thailand, Cambodia, Hong Kong, Ethiopia, and the Philippines.

The Australian governance structure includes several central but no centralizing bodies, i.e., the National Chapter, the National Executive Council (a national president and council) and the National Plenary Council (the general superiors of the member congregations and the National Executive Council).

The Americas. In 1981, as the Australians were inaugurating their new institute, the Federation of the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas began to consider the topic of restructuring. Initial conversation included all autonomous member congregations, the Sisters of Mercy of the Union, and the Canadian-based Sisters of Mercy of Newfoundland, whose joint members served in North America, the Caribbean, Central America, South America, Guam, and the Philippines.

Between 1981 and 1985, the Federation's consultation with the membership and the Roman Curia's Congregation for Religious produced a governance structure that served as the basis for a decision-making process used by the Federation's United States congregations; because of geographic, cultural, and other concerns, the Newfoundland congregation decided to discontinue participation in the restructuring project.

On July 20, 1991, the Institute of the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas came into existence with the convening of the First Institute Chapter. The founding members of this Mercy institute included the 16 former autonomous congregations and the former Sisters of Mercy of the Union with its nine provinces. The Institute's governance structure includes the Institute Chapter, the Institute President and Council, and the Institute Leadership Council comprised of the Institute President and Council and 25 regional presidents.

Not included in this 1991 foundation were 12 Sisters of Mercy of Portland, who refused membership in the new institute and became the Diocesan Sisters of Mercy of Portland, and about 40 Mercy sisters, who comprised the Religious Sisters of Mercy of Alma, Michigan, a congregation that was formed after ten sisters terminated membership in the Sisters of Mercy of the Union in 1973.

The Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland. In 1985, the national Assembly of the Sisters of Mercy in Ireland (the general superiors and elected delegates from each congregation) formed an association, "Mercy Ireland," which was commissioned to explore the feasibility of the 26 Irish congregations becoming a single institute with canonical status. Between 1985 and 1990, Mercy Ireland consulted with membership to determine the type of governance structure desired. Overwhelmingly, the sisters opted to form a single institute as their United States counterparts had done. On July 14, 1994, with the convening of the first congregational chapter, the Congregation of the Sisters of Mercy of Ireland came into existence. The 26 former autonomous Irish congregations and one autonomous congregation centered in Johannesburg, South Africa, formed this single institute. The Sisters of Mercy of Ireland consists of four Irish provinces, a South African province and a United States province. Kenya is a vice-province; Canada, Nigeria, Peru and Zambia are regions; while Brazil, Dundee (S.A.), Peru and Rwanda and Zambia are mission areas. The 1994 governance structure included a Congregational chapter, a Congregational Leader and Team, and a Plenary Conference consisting of the provincial leaders and the Congregational Leader and Team.

Establishment of Non-Juridical Structures. In addition to the official governmental structures, the Sisters of Mercy have also supported less formalized structures to enhance the effectiveness of their mission of mercy and justice. In so doing, links were made over both congregational and national boundaries. For instance, in 1979, the United States-based Sisters of Mercy of the Union founded the Latin American Caribbean Conference (LACC) to enable its sisters serving in that geographic region to network among themselves. At the first meeting, the sisters voted to open LACC up to all Mercy Sisters in ministry in that part of the world regardless of countries/congregations of origin. LACC includes sisters serving in the Caribbean (the Bahamas, Belize, Guyana, Haiti, Jamaica), Central America (Guatemala, Honduras, Panama), and South America (Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Peru).

Likewise, in 1989, the Institute of the Sisters of Mercy of Australia and the Federation of the Sisters of Mercy of New Zealand formed Mercy Pacific as a means to network the sisters working in Tonga, Samoa, Fiji, Papua New Guinea, New Zealand, and Australia. Similar structures—usually ministry-related—have been formed to provide networking opportunities for the sisters and their partners in ministry. Justice networks, e.g., the Mercy Justice Network of the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas, the Australian Mercy Aboriginal Justice Network, and Mercy Refugee Service, provide mechanisms for the Sisters of Mercy to address social ills.

Mercy International Association. A unifying force for all Sisters of Mercy is the Mercy International Association (MIA) which is a group comprised of the leader of each of the Mercy Congregations, Institutes, or Federations worldwide. The purposes of MIA are to increase our awareness and experience of our interdependence and to foster unity of heart and mind among Sisters of Mercy; to facilitate collaboration for the sake of ministry and justice and to encourage and nurture the Mercy charism within the various cultures of the world. MIA sponsors two ongoing activities—Mercy Global Concern which is the Mercy presence at the U.N. and Mercy International Justice Network which is a network of sisters around the world working on justice issues.

Associate Members. Since the 1980s, most Mercy congregations have embraced some form of associate lay involvement through which non-vowed women and men share formally the mission of the Sisters of Mercy. In the United States alone, approximately 1,247 women and men are associate members of the Sisters of Mercy.

Founder Honored. On April 9, 1990, the Congregation for the Causes of Saints declared Catherine Elizabeth McAuley as venerable, the first step in the effort to advance her cause for canonization. In July 1994, the House of Mercy in Dublin, opened by Catherine McAuley on Sept. 24, 1827, was rededicated as the Mercy International Centre. This newly renovated facility is sponsored by Sisters of Mercy worldwide.

Conclusion. During the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, the Sisters of Mercy were instrumental in the shaping the systems of education, health care, and social services in various countries. In the United States today, strengthened by formation of health care systems and greater appreciation of the role of the laity in their institutions, the Sisters of Mercy are one of the nation's leading health care providers. In addition to hospitals and other healthcare facilities, they sponsor colleges and high schools, elementary schools and other centers of learning and childcare.

Bibliography: H. AMOS and H. BURNS, "Restructuring the Sisters of Mercy," Human Development 12 (1991) 16–20. M. B. BAUMAN, A Way of Mercy: Catherine McAuley's Contribution to Nursing (New York 1958). A. BOLSTER, Catherine McAuley: Venerable for Mercy (Dublin 1990). E. A. BOLSTER, The Sisters of Mercy in the Crimean War (Cork 1964). M. C. BOURKE, A Woman Sings of Mercy (Sidney 1987). B. BRENNAN, "It Commenced with Two": The Story of Mary Ann Doyle (Ireland 2001). R. B. SAVAGE, Catherine McAuley: The First Sister of Mercy (Dublin 1949). A. CARROLL, Leaves from the Annals of the Sisters of Mercy, 4 v. (New York 1895). C. DARCY, The Institute of the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas: The Canonical Development of the Proposed Governance Model (Lanham, Maryland 1993). M. B. DEGNAN, Mercy Unto Thousands: Life of Mother Mary Catherine McAuley (Westminster, Maryland 1957). H. DELANEY, The Evolution of the Governance Structures of the Sisters of Mercy in Australia, 1946–1990 (Ottawa 1991). K. HEALY, Frances Warde: American Founder of the Sisters of Mercy (New York 1973). E. HERRON, The Sisters of Mercy in the United States, 1843–1928 (New York 1929). M. HOGAN, Pathways of Mercy in Newfoundland, 1842–1984 (St. John's 1986). M. J. GATELY, The Sisters of Mercy: Historical Sketches, 1831–1931 (New York 1931). H. MULDRY, Abounding in Mercy. Mother Austin Carroll (New Orleans 1988). M. I. NEUMANN, The Letters of Catherine McAuley, 1827–1941 (Baltimore 1969). J. REGAN and J. KEISS, Tender Courage (Chicago 1988). SISTERS OF MERCY, Trees of Mercy: Sisters of Mercy of Great Britain from 1839 (Wickford, Essex 1993). M. SULLIVAN, Catherine McAuley and the Tradition of Mercy (Dublin and Notre Dame, Indiana 1995). M. SULLIVAN, "Catherine McAuley's Theological and Literary Debt to Alfonso Rodriguez: The 'Spirit of the Institute' Parallels," Recusant History 20 (1990) 81–105. M. SULLIVAN, The Friendship of Florence Nightingale and Mary Clare Moore (Philadelphia 1999). I. SUMNER, Angels of Mercy: An Eyewitness Account of the Civil War and Yellow Fever, ed. M.P. Oakes (Baltimore 1998). R. WERNTZ, Our Beloved Union. A History of the Sisters of Mercy of the Union (Westminster, Maryland 1989).

[M. MC A. GILLGANNON/C. C. DARCY]

SISTERS OF PROVIDENCE

(SP, Official Catholic Directory #3340); a diocesan congregation whose motherhouse is in Holyoke, Massachusetts (Diocese of Springfield). This religious community stems from a congregation founded in 1861 in Kingston, Ontario, Canada (SP, Official Catholic Directory #3350), a community that was, in turn, a branch of the Sisters of Charity of Providence of Montreal (founded in 1843). A group of four sisters from Kingston came to St. Jerome's parish in Holyoke on Nov. 7, 1873, invited by the pastor, Patrick J. Harkins. In 1874 they established the first Catholic hospital in western Massachusetts. One year later another group of six sisters arrived to teach in St. Jerome's parish school for boys. In August 1892 the community in Holyoke separated itself from the Kingston foundation and became a diocesan institute as a result of the negotiations carried out by the first bishop of Springfield, Patrick T. O'Reilly (1870–92). Their religious life was based on the rule that St. VINCENT DE PAUL wrote for the Daughters of Charity. The congregation is engaged in the ministries of healthcare, geriatrics, catechetics, pastoral ministries and social outreach.

[M. L. DONOVAN]

SISTERS OF PROVIDENCE OF ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS

The Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary-in-the-Woods (SP; Official Catholic Directory #3360) came to the United States in 1840 from Ruillé-sur-Loir, France at the request of Simon Bruté, the first bishop of the Diocese of Vincennes, Indiana. They were asked to establish a novitiate for the formation of new members and open an academy for young women.

The French community of the Sisters of Providence of Ruillé had been founded in 1806 by Jacques-François Dujarié, in response to the dire needs of the people of the countryside as a result of the French Revolution and its aftermath. By the 1830s the little community was flourishing and generously responded to the needs of the American frontier. After a long and arduous journey, Mother Theodore GUÉRIN and her five companions arrived in the midst of the Indiana forest on Oct. 22, 1840.

Four prospective candidates awaited them in the farmhouse, home to the Thralls' family. This frame building, which they would purchase from the Thralls family within the next month, was to serve for 13 years as the first Providence convent. In November 1840, Bishop Celestine de la Hailandière formally opened the novitiate with the reception of three of the original American postulants. In July 1841, St. Mary's Female Institute admitted its first students in the fine brick academy that Hailandière had built.

In the beginning, the community operated under the French Rule of 1835. Modifications to the original rule were made in 1843 and again in 1863. Finally in 1894 Leo XIII gave definitive approval to the Constitutions and established the American congregation as a papal institute.

After the death of Mother Theodore in May 1856, the Congregation continued to grow. Because education was the crying need of the frontier, the sisters were unable to pursue their traditional commitment to healthcare. At the time of the Civil War, however, some sisters were temporarily withdrawn from the schools to assist in the military hospitals in Indianapolis and Vincennes. For a brief time, they administered the St. John's Home for Invalids in Indianapolis, a facility founded to care for wounded veterans.

At the beginning of the 20th century, the increased influx of immigrants drawn to the large industrial cities of the Midwest reemphasized the need for parochial schools. The Congregation expanded to Michigan, Chicago, and beyond. In November 1920, six Sisters of Providence, under the leadership of Sr. Marie Gratia Luking, opened the first American missionary school for girls on mainland China. In 1929, Sr. Marie Gratia founded an auxiliary congregation of young Chinese women, the Providence Catechist Society. For the next 30 years, the Providence Catechist Sisters remained under the guidance of the Sisters of Providence, but in 1962 they achieved canonical status as an autonomous congregation.

In the United States the Sisters of Providence continued to grow, staffing elementary and secondary schools in New Hampshire, Maryland, Massachusetts, North Carolina, Indiana, Illinois, Oklahoma, Texas, California, and Washington, D.C. They also maintained St. Mary-of-the-Woods College and Immaculata Junior College in Washington, D.C., as well as Providence College of Liberal Arts and Sciences in Taiwan. Of these institutions of higher learning, only St. Mary-of-the-Woods continues in existence in the 21st century.

At the beginning of the third Christian millennium, the Sisters of Providence are engaged in various ministries throughout the U. S. and Taiwan, serving as educators, pastoral associates, healthcare givers, hospital chaplains, and home visitors to the aged and infirm. On Oct. 25, 1998, Pope John Paul II beatified Mother Theodore Guérin.

Bibliography: M. B. BROWN, The History of the Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary of the Woods, Vol. I 1806–1856 (New York 1949). E. LOGAN, The History of the Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary of the Woods, Vol II 1856–1890 (Saint Mary-of-the-Woods, Indiana 1978). M. R. MADDEN, The Path Marked Out: history of the Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods, Vol. III 1890–1926 (Saint Mary-of-the-Woods, Indiana 1991). A. C. WOLF, Against all Odds: Sisters of Providence Mission to the Chinese, 1920–1990 (Saint Mary-of-the-Woods, Indiana 1990).

[M. R. MADDEN]

Mother Theodore Guérin.

SISTERS OF THE ADORATION OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT

The Congregation of the Sisters of the Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament (SABS), a congregation of religious women within the SYRO-MALABAR CHURCH, was founded at Champakulam in 1908 by Bishop Thomas Kurialacherry, with the assistance of its first member Mother Mary Chantal. After the death of Bishop Kurialacherry in 1925, Father J. Kandathiparampil directed the Congregation. In 1930 the Congregation was introduced in the Archdiocese of Ernakulam. Independent diocesan communities of the Congregation which were established in the various Syro-Malabar dioceses were united under a Superior General in 1963. The Congregation was raised to the pontifical status by Pope Paul VI in 1968.

Prime importance is given to the Eucharistic apostolate. Each day every SABS spends one hour of eucharistic adoration before the Blessed Sacrament. The whole Congregation is taken as a single unit to have a chain adoration both day and night throughout the year. Besides the Eucharistic apostolate, SABS extends their services in the fields of education, care of the sick, pastoral ministry and other social welfare activities when and where need arises. The Sisters wear a white habit, white coif, black veil, and a medal of the Blessed Sacrament.

By the end of 2000, the Congregation had grown to over 4000 members including a few from outside Kerala, distributed in seven provinces, six vice-provinces and two regions.

Bibliography: The Silver Jubilee of the Sisters of Adoration and the Inauguration of Perpetual Adoration, Mannanam, 1936. SR. METILDA SABS, Oru Kudumbathinte Kadha, "The Story of a Family" in Malayalam (Aluva 1991). SABS Constitution (Aluva, 1991). Indian Christian Directory, (Kottayam 2000), 1288.

[A.M. MUNDADAN]

SISTERS OF THE MOST HOLY SACRAMENT

(MHS, Official Catholic Directory #2940), a congregation with papal approbation (1935), whose motherhouse is in Lafayette, LA. This community, which follows the Rule of St. Augustine, stems from the Sisters of Perpetual Adoration of the Most Holy Sacrament, founded in 1851 by Aloysius Faller, parish priest of Bellemagny in Alsace, France. In 1872, at the request of Abp. Napoleon J. Perche of New Orleans, LA (1870–83), four sisters came to the U.S. Two years later they began their work for the education of children in New Orleans.

Until 1892 Bellemagny remained the motherhouse of the entire community. In that year the U.S. houses organized themselves into a distinct congregation, with its own motherhouse in New Orleans. As the work of education grew more arduous, the practice of perpetual adoration was discontinued, but daily exposition of the Blessed Sacrament was maintained in the motherhouse. The sisters, thereafter, adopted the name of Sisters of the Most Holy Sacrament. In 1924, at the request of Bp. Jules B. Jeanmard of Lafayette (1918–56), the motherhouse and novitiate were transferred to Lafayette. The sisters are engaged in the field of education, catechetics, pastoral care and homes for the aged.

[M. E. MARTIN]

SISTINE CHAPEL

The most famous chapel in the papal palace. It was built for Pope SIXTUS IV for papal functions and serves as palatine and court chapel. (See VATICAN; VATICAN CITY.) The design by the architect Giovannino de'Dolci is a rectangular brick structure with travertine corners and window projections. It has six arched windows on each of the two main walls and a barrel-vaulted ceiling, and contains a simple interior space which is divided into choir and nave by a screen. On the right side is the cantoria for the Sistine Choir.

On Oct. 27, 1481, after the completion of construction, a contract for its decoration was drawn between the Pope's architect, Giovannino de'Dolci, and the painters Rosselli, Botticelli, Ghirlandaio, and PERUGINO. Other painters—Signorelli, Bartolomeo della Gatta, Pintoricchio, and Fra Diamante—assisted in the project. The vaulted ceiling was painted to simulate a blue heaven studded with gold stars. Between the windows at the top of the walls were placed portraits of popes, standing in shell niches. Below these, as the main feature of the decoration, was painted a series of scenes from the life of Moses and of Christ complementing each other on the left and right walls, respectively, as one faces the altar. An "Assumption of the Virgin" originally painted on the altar wall above two of the scenes was later removed, together with the two scenes, to make room for MICHELANGELO'S Last Judgment. These wall decorations were dedicated on the feast day of the Assumption, 1483.

In 1508 Pope JULIUS II finally persuaded Michelangelo to undertake the redecoration of the vaulted ceiling. This monumental project was completed in 1513. In this gigantic enterprise Michelangelo attempted to blend the Christian doctrine of the fall of man and his need for salvation with Neoplatonic ideas current in Renaissance Italy, ideas that are present also in Michelangelo's own sonnets. The Christian doctrine of the hopelessness of man when left to himself is illustrated in nine scenes running down the center of the ceiling, beginning with the creation and ending with the drunkenness of Noah. In the temptation episode man chooses to disobey the command of God. In the Noah scene he cannot even control his personal behavior.

God's intervention to save man is then illustrated in scenes at the four corners of the ceiling vault, depicting episodes from the Old Testament in which the Hebrews were delivered from disaster. The theme is then carried on by the huge figures of the Prophets and their classical counterparts, the sibyls, enthroned along the lower edge of the vault. The Prophets and the Cumean sibyl had announced the coming of a deliverer. Christ Himself does not appear in the ceiling decoration. However, in the lunettes along the top of the walls are groups of figures presumably representing His ancestors. The scenes from the life of Christ along the right wall, already mentioned, then take their place in the entire scheme that is concluded by Michelangelo's huge Last Judgment on the end-wall, painted many years later in 1548. The Neoplatonic element injected into the decoration of the ceiling is present in the restless, ideal, nude figures of youths seated on the pedestal projections of the illusionistic architectural framework for the scenes along the center of the ceiling. Renaissance Neoplatonism saw in the beauty of the human form a reflection of God's beauty from which the forms emanated. Their restlessness suggests their unhappiness in the human shell and their desire to be reabsorbed into God, the source from which they issued.

“The Creation,” 1508-12 by Michelangelo.

Bibliography: E. STEINMANN, Die Sixtinische Kapelle, 2 v. (Munich 1901–05). C. DE TOLNAY, Michelangelo, v. 2, 5 (Princeton 1960). E. T. DEWALD, Italian Painting 1200–1600 (New York 1961) 325–331, 378–394.

[E. T. DEWALD]

SISTINE CHAPEL, RESTORATION OF

On Dec. 11, 1999, Pope JOHN PAUL II presided at a prayer service to mark the completion of the restoration of the SISTINE CHAPEL. The fifteenth-century chapel takes its name from Pope SIXTUS IV (1471–1484) who commissioned it and engaged notable Italian artists of the day to decorate it: Rosselli, Botticelli, Ghirlandaio, and Perugino. Early in the sixteenth century, Pope JULIUS II persuaded MICHELANGELO to redo the vaulted ceiling, a project that was finished in 1513. Over the centuries, the elements, dust, and candle-smoke dimmed the colors of the frescoes and caused them to deteriorate.

An ambitious restoration program, begun in 1964, went through several phases during the pontificates of Paul VI, John Paul I, and John Paul II, including the cleaning and repair of the fifteenth-century frescoes, which depicted scenes from the lives of Moses and Christ, the roof and battlements, and the frescoes on the entrance wall that continued the fifteenth-century cycle. In 1980 the project turned to the portraits of the popes and of Michelangelo's frescoes, successively the lunettes, the ceiling frescoes, and the Last Judgment. The final phase of the work, completed in 1999, repaired the cycle of murals by artists of the Florentine and Umbrian schools.

Means and Method of Restoration. The climax of the work was reached in April of 1994 with the ceremonial unveiling of the Last Judgment. Pope John Paul II celebrated a Mass in the chapel in honor of the event (April 8, 1994), using the opportunity to highlight the theology enshrined in Michelangelo's frescoes.

Fresco by Botticelli in the Sistine Chapel, in foreground, the "Purification of the Leper," center background, façade of the Hospital of the Holy Ghost founded by Sixtus IV; upper background, three scenes from the "Temptation of Christ."

The decision to clean Michelangelo's paintings was made after examination of the lunette of Eleazar and Nathan detected tiny cracks in the color fabric of the whole ceiling. They were caused by the shrinking of the covering of glue that pulled away the layers of originally luminous color. Previous restorers had used the glue to revive the frescoes darkened by dust and soot. After research, experiment, and a trial cleaning in June of 1980 on the figure of Eleazar, the frescoed surfaces of the ceiling in the Sistine were cleaned by a method using the solvent known as AB57, applied briefly and removed with a sponge soaked in distilled water. The few parts retouched by Michelangelo a secco (after the plaster had set, thus sensitive to water) were cleaned last with specific organic water solvents fixed with a solution of Paraloid B72. Watercolor was used for some modest pictorial restorations. Because Michelangelo had used the delicate lapis lazuli in coloring and a more a secco technique for the Last Judgment, it called for different cleaning methods, including washings with distilled water and treatments with a solution of water and ammonium carbonate. All the stages of the work were scrupulously filmed. The chapel was kept open for the public to see the progress of the enterprise since the scaffolding covered the ceiling frescoes only partially at any one time.

The program of cleaning rid the frescoes in the Sistine Chapel of the polluting conditions chiefly responsible for their deterioration. To counter continuing pollution, however, experts decided to eschew the use of resinous or other protective substances on the frescoes, to install a conditioning system with a monitored annual cycle for air filtration, and to lay dust-retaining carpeting on the stairs leading to the Chapel from the Vatican Museums.

Michelangelo's Genius Rediscovered. During the cleaning, a photogrammetric survey of the ceiling and the Last Judgment revealed fresh details about their state of preservation and shed new light on Michelangelo's technical procedures and virtuosity. About 6,000 specialists and scholars from the fields of art and culture examined the outcome of the restoration carefully. Many of them approved of the astonishing results, but some art historians reacted with strong criticism.

The cleaning of the frescoes in the Sistine, originally both chapel and fortress, revealed long-lost or unobserved details of Michelangelo's work. The architectural design of the ceiling, which ingeniously divided one dramatic scene from another, became powerfully evident. Because the myriad of figures from the family scenes in the lunettes to the protesting saints in the Last Judgment was more clearly delineated, the emotions of tenderness, fear, and fury registered in their gestures and expressions became more apparent. The meticulous painting of the ceiling histories from the first scene of the Creation to the Drunkenness of Noah was found to contrast sharply with the rapid execution of the lunettes, some of which had been left almost as studies. This discovery led scholars to deduce that for the lunettes, Michelangelo did not use cartoons and did the painting without using his assistants. Michelangelo's skilled use of traditional Tuscan buon fresco for the vault and the lunettes also became manifest. This demanding technique requires the painting of complete details of entire sections of the work onto fresh plaster. Art scholars could detect his sudden decisions to make changes in his figures by noting where he removed the frescoed plaster and applied a new layer on which to paint. The restored clarity of the Last Judgment revealed the strength and audacity of Michelangelo's brushstrokes, the mastery of his composition, the intellectual and pictorial brilliance of his balancing of mass and space, and the detailed expression of his mischievous or macabre humor.

The restoration and cleaning of the Sistine Chapel opened the way for many years of further study and appreciation. Worldwide attention focused on the need to reassess Michelangelo's place in the development of Renaissance painting and of his aims and achievements as a colorist and draftsman. He was perceived as well situated in the lineage of Tuscan painting, beginning in the studio of Ghirlandaio in Florence and influencing such younger Florentine painters as Rosso and Pontormo. Michelangelo used colors on the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel to model his figures. His varied shades created immense light and startling shimmering effects: gleaming white, flesh tints, yellows, and greens. His use of abrupt juxtapositions of violets, greens, and yellows in the lunettes produced wonderful impressions of light and shade. After veils of grime were removed from the Last Judgment, the colors appeared incandescent, with the figures rising and falling in a space of blue so luminous that the wall on which they were painted seemed to have dissolved.

The “rediscovery” of Michelangelo as a painter vastly different from the somber artist previously perceived was accompanied by scholarly reappraisals of other aspects of his life, his complex personality, and his always surprising art: spiritually resonant poetry, original architecture, and expressive sculpture in stone.

Bibliography: Detailed bibliographies on the cleaning of the Sistine Chapel have been published in the Monumenti, Musei e Gallerie Pontificie series. Other recent publications on Michelangelo and/or the cleaning of the Sistine Chapel include: G. COLALUCCI, “Brevi considerazioni sulla tecnica pittorica e la problematica di restauro degli affreschi michelangioideschi della volta Sistina” in Problemi del restauro in Italia, ed., CAMPANOTTO (Udine 1988); “The Frescoes of Michelangelo on the Vault of the Sistine Chapel. Original Technique and Conservation,” in The Conservation of Wall Paintings, Proceedings of a Symposium organised by the Courtauld Institute of Art and the Getty Conservation Institute (London, July 13–16, 1987), ed. S. CATHER (Singapore 1991). DE MAIO, Michelangelo e la Controriforma (Roma-Bari 1981). M. HALL, Michelangelo—The Sistine Ceiling Restored (New York 1993). F. HARTT, G. COLALUCCI, F. MANCINELLI, (and D. SCHLESAK in the German edition), La Cappella Sistina, 3 v.: v. 1, La preistoria della Bibbia; v. 2, Gli antenati di Cristo; v. 3, La storia della Creazione (Milan 1989–90; Paris, 1989–90; Luzern 1989–91; Anversa 1990–91; Tokyo 1990–91; New York 1991; Warsaw 1991). R. HATFIELD, Trust in God: The Sources of Michelangelo’s Frescoes on the Sistine Ceiling (Florence 1991). F. MANCINELLI, “La pulitura degli affreschi di Michelangelo nella Cappella Sistina,” in Il problema della Cappella Sistina, ed. ISTITUTO SUPERIORE DI ARTE SACRA (Rome 1987). J. D. OREMLAND, Michelangelo’s Sistine Ceiling: A Study of Creativity (Madison, Conn. 1989); The Sistine Chapel: Michelangelo Rediscovered, Eng. ed. (Great Britain 1986). “All Salvation History Leads to Christ,” L’Osservatore Romano, English edition (December 15, 1999).

[G. A. BULL]

SITUATION (SITUS)

A situation is one of the ten Aristotelian CATEGORIES OF BEING (Gr. κείσθα, Lat. situs) describing how a body is disposed or situated. It designates the arrangement of parts of a body in place, and is a further determination of the category location. The latter is commensurate with place, part to part, but does not specify the arrangement of parts. The separate category of situation is therefore postulated specifically to account for this arrangement.

“Pope St. Marcellus I,” fresco by Ghirlandaio, Sistine Chapel. (Alinari–Art Reference/Art Resource, NY.)

See Also: LOCATION (UBI); PLACE.

[P. R. DURBIN]

SIVA

One of the names under which the Supreme Being is worshipped in Hinduism. Together with Brahma and Vishnu he forms the trimūrti, the triple form of the deity, conceived as the Creator, Preserver, and Destroyer of the world. Siva is a complex figure and his cult has a long history. Originally a non-Aryan fertility god, he was later identified with the Vedic god Rudra, the god of storm and thunder who is also the “lord of cattle” (paśupati). An early seal from Mohenjo Daro showing a yogi sitting cross-legged in meditation surrounded by animals is believed to be the earliest representation of Siva. Besides being the god of fertility, whose symbol is the linga, Siva is also the great ascetic who holds the world in being by his power of austerity. He is conceived as the reconciler of opposites. He is the Destroyer of the world, who haunts the cremation grounds and wears a necklace of skulls, but he is also the divine physician who recreates the world at the end of time. He is absolutely inactive as the pure source of Being, but he also sustains the world as natarāja in the cosmic dance. Furthermore he is both male and female, and is sometimes represented as half man and half woman. Yet this strange ambivalent deity has come to be regarded as the Supreme Being, the Father and Creator of the world; as a personal god who is immanent in all things, dwelling in the heart of man and assisting him by his grace.

“Consegna Delle Chiavi (The Consigning of the Keys),” fresco by Perugino and Luca da Signorelli, early Renaissance, masterpiece restoration project in the Sistine Chapel. (AP/Wide World)

[B. GRIFFITHS]

SIXTUS I, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: 117 or 119 to 126 or 128. Sixtus (Xystus) was the sixth successor to Peter (see CLEMENT I). The Liberian catalogue dates his reign 117 to 126. Virtually all lists and Eusebius (Histoire ecclesiastique 4.4, 5; 5.6, 24) indicate a ten-year episcopate. The Liber pontificalis says that he was a Roman, son of a certain Pastor but the name Xystus is Greek. It also attributes to him a garbled disciplinary decree that is intelligible only in early sixth-century terms, a decree that sacred vessels should not be touched except by the ministering clergy, and a decree that the people should chant the Sanctus with the priest. He probably was not a martyr. His reputed burial near the body of Peter in the Vatican has not been substantiated by modern excavations.

Feast: April 6.

Bibliography: Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92) 1:ccviii, 54–57, 128. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 14.2:193–94. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 9. E. FERGUSON, Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (New York 1997) 2:1065. E. KETTENHOFFEN, Biographisch–Bibliographisches Kirshenlexikon, 10 (Herzburg 1995).

[E. G. WELTIN]

SIXTUS II, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: Aug. 30, 257 to Aug. 6, 258; martyr. Sixtus succeeded Stephen I during the first phase of the Valerian persecution (257). While Sixtus was conducting services in the cemetery of Praetextatus, Roman troops came to arrest him. Realizing that if he tried to escape, there would be a general massacre as the troops came after him, this true pastor identified himself to the troops. He and four deacons, Januarius, Vincent, Magnus, and Stephen, were seized and beheaded; two other deacons, Felicissimus and Agapetus, were also probably martyred the same day, and St. Lawrence four days later. Sixtus was buried in the cemetery of Callistus, and 100 years later Pope DAMASUS (366–384) composed his epitaph from which Prudentius erroneously concluded that Sixtus had been crucified.

Conservators using computer technology in the restoration of Michelangelo's frescoes in the Sistine Chapel, 1989. (©Vittoriano Rastelli/CORBIS)

During his reign Sixtus dealt with the controversy over the validity of baptism by heretics. He supported the view of his predecessor that baptism by heretics was valid, but apparently influenced by Dionysius of Alexandria, he adopted a tolerant policy toward the divergent re-baptism policies of the Eastern Churches. He also sent envoys to Cyprian of Carthage, Stephen I's adversary in this problem. The claim that Sixtus wrote the treatise Ad Novatianum cannot be established. He is thought by some to have been the composer or at least the editor of the Pythagorean Sentences of SEXTUS translated by RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA, but this attribution is doubtful. Sixtus is commemorated in the Canon of the Mass.

Feast: Aug. 6.

Bibliography: EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History. 7.5, 9, 27. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 14.2:2194–96, E. KOTTING, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 9:809. E. FERGUSON, ed., Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (New York 1997) 2.1065. J. N. D. KELLY Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 21–22. F. SCORZA BRACELLONA, Lexikon des Mittelalters, 7 (München-Zürich 1994–1995).

[E. G. WELTIN]

SIXTUS III, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: July 31, 432 to Aug. 19, 440. This pope was a Roman, the son of Xystus, and a priest at the time of his election. He was well known to (St.) AUGUSTINE and seems to have sympathized with PELAGIUS until the issuance of the Tractoria of Pope ZOSIMUS. Sixtus then abandoned Pelagius and was reminded of the limits of prudence and charity by Augustine.

“St. Lawrence Receiving the Treasures of the Church from Pope Sixtus II,” detail of fresco cycle “The Lives of Saints Stephen and Lawrence” by Fra Angelico in the Chapel of Pope Nicholas V, Vatican Palace, Rome. (Alinari–Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

Sixtus encouraged the negotiations, following the Council of EPHESUS (431), between CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA and JOHN OF ANTIOCH, who finally reached agreement regarding the two natures in Christ; the pope wrote to congratulate them (433). During his pontificate, friendly relations between Rome, Constantinople, and Alexandria had all but liquidated the Nestorian problem, until PROCLUS succeeded Maximian as bishop of Constantinople and attempted to impose the decisions of a Constantinopolitan council on the bishops of Illyricum. Sixtus wrote to Bp. Anastasius of Thessalonica confirming his office as papal vicar and warning the Illyrian bishops against the jurisdictional encroachments of Proclus. At the same time, he requested Proclus not to tolerate appeals to Constantinople from the Illyrian bishops. On the other hand, when Iddua, the bishop of Smyrna, appealed to Rome against a sentence rendered by Proclus as metropolitan of Asia Minor, the pope refused to interfere, thus indicating his determination to uphold the system of vicariates. The matter remained a thorny one in Roman-Constantinopolitan relations.

Probably relying on the memory of old sympathies, the exiled Pelagian, JULIAN OF ECLANUM, attempted to persuade Sixtus to allow him to return to his see in Italy (439), but the pope was warned against such a gesture by the deacon (later pope) Leo.

The name of Sixtus III is linked with several of Rome’s outstanding churches and monuments, and modern scholars speak of a Sixtine Renaissance. He rebuilt the Lateran BAPTISTERY, giving it the form that it has retained ever since: the inscription on the marble beams around the font extols grace and the theology of baptism to mark the Church’s triumph over the heresy of Pelagius. His most important undertaking was a complete reconstruction of the Liberian Basilica of Saint Mary Major on the Esquiline Hill and its dedication to the Virgin Mary (the first, and for many years the only, church to be so dedicated in Rome). Its majestic mosaics commemorated the triumph of the Church over the heresy of Nestorius.

A second basilica was joined to the Constantinian church of St. Lawrence Outside the Walls. The Roman Emperor VALENTINIAN III was persuaded to contribute costly silver and gold ornaments to the basilicas of St. Peter, St. Paul, and the Lateran to replace what had been carried off by the Visigoths.

The first monastery in Rome was established at St. Sebastian’s to ensure the daily recitation of the Divine Office, and in the papal crypt at St. Callistus the pope erected an important inscription or plaque on which were listed the names of the bishops and martyrs buried there. Sixtus himself was buried in St. Lawrence, although the exact location of his tomb is unknown. Ado of Sens was the first to include him in his ninth-century version of the Roman MARTYROLOGY under the date of March 28.

Feast: March 28.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 50:581–618. Patrologiae cursus completus, series latina; suppl., ed. A. HAMMAN (Paris 1957—) 3:21–22, for eds. of letters. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92) 1:232–237; 3:85. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d’archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie (Paris 1907–53) 13.1:1204–10. É AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 14.2:2196–99. G. FERRARI, Early Roman Monasteries (Rome 1957) 162. R. U. MONTINI, Le tombe dei Papi (Rome 1957) 100. R. KRAUTHEIMER, “The Architecture of Sixtus III,” Essays in Honor of Erwin Panofsky, ed. M. MEISS, 2 v. (New York 1961). A. DIBERARDINO, Patrology (Westminster, Md. 1986) 4:589. E. FERGUSON, ed., Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (New York 1997) 2:1065. H. JEDIN, History of the Church (New York 1980) 2:263–264. R. KRAUTHEIMER, Rome: Profile of a City (Princeton 1980) 33–58. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 42–43. C. PIETRI, Rome Christiana (Rome 1976) 955–966, 1139–1147. R. DELBRUECK, “Notes on the Wooden Doors of Santa Sabina,” Studies in Early Christianity 18 (New York & London 1993) 13–21. M. V. MARINI CLARELLI, “La Controversia nestoriana e i mosaici dell’arco trionfale di S. Maria Maggiore,” in Bisanzio e l’Occidente. Arte, Archeologia, Storia, Studi in onore di Fernanda de’Maffei (Rome 1996) 323–42.

[J. CHAPIN]

SIXTUS IV, POPE

Pontificate: Aug. 9, 1471, to Aug. 12, 1484; b. Francesco DELLA ROVERE, in Celle near Savona, Italy, July 21, 1414; d. Rome. Belonging to an impoverished Ligurian family, he was educated by the Franciscans, and joined the Conventual FRANCISCANS. He taught at several Italian universities, acquiring a wide reputation through his works on theology and philosophy and through his excellence as a preacher. In 1464 he became minister-general of his order; three years later he was made cardinal. After a short conclave he was elected pope to succeed PAUL II. The reign of Sixtus IV opened one of the saddest periods in papal history. During that era the concern of the popes with family affairs and political ambitions far overshadowed their interest in their duties as spiritual leaders of the Church. In fact, the contributions to the life of the Church made by Sixtus IV were few. He celebrated a HOLY YEAR in 1475, which drew numerous pilgrims to Rome, and he greatly increased the privileges of the Conventual Franciscans. He shared his order's devotion to the Blessed Virgin and supported the teaching of her Immaculate Conception. Although he tried to summon a crusade against the Turks, other European states failed to support him, and with Venetian and Hungarian aid he succeeded only in recapturing the Italian town of Otranto from the OTTOMAN TURKS. The chief interest of Sixtus remained the aggrandizement of his family. His numerous relatives were given benefices in profusion as well as high church offices. Two nephews, Giuliano Della Rovere (later Pope JULIUS II) and Pietro Riario, were made cardinals. Another nephew, Girolamo RIARIO, planned to carve a principality for himself out of Italy and involved the Pope in almost continuous disputes and wars with the other Italian states. The most infamous affair into which he drew Sixtus was the PAZZI conspiracy of 1478 against Lorenzo and Giuliano de' MEDICI. As a result of the pope's nepotism and political activity, finances fell into increasing disorder. Despite his efforts to create new sources of revenue, such as the doubling of venal curial offices, Sixtus left a large deficit to his successor. In 1482 Abp. Andrea ZAMOMETIĆ attempted unsuccessfully to convoke at Basel a council before which the pope would have to justify himself.

As ruler of Rome and as patron of humanists and artists, Sixtus must be judged more favorably. He began the rebuilding of Rome on a large scale, having streets opened, widened, and paved. He erected the churches of S. Maria della Pace and S. Maria del Popolo, and, above all, the SISTINE CHAPEL, decorated by the outstanding artists of the time, including Botticelli and PERUGINO. He drew to Rome Pinturicchio, Ghirlandaio, and many other painters and sculptors. The rearranged and enlarged VATICAN LIBRARY was opened to scholars during his reign.

The tomb of Sixtus, done by Pollaiuolo and situated in the grottoes of SAINT PETER's Basilica in Rome, is one of the finest monuments of Italian Renaissance art. The theological works of Sixtus include De sanguine Christi, De potentia Dei, and De futuris contingentibus (Rome 1470–72).

Bibliography: L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London-St. Louis 1938–61) v.4. A. TEETAERT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50)14.2:2199–2217. A. MATANIĆ, "Xystus Pp. IV scripsitne librum De conceptione beate virginis Marie?" Antoninianum 29 (1954) 573–578. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (Munich 1954–59) v.4. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 9:810–811. L. EGMONT, Sixtus IV and Men of Letters (Rome 1978). L. PUSCI, "Profilo di Francesco Della Rovere, poi Sixto IV," Storia e cultura al Santo, ed. A. POPPI (Vincenza 1976) 279–88.

[E. G. GLEASON]

SIXTUS V, POPE

Pontificate: April 24, 1585, to August 27, 1590; b. Felice Peretti at Grottammare, near Montalto, in the March of Ancona, December 13, 1520 (or in 1521 according to some). His father was a field laborer. His uncle Salvatore, a Franciscan Conventual, took him under protection and sent him to school in Montalto. Felice entered the Franciscans at the age of 12. Between 1540 and 1546 he continued his studies in Fermo, Ferrara, Bologna, Rimini, and Siena, being ordained in Siena in 1547. In 1548 he received the doctorate in theology from the University of Fermo and began teaching in the Order's convent school in Siena (1549). His reputation as a preacher attracted the notice of Cardinal Carpi, the protector of the Franciscans, who brought him to Rome in 1552. There his Lenten sermons recommended him to Julius III. Interest in Church reform led to his becoming acquainted with Cardinal Giampietro Caraffa (later Paul IV) and Cardinal Michele Ghislieri (later Pius V). Some of the sermons he gave at Perugia were printed. In 1557 Paul IV made him inquisitor in Venice. He was unpopular there and, after the death of Paul IV, withdrew to Montalto. Pius IV, however, reappointed him as inquisitor in Venice in 1560. Because of his sternness, the Republic soon officially requested that he be recalled. He was also named as theologian for the Reform Commission. Soon he was chosen as procurator-general of the Franciscans, while at the same time he served on a commission preparing a new edition of Gratian's Decretum. In 1565 he went to Spain with Cardinal Ugo Buoncampagni (later Gregory XIII) to review the proceedings against Bartolomé de CARRANZA, Archbishop of Toledo, on charges of heresy. He and Buoncampagni did not get on well together. The Spanish mission was interrupted by Pius IV's death; the resulting conclave chose Cardinal Ghislieri, who took the name of Pius V. Peretti was soon made vicar-general of the Franciscans and in 1566 bishop of Sant'Agata dei Goti, at which time he began to use Montalto as a surname. Thus when Pius V made him cardinal in 1570, he was known as Cardinal Montalto. In 1571 he was transferred from the Diocese of Sant'Agata to that of Fermo. When Gregory XIII became Pope, Montalto fell into disfavor, and he withdrew to the villa he was building on the slopes of the Esquiline. Gregory XIII suspended the pension granted him by Pius V, but the loss was repaired by the Grand Duke of Tuscany. In retirement Montalto prepared an edition of the works of St. Ambrose, but unfortunately this work had many scholarly flaws. On the death of Gregory XIII in April 1585, the Sacred College was divided by rival factions under Cardinals Alessandro de' Medici and Alessandro Farnese, as well as by the conflicting interests of Spain and France. Montalto emerged as the man whom all, however they might differ, might join in supporting. His election on April 24 was unanimous. The new Pope took the name of Sixtus V, in memory of the preceding Franciscan Pope, Sixtus IV.

Papal Reforms. Devoted to church reform and centralization, he moved quickly to impose stern discipline upon the clergy of the churches and colleges of Rome. This accomplished by his vigorous action, he undertook to tighten up clerical discipline throughout the world. The decree of the Council of Trent against simony and plurality of benefices was strictly applied. A bull of December 20, 1585, reestablished for all bishops the visit "ad limina Apostolorum," requiring further that they make detailed reports concerning their dioceses. Residence of bishops and pastors was enforced. In the bull of December 3, 1586, he set a limit of 70 members on the College of Cardinals and promulgated regulations for the cardinals, some of which still apply. In January 1588 he established 15 congregations of cardinals to carry out the administration of the Church and of the Papal States. It was feared that nepotism might again become offensive when he made his grandnephew a cardinal at the age of 14, but neither this nephew nor other relatives influenced Sixtus in his official policies or decisions.

Among the religious orders he favored the Franciscans, not only in the appointments he made among them, but by honoring them through the canonization of Diego of Alcalá and the proclamation of St. Bonaventure as a Doctor of the Church. Before his death he was thinking of requiring the Jesuits to change their name and of having a commission review the Jesuit constitution. In the dispute between the Jesuits and Dominicans over grace, he imposed mutual silence. He gave strong support to the missions, being especially aware of the conversions being made in China and Japan because an embassy from Japan was in Rome at the time of his election. He was attentive to the Dominican and Franciscan missions in South America and in the Philippines. Sixtus created additional tribunals of the Inquisition and brought more offenses within its jurisdiction. A new Index of Prohibited Books, whose preparation he had ordered, was not printed before his death. The edition of the Vulgate that he sponsored was faulty and was subsequently withdrawn. Sixtus reestablished the feast of the Presentation of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

Administration of the Papal States. Sixtus succeeded brilliantly in eradicating the banditry that had grown prevalent in the Papal States under Gregory XIII, by recourse to repressive measures. An unflinching harshness, shown by the exposure of bandit's heads on the Sant'Angelo Bridge, caused some to censure him, but in general he was praised for ridding Rome of a scourge that involved even great families. Although the coffers of the treasury were empty when his reign began, through economies, new taxes, sale of offices, and the floating of new loans (Monti vacabili and Monti non vacabili), he created a reserve of more than five million crowns. He carefully administered the provisioning of Rome, promoted the silk and wool industries, encouraged agriculture, began the draining of the Pontine marshes, and constructed new aqueducts (including the rebuilding of that of Alexander Severus, which was then called Acqua Felice).

Monumental construction in Rome included the Lateran Palace, enlargement of the Quirinal, completion of the dome of St. Peter's, building of that section of the Vatican in which the popes reside, a new building for the Vatican Library, and placing four great obelisks, including one in St. Peter's Square. Sixtus was very generous to the University of Rome.

International Diplomacy. His greatest problem in foreign policy concerned France. Sixtus wanted to halt the spread of Protestantism, but he also wanted to uphold the political balance so that Spain would not dominate all Europe. If the civil and religious struggle in France should end with Huguenot control, it could mean the end of Catholicism throughout a great part of Europe. But if the Huguenots were subdued by the power of Spain, it could mean the end of the Church's political independence. So Sixtus tried to reconcile all French Catholics to Henry III. However, the King vacillated and gave way to his personal distrust of the Guises. Moreover, the Catholic League under the Guises became affiliated with PHILIP II, King of Spain. When the Duke of Guise and his brother the cardinal were murdered by Henry III's order, Sixtus issued a stern monitorium and excommunication against the King. Yet he did not sanction revolt of the League's members against their legitimate King. When Henry III was assassinated, Sixtus allied with Philip II against the Huguenot Henry of Navarre (later King HENRY IV). The Pope knew that one thing could still achieve his original aims, namely, the conversion of Henry of Navarre. This, however, did not occur until 1593, nearly three years after Sixtus's death. In regard to England, Sixtus was solicitous for MARY STUART, Queen of Scots, but there is no proof that he was involved even indirectly in the Babington plot. After Mary's execution in 1587, Sixtus aided Spain in building the ARMADA. Upon the destruction of that fleet, however, the Pope abandoned further actions against England. He longed to crusade against the Turks, conjecturing that such a crusade could take the form of an assault on Algiers, action in the Mediterranean by a great alliance that would include Venice or, possibly, even action based on Poland in the East. None of these projects was ever launched. Sixtus favored Maximilian of Hapsburg in his attempt to achieve the Polish crown after the death of King Stephen BÁTHORY (1586). Maximilian's failure was partially compensated by the conversion to Catholicism of the Margrave of Baden.

Vigorous, eloquent, and stern, Sixtus had devoted himself unsparingly to the defense and advancement of the Church, including the promotion of missionary work in Latin America and Asia. This primary concern underlay his wide and intricate diplomacy. As an administrator he was talented, exacting, energetic, able in finance, resolute in enforcing public order, and munificent in his patronage of art and learning. A year after his death (1591), his remains were placed in the Sistine Chapel he had constructed in Santa Maria Maggiore.

Bibliography: U. BALZANI, Sisto Quinto (Geneva 1913); "Rome under Sixtus V," Cambridge Modern History (London-New York 1902–12) 3:422–455. J. A. VON HÜBNER, Sixte V é d'après des correspondances diplomatiques inédites, 3 v. (Paris 1870), Eng. The Life and Times of Sixtus the Fifth . . ., tr. H. E. H. JERNINGHAM, 2 v. (London 1872). J. A. ORBAAN, Sixtine Rome (London 1910). L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London-St. Louis 1938–61) v.21, 22. L. PASTOR, Sisto V: il creatore della nuova Roma (Rome 1922). L. M. PERSONNÉ, Sisto V: Il genio della potenza (Florence 1935). A. TEETAERT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 14.2:2217–38. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 9:811–812, s. BORSI, Roma di Sisto (Rome 1996). I. DE FEO, Sisto V (Milan 1987). G. PORISCIANI, Sisto V e la sua Montalto (Padua 1986) F. SARAZANI, Roma di Sisto V (Rome 1979). M. L. MADONNA, Roma di Sisto (Rome 1983).

[D. R. CAMPBELL]

SIXTUS OF SIENA

Biblical scholar; b. Siena, 1520; d. Genoa, 1569. Converted from Judaism in his youth, he first became a Franciscan, but later, when convicted of heresy and condemned to death, he was spared through the intercession of Michael Ghislieri, OP (later Pius V), who persuaded him to recant and become a Dominican (1551). In 1559 he was appointed censor of Hebrew books by Pius V, and in this office he was able to save many valuable works from destruction. In 1566 he published at Venice his celebrated Bibliotheca Sacra, containing eight "books" in two volumes: (1) division and authority of Scripture, (2) alphabetic and historical indexes, (3) interpretation of the inspired books, (4) alphabetic list of Catholic interpreters, (5) hermeneutics [also published separately as De arte interpretandi sacra volumina (Cologne 1577)], (6) and (7) exegetical interpretations, and (8) apologia. Some later editions arrange the eight books in a different order. Since it was based on scientific principles, this work is considered to be the first of the modern Biblical introductions. In it were used for the first time the terms proto-canonical and deutero-canonical that later became standard for distinguishing respectively the OT books that are regarded as canonical by Jews and Protestants as well as by Catholics and those that are so regarded only by Catholics.

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum, 5 v. (Paris 1719–23); continued by R. COULON (Paris 1909–); repr. 2 v. in 4 (New York 1959) 2.1:206–208. Dictionnaire de la Bible, ed. F. VIGOUROUX, 5 v. (Paris 1895–1912) 5.2:1799–1800.

[A. SMITH]

SKARGA, PIOTR

Eminent Polish preacher, theologian, and apologist; b. Grójec, Mazovia, 1536; d. Cracow, Sept. 27, 1612. He attended the parish school at Grójec, went on to the University of Cracow (B.A. 1554), was ordained at Lvov (1564), and entered the Jesuit novitiate. He studied theology in Rome (1564–71) and was appointed professor at Pułtusk College (1571). He abandoned his teaching career for preaching and missionary activities (he converted the Radziwill princes and their Lithuanian subjects) and founded or enlarged Jesuit colleges in Ryga, Dorpat, Połock, Nieśwież, and Lublin. He was first rector of the Academy (university) of Vilna (1579–84).

To uphold Catholicism and to convert Protestants and schismatics, Skarga wrote many treatises, usually in Polish, such as Pro Ssma. Eucharistia (1576; Eng. tr. Milwaukee 1939) and O Jednosci Kościoła Bożego (1577, On the Unity of the Church of God). The Union of Brest (1596), which united the schismatic Ruthenians with Rome, was widely attributed to the influence of Skarga's apologetic treatises.

Zywoty Swietych (1579, Lives of the Saints) has been most widely read by Poles through the centuries. Rather than simply translate, Skarga artistically transformed Lippomano's hagiographic work by adapting it to the Polish mentality, adding original commentaries, and including new biographies. Outstanding for philosophic depth and finesse of style is Kazania na Niedziele i Swieta (1595, Sermons for Sundays and Holidays). Skarga published his powerful Kazania o Siedmiu Sakramentach (1600, Sermons on the Seven Sacraments), together with Kazania Przygodne (Sermons on Various Occasions) and his prophetic Kazania Sejmowe (Sermons Preached to the Diet). The last work, a national examination of conscience, greatly influenced Polish literary and patriotic thought, particularly in the 19th century.

Skarga's profound eloquence combined with piety and humility to win him the name of the Polish Bossuet. He founded many charitable societies in major Polish cities: Bractwo Milosierdzi (the Brotherhood of Charity), Bractwo Betanii Sw. Lazarza (the Brotherhood of St. Lazarus of Bethany) to care for the sick, Skrzynka Sw. Mikolaja (St. Nicholas' Chest) to shield young girls, and especially the Bank Pobożny to protect the poor from usurers. He spent the last 24 years of his life as King Zygmunt III's preacher, using his prestige and power solely for the good of his Church and his country, to which he had given a salutary program for reform.

Bibliography: P. SKARGA, Pisma wszystkie, 5 v. (Warsaw 1923–30); Les Sermons politiques . . . , tr. A. BERGA (Paris 1916). S. WINDAKIEWICZ, P. Skarga (Cracow 1925). A. BERGA, Un Prédicateur . . . Pierre Skarga . . . (Paris 1916). G. M. GODDEN, P. Skarga, Priest and Patriot (London 1947).

[T. F. DOMARADZKI]

SKEHAN, PATRICK W.

Old Testament and Semitics scholar; b. New York, N.Y., Sept. 30, 1909; d. Wash., D.C., Sept. 9, 1980. Patrick William Skehan received his B.A. from Fordham University (1929), studied theology at St. Joseph's Seminary, Yonkers, N.Y., and was ordained a priest Sept. 23, 1933. He studied Scripture and Semitic Languages at The Catholic University of America, Wash., D.C., where he obtained an S.T.D. in the Old Testament (1938). He taught in the Department of Semitic Languages at CUA from 1938 until his retirement in August 1980, often serving as departmental chairman. On several occasions he served as visiting lecturer/professor to the Oriental Seminary of The Johns Hopkins University, and was annual professor at the American School of Oriental Research, Jerusalem (1954–55), serving as director there from 1955 to 1956. Skehan was Catholic Biblical Association Visiting Professor to the Pontifical Biblical Institute, Rome, 1969–70, where he was named consultant to the Pontifical Biblical Commission (1965–71).

Msgr. Skehan is perhaps best known for his work on the DEAD SEA SCROLLS, some of which he edited for publication, and the New American Bible translation. His contribution to the latter is inestimable, for he meticulously edited all parts of the Old Testament, as well as translating extensive sections himself. Skehan was a charter member of the Catholic Biblical Association, its president from 1946 to 1947, and treasurer from 1977 until his death. He was several times associate editor of the Catholic Biblical Quarterly, associate editor of Old Testament Abstracts, and editor of the association's monograph series (1973–75). A retiring man, he was revered by his colleagues for his scholarly care and integrity, and by his students for the generous and unassuming care he lavished on them.

Bibliography: A. A. DI LELLA, "Patrick William Skehan: A Tribute," The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 42 (1980) 435–437. Bibliography of Skehan's publications up to 1971: P. W. SKEHAN, Studies in Israelite Poetry and Wisdom; The Catholic Biblical Quarterly MS 1 (Wash., D.C. 1971) 254–260. Bibliography of Skehan's publications from 1971 until his death: The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 43 (1981) 96–98.

[J. JENSEN]

SKEPTICISM

The term skepticism (Gr. σκέπτομαι, to examine) designates a variety of approaches to philosophical problems. According to popular usage, a skeptic is a person who, as a general rule, or in a particular instance, hesitates or refuses to accept the truth of propositions. Skepticism may be a mere psychological attitude, or a deliberate doctrine; it may be systematic or unsystematic, partial or total. Philosophical skepticism usually implies more than mere caution or a readiness to examine problems; otherwise most philosophies would have to be termed skeptical, since they involve methodical reflection on man, knowledge, and being. Rather it has come to be indissolubly associated with DOUBT, i.e., an inability to form one's judgment; thus doubt is the skeptic's characteristic reaction in the face of theoretical problems.

While a number of names in the history of philosophy have been identified with skepticism, historians generally fail to acknowledge the extent of their influence on the development of philosophical thought. For this reason, the present treatment first sketches the historical development of skepticism, and then gives a systematic analysis of its basic concepts and presuppositions.

Historical Development of Skepticism

The history of skepticism fits naturally into three main divisions, corresponding to those used to describe the evolution of philosophy itself. Its foundations were laid by the Greeks; it was revived, largely under fideist influences, in the medieval and Renaissance periods; and it emerged as a philosophical system, although with many variations, during the early development of modern philosophy.

Greek Skeptics. Ancient skepticism was fostered by two schools, one Pyrrhonian and the other Academic. It traces its origins, with some justification, to the difficulties, controversies, hesitations, and perplexities of pre-Socratic philosophers. The most immediately palpable influence is that, of DEMOCRITUS of Abdera, who taught that the world is made up of atoms and the void, and that qualitative diversity is a mere illusion of the senses. Truth, in such an atomistic materialism, can be gauged only by the intellect or mind, in conformity with the old Parmenidean opposition between sensation and intelligence. Through Metrodoros of Chios and Anaxarchos, a direct descent is traceable from this doctrine to Pyrrho of Elis, the founder of Greek skepticism.

Pyrrhonians. Pyrrho is generally believed to have lived between 365 and 275 B.C. Influenced by the imperiturbability and indifference of the Indian Magi or gymnosophists, he came to regard peace of mind as an end to be achieved through steadfast opposition to all dogmatic assertions. Since Pyrrho left no written works, his thought has been transmitted by the writings of his disciple, Timon of Phlius (c. 320–230). It seems quite evident, from the fragments of Timon, that the basic elements of skepticism were already present, at least in primitive form, in the teachings of Pyrrho. (See PYRRHONISM.)

Later skeptics developed and systematized Pyrrhonian philosophy. Unfortunately, we know practically nothing about their lives. Some ancient authors say that the succession lapsed after Timon, to be taken up again later by Ptolemy of Cyrene. Others (see Diogenes Laertius, 9:115–16) establish an unbroken line of succession from Timon to Saturninus, the successor of Sextus Empiricus. Two authors, besides Sextus Empiricus, are singled out for their work in elaborating and systematizing the tropes (Gr. τρόποι), or ways of achieving suspension of judgment: Aenesidemus (sometime between 80 B.C. and A.D. 130) compiled the ten trope setting forth the relativity and the unreliability of sense cognition; Agrippa (no date known) worked out the five logical tropes challenging the validity of all argumentation.

Academicians. The Pyrrhonians, however, were not alone in their skeptical claims. Arcesilaus of Pitane (c. 315–241), the successor of Crates and founder of the Middle Academy, developed the elements of doubt inherent in Platonic thought (see PLATONISM). He is even credited by some authors, such as J. Burnet, with having been the first to formulate the skeptical τρόποι. Despite complete suspension of judgment in theoretical matters, Arcesilaus met the need for taking a stand in practical matters by defining a criterion of reasonableness (Gr. εὐλογον), founded on the convergence of representations with respect to a given judgment.

The Middle and New Academies, stemming as they did from the great Platonic tradition, did not join forces with Pyrrhonians whose theoretical views were practically identical with their own. The later Pyrrhonians suspected the Academicians of insincerity and of harboring an esoteric dogmatism; Academic skepticism was represented as being little more than a test of one's worthiness to be initiated in the hidden dogmas of the Academy.

In any case, it seems that the continuity of the Pyrrhonian school was interrupted, or at least that its influence was sporadic, during the period when academic skepticism developed. But it is more than probable that latter-day Pyrrhonism, which developed largely in connection with medical practice, owed much of its subtle dialectic and its boundless arsenal of skeptical tropes to the work of its Academic forebears.

Carneades of Cyrene (c. 219–129) defined a new criterion of persuasiveness or verisimilitude (Gr. πιθανόν) based on a single representation. The suspension of judgment, or ἐποχή, tended to be less pronounced as the Academy progressed. Eusebius quotes Numenius as saying that Arcesilaus was a Pyrrhonian in everything save in name (Praep. Ev. 14.6, Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 21:1202). In Carneades's teaching there seems to have been an ambiguity that one of his disciples, Clitomachos, resolved in the sense of a complete ἐποχή; another, Metrodoros, interpreted Carneades as opening the way for the possibility of speculative judgment. In the end Academic skepticism practically disappeared in Greece, but according to Cicero, it continued to flourish in Rome.

Medieval and Renaissance Skeptics. Medieval mystics, as a rule, tended to disparage the capabilities of unaided reason. In the later Middle Ages, doubt was thus thrown on the validity of rational proofs of God's existence and similar matters.

Ockhamists. JOHN OF MIRECOURT, for example, judged propositions such as God's existence and the causal dependence of creatures to be incapable of demonstrative proof. His philosophy amounts to a form of probabilism [F. C. Copleston, History of Philosophy; v.3, Ockham to Suárez (1953) 3:129–34]. NICHOLAS OF AUTRECOURT, another Ockhamist, denied the possibility of inferring the existence of one thing from that of another, or the cogency of holding that accidents inhere in substances. He even invoked the well-known skeptical argument of the “future adversary” (viz, some future thinker may be able to refute what one now considers to be irrefutable) to urge caution regarding his own probable theories.

Renaissance Origins. A number of factors contributed to the rise of skepticism in the RENAISSANCE, among which one might mention the Reformation, with its challenge to the traditional criteria of religious and philosophical truth; the revival of interest in ancient literature, particularly in Cicero; the rediscovery and translation of the works of Sextus Empiricus; and the invention of printing, which diffused such works as the Pyrrhonian corpus of Sextus, the Lives of Diogenes Laertius, and Cicero’s Academica.

Pyrrhonian and Academic doubt gained numerous followers in the period that stretches from the beginning of the 14th century to the advent of modern philosophy, though few proponents of skepticism fully adopted the radical principles of their ancient models. Systematic doubt became an effective way of expressing one’s sense of personal freedom and worth, as well as a general feeling of contempt for the philosophical dogmatism of the Middle Ages.

NICHOLAS OF CUSA (1401–64) was an anti-Aristotelian whose work on “learned ignorance” (De docta ignorantia) presented wisdom as consisting in a recognition of one’s own ignorance. Desiderius ERASMUS (1467–1536) in his De libero arbitrio expounds a form of fideistic skepticism (of which the Renaissance offers countless varieties) as a “basis for remaining within the Catholic Church” (Popkin, 5). His In Praise of Folly emphasizes the contradictions and excesses of scholastic systems. The Italian philosopher P. POMPONAZZI (1462–1525), though quoting Aristotle and St. Thomas Aquinas throughout his Tractatus de immortalitate animae and making constant use of scholastic terminology, refuses to admit that the immortality of the soul can be proved (ch. 15). Pomponazzi’s approach amounts to a sort of philosophical probabilism in which Christian revelation exercises a normative role.

Cornelius Agrippa of Nettesheim (1486–1534), a German alchemist and philosopher who is said to have influenced the French humanist Montaigne, wrote a work De incertitudine et vanitate omnium scientiarum in which he asserted that nothing is more pernicious to human salvation than the arts and sciences (1726 ed., 7). Agrippa’s skepticism, like that of most Renaissance skeptics, was fideistic in orientation. He likens knowledge to the serpent of the Garden of Eden. Revelation offers the sole means of overcoming the handicap arising from original sin.

Both Cardinal Sadoletto and Guy de Bruès wrote books intended to refute the arguments of the skeptics, but in such an indecisive manner as to reinforce the claims of skepticism.

Later Thinkers. Michel Eyquem de MONTAIGNE (1533–92) expressed a variety of philosophical attitudes in the Essais that give a running account of the evolution of his thought from 1572 to his death. Fideistic skepticism certainly marked an important phase of his development. Systematic doubt pervaded much of the intellectual life of the times, and Montaigne obviously made use of skeptical arguments to discredit immoderate dogmatic claims in all areas of knowledge (See Essais, Bk. 2, ch. 12). Pierre CHARRON (1541–1603), a disciple of Montaigne, advocated in his work De la sagesse a “universal and total freedom of mind, as regards judgment and will” (1606 ed., Bk. 2, ch. 2). He advised suspension of judgment in all matters save “divine truths revealed by eternal wisdom” and the actions of practical life (ibid., 292). However, the general tenor of his assertions, e.g., on God and moral virtues, seems to contrast with his skeptical principles. Skepticism was considered by many apologists such as St. FRANCIS DE SALES (1567–1622) and J. P. Camus (1582–1653), Bishop of Belley, to be a potent weapon in the fight for Catholic orthodoxy, however strange this may appear to present-day Catholics.

Francisco SANCHES (1550–1623), a Portuguese (or Spanish) philosopher and physician, published in 1581 his Tractatus de multum nobili et prima universali scientia quod nihil scitur. All of his writings end with the question Quid?—to underline the fact that when all is said the basic question still remains unanswered. “The more I think, the more I doubt,” Sanches wrote. “What can I say,” he asked, “that is not open to suspicion? For to me, all human affairs are suspect, even the very things I write at this moment” [Quod nihil scitur, ed. J. de Carvalho; Opera philosophica (Coimbra 1955) 8]. God alone knows all. Hence faith and the holy Scriptures must be set apart from the things to be doubted (ibid., 49), and so Sanches falls into the fideistic pattern of Renaissance skepticism.

Modern Philosophy. As philosophy moved into the modern era, the influence of ancient skepticism seemed to increase rather than diminish. Blaise Pascal’s skeptical cry “Le Pyrrhonisme est le vrai,” with its fideistic orientation, does not seem particularly original in itself, nor does René Descartes's arsenal of skeptical arguments in the Discours de la méthode and the Méditations sur la philosophie première. Viewed in the context of Renaissance skepticism, Descartes's initial doubt comes into focus not as a set of personal problems, but as the expression of stock arguments that had been bandied about by countless philosophers for the previous 200 years at least, and that were still popular with his contemporaries.

Revival of Sextus Empiricus. Pierre GASSENDI (1592–1655), though not a full-fledged skeptic, was impressed with the works of Sextus Empiricus. Bayle's Dictionnaire (see below) refers to a summary of Sextus Empiricus in Gassendi's De fine logicae that greatly influenced contemporary thought (Dict., 2306). The last chapter of the second book of Gassendi's Exercitationes paradoxicae adversus Aristoteleos (Amsterdam 1649) is entitled: Quod nulla sit scientia et maxime Aristotelea. F. de la Mothe le Vayer (1588–1672) and S. J. Sorbière (1615–70), a disciple of Gassendi's, carried on the skeptical tradition well into the Cartesian period. In his Opuscule ou Petit Traité sceptique, published in Paris in 1646, towards the end of Descartes's career, the former extols the Pyrrhonian ἐποχή as the only reasonable attitude (Opuscule, 170). He believes that skepticism, of which he considers Sextus to have been the prime exponent [cf. Cinq Dialogues (Mons 1671) 1], is in full accord with the condemnations of worldly wisdom by St. Paul and Isaiah (Opuscule, 197–98) and therefore harmonizes best with Christian revelation (ibid., 200–01).

In the modern period, skepticism has often assumed the role of an indispensable prolegomenon to critical philosophical speculation, or has served to clear the way for reliance on the new methods of science. No doubt the thoroughgoing skeptics of antiquity would have frowned on such fideistic or positivistic orientations.

Huet and Bayle. Pierre Daniel HUET (1630–1721), a French bishop who severely criticized Descartes's philosophy, wrote a work on the weakness of the human mind (Traité philosophique de la faiblesse de l'esprit humain, Amsterdam 1723). In it he expresses admiration for Pyrrhonism [ed. of London (1741) 125–31], which lays bare the imperfections of human knowledge (ibid., 20–21) and forces men to acknowledge the role of faith as an aid to the "faltering understanding."

Pierre BAYLE (1647–1706), author of the famous Dictionnaire historique et critique, was a fervent reader of Montaigne's Essais. On the subject of Pyrrhonism, he assures his readers that most physicists of his day are convinced of the incomprehensibility of nature, and thus agree with Pyrrhonism and the Academy (2d ed., 2306). Like Pascal and Saint-Cyran, he sees skepticism as a chastening experience by which men are led to the Christian faith (2d ed., 2308).

Others. David Hume's critique of substance and causality leads to a phenomenalistic philosophy that owes much to reflection on the methods of the physical sciences. Immanuel Kant's Critique of Pure Reason presupposes Hume's attack on traditional concepts, and pronounces the NOUMENA or natures of things to be unknowable. Critical philosophy appears as the crowning achievement of the mind, presupposing an earlier skeptical phase. Further inquiries would reveal skeptical components or prerequisites in other modern and contemporary philosophical systems, such as LOGICAL POSITIVISM, and Herbert Spencer's or Francis Herbert Bradley's peculiar brands of AGNOSTICISM.

Nature Of Skepticism

Sextus, whom most authors acknowledge to have been the major exponent of Pyrrhonism, defines skepticism as a mental attitude or a capacity (Gr. δύναμις) to recognize the opposition of appearances and judgments, thence to suspend judgment, and finally to achieve the mental tranquillity that dogmatists vainly seek to attain by rash assertions (Pyrrh. Hyp., 1.6). The word δύναμις in the Greek text is meant to indicate that skepticism of the Pyrrhonian variety refuses to be considered as a speculative system or as a philosophy. Renaissance and modern skeptics (e.g., Montaigne, Sanches, Pascal, and Hume) tend to differ from their ancient counterparts in that suspension of judgment becomes for them a steppingstone to something else. This certainly accounts for the greater earnestness of modern skeptics. They do not seek suspension of judgment merely for the sake of tranquillity, but to make the mind receptive to revelation, to science, or to some great philosophical intuition.

Basic Concepts. A careful reading of Sextus reveals three main components of the skeptic attitude: equipollence, suspension of judgment, and tranquillity. The first means the equality of arguments on both sides of any question. It presupposes contrariety in man's perception of reality, and controversy in the accounts given of the same things by different people. The second, suspension of judgment, results from equipollence and controversy. It involves negative attitudes to definition (Gr. ἀοριστία), external expression (Gr. ἀφασία), and inclination (Gr. ἄρρηψία). The third component of the skeptic attitude or method is tranquillity (Gr. ἀταραξία). The resolve to suspend judgment removes the mental anguish or uneasiness attendant on a dogmatist search for truth. Applied to the passions, tranquillity becomes apathy or metriopathy, or again, indifference—the external expression of Pyrrhonian quietude.

Sextus tries to avoid the contradictions of ἀφασία or ἐποχή by stating that his propositions are not meant to be dogmatic assertions or judgments, but mere expressions of what appears to him. He is no more attached to them than to their opposites. The very phrase “no more this than that” (οὐδέν μᾶλλον) cancels itself out, along with everything else (Pyrrh. Hyp. 1.7, 18, 19).

Tropes are systematic means of ensuring suspension of judgment. Sextus lays great store by the ten tropes of Aenesidemus, directed mainly against sensation, which he develops at great length (ibid., 1.14). The reliability of sense impressions is questioned because of (1) differences in animals, which make for differences in the impressions they receive from the same objects; (2) differences in men; (3) differences in the senses of an individual man; (4) differences in the circumstances or states of a man; (5) the different positions and places occupied by a person; (6) diverse relationships and mixtures in which an object is implicated when it impinges on a sense; (7) diverse conditions or underlying structures of the object; (8) the general relativity of all things, which precludes statements as to their natures; (9) differences in one’s perception of an event as a result of its frequent or rare occurrence; and (10) in ethical matters, differences of laws, habits, and customs.

Agrippa’s five dialectical tropes present a sequence of logical traps designed to thwart any attempt at valid reasoning (Pyrrh. Hyp. 1.15). The first trope sets forth the fact of controversy, which prevents the mind from giving assent to anything. If one tries to prove the truth of an opinion, he must prove the premise of his proof and so on ad infinitum (2d trope). He may wish to avoid infinite regress in any one of three ways, immediate experience, hypothesis or postulate, and circular reasoning, but these are blocked off by the remaining three tropes. Immediate experience is relative to the subject and does not make known the being of the object. There is no justification for assuming a given hypothesis rather than its opposite. And finally proving the same by the same amounts to no proof at all. Diogenes’s account follows the same order. Sextus presents two further tropes on the impossibility of apprehending an object (ibid., 1.16) and eight other modes against causal explanation (ibid., 1.17).

Evaluation. It is impossible to evaluate generally all authors who manifest some affinity or admiration for the skeptical attitude. Hence the judgment here bears primarily on the form of skepticism commonly regarded as the most radical, the most influential, and the most highly developed, i.e., that expounded by Sextus Empiricus.

Careful scrutiny of the works of Sextus reveals two distinct phases, or aspects, in the total attitude. The first stems directly from the difficulties experienced in man’s knowledge of reality and the endless controversies among proponents of various explanations. It involves uneasiness and frustration of the mind in its search for truth. Doubt and suspension of judgment flow from an incapacity to unravel the difficulties of being and cognition. Pascal or Hume probably never got much beyond this stage. However the Pyrrhonians, confronted as they were with the stupendous dogmatic constructions of the Epicureans and Stoics, came to look upon their ἐποχή as something to be nurtured and valued, particularly as compared to the rash opinions of other thinkers.

Unwittingly, a second phase or aspect then took form. Principles such as that of equipollence reflect a crystallization of doubt. Suspension of judgment becomes a systematic reaction to all opinions, thus stifling the search for truth, Ἐποχή, which ordinarily gives no cause for rejoicing, produces peace of mind.

The elements of both phases combine to constitute the final attitude. The skeptic sees himself as still searching for truth, but the systematization of doubt in the many tropes, the willingness to reject arguments on the a priori ground that some future thinker may be able to prove them invalid, reveal basic contradictions in his radical skepticism. Many texts express an uneasy awareness of these incompatible elements. The numerous attempts to correct the apparent dogmatism of language, the use of analogies such as that of the ladder (which is toppled after an ascent), of the fire (which consumes itself), of the cathartic (which eliminates itself along with body wastes), these and many others represent efforts to reconcile the inner contradictions of radical skepticism.

The problems of practical living represent the major stumbling block of skepticism. The mind may refuse assent in speculative matters, but the requirements of everyday life are incompatible with a universal ἐποχή or with the sophistic tendencies inherent in equipollence.

However, historians owe a debt of gratitude to skeptics for the wealth of materials relating to ancient thought they preserve in their writings. Again, their relentless attacks on DOGMATISM impresses upon the nonskeptic the limitations of human knowledge, the importance of moderation in judgment, and the necessity of a rigorous method in the search for truth.

See Also: CERTITUDE; EPISTEMOLOGY; KNOWLEDGE; KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF; TRUTH.

Bibliography: SEXTUS EMPIRICUS, Opera, ed. H. MUTSCHMANN and J. MAU, 3 v. (Leipzig 1958); tr. R. G. BURY, 3 v. (Loeb Classical Library 1933–36). DIOGENES LAERTIUS, Lives of Eminent Philosophers, tr. R. D. HICKS, 2 v. (Loeb Classical Library 184, 185; rev. ed. 1942) bk. 9. CICERO, De natura deorum; Academica, tr. H. RACKHAM (Loeb Classical Library 268; 1956). R. H. POPKIN, The History of Scepticism from Erasmus to Descartes (Assen 1960). E. R. BEVAN, Stoics and Sceptics (Oxford 1913). A. GOEDECKEMEYER, Die Geschichte des griechischen Skeptizismus (Leipzig 1905). v. C.

L. BROCHARD, Les Sceptiques grecs (2d ed. Paris 1923). F. C. COLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster, Md. 1946–); v.3, Descartes to Leibniz (1958).

[V. CAUCHY]

SKILLIN, EDWARD SIMEON

Editor and publisher; b. New York City, Jan. 23, 1904; d. Montclair, New Jersey, Aug. 14, 2000. Skillin attended school in Glen Ridge, New Jersey, and at Phillips Academy in Andover, Massachusetts. He graduated Phi Beta Kappa from Williams College in 1925. In 1933 he completed an M.A. in political science at Columbia University, where he studied under Cornelius Clifford, a noted lecturer in theology who “opened before me the wealth and depth of the [Catholic] tradition, and the full meaning of the Mass.” Clifford encouraged Skillin to acquaint himself with Portsmouth Priory, the Benedictine foundation in Rhode Island, and eventually Skillin became a lifelong Benedictine Oblate. In 1945, Skillin married Jane Anne Edwards; they had five children and seven grandchildren.

Years at Commonweal. In 1933, Skillin joined the Commonweal, an independent Catholic journal of opinion founded in 1924 by Michael Williams. He spent his professional career over 60 years with the review.

Under the tutelage of managing editor George N. SHUSTER, Skillin learned the rudiments of professional journalism. Shuster left the magazine in 1937 because of his disagreement with Williams’s support of Franco during the Spanish Civil War. In 1938, Skillin and fellow junior editor Philip Burnham purchased Commonweal for $9,000. They paid off the magazine’s creditors and reversed its editorial support for Franco, becoming one of the few Catholic journals in the United States to espouse a neutral position. Under Skillin’s long editorship, Commonweal placed greater emphasis on social justice and the social implications of the Christian message. In this regard, Skillin credited Virgil Michel, OSB, the founder of the liturgical movement in America, with stressing the connection between the liturgy and social action, and the French philosopher Jacques Maritain. In 1967, he resigned the post “in favor of the stimulating views of the younger editors” and to devote himself entirely to the duties of publisher.

Skillin wrote more than 3,000 articles, editorials, and book reviews for Commonweal, on topics ranging from worker cooperatives to racism, disarmament, food policy, ecumenism, human rights, liturgical reform, foreign affairs, and economic justice. Under his leadership, the magazine became deeply involved in such controversies as the Senator Joseph McCarthy affair, opposition to the Vietnam War, the debate over the papal encyclical Humanae vitae and theological dissent in the Church, and the abortion and euthanasia issues. Skillin remained principal owner of the magazine until 1984 when he donated his stock to the newly formed, nonprofit Commonweal Foundation.

Skillin was known for his kindness and spiritual tranquillity, his physical resiliency and intellectual acumen even at an advanced age, his financial stewardship that kept the precarious Commonweal afloat, his solicitude for the less fortunate, and his dedication to justice and the common good.

Bibliography: R. VAN ALLEN, The Commonweal and American Catholicism (Philadelphia 1974); Being Catholic: Commonweal from the Seventies to the Nineties (Chicago 1993).

[P. JORDAN]

SKY AND SKY GODS

In all ages and in all religions the sky was regarded as a symbol and manifestation of the divine (cf. the distinction between sky and heaven). Knowledge of the mythology, Weltanschauung, social order, and environment is of fundamental importance for understanding the function of heaven and the gods of heaven. Three types of function are distinguished, which often overlap.

Heaven is conceived as the symbol and name of the Supreme Being. This is the case among the Chinese (Ti-en), Mongols (“by the power of the eternal Heaven,” “Heaven has commanded me”), the Sumerians (An), and especially, among the inhabitants of the Afro-Asiatic steppes and the herding peoples. The Indo-European languages employ the terms Devah, Dyaus, Die, Tivar, Zeus, Deus, Diespiter, and Jupiter to designate the creator and lord of all things. Side by side with the active worship of the Supreme God of Heaven there is a tendency to make him a Deus otiosus (as in Africa) and to concentrate on the active worship of other religious phenomena that seem to be closer and to play a more central role in daily life.

Heaven is viewed as the realm (often arranged in tiers) or dwelling place of the Supreme Being and of other supraterrrestrial powers or of the dead. Heaven is the place of sacred action. Its gradation and the composition of its inhabitants are often based on the syncretistic merging of the individual gods of conquered or foreign peoples: in Egypt, Hathor, Maut, Nut, Neith, and Isis; among the Aztecs, Tezcatlipoca, Tlaloc, Quetzalcoatl, Huitzilopochtli. Among the Pygmies, their god Epilipili lives in the sky because men were unworthy of him. The Iroquois relate that the daughter of their Celestial Chief fell through a hole in the sky to the earth and became the mother of their culture-heroes. The shamans visit the celestial realms.

Sculpture of a 17th-century Sun God. (©Macduff Everton/CORBIS)

Heaven is thought of also as a cosmic world-principle. The union of heaven (mostly masculine) and earth (always feminine) determines, for example, the Taoistic world order (Ying-Yang). In Polynesia, through this union (Rangi-Pépe) the world is born. Both are fertility principles (as is clear from the rock pictures of the Yoruba in West Africa). The visible heaven is a representative of the divine. Accordingly, the natural phenomena connected with it are frequently the symbols or hypostases of divinity. Among the Haida Indians, the term Sins means heaven, air, storm, and weather. The identification of heaven with rain (Jupiter pluvius) or with thunder (among the Semang on the Malacca peninsula, the combination Ta Ped'n-Karei) is very commonly made.

The assumption that the Supreme Being is the personification of the material heaven or sky (the view of R.

Pettazzoni) runs counter to the scientific evaluation of the evidence. The phenomena mentioned above are best explained by supposing the presence of an original idea, founded in the nature of man, but variously modified and hypostatized in individual cases.

Bibliography: J. HAEKEL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:352–354. S. MORENZ, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:328–331. M. ELIADE, Patterns in Comparative Religion, tr. R. SHEED (New York 1958) 38–123, an excellent treatment with copious bibliog. G. FOUCAUT, J. HASTINGS, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion & Ethics, 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908–27) 11:580–585. R. PETTAZZONI, The All-Knowing God (New York 1956). F. HEILER, Die Religionen der Menschheit (Stuttgart 1959).

[W. DURPÉ]

SLAVERY, I (IN THE BIBLE)

Although slavery existed in Israel on only a small scale, it was an integral part of the ancient Semitic culture; basically, it was an economic institution that remained unchanged in a stable economy.

Enslavement. In Israel the following were reduced to slavery: captives taken in raids (Am 1.6, 9), insolvent debtors (Am 2.6; 2 Kgs 4.1; Neh 5.5, 8), convicted thieves unable to make retribution (Ex 22.2), young girls sold by their fathers into conditional slavery (Ex 21.7–11), and non-Israelite prisoners taken in war (2 Chr 28.8–15). The captives taken in war might become Temple slaves, domestic slaves, or state slaves. It was customary to dedicate some of the captives to Temple service (Nm 31.25–47; Jos 9.21–27); some became slaves in private households; others were made to work as slaves on state projects. The insolvent debtors mentioned above were sold into slavery to satisfy their creditors. To avoid the danger of wholesale population drift of small-scale farmers into slavery as a result of insolvency, the Law limited such slavery to a maximum of six years (Ex 21.2; Dt 15.12); at the end of this service, they were to be provided with the means necessary for returning to normal life (Dt 15.13–18). A Hebrew who had sold himself into slavery to escape poverty was to serve till the JUBILEE YEAR. If his master was a foreigner, he could either purchase his freedom or ask to be redeemed by one of his relatives any time before the Jubilee Year (Lv 25.47–55). Yet this humanitarian legislation of 7th-year release and jubilee-year liberty remained largely theoretical, as is seen in the unfulfilled pledge given the Hebrew slaves at the time of the Babylonian siege (Jer 34.8–22; see Mendelsohn, 86–87).

Legislation. Legally, the slave was property, without name or genealogy, a commodity to be sold, bought, or inherited. However, OT legislation, especially the Deuteronomic code, mindful of Israel's slavery in Egypt (Dt 5.15; 15.15; 24.18) and increasingly considerate of the individual, aimed at keeping the number of Hebrew slaves to a minimum and mitigating the severities in their life. A man who was married when he became a slave could take his wife back with him at the end of his service, but if he was single at the beginning of his service and was given a wife by his master, the wife and any children born of the couple belonged to the master (Ex 21.3-4). A significant difference between Hebrew and foreign slaves was that the latter could be held in servitude permanently and handed on with other family property (Lv 25.44-46). Religious privileges were accorded also to slaves; Hebrew and non-Hebrew slaves were to be circumcised (Gn 17.12) and enjoy the Sabbath rest (Ex 20.11; 23.12; Dt 5.14). A woman captured in war and taken as a wife, if later divorced, could neither be sold nor again reduced to slavery; her husband had to allow her to go free (Dt 21.10-14). The death penalty was prescribed for a man who deceitfully sold a fellow Israelite into slavery (Dt 24.7). The OT codes limit their legislation to domestic slaves; no prescriptions are given for the state or Temple slaves mentioned in nonlegal texts.

Role in OT Economy. Slavery, as such, was not a prominent feature of the Israelite economy. The agricultural projects were too small to lend themselves to the exploitation of slave labor; the hired laborer did this work more economically. There were no private industrial projects of great scope in Israel, nor was there a continued international commerce. Yet the nation had its building programs and, for a time, a metal industry. Israel's most outstanding use of state slaves was in the copper smeltery and foundry built by King Solomon at Asiongaber [see N. Glueck, Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 79 (1940) 2-18]. Some slaves were attached to the Temple throughout Israel's history (Jos 9.23, 27; Ezr 8.20). But the majority of Israel's slaves were found in private homes performing domestic chores.

Place in New Testament Ethics. The attitude of the NT toward the institution of slavery was primarily religious, not social. Christ and His Apostles did not give new legislation to oppose the system of existing slavery, but preached principles that would logically lead to its abolition. If all are children of the same Father, no essential distinction can remain between slave and free man (1 Cor 12.13; Gal 3.28; Col 3.11).

The Apostles did not intend an immediate change in social institutions; theirs was a religious message with the primary intention of making their converts obedient to God's revelation in Christ (Eph 6.5-9; Col 3.22-4.1; 1 Pt 2.18). Paul does not command Philemon to free his slave, although he implicitly recommends this in reminding him that Onesimus is his brother in Christ and is to be treated as such (Phlm 15-16). Moreover, he exhorts the slaves of the Corinth Church not to be impatient with their station, but to accept it, recognizing that they have a higher life in Christ (1 Cor 7.21-24). Nevertheless, in the NT the foundations were laid for a slow but effective social revolution that eventually caused the abolition of slavery in Christian countries.

Bibliography: I. MENDELSON, The Interpreters Dictionary of the Bible, ed. G. A. BUTTRICK et al. (New York 1951-57) 4:383-391; Slavery in the Ancient Near East (New York 1949). R. SALOMON, L'Esclavage en droit comparé juif et romain (Paris 1931). M. ROBERTI, La lettera di S. Paulo a Filemone e la condizione giuridica dello schiavo fuggitivo (Milan 1933). P. HEINISCH, "Das Sklavenrecht in Israel und im alten Orient," Studia catholica 11 (1934-35) 201-218. R. DEVAUX, Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions, tr. J. MCHUGH (New York 1961) 80-90.

[H. C. FRANCO]

SLAVERY, II (AND THE CHURCH)

Slavery is here understood to signify a social and economic institution in which one human being is the legal property of another, or, as the condition of such a human being who is thus become a res non persona, a human chattel without rights or privileges.

For the understanding of the Church's attitude to slavery and for balanced judgment on the morality of slavery, two things must be kept in mind: the Church's attitude toward social questions in general, and the fact that slavery has existed under different forms.

The Church was born into a world in which slavery was universally accepted as a social and economic institution pertaining to the very structure of society, just as today the system of remunerated employment is taken for granted. As in modern society no one would be likely to contemplate seriously the abolition of the existing system, so neither did it occur to Christians of the early Church to advocate the abolition of slavery. The Church did, however, from the beginning, urgently insist on the mutual rights and duties existing between masters and slaves, just as in our times she emphasizes the mutual rights and duties of employers and employees. God became man and founded His Church, not in order to usher in a new social, economic, or political order, but rather to change the hearts of men according to the prophecy of Ezekiel: "I will give them a new heart and put a new spirit within them; I will remove the stony heart from their bodies, and replace it with a natural heart, so that they will live according to my statutes, and observe and carry out my ordinances" (Ez 11.19-20). The Church took men and society as she found them and did her utmost to transform them. Thus St. Paul wrote to the Galatians: "For all you who have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek; there is neither slave nor free-man; there is neither male nor female. For you are all one in Christ Jesus" (Gal 3.2728; see also 1 Cor 12.13; Eph 5.9; Col 3.22–24; 1 Pt 2.28). An instructive concrete case of Paul's conception of things, and of the Church's constant attitude ever since toward the master-slave relationship, and later to the employer-employee relationship, is afforded by Paul's one-page letter to Philemon.

Different Forms. The term "slavery" did not always have the odious connotation that it has today. The history of slavery shows that two quite distinct forms of it have existed side by side, depending for their distinction less upon juridical institution than upon the virtue of the owners. In the form known as symbiotic slavery, master and slave worked together for their mutual good as human beings. In this form there was, on the part of the slave, fidelity, devotedness, and willing service, all in keeping with true human dignity; and, on the part of the master, kindness, respect, and even true charity, while between master and slave there often existed real friendship. The slave was part of the household and was treated as such from the moment he came into the service of his master until he died. The second historical form of slavery has been called parasitic, and in this form the master or owner exploited the labor of the slave for his own private advantage and pleasure. In this form there was inhumanity, brutality, and vice in both masters and slaves. Slavery in this form was obviously diametrically opposed to the spirit of Christianity and, as such, was always condemned by the Christian Church.

The first form of slavery the Church never opposed directly, but sought rather to transform it from within. The idea of one human being belonging to another as a piece of property was always repugnant to the Christian concept of human dignity. By changing the minds of men, masters and slaves, and legislators, the Church contributed efficaciously, although indirectly, to the total disappearance of slavery in the strict sense in all Christian lands before the 13th century.

It can be said that some men are naturally disposed, not indeed to be slaves, that is, to be the property or chattels of other men, but to serve, that is, to work under direction for their own good and for the common good of all. Moreover, in the Christian view of things, work and service are noble activities fully in keeping with true human and Christian dignity. Christ Himself came on earth to do the will of His Father (Jn 4.34; 6.8; Heb 10.7, 9) and to be obedient unto the death of the cross (Phil 2.8) out of love for His Eternal Father and out of love for mankind (see St. Thomas, Summa Theologiae 3a, 46.2). St. Thomas maintained that a life of free service in this sense would have been part of human life in the state of original justice before the fall (ST 1a, 96.3); but in no wise would a life of penal servitude (ibid., ad 1 and art. 4), which was regarded by him and by many of the Fathers of the Church as a consequence of sin (see St. Augustine, Civ. 19.15). St. Augustine makes the same point with regard to work: from being a glad and even effortless sharing in God's creative activity, it becomes as a result of sin a painful toil and labor (Gen. ad litt. 8.8). St. Thomas's teaching that between master and slave strict justice could not exist (see ST 2a2ae, 57.4, and passim) has been frequently grossly misinterpreted through being understood out of its true historical and doctrinal context. Historically, slavery in the strict sense no longer existed in Christian lands in the time of St. Thomas. Doctrinally, St. Thomas was trying to explain that the virtue governing the master-servant relationship is not mere justice but something greater, for the simple reason that between master and servant there are mutual rights and duties that last as long as the relationship remains. By insisting precisely on these mutual rights and obligations, the Church was instrumental in bringing about the abolition of slavery in the strict sense, transforming it gradually into a state of noble service on the part of the inferior and of conscientious care on the part of the superior or master. She insisted over and over again on the inalienable right of man to freedom, to guide his own life, to marry, to enter religion, and to take Orders. She insisted that servants should be given free time to attend to their own lives and families, and forbade, for instance, at the Council of Auxerre in 578 all unnecessary work on Sundays (c.16, J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 9.913). On the other hand, she condemned most severely those who, under one pretext or another, incited the servants to revolt against their masters (see c.3 of the Council of Gangres in the middle of the 4th century, Mansi 2.1102). Instances of such legislation could be given without number.

The Slave Trade. The great geographical discoveries by Spain and Portugal in the 15th and 16th centuries brought in their train the recrudescence of slavery so that the problem of the morality of slavery and enslavement again became acute. After a brief period of hesitation and uncertainty, caused by inaccurate information on conditions in Africa and the two Americas, and by a desire to avoid greater evils, the Church unreservedly condemned colonial slavery, and every type of slave trade, as inhuman and immoral. The slave trade as such was not something new. It had been practiced long before Christian times and the Church, from the beginning, regarded it as immoral. Numerous documents attest to the fact. The following are easily accessible. In 873, John VIII wrote to the rulers of Sardinia exhorting them and ordering them to restore freedom to slaves bought from the Greeks (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 668). In 1537, Paul III excommunicated those who enslaved the Native Americans and confiscated their property (Denzinger 1495). In 1838, Gregory XVI condemned all forms of colonial slavery and the slave trade, calling it inhumanum illud commercium (Denzinger 2745-46). In a letter to the bishops of Brazil (May 5, 1888), Leo XIII recalled the Church's unceasing efforts in the course of centuries to get rid of colonial slavery and the slave trade and expressed his satisfaction that Brazil had at last abolished it (Acta Leonis XIII, 8, 169-192). From the 15th century Catholic missionaries, theologians, and statesmen never ceased to strive for the abolition of ignominious traffic in human beings. During the French Revolution, at the instigation of a Catholic priest, the Abbé H. Grégoire, the National Assembly in 1794 decreed the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in all French colonies. In 1890, Cardinal LAVIGERIE founded the antislave league of France for combatting of slavery and the slave trade on an international basis. In a radio message to the workers of Spain, March 11, 1951, Pius XII stated succinctly the Church's constant attitude to slavery in all its forms. "The Church," he said, "never preached social revolution, but everywhere and at all times, from the letter of Paul to Philemon up to the great social teachings of the popes in the 19th and 20th centuries, she did her utmost to see that consideration was taken more of man himself than of economic and technical advantages so that all men might have the possibility of living a life worthy of a Christian and of a human being" (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1951, 214). Today the Church still spares no effort to save men from the crypto-slavery of the modern industrial world.

See Also: LAS CASAS, BARTOLOMÉ DE.

Bibliography: H. A. WALLON, Histoire de l'esclavage dans l'antiquité, 3 v. (2d ed. Paris 1879). J. HÖFFNER, Christentum und Menschenwürde (Trier 1947). M. LENGELLÉ, L'Esclavage (Paris 1955). A. KATZ, Christentum und Sklaverei (Vienna 1926). L. HANKE, The Spanish Struggle for Justice in the Conquest of America (Philadelphia 1949); Aristotle and the American Indians (London 1959).

[C. WILLIAMS]

SLAVERY, III (HISTORY OF)

Although slavery was found among all peoples of antiquity, an account of its development until its abolition in the most advanced countries during the 19th century can be limited to the Christian Era, beginning, that is, when Rome ruled the entire Mediterranean world.

Letter to King Charles V of Spain, 1542, from Hernando Cortez in which Cortez advises putting natives of the colonies under the protection of the Crown to prevent their enslavement.

Slavery in the Roman Empire. The legal status of the slave improved measurably toward the end of the Roman Republic and especially under the ROMAN EMPIRE. The powers of masters were reduced by law. It was forbidden to deliver a slave to wild beasts without a formal judicial sentence, and any master who mistreated a slave was obliged to sell him. An ailing or aged slave who was abandoned by his master was freed ipso facto. By degrees, the magistrate replaced the master as judge in slave proceedings. The idea of the slave as a person, still vague, gradually became more precise. These innovations reflected the theories of STOICISM that had begun to exert an influence in the first century before the Christian Era. In the early Empire, SENECA maintained that slavery was merely corporal and that the spirit remained sui juris. Ideas such as these soon infiltrated the works of jurists, as can be seen in the well-known text of Florentinus: "Slavery is a creation of the ius gentium, by which a man is subjected, contrary to nature, to ownership on the part of another" (Corpus iuris civilis, Digesta 1.5.4). The entire law of servitude was considered to be a matter of the ius gentium. Tryphoninus declared: "Liberty is contained in the natural law; domination was introduced by the ius gentium" (ibid. 12.6.64). Ulpian added, in a passage frequently quoted in medieval acts of manumission: "Manumissions are also comprised in the ius gentium . . . seeing that by natural law all were born free, and manu-mission was not known because slavery itself was unknown; but when slavery came in through the ius gentium, there followed the relief given by manumission” (ibid. 1.1.4). Another passage from Ulpian shows the position on slavery that classical Roman law attained: “According to the civil law, slaves have no rights; it is not the same according to natural law, for according to natural law all men are equal” (ibid. 50.17.32). Although the Stoics helped to humanize legislation concerning slavery, they never dreamed of furthering the abolition of the institution. Their philosophy aimed to humanize relations among men without altering the traditional order.

Under the Roman Yoke: The Iberians driven under the yoke and sold as slaves by the Romans. Engraving from a painting by R. Cogghe. (©CORBIS)

Abraham Lincoln (left, center) at first reading of the Emancipation Proclamation.

Early Christian Views. The early Church entertained ideas about slavery somewhat similar to those of the Stoics. For St. Paul as for Seneca, slavery was merely external. It did not exist in the moral and spiritual domain. Although the Apostle excluded slave merchants from the numbers of the just (1 Tm 1.10), he nonetheless regarded slavery as a legitimate institution: “Let every man remain in the calling in which he was called. Wast thou a slave when called? Let it not trouble thee.” (1 Cor 7.20–21). Furthermore he advised slaves to serve their masters “with fear and trembling” (Eph 6.5). His well-known letter to Philemon, to whom he returned a fugitive slave in whose regard he recommended indulgence, illustrates clearly the attitude of the early Church. [See SLAVERY (IN THE BIBLE); SLAVERY (AND THE CHURCH).]

AMBROSIASTER, commenting on the Epistle to the Colossians (4.1), made a very lucid presentation of patristic teaching. Masters, he wrote, had duties toward their slaves. God had created only free men, but because of worldly wickedness it was possible that men born free might be reduced to slavery as a consequence of war (a situation considered as commonplace). Slavery as the result of war could not exist in the eyes of God; sin alone could be the source of this social evil. Among the Fathers of the East, St. GREGORY OF NYSSA opposed the legitimacy of slavery in his homily on Ecclesiastes, but the theory of slavery as a consequence of sin perdured. The Western Fathers went further, and St. AUGUSTINE looked upon slavery as an expression of the divine order: “It is clear, then, that sin is the primary cause of servitude in the sense of a social status in which one man is compelled to be subjected to another man. Nor does this befall a man, save by the decree of God, who is never unjust and who knows how to impose appropriate punishments on different sinners” (Civ. 19.15). If doctrinally the Church seemed uninterested in changing social conditions, in practice she was inclined to favor freeing the slaves. From this point of view, one of the most efficacious instruments was the manumissio in ecclesia, legally approved in 321 under Constantine; it was, however, a charitable work devoid of any obligatory power. About 358 the Council of GANGRA anathematized anyone who, under the pretext of religion, taught slaves to resist their masters, to flee their service, or not to obey willingly and with all deference.

There was a recrudescence of slavery in the third, fourth, and fifth centuries, accompanying the decline of the pax romana and the renewed wars against the barbarians. SALVIAN, for example, noted (De gubernatione Dei 4.14) that bands of slaves supervised by actores and silentiarii continued to exist. Under the influence of the colonate the condition of some slaves was ameliorated, but slavery in its full rigor was in evidence everywhere while the German states were being built on the ruins of the Roman Empire. In these states, as in the Empire, enslavement had its source in war, even in war between Christians. The slave trade was equally important. The Vita of St. ELIGIUS, Bishop of Noyon in the seventh century, makes it clear that ships bearing more than 100 slaves were not unusual at this time.

Slavery in Medieval Europe. Every European country accepted slavery for a more or less extended period during the Middle Ages. Even in countries in which social development was most rapid, slavery did not disappear before the tenth century. There was general progress, however, toward what is called, for want of a better or more generally accepted term, servitude or semifreedom. (See FEUDALISM.) The semifree could no longer be sold at the block. Servitude developed both in countries in which slavery lasted until the end of the Middle Ages or well beyond, i.e., the Mediterranean countries, and in others. The transition from slavery to servitude was first accomplished in Western Continental countries, but slavery continued alongside servitude in the maritime regions where Christian peoples were in contact with heterodox populations, as well as in central and eastern Europe, where the Slavs, still pagan, were often reduced to servitude. Even in Great Britain, prisoners taken during the wars among the Anglo-Saxons, Welsh, Irish, and Scots were for a long time reduced to slavery. As late as 1102 a council held in London saw fit to decree: "Let no one hereafter presume to engage in that nefarious trade in which hitherto in England men were usually sold like brute animals." In reality slavery had by this time become rare in Britain and was found only in a very small segment of British society in frontier territories. When political unity was accomplished, slavery disappeared just as it had in other western European nations that had been inhabited by several different peoples but governed by a central authority.

Evolution of the Term in the Middle Ages. The Latin word sclavus—common source of the words slave, esclave (Fr.), esclavo (Sp.), escravo (Port.), schiauo (It.), and Sklave (Ger.)—was not yet in use during the early medieval period when slavery was common throughout Europe. Medieval slavery was then the heir of the ancient institution, the continuity of which was still in question. The slave was still the servus, the mancipium, as in Rome. It was not until slaves began to be recruited from entirely new sources that new terms appeared to describe those who were not free. Among these terms sclavus, derived from the ethnic name of the Slavic peoples, was widely accepted. In its Latin form it first appeared in Germany in the tenth century. At the same time a similar Arabic form, siklābi (pl. sakāliba), was in use in Muslim Spain. This was because an important trade route brought to the Spain of the Caliphs of CORDOBA, and from there to the rest of the Muslim world, large numbers of Slavs who were captured or bought on the eastern frontiers of Germany and transported across western Europe. The trade ceased in the 11th century, and the semantic evolution of sclavus and siklābi was arrested, in the sense of interest here, in the countries where these terms had first appeared. Sclavus disappeared altogether and siklābi came to be restricted to the nonfree eunuch.

In the 13th century, however, sclavus, meaning slave, reappeared in Italy, whence it spread over Europe. At this time the Italians were in effect at the beginning of a new trade route that served especially the Mediterranean world. Enslaved Slavs from southeastern Europe and the shores of the Black Sea began to be imported into Italy. The Slavs once again became the object of a very active trade, with the result that their name was soon used to describe all the nonfree. From Italy, Slavic slavery spread through the south of France into eastern Spain, where the Catalan sclau came into general use in the 14th century. On the other hand, there were never any enslaved Slavs in the Castilian political complex or in Portugal, since these countries participated very little in Mediterranean economic life. As a result the term slave appeared there only much later.

Origins of the African Slave Trade. Enslavement following a war against unbelievers was very common on the Iberian Peninsula as long as the Christian kingdoms were at war with Muslim nations. In central Spain the struggle lasted until the conquest of Granada in 1492, the year America was discovered. Even later, however, Muslims captured at sea were regularly sent to slave markets in Spain, as on their side the Muslims took Spanish and other Christian captives to North Africa. Also, until the middle of the 13th century, prisoners taken in frontier raids between Christian Portugal and her Muslim neighbors were enslaved. However, when the Portuguese reconquest became an accomplished fact and no independent Moors remained in the country, slaves could be obtained only outside the boundaries of the kingdom.

During the 14th and 15th centuries, when a number of African islands were discovered, the search for slaves was immediately renewed. Portuguese and Castilians sought the Guanches, a Canary Island people now extinct; but they bought still more slaves who were natives of the interior of the African continent. For a long time these black slaves were brought across the Muslim territory of Africa into southern Europe. During the 14th century a special caravan route was opened from the Sudan across the Sahara as far as the peninsula of Barca in Cyrenaica. The Portuguese, just as they later established a direct maritime line for the spice trade in the time of Vasco da Gama, now established an African slave route under Henry the Navigator, eliminating the need for intermediaries along the caravan routes or in the North African ports. The Portuguese themselves loaded the slaves at their ports of call in Senegal or Guinea. After the death of Henry the Navigator, Diogo Cão reached the Congo, where, as in Angola, increasing numbers of slaves were procured and sent, first to Europe, and then to America when the sugar plantations began to grow in importance. Beginning in the 15th century, the Portuguese government granted asientos, or permits, for the slave trade. The slave trade continued for four centuries in spite of its condemnation by the papacy, beginning with Pius II, on Oct. 7, 1462.

The trade along the African coast at the end of the Middle Ages underwent a transition to colonial slavery in America. Since the American aborigines who had been reduced to slavery at the beginning of Spanish colonization in the West Indies died out very quickly, they were replaced by Africans imported according to the rules established by the permits of the Middle Ages. The change from medieval slavery in the Mediterranean and in western Europe to colonial slavery in America was hardly noticed; it was a matter of simple continuity.

Slavery in Spanish America. In America the problem of the enslavement of the native inhabitants arose almost immediately. In Spanish America, as in Spain during the last centuries of the reconquest, native slavery quickly became a phenomenon characteristic of the frontier, that is, of any region adjacent to a still unsubdued indigenous population. At the same time, as in Spain itself, slaves originally taken on the frontier were imported into the interior of the imperial territory. This did not particularly surprise the subdued native peoples, since the tribal societies of America, like others, knew slavery as a consequence of war. Nevertheless, as the unsubdued areas gradually disappeared and the bulk of the native population was integrated into the Spanish empire, enslavement of the native peoples following frontier wars diminished and finally disappeared altogether. In one instance, in southern Chile, however, the Spanish Crown acted contrary to its general policy of suppressing the practice of subjection of the natives. The frontier war against the indomitable Araucanians continued to the end of the 17th century, and yielding to the plea of the local colonists, the Crown permitted the enslavement of prisoners. In general, however, the Spanish government envisaged colonial peace as its goal. Just as it saw no place within its realm for internecine war, it saw at the same time no advantage in slavery; and through the efforts of the Dominican friar Bartolome de LAS CASAS and the theologians F. de VITORIA and F. SUÁREZ, it had been brought at an early date to recognize in its slave law the inherent dignity of the slave as a person. This is not to say that it did not continue to treat the indigenous population very badly, but at the time the European peasant class did not always fare better.

There were similar conditions of servitude or its derivatives on both sides of the Atlantic. These conditions in America and especially in Spanish America, affecting practically the entire native population, differed from those prevailing in Europe in that the racial differences between the colonist or proprietary landowner and the Indian who tilled the soil were associated with the perpetuation of colonial customs that kept the semifree natives in a condition of hardship long outmoded in all, or most, of Europe.

Slavery and Colonization. Contrary to what is generally believed, no colonial society has been able to subsist while reducing into slavery the indigenous population, that is, the one inhabiting the colony. In the final analysis slavery and colonization proved to be in contradiction, at least with respect to the aborigines of colonized countries. Unfortunately, however, colonization did not exclude the enslavement of the nonindigenous, that is, of imported slaves; and it was thus that black slavery was introduced into the economy of colonial America.

In Africa, Europeans did not really penetrate inland between the 15th and the 19th centuries. They set up agencies along the coast where whites or blacks themselves lived by trading with inland peoples. This situation persisted throughout the ancien régime as well as during a great part of the 19th century, when colonial slavery flourished in America. During this time there was little thought of questioning the legitimacy of reducing Africans to slavery. Except with respect to black slavery in America, serious discussion of abolishing the slave trade began only after the colonial powers occupied the African interior. Then relations in Africa between colonizers and colonized became what they had long since been in America: the enslavement of the native African population became incompatible with the desire to establish and develop colonies. Great abolitionists such as William Wilberforce had not yet put an end to black slavery, but their efforts aided the cause. The necessity of establishing colonial peace in Africa in order to permit its exploitation made possible the triumph of their ideas. In the 19th century the black continent opened its inland wealth to the appetites of colonial powers, which then had to abolish the African slave trade (in which the Muslims had also engaged) to be in a position to exploit Africa.

Economic Effects of Abolition. The emancipation of slaves was proclaimed in the U.S. on Jan. 1, 1863, during the Civil War; but it was not until 1871 that the Spanish Cortes decided to prohibit slavery, after 1880, in what remained of the Spanish empire. It is true that Spain had forbidden the slave trade in 1820, whereas Portugal had not decided to do so until 1836, even after Brazil, its former colony, had set an example in 1831. The last Brazilian emperor, Peter II, decreed in 1871 the law of "free birth" that assured freedom at birth for all children of slaves, and in 1888 he proclaimed full emancipation, a move that cost him his throne.

In the West Indies, where at the very beginning of the 19th century HAITI had forged in blood the political freedom of a nation of emancipated slaves, the progressive suppression of slavery created numerous difficulties for which remedy was sought by the importation of non-indigenous people, mostly from Asia. Legally these were not slaves, although their economic condition was hardly better. There were even attempts to return to the importation of Africans called "free workers" whose misery was such that they were easily recognized as new victims of the slave trade. The apparent similarity, recognized by international opinion, was sufficient reason to end the forced migration. It had lasted long enough, however, to substitute for slavery on the plantations a multiracial labor force with living standards that were extremely low. More and more, emancipated Africans were subordinated, just as the Native Americans were, in those zones of the Americas where the plantation economy was maintained or developed by diversification of crops. Sugar, in effect, was no longer king; the elevation of European living standards resulting from industrialization created markets for new agricultural produce of the plantation regime. At the same time, this produce was no longer an American monopoly, since plantation farming had spread to other tropical and subtropical regions both in Asia and in Africa. Thenceforth, the plantation worker, regardless of the color of his skin, was to belong first to the agricultural proletariat, then to the industrial, as production was intensified by technological development. The amelioration of living conditions became dependent on technical advances, the progress of which led to the lessening of physical hardship and at length to an increase in wages.

Historic Roots of Slavery. It is generally believed that colonial slavery, and especially plantation slavery, was a product of the modern period found particularly in America. This is not the fact. Colonial slavery—distinguished by the use of nonfree manual labor of distant origin, with physical and religious characteristics different from the colonizers—existed in the eastern Mediterranean long before a plantation regime was developed in colonial America. Slaves had worked on the sugar plantations of Cyprus and in the alum mines of Phocaea on the Anatolian coast, as they did later on the sugar plantations of Brazil and the West Indies and the tobacco plantations of Virginia. In the East these slaves were not always black, but either Slavs or Muslims; in Virginia, white indentured servants worked side by side with black slaves.

Moreover, it is important to note that slavery antedated the coming of Europeans in all countries occupied during the period of colonial expansion. This was true in America, Africa, and Asia. Slavery as an institution was not introduced by Europeans, although the number of slaves increased in a frightening manner after their arrival. In the slaves' native lands population decreased as a result of the raids made by slave hunters, many of whom were themselves natives. The wholesale transportation of slaves could be effected only to those countries that were sufficiently far away to remove the possibility of escape and return of the slave to his native land. During the period in which colonial slavery underwent its greatest development, that is, from the 16th to the 19th century, these countries could be reached only by sea. Therefore, nations in a position to dominate or monopolize maritime transportation, especially intercontinental transportation, retained a monopoly of the slave trade. These were the same nations that established colonial empires across the ocean, which they succeeded in doing for the very reason that enabled them to carry on their trade on a large scale—they had achieved technical superiority in the area of maritime transportation.

