

NEW CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

NEW CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

SECOND EDITION

6
Fri-Hoh

THOMSON
—★—™
GALE

Detroit • New York • San Diego • San Francisco • Cleveland • New Haven, Conn. • Waterville, Maine • London • Munich

in association with
THE CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA • WASHINGTON, D.C.

The New Catholic Encyclopedia, Second Edition

Project Editors

Thomas Carson, Joann Cerrito

Editorial

Erin Bealmear, Jim Craddock, Stephen Cusack, Miranda Ferrara, Kristin Hart, Melissa Hill, Margaret Mazurkiewicz, Carol Schwartz, Christine Tomassini, Michael J. Tyrkus

Permissions

Edna Hedblad, Shalice Shah-Caldwell

Imaging and Multimedia

Randy Bassett, Dean Dauphinais, Robert Duncan, Leitha Etheridge-Sims, Mary K. Grimes, Lezlie Light, Dan Newell, David G. Oblender, Christine O'Bryan, Luke Rademacher, Pamela Reed

Product Design

Michelle DiMercurio

Manufacturing

Rhonda Williams

Indexing

Victoria Agee, Victoria Baker, Francine Cronshaw, Lynne Maday, Do Mi Stauber, Amy Suchowski

© 2003 by The Catholic University of America. Published by Gale. Gale is an imprint of The Gale Group, Inc., a division of Thomson Learning, Inc.

Gale and Design™ and Thomson Learning™ are trademarks used herein under license.

For more information, contact
The Gale Group, Inc.
27500 Drake Rd.
Farmington Hills, MI 48331-3535
Or you can visit our Internet site at <http://www.gale.com>

While every effort has been made to ensure the reliability of the information presented in this publication, The Gale Group, Inc. does not guarantee the accuracy of the data contained herein. The Gale Group, Inc. accepts no payment for listing; and inclusion in the publication of any organization, agency, institution, publication, service, or individual does not imply endorsement of the editors or publisher. Errors brought to the attention of the publisher and verified to the satisfaction of the publisher will be corrected in future editions.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS CATALOGING-IN-PUBLICATION DATA

New Catholic encyclopedia.—2nd ed.
p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and indexes.

ISBN 0-7876-4004-2

1. Catholic Church—Encyclopedias. I. Catholic University of America.

BX841 .N44 2002
282'.03—dc21
2002000924

ISBN: 0-7876-4004-2 (set)
0-7876-4005-0 (v. 1)
0-7876-4006-9 (v. 2)
0-7876-4007-7 (v. 3)
0-7876-4008-5 (v. 4)

0-7876-4009-3 (v. 5)
0-7876-4010-7 (v. 6)
0-7876-4011-5 (v. 7)
0-7876-4012-3 (v. 8)
0-7876-4013-1 (v. 9)

0-7876-4014-x (v. 10)
0-7876-4015-8 (v. 11)
0-7876-4016-6 (v. 12)
0-7876-4017-4 (v. 13)
0-7876-4018-2 (v. 14)
0-7876-4019-0 (v. 15)

Printed in the United States of America
10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

For The Catholic University of America Press

EDITORIAL STAFF

Executive Editor

Berard L. Marthaler, O.F.M.Conv., S.T.D., Ph.D.

Associate Editor

Gregory F. LaNave, Ph.D.

Assistant Editors

Jonathan Y. Tan, Ph.D.

Richard E. McCarron, Ph.D.

Editorial Assistant

Denis J. Obermeyer

Director of The Catholic University of America Press

David J. McGonagle, Ph.D.

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

John Borelli, Ph.D., Associate Director of Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, Washington, D.C.

Drew Christiansen, S.J., Ph.D., Senior Fellow, Woodstock Theological Center,
Washington, D.C.

Anne M. Clifford, C.S.J., Ph.D., Associate Professor of Theology, Duquesne University, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania

Raymond F. Collins, M.A., S.T.D.,
Professor of New Testament, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

Cyprian Davis, O.S.B., S.T.L., Ph.D.,
Professor of Church History, Saint Meinrad
School of Theology, Saint Meinrad, Indiana

Dennis M. Doyle, Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religious Studies, University of Dayton, Dayton, Ohio

Angelyn Dries, O.S.F., Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religious Studies, Cardinal
Stritch University, Milwaukee, Wisconsin

Arthur Espelage, O.F.M., J.C.D., Executive Coordinator, Canon Law Society of America, Washington, D.C.

Eugene J. Fisher, Ph.D., Associate Director of Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, United States Conference of Catholic Bishops,
Washington, D.C.

Edward J. Furton, Ph.D., Editor-in-Chief,
The National Catholic Bioethics Quarterly,
Brighton, Massachusetts

James F. Garneau, Ph.D., Academic Dean,
The Pontifical College Josephinum,
Columbus, Ohio

J. A. Wayne Hellmann, O.F.M.Conv., Dr.
Theol., Professor of Theological Studies, St.
Louis University, St. Louis, Missouri

Joseph T. Kelley, Ph.D., D.Min., Director of the Center for Augustinian Study, Merrimack College, North Andover,
Massachusetts

Judith M. Kubicki, C.S.S.F., Ph.D.,
Assistant Professor of Theology, Fordham University, Bronx, New York

William P. Loewe, Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religion and Religious Education, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

Rose M. McDermott, S.S.J., J.C.D., Associate Professor of Canon Law, The Catholic University of America,
Washington, D.C.

R. Bruce Miller, M.S.L.S., Head,
Theology/Philosophy, Canon Law Libraries,
The Catholic University of America,
Washington, D.C.

Francis J. Moloney, S.D.B., S.T.L., S.S.L., D.Phil., Professor of Biblical Studies, The Catholic University of America,
Washington, D.C.

Katherine I. Rabenstein, B.S.F.S., Senior
Credentialing Specialist, American Nurses Association, Washington, D.C.

Joel Rippinger, O.S.B., M.A., S.T.L., Subprior, Marmion Abbey, Aurora, Illinois

Foreword

This revised edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia represents a third generation in the evolution of the text that traces its lineage back to the Catholic Encyclopedia published from 1907 to 1912. In 1967, sixty years after the first volume of the original set appeared, The Catholic University of America and the McGraw-Hill Book Company joined together in organizing a small army of editors and scholars to produce the New Catholic Encyclopedia. Although planning for the NCE had begun before the Second Vatican Council and most of the 17,000 entries were written before Council ended, Vatican II enhanced the encyclopedia's value and importance. The research and the scholarship that went into the articles witnessed to the continuity and richness of the Catholic Tradition given fresh expression by Council. In order to keep the NCE current, supplementary volumes were published in 1972, 1978, 1988, and 1995. Now, at the beginning of the third millennium, The Catholic University of America is proud to join with The Gale Group in presenting a new edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia. It updates and incorporates the many articles from the 1967 edition and its supplements that have stood the test of time and adds hundreds of new entries.

As the president of The Catholic University of America, I cannot but be pleased at the reception the NCE has received. It has come to be recognized as an authoritative reference work in the field of religious studies and is praised for its comprehensive coverage of the Church's history and institutions. Although Canon Law no longer requires encyclopedias and reference works of this kind to receive an imprimatur before publication, I am confident that this new edition, like the original, reports accurate information about Catholic beliefs and practices. The editorial staff and their consultants were careful to present official Church teachings in a straightforward manner, and in areas where there are legitimate disputes over fact and differences in interpretation of events, they made every effort to insure a fair and balanced presentation of the issues.

The way for this revised edition was prepared by the publication, in 2000, of a Jubilee volume of the NCE, heralding the beginning of the new millennium. In my foreword to that volume I quoted Pope John Paul II's encyclical on Faith and Human Reason in which he wrote that history is "the arena where we see what God does for humanity." The New Catholic Encyclopedia describes that arena. It reports events, people, and ideas—"the things we know best and can verify most easily, the things of our everyday life, apart from which we cannot understand ourselves" (Fides et ratio, 12).

Finally, I want to express appreciation on my own behalf and on the behalf of the readers of these volumes to everyone who helped make this revision a reality. We are all indebted to The Gale Group and the staff of The Catholic University of America Press for their dedication and the alacrity with which they produced it.

Very Reverend David M. O'Connell, C.M., J.C.D.
President
The Catholic University of America

Preface to the Revised Edition

When first published in 1967 the New Catholic Encyclopedia was greeted with enthusiasm by librarians, researchers, and general readers interested in Catholicism. In the United States the NCE has been recognized as the standard reference work on matters of special interest to Catholics. In an effort to keep the encyclopedia current, supplementary volumes were published in 1972, 1978, 1988, and 1995. However, it became increasingly apparent that further supplements would not be adequate to this task. The publishers subsequently decided to undertake a thorough revision of the NCE, beginning with the publication of a Jubilee volume at the start of the new millennium.

Like the biblical scribe who brings from his store-room of knowledge both the new and the old, this revised edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia incorporates material from the 15-volume original edition and the supplement volumes. Entries that have withstood the test of time have been edited, and some have been amended to include the latest information and research. Hundreds of new entries have been added. For all practical purposes, it is an entirely new edition intended to serve as a comprehensive and authoritative work of reference reporting on the movements and interests that have shaped Christianity in general and Catholicism in particular over two millennia.

SCOPE

The title reflects its outlook and breadth. It is the New Catholic Encyclopedia, not merely a new encyclopedia of Catholicism. In addition to providing information on the doctrine, organization, and history of Christianity over the centuries, it includes information about persons, institutions, cultural phenomena, religions, philosophies, and social movements that have affected the Catholic Church from within and without. Accordingly, the NCE attends to the history and particular traditions of the Eastern Churches and the Churches of the Protestant Reformation, and other ecclesial communities. Christianity cannot be understood without exploring its roots in ancient Israel and Judaism, nor can the history of the medieval and modern Church be understood apart from its relationship with Islam. Inter-faith dialogue requires an appreciation of Buddhism and other world religions, as well as some knowledge of the history of religion in general.

On the assumption that most readers and researchers who use the NCE are individuals interested in Catholicism in general and the Church in North America in particular, its editorial content gives priority to the Western Church, while not neglecting the churches in the East; to Roman Catholicism, acknowledging much common history with Protestantism; and to Catholicism in the United States, recognizing that it represents only a small part of the universal Church.

Scripture, Theology, Patrology, Liturgy. The many and varied articles dealing with Sacred Scripture and specific books of the Bible reflect contemporary biblical scholarship and its concerns. The NCE highlights official church teachings as expressed by the Church's magisterium. It reports developments in theology, explains issues and introduces ecclesiastical writers from the early Church Fathers to present-day theologians whose works exercise major influence on the development of Christian thought. The NCE traces the evolution of the Church's worship with special emphasis on rites and rituals consequent to the liturgical reforms and renewal initiated by the Second Vatican Council.

Church History. From its inception Christianity has been shaped by historical circumstances and itself has become a historical force. The NCE presents the Church's history from a number of points of view against the background of general political and cultural history. The revised edition reports in some detail the Church's missionary activity as it grew from a small community in Jerusalem to the worldwide phenomenon it is today. Some entries, such as those dealing with the Middle Ages, the Reformation, and the Enlightenment, focus on major time-periods and movements that cut across geographical boundaries. Other articles describe the history and structure of the Church in specific areas, countries, and regions. There are separate entries for many dioceses and monasteries which by reason of antiquity, size, or influence are of special importance in ecclesiastical history, as there are for religious orders and congregations. The NCE rounds out its comprehensive history of the Church with articles on religious movements and biographies of individuals.

Canon and Civil Law. The Church inherited and has safeguarded the precious legacy of ancient Rome, described by Virgil, “to rule people under law, [and] to establish the way of peace.” The NCE deals with issues of ecclesiastical jurisprudence and outlines the development of legislation governing communal practices and individual obligations, taking care to incorporate and reference the 1983 Code of Canon Law throughout and, where appropriate, the Code of Canons for the Eastern Churches. It deals with issues of Church-State relations and with civil law as it impacts on the Church and Church’s teaching regarding human rights and freedoms.

Philosophy. The Catholic tradition from its earliest years has investigated the relationship between faith and reason. The NCE considers at some length the many and varied schools of ancient, medieval, and modern philosophy with emphasis, when appropriate, on their relationship to theological positions. It pays particular attention to the scholastic tradition, particularly Thomism, which is prominent in Catholic intellectual history. Articles on many major and lesser philosophers contribute to a comprehensive survey of philosophy from pre-Christian times to the present.

Biography and Hagiography. The NCE, making an exception for the reigning pope, leaves to other reference works biographical information about living persons. This revised edition presents biographical sketches of hundreds of men and women, Christian and non-Christian, saints and sinners, because of their significance for the Church. They include: Old and New Testament figures; the Fathers of the Church and ecclesiastical writers; pagan and Christian emperors; medieval and modern kings; heads of state and other political figures; heretics and champions of orthodoxy; major and minor figures in the Reformation and Counter Reformation; popes, bishops, and priests; founders and members of religious orders and congregations; lay men and lay women; scholars, authors, composers, and artists. The NCE includes biographies of most saints whose feasts were once celebrated or are currently celebrated by the universal church. The revised edition relies on Butler’s Lives of the Saints and similar reference works to give accounts of many saints, but the NCE also provides biographical information about recently canonized and beatified individuals who are, for one reason or another, of special interest to the English-speaking world.

Social Sciences. Social sciences came into their own in the twentieth century. Many articles in the NCE rely on data drawn from anthropology, economics, psychology and sociology for a better understanding of religious structures and behaviors. Papal encyclicals and pastoral letters of episcopal conferences are the source of principles and norms for Christian attitudes and practice in the field of social action and legislation. The NCE draws attention to the Church’s organized activities in pursuit of peace and justice, social welfare and human rights. The growth of the role of the laity in the work of the Church also receives thorough coverage.

ARRANGEMENT OF ENTRIES

The articles in the NCE are arranged alphabetically by the first substantive word using the word-by-word method of alphabetization; thus “New Zealand” precedes “Newman, John Henry,” and “Old Testament Literature” precedes “Oldcastle, Sir John.” Monarchs, patriarchs, popes, and others who share a Christian name and are differentiated by a title and numerical designation are alphabetized by their title and then arranged numerically. Thus, entries for Byzantine emperors Leo I through IV precede those for popes of the same name, while “Henry VIII, King of England” precedes “Henry IV, King of France.”

Maps, Charts, and Illustrations. The New Catholic Encyclopedia contains nearly 3,000 illustrations, including photographs, maps, and tables. Entries focusing on the Church in specific countries contain a map of the country as well as easy-to-read tables giving statistical data and, where helpful, lists of archdioceses and dioceses. Entries on the Church in U.S. states also contain tables listing archdioceses and dioceses where appropriate. The numerous photographs appearing in the New Catholic Encyclopedia help to illustrate the history of the Church, its role in modern societies, and the many magnificent works of art it has inspired.

SPECIAL FEATURES

Subject Overview Articles. For the convenience and guidance of the reader, the New Catholic Encyclopedia contains several brief articles outlining the scope of major fields: “Theology, Articles on,” “Liturgy, Articles on,” “Jesus Christ, Articles on,” etc.

Cross-References. The cross-reference system in the NCE serves to direct the reader to related material in other articles. The appearance of a name or term in small capital letters in text indicates that there is an article of that title elsewhere in the encyclopedia. In some cases, the name of the related article has been inserted at the appropriate point as a see reference: (see THOMAS AQUINAS, ST.). When a further aspect of the subject is treated under another title, a see also reference is placed at the end of the article. In addition to this extensive cross-reference system, the comprehensive index in volume 15 will greatly increase the reader's ability to access the wealth of information contained in the encyclopedia.

Abbreviations List. Following common practice, books and versions of the Bible as well as other standard works by selected authors have been abbreviated throughout the text. A guide to these abbreviations follows this preface.

The Editors

Abbreviations

The system of abbreviations used for the works of Plato, Aristotle, St. Augustine, and St. Thomas Aquinas is as follows: Plato is cited by book and Stephanus number only, e.g., Phaedo 79B; Rep. 480A. Aristotle is cited by book and Bekker number only, e.g., Anal. post. 72b 8–12; Anim. 430a 18. St. Augustine is cited as in the Thesaurus Linguae Latinae, e.g., C. acad. 3.20.45; Conf. 13.38.53, with capitalization of the first word of the title. St. Thomas is cited as in scholarly journals, but using Arabic numerals. In addition, the following abbreviations have been used throughout the encyclopedia for biblical books and versions of the Bible.

Books

Acts	Acts of the Apostles
Am	Amos
Bar	Baruch
1–2 Chr	1 and 2 Chronicles (1 and 2 Paralipomenon in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Col	Colossians
1–2 Cor	1 and 2 Corinthians
Dn	Daniel
Dt	Deuteronomy
Eccl	Ecclesiastes
Eph	Ephesians
Est	Esther
Ex	Exodus
Ez	Ezekiel
Ezr	Ezra (Esdras B in Septuagint; 1 Esdras in Vulgate)
Gal	Galatians
Gn	Genesis
Hb	Habakkuk
Heb	Hebrews
Hg	Haggai
Hos	Hosea
Is	Isaiah
Jas	James
Jb	Job
Jdt	Judith
Jer	Jeremiah
Jgs	Judges
Jl	Joel
Jn	John
1–3 Jn	1, 2, and 3 John
Jon	Jonah
Jos	Joshua

Jude	Jude
1–2 Kgs	1 and 2 Kings (3 and 4 Kings in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Lam	Lamentations
Lk	Luke
Lv	Leviticus
Mal	Malachi (Malachias in Vulgate)
1–2 Mc	1 and 2 Maccabees
Mi	Micah
Mk	Mark
Mt	Matthew
Na	Nahum
Neh	Nehemiah (2 Esdras in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Nm	Numbers
Ob	Obadiah
Phil	Philippians
Phlm	Philemon
Prv	Proverbs
Ps	Psalms
1–2 Pt	1 and 2 Peter
Rom	Romans
Ru	Ruth
Rv	Revelation (Apocalypse in Vulgate)
Sg	Song of Songs
Sir	Sirach (Wisdom of Ben Sira; Ecclesiasticus in Septuagint and Vulgate)
1–2 Sm	1 and 2 Samuel (1 and 2 Kings in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Tb	Tobit
1–2 Thes	1 and 2 Thessalonians
Ti	Titus
1–2 Tm	1 and 2 Timothy
Wis	Wisdom
Zec	Zechariah
Zep	Zephaniah

Versions

Apoc	Apocrypha
ARV	American Standard Revised Version
ARVm	American Standard Revised Version, margin
AT	American Translation
AV	Authorized Version (King James)
CCD	Confraternity of Christian Doctrine
DV	Douay-Challoner Version

ABBREVIATIONS

ERV	English Revised Version	NJB	New Jerusalem Bible
ERVm	English Revised Version, margin	NRSV	New Revised Standard Version
EV	English Version(s) of the Bible	NT	New Testament
JB	Jerusalem Bible	OT	Old Testament
LXX	Septuagint	RSV	Revised Standard Version
MT	Masoretic Text	RV	Revised Version
NAB	New American Bible	RVm	Revised Version, margin
NEB	New English Bible	Syr	Syriac
NIV	New International Version	Vulg	Vulgate

F

FRIARS

A term applied to the members of the mendicant orders founded in the 13th century and afterward. The friars represented a departure from the previous monastic tradition insofar as they lacked corporate possessions, a condition subsequently modified by the Council of Trent. They possessed a greater mobility insofar as they were not confined to a single monastery or abbey. The majority of their members were priests engaged in a direct apostolate to the faithful.

During the 13th century there was a remarkable growth in the number of mendicant orders until the Second Council of Lyons issued a decree on July 17, 1274, directed at the suppression of all but the four major orders: Dominicans, or Black Friars (1216); Franciscans, or Grey Friars (1223); Carmelites, or White Friars (1226); and Augustinians, or Austin Friars (1256). Of the other mendicants some, such as the Mercedarians (1235) and the Servites (1256), survived this proscription, while others, such as the Friars of the Sack (1251) and the Friars of the Blessed Mary, or Pied Friars (1257), gradually disappeared. Still others, such as the Order of the Holy Cross, or Crutched Friars (1248), evolved into an order of canons regular, known as the Crosier Fathers. Sometime after the Second Council of Lyons other orders of mendicants, such as the Minims (1435), were established.

Bibliography: T. SCHÄFER, De religiosis ad normam codicis juris canonici (4th ed. Rome 1947). R. W. EMERY, "The Second Council of Lyons and the Mendicant Orders," Catholic Historical Review, 39 (1953) 257–271.

[W. B. RYAN]

FRIDELLI, XAVER EHRENBERT (FRIEDEL)

China missionary and cartographer; b. Linz, Austria, March 11, 1673; d. Peking, June 4, 1743. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1688 and sailed for China in 1704. A skilled mathematician, he was one of the six to eight Jesuits who, working in groups of two and three, began in 1717 to map the Chinese Empire at the command of the Emperor. Because of the growing distrust of foreigners, the mandarin assistants served more as guards than advisers. Since the Jesuits were not permitted to enter Tibet or Korea, or go near the borders of Russia, they had to accept the information gathered by natives whom they trained for the task. In 1718 the huge map was presented to the Emperor, and later it was reproduced from 48 engraved plates. The work of the Jesuits remained the only reliable map of China until well into the 19th century. In 1720 Fridelli established a school, of which he was rector for six years, and in 1721 he opened St. Joseph's Church in Peking. His missionary work falls within the period of Christian persecution under Emperor Yum Tsching when his diplomacy, high esteem at court, and reputation for scholarship did much to soften the persecution.

Bibliography: C. W. ALLAN, Jesuits at the Court of Peking (Shanghai 1935) 222. A. ZERLIK, Neue deutsche Biographie 5 (Berlin 1961): 436.

[M. B. MARTIN]

FRIDESWIDE OF OXFORD, ST.

Abbess; b. c. 650–80; d. Oct. 19, 735. The legends describe Frideswide (Fredeswinda or, in Artois, Frévisse) as the daughter of an Anglo-Saxon subregulus who entered religious life after rejecting a princely suitor who was stricken blind when he continued to pursue her. For this reason, the legend contends, the English kings for centuries feared to approach Oxford, where she founded a monastery c. 727. The Danes burned her convent c. 1000, but it was refounded by Augustinian canons regular in 1122. St. Frideswide's relics were translated to splendid shrines in 1180 and 1289. She was the patroness of the city and the University of OXFORD by the late 12th century. Her cult was officially established at Oxford in 1434 and 1481 with special offices in the Breviary of the Young friars study their prayers before an ordination ceremony, 1956. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Sarum Rite, and she was venerated also in parts of France as Frévisse. Her convent was transformed into Christ Church College c. 1526–46, and its church was made into a cathedral for the Anglican Diocese of Oxford in 1546. The shrine of St. Frideswide was dismantled in 1538, and her bones were mixed in 1561 with those of Catherine Cathie, the Protestant wife of Peter Martyr Vermigli. The tomb was restored in 1890 and is a popular shrine with English Catholics today.

Feast: Oct. 19.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Oct. 8:379, 533–590. W. HUNT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 7:715–716. F. M. STENTON, “St. Frideswide and Her Times,” Oxoniensia 1 (1936) 103–112. E. F. JACOB, St. Frideswide, The Patron Saint of Oxford (Oxford 1953). A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 3:197–200. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 4:150–151.

[H. E. AIKINS]

FRIDOLIN OF SÄCKINGEN, ST.

Abbot, apostle of the Upper Rhine; b. Ireland; d. Säcking, Germany, sixth or seventh century. Despite his noble Irish parentage, he exercised his sacerdotal ministry in Ireland by traveling from city to city, preaching the word of God. After crossing over to France, he continued his work as an itinerant preacher until he reached Poitiers, where he rediscovered the lost relics of St. HILARY OF POITIERS. Upon resuming his journeys, he went to Strasbourg, Constance, and Chur (Switzerland), establishing churches along the way. A vision finally directed him to the uninhabited island of Säcking in the Rhine, where he founded a monastery and built a church. He is buried there. His cult is popular in Germany, Switzerland, and Ireland.

Feast: Oct. 18.

Bibliography: Vita (a somewhat extravagant legend written c. 1000 by Balther), Acta Sanctorum March 1:429–440; rep. as Fridolin, der heilige Mann zwischen Alpen und Rhein. . . , ed. W. IR-TENKAUF, tr. from the Late Middle High German by V. SCHUPP (Sigmaringen 1983). F. JEHLE, Geschichte der Stadt Säcking (Säcking 1968). Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1825–) 3: 350–369. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 3:107–108. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:499–500. H. BÜTTNER Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3rd ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 2:1132.

[O. L. KAPSNER]

FRIEDEL, FRANCIS

Educator, author; b. Cleveland, Ohio, Aug. 8, 1897; d. Dayton, Ohio, Feb. 12, 1959. He received his B.A. at the University of Dayton (1917) and his S.T.D. at the University of Fribourg, Switzerland, where he was ordained a MARIANIST priest, April 2, 1927. He attended The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., receiving his M.A. in 1935; in 1950 the University of Pittsburgh, Pa., granted him a Ph.D. He was president and charter member of the American Catholic Sociological Society; President of Trinity College, Sioux City, Iowa (1943–49); and dean of the College of Arts and Sciences at the University of Dayton (1949–53). The Dayton Journal hailed him editorially for his “interest in community welfare projects” (Feb. 14, 1959). Among his many publications are The Mariology of Cardinal Newman (New York 1928), Social Patterns in the Society of Mary (Pittsburgh 1951), and Necrology of the Society of Mary (1952). He also contributed numerous articles to U.S. and foreign periodicals and wrote various religious pamphlets.

[G. J. RUPPEL]

FRIEDHOFEN, PETER, BL.

Chimney-sweep; founder of the Brothers of Charity of Mary Help of Christians; b. Feb. 25, 1819, Weitersburg (near Koblenz am Rhein), Germany; d. Dec. 21, 1860, Koblenz. A year after Peter's birth, his father died, leaving his wife to provide for seven children. Each of the children had to begin earning money for the family as soon as they were able. Peter, next to the youngest, and his older brother Jacob traveled around the region sweeping chimneys. Jacob died leaving a wife and 11 children whom Peter tried to assist financially. While continuing his work, Peter began to engage in his vocation—caring for the helpless, especially children. He established charitable projects in Adenau, Cochem, and Wittlich. From these charities evolved the Order of Brothers of Mercy of Mary the Helper (founded 1849) for the service of the poor, the sick, and the aged. Once Peter and his companion Karl Marchand were trained by the Alexian Brothers, adapted their Rule, and had the order's constitution approved by Bishop Arnoldi of Trier (July 2, 1848), the Brothers of Mercy opened their first house (June 21, 1850). The first brothers received the religious habit in 1851. The bishop of Trier and president of the Rheinland patronized the order and assisted in its work. At the time of Friedhofen's death from tuberculosis, the congregation had spread throughout Europe and into Brazil, China, and Malaysia. His body was interred at Trier am Mosel. He was beatified by John Paul II on June 23, 1985.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1985) 784. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed. 29 (1985): 6–7.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

FRIEDRICH, JOHANN

Ecclesiastical historian; b. Poxdorf, Upper Franconia, Germany, June 5, 1836; d. Munich, Aug. 19, 1917. After his education at Bamberg and Munich, and his ordination, he taught on the theological faculty at Munich as Privatdocent from 1862, as professor of ecclesiastical history from 1872, and as a member of the philosophy faculty from 1882 until his retirement in 1905. At Vatican Council I he was theologian to Cardinal Gustav von Hohenlohe, and he used this opportunity to try to prevent the definition of papal infallibility, a doctrine that he considered historically indefensible, both by his own writings and by secretly supplying his former teacher and intimate friend DÖLLINGER with much of the material published in the Letters from Rome (1869–70) under the pseudonym Quirinus. After he refused to accept the conciliar definitions, he was excommunicated (1872), but he continued to exercise priestly functions as a member of the OLD CATHOLICS, a sect whose formation he influenced profoundly; he later withdrew from it when it ceased to insist on clerical celibacy. His historical writings concerning this period are highly subjective and tendentious.

They include Tagebuch während des Vatikanischen Konzils (1871, 2d ed. 1873) and Geschichte des Vatikanischen Konzils (3 v. 1877–87), both on the Index, along with other of his works. His Ignaz von Döllinger (3 v. 1899–1901) is very well informed but one-sided and often indiscreet. Among his other works, the most important are an ecclesiastical history of Germany, completed only to the Merovingian period, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands (2 v. 1867–69), and Johann Adam Möhler, Der Symboliker (1894).

Bibliography: T. GRANDERATH, Geschichte des Vatikanischen Konzils, 3 v. (Freiburg 1903–06). F. HACKER, "J. Friedrich als Führer der altkatholischen Bewegung," Internationale kirchliche Zeitschrift 8 (1918): 252–274. C. B. MOSS, The Old Catholic Movement (2d ed. London 1964). S. LÖSCH, Döllinger und Frankreich (Munich 1955). W. KÜPPERS, Neue deutsche Biographie 5 (Berlin 1953–) 601.

[S. J. TONSOR]

FRIENDS, RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF

One of the smaller Protestant denominations, referred to also as Quakers, or Friends, or Friends Church.

Origin and history. It originated about 1650 under the leadership of George FOX and other voluntary itinerant preachers. Within a decade, scores of these "first publishers of Truth" had carried their message throughout Great Britain and Ireland, to northern Europe, to the British colonies on the American seaboard, and to the West Indies. Regular meetings for worship were organized locally and continued to grow, although those in Holland, Germany, and the West Indies gradually died out.

Because of their rejection of compulsory church attendance and of military service and their deliberate disregard of minor social conventions, such as deference to superiors and judicial oaths, the Quakers met vigorous opposition nearly everywhere they went during their first half-century. At first this took the form of public disapproval or mob violence, but later special legislation against them was enforced by the courts. In Massachusetts, for example, four Quakers were executed between 1659 and 1661. Whatever the source of the nickname Quaker, it was used by the public in scorn. However, the unyielding pertinacity of the Friends, who refused to meet in secret, and their constant public nonresistance ultimately won them at least pity and toleration. In England their position improved after the Toleration Act of 1689, and by 1700 they had become a substantial segment of the total population both in Great Britain and the American colonies. In several of the latter they even held political control for a time. The areas of their greatest strength were Rhode Island, the Middle Colonies, and later Maine, North Carolina, and Nantucket, Mass. During the westward expansion movement, many Friends migrated into Ohio, Indiana, and Iowa, partly to escape from the slave economy; later they moved farther west to the Pacific coast. After the Civil War, they made converts in the new Western settlements and undertook foreign missionary work in non-Christian cultures.

Doctrine. Arising as they did in England during the Commonwealth of Oliver CROMWELL, the Friends not only shared much of the prevailing antipapal bias of the PURITANS, but they went even further in rejecting formalism in worship and belief. They appealed to the absence of precedent in the New Testament for using “Saint” as in St. Paul’s, for observing Christmas and other religious days, for giving tithes, for being married by a priest or with a ring, and for many other remnants of medieval “superstition.” They preferred “divine immediate revelation” to the authority of church, creed, or Bible. They have retained their emphasis on continuing first-hand religious experience. In one sense they have been at the opposite extreme from Roman Catholicism, but in other respects, such as their relative freedom from bibliolatry and their tendency to mystical or quietistic piety, they are more parallel to it than to Protestantism. Their emphasis on experience put them on guard against mere verbalism. They knew and used the Bible, but not as the chief rule of faith and conduct. Theological criticism from their contemporaries forced them into formulating a theology of their own. Robert BARCLAY in his classic Apology (1676) gave a logical defense of their views and practices, limiting himself to matters in which Quakers differed from the generality of Christians.

Freedom from a rigid creed has permitted great variety of belief in modern times and provided an excuse for inarticulateness. It has, however, posed problems to Friends and to members of other churches; ecumenical movements, otherwise congenial to Quaker participation, favor a statement of faith, no matter how simple or broad that statement may be. Meanwhile, what the early Friends called the Light Within or the Light of Christ is increasingly recognized as Christian experience in other groups.

Forms of worship. The Quakers early rejected most of the usual forms of Christian worship, Anglican or Roman, and even those of the Protestant sects. They fell into the practice of spontaneous, unprogrammed, cooperative worship. No human leader was designated and no formal ministry established to conduct worship. There were no consecrated buildings, persons, or objects; no hymns or other music; no reading or recitation; no ritual; no outward sacraments, not even baptism of water or the physical Eucharist. Women spoke and prayed as well as men, each whenever he felt moved. Silence was the background of worship and often its prevailing feature. This democratic and spontaneous type of worship is without much known parallel or precedent; it is one of the most distinctive features of Quakerism, still attractive to certain persons. In parts of America it has been superseded (except for the absence of sacraments) by something much like the usual type of nonliturgical Protestant service.

Organization. The Friends very early evolved a simple organization consisting of union in local meetings grouped into progressively larger units called respectively Monthly, Quarterly, and Yearly Meetings. These are largely autonomous. Various larger groupings of Yearly Meetings came into existence in America, two of them by coincidence in the same year, 1902. One was called the Friends General Conference, the other the Friends United Meeting. A third grouping, the Evangelical Friends International was founded in 1990, emerging out of the Evangelical Friends Alliance (established 1965). The Evangelical Friends seek to retrieve what they believe to be the Christ-centered evangelical character of the early Friends movement.

Although each Yearly Meeting has its own printed Book of Discipline, there is in fact worldwide similarity of practice in this kind of “congregational” polity, with no real distinction between clergy and laity, nor between men and women. Leadership is “recognized” as existing without human appointment.

The proceedings in the meetings for business are as democratic as in those held for worship. The matters discussed are decided not so much by debate and voting, as by the gradual emerging of a consensus, called “the sense of the meeting,” which it is the duty of the “clerk” who presides to wait for and to record. This kind of procedure has features as unfamiliar to most churches as is the distinctive Quaker worship. Communication among Friends and an indirect setting of standards have resulted from the regular presentation in the business meetings of a questionnaire called “queries,” concerning the behavior of the members of the meeting. The solidarity of Friends, prior to the present use of church periodicals, was promoted as well by the constant intervisitation by “public Friends” to the various Quaker communities.

Membership rests upon individual attachment to a local meeting either by birthright, automatically applied to children of Friends, or by “convincement” expressed by a request to be included. In neither case is adherence marked by any elaborate formality such as Baptism or Confirmation. For many years membership was lost if a member married a nonmember.

Recent Trends. The early persecutions, subsequent quietism, and intermarriage within a small group of Friends, resulted in a close-knit, somewhat aloof culture. Outside contacts, secular and lately ecclesiastical, have changed this. Waves of political, social, and religious thought have penetrated the Religious Society of Friends; in America this led to actual schisms in 1827 and again later. Prominent figures in these alignments were Elias Hicks (1748–1830) of Long Island, N.Y., and Joseph John Gurney (1788–1846) of Norwich, England. In Gurney's thought, and in that of many Friends to this day, evangelical theology became more central and extreme than in early Quakerism (see EVANGELICALISM). On the other hand, intellectualism and social concern gained fresh support from many.

The continuance of numerous schools and colleges established by the Friends attests the Quaker concern for education, originally, but not now, chiefly for their own children. At all periods Quakerism manifested a sensitivity to social needs; this was exemplified in the work of Elizabeth FRY in prison reform and that of John WOOLMAN and John G. Whittier (the New England poet) in campaigns against slavery. Quakers also interested themselves in movements for justice for the Native Americans and for the humane treatment of the insane. Their opposition to war and their contributions to relief work, for which they received the Nobel Peace Prize in 1947, have made them widely known and given them an influence out of proportion to their small numbers.

In the 20th century, Friends from all countries were brought into fellowship by the Friends World Committee on Consultation (FWCC). Established in 1937, following the Second World Conference of Friends in Swarthmore, Pa., the FWCC promotes collaboration and exchange of resources at regional, national, and international levels through conferences, publications, consultations, studies, and meetings. Headquartered in London, England, the FWCC is registered as a non-governmental organization (NGO) with the United Nations (U.N.), and participates extensively in U.N. endeavors to promote world peace. In the ecumenical arena, the Friends United Meeting and the Friends General Conference are members of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, while the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting is a member of the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Bibliography: Classics first pub. at the dates indicated are accessible in various later editions: R. BARCLAY, Apology (1676). G. FOX, Journal (1694). W. SEWEL, History of the . . . Quakers (1722). J. WOOLMAN, Journal (1774). Modern works repr. or in print include W. C. BRAITHWAITE, The Beginnings of Quakerism (2d ed. Cambridge, Eng. 1955); The Second Period of Quakerism (2d ed. Cambridge, Eng. 1961). R. M. JONES et al., The Quakers in the American Colonies (New York 1962); The Later Periods of Quakerism, 2 v. (London 1921). H. H. BRINTON, Friends for 300 Years (New York 1952). F. S. MEAD, S. S. HILL and C. D. ATWOOD, Hand- book of Denominations in the United States (Nashville, Tenn. 2001).

[H. J. CADBURY/EDS.]

FRIENDS OF GOD

A term that was used in a general sense from ancient times. It is found in the Old and New Testaments, in the works of the Fathers, and in early Christian and medieval writers to designate pious, devout, or saintly persons, such as Abraham, Moses, the Apostles, or martyrs, who gave themselves entirely to the service of God. Although the phrase continued to have a general meaning, during the 14th century, in the vocabulary of the mystics, it took on a more specialized sense, owing chiefly to its frequent use by Johannes TAULER. It was used to designate persons who were striving for or had attained mystical union with God, the highest state of the contemplative life. The Friends were not united by any formal ties or organization but were a free association of like-minded people held together by friendship, common aspirations, similar experiences, unity of purpose, and exchange of visits, letters, and spiritual writings. To this last activity are owed various spiritual classics, such as the correspondence of HENRY SUSO with Elsbeth STÄGEL and that of Henry of Nördlingen, a secular priest, with Margaret Ebner (considered by some authors the oldest collection of letters in the German language), and Margaret's Revelations. In this way the works of Suso and RUYSBROECK and the sermons of Tauler gained their widespread circulation.

Under the guidance of experienced and skillful leaders, notably Tauler, Suso, and Henry of Nördlingen, the Friends of God cultivated a life of interior devotion, intense prayer, austerity, and self-renunciation. By their edifying lives and spiritual practices, they hoped to reach intimate friendship with God and to counteract the political and moral evils of an age that was experiencing earthquake and famine, as well as political and religious strife between popes and emperors, the scandal of the papal residence at Avignon, chronic civic disorder in Italy, war between England and France, and would soon witness the Black Death and the consequent moral decay of Christendom. The Friends were heavily concentrated in Bavaria, Switzerland, the Rhineland, and the Low Countries (see SPIRITUALITY OF THE LOW COUNTRIES). Some of them lived alone, others in small groups, as at the former Benedictine monastery of Grüner Wörth near Strasbourg. Their principal centers were Strasbourg and Basel, with lesser areas of influence in Cologne and Constance, and at many of the Dominican monasteries of nuns, such as MARIA-MÖDINGEN near Nuremberg, Töss and Oetenbach in Switzerland, Adelhausen near Freiburg im Breisgau, and Unterlinden in Colmar.

Men and women of all ranks of society and every state of life, “filled with a living love of God,” moved with “compassion for their fellow-men in affliction,” and “concerned about the corruption of the world and the faults of men which awakened the wrath of God” (Tauler), embraced the ideals of the Friends and sought direction from their leaders. There were the friar and priest leaders; nuns, such as the Dominicans Margaret Ebner of Maria-Mödingen and Christine Ebner of Engenthal; layfolk, such as Margaret of the Golden Ring, Herman of Fritzlar, and Rulman Merswin (founder of the Grüner Wörth center); knights and ladies, such as Queen Agnes, widow of King Andrew III of Hungary, who had retired to a German monastery (see SPIRITUALITY, RHEINISH).

The Friends of God were entirely orthodox in their beliefs and were devoted to the Church. Even when they venerated outstanding lay members of their company, they manifested no distrust of the hierarchy or the priesthood, nor did they exhibit any trace of ecclesiastical separatism. They set themselves apart from other clergy and layfolk in the Church only in their spiritual ideals, in their desire to live a truly spiritual life under the guidance of a spiritual master, and in their hope to rescue the Church and society from contemporary evils. They must also be clearly distinguished from the Brethren of the Free Spirit, WALDENSES, and heretical BEGUINES, who, glorying in a false liberty and preaching emancipation from the Church, concealed their heretical and separatist tendencies by assuming the name Friends of God.

The term “Friends of God” began to fall into disuse toward the end of the 14th century, probably because of the general decline of mysticism and its terminology.

Bibliography: A. CHIQUOT, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932) 1:493–500. J. M. CLARK, The Great German Mystics (Oxford 1949) 75–97. A. G. SEESHOLTZ, Friends of God: Practical Mystics of the 14th Century (New York 1934). R. M. JONES, The Flowering of Mysticism: The Friends of God in the 14th Century (New York 1939).

[W. A. HINNEBUSCH]

FRIENDSHIP

A reciprocal relationship of affection or sympathy between persons of the same sex or at least independent of sexual attraction, and based on a community of nature and of interests, the latter of a spiritual kind. This article traces the historical development of the concept, presents a systematic analysis in traditional Catholic terms, and concludes with an evaluation of the role of friendship in Christianity.

History. The basic formulation of the definition of friendship took place in the context of Greco-Roman culture—the beginnings of the classical development in Greek antiquity and the remainder in Roman society. Later centuries added little to the essentials that were there discerned.

Greek Antiquity. The Greek naturalists were the first to speak of friendship, and this in connection with efforts to offer a rational explanation for changes going on in nature. They conceived of friendship as the basic principle of attraction and repulsion that governed the combining actions whereby material bodies were formed from their elemental constituents. Most of their discussions were concerned with the question of whether friendship was basically a union of contraries or a union of things with similar characteristics.

With SOCRATES, Greek thought began to restrict friendship to a relationship between persons and to give it a precise psychological meaning. In fact, friendship figured so importantly in Socrates’s thought that he set himself to teach and to practice the art of acquiring friends. Following his example, both PLATO and ARISTOTLE attracted their disciples more as friends than as students, so much so that L. Dugas could remark that the philosophical schools of ancient Greece were “not so much schools as they were associations of friends” (23).

Aristotle presents perhaps the most complete analysis of friendship in classical antiquity in bk. 8 of his Nicomachean Ethics. Rejecting the equivocal usage of his naturalist predecessors, he restricts friendship (φιλία) to a type of accord among human persons and distinguishes it from the love (φίλησις) that is also properly human. He approaches its definition indirectly by considering it as a form of attraction and finds its basis in being liked, whether this be for interest, or pleasure, or virtue. He thus distinguishes three kinds of friendship: that based on utility, which unites opposites, and those based on pleasure and virtue, which unite similars. Friendships based on utility or on pleasure care less for the friend than for the good he affords, and for this reason are less stable, ceasing as they do when their motivation disappears. Friendship based on virtue, on the other hand, is more perfect; in fact it is friendship par excellence, for in its case the friends seek each other for what they are, rather than for what they give. Again, it is more stable than other friendships because it is based on virtue, which itself is enduring, and at the same time has all of their prerogatives, for those whom it unites are pleasurable and useful for each other. Yet it is rarely found, partly because there are few who are capable of it, and partly because of the time involved in discovering and cultivating those persons who may be worthy of it.

Finally, for Aristotle, friendship thrives only when there is some community in living (συνζῆν). Those who reciprocally and consciously seek the good in each other, but are unable to associate and communicate for one reason or other, cannot strictly become friends. The element of community involved in friendship was understood differently, however, by various Greeks: the Pythagoreans saw it as a community of resources; Aristotle, as a community of likes and interests; and the Epicureans and Stoics, as a community of philosophical beliefs.

Roman Society. Among the Romans, CICERO held a position analogous to that of Aristotle among the Greeks as their principal theorist of friendship. Less profound than Aristotle, perhaps, he made up for this by the charm and warmth of his treatment. He based his notion of friendship on the instinct for sociability that is found in man, defining it as a perfect agreement of wills, tastes, and thoughts accompanied by benevolence and affection. Nothing, in his estimation, is more adapted to human nature than this type of accord. Other goods such as riches, health, power, and honor are uncertain and defectible; only friendship is really enduring, because it is based upon virtue. It can be found only among good men, for they alone have the loyalty and integrity to sustain it and lack the cupidity and passion that destroy it. True friendship is not easily found, he admits; but once found, it is forever.

The reason why true friendships are rare, for Cicero, is that few are worthy of being loved in and for themselves and many seek to make friends purely for pleasure or for profit. A true friend must be another self; thus if one desires to find friends, he must become good himself and then seek out someone similar. Cicero saw friendship as an aid to virtue, since good people who are benevolent to each other become masters of their passions and preserve virtue in one another. This explains why Cicero insisted that one should choose his friends well, for a failure of judgment could cause one to become attached to a person who would later do him harm, and then would not be a true friend.

Later Centuries. The thoughts of Aristotle and Cicero on the subject of friendship have remained classic. They passed on to the Fathers of the Church, such as St. AUGUSTINE and St. AMBROSE; to scholastic doctors and theologians, such as St. AELRED, St. THOMAS AQUINAS, and St. FRANCIS DE SALES; and to secular writers, such as M. E. de MONTAIGNE. They thus constitute a heritage that has become traditional in the Western world. Modern psychologists have complemented their doctrines on points of detail, and philosophers have subjected them to searching analyses, but neither have contradicted them in their essential elements.

Systematic Analysis. With this historical background, it becomes possible to present an analysis of the concept of friendship that describes its psychological characteristics, its metaphysical nature, and its moral aspect.

Psychological Characteristics. Friendship is first of all an attraction; seen externally, its principal effect is one of dynamism, for friends seek one another out and are not happy unless they are together. When proximity is spatially impossible, the attraction manifests itself by the one's turning his thoughts and desires to the other.

Second, friendship involves affection, being based on an emotion known among the Greeks as φίλησις and among the Latins as amatio. It is because a man loves his friend that he is attracted to him in various ways. This emotion is more interior than exterior, and one senses it without always being able to see it; yet it is occasionally discernible, sometimes by gestures, sometimes by smiles or even by tears.

Third, friendship is a reciprocal affection. It is only when an ἀντιφίλησις responds to the φίλησις, or a redamatio to the amatio, that one can speak of true friendship (φιλία, amicitia). This explains why inanimate things cannot be friends or the object of friendship; a man may love wine, but wine cannot be his friend. Again, the reciprocity involved in friendship explains why it grows and deepens with each return of affection, for it involves a type of psychological resonance based on the phenomenon of love's provoking more love in ever-increasing proportions.

Fourth, friendship is a union of a spiritual kind. There are reciprocal affective responses even at the level of brute animals, and yet one does not speak of these as friendship. What is peculiar to friendship is its concern with the intellectual life, not with the life of sense. Its activity has a certain independence from matter, and it provokes a spiritual union, i.e., one based on intellect and will and feeling, and thus properly human. This is why Aristotle could maintain that friendship can exist only between persons.

Fifth, friendship is a disinterested type of relationship. Persons may voluntarily associate for a variety of reasons, such as for profit or for pleasure; but what these associations have in common is that they promote the interest of the one entering into them. The peculiar association that is friendship is more noble and ideal than these, for it sets aside personal gain and, in this sense, is disinterested. The true friend is such because of the qualities he finds in the other; this explains why he will make sacrifices for his friend and do things with no thought of what he himself gets out of them. This also explains why friendship has a lasting character, for monetary and sensual interests are subject to frequent change, whereas the virtuous qualities that attract a friend are stable and enduring.

Finally, perfect friendship is a fusion of souls. Spiritual and disinterested relationships can be more or less intimate, but at their best they encompass all the activities of the souls engaging in them. The effect of this perfect friendship, in the expression of Aristotle and Augustine (Conf. 4.6.11), is to put but “one soul in two bodies.” Then everything is held in common; the distinction between the “I” and the “Thou” disappears; and there results the highest type of unity to be found among men.

Metaphysical Nature. Friendship manifests itself by its acts, but such acts presuppose the reality that is friendship just as volition presupposes the will and judgment presupposes the intellect. This reality is not a power or faculty of the soul, because it is not inborn in man; rather it involves an acquired disposition, a HABIT, that exists in man’s rational appetitive faculty, or WILL. This habit is actualized, as Aquinas teaches, when one friend “informs” the affection of the other. As HENRY OF GHENT and RICHARD OF MIDDLETON observed, however, habits of this type must exist in each person involved in the friendship, and thus the habits themselves must be numerically distinct. The reality that is friendship must therefore be a RELATION that is based on two absolute habits; one may refer to each habit as friendship in the person participating in it, but the notion is not complete unless it includes the relationship that unites one habit to the other.

Thomas Aquinas and other theologians who study friendship in the context of man’s relationship with God generally speak of it as a kind of LOVE; they see the “love of friendship” as the highest form of love, and oppose it to the “love of concupiscence” (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 26.3–4). From this viewpoint, one may define friendship as a love of benevolence, something held in common and based on the mutual regard of its participants. Lower forms of love are at the level of sense; they seek pleasure and self-gratification, and this is true even of the sexual love whereby man is prompted to conserve his species (see SEX). The love of friendship, on the other hand, is of a higher order; it is essentially spiritual, and thus serves well to explain the optimum relationship that unites man to God (see CHARITY).

Moral Aspect. Friendship as such is good, and therefore is legitimate for man. It is, in fact, beneficial for his soul: the companion of VIRTUE, it may itself be considered as a virtue in the one possessing it. Yet it places demands on those who embrace it, and in certain circumstances, particularly when too restrictive, can be harmful and even vicious. (For a fuller discussion, particularly as related to the spiritual life, see FRIENDSHIP, PARTICULAR.)

Role in Christianity. The fact of being a Christian in no way changes man’s nature or his needs. It is thus possible for Christians, while living a supernatural life, to have purely human friendships among themselves. There is nothing distinctively Christian about such friendships, however, unless Christianity in some way enters into the relationships and transposes them to a higher level.

Some have seen an opposition between the teaching of the pagans on friendship and the New Law given to men by Jesus Christ. For example, Jesus prescribes charity toward man’s neighbor, and this independently of one’s particular feelings and personal likes or dislikes. Such a prescription seems to deprive friendship of its proper character; for, rather than seek something selective and personal, the Christian is urged to a universal attitude of love toward all men, and this by obligation rather than by free choice. Thus the pagan ideal of friendship seems to be absorbed in charity, and itself destroyed in the process. Again, the perfection of the love of God, as conceived by such spiritual writers as St. IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA, seems to demand of man that he transfer all of his affection from creatures to his Creator; thus the renunciation of human friendships seems to be the ideal toward which the perfect Christian should tend.

There is some element of truth in these considerations, but at the same time it is possible to oppose them by others that argue for the basic compatibility between friendship and charity. For one, Christianity has focused attention on the dignity of the individual independent of his place in society; it has liberated man more from matter by accenting the immortality of his soul. Such a liberation can only favor friendship, for it provides the basis for greater personal appreciation of one’s fellow men. Much the same can be said for the teaching on the universality of the Redemption, for this too proclaims the equality of all souls in God’s sight. Finally, by the gift of supernatural life, Christianity has made numberless human souls incomparably better and therefore more worthy of love; it has increased their resemblance to one another and has thus provided a new basis of community among them.

De facto, friendship does exist among Christians. It has never flourished so much as it has since the promulgation of the gospel, nor has it ever been so pure and so noble in its practice and its ideals.

Bibliography: G. VANSTEENBERGHE, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932–) 1:500–529. W. M. RANKIN and ST. GEORGE STOCK, Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, ed. J. HASTINGS (Edinburgh 1908–27) 6:131–138. E. CENTINEO, Enciclopedia filosofica (Venice-Rome 1957) 1:168–169. E. BISER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 4:363–364. J. DE VRIES and H. VAN OYEN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 2:1128–32. L. DUGAS, L'Amitié antique (2d ed. Paris 1914). P. PHILIPPE, Le Rôle de l'amitié selon la doctrine de saint Thomas (Rome 1937). A. ODDONE, L'amicizia (Milan 1937). M. NÉDONCELLE, La Réciprocité des consciences (Paris 1942). P. J. WADELL, Friendship and the Moral Life (Notre Dame, Ind. 1989). G. MEILAENDER, Friendship, a Study in Theological Ethics (Notre Dame, Ind. 1981).

[W. A. WALLACE]

FRIENDSHIP, PARTICULAR

Particular friendship is an exclusive association between two persons based upon emotional fascination. As such, it is a perversion of God's gift of good and wholesome friendship. In the very definition of particular friendship is found the distortion of truth that it is. It is an exclusive association and therefore detrimental to the universal charity due to all. It is a friendship based upon emotional fascination and motivated more by the selfish interests of the "friends" than the desire of each to promote the good of the other. Therefore, it does not deserve to be called FRIENDSHIP except in an extended sense of the term.

The danger of forming particular friendships is directly proportional to a person's emotional instability. Such an association exists most often between those who are emotionally insecure. Particular friendships are an expression of the human tendency to love and be loved, which in this case is applied wrongly. Such friendships can develop between those of the opposite sex, or those of the same sex.

The characteristics of particular friendship are: (1) Exclusiveness—all one's attention is focused on one person to the point that there is resentment of the intrusion of others. (2) Jealousy—because all attention is focused on one person, there is jealousy if that person has other friends. (3) Absorption of mind—the friends think of each other continually in much the same way that young lovers do. As a result, the freedom to pray, study, work, do one's duties, or be with others is hampered. (4) The tendency to manifest affection—because this type of friendship has all the marks of the relationship between young lovers, the friends feel more and more the desire to manifest affection. This they do by talking in a sentimental way and even by the physical expression of love. Because of this, it is obvious that particular friendship can easily lead to violations of chastity. This may not always happen, but even when it does not lead to this, the detrimental effects of particular friendship are numerous.

Avoidance of particular friendship and freeing oneself from it involve the use of means consistently recommended by spiritual writers. These are: (1) Conviction—the persons must be firmly convinced that such friendships are harmful and therefore must be avoided or eliminated. (2) Confidence—when emotion dominates a person, victory can seem impossible, but one must be convinced that victory is possible. (3) General self-discipline—just as an alcoholic cannot break his habit without a general practice of self-discipline, so neither can one break a particular friendship without a similar self-discipline. (4) Physical separation—one must carefully avoid all unnecessary association with this kind of "friend," and when association is necessary, must be careful to control the emotional response that accompanies it. (5) Mental separation—one must avoid thinking about the other person as much as possible, for this only feeds the flame of emotional involvement. (6) Cultivation of other interests—such persons cannot succeed in a vacuum, as it were, but must substitute for the object sacrificed an interest in the right things. Only in this way is it possible to avoid or remedy a grave defect.

To see the so-called particular friendship for the perversion that it is, one need only compare it with the good and healthy friendship in which the friends grow mutually in goodness and the pursuit of higher ideals.

See Also: FRIENDSHIP.

Bibliography: G. A. KELLY, Guidance for Religious (Westminster, Md. 1956) 55–81. A. TANQUEREY, The Spiritual Life (Westminster, Md. 1945).

[C. BROWNING]

FRIENDSHIP HOUSE

A movement of Catholic lay men and women seeking to relate the Church to interracial justice, the poor and marginalized; founded in Toronto, Canada, in 1930 and in New York City in 1938. In 1938 Catherine DE HUECK DOHERTY, a Russian immigrant, took up residence and opened a store-front office and community center in Harlem; she attracted a group of young men and women to live and work with her there. The center became a source of emergency assistance for the poor, a recreational place for children, a meeting place to discuss and disseminate the Church's social doctrine, and a place where the liturgy became a daily way of life for the laity. Located as it was in the African-American ghetto, it was one of the pioneer efforts to arouse the consciences of Americans, particularly Catholic Americans, to the sinfulness of racial discrimination and segregation. Friendship House identified itself with the segregated and the insecure, not only through publications, demonstrations, and lectures, but by eschewing support from Church or community funds and relying upon voluntary contributions from interested clergy and laity. These contributions, though generous, were never sufficient to remove real poverty from the doors and tables of Friendship House workers.

By the early 1950s Friendship Houses had been established with the approval of local ordinaries in New York, Chicago, Washington, D.C., Shreveport, La., and Portland, Ore. The directors of each house, together with the chaplains, formed a national board to guide the activities and expansion of the movement. Meanwhile, Catherine de Hueck, who had married the journalist Eddie Doherty, returned to Canada in 1947, and began another apostolic effort known as Madonna House Apostolate. The Friendship House movement suffered one defeat in 1955 when the ordinary of the diocese asked that the Shreveport house be closed, after it had become the victim of a virulent attack by racists.

As the racial climate in the U.S. changed, so did Friendship House programs. Emphasis was redirected from social welfare and settlement house work, to social justice and equal opportunity; from Friendship House as a way of life, to the common vocation of all Christians to humanize the social order; from staff workers living a common life in poverty and under obedience, to staff people living a layman's life frugally and responsibly on a modest salary. By 1960 Friendship House had become a national movement for interracial justice with headquarters in Chicago; houses in all other centers had closed. The principal activities became: (1) social action, including joint efforts with civic and religious bodies to promote passage of national and state legislation in such areas as civil rights, employment, and housing; (2) publication of a monthly magazine (Harlem Friendship House News from 1941 to 1948, The Catholic Interracialist from 1949 to 1955, and Community Magazine from 1955 to 1983), and pamphlets on race relations and interracial justice; and (3) weekend retreats and conferences at Childerly Farm near Chicago where sisters, priests, seminarians, and lay men and women are brought together for prayer, study, and planning directed toward interracial justice and love.

In the face of declining participation and resources in the 1990s, the movement struggled to maintain its outreach programs. The day shelter for the poor and homeless in Chicago, which was opened in 1983, was finally closed at the end of March 2000. The movement vacated its historic premises on Division Street on Chicago.

Bibliography: C. DE HUECK, Friendship House (New York 1946).

[D. M. CANTWELL/EDS.]

FRIENDSHIP WITH GOD

That the just are in some sense friends of God is a dogma of faith defined by the Council of Trent (Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [32d ed. Freiburg 1963] 1528, cf. 1535).

Scripture and the Fathers. Those individuals who are truly wise in the Old Testament sense, that is, those who perfectly observe God's law, are said to be the friends of God: "For to men she [Wisdom] is an unfailing treasure; those who gain this treasure win the friendship of God, to whom the gifts they have from discipline commend them" (Wis 7.14). "And she, who is one, can do all things, and renews everything while herself perduring; and passing into holy souls from age to age, she produces friends of God and prophets" (Wis 7.27). Accordingly, ABRAHAM (Jdt 8.22; cf. Jas 2.23) and MOSES (Ex 33.12) are called friends of God. In the New Testament Jesus calls His Disciples friends: "You are my friends if you do the things I command you. No longer do I call you servants, because the servant does not know what his master does. But I have called you friends, because all things that I have heard from my Father I have made known to you" (Jn 15.14–15; cf. Lk 12.4).

The Fathers of the Church frequently point to Abraham and Moses as men who fulfilled God's will and so showed themselves to be friends of God. But they also extend the title to all Christians. Thus St. Hilary writes: "And indeed we know that Abraham was a friend to God. And the Law said that Moses was a friend to God. But the Gospels show that now many are friends of God . . ." (In ps. 138, 38; Patrologia Latina 9:812). And St. Ambrose says: ". . . charity makes a man a friend of God. Hence Christ says: 'But I call you friends'" (Ep. 37.23; Patrologia Latina 16:1090). Unlike the Hebrews, who considered FRIENDSHIP with God as the reward of a holy life, the Christian Fathers see it as a gratuitous election. Thus, St. Gregory the Great writes: "O how great is the mercy of our Creator! We are unworthy servants and are called friends. How great is the dignity of men to be friends of God" (Hom. in evang. 2.27.4; Patrologia Latina 76:1206). And St. Cyril of Alexandria writes: "What greater or more honorable thing can be said than to be called and to be a friend of Christ. For observe how much this dignity exceeds the bounds of human nature. For all things serve the Creator . . . nor is there any created thing which is not subjected to Him by the yoke of servitude . . . the Lord has raised the saints who keep His commandments to a supernatural glory . . ." [In Joan. evang. 10 (Jn 15.14), Patrologia Graeca 74:384; cf. Irenaeus, Adv. haer. 4.13.4, Patrologia Graeca 7:1009; Clement of Alexandria, Strom. 7.10, Patrologia Graeca 9:481; Athanasius, In ps.

138.17, Patrologia Graeca 27:534; Augustine, In ps. 131.6, Patrologia Latina 37:1718–19; In evang. Ioh. 85, Patrologia Latina 35:1848–50].

Both Sacred Scripture and the Fathers describe the just man's relationship with God in other terms, which imply a state of friendship. St. Paul says that Christ has broken down the enmity and has established peace between God and men, who have become "now no longer strangers and foreigners, but . . . citizens with the saints and members of God's household (οἰκεῖτου)" (Eph 2.14–20). The image of spiritual nuptials is used as well to describe the relationship between God and His Church. Thus St. Paul writes to the Corinthians: "I betrothed you to one spouse, that I might present you a chaste virgin to Christ" (2 Cor 11.2; cf. Eph 5.22–32). The Fathers apply this symbol to the union between God and individual just souls. Basil of Ancyra, for instance, illustrates "the union of the rational soul with the divine Word by the union of marriage" (De virginitate 50; Patrologia Graeca 30:767). And St. Gregory of Nyssa interprets the Song of Songs as signifying a union of individual souls with God through CHARITY (In cant. 1.1, Patrologia Graeca 44:763; cf. 6, ibid. 44:891). Other titles also employed by Scripture and the Fathers, such as "SONS OF GOD" and "brothers of Christ," imply a state of friendship.

Explanation of Theologians. In explaining the just man's friendship with God, theologians commonly have accepted the doctrine of St. Thomas Aquinas (In 3 sent. 27.1; C. gent. 4.19; In Dion. de div. nom. 4.9; Summa Theologiae 1a2ae, 26.4; 65.5; and especially 2a2ae, 23.1). Their notion of friendship is borrowed from Aristotle, who derived it from reflection on the common experience of human friendship (Eth. Nic. 8.1–8). Friendship supposes a similarity of nature and a community of life and interests, and consists in a stable, mutually known, and reciprocal love of benevolence. Although Aristotle had excluded the possibility of friendship between the gods and men for the reason that there is no similarity or common bond between them, Catholic theologians deny the validity of his argument in the SUPERNATURAL order: Thanks to the gifts of GRACE, the just man has been assimilated to God in a new, supernatural way, and through FAITH and the gifts of the Holy Spirit (see HOLY SPIRIT, GIFTS OF) he can come to an imperfect but adequate knowledge of God, who communicates to him through revelation and to whom he can speak in PRAYER. Moreover, between God and man there exists a reciprocal love of benevolence. God loves the goodness of the just man inasmuch as it is a participation of His own divine goodness, and He wills good to man for man's own advantage; and the just man, in turn, loves God above all else for His own sake, thanks to the supernatural virtue of charity. What is more, this selfless love is mutually known, since God can read man's heart, and the just man knows God's love for him by faith and his own love for God by the testimony of a good conscience. And it is stable, not only on the part of God, as is evident, but also on the part of man, since through charity he chooses God as the ultimate end of his whole life and being. Accordingly, in an analogous, but nonetheless true and proper, sense the just man is a friend of God.

All Catholic theologians agree that friendship with God is in some way rooted in the gifts of sanctifying grace. The most common explanation is that friendship with God flows as a formal effect from the very nature of grace, although Lessius, Duns Scotus, and Ripalda hold that this state of friendship arises from grace only because of some extrinsic element, such as the free ordination, disposition, or promise of God.

Suárez and some modern theologians who follow him see the just man's friendship with God as the precise reason under which the indwelling of the Holy Spirit (see INDWELLING, DIVINE) is to be understood. According to this theory, friendship demands the presence of the friend; hence, even if God were not already present by His immensity, He would come to be present with His friends because of His love for them. Therefore, they reason, the inhabitation of the Blessed Trinity in the soul of the just man consists precisely in this new presence of God as friend.

Ascetical Literature. Spiritual writers from the twelfth to the fifteenth centuries, such as Tauler, Suso, and the author of the IMITATION OF CHRIST, also speak of man's friendship with God. But their principal concern is not with friendship as the new relationship between God and man that is established by grace, but rather with man's growth in the spiritual life through the development and perfection of his friendship with Jesus, God incarnate. It is in this tradition that the author of the Imitation writes: "Many are His visits to the man of inward life. With such a one He holds delightful converse, greeting him with sweet comfort, much peace, and an intimacy astonishing beyond measure. Come then, faithful soul, prepare your heart for this your Spouse, so that He may vouchsafe to come to you and dwell within you" (2.1.1–2). "Love Him, and keep Him for your friend, who, when all go away, will not forsake you, nor suffer you to perish finally" (2.7.1; cf. 2.8.3). St. Ignatius Loyola, St. Teresa of Avila, and St. John of the Cross, through St. Francis de Sales and other modern writers after him down to St. Thérèse de Lisieux underline the just man's opportunity and responsibility to grow in God's friendship: "It is a horrible irreverence to Him who with so much love and sweetness invites us to perfection to say, 'I do not want to be holy, or perfect, or to have a greater share in your friendship, or to follow the counsels you give me to advance in it” (St. Francis de Sales, On the Love of God 8.8; cf. 2.22; 3.1–3; 8.9).

Bibliography: R. EGENTER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1104–06. E. DUBLANCHY, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 2.2:2225–26. M. FLICK, De gratia Christi (Rome 1962) 342–429. N. D. PHILIPPE, Le Mystère de l’amitié divine (Paris 1949). L. M. BOND, “A Comparison between Human and Divine Friendship,” Thomist 3 (1941) 54–94. E. PETERSON, “Der Gottesfreund,” Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 42 (1923) 161–202.

[J. F. DEDEK]

FRIGIDIAN OF LUCCA, ST.

Bishop; d. Lucca, Italy, c. 588. The chief source of information on his life is a vita (in manuscripts no earlier than the 11th century) claiming that he was of Irish origin and that he settled as a hermit in Italy. His reputation for sanctity caused him to be chosen bishop of Lucca. His cult spread through Tuscany into other regions of Italy and to Corsica, and his relics, miraculously discovered in the eighth century, are preserved in the church dedicated to his memory at Lucca. Recent scholars reject the legendary chronology and nationality, and one even puts him as far back as the third century. He should not be confused with another Irish traveler in Italy, St. FINNIAN of Moville.

Feast: March 18; March 20 (Ireland).

Bibliography: J. F. KENNEY, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland: v.1, Ecclesiastical (New York 1929) 1:184–185, 391. Vita Sancti Fridiani, critical edition, ed. G. ZACCAGNINI (Lucca 1989). A. M. TOMMASINI, Irish Saints in Italy, tr. J. F. SCANLAN (London 1937) 363–377. A. PEDEMONTE, “S. Frediano,” Bollettino storico Lucchese 9 (1937) 3–32; “L’Antico catalogo dei vescovi di Lucca,” ibid. 10 (1938) No. 2. J. HENNIG, “A Note on the Traditions of St. Frediano and St. Silao of Lucca,” Mediaeval Studies 13 (1951) 234–242. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:626–627.

[C. MCGRATH]

FRIGOLET, MONASTERY OF

Premonstratensian abbey, Graveson, near Tarascon, France; Diocese of Aix, former Diocese of Avignon (patron, St. Michael). Founded as a cell of the Benedictine Abbey of MONTMAJOUR in 962, it later became a priory of CANONS REGULAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE who preserved there the old chapel of Notre-Dame du Bon-Remède. HIERONYMITES and Discalced AUGUSTINIANS served Frigolet successively, from 1647, until the monastery was suppressed in 1790. The buildings were preserved and, in 1858, a former Trappist, Edmond Boulbon, restored Frigolet as a house of the primitive observance of the PREMONSTRATENSIS. In 1869 it became an abbey, and a sumptuous church and extensive new buildings were erected. After a short period of prosperity, the community was twice expelled (1880 and 1903). Its first refuge was Storrington, Sussex, England; its second, Leffe, Belgium.

Bibliography: N. BACKMUND, Monasticon Praemonstratense, 3 v. (Straubing 1949–56) 3:337–340. R. GAZEAU, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd’hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET (Paris 1947–) 4:1647–48.

[N. BACKMUND]

FRINS, VICTOR

Jesuit theologian and author; b. Aachen, Germany, April 17, 1840; d. Bonn, April 13, 1912. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1859, and studied at Münster and Maria Laach. After 1872 he taught philosophy and theology at Regensburg; scripture, and moral theology, and canon law at Ditton Hall near Liverpool; and scholastic theology at St. Bueno’s, St. Asaph, Wales. He contributed to several periodicals, especially to Stimmen aus Maria-Laach, but is better known for his theological works: Doctrina S. Thomae Aquinatis de cooperatione Dei (Paris 1893), De actibus humanis ontologica et psychologica consideratis (Freiburg im Breisgau 1897), De actibus humanis moraliter consideratis (ibid. 1904), and De formanda conscientia (ibid. 1911).

Frins, well known in theological circles as a speculative and creative thinker, was an ardent disciple of Juan de LUGO, the Spanish cardinal and theologian of the 17th century.

Bibliography: L. KOCH, Jesuiten-Lexikon (Leiden 1962) 620.

[J. G. BISCHOFF]

FRITZ, SAMUEL

Missionary in the Amazon region; b. Trautenau, Bohemia, June 6, 1651; d. La Laguna, Amazon basin, 1724 or 1725. He entered the Society of Jesus on Oct. 28, 1673, and went to Ecuador in 1684. He made his profession on Aug. 15, 1687; for two years previously he had been at the mission on the Maranhão River, among the Omaguas, of the Tupí linguistic group, at 4° S. 74° W., in the Amazon basin. He eventually founded 38 settlements between the Napo and Negro Rivers and on islands of the Amazon. In 1688 he extended his activities to the Yarımaguas. Between 1690 and 1693 he served as a diplomat to the Portuguese, defending the thesis that the dividing line between the Portuguese and Spanish territories passed close to the Grão Pará, with Spain holding the lands west of that line. To this end he prepared a detailed and precise map that was influential with the Council of Indies. From 1704 to 1712 he was superior of the mission. As a mis-siologist, he left specific information and concrete pastoral suggestions in his diary. As a missionary, he was a valiant defender of his Indians against Brazilian incursions. As a geographer, he produced a map that even today is a primary source for the study of 17th-century geopolitics.

Bibliography: J. JOUANEN, Historia de la Compañía de Jesús en la antigua provincia de Quito, 1570–1774 [i.e. 1773] 2 v. (Quito 1941–43). J. DE VELASCO, Historia moderna del Reyno de Quito y crónica de la provincia de la Compañía de Jesús del mismo Reyno, ed. R. REYES Y REYES (Quito 1941–). J. CHANTRE Y HERRERA, Historia de las misiones de la Compañía de Jesús en el Marañón Español, ed. A. E. MERA (Madrid 1901).

[A. DE EGAÑA]

FRÖBEL, FRIEDRICH WILHELM

Educator and founder of the kindergarten system; b. Oberweissbach, Thuringia, April 21, 1782; d. Marienthal, June 21, 1852. Fröbel, son of a Lutheran pastor and motherless from infancy, was neglected in childhood and received little formal education. Apprenticed to a forester at 15, he was impressed by the beauty around him and with the idea of the oneness of nature. In 1800 he spent a short time at the University of Jena, and in 1805 he went to Frankfurt to study architecture. While there, Dr. Anton Gruner, master of the model school, persuaded him to teach in his school, which he conducted along Pestalozzian lines. Fröbel accepted and, during that year, spent two weeks in J. H. PESTALOZZI's school at Yverdon. Upon his return to Frankfurt he undertook a systematic study of Pestalozzianism under Gruner's guidance and spent two years (1808–10) at Yverdon studying the methods of the Swiss reformer. In 1811 he studied at Göttingen; in 1813 he entered military service; and in 1814 he went to Berlin to continue his studies. In 1816, with Heinrich Langenthal and Wilhelm Mittendorf, he organized an experimental school at Keilhau, and in 1826 published his most important work, The Education of Man. In 1835 the Swiss government invited him to superintend a public orphanage and organize courses for the training of teachers. He returned to Germany in 1837 and, at Blankenburg, established a school for small children to which, in 1840, he attached the name "kindergarten." In 1843 he published Mother Play and Nursery Songs and from 1844 until his death devoted his time and talent to advancing the kindergarten idea in Germany and to training girls as kindergarten teachers.

Cloisters at St. Michel de Frigolet Abbey, Arles, France. (©Gail Mooney/CORBIS)

The aim of education, according to Fröbel, is the development of the child's inborn capacities and powers in accord with his nature, and the redirection of undesirable native impulses. Two basic principles, he maintained, underlie this aim: (1) the law of unity, for "all things live and have their being in and through the Divine Unity, in and through God," which, applied to practical situations, involves the unity of knowing, feeling, and doing, as well as child development; and (2) symbolism, which shows itself in his deep interest in analogies between physical and spiritual phenomena.

Fröbel sums up his general method by the term "self-activity," or the process of development from within by which the child expresses his impulses and thoughts and renders "the inner, outer," as Fröbel terms it. Education, which, he held, should begin at birth, is most effective in a miniature community where children cooperate in active social participation induced by games and similar activities. Among his permanent contributions are the introduction into the curriculum of language, drawing, rhythm, and nature study based on observation of living things; the use of play materials; the simultaneous development of language, gesture, and constructive work; and his promotion of the kindergarten idea that was spread throughout Europe mainly through the efforts of his devoted pupil, the Baroness Bertha von Marenholtz Bülow, and reached the U.S. during the 1850s.

Bibliography: H. C. BOWEN, Froebel and Education through Self-Activity (New York 1893). F. P. GRAVES, Great Educators of Three Centuries (New York 1912). F. V. N. PAINTER, Great Pedagogical Essays (New York 1905). R. H. QUICK, Essays on Educational Reformers (new ed. New York 1896).

[W. G. WIXTED]

FROBEN, JOHANN

Printer and publisher; b. 1460?; d. 1527. Of Basel, Switzerland, he was a disciple of Johann AMERBACH, noted printer of humanistic works. From 1514 to his death, Froben was ERASMUS's major publisher, issuing many works in Scripture, patristics, and the classics. In 1491 he produced the first Latin Bible in small type and in 1516 issued the editio princeps of Erasmus's Greek New Testament; this, revised in subsequent editions before Erasmus's death, had an epochmaking influence in the early days of the REFORMATION. Hans Holbein (the younger) was associated with him for four years as a designer of borders and decorative material. Under his son Hieronymus and grandson Ambrosius, the firm continued until the end of the 16th century.

[E. P. WILLGING]

FROBERGER, JOHANN JAKOB

Internationally famous 17th-century composer and keyboard virtuoso; b. Stuttgart, Germany, May 19, 1616; d. Héricourt (Haute-Saône), France, May 6 or 7, 1667. Froberger was one of 11 children born to the conductor of the Protestant court chapel at Stuttgart. His brothers were active in this chapel, and his first musical training was undoubtedly a family affair. His professional training was completed under FRESCOBALDI in Rome (1637–41), and it is thought that his conversion to Catholicism occurred during this interval. At age 25 Froberger was appointed court organist in Vienna; he continued in this position and in other royal chapels until 1657, thus providing one of the chief channels through which Italian and French idioms passed into Germany. His final years were spent under the patronage of dowager Duchess Sibylla of Württemberg. Extant sources indicate that his creative activity was in large part confined to composition for keyboard instruments. Like Frescobaldi, he composed multisectional canzonas, ricercars, capriccios, and fantasias, in which each section presents the main theme in a particular shape; he applied this technique to toccatas as well. The pattern of his suites (allemande, courante, sarabande) is that of French composers, and the texture of these dances is regarded as a transformation of French lute technique. Froberger's music is a particularly rewarding field for study of the development of tonal organization in the 17th century.

Bibliography: Gesammelte Ausgabe, ed. L. G. ADLER (Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Österreich [1893–; repr. Graz 1959–] 8, 13, 21). M. REIMANN, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 4:982–993. G. FROTSCHER, Geschichte des Orgelspiels und der Orgelkomposition, 2 v. (2d ed. Berlin 1959). A. PIRRO, Les Clavecinistes (Paris 1924). W. APEL, Masters of the Keyboard (Cambridge, Mass. 1947). M. F. BUKOFZER, Music in the Baroque Era (New York 1947). G. J. BUELOW, "Johann Jacob Froberger," in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. S. SADIE, v. 6 (New York 1980) 858–862. F. LESURE, ed. J. J. Froberger: Musicien Européen (Montbéliard, France 1998). T. NORMAN, "Performance Practice of the Keyboard Music of Johann Jakob Froberger" (Ph.D. diss. Monash University 1991). D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge, Mass. 1996) 285–286. H. SIEDENTOPF, Johann Jakob Froberger: Leben und Werk (Stuttgart 1977). N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (8th ed. New York 1992) 580.

[D. BEIKMAN]

FRÖBES, JOSEPH

Philosopher, psychologist, and author; b. Betzdorf, Germany, Aug. 26, 1866; d. Cologne, March 24, 1947. After brief public education, Fröbes entered a Catholic grammar school near Darmstadt; when this was suppressed by the Kulturkampf, he went to Stella Matutina, a Jesuit boarding school in Austria (1877–82). At age 16 he entered the Society of Jesus. He completed his philosophical studies in 1889, and spent five years teaching mathematics, physics, and chemistry; then he studied theology (1894–99), was ordained (1900), and was assigned to teach philosophy. Having been convinced that the teaching of psychology demanded revision, he undertook intensive training in experimental psychology under G. E. Müller at Göttingen (1902–04) and attended the lectures of Wilhelm Wundt at Leipzig. Fröbes then became professor of philosophy and founded a psychological laboratory at Ignatius College, a Jesuit house of studies in Holland. He taught there for more than 20 years, encouraging his students, notably, Johannes Lindworsky, to pursue scientific psychology. In Germany, Fröbes was the Catholic pioneer of experimental psychology. As the first to recognize the independence of experimental psychology from philosophical psychology, he wrote several textbooks in which the respective domains of these two fields were clearly distinguished.

Bibliography: J. FRÖBES, Lehrbuch der experimentellen Psychologie, 2 v. (3d ed. Freiburg 1923–29); Psychologia speculativa in usum scholarum, 2 v. (Freiburg 1927); Brevior cursus psychologiae speculativae (Paris 1933); Compendium psychologiae experimentalis (rev. ed. Rome 1948); Tractatus logicae formalis (Rome 1940). Literature. L. KOCH, Jesuiten-Lexikon (Louvain-Heverlee 1962). C. A. MURCHISON, ed., A History of Psychology in Autobiography, v. 3 (Worcester, Mass. 1934) 121–152. H. MISIAK and V. M. STAUDT, Catholics in Psychology (New York 1954).

[V. S. SEXTON]

FRODOBERT, ST.

Monk, founder of Montier-la-Celle; b. Troyes, 595; d. Dec. 31, 673. After being educated at the cathedral school and admitted as a cleric of the church of Troyes, he became a monk in LUXEUIL, returning to Troyes several years later to enter the bishop's service. Frodobert, wanting to satisfy his love of silence and humility, asked for and obtained from King Clovis II and BATHILDIS the Île Germanique, a marshy area on the outskirts of Troyes. There he founded a monastery (c. 650) dedicated to St. Peter. A charter of Clothar III and Bathildis (657) confirmed the gift. Frodobert's cult was recognized when, at the request of Abbot Bodo, Bishop Ottulph exhumed Frodobert's relics in 872 from the magnificent tomb to which they had been transferred by Abbot Bobinus in 790. Ottulph changed his feast from January 1 to 8.

Bibliography: Sources. ADSO, Vita S. Frodoberti, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 137: 599–620. N. CAMUSAT, Promptuarium sacrarum antiquitatum Tricassinae dioecesis (Troyes 1610). Gallia Christiana 12:538–541. C. LALORE, Cartulaire de Montier-la-Celle, v.6 of Collection des principaux cartulaires du diocèse de Troyes, 7 v. (Paris 1875–90). Literature. A. È. PRÉVOST, Le Diocèse de Troyes, histoire et documents, 3 v. (Dijon 1923–26) v.1.

[P. COUSIN]

FROHSCHAMMER, JAKOB

Idealist philosopher; b. Illkhofen, Germany, Jan. 6, 1821; d. Bad Kreuth, Germany, April 14, 1893. He was ordained in 1847 and spent most of his life as a professor of philosophy at the University of Munich. His peculiar form of idealism is based on the conception of imagination, phantasie, as the basic principle of reality. In God this imagination is conscious and subjective and transcends the universe, which is the objective and unconscious manifestation of divine imagination. It is a creative and formative power governing the evolution of the universe and in man becomes individual and conscious as the principle of psychic life. Frohschammer was condemned specifically for attempting to bring within the scope of natural reason the supernatural mysteries of faith, and for asserting the absolute independence of philosophy from the authority of the Church (letter of Pius IX, Gravissimas Inter, Dec. 11, 1862). His failure to retract three of his works led to his suspension in 1862 (see SEMIRATIONALISM). His principal works are: Über den Ursprung der menschlichen Seelen (Munich 1854); Einführung in die Philosophie (Munich 1858); Die Phantasie als Grundprinzip des Weltprozesses (Munich 1877).