In ancient times, whenever an ethnic group or nation achieved a superiority that gave it ascendancy over other ethnic groups or nations with sufficiently different physical or religious traits, the slave trade flourished. This was especially true if its victims were on a lower rung of general technical development, without arms or other means of defense sufficiently effective to afford them permanent protection. Thus Arab navigation dominated the Indian Ocean before the arrival of Vasco da Gama and the Portuguese. Long before the arrival of Europeans, the Swahili principalities on the eastern coast of Africa organized forays into the interior and filled the Arab ships with heavy cargoes of black slaves who were sent to various parts of the Muslim world. On the other hand; the Islamic conquests spread with surprising rapidity into the Sudan and Guinea after the end of the 11th century. In less than 50 years, Islam took over all western Africa, from which black captives were sent to Muslim Spain. The Africans were thus reduced to slavery in the Islamic world before the arrival of Europeans, although this in no way alters the fact that African slavery was most highly developed when the Portuguese, Spanish, and later the Dutch and English, with occasional localized French competition, achieved the dominion of the seas. Not surprisingly, since Islamic law always recognized slavery, as long as European colonization did not penetrate into the interior of eastern or central Africa, the Arab trade in Africans continued to be very active. It was not until the colonial powers gained ascendancy in these regions in the last quarter of the 19th century, that this trade, too, died out.

Bibliography: W. L. WESTERMANN, The Slave Systems of Greek and Roman Antiquity (Philadelphia 1955). E. MEYER, Die Sklaverei im Altertum (Dresden 1898). W. W. BUCKLAND, The Roman Law of Slavery: The Condition of the Slave in Private Law from Augustus to Justinian (Cambridge, Eng. 1908). M. ROBERTI, La lettera di S. Paulo a Filemone e la condizione giuridica dello schiavo fuggitivo (Milan 1933). C. VERLINDEN, L'Esclavage dans l'Europe médiévale, v. 1 Péninsule Iberique, France (Bruges 1955); "L'Origine de sclavus—esclave," Archivum latinum aevi medii 17 (1943) 97–128; "Pax Hispanica en la America colonial," Historia no. 12 (Buenos Aires 1958) 5–17; "Esclavage médiéval en Europe et esclavage colonial en Amérique," Sorbonne, Cahiers de l'Institut des Hautes Études de l'Amérique latine 6 (1963) 29–45.

[C. VERLINDEN]

SLAVIC RELIGION

Slavic paganism was animistic, worshiping all the essential elements of Slavic life. Since the daily life of the Slavs revolved around the house, yard, and stables and their agricultural, hunting, and fishing pursuits, their religious concepts developed against the background of the home life, fields, rivers, lakes, and forests among which they lived. Various spirits dwelt in all these places and the goodwill of those spirits had to be propitiated. Sacrifices were offered to them as well as to the spirits of ancestors.

The pagan Slavs believed in future life, a fact emphasized by the great attention paid to funeral rites and their great complexity: the immolation of wives, slaves, and animals that were supposed to accompany the souls of the dead into the future life, the funeral banquet called tryzna, the offering of food deposited at the graves, and the belief in the close association of the ancestral spirits with the everyday life of their living descendants. This belief explains also the great role of ancestral spirits in Slavic folklore and popular tradition, and it survives into modern times.

The early method of disposing of corpses was cremation, which was replaced by inhumation toward the end of the pagan period under the influence of Christianity. In the grave were placed ornaments, arms, tools, and other objects of daily life. Like so many other primitive peoples, the Slavs often killed old people unable to work and unwanted children. In some more remote and backward areas, this practice survived until the 14th century. Another common practice was the postrigi, or postrizini, a ritual performed on male children when they reached the age of seven. It consisted of a solemn cutting of hair of the child and symbolized the transfer from the authority of the mother to that of the father.

Over and above the household spirits, there was a group of supreme deities headed by Perun, the god of storm, thunder, and lightning. Procopius (6th century) and Helmold (11th century) both emphasize this supreme role of Perun in the Slavic pantheon. There were other great deities. Svarog was the god of the sun, fire, and light. The fire as such was considered to be a Svarozic, son of Svarog. The name of Svarog shows a close affinity to the Indo-European root svar, meaning heat, brilliance. The Eastern Slavs worshiped the sun also under the name of Dazbog, meaning "the giver." Volos, or Veles, was the god of cattle and possibly of agriculture in general. Stribog (the god of wind), Khors, and Mokos (a female deity personifying mother earth) were worshiped particularly by the Eastern Slavs, but their attributes are less clear. All of them show a close affinity to similar deities of the Iranian and Vedic pantheons.

There was usually no definite priestly caste, and worship was offered usually by the village or family elders. There is very little indication of temples or great centers of worship except among the Slavic tribes on the Baltic (Arcona, Radgost), where there was also a priestly caste, and among the Russians.

Bibliography: N. REITER, "Mythologie der alten Slaven," in Wörterbuch der Mythologie, ed. H. W. HAUSSIG (Stuttgart 1961–) Abt.1.2.1, fasc.6, 163–208. J. VENDRYÈS, E. TONNELAT, and B. O. UNBEGAUN, Les Religions des Celtes, des Germains, et des anciens Slaves ("Mana" Series 2.3; Paris 1948) 387–445.

[O. P. SHERBOWITZ-WETZOR]

SLAVOPHILISM

The romantic ultranationalistic ideology of a group of 19th-century Russian right-wing reformers who fervently predicted a brilliant future for Russia. They held forth in the endless debates inevitably occasioned by Russia's victory over Napoleon I in 1812. For them that future depended upon the restoration of Russia's legitimate past. They scorned St. Petersburg, Russia's "German" capital and the memory of the man who built it, Emperor PETER I. The Slavophiles, as they came to be known, were the philosophers of nationality (narodnost'). For them nationalism was something more than a Russian subject's manifestation of patriotic loyalty to St. Petersburg's laws, policies of the moment, and international commitment to the concert of Europe. To the Czar's alarm Slavophilism logically developed into a cultural and political pan-Slavism with dangerous messianic visions of Great Russia. The Slavophiles were interested primarily in the Slavonic race and also in the land and the faith of the Russian people (narod). Russian nationality was the object of Slavophile veneration. It was to them a grass roots "folkishness," a complexus of a God-bearing apolitical people's traditions and preoccupations: the commune (mir), religion and worship, the things of the soul (dusha) in general. Slavophiles opposed serfdom because formerly Russians were freemen. The definitive stand of the Slavophiles against their ideological enemies, the Westernizers, was crystallized in the summer of 1836 when the brilliant P. Y. Chaadaev's First Philosophical Letter appeared in Nadezhdin's Teleskop. The visiting Marquis Astolphe de Custine later published scathing observations in La Russie en 1839. Emperor NICHOLAS I promptly declared Chaadaev officially insane, and the Slavophiles rushed to defend Russia, whose past, present, and future had been so grossly slandered by both son and outlander. Because they championed the wrong Russia, so to speak, Slavophiles were often jailed by Nicholas I. Ironically, they were frequently in material agreement with their professed enemies, the Westernizers, as Herzen and Bakunin were to note.

Conservative Slavophiles were deeply religious and supported the Orthodox Church; religion was the basis of their bias. They made their own the phrase perhaps first used by a journalistic supporter, S. P. Shevyrëv: "the rotting West" (gniloï zapad). For men such as their talented leaders, A. S. Khomyakov and K. S. Aksakov, the West was deteriorating because of the false principles on which Europe's culture rested, the eclecticism and individuality of its thinkers, and the worldly political concerns of its philosophers and citizens. I. V. Kireevskiï and others drew up long lists of contrasts between East and West, always to the disadvantage of the latter. Slavophile theological thought was hostile to both Catholicism and Protestantism. Supported by M. P. Pogodin and F. I. Tyutchev, the Slavophiles Y. Samarin, I. S. Aksakov, and their followers all logically demanded that Russia halt the process of her contamination by the West, and quarantine herself spiritually and politically in the splendid Muscovite isolation of Holy Russia of a bygone age.

Bibliography: N. L. BRODSKIÏ, Rannie slavyanofily (Moscow 1910). F. FADNER, Seventy Years of Pan-Slavism in Russia (Washington 1962). N. V. RIASANOVSKY, Russia and the West in the Teaching of the Slavophiles (Cambridge, MA 1952).

[F. L. FADNER]

SLAVORUM APOSTOLI

Pope JOHN PAUL II's fourth encyclical letter, "The Apostles of the Slavs," issued June 2, 1985, commemorating the eleventh centenary of the evangelizing work of Sts. Cyril and Methodius. In the Introduction, Pope John Paul recalls and expands on his apostolic letter Egregiae virtutis (1980), in which he named the brother-saints as co-patrons of Europe along with St. Benedict, as well as letters of his predecessors. In a personal note, John Paul acknowledges that he felt "a particular obligation" to pay tribute to Cyril and Methodius, being "the first Pope called to the See of Peter from Poland, and thus from the midst of the Slav nations" (3).

The encyclical looks back at the apostolic lives and work of evangelization of Cyril and Methodius. Part 2 presents a biographical sketch of the two saints. Part 3 recalls their evangelizing activity. Part 4 emphasizes their vision of the Church as one, holy, and universal. Part 5 proposes that their catechetical and pastoral method remains "instructive for the Church today." Part 6 cites their work as a model of inculturation—"the incarnation of the Gospel in native culture and also the introduction of these cultures into the life of the Church" (21). Part 7 explains the significance of the Christian millennium to the common culture of the Slavic world. Cyril and Methodius "made a decisive contribution to the building of Europe not only in Christian religious communion but also to its civil and cultural union" (n. 27).

Woven throughout the encyclical are reflections on the method the brothers used in evangelizing Europe and the contributions they made to Slavic culture. The words of Christ, "Preach the Gospel to the whole creation" (Mk 16:15) inspired their missionary work, and they tried to adopt the customs and language of the people to whom they were preaching. Among their principal contributions were the composition of a new alphabet and their translation of the sacred literature into the Old Slavonic language. Their profound work in orthodox doctrine and their zeal gained a great deal of admiration from Roman pontiffs, patriarchs of Constantinople, and Byzantine emperors. Because of their ability to stay in touch with both the patriarch of Constantinople and the Roman See, Cyril and Methodius bridged the Eastern and Western traditions which come together in the one, universal Church.

Despite misunderstandings—the price they had to pay for their work—Cyril and Methodius served as instruments of unity in places where there was not unity between individual communities. Their approach was based on the reality that every individual and all cultures and nations have their place in God’s mysterious plan of salvation.

In the conclusion of the encyclical Pope John Paul states that Cyril and Methodius by their words and life, sustained by the charism of the Holy Spirit, gave an example of a fruitful vocation not only for past time, but also for the centuries that are to come.

Bibliography: For the text of Slavorum apostoli, see: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 77 (1985): 779–813 (Latin); Origins 15, no. 8 (18 July 1985): 113–25; The Pope Speaks 30 (1985): 252–75 (English).

[D. CLOONEY]

SLIPYJ, JOSYF

Cardinal, archbishop, leader of Ukrainian Catholics; b. Zazdrist in the Ukraine, Feb. 17, 1892; d. Rome, Sept. 7, 1984. Josyf Kobernyckyj-Dyckowskyj Slipyj (also spelled Slipyi) was born in the Western Ukraine (Galicia) when it was still a part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. He received his theological education and seminary training in Lvov (Lviv, Lemberg), Innsbruck and Rome. Ordained a priest in 1917, in 1922 he was appointed to the faculty of the Major Seminary in Lvov (now part of Poland), and became president of the newly founded Theological Academy. He started a respected theological quarterly Bohoslovia that he later (1963) revived in Rome, after a long lapse, as a yearly publication.

In 1939 Slipyj was made coadjutor to Metropolitan Szeptyckyj of Lvov, whom he succeeded as head of the Uniate Ukrainian Church in 1944. The difficulties he had with the Nazi occupation during the first few months of his tenure were nothing in comparison to what he suffered at the hands of the Bolsheviks who took over the next year (1945), annexing the Western Ukraine to the Soviet Union. Arrested and condemned for unspecified crimes, Slipyj spent 18 years in prison, labor camps and exile in Siberia (1945–63). His church was officially annihilated through forced union with the Russian Orthodox Church (Synod of Lvov 1946).

Slipyj was allowed to leave the Soviet Union in 1963 as a result of initiatives that had been set in motion by

Saint Cyril of Belozersk, Apostle to the Slav, tempera on gesso over wood panel, early 16th century. (©The State Russian Museum/CORBIS)

Pope John XXIII. He spent the rest of his life in Rome as a witness to the vitality of the Church in the Ukraine, notwithstanding the long years of repression. He spoke of a “church in the catacombs” in terms which, to some, sounded exaggerated, but later were found to be quite accurate.

Role in the West. Pope Paul VI gave Slipyj the title Major Archbishop of the Ukrainian Church, with right and privileges similar to those of a patriarch. The title, newly created by Vatican II, was the source of misunderstanding and much friction between the Holy See and Ukrainians in the West. Many thought that patriarch was the more rightful title for the head of the large and long-suffering Ukrainian Church. The appointment of Slipyj as a cardinal in 1965 did not satisfy pressure groups within the Ukrainian community, and at times Slipyj himself seemed to speak and act as an opponent of the Vatican’s Ost Politik. Although his actions and movements were restricted, Slipyj visited most Ukrainian communities in Europe and America, and held two Synods of Ukrainian bishops in Rome (1971, 1980). He was also outspoken on behalf of his persecuted people. Some of his strong statements caused an exchange of letters between Patriarch Pimen of Moscow and Pope John Paul II (1980–81).

Josyf Archbishop Slipyj, Ukrainian Primate, conducting the Divine Liturgy at the Cathedral of the Holy Name, Bombay, India, 1964. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The cultural activity of the Ukrainian cardinal was also remarkable. He played a principal part in the establishment of the faculty of St. Clement of Rome, a Ukrainian Catholic University (1963), and the construction of St. Sophia, the Ukrainian Catholic Cathedral (1969), modeled in part on that of Kiev. Both are located in the Eternal City. He wrote highly speculative treatises on the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, and he appeared as quite an expert on problems of Unionism, Ukrainian church history and liturgy. Shortly before his death at the age of 92, a new edition of his Omnia Opera appeared.

Bibliography: J. SLIPYJ, Omnia Opera Card. Josephi (Slipyj Kobernyckyj-Dyckovskyj) Archiepiscopi Majoris, 13 v. (Rome 1968–83) [Volume 14, with contributions by a number of authors, was added after his death (Rome 1984)]. M. MARUSYN, Mitropolit Josif Slipyj [in Ukrainian] (Rome-Brussels 1972); Cristiani d'Ucraina. Un popolo dilaniato ma non domato (Rome 1983). G. CHOMA, "La vita e le opere del Cardinale Slipyj," Euntes Docete 38 (1985) 217–236. G. CAPRILE, "Il Card. Josif Slipyj Pastore e Studioso," La Civiltà Cattolica (1985) 400–404. J. PELIKAN, Confessor between East and West: A Portrait of Ukrainian Cardinal Josyf Slipyj (Grand Rapids, MI 1990).

[G. EL DAROV]

SLOMŠEK, ANTON MARTIN, BL.

Slovenian archbishop, educator, writer, poet; b. Nov. 26, 1800, Slom, Ponikva, Lower Styria, Slovenia; d. Sept. 24, 1862, Maribor, Slovenia.

Born into a prosperous peasant family, he received his secondary education in Celje (Zilli in Old Austria, now Slovenia), Ljubljana, and Senj. Slomšek finished his theological studies in the Carinthian capital of Klagenfurt and was ordained (1824). He ministered in two Slovene parishes in Styria and was appointed (1829) spiritual director at the theological seminary in Klagenfurt, where he also taught the Slovene language.

In 1846, he became archbishop of the Lavant Valley (Carinthia), but in 1859 was transferred to Maribor (or Marburg, as the Austrian Germans called it) in the Slovene part of Styria. Slomšek was devoted to raising the cultural and moral level of the Slovene population. Schools were in a precarious state because of the Austrian suppression of the national language and the introduction of foreign teachers. Slovenian literature was forbidden out of fear of Panslavism. Following the adoption of the Constitution of 1848, granting national rights, he helped to found many schools, in which he also taught. His most important work, however, was the founding (1851–52) of the St. Hermagoras Society (Družba svetega Mohorja), whose aim was to distribute inexpensive and good books among the people.

Working as a Christian moralist and educational author, he published in 1834 Keršansko devišstvo (Christian Charity). In the same lucid Slovene prose (the best of the period) was the educational narrative Blaže in Nežica v nedeljski šoli (1842, Little Blase and Agnes in the Sunday School), as well as essays and other books on a great variety of subjects. In 1846, he began the educational weekly Drobtinice (Crumbs), designed to serve village priests and teachers. In 1849, his collection of sermons, Apostolska Hrana (Apostolic Food), appeared. Slomšek was also, although less prominently, a poet. As a young priest of 26 he translated Schiller's Das Lied von der Glocke, and in 1833 was responsible for a collection of Slovene folk songs sung in Carinthia and Styria. His own poems are didactic, serene, and close to the style and rhythm of folk song. Although Slomšek was a zealous nationalist, his humility, childlike simplicity, and kindness won the admiration of foreigners.

Pope John Paul II beatified Slomšek on Sept. 19, 1999, at Maribor, Slovenia. The pope praised Slomšek, the first Slovenian to be beatified, for his work of evangelization and his ecumenical efforts.

Feast: Sept. 24.

Bibliography: A. SLOMŠEK, Zbrani spisi, 5 v. (Celje 1876–90), collected works; Izbrani spisi za mladino (Celje 1924), selected works for youth. J. AMBROZIC, Pastorale familiare di Mons. Anton Martin Slomsek (Rome 1981). V. HABJAN, Anton Martin Slomsek (Ljubljana 1992). F. HRASTEJ, Otrok luci: zgodovinska povest o Antonu Martinu Slomsku (Ljubljana 1999). S. JANEZIC, Slomsek in nas cas (Maribor 1992). I. JERIC, Moji spomini (Murska Sobota 2000). M. KLUN, Fürstbischof Anton Martin Slomsek in Kärnten (Klagenfurt 1969). F. KOSAR, Anton M. Slomšek, Fürstbischof von Lavant (Marburg 1863). F. KOVACIC, Sluzabnik bozji A. M. Slomšek, 2 v. (Celje 1934–35). D. MEDVED, Knezoškof Lavantinski A. M. Slomšek (Čakovec 1900). J. POGACNIK, Kulturni pomen Slomskovega dela (Maribor 1991). B. ZAVRNIK, Anton Martin Slomsek (Ljubljani 1990).

[J. LAVRIN/K. I. RABENSTEIN]

SLOVAKIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Part of the former Czechoslovakia, the Slovak Republic is located in eastern Europe. Bound on the northwest by the Czech Republic with which it was formerly united, Slovakia is bound on the northeast by Poland, on the east by Ukraine, on the southeast by Hungary, and on the west by Austria. Featuring a mountainous landscape dominated by the Carpathians to the south, Slovakia is heavily forested, with some steppe regions in the lowlands to the southeast. Natural resources include coal, timber, and small quantities of iron, copper and manganese ore. The transition from a planned economy under communism to a modern economy was a difficult one due to international debt, unemployment and inflation. Over half of Slovakia's exports of machinery, fuels and other manufactured goods are shipped within the European Union, which it hoped to join after achieving economic stability.

Together with the historic lands of the Czechs in Bohemia and Moravia, with Silesia, and with Carpathian Ruthenia, Slovakia was part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire since medieval times. Czechs and Slovaks shared ethnic roots and spoke languages very closely allied to one another. Because of the frequent cultural exchanges they had shared for centuries, they united politically in 1918 to form their own independent state, the Republic of Czechoslovakia. When the Communists seized power in 1948, the region was termed a People's Republic, and in 1960 it became the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic. After the region achieved independence in 1989, Slovakia agitated for independence from her neighbor to the north; the Czech Republic was founded in January of 1993, leaving Slovakia an independent nation as well.

Within Slovakia there are two relatively independent organizational structures of the Catholic Church with different liturgical and juridical traditions: the Roman Catholic Church and the Byzantine (Greek) Catholic Church.

Capital: Bratislava.
Size: 18,928 sq. miles.
Population: 5,407,956 in 2000.
Languages: Slovak (official), Hungarian.
Religions: 3,244,774 Roman Catholics (60%), 216,318 Greek Orthodox (4%), 432,765 Protestants (8%), 965,199 other (18%), 548,900 without religious affiliation.
Archdioceses: Bratislava-Trnava, with suffragans Nitra and Banská Bystrica; Košice, with suffragans Spiš and Rožňava. The episcopal see of the Byzantine-rite Greek Catholic Church is in Prešov, with an apostolic exarchate in Košice.

Under communism, Byzantine-rite Catholics were absorbed into the Czechoslovak Orthodox Church, but by the 1970s the Byzantine Church had resumed functioning in Slovakia. The Eastern and Roman Churches fully respect each other and work together; bishops from all seven Slovak dioceses form the Bishops' Conference of Slovakia, the office of which is in Bratislava.

Christianity in Slovakia to 1918

Slovakia was subject to the archbishop of SALZBURG until 829, and then to Passau. After the destruction of the Empire of Great Moravia (907), Slovakia was incorporated into Hungary, where it remained until 1918.

Medieval Period. Slovakia was gradually exposed to Germanic, Celtic and Roman peoples, and missionaries entered the area in the 8th century. Within the fortified towns that grew up in the region, Slavonic culture and liturgy were gradually replaced by Latin culture and liturgy, although in the more remote valleys of eastern Slovakia the Byzantine-Slavonic rite continued to be observed. The immigration of Valachians (Rumanians) and Ruthenians, belonging to the same rite, increased the number of its adherents in the following centuries. For the most part these two groups were assimilated by the Slovaks, but a small Ruthenian (now Ukrainian) national group retained its separate identity well into the 20th century.

In 880 the Diocese of Nitra was built; it would continue to be active save for the century between the Hungarian invasion and its restoration (1024) by the sainted King STEPHEN I, who had established a Latin hierarchy in his realm by this time. In addition to Nitra, Slovakia included the See of Eger (founded c. 1009) and the Archdiocese of Esztergom (c. 1000, now located in Hungary). This ecclesiastical organization lasted for several centuries. Important contributions to Slovakia's civilization were made by the BENEDICTINES, whose monasteries included ZOBOR (founded c. 1000), Sv. Beňadik (1075) and Opátska (1143); as well as by the CISTERCIANS, who founded the monasteries of Lipovník (1141) and Štiavnik (1223); and by the PREMONSTRATIENSIS, whose houses included Bzovík (1130) and JASOV (1220).

In 1241 Tartars from Russia moved southwest into Slovakia, invading and devastating the country (see MONGOLS). To expedite reconstruction, King Bela IV encouraged colonists from Germany by granting these immigrants a number of privileges. The Germans founded several cities and promoted trade and commerce, but they lived and worked in close association with one another, thus preserving their own national enclaves through many generations. In 1930 Slovakia's German population numbered 147,500, but after 1945 almost all of them were forced to leave.

Reformation and Catholic Restoration. In the 16th century the Germans were the first in Slovakia to embrace Protestantism. The new doctrine also spread rapidly among the nobility, who then imposed it upon their feudal subjects. Because ecclesiastical discipline was decadent and ecclesiastical organization inadequate, Protestant doctrine was widely accepted by the clergy as well. After the Turks conquered the primatial See of Esztergom in 1543, the archbishop and the metropolitan chapter relocated in Trnava, where they remained for the next three centuries. It was at Trnava that Archbishop Miklós Olahus (OLÁH, 1553–68) began the work of Catholic restoration by convoking provincial synods and by introducing the Jesuits to Trnava in 1561. After his successor's death, however, the see remained vacant for 34 years. By 1600 almost all of Slovakia was, to all appearances, Protestant. Cardinal Peter PÁZMÁNY (1616–37) took as his charge the restoration of Catholicism in Slovakia. In addition to winning many nobles back to the faith, Pázmány founded the University in Trnava (1635) and entrusted it to the Jesuits.

The work of Catholic restoration proved extremely difficult, in part because Slovakia was a battleground throughout the 17th century. Turks occupied the southern section until the Christian victory at Vienna (1683). In other sections the Catholic armies of the Hapsburgs fought the Protestant troops of the princes of Transylvania. But by the 18th century the political situation had become more peaceful, and when Emperor Joseph II decreed the act of tolerance in 1781, the religious situation was stabilized. Since that time, Protestants—predominately Lutherans, but also some Calvinists—formed only a small percent of the population. The Union of Užhorod, which was tentatively settled in 1646, was concluded by the mid-18th century and helped strengthen the Church by obtaining the accession of the Orthodox members of the Byzantine rite. To improve the ecclesiastical structure, the Dioceses of Banská Bystrica, Rožnava and Spiš were erected in 1776, the Diocese of Košice in 1804, and the Byzantine-rite Diocese of Prešov in 1818.

Bratislava Castle and city of Bratislava, Slovakia. (©Adam Woolfit/CORBIS)

National Awakening. For many years Slovakia had existed as a province of the Austro-Hungarian empire. However, as a result of philosophical changes brought on by the European Enlightenment and the rise of the Napoleonic vision, the beginnings of a national consciousness arose c. 1800. This striving for a national identity received the support of many Slovak priests, notably linguist Anthony Bernolák (1762–1813), poet John Hollý (1785–1849) and Bishop Stephan Moyses (1797–1869). Some Lutheran clergymen and laymen of both confessions were also prominent. In 1870 Andrew Radlinský founded the Society of St. Adalbert (Spolok Sv. Vojtechy) to spread popular Slovak Catholic literature.

To destroy the first glimmerings of a Slovak national consciousness, the Hungarian government began a program involving political and ethnic persecution in 1867. This harassment, along with social and economic unrest, caused hundreds of thousands of Slovaks to immigrate, principally to North America. So large was the movement that the percentage of emigrants in relation to total population was higher in Slovakia than anywhere else in Europe except in Ireland and Norway. In order to turn the Slovaks into Hungarian Magyars, the government ordered that all secondary schools use the Hungarian language by 1875, and by 1907 all primary school teachers in Slovakia were required to present their lessons in Hungarian as well. These laws had the effect of preventing the development of a Slovak intellectual class, as few could read the works of native writers. By 1900 the majority of Slovak intellectuals could be found only among Catholic priests and, to a lesser extent, Lutheran ministers. The most outstanding among these priests was Monsignor Andrew Hlinka (1864–1938), who founded the Slovak Catholic People's Party in 1905. For this activity

St. Michael's Church, Košice, Slovakia. (©Carmen Redondo/ CORBIS)

Hlinka spent several years in prison, where he translated the Bible into Slovak. By the time Slovakia was separated from the collapsed Austro-Hungarian Empire in 1918, the denationalization process was almost complete.

Upheaval Follows World War I. In 1919 Slovakia joined with the Czech region to the north and formed the republic of Czechoslovakia. During the critical years following World War I, all incumbent Slovak bishops were forced to give up their sees, except Augustine Fischer-Colbrie (d. 1922) of Košice, who retained his diocese despite his German extraction. The first three Slovak bishops were consecrated in Nitra on Feb. 13, 1921. Fortunately, unlike the situation in other parts of the former Austro-Hungarian Empire, anticlerical intellectual circles were uncommon, and the clergy retained its influence over the people. The Slovak Catholic People's party became the largest political party due to its platform of Slovak autonomy and preservation of the Slovak religious heritage. It continued to gain support, despite the anti-Catholic spirit of the central government.

The papal document Ad ecclesiastici regiminis issued on Sept. 2, 1937 adjusted the southern boundaries of Slovakia but did not make a final settlement concerning the Apostolic Administration of Trnava, which had been created in May of 1922 from those parishes formerly belonging to the Hungarian Archdiocese of Esztergom but situated in Slovakia. The modus vivendi provided that Slovak dioceses should be united in one ecclesiastical province and that a second metropolitan see should be erected for Byzantine-rite Catholics in eastern Czechoslovakia. However, a new political upheaval in Europe would prevent such plans from being carried out.

The expansion of Germany's National Socialist agenda during the late 1930s directly affected Czechoslovakia due to both its proximity and cultural ties to Germany. Under the terms of the Munich Pact signed between the Czechoslovakian government and Germany in the fall of 1938 Slovakia lost its southern districts to Hungary and the former Soviet Union. Changed to a federated state of the Third Reich on Oct. 6, 1938, the republic of Czechoslovakia was forcibly dissolved six months later, and Slovakia was proclaimed an independent republic on March 14, 1939.

Slovakia's altered southern and eastern boundaries disturbed the ecclesiastical organization once more, because Hungary now encompassed the Dioceses of Košice and Rožnava, while Užhorod, residence of the Byzantine rite bishop of Mukačevo and the Latin apostolic administrator for the parishes of Satu-Mare, was part of the former Soviet Union. Parishes of the three Latin-rite dioceses remaining in Slovakia were now placed under an apostolic administrator stationed in Prešov. The Byzantine rite parishes that had belonged to the Diocese of Mukačevo were now administered by the Byzantine rite bishop of Prešov. Political power was exercised mostly by the Slovak Catholic People's party headed by Monsignor Jozef Tiso (1887–1947), who was prime minister and president of the Nazi-collaborationist state from 1939–45. Tiso's administration was disturbed by Nazi interference, both with regards to the Jewish question and in other matters. After fleeing the country in 1945, he was captured by the Allies in Germany and delivered to the Communist-controlled Czechoslovak government, which condemned him to death and executed him in Bratislava on April 18, 1947. After his death, the Slovak people continued to hold Tiso in high esteem, and as late as 1999 the city of Zilina was condemned by Catholic, Jewish and Lutheran leaders for its desire to publicly commemorate Tiso with a plaque.

Church under Communism. In 1948 a communist government under Klement Gottwald took power in the reunited Czechoslovakia. During the four decades of authoritarian rule that followed, the Church suffered great persecution. Repressive government policies gave rise to a vigorous underground Church served by bishops and priests who were ordained clandestinely. One of them, Ján Chryzostom Korec, a Jesuit, had been secretly ordained a bishop in 1951 at the age of 27. He served the underground church until 1960, when upon discovery he was sentenced to a 12-year prison term. Released in 1968 during a brief respite from oppression known as the “Prague Spring,” Korec worked in Bratislava as a laborer while founding a new clandestine ministry. In 1976, in an effort to placate the anticlericism of Czechoslovakian president Husák, a Vatican envoy ordered Korec to cease his underground activities and stop ordaining priests, but there was no letup in government repression. Other clandestine bishops continued to ordain priests, many of whom were married men because their wedded state would make them beyond suspicion of government agents. Nikolaus Krett ordained several women during this period.

The underground Church was made even more necessary after 14 June 1950, when all diocesan seminaries in Czechoslovakia were closed by the government. In their stead the government opened one seminary for the Czech lands, located in Prague, and another in Bratislava for Slovakia. Both of these state-controlled institutions were termed theological faculties, and their students were in constant suspicion of teachers who promoted a communist-controlled curriculum. During the Communist regime, Rome was allowed to appoint only three “compromise-minded” bishops to Vatican II, which met for the first of four sessions in 1962.

Despite the efforts of the government to exacerbate tensions between the two groups, Czechs and Slovaks united in efforts to frustrate Communist repression of political and religious liberties. Resistance to the Communist regime stiffened in the wake of the police assault on peaceful Catholic demonstrators on March 25, 1988. Known as “the Good Friday of Bratislava,” the Husák regime viciously attacked the thousands of Slovaks who had come to pray and in Hviezdoslavovo Square. The incident prompted international protests and solidified the will of the people to resist. In November of 1989, during a period dubbed the “Velvet Revolution,” many Slovaks joined in the creation of Verejnosť Proti Násilíu (“Public against Violence”), an umbrella organization linking parts of the resistance community. On Oct. 22, 1991, the bishops of the Czech Slovak Federal Republic gathered in St. Vitus Cathedral in Prague for a Mass celebrating the 13th anniversary of the installation of Pope John Paul II. Archbishop Miloslav Vlk of Prague greeted an assembly that included many revolutionary leaders as well as the principal celebrant, underground bishop Korec, now Archbishop of Bratislava and newly created cardinal. By the end of 1991 Husák had lost power and communist rule in Czechoslovakia had come to an end.

Although Czechs and Slovaks had united in their opposition to the Communist regime, the elections of 1992 foreshadowed the changes that would take place in the region. While a new government was established under Czech leader Václav Havel and separate legislative councils were established for both the Czechs and the Slovaks, Slovakia reasserted its independence on Jan. 1, 1993. The Church would develop a good relationship with the new Slovak government, and in June of 1995 Pope John Paul II visited the country. Two years later, Slovak President Michal Kovac made his third visit to the Holy See in four years.

Liberated Church Enters 21st Century. After the division of the two countries, the Church in Slovakia maintained open contacts with the Church in the Czech Republic. According to their statutes and encouraged by the Holy See, the episcopal conferences in both countries met annually in plenary session to discuss common problems and keep each other abreast of developments in their respective lands. One problem common to both countries was how to deal with the bishops and priests—particularly those who were married—who had been ordained in the underground church during the communist era. Fortunately, the Byzantine-rite Church had a tradition of accepting married clergy; coming forward in response to a call from the Pope in 1997, many priests who had been ordained clandestinely were re-ordained by the Greek Catholic bishop in eastern Slovakia and permitted to minister to congregations in both the Latin and Greek rites. The ordination of women remained invalid.

The regeneration of the Church in Slovakia began in 1989, when the Church was finally able to implement the liturgical reforms of the Second Vatican Council. During the 1990s, this regeneration became full-blown: religious communities opened schools, publishing companies reopened, Christian associations once again operated in the open, and the religious once again set themselves to the task of evangelization. Chaplains were once again able to resume their ministry in Slovakia’s army, prisons and hospitals. As bishop of Nitra, Cardinal Korec estimated that he opened over 70 new churches and ordained 100 priests in the decade following Slovak independence. In 1996 bishops began a program to reacquaint adult Catholics with the catechism as a way to combat the dearth of religious participation that had occurred under communism. In addition, many Church buildings confiscated by the communist government earlier in the century were returned to the Church, while new seminaries and theological faculties, such as a private Catholic university established in Ruzomberok in 2000, sprang up to replace those institutions that had been destroyed. Unfortunately, many buildings were returned in poor condition and parishes and religious houses often found themselves without sufficient funds for repairs. While the return of Church property remained an issue into 2000—in part because of Slovakia's current economic downturn—a resolution was anticipated that would allow the Church to be made "whole."

By 2000 there were 1,440 parishes ministered to by 1,750 secular and 503 religious priests. In addition, 202 brothers and 3,101 sisters worked within their communities as teachers, caregivers and in other areas of social outreach. Among the most pressing social ills that Catholic leadership hoped to address were the evangelization of youth, the welfare of the Catholic family, stopping the outbreaks of racial violence focused against the region's Roma minority and combating the spiritual inertia of an increasingly secularized and materialistic society. In November of 2000 the Holy See signed a "fundamental accord" with the Slovak government that would, in the words of Pope John Paul II, "safeguard the cultural patrimony" of the country's Catholics. Although some commentators saw the accord as providing preferential treatment of Catholic interests within Slovakia, bishops answered such complaints by noting that the agreement will in fact help all churches within the country.

Because of its long history in Slovakia, the Roman Catholic Church proved invaluable in helping not only Catholics but all Slovaks to recapture the cultural traditions their nation adopted from the West. The presence of the Byzantine Catholic Church, with its spirituality and liturgy, also reminded Slovaks of their centuries-old connection with the East. The continued unity of the two Slovak Catholic Churches, despite the religious and cultural differences that exist, illustrated the potential for unity within a secularized and diversified post-communist culture. As John Paul II commented of the importance of the Slovak Church in eastern Europe, it continued to serve as an example to all Catholics of how to "breathe by both lungs."

See Also: CZECH REPUBLIC, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN.

Bibliography: F. DVORNIK, The Slavs, Their Early History and Civilization (Boston 1956); The Slavs in European History and Civilization (New Brunswick, NJ 1962). R. RÍČAN, Das Reich Gottes in den böhmischen Länder (Stuttgart 1957). E. VARSÍK, Husiti a reformaceja na Slovensku do Zilinské dohody (Bratislava 1932). G. L. ODDO, Slovakia and Its People (New York 1960). P. YURCHAK, The Slovaks (Whiting, IN 1946). J. M. KIRSCHBAUM, Slovakia: Nation at the Crossroads of Central Europe (New York 1960). J. KVALA, Dejiny reformácie na Slovensku, 1517–1711 (Lipt 1935). J. ŠPIRKO, Cirkevné dejiny: Sosobitným zretal'om na vývin cirkevných dejín Slovenska (Turč 1943). Slovenska republika, ed. M. ŠPRINGC, (Scranton, PA 1949). A. MIKUŠ, Slovakia: A Political History 1918–1950 (Milwaukee 1963). T. J. ZÚBEK, The Church of Silence in Slovakia (Whiting, IN 1956). M. LACKO, "The Forced Liquidation of the Union of Uzahorod," Slovak Studies, 1 (Rome 1961) 145–185. J. BROUN, Conscience and Captivity: Religion in Eastern Europe (Washington DC 1988). R. ROBERSON, The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey (3d ed.; Rome 1990). G. WEIGEL, The Final Revolution. The Resistance Church and the Collapse of Communism (New York 1992).

[M. LACKO/M. FIALA/EDS.]

SLOVENIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Part of the former Yugoslavia, the southeastern European Republic of Slovenia is bordered on the north by Austria, on the northeast by Hungary, on the east and south by Croatia, and on the west by Italy. It is landlocked except for a short strip of coastline in the southwest that provided access to the Gulf of Venice; among the rivers crossing Slovenia is the Sava, running from the Julian Alps to the north southwest to Croatia. Within its wooded alpine regions and fertile valleys, Slovenia enjoys a mild climate that becomes Mediterranean along the coast. Natural resources include lignite coal, lead, zinc, mercury, uranium and silver; its primary exports are manufactured goods and machinery and transportation equipment. Agricultural products include sugar beets, potatoes and cereals.

Except for an initial period under Slovene rulers, historical and political circumstances caused Slovenes in almost all the eastern section of Austria to fall under German domination from the beginning of Austro-Hungarian overlordship (907–955) through the time of the Napoleonic Illyrian Republic (1809–13). Slovenia was incorporated into the duchy of Carantania by Frankish Emperor Otto I in 952; later rulers split the duchy into Carinthia, Carniola and Styria. In 1278 Slovenia fell to the Austrian Habsburgs, who controlled it until 1918, when Slovenia joined the Serbs and Croats in forming what would become Yugoslavia in 1928. Political independence was reestablished in 1991.

The Early Church. A Slavic people, the Slovenes entered the region from the east during the fifth and sixth centuries and settled in the Julian Alps, in the ancient Roman provinces of Pannonia and Noricum. The Franks overran the region in the late eighth century and along with them came Christianity, via both the Patriarchate of Aquileia and the See of Salzburg (the Drava River would divide these ecclesiastical jurisdictions until the 1700s). In response to the request of Chotimir (753–769), the Slovenes' second Christian prince, for a bishop to evangelize his people, St. Virgilius of Salzburg sent Chorbishop Modestus, who resided near what is now Klagenfurt, in the Austrian province of Carinthia, near the church of Sancta Maria from 760 to 763. The Prince's residence was in the same neighborhood, at Karnburg.

Under Charlemagne (742–814), German nobles began ensuring that the Slovenes and German missionaries baptized them in the Latin rite. During the ninth century CYRIL and Methodius worked among the Pannonian Slavs at the request of Prince Kocel, who intended to withdraw his lands from German influence by joining them to the Slav archdiocese of St. Methodius (created in 869) and by introducing the Slavonic liturgy. However, Koce's efforts resulted in a Slavic renaissance that was short-lived, as the Latin-rite continued to predominate.

The See of Ljubljana, created in 1461, became the first diocese in Slovenian territory. In 1788 the diocese of Lavant was expanded to include Slovenian territory, and was transferred to the city of Maribor in 1857. The Archdiocese of Gorizia (Gorica in Slovene) was erected in 1751; that see is now in Italy.

When the Ottoman Turks plundered the region during the 16th and 17th centuries, many Slovenes were forced to abandon their homes and band together, often in churches around which they had raised bulwarks for protection. The Turkish conquest of the Balkans hurt the Slovenian economy, with the result that German nobles' demands for feudal obligations incited numerous peasant revolts from 1470 to the late 16th century.

From Reformation to Enlightenment. While encouraging the spread of Protestantism within the region, the most significant impact of the Reformation was in sparking Slovenia's cultural awakening. In Tübingen, Germany, Protestant writer Primož Trubar published the first Slovenian-language catechism and abecedarium in 1550; these would be followed six years later by a translation of the New Testament, as well as by 20 other books in both Latin and Cyrillic scripts. While Ljubljana had a printing press by 1575, the authorities closed it when Jurij Dalmatin tried to publish a Slovenian translation of the Bible. Dalmatin moved to Germany, and published his Bible in 1584, complete with a glossary enabling Croats to read it.

Promotion of the Slovenian language was important to both Catholics and Protestants, the former as a means of retaining Slovenian cultural autonomy in a Protestantized society, and the latter as a way to break the hold of centuries-old power bases. Many German nobles living in the Slovenian provinces of Carinthia, Carniola and Styria supported the reformation solely as a means of Capital: Ljubljana.

Size: 7,897 sq. miles.
Population: 1,927,593 in 2000.
Languages: Slovenian; Serbo-Croatian is also spoken.
Religions: 1,388,590 Roman Catholics (71%), 28,910 Sunni Muslims (1.5%), 48,189 Serbian Orthodox (2.5%), 18,567 Protestants (1%), 443,337 practice other faiths or are without religious affiliation.
Archdiocese: Ljubljana, with suffragans Koper and Maribor.

breaking the hold of the Catholic Church and gaining political autonomy. However, the Catholic Counter-reformation eventually gained influence and by 1628 the Austrian emperor was giving Slovenian Protestants the choice between Catholicism and exile. Slovenian-language elementary schools were dismantled in cities and gradually died out in rural areas. Jesuit counter-reformers burned Slovenian Protestant literature and took other measures that, while stalling the spread of Slovenian nationalism, failed to stifle it completely. Meanwhile, Capuchin friar Janez Svetokriški published volumes of Slovenian sermons, and other Religious followed suit, determined to defend the Slovenian language against a Germanicization of the liturgy that reflected an increasingly liberalized post-reformation culture. In 1769 Augustinian monk Marko Pohlin would publish a Slovene grammar that would further revive the language.

During the 17th and 18th centuries, Slovenia developed a strong economy and living conditions improved due to increased trade within Europe, although the power of the Church slowly eroded as Austrian emperors used their authority to take possession of monastic lands. By the beginning of the 19th century, Slovenia possessed a generation steeped in the views of the Enlightenment and an intellectual class trained in Catholic schools and writing in Slovenian about the ideal Slovenian culture. In 1809, following victories in Austria, Napoleon Bonaparte incorporated the three Slovenian provinces as part of the Slavic Illyrian Provinces, its capital at Ljubljana. Promoting the ancient state of Illyria as a unifying force among Slovenes, Croats and Serbs planted the first seeds of a possible Slavic unification. The French, issuing proclamations in Slovenian as well as in German and French, instituted reforms that included new roads, the establishment of Slovenian-language schools and the appointment of Slovenes to government positions.

While Austria rescinded these French reforms after regaining power in Slovenia in 1813, intellectuals continued to debate the ramifications of Slovenian nationalism. To counter this line of thought, philologist and pioneer linguist Jernej Kopitar created a Slovenian literary language through which he hoped to strengthen support for the status quo: the Austrian-Habsburg monarchy and the Catholic Church. Despite a 1848 revolution ending serfdom, the nationalist momentum gained little headway, and the Church used its renewed control of the region's schools to promote the Serbian language within a Catholic context. Their efforts ended in 1866, after control over non-religious elementary and secondary education reverted to the state. From 1879 to 1893 the Austrian government allowed Slovenian to be used in schools and in some local governments. Slovenes controlled the local assembly of Carniola after 1883, and Ljubljana had a Slovenian mayor after 1888.

To promote Catholic culture among the populace, the Society of St. Hermagoras was founded in the 19th century in Celovec; its headquarters were moved to Celje in 1918. Battling a growing liberal nationalist ideology, the Church attempted to return education, the media and many social structures to a Catholic base, and restore Slovenia's Catholic culture. However, events early in the next century would undermine their efforts.

The Rise of Yugoslavia. In October of 1908 Austria annexed the southern Slav provinces of Bosnia and Herzegovina, a move many Slovenians viewed as a step toward formation of a South Slav union. Ten years later, at the close of World War I, Slovenia joined the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats and Slovenes, renamed the Kingdom of Yugoslavia in 1929. The region's wealthy Catholics aided fellow Catholics harmed during the war in Serbia and Macedonia by sending priests and financial and humanitarian aid. By the early 1920s Slovenian society was so homogenous that an estimated 96 percent declared themselves Catholic; among the most popular periodicals of the era was the Catholic monthly Mladika (1924–32), edited by Father Franc Saleški Finzgar, which was published in Slovenian.

Within the Kingdom of Yugoslavia, Slovenia soon realized that the Serbian majority dominated, despite policy opposition from Croats, Macedonians and other minorities. Although the Yugoslav constitution guaranteed freedom and equality to all faiths, the government favored the Orthodox Serbian Church, prompting many to join that faith and resulting in a decline in the Roman Catholic population in southern Yugoslavia. In 1922 Slovenia supported the Yugoslav government's negotiations with the Holy See intended to create corresponding diocesan and state borders and establish the Roman-Slavonic liturgy in all regions where so desired. While an agreement was reached in 1935, the Parliament bent to the will of the Orthodox Church and refused ratification.

During World War II Slovenia was occupied by German forces north of the Sava River and by Italian forces south of it. In 1946 it joined the socialist Federal People's Republic of Yugoslavia, proclaimed in 1945 by Communist leader Josip Broz Tito. Although the republic's Nov. 30, 1946 constitution guaranteed religious liberty, the new Yugoslavian government demonstrated its opposition to religion by open persecution. Ljubljana Bishop Gregorij Rožman, forced to flee in May of 1945, was marked as a fascist and traitor to his people. Almost all Catholic schools, as well as other church properties, were nationalized or destroyed; religious instruction was prohibited in public schools; the Catholic media was curtailed; and faith-based associations were suppressed.

An ideological disagreement between Yugoslavia and the former Soviet Union in 1948 prompted government officials to establish a policy of toleration with regard to religious groups. After 1956 they permitted the Holy See to appoint new bishops, suspended charges against the clergy, allowed some religious periodicals to resume publication and permitted some minor seminaries to reopen. In 1961 Ljubljana became an archdiocese without suffragans. In 1962 all bishops received permission to attend Vatican Council II. These conditions strengthened religious life in some measure; they by no means destroyed it. On June 25, 1966 the government signed a protocol with the Vatican that improved Church-state relations still further, and diplomatic relations were restored between Yugoslavia and Rome on Aug. 14, 1970.

The Slovenian region that returned to the newly socialist Yugoslavia in 1945 had been enlarged by the annexation of Slovenian portions of the Istrian peninsula under the care of the Italian-based Archdiocese of Gorizia and Diocese of Trieste. Because Italian Church leaders were not permitted in Yugoslavia, the Holy See first appointed two apostolic administrators; in 1964 Rome reduced this administration to one bishop.

The Modern Era. By the mid-20th century Slovenia was the most economically viable and politically stable republic in Yugoslavia. When a new 1974 constitution outlined federal budgeting procedures forcing Slovenia to support Yugoslavia's underdeveloped republics, the region grew increasingly critical of the amount of Serbian influence in government. Slovenia also condemned Serbian oppression of ethnic Albanians in Kosovo and the Serbian majority's push for one man-one vote elections. By 1989 several noncommunist political groups had developed in Slovenia, multiple-candidate elections were held, and open discussion of all issues was encouraged. On Sept. 27, 1989, the Slovenian parliament voted itself the right to secede from Yugoslavia. Shortly thereafter, the Slovenian League of Communists renamed itself the Party of Democratic Renewal. In 1990 it became the first Yugoslav republic to hold multiparty elections, and it declared itself independent of Yugoslavia on June 25, 1991, under a six-party coalition led by newly elected reformist president Milan Kucan. Although scattered fighting followed, Yugoslavian president Slobodan Milošević agreed to follow the ruling of the European Community and withdrew his forces.

While Slovenian independence was welcomed by the Church, a rift soon developed between the liberal government that came to power after Kucan and Church leaders over the reintroduction of religious education as part of public school curriculum, the return of confiscated Church properties and the role of the Church in Slovenian society. Under liberal Prime Minister Janez Drnovsek, state restitution for confiscated Church property quickly came to a standstill, and by 1999 only a third of all property issues had been resolved. The election of conservative president Andrej Bajuk in 2000 was viewed as encouraging by the Church. Other issues remained between conservative Catholics and the liberal minority, one of which involves the treatment of affluent Catholics alleged to be Nazi sympathizers, who were either killed or evicted from Slovenia, their property confiscated by the state, between 1946 and 1948.

Under the new constitution of Dec. 23, 1991, the government recognized freedom of religion, allowing for a regeneration of the Church. By 2001 Slovenia had over 800 parishes, tended by 835 secular and 300 religious priests. In addition, 810 sisters and 45 brothers tended to Church-run education and other community and health-based needs. During a visit from Pope John Paul II in May of 1996, the pontiff celebrated Mass in Ljubljana, and expressed joy at "being in independent Slovenia at the dawn of the new age of its history."

Bibliography: Monumenta spectantia historiam Slavorum meridionalium (Zagreb 1868—), 46 v. to 1951. M. SPINKA, A History of Christianity in the Balkans (Chicago, IL 1933). R. RISTELHUEBER, Histoire des peuples balkaniques (Paris 1950). P. D. OSTROVIĆ, The Truth about Yugoslavia (New York 1952). W. MARKERT, Jugoslawien (Cologne 1954). F. DVORNIK, The Slavs: Their Early History and Civilization (Boston 1956); The Slavs in European History and Civilization (New Brunswick, NJ 1962). K. S. LATOURETTE, Christianity in a Revolutionary Age: A History of Christianity in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries, 5 v. (New York 1958–62) v.1, 2, 4. F. MACLEAN, The Heretic: The Life and Times of Josip Broz-Tito (New York 1957). M. KOS, Zgodovina Slovencev (Ljubljana 1955). A. L. KUHAJ, The Conversion of the Slovenes (New York 1959). S. P. RAMET, Nihil Obstat: Religion, Politics, and Social Change in East-Central Europe and Russia (Durham, NC 1998). J. MATL, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², eds., J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1191–94. B. SPULER and H. KOCH, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 3, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:1054–60. Bilan du Monde, 2:914–928. Annuario Pontificio has annual data on all dioceses.

[P. SHELTON]

SMALDONE, FILIPPO MARIANO, BL.

Priest and cofounder of the Congregation of the Salesian Sisters of the Sacred Hearts (Congregazione delle Suore Salesiane dei Sacri Cuori); b. Naples, Sicily, Italy, July 27, 1848; d. Lecce, Apulia, Italy, June 4, 1923. The eldest of the seven children of Antonio Smaldone and Maria Concetta de Luca, Filippo had decided by age 12 to become a priest, despite the persecution the Church was experiencing. He entered the minor seminary in Rosano Calabria (1862). His specific apostolate was determined while he was still a student following an encounter with the mother of a deaf child in Saint Catherine's Church in Naples. From that time he evangelized and taught the deaf.

Overcoming some difficulties that required his transfer to the archdiocese of Naples, Smaldone was ordained in 1871. While ministering to plague victims, Smaldone contracted the disease, but was miraculously healed through the intercession of Our Lady of Pompeii. Frustrated by his inability to help the deaf sufficiently, Smaldone considered undertaking a foreign mission; however, his spiritual director convinced him to recommit himself to his apostolate in Naples. On March 25, 1885, Smaldone cofounded an institute in Lecce with Father Lorenzo Apicelia and some specially trained Grey Sisters, who became Salesian Sisters of the Sacred Heart dedicated to the education of the deaf. Other institutes followed for the deaf in Bari (1897) and throughout Italy, as well as centers for the blind, abandoned, and orphaned.

Smaldone's love for the Blessed Sacrament was demonstrated by his founding the Eucharistic League of Priest Adorers and Women Adorers. In addition to his charitable activities and spiritual direction of many priests, seminarians, and religious communities, Smaldone served as superior for the Congregation of the Missionaries of Saint Francis de Sales and canon of the Lecce cathedral.

He died at age 75 of cardiac complications from diabetes, and was declared venerable July 11, 1995. Pope John Paul II beatified Smaldone on Aug 16, 1996.

Feast: June 4.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1996): 551–53. L'Osservatore Romano, no. 20 (1996): 1; 21 (1996): 4–5. L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 29 (1995): 5.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

SMARAGDUS OF SAINT-MIHIEL

Benedictine abbot of that monastery, where he died after 825. He was probably of Irish origin. While teaching Latin grammar at the abbey of Castellion, he compiled his commentary on the manual of DONATUS, the Liber in partibus Donati, a work that had considerable influence. After becoming abbot, he moved from Castellion to the monastery of SAINT-MIHIEL, which he established near the Meuse. With abbatial solicitude he exhorted his monks to the practice of virtue in the Diadema monachorum (after 805) drawn largely from patristic writings. In preparation for the Council of AACHEN of 809, Smaragdus wrote a justification from Scripture of the Frankish position in the FILIOQUE controversy. Among other duties he performed at the council, he formulated its conclusions in a letter from CHARLEMAGNE to Pope LEO III. As a member of the three-man delegation sent to Rome to have the Pope impose Frankish custom on the Church, he reported the proceedings of the fruitless interview with the Pope. To Emperor LOUIS the Pious he addressed the Via regia, a work on the spiritual formation of a prince, with particular emphasis on the virtues of piety and justice. Monastic reform was the concern of his Expositio in regulam s Benedicti, written after the Council of Aachen of 817. A simple commentary on the rule, it presents an accurate picture of monastic life in the time of Louis the Pious and of the influence exerted by the reform of BENEDICT OF ANIANE. His last work, the Collectiones in epistolas et evangelia or Liber comitis, is a series of patristic texts to serve as a commentary on the Epistles and Gospels of Sundays and feasts of the year and some other Masses. His acknowledgments reveal the broad expanse of his erudition and reading and his knowledge of patristic authors.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina 102:1–970. Monumenta Germania Poetae 1:605–619; 2:918–924. M. L. W. LAISTNER in Speculum 3 (1928) 392–397. J. SCHARF, “Studien zu S. und Jonas,” DeutschArch 17 (1961) 333–384. D. MISONNE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 9:836–837.

[J. M. O'DONNELL]

SMART, RODERICK NINIAN

Philosopher, historian of Comparative Religion; b. Cambridge, England, May 6, 1927; d. Lancaster, England, Jan. 29, 2001.

Ninian Smart was born to an academic family. His father, William M. Smart was an astronomer, his mother was poet Isabel Carswell, and his elder brothers were J. C. Smart (Philosophy) and Alastair Smart (Art History). In 1954 he married Libushka Baruffaldi, with whom he had four children.

Scottish Episcopalian, Smart studied at Glasgow Academy. While serving in World War II as a Captain in the Royal Army Intelligence Corps (1945–48), he studied Cantonese and was introduced to Theravada Buddhism in Sri Lanka. After the war he studied at Queen's College, Oxford (Classics and Philosophy, 1948–54), then lectured in Philosophy at University College of Wales, Aberystwyth (1952–55), Yale (including studies of Pali and Sanskrit, 1955–56), and also at King's College, London (1956–61). He served as H. G. Wood Professor of Theology at Birmingham University (1961–67), founding Professor of Religious Studies, University of Lancaster (1967–82), and Professor of Religious Studies, University of California, Santa Barbara (1976–1998).

Professor Emeritus at the Universities of Lancaster (1989) and California (1998), his academic career included honorary professorships and degrees, numerous visiting professorships and lectures across the globe (including the Gifford Lectures), executive positions with various academic societies, consulting work (including editor of The Long Search Series), and appointments as director of Schools Council Project on Secondary and Primary Religious Education (1969–1979), centered at the University of Lancaster, and vice-chancellor of that institution (1969–72).

A pioneer in the comparative study of religion, Smart was a prolific writer and lecturer. His early work focused on issues in the philosophy of religion, including substantial comparative explorations of Indian philosophy. This included a linguistic analysis of religious doctrines and concepts that distinguishes between patterns of religious discourse and practice according to particular experiential types: the numinous, the mystical, and the incarnational. This “logical strand” model of religion draws on examples from Hinduism, Buddhism, and Christianity to illustrate how religious propositions and practices are contextualized in terms of these particular doctrinal systems.

He later went on to frame cross-cultural expositions of these and other religions in terms of various dynamic and interacting “dimensions” that are distinguished under the general categories of belief and practical manifestation. The former division of this dimensional model of religion includes: the doctrinal and philosophical; the mythic and narrative; and the ethical or legal. The latter involves: the ritual or practical; the experiential or emotional; the social, institutional or organizational; and the material or artistic.

Smart also extended his studies of religion to include “worldview analysis,” arguing that secular ideological orientations (such as Marxism, scientific humanism, nationalism, and democratic liberalism) significantly resemble religious traditions in the way in which they are empowered through their own ritual, symbol, and myth. He advocated an “interactive pluralism” committed to tolerance and openness in inter-religious and even inter-ideological dialogue and comparative study, with the goal of enhancing and refining one's own worldview through the phenomenological study of others. In regard to methodology, he stressed an attitude of “informed empathy” and advocated a “polymethodic” approach to the study of religion. Smart argued that the scientific study of religion ought to include the various academic disciplines, and refrain from imposing values and beliefs on the subject in question.

He also distinguished the scientific study of religion from various religious theologies. While theological approaches espouse and defend truth claims of religious faith, religious studies, Smart observed, maintains a neutrality on these questions. Nevertheless, the two disciplines are often mutually engaged: theology is a major subject of religious studies and religious studies provides much helpful material for theologians. Indeed, Smart himself co-authored a substantial ecumenical work of systematic theology, one that explores essential elements of Christian faith in light of contemporary developments in religious studies.

Ninian Smart was a highly influential figure in the philosophy of comparative religion and in the method and theory of religion. He played a key role in the worldwide development of religious education and the discipline of religious studies. He founded the first religious studies department in the United Kingdom and was a major force in the international expansion of the discipline. But he is best known for his survey texts on the world's religions and secular ideologies. These, as well as his other books, demonstrate Smart's vast breadth of cultural and historical knowledge, his sharp eye for comparative detail and significance, and his keen philosophical insight into religious traditions and other worldviews.

Bibliography: Books by Ninian Smart: Reasons and Faiths (London 1958); A Dialogue of Religions (London 1960), reprinted as World Religions: A Dialogue (Harmondsworth 1966); Historical Selections in the Philosophy of Religions (London 1962); Philosophers and Religious Truth (London 1964); Doctrine and Argument in Indian Philosophy (London 1964); The Teacher and Christian Belief (London 1966); Secular Education and the Logic of Religion (London 1968); The Yogi and the Devotee (London 1968); The Religious Experience of Mankind (New York 1969, new edition 1984), new edition published as The Religious Experience (New York 1991); The Philosophy of Religion (New York 1970, new edition 1979); The Concept of Worship (London 1972); The Science of Religion and the Sociology of Knowledge (Princeton 1973); The Phenomenon of Religion (London 1973); Mao (London 1974); Background to the Long Search (London 1977), published also as The Long Search (Boston 1978); The Phenomenon of Christianity (London 1979), published also as In Search of Christianity (New York 1979); Beyond Ideology (London 1981); Worldviews, Cross-cultural Exploration of Human Beliefs (New York 1983); Prophet of a New Hindu Age (London 1985); Concept and Empathy, ed., D. WIEBE (New York, 1986); Religion and the Western Mind (London 1987); The World's Religions (Englewood Cliffs 1989); Christian Systematic Theology in a World Context (London, 1991); Buddhism and Christianity (Honolulu 1993); Religions of Asia and Religions of the West (Englewood Cliffs 1993); Dimensions of the Sacred (Berkeley 1996); Reflections in the Mirror of Religion, ed., J. P. BURRIS (New York 1997); World Philosophies (New York 1999). For a chronological listing of Smart's publications and professional activities, as well as a detailed biographical sketch to 1993, see: the Appendix and P. MAGEE, "Roderick Ninian Smart—A Biographical Sketch," eds., P. MASEFIELD & D. WIEBE, Aspects of Religion: Essays in Honour of Ninian Smart (New York 1994).

[M. STOEBER]

SMEDT, CHARLES DE

Belgian Bollandist; b. Gand, April 6, 1831; d. Brussels, March 4, 1911. Educated at Louvain, De Smedt entered the Society of Jesus in 1851 and taught at Namur and in the scholasticate at Tronchiennes (1857). Upon joining the church history faculty at Louvain in 1864, he quickly recognized the need for purging Catholic historical writing of its use of doubtful sources and of an exaggerated reliance on the supernatural element in human affairs. Sent to Paris in 1869 as an editor of the Études religieuses, he published a series of articles on the principles of historical criticism, later edited as a book, Principes de la critique historique (Paris 1883). He served as a fellow of the society of Bollandists from 1870 and was made a member in 1876 on the death of V. de Buck. Two series of lectures delivered at Louvain were published as Introductio ad historiam ecclesiasticam critice tractandam and Dissertationes selectae in primam aetatem historiae ecclesiasticae. The latter work outlined a reordination of the Acta Sanctorum, giving greater importance to primary sources by publishing the original documents. As head of the society of Bollandists (1882–1911) he inaugurated the periodical Analecta Bollandiana as an instrument for the publication of hagiographical documents and critical apparatus. He likewise reorganized the use of subsidiary historical disciplines including the employment of inventories, almanacs, catalogues, and bibliographies. He discovered an unknown manuscript of the Gesta episcoporum cameracensium (1092–1138) and published an outstanding ascetical treatise, Notre vie surnaturelle (2 v. 3d ed. Brussels 1920). His reorganization of the work of the Bollandists slowed down the publication of the Acta Sanctorum but immeasurably added to their value. De Smedt became a correspondent of the Académie des Inscriptions (1894) and a member of the Académie Royale de Belgique (1900).

Bibliography: H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie 15.1:1516–18. Le R. P. Charles de Smedt, Analecta Bollandiana 30 (1911) 1–X. H. DELEHAYE, L'Oeuvre des Bollandistes à travers trois siècles 1615–1915, (2d ed. Brussels 1959), with bibliog. 166–189; Eng. (Princeton 1922). R. AIGRAIN, L'Hagiographie (Paris 1953) 346–350. A. CAUCHIE, Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 12 (1911) 347–358. M. COENS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 9:837.

[J. BEAUDRY]

SMET, EUGÉNIE DE, BL.

Foundress of the HELPERS OF THE HOLY SOULS; b. Lille, France, March 25, 1825; d. Paris, Feb. 7, 1871. Eugénie was the daughter of Henri and Pauline (Taverne de Mont-d'Hiver) de Smet, a family of the landed gentry. She was educated at the convent of the Sacred Heart in Lille, and then she devoted some years to charitable works. After seeking the counsel of the Curé d'Ars (St. Jean VIANNEY), she resolved her doubts concerning her religious vocation and decided to establish a congregation of religious women dedicated to charitable endeavors and to assistance of the souls in purgatory by prayers, sufferings, and labors. She arrived in Paris on Jan. 19, 1856, and with the aid of Hippolyte Basiau, SJ, founded her community, with a rule modeled on that of the JESUITS. In religion Smet was known as Marie de la Providence. She shared fully the squalor of the poor among whom the young community worked. She was assisted and encouraged by Pierre OLIVAIN, SJ. Smet was beatified on May 26, 1957.

Feast: Feb. 7.

Bibliography: M. RENÉ-BAZIN, She Who Lived Her Name, Mary of Providence (Westminster, MD 1948). M. C. BUEHRLE, I Am on Fire: Blessed Mary of Providence (Milwaukee 1963). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by the Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56); v. 13, suppl. and table générale (1959) 13:176–182.

[M. C. BUEHRLE]

SMETANA, BEDŘICH

Romanticist composer considered the founder of modern Czech music; b. Litoměřice, Bohemia, March 2, 1824; d. Prague, May 12, 1884. Although he wrote little church music, he was a figure of spiritual as well as historic importance in the development of romanticism and Czech nationalism. While studying at the Praemonstratensian Gymnasium at Plezeň he revealed exceptional pianistic gifts, and thereafter was active as virtuoso and chamber player. He became a friend of Robert and Clara Schumann and a disciple of LISZT, and participated enthusiastically in romanticist and liberal movements. After five years in Göteborg, Sweden, he returned to Prague in 1861 to lead the National Theater orchestra and establish a conservatory. Bearing with nobility both personal affliction (total deafness from 1874; later, mental illness) and public calumny, he emerged a national artist-hero. Best known for his comic opera The Bartered Bride, the cycle of six symphonic poems My Fatherland, and the string quartet From My Life, he composed also eight other operas, additional chamber and symphonic works, and a quantity of vocal, choral, and piano music, while active as conductor, critic, and educator. Devotion to family and fatherland and a joyous optimism animated his life and art alike.

Bibliography: V. HELPERT, Die schöpferische Entwicklung Friedrich Smetanas, Ger. tr. (from Czech) B. LIEHM (Leipzig 1956). E. RYCHNOVSKY, Smetana (Berlin 1924). Z. NEJEDLÝ, Frederick Smetana, 4 v. (Prague 1924–33); abr. Eng. tr. 1 v. (London 1924). R. NEWMARCH, The Music of Czechoslovakia (London 1942). R. NEWMARCH and G. ČERNUŠAK, Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. E. BLOM 9 v. (5th ed. London 1954) 7:843–849. P. ANDRASCHKE, "Über die Gestaltung von Smetanas Vyšehrad," International Journal of Musicology 1 (1992) 127–37. T. BARFOOT, "Dalibor" in International Dictionary of Opera 2 vols., ed. C. S. LARUE (Detroit 1993). J. CLAPHAM, The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980). C. HEADINGTON, "The Bartered Bride" in International Dictionary of Opera, ed. C. S. LARUE (Detroit 1993). R. PECMAN, "Smetanovská Miscellanea," Sborník Prací Filosofické Fakulty Brněnské University 4 (1969) 130. M. STROEHER, "Bedřich Smetana's Dalibor: A Study in Czech Cultural Nationalism," The Opera Journal 24/2 (1991) 3–23.

[F. J. BURKLEY]

SMITH, ADAM

Scottish economist and moral philosopher; b. Kirkcaldy, Scotland, June 5, 1723; d. Edinburgh, Scotland, July 7, 1790. Having been educated at Glasgow and Oxford, he became professor of moral philosophy at the University of Glasgow in 1752 and seven years later published his first book, A Theory of the Moral Sentiments. That book, at first widely read and admired, soon fell almost into oblivion; thus, unfortunately, the psychological and ethical insights expressed in it have rarely been taken into account, as they should be, in interpreting Smith's theory of economics and his advice about economic policy, as presented in his great work on the wealth of nations. Before writing the latter, he traveled on the Continent from 1764 to 1766, and while in France met some of the Physiocrats, whose important contributions to economics partially anticipated his own; but his indebtedness to them was limited. After returning in 1766 to the University of Glasgow, he labored there for ten years more and brought out, in 1776, his masterwork, An Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations. In 1778 he was appointed commissioner of customs for Scotland. Little more of note happened in the remaining 12 years of his life. His Essays on Philosophical Subjects, written relatively early in his life (before 1752), were found among his papers and published posthumously in 1795.

Bedřich Smetana.

Smith's place in the age-long history of the development of political economy must be estimated as very high, although not as high as was widely supposed in the early nineteenth century. He was by no means the founder of that science, the beginnings of which go back at least to Aristotle, and to which numerous scholastic and other writers in the medieval and early-modern centuries made important contributions. Smith was one among many great economists in his own century. Yet he stands above the others not as being more original, or brilliant, or penetrating, or invariably correct in his observations and reasonings, but by virtue of the nearly all-comprehensive breadth of his outlook and knowledge, and the surpassingly realistic, well-balanced, and moral wisdom of his treatment of the vast subject of his famous Inquiry. This work in its way sums up the main fruits of most previous research and thinking in its field, and contains the germs of many, if not most, of the advances that have since been achieved.

Adam Smith, an engraving. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

The generally prevailing impression, however, of the supposed central thesis of the Wealth of Nations has always been somewhat incorrect. This is so in part because there has been general neglect of the relevant psychological and ethical views expressed in Smith's earlier work on the moral sentiments, and in part because, as "capitalism" and attacks upon it, and diverse political ideologies, went on developing throughout the nineteenth century, it became the fashion to attribute to Smith the original sponsorship of the crude, dogmatic, unqualified, and biased laissez-faire gospel of later generations of conservative businessmen. The economic liberalism—in his phrase, "system of natural liberty" for all individuals—that Smith really sponsored had behind it both his ethical and humane concern for equal rights and opportunities for all men, and his economic analysis of the requirements of an optimal growth of their common wealth and welfare. In his early treatise, he argued that citizens of a free society could be led by their human-natural, humane, reciprocal "sympathies" and sensitivities to each others' moral judgments to develop a moral consensus and (to implement that) a just legal order, impartially defining the just rights and freedoms of all severally, and allowing none to infringe the rights of others. In his subsequent economic treatise, presupposing the existence (in a good approximation) of such a moral climate and legal order, he went on to argue that, within it, a generally competitive economic system could function in such a way that all in maximizing their private gains would also be maximizing their contributions to the aggregate wealth of the nation and the world. The wisdom of that outlook can be questioned, but its true meaning, grounds, and implications as elaborated in Smith's own writings need and deserve careful study and just appraisal undistorted by confusions of it with propaganda. Nor is his program for creating a harmony of individual (suitably modified) self-interests and the common welfare the whole or main substance of his economics. His immortal Inquiry in its time was, and even today remains, an inexhaustible mine of wisdom about the processes and conditions of on-going growth of aggregate and per capita wealth or economic welfare in and throughout all nations.

Bibliography: O. H. TAYLOR, Economics and Liberalism (Cambridge, Mass. 1955); A History of Economic Thought (New York 1960). R. B. HALDANE, Life of Adam Smith (London 1887). G. R. MORROW, The Ethical and Economic Theories of Adam Smith (New York 1923). J. RAE, Life of Adam Smith (New York 1895). F. A. NEFF, Adam Smith and His Master Work (Wichita, Ks. 1940).

[O. H. TAYLOR]

SMITH, HENRY IGNATIUS

Orator and educator; b. Newark, NJ, Aug. 25, 1886; d. Washington, DC, March 8, 1957. He was the oldest of the eight children of Michael and Loretta (Gaskins) Smith, four of whom became Dominican priests. After study in New Jersey and Ohio, he entered The Catholic University of America, Washington, DC, where he was ordained June 27, 1910, and received his Ph.D. in 1915. After teaching philosophy and sociology from 1913 to 1916 in the Dominican House of Studies, Washington, DC, he was appointed national director of the Holy Name Society and of the Third Order of St. Dominic. He served also as editor of the Holy Name Review and the Torch, which he founded in 1916, and as prior and rector of St. Catherine of Siena Church in New York, NY. In 1920 he returned to Catholic University as an instructor in philosophy, acting also as prior (1922–28) of the Dominican House of Studies. He was promoted to associate professor in 1926 and professor in 1947, and appointed to succeed Msgr. Edward A. Pace as dean of the School of Philosophy in 1936. Smith developed the School of Philosophy and made it a chief center of Thomism in the U.S. He was also responsible for the establishment of the Preachers' Institute. Renowned for his abilities as a speaker, he preached countless sermons, conducted many retreats and missions, and gave numerous talks to lay organizations. His training and interests were not those of the specialized scholar, but in addition to his doctoral dissertation, The Classification of Desires in St. Thomas Aquinas and in Modern Sociology (1915), he produced a number of articles and pamphlets on religious and philosophical subjects. They include "Aquinas and Some American Freedoms," "St. Thomas Aquinas and Human Social Life," "The Militant Christian Virtues," "Justice," "Education for Patriotism," "Benedict XV and the Historical Basis for Thomistic Study," and "The Place of Authority in St. Thomas." For the old Catholic Encyclopedia he wrote the article, "Dominican Rite," and seven biographical articles. Upon his retirement on Aug. 31, 1956, he was awarded the papal medal Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice and named to the newly established position of dean for religious communities. A bronze bust, presented by friends to the University on his retirement, stands in McMahan Hall.

Bibliography: J. K. RYAN, ed., Philosophical Studies in Honor of the Very Reverend Ignatius Smith, O.P. (Westminster, MD 1952). Archives, The Catholic University of America.

[J. K. RYAN]

SMITH, JAMES

Journalist; b. Skolland, Shetland, July 11, 1790; d. Oakley, Fife, Jan. 5, 1866. He was brought up a Presbyterian and trained as a solicitor before the Supreme Courts in Edinburgh. He was converted to Catholicism and, in the public controversy over the Catholic Emancipation Bill of 1829, lectured and wrote in support of Catholic claims. He married Catherine Mackenzie (1812), a cousin of Bp. Alexander MacDonell of Kingston, Ontario; and his own son, William, became archbishop of St. Andrews and Edinburgh (1885). In 1831, some of Smith's controversial lectures, Dialogues on the Catholic and Protestant Rules of Faith, were published and, in 1832, he founded and edited the first Catholic Scottish monthly; the Edinburgh Catholic Magazine. It appeared from April 1832 to November 1833, then fell silent until February 1837. In April 1838, "Edinburgh" was dropped from the title, and it continued as the Catholic Magazine until December 1842.

One of the reasons for the journal's eventual failure (and a typical source of weakness in Scottish periodical literature) was that the editor migrated to London. There he continued his journalistic activities, editing two successive issues of the Dublin Review (1837, 1838), and launching the Catholic Directory on the lines of John MACPHERSON's directory in Scotland. Smith's publication superseded the old Laity's Directory and still continues as the national Catholic directory for England and Henry Ignatius Smith.

Wales. Smith continued a prominent role in religious controversy and Catholic public life, acting for a time as secretary to the Catholic Institute of Great Britain. Toward the end of his life he returned to his native land.

[D. MCROBERTS]

SMITH, JOHN TALBOT

Author; b. Saratoga, N.Y., Sept. 22, 1855; d. Dobbs Ferry, N.Y., Sept. 24, 1923. He was the son of American-born parents, Bernard, a railroad worker, and Brigid (O'Donnell) Smith. After early education at the Christian Brothers' school, Albany, N.Y., he entered St. Michael's College and Seminary, Toronto, Canada, where he was ordained in 1881 for the Diocese of Ogdensburg, N.Y. After serving the diocese as curate in Watertown and pastor at Rouses Point, he was released by his bishop in 1889 and went to New York City, where he devoted himself mainly to literary work for nearly 20 years. During most of that period he was chaplain to the Christian Brothers at De La Salle Academy, and from 1901 to 1904 to the Sisters of Mercy at St. Catherine's Convent. His first publication was a novel, "A Woman of Culture," that ran serially in the Catholic World, as did some of his later writing. He was the author of a number of novels, some on the juvenile level; a biography of Brother Azarias, FSC (1897); some short stories; and a History of the Diocese of Ogdensburg (1885). He edited (1889–92) the Catholic Review, a weekly paper, and contributed, sometimes anonymously, to various other papers. His History of the Catholic Church in New York (1906), written for the centenary of the archdiocese, remains the only book on the subject. In Our Seminaries (1896), reprinted as The Training of a Priest (1908), his scathing criticism of the entire system of clerical training in America caused lasting resentment, partly because so much of what he said was true. He was a founder and president (1905–09) of the Catholic Summer School of America, and he established the first Catholic camp for boys as an adjunct to it. He founded also the Catholic Writers Guild and the Catholic Actors Guild. An excellent lecturer and preacher, he was in demand for special occasions. In September 1908, he was appointed pastor of Sacred Heart parish, Dobbs Ferry, N.Y. Before his death there, he destroyed all his personal papers.

Bibliography: Catholic World 64 (Dec. 1896) 419–420. T. MCMILLAN, ibid. 118 (Nov. 1923) 218–220.

[F. D. COHALAN]

SMITH, JOSEPH

Founder and first president of the Mormon Church; b. Sharon, Vt., Dec. 23, 1805; d. Carthage, Ill., June 27, 1844. His parents, Joseph and Lucy (Mack) Smith, were poor and migrated to upstate New York about 1816. Joseph claimed visions from 1820 on and in 1830 published The Book of Mormon as a divinely rediscovered scripture linking pre-Columbian civilizations with the ancient Hebrews. On April 6, 1830, he founded the Church of Jesus Christ of LATTERDAY SAINTS (Mormons) at Fayette, N.Y. He started Mormon communities in Kirtland, Ohio; Independence and Far West, Mo.; and Nauvoo, Ill. His movement evoked considerable opposition. The Kirtland effort ended in financial disaster, and the Saints were driven from Missouri by mob action. In Illinois, Joseph and his brother Hyrum were murdered in the Carthage jail by a mob that included uniformed militia. Heroism in death made Smith a martyr as well as a prophet to his followers. The revelations he claimed, The Book of Mormon, A Book of Commandments (1833), Doctrine and Covenants (1835), and Pearl of Great Price (1842) are, together with the Bible, accepted as scripture by the Mormon Church.

Bibliography: F. M. BRODIE, No Man Knows My History (New York 1945). W. A. LINN, The Story of the Mormons (New York 1902). T. F. O'DEA, The Mormons (Chicago 1957).

[T. F. O'DEA]

SMITH, RICHARD

Distinguished theologian of the English Reformation period; b. Worcestershire, 1500; d. Douai, July 9, 1563. Smith was elected probationer fellow of Merton College, Oxford, in 1527. In 1535 he was appointed the first Regius professor of divinity at Oxford when the chair was founded by Henry VIII. He held many ecclesiastical preferments under Henry VIII. Under Edward VI he at first adopted an equivocal attitude toward the Reformation and for a time succeeded in retaining office, but he was eventually deprived and fled abroad. Under Mary he was restored to his former position and actively supported Mary's persecution of the Protestants, bearing witness personally against Thomas CRANMER and taking part in the public disputes with Nicholas RIDLEY and Hugh Latimer. On the accession of Elizabeth I in 1558 he again lost his position and was placed under arrest, but he succeeded in escaping to the Continent. Philip II of Spain appointed him dean of St. Peter's at Douai in the Spanish Netherlands, and when the University of Douai was founded in 1562 Smith became the first chancellor and a few months later, professor of theology. He was a prolific writer and published a number of theological treatises, mostly in Latin.

Bibliography: T. COOPER, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 18:509–510. H. TOOTELL, Dodd's Church History of England, ed. M. A. TIERNEY, 5 v. (London 1839–43).

[A. F. ALLISON]

SMITH, RICHARD

Bishop of Chalcedon, second vicar apostolic of England; b. Hanworth, Lincolnshire, 1569; d. Paris, France, March 18, 1655. Smith, of non-Catholic parents, went to Oxford but left without taking a degree, probably on becoming a Catholic. In 1586 he went to the English college, Rome, to train for the priesthood, and he was ordained there in 1592. For several years he taught philosophy at the English colleges at Valladolid and Seville. He took his doctorate in theology at the University of Valladolid. From 1603 to 1609 he was on the English mission in Sussex. In 1609 he made a journey to Rome to try to obtain certain concessions from the Pope for the English secular clergy. After this he settled in Paris, where he helped to found Arras College, a small establishment of controversial writers drawn from the English clergy. In 1611 he entered the household of Richelieu, whom he instructed in theological controversy. After the death of William BISHOP in 1624, Urban VIII appointed him bishop for England with the title of bishop of Chalcedon. Like his predecessor, Smith claimed the full rights and privileges of an ordinary. In so doing, he came into conflict with the Jesuits and Benedictines on the mission and alienated a considerable portion of the laity. Though Rome decreed in 1627 that he was not ordinary, the conflicts continued until he withdrew to France in 1631, resigning his position. Rome accepted the resignation and though Smith afterward wished to withdraw it, refused to allow him to return to England. He lived thenceforward under Richelieu's patronage until the latter's death in 1642, when he retired to the convent of the English Augustinian Canonesses at Paris. Rome did not appoint a successor till 1685.

Bibliography: H. TOOTELL, Dodd's Church History of England, ed. M. A. TIERNEY, 5 v. (London 1839–43). P. HUGHES, Rome and the Counter-Reformation in England (London 1942). T. A. HUGHES, The History of the Society of Jesus in North America 3 v. in 4 (New York 1907–17). A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time 5:5:11–514. J. G. ALGER, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 18:510–511. A. F. ALLISON and D. M. ROGERS, A Catalogue of Catholic Books in English . . . 1558–1640, 2 v. (London 1956). A. F. ALLISON, "John Gerard and the Gunpowder Plot," Recusant History 5.2 (1959–60); "Richard Smith, Richelieu and the French Marriage," ibid. 7.4 (1963–64).

[A. F. ALLISON]

Joseph Smith.

SMITH, WILFRID CANTWELL

Historian and comparativist of religion, minister; b. July 21, 1916, Toronto, Ontario, Canada; d. Feb. 7, 2000, Toronto. The younger of two sons of Sarah Cory Cantwell and Victor Arnold Smith, as a youth Smith attended Upper Canada College of Toronto and spent extended periods in France, Spain, and Egypt. He obtained an Honours B.A. in Oriental Languages at University College, University of Toronto (1939), and subsequently studied Christian theology and Arabic and Islamic history at Cambridge, England (1938–40). Following missionary work in India, both as a teacher of Islamic and Indian history and as a minister of the United Church of North India (1940–46), Smith went on to obtain a Ph.D. in Oriental languages at Princeton University (1948), and was appointed W. M. Birks Professor of Comparative Religion at McGill University (1949). In Montreal he established and directed the McGill Institute of Islamic Studies (1951–1964) before moving to Harvard University as the director of the Center for the Study of World Religions (1964–73). He later founded the Department of Comparative Religion at Dalhousie University in Halifax (1973–78), returned briefly to Harvard University (1978–84), and then settled in Toronto as professor emeritus at Trinity College, Toronto School of Theology, University of Toronto (1985–2000). Throughout his academic career he held executive positions with various professional associations. His books have been translated into more than ten languages.

Trained as a specialist in Islamic studies, Smith broadened his areas of historical expertise to include other major religious traditions, and explored issues in the comparative study and method and theory of religion. In his early research in Islam and in his seminal work, The Meaning and End of Religion: A New Approach to the Religious Traditions of Mankind (1962), Smith began to develop a personalist, comparativist approach to the study of religion. Over his prolific career, his carefully researched analyses focused on the major themes of faith, belief, history, religion, transcendence, cumulative traditions, world theology, and religious pluralism.

In his exploration of the dynamics of faith, Smith responds critically to trends in the philosophical theology of his time. These tended to concentrate in the analysis of faith on the propositional truth claims of creedal belief that are given in narrowly systematized and institutionalized contexts. Supported by his detailed historical research into various religious traditions, Smith argues that faith is essentially an intimate relationship of love and commitment to God that profoundly influences a person's way of being and acting in the world. Questions concerning religious truth are only answered in reference to a particular orientation of faith. Faith is a personal experience of individuals that expresses the dynamics of the human encounter with ultimate Reality, in the unfolding of religious meaning and personal transcendence.

The historically developed expressions of this common and primary feature of religious life are the many different religious traditions of the world. Smith observes that religion, understood as a unified and fixed institutional system of beliefs and practices, is a recently developed intellectual abstraction that does not correspond to a concrete reality and tends to adversely depersonalize the subject of study. He deconstructs the idea in light of his analysis of faith and speaks rather of specific, diverse, and dynamic cumulative traditions. These various religious traditions, which Smith shows to be historical, interconnected, interdependent, and continuously constructed, provide the multifarious data for the scholar of religion. But for Smith it is faith that provides the common thread in the development of a world theology of different religious traditions.

Smith's comparative methodology hopes to transcend parochial and absolutist attitudes of earlier interreligious relations by stressing personal engagement in interfaith dialogue. He insists in his "religious pluralism" that in the global and corporately communal context of modern life means that comparativists must be unassumingly self-conscious and cognizant both of the historical construction of religious traditions and their interconnected nature. In a world theology, religious traditions must be studied on their own terms and from a perspective that recognizes the universally salvific power of God or the Ultimate and the mutual intelligibility of diverse religious views and practices.

Smith's work has drawn much attention and many responses from diverse circles in religious studies and theology, which speak to the originality and substance of his contributions. Regarded as "the 'father' of the pluralist model in Anglo-American theology" (Grüschloß, 359), he has significantly influenced contemporary understandings of certain key concepts and categories in religious studies and theology. Moreover, he has helped in the process of bridging the methods of religious studies and theology, and has stimulated and influenced the direction of comparative religion and interfaith dialogue into the 21st century.

Bibliography: W. C. SMITH, Modern Islam in India: A Social Analysis (Lahore 1943); Islam in Modern History (Princeton 1957); The Meaning and End of Religion: A New Approach to the Religious Traditions of Mankind (New York 1962); The Faith of Other Men (Toronto 1962), revised and republished as Patterns of Faith around the World (Oxford 1998); Modernisation of a Traditional Society (Bombay 1965); Questions of Religious Truth (New York 1967); Religious Diversity: Essays by Wilfred Cantwell Smith, ed. W. G. OXTOBY (New York 1976); Belief and History (Charlottesville 1977), republished as Believing—An Historical Perspective (Oxford 1998); Faith and Belief (Princeton 1979), republished as Faith and Belief: The Difference between Them (Oxford 1998); On Understanding Islam: Selected Studies (The Hague 1981); Towards a World Theology: Faith and the Comparative History of Religion (Philadelphia 1981); What is Scripture?—A Comparative Approach (London 1993); Modern Culture from a Comparative Perspective, ed. J. W. BURBIDGE (Albany, N.Y. 1997). R. T. MCCUTCHEON, "Wilfred Cantwell Smith: A Chronological Biography," ed. M. DESPLAND and G. VALLÉE, Religion in History: The Word, the Idea, the Reality (Waterloo, Ontario 1992). A. GRÜNSCHLOß, Religionswissenschaft als Welt-Theologie: Wilfred Cantwell Smiths interreligiöse Hermeneutik (Göttingen 1994). Method & Theory in the Study of Religion 4 (1992) 1–105.

[M. STOEBER]

SMITH, WILLIAM ROBERTSON

Protestant exegete, Semitic philologist, student of comparative religion; b. Keig, Aberdeenshire, Scotland, Nov. 8, 1846; d. March 31, 1894, Cambridge, England. After receiving his elementary education at home, he studied at Aberdeen University and at Free Church College, Edinburgh; he concluded his formal studies in Germany at Bonn and Göttingen. In 1870 he was appointed professor of Old Testament exegesis and Oriental languages at the Free Church college in Aberdeen. In 1875 he was made a member of the revision committee that produced the Revised Version of the Bible published in 1885. His articles on "angels" and "Bible" in the ninth edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica (1875) were regarded with suspicion and disliked by authorities in his church. A prolonged public trial by the Free Church Presbytery of Aberdeen for alleged heresies gained him great popularity; but although acquitted, he was removed from his position. His lectures were published as The Old Testament in the Jewish Church (1881) and The Prophets of Israel (1882). As editor-in-chief of the Encyclopaedia Britannica from 1881 to 1888 he was commissioned to complete the ninth edition; to this edition he contributed many articles on Biblical topics. Appointed professor of Arabic at Cambridge University (1883), he fostered the study of comparative religions with his Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia (1885), and he popularized the notion of sacrifice as communion with God in his Religion of the Semites (1889).

Bibliography: The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 18:568–570. W. NEIL, "The Critical and Theological Use of the Bible 1700–1950," The Cambridge History of the Bible, ed. S. L. GREENSLADE (Cambridge, Eng. 1963) 287–288. J. S. BLACK and G. W. CHRYSAL, The Life of William Robertson Smith (London 1912).

T. K. CHEYNE, Founders of Old Testament Criticism (New York 1893) 212–225.

[R. L. ZELL]

SMOTRYTS'KYĬ, MELETĬĬ

Author and noted advocate of Church union; b. Smotryc, Ukraine, c. 1578; d. Dermansky Monastery, Volhynia, Ukraine, 1633. He was educated at the Orthodox Academy in Ostrog and at the Jesuit college in Vilna. In the ecclesiastical conflicts provoked by the Union of BREST he was in the beginning an Orthodox partisan and wrote several polemical tracts, the best known of which is Threnody (Vilna 1610), in which he laments the state of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church after mass conversion to Catholicism. His grammar of Church Slavonic (1619) was important for Slavic philology. He was consecrated Orthodox bishop of Polotsk, and in 1623 was a representative in the Polish parliament during discussions for the reconciliation of the churches. He took refuge among the Cossacks when persecuted by Polish authorities. After a stay in Constantinople he returned to the Ukraine and, when his efforts for compromise and reconciliation of the churches failed, he joined the Eastern Catholics in 1627. In 1628 at the Orthodox Council in Kiev he was denounced and forced to leave.

Bibliography: D. DOROSHENKO, History of the Ukraine, tr. H. CHIKALENKO-KELLER, ed. G. W. SIMPSON (Edmonton, Can. 1939). M. HRUSHEVSKY, A History of Ukraine, ed. O. J. FREDERIKSEN (New Haven 1941). J. MIRTSCHUK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. M. BUCHBERGER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1930–38) 9:640.

[G. J. PRPIC]

SMUGGLING

The clandestine importation or exportation of goods in violation of the civil law. Those who engage in it do so for the purpose of evading the payment of duty or customs charges, or of circumventing absolute prohibitions on the export or import of certain commodities. That smuggling is widespread cannot be doubted, although the secrecy with which the smuggler operates makes it impossible to obtain accurate statistics.

There is no difficulty for the moralist in the case of those products that are legally forbidden as harmful or dangerous, e.g., narcotics. Smuggling such goods is clearly sinful since the legal prohibition is, in most cases at any rate, declarative of natural law. But with regard to secret importation or exportation of goods to avoid the payment of taxes, moralists are not agreed. Some insist that all civil laws impose a true obligation in conscience (provided they are just laws), at least by reason of legal justice, or, as some would say, SOCIAL JUSTICE. This opinion was at one time the general teaching of moralists, before the development of the theory of purely penal law and is still defended by many authorities. Others hold that many civil laws are purely penal—that is, they oblige in conscience only to the payment of the penalty if one is caught, and not to obedience to the law itself. All advocates of this opinion number indirect taxes, of which customs charges are a prime example, among those laws that are purely penal. These authors hold that smuggling itself does not involve moral fault. Apart from scandal, bribery, or some other immoral circumstances, one who evades the payment of these charges by smuggling is not guilty of sin. This more lenient opinion is probable enough to be used in practice.

Whatever their teaching on smuggling in general, however, moralists are agreed that one who engages in smuggling as a profession cannot be excused from moral fault. Great harm is done to civil society and to the common good by an attitude of habitual disregard for the law. Moreover, a professional smuggler places himself in danger of bringing harm upon himself and his dependents. And finally, professional smugglers are ordinarily so disposed that they are prepared to defend themselves, even by use of violence, against legitimate guardians of the law.

Nor is there any disagreement among moralists in stating that those who make use of BRIBERY or fraud to evade customs taxes are guilty of sin against legal and also commutative justice.

Bibliography: R. BROUILLARD, Catholicisme 3:146–148. M. T. CROWE, The Moral Obligation of Paying Just Taxes (Catholic University of America Studies in Sacred Theology 84; Washington 1944). J. MCCARTHY, Problems in Theology, 2 v. (Westminster, MD 1956–60) v. 2 The Commandments, 308–311, 324–329, 400–403.

[J. P. BROWNE]

SMYTH (SMITH), JOHN

Reputed founder of the English General Baptists and known as the Se-Baptist, because he baptized, or, as he said, “churched” himself; b. c. 1554; d. 1612. He was educated at Christ’s College, Cambridge, and ordained in the Church of England. Preaching strict observance of the Jewish Sabbath, he set up in Gainsborough, 1606, a separate congregation, and later left for Amsterdam, where in 1608 he solemnly baptized himself and 40 others. An able but discourteous disputant, quick to change his opinions, he soon declared this to have been an error and was excommunicated by the majority of his followers. With the rest (30 or 40) he applied to join the Mennonites but was refused. He resorted to services in the Great Cakehouse, Amsterdam, until he died of consumption in 1612; then a group of his associates returned to London to establish the first Baptist Church in England. The popular notion that he is the father of the English Baptists rests on such early writings as The Differences of the Churches of Separation (1608).

Bibliography: Works, ed. W. T. WHITLEY, 2 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1915). A. C. UNDERWOOD, A History of the English Baptists (London 1947). T. COOPER, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 vol. (London 1885–1900) 18:476–478. W. T. WHITLEY, A History of British Baptists (2d ed. London 1932).

[G. ALBION]

SNOW, PETER, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. at Ripon, Yorkshire, England; hanged, drawn, and quartered June 15, 1598 at York. He entered the seminary at Rheims in 1589 and was ordained at Soissons, France, 1591. After working in Yorkshire for about seven years, he was arrested about May 1, 1598, while traveling to York with Bl. Ralph GRIMSTON. Snow was condemned and executed for his priesthood. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

SOBORNOST

Derived from the Russian sobiratj, meaning “to gather” or “a state of being united.” It is identified with Alexy Khomyakov’s concept of the church as a theandric organism of love, effecting its unity as a free association of all peoples in Christ, patterned on the communal unity of the first Christians (Acts 2.42), and corresponding to the Greek term κοινωνία. Between what it considers a kind of mechanical unity based upon exterior authority—this it attributes to the Roman Catholic Church—and the individualistic excess of liberty—this it attributes to Protestantism—the Orthodox Church considers that it realizes a synthesis of such opposites in its characteristic of a free communion of all in charity. Its catholicity, termed sobornaja, equivalent to the Greek καθολικη, is interior; it diverges from the concept of external authority as vested in the person of the pope, whose prerogatives of primacy and infallibility are, according to the Orthodox, immanent to the church as a whole. The covenant principle of sobornost goes beyond the usual idea of conciliarity by seeing the government and sovereign magisterium of the church as residing in the college of bishops, equal in dignity and rights, who only when assembled in a universal synod legislate on matters of faith or regulate affairs of ecclesiastical government affecting the universal church. While C. Lialine associated this idea only with “dialectical solidarity” in the Oecumene, G. Dejaifve considered the concept of sobornost to be more than mere feeling and fellowship; he claimed that when rightly understood it is compatible with the hierarchical principle, even with that of a supreme papal authority.

Bibliography: G. DEJAIFVE, “Sobornost ou Papauté? La Notion de l’église dans l’orthodoxie contemporaine,” Nouvelle revue théologique 74, 355–371; Eng. version, “‘Sobornost’ or Papacy?” The Eastern Churches Quarterly, 10 (1953–54) 28–38, 75–85, 111–124, 168–176. G. FLOROVSKY, “Sobornost in the Church of God,” An Anglo-Russian Symposium (London 1934) 53–74. S. BOLSHAKOFF, “Patristic Foundations of Khomyakov’s Theology,” The Eastern Churches Quarterly 10 (1953–54) 233–237. C. LIALINE, “Nouvelles précisions sur le Conseil Oecuménique des Églises,” Irénikon 24 (1951) 37–54. N. ZERNOV, Three Russian Prophets: Khomyakov, Dostoevsky and Soloviev (New York 1944). N. ZABOLOTSKY, “Esprit communautaire et conciliarité (sobornost’),” in Procès-verbaux du Deuxième Congrès de théologie orthodoxe à Athènes (Athens 1978) 129–140. M. G. RITCHEY, “Khomiakov and his theory of Sobornost,” Diakonia 17 (1982) 53–62. A. UGOLNIK, “An Orthodox hermeneutic in the West,” Saint Vladimir’s Theological Quarterly 27 (1983) 93–118. C. D. H. DOHERTY, Sobornost: Eastern Unity of Mind and Heart for Western Man, rev. ed. (Combermere, Ont. 1992).

[L. NEMEC/EDS.]

SOBREVIELA, MANUEL

Missionary, explorer, author, and the mapper of the Amazon Basin; b. Epila, Aragon, Spain, date unknown; d. San Francisco de Lima, 1803. He arrived in Peru in 1785 and for eight years was an active and prudent superior at the Colegio de Propaganda Fide of Ocopa, building up its library with several thousand volumes. With the help of excellent collaborators, he concentrated his work on the missions in the Peruvian Amazon up to the Chanchamayo and Pachitea Rivers, achieving his greatest success in the Apurimac, Huallaga, and Ucayali River regions. He founded and organized towns, built roads, and established schools, granges, and shops, thus promoting the river and land trade between civilized regions and the jungle missions. All this formed a base for more solid and lasting evangelical work. With the same purpose in mind, Sobreviela published numerous reports and accounts of the earlier and contemporary Franciscan work in the Peruvian jungle with descriptions of territories, rivers, tribes, and land and river passages, together with a minute analysis of the causes for the flourishing or decay of the missionary centers in which more than 50 missionaries had already perished at the hands of the natives. As an assiduous correspondent of the Mercurio peruano of Lima, he published in that periodical the synthesis of these studies, some of them translated later into English and French. The most valuable of his various maps, Plan del curso de los ríos Huallaga y Ucayali y de la Pampa del Sacramento (Mercurio peruano, 1791) has had repeated editions, with successive improvements made by Ocopa missionaries and various scientists.

Bibliography: M. DE MENDIBURU, Diccionario históricobio-gráfico del Perú, 11 v. (Lima 1931–34) 10:224–228. B. IZAGUIRRE ISPIZUA, Historia de las misiones franciscanas . . ., 14 v. (Lima 1922–29).

[O. SAIZ]

SOBRIETY

Sobriety is a term that may be used in a broad sense to signify moderation of any kind, but in its strict sense indicates the virtue, a species of temperance, whose function is to moderate and control the sense appetite with respect to alcoholic drink or other intoxicating substances. The older theologians were familiar with no intoxicants except fermented drink, and sobriety for them was simply temperance as applied to the desire and use of such drink. It was distinguished from abstinence, which was temperance in the use of food and nonintoxicating drink. A virtue in addition to abstinence was considered necessary where intoxicants were concerned, because the desire for them constituted a distinct form of appetite, difficult yet important to keep under reasonable control. Today, however, when a great variety of substances are used to produce a condition morally indistinguishable from alcoholic intoxication, the scope of the virtue of sobriety must be broadened to include moderation in the use of intoxicants in every form.

The use of intoxicants is not per se or essentially evil (see 1 Tm 5.23; Sir 31.27). But if, as the son of Sirach states, wine was created to promote joy of heart, good cheer, and merriment, it has in fact proved the ruin of many, and its abuse is certainly sinful.

As in the case with other moral virtues, sobriety consists in a mean between excess and defect. The defect of sobriety is drunkenness; the vice by way of excess has been given no special name, but it consists in an unreasonable unwillingness to use intoxicants even when health requires them. Total abstainers are not guilty of a culpable excess of sobriety unless their abstention is unworthily motivated. For those prone to alcoholic addiction, the reasonable mean is total abstention. In contemporary life, when powerful intoxicants, especially distilled spirits, are in common use, and when social customs lead many into excess, total abstinence, under ordinary circumstances, is a commendable, though not an obligatory, measure to safeguard the observance of temperance. Moreover, the mean of the infused virtue of sobriety is measured by higher considerations than those that determine what is reasonable from the point of view of the natural, acquired virtue. The sacrifice of otherwise legitimate satisfactions for a supernatural motive can be praiseworthy and meritorious, as is evident in the case of virginity or celibacy undertaken for the sake of virtue, or in the case of fasting.

See Also: TEMPERANCE, VIRTUE OF; TEMPERANCE MOVEMENTS.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae, 2a2ae, 149.

[P. K. MEAGHER]

SOCIAL CONTRACT

Social contract is a concept used variously to explain, on consensual grounds, the origin, limits, conditions, and purposes of political AUTHORITY and obligation. The contract is usually deduced from some conception of NATURAL LAW, which serves as the basic reason and ultimate sanction for the agreement, although it has also been put forth on utilitarian grounds to explain political authority in purely conventional terms.

History. The Greek SOPHISTS and the philosophy of EPICUREANISM equated nature with self-interest, denied any intrinsic moral virtues, and explained the STATE as formed by men to obtain security on the basis of a tacit agreement neither to inflict nor to suffer harm. Against this, CICERO and the Roman lawyers argued that JUSTICE is an intrinsic good, that political authority arises from the collective power of the people, and that it is always subject to natural law.

Medieval Theories. In medieval Europe the contractual basis of political obligation was implied in FEUDALISM and in the patristic principle that law and government, to be legitimate, must always subserve justice. In the 11th century MANEGOLD OF LAUTENBACH preached that a people establishes a ruler that he may govern justly; if he violates the agreement, they are absolved from obedience. St. THOMAS AQUINAS distinguished (1) the principium, or substance, of authority, which is divinely ordained; (2) the modus or form of government, which is determined by the corporate people; and (3) the exercitium of authority, which must accord with natural law and which is conferred, and can be revoked if misused, by the people. Unlike the Sophists and Epicureans, Aquinas, though regarding the specific form as a matter of free choice, saw government as a dictate of natural law. In the 15th-century conciliar dispute, NICHOLAS OF CUSA wrote that “if by nature men are equally strong and equally free, the ruler having equal natural power could be set up only by the choice and consent of the others, just as law also is set up by consent” (De Concordantia Catholica 2.14).

Calvinist Theories. During the Protestant REFORMATION the idea of contract took systematic form and became a theory of action for beleaguered minority confessions. Depending on their situations, Calvinists and Catholics resorted to it as a weapon against the theory of the DIVINE RIGHT OF KINGS and as a principle of legitimacy (the Calvinists giving it a strong theological basis). The Huguenot treatise Vindiciae Contra Tyrannos (1581) answered the question of what obedience was due from a Christian to a prince commanding action contrary to divine law by arguing for the existence of a twofold contract—one between God and the people binding the people to obey God’s will and one between the prince and the people binding the people to obey the prince as long as he obeys God’s law. If the prince acts in violation of the second contract, resistance is obligatory, but it is exclusively an aristocratic function. English Puritan theory of the 16th century was connected, in good part, with the federal COVENANT THEOLOGY and in the 17th century was carried in this form to New England, where it served as the basis of the various compacts establishing new communities.

Counter Reformation Theories. On the Catholic side, the work of the Jesuits Robert BELLARMINE, Francisco SUÁREZ, and Juan de MARIANA was most prominent. In extending the arguments of Aquinas, Suárez maintained that the state is a purely natural phenomenon originating in a voluntary union of heads of families by which each assumes the obligation to subserve the common good. The state depends on God’s ordination only insofar as does all of creation. Political power derives from the community; when it is used to contravene the common good or any other injunction of natural law, it may be resisted. Coupled with the indirect theory of papal power to intervene in temporal affairs, the formulation of Suárez (and of Bellarmine) tended to exalt the divine right of the pope and to set the state apart from theology by explaining it in naturalistic terms. More radical, although not novel, was Mariana’s deduction that private citizens have the right to kill usurpers of temporal power.

Hobbes. In the 17th century the idea of contract was joined to an individualistic theory of autonomous natural law (see NATURAL LAW IN POLITICAL THOUGHT). Thomas HOBBS, in his Leviathan, hypothesized a state of nature wherein men are radically egotistic, perpetually seeking power, and subject to no law, divine or natural. This leads to a bellum omnium contra omnes in which life is “solitary, poor, nasty, brutish and short.” Impelled by the desire of self-preservation to seek security and order, men contract with each other to set up a common sovereign to whom they relinquish all their rights. Thus by artifice is set up that “mortal god,” the state, which exists not as in the classical tradition as a dictate of nature to help men become good, but as a convention to ensure existence. The desire to be is the fundamental natural right; natural law and the social contract are deductions therefrom that are merely definitive of the conditions of ordered existence. The only real limitation on the sovereign—be he one, few, or many—is the amount of power he can effectively command at any moment. Hobbes’s notion of obligation is rooted in interest. Law is the command of the sovereign and is limited only insofar as one is not obliged to obey an order violative of the basic right of self-preservation.

Locke. John LOCKE, in his second Treatise of Civil Government, propounded a contractual theory that proceeded from assumptions similar to Hobbes’s but within the framework of transcendent natural law. Locke’s state of nature is a condition in which men are free and equal and subject to natural law, the terms of which each judges and enforces. Because of the lack of a common impartial judge and executive, uncertainties and inconveniences arise that can issue in a state of war. To remedy this, men contract to form civil society to protect their property in their lives, liberty, and estates. Government is then set up on a fiduciary basis to protect property; when it acts to the contrary as manifested in a concerted pattern of abuses and usurpations, the people, with the majority as the motive force, may resist. Locke’s philosophy underlies the American Declaration of Independence and constitutions of government; it differs from Hobbes’s thought in holding that natural rights can never be surrendered to the state but serve as limitations on political authority. Whereas Hobbes’s contract theory issued in ABSOLUTISM, Locke’s issued in constitutionalism.

Hume, Rousseau, and Kant. In the 18th century David HUME attacked the theory that political obligation may be binding only if it is accepted voluntarily, arguing that the obligation to civil obedience cannot be derived from the obligation to keep an agreement but that both are binding because without them an ordered society cannot be attained and that allegiance develops on habitual grounds, reinforced by education. After Hume the idea of contract lost ground in England; it retained vigor in America until attacked in the 19th century by men such as John C. Calhoun. On the Continent Jean Jacques ROUSSEAU postulated the social contract as a means whereby men retain their original freedom while creating morality by establishing as sovereign the general will of the community. Each surrenders himself entirely to the community with all his rights and property and by giving himself to the whole surrenders to no one. Thus civil society is constituted by the agreement between men to subserve the general will, which leaves each as free as before because he subscribes only to his transformed or ideal will. Because Rousseau recognized no fixed ends in man's nature, the general will is purely formal; its only limitation lies in the requirement of its generality. Accepting Rousseau's premises, Immanuel KANT viewed the social contract in a metaphysical sense as an instrument relating men to each other so that the freedom of each is compatible with the freedom of all. In this view the social contract is a social imperative prescribing the conditions of free social life rather than a call to action. In the 19th century the idea of contract lost attractiveness because of the growth of historical studies and idealist and evolutionist philosophies.

Critique. The idea of a social contract contains two elements, the pactum unionis, which forms the body politic, and the pactum subjectionis, which organizes political authority in a constitution and government. Catholic thought in the Middle Ages and Calvinist thought emphasized the latter; Hobbes, Locke, Rousseau, and the rationalists emphasized the former; and Catholic scholastic thought, in developed form (Bellarmine, Suárez), does not separate the two but regards the will to common life in political society as realized in a concrete constitutional order. Hobbes, Locke, and Rousseau deny any teleological necessity for the origin of the state in man's nature, seeing authority as rising solely from the wills of the contracting individuals. Catholic thought presupposes families as the basic social units and regards the state as a moral necessity whose concrete realization and organization is the product of man's will. The contract does not create political authority but designates how and by whom it shall be exercised. The state is seen as part of the objective moral order, with human intelligence and will having a role in its construction. It follows that obligation to obedience is not, as with Hobbes, Locke, and Rousseau, rooted in the contractual promise or in individual interest, but in the objective natural law, which indicates the moral necessity of authority. That history shows that many states were established by force and exist by sheer power and that specific conscious acts of consent by all within a community rarely, if ever, occur, does not vitiate the contract theory as a normative explanation of the origin and continued existence of the state. Modern constitutionalism based on the dignity of man recognizes this fact in the emphasis it places on the consensual factor as a legitimating and operational principle.

Bibliography: O. F. VON GIERKE, Natural Law and the Theory of Society, 1500–1800, tr. E. BARKER (Boston 1957); Political Theories of the Middle Ages, tr. and introd. F. W. MAITLAND (Boston 1958). E. BARKER, ed., Social Contract: Essays by Locke, Hume, and Rousseau (New York 1948). J. N. FIGGIS, Studies of Political Thought from Gerson to Grotius (Cambridge, Eng. 1960). G. SABINE, A History of Political Theory (New York 1961). T. HOBBS, Leviathan, ed. and introd. M. OAKESHOTT (Oxford 1957). S. J. BRUTUS, A Defense of Liberty against Tyrants, ed. and introd. H. J. LASKI (London 1924). H. A. ROMMEN, The State in Catholic Thought (St. Louis 1945). L. STRAUSS, Natural Right and History (Chicago 1953). J. F. FENTON, The Theory of the Social Compact and Its Influence upon the American Revolution (New York 1891). D. HUME, Theory of Politics, ed. F. WATKINS (New York 1951).

[A. J. BEITZINGER]

SOCIAL GOSPEL

The movement in American Protestantism, beginning in the 1870s, that endeavored to answer the challenges presented by the abuses of industrialism. It was also a corrective to the theological individualism and economic conservatism of the churches of that epoch, and an assertion that from the teachings of Jesus Christ the institutions of a just social order can be deduced. Although its theological premises were different, the moral idealism of the social gospel movement and its goals paralleled those of Christian socialism in England, and the efforts of Continental Catholicism that culminated in Leo XIII's encyclical RERUM NOVARUM of May 1, 1891. The social sympathies of UNITARIANS and the utopian perfectionism of TRANSCENDENTALISM earlier in the 19th century undoubtedly contributed to the emergence of the social gospel, as did the momentum of the antislavery crusade. These humanitarian protests came at a time when labor leaders, socialists, and reformers were attacking Christianity as a class religion concerned primarily with protecting property and ignoring widespread human misery. Moreover, science was eroding the beliefs of theological fundamentalism, and the recognition was growing that the shocking disparities of wealth were not to be cured by appeals to middle-class piety. A new interpretation of the Christian message was probably inevitable, one addressing itself to the changed world and its problems of the sweatshop, the slum, the company town, and unemployment.

A social order reflecting the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man was the essential demand of the social gospel. The ideas of Horace BUSHNELL directly influenced Washington Gladden, who, along with W. D. P.

Bliss, gave a new orientation to American Protestantism at the end of the century. Their voices were subsequently joined by those of George D. Herron, Walter RAUSCHENBUSCH, and Shailer MATHEWS. In a movement climaxed in December 1908, the overwhelming majority of churches of the evangelical tradition formed the NATIONAL (originally called Federal) COUNCIL OF CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN THE U.S.A. to secure, as the preamble to its Constitution declared, “a larger combined influence for the Churches of Christ in all matters affecting the moral and social condition of the people, so as to promote the application of the law of Christ in every relation of human life.”

The reforms advocated by the exponents of the social gospel were gradual ones. Their goals, partly because of the moral energy they released, have been incorporated into national legislation. Their overly simple belief in the essential goodness of man and in his responsiveness to moral suasion, along with their lack of realism as to the magnitude and complexity of the problems they optimistically analyzed and prematurely “solved,” ultimately weakened confidence in the social gospel. Its energies were dissipated in efforts to impose national prohibition. Attacks on its theological adequacy by the disciples of Karl Barth, and on its political naïveté by Reinhold Niebuhr, further weakened the movement. But its activist emphasis and its concern for justice among men left a characteristic stamp on American Protestantism.

Bibliography: R. H. GABRIEL, The Course of American Democratic Thought (2d ed. New York 1956). F. E. JOHNSON, The Social Gospel Re-examined (New York 1940). J. A. HUTCHISON, We Are Not Divided (New York 1941). C. H. HOPKINS, The Rise of the Social Gospel in American Protestantism, 1865–1915 (New Haven 1940). A. S. NASH, Protestant Thought in the Twentieth Century: Whence and Whither? (New York 1951). W. A. VISSER 'T HOOFT, The Background of the Social Gospel in America (New York 1929).

[E. DUFF]

SOCIAL JUSTICE

The VIRTUE that ordains all human acts toward the common good. It is a special virtue, specified and distinguished from other virtues, but like charity it is also a general virtue because ordered to it under a certain aspect are all acts of other virtues and not only acts of JUSTICE in the particular sense of the term. It is appropriate to outline the historical development of this expression and to define its meaning.

Origins of the Term. The term social justice has been employed in ecclesiastical teaching only recently. St. Thomas Aquinas referred to the same reality as general, or legal, justice. Referring to general justice he wrote:

“Now it is evident that all who are included in a community, stand in relation to that community as parts to a whole; while a part, as such, belongs to a whole, so that whatever is the good of a part can be directed to the good of the whole. It follows therefore that the good of any virtue, whether such virtue direct man in relation to himself, or in relation to certain other individual persons, is referable to the common good, to which justice directs: so that all acts of virtue can pertain to justice, insofar as it directs men to the common good. It is in this sense that justice is called a general virtue.” Then, using the term legal justice, St. Thomas adds, “Since it belongs to the law to direct to the common good, as stated above, it follows that the justice which is in this way styled general, is called legal justice, because thereby man is in harmony with the law which directs the acts of all the virtues to the common good” (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 58.5).

The expression social justice was introduced into the vocabulary of Catholic writers by Luigi TAPARELLI D'AZEGLIO, SJ [Saggio teoretico di diritto naturale (2v. Palermo 1840) no. 353]. Others who used the term, often imprecisely, were Édouard de Léhen, SJ [Institutes du droit naturel privé et public et du droit des gens (Paris 1866) 535], and later the French Catholic social thinkers C. H. R. LA TOUR DU PIN and Albert de Mun. Some people distrusted the expression and suspected those who used it of inclinations toward statism and equalitarian socialism. Undoubtedly La Tour du Pin invited such criticism by appearing to confuse social justice with distributive justice or with the obligations imposed by the state as legislator. In Germany, the Jesuits of Stimmen aus Maria Laach, particularly Viktor CATHREIN, sought at first to restore use of the term legal justice. However, in spite of the efforts of Heinrich Pesch to avoid the restriction of legal justice to the distributive justice exercised by the state, contemporary writers were too inclined toward this confusion to allow acceptance of the Thomistic term.

In the end the term social justice imposed itself. The new expression was found in the writings of René du Bouays de la Bégassière, SJ (c. 1895), of Charles Antoine, SJ [Cours d'économie sociale (2d ed. Paris 1899)], and of A. Pottier [De jure et justitia (Liège 1900)]. At the Semaines sociales de France, A. G. SERTILLANGES, OP, spoke of “general justice or social justice destined to safeguard the common good” [Proceedings 8 (1911) 98]. In Germany as early as 1905, in a development seemingly inspired by Antoine, Pesch used the term soziale Gerechtigkeit. The idea spread little by little but without gaining full acceptance. Arthur VERMEERSCH, SJ, who had referred to “legal or social justice” at least as early as 1921, was still uncertain about the term on the eve of the encyclical QUADRAGESIMO ANNO. He wrote at the time that “social justice is an imprecise expression that designates an end rather than a virtue, an end in which different virtues meet” [Il XL anniversario della enciclica Rerum Novarum (Milan 1931) 556]. But was this not exactly the general justice of St. Thomas?

Use in Early-Twentieth-Century Papal Teaching.

Pius XI definitively incorporated the term social justice into the teaching of the Church, giving it, it seems, exactly the same meaning as general and legal justice. The latter expressions may have been abandoned because they were poorly understood, especially legal justice, which was too easily confused with the rule of the positive legislator. Some years before Pius X had extolled St. Gregory the Great as the “public champion of social justice” because he had resisted the unjust pretensions of the Byzantine emperors [Jucunda sane, Acta Sanctae Sedis 36 (1904) 515]. Pius XI gave the term a more technical meaning as early as 1923, recalling that St. Thomas had formulated with exactitude “the principles of legal or social justice” [Studiorum Duce, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 15 (1923) 322]. The expression soon appeared in the writings of Cardinal Pietro Gasparri, papal Secretary of State, who in a letter to Eugène Duthoit on the occasion of the Semaine sociale of 1928 termed social justice “this virtue which orders toward the common good the external acts of all the others” [Proceedings 20 (1928) 11].

In Quadragesimo anno Pius XI employed the term eight times. In discussing the just distribution of goods, he identified social justice with respect for the “good of the whole community” [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 23 (1931) 196, 197]. He mentioned it again in insisting on the urgency of reforms to ensure wage levels adequate for family needs and so regulated as to maximize opportunities for employment (ibid. 200, 202). The Pope condemned as a violation of “right order” capital’s use of labor “without any regard to the human dignity of the workers, the social character of economic life, social justice and the common good” (ibid. 210). On this principle also, institutions for social assistance are required by social justice. In general, an enduring economic order must be subject to the norm of social justice. Free competition “cannot be an adequate controlling principle in economic affairs”; there must be recourse to nobler principles of “social justice and social charity” (ibid. 206). The Pope adds that “the public institutions of the nations should be such as to make all human society conform to the requirements of the common good, that is, the norm of social justice” (ibid. 212). Social reform must proceed “according to the mind of the Church on a firm basis of social justice and social charity” (ibid. 218).

The encyclical DIVINI REDEMPTORIS (1937) contains the most explicit definition of social justice: “It is of the very essence of social justice to demand from each individual all that is necessary for the common good. But just as in the living organism it is impossible to provide for the good of the whole unless each single part and each individual member is given what it needs for the exercise of its proper functions, so it is impossible to care for the social organism and the good of society as a unit unless each single part and each individual member . . . is supplied with all that is necessary for the exercise of his social functions” [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 29 (1937) 92].

Even after Quadragesimo anno, some still questioned the appropriateness of the term social justice. J. Tonneau, OP, suggested that it was a vague expression taken from the language of the people and regretted “that the qualified representatives of moral theology, who should have a truly scientific care to use only a well-developed terminology, were not able to provide the magisterium with a body of technical formulas, if not more expressive, at least more logically articulated” [Bulletin thomiste, 4 (1934–36) 498]. In Tonneau’s view, there had been a confusion of the obligations of general justice and of distributive justice; his interpretation was undoubtedly related to his own inclination to consider as simple distributive justice that which belongs at the same time to general justice or (according to the new term) to social justice. Pius XII did not use social justice very frequently; but when he did, he used the term in the sense of ordination to the common good.

Underlying Problem. Under the influence of individualist and liberal philosophies, many 19th- and early 20th-century Catholics restricted their view of justice to commutative justice between individuals. This species of justice is concerned with the equivalence of reciprocal payments beyond which nothing can be strictly owed and beyond which there is room only for charity (understood in the narrow sense that has brought it into disrepute). As a result, the Church sought to reaffirm its traditional doctrine that there can be no justice in the full meaning of the word without an ordination of parts to the whole, of individuals and all their acts to the common good. Assuredly, the common good is not unrelated to particular goods. It is the “community of the good” that enables each member of the community to participate in “all possible good.” This end cannot be attained without the mediation of a “good of the community”—a common good in the usual meaning of the term—that is imposed on individuals and binds them to various duties in view of the common participation of all in the greatest possible good. Social justice is the virtue that subjects men to the “good of the community” in view of the “community of the good” [Gaston Fessard, Autorité et bien commun (Paris 1944) 55].

Social justice is achieved by the acts of all other virtues, especially, however, by the acts of “particular” justice, either commutative in the relation of person to person or, distributive in the distribution of the common good among diverse individuals. This distribution is accomplished by reference to the common good, for each man participates in the good of the community; to consider distributive justice in isolation would be to deprive it of its ultimate norm. To reduce social justice to distributive justice, on the other hand, would risk giving distributive justice an arbitrary or simply equalitarian character. Both commutative justice and distributive justice are related to social justice as to their ultimate norm.

Recent Developments. In the era after Vatican II, common understandings of the meaning of social justice have evolved considerably. The term has come to be something of a rallying cry for a variety of efforts to improve society and enhance the equitable treatment of all people, especially the poorest. The increase in prominence of this term may be attributed in part to several pivotal church documents and to the courageous leadership of recent popes. The tone for the developments of recent decades was set by the strong words of the Vatican II document Gaudium et spes (Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World) which elucidated a communal vision that embraces all of humankind and noted “the pressing need to reform economic and social structures” (par. 86) so that all people benefit from prosperity. The social encyclicals of Pope Paul VI, particularly Populorum progressio (1967), spoke prophetically about the necessity of assisting the needy, not merely as a desirable act of voluntary charity but as an absolute demand of justice. Social justice is appropriately applied not only within given societies, but on the global level, where rich countries experience an obligation to aid the development of their poorer neighbors. The 1971 Synod of Bishops reaffirmed both the seriousness and international dimension of the obligations of social justice with its document Justice in the World.

Pope John Paul II has also spoken forcefully about social justice, particularly in his social encyclicals Sollicitudo rei socialis (1987) and Centesimus annus (1991). He has particularly emphasized the fact of global economic interdependence which underlines the importance of the virtue of solidarity which motivates acts of social justice. Like several of his predecessors, John Paul II seeks to inform Catholics about the requirements of social justice in light of the “signs of the times” (such as the fall of Communism and the phenomenon of globalization) and to respond to new realities in ways consistent with the Gospel. Bishops’ conferences in many parts of the world have interpreted the universal call for social justice for their own national contexts. The bishops of the United States addressed numerous concerns about social justice in the American context in the 1986 Pastoral Letter Economic Justice for All.

Finally, recent Catholic reflections on social justice have benefitted from the influence of several important movements, both intellectual and popular in nature. Liberation theology has added many rich themes to contemporary religious discourse on proper social order. Its call to enact a “preferential option for the poor” has inspired not only constructive scholarship on social obligations to those in need but also concrete praxis aimed at the advancement of social justice. Other contributors include academics who engage in political theology, those who take part in intentional alternative communities such as the Catholic Worker and labor activists who seek greater equity in work arrangements and remuneration. Catholicism, with its distinctive vision of the communal nature of human life, will surely continue to play a pivotal role in inspiring and enacting social justice.

See Also: SOCIETY; STATE, THE

Bibliography: J. Y. CALVEZ and J. PERRIN, The Church and Social Justice: The Social Teachings of the Popes from Leo XIII to Pius XII, 1878–1958, tr. J. R. KIRWAN (Chicago 1961) 133–61. P. VALLIN, “Aux origines de l’expression justice sociale,” Chronique Social de France 68 (1960) 379–92. W. FERREE, Introduction to Social Justice (New York 1948), pamphlet. J. MADIRAN, De la justice sociale (Paris 1961).

[J. Y. CALVEZ/T. MASSARO]

SOCIAL SERVICE, SISTERS OF

(SSS), a congregation of women religious founded in 1923 in Budapest, Hungary, for social service work. In 1926 the first American foundation (the Sisters of Social Service of Los Angeles, Official Catholic Directory #4080) was made in Los Angeles, CA; it became a motherhouse for U.S. and Canadian foundations in 1956. Another branch of this congregation was established as a diocesan congregation with its motherhouse in Buffalo, NY (Official Catholic Directory #4090). Its special objective is to engage in social and pastoral activities at parish and diocesan levels. The sisters are engaged in education and literacy programs, catechetics, retreats, counseling, spiritual direction, camps for children and youth, ministries to the elderly, immigrants and ethnic minorities, legal services and social outreach programs for the poor, as well as justice and peace work.

[J. M. RENFRO/EDS.]

SOCIAL SIN

The concept of social sin is derived from the biblical account of Israel’s struggle to remain faithful to the terms of the ancient covenant. Torah committed Israel to a life of society free of the inequality and exploitation that characterized its own existence in the Egyptian land of bondage. Whenever Israel tolerated the oppression of the poor, of orphans, widows and immigrants, the prophets accused the people of collective infidelity to God. To know God was to do justice (Amos, Jeremiah, Isaiah). Jesus himself included in his mission the release of captives and the liberation of the oppressed (Lk 4.18–19).

De-privatization. The concept of social sin has come to the fore in post–Vatican II Catholic theology, especially political theology and LIBERATION THEOLOGY, and has assumed a prominent place in the Church’s social teaching. One of the principal tasks of political theology, according to J.-B. Metz, is the “de-privatization” of the Christian message, i.e., the overcoming of the inherited individualistic interpretation of sin, conversion, and new life, and the retrieval of the original social dimension of the Good News. Sin has both a personal and a social dimension; and the two are interrelated. One of the tasks of Latin American liberation theology is the analysis of the structures of marginalization that inflict misery and hopelessness on the people of that continent. In A Theology of Liberation, G. Gutierrez argues that institutionalized injustice reveals the collective dimension of human sin.

Since post–Vatican II Catholic social teaching based itself, not on the inherited natural law theory, but on biblical revelation and, guided by its light, on human reason, the ecclesiastical documents began to use theological terms to designate the violations of justice. Institutions that violate justice are called sinful.

Influenced by the perspective of the Medellin Conclusions (Latin American Bishops Conference 1968), the statement “Justitia en mundo” published by the 1971 Synod of Bishops, spoke of “recognizing sin in its individual and social manifestation” (n. 51) and acknowledged that the dynamism of the gospel “frees men from personal sin and from its consequences in social life” (n. 5). The statement recognized “the network of domination, oppression and abuses” (n. 3) that was being built around the world and that stifled freedom and kept the greater part of humanity excluded from power and resources.

Institutional Injustice. The Church itself is not altogether free of social sin. The same statement demanded that the Catholic Church critically evaluate its own self-organization (nn. 40–48).

Within the Church rights must be preserved . . . (n. 41). We also urge that women should have their own share of responsibility and participation in community life . . . of the Church (n. 42). The Church recognizes everyone’s right to suitable freedom of expression and thought. This includes the right of everyone to be heard in a spirit of dialogue which preserves a legitimate diversity within the Church (n. 44).

Social sin refers to institutionalized injustices. At Medellin the bishops spoke of situations that were so massively unjust that they had to be called “institutionalized violence.” The Canadian bishops, following John Paul II, spoke of the plague of unemployment as a “moral evil” and as “symptomatic of a basic moral disorder” (Ethical Reflections on the Economic Crisis, n. 3; cf. Redemptor hominis, n. 52). In their pastoral, “Economic Justice for All” (1986), the North American bishops defined injustice as the structured exclusion of people from political, economic, and cultural participation in society (n. 77). Since these patterns of exclusion are created by free human beings, “they can be called forms of social sin” (n. 77).

The notion of social sin has not yet been fully explored theologically. Since the term “sin” usually refers to a personal option, how can one speak of sinful institutions or sinful structures? Replying to this question, the Vatican Instruction on Christian Freedom and Liberation (1986) recognized that sin in the primary sense refers to voluntary acts, but because unjust structures are created by sinful humans, it is possible to speak of “sinful structures” and “social sin” in a derived and secondary sense (n. 75).

Source and Consequence. How do structures become sinful? The ecclesiastical documents offer several suggestions. First, and most obviously, structures may be sinful because they have been created by sinful men to institutionalize exploitation and discrimination. More often, however, institutions are created to serve a good purpose. How, then, do they become sinful? In Redemptor hominis (n. 15), John Paul II introduced dialectical thinking into Catholic theological reflection. He argued that what humans produce with the best of intentions often turns against them in the long run. Instruments and institutions created to serve human purposes may actually come to control their masters and exercise dehumanizing influence. It follows from this that it always remains necessary to test structures to see if they still serve their purpose or if they have come to damage human life. If the latter is true, personal sin enters the situation only when those in charge refuse to be critical and rebuild the inherited structures. “Acquiescence with sinful structures or failure to correct them when it is possible to do so is a sinful dereliction of Christian duty” (Economic Justice for All, n. 77).

This dialectic reveals how even holy institutions, such as the Church, created in accordance with the demands of justice and love, can become tainted by social sin. Administrative structures set up to serve the life of the community may, after a period of time, actually become obstacles to the Spirit-guided unfolding of this life. The sin is then not in the founders of these structures but in those who refuse to recognize the present damage and resist efforts to reconstruct them.

Personal sins, then, generate social sin. Conversely, social sin multiplies personal sins. Marginalization creates conditions that foster resentment and despair in the victims and thus easily provoke irrational responses. More than that, since institutionalized injustice affects all members of society, it creates conditions that facilitate personal sin on all levels. Social sin distorts people's perception of reality; it makes them see the structures of marginalization as natural and necessary; it falsifies their moral conscience. That is why the Medellín Conclusions (Justice nn. 17, 20, 23) included "conscientization" in the Church's pastoral mission, i.e., the raising of people's consciousness in regard to the historical obstacles that prevent them from assuming responsibility for their lives. Social sin, often hidden by the dominant culture, must be made visible.

Bibliography: G. BAUM, Religion and Alienation (New York 1975). D. DORR, Option for the Poor (Maryknoll, NY 1983) J.-B. METZ, Theology of the World (New York 1973). P. KERANS, Sinful Social Structures (New York 1974).

[G. BAUM]

SOCIAL THOUGHT, CATHOLIC

Social thought is an inclusive term that refers to any expression of ideas concerning the conduct of relations among men, particularly ideas concerning the comprehensive system of relations that is SOCIETY. According to this usage, Catholic social thought includes not only the official teaching of the Church affecting the organization of society but all social ideas that can be attributed to Catholic inspiration, whether these ideas are taught formally or only exemplified in the social institutions and popular traditions of a given period of history. The introduction to this article defines the more restricted official concern of the Church with the morality of social life. The historical sketches in the succeeding parts outline the development preceding the systematic formulation of Catholic social teaching that began with Leo XIII (see SOCIAL THOUGHT, PAPAL). Thus the Bible itself is seen to be rich in social concepts and social implications, although obviously the sacred writers were not professedly concerned with social theory. The Fathers of the Church and the medieval theologians addressed themselves formally to numerous social questions (e.g., the social nature of man, forms of government, the morality of interest), but they did not recognize a distinctive corpus of social doctrine as such. Concern with the theory of society is a development of the modern period and particularly of the 19th century, when Catholic moralists and others and ultimately the magisterium of the Church had to take account of divergent social philosophies and ideologies and of the fundamental changes in social life that were initiated by industrial capitalism. Meanwhile, social philosophy and social science and their specialized branches had become the explicit concern of scholars. These disciplines have become increasingly important in their own right and as means for the understanding of complex situations that must be evaluated by the teaching Church.

1. Introduction

The basic assumption of the Church's teaching on social questions is that man is a social being (see MAN, 3). By nature he is dependent on others at every stage of life, for existence and for the fulfillment of spiritual, intellectual, emotional, physical, and social needs. Peace and order in human society require the conformity of individual members to certain expectations in their interaction with each other, individually and collectively. Conformity to role expectations in family life, education, economic behavior, participation in the political community, and all daily interaction is universally deemed essential for the common good. The ultimate concern of the Church is the salvation of men's souls, for which both guiding principles and specific means must be provided. Since salvation is won or lost during life on earth and since it depends not only on internal dispositions but also on conformity with a code of conduct prescribed for human interaction, the Church is of necessity concerned with social morality. What is morally right and what is morally wrong in social institutions and human behavior patterns? What are men's basic moral rights and responsibilities toward each other as individuals and in groups? What are the mutual rights and responsibilities of social groups such as families and political or economic communities? The body of principles applicable to these and similar questions that has been developed through the centuries is known as Catholic social teaching. It is logically necessary to inquire why the Church is concerned with social morality, what the sources are from which teaching on social questions is derived, how the doctrine is developed, and why it differs from other codes of social morality that may be current from time to time.

Authority of the Church. The bases of the Church's concern were clearly stated by Pius XI in a well-known paragraph of QUADRAGESIMO ANNO:

That principle which Leo XIII so clearly established must be laid down at the outset here, namely, that there resides in Us the right and duty to pronounce with supreme authority upon social and economic matters. Certainly the Church was not given the commission to guide men to an only fleeting and perishable happiness but to that which is eternal. Indeed "the Church holds that it is unlawful for her to mix without cause in these temporal concerns;" however she can in no wise renounce the duty God entrusted to her to interpose her authority, not of course in matters of technique for which she is neither suitably equipped nor endowed by office, but in all things that are connected with the moral law. For as to these, the deposit of truth that God committed to Us and the grave duty of disseminating and interpreting the whole moral law, and of urging it in season and out of season, bring under and subject to Our supreme jurisdiction not only social order but economic activities themselves [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 23 (Rome 1931) 190].

Although there are some who consider morality to be completely divorced from religion, it is nevertheless true that in the traditional Catholic view the Church is the only authoritative custodian and interpreter of the moral code in all its aspects, social morality included.

Sources of Catholic Teaching. The Church's teaching on social questions is derived from the same sources as on all matters of faith and morals. These sources are usually classified as mediate, or remote, and immediate, or proximate.

Natural Law. One mediate source is the NATURAL LAW comprising all moral principles that can be known through reason. A considerable proportion of the Church's teaching on social questions is based essentially on natural law principles, e.g., teaching on such important issues as the right of the worker to a living wage for himself and his family, the right to organize labor unions and political parties, the responsibilities of qualified citizens to vote, and the like. A remarkable development of these principles began with the pontificate of Leo XIII (1878–1903). Revolutionary changes in the way men earn their living and support their families and in the manner in which they wish to be governed, as well as human problems arising out of rapid scientific and technological developments, call for continuing reexamination by the teaching Church of the application of the natural law to the new situations and human problems. The natural law does not change, but its principles are developed through specification and application to new human problems as they arise. The Church claims the exclusive right to determine such specifications and applications, usually through the pronouncements of the popes and the general councils of Church Fathers.

Revelation. A second mediate source of Catholic social teaching is revelation. As understood by Catholics this includes both the Sacred Scriptures and tradition (see REVELATION, THEOLOGY OF). Many important moral principles are derived directly from the revealed word of God. The demands of charity, particularly as they apply to man's attitudes toward and interaction with his fellowmen serve as a prime illustration. The Church insists that true peace and order in society cannot be achieved until the ideals regarding love of neighbor that were preached by Christ are realized. Other social principles implicit in the natural law regarding justice in all its forms, e.g., the right to ownership and the durability of marriage, are strongly supported by the revealed word of God. Even the Church's teaching on interracial relations is based in large measure on Sacred Scripture.

Magisterium. The immediate source of Catholic social teaching is the magisterium of the Church, or the Church as the divinely authorized teacher in the realm of faith and morals. Here it is necessary to distinguish between the ordinary and extraordinary teaching power of the Church. Since the latter usually involves solemn and inspired declarations by the sovereign pontiffs or by a general council of the Church acting in union with the pope, relatively few Catholic social principles are placed in this category. Certainly some of the Church's social teaching, e.g., on man's ultimate goal and the measures to achieve it and on the nature of marriage as a Sacrament, has been solemnly defined by the Church and has the standing of doctrine that must be accepted as a matter of faith. But most of the recent development in Catholic social teaching, including the principles and directives on social questions that have emanated principally from the Holy See since the time of Leo XIII, cannot be taken as infallible but rather as an expression of the ordinary magisterium of the Church. Pronouncements in this category are not infallible in the sense that they must be believed, in the theological meaning of the term.

It is common opinion among theologians, however, that ordinary teaching of the magisterium must be accepted, even internally, and obeyed. The assumption is that although the Holy See or a general council does not usually make infallible pronouncements on questions that involve what are in essence specific applications of the natural law, the role of the teaching Church as the authoritative custodian and interpreter of the whole moral code, nevertheless, requires that directives and prescriptions on social questions must be accepted and obeyed by all Catholics. There is some disagreement as to the specific virtue involved here, but most authorities seem to agree that OBEDIENCE, at the very least, is certainly involved.

Distinctiveness of Catholic Social Teaching. Why and how does Catholic social teaching differ from other codes of social morality? This is a complex question that cannot be resolved satisfactorily here. The Church's position on most social questions is identical with, or at least approximates, that of all denominations in the Judeo-Christian tradition. It differs most in its fundamental premise that the natural moral law is one, universal, invariable, and immutable and that the Catholic Church is its official custodian and interpreter. The Church cannot agree with the proposition that social morality, in any objective sense, is ultimately dictated by the mores of particular societies or that social morality is determined by men rather than ultimately by the Creator. Because of this position, the Church's teaching on such issues as divorce with the right to remarry and artificial birth control may differ markedly from that of other religious groups in the Judeo-Christian tradition. Needless to say, its teaching on social questions differs to a considerable degree from that of religions that are not in this tradition.

Bibliography: J. MESSNER, Social Ethics, tr. J. J. DOHERTY (St. Louis 1964). E. WELTY, A Handbook of Christian Social Ethics, tr. G. KIRSTEIN, rev. J. FITZSIMONS (New York 1960—).

[T. J. HARTE]

2. In the Bible

The concept of the people of God is basic in biblical thought. In the Old Testament (OT) justice is the social principle that gives solidarity to this people; in the New Testament (NT) justice is transcended by love. This article treats the application of these principles to the family, the economy, labor, slavery, and loans.

The People of God. In all creation, man is the only being created in the image of God and therefore free—free in all things, even to rebel against his Creator. A group of men chosen by God form Israel, a people consecrated to God, bound to Him by a COVENANT, established as a juridical person for a universal mission, the spread of monotheism. As children of a single God, all men are brothers, equals, to be loved, as they await the Messiah to unite them more closely. When Israel turns this divine privilege into opposition, to other nations, the prophets remind it of its solidarity with them, joining, at the center of life in common, love with the worship of God and love with the service of men. Yahweh is not pleased with fasting and sacrifice unless accompanied by works of mercy toward brethren in need.

The Law of Moses implies the duties of “releasing those bound unjustly, untying the thongs of the yoke, setting free the oppressed, . . . sharing bread with the hungry, sheltering the oppressed and homeless, clothing the naked” (Is 58.5–7); for “to do what is right and just is more acceptable to the Lord than sacrifice” (Prv 21.3). The king also is bound to such justice, and therefore he must be “a kinsman, not a foreigner He may not have a great number of wives, . . . nor may he accumulate a vast amount of silver and gold;” every day he must read and meditate on the Law, that he may learn to keep all its commandments, “lest he become estranged from his countrymen through pride” (Dt 17.15–20).

When this communion among the Israelites is in danger of being broken by grievous inequalities, the conscience of the people reacts against it, especially through the prophets, so that the rich are identified with the wicked, the poor with the pious, and the obligations of the Decalogue are again called to mind: to worship God, to honor parents, not to kill, not to commit adultery, not to steal, not to lie, not to covet another's possessions. Such solidarity is expressed at times, in “the assembly of the people of God” (Jgs 20.2), by the sharing of the income with those in need. This is the symbolic meaning of the precept that the first fruits and tithes are to be eaten in a sacred meal, “in Yahweh's presence,” together with the poor and the strangers, the widows and the orphans (Dt 14.29; 16.11, 14; 24.19–21; 26.12–13; etc.); hence also, the importance of almsgiving.

In the NT the new people of God, now baptized and no longer circumcised, and therefore freed from limitations of race and territory, keep the character of “the assembly of God” (ἡ ἐκκλησία τοῦ θεοῦ: Acts 20.28; 1 Cor 1.2; 10.32; 11.16; etc.), with the priestly mission of “a chosen race, . . . a holy nation” (1 Pt 2.9), for the purpose of mankind's unification—“that all may be one” (Jn 17.21).

In the OT the authority that rules the state and the various communities comes from God and obeys His law. This law commands the rulers not to be proud, not to make selfish misuse of power, not to be influenced by bribery, not to overburden the subjects, and to give justice to the innocent. In other pre-Christian regimes politics includes religion; in Israel religion includes politics. Therefore, a sacral character is impressed on government. (See THEOCRACY).

Jesus recognizes a lay element in government: “Give to Caesar what belongs to Caesar, and to God what belongs to God” (Mk 12.17 and parallels). Between the two He makes a distinction, but not a separation; both come forth from God. If political authority orders actions contrary to the law of God, God, rather than man, is to be obeyed (Acts 5.29). The opposition can reach the point of active persecution and the dualism of the Apocalypse: the City of the Lamb (Jerusalem, the Church) as opposed to the City of the Beast (Rome, the Empire). But this does not lead to any overthrow. The Christian religion may be worn away by the spirit, but not by externals, not by any hostile structures.

The Social Principle. The centripetal social principle of the OT is justice, as contained in the Law, the synthesis of divine and human rights. (See JUSTICE OF GOD; JUSTICE OF MEN.) The Law also commands love. Yet actually, the sense of solidarity is limited to fellow members of religion and race, even though the prophets often urge a going beyond these narrow limits.

In the NT love plays the predominant role; it becomes the new commandment that overthrows all 613 prescriptions of the OT. In this sense Jesus does not abolish the law; he completes it: “It was said to those of old: ‘Thou shalt love thy neighbor and shalt hate thy enemy’ [cf. Lv 19.18; Nm 35.19–20]. But I say to you: Love your enemies, do good to those who hate you” (Mt 5.43–44). Love is life—the life of God who is love; hatred is the spirit of Satan, murder. Love unifies: “In one Spirit we were all baptized into one body, whether Jews or Gentiles, whether slaves or free” (1 Cor 12.13). Christ insists, above all, on unity, through which there is born a spiritual living together in which distinction of race, class, or sex is no longer valid, with a resulting social economy in which, all being “of one heart and one soul,” there is a sharing of material goods, so that no one is in want (Acts 4.32, 34). Love is God’s justice that surpasses man’s justice, as illustrated in the parable of Lazarus and the rich man, the parable of the laborers in the vineyard, the episode of the woman taken in adultery, etc. Human justice gives to each one his due; love gives of oneself, one’s very life. [See LOVE (IN THE BIBLE).]

The main source of profit in Israel is agriculture, not war. God loves peace. Among the Israelites, soldiers are allowed to return home for work and for feasts and even because of fear; their military law is shot through with humaneness. When the army goes on a campaign, before a city is besieged it is offered terms of peace. The Bible champions peace without end, which will be realized by the Messiah, “the prince of peace,” “with right and justice” (Is 7.14; 9.5–6), when “they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks; one nation shall not raise the sword against another, nor shall they train for war any longer” (Mi 4.3). [See WAR (IN THE BIBLE).]

The NT opens with the announcement of peace to men of good will, it puts forgiveness in place of quarrels, it urges the overcoming of evil with good, it ranks peacemaking as one of the beatitudes, and it warns that “all those who take the sword will perish by the sword” (Mt 26.52).

The Family. The Bible has important teachings on the family, which is the nucleus of society. For the preservation of family life, adultery and other sexual sins are condemned. [See ADULTERY (IN THE BIBLE); SEX (IN THE BIBLE).] Contrary to the Code of Hammurabi, Israelite Law protects the personality and rights of children: “Fathers shall not be put to death for their children, nor children for their fathers; only for his own sin shall a man be put to death” (Dt 24.16). The sacrifice of the firstborn, a common practice of the neighboring peoples, is condemned. Children are to receive a strict education. WOMAN is of the same nature as man: “God created man in his image, . . . male and female he created them” (Gn 1.27). Yet in several respects Israelite society is androcratic. A husband may divorce his wife, but a wife may not divorce her husband. Adultery consists only in sexual intercourse between a married woman and a man other than her husband, not in illicit relations of a married man with a woman other than his wife. A woman is juridically subject to her father or husband or nearest male relative; she cannot hold property in her own name, unless there is no male heir [See INHERITANCE (IN THE BIBLE).] Limited polygamy is permitted in the patriarchal period; later custom is opposed to it. King Solomon is censured for taking many wives, although primarily because they were pagans who led him to offer pagan sacrifices. The wisdom literature frequently sings the praises of the virtuous wife and condemns the adulterous woman (Prv 11.16; 12.4; 19.14; 22.14; 30.20; 31.10–31; Eccl 7.26–28; Sir 7.19; 25.12–25; 26.1–4, 6–18; 42.9–14; etc.)

In the NT the Blessed Virgin Mary carries out with dignity a unique task: it falls to her, a young woman, to proclaim in her MAGNIFICAT the Christian revolution—the putting down of the mighty and the exalting of the lowly, the scattering of the proud, the filling of the hungry with good things and the sending away of the rich empty—the realization of the OT messianic ideals.

Jesus treats all women, even the much-married Samaritan woman, with deference. He condemns divorce and adultery equally of the husband and the wife. He declares the marriage bond sacred: “What God has joined together let no man put asunder” (Mk 10.9). In the NT marriage is an indissoluble union between one man and one woman, similar to the mystical union between Christ and His Church and therefore called “a great mystery” (Eph 5.29–32). This similarity is also the reason why the husband should love his wife, and the wife should be subject to her husband (Eph 5.22–28). Second marriages are regarded with disfavor, and celibacy is praised. [See MATRIMONY.]

Widows, Orphans, and Strangers. The most unfortunate persons in the ancient world were widows and orphans, who were economically helpless without the aid of a male head of the family. But the God of Israel “executes justice for the orphan and the widow, and befriends the alien, feeding and clothing him” (Dt 10.18). Like the OT, the NT also inculcates charity to those unfortunate creatures: “Religion pure and undefiled before God the Father is this: to give aid to orphans and widows in their tribulation, and to keep oneself unspotted from this world” (Jas 1.27). [See WIDOW (IN THE BIBLE).] Charity must be shown also to the resident alien (Heb. gēr), who, without landed property, would find it hard to earn a livelihood: “When an alien resides with you in your land, do not molest him. You shall treat the alien who resides with you no differently than the natives born among you; have the same love for him as for yourself; for you too were once aliens in the land of Egypt” (Lv 19.33–34). The NT abolishes the religious distinction based on race or nationality: “You know it is not permissible for a Jew to associate with a foreigner or to visit him; but God has shown me that I should not call any man common or unclean” (words of Peter regarding his visit to the Gentile Cornelius in Acts 10.28).

Wealth. All wealth comes from the divine Creator and is to be used according to His will, that is, for the benefit of all men. In keeping with the OT ideal, there would be no poverty: “There should be no one of you in need” (Dt 15.4). Should an Israelite be in need, his fellow Israelites were commanded to help him, at least by giving him an interest-free loan of “enough to meet his need” (Dt 15.7). A sharing of the goods given by the heavenly Father is demanded by the sense of solidarity among His children on earth. Realistically aware that there will always be some poor people (Mt 26.11), the Law ordains: “The needy will never be lacking in your land; that is why I command you to open your hand to your poor and needy kinsman in your country” (Dt 15.11). Avarice is condemned. Ownership, particularly of farm land, is relative, provisional; it is more an occupancy than a possessing. Yahweh says to Israel: “The land is mine, and you are but aliens who have become my tenants” (Lv 25.23). If landed property is sold, it must be restored to the original owner in the JUBILEE YEAR (Lv 25.13–17). The purpose of this law is to prevent the accumulation of vast estates in the hands of a few people (Is 5.8) and to permit the economic recovery of impoverished families.

“Woe to you rich!” (Lk 6.24); for “it is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven” (Mt 19.24). These are the words of Jesus, who calls the poor blessed (Lk 6.20), the poor in spirit (Mt 5.3), whose hearts are detached from the MAMMON of iniquity (Mt 6.24; Lk 16.9, 11, 13), “for a man’s life does not consist in the abundance of his possessions” (Lk 12.13). Jesus wishes the goods of this world to circulate for the benefit of all. Without material poverty there is no spiritual perfection: “If thou wilt be perfect, go, sell what thou hast and give to the poor, and thou will have treasure in heaven” (Mt 19.21). He who has more than enough should give to him who is in need, “that there should be equality” (2 Cor 8.13–14).

The Christian social order is born from a union of faith and good works, founded on the principle of the Incarnation of the God-Man, Jesus Christ. The LORD’S PRAYER associates our Father in heaven with our bread on earth (Mt 6.9–11). The Church, following the example of Jesus, is concerned with the corporal and temporal as well as the spiritual and eternal. The importance of material food is shown in the institution of the first seven DEACONS, who serve at table before they preach the Gospel (Acts 6.1–7).

Labor. God has prescribed work for man, to subdue the earth and to have dominion over the animals (Gn 1.28). Labor, which is natural for man, has become burdensome for him as a punishment for sin (Gn 3.17–19). Since work is the God-ordained means of man’s subsistence, man has both the duty and the right to work. If a man works for another, he has a right to a just wage: “The laborer deserves his wages” (Lk 10.17; 1 Tm 5.18). The prophets inveigh against “those who defraud the hired man of his wages” (Mal 3.5; Jer 22.13; Lv 19.13; Jas 5.4). Of all work, farming is the best: “Hate not laborious tasks, nor farming, which was ordained by the Most High” (Sir 7.15). The wisdom literature has many warnings against sloth (Prv 6.6–11; 13.4; 19.15; 20.4; Eccl 10.18; Sir 22.1–2). Labor, however, is mitigated by the SABBATH rest, which, with its freedom from work every seven days, refreshes both the body and the soul of man. The blessings of the Sabbath are to be shared in by the slaves, the strangers, and even the domestic animals.

The NT presents its greatest figures as laborers—Joseph, Jesus, and the Apostles. St. Paul echoes the OT refrain against laziness: “If any man will not work, neither let him eat” (2 Thes 3.10). “He who was wont to steal, let him steal no longer; but rather let him labor, working with his hands at what is good, that he may have something to share with him who suffers need” (Eph 4.28).

Slavery. The ancient Israelites used slave labor, as did the rest of the ancient world; but their slaves were mostly foreigners who had been captured in war or foreigners bought from other lands (Lv 25.44–46). Sirach takes a realistic view of the hardship of a slave’s life: “Food, correction, and work for a slave. Make a slave work, and he will look for his rest; let his hands be idle, and he will seek to be free. Force him to work that he be not idle, for idleness is an apt teacher of mischief. Put him to work, for that is what befits him; if he becomes unruly, load him with chains. But never lord it over any human being, and do nothing unjust” (Sir 33.27–30). The humane attitude of Israel toward slaves is seen in the fact that asylum was given to fugitive slaves: “You shall not hand over to his master a slave that has taken refuge with you. Let him live with you wherever he chooses, in any one of your communities that pleases him. Do not molest him” (Dt 23.16–17).

Slavery of an Israelite to a fellow Israelite was limited by the Law, which considered this an abuse: “If your kinsman, a Hebrew man or woman, sells himself to you, he is to serve you for six years, but in the seventh year you shall dismiss him from your service, a free man. When you do so, you shall send him away empty-handed” (Dt 15.12–13). Only if a Hebrew slave freely requests to remain a slave may his master keep him indefinitely (Dt 15.16–18). If an Israelite is forced by poverty to sell himself into slavery to a foreigner, his fellow countrymen are urged to redeem him (Lv 25.47–55).

In the NT also the institution of slavery is taken for granted. But the teachings of the NT contain the seed that ultimately grew into the abolition of slavery in Christendom. Paul sends back Onesimus, a fugitive slave, to his Christian master; but he urges the latter to receive him back, not as a slave, but as a “brother” in Christ (Phlm). In the urgency of the forthcoming return of Christ, it matters little if one is a freeman or a slave (1 Cor 7.17–21). Among those who have been baptized into Christ “there is neither slave nor freeman” (Gal 3.28; Col 3.11), for a baptized slave is “a freeman of the Lord,” and a baptized freeman is “a slave of Christ” (1 Cor 7.22). On the relationship among Christians between a slave and his master, see Eph 6.5–9 and Col 3.22–4.1. [See SLAVERY (IN THE BIBLE).]

Loans. Among the ancient Israelites, as among all other peoples, loans were taken for granted. It was mostly poor farmers, impoverished after a bad season, who were forced to take out loans. If they could not repay the debt, they had to sell themselves as slaves to the creditors. The Mosaic Law had various provisions for alleviating this unfortunate situation. A Hebrew slave could regain his freedom after six years of service (Dt 15.12); every Sabbath year all loans were cancelled (Dt 15.1–2). Although interest could be demanded on a loan to a foreigner, no interest could be asked on a loan to a fellow Israelite (Dt 23.20–21), since an Israelite would ordinarily not take out a loan unless forced by necessity. The taking of a pledge for a debt was limited: a mantle thus taken had to be returned before sunset, since it was used also as a blanket (Dt 24.12); a hand mill could not be thus taken at all, since it was needed for daily bread (Dt 24.6). [See PLEDGE (IN THE BIBLE).]

In the NT, which is not concerned with commercial loans, the giving of a loan to one in need is regarded as an act of charity: “Do good and lend, not hoping for any return, and your reward shall be great, and you shall be children of the Most High, for he is kind toward the ungrateful and evil” (Lk 6.35).

Jesus Christ and the Apostles sum up the social thought of the messianic expectations in their teaching, which they first practice themselves, of love for all without distinction, of justice and peace, and of economic solidarity on the basis of communion that meets every need of body and soul. They affirm the dignity of the human person, whether master or slave, rich or poor, man or woman. They condemn the deprivation of freedom and the exploitation of human beings. They make the prime function of authority the service of mankind, and they put all things and all men in dependence on God. Social relationships are simplified by equating man with Christ, as quaintly stated in one of the Logia Jesu: “See your brother, see the Lord.”

Bibliography: R. H. KENNETT, Ancient Hebrew Social Life as Indicated in Law, Narrative and Metaphor (London 1933). J. W. GASPAR, Social Ideas in the Wisdom Literature of the Old Testament (Washington 1947). R. G. NORTH, Sociology of the Biblical Jubilee (Rome 1954), bibliog. ix–xlvi. I. GIORDANI, Il messaggio sociale del cristianesimo (Rome 1963).

[I. GIORDANI]

3. Patristic and Medieval

Christian thinkers of the patristic and medieval periods developed no comprehensive and autonomous systems of social thought, but they did produce an extensive and often perceptive social commentary. Their thought, in the main, proceeded along two lines: (1) the examination of social institutions in the light of the Christian comprehension of the nature of man and his destiny; (2) the examination of social practices in the light of Christian ethical standards.

The Patristic Age (c. 200–600). In background and education, the FATHERS OF THE CHURCH were closely associated with the aristocracy of ancient society, the curial or senatorial class of substantial landowners. Steeped in the same literature, even educated in the same schools as their pagan counterparts, the Fathers accepted without question established social institutions. They further believed that the promise of Christianity was in personal reform, not social reform, and this reinforced the conservative bent of their thought. But the Fathers still faced the problem of reconciling the authority of the state, the existence of private property, and resultant social inequality with the fundamental Christian assumption that all men are equally the children of God and heirs of His kingdom.

Authority of the State. ARISTOTLE had maintained that man was by nature a political animal, and this naturalistic interpretation of the STATE was repeated by LACTANTIUS (Divinarum Institutionum Libri VII 6.8, following Cicero; 6.10) and even by St. AUGUSTINE (De civitate Dei 19.12; Bon. coniug. 1). But the more favored patristic opinion—from the Epicureans, repeated by Lactantius, AMBROSE, Augustine, GREGORY I (the Great), and ISIDORE OF SEVILLE among others—was that the state was not natural. It was rather the product of a SOCIAL CONTRACT or convention among men for the repression of evil. The state became necessary when men, through ORIGINAL SIN, lost their pristine innocence and became prone to evil; it was itself an evil, but a necessary one. St. Paul, however, had laid the basis for a more positive interpretation of authority (Rom 13.1–7). The king was the minister of God appointed as a correction for sin, a remedium peccati. In the 4th century, EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA, in his Panegyric on Constantine, declared that the emperor was not alone God's steward but His earthly counterpart, providentially appointed to the sacred functions of ruling His people, protecting His Church, and promoting the salvation of souls. This exalted interpretation paralleled Hellenistic ideas on the sacred character of kingship and struck deep roots in the Eastern Empire, where it served as one of the foundations of Byzantine CAESAROPAPISM.

The most original and influential patristic interpretation of authority was undoubtedly Augustine's profound exploration of the societal implications of the Christian dogma of GRACE. Augustine maintained that grace not only sanctified the individual but introduced him into a new spiritual fellowship, the City of God. With his acute sense of psychology, Augustine discerned the basis of all societies in a union or harmony of wills (De civitate Dei 19.24). The City of God was composed of those who, through grace, loved God more than themselves. Its counterpart was the Earthly City, made up of those who loved themselves more than God.

Augustine's political dualism dominated all subsequent discussion of authority during the Middle Ages. His own attitude toward secular power was, however, ambivalent. The coercive authority of the state resulted from evil, but in the City of God Augustine urged the good Christian to be subordinated to it, even to pray for its welfare, in order to make use of its peace. On the other hand, in his tracts against the Donatists, Augustine maintained that the state should help the Church in the repression of heresy and therefore be subservient to its interests. This ambiguity meant that Augustinian principles could be used to support quite different attitudes toward authority during the Middle Ages.

Property. In regard to private PROPERTY, the common opinion of the Fathers, expressed by Ambrose (De off. 1.28; De Nabuthae 1, 2; Exp. ev. sec. Luc. 7.124), Lactantius (Divinarum Institutionum Libri VII 5.5, 5.6), and Augustine (In evang. Ioh. 6.25) was that this too, like the state, was not natural to men but resulted from sin. The Fathers were, however, in no sense communists, nor did they consider a community of possessions a practical arrangement for fallen men. Lactantius (Divinarum Institutionum Libri VII 3.21), Ambrose (Epist. 63, 92), Augustine (C. acad. 20.2), and HILARY OF POITIERS (Com. in ev. Matt. 19.9) all expressly recognized the right of private ownership. The Fathers, however, constantly warned of the dangers of avarice and taught that the rich had a positive duty to relieve through alms the sufferings of the poor. [See ALMS AND ALMSGIVING (IN THE CHURCH).]

Slavery. Concerning slavery, Augustine expressed the characteristic patristic opinion when he declared (De civitate Dei 19.15) that, although it was contrary to nature, it was a punishment for sin that had to be accepted accordingly. [See SLAVERY (AND THE CHURCH).]

Commerce. Concerning commercial activities, the Fathers expressed fear at the temptations to avarice and deceit associated with them and forbade clerics to participate in them, but they never denied to merchants the possibility of salvation. Breaking with the tradition of Roman law that permitted USURY, or profit on a loan, Fathers such as Augustine, Ambrose, JEROME and LEO I (THE GREAT) condemned it as contrary to biblical commands. In more general terms, Ambrose (De off. 3.6, 3.9) argued that no commercial profit could be made at public injury. But the Fathers on the whole paid slight attention to commercial transactions, and their statements did not go much beyond large and often vague exhortations to justice.

Significance of Patristic Social Thought. The historical importance of patristic social thought is difficult to evaluate. Interested in personal reform rather than social reform, the Fathers promoted such social virtues as frugality, diligence, self-restraint, self-discipline, and fairness. Undoubtedly too, in praising manumission as a virtuous act, in proclaiming the human dignity of slaves and the social dignity of the labor they performed, the Fathers facilitated the transition to the peasant economy of the Middle Ages, based, in a way the ancient economy had never been, upon willing labor. The Fathers confirmed the solidarity of the family; the position of woman in later epochs—a subordinate but honorable one—owed much to their influence. Intellectually, they transmitted to the Middle Ages many of the seminal social ideas of pagan antiquity. But they contributed almost nothing to the methods of social analysis, since their thought was confined to speculation concerning the religious purposes of social institutions and they had no interest in empirical approaches. They did, however, advance the proposition that a society's institutions ought to be considered and judged not by the interests of an aristocracy but by the JUSTICE imparted to all its members. This has remained a lasting ideal within the tradition of Christian and Western social thought.

The Middle Ages (c. 600–1500). Appreciation of the social thought of the MIDDLE AGES has often been obstructed by persistent misconceptions concerning it. One such misconception is that medieval social thought was monolithic and unchanging, devoted to the defense of a land-based and rigidly stratified feudal society dominated and regulated in all particulars by an omniscient Church. Another is that medieval thinkers were unalterably opposed to a free economy, to economic individualism, and to the commercial, capitalistic activities associated with it.

The truth is more complex. Medieval social thought changed greatly, as medieval society and the position of the scholar within it themselves changed. Up to the 11th century, the medieval economy remained overwhelmingly agrarian (see FEUDALISM), and intellectual activity was carried on largely within the disciplined and ascetic milieu of the monasteries. The few writers who commented upon social institutions—JONAS OF ORLÉANS, SMARAGDUS OF SAINT-MIHIEL, Sedulius Scotus, and HINCMAR OF REIMS among the more important—did little more than repeat patristic commonplaces.

From the 11th century, however, the equilibrium of the medieval economy and society was shaken by many forces: population growth, geographic and commercial expansion, the rise of towns and the extension of capitalistic techniques, the growth of effective administrative institutions in both church and state. These dynamic conditions confronted medieval thinkers with social and political problems that the Fathers had scarcely anticipated. The thinkers themselves changed. Supported by the new universities, aided by a new familiarity with ancient philosophy and law, they became full-time, professional scholars, constituting a true intelligentsia, confident in and committed to systematic rational analysis.

Church and State. These thinkers greatly developed the social ideas of the Fathers. The INVESTITURE STRUGGLE in the late 11th century and subsequent conflicts between church and empire inspired an abundant polemical literature and energetic efforts to analyze the nature of power (see CHURCH AND STATE). The imperial supporters explored at length the patristic idea that the emperor was directly God's minister; and the papalists, including GREGORY VII himself, responded that the state was the result of sin and should be subject to higher spiritual authority. The hierocratic theme later achieved its most forceful expression in the works of the papal publicists GILES OF ROME (d. 1316) and AUGUSTINE (TRIUMPHUS) OF ANCONA (d. 1328). They claimed for the pope a plenitude of power; all authority and even all property upon earth belonged to him. Their systems exemplified admirable philosophical and juridical reasoning, paradoxically advanced at a time when the reality of papal power was already declining. Paradoxically too, in their analysis of absolute power, they rank among the apostles of the modern idea of monistic and unlimited SOVEREIGNTY, although the secular state, not the papacy, was to benefit from it.

Theory of the State. Besides enlarging upon patristic ideas, medieval social thought also changed in its fundamental assumptions and even in its methods. In his Policraticus (finished in 1159), JOHN OF SALISBURY mentioned the spiritual purposes of society but concentrated his attention upon how the political community was actually constituted and how its parts were interdependent. He likened the body politic to the body physical, and advised princes and statesmen how to assure its proper coordination. John thus revealed a new social consciousness and even preached a new social responsibility, manifest particularly in his famous proposition that the good citizen had the right, even the duty, to assassinate a tyrant.

To this growing interest in the natural foundations and structure of the state, the Politics of Aristotle, available in western Europe by the 2d decade of the 13th century, made two fundamental contributions: (1) it presented for the first time to medieval thinkers a mature and intellectually compelling naturalistic theory of the state; (2) it introduced a strong element of empiricism into medieval social thought. Aristotelian naturalism directly challenged the Augustinian assumptions of earlier social theory. What, if anything, did a state established by nature owe to the Church, which existed through grace? This problem occupied the greatest scholastic thinkers of the 13th century, St. ALBERT THE GREAT and St. THOMAS AQUINAS. St. Thomas conceded that the state was natural and autonomous, but held that its sovereignty was limited by NATURAL LAW and, in religious matters, by ecclesiastical authority. Thomistic political and social thought, which must be reconstructed from numerous scattered passages, is perhaps too intricate and in points even obscure. But Thomas's full acceptance of the autonomy and dignity of the natural order has remained a premise of modern Catholic social thought, and Thomas himself serves as a model of openness to new ideas, of moderation, balance, and prudential wisdom.

The opponents of papal theocracy also made use of Aristotelian principles. Prominent among them were JOHN (QUIDORT) OF PARIS, who in 1302 wrote the Treatise on Royal and Papal Power, and the more radical WILLIAM OF OCKHAM and MARSILIUS OF PADUA. The latter's Defensor Pacis (1324) ranks as one of the most original of medieval political tracts. Marsilius was less interested in the purpose of power than in its origin and nature. He maintained that it derived from the people, and his theory is the most rigorous expression of medieval populism. The authority of the people, or of their "greater and healthier part," was limited neither by natural law, which the people themselves created, nor by ecclesiastical authority, to which Marsilius denied any substance. Marsilius, along with his great opponents, the papal hierocrats, was a pioneer of modern conceptions of sovereignty as monistic, absolute, and unlimited.

Property. In regard to property and economic matters, medieval social thought both developed patristic ideas and struck out in entirely new directions. The patristic notion of a state of communism before the Fall figured in many heretical and social-revolutionary movements in the later Middle Ages [CATHARI, APOSTOLICI, Beghards (see BEGUINES AND BEGHARDS), and many others]; these groups demanded a return to the communistic regimen God had originally intended for men. But the true originality of medieval social thought was its adoption of Aristotelian naturalism and empiricism.

St. Thomas, for example, accepted the patristic notion that private property was the result of original sin (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 98.1 ad 3). But he sought also to show its practical necessity in the functioning economy: it assured peace, maintained order, provided incentive, and guaranteed proper care of belongings (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 66.2). Property had to be administered, however, not for the owner's benefit but for the good of society. The owner was similarly obligated to CHARITY, but the chief virtue to be cultivated by him was LIBERALITY. Liberality meant not so much generosity as the willingness freely and appropriately to use property in the primary interest of the common welfare.

Economic Justice. Toward commercial activities, St. Thomas still betrayed a traditional suspicion, as he discerned therein "something base" (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 77.4). But under the influence of Aristotelian naturalism and empiricism and confronting a rapidly developing and ever more complicated economy, St. Thomas and later scholastics—DUNS SCOTUS, NICHOLAS ORESME, St. BERNARDINE OF SIENA, St. ANTONINUS OF FLORENCE—undertook an ever more penetrating economic and social analysis. They sought principally to accomplish two things: (1) to find a basis in natural law for such traditional ethical teachings as the usury prohibition or the requirement of justice in pricing; (2) to define what was ethical and not ethical within the multifarious and highly complex operations of the marketplace.

The scholastics were thus drawn to examining such basic economic concepts as the nature of money and value, and the factors that determine price. Nicholas Oresme, for example, in attempting to show the injustice of monetary debasements, wrote between 1350 and 1360 the tract De moneta, which anticipated many of the ideas of the 16th-century economist Jean Bodin. Scholastic thought was also less rigid and more favorable to a free economy than is frequently asserted. The common scholastic opinion was, for example, that the just price was under normal conditions the free-market price; while maintaining the usury prohibition, the scholastics did not obstruct the development of alternate ways of channeling credit: through partnerships and companies, annuities, and bills of exchange. Scholastic thought through the later Middle Ages and into the early 17th century reveals an ever stronger empirical emphasis in its analysis and an ever more sympathetic comprehension of the activities of the marketplace.

Significance of Medieval Social Thought. The historical importance of medieval social thought is again difficult to define. Medieval thinkers wanted to establish justice in social affairs, but the extent to which they were successful is beyond assessment. On a more practical level, their early suspicions of commercial activities probably worked to channel effort and investment into agriculture rather than trade; but given the predominantly agricultural character of the early medieval economy, it would be hard to call this result unfortunate. And it would also be hard to say that the usury prohibition for long delayed the development of a capitalistic economy, so varied were the ways of circumventing it. Scholastic thought did have a clear impact on medieval economic institutions, and it strongly influenced banking practices and the economic policies of cities and states. The time has long since passed when the scholastics could be dismissed as unimportant in the history of European social thought. Scholastic social analysis forms an initial and integral chapter within the larger effort of Western man to understand, and hopefully to improve, his society and its institutions.

Bibliography: G. LE BRAS, "Conceptions of Economy and Society," Cambridge Economic History of Europe, v.3 (Cambridge, Eng. 1963) 554–575. I. GIORDANI, The Social Message of the Early Church Fathers (Paterson, NJ 1944). I. SEIPPEL, Die wirtschaftsethischen Lehren der Kirchenväter (Vienna 1907). P. H. FURFEY, A History of Social Thought (New York 1942). R. W. and A. J. CARLYLE, A History of Mediaeval Political Theory in the West, 6 v. (New York 1950). G. DE LAGARDE, La Naissance de l'esprit laïque au déclin du moyen âge, 5 v. (Louvain 1956–63). J. A. SCHUMPETER, History of Economic Analysis, ed. E. B. SCHUMPETER

(New York 1954). J. W. BALDWIN, The Medieval Theories of the Just Price (Philadelphia 1959). R. DE ROOVER, "The Concept of the Just Price: A Theory of Economic Policy," Journal of Economic History 18 (1958) 418–438. J. T. NOONAN, The Scholastic Analysis of Usury (Cambridge, MA 1957). E. TROELTSCH, The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches, tr. O. WYON, 2 v. (New York 1931). B. JARRETT, Social Theories of the Middle Ages, 1200–1500 (Westminster, MD 1942). G. A. O'BRIEN, An Essay on Mediaeval Economic Teaching (New York 1920).

[D. J. HERLIHY]

4. Modern

Social movements, in the sense of practical programs for political and economic reform in the interest of the general welfare, are relatively modern phenomena. They were particularly characteristic of the 19th century and arose out of a heightened consciousness of the importance of society in the lives of individual men. This social consciousness was derived from the revolutions wrought by DEMOCRACY, nationalism, and industrialism. The democratic revolution, set in motion in the U.S. and France, replaced the older aristocratic political structures with a new one centered on the masses. In Germany the nationalist revolution, which came into being by way of opposition to Napoleonic dominance, influenced economics, law, and philosophy as well as politics. The industrial revolution, originating in England, substituted a system of production based on factories for the previous simple, cottage-housed, rural industry. Each of these revolutions contributed in its own way to a keener awareness of social reality and social problems. This was particularly true of the industrial revolution. Factories themselves became miniature societies; industrial cities were new and larger social groupings; and at national and international levels social interdependence was fostered by developments in banking, finance, transportation and general communications of the industrial era.

The Challenge of Freedom. Despite their different origins, immediate interests, and emphases, these revolutionary changes developed from a common philosophy. It was summed up in the one word liberty—liberty through political representation, national independence, and economic initiative. In the domain of politics the way was prepared by the writings of the 18th-century ENCYCLOPEDISTS and the philosophes, for whom individual FREEDOM was the highest human value. In the sphere of nationalism the new spirit made the 19th century an era of turmoil and rebellion. But LIBERALISM in the form of economic INDIVIDUALISM was most significant, to the extent that the basic economic outlook of the 19th century was termed laissez-faire. The glorification of freedom in every realm led to many and grave abuses, particularly in economic matters. In this field the doctrine of freedom, often expressed by the phrase "every man for himself," allowed the strong to oppress the weak. In the absence of trade unions, then regarded as threatening individual freedom, capitalist manufacturers imposed miserably low wage rates on employees. In like manner, with the state standing by and refraining from interference, exceptionally bad working and living conditions became the order of the day. In short, what began to be called the proletariat, that is, the propertyless, wage-earning class, was reduced to a state little better than slavery. Paradoxically, the 19th century, despite its insistence upon liberty for all men and all nations, produced at first a new bondage for the working man.

Catholic Traditionalism. One of the most striking things about this development is that the Christian churches, at least officially, made virtually no attempt to stem the evil effects of early industrialism. As far as Protestantism was concerned, the opposite was the case. Those countries in which industrial capitalism made its first headway were precisely the Protestant countries and regions of Europe. So much so that Max WEBER, R. H. Tawney, and others have advanced the thesis that the Protestant ethic, particularly in its Calvinist form, was an important impetus to the growth of industrial capitalism. Although it is true that an earlier form of commercial capitalism had developed in the 14th and 15th centuries, insofar as it was related to religion it was a reflection of Europe's waning faith and indifference to the Church's condemnation of usury; it was not something that received support from official Catholic teaching. The case of industrial capitalism vis-à-vis Puritan Protestantism was quite different; for material success was linked with the possession of virtue and the promise of salvation, and vice with general fecklessness and moral evil. Many Christian statesmen and economists felt that it would be flaunting Providence to attempt to change the situation in the name of social reform.

For decades the Catholic Church also remained inactive, with near-disastrous consequences. In retrospect, it seems clear that the Church should have developed a body of social thought and a program of social reform much earlier than it did. There were extenuating factors that explain, although they do not justify, this failure. In particular, the European Church was intensely preoccupied with the problems raised by the democratic revolution. Indeed, her fear of its consequences as manifested in the ATHEISM and RATIONALISM of the FRENCH REVOLUTION, the seizure of Church lands, and the imposition of the CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY became almost a Catholic obsession. Although alleviated for a time by the Napoleonic Concordat, the reaction was prolonged by Napoleon's annexation of the States of the Church, concern for which later occupied the attention of the pa-pace during the period of the Italian RISORGIMENTO. The intensity of the reaction was manifest in the Church's rejection of Félicité Robert de LAMMENAIS (1782–1854) and the Liberal Catholics, whose interests, though predominantly political, included some attention to social reform. In England, the leading industrial country, where the evils of liberal capitalism were most in evidence, the Church was especially weak. In 1800 there were only about 60,000 Catholics in the country. By 1850 the number had risen to about a million, but both the leaders of the Church and the faithful were without much social or political influence. Moreover, both in England and on the Continent, there was a Catholic traditionalist conservatism that resisted awareness of the need for radical social reform. An aspect of this attitude was displayed by CHATEAUBRIAND, who extolled the glories of a past age in his Genius of Christianity when he should have been leading Catholics to face contemporary problems.

Growth of Secularism. The outcome was a lamentable division of European men into two blocks of opinion, two closed and mutually exclusive compartments, the Christian and the secular. Of course the growth of SECULARISM is not to be attributed entirely to the failure of organized religion to come to grips with the social injustice of the period. The apathy of the churches was indeed an important contributing factor, but the rise of atheism and disbelief was influenced directly by other factors, such as the rationalism and freethinking of the Aufklärung (Enlightenment). The social situation was nevertheless a cause, and an important one. This being the case, it is not at all surprising that the first formal movements for social reform came from secular sources and, as a result, had an irreligious and even antireligious character. Their object—to achieve the equality that was intended to go hand in hand with liberty—was conceived in a variety of ways by diverse thinkers; but it is generally covered by the term socialism, one wing of which was moderate and democratic in its aims, whereas the other, communism, was very extreme.

Rise of Catholic Social Movements. Modern Catholic social thought in general began in a series of unrelated and sporadic efforts rather than as the official program of a full-fledged movement. In France it had its beginnings in opposition to the Young Socialists after the abortive revolution of 1830. Its chief representatives were Frédéric OZANAM (1813–53), who launched a successful organization for the relief of the poor, the Society of ST. VINCENT DE PAUL; LACORDAIRE (1802–61), who preached in Notre Dame against the worst evils of capitalism; and MONTALEMBERT (1810–70), who, as member of the Chamber of Deputies, was responsible for the first French factory legislation. Together with the Workers' Circles and study circles promoted by Albert de Mun and LA TOUR DU PIN, these initiatives represented the only French Catholic social thought and activity until the last decade of the century.

In Germany similar figures appeared in opposition to the Communists after the revolution of 1848. These were Adolf KOLPING (1813–64), the journeyman worker become priest, who established a string of hostels for immigrant peasant workers in the new industrial cities; Emmanuel von KETTELER (1811–77), civil servant and bishop of Mainz, who preached sermons and wrote treatises condemning laissez-faire; and Ludwig WINDTHORST (1812–91), who, like Montalembert in France, was a member of the Reichstag and sponsored the first German factory acts.

Two defects in these developments are immediately apparent. For one thing, they originated defensively, in opposition, that is, to socialism of one kind or another. Certainly they were founded in a consciousness of the need for justice, but this consciousness was not experienced with the intensity needed for action until the socialist movement had begun to draw thousands of workmen away from the faith. Second, they sought amelioration rather than thoroughgoing reform. In general, the existence of the capitalist system with all its shortcomings was accepted and ways and means were sought to bandage the afflicted, when what was needed was a sort of preventive social medicine.

These proponents of a committed social Catholicism, however, laid the bases of the now widespread and successful Catholic social movements. They were at least a generation behind the early socialists, such as the Comte de SAINT-SIMON, Robert Owen, and Charles Fourier. Moreover, socialism was first to organize at the international level—the Socialist International was founded in 1864—whereas the Catholic social movement first became international in scope in 1885. In that year Cardinal Gaspard MERMILLOD (1824–92) founded the Fribourg Union to provide a link between the independent efforts in different countries and the development of a common body of Catholic social thought. This was progressively hammered out at meetings of the Fribourg Union and through the force of concrete example in the practical attitudes of men such as Cardinals Henry MANNING (1808–92) and James GIBBONS (1834–1921). The revival of Thomistic philosophy about 1880 led to a systematic effort in social philosophy, particularly on the part of German Jesuits such as Viktor CATHREIN (1845–1931) and Heinrich Pesch (1854–1926), whose theories of SOCIETY and the STATE were based upon applications of natural law in economic and political thought.

These developments were given status and authority in 1891 by the encyclical RENUM NOVARUM of Leo XIII, reinforced in later decades by Quadragesimo anno (1931) and the social encyclicals of Popes John XXIII, Paul VI, and John Paul II. Here, the most recent popes develop carefully nuanced positions on the themes of property and wages, trade unionism and industrial relations, the role of the state in socioeconomic affairs, international economic development, and new challenges to the advancement of the common good in society. The papal social encyclicals constitute a tradition of reflection that at once builds upon the biblical, philosophical, and theological traditions treated above and exhibits an openness to new ideas (such as the imperative to end colonialism), trends of thought (such as personalism), and empirical data (such as the end of communism and the Cold War). In so doing, these documents take up the challenge offered by the Second Vatican Council ever to take seriously “the duty of scrutinizing the signs of the times and of interpreting them in the light of the gospel” (Gaudium et spes, 4).

Contemporary Catholic social thought is not restricted, of course, to papal teachings and magisterial documents emanating from national episcopal conferences and regional or occasional synods of bishops. Besides these magisterial social teachings there is also a less well-defined but vitally influential body of unofficial Catholic social thought. Some of this ethical guidance is associated with the literature and social involvements of lay movements, from the predominantly European Catholic Action (encouraged especially during the pontificate of Pius XI) to the Catholic Worker Movement (active mainly in North America since the 1930s) to the base Christian communities (primarily a Latin American phenomenon) associated with liberation theology. These and many other popular movements serve as indispensable contributions to Catholic social thought, for they help form the laity and assist in organizing social action on behalf of justice in an increasingly complex and interdependent world.

Bibliography: J. NEWMAN, The Christian in Society (Baltimore 1962). D. A. O’CONNOR, Catholic Social Doctrine (Westminster, MD 1956). H. SOMERVILLE, Studies in the Catholic Social Movement (London 1933).

[J. NEWMAN/T. MASSARO]

SOCIAL THOUGHT, PAPAL

The social teaching of the Church as promulgated by the popes. This article indicates the historical background of the remarkable development of this teaching that began in the 19th century and outlines the basic concepts involved.

1. History

Direct papal involvement in the systematic, positive development of Catholic teaching on social questions is a relatively recent phenomenon, beginning with the pontificate of LEO XIII (1878–1903). It is clear, nevertheless, that the papacy has always had, at least since the patristic period, an important role in the evolution of doctrinal and disciplinary positions bearing in some degree, directly or indirectly, on society and its problems. One example can be found in its well-known role in the INVESTITURE STRUGGLE and in the determining of the relations of CHURCH and State in general. Similarly, although the concern of the early popes with marriage and the family was essentially doctrinal and disciplinary, their decisions had important social ramifications. As early as the 5th century INNOCENT I and LEO I issued decisions on divorce and remarriage that had far-reaching effects. Beginning in the 8th century, the papacy was increasingly involved in untangling the confusion surrounding cousin marriages, both for consanguineal and affinal relationships. It is difficult to determine the papacy’s exact role in the elimination of SLAVERY in the Roman Empire, in the development of Christian principles pertaining to the morality of WAR, or in the resolution of problems related to charging interest for financial loans—USURY. Yet in these and other matters, to the extent that papal approval was given to the acts of official Church councils, both general and local, it can be concluded that the popes had a significant role in the development of Christian social thought, at least in a broad sense. [See SOCIAL THOUGHT, CATHOLIC.]

Papal Conservatism in the 19th Century. The 19th century was a period of radical political, economic, and social change. After the FRENCH REVOLUTION the Church was confronted with new or changing structures. It faced many problems involving its own status in relation to the new secular governments and, as an aftermath of the industrial revolution, new social and economic problems with complex moral implications. Most serious of all was the fact that the spirit initiating the momentous social upheavals was that of RATIONALISM (and later, LIBERALISM). The tenets of these new philosophies were often diametrically opposed to traditional Catholic teaching. Throughout the first three-quarters of the century, however, there were many eminent Catholics, both clerical and lay—among them J. B. H. LACORDAIRE, C. F. R. de MONTALEMBERT, and Frédéric OZANAM in France; Bp. Emmanuel von KETTELER in Germany; Cardinal Henry Edward MANNING in England; and Cardinal Gaspard MERMILLOD in Switzerland—who clearly recognized that the new trends were irreversible and that the Church would have to go beyond its traditional teaching and even in some measure reverse its historic position vis-à-vis other social institutions.

The reactions of the popes to the changes of this period were in general negative. They fought to stem the tide and to restore the old order. Their attitude was most clearly reflected in GREGORY XVI's Mirari vos (1832), which condemned the teachings of H. F. R. de LAMMENAIS and the L'Avenir group in France, and in the QUANTA CURA (1864) and accompanying SYLLABUS OF ERRORS of PIUS IX (1846–78). The latter condemned many propositions of rationalists that had social implications, among them those pertaining to religious freedom and separation of Church and State. The papacy, shorn of its temporal power and in apparently bitter opposition to almost everything equated with enlightened progress, suffered a diminution of prestige. Indeed the prestige of the Church was at a low ebb at the time of the papal election of 1878.

Role of Leo XIII. Leo XIII made it apparent in his first encyclical, Inscrutabili (1878), that although he had no intention of compromising basic philosophical or theological principles to placate progressives, neither would he admit that the Church was an outdated institution in the modern world. On the contrary, he asserted that the Church favored true progress in all areas, as it had in the past, and that, far from impeding it, the Church would promote and support social progress in all possible ways. This became a recurrent theme in his great encyclicals and in those of his successors. They emphasized the need of society for the moral leadership of the Church, just as the Church in turn was seen to be dependent upon other social structures and institutions in every age.

It was not until ten years after his election to the papacy that Leo XIII issued his first fully developed pronouncement on one of the most controversial issues of the day, the nature of human liberty. His LIBERTAS (1888) must be considered as one of the most basic social documents of the Holy See in modern times inasmuch as it laid down the fundamental principles for papal teaching regarding marriage and the family, the nature of the state and of relations between Church and State, the rights and duties of management and labor, the right of the Church to freedom in the fulfillment of its mission, and the right of peoples to be free to determine the form of government exercising rule over them. Leo wrote in effect that, far from being opposed to human liberty in all areas, the Church supported the ideal of freedom while opposing license as a perversion of freedom.

Papal Teaching on Marriage and the Family. In some areas there have been only slight changes or developments in papal social thought. Thus, Catholic teaching has always held the family to be the basic unit of society and all modern popes have been solicitous in defense of the marriage bond and the rights of parents in the education of children. PIUS XI, in CASTI CONNUBII (1930), included a discussion of the problem of birth control, a subject not even mentioned in Leo XIII's ARCANUM (1880). Continuing attention to this problem and to the morality of rhythm (periodic abstinence) can be found in the discourses of PIUS XII. Pius XII also opened new vistas in addresses on the role of women in modern society [see WOMEN AND PAPAL TEACHING]. Paul VI's Humanae vitae (1968) not only reaffirms the Church's prohibition of artificial birth control but also treats many aspects of family life, such as the value of spousal fidelity. John Paul II's Familiaris consortio (1981) and Letter to Families (1994) advanced Catholic reflection on the relationship between the genders and underlined the importance of family life by frequently referring to the family as "domestic church."

Defense of Human Dignity. Only shortly before the appearance of Libertas Leo XIII's encyclical In plurimis (1888) had reiterated the position of the Church on the morality of slavery as it developed after the latter part of the 15th century. One of the more useful features of the encyclical was its treatment of the historical application of the Church's official teaching on the capture of African slaves, the slave trade, and the enslavement of natives in the New World. Leo pointed with obvious pride to the denunciations of these practices by PIUS II (1458–64), LEO X (1513–21), PAUL III (1534–49), URBAN VIII (1623–44), BENEDICT XIV (1740–58), and PIUS VII (1800–23). Leo's immediate successor, St. PIUS X (1903–14), found it necessary to address himself to the same problem in his Lacrimabile statu (1912).

On the broader problem of racism, the teachings of Leo XIII, Pius XI, Pius XII, and JOHN XXIII have been most explicit. In 1938 the famous condemnation by the Congregation of Seminaries and Universities of eight racist propositions, all referring to the teachings of National Socialism, summarized the official Roman attitude toward this heresy. Many of the major pronouncements of Pius XII, his SUMMI PONTIFICATUS (1939), for example, and John XXIII's MATER ET MAGISTRA (1961) and PACEM IN TERRIS (1963) also developed the Church's position on racism in the course of their consistent emphasis on world unity. In Populorum progressio (1967), Paul VI also denounced any structures, whether economic, political or social in nature, that divide the human race by race or class and thereby diminish the recognition and dignity that should be accorded to all. John Paul II has consistently used the term solidarity as a summary of the ethical principles and moral virtues that enhance the achievement of equal dignity for all humans. In Sollicitudo rei socialis (1987), John Paul II denounces "the various forms of exploitation and of economic, social, political and even religious oppression of the individual and his or her rights, discrimination of every type, especially the exceptionally odious form based on differences of race” (no. 15).

Freedom of Religion. Some modifications and clarifications of Leo’s ideas on liberty appeared in the pronouncements of later popes. One of the most important was in the area of FREEDOM OF RELIGION. Leo XIII took the position that governments could tolerate evil, false religions, for example, in the interests of the common good. Pius XII, in his Ci riesce (1953), held the coexistence of a plurality of religions on an equal basis to be not a matter solely of permissiveness but, where conditions required, a moral imperative. John XXIII in Pacem in terris (1963) removed this question from the realm of mere “tolerance” when he insisted on the right of every human being “to honor God according to the dictates of an upright conscience, and therefore the right to worship God privately and publicly” (14). After the Second Vatican Council’s Dignitatis humanae (Declaration on Religious Freedom) definitively expressed the church’s support of civil freedom in religious matters, subsequent popes have spoken eloquently of their unwavering support for the principles of religious freedom and respect for individual conscience in every social context.

Democratic Government. There has been in fact a marked progression in papal teaching on the nature and function of the STATE, particularly with regard to the acceptance of democratic forms of government. In his IMMORTALE DEI (1885) and in Libertas Leo XIII readily admitted DEMOCRACY among the many forms of government acceptable to Catholic teaching. Pius XII in his Christmas message Benignitas et humanitas (1944) remarked that people at the time were convinced that only democracy could provide protection against dictatorship and secure world peace. He proceeded to discuss the rights and responsibilities of free citizens, rulers and subjects, under a democratic regime. John XXIII strongly implied in Pacem in terris that democratic political organization should be the ultimate goal even for emerging nations. The Second Vatican Council’s Gaudium et spes (no. 31) all but endorsed democracy when it affirmed, “Praise is due to those national procedures which allow the largest possible number of citizens to participate in public affairs with genuine freedom.” Subsequently, Popes Paul VI and John Paul II have viewed democracy in a positive light, although have stopped short of providing an uncritical endorsement of all features of modern democratic societies. For example, in nos. 46–49 of his 1991 encyclical Centesimus annus, John Paul II intersperses his appreciation of democratic principles (“The church values the democratic system . . .”) with reminders of potential shortcomings of democratic societies (as when he calls upon citizens of democracies to “overcome today’s widespread individualistic mentality”).

Approach to the Social Question. Leo XIII pioneered in his RERUM NOVARUM (1891) by laying down a set of broad principles pertaining to the rights and obligations of workers, employers, and the state, in the kind of wage economy that had emerged in Europe and America after the industrial revolution. These principles, based essentially on NATURAL LAW, ran counter to the prevailing principles of economic and political liberalism. Stressing the dignity of the worker as a human being, Leo developed the rights flowing from this fact: the worker’s right not to be treated as a mere commodity in the productive process; the right of the state to intervene in private industry when necessary to protect the worker against exploitation and to ensure his or her rights to self-development; the right of the worker to a just wage because individual labor is both personal and necessary in a wage economy; the right of workers to organize for group protection; and the right and necessity of private ownership for all.

Pius XI’s QUADRAGESIMO ANNO (1931) took its place with Rerum novarum as one of the great papal social documents. It developed further the principles of Leo XIII, especially through its emphasis on the concept of the common good of society and on the responsibility of the state to promote the temporal well-being of every segment of society. The principle of intervention by public authority is balanced by another principle, that of SUBSIDIARITY. Pius XI also introduced two new concepts, those of SOCIAL JUSTICE and social charity, the implementation of which he considered essential to the reconstruction of society. He emphasized, as had Leo XIII, the substitution of the principle of cooperation for that of conflict in the relationship between management and labor. To this end he proposed the establishment of a form of industry council plan calling for the reorganization of all industries and professions along vertical rather than horizontal class lines. He also suggested as feasible the introduction of some form of partnership contract whereby workers might share in ownership or management and also in profits. Finally, he emphasized the role of the LAITY as indispensable for the restoration of social order. His successors have placed ever-increasing emphasis on the importance of the lay apostolate.

The concept of private PROPERTY received further clarification in La solennità (1941), a radio message of Pius XII. One of the most basic of human rights is that of every human being to access to whatever material goods he needs for his full development as a human being. This individual right cannot be suppressed, even by other clear and undisputed property rights. The ultimate justification of the institution of private property is to protect and promote this individual right, and it is a weighty duty of public authority to protect and implement the right.

John XXIII's contributions on economic questions were numerous and varied, not the least being his excellent historical summary and interpretation of preceding papal teaching in the first part of Mater et Magistra. He made particular contributions in two areas, namely, in his insistence that the farmer and the farm worker should share in the material and social rewards of progressively industrialized societies and in his demand that all classes in developing areas—workers, especially—should be given assistance and opportunity to share in the benefits of the more highly developed nations in accordance with the demands of the principle of subsidiarity. Pope Paul VI and John Paul II have extended their predecessors' concerns about social order by repeating calls for the equitable sharing of the world's material resources. Paul VI affirmed that the new global nature of human interdependence calls for a recognition of new social duties, such as his hope, expressed in his 1967 encyclical Populorum progressio (no. 49) "that the superfluous wealth of rich countries should be placed at the service of poor nations." John Paul II also frequently notes the increase in global economic interdependence, a fact of modern life which makes all the more relevant his 1987 reminder that "private property, in fact, is under a social mortgage, which means that it has an intrinsically social function" (Sollicitudo rei socialis, no. 42).

Popes and International Order. On the subject of war, Benedict XV bemoaned the horrors of World War I, particularly in his Ad Beatissimi (1914), as did his successor, Pius XI, in his Ubi arcano Dei (1922). Pius XII, who was very much involved in the problems of World War II, stated in 1939 that "nothing is lost by peace. Everything may be lost by war" (Un'ora grave). Again in Benignitas et humanitas he called on peoples everywhere to make war on war. John XXIII in Pacem in terris summed up his discussion of the need for worldwide disarmament by declaring that "it is hardly possible to imagine that in the atomic era war could be used as an instrument of justice" (127).

In Ubi arcano Dei, Pius XI touched on the broader question of the international community more or less in passing when he pointed to excessive nationalism, which overlooks the fact that all peoples are members of the universal human family, as a major cause of world unrest. His successor, Pius XII, was very much concerned with this problem from his first encyclical, Summi Pontificatus, in which he considered the denial of the unity and solidarity of the human race as one of the major heresies of modern times. He returned repeatedly to this subject, stressing first of all that there is a natural international community that embraces all peoples, and secondly that there is a very real need for a juridically established international organization as a sine qua non of peace in the modern world (see especially, Benignitas et humanitas and Ci riesce). The name of John XXIII will be forever identified with the quest for international unity and world peace. It was he who first saw clearly that world unity is unattainable unless there is, if not total religious unity, at least greater tolerance among religious groups of all kinds (Pacem in terris). To this end he convened Vatican Council II, to which he invited as observers representatives of all major Christian denominations. His successors picked up John's mantle as defenders of peace. Both Paul VI and John Paul II acted frequently and heroically to bring together warring parties, to defuse global conflicts and to use their good offices for the peaceful arbitration of differences. Both issued encyclicals that treated not only the proximate causes of armed conflict, but also more remote causes, such as economic underdevelopment (see Paul's Populorum progressio, nos. 76–7 and John Paul's Centesimus annus, no. 52, both of which note that "another name for peace is development"). In numerous statements released during the Persian Gulf War of 1990–91 and the several Balkan conflicts of the 1990s, John Paul II subjected to rigorous moral scrutiny the repeated appeals to the just war theory on the part of armed parties. The effect of John Paul's rejection of any facile appeal to the principles of just war was an authentic development of doctrine which renewed the early church's overwhelming presumption against the use of force and challenged modern nations to reconsider whether their option for war was genuinely a last resort motivated by the highest principles, as opposed to opportunistic ventures in national aggrandizement.

Bibliography: M. C. CARLEN, A Guide to the Encyclicals of the Roman Pontiffs from Leo XIII to the Present Day (New York 1939); Dictionary of Papal Pronouncements: Leo XIII to Pius XII, 1878–1957 (New York 1958). T. J. HARTE, Papal Social Principles: A Guide and Digest (Milwaukee 1956). L. STURZO, Church and State, tr. B. B. CARTER (New York 1939).

[T. J. HARTE/T. MASSARO]

2. Basic Concepts

The magisterium of the Church has not defined its social teaching in systematic form, once and for all. Instead, especially under Leo XIII and his successors, it has gradually enucleated this teaching from its sources in revelation and tradition, elucidating it in relation to new situations and almost always in the solution of problems emerging from social evolution. On this account, real difficulties can arise in attempts to determine which elements of the teaching are essential and which are only relative to the historical situations in which they are formulated. One possible solution is that of holding as essential only those elements that are frequently repeated and reaffirmed in varying historical situations, but an absolute value cannot be attributed to this criterion. It is more to the point to note that there has always been in the magisterium of the Church a consciousness of the need to distinguish clearly, especially in the social field, between the specific and direct object of its teachings and the motives by which it justifies these teachings. It is, for example, an essential element in the social teaching of the Church that private ownership of goods, productive goods included, is a natural right; but the motives that are cited by the pontiffs to justify the natural character of this right are not always the same—they have different values and some are mere expressions of opinion. (See ENCYCLICAL; SOCIAL THOUGHT, CATHOLIC, 1.)

It is evident that, in its general scope, the social teaching of the magisterium comprises both metaphysical and moral elements, that is, elements that explain what social reality is and elements that indicate how men ought to live in SOCIETY. When referring precisely to the social DOCTRINE of the Church and its specific content, scholars are not in unanimous agreement, although the opinion that the specific content of this doctrine is metaphysical in nature continues to gain support. In this view, the problems of doctrinal concern are such as the following. What is social reality? What are the elements that form it and the subjects that work in it? What are the fundamental principles on which it is built and that regulate the relationships of which it is composed?

It is true that the magisterium of the Church alternates metaphysical and moral teachings in one and the same document; in fact, frequently the former are developed in the latter. This characteristic approach is explained by the very mission of the Church, which is to guide men and women to the attainment of their last end, an end reached outside time, if during the earthly phase of his or her existence a person has acted justly. Since there is an intrinsic connection between being and acting, once the nature of social reality is defined, it is logical that the magisterium of the Church should deduce from it the norms according to which people, especially the faithful, are obliged to act and that it should encourage the observance of these norms.

In outlining the basic concepts of the social doctrine of the Church presented by modern popes from Leo XIII to Paul VI, this article follows, although not rigidly, the opinion of those who hold that the specific content of the Church's social doctrine is metaphysical.

Dignity of Man. A human being, in all the relationships of society, in all institutions and in all environments, can never be considered as a chattel or a mere instrument; he must instead always be considered and treated as a person [see PERSON (IN PHILOSOPHY)]. In discussing economic relationships, Leo XIII declared in the encyclical RERUM NOVARUM: “Workers are not to be treated as slaves; justice demands that the dignity of human personality be respected in them, ennobled as it has been through what we call the Christian character. . . . It is shameful and inhuman to use men as things for gain and to put no more value on them than what they are worth in muscle and energy” [Acta Sanctae Sedis 23 (1890–91) 649]. Leo's successors have repeated this principle and applied it to all sectors of society. The individual, proclaimed Pius XII in his Christmas message of 1944, “so far from being the object and, as it were, a merely passive element in the social order, is in fact, and must be and continue to be, its subject, its foundation and its end” [Benignitas et humanitas, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 37 (1945) 12]. John XXIII confirmed the same concept in PACEM IN TERRIS:

Any human society, if it is to be well-ordered and productive, must lay down as a foundation this principle: that every human being is a person; his nature is endowed with intelligence and free will. By virtue of this, he has rights and duties of his own, flowing directly and simultaneously from his very nature, which are therefore universal, inviolable and inalienable.

If we look upon the dignity of the human person in the light of divinely revealed truth, we cannot help but esteem it far more highly; for men are redeemed by the blood of Jesus Christ, they are by grace the children and friends of God and heirs of eternal glory. [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 55 (1963) 259.]

Nobility of Work as Expression of Personality. The work of human beings can never be placed on the same level as the forces of nature and therefore can never be assigned a monetary value as can merchandise. It is a free and conscious human activity, an expression of the personality of the worker. Therefore, it is always noble, even when expressed in modest forms and in economic activity. In the words of Leo XIII, “If we hearken to natural reason and to Christian philosophy, gainful occupations are not a mark of shame to man, but rather of respect, as they provide him with an honorable means of supporting life” (op. cit.).

Certainly work is a human activity, carried out according to the laws of the immediate and specific ends that it is meant to attain. If one wishes to produce economic wealth, one must know and respect the laws that govern economic activities and one must also know and respect the laws that govern the specific activity in which one intends to engage. It is true that economic laws are always the same, but each of the innumerable activities of the economic world has also laws of its own; e.g., the laws that one must respect in building houses are different from those that apply to making clothes or preparing food. But any work, whatever the nature of its specific and immediate end, is also and always an expression of the personality of the worker. In his activities he must obey the laws governing his work, but he is also obliged to obey the moral law, which is founded on God and leads to God. Pius XI developed this thought in QUADRAGESIMO ANNO:

Even though economics and moral science employs each its own principles in its own sphere, it is, nevertheless, an error to say that the economic and moral orders are so distinct from and alien to each other that the former depends in no way on the latter. Certainly the laws of economics, as they are termed, being based on the very nature of material things and on the capacities of the human body and mind, determine the limits of what productive human effort cannot, and of what it can attain in the economic field and by what means. Yet it is reason itself that clearly shows, on the basis of the individual and social nature of things and of men, the purpose which God ordained for all economic life.

But it is only the moral law which, just as it commands us to seek our supreme and last end in the whole scheme of our activity, so likewise commands us to seek directly in each kind of activity those purposes which we know that nature, or rather God the Author of nature, established for that kind of action, and in orderly relationship to subordinate such immediate purposes to our supreme and last end. If we faithfully observe this law, then it will follow that the particular purposes, both individual and social, that are sought in the economic field will fall in their proper place in the universal order of purposes, and we, in ascending through them, as it were by steps, shall attain the final end of all things, that is God, to Himself and to us, the supreme and inexhaustible Good. [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 23 (1931) 190–191.]

What is stated in this passage with respect to economic science and the moral law can be affirmed for all human activity. When there is a question of human activity in the field of art, it is carried out according to the laws of art but also governed by the moral law. The same can be said of human activity in the fields of law, politics, culture, health, or any other field.

Multiplicity of Values in Work. A multiplicity of values is implicit in every form of work. First of all there is the value of the objects sought. An economic work tends to realize an economic value, an artistic work an artistic value, a political work a political value, a scientific work a scientific value, and so on; considering work in relation to its objects the possible values to be realized are limitless. But work is carried out in harmony with the moral law, which is the law governing the worker. Since it is or should be the fulfillment of duty, work possesses a moral value.

Further, the moral law has its foundation in the relationship that exists between man and God and imposes obligations upon man in this most profound of all relationships. Therefore, work is the recognition and respect of the order established by God, an act of homage to Him, a contribution toward the fulfillment of His providential plan in history. Through work a religious value can be realized. This is worth so much more when men, united to Christ as branches to the vine (Jn 15.5), live their work as a continuation of the work of Christ Himself. As Pius XII reminded a group of Italian civil servants, “Work done with God and for God is human work transformed into the Divine. It is prayer” [Abbiamo avuto recentemente, L’Osservatore Romano 161 (May 19–20, 1952) 1]. Or, more amply,

Labor is a service of God, a gift of God, the vigor and fullness of human life, the gauge of eternal rest. Lift up your heads, and hold them up, workers. Look at the Son of God, Who, with His eternal Father, created and ordered the universe; becoming man like us, sin alone excepted, and having grown in age, He enters the great community of workers; in His work of salvation He labors, wearing out his earthly life.

It is He, the Redeemer of the world, Who by His grace, which runs through our being and our activity, elevates and ennobles every honest work, be it high or low, great or little, pleasant or tiresome, material or intellectual, giving it a meritorious and supernatural value in the sight of God, and thus gathering every form of multifarious human activity into one constant act of glorifying His Father Who is in heaven. [Ancora una quinta volta, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 36 (1944) 16]

Every human being in each instant of his work life is confronted with two alternatives that can be formulated in the question of whether personality should be sacrificed to work or be enriched by work. Many theories have been elaborated that accept the first alternative. Man’s being is identified with his work, bounded as it is by time and space. Many forces in modern civilization, which is characterized by the prevalence of scientific and technical elements, impel men toward such an identification. On the other hand, the magisterium of the Church speaks with clarity and insistence for the second alternative. Man’s work is only a moment of his existence, it is carried out for the efficacious attainment of the immediate ends that correspond to his specific nature, but at the same time it can assure his perfection and lead him to the attainment of his celestial and eternal destiny [John XXIII, Mater et Magistra, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 53 (1961) 460–463].

Just Remuneration of Work. Work is an obligation, not only because the members of the human race can perfect themselves through their work, but also because it enables them to enjoy a decent standard of living, meet their family responsibilities, and fulfill their social obligations. But if work is an obligation, it is also a right, because every duty imposed by one's conscience and by God presupposes a corresponding right in human society (Pacem in terris, loc. cit. 264). There is, therefore, an objective and intrinsic relationship between work and the means of livelihood, that is to say, the moral law assigns a specific end to work that cannot be arbitrarily misunderstood or violated; it is that of being the natural source from which a man draws his livelihood.

It follows that the remuneration of work cannot be left to the changing laws of the market, nor can wages be fixed by an arbitrary decision of those occupying high places in the economic order or by those invested with civil authority. Wages must be determined according to criteria of justice. This is a doctrinal line constantly affirmed and progressively clarified by the teachings of the Church. Leo XIII affirmed that justice demands that the remuneration of work must be sufficient to enable the worker to live with dignity:

Let it be granted then that worker and employer may enter freely into agreements and, in particular, concerning the amount of the wage; yet there is always underlying such agreements an element of natural justice, and one greater and more ancient than the free consent of contracting parties, namely, that the wage shall not be less than enough to support a worker who is thrifty and upright. If, compelled by necessity or moved by fear of a worse evil, a worker accepts a harder condition, which although against his will he must accept because the employer or contractor imposes it, he certainly submits to force, against which justice cries out in protest. [Op. cit. 662]

Pius XI taught that in determining wages it is necessary to consider, as a criterion of justice, what is sufficient for the support of the worker and his or her family, the conditions of any particular business, and the exigencies of the common good (op. cit. 200–202). Pius XII reiterated frequently the same directives, while John XXIII in Mater et Magistra included also the personal contribution of the worker to production and the exigencies of the universal common good, that is, the common good of the entire human family.

This doctrine concerning the remuneration of work finds confirmation in the actual development of the economy. A better way of life for the working classes has accompanied the progressive growth of production. The modern economy, founded on science and technical knowledge and characterized by the assembly line, tends naturally to produce goods and services in increasing quantities; that is, it gives rise to mass production. Mass production demands mass consumption, without which the whole system is disrupted, and collapse and disintegration follow. Mountains of unsold goods would destroy their producers. In turn, therefore, mass consumption depends on the purchasing power of the working classes that alone can consume the vast amount of commodities produced. The three elements mass production, mass consumption, and mass purchasing power are interdependent.

Economic development, therefore, demands social progress, and social progress promotes economic development. When the modern economy is studied objectively, the demands of justice are seen to be suggested and obtained by the inherent logic of its interior growth, rather than by any imposition from without. On this point, history has refuted the Marxist thesis of the progressively increasing distress of the working classes.

The immanent tendency of economic development, however, understood in terms of experience since the early 19th century, is realized only after a long period of fluctuation and periodic crises that have immediate and acutely negative effects on the social classes that are economically weak. In order to limit these fluctuations and their repercussions, the more politically mature communities with market economies have made more and more effort to regulate management-labor relations, above all in the medium and larger businesses, through collective bargaining and the introduction of social insurance and social security systems. After World War II, these states developed economic and social policies expressed in many forms of intervention but directed toward the same fundamental objective of insuring comparable development in the social and the economic order. This implies that the division of wealth with respect to the remuneration of labor should be carried out according to the criteria of justice mentioned above.

John Paul II and Human Labor. The most extensive papal statement on work to date is John Paul II's 1981 encyclical Laborem exercens. In marking the 90th anniversary of the first modern social encyclical Rerum novarum, John Paul offers a detailed treatise which addresses not only the conditions under which human labor proceeds, but also the overarching issue of the meaning of human work, in its subjective as well as objective dimensions.

John Paul repeats many of the concerns voiced by his predecessors: that just wages prevail, that laborers' rights to collective bargaining be respected, that workers in all sectors (agricultural as well as industrial and service workers) face favorable working conditions, and that public authorities fight the scourge of unemployment. New concerns are added to previous lists, such as the impact of work on family life in general and women in particular (no. 19), provision for the physically and mentally disabled to work according to their capacity (no. 22), and an insistence that legislators in all nations respect the rights of those who emigrate in search of work (no. 23). John Paul introduces (in nos. 16–17) a novel term, the "indirect employer," to express the new awareness of the complex interdependence of our new economic system, where many systemic factors influence the terms of employment and turn the seemingly private contract between workers and management into truly public matters which impact all members of society and reflect a wide range of social conditions. In this new environment, regional and national economic planning is not only a viable option, but truly a necessity to protect the rights of workers. Although it should not lead to excessive centralization, a carefully planned labor policy may prevent unemployment and poverty and promote the security of all families.

The most original aspect of Laborem exercens lies in the way it evokes the themes of personalism to portray the subjective dimensions of labor as supremely important, indeed as "the essential key to the whole social question" (no. 3). In order to prevent the alienation of workers from their work and to advance the achievement of social justice, we must insure against impersonal centralization "which makes the worker feel that he is just a cog in a huge machine moved from above, that he is for more reasons than one a mere production instrument rather than a true subject of work with initiative of his own" (no. 15). The right ordering of labor arrangements will recognize the priority of labor over capital and place people above the production process, so that an ethic of "being" over "having" may prevail in society. Work holds the promise to be far more than just a source of income to support the worker and his or her family; work at its best is an expression of the worker's personality, the performance of a service to others and the locus of one's contribution to the good of society.

The encyclical concludes with a section entitled "Elements for a Spirituality of Work" that seeks to link the foregoing philosophical considerations to the life of the church and its tradition. Rich connections are drawn to scriptural materials to portray Christ as the "man of work" who preached a "gospel of work" (no. 26) to encourage all humankind to become co-creators with God, participants in God's plan for the universe (no. 27). In subsequent encyclicals, John Paul II continues to emphasize the relation of work to human dignity, underlining his observation in Laborem exercens that "in the first place work is for man, and not man for work" (no. 6).

Private Property. Private ownership, even of productive goods, is a natural right, a right that belongs to man by virtue of his dignity as a person and not because of any concession by public authority. This right is man's because he is spiritual, intelligent, and free and responsible for his own livelihood and destiny; each man is responsible for the support and government of the family he decides to form and bound to contribute personally to the common good.

This doctrinal position has been constantly reaffirmed by the magisterium of the Church. Leo XIII stated, "To own goods privately . . . is a right natural to man, and to exercise this right, especially in life in society, is not only lawful, but clearly necessary" (op. cit. 651). Adverting to unjust claims of both capital and labor with respect to the distribution of goods and income, Pius XI reaffirmed "that the division of goods which results from private ownership was established by nature itself in order that created things may serve the needs of humankind in fixed and stable order" (op. cit. 196). Pius XII noted that "the right of the individual and of the family to the private ownership of property is a direct consequence of their human personality, a right due to their dignity as persons, a right to which social obligations are attached but which is not only a social function" [Mit Freuden kommen Acta Apostolicae Sedis 44 (1952) 792]. And John XXIII reiterated in Mater et Magistra that "the right of private property, including that pertaining to goods devoted to enterprises, is permanently valid. Indeed, it is rooted in the very nature of things, whereby we learn that individual men are prior to civil society, and hence, that civil society is to be directed toward man as its end" (loc. cit. 427).

Individual Functions. The motives that the magisterium of the Church usually cites to justify the natural character of the right of private ownership of goods, productive goods included, apply to individuals, to the family, and to society. From the point of view of the individual, the right of private ownership is based on the fact that the individual is prior to society. This priority is derived from the individual's existence, his work, and the hierarchical relationship between his final end and the end of society. Private ownership of property is a necessity of the spiritual nature of man "under the eternal law, and under the power of God most wisely ruling all things" (Leo XIII, op. cit. 643). The same right finds its principal source and constant support in the fruitfulness of labor; it is also a stimulus to the exercise of responsibility in all fields of society, and it is a defense and guarantee of the fundamental expression of human liberty. In Mater et Magistra John XXIII observed that “experience and history testify that where political regimes do not allow to private individuals the possession also of productive goods, the exercise of human liberty is violated or completely destroyed in matters of primary importance. Thus it becomes clear that in the right of property, the exercise of liberty finds both a safeguard and a stimulus” (loc. cit. 427).

Familial Functions. In the familial order, private ownership is considered an element of stability, serenity, and efficiency in the pursuit of the ends proper to the family unit. Possessing a patrimony, even a modest one, the individual can face with fewer preoccupations the responsibility inherent in the creation of a new family; disastrous and painful separations of husband and wife, parents and children are less frequent; children are better nourished, better educated, and more fittingly prepared to face life. The argument is found in Rerum novarum that the “right of ownership . . . bestowed on individual persons by nature, must be assigned to man in his capacity as head of a family. Nay, rather, this right is all the stronger, since the human person in family life embraces much more” (loc. cit. 645–646.) Pius XII, in a happy expression, called private ownership the “vital space” of the family: “If today the concept and the creation of vital spaces is at the center of social and political aims, should not one, before all else, think of the vital space of the family and free it of the fetters of conditions which do not permit even to formulate the idea of a homestead of one’s own?” (La solennita, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 33 (1941) 224).

Societal Functions. In the society in general, the social function of private ownership has a double aspect, constitutive and operative. The first follows from the fact that the resources of nature and the economic world are preordained by Providence to provide for the dignified support of the human family. However, this end can be reached only if there is a lasting and fruitful order in social relationships, an order that includes as one element the institution of private ownership of goods, productive goods included. This is recalled in Quadragesimo anno as the traditional teaching on the twofold aspect of ownership: “Nature, rather the Creator Himself, has given man the right of private ownership, not only that individuals may be able to provide for themselves and their families but also that the goods which the Creator destined for the entire family of mankind may through this institution truly serve this purpose. All this can be achieved in no wise except through the maintenance of a certain and definite order” (loc. cit. 191–192; see also St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 66.2 ad 7).

The second aspect flows necessarily from the first. It is found in the truth that while one pursues his own interests in the exercise of this right he contributes also to the common good; the goods he owns can also be used for the needy and for the accomplishment of noble works without compromising the owner’s way of life and his economic and social position (Mater et Magistra, loc. cit. 430–431). In consideration of the relationship between private ownership and concrete possibilities for the integral development of human beings; between private ownership and stability, serenity, and family preferences; between property and an orderly and fruitful progress in society; the magisterium of the Church constantly engages in various efforts to ensure the proper division of goods. As John XXIII maintained, “It is not enough, then, to assert that man has from nature the right of privately possessing goods as his own, including those of productive character, unless at the same time, a continuing effort is made to spread the use of this right through all ranks of the citizenry” (ibid. 428).

Not only individuals and their respective families but other organized groups, intermediate associations, and public agencies, whether administrative or political, can also lawfully own private property, even productive property; and they can be owners insofar as it is necessary for the effective attainment of their specific goals and the common good. Mater et Magistra, in a passage noting that the doctrine of private property obviously “does not preclude ownership of goods pertaining to production of wealth by states and public agencies” (ibid. 429), cites Quadragesimo anno to the effect that this is true especially “if these carry with them power too great to be left in private hands, without injury to the community at large” (loc. cit. 214).

Without ever disputing the validity of the basic principle of private property, recent popes have insisted upon the advisability in certain circumstances of exceptions to a regime of what is sometimes termed “possessive individualism.” The right to private ownership of property is not an absolute and unconditional right that may disregard the urgent needs of others and numerous concerns for the common good. The popes of the late 20th century staked out several carefully nuanced positions regarding the competing values of the common good and the legitimate private ownership of productive and personal property. In nos. 51–67 of Mater et Magistra, Pope John XXIII noted how improvements in technology, transportation and communication were creating a more interdependent world. He referred to these trends as “the multiplication of social relationships,” a circumlocution which has since been generally referred to as the phenomenon of “socialization.” Because we are increasingly interdependent in our economic and social lives, the intervention of public authorities is more often necessary in order to coordinate social relations. From time to time, it becomes necessary to restrict the free exercise of property rights, such as when a government invokes the principle of eminent domain to secure land for road construction or expansion of public utilities such as energy production or distribution. At other times, vital industries that impact the welfare of all people (such as oil, electricity, and communications) are subject to regulation or even nationalization in order to provide for the common good. John XXIII and subsequent popes understand these departures from a regime of private property not as excuses for crass collectivization, but as the employment of prudent measures to insure accountability to universal well-being.

Pope Paul VI addressed a more dire instance of the need for societal restriction of property rights. During his pontificate, several nations in Latin America witnessed heated disputes over the issue of land reform. Desperately poor and landless workers were demanding the expropriation of large estates (latifundia), many of which not only contained disproportionate shares of the most fertile land, but often lay fallow while nearby campesinos faced starvation. In his 1967 encyclical Populorum progressio, Paul VI first notes the principle that “private property does not constitute for anyone an absolute and unconditional right” (no. 23) and then proceeds to apply this timeless church teaching to his contemporary situation: “If certain landed estates impede the general prosperity because they are extensive, unused or poorly used, or because they bring hardship to peoples or are detrimental to the interests of the country, the common good sometimes demands their expropriation” (no. 24). This teaching neither refutes the principle that private holdings are legitimate nor justifies a totalitarian state, but it does update the church’s understanding of the role and functions of public authorities in securing the common good. Paul VI thus reiterated the church’s recognition of the social nature and purpose of property, an aspect of Catholic social philosophy since many of the figures of the patristic era emphasized the universal destination of all material goods. John Paul II contributed a new way to express this insight when he used the phrase “social mortgage” in no. 42 of his 1987 encyclical Sollicitudo rei socialis: “The good of this earth are equally meant for all. The right to private property is valid and necessary, but it does not nullify the value of this principle. Private property, in fact, is under a social mortgage.”

Authority Essential to Moral Order. Human society is consistent with the dignity of human beings when the moral law is recognized, respected, and lived, that is, when the rights of the individual are recognized, obligations are fulfilled and, in countless forms of collaboration with others, each man acts on his own responsibility. Under such conditions, a society is based on truth, realized in justice, vivified and integrated by love, and accomplished in liberty (Pacem in terris, loc. cit. 265–266). It is indispensable that there be in this society an authority and a power to command according to right reason (ibid. 269). This authority is invested in the civil powers according to the needs of the historical situation. The right to command is required by the moral law to ensure the observance of that law in a sufficient degree so that social living can be human, dignified, and fruitful. As stated by Pius XII, “the absolute order itself of beings and purposes, which shows that man is an independent person, namely the subject of inviolable duties and rights, who is the source and end of his own social life, comprises the state also as a necessary society endowed with authority, without which it could neither exist nor live” (Benignitas, loc. cit. 15). The right to command is required by the moral law, and it follows that those who hold authority may not exercise it in violation of the moral law; should they attempt to do so, their decrees would carry no obligation and if their orders were intrinsically immoral there would be an obligation to resist rather than to obey. (See AUTHORITY, CIVIL.)

God the Foundation of the Moral Law. The moral law is a universal law, immutable and absolute; it can therefore find its basic goal and its final explanation only in the relationship between man and God—the true God, transcendent and personal, existing Truth, highest Good, supreme Justice. For this reason human authority can and must be held as a participation of the divine authority. Pius XII continues: “And since that absolute order, in the light of right reason, and in particular of the Christian faith, cannot have any other origin than in a personal God, our Creator, it follows that . . . the dignity of political authority is the dignity deriving from its sharing in the authority of God” (ibid.).

The derivation of human authority from God through the moral law, while it explains the power of the authority to oblige man in conscience, constitutes also a safeguard for the dignity of his person. In fact, obedience to public authority is not obedience to men but an act of homage to God, the provident Creator, who has decreed that men’s dealings with one another should be regulated by an order that He Himself established. Obeying God, man does not debase himself but rather is ennobled, for to serve God is to rule (Pacem in terris, loc. cit. 271).

Common Good. The common good of the political community is not identical to the sum of the individual goods of its respective citizens (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 58.7). It is characterized by its specific content, which, however, cannot be conceived in its essential aspects and still less determined in its historical elements unless man as a person is considered in relation to the totality of his material needs and spiritual necessities. The common good “embraces the sum total of those conditions of social living whereby men are enabled more fully and more readily to achieve their own perfection” (Mater et Magistra, *loc. cit.*417).

Individuals as well as intermediate groups and social enterprises are obliged to contribute to the interests of the common good, and they do contribute when they pursue their own special interests in true harmony and without damage to the common good. However, the public authority is especially obliged to guarantee the common good; in fact, the realization of the common good is the reason for the existence of this authority, and the goal toward which it must work. In modern times the public authority pursues its proper end above all when it acknowledges, respects, coordinates, and effectively and harmoniously defends the rights of the individual and when it promotes these rights contributing positively to create an atmosphere where each one may more easily carry out his duties (Pacem in terris, loc. cit. 273–274).

During recent decades the pontiffs have been identifying a new doctrinal principle regarding the attainment of the common good. They have begun to affirm more clearly the existence of an intrinsic relationship between the historical content of the common good, on one hand, and the juridical structure and operation of the public authority, on the other. Since authority is required to effect the common good, the moral law demands that this authority should be efficient for the attainment of this goal. In this matter Pius XII observed that according to reason political communities must be built democratically: “If then, we consider the extent and nature of the sacrifices demanded of all the citizens, especially in our day when the activity of the state is so vast and decisive, the democratic form of government appears to many as a postulate of nature imposed by reason itself” (Benignitas, op. cit. 13). John XXIII, in his turn, stressed the fact that the juridical political organization of the human community, founded in a convenient division of powers corresponding to the three principal functions of the public authority, “affords protection to the citizens both in the enjoyment of rights and in the fulfillment of duties” (Pacem in terris, loc. cit. 277). As for that which concerns the universal common good, he declared that it presents problems so vast, complex, and urgent that they can be solved only by a public authority capable of operating efficiently on a world basis. From this he concluded that the moral order itself “demands that such a form of public authority be established” (ibid. 293). Both Paul VI and John Paul II continued this pattern of reflection regarding the legitimate role of government as the privileged agent of the common good, treating a range of new economic and cultural conditions which threaten to abridge the full attainment of the common good and calling upon public authorities, in cooperation with the institutions of civil society, to address these concerns and injustices.