Bibliography: J. G. WÜCHNER, Frohschammer's Stellung zum Theismus (Paderborn 1913). Philosophen-Lexikon, ed. W. ZIEGENFUSS, 2 v. (Berlin 1949) 1:369–370. A. W. ZIEGLER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 16.2:1753–54. J. HANSLMEIER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65).

[J. C. BUCKLEY]

FROILÁN, ST.

Patron and bishop of León; b. Lugo, Spain, 832; d. León, 905. With St. ATTILANUS he combined the life of a hermit in the mountains of Galicia with that of a preacher. In Viseu, at popular request, he founded a flourishing monastery of 300 confessors. Alfonso III of Oviedo authorized him to build large monasteries on his southern frontier to further repopulation. Two such monasteries were founded by 900, when Froilán, against his will, was made bishop of León. In his last years he had the gift of prophecy. His religious practices resemble somewhat those of the Mozarabs at this time. He was included in the Roman martyrology in 1724.

Feast: Oct. 3.

Bibliography: H. FLÓREZ, España sagrada, 54 v. (Madrid 1747–1957) 34:422–425. A. LAMBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART (Paris 1912–) 5:169–170. J. GONZÁLEZ, San Froilán de León (León 1946).

[E. P. COLBERT]

FROUDE, RICHARD HURRELL

A leader of the OXFORD MOVEMENT; b. Dartington, England, March 25, 1803; d. Dartington, Feb. 28, 1836. He was the eldest son of Robert Hurrell Froude, a vicar who became archdeacon of Totnes, and the brother of James Anthony Froude, a noted historian. He attended Oriel College, Oxford, where he was elected fellow (1826) and was ordained an Anglican priest (1829). At Oxford he came under the influence of John KEBLE, who converted him to HIGH CHURCH views. Froude was instrumental in bringing Keble and John Henry NEWMAN together, thus laying the foundations for the Oxford Movement. Froude contributed three tracts to the Tracts for the Times and several poems to the Lyra Apostolica (1836), but illness cut short his activities. The posthumous publication of his private papers, Remains (1838–39), revealed how far he had advanced toward a complete acceptance of Catholicism. Although he advocated clerical celibacy, was devoted to the Blessed Virgin and the saints, and was sharply critical of the Protestant Reformation, he still rejected Romanism at the time of his death.

Bibliography: Remains of the Late Reverend Richard Hurrell Froude, ed. J. H. NEWMAN and J. KEBLE, 2 v. in 4 (London 1838–39). L. I. GUINEY, Hurrell Froude (London 1904).

[T. S. BOKENKOTTER]

FRUCTUOSUS OF BRAGA, ST.

Monastic founder and archbishop of Braga, Portugal; d. San Salvador de Montelios, Spain, April 16, 665. Fructuosus, of a noble family, studied under Bishop Conantius of Palencia, then retired into a solitude near Astorga, Spain, where he founded the monastery of Complutum whence six further foundations were begun in Galicia and Baetica. He likewise organized double MONASTERIES. He was consecrated bishop and abbot of Dumium, and was named archbishop of Braga by the Tenth Council of Toledo (656). He devoted himself in particular to the spread of monasticism, writing a Regula monachorum and a Regula communis that were observed in the monasteries of Galicia and Portugal until the 11th century. His Pactum, or act of religious profession, shows the strong influence of Germanic law. A letter to BRAULIO of Saragossa and another to King Receswinth have been preserved. His life was written by the monk Valerius; in 1102 his relics were transported to Compostela, where they continue to repose in the church of S. Jerónimo de Real.

Feast: April 16.

Bibliography: Opera omnia, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 87:1087–1131; Epistola ad Braulionem, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 80:690–692. M. C. DÍAZ Y DÍAZ, La vida de San Fructuoso de Braga (Braga 1974). San Fructuoso y su tiempo, ed. F. A. DIEZ GONZÁLEZ et al. (León 1966). I. HERWEGEN, Das Pactum des hl. Fructuosus von Braga (Amsterdam 1965). VALERIUS, Vita, tr. F. C. NOCK (Washington 1946). J. PÉREZ DE URBEL, Los monjes españoles en la edad media, 2 v. (Madrid 1933–34). G. BARDY, Catholicisme 4:1655–56.

[L. VEREECKE]

FRUCTUOSUS OF TARRAGONA, ST.

Bishop and martyr; d. 259. On being summoned before Aemilianus, Roman Governor of Tarragona, who was enforcing the second edict of the Emperors Valerian and Gallienus against the Christians, he did not hesitate to state that he was a bishop, and he and his two deacons, Augurius and Eulogius, steadfastly refused to offer pagan sacrifice. They were then condemned to be burned alive in the amphitheater of Tarragona. The Acta SS. Fructuosi, Augurii et Eulogii, the earliest documents of the kind for Spain, describe the trial and death of the martyrs in a simple and realistic manner. They have an authentic character, as they are clearly based on the official report filed in the archives of the Roman governor. The veneration of Fructuosus and his deacons began immediately, and their cult spread to Africa. In his Sermon 273, In natali martyrum Fructuosi episcopi, Augurii et Eulogii diaconorum, St. AUGUSTINE relates that their Acta were read also in the Church at Hippo, and Prudentius employed them as source material for his Peristephanon 6. In the Middle Ages St. Fructuosus of Tarragona was often confused with St. FRUCTUOSUS OF BRAGA (d. 665).

Feast: Jan. 21.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Jan. 2:239–341. M. M. ESTRADA, Sant Fructuós, bisbe de Tarragona i màrtir (Barcelona 1960). T. RUINART, Acta Primorum Martyrum (Paris 1689) 220–223. P. FRANCHI DE' CAVALIERI, Note agiografiche 8 (Studi e testi 65; 1935) 127–194. G. LAZZATI, Gli sviluppi della letteratura sui martiri nei primi quattro secoli (Turin 1956). Z. GARCÍA VILLADA, Historia eclesiástica de España, 3 v. in 5 (Madrid 1929–36) 1:257–262. H. H. WARD, A Dictionary of Christian Biography, ed. W. SMITH and H. WACE, (London 1877–87) 2:571–572.

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

FRUMENTIUS, ST.

Venerated as the fourth-century apostle who converted Ethiopia to Christianity; life dates uncertain. The main Western source is RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA (Histoire Ecclesiastique 1.9). Meropius, a philosopher of Tyre, and his two young disciples, Frumentius and Aedesius, were en route to India when their ship was attacked by natives in an African harbor. The two youths were captured and kept as slaves in the personal service of the local king, after whose death Frumentius was appointed civil administrator by the queen regent; he then began his apostolate, giving full freedom of cult to Christian merchants from the Roman Empire.

When the prince and heir came of age, his mentor Aedesius returned to Tyre, where in 403 he met Rufinus. At the same time, Frumentius went to Alexandria, where St. ATHANASIUS consecrated him bishop for the region of his apostolate, to which he returned. Constantius II, who favored Arianism, wrote c. 356 asking the rulers of Aksum, the capital of Ethiopia, to expel Frumentius as a follower of the orthodox Athanasius. The Greek text of the letter, included in Athanasius's Apology (Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne 25:656–657), is clear evidence that the events narrated about Frumentius by Rufinus, who does not name the country, took place in Ethiopia. Frumentius is known in Ethiopia as Ferēmenatos and as Kasātē Berhān (Revealer of the Light). His consecration by Athanasius is the historical link between the Ethiopian Church and the Coptic Patriarchate of Alexandria. Frumentius, a Syrian, probably intentionally avoided being consecrated by his own patriarch of Antioch, then favorable to Arianism.

Feast: Oct. 27; Aug. 1 (Hamlē); Aug. 26 (Ethiopian Church).

Bibliography: I. GUIDI, ed. and tr., Synaxaire Ethiopien, Patrologia orientalis, ed. R. GRAFFIN and F. NAU 7:427–429. E. CERULLI, “Punti di vista sulla storia di Etiopia,” Atti del Primo Convegno Internazionale di Studi Etiopici (Rome 1960) 21–22.

[E. CERULLI]

FRUTOLF OF MICHELSBERG

Historian and musicologist; d. Abbey of Michelsberg, Bamberg, Germany, Jan. 17, 1103. Probably a priest before becoming a Benedictine, Frutolf taught in the Michelsberg monastic school and possibly held the office of prior. During the last four years of his life he composed his Chronicon (autograph MS Jena 19), a history of the world to 1101. This work was overshadowed by the plagiarized and tendentious version of Ekkehard of Aura (d. 1125), and its author was forgotten. Yet, in its original form it ranks as one of the most distinguished world histories written in the Middle Ages. In its composition Frutolf drew from a staggering wealth of historical sources in bringing the account to his day, and with chronological and critical insight he produced an accurate, comprehensive, and readable narrative. The Chronicon is especially notable for its objectivity in the period for which its author is a contemporary witness, citing in evidence papal documents, letters, and official acts. Frutolf is credited also with the De officiis divinis and with several musicological works, viz, Breviarium de musica, Tonarius, and possibly the Rithmimachia, in which he depended on the work of BOETHIUS, GUIDO OF AREZZO, and HERMANNUS CONTRACTUS.

Bibliography: FRUTOLF-EKKEHARD, Chronicon, ed. G. WAITZ, Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores (Berlin 1825–) 6:33–267. H. BRESSLAU, Neuses Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde 21 (1895) 197–234. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 3:350–361. W. WATTENBACH, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter. Deutsche Kaiserzeit, ed., R. HOLTZMANN, v1.1–4 (3d ed. Tübingen 1948; repr. of 2d ed. 1938–43) 1:491–506. J. SCHAMLE-OTT, “Die Rezension C der Weltchronik Ekkehards,” Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 12 (1956) 363–387.

[O. J. BLUM]

FRUTTUARIA, ABBEY OF

Former BENEDICTINE monastery, near Volpiano, in the Piedmont, Italy, about ten miles from Turin. It was founded in the early 11th century by WILLIAM OF SAINT-BÉNIGNE OF DIJON and his uncle, Count Arduin of Ivrea, who died at Fruttuaria in 1015. William, a native of Volpiano, had been a monk of CLUNY and Saint-Bénigne in Dijon. The abbey enjoyed Episcopal EXEMPTION from 1029 on. The life of its monks was so exemplary that they were requested—even beyond the dependent houses Fruttuaria founded—to reform the older monasteries all over north Italy, Corsica, and as far away as Lorraine. Thus, was founded the great Congregatio Fructuariensis. Meanwhile, the arts and scholarship flourished at the motherhouse. The abbey became excessively rich, to the point where it had its own mint. This led to decline and ruin, and in 1477 Pope Sixtus IV gave it into COMMENDATION. In 1617 the abbey was secularized and became a collegiate church. The Savoys, who had been commendatories since the time of Emanuele Filiberto in 1577, occupied the abbatial territories in 1710 with troops; after a long fight and excommunication (1741) of the commendatory abbots, Pope Benedict XIV had to recognize the state of affairs by abolishing the abbatial fief. During the Napoleonic era, French invaders did irreparable damage to Fruttuaria: the library was destroyed, the school suppressed, the goods and chattels sold, and the territory of the Abbot Nullius abolished (1803). After a brief restoration of the abbey, the Piedmont government finally suppressed it in 1848. A Salesian Institute was later built on the site. The Chronicon Fructuariense has not yet been edited.

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topographique des abbayes et prieurés 1:1227–28. F. UGHELLI, Italia sacra, ed. N. COLETI, 10 v. in 9 (2d ed. Venice 1717–22) 4:1066–68. G. PENCO, Storia del monachesimo in Italia (Rome 1961) 206–208.

[I. DE PICCOLI]

FRY, ELIZABETH

Philanthropist, prison reformer; b. Norwich, England, May 21, 1780; d. Ramsgate, England, Oct. 12, Elizabeth Fry.

1845. Her father, John Gurney, a Quaker merchant and banker, provided her with no formal education. Although she was at first attracted to deism, she was converted to primitive Quakerism by an American, William Savery, and by Joseph Fry, whom she married in 1800, and by whom she had 11 children. Influenced by the deaths of her father and father-in-law, Fry entered the Quaker ministry in 1811. Her work at Newgate prison, which was prompted by her two Quaker brothers-in-law and facilitated by her husband's business reputation, began in 1817. She developed a program of prison reform that included education, paid employment, association by day, solitude by night, rewards, and women warders for female prisoners. While promoting her reforms through extensive travels, correspondence, and published reports, she found time for other philanthropic activities, the most important of which was founding an order of nursing sisters. Two of her daughters edited her Memoirs, with Extracts from Her Journals and Letters.

See Also: FRIENDS, RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF.

Bibliography: J. WHITNEY, Elizabeth Fry (Boston 1936). J. KENT, Elizabeth Fry (New York 1963).

[E. E. BEAUREGARD]

FUCHS, JOSEF

Moral theologian; b. Bergisch Gladbach, Germany, July 5, 1912. Fuchs entered the diocesan seminary of Cologne in 1931 and was ordained a priest of that diocese in 1937. He studied at the Gregorian University, receiving licentiates in philosophy and theology. In 1938 he entered the German province of the Society of Jesus and received an S.T.D. from the Jesuit theologate at Falkenberg, Holland, in 1940. After four years in parish work, he returned to study, receiving a Th.D. from the University of Münster in 1946. Having taught moral theology at St. George Hochschule from 1947, Fuchs was appointed to the faculty of the Gregorian University in Rome in 1954. Although he reached the mandatory retirement age of seventy in 1982, he remained active, providing consultation to faculty and students of the Gregorian.

A prolific author, Fuchs's writings include 14 books, several of which are collections of essays, as well as more than 50 other articles. Over the years, he gave extended attention to a wide variety of issues. His early writings focus on the theology of sexuality and marriage in St. Thomas Aquinas. Between 1958 and 1960 he published four textbooks on various areas of moral theology patterned on the classic "manualist" tradition but introducing new insights, which he used in his teaching at the Gregorian University and which were exported by his multinational student population. The early 1960s were especially fruitful, resulting in articles on new issues in sexual ethics, the place of law in human society, and a sundry other topics. In 1965 he published Natural Law: A Theological Investigation, a major work in the field of Catholic moral theology and a pivotal document in Fuchs's own intellectual history. It coincided with a long series of publications exploring the implications for moral theology of the vision of Vatican II, particularly as that vision is articulated in Gaudium et spes.

A major turning point in his career was Fuchs's membership on the Papal Commission on Family, Births, and Population of 1965–68. He is alleged to have been an author of the so-called "majority report" that Pope Paul VI ultimately rejected in the writing of Humanae Vitae. In any case, Fuchs's views on the permanence, universality, and exceptionlessness of concrete moral norms changed as a result of his reflections during these years.

Though Fuchs has addressed a variety of specific questions, his abiding focus, particularly in the years since Vatican II, has been the core commitments on which a Christian morality is based. He discussed the character of the natural law, the relationship of human morality and Christian life, the identity of the moral person, the shape and limits of moral norms, the role of conscience, issues of secularism and religious commitment, and the significance of moral community, especially the Catholic Church as an institution, for personal moral decision making. In many of these areas, Fuchs gives evidence of being deeply influenced by the theological anthropology of Karl RAHNER.

Fuchs's influence has been worldwide, thanks to his role at the Gregorian University. That influence is greater yet because he taught in the ecclesiastical period prior to, during, and since the Second Vatican Council. Indeed, he is both a commentator on and a major contributor to the renewal of moral theology occurring in this period. Along with his colleague at the Alphonsianum University, Bernard Häring (also born in 1912), Fuchs has been described as a "revisionist" and associated with the methodology of proportionalism.

Bibliography: F. FUCHS, Natural Law: A Theological Investigation (New York 1965); Human Values and Christian Morality (Dublin 1970); Personal Responsibility and Christian Morality (Washington 1983); Christian Ethics in a Secular Arena (Washington 1984); Christian Morality: The Word Becomes Flesh (Washington 1987); Moral Demands & Personal Obligations (Washington 1993). T. O'CONNELL, Changing Roman Catholic Moral Theology: A Study in Josef Fuchs (Ann Arbor 1974).

[T. E. O'CONNELL]

FUENTE, MICHAEL DE LA

Carmelite spiritual writer; b. Valdelaguna, a village between Madrid and Toledo, March 2, 1573; d. Toledo, Nov. 27, 1625 (Nov. 17, 1626?). He was professed as a Carmelite on May 29, 1594, and then studied philosophy and theology at the University of Salamanca. After the province of New Castile was separated from that of Old Castile, he retained the office of novice master in the new province. He spent the rest of his life in Toledo, where he wrote a rule for the Carmelite Third Order that was highly important in the development of that group. Especially devoted to the Eucharist, the Passion, the Immaculate Conception, and the Brown Scapular, he is said to have had the extraordinary graces of ecstasy, levitation, and prophecy. Miracles before and after his death are reported. Several years after he died, his body was found incorrupt; his cause for beatification was introduced at Rome shortly after death. A nephew (d. 1629) of the same name was also a Carmelite. La Fuente's principal writing, Libro de las tres vidas del hombre corporal, racional y espiritual (Toledo 1623), an ascetical and mystical work, has assured him of a significant place among spiritual writers in and outside of his order.

Bibliography: T. MOTTA NAVARRO, Tertii Carmelitici saecularis ordinis historico-iuridica evolutio (Rome 1960) 178–194. A. DE SAINT PAUL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 10 (Paris

Jakob Fugger, from a woodcut by Hans Burgkmair.
(©Bettmann/CORBIS)

1903–50) 2:1703–05. H. ERHARTER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–) 7: 395–396.

[K. J. EGAN]

FUGGER

Family of prominent early south German capitalists, enjoying immense wealth and great, if not commensurate, political influence. Ulrich Fugger, who moved to Augsburg in 1367, and his son Johann (d. 1409) were prosperous fustian weavers. Ulrich's grandsons, Jacob I (d. 1468) and Andreas (d. 1457), founded separate lines, though the latter soon died out. Through his in-laws, the Bässinger family, Jacob became interested in the silver mines of Schwaz in the Tyrol and extended his financial activity to the gold trade and to speculation in stock. During the last quarter of the 15th century the family wealth was increased enormously by Jacob's three sons, Ulrich I (d. 1510), Georg (d. 1506), and Jacob II (d. 1525). The acquisitive instincts of the youngest son, Jacob, made him an archetype of the early modern capitalist. He studied commerce in Venice, married the granddaughter of the merchant Ulrich Arzt the Rich, participated in the East India spice trade, and enlarged the family's mining and land holdings. The Fuggers became involved in ecclesiastical finance, organizing the transfer of money resulting from traffic in INDULGENCES and other revenues, financing the travels of papal legates and nuncios, and making large loans to churchmen. The Fuggers secretly lent ALBRECHT OF BRANDENBURG the 34,000 ducats that he needed in order to obtain the papal dispensation and the pallium, and to take care of related expenses, when he wished to add the archbishopric of MAINZ to his offices. This transaction led to the sale of indulgences for repayment and precipitated Martin LUTHER'S protest in 1517. Fugger money influenced papal elections and in 1519 was a decisive factor in securing the election of CHARLES V as Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire. Jacob remained neutral at the start of the Reformation, but after 1525 he became increasingly firm in his support of the Catholic Church. In Augsburg, he built the Fugger tomb chapel of St. Anna, hired Renaissance artists to decorate the Fugger palace, and in 1519 founded the Fuggerei, the first social settlement for poor workers, consisting of 106 houses at nominal rent. Jacob was childless and willed his holdings to his brother Georg's sons, Raymund (d. 1535) and Anton (d. 1560). Anton involved the family in risky political loans for the wars against the Turks and for the Hapsburg struggles with the Valois Kings of France. He supported Charles V against the German Protestants in 1546 and 1547 and again in 1552, losing large sums by default. Although Raymund's son, Ulrich II the Younger, decided in favor of the REFORMATION, the family as such remained with the Catholic Church, helping to establish a Jesuit College in Augsburg and supporting a number of prominent clergymen in later years, notably Sigmund Friedrich (d. 1600), Bishop of Regensburg, and Jacob (d. 1626), Bishop of Constance. Although lineal descendants of the family are still active today in finance and commerce, the family's power and influence waned rapidly after the THIRTY YEARS' WAR.

Bibliography: R. EHRENBERG, Das Zeitalter der Fugger, 2 v. (Jena 1896). A. SCHULTE, Die Fugger in Rom, 1495–1523, 2 v. in 1 (Leipzig 1904). J. STRIEDER, Jacob Fugger der Reiche (Leipzig 1926); Eng. tr. M. L. HARTSOUGH, ed. N. S. B. GRAS (New York 1931). E. HERING, Die Fugger (Leipzig 1939). G. VON PÖLNITZ, Die Fugger (2d ed. Frankfurt am Main 1960).

[L. W. SPITZ]

FULBERT OF CHARTRES

Bishop; b.c. 960; d. April 10, 1028. He was born of a poor and non-noble family, probably in northern France. He studied under Gerbert (SYLVESTER II) at Reims and then went to CHARTRES, where he taught in the cathedral school. He was ordained to the diaconate by 1004 and became bishop of Chartres in September or October 1006. As one of the principal churchmen in northern France and as bishop of a royal diocese, Fulbert was involved in the many ecclesiastical and secular controversies of his day. He was most anxious to remedy the abuses of SIMONY and clerical marriage and to free the Church from the control of the feudal nobility. Especially important were his efforts to uphold canonical regulations concerning episcopal elections and his attempts to reinforce the spiritual and temporal authority of the diocesan bishop. Yet Fulbert accepted the customary medieval notions of divine-right kingship and the long-standing traditions of royal influence within the French Church. He supported King Robert II of France in his struggle against the nobles and on several occasions actively intervened in an effort to restore peace. Fulbert was well educated for his time. He knew the standard classical and Christian authors and was exceptionally learned in ecclesiastical and secular law. There is no evidence to indicate that he continued to teach after his episcopal consecration, but he did maintain close contact with the students who came to Chartres. His advice was often sought on both scholarly and practical matters, and he corresponded with some of the most famous leaders of his time, including Abbots ABBO OF FLEURY and ODILO OF CLUNY, and Duke William V of Aquitaine. Fulbert was an ardent promoter of devotion to the Blessed Virgin, and he began the rebuilding of Chartres Cathedral, which had been destroyed by fire in 1020. In 1022 he made a pilgrimage to Rome and sometime later was made treasurer of St. Hilary's at Poitiers by Duke William. Fulbert was buried in the monastery church of St. Père-de-Chartres. Although he has long been popularly venerated as a saint, it was only in the mid-19th century that his cult was officially sanctioned for the Dioceses of Chartres and Poitiers.

Feast: April 10.

Bibliography: Collected works in Patrologia Latina 141:185–368. F. BEHREND, The Letters and Poems of Fulbert of Chartres (Oxford 1976). C. PFISTER, De Fulberti Carnotensis Episcopi, Vita et Operibus (Nancy 1885). L. C. MACKINNEY, Bishop Fulbert and Education at the School of Chartres (Notre Dame, Ind. 1957), with older bibliography. Y. DELAPORTE, "F. de C. et l'école chartraine de chant liturgique au XI^e siècle," Études Grégoriennes 2 (1957) 51–81. J. R. GEISELMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:443. J. M. CANAL, "Los sermones marianos de San Fulberto de C. (†1028)," Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 29 (1962) 33–51; 30 (1963), 55–87, 329–333. H. BARRÉ, Prières anciennes de l'occident à la mère du Sauveur (Paris 1963) 150–162.

[F. BEHREND]

FULCHER OF CHARTRES

Crusade chronicler; b. c. 1059; d. c. 1127. Fulcher was raised at Chartres and was ordained before 1096. In 1095 he was present at the Council of Clermont when Pope URBAN II proclaimed the First Crusade (see CRUSADES). Fulcher's description of the Council and of the Pope's proclamation of the Crusade is an important eyewitness account. Fulcher joined the Crusade as chaplain to Count Stephen of Blois and Chartres. In 1097 Fulcher joined the retinue of another crusading prince, BALDWIN I, who later became Count of Edessa and King of Jerusalem. He accompanied Baldwin to Jerusalem when he assumed the throne of the Latin Kingdom on Nov. 9, 1100 (see CRUSADERS' STATES) and later appears as a royal chaplain and canon of the Holy Sepulcher. He may also have been appointed prior of Mt. Olivet. After the death of Baldwin I, Fulcher was also close to his successor, Baldwin II. Late in 1101 Fulcher began writing his Historia Hierosolymitana, on which he worked intermittently for more than a quarter of a century. Fulcher's account remains a major and unusually reliable source for the history of the First Crusade and of the Latin settlements in the Holy Land.

Bibliography: FULCHER OF CHARTRES, Historia Hierosolymitana, ed. H. HAGENMEYER (Heidelberg 1913); Chronicle of the First Crusade, tr. M. E. MCGINTY (Philadelphia 1941), Bk. I of the Historia. D. C. MUNRO, "A Crusader," Speculum 7 (1932) 321–335.

[J. A. BRUNDAGE]

FULCOIUS OF BEAUVAIS

Archdeacon, writer of Latin verse; fl. during the last half of the 11th century; b. Beauvais; d. Meaux, France. He composed three volumes of verse: Uter (epitaphs and letters), Neuter (lives of SS. Agil, Blandinus, Faro, and Maurus), and Uterque (Biblical narrative of Christ and His Church). Fulcoius's letters to ecclesiastical and political leaders reflect the moral-ethical condition of the time and show the nature of the obstacles facing Pope GREGORY VII in his reform. Familiarity with classical poets and the Church Fathers adds charm and value to his work, meriting for Fulcoius a place in the history of medieval poetry.

Bibliography: FULCOIUS OF BEAUVAIS, Utriusque de nuptiis Christi et ecclesiae libri septem, ed. M. I. J. ROUSSEAU (Washington 1960). Manitius 3:836–840. A. BOUTEMY, "Essai de chronologie des poésies de Foulcoie de Beauvais," Annuaire de l'Institut de philologie et d'histoire Orientales et Slaves de l'Université Libre de Bruxelles 11 (Mélanges Henri Grégoire 3; Brussels 1951) 79–96. M. L. COLKER, "Fulcoii Belvacensis epistulae," Traditio 10 (1954) 191–273.

[M. I. J. ROUSSEAU]

FULCRAN OF LODÈVE, ST.

Bishop; d. Feb. 13, 1006. Fulcran's great reputation for virtue led Bishop Thierry of his native Lodève, Languedox (southern France), to ordain him priest in spite of Fulcran's reluctance. By popular acclaim he was made Thierry's successor in 949. Through periodic episcopal visitations he insisted upon regular discipline in religious houses and outspokenly condemned the sins of the highborn as well as of the low. He befriended the poor, founded Saint-Sauveur for Benedictine nuns, and built the cathedral church of St. GENESIUS, in which he was buried. Once, upon hearing of a bishop who had fallen into Judaism, he remarked in emotion that he should be burned; and then, overwhelmed with remorse when taken literally, he undertook enormous penances and made a pilgrimage to Rome to seek forgiveness. His body was exhumed in 1127, but only some of his relics survived a Huguenot sack of his shrine in 1572.

Feast: Feb. 13 (Montpellier and Nîmes).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Feb. 2:711–718, 898–900. A. BEC, Vie de saint Fulcran (Lodève 1858). H. REYNIS, Les Reliques de St. F. de Lodève (Lodève 1861). ABBÉ BOUTY, Vie de St. F. (Montpellier 1865). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 2:310–311.

[W. E. WILKIE]

FULDA, ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine monastery in the town of the same name, 54 miles northeast of Frankfurt am Main, Germany, Diocese of Fulda. It was founded March 12, 744, by STURMI, a disciple of St. BONIFACE. The Frankish mayor of the palace and Pope ZACHARY granted it special privileges, and it remained Boniface's own monastery until his martyrdom (754), after which his remains were translated to Fulda. Boniface and Sturmi had organized the abbey according to the BENEDICTINE RULE, combining elements of Anglo-Saxon origin with the monastic customs of Monte Cassino. Pepin made it a royal abbey (764–765). Fulda received numerous donations, and its territorial domain soon extended through all of what was then Germany.

By 780 CHARLEMAGNE had sent monks of Fulda on the mission to the Saxons. Construction on Fulda's great Holy Savior Basilica over the tomb of St. Boniface began c. 790, and the edifice, probably the first double-choired church in the West, was consecrated in 819. The smaller St. Michael's Chapel, still in use, was built in 822 in the monastery cemetery. Fulda, with more than 400 monks in the 9th century, possessed an important SCRIPTORIUM in which the Anglo-Saxon influence of the abbey's founding days lasted to c. 850. Notable abbots included Baugulf (780–802), Ratgar (802–817), and RABANUS MAURUS (822–842). Under their leadership, Fulda maintained an influential monastery school that produced such scholars of the 9th century as EINHARD, Lupus of Ferrières, WALAFRID STRABO, Baturich of Regensburg, Samuel of Worms, Rudolph of Fulda, Hartmut of Sankt Gallen, and GOTTSCHALK OF ORBAIS. In the Middle Ages its library had more than 2,000 MSS, containing works of ancient authors that have been preserved for the modern world only through the Fulda monks (e.g., the Annales and Germania of Tacitus); the MSS were scattered in the Thirty Years' War. Fulda was also a cradle of Old High German literature, e.g., the Vocabularius, the Hildebrandslied, the Wessobrunn Prayer(?), and the Muspilli(?).

Fulda became part of the reform movement of BENEDICT OF ANIANE (817–818). In 1013 the monastic reform of Lorraine (see GORZE) was instituted at Fulda by Emperor Henry II; Fulda became a model monastery, transplanting its observance to other monasteries in Hesse and Thuringia. From the 10th to the 12th century it was the most important imperial abbey in Germany; its abbot gradually became the abbot primate (969) of Germany and Gaul, assumed the office of archchancellor of the Empress, and was granted pontifical rights (1133). During this period MANUSCRIPT ILLUMINATION, such as that of the Fulda Sacramentary, murals as in the churches of Petersberg and Neuenberg, gold work, and sculpture, were at their zenith in Fulda.

The numerous privileges granted to Fulda made it easy for the abbey to organize its land holdings into a territorial state in the 13th century; the abbot held the rank of a prince of the Holy Roman Empire. Although the abbot had managed to quell the monastery's rebellious vassals during the 13th century, in 1353 and 1395 he was forced to grant them, as concessions to gain election, the right to participate in the government of the principality. When the household of the abbot became separate from the monastery proper (1294), grave irregularities in monastic discipline began to occur, especially as the community was accepting only noblemen as monks. Fulda was not affected by the numerous Benedictine reforms of the late Middle Ages.

The monastic state of Fulda was severely disturbed during the Peasants' War in 1525; simultaneously, the Protestant Reformation was penetrating the principality. Important abbots, such as Balthasar von Dernbach (1570–1606) and Schenk von Schweinsberg (1623–32), successfully resisted the dissolution of Fulda and worked toward a Catholic restoration. Monks from SANKT GALLEN helped reform the monastery. As early as 1571 the Jesuits had come to the town of Fulda, and thanks to them the principality had been restored to Catholicism by c. 1620. Franciscans established at the Frauenberg in 1620, and Benedictine nuns, from 1631, also played a part in revitalizing Catholicism throughout the principality. The Thirty Years' War (1618–48) severely damaged both the abbey and countryside, but abbots during the late 17th century laid the foundation for an artistic and intellectual revival. Among them were Athanasius KIRCHER, Christoph BROUWER, and Count Friedrich von SPEE. During the baroque period several important edifices were erected in the town of Fulda, including a new abbey church (the present cathedral), the orangery, and Schloss Adolfsseck.

On Oct. 5, 1752, the abbot of Fulda was made bishop of the newly created exempt Diocese of Fulda; the monks, who were to function as the cathedral chapter, kept their monastic constitution. In 1755 the Diocese of Fulda was placed under the metropolitan of Mainz, while the abbey kept its exempt status. Under Bishop-Abbot Heinrich von Bibra (1759–88), the monastic state of Fulda experienced an economic revival, city development, and improvement in educational and pastoral care. As a result of the Treaty of Paris (1802) and the 1803 enactment of the delegates of the Empire the Diocese of Fulda was secularized, and the abbey was suppressed.

Bibliography: Sources. Annales Fuldenses antiqui, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptorum 3:116–117. "Das Chronicon Laurissense breve." ed. H. SCHNORR VON CAROLSFELD, Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde 36 (1910) 13–39. Annales Fuldenses, ed. F. KURZE (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptorum: Scriptorum rerum Germanicarum 7; 1891). Annales sancti Bonifatii, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptorum 3:117–118. Catalogus abbatum Fuldensium, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptorum 13:272–274, 370. Miracula sanctorum in Fuldenses ecclesias translatorum, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptorum 15.1:328–341. Biographies. Vitae sancti Bonifatii archiepiscopi Moguntini, ed. W. LEVISON (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptorum: Scriptorum rerum Germanicarum 57; 1905). Eigilis vita sancti Sturmi, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptorum 2:365–377. Vitae Leobae abbatissae Bischofheimensis, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptorum 15.1:118–131. Vitae Eigilis abbatis Fuldensis, ibid. 221–233 and Candidus de vita Aegili, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Poetae 2:94–117. Vita Bardonis archiepiscopi Moguntini, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptorum 11:321–342. Monumenta Germaniae Historica Libri confraternitatum (1884) 194–203. Annales necrologici Fuldenses, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptorum 13:161–218. Necrologium Fuldense, ed. E. DÜMMLER, Forschungen zur deutschen Geschichte 16 (1876) 168–177. Charters. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Diplomata passim. E. E. STENGEL, Urkundenbuch des Klosters Fulda, I. (Marburg 1958). E. F. J. DRONKE, ed., Traditiones et antiquitates Fuldenses (Fulda 1844); Codex diplomaticus Fuldensis, 4 fasc. (Kassel 1847–50). Letters. S. Bonifatii et Lulli epistolae, ed. M. TANGEL (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae selectae 1; 2d ed. 1955). Supplex Libellus monachorum Fuldensium, ed. J. SEMMLER, in Corpus consuetudinum monasticarum. I., ed. K. HALLINGER (Siegburg 1963) 319–327. Hrabani Mauri . . . epistolae, in Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae Karolini aevi 5.2:379–516. Epistolarum Fuldensium fragmenta, ibid. 517–533. Thiostrochi diaconi epistola, ed. W. WATTENBACH, Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für älterer deutsche Geschichtskunde 4 (1879) 409–412. Titles and epitaphs. Notae dedicationum Fuldenses, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptorum 15.2:1287–88. Tituli ecclesiarum Fuldensium. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Poetae 2:205–217, 220–224. Epitaphia Eigilis abbatis Fuldensis, ibid. 117. Epitaphium Hattonis abbatis Fuldensis, ibid. 258. Sacramentary of Fulda. G. RICHTER and A. SCHÖNFELDER, Sacramentarium Fuldense saeculi X. (Quellen und Abhandlungen zur Geschichte der Abtei und der Diözese Fulda 9; Fulda 1912). Literature. Quellen und Abhandlungen zur Geschichte der Abtei und Diözese Fulda, eds. G. RICHTER and L. PRALLE (Fulda 1904–). Veröffentlichungen des Fuldaer Geschichtsvereins (Fulda 1899–). Fuldaer Geschichtsblätter (Fulda 1902–). C. BROWERUS, Fuldensium antiquitatum libri IV (Antwerp 1612). J. F. SCHANNAT, Dioecesis Fuldensis cum annexa sua hierarchia . . . (Frankfurt 1727); Historia Fuldensis, 2 v. (Frankfurt 1729). W. DERSCH, Hessisches Klosterbuch (2d ed. Marburg 1940) 39–52, with sources and literature up to 1939. A. SCHMITT, Die Fuldaer Wandmalerei des frühen Mittelalters (Fulda 1949). K. HALLINGER, Gorze-Kluny, 2 v. (Studia anselmiana 22–25; 1950–51), passim. P. J. JÖRG, Würzburg and Fulda (Quellen und Forschungen zur Geschichte des Bistums und Hochstifts Würzburg 1951). H. BEUMANN, “Zur Fuldaer Geschichte,” Hessisches Jahrbuch für Landesgeschichte 1 (1951) 211–217, with literature. L. PRALLE, Die Wiederentdeckung des Tacitus (Quellen und Abhandlungen zur Geschichte der Abtei und der Diözese Fulda 17; Fulda 1952). K. LÜBECK, Fuldaer Studien, 3 v. (Veröffentlichungen des Fuldaer Geschichtsvereins 27–29; Fulda 1949–51); Die Fuldaer Äbte und Fürststäbte des Mittelalters (ibid. 31; Fulda 1952). Sankt Bonifatius: Gedenkgabe zum 1200. Todestag (Fulda 1954). T. SCHIEFFER, Winfrid-Bonifatius und die christliche Grundlegung Europas (Freiburg 1954). J. A. BORNEWASSER, Kirche und Staat in Fulda unter Friedrich Wilhelm von Oranien, 1892–1906 (Quellen und Abhandlungen zur Geschichte der Abtei und der Diözese Fulda 19; Fulda 1956). H. HACK, Der Rechtsstreit zwischen dem Fürstbischof von Würzburg und dem Fürststabt von Fulda . . . 1688–1717 (ibid. 18; 1956). R. GATTENS, Das Geld- und Münzwesen der Abtei Fulda im Hochmittelalter (Veröffentlichungen des Fuldaer Geschichtsvereins 34; Fulda 1957). A. HOFEMANN, Studien zur Entwicklung des Territoriums der Reichsabtei Fulda und seiner Ämter (Schriften des Hessischen Landesamtes für geschichtliche Landeskunde 25; Marburg 1958). H. BÜTTNER, “Das Diplom Heinrichs III. für Fulda von 1049 und die Anfänge der Stadt Fulda,” Archiv für Diplomatik 4 (1958) 207–215. J. SEMMLER, “Studien zum Supplex libellus und zur anianischen Reform in Fulda,” Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 69 (1958) 268–298. E. E. STENGEL, Die Reichsabtei Fulda in der deutschen Geschichte (Weimar 1948); “Zur Frühgeschichte der Reichsabtei Fulda,” Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 9 (1952) 513–534, with literature; “Fuldensia I–V,” Archiv für Urkundenforschung 5 (1913) 41–152; 7 (1920) 1–26; Archiv für Diplomatik 2 (1956) 116–124; 4 (1958) 120–182; ibid. 8 (1962) 12–67; Abhandlungen und Untersuchungen zur hessischen Geschichte (Veröffentlichungen der historischen Kommission für Hessen und Waldeck 26; Marburg 1960). W. A. MÜHL, Die Aufklärung an der Universität Fulda . . . 1734–1805 (Quellen und Abhandlungen zur Geschichte der Abtei und der Diözese Fulda 20; Fulda 1961). W. HESSLER, “Zur Abfassungszeit von Eigils Vita Sturmii,” Hessisches Jahrbuch für Landesgeschichte 9 (1959) 1–17; “Petitionis exemplar,” Archiv für Diplomatik 8 (1962) 1–11. D. GROSSMANN, Kloster Fulda und seine Bedeutung für den frühen deutschen Kirchenbau v. 1 (Das erste Jahrtausend) (Düsseldorf 1962) 344–370. K. WITTSTADT, Placidus von Droste, Fürststabt von Fulda (Veröffentlichungen des Fuldaer Geschichtsvereins 39; Fulda 1963). F. W. WITZEL, Die Reichsabtei Fulda und ihre Hochvögte, die Grafen von Ziegenhain, im 12. und 13. Jahrhundert (ibid. 41; 1963). W. HESSLER, “Von Ratger zu Hraban: Fulda im Anfang des 9. Jahrhunderts,” in Archiv für Diplomatik (1965–66).

[J. SEMMLER]

FULGENTIUS OF ÉCIJA, ST.

Bishop of Écija; b. Seville(?), Spain, c. 540–60; d. Écija(?), c. 619. He is one of four saints in an important Hispano-Roman family that had migrated, probably before his birth, from Byzantine-held Cartagena on the Mediterranean to Visigothic Seville on the Atlantic. He attended the Councils of Toledo (610) and Seville (619). His older brother, LEANDER, in his De institutione virginum, advised their sister FLORENTINA to pray for Fulgentius, whom he had sent to Cartagena. His younger brother, ISIDORE OF SEVILLE, wrote the De officiis ecclesiasticis at his request (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 217 v. 83:737). Certain Spanish Breviaries attribute to Fulgentius writings by Fulgentius of Ruspe and Fabius Planciades Fulgentius; but N. Antonio in 1696 and E. Flórez in 1753 refuted these claims. A like attribution that he was bishop of Cartagena seems to have arisen about 1330 when his relics were discovered near Guadalupe. In 1593 the relics were shared with the Escorial and the See of Cartagena, of which Fulgentius is patron saint. His cult in Spain is immemorial.

Feast: Jan. 16.

Bibliography: Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 2:4810. N. ANTONIO, Bibliotheca Hispana vetus, 2 v. (Madrid 1788) 1:306–314. H. FLÓREZ, et al., España Sagrada (Madrid 1747–1957) 10:88–107. U. CHEVALIER, Répertoire des sources historiques du moyen-âge. Biobibliographie, 2 v. (2d. ed. Paris 1905–07) 1:1626. H. WARD, A Dictionary of Christian Biography, ed. W. SMITH and H. WACE, (London 1877–87) 2:584–585. Enciclopedia universal ilustrada Europeo-Americana, 70 v. (Barcelona 1908–30) 25:11. G. BARDY, Catholicisme 4:1668–69.

[E. P. COLBERT]

FULGENTIUS OF RUSPE

Sixth-century African bishop and theologian; b. Telepte, North Africa, 467; d. Jan. 1, 533. Fulgentius, the outstanding Western theologian of the early 6th century, came of a well-to-do family and received a sound education in Greek as well as Latin literature. He entered the civil service and was the procurator or tax collector of Telepte when, on reading Augustine's commentary on Psalm 36, he decided to become a monk. In 507 he was selected as bishop of Ruspe, a small seaside town in Byzacena; but in 508, with 60 other African bishops, he was exiled to Sardinia by the Vandal King Thrasamund. He returned to Ruspe in 515 but had to take up residence in Sardinia again from 517 to 523.

His writings were both dogmatic and polemic, the latter directed against the Arian doctrines of the Vandal rulers of Africa and against Pelagianism. His Contra Arianos is a reply to ten questions proposed by King Thrasamund, and his three books Ad Thrasamundum regem further elaborate the Catholic objection to Arian teaching. He composed also Contra sermonem Fastidiosi Ariani, Contra Fabianum, De Trinitate ad Felicem, and De incarnatione ad Scarilam. His tracts against SemiPelagianism include three books Ad Monimum, three books De veritate praedestinationis, and a Contra Faustum Reiensem in seven books, which has not been preserved.

His De fide ad Petrum is a compendium of dogmatic theology formerly attributed to Augustine. He wrote two books De remissione peccatorum ad Euthymium and a lost Adversus Pintam. The tract under that name (Patrologia Latina) is probably his Commonitorium de Spiritu Sancto, considered lost. He is also credited with a recently discovered Psalmus abecedarius against the Arians.

His letters are mainly long treatises dealing with virginity, marriage, and penance (Epist. 1–7); two are collective encyclicals of the exiled African bishops (15 and 17). The latter deals with the formula “one of the Trinity suffered in the Flesh” submitted for the bishops’ judgment by the Scythian monks of Constantinople (see MONOPHYSITISM). Seven of the sermons attributed to him are authentic. The life of Fulgentius was written by the Carthaginian deacon Ferrandus soon after the bishop’s death and is one of the finest biographies of the age.

Fulgentius followed Augustinian teaching faithfully. He defended Trinitarian teaching against the Arians and explained the problem of predestination in Augustine’s terms: God’s will determines one’s predestination to glory or damnation; unbaptized infants are damned, but their punishment will be mitigated (De veritate praed. 1.1–31). Prayer and good works must be pursued, relying on the mystery of salvation. Parental concupiscence is the instrument for the transmission of original sin (De veritate praed. 3.14–23); hence he denied the Immaculate Conception of Mary (Epist. 17.6, 13).

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNÉ, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 65:105–1018. G. G. LAPEYRE, L’Ancienne église de Carthage, 2 v. (Paris 1932); ed. and tr., Vie de saint Fulgence (Paris 1929). G. KRUEGER, Harnack-Ehrung (Leipzig 1921) 219–223. B. NISTERS, Die Christologie des hl. Fulgentius (Münster 1930). A. D’ALÈS, Recherches de science religieuse 22 (1932) 304–316, Commonitorium. H. DELEHAYE, Analecta Bollandiana 52 (1934) 103–105. C. LAMBOT, Revue Bénédictine 48 (1936) 221–234, Psalmus abecedarius. F. DI SCIASCIO, Fulgenzio di Ruspe (Rome 1941).

J. BEUMER, Gregorianum 23 (1942) 325–347, de fide. J. J. GAVIGAN, Traditio (1947) 313–322, Baptism. Clavis Patrum latinorum, ed. E. DEKKERS (2d. ed. Streenbrugge 1961) 814–846. A. GRILLMEIER and H. BACHT, Das Konzil vom Chalcedon: Geschichte und Gegenwart (Würzburg 1951–54) 2:807–814, Christology. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF (New York 1960) 587–589.

[A. NEUWIRTH]

FULK OF NEUILLY, BL.

Preacher of the Fourth Crusade; d. March 2, 1201. Nothing is known of his early life, but from 1191 he was a priest in the church of Neuilly-sur-Marne near Paris. He was an eloquent speaker and served as a wandering missionary-preacher through Normandy, Picardy, and Burgundy. The historian Villehardouin stated that it was Fulk who had inspired Count Thibaut III of Champagne (d. 1201) to urge Pope INNOCENT III to organize the Fourth Crusade (1202–04), which resulted in the capture of CONSTANTINOPLE. Fulk then served as Innocent’s chief recruiting agent in France, touring the country urging the people to follow their lords to the Holy War. He died, however, before the crusade got under way. Fulk was famed for his fearlessness before princes, and he reputedly ordered King RICHARD I of England to abandon his pride, avarice, and lust. Reference to Fulk can be found in Villehardouin, Roger of Hoveden, Ralph of Coggeshall, and JACQUES DE VITRY. He was buried in Neuilly-sur-Marne.

Feast: March 2.

Bibliography: Raynald’s continuation of Baronius (1646) 1198, nn. 38–42. INNOCENT III, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNÉ, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 214:375–376. S. RUNCIMAN, A History of the Crusades, 3 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1951–54) 3:107–109. U. CHEVALIER, Répertoire des sources historiques du moyen-âge. Bibliographie, 2 v. (2d. ed. Paris 1905–07) 1:1553. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:461–462.

[V. L. BULLOUGH]

FUNCTIONALISM

Because of its affinity with American pragmatism, functionalism is one of the most influential psychologies in education. Originally it was a reaction against the structuralism popular in Germany (Wundt), but its American proponents—James Angell, William JAMES, George Mead, and John Dewey—were responsible for its development and popularity.

Functionalists view man as a highly developed biological organism, and the mind as the result of the evolutionary process. Their work contains an explicit rejection of the traditional mind-body dualism, which attributes the activities of mind such as judgment and reasoning to a spiritual soul. In the late 19th century, Dewey argued against the separation of mind and body, structure and function, stimulus and response, sensation and idea. To him idea and body were of one and the same fabric. Thus, mind is a function of the organism enabling man to interact with and adjust to the environment. As such, its operations might be compared to breathing and other biological functions except that mental action, especially thought, is normally associated with conscious activity. Explanations are sought by this school for the purpose or function of consciousness itself.

Since mind is viewed as a dynamic function, functionalism is not purely mechanistic, and a simple stimulus-response explanation of behavior is inadequate. The psychologist must study mental operations and activities, the basic "utilities" of mind used in mediating between the organism and the environment (in the adaptive activities). What the mind does is more important than its contents. Psychological investigations must also view all functions in unison. As Angell says: "Functionalism is a study of the responses of a whole individual rather than an investigation of the movements of any single part of an individual." The psychologist must give attention to phenomena as well as to behavior. Consequently, the subject matter of psychology, according to the functionalist, encompasses all acts such as seeing, hearing, tasting, thinking, and choosing as these relate to objects external to the knower and as such objects are related to other objects. However, psychology is not limited to the mere description of the physiological components of behavior, for psychology is concerned also with action, and a human act involves an awareness of a pattern of mental content, with adaptive significance, that will enable the organism to distinguish different acts through their consequences. Thus, an "act is a group or pattern of contents exhibiting a unity from the standpoint of its meaningful implications as to end result" (Angell). Because it includes so much in the psychology of behavior, functionalism lends itself readily to education and other areas of applied psychology.

The theory of learning is a central concern of the functionalist. For him, learning is not rooted in the faculty of intellect (or reason) but is conceived as a mode of reacting to problematic situations that confront the organism. However, the individual does not have to start from a clean slate in each new situation since an organic form of memory provides him with recollections of his own and others' experiences. Other factors that come into play include frequency, recentness, intensity, interest, emotion, moods, organic maturation, motivation, and forgetting with the sense receptors and the nervous system active in all phases.

Dewey's analysis of the complete act of thought reflects the principles of functional psychology. He argues that all thought or meaningful learning is initiated by a difficulty resulting from the organism's immediate inability to attain some goal. The situation is obscure and fraught with conflict and doubt. As the organism becomes aware of the difficulty it locates and defines the problem. A possible solution (or alternative solutions) is suggested, and each hypothesis is examined in terms of anticipated consequences. The hypothesis is put to the test of experience and is rejected or accepted. Acceptance follows when the situation becomes clear, coherent, settled, and harmonious; that is, when the organism has achieved a satisfactory adjustment to the environment or the difficulty disappears.

An important factor in Dewey's functionalism is the significance he gives to the role of habit in adaptive situations. Routine habits aid in adjustment where the environment is relatively static. Flexible habits, of which intelligence is one, are needed to aid the individual in his adjustment to changing environment, especially the social environment. Reflective thought, described above, is the most useful of the habits since it enables man to handle the highly complex problems of modern civilization.

Of all the theories of psychology, functionalism has had the greatest influence on modern American secular education. Adjustment, as an aim of education, the emphasis on skill in problem solving, and much of the emphasis on the "whole child" in education originated in functionalist thinking. The textbooks of adolescent and child psychology and those of educational psychology and methods used in teacher education demonstrate the influence of this school of psychology.

Its major weakness lies in interpreting human behavior in purely biological terms. It fails to recognize in man any activity, such as reasoning, that might transcend the purely organic. It fails also to provide an adequate explanation for the various states of consciousness. On the other hand, functionalism's emphasis on the dynamic nature of learning did much to break the strangle hold of purely mechanistic psychologies and their application.

Bibliography: J. R. ANGELL, An Introduction to Psychology (New York 1918). J. DEWEY, How We Think (Boston 1910); Reconstruction in Philosophy (New York 1950). J. DEWEY and A. F. BENTLEY, Knowing and the Known (Boston 1949). W. JAMES, Pragmatism: A New Name for Some Old Ways of Thinking (New York 1907). E. R. HILGARD, Theories of Learning (2d ed. New York 1956). G. MURPHY, Historical Introduction to Modern Psychology (rev. ed. New York 1949). A. ADLER et al., Psychologies of 1930, ed. C. A. MURCHISON (Worcester, Mass. 1930). B. B. WOLMAN, Contemporary Theories and Systems in Psychology, ed. G. MURPHY

(New York 1960). R. S. WOODWORTH, Contemporary Schools of Psychology (New York 1931); Dynamic Psychology (New York 1918).

[A. M. DUPUIS]

FUNDAMENTAL OPTION

The term fundamental option became popular in the 1960s. It represented an attempt to describe the basic orientation of one's moral life as a continuous process with a definite moral direction rather than as a sequence of discrete, unconnected actions. Particular acts are seen as expressing and modifying the fundamental option, confirming and developing it or diminishing and ultimately reversing it.

Existentialist and personalist analyses, combined with dynamic psychological insights, alerted theologians to the inadequacy of any atomistic picture of human actions, good or bad, into which the theological manuals had drifted. Thus the emphasis was shifted from the particular action to the living subject as the bearer of morality. The notion of a fundamental option has roots in several strata of the Christian tradition: in the prophet Jeremiah the new covenant is said to be written in the hearts of men; the New Testament insists on the interior dimension of morality; Paul frequently insists upon the centrality of a total conversion in expressions such as "life in Christ"; and also in Thomas Aquinas's discussion of the new law (Summa theologiae 1–2, 106). Within this Christian perspective, grace and sin are regarded as states of existence—the result of a fundamental option.

On the level of moral analysis, discussion of the "first moral act" (Summa theologiae 1–2, 89, 5) has led to the recognition of a person's overall commitment through his actions, so that further actions expressed and reinforced or contradicted and weakened that commitment. To understand such a commitment it may be better to consider it as gradually gathering momentum through the responses of the agent. Depending upon whether the acts are predominantly other-centered or self-centered, the person is characteristically ordered toward an altruistic or selfish life-stance. In the Christian context of love of neighbor involving love of God, the predominantly other-centered person will also be open to the Absolute other and hence in the state of grace; the predominantly self-centered person will be closed to God and hence in sin. A transition from one state to the other through conversion or mortal sin will not occur easily, but will remain an actual possibility through some serious involvement of the agent and frequently as the climax of a process. Thus the term "fundamental option" has a definite value when describing the basis of one's overall commitment, although the actual state itself is better described as a basic orientation, thereby avoiding any implications of unique dramatic choice—an experience quite foreign to most people's moral lives.

The term appears in Church documents. The Declaration on Certain Questions Concerning Sexual Ethics issued by the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith (1975) and Pope John Paul II's encyclical Veritatis splendor adopt the concept of fundamental option but link it more closely to particular acts. They insist that mortally sinful acts, done with full knowledge and consent, constitute a turning away from God and, thereby, imply the exercise of a fundamental option.

Bibliography: E. J. COOPER, "The Notion of Sin in Light of the Fundamental Option: The Fundamental Option Revisited.," Louvain Studies 9 (1983) 363–382. J. FUCHS, "Basic Freedom and Morality" Human Values and Christian Morality (Dublin 1970). E. MCDONAGH "The Moral Subject," The Irish Theological Quarterly 39 (January 1972) 3–23. L. MONDEN, Sin, Liberty and Law (New York 1965). K. RAHNER, "The Commandment of Love in Relation to the other Commandments," Theological Investigations 5 (Baltimore 1966) 439–460; "Theology of Freedom" and "Reflections on the Unity of the Love of Neighbour and Love of God," Theological Investigations 6 (Baltimore 1969) 178–196, 231–252. H. REINERS, Grundintention und Sittliches Tun (Freiburg 1966).

[E. MCDONAGH/EDS.]

FUNDAMENTAL THEOLOGY

Fundamental theology has traditionally concerned itself with the two great Christian facts: God has revealed Himself to men, and this revelation was climaxed in Christ, who founded a Church that transmits the Christian revelation. The fundamentals, or foundations, or basic elements, in the Judeo-Christian tradition are the existence of divine revelation and the transmission of this revelation to and through the people of God. The method of fundamental theology has been philosophical, historical, and theological. Because methodological questions arise only after the theological work is in progress and because of the historicist and positivistic temper of the last century, there has been a certain ambivalence as to whether fundamental THEOLOGY is properly philosophical or theological. The tendency today is to regard the discipline as strictly theological, that is, the activity of man's human reason transformed by FAITH seeking an understanding of the WORD OF GOD transmitted in the Church. As fundamental theology is now structured, it is left to prior investigation to ascertain man's cognitional powers as well as to come to a knowledge of God's existence. Some theologians, however, prefer to begin fundamental theology with the existence of a personal and provident God as known by reason and confirmed by a study of the history of religions.

K. Rahner and other scholars have pointed out that the above presentation is one-sided because it does not explain how man is capable of receiving revelation without this revelation being necessary for man. Thus, Rahner has proposed that fundamental theology concern itself more with man's openness to all being. Fundamental theology would proceed from man's openness to all being by a study of the ANALOGY of being and a careful analysis of man's OBEDIENTIAL POTENCY for revelation. Precisely because man is spirit incarnated he is open to all being. He is capable of hearing the word of God, of receiving the divine self-disclosure. An analysis of this capability, both in the abstract and as it is fulfilled in the concrete, would be the task of fundamental theology. This discipline would study man in relation to the revelation in creation, in the personal word, and in the historical deeds of God as transmitted in Scripture. The Thematik of fundamental theology would be the ontological principles of natural and supernatural theology. Some of the categories to be examined are: the forms of revelation; the demand that revelation makes upon man; revelation as intersubjectivity or divine action in opposition to revelation as past external fact; the logos as address and as meaning; the social character of revelation; the nature of word, speech, writing; the mediation of revelation; the presence of revelation in the Church. This approach to fundamental theology might well answer the questions: How can man hear the word of God? What is the word of God that man hears? Where does man receive the word of God? This type of fundamental theology would be neither exclusively historical nor philosophical but rather completely and thoroughly theological. Fundamental theology would thus be the meeting point for FAITH AND REASON, theology and philosophy, revelation and the world.

See Also: APOLOGETICS; IMMANENCE APOLOGETICS; METHODOLOGY (THEOLOGY); REVELATION, CONCEPT OF (IN THE BIBLE); REVELATION, THEOLOGY OF; REVELATION, FONTS OF; WORD OF GOD.

Bibliography: G. SÖHNGEN and H. VORGRIMLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:452–460. S. TROMP, De revelatione christiana (Rome 1950) 11–22. K. RAHNER, Theological Investigations, tr. C. ERNST et al. (Baltimore 1961—) 1:19–23. B. LONERGAN, "Theology and Understanding," Gregorianum 35 (Rome 1954) 642–644. J. THORNHILL, "Towards an Integral Theology," Theological Studies 24 (Woodstock, Md. 1963) 264–277.

[P. J. CAHILL]

FUNDAMENTALISM

An interdenominational movement that originated in American Protestantism toward the end of the 19th century.

It was a reaction against the liberal and modernistic currents of theology that infiltrated the seminaries and universities, especially in the Northern and Eastern parts of the United States. Drawing its strength principally from the rural areas and small towns of the "Bible belt" (the South and Midwest), old-fashioned evangelical faith found expression in various gatherings, notably in annual Bible conferences, at which the so-called "higher criticism" of the Bible was deplored. The Niagara Bible Conference of 1878 drew up 14 "fundamentals of the faith," which were later reduced to five: (1) the inspiration and inerrancy of the Bible; (2) the virgin birth and full deity of Christ; (3) Christ's death as a sacrifice to satisfy the divine justice; (4) Christ's bodily resurrection; and (5) Christ's return in bodily form to preside at the Last Judgment. In some lists the miracles of Christ in his public ministry took the place of his second coming as the fifth fundamental.

Origin and Development. In Los Angeles, California, two brothers, Milton and Lyman Stewart, promoted the movement by founding in 1908 the Los Angeles Bible Institute and establishing the Stewart Evangelistic fund to promote their conservative views. With their financial support a series of 12 small volumes, titled The Fundamentals: A Testimony to the Truth, were published between 1910 and 1915. The Stewarts mailed some three million copies of these books free of charge to pastors, missionaries, theology students, and church workers. These booklets, containing 90 articles by scholars from Europe and North America, defended the inspiration and total inerrancy of the Bible, opposed the "higher criticism," and attacked evolutionism and the "social gospel." Contrary to scientific biblical scholarship, they asserted that the Pentateuch (except Dt 34) was written by Moses himself.

The movement took another step forward in 1919, with the founding of the World's Christian Fundamentals Association, which published a quarterly review and conducted annual rallies in various North American cities during the next decade. About 1920 the title "Fundamentalist" first came into currency, signifying, as one newspaper expressed it, one who does "battle royal for the Fundamentals." This title was accepted by the adherents as a badge of honor. "Creation science," based on a strict interpretation of GENESIS, was promoted as an alternative to Darwinism.

During the 1920s many American Protestant churches, especially those with strong evangelical tendencies—such as the Presbyterians, Methodists, Baptists, and Disciples of Christ—became split into Fundamentalist and Modernist camps, with an amorphous group caught in the middle. The Lutherans and Episcopalians felt the controversy less acutely, being more securely rooted in their confessional traditions.

Religious billboard, South Carolina. (©Franken Owen/CORBIS)

Although Fundamentalism was primarily the fruit of simplistic popular thinking, it acquired intellectual respectability through the support of several distinguished theologians. Benjamin B. Warfield of Princeton Theological Seminary, perhaps the most eminent of America's conservative Presbyterian scholars, contributed to the first volume of The Fundamentals. John Gresham Machen, also of Princeton, while preferring to call himself simply a Calvinist, likewise supported the Fundamentalist cause.

Decline. Largely through Fundamentalist pressures, several state legislatures barred the teaching of evolution in public schools. In 1925 John T. Scopes, a high school biology teacher in Dayton, Tenn., was accused of teaching Darwinism in violation of the law. Behind the immediate question of evolution loomed the larger question whether the Bible was totally free of error in its obvious meaning, as understood by the ordinary reader. Although Scopes was convicted and the constitutionality of the statute upheld, William Jennings Bryan's feeble performance as a witness for the prosecution and the unfavorable publicity given to the case in the secular press resulted in a major setback for Fundamentalism.

In the mid-1920s the Fundamentalist tide began to recede. In 1927 Princeton Seminary, the traditional bastion of conservative orthodoxy, opened itself to other theological tendencies. In 1929 Machen resigned his post to found a new conservative seminary in Philadelphia, and ultimately (in 1936) his own Orthodox Presbyterian Church.

Although Fundamentalism lost much of its influence, important Protestant groups, especially in the Netherlands and the U.S., remain strongly committed to the view that the Bible, understood in its obvious literal meaning, is totally inerrant. The more sophisticated representatives of conservative Evangelicalism, such as Carl F. H. Henry and Edward J. Carnell, sought to shed the Fundamentalist label and to identify themselves with international conservative Protestant bodies, such as the World Evangelical Fellowship. But the Fundamentalist mentality continues to manifest itself in some parts of the United States. In 1981, for example, the State of Arkansas adopted a law requiring that "creation science" be taught alongside of evolutionary theory in public schools. That law was later ruled unconstitutional.

Catholic Responses. Fundamentalism properly so called can have no legitimate place in Catholic theology. Already in the 17th century the Catholic bishop J. B. Bossuet controverted the view of the Calvinist Pierre Jurieu that a few “fundamental articles” could be a sufficient test of orthodoxy. In his encyclical Mortaliū animos (1928) Pius XI rejected the distinction between fundamental and nonfundamental articles. The “five fundamentals,” while true if rightly understood, do not mention all that Catholics consider basic to their faith. The omission of the Trinity, the Church, and the sacraments gives a markedly sectarian slant to the Fundamentalist platform.

Certain anti-Modernist trends in Catholic theology ran parallel to Protestant Fundamentalism. Catholics regarded by some as ultraconservative opposed the scientific study of the Scriptures and sought to defend every sentence of the Bible in what they took to be its obvious sense. They rejected the idea of human evolution as unbiblical and repudiated the practice of distinguishing between different “literary forms” in books deemed to be historical. Pius XII in his encyclical Divino afflante Spiritu (1943), correcting these tendencies, endorsed scientific literary and historical criticism and a prudent use of the method of form criticism. In 1993 the Pontifical Biblical Commission issued a document on The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church, which included a severe criticism of Fundamentalism for offering false certitudes and for confusing the divine substance of the Bible with what are in fact its human limitations. The United States Catholic Bishops’ Conference in 1987 established an ad hoc committee on Biblical Fundamentalism that warned against the deceptive attractions of Fundamentalism, calling attention to its tendency to neglect the role of the Church in the transmission of Christian faith.

Bibliography: G. M. MARSDEN, Fundamentalism and American Culture (New York 1980); Understanding Fundamentalism and Evangelicalism (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1991). T. M. O’MEARA, Fundamentalism: A Catholic Perspective (New York 1990). PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL COMMISSION, The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church (Vatican City 1993). UNITED STATES BISHOPS’ COMMITTEE, “Pastoral Statement for Catholics on Biblical Fundamentalism,” Origins 17 (Nov. 5, 1987) 376–77. H. A. HARRIS, Fundamentalism and Evangelicals (Oxford 1998).

[A. DULLES]

FUNDAMENTALISM, BIBLICAL

The term fundamentalism is used in two related but clearly distinguished senses: (1) to designate what is more generally called a conservative type of Christian thought, as opposed to the liberal or modernist tendencies that became influential in the second half of the 19th and even more so in the first half of the 20th century; and (2) as the name of a specific conservative movement with its own organizations and agencies devoted to the propagation of a definite doctrinal program (the five points of fundamentalism) that, it was claimed, constitutes the true Christian faith. In the first sense the term is more often used by liberals to describe conservatives than by the conservatives to describe themselves.

Hutterite elders gather around to re-examine their version of the Bible, Miller Colony, Montana, 1968. The Hutterites, a fundamentalist Christian sect founded by Hutter in Germany, immigrated to the Ukraine, Canada, South Dakota, and finally, Montana. (©Ted Streshinsky/CORBIS)

Organized Movement. In the second sense fundamentalism is a religious movement that began in the U.S. in 1909 among very conservative members of various Protestant denominations (mainly Baptists). Its objectives were to resist the spread of modernism in theology and to maintain traditional interpretations of the Bible and what they believed to be the fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith. A series of 12 books or pamphlets was issued between 1910 and 1912, subsidized by two laymen, Milton and Lyman Stewart. Five points of doctrine were set forth as fundamental: (1) the literal inerrancy and infallibility of the Bible, (2) the virgin birth and full deity of Christ, (3) the physical Resurrection of Christ, (4) the atoning sacrifice of His death for the sins of the world, and (5) His second coming in bodily form to preside at the Last Judgment. The Stewart brothers also founded the Los Angeles Bible Institute and established the Stewart Evangelistic Fund in order to promote their tenets. In 1918 the World's Christian Fundamentals association was founded. Its chief objectives were to resist all anti-Christian influences throughout the world, especially in the U.S., and to defend the strict literal sense of the Bible. The main fundamentalist controversy was among the Baptists, though it spread to other denominations, in particular to the Presbyterians. At Dallas, Texas, in 1923, the bishops of the Episcopal Church issued a pastoral letter requiring strict conformity to the 39 Articles.

Repercussions. Tension between liberals and conservatives arose in many Bible colleges throughout the U.S. Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick, a liberal Baptist preacher at the First Presbyterian Church, New York, refused to accept the church's required doctrinal positions and was forced to withdraw from his post. Repercussions were felt in other areas of public life. Laws against the teaching of evolution in the public schools were passed in some southern states of the U.S. In the famous Scopes trial at Dayton, Tenn., in 1925, William Jennings Bryan, a fundamentalist, won the state's case against John T. Scopes, a public high school teacher charged with teaching evolution. The influence of the fundamentalist movement was strong on both clergy and laymen in Protestant circles. It occasioned the organization of the American (now International) Council of Christian Churches in opposition to the Federal (now National) Council of the Churches of Christ in America (now in the United States of America). The fundamentalist movement exercised its strongest influence in the southern and agricultural areas of the U.S. in the 1920s. Fundamentalist theological seminaries were founded to counteract the influence of the more liberal theological schools of Crozer, Princeton, and Union, and Harvard University and the University of Chicago. By the late 20th century, fundamentalism had lost the extensive influence it once had. While no means extinct, the movement changed its methods and less frequently used that name.

Bibliography: J. W. JOHNSON, Fundamentalism versus Modernism (New York 1925). W. LIPPMANN, American Inquisitors (New York 1928). A. W. ROBINSON, The New Learning and the Old Faith (New York 1928). S. G. COLE, The History of Fundamentalism (New York 1931). J. L. NEVE and O. W. HEICK, A History of Christian Thought, 2 v. (Philadelphia 1943–46) 2:325–328. F. E. MAYER, The Religious Bodies of America, rev. A. C. PIEPKORN (4th ed. St. Louis 1961).

[T. A. COLLINS]

FUNERAL RITES

The Greco-Roman funeral procession—the funus—what everyone understood to be the funeral, was adopted by Christians as a metaphor for their journey as earthly church toward the heavenly Jerusalem. They spoke of this journey and its expression in the funeral procession as “going to Christ” (ire ad Christum). For ancient Christians, the mystery of divine incarnation and the promise of resurrection in the likeness of the risen Christ transformed superstitious concerns about the lot of the dead. Belief in the sacredness of the human body, the mystery of Christ's incarnation and resurrection, and the resurrection of the dead traditionally found expression in the care taken to prepare the bodies of the deceased for burial. The body that participated integrally in all the expressions of sacramental life became the primary object of liturgical attention in funeral liturgy. The prayers and ritual gestures of Catholic funeral rites affirm the Church's reverence for the mortal remains of her deceased members. Whatever form human mortal remains take, they are due Christian respect as the final form of the flesh and blood person who lived and died and will rise in relationship with God.

A Brief History. In the Greco-Roman culture of earliest Christianity burial and cremation existed side by side. Christians followed the Jewish custom of burial. By mid third century, burial became the preferred proper ritual attention to the dead, necessary to secure happiness in the afterlife. Throwing a handful of earth on the corpse or, in the case of cremation, cutting off a small bone to be buried later were essential rites. Even the dead stranger was to be given a ritual burial, and, when cremations did take place, burial of the ashes in the earth or a tomb was the norm.

The earliest Christian writings include examples of prayers and hymns for use at funerals, marking the beginning of the Christian obsequiae or services for the dead. Long before Christians had churches, they buried their dead brothers and sisters and kept their memory alive in their cemeteries (koimeteria or dormitories for the dead [see BURIAL II (EARLY CHRISTIAN)]). Later they constructed their first basilicas over the site of Jesus' death, burial, and resurrection and over the graves of martyrs. In time the Christian funeral developed into rites that took place “at church,” and burial in the churchyard or entombment in or along the walls of the church building itself became the tradition. These cemeteries are iconographic witnesses to Christian care of the dead. Their funerary decorations proclaimed that the dead had gone to the Paradise of the Shepherd, to the place of refreshment, light, and peace. They linked the “refreshment” of the funeral meal with the Eucharist, the food of life. Other decorations reflected singing and prayer on the part of individuals and the community.

In like manner Christians invested other funeral practices with their religious memory and faith. Activities, such as washing and anointing of the dead, the solemn funus or funeral procession to the cemetery, and the tomb itself, became symbols of liturgy. To the Hebrew psalms they added Christian hymns; the eucharistic banquet came to supersede the memorial funeral meal; Jewish and pagan funerary art inspired still newer Christian representations expressing the mystery of redemption. Prayer for the dead became a duty in Christian charity. Augustine, for example, taught that prayer, almsgiving, and especially offering the Eucharist were efficacious for the dead before the judgment seat of God. In time, two attitudes of Christian faith, one hopeful of God's mercy, the other fearful of God's justice, marked the increasingly familiar ways Christians translated that faith into worship and constituted the origin of a Christian funeral liturgy.

Christian funeral service, Russia. (©David & Peter Turnley/CORBIS)

Orders of funeral service survive from the ninth century. They reveal a pattern of prayerful preparation of the corpse (washing, clothing), vigil or wake with psalms, hymns and Scripture readings, a procession with the body to the church complex for burial to the accompaniment of psalms and prayers. Gradually, the celebration of Mass, associated with Christian death from the beginning, became a formal part of the funeral rites themselves and the church, the focal point of the liturgy. Throughout the Middle Ages, despite the different customs from region to region and between cathedral and monastic practices, a threefold structure of the classic Catholic funeral evolved as the norm. The Rituale ordered by the Council of Trent made it the universal practice of the Church. The Order of Christian Funerals (OCF) embodies this tradition as Vigil and Related Rites, Funeral Liturgy, Rite of Committal, like three panels of a triptych, and thus preserves the spirit of the funeral as metaphor for the Christian journey to Christ.

Vigil and Related Rites. The Vigil and Related Rites and Prayers are opportunities for liturgical prayer that may be celebrated during the time between death and the principal Funeral Liturgy or committal. They enable the specifically Christian expressions of faith and hope to find an appropriate place in the earliest moments of leave-taking. Although the term “vigil” in the OCF designates a particular liturgical rite of “vigil for the deceased,” the whole time span surrounding death is a liminal time of “vigil” or wake. Its purpose is to offer the Church’s supportive ministry of gently accompanying the mourners in their initial adjustment, cognizant of their need to express the sorrow of bereavement and to enjoy the treasure of consolation their faith holds for them.

The Vigil for the Deceased is the principal celebration of the Christian community during the time before the funeral liturgy (or, should there be no funeral liturgy, before the rite of committal). It may take the traditional form of a liturgy of the Word or of some form of the Office for the Dead. The latter also introduces the community to the psalms, particularly the lament psalms, which effectively permit the bereaved to own the reality of grief in the context of faith and hope.

Custom and pastoral need determine where the vigil takes place. For bereaved confined to their homes or other residences, celebrating the vigil there may be preferred; for others, the vigil at the parish church (where the body might “be waked” until the Funeral Liturgy) will be the best solution. Finally, the funeral home, where the body has been prepared and laid out for visitation and last respects, offers a convenient, familiar location.

The vigil for a deceased child differs slightly from the vigil for adults. There is greater flexibility to adapt the rite to suit the occasion, with more appropriate texts, specifically adapted to the needs of the family suffering such a tragic loss. The Church commends the child to the love of God the author of life, and prays for the consolation of the immediate family.

The OCF restores the vigil as an integral part of the Catholic funeral, and the models proposed are familiar to today’s faithful. The Church gathers to share the pain and suffering of the family by allowing the Word of God to transform their grief and to pledge support for them in the times ahead.

Besides the Vigil for the Deceased and the devotional prayer of parish groups (such as the traditional Rosary) during the wake, there are other critical times in the period soon after death when the Church wishes to pray with the family and close friends of the deceased. The OCF provides for this opportunity by including Related Rites and Prayers as models of liturgical pastoral care to be adapted according to the circumstances of time, place and culture. These moments include prayers after death, gathering in the presence of the body, and the transfer of the body to the church or place of committal. They are times when the intimate family and friends of the deceased ordinarily begin to confront the reality of death and loss and may start to feel grief and pain deeply. At such moments the OCF recognizes the need for paschal faith and the consolation of Christian hope as well as the support of the entire community embodied in the presence of those who gather.

The Funeral Liturgy. As Catholic leave-taking, the principal funeral rite in the church stands in direct continuity with the vigil and related rites during the time following death and presumes movement to final closure at committal. With its unique prelude (Reception of the Body) and postlude (Final Commendation and Farewell) the Funeral Mass is the principal Catholic funeral event: Eucharist, at one with Jesus dead and risen, toward which all has pointed, and from which closure and a new relationship with the deceased follows. The symbols surrounding the deceased are reminders of a living faith that cannot be quenched by death. Sprinkling with holy water, placing of the pall, lighting of the Easter candle are all signs of baptism. They mark the rite of passage not from but into the land of the living.

Models for Funeral Liturgy for both adults and children follow traditional patterns while still incorporating options for celebrating the Rite of Reception earlier at the Vigil liturgy as well as celebrating the Final Commendation later at the place of committal. Two forms accommodate pastoral circumstances: “Funeral Liturgy” (including a funeral Mass) and “Funeral Liturgy outside Mass,” with all elements of the former except the Eucharist. In all circumstances, a funeral Mass is preferred, and the OCF invites all to celebrate Mass soon in association with the death, whatever the circumstances of the funeral may have been. For the Eucharist is the sacrament that connects the mystery of the death and resurrection of the Lord to the death of this Christian.

The Final Commendation is very simple: an invitation to prayer, silence, signs and song of farewell, and prayer of commendation. Yet its explicit commendation of the deceased into God’s hands at this closing moment of the Funeral Liturgy profoundly professes Christian belief that the living God, not the destruction of death, has the last word for this person of faith.

The Rite of Committal and Beyond. Nowhere do the paschal faith of Christians and the cross of human mortality meet more explicitly than beside an open grave or other final resting place. It is the authentic tradition of the Church to be present there. The liturgy of committal thus expresses the consolation of faith that gives meaning to this seemingly most meaningless experience of human loss and promises the continued presence of the Church.

What happens at the cemetery is a natural continuation of the funeral liturgy at church. The church complex and the cemetery form a liturgical unity, even when they are separated by time or distance. Formerly a short procession with the corpse from the church to the place of disposition—together with the prayers, psalms and rituals of committal—functioned primarily to conclude the rites of leave-taking. Today the procession with the body from the church is the same procession that enters the cemetery and proceeds to the grave or mausoleum. In this procession to the place of committal the OCF has restored the spirit of the classic Christian funeral. It is not distance but the movement of the Church with the deceased (ire ad Christum) as liturgical action that creates a “funeral” procession.

Rites of committal themselves follow the familiar pattern of spoken word and acted sign: gathering (preferably at the site of interment or preservation of cremated remains), short Scripture verses, prayer and, where pastorally appropriate, lowering the coffin into the grave or placing the cremation container in its resting place. The OCF affirms, “Through this act (of committal) the community of faith proclaims that the grave or place of interment, once a sign of futility and despair, has been transformed by means of Christ’s death and resurrection into a sign of hope and promise” (209).

The liturgy now points beyond the funeral and professes the commitment of the assembled Church to walk with the bereaved on the long, often painful process of healing. In short, committal rites serve to bring the funeral liturgy to closure and open the official time of mourning.

Bibliography: NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF CATHOLIC BISHOPS, Order of Christian Funerals, 1989, including Appendix on Cremation. Available from three publishers: Catholic Book Publishing Co., The Liturgical Press, and Liturgical Training Publications. V. K. OWUSU, The Roman Funeral Liturgy: History, Celebration, and Theology (Nettetetal 1993). F. S. PAXTON, Christianizing Death: The Creation of a Ritual Process in Early Medieval Europe (Ithaca, NY 1996). G. ROWELL, The Liturgy of Christian Burial (London 1977). A. C. RUSH, Death and Burial in Christian Antiquity (Washington, DC 1941). R. H. RUTHERFORD, The Death of a Christian. The Order of Christian Funerals (Collegeville, MN 1990). D. SICARD, La liturgie de la mort dans l’église latine des origins à la réforme carolingienne (Münster 1978). J. M. C. TOYNBEE, Death and Burial in the Roman World (London 1971). F. VAN DER MEER and C. MOHRMANN, Atlas of the Early Christian World (London 1966).

[R. RUTHERFORD]

FUNERALS (CANON LAW)

Christian FUNERAL RITES have traditionally consisted of three parts: the escorting of the body to the church or cemetery; rites at the house, the church and the cemetery; and burial in ground set aside for the interment of the faithful.

Right to a Church Funeral. As to who may receive Church Funeral, Codex iuris canonici (CIC) 1 c., 1176, states that the Christian faithful departed must be given ecclesiastical funerals in accord with the norm of law. In addition to Catholic Christians, CIC c., 1183 allows for the celebration of Catholic funeral rites for certain other groups (confer, CCEO 1, 2 c., 876). Catechumens are to be given Catholic funeral rites, as are children whom the parents intended to baptize, but who died before baptism could be administered. A local ordinary may allow a Christian enrolled in a non-Catholic church or ecclesial community to have an ecclesiastical funeral, if the person’s own minister is unavailable, and if such is not manifestly contrary to the person’s intention.

Denial of Church Funerals. With regard to those who may not be given Christian burial, CIC c., 1184 expressly forbids ecclesiastical funerals to three classes of Catholics (confer, CCEO c. 877):

(1) Notorious apostates, heretics and schismatics. CIC c., 751 gives definitions for apostasy, heresy and schism. The offense must be publicly known. One who ceased the practice of Catholic religion without formally abandoning the Church does not fall under this heading, and should not be denied Catholic funeral rites.

(2) Those who have commanded that their body be cremated for reasons contrary to Christian faith. Officially forbidden for centuries, CREMATION is now permissible, so long as “it does not demonstrate a denial of faith in the resurrection of the body” (CCC, no. 2301). The Eastern Code permits cremation “provided it does not obscure the preference of the Church for the burial of bodies and that scandal is avoided” (CCEO c. 8763). In the Order of Christian Funerals approved for use in the United States, guidelines have been provided for funeral liturgies involving the cremated remains of the deceased.

(3) Other manifest sinners who cannot be granted ecclesiastical funerals without public scandal. The term manifest indicates that the person must be publicly known to have lived in a state of grave sin. For example, some who might qualify are those involved in the drug trade and those who have admitted to murder. It is also required that having an ecclesiastical funeral would provoke public scandal among the Christian faithful. Only when both conditions are verified would Catholic funeral rites be prohibited. Persons who have divorced and remarried do not come under this heading. Nor are persons who have committed suicide included under this heading. According to most medical authorities, a person who commits suicide is considered deprived at least temporarily of the full possession of his faculties.

Deán Gregorio Funes.

Doubtful Cases. If the deceased has given any sign of repentance, he is not to be denied a Catholic funeral. Such a sign of repentance might be summoning a priest or making an act of perfect contrition. These signs show that the deceased in some way preserved an attachment to the Church.

Bibliography: M. CONTE, De locis et temporibus sacris (Turin 1922) 125–133, 150–151, 253–268. C. KERIN, The Privation of Christian Burial (Catholic University of America Canon Law Studies, 136; Washington 1941). A. BERNARD, La Sépulture en Droit Canonique (Paris 1933). J. M. HUELS, OSM in J. P. BEAL et al., New Commentary on the Code of Canon Law (New York 2000) 1412–1413.