Intermediate Associations. Human society is, by its nature, pluralistic. In the natural order there are three centers possessing universal and inviolable rights: individuals, the family, and the political community. The Church, not founded by men but established by God through Jesus Christ, is also a center of universal and inviolable rights, but as a supernatural society, founded for a supernatural end that must be reached by supernatural means. In addition, according to a doctrinal line consistently advanced by the magisterium of the Church, social life cannot develop in an orderly and fruitful manner if between individuals and their respective families, on the one hand, and the political community, on the other, there is not found a scale of organized groups or intermediate associations. The number of these groups or associations will be in proportion to the needs of a community. Whether in the economic, professional, recreational, hygienic, political, cultural, religious or other fields, they find their source in the natural law, which impels individuals and their respective families to associate themselves in order to attain ends that they could not otherwise attain. On the other hand, in relation to these ends, the action of public authority is not indispensable or even advantageous; on the contrary, its action for such ends would only be burdensome and therefore unproductive. Consequently, the autonomy of intermediate associations, which corresponds to the true ends for which they were organized, must be recognized. This implies that in the field of their specific activity they move by their own initiative and responsibility and employ suitable methods to render their actions effective. (See ASSOCIATION.)

Solidarity and Collaboration. Every human being is a person and therefore by nature social. This is proved by the fact that human beings live normal lives when they mutually assist each other; it is also true that each one succeeds in perfecting himself when with the same activity he contributes to the perfection of others. It follows that force cannot be accepted as the supreme criterion in the government of human relations, as in the liberal doctrine of free competition, the Marxist doctrine of class warfare, or the doctrine of group pressure or economic or political superiority. Social relations must be governed instead according to the principles of solidarity and mutual collaboration in truth, justice, love and freedom. Pius XI wrote:

Just as the unity of human society cannot be founded on an opposition of classes, so also the right ordering of economic life cannot be left to a free competition of forces. . . . But free competition, while justified and certainly useful provided it is kept within certain limits, clearly cannot direct economic life—a truth which the outcome of the application in practice of the tenets of this evil individualistic spirit has more than sufficiently demonstrated. Therefore, it is most necessary that economic life be again subjected to and governed by a true and effective directing principle. This function is one that the economic dictatorship which has recently displaced free competition can still less perform, since it is a headstrong power and a violent energy that, to benefit people, needs to be strongly curbed and wisely ruled. But it cannot curb and rule itself. Loftier and nobler principles—social justice and social charity—must, therefore, be sought whereby this dictatorship may be governed firmly and fully. [Op. cit. 206]

What Pius XI indicated as the criterion according to which human relationships in the economic order should be governed, John XXIII reaffirmed in application to all the relationships of human society, whatever their content, extent, or nature: “The society of men must not only be organized but must also provide them with abundant resources. This certainly requires that they recognize and fulfill their mutual rights and duties; it also requires that they collaborate together in the many enterprises that modern civilization either allows or encourages or demands” (Pacem in terris, loc. cit. 265).

Principle of Subsidiarity. Individuals, families, intermediate groups, and public authority are the units present and working in society. The problem arises: what is the principle or the criterion used to decide the sphere of action proper to each group? The magisterium of the Church usually calls this the principle of SUBSIDIARITY, according to which intermediate associations and public authority do not claim to do those things that individuals and families are able to accomplish unaided and public authority does not claim to do those things that intermediate associations can and in fact do accomplish.

This principle was first proposed in explicit form by Pius XI in Quadragesimo anno, as a principle according to which the spheres of action of individuals, organized groups or intermediate associations, and public authority in the socioeconomic field, should be decided (loc. cit. 203). While John XXIII in Mater et Magistra affirmed its validity in the same field, in the encyclical Pacem in terris he maintained that this principle must be considered valid even in delineating the spheres of action proper to the political authority of the individual political communities and those of the political authority of the world community:

Just as within each political community the relations between individuals, families, intermediate associations and public authority are governed by the principle of subsidiarity, so, too, the relations between the public authority of each political community and the public authority of the world community must be regulated by the same principle. This means that the public authority of the world community must tackle and solve problems of an economic, social, political or cultural character which are posed by the universal common good. For because of the vastness, complexity, and urgency of those problems, the public authority of the individual states are not in a position to tackle them with any hope of a positive solution. [Loc. cit. 294]

The principle of subsidiarity is proposed as a principle of action or as a criterion for the effective resolution of concrete problems; it is rooted in the nature of the relations between human beings and the society of which they are members. Human beings create or maintain a society not for the purpose of being absorbed by it, but in order to reach goals that otherwise they would not be able to reach, goals that they foster and pursue as means of affirming their own personality. This is what Pius XI held in the first formulation of the principle: “For every social activity ought of its own very nature to furnish help to the members of the body social, and never destroy and absorb them” (op. cit. 203). The same idea is advanced by John XXIII in Pacem in terris in applying the principle to the relations between individual political communities and the world community: “The public authority of the world community is not intended to limit the sphere of action of the public authority of the individual political community, much less to take its place. On the contrary, its purpose is to create, on a world basis, an environment in which the public authorities of each political community, its citizens and intermediate associations, can carry out their tasks, fulfill their duties and exercise their rights with greater security” (loc. cit. 294–295). Pope John Paul II, particularly in the 1991 encyclical Centesimus annus, has called attention to the prudent limits to centralized activities of the state, which should act in such a way as to empower private, local and voluntary associations, never to impinge on their legitimate operations or threaten their rightful autonomy and initiative (see nos. 39–51).

Unity, Growth, and Purpose of Papal Social Teaching. Like any tradition, modern papal social teaching has grown and developed over time in ways that could not have been predicted at the time of its origin. Succeeding popes have responded to new political and economic conditions and new social and cultural challenges. Although some might prefer to emphasize either the elements of change or those of continuity, an honest observer of papal social encyclicals over the past century detects both elements at work. It would be as false to claim that each pope is idiosyncratic in his social concerns as it would be to claim that a stable complex of ideas passed unchanged from papal mind to papal mind over the decades. Rather, it is perhaps best to interpret this tradition as a response to the call all Christians receive, in the words of the Second Vatican Council, to take seriously “the duty of scrutinizing the signs of the times and of interpreting them in the light of the gospel” (Gaudium et spes, 4).

The distinctive aspect of papal social thought is that it is promulgated as an authentic teaching of the Catholic Church. These reflections on the ethical meaning and implications of human life in society are proposed as genuine sources of moral guidance for all members of the church. Because they draw from deep sources of the Christian tradition such as scripture and Doctors of the Church, papal social encyclicals enjoy the presumption of authentic truth that adheres to similar magisterial statements. Yet because they so often deal with changing temporal phenomena, in those instances where prudential judgments are offered on political and economic realities, there is room for disagreement even on the part of faithful Catholics of good will. To accord to papal social teaching a different type or level of authority than any given statement on “the social question” intends would be to misconstrue its nature as some sort of blueprint for society, to be followed slavishly and without appropriate adaptation in every corner of the world.

In his 1971 apostolic letter Octogesima adveniens, Pope Paul VI offers these suggestions for the local application of papal social teachings: “In the face of such widely varying situations it is difficult for us to utter a unified message and to put forward a solution which has universal validity. Such is not our ambition, nor is it our mission. It is up to the Christian communities to analyze with objectivity the situation which is proper to their own country, to shed on it the light of the Gospel’s unalterable words and to draw principles of reflection, norms of judgment and directives for action from the social teachings of the Church” (no. 4). Similarly, Pope John Paul II in no. 41 of his 1987 social encyclical Sollicitudo rei socialis explained how the notion of the “hierarchy of truths” applies to papal social teaching. He begins by insisting that “the church does not have technical solutions to offer” regarding complex economic problems; its expertise is of the moral variety. The aspiration of popes when they address complex social issues is to see that “the church fulfills her mission to evangelize” by “proclaiming the truth about Christ, about herself and about man, applying this truth to a concrete situation.” In taking seriously the messages of papal social teaching, faithful Catholics (and indeed all people of good will) answer their call and fulfill their moral duty to discern the meaning of social justice and to act to advance the common good in our complex contemporary world.

Bibliography: J. N. MOODY and J. G. LAWLER, eds., The Challenge of Mater et Magistra (New York 1963). J. Y. CALVEZ and J. PERRIN, Église et société économique, 2 v. (Paris 1959–63), v.1 The Church and Social Justice. . . Leo XIII to Pius XII, tr. J. R. KIRWAN (Chicago 1961). J. F. CRONIN, Social Principles and Economic Life (Milwaukee 1959). L. J. DE MESQUITA, As encíclicas sociais de Joao XXIII (Rio de Janeiro 1963). E. M. GUERRY, The Social Doctrine of the Catholic Church, tr. M. HEDERMAN (New York 1961). T. J. HARTE, Papal Social Principles: A Guide and Digest (Milwaukee 1956). Instituto social Leon XIII, ed., Commentarios a la “Mater et Magistra” (Madrid 1962); Commentarios a la “Pacem in terris” (Madrid 1963). R. KOTHEN, L’Enseignement social de l’Église (Louvain 1949). D. A. O’CONNOR, Catholic Social Doctrine (Westminster, Md. 1956). P. PAVAN, L’ordine sociale (Turin 1963); Dalla Rerum novarum alla Mater et Magistra (Rome 1963). J. VILLAIN, L’Enseignement social de l’Église, 3 v. (Paris 1953–54). C. VAN GESTEL, La Doctrine sociale de l’Église (Paris 1952). E. WELTY, A Handbook of Christian Social Ethics, tr. G. KIRSTEIN, rev. J. FITZSIMONS (New York 1960–). P. BIGO, La Doctrine sociale de l’Église (Paris 1965).

[P. PAVAN/T. MASSARO]

SOCIALIZATION, RELIGIOUS

Religious socialization may be broadly described as a process that encompasses the varying dynamics of religious group membership and the patterns of commitment which such membership can engender (Roberts 1984:133–148). It is a process potentially life-long in scope, and until quite recently it was a process thought virtually inevitable in churches and traditional religious groups, as the latter could assume both ongoing commitments in an unchanged society and the gradual incorporation of individuals into the religious group, whether from birth onward (as was the case of Roman Catholics and many mainline Protestants) or from the point of a conversion experience with its strong emotional power (the case of many sects and evangelical traditions). However, as churches and other social groups have been touched by increased levels of social and institutional change (Roof and McKinney 1987), and as CULTS and newer religious groups have become prominent in American society (Chalfont, Beckley and Palmer 1987:191–220), commitment patterns have become tenuous, and religious socialization has become a subject of specific and—on the part of churches—self-conscious concern (see the discussions by Westerhoff 1974; Groome 1980; Marthaler 1980; Phillibert and O’Connor 1982; Princeton Research Center 1986).

A concern with religious socialization has also been evident in the literature of social science. Since the mid-1970s, social scientists (e.g., McGuire 1981; Roberts 1984; Chalfont, Beckley and Palmer 1987) have refocused the theoretical grounding of religious socialization and directed research efforts to the study of conversion as the illustrative case of this theoretical re-grounding. This essay addresses religious socialization from within the context of these concerns. It begins with a discussion of the “problems” of religious socialization; it then identifies key efforts on the part of researchers who have attempted to resolve these problems; and finally, it closes with an overview of selected issues which are implied by, but yet underdeveloped within, the current religious socialization literature.

“Problems” of religious socialization. In the literature of social science, there are at least two problems that have beset the study of religious socialization during the period since the mid and late 1960s. The first problem is what one might term the “absence of boundary questions,” or the absence of those questions which set limits on the object of one’s study. They include the following: First, what is religious socialization? And second, what is it not? Is it a study of the effects of a process? Or is it the study of the process itself?

These questions are, at first glance, apparently obvious, but as one reviews the early literature on religious socialization, one finds that the latter is a general topic about which much is said, but about which little is actually made clear. Merton Strommen’s (1971) extended anthology, Research on Religious Development, illustrates this point. It has 22 literature review entries grouped under the general headings of “religion and research,” “personal and religious factors in religious development,” “religion, personality and psychological health,” “dimensions of religious development,” etc., that survey the effects of several presumed “agents” of religious socialization (whether church-based or secular) in their efforts to communicate and/or transmit aspects of religion to individuals who constitute the captive audience for these attempts. There are, however, almost no entries (save that by Greeley and Gockley) that address the religious socialization process per se, or any that attempt to explain how individuals and agents together enter into and engage in the process of people “becoming religious.” Rather, one finds the assumed postulates of this process and discussions about its varying and far-reaching correlates and effects (see Fairchild and Elkind).

This point is important, for in such an approach one makes two methodological mistakes. First, one equates a study of the process with a study of (presumably) its effects. Second, one lets stand what Long and Hadden (1983:2) describe as the “core theorem of socialization,” namely, the “equation of socialization with internalization.”

Unless these errors are clearly identified, they generate a tautological framework for both the conceptualization and analysis of the religious socialization process. Further, they can preclude a clear distinction between the study of religious socialization and the study of religiosity, or the various ways in which individuals express their involvement and attachment to religious phenomena, e.g., the knowledge of specific religious teachings, the types and levels of participation individuals may have in religious organizations, their adherence to faith tenets, etc. (See Chalfont, Beckley and Palmer 1987:58–76 for an overview of recent research literature).

The first problem of religious socialization, therefore, is to establish clear boundaries concerning the object of one’s study, for without such boundaries, both the process and its effects become confused, and “theory” follows the circular logic of tautology. A second problem is the tendency of researchers to conceptualize by means of analogy, or to adopt selected general assumptions about socialization and then transfer them uncritically to the sphere of religion. This problem is related to the first, for it too identifies socialization with internalization. However, this second problem differs in that it roots the equation in assumptions that stem from functionalist (and/or social system) theory. Put differently, this second problem focuses socialization in terms of its integrating function for social systems, and as assumptions about socialization are applied to the sphere of religion, the internalization equation and its tautological outcomes are again affirmed.

By way of illustration, in the general socialization literature it is typically assumed that socialization entails the internalization of what is external to subjective consciousness (Berger and Luckmann 1966:129–163), since socialization is a life-long process “by which individuals acquire the attitudes and behaviors which are appropriate for [membership] in [their] society” (Taylor, et al. 1987:66; Clausen 1968:5–9). Further, it is assumed that this process is best studied through discipline-specific analyses (i.e., anthropological, sociological and psychological studies), since the phenomena to be internalized include cultural norms and symbols, institutionally based social roles, and those factors that shape the development of individual personality structures (Clausen 1968:18–72).

However, as DiRenzo (1977) points out, neither discipline-specific perspectives nor standard functional assumptions are helpful for understanding the actualities of socialization. Virtually all of the social sciences equate socialization with internalization, and functional approaches do no more than characterize its systemic effect, i.e., system integration. More pointedly, functional perspectives do not define socialization, or rather, when they do, they do so in terms of internalization. Thus, whether the categories of discussion are “socialization” per se (the sociological term of reference) or “culturation” and “enculturation” (the anthropological terms of reference), or lastly “personality development” and/or “maturation” (the psychological terms of reference), they are all terms that assume the transferral of externalities into human consciousness, or the equation of socialization with internalization. Thus, as this mechanism of system integration is detailed, it is done via the assumption “of a relatively simple material object [internalization] with varied formal objects [discipline specific terms of reference]” (DiRenzo 1977:265).

DiRenzo dubs this strategy a “simplistic labeling of [one’s] appropriate disciplinary heritage” (1977:264) and identifies it as the “crux” of many conceptual issues attached to contemporary socialization theory. Alternatively, the functional/discipline-specific approach is an orientation that clouds the understanding of religious socialization, as again, the socialization-internalization equation is affirmed, and a tautological framework generated.

One additional assumption from the general literature also bears mention. This assumption is the distinction between primary and secondary socialization or the idea that socialization occurs in two stages: primary socialization, which begins at birth and continues through early childhood, and secondary socialization, which is “role specific” and picks up at the close of primary socialization and continues throughout life (Berger and Luckmann 1966:163–173)

While this assumption is valid insofar as socialization does occur throughout the life cycle (Brim 1966; Dion 1985), it is not particularly helpful, at least as it presently stands, for it implies that secondary socialization is either only role-specific learning, or that learning is borne only of primary socialization experiences. In short, this two-stage approach lends itself to a deterministic or “oversocialized” (Wrong 1961) approach to human, social learning. Further, it is contradicted by the research literature on “adult socialization” and the findings of symbolic interactionists (Stryker and Statham 1985), which suggest that every experience is a socialization experience and that new learning, or learning unrelated to primary socialization, can and apparently does take place (Stryker and Statham 1985).

The second problem of religious socialization, therefore, is the tendency to theorize by analogy or the tendency to adopt general assumptions about socialization as if they could apply (without qualification) to the sphere of religion. Its main defect is its enhancement of the socialization-internalization equation and the tautological framework that this equation engenders. This problem, in conjunction with religious socialization’s lack of clear boundaries, leads inevitably to the following questions: What actually is entailed in the study of religious socialization, and how might the latter be studied?

The answers are obvious. The study of religious socialization entails the study of a process (rather than the presumption of its outcomes), and the study of this process through categories that permit a descriptive account of how individuals enter into and engage in the process of becoming religious. Further, if this is the task that constitutes the study of religious socialization, then research efforts need to be directed to a context that permits the fulfillment of these criteria.

The study of religious conversion affords the occasion to meet these criteria, and its articulation through the framework of symbolic interactionism meets to the request of describing the process of religious socialization apart from its religion specific “contents” or outcomes, i.e., expressions of religiosity. In sociological terms this is the study of religious affiliation and disaffiliation or the study of the dynamics encompassed in religious group membership and the patterns of commitment that they can engender.

Conversion and religious socialization. In the study of religious socialization, it is helpful to begin with a discussion of two seemingly disparate topics: cult recruitment and symbolic interaction theory. The literature on cult recruitment stems largely from research by John Lofland (1977) who, with Rodney Stark and others (Lofland and Stark 1977; Lofland and Skonovd 1981), has presented a seven-step description of “conversion,” or recruitment to cult membership. The model is premised upon the conditions of both psychological “tension” and “religious seekership” (i.e., an inclination to solve such problems from a religious rather than non-religious perspective), and while its particulars need not be spelled out here (see Roberts 1984:148–156), two emphases within it merit mention. First, in spite of the tension-based predisposition that characterizes it, the model indicates clearly that recruitment to new religious groups is based on extensive cult member and potential new member interaction and the gradual movement of an individual from diffuse to close-knit (new) group associations. Second, the model indicates that such movement involves a general movement away from competing groups and toward the new group as a primary reference group or context for identity.

These emphases are important, for although the Lofland model has been criticized in terms of its initial stages and the assumption of a tension-based experience that generates the process (Snow and Phillips 1980; cf. Roberts 1984:153–156), it has occasioned a re-thinking of the classical imagery attached to religious conversion. Several sources are important in this vein. First is the Hoge and Roozen (1979:48–49) discussion of “factors affecting church commitment,” which highlights the difficulty of testing deprivation-based theories in general and conversion deprivation-based theories in particular.

Second, as Snow and Machalek (1984) point out, the methodological difficulties in conversion research are only one aspect of the problem. Of equal importance is the conceptualization of conversion. It has been described generally within the literature, as either “radical personal change . . . the core of all conceptions of conversion, whether theological or social scientific” or a “change in one’s universe of discourse.” The latter is the framework that informs Snow and Machalek’s own research (1983), and for them, it suggests something that “concerns not only a change in values, beliefs, and identities, but more fundamentally and significantly . . . the displacement of one universe of discourse by another or the ascendance of a formerly peripheral universe of discourse to the status of a primary authority” (Snow and Machalek 1984:170–171).

Third is James Richardson’s (1985) survey of recent conversion research literature, which he characterizes as caught in the midst of a paradigm conflict. Although his own research on conversion is extensive (Richardson 1978; 1980; 1985), it is his 1985 discussion that proves to be most compelling. It attempts to dispel the so-called passive qualities view assumed in religious conversion, so that a more activist and interactive approach to both conversion and the activity of potential converts may be developed.

Richardson begins his discussion with a summary of the major characteristics that attach to the “old paradigm” for conversion research, i.e., the experience of Paul on the road to Damascus. These characteristics are generally well known. First, the experience of conversion is typically assumed to be sudden, dramatic, and emotional, and often, irrational in quality. Second, it is an event that is perceived as external to the recipient. Third, it is both individualized and psychologized in that it is an event thought to change one’s life completely. Fourth, this change is (in Richardson’s words) “static” and “deterministic,” as the event involves a total break with one’s past—or more particularly, the negation of one’s old self into a new self. Fifth, because this event was (and is) perceived from within the context of the one true church (i.e., Christianity), it is an event that is a “once-in-a-lifetime experience,” or an experience never to be repeated and, of ever-greater significance, never needing to be repeated. Finally, because Paul’s experience entailed an apparent change in his own belief structure, conversion was defined in cognitive terms such that “behaviors follow beliefs” and not beliefs behaviors.

It is against this type of thinking that Richardson marshals his argument for the adoption of a more activist and interactive perception of conversion, since, on the one hand, the interactive model presented initially by Lofland has had significant and expanding confirmation without reference to a tension and/or problem-solving basis (cf. literature cited by Richardson: Pilarzyk 1969; Gerlach and Hine 1979; Bromley and Shupe 1979) and, on the other hand, theoretical frameworks such as that of symbolic interaction and humanistic sociology (e.g., the sociology of knowledge) suggest an alternative context for interpreting conversion.

In particular, Richardson draws attention to the concept of alternation, as developed by Berger and Luckmann (1966) and Travisano (1970). Alternation implies a less definitive and externally directed change of identity and a more initiative and interactive role of converts with potentially new reference groups. This view is based upon Meadian social psychology (Blumer 1969; Hewitt 1983), and especially Mead’s notion of role-taking and self-other interaction as the bases of identity development.

According to Mead, individuals develop through interaction with others and in the light of mutually constructed symbols or—to borrow from Berger and Luckmann (1966:34–46)—mutually agreed upon significations of human behavior. These significations are both behavioral and linguistic, and according to Mead, they are the media through which interaction takes place. Further, they are the bases of his concept of role taking, for as both gestures and linguistic significations merge, identifiable role structures become obvious, and individuals can opt to “take on the role” of others or engage in imaginative imitation of these persons. Children engaged in “let’s pretend” play are Mead’s illustration of this point, for as children imagine themselves as others, whether doctor, “mommy” or “daddy,” they not only see these others as distinct from themselves, but they also anticipate the behavior of these others and enact it. Thus as children play, they take on the roles of others and to a greater or lesser extent, appropriate them for their own purposes.

Participation in structured games is a second illustration that Mead uses to unfold his notion of role taking, for in contrast to play (or imitative behavior), games come replete with rules, differentially structured roles, and more often than not, competition. Thus, as the child enters into a game, she or he must anticipate not only multiple role relations, but also their sequenced and potentially patterned relationships. To make the point concretely, Mead cites team play in baseball: it is interactive, it involves the capacity to “take on the role” of many others simultaneously, and it is a game that must be played in terms of rules, or behavioral norms that transcend the identities of individual players.

Mead’s concept of role taking is important, for while it acknowledges the eventual possibility of routinized or automatic role enactment, it nonetheless recognizes that role learning is a dynamic and interactionally based negotiation, or a phenomenon that involves common participation by all engaged parties. His notion of the self as a social process involving both an “I” and a “Me” further expands this point.

As already indicated, the self develops through interaction with others through the process of role taking. However, this self is not an undifferentiated stream of consciousness. Rather it is a process of engagement with others, wherein the individual is self-reflective, or able to distinguish present consciousness from past experience. Put differently, as the process called “self” develops, it does so as an “I” (the active and responsive dimension of self) in dialogue with several “Me’s” (past experience or the many composites of previous “I’s” together with society’s responses to them). Put in yet another way, the self is an ongoing process that interprets both others and the responses of others to itself. It is a process that organizes these responses internally and then knows them as recognizable realities, that is, as “Me’s”.

It is precisely these Meadian emphases on role taking and the social basis of identity that undergird Richardson’s discussion of conversion. Richardson (1985:171) notes that a symbolic interactionist perspective permits the depiction of conversion as a series of alternations within and among religious groups, or as a career-like phenomenon involving the serial and periodic construction of one’s religious-social self. More graphically, the symbolic interaction framework permits the depiction of conversion as a “conversion career” (Richardson 1980; 1984), or a series of identity adaptations grounded in the “I-Me” dialectic of role-taking vis-à-vis “old and new” religious groups. Thus for Richardson, symbolic interactionism permits a better image of conversion because it suggests that conversion involves alternation rather than the once in a life-time event of the Pauline paradigm; and it permits a more accurate description of conversion because it illumines the interaction of individuals with identity defining roles and significations in a manner that exhibits the partial control that potential converts appear to have (and retain) over their old and new religious identities. Thus it challenges the external assumptions of the traditional paradigm, with its character of sudden dramatic event, of individualized and “deterministic” qualities, and of distinctive cognitive bias. These emphases are all implicit in the symbolic interaction framework that underlies the literature cited by Richardson, and hence his advocacy of the activist rather than passive paradigm for conversion research.

Wider implications. There are three sets of wider implications that follow from this understanding of religious socialization as a process that involves the dynamics of religious group membership and the patterns of commitment that such membership can engender: those concerning the “activist” paradigm itself; those concerning important differences between cults and mainline churches; and finally, those concerning the sociology of religious commitment, about which the literature is relatively silent.

First, as regards the development of an activist or interactive paradigm for the study of conversion (and by extension religious socialization), Richardson is correct in noting that conversion research is presently in a state of paradigm conflict because active and passive images are both supported in varying degrees by past and present literature (see Rambo 1982 which contains a detailed conversion bibliography through 1981). However, the weight of the evidence seems to be in favor of Richardson’s activist paradigm. The Lofland research points to this as does the work of Snow and Machalek, who suggest that conversion studies should focus on the analysis of “rhetorical indicators” such as “biographic reconstruction, adoption of a master attribution scheme, suspension of analogical reasoning and the embracement of the convert role” (Snow and Machalek 1984:173ff.). Further, as Chalfont, Beckley and Palmer (1987:44) indicate, the current cult recruitment/conversion literature (including Richardson’s own) seems to suggest that conversion (however it is imaged) is but one type of religious socialization. In their judgment, religious socialization may involve not only “conversion,” but “a series of affiliations and disaffiliations,” or “alternations” in Richardson’s terms. Indeed, Chalfont, Beckly and Palmer take Richardson’s position as a given. This is important, for it underscores the potentially life-long and variegated character of religious socialization.

If such alternations are endemic to the life-long course of religious socialization, then it would appear that the study of religious socialization should be undertaken concomitantly with the study of religious and social change, since the unidirectional assumptions of traditional (and often tautological) frameworks have less bearing than one might imagine. If religious socialization is based instead on interactive and processually based interpretive processes, then dynamic rather than static conceptual frameworks need specification, and research needs to be directed to the interplay between organizational, confessional, and locally based reference groups, or what sociologically are church politics, historically normative frameworks (including “dogmas” and worship), and ethnic or otherwise configured parish and/or congregational memberships.

Second, although cults and churches differ significantly, e.g., the former generally access individuals who are older and frequently in marginal contexts, whereas churches frequently begin socialization in early childhood and within established class contexts, they are, nonetheless, both groups that seek to engage persons in interpretive interaction vis-à-vis their respective spheres. Thus, whether one is speaking about evangelization (a mainline analog to cult recruitment) or recruitment by membership birth, one is still addressing religious socialization vis-à-vis the “institutional,” “meaning,” and “reference group” factors (Roberts 1984:325–372) that typify church based socialization efforts and/or contexts, or the interplay of both religious and social demographics that underlie the significations attached to these spheres.

It is this latter emphasis that is underdeveloped within the literature, but the seeds of its future development are present within the notion of the activist paradigm, for change and the presence of overlapping social worlds are inherent to the paradigm. In particular, in a mobile, information based and pluralistic society, it is necessary to consider the social and demographic bases of mainline churches and denominations, and by way of specifics, their overlap with traditional and modified family and educational structures, such ascribed characteristics as age, race, and gender, achieved characteristics such as occupational and political networks (with their associated ethics and worldviews), and a host of personal psychological variables, including perceived values of success, failure, self-image, power, responsibilities to others and the like. In short, it is necessary to consider the full range of those social-organizational variables that undergird the mainline churches and their structures, for it is these latter variables that provide the warp and woof of activist and interactive spheres.

This last consideration brings us to the subject of commitment, the third of the wider implications for religious socialization, but one largely unaddressed by the cult recruitment/conversion literature, save the assumption that commitment entails conformity to group norms or acquiescence to the eventuality of routinized role behavior and their associated cognitive enclaves (Berger 1967).

In the general literature on religious socialization, the subject of commitment has largely been underdeveloped, save for isolated studies that address commitment in particular institutional frameworks, such as religiously affiliated schools (Greeley and Rossi 1966; Greeley and Gockel 1971) or institutions involving socialization to religious professions (Schoenherr and Greeley 1974; Potvin 1976). One explanation for this is that as Kanter (1968; 1972) has noted, commitment is multi-dimensional. That is to say, it involves (at least) three different dimensions, i.e., “instrumental” (or organizational) commitment, “affective” commitment (or commitment to group members), and “moral” commitment (ideational or ideological commitment). Extended theoretical work is needed, however, if the study of commitment is to be advanced, for although Kanter’s work details these three types of commitment and the mechanisms that seem to facilitate them, it is based on the study of utopian (or closed) communities and not denominational or open, voluntary associations. Rather, for an understanding of commitment in these spheres, attention must be directed (again) to the situationally specific bases of religion (viz., the variables of social organization) and their interplay with local church reference groups, large-scale church bureaucratic structures, and denominationally specific theological emphases (i.e., confessional ideations).

Finally, if the study of commitment is to be undertaken independently (but not completely apart from) the study of religiosity, it will be necessary to connect the activist paradigm to the concerns of socialization within non-religious spheres, since the carrying over of religious values—and particularly service to those in need—into spheres not formally defined as religious is still the goal of churches and traditional religious associations.

Bibliography: P. BERGER, The Sacred Canopy (New York 1967). P. BERGER and T. LUCKMANN, The Social Construction of Reality (New York 1966). H. BLUMER, Symbolic Interaction: Perspective and Method (New Jersey 1969). O. BRIM and S. WHEELER, Socialization After Childhood: Two Essays (New York 1966). D. BROMLEY and A. SHUPE, JR., “Just a Few Years in a Lifetime: A Role Theory Approach to Participation in a Religious Movement,” L. KRISBERG, ed. Research in Social Movements: Conflict and Change (Conn. 1979) 159–186. H. P. CHALFONT, et al., Religion in Contemporary Society (California 1987). J. CLAUSEN, ed. Socialization and Society (New York 1968). K. DION, “Socialization in Adulthood,” v. 2 The Handbook of Social Psychology, G. LINDZEY and E. ARONSON, eds. (New York 1985) 123–148. G. DIRENZO, “Socialization, Personality and Social Systems,” Annual Review of Sociology 3 (1977) 261–295. J. DITTES, “Beyond William James,” C. GLOCK and P. HAMMOND, eds. Beyond the Classics (New York 1978) 291–354. A. GREELEY and G. GOCKEL, “The Religious Effects of Parochial Education,” Research on Religious Development, M. STROMMEN ed. (New York 1971) 265–301. A. GREELEY and P. ROSSI, The Education of Catholic Americans (Chicago 1961). T. H. GROOME, Christian Religious Education (New York 1980). D. R. HOGE and D. ROOZEN, eds. Understanding Church Growth and Decline (New York 1979). J. HEWITT, Self and Society: A Symbolic Interactionist Social Psychology (3d ed. Boston 1983). R. M. KAN-

TER, "Commitment and Social Organization: A Study of Commitment Mechanisms in Utopian Communities," American Sociological Review 33 (1968) 499–517; Commitment and Community (Cambridge, Mass. 1972). J. LOFLAND, Doomsday Cult (enlarged edition New York 1977). J. LOFLAND and NORMAN SKONOVD, "Conversion Motifs," JScStRel 20 (1981) 373–385. J. LOFLAND and R. STARK, "Becoming a World-saver: A Theory of Conversion to a Deviant Perspective," American Sociological Review 30 (1965) 863–874. T. LONG and J. HADDEN, "Religious Conversion and the Concept of Socialization: Integrating the Brainwashing and Drift Models," JScStRel 22 (1983) 1–14. B. L. MARTHALER, "Handing on the Symbols of Faith," Chicago Studies 19 (1980) 21–33. M. MCGUIRE, Religion: The Social Context. (Belmont, Calif. 1981). P. PHILLIBERT and J. P. O'CONNOR, eds., "Adolescent Religious Socialization: A Study of Goal Priorities According to Parents and Religious Educators," RevRelRes 23 (1982) 225–316. T. PILARZYK, "Conversion and Alternation Processes in Youth Culture," Pacific Sociological Review 21 (1978) 379–406. R. POTVIN, "Role Uncertainty and Commitment Among Seminary Faculty," Sociological Analysis 37 (1976) 45–52. Princeton Research Center, Faith Development and Your Ministry (Princeton 1986). D. RAFKY, "Phenomenology and Socialization: Some Comments on the Assumptions Underlying Socialization Theory," Recent Sociology No. 5: Childhood and Socialization, H. P. DREITZEL, ed. (New York 1973) 44–64. L. RAMBO, "Current Research on Religious Conversion," Religious Studies Review 8 (1982) 147–159. K. A. ROBERTS, Religion in Sociological Perspective (Illinois 1984). W. C. ROOF, "Traditional Religion in Contemporary Society: A Theory of Local-Cosmopolitan Plausibility," American Sociological Review 41 (1976) 195–208. W. C. ROOF and W. MCKINNEY, American Mainline Religion: Its Changing Shape and Future (New Brunswick 1987). J. T. RICHARDSON, Conversion Careers (Beverly Hills 1978); "Conversion Careers," Society 17 (1984) 47–50; "Studies of Conversion: Secularization or Reenchantment?" The Sacred in Secular Age, P. HAMMOND, ed. (Berkeley 1984) 104–121; "The Active and Passive Convert: Paradigm Conflict in Conversion/Recruitment Research," Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion 24 (1985) 163–179. R. A. SCHOENHERR and A. GREELEY, "Role Commitment Processes and the American Catholic Priesthood," American Sociological Review 39 (1974) 407–426. D. A. SNOW and C. PHILLIPS, "The Lofland-Stark Conversion Model: A Critical Assessment," Social Problems (1980) 430–447. D. SNOW and R. MACHALEK, "The Convert as a Social Type," Sociological Theory, R. COLLINS, ed. (California 1983) 259–289; "The Sociology of Conversion," Annual Review of Sociology 10 (1984) 167–190. S. STRYKER and A. STATHAM, "Symbolic Interaction and Role Theory," v. 1 The Handbook of Social Psychology, G. LINDZEY and E. ARONSON, eds. (3d ed. New York 1985) 311–378. M. C. TAYLOR, et al., Introduction to Sociology (New York 1987). J. H. WESTERHOFF, Will Our Children Have Faith? (New York 1976). J. H. WESTERHOFF and G. N. KENNEDY, Generation to Generation (Philadelphia 1974). D. WRONG, "The Oversocialized Conception of Man in Modern Sociology," American Sociological Review 26 (1961) 183–193.

[M.-P. WALSH]

SOCIETAS LITURGICA

Societas Liturgica came into existence by the initiative of Wiebe Vos, a pastor of the Netherlands Reformed Church. In 1962 he had founded Studia liturgica, "an international ecumenical quarterly for liturgical research and renewal." In 1965 he convened a conference of 25 liturgists from Europe and North America at the Protestant community of Grandchamp, in Neuchâtel, Switzerland. With J. J. von Allmen in the chair, the conference discussed Christian initiation and resolved to found a Societas Liturgica, "an association for the promotion of ecumenical dialogue on worship, based on solid research, with the perspective of renewal and unity." As an ecumenical society, membership is open to all Christians who are engaged in teaching and doing research in liturgical and related studies, as well as those who make significant contributions to the liturgical life of their churches.

The foundation meeting of Societas Liturgica took place at Driebergen, Holland, from the 26th to the 29th of June, 1967. That meeting studied Vatican II's Constitution on the Liturgy and recent work on worship by the World Council of Churches' Faith and Order. Thereafter the Societas has held congresses at two-yearly intervals. The papers delivered at these congresses have been published in English in its journal Studia Liturgica.

Bibliography: E.S. BROWN, "New Faces on the Scene: Societas Liturgica," Christian Century 84 (Aug. 23, 1967) 1080–1082. D.S. HENDERSON, "First International Conference of Societas Liturgica," Studia Liturgica 6:4 (1969) 189–190. W.L. MCCLELLAND, "Societas liturgica: from Grandchamp to Montserrat, 1965–1973," Studia Liturgica 10:3–4 (1974) 77–87. T. BERGER, "The International Congresses of Societas Liturgica: A Bibliographical Survey," Studia Liturgica 19 (1989) 111–114. G. LAPOINTE, "The Societas Liturgica: Towards International Ecumenical Research in Liturgy," Ecumenism 122 (1996) 28. B. BÜRKL, "Societas Liturgica: Tracing Its Journey So Far," Studia Liturgica 27 (1997) 129–151.

[G. WAINWRIGHT]

SOCIETY

A union of individuals, particularly of human beings, among whom a specific type of order or organization exists, although not all are agreed on its formal constitutive. This article first analyzes the nature of society from the viewpoint of Catholic social philosophy and then outlines theories of society that are proposed in the science of sociology.

Philosophical Analysis

Society may be defined as the permanent union of men who are united by modes of behavior that are demanded by some common end, value, or interest. Analyzed semantically, the term denotes a union of one kind or another. Its notion differs from that of community in that community is a form of society in which men are more intimately bound by specific ends and natural forces. Society itself is not possible, however, unless based upon some common moral and legal understanding with social laws and controls to sustain it; hence some characteristics of the community are found also in society.

Nature. Guided by experience, and thus by the findings of the social sciences, the social philosopher regards it as empirically established that man can attain the full development of his nature only in association with others. Human nature therefore constitutes the ontological ground for society; it manifests this through its biological, psychological, and teleological tendencies. Biologically, man's nature is ordered to marriage and the family. Psychologically, the impulse to be a member of a social group and to be appreciated as such is characteristically human. Teleologically, man seeks both happiness and conformity with the NATURAL LAW; both of these, in turn, urge him to establish an order of social life guaranteeing freedom and common utility as conditions for the achievement of a fully human existence. In consequence, viewed ontologically, human nature needs social supplementation for its integration; again, since different potentialities are found in individual humans, human nature is capable of bringing about such supplementation. Hence man is by nature a social animal (ζῷον πολιτικόν for ARISTOTLE; ens sociale for St. THOMAS AQUINAS).

Since this is the design of the Creator, it is in human nature itself that one can recognize the will of the Creator with regard to the fundamental ordering of society. The fact that one can philosophically ascertain the will of the Creator in "the nature of things" needs emphasizing in contemporary Catholic social philosophy; while until recently there was a lack of contact with the empirical social sciences, there is currently a precipitous tendency to theologize concerning Christian social theory. It must be emphasized, too, that Catholic social doctrine does not depend simply upon ethical postulates; rather, its ethical principles are ontologically grounded in the natural law.

Unity of Society. Because MAN is a composite of body and soul, and hence a PERSON who is responsible for his own conduct, the society he forms is, unlike other unities, unified by an intrinsic principle, the self-binding will of its members. In this specific sense, society is a unity resulting from an actualized moral order (unitas ordinis). Nevertheless, society rests also on an extrinsic formative principle that adds to the note of order one of organization. The reason for this is not only that the self-binding will of its members is to some extent defective, but also that the concrete demands of society's intrinsic end are not fully recognizable by all of its members, and, furthermore, that the lasting realization of the social end from one generation to another can be secured only by organizational means, such as legal and administrative institutions.

Function of Society. The function of society is to actualize its inherent end, the common good, viz, the conditions that make a fully human existence possible for all of its members. Because the individual depends on others to bring about the end of society (principle of solidarity), the individual good is part of the common good.

Only when the common good has been established as an ontological criterion can the true functions of society be ascertained. For this reason, in line with the thought of St. Thomas Aquinas, the present exposition of society focuses on the idea of ends (ordo finium) rather than on the idea of value found in modern social theory. When the idea of ends implicit in human nature is given equal prominence with that of value, three problems that beset the philosophical and ethical theory of value become more amenable to solution. First, the connection of value with objective being becomes more readily apparent, for in modern theory the recognition of value is made a matter of feeling or of mere a priori insight. Second, the obligatory character of moral values in the personal and social sphere can be shown more easily; this follows from their being related to inherent tendencies in human nature (inclinationes naturales, in Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 94.2), whose intrinsic ends indicate the will of the Creator. Third, in this way the standards for defining the order of values and the scale of values in the life of both the individual and the community can be established. Apart from these considerations, moreover, an ontologically founded teleological order makes it apparent that man, as a member of the community, has to achieve ends or realize values on his own responsibility (principle of SUBSIDIARITY) as far as this is possible.

Instead of ends and values, one may speak of interests (e.g., general or public interests, group interests, individual interests); even in this terminology, however, the ontological idea of ends is indispensable for an objective evaluation of subjective claims based on interests.

Reality of Society. The common good is a reality over and above the good that individuals can achieve separately; consequently, in realizing the common good, society emerges as a reality of a special kind. Predicamentally this reality cannot be defined simply in terms of the disjunction between SUBSTANCE and ACCIDENT (see CATEGORIES OF BEING). Society is not a substance, but neither is it a mere ontological accident. The interpretation of the good of the individual as part of the common good of society, which had far-reaching implications for Aquinas, has been concretized by those social scientists who give equal importance to nurture and nature in forming the fully human existence of the individual as a person. They see in nurture the culture or the civilization of the society by which the individual's psychic, mental, moral, and religious predispositions are largely formed. In view of their analysis, the category of RELATION is not sufficient to describe the being of society, for it would suggest that society is a structure consisting in relations between fully developed persons, whereas man reaches the fullness of his human existence only through social interaction. This is especially true during adolescence, but it is true too in later life; as Aquinas also taught, only the completely matured person is morally permitted to leave society and to live in solitude. Society's ontological nature is also obscured when it is reduced to an "I-Thou" relationship or to a "we" relationship or to a "dialogue" form of human existence, even though such attempts contain elements of truth and may serve to illustrate man's social nature and responsibility. In Aquinas's thought, the relation ad alium singulariter is given due consideration, but emphasis is laid on the relation ad alium in communi, i.e., on the community as such (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 58.5). Other attempts are deficient in accounting for the supra-individual reality of society as this is actualized in the process of realizing the common good. It is, however, equally certain that the existence of society does depend upon the existence of man who ontologically is a substance. As a person he is also a supersocial being with supersocial ends; it is here that his rights to freedom, which are not to be violated by society, are grounded.

Structure. Since the ends to be realized through social cooperation are many, society necessarily has a pluralistic structure. This pluralism is of two kinds. The first is derived directly from the social nature of man in which are rooted not only such vital structures as the family and the state, but also the territorial as well as the vocational community and the ethnic-cultural group. Because they are based directly upon human nature as such, they are found everywhere in mankind and its history in one form or another. The second kind of social pluralism is based indirectly on human nature, namely, on common purposes open to man's free CHOICE. This kind of pluralism intensifies in proportion to the growth of population and to the development of civilization. It results from the articulation and particularization of both material and mental ends and values, whose pursuit results in an increasing variety of associations and in a growing measure of socialization, i.e., closer interdependence among men. The pluralism existing in the modern democratic society derives its peculiar character from its causes; these lie in the mechanism of decision-making in the parliamentary process and in the striving for influence on government and parliament by pressure groups.

From what has been said about the structure of society, a further important characteristic emerges, namely, that it is always historically patterned. Only the fundamentals of social order are implicit in human nature; more cannot be found in such nature even for the family community, still less for larger elements of society and for the state. In their concrete aspects, the forms of society change as human nature changes, which, though invariable in its essence, is otherwise mutable (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 57.2 ad 1).

Social Process. It follows from the fact that common ends are constitutive of society that a power of direction must be vested in some AUTHORITY. To the extent that social ends are ontologically implicit in human nature, authority is itself ontologically grounded; otherwise, it is established by the agreement of wills of those who freely unite themselves for the pursuit of a common goal. Authority is necessary not only because the realization of common ends by a self-determining group requires coordination, but also because a governing power must determine concrete objectives pertaining to the common good as well as methods to attain them. The mode of exercising authority and the extent of its competence depend very largely on the form of society in which it operates. It is practically confined to a rule of custom in the case of the homogeneous ethnic community living as a national minority, whereas it is comprehensive in the case of a heterogeneous society such as a large territorial state, for this must rely to a great extent on organizational means.

Capacity for Action. Only the person is capable of having responsibility and of acting accordingly. Society as a whole is responsible for actualizing its own ends, and it carries out this responsibility through various organs (e.g., states conclude treaties and trade unions make contracts). Society, therefore, is a person; but because its bond of unity consists in a common responsibility, it is called a moral person, to distinguish it from the physical person of individual man. It is also called a juridical person because it possesses natural rights by reason of its responsibilities and is capable of legally relevant action. In consequence, society is a person not merely in a metaphorical sense but by strict ANALOGY.

In a similar manner, society may be called an organism; in fact, one is accustomed to speak of the body politic, its members, and its organs. The organic theory of society lays stress on a community of responsibility to attain common intrinsic ends, whereas the mechanistic theory sees society either as a harmony of self-balancing interests (individualism) or as a unity to be organized for extrinsic ends by a ruling group (collectivism). Aquinas refers to the Church as a person (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 83.16 ad 3) and a body (ibid. 3a, 8.4).

Types. A major consideration of social philosophers is the relation between a society and its members; these latter may be individuals or they may be smaller societies. Hence, the first classification is that of the all-embracing society, such as the STATE or the organized society of nations. Particular societies are referred to as intermediate structures because they serve as social units between the individual and the all-embracing society through their particular ends, responsibilities, and rights. Another division is that into necessary communities, relatively necessary communities, and free associations. Necessary communities, examples of which are the family and the state, are indispensable to human existence and are based directly on human nature; they also impose indisputable moral obligations. Relatively necessary societies also are based directly on human nature, but they are structures with limited functions, such as ethnic groups. Free associations (e.g. the literary club and the stock company) are based on human nature only indirectly; they have their origin in the free choice of their members and are limited to serving man in various spheres of culture.

All of the foregoing social units belong to the natural sphere, as distinct from the supernatural. The Church, by reason of its divine mandate for salvation and its life of grace, forms the MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST, a supernatural society. A society that affords all the requisites for the full development of human nature is called a perfect society: examples are the state in the natural order and the Church in the supernatural order. Imperfect societies are the smaller societies; these are capable of performing their functions only as members of a perfect society. The free society, in which the state fully recognizes human rights, particularly that of free public opinion, is to be differentiated from the totalitarian society, in which the government assumes unlimited dominance over the individual. The free society is an open society to the extent that it allows COMMUNICATION with individuals and associations outside its domain in an unhampered way. A closed society excludes such communication. In a different sense, one speaks of a closed society when a traditional social morality (H. Bergson) or Ethosform (M. Scheler) prevails to unite its members in an intimate spiritual bond. Finally, the juridical society may be differentiated from the amicable society. The first rests upon legal provisions (e.g. a municipality or a business corporation), whereas the second rests upon a good-will agreement on the part of the members (e.g. a sports club or charitable organization).

Narrower Sense. Society is sometimes used in a narrower sense to designate relative autonomies as compared to the more absolute autonomy of the state. The distinction is of crucial importance for social philosophy and social ethics. In the narrower sense, society is composed of individuals and smaller social units with their own particular ends and responsibilities; the state, on the other hand, has an all-embracing end and effects the basic ordering of social functions in the over-all society. This is the common understanding in English social theory, in contrast to Hegel's theory in which society is absorbed by the state (cf. E. Barker, Political Thought in England 1848–1914 [Oxford 1942] 66).

F. Tönnies (1855–1936) uses the word "society" in a still narrower sense as designating only associations based on free choice and generally with material purposes, to distinguish these from the community as a biological-spiritual unit, especially the family, the ethnic group, and the nationality. As an example of the first, he would cite the modern market society that is formed by commercial exchange in balancing supply and demand. Influenced by Tönnies as well as by Marx, not a few regard the state itself as a purely functional social entity. There is an element of truth in Tönnies's distinction, easily recognized in present pluralistic democracies. Yet in light of the principles of social philosophy pointed out above, the state is much more than an arbitrary structure; it is grounded in the social nature of man and can subsist as a political society only if it is rooted in consent with respect to common values. This has been the thought of political theorists from Cicero, Augustine, Aquinas, and Edmund BURKE down to the rise of individualism. One who sets society altogether apart from community, as does Tönnies, overlooks the fact that society in any form must rest on a sharing of values, particularly those values that man finds revealed in his nature as morally binding for life in society.

Other philosophical theories. In the latter part of the Middle Ages, NOMINALISM set the stage for the undermining of the ontological and metaphysical concept of society. It held that only individual things are real, hence also only individual human beings; for the nominalist, therefore, society could exist only in mind as an idea, not as a reality. The so-called fictive theory of society is believed to be traceable to Pope INNOCENT IV, who, referring to social grouping, used the expression figatur una persona; what he meant by this, however, was only that society is a res incorporalis, for he was concerned with establishing the difference between a juridical and a physical person.

Under the influence of nominalism, the doctrine developed that society depends exclusively on the will of the people, giving rise to the theory of the SOCIAL CONTRACT. According to T. HOBBS (De Cive, 1642; Leviathan, 1651), the natural state of man is a struggle of each individual against the other. Fear and self-preservation lead to the social contract, by which men establish an order that guarantees a limited amount of freedom for all. J. J. ROUSSEAU (Contrat social, 1762), advocated the opposite theory, namely, that man in his natural state lived in freedom and equality, both of which were destroyed by the introduction of property, to be followed by strife and war. Order was established by means of the social contract, and thus by the will of the people, with the result that each man obeys himself, having cooperated in establishing law and authority.

According to G. W. F. HEGEL (Grundlinien der Philosophie des Rechts, 1821), society is “the realization of the substantial will” expressing “the objective spirit,” the moral consciousness made effective in group life; participating in this spirit, individual man attains fully human existence, but this is only an “accidental” being. In K. MARX’s theory of dialectical materialism (Zur Kritik der politischen Ökonomie, 1859), society is patterned on the “mode of production of material life”; hence every advanced precommunist society must be a class society, if only because of the “social power” inherent in the private ownership of production.

In spite of manifest discrepancies, some element of truth is to be found in all these theories. They are not so much concerned with society, however, as they are with the justification of the state and its authority; yet all of them presuppose that association is necessary for man and even essential to his nature. This is the basic problem in social philosophy; it still calls for analysis and explanation. Moreover, since these theories take as their starting point an inadequate notion of the person, they reach false conclusions, such as those on which individualism and collectivism are based, and continue to have detrimental consequences in the development of modern society. The element of truth to be found in the social contract theory is that society and its order rest upon the individuals’ responsibility to comply with the demands of human nature and thus upon a union of wills (or upon what Aquinas, following Cicero and Augustine, calls a iuris consensus, Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 105.2). The basic mistake of any social contract theory is the notion of absolute sovereignty, which Hobbes situated in monarchy and Rousseau in the people. Hegel was right in emphasizing that society requires a spiritual basis of unity and that only by participating in it can man achieve a fully human existence; this is akin to the scholastic doctrine that the individual good is but a part of the common good. However, Hegel left too little room for the individual, particularly when the supersocial and superpolitical ends of the human person are to be considered. For Marx, social (and consequently the individual) human consciousness are formed wholly by the material world with its technical and economic means of production; moreover, he too finds no room for the individual’s own being and responsibility as a person, having disavowed the “dualism of spirit and matter.” On the other hand, there is an element of truth in his theory of society, particularly in its emphasis on political economy as the most important socially uniting bond; the latter’s relative importance as an integrating factor was acknowledged by Aquinas as well.

Bibliography: J. MESSNER, Social Ethics: Natural Law in the Modern World, tr. J. J. DOHERTY (new ed. St. Louis 1965). E. WELTY, Man in Society, v. 1 of A Handbook of Christian Social Ethics, ed. J. FITZSIMONS, tr. G. KIRSTEIN (New York 1960–), bibliog. B. A. PAPARELLA, Sociality and Sociability: A Philosophy of Sociability according to St. Thomas Aquinas (Washington, D.C. 1955). J. MARITAIN, The Person and the Common Good, tr. J. J. FITZGERALD (New York 1947); Moral Philosophy: An Historical and Critical Survey of the Great Systems (New York 1964). J. F. CROININ, Catholic Social Principles (Milwaukee, Wis. 1950). M. J. WILLIAMS, Catholic Social Thought (New York 1950). A. F. UTZ, Die Prinzipien der Gesellschaftslehre, v. 1 of Sozialethik (Heidelberg 1958—), international bibliog. G. GUNDLACH et al., Staatslexikon 3:817–823, 842–847.

[J. MESSNER]

Sociological Theories

The effects of nominalistic and individualistic theories of society upon social institutions were already evident when the modern science of sociology was first proposed and named by Auguste COMTE (1798–1857). His work and that of other early sociologists was in part a reaction against the dissolution of traditional groupings in the course of the FRENCH REVOLUTION. There remained, so it seemed, no intermediary groups between the individual and the STATE, and this condition heightened the importance of a distinction between society and the state that had not been made explicit up to that time. Sociology was conceived as a means for the discovery of laws of societal structure and change through the application of which a new social solidarity could be attained. Since ontological and metaphysical concepts of society had been abandoned, the search for such laws could be undertaken only with the method of “positive science.” As the field developed, the original POSITIVISM became the object of a critique from within as well as from without, but the inductive study of society remained the distinctive task of sociology. Thus, although sociologists are aware that assumptions about the nature and reality of society affect the models, methods, and techniques that they employ, these assumptions are not their primary concern. Their attention is given to the observable fact of society.

Definition. The sociologist begins with the observation that individuals interact with reference to pluralities or collectivities of various types. Among these are some that are broadly inclusive and are called societies (assuming that they can be distinguished empirically from other types). Some definitions identify a society in this macroscopic sense as a plurality possessing a common CULTURE, while others refer to a common territory or a common government. In general, these definitions are deficient because they do not distinguish sufficiently between society, culture complex, community, and nation. Marion J. Levy has attempted a conceptually precise and empirically relevant definition of society as “a system of action in operation that (1) involves a plurality of interacting individuals of a given species (or group of species) whose actions are primarily oriented to the system concerned and who are recruited at least in part by the sexual reproduction of members of the plurality involved, (2) is at least in theory self-sufficient for the actions of this plurality, and (3) is capable of existing longer than the life-span of an individual of the type (or types) involved” (Structure of Society [Princeton, N.J. 1952] 113). In a human society, the “given species” is Homo sapiens and the system itself consists in the patterned, organized regularities observable in the interaction of men who are primarily oriented to the system and influenced by it.

In theory, animals may form societies according to this definition, but this does not imply that the anthill or elephant herd is of the same type or order as human society. Human interaction is empirically distinct. It involves symbols and meanings that have both subjective and cultural dimensions. It produces a specifically different kind of plurality with its own internal problems of order and its own dynamism of development (deriving ultimately from human rationality and freedom).

A society is not simply the sum of discrete interactions. Rather, its members or parts are organized in such a way that an emergent whole is maintained and develops, remains static, or disintegrates. “American society,” for example, has meaning with reference to its past development, its present state, and its prospects for the future. Although the whole is the product of interaction, it is nonetheless a system of patterned relationships and institutions that influence behavior, even so-called unstructured or deviant behavior.

The members of a society vary as to the extent and the exclusiveness to which their actions are oriented to this system. Citizenship, which constitutes membership in the state, is not the basic criterion for membership in a society. A member is one whose actions are oriented more toward the major institutions of one society, especially the institutions that define its goals, than toward those of another. Most often contemporary societies and nation-states are coextensive, but they need not be.

The restriction that a society’s members must be recruited at least in part through sexual reproduction excludes such pluralities as the ASSOCIATION or collectivities that are prisons and religious communities. It implies further that a society must be composed of members of both sexes and must provide institutional regulation of sexual relations.

The norm of self-sufficiency requires that a society be capable of supplying “from within” all the adaptive and integrative institutions needed for its existence and operation. This excludes such partial systems as the family or the church that need the help of other institutions if they are to function. (The Catholic Church is a perfect society in the theological and canonical, not the sociological, meaning of the word.) Self-sufficiency in this context does not imply that a society must not import goods or services, but only that it must have the necessary structures to obtain what it needs.

Moreover, a society must be capable of existing beyond the life-span of its individual members. In effect this means that some provision has to be made for the effective socialization of the young. The society must possess the structural facilities—through its families, religious institutions, social classes, schools, etc.—to transmit the beliefs, values, and norms required for the survival of its institutions.

Theories and models. Although sociologists have relatively little difficulty in isolating a society from other types of social pluralities, they have not reached consensus on the analysis of its structure and functions. Is society simply a more complex organization of microsystems such as interactional encounters? Or is it a macrosystem in its own right with emergent structures and processes unique to its own level? If society is a whole made up of parts, how are these parts put together and how do they work? Is this whole an on-going process, a BECOMING, or a BEING? In attempting to answer these questions, sociologists have proposed various models or general images, often developed through analogy, about the kinds of units, the patterns of their relations, and the type of whole that is society. The literature is replete with models inspired by physics, biology, psychology, and even mathematics. Thus there are atomistic, organic, evolutionary, conflict, equilibrium, and statistical models. The extent to which any one of these models exhausts the sociological reality of society is still debatable since each seems to present some aspect of that reality. A completely adequate model that is more than an eclectic juxtaposition is still to be developed.

Comte. In some ways Comte prefigured most of the currently available approaches to the study of society. Although he never defined the term, he equated it with the whole of the human species. He considered the species to be one organism to be studied in itself, since a whole is better known than its parts. In practice, he tempered this extreme macroorientation by stressing the reciprocal influence between individuals, families, and pluralities of lesser scope than total humanity. He insisted that the family is the basic unit of society and gives birth to feelings of solidarity among men but that in turn “wise men,” men with ideas, are needed to unite families together into tribes and nations. Although he postulated a basic antagonism between forces of innovation and conservatism, he viewed society as an order based on a universal consensus, the foundation of unity as well as of the division of labor. In another perspective, however, that which he called social dynamics, he referred to society as primarily a process of growth from a militaristic through a legalistic to an industrial stage of organization. Unfortunately, Comte never integrated his static and his evolutionary models, nor did he fully incorporate the functions of ideas and of conflict into his organic model. Each of his approaches seems to have had a “life of its own” prefiguring one of the competing theories to follow, just as his concern with these several approaches prefigured the more eclectic or synthesizing theories of contemporary sociologists.

Spencer. Perhaps Herbert SPENCER (1820–1903) was the most extreme among the early sociologists in his use of the organic-evolutionary model. He defined society as a superorganism progressing inevitably from homogeneity to heterogeneity, and he conceived it as an entity formed of permanently arranged units analogous to the arrangement of the parts of a biological organism having its own sustaining, distributive, and regulating organs or institutions. As a society grows its units become more differentiated. The result is an increase of structure as well as of mass. The process is similar to the growth of an organism even though the basic parts of society (individuals) are discrete and do not form a concrete whole. Spencer’s macromodel assumes, in spite of some denial on his part, that societal laws are merely special cases of biological laws.

Durkheim. Such extreme forms of bio-organicism have long since disappeared from sociology, but more moderate models have persisted, to a great extent because of the influence of Émile DURKHEIM (1855–1917). While he retained Spencer’s macrosociological approach, he stripped it of all biologism. In his theory the social fact of solidarity is the essential characteristic of society, but solidarity is conceived as an emergent reality arising from the association of individuals and not reducible to the mere sum of their actions. Society has a consciousness (conscience collective) that creates a system of values and norms binding upon the individual. The resultant solidarity has in one sense a life of its own; it progresses from a mechanical to an organic form as the collective consciousness becomes less imperative and the division of labor increases because of rising population density and effective communication. But even in a society characterized by organic solidarity, individual actions are only incidents within the large-scale social process in which society exists.

Tönnies. This undiluted macroorientation seems to postulate a substantial reality for society, a position that Ferdinand Tönnies (1855–1936) found unacceptable. Although conceiving society as a type of collective person, he defined it as a product of single persons, the will of one affecting another and vice-versa, with a collective will developing from this interaction. His theory suggests the possibility of microanalysis within a macrosociological framework. In fact, his societal types, Gemeinschaft and Gesellschaft, are explained in terms of human willing. The first is a union of persons relating to each other through a natural, unconditional volition, such as the love of a mother for her child, while the second is a plurality of individuals interacting as a consequence of “rational will,” a sort of calculating volition whereby appropriate means are chosen for specific ends. In general, Tönnies saw society as changing from a Gemeinschaft to a Gesellschaft much in the same way that Durkheim saw mechanical solidarity being replaced by organic solidarity.

Simmel. Georg Simmel (1858–1918) retained the microanalytical approach but rejected the organic overtones. He defined society as a function and a process manifest in the relationships and interactions of men. He was not a reductionist, however, at least in the strict meaning of the term, since in his system individual interaction, while remaining discrete, is synthesized into the unity of society as each element (the content) is related to the others through forms (in the Kantian sense). Simmel posited the existence of society in the consciousness of its members, but the individual is not the group and therefore must become “generalized” by a postulated call or vocation. This helps to explain why quantitative growth can lead to qualitative changes in society, but Simmel did not discuss the process, perhaps because of his failure to attack the problem of macroanalysis.

Marx. Most of these theorists, in spite of their different views, were preoccupied mainly with the problem of unity or order. Karl Marx (1818–83) preferred a conflict-evolutionary model in his analysis of society. He defined it as a dialectical process of warring classes wherein economic factors determine the structure and development. The nature of this determinism has been the subject of much controversy, even among so-called orthodox interpreters, but the notion of conflict remains central to Marxian thought. Each stage of society is held to contain within itself the seeds of its own destruction and to prepare the next state until the final end of evolution, a classless order, is attained. Others before Marx noted the fact of conflict, but Marx postulated that the process itself and its resolution are the very core of society.

Sumner. This notion of conflict was taken up by William Graham Sumner (1840–1910) but recast in the framework of social Darwinism and Spencerian organicism. Sumner maintained that the basic law of society is the law of evolution that receives its impetus from the struggles for existence. Society is basically a system of forces arising primarily from the pressure of population and economic growth and generating through trial and error specific folkways (or ways of doing things). In his early thought Sumner believed that these customs could be modified by man to a very limited extent only, but later he seemed to allow man a larger role in the structuring of society.

Small. Sumner's idea was further developed by Albion W. Small (1854–1926), who defined societal conflict in terms of man's interests and society as the product of individual efforts to fulfill interests, resulting in a continuous process of conflict constantly resolving itself into cooperation. Like the organic model before it, the conflict model of society was slowly transformed into a more psychological conception, but one in which both conflict and order assumed prominence.

Ward. It was Lester F. Ward (1841–1913) who projected man into the evolutionary process. He conceived of society in terms of a psychological-evolutionary model. Attributing spontaneous evolution (genesis) to blind forces, he believed the process was bifurcated with the appearance of mind. Thus he defined "social forces" as psychic forces or feelings and assigned a crucial role to man's purposive actions (telesis). Recognizing that social forces could give rise to conflict, he held them to be checked by "synergy," the basic principle behind evolution, and molded into structures and society. In this way, Ward retained the notion of conflict but subordinated it to equilibrium.

Trend Toward Psychological Models. With the decline of the evolutionary school, the psychological model became more microoriented. In the thought of Gabriel Tarde (1843–1904) the fundamental elements of society are belief and desire and the basic processes are imitation or repetition, opposition, and adaptation. For him society could not be studied as such. Gustave Le Bon (1841–1931) accepted this proposition but attempted to reconcile it with Durkheim's stress on the collectivity, an effort at integration that influenced the work of James Baldwin (1861–1934) and George Mead (1863–1931) and found its sociological expression in the theories of Charles Horton Cooley (1864–1929) and William I. Thomas (1863–1947).

Cooley defined both society and individual as "simply collective and distributive aspects of the same thing" (Human Nature and the Social Order [New York 1902] 2). The basic social fact, he maintained, resides in the imagination each person has of the other. He conceded, however, that social reality is not simply the product of agreement between individuals but the result of organization. Unfortunately, he never explained what he meant by organization. While sharing Cooley's basic orientation, Thomas was somewhat more specific. He postulated attitudes and values as the elements of society, but among the latter he included social norms that coalesce into institutions and social organization. This marked the beginning of a return to macroanalysis by theorists using psychological models.

Weber. This trend is pronounced in Max WEBER (1864–1920). Even though he believed the individual and his actions to be the basic units of study, he carried forward his analysis to all levels of social life. While Cooley reduced society to a socio-psychic complex, Weber postulated a continuum of social categories ranging from the individual actor to society. He saw the social relationship in which actors take account of and are oriented to each other as capable of patterning in different ways and of forming different pluralities, including society. His concern, however, focused on the subjective meaning of action; it is "meaning" that becomes patterned and expected in certain situations, so that in spite of the macrosociological scope of his historical studies, Weber remained strongly nominalistic and conceived of society mainly as a category of human interaction. This did not preclude his analyzing the evolution of social structures as the result of tension between the principles of traditionalism, rationality, and charisma, or his seeing a general trend of increasing rationality in the development of societies.

Pareto. With the renewed concern for macroanalysis it was inevitable that the organic model should return to favor. In a sense the equilibrium paradigm of Vilfredo Pareto (1848–1923) represented an attempt to incorporate elements of most previous approaches without reducing society to any one type of phenomenon. Pareto's notion of equilibrium was taken from physics and mechanics but he rejected the outright physicalism of a Henry Carey (1793–1879), who saw man as a molecule of society and society as a variation of the law of molecular gravitation. In spite of his terminology Pareto was more a moderate organicist than a mechanist. He conceived of society as a system whose form and state of equilibrium are determined by the elements acting upon it, which elements in turn are influenced by society. This type of system analysis implies both micro- and macrosociological orientations. Reciprocal causality is operative.

If some change is introduced and affects the form of society, a reaction occurs tending to restore the form to its original state. Pareto, however, does not rule out all change of the system since the “sentiment” of resistance (an innate human tendency manifested in interests, knowledge, “residues,” and “derivations”) may not be operating for some reason. In fact, since there are two principal types of elites in a society, a governing and non-governing elite, they can and do succeed each other and thus give birth to conservative and progressive phases. Thus Pareto’s theory incorporates an element of change, but change of society is explained in terms of change within society.

Variant Tendencies. In effect Pareto achieved a partial synthesis of previous models. Although most contemporary sociologists follow his lead, a few remain committed to the early models. Leopold von Wiese (b. 1876), for example, is basically microoriented. For him all plurality patterns, including societies, are nothing more and nothing less than neuropsychic patterns. Georges Gurvitch (b. 1894), on the other hand, insists that societies cannot be adequately analyzed unless the collective mind that operates through individual minds is recognized as the immediate social reality. George Lundberg (b. 1895) reduces society to physical phenomena, a field of force wherein individuals are attracted or repulsed as particles of an atom. George Vold (b. 1896) sees it as a congeries of conflicting groups and V. Gordon Childe (b. 1892) continues the tradition of the biological-evolutionary school wherein Darwin’s theory of variation is transferred from organic to social evolution. But, for the most part, today’s theorists have developed more complicated models of society.

Contemporary attempts at integration. The insights of Durkheim, Weber, and Pareto have been combined by the “social action–functionalist school.” The basic unit of society is taken to be meaningful social action, i.e., an action that has meaning for the actor because it takes into account the behavior of others. Florian Znaniecki (1882–1958) termed this concern the “humanistic coefficient of cultural data,” while Robert MacIver (b. 1882) drew attention to the “dynamic assessment” of the situation made by the actor. Both of these men defined society as an emergent reality and recognized that in some way the “whole” has causal priority over the part. Znaniecki subsumed the concept of social action under the concept of system and prepared the way for the study of a society as an inclusive “system of systems.” MacIver proposed different levels of causal analysis and stressed the need to study the “teleological aspects of social phenomena.” For him, while social facts are products of individual meanings, they may be distributive phenomena (activities of a like nature), collective phenomena (conjoint actions), or conjunctural phenomena (unpurposed results of activities by interdependent groups or individuals). Society includes all of these phenomena. Thus are joined in one model the micro- and macrosociological, the psychological and the organic approaches. MacIver added an evolutionary dimension. Society, while constituted by meaningful acts, is forever unfolding, and this process manifests itself in greater division of labor and increasing differentiation of associations and institutions.

Sorokin. In a sense Pitirim Sorokin (b. 1889) belongs to this school, although he denies any association with functionalism. His analysis is in terms of an idealistic organic model, but again, meaningful interaction is at the basis of society. Such interaction can be understood, however, only in terms of the total sociocultural system in which all the parts are mutually interdependent, some of which must be “logico-meaningfully” integrated. Sorokin denies neither the existence of unintegrated or neutral and contradictory or antagonistic elements nor the existence of congeries or elements related to the system only in terms of mechanical adjacency, but he does insist that every society is characterized by a central theme that is either sensate (equating truth with sense knowledge), ideational (equating truth with faith), or idealistic (equating truth with reason). In every society these central themes are forever changing. While MacIver sees a trend toward structural differentiation, Sorokin concludes to cycles of sensate, ideational, and idealistic themes.

Merton and Homans. The implications of Znaniecki’s model have been developed by Robert Merton (b. 1910) and George Homans (b. 1910). Merton, influenced by Radcliffe-Brown and Malinowski, defines functions as the consequences of any act, aim, or purpose within an organic-type system, including society. These may serve to maintain or to disrupt the system, and society thus becomes not only an integrated whole, but a net balance of integration and deviance that in turn affects the individuals composing it. Homans, on the other hand, isolates the structural components that contribute to the whole: activities, interactions, sentiments, and norms, some of which are oriented to solving problems arising from the environment, others of which are oriented to the internal problem of integration and differentiation. Society therefore is composed of an external system and an internal system, which interact with each other and set the stage for its survival or collapse.

Parsons. Perhaps the most comprehensive model of society in contemporary sociology is that of Talcott Parsons (b. 1902). He postulates a homology of small and large systems, a continuity between two-person interaction and society. His model is based upon (1) a volunta-ristic conception of social action with psychological overtones, (2) the physicalist notion of action space and the law of inertia, (3) the mechanistic idea of equilibrium, and (4) the organismic postulate of functional requisites. Therefore the model combines micro- and macroanalysis.

Parsons defines society as a system of interaction, and the relations between actors (status-role reciprocities) compose its structure. In a sense the system is superior to its units and "calls" for structural contributions for its functioning. A society must meet all the essential functional requisites for survival through its own resources and must not be a differentiated subsystem of a larger plurality or, more precisely, collectivity. In other words, it must be a relatively self-sufficient system and possess a common culture to coordinate differentiated units that in the long run depend on human individuals as actors. In effect, this means that a society must have the needed institutions to meet the requirements of goal attainment, adaptation to the environment, pattern maintenance (socialization and tension management), and integration.

While society as defined by Parsons cannot be equated with nation, the boundaries of a society tend to coincide with the territory under control of the highest-order political organization. This holds true in spite of increasing structural differentiation, the specialization of function and separation of the kinship system, the economy, religion, the legal system, and the polity because, in effect, any institution whose orientation is primarily cultural rather than societal lacks the legitimate authority to prescribe values and enforce norms for the society. Nonetheless, in Parsons' model each institution contributes to the maintenance of society and is involved in a process of exchange by which equilibrium is maintained. These intermeshing processes deal with decisions about the disposition and allocation of resources that, from the point of view of the system, are consumed, and with media of control that, like power, circulate from one unit to another. In effect, Parsons sees the dynamics of society mainly as the processing of information.

But this equilibrium-maintaining process does not imply a static structure. Society is a cybernetic system of control over behavior, and structural change is inevitable in the equilibrating process because roles are continuously being played by new actors and strains are inevitable in the exchange between societal units. Control can resolve these problems up to a point; but when a cumulative process begins, change in the normative structure results and its general direction is toward functional differentiation and increasing complexity of the system.

Evaluation. Contemporary theorists seem agreed that Parsons' model of society helps to resolve many of the differences between the so-called individualistic and collectivistic points of view, but that the two have not been fully integrated. Significant objections have been based upon the model's failure to explain adequately the basic fact of conflict and its contribution to the "state of the system." Another objection is that the evolutionary nature of society is not really explained. Some sociologists, such as Lewis Coser and Ralph Dahrendorf, maintain that society is not in the harmonious balance implied by an equilibrium model. In their view, dissension arising from competition rather than consensus is a basic condition of society and a dialectical model of some sort is needed. Wilbert Moore insists that the notion of equilibrium either forecloses discussion of change or predicts change in one direction only, the restoration of society to a steady state. He suggests the use of a tension-management model, but one that makes no presumption that tensions or strains are in fact "managed." Moore would make both order and change problematical and normal.

Pierre van den Berghe, while recognizing that societies show a tendency toward equilibrium and solidarity, argues that they generate the opposites as well and require other mechanisms of integration than consensus. Moreover, he agrees that the equilibrium model does not account for endogenous change through conflict and contradiction. He suggests that there is need for a dialectical model (one that does not reduce social reality to polarized opposites), but he also recognizes that social dialectics alone cannot account for change through differentiation and adaptation nor account for consensus. He therefore proposes a functional-dialectical model wherein both conflict and consensus are basic.

Such a model has not been developed but may be promising. The juxtaposition of the two approaches is not as arbitrary as it might seem. In a sense, interdependence contains its own dialectic and dialectical conflict and is based on some assumption of equilibrium. The model of structural-functional analysis postulates that society is a system composed of interrelated parts but, whether institutions or actors, the parts are to some extent relatively autonomous. These parts may adjust or react so that equilibrium and interdependence cannot be equated. Adjustment itself occurs within a tension system wherein autonomy and control interact dialectically (in the broad sense of the word) so that consensus or stability cannot be a permanent or total state of the system. And reaction occurs within a system of interdependence in which equilibrium forces are operative so that society cannot be adequately defined in terms of simple conflict or change. As a system of relatively autonomous but organized elements, society is empirically a whole whose equilibrium implies a tension system and whose dialectics imply an evolving synthesis. As such, strain and deviancy are as much its components as harmony and conformity, and change as much its feature as stability.

Such a model, which might be called an evolving dialectical-equilibrium model, would seem to reunite the major insights of past theorists and resolve many of the contemporary objections to the structural-functional analysis of society. It would incorporate into one synthesis actor-interaction as well as holistic processes, conflict and consensus, stability and change as facts of society. Whether such a model is adopted sooner or later, the contemporary trend seems to point in such a direction.

Bibliography: H. E. BARNES and H. BECKER, Social Thought from Lore to Science, 2 v. (2d ed. Washington, D.C. 1952). L. A. COSER, The Functions of Social Conflict (Glencoe, Ill. 1956). S. N. EISENSTADT, "Social Change, Differentiation and Evolution," American Sociological Review 29 (1964) 375–386. A. INKELES, What Is Sociology? (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1964). M. J. LEVY, The Structure of Society (Princeton, N.J. 1952). W. E. MOORE, Social Change (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1963). T. PARSONS et al., eds., Theories of Society, 2 v. (New York 1961). P. A. SOROKIN, Contemporary Sociological Theories (New York 1928). H. R. WAGNER, "Displacement of Scope: A Problem of the Relationship between Small-Scale and Large-Scale Sociological Theories," American Journal of Sociology 69 (1964) 571–584. P. L. VAN DEN BERGHE, "Dialectic and Functionalism," American Sociological Review 28 (1963) 695–705. D. MARTINDALE, The Nature and Types of Sociological Theory (Boston, Mass. 1965).

[R. H. POTVIN]

SOCIETY (CHURCH AS)

The term society has been in use to designate the Church throughout the history of Western Christian thought. However, it is only within the last two centuries that the term, with its corresponding systematic conceptualization, has found widespread favor and use in ecclesiology.

Patristic Era. Among the Fathers, St. Augustine often applied the term society to the Church. The term in St. Augustine, corresponding to his whole philosophical and religious spirit, has a strong emphasis on the interiority of the intrapersonal society involved, on the community of life being actually what it seems to be, and not merely fair seeming. The basic reason for this emphasis is his conviction that the Holy Spirit, who is "the society of the Father and of the Son" within the Trinity, is also the ground of the Church as a society:

. . . the society of the unity of the Church of God, outside of which there is no forgiveness of sins, is, as it were, the proper work of the Holy Spirit (the Father and the Son, to be sure, working together with Him), because the Holy Spirit Himself is in a certain sense the society of the Father and of the Son (Serm. 71.20.33; Patrologia Latina 38:463).

"The society by which we are made the one Body of God's only Son, is the Spirit's role" (ibid. 17.28; Patrologia Latina 38:461). ". . . no one can achieve eternal life and salvation apart from the society of Christ, which is realized in Him and with Him, when we are bathed in His Sacraments and incorporated into His members" (Pecc. merit. 3.11.19; Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum, 60:145). Augustine asks, "How should the city of God . . . originate, develop, and attain its destiny, if the life of the saints were not a social life?" (Civ. 19.5; Corpus Christianorum. Series latina 48:669.) Even "the peace of the heavenly city," which is the glorious Church of heaven, is called "the perfectly ordered and harmonious society of those who find their joy in God and in one another in God" (ibid. 19.13; Corpus Christianorum. Series latina 48:679). Augustine's generic understanding of what a society is can be gathered from a phrase of the City of God: ". . . an assemblage of reasonable beings joined in society by their harmonious sharing in the object of their love" (ibid. 19.24; Corpus Christianorum. Series latina 48:695).

Medieval and Later Scholasticism. Notwithstanding Augustine's patronage, the term society was slow to become one of the abstract collective names commonly used to designate the Church. Rather these were in large measure derived from the name ecclesia, which the Fathers and the scholastics explained etymologically as God's "convocation" of His people, with the "congregation" of the faithful resulting from God's calling (see St. Isidore of Seville, De eccles. off. 1.1.2; Patrologia Latina 83:739–740).

The following are examples of the continuing, though relatively minor, use of the term society. St. Thomas Aquinas, who uses the term rather infrequently, says that the grace of the Eucharist is "the Mystical Body of Christ, which is the society of the saints" (Summa theologiae, 3a, 80.4), thus intimately linking the society or communion of the saints with the Eucharistic Communion. In an Augustinian phrase St. Thomas calls the heavenly Church "the well ordered society of those who enjoy the vision of God" (C. gent. 4.50); it is St. Thomas's view that citizenship in the city of God "will not be annulled in the future world but perfected" (In 3 sent. 33.1.4). For a similar use of the term society with respect to the heavenly Church, (see Summa theologiae, 1a2ae, 4.8; De carit. 2; De vit. spir. 2; In 1 Cor. 10. lect. 5; In 3 sent. 19.5.1). In St. Thomas the concept society emphasizes the community of life, the interdependence (the ordo ad invicem) of those who share in the same common good (here the ordo ad Deum).

Among the controversialists St. Robert Bellarmine uses the term society only rarely (see De eccl. mil. 5, 12). It is interesting to note that Bellarmine employs the concept society as an argument for the VISIBILITY OF THE CHURCH. “The Church is a society, not of angels or of souls, but of men” (De eccl. mil. 12). Hence, as a society made up of men, it must be structured visibly, with visible criteria for membership, so that its members can know who their fellows are.

Modern Era. The importance that the term and concept society have in the ecclesiology of the last two centuries can be judged by examining their use in Church documents and also in the unofficial, though historically important, two schemata on the Church prepared for Vatican I.

Pius IX’s Syllabus errorum (Dec. 8, 1864) stresses that the Church is “a true and perfect society, wholly free” (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 2919). Since the Syllabus was to set the guidelines for the theological commission in working up the preliminary drafts for Vatican I (see J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 49:621), the theme of the Church as “a true and perfect society, wholly free,” not unexpectedly had a prominent place in the first schema on the Church, and also, in a lesser degree, in the second schema.

The first schema (ibid. 51:539–553) uses the term and concept society as its main theme. The Church is portrayed as “the society of salvation” (ch. 8), “the society of life” (ch. 9), the unique repository of Christ’s light and grace, wholly competent within its own resources to achieve its mission, and totally independent of any tutelage of the state. Hence it is “a true and perfect society” (ch. 3). Although a visible human society, it belongs to an order wholly transcending the purely natural level, because the indwelling Holy Spirit is the ground of its unity and life. As a society it is a sign to the nations, discernible from other religious groupings that challenge its unique mission. It is a society that requires a harmonious coexistence with the state.

The anti-Protestant orientation of this development is clear. Over against the traditional Protestant theme of the invisible, or hidden, church, the schema teaches that the Christian religion is not un-churched, but divinely incorporated in a true society, which is not optional but the one peremptory means of SALVATION for all men. In the face of a more recent development in Protestant ecclesiology, dating from the 18th century, in which many Protestant theologians and jurists, often under the spirit of the Enlightenment, and using categories taken from the philosophy of society, presented the empiric national church as a man-made institution and conceded the state a hegemony over this church, the schema reacts with like categories, drawn from the philosophy of society, proposing, however, entirely opposite doctrines on the nature of the Church as a society.

The second revised schema (ibid. 53:308–317) was drawn up by Joseph Kleutgen, SJ, to meet the criticisms that the Fathers had made of the first schema. Responsive to their wishes, Kleutgen greatly curtailed in frequency and emphasis the use of the term society. However, despite this deemphasis, “it has been judged wholly advantageous,” Kleutgen wrote in his covering report on the revised schema, “to state in the constitution in so many words that the Church is a true and perfect society” (ibid. 53:318). Moreover, “it is not alien to the Church’s language to call the Church a society,” for St. Augustine himself “often” (ibid.) used the term of the Church.

Leo XIII, who was present at Vatican I, made repeated use of the theme society in several encyclicals dealing with the Church, both in itself and in its relation to the city of man. See, e.g., SATIS COGNITUM, June 29, 1896 [Acta Sanctae Sedis, 28 (1895–96) 724–725; see H. DENZINGER, *Enchiridion symbolorum*³¹ 1959]. It is to be noted that the pope strongly emphasized the supernatural life of the Church as a society, and grounded its social life primarily in the “life of Jesus Christ [which] . . . nurtures and sustains each member, keeps them joined together and directed to the same end, amid all the variety of action of the single members” [Sapientiae christiana, Jan. 10, 1890; Acta Sanctae Sedis, 22 (1889–90) 392].

The social theme is worked through the whole of Pius XII’s encyclical MYSTICI CORPORIS (June 29, 1943). Phrases such as “social body,” “social members,” “social activity,” and “society” occur with notable frequency. The following points of the encyclical deserve mention:

1. All social members of the Body “ought to serve in common Christ and His saving work” (i.e., the application of Christ’s merits to men through the Church), “all ‘who are saved and who save from One and through One’” (par. 57). In other words, the whole Church, acting jointly, is mater ecclesia (12, 43, 86).
2. In this work “the divine Savior with His social Body constitutes only one mystical person . . . the whole Christ” (67, cf. 78).
3. This common work and service is due primarily to an inward principle, “the divine Spirit who . . . fills and unites the whole Church” (60, cf. 68–69).
4. There is no radical dissociation, or even any uneasy precarious alliance, between a “society nurtured and formed by love,” and a “juridic society”; on the contrary these two aspects “mutually complement and perfect each other” (63).

For the Church as a society of worship, see Pius XII, MEDIATOR DEI [Nov. 20, 1947, Acta Apostolicae Sedis, 39 (1947) 538; Enchiridion symbolorum, 3841].

Conclusion. Vatican II's Lumen Gentium expressed an ecumenical position that emphasized simultaneously the visible and invisible dimensions of the Church: "the society equipped with hierarchical structures and the mystical body of Christ, the visible society and the spiritual community, the earthly church and the church endowed with heavenly riches, are not to be thought of as two realities. On the contrary, they form one complex reality comprising a human and a divine element" (8). The tendency to highlight one of these dimensions over the other underlies much contemporary ecclesiological debate. On the one hand lies the danger of reducing the Church to a merely psychological or sociological reality by underemphasizing its mystical and transcendent dimensions. On the other hand lies the danger of ignoring the historical and social dimensions of the Church in favor of a mystified or overly idealized view.

The Church considered as a society is like other societies in that it has certain structures and laws; unlike most other societies, however, its essential structures are believed to be of divine origin. Although the Church is to be distinguished from the kingdom of God in its fullness, Lumen Gentium says that "the church . . . is, on earth, the seed and the beginning of that kingdom" (5). Gaudium et Spes describes the role of the Church in the world, "to be a leaven, and, as it were, the soul of human society in its renewal by Christ and its transformation into the family of God" (40).

See Also: MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST; SOUL OF THE CHURCH; CHURCH, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: N. MONZEL, Struktursoziologie und Kirchenbegriff (Bonn 1939). T. GEPPERT, Teleologie der menschlichen Gemeinschaft (Münster 1955). A. RADEMACHER, Die Kirche als Gemeinschaft und Gesellschaft (Augsburg 1931). Y. CONGAR, "Peut-on définir l'Église?" Sainte Église (Paris 1963) 21–44. U. VALESKE, "Die Kirche als Gemeinschaft und als Gesellschaft," Votum Ecclesiae (Munich 1962) 115–127. D. M. DOYLE, "Henri de Lubac and the Roots of Communion Ecclesiology," Theological Studies 60:209–227. J. A. KOMONCHAK, "Ecclesiology and Social Theory: A Methodological Essay," The Thomist 45:262–283.

[F. X. LAWLOR/D. M. DOYLE]

SOCIETY (THEOLOGY OF)

In the Constitution on the Church in the Modern World Vatican Council II outlined some general principles for a theology of society. They concerned the social nature of man, the interrelationship between individual and community and between the primacy of the person and a notion of the common good as "the sum total of social conditions which allow people, either as groups or as individuals, to reach their fulfilment more fully and more easily" (Gaudium et spes 25–26).

Resources: The Social Sciences. For these very general observations to become the subject of a systematic reflection on society, theologians must make use of the resources and conclusions of the social sciences. They will, first of all, have to take account of the almost bewildering variety which empirical research has discovered in social relationships and orders both across generations and across cultures. Secondly, they will have to reflect on what might be called "the dialectic of social existence," by which the very societies which men have produced themselves become the producers of men.

The latter interest will first see societies as human products, produced and constituted by shared meanings and values. Social relationships and orders are the effects of exercises of human intelligence and freedom, and not the inevitable products of a preconscious "human nature" nor of a cosmic or merely "natural" order.

Such social orders have their own "objectivity." They confront the individual born or reared within them with a massive inertial force. The "real world" into which he is introduced is the world as it has been shaped and interpreted by earlier generations and his own possibilities for self-realization are limited by the resources of his society and its communities. It is their language through which the world is mediated to him and which moulds and orients his own consciousness. It is their taken-for-granted stock of knowledge which constitutes the largest part of what he comes to "know." It is in terms of their roles and institutions and in pursuit of the values they honor that he learns to orient his freedom. In all these ways, the individual is a social product; the self is socially mediated.

Society: Theological Object. So understood, the social order itself becomes an object of theological investigation and evaluation. The society, policy, economy are not pre-moral givens within which individuals privately live, and the Christian message does not concern only their privatized lives. The social order is another of the ambiguous works of man, and its moulding and orienting influence on those born and reared within it is no less ambiguous. The Gospel does not address individuals in the abstract, but only the persons who exist, all of whom are social products. Thus, for example, contemporary theologians speak of "sinful social structures" or of "social sin" to describe the larger context of evil to which the Gospel must be addressed, and seek to explain how the "reign of sin" shows itself there as well as in the minds and hearts of individuals.

Such reflections lead easily enough into a POLITICAL THEOLOGY. This is not simply a “theology of politics,” but an attempt to rethink the Christian message in terms of the fundamental and even constitutive role which societies play in the development of individuals. The search for meaning and value, which defines man, is seen to be a “political” enterprise, first in the sense that this search, like every other human endeavor, is inescapably marked by the social conditions under which it is undertaken, and, secondly, in the sense that the discovery of the revealed meanings and values of the Gospel has immediate political and social implications.

A critical theology of society, then, must (1) start from the social matrix of individual existence; (2) critically explore the relationship between that essential freedom which the Church has always defended as “free will” and its effective realization in concrete individuals; (3) interpret the meaning of the Gospel and the role of the Church in the light of the social dialectic; (4) elaborate effective hermeneutical principles by which the Gospel may be made to evaluate social orders; and (5) learn how to collaborate with the social sciences in bringing the Gospel’s redemptive truth and power to bear upon concrete social orders and situations.

Bibliography: P. BERGER and T. LUCKMANN, The Social Construction of Reality (New York 1980). J. GREMILLION, The Gospel of Peace and Justice: Catholic Social Teaching since Pope John (Maryknoll, NY 1976). G. GUTIERREZ, A Theology of Liberation: History, Politics and Salvation, tr. C. INDA and J. EAGLESON (Maryknoll, NY 1973). B. LONERGAN, Method in Theology (New York 1972). J. B. METZ, tr., W. GLEN-DOEPEL, A Theology of the World (New York 1969).

[J. A. KOMONCHAK]

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE (SPCK)

The oldest Anglican mission society, SPCK was founded in 1698 by Rev. Thomas Bray and four lay supporters, “to promote and encourage the erection of charity schools in all parts of England and Wales; to dispense, both at home and abroad, Bibles and tracts of religion; and in general to advance the honour of God and the good of mankind, by promoting Christian knowledge both at home and in the other parts of the world by the best methods that should offer.” An appeal from Maryland for help in the colony’s ecclesiastical organization made Henry Compton, Bishop of London, choose Bray as his commissary. Bray sought missionaries to join him and worked out a scheme for free libraries in Maryland. The support he received made him try out the library scheme in England with success. This and other educational and literary projects led to the foundation of the SPCK. After long legal delays, Bray set sail for Maryland, arriving in March 1700. Though well received, he returned almost immediately, convinced he could serve the Maryland church better from England. Finding that the SPCK had developed rapidly, Bray founded the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL (1701) for the foreign missions. This and the National Society for the Education of the Poor in the Principles of the Established Church (1811) have since shared the work of the SPCK, but the latter has set up Church of England schools and teachers’ training colleges both at home and abroad. The SPCK is best known now for its publications on theological and other subjects. It holds the distinction of being the third oldest publishing house in England, after Oxford and Cambridge.

Bibliography: W. O. B. ALLEN and E. MACCLURE, Two Hundred Years: The History of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, 1698–1898 (London 1898). W. K. L. CLARKE, A Short History of S. P. C. K. (London 1919). M. CLEMENT, The S.P.C.K. and Wales, 1699–1740 (London 1954). W.A. BULTMANN and P.W. BULTMANN, “The Roots of Anglican Humanitarianism: A Study of the Membership of the SPCK and the SPG, 1699–1720,” Historical Magazine of the Protestant Episcopal Church 33 (Mar 1964) 3–48. M.A.C. WARREN, “The Missionary Expansion of Ecclesia Anglicana,” in New Testament Christianity for Africa and the World (London 1974) 124–140. C. ROSE, “The Origins and Ideals of the SPCK 1699–1716,” in The Church of England c. 1689–c. 1833 (Cambridge 1993) 172–190. P.J. POSAN, “The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge: Past, Present, and Future,” American Theological Library Association: Summary of Proceedings 52 (1998) 247–254.

[G. ALBION/EDS.]

SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL

More commonly known as the SPG. This society (full title, Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts) was founded under royal English charter in June 1701 as the official overseas missionary body of the Church of England. Its leading promoter was Rev. Thomas Bray (1656–1730), also one of the founders of the SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE (SPCK), who had been Ecclesiastical Commissary for Maryland in 1699–1700. The impulse for the SPG’s organization came from a belated but nonetheless fervent Anglican recognition of the need to carry the Christian Gospel beyond England. In this sense it was a part of the great worldwide Christian revolution, which eventuated in the emergence of Christianity as a genuine universal faith during the following 200 years. According to the terms of its charter the SPG was incorporated for the purposes of (1) “providing a maintenance for an orthodox Clergy in the plantations, colonies, and factories of Great Britain beyond the seas, for the instruction of the King's loving subjects in the Christian religion"; (2) "making such other provisions as may be necessary for the propagation of the Gospel in those parts;" and (3) "receiving, managing, and disposing of the charity of His Majesty's subjects for those purposes." During most of the 18th century the Society's activities were confined to the British colonies of North America where it was active not only among European colonists but undertook the conversion of Black slaves and Native Americans. Prevented by the terms of its charter from continuing in the United States after the American Revolution, the SPG shifted its activity, first, to Canada and, after 1823, to non-Christian regions of Asia and Africa. On the whole, the SPG tended to develop the community type of mission and usually carried on its activities under the direct superintendence of the diocesan bishop in the mission field. Its close identification with Anglo-Catholicism during much of its history and the founding by the Anglican evangelicals of the Church Missionary Society in 1799 somewhat limited the Society's activities. Nevertheless, during the course of the 19th century it spread extensively into South Africa (1821), Bengal and South India (1823), Borneo (1848), Pacific Islands (1862), North China (1863), Japan (1873), Korea (1899), Manchuria (1892), and Siam (1903). Its greatest mission successes were won in India where it still has great influence. The 20th century has witnessed some diminution of the Society's activities as the former holdings of the British Empire have contracted. Even so, it continues to play an active and effective role as a mission agency in the British Commonwealth.

Bibliography: H. P. THOMPSON, Into All Lands (London 1951). C. F. PASCOE, Two Hundred Years of the S.P.G., 1701–1900 (London 1901). R. P. S. WADDY, "250 Years of Patrologia Graeca," International Review of Mission 40 (1951) 331–336. B. C. ROBERTS, "SPG: How It Works," Church Quarterly Review 157 (1956) 136–143. W. A. BULTMANN and P. W. BULTMANN, "The Roots of Anglican Humanitarianism: A Study of the Membership of the SPCK and the SPG, 1699–1720," Historical Magazine of the Protestant Episcopal Church 33 (Mar 1964) 3–48. G. J. GOODWIN, "Christianity, Civilization and the Savage: The Anglican Mission to the American Indian," Historical Magazine of the Protestant Episcopal Church 42 (June 1973) 93–110. M. A. C. WARREN, "The Missionary Expansion of Ecclesia Anglicana," in New Testament Christianity for Africa and the World (London 1974) 124–140. B. HOUGH, "Archives of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel," Historical Magazine of the Protestant Episcopal Church 46 (1977) 309–322. R. H. S. BOYD, "The Patrologia Graeca in Ahmedabad: 1830–1851," Indian Church History Review 12 (June 1978) 54–66. A. K. DAVIDSON, "Colonial Christianity: The Contribution of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel to the Anglican Church in New Zealand 1840–1880," Journal of Religious History 16 (Dec. 1990) 173–184.

[S. BURRELL/EDS.]

SOCIETY OF CATHOLIC COLLEGE TEACHERS OF SACRED DOCTRINE

Founded in 1953 as a national association of Catholic university and college professors of theology whose main objective is the improvement of the teaching of sacred science as a liberal (that is, nonprofessional) study above the secondary or high school level. In 1967, the society adopted a new name, the COLLEGE THEOLOGY SOCIETY. This entry describes the history of the society from 1953–1967.

After much criticism in private circles, university workshops, and journals of the impoverished quality of religion courses then offered on Catholic campuses, this society began in 1953 as a constructive effort to remedy the situation. After preliminary meetings of small groups of teachers in Washington and Philadelphia, representatives of 47 eastern colleges meeting at Fordham University, New York City, Feb. 24, 1954, agreed on a provisional constitution.

The title chosen for the group (generally abbreviated to Sacred Doctrine Society) is self-explanatory. The word doctrine was chosen as being general enough to refer both to theology and the content of religion courses. At that time, a controversy was raging among college educators, dividing them into those who favored the academic learning of theology and those inclined to stress the pedagogical aspect of communicating religious truth. The Society was committed to be an open forum, uncommitted to either side of the controversy.

The ultimate purpose of the Society, according to its original constitution, was the assurance of a high academic level for its special discipline and assistance to professors for imparting solid and effective instruction in sacred science. This original intention was further explicated in more proximate aims that included: (1) the formulation of the proper and immediate aim and content of sacred doctrine curricula for Catholic colleges within the context of the total aim of Christian higher education; (2) the investigation of the suitability of sacred doctrine as a principle of interdisciplinary integration; (3) assistance in the development of programs genuinely intellectual in content and method, yet designed to take into account actual student needs and capacities; (4) discussion and evaluation of methods of teaching; (5) the encouragement of teacher preparation both in the graduate schools and in in-service training; (6) the providing of opportunity for meeting with experts in the various areas of the science; (7) serving as a forum for the communicating of pedagogical experience and information.

The accomplishment of these aims was attempted through a variety of means. For example, the quarterly newsletter, Sacred Doctrine Notes (originally called Magister), offered both member and nonmember subscribers news, discussion, book reviews, and bibliographies. The Proceedings of the annual national conventions proved to be a valuable source for expert theological articles.

While the membership was largely from the U.S., Canada had a substantial membership and even non-English-speaking countries had representatives. Membership was restricted to priests, religious, and Catholic laity who were qualified by training or teaching experience for the instruction of college students in theology. Although the society attempted to encourage attempts to better high school religion courses, its focus was consistently that of education leading to college degrees.

The national conventions, held Easter Monday and Tuesday, showed the development of the society, the status of theology in the college and of theology itself. The first convention (1955) was devoted to a study of proposed curricular plans, and used a society survey of curricula in use. A year later, the concern was with the finality of theology and the student; another year, the relation of theology to other disciplines. From 1958 to 1960 the topics became more technical, with increasing emphasis on scriptural study. The years following until the 10th anniversary presented special area studies in ecumenism, liturgy, and spiritual theology. Finally, in 1964, the convention, after visiting major American cities, returned to Washington for a realistic appraisal of present status and future needs. The society demonstrated its advancing maturity by its ability to formulate more specific resolutions on teacher preparation, on the equality of status for religious and secular subjects, on minimum time requirements, on implementation of Vatican Council II's decrees on renewal of church and theology.

For developments from 1967, see: COLLEGE THEOLOGY SOCIETY.

[U. VOLL/EDS.]

SOCINIANISM

An antitrinitarian movement on the margins of Protestantism. Three phases of thought are distinguished: (1) that of two members of a Siense family of juris-consults, Laelius and Faustus Socinus (Sozzini); (2) that of the Socinianized Minor (Reformed) Church of Poland from 1579 to 1605; and (3) evangelical rationalism, especially after the suppression of the Minor Church in Poland in 1658.

Socinianism originated in Italy as an amalgam of Valdesian Erasmianism, Florentine Platonism, Paduan

Aristotelianism, and Protestant Biblicism. In Poland it was augmented and altered by specifically Calvinist and Anabaptist ingredients. Diffused in Germany, Holland, and Great Britain, it showed affinities with 17th-century philosophy. In all three phases Socinianism was characterized by a rationalistic scriptural literalism (with a predilection for the New Testament) and by an acceptance of Jesus as the definitive revelation of God (interpretatione divinae voluntatis), but solely as a man, born of the Virgin, resurrected from the dead, in confirmation of his exemplary obedience, and deputed to rule as King, Priest, and Prophet over the world and the church. Socinianism espoused toleration for all. Mutually disciplined members looked forward, after the death of the soul with the body (mortalist heresy), to the final resurrection of the soul of the righteous only and of their investment with spiritual bodies to enjoy the immortality that was the reward of all who had persevered in observing all of Jesus' commandments "through the power of the Spirit."

Laelius and Faustus Socinus. Laelius Socinus, born in Siena in 1525, was a student and seeker, who established close contacts with P. Melancthon, J. Calvin, and H. Bullinger, and also with the Rhaetian radical Camillo Renato. Suspected of heresy by Bullinger, Laelius was obliged to prepare an (ambiguous) Confession of Faith, one of the few extant documents from his hand. At death in 1562 in Zurich he left his library and papers to his nephew Faustus.

Faustus Socinus, born in Siena in 1539, became a student of logic and law, and a member of the local academy and of the court in Florence; he first clearly manifested his rejection of Catholicism in a letter of 1563, arguing against the unconditional IMMORTALITY of the soul. A major work followed on hermeneutics, De auctoritate sacrae scripturae (1570). His treatise on Christology and soteriology, De Jesu Christo servatore (1578), clarified his view that the ascended Christ, though not divine by nature, was divine by office and might therefore be properly addressed in prayer. At this time a faction under Franz DÁVID in the Unitarian Reformed Church in Transylvania had moved to the more extreme position of disallowing such prayer. The more moderate faction under Giorgio BLANDRATA invited Socinius to their side. On his journey thither he was persuaded to make Poland his permanent home.

The Socinianized Minor Church (1579–1658). In this second phase of development, the theology of Faustus was fused with that of the antecedent antitrinitarian and partly anabaptist Minor (Reformed) Church. Raków, the communitarian settlement and spiritual center north-east of Cracow, developed a gymnasium bonarum artium at one time attracting 1,000 students, and a publishing house turning out tracts and books in a score of languages. Faustus defended the Minor Church on the issues of war and political authority, although he declined on principle to become a communicant member because he refused to submit to the practice of believers' baptism (anabaptism) by immersion. Socinus was nevertheless co-commissioned to revise the Catechesis (1574) of Raków, published in Polish as the Racovian Catechism in 1605, a year after Socinus's death in Luclawice (German and Latin editions, 1609). Among the faculty of the academy and the pastorate of the synod that met annually in Raków the most prominent were Faustus's own grandson, Andreas Wiszowaty (d. 1678), Stanislas LUBIENIECKI, who wrote Historia Reformationis Polonicae, and converts from German Protestantism such as Christoph Ostorodt (d. 1611) and Johann Crell (d. 1631). The academy and press at Raków were suppressed in 1638; and in 1658 the Warsaw Sejm threatened Socinians with death if they would not become Catholic within three years.

Evangelical Rationalism. Socinians were established in the Netherlands and Germany well before the extinction of the Minor Church in Poland. Ernst Soner (d. 1612) made the University of Altdorf a center of diffusion. At Amsterdam the basic works of the movement were printed in 1688, as the Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum in eight volumes. Christoph Sand (d. 1680) compiled the Bibliotheca Antitrinitariorum. In England Socinian rationality, LATITUDINARIANISM, and mortalism variously appealed to Arminian prelates, to Oxford rationalists, to Cambridge Platonists, to scientist-theologians (such as Isaac Newton), and to the first avowed native Socinians: John BIDDLE ("the father of English Unitarianism") and Stephen Nye, whose History of Unitarianism commonly called Socinianism set off the Trinitarian Controversy in the Established Church of England in 1687.

Bibliography: L. CRISTIANI, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 14.2:2326–34. B. STASIEWSKI, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 9:928–931. E. M. WILBUR, A History of Unitarianism 2 v. (Cambridge, MA 1945–52). D. CANTIMORI, Eretici Italiani del '500 (Florence 1939), German Italianische Haeretiker der Spätrenaissance (Basel 1948). L. CHMAJ, Faust Socyn (Warsaw 1963). S. KOT, Socinianism in Poland, tr. E. M. WILBUR (Boston 1957). W. J. KÜHLER, Socinianisme in Nederland (Leiden 1912). H. J. MCLACHLAN, Socinianism in 17th Century England (New York 1951). J. TEDESCHI, ed., Italian Reformation Studies (Florence 1965), esp. for genealogy of Sozzini family.

[G. H. WILLIAMS]

Faustus Socinus.

SOCRATES

Greek philosopher, teacher of PLATO; b. the son of a stonemason and a midwife, Athens, c. 469 B.C.; d. Athens, 399 B.C.

Life. Socrates's life spanned the great outburst of Athenian activity and culture triggered by the Greek victory over Persia (480–479) and ending in the long war of attrition with Sparta that brought Athens to ruin. He married, perhaps twice and rather late in life, leaving young sons when he died at the hands of the restored democracy, which found in him a scapegoat for Athenian failings during the recent war.

In early life he showed interest in the physical speculations of his time and is said to have associated with Archelaus, who was a close follower of ANAXAGORAS. Aristophanes's Clouds (423 B.C.) links him, in comic fashion, with the SOPHISTS and speculators on cosmology. In the Phaedo (97C), Plato represents him as pleased with the view of Anaxagoras that Mind arranges and is the cause of all things, but as disappointed with Anaxagoras's subsequent explanation of the universe through physical causes. Certainly at some time during his life, possibly around the outbreak of the Peloponnesian War, Socrates turned his attention almost exclusively to questions of human conduct and virtue. It was a change consonant with the increased importance and responsibility of the individual under the new Athenian democracy and paralleled by the search for a systematic higher education that gave the Sophists their opportunity to practice as itinerant teachers. Socrates's ascetic habits, extreme self-control, and refusal to take fees, together with his great courage and striking appearance, gave personal weight to his emphasis on care of the soul and his quest for moral definition. He served with bravery at Potidaea (432), Delium (424), and Amphipolis (422); as one of the Council of Presidents he refused to sanction simultaneous trial of eight generals after Arginusae (406); and he disobeyed an order of the Thirty that would have involved him as an accomplice to murder (403).

Socrates, drinking hemlock.

Teaching. Sources for the teaching of Socrates are various. He wrote nothing himself, reckoning dialogue as far superior to the written word, but in Plato's Apology and in the early "Socratic" dialogues perhaps the historical Socrates is fairly substantially represented, although Plato allows himself considerable liberty in dramatic setting, casting, and literary embellishment. Another contemporary source is Xenophon, who gives a more matter-of-fact account of Socrates in his Memorabilia, Apology, and Symposium. Aristotle gives some assessments in the Metaphysics and Nicomachean Ethics that are confirmed in the Magna Moralia, and there is a life of Socrates in Diogenes Laertius.

Chaerephon, a lifelong friend of Socrates, is said to have asked the oracle of Apollo at Delphi whether anyone was wiser than Socrates and to have received a negative reply. To test the truth of the oracle, Socrates is represented (Apol. 21C–22E; Diog. Laert. 2.5.37) as constantly searching for persons of wisdom, but as disappointed in his quest, and hence concluding that he must be wiser than others because he knew himself to be ignorant, whereas they thought themselves wise and were not. Socrates is portrayed as a frequent visitor to the market place, where he was ready to converse with all comers in an attempt to turn their attention from externals to themselves and to the virtues of the soul. The typical procedure (e.g., Charmides, Euthyphro, Meno, Mem. 4.2.8–39) was for Socrates to lead on his acquaintance to make some assertion concerning a particular virtue or virtue in general, and then to question the accuracy of his observations. After several attempts at definition, the dialogue usually ends in indecision, but much has been accomplished. The person engaged in conversation has recognized his own lack of precision and mere assumption of knowledge where true knowledge was none. He leaves convicted of ignorance and perhaps stimulated to search further for a satisfactory answer. All the while, Socrates, with gentle irony, protests his own ignorance and his desire to learn from his interlocutor.

ARISTOTLE is insistent that Socrates considered virtue to be knowledge. In a sense, knowledge is the only good, ignorance the sole evil. There is no such thing as the problem of incontinence—i.e., knowing what is good, but failing to do it because of the lure of pleasure (Eth. Nic. 1145b 21–1146b 5). Socrates analyzes this so-called problem and pronounces it to be a failure in the correct estimate of the relative balance of pleasure and pain or of good and evil (Prot. 353–7). Aristotle summarizes the achievement of Socrates by ascribing to him inductive reasoning and the quest for universal definitions in matters of human conduct (Meta. 987b 1–4). Perhaps the wisdom of Socrates was truly a “human” wisdom (Apol. 20D).

Aristotle remarks that Socrates did not separate his universal definitions from particular things (Meta. 1078b 30, 1086b 3–5), and it is clear from the Meno (80D–81E) that Plato first puts forward the theory of preexistence and recollection in order to justify Socrates’s confidence in inquiry and to save him from the horns of Meno’s dilemma. The theory of Ideas is a development of Socrates’s thought that must be ascribed to Plato.

Appreciation. Socrates was a religious man, who saw clearly the limits of human reason and the need to consult the gods in matters beyond the grasp of men (Mem. 1.1.4–9). He was accused of “introducing strange deities” only because of his constant reference to a spiritual warning that always stopped him from a proposed course of action but never positively encouraged him to act. It is clear that this was, in his view, something distinct from the mere voice of conscience, and Socrates was too rational a man to be given to hallucinations. Of personal immortality he was unsure. Death was either a dreamless sleep or a migration of the soul to another place where it would be immortal and happier than here (Apol. 40D–41C).

The CYNICS are connected with Socrates via Antisthenes, an admirer of his poverty and frugality (Symp. 4.34–44); the CYRENAICS through Aristippus, whom Xenophon portrays in discussion with Socrates on the question of pleasure (Mem. 2.1); and the Megarian school of eristic disputation through Euclides. But none of these minor schools can strictly be called Socratic in tradition.

See Also: GREEK PHILOSOPHY.

Bibliography: A. E. TAYLOR, Varia Socratica (Oxford 1911); Socrates (New York 1933). E. DUPRÉEL, La Légende socratique et les sources de Platon (Brussels 1922). A. K. ROGERS, The Socratic Problem (New Haven 1933). R. HACKFORTH, The Composition of Plato’s Apology (Cambridge, Eng. 1933). A. D. WINSPEAR and T. SILVERBERG, Who Was Socrates? (New York 1939). V. DE MAGALHÃES-VILHENA, Le Problème de Socrate (Paris 1952). A. H. CHROUST, Socrates, Man and Myth (London 1957). G. FAGGIN, Enciclopedia filosofica 4:742–749. F. UEBERWEG, Grundriss der Geschichte der Philosophie, ed. K. PRAECHTER et al. 1:129–158. Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. 3A.1 (1927) 804–893. F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster, Md.) 1:96–115.