[C. A. KERIN/J. STAAB]

FUNES, DEÁN GREGORIO

Argentine priest and political figure in the independence movement; b. Córdoba, May 25, 1749; d. Buenos Aires, Jan. 10, 1829. He was buried in the Cathedral of Córdoba.

Funes obtained his doctorate in theology at the University of Córdoba (1774), his degree in civil and Canon Law at Alcalá de Henares, Spain, and was admitted to the practice of law before the Royal Councils in 1778. He held numerous ecclesiastical posts in his native city, including that of dean of its cathedral (1804). He was also vicar-general and governor of the bishopric. Funes served as rector of the Colegio de Monserrat and of the University of Córdoba (then called San Carlos) between 1808 and 1813. His ideas and achievements in the field of education are set forth in his Plan de Estudios of 1813. In this work he included new ideas without breaking with tradition. Through education he tried to mold the student's personality, orienting his teaching around philosophy and theology.

In 1810 he joined the revolution that won Argentina its independence, and he performed many important services as a member of the first revolutionary governments and as deputy in the congresses that drafted the constitutions of 1819 and 1826. He advised the government on drafting decrees, such as those on freedom of the press and on the creation of provincial juntas foreshadowing federalism. He reformed ordinances and influenced public opinion through contributions to the newspapers Gaceta, El Argos, El Centinela, and La Abeja Argentina.

Funes was, above all, a politician concerned with the practical problems of his country in a time of great change, and he put his great learning into the service of his vocation, the independence of his country. His conception of the revolution was analogous to that of Bolívar. He was democratic and drew support for his ideas from the Spanish theological school, with influences from French ideology. As a liberal in politics, he advocated an ethical liberalism respectful of religion. He supported the organization of his country on a federal basis.

He was deeply concerned over the relations between Church and State, then disturbed by the PATRONATO REAL and the attitude of the Holy See, which continued to respect Spanish patronage and thus cut off the Argentine Church, with serious damage to its discipline. To Funes, the Patronato was tied to national sovereignty and therefore could be exercised by the revolutionary government. He felt the Church and the State differed in origins, means, and ends, but should act together and aid each other. The one, universal Church was subordinated to the pope, but within the Spanish tradition, the Church had granted to the State certain powers in the field of ecclesiastical discipline. He supported the intolerance of the Church but admitted State tolerance limited by the requirements of public order and due protection of religion.

Funes's writings are numerous and varied. They include articles on ecclesiastical matters and on civil rights, and a three-volume work, Ensayo de historia civil del Paraguay, Buenos Aires y Tucumán (Buenos Aires 1816–17).

Bibliography: G. FURLONG, Bio-bibliografía del deán Funes (Córdoba 1939). E. MARTÍNEZ PAZ, El deán Funes: Un apóstol de la libertad (Córdoba 1950).

[E. MARTÍNEZ PAZ]

FUNK, FRANZ XAVER VON

Church historian and patrologist; b. Abtsgmünd, Germany, Oct. 12, 1821; d. Tübingen, Feb. 24, 1907. Educated in the German school system, he obtained his doctorate in 1863, was ordained in 1864, and lectured as an instructor (repetent) in theology at Tübingen from 1866 to 1870. His early interests were devoted to moral theology and national economy, and he wrote monographs on usury, including Zins und Wucher (1868) and Geschichte des kirchlichen Zinsverbotes (1876). In 1870 he replaced C. HEFELE as lecturer in history and theology and in 1875 was named a full professor at Tübingen. He achieved an international reputation as a historian of the early Church, patrologist, and Christian archeologist. During his 37 years at Tübingen, his scientific method and devotion to scholarship helped further the reputation for excellence of the Catholic faculty at Tübingen. His edition of the post-Apostolic Fathers, Opera Patrum Apostolicorum (2 v. Tübingen 1878–81), has been reedited by his students and successors. His Lehrbuch der Kirchengeschichte (1886) was frequently revised and is the basis for the contemporary study by K. Bihlmeyer and H. Tüchle, Church History (tr. V. Mills, 3 v. Westminster 1956–65). He also published editions of the Doctrina XII Apostolorum (1887), Didascalia et Constitutiones Apostolorum (2 v. 1905), and a collection of articles and reviews, Kirchengeschichtliche Abhandlungen und Untersuchungen (3 v. 1897–1907).

Bibliography: K. BIHMEYER, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche 1 4:235. A. KOCH, Theologische Quartalschrift (Tübingen, 1908) 95–137. H. SCHIEL, F. X. Kraus und die katholische Tübinger Schule (Ellwangen 1958) 73–83. P. GODET, Revue du Clergé 56 (1908) 129–149; DTC 6.1:972–975.

[P. STEELS]

FURLONG, THOMAS

Bishop, founder of three religious institutes; b. Mayglass, County Wexford, Ireland, c. 1803; d. Wexford, Nov. 12, 1875. He entered St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, in 1819 and was ordained in 1826 after a Dunboyne theology course of two years. On June 28, 1827, he became junior dean in Maynooth, and then successively professor of humanities (1829), of rhetoric (1834), and of theology (1845). He was consecrated bishop of Ferns on March 22, 1857. As a bishop he strengthened ecclesiastical institutions and fostered a more personal and interior spirituality among his flock. Based on his deep personal spirituality, especially his devotion to the Blessed Sacrament, his labors produced results still in evidence both within the diocese and, through the work of the institutions he founded, far outside it. To promote the better observance of Sundays and holy days, he opposed the prevalent custom of holding fairs and transacting business on those days and also the intemperance so often associated with these practices. He developed the diocesan seminary, St. Peter's College, Wexford. For the education of girls, he introduced six convents of nuns into his diocese. He also completed the cathedral church of St. Aidan, Enniscorthy.

In 1866 he founded the Missionaries of the Blessed Sacrament, diocesan priests who live a common life and, from their headquarters in Enniscorthy, preach missions and retreats in the diocese and outside it. In 1871 he founded the Sisters of ST. JOHN OF GOD, a teaching and nursing order that has spread widely in Ireland and abroad. After various attempts to introduce an order of nuns devoted to perpetual adoration of the Blessed Sacrament, he secured papal approval in 1875 for the Institute of Perpetual Adoration, a diocesan congregation of sisters, which has ever since maintained vigil before the Blessed Sacrament in one of the parish churches of Wexford.

Bibliography: W. H. G. FLOOD, History of the Diocese of Ferns (Waterford 1916). Irish Catholic Directory (1857–75).

[P. J. CORISH]

FURSEY (FURSEUS), ST.

Irish missionary; b. near Lough Corrib, Ireland, possibly on the island Inisquin in that lake; d. Diocese of Amiens, France, c. 650. He became a religious and founded a monastery in the Diocese of Tuam (Cill Fursa) to which recruits came from all Ireland. Later he traveled in England and founded a monastery at Burgh Castle near Yarmouth. Between 640 and 644, having been driven out of England by Penda, he went to Gaul. There King Clovis II gave him land near Paris where he built a monastery at LAGNY-SUR-MARNE. At one time he served as vicar of the Diocese of Paris. He died while traveling in the Diocese of Amiens, and his remains were taken to Peronne, France; they were found incorrupt many years later. Furseus enjoyed great literary fame in the Middle Ages because of his celebrated visions (see VISION (DREAM) LITERATURE). These were first reported by BEDE (Histoire Ecclesiastique. 3.19) and by AELFRIC GRAMMATICUS, but the Latin vitae also devote much space to his mystical experiences.

Feast: Jan. 16 (Diocese of Northampton and throughout Ireland).

Bibliography: J. COLGAN, The Acta sanctorum Hiberniae (Louvain 1645; repr. Dublin 1948) 75–98. Acta Sanctorum Jan. 2:399–419. Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1825–) 4:423–449. W. STOKES, Three Months in the Forests of France: A Pilgrimage in Search of Vestiges of the Irish Saints in France (London 1895); ed. and tr., “The Life of Fursa,” Revue Celtique 25 (1904) 385–404. Nova legenda Anglie, ed. C. HORSTMANN, 2 v. (Oxford 1901) v.1. C. S. BOSWELL, An Irish Precursor of Dante (London 1908) 166–169. J. F. KENNEY, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland: v.1, Ecclesiastical (New York 1929) 500–503. L. GOUGAUD, Gaelic Pioneers of Christianity, tr. V. COLLINS (Dublin 1923) 17–19.

[R. T. MEYER]

FÜRSTENBERG, FRANZ VON

Priest, statesman, and educator who reformed education in the Diocese of Münster and influenced Catholic education throughout the Germanies; b. Herdringen, Westphalia, Aug. 7, 1729; d. Münster, Sept. 16, 1810. He attended the universities of Cologne and Salzburg and completed his studies in jurisprudence at the Sapienza in Rome. The Fürstenberg family, which takes its name from the castle of Fürstenberg on the Ruhr, ruled over large tracts of land in Westphalia and was among the most important Catholic lines in the Germanies. As a member of this family, Franz Friedrich Wilhelm had many paths of preferment open to him, but choosing to enter the service of the Church, he was ordained in 1757.

In 1761 the elector of Cologne, later the prince-bishop of Münster, appointed von Fürstenberg as a member of his curia. In 1770, after passing through numerous lower offices, von Fürstenberg became vicar-general of the diocese. Since the prince-bishop was also a temporal ruler, many secular administrative duties were attached to the office of vicar-general, in which capacity he effected several economic and agricultural reforms, improved the military system, and in 1773 established a college of medicine. His service on the curial staff also resulted in some administrative changes in church and state, accomplished by establishing a corps of educated and trained officials. The educational practices then in vogue, however, which leaned toward the classics and nonpractical subjects, seemed constructed to frustrate the vicar-general's purposes.

Von Fürstenberg's desire for administrative reforms focused his attention on education. Wishing to make the Gymnasium more practical, with greater emphasis on subjects that prepared young men for civil or Church service, he included the vernacular, German, in the curriculum; gave greater prominence to natural sciences and mathematics; and deemphasized the classics. To supply teachers for this new type of Gymnasium, in 1783 von Fürstenberg opened and entrusted to the priest-educator, Bernard OVERBERG, a normal school that became a model for the Catholic schools in the Germanies. The University of Münster received new financial grants and increased its influence during von Fürstenberg's tenure as vicar-general.

Bibliography: J. E. WISE, The History of Education: An Analytic Survey from the Age of Homer to the Present (New York 1964). J. ESTERHUES, Lexikon der Pädagogik 2:192–193.

[E. G. RYAN]

FÜRSTENBERG, FRANZ AND WILHELM EGON VON

Franz and Wilhelm Egon Von Fürstenberg were German churchmen and statesmen, sons of Egon von Fürstenberg–Heiligenberg (1588–1635), Bavarian Commander in Chief; Franz Egon, b. Bavaria, April 10, 1625; d. Cologne, Germany, April 1, 1682; and Wilhelm Egon, b. Bavaria, Dec. 2, 1629; d. Paris, April 10, 1704. The talents and the ambition of these brothers, who had their education by Jesuits in Cologne, were recognized early in their lives by the Bavarian Prince Maximilian Heinrich, later electoral prince of Cologne. They remained in his service until won over by Cardinal Mazarin with gifts, pensions, and benefices. They became energetic in furthering French interests and were instrumental in creating the rheinischer Bund between the rulers of important German cities and states and the crown of France. Later Louis XIV rewarded their loyalty with rich benefices and titles of honor, giving Franz the bishopric of Strassburg and Wilhelm the rich abbey of Saint–Michel. They also worked on the Francophile sympathies of Maximilian Heinrich, with the result that the alliances on Oct. 22, 1666, and June 11, 1671, were favorable to the French monarch. During an annual carnival in Cologne, Wilhelm was apprehended by the troops of Emperor Leopold I. His execution for treason was averted by the intervention of the papal nuncio, but both he and Franz were deprived of incomes, privileges, and property. A provision of the treaty of Nijmegen in 1679, which closed the Franco-Holland wars, restored the Fürstenberg brothers to their possessions and titles. At the death of Franz, Louis XIV had Wilhelm elected to succeed to the See of Strassburg on June 22, 1682, and four years later obtained a cardinal's hat from Innocent XI for his loyal agent.

Wilhelm then intrigued to succeed the aged and ailing Maximilian Heinrich in the powerful See of Cologne. Against the warnings of Innocent XI, the cathedral chapter gave Wilhelm 17 of the 24 votes. Although the pope declared the election null and void, Fürstenberg headed the government on Maximilian Heinrich's death on June 3, 1688. Because his election had not been confirmed, another was set for July 19. Of the 24 votes, 13 fell to Wilhelm and nine to Joseph Clemens. Wilhelm entered the palace of the electoral prince and ordered a proclamation of his elevation. This precipitous action caused the assembly (September 15) to declare the postulation of Fürstenberg invalid and the election of Joseph Clemens legal. Preparations were made for the installation of Clemens, and Fürstenberg was commanded in severe terms to leave Bonn. On April 12, 1689, he left for his abbey, Saint-Germain-des-Prés in Paris, where he remained until his death.

Bibliography: L. ENNEN, Allgemeine deutsche Biographie (Leipzig 1875–1910) 7:297–306. Der Grosse Brockhaus: Handbuch des Wissens, 20 v. (15th ed. Leipzig 1928–35) 6:692. A. HAS-SAL, Cambridge Modern History (London-New York 1911–36) 5:32–63. H. S. WILLIAMS ed., France 843–1715, v. 11 of The Historians' History of the World, 27 v. in 15 (5th ed. New York 1926). M. BRAUBACH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:469–470.

[M. V. SCHULLER]

FUTURIBLE

That one of two possible contradictory acts that a free agent would perform if certain conditions were fulfilled. It is called pure futurible if they are not fulfilled. The reality of futuribles is apparent from an example: what a defeated electoral candidate would do if elected. At any given moment two contradictory actions would be possible to him, but only one would eventuate. Thus, every futurible is something that definitely "would be" and is therefore infallibly known by God. God's unerring providential government of human history is directed by His infallible knowledge of futuribles; admission of this divine knowledge is implied in all the Church's petitionary prayers. Few Catholic thinkers today question the reality of futuribles; but whether God knows the futuribles immediately, because of their definite intelligible being, or in Himself, is a disputed question.

See Also: PREDETERMINATION; SCIENTIA MEDIA; BAÑEZ AND BAÑEZIANISM; MOLINISM; OMNISCIENCE; GRACE; PREDESTINATION; PROVIDENCE.

Bibliography: T. DE DIEGO DIÉZ, Theologia naturalis (Santander 1955).

[F. L. SHEERIN]

Johann Joseph Fux.

FUX, JOHANN JOSEPH

Preeminent baroque church musician in Austria; b. Hirtenfeld (Upper Styria), 1660?; d. Vienna, Feb. 13, 1741. His parents, simple country people, were Andreas and Ursula Fux. In 1680, as a young man, he began studies at the University of Graz, entered the Ferdinandeum, a Jesuit college, the following year, and apparently pursued further studies in Bologna. In 1696 he was appointed organist at the Schottenkirche, Vienna, maintaining this post until 1702; from 1698 he was also court composer to Emperor Leopold. From 1705 to 1715, when he became chief Kapellmeister to the court, he was music director at the cathedral of St. Stephen. His earliest composition (1697) is the Requiem for Archduchess Eleonora, Queen of Poland, performed also at the burial of Prince Eugene in 1737. This was followed by a seven-part Concentus musico-instrumentalis (1701) and his a cappella masterpiece, Missa canonica, both dedicated to the future Emperor Joseph I, and two operas (now lost), composed for saint's-day celebrations at court. His total compositions number more than 500 known items, some 300 of them for church use, including 60 Masses, 12 Requiems, 22 motets, 106 hymns, and several sonatas and settings of psalms and litanies, all distinguished by the perfection of his canonic writing, which even J. S. Bach admired. His great theoretical work, Gradus ad Parnas- sum (1725, dedicated to Emperor Karl V), is a fundamental textbook of vocal counterpoint; it played an influential part in compositional training for more than a century and is still consulted in one or other of many editions and translations. The first English version appeared in 1791.

Bibliography: Sämtliche Werke, ed. JOHANN-JOSEPH-FUX GESELLSCHAFT (Kassel-New York 1959–); Ausgewählte Kompositionen, ed. J. MITTERER (Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Österreich [1893–; repr. Graz 1959–] 3); Messen, ed. J. E. HABERT and G. A. GLOSSNER (ibid., 1); Steps to Parnassus, ed. A. MANN (New York 1943), a new tr. of Gradus ad Parnassum. Also keyboard and instrumental works in various modern eds. O. STRUNK, ed., Source Readings in Music History (New York 1950) 535–563, with excerpts from Gradus ad Parnassum. A. LIESS, Fuxiana (Vienna 1958); Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 4:1159–75. J. H. VAN DER MEER, Johann Joseph Fux als Opernkomponist, 4 v. in 3 (Bilthoven 1961). A. LOEWENBERG and C. F. POHL, Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. E. BLOM, 9 v. (5th ed. London 1954) 3:527–575. P. H. LÁNG, Music in Western Civilization (New York 1941). D. J. GROUT, A Short History of Opera, 2 v. (2d, rev. and enl. ed. New York 1965). M. F. BUKOFZER, Music in the Baroque Era (New York 1947). H. FEDEHOFER, “Johann Joseph Fux,” in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. S. SADIE, v. 7 (New York 1980) 43–46. D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge, Mass. 1996) 288. F. REIDEL, “Johann Joseph Fux: Vor 250 Jahren starb Österreichs großer Barockkomponist,” Österreichische Musik Zeitschrift 46 (1991) 450–457. N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, 8th ed. (New York 1992) 586. H. WHITE, “Erhaltene Quellen der Oratorien von Johann Joseph Fux: Ein Bericht,” Kirchenmusikalisches Jahrbuch, 67 (1983) 123–131; “The Oratorios of Johann Joseph Fux” (Ph.D. diss. Trinity College, University of Dublin 1986); ed., Johann Joseph Fux and the Music of the Austro-Italian Baroque (Aldershot, Eng. 1992).

[F. HABERL]

G

GABON, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Republic of Gabon is located in west central Africa. Featuring a narrow coastal plain to the west that rises to forested hills in the interior and a savanna in the east and south, Gabon was a territory in French West Africa from 1910 until it gained independence in 1960. Gabon is bordered by on the north by Equatorial Guinea and Cameroon, on the east and south by the Republic of the Congo, and on the west by the Atlantic Ocean.

With much of its territory covered by equatorial forest, Gabon's main products are agricultural: cocoa, plantains, coffee, cassava, palm oil, and soft timber. In addition, there are deposits of manganese, iron ore, uranium, and oil within its borders. Most of the population is ethnic Bantu, with tribal groupings of Fang, Eshira, Bapounou, and Bateke. Over 60 percent of the adult population is literate. Ecclesiastically, Gabon has an archdiocese located in Libreville, with diocese in Franceville, Mouila, and Oyem.

Although the Portuguese were the first Europeans to establish a presence on the coast of Gabon c. 1400, the region was settled by the French, who founded trading posts at the mouth of the Gabon estuary in 1839 and 1842. From these port cities, in 1839 France established a naval base to aid in its attempt to halt the slave trade. Ten years later Libreville was founded by French merchants from Senegal, and freed slaves settled there on a model plantation. The slow evangelization of Gabon's interior began in 1881 with the Mission of Lambaréné on the lower Ogooué River, which drains most of Gabon. Other missions were established at N'Djolé and Franceville in 1897 and at Sindara in 1899. An additional nine missions were founded in the region in 1925.

The immense Vicariate of the Two Guineas—Upper and Lower Guinea and Sierra Leone, called Gabon (1863) and Libreville (1947)—originally comprised all west Africa from Senegal to the Orange River (except Luanda), with no fixed inland borders. Eventually the vicariate was broken apart, with portions becoming the Prefecture of Fernando Po (1855) and the vicariates of Sierra Leone (1858), Dahomey (now Benin; 1860), Senegambia (now Dakar, Senegal; 1863), Congo (1865); the Gold and Ivory Coasts (now Cape Coast, Ghana and Abidjan; 1879), Upper Niger (now Benin City, Nigeria; 1884), the French Congo (now Brazzaville; 1886), the Lower Niger (now Onitsha, Nigeria; 1889), and Cameroon (now Yaoundé; 1890). American Bishop Edward BARRON became the first vicar apostolic of the Two Guineas in 1842, but withdrew from Africa three years later. Remy Bes-sieux, a Holy Ghost Father in Gabon (1844–76), became the second vicar apostolic in 1849.

By 1910 Gabon had become a colony of French West Africa, and in 1946 it gained territorial status. The Vicariate of Libreville became a diocese suffragan to Brazzaville in 1955, and in 1958 the suffragan See of Mouila was detached from Libreville, which became an archdiocese. In response to the nationalist movement that took shape during the late 1950s, French Prime Minister Charles de Gaulle granted increasing political autonomy to the region, and independence was granted to Gabon on Aug. 17, 1960. Unfortunately, the new government was quickly overthrown by the Gabonese military. With the help of French troops peace was restored by 1964, and a new constitution was adopted two years later. The first Gabon bishop, François Ndong, was appointed auxiliary bishop of Libreville in 1961. The Catholic Church continued to operate private schools in the country, although it received no aid from the government.

During the 1970s Gabon's attempts to develop its economy met with success due to the country's supply of natural resources—particularly oil. While multi-party elections were established in the republic in 1990, the nation's long-time president Omar Bongo, in power since 1967 and a member of the nation's Muslim minority, continued to win a majority of the votes, even defeating a Catholic priest in the 1993 election. In June 1999, after nearly two years of negotiations, Bongo's government

Capital: Libreville.
Size: 103,347 sq. miles.
Population: 1,208,436 in 2000.
Languages: French; Fang, Eshura, and local languages are spoken in various regions.
Religions: 664,640 Catholics (55%), 12,054 Muslims (1%), 752,537 Evangelical Protestants (5%), 459,205 indigenous religions (38%).

signed an accord with the Holy See that outlined the diplomatic and social functions of the Church within Gabon. The government also organized annual meetings between Church leaders and members of the Islamic Council to promote interfaith relations, which were amicable. Gabon, a member of the Central African Bishop's Conference, contained 65 parishes administered by 36 secular and 70 religious priests, and the nation's social welfare agencies benefitted from the efforts of its 23 brothers and 167 sisters.

In an effort to promote Christianity among the region's native peoples, Samuel Galley translated the New Testament (1925) and the whole Bible (1952) into the native Fang language. By this time, other faiths had begun evangelization efforts in the area, American Protestants having established a mission near Libreville as early as 1841. While Protestant activity subsided for several decades, the mission was revived by Presbyterians in 1870, and other missions were established with aid from French Protestants. In 1913 Nobel Prize-winning Alsatian theologian Albert Schweitzer revived the now-deserted mission at Lambaréné as a hospital devoted to treatment of leprosy and sleeping sickness. By the second half of the 20th century Gabon began to see an increase in Islamic non-citizens due to immigration from West African nations, and by 2000 Islamic worshipers were estimated to comprise as much as 12 percent of the actual resident population.

Bibliography: Le missioni cattoliche: Storia, geografia, statistica (Rome 1950) 129–130. Bilan du Monde, 2v. (Tournai 1964) 2:398–401.

[J. LE GALL/EDS.]

GABRIEL, ARCHANGEL

Gabriel is mentioned four times in the Bible (Dn 8.16; 9.21; Lk 1.19, 26). In the book of DANIEL he is the angel sent to explain to Daniel the meaning of his visions. In Luke's gospel he is the angel who foretells to Zechariah that he is to have a son (John the Baptist) and announces to Mary the coming birth of her son, Jesus. His name in Hebrew (gabrī'ēl) means "hero of God."

To Daniel, Gabriel appeared as "a manlike figure" (8.15). On another occasion "a hand touched" Daniel and raised him from his faint to a posture on hands and knees, and addressed him as "Daniel beloved" (10.9–12); presumably this also was Gabriel. Gabriel came to Daniel "in rapid flight" (9.21), though there is no explicit mention of wings. To Zechariah Gabriel appeared also in the form of a man standing and speaking (Lk 1.11, 13). Though there is no advertence to the form of the angel in his visit to Mary, the pericope (Lk 1.26–38) asserts personal identity between Mary's visitor and Zechariah's and presumes identical appearance.

In Daniel, ch. 8 to 10, the seer is professedly seeing visions; and in 10.7–8, the author asserts, "I alone, Daniel, saw the vision"; the men who were with him fled "although they did not see the vision." The objectivity of the appearances of Gabriel is not asserted. The internal and subjective character of these visions is quite possible. Moreover, Luke was not witness of either visitation of Gabriel that he records, and it is possible that he is using the literary form of haggadic MIDRASH, with his mind dwelling on the striking parallels existing between Daniel's visitation and Luke's own meditations on God's announcements to Zachary and to Mary of the impending parenthood of each.

Despite the scholarly doubts about the objective reality of Gabriel, Christian devotion venerates him as an archangel, a title never given him in the Bible, though perhaps suggested in Lk. 1.19 where Gabriel asserts he stands in the presence of God—possibly a Lucan reference to Tb 12.15. The universality and antiquity of representations of Gabriel (a 5th-century mosaic of Gabriel at the Annunciation is the oldest known representation of an angel with feet and two wings in St. Mary Major, Rome) testify to Gabriel's reality and power. The earliest liturgical recognition of Gabriel has been traced to a Greek litany of the Saints (7th century) where MICHAEL, Gabriel, and RAPHAEL occur in that order, and enjoy precedence over John the Baptist and the Blessed Virgin [see D. Bishop, Liturgica Historica (Oxford 1918) 142–151]. Gabriel has never been as popular or as versatile as Michael in Christian devotion. On Jan. 12, 1951, Gabriel was declared by Pius XII to be patron before God of people engaged in telecommunications (telephone, telegraph, television, radio).

In Jewish legend and apocrypha Gabriel has filled many functions: he is one of the four angels who stand at the four sides of God's throne, guardians of the four parts of the world and intercessors for the world at the time of the deluge; angel destroyer of Sodom; destroyer of the army of Sennacherib; foreteller of the birth of Samson. In Islamic literature, under the name Jibril (plus variants and other titles) Gabriel is the principal in many strange tales. He is supposed to have been the one who revealed the QUR'ĀN to the Prophet Muḥammad.

Historically, the Feast of Gabriel, Archangel was celebrated on March 24 in the Roman Rite. The post-Vatican II reform of the Roman liturgical calendar created a combined Feast of the Archangels Michael, Gabriel, and Raphael on September 29. In the Eastern Christian tradition, the Feast of the Archangels is celebrated on November 8.

Bibliography: D. KECK, Angels and Angelology in the Middle Ages (New York 1998). B. OTZEN, "Michael and Gabriel," in The Scriptures and the Scrolls, ed. F. GARCIA MARTINEZ, A. HILHORST and C.J. LABUSCHAGNE (New York 1992).

[T. L. FALLON/EDS.]

GABRIEL, COLOMBA JOANNA, BL.

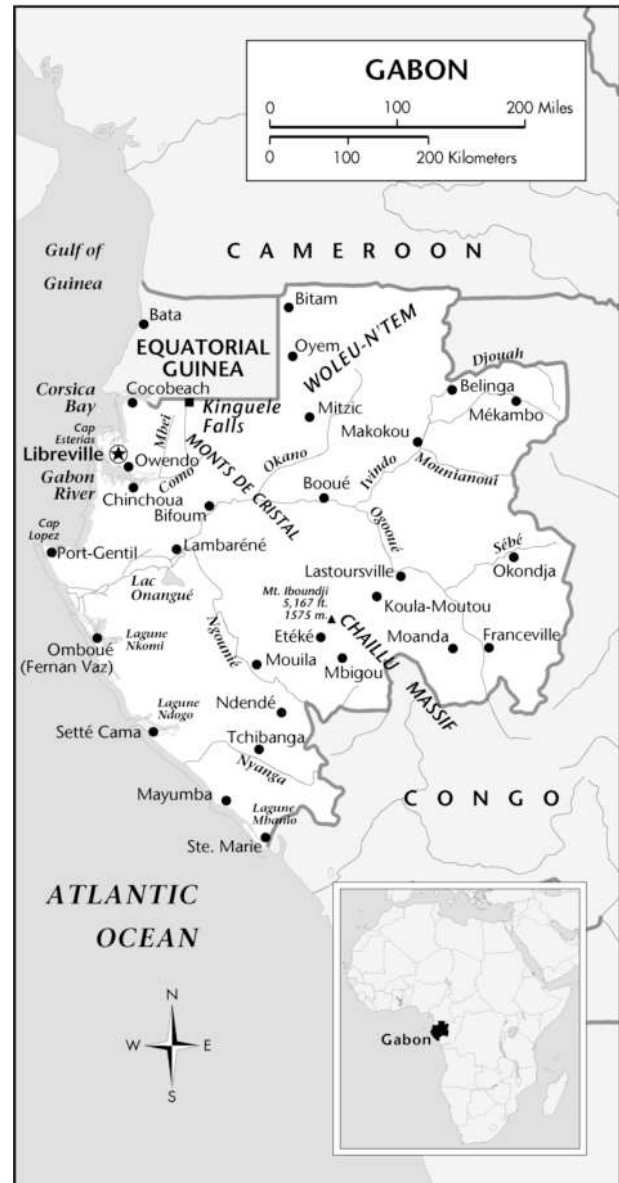

Baptized Joanna Matylda (Matilda) Gabriel; Benedictine nun; founder of the Oblates of Saint Benedict and the Benedictine Sisters of Charity (Sorum Ord. S. Benedicti a Caritate); b. May 3, 1858, Stanislawow, Poland (now Ivano-Frankivsk, Ukraine); d. Sept. 24, 1926, Centacelle (suburb of Rome), Italy. Joanna, born into the Polish nobility, was known in her time as "a woman born for love." She received her education locally and at Leopoldi, where she joined the Benedictines and became Sister Colomba. Called to serve poor working girls, she transferred to Rome (1900), spent time at Subiaco (1902), then returned to Rome (1903). Under the spiritual direction of Dominican Hyacinth CORMIER, Sister Colomba taught catechism and began visiting the sick and poor of the Roman Prati district. She gathered lay people to assist in her ministry, who became the Benedictine Oblates. In 1908, Colomba established the religious Benedictine Sisters of Charity to open homes and operate charitable programs for the needy of Rome. With the patronage of Italian Queen Elena, Pope Saint PIUS X and Pope BENEDICT XV, the congregation expanded throughout Italy, to Romania and Madagascar. Colomba was beatified by John Paul II, May 16, 1993.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1993): 601–03.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GABRIEL FERRETTI, BL.

Responsible for the Franciscan crown; b. Ancona, Italy, 1385; d. there, Nov. 12, 1456. Born of the noble family of Ferretti, he joined the Franciscan Observants at the age of 18 (1403), and from the very beginning he was scrupulous in his observance of the smallest rules. He showed remarkable humility, a virtue that inspired his whole life. He was ordained and became a renowned preacher, and served both as guardian and as provincial. On his death bed in the Franciscan house in Ancona, he was assisted by Bl. George and by St. JAMES OF THE MARCHES. He was buried in the old church of St. Francis in Ancona. With the permission of INNOCENT VIII (1489), two relics were later interred at the right of the high altar in a marble Renaissance mausoleum. Shortly after his death his fellow citizens drew up an official account of his miracles—unfortunately lost—and sent it to Pope CALLISTUS III. A copy of this document was kept in the Franciscan convent; L. WADDING quoted from it and noted that it had been damaged. His cult was approved by BENEDICT XIV in 1753. He is responsible for promoting the Franciscan rosary in honor of the seven joys of Our Lady, known as the Franciscan or Seraphic crown.

The Annunciation, detail of the mosaic on the arch of the apse of St. Mary Major, Rome, c. 432–440. This is the oldest known representation of a winged Gabriel.

Feast: Nov. 12.

Bibliography: L. WADDING, Scriptores Ordinis Minorum 12:546–550. S. MELCHIORRI, Leggenda del b. Gabriele de' Ferretti d' Ancona (Ancona 1844). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 4:326–327. G. MENCARELLI, L'angelo di Ancona: Vita del b. Gabriele dei conti Ferretti (Ancona 1956). W. FORSTER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:92. M. A. HABIG, The Franciscan Crown (Chicago 1976).

[T. C. CROWLEY]

GABRIEL OF ST. MARY MAGDALEN

Also known as Adrian Devos; Discalced Carmelite, spiritual writer; b. Bevere-Audenaerse, Belgium, Jan. 24, 1893; d. Rome, March 15, 1953. After his studies in the humanities, he was professed in the Teresian Carmel of Bruges (Sept. 8, 1911) and studied philosophy at Courtrai (Belgium) and theology in Dublin. World War I forced his return to Belgium, where he was mobilized and served in the sanitation corps; twice wounded, he was awarded the military cross of honor. He was ordained Dec. 20, 1920, and then served as professor of philosophy and theology in his province (1920–26). He was called to Rome as professor in the International College of the Discalced Carmelites, of which he later became vice-rector (1926–36). As professor of spiritual theology and author of many lectures and writings, he acquired an international reputation. When the International College was granted the faculty of theology, he was appointed prefect of studies. He intensified his literary work in 1941 by founding the journal Vita Carmelitana, which became the Rivista di Vita Spirituale in 1947. He was cofounder of the scientific journal of the theological faculty Ephemerides Theologicae-Carmeliticae (1947). All his writings were in the field of mysticism.

Bibliography: C. DI S. GIUSEPPE, Un Maestro di vita spirituale: P. Gabriel di S. M. Maddalena (Rome 1959). B. DELLA SS. TRINITA, "Il fondatore della 'Revista de Vita Spirituale,'" Revista de Vita Spirituale 7 (1953) 113–161. V. DI STA. MARIA, "Il P. Gabriele di Sta. M. Madd., Carm. Scalzo" Vita Cristiana 22 (1953) 249–258. BEDE OF THE TRINITY, "Fr. Gabriel of St. Magd., Exponent of Carmelite Mysticism," Ephemerides Carmeliticae 13 (1962) 758–767.

[O. RODRIGUEZ]

GABRIEL SIONITA

Maronite Orientalist; b. Edden, Lebanon, 1577; d. Paris, 1648. He studied Syriac and Hebrew, as well as Latin and theology, at the Maronite College in Rome. In 1614 he went, with John Hesronita, to Paris, where he collaborated on the Parisian POLYGLOT BIBLE and where he was soon given the chair of Semitic languages at the Sorbonne. He was ordained in 1622 at the age of 45. His collaboration on the Polyglot Bible from 1614 to 1645, marked by numerous disturbances mostly due to his abulic character, was limited to the revision and correction of almost all its Arabic and Syriac texts, most of which he also translated into Latin. For the Gospels, however, he merely revised the current Latin text, and he made no Latin translation from the Syriac for the Sapiential Books and Apocalypse. Among other works, he published also the Arabic text of the Geographia Nubiensis (Rome 1592, Paris 1619), with Latin translation, based especially on the geographical writings of Idrisi (1100–c. 1166), and in 1616 a short Arabic grammar.

Bibliography: J. LE LONG, Bibliotheca sacra, ed. A. G. MASCH, 2 v. (Paris 1778–90) 1:350–352. Biographie universelle, ed. L. G. MICHAUD, 45 v. (Paris 1843–65) 15:325–326. J. ASSFALG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 4:482.

[J. M. SOLA-SOLE]

GABRIELI, ANDREA

Renaissance organist, teacher, and composer of the first magnitude; b. Venice, 1510 or 1520; d. Venice, 1586. He started out as a chorister at St. Mark's, and probably a pupil of its music director, WILLAERT. After travels in Germany and Bohemia, and various musical experiences such as serving as Bavarian court organist at the coronation of Maximilian II in 1562, he became organist at St. Jeremiah in Venice, then in 1566 at St. Mark's, where he remained until his death. His recitals with MERULO at the other organ on Sunday afternoons were high points in Venice's cultural life. He was a thoroughly Renaissance master, prolific and versatile, equally adept in sacred, instrumental, and social music; and he created masterpieces in all these categories. He left 4 Masses, 7 Penitential Psalms, 2 Magnificats, more than 100 motets, 260 madrigals, 4 mascherate, 4 dialogue-madrigals, choruses to Sophocles's Oedipus (performed at the opening of Palladio's Teatro Olimpico, Vicenza, in June 1585), some 30 greghesche and justiniane (comic part-songs with dialect text), and many works for organ and instrumental ensembles.

He was a master of the divided-choir technique (cori spezzati, coro battente) and a pioneer in the new homophonic texture, reserving mainly to his madrigals his virtuosity in handling polyphony. His canzoni francesi for instrumental ensembles represent the climax of this species, as do his organ toccatas and ricercari in that field. His music mirrors the pompous and gay life of Venice at the close of the 16th century. Thus his madrigals have the lighter, more fanciful and good-humored spirit of that phase set off by V. Ruffo in Verona but brought to perfection by Gabrieli in the culturally superior and cosmopolitan atmosphere of Venice. Of his many pupils, the most famous were Hans Leo Hassler and his nephew Giovanni GABRIELI.

Bibliography: G. BENVENUTI, ed., Andrea e Giovanni Gabrieli e la musica strumentale in San Marco, 2 v. (Istituzioni e monumenti dell'arte musicale italiana 1–2; Milan 1931–32). A. EINSTEIN, The Italian Madrigal, tr. A. H. KRAPPE et al., 3 v. (Princeton N.J. 1949). D. ARNOLD, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 4:1185–94; “The Significance of Cori Spezzati,” Music and Letters (London 1920–) 40 (1959) 4–14. M. F. BUKOFZER, Music in the Baroque Era (New York 1947). D. ARNOLD and E. M. ARNOLD, “Andrea Gabrielli,” in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. S. SADIE, v. 7 (New York 1980) 54–60. F. DEGRADA, ed., Andrea Gabrieli e il suo tempo atti del Convegno Internazionale (Venezia 16–18 Settembre 1985) (Florence 1987). D. KÄMPER, “Synkretismus der Formen und Annäherung an die Canzon da sonar bei Andrea Gabrieli,” Analecta Musicologica 10 (1970) 152–155. D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge, Mass. 1996) 289. N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (8th ed. New York 1992) 588–589.

[E. F. KENTON]

GABRIELI, GIOVANNI

Pioneer baroque church composer whose creative innovations forwarded virtually every musical form; b. Venice, c. 1557; d. Venice, Aug. 12, 1612. He was the nephew and pupil of Andrea GABRIELI, his only known relative, and rounded out his education in the Bavarian ducal chapel under LASSO. In 1585, when Andrea Gabrieli succeeded MERULO as first organist at St. Mark's in Venice, Giovanni succeeded his uncle at the second organ and kept this post until his death. He published chiefly his uncle's works and only a few of his own; many of his MSS disappeared during Napoleon's occupation of Venice. Preserved are 2 Mass fragments, 7 Magnificats (parts of 3 more), 1 litany, and some 85 symphoniae sacrae, choral works with or without instrumentation, destined for the Proper, Offices, and specifically Venetian holidays. Next in importance are his instrumental works: some 40 for organ and 37 for ensembles of from 8 to 22 parts. He produced also 30 madrigals (one a spiritual madrigal) and excelled in the Venetian dialogue and echo-madrigal.

The strong long-range influence of his printed output was in surprising contrast with its small quantity. The sacrae symphoniae, with their instrumental preludes and interludes, alternation of vocal solos, duets, and choirs, homophonic texture, and basso per l'organo, shaped the evolution of the baroque cantata perfected by J. S. BACH. His stylistic innovations appear in initial and end repetition, recapitulation of the beginning at the end, ritornels, and use of register levels developed in the divided-choir technique for structural purposes. He assigned instrumental parts to specific instruments (first attempt at orchestration) and was one of the first to use dynamic signs, and the first to differentiate between canzone and sonata and to use sequential episodes in ricercari. Two top parts in imitation foreshadow the trio-sonata form basic to later baroque composition. His harmony is clear and simple; chromaticism is reserved for expressiveness in vocal works, while chordal declamation used in choral works is transferred to instrumental ensembles. These and other departures from tradition were soon reflected in the work of his many northern pupils, especially that of Heinrich SCHÜTZ.

Bibliography: Opera omnia, ed. D. ARNOLD, 3 v. (Corpus mensurabilis musicae, ed. American Institute of Musicology, v. 1–12.1–12.3; 1956–62). C. G. A. VON WINTERFELD, Johannes Gabrieli und sein Zeitalter, 3 v. in 2 (Berlin 1834). E. F. KENTON, Giovanni Gabrieli: His Life and Works (Rome 1966); “The Late Style of G. Gabrieli,” Musical Quarterly (New York 1915–) 48 (1962) 427–443. D. ARNOLD, “Music at the Scuola di San Rocco,” Music and Letters 40 (1959) 229–241. G. REESE, Music in the Renaissance (rev. ed. New York 1959). Histoire de la musique, ed. ROLAND-MANUEL, 2 v. (Paris 1960–63); v. 9, 16 of Encyclopédie de la Pléiade v. 1. Enciclopedia della Musica (Milan 1963–). D. ARNOLD and E. M. ARNOLD, "Giovanni Gabrielli," in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. S. SADIE, v. 7 (New York 1980) 54–60. R. CHARTERIS, "Newly Discovered Manuscript Parts and Annotations in a Copy of Giovanni Gabrieli's Symphoniae sacrae (1615)" Early Music 23 (1995) 487–496. H. PYUN, "Modal Structure in Sixteen Instrumental Works from Giovanni Gabrielli's Sacrae Symphoniae (1597)" (Ph.D. diss. Rutgers University 1994). D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge, Mass. 1996) 289. N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (8th ed. New York 1992) 589.

[E. F. KENTON]

GADAMER, HANS-GEORG

Philosopher; b. Marburg, Germany, Feb. 11, 1900; d. March 14, 2002. The son of a pharmaceutical chemist, as a student in the classical gymnasium and at the University of Breslau, Gadamer was steeped in the study of the Greek and Latin classics and modern languages. He did his doctoral studies in philosophy at the University of Marburg under the neo-Kantian Paul Natorp. After completing his dissertation on Plato at the age of 22, Gadamer came under the spell of young Martin HEIDEGGER, newly arrived from Freiburg, who exercised a decisive influence on this thought.

During the almost 20 years he spent at Marburg as an assistant and Privatdozent (until 1938), Gadamer pursued the study of Plato and Aristotle, and began a study contrasting Sophistic and Platonic doctrine of the polis which led to the publication of "Plato and the Poets" (1934) and "Plato's Educational State" (1942). In those years Rudolf BULTMANN held Thursday evening Graeca sessions in his home where Gadamer came to know Heinrich Schlier, Günther Bornkamm, Gerhard von Rad and Erich Dinkler. It was also at Marburg that he collaborated in the preparation of Jacob Klein's masterwork Greek Mathematical Thought and the Origin of Algebra (1936), and came into contact with the circle surrounding the poet Stefan George. It was the George circle which produced the revolutionary, non-academic and political readings of Plato by Kurt Singer, Heinrich Friedemann and Kurt Hildebrandt. These influences, combined with the paramount role of Heidegger, are evident in Gadamer's Habilitationsschrift Plato's Dialectical Ethics.

In 1938 Gadamer began a distinguished career as Ordinary Professor of Philosophy at Leipzig where he became dean of the philosophical faculty and rector of the university in the immediate post-World War II years (1945–47) under the communist regime. In 1949 he succeeded Karl JASPERS at the University of Heidelberg. Named professor emeritus in 1968, Gadamer continued to write and lecture. He undertook an edition of his collected works (Tubingen: Mohr/Siebeck Verlag), and accepted appointments as visiting lecturer at The Catholic University of America in Washington, McMaster University in Hamilton, Ontario, and Boston College.

Thought. Gadamer's entire career was devoted to redefining the understanding of Wissenschaft, and the overcoming of defects in the Enlightenment notion of science and technology. Having been warned off Nietzsche by his father, young Gadamer while still in his teens was spurred to read a volume by the great philosopher from the paternal library. It was Nietzsche's anti-Platonic polemics that caused him to become intrigued with Plato. His youthful encounter with Nietzsche, moreover, coincided with the deep confusion wrought on the German scene by World War I. The crisis of the West, first proclaimed by Nietzsche and echoed by writers Oswald Spengler, Hermann Hesse and Thomas Mann, marked the end of the age of liberalism with its faith in progress. In seeking a new orientation and basis for cultural traditions, Gadamer turned to philosophy, while never relinquishing his predilection for literature, the arts and philology.

The Heideggerian Revolution. The prevalent philosophic approaches to which Gadamer was attracted before his encounter with Heidegger were: Paul Natorp's transcendental idealist approximations toward constructing comprehensive systems, bolstered by the Neo-Kantian conception of the history of supra-temporal problems that supposedly recur "eternally" within novel systematic context—what Gadamer called "systems-games" that lack evidential warrants from historical-critical method; Nikolai Hartmann's attempt to transform such systems-games into an open system of problems, categories, and values by means of an analysis of categories grounded in both a phenomenological investigation of essences and an idealistically tinged history of problems.

In stark contrast, in Heidegger's philosophizing "the thought-formations of the philosophic tradition came alive, because they were understood as answers to real questions." As Gadamer later realized, Heidegger confirmed the rightness of abandoning eternally identical problems constructed with utter naivete out of the elements of idealist and Neo-Kantian philosophy for the alternative of using historical thinking to retrieve the questions of the tradition in such a way that the old questions became so intelligible and vivid as to become one's own. Gadamer described the pivotal hermeneutical experience as follows: "The disclosure of these questions' historical motivation lends them something of inevitability. Questions as understood cannot just be treated as information. They become one's own questions." Once he appropriated such experiences, Gadamer became a life-long opponent of any scholasticism—whether ancient, medieval, modern, or contemporary—whose characteristic bent from terminological fixity seeks to preserve traditional answers or positions without paying careful historical attention to the questions out of which they arise.

Heidegger, Plato, Aristotle. Heidegger undertook to criticize the metaphysical tradition dominant in Western philosophy and theology. For him both the premodern metaphysics of substance and the modern metaphysics of subject amount to a forgetfulness of being. In order to lay bare the questionable presuppositions of such metaphysics Heidegger returned to Plato and Aristotle. Even though Plato and Aristotle were more foils than exemplars for him, Heidegger nevertheless sought access to them in their originality beneath the encrustations of scholastic traditions. In this way Heidegger enabled Gadamer to recover what he called “the mystery of the Platonic dialogue,” namely, that philosophy’s task of “giving an account” is not a matter of pursuing the guiding ideal behind the post-Cartesian notion of system to attain an ultimate foundation in some supreme principle or proposition; rather it is the dialogical task of trying to think through to the end the conceptual and perceptual force of the language in which we dwell by means of a repeated and further thinking through of our primordial experience of the world.

This opposition to the logical ideal of systematic grounding is central to Gadamer’s hermeneutical resistance to the primacy of ancient episteme or of modern science, which he understood as approximating techne in Aristotle’s sense. In the Phaedo the Platonic Socrates had argued that resistance to Sophism and the possibility of attaining a right orientation towards the whole resides not in a science of nature but in the “flight into the logoi,” or dialectic. Gadamer maintained that dialectical conversation lets something we hold in common come to light even through breakdowns in communication, misunderstandings, and the famed Socratic discovery that we do not know what is highest and best or the whole. But this sought-after commonality regarding our life-orientation—what the Platonic dialogues portray as the One, the Being, the Good at the basis of the order of the soul, of the city’s regime, and of the cosmos—did not for Gadamer take the form of a logically established principle or of scientific or technical knowledge. Hence, the point of his hermeneutic philosophy was to make convincing in our time the Socratic legacy of “human wisdom” that, in comparison to the virtually godlike infallibility vulgarly ascribed to scientific knowledge, is nescience.

Gadamer’s esteem for Platonic dialectic opened up for him by Heidegger led him to conclude that Aristotle is the first and perhaps the greatest Platonist. Under Heidegger’s lead Gadamer grasped that Aristotle’s analysis of practical knowing (phronesis) offers the model for linking the Socratic “human wisdom” (docta ignorantia) to the foundational problematic of the interpretative (verstehende) human sciences. Perhaps because he was less concerned than Heidegger to dismantle Plato and Aristotle as originators of Western metaphysics, Gadamer could see just how Being and Time’s analysis of the facticity of Dasein by way of disengaging the conditionedness of Verstehen (human understanding and interpretation) was dependent upon the earlier Aristotelian account of phronesis. Aristotle had shown how practical insight and practical reasonableness have little or nothing to do with the teachability of science’s generalizations; and how they are made possible instead by practice itself in its concrete and indissoluble nexus with one’s ethos. Thus, Gadamer’s hermeneutical philosophy turns out to be a renewal of practical, social, and political rationality.

Gadamer’s Dialectical Alternative. Gadamer spelled out his opposition to the knowingness of science specifically in terms of a rejection of idealism with its Romantic underpinnings in both aesthetic and historical consciousness. The incapacity of aesthetic consciousness to do justice to the truthfulness of art Gadamer exposed as merely the opposite side of the coin which degrades the existential value of the artistic, the mythic, and the poetic in the name of a mistaken overestimation of logic, conceptual rigor, and proof on the one hand, and of technical expertise on the other. Similarly, the dispassionate remoteness of the cultivated bourgeois consciousness that incarnates historical consciousness cannot do justice to the primordially of our historical being. Both aesthetic and historical conceptions are based ultimately on the illusions of idealist conceptions of consciousness. Gadamer’s antidote to these misconceptions was “effective-historical consciousness.” He elaborated this wirkungsgeschichtliches Bewusstsein phenomenologically in his explication of the game or play (Spiel). And about it he made his famous claim that it is “more being than consciousness.”

To counter the conceptualist hubris of idealist consciousness Gadamer underlined the primal significance of conversation. Against the conceptualist tendencies of the Greeks, against German idealism’s metaphysics of the will, and against the methodologism of the NEO-KANTIANs and the Neo-Positivists, he pointed insistently toward our attempts at mutual understanding by which we are engaged in an unending conversation, a logic of question and answer in which no person will have the last word. To underscore this dialogical dimension Gadamer invoked the European traditions of rhetoric (Vico) and hermeneutics (SCHLEIERMACHER, DILTHEY) by way of re-enforcing the truth of Plato's dialectic and of Aristotle's practical and political philosophy. At the heart of each of these is an art of holding a conversation, which entails holding this conversation with oneself and pursuing an internal harmony with oneself.

According to Gadamer's hermeneutic philosophy, focusing upon the experience of talking-to-each-other and listening-to-one-another means concentrating upon the linguisticity of human experience. Language, or better, language-in-use, has the signal advantage of highlighting the preschematization of our possible experience. In our use of language it becomes plain that human experience is enacted in a constant communicative build-up of our knowledge of the world. The linguistic entwining of world-as-word and word-as-world also serves to decenter all subjectivistic illusions about consciousness; and it let Gadamer thematize the empirically verifiable reflective interiority (which Bernard LONERGAN helpfully called "consciousness as experience"). This awareness is prior to and irreducible to the mythic and exaggerated kind of awareness sponsored by Cartesian and Kantian idealism (which Lonergan identified as "consciousness as perception"). Moreover, language as dialogical also makes clear the difference between advancing, enhancing, and illuminating the horizon of mutual understanding and the limited validity of the ideal of objective determinacy and its concern for logical consistency and univocity.

Hermeneutical philosophy teaches that linguisticity does not head towards the finality of propositional statements, of objective validity-claims, or towards totality as the to-be-completely-determined object. Rather it points in the direction of a mysterious and all-encompassing world-horizon in which we live and move and have our being. For Gadamer human language is not oriented towards a humanly inaccessible truth as "full disclosure, whose ideal of fulfillment is ultimately the self-presence of the absolute spirit." This is why he repudiated "any 'theoria' whose ontological legitimation could only be found in an intellectus infinitus about which human experience unsupported by any revelation knows nothing." Gadamer tried to demonstrate that the finality warranted by language which is genuinely carried out in the infinite dialogue of the soul with itself is "not to be characterized as the determination of an objective world to be known, either in the Neo-Kantian sense of an infinite task, or in the dialectical sense of transcending any given limit through thinking." For him what is expressed is not everything; and hermeneutical philosophy is out to help us acknowledge that what is unsaid "first lets what is said become word and reach us." Thus, the infinity proper to dialogue has a finality consonant with the normative attainment of experience in human living: "A plenitude of experiences, encounters, teachings, and disappointments culminate not in one's finally knowing everything, but in one's knowing something and in one's having learned modesty." In conversation we try to enter into the language of anyone who is thinking along with or thinking things out further than we are. In sum:

"Hermeneutical" philosophy understands itself . . . not as an 'absolute' position, but as a way of experience. It insists that there is no higher principle than this: to open oneself up for conversation. But that constantly means acknowledging beforehand the possible correctness, and indeed the superiority of one's conversation partner. Is that too little? This seems to me the only kind of intellectual probity one can require of a professor of philosophy—but which one also ought to demand.

In articulating his hermeneutic philosophy in Truth and Method (1960), Gadamer gave a theoretical account of the style of his study, of his teaching in seminar and lecture hall, and of his personal hand in forming generations of Germany's leading teachers in philosophy. His published works stand as a witness to his teacher's efforts to establish sustained conditions for teaching and learning that embody the classic ideals of the German university and Western culture.

Bibliography: E. MAKITA, Gadamer-Bibliographie: 1922-1994 (New York 1994). H.-G. GADAMER, The Philosophy of Hans-Georg Gadamer (Chicago 1997). Works.H.-G. GADAMER, Gesammelte Werke (Tübingen 1985-); Kleine Schriften (Tübingen 1967-1972); Philosophical Hermeneutics, tr. and ed. D. E. LINGE (Berkeley 1976); Dialektik und Sophistik im siebenten platonischen Brief (Heidelberg 1964); The Relevance of the Beautiful, tr. N. WALKER, ed. and intro. R. BERNASCONI (Cambridge 1986); Hegel's Dialectic, tr. and intro. R. C. SMITH (New Haven 1976); Hermeneutik und Dialektik, R. BUBNER, ed. (Tübingen 1970); The Idea of the Good in Platonic-Aristotelean Philosophy, tr. and intro. P. C. SMITH (New Haven 1986); Idee und Wirklichkeit in Platos Timaios (Heidelberg 1974); Metaphysik XII: Übersetzung und Kommentar von Hans-Georg Gadamer (Frankfurt am Main 1970); Platos dialektische Ethik und andere Studien zur platonischen Philosophie (Hamburg 1968); Reason in the Age of Science, tr. F. G. LAWRENCE (Cambridge, Mass. 1982); Vernunft im Zeitalter der Wissenschaft: Aufsätze (Frankfurt am Main 1976); Truth and Method, trs. G. BARDEN and J. CUMMING (New York 1975); The Beginning of Knowledge, tr. R. COLTMAN (New York 2001); The Beginning of Philosophy, tr. R. COLTMAN (New York 1998); Hermeneutics, Religion, and Ethics, tr. J. WEINSHEIMER (New Haven 1999); Praise of Theory: Speeches and Essays, tr. C. DAWSON (New Haven 1998); Gadamer on Celan: "Who Am I and Who Are You" and Other Essays, tr. R. HEINEMANN and B. KRAJEWSKI (Albany, N.Y. 1997); The Enigma of Health: The Art of Healing in a Scientific Age, tr. N. WALKER and J. GEIGER (Stanford 1996); Heidegger's Ways, tr. J. W. STANLEY (Albany, N.Y. 1994). Literature. J. GRONDIN, Hans-Georg Gadamer: Eine Biographie (Tübingen 1999). J. WEINSHEIMER, Gadamer's Hermeneutics: A Reading of Truth and Method (New Haven 1985). H. DIETER, et al., eds., Die Gegenwart der Griechen im neueren Denken: Festschrift für Hans-Georg Gadamer zum 60 (Tübingen 1960). D. C. HOY, The Critical Circle: Literature, History and Philosophical Hermeneutics (Berkeley 1978). J. VANDENBUL-

CKE, Hans-Georg Gadamer. Een filosofie van het interpreteren (Utrecht 1973). L. K. SCHMIDT, The Epistemology of Hans-Georg Gadamer. An Analysis of the Legitimization of Vorurteile (New York 1985). M. R. FOSTER, Gadamer and Practical Philosophy: The Hermeneutics of Moral Confidence (Atlanta 1991). T. K. CARR, Newman and Gadamer: Toward a Hermeneutics of Religious Knowledge (Atlanta 1996). Dialogue and Deconstruction: The Gadamer-Derrida Encounter, tr. D. P. MICHELFELDER and R. E. PALMER (Albany, N.Y. 1989).

[F. G. LAWRENCE]

GAETANI (CAETANI)

Italian family descended, according to family tradition, from the consuls and dukes of Gaeta (ninth century to 1032). Genealogical documents for branches in Naples, Pisa, and Anagni date from the 12th century. Benedetto Gaetani, who became pope as BONIFACE VIII in 1294, made the family a GUELF power between the STATES OF THE CHURCH and the Kingdom of Naples, and used it combined with the ORSINI north of Rome to contain the Ghibelline COLONNA. The Naples branch, associated with the Angevins, disappeared in the 15th century, and the Pisa branch, which had four cardinals (including Aldobrandino, d. 1223, favored by Honorius III) and many prelates in the 12th and 13th centuries, lost importance after the time of the banker James (d. 1342), an intimate of Boniface VIII.

The Anagni branch at its peak (1350–1500) held 200 castles. Cardinal Francis (d. 1317) and JAMES GAETANI STEFANESCHI (d. 1343) defended the memory of Boniface VIII. As a papal legate, Annibale de Ceccano (d. 1350), a luxury-loving prelate with many benefices, sought to make peace between the kings of England and France in 1342. Onorato I was host to the dissident cardinals at Fondi, who in 1378 elected the antipope CLEMENT VII and began the Western Schism. James II (d. c. 1423) divided the Anagni branch (c. 1420) into the Gaetani d'Aragona, friendly to Spain, and the Gaetani di Sermoneta (near Rome), which ALEXANDER VI tried to exterminate in 1499. Antonio I (d. 1412), brother of Onorato I and of James II, became a cardinal in 1402. Onorato IV commanded papal troops in the Battle of Lepanto (1571). As papal envoy to France during the WARS OF RELIGION, Cardinal Enrico (d. 1599), Patriarch of Jerusalem, was accompanied by St. Robert BELLARMINE and his brother, Camillo Gaetani (d. 1602), Patriarch of Alexandria and later papal envoy to Emperor Rudolph II in Prague (1591) and to PHILIP II of Spain in Madrid (1592–99). Enrico's nephew, Cardinal Antonio II (d. 1624), was also an active papal diplomat. Michelangelo (d. 1882) was a moderate liberal politician and a DANTE scholar. Honorato (d. 1917) was a politician and geographer, whereas Leone (d.

1935) was a historian of Islam. Gelasio Caetani (d. 1934), ambassador to Washington from 1922 to 1925, rebuilt the castle of Sermoneta and published many volumes of documents from the family archives, now in the VATICAN, as well as a family history.

Bibliography: L. JANIN et al., Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 11:139–154. O. ENGELS, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:484. G. B. A. CAETANI, Caetanorum genealogia (Perugia 1920); Regesta chartarum, 5 v. (Perugia 1922–30); Domus Caietana, 2 v. (Perugia 1927–33). L. ERMINI, Onorato I Caetani conte di Fondi, e lo scisma d'Occidente (Rome 1938). C. MANFRONI, La legazione del cardinale Caetani in Francia (Turin 1893). E. CAETANI, Alcuni ricordi di Michelangelo Caetani duca di Sermoneta (Milan 1904). V. NOVELLI, I Colonna e i Caetani, storia del medio-evo di Roma, 2 v. (Rome 1892–93).

[E. P. COLBERT]

GAGARIN, IVAN SERGEEVICH

Writer; b. Moscow, Aug. 1, 1814; d. Paris, July 19, 1882. He belonged to a noble Russian family. In 1832 he joined the diplomatic corps and served as secretary to the embassy in Munich, Vienna, and Paris (from 1838). Mme. Swetchine, his aunt, brought him into contact with Chateaubriand, Falloux, Montalembert, Lacordaire, Donoso Cortes, and other leading Catholics who frequented her Parisian salon. Under the influence of Gustave de RAVIGNAN, SJ, he was converted from Orthodoxy to Catholicism and joined the JESUITS (1843). From this time he used also the name John Xavier. After ordination he taught philosophy and ecclesiastical history in Brugelette (1849–51) and Laval (1854–55). From 1855 he lived mostly in Paris, where he engaged in writing and pastoral work, and sought chiefly to reunite the Russian Orthodox Church with Rome. Besides numerous periodical articles, he published in Paris La Russie sera-t-elle Catholique (1856), Les starovères, L'Église russe et le Pape (1857), and L'Église russe et l'Immaculée Conception (1868). With Charles Daniel he founded in 1856 the periodical Études, which still continues publication. Stories linking his name with the duel in which Aleksandr Pushkin, the Russian poet, was mortally wounded, lack foundation.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 3:1089–95. J. G. A. M. REMMERS, De Herenigingsgedachte van Ivan S. Gagarin (Tilburg 1951). L. KOCH, Jesuiten-Lexikon: Die Gesellschaft Jesu einst und jetzt (Paderborn 1934) 629.

[J. PAPIN]

GAGE, THOMAS

Missionary, apostate, and traveler; b. England, 1602 or 1603; d. Jamaica, 1656. Thomas, member of an old English Catholic family, joined the Dominican Order in Spain and went to Mexico in 1625. He spent 11 years in Guatemala, first in the capital, later as priest among the Pokoman Maya. He traveled overland to Panama and returned to England in 1637. Five years later he apostatized, joined the Puritans, and became violently anti-Catholic. Largely on his evidence three priests, including one who had been a schoolmate at St. Omer's, were executed, but he did testify so as to save the life of his former superior, Thomas MIDDLETON, OP, provincial of the small band of English Dominicans. In 1648 Gage published The English-American, his Travail By Sea and Land or a New Survey of the West Indies, an account of his travels and observations in Spanish America. This contained much anti-Catholic and anti-Spanish propaganda inserted to win support for an English invasion of the Spanish Main, but shorn of those features, it was a detailed, accurate, and fascinating picture by a first-class observer of that strange world forbidden to Englishmen, as the many editions and translations attest. The book helped establish the unhappy "Black Legend." By exaggerating the weakness and corruption of Spanish rule and the supposed readiness of native peoples to revolt, Gage was partly, perhaps largely, instrumental in persuading Oliver Cromwell to attack the Spanish Main. Gage accompanied the expedition as chaplain and adviser and acted as interpreter in the negotiations for the surrender of Jamaica.

Bibliography: T. GAGE, Travels in the New World, ed. J. E. S. THOMPSON (Norman, OK 1958).

[J. E. S. THOMPSON]

GAGLIARDI, ACHILLE

Jesuit theologian and spiritual writer; b. Padua, 1537 or 1538; d. Modena, July 6, 1607. He entered the Society of Jesus on Sept. 29, 1559. After studying at the Roman College with Robert Bellarmine from 1561 to 1563, he taught philosophy and theology there from 1563 to 1579, except for the years 1568 to 1575, when he was rector of the Jesuit college at Turin. He taught at Padua and in 1580 was sent to Milan at the request of its archbishop, St. Charles BORROMEO, whom Gagliardi subsequently directed. He was superior of Milan's S. Fedele residence from 1584 to 1594. While there he published his Catechismo della fede cattolica (Milan 1584). He also participated in the revision of the Jesuit Ratio Studiorum in 1598 and composed ascetical works intended especially for Jesuits. Some of his reflections appear in his Commentaria in exercitia spiritualia S. P. Ignatii de Loyola (Bruges 1882); most of his De disciplina interioris hominis remains unpublished. As spiritual director of Isabella Bellinzaga Lomazzi (1551–1624), he collaborated with her on the Breve compendio intorno alla perfezione cristiana (Brescia 1611), a highly influential ascetical work and one whose French editions had an effect upon Bérullian spirituality. Because of the undue stress in the Compendio on spiritual passivity, Pourrat considered Gagliardi an unconscious precursor of Italian "pre-quietism." P. Pirri has studied the difficult question of Gagliardi's share in the composition of the Compendio, and although the work reflects Gagliardi's spirituality and his conduct of retreats, it does not seem to be exclusively his creation. During Gagliardi's lifetime, its orthodoxy was questioned by the Holy Office, but a favorable judgment was given it in 1601, possibly because of Bellarmine's intervention. CLEMENT VIII forbade Gagliardi any further collaboration with Lomazzi and had him moved from Milan. The book was on the Roman Index from 1703 to 1800.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 3:1095–99. Brémond 11:3–56. J. DE GUIBERT, The Jesuits: Their Spiritual Doctrine and Practice, tr. W. T. YOUNG (Chicago 1964). Directoria Exercitiorum Spiritualium, ed. I. IPARRAGUIRRE (Monumenta historica Societatis Jesu Madrid 76; 1955). I. IPARRAGUIRRE, Répertoire de spiritualité ignatienne (Rome 1961). For the Breve compendio, consult M. VILLER, "L'Abrégé de la perfection de la dame milanaise," Revue d'ascétique et de mystique 12 (1931) 44–89; "Autour de l'Abrégé de la perfection: L'Influence," ibid. 13 (1932) 34–59; Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique 1:1940–42. M. VILLER and G. JOPPIN, "Les Sources italiennes de l'Abrégé de la perfection," Revue d'ascétique et de mystique 15 (1934) 381–402. P. PIRRI, "Il P. Achille Gagliardi, la Dama milanese, la riforma dello spirito e il movimento degli zelatori," Archivum historicum Societatis Jesu (1945) 1–72; "Il Breve compendio di Achille Gagliardi al vaglio di teologi gesuiti," ibid. 20 (1951) 231–253; "Gagliardiana," ibid. 29 (1960) 99–129.

[M. A. FAHEY]

GAGUIN, ROBERT

Humanist, poet, historian, and ecclesiastic; b. Cal-lone-sur-Lys, Diocese of Artois, c. 1433; d. Paris, May 22, 1501. Although a Fleming by birth, he was French by nationality. Having been schooled by the TRINITARIANS (known also as Mathurins), he later joined the order and in 1473 was elected their general. He was a professor at the Sorbonne and dean of the Faculty of Canon Law. Much influenced by Guillaume Fichet, with him he celebrated the introduction of printing in Paris and was enthusiastic over Latin elegance. ERASMUS and REUCHLIN both studied with Gaguin in Paris. His correspondence, including letters to Erasmus and M. FICINO, is a storehouse of information concerning HUMANISM and reform in Paris at the end of the 15th century; the publication of his letters in 1498 was a significant event in the development of humanism in France.

After 1485 his energies were increasingly turned away from humanistic activities and given to diplomacy and various missions: Italy in 1486, England in 1489–90, and Germany in 1492. He was ambassador to England in 1489–90, at a time when Thomas MORE was in Archbishop MORTON'S household, and More's allusion, "Gaguin, who neither disparages the honor of the French nor broadcasts our honor," glances at this and at Gaguin's best-known work, De origine et gestis Francorum compendium (1495). He is also the subject of J. Skelton's Re-cule ageinst Gaguayne. His travels brought him into contact with BESSARION, Ermolao BARBARO, PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA, and Publio Fausto Andrelini—all distinguished humanists.

Theologically he is noteworthy for his writings in verse and in prose on the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION, and in 1497 he published the Statuta ordinis fratrum sanctae Trinitatis et redemptionis captivorum. In addition to his translations of Latin prose and verse, which included Caesar's Commentaries in 1485, he translated Alain Chartier's Curial into French and imitated him in his Débat du laboureur, du prestre et du gendarme.

Bibliography: R. GAGUIN, Epistole et orationes, ed. L. THUASNE, 2 v. (Paris 1903). A. RENAUNET, Préréforme et humanisme à Paris . . . (2d ed. Paris 1953). ANTONIO DE LA ASUNCIÓN, Diccionario de los escritores trinitarios de España y Portugal, 2 v. (Rome 1898–99) v. 2. K. GAQUOIN, Denkschrift zum 400. Todestage des R. G. (Heidelberg 1901). A. PALMIERI, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique ed. A. VACANT et al. 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 6:996–998. F. SIMONE, "R. G. ed il suo cenacolo umanistico," Aevum 13 (1939) 410–476. V. ZOLLINI, Enciclopedia cattolica 5: 1851. D. ERASMUS, Opus epistolarum, ed. P. S. ALLEN, 12 v. (Oxford 1906–58) 1:146, 241. The Correspondence of Sir Thomas More, ed. E. F. ROGERS (Princeton 1947) 36. H. M. FÉRET, Catholicisme 4:1699–1700.

[R. J. SCHOECK]

GAILHAC, PIERRE JEAN ANTOINE

Founder of the Religious of the SACRED HEART OF MARY; b. Béziers, France, Nov. 14, 1802; d. there, Jan. 25, 1890. He was born in modest circumstances and received his early education from a priest. After a brief apprenticeship to his uncle, a pharmacist, he entered the seminary of Montpellier. He remained there for eight years after ordination (1826) as professor of theology. When the government demanded that all professors of theology teach and defend the DECLARATION OF THE Pierre Jean Antoine Gailhac.

FRENCH CLERGY of 1682, Gailhac alone among the Montpellier faculty incurred diocesan disapproval by refusing (see GALLICANISM). While serving as hospital chaplain in Béziers (1830–49), he decided to devote himself to the sick poor. He opened a house of refuge for penitent women and later an orphanage. In 1849 he founded the Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary. The immediate obligation of this congregation of women was the care of orphans, but the general purpose was the education of young women. A second foundation, the Priests of the Good Shepherd, did not endure. In 1860 Gailhac was anonymously accused of poisoning two nuns, subjected to an official investigation, and acquitted. Years later an obscure citizen sent a deathbed statement to the bishop confessing his responsibility for the false accusation. The decree introducing his cause for beatification was issued in 1953.

Bibliography: F. LERAY, Un Apôtre: Le père Jean Gailhac (Paris 1944). H. MAGARET, Gailhac of Béziers (New York 1946).

[H. MAGARET]

GAIUS (CAIUS), POPE, ST.

Pontificate: Dec. 17, 283 to April 22, 296. The biography of Gaius in the Liber pontificalis describes him as a Dalmatian and supposedly a relative of the Emperor Diocletian. He is said to have decreed that the hierarchical orders from lector to priest had to be observed before a bishop could be consecrated; he assigned deacons to administer the seven ecclesiastical districts of Rome. ANASTASIUS THE LIBRARIAN records Gaius's imprisonment with the future popes SIXTUS and DIONYSIUS in 257; legend connects him with the Diocletian persecution, and the Passio S. Susannae associates him in the martyrdom of Susanna, apparently identifying him with the donor of the title church Gaii near the Quirinal. The Passio Sancti Sebastiani says that Gaius encouraged SEBASTIAN, the famous Christian soldier who has been the subject of numerous paintings, to be firm in his martyrdom (the pagans shot him to death with arrows). However, his name appears in none of the martyrologies. It does head a trustworthy list of Roman ordination dates, and he is listed in the Liberian Catalogue as reigning from Dec. 17, 283 to April 22, 296, thus anticipating the Diocletian persecution. Eusebius cites him as a contemporary and credits him with a fifteen-year pontificate (Ecclesiastical History 7.32). According to the Depositio episcoporum Gaius was buried in the cemetery of St. Callistus in a room separate from the bishops' grotto, but this statement is unconfirmed by archeological research, although Pope URBAN VIII transported the body to the church of St. Caius in 1631. His epitaph, "Burial of Gaius, bishop . . . April 22," has been reconstructed by G. de Rossi.

Feast: April 22.

Bibliography: G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 3d. ed. (Freiburg 1995) 2:877. DUCHESNE, Liber Pontificalis 1:xcviii–xcix, 71–72, 154, 161. Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART, et al. (Paris 1912–) 11:237–238. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie. ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 2.2:1738–39. G. B. DE ROSSI, La Roma sotterranea cristiana, 4 v. (Rome 1864–97) 114–120; suppl 1, ns, J. WILPERT, Die Papstgräber . . . in der Katakomben des hl. Kallistus (Freiburg 1909). E. FERGUSON, ed., Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (New York 1997) 1:446. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 24.

[E. G. WELTIN]

GALAND, AGNÈS OF JESUS, BL.

Also known as Agnès de Langeac; Dominican nun; mystic; b. Nov. 17, 1602, Puy-en-Velay (near Langeac), France; d. Oct. 19, 1634, Langeac. Agnès, a vivacious and generous child, was educated by the Sisters of the Holy Virgin. She entered the Dominican convent at Langeac (1623) and, displaying the enthusiasm that characterized her early life, was elected prioress in 1627. In accordance with her understanding of God's will revealed through a vision of the Virgin Mary (1631), Sister Agnès used her gift of prayer and her hidden penances for the good of Jean Jacques OLIER, abbot of Prébrac, who was then a young priest living irresponsibly and whom she had never met. She is said to have bilocated (1634) to the Church where Father Olier was praying during a retreat under the direction of Saint VINCENT DE PAUL. She met Olier just before her death. Twenty years later he founded the Sulpicians. She was beatified by John Paul II on Nov. 20, 1994.

Feast: Oct. 19 (Dominicans).

Bibliography: Mère Agnès de Langeac et son temps: une mystique dominicaine au grand siècle des âmes: actes du colloque du Puy (Le Puy, France 1986). J. BOUFLET, Petite vie de Agnès de Langeac (Paris 1994). M. J. DORCY, Saint Dominic's Family (Dubuque, Iowa 1964) 386–87. E. PANASSIÈRE, Mémoires sur la vie d'Agnès de Langeac (Paris 1994). R. DE TRYON-MONTALEMBERT, Agnès de Langeac: "Qui a Dieu a tout" (Paris 1994).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GALANO, CLEMENTE

Theatine missionary, theologian, and Orientalist; b. Sorrento; d. Leopold, May 14, 1666. He was professed at Holy Apostles Monastery, Naples, Feb. 25, 1628, and in 1636 appointed to the Georgian missions to reunite the Armenian Church with Rome. His negotiations with the Armenian patriarch, Ciriac of Erivan, ended short of success, cut off by the patriarch's death. In addition to his spiritual activities, Galano opened a college in Constantinople, publishing there his Armenian grammar and logic. He was forced to leave for Rome with his followers in 1645 because of the violent opposition of the newly elected Patriarch David. His group, made up of disciples and dignitaries converted from the Greek-Armenian Church, was warmly received by Pope Urban VIII. Shortly afterward, Galano was appointed professor of the Armenians in the college De Propaganda Fide, staffed by Theatines since 1641. In 1663 the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith sent Galano and Louis Pidou to Poland to work toward reunion with the Church of Rome among the Polish-Armenians. They opened an Armenian college in Leopold. On the eve of success, death overtook Galano, but Pidou completed the work and saw the end of the schism.

Bibliography: F. A. VEZZOSI, Scrittori dei chierici regolari detti teatini, 2 v. (Rome 1780). A. PALMIERI, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 6:1023–25. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae 6 v. (Innsbruck 1903–13) 4:118–119. F. ANDREU, Enciclopedia cattolica ed. P. PASCHINI et al. (Rome, 1949–54) 5:1853.

[A. SAGRERA]

GALANTINI, HIPPOLYTUS, BL.

Founder of the secular Institute of Christian Doctrine; b. Florence, Oct. 12, 1565; d. there March 20, 1619. The son of a silk weaver, Filippo Galantini (Galanti), he supported himself by this trade and remained a layman all his life. Although cured of a severe illness, he lacked health to enter the cloister; he decided at the age of 12 to devote himself to the service of God. Archbishop Alessandro de' Medici, recognizing his spiritual gifts, permitted him to use the church of S. Lucia al Prato to instruct children. Four years later Galantini established a confraternity for the religious education of poor children. Opposition, based on want of money and his own lack of secular education, delayed his plan until 1602. His work and his zeal came to the attention of CLEMENT VIII, who ordered that an oratory dedicated to St. Francis and St. Lucy should be built for his use. There at the age of 37, Galantini founded the Institute of Christian Doctrine and composed the rule for his associates. His own reputation for holiness and the ascetic spirit of his followers won for members of the institute the title "Vanchetoni" (unworldly ones). The practice of nocturnal adoration may be traced back to his use of this devotion to keep youth from dangerous entertainment. The Franciscans consider him as one of their tertiaries. He saw his work spread through northern Italy before he died of a painful illness. He was beatified by LEO XII in 1825.

Feast: March 20.

Bibliography: D. A. MARSELLA, De beato Hippolyto Galantino (Rome 1826). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:650.

[G. M. GRAY]

GALATIA

A region in central Asia Minor. The name Γαλατία (Galatia) is derived from that of the Γαλάται (Galatians), a variant form of Κελτοί (Celts), the name of a people speaking the Celtic language who came from the East into central and western Europe probably around the beginning of the first millennium B.C.

In History. In the first half of the 3rd century B.C. a group of this Gallic or Gaulish people invaded the Balkans, Macedonia, Thrace, and Greece. After they were repulsed from Greece, three of their tribes, embracing about 20,000 souls, crossed over into Asia Minor in 178 B.C. at the invitation of King Nicomedes I of Bithynia, who sought their military service. For the next half century they overran most of Asia Minor until they were subdued by King Attalus I of Pergamum (c. 232 B.C.). Thereafter they settled in central Asia Minor, both to the east and to the west of the great bend of the Halys River.

In this region, Galatia in the strict sense, the Gaulish invaders formed merely the ruling class, to whom the earlier inhabitants (Phrygians in the west and Cappadocians in the east) were subject. After Galatia had been a vassal state of Pergamum and a half-independent kingdom, it became a client state of Rome in 64 B.C. When King Amyntas of Galatia died in 25 B.C., the country was incorporated into the Roman Empire and formed part of a newly established province, which bore the same name. However, the Roman Province of Galatia as then constituted was much larger than the original region of Galatia; it included also the districts of Lycaonia and Pisidia in the south and the southern part of Phrygia in the southwest. When the Roman Emperor DIOCLETIAN reorganized the provinces of the empire (c. 295), he divided the Province of Galatia into two provinces, of which only the northern half (Galatia in the strict sense) was now called Galatia. In the 11th century the country was conquered by the SELJUKS, and in the 14th century it fell to the possession of the OTTOMAN TURKS.

In the Bible. Because the term Galatia was used by ancient writers to designate either Galatia in the strict sense or the Roman Province of Galatia or even southern Gaul (later France), the exact meaning of the term as used in the Bible is often uncertain and, in connection with the missionary activity of St. Paul, still much disputed. The Galatians who are mentioned in 2 Mc 8:20 are, no doubt, men from Galatia in the strict sense, who often served as mercenary troops. Those referred to in 1 Mc 8:2 as defeated by the Romans may well be the Gauls of northern Italy.

In the NT the Galatia mentioned in 1 Pt 1:1 is most likely the Roman province of that name, since all the other names mentioned in this verse are those of Roman provinces in Asia Minor. It is uncertain what district is meant by the Galatia to which Crescens went (2 Tm 4:10); it might be even southern Gaul. No mention of Galatia itself is made in the Acts of the Apostles, but according to Acts 16:6 St. Paul "passed through Phrygia and the Galatian country [Γαλατική χώρα]" on his second missionary journey, and according to 18:23 he "traveled through the Galatian country and Phrygia in turn [better: one place after another in the Galatian country and Phrygia], strengthening all the disciples." Both passages probably refer to the southwest section of the Province of Galatia, which was inhabited by Phrygians and Galatians. In any case, there appears to be no clear reference in Acts to Paul's having ever evangelized Galatia proper. All available evidence seems to show that at the time of St. Paul Galatia in the strict sense was scarcely Hellenized, not even in its three main cities, Pessinus, Ancyra (modern Ankara), and Tavium, and very few Jews were settled there. The contrary is true of the southern section of the Province of Galatia, which Paul evangelized on his first missionary journey (Acts 13:13–14:25).

A Hittite Shrine near Ankara, Turkey, one of the three major cities of the former province of Galatia. (©Richard T. Nowitz/CORBIS)

However, there are many modern scholars who still defend vigorously the formerly unique opinion that “the churches of Galatia” (Gal 1:2) to which Paul addressed his Epistle to the GALATIANS were in Galatia proper. Among their arguments the strongest are (1) that Paul addressed the recipients of his letter as ὧν Γαλάται (O Galatians: Gal. 3:1), a term that would seem to fit the inhabitants of Galatia proper much better than those of the southern part of the Province of Galatia, and (2) that the “Galatian country” used in Acts 16:6; 18:23 (see above) can be understood as referring to Galatia proper.

Bibliography: W. RAMSAY, Historical Geography of Asia Minor (London 1890). Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. (Stuttgart 1893) 7.1:519–559. H. SCHLIER, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg, 1957–66) 4:488–489. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 829–831.