[W. H. O’NEILL]

SOCRATES, BYZANTINE HISTORIAN

Byzantine Church historian; b. Constantinople, c. 380; d. c. 450. Socrates, known also as Socrates Scholasticus, was educated by the pagan grammarians Helladius and Ammonius; he became a lawyer in Constantinople and is the first known layman in the field of ecclesiastical historiography. At the request of Theodore, identified only as “a sacred man of God,” he continued Eusebius’s Historia ecclesiastica in seven books beginning with the year 305 and ending with 439. Each book covers the reign of an emperor and takes into account secular history and events in Constantinople, as well as matters of purely ecclesiastical interest.

Socrates’s Historia ecclesiastica has been preserved in a second edition. It uses as its sources EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA; the treatises and letters of St. ATHANASIUS, GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS, RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA; conciliar acts collected by the Macedonian Sabinus of Heraclea; lists of bishops; and letters of prelates and emperors. The first edition of the first two books (only fragments in an Armenian translation survive) was drastically revised when the inaccuracies of Rufinus were detected.

Socrates’s work is particularly valuable because of verbatim quotation of sources. His Historia ecclesiastica, completely extant, is an objective account, uninvolved in theological controversy, nonpartisan and fair in its treatment of heresies (especially the Novatianists, see NOVATIAN AND NOVATIANISM), yet in full accord with orthodox teaching. The work of Socrates was the chief source for his younger contemporary SOZOMEN, for THEODORE LECTOR of the early 6th century, and for the Epiphanius-Cassiodorus Historia tripartita of the later 6th century.

Bibliography: J. QUASTEN, Patrology 3:532–534. R. HANSLIK, *Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart*³ 6:127–128. L. SZYMANSKI, The Translation Procedure of Epiphanius-Cassiodorus in the ‘Historia Tripartita’ (Washington 1963). Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte 1:22. The Armenian Adaptation of the Ecclesiastical History of Socrates Scholasticus, tr. R. W. THOMSON (Sterling, VA 2001).

[H. DRESSLER]

SODALITIES OF OUR LADY, NATIONAL FEDERATION OF

The National Federation of Sodalities of Our Lady in the U.S. was erected by the bishops of the U.S. at the annual meeting of the National Catholic Welfare Conference (NCWC), November 1956, in response to the expressed wish of Pius XII. At the time thousands of sodalities in the U.S., canonically erected and affiliated with the Prima Primaria Sodality in Rome, were serving the Church under their local ordinaries. In approving the national federation, the American hierarchy wished to provide a structure that would unify these singular and individual sodalities, represent them on national and international levels, and enable them to cooperate in approved work of other organizations.

First Sodality. The first Sodality of Our Lady was established in Rome in 1563 by Father John Leunis, SJ, for students attending the Roman College. In its initial years, this organization for men developed and practiced the distinctive marks of sodality life that have been perpetuated through the centuries. Thereafter, for 400 years, the sodality, proposing a Christian way of life through a well-defined program of spiritual formation, tried to implement and unify the sacramental nature of the Christian at prayer and the Christian in action. Its characteristic mark has been service of the Church under the patronage of Our Lady and the direction of the hierarchy.

After the erection of the first sodality, similar groups were formed in other Jesuit institutions in Europe. In 1584 Gregory XIII canonically erected the Annunciation Sodality at the Roman College as the Prima Primaria Sodality and empowered it to affiliate other sodalities willing to adhere to the rules approved by the Holy See. Women were admitted as sodalists in 1751.

The Sodality in the Americas. The first sodality in the New World was founded in 1574 at the Colegio Maximo in Mexico City. In March 1739, Clement XII issued a papal bull approving the sodality founded in 1730 at the Ursuline school in New Orleans, Louisiana. The first sodality within the geographical area of the U.S. after its emergence as a new nation, was at Georgetown University in Washington, D.C. This sodality was affiliated with the Prima Primaria in 1833, but had been established and functioning since shortly after the founding of the college in 1789.

During the latter part of the 19th century and the first few decades of the 20th century, the Sodality of Our Lady was widely used in the U.S. by pastors as a basic parish organization for women and young girls. These sodalities developed during the era when the Church was stressing monthly corporate Mass and Communion for the laity.

Although a monthly meeting provided for some spiritual and apostolic development of the members, many of the groups lost sight of the nature and purpose of sodalities as defined in the common rules.

In 1910, when the common rules of sodalities were revised, there was need to promulgate them. In 1913, the general of the Society of Jesus asked Jesuits in various countries to begin publication of sodality magazines for their nations. In the U.S. the task was committed to the Missouri province. Under the guidance of Rev. Edward F. Garesché, SJ, the Queen's Work was launched to encourage directors and sodalists to honor the Queen of Sodalities through fidelity to the common rules of the sodality.

Aware of the need to meet sodalists personally, Garesché held meetings and conventions across the country. In many localities he was successful in organizing diocesan unions of sodalities, and he appealed to the bishops to appoint diocesan sodality directors.

In 1925 Daniel A. Lord, SJ, who as a Jesuit scholastic had worked with Garesché, was assigned to succeed him as editor of the sodality periodicals. For more than a quarter of a century, Father Lord exercised an important influence on the development and promotion of sodalities. In 1929 he organized the National Parish Sodality Advisory Board, composed of lay sodalists from many dioceses. While this board served in an advisory capacity, it was a formative step toward national sodality unity, and its effectiveness led to the establishment of a national advisory board for high school sodalists. In 1931, in response to the official call to Catholic Action issued by Pius XI, Lord instituted the Summer Schools of Catholic Action (SSCA). These were originally designed for leaders of sodalities so they could assume their rightful responsibility in the apostolic programs of their bishops.

From 1913 to 1963 the Jesuits and laity of the Queen's Work, St. Louis, Missouri, promoted sodalities through publications and in national and local training sessions. Gradually, more bishops gave approval for the establishment of diocesan federations of sodalities and appointed diocesan sodality directors. In 1939 the diocesan directors, with the help of the sodality promoters at the Queen's Work, began to meet annually. These informal meetings resulted in the formation in 1956 of the National Diocesan Sodality Directors Conference. Rev. Erwin A. Juraschek of San Antonio, Texas, was elected the first president.

U.S. Federation. On July 2, 1953, Pius XII juridically established the World Federation of Sodalities whose general aim was to assure union of sodalities everywhere and more effective cooperation in the lay apostolate throughout the world. One of the approved means for doing this was the establishment of national federations of sodalities. Under the World Federation of Sodalities, the first World Sodality Congress was held in Rome in 1954. In November 1956, the American bishops in their annual meeting approved the National Federation of Sodalities and named Cardinal Joseph Ritter (then Archbishop) of St. Louis as episcopal moderator and Bp. Leo C. Byrne of St. Paul, Minn. as executive episcopal moderator.

The first convention of the U.S. federation was held in St. Louis in January 1957, with 17 diocesan federations or unions present. Robert Graffy, a Cleveland, Ohio, businessman was elected president, and seven lay sodalists formed the executive council, with Juraschek as national director. In 1959, the National Federation of Sodalities (NFS) was host to the second World Sodality Congress in Newark, New Jersey. An American sodalist from New York, Mary I. DiFonzo, was elected secretary of the World Federation. The need for stronger unity in the national federation demanded that it embrace sodalities of all kinds and classes, as well as all directors and all movements.

This next organizational step was undertaken by a committee of lay sodalists and directors under the leadership of Bishop Byrne. A new constitution was adopted at the fourth biennial convention held in Cleveland, October 1963, which transformed the NFS into an organism representative of all parts of the sodality movement. Three councils within the framework of the NFS include one representative of all sodalities, whether or not these are organized into diocesan federations; another for the bishops' representatives and diocesan directors; and a third representative of all directors and moderators of sodalities, whether they be clergy, religious, or lay.

In the organizational structure of the NFS the president of the council of lay sodalists was, ex officio, the president of the federation. Major responsibility was placed in the hands of the laity who constitute a majority of the executive council. The council of lay sodalists, within the NFS, reflected the results of the apostolic constitutio Bis saeculari, issued by Pius XII in 1948. The challenge of the social apostolate emphasized in Bis saeculari brought new depth and vitality to existing adult sodalities, and influenced the establishment of many sodalities for professional adults, such as teachers, lawyers, doctors, and business people. Through the apostolic spirituality of the common rules and the Bis saeculari of Pius XII, the NFS also guided the laity to the mature Christian thought and action enjoined on them by Vatican Council II.

In 1971 Pope Paul VI promulgated revised norms for the organization and changed the name for sodalities of Our Lady to Christian Life Communities.

Bibliography: Archives, National Sodality Service Center, St. Louis, Mo. E. VILLARET, Abridged History of the Sodality of Our Lady, tr. W. J. YOUNG (St. Louis 1957). B. WOLFF, The Sodality Movement in the United States, 1926–36 (St. Louis 1939) W. B. FAHERTY, "A Half-Century with the Queen's Work," Woodstock Letters 92:2 (April 1963) 99–114.

[A. J. CONLEY/EDS.]

SODALITIUM PIANUM

Sodalitium pianum, or the Sodality of St. Pius V, known also as Sapinière, was a more or less secret Catholic society or federation of secret societies founded by Umberto BENIGNI in 1909, to implement the condemnations of PIUS X against Modernism. It turned out to be a chief instrument of INTEGRALISM, one of whose leaders was Benigni. On three occasions (July 5, 1911, July 8, 1912, and July 6, 1914) Pius X (1903–14) endorsed Sapinière's generic aims, but the pope never gave a formal, definitive approval. The Sodalitium's activities were supposedly known to higher ecclesiastical authorities; but the clandestine nature of this work has left the movement's history very imperfectly known, even to the present. In its anti-Modernistic zeal the Sodalitium raised suspicions concerning the orthodoxy of several reputable Catholic scriptural scholars, theologians, philosophers, and ecclesiastical historians. These condemnatory judgments were published in La Correspondenza and Agence internationale de Rome, newsletters founded by Benigni in 1909 and 1912 and copied by European Catholic newspapers. Opponents of Catholic Liberalism and Christian Democracy also used Sapinière as a rallying point.

After Pius X's death, the organization disbanded for a year, and then revived despite the warning of BENEDICT XV (1914–22) against restricting free discussion within the Church (Nov. 1, 1914). During World War I the German occupation troops in Ghent, Belgium, seized documents revelatory of Sapinière's work. These were transmitted to the Holy See (1921) and were largely instrumental in the suppression of the Sodalitium (November 1921) by the cardinal prefect of the Congregation of the Council, who acted seemingly at the Pope's urging. The sole public explanation was that the organization had served its purpose and was no longer needed. Some French leaders of the Sodalitium were believed to have joined ACTION FRANÇAISE.

The investigation by the Congregation of Rites preceding Pius X's beatification delved into the Sodalitium's activities. The results were published in the historical Disquisitio which supplies a fairly detailed history of the Sodalitium.

Bibliography: F. ANTONELLI and G. LÖW, Disquisitio circa quasdam objectiones modum agendi servi Dei Pii X respicientes in modernismi debellatione cum summario additionali ex officio compilato (Vatican City 1950). O. WEISS, Modernismus und Antimodernismus im Dominikanerorden: zugleich ein Beitrag zum "Sodalitium pianum" (Regensburg, Germany 1998).

[G. J. O'BRIEN/EDS.]

SODEPAX

SODEPAX is the acronym for Société, Développement, Paix. SODEPAX was established as the Committee on Society, Development and Peace of the Programme Unit Justice and Service of the World Council of Churches (WCC) and the Pontifical Commission Justice and Peace of the Holy See, its official parent bodies. SODEPAX was a liaison body whose task was to promote development, justice, and peace by means of study and reflection programs. Based on the social thinking and teachings of the WCC, these programs were for ecumenical use in the Churches and were developed in close conjunction with the WCC and the Catholic Church. In this way, SODEPAX was intended to be a significant ecumenical instrument of the WCC's and the Catholic Church's common witness to Christian concern for development, justice, and peace in the world.

SODEPAX was established on an experimental basis in 1968, in the spirit of Vatican Council II and the WCC's Geneva Conference on Church and Society (1966). Its offices were located in the Ecumenical Centre in Geneva. By agreement, the General Secretary was a Catholic, the Associate General Secretary a Protestant. In its first phase, 1968–71, SODEPAX organized a number of large international conferences on development and peace, in addition to sponsoring many regional meetings and organizing national chapters in several countries. Its second mandate, 1972–75, was notable for activity in the Far East on development and an important conference which brought together Protestant and Catholic representatives from Northern Ireland to discuss avenues to peace. The third mandate of SODEPAX, 1976–78, saw the launching of an ecumenical program entitled In Search of a New Society: Christian Participation in the Building of New Relations among Peoples. From 1973 onward, SODEPAX published a journal of documentation, news and articles, in French and English, called Church Alert.

In addition to its program function of reaching out to the Churches and the world, SODEPAX carried on a continuous liaison function between its parent bodies, seeking to draw them closer together in both reflection and action. It kept in close touch with the Secretariat for the Promotion of Christian Unity and the JOINT WORKING GROUP of the World Council of Churches and the Roman Catholic Church, while acting as a kind of ecumenical and social conscience for the Churches, and especially its parent bodies. Perhaps most important of all, it attempted, despite its slim resources, to be the effective symbol of the Churches' commitment to unity and to the Christian service of humanity.

In the late 1970s, SODEPAX was caught in the dilemma of being regarded as a "third entity" that overshadowed its sponsoring institutions, the WCC and the Vatican. Under considerable pressure, it reduced its operations, and in 1980 its experimental mandate was terminated.

Bibliography: H. A. JACK, "SODEPAX Program: Guidelines for Peace and Christian Action," Christian Century, 87 (1970) 675–677. H. A. JACK, "SODEPAX as a Thriving Union," Christian Century, 87 (1970) 709–710. G. H. DUNNE, "Principes et activités de Sodepax," in Oecumenisme en mission, eds. J. KEMPENEERS, J. MASSON, and G. H. DUNNE (Paris 1970) 23–39. J. J. SPAE, "SODEPAX: An Ecumenical and Experimental Approach to World Needs," Ecumenical Review, 26 (1974) 88–99. L. J. NIILUS, "Efforts for Human Rights of the World Council of Churches and of SODEPAX," The Church and the Rights of Man (Concilium 124) (New York 1979) 86–91. "Some Lessons from the Ending of SODEPAX," African Ecclesiastical Review, 23 (1981) 258–259. P. LAND, "SODEPAX: An Ecumenical Dialogue," Ecumenical Review, 37 (1985) 40–46.

[J. LUCAL/EDS.]

SÖDERBLOM, NATHAN

Lutheran archbishop, historian of religion, theologian, leader in the ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT, principal promoter of the LIFE AND WORK movement; b. Trönö, Sweden, Jan. 1, 1866; d. Uppsala, July 12, 1931. Son of a Pietist pastor, he was ordained a Lutheran minister (1893), and served as pastor of the Swedish congregation in Paris from 1894 until he received his doctorate from the Sorbonne (1901), where he specialized in the study of comparative religion, especially Persian religion. From 1901 to 1914 he was professor of the history of religions at the University of Uppsala and also at Leipzig University (1912–14). From 1914 to 1931 he was archbishop of Uppsala and primate of the Church of Sweden. His engaging personality won him a very wide circle of international friendships, also among Catholics, whose liturgy and piety appealed to him, although he was sharply critical of the "Roman system." As a theologian he was much influenced by Louis SABATIER, RITSCHL, and other Liberal Protestants and to some extent by proponents of Modernism, such as LOISY, TYRRELL, and Von HÜGEL. His ability, industry, and outstanding oratorical qualities made him the leading force in the Swedish Church and in European Protestantism, despite conservative opposition. His intervention in behalf of war prisoners and displaced persons during World War I and his advocacy of peace won him the Nobel peace prize (1930).

Söderblom's interest in Christian reunion began during his student years and increased during a visit to the U.S. (1890) and journeys elsewhere. He sought the cooperation of all Christian denominations in solving social problems and in serving society without consideration of doctrinal differences. Largely because of him the Universal Christian Council on Life and Work came into being. This movement formed one of the two main streams that in 1948 merged in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Söderblom's numerous writings, few of which have been translated into English, include La Vie future d'après Mazdéisme (1901), Humor och Melankoli (a study of Luther, 1919), and Einigung der Christenheit (1938). His translated books include The Nature of Revelation (1933), Christian Fellowship (1923), and The Living God (1933).

Bibliography: N. KARLSTRÖM, ed., N. Söderblom in memoriam (Stockholm 1931), with bibliog. P. KATZ, Nathan Söderblom: Ein Führer zur kirchlichen Einheit (Halle 1925). T. ANDRAE, Nathan Söderblom (Berlin 1938), originally pub. in Swed. R. ROUSE and S. C. NEILL, eds., A History of the Ecumenical Movement, 1517–1948 (London 1954).

[S. J. MILLER]

SODOR AND MAN, ANCIENT SEE OF

The Ancient See of Sodor and Man is a bishopric formed by the union of the two old Celtic dioceses of the Isles, or Sudreys (Latin, Sodor; Norse, Sudreyjar, the Southern Isles, as distinct from the northern isles of Orkney, Shetland, and the Faroes), and Man, both of which had been disorganized by the Scandinavian invasions of the 8th and 9th centuries. Its foundation date is uncertain, but it occurred after the conquest of both the Isles and Man by Magnus III of Norway about 1098, and before Eugene III placed it under the jurisdiction of the Archdiocese of Trondheim (Norway) in 1152. Its seat was established at Peel on the Isle of Man, St. German's cathedral being built on the site of an earlier church associated with St. German, the disciple of St. Patrick, who is said to have first brought Christianity to Man. The political hegemony that the early Manx kings exerted over this whole archipelago of islands lying between northeast Ireland, southwest Scotland and northwest England, however, led them and their Norwegian overlords into conflict with the kings of England and Scotland, and on July 2, 1266, Nathan Söderblom (r).

Magnus IV of Norway was forced to cede Man (but not the Southern Isles) to Alexander III of Scotland. Later (1334) Man passed into English hands. These changes in political loyalties are reflected not only in the number of Norwegian, Scottish, and English bishops appointed to the see, but also in the fact that, when under Scottish control, it reverted to its old title of "The Isles," and its bishops rejected the metropolitan claims of YORK upon them. The matter was settled on July 11, 1458, when Callistus III transferred the see from the jurisdiction of Trondheim to that of York, a decision that was confirmed later by Henry VIII in 1542. The CISTERCIANS had an abbey at Rushen (colonized from Furness), Cistercian nuns lived at Douglas, and Franciscan friars were at Becmachen. These houses were dissolved at the time of the Reformation, when St. German's cathedral was abandoned to ruin. The Church of England, however, retained the bishopric with its title of Sodor and Man, although today it includes only the Isle of Man.

Bibliography: Chronica regum Manniae et insularum. The Chronicle of Man and the Sudreys, ed. P. A. MUNCH and A. GOSS,

2 v. (Douglas, Isle of Man 1874). W. HARRISON, An Account of the Diocese of Sodor and Man. . . (Douglas 1879). W. CUBBON, A Bibliographical Account of Works Relating to the Isle of Man, 2 v. (London 1933–39); Island Heritage (Manchester 1952). R. H. KIN-VIG, A History of the Isle of Man (2d ed. Liverpool 1950). D. KNOWLES and R. N. HADCOCK, Medieval Religious Houses: England and Wales (New York 1953), map appendices. F. M. POWICKE and E. B. FRYDE, eds., Handbook of British Chronology (2d ed. London 1961) 254–256. A. W. MOORE, Sodor and Man (London 1893). A. ASHLEY, The Church in the Isle of Man (London 1958).

[L. MACFARLANE/EDS.]

SOGLIA CERONI, GIOVANNI

Cardinal, secretary of state; b. Casola Valsenio near Imola (Bologna), Italy, Oct. 11, 1779; d. Osimo (Ancona), Aug. 12, 1856. He became secretary of the Congregation of Studies early, and as a member of the papal household of PIUS VII was imprisoned at Fenestrelle when that pontiff was dispossessed by Napoleon. He also followed Pius VII to Savona. Leo XII made him titular archbishop of Ephesus and privy almoner. Gregory XVI made him Latin patriarch of Constantinople, secretary of the Congregation of Bishops and Regulars, and cardinal (1839). Meanwhile he governed the See of Osimo and Cingoli very capably. Pius IX appointed him secretary of state (June 4, 1848) and president of the Council of Ministers. The latter post normally had merely nominal authority, but Soglia, following the pope's wishes, often acted independently of the lay ministers and came into conflict with them. After Pius IX's flight to Gaeta (Nov. 24, 1848), Soglia resigned as secretary of state (November 29) and spent the remainder of his life directing the Diocese of Osimo.

Bibliography: W. SANDFUCHS, Die Aussenminister der Päpste (Münich 1962).

[A. RANDALL]

SOKA GAKKAI

A modern lay Buddhist movement, Soka Gakkai means "value-creating society." It arose and has its principal strength in Japan, but has followers in the U.S. and other countries as well. Originally associated with Nichiren Shoshu, one of several groups based on the reinterpretation of Buddhism by the Japanese teacher Nichiren Daishonin (1222–82). Soka Gakkai's origins go back to 1930, when its founder, Tsunesaburo Makiguchi (1871–1944), published the first of four volumes of his Value-Creating Pedagogical System. It was formally organized in 1937 in Tokyo and by 1941 had some 3,000 members. Refusal to support Shintoism during World War II brought virtual destruction of the movement, however, and Makiguchi died in prison.

In 1946 the movement was revived by his chief disciple, Josei Toda (1900–58). In the wake of national defeat, Soka Gakkai appealed to many Japanese as a new religious force, but one that, unlike Christianity, was deeply rooted in Japanese history. A stress on health and prosperity gave mass appeal, and members were offered a wide array of cultural activities. Counting membership in households, and never subtracting those who may have drifted away, Soka Gakkai reported growth from 3,000 families in 1951 to 750,000 in 1957, to more than 6 million by the end of the 20th century. Meanwhile it had become involved in politics, electing its first representatives to the Diet in 1956 and organizing its political arm, Komeito (Clean Government Party), in 1964.

Its organizational discipline led some outsiders to fear it was reviving the spirit of militarism. And it disturbed many Japanese by its outspoken intolerance of other religions and its aggressive shakubuku (break and subdue) methods of winning converts. Talk of converting all Japan and building a national temple disturbed those who considered the idea of a state religion detrimental. But these particular goals were deemphasized under Daisaku Ikeda, Soka Gakkai leader after Toda, and some of the militancy subsided.

Since the seventies the Komeito was Japan's third largest party. It stresses nationalism, world peace, and opposition to corruption. It calls for a somewhat vaguely defined Buddhist democracy, rejecting both liberal and Marxist democracy. Soka Gakkai spiritual life centers on chanting Nichiren's phrase Nam-myoho Renge-kyo (devotion to the wonderful lotus sutra), and each household is given a replica of the Dai-gohonzon, the sacred tablet on which Nichiren is said to have written the phrase. The original is in the chief Nichiren Shoshu temple at Taiseiji, at the foot of Mt. Fuji.

In the U.S. Soka Gakkai's initial adherents were primarily Japanese immigrants, including a number who had married U.S. servicemen. In some cases the American spouses became members, and Soka Gakkai subsequently won considerable numbers of other American converts. Since 1964 Soka Gakkai in the U.S. has gone under the name Nichiren Shoshu.

Bibliography: T. KUBO, The Development of Japanese Lay Buddhism (Tokyo 1986). D. A. METRAUX, The History and Theology of Soka Gakkai: A Japanese New Religion (Lewiston, NY 1988). J. D. HURST, Nichiren Shoshu Buddhism and the Soka Gakkai in America: The Ethos of a New Religious Movement (New York 1992). D. A. METRAUX, The Soka Gakkai Revolution (Lanham, Md. 1994). P. E. HAMMOND and D. W. MACHACEK, Soka Gakkai in America: Accommodation and Conversion (Oxford/New York 1999). D. W. MACHACEK and B. R. WILSON, Global Citizens: The Soka Gakkai Buddhist Movement in the World (Oxford/New York 2000).

[T. EARLY/EDS.]

SOLANO, FRANCIS, ST.

Franciscan missionary; b. Montilla, Spain, March 1549; d. Lima, Peru, July 14, 1610. Solano was born of a moderately wealthy family in Andalusia. His secondary studies were made in the local Jesuit college. As a youth, he must have met frequently with Garcilaso Inca, the Peruvian writer, who went to Montilla to live in 1561. Solano entered the Franciscan Order in the local friary and was professed in 1570. He worked 20 years in Spain and 20 years in the Americas. In Spain, he was novice master, teacher, and superior. He was also a preacher with a boundless compassion for the ailing in society, as evidenced by his labors among the plague-stricken in Montoro. In 1589 his superiors sent him to America with a band of missionaries intended for Tucumán in Argentina. After landing in Lima, he journeyed overland to Santiago del Estero on foot, arriving in 1590. He had hardly passed a year among the natives of Socotonio and La Magdalena, when he was appointed custos of Tucumán and Paraguay. Upon the completion of the term, he was recalled to Peru (1598), where he spent the remaining years of his life as superior in Lima and Trujillo.

His biographers often picture him as a hermit of the desert rather than as a Franciscan from Andalusia, whose primary aim was to model his life after St. Francis of Assisi. Those who knew him best called him Franciscus redivivus. A gifted man with a fine voice and training on the Spanish violin, he was fond of composing songs and dances in honor of the Christ Child and the Blessed Mother. On occasion, he would snap his fingers to imitate the castanets of his native province. Knowledgeable in medical lore, he insisted on isolation of the victims of the plague and on burning the garments worn by those who had recovered. His passion was to make Christ known and loved by all men, and to this end he never spared himself. When his novices asked how they could become saints, he told them by accepting the disappointments of everyday life, especially those that came from their friends. He was a man of prayer and a lifelong student, especially of the writings of St. Bonaventure, a select library of whose works he always carried with him. Unfortunately, his writings, carols, and songs were all sent to Rome for the process of his beatification and then lost. Clement X beatified him in 1675 and Benedict XIII canonized him in 1726. His body rests in the Franciscan church in Lima, but his portable altar is in Buenos Aires; his ritual, in Córdoba; his miraculous spring, in Salta; his chasuble, in Tucumán; one cell, in la Rioja, and another, together with his garments, in Santiago del Estero, thus justifying in a way his title as apostle of South America.

Bibliography: J. G. ORO, San Francisco Solano: Un hombre para las Americas (Madrid 1988). M. F. WINDEATT, Saint Francis Solano: Wonder Worker of the New World and Apostle of Argentina and Peru (Rockford 1994).

[A. CAGGIANO]

SOLER, MARIANO

Catholic polemicist and intellectual; b. San Carlos, Maldonado, Uruguay, March 25, 1846; d. at sea, Sept. 26, 1908. He studied in Santa Fé, Argentina, and at the South American College in Rome, where he received the degrees of doctor of theology and canon law. He was ordained Dec. 20, 1872. In Uruguay he was appointed ecclesiastical attorney. In 1875 he founded and directed the Liceo Universitario. He combated the very active liberal campaign of the Ateneo and the Sociedad Universitaria. In 1879 he entered the House of Representatives. Combative and well versed in sacred and profane learning, Soler directed the campaign against the irreligious attacks of the government of Gen. Máximo Santos. This campaign found expression in the daily El Bien Público, edited by the poet Juan Zorrilla de San Martín, and through the Catholic Club, dominated by the powerful eloquence of Francisco Bauzá. The pulpit of the church of El Cordón, of which Soler was pastor, was a focal point of resistance that elicited governmental objections since Church and State were united. In 1886 Soler went to Europe; he visited also the Orient and several Latin American republics. When Bp. Inocencio María Yéregui died in 1890, Soler acted as apostolic administrator of the diocese, and on Feb. 8, 1891, he was consecrated the third bishop of Montevideo. When Montevideo was raised to an archbishopric on April 19, 1897, Soler was appointed the first metropolitan archbishop. To his apostolic ministry and a militant defense of Catholic doctrine, Mariano Soler brought the gifts of a facile writer, skillful in answering his opponents. He was a powerful dialectician who treated a wide variety of subjects, many of which were forced on him by circumstances and had to be developed without the time for careful study. His writings were numerous, and his intellectual reputation is still in the forefront of Catholicism in Uruguay.

[A. D. GONZÁLEZ]

SOLESMES, ABBEY OF

The Abbey of Solesmes, or Abbaye Saint-Pierre, in the village of Solesmes (Sarthe), France, was founded c. 1000 by Geoffroy de Sablé as a priory of the Benedictines dependent on the abbey of La Couture. In the 12th century it was given a relic of the CROWN OF THORNS, which is still an object of great veneration. The priory was destroyed during the Hundred Years' War by the English (1425) but was soon reconstructed. During the Renaissance the 11th-century church was rebuilt and adorned with magnificent statues, called "the saints of Solesmes." The monastery was placed in COMMENDATION (1556–1773), and aggregated to the Benedictine Congregation of St. Maurus, or MAURISTS (1664). During the French Revolution it was suppressed and put up for sale, and the monks dispersed (1791). Prosper GUÉRANGER, then a curate in Sablé, purchased the property (1833) and reestablished Benedictine life. Pope Gregory XVI raised it to the status of an abbey (1837), named Dom Guéranger as first abbot (1837–75), and made it head of the new Benedictine Congregation of France, known also as the Congregation of Saint-Pierre de Solesmes. Under Guéranger Solesmes became a famed center of religious renewal. The French government expelled the monks in 1880 and again from 1882 to 1896. Dom Paul Delatte, abbot (1890–1920) succeeding Dom Charles Couturier, regained possession of the abbey and began large scale construction until the laws against religious (1901) sent the monks into exile to QUARR ABBEY on the Isle of Wight. Dom Germain Cozien, fourth abbot (1920–59) led the community back to Solesmes (1922). The monastery has gained world renown for its role in the liturgical movement and the restoration of Gregorian chant. In addition to Guéranger it has produced such well-known scholars as Cabrol, FEROTIN, LECLERQ, MOCQUEREAU, PITRA, Pothier, and QUENTIN. Among the most notable publications of the monks have been editions of the writings of St. Gertrude, St. Mechtild, William of Saint-Thierry, St. John of the Cross, John of St. Thomas, Bérulle, and the English mystics. Current projects include the publication of the works of Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, and papal documents (Collection Les Enseignements Pontificaux), and a series of phonographic records of Gregorian chants.

Interior of Abbey of Solesmes. (©John Heseltine/CORBIS)

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Réertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:3055–57. O. L. KAPSNER, A Benedictine Bibliography: An Author-Subject Union List, 2 v. (2d ed. Collegeville, Minn. 1962): v. 1, author part; v. 2, subject part. 2:5253–99. P. GUÉRANGER, Essai historique sur l'Abbaye de Solesmes (Le Mans 1846). H. QUENTIN, Notice historique sur l'Abbaye de Solesmes (Tours 1924). Benedictines of Solesmes, Le Monastère Saint-Pierre de Solesmes (Solesmes 1955); Les Saints de Solesmes (Paris 1951). A. SAVATON, Dom Paul Delatte, Abbé de Solesmes (Paris 1954). J. HOURLIER, Les Églises de Solesmes (Paris 1951). P. SCHMITZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 9:864.

[L. ROBERT]

SOLIDARISM

A social philosophy based on Catholic philosophic principles whose leading proponent was Heinrich Pesch, SJ, the famous German economist. Rejecting both socialism and individualism, solidarism finds in the nature of society and man a principle of order for the economy as a whole. Society is a moral organism presenting not the unity of oneness but the union of the many. The economy is an organic-moral unity of many autonomous economic units bound together by the goal and the authority of society. It is a community of free citizens striving for the common welfare of all. The variety, freedom, particular aims, autonomy, and self-responsibility of the individuals and private enterprise are to be encouraged and furthered and also are to be subordinated to the fulfillment of the common task. The state is not a necessary evil, but a necessary good. Its function is to direct, supervise, stimulate, and restrain the activities of the economic units to the extent that the common welfare requires it.

In solidarism the individual is not a mere member of the whole or a mere means by which a state-designated goal is achieved, but he is a person for whom all the activities of all the members of society and of the state are directed. The profit motive is not rejected but merely restrained so that it aids rather than hinders the attainment of the goal of the economy. More generically, self-interest is recognized as a legitimate, natural instinct, a force for good, which must, however, be ordered so that both the individual and community are satisfied.

Solidarism recognizes the importance of freedom in the economic sphere. While it rejects a compulsory planned economy, it also disavows absolute freedom. It fears that unlimited, unbridled freedom will hinder the achieving of the goal of the economy unless it is subject to the demands of justice. Only the acceptance of authority develops and guarantees that degree of justice required by freedom. Solidarism's freedom is the freedom of order.

Both the individualistic, irresponsible, absolute concept of private property and the socialistic concept of state ownership are rejected. Solidarism justifies private ownership and limits it by invoking the principle that "the goods of the earth should serve all mankind." In the last resort the state has the duty and the right to see that this is achieved.

Just as solidarism is a middle way between socialism and individualism, it stresses the establishment in society of groups that will take their place between the individuals and the state. These are organizations embracing all who are engaged in a particular profession or performing a particular service for the nation. All performing the same function in society, though divided by different personal interests, belong to the same group. These functional groups are organs of society that operate as the representatives of the group and as self-governing authorities for the particular profession of industry in keeping with the principle of SUBSIDIARITY. While not essential to the political society, in the sense that society could not exist without them, they are necessary for its perfection. The particular form that these functional groups may adopt will vary according to the economic, social, and political conditions of the nation.

Bibliography: R. C. MULCAHY, The Economics of Heinrich Pesch (New York 1952). F. H. MUELLER, Heinrich Pesch and His Theory of Solidarism (St. Paul 1941).

[R. E. MULCAHY]

SOLIDARITY

Solidarity, as defined by Pope JOHN PAUL II, represents "a firm and persevering determination to commit oneself to the common good; that is to say for the good of all and of each individual, because we are all really responsible for all" (Sollicitudo rei socialis, no. 38). Solidarity is a recurring theme in the writings of John Paul II. In the encyclical CENTESIMUS ANNUS he says that the term describes "one of the fundamental principles of the Christian view of social and political organization," and notes that previous popes have identified the same principle under the name "friendship" (Leo XIII), "social charity" (Pius XI), and "the civilization of love" (Paul VI) (no. 3). John Paul II's repeated appeal to this principle in a variety of contexts makes it clear that solidarity is neither a vague feeling of compassion or commiseration, nor the union of one group in society over against another. Though the pope uses the word to describe the union of workers against the degradation of their work (Laborem exercens, no. 8), he insists that solidarity "aims at the good of social justice," and is not undertaken "for the sake of 'struggle' or in order to eliminate the opponent" (ibid., no. 20). It is a human and Christian virtue, describing the commitment to the common good. It has three principal manifestations, according to whether the common good is taken to refer to goods, activities, or the communion of persons. This same division is found in the treatment of solidarity in the Catechism of the Catholic Church, nos. 1940–1942.

According to John Paul II, the common good can consist of goods, realized in individuals, that share a common species. Because of our common humanity we can say that we share a common status, in the sense that no person is more or less human than another; that there are perfections common to us all, such as health, knowledge, and religious devotion; and that there are things whose use is inherently common, such as money, food, and technology. Each of these can be the ground of moral and legal rights, and thus can express a reason for solidarity. In SOLLICITUDO REI SOCIALIS the "virtue" of solidarity is described initially as the willingness to make a moral response to common goods described in this way (no. 38). Likewise the Catechism says, "Solidarity is manifested in the first place by the distribution of goods and remuneration for work" (no. 1940). Solidarity thus described recognizes and is committed to the virtue of distributive justice, not only on the part of the state, but also on the part of other social groups: families, unions, business enterprises.

The common good can also be realized in the common activity of individuals. John Paul applies this idea to the domestic political order, international relations, the initiatives of intermediate societies, and economic life (cf. CCC 1941). In Centesimus annus he writes:

By means of his work a person commits himself, not only for his own sake but also for others and with others. Each person collaborates in the work of others and for their good. One works in order to provide for the needs of one's family, one's community, one's nation, and ultimately all humanity. Moreover, a person collaborates in the work of his fellow employees, as well as in the work of suppliers and in the customers' use of goods, in a progressively expanding chain of solidarity. (No. 43; cf. Laborem exercens, no. 8)

Insofar as the common good is constituted by common activity, having its own inherent perfection and value, the supplanting of that activity through the intervention of "higher" powers results in the loss of the good itself. The good is not simply the external result (e.g., the just distribution of goods), but the collaborative activity whereby the external result is produced. Pope John Paul speaks also, in the same vein, of the "subjectivity" of society, constituted by "structures of participation and shared responsibility" (Centesimus annus, no. 46); totalitarian societies invariably bring about "the destruction of the true subjectivity of society and of the individual citizens"—not because the State does a poor job of distributing common goods equitably, but because in such a society the individual and the people as a whole are reduced to objects.

The principal meaning of "common good" is found in the theological concept of communion: the greatest common good is the communion of persons. Papal and conciliar documents speak of "communion" typically in reference to those means by which the individual becomes part of, or grows in, the body of Christ (e.g., marriage, Eucharistic fellowship, baptism). It is this understanding of "common" that governs the others. In Sollicitudo rei socialis John Paul says:

Beyond human and natural bonds, already so close and strong, there is discerned in the light of faith a new model of the unity of the human race, which must ultimately inspire our solidarity. This supreme model of unity, which is a reflection of the intimate life of God, one God in three Persons, is what we Christians mean by the word "communion." (No. 40)

The Catechism (no. 1942) likewise speaks of solidarity involving the communication of spiritual goods. This communion has often, throughout Christian history, been the inspiration for the fostering of solidarity in temporal goods, impelling souls then and now to the heroic charity of monastic farmers, liberators of slaves, healers of the sick, and messengers of faith, civilization, and science to all generations and all peoples for the sake of creating the social conditions capable of offering to everyone possible a life worthy of man and of a Christian (Ibid., quoting a discourse of Pius XII).

Solidarity therefore involves charity as well as justice: communion in common goods and activities finds a root in the common nature of man, but it is ultimately secured by the recognition that every person is called to share in the communal life of the Trinity.

With this notion of solidarity, John Paul II has marked out the basis for an understanding of social and political life that challenges the distinctively modern notion of the political good. The revolutions of the nineteenth century produced an aggressively secularist and monistic notion of solidarity achieved by, or exemplified in, the state; in certain species of liberalism, on the other hand, a mechanistic notion of the market is given primacy. In Centesimus annus John Paul II criticizes any system that would "suffocate" the human person "between two poles represented by the State and the marketplace" (no. 49); in Evangelium vitae he warns that authentic solidarity is not compatible with the way the democracies understand themselves today. Contrary to their own constitutions, some human lives are deemed unworthy of protection. The "civilization of love" bases the social good on solidarity: the authentic interdependence of persons, leading to communion.

Bibliography: R. HITTINGER, "Making Sense of the Civilization of Love," In The Legacy of Pope John Paul II: His Contribution to Catholic Thought (New York 1999).

[R. HITTINGER]

SOLIGNAC, ABBEY OF

Former BENEDICTINE monastery of St. Peter and St. Paul, on the Briance River, in the Diocese and arrondissement of Limoges, Haute-Vienne, France. Solignac (Lat. Solemniacum) was founded in 631 at the request of St. ELIGIUS OF NOYON (d. 659), a minister of King Dagobert. The first monks came from LUXEUIL; St. Remaclus, who later became bishop-abbot of STAVELOT-MALMÉDY, was Solignac's first abbot (632–642). The abbey soon grew to 150 monks. In 675 it founded Brageac in the Diocese of Clermont-Ferrand. Solignac was plundered several times and had to be restored in 840 and 1100. Its dependent priories included Arton (Haute-Vienne) and Agumont (Corrèze). In 1571 it was ravaged by the Calvinists. Though incorporated into the Congregation of Saint-Maur in 1619 (see MAURISTS), the abbey had only nine monks in 1768. It was suppressed during the French Revolution, but the buildings were preserved, and sheltered in succession a boarding school, a porcelain factory, and finally a major seminary of the OBLATES OF MARY IMMACULATE. The abbey church, a masterpiece of romanesque art, has been made a national historical monument.

Bibliography: Gallia Christiana, v.1–13 (Paris 1715–85), v.14–16 (Paris 1856–65) 2:566–575. BEAUNIER, Abbayes et prieurés de l'ancienne France, ed. J. M. L. BESSE, 12 V. (Paris 1905–41) v.5. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:3058–59. "Solignac," Bulletin de la société archéologique et historique du Limousin 77

(1937) 155–179. P. MOREL, “Les Archives de S.,” ibid. 84 (1953) 169–180. F. BAIX, “L’Hagiographie à Stavelot-Malmédy,” Revue Bénédictine 60 (1950) 120–162.

[J. DE LA C. BOUTON]

SOLIPSISM

Solipsism is a term that seems to have been first used by G. W. LEIBNIZ; derived from the Latin solus (alone) and ipse (self), it designates the philosophical teaching that a person can know only himself and that there are no grounds for acknowledging the existence of anything apart from SELF. The general theory of knowledge that overemphasizes the subject of knowledge while depreciating its OBJECT is IDEALISM; most types of idealism also imply subjectivism, either total or partial. Solipsism is the ultimate reach of total subjectivism, for it shuts man up within himself and equates his personal experience with the totality of existence.

The idealistic thesis that knowing is an immanent action within man and therefore that man cannot transcend his own mind has dominated modern philosophy. It has led many to the conclusion, unwarranted though it may be, that man cannot know things in themselves. The logical conclusion of such thinking is solipsism, however much its proponents deny this. It is not in any sense a new insight into the problem of knowledge, but simply an old mistake revived. Implicit in the view of the early Greek SOPHISTS, it is later found in the SKEPTICISM of the Platonic academies. ARISTOTLE was aware of it and deals with it in his Metaphysics, where he complains that men who think this way reduce themselves to the level of plants (1006a 15). In modern thought, the faulty definition of the idea by J. LOCKE reintroduced it; G. BERKELEY applied it to man’s knowledge of matter; and D. HUME applied it finally to all things, turning it into a corrosive skepticism that seemed insane even to its author. Hume can hardly be called a conscious solipsist, but he would have become one had he carried his thought to its logical outcome.

The obvious difficulties of such an extreme position preclude any general support on the part of philosophers, even among idealists; and the term solipsism, rarely if ever self-applied or willingly acknowledged, is usually pejorative. Solipsism, moreover, being hardly defensible in itself, is attributed to the extreme varieties of subjective idealism less as a primary position than as an inevitable consequence of these doctrines if pursued to their logical conclusion. It is thus held up as the absurd situation to which subjective idealism must be driven by its own principles: the ultimate reductio ad absurdum of extreme idealism.

See Also: KNOWLEDGE; KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF; EPISTEMOLOGY.

Bibliography: P. COFFEY, Epistemology, 2 v. (New York 1917; repr. Gloucester, Mass. 1958). L. M. RÉGIS, Epistemology, tr. I. C. BYRNE (New York 1959). J. MARITAIN, Distinguish to Unite, or the Degrees of Knowledge, tr. G. B. PHELAN (New York 1959). R. HOUDE and J. P. MULLALY, eds., Philosophy of Knowledge (Philadelphia 1960).

[G. C. REILLY]

SOLITUDE

Solitude, in Christian usage, a condition, or state, of deliberate separation from others in order to devote oneself, without the distractions of company, to prayer. Following the example of Christ, who often went alone to pray, Christians desirous of being close to God have, from earliest times, sought solitude as a condition for continued prayer. In mid-3d century, the first monks found solitude in the desert. In the 4th century, hermitages were scattered through the Christian world (see MONASTICISM, 1). Hermits’ cells grouped around a common place of worship developed into monasteries, in which solitude of soul was achieved by silence.

Authors of religious rules have considered solitude necessary for RECOLLECTION and aimed at it by the practice of silence. In modern times the CARTHUSIANS and CAMALDOLESE achieve relative solitude in their monasteries; the Discalced CARMELITES are permitted occasional periods of complete solitude; all religious communities insist on some solitude, through retreats and times of silence each day.

Bibliography: H. HEMMER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951) 1.1:1134–42. H. J. WADDELL, tr., The Desert Fathers (New York 1936). M. WOLTER, The Principles of Monasticism, tr. B. A. SAUSE (St. Louis 1962).

[P. MULHERN]

SOLLICITUDO REI SOCIALIS

Pope JOHN PAUL II’s seventh encyclical letter, issued Dec. 30, 1987, marking the twentieth anniversary of POPULORUM PROGRESSIO, Pope Paul VI’s encyclical on the development of peoples. John Paul II presents a series of reflections on the requirements of authentic human development, the international duty of solidarity, and the social responsibility of the church. In considering the relevance of the earlier document’s themes for the present era, the pope aims both to pay homage to his predecessor and to set forth the tradition of Catholic social teaching (nos. 1–4).

The pope begins by characterizing Populorum progressio as an application of the teachings of the Second Vatican Council, and in particular the social tenets of the Pastoral Constitution GAUDIUM ET SPES, to the problem of the development of peoples (nos. 5–7). The encyclical, he states, is original in three respects: its bringing to bear of an authoritative ethical perspective on a problem often viewed as social and economic, its transferral of the “social question” to a global context, and its exposition of the proposition that “Development is the new name for peace” (nos. 8–10).

The next section surveys conditions in the contemporary world and comments on their implications for a renewal of the teachings of Populorum progressio. After discussing such indicators as world poverty; the divisions between East and West, North and South, and the First, Second, Third, and Fourth Worlds; and cultural ills such as illiteracy, social and religious oppression, and the suppression of economic initiative, the pope concludes that Paul VI’s hopes for development have remained unmet and that, indeed, the situation has worsened (nos. 11–16). Because global interdependence determines that the levels of development of all nations are intertwined, even developed countries have come to manifest signs of underdevelopment, in the form of a housing crisis and burgeoning under- or unemployment. Moreover, loans to developing nations, originally intended to contribute to their development, have instead aggravated underdevelopment by producing a system of international debt (nos. 17–19). In analyzing the causes of these failures, the pope focuses on political factors, criticizing the ideological conflict between East and West and its impact, via the mechanisms of neo-colonialism, on the developing world; the “disorders” of arms production and the arms trade; and population control policies rooted in an “erroneous and perverse” concept of human development (nos. 20–25). This largely negative balance, he adds, should not overshadow hopeful signs such as increasing respect for human rights, a growing sense of international solidarity, and the spread of “ecological concern” (no. 26).

The “true nature of the development of peoples” forms the subject of the subsequent section. This concept is distinguished from both a naive, Enlightenment belief in progress and a purely economic conception of development leading, in practice, not only to underdevelopment but to a nexus of consumerism, materialism, and anomie the pope terms “superdevelopment.” Authentic human development, by contrast, retains an economic component, but subordinates the “having” of goods to the “being” of the person (nos. 27–28). Its essence, meanwhile, is moral and theological: as the pope shows in a reflection on the creation accounts in Genesis, “full” development is rooted in the human participation in the image of God and the vocation to obey the divine law, to work, and to serve others that flows from it (nos. 29–30). Christian faith, with its vision of the Kingdom, at once found a new assurance regarding the attainability of development and mandates that the church has an obligation to work toward it; this obligation, indeed, is shared by all individuals as well as the various communities including religious ones in which they find themselves, and it is mirrored in the right of all peoples or nations to full development (nos. 31–32). The moral character of authentic development is exhibited in its intrinsic commitment to the spectrum of human rights, including social, economic, political, personal, and collective rights; to the values of solidarity, freedom, and love of God and neighbor; and to respect for nature (nos. 33–34).

The pope next brings this account of development to bear on a “theological reading of modern problems.” In keeping with development’s primarily moral character, he asserts, the chief obstacles to development are also of a moral nature, and consist in such failings as an “all-consuming desire for profit,” a widespread “thirst for power,” and, building on such attitudes, “structures of sin” (nos. 35–37). In order to overcome these evils, a profound change in spiritual attitudes for Christians, a conversion is necessary, leading to the embrace of the virtue of solidarity: “a firm and persevering determination to commit oneself to the common good.” The pope’s exposition of the functions of solidarity both within and among societies demonstrates it to be a core value of Catholic social teaching, intimately bound up with such notions as peace, justice, the common good, the option for the poor, and the universal destination of the goods of creation. Solidarity is, he further notes, a Christian virtue, closely related to charity and, in its commitment to human unity, modeled on and symbolic of the Trinity and Christian communion (nos. 38–40).

A penultimate section presents particular guidelines for addressing the problem of development. Since the church does not profess to offer a “third way” between liberal capitalism and Marxist collectivism, these guidelines are not technical but moral and theological in character. Drawing on Catholic social teaching regarding the primacy of the poor, the universal destination of goods, and the “social mortgage” on private property, the pope calls for reforms involving the international trade and monetary systems, international organizations, and technology exchanges. Invoking the Catholic social doctrine of participation, he further counsels developing nations to promote the literacy, self-sufficiency, and political involvement of their citizens and to cooperate with one another in regional associations (nos. 41–45).

In his conclusion, the pope, making reference to Latin American liberation theology, identifies a strong link between authentic development and “true” liberation. Both values are manifested in the exercise of solidarity, a virtue the pope exhorts all religious people to exhibit. The letter closes with a reflection on the sacrament of the Eucharist and an appeal for the intercession of Mary (nos. 46–49).

Bibliography: For the text of Sollicitudo rei socialis, see: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 80 (1988) 513–86 (Latin); Origins 17, no. 38 (Mar. 3, 1988): 642–60 (English); The Pope Speaks 33 (1988): 122–55 (English). For commentaries and summaries on Sollicitudo rei socialis, see: J.-Y. CALVEZ, “Sollicitudo rei socialis,” in J. A. DWYER, ed. The New Dictionary of Catholic Social Thought (Collegeville, MN 1994) 912–917. P. HENRIOT, E. P. DEBERRI, and M. J. SCHULTHEIS, Catholic Social Teaching: Our Best Kept Secret (Maryknoll, NY 1988) 74–82.

[W. BARBIERI]

SOLMINIHAC, ALAIN DE, BL.

Reforming bishop of Cahors, France, canon regular of St. Augustine (OSA); b. Nov. 25, 1593, Belet (near Périgueux) France; d. Dec. 31, 1659, Mercuès (near Cahors), Quercy, France. Named abbot of Chancelade (a foundation of CANONS REGULAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE near Périgueux) in 1614, Alain gradually corrected the physical and spiritual deterioration of his monastery. He was consecrated bishop of Cahors on Sept. 27, 1637, and worked vigorously and successfully for the reform of this huge but spiritually impoverished diocese. He was strongly pro-papal in the Gallican conflicts and actively anti-Jansenist. He was regarded as a saint by VINCENT DE PAUL and others. The cause of his beatification was introduced in 1783. Pope John Paul II, during the beatification ceremony (Oct. 4, 1981), praised Solminihac for his “courage to evangelize the modern world fearlessly.”

Feast: Jan. 3.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 74 (1982): 261–63. L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 41 (1981): 1, 12. L. CHASTENET, La Vie de Monseigneur Alain de Solminihac Eveque Baron, et Comte de Caors, et Abbé régulier de Chancelade (Cahors 1663). C. DUMOULIN, Au service de Dieu et de sa gloire (Paris 1981). E. SOL, Un prélat ultramontain du XVIIe siècle, Alain de Solminihac et le Saint-Siège (Aurillac, France 1927); Alain de Solminihac . . . : Lettres et documents (Cahors 1928); L'Église de Cahors à l'époque moderne (Paris 1947).

[M. A. ROCHE]

SOLOMON

Son and successor of DAVID as king (c. 961–922 B.C.) of all Israel. According to 2 Sm 12.25, his name seems originally to have been Jedidia (Heb. yēdīdyā, beloved of Yahweh), and the name Solomon (Heb. šēlōmōh, often associated with šālōm, peace, but probably an abbreviation of a longer name meaning something like “may Yahweh guard his welfare”) was probably adopted on his accession to the throne.

Solomon’s mother was Bathsheba, David’s partner in adultery (2 Sm 11.2–5), but the precise details of his birth and early life are not clear, because of the complex nature of the Biblical record. For instance, it is usually assumed that he was the second son of David and Bathsheba, the first having died as punishment for the sin of adultery (2 Sm 12.13–25); but elsewhere (1 Chr 3.5; 14.4; 2 Sm 5.14) he is listed as their fourth son. In David’s time there was no strict rule of primogeniture determining royal succession. Accordingly, David did no one any injury in selecting Solomon as his heir. That he did so is certain, but the details are confused. Solomon, having obtained the crown through the intercession of his mother and of the Prophet NATHAN, consolidated his position by the ruthless removal of those who stood in his way.

More space in the Bible (1 Kgs 1.1–11.43; 2 Chr 1.1–9.31) is devoted directly to Solomon than to any other king except David, but curiously he does not emerge as a clearly delineated person. Most of the material deals with the Temple of Jerusalem [see TEMPLES (IN THE BIBLE)] and his building operations; and the rest, partly owing to the complex nature of the literary form, tells relatively little about the man himself. Even his celebrated wisdom, the tradition of which provides the basis for the later ascription to him of most of the SAPIENTIAL BOOKS of the Bible (Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs, Wisdom, and certain Psalms), is dealt with mostly in general terms. The single specific illustration, the story of the two mothers (1 Kgs 3.16–28), is a familiar theme in Oriental folklore. It is unlikely, however, that his reputation as the wise king is entirely without foundation.

Solomon’s fabled magnificence, alluded to by Jesus (Mt 6.29), is probably exaggerated; in any case, it was purchased at too high a price in excessive taxation, forced labor, and the destruction of tribal loyalties—all of which helped pave the way for the division of the kingdom immediately after his death.

All in all, however, Solomon was an outstanding king. Taking advantage of the momentary weakness of Egypt and Assyria, he consolidated his already strong position and even extended his sphere of influence by skillful diplomacy rather than war. It is especially as a peaceful king that Christian tradition sees in him a type of Christ. Despite his very real shortcomings he seems to have been sincerely devoted to the service of God; yet he apparently did not grasp the full implications of uncompromising monotheism.

King Solomon's Temple, drawing by John W. Kelchner, 1913.

Many events of Solomon's life as described in the Bible have provided themes for Christian art. These include the encounter between Solomon and Bethsabee (1 Kgs 2.19–24), Solomon's dream (3.4–15), the judgment for the two mothers (3.16–28), and the meeting with the Queen of Sheba (10.1–13), as well as the Temple and its furnishings. Sometimes the motif is given a typological interpretation, as when Solomon's invitation to Bethsabee to share his throne is understood to foreshadow Mary's crowning at the hand of Christ or when his judgment is set in relation to the Last Judgment. The earliest example of Solomon in Christian art is the bas-relief of Solomon's judgment on the silver reliquary of the cathedral of Milan (end of the 4th century).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, translated and adapted by L. HARTMAN (New York, 1963) 2260–63. M. REHM and A. LEGNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 9:272–275. J. BRIGHT, A History of Israel (Philadelphia 1959) 190–208. L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, 6 v. (Paris 1955–59) 2.1:286–299.

[B. MCGRATH]

SOLOV'EV, VLADIMIR SERGEEVICH

Russian mystic, theologian, philosopher, poet, journalist, ecumenist (also known as Solov'yev, Solovyev, Solowjew); b. Moscow, Jan. 16 (28), 1853; d. Uzkoie, near Moscow, July 31 (Aug. 13), 1900. Although reared in a devout Russian Orthodox home, Solov'ev became an atheist while in secondary school after reading the lives of Christ written by David STRAUSS and RENAN. He also became devoted to the MATERIALISM of Ludwig Büchner (1824–99) and the NIHILISM of Pisarev. During his university years in Moscow (1869–74), he experienced another religious crisis. From SPINOZA he gained a living sense of God's reality and a clear experience of the total spiritual unity of the world. Other influences on the development of his religious thought were SCHOPENHAUER, Eduard von HARTMANN, SCHELLING, and HEGEL. He attended the Theological Faculty of Moscow (1873–74) and published his widely acclaimed dissertation against COMTE and POSITIVISM, Crisis of Western Philosophy (1874). After lecturing at the university, Solov'ev studied mysticism and THEOSOPHY in London (1875). He then went to Egypt, where he claimed to have had a vision of Sophia, or Wisdom. In 1876 he resumed teaching but soon left Moscow University because of a dispute concerning SLAVOPHILISM. In St. Petersburg he served on the Scholarly Committee of the Educational Ministry and delivered 12 lectures on Godmanhood (1877). He thought the essence of Christianity consisted of the union of God and man in the Incarnate Word, but that Eastern Orthodoxy neglected man, while Western Christianity tended to forget God. These lectures attracted much attention. The audience included DOSTOYEVSKY and TOLSTOI. The former had been a friend of the lecturer since 1873 and seemingly fashioned the character Alyosha in Brothers Karamazov after Solov'ev. Tolstoi's denial of Christ's resurrection caused Solov'ev to be wary of him. A Critique of Abstract Principles (1880), Solov'ev's doctoral dissertation, met wide acclaim, but its author was compelled to retire from teaching in 1881 because he had publicly sought clemency for Alexander II's assassins.

This proved to be a turning point in Solov'ev's life. Thereafter he devoted himself entirely to writing and the ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT. He described himself as an eternally wandering, homeless pilgrim seeking the heavenly Jerusalem. Friends were never lacking, however, to provide him with hospitality. Some of his writings at this time concerned contemporary problems, but his most significant works had to be published abroad because of his growing sympathy with the Roman Church. These tendencies occasioned a break with his slavophile friends, especially KHOMĪĀKOV and Kireyevsky. In his Great Dispute and Christian Policy (1883) he defended the papal primacy. His History and Future of Theocracy (1884) indicated that he had been little influenced by Chaadayev's slavophile views about the kingdom of God. During Solov'ev's travels in Croatia (1886–88), his association with Bishop STROSSMAYER strengthened his desire for reunion with Rome. In 1887 he lectured in Paris on the Russian Church, and in 1889 he published La Russie et l'église universelle, which met a very hostile reception in Russia. The HOLY SYNOD forbade him to write further on religious topics.

In 1896 he made a profession of faith, confessed to a Catholic priest, and received Holy Communion. He hoped to see all men united religiously in Christianity (which would be in practice a theocracy under the pope) and politically, under the czar. His thought became more eschatological in Three Conversations (1889–90), as he became increasingly pessimistic and concerned with the problem of evil and of the ANTICHRIST. On his deathbed Solov'ev received the Last Rites from a Russian Orthodox priest. Since he believed that Roman Catholicism and the ORTHODOX churches remained mystically united despite their outward separation, he apparently considered intercommunion justifiable. His action, therefore, was apparently not based on disregard for canon law. So broad was his erudition that Solov'ev has been called the Russian Newman. Several of his works have been translated into English.

Bibliography: Collected works in Russian, 9 v. (St. Petersburg 1901–07; 2d. ed., 10 v. 1911–14); Collected letters in Russian, 4 v. (St. Petersburg 1908–23); A Solovyof Anthology, ed. S. L. FRANK, tr. N. DUDDINGTON (London 1950). M. D'HERBIGNY, Vladimir Soloviev, A Russian Newman, tr. A. M. BUCHANAN (London 1918). D. STREMOUKOV, Vladimir Soloviev et son oeuvre messianique (Paris 1935). K. PFLEGER, Wrestlers with Christ, tr. E. I. WATKIN (London 1936). N. ZERNOV, Three Russian Prophets: Khomyakov, Dostoevsky and Soloviev (New York 1944). V. V. ZEN'KOVSKIĪ, History of Russian Philosophy, tr. G. L. KLINE, 2 v. (New York 1953). E. MUNZER, Solovyev, Prophet of Russian-Western Unity (London 1956). L. MÜLLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 9:869–870.

[J. PAPIN]

SOMALIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Somalia is located on the horn of the east coast of Africa, and is bordered on the north by Djibouti and the Gulf of Aden, on the east by the Indian Ocean, on the southwest by Kenya and on the west by Ethiopia. Largely semi-desert, with the exception of irrigated areas along the two rivers, Juba and Shabele, in the south, the region is plateau, rising to hills in the north. Natural resources, which are under-exploited, include uranium, iron ore, tin, gypsum, copper, bauxite and salt. Most of the population are nomadic farmers who raise livestock; other agricultural products include bananas, sorghum, corn, sugarcane, sesame seeds and mangoes.

In 1960 Somalia became an independent republic formed by the union of the British Somaliland Protectorate to the north and the Italian trusteeship territory of Somalia to the south. Subsequent border disputes with Kenya and Ethiopia were eventually resolved, and in 1969 the region became a Marxist dictatorship under General Muhammad Siyad Barrah (1911–95) as the Somali Democratic Republic. By 1988 the economy was in tatters due to drought and civil wars, resulting in a humanitarian disaster as thousands died due to famine and disease. In 1991 a rebel Muslim faction took control of the former British protectorate, but fighting continued in the south, despite U.N. efforts at a ceasefire. In 1995 General Muhammad Aidid declared himself president. Aidid was killed in 1996 and the presidency claimed by his son, Hussein Aidid, although with no end to the violence. The inhabitants are mostly Somalis, a Hamitic people, who are almost all Sunni Muslims. There are also Arab and Egyptian minorities, as well as small Indian, Pakistani, Italian and British populations. Most of the population is pastoral nomads. The country was again visited by Capital: Mogadishu.

Size: 258,000 sq. miles.
Population: 7,253,137 in 1975; large nomadic populations, famine, and ethnic warfare precluded 2000 estimates.
Languages: Somali, Arabic, Italian, English.
Religions: (Estimated) 200 Catholics, 100 Protestants; almost all others are Sunni Muslim.
Diocese: Mogadishu, immediately subject to the Holy See.

drought in 2000, increasing the humanitarian tragedy in this region. At the start of the 21st century there was no functioning government in Somalia.

History. The region was crossed by Muslim and Arab trading routes from the 7th century, and by the 10th century Somali nomads inhabited the interior regions. The British entered the region after occupying Yemen, and the region was divided into British and Italian spheres of influence. Successive civil administrations restricted Catholic missionary activity to the spiritual care of immigrants. Capuchin missionaries labored in the northern part from 1891 until 1910 when the British expelled them. From 1904 TRINITARIANS and then CONSOLATA MISSIONARY FATHERS were entrusted with the southern, Italian-occupied section until 1930 when the Franciscans took charge. In 1904 the Prefecture Apostolic of Benadir was created in southern Somalia, while Northern Somalia became part of the Vicariate of Arabia under the Capuchins. In 1927 southern Somalia was constituted the Vicariate of Mogadishu.

The “Somali Socialistic Revolution” brought Mohamed Siyad Barre to power on Oct. 21, 1969. For the first three years of this government the Catholic Church continued its social activities, mainly in the fields of education and health, as well as its pastoral commitments. In December of 1971 northern Somalia was separated from the vicariate of Arabia and became part of the vicariate of Mogadishu; on Nov. 20, 1975, the vicariate became the diocese of Mogadishu.

In 1972 the Marxist government nationalized all 15 of the country’s Catholic schools, and other properties were confiscated. Under threats of violence from Islamic extremists many Christians of all denominations left the country. Franciscans were reduced from 30 to 10, and the Consolata sisters from 95 to 35, and there was also a reduction in the number of lay missionaries. Religious sisters continued to work after this time in government hospitals. The general situation of Somalia continued to worsen as a consequence of the Ogaden war (1977–78), which was lost by Somalia. In response to the requests of the government, Mogadishu Bishop Colombo was able to bring in more sisters—the St. Joseph of Tarbes sisters and the Mother of Carmel sisters—from India to work as nurses in Mogadishu hospitals.

The influx of hundreds of thousands of refugees from the Ogaden war saw the Church in the frontline of service. Bishop Colombo founded Caritas Somalia in 1980 as the instrument of the Catholic community in helping refugees, providing hundreds of wells for drinking water, constructing a hospital in Qorioley and contributing to agricultural and forestation projects. During the 1980s an interreligious library was opened at the Mogadishu Cathedral. The liturgy was translated into Somali, and catechetical books in Somali were also produced. There was also collaboration with Protestants, who used to conduct religious services in the two Catholic churches of Mogadishu.

On July 9, 1989, Bishop Colombo was murdered, and replaced by apostolic administrator G. Bertin. The rebellion against the regime of Siyad Barre reached Mogadishu in late December of 1990, and the cathedral was ransacked and destroyed by fire within weeks. The civil war that followed destroyed all the properties of the Church in the country and obliged all the missionaries and most Christians to leave Somalia. Only a few dozen Somali Christians remained underground, due to the strong threat of Muslim fundamentalists. One of the last missionaries to remain, Father Turati, was murdered in February of 1991. Apostolic administrator Bertin, with the last four Consolata sisters, took refuge in Nairobi, Kenya, from where he attempted to minister to the few remaining Catholics in Somalia and guide the work of Caritas Somalia. The sisters eventually returned to Mogadishu.

The 1990s saw the destruction of the Somali state, the secession of the northern regions as the Republic of Somaliland, anarchy, famine, and banditry. For humanitarian reasons the international community intervened with “Operation Restore Hope,” followed by UNOSOM 2, a United Nations operation, which remained in the region from 1995 until violence forced them to leave two years later. The Church, along with other non-governmental organizations, remained active in Somalia, attempting through the Caritas network to alleviate the terrible consequences of the region’s human disaster.

By 1998 a priest and the four Consolata sisters were all that remained in the country. The sisters operated a hospital in Mogadishu where they provided maternity care and treated 500 children per week. After one sister was kidnapped on Sept. 10, 1998, the sisters—the last Catholic missionaries in Somalia—were forced to leave the country. Islam was considered the state religion, despite the absence of an organized government. Shari’a (Islamic Law) was increasingly implemented in civil governments throughout the region, particularly in the radicalized north, and proselytization was considered a criminal offense.

Bibliography: The Catholic Directory of East and West Africa 1961 (Nairobi 1961). Le missioni cattoliche: Storia, geografia, statistica (Rome 1950) 208, 92–93. Bilan du Monde 2:793–795. Annuario Pontificio has information on all diocese.

[T. A. WHITE/G. BERTIN/EDS.]

SOMASCAN FATHERS

(Clericorum Regularium Somaschensium, CRS, Official Catholic Directory #1250); also known as Order of St. Jerome Aemilian. The Order of Clerics Regular of Somascha, a religious community of men was begun at Venice, Italy, in 1528 by St. Jerome EMILIANI to care for orphan children and to teach Christian doctrine. The founder, who remained a layman, died in Somasca (from which the order took its name), a town near Bergamo, Italy, on Feb. 8, 1537. In the beginning the order was called the Society of Servants for the Poor, and its membership included both clerics and laymen. On June 6, 1540, the society was approved by Paul III. In 1547 Paul IV, the former Gian Pietro Caraffa, who had been the confessor of Emiliani, united the society with the THEATINES. This union lasted only until 1555, because of differences in ideals between the two groups. An attempt was made also for union with the Jesuits, but without success. On Dec. 6, 1568, Pius V promoted the society to a religious order, gave it its present title, and extended its activities to work in seminaries, colleges, academies, and parishes.

During the 17th century the order experienced growth and progress. Some of its distinguished institutions at that time were: the seminary in Venice; the Cardinal Gallio College in Como, Italy; and the Clementine College in Rome, where Prospero Lambertini (later Benedict XIV) was a student. In 1616 Paul V united the Congregation of Christian Doctrine of France, at the request of its members, to the Somaschi Fathers—a union that lasted until 1647. Urban VIII in 1626 approved definitively the constitutions of the order. Among the notable members of the community were: Angiolmarco Gambarana (1498–1573), outstanding for his sanctity; Giacomo Stellini (1699–1770), philosopher; and Francesco Soave (1743–1806), a teacher who had among his students the famous Alessandro Manzoni. During the 19th century the Somaschi Fathers, like all other religious, suffered greatly from suppression and confiscation in Europe. In the early 20th century, it recovered and established houses in Switzerland, Spain, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Mexico, Brazil, and the U.S.

The Somascan Fathers established their first foundation in Manchester, NH, with a program aimed at the needs of youth. The U.S. headquarters is in Suncook, NH; the generalate is in Rome.

Bibliography: P. BIANCHINI, Origine e sviluppo della Compagnia dei Servi dei Poveri (Milan 1941). S. RAVIOLO, Lineamenti di storia dei CC. RR. Somaschi (Rome 1957).

[P. BIANCHINI/EDS.]

SON OF DAVID

A messianic title describing Jesus Christ as man, a SAVIOR of His people who would bring Israel the full enjoyment of God's promises. It is based on God's assurance to DAVID (2 Sm 7.13–29) that his kingship would last forever. Time proved that these words could not be understood literally, but Jewish hope transcended time and gave the promise an eschatological dimension. Men believed that a king would inaugurate this blessed era in this world. "I have made a covenant with my chosen one, I have sworn to David my servant: Forever will I confirm your posterity and establish your throne for all generations" [Ps 88(89).45].

The exile of Israel strengthened this interpretation. Jeremiah wrote: "On that day, says the Lord of hosts . . . they shall serve the Lord, their God, and David, their king, whom I will raise up for them" (30.8–9). According to Ezekiel, all Israelites will be united forever in one kingdom under David (Ez 37.24–26). Psalm 2 describes the submission of all nations to the king appointed by the Lord. Some expected a civil ruler, a prince of peace (Zec 9.9–10); others believed that he would be a warrior who would rule with "a rod of iron," as in the Psalms of Solomon (17.26). This latter work (17, 18) suggests that Son of David was a messianic title favored by the Pharisees, who taught that he would expel pagans from Jerusalem, purify the city, and restore the Davidic kingdom. A popular opinion about the return of David's Son prevailed in Palestine at the time of Christ (Mt 12.23; Jn 7.41–42). The synoptists used this title in the cure of the blind Bartimaeus (Mt 20.30–31; Mk 10.47–48; Lk 18.38–39). Matthew introduced it in the genealogy (1.1), cure of two blind men (9.27), crowd (12.23), Syro-Phoenician woman (15.22), Palm Sunday (21.9), Temple (21.15). Jesus did not welcome the title and tried to open men's minds to another concept of the Messiah. Paul used the phrase "born of the seed of David" and linked it with the statement that Jesus is the SON OF GOD (Rom 1.3–5). This relationship was recognized in the primitive Church (Lk 1.26–38; Acts 13.16–41; Ignatius Ad Eph. 20.2; Ad Smyrn. 1.1). In the Epistle to Barnabas (12.10–11) "Son of David" is rejected as heretical and Jesus is called instead the Son of God. This is in harmony with Jesus' own teaching. Just as He invited men to look beyond the restoration of the earthly kingdom long associated with David, so the primitive Church was not content with "Son of David" but preferred to use "Son of God."

See Also: JESUS CHRIST, III, 7; MESSIANISM.

Bibliography: B. VAN IERSEL, "Fits de David et Fils de Dieu," La Venue du Messie (Recherches Bibliques 6; Louvain 1962). V. TAYLOR, The Names of Jesus (New York 1953). O. CULLMANN, The Christology of the New Testament, tr. S. GUTHRIE and C. HALL (Philadelphia 1959). E. LOHMEYER, Gottesknecht und Davidssohn (Göttingen 1953).

[K. SULLIVAN]

SON OF GOD

The concept is first considered according to its Biblical employment (with attention given here to the relevance of other Near Eastern usage); it is then treated for its significance in subsequent theology.

IN THE BIBLE

The term son of God was used (1) in the ancient Near East to express a variety of relationships of man or the world to God or the gods; (2) in the Old Testament for the people or the king as chosen and called to special intimacy with God; (3) in later Judaism for the pious or just; (4) in the New Testament of Jesus as the chosen, the Messiah, and Son of God in a new sense illumined by His teaching and especially by His Resurrection, and given theological precision by the Epistles of Paul and the Fourth Gospel.

In the Ancient Near East. Here theophoric names expressive of a man's relation of sonship to a particular god were widespread: e.g., Ben-Hadad, meaning son of (the god) Hadad; Bar-Rekub, son of (the god) Rekub; Abiel (1 Sm 9.1), meaning (the god) El is my father; Abiah, Yahweh is my father (1 Sm 8.2; 2 Chr 13.20); Abibaal, Baal is my father. These names were meant to express confident trust in the god's fatherly protection, the sonship being conceived, at most, as adoptive.

When appropriated by kings, the term son of God was frequently understood to express a really divine character in its bearer. This was particularly true of the kings of Egypt, who called themselves the sons of Ra; the Ptolemies took the title θεός ἐκ θεῶν (god of the gods). By New Testament times the Roman emperors had taken over the Near Eastern practice. Inscriptions from Pergamum, Magnesia, and Tarsus give Augustus and his successors the title son of god, θεοῦ υἱός (divi filius).

There was a growing tendency to attribute divine qualities to exceptional men. A prophet or a wonder-worker of the Hellenistic world was called a divine man or son of god. In this way in the HERMETIC LITERATURE, a man who undergoes a rebirth may become "a god, a child of god." Counter to this seeming devaluation of the transcendence of the god, certain philosophical circles spoke of the created cosmos, or of its archetype, or of the LOGOS, as the only true son of god—using the title in a clearly metaphorical sense for the mediating or emanating essences through which the supreme god creates the world, through which he may also be known. Nevertheless, the distinction between the divine and the human spheres eventually wore thin ["Man on earth is a mortal god; god in heaven is an immortal man"; Corpus Hermeticum 10(key).25].

In the Old Testament. The king was understood in the Old Testament to stand in a special relation of sonship to God, and although the title son of God is never given to the king explicitly, Yahweh is frequently depicted as calling him "my son" (2 Sm 7.14; 1 Chr 22.10; Ps 2.7), "my firstborn" [Ps 88(89).28]. This unique relationship was rooted in Yahweh's choice (1 Chr 28.6) and was acknowledged at the king's enthronement: "You are my son; this day I have begotten you" (Ps 2.7). The king was thus understood to sit on Yahweh's throne (1 Chr 29.23), to be His representative and the witness of God's love and care for His people (2 Chr 9.8). Although divine wisdom is sometimes attributed to the king (2 Sm 14.20; 1 Kgs 3.12, 28), and a court poet goes so far as to call him 'ēlohîm, "god" [in the same sense that the judges are so called in Ps 57(58).2; 81(82).1, 6], the king was never given divine worship in Israel, and the Prophets felt free to criticize the ruler as one who was himself subject to God's judgment (2 Sm 12.5–12). Hence, the tendency to exalt the king as God's son was tempered by that other more ancient tradition according to which the people of Israel itself is God's son in virtue of Yahweh's choice, deliverance, and covenant (Ex 4.22; Jer 31.9; Hos 11.1; Wis 18.13; See SONS OF GOD).

"Madonna and Child," painting by Sandro Botticelli. (©Francis G. Mayer/CORBIS)

In Later Judaism. The Israelite in later Judaism who practiced the virtues, especially generosity to the poor, was "like a son to the Most High" (Sir 4.10); but notably the title described the just man who excited the envy and malice of the wicked and was subjected by them to revilement and torture to try his patience (Wis 2.15–18); or the just whom God’s fatherly providence chastised for their own good (Psalms of Solomon 13.8; 17.30; 18.4). At this period the royal Psalms [Ps 2; 44(45); 71(72); 109(110)] were interpreted as referring to the MESSIAH, and although the earlier idea of the king as son of God could be implicitly transferred, nowhere is the Messiah directly called the son of God. (In 4 Ezra 7.28, “my Son, the Messiah,” is probably not original; and at any rate 4 Ezra is not pre-Christian.) There is hesitation (evident in the Aramaic translations of the Old Testament) in using this title even for the king or for the people for fear of its polytheistic connotations. Consequently, at the time of Jesus, Son of God was not a common title for the Messiah, although it is used at times in the New Testament in this sense (Mk 12.35–37; 14.61; Lk 4.41). Judaism never attributed a divine nature to the Messiah; the SON OF MAN (Dn 7.13–14) was interpreted in Enoch (ch. 46, 48, 52) as the Messiah, but was given preexisting, heavenly traits, quite out of keeping with the traditional earthly character and origin of the Davidic Messiah. When the rabbis said that the Messiah existed eternally with God, they meant merely that God knew from all eternity who the Messiah would be.

“Resurrection of Christ,” ca. 1503, High Renaissance style painting by Raphael. (©Francis G. Mayer/CORBIS)

In the New Testament. In contrast to the Old Testament usage, the title Son of God in the New Testament differs both in frequency and in content. For the purposes of the present discussion, it is not possible to leave aside such other usages as “the Son,” “His Son,” “a Son,” “My Son,” “My beloved Son,” and “the [His] only-begotten Son.” Treatment will be made here of the New Testament depiction of Jesus’ consciousness of His divine sonship, the conception of the primitive Christian community of His sonship, the theological clarifications of St. Paul, and the Johannine development.

Jesus’ Consciousness of Divine Sonship. In the Synoptic Gospels Jesus, who frequently calls Himself Son of Man, never applies to Himself the title Son of God. Others, however, use it frequently of Him (nine times in Matthew; five times in Mark; six times in Luke). From this it does not follow that the conception of Jesus’ divine sonship derived uniquely from the faith of the Christian community. The Synoptics attest that the primitive Christian faith in the divinity of Jesus was rooted, not merely in the fact of the Resurrection, but also in the illumination this brought concerning Jesus’ own statements and deeds during His public ministry, which His Disciples at first did not adequately understand. That Jesus conceived of Himself and presented Himself as the Son of God in a unique and preeminent sense appears repeatedly in the Synoptic tradition. An allusion appears in the Parable of the Vinedressers, in which a qualitative difference is stressed between the servants and the son, the heir (Mk 12.1–12 and parallels). If this is discounted as merely stressing the preeminence of the Messiah over His forerunners, the same cannot be said of the question concerning the origin of the Messiah: if David calls his son Lord, how can He be merely his son? (Mk 12.37). Jesus’ deliberate usage of “your Father” when speaking of His Disciples’ relation to God, as contrasted with “my Father” when speaking of His own (Mt 7.21; 10.32–33; 11.27; 12.50; Lk 2.49; 10.22), and the conspicuous absence of the term “our Father” applying to both together evidence a clear distinction between the two. The passage of Mt 11.27 (parallel to Lk 10.22) is important in this context: “All things have been delivered to me by my Father; and no one knows the Son except the Father; nor does anyone know the Father except the Son, and him to whom the Son chooses to reveal him.” The statement portrays a claim to a knowledge by Jesus of God in His personal relationship, a knowledge that the Son alone possesses and that corresponds to the Father’s personal knowledge of the Son, a knowledge that the Son alone can communicate. Particularly interesting is the logion of Mk 13.32 concerning the Last Day: “But of that day or hour no one knows, neither the angels in heaven, nor the Son, but the Father only.” The authenticity of this passage can hardly be questioned, for a community bent on exalting its Lord would scarcely have constructed a saying in which He confesses ignorance. In this text Jesus uses “Son” of Himself, not as men or angels are sons, but as He alone stands as Son in His distinctive relationship with God.

Primitive Christian Concept of Jesus’ Divine Sonship. Although Jesus was conscious of His divine sonship, this divine sonship in the strict sense was not so clear from the beginning to His contemporaries or His Disciples; hence the importance of distinguishing the meaning of the term Son of God when used in the original life situation of Jesus and the enriched meaning perceived by the Evangelist, in the redaction of the account. At the more primitive stages of the New Testament tradition, the title Son of God frequently is used or is shown to be understood in less profound senses. (1) It is not always clear what the term means when spoken by the demons; it may mean only man of God (Mt 8.29 and parallels; Lk 8.28; Mk 3.11; Mk 1.25 and parallels: the Holy One of God), but in Lk 4.41 it clearly means the Messiah. (2) Used by the centurion at the Crucifixion, it seems to have meant only a just man (cf. Mt 27.54 and Mk 15.39 with Lk 23.47). (3) In the INFANCY NARRATIVES the child to be born shall be called the “Son of the Most High” [Ps 81(82).6] because the “Lord God will give him the throne of David, his father” (Lk 1.32), i.e., He will be the Davidic Messiah; and He will be called the Son of God because He is conceived by the Holy Spirit and the power of the Most High (Lk 1.35). The “Son of the living God” in Peter’s Matthaean confession (Mt 16.16) seems to modify Mk 8.29, in which Peter confesses Jesus’ messiahship. (4) In the accounts of the baptism and the Transfiguration of Jesus, the voice from heaven declaring Jesus to be God’s only-begotten Son reveals the highest point of intimacy with the Father. The two events are connected certainly with Jesus’ messianic mission (see also Mt 3.17 and parallels; 17.5 and parallels). (5) In Mark’s account of the trial of Jesus, the high priest asks “Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed One?” (Mk 14.61). Is the second title an appositive of the first, or does it mean the divine sonship in a higher sense? Matthew’s version of the question has “Christ, the Son of God” (Mt 26.63). Luke’s version makes two separate interrogations: “If thou art the Christ, tell us” (Lk 22.66), and after Jesus’ prophecy concerning the Son of Man, “Art thou, then, the Son of God?” (22.67). Luke seems clearly to distinguish the two titles. The evidence that Son of God was not a current title for the Messiah, that the claim to mere messiahship could hardly have been a pretext for the accusation of blasphemy, and that the teaching of Jesus (which John assures his readers was a major object of the trial: Jn 18.19) had laid much more stress on the religious nature of His mission than on His earthly sonship of David—all this points to the fact that Son of God, particularly as qualified by the Son of Man statement in the context, was understood by the Sanhedrin to be something quite beyond messiahship, namely, Jesus’ claim to an intimacy with God given to no other mortal.

It was in the Resurrection that the Disciples recognized Jesus as “the Son of God in power” (Rom 1.4), and thereafter the title is charged with a new significance. In their report of the earthly life of Jesus, which Mark entitles “the good news about Jesus Christ, the Son of God” (Mk 1.1), the Synoptic Evangelists portray His divine power more by what Jesus did than by what He said. That the demons are subject to Him (Mt 8.28–34 and parallels) is proof that God’s royal power is manifest in Him (Mt 12.28). He assumes the divine prerogative of forgiving sinners on His own authority (Mk 2.5, 7). He is not bound to the limits of Scripture and tradition in His teaching, as are the Scribes and Pharisees, but teaches with full authority (Mk 1.22; Mt 7.28–29), not hesitating to improve on the divine law (Mk 10.1–12; Mt 5.21–48). His word abides forever (Mk 13.31), a claim which the Old Testament had reserved for the word of God (Is 40.8).

The Resurrection of Jesus and the descent of the Holy Spirit strengthened the originally weak faith of the Disciples (Mk 8.17–21; 6.51–52; Mt 14.33) and clarified what had originally been a stumbling block for them (Mk 8.32), namely, that it was indeed the divine plan for Jesus to enter His glory by way of suffering and death (Lk 23.26, 46; 1 Pt 1.11), that in order to fulfill the prophecies concerning the Messiah and the conception of the glorious Son of Man, He would first fulfill those that told of the Suffering Servant of Yahweh (Acts 4.27, 30; Mk 9.12; 10.45; Mt 17.12; see SUFFERING SERVANT, SONGS OF). The Resurrection thus appeared as the reversal of the judgment of the Sanhedrin and as the instatement of Jesus in the fullness of His glory as Lord and Messiah (Acts 2.36; 5.31). As this glory is something strictly divine, the term Son of God now connotes the enthronement in a royal dignity that is also divine. To Christ are now applied statements reserved to Yahweh in the Old Testament: salvation through invoking the name of Jesus (Acts 4.10, 12); coming at the end of time to judge the living and the dead (Acts 10.42; 17.30). The consciousness that such a dignity belonged to Christ by right and by preexistence becomes clearer, but it is St. Paul who gives the theological precision.

St. Paul’s Theological Clarifications. In the Pauline Epistles, Lord is the preferred title for expressing the divine glory of the risen Christ. Paul does not hesitate to transfer to the Person of Christ this title reserved to Yahweh in the Old Testament: “God has exalted him and bestowed on him the name which is above every name [in the Old Testament this could only be Yahweh], that at the name of Jesus every knee should bend, in heaven and on earth and under the earth, and every tongue confess, to the glory of God the Father, that Jesus Christ is Lord” (Phil 2.9–11). It is in the same vein that in Rom 1.4 Paul states that God’s Son was “constituted Son of God by an act of power in keeping with the holiness of his spirit, by resurrection from the dead.” From Paul’s doctrine elsewhere, it can be seen that this text does not imply that Jesus became Son of God at the Resurrection, but that the Resurrection manifested His divine sonship and instated Him in its fullness. (1) Christ’s lordship, like Yahweh’s in the Old Testament (Is 40.22–26; 45.18–24), is associated with creative power (1 Cor 8.16; Col 1.13–17). He was “begotten before every creature” (Col 1.15). (2) The “sending” of the Son implies His preexistence (esp. Gal 4.4; cf. Rom 8.3). (3) Christ “was in the form of God from the start” (Phil 2.6). The noun μορφή and the participle ὑπάρχων make it clear that Christ possessed the divine character essentially before His entry into time. (4) The Trinitarian texts (e.g., Eph 4.4–6; 1 Cor 12.4–6; 2 Cor 13.13) put the Son on the same level as the Father. In the prayer of 2 Thes 2.16–17, the Lord Jesus Christ is addressed before the Father, and the plural subject is preceded by a singular intensive pronoun (“himself”) and followed by singular verbs (see also 1 Thes 3.11). The Resurrection is the full expression of Christ’s divine sonship, while at the same time it gives Him the power of becoming the principle of resurrection to His members, who are adopted sons of God (Rom 8.11). Hence, Paul gives precision to the Synoptic theology, but he takes for granted that he is not introducing anything novel into the Christian tradition (1 Cor 15.11; Rom 1.1–4). It is even probable that the passage of Phil 2.6–11 is a primitive hymn of a Palestinian Christian community incorporated by St. Paul in this letter. Nevertheless, in Paul the divinity of Christ is always considered in relation to the Father, who remains the first principle (1 Cor 3.22–23; 11.3; 15.24–27).

Johannine Development. In the Gospel of St. John, twice the title Son of God means nothing more than Messiah. Thus Nathanael’s confession of faith, “Rabbi, thou art the Son of God, thou art King of Israel!” (Jn 1.49) regards the two as equivalent (see also 11.27). Or again “the Son” may be related to the concept of Son of Man and His mission (3.14–17). However, in ch. 5, the strife with the Jews begins over Jesus’ curing on the Sabbath and “calling God his own Father, making himself equal to God” (5.18). The climax of the accusation comes in 19.7: “We have a Law, and according to the Law he must die, because he has made himself the Son of God.” The title here goes beyond messiahship and affirms the uniqueness of relationship between Son and Father that the entire Gospel of John describes. With the Synoptics, John portrays Jesus distinguishing “my father” and “your father,” adding “my God” and “your God” (20.17). But in John alone in the New Testament is the term only-begotten (Son) used of Jesus (1.14, 18; 3.16, 18). “The Father is in me and I in the Father” (10.38); seeing Jesus is seeing the Father (14.9), and Father and Son are embraced in one act of faith (12.44), because “I and the Father are one” (10.30). The Jews interpret this as blasphemy, “You, being a man, make yourself God” (10.33).

On the preexistence of the Son of God, John is clearer than any other New Testament author. If some of the statements (8.56; 12.41; 17.5, 24) can be interpreted as describing merely the glory that was foreseen by Abraham or Isaiah or that was predestined by the Father from all eternity, the same cannot be said of statements such as 6.63: “What then if you should see the Son of Man ascending to where he was before?” and 8.58: “Before Abraham came to be, I am.” The intentional contrast here between an existence that had a beginning and one that transcends time and history, coupled with the use of the divine name revealed to Moses, witnesses to a claim to full divinity, and the Jews are shown to understand the claim by their attempt to stone Him (8.59). Similarly, in the words of the Baptist, “After me there comes one who has been set above me, because before me he was” (1.30), the stress is on the verb relegated to the end of the clause, which predicates a transcendent existence to Christ. The progression of faith in the Disciples is climaxed in Thomas’s post-Resurrection confession: “My Lord and my God!” (20.28).

The prologue is a synthesis of Johannine theology of the Son of God. Calling the preexisting Son the WORD, the text in swift strokes attributes to Him eternal preexistence (“In the beginning was the Word”), personal distinction from the Father (“and the Word was with God”), and divine nature (“and the Word was God”—1.1). Then it evokes His role in the creation of absolutely everything (1.2). He is the principle of all being, the source of all life, and the light that enlightens every man (1.4–9). Then, touching on the shadow of rejection by His own, which will lengthen as the Gospel unfolds, John goes on to portray the gift of “becoming sons of God” given to those who received the Word when He came (1.11–12). The Word was made flesh, and in His human nature “we saw his glory—glory as of the only-begotten of the Father” (1.14). Glory in John expresses the manifestation of the divine nature of the only-begotten Son of God, which takes place already during His earthly life (2.11). It is the mission of the only-begotten to reveal the Father (1.18), and this expression of the Father to men partially explains John’s choice of Word as Jesus' title in the prologue. But the term Logos is more than functional. "His work is to reveal God to men, but this is itself founded upon the very nature of Christ; before all revelation He was already in a certain sense the Word of God (just as the sapiential books say of Wisdom that she was Wisdom in God even before the work of creation), He was in a certain sense the expression of the thought of God" (M. É. Boismard, 94). The prologue thus prepares and introduces the theme of the whole Gospel, namely, that the entire earthly career of Jesus is a projection on the plane of time of the eternal relationship between the Son and the Father.

The history of the term Son of God illustrates the attempt of the early Church to articulate a new experience for which it continually found the Old Testament and Hellenistic vocabulary and thought patterns inadequate. But other tools it did not have. It would be naïve to expect a Nicæan definition of those who first sought to translate into human words their experience of incarnate divinity. "Divinity is felt before it is named, and when it is named, the words are inadequate" (V. Taylor).

Bibliography: A. GELIN et al., Son and Saviour, tr. A. WHEATON (2d ed. Baltimore 1960). J. DE FRAINE, Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 2264–70. V. TAYLOR, The Names of Jesus (New York 1953) 52–71. J. LEBRETON, Dictionnaire de la Bible, supplemental ed. by L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 4:1025–34. E. HUNTRESS, "Son of God in Jewish Writings Prior to the Christian Era," Journal of Biblical Literature 54 (1935) 117–123. M. J. LAGRANGE, "Les Origines du dogme paulinien de la divinité du Christ," Revue biblique 45 (1936) 5–33. C. P. CEROKE, "The Divinity of Christ in the Gospels," The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 24 (1962) 125–139. B. M. F. VAN IERSEL, "Der Sohn" in den synoptischen Jesusworten: Christusbezeichnung der Gemeinde oder Selbstbezeichnung Jesu? (Novum Testamentum Supplement 3; 1961), with extensive bibliography. M. J. LAGRANGE, Évangile selon saint Jean (8th ed. Paris 1948) cxliv–clx. M. É. BOISMARD, St. John's Prologue, tr. CARISBROOKE DOMINICANS (Westminster, Maryland 1957). C. H. DODD, The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge, England 1960) 250–262.

[G. T. MONTAGUE]

IN THEOLOGY

The place of Son of God in CHRISTOLOGY is the subject that will now be considered.

Christology. Concerned with the theological analysis and synthesis of the Church's faith in Jesus Christ, Christology is controlled by the dogmatic definition of the Council of CHALCEDON, 451: ". . . one and the same Christ, Son, Lord, only-begotten, proclaimed in two natures, without confusion, without change, without division, without separation. . ." (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer 302). In the classical theology of the West this statement of the Church's doctrine about Jesus Christ is developed by using the categories of formal ontology; the concepts of Person and nature are used, according to the analogy of proportionality, to interpret the formula of Chalcedon. Son of God within this setting is seen as the subject possessing, though in different manners, the divine nature and the human nature. From this position are drawn the soteriological consequences of the satisfactory and meritorious value of Jesus Christ's earthly actions, especially of His voluntary death; it also follows that Jesus Christ is the object of the supreme form of worship, adoration. The static character of the categories employed by classical Christology make for intellectual clarity in the theological statement of Son of God, and in this way the problems raised by Son of God can be appreciated. But these categories do not easily lend themselves to the interpretation of the significance of Son of God, which is the point of interest today (Leeming, 696).

Investigation into the origins of prescientific Christology, especially into the Christology of the New Testament writings, reveals an essentially dynamic approach to the understanding of the Person of Jesus Christ. The conclusion reached by C. H. Dodd (123) is that even in its developments New Testament Christology goes back to a primitive body of testimonies from the Old Testament, seen as declaring "the determinate counsel of God," now fulfilled in the events that constituted the life of Jesus Christ. J. Jeremias (30) takes this same dynamic approach to the understanding of the Person of Jesus Christ beyond the apostolic KERYGMA about Christ to the historical Jesus. In the very way in which Jesus speaks of God as ABBA, Father, this author (27) sees Jesus bearing witness to Himself as Son of God precisely because of the unique way in which He knows God: God has revealed Himself to Him as only a father can reveal himself to his son. Modern theologians, using existential categories (here given the precise meaning of the categories thrown up by the philosophic analysis of spiritual, personal being), are working to interpret the Christological formula of Chalcedon in such a way that Son of God is seen in a dynamic way. The purpose of this endeavour is not to replace classical Christology but to carry it through to another dimension.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique: Tables générales (Paris 1951–) 2548–2655. R. SCHNACKENBURG and R. LACHENSCHMID, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 9:851–857. O. CULLMANN, The Christology of the New Testament, tr. S. C. GUTHRIE and C. A. M. HALL (rev. ed. Philadelphia 1963). C. H. DODD, According to the Scriptures (New York 1953). J. JEREMIAS, "Abba": The Central Message of the New Testament (London 1965). K. RAHNER, "Current Problems in Christology," Theological Investigations, tr. C. ERNST (Baltimore 1961–) 1:149–200. B. LEEMING, "Reflections on English Christology" in A. GRILLMEIER and H. BACHT, Das Konzil von Chalkedon: Geschichte und Gegenwart, 3 v. (Würzburg 1951–54) 3:695–718. R. SCH-

NACKENBURG, "Der Abstand der christologischen Aussagen des N.T. vom chaldäonischen Bekenntnis nach der Deutung Rudolf Bultmanns," ibid. 675–693.

[E. G. HARDWICK]

SON OF MAN

This title is of special interest because it was the one more particularly employed in the New Testament to designate Jesus and His mission. The import it had in His teaching is to be determined by the associations it already had in His day and the new content with which He endowed it. Accordingly, this article will investigate the Old Testament background of the term, its use in Jewish apocryphal writings, and its use in the New Testament.

Old Testament Background. The phrase "son of man" is a literal rendering of the Hebrew ben 'ādām (Aramaic, bar 'ēnāš; Greek, υἱὸς ἀνθρώπου), an expression that more exactly means "a man," or "a human individual" (see ADAM). It is not the common expression for man, but is used especially in poetic parallelism with more usual words for "man" (e.g., Nm 23.19; Is 51.12; 56.2; Ps 8.5). The prophet Ezekiel is addressed frequently (more than 90 times) by this title by God, a usage intended to accentuate his human state before the majesty of God.

The most important Old Testament occurrence of this expression is found in Dn 7.13. The interpretation of the apocalyptic vision of Daniel ch. 7 as it now stands is fairly clear (see DANIEL, BOOK OF). The four beasts who come up from the sea (7.1–7) represent the succession of world empires. While the judgment passed upon them represents the negative element of God's saving intervention, the positive element is seen in the establishment of God's rule, the messianic kingdom (see MESSIANISM), represented by the investiture of "one like a son of man" with dominion, glory, and kingship. The human figure represents a collectivity, "the holy ones of the Most High" (7.18, 27); just as the beasts were apt for symbolizing the pagan empires, so a human figure was apt for symbolizing God's kingdom. However, just as in this vision the four beasts can be understood, almost indifferently, to represent kings (7.17) or kingdoms (7.23), so also the human figure could symbolize the individual who rules and represents the kingdom of God. The figure in this vision is hardly to be identified with the Davidic Messiah, for he is a celestial being rather than a mortal; the clouds of heaven "on" or "with" (Aramaic 'im) which he comes are commonly the vehicle of Yahweh and an element of divine theophanies. A. Feuillet, J. Coppens, and others have emphasized the fact the apocalyptic expectation looked for a kingdom established from above rather than a resurgence of the Davidic line.

There are some who think that the Son of Man did not appear for the first time in Dn 7.13, but was well-known in earlier, non-Israelite speculation; the human figure in this vision, according to these authors, would not need to be interpreted strictly within the framework of this chapter. Those who suggest such a prehistory (e.g., E. Sjöberg, S. Mowinckel) think especially of Iranian, Chaldean, and Gnostic myths of a primordial man (Anthropos, Gayomart), a cosmological and eschatological figure, the archetype of all men, who will come as a redeemer of men on the last day. Some non-Israelite prehistory of the Son of Man cannot be ruled out, but neither has it been proved. Most scholars hold that the structure of Daniel ch. 7 and standard Biblical imagery explain the appearance of the human figure, which, it is to be noted, is referred to in a rather indeterminate way: "one like a son of man." Even if a new creation motif may be seen here (the raging sea, animals placed under dominion of a human figure with divine characteristics—cf. Gn 1.2, 26–28), the imagery and thought is still that drawn from the Bible.

Apocryphal Works. The Book of Enoch also, in the section called Parables or Similitudes (ch. 37–71), speaks of a celestial man who is closely connected with the establishment of God's kingdom. There are, however, difficult problems of original language, time of composition, and textual transmission of this book [see CANON, BIBLICAL].

In the Parables of Enoch (possibly 1st century B.C.) the Son of Man clearly emerges as an individual rather than as a symbol for a collectivity, as the Danielic figure was, although intimately united to the elect community. He is preexistent (48.2–3), will appear at the end of the world (62.4–5) to sit upon the throne of God (51.3) and exercise judgment (62.1). He is identified with the Messiah (48.10; 52.2) and in many passages is referred to as "the Elect One."

The question arises as to whether the Son of Man of Enoch can be explained simply as an evolution from the figure in Daniel, or whether non-Biblical ideas have entered in. Again there is a division of opinion. Mowinckel believes that the Son of Man in Enoch, where he is clearly an individual, goes back directly to the Anthropos myth, while Daniel's figure, a symbol for a collectivity, is a re-interpretation of the same myth. Thus the Enoch figure would not depend on that of Daniel, but both would depend on earlier tradition. Against this is the fact that the figure in Enoch does not have the nature of an archetype at all; while he is clearly an eschatological figure, there is nothing to connect him with the beginning except his preexistence. P. Grelot and others, therefore, accept Daniel ch. 7 as the point of departure for Enoch's Son of Man, while conceding that there has been a great deal of advance. The Parables of Enoch demonstrate very clearly that there existed in some circles of Judaism, probably before the time of Jesus, belief in a transcendent Messiah who could be referred to by the title Son of Man.

The same concept appears in 4 Ezra, in which “as it were the form of a man” rises from the sea and travels with the clouds of heaven (13.3), destroys the wicked with his breath (13.10–11, 27), and gathers together the lost ten tribes (13.12–13, 39–42). Like the Son of Man in Enoch, he has been kept by God for many ages to deliver creation (13.26) and is identified with the Messiah (cf. 13.32, 37, 52 with 7.28), who is referred to as God’s Son. This apocalypse, probably composed near the end of the 1st Christian century, neither influenced the composition of the Gospels nor was influenced by them. Yet it does bear further witness to speculation concerning the Son of Man in Jewish circles near the time of Christ.

In the New Testament. It is most likely that the Christian community did not invent the title Son of Man and apply it to Jesus, but that He applied it to Himself, a title He preferred above all others and used almost exclusively. The title is found, for all practical purposes, in the mouth of Jesus alone. The rare exceptions are hardly true exceptions: in Jn 12.34 the crowd is quoting Him, and in Acts 7.56 Stephen sees the words of Christ in Mk 14.62 fulfilled; see also Rv 1.13 and 14.14. The usage is found in all strata of the Gospel tradition: Mark, the common source of Matthew and Luke, the materials proper to Matthew and Luke, respectively, and John (see SYNOPSIS OF THE GOSPELS).

It is clear from the discussion above that Son of Man was considered a messianic title in at least some circles. (For Jewish interpretation of the Danielic figure in a messianic sense during the rabbinic period, see texts given in Strack-Billerbeck on Mt 8.20.) Yet there are many who doubt that this usage was widely spread; no example of it has been found at Qumran, for instance. It is also true that while Jesus avoided the title Messiah (see MARK, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO), He freely used Son of Man. Part of the explanation probably lies in the nationalistic overtones the title Messiah had acquired in popular expectations and in political overtones that would have been a threat to His mission.

Jesus never mechanically adopted earlier traditions, but always transformed them to conform to His own original conception of His mission. Thus it is necessary to seek the meaning the term Son of Man took on in the light of His teaching and ministry. Scholars often distinguish various classes of Son of Man sayings: those in which the title refers to the glory and power of Jesus, hidden during His earthly ministry, but to be revealed at His Parousia

(e.g., Mk 2.10; 8.38; 13.26–27; 14.62; Mt 10.23; 16.27; 19.28; 25.31); those in which the title recalls the humble circumstances of His ministry (e.g., Mt 8.20; 11.19); and those which refer to suffering and death (e.g., Mk 8.31; 9.31; 10.33). The first series builds in part upon the figure of Dn 7.13 (glory, power, clouds of heaven), but also goes beyond it (the Son of Man sits upon the throne of glory and judges), perhaps building upon the usage the Son of Man in Enoch. The second series of texts finds no parallels in earlier literature mentioning the Son of Man; however, the basic expression was apt for expressing the condition of human weakness (cf. its use in Ezekiel) in which the Savior had come, as well as the suffering He would endure in the absolute obedience by which He redeemed mankind. In the third series, Jesus brought a whole new content to the term Son of Man by applying to Himself under this rubric what had been said of the Servant of the Lord (see SUFFERING SERVANT, SONGS OF). At the Last Supper He said, “The Son of Man indeed goes his way, as it is written of him” (Mk 14.21, and see 9.11); the Scripture referred to is almost certainly Is 53.1–12 (cf. also 1 Cor 15.1–3; see Mk 10.45). The sayings that combine predictions of the Passion [see PASSION OF CHRIST, I (IN THE BIBLE)] and the Resurrection likewise find their natural source in the Servant of the Lord oracles. In thus combining two currents of thought under one title, the New Testament immeasurably enriched both: the Servant of the Lord, who by His obedient suffering and death would redeem Israel and all the world, was also the Son of Man who would one day be revealed in glory as God’s Son and judge of all men. Both Old Testament figures find their fullest and most natural explanation as corporate personalities and so illustrate well the relationship of the faithful to Jesus: by incorporation into Christ the believer shares in that absolute obedience to the will of God which destroys sin and enables him to share in the glory of the second coming.

In the fourth Gospel also, Passion and glorification are both referred to in Son of Man passages, but here the tendency is to unite the two concepts more strictly, even to the extent of seeing the Passion already the beginning of Christ’s glorification. This is done especially by the play on words in which “to be lifted up” (Jn 3.14; 8.28; 12.23, 34) signifies both His being raised up in crucifixion and His exaltation in one and the same act (see JOHN, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST.). St. John also puts a certain emphasis on Our Lord’s preexistence in heaven (3.13; 6.63; 17.5; cf. 1.1–2); while this is a necessary corollary of faith in His divinity, it is possible that the formulation owes something to the teaching of Enoch. [see JESUS CHRIST (IN THE BIBLE).]

While the evangelists place all these “Son of Man” sayings in the mouth of Jesus, there is little doubt that the faith of the early Church developed the nucleus of sayings attributed to Jesus and enriched them with new insights from Christian faith. The degree to which this has been done is impossible to determine.

St. Paul does not use the term Son of Man, but he does speak of Jesus as “the Man” (the actual meaning of the longer phrase) in Rom 5.12–21, and as the “last Adam” in 1 Cor 15.45–49, in such a way as to link up with the Jewish speculation on Adam that was closely akin to and possibly dependent on myths concerning primordial man. Paul, however, clearly distinguishes and separates the figures (the first earthly, the second heavenly) that non-Christian thought had tended to identify. See further, O. Cullmann in bibliography.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, translated and adapted by L. HARTMAN (New York, 1963) 2270–79. S. E. JOHNSON, G. A. BUTTRICK, ed., The Interpreters' Dictionary of the Bible, 4 v. (Nashville 1962) 4:413–420. E. SJÖBERG, Der Menschensohn im äthiopischen Henochbuch (Lund 1946). J. COPPENS and L. DEQUEKER, Le Fils de l'homme et les Saints du Très-Haut en Daniel VII, dans les Apocryphes et dans le Nouveau Testament (2d ed. Paris 1961), with ample bibliog. O. CULLMANN, The Christology of the New Testament, tr. S. C. GUTHRIE and C. A. M. HALL (Philadelphia 1959) 137–192. S. O. MOWINCKEL, He That Cometh, tr. G. W. ANDERSON (Nashville 1956) 346–450. C. H. DODD, The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge, England 1953) 241–249. P. GRELOT, “Le Messie dans les Apocryphes de l'Ancien Testament,” La Venue du Messie, ed., E. MASSAUX et al. (Bruges 1962) 19–50. A. J. B. HIGGINS, “Son of Man-Forschung since The Teaching of Jesus,” New Testament Essays; Studies in Memory of T. W. Manson, 1893–1958, ed. A. J. B. HIGGINS (Manchester 1959) 119–135. A. FEUILLET, “Le Fils de l'homme de Daniel et la tradition biblique,” Revue Biblique 60 (Paris 1892–) 170–202, 321–346. T. W. MANSON, “The Son of Man in Daniel, Enoch, and the Gospels,” The Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 32 (Manchester 1949–50) 171–193. V. TAYLOR, “The Son of Man Sayings Relating to the Parousia,” Expository Times 58 (Edinburgh 1946–47) 12–15. D. R. BURKETT, The Son of Man Debate: A History and Evaluation 107 (Cambridge and New York 1999). G. W. E. NICKELSBURG, “Son of Man,” Anchor Bible Dictionary 6:137–150. J. A. FITZMYER, “Some Implications of the New Henoch Literature from Qumran,” Theological Studies 38 (1977) 221–45.

[J. JENSEN]

SONG OF SONGS

The Song of Songs, or Canticle of Canticles, is a canonical book of the OT. The title means “the greatest song,” and the book is the first of the megillôt or “scrolls” used in the liturgy of the Synagogue. This article treats of its author, date, and canonicity; its literary structure; its content; and its interpretation.

Authorship. The authorship is unknown; the mention of Solomon in 3.7; 8.11 probably is a reason why this postexilic work was ascribed to him. Although some of the songs are doubtless pre-exilic (as suggested by the reference to Thersa, the early capital of the Northern Kingdom, in 6.4), the form of the language, as a whole, suggests a late date. Early Jewish tradition indicates that there was some opposition before the first Christian century to its inclusion in the canon [see W. Rudolph, Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft 18 (1942–43) 189–199]. Among Christians, Theodore of Mopsuestia is alleged to have opposed the work; but the condemnation of Theodore at Chalcedon V in 553 is aimed at his views concerning the inspired character of the book, not at the so-called naturalistic interpretation attributed to him [see R. E. Murphy, The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 15 (1953) 502–503; A. Brunet, Études et Recherches 9 (Ottawa 1955) 155–170].

Literary Structure. Although there are refrains in the work (2.7; 3.5; 8.4; etc.), there has been no general agreement on the division into poetic units. A. Bea finds seven; the CCD has 24 subheadings. As the book now stands, several songs have been combined into a loose unity. Some scholars (e.g., F. Delitzsch) have interpreted it as a drama, with two leading characters, Solomon and the Sulamite girl (cf. Ct. 7.1). Others (e.g., H. Ewald; W. Pouget-J. Guitton) have recognized three characters: the girl, her rustic lover, and Solomon, whose blandishments the girl resists. But the dramatic interpretation has not been able to overcome its own subjective and arbitrary explanations. There is no example of any drama in all of ancient Semitic literature, and in this book any conflict between the alleged suitors necessary for true drama seems to be absent. The truth in this view is that the Song is in a certain sense dramatic, since it is a dialogue, as the ancients recognized and as the Hebrew text itself makes clear; hence, modern translations (e.g., CCD) supply marginal rubrics to indicate the speakers.

Contents. As a collection of love lyrics, this book is not easy to summarize. The poems follow no logical sequence; rather, they express the various moods of love: the joy of union, the pain of separation. There are protestations of love and fidelity, reminiscences of courtship, descriptions of each other's beauty. The mood of mutual love is sustained throughout, but a high-point is reached in 8.6–7, “Set me as a seal on your heart. . . .” The imagery is spontaneous and varied: gazelles and hinds, pomegranates and mandrakes, myrrh and spices, vineyards and wine. The rich use of geographical references suggests the disparate origins of the lyrics: Cedar, Engaddi, Lebanon, etc.

Interpretation. If identifying the literary structure is difficult, the interpretation of the meaning is more so. Both Christian and Jewish interpretations have agreed on a religious meaning: this book describes the love of Yahweh and Israel (or Christ and the Church) in terms of human marriage, thus continuing the theme inaugurated by Hosea (ch. 1–3) and echoed in many later prophets (Is 1.21–22; 62.5; Jer 3.1–10; Ez ch. 16, 23).

As Parable or Allegory. In detail, this interpretation is worked out as a parable, or as an allegory. The parabolic view is presented by D. Buzy, who claims that the work as a whole deals with the covenant relationship under the guise of human marriage. One should not press the details here; they serve to create the marriage atmosphere and to carry on the theme. Others argue that the Song is an allegory; the details have each a transferred meaning, referring to various aspects of Yahweh's dealings with Israel. This approach was first given a strong philological and exegetical basis by P. Joüon, and it has been supported by the method of style anthologique, applied by A. Robert. The "anthological style" refers to the Biblical practice (e.g., in Prv ch. 1–9, Sir, Wis) of composing a work in phrases and diction borrowed from earlier Biblical works; presumably the allusions to the previous books betray the intention of the writer of this book.

As Cultic Songs. Another interpretation, by such scholars as T. Meek, M. Haller, H. Ringgren, H. Schmökel, finds in this book cultic songs of the pagan myth of Tammuz and Ishtar. Presumably these could have been sung in the temple (e.g., during the reign of Manasseh) and might later have entered the Passover liturgy. But the contacts that are pointed out between the Song and the myth are not sufficient to establish this interpretation. Nor can one easily imagine that Israel would have glossed over such origins in eventually accepting the poems into the canon. Any similarity is more easily explained by the influence that popular beliefs might have had on the love poetry and the wedding imagery of the Israelites themselves.

As Extolling Human Love. In recent times several Catholic scholars have criticized both the allegorical and parabolic approach. The principal reason for this criticism is that the obvious meaning of the Song is human love. When human love is used in the prophetic writing as referring to Yahweh and Israel, the explanation of the symbolism is always given. Hence we may not presume that the intent of this book goes beyond the obvious and direct meaning. The use made by the prophets is usually in terms of Israel as the adulterous spouse (Hos 2.18–22; Is 62.5; etc. are clear exceptions), but the Song presents a picture of idyllic love. The elaborate use of anthological style by A. Robert and A. Feuillet has not convinced many, especially for the reason that there is no indication in the Song of alleged mercy toward an unfaithful spouse.

There is a strong trend among recent Catholic scholars to agree with many of their Protestant colleagues (H.

H. Rowley, W. Rudolph, etc.) that the literal sense of this book is the extolling of love and fidelity between man and woman; so say J. P. Audet, A. Dubarle (at the Louvain Journées bibliques of 1963), M. van den Oudenrijn, and others. Comparison of this book with the love poems of the ancient Near East, especially Egypt, shows a common atmosphere and similarity of theme. The Song would be the "voice of the bridegroom" and the "voice of the bride" mentioned in Jer 7.34 (Audet). Such praise of love is entirely consonant with inspiration, since God himself is the author of that love (Gn 1.27).

In line with this deeper understanding of love, these scholars also allow that a higher sense, fuller or typical, can be found here. Human love is a participation in divine love, to which it is oriented; the family reflects the people of God. Here exegesis would join the age-old interpretation that sees in the Song the description of the love between God and his People. Christian tradition has developed this theme, already found in the NT (Eph 5.23–25, marriage compared to the relationship between Christ and his Church). The famous medieval writers, such as St. Bernard, and the mystical writers, such as St. John of the Cross, have exploited the richness of this interpretation.

Bibliography: For surveys, see R. E. MURPHY, "Recent Literature on the Canticle," The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 16 (1954) 1–11. H. H. ROWLEY, The Servant of the Lord and Other Essays on the Old Testament (London 1952). A complete and up-to-date bibliography is to be found in the two recent commentaries: A. ROBERT et al., eds. and trs., Le Cantique des cantiques (Études bibliques; Paris 1963) 29–39 and G. GERLEMAN, Ruth, Das Hohelied (Biblischer Kommentar: Altes Testament 18.2; Neukirchen 1963) 85–92. D. BUZY, ed. and tr., Le Cantique des Cantiques (Paris 1950). T. MEEK, The Song of Songs, The Interpreters' Bible, ed. G. A. BUTTRICK et al. (New York 1951–57) 5:91–148. W. RUDOLPH, Das Buch Ruth, Das Hohe Lied, Die Klagelieder (Kommentar zum Alten Testament 17:1–3; Gütersloh 1962). For comparisons with ancient Near Eastern literatures, cf. the excursus in the volume by Robert, et al. 339–421. A history of interpretation is to be found in F. OHLY, Hohelied-Studien (Wiesbaden 1958). Two important articles are: A. M. DUBARLE, "L'Amour humain dans le Cantique des cantiques," Revue biblique 61 (1954) 67–86. J. P. AUDET, "Le Sens du Cantique des cantiques," Revue biblique 62 (1955) 197–221.

[R. E. MURPHY]

SONNET, RELIGIOUS USE OF

After some centuries of existence as a light love lyric, the sonnet began to find profound religious use in late 16th-century England. After Tottel's Miscellany introduced, in 1557, the sonnets of Thomas Wyatt (1503–42) and the Earl of Surrey (1517?–46?), the Petrarchan tradition of languishing lovers complaining of cruel mistresses in 14 lines of closely rhymed iambic pen-tameter verses flourished, and collections of sonnet sequences flooded the literary market. But a number of writers began to experiment with the form as an expression of religious thought and feeling. In the last decade of the century, the Protestant Barnabe Barnes (1570?–1609) and the Catholic Henry Constable (1562–1613) turned out undistinguished collections of Spirituall Sonnettes. A far better poet, Sidney, in his “Leave me, O love which reachest but to dust,” used the sonnet to celebrate the progress from mortal love to “Eternall Love.” Shakespeare, in sonnets such as his 116, 129, and 146, echoed the religious insights of St. Paul. In Sonnet 116 (“Let me not to the marriage of true minds / Admit impediments”), for example, Shakespeare embodied much of ch. 13 of 1 Corinthians, and followed Paul’s thought so far as to state that if there were no love (in the full Pauline sense of the unselfish willing of the good of another), both literature and life would be meaningless: “If this be error and upon me proved, Solidus never writ, nor no man ever loved.”

The first complete flowering of the religious use of the sonnet came with DONNE’s Holy Sonnets, written in the early years of the 17th century. Here for the first time a great poet demanded that sonnets set forth carefully articulated Christian dogma, sometimes with enormous power (“Batter my heart, three-personed God”) and sometimes with profound tenderness (“Immensitie cloysterd in thy deare wombe”).

In two famous sonnets, Milton’s “soul-animating strains” expressed religious conviction: “On his blindness,” which accepts God’s providence in spite of appearances, and “Thy martyred saints,” which foretells the triumph of God’s justice.

Wordsworth’s Treatment. For the next century and a half, interest in the sonnet waned, and not until Wordsworth joined in the attempts to revive the Petrarchan tradition did the religious use of the sonnet by a great poet appear once again. The results here were largely unfortunate. In some of his good sonnets, such as “The World is too much with us,” Wordsworth expressed his conviction that a response to natural beauty will evoke also a religious response—though to him this may mean no more than bringing oneself to an experience of one’s own spirituality. But Wordsworth called upon the sonnet to express dogmatic facts in historical sequence in his long Ecclesiastical Sonnets, a history of the Anglican Church.

These poor, warped poems fail to express any profound grasp of Christian dogma, to say nothing of the bathetic things they do with history. They clumsily and grotesquely attack the Catholic Church at times, as in the section (xix–xvii) depicting the dissolution of the monasteries and shrines during Henry VIII’s reign. Here monks and nuns sit on either side of a huge hearth quaffing beer and roaring, “Our kingdom’s here.” The dismissal of the saints and of idolatry, after being noted and approved, is sentimentally mourned. The sonnet often included in Catholic anthologies, “The Virgin” (xxv), with its much-quoted line, “Our tainted nature’s solitary boast,” appears at this point. Its statement, “Thy image falls to earth,” often glossed as a Protestant poet’s tribute to Mary’s influence, in context means merely, “Your statue, your graven image, forbidden by God, fails to the ground.” But, the poem goes on to say, the idolatry of Catholics might merit forgiveness because of the beauty of the Ideal Woman—scarcely a Catholic or an Anglican attitude. A careful reading of the poem will disclose that Wordsworth is really writing about a goddess whose beauty he admires, not about the Mother of God.

Hopkins’s Achievements. The highest point for the religious use of the sonnet comes between 1875 and 1889, the productive years of one of England’s great religious poets, Gerard Manley HOPKINS. Like Wordsworth, Hopkins set forth, as in “God’s Grandeur,” a response to natural beauty, but in and beyond nature he responded also to God, the dynamic Creator and Sustainer of nature. Hopkins, too, drew upon Christian dogma for the elements of his sonnets; and in “The Windhover: To Christ our Lord” and “As Kingfishers Catch Fire,” he echoed St. Paul far more pointedly and profoundly than did Shakespeare, expressing the Catholic insight of the identity of Christ and Christian in the Mystical Body—“I live now, not I, but Christ lives in me.”

The success of Donne and Hopkins (and Wordsworth’s failure) in using the sonnet for religious ends may indeed, as Louis Martz suggests in his study of the poetry of meditation, owe something to the activity of Ignatian meditation influencing the artistic vision and techniques of those artists (or failing to do so, as in Wordsworth’s case). More likely, however, is the supposition that the power of Catholic tradition added to the vigor and depth of Catholic belief (qualified but not destroyed in Donne’s vision) provided the added element rare in our literature to account for the bias and the success of these poets in their religious sonnets.

Bibliography: L. L. MARTZ, The Poetry of Meditation (New Haven 1954; repr. pa. 1962).

[R. BOYLE]

SONS OF DIVINE PROVIDENCE

Filii Divinae Providentiae (FDP; Official Catholic Directory #0410), a congregation of priests with papal approbation (1944 and 1954), founded by Don Luigi Orione in 1903. It is one of five communities that comprise Orione's Little Work of Divine Providence; there are communities of priests, brothers, hermits, and two of sisters (the LITTLE MISSIONARY SISTERS OF CHARITY, and the Perpetual Adorers of the Blessed Sacrament; the members of the latter group are blind persons). Orione began his apostolate as a seminarian at Tortona, Italy, in 1892, and after ordination he established a series of oratories for the care and education of neglected boys. The bishop of Tortona gave initial approval to Orione and his companions on March 21, 1903, under the name Sons of Divine Providence. The first foundation in the United States was established at Boston, Massachusetts, in 1949. The generalate is in Rome.

Bibliography: D. SPARPAGLIONE, Vita di Don Orione (Venice 1942). D. HYDE, God's Bandit (Westminster, Maryland 1957).

[J. COSS/EDS.]

SONS OF GOD

The title sons of God was used outside Israel for beings that belonged to the divine sphere or for men who worshiped a given deity, and in Israel, for beings, heavenly or earthly, who were in some way associated with divine functions; for the members of Israel as objects of the divine election, and for the pious. In the New Testament it is used for those who do God's will and imitate His love for all men, and for those chosen and adopted by God who accept through faith the Redemption by Christ.

Outside Israel. The term sons of God was a common term in the mythologies of the ancient Near East for the divine offspring of a certain god or goddess. Thus, in the Ugaritic texts, EL and his consort Asherah are clearly designated as the parents of the gods who are collectively designated as the "seventy children of Asherah" (II Anchor Bible VI 46), "the generation [circle, family] of El," (III K III 17–19), or the "circle of the sons of El," (2:17, 34; 107:2). Similarly, in Babylonia, Apsu and Tiamat are the begetters of the gods, Anu is Anshar's first-born, etc. (see J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, 61).

The term is likewise used of demigods, whether these are represented as the offspring of god and man (Gilgamesh being depicted as two-thirds god and one-third man), or as a kind of god incarnate, as were the kings of Egypt, or the Phoenician Keret, a mortal hero or king who addresses El as his Father (I K 41, 59, 76, 169) and is called "the son of El" and "the offspring of the Beneficent and Holy One" (II K I–II 10–11, 20, 21).

The worshipers of a national god are called the sons of this god, who was considered to be the head of the tribe, family, or house (whence the term "the lord of the house" among the Aramaeans of the 9th and 8th centuries B.C.). Early in the 1st millennium the Aramaeans named their children "Son of (the god) Hadad," a custom that later became very popular among the pagans of Syria and Mesopotamia in the early Christian age. An echo of this widespread practice is found in Nm 21.29, where the worshipers of Chamos, god of the Moabites, are called his sons and daughters (see also Jer 2.27).

Finally, in keeping with the Semitic usage of the word son in the sense of one belonging to a class or group, the title sons of God may stand for the whole assembly of divine beings, for those who belong to the sphere of the divine.

In Israel. In adapting the title sons of God to its monotheistic faith, the Old Testament used it with various meanings.

Applied to the Angels. The title most frequently refers to those heavenly beings who form the court of God, who serve Him, act as His messengers and at times do battle for Him, who were later given the technical title angels [Jb 1.5; 2.1; 38.7; Ps 28(29).1; 88(89).7; Dn 3.24; see also 1 Kgs 22.19; Gn 35.7]. This general usage invites taking sons of God in the controverted passage Gn 6.1–4 in the same sense, particularly in virtue of the contrast there between sons of God and daughters of men. The Septuagint (LXX), later Judaism (esp. the book of Enoch 5.1–10.17), and nearly all the Fathers of the first three centuries concur in this interpretation. The other interpretation that sees in these sons of God the Sethites and in the daughters of men the Cainites dates from the 4th century and is influenced by theological concern for maintaining the spirituality of the angels (H. DENZINGER, Enchiridion symbolorum, 428). For the same reason and also because they find it difficult to admit that the sacred author could have made use of material from a pagan myth, many modern Catholic scholars hold to the latter interpretation. Yet it is generally admitted today that the principle of Biblical inspiration does not exclude the possibility that the sacred author picked up and reworked a preexisting popular tale about a race of giants before the flood. Babylonian and Greek mythologies speak of the gods having intercourse with mortal women; the monotheistic author who used the expression sons of God and the Israelite who heard this section recited would certainly have understood the term in a way compatible with Israelite monotheism, and hence as meaning the angels rather than gods. Far from approving the practice, the sacred author rather uses the tale to climax his illustration of the progression of wickedness upon the earth, which prepares the flood. Moreover, by upsetting the natural order in what is left of the tale (vv. 1, 2, 4, 3), the author reveals his intention to deny these illicit relationships any proper causality in the phenomenon of giants. Thus the author may be said to have used the materials of a myth to reverse the myth's original proposition: a claim to immortality by the physical, procreative transmission of the divine spirit of the gods. Such a claim is impious, for man's spirit is from Yahweh (v. 4), who may withdraw it or limit it at will. (See ANGELS, 1.)

A similar problem is raised by Dt 32.8–9: "When the Most High assigned the nations their heritage, when he parceled out the descendants of Adam, He set up the boundaries of the peoples after the number of the sons of God; while the Lord's own portion was Jacob, His hereditary share was Israel." The Masoretic Text has "sons of Israel," but the LXX reading, "sons of God," has been confirmed by the Hebrew manuscript of Deuteronomy found in Cave 4 at Qumran. Here again the imagery is borrowed from the ancient conception of the pantheon dominated by the "Most High" God, who apportions to each of the members of the divine court the territories of the different peoples who will be their wards. But that this is a mere poetic device with no intention to admit polytheism is seen from the poem itself, which conceives Yahweh Himself as the Most High and master of human destiny and reduces the gods to "no-gods" (v. 21). Here again, Israel's tradition would have understood sons of God as the angels (Jb 1.6), the members of the heavenly court (as in Dt 32.43), the guardian angels of the nations (Dn 10.13).

Applied to the Judges. The title is applied to men; and, in particular, to the judges, who in God's name render a judgment to those who present their cases "to God" [Ex 18.15–19; 22.8–9; Ps 57 (58).2; 81(82).1]; even though they bear the titles 'ēlōhîm (gods) and benê 'elyôn (sons of the Most High), they too will be judged [Ps 81 (82). 6–8].

Applied to Israel and Its King. In Ex 4.22 Yahweh says, "Israel is my son, my first-born." Thus the people of God stand in a relation of sonship to Yahweh [Dt 14.1; 32.5; Jer 31.9; Ps 72(73).15]. The Prophets recall this adoption (Hos 11.1; Jer 31.20) to justify the divine complaint that the sons Yahweh has reared have disowned Him (Is 1.2) and have become lying and rebellious sons (Is 30.1, 9; Jer 3.14, 19). After the captivity God will bring back His sons from distant lands (Is 43.6), and they shall then be called "sons of the living God" (Hos 2.1); for the corollary on God's fatherhood (see Is 63.16; 64.8).

The king also is addressed by Yahweh, "You are my son" (Ps 2.7). Yet never does the Bible use the term "Son(s) of Yahweh." In the creation account of Genesis, man in virtue of his creation is "in the image, after the likeness of 'elōhîm" (Gn 1.27), but he is notably not given the title son of God. Any polytheistic idea of a direct or equal sharing in the divine nature is thus avoided. Creation is not procreation. Men are not sons of God in virtue of their creation; in the case of Israel and its king, the instatement to sonship supposes a special divine election.

A similar thought underlies the application of the title in later Judaism to individual Israelites who lived virtuous lives in accordance with God's will (Sir 4.10; Wis 2.16–20; 5.5; Job 1.23–25; Enoch 62.11; Psalms of Solomon 13.9; 17.27).

In the New Testament. The Synoptic tradition gives the title sons of God to the peacemakers (Mt 5.9), to those who return good for evil (Mt 5.45; Lk 6.35), and to the just in their risen state (Lk 20.36).

St. Paul, using the legal figure of adoption, identifies the Christian community as the New Israel, object of God's gratuitous election (Gal 4.5, where the obviously intentional use of the article before the abstract υιοθεσία not only recalls a well-known truth, but also most probably connects Christian sonship with that of Israel as type and antitype; see also Rom 9.4). It is specifically faith that has made Christians the sons of God (Gal 3.26), and this new title brings with it God's interior gift of the Spirit by which we cry with God's own son, "ABBA, Father" (Gal 4.4–6; Rom 8.15). That the title is no longer purely juridical appears in its close relationship with the efficacious Spirit and in the obviously intentional switch from υιός (son, as one with recognized status and legal privileges) to τέκνον (son or child, as one who has origin or descent or personal relation) in Rom 8.12–18. In Rom 8.23, if the traditional reading "the adoption of sons" is correct, it expresses the final consummation looked forward to, but the apparent absence of υιοθεσία from the recently published P⁴⁶ (3rd century) in support of the later D and G manuscripts, makes it highly questionable that Paul used the term in the future sense.

The Johannine literature likewise attributes Christian sonship to a power from God by which those who receive Christ, that is, believe in Him, are made sons of God (Jn 1.14). The idea of God's free election is likewise present ("born of the will of God"), but it is also stressed that "children of God" is not just a title but a reality (1 Jn 3.1–2).

See Also: SON OF GOD.

Bibliography: P. VAN IMSCHOOT, Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek, 2281–83. J. L. MCKENZIE, Divine Sonship in the Old Testament (Weston, Mass. 1946); "Divine Sonship of Man in the O.T.," The Catholic Bible Quarterly, 7:326–339; "Divine Sonship and Individual Religion," ibid. 32–47; "The Divine Sonship of the Angels," ibid. 5:293–300. B.

S. CHILDS, Myth and Reality in the O.T. (Naperville, Ill. 1960) 49–57. M. H. POPE, El in the Ugaritic Texts in Vetus Testamentum (Suppl. 2; 1955), 47–49. J. B. BAUER, “Videntes filii Dei filias hominum,” Verbum Domini, 31:95–100. J. E. COLERAN, “The Sons of God in Gn 6.2,” Theological Studies, 2:488–509. E. G. KRAELING, “The Significance and Origin of Gn 6.1–4,” Journal of Near Eastern Studies, 6:193–208. P. JOÜON, “Les Unions entre les Fils de Dieu et les Filles des hommes (Gn 6.1–4),” Recherches de sciences religieuses 29:108–112. H. JUNKER, “Zur Erklärung von Gn 6.1–4,” Biblica 16:205–212. C. ROBERT, “Les Fils de Dieu et les filles de l’homme,” Revue Biblique, 4:340–373, 525–552. M. W. SCHOENBERG, “Huiothesia: The Adoptive Sonship of the Israelites,” American Ecclesiastical Review, 143:261–273; “St. Paul’s Notion on the Adoptive Sonship of Christians,” Thomist 28:51–75.

[G. T. MONTAGUE]

SONS OF MARY HEALTH OF THE SICK

(Filii Mariae Salutis Infirmorum, FMSI, Official Catholic Directory #1270); a diocesan congregation founded in 1952 in the Archdiocese of Boston by Edward F. GARESCHÉ, with the approval of Archbishop (later Cardinal) Richard J. Cushing, for medical, catechetical, and social work in home and foreign missions. Besides the sanctification and mission work of its own members, the society has as its special purpose the training of qualified lay people for catechetical and medical work in order to reach large numbers of persons in need of religious instruction and medical attention. On March 26, 1955, a decree from Rome recognized the diocesan status of the congregation. Its first priest was ordained Jan. 29, 1956. The generalate is in Framingham, Massachusetts.

[J. COSS/EDS.]

SOPHISTS

The term sophist (Gr. σοφιστής), meaning an expert either in practical or theoretical matters, was initially equivalent to σοφός (wise man). In the fifth and fourth centuries B.C. it designated one who possessed wisdom and virtue and for a livelihood made a profession of teaching these to others (Plato, Prot. 348E; Xenophon, Memorab. 1.2). The name gradually assumed a derogatory meaning, largely through the Platonic and Aristotelian writings in which the Sophists are portrayed as professors of apparent, not true, wisdom (Prot. 312C–313C; Soph. elen. 165a 19–24). Thus in time it came to signify a quibbler or one who employs specious arguments (sophisms), the sense it still has in nontechnical usage (see FALLACY).

Characterization. The Sophists first appeared in Greece in the fifth century B.C. as traveling teachers of political virtue to the sons of wealthy families, for which they received substantial fees. With them a new kind of paideia was introduced into Greece, dictated by the exigencies of the social order. The Sophists imparted the prized arts of eloquence and persuasion, and the more eminent among them also instructed their charges in arithmetic, geometry, music and astronomy. Thus they contributed to the development of disciplines later to be known as the trivium and quadrivium. In extensive travels throughout Greece they served the cause of Panhellenism well; they also emphasized the conventional character of the social and political institutions of the individual Greek city-states.

Of the writings of the Sophists only a few fragments remain, more rhetorical than philosophical in content. The Sophists wrote chiefly for their contemporaries, and later Greeks did not preserve their works as productions of permanent value. Historians of philosophy depend greatly on Plato’s dialogues, especially the Protagoras, Gorgias and Theaetetus, for knowledge of their doctrines. Aristotle also supplies important information about them. Both are reliable sources, though somewhat prejudiced. The Sophists were individualists, but they did have a common Eleatic, Heraclitean and Democritean background. Avoiding the cosmological speculation of the pre-Socratics, they concentrated on problems of man, his knowledge and society.

Sophristic philosophy was a radical phenomenalist RELATIVISM that denied a knowledge of things in terms of being (ἐπιστήμη) and satisfied itself with mere opinion (δόξα) as sufficient for practical human needs. Although philosophy inherited little from the Sophists, without their challenge Socrates, Plato and Aristotle would not have achieved their masterly solutions to the problems of knowledge.

Protagoras. Protagoras of Abdera (c. 590–420 B.C.) was the first Sophist. Very little is known of him except that he visited Athens on several occasions. Some ancient writers testify that he was an associate of DEMOCRITUS, though this is questionable. According to Diogenes Laertius (9.55), Protagoras wrote several treatises, of which only a few scattered fragments remain. As a teacher of political virtue he trained his charges in the art of making the weaker cause appear the stronger (Aristotle, Rhet. 1402a 23–24). He held the opinion that two contradictory accounts can be given about everything (Diogenes 9.51). How he developed this point is not known. Earlier ZENO OF ELEA employed the same technique in his arguments against motion and plurality. Protagoras is most famous for his statement that “man is the measure of all things, of existing things that they exist and of non-existing things that they do not exist” (Sextus Empiricus, Against the Logicians 1.60). Philosophers have variously interpreted this as meaning either the individual or collective man. Plato (Theaet. 152A–154B) takes it to mean individual man; Aristotle (Meta. 1062b 12–15) and Diogenes Laertius agree. For Plato it meant that things are as the individual knower perceives them to be, and he relates it to the universal flux of HERACLITUS. Aristotle reduces it to a denial of the principle of CONTRADICTION. The statement most probably refers to the second part of “The Way of Seeming” of PARMENIDES. In another statement attributed to him, Protagoras seems to profess complete agnosticism: “About the gods, I have no way of knowing whether they exist or do not exist, nor of what form they are; for there are many things which hinder knowledge, the obscurity and the shortness of man’s life” (Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker: Griechisch und Deutsch, 80B, 4).

Gorgias. Gorgias of Leontini (c. 480–380 B.C.), an eminent Sicilian, had been a pupil of EMPEDOCLES and was himself the master of ISOCRATES. Most of Gorgias’s writings were rhetorical in nature, but his chief work, “On Not-Being or On Nature” (περὶ τοῦ μὴ ὄντος ἢ περὶ φύσεως), was philosophical. It contains three nihilistic statements, together with a proof of each: (1) nothing is; (2) even if anything is, it is unknowable to man; and (3) even if anything is knowable, it is incommunicable to others (Sextus Empiricus, ibid. 1.65–87). Various interpretations have been given, namely, that they are facetious statements, that Gorgias was merely displaying his rhetorical skill, that they represented an anti-Eleatic polemic, that they were intended to abolish the copula “is,” or finally that they expressed the tragedy of human reason. Since the ancients understood them in a serious way, they can hardly be facetious. They are the logical result of Eleatic dialectic pushed to its limit, expressing a radical intellectual pessimism.

Hippias of Elis. Plato is the chief source of information about this rhetorician in the Protagoras and Hippias Maior (probably authentic). A younger contemporary of Protagoras, Hippias was a prodigious polymath with a most versatile mind, but boastful and vain. Very little is known of his philosophical doctrines, for all his writings have disappeared. According to Plato he set up a radical opposition between nature and law (Prot. 337D). This was a view common to the Sophists.

See Also: GREEK PHILOSOPHY.

Bibliography: F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster, Md 1946–) v.1. J. OWENS, A History of Ancient Western Philosophy (New York 1959). K. FREEMAN, The Pre-Socratic Philosophers (2d ed. Cambridge, Mass. 1959); tr., Ancilla to the Pre-Socratic Philosophers (Cambridge, Mass. 1957). W. W. JAEGER, Paideia: The Ideals of Greek Culture, tr. G. HIGHET (2d ed. New York 1945–) v.1. M. UNTERSTEINER, The Sophists, tr. K. FREEMAN

(Oxford 1954). H. DIELS, Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker: Griechisch und Deutsch, ed. W. KRANZ, 3 v. (8th ed. Berlin 1956); v.1 (10th ed. Berlin 1960–61).

[L. A. BARTH]

SOPHRONIUS, ST.

Patriarch of Jerusalem, b. Damascus, Syria, ca. 560; d. Jerusalem, March 11, 638. Most probably to be identified with Sophronius Sophistes (“the Sophist”), he was a monk in Egypt (ca. 580), then in the Jordan area, and from 619 at the Theodosius Monastery at Jerusalem. He accompanied John MOSCHUS on his journey to Rome, and Moschus dedicated his Λειμών (Pratum spirituale) to him. In 633 Sophronius went to Alexandria to combat, but without success, the Monothelite doctrine of Cyrus of Phasis, Patriarch of that city. In the same year he traveled to Constantinople in order to persuade the patriarch SERGIUS I, the leading figure among the Monothelites, to accept the Orthodox position, but this mission likewise ended in failure. Shortly after his own election to the Patriarchate of Jerusalem (634–638), he addressed his famous Synodical Letter to the other patriarchs, explaining his own teaching on the two natures in Christ. His death was undoubtedly hastened by the tragic event of the preceding year, the surrender of Jerusalem to the Saracen conqueror the Caliph Omar. In addition to his Synodical Letter, he composed a Florilegium (not extant) in two books in which he cited some 600 passages from earlier ecclesiastical writers in support of Dyothelitism. Earlier in his career, he wrote an Encomium on the Alexandrian martyrs, Cyrus and John, a Vita (not extant) of the Alexandrian patriarch, Joannes Eleemon (d. 619), and 23 Anacreontic Odes in Classical meter on the Christian feasts. Of his 11 extant sermons, in part in Latin translation, that delivered on Christmas 634 has special historical interest, as it indicates that the Saracens were already in possession of Bethlehem.

Feast: March 11.

Bibliography: F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 1272. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF from 5th German ed. (New York 1960) 628–629. H. G. BECK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al. (1966) 9:888–889. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 434–436, critical study, with bibliog. G. BARDY, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 14.2:2378–83. O. BARDENHEWER, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur 5. (Freiburg 1913–32) 36–41. C. VON SCHÖNBORN, Sophrone de Jérusalem (Paris 1972). H. DONNER, Die anakreontischen Gedichte Nr. 19 und Nr. 20 des Patriarchen Sophronius von Jerusalem (Heidelberg 1981).

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

SORA (SOR), ABBEY OF

Benedictine foundation near the city of Sora, southeast of Rome, at the junction of the Liri and Fibreno Rivers, in the Diocese of Aquino, Pontecorvo, and Sora. The abbey was built on the traditional site of a Ciceronian villa by St. DOMINIC OF SORA, a native of Foligno and a monk of MONTE CASSINO, at the request of the Lombard duke, Pietro di Rainerio, probably about 1011. Dominic became abbot and it was there that he died in 1031. The monastery failed to develop economically or spiritually, and in view of its rapid decline by 1222 Pope HONORIUS III placed it under the nearby Cistercian establishment of Casamari. The CISTERCIANS installed their own prior, and the ancient abbey was reduced to a simple dependency and followed the fate of its motherhouse. In the 19th century Ferdinand II of Bourbon, King of Naples, granted the revenues of the monastery to the Chapter of St. Peter's in the Vatican. Little remains of the original church consecrated by PASCHAL II in 1104; it was restored frequently, the last time in the 18th century. The body of its holy founder is still preserved in this church.

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:3062. A. LAURI, Il mio paese natio (Sora 1905).

[I. DE PICCOLI]

SORAZU, ÁNGELES

Franciscan conceptionist nun, mystic, and mystical writer; b. Zumaya, Guipúzcoa, Spain, Feb. 22, 1873; d. Valladolid, Aug. 28, 1921. Florencia, as she was christened, grew up in an atmosphere of Christian virtue, but she had much poverty and other misfortune to endure in her childhood, and her education was limited. At the age of 15, when she was in Tolosa working in a hat factory, she went through a brief period of worldly attachment and minor dissipation. Converted from this, she consecrated herself totally to God. At 18 she was received into the Franciscan monastery of the Purísima Concepción. She took the name María de los Ángeles, though she was commonly known simply as Sister—or later, Mother—Ángeles. She was elected abbess of her monastery in 1904, and remained in that office until her death. She is chiefly remembered for her interior life, of which she left an account in works written in obedience to her directors and published after her death. The more important of these were: La vida espiritual coronada por la triple manifestación de Jesucristo (Valladolid 1924); Autobiografía (Valladolid 1929); Exposición de varios pasajes de la Sagrada Escritura (Salamanca 1926). Three volumes of letters she wrote to her principal director, Mariano de Vega, OFM Cap, were published in Madrid (1942, 1952, “God sending the Word and Holy Spirit to the soul,” by Ángeles Sorazu.

1958). Her spirituality was influenced by her devotion to the mysteries of Christ, to Our Lady, and by her interest in the Gospels and the catechism. Her descriptions of transforming union, of the soul's participation in the divine attributes, and of contemplation are, according to the judgment of some, not unworthy of comparison with the writings of St. TERESA OF AVILA and of St. JOHN OF THE CROSS.

Bibliography: L. VILLASANTE CORTABITARTE, La sierva de Dios, M. Ángeles Sorazu: Concepcionista franciscana, 1873–1921, 2 v. (Bilboa 1950) v.1 Estudio místico de su vida. “El caso de la Madre Sorazu,” Verdad y Vida 14 (1956) 105–114. M. LÉDRUS, “Le Cas de la Mère Sorazu,” Gregorianum 35 (1954) 656–659. J. M. DE BUCK, Révérènde Mère Angelés Sorazu, conceptioniste (Paris 1937), translation and adaptation of the Autobiografía.

[L. VILLASANTE]

SORBON, ROBERT DE

Theologian and founder of the Sorbonne, first endowed college of the University of Paris; b. Sorbon, near Rethel, Champagne, France, Oct. 9, 1201; d. Paris, Aug. 15, 1274. He became a master theologian c. 1236, and as a master regent taught at the University of Paris from 1254 to 1274. His teaching career covered the period in which secular and religious teachers engaged in fiery discussions concerning religious perfection (WILLIAM OF SAINT-AMOUR and GERARD OF ABBEVILLE, 1254–56), the great school strike, and Latin AVERROISM (SIGER DE BRABANT). Robert was a contemporary and colleague of THOMAS AQUINAS, BONAVENTURE, ALBERT THE GREAT, and GILES OF ROME. Named chaplain of Cambrai (c. 1250) and in 1258 at Notre Dame de Paris, he belonged to the circle of friends of Louis IX, who regarded him as a man of great wisdom and chose him as his confessor. J. de Joinville has preserved his memory in a series of vignettes that give evidence of his simplicity and kindness.

Among his works are a number of frequently revised treatises that deal with moral and spiritual matters rather than with learned speculation: De conscientia, De tribus dietis, De matrimonio, De confessione, and De saporibus (unpublished). He also left about 85 remarkably simple but concrete sermons delivered between 1260 and 1265. Robert de Sorbon's renown, however, does not stem from his works. Having himself experienced the difficulties of poor students in the pursuit of theological studies, he undertook the foundation of a college for "poor lay theology students" that was not to be a mere student hostel but a true house of studies such as those provided by the Dominicans and Franciscans. His project won the interest of the king, the bishops, and even the pope, and he opened the college in October 1257. After a well-organized search for suitable property, he bought almost all the houses (62 at the time of his death) in the neighborhood of Rue Coupe Gueule, a site still occupied by the Sorbonne. He gave the institution carefully planned statutes that provided for the recruitment, common life, and studies of the students who were to live collegialiter, socialiter, moraliter, scholariter, and to participate in the various duties and responsibilities of the house under the direction of the headmaster. Master Robert's college, which usually numbered about 30 theology students, soon became the center of attraction at the Faculty of Theology. The large classrooms conducive to the meetings and scholarly discussions characteristic of the Sorbonne, and the library open to outsiders, contributed to its growth and soon made its name synonymous with the Faculty of Theology and its professors, the arbitrators of orthodoxy.

Bibliography: P. GLORIEUX, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et. al. 14.2:2883–85. P. GLORIEUX, Répertoire des maîtres en théologie de Paris au XIII^e siècle 1:340–342. A. L. GABRIEL, "Robert de Sorbonne," Revue de l'Université d'Ottawa 23 (1953) 473–514.

[P. GLORIEUX]

SORETH, JOHN, BL.

Carmelite reformer; b. Caen, c. 1395; d. Angers, July 25, 1471. He studied at Paris, where he received his doctorate in theology in 1438. Superior of the province of Francia (1440–51), he was elected prior general of the order in 1451 and remained in that office until his death. As general he worked for reform, and was particularly successful in the Low Countries, the Rhineland, and northern France. He sought to improve religious life in general within his order, especially by establishing stricter observance on a voluntary basis. At the Brussels chapter of 1462, he promulgated new constitutions for his order that were approved by the Orléans chapter in 1469. He was the founder of the second order of cloistered Carmelite nuns, and received from Nicholas V the bull Cum nulla giving canonical status to various women's groups affiliated with the order (Oct. 9, 1452). He personally established some convents, among them the foundations at Liège (1457), Dinant (1455), Haarlem (1466), and Vilvoorde (1469). With the collaboration of Bl. FRANCES D'AMBOISE he introduced Carmelite nuns into France, establishing a house at Vannes in 1464. Bl. Soreth drew up the constitutions for the nuns. Similar foundations were established in Italy during Soreth's generalate. He visited extensively as prior general, insisting everywhere upon the renewal of the liturgy. He was noted for his love of the Blessed Sacrament, and is pictured in art with a pyx in his hand, recalling his defense of the Eucharist from profanation when Charles the Bold attacked Liège. He was beatified by Pius IX in 1866.

Bibliography: M. REUVER, "Prima biographia B. Joannis Soreth e codice Viennensi Novale Sanctorum (12709) transcripta," [by Joannes Taye, a contemporary] Carmelus 5 (1958) 73–99. G. MEESTERS, "Carmelite Spirituality according to Blessed John Soreth," The Sword 16 (1953) 323–335. M. ARTS, "The Work of John Soreth," ibid. 15 (1952) 457–466. P. M. DE LA CROIX, "Une Précieuse découverte: Les Constitutions des Carmélites de Vannes (Nazareth)," Carmel 44 (1961) 61–70. G. MEESTERS, "Johannes Soreth und sein Werk," in Karmel: Gesetz und Geheimnis, ed. A. DECKERT and O. MERL (Cologne 1959) 55–68. Carmelus 10 (1963), special number on Las monjas Carmelitas hasta Santa Teresa de Jesús, has much on Soreth and the nuns, e.g., A. STARING, "The Carmelite Sisters in the Netherlands," 56–92, v. WILDERINK, "Les Premiers monastères de Carmélites en France," 93–148.

[E. R. CAROLL]

SORIN, EDWARD FREDERICK

Founder of the University of Notre Dame, South Bend, Ind.; b. Ahuillé, France, Feb. 6, 1814; d. Notre Dame, Oct. 31, 1893. He entered the diocesan seminary at Le Mans, France and was ordained May 27, 1838. He later joined the Congregation of the HOLY CROSS, founded by Basil Anthony MOREAU, a professor at the Le Mans seminary, and was professed Aug. 15, 1840. When Bp. Célestine de la Hailandière of Vincennes, Ind., on a visit to France in 1839, asked Moreau for missionaries for his diocese, Sorin and six brothers volunteered. Reaching Vincennes in October 1841, they settled first at St. Peter's, in Daviess County. The following year Hailandière offered Sorin a plot of land near South Bend on condition that he start a college within two years. The land's original owner, the missionary Stephen T. BADIN, called the site Ste. Marie des Lacs. Sorin accepted the condition, appealed to France for more men, and began to build. On Jan. 15, 1844, the General Assembly of Indiana granted him a charter for the University of NOTRE DAME DU LAC, and the first building was completed in time for commencement that June. Sorin was president until 1865; he also served as provincial superior, and took care of the missions in northern Indiana and southern Michigan.

In 1843 he received a group of Sisters of Holy Cross from Le Mans, and established them the following year at Bertrand, Mich. The site of the present motherhouse was secured in 1854 for the sisters' convent and academy. He brought to the community Eliza Maria GILLESPIE, who, as Mother Angela, guided and inspired the sisters after their separation into a distinct community. At his direction, priests and sisters cared for the soldiers during the Civil War. In 1865 he began publication of the magazine Ave Maria. He was elected superior general of the Congregation of the Holy Cross in 1868, and thus supervised the community's educational and missionary activities in France, Canada, and Bengal, as well as in the U.S. In 1883 he suggested the establishment of the Laetare Medal award. Sorin retained the presidency of the trustees of Notre Dame until his death.

Bibliography: E. F. SORIN, Journal and "Missions Attended from Notre Dame," Notre Dame Provincial Archives. T. E. HOWARD, History of Saint Joseph County, Indiana, 2 v. (Chicago 1907). Notre Dame University, Brief History of the University of Notre Dame du Lac, Indiana from 1842 to 1892 (Chicago 1895). E. and T. CATTI, Basil Anthony Moreau, tr. E. L. HESTON, 2 v. (Milwaukee 1955). A. J. HOPE, Notre Dame: One Hundred Years (Notre Dame 1943). W. MCNAMARA, Dictionary of American Biography, ed. A. JOHNSON and D. MALONE, 20 v. (New York 1928–36; index 1937; 1st suppl. 1944; 2d suppl. 1958) 17: 399–400.

[T. T. MCAVOY]

SORROWS OF MARY

The spiritual martyrdom of Mary, Blessed Virgin, and her compassion with the sufferings of her divine Son are referred to as her sorrows (or dolors). Underlying all consideration of the sorrows of Mary by Christians is the fact of her presence "by the cross of Jesus" (Jn 19.25). St. Luke, who recorded Simeon's prophecy concerning the sword that would pierce her soul (Lk 2.35), does not mention Mary's presence on Calvary. The preceding verse, however, shows that the sword refers to Mary's sorrow at the contradictions her Son would meet. At least implicitly, then, it refers to her sorrow when these came to climax in His redemptive Passion and death.

Fathers. Except for St. Ambrose, who portrayed Mary standing with courage beneath the cross, conscious of the Redemption of mankind and of the Resurrection to follow (De inst. virg. 7; Patrologia Latina, ed. J.P. Migne, 16:318), the Latin Fathers who considered these New Testament texts explained them in terms of Mary's sorrow without much elaboration. It was not properly until the 11th and 12th centuries that the theme of Mary's compassion was fully developed in the West.

Following Origen (Hom. in Luc. 17), during three centuries the Eastern Fathers quite universally held the sword of Lk 2.35 to indicate Mary's supposed doubt or infidelity during the Passion. St. Romanus Melodus (d. 556) in a liturgical poem in the form of a dialogue between the suffering Christ and Mary seems the first in the East to show her keeping faith during her sorrow [ed. Pitra, Anal. sacra 1 (Paris 1876) 101–07]. From the 6th to the 10th century, and thus before the West, the East considerably developed the theme of Mary's sorrow.

Devotion to the Seven Sorrows. Traceable to the early 14th century, devotion to the seven sorrows even in the 15th century varied in the specific sorrows and was paralleled by devotion to 5, 15, etc. Devotion to a fixed number of sorrows followed and was modeled on devotion to a fixed number of Mary's joys. The unvaried sorrows of today (Simeon, Egypt, loss in the Temple, carrying of the cross, Crucifixion, taking down from the cross, burial) are the result of the spread of confraternities of the seven sorrows in the Low Countries toward the end of the 15th century by a priest, John of Coudenberg. Latin distichs on these seven sorrows were part of the devotions of this confraternity [Analecta Bollandiana 12 (1893) 339–46]. In 1607 Paul V granted the SERVITES, apostles of this devotion, exclusive power to erect these confraternities everywhere.

Liturgical Feasts. Until 1960 two feasts of the Seven Sorrows of Mary existed. The feast until then celebrated on the Friday after Palm Sunday found early precedent in a Mass decreed by a Synod of Cologne in 1423. Sixtus IV composed the liturgical Mass in 1482 and had it inserted in the Roman Missal. First conceded to individual religious orders and countries, the feast was extended to the whole Latin Church by Benedict XIII in 1727. The sequence STABAT MATER was added at this time. The rubrics of 1960 reduced the feast to a commemoration. The second feast originated in 16th-century devotions led by the Servites. About 1600, a Mass and procession on the third Sunday of September became popular, and in 1668 Innocent XI granted the feast to the Servites. In 1672 the Servite Prosper Bernardi composed the Mass and Office. After partial concessions, in 1814 Pius VII extended the feast to the Latin Church, to be celebrated on the third Sunday of September. In 1908 St. Pius X raised the feast to the second class, and in 1913 fixed the feast on September 15, except for the Servites, who retain the Sunday. The 1969 reforms of the liturgical calendar designate a single Feast of Our Lady of Sorrows, to be celebrated as an obligatory memorial on September 15.

Bibliography: A. M. LÉPICIER, Mater Dolorosa: Notes d'histoire, de liturgie et d'iconographie . . . (Spa 1948).

[J. C. GORMAN/EDS.]

SORTES HOMERICAE, VERGILIANAE, BIBLICAE

Divination by the use of tablets containing letters of the alphabet, which were drawn at random from a receptacle, and usually by a child, was practiced at ancient Praeneste in Italy and elsewhere. The tablets with individual letters were replaced subsequently by others containing phrases selected from books inspired by the Muses, especially books of Homer, Hesiod, and Vergil, or from collections of divinely inspired oracles. This form of divination was called rhapsodomancy. Finally, in place of such extracts, it became customary to open a copy of Homer or Vergil at random and to regard the first words to catch the eye as giving an answer to the problem of the consultant. In the Historia Augusta (Vita Hadr. 2.8) it is recorded that Hadrian, in consulting Vergil in this manner, hit upon Aeneid 6.808–812 and felt these lines indicated that he enjoyed the favor of Trajan and was to be his successor. In the same work (Vita Sev. Alex. 14) it appears that Alexander Severus also consulted Vergil and chanced upon Aeneid 6.848–854; he interpreted the passage to mean that he was to become emperor. The Vergilian sortes have had a long history. R. Ganszyniec found 169 examples of their use in the 16th century. Charles I (1625–49) of England was persuaded to consult them at Oxford and chanced upon Aeneid 4.615–621, the course of Dido. D. A. Slater has shown that they are still being consulted in the present century.

The term Sortes Biblicae is employed to designate a similar Christian practice, noted from the early 4th century. The most famous ancient example is that described by Augustine in his Confessions. When he opened a codex of the New Testament at random, the first passage to meet his eye—and one most appropriate under the circumstances—was Rom 14.1 (Conf. 8.12.29). However, he realized the dangers of such consultations and warned against them in Letter 55.37.

The term biblical sortes is used rather loosely to include the similar employment also of liturgical texts and lives of the saints. P. Courcelle has listed a number of examples (see bibliography) and he has indicated the role played by children, and particularly by young lectors, either official or chosen for the occasion. In late antiquity and into the Carolingian age, widespread use of the biblical sortes in various matters of importance included that of the election of bishops and other ecclesiastical officials. Naturally, such a procedure led to abuses, and the use of the sortes, especially of the collection known as the Sortes Sanctorum, which should not be confused with the biblical sortes proper, was repeatedly condemned by medieval councils.

The use of the biblical sortes declined from the beginning of the Carolingian age, but persisted sporadically; it occurs as an individual aberration in the spiritual realm even in recent times.

See Also: DIVINATION.

Bibliography: A. BOUCHÉ-LECLERCQ, "Divination," C. DAREMBERG and E. SAGLIO, Dictionnaire des antiquités grecques et romaines d'après les monuments (Graz 1962–63) 2.1:292–319, esp. 302. D. A. SLATER, "Sortes Vergilianae" or Vergil Today (Oxford 1922). H. A. LOANE, "The Sortes Vergilianae," Classical Weekly 21 (1927–28) 185–189. R. GANSZYNIEC, "Vergiliana: De sortibus Vergilianis," Eos (1930–31) 194, 201, 597, 650. H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 15.2: 1590–92. P. COURCELLE, "L'Enfant et les 'sorts bibliques'," Vigiliae Christianae 7 (Amsterdam 1953) 194–220, with copious examples and bibliog. C. DU CANGE, Glossarium ad scriptores mediae et infimae latinitatis (Niort 1883–88) 7:532–534.

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

SOTER, POPE ST.

Pontificate 162 or 168 to 170 or 177. Eusebius may have been mistaken when he placed Soter's accession in the eighth year of Marcus Aurelius, 168 (Chron.; Hist. Eccl. 4.21–23, 30; 5.1, 6, 24), and his dates are not certain. The Liber pontificalis states that Soter was a Campanian from Fondi (although he had a Greek name) and that he ordered non-ordained monks not to touch altar cloths or offer incense in church. It gives two accounts of his burial: one in the Vatican, which modern excavations have not borne out; and in the cemetery of Calixtus, which, at least in name, did not exist in Soter's time. Eusebius preserved a letter from DIONYSIUS OF CORINTH to Soter stating that an earlier epistle of Soter's, which was read in the Church of Corinth for its wholesome consolation and advice, commended Rome for its charity to the needy everywhere and its solicitude for those laboring in the mines. This letter identifies Clement I as the author of the Roman letter to the Corinthian community, written some 75 years earlier. The fifth-century report (Praedestinatus 1.26) is not credible where it reports that Soter wrote against the heretic Montanus, who was then active in Asia Minor.

Feast: April 22.

Bibliography: Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92, 1958) 1:58–59. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 14.2:2422–23. W. C. VAN UNNIK, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 6:148–149. E. FERGUSON, Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (New York 1997), 2:1079. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986).

[E. G. WELTIN]

SOTERIOLOGY

The term soteriology is derived from the Greek words σωτηρία (deliverance, salvation) and λόγος (word, thought). It designates in a general sense the study of salvation.

The Christian faith proclaims the fact of man's SALVATION, which is accomplished by the merciful act of God's love in Christ, who, by means of His life, death, and Resurrection, delivers man from the evil of sin and reunites man in grace with God. The term salvation names the mystery. The term soteriology names the effort of Christian theologians to investigate the mystery for some understanding of the data of revelation and to shape these understandings into a coherent, organic system. Soteriology is both a special field of sacred doctrine and a special focus of theological research.

The Christian faith in its totality is the salvific event, the saving encounter of God with sinful men. From this point of view the study of any subject of revelation could be called soteriology. The field of soteriology would be as wide as revelation itself. But in accepted theological usage, the term refers most properly to the study of God's saving action as performed in and through the work of the Incarnate Word. Soteriology considers the work of Jesus Christ in its finality of delivering mankind from sin and restoring man to divine grace. Soteriology conceives the Incarnate Word in His redemptive role; it is the dynamic and practical aspect of CHRISTOLOGY.

To the redemptive work of Christ, soteriology addresses questions to understand in what salvation consists, in what manner the life, death, and Resurrection of the Redeemer accomplish salvation, how man's salvation is achieved by God's activity and man's response. Soteriology is also the effort to adduce those theological principles both of exposition and of proof that will attempt a systematization of the many subjects, the divergent issues, and the multirelated facts that are included in and related to the mystery of salvation as achieved by the work of Christ.

See Also: REDEMPTION.

Bibliography: K. RAHNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 9:894–897. J. GNILKA and W. DETTLOFF, H. FRIES, ed., Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe, 2 v. (Munich 1962–63) 1:303–319. E. MASURE, "Le Rédempteur," Le Christ, ed. G. BARDY and A. TRICOT (Paris 1946) 518–551. J. RIVIÈRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 13.2:1912–2004. F. BAMMEL et al., Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 2:584–599.

[E. L. PETERMAN]

SOTO, DOMINGO DE

Theologian; b. Segovia, 1494; d. Salamanca, Nov. 15, 1560. He received his early education in Segovia. Poverty forced him to seek employment as a sacristan in the church of a neighboring village, Ocando, where he began to develop a true spirit of piety and a love of study. At the University of Alcalá he studied logic and philosophy under THOMAS OF VILLANOVA and became a close friend of Pedro Fernandez de Saavedra, who later became a missionary to America. After his studies at Alcalá, De Soto attended the University of Paris, received his baccalaureate, and immediately began his theological studies; but a longing for Spain cut short his stay in Paris and he returned to Alcalá. The chair of philosophy was vacant and De Soto won an appointment to it in 1520. He established himself as a brilliant scholar, pitting Aristotelian thought against the nominalism of his day.

Quite suddenly he resigned his post and made a retreat at the Benedictine Abbey of Montserrat. His original intention was to become a Benedictine but the retreat master directed him to the Dominicans. He made his profession in the Dominican priory of Burgos on July 23, 1525. Domingo de Soto was immediately assigned to the house of studies in Segovia as a professor of dialectics. He taught there for seven years and during that time compiled a manual of logic, Summulae F. Dñci Soto Segobiensis, Ord. Praed. Magistri (Burgos 1529). This treatise was renowned for its simplicity, precision, and clarity. In 1532 his superiors sent him to Salamanca to occupy one of the order's chairs at the University in that city.

The Emperor Charles V selected him to be his imperial theologian at the Council of Trent. De Soto's work at the Council was varied. He won recognition as a man of sterling character, true piety, and deep learning. He labored diligently in the task of formulating schemata and solving difficult questions. He defended the doctrines of original sin, predestination, justification, merit, and others against the attacks of the Protestant theologians. He also wrote the treatise De Natura et Gratia (Venice 1547) and dedicated it to the conciliar fathers. In the meantime, he acted in another capacity. When the Dominican master general Albertus Casuas died before the opening of the Council, De Soto was appointed to serve as the order's representative during the first four sessions. Although a new general was elected in 1546, De Soto continued to serve as the Dominican representative during the fifth and sixth sessions.

When in 1547 the Council was interrupted, Charles requested that De Soto be appointed his confessor and spiritual advisor. He also sought to nominate De Soto for the vacant See of Segovia, but De Soto refused the honor and returned to Salamanca in 1550. Here he was elected prior of the ancient Dominican priory founded in the time of St. Dominic. In 1552, when Melchior CANO resigned from the first chair of theology at the University of Salamanca in order to accept a bishopric, De Soto was chosen to succeed him, a choice approved by the university and student body. This was his crowning glory, and he taught with success the doctrines of St. Thomas Aquinas and St. Augustine. He retired from his professorship in 1556.

His principal works are: In dialecticam Aristotelis commentarii (Salamanca 1544), Commentarii in libros Physicorum (ibid. 1545), In tres libri De anima (unedit-ed), Quaestiones in libros Physicorum (ibid. 1545), Deliberatio in causa pauperum (Venice 1547), In Epistolam divi Pauli ad Romanos commentarii (Antwerp 1550), In quartam sententiarum commentarii (Salamanca 1557), and De institiis et iure (ibid. 1556).

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum, 5 v. (Paris 1719–23) 2.1:171–174. A. M. VIEL, “Dominique Soto 1494–1560: Étude historico-doctrinale,” Revue thomiste (Paris 1893–) 12 (1904) 151–166; 13 (1905) 174–193. A. TOURON, Histoire des hommes Illustres de l'ordre de St. Dominique, 6 v. (Paris 1743–49) 4:205–216. V. BELTRÁN DE HEREDIA, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951–) 14.2:2423–31.

[F. D. NEALY]

SOTO, PEDRO DE

Theologian; b. Córdoba, Spain, 1500; d. Trent, Italy, April 22, 1563. He was born of noble parents, and as a youth displayed superior intelligence and a remarkable memory. He entered the Order of Friars Preachers and made his profession in 1519 at St. Stephen's Priory, Salamanca, Spain. During his student days he made an assiduous study of sacred doctrine, showing a special interest in patrology and in a study of the councils of the Church.

In 1542 Charles V of Spain selected him for his adviser and confessor. This association was severed nine years later because of a disagreement on the INTERIMS, the three provisional arrangements for the adjustment of religious differences between the Catholics and Protestants of Germany. During his service to the emperor, De Soto and another Dominican, Gabriel de Guzmans, were credited by Paul III as being highly successful in arranging a peace between Charles V and Francis I of France.

The association with the emperor also introduced De Soto to the reality of Lutheranism, and he became enthusiastic over the project of preaching in the areas greatly influenced by Lutheranism. With the help of his friend Cardinal Otto Truchses of Augsburg, he succeeded in restoring the chair of theology at the University of Dillingen. De Soto himself occupied the chair (1549–53). During his tenure as professor of theology he stressed the teachings of St. AUGUSTINE and St. THOMAS AQUINAS.

In 1554 De Soto and a fellow Dominican, Juan de Villagrada, were sent to England at the request of Philip II in the hope that they would be instrumental in effecting the return of the faith to the universities of Oxford and Cambridge. Far from meeting with success, they were forced to flee England upon the death of Queen Mary in 1558.

The Dominicans also made use of De Soto's talents. He was appointed the superior of the German province of the order, acting as commissar of the master general, Franciscus Romeus (1546–52), who tried to restore a real vitality to the province.

De Soto's last assignment was his appointment as Pius IV's theologian at the Council of Trent. He died while attending the council.

His major works include Institutiones Christianae (Augusta 1548), Defensio catholicae confessionis et scholiorum circa confessionem ducis Wirtenbergensis nomine editam adversus prolegomena Joannis Brentii (Antwerp 1557), Manuale Clericorum (Dillingen 1558), Methodus confessionis (Antwerp 1553), Doctrinae christianae compendium in ultimum plebis recte instituendae (Ingolstadt 1549), and Assertio catholicae fidei (Cologne 1555).

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores ordinis praedicatorum (New York 1959) 2.1:183–184. D. A. MORTIER, Histoire des maîtres généraux de l'ordre des Frères Prêcheurs, 8 v. (Paris 1903–20) 5:463–469, 504–505, 525–529. A. TOURON, Histoire des hommes illustres de l'ordre de Saint Dominique, 6 v. (Paris 1743–49) 4:216–230. V. D. CARRO, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 14.2:2431–43.

[F. D. NEALY]

SOUBIRAN, MARIE THÉRÈSE DE, BL.

Foundress of the Society of Mary Auxiliatrix; b. Castelnauary, near Carcassonne, France, May 16, 1834; d. Paris, June 7, 1889. Sophie Thérèse Augustine Marie, as she was named, came of a family that traced its ancestry, directly or collaterally, to St. LOUIS IX, St. ELZÉAR OF SABRAN, St. ELIZABETH OF HUNGARY, and Pope Bl. URBAN V. Her parents, Joseph and Noémi (de Gélis) de Soubiran la Louvière, afforded a pious but stern family atmosphere; and her uncle, canon Louis de Soubiran, took firm control of her spiritual direction. At the age of 14, she made a private vow of chastity and aspired to join the Carmelites, but in 1854 her uncle convinced her to join the BEGUINES at Ghent, Belgium. In 1855 she established a béguinage at Castelnauary. This community was bound to common life, ran an orphanage, and was devoted to nocturnal adoration.

In September 1864, with the assistance of a Jesuit, Paul Gin hac, Mère Thérèse instituted a new religious congregation, the Society of Mary Auxiliatrix, at Toulouse; it received diocesan approval (1867) and the approval of the Holy See (1868). The constitutions were patterned on those of the JESUITS. The sisters were to engage in works of charity and to practice perpetual adoration of the Blessed Sacrament. The institute soon expanded to Amiens and Lyons, but during the Franco-Prussian War (1870), the sisters fled to London. After their return to Bourges (1871), Mère Marie Françoise de Borgia (1830–1921) became very influential in the congregation. As assistant superior general, she convinced Mère Thérèse, the superior general, to embark on a disastrous expansion of houses. By 1874 the congregation was in difficulty and Mère Françoise discredited. Domineering, unstable, and ambitious, she reacted by blaming Mère Thérèse and even succeeded in turning Father Gin hac, the archbishop of Toulouse, and the sisters against her. On Sept. 20, 1874, the foundress was expelled from the society.

She sought vainly to join the Visitation Nuns and the Carmelites. Eventually accepted by the Sisters of Our Lady of Charity of the GOOD SHEPHERD at Paris, she made her profession in this congregation (1877). Mère Françoise's autocratic rule even forced the expulsion of Mère Thérèse's sister, Marie Xavier (January 1881). Within a year of Mère Thérèse's death, however, her persecutor was deposed and expelled from the congregation. The new superior general, Mère Élisabeth de Luppé, exonerated the foundress, and recalled Mère Xavier. Mère Thérèse was beatified on Oct. 20, 1946. Her remains rest in the motherhouse in Paris.

Feast: Oct. 20.

Bibliography: Bl. Marie-Thérèse de Soubiran: A Study in Failure, ed. H. MONIER-VINARD, tr. T. BAILY (London 1944). W. LAWSON, A Life of Blessed Marie Thérèse de Soubiran (London 1952). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by the Benedictines of Paris (Paris 1935–56) 6:140–143. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 4:157–161.

[T. JOYCE]

SOUBIROUS, BERNADETTE, ST.

B. Lourdes, southwestern France, Jan. 7, 1844; d. Nevers, France, April 16, 1879. Bernadette was the eldest of nine children of the miller Françoise and Louise (Castérot) Soubirous. Because of her family's poverty and her own poor health, she was not sent to school. Delay in her instruction meant that she was unable to receive her First Communion until June 3, 1858. Bernadette is reputed to have had 18 visions of the Blessed Virgin Mary between Feb. 11 and July 16, 1858. While collecting firewood close to a grotto called Massabielle, by the River Gave near LOURDES, she saw a young girl dressed in white and holding a rosary. Her account of her vision met with disbelief from her pastor, M. Peyramale. She also suffered much misunderstanding from her family and the townsfolk. In subsequent apparitions she first called the young girl "the lady," but during the 16th apparition, on the feast of the Annunciation, the visitor identified herself in the dialect of Lourdes as the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION. The doctrine of Mary's conception without the stain of original sin had been formally defined by Pius IX shortly before this (Dec. 8, 1854). On the feast of Our Lady of Mt. Carmel (July 16), the final apparition occurred.

After the apparitions Bernadette was educated as a day and boarding student with the Sisters of Charity and Christian Instruction of Nevers at Lourdes (see CHARITY, SISTERS OF). In 1866 she joined the congregation at the motherhouse in Nevers. In religion she kept her baptismal name, Marie Bernarde. Even after the bishop of Tarbes rendered a favorable judgment on the authenticity of the apparitions, Bernadette continued to experience much misunderstanding. Tuberculosis of the bone kept her always in weak health in the convent, where she performed the duties of assistant in the sacristy and infirmary. Bernadette was beatified on June 14, 1925, and canonized on Dec. 8, 1933. The immense popularity of Lourdes as a pilgrimage center has helped make her one of the most popular of modern saints (see VISIONS).

St. Bernadette Soubirous.

Feast: Feb. 18.

Bibliography: H. PETITOT, The True Story of Saint Bernadette, tr. a Benedictine of Stanbrook Abbey (Westminster, Md. 1950). R. CRANSTON, The Miracle of Lourdes (New York 1955), popular. L. VON MATT and F. TROCHU, St. Bernadette: A Pictorial Biography, tr. H. REES (Chicago 1957).

[T. F. CASEY]

SOUILLAC, ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine monastery of St. Mary, Souillac, canton and arrondissement of Gourdon (Lot), France, Diocese of Cahors, on the Borrèze River (Latin, Sollicium, Sordillacum, Sublacum). According to tradition, the abbey was founded by ELIGIUS OF NOYON in 655. In 806 it needed restoration by Louis I, the Pious. After the NORMAN invasions, it was reendowed in 927 by Frotard, Viscount of Cahors; in 960 it was restored by Gerald of Saint-Céré, Abbot of AURILLAC. In 1660 Souillac was united to the Congregation of Saint-Maur (see MAURISTS). At one time it had over 80 priories and parishes dependent on it. The 12th-century Romanesque abbey church, which is now a national historical monument, is perfectly preserved and recalls Saint-Front of Perigueux in size and Byzantine style. A former portal of the church, now inside, is one of the most interesting pieces of southern French romanescque sculpture.

Bibliography: Gallia Christiana, v.1–13 (Paris 1715–85), v.14–16 (Paris 1856–65) 1:179–182. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:3069. M. AUBERT, “Souillac,” Congrès archéologique de France 90 (1927) 261–270. G. CANY, “Les Chapiteaux historiés du chœur de Souillac, Lot,” Annales du Midi 62 (1950) 209–214. G. CANY and M. LABROUSSE, “L’Église abbatiale de . . . Souillac . . .,” Bulletin monumental 109 (1951) 389–404.

[J. DE LA C. BOUTON]

SOUL

In its most ordinary present-day usage, the term “soul” (Gr. ψυχή; Lat. anima), when used alone, refers to the human soul; to say soul is to mean human soul. If one intends to speak about other sorts of soul, he uses expressed qualifiers; e.g., he says plant soul, or animal soul. There is nonetheless a use of the term “soul” that means simply a principle of life, or a source of life activities, at least that of nourishing. According to this usage, soul designates the mark of a living thing, or what separates the living from the nonliving; soul in this sense is the concern of this article.

Early Greek Views. The Greek predecessors of Aristotle fastened on two characteristic marks that distinguish what has soul in it from what has not: (1) movement, and (2) sensation or knowledge; each of these is traceable to their views on the first principles of things (see Aristotle, Anim. 403b 25–28). Those who paid special attention to movement thought that soul ought to be identified with the first principle, which is most capable of originating movement. DEMOCRITUS, e.g., held that soul is composed of spherical atoms, which because they are spherical are most suited for motion, and hence are most in a state of motion. Diogenes’s argument was in form identical with that of Democritus; but for Diogenes, air was the element most capable of originating movement, because it is the finest in grain. Anaxagoras’s view, though obscure in many respects, seems to have been that soul is the source of movement, without itself being in motion; seemingly, therefore, it is a first principle in some respects unlike what is material or a body.

Abbey Church of Souillac, France. (Marburg Art-Reference, Art Resource, NY)

Those who expressed a view on soul from the viewpoint of sensation or knowledge had, as a basic conviction, that like is known only by like. Thus, if one analyzes what soul knows, one can say what soul is. According to EMPEDOCLES, the soul knows all natural things, and natural things can be analyzed into four intrinsic constituents, namely, fire, air, water, and earth, and two extrinsic principles, namely, Love and Strife. Soul, therefore, is a combination of the six. Otherwise, it would be difficult to see how soul can know these things. According to PLATO, soul knows not only natural and changing things, but also changeless things—the Numbers, the Forms or Ideas, and the Geometricals. Since all things have whatever reality they possess because of a participation in the Numbers, and since soul knows all things, soul must be a number. Another way of showing that the soul is a number (or a combination of numbers) is to consider the fact that soul knows in different ways: (1) by intuition (hence the number one is of the nature of the soul, since intuition grasps in a single flash); (2) by science (hence the number two, since in science the soul moves from one thing to a second, i.e., from premises to a conclusion); (3) by opinion (hence the number three, since soul here moves from premises to a conclusion but with the fear that some third thing, rather than the conclusion, may be true); and (4) by sense (hence the number four, because it takes four points to determine a body, and the soul knows bodies by sense).

A brief reflection on the views just recorded reveals a third characteristic mark of soul, namely, incorporeity. But two senses of incorporeity can be discerned: (1) a strict sense, as in the case of Plato's Numbers, which are neither material nor bodies; this is perhaps also implied in Anaxagoras's view of soul as the origin of motion, itself not in motion, hence possibly itself not a body; and (2) a looser sense, as in the case of Democritus's spherical atoms and Diogenes's air—in the sense of something subtle or rarefied, but nonetheless a body or material.

Preliminaries to a Definition. Of the many criticisms ARISTOTLE makes of his predecessors' views on the soul (Anim. 403b 20–411b 31), two are quite basic: (1) If one is to have a complete account of soul from the viewpoint of MOTION, one ought to investigate all that is implied in motion. If there is motion, then there is both a mover and a moved; in the mover there must be the ability to move, i.e., to originate motion; in the moved, the ability to be moved. The mover in this case is said to be the soul; the moved, the body. Thus, one ought not simply to put his finger on the source of soul's ability to move the body, e.g., Democritus's spherical atoms or Diogenes's air; one should also try to put his finger on the source of the body's ability to be moved by the soul. One should perhaps ask such questions as: What are the structural specifications of a body moved by soul? None of the views of Aristotle's predecessors looks to the condition of the body qua moved by the soul; all of them look only to the condition of the soul qua mover of the body. (2) Aristotle observes that all the views on soul proposed by his predecessors fail to take into account all types of soul. To say something about soul from the viewpoint of local movement, or of sensation or knowledge, or of respiration, is not to talk about all kinds of soul, for it is obvious that not all living things move about locally, nor do all of them sense, nor do all of them breathe. A complete account of soul ought to consider all types of soul. And this is why Aristotle begins his own account of soul by proposing a common definition of soul, i.e., one applicable to all its types without specifying what is distinctive of any given type; and why he carefully specifies the sort of body that is the appropriate subject having a soul (see Anim. 412a 2–414a 28).

The question, What is it?, which is fundamental for philosophers and which asks for a DEFINITION, is not properly asked about a thing until one knows that there is such a thing. But to ask: Is there such a thing as soul? presupposes having assigned a meaning to soul. Now, if soul is taken to mean the source or principle of life activities, namely, whatever there is in all things we call living that distinguishes them from those we call nonliving, then it is clear that the question: Is there such a thing as soul? is answered by answering the question: Are there living things? It is clear therefore that there is such a thing as soul, because it is clear that there are living things.

What follows is a brief presentation of Aristotle's two common definitions of soul, as commented on by St. THOMAS AQUINAS, and as clarified with examples from modern science, wherever they are of service. Aristotle's method is that of division. He begins by laying out two sets of distinctions. The first set:

1. What exists, i.e., BEING, is either a SUBSTANCE, i.e., an independently existing subject, like Jack; or an ACCIDENT, i.e., something that exists in an independently existing subject as some sort of modification of it, like Jack's height.
2. Substance, according to its meanings or senses, is either MATTER, which is POTENCY and as such does not exist; or FORM, which is ACT, and as such does not exist, but which accounts for the existence of matter and of the composite (such a form is said to be a substantial form—see MATTER AND FORM); and the composite (i.e., what is composed of matter and form), which is the actually existing thing, such as Jack.
3. Actuality or ENTELECHY is either like knowledge possessed (this is first actuality) or like considering knowledge possessed (this is second actuality).

The second set:

1. Substance, according to its types, is either a body (i.e., a corporeal substance) or a SPIRIT (things such as an angel or God). (See ANGELS, 2.)
2. A body is either natural, which is such that both its matter and its form are substantial; or artificial, which is such that only its matter is substantial, its form being accidental. The form of an artificial body is man-given. A natural body is more perfectly a substance than an artificial body, since both its matter and its form are substantial.
3. A natural body is either nonliving, such as a stone, or living, such as Jack. Anything that at least vegetates, i.e., keeps itself in existence by absorbing nourishment from its environment, is said to be a living body.

First Definition. From the second set of distinctions, it is easy to see that a living body is a natural body and a substance. Since a living body is an actually existing thing, such as Jack, a living body is a substance in the sense of a composite (see substance in the first set). Therefore, a living body has a natural and substantial matter and a natural and substantial form; a form that accounts for its being alive, and a matter that is its potentiality for being alive. Thus, soul is the form or actuality of a natural body with a potentiality for being alive. Indeed, soul is the first actuality of such a body. Soul is actuality in the sense in which knowledge possessed is actuality; for soul is presupposed to life activities. Life activities are actualities in the sense in which actually considering what one knows is actuality; actually considering what one knows presupposes what one knows. To say that soul is the first actuality of such a body is to say that soul is such a body's substantial form.

But life activities presuppose not only soul. They presuppose also a certain sort of natural body, a body having life potentially in it. Such a body is composed of certain sorts of natural elements and compounds, and is productive of certain others whose natural activities contribute to life activities. For example, digestion is performed through the natural activities of HCl, among others. Such a body is also an organized body. Witness those things, i.e., plants, in which are found what men take to be the minimum manifestations of life. The plant has diverse bodily parts ordered to diverse functions. Functionally ordered parts are organs; and a body with such parts is said to be an organized body or organism.

In light of this analysis, it can be said that natural organized body stands in the same relationship to soul as potency does to actuality. But this proportion must be properly understood. There are two senses of the potency-actuality relationship: (1) the sense in which marble, for example, before the change in which it becomes a statue, is in potency to the shape; it is as something perfectible in relation to the perfection (the shape) it is about to acquire; (2) the sense in which the marble, after the change has been completed, is in potency to the shape it has acquired; it is as something perfected in relation to the perfection it possesses, the perfection being no part of the marble as such. Natural organized body, as it appears in the definition of soul, is in potency to soul in the second sense just distinguished.

Second Definition. Aristotle's second common definition of soul, namely, the primary principle whereby we live, sense, move, and understand, is formulated in order to be used as a middle term for arriving at the first common definition by the method of DEMONSTRATION.

Types of Soul. There are three types of soul, distinguished in terms of the extent to which activities commonly attributed to living things transcend the activities of matter in its nonliving states; or, in another way of putting it, in terms of the extent to which these activities transcend anything that is found in the makeup of the natural organized body of a living thing (see St. Thomas, ST 1a, 78.1). There is an activity of soul that so transcends anything in the makeup of a natural organized body, that it is not even performed by any bodily organ; this is the activity of the intellectual soul (see SOUL, HUMAN). Below this, there is an activity of soul performed by a bodily organ, but not through the natural activities of the elements and compounds that constitute the organ; this is the activity of the sensitive soul. Of course, such elements and compounds and their activities are required for this activity of soul, not in such a way that it takes place by the power of these elements, but only for keeping the organ properly disposed. Lastly, there is an activity of soul that is performed by a bodily organ and by the activities of certain natural elements and compounds; this is the activity of the vegetative soul. The transcendence of this activity is seen clearly in nourishment; it is seen even more clearly in the process of reproduction.

Parts of Soul. Since soul performs diverse sorts of activity, it is often said that soul has diverse parts, a part for each sort of activity. Since soul is not a body, but the first entelechy of a body, these parts of soul cannot be quantitative parts; hence soul is not quantitatively divisible into them. These parts are nothing other than the potencies or powers the soul has for performing diverse sorts of life activity; thus, if one says that soul is divisible into these parts, the meaning is simply that these parts are distinguishable from each other by definition; each is defined in terms of its object (see FACULTIES OF THE SOUL). These parts are often called power parts, to distinguish them from quantitative parts; and the soul, a power whole. The following will make clear the difference between power parts and quantitative parts: (1) quantitative parts are "spread-out" parts, whereas power parts are not; (2) quantitative parts are homogeneous, whereas power parts are heterogeneous—there being as many different sorts of parts as there are different activities; and (3) quantitative parts are intrinsic constituents of the whole, whereas power parts are not, since the soul is something substantial and the powers of the soul are merely accidents.

Modern Thought. In modern thought, say from the time of R. DESCARTES to the present, man's concern with the problem of soul has been: (1) a concern with the human soul, largely with the problem of the relation between man's body and soul (see SOUL-BODY RELATIONSHIP); and (2) a concern with the problem of LIFE, turning mainly about the issue of mechanism versus vitalism (see MECHANISM, BIOLOGICAL; VITALISM).

See Also: SOUL, HUMAN; IMMORTALITY; SOUL, HUMAN, ORIGIN OF.

Bibliography: J. E. ROYCE, Man and His Nature (New York 1961). A. M. HOFFSTETTER, "Viruses: Are They Alive?" New Scholasticism 31 (1957) 297–316. R. TAYLOR, Metaphysics (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1963). M. J. ADLER, ed., The Great Ideas: A Syntopicon of Great Books of the Western World, 2 v. (Chicago 1952); v. 2, 3 of Great Books of the Western World 2:791–810. C. MAZZANTINI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 1:222–239. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 3:1–22.

[J. BOBIK]

SOUL (IN THE BIBLE)

Soul in the OT is nepeš, in the NT, ψυχή. The definitions and the use of these terms will be treated in this article.

Old Testament. Nepeš comes from an original root probably meaning to breathe. Thus the noun form means neck or throat opened for breathing, thence, breath of life. Since breath distinguishes the living from the dead, nepeš came to mean life or self or simply individual life. Nepeš is used in regard to both animals and humans. If life is human, nepeš is equivalent to the person, the “I.” After death, the nepeš goes to SHEOL.

The above summary indicates that there is no dichotomy of body and soul in the OT. The Israelite saw things concretely, in their totality, and thus he considered men as persons and not as composites. The term nepeš, though translated by our word “soul,” never means soul as distinct from the body or the individual person. Other words in the OT such as SPIRIT, FLESH, and HEART also signify the human person and differ only as various aspects of the same being.

In Ps 68(69).2, the phrase, “the waters threaten my life,” is literally “waters come up to nepeš” (cf. Jn 2.6; Is 5.14; Prv 23.2). The sense of throat for nepeš is apparent in these places. The word nepeš means breath in Jb 41.13: “His breath [nepeš] sets coals afire; a flame pours from his mouth.” In 2 Kgs 17.22, it means breath of life, “And the soul [nepeš] of the child returned into him and he revived” (cf. 2 Kgs 17.21; 2 Sm 1.9; Jer 38.16).

In Gn 9.4, “But flesh with its life [nepeš]*—*that is, its blood—you shall not eat,” the comparison shows more of an abstract meaning for nepeš as life in general without signifying breath or breathing (cf. Lv 17.11; Dt 12.23). Finally, nepeš means the individual being itself whether of animals or men. In Gn 2.7, “Then the Lord God . . . breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living being,” the Hebrew word for being is nepeš. Of animals, Prv 12.10 says, “The just man takes care of his beast,” literally, “the nepeš in his beast.”

As a human life, nepeš can be identical with the personal pronoun or the reflexive pronoun (Gn 27.4, 25; Lam 3.24, where “says my soul” could be just as correctly translated “say I,” etc.). As the “I,” the nepeš performs all the sensations of an individual. The nepeš hungers, thirsts, hopes, longs, loves, and hates.

At death, the nepeš goes to Sheol, a place of an insensitive, shadowy existence. Many psalms pray for the rescue of one’s nepeš from death, where the rescue means to be saved from dying, not to be raised from the dead. Happiness after death is known only in late OT revelation.

New Testament. The term $\psi\upsilon\chi\eta$ is the NT word corresponding with nepeš. It can mean the principle of life, life itself, or the living being. Through Hellenistic influence, unlike nepeš, it was opposed to body and considered immortal.

The psyche in Mt 10.28, “And do not be afraid of those who kill the body but cannot kill the soul [psyche]; but rather be afraid of him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell,” means a life that exists separately from the body. The meaning of psyche in our Lord’s statement, “[T]he Son of Man has not come to be served but to serve, and to give his life [psyche] as a ransom for many,” is obviously His mortal existence (Mt 20.28; Jn 10.11). As a living being, subject to various experiences, it can refer to animals, “And every live thing [psyche] in the sea died” (Rv 16.3), or to humans, “Fear came upon every soul [psyche]” (Acts 2.43; Rom 2.9; 13.1). Thus the psyche feels, loves, and desires. In this connection it can be used to mean the personal or reflexive pronoun, as in Jn 10.24, “How long dost thou keep us [our psyches] in suspense?”

Thus far, $\psi\upsilon\chi\eta$ is quite similar to the Hebrew nepeš, except for Mt 10.28. Under the Greek influence, however, it was gradually opposed to body and was used for the immortal principle in man (Rv 6.9; 20.4).

In summary, the Hebrew nepeš generally is connected with the concrete sign of life in the individual, the “I” that feels, wills, pants for, etc. Its end is Sheol. The Greek counterpart, $\psi\upsilon\chi\eta$, includes many of the meanings of nepeš; but it has added to the concept “I,” the immortality of later philosophy and revelation.

See Also: MAN, 1; LIFE, CONCEPT OF (IN THE BIBLE).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible (New York 1963) 2286–90. J. P. E. PEDERSEN, Israel: Its Life and Culture, 4 v. in 2 (New York 1926–40; reprint 1959) 1:99–181. R. BULTMANN, Theology of the New Testament, tr. K. GROBEL (New York 1951) 1:190–259. C. TRESMONTANT, A Study of Hebrew Thought, tr. M. F. GIBSON (New York 1960) 83–124.

[W. E. LYNCH]

SOUL, HUMAN

Intuitively and almost universally man acknowledges an essential difference between living and nonliving things. The intrinsic force, or principle of movement, by which certain things are living is commonly called the soul (see Aristotle, Anim. 413a 20–21). The human soul, essentially different from other souls, is that internal principle by which man lives, perceives, and thinks (Anim. 414a 12–13). All cultures and civilizations have been convinced that man is not a purely material being; rather, they recognize that man possesses within himself some element that is relatively independent of the body, giving life and power to the body. The nature of this principle was not always clearly understood. Often it was compared or identified with air, wind, breath, or spirit. Some considered the soul to be a single simple principle; others distinguished between the soul, the principle of bodily life, and the intellectual powers by which man thinks (see FACULTIES OF THE SOUL). The origin of the human soul has often been explained by myths, by superstitious belief, by natural causes, or by religion. Consideration of its survival and ultimate destiny have given rise to many beliefs.

Soul parts with dead body, illustration by William Blake. (©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

The human soul is considered here under five titles: (1) Oriental and Greek conceptions; (2) patristic and medieval writers; (3) modern and contemporary thought; (4) philosophical analysis; and (5) theology.

1. Oriental and Greek Conceptions

Long before the earliest philosophers discussed the human soul in philosophical language, ancient peoples of the East spoke of the soul in the language of myth and primitive religion. While philosophical analysis was the greatest contribution of the Greeks, the non-philosophical and mythical approach of ancient religions cannot be neglected.

Nonphilosophical thought. In Chinese tradition a distinction is made between the lower, sensitive soul that disappears at death and the hun, or rational principle, that survives the grave and is the object of ancestor worship. The ancient Egyptians spoke of at least two souls: the ka, or breath, the “double” of man, born with him but surviving death and remaining close to the tomb, and the ba, or spiritual part, which alone proceeded to the region of the dead to be judged by Osiris. The Greek epics of Homer represented the soul as the breath of life, something airy, or ethereal, so that when Achilles saw the spirit of Patroclus, he was able to recognize him but unable to embrace him (Iliad 23:99–104).

In India the religious philosophical treatises of Brahmanism, the Upanishads (c. 650–500 B.C.), present the first extensive account of the origin, nature, and destiny of the human soul. According to this account, which is essentially monistic, BRAHMAN, the original source, generated the world and individual souls that enter bodies and are caught up in the world of maya, i.e., illusion and suffering. Birth is considered a misfortune, since the body is the prison of the soul. Salvation requires withdrawal from the body, even in this life, through knowledge of the All, the Absolute, in everything, and through an asceticism that strips off individuality and particular existence. If one has achieved this salvation, death brings extinction to him as an individual and a return to the Absolute; for one not purified by knowledge and asceticism, death brings a transmigration to another body and further suffering. In Brahmanism, the soul not only existed before the body, but it is somehow an emanation from Brahman, individualized and implanted in the world of phenomena. When purged and purified, the soul loses its individuality and merges once more with the Absolute. In a more pessimistic vein, BUDDHISM denied even substantiality to the individual soul, reducing it to a mere chain of sensations.

What was implied in Brahmanism became explicit in the cosmogony of ORPHISM among the Greeks. As a religious reform movement, about which authorities are not agreed, Orphism seems to have adapted older legends to account for the origin of man. According to one account, the evil Titans, sons of Earth, who had been gods before Zeus, killed and devoured the infant Dionysos; in punishment Zeus hurled a thunderbolt upon them to burn them up. From their ashes came forth the human race, in whom the divine, good element derived from Dionysos is mingled with the earthy, evil element derived from the Titans. The soul of man was thus considered a remnant of a god, but his body was a child of earth. Nevertheless the human soul, which apparently was considered to be an individual, could not return to the divine realm until it had sloughed off, in a series of transmigrations, all taint of what Plato later called “the old Titanic nature” (Laws 3:701C). Orphism, Pythagoreanism, the κάθαρμοι, or purifications of EMPEDOCLES, the catharsis of Plato—all sought to provide a means of deliverance from the “wheel of births.” (See PYTHAGORAS AND PYTHAGOREANS; MYSTERY RELIGIONS, GRECO-ORIENTAL.)

Greek philosophers. Not without reason has it been said that Orphism introduced into Greek philosophical thought the notion of soul as something divine, a quasi-incorporeal, immortal substance that existed before the body and sojourns a while on earth in the prison of the body. Not all Greek philosophers, however, were impressed by this mystery religion, and not all were inclined to accept its teachings on the soul. Instead, many philosophers tried to study human nature in terms of natural causes and events.

Early philosophers. The pre-Socratic philosophers generally considered man within the larger framework of φύσις, the basic principle, or source, of all growth and movement. As a result, they tended to define the soul as something that causes movement and to identify it with whatever element they considered primarily responsible for movement in the universe: fire, water, air, or ether. Since no one suggested that it was made out of earth (Aristotle, Anim. 405b 8–10), pre-Socratic philosophers, it would seem, attributed a tenuous, non-bodily character to the soul. This does not imply that any of the pre-Socratics attained to a concept of the spirituality of the soul. In all their descriptions, they spoke of the soul as something material. Anaximenes (fl. 542B.C.) described the soul as having an air-like nature that guides and controls the living being. ANAXAGORAS did not escape an implicit MATERIALISM, even though he introduced the notion of mind both for the universe and for man. Materialism is more evident in HERACLITUS, for whom the soul was fire, and in DEMOCRITUS, who considered it to be made of the finest atoms.

Plato. It was not until SOCRATES and PLATO that Greek thought rose to the notion of immateriality. Even when Plato employed mythology to describe creation, he considered the human soul an incorporeal substance, made from the same elements as the WORLD SOUL, akin to the gods and yet part of the world of change and becoming (Tim. 41). Being composed, the soul has within itself the roots of conflict—implied in the myth of the charioteer and the two winged horses (Phaedrus 246A–248D). If the earthy part of the soul triumphs over the divine, the soul falls from happiness to union with the body, which is its prison rather than its natural abode. Since the body is composed of “the turbulent and opposing mob of elements,” man is the seat of constant inner conflict, from which he must be delivered by the catharsis of philosophy. To explain the sources of this inner conflict Plato suggested that man has three souls or one soul having three parts: rational, irascible, and appetitive (Tim. 69D–72B; Phaedo 80B; Rep. 4.444B). Harmony is attained only when the rational part, the “man within man,” is able to attain mastery over the lower forces. The dependence of Plato’s doctrine on Orphism is a matter of conjecture, although there is a striking resemblance between the two.

Aristotle. In his early writings ARISTOTLE accepted the myth of the soul as a divine sojourner on earth; the lost Eudemus apparently dwelt at length on this theme. But as Aristotle grew to intellectual maturity he abandoned this outright dualism of body and soul. At first he adopted a theory of close collaboration between the two without considering them elements of one unique reality. Finally in the De anima, he described the soul as an entelechy, or form, “inseparable from its body, or at any rate, certain parts of it are” (Anim. 413a 4–5). But even when Aristotle proposed his doctrine of the substantial unity of body and soul, he wondered whether mind (νοῦς), the power of thinking, may not be “a widely different kind of soul, differing as what is eternal from what is perishable” (413b 25–26). He stated that “it alone is capable of existence separated from all other powers” (413b 26–27). However, in later chapters he suggested a disinction between νοῦς that is the power of becoming all things through knowledge and νοῦς that is active, “separable, impassible, unmixed” (430a 14–19). Aristotle’s obscure explanation of the precise relation between the active and passive intellects occasioned many divergent and contradictory explanations of his doctrines [see W. D. Ross, Aristotle (New York 1959) 128–151].

Later Philosophers. Aristotle’s doctrine in the De anima seems to have been unknown to the Epicureans and Stoics, both of whom, despite vast differences, had a materialistic concept of the soul. For EPICURUS, the soul is composed of Democritus’s atoms that disperse after death. The Stoics considered it a particle of the divine fire, or Logos, without deciding whether it survives this life or not (see STOICISM). Platonic dualism of soul and body was revived in the 1st century B.C. by the Stoic Poseidonius of Apameia (d. c. 51B.C.) and by the Platonist Antiochus of Ascalon (d. c. 68B.C.). Both considered the soul to be preexistent and immortal, and Poseidonius regarded it as distinct from the corporeal spirit that confers sentient and appetitive life. In the early Christian era, Middle Platonism helped to shape the Christian concept of a spiritual soul. PLOTINUS and NEOPLATONISM, representing the last philosophical movement among the Greeks, saw the soul not as entelechy (Enneads 4:7:8, against Aristotle’s doctrine), but as an emanation from Soul, ψυχῆ, the third divine hypostasis. Though it was forced to descend to the body by way of punishment, or, as other passages suggest, came voluntarily to put order and beauty into matter, the human soul is never quite separated from Soul or wholly immersed in matter (Enn. 4:3:12–13). Its union with the body is natural and necessary, although it does not form with the body a new reality (Enn. 4:3:19). Plotinus went so far as to say that man is the soul; everything else is merely accidental (Enn. 4:7:1; 4:4:18).

Arabian falasifa. Significant developments in Aristotelianism took place among the Muslim philosophers, the falasifa, when they tried to solve the ancient problem of the two intellects. From Alexander of Aphrodisias (fl. A.D. 198–211) they borrowed an interpretation that identified the active intellect with God, who accordingly caused the material, or possible, intellect of man to pass from potentiality to the actuality of knowledge possessed. Since Arabian philosophers professed a Neoplatonic kind of Aristotelianism, they were inclined to identify the agent intellect with the last of the intelligences, or intellectual emanations from the One. From this tenth intelligence, according to AVICENNA, emanates the human soul, which is essentially intelligent, immaterial, indestructible, and immortal. Although the soul came into existence with the body, it has a life and operation of its own so that union with the body is not of the essence of the soul but rather a temporary situation. Avicenna explained knowledge as the infusion of intelligible forms by the separated agent intellect. Sense knowledge, for him, merely disposes the human intellect to receive such forms.

The problem implicit in Avicenna became acute when AVERROËS undertook to comment on the De anima of Aristotle. The human soul, according to Averroës, is a substance brought into being by human generation, and it perishes at death. Man possesses by nature only a material, passive, intellect, sometimes called vis aestimativa, or particular reason. For Averroës, the spiritual faculty of knowing and the agent intellect are both separated from individual men and are common to all men (see INTELLECT, UNITY OF). Since knowledge is achieved only by a kind of union, continuation, or conjunction of the individual with the separated intellects, the human soul is not essentially an intellectual one (anima intellectiva), but only a corruptible actuality of matter. This doctrine of Averroës, a matter of great concern in scholasticism after 1260, was one of the principal tenets of Latin AVERROISM.

See Also: GREEK PHILOSOPHY; ARABIAN PHILOSOPHY.

Bibliography: I. C. BRADY, A History of Ancient Philosophy (Milwaukee 1959). J. OWENS, A History of Ancient Western Philosophy (New York 1959). C. TRESMONTANT, La Métaphysique du christianisme et la naissance de la philosophie chrétienne (Paris 1961). L. PETIT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 1.1:1006–16 (Paris 1950). C. MAZZANTINI, Enciclopedia filosofica 1:222–226.

[I. C. BRADY]

2. Patristic and Medieval Writers

The Christian concept of a spiritual soul created by God and infused into the body at conception to make man a living whole is the fruit of a long development in Christian philosophy. Only with Origen in the East and St. Augustine in the West was the soul established as a spiritual substance and a philosophical concept formed of its nature. Even then, no adequate theory of the relationship between soul and body was achieved before the development of scholasticism.

Greek Fathers. The early Fathers were not directly concerned with the nature of the human soul, although they could not avoid treating this question at least implicitly when discussing the soul’s immortality (see IMMORTALITY, 1. HISTORY OF PROBLEM).

Athenagoras. The apologist Athenagoras (c. 177), who called himself “a Christian philosopher of Athens,” perhaps attained more clarity than others in his “On the Resurrection of the Dead.” There he taught that God made man both to reveal His own goodness and wisdom and for man's sake. Since such reasons are permanent, there is no reason for man's total annihilation. Yet since man's nature is composed of an immortal soul and a body, neither of which is intended by God to exist apart, these elements will be reunited at the resurrection (ch. 12–15). Here one finds a clear emphasis on the Christian view of man as a unit, a living whole, even if the immortal soul is the more important element.

Irenaeus. In somewhat the same spirit St. IRENAEUS attacked the notion of preexistence and transmigration, arguing that God confers on each individual body its proper soul, to which it will be rejoined in the resurrection. In this, Irenaeus was an early witness to the Christian dislike for the Platonic notion of immortality, which implied that the soul was in some sense divine. The parable of Dives and Lazarus (Lk 16:19–31) induced Irenaeus to conclude that the departed soul preserves the same form or character as the body to which it was united and retains the figure of the man so that it is recognizable, as Dives recognized Lazarus (Adversus haereses 2:34). That this implied, for him, a certain materiality in the soul is confirmed by his earlier remark that souls are adapted to bodies and so possess the form of the body (ibid. 2:19). Such materiality, however, is not necessarily corporeality, since Irenaeus sharply distinguishes between body and soul; souls are immortal and incorporeal in comparison to bodies, which are subject to death (ibid. 5:7). If at times Irenaeus seems to distinguish in man body, soul, and spirit, this should not be understood as implying a real difference between the psyche and nous, soul and intellect, for these are identical in being (2:29). Rather it refers to the union of soul and Spirit that produces the perfect man, the spiritual man made to the likeness of God (5:6; cf. J. Quasten, Patrology 1:308–310).

Clement. The first of the Fathers explicitly to borrow from the Greek tradition on the soul was CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA. For him, philosophy can be judiciously used by the Christian as an aid to wisdom and the defense of the faith; whatever any school rightly teaches can be used by the Christian gnostic (Strom. 1:7, 1:13; Patrologia Latina 8:732D, 756B). What little Clement had to say on the nature of the soul, usually within the framework of Genesis, ch. 1 and 2, betrays such eclecticism. At times he was inclined to adopt the Platonic teaching of the tripartite soul, or posit a composition in man of body, soul, and spirit (Paedag. 3:1, Patrologia Graeca 8:556A; Strom. 3:9, Patrologia Graeca 8:1166C). Yet he seems to have preferred a Stoic analysis whereby the soul is said to have ten parts: the five senses, the power of speech, the generative faculty, a corporeal spirit, another spirit that is the ruling power (hegemonikon) of the soul, and lastly the Holy Spirit, who comes to those who have the faith (Strom. 6:16, Patrologia Graeca 9:360A). By “corporeal spirit” Clement evidently meant the vegetative-sentient soul (ibid. and 7:12, 509A). The ruling power, identified as the mind (nous), is not generated but introduced from without by God (6:16; 5:14). The lower elements are subordinate to such “ruling power,” through which man is said to be alive (6:16), which bestows on him his true dignity, and in which is found the image of God (6:16; 6:9). Do these two spirits form one soul? Clement did not say. On the one hand, he considered man as made up simply of body and soul (ibid. 4:26, Patrologia Graeca 8:1373A, C). Yet, since the “corporeal spirit” can rebel with the flesh against the soul (Gal 5:17), it is hardly identical with the latter, which is “subtle and simple, and can even be called incorporeal” (Strom. 6:6, Patrologia Graeca 9:273C). In such a doctrine Clement mingled elements from both Scripture and Greek thought, but he did not succeed in obtaining a clear concept of soul as one spiritual substance possessed of many powers. Instead, he seemed to favor a kind of trichotomy in man of body, soul (as principle of sentient life), and spirit or mind.

Origen. Only with ORIGEN, Clement's most famous pupil, did the soul emerge as a spiritual rational substance identified with spirit or mind. Since it was within the same context of “flesh rebelling against the spirit” (Gal 5:17) that Origen considered the question of two souls or soul and spirit in man, he likely had Clement's doctrine before him (De principiis 3:4, Patrologia Graeca 11:319–325). Is there, he asked (323C), another soul in man, an anima carnis, besides the heavenly and rational soul? Advancing arguments for both sides, he modestly let the reader decide (325C). Yet he himself evidently thought there was but one soul, a conclusion bolstered by his earlier interpretation of soul and spirit (2:10:7, 239). The latter is either the Holy Spirit or the “better part of the soul,” that made to the image and likeness of God but not separate from the substance of the soul, or even the spirit or angel assigned to man as guardian. The “Discussion with Heraclides,” discovered only in 1941, corroborates the identity of soul and spirit, since Origen here proposes that “spirit” is really a part of man (J. Quasten, Patrology, 2:62–64). This one soul in man is a rational substance (De prin. 2:6:3–5, Patrologia Graeca 11:211D, 213C), a simple intellectual nature that “needs no bodily place or physical magnitude, color, or aught else that is proper to body or matter,” and grows only in “intelligible magnitude” as it increases in knowledge (1:1:6, 125A–126C). “Let those who think the mind and soul is a body tell me, if this were so, how it could receive and understand reasonings which are often difficult and subtle, and contemplate and know things invisible and incorporeal” (1:1:7, 126C). Such intellectual knowledge, in marked contrast to sense knowledge (127B), forces one to conclude that mind or soul is superior to all corporeal nature. Lastly, to claim that mind is corporeal is to offer insult to God, since the mind is the intellectual image of God and has thereby a certain affinity to Him who is wholly spiritual and intellectual in nature (128A) and is the source of every intellectual being (125A; cf. Exhortatio ad martyrum 47, Patrologia Graeca 11:629B).

Such a position, established by arguments valid in their own right, marked a decided advance that was maintained by Origen's successors. Unfortunately, in his own thought it was intimately bound up with a theory on the origin of the soul that exceeded the limits of orthodoxy. For Origen, all rational creatures were created at once, in the beginning, pure, equal, and alike; since they were without body or matter, and invisible and intelligible by nature, they could rightly be called intelligences. But because they were creatures, they were mutable and equally capable of good and evil; and when God put them to the test, all fell in some degree, except the soul of Christ. The result was the diversity and hierarchy of rational creatures: angels, souls, and demons. The human soul was thus originally a nous, a purely spiritual being, which became a soul (psyche) "because it waxed cold [psychesthai] from the fervor of just things" (De prin. 2:8:3, Patrologia Graeca 11:223B). The proximate cause of such diversity was to be found in the type of body each nous received as chastisement and remedy for the fall [ibid. 2:9, Patrologia Graeca 11:225–233; for details, see J. Daniélou, Origen (New York 1955) 209–219, and C. Tresmontant, 395–518].

Gregory of Nyssa. This theory did not go unchallenged by such anti-Origenists as Peter of Alexandria and Methodius of Olympus. Yet the orthodox elements of Origen's thought lived on in the two Christian psychologists of the 4th century: St. GREGORY OF NYSSA and Nemesius of Emesa. Both made considerable use of Greek psychological writings, though always with the critical eye of a Christian. Gregory was much more the theologian, while Nemesius was primarily the philosopher in his approach. In the first complete definition of soul to be found, it would seem, in a Christian writer, Gregory saw soul not only as the life-giving principle but also as identical with mind: "Soul is a produced, living, rational substance, which imparts of itself to an organic body capable of sensation the power of life and sensation, as long as the nature capable of such things exists" (Macrinia, or De anima et resurrectione, Patrologia Graeca 46:29B). The Pauline distinction of body, soul, and spirit is primarily a moral one (De hominis officio 8, Patrologia Graeca 44:145), and there is no question in man of two or three souls welded together: "the true and perfect soul is one in nature, intellectual and immaterial, and endowed with powers it imparts to the material body" (ibid. 14, 176B).

Such is the remarkable union of this spirit with matter that all the lower powers serve the higher (8–10), from which they receive life; while the intellect itself is dependent on the senses for communication with the outer world (10, 14). The question of the origin of the soul was much discussed, Gregory said, in the churches of his day (ibid. 28, 229B), an echo of the Origenist controversies. That soul was created before the body he labeled fantastic and absurd, a fable borrowed from Greek philosophy. That soul is made after the body he held as contrary to manifest experience. Therefore both come into existence together, though Gregory was at a loss to explain how. He was content to believe that somehow the power of God intervenes to change the sperm into a most wondrous living thing (Catechesis 33, Patrologia Graeca 45:84D; cf. 11, 44A and Macrinia, Patrologia Graeca 46:120CD, 121A, 125A).

Nemesius. The first Christian to write a full summa on the nature of man (which scholastics knew under the name of Gregory), NEMESIUS OF EMESA began by examining the all-important question: what do we mean by soul? Is it identical with mind, or does mind come to soul? (De natura hominis 1, Patrologia Graeca 40:504A). The answers of Plotinus, Aristotle, and Plato he rejected as insufficient. Plotinus would make mind and soul two distinct entities; Aristotle posits a double nous, one coming from without; while Plato identifies nous and man, defining the latter as "a soul using a body." What Nemesius considered the soul to be is evident only indirectly, through his long survey and criticism (2, 556–589) of ancient opinions, including a devastating attack on Aristotle (560–569). He concluded that the soul is an incorporeal substance, subsistent in itself, not dependent on something else for its being, yet intended for union with the body (589AB, 592A). Bolder than his predecessors, Nemesius undertook to answer "the difficult question" how soul and body are joined (3, 592–608). Of all solutions offered, that of Ammonius Saccas (593B), as expressed by Porphyry, seemed to him best: "It cannot be denied [quoting Porphyry] that some substance can be assumed as complement to another substance and so become part of a being that, while remaining in its own nature, it both completes the other substance and becomes one with it and yet keeps its own identity. Moreover, without suffering any change itself, it may by its presence transform those things in which it is into means of its own activity" (604A). To illustrate such a union Nemesius found an apt analogy in the union of the Word of God and man in the Incarnation (601A). Much of what he said in succeeding chapters on the body, the outer and inner senses, the lower powers of the soul, and the passions, is an agglomerate from many sources: Aristotle, the Stoics, Galen, etc. This, with the lengthy analysis of the will, dependent in part on Aristotle's Ethics, is a new and important contribution to the Christian philosophy of man.

Other Influences. Since Maximus Confessor and St. John Damascene did little more than summarize earlier writers, Nemesius marked the climax of Greek patristic thought on the soul. The resulting doctrine of the soul as a substance made for union with the body, yet subsistent in itself, rational, incorporeal, simple, and immortal, was far different from the teaching of the early Greek philosophers. Plato and Aristotle seem to have had little direct influence in the formation of such a concept; when their doctrine was adduced, it was usually subject to criticism. Neoplatonism received less attention than one might expect. It is more probable that Middle Platonism, which flourished in the first Christian centuries, furnished Clement, Origen, and later writers with key ideas. At the same time, the Fathers were concerned with establishing a concept in accord with the Christian doctrine of immortality as well as of the Incarnation. Frequently, it seems they read Scripture with Greek minds, interpreting certain Semitic expressions in terms of their own backgrounds.

Latin Fathers. Africa, not Rome, provided the first Latin writers in the Church. Of those who wrote on the soul, the most important include Tertullian, Arnobius, Lactantius, Augustine, and a few later thinkers.

Tertullian. A lawyer and apologist, not too apt a philosopher, TERTULLIAN undertook in his De anima to summon up every human opinion on the soul [ch. 58; ed. J. H. Waszink (Amsterdam 1947) 80], using "God's letters" to test its worth (ch. 2). His documentation is poor, since much of his information is derived from Soranus the Stoic (ch. 6). Stoicism led him into one famous error, that the soul though a spirit is at the same time a body (ch. 5); this, he thought, was the only explanation of Dives and Lazarus (ch. 7). From it proceeds his TRADUCIANISM: that Adam's soul alone was created by God, while all other souls come into being by the act of generation (ch. 23–27, 36). Despite such errors, Tertullian's position was often solidly Christian, e.g., his approach to the body and its functions (De resurrectione carnis 4–6), the close union of body and soul (ibid. 7–10, 15–16), and the identification of soul and mind (De anima 12–13). He was the first Latin to see the powers not as parts of the soul but as vires et efficaciae, evidently a translation of the Greek energiae (ibid. 14). The influence of his De anima was extremely slight, perhaps because it was too polemical.

Arnobius. Of less importance was ARNOBIUS, whose "Case against the Pagans" (Adversus nationes) is of interest only for its attack on the immortality of the soul, a doctrine that turned the soul into a god (2:14–15). In his view, men are merely animate beings not greatly different from beasts, and for the most part do not act according to reason (16–17); this fickleness would show that the soul is not made by God (36, 45).

Lactantius. In contrast, LACTANTIUS dwelt on the real differences between man and beast as revealing God's special providence (Div. institut. 7:4; De opificio Dei 2–4). He rejected Tertullian's traducianism, since spirit cannot beget spirit (De opif. 17–19); for him, souls are produced by God at the time of conception.

Augustine. St. AUGUSTINE is the first of the Latin Fathers to have a clear concept of soul as a spiritual substance intimately united to the body. His doctrine, which became standard in the West until the late 12th century, owed much (including some shortcomings) to Neoplatonism, yet was much more strikingly Christian in approach and content. His thought begins with man created by God as a whole, a rational substance composed of body and soul (Trin. 15:7:11; Serm. 150:4). How these are united is beyond the comprehension of man (Civ. 21:10), but the union is natural and not penal (ibid. 13:16; Epist. 164:7), substantial and not accidental (Civ. 13.24). The soul is the active principle, the body the passive, in the living whole that is man (ibid. 22, 24), since the body subsists through the soul and receives form and life from it (ibid. 13.2; Immort. anim. 15–16), while soul is so merged with body that it does not lose its identity (Epist. 166:2). All this is possible only because the soul is a completely immaterial substance, res spiritualis, res incorporea, and close to the substance of God (In psalm. 145:4). The incorporeality of the soul, Augustine wrote to St. Jerome (Epist. 166:2), is something difficult to prove to those who are slow of wit—as is evident from his controversies over the question—but it is something of which he was wholly convinced. In proof he offered especially man's intellectual knowledge of the immaterial (Quant. anim. 13–14, 27–28), as well as self-consciousness (Gen. ad litt. 7:19–21). Later, between 467 and 472, his position was defended and reinforced by Claudianus Mamertus (De statu animae) against Faustus, Bishop of Riez, who ascribed a corporeal nature to both souls and angels [on this problem, see P. Glorieux, Autour de la spiritualité des anges (Tournai 1959)].

While Augustine was sure of the incorporeality of the soul, he was unable to reach a definitive position on its origin. Adam's soul was created directly by God (Gen. ad litt. 7:28); but as to the origin of all others, he confessed his inability to choose between opposing opinions (Retract. 1:1:3; C. Iulian. op. imperf. 2:178). Traducianism he regarded as a perverse theory that destroys the spiritual character of the soul (Epist. 190:4); creation of individual souls at conception seemed preferable, yet it hardly explained the transmission of original sin (Epist. 166:8). Could all souls have been created at once and then either be sent by God in due time to be united to bodies or come of their own accord? This is possible, yet it does not provide a solid reason for union with the body (Epist. 166:3). At most, Augustine was sure that God is the creator and maker of every soul, and that the soul is not an emanation from the divine substance but a creature made to God's image.

Later Thinkers. Augustine was not alone in such difficulties. St. GREGORY THE GREAT considered the question of the origin of soul difficult and beyond human comprehension (Epist. 52, Patrologia Latina 77:990A). St. ANSELM OF CANTERBURY regretted on his deathbed (1109) that he had not been able to elucidate the question (Patrologia Latina 158: 115B). On the other hand, St. Leo the Great (447), reproving the "fable" of preexistence, stated plainly that the Catholic faith constantly and truly teaches that the souls of men do not exist before they are breathed into their bodies, being placed there by God alone, who is the creator of souls and bodies (Epist. 15.10, Patrologia Latina 54:685A). Among the scholastics, following Peter Lombard (Sent. 2:18:7), St. Jerome was considered the patristic authority for creationism, since he said that God daily fashions souls and does not cease to be the creator (Patrologia Latina 23:372; on this problem, see Tresmontant, La Métaphysique du christianisme et la naissance de la philosophie chrétienne, 577–612).

Scholastics. Very little originality was shown in all the treatises on the soul that fill the early Middle Ages. Cassiodorus, Licinianus, Alcuin, Rabanus Maurus, Hincmar of Reims, and Ratramnus of Corbie were content to repeat Augustine and sometimes one another, even when they engaged in fresh controversies on soul and body. An exception was John Scotus Erigena, who translated Gregory of Nyssa's De hominis opificio and introduced certain of its themes into his De divisione naturae.

Twelfth-century Mystics. The renaissance of the 12th century saw a whole new approach to the soul from the viewpoint of MYSTICISM. Psychology became a prelude to the ascent to God. Such an approach had been that of St. Augustine, who in his search for God had proceeded from the external world to the inner world of the soul, and ascended through it to God (Conf. 7:17; 10:6–8). His dialectic became the inspiration for HUGH OF SAINT-VICTOR: "To mount upward to God is to enter into oneself; and not merely so to enter but in an ineffable way to transcend self within" (De vanitate mundi 2, Patrologia Latina 176:715B). The Cistercian school, after St. Bernard, was a more striking example of this trend. Almost every one of its writers composed a treatise in some form or other

"On the Soul" as the key to, and formulation of, his mysticism [see J. M. Déchanet, Guillaume de Saint-Thierry, Oeuvres choisies (Paris 1944) 51]. What sets many of these treatises apart from previous works was the fusion of the Latin tradition of Augustine with the theology of the Greek Fathers, especially Gregory of Nyssa and Pseudo-Dionysius, as well as the incorporation after 1140 of medical and psychological material from newly translated Greek and Arabic sources. William of Saint-Thierry is an example of the former, since his treatise De natura corporis et animae (Patrologia Latina 180:695–726) is largely and literally Gregory's work supplemented by Cassiodorus, Claudianus Mamertus, and a few pieces of Augustine (see Déchanet, 71–). Later writers of the school, St. Aelred of Rievaulx, Isaac of Stella, Alcher of Clairvaux (the supposed author of De spiritu et anima), and William of Conches, who was not a Cistercian, were much preoccupied with classifying the powers of the soul and discussing the organs of the body and the ventricles of the brain. Their work, especially Isaac's Epistola de anima and the anonymous De spiritu et anima (which incorporates much of the former) influenced some scholastics of the 13th century. The question of the identity of soul and powers, for example, stems from their writings (cf. Lottin, 1:483–502). Again, Isaac's theory that the union of soul and body is effected through the medium of the imagination was accepted by some and rejected by others, including St. Augustine [see Epist., Patrologia Latina 194:1881D; De spiritu et anima 14, Patrologia Latina 40:790; and P. Michaud-Quantin, "La classification des puissances de l'âme au XII^e siècle," Revue du moyen âge latin 5 (1949) 15–34].

Greek and Arabian Influence. The foregoing writers belong to what is sometimes called pre-scholasticism, the period uninfluenced by the new philosophical literature, Greek and Arabian, that began to appear in the West after 1150 (see Van Steenberghen). The advent of ARISTOTLE, AVICENNA, and later AVERROËS, and the appearance of the De anima of DOMINIC GUNDISALVI, or perhaps more likely of Ibn David, produced a whole new approach to psychological problems. Faced for the first time with a purely philosophical definition of the soul free from ethical or mystical aspects, and a metaphysical and not merely psychological theory of the relation of soul and body, the schoolmen were forced to reexamine their Christian traditions and decide whether or not they would and could accept the hylomorphism of Aristotle.