[L. F. HARTMAN]

GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THE

Paul’s letter to the Galatians is a relatively brief writing. Its authenticity has seldom been put in doubt. It is often assumed that the addressees are, for the most part, believers converted from paganism; they live in Galatia, a region in central Asia Minor. Paul has visited and evangelized the population during his second missionary journey. Those “who trouble” (1:7) the Galatians are considered to be Jewish Christian missionaries who keep contact with the Jerusalem authorities. These opponents of Paul are compelling the Galatians to be circumcised and to observe (parts of) the Mosaic law. They also attack the legitimacy of Paul’s apostleship. Paul tries to win back the Galatians who seem to side with his adversaries.

The letter to the Galatians was written, according to this common view, some time during Paul's third missionary journey in the mid-fifties, either during his stay at Ephesus or somewhere in Macedonia. The following outline provides a general overview of the letter's contents:

- 1:1–10 Salutation and Rebuke
- (1) 1:11–2:21 Autobiography (Paul's apostleship)
- (2) 3:1–4:31 Reflection (the Mosaic law)
- (3) 5:1–6:10 Exhortation (freedom in love and Spirit)
- 6:11–18 Postscript

Overview of the Letter

Salutation and Rebuke (1:1–10). Paul introduces himself to the churches of Galatia and wishes them "grace and peace." He is an apostle sent not by humans but by God the Father and Jesus Christ (1:1–5). Paul omits his customary thanksgiving and at once expresses his astonishment that the Galatians, under the influence of troublemakers, are turning to a different gospel (1:6–10).

Autobiography (1:11–2:21). Paul's gospel came to him through a revelation of Jesus Christ. Paul relates how he was zealous for the traditions of the fathers and became a persecutor of the church. Yet God called him and revealed to him his Son so that he might preach Jesus Christ among the Gentiles. Only after three years did he go up to Jerusalem to visit Cephas and remained with him but 15 days; other apostles, except James the Lord's brother, he did not see (1:10–24). After 14 years he went up to Jerusalem a second time, in response to a revelation. He explained his Torah-free gospel privately to the three "pillars," James, Cephas, and John. They did not compel Titus, who came with him, and Barnabas to be circumcised, notwithstanding the pressure from the false brothers. Furthermore, the division of the apostolic work was recognized: Peter had been entrusted with the gospel for the Jews and Paul had been sent to the Gentiles. Paul, however, should remember the poor of Jerusalem (2:1–10). Later in Antioch Paul saw that, after the arrival of certain people from James, Cephas and with him other Jews and even Barnabas drew back and ate no longer with the Gentiles. According to Paul, Peter was no longer acting consistently with the truth of the Gospel. Therefore, Paul addresses Peter and emphasizes that Jews and Gentiles alike are justified by faith in Christ, not by works of the law (2:11–21).

Reflection (3:1–4:31). Already in 2:14b–21, the address to Peter, Paul was arguing in a theological way. At the beginning of chapter 3 he suddenly writes: "You foolish Galatians." Did they receive the Spirit by works of the law? Paul refers to Abraham who believed; his faith was reckoned to him as righteousness. So those who believe are the descendants of Abraham. Those who rely on works of the law are under a curse because they do not observe all the requirements of the law. But Christ redeemed us from that curse and in him the blessing of Abraham comes to the Gentiles (3:1–14). In fact, the promises made to Abraham belong to Christ, his only offspring ("seed" in Gn 12:7 is in the singular). The law came 430 years later than the covenant and cannot annul it. That law was added because of transgressions. The law was our custodian until Christ came: we were all imprisoned under the law. But now, since the Galatians belong to Christ, they are Abraham's offspring. There is no longer Jew or Greek, there is no longer slave or free, there is no longer male and female: the Galatians are one in Christ Jesus (3:15–29). We are no longer slaves and, as children, we are heirs of God. We were enslaved to the ruling powers of this world. But God sent his Son in order to redeem those who were under the law so that all might receive adoption as children. The Spirit of the Son cries in our hearts: "Abba! Father." Paul asks: how can you want to be enslaved again? He is afraid that his work will have been in vain (4:1–11). Paul now points to his first arrival in Galatia. Because of an ailment he remained there and preached the gospel. The Galatians received him with great love. He can testify to them that they would have torn out their eyes and given them to him. Has he now become their enemy? The opponents are courting the Galatians and want to separate them from Paul. But the believers are his children; he is again in childbirth until Christ be formed in them (4:12–20). Many Galatians desire to be under the law. But what is written in the law? Paul refers to the slave woman Hagar and the free woman Sarah and sees in them two covenants. Hagar, the covenant from Mount Sinai, bears children for slavery and corresponds to the present Jerusalem. The other woman corresponds to the Jerusalem above: she is free and is our mother. Like her child Isaac we are children of the promise and consequently heirs (4:21–31).

Exhortation (5:1–6:10). In 5:1 Paul begins his explicit exhortation: "For freedom Christ has set us free." The first item is: let yourselves not be circumcised, for you would cut yourselves off from Christ. In Christ Jesus neither circumcision nor uncircumcision means anything; what counts is faith working through love (5:1–12). The second item is: do not use your freedom as an occasion for the flesh but through love be enslaved to one another. The whole law is fulfilled in the one word "You shall love your neighbor as yourself." The Galatians must live by the Spirit and not gratify the desires of the flesh (5:13–24). In 5:24 Paul once again urges: "If we live by the Spirit, let us also follow the Spirit.’’ The unifying factor of this section is the interweaving of mutual help and individual attentiveness, two complementary injunctions which throughout manifold themes dominate Paul’s parenesis here. Bearing one another’s burden is fulfilling the law of Christ (5:25–6:10).

Postscript (6:11–18). A final autograph warning against those who are trying to compel the Galatians to be circumcised comes at the end. Neither circumcision nor uncircumcision is anything. Believers are a new creation. Paul himself carries on his body the marks of Jesus. Wishes of peace and mercy as well as a blessing form the conclusion of the letter.

Hermeneutical Problems

The interpretation of Galatians is conditioned by the types of solutions one offers for the hermeneutical problems found in the letter. The second part of this article will deal with the rhetorical approach, addressees, and date of the letter, the identity of the so-called opponents, Paul’s use of Scripture in this letter, and justification not by works of the law. Much more than a state of the questions cannot be offered. By way of conclusion a word about the current value of this letter will be said.

Rhetoric. Since about the 1970s the rhetorical approach to Galatians has been very much in vogue (cf. H. D. Betz). In writing his letter Paul uses persuasive language and is dependent on Greek rhetoric. Due attention must be given to the figures of style. As applied to Galatians, rhetorical criticism asks two basic questions: (1) To what kind of rhetoric does Galatians belong? (2) Is it possible to detect a rhetorical structure (dispositio) in the letter?

With regard to the first question few among those who favor this approach still defend the classification of Galatians as an apologetic letter. It would seem that a sustained deliberative rhetoric is present. Paul tries to persuade his addressees not to submit to the opponents’ pressures. As to the second question, an example of rhetorical structure is proposed here. Within the epistolary frame (prescript and postscript) one finds an exordium (1:6–10), a narratio (1:11–2:10), a propositio (2:15–21), a probatio (3:1–4:31) and an exhortatio (5:1–6:10).

Yet many doubts remain. To what degree was Paul trained in Greek rhetoric? If so, does he apply the speech structure deliberately? Is a rhetorical division not forced upon the text? Moreover, there is a plethora of diverging structural proposals. Where does one find the propositio? Is Galatians not primarily a spontaneous and emotional letter? Does not Paul’s way of reasoning and using Scripture indicate more Semitic than Greek influence?

Addressees and Date. There is no absolute certainty about the identity of the addressees. According to the North Galatian or territory hypothesis—the more traditional view—the Galatians are the inhabitants of the region Galatia (central Asia Minor) and Celtic by race. According to the more recent South Galatian or province hypothesis (cf. W. M. Ramsay), the addressees are the Christians about whom Luke writes in Acts 13–14. In Paul’s time, the Roman province of Galatia included parts of Lycaonia, Pisidia, and Phrygia. During his first missionary journey Paul was in Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe. The territory theory assumes that Paul preached the gospel in Galatia on his second missionary journey; that region (but no preaching) is mentioned in Acts 16:6 and, again, in Acts 18:23 at the beginning of the third journey. Yet not all consider the information found in Acts as trustworthy. Some exegetes are of the opinion that the first missionary journey took place after the Jerusalem conference and the Antioch incident (Gal 2:1–21) and that Acts 15—with its compromise decree that Paul does not mention—is from a later date. An early date for the letter has been proposed; some scholars even see Galatians as Paul’s first letter.

It would seem that in Gal 4:12–14 Paul indicates the region, not the province, on his second journey (cf. Acts 16:6); moreover, proteron (former) in 4:13 possibly refers indirectly to the other visit (cf. Acts 18:23). Most probably the letter to the Galatians was written not long before that to the Romans that takes up the controversy about the law. So a preference for the North Galatian hypothesis and a date around 55 may be justified.

Opponents. The difficulty in identifying the opponents is because one has to rely on Pauline information alone (cf. 1:7; 3:1; 4:17; 5:7, 10, 12; and 6:12–13). Mirror reading is unavoidable; reconstruction proves delicate. The discussion about another name (e.g., agitators) is of minor importance. The opponents are hardly Gnostics. They do not consist of two categories or manifest a twofold, partly conservative and partly spiritual and liberal, mentality. They appear to have been Jewish Christian missionaries who arrived in Galatia after Paul and tried to impose circumcision and other Jewish regulations on the Gentile Christians. Therefore, they are called Judaizers; they may have had connections with the authorities in Jerusalem. According to Paul, the opponents are perverting the gospel of Christ.

Scripture. The way Paul uses the figure of Abraham for his main argumentation is disturbing to say the least. Paul’s Jewish contemporaries assume that the works of Abraham, e.g., circumcision and the sacrifice of Isaac, are an integral part of his faith. He does more than just ‘believe’ as Paul seeks to prove by means of Gen 15:6 cited in Gal 3:6. Jews are even more irritated by Paul's so-called allegory of Hagar and Sarah in Gal 4:21–31.

The question arises whether Paul's forced use of these Scripture passages is not caused by a previous use of them by the opponents against his understanding of faith. The same may perhaps also apply to the quotations present in Gal 3:10–13 (Dt 27:26; Hb 2:4; Lv 18:5; Dt 21:23).

Justification by Faith. In the traditional interpretation of Galatians, Paul was opposed by Judaizers who were legalists. They insisted upon "the works of the law," e.g., circumcision and other works prescribed by the law. The Galatians require more than faith in Christ in order to be saved. In accordance with the Jewish tradition, the Gentile Christians of Galatia must also earn their salvation by doing the works of the law. For Paul, however, one is justified by believing in Christ, by faith alone (i.e., by faith working through love, Gal 5:6).

It has been suggested that in Paul's days Judaism was not a legalistic religion of self-righteousness. For Jews the covenant is first of all grace and gift, and only then also human answer and work (E. P. Sanders). Furthermore, today many exegetes maintain that the problem in Galatia was not individual salvation but social discrimination: how can Galatians of pagan origin become true Christians? The opponents' answer is: by doing the works of the law that perhaps may be understood as specific signs of Israel's identity, such as circumcision, food prescriptions, and calendar regulations (J. D. G. Dunn). Paul's reaction is clear. One does not need to become a Jew in order to be an authentic Christian; one is not justified by the works of the law, but by faith in Christ (cf. 2:17).

Although the social dimension must not be neglected and it should not be assumed that Paul is criticizing Jewish pride and legalism, in Galatians the apostle reflects on the sinful condition of Jews and Gentiles alike. Christ alone is our redeemer, not the law. A final note: most probably the expression pistis Christou does not mean "Christ's faithfulness" (subjective genitive) but "faith in Christ" (objective genitive).

Galatians Today. Paul's letter to the Galatians constitutes one of the most basic documents of the New Testament. The letter offers a range of autobiographical details about Paul. Galatians emphasizes God's initiative in Christ, as well as justification for all peoples on the same condition. Last but not least, Galatians will remain the Magna Charta of Christian liberty.

Bibliography: J. M. G. BARCLAY, "Mirror-Reading a Polemical Letter: Galatians as a Test Case," Journal for the Study of the New Testament 31 (1987) 73–93; Obeying the Truth: A Study of Paul's Ethics in Galatians (Edinburgh 1988). C. K. BARRETT, Freedom and Obligation: A Study of the Epistle to the Galatians (Philadelphia 1985). H. D. BETZ, Galatians (Philadelphia 1979). J. BUCKEL, Free to Love: Paul's Defense of Christian Liberty in Galatians (Louvain 1993). J. D. G. DUNN, The Epistle to the Galatians (London 1993); The Theology of Paul's Letter to the Galatians (Cambridge 1993). I.-G. HONG, The Law in Galatians (Sheffield 1993). M. D. HOWARD, Paul: Crisis in Galatia: A Study in Early Christian Theology (Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 35; Cambridge 1990). P. H. KERN, Rhetoric and Galatians. Assessing an Approach to Paul's Epistle (Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 101; Cambridge 1998). L. J. MARTYN, Galatians (Anchor Bible 33A; New York 1998). F. J. MATTERA, Galatians (SP 9; Collegeville, Minn. 1992). W. M. A. RAMSAY, A Historical Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians (New York 1900). B. WITHERINGTON, Grace in Galatia: Commentary on St. Paul's Letter to the Galatians (Edinburgh 1998).

[J. LAMBRECHT, S.J.]

GALBERRY, THOMAS

Bishop, first provincial of the AUGUSTINIANS in the U.S.; b. Naas, County Kildare, Ireland, May 28, 1833; d. New York City, Oct. 10, 1878. In 1836 the Galberry family came from Ireland to live in Philadelphia, Pa. Thomas graduated in 1851 from Villanova College (now University), Villanova, Pa., and joined the Augustinian Order in Jan. 1852. After ordination (Dec. 20, 1856) by Bp. John Neumann of Philadelphia, Galberry served as pastor, between 1858 and 1872, in Havertown, Pa.; Troy, N.Y.; and Lawrence, Mass. For the next three years he was president of Villanova College (1872–75). Meanwhile, in 1866, he was appointed superior (commissary general) of the Augustinian Order in the U.S., and in 1874 he was elected the first provincial of the newly erected province of St. Thomas of Villanova. Not long afterward Galberry was appointed to the See of Hartford, Conn.; he was consecrated March 19, 1876. His episcopate, like his life, was brief but filled with energetic labor; he laid the cornerstones of numerous churches and religious institutions and founded (1876) the diocesan newspaper, Connecticut Catholic (now the Catholic Transcript). While on a journey in 1878, Galberry became ill in New York and died suddenly.

Bibliography: T. PURCELL, "Thomas Galberry," Tagastan 5 (1941) 5–14.

[A. J. ENNIS]

GALBIS GIRONÉS, VICENTE, BL.

Lay martyr, lawyer; b. Sept. 9, 1910, Ontinyent (or Onteniente), Valencia, Spain; d. Sept. 21, 1936, Benisoda. Vicente (Vincent) was baptized in St. Charles Church in his hometown shortly after his birth. He received his early education at the hands of the Franciscan fathers, a baccalaureate degree at the National Institute of Murcia, and his law degree from the University of Valencia, where he was a member of the Catholic Student Union.

In 1922, Vicente became a founding member of the first Youth of Catholic Action in the Archdiocese of Valencia at Santa María Church. From that moment he was joined with the other martyrs of Ontinyent: Bl. Carlos DÍAZ GANDÍA, president, José María García Marcos, secretary, and Bl. Rafael Alonso Gutiérrez de Medina, president of the Men of Catholic Action.

In 1933, he moved into his family home, and began exercising his profession gratis in defense of the poor—a dream he had since childhood. A man of profound faith, he daily recited the rosary with his family, participated in the Mass, and received Holy Communion. He was also a member of the Apostleship of Prayer, Nocturnal Adoration Society, and the Society of St. Vincent de Paul.

On Sept. 5, 1935, Vicente married María de los Desamparados (called Amparo) Bonastre Oltra with whom he had one son, Vicente, born July 6, 1936—just three months before the father’s death. He continued his devotional practices with his wife and joined various lay religious groups.

Although Vicente appeared to be timid, when religious persecution began and martyrdom seemed probable, he knew no fear in responding to blasphemy and detractors of the faith that it was his “greatest honor to be Catholic.” Upon seeing the danger to the Church in the days just prior to the Revolution, he volunteered to spend some nights in vigil at the parish, despite the warnings of friends and family.

The Revolution began in Ontinyent with the burning of the churches and imprisonment of Catholics. Because Vicente openly professed his faith, his home was subjected to several searches. The last time the militants proposed that he abandon his current work with poor Catholic workers and become a well paid lawyer for the revolutionaries. He responded, “It would be impossible for me to defend people who profane religious images and destroy churches.”

He was arrested in his home at 12:30 AM on Sept. 21, 1936. As his wife watched, he was taken to prison and held for two scant hours. From there he was taken with six youths, including Bl. Manuel TORRÓ GARCÍA, to Benisoda. En route they recited the rosary together. During his last moments before the firing squad, he shouted, “¡Viva Cristo Rey!” (“Long live Christ the King!”).

At dawn Vicente’s widow and her father obtained a safe conduct from the Committee to search the highways for the site of her husband’s execution, where they were told to look for his body in Benisoda’s cemetery. Overcoming the resistance of the militiamen, she searched among the bodies. When she found her husband’s, she drenched a handkerchief in his blood and saved his scapular and rosary.

His wife, Amparo, and aunt, Ángeles Bonastre García, were present at the exhumation of his body and reburial in the new cemetery at Ontinyent (October 1959). He was beatified by Pope John Paul II with José APARICIO SANZ and 232 companions on March 11, 2001.

Feast: Sept. 22.

Bibliography: V. CÁRCEL ORTÍ, Martires españoles del siglo XX (Madrid 1995). W. H. CARROLL, The Last Crusade (Front Royal, Va. 1996). J. PÉREZ DE URBEL, Catholic Martyrs of the Spanish Civil War, tr. M. F. INGRAMS (Kansas City, Mo. 1993). R. ROYAL, The Catholic Martyrs of the Twentieth Century (New York 2000). Consejo Diocesano de los Hombres de Acción Católica de Valencia. Possumus, n. 108 (1960), 10; Ánimos, n. 12 (1945). L’Osservatore Romano, Eng. no. 11 (March 14, 2001) 1–4, 12.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GALDINUS, ST.

Cardinal archbishop; b. Milan, c. 1100; d. Milan, April 18, 1176. Galdinus, of the noble Valvarsi della Sala family, was chancellor and archdeacon at Milan before becoming cardinal priest of Santa Sabina at Rome in 1165. The following year he was made archbishop of Milan (April 18, 1166), to which charge was added that of papal legate for Lombardy. In his diocese and throughout Lombardy, he strove vigorously to repair the ravages of the Victorine schism and to counteract the heresy of the CATHARI. He joined, also, in the rebuilding of Milan (destroyed by FREDERICK I BARBAROSSA), cared for the needs of the poor, and reformed and reorganized his clergy. He died literally on his feet while preaching, and he was canonized by the then-reigning pope, ALEXANDER III.

Feast: April 18.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum April 2:590–595. F. MEDA, Galdino della Sala (Bologna 1931). E. CAZZANI, Vescovi e arcivescovi di Milano (Milan 1955) 149–153.

[J. E. BRESNAHAN]

GALEN, CLEMENS AUGUSTINUS VON

Cardinal, bishop of Münster, Germany; b. Dinklage, Oldenburg, Germany, March 16, 1878; d. Münster, March 22, 1946. He was the son of Count Ferdinand Heribert von Galen and Elizabeth, Countess of Spee. After being educated by the Jesuits in Feldkirch, he studied at the Catholic University in Freiburg, Germany, the Jesuit theological college in Innsbruck, Austria, and the diocesan seminary in Münster and was ordained in 1904. Following parish work in Berlin, he became pastor of St. Lambert's, Münster (1929). Having denounced the godlessness of Germany after World War I in his book Die Pest des Laizismus und ihre Erscheinungsformen (1932), Von Galen became an outspoken critic of the Hitler regime after his consecration as bishop of Münster (1933). His sermons attacked Nazi racial doctrines, totalitarian methods, and state confiscation of religious property. He was critical too of the Gestapo, the policy of euthanasia for insane and "unproductive" members of society, and the efforts to undermine youth. Von Galen displayed no concern for his personal safety, but Hitler, fearing that the support of Westphalia might be entirely lost, seems to have ordered that no restraints be placed on the "Lion of Münster." After World War II, the bishop continued his denunciation of injustices under the occupation authorities. He was created cardinal on Feb. 17, 1946, shortly before being stricken with a fatal attack of intestinal paralysis.

Bibliography: H. PORTMANN, Cardinal von Galen, tr. R. I. SEDGWICK (London 1957). G. RITTER, The German Resistance, tr. R. T. CLARK (New York 1959). M. A. GALLIN, German Resistance to Hitler (Washington 1961). H. ROTHFELS, The German Opposition to Hitler, tr. L. WILSON (Chicago 1962). M. BIERBAUM, Staatslexicon ed. Görres-Gesellschaft, 8 v. (6th, new and enl. ed. Freiburg 1957–63) 3:639–642.

[M. A. GALLIN]

GALERIUS, ROMAN EMPEROR

Reigned 305 to 311; b. Gaius Galerius Valerius Maximianus (Galerius Maximian), near Sardica, Illyricum, c. 250; d. 311. On March 1, 293, after a distinguished military career, he was chosen Caesar of the East by Diocletian. He was charged with the government and defense of the Danubian provinces, and was later sent against the Persian Narses. After an initial defeat at Carrae, he achieved a complete victory (297) and was given command on the Danube. He went to Nicomedia early in 303, where he helped persuade DIOCLETIAN to issue the first of his four edicts against the Christians. During Diocletian's illness in 304, Galerius increased the intensity of the persecution. On May 1, 305, Diocletian and Maximian abdicated, probably at the urging of Galerius. Constantius and Galerius succeeded them as the Augusti, while Severus and Maximinus Daia were named the new Caesars. When Constantius died in 306, Galerius reluctantly recognized his son CONSTANTINE I as Caesar. After conferring the title of Augustus on Severus, he sent him against Maxentius in Rome. Severus was defeated, and Galerius himself had to retreat after an attempted invasion of Italy. In 308 a reorganization of the empire was effected at Carnuntum, where Licinius was named Augustus and Maxentius was declared a public enemy. In 310, Galerius was afflicted with cancer. One of his last acts, in April 311, was an edict issued in his own name and that of the other regents recognizing the failure of the persecution and allowing the Christians "to exist again and build the houses in which they used to assemble" (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 8.17.9). Galerius was by nature cruel and suspicious. His animosity toward the Christians may have been aroused by his mother, since she herself was known to have been extremely superstitious (Lactantius, De mort. persec. 11).

Clemens Augustinus Von Galen.

Bibliography: R. B. MOTZO, Enciclopedia Italiana di scienze, lettere ed arti 36 v. (Rome 1929–39), 16:270. A. AMORE, Enciclopedia cattolica, ed. P. PASCHINI et al. 12 v. (Rome 1949–54) 5:1867–68. W. ENSSLIN, Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft ed. G. WISSOWA et al. (Stuttgart 1893–) 14.2 (1930) 2516–28.

[M. J. COSTELLOE]

GALGANI, GEMMA, ST.

Italian mystic; b. Borgo Nuovo di Camigliano, near Lucca, Italy, March 12, 1878; d. Lucca, April 11, 1903. She was born of pious parents, Enrico and Aurelia (Landi) Galgani, and was educated by the Sisters of St. Zita, whose foundress, Bl. Elena GUERRA, was one of her teachers. Her mother died in 1886. Her father's death (1896) left her in extreme poverty. Her remaining years were spent in the large household of Matteo Giannini in Lucca. Serious recurring illnesses, which plagued her from childhood, prevented her from joining the Passionist nuns. From her early years she meditated on Christ's sufferings. Gemma had visions of Christ, the Blessed Virgin, and her guardian angel; she experienced STIGMATIZATION and other physical phenomena of Christ's Passion, such as the sweat of blood, scourging, and the crowning with thorns. At times she was disturbed by diabolical manifestations, but her life was for the most part retired and quiet. She was a model of humility, obedience, poverty, and especially of patience in illnesses and tribulations. She was beatified May 14, 1933, and canonized May 3, 1940. The cult of St. Gemma became quite popular after the publication in 1941 of her correspondence with her spiritual director, Germano di San Stanislao Ruoppolo, CP.

Feast: May 14.

Bibliography: Gesù solo, ed. G. POLLICE (Rome 1978); Letters of St. Gemma Galgani, ed. GERMANO OF ST. STANISLAUS, tr. Dominican nuns of Corpus Christi monastery (New York 1947); Estasi, diario, autobiografia, scritti vari di s. Gemma Galgani, ed. GERMANO OF ST. STANISLAUS (Rome 1943). J. JORGENSEN, Gemma e altre storie lucchesi, ed., L. DEL ZANNA (Lucca 1983). G. AGRESTI, Ritratto della espropriata (Lucca 1978). A. CARRARA, Gemma Galgani (Florence 1977). J. F. VILLEPELÉE, La folie de la Croix (Hauteville 1977). E. ZOFFOLI, La povera Gemma (Rome 1957). SISTER SAINT MICHAEL, Portrait of St. Gemma, a Stigmatic (New York 1950). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by The Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935-56) 4:272-275. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:75-76.

[F. G. SOTTOCORNOLA]

GALILEI, GALILEO

Florentine philosopher, physicist, and inventor; most commonly remembered for his condemnation by the Holy Office as a result of his attempting to prove the Copernican theory of the universe; b. Pisa, Italy, Feb. 15, 1564; d. Florence, Jan. 8, 1642. The family name had originally been Bonajuti, but it had been changed in the 15th century to Galilei in honor of Galileo Bonajuti, a famous physician. The fortunes of the Galilei family had declined by the time Galileo was born. His father, Vincenzo Galilei, was a noteworthy, though impoverished, musician. At the age of 12, Galileo was enrolled in the monastery school at Vallombrosa. Subsequently, it seems, he entered the Vallombrosan order as a novice, but was withdrawn by his father before completing his novitiate training. In 1581 he entered the University of Pisa to pursue the liberal arts course as a prerequisite for entering the school of medicine. After four years of study, Galileo, who by then was more interested in mathematics and science than in medicine, had to withdraw from the university without completing his courses or graduating. He continued to study privately and began to write. In 1586 he wrote a treatise on the hydrostatic balance (La Bilancetta), and two years later he produced a work on the center of gravity in solids. By then he had attracted the attention of a wealthy patron, the Marquese Guidobaldo del Monte (1545-1607), who was also a very capable mathematician. Guidobaldo used his considerable influence to have Galileo appointed as a lecturer in mathematics at the University of Pisa.

Galileo seems to have made many enemies among the faculty members at the university. Although he probably taught within a framework of traditional mathematics and science, apparently he was not afraid to disagree with the standard doctrine when he had reason to do so. Although it is doubtful that Galileo ever did drop bodies of unequal weight from the Leaning Tower of Pisa to demonstrate that velocity of fall does not vary according to weight as Aristotle taught, the story does exemplify Galileo's spirit. To understand the opposition that Galileo faced at Pisa and throughout his life, it is necessary to review briefly the state of philosophy as generally taught in the universities of his time.

Philosophical Climate. It must be remembered that the philosophy of ARISTOTLE was the predominant system of thought in the 16th century. It had been introduced to the Western world in only the 13th century, but in a relatively short time it became the most widely accepted system, partly because of the commentaries of St. THOMAS AQUINAS and the scholastics. Aristotelian philosophy presented a logical, clear, and rational explanation of man and the world around him. By the 16th century, philosophical disputes more often than not were between schools advocating different interpretations of Aristotle. Scholastics, Averroists, and Alexandrists all claimed true intellectual descent from the Stagirite. Moreover, under the influence of Renaissance humanism, the tendency to attribute definitive authority to the texts of Aristotle grew even stronger, and philosophical writings were generally more textual and philological than original or creative. Intramural disputes on the interpretation of Aristotle replaced the empirical approach that Aristotle himself had championed centuries before as the beginning of philosophy.

The result was that those who opposed Galileo in the name of Aristotelian philosophy were neither Aristotelian in spirit nor philosophers in the true sense. Galileo described them as people who think that “philosophy is a sort of book like the Aeneid or the Odyssey, and that the truth is to be sought not in the universe, not in nature, but by comparing texts.” Galileo’s willingness to speak out against Aristotle whenever he thought it necessary, coupled with the fact that he had never graduated from the university and had no academic degree, led his Aristotelian opponents on the faculty to oppose him bitterly as an upstart who dared to challenge their authority and that of “the Philosopher.”

In 1592, after two years of teaching at Pisa, Galileo resigned. He returned to his family, then living in Florence and, when his father died, took over the duties of supporting them. Guidobaldo del Monte again came to Galileo’s aid, and within a few months he was appointed by the Venetian senate to the chair of mathematics at the University of Padua, a post he held for 18 years. Soon after moving to Padua, Galileo began living in concubinage with a woman named Marina Gamba, who bore him a son, Vincenzo, of whom little is known, and two daughters, both of whom became nuns. Sister Marie Celeste was Galileo’s greatest consolation during the trying years that followed.

Padua provided a congenial atmosphere for Galileo. It had a tradition of true philosophical inquiry as witnessed by the fact that 15th-century Paduans such as Paul of Venice, Gaetano da Thiene, and Johannes Marlianus had made significant changes and developments within the framework of Aristotelian science. There Galileo invented a thermometer, wrote many treatises dealing with his ideas and experiments in mechanics, and became deeply interested in astronomy.

Theories of the Universe. Through the ages, the geocentric system of the universe had been almost universally accepted. It had received its doctrinal formulation in the writings of Aristotle (378–322 B.C.) and PTOLEMY (fl. 150 B.C.). Both agreed that the earth was the motionless center of the universe; but whereas Aristotle accounted for celestial motions by postulating a squadron of concentric spheres to carry the planets and fixed stars around the earth, Ptolemy described the motions of the heavens in terms of eccentric spheres and epicycles. Elements of the Aristotelian and Ptolemaic views were combined in a treatise by JOHN DE SACROBOSCO (d. 1256) and the resulting eclectic system won widespread acceptance. The system did save the appearances, and it had physical support in the Aristotelian concepts of the quintessence,

Galileo Galilei. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

the circular character of celestial motion, and the First Mover. It is true that there had been some opposition to the geostatic explanation. NICHOLAS ORESME, in the 14th century, conceived of a rotating earth at the center of an otherwise motionless universe. Cardinal NICHOLAS OF CUSA, in his Docta ignorantia (1440), supported Oresme’s theory with a few modifications of his own. But it was not until Nicolaus COPERNICUS (1473–1543) that a rival system was sufficiently well formulated to challenge the Aristotelian-Ptolemaic position. In his great work De revolutionibus orbium coelestium (1543), Copernicus advocated a sun-centered universe in which the earth was a planet that revolved both on its axis and around the sun. Copernicus probably believed that his system described the real motions of the heavens, but, largely because of a spurious preface inserted in the De revolutionibus by Andreas OSIANDER in order to avoid religious opposition to the new system, it was commonly thought that Copernicus himself believed his system to be only a mathematical hypothesis and not necessarily representative of the actual constitution of the universe. Even though Copernicus had been unable to free himself of the idea that celestial motion must be circular and was therefore forced to employ eccentrics and epicycles, his system was a slight gain in simplicity over Ptolemy’s. Galileo studied the De revolutionibus and, writing to Johann KEPLER in 1597, acknowledged that he had discarded the Ptolemaic position several years before and believed in the reality of the Copernican system. It was to be the passion of his life to demonstrate the truth of the new astronomy.

The Telescope. In 1608 a Dutchman, Hans Lipperhey of Middleburg (1570?–1619), invented a fairly reliable telescope. When Galileo heard of the invention a year later, he began to construct one of his own. Within a short time, he built three telescopes, the largest of which made objects appear nearly 1,000 times larger and 30 times closer than when seen with natural vision. With this instrument Galileo searched the heavens. He made astounding discoveries, the most important of which were reported in his Sidereus Nuncius, or Starry Messenger (1610). In this work, which made him famous, Galileo revealed that the moon was not a perfect sphere as had been thought, but was marred with mountains and valleys. The Milky Way was seen to consist of a multitude of stars invisible to the naked eye. Most important, Galileo announced that the planet Jupiter had four moons revolving around it. These satellites of Jupiter could serve to answer an objection made against the Copernican theory to the effect that if the earth moved through space it would leave the moon behind. Here was a planet traveling a major orbit and carrying four moons with it. Galileo dedicated his Starry Messenger to Cosimo II de Medici (1590–1621), the Grand Duke of Tuscany. In return, Cosimo appointed him ducal philosopher and mathematician with a salary of 1,000 gold florins a year. Galileo left Padua in July 1610 and moved to a villa at Arcetri, near Florence. There he observed the heavens under the aegis of the Grand Duke.

There were strong reactions to the Starry Messenger. Some saw it as a great contribution to human knowledge, but the university Aristotelians came forth in defense of their master's cosmology. First, they said, no matter what Galileo saw through his telescope, the Copernican system seemed to contradict experience. Anyone with the sense of sight could see the sun rise in the east and set in the west. Second, they pointed out that a moving earth was completely opposed to all the known laws of physics. They had a point; a superior system of physics did have to be established before Copernicanism could win acceptance. Third, Aristotle had said long before that if the earth moved, stellar displacements or parallaxes would be observable, but none had ever been recorded. This was a strong objection, and it remained unanswered until F. W. Bessel (1784–1846) and others determined the parallax of the star 61 Cygni in 1838. Another objection raised was that, taken as a fact and not as a mere mathematical device for aiding astronomers in charting stellar positions, Copernican astronomy contradicted the explicit words of Sacred Scripture.

While the debate went on, Galileo made two more discoveries: the phases of Venus and the sunspots. The only explanation for the fact that Venus changes shape just as the moon does is that Venus moves around the sun and not the earth. The sunspots questioned the Aristotelian doctrine that celestial bodies were composed of an immutable quintessence.

While Galileo was formulating his arguments, he failed to adopt a discovery that might have helped the new astronomy win acceptance. In 1609 Johann Kepler published his Astronomia nova, in which he disclosed that planetary orbits were not circular but elliptical and that the sun is at a focus of the ellipse. This was the very thing needed to clear astronomy of epicycles and the dogma of perfect circles. Although it is fairly certain that Galileo knew of the discovery, he never made use of it.

In December 1610 Galileo received support from an unexpected source. Father Christopher CLAVIUS, chief mathematician and astronomer at the Jesuit Roman College, wrote to tell him that the Jesuit astronomers had confirmed all his discoveries. Galileo decided that it was time to go to Rome. If he could secure the support of the Jesuit astronomers, he might be able to win at least unofficial ecclesiastical backing for his position. He arrived in the Holy City in March 1611. His reception was most encouraging. Pope PAUL V granted him a long audience. Prince Federigo Cesi (1585–1630) appointed him a member of the Accademia de' Lincei, a society devoted to philosophical and scientific studies. The Jesuits of the Roman College held a day of ceremonies in his honor. Galileo returned to Florence in June confident that he had won some support.

Heliocentrism and Scripture. Despite his discoveries, Galileo still had no real proof that the Copernican system was anything more than a theory. His observations militated more against Aristotle and Ptolemy than for Copernicus. Had there been only two alternatives, either the Ptolemaic or Copernican, Galileo, by discrediting the first, would have shown the superiority of the second, but it was not that simple. A third system had been worked out by the Danish astronomer Tycho Brahe in 1588. In Brahe's scheme, the planets revolved around the sun while the sun was revolving around a motionless earth. This system could explain Galileo's chief discoveries, the moons of Jupiter and the phases of Venus, while keeping the earth as the motionless center of the universe.

Back in Florence, Galileo became involved in two minor controversies. One was over the question of why things float or sink; the other was an argument with the Jesuit Christopher Scheiner as to who had discovered the sunspots first and how they were to be explained. The latter dispute prompted Galileo to write his Letters on Sunspots (1613), in which, despite his lack of proof, he endorsed the Copernican system. Cardinal Maffeo Barberini, later Pope URBAN VIII, was one of many who wrote to congratulate the author. The Letters were published in Italian rather than Latin, and the growing controversy now became a popular subject of discussion.

Interest passed from the complex problems of physics and astronomy and came to center on the scriptural difficulties raised by the new system. People wanted to know why Joshua would command the sun to stand still if it never moved anyway. (See Js 10.12–13.) They wondered how a moving earth could be reconciled with the statement that God “fixed the earth upon its foundation, not to be moved forever” (Ps 103.5). Also, they believed that the sun must be in motion, for the Book of Ecclesiastes states that “the sun rises and the sun goes down: then it presses on to the place where it rises” (Eccl 1.5). In December 1613 Galileo heard from Father Benedetto Castelli that these and other texts from Sacred Scripture were being invoked directly against the Copernican system. Galileo wrote a letter to Castelli in which he formulated his ideas on the relationship of the Bible and science. Copies of the letter were made and circulated freely. Now the dispute was in the open. In December 1614 a Dominican, Tommaso Caccini, preached a sermon at S. Maria Novella in Florence in which he strongly condemned the new astronomy. Before long, a copy of Galileo’s letter to Castelli was forwarded to the Holy Office for examination. Although the Holy Office judged that the letter contained nothing contrary to the faith, Galileo decided to revise and expand it.

While he was working on this, a Carmelite, Paolo Antonio Foscarini (1565–1616), published a book that attempted to reconcile the Copernican system with Holy Scripture. He sent a copy to Cardinal Robert BELLARMINÉ, the leading theologian in Rome, and asked his opinion of it. Bellarmine’s Letter to Foscarini expressed the unofficial but quite definite attitude of the theologians toward the new astronomy. Bellarmine admitted that the Copernican system saved the appearances better than the Ptolemaic and therefore could be considered a superior hypothesis, but, he pointed out, it was still not established as a fact. The cardinal explained that one is not allowed to interpret the Scriptures contrary to the common agreement of the Fathers of the Church, and the Fathers seemed to interpret the texts in question literally. To contradict their exegesis was to oppose the truth of the Scriptures themselves. There could be no departure from the interpretation of the Fathers in case of doubt, and there would always be a doubt unless Galileo could produce a true demonstration of his theory.

Bellarmino’s opinion was wrong on several counts. First, he should have remembered that, as St. AUGUSTINE and St. Thomas Aquinas had said long before, the Bible was not intended to teach science and therefore its authority should not be invoked in scientific disputes. Second, although most of the Fathers did think that the earth was immobile and the sun moved, not one of them held that this had to be believed as a revealed truth. Third, although it is true that common interpretation by theologians of a text whose meaning is not defined makes that interpretation highly probable, there is still room for an alternative, if less probable, exegesis. However, Bellarmine demanded a physical demonstration before he would allow any other exegesis.

Galileo presented his position in the revised letter to Castelli, which he entitled A Letter to the Grand Duchess Christina. Galileo ably defended the fact that the Bible was not meant to teach science and that, when referring to the physical world around them, the sacred writers used the common conception of the universe in order to avoid confusing the minds of their readers and making them suspicious of the religious truths that the Holy Texts were meant to convey. However, Galileo then made the mistake of conceding to Scripture superior authority even in science, unless contrary physical arguments were demonstrative. “As to the [physical] propositions which are stated but not rigorously demonstrated, anything contrary to the Bible involved in them must be considered undoubtedly false and should be proved so by every possible means.” By granting Scripture precedence over probable physical arguments to the contrary and by his inability to prove the real truth of the Copernican system, Galileo was caught in a logical snare. The issue was still being debated when Galileo decided to go to Rome in December 1615 to plead his case personally. About this time, Cardinal Boniface Gaetani wrote to the Dominican Friar Tommaso CAMPANELLA, asking his views on the dispute. Campanella responded by writing an eloquent plea for scientific freedom entitled Apologia pro Galileo; and although it was undoubtedly the best theological analysis of the problem written at the time, it went largely unnoticed.

First Condemnation. Galileo’s conduct in Rome was incredibly bold. He felt he had to convince anyone who would listen that his arguments supported “realist” Copernicanism. What particular incident brought the issue to a climax is a subject of debate; but early in 1616 Pope Paul V thought that the whole matter was getting out of hand, and he ordered the Congregation of the Holy Office to look into it. On Feb. 19, 1616, two propositions, clumsily worded, but representative of Galileo's position, were sent to a committee of 11 theologians who were consultants of the Holy Office. Five days later, they reported their decision to the authorities of the Holy Office.

Obviously, they agreed with Bellarmine's position. In their opinion the proposition that the sun is at the center of the universe and does not move was "philosophically foolish and absurd and formally heretical, inasmuch as it expressly contradicts the doctrines of Holy Scripture in many places, both according to their literal meaning and according to the common exposition and interpretation of the holy Fathers and learned theologians." As to the proposition that the earth is not the center of the universe, but that it moves with both an annual and daily motion, the consultants were agreed that this deserved "the same censure in philosophy, and, that, from a theological standpoint, it was at least erroneous in the faith." Galileo was ordered to appear before Cardinal Bellarmine and was told not to hold or defend the Copernican position any longer. Then, it seems, the commissary-general of the Holy Office, overzealous in his duty (for he was not instructed to intervene unless Galileo objected to Bellarmine's instruction), stepped forward and gave Galileo an absolute injunction not to hold, teach, or defend his opinion in any way, either verbally or in writing. The report of this meeting, found in the files of the Holy Office, has been the subject of a long controversy. It is quite possible that the commissary-general did serve this strict injunction but that Cardinal Bellarmine, knowing that it had not been called for, told Galileo that he was not bound by it. At any rate, with Galileo's promise to comply with the instructions, the case was closed before the Holy Office.

On March 5, 1616, the Congregation of the Index issued a decree suspending Copernicus's book De revolutionibus orbium coelestium until it could be rendered more hypothetical. (The corrections were made, and it was again permitted to be read within four years.) The decree further condemned outright all books that attempted to reconcile the heliocentric system with Holy Scripture, since that doctrine was "false and altogether contrary to Holy Scripture." The actions of the Holy Office and the Congregation of the Index in no way represented a commitment of the infallible teaching authority of the Church against the new astronomy. The decree of the Index received papal approval only in forma communi and therefore was only the fallible decision of a Roman Congregation. Still it did bind Catholics to at least external observance. The publication of the Index decree gave Galileo's enemies ample material for speculation about the theological orthodoxy of the Florentine scientist. Galileo appealed to Cardinal Bellarmine for a written statement that he could use in self-defense. The cardinal's certificate stated that Galileo had not abjured his opinion, nor had he been given a penance, but that he had been told not to hold or defend the Copernican system as true.

The Dialogue. Galileo returned to Florence discouraged but not defeated. For several years he stayed out of disputes. Then, in 1619, he backed a disciple, Mario Guiducci, in a bitter controversy with the Jesuit astronomer Horatio Grassi (1583–1654) over the nature and course of comets. This was still going on when, in 1623, Pope GREGORY XV died and Cardinal Maffeo Barberini was elected pope. Barberini, who was a good friend of Galileo and had opposed the actions of the Holy Office in 1616, took the name Urban VIII. Galileo dedicated The Assayer (1623), a polemic against Grassi, to the new Pope and then, a year later, went to Rome to see him. Galileo had six long audiences with Urban; and although the Pope refused to lift the ban against "realist" Copernican writings for fear of undermining the authority of the Congregations, he apparently told Galileo that as long as he treated the subject hypothetically and did not attempt to prove the Copernican system, he could go ahead and write.

Galileo decided to risk everything in the hope that he could demonstrate his theory. He spent most of the next six years (1624–30) working on what he thought would be final and conclusive proof that the Copernican system was true. By means of submission clauses in the preface and conclusion, the resulting book, entitled Dialogue on the Two Great World Systems, was approved by the censors and went to press in 1632. The main argument of the Dialogue was based on an erroneous theory of the tides: a theory that he thought would necessitate the motion of the earth. The other important argument of the book, that based on the motion of sunspots, was also faulty and undemonstrative, but the Dialogue still caused a storm. It was obvious that Galileo had attempted to prove the Copernican system. Not only that, but someone convinced Pope Urban that Galileo had made a fool of him and that he had never intended to heed the Pope's instructions. Urban appointed a special commission of theologians to investigate, and again Galileo was in trouble.

Second Condemnation. The special commission made two main charges against the famous scientist. First, Galileo had treated the Copernican system not as a hypothesis, but as an absolute fact. This was contrary to the decree of the Index and Bellarmine's admonition in 1616. Second, he had been fraudulently silent about a command given him in 1616 by the commissary-general during the audience with Bellarmine, not to hold, teach, or defend the new astronomy in any way, either verbally or in writing. The special commission found a record of this strict injunction in the files of the Holy Office, and news of it came as a surprise, even to the Pope. Galileo, then nearly 70 years old, was ordered to come to Rome.

After a long delay due to illness, he arrived on Feb. 13, 1633. He was received with kindness and given comfortable lodging. He was never imprisoned as some have claimed. During the trial, Galileo would not admit that he had tried to prove the Copernican system in his Dialogue despite the many passages from that book that could be cited to the contrary. Nor did he remember that any command had been given him by the commissary-general in 1616. He produced a copy of the certificate Bellarmine had given him years before, which stated that Galileo had been instructed only not to hold or defend the Copernican doctrine. Moreover, as he pointed out to the judges, his book had an imprimatur. It was a strong defense.

Still, he had disobeyed the decree of the Index, Bellarmine's admonition, and the explicit wishes of the Pope; and it seemed even to those who wanted to treat Galileo leniently that some token punishment was in order. There seem to have been two opposing views among officials in Rome regarding what action was to be taken against the old scientist. Cardinal Francesco Barberini, the Pope's nephew, led those who advocated leniency, but a stronger group wanted to humiliate Galileo completely, and they prevailed. They succeeded in having the Dialogue prohibited (the ban was lifted only in 1822) and in having Galileo condemned as "vehemently suspected of heresy." Galileo was made to kneel and abjure the Copernican opinion, sentenced to imprisonment, and given a "salutary penance" to recite. The prison sentence was never imposed, although Galileo remained under house arrest in Florence for the rest of his life. The condemnation was the act of a Roman Congregation and in no way involved infallible teaching authority, but the theologians' treatment of Galileo was an unfortunate error; and, however it might be explained, it cannot be defended.

Last Days. Upon his return to Florence, Galileo went back to the study of dynamics. In 1636 he finished his greatest work, the Discourses concerning Two New Sciences, a clear statement of his thought on such subjects as the characteristics of solid bodies, accelerated motion, and the parabolic path of projectiles. In 1637, shortly after discovering the moon's libration, Galileo lost the sight of his right eye. A year later he was totally blind. He continued with the help of his disciples, E. Torricelli and V. Viviani (1622–1703), dictating addenda to his Discourses and experimenting. He was buried in the Church of S. Croce in Florence. Only in 1737 was permission finally obtained to erect a monument over his tomb.

Contributions to Scientific Thought. Galileo made many significant contributions to the progress of human thought. In astronomy his contributions were observational rather than theoretical. He made numerous discoveries, but was not a speculative astronomer, as was Kepler. Galileo used his discoveries to argue effectively against some Aristotelian and Ptolemaic doctrines. He showed that it was unnecessary to have one system of mechanics in celestial physics and another in terrestrial physics, and he definitely brought out the inadequacies of the Ptolemaic system. In addition, Galileo deserves to be considered one of the founders of the new mechanics. Some of his criticisms of Aristotelian mechanics had been anticipated by JOHN PHILOPONUS and JOHN BURIDAN, but these men made corrections within the framework of Aristotelian qualitative analysis, whereas Galileo, concentrating on the measure of motion, changed the emphasis from explaining why a body moves to why it ceases to move. Galileo formulated a rough approximation of the law of inertia that was later perfected by Sir Isaac Newton.

One of Galileo's most significant contributions to modern science was in the area of methodology. It would be an exaggeration to say that he alone founded a new method or that only he recognized the necessity of experimentation, but he did combine elements from the past and prepare the way for the future. Galileo's approach to a scientific problem was to begin by abstracting from concrete factors that were not easily controllable, for example, resistance. He could then formulate simple laws based on idealized description. These would subsequently be applied, making allowance for concrete, physical circumstances. In his method, the use of experiment was primarily to illustrate insights that were the result of prior scientific theorizing; secondarily, it provided the basis for theories where there were no original, pre-experimental insights.

Galileo's true originality, however, lay in his insistence that the book of nature is written only in mathematical characters such that the inner workings of nature can only be expressed mathematically. As far as Galileo was concerned, whatever could not be caught in mathematical abstraction, such as secondary sense qualities, essences, and causes, were either subjective or did not exist. Such a view denied the need for a natural philosophy in the traditional sense. Newton, who fully appreciated the mathematical approach to reality, did not accept Galileo's mathematical "realism" but allowed for the validity of the traditional qualitative, philosophical inquiry. Galileo, then, represents in many ways the culmination of certain scientific trends that existed before him, especially at Paris, Oxford, and Padua, and part of a new beginning for science that led to Newton and beyond.

Bibliography: Le opere di Galileo Galilei, ed. A. FAVARO, 20 v. (Florence 1929–39), contains Galileo's works and minor writings as well as many documents pertaining to his conflict with the theologians. Galileo's most important works are available in English: Dialogue concerning the Two Chief World Systems, tr. S. DRAKE (Berkeley 1953); Dialogues concerning Two New Sciences, tr. H. CREW and A. DE SALVIO (New York 1914; pa. repr. 1952); Discoveries and Opinions of Galileo, ed. and tr. S. DRAKE (New York 1957), contains translations of the Sidereus Nuncius, Letters on Sunspots, Letter to the Grand Duchess Christina and most of the Assayer. There is an enormous amount of secondary source material on Galileo. The philosophical background for his work is well handled in E. A. BURTT, The Metaphysical Foundations of Modern Physical Science (rev. ed. Garden City 1932; repr. Anchor Bks 1954) and J. A. WEISHEIPL, The Development of Physical Theory in the Middle Ages (New York 1960). Galileo's scientific work is analyzed in A. KOYRÉ, Études Galiléennes (Paris 1939) and clearly explained by I. B. COHEN, The Birth of a New Physics (Garden City 1960). The most important books recounting the events of the condemnation include J. J. LANGFORD, Galileo, the Church and Science (New York 1966), F. S. TAYLOR, Galileo and the Freedom of Thought (London 1938), and G. DE SANTILLANA, The Crime of Galileo (Chicago 1955), which is a very readable though not altogether fair account of the famous conflict. R. J. BLACKWELL, Science, Religion and Authority: Lessons from the Galileo Affair (Milwaukee 1998); Galileo, Bellarmine, and the Bible: Including a Translation of Foscarini's Letter on the Motion of the Earth (Notre Dame, Ind. 1991). T. CAMPANELLA, A Defense of Galileo, the Mathematician from Florence: Which Is an Inquiry as to Whether the Philosophical View Advocated by Galileo Is in Agreement with, or Is Opposed to, the Sacred Scriptures, tr. with intro. R. J. BLACKWELL (Notre Dame 1994). W. A. WALLACE, Galileo's Logic of Discovery and Proof: The Background, Content, and Use of His Appropriated Treatises on Aristotle's Posterior Analytics (Dordrecht; Boston 1992); Galileo and His Sources: The Heritage of the Collegio Romano in Galileo's Science (Princeton, N.J. 1984); W. A. WALLACE, ed., Reinterpreting Galileo (Washington, D.C. 1986). M. A. FINOCCHIARO, ed. and trans., The Galileo Affair: A Documentary History (Berkeley 1989). E. MCMULLIN, ed., Galileo, Man of Science (Princeton Junction, N.J. 1988). P. CARDINAL POUPARD, ed., Galileo Galilei: Toward a Resolution of 350 Years of Debate, 1633–1983, epilogue JOHN PAUL II, trans. I. CAMPBELL (Pittsburgh 1987). S. DRAKE, Galileo at Work: His Scientific Biography (Chicago 1981, c1978). D. SHAPER, Galileo: A Philosophical Study (Chicago 1974).

[J. J. LANGFORD]

GALITZIN, ELIZABETH

Religious administrator; b. St. Petersburg, Russia, Feb. 22, 1797; d. St. Michael's, Louisiana, Dec. 8, 1843. Her father was Prince Alexsis Andrevitch; her mother, Countess Protasof, left the Russian Orthodox Church to embrace Catholicism. Four years later Elizabeth made her submission to Rome and entered the Society of the SACRED HEART at Metz, Lorraine. She received the habit in 1826, made her first vows in 1828, and made her final profession at Paris in 1832. Two years later she was appointed secretary general to the foundress, St. Madeleine Sophie BARAT. Mother Galitzin took an active part in the sixth general council of the order, held in Rome in 1839, and was elected assistant general. Sweeping changes in organization, designed to make the order resemble more closely the Society of Jesus, were approved for a three-year trial; and Mother Galitzin was sent (1840) as visitatrix to the American convents of the Sacred Heart to explain the new decrees and ensure their proper application. She reached New York early in September and traveled directly to Missouri to visit the convents in St. Louis, Florissant, and St. Charles, and then those in Louisiana. Although she was a conscientious and efficient visitor, her autocratic nature lacked sympathy and understanding. Before returning to France in 1842, she founded convents in New York City and McSherrystown, Pa., and approved the opening of a mission among the Potawatomi Indians at Sugar Creek, Kansas. When in March 1843 GREGORY XVI confirmed the original rules and constitutions of the society, Mother Galitzin became aware of the harm she had done in imposing too vehemently the changes she had championed and begged to be allowed to revisit America and restore the original organization as established there by St. Philippine DUCHESNE. Embarking from France, she visited convents in New York, Pennsylvania, and Canada, and then went to Missouri and Louisiana. At St. Michael's, where she found yellow fever raging, she nursed the sick with heroic devotedness until she herself was fatally stricken with the disease.

Bibliography: Archives, R.S.C.J., St. Michael's, Louisiana, housed at Maryville College of the Sacred Heart, St. Louis, Missouri. L. CALLAN, The Society of the Sacred Heart in North America (New York 1937). A. P. GALITZYN, Vie d'une religieuse du Sacre-Coeur, 1795–1843 (Paris 1859). M. WARD, Life of Bl. Madeleine Sophie Barat (Roehampton, England, 1900; rev. 1911).

[L. CALLAN]

GALL, ST.

Irish missionary to the Continent; b. Ireland, c. 560; d. Switzerland, after 615, c. 630–35. Gall was known personally to JONAS OF BOBBIO, the biographer of COLUMBAN, Gall's religious superior. However, Jonas has little to say about Gall except to recount the incident when Columban ordered Gall to fish in the Breuchin, which flows into the Lanterne, and Gall decided to try the L'Ognan, a tributary of the Aar, instead. He caught nothing. On being reproved by Columban for his disobedience, he returned to the Breuchin and had a large catch. This account of Jonas is the only really authentic information available on Gall; for other details of his life one must depend on a vita written as late as c. 771 (which survives but in fragmentary form) and later accounts apparently based on it. According to these documents, Gall was offered to God as a child, in the Abbey of BANGOR, where he was placed under the guidance of Columban. When he set off for the Continent with Columban (c. 590), Gall was already a priest and so at least 30 years old (the canonical age for ordination). This places his birth in 560 or before. The history of his early years on the Continent is that of Columban. Gall's separate story begins with Columban's departure from Brigantium (present-day Bregenz), at the eastern extremity of Lake Constance, just after 610, for Italy. Gall's vita states that Gunzo, Duke of the ALAMANNI, was responsible for this departure, but he is not mentioned elsewhere. However, it is known that at that time, Theodoric, Columban's old enemy, had conquered his brother Theudibert and was controlling the Alamanni. In any case, Gall remained behind because of illness when Columban departed. Later Gall established a hermitage at the source of the Steinach, where he was joined by disciples. He spent the remainder of his life in meditation and in converting the Alamanni. The date of his death is uncertain, but apparently it was after that of Columban (d. 615). A genealogy makes Gall a relation of St. BRIGID, but this may safely be ignored. He is normally represented with a bear, mentioned in one of the legendary accounts of his life. His cult spread throughout Switzerland and into Alsace, Lorraine, Germany, and Italy. The famous Abbey of SANKT GALLEN was established nearly a century after his death on the site of his hermitage.

Feast: Oct. 16.

Bibliography: KENNEY, discusses the sources and gives a comprehensive bibliog. M. JOYNT, The Life of St. G. (London 1927), including an Eng. tr. of Gall's life by WALAFRID STRABO c. 833. B. and H. HELBLING, "Der heilige Gallus in der Geschichte", Schweizerische Zeitschrift für Geschichte 12 (1962) 1–62. L. HERTLING, "Saint G. in Switzerland," in Irish Monks in the Golden Age, ed. J. J. RYAN (Dublin 1963) 59–72. L. GOUGAUD, Gaelic Pioneers of Christianity, tr. V. COLLINS (Dublin 1923) 124–126, on cult. A. M. TOMMASINI, Irish Saints in Italy, tr. J. F. SCANLAN (London 1937) 252–264, on cult. J. DUFF, Die Gallus-Kapelle zu St. Gallen und ihr Bilderzyklus (St. Gallen 1977), iconography at Saint Gallen. P. OSTERWALDER, St. Gallus in der Dichtung (St. Gallen 1983).

[C. MCGRATH]

GALL OF CLERMONT, ST.

Bishop; b. c. 486; d. 551. From the writings of his nephew, GREGORY OF TOURS (confirmed by an epitaph composed by Fortunatus and by the signatures of the councils), a meager biography of St. Gall can be gleaned. He came of a wealthy Gallo-Roman family, and became a monk at Cournon, where he distinguished himself by his fasts, love of reading, and fine singing voice. Because of his musical talent he was brought first to Clermont by Bishop QUINCTIAN, and then to the royal court at Trèves

Church of St. Gall, Prague, Czech Republic. (©Dave G. Houser/CORBIS)

by King Theodoric I. In 526–527 he succeeded Quinctian to the See of Clermont. He took part in person or by proxy at four synods held in Orléans (533–549), and at one, which he himself assembled, in Clermont (535). His humility, his charity, and his miracles won the veneration of his people.

Feast: July 1.

Bibliography: GREGORY OF TOURS, Historia Francorum, 4:5, 6, 13; Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum 1.1:138–139, 144; Eng. tr. O. M. DALTON, 2 v. (Oxford 1927). Vitae patrum, 6. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum 1.2. J. MABILLON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti 1:109–113. Epitaph by FORTUNATUS, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Auctores antiquissimi 4.1:81. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Concilia 1:65, 70, 84, 97, 109. L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule 2:36. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie 3.2:1917–18. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, by the Benedictines of Paris 7:19–22. BUTLER The Lives of the Saints 3:3–4. J. DES GRAVIERS, Catholicisme 4:1718–19.

[G. M. COOK]

GALLAGHER, HUGH PATRICK

Missionary, editor; b. Donegal, Ireland, May 12, 1815; d. San Francisco, Calif., March 10, 1882. Leaving Ireland in 1832, he went to the U.S. and entered St. Charles Seminary, Overbrook, Pa., where he was assigned to teach Latin and Greek. After his ordination in 1840, he served as pastor in the coal regions of western Pennsylvania. There he defended the interests of the Irish immigrant and promoted the temperance movement begun in Ireland by Rev. Theobald MATHEW. In 1844 Gallagher was appointed rector of the Theological College of Pittsburgh, Pa. To combat nativist opposition to Irish Catholics in the state, he wrote editorials for the Pittsburgh Catholic. He was transferred to Loretto, Pa., and was named theologian to the First Plenary Council of Baltimore in 1852. There he met Bp. Joseph S. ALEMANY, OP, of Monterey, Calif., who persuaded him to obtain temporary leave from the Diocese of Pittsburgh to serve in the new Archdiocese of San Francisco.

Gallagher was sent as a missionary through northern California, serving in rapid succession at Benicia, Shasta, Weaverville, and St. Francis Church, San Francisco. Having founded (1853) the Catholic Standard, the first Catholic weekly on the Pacific Coast, he left for Europe in December 1853 to secure help for the California missions. In Ireland he enlisted several priests, 14 seminarians, the Sisters of Mercy of Kinsale, and the Presentation Sisters of Cork City. Having narrowly avoided sailing aboard the ill-fated Arctic, which sank in the Atlantic with the loss of all passengers, the party arrived in the U.S. in 1854. Released from Pittsburgh, Gallagher visited the gold and silver mining regions of the West. In Nevada he built (1861) the territory's first Catholic church at Genoa and purchased property for the churches in Carson City and Virginia City. In San Francisco he founded (1861) St. Joseph's, building the church, hall, and convent, and a free school that was the beginning of parochial education in the archdiocese. He was also one of the founders of St. Mary's Hospital, and of the Magdalen, a home for wayward girls. His civic influence was demonstrated when the state legislature adopted his plan to improve Golden Gate Park in 1869.

[M. J. HURLEY]

GALLAGHER, SIMON FELIX

Missionary; b. Ireland, 1756; d. Natchez, Miss., Dec. 13, 1825. As a priest of the Diocese of Dublin, Ireland, and, from his own statement, a graduate of the University of Paris, he presented himself to Bp. John CARROLL of Baltimore, Md., on Feb. 3, 1793, bearing a letter of recommendation from Bp. John Troy of Dublin. Carroll sent him as third pastor to Charleston, S.C., where organized Catholicism had begun in 1788. Gallagher immediately became a popular orator who made many friends, including Charles Carroll of Carrollton. He organized the Hibernian Society of Charleston and became an instructor at the College of Charleston, helping to enhance its reputation for learning.

Shortly after his arrival, Gallagher began to have trouble with TRUSTEEISM, which deprived him of real authority over the church at Charleston. In 1800, Gallagher was suspended for intemperance, and the vestry refused to acknowledge Carroll's new appointment. Gallagher's repentance and reinstatement relieved Carroll of action for the moment. In 1812 Carroll appointed Joseph Picot de Clorivière as an assistant to Gallagher to serve the large number of French in the congregation, and the two seemed to work amicably. But when Clorivière went to Europe in 1814, Gallagher called Rev. Robert Browne, pastor at Augusta, Ga., to assist him, and on Clorivière's return, Gallagher and Browne resisted the French priest's effort to take up his duties in Charleston. The vestry upheld Gallagher and, as holders of the incorporating charter, claimed the right to decide who would serve in the church.

Abp. Leonard NEALE, who had succeeded Carroll, confirmed Clorivière's appointment and suspended Gallagher and Browne. He also ordered Clorivière to open another place of worship for the faithful, placing under interdict the church controlled by Gallagher and the trustees. In 1818 the archbishop sent Rev. Benedict Fenwick to Charleston to effect a peace. During the negotiations Gallagher spent the winter of 1819–20 at Philadelphia, Pa., assisting Rev. Louis de Barth at St. Mary's Church. When Charleston was established as a diocese in 1820, its new bishop, John England, reinstated Gallagher, but considered him "an old man to whom no duty can be committed." In August 1822, Gallagher requested a change to St. Augustine, Fla., where he remained until the following January, when he left for Havana, Cuba. While serving in New Orleans, La., in 1825, he preached at the cathedral for the annual commemoration of the Battle of New Orleans. By March 1825 he had moved to Natchez, Miss., and accepted the duties of pastor of St. Mary's Church, where he died the following December.

Bibliography: J. H. EASTERBY, History of the College of Charleston (Charleston 1935). P. K. GUILDAY, The Life and Times of John England, 2 v. (New York 1927). C. J. NEUSSE, The Social Thought of American Catholics, 1634–1829 (Westminster, Md. 1945).

[R. C. MADDEN]

GALLANDI, ANDREA

Priest, canonist, and patristic scholar, whose writings contributed to the study of the development of the origins of Canon Law; b. Venice, Dec. 7, 1709; d. Venice, Jan. 2, 1779. He published a collection of treatises of such famous canonists as COUSTANT, De Marcha, BALLERINI, Berardi, QUESNEL, and Blasco. This work, entitled De vetustis canonum collectionibus dissertationum sylloge, was published at Venice in 1778. He compiled also the less-known writings of 380 ecclesiastical writers of the first seven centuries in Biblioteca graeco-latina veterum Patrum antiquorumque scriptorum ecclesiasticorum. This collection was published at Venice over a period of years between 1765 and 1781.

Bibliography: R. NAZ, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, (Paris 1935-) 5:931. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 6 v. (Innsbruck 3 1903-13; v. 1 4 1926) 5:111-112. J. C. HOFER, Nouvelle biographie générale, 46 v. (Paris 1852-66).

[B. R. PISKULA]

GALLICAN RITES

Gallican is the name usually given to the liturgy that prevailed in Gaul from the beginnings of Christianity in that country to about the end of the 8th century, when Charlemagne imposed the Roman rite there. The difficulty of such a concept is that there was no single form of worship in the earliest times, but rather a diversity of liturgical forms, because Gaul was not a political or ecclesiastical unity. The characteristics that distinguish the so-called Gallican rite from that of Rome appear only in a later period, and many of them are then shared by other Western rites, such as the Spanish, Celtic, and Ambrosian. It is a serious mistake and, from a scholarly point of view, impossible to see these characteristics as belonging to the earliest period.

History. Unfortunately, the Gallican liturgy has so far not found its historian. There are a great number of problems regarding its origin that have escaped any solution. Several theories have been advanced, but none of them seems satisfactory. According to the oldest theory, the Gallican rite was brought to Lyons from Ephesus by St. Photinus and St. Irenaeus and was of apostolic origin, since they had received it through St. Polycarp from St. John the Apostle. This idea has been given up by all serious scholars because such an early beginning is absolutely improbable. It is the second theory, developed by L. Duchesne, that has found many adherents. According to this theory, the Gallican liturgy was strongly influenced by Milan, especially in its Oriental features. In fact, to Duchesne the Gallican liturgy is an Oriental liturgy introduced into the West toward the middle of the 4th century via Milan. This theory can no longer be regarded as convincing because Duchesne's reconstruction of the Gallican Mass of the 6th century is based on the assumption that the so-called Letters of St. Germanus of Paris are authentic. A. Wilmart, however, has clearly demonstrated that these letters have nothing to do with St. Germanus (d.576) or with Paris, but that they were composed in the south of France about the year 700. Thus Duchesne's reconstruction may give an idea of the Gallican liturgy of the 7th or 8th centuries, but not of the 6th, because these letters represent the Gallican rite, not in its early purity, but in the period of its decadence after it had been transformed by a number of foreign elements. One must take account of O. Faller's and H. Connolly's vindication of St. Ambrose's authorship of the treatise De sacramentis. There remains nothing to prove that the liturgy of Milan in the second half of the 4th century was a liturgy imported from the East. It was fundamentally a Roman rite, except for minor details. De sacramentis demonstrates that the Church of Milan was already using an early form of the Roman Canon. Hence Duchesne's theory that Milan was the center of diffusion for the Gallican rite in the West, which he supposed had been imported from the East by St. Ambrose's predecessor, Auxentius, about 360, must be discarded. Moreover, the greatest obstacle to a clear understanding of the beginnings of the liturgies in the West, Duchesne's theory of an Oriental origin for all non-Roman Western rites, has been eliminated, and the way has been opened for a new study of the beginnings of the Gallican rite.

E. Griffe, though fully aware of the remaining problems, has come to the conclusion that the early Gallican liturgy did not come from Milan, nor from the East, but from Rome. Far from being prolix and oratorical, this early liturgy was remarkable for its simplicity and sobriety of style. It was only in the course of the 6th and 7th centuries that the Gallican liturgy became enriched by new rites that had their origin in the Orient. Some of these rites were introduced via Rome, others via Spain, and others again directly from the East, especially Syria. In order to understand the beginnings of the Gallican liturgy, it will be necessary to leave these later additions aside.

Unfortunately, almost all the extant sources of the Gallican rite are of a later period and do not give any information for the 5th century and earlier. Hence, A. Wilmart was of the opinion that the liturgy of Gaul of that time must remain a myth. The so-called Gallican rite of that early period, if it existed at all, was not different from that of Rome.

If one wishes to get an idea of the liturgy for the period of 150 to 313, for which there are no Gallican sources at all, it may suffice to recall the description of the eucharist that St. Justin gave in his Apology. It provides an idea not only of the eucharist at Rome, but also for the other churches of primitive Christianity. The following order is found in ch. 65 and 67: (1) readings from the Old and New Testaments, (2) the homily, (3) the prayer of the faithful, (4) the kiss of peace, (5) the offering of bread and wine, (6) the Eucharistic Prayer, and (7) Holy Communion distributed by the deacons. The first Christian communities organized on the soil of Gaul most probably followed this order presented by the Church of Rome between 150 and 250. Its primitive structure can be recognized even in the later, more developed Gallican forms.

It was the 4th century that saw the Church of Gaul definitely organized, and this must have been the time that local differences in the liturgy began to appear. The Consuetudines of local synods of the 5th and 6th centuries testify to this development. Very soon this liturgical evolution led to the presence of two different types of liturgies in the West: the Roman, used in all Italy and in Africa, the Gallican, in Gaul and Spain. The writings of Gregory of Tours and Caesarius of Arles and the Merovingian councils enable one to get some idea of this early Gallican liturgy of the 6th century.

Sources. It is only after this period that there are available liturgical sources, such as Missals, Benedictionals, and Lectionaries. For the later form, there is the very valuable description found in the so-called Letters of St. Germanus, which show evidence of a definitely Eastern influence.

Mone Masses. Mass formularies have been published by F. J. Mone, Lateinische und griechische Messen aus dem zweiten bis sechsten Jahrhundert (Frankfurt 1850). They have been reprinted by J. M. Neale and G. H. Forbes, The Ancient Liturgies of the Gallican Churches (Burntisland 1855), by Migne, Patrologia Latina 138:863–882, and more recently by L. C. Mohlberg and P. Siffirin, Missale Gallicanum Vetus (Rerum Ecclesiasticarum Documenta, Series Maior, Fontes III; Rome 1958) 61–91. Mone discovered these Masses in a late 7th-century palimpsest manuscript belonging to the library of Karlsruhe, Germany, but originally from the Abbey of Reichenau. It contains 11 Masses of the pure Gallican type, notable for the absence of all reference to the cycle of liturgical feasts. One of them is in honor of St. Germanus of Auxerre, but the others do not specify any festival. H. Brewer [Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 43 (1919) 603–703] is of the opinion that these Masses were composed by Venantius Fortunatus. This is highly improbable, except for one, Sidera de sede nitens, which is almost entirely in hexameter verse (the Post-Pridie is in prose). For the time of origin and the order of these Masses, see A. Wilmart, “L’Âge et l’ordre des Messes de Mone,” Revue Bénédictine 28 (1911) 377–399; for the place of origin and authorship, see P. Radò, “Verfasser und Heimat der Mone-Messen,” Ephemerides liturgicae 42 (1928) 58–65; for the sources used in their composition, see L. Eizenhöfer, Revue Bénédictine 43 (1953) 329–332.

Missale Gothicum. This is a Gallican Sacramentary, now in the Vatican Library (Cod. Vat. Reg. Lat. 317), written at the end of the 7th century and belonging formerly to the Petau Library. The misleading title, Missale Gothicum, was added to the manuscript in the 15th century and caused its first editor, G. M. Tommasi, to attribute it to Narbonne, then under Visigothic rule. The inclusion of the Masses for the feasts of St. Symphorian and St. Léger led L. Duchesne to believe that it was from Autun. Hence it is frequently called the Sacramentary of Autun. Following the order of the Proprium de tempore, it contains Masses from the Vigil of Christmas to Pentecost, interspersed with some saints’ days, Rogation Days, and the Feast of the Finding of the Cross. It ends with Masses for the Common of Saints, six Sunday Masses, and a fragment of a Mass, Missa Cotidiana Romensis, for use of ferias. The arrangement throughout is that of the Gallican Mass, though for the Masses of the saints the formularies are Roman. It was first edited by G. M. Tommasi, Codices Sacramentorum Nongentis Annis Vetustiores (Rome 1680) 263–317, and by J. Mabillon, De Liturgia Gallicana (Paris 1685) 188–300; reprinted by L. A. Muratori, Liturgia Romana Vetus (Venice 1748) 517–558, by F. M. Neale and G. H. Forbes, The Ancient Liturgies of the Gallican Church (Burntisland 1855) 32–150, and by Migne, Patrologia Latina 72:225–318. Modern editions are: H. M. Bannister, Missale Gothicum: A Gallican Sacramentary (London 1917); facsimile edition by L. C. Mohlberg, Missale Gothicum: Das gallikanische Sakramentar (Cod. Vat. Regin. Lat. 317) des VII.–VIII. Jahrhunderts (2 v. Augsburg 1929). [For a study of the place of origin see G. Morin, “Sur la provenance du Missale Gothicum,” Revue d’histoire ecclésiastique 37 (1941) 424–430.]

Missale Gallicanum Vetus. The Sacramentary of Auxerre is preserved in a single manuscript, Codex Pal. 493 of the Vatican Library; it was written at the end of the 7th century or the beginning of the 8th and is in fragmentary condition. There is a certain disorder of arrangement that Tommasi tried to improve. The series of Masses begins with one for the feast of St. Germanus of Auxerre (Oct. 9), which is followed by prayers for the blessing of virgins and widows, two Advent Masses, a Mass for the Vigil of Christmas, the Expositio, Traditio Symboli, and other Lenten ceremonies preparatory to Baptism, the ceremonies for Holy Week and Easter Sunday including the baptismal liturgy, and Masses for the Sundays after Easter up to the Rogation Mass. Many prayers are identical with those in the Missale Gothicum. The Good Friday prayers are the same as in the Roman Missal, except for a few variations. The manuscript has been edited by Tommasi, 433–492; Mabillon, 329–378; Muratori, 697–760; Migne, Patrologia Latina 72:339–382; and Neale and Forbes, 151–204. There is a new edition by L. C. Mohlberg, L. Eizenhöfer, and P. Siffrin, Missale Gallicanum Vetus (Rome 1958).

Bobbio Missal. Now at Paris (B.N. MS lat. 13.246), this Missal is of the 8th century and represents an important collection of Gallican prayers, although it was compiled probably by an Irishman and written originally in Italy in the monastery of Bobbio, where Mabillon found it. The original edition was published by J. Mabillon, Museum Italicum seu Collectio Veterum Scriptorum ex Bibliothecis Italicis eruta (Paris 1687) 1.2:278–397. It was reprinted by L. A. Muratori, Liturgia Romana Vetus (Venice 1748) 775–968, and Migne, Patrologia Latina 52:451–580. A modern critical edition was published by E. A. Lowe, The Bobbio Missal, A Gallican Mass Book (Henry Bradshaw Society 56; London 1920). There is a facsimile edition by J. Wickham Legg, The Bobbio Missal, Facsimile of MS Paris. lat. 13.246 (Henry Bradshaw Society 53; London 1917). A volume of notes was added later by A. Wilmart, E. A. Lowe, and H. A. Wilson, The Bobbio Missal, Notes and Studies (Henry Bradshaw Society 61; London 1923). [For a description see A. Wilmart, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie 2.1:939–962; “Une Curieuse instruction liturgique du missel de Bobbio,” Revue Charlemagne 2 (1912) 1–6.]

Mass Fragments. Fragments of Masses of the Gallican rite have been found by a number of scholars. D. de Bruyne edited from a Gospel manuscript of the 7th century (BN Codex 256) prayers and a contestatio of a Missal pro defuncto [D. de Bruyne, “Une Messe gallicane inédite pro defuncto,” Revue Bénédictine 34 (1922) 156–158; repr. L. C. Mohlberg, Missale Gallicanum Vetus (Rome 1958) 96–97]. G. Bickell published a fragment of a Gallican Christmas Mass from a codex of Gonville and Caius College at Cambridge (No. 820) of the middle of the 8th century [G. Bickell, “Ein neues Fragment einer gallikanischen Weihnachtsmesse,” Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 6 (1882) 370–372; repr. L. C. Mohlberg, Missale Gallicanum Vetus 370–372, and K. Gamber, Sakramentartypen (Beuron 1958) 28–29]. There are fragments from a codex of the monastery of St. Gall in Switzerland (Stiftsbibliothek Codex 194). Six palimpsest pages of this MS contain a Benedictio populi and a Postcommunion that seems to be the end of a Pentecost Mass (see K. Gamber, Sakramentartypen 29). A. Dold has published fragments of a Sacramentary from Codex M 12 of the Ambrosian Library at Milan that represent a mixture of Gallican and Visigothic type of the 7th century. The framework is more Gallican, the formularies more Visigothic [A. Dold, Das Sakramentar in Schabkodex M 12 Sup. der Bibliotheca Ambrosiana mit hauptsächlich altspanischem Formelgut im gallischen Rahmenwerk (Texte und Arbeiten 43; Beuron 1952)]. J. Mabillon edited a Missal in honorem S. Remigii from Codex Reims 1395 of the 9th century [Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti 1 (Paris 1703) 63, 680; repr. L. C. Mohlberg, Missale Gallicanum Vetus 91–92; see also F. Baix, “Les Sources liturgiques de la Vita Remigii de Hincmar,” Miscellanea A. De Meyer 1 (Louvain 1946) 222–227]. A. Dold also published, from Codex Sangallensis 908 of the 6th or 7th century, a series of Missae defunctorum et exhortationes matutinales [Palimpsest-Studien 1 (Texte und Arbeiten 45; Beuron 1955) 1–36; see J. A. Jungmann, “Die vormonastische Morgenhore im gallisch-spanischen Raum des 6. Jahrhunderts,” Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 78 (1956) 306–336]. W. J. Anderson published fragments of a Gallican Sacramentary from Codex London W. Merton of the 8th century [“Fragments of an Eight-Century Gallican Sacramentary,” Journal of Theological Studies 29 (1928) 337–345; repr. L. C. Mohlberg, Missale Gallicanum Vetus 98–102]. A Praefatio Missae from Codex latinus Monacensis 14429 of the 7th or 8th centuries was published by Dold [“Liturgie-Fragmente aus Clm 14429,” Revue Bénédictine 38 (1926) 277–287; see M. Frost, “A Prayer-Book from St. Emmeran, Ratisbon,” Journal of Theological Studies 30 (1929) 32–45; H. Frank, “Die Briefe des hl. Bonifatius und das von ihm benutzte Sakramentar,” Sankt Bonifatius: Gedenkgabe zum 1200. Todestag (Fulda 1954) 75]. P. Siffrin published fragments of a Calendarium from Codex Berlin lat. fol. 87 and Regensburg Graf Walderdorff of the 8th century [P. Siffrin, “Das Walderdorffer Kalendarfragment saec. VIII,” Ephemerides liturgicae 47 (1933) 204–209; repr. L. C. Mohlberg, Missale Francorum (Rome 1957) 71–85]. Fragments of a Cologne Codex GB Kasten B 24.123, 124 of the 8th century were published by H. M. Bannister [“Fragments of an Anglo-Saxon Sacramentary,” Journal of Theological Studies 12 (1911) 451–455]. Two Postcommunions were discovered in Codex Parisinus Bibl. Nat. MS. lat. 242 of the 9th century and edited by A. Wilmart [Archivum latinitatis medii aevi 15 (1940) 207; repr. L. C. Mohlberg, Missale Gallicanum Vetus 102–103]. In addition, L. C. Mohlberg published Fragmentum diptychorum ex regula S. Aureliani (92–93) and Priscilliani benedictio super fideles (103–105) from Codex Würzburg, Univ. M.p.th. Q.3 of the 5th or 6th centuries and reprinted (93–94) the fragment of a lost Codex of Fulda of the 8th century, which was first edited by A. Ruland [Theologische Quartal- schrift 39 (1857) 420–421]. Missae in honorem S. Samsonis were edited by F. Duine [Inventaire liturgique de l'hagiographie bretonne (Paris 1922) 20–23, 236–237].

Benedictionalia. Pope Zacharias, in a letter (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae III, Merov. et Karol. aevi 1:371) addressed to St. Boniface in 751, criticized the custom that the bishops of Gaul had of inserting blessings after the Our Father at Mass as against apostolic tradition, and exhorted him to remain loyal to the Roman custom, which did not have such blessings. A number of such prayers are preserved in collections called Benedictionales. The oldest of them seems to be the Benedictionale Frisingense vetus composed in Gregorienmünster at the end of the 7th century and later used in Freising [W. Dürig, “Das Benectionale Frisingense Vetus (Clm 6430 fol. 1–14),” Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft 4 (1955) 223–244; for a later Freising collection see W. Dürig, “Die Typologie der Osterwoche im jüngeren Freisinger Benedictionale,” Paschatis Sollemnia, ed. B. Fischer and J. Wagner (Freiburg 1959) 197–207].

A shorter Gallican collection is the Benedictionale Friburgense found in the 9th-century Codex 363 of the University of Freiburg [M. J. Metzger, Zwei karolingische Pontifikalien vom Oberrhein (Freiburg 1914) 87–92, 18*–25*]. A third collection is the Benedictiones Gallicanae found in MS Clm 29163m of the 9th or 10th centuries in the Munich Library [W. Dürig, “Die Bruchstücke einer Sammlung von Benedictiones Gallicanae in CL 29163,” Revue Bénédictine 64 (1954) 168–175]. For further Gallican Benedictiones Episcopales see Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie 2.1:717–720; W. Lüdtke, “Bischöfliche Benediktionen aus Magdeburg und Braunschweig,” Jahrbuch für Liturgiewissenschaft 5 (1925) 97–122; R. M. Wooley, The Benedictional of John Longlonde (London 1926); A. de Vasconcelos, “Notas liturgico-bracarenenses,” Opus Dei 5 (1930–31) 21–28, 46–54; G. Manz, Ausdrucksformen der lateinischen Liturgiesprache (Beuron 1941) 25–36; J. Leclercq and J. Laporte, “Bénédictions épiscopales dans un manuscrit de Huesca,” Hispania Sacra 5 (1952) 79; L. Eizenhöfer, “Nochmals Spanish Symptom,” Sacris Erudiri 4 (1952) 32–42; and L. Brou, “Encore les Spanish Symptom et leur Contre-Partie,” Hispania Sacra 7 (1954) 467–485.