Those who came to grips with the problem early in the 13th century (e.g., JOHN BLUND, PHILIP THE CHANCELLOR, and JOHN OF LA ROCHELLE) usually took Avicenna as their guide in interpreting Aristotle's definition, since with Roger Bacon they considered him "the principal imitator of Aristotle and next to him the leader and prince of philosophy.” For Avicenna, the soul is both a spiritual substance and the perfection of the body. But, in an all-important distinction, he differentiated between the essence of the soul and its role in the body: “The term ‘soul’ is not given this spiritual being because of its substance but by reason of its relation to the body, just as in defining a workman we must include his trade, but we do not do so in defining ‘man’” [Anim. 1:1 (Venice 1508) fol. 1c]. On this basis some scholastics, St. Albert the Great among them, claimed that the spiritual soul could be considered the perfection of the body without being a form in the strict sense, since a form is always immersed in matter and has no existence of its own. Out of this viewpoint grew the theory, in Odo Rigaldus and St. Bonaventure and his school, of the colligantia naturalis, the natural bond, between body and soul. Soul is united as “perfection” to the body as “that which is perfectible”; but both are considered complete substances existing and acting independently of each other. To explain how the soul is capable of subsisting in itself, the school adopted the theory of a composition of spiritual matter and form proposed by AVICEBRON. The body, on the other hand, is constituted as body by some form or forms that precede the union with the soul and endure in that union. Notwithstanding their individual substantiality, soul and body are made for mutual union. There is a natural bond between them from which there results a natural union, but not that proposed by Aristotle. At most, Aristotelian HYLOMORPHISM was a help in understanding that union; the doctrine itself was rejected because it seemed to contradict the Christian teaching of the soul as a spiritual substance.

Thomas Aquinas. All such theories St. THOMAS AQUINAS rejected as useless obstructions to the true approach to the problem. For him, to speak of spiritual matter was to contravene the obvious and established meaning of matter. To posit a plurality of forms in the human body or in any body was to weaken, if not destroy, the metaphysics of actuality and potentiality, of matter and form, and to abandon the principles of true philosophy. To distinguish with Avicenna between soul as spirit and soul as form or perfection was to reduce its union with the body to one of “contact of power” and to make man “a being by accident” (C. gent. 2.57). Instead, St. Thomas undertook to show that Aristotle’s doctrine on soul as form and its hylomorphic union with the body was the only adequate interpretation fitting the facts of experience: “If anyone does not wish to say that the intellectual soul is the form of the body, let him find a theory whereby the act of understanding is the action of this man, for everyone knows by experience that he understands” (Summa theologiae 1a, 76:1).

Yet, to establish this, Thomas had to meet a more formidable adversary than the semi-Aristotelian scholastics; he had to oppose and refute Averroës, the Commentator of Aristotle, and the group in the Paris faculty of arts who chose to follow the mighty Muslim. For Averroës every form is completely immersed in matter and is thus purely and simply material. From this it follows that no immaterial intellectual substance can be the form of a body. While man possesses a soul that is a material perishable form, the intellect is not part of that soul but is somehow a separate unique substance. The burden lay on St. Thomas to prove against such a position (advanced in the name of Aristotle) that the soul and intellect are one, that this intellectual soul can be and is the form of the body and yet transcends the body in its intellectual power, and that this is the only true interpretation one can give to Aristotle’s doctrine (see Pegis, “St. Thomas and the Unity of Man,” 153–173).

In answering both extremes St. Thomas refused to see the problem as psychological or spiritual, as perhaps other scholastics were inclined to do, but regarded it, with Averroës, as primarily and fundamentally metaphysical. The solution, whether of the question of spiritual matter and form, of the plurality of forms, or of the union of soul and body, was so intrinsically bound up with his metaphysical doctrine that it provoked opposition on this ground in many quarters. In the last quarter of the 13th century the scholastic world was full of controversies that arose out of refusal to accept Aquinas’s position. Among the theologians of Paris there was open and outspoken criticism of his teaching on the unicity of form in man. Among the 219 propositions condemned at Paris in 1277 some touched it indirectly, while among the 30 proscribed shortly after at Oxford it was mentioned very specifically. The controversy continued into the 14th century, as is evident in Duns Scotus’s doctrine of the form of corporeity. Yet throughout, Aristotle’s definition was accepted; the differences arose over particular metaphysical interpretations.

Peter John Olivi. Connected with this is the peculiar theory of PETER JOHN OLIVI on the constitution of the soul itself. In the human body, he held, there are other forms (e.g., vegetative and sensitive) besides the soul; yet with the latter such forms make up but one complete form [Quaest. in 2 sent. 50 (Quaracchi 1924) 35]. From this he concluded that the intellective part of the soul is not as such the form of the body, since otherwise it could not be intellectual, free, immortal, and separable (ibid. 51, 111); yet at the same time it is the form through the sensitive part (59, 539). In the Council of Vienne (1311) many of Olivi’s positions were attacked; yet the decree Fidei Catholicae fundamentum, defining that the intellective or rational soul per se et essentialiter is the form of the body (Denz 900), apparently did not concern his doctrine, though William of Alnwick seems to have interpreted it to be so [Greg 30 (1949) 268; cf. C. Partee, "Peter John Olivi," Franc Studies 20 (1960) 241–253].

Finally, the discussion over the relation of the soul to its powers, which had its rise in the mid-13th century, gathered momentum after the time of St. Thomas and HENRY OF GHENT, especially among the disciples of Duns Scotus (see Piana). Interest in the 14th century, however, shifted from the soul itself to questions of man's knowledge of it and of knowledge in general.

See Also: AUGUSTINIANISM; FORMS, UNICITY AND PLURALITY OF; SCOTISM; THOMISM.

Bibliography: C. MAZZANTINI, Enciclopedia filosofica 1:222–239. J. BAINVEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 1.1:977–1006 (Paris 1950). É. H. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages, (New York 1955). F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy v.1–2 (Westminster, Md. 1950). A. C. PEGIS, "St. Thomas and the Unity of Man," Progress in Philosophy, ed. J. A. MCWILLIAMS (Milwaukee 1955) 153–173; St. Thomas and the Problem of the Soul in the Thirteenth Century (Toronto 1934). O. LOTTIN, Psychologie et morale aux XII^e et XIII^e siècles, 6 v. in 8 (Louvain 1942–60). THOMAS AQUINAS, "Commentary," Aristotle, De anima, in the Version of William of Moerbeke, tr. K. FOSTER and S. HUMPHRIES (New Haven 1951). A. FREMANTLE, ed., A Treasury of Early Christianity (New York 1953). F. VAN STEENBERGHEN, Aristotle in the West, tr. L. JOHNSTON (Louvain 1955). C. TRESMONTANT, La Métaphysique du christianisme et la naissance de la philosophie chrétienne (Paris 1961). C. PIANA, "La controversia della distinzione fra anima e potenze ai primordi della scuola scottista," Miscellanea del Centro di Studi Medievali (Milan 1956) 65–168.

[I. C. BRADY]

3. Modern and Contemporary Thought

Although the word soul continued to be widely used until the 19th century, the scholastic view of it as the principle of existence, of life, and of all levels of activity, as that which constitutes the individual man as one corporeal human existent, had already been lost before the origin of modern philosophy with Descartes. This part of the article therefore begins with doctrines concerning the soul that are typical of the Renaissance, continues with notions that were prevalent in the modern period, and concludes with a survey of the status of the concept of soul in contemporary philosophy.

Renaissance thought. Because of their nearness to the Averroist struggle over the unity of the intellect, Renaissance philosophers were concerned more with personal immortality and free will than with the substantiality of the soul. Thus M. FICINO, a Platonist, defended personal immortality. In his five degrees of being, related successively as cause and effect, the soul is the third or middle essence and the "fountain of motion."

The higher soul comprises the power of contemplation (mind), shared with God and the angels, and reason, unique to man. The soul, with two tendencies, one toward the body and related to sense, the other toward God and associated with the rational soul, is free to oppose or be misled by the senses. Because of reason, man is unable to attain final perfection on earth. That the general ontological principle (no natural desire can be in vain) be not contradicted, the human soul must know and enjoy God in afterlife. The natural inclination of the body also will be satisfied when the soul possesses its own body made everlasting, a natural condition in which the soul finds eternal rest.

P. Pomponazzi, heir to Averroist and Italian ARISTOTELIANISM, tried to make the soul a material inhabitant of an orderly universe. To be consistent with revelation, which states that the soul is immortal, the intellective soul must be entirely separate; if it is, it cannot be a FORM or else the union is of two independent elements. If the soul is the form of the body, it gives the body being as well as operation and is an immersed form. The human soul is thus essentially mortal and relatively immortal. The Aristotelian form or soul is here viewed univocally, not analogically. The act of existence of the soul is different from that of man the composite. The soul is a bodily function generated by the parents, not by special creation, and is incapable of operating or existing without the body. Later Pomponazzi declared that, philosophically speaking, the soul is mortal, and, lacking simplicity and spirituality, is exactly like any material form; only by faith can it be seen as immortal.

B. Telesio, while recognizing in the bodies of men and animals a SPIRIT or pneuma—an emanation of the warm element passed through the body by the nerves—felt that man could not be totally analyzed in biological terms. In his view, there must be present in man a forma superaddita, an immortal soul that informs body and spirit and is capable of union with God. This divine soul understands, but only those things the natural spirit presents to it.

G. Bruno, lacking a concept of ANALOGY, was unable to distinguish between SUBSISTENCE and ASEITY (aseitas). Particular finite substances are only modes of the unique divine substance. Every existent is animated by the WORLD SOUL, an infinite continuum in one sense, and yet, in another sense, discontinuous and infinitely divisible. The human soul is an individual soaring to the utmost spiritual development congruent with its own nature, imbued with the divine spirit, whereby the whole infinity of discrete and independent souls is fused into a unity transcending their discrete separateness. While immortality of a kind is thus guaranteed for the intellectual principle in man, man's individuality is lost, since union through love is comparable to the identification of a substance with its attributes.

Modern period. With the growth of the scientific attitude and the sterility of scholastic philosophy in the 17th century, scholastic terms were no longer used with their medieval connotations. This prepared for a variety of explanations consonant with rationalist, empiricist, and idealist philosophical positions.

Cartesianism. The Cogito of R. DESCARTES split man into two separate substances: one a thinking substance, the other, the body, an extended substance that is mechanical in nature and operation and thus like the rest of the material world. J. KEPLER and G. GALILEI had banished animation from inorganic nature, but the Cartesians went one step further and conceived the entire organic realm as subject to mechanical laws. Those who supported animism did so to support religious dogmas, particularly belief in an afterlife. The soul was regarded as a thinking substance, but the vitalizing, vegetative, and sensory functions implicit in the Thomistic concept were denied to it. Vitalism proposed a life principle in no way linked to the thinking, willing soul, the ground of all individual consciousness as described by Descartes. The soul, to him, located in the pineal gland, is an immaterial unextended being interacting with the body through the medium of the brain and nervous system only. The separation of the conceptions of vitalizing principle and thinking principle thus became complete.

Descartes's bold assertion that animal and bodily behavior are mechanical hastened the view of man's behavior as a mechanical response to stimuli and laid the grounds for the theoretical justification of conditioning therapies. The two aspects of the soul—that of thinker (res cogitans) and of thought (res cogitata) further complicated the mind-body problem. A. GEULINCX and N. MALEBRANCHE attempted a solution with their doctrine of OCCASIONALISM, which held that a change in either soul or body was the occasion for God to bring about a corresponding change in the other.

Leibniz and Spinoza. G. W. LEIBNIZ refused to admit intercausal relation. Man is composed of a superior monad (the soul) and an aggregate of inferior monads (the body). Both are so constructed that they register alike in their experiences but independently of each other, much as two clocks run together in preestablished harmony. The term soul applies to those created monads whose perception is more distinct than that of simple substances. Rational soul or mind, which distinguishes man from mere animals, gives reason and raises man to a knowledge of himself and of God. For Leibniz, thinking is the proper activity of the human soul. Ultimately, thinking becomes its only activity—with no causal relation to the body. While souls act according to final causes (thus implying the presence of a DYNAMISM in the soul), bodies act according to the laws of efficient causality. The two realms of causality are in harmony, not in contact, with each other.

For B. SPINOZA, mind and body are but two reflections of one clock seen at different angles. Thought, soul, or mind, and extension are but two of many attributes of one Real Substance, God. The soul is one with the cosmos; the mind, an activity of the Divine Mind.

Empiricism. J. LOCKE, too, rejected the soul as a substantial form. The conception of an immaterial soul, for him, involved no more obscurity than that of material substance. Soul is as unknown as is substance, but the notion of "spiritual substance" seemed to him more reasonable, probable, and in harmony with religious belief.

The ambiguous connotations of the soul as both subject of thinking and object of thought persisted for a century. G. BERKELEY was convinced of the reality of the spirit, mind, or soul as a perceiving active being—not one's ideas, but something distinct from ideas in which ideas exist or whereby they are perceived. Spirit is that which thinks, wills, and perceives. The soul always thinks. Such an active uncompounded substance cannot be dissolved by natural forces; therefore, Berkeley concluded, the soul of man is naturally immortal.

D. HUME denied the substantiality of spirit. In place of the word soul he used the term self, that to which impressions and ideas are supposed to have a reference. Through habit man merely ascribes constancy and identity to a bundle of perceptions (called self) in much the same way as he ascribes a causal relationship to a mere sequence of events. If substance is defined as something that may exist in itself; and, if man has no idea of substance, only of perceptions; and if perceptions do not appear to need support, then the question as to whether perceptions inhere in a material or spiritual substance is meaningless. So, too, is the question of the relation of the soul to the body.

J. O. de La Mettrie brought to its ultimate conclusion this examination of the metaphysical concept of soul and the effort to verify it empirically by calling soul "an empty symbol of which one has no conception and which a sound mind would use only to indicate that which thinks in man."

Kantianism. I. KANT faced the ambiguity implicit in the connotation of soul as both thought and thinker. He claimed that reason regulates ideas, validly, but that reason may constitute ideas, invalidly. The ultimate synthetic principles of reason are soul, world, and God. Attempts to prove the soul's immateriality, spirituality, immortality, personality, and its animation of a body amount to paralogisms or formal errors in reasoning. "'I as thinking am an object of the internal sense, called a soul.'" That which is object of the external senses is called body. In pure reason, one confuses the logical subject with the real substrate when trying to prove the substantiality of the soul. The soul as an unconditioned real unity of all phenomena of the inner sense can neither be proved nor refuted, but it can be a valuable heuristic principle for investigating the interconnections of the psychical life. The object of psychology is the determinable self or thought; of philosophy, the determining self or thinker. Only for practical or moral purposes are the freedom and immortality of man to be believed. They can never be known. Man can believe that the soul is immortal because ethical consciousness demands the highest GOOD that is beyond the order of nature. Philosophically, it is not clear how Kant's noumenal ego or self is related to the scholastic term soul.

The role of reason as regulator of phenomenal experiences changed imperceptibly, however, into the view that the mind constitutes knowledge. The Kantian school continued to propagate in crude form the doctrine that neither the object in itself nor the subject in itself is knowable but only the world of CONSCIOUSNESS. The object gives the manifold of the material; the subject imposes the synthetic unity of the form. Soul, like all forms, is a logical construct imposed by the subject on a series of phenomena to preserve the unity of man. That the intrinsic unity of man may be due to the soul as a formal metaphysical principle is simply not present in Kantian thought.

Reactions to Idealism. In reaction to post-Kantian IDEALISM, J. F. Herbart developed the theory of the "reals" (Realen) that reciprocally disturb each other in order to be preserved. These self-preservations are the means by which the unknown "real" of the human soul maintains itself against disturbance by other "reals." As a simple substance, the soul is naturally unknowable; psychology, as a science, studies only its self-preservations, for these constitute the soul. The soul merely furnishes the indifferent stage for the coexistence of the ideas. The psychical life or life of the soul is one of reciprocal tension of ideas.

A. SCHOPENHAUER, still keeping Kant's doctrine of the noumenal and the phenomenal, held that the thing-in-itself is the WILL. In men and animals, the will appears as motivation determined through ideas; in instinctive and vegetative life, it appears as susceptibility to stimulation, and in the rest of the nonconscious world, as mechanical processes. For Schopenhauer, the ABSOLUTE is world-will.

The result of this line of thought was that human soul was no longer considered as it is in itself but rather as it can be investigated in its activities. MAINE DE BIRAN, J. G. FICHTE, and Schopenhauer located the essential nature of man in the will—although they did not explicitly identify soul with will itself.

Hegelianism. The dialectical method of Fichte and G. W. F. HEGEL challenged the immortality of the soul. In their systems of perpetual becoming and of passing from one form to another, the finite personality could scarcely be a substance in itself, and thus the strongest argument for immortality was undermined.

Hegel presented his philosophy of spirit in three parts, the first two dealing with finite spirit or soul and the last with Absolute Spirit. In anthropology, the soul is merely a sensing and feeling spirit, enjoying self-feeling but not reflective self-consciousness. It is embodied; the body is merely the external aspect of the soul. After this study of an undifferentiated subjective spirit, Hegel investigated the phenomenology of consciousness wherein the subjective spirit is confronted first by the other, external to it, and then by itself in reflective self-consciousness. Ultimately it rises to universal self-consciousness wherein other selves are recognized as both one with itself and yet distinct.

Contemporary philosophy. Granted the difficulty of drawing a dividing line between modern and contemporary thought regarding the soul, the principal movements within contemporary philosophy may be discussed under the headings of phenomenology, Marxism, neopositivism, American philosophy, and existentialism.

Phenomenology. M. SCHELER opposed Kant's ideas on the noumenal ego and maintained that the ego is merely another object of knowledge. E. HUSSERL, on the other hand, extended Descartes's doubt to the absolute certainty of mind as thinking substance. By transcendental reflection, he bracketed the existence of the world and his thoughts and thus reached the transcendental ego, the source from which all objective phenomena derive their meaning. In Husserl's transcendental reflection, man looks at himself as the thought. Man is thus still split into the psycho-physical "I," the "I" of lived immanent events, and the transcendental ego. The sharp distinction between mind and soul persists in Husserl's thought; the principle that gives rise to man's rational and volitional life is still considered as quite apart from psychical effects.

M. MERLEAU-PONTY viewed man as the unfolding of the body-subject. The relation between the body and the soul, for him, is one in which the first constituted layer of meaning, the body, serves as the starting point for the higher “given” of meaning, the soul. The body is below the conscious subject. It is another subject, preconscious and impersonal, and does not derive its subjective character from a principle other than itself. It is a self-transcending movement. The natural “I” understands the world before and better than the conscious “I.” The “I-body” is neither pure matter, pure spirit, nor a merger of the two. The concepts soul and body are relative. Fixed existence and human self-movement are two aspects of the soul reality, the body-subject.

Marxism. K. MARX described a profound self-alienation in the socioeconomic sphere, for he regarded man only as matter. To N. LENIN, mind or consciousness was an epiphenomenon. In the Marxist-Leninist view, consciousness is a product of the brain and the soul as a spiritual substance is not even considered. (See MATERIALISM, DIALECTICAL AND HISTORICAL.)

Neopositivism. Neopositivists and logical positivists continue the emphasis on verifiability raised by the empiricists. B. RUSSELL claims that mental events are more real to him than matter, which is not immediately given but must be established by deduction and construction. At the same time he denies the existence of a substantial soul because, as he maintains, mental phenomena are totally dependent on physiological phenomena. Neopositivists, in general, hold that intersubjective VERIFICATION is possible only of empirical experience, only of the body and its movements. The concept of soul, not open to intersubjective verification, is meaningless. Statements in classical philosophy, such as, “The soul is immortal, free, and a substance,” express feelings but assert nothing.

American Philosophy. For W. JAMES, the soul or pure ego and the will are outside the realm of empirical psychology. They can neither be affirmed nor denied by psychology, although the notions of soul and will may help in systematizing philosophical thought. J. Dewey, influenced by the theory of evolution, regarded the mind merely as an adaptive function of the body. While A. N. WHITEHEAD affirmed the existence of spirit, he could regard it as substance no more than he could regard the body as substance. Both are events. Consciousness is a function, the bipolar event seen from within. The immortality of the soul can be maintained only on the evidence of something like religious experience.

Existentialism. In reaction to SCIENTISM, to extreme DUALISM, and to idealism, H. BERGSON, the existentialists, and the personalists sought to restore either the spiritual aspect of man, or his unity, or his presence in the world, or all three. They, too, avoided the word soul and substituted for it such terms as besouled body, body-subject, incarnated consciousness, and person. Discussion here is limited to the forms of EXISTENTIALISM proposed by Jaspers, Marcel, Sartre, and Heidegger.

Karl JASPERS holds that there are four spheres of reality in the world: matter, life, the soul as inner experience, and spirit, the rational soul of traditional philosophy. None can be subsumed under a single unifying principle. Mythical language calls it the soul, whereas philosophical terminology calls it “existence,” a being that stands out against the totality of the world’s being.

Gabriel MARCEL starts with man’s presence in the world. To be a man is not only to “have” a body but to “be” a bodily incarnate being. In fact, men’s souls are made or unmade by the quality of response to being and bodily trials.

J. P. SARTRE denies that man has a nature or fixed essence. He is a useless passion for whom there is no potentiality. The questions of God and the soul are problems for metaphysics since one questions about the soul only in relation to particular things. If the study of apparent presence in consciousness is identified with ontology, the principle of causality is excluded from both the real and the intentional order. This ontology is not required to infer an immaterial principle of life or soul. Sartre’s denial of essences is ambiguous, however, for it is not clear whether he refers to the metaphysical or to moral aspects of man when he states that man’s free choices constitute his essence.

Martin HEIDEGGER possibly substitutes the notion of spirit for that of soul. He deplores the reinterpretation of spirit as intelligence or mere cleverness. The spirit, to him, is the sustaining, dominating principle in which all true power and beauty of the body, all courage, authenticity, and creativity are grounded. Upon the power or impotence of the spirit depends the rise and fall of these qualities and activities of man. “Spirit is a fundamental knowing resolve toward the essence of being.” Where spirit prevails, this being becomes ever more so, for the spirit is the mobilization of the powers of being. Spirit, moreover, is not world reason.

Summary. NOMINALISM and the rise of empirical and mathematical science gradually emptied the concept of soul of its original meaning as substantial form of living beings. With the confusion of the metaphysical and empirical levels of knowledge and the transfer of the scientific criteria of validation to metaphysics, the concept of soul as substance, knowable by man, was challenged by Locke and Hume and ultimately by Kant. The subject-object split in man’s knowledge, begun by Descartes and accentuated by Kant, led to idealism and MATERIALISM.

In reaction, philosophers became less concerned with probing the nature of man’s unity of body and spirit

(i.e., the essence of man). Rather they sought a view of man as incarnated consciousness, besouled body, and body-subject whose existence is quite different from the being of all other reality, since only man can stand out (ex-sistere) against the world by acts of responsible decision. The consequent disuse of the term soul is not so much a rejection of the concept of a dynamic organizing principle of unity in man as it is a rejection of a concept of man as split in two—a view that is apt to occur when man is described as a union of body and soul. The shift in attention is thus from the essence of man to his existing—his mode of being in the world. That man is spiritual may be implied by many of the existentialists when they attribute to man a form of existence different from other existents. Related notions, such as FREEDOM and spirituality (but not immortality), seem to be implicit in the thinking of Marcel, E. Mounier, Heidegger, Jaspers, M. Buber, perhaps even of Merleau-Ponty. Yet the term soul itself seems to be ignored by contemporary philosophers and to be used primarily in theological and moral circles.

See Also: PERSONALISM; SELF, THE; SPIRIT; SPIRITUALISM; SUBJECTIVITY.

Bibliography: F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy, (Westminster, Md. 1963). R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 3:1–22. J. D. COLLINS, A History of Modern European Philosophy (Milwaukee 1954). S. STRASSER, The Soul in Metaphysical and Empirical Psychology (Pittsburgh 1957). W. ELLIS, The Idea of the Soul in Western Philosophy and Science (New York 1940). E. CASSIRER, The Individual and the Cosmos in Renaissance Philosophy, tr. M. DOMANDI (New York 1964). E. CASSIRER et al., eds., The Renaissance Philosophy of Man (Chicago 1948). P. O. KRISTELLER, Renaissance Thought (New York 1961). B. SNELL, The Discovery of the Mind: The Greek Origins of European Thought, tr. T. G. ROSENMEYER (Cambridge, Mass. 1953). H. SPIEGELBERG, The Phenomenological Movement, 2 v. (The Hague 1960). R. C. KWANT, The Phenomenological Philosophy of Merleau-Ponty (Pittsburgh 1963). W. A. M. LUIJPEN, Existential Phenomenology (Pittsburgh 1960).

[M. GORMAN]

4. Philosophical Analysis

One cannot ask about the nature of the human soul without having first asked and answered the question about its existence. Moreover, the question about its existence cannot be meaningfully pursued unless one has first assigned a meaning to “human soul.” This is simply an application of the Aristotelian-Thomist doctrine that the question quid est (which asks for a DEFINITION, i.e., a statement of a thing’s nature) is not properly asked unless one has answered the question an est (which asks whether there is such a thing); and that the question an est cannot be pursued unless one has answered the question quid est quod dicitur (which asks for a meaning for the word or expression used to designate the thing to be investigated, i.e., a quid nominis).

Existence. If one agrees that “human soul” will be taken to mean “source of thought activity,” and gives a careful account of the meaning of “thought activity,” he is in a position to ask: Are there human souls? It is then easy to see that the question: Are there human souls? is answered by answering the question: Are there things that think? Of the two direct methods available for answering the latter question—that of sense observation and that of INTROSPECTION—introspection can serve here as the primary, though not exclusive, method. One confronts a thinking being in the awareness of his own thought activity; that is, introspection makes man aware of his own existence as a thinking being. Further, by noticing that language is used to communicate thoughts, man comes to recognize that thinking beings other than himself exist. Sense observation plays a primary role in this recognition. (Direct method is used here by way of opposition to indirect method; in the latter—in addition to sense observation or introspection—there is also a reasoning process, as, e.g., in proofs for God’s existence. In the direct method, one has an immediate cognitive contact, either in sense observation or in introspection, with the thing in question, so that reasoning is not required as a mediating activity; all one needs is a quid nominis.)

Nature. Apropos of the nature of the human soul, it is important to consider the following points: (1) the human soul is man’s substantial form; nonetheless (2) it is to some extent completely immaterial, i.e., it is a subsistent form, or a spirit; but (3) it is not complete as to species; (4) though it is essentially and quantitatively simple, it is dynamically composed; (5) some of its powers require habits for their perfection; and (6) even though it is to some extent completely immaterial, it is even to that extent, though from a different viewpoint, dependent on the human body. These points are considered in order.

Substantial Form. The human soul, like any sort of soul, is the first actuality of a natural organized body, and as first actuality it is a substantial form (see SOUL; ENTELECHY). It is thus not a substance, but only part of a substance.

Immaterial. To say that the human soul is completely immaterial is to say both that matter is not a part of what it is and that it is independent of matter for its existence. This becomes clear when one considers that a thing can be said to be immaterial if it is such that matter is not a part of what it is, even though such a thing may be dependent on matter for its existence; e.g., substantial forms, or the accidental form of QUANTITY. A thing is completely material only if it depends on matter for its existence and has matter as part of what it is—a definition that is verified of composed substance. Substantial forms, therefore, can be said to be material, since they depend on matter for existence, and immaterial as well, since matter is not a part of what they are. But the completely immaterial neither has matter as part of what it is nor depends on matter for its existence.

The claim that the human soul is completely immaterial can be established as follows. In the realm of physical changes, both substantial and accidental, the forms received are individual forms, because what receives them is individual matter. An individual form is a form that is one, countably one, among several of a type. A type, considered as such, e.g., manness, is neither one (countably one) nor more than one. Man can be one or many only if found in something divisible in such a way that its actually being divided yields a countable or numerical plurality; in the physical universe this is clearly three-dimensional extendedness. It is because the matter of the physical universe is three-dimensionally extended that it can be divided into diverse parts, each of which can be counted as one (this is what is meant by “individual matter”), and into each of which, subjected to an appropriate natural process, a form of some type can be introduced.

It is to be noticed that wherever matter is found, it is found as three-dimensionally quantified; moreover, it is circumscribed to being just so much (i.e., actually divided into diverse parts) as is found in what one calls an individual thing. If matter were not quantified and actually divided into diverse parts, the forms of things in the physical universe could not be numerically multiplied (see INDIVIDUATION).

Thus, in the realm of physical changes, whether substantial or accidental, the forms received are individual forms, because the recipient is individual matter. The same thing is to be noticed in the realm of sensitive activity. The sensible form received into the sense is received into a bodily organ, such as the eye, an organ that is three-dimensionally quantified and circumscribed to being just so much; this is why the form received is an individual form. Thus, one can see that, universally speaking, if the recipient of a form is individual matter, the form received is an individual form. So that, if man can discover in an examination of the contents of his knowing experiences a form that is not an individual form, it will follow that there is in him a power that is not the power of some bodily organ.

It is not difficult to discover such a form, for the human soul performs the activity of UNDERSTANDING. To understand is to receive the forms (essences) of things absolutely, i.e., as separated from, as abstracted from, individuality. For example, to understand “man” is to have grasped this: something composed of flesh and bones and soul—understood absolutely or with no qualifications. Existing men are individual men; each man is something composed of this flesh and these bones and this soul. It is the presence in the existing individual of quantified matter circumscribed to being just so much that accounts for its being an individual. But one’s understanding, i.e., his intellectual knowledge, of that to which he attaches the word “man” is simply this: something composed of flesh and bones and soul; and the qualifiers “this” and “these” are not included.

Even though each human soul is an individual soul, it cannot have matter as part of what it is. For it is clear that whatever is received into something must be received according to the mode (capacity) of the recipient. Since the human soul, in knowing what things are, receives the forms (essences) of things absolutely, i.e., since its mode of reception in intellectual knowledge is absolute, the human soul likewise must be an absolute form.

If the human soul were composed of matter and form, it would follow that the forms of things received in knowledge would be received into it as individuals, as is the case in sensation and in physical change generally. The same thing would follow if the intellectual soul were held to operate through some bodily organ, e.g., the brain, in the way in which the power of sight operates through the bodily organ that is the eye. The bodily matter of the organ would individualize the form received. Thus, the human soul is totally free of matter; not only does it not have matter as part of what it is, but it neither exists nor operates with a dependence on matter (St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 1a, 75.5).

The complete IMMATERIALITY of the human soul must be properly understood. It is a complete immateriality that is at the same time partial. The human soul is the form (substantial form) of the human body; and as the form of a living body, it is the source of vegetative and sensitive activities, which take place with a dependence on the matter of the human body. Thus, the human soul has activities, hence powers or parts, that are material, in the sense of dependent on matter. In some of its powers or parts, therefore, the human soul is dependent on the body. In its intellectual part, it is independent of the body. This is what is meant by describing the complete immateriality of the human soul as a partial one.

The above has shown that the human soul is a subsistent form or a spirit, i.e., that it operates and exists independently of matter as of a subject. Now, matter is the proper subject for substantial form; there is no subject but matter in which such a form can exist (see MATTER AND FORM). Thus, if the existence of the human soul is independent of matter as of a subject, it exists in the way proper to a SUBSTANCE; it is subsistent. But it is subsistent only partially, i.e., to the extent that it has an intellectual power or part.

Incomplete in Species. Though the human soul is a subsistent form, it is a subsistent form that is also a substantial form. From this it is clear that the human soul, though complete as an existent, is nonetheless not complete as to SPECIES. Only the composite of human body and human soul, the man, is complete as to species.

Essentially Simple, but Dynamically Composed. Although the human soul is essentially simple (i.e., not composed of matter and form), and hence quantitatively simple (i.e., not composed of quantitative parts), it is nonetheless said to be dynamically composed. That is, it has a multiplicity of parts or powers, ordered to a multiplicity of life activities; it has as many powers as it has diverse sorts of activity. These are often called power parts or dynamic parts; and thus the soul is sometimes said to be dynamically composed, i.e., to have dynamic parts (see FACULTIES OF THE SOUL).

Although the soul is dynamically composed, there is but one soul in each one man, which is clear from the fact that soul is a substantial form. If a living thing had a plurality of souls, each taken as the source of a diverse sort of activity—e.g., if man had a vegetative soul as source of nourishing, growing, and reproducing, and also a sensitive soul as source of seeing, hearing, etc., and lastly an intellectual soul as source of thought activity—it would follow that a man would be simultaneously more than one thing. For a substantial form is what constitutes a thing a being.

Powers and Habits. Some of the powers of the human soul can be made to operate more easily, more perfectly, and more efficiently by means of habits. Habits are acquired qualities (as opposed to powers, which are innate) that dispose these powers to easier and more efficient operation (see HABIT). Knowledge is such a quality of the intellect; virtue, of the will and of the sense appetites—e.g., temperance is a virtue of the concupiscible APPETITE. Not all powers can be perfected by habits, nor are all of them in need of such perfecting, e.g., the powers of nourishing and growing. Nonetheless, some aspects of these powers are so perfectible, e.g., one can acquire the habit of proper and deep breathing. Generally speaking, man's rational powers, and any of man's lower powers, to the extent that they come under the domination of the rational powers, are so perfectible.

Dependent on Body. It is important to understand that, although the human soul is completely immaterial in its intellectual part, it is nonetheless, and qua intellectual, dependent on the body, in particular on the brain and on the organs of the external senses. This dependence is twofold: originative and concomitant.

Man is born with an INTELLECT that is as a blank tablet; it is a power or capacity to know, but it possesses no knowledge. Man's first intellectual knowledge is about things in the sense-perceivable world. His intellect forms its ideas about things in the real world with a dependence on his senses. Man's intellectual knowledge thus originates in his sense experience of the real world; nevertheless the intellect itself, by its own power and not by that of any sense, produces its ideas; for an idea is an absolute form. This is what is meant by the originative dependence of the intellect on the bodily organs of sensation.

But even after the intellect is in possession of some knowledge, it remains dependent on a bodily organ, viz, the brain; for the brain is the bodily organ of the IMAGINATION, which produces and stores the sensible forms of things originally perceived by the external senses. These stored forms are called images or phantasms. Like the sensible species that are individualized by the bodily matter of the organs of the external senses, the phantasm is individualized by the bodily matter of the brain. By means of phantasms man is in cognitive contact with things not here and now being perceived by external sense. Thus, by means of phantasms, the intellect is provided an object to think about. The intellect carries on its thought activities, therefore, with a dependence on accompanying or concomitant brain-produced phantasms. To be sure, the intellect thinks by its own power, for to think is to entertain an absolute form; but the phantasm provides the object about which it thinks. Ordinarily the concomitant phantasm is visual, or auditory, or olfactory, etc., i.e., a reproduction of the external sensation(s) from which the idea was originally abstracted. For example, a visual phantasm of the body of a man ordinarily accompanies one's thinking about what a man is. Often, however, especially in highly abstract thinking, the concomitant phantasm is a phantasm, usually visual or auditory, of the word, expression, or symbol attached to the concept. For example, a visual or auditory phantasm of the word "essence" often accompanies one's thinking about what it is to be an essence; or, visual phantasms of the symbols for "is equal to" (=), "is greater than" (>), "is less than" (<), etc., often accompany one's mathematical thinking. This is what is meant by the concomitant dependence of the intellect on the body.

Other views. Although materialistic views of the nature of man—views denying the existence of the human soul—have the obvious advantage of simplicity and of not having to consider the problem of the soul-body relationship, they nonetheless do not take into account, among other things, the fact that knowledge of absolute forms is an indisputable element of man's knowing experience. The very formulation of such a denial is itself an instance of knowledge of absolute forms.

Platonic views of man's nature—views that identify man with his soul and claim that soul's relationship to body is accidental and simply that of a tenant to his room or that of a prisoner to his cell—also have the advantage of simplicity. However, they have no adequate way of accounting for things such as: (1) the effects that conditions or states of the body have on the soul's thinking and willing, e.g., the effects of brain damage in impairing thought activity or causing its total cessation, or the role of bodily conditions and states in the phenomena of split personality, hysteria, and amnesia; (2) the introspectively experienced unity of a man as the single source of the activities attributed to his body as well as of those attributed to his soul. Idealistic views of man's nature—views that deny the existence of matter and maintain that all bodies exist only as thoughts in some mind—are subject to the same inadequacies.

Other views of man's nature, such as interactionism, epiphenomenalism, the dual-aspect theory, parallelism, occasionalism, and preestablished harmony, are attempts to come to grips, but without success, with the great problems emerging from treating the human body and the human soul as two different things (see SOUL-BODY RELATIONSHIP). In the Aristotelian-Thomist account, the soul is not one thing and the body another. Neither is a thing at all. The man is the thing, the one thing, with a soul related to the body as the body's first actuality.

See Also: FORM; MAN, 2; SPIRIT.

Bibliography: C. MAZZANTINI, Enciclopedia filosofica 1:222–239. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe 3:1–30 (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30). F. HARTMANN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 4:287–291 (3rd ed. Tübingen 1957–63). J. E. ROYCE, Man and His Nature (New York 1961). R. J. CONNELE, “The ‘Intus Apparens’ and the Immateriality of the Intellect,” The New Scholasticism 32 (1958) 151–186.

[J. BOBIK]

5. Theology

There is no unanimous Christian teaching on every point concerning the human soul. We seem to live in an era in a very long evolution of the anthropological dogma, i.e., of the believing understanding of the mystery of man in his body and soul. As a result of controversy and the development of Biblical anthropology, there is a growing tendency to consider man in his unity and personality and to interpret him from the historico-salvational and Christological point of view (Christ the ideal of man; see H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer 301, 554, 900, etc.). This is being done in a manner as free as possible of any preconceived philosophical mentality (e.g., Orphic or Platonic understanding of the human soul), the projection of which upon the revealed data could oversimplify, impair, or destroy rather than save and elucidate to the faithful the mystery of man in the totality of his being. Besides, today in theology the accent lies correctly on the eternal life of the whole man after resurrection in Christ, rather than on the salvation of the immortal soul, because it is the whole man in his totality who is saved by the merciful God [note the definition of the Assumption of Mary “to the glory of heaven both in body and soul” (ibid. 3903)]. As a result, the distinction between the superior and inferior, more and less noble, or precious, part, in man (ibid. 815) is vanishing, because theologians realize that man is an IMAGE, partner, child, mystery, etc. of God in the totality of his being rather than in his soul only.

Soul and Body. This article considers the soul first according to the teaching of the solemn magisterium and then according to that of the ordinary magisterium.

Solemn Magisterium. Interpreting officially the witness of the Scriptures and tradition concerning the human soul, the teaching authority of the Church solemnly affirms that the Triune God is the creator of the human creature “constituted, as it were, alike of the spirit and the body” (Lateran Council IV in 1215: ibid. 800; cf. Vatican Council I: ibid. 3002); “that man has one rational and intellectual soul” (Council of Constantinople IV in 870: ibid. 657; there the doctrine of the two souls in man was condemned as heretical); “that the rational or intellectual soul is the form of the human body in itself and essentially” (Council of Vienne in 1312 against Peter John Olivi: ibid. 902, cf. 900, 1440); and that the human soul is “immortal and multiple according to the multitude of bodies into which it is infused, multiplied, and to be multiplied . . .” (Lateran Council V in 1513 against some humanistic Aristotelians who renewed the Averroistic monopsychism: ibid. 1440). These decisions of the ecumenical councils tried to save the true unity of man and simultaneously to point out his metaphysical constitution and not the historico-salvational, biological, or (experimental) psychological dimensions in which man must be considered primarily as a psychosomatic whole. Besides, the councils did not recognize officially the Thomistic doctrine of the unicity of the substantial form or Aristotelian HYLOMORPHISM, but, in the language most convenient at that time, only tried to defend the mystery of man in the plurality of his dimensions and the unity of his being. The definition of the soul's personal immortality (ibid. 1440) leaves open the question whether it is naturally immortal because of its spiritual quality, or supernaturally because of a special gift of God (however it is stated that Christ makes men participators in His immortality: ibid. 413).

Ordinary Magisterium. Man is so substantially one, according to the ordinary teaching authority of the Church, that his unity (which is not accidental) has ontological priority before the real and irreducible plurality of his being. He is one in origin (see CREATIONISM; TRADUCIANISM), being, and final destiny (Enchiridion symbolorum 502, 2828, 3005, 3221–22, 3224). Therefore each consideration of a part or one aspect of man implies repercussions concerning all parts and aspects. Any division of man is always inadequate, because as a microcosm (ibid. 3771) he must be considered as a whole. However, since there is an essential difference between matter and SPIRIT (ibid. 3891; cf. 3022–24), there is a real plurality of realities in man which are irreducible to each other. Thus the spiritual soul is not an emanation or a part of man's matter or body (ibid. 3022, 3220–21, 3896), and it is equally true that the matter cannot be deduced from or reduced to the finite human spiritual soul. Both need a special creative act of God in order to exist, because they are ontologically different (ibid. 360, 3896). Thus man possesses the vital (ibid. 2833) and constitutive principle of his being, i.e., one spiritual, simple, and substantial soul (ibid. 791, 801, 900, 1440), which despite the substantial unity of being in man, is in its being and meaning essentially different and independent of matter (ibid. 1007, 3002, 3022, 3220–24, 3896), and immortal (ibid. 1440). Since the soul is spiritual in itself, man is not composed of three different realities, i.e., body, soul, and spirit, but is a substantial unity in body and spiritual soul only (as opposed to all sorts of trichotomy: ibid. 301, 502, 657, 900, 902, 1440–41, 2828). The approval by the ordinary magisterium of the Thomistic theses concerning the human soul (ibid. 3613–22) must be understood as a favorable reception of them as one of the best illustrations of the mystery of man.

See Also: MAN, ARTICLES ON; RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD, 2; SOUL, HUMAN; IMMORTALITY; SOUL, HUMAN, ORIGIN OF; SOUL-BODY RELATIONSHIP.

Bibliography: J. BAINVEL et al., Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 1.1:968–1041. J. HAEKEL, et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 9:566–574. A. HALDER, ibid. 4:611–614. A. HALDER, et al., ibid. 1:604–627; 7:278–294. “Tod,” ibid. v.10. “Leib,” “Seele,” “Tod,” K. RAHNER and H. VORGRIMMLER, Kleines theologisches Wörterbuch (Freiburg 1961). J. B. METZ, H. FRIES, ed., Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe, 2 v. (Munich 1962–63) 2:30–37, bibliog. J. BRINKTRINE, Die Lehre von der Schöpfung (Paderborn 1956) 220–256. W. B. MONAHAN, The Psychology of St. Thomas Aquinas and Divine Revelation (Worcester 1938). D. R. G. OWEN, Body and Soul (Philadelphia 1956). K. RAHNER, On the Theology of Death, tr. C. H. HENKEY (Quaestiones disputatae 2; New York 1961). P. OVERHAGE and K. RAHNER, Das Problem der Hominisation (Quaestiones disputatae 12–13; Freiburg 1961). K. RAHNER, Schriften zur Theologie (Einsiedeln 1954–) 2:211–225; 4:428–437. H. W. ROBINSON, The Christian Doctrine of Man (Edinburgh 1911). J. A. T. ROBINSON, The Body: A Study in Pauline Theology (Chicago 1952). F. RÜSCHE, Das Seelenpneuma (Paderborn 1933). M. J. SCHEEBEN, Handbuch der katholischen Dogmatik (v.3–4; 3d ed. Freiburg 1961) 3 § 146–157. M. SCHMAUS, Katholische Dogmatik, 5 v. in 8 (5th ed. Munich 1953–59) 2.1 § 128–130; J. SCHMID, “Der Begriff der Seele im NT,” Einsicht und Glaube, ed. J. RATZINGER and H. FRIES (Freiburg 1962). A. SERTILLANGES, Les Grandes thèses de la philosophie thomiste (Paris 1928). S. STRASSER, Le Problème de l'âme (Paris 1953). THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa Theologiae 1a, 75–90; De anim. J. TYCIAK, Zwischen Morgenland und Abendland (Düsseldorf 1949). T. WARE, The Orthodox Church (pa. Baltimore 1963), R. C. ZAEHNER, Matter and Spirit: Their Convergence in Eastern Religions, Marx, and Teilhard de Chardin (New York 1963). A. AHLBRECHT, Tod und Unsterblichkeit in der evangelischen Theologie der Gegenwart (Paderborn 1964). R. HEINZMANN, Die Unsterblichkeit der Seele und die Auferstehung des Leibes (Münster 1965).

[P. B. T. BILANIUK]

SOUL, HUMAN, ORIGIN OF

Christians are in fairly general agreement that each human soul begins to exist by a direct creative act of God at the moment of its union with matter to form the new human being, with no previous existence. Various other theories have been held, however, and Catholic scholars are still divided as to whether the soul originates at the moment of conception or later during gestation. This article discusses the problem involved and the diversity of solutions offered concerning both the manner of the soul's origin and the time at which this occurs.

Manner of Soul's Origin

Historically, emanationism and traducianism are the two major theories opposing orthodox teaching concerning the origin of the human soul. Recent Catholic discussion, while presupposing the doctrine of CREATIONISM, has centered about the degree of immediacy of God's action in the creative process.

History. EMANATIONISM was held by pantheists, Pythagoreans, Stoics, and early heretics such as the Gnostics, Manichees, and Priscillianists. They believed that the human soul emanates or flows from the divine substance as a particle or offshoot of God. This theory has been rejected as contrary both to the nature of God and to the nature of the soul. If God is a perfectly simple spiritual substance, He cannot be divided or have parts; conversely, the soul lacks many of the characteristics proper to divine substance, such as eternal self-subsistence and total lack of change. Moreover, this position militates against the individuality of the human soul.

TRADUCIANISM holds that the human soul is produced by the generative act of the human parents. This explanation supposes a seed or sprout, which may be either material or spiritual. Totally materialistic theories of evolution and other denials of the spirituality of the soul naturally imply that all of man originates through organic generation. A spiritual soul cannot come wholly from material germ cells. TERTULLIAN seems to have held such a theory. More palpable is the spiritual traducianism of the Apollinarists, which postulates the origin of the human soul from the souls of the parents.

In Oriental Christianity the orthodox tradition has consistently taught creation of the human soul. The Western tradition was similar, except for Tertullian, up until the Pelagian heresy. The motivation for some to hold spiritual traducianism at that time was an attempt to explain the transmission of original sin in the human race. St. AUGUSTINE seems to have remained doubtful on the point, along with Fulgentius, ISIDORE OF SEVILLE, and others. Martin LUTHER and a scattering of both Catholic and Protestant theologians over the past four centuries have favored spiritual traducianism.

Catholic Teaching. Contemporary Catholics appeal both to philosophical reasoning and to the pronouncements of the Church (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [Freiburg 1963] 190, 360, 455–456, 685, 1007, 1440, 3024, 3896) to support the doctrine that the soul is created immediately by God. Scriptural proofs are difficult and only suasive, because of contextual problems. The Biblical words for soul usually mean total person. [See SOUL (IN THE BIBLE).] Scriptural texts favor placing more stress on the flesh-spirit composite, both in activity and origin, than appears in many post-Cartesian formulations.

The substantial forms (or “souls”) of other animals below man, having no existence apart from that of the composite, have no cause other than the causes of the animal itself; but the human soul cannot arise wholly by generation, since it is spiritual and not within the potentialities of matter. The Apollinarists argued that there is no need to postulate the origin of the human spiritual soul by a material process, as the parents’ souls could act as a spiritual cause producing a spiritual effect. However, serious difficulties arise in the attempt to explain precisely how this would happen. The soul is simple and could not be compounded from something received from each parent. There is no evidence that it arises simply from one parent, to say nothing of the problems arising if one attempted to designate which one. The parent’s soul is simple and spiritual; so there is no possibility of dividing off a piece of it for the child’s soul. The new soul could not be educed from the potency of spiritual substance, for spirit does not contain a principle of SUBSTANTIAL change analogous to primary matter in material being. The parents’ souls would have nothing to work on, nothing out of which to make the soul.

One might consider whether it is necessary to talk of the parents’ souls making the new soul “out of” any pre-existing subject, i.e., whether they could simply produce it by their sheer reproductive activity. Aside from the fact that the parental reproductive activity is entirely biological, this solution is rejected because no created cause makes something simply to be rather than not be. Since only the First Cause has being of Itself and hence dominion over existence, only God can give being absolutely, rather than cause what already exists to be in another way. The human soul can originate only through creation by God (St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 1a, 90.2–3; C. gent. 2.87). The human soul is intrinsically independent of matter in its becoming; i.e., the generative act of the parents is only the extrinsic cause setting the time and place for the origin of the soul. Since an efficient cause is always distinct from its effect, the soul cannot be God, or a part of God. Creation is the antithesis of PANTHEISM.

One might object that the body is in potency to the soul, and therefore the soul must be educed from the potency of matter. This does not follow, for to be in potency to a form is not necessarily to have that form in potency. Matter is in potency to any form that can actuate it, and the human soul does this. But only material forms can be educed from the potency of matter. (See MATTER AND FORM.)

God’s Activity. This doctrine of creation might seem to detract from the fullness of parenthood, since the parents do not generate the soul, but their offspring are truly theirs nonetheless, for it is not necessary that one produce all the component parts in order to be the true cause of a thing. Relations such as father and son are said of the PERSON, not of the part.

However, the precise nature of the cooperation between God and the human parents is more complex and intimate than suggested by the older formula “God creates the soul, the parents make the body.” Man is one being, not two. Both God and parents contribute to this unique act of existence. Moreover, acceptance of evolution among theologians has turned attention to the notion that all creatural causality is an instrument of God (St. Thomas, De pot. 3.7), a doctrine neglected in the centuries of vigorous opposition to OCCASIONALISM. TEILHARD DE CHARDIN and Karl RAHNER applied this thinking to the origin of the first man. The same reasoning can be used regarding the origin of all other human souls; but in both cases it seems more logical to posit union with the human zygote at the moment of conception, rather than holding mediate animation or that the first man was originally subhuman.

The degree of immediacy of God's action in creating the human soul, whether the first or subsequent ones, is hence controversial. One can detract neither from the unique role of God nor from the vital, if secondary and instrumental, role of the parents. God's causality is not one link in a long chain of causality, but basic to, and cooperating with, all others. Similarly, one can avoid neither the unique nature of the human soul as the terminus of the divine action nor the existential unity of man as a composite produced by the complex cooperation of many causes.

Time of Soul's Origin

ORIGEN, PRISCILLIAN, and other Neoplatonists taught that human souls existed separately before being united with matter. This opinion is considered heretical (Enchiridion symbolorum, 403, 456).

Arguments Against Preexistence. Unlike an angel whose nature it is to exist by itself as a complete substance, the human soul has as its proper role union with matter to form this man and no other. Hence any existence previous to the man is contrary to the very meaning of soul as substantial form (Summa theologiae 1a, 90.4). The separate existence of the soul after death does not contradict this, since the soul retains previously acquired knowledge, a transcendental relation to matter, and even a certain exigency to be united with matter; but before actual union with matter to form a body it has no such relation. The notion that God has a supply of souls that are not anybody's in particular until He infuses them into human embryos is entirely unwarranted by any evidence. Such souls would have no individuality, no personal human identity, and would be in an unnatural state because of their inability to acquire any knowledge in the way proper to man. The theory that man is born with ideas carried over from a previous life has little to support it, and much evidence against it (see METEMPSYCHOSIS). The soul is created by God at the time it is infused into matter, i.e., when it is substantially united with an embryo appropriately disposed to receive it and form a man.

Time of Infusion. Exactly when this happens is more controversial, and still an open question with scholastic philosophers of high standing on both sides. All agree that since the soul is the principle of vital operations, the human soul is present when there is specifically human operation. Because there is evidence of specifically human operations from the first moment of conception, a majority assert that the human soul is present then.

Aristotle thought that he was unjustified in asserting true human life in the male before the embryo was 40 days old and in the female, before 80 to 90 days. St. Thomas followed him in teaching a succession of forms, the embryo having first a vegetative soul and later a sensitive one, before the human soul finally arrives. Modern studies in embryology reveal that at the moment sperm and ovum unite and the two pronuclei fuse, an orderly process of development begins with a definiteness governed by the pattern of the DNA molecule. The new individual is characterized by the resulting unique constellation of genes and chromosomes before the zygote divides for the first time. This organization is not only intricate and vital; it is specifically human. The chromosomes contain determiners for specifically human eyes and ears, not just animal eyes and ears in general. The offspring of all vertebrates may go through the same stages of embryological development, and in similar ways, but each goes through those stages in ways that are characteristic and peculiar to its own species. Embryology considers the living body from the one-cell stage onward to be a human individual, not some general plant or animal that will become human in 40 or 80 days.

If one were to wait for clear evidence of rational activity before concluding belief in the existence of a human soul, it would not be a matter of days, but of years. As long as the embryo is clearly the product of human generation, it has a human nature even if severe organic defect prevents it from ever exercising any rational activities, as in the case of some developmentally disabled individuals. Examination of the fetus through its early stages gives no clue as to when one can draw the line. The available evidence seems to force one back to the very moment of conception.

A minority view points to the problems of fragmentary life, transplants, divisibility of lower animals such as worms, and human identical twins as arguments in favor of the mediate animation held by St. Thomas Aquinas, which seems to handle these difficulties more neatly.

The problem of when the human soul is created received renewed attention in the latter half of the twentieth century with the rise of modern reproductive technologies and the growing possibility that human embryos might be made the object of scientific experimentation. In vitro fertility laboratories, in an effort to increase the efficiency of their procedures, began producing many more human embryos than they actually needed for implantation, leading to the frozen storage of tens of thousands of human embryos in laboratories throughout the developed world. The emergence of this problem convinced the Vatican that new statements of concern over this practice were necessary and these included renewed calls for the world community to respect the dignity of the human being from the moment of conception.

The debate over whether the soul is immediately infused or arrives at some later point in embryological development was not the most pressing moral problem faced by the Church during the rise of legalized abortion. Nonetheless, the much referenced footnote 19 of the Declaration on Procured Abortion (1974) took note of the debate between proponents of immediate and delayed hominization and stated that:

It is not within the competence of science to decide between these two views, because the existence of an immortal soul is not a question in its field. It is a philosophical problem from which our moral affirmation remains independent . . . supposing a later animation, there is still nothing less than a human life, preparing for and calling for a soul in which the nature received from parents is completed.

One finds here two important points: the question of when the soul is infused is not one that can be decided by any empirical means, and even if the soul were to be infused at some later point in embryological development, the zygote that is present at fertilization is surely a human life. As such it deserves the same respect as is due to any other human being.

With the discovery of human genome, and the recognition that it contains the entire code for the epigenetic unfolding of the human being, there was a growing conviction among many Catholic theologians that personhood must begin at conception. Others, in spite of this new evidence, insisted that the lack of individuality in the early embryo, which is capable of twinning in its earliest stages, or the supposed absence of a proper material foundation to support the human soul, such as the “primitive streak” (primitive spinal cord and brain), which appears at approximately 14 days, left the question at best undecided or perhaps even settled in favor of delayed hominization on scientific grounds.

In 1987 the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith entered this debate with Donum vitae: Instruction on Respect for Human Life in its Origin and on the Dignity of Procreation. The document addressed a panoply of moral issues related to modern reproductive technologies, but it took special note of the question of the origin of the human soul. The Congregation stated that it was “aware of the current debates concerning the beginning of human life, concerning the individuality of the human being and concerning the identity of the human person” and then, calling attention to recent findings of science that indicated that a “new human individual” is constituted at the moment of conception, remarked:

Certainly no experimental datum can be in itself sufficient to bring us to the recognition of a spiritual soul; nevertheless, the conclusions of science regarding the human embryo provide a valuable indication for discerning by the use of reason a personal presence from this first appearance of a human life: how could a living human creature not be a human person? The Magisterium has not expressly committed its authority to an affirmation of a philosophical nature, but it constantly reaffirms the moral condemnation of any kind of procured abortion. [I.1]

Thus, while leaving the door open for the possibility of later animation, Donum vitae placed the weight of the Vatican on the side of those who view a personal presence in the human zygote; however, because this document did not make its judgment definitive, the debate on this important topic continues. What is clear beyond any doubt is that, in the view of the Church, “the fruit of human generation, from the first moment of its existence, that is to say from the moment the zygote is constituted, demands the unconditional respect that is morally due to the human being in his bodily and spiritual totality.”

The prospect of so-called therapeutic human cloning, in which human clones are made and destroyed for research purposes, and the desire among certain members within the scientific community to exploit the unfortunate plight of frozen human embryos, has greatly heightened the stakes in this debate and promises to keep the question at the forefront of philosophical and theological discussion well into the twenty-first century.

See Also: SOUL, HUMAN; IMMORTALITY.

Bibliography: P. OVERHAGE and K. RAHNER, Das Problem der Hominisation (Freiburg 1961). R. LACROIX, L'Origine de l'âme humaine (Quebec 1945). R. NORTH, “Teilhard and the Problem of Creation,” Theological Studies 24 (1963) 577–601. M. FLICK, “Problemi teologici sull’ ‘ominazione’,” Gregorianum, 44 (1963) 62–70. M. HUDECZEK, “De tempore animationis foetus humani secundum embryologiam hodiernam,” Angelicum 29 (1952) 162–181. A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 15.1:1350–65.

[J. E. ROYCE/E. J. FURTON]

SOUL-BODY RELATIONSHIP

In the context of scholastic teaching that man is composed of body and soul, the question arises how the relationship between these two elements is to be conceived. (Although modern nonscholastic authors rarely use the term soul, they do speak of the mind-body problem, and in so doing ask essentially the same question in a less philosophical way.) The answer can be investigated generally, as applied to all species of living organisms, or it can be investigated only in relation to humanity, where it raises particularly difficult problems. Man’s soul being spiritual in nature, how can such a spiritual principle be related to the matter of the human body? The disproportion between matter and spirit seems so great that it is difficult to conceive how both can be joined in man to form an essential unity.

Greek Thought. As long as GREEK PHILOSOPHY considered only the material cause, as Aristotle noted, no major difficulty of this type arose. With the discovery of a spiritual dimension to reality, as in Plato's world of ideas, however, the problem immediately came into focus: how can something spiritual, characterized as it is by its independence from matter, be essentially bound to something material? Such a union seems contrary to the very nature of spirit. Influenced by this line of thought, PLATO considered the union to be a punishment for some sin committed by the soul in a former life. The relation of the soul to the body, in his view, was that of a prisoner to his prison (Phaedrus 250; Phaedo 80–83). In other texts, Plato compared the relation to that between a ship and the pilot, insofar as the soul moves and directs the body as a pilot does a ship—a relationship that remained somewhat extrinsic and accidental.

ARISTOTLE criticized this teaching of his master as inconsistent with the facts. Man is one substantial reality, not an accidental union of two different substances. Yet how can he be one substance, if two such different elements as a material body and a spiritual soul are found in him? Aristotle saw the solution in his doctrine of HYLOMORPHISM. He defined the soul as the first act of a physical organic body (Anim. 412a 20–28). Unfortunately, this cryptic definition seemed to imply a contradiction, because a physical organic body, as something determined, was already conceived as in act, and thus it was hard to see how the soul could be its "first" act. The difficulty, it turns out, is largely terminological; an adequate explanation of the Aristotelian formula can be given, although it is not easy to comprehend (see SOUL; ENTELECHY). Possibly because of its concise and somewhat elliptic formulation, it has been regarded by many as not giving a satisfactory and adequate solution to the problem.

Thomistic Explanation. St. THOMAS AQUINAS, and most scholastic philosophers, took over the Aristotelian formula and used it to derive a more accurate conception. (1) The basic reality to account for, as Aquinas saw it, is the essential unity of man. This unity is clearly demonstrated by the fact that the same concrete man who is given to one's phenomenological experience in his bodily presence is also a person who thinks. The spiritual activity of thinking and the material givenness of the body are both manifestations of one and the same human reality. (2) Again, the transcendence of the spirit over material reality is manifested by the immateriality of thinking; this means that the soul, having an activity that is intrinsically independent of material conditions, cannot have a mode of being inferior to its mode of acting. In other words, it must be essentially independent of matter. (3) On the other hand, man is really material, and this not only accidentally: the body belongs essentially to his nature. How can one reconcile all three seemingly contradictory, but equally certain, data?

Soul-Body Union. Taking into account all three aspects, St. Thomas proposed a precise and ingenious solution. He refused to admit a contradiction between the spirituality of the soul and its union with a material body. This union, he argued, need not be understood as implying an essential dependence on matter. The soul, as spiritual, really exists on its own account and in its own right. In other words, it is not dependent on matter in the very fact of existing. This, in turn, does not entail that the body belongs to man only accidentally. The body is a real and essential part of man's nature, but not in such a way that the soul is essentially subjected to it or ontologically dependent upon it. On the contrary, the body is dependent upon the soul and exists in virtue of the soul's existence. As Thomas puts it: "Human existence pertains to corporeal matter as receptive and as subjected to something above it; it pertains to intellectual substance as to a principle, and according to the demands of its proper nature" (C. gent. 2.68). This describes an intimate, ontological relationship between body and soul, destroying neither man's substantial unity, nor the spiritual character of his soul, nor the body as an essential part of his nature.

Solution of Difficulties. Is this, however, only a clever theoretical construction, or is it an interpretation of man that conforms to genuine human experiences? Does the human soul really enjoy the type of superiority over the body that this ontological interpretation implies? Does experience not show, on the contrary, that man's spiritual soul is dependent upon his body in many ways? Man comes into being through biological conception and birth; the very existence of his soul seems thus to be conditioned by his body. And what about fatigue, illness, and death? In all these cases is not the soul subject to the law of the body? How can one bring such arguments in harmony with the Thomistic conception of a soul that exists in its own right, in ontological independence of the body?

It may be noted that, apart from these instances of negative interplay between body and soul, innumerable instances of a positive relation between the two are equally evident in authentic human experience. The body appears as an instrument of the soul, for example, in acquiring knowledge or in executing decisions of the will; or it simply appears as an expression of the soul, e.g., in language, in gestures, in a smile or in a tear. The main thing to be noted about these experiences, however, whether they be positive or negative, is that the Thomistic explanation does not conceive these as an interplay between two realities, but rather a mutual conditioning of two constitutive principles in one reality. Thus the soul is conditioned by the body, just as the body is conditioned by the soul. Yet the fact that the body is dependent upon the soul need not entail that the soul is also dependent upon the body. If the soul really assumes the body into its own existence, as Thomists maintain, the body cannot be considered as alien to the soul. It is the soul's body, and nothing else. The whole bodily condition, with all its implications, positive and negative, is assumed by the soul as its own. The soul cannot be said to depend upon the body, but it can be said to have assumed as its own a bodily condition. The soul does not participate in the existence of the body, but the body is assumed in the existence of the soul. Thus, although body and soul really coincide in man's substantial unity, and in a total mutual conditioning, there is a one-way dependence in the strict sense of the word, namely, that of the body upon the soul.

This delicate, subtle, and finely balanced conception of the soul-body structure gives due account of the concrete human situation, which, however materially conditioned, is marked by the absolute primacy of the spirit and of spiritual values. It is also in accord with the image of man that is presented in divine revelation.

Other Explanations. The value of this particular interpretation of the soul-body relationship may be confirmed by a brief comparison with alternative solutions.

Extreme monistic solutions, such as those reducing man to mere spirit or not taking the reality of the body seriously (e.g., PLATONISM), or those reducing man to matter alone, considering the soul to be a manifestation of matter (e.g., MATERIALISM), do not explain the real man as given in experience. Nor does an exaggerated DUALISM, such as that of DESCARTES, account for the subtle complexity and unity of man as manifested in personal and intersubjective experiences.

Again, man cut as it were in two parts—the phenomenal and the noumenal, as KANT presents him—does not furnish an adequate explanation. Similarly, the positivist approach to the question reduces the delicate and complex ontological problem to a psychophysical parallelism in which the spiritual dimension of man disappears, to be replaced by a superfluous and meaningless epiphenomenon of physiological processes.

A newer and sounder conception of man's duality has been proposed in PHENOMENOLOGY, particularly by M. MERLEAU-PONTY and by Gabriel Marcel (see EXISTENTIALISM, 4). Though thinking in very different categories, confining themselves more to phenomenological description than to ontological analysis, these thinkers have rediscovered the intimate, indissoluble union of body and mind in their conception of man as esprit incarné. Marcel concentrates on the question, "Am I body or do I have a body?" and, distinguishing between the corps objet and the corps sujet, affords new evidence for a conception of man akin to that of traditional scholasticism. Though the deeper ontological view is lacking in such phenomenological approaches, they represent a great progress over positivist conceptions and can lead to a fuller understanding of man in terms of the soul-body relationship.

See Also: SOUL, HUMAN; IMMORTALITY; MAN, 3, 4.

Bibliography: N. A. LUYTEN, "The Significance of the Body in a Thomistic Anthropology," Philosophy Today 7 (1963) 175–193; "Das Leib-Seele Problem in philosophischer Sicht," Geist und Leib in der menschlichen Existenz (Naturwissenschaft und Theologie 4; Munich 1961) 150–214. G. SIEWERTH, Der Mensch und sein Leib (Einsiedeln 1953).

[N. A. LUYTEN]

SOUL OF THE CHURCH

The early Christian creeds point to a faith in the life-giving Spirit (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer 42, 150) present in the Church and in the saints, quickening and sanctifying them (ibid. 44, 46, 48, 60, 62, 63). The historical reasons why the Church was originally inserted among the items appended to the third member of the Trinitarian-structured creeds have not been clarified. However, the logic of Christian life soon associated the mention of the Church with the mission of the Spirit, precisely because the Church was paramount among "the realities that could be, and were, regarded as the fruits of the Spirit in action" [J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds (2d ed. London 1960) 155]. The Fathers, with a copious range of imagery, present the Spirit as the prime inward principle of all life and unity in Christ's Body, the Church [see S. Tromp's florilegia: De Spiritu Sancto anima: I. Testimonia e PP. graecis (2d ed. Rome 1948); II. Testimonia e PP. latinis (Rome 1932)]. St. Augustine, in particular, compared the Spirit's role in the Church with that of the soul in the human body, thus striking off a fresh analogy destined to influence the whole Western Church; see especially two sermons on the mystery of Pentecost (267.4, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne 38:1231; 268.2, ibid. 1232). As for the Eastern Church, see Chrysostom's commentary on Eph 4.3 (Hom. 9.3; Patrologia Graeca 62:72).

The Augustinian theme became a commonplace of medieval and later Western theology. However, speculation concerning the headship of Christ interested scholastic theologians much more than the question of the Spirit's role as the soul of the Body.

In recent times this traditional analogy of metaphor has been taken into the Church's documents. [See Leo XIII's DIVINUM ILLUD MUNUS (May 9, 1897: Enchiridion symbolorum 3328).] Pius XII (MYSTICI CORPORIS, June 29, 1943: ibid. 3807–08) presents Christ's Spirit as the prime inward principle, one and indivisible, of all SUPERNATURAL life and growth, energies and powers, of Christ's Body (Pius XII Mystici Corporis, pars. 54, 68); a transcendent principle, "infinite and uncreated" (60), which, without prejudice to its transcendence, is an immanent principle, abidingly present and active in the whole Body (55, 60), thus forming the one, holy and living Body of Christ (55). Christ the Head, by communicating His Spirit to the Body, joins and assimilates the Body to Himself (51, 54, 78) with an immediacy of union that establishes His Body, analogically, in a theandric order. Christ is in His members, and they in Him, through His Spirit (77), with a measure of unity such that He is become the bearer, the "sustainer" (52) of His Body; and thus "the whole Christ" (78), Head and Body together, comes into being to serve Christ's work in the world of men.

Bellarmino, although continuing the traditional doctrine, inaugurated another way of employing the body-soul metaphor that found widespread favor in apologetic writing. He compared the soul of the Church to "the interior gifts of the Holy Spirit," while the body became "the exterior profession of faith and the sharing in the Sacraments" (De ecclesia militante ch. 2). However, any maladroit use of this theological construct creates the impression that there is a dissociation between body and soul in the Church. The lasting dissatisfaction with this usage, especially since Mystici corporis, has ensured its obsolescence.

As for its basis in Scripture, it may be said that the metaphor of the Spirit as soul is not biblical, the nearest approach being Eph 4.4 and 1 Cor 12.13. St. Paul used the "Body" theme in a Semitic sense, with Body signifying the whole concrete Person. Hence, only after the Fathers had taken over the Greek dualism of body and soul did it become feasible to elaborate a body-soul development in ecclesiology.

See Also: MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST; HOLY SPIRIT; CHURCH, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: P. DE LETTER, "The Soul of the Mystical Body," Sciences Ecclésiastiques 14 (1962) 213–234. C. LIALINE, "The Holy Spirit and the Mystical Body of Christ," The Eastern Churches Quarterly 7 (1947–48) 69–94. F. MALMBERG, Ein Leib-ein Geist (Freiburg 1960). S. TROMP, De Spiritu Christi anima

(1960), v. 3 of Corpus Christi quod est ecclesia, 3 v. (Rome 1937–60).

[F. X. LAWLOR]

SOULERIN, JEAN MATHIEU

Founder of the University of St. Michael's College, Toronto, Canada; b. Ailhon, Ardèche, France, June 6, 1807; d. Annonay, Ardèche, Oct. 17, 1879. Educated at the Basilian College in Annonay, he joined the Congregation of Priests of St. Basil in the first decade of its history and was ordained Dec. 20, 1834. While serving as director of the College at Annonay, he was chosen in 1852 to head a mission band of five sent to Canada to found a school at Toronto that has since grown into the University of St. Michael's College. He also established St. Basil's parish and a novitiate in Toronto. Elected superior general of the Basilian Fathers in 1865, he returned to France and in 1878 published the French text of the constitutions of his congregation. During his years as superior general the Congregation of St. Basil reached its peak in France, and developed rapidly in America.

Bibliography: L. K. SHOOK, "St. Michael's College: The Formative Years, 1850–1853," Canadian Catholic Historical Association, Report 1950 (Ottawa 1950) 37–52.

[R. J. SCOLLARD]

SOUTH AFRICA, THE CHURCH IN

The Republic of South Africa, located at the southern tip of Africa, is bordered on the north by Botswana and Zimbabwe, on the northeast by Namibia, on the east by Mozambique and Swaziland, on the southeast and south by the Indian Ocean and on the southwest by the South Atlantic Ocean. The region also includes the Prince Edward Islands, located southwest of the mainland in the Atlantic. The region is semiarid except for a subtropical region along the eastern coast. A narrow plain along the southern coast rises to a large plateau region, rising to hills to the north. The wealth of South Africa is in its natural resources, which include diamonds, gold, platinum, chromium, coal, iron ore, manganese, nickel, uranium and copper. Despite the long periods of drought experienced in much of the country, agricultural products include corn, sugar cane, wheat, fruits and vegetables and wool.

From 1910 until 1961 the region was a self-governing colony of the United Kingdom, formed by uniting the Cape, Natal, Free State and Transvaal provinces. Most Europeans are Afrikaners, descendants from Dutch, Huguenot and German settlers who arrived during Capital: Pretoria (administrative), Bloemfontein (judicial), Cape Town (legislative).

Size: 472,494 sq. miles.
Population: 43,421,010 in 2000.
Languages: Afrikaans, English; native languages are spoken in various regions.
Religions: 3,830,150 Catholics (8.8%), 5,000,000 Dutch Reformed (11.5%), 868,420 Muslims (2%), 654,980 Hindus (1.5%), 8,439,200 Protestants (20%), 24,628,260 followed indigenous or Zionist faiths or were without religious affiliation.

the early 18th century. The discovery of diamonds and gold between 1867 and 1886 resulted in the subjugation of the native population by a white minority elite which maintained its social and economic dominance by the rigid policy of racial segregation called apartheid. Due to increasing international condemnation of South Africa's racist policies and the work of nationalists, black rule returned to South Africa in the 1990s.

Catholic Origins and Development. The Catholic Church first came to South Africa when Portuguese explorers arrived late in the 15th century seeking a shorter route to the Orient. In 1488 Bartholemew Dias rounded the Cape of Good Hope. The Portuguese planted stone crosses (padroes) in several locations along the coast. Cape Cross, St. Blaise Bay, Conception Bay, St. Lucia Bay, Port Natal and other places still bear Catholic names bestowed on them by the Portuguese. Joan de Nova built a small hermitage near St. Blaise Bay in 1501, and in 1635 a Catholic church was built at the mouth of the Umzimkulu River on the Natal coast. However, the Catholic presence in the region ended by the mid-17th century, after Jan van Riebeeck founded Cape Town in 1652. Dutch Calvinists (called Boers) immigrating to the region were bitterly intolerant of Catholicism and expelled all priests and missionaries, causing the disappearance of Catholic life until the 19th century.

England occupied the Cape in 1795, receiving permanent possession by the Treaty of Paris in 1814. Evicted from the region, Boers traveled north in what became known as the Great Trek, founding the republic of Transvaal and Orange Free State. In 1804 three Dutch priests arrived, and one of them, Joannes Lansink, was appointed prefect apostolic. However, the British expelled all three priests in 1805. British tolerance of the Church increased in the next decade, and in 1818 Edward Bede Slater, OSB, of Ampleforth, England, was named vicar apostolic for the Cape of Good Hope, Madagascar and neighboring islands (including Australia and New Zealand). Unable to reside at Cape colony, he was appointed the first vicar apostolic of MAURITIUS in 1819. Slater visited the Cape in 1820, and left Father Scully, an Irishman, who built the first church in 1822, in charge of the mission. In 1837 the Vicariate of the Cape of Good Hope was separated from Mauritius, and Patrick GRIFFITH, OP, became the first resident bishop.

With the bishopric established, evangelization of the native South African population began. As the congregations grew, the vicariate of the Cape was separated into eastern and western sections in 1847, and the vicariate of Natal was created in 1850 and entrusted to the OBLATES OF MARY IMMACULATE (OMI). Bishop Marie Jean Alard, OMI, Vicar Apostolic of Natal (1850–73), inaugurated missionary efforts among the Zulu and Basuto tribes. In 1879 the Jesuits assumed charge of the Zambezi mission north of the Limpopo River. With the discovery of diamond mines and gold fields, immigrants from many countries arrived in South Africa after 1867, and in 1886 the Vicariate Apostolic of the Orange Free State and the Prefecture Apostolic of Transvaal were created. In 1910, following the Boer Wars, all colonies in the region were united under British rule, and 12 years later Pius XI established an apostolic delegation for South Africa, headquartered in Pretoria. The present hierarchy was established in 1951. In 1991 a group called Afrikaans Apostolate completed a 29-year undertaking by publishing the first Afrikaans Sacramentary and Lectionary.

Church Confronts Apartheid. In the 1947 elections, a right-wing party took power in South Africa. The policy of apartheid (officially known as “plural democracies”) was introduced in 1952 by Prime Minister D. F. Malan, and touted as a means of preserving the cultural identity of each of the many “nations” that constituted the region by keeping the races separate. The brutal shooting of blacks during the Sharpsville Massacre, which occurred in 1960, concurrently with South Africa's struggle for independence, served as a symbol to the world of the severe repression under this system. In 1977 the government proposed a plan whereby the black majority was to be distributed among nine “homelands” which the government claimed would become independent nations. This scheme failed to receive international recognition, being regarded as unjust, a denial of human rights, and a ruse to perpetuate white domination in South Africa. Apartheid was confronted by such moderate groups as the Christian Institute and Black Consciousness, as well as the African National Congress (ANC), which began campaigns of civil disobedience that would extend for over four decades as it gained in power.

In September of 1977 Black Consciousness leader Stephen Biko died of wounds received while in police custody. The government moved to suppress the rioting and criticism of Biko's death by jailing almost all black leaders except those appointed by the government itself, and by banning several influential white critics. (Banning orders forbade, among other activities, speaking in public or writing for publication.) Among the imprisoned black leaders was Father Smangaliso Mkhathshwa, acting secretary-general of the South African Catholic Bishops' Conference (SACBC). After four months of imprisonment, Mkhathshwa and several others were released, but severe restrictions were placed regarding his movements and activities. In February of 1977 the SACBC called for drastic changes in the organization of South African society, as well as advocating reforms within the Church itself. On racism they declared that "the only solution . . . consists in conceding full citizen and human rights to all persons in the Republic, not by choice on the false grounds of color, but on the grounds of the common humanity of all men, taught by our Lord Jesus Christ."

The announced policy of Church leaders was contrary to government policy and even illegal in several significant ways. In addition, conflict existed within the Church itself between adherents of the Black Consciousness Movement (including many black priests) and white Church authorities that centered around questions of the extent to which the Church should take a political stance against the government. The South African Catholic Defense League presented an organized objection to the Church's position in support of school integration. Meanwhile, other religious communities also struggled with such conflicts. In April of 1978, the Dutch Reformed Church of South Africa cut its ties with its "Mother Church," the Dutch Reformed Church of the Netherlands, which had been critical of South Africa's racial policies despite its South African congregations's support of the government. Because of these conflicts, during the 1970s and 1980s Church leaders were expelled from the country, sometimes even arrested and tortured for their views.

International public opinion combined with a more moderate white government succeeded in bringing an end to apartheid before the end of the century. In the early 1990s came the work of dismantling the apartheid apparatus, and in April of 1994 the White congress voted itself into history. A new constitution went into effect and on May 10, ANC leader Nelson Mandela was sworn in as the first black president of South Africa at the head of a coalition government. In 1996 the country produced a new constitution, which, like the one it replaced, guaranteed religious freedom. In 1997 the Church admitted that, although not active in supporting apartheid policies, it could have done more to prevent them.

Into the 21st Century. By 2000 there were 746 parishes in South Africa tended by 398 diocesan and 749 re-

Archdioceses	Suffragans
Bloemfontein	Bethlehem, Keimoes-Upington, Kimberley, Kroonstad
Cape Town	Aliwal, De Aar, Oudtshoorn, Port Elizabeth, Queenstown
Durban	Dundee, Eshowe, Kokstad, Mariannhill, Umtata, Umzimkulu
Pretoria	Johannesburg, Klerksdorp, Lydenburg, Pietersburg, Rustenburg, Tzaneen, Witbank

There is an apostolic vicariate at Ingwavuma and a military ordinariate in South Africa.

ligious priests. Other religious included 215 brothers and approximately 2,940 sisters, each of whom served the region's growing Catholic population and some of whom ran the Church's 249 primary and 115 secondary schools throughout the country. Despite the end of apartheid, Church leaders now found themselves forced to publicly confront racism against South Africa's growing Muslim population, which had become the focus of scattered violence by 2000. The midlands area also continued to be visited by violence as Zulu extremists rebelled against the current political system. Ironically, the Church also began to break with the new mixed race government. The government's liberal views involved legalizing abortion in 1996 and the Church responded with a "right to life" campaign. However, despite such conflicts, relations between Church and state remained amicable. During a 1998 meeting between President Mandela and Pope John Paul II, Mandela commented that "No one among us can forget what the Church has done in teaching and health care for our children, when no one else was doing the same thing."

Bibliography: J. E. BRADY, Trekking for Souls (Cedara, Natal 1952). W. E. BROWN, The Catholic Church in South Africa from Its Origins to the Present Day (New York 1960). K. S. LATOURETTE, A History of the Expansion of Christianity, 7 v. (New York 1937-45) v.5. K. S. LATOURETTE, Christianity in a Revolutionary Age: A History of Christianity in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries, 5 v. (New York 1958-62) v.3, 5. Bilan du Monde 2:25-36. The Catholic Directory of South Africa (Capetown 1917-). Annuario Pontificio has annual data on all dioceses.

[J. E. BRADY/EDS.]

SOUTH CAROLINA, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Diocese of Charleston began the 21st century under the leadership of Robert J. Baker, who was appointed as the 12th bishop of the diocese on July 13, 1999 by Pope John Paul II. Baker was consecrated in Charleston on September 29, 1999 and installed in the Cathedral of Saint John the Baptist. The diocese, established by Pope Pius VII on July 11, 1820, comprises the land area of the entire state, and with Richmond, Virginia, was the first diocese created in the South.

At the beginning of the new millennium the diocese included about 122,000 Catholics, representing 3.25 percent of the state’s population. The diocese is served by 94 active priests (of whom 34 are members of religious orders), 69 permanent deacons, and 184 religious brothers and sisters serving in 85 parishes, 30 missions, and 10 pastoral centers. The diocese sponsors two hospitals, seven social service centers, a retirement center, 25 parochial schools, and two high schools.

The first act of Christian worship in what is now South Carolina was probably a Mass celebrated by Catholic priests accompanying the explorations of Lucas de Ayllon and Hernando de Soto through the area in the first half of the 16th century; but it was not until more than 250 years later that the Church began to develop in the region. The English Crown gave eight lords proprietors a charter in the 17th century to develop the colony of Carolina. Charleston, the see city of the diocese, was settled in 1670 when the first English colonists arrived with their slaves from Barbados. The English, reflecting European political divisions, adopted a policy prohibiting the immigration of Catholics and all manifestations of their religion. Carolina's royal governor observed in 1770 that there was religious freedom for everyone in the colony "except Papists." The Church took root in the state only after the success of the American Revolution during which the Church of England was disestablished. An Italian priest celebrated the first Mass in Charleston in 1788 as he was passing through the city on a ship bound for South America.

Decorative mouldings embellish the facade of a South African church. (©Hans Georg Roth/CORBIS)

Matthew Ryan was the first priest assigned to minister to the small Catholic population in Charleston. Father John Carroll of Baltimore, the first ecclesiastical superior in the emerging nation, sent the Irish priest to Charleston in 1788. The fledgling congregation acquired a building on Hasell Street in 1789 and established Saint Mary's Church. Charleston was an important seaport on the southern Atlantic coast, and the number of Catholics increased as the city grew with immigration from Ireland and other European nations.

French Catholics arrived in Charleston from the Caribbean after a slave revolution in Haiti led to the flight of many residents from Haiti and Santo Domingo. Among them were two daughters of Admiral le comte de Grasse, a French naval hero of the American Revolution. Both girls died in Charleston in 1799 and their bodies were laid to rest in Saint Mary's churchyard.

Simon Felix Gallagher, an Irish priest with a degree from the University of Paris, came to Saint Mary's in 1793. Gallagher was an important figure in the Charleston community as well as at Saint Mary's during the 30 years he lived in the city. He was a member of the faculty of the College of Charleston, and served as its president on two occasions. He founded a school called the Athenian Academy, and was a founder of an association of Irishmen called the Hibernian Society that is still in existence.

Exterior of Llandaff Oratory, the world's smallest Catholic Church, Van Reenen, Transvaal, South Africa. (©Nik Wheeler/CORBIS)

Both Gallagher and the congregation at Saint Mary's were often embroiled in conflicts with the ecclesiastical authority. The congregational disputes reflected the republican disposition of the young nation and a desire for independence from outside control from afar. The bishop received frequent complaints from Charleston Catholics about Gallagher's personal behavior. Carroll warned Gallagher on more than one occasion about using inappropriate language during services, and for celebrating Mass in an inebriated condition.

The congregation at Saint Mary's decided that it wished to have a voice in the selection of bishops chosen to serve in Charleston as well as elsewhere in America. When its proposals to have a veto power over the selection of bishops were thwarted, the congregation made attempts to recruit a bishop of its own liking from among Old Catholic separatists or from one of the Eastern Orthodox Churches in an effort to establish an "Independent Catholic Church" in America. The mission was unsuccessful, but problems continued until closer ecclesiastical supervision could be established.

Many priests came to America from France to escape the dangerous effects of the French Revolution. Their immigration resulted in a disproportionately large number of French clergy in the American church. Disputes arose within the Church as many Catholics of Irish origin thought that too many French clerics were appointed to positions of authority. The tension was heightened in South Carolina where the Church was predominately Irish from the earliest days, but where there was also a significant French Catholic population.

Carroll, now Archbishop of Baltimore, sent a French priest to Charleston in about 1810 to assist Gallagher. Joseph Picot Limoelan de la Clorivière had been a royalist officer at the beginning of the French Revolution and was forced to leave France. When he returned to France after the Revolution, Clorivière was implicated in a plot to assassinate Napoleon Bonaparte. He escaped execution for his involvement in the affair only because his uncle, the head of the Society of Jesus in France, was able to arrange his secret emigration to America. Clorivière arrived in Baltimore, attended Saint Mary's Seminary, was ordained to the priesthood, and assigned to Saint Mary's in Charleston. He was not acceptable to Gallagher or to many in the congregation, which led to further fragmentation of the parish, and Saint Mary's was placed under an interdict by Carroll's successor, Archbishop Leonard Neale of Baltimore, in 1817.

The Diocese of Charleston was created on June 20, 1820, and John England, a native of Cork, Ireland, was nominated its first bishop. England was consecrated in Ireland on September 1, and arrived in Charleston on December 30 with his sister, Joanna Monica England, and a priest, Denis Corkery. The first Mass celebrated by a bishop of Charleston occurred at Saint Mary's Church on Dec. 31, 1820.

The newly erected Diocese of Charleston comprised three states, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, and covered 142,000 square miles which contained no more than five churches and less than 400 Catholics. Bishop England wasted no time establishing a coherent diocesan organization. He established the Cathedral of Saint Finbar on Broad Street in Charleston, giving it the same name as that of his home parish in Cork. The bishop opened a seminary, Saint John the Baptist, adjacent to the cathedral, and its first student was Andrew Byrne who later became the first bishop of Little Rock, Arkansas. England established the United States Catholic Miscellany, the first Catholic publication of general circulation in the nation. He wrote a constitution for the diocese that enabled lay people to participate in the affairs of church governance through state and diocesan conventions of elected representatives. The bishop and his sister, Joanna, were instrumental in founding a religious order for women known as the Sisters of Charity of Our Lady of Mercy, and he invited a community of Ursuline nuns to Charleston where they founded a non-sectarian school that was perhaps the first such school in the state. England founded schools in Charleston for slaves, free blacks, and mulattos to promote education among the African American population. Saint Peter's Church, established in Columbia, the state's capital city, was one of the first parishes in the midlands of the state. It was dedicated by England on Dec. 12, 1830. Churches were established wherever there were Catholics to support them as the population moved farther into other parts of the state. The Church was firmly established in South Carolina by the time Bishop England's ministry ended with his death at age 56 in 1842. From his first days in America, he preached a message of tolerance among all people, and worked to make Catholicism acceptable in the emerging nation. He appreciated American democracy and endeavored to present it as compatible with the Catholic faith. The essentially Irish character of the Church that emerged in the diocese continued until well into the 20th century.

Ignatius A. Reynolds became the second bishop of the diocese. A native of Bardstown, Kentucky, Reynolds was consecrated in Cincinnati and arrived in Charleston on April 3, 1844. Under Reynolds's leadership the diocese continued to expand beyond the city of Charleston as more Catholics settled in the region. He raised funds to pay debts incurred by Bishop England, and organized plans to build a new cathedral, which was consecrated in 1854. The Sisters of Charity of Our Lady of Mercy prospered and opened a hospital in Charleston in 1852. Schools were opened in Columbia where Saint Joseph's Church was established in 1854. The diocese was reduced in territorial size when the Diocese of Savannah, including the entire state of GEORGIA, was erected in 1850. Reynolds served until his death on March 6, 1855.

A local priest, Patrick Neison LYNCH, became the diocesan administrator upon the death of Reynolds, and was soon appointed the third bishop of the diocese. Born in Ireland, Lynch became the first bishop consecrated in the diocese. Bishop Lynch's episcopate was engulfed by the disruption and turmoil of the Civil War that began when South Carolina seceded from the Union on December 20, 1860.

A devastating fire struck the city of Charleston on December 11, 1861, that added to the wartime destruction. The Charleston fire destroyed the cathedral, the bishop's residence, the Catholic Institute Hall, the seminary library, and an orphanage near the cathedral. The state's separation from the Union brought about the change of the name of the U.S. Catholic Miscellany to the Charleston Catholic Miscellany, and its last edition was published on December 14, 1861, three days after the fire. The population of the city was endangered and church property damaged by hostile shelling during a siege by northern forces from 1863 to 1865. The Ursuline convent in Columbia was severely damaged by a fire in 1865. Several Sisters of Our Lady of Mercy joined the war effort as nurses supporting the Confederate Army. During the war, the westward expansion of the diocese continued as more Catholics settled the Carolina backcountry.

The ruins of a Catholic cathedral damaged during the Civil War in Charleston, South Carolina, 1865. (©CORBIS)

Lynch became an advocate for the Confederate cause and, like some of the other southern bishops, was a slave owner. He defended the institution of SLAVERY and justified its existence on moral grounds, and felt that the proper treatment and education of slaves by the Catholic Church was necessary to sustain it. Jefferson Davis, the president of the Confederacy, asked Lynch to represent the rebellious southern government on a diplomatic mission to the Holy See. The bishop agreed to undertake the assignment and arrived in Rome in June 1864 as a "Special Commissioner of the Confederate States of America to the States of the Church," for the purpose of seeking the diplomatic recognition of the Confederate government by Pope Pius IX. He had an audience with the Pope and presented his credentials as "Minister of the Confederate States," but his petition evidently did not proceed beyond that point. He was unable to return to the diocese because he was declared persona non grata by the United States government. Lynch was pardoned by President Andrew Johnson after taking an oath of allegiance to the United States before the ambassador in Paris on Oct. 14, 1865, thus enabling him to return to South Carolina. The bishop returned to the diocese to find much destruction and the need for substantial funds for rebuilding the fabric of the Church and the community.

A vicariate apostolic was established for North Carolina in 1868, separating it from the Diocese of Charleston and relieving Bishop Lynch of further responsibilities there. Lynch spent much of his time during Reconstruction away from the diocese raising funds in the North for rebuilding. He also developed ideas and plans for the assimilation of former slaves into the Church and society. Economic stability was not achieved in the South until many years after the Civil War, and there was much to be done to restore the spirit of the people and church property when Lynch's episcopate ended upon his death on Feb. 26, 1882.

The period between the Lynch's death and World War I was one of steady growth and progress in the diocese. Henry P. Northrop, the only native of the city of Charleston to be named bishop of the diocese, became the fourth bishop on March 11, 1883. He had been serving in North Carolina as the vicar apostolic. A time of religious and minority intolerance followed the Civil War. The Reconstruction era brought with it the establishment of such organizations as the KU KLUX KLAN and the enactment of Jim Crow laws throughout the region. The Catholic Church unfortunately became the target of more than its share of vitriolic language and behavior by many whites.

Another natural disaster visited the coastal area of the diocese when a severe earthquake hit Charleston in 1886. It caused damage to church property in the city and surrounding area requiring renewed fund-raising efforts to repair the damage.

A synod of the diocese, the first since the time of Bishop England, was called in 1887 and attended by 16 priests. A new wave of immigrants from predominantly Catholic European countries and from Lebanon led to a sharp increase in the number of communicants in the diocese around the turn of the 20th century. The Lebanese brought the Maronite Rite with them, but they were soon largely assimilated into the Latin Rite Catholic population. The demography of the diocese began to shift with the new immigration from one of traditional Irish dominance to one with broader cultural diversity. There were about 9,000 Catholics in South Carolina at the turn of the century, and many improvements were made in the fabric of the diocese as the economic hardships of the Reconstruction era began to subside. A cathedral school was opened in 1887, and new churches were established across the diocese to accommodate the increasing numbers of Catholics.

Northrop's episcopate, the longest in the history of the diocese, was marked by steady progress in the development of diocesan institutions. Saint Angela's Academy opened in Aiken in 1900, a branch of the Knights of Columbus was organized in Charleston in 1902, the Holy Name Society was established, and Bishop England High School was founded in 1915. James Cardinal Gibbons, the archbishop of Baltimore, celebrated a Mass of dedication on April 14, 1907, for the reconstructed cathedral on the 25th anniversary of Bishop Northrop's consecration. And in about 1910, a new motherhouse for the Sisters of Charity of Our Lady of Mercy began operation at Queen and Legare Streets in Charleston.

Northrop's death came on June 17, 1916. He was succeeded by William T. Russell of Washington, D.C. Installed on March 22, 1917, Russell continued the development of mission work throughout the diocese and blessed many new parishes. Saint Francis Xavier Hospital was organized in Charleston where the bishop died in 1927.

Russell's successor was Emmet Michael Walsh, a much beloved native son of the diocese who came from Atlanta and was installed as the sixth bishop of Charleston on Sept. 22, 1927. Walsh served in Charleston until his appointment as coadjutor bishop of the Diocese of Youngstown, Ohio, in 1949. Catholic hospitals were established in Charleston, Greenville, Rock Hill, York, Columbia, and Dillon. Bishop Walsh founded a Council of Catholic Women, a Council of Catholic Men, and a Catholic Youth Council. Camps for children were organized, and a parish for African Americans was begun in Columbia.

Bishop Walsh developed an innovative program for the development of new church buildings. A standard church building design was developed with the help of a priest at Belmont Abbey in North Carolina to provide the diocese with simple, dignified church buildings of wooden frames on brick pillars with cedar shingles on the outside walls. These simple buildings were designed to include all the necessary furnishings and fixtures down to the curtains for the confessionals. The standard design made it possible to construct identical buildings any place in the diocese where a church was needed at low cost in a minimal time. At least 12 of these structures were put into service, including church buildings at Myrtle Beach, Union, Dillon, Bennettsville, Bishopville, and Saint Patrick's in Columbia.

Mepkin Abbey was established in the diocese in 1949 by the Order of Cistercians of the Strict Observance (Trappist). Clare Booth Luce and her husband, Henry Luce, whose bodies lie at rest on the Abbey grounds, gave the order 3,000 acres of land for the abbey in Berkeley County, just north of Charleston. The first monks arrived at Mepkin in the fall of 1949 under the leadership of Dom Anthony Chassagne. The leadership of Abbot Francis Kline (1990–) continued the tradition of making the abbey and its monastic community an important part of the life of the local diocese.

From the departure of Bishop Walsh in 1949 to 1963 three bishops were appointed to the see of Charleston, and all were transferred elsewhere. John J. Russell was installed in 1950 and appointed bishop of Richmond, Virginia, in 1958; Paul J. Hallinan was installed in 1958 and became archbishop of the new Province of Atlanta in 1962; Francis F. Reh was installed in 1962 and became rector of the North American College in Rome in 1963.

Joseph L. Bernardin, a native of Columbia, was ordained in the Charleston cathedral in 1953 and became Bishop Russell's secretary. He served as a priest in the diocese for 14 years after his ordination until his appointment as auxiliary bishop of Atlanta. A distinguished son of the diocese, Bernardin later served as general secretary to the National Conference of Catholic Bishops and cardinal archbishop of Chicago.

A new publication, the Catholic Banner, was inaugurated in 1951 to provide a newspaper for the diocese for the first time in many years. In 1959, the motherhouse of the Sisters of Charity of Our Lady of Mercy moved to a new site on James Island, overlooking Charleston Harbor, and Cardinal Newman High School was dedicated in Columbia in 1961. Upon the departure of Bishop Reh in 1963, Joseph L. Bernardin became the diocesan administrator until the installation of Ernest L. Unterkoefler as the 10th bishop of the diocese on February 22, 1964.

The episcopate of Unterkoefler was marked by a strong voice from the Church on matters of racial justice and social concerns. Unterkoefler courageously led public civil rights marches in the diocese in the 1960s in order to demonstrate the commitment of the Church to the achievement of social justice for everyone in America. He also strongly supported ecumenical activities with other Christian bodies.

David B. Thompson became the 11th bishop of the diocese in 1990 and promptly set about the task of improving the Catholic school system, and took steps to insure a racial balance in all the educational institutions of the diocese. The name of the diocesan newspaper was changed to the New Catholic Miscellany to honor Bishop England's founding of the first general publication for Catholics in the nation.

The church in South Carolina was racially segregated until the mid-1960s. There were several parishes in the diocese, Saint Patrick's in Charleston, Saint Martin de Porres in Columbia, Saint James at Ritter, and others that specifically served the African-American Catholic population. Immaculate Conception in Charleston was a high school for African-American students. Under the leadership of Unterkoefler the parishes, schools, and other diocesan institutions were successfully desegregated.

Bishop Thompson convened a synod in 1995, called the Synod of Charleston, to plan and empower the participation of lay people in the work of the Church. The Synod, involving lay people and clergy, led to the renewal of participation by lay people in the parishes of the diocese as lectors, cantors, eucharistic ministers, and pastoral associates. It also encouraged the development of new religious education and peace and justice programs.

The cultural diversity of the Church in South Carolina continued to broaden as the American population became more mobile in the 20th century. By the end of the millennium the Irish dominance of the Church in earlier times had given way to a Catholic population reflecting the attributes of the rich cultural heritage of America. These changes along with the reforms of the Second Vatican Council have placed the Diocese of Charleston in the mainstream of American Catholicism.

Bibliography: G. ACCAME, producer, "Fire Tried Gold" (film) (Kensington, Md. 2000). THE REV. S. J.-A. BUCHANAN, "Catholicism in the Carolinas and Georgia: 1670–1820," Dissertatio ad Licentiam in Facultate Historiae Ecclesiasticae (Rome 1998). P. GUILDAY, The Life and Times of John England, First Bishop of Charleston (1786–1842), 2 v. (New York 1927). R. C. MADDEN, Catholics in South Carolina (Lanham, N.Y. 1985). J. J. O'CONNELL, Catholicity in the Carolinas and Georgia (New York 1879). T. TISDALE, A Lady of the High Hills: Natalie Delage Sumter (Columbia, S.C. 2001). Also see the web site of the Diocese of Charleston, www.catholic-doc.org.

[T. TISDALE]

SOUTH DAKOTA, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Bordered by North Dakota, Minnesota, Iowa, Montana, Wyoming, and Nebraska, South Dakota comprises over 77,047 square miles with two dioceses, that of Sioux Falls east of the Missouri River and Rapid City which includes the Black Hills and the area west of the river. Major cities are Sioux Falls, Rapid City, and Aberdeen. Pierre is the capital. Agriculture and tourism contribute most to the economy although more industrial and service enterprises are locating in the state. The poorest areas are on the reservations although the upsurge in gambling casinos on most of them has provided funds for more educational and social services. The population of this state (which derives its name from the Dakota Sioux) is over 725,000, of whom about 125,000 of these are Catholic. The two Catholic dioceses in South Dakota, RAPID CITY and SIOUX FALLS, are suffragan sees of the Archdiocese of ST. PAUL-MINNEAPOLIS.

Catholicism arrived with French-Canadian fur traders in the 18th century, but it was not until the Belgian Jesuit missionary, Pierre Jean De Smet journeyed through the area in the mid-19th century that a baptism was recorded. Although the missionary catechized and was beloved by the Native Americans who, at that time, still populated almost half of the state's area, it was not until the arrival of Martin Marty, a Swiss Benedictine abbot who came to Dakota Territory from Indiana in 1876 to minister to the Native Americans that the church was organized on and off the reservations. Small rural and town parishes had been under the jurisdiction of the bishop of Omaha, Neb. which also governed the parishes just across the Missouri from Yankton.

Within two years of his arrival, Marty was appointed Vicar Apostolic to the area which then included what is now North and South Dakota and small sections of the present Montana and Wyoming borders. Marty came to Yankton and the Standing Rock Reservation shortly after Custer's defeat by the Sioux at Little Big Horn on the Wyoming-Territory border. Prominent in that battle were two Native American leaders from the Dakota Territory: Crazy Horse and Sitting Bull. Marty eventually journeyed to Canada to encourage the refugees, Sitting Bull, a Hunkpapa Teton Sioux, and his followers, to return to the territory's reservations in order to avoid starvation. Although they refused at the time, the crops were still good and buffalo and deer plentiful, ultimately drought, depletion of the wildlife, and famine as well as Canadian policy that they be self-sufficient, forced them to return. Sitting Bull was later accidentally killed by Native American police commissioned by reservation agents to transfer him from one reservation to another.

The Dakota Vicariate had been assigned to the Benedictine missionary in 1879 making him Dakota Territory's first bishop. After division into North and South Dakota and admission to the Union in 1889, Bishop Marty decided that Sioux Falls, the fastest growing town, should be the new diocesan See. He left his Yankton residence (which still stands) where he had based his ministry. Yankton had formerly served as the territorial capital when he had arrived to minister to the Native Americans.

It was Marty who, as a circuit rider, on horseback or wagon, in inclement weather of all kinds, had had churches built on most of the reservations, regularly visited the small rural parishes, and established dozens of new ones. He baptized numerous children and adults, opened parish schools and mission schools for the Native American children who spoke Dakota, Lakota or Nakota. However, government policy mandated English only be used by the Sioux and their teachers in the reservation schools. To date about 50% of the more than 25,000 Native Americans on eight reservations are Catholic. One of them, Marty Mission near Wagner, founded after his death, is named for the first bishop. It also supports a school for Native American children, funded originally by Mother (now St.) Katharine Drexel, who responded to Bishop Marty's pleas for financial assistance and sisters to staff the school.

It was this first bishop who brought the Benedictine Sisters to Yankton and Sturgis (now at Rapid City) primarily to educate Native American children, as well as the Presentation Sisters to Aberdeen where they operated a parish school and, when an epidemic prompted them to care for the sick, a hospital which has become one of the largest in the state. Transferred to St. Cloud, Minn., because of declining health, Marty died in 1896 at age 62 shortly after attending the South Dakota Indian Congress which he had organized years earlier. (A later Tekakwitha Conference has somewhat replaced that although gatherings of Native Americans in the Dakotas are still frequent). In 1891, he had agonized over the infamous Massacre of Wounded Knee on the Pine Ridge Reservation. That reservation, Rosebud, Crow Creek, Lower Brule and the southern area of Standing Rock all later became part of the new diocese of Lead, founded in 1902, (which transferred to Rapid City in 1930). State-wide and diocesan apologies and reconciliation efforts concerning the Native Americans have served to heighten an awareness among the Catholics of the need for justice and more spiritual as well as material assistance for native tribespeople.

Catholic Institutions. South Dakota has five motherhouses of religious nuns and sisters. Benedictines are in Yankton and Rapid City; Presentations in Aberdeen;

Oblates of the Blessed Sacrament in Marty; Franciscans in Mitchell, formerly Gettysburg; and contemplative Carmelites in Alexandria. The only Benedictine abbey near Marvin, S.D., was founded in the 1950s by monks from ST. MEINRAD ARCHABBEY in Indiana, to enable them, working as missionaries to the Native Americans, to have a motherhouse nearer their ministries. The Sioux Falls diocese has assumed the obligation of serving the parishes formerly filled by the monks whose paucity of numbers has obliged them to withdraw from Native American ministry except at the abbey itself, and in a nearby parish. Another fast growing minority, the Hispanics, are also being served with the opening of Our Lady of Guadalupe parish in Sioux Falls. It is staffed by a recently ordained native Spanish-speaking priest from South America. South Dakota, although not populous, has a vibrant Catholic presence that is apparent wherever one travels across the state.

The state has two Catholic colleges, Mount Marty in Yankton and Presentation in Aberdeen; nine Catholic hospitals; four diocesan and parish high schools and 23 Catholic elementary schools. Schools primarily for the Native American population are on the reservations, at Marty Mission, and Chamberlain.

Bibliography: R. KAROLEVETZ, With Faith, Hope and Tenacity (Sioux Falls, 1989); Bishop Martin Marty: Black Robe Lean Chief (Yankton, 1980). A. KESSLER, "First Catholic Bishop of Dakota" in South Dakota Leaders, eds H. HOOVER et al. (Vermillion 1989); "Mount Marty College," in From Idea to Institution, eds. H. HOOVER et al. (Vermillion 1989); C. DURATSCHKE, Beginnings of Catholicism in South Dakota, (Washington, D.C. 1943); Crusading along Sioux Trails (St. Meinrad, Ind. 1947).

[C. DURATSCHKE/A. KESSLER]

SOUTHERNE, WILLIAM, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. c. 1579 at Ketton, Co. Durham; d. April 30, 1618 at Newcastle-under-Lyme under James I. Following his studies at Douai and Valladolid, he was ordained and returned to England. There he worked for 14 years, primarily among the poor of Staffordshire, particularly at Baswich, which then belonged to a branch of the Fowler family. He was arrested while saying Mass and sentenced in his vestments for being a priest and refusing the Oath of Supremacy. He remained in Stafford prison for six days after his condemnation because no one was willing to hang him. Finally he was strangled, then drawn and quartered. His head was stuck on one of the gates of Stafford. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

SOUTHWELL, NATHANAEL (BACON)

Jesuit bibliographer; b. Sculthorp, near Walsingham, Norfolk, England, 1598; d. at the Gesù, Rome, Dec. 2, 1676. He studied the humanities at the College of English Jesuits, Saint-Omer, and entered the English College at Rome, October 1617, under the assumed name Southwell. He was ordained Dec. 21, 1622, and sent to England. Later he was recalled to Rome as minister and procurator of the college there. In 1637 he was appointed spiritual father and confessor of the college. Then he went to the Gesù where for more than 20 years he was secretary to five generals of his order: V. Caraffa (1646–49), F. Piccolomini (1649–51), A. Gottifredi (1652), G. Nickel (1652–64), and J. P. Oliva (1664–81). Even after his retirement in 1668 he remained admonitor to Oliva. He revised and continued the great work of Pedro de RIBADENEYRA, Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesu (1676). He also compiled A Journal of Meditations for Every Day of the Year. Gathered out of Divers Authors, first published 1669, with a second edition, 1674, and a third edition, 1687. The work was translated from the original Latin by Edward Harvey, alias Mico, SJ, who died in prison in 1678.

Bibliography: T. COOPER, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 vol. (London 1885–1900) 18:700. J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time, 5 vol. (London-New York 1885–1902) 1:95–96.

[H. S. REINMUTH, JR.]

SOUTHWELL, ROBERT, ST.

English poet and martyr; b. Horsham St. Faith, near Norwich, toward end of 1561; d. Tyburn, London, Feb. 21, 1595. His father, Sir Robert Southwell, was a Catholic, but later conformed to the new religion; his mother's family (Copley) remained staunchly Catholic, as did his relatives, the Shelleys, Gages, and Cottons. When sent abroad for his education, he lived first among the English Catholic exiles at DOUAI, attending classes at the Jesuit college there. Later he went to Paris, where he came under the influence of the Jesuit Thomas Darbyshire, who had been an eminent divine under Queen Mary. Southwell, scarcely 17, sought admission into the Society of Jesus at Paris, but was refused because of his youth. He went on foot to Rome, and was there admitted in the autumn of 1578. Before and after ordination in 1584, he lived at the newly founded English College in Rome, where he acted as tutor and spiritual instructor to the students.

In 1586 Southwell left Rome for England with Henry GARNET; they landed near Folkestone on July 7. In London, which Southwell reached a few days later, he narrowly escaped capture: it was the time of the Babington Plot (see MARY STUART, QUEEN OF SCOTS), which Southwell later exposed in his An Humble Supplication to Her Majestie (1595). He worked mostly in London, living first at Arundel House in the Strand, the home of the countess, whose husband (St.) Philip HOWARD was a prisoner in the Tower. To Howard, Southwell addressed the spiritual letters that he later expanded into An Epistle of Comfort, which is one of the finest prose works of the late Elizabethan Age. Among his other writings, most of them printed at a secret press that he and Garnet directed, were Mary Magdalen's Funerall Teares (1594) and A Short Rule of Good Life (1598). The best known of his poems are The Burning Babe and St. Peter's Complaint (1595), in which he made experiments in verse that were followed or developed by others, including Shakespeare. He has been compared with Philip Sidney in his style and conceits.

In June 1592 Southwell was captured by an agent of the crown, Richard Topcliffe, at Uxenden, Harrow, the home of the Bellamy family, and was tortured in his captor's lodgings adjoining the Gatehouse prison in London. Later he was transferred to the Tower and finally to Newgate. In all he was tortured ten times. He was condemned for his priesthood, hanged, drawn, and quartered; his execution shocked the court and the whole country. He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929 and canonized in 1970 as one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

Feast: Oct. 25 (Feast of the 40 Martyrs); Dec. 1 (Jesuits); May 4 (Feast of the English Martyrs in England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF; OATHS, ENGLISH POST-REFORMATION; RECUSANT LITERATURE.

Bibliography: C. DEVLIN, The Life of Robert Southwell: Poet and Martyr (New York 1956). P. JANELLE, Robert Southwell, the Writer (New York 1935). H. FOLEY, Records of the English Province of the Society of Jesus, 7 v. (London 1877–82) passim. M. FITZ HERBERT, An Epistle of Comfort (London 1965).

[P. CARAMAN]

SOUTHWORTH, JOHN, ST.

Priest, martyr; b. Lancashire, 1592; d. Tyburn June 28, 1654. He belonged to the family of Southworths of Sameesbury near Preston. He entered the English College, Douai, on July 4, 1613; was ordained in 1618; and left for the English mission on December 13 the following year. He returned to Douai in March 1624, but in July 1625 left again for England, where he worked for five years in his native Lancashire. In 1627, he was arrested and was imprisoned in Lancaster Castle at the same time as Edmund ARROWSMITH, whom he absolved on his way to execution on Aug. 28, 1628. He was condemned for his priesthood but reprieved, and was next heard of in the Clink prison, Southwark, in March 1630. His name was included in an order for the banishment of priest prisoners, but it is uncertain whether he left the country. Henceforth his apostolate lay in London, where he showed heroic courage during the plague of 1636 to 1637. With Henry MORSE he organized the relief for the Catholic poor, who by their religious profession were excluded from the assistance given by the parishes. He worked mostly in the Westminster district, where his activity aroused the jealousy of the curate of St. Margaret's, who in October 1636 secured his arrest and imprisonment in the Gatehouse. There he continued his work for the plague-stricken. He was released in June 1637 but recommitted the following November. His name occurs again among the prisoners in the Clink in June 1640. His movements are obscure between his last release in July that year and 1654, when he was seized in bed, condemned to death, and executed at Tyburn on June 28. The Spanish ambassador conveyed his quartered body to Douai, where it remained in the chapel of the English College until the confiscation of the seminary by the French revolutionary forces. It was then secretly removed, reburied elsewhere in the building, and in 1927 discovered by workmen excavating on the site. After identification it was transferred first to St. Edmund's College, Ware, and after Southworth's beatification on Dec. 15, 1929, to Westminster Cathedral, where it is now exposed for veneration. He was canonized by Paul VI on Oct. 25, 1970 as one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

Feast: Oct. 25 (Feast of the 40 Martyrs of England and Wales); May 4 (Feast of the English Martyrs in England).