Gallican Lectionaries. The oldest Gallican Lectionary is that discovered and edited by A. Dold from the palimpsest Codex Weissenburgensis 76 of the 5th or 6th century in the Herzog August Bibliothek at Wolfenbüttel [Das älteste Liturgiebuch der lateinischen Kirche (Beuron 1936)]. This Lectionary is the oldest document of liturgical Scripture lessons that has been preserved. The Lessons are taken partly from a pure Vulgate text, partly from an older Latin Scripture text, partly from a mixture of both. A very interesting feature is the fact that the ecclesiastical year of this Lectionary begins with Easter and ends with Holy Saturday. Hence the first Lessons are those of the Easter Vigil. There follow those of Easter and Easter week, including the Octave of Easter (Low Sunday), the Gallican Rogation Days, and the feasts of the Ascension and Pentecost. In between Ascension and Pentecost, the Lectionary gives the Lessons for the anniversary of the Dedication of the Cathedral. Then follow the Lessons for the Nativity of St. John the Baptist, for the feasts of St. Peter and St. Stephen, Epiphany, the feast of the Cathedra Petri, and Lent, including Holy Week, ending the ecclesiastical year with a liturgy for Holy Saturday. An appendix contains the Lessons for special liturgical occasions (e.g., the consecration of a bishop and the ordination of a priest), the Lessons of the Common of one or several martyrs, of a confessor, of a dedication of a church, of the birthday of the diocesan bishop, of the funeral of a bishop and of Christians in general, of the consecration of a virgin, and for the offering of tithes. The order of the Lessons for the ecclesiastical year may reach down even to the period before the Council of Ephesus. The Lectionary was written in southern France in the old Septimania.

The Luxeuil Lectionary, part of MS 9427 of the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris, was discovered by J. Mabillon in the Abbey of Luxeuil. It is of the 7th century and contains, among its very few saints' days, the feast of St. Genevieve, a feature that induced G. Morin to attribute it to Paris. Beginning with Christmas Eve, it gives the prophetic Lessons, Epistles, and Gospels of the liturgical year, followed by the Lessons for a few special Masses, for the burial of a bishop, for the dedication of a church, for when a bishop preaches, for the giving of tithes, for when a deacon is ordained and when a priest is blessed, and for starting on a trip, and lectiones cotidianae. J. Mabillon [De Liturgia Gallicana (Paris 1685) 106–173] gives only the references to all the Lessons and the beginnings and endings of the texts. A critical edition of the entire text was published by P. Salmon [Le lectionnaire de Luxeuil I-II (Collectanea Biblica 7, 9; Rome 1944–53); for the place of origin see C. Charlier, “Note sur les origines de l'écriture dite de Luxeuil,” Revue Bénédictine 58 (1948) 149–157; E. Masai, “Pour quelle église exécuté le lectionnaire de Luxeuil?” Scriptorium 2 (1948) 37–46; 3 (1949) 172; P. Salmon Le Lectionnaire de Luxeuil: Étude Paléographique (Rome 1953)].

For other Gallican Lectionaries see E. Chatelain, “Fragments palimpsestes d'un lectionnaire mérovingien,” Revue d'histoire et de littérature religieuse 5 (1900) 193–199 (palimpsest Codex of Paris, B.N. lat. 10863 of the 7th century); P. Salmon, “Le Système des lectures liturgiques contenu dans les notes marginales du MS. Mp. Th.Q. la de Wurzburg,” Revue Bénédictines 61 (1951) 38–53 (Evangelium S. Kiliani); G. Morin, Études, textes, découvertes (Maredsous 1913) 440–456 (Lectionary of Schlettstadt of the 8th century), 446 (Epistolary of Schlettstadt of the 8th century); P. Salmon, “Le Texte biblique de l’Évangélaire de St. Denis,” Miscellanea Mercati 1 (1946) 103–106 (Gospel book of St. Denis in Codex Paris, B. N. MS lat. 256 of the 8th century); D. de Bruyne, “Les Notes liturgiques du manuscrit 134 de la Cathédral de Trèves,” Revue Bénédictines 33 (1921) 46–52 (Gospel book of the 8th century); A. DOLD, Die im Codex Vat. Reg. lat. 9 vorgeheftete Liste paulinischer Lesungen für die Messfeier (Texte und Arbeiten 35; Beuron 1944) 39–52 (Lectionary of Tegernsee in Clm 19126 of the 8th century); C. H. Turner, The Oldest MS. of the Vulgate Gospels (Oxford 1931) 217 (Gospel books of Durham in MS of the 8th or 9th century); U. Robert, Pentateuchi versio latina antiquissima e cod. Lugdunensi I (Paris 1881) XIX–XLI; II (Lyons 1900 XIII; E. A. Lowe, Codices Lugdunenses antiquissimi (Lyon 1924) 32–33; A. Wilmart, “Une Lectionaire d’Aniane,” Revue Mabillon 13 (1923) 40–53 (Epistolary in Codex Montpellier, Bibl. mun. 6 of the 9th century); B. Bischoff, “Gallikanische Epistelperikopen,” Studien und Mitteilungen aus dem Benediktiner und Zisterzienser-Orden 50 (1932) 515–519 (Epistolary of Freising in Clm 6229 of the 8th century).

The Letters of St. Germanus of Paris. The most important source for knowledge of the late Gallican liturgy is the so-called Expositio Brevis Antiquae Liturgiae Gallicanae. It is preserved in a codex from the Abbey of St. Martin at Autun, at present in the library of the Seminary of Autun, the only manuscript of this valuable document that exists. The Expositio consists of two letters, the first of which describes the rite of the Gallican Mass, while the second deals with diversa ecclesiae carismata, i.e., with the baptismal rite, liturgical vestments, antiphons, responses, etc. The first to edit this text was A. Martène, Thesaurus novus anecdotorum 5 (Paris 1717) 91–100; repr. Migne, Patrologia Latina 72:83–98. A separate edition was published by J. Quasten, Expositio antiquae liturgiae Gallicanae Germano Parisiensi ascripta (Münster 1934). The question naturally arises as to the authorship of these letters and as to the time of origin. The Epistula prima seems to answer this question, because it starts with the following sentence: Capitula patrum traditionum suscipimus. Quomodo solemnis ordo ecclesiae agitur quibusve instructionibus Kanon ecclesiasticus decoratur, Germanus episcopus scripsit de missa (Expositio 10.4–7). Germanus was born about 496 near Autun, and he was ordained in 530. From 555 until his death, May 28, 576, he was bishop of Paris. The Ex- positio would therefore belong to the 6th century if the introductory sentences are correct in attributing these letters to Germanus of Paris. A. Martène, P. Lebrun, L. Duchesne, A. Franz, and others did not question this statement. L. Duchesne went so far as to state: “I do not believe that there is the slightest reason to doubt the authenticity of this heading” [Christian Worship (5th ed. London 1919) 155]. Today very few scholars dare to think of Germanus as the author. A critical analysis proves that the letters make use of Isidore of Seville’s De ecclesiasticis officiis, a work that originated about the year 620. It is therefore more probable that the two letters were composed by an anonymous author of the 7th or 8th century. The liturgy that they describe seems to be not the liturgy of Paris, but perhaps that of Autun, where the manuscript was found. The Gallican rite as described in these letters shows strong influence of Oriental liturgies [see A. Wilmart, “Germain de Paris (Lettres attribuées à Saint),” Dictionnaire d’archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie 6.1: 1049–1102; A. Gaudel, “Le Problème de l’authenticité des Lettres attribuées à St. Germain de Paris,” Revue des sciences religieuses 7 (1927) 299; J. Quasten, “Oriental Influence in the Gallican Liturgy,” Traditio 1 (1943) 55–78].

Points of Difference. From these sources, especially from the letters attributed to Germanus, the following specialities can be pointed out for the late form of the Mass and Baptism in the Gallican rite.

Mass. The ceremony begins with an antiphon, an entrance chant, and a greeting, after which comes the Aius, i.e., the Trisagion sung in Greek and Latin, well known from all Oriental Liturgies. Both the letters of Pseudo-Germanus and Bobbio Missal mention the Trisagion as part of the introduction to the Mass. According to Pseudo-Germanus, this hymn occurs three times during the Mass, the second and third time before and after the Gospel. The Trisagion was not reported in Gaul until the very end of the 6th century, the period when importations from Syria became evident in the liturgy of France.

Upon the Aius there follows a threefold Kyrie, which in turn is followed by the Benedictus. The use of the Benedictus is attested by the Missale Gothicum, the Bobbio Missal, and the letters of Pseudo-Germanus. In the Gallican Mass of the 6th century it held the position that the Gloria held at that time in the Roman liturgy. According to Pseudo-Germanus, after the Epistle the Cantic of the Three Children, or the Benedicite, is sung. The Lectionary of Luxeuil mentions it once after the OT Lessons and once after the Epistle. In the Roman Mass it appears on Ember Saturdays after the last OT Lesson.

The Diptychs and the Kiss of Peace occurred before the Canon. In the Roman Mass the Diptych for the dead did not exist at that time. It appeared in the Gallican Mass in the 7th or 8th century. The Roman Mass did not adopt the commemoration of the dead in all Masses before the 9th century.

Of special interest in the Gallican Mass is the fact that the Canon, except for the words of Institution, varied with the season. The words of Institution were followed in many Gallican Masses by a prayer Post-Pridie. In 11 of the Mone Masses that represent such an early state of the Gallican liturgy, four contain a form of an EPICLESIS in this Post-Pridie.

The letters of Pseudo-Germanus state that the Fraction takes place while an antiphon is sung. In the Ambrosian rite, this antiphon is called Confractorium. The Pater Noster followed the Fraction but was preceded by a variable introduction and followed by a variable EMBOLISM. During the Communion, the Trecanum was sung; this is a Trinitarian hymn, which seems to be a counterpart of the Trinitarian acclamation preceding Holy Communion in Oriental Liturgies.

Baptism. The authorities for the Gallican baptismal service are the Mixssale Gothicum and the Missale Gallicanum Vetus. The baptismal formula was: "Baptizo in nomine . . . Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti in remissionem peccatorum, ut habeas vitam aeternam." The Missale Gallicanum Vetus and the Bobbio Missal mention the ceremony of Feet-washing. The letters of Germanus mention too that Baptism was not administered during Lent; for this reason the baptistery was closed. The Gallican rite here accords with the liturgy of Spain and Syria.

Bibliography: H. NETZER, L' Introduction de la messe romaine en France sous les carolingiens (Paris 1910). J. B. THIBAUT, L'Ancienne liturgie gallicane, son origine, et sa formation en Provence aux V^e VI^e siècles (Paris 1929). F. CABROL, "Les Origines de la liturgie gallicane," Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 30 (1930) 951–962. G. NICKL, Der Anteil des Volkes an der Messliturgie im Frankenreich von Chlodwig bis Karl den Grossen (Innsbruck 1930). H. G. J. BECK, The Pastoral Care of Souls in South-East France during the 6th Century (Analecta Gregoriana 51; 1950). É. GRIFFE, "Aux origines de la liturgie gallicane," Bulletin de littérature ecclésiastique 52 (1951) 17–43. H. ASHWORTH, "Gregorian Elements in Some Early Gallican Service Books," Traditio 13 (1957) 431–443. W. S. PORTER, The Gallican Rite (London 1958). A. A. KING, Liturgies of the Past (Milwaukee 1959) 77–185. J. KOVALEVSKY, Le canon eucharistique de l'ancien rite des Gaules (Paris 1957). GERMANUS OF PARIS, Expositio antiquae liturgicae gallicanae (London 1971). J. A. FRENDO, The "post secreta" of the "Missale Gothicum" and the eucharistic theology of the Gallican anaphora (Malta 1977). K. GAMBER, Ordo antiquus Gallicanus; der gallikanische Messritus des 6. Jahrhunderts (Regensburg 1965). K. GAMBER, Die Messfeier nach altgallikanischem Ritus (Regensburg 1984). K. GAMBER, Der altgallikanische Messritus als Abbild himmlischer Liturgie (Regensburg 1984).

[J. QUASTEN/EDS.]

GALLICAN RITES, CHANTS OF

Chants of the ancient liturgies practiced in French Gaul from the beginning of the 5th century to the early part of the 9th century. Four important regions, each revolving around important churches and corresponding roughly to the old civil divisions made by the Romans in Gaul, established centers of their provincial rites. The regions of Narbonne and Aquitaine (with Narbonne and Toulouse as mother churches) had much in common with the Mozarabic liturgy and chant. The region of Lyons and Provence influenced the churches of Lyons, Autun, Vienne, and Arles. The churches of the west, center, and north came under the influence of Tours. Sharing a basic liturgy, each developed its own provincial rites, and perhaps its own particular chants.

Because of the royal edicts of unity these ancient liturgies and chants were suppressed in favor of the Roman liturgy and chant. The movement of suppression, begun by Pepin at the instigation of his cousin St. CHRODEGANG, fully ensured by the strong measures of Charlemagne, reached its consummation under Charles the Bald. Unfortunately for the preservations of Gallican chant, its suppression occurred at a time when neume notation was not widely used. No single musical MS of the Gallican liturgy has been preserved. Authentic examples of Gallican chant are those that have been absorbed into the Roman rite and enshrined in Gregorian MSS, especially those of the school of Aquitaine. The best examples of chants absorbed into the Roman rite are those incorporated in the Good Friday liturgy: the improperia, Crux fidelis, Pange lingua . . . certaminis, and Vexilla regis. Principal among the MSS is the Graduale written in the 11th century for the cathedral of Albi (Paris: Bibl. nat. lat. 776). This magnificent specimen of Aquitainian diastematic notation contains the Gregorian Mass repertory plus supplementary chants, tropes, proses, and some pieces taken from the Gallican and Mozarabic liturgy. It is from this source and from MSS originating at St. Martial of Limoges that extant transcriptions of Gallican chants, mostly from the Mass and Office, have been made. Thus in the Variae Preces of Solesmes are found Compline antiphons, Preces, and the antiphon Venite populi. The Solesmes Processionale monasticum contains the Hodie illuxit nobis for the feast of SS. Peter and Paul, the Hodie nobis beata illuxit for the feast of Epiphany, the Ascendit Christus for the feast of the Assumption. Still other examples are found in the Ordinaire des Saluts and the Histoire du chant liturgique à Paris of A. Gastoué.

The musical study of these absorptions and transcriptions—frequent cadences on ut; the use of si natural in a large number of cadences; the use of recitational pitches on mi and si; frequent intonations of ut-re-mi, ut- mi-sol; and a preference of si natural—indicates that Gallican chant is a dialect of its own, with characteristics of style, modality, and melodic development different from the Gregorian. Walafrid Strabo (d. 849) mentions that in his day the discerning cantor could still distinguish Gallican pieces in the Roman chant books (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 114:956).

Bibliography: J. M. NEALE and G. H. FORBES, The Ancient Liturgies of the Gallican Church (Burntisland 1855–67). L. DUCHESNE, “Sur l’origine de la liturgie gallicane,” Revue d’histoire et de littérature religieuses 5 (1900) 31–47. A. GASTOUÉ, Histoire du chant liturgique à Paris, des origines à la fin des temps carolingiens (Paris 1904). A. WILMART, “L’âge et l’ordre des messes de Mone,” Revue bénédictine 28 (1911) 377–90. H. LIETZMANN, Ordo missae romanus et gallicanus (Bonn 1923). F. CABROL, “Les origines de la liturgie gallicane,” Revue d’histoire ecclésiastique 25 (1930) 951–62. A. GASTOUÉ, Le chant gallican (Grenoble 1939). J. QUASTEN, “Oriental Influence in the Gallican Liturgy,” Traditio 1 (1943) 55–73. W. S. PORTER, The Gallican Rite (London 1958). H. HUCKE, “Toward a New Historical View of Gregorian Chant,” Journal of the American Musicological Society (1980) 437–67. K. LEVY, “Toledo, Rome and the Legacy of Gaul,” Early Music History 4 (1984) 49–99. K. LEVY, “Charlemagne’s Archetype of Gregorian Chant,” Journal of the American Musicological Society 40 (1987) 1–31. K. LEVY, “Gallican Chant,” New Oxford History of Music 2 (1990) 93–101. J. CLAIRE, “Le cantatorium romain et le cantatorium gallican: étude comparée des premières formes de la psalmodie,” Orbis musicae 10 (1990–91) 50–86. J. MCKINNON, “The Eighth Century Frankish-Roman Communion Cycle,” Journal of the American Musicological Society 45 (1992) 179–227. J. MCKINNON, “Lector Chant versus Schola Chant: a Question of Historical Plausibility,” in Laborare fratres in unum: Festschrift László Dobszay zum 60. Geburtstag, ed. J. SZENDREI and D. HILEY (Berlin 1995) 201–11. Y. HEN, “Unity in Diversity: the Liturgy of Frankish Gaul before the Carolingians,” in Unity and Diversity in the Church, ed. R. N. SWANSON (Oxford 1996) 19–30. Y. HEN, Culture and Religion in Merovingian Gaul, A.D. 481–751 (Leiden 1995).

[I. WORTMAN/EDS.]

GALLICANISM

A complex of theological and political doctrines, administrative and judicial practices, and religious passions, which characterized the life of the Catholic Church in FRANCE from the late Middle Ages to the French Revolution. The adjective Gallican, derived from the Latin gallicanus, was for a long time in common usage without connoting a doctrine suspected of heresy; it was not, however, a synonym for French except in a few expressions such as Gallican Breviary, Gallican Church, Gallican liturgy, Gallican Flanders, and the Gallican province of the Third Order of St. Francis. Gallicanisme was not introduced into the French language as a noun until c. 1900. Soon after this it appeared in other languages. It was a convenient word because it replaced several other expressions in use since the 15th century, such as “maxims and immunities of the Gallican Church.” A lawyer in the Paris Parlement c. 1800, taking his inspiration from Pierre Pithou, began an article dealing with the liberties of the Gallican Church thus: “The word Libertés, which proclaims to servile ultramontane minds exorbitant privileges, merely denotes the ancient right common to all churches, which the French have succeeded in defending against the court of Rome with more steadfastness than the magistrates and doctors of other Catholic nations.” This jurist merely echoed a tradition when he opposed Gallicanism to ULTRAMONTANISM (opinions commonly held beyond the mountains, in Italy, and more precisely, those held by Roman theologians and canonists, who had only a small number of representatives in France). The defenders of the liberties of the Gallican Church were and wished to remain Catholics. There were, in fact, many ways of interpreting the term “liberties,” and of utilizing them. “We have found far less evidence of a developing Gallican system than of Gallican systems that succeed one another” (M. Dubruel, Dictionnaire apologétique de la foi catholique 2:201); but this author and his collaborator, H. X. Arquillère, multiplied in this famous article, examples of successions and traced Gallicanism as far back as the Carolingian period (ibid.). In any case, the best contemporary historian is explicit: “There is not one Gallicanism but Gallicanisms, so different are the interpretations of doctors, bishops, magistrates, and kings” (A. G. Martimort, Le Gallicanisme de Bossuet 7). If Gallicanism terminated with the end of the alliance between throne and altar during the FRENCH REVOLUTION of 1789, the revival during the 19th century of some theses dear to Gallicanism can be called neo-Gallicanism.

Despite the varieties of Gallicanism, Victor MARTIN has attempted to establish a common source for all of them, which consisted of three basic ideas: independence of the king of France in the temporal order; superiority of general COUNCILS over the pope; and union of king and clergy in France to limit papal intervention within the kingdom, in the name of ancient canons (Les Origines du gallicanisme 1:7). This appeal to ancient canons, or to rights acquired in ancient times by the Church of France, seems to be the distinctive trait of a certain French anti-Romanism; it eliminated the possibility of confusing Gallicanism with other similar movements that were spreading over Europe long before the appearance of FEBRONIANISM and JOSEPHINISM.

Gallicanism is inseparable from a certain pride of French Catholicism. It did not believe in the DONATION OF CONSTANTINE. It knew that PEPIN III, Charlemagne’s father, helped Pope Stephen II (753) and had permitted him to lay the foundations for the STATES OF THE CHURCH. Since then, France has been called the eldest daughter of the Church, with St. Petronilla, daughter of St. Peter, as her patron saint. The king of France was consecrated with oil said to have been brought from heaven by an angel and believed to have the miraculous power of healing the king's evil (scrofula). He was not elected; he believed that his power came to him directly from God. "The king of France and the emperor are not one and the same thing," wrote an author in the service of King Charles V, in Le Songe du verger (1376). Independent of the emperor and an emperor in his own kingdom, the king claimed to be dependent on the pope only in spiritual matters, not at all in temporal affairs. The conflict of PHILIP IV the Fair with Pope BONIFACE VIII demonstrated this in striking and brutal fashion.

First Manifestations (1398–1438). It was during the attempts to end the WESTERN SCHISM that the ancient immunities of the Gallican Church were evoked and discovered. Following a national synod, Charles VI decided (July 27, 1398) to sever relations with Benedict XIII, the Avignon pope, and to do so without any recognition of Boniface IX as pope. The end of the royal ordinance read thus: "The king intends to take the necessary measures to make certain that in the future the Gallican Church will, under all circumstances, retain its original immunities and liberties to use them and enjoy them" (V. Martin, Origines 288–289). In accord with his clergy, the king of France had, therefore, passed judgment on the pope (or at least on the one he thought to be pope), because this pontiff, too eager for money, was no longer fulfilling his proper function as servant of the common good of all the faithful. The national synod of 1398 was not a general council, but because of the dangers threatening the Church it was considered to be virtually a general council (V. Martin, Origines 1:283). The Church in France, which was making use of its original immunities to assume full liberty, freed itself from the demands of the papal treasury only to fall under royal fiscal control; it escaped papal abuses in the distribution of benefices only to submit its litigations to the Paris parlement. After undergoing other difficulties, the Church in France rejoiced to see the Western Schism terminated with the election of Pope Martin V (1417). But the ancient immunities and privileges, which were used merely as an expedient during a crucial period, became, as Charles VI had desired, a permanent institution.

The desire to end abuses once again brought about a national synod, this time at Bourges, to legislate as a general council. A royal ordinance, the PRAGMATIC SANCTION (1438), collected the decisions concerning the authority of general councils, the conferring of benefices, elections, expectancies, appeals, ANNATES, the celebration of Divine Office, and other ecclesiastical matters (F. A. Isambert, Recueil général des anciennes lois françaises 9:3–47). According to the Pragmatic Sanction ecumenical councils must convene every 10 years, as the Councils of CONSTANCE and BASEL had ordained; an ecumenical council is superior to the pope; bishops must be elected by cathedral chapters, and abbots, by their abbeys. Some of these articles undoubtedly anticipated the reform work of the Council of TRENT a century later, but the Pragmatic was a document of debatable canonical value and also a condemned one; yet it had considerable value. Members of the parlements, who were charged with supervising the observance of the Pragmatic, long regarded it as the special constitution of the Gallican Church. Doctors on the various faculties of theology were wary of it for fear lest graduates lose their privileges, which allowed them to obtain benefices more easily than could other clerics. Bishops were of two minds about it. They approved the independence it afforded the Church in France; but they did not like it when they were themselves elected by chapters and then found these chapters too powerful. (See CONCILIARISM.)

Ramifications of Gallicanism (1438–1594). Gallicanism assumed several different aspects: rigid among members of the parlements, nuanced among theologians, hesitant among bishops, and opportunist among kings.

Gallicanism of Parlement. As guardians of the holy decrees of the Gallican Church and of the Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges members of the parlements wished to establish their own courts as a supreme ecclesiastical court and as the necessary intermediary between the national Church and the pope. Every summons to Rome, omisso medio, was considered by them an abuse. No papal document and no papal legate could enter France without the consent of the Paris parlement. In 1465 this parlement presented the king with a remonstrance composed of 89 articles. In them it was sorrowful as it recalled the years from 1407 to 1439, but joyful as it evoked the years from 1439 to 1461 (the year in which Louis XI suppressed the Pragmatic). During this latter period, it claimed, the Pragmatic had brought prosperity to the king and his kingdom and rendered the Church in France illustrious with saintly prelates and numerous miracles. To repeal it, according to articles 18 and 19 of the remonstrance, would expose both king and kingdom to every evil, and especially to four: the whole ecclesiastical order would be thrown into confusion (art. 20–61); the kingdom would become depopulated (art. 62–66); the currency would be sent abroad (art. 67–80); and all dioceses would be ruined (art. 81–89). It was held necessary, therefore, to maintain "the freedom of elections and the exoneration of the Church from the heavy burden of annates" (E. Maugis, Histoire du Parlement de Paris de l'avènement des rois Valois à la mort d'Henri IV [Paris 1913] 1:707–708). Logical in its own interests, parlement opposed the official registration of the concordat of 1516 and had to be compelled before it registered the pact in 1518. Its remonstrances of 1579–80, for example, still pleaded for the reestablishment of the Pragmatic as something very praiseworthy and desired by all royal subjects (ibid. 1:710).

Theological Gallicanism. Just as the Parlement of Paris set the tone for the other parlements, so the Faculty of Theology of the University of PARIS set the tone for the provincial universities. Its doctors were the spiritual heirs of PETER OF AILLY and Jean GERSON, who played a decisive role at the Council of Constance and contributed to ending the Western Schism. These doctors revered the pope, but above all they loved the Church. They believed that a pope might err but not the Church. To the latter, united in general council, “each one owes obedience, no matter what rank or dignity he may hold, even papal.” This decree of the fifth session of the Council of Constance was one that met with unanimous approval among French theologians. They liked to repeat, with St. Jerome, “orbis major est urbe.” University, or theological, Gallicanism claimed that if the papal power was not limited in itself, it was in its use and exercise by natural law, by the very constitution of the Church, and by the ancient statutes that governed various churches. “We do not read,” said Gerson, “that Christ conferred on the pope the power to dispose of benefices, dignities, bishoprics, domains, or ecclesiastical properties. We read nowhere that Peter ever exercised this power.” (P. Imbart de la Tour, Les Origines de la Réforme 2:77–83; Martimort, op. cit. 17–56). This tradition was presented by French bishops at the Council of Trent, but it nearly disappeared later as a consequence of the Counter Reformation. In 1611 the Syndic of the Faculty of Theology of Paris, Ed. Richer revived it in order to oppose ultramontanism. His extreme views were rejected but theological Gallicanism subsisted in the faculty, expressed in a succession of pronouncements, the most important of which are the Six Articles of 1663, the source of the 1682 Gallican Articles, and the censure of J. Vernant (1664), “the most complete synthesis of what the faculty achieved against the Ultramontanes for many centuries” (A. G. Martimort, Le gallicanisme de Bossuet 245). It was renewed by the opponents to the bull Unigenitus and was eventually condemned by Auctorem fidei.

Episcopal Gallicanism. French theologians spoke rarely of the liberties of the Gallican Church but the bishops made much of them. They claimed for themselves the exercise of a threefold liberty: administrative, permitting them to deliberate among themselves, especially in provincial councils; fiscal, allowing them to levy taxes (tithes) and to dispose of the income; and judicial, giving them the right to have diocesan officials and to be the sole judges of fellow bishops, when these have failed to fulfill their duties. Should parlements encroach on episcopal jurisdiction, the prelates appealed to the king’s council, nor did they overlook the pope. In the 15th century an archbishop of Toulouse composed a whole treatise against the validity of the Pragmatic and in favor of papal supremacy, while an archbishop of Tours published another treatise, Contre la constitution impie des Gallicans appelée Pragmatique. In 1487 the bishop of Autun published some papal bulls without having them officially registered and invited the clergy and faithful to obey them. Two years later, the bishop of Luçon refused to have certain briefs revoked; in 1491 the bishop of Beauvais placed a papal interdict on the lands of the priests belonging to the Archdiocese of Narbonne. Others accepted mandates from delegated judges, general collectors of tithes. After the Council of Trent, the bishops came into conflict with statesmen. The conviction that further entreaties were useless led the bishops to distinguish between the role of a prince and the duties of the episcopate. It was, then, the struggle precipitated in France by the introduction of the Tridentine reforms that allowed for the acceptance of the “separating of powers:” the religious power, the guide of consciences, whose domain is the supernatural; and the civil power, engaged mainly with temporal affairs and endowed with physical force to put its will into effect.

Royal Gallicanism. After the appearance of the Pragmatic Sanction, the king sought much less to keep aloof from the pope than to negotiate with him; but the royal motivation was more self-interest than religion. In 1442 Charles VII agreed to renounce the Pragmatic and to conclude a concordat with Pope Eugene IV. Negotiations broke down, but reopened in 1449. King Louis XI made known to Pope Pius II his intention of abrogating the Pragmatic (1461) and proclaimed its abrogation in 1462. But the ordinances issued in 1463 and 1466 nullified the significance of this spectacular act. After Louis XI came to an understanding with Pope Sixtus IV (1472), a concordat, which remained in force for three years, provided that major benefices should be at the king’s disposal, while minor benefices should be conferred by the pope in the uneven months and by the king in the even months. After 1475 the king avoided the strict application of the Pragmatic and allowed electors to select their own candidates. After a new attempt at a concordat (1485), King Francis I and Pope Leo X signed at Bologna in 1516 a concordat that was observed until 1790. This concordat put an end to the Pragmatic, which had been praised as “the palladium of national liberties.” The concordat granted the king in perpetuity the unique privilege of naming to consistorial benefices but said nothing about the papal right to collect annates. Later papal demands that the Tridentine decrees be received officially in France went unheeded. The kings could no doubt have overcome the obstinacy of the parlements. It was not fear of excessive papal power that deterred them but rather the fear of being deprived of the privilege of COMMENDATION. The Blois ordinance (1579) tried to introduce a part of the Tridentine reform into French legislation but Pope Gregory XIII could not allow France once again to legislate as in 1438.

Pithou. Pierre PITHOU, a lawyer in the Paris parlement, published in 1594 a 54-page treatise (Les Libertés de l'Église gallicane) that had astounding success well into the 19th century. This booklet was divided into 83 articles. This catalogue of propositions, arranged to attract French readers, was doubtless less logical than was claimed in article three where the author affirmed that all the following liberties stemmed from two maxims only: "The first is that the popes can neither command nor ordain anything, be it general or particular, that bears on the temporal affairs of countries or lands under obedience to the Most Christian King, and should they command or decree any such thing, the subjects of the king, even though they be clerics, are therefore not bound to obey" (art. 4); "The second, although the pope is recognized as sovereign in spiritual matters, nevertheless absolute and infinite power has no place in France, but is restricted and limited by the canons and rules of the ancient councils of the Church accepted in this kingdom" (art. 5). To exemplify these maxims Pithou continued: "The prelates of France may not leave the kingdom without his majesty's permission" (art. 13). "The king's officers cannot be excommunicated for the exercise of their duties" (art. 16). "The bull In coena Domini is not accepted in France" (art. 17). "The Church of France does not accept all the decretals" (art. 41).

Pierre Dupuy (1582–1651), state counselor and curator of the royal library, republished Pithou's book as part of Traitez des droits et libertés de l'Église gallicane, and commented on it in Preuves des Libertés de l'Église gallicane. These two works appeared in 1639; a second edition came out in 1651. Jean Louis Brunet (1688–1747), a lawyer in the Paris parlement, added considerably to these two books in 1731. Pierre Toussaint Durand de Maillane (1729–1814), lawyer in the Aix-en-Provence parlement, organized the material accumulated by Dupuy and Brunet and called his compilation, increased by new commentaries, Les Libertés de l'Église gallicane prouvées et commentées suivant l'ordre et la disposition des articles dressés par M. Pierre Pithou (5 v. Lyon 1771). It was a summary of Parliamentary Gallicanism with all its excesses. No work could give a clearer and more complete idea of this teaching. Without being guilty of rash judgment, one could apply to it what the French bishops said in 1639 of Dupuy's two volumes: "a hateful work, full of the most venomous propositions and presenting formal heresies under the fair name of freedoms Never has the Christian faith, the Catholic Church, ecclesiastical discipline, the safety of the kingdom been attacked by more pernicious doctrines." In the same tone, but with a touch of humor, Claude FLEURY, a canonist and a moderate Gallican, observed in his Discours sur les libertés de l'Église gallicane (1723): "Any bad Frenchman, who could flee to safety outside France, could write a Traité des servitudes de l'Église gallicane, as has already been done in regard to its liberties, and he need not lack for proofs."

Declaration of 1682. At the meeting of the Estates General (1615) the clergy rejected the first maxim of Parliamentary Gallicanism, that of the absolute independence of the king in relation to the pope in temporal affairs. A meeting of the Assembly of French Clergy (see ASSEMBLIES OF FRENCH CLERGY) some months later accepted decrees of the Council of Trent. These two important decisions did not imply that the French clergy, with the bishops at their head, had ceased to defend the Gallican liberties. If such was the intent, repentance was made in 1682. Victor Martin has devoted an entire book, Le Gallicanisme politique et le clergé de France (1929), to explaining how this reversal came about. Nevertheless, the declaration of 1615 at the Estates General pertained only to the first of the four articles of 1682.

The declaration of March 19, 1682, the manifesto of episcopal Gallicanism, was approved by an extraordinary meeting of the Assembly of the French Clergy. King LOUIS XIV permitted this reunion of 52 bishops and priests to settle the affair of the REGALIA and to condemn a book. The Second General Council of Lyons (1274) had tolerated the continuance of the regalia in the dioceses in which it already existed, but forbade bishops, under pain of excommunication, to permit it to be introduced into dioceses in which it did not already exist. Louis XIV wished to extend the regalia throughout his kingdom (1673–75). It might seem that the king, as a good Gallican, would want to obey the prescriptions of a general council, but this would confuse royal Gallicanism, which had little concern for doctrine, with the Gallicanism of the theologians. Royal Gallicanism had only to accept the principles of Parliamentary Gallicanism as established by Dupuy, which held that the canons and decrees subsequent to the 9th century were not obligatory. In any event, two French bishops took their stand on the Second Council of Lyons and opposed Louis XIV. Pope INNOCENT XI approved them. After the death of these two bishops, the conflict between the French court and the Holy See still perdured in 1681.

The condemnation of a book by Jean Gerbais, Disseratio de causis majoribus ad caput concordatorum (1679), did not improve matters. A brief of Innocent XI (Dec. 18, 1680) reproved the book's contents as "schismatic, suspect of heresy, and injurious to the Holy See." Gerbais had written his book at the request of the 1665 Assembly of the Clergy, and in it he defended some of the ideas cherished by episcopal Gallicanism, namely, that bishops have the right to judge matters relative to faith and also to judge, as courts of first instance, their fellow bishops.

The extraordinary assembly of 1681–82 believed that it could contribute to the reestablishment of peace between the king and the pope by determining clearly the respective powers of popes, kings, and bishops. J. B. BOSSUET, Bishop of Meaux, was charged with drafting a declaration in Latin. The preamble demonstrated the conciliatory purposes of the document, which sought to avoid the excesses of those who were attacking the decrees and liberties of the Gallican Church (i.e., the ultramontanists) and also the excesses of those who magnified these liberties even to the point of casting aspersions on the PRIMACY OF THE POPE and the obedience due to the Holy See by all Christians. The essentials of the first article have been noted above. The second article admitted the papal plenitude of power and also accepted as permanently valid the decrees of the fourth and fifth sessions of the Council of Constance regarding the superiority of ecumenical councils over popes. The third article insisted that the papal power must be exercised in conformity with the ancient canons and with the customs of the Gallican Church. The fourth article admitted that in decisions on matters of faith the pope enjoys the principal role but claimed that his judgments are not irreformable without the consent of the universal Church (see DECLARATION OF THE FRENCH CLERGY).

Louis XIV was pleased to accept this declaration and issued an edict (March 1682) that enjoined the professors of theology to subscribe to it and to teach it each year, and required bishops to make known its contents in their dioceses. Once the king had won the clergy to his side, he believed that Innocent XI would finally yield to his wishes, but he was mistaken. A new conflict, which began because of other royal demands relative to the quarters of the French embassy in Rome, aggravated the situation. Innocent XI continued to refuse to confirm the bishops whom Louis XIV proposed to him. As a result there were 35 dioceses vacant in France in 1689 when Innocent XI died.

In 1690 Pope Alexander VIII condemned the declaration of 1682 (see below). In a letter to Innocent XII (Sept. 14, 1693), Louis XIV denounced his own edict of March 1682. The declaration could have been condemned much sooner, in accord with its own principles, if foreign bishops had followed the example given them in 1682 by the primate of Hungary. Bossuet sensed the danger and composed between 1683 and 1685 an extensive defense in Latin: Defensio declarationis cleri gallicani, which did not appear in print until 1745. Despite the withdrawal of Louis XIV's edict, the declaration of 1682 continued to be widely taught in France during the 18th century. In 1772 Jacques ÉMERY wrote: "To avoid the least suspicion of ultramontanism, we add that we adhere fully to the maxims of the French clergy contained in the declaration of 1682. We consider this declaration to be a precious monument, valuable even to the Holy See, which we do not doubt will one day recognize its wisdom" (cited by J. Leflon, Monsieur Emery [Paris 1947] 2:302).

Last Manifestations. In the 18th century, royal and episcopal Gallicanism became circumspect. Thus the king himself forbade (1720, 1730) his subjects to bring the topic of an APPEAL TO A FUTURE COUNCIL. Parliamentary Gallicanism, on the other hand, became more and more violent and repeatedly had recourse to the appeal from an abuse (appel comme d'abus). Theological Gallicanism was divided. There were moderates, who sided with the bishops, and Jansenists, who made common cause with the Gallicans of the parlements. In JANSENISM could be found something of Presbyterianism, parochialism, and even of LAICISM, as well as of Gallicanism. Gallicanism died with the CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY (1790), which broke the bond between the king and his clergy. The situation then was far different from that under the Pragmatic Sanction. After the parlements had discredited Gallicanism, they were themselves abolished during the French Revolution. J. E. M. Portalis, who thought he could conciliate his admiration for the declaration of 1682 with the decisions of the 18th-century parlements, tried to revive the liberties of the Gallican Church by adding 77 Organic Articles to the 17 articles of the French CONCORDAT OF 1801. This, however, was merely one of the means of controlling the Church open to Napoleon. Furthermore, nothing was more contrary to episcopal Gallicanism than the resignation of the entire French hierarchy in obedience to the demand of PIUS VII. Associated as it was with Bossuet's name, the declaration of 1682 continued to have admirers. Between 1824 and 1860, A. Dupin published five editions of Pithou's book; but his Manuel du droit public ecclésiastique française, which contained Pithou's work, was condemned by the majority of French bishops, even by those who were Gallicans; it was also placed on the Index (1845). Between 1845 and 1865 the French clergy withdrew their attachment to Gallicanism and adhered in great numbers to ultramontanism. Henri MARET tried to conciliate Gallicanism with LIBERALISM in his book, Du concise général et de la paix religieuse (1869). After the complete separation of Church and State in France (1905), the upholders of laicism, although indifferent to the Catholic Church or hostile to it, regretted more than the Catholics themselves the abrogation of the concordat of 1801 and its attached Organic Articles.

Papal Condemnations. The papal condemnations of the appel comme d'abus, the appeal to a future council, the exequatur, and the placet also affected Gallicanism. When Leo X promulgated the concordat of 1516 with the bull Pastor aeternus (1516), he also attacked Gallican conciliarism (Enchiridion symbolorum 740). Alexander VIII's constitution Inter multiplices (1690) decreed the Four Gallican Articles void (Enchiridion symbolorum 1322–26). Pius VI renewed Alexander VIII's condemnation in his constitution AUCTOREM FIDEI (1794) against the Synod of Pistoia, which had, among other things, adopted Gallicanism (Enchiridion symbolorum 1599). The SYLLABUS OF ERRORS (1864) included an attack on Gallicanism. The solemn definitions of the papal primacy and infallibility at VATICAN COUNCIL I (1870) rendered impossible any revival of the old Gallican claims, which were by then a faded memory.

Bibliography: V. MARTIN, Les Origines du gallicanisme, 2 v. (Paris 1939); Le Gallicanisme et la réforme catholique: Essai historique sur l'introduction en France des décrets du Concile de Trente, 1563–1615 (Paris 1919); Le Gallicanisme politique et le clergé de France, 1615–1682 (Paris 1929). J. LECLER, "Qu'est-ce que les libertés de l'Église gallicane?" Recherches de science religieuse 23 (1933) 385–410, 542–568; 24 (1934) 47–85. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935–) v. 7–21, esp. 7, 14, 15, 18–21. P. IMBART DE LA TOUR, Les Origines de la Réforme v. 2, ed. Y. LANHERS (2d ed. Melun 1944) 73–125. G. MOLLAT, "Les Origines du gallicanisme parlementaire aux XIV^e et XV^e siècles," Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 43 (1948) 90–147. A. G. MARTIMORT, Le Gallicanisme de Bossuet (Paris 1953). J. R. PALANQUE, Catholiques libéraux et gallicans en France face au concile du Vatican, 1867–1870 (Aix-en-Provence 1962). R. THYSMAN, "Le Gallicanisme de Mgr. Maret et l'influence de Bossuet," Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 52 (1957) 401–465. L. BÉRARD, "Séparation, gallicanisme et concordat," Revue des deux mondes (July–August 1957) 193–216. E. PUYOL, Edmond Richer. Etude historique et critique sur la renouation du Gallicanisme au commencement du XVII^e siècle (Paris 1876). M. VÉNARD, "Ultramontane or Gallican? The French Episcopate at the End of the Sixteenth Century," Jurist 52 (1992), 142–161. P. BLET, Les assemblées du Clergé et Louis XIV, de 1670 à 1693 (Rome 1972). R. DUCHON, "De Bossuet à Febronius," Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 65 (1970) 375–422. J. M. GRES-GAYER, Le Gallicanisme de Sorbonne (Paris 2001). W. J. BOUSWISMA, "Gallicanism and the Nature of Christendom," A Usable Past: Essays in European Cultural History (Berkeley) 308–324. H. G. RULE, "Louis XIV and the Church," Louis XIV and the Craft of Kingship, ed. J. C. RULE (Ohio 1969) 240–263. P. SONNINO, Louis XIV's View of the Papacy (Berkeley 1966). P. BLET, Le clergé de France en ses assemblées (1615–1717) (Paris 1995). M. DUBRUEL and H. X. ARQUILLIÈRE, Dictionnaire apologétique de la foi catholique, ed. A. D'ALÈS, 4 v. (Paris 1911–22; Table analytique 1931) 2:193–273. M. DUBRUEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 6.1:1096–1157. C. CONSTANTIN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 4.1:185–205, s.v. "Déclaration de 1682." R. LAPRAT, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 6:426–525, s.v. "Libertés de l'Église gallicane."

[C. BERTHELOT DU CHESNAY/J. M. GRES-GAYER]

GALLIENUS, ROMAN EMPEROR

Emperor 253 to 268; b. Publius Licinius Egnatius Gallienus, c. 218; d. Milan, Aug.(?) 268. His mother was Gnatia Mariniana. In 253, when his father, P. Licinius Valerianus, became emperor, Gallienus was named Augustus and given the West to defend. In successful campaigns along the Rhine, he saved Gaul from the attacks of Germanic tribes, and in 258 at Milan checked an invasion of Italy by the Alamanni. On the death of his father VALERIAN, in 259 or 260, the defense of the Empire, complicated by numerous rebellions among his generals, fell upon Gallienus. In 267 he gained a brilliant victory over the Heruli, who were ravaging Greece, and returned to Italy to check the revolt of Aureolus. He was murdered by his officers during the siege of Milan in July or August 268. Gallienus introduced a number of important political, military, and religious reforms; excluded senators from military commands; and created an independent cavalry corps with its base at Milan. In 260 he issued edicts that ended the persecution of the Christians, recognized their bishops and restored their churches and cemeteries (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 7.13). His tolerance followed a realization of the failure of his father's policy and reflected the influence of his wife, Salonina, who had a high esteem for Christians. This was the first Roman declaration of tolerance for Christians. Though later tradition made a tyrant of Gallienus, he was a man of high culture and boundless energy, keenly aware of the essential needs of his times. Many of his political reforms anticipated those of Diocletian.

Bibliography: U. WICKERT, Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. 13.1 (Stuttgart 1926) 350–369. G. M. BERSANETTI, Enciclopedia Italiana di scienze, lettere ed arti. 36 v. (Rome 1929–39) 16:326–327.

[M. J. COSTELLOE]

GALLIFET, JOSEPH FRANÇOIS DE

Theologian; b. Aix, France, May 3, 1663; d. Lyons, Aug. 31, 1749. He entered the Society of Jesus at Avignon in 1678. He had as spiritual director Bl. Claude la Colombière, who first taught him devotion to the Sacred Heart. As a young priest during his third year of probation at Lyons (1690), he fell critically ill. As he lay near death, one of his brethren, probably Jean Croiset, another early promoter of the devotion, made a vow in his name that should he live, Gallifet would spend his life in promoting this devotion. He recovered fully, ratified the vow, and devoted all his activities to fulfilling it. Gallifet held important positions: he was rector at Vesoul, Lyons, Grenoble, and Besançon; provincial (1719–23) and French assistant to the superior general in Rome (1723–30). He built chapels of the Sacred Heart, wrote several books, and established more than 700 confraternities of the Sacred Heart in his lifetime. He is best known for his efforts in Rome to obtain approval for the public cult and establishment of a liturgical feast of the Sacred Heart. As promoter of the cause before the Congregation of Rites, he composed the De cultu sacrosancti Cordis Dei ac Domini nostri Jesu Christi (1726), a Latin theological treatise with the autobiography of St. Margaret Mary ALACOQUE appended, later revised and published in French as De l'Excellence de la dévotion au Coeur adorable de Jésus-Christ (1733). Its weakness, which contributed to the negative reply of the Congregation of Rites, was the explanation of the heart as seat of the emotions. Final victory came only after his death with the establishment of the feast in 1765.

Bibliography: P. MECH, Catholicisme 4:1739–40. P. BERNARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 6.1:1137–40. C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 3:1124–31. A. HAMON, Histoire de la dévotion au Sacré-Coeur, 5 v. (Paris 1923–41) 4:5–31.

[C. J. MOELL]

GALLITZIN, AMALIA

Leader of the Münster circle in the German Catholic revival; b. Berlin, Aug. 28, 1748; d. Münster, April 27, 1806. Adelheid Amalia, Countess von Schmettau, the daughter of the Prussian Count von Schmettau, was baptized a Catholic but was raised in an atmosphere of religious indifference. In 1768 she married the Russian Prince Dimitri Gallitzin, from whom she separated (1775) after bearing two children. With the encouragement of Franz Hemsterhuis, the Dutch philosopher, she settled in Münster (1779), retired from high society, and devoted herself to study. She and Franz von FÜRSTENBERG established the Münster circle, which discussed philosophy, pedagogy, and Christian perfection and maintained a fruitful intellectual exchange with Catholic groups in southern Germany. Its members included Johann HAMANN, Friedrich von STOLBERG, Clemens von DROSTE ZU VISCHERING, and Bernard OVERBERG. Through the influence of Overberg (much more than that of Hamann), Princess Gallitzin ceased to be a disciple of the French ENLIGHTENMENT, returned to Catholicism (c. 1786), and became an active promoter of Catholic life in Westphalia. Later she became an intimate friend of GOETHE. Her son Demetrius GALLITZIN was a missionary in Maryland and Pennsylvania.

Head of Gallienus from Museo delle Terme, Rome. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

Bibliography: S. SUDHOF, ed., Der Kreis von Münster: Briefe und Aufzeichnungen Fürstenbergs, der Fürstin Gallitzin und ihrer Freunde (Münster 1962–64) 1:1769–88, in process. J. GALLAND, Die Fürstin Amalia von Gallitzin und ihre Freunde (Cologne 1880). P. BRACHIN, Le Cercle de Münster (1779–1806) et la pensée religieuse de F. L. von Stolberg (Lyons 1952). E. REINHARD, Die Münsterische "Familia sacra" (Münster 1953). W. H. BRUFORD, Fürstin Gallitzin und Goethe (Cologne 1957).

[A SCHRÖER]

GALLITZIN, DEMETRIUS AUGUSTINE

Pioneer missionary; b. The Hague, Holland, Dec. 22, 1770; d. Loretto, Pa., May 6, 1840. He was the son of the Russian Prince Demetrius, a scientist, and Countess Amalia Gallitzin, daughter of a Prussian field marshal. Although his mother had been baptized a Roman Catholic, she had lost interest in her religion before the birth of her son. Soon after his birth, the parents separated and Demetrius was raised in the Orthodox Church of his father. His mother, after a critical illness in 1786, returned to the Roman Catholic Church, and young Demetrius followed her the next year. He completed his education and served for a time as aide-de-camp to the Austrian general Von Lillien. Instead of making the customary grand tour of Europe, Gallitzin was sent by his mother on a trip to the U.S.

His arrival in Baltimore, Md., on Oct. 28, 1792, was a turning point in his life. He presented himself to Abp. John CARROLL, asking to be admitted to the seminary. On March 18, 1795, he was ordained—the first priest to receive all his training and orders in the U.S. He first served the mission stations of Port Tobacco, Md., and Conewago, Pa., and the German community in Baltimore. However, like many of his contemporaries, he desired to go to the West. On a trip to the Allegheny Mountains in 1796, he visited Capt. Michael McGuire's settlement in Cambria County, Pa. The captain offered him a tract of land if he would settle in the area, but it was several years before Gallitzin obtained the permission from his bishop. He built a church at what came to be known as Loretto, Pa., and celebrated Mass there on Christmas Day, 1799. Wishing to create an ideal Catholic frontier settlement, Gallitzin encouraged migration by purchasing land and offering it to settlers at a low cost. His early years at Loretto were stormy, for his masterful personality and strict moral standards antagonized the local settlers. In the beginning he supported his activities with money received from his father during the latter's lifetime. When he inherited little of his father's estate, he sought funds by a public appeal for aid in 1827.

Gallitzin declined several episcopal appointments in order to direct his colonization project. He eventually became vicar-general for Western Pennsylvania. Although his "ideal" community subsequently disappeared, the strong Catholicism he established in Cambria County is reflected in that area's present heavily Catholic population.

Bibliography: P. H. LEMCKE, Life and Work of Prince Demetrius Augustine Gallitzin, tr. J. C. PLUMPE (New York 1940). G. MURPHY, Gallitzin's Letters: A Collection of Polemical Works . . .

(Loretto, Pa. 1940). D. SARGENT, Mitri, or the Story of Prince Demetrius Augustine Gallitzin, 1770–1840 (New York 1945).

[T. V. HARTZEL]

GALLO, ANDRÉS MARÍA

Colombian patriot; b. Tuta, Boyacá, Colombia, Feb. 2, 1791; d. Bogotá, April 14, 1863. He studied in Tunja and Bogotá and graduated in law, Oct. 4, 1815. During the war for independence he served in the republican army, rising from captain to commander of a unit, but after his brief army career he had returned to the university. Gallo was an alcalde in Tunja when the royalist forces regained power in 1816 and condemned him to death for his republican activities. That sentence was canceled. He served as a member of the court of justice and of the legislature in Tunja and as representative from Tunja in the federal congress. He received a doctorate in theology from the University of Santo Tomás in 1818 and was ordained April 25 that same year. As pastor of Ramiriquí he helped provide supplies for Bolívar's troops; he was named chaplain of the military staff and was active in the battle of Pantano de Vargas (July 25, 1819). Later he served as pastor of Viracachá, Firavitoba, Genesano, Guatavita, and Tenza. At various times he served as representative and as senator in the congress. Three times he was proposed for a bishopric: for Pasto, Cartagena, and Pamplona; however, he did not accept a see. In 1856 he was canon of the cathedral of Bogotá, and in 1859 he became vicar-general of the archdiocese. In that position he defended the rights of the Church against the dictator Gen. Tomás C. de Mosquera, while Abp. Antonio Herrán was in exile. Gallo had a reputation as a preacher and often preached on patriotic themes. By keeping up his political activities he became vice president of the senate, but he also acquired many political enemies. He was interested in promoting education in Colombia. He left his memoirs: Reminiscencias del Canónigo doctor Andrés M. Gallo.

Bibliography: J. ACOSTA ORTEGÓN, "El doctor Andrés María Gallo y su época," Boletín de historia y antigüedades 33 (1946) 477–505.

[J. M. PACHECO]

GALLO, MARIA FRANCESCA OF THE FIVE WOUNDS, ST.

Italian mystic; b. Naples, March 25, 1715; d. there, Oct. 8, 1791. At a very early age she began to practice penances and to meditate on Christ's Passion. After resisting her father's urging to marry, she joined the Third Order of Franciscans (1731) and changed her baptismal name, Anna Maria Rosa Nicoletta. Continuing to live at home, she devoted herself to charitable works for the poor and sick. She was favored with extraordinary mystical graces and was reputed to be endowed with the gift of prophecy. On Fridays, especially, she experienced in a physical manner the agonies of the Passion and STIGMATIZATION. Her deep devotion to the suffering Christ and to the Eucharist helped her to endure severe illnesses, misunderstandings by her relatives and by her spiritual directors, and spiritual aridity. She was beatified Nov. 12, 1843, and canonized June 29, 1867.

Feast: Oct. 6.

Bibliography: M. P. ADAMI, S. Maria Francesca delle cinque piaghe di N. S. (Naples 1970). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints 4:46–47. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, by the Benedictines of Paris 10:177–182.

[F. G. SOTTOCORNOLA]

GALLUP, DIOCESE OF

Established Dec. 16, 1939, the Diocese of Gallup (Gallupensis) is suffragan of the Metropolitan See of Santa Fe, N.M. It embraces 55,468 square miles of northwestern New Mexico and northern half of the state of Arizona, including the Navajo and Hopi Reservations, with a 15 percent Catholic population. The diocese included a larger Native American population than any other diocese in the U.S.

History. The region, proclaimed “the new kingdom of St. Francis” in 1539 by the Franciscan friar Marcos de Niza, is the home of the Pueblo people of Acoma, Laguna, Zuñi, and other villages, the Jicarilla Apaches, located in New Mexico; the Whiteriver Apaches, the Havasupais, Hualapais, and Mohaves; the Pueblo people of the three Hopi Mesas in Arizona; and the Navajos whose reservation extends over 25,000 square miles in both New Mexico and Arizona. When the diocese was established in 1939 it had a population of about 50,000 Native Americans. There were 30,000 Catholics in 1939, including 23,000 Hispanic Americans, 6,000 Caucasian Americans and 1,000 Native Americans.

The first bishop, Bernard T. Espelage, O.F.M., of the Province of St. John the Baptist, Cincinnati, Ohio, was consecrated Oct. 9, 1940. He was succeeded by Jerome J. Hastrich, Auxiliary bishop of Madison, who was installed as second bishop on Dec. 3, 1969. The third bishop, Donald E. Pelotte, S.S.S., Ph.D., of the Congregation of the Blessed Sacrament of Cleveland, Ohio, and a Native American, was appointed coadjutor bishop of Gallup on Feb. 24, 1986, and succeeded to the see on March 20, 1990. The diocese’s 56 parishes and 35 missions are served by 91 diocesan and religious priests, 26 permanent deacons, 13 religious brothers, and 139 religious sisters. The prominent Romanesque cathedral of the Sacred Heart is visible from all highways entering the city of Gallup.

Bibliography: O. FELLIN, Yahweh, the Voice that Beautifies the Land: A Brief Historical View of the Diocese of Gallup, New Mexico (Gallup, NM 1976).

[E. TROCKUR/A. ESPELAGE]

GALLUPPI, PASQUALE

Italian philosopher; b. Tropea, Calabria, April 2, 1770; d. Naples, Dec. 13, 1846. His fame as a philosopher went beyond the confines of the kingdom of Naples and Italy; he was known by E. B. de CONDILLAC, A. ROSMINI-SERBATI, V. COUSIN, and W. HAMILTON, among others. In 1831 he gained the professorial chair of logic and metaphysics at the University of Naples. The French Academy of Sciences named him “corresponding socius” and Louis Philippe granted him the Cross of the Legion of Honor.

For Galluppi, immediate consciousness of oneself is the first truth that necessarily serves as the first principle. The perception of myself, through its modifications, grasps what is outside of me. Upon this is focused the activity of the mind, which decomposes and then recomposes its elements “in analysis and synthesis, that is, in the faculties which isolate and decompose perceptions, and in that which unites and composes them” [Saggio filosofico sulla critica della conoscenza, six v. (Naples 1819–23) 1:2.10]. Judgment is distinct from feeling; analysis and synthesis are the basis for every universal judgment.

Along with KANT, he accepts a priori practical synthetic judgments as precepts without which it is “impossible to establish the morality of actions” [Filosofia della volontà, four v. (Naples 1832–40) 4:147]. He criticizes any form of EUDAEMONISM or Utilitarianism as a morality not based upon disinterested action, the sole guarantee of all public and private virtue. Virtue is not a means, but an aim: “the consciousness of having practiced it should be a pure pleasure distinct from, and independent of, the pleasure resulting from the reward” [Elementi di filosofia, six v. (Messina 1820–27) 5:37]. Nevertheless, Galluppi maintains that the useful can accompany duty, as long as the former is subordinated to the latter.

Bibliography: G. DI NAPOLI, Enciclopedia filosofica 2:576–581; La filosofia di Pasquale Galluppi (Padua 1947).

[M. F. SCIACCA]

GALTIER, PAUL

Theologian; b. Jouanesq (Aveyron), France, Feb. 9, 1872; d. Rome, Jan. 20, 1961. He entered the Jesuits in 1892 and was ordained in 1904. He taught dogmatic theology at Enghien, Belgium (1907–38), and at the Gregorian University, Rome (1939–57). Galtier contributed greatly to the understanding of the divine indwelling. In explaining this mystery he did not admit a special relation of the just to each person of the Trinity [De SS. Trinitate in se et in nobis (Paris 1953), L'Habitation en nous des trois personnes (Paris 1950), Le Saint Esprit en nous d'après des Pères grecs (Paris 1946)]. In Christology, the most original aspects of his doctrine are the conception of Christ the Redeemer as the end of creation, and the explanation (much disputed later) of the unity between the divine and human conscience of Christ by means of the beatific vision [De incarnatione et redemptione (Paris 1947), Les deux Adam (Paris 1947), L'Unité du Christ: Être, personne, conscience (Paris 1939)]. Galtier's research was especially esteemed in the history of Christian penance. He demonstrated in a very convincing manner that the Church of the Fathers reconciled sinners and attributed to this act a value analogous to that of Baptism, i.e., the remission of sins [De paenitentia tractatus dogmatico-historicus (Rome 1957), L'Église et la rémission de péchés aux premiers siècles (Paris 1932), Aux Origines du sacrement de pénitence (Rome 1951)].

Bibliography: G. JACQUEMET, Catholicisme 4:1742–43. Liber annualis Pontificiae Universitatis Gregorianae (Rome 1962) 103–107.

[Z. ALSZEGHY]

GALUPPI, BALDASSARE

Early classical composer of church music and opera; b. Burano Island, near Venice (hence his nickname Il Buranello), Oct. 18, 1706; d. Venice, Jan. 3, 1785. His father, a barber and theater orchestra violinist, provided his first music training. After Galuppi's first opera failed in 1722, Benedetto MARCELLO arranged for him to study composition with Antonio Lotti, and this resulted in a steady flow of commissions (112 operas in all). In 1748 he was named vice chapelmaster at St. Mark's, Venice, becoming first chapelmaster in 1762. He was invited to Russia by Catherine the Great, and he spent three years there (1765–68), composing and producing operas, teaching (Bortniansky was a pupil), and serving as the Czarina's adviser on music. By 1773 he had stopped composing operas in favor of oratorios (27) and church music. His sacred works (very few of which have been published) were projected in both an austere A CAPPELLA style and in a contemporary style like that of his operas, in which the solo parts are filled with elaborate coloratura passages and the role of the large orchestra is quite important. A gifted harpsichordist, Galuppi also wrote 51 keyboard sonatas, as well as a number of concerti.

Bibliography: No complete modern ed. of his music, but selected arias, sonatas, and Masses have been transcribed. A. DELLA CORTE, Baldassare Galuppi (Quaderni dell'Accademia Chigiana 18; Siena 1948). W. BOLLERT, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 4:1342–48. E. BLOM, Stepchildren of Music (London 1925). Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, ed. N. SLONIMSKY (5th, rev. ed. New York 1958) 532–533. R. EITNER, Quellen-Lexikon der Musiker und Musikgelehrten, 10 v. [Leipzig 1900–04; New York n.d. (1947)] 4:138–141. JAMES L. JACKMAN, "Baldassare Galuppi" in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, v. 7, ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980) 134–138. D. MONSON, "Baldassare Galuppi" in International Dictionary of Opera, 2 v., ed. C. S. LARUE (Detroit 1993) 483–486. T. MURARO and F. ROSSI, eds., Galuppiana 1985: Studi e ricerche atti del Convegno Internazionale (Venezia, 28–30 ottobre 1985) (Florence 1986). N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (New York 1992) 596–597. R. WIESEND, Studien zur opera seria von Baldassare Galuppi (Tutzing 1981).

[R. STEINER]

GALVÁN BERMÚDEZ, DAVID, ST.

Martyr, priest; b. Jan. 29, 1881, Guadalajara, Jalisco, Mexico; d. there, Jan. 30, 1915. Entered Guadalajara's seminary at age 14, but he became disillusioned. A year later he returned a new man. Even before his ordination (1909) he taught at Guadalajara's seminary and continued thereafter. He was arrested, but later released, during the Carrancista revolution for being a priest. Because of his great love for the poor and for workers, he organized a workers union. Defender of the sanctity of marriage, he helped a young woman pursued by a married soldier by pretending to be her spouse. This act earned him the enmity of his executioner. He and Araiza were arrested as they ministered to wounded soldiers (Jan. 30, 1915) following a confrontation between Pancho Villa's supporters and the Carrancistas. Lieutenant Colonel Enrique Vera ordered them shot. Fr. Galván was both beatified (Nov. 22, 1992) and canonized (May 21, 2000) with Cristobal MAGALLANES [see GUADALAJARA (MEXICO), MARTYRS OF, SS.] by Pope John Paul II.

Feast: May 25 (Mexico).

Bibliography: J. CARDOSO, Los mártires mexicanos (Mexico City 1953). R. HAROLLAMAS, El padre Galván: una vida sacerdotal en el marco histórico de su tiempo (Guadalajara, Jalisco 1977).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GALVÃO DE FRANÇA, ANTÔNIO DE SANT'ANA, BL.

Franciscan priest; founder; b. 1739, Guaratinguetá, São Paulo, Brazil; d. Dec. 23, 1822, São Paulo. Antonio's socially prominent, devout father encouraged his son's religious vocation by sending him to study at the Jesuit seminary of Belém (1752–56). Eventually, Antonio entered the novitiate of the Alcantarine Franciscans at Macacu near Rio de Janeiro (1760), professed his solemn vows (1761), and was ordained priest (1762). Upon completing his studies (1768), he was appointed porter at St. Francis Friary in São Paulo and engaged in priestly ministry. While serving as chaplain to the Recollects of St. Teresa (1769–70), Father Galvão met the mystic Sister Helena Maria Espirito Santo. With her he founded the convent of Our Lady of the Conception of the Divine Providence in 1774, a women's religious community that initially required no vows. Following Helena's death (1775), he continued to nurture the community—the Recolhimento de Nossa Senhora da Luz (Recollects of Our Lady of Light)—by writing its rule, ensuring the completion of its convent and church (dedicated in 1802), and guiding its incorporation into the Order of the Immaculate Conception (1929). In addition to this work, Galvão served as novice master in Macacu (1781), guardian of St. Francis Friary in São Paulo (1798, 1801), definitor (1802), visitator general, and chapter president (1808); he founded St. Clara Friary in Sorocaba (1811). Above all, he responded to his religious vocation by caring for the poor, sick, afflicted, and enslaved. In his declining years the priest lived at the Recolhimento da Luz, where his mortal remains are enshrined in its church. On March 8, 1997, he was declared venerable. He became the first native Brazilian beatus when he was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Oct. 25, 1998.

Feast: Oct. 25.

Bibliography: C. E. MARCONDES DE MOURA, Os Galvao de França no povoamento de Santo Antonio de Guaratinguetá (Sao Paulo 1993). V. WILLEKE, Franciscanos na história do Brasil (Petrópolis, Brazil 1977). L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed., no. 43 (1998): 3.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GALVIN, EDWARD J.

Bishop, founder of the COLUMBAN FATHERS; b. Crookstown, County Cork, Ireland, Nov. 23, 1882; d. Navan, Ireland, Feb. 23, 1956. One of nine children of John and Mary (Lorden) Galvin, he entered St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, and was ordained in 1909. He went to Brooklyn, N.Y., where he was a curate in Holy Rosary parish for three years. When he learned of vast missionary opportunities in China, he volunteered his services there. After landing in Shanghai (April 1912) he worked with the French Vincentians. When French priests were ordered home to be drafted into the army upon the outbreak of World War I (1914), Galvin wrote to Ireland for volunteers. In 1915 two Irish priests joined him. In the following year he returned to Ireland seeking further recruits. The result was the foundation of St. Columban's Foreign Mission Society in 1916, with the approval of the Irish hierarchy and the blessing of Pope Benedict XV. The first house was opened at Delgan Park, Galway (January 1918). Recruits from the U.S. soon joined, and the first American house was started in Omaha, Nebr. (1918). When the Holy See assigned the Columban Fathers mission territory in Hanyang, Hupeh Province, China, 600 miles from the mouth of the Yangtze River, Galvin went there with two colleagues (1920). During 1920 they were joined by 15 more priests. Some Sisters of Loretto from the U.S. soon arrived to help. In Hanyang Galvin became prefect apostolic (1924), vicar apostolic (1927), and first head of the see when it became a diocese (1946). Hanyang was the scene of much misery because of the frequent air raids and the capture of the city by the Japanese in 1938. By 1949 Communists gained control of the area, and the bishop was left with six priests to care for the 50,000 Catholics of the diocese. After a house arrest lasting three years and frequent interrogations, Bishop Galvin was tried and was expelled from China (Sept. 15, 1952). He spent the following year visiting Columban houses in the U.S., and then he returned to Ireland, where he died of leukemia.

Bibliography: R. T. REILLY, Christ's Exile: Life of Bishop Edward J. Galvin (Dublin 1958). P. CROSBIE, March Till They Die (Westminster, Md. 1956). E. FISCHER, Journeys Not Regretted: The Columban Fathers' Sixty-Five Years in the Far East (New York 1986). J. MCCASLIN, The Spirituality of Our Founders: A Study of the Early Columban Fathers (1986).

[E. MCDERMOTT]

GAMALIEL

Name of six Palestinian rabbis of the early Christian centuries, all of them descendants of Hillel; the most important among these rabbis are the following.

Gamaliel I or the Elder, active in Jerusalem from c. A.D. 20 to c. 50. According to Josephus (Life 38.190–191), Gamaliel belonged to “a highly respected family”; there is no good reason to reject the early Jewish tradition that he was the grandson (or perhaps the son) of Rabbi Hillel. In any case, he was the leading Hillelite as well as the most highly esteemed PHARISEE of his time.

Since the early Tannaim (“repeaters”), such as Gamaliel the Elder, are usually cited anonymously in the TALMUD, relatively few sayings are ascribed to him expressly by name. But it seems that he took a special interest in social reform, particularly in bettering the legal status of women. This is the Gamaliel from whom St. Paul received his rabbinical education (Acts 22.3). He is also the one mentioned in Acts 5.34: when the Apostles were arrested and brought to trial before the Sanhedrin, “a Pharisee named Gamaliel, a teacher of the law respected by all the people,” counseled caution before condemning the Apostles; his speech at this trial (Acts 5.35–39) shows that he was skeptical of messianic movements. Because he seemed so well disposed toward the Apostles on this occasion, early Christian legends imagined that he himself later became a Christian (Pseudo-Clement, Recog. 1.65–67), even a saint martyred for Christ [see STEPHEN (PROTOMARTYR), ST.], and an apocryphal Gospel was attributed to him.

Gamaliel II, ben Simeon, known also as Gamaliel of Jabneh to distinguish him from his grandfather Gamaliel the Elder, was active toward the end of the 1st and perhaps the beginning of the 2d century. After the death of JOHANAN BEN ZAKKAI (c. A.D. 80), Gamaliel II succeeded him as president of the Sanhedrin at Jabneh. In his efforts to establish a uniform rabbinical law based on the teaching of the Pharisees, he settled all the disputes between the Hillelites and the Shammaites in favor of the former. He drew up the definitive form of the Shemone Esre (the “Eighteen Blessings”), one of the oldest Jewish prayer formulas, to which he added the “prayer against heretics,” i.e., Judeo-Christians (Ber. 28b). Because of his harsh use of the ban (excommunication) against scholars who disagreed with him, he was temporarily deposed from the presidency of the Jabneh Sanhedrin.

Gamaliel III (3d century) was the eldest son and successor of JUDAH HA-NASI (grandson of Gamaliel II) as president of the Sanhedrin. During his term of office the final form was given to the MISHNAH of Juda Ha-Nasi.

Bibliography: D. J. BORNSTEIN, Encyclopedia Judaica 7:80–89. R. GORDIS, Universal Jewish Encyclopedia 4:506–508. W. BACHER, Jewish Encyclopedia 5:558–562. K. SCHUBERT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:510. C. H. HUNZINGER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 2:1197. G. F. MOORE, Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era: The Age of the Tannaim, 3 v. (Cambridge, Mass. 1927–30).

[J. J. DOUGHERTY]

GAMBACORTA, PETER, BL.

Known also as Peter of Pisa, hermit, founder of the Poor Hermits of St. Jerome; b. Pisa, Feb. 16, 1355; d.

Venice, June 17, 1435. Born of the ruling family of Pisa, he became a hermit in the wilderness near Urbino. When he was joined by other hermits he formed the congregation of the Poor Hermits of St. Jerome, at Montebello. The congregation was approved in 1421, and further foundations were made at Venice, Pesaro, and Treviso. Peter's zealous asceticism brought him before the Inquisition. He was beatified in 1693; an Office and Mass in his honor were approved in 1729. In 1933 Pius XI suppressed the Poor Hermits because of the smallness of the congregation.

Feast: June 17.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 4:436–451. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 2:6710. A. POTTHAST, Bibliotheca historica medii aevi 2:1522. W. MARSCHALL, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*² 8:376. For suppression of order, see Acta Apostolicae Sedis 25 (1933) 147–149.

[C. DAVIS]

GAMBIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The smallest nation on the African continent, the Republic of the Gambia is located on the northwest coast of Africa, extending west to east for 200 miles in a narrow strip along both banks of the Gambia River and surrounded by SENEGAL. The fertile floodplain region along the length of the river allows for the production of groundnuts and the raising of livestock, while fishing and tourism also contribute to the Gambian economy. Ethnically the Gambians are members of Mandingo, Fulani, Wolof, Dyola and Serahuli tribes, as are the surrounding Senegalese.

The mouth of the Gambia River was discovered by Portuguese traders traveling the Atlantic Ocean in the mid-15th century, although the river would not be traversed by Europeans until the British did so c. 1618. Granted to the British in the Treaty of Versailles in 1783 and incorporated into Sierra Leone, the Gambia provided a means of fighting the slave trade through its fort at Banjul (1816). It became a British colony in 1843, and a protectorate in 1893, in part because of tribal wars in nearby Senegal. Gambia became an independent member of the British Commonwealth on Feb. 18, 1965. Gaining its independence in 1970, it joined Senegal as the federation of Senegambia in 1982, but that association lasted only seven years. In July of 1994 President Dawda Kairaba Jawara was overthrown in a military coup led by Lieutenant Yahya Jammeh, but peace was quickly restored and in August of 1996 civilian elections were resumed under a new constitution.

Christianity was introduced into the region in the wake of the Portuguese explorers, although evangelization efforts did not meet with any real success until the early 19th century. By 2000 Catholicism remained a minority faith in Gambia, a country that had thus far remained immune to the religious and ethnic conflicts proliferating in that part of Africa. During a meeting in 2001, Pope John Paul II encouraged Gambia's new ambassador to the Vatican to "make courageous decisions that will lead people along the road to peace," a reference to Gambian efforts to mediate the violence in nearby Senegal. The faithful in the country's 52 parishes were tended by 11 diocesan and 12 religious priests, while 13 brothers and 65 sisters aided in maintaining the Gambia's 41 primary and 11 secondary Catholic schools as well as hospitals, clinics, shelters and other humanitarian efforts. The government put no limits on religious instruction, which was made available in both public and private schools.

Bibliography: Bilan du Monde, 2v. (Tournai 1964) 2:401–402. Annuario Pontificio. For additional bibliography, see AFRICA.

[J. BOUCHAUD/EDS.]

GAMBLING

The staking of something of value, usually money, on some fact or the outcome of some event, the determination of which is due solely to chance or to contingency not predictable with certainty. The term is used here to include: (1) gaming, in which skill plays a part in determining the outcome; (2) wagering, in which the event or fact upon which the bet is laid is beyond the power of the wagering parties to affect; (3) lotteries, in which prizes are distributed by lot to some of those who have paid a premium for the chance of having their names or the numbers of their tickets drawn from a mass of names or tickets of other competitors. Gambling is a type of aleatory contract and as such is licit provided that there is a reasonable equality between the parties, that the transaction is conducted without fraud, and that the particular type of contract is not prohibited by law.

A person is entitled to dispose of his own property as he wills, so long as in doing so he does not render himself incapable of fulfilling duties incumbent upon him by reason of justice or charity. Gambling, therefore, though a luxury, is not considered sinful except when the indulgence in it is inconsistent with duty. Thus it can be sinful when a person has no right to risk the money he bets, either because it is not his own, or because he needs it for the support of his family or for the discharge of other obligations. It is sinful also when he knows the person with Capital: Banjul.

Size: 4,127 sq. miles.

Population: 1,367,120 in 2000.

Languages: English; Mandingo, Fulani and other languages are spoken in various regions.

Religions: 41,700 Catholics (3%), 1,298,950 Muslims (95%), 13,850 Protestants (1%), 12,620 follow indigenous religions or other faiths.

Ecclesiastical organization: Gambia was part of the Vicariate Apostolic of Senegambia in Senegal until 1931, when it became a mission sui juris. It was entrusted then, together with its 3,000 Catholics, to the Irish province of the Holy Ghost Fathers. In 1951 this mission became the Prefecture Apostolic of Bathurst, which in 1957 was made a diocese (Banjul) directly subject to the Holy See.

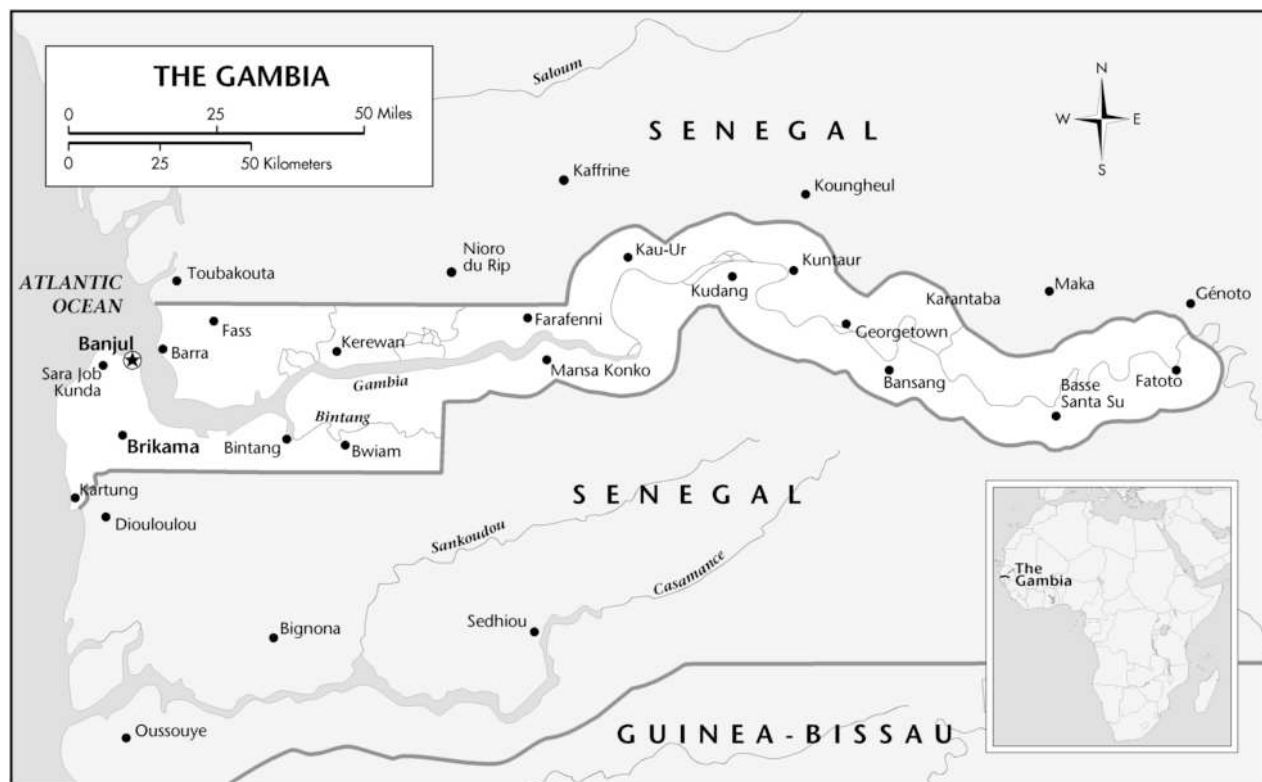

whom he bets ought not to risk his money. Moreover, since with some types of personality gambling readily becomes a compulsive activity, damaging to the individual and a disruptive influence in family and other social relationships, excessive indulgence is sinful, especially when it is marked by passionate infatuation.

Gambling may be sinful also on the part of one who cheats or engages in other dishonesty in the transaction, or who bets upon a certainty, unless the rules of a game, understood by all participants, make this permissible. Moreover, the gambling contract is unjust if there is no reasonable proportion between what is risked and what may possibly be gained. A disproportion, however, is admissible in state lotteries conducted for purposes of revenue, or in lotteries held to gather money for charity. In these cases the participants understand that only a portion of what is taken in will be returned to winners in the form of prizes, and they are presumed to consent to the arrangement.

Because gambling can become a major social evil, most societies have laws restricting, controlling, or prohibiting certain forms of it. Generally speaking, these laws appear to be just, and defiance of them on a large or professional scale seems incompatible with Christian morality.

Bibliography: D. M. PRÜMMER, Manuale theologiae moralis, ed. E. M. MÜNCH (Freiburg-Barcelona 1955) 2:267–271. H. DAVIS, Moral and Pastoral Theology, rev. and enl. ed. by L. W. GEDDES (New York 1958) 2:373–376. M. ZALBA, Theologiae moralis summa 3 v. (Biblioteca de autores cristianos 93, 106, 117; 2d ed. 1957). F. DESHAYES, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 1.1:695–703.

[F. O'HARE]

GAMS, PIUS

Church historian; b. Mittelbuch (Württemberg), Germany, Jan. 23, 1816; d. Munich, May 11, 1892. He studied in Tübingen (1834–38), was ordained in 1839, and became professor of history and theology at Hildesheim (1847–55). In 1855, he entered the Benedictine Abbey of St. Boniface in Munich. Four of the five volumes of his Kirchengeschichte von Spanien (1862–79; Graz 1959) deal with the period before 1492. At times the work becomes an ecclesiastical chronicle, but it includes many valuable studies of difficult problems. His gigantic Series episcoporum (1873; Leipzig 1931; Graz 1957), brought up to date in two supplements (1879, 1886), lists all bishops known in the history of the Church.

Bibliography: F. LAUCHERT, Studien und Mitteilungen zur Geschichte des Benediktiner-Ordens 27 (1906) 634–649; 28 (1907) 53–71, 299–315. B. HEURTEBIZE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 6.1:1141–42. H. LANG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HÖFER AND K. RAHNER, 10 v. (1957–) 4:511.

[E. P. COLBERT]

GANDERSHEIM, CONVENT OF

A former BENEDICTINE establishment in the Diocese of Hildesheim located in the town of Bad Gandersheim, Lower Saxony, Germany. It was founded in Brunshausen in 852 as a free imperial abbey of canonesses by Margrave Liudolf of Saxony (d. 866), ancestor of the Ottonian dynasty, and was moved to Gandersheim in 856. Three daughters of Liudolf ruled their family's foundation: Hathumod (d. 874), Gerberga (d. 896), and Christina (d. 919). Under Abbess Gerberga II (959–1001), daughter of Duke Henry I of Bavaria, the abbey school achieved great fame through the poetic works of ROSWITHA. In her Primordia coenobii Gandeshemensis, the important donations of Bishop Altfried of Hildesheim (852–874), which resulted in proprietary rights for the Diocese of Hildesheim, are passed over in silence. To break the ties with Hildesheim, OTTO III's sister, Sophie, abbess from 1002 to 1039, persuaded Archbishop WILLIGIS OF MAINZ to claim the abbey for his see on the basis of Fulda's ancient rights over Brunshausen and Gandersheim. After a struggle of more than seven years, Bishop BERNWARD OF HILDESHEIM saw his rights recognized by his metropolitan, Willigis, in 1007. However, Archbishop ARIBO renewed the claims against GODARD, Bernward's successor, in 1023, and a final settlement was not reached until 1028. Emperor HENRY II added a county to the possessions of the wealthy abbey in 1021, and the Salic emperors continued to entrust the convent, together with other Saxon abbeys, to an imperial princess because of its political importance. A Low-German adaptation of an early 12th-century Latin chronicle, made by Eberhard, deacon of Gandersheim (c. 1216), reflects the abbey's century-long struggle for independence from the bishop. Pope INNOCENT III's privilege finally brought Gandersheim exemption from Hildesheim in 1208. The free imperial abbey became a Protestant convent in 1589 and was dissolved in 1810.

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topographique des abbayes et prieurés 1:1250. L. WOLFF, Die deutsche Literatur des Mittelalters 1:470–474. W. WATTENBACH, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter 1:37–38, 61–62. H. GOETTING, “Die Gandersheimer Originalsupplik an Papst Paschalis II. als Quelle für eine unbekannt Legation Hildebrands nach Sachsen,” Niedersächs. Jahrbuch 21 (1949) 93–122; “Zur Kritik der älteren Gründungsurkunde des Reichsstifts Gandersheim,” Mitteilungen des Österreich. Staatsarchivs 3 (1950) 362–403. O. PERST, “Die Kaisertochter Sophie, Äbtissin von Gandersheim und Essen, 975–1039,” Braunschweig. Jahrbuch 38 (1957) 5–46. H. ENGFER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 4:511–512.

[A. A. SCHACHER]

GANDHI, MOHANDAS KARAMCHAND

The greatest and most widely admired of 20th-century Indian leaders; b. Porbandar, Kathiawad, Oct. 2, 1869; assassinated, New Delhi, Jan. 30, 1948. Gandhi came from a well-to-do Hindu family and studied in India and England. He was admitted to the bar (1891) and practiced as a lawyer in South Africa (1893), where he became involved in the struggle of the South African Indians against the white rulers. He divided his time between India and South Africa (1896–1902), established Indian Opinion and Phoenix Farm (1904), contested through satyāgraha (civil disobedience) the policies of the South African government, and was jailed more than once between 1907 and 1913. On his return to India, Gandhi established the Sabarmati Ashram (1915) and was gradually drawn into the vortex of Indian politics—for example, he organized an all-India hartal (work stoppage) on April 6, 1919. He also edited the periodicals Young India, in English, and Navajivan, in Gujarati.

On gaining control of the Indian National Congress, Gandhi launched the noncooperation movement and inaugurated mass civil disobedience (December 1921). He suspended it (February 1922), but launched another satyāgraha, this time against the government salt monopoly, by marching to Dandi (1930). He signed a pact with the viceroy (1931) and attended the Round Table Conference at London. In 1933 he began Harijan, a weekly paper, and worked for civic integration of the untouchables. He launched limited individual satyāgraha (1940), gave the call for the “Quit India” movement (August 1942), and was imprisoned.

Central mosque, Banjul, Gambia. (©Nik Wheeler/CORBIS)

Gandhi's talks with Jinnah, the Muslim leader, ended in failure (1944), and he was deeply distressed by the Hindu-Muslim riots in 1946–47. While opposing the partition of India, he repeatedly fasted and prayed to avert communal frenzy. He was acclaimed “Father of the Nation” by free India, and acted as adviser to J. Nehru's government on crucial matters. He was assassinated while on his way to prayer. The title Mahatma (great-souled) was popularly accorded to him.

Gandhi wrote in Gujarati, his mother tongue, and in English. While his succinct Hind Swaraj (1909) became the locus classicus of the Gandhian philosophy of life and action, his Autobiography (1927) revealed to millions with complete fidelity the contours of his mind and the impulses of his heart. He was deeply influenced not only by the Hindu scriptures, but by the New Testament and the writings of THOREAU, RUSKIN, and TOLSTOI. His philosophy of action comprised sarvōdaya (happiness for all) to be achieved through satyāgraha (action based on fearlessness, truth, and the abjurement of violence). He pleaded for inner purification through celibacy or chastity, dietetic regulation, fasting, silence and prayer, the adoption of a simple life, the ready acceptance of manual labor, and the voluntary rejection of material possessions. His asceticism and strength were reflected in his speech and writing; in Gandhi, the style was truly the man.

Mohandas Karamchand Gandhi. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Bibliography: Collected Works (New Delhi 1958–94); An Autobiography: The Story of My Experiments with Truth, tr. M. DESAI (2d ed. Washington 1948); comp. and tr., Songs from Prison (New York 1934); A Gandhi Reader: A Source Book of His Life and Writings, ed. H. A. JACK (New York 1956). V. SHEEAN, Lead, Kindly Light (London 1950), biog.

[K. R. SRINIVASA IYENGAR]

GANDOLF OF BINASCO, BL.

Franciscan hermit; b. village of Binasco, near Milan, Italy, late 12th century; d. Polizzi Generosa, Sicily, c. 1260. He joined the FRANCISCANS during the lifetime of FRANCIS OF ASSISI, and his observance of the rule was so perfect that he advanced rapidly in holiness of life and the practice of virtue. His food was coarse, his dress rough; he spent long night vigils in prayer, and he severely disciplined his body. His quest for solitude took him from Palermo to a hermitage near the small town of Polizzi Generosa, where, even during his lifetime, his conspicuous sanctity, his inspired eloquence, and his reputation for miracles won him the enthusiastic veneration of the people of the town and surrounding countryside. He had great devotion to the Passion, as well as to the Blessed Mother, and as he lay dying, he embraced the crucifix, punctuating his sobs with the ejaculation “Ave.” A vita, in dialogue form, written not long after his death by James of Narni, bishop of Cefalù (d. 1324), was published in 1632 in the Processus pro canonizatione, and his cult was confirmed by Pope GREGORY XV in 1621.

Feast: April 3 (Franciscans).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum September 5:701–728. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 1:3261–64. O. BONMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:513. L. WADDING, Scriptores Ordinis Minorum (3d ed. Quaracchi-Florence 1931–) 4:165–170.

[T. C. CROWLEY]

GANGOLF, ST.

Historically, an uncertain figure: either the attorney and defender of the abbey of Beza in the Côte d’Or, France, d. 670; or the friend of St. CEOLFRID and of St. BEDE, d. 716; or—as is usually believed—a virtuous and valiant warrior, descendant of a noble family of Burgundy and friend of PEPIN III. He was murdered at the instigation of his unfaithful wife and is honored as a martyr of conjugal fidelity. The traditional place of his burial is Varennes-sur-Amance (Haute-Marne). His cult is popular in western and central Europe, e.g., at Florennes in Belgium. The account of his martyrdom, first written toward the end of the ninth century, was rewritten by ROSWITHA in the tenth century.

Feast: May 11; May 12 (Langres).

Bibliography: J. P. MIGNE, Patrologiae latina, 137:1083–94. Acta Sanctorum, May 2:643–652. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum, 7.1:142–174. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores, 15.2:791–796. E. MARTIN, Histoire des diocèses de Toul, de Nancy et de S. Dié, v.1 (Nancy 1900), passim. F. MAYER, “Der heilige Gangolf,” Freiburger Diözesan-Archiv 67 (1940) 90–139. P. VIARD, Catholicisme 4:1831–32.

[É. BROUETTE]

GANGRA

Gangra, the capital of the Roman province of Paphlagonia, today Cankiri, northeast of Ankara, Turkey. It probably had a bishop at the Council of NICAEA in 325, but the story of the stoning of Bishop Hypatius by the Novatians after his return from that council is not based on historical data [Roman martyrology Nov. 14, Acta Sanctorum dec. Propyl. 521–522, Analecta Bollandiana 51 (1933) 392–395]. Its first bishop was probably Eusebius, who presided at the Council of Gangra (J. D. Mansi Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 2:1095–1122). Although the date is uncertain, the council is the most important event of Gangra's Christian history. Sozomen (Church History 3.24 and 4.24) dated it before the synod of Antioch in 341. Twenty canons of the council described and condemned the exaggerated asceticism of EUSTATHIUS OF SEBASTE, who would have required all Christians to follow monastic discipline with regard to dress, marriage, and abstinence. He also ordered fasting on Sunday rather than according to the practice of the Church, and he claimed that rich or married people could not be saved. The 20 canons were sent to all Armenian bishops and were later included in GRATIAN'S Decretum. After the Turkish conquest of 1423, the metropolitan See of Gangra along with its five suffragan sees was suppressed. Its ancient cathedral of St. Demetrius has since been converted into a mosque.

Bibliography: C. J. VON HEFELE and H. LECLERCQ, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux (Paris 1907–38) 1.2:1029–45. Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. E. WISSOWA (Stuttgart 1893—) 7.1:707. G. BARDY, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ (Paris 1935–65) 5:935–938. Catholicisme 4:1745–46. A. BIGELMAIR Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:514.

[J. VAN PAASSEN]

GANSFORT, JOHANNES WESSEL

Theologian, philosopher, humanist; b. Groningen, Netherlands, c. 1419; d. Groningen, Oct. 4, 1489. He was probably baptized Wessel, and later, when he was identified erroneously with Johannes Rucherath von Wesel, Johannes was added to his name. After studying under the direction of the BRETHREN OF THE COMMON LIFE, Gansfort taught at Zwolle from 1432 to 1449, and was deeply influenced by the DEVOTIO MODERNA. His desire for more learning led him to Cologne (1449), where he studied Greek, Hebrew, philosophy, and theology and familiarized himself with the works of Augustine, BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, and RUPERT OF DEUTZ. After a brief stay in Heidelberg, Gansfort went to Paris c. 1458, became involved in the nominalist controversy, and called into question the infallible teaching authority of the pope and of the ecumenical councils, the power of priestly absolution, the teachings on indulgences, purgatory, and the efficacy of the Sacraments. After a brief visit with Italian humanists c. 1470, Gansfort returned to Paris, and some five years later he departed for his native land. He has at times been called a precursor of the Reformation. Luther is even quoted as saying that his enemies might accuse him of having copied from Gansfort (poterat . . . videri Lutherus omnia ex Wesselo hausisse). The writings of Gansfort, however, are occasional treatises, rather than a systematic presentation of a body of teachings, and can be open to several interpretations, as was noted by his contemporaries. To his friends he seemed the “light of the world” (lux mundi), while his enemies dismissed him as “the master of contradictions” (magister contradictionum). Enjoying the protection of David, Bishop of Utrecht, Gansfort spent the last years of his life in study and in the writing of several ascetical works, such as the Scala meditatoria and the Exemplum scalae meditatoriae, which gained for him as a layman an honored position among the teachers of the Devotio Moderna. His works were published for the first time by A. Hardenberg at Gröningen in 1614.

Bibliography: S. D. VAN BEEN, Realencyklopädie für protestantische Theologie, ed. J. J. HERZOG AND A. HAUCK, 24 v. (Leipzig 1896–1913) 21:131–147. L. CRISTIANI, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 15.2:3531–36. M. GOOSENS, De Katholieke Encyclopaedie, ed. P. VAN DER MEER et al., 25 v. (2d ed. Amsterdam 1949–55) 11:263–264. P. DOYÈRE, Catholicisme 4: 1746. E. BARNIKOL, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 6 v. (Tübingen 1957–63) 2:1199–1200. A. FRANZEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HÖFER AND K. RAHNER (1957–) 5:1034–35.

[H. DRESSLER]

GANTE, PEDRO DE

Franciscan missionary, founder of the first school in Mexico; b. Ayghem-Saint-Pierre, Gante, Flanders, 1486; d. Mexico City, April 1572. He studied first with the Brothers of the Common Life (whose emphasis on broad humanistic principles probably strongly influenced his own pedagogical principles), and later studied also at the University of Louvain before he entered the Franciscans as a brother. He stammered, and this defect may have restrained him from becoming a priest. However, while his fellow friars claimed they could not understand him in either Spanish or Nahuatl, the indigenous people never had that difficulty. Hence Pedro often served as an interpreter and frequently, on Sundays when a priest was not available, preached to the natives in their own language. His special realm was that of teacher, and modern authors have called him the “first teacher of the Americas.” The revolutionary regime of modern Mexico, planning its program to teach the indigenous people to read and write, restudied Pedro's methods and applied them to modern circumstances.

Fray Pedro arrived in Veracruz, New Spain, Aug. 13, 1523, with the Franciscan friars Juan Dekkers and Juan

Van der Auwera. He established his Colegio de San José (called also Colegio de San Francisco) in Texcoco. Late in 1526 or early in 1527 it was transferred to a site next to the Convento de San Francisco in Mexico City. At the time it was customary to have a doctrinal school in each Franciscan friary in Mexico. This particular school was a school of doctrine, but from the beginning it was something much more for the 800 to 1,000 students it housed and fed. In the mornings the pupils were taught reading, writing, and singing. The afternoons were devoted to learning Christian doctrine and to rehearsals of the sermons, songs, or plays that selected young men would present on the following Sunday or feast day in a neighboring pueblo. Because of the shortage of priests, Pedro had selected about 50 of the students to act as catechists. Whenever he heard that the pagans were to have a festival, he prepared songs or a tableau on Christian themes, trained his students, and led the group to the fiesta to counteract pagan influences and to arouse interest in the Catholic faith.

By 1529 Pedro wrote that he had built more than 100 churches in the environs of Mexico City. To build, ornament, and staff them, he expanded his curriculum. Latin was added, as was instrumental music, to supply the chanters and musicians needed for Church services. Painting, sculpture, and embroidery were introduced to supply the vestments and images; and among other crafts, carpentry, iron working, leather working, and stonemasonry were taught. By 1533 there were at least 13 courses being taught successfully to more than 1,000 natives. A hospital had been added in which natives could be trained in European medical practices while refining the use of their older medicinal herbs. The chapel these students built for their school—Capilla de San José de los Naturales—was for many decades the largest and best in Mexico. Even though it was the parish church of the natives, the Spaniards liked to use it for their greater festivals.

After the death of Archbishop Zumárraga, Pedro de Gante wrote in one of his letters that he was tempted to return to Europe to prepare for death. The affection of the native people drove away this idea, and he remained with them as their friend and protector. Archbishop Montúfar, Zumárraga's successor, once exclaimed: "I am not the archbishop of Mexico; Fray Pedro de Gante is." He is buried in San Francisco church; his statue is in the monument to Columbus on the Paseo de la Reforma.

Bibliography: V. M. GRACIA, Fray Pedro de Gante, primer maestro del continente iberoamericano (Valencia 1989). P. R. VÁZQUEZ, Fray Pedro de Gante: El primero y más grande maestro de la Nueva España (Mexico 1995). J. C. CASTELLANOS, El catecismo en pictogramas de fray Pedro de Gante: Estudio introductorio y desciframiento del Ms. Vit. 26-9 de la Biblioteca Nacional de Madrid (Madrid 1987). R. C. CARVAJAL, La obra educativa de Pedro de Gante en Tezcoco (Tezcoco 1986). Cartas, compiladas de diversas obras, ed. F. DE J. CHAUVET (Mexico City 1951). E. A. CHAVEZ, El ambiente geográfico, histórico y social de fray Pedro de Gante, hasta el año 1523 (Mexico City 1943); El primero de los grandes educadores de la América, fray Pedro de Gante (2d ed. Mexico City 1943).

[L. CAMPOS]

GAPP, JAKOB, BL.

Priest of the Society of Mary (SM); b. Wattens, Tyrol, western Austria, July 26, 1897; d. Plötzensee Prison, Berlin, Germany, Aug. 13, 1943.

Jakob Gapp, the seventh child of Martin Gapp and Antonia Wach, completed secondary school under the tutelage of the FRANCISCANS at Hall, Tyrol. During World War I Gapp served in the military on the Italian front; received the silver medal of Courage Second Class after being wounded in 1916; and was a prisoner of war at in the Italian Piedmont from Nov. 4, 1918 to Aug. 18, 1919.

After Gapp made his vows as a Marianist at Greisinghof, Upper Austria, he worked for four years in Graz. He entered the seminary at Fribourg, Switzerland, where he was ordained on April 5, 1930. His first eight years as a priest, Gapp worked as a primary school teacher, director of religious education, and chaplain in Marianist schools in Austria.

During the depression following World War I, he collected and distributed food and funds to those in need, and helped the unemployed to find jobs. He refused to heat his own room in winter in order to give his allotment of coal to poor families. This sense of justice led to his final demise.

Gapp came to recognize the incompatibility of National Socialism and Christianity after reading Nazi publications, particularly Alfred Rosenberg's Myth of the Twentieth Century, the statements of the Austrian bishops, and Pius XI's encyclical Mit brennender Sorge. He boldly denounced the "abhorrent and totally irreconcilable" ideology when German troops occupied Austria in March 1938. Because of his notoriety as an enemy of Nazism, in October 1938, the Gestapo forbade him to teach. Despite the ban, he continued to advise parishioners to ignore German propaganda and defended Pope Pius XI against Nazi slander in a sermon on Dec. 11, 1938. Advised to leave Austria, Gapp served as librarian and chaplain at the Marianist motherhouse in Bordeaux for several months before being reassigned to Spain (May 1939).

In Spain Gapp found himself isolated among the Marianists because his confrères could not understand his insistence that Catholics must vocally oppose injustice in all forms, particularly that of the Nazis. During his three years in Spain, Gapp was transferred to San Sebastián, Cádiz, Lequeitio, and finally Valencia.

In August 1942 Gapp received messages from two German agents posing as refugee Jews from Berlin in need of his help. They were living just across the border at Hendaye in southern France. When he drove over the border to meet them on November 9, Gapp was immediately arrested by the Gestapo. He was detained at several French prisons before being taken to Berlin. There he was tried before the infamous Volksgesichtshof and condemned to death on July 2, 1943 on the charge of high treason. The sentence specified that his remains were not to be returned to his family for burial because Gapp had “defended his conduct on expressly religious grounds. For a religious people Fr. Gapp would be considered a martyr for the faith, and his burial could be used by the Catholic population as an opportunity for a silent demonstration in support of an already judged traitor.”

In the six hours between being informed of his execution and his decapitation by guillotine, Gapp wrote moving letters to his superior and his family. Gapp’s body was sent to the Anatomical-Biological Institute of the University of Berlin on the grounds that it would be used for research. The only known relic is the ring Gapp received upon his religious profession, which is kept in the Marianist novitiate at Greisinghof, Austria. Gapp was respected even by his enemies. Himmler had remarked to Gapp’s judge that Germany would easily win if there were more party members as committed to the cause as Gapp was to his Christian faith.

Gapp was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 24, 1996.

Feast: Aug. 13 (Society of Mary).

Bibliography: Blessed Jakob Gapp, Marianist (Dayton, Ohio 1999). L’Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed., no. 48 (1996). J. LEVIT, Jakob Gapp: Zeuge seines Glaubens (Innsbruck 1988). J. M. SALAVERRI, Jakob Gapp Martyr de la Foi (Saint-Augustin 1997).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GARABITO, JUAN DE SANTIAGO Y LEÓN

Bishop of Guadalajara, Mexico; b. Palma, Andalucía, Spain, July 13, 1641; d. Guadalajara, July 11, 1694. He was a member of a distinguished Spanish family related to St. PETER OF ALCÁNTARA. He received a doctorate in theology from Salamanca and held various ecclesiastical offices, including positions as preacher to Charles II, preaching canon of the cathedral of Badajoz, visitor general of the diocese, and censor of the Holy Office. In 1676 he was named bishop of Puerto Rico and in the following year was nominated to the See of Guadalajara. He took possession of the diocese on Jan. 7, 1678, and was consecrated in Puebla on May 22. Garabito is considered one of the most distinguished bishops of Guadalajara. Although the diocese gave him a rich annual rent of 17,000 pesos, he set aside about two-thirds of it for the needy and lived in relative poverty himself. Zealous in his care for souls, he acquired a wide reputation for sanctity. He introduced the Oratorians into his diocese. He fostered devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary, especially to the Virgin of Guadalupe and the Virgin of Zapopan. He insisted that all priests in the diocese be instructed in Nahuatl so that they could better serve the people.

Bibliography: J. I. P. DÁVILA GARIBI, Apuntes para la historia de la iglesia en Guadalajara (Mexico City 1957, 1961).

[E. J. GOODMAN]

GARAKONTHIE, DANIEL

Iroquois chieftain; b. c. 1600; d. Onondaga, N.Y., 1676. When he visited Montreal in 1654 as a member of a delegation of Native Americans seeking peace with the French, he remained there as one of the hostages left by the Iroquois as a pledge of their good faith. On his return to his home territory, Garakonthie became an ardent admirer of the French. In 1661 he met Simon le Moyne, SJ, and a close friendship developed between them. When Le Moyne returned to Canada, he was accompanied by Garakonthie and nine French captives whom the native American had rescued from hostile tribes. Garakonthie made frequent trips between Onondaga, the headquarters of the Iroquoian Confederacy, and Quebec, seeking to lessen tensions between the French and the Iroquois and urging that additional missionaries be sent. Although for many years he was sincerely interested in spreading the Gospel, it was not until 1670 that he was baptized and confirmed by Bp. François Laval in the Immaculate Conception Cathedral, Quebec. He took Daniel as his Christian name. Firm in his new faith, he desired to read the Scriptures, and before long, had learned both reading and writing. He was attended at his death in 1676 at Onondaga by Jacques de Lamberville, a Jesuit missionary.

[R. C. NEWBOLD]

GARAMPI, GIUSEPPE

Cardinal, archivist, diplomat; b. Rimini, Oct. 29, 1725; d. Rome, May 4, 1792. Garampi, born of a noble family and well educated, drew his passion for historical studies from Ludovico MURATORI. In Rome he belonged to the Academy of Church History founded by BENEDICT XIV, who employed him in the Papal Secret Archives in 1749 and appointed him prefect in 1751. CLEMENT XIII twice sent him to Germany. In 1761 there was talk of calling a peace conference in Augsburg. Awaiting it, Garampi studied and traveled until 1763. After careful observation he made a proposal that had some influence—namely, that in order to counteract anti-Church books, such as those of Febronius, Catholic theologians should themselves publish books. In 1764 he accompanied Niccolò Oddi, the nuncio, to Frankfurt for the election of Archduke Joseph as King of the Romans. Appointed nuncio to Warsaw by CLEMENT XIV in 1772, he arrived there just after the first partition of Poland and was faced with the difficulties that arose concerning the status of Catholic churches in the portions annexed by Prussia and Russia, and the dissolution of the Society of Jesus by CLEMENT XIV in 1773. He served also as nuncio to Vienna, and he was there during PIUS VI'S visit to Joseph II. He was created a cardinal in 1785, and was also bishop of Montefiascone and Corneto, as well as protector of the German College in Rome.

Wherever he was he pursued three objectives: the study of the history of the Church, the betterment of the state of religion and of scholarship, and the acquisition of manuscripts and books for his library. He left a library of 16,630 items, 4,225 of them theological and 7,812 historical subjects. A number of his studies and one diary have been published; others are among the Vatican manuscripts.

Bibliography: G. GARAMPI, Viaggio in Germania, Baviera, Svizzera, Olanda e Francia . . ., ed. D. G. PALMIERI (Rome 1889), journal. Pastor v.35–40, scattered statements and quotations from Garampi's official letters in v.38. F. CANCELLIERI, "Notizia sul Cardinale Giuseppe Garampi," Memorie di Religione, di Morale e di Letteratura 11 (Modena 1827) 385–442, written by a contemporary who knew Garampi, with 12 of his personal letters included. G. AMATI, Bibliothecae Josephi Garampii Cardinalis Catalogus, 5 v. (Rome 1796) 1:3–14, biog. sketch. J. WODKA, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HÖFER AND K. RAHNER (1957–) 4:515.

[M. L. SHAY]

GÁRATE, FRANCISCO, BL.

Jesuit brother, affectionately called "Brother Courtesy"; b. Feb. 3, 1857, Azpeitia (near Loyola Castle), Spain; d. Sept. 9, 1929, Bilbao. Francisco Gárate, the second of seven siblings, was raised in a devout farming family in which three sons became JESUITS. He entered domestic service (1871) as a house servant at the new Jesuit College of Nuestra Señora de la Antigua at Orduña. Because the Jesuits had been expelled from Spain (1868), Francisco sought entrance into the Society of Jesus (1874) at the novitiate in Poyanne in southern France. After professing his initial vows in 1876 and spending another another year in Poyanne, he was assigned as infirmarian and sacristan (1877–87) at the College of Santiago Apostolo in La Guardia, Pontevedra in western Spain, where he was known for his extreme kindness. He professed his final vows in August of 1887. In March of 1888, he was transferred to Bilbao in northern Spain because his service in the infirmary was affecting his health. For the next 41 years, Brother Francisco was doorkeeper at the Jesuit university in Duesto Bilbao. There he became renowned for the evangelizing power of his humble, joyful service to all he encountered. Pope John Paul II beatified Francisco on Oct. 6, 1985 for his Christian perfection in the way of humble service.

Feast: Sept. 10 (Jesuits).

Bibliography: J. ITURRIOZ, H. Francisco Garate, S.I.: "Portero" de Deusto (Bilbao 1985). J. A. DE SOBRINO, Tres que dijeron 'si' (Madrid 1985). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 79 (1987): 7–10. J. N. TYLEND, Jesuit Saints and Martyrs (Chicago 1998) 297–9. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed., no. 42 (1985): 6–7.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GARCÉS, FRANCISCO TOMÁS HERMENEGILDO

Franciscan missionary and martyr; b. Morata del Conde, Spain, April 12, 1738; d. on the banks of the Colorado River, July 19, 1781. As a child he was taught by an uncle who was a priest. In 1753 he entered the Franciscan province of Aragon. Upon his ordination in 1763, he asked for mission work and was sent to the Missionary College of Santa Cruz de Querétaro the same year. In 1767 he was assigned to the missions in Sonora and went with other friars to Tepique to await transportation. After months of delay there followed by a stormy voyage, he arrived at San Xavier del Bac (near modern Tucson, Arizona) on June 30, 1768. He went on four entradas: to the Gila River in 1768 and again in 1770; to the Gila and the Colorado in 1771; and over the same territory and on to the Mission of San Gabriel in California in 1774. He did missionary work among the Pápagos, Pimas, Yumas, and Apaches. His missionary travels took him many miles—in one 11-month period he covered about 3,600 miles through hostile territory. In August 1779, when the rebellion broke out among the Yuma people, he returned to the Pueblo de la Concepción on the Colorado River to try to pacify them. There he was martyred by the Yuma. He wrote Diario y Derrotero, dated 1777, which has been translated into English.

Bibliography: E. COUES, ed., On the Trail of a Spanish Pioneer: The Diary and Itinerary of Francisco Garcés, 2 v. (New York 1900)

[E. DEL HOYO]

GARCÉS, JULIÁN

First bishop of Tlaxcala, Mexico; b. Munébraga, Aragón, Spain, 1447; d. Puebla, 1542. He was born of a noble family, was educated by a tutor and later at the Sorbonne, and then entered the Dominican convent of San Pedro Mártir in Calatayud. His erudition and fame as a preacher led to a call to the court of Charles V as royal chaplain and confessor to Bp. Rodríguez de Fonseca. The See of Cozumel (later named Yucatán) was established in 1518, and Rodríguez de Fonseca recommended his confessor as bishop. Since there were neither Spaniards nor churches in that diocese, a new see was established at Tlaxcala in 1526, and Garcés was named bishop by Charles V. Early in 1527 he embarked for New Spain. The King conferred on Garcés the title of Protector of the Indians, and ordinances of the Council of the Indies gave him powers necessary to enforce penalties against violators. The fact that the audiencia was persecuting the native Mexicans (between 1528 and 1531) at the same time it was supposed to aid the bishop complicated his work. However, Garcés' exemplary life and zeal resulted in numerous conversions. He wrote Charles V that he baptized no fewer than 300 native Mexicans each week. His championship of native rights won him the enmity of the encomenderos, but ultimately he was successful. His strong letter to the Pope favoring the indigenous peoples is believed responsible for Paul III's bull (1537) declaring them to be truly men with all the rights of men. He was buried in the cathedral of Puebla, where the see was transferred in 1539.

Bibliography: M. CUEVAS, Historia de la Iglesia en México, 5 v. (5th ed. Mexico City 1946–47). W. E. SHIELS, King and Church: The Rise and Fall of the Patronato Real (Chicago 1961).

[E. J. GOODMAN]

GARCIA DIEGO Y MORENO, FRANCISCO

First bishop of the Californias; b. Lagos, Jalisco, Mexico, Sept. 17, 1785; d. Santa Barbara, Calif., April 30, 1846. He was the son of Francisco Diego and Ana Maria Moreno. After completing his studies at St. Joseph's Conciliar Seminary, Guadalajara, Mexico, he entered the Franciscan Order, taking his vows on Dec. 21, 1802. He then attended the Franciscan College of Our Lady of Guadalupe, Zacatecas, Mexico, and he was ordained on Nov. 14, 1808. In addition to doing missionary preaching and to writing a handbook for mission priests, Metodo de misionas, he held various posts at the Franciscan College, including those of prefect (1822–25) and vicar (1832). When the Mexican government decided to replace Spanish missionaries in California with native Mexicans, García Diego and ten friars from Zacatecas were sent to take charge of the missions of Upper California. The Zacatecans, with García Diego as prefect, arrived Jan. 15, 1833 and established their headquarters at Mission Santa Clara. They were preparing to take over eight missions north of Monterey, Calif., when the Mexican congress, on Aug. 17, 1833, enacted a bill converting the mission churches into parishes under secular clergy. Opposing this secularization of the missions, García Diego traveled to Mexico City, where he persuaded the government to suspend secularization until diocesan organization could be obtained. On April 27, 1840, Gregory XVI separated Upper and Lower California from the Diocese of Sonora, establishing them as a single suffragan diocese with San Diego, Calif., as the see city. Consecrated as first bishop of the new diocese on Oct. 4, 1840, García Diego hoped to secure financial assistance from the PIOUS FUND, but this was not forthcoming and the promise of financial support induced the bishop to move to Santa Barbara. García Diego was unable to check the steady decay that confronted his diocese, although he did succeed in founding a seminary at Santa Ines on May 4, 1844, and in ordaining his first three priests on Jan. 1, 1846, shortly before his death and the American conquest of California.

Bibliography: F. J. WEBER, A Biographical Sketch of Right Reverend Francisco García Diego y Moreno (Los Angeles 1961). Z. ENGELHARDT, The Missions and Missionaries of California, 4 v. (San Francisco 1908–15). A. R. BANDINI, "A Bishop Comes to California," American Ecclesiastical Review 103 (1940) 253–267.

[M. J. GUILFOYLE]

GARCÍA OF TOLEDO

Pseudonym of the author of the antipapal tract De reliquiis preciosorum martirum Albini et Rufini (generally recognized after 1076 as Silver and Gold). In the tract, García in 1099 happens to accompany Archbishop Grimoardus (actually Bernard) of Toledo, who hopes to be confirmed as legate for Aquitaine after offering "relics" to the Roman Curia. URBAN II and the cardinals received Grimoardus during a drinking feast and, impressed by his prowess as a drinker, granted his request. Throughout the tract the author parodies the words of the Bible and the liturgy in rude but witty satire, using homiletic and dramatic techniques with skill. Much of the work is modeled after classical Latin comedy. Although García calls himself a canon of Toledo in the title, the Pope addresses him in the tract as “brother,” i.e., bishop.

Bibliography: Libelli de lite 2:423–435. Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters 3:46.

[E. P. COLBERT]

GARCIA VILLADA, ZACARIAS

Historian; b. Gatón de Campos (Valladolid), March 16, 1879; shot and killed by Leftist militia in Vicálvaro, near Madrid, Oct. 1, 1936. As a Jesuit after 1894, he studied at Rome, Innsbruck, and Vienna. He taught historical method (Methodología, 1912) in Barcelona, continued Lowe-Hartel's Bibliotheca patrum latinorum Hispaniensis (1913), edited the Chronicle of Alfonso III (1918), and published a catalogue of the codices and documents of the cathedral of León (1919) and a textbook of Spanish paleography (1925). His small volumes on Cisneros (1920), Covadonga (1922), St. ISIDORE THE FARMER (1922), and the Battle of Pavia (1925), have more value than their popular format indicates. His main work, Historia eclesiástica de España, 3 v. in 5, (1929–36), represents his many years of study. It was interrupted in May 1931, when material he had been collecting since 1902, much not available in Spain, was destroyed in the burning of the Jesuit Instituto Católico in Madrid, where he resided. He published lectures on the life of Spanish medieval writers (1926), and (upon his entry into the Real Academia de la Historia in Madrid in 1935) on the organization of the Church in Spain from 711 to 1085. In El destino de España en la historia universal (1936), he rejects atheistic materialism in favor of divine providence, showing that when Spain was great, she traditionally associated herself with Catholicism.

Bibliography: Razón y Fe 8–103 (1904–33), passim.

[E. P. COLBERT]

GARCÍA XEREZ, NICOLÁS

Bishop of Nicaragua; b. Murcia, Spain, 1746; d. Guatemala, July 31, 1825. He entered the Dominican monastery in his native city, where he studied and graduated as master of sacred theology. He then went to the Indies as a missionary. There he was elected prior of the monastery in Cartagena. One author says that before he came to America he had renounced the archbishoprics of Zaragoza and Valencia. This is not very probable for he accepted the bishopric of Nicaragua in 1807 and took possession in 1810. His see city of León disavowed the governor intendant of Nicaragua Don José Salvador when the revolutionary movement in New Granada asked that all Spaniards be deprived of office. Although García Xerez was a Spaniard, he was accepted by the people as magistrate until 1814. García Xerez could do no less than join in proclaiming the independence of Nicaragua from the Spanish crown. However, he took a very moderate position, which was interpreted by Liberal authors as ambiguous. He calmed impulsive men and warded off riots and excesses; he brought under his influence the committee presided over by Miguel González Saravia. He inspired the proclamation of Oct. 11, 1821, known as the Acta de los Nublados, which declared that Nicaragua freed itself not only from Spain but from every other nation. Saravia altered his stand at the end of 1821 and supported annexation with Mexico. This started a fight between the inhabitants of New Granada, who were unwilling, and the people of León, who because of their leader were ready to compromise. In the political-religious confusion stirred up in Nicaragua in 1824, García Xerez was banished to Guatemala, and he died there in the Dominican monastery. His remains were brought back to Nicaragua on Sept. 12, 1854, and rest in the cathedral of León.

García Xerez had finished the towers and façade of the monumental cathedral and rebuilt the church and monastery of La Merced; he built a bridge of stone and mortar, which joined the city of León with its suburb of Guadalupe.

Bibliography: V. SANABRIA MARTÍNEZ, Episcopologio de la diócesis de Nicaragua y Costa Rica (San José 1943). F. ORTEGA, Nicaragua en los primeros años de su emancipación política (Paris 1894). A. AGUILAR, Reseña histórica de la diócesis de Nicaragua (León 1927).

[L. LAMADRID]

GARDEIL, AMBROISE

Dominican theologian; b. Nancy, March 29, 1859; d. Paris, Oct. 2, 1931. Gardeil joined the Dominican Province of France in 1878 while it was in exile. He began his long teaching career on the Gold Coast in 1884; his lifelong specialty was theological methodology. In 1893 he assisted Father Coconnier in founding the Revue Thomiste, and became provincial regent of studies. Meanwhile, he continued to instruct young Dominicans, eventually covering the whole of the Summa Theologiae twice in class. Although he was probably his order's best theologian at the time, Gardeil gave up teaching in 1911 to have more time for writing and preaching. Apart from his many articles in the Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, the Revue Thomiste, etc., he is best known for his trilogy: La Crédibilité et l'apologétique (1908), Le Donné révélé et la théologie (1910), and La Structure de l'âme et l'expérience mystique (1926).

Bibliography: H. D. GARDEIL, L'Oeuvre théologique du Père Ambroise Gardeil (Paris 1956). R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, "Le Père A. Gardeil," Revue thomiste 36 (1931) 797–808.

[P. CANGELOSI]

GARDINER, GERMAN, BL.

Layman, last martyr under Henry VIII; d. Tyburn (London), England, March 7, 1544. The Cambridge educated German was secretary to Bp. Stephen Gardiner of Winchester and an able apologist. He wrote a tract against John Frith (Aug. 1, 1534) after which little is heard of his career. He was inspired by the English martyrs who preceded him, especially St. Thomas More. When Henry VIII waived in his Protestant convictions, Cranmer fell under suspicion and Gardiner was employed to draw up a list of his errors in faith. The king's whim then turned on Gardiner, who was indicted for endeavoring "to deprive the king of his dignity, title, and name of Supreme Head of the English and Irish Church." He was beatified by Pope Leo XIII.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: MARTYRS OF ENGLAND AND WALES.

Bibliography: B. CAMM, ed., Lives of the English Martyrs, (New York 1904), I, 543–47. R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GARDINER, HAROLD CHARLES

Editor, journalist, author; b. Washington, D.C., Feb. 6, 1904; d. Denver, Colorado, Sept. 3, 1969, the son of Ignatius and Lillian (Bechtel) Gardiner. He graduated from Gonzaga High School, Washington, D.C., and entered the Society of Jesus on Aug. 14, 1922, at St. Andrew-on-Hudson, Poughkeepsie, New York. He subsequently spent two periods of philosophical (1926–29) and theological (1932–36) study at Woodstock College, Maryland, in the course of which he earned his A.B., M.A., and S.T.L. degrees. In between (1929–31), he taught Latin, Greek, and English literature at Canisius College in Buffalo.

Gardiner was ordained to the priesthood on June 21, 1945. After a year (1936–37) of study in ascetical theology at Tronchiennes, Belgium, he began graduate studies in English literature at Cambridge University, and received his Ph.D. in 1941. In the summer of 1940 he joined the editorial staff of America, the Jesuit-edited national Catholic weekly review, in New York City. He served as literary editor of America from 1940 to May 1962, when he took a leave of absence to become a staff editor, with responsibility for all materials dealing with literature, of the 15-volume New Catholic Encyclopedia, then in preparation in Washington, D.C. After completing this task in 1966, he took on the editorship of Corpus Books until his death. In addition to his work as an editor and author, Gardiner lectured widely before university audiences and on radio and television. From 1948 to 1962, he was chairman of the editorial board of the Catholic Book Club. He also served frequently as a consultant to publishers and film directors.

Gardiner promoted literary excellence among Catholic authors and pioneered the formulation of a new understanding among Catholics of the relation between morality and literature, art and the censor. His books include: Mysteries' End (1945), The Great Books (ed. 4 v., 1947–53), Fifty Years of the American Novel (ed., 1951), Norms for the Novel (1953), Imitation of Christ (tr. and ed., 1955), Edmund Campion (1957), Catholic Viewpoint on Censorship (1958), American Classics Reconsidered (ed., 1958), In All Conscience (1959), Movies, Morals and Art (jt. auth., 1961).

[D. R. CAMPION]

GARDINER, STEPHEN

Bishop of Winchester and lord chancellor of England; b. Bury-St.-Edmund's, West Suffolk, England, between 1483 and 1493; d. Whitehall, London, Nov. 12, 1555. He was educated in canon and civil law at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, where he later became master. From Cambridge he passed into Cardinal Thomas WOLSEY'S household and in 1528 was sent to the papal court on an embassy (concerning HENRY VIII'S divorce) with which he made his mark. He survived Wolsey's fall, became the King's secretary, and in November 1531 became bishop of Winchester. In the spring of the next year he temporarily lost favor by upholding the cause of the clergy against the combined attack of Commons and King, but he was soon back in royal service, being present the next year at the court in which Thomas CRANMER, Archbishop of Canterbury, declared Henry's marriage to Catherine null.

Despite some hesitation, which cost him the secretaryship in 1534, Gardiner became an enthusiast not only for the divorce but also for Henrician caesaropapism. It was such bishops as he who made Henry's theological revolution so easy, and his De vera obedientia (1535) was an important piece of propaganda for the Royal Supremacy. From then onward, though a keen rival of Cromwell, he served Henry unquestioningly, above all as a diplomat, without, however, acquiring high office, probably because he was a bishop.

Gardiner was a typical Henrician, convinced that the King was, by God's law, his spiritual and temporal overlord, to whom he owed all obedience; but otherwise he was theologically conservative. He was one of those behind the swing back to orthodoxy in 1539, and he took a leading part in the unsuccessful attempt to unseat Cranmer with a charge of heresy in 1543. For the rest of Henry's reign he was a major figure in the conservative party and was keenly engaged in the jockeying for power that filled the last months of Henry's reign. Shortly before Henry died, Gardiner had been worsted, and the new reign finally brought him down. Gardiner opposed the Protestant reforms of Cranmer (particularly his Book of Homilies) and was promptly imprisoned. He was released in early 1548 but was arrested again a few months later and sent to the Tower. He had then taken a firm stand on behalf of the Real Presence and the Mass against the reformers. Not till late 1550 was he brought to trial, then, being found guilty of opposing "godly reformations of abuses in religion," he was deprived of his bishopric. Had Edward VI lived, Gardiner might have ended his days in the Tower. But in 1553 MARY TUDOR came to the throne, and he was released, restored to his see, and created lord chancellor. Despite his past, he was the sort of man upon whom Mary had to rely to carry out the restoration of Catholicism. Whether he had any real grasp of the size or nature of the problem confronting him and his fellow bishops, whether he had become more than the ecclesiastical politician of old is not easy to say. But he gave Mary good advice when he boldly opposed the Spanish marriage and, though his hand was behind the restoration of the heresy laws, he was not particularly active as a persecutor, even trying to soften the blows against Cranmer and John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland. Furthermore, his own conversion seems to have been sincere. The former Henrician and trimmer seems to have declared his true self when in 1554 he made his peace with Rome. Late the next year he died at Whitehall with the following words on his lips: "I have denied with Peter, I have gone out with Peter, but I have not wept with Peter"; we may accept this as his epitaph.

Bibliography: S. GARDINER, Obedience in Church and State, ed. and tr. P. JANELLE (Cambridge, Eng. 1930); Letters, ed. J. A. MULLER (New York 1933). J. A. MULLER, Stephen Gardiner and the Tudor Reaction (New York 1926). H. M. SMITH, Henry VIII and the Reformation (New York 1962). L. B. SMITH, Tudor Prelates and Politics, 1536–1558 (Princeton 1953). P. HUGHES, The Reformation in England (New York 1963) v.2. H. O. EVENETT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:518. A. GATARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 6.1:1156–58. J. B. MULLINGER, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 7:859–865.

[J. J. SCARISBRICK]

GARESCHÉ, EDWARD FRANCIS

Author and mission-aid organizer; b. St. Louis, Missouri, Dec. 27, 1876; d. Framingham, Mass., Oct. 2, 1960. He was a member of one of the old Catholic families of St. Louis, was a graduate of St. Louis University (1896), and received a law degree from Washington University in St. Louis (1898). After practicing law for two years, he entered the Society of Jesus at Florissant, Missouri, on Sept. 7, 1900 and was ordained on June 27, 1912. Garesché's first assignment was a summer's work on the staff of the Jesuit weekly America. He was then assigned in 1913 to intensify the promotion of the Sodality of Our Lady on a national scale. In 1914 he founded the Sodality publication The Queen's Work, and before he left the promotion work in 1922 the magazine had a circulation of 160,000. Daniel A. LORD, SJ, succeeded him as promoter; The Queen's Work ceased publication in June 1964.

After leaving the Sodality, Garesché became associated with the Catholic Hospital Association. In 1927 he was engaged by the Catholic Medical Mission Board, of which he was director from 1929 until his death. In 1928 he founded the International Catholic Guild of Nurses, with himself as permanent spiritual director, a position that caused considerable controversy in 1936. In 1935 Garesché founded a congregation of mission sisters, the Daughters of Mary Health of the Sick, and after much opposition he founded a companion community of brothers, SONS OF MARY HEALTH OF THE SICK, at Framingham, Mass., in 1952. After this foundation he spent half of his time with the brothers and half in New York City. Although he remained a member of the Jesuit Missouri province, many found his status anomalous, since he went his own way most of the time. A bibliography of his works lists 37 books of prose, six books of poetry, and eight booklets. He also published millions of leaflets during World War II and numerous articles in Catholic periodicals. His literary efforts were more devotional than learned; his true title to fame rests on the tons of medical supplies he was able to send to missions all over the world.

[E. R. VOLLMAR]

GARESCHÉ, JULIUS PETER

Union soldier; b. near Havana, Cuba, April 26, 1821; d. Murfreesboro, Tenn., Dec. 31, 1862. He was the son of a Huguenot father, Vital Marie, and a Catholic mother, Louisa (Bouday) Garesché; he and the family resided chiefly in Delaware. After attending Georgetown College (later University), Washington, D.C., from 1833 to 1837, during which time he became a Catholic, he was appointed to the U.S. Military Academy, and he graduated 16th in his class in 1841. Garesché was first commissioned second lieutenant in the Fourth U.S. Artillery. He served in various frontier posts and in the war with Mexico before becoming brevet captain (assistant adjutant general) on Nov. 9, 1855. In 1862 as a lieutenant-colonel, he was assigned to the staff of Gen. William S. Rosecrans, Commander of the Army of the Cumberland, and became his chief of staff. He was killed early in the Battle of Stones River, Tenn., while riding beside Rosecrans. As a resident of Washington, D.C., Garesché helped to establish the St. Vincent de Paul Society in St. Matthew's parish, the first such unit in that city. He contributed to the New York Freeman's Journal and to Brownson's Quarterly Review. In September 1851 he was vested with the Order, Knight of St. Sylvester, by Pius IX.

Bibliography: U.S. War Dept., The War of Rebellion: A Compilation of the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Armies, 70 v. in 128 (Washington 1880–1901). G. W. CULLUM, Biographical Register of the Officers and Graduates of the U.S. Military Academy, 1802–1890 (3rd ed. rev. Boston 1891–). L. GARESCHÉ Biography of Lieut. Col. Julius P. Garesché (Philadelphia 1887). W. M. LAMERS, The Edge of Glory: A Biography of General William S. Rosecrans (New York 1961).

[J. W. COLEMAN]

GARET, JEAN (GARETIUS)

Theologian; b. Louvain, early 16th century; d. Belgium, Jan. 21, 1571. After completing a course in philosophy, he joined the Canons Regular of St. Augustine at Saint-Martin in Louvain. After his ordination, he served as subprior of the monastery of Saint-Martin. He also assumed the spiritual direction of two convents of religious women at Antwerp and Ghent. He devoted all his free time to writing and preaching against Protestantism. His writings manifest vast erudition, sane judgment, and ardent attachment to the traditional truth. For reasons of ill health, he refused the bishopric of Ypres. His masterpiece was a work on the Eucharist proving the Real Presence from patristic texts: De vera praesentia corporis Christi in sacramento Eucharistiae (Antwerp 1561). It was the source which A. ARNAULD and P. NICOLE used in the compilation of their famous La Perpétuité de la foi (Paris 1669–76). Garet also published works on the invocation of saints and suffrages for the dead.

Bibliography: J. FORGET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 6.1:1158–60.

[C. R. MEYER]

GARIBALDI, GIUSEPPE

Italian military and nationalist leader; b. Nice, France, July 4, 1807; d. Caprera Island, near Sardinia, June 2, 1882. After receiving a Catholic upbringing, he went to sea as a youth and came into contact with exiles and conspirators. By 1832 he was certified as a ship's captain. While a member of the Young Italy movement of Mazzini, he joined the Sardinian navy (1833) and plotted to seize the frigate "Euridice" and occupy the arsenal in Genoa. For his involvement in this abortive conspiracy he was condemned to death. He escaped and went to South America, where he fought in behalf of Brazil's rebellious province of Rio Grande do Sul. From 1841 to 1847 he assisted Uruguay in its war against Argentina, organizing an Italian legion in Montevideo. This experience in guerrilla warfare proved very useful to him in Italy, to which he returned during the revolution of 1848 and led a volunteer army against Austria in the struggle to unify Italy. After the Italian defeat at Custoza, Garibaldi became the general for the forces of the short-lived Roman Republic against the Neapolitans at Palestrina and Velletri and against the French at San Pancrazio. When the republic collapsed he went into exile, landing in New York in 1850 and then following the sea as a sailor (1851–54).

Garibaldi returned to Piedmont in 1854 and purchased half of the barren island of Caprera, off the coast of Sardinia, and made his home there. During the Austro-Sardinian War (1859) he commanded a successful volunteer army (Cacciatori delle Alpi) against the Austrians. Garibaldi's conquest of the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies was his most famous exploit. Despite the strong disapproval of CAVOUR, Garibaldi and his Red Shirts invaded Sicily and defeated General Landi at Calatafimi (May 15, 1860). Suppressing his animosity toward the Church, Garibaldi participated in religious exercises and impressed the Sicilians as a defender of Catholicism. He entered Naples in September, but upon the arrival of Victor Emmanuel II in November, he surrendered his dictatorial position and retired to Caprera. When the Civil War erupted in the U.S., Abraham Lincoln offered him the command of a corps in the Union army but Garibaldi refused to accept unless the President appoint him supreme commander and abolish slavery. In 1862 Garibaldi led a march on Rome that was halted by royal troops at Aspromonte. He defeated the Austrians in several engagements in northern Italy during the Austro-Prussian War (1866).

A renewed attempt by Garibaldi to overthrow the STATES OF THE CHURCH met defeat at Mentana (Nov. 2, 1867). In the Franco-Prussian War he served with the French.

Garibaldi devoted his later years to revising his autobiography, composing irreligious novels, and engaging in other literary activities. His religion was a vague compound of DEISM, PANTHEISM, and what he called the religion of humanity. Bitter ANTICLERICALISM was characteristic of his outlook to the close of his life. His political testament explicitly repudiated the priesthood. Although he was a member of every Italian parliament, except one, elected after 1860, he rarely occupied his seat because of his scorn for legislative assemblies, at least as they functioned in Italy. His own preference was for temporary dictatorship. He possessed a keen sense of justice and identified himself with the common man. As a military leader he was noted for his valor and ability. For his services in the RISORGIMENTO he is honored as a national hero of Italy.

Bibliography: G. GARIBALDI, Edizione nazionale degli scritti di Giuseppe Garibaldi, 6 v. (Bologna 1932–37); Autobiography, ed. A. WERNER, 3 v. (London 1889). G. SACERDOTE, La vita di Giuseppe Garibaldi (Milan 1933). D. MACK SMITH, Garibaldi (New York 1956).

[E. A. CARRILLO]

GARICOÏTS, MICHAEL, ST.

Founder of the BÉTHARRAM FATHERS; b. Ibarre (Basses-Pyrénées), France, April 15, 1797; d. Bétharram (Basses-Pyrénées), May 14, 1863. He came of a poor peasant family, which reared him in profoundly Christian surroundings. To follow his priestly vocation he worked as a domestic while a student. After ordination (1823) he renewed a parish while a curate. As professor (from 1825) and superior (1831–33) of the seminary in Bétharram he reestablished discipline and piety. After the transfer of the seminary to Bayonne he remained at Bétharram, where he founded (1832) and directed under enormous difficulties a congregation of missionaries and teachers. By his foundations of schools and colleges he was a pioneer in Christian education, and through his missionaries and his own activity he helped re-Christianize the region. An adversary of JANSENISM, he favored frequent communion, devotion to the Sacred Heart and to the Blessed Virgin Mary. An exemplary priest, firm, obedient to the point of heroism, zealous, he was a peerless and supernaturally enlightened director of souls—called the Seer of Bétharram. He was beatified May 10, 1923; canonized July 6, 1947.

Feast: May 14.

Bibliography: Life of Blessed Michael Garicoïts, ed. BÉTHARRAM FATHERS, tr. C. OTIS-COX (London 1935). D. BUZY, Saint Mi- chel Garicoïts, le saint de Bétharram (Lourdes 1967). P. DUVIGNAU, Un Maître spirituel du XIX^e siècle: Saint Michel Garicoïts (Paris 1963); La Doctrine spirituelle de saint Michel Garicoïts (Paris 1949). D. INNAMORATI, The Life of St. Michael Garicoïts (Leigh, U.K. 1997).

[P. DUVIGNAU]

GARIN, ANDRÉ

Missionary; b. Côte-Saint-André, Isère, France, May 7, 1822; d. Lowell, Mass., Feb. 16, 1895. After studies in the local seminary of his birthplace, he entered the Oblates of Mary Immaculate on Nov. 1, 1842 and was sent to Canada to be ordained on April 25, 1845, in Montreal by Bp. I. Bourget. Garin's 12 years as a missionary to the Native Americans from the Saguenay to Hudson Bay and Labrador were filled with hardships, but also with great apostolic achievement. When he went to Springfield, Mass., in October 1866 to preach a mission for Canadians, he attracted the attention of Bp. J. J. Williams of Boston, who invited the Oblates to found a parish in Lowell for Franco-Americans. Within a month after Garin and a companion visited Lowell on April 19, 1868 to explore the question, the bishop bought a former Unitarian chapel, naming it St. Joseph's. Three other churches were built under Garin's direction during his 27 years in Lowell. Two years after his death, the parishioners honored him by erecting a statue of him.

Bibliography: Missions de la Congrégation des Missionnaires Oblats de Marie-Immaculée (Paris 1862) 7.

[T. F. CASEY]

GARLICK, NICHOLAS, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. ca. 1555 at Dinting, Glossop, Derbyshire, England; hanged, drawn, and quartered July 24, 1588 on St. Mary's Bridge at Derby. He finished his studies at Gloucester Hall, now Worcester College, Oxford, but did not take a degree, perhaps because it required taking the Oath of Supremacy. For the next seven years he was schoolmaster at Tideswell in the Peak (Derbyshire), where his personal holiness so influenced his pupils that three of them, including Bl. Christopher BUXTON, followed him to Rheims in June 1581. He was ordained in 1582 and returned to England the following January. After working for a year in the Midlands, he was arrested and sent into exile (1585). Although he knew that he would be shown no mercy should he be found again in England, he was soon back at work in the same neighborhood. In 1588, he was apprehended with Bl. Robert LUDLAM by the infamous Topcliffe at Padley Hall, the home of John Fitzherbert, whose son betrayed the priests. They were confined in the verminous Derby Gaol with Bl. Richard SIMPSON until execution. Garlick was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GARNERIUS OF ROCHEFORT

Also known as Garnier of Rochefort or Langres; monk, bishop, monastic author; b. c. 1140; d. Clairvaux, after 1225. He was an active and influential man, related to the lords of Rochefort-sur-Brévon of the Côte d'Or, France. A CISTERCIAN of Longuay Abbey, he became prior of CLAIRVAUX c. 1175 and abbot of Auberive in 1180 and then of Clairvaux in 1187. He preached the Third CRUSADE, and it was to Garnerius that RICHARD I, the Lion-Heart, wrote on Oct. 1, 1191, telling of his successes and asking for reinforcements. Garnerius was bishop of the important See of Langres by 1193 at the latest, but he was soon in conflict with his cathedral chapter. Pope Innocent III demanded his resignation; after a delaying action, he complied in 1199 and retired to Clairvaux. He has left a letter and some sermons (crit. ed. in prep.). In all likelihood he wrote the treatise Contra Amaurianos and compiled an onomastic list beginning with angelus. Numerous charters signed by him have been preserved. A fervent monk, a worthy bishop, and a distinguished humanist, Garnerius should be studied also as a representative of the monastic theology of the late 12th century. For a long time scorned, he now attracts more attention, particularly for his exegetical method and his mystique of numbers.

Bibliography: Gallia Christiana 4:591–594 and Instrumenta: 194–195. J. C. DIDIER, “Garnier de Rochefort: Sa Vie et son oeuvre,” Collectanea Ordinis Cisterciensium 17 (1955) 145–158; “Une Lettre inédite de G. de R.,” ibid. 18 (1956) 190–198; “Quelques précisions sur G. de R.,” Les Cahiers haut-marnais 46 (1956) 164–166; Dictionnaire de théologie catholique Tables générales 1:1775. J. LECLERCQ, “Manuscrits cisterciens dans diverses bibliothèques,” Analecta Sacri Ordinis Cisterciensis 11 (1955) 139–148. M. D. CHENU, “Erigène à Citeaux. Expérience intérieure et spiritualité objective,” La Philosophie et ses problèmes: Recueil d'études . . . offert à R. Jolivet (Paris 1960) 99–107.

[J. C. DIDIER]

Henry Garnet.

GARNET, HENRY

Jesuit superior in England; b. Heanor, Derbyshire, 1555; d. London, May 3, 1606. Garnet, son of the headmaster of a school in Nottingham, was not brought up a Catholic. After attending Winchester School, he studied law, but on his conversion he journeyed to Rome to enter the Jesuit novitiate (September 1575). Later, he taught Hebrew in the Roman College and also, for a time, mathematics. On May 8, 1586, with Robert SOUTHWELL, he left Rome for England, landing there July 17. Father William Weston, his superior, was soon captured, and on Weston's removal from the Clink to Wisbech, January 1588, Garnet became superior. He fixed his headquarters near London, but he made several missionary journeys in the country. He gradually increased the number of Jesuits in England, enrolling several seminary priests, until by 1605 there were more than 40. He placed his priests near one another for mutual help and held periodic meetings for spiritual exercises and renewal of vows. As no one was attending to organization within the English mission, Garnet realized the need and filled it. Newly arrived seminary priests were received and supported until they could safely journey to relatives or be otherwise placed. To priests in poorer districts he afforded such monetary aid as was available. Many lay-helpers were employed and supported by him. One, a carpenter, traveled the country making hiding-places. Some accompanied Jesuits and priests on their journeys and, when traveling was dangerous for priests, acted as messengers. Others worked the press, which he set up, printing spiritual books that were dispersed throughout the country. Such work not only left him frequently in debt, but also caused a few to think, quite unjustly, that the Jesuits wished to dominate the clergy.

When strife broke out among the prisoners at Wisbech and 18 priests begged to have Weston as their superior, Garnet refused, though he would not condemn the priests' association. He worked to end the strife, and through his persistence a pacification was agreed to in November 1595.

On Cardinal William ALLEN's death in October 1594, many students in the English College, Rome, got out of hand, until Robert Persons, recalled to Rome (1597), restored peace and discipline. Fuel had been added to these troubles in 1596 by letters, still extant, of W. Gifford, dean of Lille, full of calumnies against English Jesuits. To spread these calumnies in England and bring back further charges, students were sent to England. The last of these, Robert Fisher, on returning to the Continent, drew up a paper containing these charges, purporting to be in the name of the clergy; the Flanders nuncio, persuaded by Gifford and Charles Paget, forwarded it to Rome. While Persons dealt with these calumnies in Rome and Flanders, Garnet did so in England. A circular letter to the clergy in March 1598 resulted in nearly 200 seminary priests testifying in favor of the Jesuits. Fisher's confessions in Rome, also in March, further revealed what was a combined effort to get the Jesuits withdrawn from England and from the seminaries.

Partly in consequence of these disturbances, Clement VIII, in March 1598, appointed George BLACKWELL archpriest and superior of the clergy in England. Some few priests refused to recognize his authority; in the ensuing controversy Garnet supported Blackwell and at one time considered severe measures from Rome necessary (see ARCHPRIEST CONTROVERSY). After the pope's decision in October 1602, Garnet worked for a general pacification, enjoining on his brethren strict observance of the papal brief.

In James I's reign, Garnet, advocating peaceful means, eventually obtained from the pope a prohibition of violent measures. Convinced that most Catholics would bear the increasing persecution patiently, he yet doubted his power to restrain some of them. Strongly suspecting some plot, he desired the pope to issue a brief adding excommunication to the prohibition. In confession he obtained a knowledge of a plot, which knowledge he was allowed to use only if called in question by the pope, his general, or the state. Apprehended at the end of January 1606, Garnet denied any cooperation in the Gunpowder Plot. According to a letter of W. Baldwin, SJ (May 27, 1606), the Spanish ambassador's interpreter, present at Garnet's execution, had affirmed that on the scaffold Garnet, solemnly protesting his innocence, declared that he received the confessional knowledge only five days before the plot was discovered.

Bibliography: H. FOLEY, ed., Records of the English Province of the Society of Jesus, 7 v. in 15 (London 1877-82). T. FITZHERBERT, Letters, ed. L. S. HICKS (Publications of the Catholic Record Society 41; London 1948); The Wisbech Stirs, 1595-1598 (ibid. 51; London 1958). J. GERARD, "Contributions Towards a Life of Father Henry Garnet, S.J.," Month 91 (1898) 6-21, 121-130, 238-246, 356-367, 458-467, 603-610. T. G. LAW, ed., The Archpriest Controversy, 2 v. (Camden Society 56, 58; London 1896-98). For his writings, A. F. ALLISON and D. M. ROGERS, A Catalogue of Catholic Books in English . . . 1558-1640, 2 v. (London 1956). T. COOPER, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885-1900) 7:881-884.

[L. HICKS]

GARNET, THOMAS, ST.

English martyr; b. Southwark, in the parish of St. Mary Overies, c. 1575; d. Tyburn, June 23, 1608. He attended grammar school at Horsham in Sussex, where in 1588 his father, Richard Garnet, brother of Henry GARNET, was imprisoned for his faith with his wife and children. For a time Thomas was a page to Lord William Howard, half-brother to Bl. Philip HOWARD. At the age of 15 or 16 he crossed to Saint-Omer to complete his education at the Jesuit college. On Feb. 21, 1596, he entered the English seminary at Valladolid, where he was a fellow student with Andrew White, later the founder of the Maryland mission. In July 1599, Garnet, a priest, left for England, and there in September 1604 he became a Jesuit. Arrested and imprisoned in the Gatehouse at the time of the Gunpowder Plot, he was stringently examined by Lord Salisbury for evidence that might implicate his uncle, Henry Garnet. When he proved himself innocent he was banished with other priests in June 1606, but, after a brief novitiate at Louvain, returned the following September. Five or six weeks later he was again arrested and imprisoned, first in the Gatehouse, then in Newgate. After several examinations he was tried at the Old Bailey on June 19, 1608, and condemned for his priesthood. A crowd estimated at more than 1,000 witnessed his execution at Tyburn four days later. On the scaffold he mentioned by name all who were responsible for his execution and prayed God's forgiveness for them. He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929, and canonized by Paul VI in 1970. He is the protomartyr of St. Omer's College, now Stonyhurst.

Feast: June 23.

Bibliography: H. FOLEY, ed., Records of the English Province of the Society of Jesus, 7 v. (Quarterly Ser. 75; London 1877–82) 2.2:475–505. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:627. J. H. POLLEN, Acts of the English Martyrs (London 1891). R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time, 5 v. (London–New York 1885–1902; repr., New York 1961) 2:395–397.

[G. FITZHERBERT]

GARRAGHAN, GILBERT JOSEPH

Historian; b. Chicago, Ill., Aug. 14, 1871; d. Chicago, June 6, 1942. His parents, Gilbert and Bedelia (Kehoe) Garraghan, sent him to St. Ignatius College, Chicago, where he earned his A.B. in 1889. He entered the novitiate of the Society of Jesus at Florissant, Mo., Sept. 1, 1890, taking vows in 1892 and pursuing classical studies there for a year. After three years of philosophy at St. Louis University, Mo., he became instructor in Latin at Xavier University, Cincinnati, Ohio (1896–1901). Garraghan returned to St. Louis University for theology, was ordained on June 29, 1904, and made his tertianship at Florissant (1905–06).

Garraghan spent the next year teaching English literature in Creighton University, Omaha, Nebr., and then four years teaching young Jesuits in the juniorate at Florissant. From 1911 to 1921, and again from 1927 to 1928, he served as assistant to the provincials of the Missouri province of the Society. Residing at St. Louis University during these years, he used the opportunity to engage in historical studies and was awarded the doctorate in history in 1919. Research on the beginnings of the Catholic Church in the Midwest occupied him from 1921 to 1925. Garraghan was professor of history in the graduate school of St. Louis University (1925–32), and editor of Mid-America, a historical quarterly (1929–33). In 1932 he was made research professor at Loyola University, Chicago.

In Europe from 1933 to 1935, he collected an extensive file of documents from the archives of Italy, France, Belgium, and England. Returning to Loyola University, he completed his monumental work on the Middle Western missionary and educational activities of the Jesuits from 1673 to 1919. His historical works include Catholic Beginnings in Kansas City (1919), Catholic Church in Chicago (1921), Chapters in Frontier History (1934), Catholic Beginnings in Maryland (1934), Marquette, Ardent Missionary, Daring Explorer (1937), Jesuits in the Middle United States (3 v. 1938), and Guide to Historical Method, edited by Jean Delanglez (1946).

[J. V. JACOBSEN]

St. Thomas Garnet.

GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, RÉGINALD

Dominican theologian and philosopher; b. Auch (France), Feb. 21, 1877; d. Rome, Feb. 15, 1964. Before entering the Dominican Order (1897) he studied medicine at the University of Bordeaux. When he completed his ecclesiastical studies under the direction of A. GARDEIL, he was assigned to teach philosophy and theology at Le Saulchoir, Belgium (1905). From 1909 until 1960 he taught fundamental, dogmatic, and spiritual theology at what is now called the Pontifical University of St. Thomas Aquinas in Rome, and served during the latter part of his career as a consulter of the Holy Office and of other Roman congregations. He began to write for publication in 1904, and produced in all more than 500 books and articles published in scholarly periodicals, many of which have been translated from the original French or Latin into other tongues. He was a zealous proponent of the doctrine of St. Thomas Aquinas as expounded by the classical commentators of the Dominican school—CAJETAN (TOMMASO DE VIO), Báñez, JOHN OF ST. THOMAS, and Charles BILLUART. He combined a great respect for the past with an understanding and appreciation of the intellectual and spiritual needs of his own time. His principal theses are set forth systematically in his La Synthèse thomiste (Paris 1946).

Réginald Garrigou-Lagrange.

In the field of philosophy his first outstanding work was his Le Sens commun, la philosophie de l'être et les formules dogmatiques (Paris 1909). This was written against Modernism and its conception of the evolution of dogma. Reaffirming the validity of the philosophy of being, of moderate realism and of Aristotelian-Thomistic metaphysics, which is simply the development of elementary and primordial ideas by natural intelligence, Garrigou-Lagrange showed how the human mind grasps first and self-evident principles in intelligible being, which is the first object apprehended by the intellect in the data of the senses. Turning then to dogmatic formulas, which he did not wish to enfeoff to any philosophical system, he showed their rational value and stability. Knowledge of dogma and of dogmatic expressions and formulas can progress, but the dogma remains always immutable in itself. Among his other philosophical works were Le Réalisme du principe de finalité (Paris 1932) and Le Sens du mystère et le clair obscur intellectuel (Nature et Supernaturel) (Paris 1934). His most important philosophical work was Dieu, son existence et sa nature (Paris 1915). In this study, by which he hoped to provide a solution to the antinomies of agnosticism, he explained first principles, defending their ontological and transcendental validity. Then, basing his argument on them, he advanced the Thomistic proofs of the existence of God and of certain truths regarding the divine nature, laying great stress on the Thomist doctrine concerning the identity of essence and existence in God and the real distinction of essence and existence in the creature.

The major part of Garrigou-Lagrange's work, however, was theological. His classic De revelatione ab ecclesia proposita (Rome 1918; rev. ed. Rome 1932), fixed for his generation the main lines of Catholic apologetics. For him apologetics was a theological rather than a philosophical science, because he conceived it as a rational defense of divine revelation made by reason under positive direction by faith. Thus he tried, on the one hand, to protect the notion of faith as a gratuitous gift of God, a grace, and, on the other, to avoid the pitfalls of a fideism that ignores reason and human study. Faith, essentially a supernatural gift, transcends by far the elaborations of human thought and cannot be the fruit of a rational syllogism, which can lead the mind no farther than to the judgment of credibility.

Garrigou-Lagrange's magisterial commentary on the Summa Theologiae of St. Thomas (7 v. Paris-Turin 1938–51) is a comprehensive development and treatment of the truths of faith according to the theology of St. Thomas Aquinas. Other theological works worthy of mention were La Prédestination des saints et la grâce (Paris 1935); L'Éternelle vie et la profondeur de l'âme (Paris 1950), his articles in the Dictionnaire de théologie catholique—"Prédestination," "Promotion physique," "Providence selon la Théologie," "Thomisme"—and the article "Predestinazione" in the Enciclopedia cattolica.

In spiritual theology the principal points in his doctrine were established in the light of Thomistic teaching. Adopting the position of Juan Gonzalez ARINTERO, he insisted vigorously on the universal call to holiness and therefore to infused contemplation and to the mystical life as the normal ways of holiness, or of Christian perfection. Among his most fundamental works in this field are Perfection chrétienne et contemplation (Paris 1923), Les trois conversions et les trois voies (Paris 1933), Les trois âges de la vie intérieure (Lyons 1941), De sanctificatione sacerdotum secundum exigentias temporis nostri (Turin 1947), and De unione sacerdotis cum Christo Sacerdote et Victima (Turin 1948).

Bibliography: "Essai de bibliographie du R. P. Garrigou-Lagrange," Angelicum 14 (1937) 5–37. C. MAZZANTINI, "Nota a proposito del principio d'identità . . . nella filosofia del G.-L.," ibid. 318–322. H. D. GARDEIL, Catholicisme 4:1764. B. LAVAUD in Sacra Doctrina 2 (1957) 14–20. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, Tables générales 1:1776–77. "Reginaldi Garrigou-Lagrange: In memoriam," Angelicum 42.1–2 (1965).

[R. M. PIZZORNI]

GARVIN, JOHN E.

Author; b. San Antonio, Texas, Feb. 24, 1865; d. Washington, D.C., Oct. 7, 1918. He joined the Marianist brothers and received his B.A. from the University of Dayton, Ohio (1886), and a licentiate in physics and mathematics from Stanislaus College, Paris, France (1891). Although trained in science, he is remembered also for his speeches and conferences on religious topics. His chief publications were the translation of Henry Rousseau's Life of Guillaume Joseph Chaminate, from French to English, and The Centenary of the Society of Mary in America (Dayton 1917). A methodical teacher, he addressed meetings of the National Catholic Educational Association and was a frequent contributor to the Apostle of Mary and other publications. His notes on the teaching of composition in elementary and high schools are preserved in the archives of Mt. St. John, Dayton.

[G. J. RUPPEL]

GASPARRI, PIETRO

Cardinal, secretary of state under two popes, codifier of Canon Law; b. Ussita (Macerata), Italy, May 5, 1852; d. Rome, Nov. 18, 1934. At the Apollinare in Rome he received doctorates in philosophy, theology, and civil and Canon Law. After ordination (1877), he was secretary to Cardinal Mertel, the prefect of the Apostolic Signatura, and he lectured on Canon Law at the college of Propaganda in Rome. At the request of Leo XIII he accepted (1890) the newly established chair of Canon Law at the Institut Catholique in Paris, and remained there 18 years. During this period he published the fruits of his research: Tractatus canonicus de Matrimonio (1892), De sacra Ordinatione (1893–94), and De Sanctissima Eucharistia (1897). He joined the commission examining the validity of ANGLICAN orders. At first he favored their validity, but he modified his opinions somewhat in De la valeur des ordinations anglicanes (1896). He was sent as apostolic delegate to Peru, Bolivia, and Ecuador (1898–1901), and was consecrated titular archbishop of Caesarea (March 6, 1898). He returned to Rome (1901) as secretary of the Congregation for Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs. His greatest accomplishment was the codification of Canon Law. As secretary of the cardinalial commission of codification and as presiding officer of the two groups of scholars who did the research and actual formulation of the canons, he was the man most responsible for the completion of the tremendous task. Work began Nov. 13, 1904 and was expected to require 25 years. However, Gasparri handed Benedict XV the first printed copy of the new Code of CANON LAW on Dec. 4, 1916. It was solemnly promulgated on Pentecost 1917. Gasparri was elevated to the cardinalate Dec. 16, 1907.

Pietro Gasparri. (The Catholic University of America)

Gasparri succeeded Cardinal FERRATA as secretary of state (Oct. 13, 1914) a few months after the outbreak of World War I. No detail of Benedict XV's many projects to end hostilities and to alleviate human misery was too insignificant for the cardinal's wholehearted attention. When Benedict XV died (Jan. 22, 1922), Gasparri said: "Every man has his special mission in life. Mine was the codification of Canon Law and the support of Benedict during the war. These two tasks are now completed." Pius XI, however, pleaded with the weary camerlengo to continue as secretary of state. On Feb. 11, 1929, in the Lateran Palace, Gasparri and Mussolini signed the Lateran Pacts on which Gasparri had worked painstakingly for some years, and which ended the ROMAN QUESTION. The pope finally acquiesced to Gasparri's pleas for permission to resign (Feb. 7, 1930). The remaining four years of his life he spent in a modest residence overlooking the Colosseum, enjoying his library and completing his Catechismus Catholicus (1930). He lived to see the completely edited manuscript of the seventh volume of his celebrated Fontes Iuris Canonici. On

Italian Premier Alcide De Gasperi, second from left. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Nov. 14, 1934, he gave a brilliant address to the international jurists, assembled at the Apollinare for the 14th centenary of the Code of JUSTINIAN I. He suffered a heart attack immediately after and died four days later. Gasparri, descended from a family of shepherds, was always a simple, devoted priest, practical rather than theoretical in his approach to problems. His inexhaustible capacity for work, his disarming amiability, humor, tact, and imaginative resourcefulness were qualities that contributed to his greatness. His diary remains unpublished.

Bibliography: P. GASPARRI, "Storia della codificazione del diritto canonico per la Chiesa latina," Acta Congressus iuridict internationalis, 5 v. (Rome 1935–37) 4:1–10. L. FIORELLI, ed., Il cardinale Pietro Gasparri (Rome 1960). F. M. TALIANI, Vita del Cardinale Gasparri, segretario di Stato e povero prete (Milan 1938). W. SANDFUCHS, Die Aussenminister der Päpste (Munich 1962). C. LEDRÉ, Catholicisme 4:1765–68. W. H. PETERS, The Life of Benedict XV (Milwaukee 1959).

[W. H. PETERS]

GASPERI, ALCIDE DE

Italian statesman; b. Pieve Tesino (Trentino), Austria-Hungary, April 3, 1881; d. Sella, Italy, Aug. 19, 1954. After receiving his secondary education in Trent, he studied in the University of Vienna (1900–05), where he specialized in philosophy and philology. While there he devoted much time to organizing Catholic students and workers and instilling in them the principles of Leo XIII's social encyclical RERUM NOVARUM. After graduation he edited Il Trentino and made it the journal of the Popular party, which advocated Catholic solutions to socioeconomic problems and autonomy for the Trentino region. De Gasperi was elected to the Austrian Reichsrat in 1911. During World War I he supervised relief activities in the camps peopled with Italians who had been expelled from the Trentino by the Austrian authorities.

After Italy annexed the Trentino (1919), De Gasperi joined the Popular party of Don STURZO and was elected to the Italian parliament (1921). As an opponent of fascism, De Gasperi was arrested and charged with clandestine attempts at expatriation (1927). He received a four-year prison sentence, but illness and royal intervention effected his release (1928). From 1929 until 1943 he worked in the VATICAN LIBRARY, first as a cataloguer and later (1939–43) as the secretary of the library. In 1942 he revived the Popular party, which was known henceforth as the Christian Democratic party. He was premier of Italy (Dec. 1945 to July 1953), the first practicing Catholic to hold the post. Communists and left-wing Socialists were part of his coalition cabinets until June 1947, but they were excluded thereafter and membership was restricted mostly to his own party. As premier De Gasperi supported industrial and agrarian reforms, continuation of the Lateran Pacts, alliance with the West, and European unity. He is buried in Rome in the Church of S. Lorenzo.

Bibliography: A. DE GASPERI, I Cattolici dall'opposizione al governo (Bari 1955). I. GIORDANI, Alcide De Gasperi (Milan 1955). G. ANDREOTTI, De Gasperi e il suo tempo (Milan 1956). E. A. CARRILLO, A. De Gasperi (Notre Dame, Ind. 1965).

[E. A. CARRILLO]

GASQUET, FRANCIS NEIL AIDAN

Cardinal, historian, and in his time leading authority on English monasticism; b. London, Oct. 5, 1846; d. Rome, April 4, 1929. The son of a French emigré father and a Scots mother, he was educated at DOWNSIDE ABBEY, near Bath. In 1866 he entered the Benedictines at Belmont Abbey, Hereford. After his novitiate Gasquet (now Dom Aidan) returned to Downside, where he taught mathematics and history and was ordained in 1874. In 1878 his community elected him prior, but he resigned in 1885 because of ill health. Enforced convalescence led him to historical research, and much of his time was spent in the British Museum and the Public Record Office. His two volumes, entitled Henry VIII and the English Monasteries (1888–89) were welcomed as a vindication of English monks and nuns of the Reformation period and established him as an authority on monastic history in England. His Edward VI and the Book of Common Prayer (3d ed., London 1891) won him nomination to the Commission on Anglican Orders set up by Pope Leo XIII. After taking a prominent part in the reorganization of the English monasteries, he was elected (1900) abbot-president of the English Benedictine Congregation. During his term of office, the monasteries of Downside, Ampleforth, and Douai were raised to the ranks of abbeys, and houses of studies were opened in London and Cambridge. The international commission for the revision of the Vulgate had Gasquet as its first president. He raised $10,000 for the project on a lecture tour of the United States.

Pope Pius X, in the last consistory of his pontificate, created Abbot Gasquet a cardinal-deacon with the title of St. George in Velabro. Subsequently, his titular church was changed to Santa Maria in Campitelli, and in 1924 he was promoted to cardinal-priest. At the beginning of World War I (December 1914), the British government, anxious about Austrian and German influence in Roman ecclesiastical circles, secured the acceptance of a special envoy to the Vatican. Cardinal Gasquet was concerned in the establishment of these diplomatic relations. He was a member of the Congregations of Rites, De Propaganda Fide, of Religious, and of the Oriental Church. He became prefect of the Vatican archives in 1917 and, two years later, librarian of the Holy Roman Church. By his own wish, he was buried at Downside Abbey. Gasquet's published works include A History of the Catholic Church in England, 2 v. (London 1897), Parish Life in Medieval England (3d ed. London 1909), Religio religiosi, the Object and Scope of the Religious Life (4th ed. London 1924), and A History of the Venerable English College, Rome (London 1920). Some of his works have been translated into other languages.

Bibliography: E. C. BUTLER, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (1922–30) 330–332. D. KNOWLES, Cardinal Gasquet as an Historian (London 1957). S. LESLIE, Cardinal Gasquet: A Memoir (New York 1953). J. C. FOWLER, "Cardinal Gasquet at Downside," Downside Review 47 (1929) 123–131. B. KUYPERS, "Cardinal Gasquet in London," ibid. 132–149. U. BUTLER, "Cardinal Gasquet in Rome," ibid. 150–156. A. BAER, "The Careers of Cardinal Gasquet," American Benedictine Review 5 (1954) 113–122; A Benedictine Bibliography: An Author-Subject Union List 1:4112a–4212.

[B. EGAN]

GASSENDI, PIERRE

Philosopher whose works influenced the growth of mechanics and theoretical astronomy from GALILEO to Newton; b. Champtercier, Jan. 22, 1592; d. Paris, Oct. 24, 1655.

Exposed to, but not convinced by, the Aristotelianism presented during his student days at the University of Aix (1609–12), the philosophically hungry Gassendi taught rhetoric in the college at Digne. In 1614 he received minor clerical orders, was granted a doctorate in theology by the University of Avignon, and was elected canon-theologian of the cathedral chapter at Digne. In 1616 Gassendi joined the philosophical faculty of the Royal Bourbon College at Aix and was ordained a priest at Marseilles. Gassendi's courses at Aix were ambiguous, for he countered each presentation of an "official" Aristotelian thesis with objections calculated to weaken, if not destroy, its acceptability. When in 1621 the Bourbon College was entrusted to the Jesuits, Gassendi returned to Digne.

In 1624 at Grenoble, en route to Paris on chapter business, Gassendi published the first of his projected seven Unpopular Essays against the Aristotelians (Exercitationes paradoxicae adversus Aristoteleos . . .). At Paris Gassendi consolidated an intimate friendship with Marin Mersenne, who, fearful of the inroads of magical pseudonaturalism, counseled Gassendi to discontinue the Exercitationes series and search instead for a sounder philosophy to fill the intellectual vacuum created by the impending dissolution of Aristotelianism. Gassendi chose Epicurus to replace Aristotle. To explore and expound the philosophy of Epicurus, as compatible with both the demands of orthodox Christian faith and the needs of the new science, thenceforth became Gassendi's goal as scholar and scientist.