Bibliography: A. B. PURDIE, The Life of Blessed John Southworth . . . (London 1930). E. E. REYNOLDS, John Southworth . . . (London 1962). R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints 2:662–664.

[G. FITZHERBERT]

SOUVIGNY, ABBEY OF

Former Cluniac priory, burial place of the dukes of Bourbon, located at Souvigny. Founded in the tenth century by the then obscure feudal lord of the Bourbonnais, the monastery became a center of pilgrimage after the burial there of two famous abbots of Cluny, St. MAJOLUS (d. 994) and St. ODILO (d. 1049). The dukes of Bourbon alternately protected and attacked Souvigny. In the 13th century Robert, the youngest son of LOUIS IX, married the heiress of Bourbon; from this marriage HENRY IV derived his claim to the French throne in 1589. From the time of Duke Louis II (d. 1410) the family was buried there. In the 15th century the prior, Dom Chollet, restored the church by constructing a beautiful flamboyant Gothic nave on the sturdy Romanesque basilica. The tombs of Duke Charles and Duchess Agnes, sculptured by Jacques Morel (d. 1459?), are found in the new chapel. In the 16th century commendatory abbots collected the revenues but made no contribution to the development of Souvigny, which suffered also from internal decay. In the 17th century, however, the prior Nicolas des Mesgrigny renewed the spirit of the monastery and contributed to its history by collecting documents which form the Thesaurus silviniacensis, an incomplete but precious corpus for the history of the monastery. Souvigny was suppressed in 1791; two years later the Terror destroyed the house and the artistic accumulation of nine centuries.

Bibliography: S. MARCALLE, Antiquitez du prioré (sic) de Souvigny (Moulines 1610). Thesaurus silviniacensis, ed. N. DE MESGRIGNY (1652). Gallia Christiana, v.1–13 (Paris 1715–85), v.14–16 (Paris 1856–65) 2:377–380. A. ALLIER, L'Ancien Bourbonnais, 2 v. (Moulines 1833–38); ed. M. FAZY in 4 v. (1934–38). A. BRUEL, ed., Recueil des chartes de l'abbaye de Cluny, 6 v. (Paris 1876–1903). N. DE NICOLAY, Générale description du Bourbonnais, ed. A. VAYSSIÈRE, 2 V. (Moulines 1889). G. DE VALOUS, Le Temporel et la situation financière des établissements de l'ordre de Cluny du XII^e au XIV^e siècle (Paris 1935). L. CÔTE, Contributions à l'histoire du prieuré clunisien de Souvigny (Moulines 1942); Moines, sires, et ducs (1965).

[L. CÔTE]

SOVEREIGNTY

Sovereignty is a species of AUTHORITY, namely, political authority, the moral right of ultimate decision within a legitimately constituted STATE. Whether this supreme societal power is vested in the one, the few, or the many, it includes the right to direct by laws and other institutions and instrumentalities of GOVERNMENT, not excluding that of physical coercion, the activities of persons, families, and other subordinate societies toward the attainment of the common good. It embraces legislative, executive, and judicial power, the right of life and death, of war and peace. On the international level it demands the juridical independence of the state and its acceptance as an equal in the community of nations. Ideas such as these embraced by the term are as old as the state itself, and they were known to the Greek political philosophers and the Roman jurists, for example. However, sovereignty as a philosophical term came into use during postmedieval political developments, notably in the works of Jean Bodin (1530–96), alleged father of the term, Thomas HOBBES (1588–1679), and Jean Jacques ROUSSEAU (1712–78).

Book inscription, heart with initials J.S., reportedly a gift from John Southworth to his servant John Lillie.

Origin. Sacred Scripture, papal teaching, and Catholic philosophy declare that sovereignty ultimately derives its origin from God. St. Paul, instructing the faithful on human dignity and the duty to obey civil authority, wrote, “Let everyone be subject to the higher authorities, for there exists no authority except from God” (Rom 3.1–7; 1 Pt 2.13–17 and Jn 19.9–11). The Syllabus of Pius IX and the encyclicals of Leo XIII, Pius XI, Pius XII, and John XXIII present the Church’s doctrine in regard to the origin, function, and limitations of sovereignty. In these documents sovereignty is ascribed to God, the author of man’s nature. “Every civilized community,” Leo XIII said, “must have a ruling authority and this authority, no less than society itself, has its source in nature and consequently has God for its author. It follows, then, that all power must proceed from God” [Immortale Dei, Acta Sanctae Sedis, (Rome 1865–1908) ed. 18 (1885) 162].

The philosophical arguments of Catholic philosophers lead to the same conclusion. In them, MAN has been viewed consistently as a social and political being not merely by his own free choice but by the exigency of his intrinsic human nature. This is to say that man is obliged by the NATURAL LAW to accept or create right social order or civil society in which he may achieve the perfection demanded by human nature, that is, the development of his physical, intellectual, cultural, and moral potentials. This natural goal can be achieved only in and through association with his fellow men. Consequently, membership in SOCIETY, especially in the family and the state, is natural to man. It is an expression of his dynamic nature. It answers an essential demand and fulfills an intrinsic need of his human nature. Since human nature demands the existence of the state, it simultaneously requires the existence of all elements essential to the state, one of which is sovereignty. God, therefore, being the author of human nature, is likewise the author of the state and the origin of sovereignty. Edmund BURKE (1729–97) put the argument succinctly in his Reflections on the Revolution in France: “He who gave our nature to be perfected by our virtue willed also the necessary means of its perfection: He willed, therefore, the state” [Works (Boston 1881) 3.361].

Limitations. In accordance with this philosophical theory, in exercising sovereignty the state performs a twofold service function. First, it directs its activities toward the realization of the common good, while at the same time safeguarding the inviolable rights of the human person. Secondly, it maintains a stable order of peace and prosperity in and through which man, in the enjoyment of his God-given rights, may pursue within the confines of the common good his happiness and perfection. Sovereign power, therefore, although supreme and final in the direction of society toward the common good, is not absolute and unlimited. It is limited by its purpose, the common good, by the inviolable rights of the human person, and by the dictates of the natural law and the divine law. Any law or activity of the sovereign power that would deprive a person of his natural rights to ownership of property, to marry, or to worship God, for example, would be contrary to the will of God and the inviolable rights of the person and therefore ultra rites, not only immoral but also illegal. Political philosophers who deny that man is social and political by nature and those who advance positivistic theories of sovereignty are forced to posit the free will of man as the sole source of political society and sovereignty. Consequently, they are unable to establish a sound, objective justification either for man’s obedience to or for any theoretical limitations on sovereignty. If the supreme authority of the state, sovereignty, is derived solely from the free will of man, there is no objective order of rights or any higher law to which both man and the state are subject. Nor is there any valid protection against the arbitrary use of sovereignty and the creation of the absolute state. To say that God is the author of sovereignty is not to deny men the right in the actual formation or change of government to choose the form of government under which they wish to live and to locate sovereignty.

Bibliography: H. A. ROMMEN, The State in Catholic Thought (St. Louis 1945). L. STURZO, Church and State, tr. B. B. CARTER (New York 1939). J. MARITAIN, Man and the State (Chicago 1951). G. BOWE, The Origin of Political Authority (Dublin 1955). J. LECCLERQ, The Two Sovereignities (New York 1952). THOMAS AQUINAS, On Kingship, to the King of Cyprus, tr. G. B. PHELAN, ed., I. T. ESCHMANN (Toronto 1949). F. SUÁREZ, Selections from Three Works, tr. G. L. WILLIAMS, 2 v. (Oxford 1944), contains De Legibus, Defensio fidei, and De triplici virtute theologica. R. BELLARMINE, De laicis, or The Treatise on Civil Government, tr. K. E. MURPHY (New York 1928).

[A. A. NORTH]

SOZOMEN

Greek Church historian; b. Bethelia near Gaza, Palestine, c. 400; d. Constantinople, c. 450. He was born of a Christian family converted by St. Hilarion. Salaminius Hermias Sozomen received his primary religious education in a monastery, studied law at Beirut, and practiced law in Constantinople under Theodosius II. He speaks of a historical epitome covering the history of the Church from the birth of Christ to the defeat of Licinius (323), but this work is lost. His Ecclesiastical History, written between 439 and 450 and dedicated to THEODOSIUS II, covers the period from 324 to 439 in nine books; however, the years 425 to 439 are missing. Sozomen frequently follows his contemporary SOCRATES, Historian, almost verbatim, but interpolates archival and Syriac material unknown to Socrates, for example, the persecution of the Christians in Persia under Sapor II, evidently based on the Acts of the Persian Martyrs. Stylistically, his work is superior to that of Socrates, but it is less critical and occasionally incorporates legendary material. A possible explanation for his less-critical sense arises from his desire to present monasticism as a guideline for his history of the Church.

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1857–66) 67:844–1630. R. HUSSEY, ed., Ecclesiastica historia, 3 v. (Oxford 1960). J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster, Md. 1950–) 3:534–536. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF from the 5th German ed. (New York 1960) 274. G. BARDY, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 14.2:2469–71. N. H. BAYNES, Journal of Theological Studies 49 (1948) 165–168. W. TELFER, ibid. 50 (1949) 187–191. P. BATIFFOL, “Sozomène et Sabinos,” Byzantinische Zeitschrift 7 (1898) 265–284. G. SCHOO, Die Quellen des Kirchen- historikers Sozomenos (Berlin 1911). J. BIDEZ, La Tradition manuscrite de Sozomène et la Tripartite de Théodore le Lecteur (Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 32.2b; 1908). W. ELTESTER, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA, et al. (Stuttgart 1893–) 3A.1 (1927) 1240–48.

[F. CHIOVARO]

SPACE

The term space, derived from the Latin spatium, has a variety of meanings both in ordinary language and in philosophical and scientific usage. While corresponding etymologically to the Greek στάδιον, it has a much wider meaning than the latter; thus it can signify distance or length, place, temporal duration or interval, or other types of dimensionality. In the Greek language there is no term corresponding to this broad signification of the Latin and modern term. It is difficult, then, to speak about the historical development of the concept of space. Rather one must speak about various concepts and problems that are more or less connected with the meanings attributed to the word in modern usage. This article proposes to do so by a philosophical analysis of the concept.

Philosophical Analysis. A philosophical analysis of the concept of space distinguishes a threefold aspect or usage of the concept, viz, the psychological, the mathematical, and the physical.

Psychological Aspect. According to the investigations of contemporary psychology, the representation of space is gradually formed in the consciousness of the child through a complex experience that begins from the very early months of his life. The senses principally involved in this experience present a whole field wherein single objects are perceptible; this forms, as it were, a unitary and permanent picture wherein individual objects appear and disappear. The unitary and permanent picture gradually becomes distinct and separate from the individual objects and, notably in the imagination, is established as something independent and existing in itself. Thus, by successive integrations, there is formed visual, tactile, imaginary, etc., space.

By reason of its very origin, the space pertinent to perception and imagination has an essential unity, an absolute center of reference, and privileged directions of up and down, length, width, and depth. With the extension of infantile experience, the space relevant to perception, initially limited to present perception, is progressively broadened and identified first with the space of familiar surroundings, places of travel and play, and the region about the horizon of one's own experience. Finally, by way of information gleaned from stories and schooling, it is identified with terrestrial space, wherein the earth, with its complex of mutually similar objects, constitutes the privileged and absolute platform on which bodies exist and physical phenomena develop and about which the celestial sphere moves with the stars.

This geocentric representation, which has formed the space of humanity for thousands of years, has the same characteristics of absoluteness and independence of individual bodies, together with unity, center, and privileged directions, as the primitive representation in the child. When the Copernican revolution substituted the heliocentric system for the geocentric, it did not make essential modifications in the representation of space. A more decisive and revolutionary step was taken shortly afterward: this resulted from the recognition of the sun's equality with other stars, the recognition of equivalence in inertial systems, and the definitive renunciation of privileged centers and direction—all associated with the beginnings of modern mechanics, especially the work of Galileo GALILEI. Did these developments imply a renunciation of all systems of extrinsic reference for the position and movement of bodies or of all stable platforms for the description of physical phenomena? In the 17th century an affirmative answer would have demanded an audacity of which a genial poet might possibly have been capable, but not a methodical and reflective scientist such as Isaac Newton. A man of his times, Newton restricted himself to the path that seemed safer and less risky for him. For the egocentric, geocentric, and heliocentric platform, he substituted the notion of absolute space, existing by itself, always conformed to itself, and immobile, infinite, and eternal, without being dependent upon particular terrestrial and heavenly bodies.

From the psychological point of view, Newton's absolute space constitutes the projection of imaginary space into the world of physical reality, while maintaining the same characteristics of unity, absoluteness, and necessity. In fact, although the fantasy can imagine that it is suppressing all existing bodies, it cannot suppress imaginary space. This is a matter however, of psychological necessity deriving from the fact that the imagination is an organic faculty and, therefore essentially spatial. However, as a spiritual faculty, the intellect—which has being as such as its object—can discern (that is, judge, and not merely imagine) that the world and space itself would not exist if matter were totally annihilated. The intellect, then, can recognize that imaginary space is fictitious entity lacking reality in itself, independent of material bodies. This realization opens the door to a more rational consideration of space through the sciences of mathematics and physics.

Mathematical Aspect. Mathematical space, which is the proper object of classical geometry and its more recent generalizations, can be defined as pure EXTENSION. Absolutely considered in its essence, abstracting from all the concrete conditions of its realization, as well as from every relation, either of dependence or of content, to real bodies. As such, it is absolutely possible extension.

Mathematical space received a systematic treatment, admirable for its logical rigor and completeness, in the Elements of Euclid about the year 300 B.C. Transmitted through Arabian culture to medieval Europe, this treatise still constitutes the nucleus of geometric knowledge for the person of ordinary culture. At the basis of this teaching there is a natural, uncritical, and directly realistic conception taking fundamental notions (point, line, surface, etc.) from spontaneous intuition. It proceeds from principles held as evident and necessary truths, and it claims that all its propositions contain absolute truth. Euclidean space is three-dimensional, homogeneous, and isotropic, as well as infinite, or rather, indefinite. In it, parallel straight lines are equi-distant; there is the possibility of similar figures, and the form of geometric things is independent of their position and extension. In short, Euclidean space is straight, having no curvature.

All the properties of Euclidean space can be deduced by introducing a postulate, namely, Euclid's fifth postulate, which states in substance that through a point external to a straight line one and only line can be drawn parallel to that line. The evidence and necessity of this postulate, and equivalent statements that have been substituted for it, have been disputed since the time of Euclid's first commentators. In fact, it constitutes an extrapolation from immediate intuition, lacking logical justification. The critique of Euclidean geometry, through the work of many mathematicians, such as K. F. Gauss, J. Bolyai (1802–60), N. I. Lobachevskiĭ, and G. F. B. Riemann, has led to the conclusion that Euclid's postulate does not have an intrinsic and exclusive logical necessity, since it is possible to substitute opposite postulates for it. These lead to concepts of curved, hyperbolic, or elliptical spaces having properties different from those of Euclidean space, yet logically coherent and free from internal contradictions. This development has led to a generalization of the concept of mathematical space, further elaborated by the consideration of nonisotropic and differential spaces, of hyperspaces having more than three dimensions, and of functional spaces having infinite dimensions, etc.

The evolution of geometry, then, has shown the need for distinguishing the question of absolutely possible mathematical spaces from that of a really existing physical space. Rene DESCARTES and classical physicists deemed these questions to be identical.

Physical Aspect. By physical space is meant the first, fundamental, dimensional quantity that, along with time, enables one to describe the motion of bodies, define velocity as the derivative of space with respect to time, and, consequently, determine the position of the body at the term of its motion. Two questions are posited in reference to physical space: (1) Does physical space have an existence distinct from the bodies that fill it (or can there be space without matter)? And (2) What are the properties of physical space?

As regards the first question, the Greek atomists, in opposition to PARMENIDES, claimed that the void exists together with the plenum and that this is necessary for the multiplicity and motion of atoms. This teaching was restored by Pierre GASSENDI during the 17th century, in opposition to Descartes; the latter, identifying the essence of bodies with their extension, denied all possibility of empty space. Aristotle, and scholastic philosophers generally, deny the possibility of an absolute void; as a mere nonentity, this cannot exist in itself. Aristotelians explain the multiplicity and movement of bodies in terms of real divisibility of matter, itself made intelligible by the concept of potency. There would seem to be no validity Isaac Newton's arguments in favor of an absolute space independent of sensible bodies or fixed stars, since the position and movement of bodies can be explained in reference to the complex of sensible bodies or fixed stars, without recourse to a system of uncontrollable and purely imaginary reference. Physical space, then, is identical with the complex of extended bodies constituting the universe—not only directly sensible bodies, that is, solids, liquids, and gases, but also ether and the fields of modern physics.

As regards properties, man has always asked whether physical space is finite or infinite. According to the Ptolemaic conception, it was easy to deem physical space to be finite and limited by the outermost celestial sphere; according to the Copernican conception, however, one was led to think of space as open and infinite. More recently, equilibrium considerations in celestial mechanics and deductions from the theory of general relativity lead scientists to conceive of physical space as finite. In recent times a question has also arisen as to whether physical space is Euclidean or non-Euclidean. There is no absolute answer to this question, since all physical measurements for ascertaining the geometry of space are approximate and imprecise; one can speak only of a greater or lesser approximation to a geometric space. Within the limits of attainable measures and terrestrial experiments, physical space constitutes a good approximation to Euclidean space. Where astronomical distances are involved, however, it is more exact to say (in keeping with the theory of general relativity) that physical space is what Riemann has described it to be—elliptical, curved in its totality, and enclosed within itself, as a spherical hypersurface.

Finally, as regards the relations between space and time, the theory of special relativity rejects the absolute separation of these categories and claims the existence of a sole spatial-temporal physical reality, the space-time continuum, wherein spatial and temporal relations among various bodies and events depend upon the state of reciprocal movement.

See Also: CONTINUUM; PLACE; TIME; MOTION

Bibliography: M. J. ADLER, ed., The Great Ideas: A Syntopicon of Great Books of the Western World, 2 v. (Chicago 1952) 2:811–25. C. B. GARNETT, The Kantian Philosophy of Space (New York 1939). M. JAMMER, Concepts of Space (Cambridge, Mass. 1954). G. BACHELARD, L'Expérience de l'espace dans la physique contemporaine (Paris 1937). L. P. EISENHART, Riemannian Geometry (Princeton 1949). F. GONSETH, La Geometrie et le probleme de l'espace, 6 v. (Neuchatel 1945–55). F. SOCCORSI, Quaestiones scientificae cum philosophia coniunctae: De geometriis et spatiis non euclideis (Rome 1960). A. EINSTEIN, Relativity, tr. B. W. LAWSON (15th ed. London 1953). A. S. EDDINGTON, Space, Time and Gravitation (Cambridge, Eng. 1920). H. MARGENAU, The Nature of Physical Reality (New York 1950). D. NYS, La Notion de l'espace (Brussels 1922). F. SELVAGGI, Cosmologia (Rome 1962); Scienza e metodologia (Rome 1962).

[F. SELVAGGI]

SPADAFORA, DOMINIC, BL.

Dominican preacher; b. Randazzo, near Mt. Etna in Sicily, 1450; d. Monte Cerignone in Urbino, Dec. 21, 1521. He entered the Order of Preachers at St. Zita's Priory in Palermo. After ordination, he went to Padua, where he taught for several years. He then returned to Palermo, as the center of missionary work among the people of Sicily, for eight years. In 1487 he obtained the degree of master in theology and was called to Rome as assistant to Master General Joachim Torriani. Together they worked on the reform of the order until 1491, when Spadafora was commissioned to found a monastery of strict observance at Monte Cerignone near the shrine of Our Lady of Grace, and thus he was spared involvement in SAVONAROLA's tragic course toward execution for sedition and heresy. For 30 years he served as prior at the monastery and as missionary preacher to the people of central Italy. He was memorable for his wisdom, his ascetic spirit, and the constancy of his zeal for souls. Benedict XV beatified him Jan. 12, 1921.

Feast: Oct. 12, formerly Oct. 3.

Bibliography: A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York, 1956) 4:21–22. J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum, 5 v. (Paris 1719–23); repr. 2 v. in 4 (New York 1959) 2.1:333. G. GIERATHS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:483. Acta Apostolicae Sedis 13 (1921) 104–108. R. DIACCINI, Vita del B. Domenico Spadafora (Foligno 1921).

[G. M. GRAY]

SPAIN, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Located on the Iberian peninsula in Europe, Spain (Estado Español) is bordered on the north by the Bay of Biscay and the French Pyrenees, on the east by the Mediterranean Sea, on the south by Morocco and the Strait of Gibraltar, and on the west by Portugal and the North Atlantic Ocean. Spain also includes the Balearic Islands in the Mediterranean and the Canary Islands in the Atlantic Ocean off the coast of Africa. With most of its land comprised of a flat plateau region, Spain has a strong agricultural base, producing grains, olives, grapes, and other crops, as well as beef, poultry, and pork. Predominately an industrial and service industry economy, Spain was plagued by higher-than-acceptable unemployment rate through much of the late 20th century. Governed as a socialist dictatorship following World War I, Spain reverted back to a monarchy in 1975.

Two-thirds of Spain's population live in the coastal regions. Although there are noticeable regional and linguistic diversities, the Spanish people are basically homogeneous in race and culture. The only true racial minority in Spain are the Gypsies whose number is estimated at several hundred thousand. Barcelona, Valencia, Seville, and Madrid are among the major cities.

The Spanish mainland has 15 geographic and historic regions that generally correspond to what were once Christian and Moorish kingdoms. The predominant religion in Spain is Roman Catholicism. Most non-Catholic Christians are Protestant, and among the newer sects the Jehovah Witnesses, by aggressive proselytizing, are most conspicuous. Among non-Christians, the Jewish community is prominent.

The four-part essay that follows deals with (1) the early history of Spain until A.D. 711, under Roman and Visigothic rule; (2) the medieval kingdoms, 711 to 1474; (3) the rise of modern Spain from 1474 to 1939; and (4) the close of the Spanish Civil War to 2000.

[EDS.]

Early History. Although first colonized by Phoenician and Greek peoples, Spain was christianized following its inclusion in the Roman Empire, c. 201 B.C., and its episcopacy organized along Roman lines. The conquering Germanic Visigoths, who ruled the region during the 4th century, supported Arianism until they were converted to Catholicism in 587. Visigoth rule was marked by an important amalgam of Roman and Gothic law and by one of the most flourishing cultural periods of Spanish history, during which the episcopacy took an active part in the political affairs of the country.

Roman Rule. While no positive proof remains, it is believed that St. Paul planned to take the gospel to Spain, which had been incorporated into the Roman Empire by the time of Emperor Augustus. Both St. Irenaeus and Tertullian testified that there were Christians in Spain before A.D. 200. In 254 St. CYPRIAN OF CARTHAGE mentioned the bishops of León-Astorga, Mérida, and Saragossa and alluded to other unnamed sees. His letter revealed the close relationship that existed between Christians in Spain and in North Africa. In 259 St. FRUCTUOSUS and two of his deacons were martyred at Tarragona. At the Council of ELVIRA (c. 304), 43 bishops and priests represented 37 communities, all but five in south Spain. The great persecution begun by DIOCLETIAN (303–304) apparently claimed Christian martyrs in all five provinces of Spain: Galicia, Tarraconensis, Baetica, Carthagera, and Lusitania.

After establishing peace under Emperor Constantine, the Church increased in numbers despite being infiltrated with pagan influences. Spain produced several remarkable bishops and theologians in the 4th century, among them Hosius of Córdoba, Potamius of Lisbon, GREGORY OF ELVIRA, and PACIAN OF BARCELONA. This period also saw the rise of the Emperor THEODOSIUS I, the poets Juvenecus and PRUDENTIUS, and probably the Virgin Aetheria, whose account of her travels to the East is of great interest.

A late 4th-century controversy caused by PRISCILLIAN reflected the difficulties encountered throughout western Europe by the monastic movement, although in this instance the struggle was exacerbated by the doctrinal insecurity betrayed by insistence on apocryphal writings. Priscillian's execution in 385 only encouraged the growth of PRISCILLIANISM, which survived in Galicia as a powerful movement until the late 6th century. Councils to combat Priscillianism were convoked at Saragossa (380) and at Toledo (400).

Visigothic Rule. The 5th century, with its wars and invasions, remains obscure. In 409 Spain was invaded by the barbarian ALANS, VANDALS, and Suevi. Vandals and Alans who survived the subsequent attack of the Germanic Visigoths in 418 moved to North Africa, while the Suevi withdrew to Galicia and part of modern Portugal. The main Visigothic movement into Spain took place in 496 and again after their loss of most of south Gaul to the Franks in 507. In 554 the Visigoths established their capital in Toledo. Baetica, which had resisted conquest by the barbarians, welcomed the Byzantines (552), who were expelled finally from south Spain only in 629. There is little evidence of religious persecution of the Church by the Arian Suevi or Visigoths. In the 6th century a number of councils were held, mostly in east Spain: Tarragona (516), Gerona (517), Toledo (527), Barcelona (540), Lérida (546), and Valencia (549). These councils, which reformed abuses, mark a revival of religious life, which was evident also in Christian literature. The Arian Suevi were converted to Catholicism by St. MARTIN OF BRAGA, who inspired two Councils of Braga (561, 572). The conversion of the Visigoths to Catholicism followed a civil war between King Leovigild and his Catholic son, St. HERMENEGILD, in Seville (580–584). After Leovigild's victory he conquered the Suevi, incorporating their kingdom into the Visigothic. After the murder of Hermenegild in 585 and the death of Leovigild a year later, Hermenegild's younger brother, King Recared, became a Catholic and in 589 officially brought the Visigoths into the Church.

The 7th century was the great age of Catholic Spain under the Visigoths. It saw an apparent Romanization of the Visigoths and a renaissance of Latin literature in cathedral and monastic schools, which produced such luminaries as St. ISIDORE OF SEVILLE (d. 636), St. BRAULIO OF SARAGOSSA (d. 651), St. EUGENE II (III; d. 657), St. ILDEFONSUS (d. 667), and St. JULIAN OF TOLEDO (d. 690). National and provincial councils were regularly held at Toledo from 589 to 702. The acts of provincial councils at Narbonne (589), Seville (590, 619), Huesca (598), Barcelona (599), Egara (614), Mérida (666), Braga (675), and Saragossa (691) also are preserved. The kings and some of the nobility attended the national councils, whose legislation was in large part intended to invest royal authority with moral force. The initiative lay with the kings, as with the emperors in Byzantium.

The Spanish Visigothic Church comprised 77 bishoprics in six provinces, under the archbishops of Toledo, Tarragona, Seville, Braga, Mérida, and Narbonne. Narbonne included several sees in Septimania; part of south Gaul was still subject to the Visigoths. The Church in Spain became increasingly nationalistic, more closely identified with the monarchy, suspicious of papal intervention (though recognizing papal primacy in theory), and more amenable to the persecution of the Jews, who were required to choose between baptism and slavery (694). By 681 the head of the Church was the archbishop of Toledo, who participated in all episcopal nominations as deputy of the king. The Church was governed by the HISPANA COLLECTIO, a collection of Canon Law drawn up by ISIDORE OF SEVILLE and revised by Julian of Toledo. This collection influenced Carolingian legislation, and Isidore's many writings were continually quarried and copied by later generations, beginning with the Irish in the 7th century. There was a strong monastic movement in Spain, both in the cities and in the countryside. In Galicia it was influenced by Irish asceticism and dominated by such figures as St. FRUCTUOSUS OF BRAGA (d. 667) and the hermit St. VALERIO OF BIERZO (d. c. 690). The Mozarabic liturgy, drawn up in the 6th and 7th centuries, was revised by Julian. The creeds of the Councils of Toledo signaled a step forward in the development of doctrine. Church architecture displayed interesting Byzantine influences.

The Visigothic kingdom, elective from 636 and weakened by incessant civil wars between factions of nobles, eventually succumbed to the Arab invasion from North Africa (711–714). The Church had tried to stabilize and support a strong monarchy; but in the last decades, it, too, became weak. Only in north Spain did Christian elements hold out. Elsewhere, the Church lived according to its tradition, dealing as best it could with Islam and heterodox Christian movements.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 84. Concilios visigóticos e hispano-romanos, ed. J. VIVES et al., v.1 of España Cristiana (Barcelona 1963). J. VIVES, in Miscelánea L. Ferotín (Madrid 1965), Varones Apostólicos; Inscripciones cristianas de la España romana y visigoda (Barcelona 1942). K. ZEUMER, ed., Leges visigothorum (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Leges) (Berlin 1826–) 1.1; 1902). M. C. DÍAZ Y DÍAZ, Index scriptorum latinorum medii aevi hispanorum, 2 v. (Salamanca 1958–59). A. FÁBREGA GRAU, Pasionario hispánico, 2 v. (Madrid 1953–55), acts of martyrs. R. MENÉNDEZ PIDAL, ed., Historia de España (Madrid 1935–), v.2, España romana (1935), and v.3, España visigoda (Madrid 1940). P. B. GAMS, Die Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, 3 v. in 5 (Regensburg 1862–79). Z. GARCÍA VILLADA, Historia eclesiástica de España, 3 v. in 5 (Madrid 1929–36). J. FERNÁNDEZ ALONSO, La cura pastoral en la España romanovisigoda (Rome 1955). J. N. HILLGARTH, "Coins and Chronicles: Official Propaganda in Sixth-Century Spain," Historia 14 (1965); "Visigothic Spain and Early Christian Ireland," Royal Irish Academy: Proceedings 62.C (1962) 167–194. R. AIGRAIN, A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935–) 5:231–267. A. K. ZIEGLER, Church and State in Visigothic Spain (Washington 1930). J. M. LACARRA, in Settimane di studio v.7.1 (Spoleto 1960) 353–384. A. MUNDÒ, "Il monachesimo nella penisola iberica fino al sec. VII," ibid. v.4 (Spoleto 1957) 73–108. J. PÉREZ DE URBEL, Los monjes españoles en la edad media, 2 v. (Madrid 1933–34). A. ECHÁNOVE, "Precisiones acerca de la legislación conciliar toledana sobre los judíos," Hispania sacra 14 (1961) 259–279, Jews. P. B. HUGUET and H. SCHLUNK, Ars Hispaniae v.2 (Madrid 1947).

[J. N. HILLGARTH]

MEDIEVAL SPAIN

The Visigothic kings, unable to command the loyalty of their subjects even with the occasional support of Spanish bishops, fell quickly before the sudden invasion of Arabs and Moors from North Africa in 711. One by one, lords and cities fell to the conquerors, except for groups in the northern mountains, one of which, in the Asturias, would eventually lay claim to the Visigothic inheritance. The region's new Arab governors—most of whom were subject to the emir of al-Qayrawān, who in turn depended on the caliph in Damascus—governed amid civil war from the strategic location of Córdoba in upper Andalusia. Their rule continued until 755 when Abd ar-Rahman I, refugee scion of the fallen Umayyads of Damascus, established a dynasty in Córdoba that lasted as an independent power in the Muslim world to 1031. The conquered land allotted to Arab tribes in 745 extended from Algarve to Murcia, and the levy of troops under Emir Mohammed I (852–886) came from an even smaller area; Córdoba itself was excluded from the allotment and the levy. Córdoba’s control of the Meseta and the Mediterranean and Atlantic coasts was never strong or direct.

Christians under Muslim Rule. The Christian church, having deeper and stronger roots in the peninsula than the Visigoths, survived under the Muslims, the bishops retaining much of the administrative authority they acquired during the Roman Empire. At least 29 bishoprics survived under the Muslims, and seven “national” councils in Toledo (792), Seville (782, 823), and Córdoba (839, 852, 860, 862) dealt freely with matters of common interest in the absence of bishops from the Christian north.

Possibly because of efforts to accommodate the two religions and perhaps as a result of the influence of Christians of Syria, the Church in Spain suffered throughout Muslim rule from errors in discipline and doctrine, for the most part christological. Pope ADRIAN I (772–795), now allied with the new Frankish power which had been victorious at Tours (732) and elsewhere, felt enough concern to send letters and the missionary Egila to the Spanish bishops. But the bishops acquitted themselves before the Pope, while Egila fell victim to the heterodox teachings of the Spaniard Migetius, who was condemned by a council in Seville in 782 presided over by Abp. ELIPANDUS OF TOLEDO. In his attempt to maintain the primacy of Toledo (the last-known effort before its reconquest in 1085) and in his obstinate defense of ADOPTIONISM and of the traditional Spanish liturgy (see MOZARABIC RITE), Elipandus may have weakened the authority of Toledo and caused a division in the Spanish episcopate. He faced opposition from BEATUS OF LIÉBANA and Bp. Eterius of Osma, the authors of a lengthy treatise more important for the view it offers of Christian life and thought in the Asturias than for its refutation of Elipandus. Beatus compiled a commentary on REVELATION, the MSS of which offer an important link between early Christian and medieval art. ANTICHRIST figured prominently in the writings of Beatus and in a later work by Albar of Córdoba. In 851 EULOGIUS OF CÓRDOBA praised Bp. Wistremirus of Toledo, “the lamp of all Spain,” for sanctity and learning. The bishops of Córdoba, despite their residence in the Muslim capital, do not seem to have exercised jurisdiction over the traditional metropolitans of Toledo, Seville, and Mérida.

The great achievement of Visigothic rule, the Liber iudicum, an amalgam of Roman and Visigothic law, continued, alongside the edicts of the emirs and decrees of church councils, to be the law of the Christians in Muslim areas. Some Christians apostatized from their Latin Christian heritage to accept Arabic culture and Islam, which enjoyed official precedence. Many Christians, however, were bilingual and knowledgeable in Islam as well as in their own religion, and into the mid-9th century a sufficiently large number of Muslims and apostate Christians identified themselves as Christians as to alarm the Muslims of Córdoba. Contemporary with the CAROLINGIAN RENAISSANCE, which attracted a number of Spaniards (THEODULF OF ORLÉANS, CLAUDIUS OF TURIN, AGOBARD OF LYONS, PRUDENTIUS OF TROYES), a renaissance of Latin learning in Córdoba began with Abbot Esperaindeo and flowered in his pupils Eulogius and Albar, whose works constitute the most important historical sources of early Muslim Spain. The strong cultural and religious competition that developed in Córdoba erupted in the martyrdom, in part voluntary, of some 50 Christians between 850 and 859. The martyrdoms disturbed Umayyad rule in Andalusia and coincided with a disruption of communications between Córdoba and Muslim Saragossa during this period, leaving the land between prey to brigands. The Abbot Samson’s lengthy theological Apologeticus (864), dealing with cosmology, ANTHROPOMORPHISM, and PANTHEISM, prefigures the later philosophical literature of the Latin West that would also wrestle with Arabic ideas. Christian Córdoba collected texts, especially a corpus dealing with the prophet MUHAMMAD and Islam. Whether the renaissance there was without issue depends on what influence it had on later Mozarabic scriptoria and on later Arabic letters in Córdoba.

As a rule, the rebellions against Córdoba were based on issues of municipal independence, as had been the case under the Visigoths, rather than on religious or cultural differences. But Omar ibn Hafsun (d. 917), who returned to Christianity from a renegade family, in 879 stirred up a rebellion, motivated in part by religion, that his sons continued to 932.

The holy image of Montserrat, “Black Virgin.”

Although Arabic letters flourished in Córdoba in the 9th century, extant Arabic works from Spain date from the late 10th century, when the glory of the caliphate, established in 929, was a thing of the past. Recemundus, a learned bilingual Christian, chancellor-ambassador of Abd ar-Rahman III (912–961), bishop of Granada, and author of an Arabic Christian liturgical calendar dedicated to the Caliph al-Hakam II (961–976), appeared at the court of Emperor OTTO I, where he struck up a friendship with LIUTPRAND OF CREMONA. Mozarabic scriptoria flourished at this time, and Córdoba was a center visited by Christian pilgrims. Christians fared well enough under Muslim rule until the reconquest of Toledo in 1085. The 25 or more petty municipal kingdoms (taifas), which had succeeded the caliphate in 1031, were overwhelmed by the Muslim Almoravid religious zealots from southern Senegal. These invaded Spain in 1086 and recaptured the strategic port of Valencia from the Cid of Castile in 1102, while European crusaders were taking Jerusalem. Almoravid invasions (1146–1212) harmed Spain's Mozarab communities under the influence of the Church to the north and influenced by the GREGORIAN REFORM. Some Mozarabs immigrated to the north while others were deported to North Africa, much of their distinctive and traditional culture thus stamped out. In 1212 a united crusade of Spanish, French, and military orders broke Almoravid power at Las Navas de Tolosa. Córdoba (1236) and Seville (1248) were reconquered, and only the kingdom of Granada, a link with North Africa, remained until 1492.

Interior view of Mudejar ceiling detail, geometric interlace pattern with the lion of Castile in center, built by Isabella and Ferdinand, 1510, San Juan de los Reyes Monastery, Toledo, Spain. (©CORBIS)

The Reconquest. The Reconquest (Reconquista) of Muslim Spain by the Christian kings of northern Spain characterizes most of medieval Spanish history. Although efforts to restore peninsular unity in the Visigothic tradition and assert the supremacy of Christianity figure prominently in the Reconquest, self-interest better explains many actions. Agricultural and commercial development, the growth of towns, the corporate enterprise of religious and military orders, centralized monarchies, and the universal papacy were among the goals of those who supported dispossessing the Moors to the south. Aragon wished to control the Mediterranean, from which she sought to exclude Castile. Castile hoped to control the major part of the peninsula and thus make others depend on her; her ambitions to expand in North Africa were restrained by Aragon, Portugal, and France. For many Spanish, however, reconquest would be achieved by the conversion of the Moors to Christianity.

In the north Christians reorganized the conquered peninsula into the kingdoms of Portugal, Castile, and Aragon. In 1139 Portugal became a separate kingdom independent of Castile. In 1037 Castile absorbed the kingdom of León and in 1479 united with Aragon under Ferdinand and Isabella. In 1162 Aragon joined with Catalonia (Barcelona) and became a maritime power with extensive Mediterranean interests. Navarre survived as a more or less independent state until it was absorbed by Aragon and France in 1512.

After Emperor Nicephorus II Phocas added Antioch to the Byzantine Empire in 969, the Fatimid caliphs of Tunisia moved to Cairo and the Umayyad caliphs of Córdoba extended their authority in the Maghreb. Diplomatic efforts by Córdoba kings were followed by sudden attacks against the Muslim frontier in northern Spain, which were answered, especially after the death of Caliph al-Hakam II (976), by al-Manzor using auxiliary troops from North Africa. The Reconquest then moved down from the Pyrenees and, with French help, had by 1085 taken Toledo, thereafter the capital of the Reconquest. After the conquests of the Balearic Islands (1229), Valencia (1238), Córdoba (1236), and Seville (1248), the Reconquest was complete except for the Moorish principality of Granada.

Segovia Cathedral visible through trees at left, designed by Juan Gil de Hontanon and Rodrigo Gil de Hontanon, built c. 1525–1590, and 1678, Segovia, Spain. (©Macduff Everton/CORBIS)

While some lands reconquered from the Muslims suffered little, others had to be resettled and defended. Initially repopulation was overseen by bishoprics and monasteries; later settlement was effected by the efforts of Cluniacs, Cistercians, and the Cistercian-affiliated military orders. Grants of fueros (privileges, franchises, and immunities), beginning in the 11th century, attracted settlers and provided law and government for areas far from royal control. The fueros, which reached a peak in the 12th and 13th centuries and declined c. 1300, modified the Visigothic Fuero juzgo, which Alfonso II (793–842) had restored as the basic law of the Reconquest. Under the influence of revived Roman law, efforts were made at legislative unity from the time of Ferdinand III (1217–52). The maze of charters and liberties accumulated in the peninsula over several centuries would be among the problems faced by Ferdinand and Isabella.

Papal Relations. In 918 Pope JOHN X sent a legate to Santiago to inspect the ancient Spanish (Mozarabic) rite. While the rite was approved in a Roman synod of 924 and at the Council of Mantua in 1067, Rome wanted it replaced by the Latin. The decree of the cardinal legate Richard and Alfonso VI (1078) was officially confirmed by the Council of Burgos (1080), and the Mozarabic rite survived only in chapels in Toledo and Salamanca. The popes also intervened in Spain because of civil wars and royal marriages within the forbidden degrees of kinship. Alfonso Enriquez of Portugal and Peter II of Aragon made themselves vassals of the Holy See and established special ties with Rome. Henry II of Castile and Peter IV of Aragon were neutral in the WESTERN SCHISM, which began in 1378, but collected papal revenues in Spain until the congresses of Alcalá and Barcelona chose to support the Avignon popes. Spain supported the Spanish-born Benedict XIII until 1416 (after his death in 1423 his relics were reported to work miracles.) The election of bishops, as a rule the privilege of cathedral chapters, by the 14th century came to be reserved to the popes with the kings having the right of presentation. Popes gave generously from the Church's wealth, derived from voluntary contribution and tithes, to assist the kings in their wars against the Moors. The royal third (two-ninths of the tithes) given to Alfonso X by Gregory X was made a perpetual gift by Alexander VI. More than 130 church councils were held in Spain between 711 and 1474.

Loyalist firing squad takes aim at statue of Jesus Christ surmounting cluster of religious figures, 1936, Cerro de Los Angeles, Spain. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Culture and Literature during the Medieval Period. During the early years of the Reconquest, Church cultural activity was at first generally restricted to copying MSS in monastic scriptoria, especially in Bobadilla, Cardena, Silos, Berlangas, Cuxa, Gerona, and Vich. The Visigothic script was used until suppressed by the Council of León in 1091, although Caroline minuscule appeared in Catalonia in the 9th century. As the frontier moved south and as relations with the rest of Europe increased, in part because of the pilgrimage route to Santiago de Compostela, cultural activity expanded and increased from the 11th century. Noteworthy Romanesque monasteries and churches were built in Ripoll, San Juan de las Abadesas, Lérida, Tarragona, Leyre, Jaca, Loarre, León, Palencia, and Santiago. In the 13th century Gothic cathedrals of note appeared in Burgos, Toledo, León, Barcelona, Palma de Majorca, and Gerona. Bishops sought to raise the level of their clergy through cathedral schools. Under Abp. Raymond of Toledo (1126–52) a school of translators transmitted Arabic learning into Latin. Under royal patronage universities were founded, replacing the cathedral schools: Palencia (1212), Salamanca (1220), Seville (1254), Valladolid (1260–64), Alcalá de Henares (1293), Lérida (1300), Huesca (1354), Perpignan (1354), Gerona (1446), and Saragossa (1474).

While the 13th century saw the founding of universities, mendicant orders fostered zeal, and RAYMOND OF PEÑAFORT opened a studium arabicum in Tunis (1250). Missionary activity was promoted not only for Moors and Jews in the peninsula but also for carrying the Gospel to foreign lands. Spanish missionary activity in Morocco was almost continuous from at least the 13th century. Mysticism and asceticism informed much of the spiritual life. Heretical and heterodox movements also appeared. Lucas of Tuý (d. 1249), a chronicler in León, wrote a treatise against the ALBIGENSES, who made some headway in Aragon and Catalonia. BEGUINES, FRATICELLI, and divers POVERTY MOVEMENTS appeared in Narbonne, Gerona, Barcelona, Tarragona, Valencia, Majorca, and elsewhere: disciples of PETER JOHN OLIVI, JOACHIM OF FIORE, Arnold of Villanova (d. 1311), and Philip of Majorca (d. c.1340). In response, Pope Gregory IX would begin the INQUISITION by asking Abp. Espárrago de Barca of Tarragona (d. 1233) to act against the heretics. The Inquisitor General Nicholas Eymerich (d. 1399) compiled a famous Directorium inquisitorum. The vernacular came to be a frequent vehicle for writings.

Unfinished interior of Gaudi's Sagrada familia, Barcelona, Spain. (©Macduff Everton/CORBIS)

Although much of the literature translated from Arabic was philosophical and philosophy and theology were of great importance in the universities, no outstanding Spanish theologians emerged during the early Middle Ages; Spanish literature for the most part consisted of historical chronicles and practical religious writings, apologetical or polemical treatises against Judaism and Islam, the vitae and miracles of saints, and sermons or treatises promoting a more perfect Christian life. Works of the 8th and 9th century may be regarded as Mozarabic, but thereafter Christian writings seem to come almost entirely from Christian Spain. Until the Reconquest was completed near the 13th century, Christian works, somewhat sparse, consisted mainly of HAGIOGRAPHY.

Judaism contributed substantially to Spanish letters, inasmuch as it occasioned many apologetical and polemical works and several converted Jews were prominent authors in the late Middle Ages. The Introduction to the Duties of Hearts by 11th-century Jew Bahya ibn Paqûda, of Córdoba or Seville, is a spiritual work of great value. Salvus (d. 972), abbot of ALBELDA, composed a rule for nuns and several liturgical writings. Oliva (d. 1046), abbot of Ripoll, founder of MONTSERRAT, and bishop of Vich, was a literary figure. Peter Alfonsi (1062–1140), a converted Jew of Huesca, composed a Disciplina clericalis in the form of a fabliau as well as a Latin dialogue against Judaism. Peter of Compostela imitated Augustine, Boethius, and Isidore of Seville in his De consolatione rationis (1140–50). The translator DOMINIC GUNDISALVI showed the influence of Arab philosophy in his De anima and De processione mundi. MARTIN OF LEÓN (d. 1203) left a large corpus of sermons.

FRANCISCANS and DOMINICANS were prominent in Spain in the later Middle Ages. In the former group, Raymond LULL (1232–1315) dominated the period, writing prolifically on a variety of subjects. John Gil of Zamora (c. 1300) composed a number of works in Latin and Castilian on the Blessed Virgin and saints. ALVARO PELAYO (1275–1349) wrote exhaustively in the interest of general Church reform. Francis Eximenis (1340–1409) composed mystical works in Catalan and Latin. The reformer Lope de Salinas (d. 1463) wrote spiritual guidance in Castilian. Among the Dominicans, founder St. DOMINIC GUZMAN (d. 1221) was himself a Spaniard. The famous Orientalist RAYMOND MARTINI (d. 1286), a converted Jew, composed among other works a treatise against Moors and Jews. Rodrigo el Cerratense (d. 1290) compiled a collection of vitae of Spanish saints that influenced later periods. The Vergel de consolación del alma o Viridario of James of Benavento (d. 1350), a study of sin and virtue, was influential in the development of Spanish literature. John of Monzon (d. 1412) and Sancho Porta (d. 1429) left works on the Blessed Virgin. Miracle worker St. VINCENT FERRER (1346–1419) composed a number of sermons and treatises. Cardinal Juan de TORQUEMADA (d. 1468) wrote a series of spiritual and theological works, while Antonio de Canals (d. 1418), Alfonso de San Cristobal (d. 1440), and Juan López (d. 1490) wrote on penitence and the spiritual life.

The Carthusian Boniface Ferrer (d. 1417), brother of St. Vincent, translated the Bible into Valencian for the first time, but as it lacked critical notes the edition was burned in 1478. Carmelites Guido Terrena (d. 1342), Francis Bacó (d. 1372), Juan Ballester (d. 1374), Francis Marti (d. 1390), and Philip Ribot (d. 1391) wrote sermons and works on the spiritual life, the Blessed Virgin, and on heretics and infidels. The Augustinian Bernard Oliver (d. 1348) composed an Excitatorium mentis ad Deum and a Tractatus de inquisitione Antichristi; and Lope Fernández de Minaya (d. after 1475) wrote on penitence and the spiritual life. The Mercedarian PETER PASCUAL (d. 1300), defender of the Immaculate Conception, left extensive apologetical writings in the vernacular; Antonio Tajal (d. 1417) composed a Rosa ad auroram on the Immaculate Conception. Lope de Olmedo (d. 1433) and Alfonso of Oropesa (d. 1478) wrote sermons and works of importance for Hieronymites.

Diego Garcia (1140–1218), chancellor of Castile, composed a Planeta in seven books in which, while discussing Christ the King, the Blessed Virgin, St. Michael, and peace in the Church, he criticized the morals of his time. The spiritual poetry of Gonzalo de Berceo (d. after 1246) is the earliest poetry in Castilian. The works of Alfonso de Valladolid (d. 1346), the first converted Jew to use the vernacular to defend his new faith, gave new impetus to preaching in Burgos. Pedro de Luna, Antipope BENEDICT XIII (d. 1423), left a Vitae humanae adversus omnes casus consolationes, a Liber de consolatione theologiae, and a Tractatus de horis dicendis per clericos. Pablo de Santa Maria (d. 1435), a converted rabbi and bishop of Cartagena and Burgos, turned to Holy Scripture to defend the Eucharist and the Blessed Virgin. His son, Alfonso of Cartagena (1384–1456), who succeeded him as bishop of Burgos, dealt with historical and religious matters in his works. The learned Alonso TOSTADO DE MADRIGAL (d. 1455), bishop of Ávila, was a prolific author of commentaries on Holy Scripture and treatises on the Mass. Alfonso Martínez of Toledo (d. 1470), archpriest of Talavera, is known chiefly for his satire on women, El Corbacho. Rodrigo Sánchez de ARÉVALO (d. 1470) composed the first history of Spain arranged according to papal reigns. The De confessione of Peter of Osma (d. 1480) was condemned by Sixtus IV for doctrinal errors. Pedro López de Ayala (1332–1407), chancellor of Castile whose contemporary chronicle deals with social institutions, was also a translator of works of Pope St. Gregory I, St. Isidore, and Boethius. The lay poet Juan de Mena of Córdoba (d. 1456) composed pieces on Virtues and Vices, on the Seven Deadly Sins, and a Laberinto in imitation of Dante. The works of Fernand Pérez de Guzmán (d. 1460), humanist, moralist, and poet, are also of religious interest.

Kingdom of Navarre. The people of the western Pyrenees, led by the kings of Pamplona, had retained their independence of Romans, Visigoths, Franks, and Moors; their land was both a buffer state and a bone of contention between Asturias-León-Castile and Aragon. Charlemagne razed Pamplona in 778 as he returned to the Saxon wars from his bootless expedition to Saragossa, but his rear guard was decimated by Basques in the pass of Roncevalles. Iñigo Arista in the early 9th century began a Christian dynasty that came to prominence with Sancho I Garcés (905–925). With Ordoño II of León in 917 Sancho defeated the emir of Córdoba and in 918 raided the upper Ebro valley. In 920 the emir defeated the two kings in the battle of Valdejunquera, sacked Pamplona, and replaced the Banu Kasi dynasty of Saragossa with the Tuchibis. In 924 Sancho founded the monastery of Albel-da, which soon became the cultural center of the Rioja; his son and daughter married into the dynasties of Aragon and Castile.

Beginning with Queen Tota's regency of her son García I Sánchez (925–970), Navarre intervened in the affairs of Castile and became allied with Muslim and Christian alike in an effort to obtain hegemony among the northern Christian kingdoms, siding with León and Castile in the victory over Córdoba at Simancas in 939. Sancho II Garcés (970–995), who enjoyed peace with Córdoba, endowed the monasteries of San Pedro de Sire-sa (971), San Andres de Cirueña (972), and San Juan de la Peña (983, 987), meanwhile extending Navarre's influence east to Ribagorza. The mother of Caliph Hisham II of Córdoba (976–1013) came from Navarre; and al-Manzor, actual ruler of Córdoba (981–1002), married princesses from León and Navarre. Almost all northern Spain was ruled by Sancho III Garcés the Great (1000–35), who introduced the CLUNIAN REFORM to San Juan de la Peña in 1020, restored the monastery of San Victorian and the bishoprics of Roda and Pamplona, and granted fueros to cities. He divided his realm among four sons: Ferdinand I in Castile, Ramiro I in Aragon, García III in Navarre, and Gonzalo in Sobrarbe and Ribagorza. García III Sánchez (1035–54), who made a pilgrimage to Rome, was slain by his brother Ferdinand in the battle of Atapuerca; and Sancho IV Garcés (1054–76), who allied with Aragon against Castile, was assassinated. The Navarrese then elected as king Sancho Ramírez (1076–94) to put an end to the invasion of their land by Alfonso VI of Castile. In 1060 the Council of Jaca was presided over by (St.) Austinde (1042–68), Archbishop of Auch. Auch was a metropolitan see having jurisdiction over Navarre and Aragon until the restoration of the See of Tarragona in 1118.

Sancho Ramírez, Peter I (1094–1104), and Alfonso I (1104–34) ruled Aragon and Navarre. García Ramírez (1134–50) and Sancho VI (1150–94) kept Navarre independent of Aragon and Castile. Sancho VII (1196–1234) traveled to Morocco in 1198 and 1199 to ally with the sultan against a Castile-Aragon alliance, and in 1202 he made an alliance with King John of England; but he sided with Castile in the victory over the Moors at Las Navas de Tolosa in 1212. On his death the Navarrese repudiated his agreement that Navarre should pass to James I of Aragon and elected as king his nephew, Thibault I of Champagne (1234–53), who favored the CISTERCIANS and made Pamplona a center of troubadours. Thibault II (1253–70) married Isabelle, the daughter of LOUIS IX OF FRANCE, and followed the French king on his crusades. From the marriage of Joan I (1274–1305), Thibault's niece, to PHILIP IV OF FRANCE in 1284 Navarre was ruled by the kings of France through French governors. The Évreux dynasty began with Philip III (1329–43), whose wife Joan waived her claims to the French throne. During the Hundred Years' War Charles II the Bad (1349–87) centralized the administration of Navarre and took an active part in events in France and Spain. In 1377 the Navarrese company under Louis of Évreux conquered Albania and then took over the conquests of the Catalan company in Greece, but its power declined by 1402. Under Charles III the Noble (1387–1425) Navarre enjoyed peace and justice. Charles's daughter Blanche (1425–42) was succeeded by her husband, John I (1442–79), the son of Ferdinand I of Aragon and a member of the Castilian house of Trastámara, and their son Charles of Viana (1442–61).

Amid civil war in Navarre John I succeeded in disinheriting Charles, who fled to Naples in 1455 but was unable to obtain help from Alfonso V, who died in 1458 leaving Aragon to John. Charles then tried to marry Isabella, sister of Henry IV of Castile, but was imprisoned by John; he was released after a general protest, but died suddenly. His sister and heir, Blanche, imprisoned by John, died in 1464. John was succeeded in Aragon by his son Ferdinand II, who had married Isabella of Castile in 1469, and in Navarre by his daughter Leonore (1479), married to the Count of Foix. Leonore was succeeded by her grandson Francis I (1479–83) and granddaughter Catherine (1483–1515), both minors under the regency of their mother Madeleine, sister of Louis XI of France. Catherine's marriage to Jean d'Albret in 1486 led to the occupation of Navarre by Ferdinand of Aragon and the loss of its independence (1512–15). The part of Navarre north of the Pyrenees went to France.

Asturias and León. The history of the Asturian kings is seated on a rivalry between Galicia and the Asturias and between the Church and the Crown. Alfonso I (739–757) reconquered lands stretching from Galicia to Castile, restoring episcopal sees and devastating areas he could not hold to leave a no-man's-land between Christians and Muslims that lasted through most of the Reconquest. Under Aurelius (768–774) there was an uprising of slaves against their masters, and Silo (774–783) had peace with the Moors "because of his mother." Alfonso II (793–842), friend of Charlemagne, resumed the war against the Muslims. He founded the See and cathedral of Oviedo, where he built churches and palaces in an attempt to make it the successor of Visigothic Toledo. During his time the tomb of St. JAMES (SON OF ZEBEDEE) was discovered in Santiago. Christian arms had great success under Alfonso III (866–909); during his reign Oviedo became a metropolitan see (874) and the basilica of Compostela was built (899). He abdicated and left his realm, comprising Galicia, León, and the Asturias, to his three sons. In 924 the three kingdoms were reunited under León.

Ramiro II of León (931–951), who built the monastery of San Salvador in León, defeated the new caliphate of Córdoba at Simancas (939) and at Talavera (950) but could not control the counts of Castile. The first cortes—a gathering of nobles and clergy—were held in León in 934 and 937. Sancho I the Fat (956–966) was cured of obesity in Córdoba (959) and obtained for León the relics of the martyr St. Pelagius of Córdoba (d. 925). Under Alfonso V (999–1028), who resumed the Reconquest after the death of al-Manzor, the politicoreligious Council of León (1020) granted the famous fuero of León. The royal dynasty became extinct at the death of Bermudo II (1028–37), and León went to Ferdinand I of Castile.

The counts of Castile, known from 824, had become independent of León as Fernán González (923–970) was closing his career. Sancho Garcés (995–1017), who made an entry into Córdoba in 1009 at the end of the caliphate, granted many fueros to towns. At the death of García Sanchez (1017–28) Castile reverted to Sancho III of Navarre (1028–35) and his wife. Their son Ferdinand I (1037–65), confirmed the fueros of Castile at the reform Council of Coyanza (1050). The Muslim rulers of Badajoz, Saragossa, Toledo, and Seville did homage to him. In 1062 Ferdinand obtained from Seville for his capital León the relics of St. ISIDORE, the father of Spanish learning. Ferdinand died besieging Valencia.

When Sancho II of Castile was treacherously killed at Zamora, Alfonso VI (1065–1109) returned from his refuge in Muslim Toledo. In 1085 he took Toledo, giving Valencia as a fief to its dispossessed ruler, receiving homage from a number of Muslim rulers, and calling himself “Emperor of the Two Religions.” The Almoravid Muslim zealots, called in from North Africa to stop the rout of Islam, devoted themselves to reorganizing a Muslim monarchy in the south and left Alfonso, who failed to take Saragossa in 1086, free in his own lands. There Alfonso supported the official change from the Visigothic or Mozarabic rite to the Roman. Valencia, taken in 1094 by Alfonso’s estranged vassal, El Cid, was yielded to the Almoravids in 1102 by El Cid’s widow. Alfonso died at the age of 79, the year after his only son was slain in the battle of Uclés (1108). The prowess of the half-legendary Cid (b. Burgos, c. 1040; d. Valencia, 1099), known through the Cantar or Poema de mio Cid and through later chronicles, was compared in an epitaph by Alfonso X with that of imperial Rome, King Arthur, and Charlemagne.

The heiress of Alfonso VI, Urraca (1109–26), daughter of Alfonso’s second wife, Constance of Burgundy, and widow of the count of Galicia, Raymond of Burgundy (d. 1107), had one of the most complicated reigns in Spanish history. She had to deal with the threat of Aragon in the person of her spouse, Alfonso I, until the annulment of their marriage in 1114; with revolt in Galicia, centering around the powerful archbishop of Santiago, Diego Gelmírez; and with the claims of Portugal, a county founded after the Almoravid victory at Lisbon in 1094 as a vassal of Galicia. Alfonso VII (1126–57), called Imperator of all Spain at the cortes of León in 1135, moved the frontier south to the Guadiana River. In 1142 at the peace of Zamora he recognized the independence of Portugal. He took Córdoba (1146) and, with help from Pisa, Genoa, and Montpellier, also Almería (1157), but he lost them to the fierce and destructive Almohads from North Africa who entered Spain to halt once again the march of Christian arms. Alfonso left his realm to two sons, Sancho II of Castile (1157–58) and Ferdinand II of León (1157–88).

Alfonso VIII of Castile (1158–1214), founder of the University of Palencia (1212), withstood a confederation of Navarre, Aragon, and León in 1191 and led Christians to a lasting victory over the Almohads at Las Navas de Tolosa in 1212. Neither León nor Portugal sent troops for the famous battle; and many French, Germans, and Italians left the widely proclaimed crusade in Spain that had won the support of INNOCENT III. When Alfonso died, the hegemony of Castile in Spain was clear. After 14-year-old Henry I (1214–17) was killed at play, his sister Berenguela abdicated in favor of her son by Alfonso IX of León, Ferdinand III (1217–30). Alfonso IX (1188–1230), founder of the University of Salamanca, had serious conflicts with the papacy over his marriages with Bl. THERESIA of Portugal and Berenguela of Castile.

The late Middle Ages in Castile were introduced by the triumphal reign of (St.) FERDINAND III, who, after its capture in 1248, made Seville his residence. Having defeated the Moorish fleet, he prepared to invade Morocco but was prevented by death. His last years were contemporary with the Crusade to Palestine and Egypt (1248–54) of Louis IX of France, son of Blanche of Castile (d. 1252). While an uprising of Andalusian Moors prevented ALFONSO X (1252–84) from invading Morocco, he also worked vainly to obtain the HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE (1256–75). When Alfonso’s support of the succession of his grandson Ferdinand de la Cerda over his second son Sancho caused him to be deposed in 1282, he allied with Morocco and France against Sancho, who found a ready ally in Aragon. Alfonso died in Seville. Sancho IV (1284–95) repelled an invasion from Morocco as Philip III of France, with papal blessing, led his ill-fated invasion of Aragon in retaliation for Aragon’s seizure of Sicily after the Sicilian Vespers (1282). Ferdinand IV (1295–1312), king at the age of nine, was succeeded by Alfonso XI (1312–50), who became king at one year of age. A Moroccan invasion of Spain was defeated on land and sea by Alfonso with help from Aragon and Portugal in 1340. With Abp. Gil ALBORNOZ of Toledo he reorganized Castile (1344–50), especially in the Ordenamiento of Alcalá (1348). In 1348 the Black Death took a heavy toll in Spain. On Alfonso's death at the siege of Gibraltar his policies were reversed under Peter I (1350–69), king at the age of 15.

Peter warred without success from 1356 against Aragon, France, Bertrand du Guesclin's free companies, and his rival Henry, eldest illegitimate son of Alfonso XI, of the house of Trastámara, which was to succeed also to the crown of Aragon in 1412. After slaying Peter and gaining the throne of Castile, Henry II Trastámara (1369–79) then had to fight against several Spanish cities—Portugal, Granada, Navarre, Aragon, and John of Gaunt (Duke of Lancaster)—all of which took advantage of the irregularity of his succession. He sent the Castilian fleet to aid France against England in the Hundred Years' War and was planning to complete the Reconquest when he was murdered. John I (1379–90), who became king at 21, continued naval aid to France and recognized the Avignon pope in the Western Schism. In 1383 he replaced the Spanish Era with the normal Christian chronology (A.D.), and in 1385 lost a chance to unite Spain and Portugal in the brutal battle of Aljubarrota. John died after falling from his horse. The accession of Henry III (1390–1406), who came to the throne at 11, was marked by massacres of Jews by the people of Seville, Córdoba, Toledo, and elsewhere (1391). Henry cleared the straits of Gibraltar of pirates (1400); sent embassies to the Ottoman Bajacét I and Tamerlane (1403); and added to the crown (1402–05) the Canary Islands, discovered in 1341. John II (1406–54), who became king at age two, continued the war against Granada. Ferdinand, his uncle and regent, became Ferdinand I of Aragon (1412–16); in 1418 John married Ferdinand's daughter María. Henry IV the Impotent (1454–74), king at 30, kept a large army but did little fighting against the Moors. With a claim to the throne of Navarre through his first wife Blanche, he offered his sister Isabella in marriage to Charles of Viana. The marriage of Isabella to Ferdinand of Aragon in 1469 augured that Castile's future lay with Aragon and its Mediterranean interests rather than with Portugal and its Atlantic and African discoveries. In 1470 Henry, who had repudiated Joan (la Beltraneja), born to his second wife Joan of Portugal, declared her legitimate and heir to Castile; but later he was reconciled with his sister Isabella.

Monarchical authority grew strong under Ferdinand III, who made Castilian the official language, published the Fuero juzgo in Castilian, and began work on a general legal code. Alfonso X and Alfonso XI continued this tradition; but the power of the nobles increased during the frequent regencies because of illegitimate royal offspring and royal protection of the families of concubines and favorites. The cortes, representing the main cities, the nobility, and the clergy, reached a peak under John I but declined under Henry IV; those of Castile and León continued to meet separately until 1301. Towns of democratic origins and seeking freedom from nobles and bishops reached a peak in the 13th and 14th centuries but declined in the 15th under the influence of Roman law. Hermandades or leagues of towns, originating in the fuero of Salamanca (c. 1200) and its association of 13 towns, were prohibited by the cortes of 1252; but in 1282 a hermandad of prelates and nobles was thriving. Hermandades of laborers, of public peace, and of ports on the Bay of Biscay also existed. The cortes of Guadalajara (1390) created a standing army. The regent Ferdinand used gunpowder and many machines of war at Zahara in 1408. From the time of Alfonso X, Castile, whose navy was stronger than that of the English, kept two fleets, one in the Bay of Biscay and one in the south.

The Crown of Aragon. The 9th-century county of Aragon, which derived its name from the Arrago River, became independent of Navarre in 1035, and had Saragossa as its capital after 1118. In 1137 it was united with Catalonia (Barcelona), whose counts had absorbed the Spanish March of the Carolingians. Aragon's basic interests were peninsular, Catalonia's Mediterranean. With the inclusion of Majorca (1229), Valencia (1238), Sicily (1282), Sardinia (1324), Athens (1311), and Naples (1442) Aragonese history became that of several kingdoms known as the Crown of Aragon.

Catalonia. Augustus had ruled the Roman Empire temporarily from Tarragona, capital of Tarraconensis; while Barcelona, Arian under the Visigoths, had close ties with Vandal North Africa. After Clovis broke Visigothic power in Gaul (507), the Ostrogoths of Italy intervened to divide France's Mediterranean coast between themselves and the Visigoths. Visigothic Septimania (Narbonne) and Tarraconensis were not successfully ruled from Toledo; the Arabs took Saragossa c. 713 and moved quickly down the Ebro to the sea. Count Fortunius of Tarragona became a Muslim and founded the Banu Kasi dynasty of Saragossa (replaced by the Tuchihi in 924), which became, in fact, an independent kingdom nominally dependent on Moorish Córdoba. Both Banu Kasi and Tuchihi married Christians and allied with Christians. After Charlemagne organized the kingdom of Aquitaine for Louis the Pious, the Franks began to attack Catalonia. Whole districts of refugee Visigoths migrated and settled Septimania by aprisiones, the occupation of land abandoned for 30 years, living under the Visigothic Forum iudicum. The Franks took Gerona in 785 and Barcelona in 801, building a road and establishing counties as they advanced.

Although Christian rule in Catalonia was interrupted only for about 80 years, extant hagiographical and liturgical traditions derive from sources mostly later than the 9th century. The civil and ecclesiastical reorganization was the work of Christians of the north under the Frankish king and the metropolitan of Narbonne; the Visigothic Church was not restored. Apparently, only Urgel's episcopal succession continued uninterrupted; bishops of Saragossa under Muslim rule appeared intermittently. Monastic foundations date from the 9th century, and a new church architecture, with Frankish influence, appeared. Dating according to the regnal years of French kings lasted until 1180. To offset Frankish influence Catalonia maintained ties with Córdoba, whose gold coinage was used in Barcelona.

As Carolingian power declined, the counts became hereditary and assumed sovereign prerogatives. Wifred, the first count of Barcelona free of the Franks, united the counties of Barcelona, Urgel (873), Gerona (894), and Cerdagne (895); took Montserrat from the Moors; gave charters to towns; founded the monastery of San Juan de las Abadesas (875); and revived that of Ripoll. The dynasty he founded lasted until 1410. Meanwhile, Visigoths and Mozarabs in Catalonia were seeking independence of the metropolitan of Narbonne. Count Borrell II (966–993), Gerbert of Aurillac, and Bp. Ato of Vich went to Rome in 970 and obtained metropolitan status and the pallium for Vich, Tarragona being still under the Moors; but the metropolitan dignity was not retained. Catalan relations with Capetian France (987), north Italy, and the papacy increased in the late 10th century. Under Ramón Berenguer I (1035–76) Barcelona's rule, through marriages, extended from the Ebro to the Rhone. In 1064 he supported the peace and the truce of God in a promulgation to an assembly of bishops, clergy, and laity. The Usatges, the customary law of Catalonia, were promulgated before 1068 and compiled after 1076 by a judge of his court.

The incongruous joint reign of Ramón Berenguer II, ally of Muslim Seville against Muslim Murcia in 1076, and Berenguer Ramón II, ally of Muslim Lérida against Muslim Saragossa in 1078, each to rule for six months of the year, ended with the former's assassination in 1082. Berenguer Ramón allied with Saragossa against El Cid's Valencia in 1089 and put himself in the service of Alfonso VI of Castile in 1092; in 1096, accused of his brother's murder by Ramón Berenguer III and defeated in trial by battle at Alfonso's court, Berenguer was deposed and joined the First Crusade to Palestine. Ramón Berenguer III (1096–1131), Count of Provence by marriage in 1112 and ally of Genoa, Pisa, and his mother's Norman Sicily, in 1118 restored the metropolitan See of Tarragona, to which the Norman Robert de Aquilo brought colonists and was made prince. In 1130 Abp. Olegarius brought the TEMPLARS to Catalonia. Ramón Berenguer IV married Petronilla of Aragon in 1137, and their son Alfonso II of Aragon began his rule in 1162.

Aragon. The county of Aragon, known from the 9th century, became a kingdom by the last testament of Sancho III of Navarre in 1035. The bishops of Aragon and Navarre, suffragan to Auch, called themselves bishops of Aragon until the reconquest of Huesca (1096), even though Jaca became a see in 1063. They were itinerant and followed the royal court in the Reconquest. Sancho I (1063–94), who succeeded Ramiro I (1035–63) and divided Navarre with Alfonso VI of Castile, granted many fueros to Christians who repopulated towns under him. Opposite Huesca, Sancho built (1086–89) the fortress monastery of Monte Aragon, subsequently one of the most important in Aragon. In 1071 he introduced the Roman liturgy in San Juan de la Peña and in 1073 his brother-in-law in Champagne, Ebles of Roucy, organized an impressive crusade against the Moors of Spain; the land he hoped to reconquer was to become a fief of the Holy See. Aragon became a papal fief in 1089, and documents thereafter were dated according to the regnal years of the popes, the feudal lords. With papal approval, Sancho distributed churches and monasteries in areas reconquered from the Moors favoring CLUNY; his authority was the basis for the kings of Aragon and Spain to claim tithes. Sancho died while besieging Huesca. Peter I (1094–1104) took Huesca (1096) and Barbastro (1101), occupied by the bishop of Roda with the authority of the old See of Lérida. In 1095 Urban II gave Peter and his successors exemption from episcopal authority for chapels and monasteries on which the king's warriors depended for their support. During Peter's reign the papacy intervened in a dispute between the canons of Saint-Sernin in Toulouse and monks of San Juan de la Peña over a church in Pamplona.

Alfonso I (1104–34), husband of Urraca of Castile, attacked the bishops of Burgos, León, Palencia, and Toledo and replaced the abbot of Sahagún with his brother Ramiro (1112). When he confiscated Church treasure, the people turned against him. He took Saragossa in 1118 with the aid of Frankish troops. On an appeal from the Christians of Andalusia c. 1125 he penetrated as far as Murcia and returned with 10,000 "Mozarabs" whom he resettled with fueros. Without heirs and on bad terms with Cluny and the monasteries of Castile and Aragon, Alfonso left Aragon to the Templars, KNIGHTS OF MALTA, and KNIGHTS OF THE HOLY SEPULCHER, who were defending the frontier. Indignant nobles and clergy brought his brother Ramiro II (1134–37) out of the cloister, where he may have received major orders, and elected him king at the cortes of Monzon. Without papal dispensation Ramiro married the daughter of the Duke of Aquitaine, and their daughter Petronilla in 1137 was given in marriage to Ramón Berenguer IV (1131–62) of Barcelona. In 1156 Ramón recognized his vassalage to the Holy See.

Aragon and Catalonia. In 1156 Ramón Berenguer fixed the south border of Murcia as the limit of Aragon's Reconquest. He died en route to the court of Emperor FREDERICK I in Turin to acknowledge Provence as a fief of the Empire. Alfonso II (1162–96) ended Aragon's vassalage to Castile by helping Castile conquer Cuenca and moved the royal pantheon from Ripoll to the Cistercian abbey of Poblet (founded 1150). Peter II (1196–1213), whose sister Constance, widow of the King of Hungary, married Emperor FREDERICK II, recognized Aragon as a fief of the Holy See when he was crowned by Innocent III in Rome (1204). After taking part in the victory of Las Navas de Tolosa (1212), he died at Muret defending the count of Albigensian Toulouse and several of his vassals against French crusaders, and Aragon's influence in southern France came to an end. James I (1213–76), who became king at six, was married to the daughter of the King of Hungary; he maintained commercial relations with Morocco and Tunis and restricted Genoese shipping in 1227 by forbidding Catalan cargos to travel on foreign ships for Ceuta, Syria, or Alexandria. He replaced Latin with Catalan as the official language. In 1229, despite Aragonese reluctance, he conquered Majorca, as RAYMOND OF TOULOUSE surrendered to the French regent Blanche of Castile in the treaty of Paris, and as Pope Gregory IX began a crusade against Frederick II. Valencia was reconquered (1232–38) and in 1244 a new treaty fixed the Castile-Aragon border for the Reconquest. After the marriage (1262) of James's heir, Peter, to Constance, daughter of Manfred of Sicily, over the objections of the Pope, of Louis IX, and of Alfonso X of Castile, an uprising of Moors took place in Andalusia and in Murcia (1263) that James and Alfonso put down by 1266. Peter III (1276–85), whose daughter married Denis of Portugal, held gages of peace with both Castile and France by his custody of the widow (Blanche of France) and the heirs of Ferdinand de la Cerda (d. 1277), claimant to the throne of Castile. In 1280 he set up a quasi protectorate over Tunis and in 1282 occupied Sicily after the Sicilian Vespers overthrew Charles of Anjou. In 1285 Philip III invaded Aragon with an army of 240,000 men, including 6,000 papal mercenaries, and took Gerona; but Aragon's victory over the French fleet, disease, and guerrilla warfare brought the expedition to ruin. Charles of Anjou, Philip III, Peter III, and Pope Martin IV all died in 1285.

Alfonso III (1285–91) was succeeded by his brother JAMES II OF ARAGON (1291–1327), who left his brother Frederick in Sicily to war against the house of Anjou. Thanks to Boniface VIII, James made a treaty with the Angevins in 1295 and in 1297 gained Corsica and Sardinia as well as the titles Admiral and Captain General of the Church. The end of the fighting in Sicily (1302) left Aragonese forces free to go to the East and begin the Catalan Company, which established the Duchy of Athens under the King of Sicily (1311–88). In 1312 the Templars were suppressed, their goods going to the Hospitallers; and in 1317 the KNIGHTS OF MONTESEA were founded in Valencia with the goods of both Templars and Hospitallers. Alfonso IV (1327–36) had to deal with a Genoese attack on Sardinia, which Aragon never held with success. Peter IV (1336–87) annexed the Balearics in 1344 and defeated a union of Aragonese nobles backed by Valencia in 1348. He reorganized the court of Aragon and sought to introduce Alfonso X's Siete Partidas into Aragon, but met strong feudal opposition. His Catalan translation of the Partidas, however, weakened the feudal position. John I (1387–95) fostered French art and vogues in his court. His brother Martin I (1395–1410) died without heirs, his son having died (1409) of poison in the war against Genoa in Sardinia. Delegates from Catalonia, Aragon, and Valencia in the Compromise of Caspe then chose as king Ferdinand of Antequera (1412–16), Regent of Castile, at a moment when the monarchy had become dominant in Aragon. Alfonso V (1416–58) used Aragon as a source of revenue for his wars in south Italy. The son of John II (1458–79), Ferdinand, married Isabella of Castile.

Majorca. The kingdom of Majorca (1276–1344), comprising the Balearics and the mainland counties of Roussillon, Cerdagne, and Montpellier, was the vassal of Aragon until annexed by Peter IV. It depended on Catalonia for its cortes and its coin, but the royal court in Perpignan was dominated by French influence. Majorca, where Raymond Lull founded a school of Oriental languages for missionaries, was an important cartographical center, participating in the Atlantic discoveries. A highly prized atlas of 1375, probably by the Majorcan Jew Abraham Cresques, described coasts in detail but gave little information on hinterlands. Jafuda Cresques, converted to Christianity in 1391, directed Prince Henry the Navigator's school at Sagres (Portugal). When Aragon lost Mediterranean naval supremacy to Italian cities and to the Turks, Majorca's prosperity declined.

The Crown of Aragon differed from Castile in that the monarchy was oligarchic rather than democratic. Its smaller but better-organized nobility never attempted to change the hereditary succession, but fought only to obtain more liberties for themselves. The important institution of the Justicia of Aragon, arbitrator between the king and his subjects, declined in time and became nominal. The question of Aragon's vassalage to the Holy See disturbed Church affairs in Aragon but did not affect orthodoxy. After introducing the Roman rite and the Gregorian reform, papal legates to Spain generally turned to keeping peace and organizing the ecclesiastical hierarchy under the feuding metropolitanates of Toledo, Tarragona, Braga, and Santiago. They later devoted themselves to the restoration of sees and to the organization of the war against the Moors. After 1100, relations increased between Rome and Spanish bishops, who grew stronger at the expense of Cluny and the Benedictines. The Cistercians, closely affiliated with Rome, arrived in Spain c. 1150 from Morimond and Clairvaux (later from Cîteaux), going first to the west of the peninsula and later to the east. The military orders, at their peak c. 1300, were associated with the Cistercians. Cathedral chapters in Aragon elected bishops until c. 1250, when episcopal appointments came into the hands of the popes and the kings. With the crown of Sicily, Aragon obtained the patronato of churches in the Holy Land. In 1318 Saragossa became a metropolitan see separate from Tarragona.

Bibliography: R. BEER, Handschriftenschatze Spaniens (Vienna 1894). España sagrada (Madrid 1747-). J. L. VILLANUEVA, Viage literario á las iglesias de España, 22 v. (Madrid 1803-52). E. R. ST.-HILAIRE, Histoire d'Espagne depuis les premiers temps historiques jusqu'à la morte de Ferdinand VII, 14 v. (rev. ed. Paris 1844-79). Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas, Estudios de Edad Media de la Corona de Aragón (Saragossa 1945-). H. FINKE, ed., Acta aragonensia, 3 v. (Berlin 1908-22). P. F. KEHR, ed., Papsturkunden in Spanien, 4 v. (Berlin 1926-28). D. MANSILLA, ed., La documentación pontificia hasta Inocencio III, 965-1216 (Monumenta Hispaniae Vaticana 1; Rome 1955). J. M. CASTROVIEJO BLANCO CICERÓN, Galicia: Guía espiritual de unatierra (Madrid 1960). F. VALLS-TABERNER and F. SOLDEVILA, Historia de Cataluña, 2 v. (Barcelona 1955-57). H. J. CHAYTOR, A History of Aragon and Catalonia (London 1933). J. PLA, Cataluña (Barcelona 1961). F. SOLDEVILA, Història de Catalunya, 3 v. (Barcelona 1962-). A. Lambert, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed., A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912-) 3:1378-86; 6:734-747. Encyclopedia of Islam, ed., M. T. HOUTSMA et al., 4 v. (Leiden 1913-38) F. J. SIMONET, Historia de los mozárabes de España (Madrid 1897-1903). M. GÓMEZ-MORENO, Iglesias mozárabes: Arte español de los siglos IX a XI, 2 v. (Madrid 1919). F. R. FRANKE, "Die freiwilligen Märtyrer von Cordova und das Verhältnis der Mozaraber zum Islam . . .," Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Kulturgeschichte Spaniens 13 (Span. Forschungen der Görresgesellschaft; 1958) 1-170. I. DE LAS CAGIGAS, Minorías étnico-religiosas en la Edad Media española, I. Los mozárabes, II. Los mudéjares, 4 v. (Madrid 1947-49). E. P. COLBERT, The Martyrs of Córdoba, 850-859: A Study of the Sources (Washington 1962). R. M. PIDAL, La España del Cid, 2 v. (4th ed. Madrid 1947). L. VÁZQUEZ DE PARGA et al., Las peregrinaciones a Santiago de Compostela, 3 v. (Madrid 1948-49). M. DEFOURNEAUX, Les Français en Espagne aux XIe et XIIIe siècles (Paris 1949). La reconquista española y la repoblación del país (Saragossa 1951). J. G. GAZTAMBIDE, Historia de la bula de la cruzada en España (Vitoria 1958). Acts of the Asturian Kings, ed. L. BARRAU-DIHIGO, in Revue hispanique 46 (1919) 1-191; 52 (1921) 1-360. A. C. FLORIANO CUMBREÑO, Estudios de historia de Asturias: El territorio y la monarquía en la alta edad media asturiana (Oviedo 1962). J. V. SUBIRATS, Alfons "el Cast": El primer comte-rei (Barcelona 1962). J. GONZÁLEZ, Alfonso IX, 2 v. (Madrid 1944); Elreino de Castilla en la época de Alfonso VIII, 3 v. (Madrid 1960). F. PIÉTRI, Pierre le Cruel (Paris 1961). L. S. FERNÁNDEZ, Castilla, el cisma y la crisis conciliar, 1378-1440 (Madrid 1960). J. M. LACARRA, Orígenes del condado de Aragón (Saragossa 1945). A. D. GUDIOL, La Iglesia de Aragón durante los reinados de Sancho Ramírez y Pedro I, c.1062-1104 (Rome 1962). C. M. LÓPEZ, Leyre: Historia, arqueología, legenda (Pamplona 1962). H. C. LEA, A History of the Inquisition of Spain, 4 v. (New York 1906-07). J. B. VINCKE, Zur Vorgeschichte der spanischen Inquisition: Die Inquisition in Aragon, Katalonien, Mallorca, und Valencia während des 13. und 14. Jahrhunderts (Bonn 1941). B. LLORCA, La inquisición en España (3d ed. Barcelona 1954). J. VANCE, The Background of Hispanic-American Law: Legal Sources and Juridical Literature of Spain (Washington 1937). R. B. DONOVAN, The Liturgical Drama in Mediaeval Spain (Toronto 1958).

[E. P. COLBERT]

SPAIN IN THE MODERN ERA

Ferdinand and Isabella unified the entire Iberian peninsula except for Portugal, which came under Spanish rule later (1580-1640). They organized political, religious, and cultural life more extensively than they had ever been; and Spain and Portugal built colonial empires that remained important in world history until the 19th century. After the Catholic sovereigns, Charles V combined Spain's military might and the wealth of the New World with Hapsburg power in central Europe to establish hegemony in Europe. Philip II elected to pursue this same goal from Spain, meanwhile developing the overseas possessions without serious threat from other powers. After Philip's death in 1598, however, Spain's empire in Europe declined, while England, France, and the Netherlands began to build colonial empires to compete with the Spanish-Portuguese monopoly. In the mid-17th century, France crushed Spain as a power in Europe, reducing Spain's role to that of a guerrilla force and an ally of occasional critical importance to the major powers.

The Bourbon accession to the throne of Spain in 1700 extended Castilian administration to all Spain and introduced an era of economic reform, especially under the enlightened despot Charles III. French military occupation of the peninsula and Napoleon's disrespect for the Spanish monarchy provoked the War of Independence (1808-14), which sapped France's effort to establish an empire in Europe. As a result of these years of war, Spain's overseas possessions became independent, except Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the Philippines, which were lost in the war of 1898. The Bourbon dynasty, interrupted between the constitutionally restive reign of Isabella II (1833–68) and that of Alfonso XII (1875–85), came to an end with the exile of Alfonso XIII (1886–1931). The political, social, and economic troubles of the 20th century gave rise to the dictatorship of Primo de Rivera (1923–30), the Republic (1931–36), the Civil War (1936–39), and the government of Francisco Franco. For much of the period after 1600 Spain's history is mainly that of a traditionalist nation dealing with liberal forces that had well-springs outside the peninsula.

Reform of Ferdinand and Isabella: 1474–1517.

The Catholic sovereigns Ferdinand and Isabella made Spain the prototype of the modern state and instituted a profound religious and ecclesiastical reform that served as a solid basis for the reform of the Church sought by all Christendom since the 14th century. Their focus on a close union of politics and religion illustrates the determining influence that the religious ideal of the Reconquest, terminated in 1492 with the conquest of Granada, played in the formation of Spain. Their esteem for the medieval religious ideal of unity was the historical justification for the decree of 1492 which expelled from Spain all 165,000 Jews who would not become Catholics, as well as for the policy whereby they obtained the mass conversion of the Moriscos in 1502 (see MARRANOS). (Despite this forced conversion, the religious, social, and political problem presented by the Moriscos would not be solved until the reigns of Philip II [1556–98] and Philip III [1598–1621].) The desire for unity was the basis for the sovereigns' decision to extend to all of Spain the tribunal of the Inquisition, conceded by Sixtus IV in 1478.

In their intrusion in ecclesiastical affairs Ferdinand and Isabella were supported by royal rights whose juridical bases, attested since the Siete Partidas of Alfonso X (1252–84, were recognized by the popes. Believing in the supreme power of the popes, they made it a point always to obtain not only papal agreement but papal support in bulls and briefs for everything they thought had to be done in the religious sphere. They regarded the people's private rights as an obligation of service, to foster and defend the purity of the Church. They submitted requests to the pope, albeit with the understanding that they had a right to what they requested. What conflicts they had with the Holy See did not violate this doctrinal basis, making their religious policy substantially different from that which had been pursued in the Crown of Aragon by Ferdinand's father, John II, and that eventually sought by 18th-century Regalists.

Thanks to this spirit and to the great churchmen who worked with the sovereigns—Hernando de Talavera, Diego de Deza, Cardinal MENDOZA, and especially Cardinal XIMÉNEZ DE CISNEROS—Spain achieved a profound ecclesiastical reform, as well as a real and productive approach to the new spirit of the Renaissance and humanism that was in perfect accord with the spirit of Christianity. The laicization of culture characteristic of the Italian and European Renaissance hardly showed itself in Spain. Such a basis made Spain the solid bastion of the COUNTER REFORMATION and the model state for the defense of Catholicism in Europe during the political-religious crisis of the 16th and 17th centuries, until the Peace of Westphalia in 1648.

Clerical Reform. The religious reform that began with the secular clergy was fostered and directed personally by the sovereigns. First, the feudal episcopacy was reformed. The bishops, some of whose lives were completely secular, had participated in the anarchy of the last previous reigns, intervening at times decisively in civil conflicts and court intrigues (e.g., Abp. Alfonso Carrillo of Toledo). These bishops, along with other nobles, were put down skillfully and forcefully. But the reform of the sovereigns, especially of Isabella, was more pastoral than political. From the beginning of her reign (Jan. 15, 1475) she outlined a plan of "appeal" to the pope in the matter of filling bishoprics and benefices "as seems best for the service of God and the good of the churches, and for the souls of all and the honor of the realm, and those appointed will be educated persons." Moreover, those chosen were almost without exception native Spaniards who resided in the country and devoted themselves to their pastoral duties. Many of the candidates, who had to be reputable persons, came from the middle class. In the defense of their "right" of presentation, the sovereigns came at times into quite violent conflict with popes: with Sixtus IV over the choice of his nephew Girolamo RIARIO for the See of Cuenca in 1482 and with Innocent VIII over Rodrigo BORGIA for that of Seville in 1484. In 1482 they came to a partial agreement with the papal legate Dominic Centurione without obtaining the right of PATRONATO, which was granted in 1483 by Innocent VIII for Granada, confirmed in 1493 by Alexander VI, and extended in 1523 by Adrian VI to CHARLES V for all Spain.

The result of this policy, at a time when little could be expected from the popes in the way of reform, was the high moral and cultural level of Spanish bishops, who in turn reformed the lower clergy after a plan outlined by the national assembly of the clergy convoked by the sovereigns in Seville in 1478 and by the cortes of Toledo in 1480. Many reformers were zealous, and a multitude of synods were held. The provincial synod of Aranda called in 1473 by Alfonso Carrillo, the synods of Toledo convoked in Alcalá and Talavera in 1497 and 1498 by Cisneros, and the synod of Palencia in 1500 summoned by Deza were especially noteworthy. The majority of bishops shared the positive ideals of clerical reform, fostering spiritual and cultural life and the reorganization of pastoral care. To carry out the reform, many colleges for the training of priests were founded: Sigüenza in 1476, Toledo in 1485, Granada in 1493, Seville in 1506, Alcalá in 1513, Salamanca in 1510 and 1517, and many more in the 16th century.

The reform of the religious, after an initial move inspired by Talavera (1475–92), began on a grand scale after 1495 under Cisneros with many bulls and briefs from Alexander VI. Directed primarily to Franciscans, it extended also to Cistercians, Benedictines, Dominicans, Augustinians, and, to a lesser degree, to Premonstratensians, canons regular, and others.

Cultural Advance. Cultural life too received a vigorous stimulus that lasted into later reigns, giving Spain a hegemony in theology and the humanities to accompany its political eminence. The central figure again was Cisneros, who in 1508 founded the University of Alcalá, the most important center of Spanish humanism, where the Church had access to the achievements of the Renaissance in literature, philology, and humanism and where free criticism and a wide representation (chairs of NOMINALISM and SCOTISM as well as THOMISM) were introduced into the teaching of philosophy and theology. The ideas of ERASMUS, whom Cisneros invited in vain to teach at Alcalá, had free scope. The Complutense POLYGLOT BIBLE (1502–14) was a typical example of this spirit.

All these elements brought about the introduction, on the spiritual plane, of the DEVOTIO MODERNA and the Erasmian ‘philosophy of Christ’ that so influenced later Spanish spirituality. The ideas were widely diffused even outside universities thanks to the new invention of printing, and people came into direct contact with Holy Scripture, the Fathers, and the best ascetic-mystic authors.

Isabella died in 1504, Ferdinand in 1516, and Cisneros in 1517. In less than 50 years (1474–1517) there had occurred in the ecclesiastical sphere a gigantic achievement that in retrospect appears to be the germ from which grew the Church of Spain (and Spain itself), especially in the 16th and 17th centuries.

Reform and Counter Reform: 1517–1700. The theological and spiritual renovation begun at Alcalá spread year by year. One of its merits was that it occasioned the reform of method and the institution of a theological dialogue in the University of Salamanca through the work primarily of Francisco de VITORIA (1480–1546) after 1526. This method was characterized by a criterion independent of and above the various schools, by the use of St. Thomas’ Summa as a text, by recourse to sources (Holy Scripture, acts of councils, Church teaching, etc.) and all the aids employed by the Renaissance and humanism, by simplicity of exposition, and by concern for problems of the time (the conquest of America, just war, etc.). Melchior CANO, OP (1509–60), systematized this method, and Domingo de SOTO, OP (1494–1560), composed the first great moral treatise. From this center in Salamanca went forth the great theological reform that produced figures such as Domingo BAÑEZ, OP (1528–1604), Diego LAÍNEZ, SJ (1512–65), Alfonso SALMERÓN, SJ (1515–85), Francisco SUÁREZ, SJ (1548–1617), and Alfonso de Castro, OFM (1495–1558), who systematized penal law. The profundity of Spanish theology was confirmed at the Council of Trent and is suggested by the number of Spaniards teaching in the Universities of Paris, Coimbra, Louvain, Rome, Ingolstadt, Prague, and others. This was one of Spain’s most important contributions to the reform of the universal Church.

The spiritual movement of Cisneros came to flower in the ascetic-mystic splendor of such figures as the Franciscans BERNARDINO OF LAREDO (d. 1565), Alfonso of Madrid (d. 1545), and FRANCIS OF OSUNA (d. 1540); the Dominican LOUIS OF GRANADA (d. 1568); the Carmelites St. TERESA (d. 1582) and St. JOHN OF THE CROSS (d. 1591); the Jesuits St. IGNATIUS (d. 1556), Alfonso RODRÍGUEZ (d. 1616), Luis de la Palma (d. 1616), ALVAREZ DE PAZ (d. 1620), and Luis de la Puente (d. 1624); the Benedictine abbot of Montserrat, García de CISNEROS (d. 1510); the Augustinians St. THOMAS OF VILLANUEVA (d. 1555) and Luis de LEÓN (d. 1591); and the secular priest Bl. JOHN OF ÁVILA (d. 1569), confessor of saints. The reform of religious orders continued, Franciscans by St. PETER OF ALCÁNTARA (d. 1562) and Carmelites by St. Teresa and St. John. New orders were founded, the Jesuits by St. Ignatius and the clerics of Pious Schools by St. JOSEPH CALASANCTIUS (d. 1648).

A byproduct of the mysticism fostered by Cisneros was the heterodox Illuminist Movement of the ALUMBRADOS among the masses and converted Jews and Moors, especially in New Castile, suppressed by the Inquisition from 1524. The Erasmian spirit of reform dominant in the bourgeoisie and intellectual circles determined the religious policy of Charles V (1516–56) in the Empire, through the influence of Erasmus himself and the Spanish Erasmists Juan Luis Vives, Alfonso and Juan de VALDÉS, and Vice Chancellor Miguel May, educated in Barcelona.

Charles V. Charles’s plan of empire did not entail a universal empire or monarchy, but rather the hegemony of an emperor who maintains peace among Christians to be able to war against infidels, an ideal shaped by Ferdinand and Isabella in their testaments and proposed to Charles in 1516 by First Secretary of State Pedro de Quintana. In 1520 Charles declared Spain to be ‘the fortress, defense, wall, refuge, and final security” of his other realms and lands; and all the spiritual and material resources of Spain, including gold from America, did service for the religious policy of the emperor. This policy, based on the ideals of Erasmus, sought a reconciliation among Christian princes and between Catholics and Protestants, while promoting an ecclesiastical reform to restore religious unity. But Spanish and imperial policy failed in both respects. France, German princes, and even the popes opposed the political aims of the emperor, who was only partly successful against them in wars in France, Germany, and Italy. In the religious sphere the Protestant position became radical in Calvinism, supported by German princes and the French king, who saw in Protestant particularism the basis for the struggle of autonomous states against Charles’s pet idea of empire. Important but relative triumphs were the convocation of the Council of Trent by Paul III, the first two stages of which (1545–49, 1551–52) constituted the last attempt at religious conciliation; and the uncertain but generally positive course of the war against the Turks. The treaty of Passau (1552) and the religious peace of Augsburg (1555) made the religious division of Europe definite, and thus ruined the imperial policy of Charles V. With this bitter medicine, in 1556 he abdicated from the Empire and left Spain and its dominions to his son Philip II.

Philip II. The failure of the conciliatory policy resulted in loss of status for Erasmists in Spain. They gained a political victory in Valladolid in 1527, but opposition to them increased until, in 1530, the Inquisition began to investigate charges of illuminism and Lutheranism against large numbers of Erasmists. A fear of Protestant infiltration developed, reaching its height under Philip II, whose religious policy was modeled completely on the Counter Reformation, the product of the third stage of Trent (1562–63) and the inevitable consequence of the collapse of the ideals of empire. Spain, cooperating closely with Archduke Ferdinand I, who succeeded to the Empire, became a kind of fortress and paladin state in the fight against Protestantism and the infidel Turks. The Inquisition, spurred on and supervised by the king, suppressed the only Protestant centers of any importance, Valladolid and Seville, in 1559–60 and, with a zeal explained only by the great fear, prosecuted anything that indicated connivance with the ideas of Luther and Erasmus: such as Holy Scripture in the vernacular, commentaries on Scripture for the laity, ascetic and mystical writings tainted with illuminism.

Along with persons and movements undoubtedly of Protestant origin or heterodox tendency (the alumbrados of Llerena, 1574–78), persons undeniably orthodox (Bl. John of Ávila, St. Teresa, St. John of the Cross, Luis de León) were subjected to the scrutiny of the Inquisition.

A typical example of the fear and the impassioned religious fervor then prevalent in Spain appears in the dramatic trial of Abp. Bartolomé de CARRANZA of Toledo (d. 1576), which offered an outlet for the personal enmity of the Inquisitor Fernando de Valdés, Melchior Cano, and others, while providing Philip II with the opportunity to defend the Spanish Inquisition with regard to the papal tribunal. Philip’s prohibition against Spaniards studying in universities abroad in 1559 (renewed in 1568) may have kept heresy out, but it also isolated Spain from the current of European thought until the 18th century. The Wars of Religion fought all over Europe were a gigantic effort and had some spectacular victories, but they had no chance of bringing about the triumph of the Christian policy of Philip “the Prudent.” The only substantial victory, the naval defeat of the infidel Turks at Lepanto (Oct. 7, 1571), was not lasting. The Moriscos, constantly conspiring with the Turks against the security of the Spanish state, were more a political than a religious problem. Philip II’s attempt to handle them by mass conversion not only failed but worked against him. Philip III’s expulsion of about 300,000 of them between 1609 and 1614 was also more for political than for religious reasons.

Philip’s concern for domestic church matters appears in his negotiations with the Holy See to obtain new dioceses: Orihuela (1564), Barbastro and Jaca (1571), Teruel (1577), Solsona (1593), Valladolid (1595), and the division of Albaracín and Segorbe (1577). The decrees of the Council of Trent, officially received on July 12, 1564, were applied through provincial councils: Tarragona in 1564; Toledo, Valencia, Salamanca, Granada, and Saragossa in 1565; and Toledo in 1581–82. Spain’s great reform bishops at Trent were Martín López de Ayala, Bernardo de Sandoval y Rojas, Pedro Guerrero, and Ber-nal Díaz de Luco. Among others deeply moved by spiritual and pastoral zeal for reform who were not at Trent should be noted Abp. Juan de Ribera of Valencia (d. 1611).

The Council of Trent was accepted “saving the rights of king and country”: meaning except rights linked to the patronato real over dioceses and certain benefices; the royal exequatur and placet introduced by Charles V in 1523, 1528, and 1543; recursos de fuerza, or appeal from ecclesiastical to civil tribunals; and other items. All this constituted the basis of the Regalism thought out and scientifically systematized by Diego Covarrubias (d. 1577) and later canonists, which, sponsored by the state, gave rise to serious conflicts with the Holy See in the 17th century, especially under Philip III (1598–1621) and Philip IV (1621–65). The most serious crisis, that caused by the defense of the Spanish crown in Rome by Bp. Domingo Pimentel of Córdoba and Juan Chumacero y Carrillo in 1633, led to the breaking of relations and the closing of the papal nunciature in 1639. The Facchinetti concordat ended the crisis with a concession by the Holy See with regard to the privileges of its nunciature. Civil courts were showing themselves more and more opposed to ecclesiastical immunities.

Decline. Meanwhile Spain's economic and political fall was in course: the defeat at Rocroy in 1643, the Peace of the Pyrenees in 1659, the Portuguese independence of 1640 finally recognized in 1668. Spain's European religious policy came to ruin with the treaties of Westphalia in 1648. The theological idealism represented in Spain's combined defense of Catholicism and of the supremacy of the state was cause enough for her general collapse. Still, Spain's religious spirit lasted well into the 17th century and inspired another golden century of the arts, expressed in the transcendent painting of El Greco (d. 1614), the polychrome sculptures of Gregorio Fernández (d. 1636), Martínez Montañés (d. 1649), and their disciples, and the writings of priests Lope de Vega (d. 1635), Tirso de Molina (d. 1648), and Calderón de la Barca (d. 1681). There also unfortunately existed an inordinate concern among bishops for precedence and prestige, an excessive number of clerics, inadequately trained and lacking apostolic zeal, and an abundance of superstition among an inadequately instructed laity. To offset this laxity, prelates such as Ven. Juan de PALAFOX Y MENDOZA (d. 1659) worked zealously to evangelize their dioceses, fostering FORTY HOURS DEVOTION to the Eucharist, sponsoring groups such as the School of Christ to encourage piety and prayer, and making special use of religious orders for missions and teaching (St. VINCENT DE PAUL's Congregation of the Mission, St. Philip NERI's Oratory). Popular missions were preached by Jesuits Baltasar Gracián (d. 1658), Jerónimo López (d. 1658), and Tirso GONZÁLEZ (d. 1705), the last a Jesuit general known for his opposition to probabilism in moral theology. The widely known mystic teachings of Ven. Mary of ÁGREDÁ (d. 1665) inspired the painting of J. Ribera (d. 1659), F. Zurbarán (d. 1662), and B. Murillo (d. 1682).

Regalism and Enlightenment: 1700–1808. The heightened Bourbon Regalism, given perfect expression by Melchor de Macanaz, produced a deep split in the Spanish episcopacy that would last until the late 19th century. When Philip V (1700–46) broke relations with the Holy See in 1709, the split became open. Opposed to the king were the primate, Cardinal Portocarrero of Toledo; the archbishops of Seville, Granada, and Santiago; and in particular Bp. (future cardinal) Luis Belluga of Cartagena (d. 1743). In conflict with these ultramontanes were bishops who championed the most blatant regalism, actively represented by Francisco de Solís (d. 1716), Bishop of Lérida and later of Córdoba. A middle group, called Jansenists later in the century, while Regalist and influenced by the Enlightenment, maintained a true Christian spirit and a deep devotion to the Church. This spiritual synthesis differentiated the Spanish from the general European Enlightenment. The crisis of 1709 embittered the movement against clerical privilege and ecclesiastical immunity. After the sterile concordats of 1717 and 1737, that of 1753 recognized the patronato real in its fullest extension in return for insignificant concessions by the Spanish government.

This Christian Enlightenment was guided by Benijo Feijoo (d. 1764), who spearheaded the enormous historic-oecclesiastical work of a generation of scholars. The belief in the right of the state to many of its claims against ecclesiastical immunity and in the ideals of progress and patronage of culture under an enlightened despot—the best example of which was Charles III (1759–78)—were shared by many Christians. They were also shared by some members of the clergy and bishops, such as those who in 1765 endorsed the Tratado de la regalía de amortización by statesman and economist Pedro Rodríguez de Campomanes (1723–1803) and those who approved the expulsion of the Jesuits in 1767. Perhaps the best representative of this group was Bp. Philip Bertrán of Salamanca (d. 1783), who was supported by many close associates, such as Bp. José Climent of Barcelona (d. 1782) and Abp. Francisco Armañá of Tarragona (d. 1803). Marked by great pastoral zeal, they were concerned with the education of the clergy, preaching, and the catechetical instruction of the faithful. Seminaries thrived, especially after the expulsion of the Jesuits, many of whose houses were converted to seminaries. Preaching became simpler and more practical, prompted by the keen criticism of José Francisco de Isla, SJ (d. 1781). Models of the new style were the Jesuit Pedro of Calatayud (d. 1773) and the Capuchin Bl. DIEGO OF CÁDIZ (d. 1801). The clergy were numerous (172,231 according to a census of 1797), but only about 20,000 devoted themselves to pastoral care; the faithful held the rural pastor in very high esteem. Several religious orders did service in education and social work, areas to which the state still paid little heed.

Moderates lost ground with the outbreak of the French Revolution in 1789. In the last years of Charles IV (1788–1808) religious policy was determined by extremist Regalist ministers, supported by Félix Amat (d. 1824), titular Archbishop of Palmyra, the priests Joaquin Lorenzo Villanueva and J. A. LLORENTE, and others. Such clergy, espousing Regalist and episcopal (even heterodox) views, almost provoked a national schism in 1799.

Years of Violence: 1808–1936. Spaniards continued to be both good Christians and attached to the traditional ways and institutions of the Church, as they showed in the War of Independence against Napoleon (1808–13), when they defended their religious ideas as well as their country. But in the constitution of the cortes of Cádiz in 1812 the extremist ideas of the French Revolution triumphed over those of enlightened despotism. More than half the 2,128 monasteries were suppressed, freedom of the press was declared, and the Inquisition was abolished. While Ferdinand VII (1813–33), on his return in 1814, abrogated these measures and installed unrestrained absolutism, six years later revolutionists forced the reimplementation of the constitution of Cádiz with all its consequences: the Jesuits were again expelled, many bishops were exiled, and relations with the Holy See were broken. In 1823 absolutism was restored with French intervention (the 100,000 sons of St. LOUIS IX). Things were made worse by the dynastic war between Carlists and liberals, who in 1835 renewed the measures against monasteries, further restricted ecclesiastical liberties, and issued laws of amortization, confiscating much church property; it was the final act of a campaign by the state that had gone on for centuries and had been especially hard in the 1700s. Convents were burned, religious were murdered in Madrid (1834), Saragossa, Murcia, Barcelona, and elsewhere (1835), and several bishops were exiled in the bloody persecution of the Church.

The Concordat of 1851 made Catholicism the only recognized religion in Spain and revised the map of Spanish dioceses; the Church renounced the amortized property, and the state agreed to subsidize cult and clergy; the king retained his right of patronato unrestricted. In the Liberal period 1854 to 1856 persecution was renewed, and the revolts of 1868 and the fanatic character of the first Republic (1873–74) made the concordat practically useless. The situation of the Church became more difficult with the political-religious split of Catholics and clergy into traditionalists (liberal conservatives or liberal Catholics) and integralists. Neither the advice of great thinkers such as Jaime BALMES (d. 1848) and J. F. DONOSO CORTÉS (d. 1853), nor the good intentions of certain governors, nor the warnings of Pius IX and Leo XIII could mend the split. The most important cultural and political figures of the late 19th and early 20th century were shaped in the Free Institute of Education, founded by Francisco Giner de los Ríos, which introduced new pedagogical methods into Spain and provoked a real cultural renaissance. Unfortunately, it was basically laicist and antireligious. Apologetics and polemics dominated the Catholic field, the greatest positive contribution being by M. Menéndez y Pelayo (d. 1912).

A spiritual and cultural renaissance of the Church marked the end of the 19th century, thanks especially to religious orders: the Augustinian university in the ESCO-

RIAL (1893), the Jesuit Faculties of law and letters in Deusto (1886), the pontifical university of Comillas (1890), and the pontifical Spanish college in Rome (1892). St. Anthony M. CLARET (d. 1880) and P. Tarín, SJ (d. 1910), were apostles of the people. Catholic socialism had a forerunner in Anthony Vincent, SJ (d. 1912), but neither he nor his followers could form a unified organization or infuse the Christian spirit into worker movements, which since 1843 had drifted away from the Church. The only organized general movement, albeit composed of minorities, was that conceived by Angel Ayala, SJ, and put into practice by Angel Herrera, Bishop of Malaga after 1947, who founded the national Catholic Action of Propagandists (1909) and organized Catholic Action (1924)—both events of prime importance in the religious life of 20th-century Spain.

In the first decades of the 20th century, popular manifestations of Catholicism alternated with persecution by anticlerical governments. After the dictatorship of Primo de Rivera (1923–30) brought years of religious peace, the Republic was installed in 1931. Its fanatic character quickly appeared in the burning of convents in Madrid, Málaga, and elsewhere (May 1931). A discriminatory constitution was voted into law, the Jesuits were dissolved, the cardinal primate of Toledo was expelled, and the state confiscated all church goods. A Catholic reaction in 1933 under José María Gil Robles was annulled in February 1936 by revolutionary forces who began a regime of anarchy and terror.

National Movement: 1936–39. The National Movement begun on July 18, 1936, under General Francisco Franco was designed to remedy the political and social situation created by the Republic. Begun as a military insurrection to restore legality and order, it evolved into the Spanish Civil War (1936–39). For many it also became a religious war in defense of Catholicism and the Church, as the episcopate solemnly declared in a common letter in 1937. In response, violent religious persecutions were systematically carried out. Under José Giral (July 20–Oct. 4, 1936) 2,600 secular priests (12 bishops), 1,200 religious, and 100 nuns were murdered. Under Largo Caballero, the “Spanish Lenin” (Oct. 4, 1936–May 18, 1937), 1,400 priests, 1,130 religious, and 150 nuns were murdered. Countless laymen died simply because they were Catholics; to carry a religious object (crucifix, medal, rosary) was reason enough to be killed. By the end of the war 6,832 clerics (4,184 secular, 2,365 religious, and 283 nuns) were dead, called genuine martyrs by Pius XI. Meanwhile a clandestine ecclesiastical and religious life was organized; Mass was celebrated, the Sacraments administered, and mutual aid provided, in areas such as the Dioceses of Madrid and Barcelona, with an extraordinary precision in organization.

The common letter of the episcopate noted, in 1937: "The Church, although peaceful of nature and neither desiring nor participating in the war, could not be indifferent in the struggle. . . . One side seeks to suppress God, whose work the Church is to do in this world, and works great harm to the Church in persons, things, and rights, such as probably no institution in history has suffered. The other side, despite human deficiencies, is the force seeking to preserve the old life, Spanish and Christian." Accordingly, Catholic forces joined Franco's National Movement, excepting only separatist Basque Catholics seeking autonomy. Pius XI (Sept. 14, 1936) blessed "those with the difficult and dangerous task of defending and restoring the rights and honor of God and religion, that is to say, the rights and dignity of men's consciences." In the months following, pastoral letters on the spiritual value of the Movement multiplied: "The Two Cities" by Bp. Play Deniel of Salamanca (Sept. 30, 1936); the many documents of Cardinal Isidro Gomá of Toledo, among them "The Case of Spain" (Oct. 23, 1936), "Spain's Lent" (Jan. 30, 1937), and "Lessons of War and Obligations of Peace" (Aug. 8, 1939). But the Church did not intend to "guarantee the conduct, aims, or intentions that in the present or future might disfigure the noble visage of the National Movement in its origin, its course, and its ends."