Gassendi's choice entailed two consequences: (1) epoche and (2) acceptance of both atoms and the void. The first consequence, as a conscientious refusal to commit oneself to any one of several competing theories, allowed Gassendi, in his 1643 Disquisitio metaphysica, to controvert powerfully the purportedly certain deductive system of Descartes's 1641 Meditationes de prima philosophia and to write (indeterminatamente) another book, his 1647 Institutio astronomica. Galileo had received papal authorization for such a book, but instead had produced his passionately partisan 1632 Dialogo in defense of Copernicus. Gassendi's espousal of atomism exorcised that theory from the curse of popular prejudice and made it respectable in a Christian milieu, but scientific development of it needed the quantitative and experimentally analytic results of Robert Boyle, not the qualitative and imaginatively synthetic descriptions of Gassendi's "compounds." Gassendi's acceptance of the void, however, allowed him to set the mechanics of Galileo's 1638 Discorsi into an isotropically neutral space, and hence to publish for the first time (1649) a scientifically adequate formulation of the principle of inertia.

Bibliography: Opera omnia, ed. H. L. HABERT DE MONTMOR and F. HENRI, 6 v. in 4 (Lyons 1658–75); repr. in 6 v. (Stuttgart 1964), introd. T. GREGORY. B. ROCHOT, ed., Pierre Gassendi: Sa vie et son oeuvre (Paris 1955). Comité du Tricentenaire de Gassendi, Actes du Congrès du Tricentenaire de Pierre Gassendi (Paris 1957). T. GREGORY, Scetticismo ed empirismo: Studio su Gassendi (Bari 1961). J. T. CLARK, "P. G. and the Physics of Galileo," Isis 54 (1963) 352–370.

[J. T. CLARK]

GASSER, VINZENZ FERRER

Prince-bishop of Brixen; b. Inzing (Tirol), Oct. 30, 1809; d. Brixen, April 6, 1879. After ordination (1833), he taught dogmatic theology and Oriental studies in the seminary at Brixen (1836–55). In 1848 he was elected to the Frankfort national assembly. Pius IX approved his nomination by Emperor Franz Joseph I as prince-bishop of Brixen (1856). As bishop he was an example of asceticism and scholarship for his clergy, for whom he also provided the necessary vocations by founding a seminary at Brixen, the Vincentinum, which still carries his name. As a member of the Tirol parliament (Landes-parlament), by virtue of his ecclesiastical position, he fought successfully for the exclusive recognition of the Catholic religion in Tirol, which had been guaranteed by ancient state laws. He became world famous during VATICAN COUNCIL I as an outstanding theologian. As a member of, and speaker for, the commission on faith, which had the responsibility of rewriting the first schema on the Catholic faith, he defended successfully the first part of the new schema, prepared by himself. Later during the commission's discussions on the essential nature of the primacy of the pope, he was responsible for having inserted in the schema the explanation that the papal primacy does not limit the ordinary and immediate governing authority of bishops, but protects and strengthens it. Finally (July 11, 1870), he presented to the Council fathers the decree, composed by himself, on papal infallibility in a four-hour Latin speech with such conviction that the decree was approved by a majority of the bishops with only minor changes, and was solemnly defined a week later.

Bibliography: J. ZOBL, Vinzenz Gasser (Bressanone 1883). C. BUTLER, The Vatican Council, 2 v. (New York 1930), with photo. A. SPARBER, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche 4:525–526.

[F. MAASS]

GASTON, WILLIAM JOSEPH

Judge, statesman; b. New Bern, N.C., Sept. 19, 1778; d. Raleigh, N.C., Jan. 23, 1844. He was one of three children of Alexander, a physician, and Margaret (Sharpe) Gaston. In 1781 his father, an ardent rebel, was killed by Tories. William became the first student of Georgetown College, Washington, D.C., but after two years withdrew because of ill health. He graduated from Princeton in 1796, studied law with François X. Martin, and in two years was admitted to the bar. His election to the North Carolina Senate at 22 was the beginning of a 30-year career of service that included four terms in the state Senate and seven in the state House of Commons. He drafted many of North Carolina's important statutes and was chairman of the joint committee that in 1818 created the new supreme court of the state. He was trustee of the state university for 42 years. In 1840 he wrote the song "The Old North State."

In 1808 Gaston was a Federalist presidential elector. He was twice elected to Congress (1813, 1815), where he was a leader of the antiwar Federalists. Among the speeches that gained for him a national reputation, the best known was that on "The Previous Question," directed against Henry Clay. It has been frequently reprinted as a masterpiece of parliamentary oratory. In 1815 he obtained from Congress the charter for Georgetown University. Despite a prohibition of the state constitution against anyone holding office "who did not believe in the truths of the Protestant religion," Gaston was elected by the legislature in 1833 to the state supreme court. Two years later he was elected to the state constitutional convention, where his eloquence effected the substitution of the word "Christian" for "Protestant" in the constitution.

Gaston was known for his humanitarianism and ready defense of minority causes. He dared to speak against slavery and did so in 1832 in delivering the commencement address at the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill. Three years later he spoke at Princeton against the nativist movement. As a member of the state supreme court he handed down opinions that were models of clarity, logic, and vigor of expression. His judgment in State v. Will established the rights of slaves against brutal treatment; another concerning the citizenship of the colored freemen (State v. Manuel) was cited by Judge Benjamin Curtis in the Dred Scott case. Gaston was awarded honorary doctorates by Harvard and Princeton Universities and the University of Pennsylvania. He served Bp. John England of Charleston as legal and financial advisor and saved the U.S. Catholic Miscellany from destruction on several occasions. Gaston was married three times and was survived by five children. He died on the bench while presiding over a session of the North Carolina supreme court in Raleigh and was buried in New Bern.

Bibliography: P. K. GUILDAY, The Life and Times of John England, 2 v. (New York 1927). J. H. SCHAUINGER, William Gaston: Carolinian (Milwaukee 1949).

[J. H. SCHAUINGER]

GATES OF HELL

This phrase occurs in the New Testament only at Mt 16.18: “. . . upon this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.” The Greek word here rendered “hell” is ᾍδης (HADES), which in the Septuagint regularly translates the Hebrew שְׁאוֹל (SHEOL). In the Old Testament Sheol was conceived as the dark, underworld abode of all the dead; in later Judaism it came to be thought of as a place of punishment for the souls of the wicked, whereas the souls of the just awaited the resurrection in paradise. The earlier idea is seen in the New Testament at Acts 2.27, 31; the latter notion is found in Lk 16.22–26, where the rich man is buried in Hades and there suffers torments, whereas Lazarus is carried by angels into Abraham’s bosom.

The phrase “the gates of Hades–Sheol” occurs in the Old Testament at Is 38.10 and Wis 16.13, where it is a figurative expression for death. This is likewise its meaning in the apocrypha (Psalms of Solomon 16.2; 3 Mc 5.51) and in classical Greek literature (Homer, Iliad 5.646; 9.312; Odyssey 14.156; Aeschylus, Agamemnon 1290; Euripides, Hippolytus, 56). Since death is seen as the passage through the gates of hell, which then shut to prevent all escape, the gates can stand, as pars-pro-toto, for the whole realm.

Exegetes differ as to the exact sense of the promise in Mt 16.18 that “the gates of hell shall not prevail.” Noting that in the Old Testament and its apocrypha the gates of Sheol meant death, A. von Harnack and P. Schepens take it as a promise of immortality. (Von Harnack’s conjecture that the original saying contained no reference to the Church, but only a promise that PETER would not die, lacks solid foundation.) Schepens argues that a promise of immortality is a figurative way of promising the Church’s INDEFECTIBILITY. J. Schmid [Regensburger Neues Testament, ed. A. Wikenhauser and O. Kuss, (Regensburg 1955–) 1:249–250] likewise takes the gates of Hades to mean the power of death, and the promise to mean that the Church will endure to the end of time. O. Cullmann agrees that Hades is the realm of the dead, but takes the promise to mean that its gates will not withstand the assault of the Church, which will force Hades to release its dead at the resurrection (Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, 6:107). Against this, J. Jeremias (ibid. 6:926) argues that the promise in v. 18c must be understood as developing the theme of the rock, which he explains in the light of the contemporary image of the cosmic rock that bars the flood of the nether world. Hence he concludes that the gates of Hades stand for the hostile power in the lower world, which will storm in vain against the rock. Until now there has been no general acceptance of the conjecture of R. Eppel and J. B. Bauer that the original Aramaic word meant gate keepers rather than gates.

William Joseph Gaston, engraving by A.B. Durand, from portrait by George Cooke.

Bibliography: J. JEREMIAS, TDNT 6:924–928. M. SALLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1305. J. DUBLIN, “The Gates of Hades,” The Expositor 11 (1916) 401–409. P. SCHEPENS, “L’Authenticité de S. Matt. 16,18,” Recherches de science religieuse 10 (1920) 267–302. L. E. SULLIVAN, “The Gates of Hell,” Theological Studies 10 (1949) 62–64. R. EPPEL, “L’Interpretation de Matt. 16:18b,” Mélanges offerts à M. Goguel (Paris 1950) 71–73. J. B. BAUER, “Ostiarum,” Biblica 34 (1953) 430–31.

[F. A. SULLIVAN]

GĀTHĀS

The hymns of ZOROASTER preserved as part of the Avesta, are short poems, comparable to those of the Rig-Veda in India. Although their language is fairly intelligible, being closely akin to Vedic Sanskrit, their style and contents make them excessively difficult to understand and translate. Their burden is the praise, untiringly repeated and varied, of the god Ahura Mazda and of his court or family of Entities, who bear abstract names and are, at the same time, human (moral and social) qualities personified. On the other hand, the cult of the ancient gods or daevas (cf. Sanskrit deva “god”) and of the Evil Spirit [see AHURA MAZDA (OHRMAZD) AND AHRIMAN] and his entourage is unrelentingly combatted. It is not clear whether the sacrifice of the sacred liquor (see AVESTA) and the bull sacrifice were prohibited as such, or only special, repulsive forms of them. Anyhow, a destiny of woe in a dark hell with nauseous food is promised to the daevas-worshippers, whereas the followers of Ahura Mazda and his Holy Spirit, i.e., all those who rally to Truth, Justice, etc., against the forces of evil, will hereafter enjoy bliss, either in heaven or on a renovated earth. This renovation, entailing a resurrection of the body, will be brought about by coming saviors.

“The Gates of Hell,” sculpture by Auguste Rodin. (©Vanni Archives/CORBIS)

Bibliography: J. DUCHESNE-GUILLEMIN, The Hymns of Zarathustra, tr. M. HENNING (London 1952); La Religion de l'Iran ancien (Paris 1962).

[J. DUCHESNE-GUILLEMIN]

GATTERER, MICHAEL

Jesuit pastoral theologian; b. Oberrasen (south Tirol), Sept. 21, 1862; d. Innsbruck, June 6, 1944. He studied theology at Innsbruck as a disciple of Josef Jungmann and was ordained in 1885. After three years of experience in pastoral work, he entered the Society of Jesus in 1888 and began his teaching career at Innsbruck in 1892, where he became professor of moral theology, homiletics, and catechetics. His writings include: Katechetik (Innsbruck 1909); Die Erstkommunion der Kinder (Innsbruck 1911); Elementarkatechesen (Innsbruck 1923), a work in collaboration with A. Gruber; and Das Religionsbuch der Kirche (4 v. Innsbruck 1928–30). Establishing this Augustinian goal for himself, Gatterer held that love of God is the beginning, middle, and end of every religious inquiry. In keeping, however, with the declaration on faith of Vatican Council I, he maintained that the authority of the Church is the point of departure for every investigation. During the famous dispute about catechetical methods that arose about 1900, Gatterer insisted that catechesis should begin with the actual concerns of the child about his soul and should teach him to live devoutly.

Bibliography: Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus 3:1265–68. J. A. JUNGSMANN, Lexicon der Pädagogik 2:214–215. W. CROCE, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche 4:529–530.

[F. C. LEHNER]

GATTINARA, MERCURINO ARBORIO DI

Grand chancellor of Emperor CHARLES V, cardinal; b. Castello di Arborio, Vercelli (Piedmont), Italy, June 10, 1465; d. Innsbruck, Austria, June 5, 1530. Gattinara, orphaned at 14, was raised at Vercelli in the household of his uncle Pietro di Gattinara. His studies in jurisprudence began under the distinguished lawyer Bartolomeo Ranzo and were completed at the University of Turin. He became a successful advocate, then a professor of law at the University of Dôle and a jurisconsult for Philibert II, Duke of Savoy. After the Duke's death in 1504, he served the Duke's widow, Margaret of Austria (1480–1530). When Margaret was chosen by Emperor Maximilian I to be regent of the Netherlands and guardian of his grandson Charles, Gattinara remained in her court. There he oriented the political interests of the future Charles V away from the narrow dynastic traditions of the Burgundian court and toward the principles of universal monarchy, which he had himself learned from Dante's De Monarchia. In 1513 Gattinara was named president of the Council of the Netherlands; he was later accused of treason, and after defending himself he retired to a Carthusian monastery. Maximilian, needing his services, returned him to power and sent him on diplomatic missions to France, Italy, and Spain. Charles, after his accession to the throne of Spain (1516), made Gattinara his grand chancellor to succeed Jean de Sauvage, who died June 7, 1518. In this office, which he kept until his death, Gattinara influenced Charles's statecraft concerning the need of a general council as a political and religious move, and an Italian policy that would oust French control from northern Italy. He was created a cardinal and bishop of Ostia by Clement VII in 1529.

Gattinara's concept of imperial power is expressed in a memorandum sent to Charles after his election on June 28, 1519. It reminded the new Emperor that he now had power hitherto possessed only by Charlemagne, and that he "was on the way to world sovereignty and the gathering of all Christendom under one shepherd." He left a large correspondence, essays on political subjects, and an autobiography edited by C. Bornate, "Historia vitae et gestorum per dominum magnum cancellarium . . .," Miscellanea di storia italiana, 3d ser. 17 (Turin 1915) 231–585.

Bibliography: K. BRANDI, The Emperor Charles V: The Growth and Destiny of a Man and a World-Empire, tr. C. V. WEDGWOOD (New York 1939). Jedin Trent 1. C. BORNATE, Enciclopedia Italiana di scienze, lettere ed arti 16:451. P. MIKAT, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche 4:530. P. SANNAZZARO, Enciclopedia cattolica 5:1960–61.

[E. D. MCSHANE]

GATTORNO, ROSA MARIA BENEDETTA, BL.

Also known as Anna Rosa Gattorno; widow, mother, founder of the Institute of Daughters of St. Anne; b. Oct. 14, 1841, Genoa, Italy; d. May 6, 1900, Rome. One of six children born to Francesco Gattorno and Adelaide Campanella, Rosa was educated at home. She married her cousin Gerolamo Custò (November 5, 1852) and gave birth to three children (1853–57). Gerolamo's death from tuberculosis (1858) left her with continued financial problems and a sickly, deaf-mute eldest daughter. Her youngest child died the same year. Though grief-stricken, Rosa offered herself in charitable service and care of her two surviving children. She privately vowed perpetual chastity and obedience (1858), then added a vow of poverty (1861). Even during her marriage, Rosa grew spiritually through daily Communion and the gift of a hidden stigmata. As her reputation for holiness increased, she was chosen president of the Pious Union of the New Ursuline Daughters of Mary Immaculate and revised its rule (1864).

This revision led her to consider founding a new religious order, but she was torn between her duty to her children and her new heightened sense of religious vocation. She sought advice from her confessor, the archbishop of Genoa, St. Francis of Camporosso and Pope Pius IX (1866), and then decided to establish the Institute of Daughters of St. Anne. The new foundation was made in Piacenza, Dec. 8, 1866, with the help of Giovanni Battista Tornatore, CM. Rosa received the habit in 1867 and was professed with 11 other sisters in 1870. The institute, dedicated to working with disadvantaged youth, received approval in 1879, as did the rule in 1892. She collaborated with Giovanni Battista SCALABRINI in ministering to the speech and hearing impaired. She contracted a virulent influenza in February 1900, died the following month, and was buried in the church adjoining the generalate.

The institute expanded before and after Mother Rosa's death throughout Europe to South America, Africa, the Middle East, Asia, and Oceania, where the sisters have been engaging in evangelization, catechesis, and assistance to the poor including drug rehabilitation centers, schools, daycare centers, and homes for the elderly. Her charism has expanded to include contemplative sisters, an association of priests (Sons of St. Anne), a secular institute, and a lay association (Movement of Hope). She was beatified by Pope John Paul II on April 9, 2000.

Feast: May 6.

Bibliography: L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed., no. 16 (2000): 3.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GAUCHERIUS, ST.

Augustinian canon, abbot; b. Meulan-sur-Seine, c. 1060; d. near Limoges, April 9, 1140. Having received a fine education, Gaucherius retired to the forests near Limoges to live the contemplative life of a hermit when he was about 18 years old. Gradually cells of other devout men were erected in the vicinity, and Gaucherius founded a priory there (c. 1078) that came to be called Saint-Jean of Aureil. A daughterhouse of Saint-Rufus et André, founded earlier by Gaucherius's kinsman, Rufus, in Avignon, it followed the Rule of St. Augustine (see CANONS REGULAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE). Gaucherius's disciples included such saints as Lambert of Angoulême, Faucherius, and STEPHEN OF MURET. He also founded a convent for women and gave it the rule of the Canonesses Regular of St. Augustine. He was canonized in 1194.

Feast: April 9

Bibliography: Acta Santorum April 1:841–844. A. LECLERQ, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A.

BAUDRILLAT et al. (Paris 1912–) 5:710–713. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'histoire des fêtes, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 4:218–219. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:59–60.

[E. J. KEALEY]

GAUDENTIUS OF BRESCIA, ST.

Fl. 400; date of birth, episcopal consecration, and death unknown. The chief source for his life is his own Sermo de ordinatione sua. He was on a journey to the East when he received the news that he had been chosen bishop of Brixia (Brescia) to succeed Filastrius (d. 397). Despite his opposition to the nomination, he was finally persuaded by St. AMBROSE and other northern Italian bishops to accept it. He was one of the Latin bishops who were requested by the Emperor Honorius and Pope INNOCENT I to go to Constantinople to plead with the Emperor Arcadius for the return of St. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM from exile, but this mission failed (see Palladius, Dial. de vita Chrys., 4; Chrysostom, Epist., 184). Of his 21 extant sermons, ten were delivered during Easter week, and the last (De vita et obitu Philastrii), on the 15th anniversary of the death of his predecessor in the See of Brescia. The sermons show that Gaudentius had a remarkably sound knowledge of theology. Sermon 2 contains an important treatment of the Eucharist. Sermon 9 defends the virginity of the Blessed Virgin, and Sermon 5 contains an interesting passage on the episcopal staff and the duties of the bishop as a guide and corrector of the faithful. Since he knew Greek, Gaudentius in his exegesis was able to compare Latin Biblical readings with those of the Greek text. His style is simple and clear and much closer to the best school standard of the age than that of Filastrius. The sermons of Gaudentius were much admired for their style and content by his flock. Those extant owe their preservation to the fact that a high official, Benivolus, a magister memoriae and friend of Gaudentius, furnished the bishop with stenographic copies, which the bishop revised for circulation in written form. The influence of his classical training is concretely revealed by borrowings from Terence, Cicero, Vergil, and Ovid. There is a modern critical edition of the Sermons (Tractatus) by A. Glueck, Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 68 (1956).

Feast: Oct. 25.

Bibliography: G. M. BRUNI, Teologia della storia secondo Gaudenzio da Brescia (Vicenza 1967). C. TRUZZI, Zeno, Gaudenzio e Cromazio: testi e contenuti della predicazione cristiana per le chiese di Verona, Brescia e Aquileia (Brescia 1985). A. JÜLICHER, "Gaudentius (9)," Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen 7.1 (1910) 859–861. O. BARDENHEWER, Geschichte der Altkirchlichen Literatur 3:485–486. U. MORICCA, Storia della letteratura cris- tiana, 3 v. in 5 (Turin 1923–1935) 2.1:585–590. F. SAVIO, Gli antichi vescovi d'Italia, 4 v. (Bergamo 1898–1932) 3:149–156.

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

GAUDENTIUS OF GNEZNO, ST.

First metropolitan of Gniezno, younger brother of St. ADALBERT; b. c. 960–70; d. c. 1006–11. Having joined the BENEDICTINE order in Rome in 988, he was later ordained priest there. About 996 he accompanied Adalbert on his missionary journey into Prussia, where he witnessed Adalbert's martyrdom. When Gaudentius returned to Rome for his brother's CANONIZATION process, the matter of the first archbishopric for Poland came to the fore. In late 999 he was consecrated with the title archiepiscopus sancti Adalberti martyris. The following March, papal legates enthroned him as archbishop in Gniezno in the presence of Emperor OTTO III and King Boleslaw Chrobry. Details of his episcopal activity are vague. His relics were translated to Prague in 1039. His cultus is immemorial, but without formal ratification.

Feast: Jan. 5, Aug. 25.

Bibliography: G. LABUDA, in Polski Słownik Biograficzny, v.7 (Cracow 1949) 308–309. F. DVORNIK, The Making of Central and Eastern Europe (London 1949) 101–105, 143–144. Z. SZOSTKIEWICZ, "Katalog Biskupów obrz. łac. Przedrozbirowej Polski," Sacrum Poloniae Millennium 1 (1954) 450. W. MEYSZTOWICZ, "Koronacje Pierwszych Piastów," ibid. 3 (1956) 294.

[L. SIEKANIEC]

GAUDERICH OF VELLETRI

Bishop; fl. second half of 9th century; d. before 897. One of the chief counselors of Pope John VIII, he had probably been consecrated bishop of Velletri by Pope Nicholas I c. 865. Shortly after Nicholas's death (Nov. 13, 867), Gauderich, together with Bp. Stephen of Nepi and JOHN THE DEACON (Hymmonides), was unjustly exiled by Duke Lambert of Spoleto, but was soon recalled to Rome by Pope ADRIAN II (December 867). In 868 Adrian had Gauderich and Bishop FORMOSUS (later pope) ordain the Slavic disciples of St. Cyril who had just arrived in Rome. In the Roman synod of 869, Gauderich, as spokesman for the bishops, urged severe action against PHOTIUS. In the following decade, he performed several important legations for Pope JOHN VIII. In 879 he was instrumental in securing the rehabilitation of Photius; and, apparently in gratitude, Photius sent him a very friendly letter and a gift (probably an enameled cross) in spring 880. Though Gauderich died before 897, there is no substantial proof that he had retired to Monte Cassino. To honor Pope St. CLEMENT I, patron of his cathedral, he asked John Hymmonides to compile an account of Clement's miracles and the translation of his relics to Rome. He received a description of this translation from ANASTASIUS the Librarian (Epistolae 7:435–438). Hymmonides died before finishing the work, which was then completed by Gauderich himself [Bibliotheca Casiniensis IV (Monte Cassino 1874) 373–390]. Although only partially preserved, this work was used by later authors, and is one of the chief sources for the lives of SS. CYRIL and Methodius.

Bibliography: F. DVORNIK, The Photian Schism (Cambridge, Eng. 1948). P. MEYVAERT and P. DEVOS, "Trois énigmes cyrillo-méthodiennes de la Légende italique," Analecta Bollandiana 73 (1955) 375–461; "Autour de Léon d'Ostie et de sa Translatio s. Clementis," ibid. 74 (1956) 189–240. P. DUTHILLEUL, L'Évangélisation des Slaves: Cyrille et Méthode (Tournai 1963) 20–25, 119–120.

[G. T. DENNIS]

GAUL, EARLY CHURCH IN

Earliest evidence of the existence of Christianity in Gaul stems from the middle of the 2d century; the legends tracing evangelization to the Apostles and Disciples are totally unhistorical. In about 150 a Christian community was organized in the Roman colony of Lyons to care for a large group of Greek settlers, but in 177 a popular uprising caused persecution to break out there. Among some 48 known victims were the first bishop of the city, Pothinus, who died in prison; the deacon Sanctus of Vienne; the young slave girl Blandina; and the youth Ponticus. The details of the persecution are known from a letter sent by the Christians of Lyons and Vienne to their brethren in Asia Minor (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 5.1–4).

Foundation of the Episcopacy. The successor of Pothinus was IRENAEUS OF LYONS, who in his youth had been a disciple of POLYCARP at Smyrna. Christianity spread from Lyons into the valley of the Rhône and penetrated northward toward Treves and the Rhine Valley. Irenaeus wrote to Pope VICTOR (c. 190) to give him the collective opinion of the parishes of Gaul on the EASTER CONTROVERSY (Hist. eccl. 5.23). Although Irenaeus suffered martyrdom under Septimius Severus (c. 202), according to GREGORY OF TOURS (Hist. Franc. 1.27), Eusebius makes no reference to the death of the great bishop. The Greek epitaph of PECTORIUS discovered at Autun indicates that there were Christians in that city by the second half of the 2d century or at the beginning of the 3d; by 250 there were some 30 episcopal sees, including Lyons, Arles, Marseilles, Autun, Vienne, Toulouse, Narbonne, Treves, Reims, and Paris.

A letter from CYPRIAN OF CARTHAGE to Pope STEPHEN on the severity of Bp. Marcion of Arles, in dealing with the lapsi of the Decian persecution, names several Gallic bishops (Cyprian, Epist. 68.2–3). Faustinus of Lyons had informed the Pope of the schismatic attitude of Marcion and appealed to Cyprian to solicit the intervention of Rome. According to Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. 1.30), Bp. Saturninus of Toulouse suffered martyrdom in the persecution of Decius (249–251); in that case, the bishopric of Toulouse was anterior to 250. Bishops were established also in Belgian and Celtic Gaul; but the western region, less Romanized, seems to have been neglected. The account of seven bishops sent to Gaul by Pope Fabian (c. 250) is found only in Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. 1.28) and has no other evidence, nor is there any proof that the churches of Tours, Limoges, and Clermont were founded at this time. The later persecutions had only a few victims in Gaul; under Valerian (257), Denis of Paris suffered martyrdom. But thanks to the benevolent policy of Constantinus Chlorus, the persecution of Diocletian was not carried out in Gaul.

There were 36 episcopal sees in Gaul when CONSTANTINE I granted peace to the Church. Sixteen of these were represented at the Council of Arles (314), 12 of them by their bishops: Arles, Lyons, Vienne, Marseilles, Vaison, Bordeaux, Eauze, Autun, Rouen, Reims, Treves, and Cologne. In the 30 years following this council, efforts were made toward ecclesiastical organization. By the middle of the 4th century, the number of episcopal sees had doubled the number listed for the year 313. By the time of the death of THEODOSIUS I (395), the Church in Gaul was fully organized in diocesan structure and hierarchy; but it was only in the last third of the 4th century that the Nicene provision for provincial grouping was effectively adopted. According to the Notitia Galliarum, Gaul counted 17 provinces in 375.

Administration and the Control of Heresy. Conflict in the southwest over the attempt to follow the framework of the civil administration in provincial grouping led to controversy between the metropolitan of Vienne and the bishop of Arles. The latter claimed to be the metropolitan, since the prefecture of Gaul had been transferred from Treves to Arles. In 398 the bishops of Gaul submitted the matter to the bishops of the province of Milan, meeting in synod at Turin. They suggested a division of the province between the two bishops. The same synod was asked to settle the claims of the bishops of the Narbonnaise against Bp. Proclus of Marseilles, who had assumed the office of metropolitan of that province.

Only one bishop from Gaul had assisted at the Council of Nicaea; but after the sojourn in Treves of ATHANASIUS OF ALEXANDRIA, who had been exiled by Constantine I (335–337), the bishops of Gaul participated in the controversies that had their rise in the political Arianism of Constantius. At the Council of SARDICA (343) that restored Athanasius, bishops were present from Lyons and Treves. Although Saturninus of Arles sided with the Arianizing Emperor, HILARY OF POITIERS and Phebadus of Agen strongly supported the orthodox position. After the Council of Béziers (356), Hilary spent four years in exile in Phrygia (356–360). On his return, in spite of the wavering of almost all the bishops of Gaul at the Council of Rimini (359), Hilary succeeded in having the episcopate of Gaul assembled about him at the Council of Paris (360). “Everyone knows,” wrote Sulpicius Severus, “that Gaul is indebted to Hilary alone for the benefit of freedom from heresy” (Chron. 2.45). In 380 two bishops of Aquitaine took part in the Council of Saragossa that condemned PRISCILLIANISM; the next year, six Gallic bishops assisted at the Council of Aquileia that dealt with two bishops accused of Arianism.

Parishes and Monasteries. Since a bishop was an official personage, he installed his cathedral inside the city. In the suburbs, cemeterial basilicas were built to honor the tombs of martyrs and confessors. The apostolate in the countryside began only with the peace of the Church. It was carried out through the erection of parishes in the villages. St. Martin of Tours, who was noted for evangelizing the rural areas, created the first six parishes of his diocese (371–397). At the beginning of the 5th century, the number of pagans, almost insignificant in the cities, was still high in the country places. The oratories established by the lords of rural estates were often transformed into parochial churches. In the second half of the 4th century, following the example of the East, hermitages and monasteries were established. The oldest known was the modest monastery that Martin of Tours organized at Ligugé near Poitiers. Later as bishop, Martin gathered his numerous disciples at Marmoutier near his episcopal city. Many women embraced a life of virginity; some lived in common, others, such as St. GENEVIÈVE OF PARIS, lived at home. There were also recluses among them (Sulpicius Severus, Dial. 2.12). Monastic life gained in prestige during the 5th century. Among the monasteries were Lérins, established by HONORATUS OF ARLES (c. 410), and that of St. Victor at Marseilles founded by John CASSIAN (c. 416) on the model of Egyptian monasticism.

Consolidation. The 5th century witnessed the struggle to consolidate the power of the episcopate of Gaul and to preserve communication with Rome in the midst of barbarian inroads. Under Pope Siricius (384–398) a number of decrees were sent to bishops in Gaul, and the popes were frequently called upon to preserve discipline and uphold the rights of sees and bishops. In 417 jurisdictional conflicts arose when Pope ZOSIMUS, pressed by Bp. Patroclus of Arles, placed under the metropolitan authority of Arles all the ancient Narbonnaise, to which was annexed the provinces of the Maritime Alps. Although this attempt to create the primacy of Arles was not sustained by the successors of Zosimus, the city remained a great ecclesiastical center, especially under Bishop HILARY OF ARLES (429–449), whose encroachments were severely censured by Pope LEO I in 445 (Epist. 10). Before attracting the unfavorable attention of the Pope, Hilary had tried more than once to assemble all the bishops of the south-east in inter-provincial council: Riez (439), Orange (441), and Vaison (442).

The VANDALS raged through Gaul between 407 and 408, but the invasions of the VISIGOTHS, Burgundians, FRANKS, and Alamanni were of more serious consequence. These peoples, at first established as foederati of the Roman Empire, set up independent kingdoms and destroyed what remained of imperial authority. The bishops, among whom were Aignan of Orléans, GERMAIN OF AUXERRE, and Lupus of Troyes, tried to alleviate the hardships of the time. The Church adapted itself to the rule of barbarian kings: Visigoths in Aquitaine and a part of the Narbonnaise, Burgundians in the valleys of the Rhine and the Saine, and Franks in Belgian Gaul and in the Rhine region. With the baptism of Clovis and about 3,000 of his retainers (c. 496), the conversion of the Frankish nation was soon an accomplished fact.

Scholars and Defenders of the Faith. Gaul produced some of the foremost writers of early Christianity. Two works of Irenaeus of Lyons (originally from Asia Minor, however) are extant: Proof of the Apostolic Preaching and Adversus haereses. Hilary of Poitiers (d. 367), the first to write in Latin, composed De Trinitate, Commentarium in s. Mattheum, and Tractatus super Psalmos, as well as controversial tracts in defense of Nicene orthodoxy. St. Jerome reports that Hilary also composed a Liber hymnorum. PAULINUS OF NOLA (353–431) composed most of his poetry after he had left Gaul for Italy. Sulpicius Severus (d. 420) wrote excellent Latin prose, as his Dialogues, Chronicle, and Vita Martini prove. The latter work (Ancient Christian Writers 7) popularized the cult of the famous bishop and attracted pilgrims to his tomb. John Cassian (d. 435) wrote De Incarnatione at the request of the deacon, later Pope Leo I, and composed his Institutes and Collations as a stimulus to monastic spirituality. His Semi-Pelagian tendencies provoked a lay theologian, PROSPER OF AQUITAINE, to come to the defense of St. Augustine in works of prose and verse. VINCENT OF LÉRINS (d. 450) exhibited Semi-Pelagian leaning in his Commonitorium, and Salvian of Marseilles (c. 400) wrote his famous De gubernatione Dei (Ancient Christian Writers 7). The hagiography that developed in the 6th century with Gregory of Tours' eight books of miracles is not trustworthy, although his History of the Franks, despite its credulous and moralizing tendency, is an indispensable source for the early history of Christian Gaul and one of the major historical works of the Middle Ages.

The zeal of CAESARIUS OF ARLES (502–542) was exercised in an attempt to vivify the Church in Gaul by means of popular preaching and a reform of ecclesiastical discipline. Some 238 of his sermons have been preserved and reveal him to have been the greatest popular preacher in the Latin Church after St. Augustine. The synod at Orange (529), presided over by Caesarius, submitted its 25 canons rejecting PELAGIANISM and Semi-Pelagianism to Pope BONIFACE II (530–532). The papal confirmation of the decisions was accepted throughout the Church, and thus the first great Western controversy in regard to grace was brought to a close. With the death of Caesarius, a new phase in the Gallican Church began.

Bibliography: J. LEBRETON and J. ZEILLER, The History of the Primitive Church, tr. E. C. MESSENGER, 4 bks. in 2 (New York 1949) 1:360–363; 2:717–728, 772–778, 1193–96. J. R. PALANQUE et al., Fliche-Martin v.3–4, Eng. The Church in the Christian Roman Empire, tr. E. C. MESSENGER, 2 v. in 1 (New York 1953) 1:272–283; 2:634–647. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, eds. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 5.2:2116–2575; 6.1:310–473, s.v. Gallicane église; 8.2:2357–2440, s.v. Légendes Gallicanes; 12.2:1717–27, s.v. Notitia Galliarum. É. GRIFFE, La Gaule chrétienne à l'époque romaine v.1–2.1 (Paris 1947–57; rev. ed. 1965-); Catholicisme 4:1775–82; Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, eds. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 2 4:504–506. L. SCHMIDT and M. C. PFISTER, Cambridge Medieval History, 8 v. (London-New York 1911–36) 1:277–303. S. DILL, Roman Society in Gaul in the Merovingian Age (London 1926). GREGORY OF TOURS, The History of the Franks, ed. and tr. O. M. DALTON, 2 v. (Oxford 1927). C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux (Paris 1907–38) 1.1:192–193, on legendary synod of Narbonne; 1.2, passim; 2.1–2, passim. References to the pertinent councils may be checked through the Table Analytique at end of pt. 2 in each v. A. LATREILLE et al., Histoire du catholicisme en France, 3 v. (Paris 1957–62) v.1. E. MÂLE, La Fin du paganisme en Gaule (Paris 1950).

[M. C. HILFERTY]

GAUZELIN OF TOUL, ST.

Bishop; d. Sept. 7, 962. Of a noble Frankish family, he entered the chancery of Charles the Simple as notary (913); he was chosen bishop of Toul, March 17, 922. His episcopate was disturbed by various political problems. In his time Lorraine came under the control of Abp. BRUNO OF COLOGNE, brother of OTTO I, who created the duchies of Upper and Lower Lorraine (959). The city and Diocese of Toul, part of Upper Lorraine, also suffered from the Hungarian invasions of 928 and 954. Standing free of these contentions, Gauzelin tried to maintain and develop the patrimony of his church and favored monastic reform. Einold, the archdeacon of Toul, started the reform of GORZE, and Gauzelin encouraged various foundations, personally introducing the observance of SAINT-BENOÎT-SUR-LOIRE at the Abbey St. Aper. He was buried near Nancy, in the Abbey of Bouxières-aux-Dames, which he founded.

Feast: Sept. 7.

Bibliography: Gesta episcoporum Tullensium, J. P. NIGNE, Patrologia latina 157:459–463. Acta Sanctorum, Sept. 3:143–144. E. MARTIN, Histoire des diocèses de Toul, de Nancy et de Saint-Dié, 3 v. (Nancy 1900–03) v.1.

[J. CHOUX]

GAVAN, JOHN, BL.

Jesuit priest and martyr; b. London, England, 1640; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London), June 20, 1679. Affectionately called “Angel”, Gavan studied at the Jesuit college at St-Omer, Flanders, before his entrance into the Society of Jesus at Watten (September 7, 1660). Prior to his ordination (1670), he studied philosophy at Liège and theology at Rome. Upon returning to England (1671), he ministered fruitfully for eight years in Staffordshire, until he was implicated by Stephen Dugdale in the fictitious Titus Oates Plot to kill the king. When a bounty of 50 pounds was placed on his head, he planned to escape to the Continent disguised as a servant. He was discovered in the imperial ambassador’s stables, arrested on Jan. 23, 1679, and imprisoned at the Gatehouse (London), then at Newgate Prison.

During his trial at the Old Bailey with Frs. Thomas WHITBREAD, Antony TURNER, William HARCOURT, and John FENWICK, he served as spokesman. They were found guilty of high treason based on perjured testimony with the judge’s prodding of the jury. On the gallows he again protested his innocence, then said: “I am contented to undergo an ignominious death for the love of you, my dear Jesus, seeing you have been pleased to undergo an ignominious death for the love of me.” He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England); December 1 (Jesuits).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891). J. N. TYLEND, Jesuit Saints & Martyrs (Chicago 1998) 179–81.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GAY, CHARLES LOUIS

Ascetical theologian and spiritual writer; b. Paris, Oct. 1, 1815; d. Paris, Jan. 19, 1892. As a young man Gay led an indifferent religious life, but the sermons of Lacordaire began his conversion, and he decided to study for the priesthood. Ordained in 1845, he soon became extremely popular as a preacher and spiritual director. He based his direction on a clear exposition of Christian dogma, insisting that instruction must precede advice. He belonged to the Oratorian school of spirituality and followed the footsteps of Pierre de BÉRULLE. Among his chief writings are De la vie et des vertus chrétiennes (2 v. Paris 1874), of which 10,000 copies were sold in 18 months, and Elévations sur la vie et la doctrine de Notre Seigneur Jésus Christ (2 v. Paris 1879). He was appointed vicar general of Poitiers and later auxiliary bishop and attended Vatican Council I as a theologian. In addition to his many books, several volumes of sermons and six of letters witness to his great influence on the France of his day.

Bibliography: G. LIÉVIN, Enciclopedia cattolica 5:1969. P. POURRAT, Christian Spirituality, tr. W. H. MITCHELL et al., 4 v. (Westminster, Md. 1953–55) 4:493–499. B. DU BOISROUVRAY, Mgr. Gay . . . sa vie, ses oeuvres, 2 v. (Tours 1922–27).

[M. J. BARRY]

GEBHARD II OF CONSTANCE, ST.

Bishop; b. 949; d. Aug. 27, 995. He was the son of Count Udalrich VI of Bregenz and was educated in Constance under Bp. CONRAD OF CONSTANCE. In 979 Emperor OTTO II made him Conrad's second successor. Like Conrad he was concerned with monastic reform, and in 983 he founded the Abbey of PETERSHAUSEN opposite Constance. From Pope JOHN XV he obtained relics of Pope St. GREGORY THE GREAT, under whose title he consecrated the abbey church in 992; however, since the church was modeled on ST. PETER'S BASILICA in Rome, the abbey came to be known as Petershausen. Gebhard called an abbot and BENEDICTINE monks from EINSIEDL, thus introducing the customs of that great reform center, but Petershausen never played the important role he had hoped for. Gebhard was buried in his foundation, and his cult is allowed in the former Diocese of Constance.

Feast: Aug. 27.

Bibliography: Vita (c. 1134), Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptorum, 10:582–594. See Casus Monasterii Petrishusensis, bk. 1, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptorum 20:627–639. Two Sequences in Analecta hymnica 54:61–64. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'histoire des fêtes, by the Benedictines of Paris

8:518. A. M. ZIMMERMAN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige 2:630. H. TÜCHLE, Kirchengeschichte Schwabens, 2 v. (Stuttgart 1950–54) 1:156–157. O. FEGER, Geschichte des Bodenseeraumes, 4 v. (Lindau 1956–) 1:205–211. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, *Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche*² 4:555. K. SCHMID, Neue deutsche Biographie 6:114.

[A. A. SCHACHER]

GEBHARD III OF CONSTANCE

Bishop; b. c. 1050; d. Constance, Germany, Nov. 12, 1110. The future leader of the papal party in Germany was the son of Berthold I of Zähringen. He was provost in Xanten and then a simple monk in the Abbey of HIRSAU before Otto of Ostia, later Pope URBAN II, consecrated him bishop of the largest diocese in the Empire. Gebhard supported WILLIAM OF HIRSAU in the reform or foundation of numerous monasteries while he imposed the customs of Hirsau on the Abbey of PETERSHAUSEN near Constance, which flourished under Abbot Theodorich (1086–1116). Named papal LEGATE by Urban II in 1089, Gebhard became the principal legate for Germany after the death of ALTMANN OF PASSAU in 1091. As such, he won his brother Berthold II, Duke of Carinthia and Swabia, and Duke Welf IV of Bavaria for the papal cause. During a princes' meeting at Ulm in November 1093, Gebhard and Berthold were given religious and political leadership in Swabia. A reform synod at Constance during Easter 1095 followed. Driven from his see in 1103, Gebhard, at the request of Pope PASCHAL II, rallied the papal party behind the Emperor's rebellious son, HENRY V. At the Diet of Mainz during Christmas 1105, he denied the Emperor the absolution for which he had asked. In the cause of Henry V who had returned him to his see in 1105, he went to Rome the following year. Gebhard was reprimanded in absentia by Paschal II at the Synod of Troyes in 1107 for having acquiesced to Henry V's nomination of the bishop of Halberstadt, and thus his legation came to an end. He devoted his last years exclusively to the care of his diocese.

Bibliography: E. HOFMANN, "Die Stellung der Konstanzer Bischöfe zu Papst u. Kaiser während des Investiturstreites," Freiburger Diözesanarchiv 31 (1931) 181–242, esp. 218–242. H. TÜCHLE, Kirchengeschichte Schwabens, 2 v. (Stuttgart 1950–54) 1:219–221; Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche 4:555–556. O. FEGER, Geschichte des Bodenseeraumes, 2 v. (Lindau 1956–58). K. SCHMID, Neue deutsche Biographie 6: 114–115, bibliog.

[A. A. SCHACHER]

GEBHARD OF SALZBURG, BL.

Archbishop; d. Salzburg, June 15, 1088. A member of the Suabian nobility, and chaplain to Emperors HENRY

III and HENRY IV, he served also as royal chancellor and ambassador to the Greek court (1057–59). Having become archbishop of Salzburg in 1060, he founded the Diocese of Gurk (1072) and the Abbey of ADMONT (1074), organized parishes, suspended the title of the Slavs, and effectively supported GREGORY VII. He wrote a reliable description of the INVESTITURE struggle (now known only from second-hand sources) and a letter answering Bp. Herman of Metz regarding the election of antipope GUIBERT OF RAVENNA (Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores 8:459–460). He was driven from his see by Henry IV and could return only in 1086. His remains rest in Admont; his canonization process was begun in 1629.

Feast: June 15.

Bibliography: Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores (Berlin 1825–) 11:17–19, 25–50. Acta Sanctorum June 6:147–154. W. STEINBÖCK, Erzbischof Gebhard von Salzburg (Vienna 1972). Salzburger Urkundenbuch, eds. W. K. HAUTHALER and F. MARTIN, v.2 (Salzburg 1916) 160–180. P. KARNER, Die Heiligen und Seligen Salzburgs (Austria Sancta 12; Vienna 1913). E. TOMEK, Kirchengeschichte Österreichs v.1 (Innsbruck 1935) 138–139, 143–149. R. BAUERREISS, Kirchengeschichte Bayerns (2d ed. Munich 1958–) v.2. J. WODKA, Kirche in Österreich (Vienna 1959); Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:556. W. OHNSORGE, Abendland und Byzanz (Darmstadt 1958) 342–363.

[V. H. REDLICH]

GEBIZO, ST.

Monk; d. Oct. 21, 1078 or 1087. About 1060 he left Cologne and made a pilgrimage to MONTE CASSINO with the advice and assistance of the Empress Agnes (d. 1077). Abbot Desiderius, later Pope VICTOR III, received him into the BENEDICTINE Order. Gebizo was a lover of prayer and silence, and he practiced great self-denial, taking no foods with oil or animal fat. He was confused with the future bishop of Cesena and thus falsely reported to have been sent in 1076 as the legate of GREGORY VII to crown the Croatian king, Demetrius Zvonimir (d. 1089). At the end of his life Gebizo suffered great pain from an abscess on his chest, but he continued to beg God for additional sufferings. The bishop of Venafrò treated him but could not help him. He was always called a saint, even in his earliest biographies, but there is no trace of any liturgical veneration. He is mentioned in the monastic martyrology, but not in the Roman, although his cult has been approved. His picture may be seen in Cesena in the church of S. Maria del Monte.

Feast: Oct. 21.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum, Oct. 9:397–405. J. P. MIGNE, Patrologia latina, 173:1107–10. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium

Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige 3:205–207.

[G. SPAHR]

GEDDES, ALEXANDER

Catholic Biblical scholar pioneering in the literary criticism of the Pentateuch, known especially for his “fragment hypothesis”; b. Ruthven, Banffshire, Scotland, Sept. 14, 1737; d. London, Feb. 26, 1802. He received his higher education at the Scots’ College in Paris, where he also attended lectures at the Sorbonne. Having become proficient in Hebrew, he took a deep interest in the Tübingen school of Biblical criticism. After ordination in 1764, he carried out parochial duties in Scotland until 1779, when his liberal views, expressed with uncompromising frankness and imprudence, brought him into difficulties with his bishop. Helped by his munificent patron, Lord Petre, he established himself in London, where he devoted the rest of his life to Biblical and literary studies. In the preface to his English translation of the Hexateuch (1792), Geddes propounded such extreme views on the origin of the Pentateuch that Protestants as well as Catholics were shocked. He denied that the mission of Moses was divine, held that not all of Scripture was inspired, and, in general, showed strongly rationalistic tendencies. For his views he was suspended from exercising his priestly functions. Of a brilliant but erratic character, Geddes was one of the first scholars in England to recognize the inadequacy of the traditional notions about the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, but he went to excess in his ardor for the new theories. Always claiming to be a Catholic, though of his own strange variety, he received the Last Rites and died in the Church. Among his better-known works are: The Holy Bible . . . Faithfully Translated from the Corrected Texts of the Original . . . (2 v., containing the Pentateuch and the historical books; London 1792–97); Critical Remarks on the Hebrew Scriptures (London 1800); A Modest Apology for the Roman Catholics of Great Britain (London 1800); A New Translation of the Psalms from the Original Hebrew . . . (posthumously edited by J. Disney and C. Butler; London 1807).

Bibliography: A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time 2:410–415. J. GOOD, Memoirs of the Life and Writings of Alexander Geddes (London 1803). T. K. CHEYNE, Founders of Old Testament Criticism (London 1893) 3–12.

[K. O’SULLIVAN]

GEHENNA

A valley in Jerusalem where refuse was burned, later becoming a symbol for the place of punishment in the nether world. The NT term γέεννα is a Greek-influenced form of Aramaic gêhinnām, corresponding to Hebrew gê'hinnōm (the Valley of Hinnom: Neh 11.30, a shortened form of gê' benê-hinnōm, the Valley of the Sons of Hinnom: Jos 15.8; 18.16; etc.); the ravine (modern Wādī er-Rabâbeh) is situated at the southern end of Jerusalem. During the monarchy the place called Thopheth in this valley was the scene of an idolatrous cult involving the burning of children as sacrificial victims to Moloch (Jer 7.31; 2 Kgs 16.3; 21.6). Later, perhaps because of its reputation as a place of idolatrous worship, it became the dumping ground where the refuse of the city was burned. In Jeremiah's time it was known simply as "the valley" (Jer 2.23).

By the time of Christ, however, the word Gehenna had evolved from a topographical designation to an eschatological one; it became the place of chastisement for the wicked immediately after death or in the eternity that was to follow the resurrection and the Judgment. The eschatological imagery of Gehenna came from Jer 7.30–8.3; 19.2–13; and Is 66.24. Jeremiah foretold that this place would one day be called the Valley of Slaughter, for in the destruction of Jerusalem so many of its inhabitants would be killed that their corpses would be cast, unburied, into the valley to rot or be burned. In short, Gehenna would be a symbol of divine chastisement, although this would not be definitive, for Jeremiah predicted also that the valley of dead bodies and ashes would eventually be holy to Yahweh (Jer 31.40).

In Is 66.24, the last verse of an eschatological oracle coming from the period of reconstruction after the Exile, YAHWEH proclaimed that He would vindicate Himself by restoring ZION and by having all the nations come there to pay Him honor. Outside its gates the nations would see the cadavers of all who had rebelled against Him. Although Gehenna was not mentioned in the oracle, there was an obvious allusion to Jer 7.30–8.3, but now the chastisement is described as definitive ("Their worm shall not die, nor their fire be extinguished"). As a rubbish dump, Gehenna was a place where fire burned constantly and where worms feasted on the garbage, and these images were transferred to the never-ending punishment of the rebellious. The references to fire in Is 31.9 and Is 33.14 envisioned Yahweh's power as bringing vengeance on Israel's oppressors (Is 33.10–12) rather than a fire punishing the damned.

The apocryphal literature used the image of Gehenna as a symbol of everlasting punishment but not in a uniform way. The Book of Enoch (ch. 6–36, c. 150 B.C.) still envisaged a terrestrial eschatology: the resurrected just would rejoice on the earth (ch. 25) and evildoers would rise and be thrown into the fire of Gehenna (ch. 22). In ch. 83 to 90 of Enoch, Gehenna was not named, but it was alluded to in an apparently transcendental eschatology. The fallen angels after the Judgment would be cast into a fiery abyss (90.24–27). This concept was not so developed an eschatology as that of Matthew in which Gehenna was conceived in cosmic terms as belonging exclusively to the world beyond and as having always been in existence (Mt 25.41).

In ch. 37 to 71 of Enoch (beginning of the Christian Era) SHEOL and Gehenna were used interchangeably (54.1–2). The darkness of Sheol was thus added to the fire of Gehenna, which was thought of as a fire that burns without giving light. Such confusion between Sheol and Gehenna is found also in the NT, e.g., "the darkness outside" (Mt 8.12; 22.13; 25.30). Gehenna had thus become disengaged from its ancient topography and transferred to the NT eschatology of the world beyond. In Enoch 90.26–27; 54.1–2; and 56.3–4 Gehenna was destined only for apostate Jews; elsewhere it was the destiny for all the wicked, including pagans. Later Judaism, however, regarded Gehenna as a sort of purgatory for faithless Jews and a place of eternal perdition for the Gentiles.

Other NT texts that mentioned Gehenna are Mt 5.22, 29; 10.28; 18.9; 23.15, 33; Mk 9.43–47; Lk 12.5; and Jas 3.6. Synonyms such as "furnace of fire" (Mt 13.42, 50), "everlasting fire" (Mt 18.8; Jude 7), and "pool of fire" (Rv 19.20; 20.9, 14–15; 21.8) were employed as well to signify eternal punishment.

See Also: HADES; HELL (IN THE BIBLE); HELLFIRE; JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THE BIBLE).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible (New York 1963) 847–850. J. JEREMIAH, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament, ed. G. KITTEL (Stuttgart 1935) 1:655–656. A. WIKENHAUSER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:598. T. H. GASTER, The Interpreters' Dictionary of the Bible (Nashville, Tenn. 1962) 2:361–362. J. BONSIRVEN, Palestinian Judaism in the Time of Jesus Christ, tr. W. WOLF (New York 1964) 226–251.

[I. H. GORSKI]

GEILER VON KAYSERSBERG, JOHANNES

Theologian and preacher; b. Schaffhausen, Switzerland, March 16, 1445; d. Strassburg, March 10, 1510. In 1446 his father went to Ammerschweier, Upper Alsace, as city clerk; he was killed in an accident when Johannes was three years old. The boy's grandfather in nearby Kaysersberg brought him up. At the age of 15 he began the study of philosophy at the recently established University of Freiburg im Breisgau, and in 1465 he taught philosophy and grammar there and for a brief period was dean of the philosophical faculty. In 1470 he resigned his position in order to study theology at the University of Basel, which had also been founded a short time before. He obtained his doctorate in 1475, and the following year he returned to the University of Freiburg, where he had received an appointment and where he was elected rector the next year. Teaching, however, was less congenial to him than preaching, and in 1478 he accepted an invitation to go to Strassburg as cathedral preacher, an office in which he continued until his death. He was buried under a magnificent late-Gothic pulpit built especially in his honor.

Geiler was a man of broad humanistic, philosophical, and theological learning. With his teacher, John Heynlin—an outstanding teacher, preacher, and university administrator—and many other friends and acquaintances, he belonged to a group of early German humanists. Despite his classical and national historical interests, he was steadfast in his adherence to the fundamentals of the old faith. In his theological inspiration he was chiefly dependent upon J. GERSON, and although he vigorously criticized the ecclesiastical conditions of his time, he was in no way a revolutionary. His tie with late medieval scholasticism shows itself externally in the ramified classifications that characterized his sermons. He possessed an extraordinary knowledge of the Fathers, and made abundant use of the Bible. He also had recourse to profane authors, and was given to the use of literary patterns in his preaching. He preached, with great acclaim, a series of sermons that had the Narrenschiſſ (Ship of Fools) of his friend Sebastian Brant for their theme.

He could, when he wished, preach well upon dogmatic topics, but for the most part he preferred moral subjects, and in treating of these he gave less attention to the building up of positive ideals than to the condemnation of the moral decadence of his time. From his pulpit there flowed a richly colored picture of the moral corruption of the world he knew. He excoriated the obscene conversation of the bath houses, the ridicule of the Sacraments, and the sexual mores of the times with shocking frankness. From his mordant observations about their inordinate preoccupation with dress and finery one could write a book of fashions for the times around the year 1500. Indeed, his sermons are an important source of knowledge of the speech, customs, and beliefs of the common people at the beginning of the 16th century.

He cast an especially critical eye upon the social evils of the time. He denounced the avarice of the law-

Die wort
Doctor Keiserspergs predig

Nimmwar du gü
ter hirt. Hochwirdiger vatter. Du fleißiger biſch off diſes wtdigen ſtiffes
Strasburg. Nitmwar/ deine iüger ſein alle verſamlet/ ſie ſeind ſammenſafft zu dir kommen/ nit vſ forcht der iuden ſunder vſ geſesame. Sie ſeind nit als irrige ſcheſſin ſunder ſie haben ſich ge ker zu dir irem ſittten vnd biſchoffen trax ſelen. Su ſteft auch mitre vnder ine als ein güter hirt/ vnd folgt nach den füßſtapfen des oberſten hirtē/ der mit tel vnder ſeinen lungen geſtanden iſt.
Du hirt ſtoß mittel vnder de huren.
San wan du ſie fragſt wer ſie ſeind/ ſo gebiert ine/ das ſie mit den kinden Ja cob die antworten. Wie ſeind ſchaff hirtē. Got wolt auch/ das inen vñ ir ye dem das ewangelieſch wort geſim. Ich bin ein güter hirt / der ſein ſel güter für ſeine ſcheſſin/ia für die ſcheſſin dy da die wort des künigs David zu got de

Johannes Geiler von Kaysersberg preaching, woodcut from "Ein heilsam kostiche Predig Doctor Iohans Geiler von Keisersperg."

yers, the injustice of certain laws, the raising of prices, and the practice of usury. With great apostolic courage he attacked the laxity of monasteries and the concubinage practiced by the clergy, and he did not hesitate to pillory the patrons in high places whom he considered to be mainly responsible. The influence of the nobility in securing for their offspring ecclesiastical offices, especially bishoprics, he considered to be a cancerous social evil.

Geiler prepared his sermons with great care, writing them out beforehand, but these compositions were drawn up in Latin rather than in German. Few of the sermons that have been published under his name came directly from his pen; most of them were taken down by others and later published.

As was true also of Berthold of Regensburg and ABRAHAM OF SANCTA CLARA, Geiler's homeliness and originality of speech lent power to his words and contributed to his popularity. But, like the other two great popular preachers, he yielded sometimes to the coarseness of his age.

From the fact of his popularity and from the testimony of contemporaries it is evident that Geiler's sermons produced a marked effect upon those who heard him. Still, for all his apostolic zeal and his strenuous labors, this effect fell far short of his target. He lamented that neither clergy nor laity could be persuaded to join in an effort toward reform. His preaching appears to have produced no lasting effect. Perhaps his manner was too gruff, his language too hard, his criticism too merciless, or his moralizing sermons too negative, to bring about the results he wanted. Or perhaps it was too late. A few years after his death Strassburg became Protestant.

Bibliography: N. SCHEID, The Catholic Encyclopedia 6:403–405. E. BARNIKOL, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 2:1266–67. J. M. B. CLAUSZ, “Kritische Übersicht der Schriften über Geiler von Kaisersberg,” Historisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft 31 (1910) 485–519. E. F. ROEDER VON DIERSBURG, Komik und Humor bei Geiler von Kaisersberg (Berlin 1921).

[J. F. GRONER]

GEISERIC, KING OF THE VANDALS

Reigned 428–477. Geiseric (also Genseric or Gaiseric) became king over the Vandals, Alans and a polyglot group of barbarians in Spain in 428. He was the illegitimate son of King Godagisel, born of a slave woman in 389. Of short stature, Geiseric walked with a limp as a result of a fall from a horse. The circumstances of his accession to the kingship are unknown, as is the cause of death of Geiseric's half-brother Guntharic, who preceded him as king.

In May 429 Geiseric led the most bold and successful expedition of any barbarian leader of his time. Having acquired a fleet, he effected the large-scale migration of 80,000 men, women and children across the strait of Gibraltar. With a fighting force estimated at a maximum of only 16,000 men, he proceeded to break the Roman Empire's hold over all of North Africa and install himself as king in Carthage within ten years. Styling himself rex Vandalorum et Alanorum (the King of the Vandals and Alans), he instituted a new calendar that began with the seizure of Carthage and minted coins in honor of his reign.

In politics and war, Geiseric was thoroughly Machiavellian. He avoided major conflicts with Roman forces but exploited Roman weakness wherever it was evident. On Oct. 19, 439, Geiseric entered Carthage, left undefended by virtue of a 435 treaty with the Western emperor Valentinian III. Valentinian recognized the fait accompli in a second treaty signed in 442. That same year Geiseric bloodily suppressed a revolt of his soldiers and nobles. From Carthage Geiseric ruled a large part of North Africa and many Mediterranean islands. He enjoyed tranquil relations with the indigenous African tribes, even enlisting their aid in military expeditions. His fleets engaged in piracy and raids along the coastlands of the Roman Empire; Italy and the Balkan peninsula were particularly afflicted. In June 455 Geiseric seized the opportunity afforded by the murder of Valentinian III to pillage Rome. He carried off the treasures of Rome (including the vessels that had been captured from the Temple in Jerusalem in A.D. 70) and many Romans, among them Valentinian's widow and daughter Eudoxia, whom he married to his son Huneric. In 468 Geiseric destroyed a large fleet sent by Emperor Leo I. Under the pretext of taking several days to consider peace, he awaited the proper wind and attacked by night, hurling burning ships into the anchored imperial fleet. In 474 Geiseric signed a treaty of perpetual peace with Leo's successor Zeno.

Geiseric attempted to completely replace the Catholic Church in Africa with the Arian creed and ecclesiastical structure. He employed bribery, forced re-baptism, torture, death and exile on Catholics—especially the bishops—but was met by the fortitude of Catholic Trinitarian faith. Because of his political success, cruelty, and persecution of the Catholic faith, some contemporaries saw Geiseric as Antichrist. Hydatius relates a rumor that Geiseric was an apostate who left Catholicism for Arianism. He died of natural causes on Jan. 24, 477.

Bibliography: C. COURTOIS, Les Vandales et l'Afrique (Paris 1955). H.-J. DIESNER, Das Vandalenreich, Aufstieg und Untergang (Stuttgart 1966). E. F. GAUTIER, Genséric, roi des Vandales (Paris 1951). H. GOURDIN, Genséric: soleil barbare (Paris 1999). F. MARTROYE, Genséric: la conquête vandale en Afrique et la destruction de l'empire d'Occident (Paris 1907). L. SCHMIDT, Geschichte der Wandalen (1942, repr. Munich 1970).

[D. VAN SLYKE]

GEISSEL, JOHANNES VON

Cardinal, archbishop of Cologne; b. Gimmeldingen (Rhine Palatinate), Germany, Feb. 5, 1796; d. Cologne, Sept. 8, 1864. After studying in the diocesan seminary in Mainz, he was ordained (1818). He was much influenced in an ultramontane direction by the theological circle at Mainz and maintained close ties with the Holy See throughout his life. He became bishop of Speyer (1836), coadjutor to Abp. DROSTE ZU VISCHERING of Cologne (1841), archbishop (1845), and cardinal (1850). While coadjutor he administered the archdiocese and helped end the Cologne mixed marriage dispute. He was one of the outstanding German bishops of his century, an energetic and far-sighted leader who fostered clerical education, the introduction of religious orders into his archdiocese, and the founding of Catholic societies; and he vigorously combated the followers of GÜNTHER and HERMES. Under King Friedrich Wilhelm IV (1840–61), who was well disposed to Catholics, he notably improved Church-State relations. In the King's presence he laid the cornerstone for continuing construction of the cathedral of Cologne, and saw its completion in 1863. Geissel organized and directed the first conference of the German episcopate at Würzburg, which proved very important for Church renewal. He was also responsible for the Cologne provincial council (1860), whose decrees were heeded elsewhere. He also won esteem as a preacher and writer.

Bibliography: J. VON GEISSEL, Schriften und Reden Geissels, ed. K. T. DUMONT, 4 v. (Cologne 1869–76). Cardinal Geissel, 2 v. (Freiburg 1895). A. BECK, Die Kirchenpolitik des Erzbischofs von Köln, Johannes Kardinal von Geissel (Geissen 1905). F. SCHNABEL, Deutsche Geschichte im neunzehnten Jahrhundert, v.4 (2d ed. Freiburg 1951) 76–80, 149–155, 251–259. R. LILL, Die Beilegung der Kölner Wirren 1840–1842 (Düsseldorf 1962); Die ersten deutschen Bischofskonferenzen (Freiburg 1964). R. HAAS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 4:608.

[R. LILL]

GELASIAN DECREE

So-called, consists of 5 chapters concerned with (1) the Holy Spirit and the names of Christ, (2) the canon of Sacred Scripture, (3) the primacy of Peter and of the apostolic see, as well as the precedence of patriarchal sees, (4) the authority of the decrees of general (ecumenical) councils, and (5) the authority of patristic and papal writings, along with the acceptability of other Christian works available at the time (see Denz 178, 179–180, 350–354). A compilation of documents of probably different periods, it is thought by many scholars to have been put together privately by a cleric of southern Gaul or northern Italy at the beginning of the 6th century.

Bibliography: E. VON DOBSCHÜTZ, Das Decretum gelasianum de libris recipiendis et non recipiendis (TU 3d ser. 8.4; 1912). G. BARDY, Dictionnaire de la Bible, supplement (Paris 1928–) 3:579–590. T. CAMELOT, Catholicisme 4: 1804.

[M. O'CALLAGHAN]

GELASIAN LETTER

This letter, often referred to by its opening words Famuli vestrae pietatis (Ep. 8, PL 59:41–47; Ep. 12, Thiel's Epistolae rom. pont. 1:349–358), was written by Pope GELASIUS I (492–496) in 494 to the Byzantine Emperor Anastasius I. Its importance is in the fact that it is held to be “the most famous document of the ancient Church concerning the ‘two powers’ that exist on earth”

(Denz 347) and that it states what has come to be called the Gelasian theory on relations between Church and state. The oft-repeated sentence runs: “Duo quippe sunt, imperator auguste, quibus principaliter mundus hic regitur: auctoritas sacra pontificum et regalis potestas—There are indeed, Your Majesty, two [powers] by which this world is mainly ruled: the sacred authority of pontiffs and the royal power.”

Though this central thesis of Gelasius is plainly enough stated, one who would derive from it a complete theory on the exact relations between the Church and civil societies under all circumstances would hardly escape the charge of rashness. The judgment of S. Z. Ehler and J. B. Morrall can perhaps be endorsed: “Silence on the question of what were in practice the limits of each sphere made it [letter and theory] ambiguous when borderline instances occasioned a clash between the two powers. This ambiguity is shown by the fact that both papalist and imperialist supporters in the medieval controversies appealed to Gelasius with equal freedom” [Church and State through the Centuries (Westminster, Md. 1954) 11].

The point of Gelasius' teaching is better appreciated if one recalls that the letter forms one incident in the whole series of incidents that occurred after and in consequence of the Council of Chalcedon (451) and more precisely during the ACACIAN SCHISM. This split between East and West arose out of the deposition (484) by Pope Felix III of Acacius, Patriarch of Constantinople, and was not healed until 519. It was then, during this period of friction, that the Pope wrote the letter to the Emperor, reproaching Anastasius for his support of the schismatical tendencies of the patriarchs of Constantinople.

If the occasion demanded a frank statement of the autonomy of the episcopate in deciding the doctrine and the discipline of the Church, an independence for which the Church had been struggling since the days of Constantine (cf. similar declarations of Athanasius, Ambrose, Augustine, Gregory of Nazianzus, and John Chrysostom in Lo Grasso Eccl), it did not suggest to Gelasius that a “distinction” of powers should evolve into a “separation” of powers. Gelasius' view of the relationship between the two powers can be read in that passage of the letter in which he states that “in the interests of their salvation much more will the people of Constantinople necessarily obey you, if you lead them back to the catholic and apostolic communion. For, Your Majesty, if you would not permit a man under any pretext to act against the laws of the State, don't you think that it is a matter of conscience for you to restore the people subject to your authority to an unsullied and genuine devotion to God?” For Gelasius the Emperor will be acting properly if he exerts his not inconsiderable influence to effect at the public level Christian religious unity on the lines laid down by the legitimate authority of the combined episcopate under the leadership of the successor of Peter.

The letter therefore is composed within the framework of a theory of two distinct “powers” in a Christian world rather than of two distinct “societies.” It takes for granted a close cooperation between these two powers as well as a profession of religion on the part of the State. It does not examine the problem it treats in the light of the religious liberties of the individual nor does it envisage the relations between the Church and a State of divided religious allegiance. One of its main purposes is to insist that bishops are not mere ministers for public worship in the imperial “cabinet,” but are immediately empowered in matters of religion by a distinct divine disposition, a disposition that entitles them to determine without interference from the other “power” the sense of Christian revelation and to enact all appropriate disciplinary measures.

See Also: AUTHORITY, ECCLESIASTICAL.

Bibliography: Y. M. J. CONGAR, Catholicisme 3:1430–41. P. T. CAMELOT, ibid. 4:1801–03. K. BAUS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 4:630. J. LECLER, The Two Sovereignties (New York 1952). J. MARITAIN, Man and the State (Chicago 1951). J. C. MURRAY, We Hold These Truths (New York 1960).

[S. E. DONLON]

GELASIAN SACRAMENTARY

Also known as Old Gelasian Sacramentary (Latin: Gelasianum Vetus), Gelasian Sacramentary is the popular name for the Vatican manuscripts Reginensis latinus 316. Muratori gave this convenient but misleading label to the Vatican manuscript Reginensis 316 in his edition of 1748, and it has been in usage ever since. But its most recent editor, Mohlberg, despite adverse criticism, has rightly restored the actual title of the manuscript: Liber Sacramentorum Romanae Aeclesiae Ordinis Anni Circuli (Rome 1960). However, since that title, though accurate, is cumbersome, it will be referred to as Reg 316.

Date. Besides being the oldest and most complete extant manuscript of the Roman Sacramentary, albeit a Frankish-Roman hybrid, it is also a beautiful example Merovingian manuscript and calligraphy. The authorship of the Reg 316 can no longer be attributed to Pope GELASIUS (492–496), because “that theory rests upon a faulty interpretation of a passage in the Liber pontificalis and from an expression in the Vita Gregorii by the Roman deacon John which is too late to be helpful” (Vogel, Medieval Liturgy, 68). The Old Gelasian Sacramentary is to be distinguished from the so-called 8th-century Gelasian Sacramentary or the Frankish-Gelasian Sacramentaries, a different family of sacramentaries which is discussed as a topic under GREGORIAN SACRAMENTARY.

C. Vogel suggests that the ancestor of the Reg 316 “must have been composed between 628 and 715, i.e., between the oldest possible date of the most recent feast and the beginning of Gregory II’s pontificate.” The terminus ad quem can be determined from the fact that in the Reg 316, the Thursdays of Lent are liturgical, i.e., it did not yet have the Masses which Gregory II (715–731) introduced into the Roman liturgical calendar. As for the terminus a quo, Vogel observes that the Reg 316:

already has a Capitulum S. Gregorii papae (†604), the Canon actionis contains the Gregorian embolism of the Hanc igitur: Diesque nostros in tua pace disponas atque ab aeterna damnatione nos eripe et in electorum quorum iubeas grege numerari and the Pater noster is situated immediately after the Canon — exactly where St. Gregory I put it. The Sanctoral Cycle has both feasts of the Cross, although the Exaltatio Crucis was introduced at Rome after the death of Gregory the Great, probably after the recovery of the True Cross from the Persians by the Emperor Heraclius in 628. The Sanctoral also contains the four feasts of the Blessed Virgin (Purificatio, Feb. 2; Annunciatio, Mar. 25; Assumptio, Aug. 15; Nativitas, Sept. 8) unknown at Rome in the time of Gregory but which were being celebrated during the reign of the Syrian pope, Sergius I (687–701).

History. This manuscript is the only one of its kind known to exist. A. Wilmart and Lowe were inclined to the view that it was written in northeastern France, its ornamentation suggesting Corbie. But in 1953 Lowe drew attention to B. Bischoff’s suggestion that the Reg 316 belongs to the same school as a group of 8th-century Cologne manuscripts written for Bishop Hildebald of that see (785–819). In Lowe’s opinion the scriptorium that produced such manuscripts must have been of some importance, and in all probability Bischoff is right in thinking of the convent of Chelles near Paris, whose abbess was Gisela, sister of Charlemagne and lifelong friend of Alcuin.

Description. The Reg 316 is divided into three distinct parts or books. Book 1 contains the Mass formularies from Christmas Eve to the Octave of Pentecost. Book 2 consists of the Sanctoral throughout the year, the Common of Saints, and an appendix of Advent Masses. Book 3 contains a well-known series of 16 Sunday Masses, which have found their way into the Roman Missal, the Canon of the Mass, a series of votive Masses and various blessings. Different interpolations of Gallican origin are found within the body of the book and have been the object of a serious examination by Chavasse [Le Sacramentaire Gélisien (Paris 1958)].

Authorship. Ever since Muratori's edition of the Reg 316, it has been called the Gelasian Sacramentary. An examination of its contents, however, makes it difficult to believe that in its present state it is an exact copy of the work of Gelasius. In 1945 Capelle drew attention to the fact that the LEONINE SACRAMENTARY contains material that, in all probability, was composed by Gelasius in very precise circumstances; but this material is absent from the Sacramentary that bears his name. This of itself is a reason for rejecting its attribution to Gelasius ["Retouches Gélasiennes dans le Sacramentaire Léonien," Revue Bénédictine 61 (1951) 3–14]. Numerous studies by such scholars as Coebergh and Chavasse served only to confirm Capelle's verdict. The Gelasian Sacramentary is not the work of Pope Gelasius, although it may contain isolated prayers and prefaces that are his and that found their way into the body of the text, perhaps through the Leonine Sacramentary.

Character. Concerning its character and contents, earlier scholars such as E. Bishop and M. Andrieu were inclined to look upon it as the official Roman Mass Book of the 6th century. Duschesne, Baumstark, and more recently Schmidt consider it to be a Frankish compilation of the 8th century, the compiler having used both Roman and Gallican material. More recently the prestige of Chavasse's learning has led the majority of scholars to accept his conclusions presented in his major work on the subject referred to above. In his view the Roman source of the Reg 316 is a Sacramentary now lost (but incorporated into this work by the 8th-century scribe of the Reg 316) that was used by the clergy of the Roman tituli. This lost source, in Chavasse's view, provided a quarry also for the Gregorian Sacramentary and the earlier Gallican service books. Not all scholars, however, have followed Chavasse in every detail. Capelle more cautiously suggested that the evidence could point to the Libelli Missarum preserved in the Lateran Archives as a probable source of the Merovingian service books [Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 54 (1959) 877–879]. Coebergh expressed himself unconvinced by the author's arguments and objected that insufficient use had been made by Chavasse of the material provided by J. P. Kirsch in his Die römischen Titelkirchen im Altertum, ignorance of which had led Chavasse into some grave errors of judgment. Coebergh considers it more likely that the Reg 316 is a compilation made by two Frankish priest-monks, of progressive tendencies, who drew upon a series of Lateran Libelli Missarum during the course of the 7th century ["Le Sacramentaire Gélisien Ancien, une compilation de clercs romanisants du VII^e siècle," Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft 7 (1961) 45–88].

Whatever the case may be, what is clear is the fact that the Reg 316 is a hybrid sacramentary, comprising the most primitive extant Roman substratum with Frankish additions. The Roman substratum itself is not entirely homogeneous, but "is the result of an intermingling of a variety of Roman libelli belonging to different periods and representing both papal and presbyteral usages" (Vogel, Medieval Liturgy, 66).

Bibliography: Critical Edition: Liber Sacramentorum Romanae Aeclesiae Ordinis Annis Circuli (Cod. Vat. Reg. lat. 316; Paris Bibl. Nat. 7193 41/56), ed. L. C. MOHLBERG, L. EIZENHÖFER, and P. SIFFRIN (Rerum Ecclesiasticarum Documenta, Series Maior, Fontes 4; Rome, 1960). Color Photo-reproduction: Sacramentarium Gelasianum: e Codice Vaticano Reginensi Latino 316 Veritente Anno Sacro MCMLXXV, iussu Pauli PP. VI, phototypice editum (Vatican 1975). This important reproduction contains two important introductory essays: B. NEUNHEUSER, "The Manuscript," 5–29; and "The 'Sacramentarium Gelasianum' (Reg. lat. 316) and its Significance in Liturgical History," 30–49. Commentary: A. CHAVASSE, Le Sacramentaire Gélisien (Tournai 1958). For overview and further bibliographies, see: C. VOGEL, Medieval Liturgy: An Introduction to Sources (Washington, D.C. 1986); and E. PALAZZO, A History of Liturgical Books: From the Beginning to the Thirteenth Century (Collegeville, Minn. 1998).

[H. ASHWORTH/EDS.]

GELASIUS I, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: March 1, 492, to Nov. 19, 496. A strong-willed archdeacon of the Roman Church, Gelasius apparently came from an African lineage but there is a debate over whether he was born in Africa or in Rome. The Liber pontificalis states that he was "natione Afer" whereas in a letter to Emperor Anastasius (Ep. Xii, n.1) he described himself as "Romanus natus."

He was the dominant figure in Rome during the reign of Felix II and draftsman of that pope's letters. His own letters and treatises reveal him as the chief Roman theoretician in the quarrel with Constantinople, known as the ACACIAN SCHISM. Technically, the dispute concerned the flouting of the authority of the Roman Church through the intrusion of heretics in certain Eastern sees. In this light, he became an active defender of the historical importance of the sees of Antioch and Alexandria against the see of Constantinople. Actually, more was at stake. The popes were increasingly alarmed by the manifestations of caesaropapism in the late 5th century, exemplified by the heretical Henoticon of Emperor Zeno, who attempted to appease the Monophysites with a statement of faith devised by the Patriarch Acacius without consulting Rome. Though he was not attacked directly, Zeno became the real object of papal strictures.

Papal Supremacy. When faced by a new threat to orthodoxy, the popes of the time reacted instinctively by exalting the divine origin and apostolic basis of the papal office. If Leo I can be said to have laid the juridical foundations of papal authority for all time, Gelasius I applied those principles in letters that read very much like legal briefs. There was little that subsequent generations could add to his explicit statements about papal supremacy or the relations between church and state, except a spelling out of what was contained in his thought. The fame of Gelasius I rests on the great influence exercised by his letters and treatises on later generations; this influence they owed to the wide currency that they acquired through being excerpted and incorporated in a series of contemporary canonical collections, which began to be compiled about that time in the West, the products of the so-called Gelasian Renaissance, which he helped to inspire. One of the most famous of these early canonists, the Scythian Dionysius Exiguus, paid tribute to the learning and virtue of the pope in the preface to his early 6th-century collection of papal decretals. The inflexible attitude of Gelasius toward Constantinople was influenced by the pope's good relations with the Arian, Theodoric, who replaced Odoacer as king in Italy. Attempts were made by the Constantinopolitan patriarchs, Flavita and Euphemius, to restore communion with Rome, but the pope's demand that the name of Acacius be stricken from the diptychs caused the negotiations to break down.

The Two Powers. Zeno's successor as emperor, Anastasius II, inclined as he was to Monophysitism, was even less likely to countenance any concession on this point. However, he recognized the importance of cultivating good relations with Rome in the interests of protecting his vague suzerainty over Italy and took the occasion of an embassy from King Theodoric to Constantinople to remind the pope that he had received no greetings from him. In his respectful but firm reply Gelasius outlined his views on the two powers that govern the world, the consecrated authority of bishops (auctoritas sacrata pontificum) and the royal power (regalis potestas). Gelasius made clear that, in his opinion, it was the duty of the emperor to learn about "divine things" from bishops, not vice versa. His implicit claim that the papal power was superior to the civil marked a significant step toward the formation of the medieval hierocratic ideal.

Vicar of Christ. At a Roman synod held in 494, Gelasius decreed that the revenue from church property should be apportioned four ways, among the bishop, the clergy, and the poor and for the maintenance of buildings. (It should be noted, however, that in Ep. XIV, n.27 he notes this practice as "dudum rationabiliter decretum," which would seem to indicate that it had been a common practice, at least in Rome, for some time). This rule was incorporated in the oath that all bishops under the metropolitan jurisdiction of Rome were required to make on the day of their consecration (Liber diurnus); and other churches adopted somewhat similar arrangements. A Roman synod the following year, whose acts have survived, is remembered as the first-known occasion when the pope was hailed as Vicar of Christ. Gelasius I warned against a resurgence of Pelagianism in Dalmatia and Picenum, and was active in routing out the last vestiges of paganism in Rome. Most notable in this respect is his treatise against the Lupercalia (a penitential and fructifying festival in which young men with whips cavorted about the city and struck women) which the senator Andromachus had tried to reform. He was also zealous in rooting out the last vestiges of Manichaeism at Rome. A cache of Manichaean books was discovered and burned before the doors of St. Mary Major's. To this end, he also mandated, at least for a time, the celebration of the Holy Eucharist under both species because the Manichaeans would have rejected wine, seeing it as impure and sinful.

Gelasian Sacramentary. More than 100 of his letters and treatises have been preserved. Although Gelasius apparently wrote Mass formulas later incorporated in the so-called Leonine, or Verona, Sacramentary, a 6th-century compilation, he can hardly have had anything to do with the 7th-century Roman presbyteral Sacramentary that commonly bears his name. Gelasius I was buried in St. Peter's, although the exact location of his tomb is unknown.

Feast: Nov. 21.

Bibliography: Clavis Patrum latinorum, ed. E. DEKKERS (Strasbourg 1961) 1667–76. Patrologiae cursus completus, series latina, suppl. ed. A. HAMMAN (Paris 1957—) 3:739–. G. POMARÈS, ed., Lettre contre les Lupercales et dix-huit messes du sacramentaire Léonien (Sources Chrétiennes 65; 1960). Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 59:13–190. A. THIEL, ed., Epistolae romanorum pontificum, v.1 (Branieno, Ger. 1868) 287–510. S. LOEWENFELD, ed., Epistolae pontificum romanorum ineditae, repr. (Graz 1959) 1–12. Liber pontificalis, L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92) 1:255–257; 3:87. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie (Paris 1907–53) 13.1:1212. E. CASPAR, Geschichte de Papsttums von den Anfängen bis zur Höhe der Weltherrschaft (Tübingen 1930–33) 2:44–81, 749–752, 758. K. BAUS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:630. G. BARDY, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ (Paris 1935–65) 5:940–945. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935—) 4:339–340. H. ANTON, "Kaiserliche Selbstverständnis in der Religionsgesetzgebung der Spätantike und päpstliche Herrschaftsinterpretation im 5. Jahrhundert," Zkirchgesch 88 (1977) 38–84. A. COTTRELL "Auctoritas and Potestas: A Reevaluation of Gelasius I on Papal-Imperial Relations," Medieval Studies 55 (1993) 95. F. DVORNIK, The Idea of Apostolicity in Byzantium (Cambridge, MA 1958). J. GAUDEMET, L'Église dans l'Empire ro- main (Paris 1958). J. TAYLOR, "Early Papacy at Work: Gelasius I (492–6)," Journal of Religious History 8 (1975) 317–32. W. ULLMANN, The Growth of Papal Government in the Middle Ages (New York 1962); Gelasius I. (492–496): das Papsttum an der Wende der Spätantike zum Mittelalter (Stuttgart 1981). A. K. ZIEGLER, "Pope Gelasius I . . . the Relation of Church and State," American Catholic Historical Review 27 (1942) 3–28.

[J. CHAPIN/EDS.]

GELASIUS II, POPE

Pontificate: Jan. 24, 1118 to Jan. 28, 1119; b. John of Gaeta; d. Abbey of Cluny. The son of John Coniulo of Gaeta, Italy (not a member of the Gaëtani family), he entered Monte Cassino as an oblate c. 1060 under Abbot Desiderius (1058–87), the future Pope VICTOR III. As his master John had Alberic of Monte Cassino, whose teachings influenced the style of his Lives of SS. Erasmus, Eustasius, and Hypolistus. Pope URBAN II called the young subdeacon as prosignator to his chancery as early as 1088, promoted him in the same year to deacon and cardinal, and made him chancellor in 1089. In this office John carried out important improvements in the papal chancery, increasing its personnel and reforming the style (revival of the Cursus Leoninus) and the dating of papal documents. Probably in 1111 he received from Pope PASCHAL II the church of S. Maria in Cosmedin, whose reconstruction was begun by him.

John was unanimously elected pope on Jan. 24, 1118, in the church of S. Maria in Pallara on the Palatine. At the end of the ceremony the pope and the cardinals were attacked by Cencius II FRANGIPANI, who imprisoned the pope and released him only after an uprising of the other nobles and the people. The arrival in Rome of Emperor HENRY V early in March forced the pope to withdraw to his home town, Gaeta, where he was consecrated priest, bishop, and pope, and assumed the name Gelasius II (March 10). Meanwhile, Henry V, supported by the celebrated IRNERIUS of Bologna, had the disgruntled Abp. Mauritius of Braga proclaimed antipope, with the name of Gregory VIII. Gelasius excommunicated him together with Henry V. The approach of Robert of Capua's army caused Henry to leave Rome, and Gelasius was able to return to Rome, whence he fled to France in September after a new attack by Cencius. He stayed briefly at Saint-Gilles near Nîmes and elsewhere in southern France and held a synod in Vienne. He died at Cluny, where he was buried on the following day.

Bibliography: Vita Gelasii by PADULF, in Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–1953) 3:157–166, 135–136; see also 2:311–321. Annales Romani, ibid. 2:347. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LOWENELD (Graz 1956) 1:6631–81. For John's lives of saints, O. ENGELS, Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumskunde und für Kirchengeschichte 51 (1956) 16–33, Erasmus; Quellen und Forschungen aus italienischen Archiven und Bibliotheken 35 (1955) 1–45, Eustasius and Hypolistus; The Historical Journal 76 (1957) 118–133. C. ERDMANN, "Mauritius Burdinus (Gregor VIII)," Quellen und Forschungen aus italienischen Archiven und Bibliotheken 19 (1927) 205–261. R. ELZE, "Die päpstliche Kapelle im 12. und 13. Jahrhundert," Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung 36 (1950) 145–204. J. HALLER, Das Papsttum (Stuttgart 1950–53) 2:503–504. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Hr. (Munich 1954–59) 3:151–154. W. ULLMANN, The Growth of Papal Government in the Middle Ages (2d ed. New York 1962) 327–331. G. ANDRISANI, "Gelasio II a Capua," Benedictina 40 (Rome 1993) 35–47. O. ENGELS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 3d. ed. (1995). R. VOLPINI, "Documenti nel 'Sancta sanctorum' del Laterano. I resti dell' 'Archivio' di Gelasio II," Lateranum 52 (1986), 215–64. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 163.

[H. BLOCH]

GELASIUS OF CAESAREA

Bishop and church historian; b. before 335; d. c. 395. His mother was the sister of CYRIL OF JERUSALEM. Gelasius became bishop of Caesarea (Palestine) in 367, was ousted by Valens in 372 for his attachment to the faith of Nicaea, but regained his see in 378. He was among the 150 fathers of the Ecumenical Council of CONSTANTINOPLE I (381). None of his writings have survived. Jerome praised their style and stated that Gelasius kept them in his desk (De vir. ill. 130). Some of them were published, however, as is proved by the testimony of Photius (Bibl. cod. 88, 89) and by fragments quoted in the writings of THEODORET OF CYR, Leontius of Byzantium, and Severus of Antioch. Gelasius wrote also a polemical treatise against the Anomoeans and a collection of at least 20 instructions on the fundamental teachings of the Church that probably paralleled the famous Catechetical Instructions of his uncle, Cyril of Jerusalem. An Explanation of the Symbol, mentioned in fragment four, may have formed part of the above collection. His main work was an Ecclesiastical History, a continuation of Eusebius's work. According to F. Scheidweiler, it can be reconstructed for the most part from later church historians who borrowed from it: RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA, Gelasius of Cyzicus, SOCRATES, and the author of the Vita Metrophanis et Alexandri. The literary dependence between Gelasius's History and that of Rufinus of Aquileia has been greatly debated. The fragments of Gelasius's dogmatic writings have been edited by F. Diekamp in Analecta patristica 42–49.

Bibliography: F. DIEKAMP, Analecta patristica (Orientalia Christiana Analecta 117; 1938) 16–49. J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3:347–348. B. ALTANER, Patrology, 272–273. F. SCHEIDWEILER, Byzantinische Zeitschrift 46 (1953) 277–301; 48 (1955) 162–164; 49 (1956) 2–6; 50 (1957) 74–98. F. X. MURPHY, Rufinus of Aquileia (Washington 1945) 61–63.

[V. C. DE CLERQC]

GEMARAH

The discussion of the Jewish legal opus, the MISHNAH, with which it forms the TALMUD. The term is from the Aramaic word ge mārā', meaning completion, but it is used also in the derived senses of tradition, study, or even Talmud. In the technical sense the Gemarah is a commentary on the Mishnah. In it the rabbis known as Amoraim (plural of the Hebrew-Aramaic word 'āmôrâ', speaker, lecturer) seek to interpret the teachings of the earlier rabbis, the Tannaim (plural of the Aramaic word tannā', repeater, recounter), that are recorded in the Mishnah and to reconcile them with the Baraitot (plural of the Aramaic word baraitā', external thing), the Tannaitic teachings that are not recorded in the Mishnah but are often held as equally authoritative. There are two Gemarahs (and therefore two Talmuds): the Palestinian, composed between A.D. 200 and 400 and written in western Aramaic, and the Babylonian, completed c. A.D. 500 and written in eastern Aramaic; both, however, are interspersed with Hebrew. The Babylonian is the larger work and is held by Judaism as the more authoritative. About a third of it consists of HAGGADAH (homiletic and folkloristic material), and the remainder of HALAKAH (legal exposition).

For bibliography, see TALMUD.

[R. KRINSKY]

GEMBLoux, ABBEY OF

Benedictine abbey near Namur, Belgium; founded c. 922 by St. Guibert (Wibert), monk from the Abbey of GORZE. On Sept. 20, 946, Emperor Otto I approved the foundation against the feudal claims of Guibert's relatives. Erluin (d. 986) succeeded Guibert after the latter's retirement to Gorze and obtained a charter of exemption from Pope Benedict VII. This right was surrendered to the friendly Notger, Bishop of Liège by Abbot Heriward (d. 990). Gembloux (Gemblours, Gemblacum) began its period of greatness under Olbert, who ruled from 1012 to 1048. He enlarged the monastery, built a new church, organized the library, and restored the discipline of the house, which had lapsed during the rule of his predecessor, Erluin II. During the rule of Abbot Thietmar, the Benedictine historian Sigebert (d. 1112) wrote the important chronicle of the world, and commenced the history of the abbots of Gembloux, which was continued by his disciple Gottschalk (see SIGEBERT OF GEMBLoux). Prior Guerin, his contemporary at Gembloux, won fame at this time as a monastic teacher. In 1505 Abbot Arnold II of Solbrecg (d. 1511) affiliated his jurisdiction of Gembloux with the Abbey of BURSFELD in Hildesheim. During the religious wars, Gembloux was pillaged by Calvinists. In addition to this devastation in 1598, damage by fires threatened its ruin in 1678 and 1712. It was suppressed in 1796, but the buildings are used as a state agricultural institute.

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1263–65. Sigeberti gesta abbatum Gemblacensium et vita Wicberti, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 271 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 160:591–678 (to 1136). R. FORGEUR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:643, bibliog.

[E. D. MCSHANE]

GEMELLI, AGOSTINO

Franciscan philosopher and psychologist; b. Milan, Jan. 18, 1878; d. July 15, 1959. He was a founder of the Catholic University of the Sacred Heart in Milan, and its rector; professor of psychology, and director of a psychological research center; president of the Papal Academy of Sciences; and a promoter of neoscholasticism in Italy. Gemelli first studied medicine and received a doctorate in medicine and surgery at the University of Pavia in 1902. As a young man he lost his faith and thought that science alone could solve all "the riddles of the universe." Eventually disillusioned with philosophy, which he studied for a while, he returned to Catholicism, entered the Franciscan Order, and was ordained in 1908. He continued to study biology, physiology, and philosophy at various universities in Europe. In 1911 he completed his doctorate in philosophy at the University of Louvain, but his dominant interest soon became psychology.

Gemelli's extensive research and publications and his active participation in psychological congresses made him one of the most prominent psychologists in Europe. The scope of his studies and writings included areas such as perception, feeling and emotion, developmental psychology, clinical psychology, psychoanalysis, and electrolinguistics. One of his recurring themes was the nature of psychology and its relation to philosophy and biology. Much of his research was devoted also to practical problems, such as vocational selection and guidance, accident prevention, delinquency, education, and working conditions in industry. During World Wars I and II he rendered valuable services to the Italian armed forces, especially in regard to the selection and training of pilots. Through these activities Gemelli contributed considerably to a better understanding and appreciation of psychology among Catholics and attracted Catholics to the study of psychology.

Gemelli also published works in theology, philosophy, and ethics. Deeply interested in current religious, moral, and scientific issues, he discussed such issues in his writings and ably presented the Catholic point of view. He thereby exerted a profound influence on the intellectual life of Catholic Italy.

Bibliography: Autobiography in A History of Psychology in Autobiography, v.4 (Worcester, Mass. 1952). H. MISIAK and V. M. STAUDT, Catholics in Psychology (New York 1954). D. MORANDO, Enciclopedia filosofica 2:603. P. BONDIOLI, Il P. Agostino Gemelli (Milan 1926). Vita e Pensiero 42 (1959) 505–716, entire issue about Gemelli with his bibliog. A. MANOIL, La Psychologie expérimentale en Italie: École de Milan (Paris 1938).

[H. MISIAK]

GENEALOGIES, BIBLICAL

The Israelites share with other Semitic peoples the tendency to trace the ancestry of the tribe, clan, or individual back through the male line to a historical or legendary figure of the distant past. Frequently he is eponymous; i.e., from him they take their name—e.g., the individuals of a social group would be known as the sons of Israel (Heb. benê yiśrā'ēl) and the group as the house of Israel (bêt yiśrā'ēl). Membership in a tribe or clan means to be descended from such a common ancestor either really or by legal fiction. When those who are not of natural descent are amalgamated to the group (Jos 15.13), they are genealogized into it by adoption of its ancestors.

The Old Testament genealogies are mostly the work of the Pentateuchal PRIESTLY WRITERS in the Persian period from the 6th to the 4th century. They are found especially in the Pentateuch, Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemia. Some, such as Genesis ch. 4–5, have parallels in Babylonian literature, where there is also an artificial listing of ten generations between the first man and the flood. The Priestly Writers frequently utilized genealogies as mnemonic aids, bridging the important epochs of history. Writing for a nation that was no longer independent, they wished to show the links of the present community with the past and Yahweh's special intervention in Israel's history. Israel's role and God's choice of Israel were shown to be no accident of history; they were in Yahweh's plan from the creation of the ancestor of all men, Adam. The genealogy showing the descent of all nations from Noah (Gn ch. 10) continued the same line of thought, indicating the relationship of the chosen people to the Gentiles.

After the Exile, genealogies became so important that ancient figures, such as Samuel, who previously had none, were given lines of ancestors. Every effort had to be made to preserve the identity and faith of the nation, continually threatened by syncretism. One solution was to insist that the priests and other leaders be of pure Jewish blood (Neh 7.5) as proved by genealogical charts. Levites who lacked authentic genealogies were excluded from the service of the Temple. The effort to preserve the nation developed into a nationalism and exclusivism opposed by works such as Jonah and Ruth. Finally, John the Baptist told the Jews that genealogy did not bring salvation: "God is able out of these stones to raise up children to Abraham" (Mt 3.9).

Studies of the individual genealogies often show their artificial nature. There are symmetrical patterns of names and periods of time. Words such as son and brother are used for distant relatives and for those joined only by covenant. Doublets occur showing great variation in the genealogy of the same person. After the period of conquest when the Israelites settled the land of Canaan, names of villages and towns often replaced personal names. All of this points to the fact that the author felt that the history of Israel is the history of God's chosen ones. Study of the genealogies shows that he was more interested in theology than chronology, more concerned with salvation history than the narration of names and dates.

See Also: GENEALOGY OF JESUS.

Bibliography: R. DE VAUX, Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions, tr. J. MC HUGH (New York 1961) 4–6. J. PEDERSEN, Israel, Its Life and Culture, tr. A. MØLLER and A. I. FAUSBØLL, 2 v. (New York 1926–1940; rev. ed. 1959) 1:257. L. WATERMAN, "Some Repercussions from Late Levitical Genealogical Accretions in P and the Chronicler," American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literatures 58 (1941) 50. R. A. BOWMAN, The Interpreters' Dictionary of the Bible, G. A. BUTTRICK, ed., 4 v. (Nashville 1962) 2:362–365.

[S. C. DOYLE]

GENEALOGY OF JESUS

The two lists of Jesus' ancestors are given in the Gospels, one in Mt 1.1–17 and one in Lk 3.23–38. The importance of Christ's genealogy and the differences between the two lists will be considered here.

Importance. Besides the importance attached in general to genealogies in the ancient Near East (see GENEALOGIES, BIBLICAL), the genealogy of Jesus is of particular significance in support of His claim to be the MESSIAH, the son of David. The Old Testament (e.g., Is 11.1–9; Jer 23.5–6; Ez 34.23–24) foretold that the promised Messiah would be David's descendant, and as such have a legiti-mate claim to the restored throne of the Davidic dynasty. That the terms “Messiah” and “son of David” were considered synonymous at the time of Christ is clearly shown in Mt 22.41–46; Mk 12.35–37; and Lk 20.41–44. There can be little doubt that the Savior’s Davidic descent was part of the primitive KERYGMA (cf. Acts 13.22–23; Rom 1.3), and it was eventually incorporated into the written gospel.

Matthew (1.1–17) and Luke (3.23–38) both give formal genealogies, the primary aim of which is to identify Jesus as Son of David and, secondarily, as Son of Abraham (Mt) or Son of God (Lk).

Differences Between the Lists. It is immediately apparent to anyone who places the two lists side by side that they differ widely in particulars. These differences may signify that one (or perhaps both) of the genealogies is more concerned with something beyond biological lineage, for the genealogical table in antiquity could fulfill more than a single function. It served to legitimate a royal or cultic line and to reveal character, on the assumption that descendants inherit the traits of their ancestors. The differences between the lists may signify, however, no more than the presence of two traditions that may or may not be reconcilable.

First List. Matthew (1.17) makes it clear that the genealogy he gives has been schematically arranged; it is divided into three sections, each of 14 generations. To achieve this, he has omitted four of the kings between Solomon and Jechonias, and other names have also no doubt been dropped. Perhaps the number 14 was chosen because it is twice seven (the perfect number), or possibly because the Hebrew consonants (the letters of the alphabet having numerical value) that make up the name David add up to 14. A major problem posed by this genealogy is that the descendants of Zorobabel whom it enumerates do not apparently correspond to those given in 1 Chr 3.19–24.

A final observation on this genealogy concerns the mention of four women (five if we include Mary): Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, and Bathsheba. St. Jerome maintained that these “sinful” women were mentioned to remind us that “He who came for the sake of sinners” was born of sinners. This explanation fails. Ruth was in no way a sinner. Although Tamar and Rahab were prostitutes, and Bathsheba was an adulteress, each of these women was honored in later Judaism; Tamar (Gn 38), as a proselyte to Judaism and because she upheld Judah’s family line by seducing her father-in-law; Rahab (Jos 2, 6), because she aided Israel’s victory at Jericho (cf. Heb 11.31); Bathsheba, because she gave birth to Solomon. A more plausible explanation for the inclusion of women is that what all of them have in common is a foreign background: Tamar and Rahab were Canaanites, Ruth was a Moabite, Bathsheba was the widow of a Hittite. Matthew aimed accordingly, to emphasize the universality of Messianic salvation and to appeal to the Gentile members of the community addressed by his gospel.

A final explanation for the inclusion of women in Matthew’s genealogy makes sense of the biblical texts, on their own historical and literary terms, while offering a perspective compatible with modern convictions. In each case divine intervention occurs, through a woman, by “irregular” or even “scandalous” means (R. Brown), thus foreshadowing Mary’s role in Jesus’ birth. To become pregnant out of wedlock (Matt 1.18) would have been scandalous at the time, while Jesus’ conception by the holy spirit, rather than by natural means, is irregular. Tamar, Rahab, Bathsheba, and Ruth may be viewed, moreover, as examples of “higher righteousness” (Amy-Jill Levine). Their distance from positions of social and cultural privilege, and the initiative they take to advance divine purposes, qualifies them as models for a kind of justice inaccessible to their male counterparts (Judah, the king of Jericho, David, Boaz).

Second List. Luke’s genealogy is much longer than Matthew’s (giving the descent of Abraham from Adam) and is regressive in structure (moving backward from Jesus rather than forward to Him). Between David and Joseph only two names, Zorobabel and Salathiel, correspond to any found in Matthew’s table. The descent from David is traced through the line of Nathan, one of his numerous sons (2 Sm 5.14) about whose issue the Bible tells us nothing save that it was extant in the time of Deutero-Zechariah (Zec 12.13).

If this were the only point at issue, we should have no hesitation in accepting one of the two ancient proposals to harmonize the Matthean and Lucan genealogies. Julius Africanus, in his Letter to Aristides, explained that the Jacob of Matthew’s genealogy and the Heli of Luke’s were uterine brothers, and that upon the death of Heli without any children, Jacob, following the levirate law (Dt 25.5–10) married his brother’s widow and begot Joseph, the legal father of Jesus. This has long been considered the traditional answer to the problem of divergent genealogies, but it is highly doubtful that the levirate law applied to uterine brothers. The alternative suggestion, usually credited to Annius of Viterbo (c. A.D. 1490) but traceable to the 5th century and possibly even to the writings of Justin Martyr (Dial. 100), regards Luke’s genealogy as that of Mary. On this supposition we should read Lk 3.23 as follows: “And Jesus Himself, when He began His work, was about thirty years of age, being—as was supposed—the son of Joseph [but in reality the grand-] son of Heli. . . .” Against this hypothesis it is frequently alleged that descent through a woman was of no account to the Jews and that the genealogy of women is never given. This is not true. The lineage of heiresses is recorded (e.g., Nm 26.33; 1 Chr 2.16–17) and the lengthy genealogy of Judith (Jdt 8.1), whatever one may choose to make of it, shows that a woman's importance entitled her to the same distinction. The real difficulty with the Marian hypothesis, as with that of Africanus, is that neither explains how Salathiel and Zorobabel appear as descendants of Nathan in Luke's genealogy. It is useless to invoke the solution of a levirate marriage again, for we know the names of all the sons of Jechonias and none of them is called Neri (cf. 1 Chr 3.17–18).

Yet the inclusion of Salathiel and Zorobabel in this pedigree may point to its having a wider function than the purely genealogical. Closer study reveals that it consists of 11 sets of seven names each and, more significantly, that the last name in all but the earliest two groupings marks a sort of climax: Jesus, Joseph, Mathathias, Salathiel, Jesus, Joseph, David, Aram, and Thare. These names constitute a kind of historical panorama calling to mind the departure from Ur, the enslavement in Egypt, the first monarchy and the long period of Messianic expectation (the early Joseph and Jesus paralleling the later Joseph and Jesus), the Babylonian exile, the second monarchy, and finally the era of the true Messiah. Some of the other names may have been suggested to the compiler by Zec 12.12–13; some may be fragments of an actual genealogy. We cannot say that the Lucan genealogy has yielded up all its secrets, but we are closer to understanding it.

Bibliography: J. OBERNHUMER, "Die menschliche Abstammung Jesu," ltheologisch-praktische Quartalschrift 91 (1938) 524–527. R. T. HOOD, "The Genealogies of Jesus," Early Christian Origins, ed. A. WIKGREN (Chicago 1961). L. NOLLE, "Old Testament Laws of Inheritance and St. Luke's Genealogy of Christ," Scripture 2 (1949–50) 38–42. S. SANDMEL, "Myths, Genealogies and Jewish Myths and the Writing of the Gospels," Hebrew Union College Annual 27 (1956) 201–211. R. E. BROWN, The Birth of the Messiah (Garden City, NY 1977). A.-J. LEVINE, "Matthew," The Women's Bible Commentary, eds. C. A. NEWSOM and S. H. RINGE (Louisville, KY 1992) 253–54.

[J. E. BRUNS/M. STEVENSON]

GÉNÉBRARD, GILBERT

Exegete and Hebraist; b. Riom, Auvergne, France, Dec. 12, 1537; d. Semur, Bourgogne, France, March 14, 1597. He entered the Benedictine monastery at Mautiac as a youth, received the doctorate of theology in Paris (1563), and there became professor of Hebrew and Scripture (1569). Consecrated a bishop (April 4, 1592), he was appointed archbishop of Aix-en-Provence (Oct. 9, 1593). A staunch supporter of the Catholic League in opposing the succession of the Protestant Henry of Navarre to the throne of France, Générard suffered for his resistance, even though, soon after Henry became a Catholic and was crowned HENRY IV of France (1593), he rendered his submission to the new king. In 1596 the parliament of Provence accused him of lese majesty, had his work De sacrarum electionum jure (Paris 1593) publicly burned, and banished him from the region. After a brief exile in Avignon, he was allowed to retire to his priory in commendam at Semur, where he soon died.

Génébrard was rightly regarded by his contemporaries as one of the outstanding savants of the 16th century. Among his numerous published works are studies in the fields of OT exegesis, rabbinical literature, Patristics, dogmatic and moral theology, Canon Law, liturgy, and chronology.

Bibliography: H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 3:116–117. B. HEURTEBIZE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 6.1:1183–85; Dictionnaire de la Bible 3.1:171–172. Y. CHAUSSY, Catholicisme 4:1813. A. VACCARI, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche 4:662–663.

[L. F. HARTMAN]

GENERAL DIRECTORY FOR CATECHESIS

Catechetical directories are a new genre of writing in the Roman Catholic religious education that emerged at the Second Vatican Council. They furnish guidelines that delineate theological-pastoral principles, describe the nature and purpose of catechesis, set goals, outline structures, and suggest strategies for catechetical programs. The General Directory for Catechesis (GDC) promulgated in 1997 by the Congregation for the Clergy updates the General Catechetical Directory published in 1971. Composed originally in Spanish and Italian, the GDC exists in Latin (the editio typica), English, French, German, and other translations. The new edition reflects the orientation given to catechesis in the apostolic exhortations Evangelii nuntiandi of Pope Paul VI (1974) and Catechesi tradendae of Pope John Paul II (1979) by yoking catechesis and evangelization in the Church's mission to proclaim the Gospel. It encourages the baptismal catechumenate, restored in the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (1972), as the model for all catechesis. The 1979 Directory, considerably longer than the earlier edition, consists of five parts. Part 1 explains the nature, object, and the duties of catechesis in the context of the Church's mission of evangelization. Part 2 recapitulates the norms and criteria for presenting the Gospel found in the 1971 edition of the Directory and explains the contents and use of the Catechism of the Catholic Church. Part 3 describes “the pedagogy of God” as the source and model of the pedagogy to be adopted in catechesis. Part 4 focuses on the recipients of catechesis, explaining how the methods and even the message needs to be adapted according to age groups, special needs, the socio-religious context, and cultural background of those being catechized. Part 5 addresses catechesis in the local church. It outlines principles that should guide the formation of catechesis, the need to be sensitive to the surroundings where it is carried on, and the importance of coordinating catechetical and other pastoral programs for their mutual support. The 291 numbered paragraphs of the GDC are not all of the same importance. The sections deal with divine revelation, the nature of catechesis, and the criteria governing the proclamation of the Gospel message are “universally valid.” Paragraphs that refer to particular circumstances, methodology, and to the manner of adapting catechesis to diverse age groups and cultural contexts are by way of guidelines and suggestions. The immediate aim of catechetical directories is to assist in the composition of national and regional directories and the writing of catechisms.

Bibliography: General Directory for Catechesis. Washington, D.C.: United States Catholic Conference, 1998. C. BISSOLI, “Il Direttorio Generale per la Catechesi (1997),” Salesianum 60 (1998) 521–547. B. L. MARTHALER, Sowing Seeds: Notes and Comments on the General Directory for Catechesis (Washington, D.C. 2000).

[B. L. MARTHALER]

GENERAL INTERCESSIONS

General intercessions are also called universal prayer, prayer of the faithful, or prayers of the people. Christian tradition has always given an important place to intercessory prayer. St. Paul exhorts to the offering of “prayers, petitions, intercessions and thanksgiving for all: for rulers and all in authority, so that we may be able to live quiet and peaceful lives in the full practice of religion and of morality” (1 Tm 2.1–4). Intercessory prayer is a natural part of the liturgy in which the Church, in the name of Christ, continues to offer the prayer and petition which he poured out in the days of his earthly life. Already by the 2nd century the origins of the General Intercessions appear. St. Justin Martyr writes (c. 155) that “on the Lord’s day, after the reading of Scripture and the homily, all stand and offer the prayers” (First Apology 67). Vatican Council II’s Constitution on the Liturgy called for the restoration of these General Intercessions which in the course of time had disappeared from the Roman Mass (Sacrosanctum Concilium 53).

At Mass. The structure of the General Intercessions has three parts. First, after the Homily the one presiding invites the people to pray. Second, the deacon (or another person) announces the intentions to the people and they pray for that intention in silence or by a common response, recited or sung. Third, the one presiding concludes with a prayer (GenInstrRomMissal 47). As a rule the sequence of intentions is: (1) for the needs of the Church; (2) for public authorities and the salvation of the world; (3) for those oppressed by any need; and (4) for the local community (ibid. 46).

Liturgy of the Hours. The Church praises God throughout the course of the day by celebrating the Liturgy of the Hours. The tradition does not separate praise of God from petition and “often enough praise turns somehow to petition” (GenInstrLitHor 179). Consequently, the General Intercessions have been restored to Morning and Evening Prayer, however with some nuance to avoid repetition of the petitions at Mass. The intentions at Morning Prayer are to consecrate the day to God (ibid. 181); those at Evening Prayer stress thanksgiving for graces received during the day. The intentions found in the Hours Book are addressed directly to God (rather than to the people, as at Mass) so that the wording is suitable for both common celebration and private recitation (ibid. 190). Although “the Liturgy of the Hours, like other liturgical actions, is not something private but belongs to the whole body of the Church” (ibid. 20), it must be acknowledged that it is still often prayed privately. In every case, however, the petitions should be linked with praise of God and acknowledgement of his glory or with a reference to the history of salvation, as in the Lord’s Prayer (ibid. 185).

Bibliography: Consilium, De Oratione Communi seu Fidelium: Natura, momentum ac structura. Criteria atque specimina coetibus territorialibus episcoporum proposita (Vatican City 1966). P. DE CLERCK, La “prière universelle” dans les liturgies latines anciennes: Témoignages patristiques et textes liturgiques (Liturgiewissenschaftliche Quellen und Forschungen 62 Münster, Westfalen 1977). D. CONNORS, ed. Issue on “General Intercessions,” Liturgical Ministry 2 (1993) 1–33. J. B. MOLIN, “Quelques textes médiévaux de la prière universelle,” in Traditio et progressio (Rome 1988) 333–358.

[T. RICHSTATTER/EDS.]

GENERATION-CORRUPTION

The change or passage from a negative term to a positive term, from not existing to existing, is called generation (Lat. generatio); the change or passage from a positive term to a negative term, from existing to not existing, is called destruction or corruption (Lat. corruptio). Because there is no intermediary between the contradictories “existing” and “not existing,” between “affirming” and “denying,” generation and corruption are called changes according to contradiction. They are therefore instantaneous. Either one may be “absolute” (simpliciter) or merely “with respect to something” (secundum quid). An example of the former is the coming into existence of Socrates, a man, or his ceasing to exist; of the latter, his becoming white or his ceasing to be white, whether he, too, comes to be or ceases to be or not.

Neither generation nor corruption, whether absolute or with respect to something, is MOTION in the strict sense of the word. Motion requires something already in existence that can be moved gradually from one positive term to another positive term contrary to the first.

In living beings, substantial or absolute generation is a vital operation that proceeds from within the parent as a conjoined principle producing an offspring specifically like itself.

See Also: SUBSTANTIAL CHANGE; MATTER AND FORM.

[A. ROBINSON]

GENERATION OF THE WORD

The topic here is the origin of the Son from the Father within the Godhead. As such that origin is not an object of direct consideration in the New Testament. This is not, however, to say it has no background there; quite the contrary is the case. The Father and Son (prescinding from the Holy Spirit) appear on the same side of the dichotomy between Creator and everything else. And precisely in this frame of reference they are still related to each other in the way their very names imply (see GOD [SON]). To speak of the Son as being generated is to continue further the Biblically inspired analogy of paternity-filiation in the Deity. The Latin version of the Scriptures gives reason for so doing in applying unigenitus to the Son (Jn 1.14, 18; 3.16, 18; 1 Jn 4.9), although the Greek μονογενής has more the sense of unique, sole, or only one of its kind, than only-begotten. All this has importance as it indicates the type of origin ascribed to the Son before the Incarnation, namely, GENERATION. The Bible being what it is, its authors were not concerned with giving a description of the preconditions, constituents, and consequences of that intra-Trinitarian generation. Its factual character is, however, asserted, namely, a dependence of Son on Father in a way that is diverse from that of all other realities.

If the Scriptures did not enter into the precise manner of the origin in question, the case was decidedly otherwise in the postapostolic Church. It was no small task to find a formula that would express both the origin and dependence of Jesus on the Father and also not imply that He was on the other side of the above-mentioned dichotomy. The difference between γίνομαι and γεννώω was difficult to grasp and explain, this due to a resemblance at once literal and ideological. At the instance of Arius, the Council of Nicaea I entered more directly into the implications of the Son’s eternal generation. Excluding origin from nothing and origin from other preexistent beings, He was said to be generated (not made) from the Father’s own reality, or substance (Enchiridion symbolorum, 125–126). When later the Holy Spirit was proposed as the creature of the Son, the orthodox reaction affirmed His origin from the Father by way of procession (Enchiridion symbolorum, 150) distinguished from the Son’s generation (Enchiridion symbolorum, 75, 800). Finally the connection between the conception of the Son in time and His eternal birth from the Father entered very much into the Nestorian controversy of the 5th century [cf. A. Grillmeier, Christ in Christian Tradition, tr. J. S. Bowden (New York 1965) 369–399].

The assertion that the Father’s personal note (αγεννησία) was connected of utter necessity with the nature of Deity excluded not only the Son (as generated) but also much mystery from the Godhead (Eunomius, Apol.; Patrologia Graeca 30:842–847). By reaction, the incipient theology of the beatific vision found some Greek Fathers qualifying the intellectual union of man with God even in glory so as to preserve the transcendence of the Deity [Chrysostom, Incomprehens., Patrologia Graeca 48:704; Theodoret, Eran. (Dial.) 1, Patrologia Graeca 83:49].

In dependence on Augustine, scholastic theologians considered the human psychology of knowing and loving analogous to the divine processions (see WORD, THE). The difference between the two in man provided intelligibility to an increased degree for the article of faith that in the Godhead only the Son arises, or takes origin, by way of generation (intellection). Contemporary Christian theology, with its emphasis on CHRISTOLOGY, is attempting to investigate or consider the procession of the Son (generation) as continued in His temporal mission (see MISSIONS, DIVINE) and as a possible precondition for the concession of revelation and grace by God to man (see LOGOS).

See Also: CONSUBSTANTIALITY; FILIATION; HOMOOUSIOS; TRINITY, HOLY, ARTICLES ON.

For bibliography, see GOD (SON); WORD, THE; LOGOS; TRINITY, HOLY.

[C. J. PETER]

GENESIS, BOOK OF

The first book in the Bible. As with all their sacred books, the Jewish people called the first book by its opening words b'ere'shit. The name commonly used in modern European languages is derived from the Vulgate adaptation of the Septuagint (LXX) title, which refers to the story of creation, or the "genesis," of the world.

The main topics considered in this article concerning the Book in the Bible are its historical character, its place in the Church's doctrine, and its most important teachings. Before these are considered, however, it will be helpful to outline its contents and say a word about its composition.

Contents and Division. Genesis is divided into two main parts. As the first book of the Pentateuch, Genesis is an introduction to Israel's history. The main division is between ch. 1–11, which treat of the primeval age, and ch. 12–50, which treat of the patriarchal history. The latter section is an immediate introduction to the story of Israel (beginning with Abraham), and the former is a prologue to the whole Pentateuch, explaining the need for a divine intervention in mankind's history. Both are interpretative analyses, but they differ in their type of material. The history of the primeval age is a conflation of two traditions, the YAHWIST (J) and the Priestly (P). (See PRIESTLY WRITERS, PENTATEUCHAL.) In the patriarchal history a third tradition, the ELOHIST (E), appears. The following division of the book into literary units and their attribution to the three traditions are somewhat tentative and subject to revision on the basis of further scholarly work.

1. 1.1–11.32: Primeval Age
 - a. 1.1–2.4a: creation of world and man (P)
 - b. 2.4b–25: creation of man and woman (J)
 - c. 3.1–24: the Fall (J)
 - d. 4.1–16: Cain and Abel (J)
 - e. 4.17–26: genealogy of Cain (J)
 - f. 5.1–32: genealogy of Adam to Noah (P)
 - g. 6.1–22: prologue to the Flood (J and P)
 - h. 7.1–8.22: the Flood (J and P)
 - i. 9.1–17: covenant with Noah (P)
 - j. 9.18–27: sons of Noah (J)
 - k. 10.1–32: peopling of the earth (P and J)
 - l. 11.1–9: tower of Babel (J)
 - m. 11.10–32: concluding genealogies (P and some J)
2. 12.1–25.18: The Patriarch Abraham
 - a. 12.1–9: call of Abram (J, some P)
 - b. 12.10–20: Abram and Sarai in Egypt (J)
 - c. 13.1–18: separation of Abram and Lot (J, some P)
 - d. 14.1–24: Abram and the four kings (?)
 - e. 15.1–20: promises renewed (J, some E?)

- f. 16.1–16: Hagar's flight (J, some P)
- g. 17.1–27: covenant of circumcision (P)
- h. 18.1–19.38: Sodom and Gomorrah (J)
- i. 20.1–18: Abraham and Sarah in Gerar (E)
- j. 21.1–21: Isaac and Ishmael (J and P)
- k. 21.22–34: Abraham and Abimelech (E)
- l. 22.1–24: sacrifice of Isaac (E, some J)
- m. 23.1–20: purchase of cave of Machpelah (P)
- n. 24.1–67: wife of Isaac (J)
- o. 25.1–18: Abraham's descendants (P and J)
3. 25.19–36.43: Patriarchs Isaac and Jacob
 - a. 25.19–34: birth of Esau and Jacob (J, some P)
 - b. 26.1–35: Isaac in Gerar and Bersabee (J, some P)
 - c. 27.1–45: Isaac's blessing of Jacob (J)
 - d. 27.46–28.9: Jacob's departure for Phadan-aram (P)
 - e. 28.10–22: vision at Bethel (J and E)
 - f. 29.1–30: Jacob's marriages (J and E?)
 - g. 29.31–30.24: Jacob's children (J and E)
 - h. 30.25–43: Laban outwitted by Jacob (J, some E)
 - i. 31.1–21: Jacob's departure (E, some J)
 - j. 31.22–42: Laban's pursuit (E, some J)
 - k. 31.43–32.3: contract between Jacob and Laban (J and E)
 - l. 32.4–22: preparation for Jacob's meeting with Esau (J and E)
 - m. 32.23–33: Jacob's struggle with God (J)
 - n. 33.1–20: Jacob's meeting with Esau (J, some E?)
 - o. 34.1–31: rape of Dinah (J and E)
 - p. 35.1–29: Jacob at Bethel (E and P, some J)
 - q. 36.1–43: descendants of Esau (P?)
4. 37.1–50.26: History of Joseph
 - a. 37.1–36: Joseph sold into Egypt (J and E)
 - b. 38.1–30: Judah and Tamar (J)
 - c. 39.1–23: Joseph's temptations (J)
 - d. 40.1–23: Joseph's interpretation of prisoners' dreams (E)
 - e. 41.1–57: Joseph's interpretation of Pharaoh's dreams (E, some J)
 - f. 42.1–38: first encounter of Joseph with his brothers (E, some J)
 - g. 43.1–34: second journey to Egypt (J, some E)
 - h. 44.1–34: Judah's plan for Benjamin (J)
 - i. 45.1–28: recognition of Joseph (J and E)
 - j. 46.1–34: Jacob's journey to Egypt (J, E, and P)
 - k. 47.1–31: Hebrews in Egypt (J and P)
 - l. 48.1–22: Jacob's adoption of Joseph's sons (J and E, some P)
 - m. 49.1–33: Jacob's blessings (J)
 - n. 50.1–26: burial of Jacob and final acts of Joseph (J, E, and P)

The principles for the literary analysis of the Pentateuch were first applied to Genesis, where the documentary traditions were quite apparent. In the history of the primeval age (ch. 1–11) J provided the narrative continuity, while P, for the most part, supplied the chronological and ethnological framework. The same roles were generally continued in the patriarchal history (ch. 12–50), although here E added its theological insights with a parallel narrative. The narrative was probably more extensive in its original form, but was reduced when conflated with J.

“Lot and His Daughters,” painting by Wolfgang Krodel, 16th century. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

"The Expulsion from Eden," fresco by Masaccio, 1427, the Brancacci Chapel of S. Maria del Carmine, Florence, Italy.

Historical Character. Genesis presents a theological interpretation of history, intended to throw light on later Israelite history. It does not purport to be a disinterested presentation of facts, but a religious illustration of the divine plan of salvation. As such it is highly selective in its use of material and freely adapts it to its purpose.

The basic facts in the patriarchal history correspond, at least in a general way, to the findings of modern archeology that provide information and insight about the political, social, juridical, and religious conditions in the first half of the 2nd millennium B. C. Similar conditions are reflected in Genesis ch. 12–50. The general lines of the patriarchal activity, from the migration from Upper Mesopotamia, through their varying adventures in Canaan, to the descent of at least a representative group into Egypt, are true to historical reality.

This basic family history was first recorded and preserved in oral form. The original purpose was generally one of entertainment and tribal pride, resulting in the story's popular form. Thus, popular explanations were given to the meaning of names; family incidents were put into ballad form; and, at times, local cult legends were used to give a deeper insight into mysterious happenings. Gradually the stories tended to concentrate on certain individuals or, especially, to become liturgical elements for certain shrines, thus assuring their preservation. Cycles of stories arose, frequently with a geographical link. During this period of their shrine history, the stories underwent a development that emphasized religious elements and reflected confessional interests that added luster to the local shrine or tribe. Only after this development did the Pentateuchal editors adapt them to their purposes. Such adaptation necessitated adjustments at times in order to stress religious lessons for each story or dominant themes for the entire history. In the gradual conflation of the traditions and in the final redaction of the canonical book, still more editorial work was done in keeping with the purposes of the inspired authors. Despite this long and varied history, which must be taken into account in interpreting Genesis, the basic historical character of the patriarchal narratives was preserved. (For the historical nature of Genesis ch. 1–11, see PRIMEVAL AGE IN THE BIBLE.)

The Church and Genesis. Many stories and figures in the Book of Genesis have become part of general western culture. The story of creation, the tower of Babel, and the flood are ready points of reference, as are the names of Adam and Eve, Cain and Abel, Noah, and the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac and Israel. Within Christianity, however, there are sharp differences in the interpretation of the text, especially of the first 11 chapters, both as regards the origin of the material and its historical value. In the 18th and 19th centuries the study of linguistics and comparative religion as well as the newborn sciences of archeology, geology, and anthropology brought into question the historicity of the first chapters of Genesis and caused some to raise doubts about the reliability of the Bible itself. In reaction Christian apologists defended the veracity of the biblical accounts even to the point of insisting of a literal interpretation of six days of creation. Catholic scholars for the most part, steering a middle course between FUNDAMENTALISM and rationalism, advocated forms of concordism, that is, interpretations of the text that were consonant with the findings of anthropology and geology.

The common Christian belief that the Bible mediates the revealed word of God is fundamental to the official Catholic interpretation of Genesis, and it was to safeguard this truth that the Church was at times tenacious in defending its Mosaic authorship and the historical value. This was especially the case in early decisions of the PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL COMMISSION in repudiating rationalist and Modernist interpretations of the text. By the time Pope Pius XII published his important encyclical DIVINO AFFLANTE SPIRITU in 1943, leading Catholic scholars had reexamined the tradition. The encyclical set down basic principles for a sound Christian exegesis and encouraged scholars to apply them to all parts of the Scriptures without fear. There followed, not long after this, scholarly articles and several complete commentaries on Genesis that made full use of scientific methodology. That these were not contrary to the mind of the Church was implied in the letter of the secretary of the Pontifical Biblical Commission to the cardinal archbishop of Paris (E. Suhard) on Jan. 16, 1948. Concerning the first 11 chapters of Genesis, the letter said in part, "They relate in simple and figurative language, adapted to the understanding of a less developed people, the fundamental truths presupposed for the economy of salvation, as well as the popular description of the origin of the human race and of the chosen people" (Enchiridion biblicum, 4th ed., 581).

There was a similar development in the understanding of the origin of the material used in the opening chapters. Catholic scholars came to agree that the truths contained in these 11 chapters were the fruit of Israel's faith and that the narrative form in which the truths were preserved can be traced, in part at least, to extra-Biblical sources that antedate Israel. Northern Mesopotamia is the likeliest place for the narratives' origin, since this was the immediate home of the Patriarchs' ancestors, and the suggestion is confirmed by a comparison of the Genesis stories with those of Mesopotamia. Israel's theology, of course, radically affected the stories and made them vehicles for teaching Israelite religious truths. Most Catholic scholars accepted some form of the documentary thesis that attributes the Genesis text to a conflation of the Yahwist (J) and Priestly (P) traditions that were given final form by the Elohist (E) editor.

The Catechism of the Catholic Church acknowledges that the natural sciences have "splendidly enriched our knowledge of the age and dimensions of the universe" (n.283), and at the same time it emphasizes the "unique place" that the first three chapters of Genesis occupy in the Church's teaching on creation. "From a literary standpoint," the Catechism says, "these texts may have had diverse sources. The inspired authors have placed them at the beginning of Scripture to express in their solemn language the truths of creation—its origin and its end in God, its order and goodness, the vocation of man, and finally the drama of sin and salvation" (n. 289). Elsewhere it states, "the account of the fall in Genesis 3 uses figurative language" to affirm "a primitive event, a deed that took place at the beginning of the history of man" (n. 390; see also, 375).

Importance of Genesis. The abundant references and allusions to Genesis in the NT, the Fathers, and the official documents of the Church attest to its importance as the background for many Christian doctrines. Dependent on Genesis, for instance, are the Pauline doctrines of original sin, of the new Adam, and of the role of faith in justification. In 1 Peter the waters of the flood become a type of baptismal waters, and the author of Hebrews has greatly developed and applied the symbolism of the figure of Melchisedek.

Its importance is even more clearly shown by a summary of the principal teachings of the book. The primary purpose of Genesis is to explain the saving actions of God on Israel's behalf. These actions are seen, first of all, as the fulfillment of the patriarchal promises recorded in ch. 12–50 and, ultimately, as necessitated by man's religious and moral deterioration as described in ch. 1–11. The book is, therefore, wholly soteriological in aim. (For a summation of the doctrine of ch. 1–11, see PRIMEVAL AGE IN THE BIBLE.)

The scattering of the peoples over the face of the earth, which marks the climax of man's alienation from God (11.1–9), forms the background for the divine intervention in the favor of Abraham. The Patriarch is called from his Mesopotamian homeland and given the promise of a great posterity and of special divine blessings (12.1–3). This promise, made by the personal God of the fathers (31.5, 29, 42, 53), is constantly renewed (13.14–16; 26.2–5; 28.13–15) and is to be fulfilled in the people of Israel (15.13–16, 18–21). Together with the conviction of the one personal Lord, the promise of a great nation possessing one land ties the patriarchal narratives intimately to the rest of Israel's history.

All that is recorded in these narratives has its final relevance to the divine plan of salvation. Dependent on it, therefore, are the manifestations of divine power (12.17; 14.19–20), divine justice (19.24–29; 38.7), and divine mercy (18.23–32; 19.19–22). It is likewise within this context of the divine saving plan that human virtues are presented: faith (12.4a; 15.6; ch. 22), sacrificial worship and the invoking of God's name (12.7–8; 13.4, 18; 26.25; 31.54; 33.20; 35.1, 7; 46.1), sexual morality (ch. 19–20; 38.24; 39.7–12), hospitality (19.1–8; 24.17–20), forgiveness of offenses (50.15–21), abhorrence of murder (37.21–22), and respect for the dead (cb. 23; 25.8–10; 35.19–20, 29; 50.1–14).

Bibliography: C. WESTERMAN, Genesis 1–11, Genesis 12–36, Genesis 37–50 3 vols. (Minneapolis, 1984–86) [Noteworthy for its comprehensive bibliography based on the work of the University of Heidelberg Genesis- Research Institute]. G. VON RAD, Genesis: A Commentary, tr. J. H. MARKS (Philadelphia 1961). E. A. SPEISER, Genesis (Anchor Bible 1; Garden City, NY 1964). B. VAWTER, On Genesis: A New Reading (New York 1977). W. BRUEGGEMANN and W. WOLFF, The Vitality of the Old Testament Traditions (Atlanta, 1975). W. BRUEGGEMANN, Genesis (Atlanta, 1982). M. NOTH, A History of Pentateuchal Traditions (Englewood Cliffs, NJ 1972). J. VAN SETERS, Abraham in History and Tradition (New Haven, CT 1975). C. L'HEUREUX, In and out of Paradise (Ramsey, NJ 1983).

[E. H. MALY/EDS.]

GENESIUS, SS.

There are four saints by this name of whom any details are known.

Genesius (Genès) of Arles, martyr; d. 303? This catechumen, as notary of Arles, refused to transcribe an edict ordering the persecution of Christians. Fleeing the city, he sent the bishop a request for baptism, but before he could receive the sacrament, he was beheaded near the river Rhône. He is often confused with Genesius the Comedian.

Feast: Aug. 25.

Genesius, bishop of Clermont; d. c. 660. When chosen unanimously by the populace to fill the bishopric on the death of St. Proculus, Genesius reluctantly accepted. After five years he made a pilgrimage to Rome seeking permission to resign and lead a solitary life, but his people forced him to return. He built the church of St. Symphorian (where he was buried and which later bore his name), a hospice, and a monastery, Manglieu or Grandlieu. A later bishop of Clermont, St. Praejectus (Prix; d. 676), was his ward.

Feast: June 3.

Genesius the Comedian, legendary martyr, patron of actors; of unknown origin. The passio relates that, a pagan actor, he was “baptized” while performing a burlesque of Christian rites for the Emperor DIOCLETIAN and publicly confessed the faith. Diocletian immediately put him to torture and had him beheaded.

Feast: Aug. 25.

Genesius, bishop of Lyons; d. Nov. 11, 678. He was an abbot and chaplain of Queen St. BATHILDIS, becoming bishop of Lyons in 658. In 677 he presided over the Council of Malay.

Feast: Nov. 1.

Bibliography: S. CAVALLIN, “Saint Genès le notaire,” Eranos Löfstedtianus 43 (1945) 150–175. P. FRANCHI DE' CAVALLIERI, Note agiografiche 8 (Studi e Testi 65; 1935) 203–210. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie 6.1:903–909. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints 2:465; 3:398–400. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige 3:247. G. of Arles. G. PRETE, Trittico stenografico (2d. ed. Asti 1970). J. VERT I PLANAS, La reliquia de Sant Genís (Torroella de Montgrí 1982). G. the Comedian. M. PERRIN, Saint Genès et comédiens convertis (Paris 1966). C. RAMBAUD, Le comédien aux liens (Saint-Étienne 1983). H. GALINDO, Genesio: obra farsica en quince cuadros (Monterrey, Mexico 1995).

[A. M. SHEA]

GENEVIÈVE, ST.

Patroness of Paris, France; b. Nanterre, outside Paris, c. 422; d. c. 500. According to the ancient vita, Geneviève, or Genovefa, on hearing an inspiring sermon by St. GERMAIN OF AUXERRE, promised to consecrate her life to God. She was only seven years old at the time. When she was 15, she was received as a virgin before a certain Bishop Vilicus. Her parents died soon after, and Geneviève moved to Paris to live with her godmother. In 451, when Attila's troops were on the outskirts of the city, Geneviève persuaded the citizens of Paris to hold fast and not to leave the city. Her prediction was correct. Attila's troops switched their offensive from Paris and turned toward Orléans, where they were defeated by the Romans and the Franks on the Catalonian fields. Geneviève was buried in the church of the Holy Apostles Peter and Paul, popularly known as the church of St. Geneviève. When the church that had been built in her honor (in 1764) became the Pantheon (1793), most of her relics were destroyed; a center of her veneration today is the church of St. Étienne-du-Mont. Frequent claims of her miraculous protection of the city of Paris, including delivery from a pestilence in 1129, contributed to both the literature of devotion and legend during the Middle Ages. The vita has been preserved in three recensions and has been the object of vigorous historical research. Some competent scholars defend its authenticity.

Feast: Jan. 3.

Bibliography: Vita, ed. B. KRUSCH, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptorum rerum Merovingicarum 3 (1896) 204–238. M. HEINZELMANN, J. C. POULIN, and M. FLEURY, Les vies anciennes de sainte Geneviève de Paris études critiques (Paris 1986). C. KOHLER, Étude critique sur . . . Sainte Geneviève (Paris 1881) 5–47. K. KÜNSTLE, ed., Vita Sanctae Genovefae (BT; 1910). G. KURTH, Études franques, 2 v. (Brussels 1919) 2:1–96. Acta Sanctorum, Jan. 1:137–153. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie 6.1:960–990. P. VIARD, Catholicisme 4:1829–31. E.

BOURASSIN, Sainte Geneviève (Monaco 1997). J. DUBOIS and L. BEAUMONT-MAILLET, Sainte Geneviève de Paris: la vie, la culte, l'art (Paris 1982). H. LESÉTRE, Sainte Geneviève (Les Saints 191; Paris 1900). A. RICHOMME, Sainte Geneviève: patronne de Paris (Paris 1979). A. D. SERTILLANGES, Sainte Geneviève (Paris 1917). M. SLUHOVSKY, Patroness of Paris: Rituals of Devotion in Early Modern France (Leiden 1998). Y. Z. ZHANG, Der Legendenstoff der heiligen Genoveva in dramatischen Bearbeitungen vom Barock bis zum Realismus (Frankfurt am Main 1998). F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church.

[D. KELLEHER]

GÉNICOT, ÉDOUARD

Jesuit moral theologian; b. Antwerp, June 18, 1856; d. Louvain, Feb. 21, 1900. Génicot entered the Society of Jesus on Sept. 27, 1872. He took over the chair of moral theology at Louvain in 1889, teaching first Canon Law and then moral theology until his death in 1900. His teaching was marked by great clarity and the avoidance of subtleties, and by the careful pursuit of principles to their legitimate conclusions. His Theologiae Moralis Institutiones, first published in 1896, went through numerous revised editions and became the standard moral text in many seminaries. It draws its inspiration mainly from the large work of Ballerini-Palmieri, and was in turn frequently edited and adapted, especially after the promulgation of the Code of Canon Law, by Génicot's nephew, Joseph Salsmans. Génicot judiciously popularized, for the use of students and the general public, the work that Ballerini had written for scholars. Génicot's other well-known work, Casus Conscientiae, published posthumously at Louvain in 1901, was also brought up to date by Salsmans.

Bibliography: P. BERNARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 6.2: 1223–24. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae 5.2:2056.

[J. H. CAMPANA]

GENIZA

The Hebrew name for a room in a synagogue in which damaged manuscripts of the Bible or other writings with sacred associations are preserved when withdrawn from use. It is also a collective term designating writings so preserved. The Hebrew verb gānaz means “to conceal,” and, consequently “to preserve carefully.” The setting apart of the “holy” from the “profane” being one of the main tenets of the Jewish religion, sacred objects worn beyond usefulness were concealed instead of being destroyed. This practice was observed in Biblical times in respect to the knife used in the temple for killing sacrificial animals and the linen garments worn by the high priest on the Day of Atonement. The command to conceal applies especially to canonical Scriptures and other writings in which the divine name appears. An exception is made regarding writings of heretics, especially Christians, which may be destroyed by fire even if the name of God is found in them (Bab. Talmud, Sab. 116a). Books whose canonicity was contested or held suspect were equally concealed: “Originally, it is said, Proverbs, Song of Songs, and Ecclesiastes were concealed [genûzîm] . . . , until the men of the Great Synagogue [variant: the men of Hezekiah] came and interpreted them” (Aboth de R. Nathan, 1). No mention is made in the Talmud of the mode of concealment, except a remark of Rabba (4th-century Babylonian sage) that a Torah roll unfit for use was concealed by being placed in a scholar’s grave. Maimonides (1135–1204) makes the authoritative pronouncement: “A Torah roll which has become old or unfit for use is to be laid in an earthen vessel and buried beside a scholar. In this consists its concealment”

“Saint Geneviève,” 15th-century sculpture by Hugo van der Goes. (©Archivo Iconografico/CORBIS)

(Mishnēh Tôrâ, Hilkôth Sēfer Tôrâ, 10.3). Fortunately, this prescription was not always carried out. Today “the Geniza” refers to the ancient storeroom of the now rebuilt Ezra Synagogue (once the Melkite Church of St. Michael) in Old Cairo (Egypt), belonging to the Karaites and containing valuable documents accumulated for centuries. Solomon Schechter, U.S. Jewish theologian and Talmudist, in 1896 brought over to Cambridge University Library from Cairo about 100,000 of these treasured fragments, the bulk of the collection, although other portions of it reached Oxford, Paris, and New York. A broad survey of its significance is given by Paul E. Kahle in his The Cairo Geniza (2d ed. New York 1960). The two most notable finds were the original Hebrew text of the book of SIRACH (Ecclesiasticus), known until then only in Greek and Syriac translations, and the Zadokite Document, the true character of which did not appear clearly until the discoveries in the Judean Desert in 1947 (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS). It should be noted that the title given by E. L. Sukenik to his first edition of the scrolls found in the Judean Desert, Megilloth Genuzoth (v.1–2, Jerusalem 1948, 1950), is misleading, as these scrolls were indeed stored away, but not concealed.

Bibliography: S. SCHECHTER, Studies in Judaism (2d ser. Philadelphia 1908) 1–30.

[M. J. STIASNY]

GENNADIUS I, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE, ST.

Episcopacy 458 to 471, theologian and exegete; b. place and date unknown; d. Constantinople. In his extant works he opposes Alexandrian Christology and interprets Scripture literally. As a young man he vigorously attacked (431) CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA's Twelve Anathemas and in a later work (Ad Parthenium) accused Cyril of blasphemy. Fragments of his encomium on LEO I THE GREAT's Ad Flavianum establish his own orthodoxy on the Incarnation. He wrote commentaries on Genesis, Exodus, Daniel, Psalms, and the Pauline Epistles; surviving fragments show him to have been an exegete of the Antioch school. He became patriarch of Constantinople (458), and he removed the Monophysite bishop of Alexandria, Timothy Aelurus, on the admonition of Leo I (Ep. 170). At a synod (460) called to curb simony in ordinations, he issued an encyclical anathematizing this abuse. He was conspicuous for learning and sanctity, and his power of prayer was a legend in his own lifetime. When an unruly lector heeded neither reprimand nor flogging, Gennadius prayed that he might mend his ways or leave this world; to the terror of all, the lector died the next day. An artist who had presumed to paint Christ as Jupiter found his right hand withered, but at Gennadius's prayer it was restored to use. He administered his see ably and successfully.

Feast: Aug. 25.

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca 85:1613–1734. Acta Sanctorum Aug. 5:148–155. J. QUASTEN, Patrology 3:525–526. F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church 547.

[P. W. HARKINS]

GENNADIUS II SCHOLARIUS, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Byzantine lay theologian and scholar, patriarch of Constantinople as Gennadius II (1453–c. 1466); b. George Courtesis, Constantinople, c. 1405; d. Constantinople, after 1472.

Scholarius early devoted himself to the study of philosophy, and he had Mark EUGENICUS as one of his teachers in theology. His preference for Aristotelianism led him to learn Latin and to admire St. Thomas Aquinas, several of whose works he translated into Greek. He opened a school of grammar and philosophy, became imperial secretary, judge general of the Greeks, and, though a layman, preacher-in-ordinary at the court. Sanguine about the projected council of union in Italy, he participated in the preliminary discussions in Constantinople and wrote a letter of congratulations to Pope EUGENE IV. He served the Emperor John VIII (1392–1448) as theological adviser at the Council of Florence but, to judge from the documents, was not very active. From the start he would have preferred to discuss the doctrine, not the legitimacy, of the FILIOQUE. In April 1439 he addressed a strong exhortation to the Greeks for agreement with the Latins, since the Fathers of both Churches agreed in doctrine, and thus to win military assistance for Constantinople. On May 30 he stated publicly that he considered the Council ecumenical, and the Latin “from” and the Greek “through” he considered equivalent in respect to the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father. At the same time he presented two treatises in support of that position. He left Florence on June 25, 1439 for Venice but returned to Constantinople with the other Greeks.

He resumed his former activities and for a time took no part in the controversy for or against the union. In June 1445, however, he acceded to the request of the dying Mark Eugenicus and replaced him as leader of antiunionism. To that end he directed all his undoubted talent, defending his position in 15 debates in Constantinople with the Latin legate Lapacci (1445) and later began the series of writings that made him the outstanding leader of the antiunionists. With the death of the Emperor John VIII (Oct. 31, 1448), Scholarius lost his protector and in 1450 became a monk, with the name Gennadius. However, he continued as leader and propagandist for the antiunionists, redoubling his efforts when ISIDORE OF KIEV arrived in Constantinople (Oct. 26, 1452) to promulgate the decree officially. In the fall of the city (May 29, 1453) Gennadius was taken prisoner, but was chosen as patriarch by Mohammed, who wished to use the Church to stabilize his new empire. The Sultan presented him with the insignia of the patriarchal office. Gennadius, unhappy in his position, was nevertheless reinstated, once after resigning and again after flight. He was finally allowed to abdicate and spent the last half-dozen years of his life in a monastery near Serres, reediting old writings and producing new ones, among them translations of St. Thomas's Summa Contra Gentiles and the Prima and the Prima Secundae of the Summa Theologiae. His literary and theological production was enormous and included countless pamphlets against the union, two long treatises on the procession of the Holy Spirit, a profession of faith (1446), several anti-Latin dialogues, an apology for his part in the Council of Florence, and others. He wrote a tract in favor of Palamism (see PALAMAS, GREGORY), a dialogue against the Jews (1464), and a collection of prophecies, and he engaged in controversy with Gemistos PLETHON in defense of Aristotle and early Christianity and against fatalism and polytheism. As the result of conversations with Sultan Mohammed II, he composed several tracts on the divinity of Christ and an address to Islam. He also published sermons; eulogies; pastoral letters on the Sacraments, liturgy, and penance; a treatise on simony; and prayers in verse and prose.

Bibliography: Oeuvres complètes, ed. L. PETIT et al., 8 v. (Paris 1928–36), with biog. 8: 15–47. M. JUGIE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 14.2:1522–70; “La Polémique de Georges Scholarios contra Pléthon,” Byzantion 10 (1935) 517–530. S. SALAVILLE, Échos d’Orient 23 (Paris 1924) 129–136. K. BAUS, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche 2 4:676–677. J. GILL, Personalities of the Council of Florence (New York 1964) 79–94. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinschen Reich, 760–763. F. BABINGER, Mehmed der Eroberer (Munich 1953).

[J. GILL]

GENNADIUS OF ASTORGA, ST.

Bishop of Astorga (Spain) from 899 and patron saint, fostered Benedictine monasticism in Bierzo; date and place of birth unknown; d. Bierzo, 936. As a priest in 895 he restored the monastery of San Pedro de Montes. In 920 he built an oratory for hermits and resigned his see to lead the eremitic life. He is buried at Santiago de Peñalba, one of three hermitages he founded, where his feast was celebrated as early as 1311. There is no vita; data derive from documents. In his testament he left to his monasteries copies of liturgical books and other important manuscripts. His Benedictines flourished next to immigrant Mozarab monks from the south.

Feast: May 25.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum May 6:93–99. H. FLÓREZ ET AL. España sagrada (Madrid 1747–1957) 16:129–147. A. LAMBERT, Dictionnaire d’histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912) 4:1218–19; 8:1443. F. C. NOCK, Vita sancti Fructuosi (Washington 1946). C. M. AHERNE, Valerio de Bierzo (Washington 1949).

[E. P. COLBERT]

GENNADIUS OF MARSEILLES

Fifth-century priest and theological writer of unknown origin; d. Marseilles, between 492 and 505. Gennadius is the author of a De viris illustribus, written between 467 and 480 as a continuation of a similar work by St. JEROME. It contains 101 notices of fourth- and fifth-century Christian writers, nine of which (92 to 100) were added by a later hand. While the biographical detail is limited, these notices are invaluable for their bibliographical information regarding such authors as EVAGRIUS PONTICUS, Gennadius of Constantinople (89), Isaac of Antioch (66), Eutropius of Spain (50), Fastidius of Britain (56), NICETAS OF REMESIANA (22), Commodian (15), PROSPER OF AQUITAINE (84), and MAXIMUS OF TURIN (40). Chapter 101 is devoted to his own writings, and lists works against NESTORIUS, PELAGIUS, and Eutyches, none of which have been preserved. His Liber ecclesiasticorum dogmatum gives an indication of Semipelagian leanings, but it appears to have been rewritten during the 6th century. It is probable that the final section of his unpublished eight books Adversus omnes haereses is contained in the Liber. The pseudo-Augustinian Commentary on the Apocalypse (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 217 v. 5:2417–52) ascribed to Gennadius is actually a work of CAESARIUS OF ARLES; and the Confessio likewise attributed to his authorship is of much later origin. The information he provided concerning the authors he cited, as well as the Pelagian and early Monophysite controversies, has been the subject of much recent study.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 58:979–1054, 1059–1120. JEROME, De viris illustribus, ed. E. C. RICHARDSON (Texte un Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 14.1; 1896); De viris illustribus, ed. G. HERDING (Bibliotheca scriptorum Graecorum et Romanorum Teubneriana 1924). A. FEDER, Scholastik 2 (1927) 481–514; 3 (1928) 238–243; 8 (1933) 380–399. C. H. TURNER, ed., Journal of Theological Studies 7 (1905–06) 78–99 8 (1907)

Bl. Edmund Gennings, antique engraving made the year of his martyrdom.

103–114, Liber ecclesiasticorum dogmatum. G. MORIN, Revue Bénédictine 24 (1907) 445–455. B. CZAPLA, Gennadius als Litterarhistoriker (Münster 1898). J. MADDOZ, Razon y Fe 122 (1941) 237–239. G. BARDY, A. GRILLMEIER and H. BACHT, Das Konzil von Chalcedon: Geschichte und Gegenwart, 3 v. (Würzburg 1951–54) 2:771–789, Christology. H. A. SANDERS, ed., Beati in Apocalypsin libri XII (Rome 1930). B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF from the 5th German ed. (New York 1960) 567–568. O. BARDENHEWER, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur, 5 v. (Freiburg 1913–1932) 4:595–599.

[A. NEUWIRTH]

GENNINGS, EDMUND, BL.

English martyr; b. Lichfield, 1567; d. Gray's Inn Fields, London, Dec. 10, 1591. When Edmund was 16, Mr. Sherwood, a much persecuted Catholic gentleman, came to Lichfield and inquired of the local schoolmaster if there were a youth in the town who would make a good page. The schoolmaster recommended Edmund, who had been brought up a Protestant, but under his new master's influence became a Catholic. In 1584 he fled from England to study for the priesthood at Reims. Overwork and austerity broke his already delicate health, but he recovered and was ordained in 1590 by special dispensation because he was only 23 years old.

On his way back to England as a missionary he was captured and imprisoned for three days by French Huguenots. Edmund adopted the alias Ironmonger, and eventually landed at Whitby and made his way to Lichfield only to find all his family dead except his brother John, who was in London. Determined to convert John, Edmund set out for London. After a month's search he met him on Ludgate Hill; John, however, was very hostile and frightened of being compromised. Edmund, seeing there was no hope of his brother's conversion for the moment, left for the country.

On Nov. 7, 1591, he returned to London, where he met Father Polydore Plasden, a fellow student at Reims. They decided to say Mass the next day in the Gray's Inn Lane at the house of the devout Catholic layman Swithin Wells. While Edmund was saying Mass, Topcliffe, the pursuivant, arrived and arrested the two priests and the congregation. They were accused of treason and all tried together. On December 10 Edmund and Swithin Wells were executed together at Gray's Inn Fields in front of Swithin's house. After Edmund's martyrdom John Gennings, who had wished his brother dead, had a sudden change of heart and could not rid his mind of his brother's image. He decided to become a Catholic; he joined the Franciscans and was appointed the first provincial of the restored English Franciscan province. Edmund was beatified on Dec. 15, 1929. (See ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.)

Feast: Dec. 10.

Bibliography: J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891). A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time 2:415–419. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 4:532–534.

[G. FITZHERBERT]

GENNINGS, JOHN

English Franciscan provincial; b. Lichfield, Staffordshire, 1570; d. Douai, Nov. 12, 1660. The martyrdom of Edmund GENNINGS, John's older brother, inspired John to remorse and the renunciation of Protestantism for Roman Catholicism. Leaving England, John entered Douai and was ordained (1607). When sent on the English mission, he zealously served English Catholics until shortly after 1610, when he decided to become a Franciscan. By 1614 he had been admitted and in conjunction with several English Franciscans was seeking to revive the defunct English Franciscan province. Aided by their Belgian and French confreres, the group began a provincial college at Douai, which was to serve as their motherhouse. They petitioned for the canonical erection of the English province, and Gennings was first appointed custos and then provincial (1629) when the petition was granted. After 1621 Gennings was also assisted by English Franciscan nuns of the convent of St. Elizabeth, Brussels. He was subsequently elected and re-elected provincial in 1634 and 1640; Gennings provided effective leadership and inspiration for the revived English province until his death.

Bibliography: THADDEUS, The Franciscans in England, 1600–1850 (London 1898). R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. GENNINGS, Life and Death of Ven. Edmund Gennings (London 1887). J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time, 5 v. (London and New York, 1885–1902) 2:419–423.

[P. S. MCGARRY]

GENTILE, GIOVANNI

Italian idealist philosopher, educator, and statesman; b. Castelvetro, Sicily, May 30, 1875; d. Florence, April 15, 1944. He was a student of the Hegelians D. Jaja and B. Spaventa and was a collaborator with B. CROCE on La Critica. As minister of public instruction (1922–24) he wrought an extensive transformation in the Italian educational system, inspired by the principles of his own philosophy—to which he gave the name actual idealism. Gentile consciously related his philosophical position to his interpretation of the history of Western philosophy; thus actual idealism can best be understood as Gentile's response to the basic quest of Western thought, the establishment of the immanent rationality of concrete existence. Actualism draws its profoundest inspiration from the insight of G. VICO: verum factum convertuntur; the immanent rationality of concrete existence can be grasped only through the principle of its becoming. Gentile develops this insight into the proposition that reality is a process of "autoctisi" involving position, distinction, and unification, by which all immediacy, dualisms, and transcendence are overcome. Relying on the critique of Spaventa, Gentile concluded that Hegel had misconceived the dialectic through his faulty notion of becoming. The clues to a rectification of this error are to be found in a purified form of the Kantian synthesis a priori and in Spaventa's conception of the dialectic of actual thought.

This correction of Hegel gives rise to Gentile's theory of the spirit as "pure act": reality that "is" insofar as "it is not yet," but "becomes," or "makes itself"; this reality is the "I," the individual that becomes by the process of universalizing itself. This "I" is the only concrete reality; it is not a subject that "is" as an object, a "fact," but an "act." Gentile develops the notion of "I" and of "pure act" in two directions: the existential and moral, which terminates in his theory of education, and the abstract, which is expounded in the Sistema di Logica (1917–23). The Logica distinguishes the "logic of what is thought" from the "logic of the act of thinking"; since "what is thought" has its whole being from the act of thinking, the logic of the latter is more basic and the ground of the former. The former is the realm of the concept and is governed by the principle of identity; the latter is pure becoming and is governed by the dialectic. These are united in the concrete existence of the "I." The self-generation of the "I" is not an abstract process; it is concrete, and as such is the fulfillment of a duty or project, which is identical with the self; the "I" is a moral reality, a value and a generator of values. The process by which the "I" realizes itself in its own universalization is education. As a consequence, pedagogy is the highest reach of philosophy and paideia the purest form of concrete existence under its rational aspect.

See Also: HEGELIANISM AND NEO-HEGELIANISM; IDEALISM.

Bibliography: Works. Opere complete, 60 v. (Florence 1957–) Literature. Istituto di Studi Filosofici, Bibliografia filosofica italiana dal 1900–1950, 4 v. (Rome 1950–56) 2:111–133. V. A. BELLEZZA, Bibliografia degli scritti di G. Gentile (Florence 1950); Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:631–643; L'esistenzialismo positivo di G. Gentile (Florence 1954). Giovanni Gentile: La vita e il pensiero, 8 v. (Florence 1948–57). E. CHIOCCETTI, La filosofia di G. Gentile (Milan 1922). U. SPIRITO, Note sul pensiero di G. Gentile (Florence 1954). M. M. THOMPSON, The Educational Philosophy of G. Gentile (Los Angeles 1934). H. S. HARRIS, The Social Philosophy of G. Gentile (Urbana 1960). R. W. HOLMES, The Idealism of G. Gentile (New York 1937).

[A. R. CAPONIGRI]

GENTILES

A term used in the Bible to designate those who are not Israelites. In the OT the words gōyīm and 'ammūm were the terms most commonly used for peoples or nations other than the chosen people. The Greek Septuagint rendered these words as ἔθνη, and the Latin, in its turn, as gentes. The NT employed the same terminology, using ἔθνη (gentes) to indicate non-Jews. In a more general sense, the term indicated all those who had not been converted to the true faith (Mt 10.18; Acts 21.21; 26.17).

The attitude of the Israelites of the OT was determined by religious rather than racial considerations. Social and political contacts with Gentiles always involved the danger of religious contamination, and since the Israelites were the sole champions of pure moral monotheism, this was a consideration of prime importance. It explains some of the harsh strictures against Gentiles in the OT (Dt 7.1–5; 20.16; Ex 23.27; 34.15–16). The entrance of a Gentile into the Temple was tantamount to desecration (Acts 21.28). Food grown or prepared by Gentiles was unfit for Israelite consumption (Ez 4.13; Hos 9.3; Dn 1.8; Tb 1.10–12; Jdt 10.5; 12.2). A fortiori, marriages between Israelites and Gentiles were strictly forbidden (Ex 34.16; Dt 7.3; Ezr 9.1–10.44). In the prophetic and postexilic periods a more universalist attitude developed. The Book of JONAH is an expression of this attitude. The blessings conferred on the Israelites could be extended to Gentiles also, but only through entrance into the chosen people and its worship (Is 4.2–4; 19.18–25; 56.3–8; 66.18–21).

The apostolic Church was at first, as might be expected, exclusively Jewish. It took much time and trouble—and, indeed, a divine intervention—to clarify the question of the admission of Gentiles into the Church and the manner of their admission. The principle was clear enough: Jesus had indicated that salvation was to be extended to all. The first recorded conversion of a Gentile was that of Cornelius, a proselyte, by Peter (Acts 10.1–48). This act, however, was viewed with alarm by the Jerusalem community, and Peter felt it necessary to justify his action (11.1–18). At Antioch Christianity was preached for the first time to Gentiles who were not proselytes. Some Judaeo-Christians thought converted Gentiles should be required to observe the Mosaic Law, but the Council of JERUSALEM rejected this suggestion. The Judaizers, however, were not so easily discouraged, and the problem forms the background of St. Paul the Apostle's Epistle to the ROMANS and his Epistle to the GALATIANS. Chiefly through his efforts the Church became the wholly universal kingdom envisioned by its Founder.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 857–861. A. VOGEL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:67–68. H. CONZELMANN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:128–141. G. BERTRAM and K. L. SCHMIDT, in G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 2:362–379. H. LESÈTRE, Dictionnaire de la Bible, ed. F. VIGOUROUX, 5 v. (Paris 1895–1912) 3.1:189–192. T. W. MANSON, Jesus and the Non-Jews (London 1955). J. JEREMIAS, Jesus' Promise to the Nations, tr. S. H. HOOKE (Naperville, Ill. 1958). G. DIX, Jew and Greek (Westminster 1955).

[J. J. CASTELOT]

GENTIS POLONAE GLORIA

An office hymn formerly sung at Vespers on the feast of JOHN CANTIUS; its division, Corpus domas ieiunialis, is used for Matins. The Te deprecante, corporum used at Lauds is possibly still another division of the hymn. Each division has 5 four-line Ambrosian stanzas. The author is unknown but the text is found as early as 1772, the saint's canonization having taken place in 1767. The hymn—especially in stanzas 1 and 3 of the Corpus section—enumerates John's virtues, i.e., his teaching, his devotion to the divine law, his ascetic practices, and his Christian charity. Three main episodes of the saint's life are recounted: his teaching at the university, his four visits to the tomb of the Apostles in Rome, and his pilgrimage to the Holy Land (cf. the lessons for the feast). The author probably modeled his work on the hymns of St. Dominic, especially Gentis Hispanae decus (1525), and of St. Teresa of Avila (1616). It should be compared also with the Gentis Hispanae pater in honor of Isidore of Seville (1659).

Bibliography: J. CONNELLY, Hymns of the Roman Liturgy (Westminster MD 1957) 240–241. H. LAUSBERG, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:682.

[J. SVÖVÉRFY]

GENUS

(Gr. γένος) refers first to the principle of generation (Gr. γένεσις), the genus or stock, then to the multitude of things springing from one principle. In logic genus refers first to the universal that is predicable of many things differing in species; like SPECIES, it answers the question "What is it?" Whereas species predicates the whole ESSENCE, genus predicates the common and determinable part of the essence of its subject. The genus that is contained under no higher genus is called supreme genus or category. Those contained under higher genera are called subaltern genera.

In Aristotelian DIALECTICS genus is one of the four predicates, constituting one kind of dialectical problem (Topica 101b 37–102b 27; 128b 14–139a 20). Genus refers also to the genus subjectum of a science, the limited subject-matter considered by a given science (Anal. post. 76b 11–16).

In things composed of matter and form, MATTER is remotely the principle of genus inasmuch as it is the principle of all POTENCY. It is also the principle of diverse genera within a category, insofar as in the category of substance matter receives the perfection of ACT to different degrees. As actuated to one degree, say "sensitive life," it will be the basis of a genus and be in potency either to the further perfection, "rational," or to the imperfection, "non-rational" (St. Thomas Aquinas, In Boeth. Trin., 4.2).

The genus of the logician is, moreover, to be distinguished from the genus of the natural philosopher. The former looks merely for a common ratio, the latter requires in addition a common matter (physical genus).

See Also: PREDICABLES; PORPHYRIAN TREE; DEFINITION; MATTER AND FORM.

[W. BAUMGAERTNER]

GEOFFREY HARDEBY

Augustinian theologian; b. England; d. May 21, 1385. He entered the AUGUSTINIANS at Leicester and studied at Oxford. Appointed master regent at the Oxford monastery in 1357, he engaged in the controversy caused by Abp. RICHARD FITZRALPH's De pauperie salvatoris. Both in his lectures and in his posthumously published De vita evangelica (1385), Hardeby not only ably and courteously answered Fitzralph's arguments on the nature of poverty, property, and jurisdiction, but also defended the Augustinian Friars against the charges of the Augustinian CANONS REGULAR. Bale credited him also with the authorship of Quodlibeta Oxoniensia, Ordinariae questiones, Determinationes, Postillae Scripturarum, Lectiones Veteris et Novi Testamenti, Sermones de tempore and de sanctis, and a historical record of the Augustinians. Hardeby was also active in the affairs of his order. He served as a delegate for the English province to the general chapter at Padua in 1359. Having been granted a papal dispensation for illegitimacy, he was elected prior provincial of England in 1360, and it would seem that he served in this office for six years. After being out of office for three years, he was reelected in 1369. Hardeby was favored by King EDWARD III with pensions and acted as confessor to Richard, Prince of Wales, 1376–77. On his death he was buried at the Austinfriars in London.

Bibliography: R. L. POOLE, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900; repr. with corrections, 21 v., 1908–09, 1921–22, 1938; suppl. 1901–) 8:1213–14. A. GWYNN, The English Austin Friars in the Time of Wyclif (London 1940). A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the Scholars of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 2:869, xviii.

[E. J. SMYTH]

GEOFFREY OF CLAIRVAUX

Or Geoffrey of Auxerre, Cistercian abbot, author; b. Auxerre, France, c. 1120; d. Hautecombe Abbey, after 1188. A student of ABELARD in Paris, he became a CISTERCIAN monk at CLAIRVAUX in 1140 after hearing BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX preach his famous De conversione ad clericos. As St. Bernard's secretary, Geoffrey accompanied him on many journeys (1145–48) and was present at the Council of Reims presided over by Pope EUGENE III (1148), which centered on the GREGORIAN REFORM. Certain scholars hold that he succeeded Bl. GUERRIC as abbot of Igny in 1155; it is certain, however, that he was elected abbot of Clairvaux (1161 or 1162) but had to resign this office in 1163 because of the hostility of certain monks. He retired to CÎTEAUX, was sent on various missions, and later became abbot of Fossanova, near Rome (1170), and then of HAUTECOMBE (1176). Geoffrey's main work was his collection of Bernard's letters and the completion of Bernard's biography begun earlier by WILLIAM OF SAINT-THIERRY and ARNOLD OF BONNEVAL (Patrologia latina 185:301–368, 523–530). Geoffrey tells of Bernard's work in Languedoc among the ALBIGENSES (Patrologia latina 185:410–416) and of his preaching the Second Crusade in Germany in 1146 (Patrologia latina 185:395–410). From Bernard's sermons he extracted the Declamationes de colloquio Simonis cum Iesu (Patrologia latina 184: 435–476). One of Geoffrey's sermons on an anniversary of the death of Bernard is extant (Patrologia latina 185:573–588).

Geoffrey also wrote a refutation of GILBERT DE LA PORRÉE, the Libellus contra capitula Gilberti Pictaviensis (Patrologia latina 185:595–618), and two letters to Cardinal Henry of Albano, one in 1188 about Gilbert's condemnation at the Council of Reims (Patrologia latina 185:587–595), and the other Super transsubstantiatione aquae mixtae vino in sanguinem Christi (Baronius, Annales, year 1188, n.28). Also extant are a commentary on the Our Father (Patrologia latina 184:617–620), the Tractatus de contemptu mundi (formerly attributed to Bernard), sermons for the feast of John the Baptist and Martin of Tours (F. Combefis, Bibliotheca concionatoria 7:1470; 8:480; Tissier, Bibliotheca patrum Cisterciensium 4:261), and a vita of PETER OF TARENTEISE (Acta Sanctorum May 2:322–345). The library of Troyes, France, has several of his unpublished MSS: a Liber contra Abaelardum, 17 sermons, a Commentaria in Canticum Canticorum, and sermons on the Apocalypse (Catalogue général des MSS des bibliothèques des départements v.2).

Bibliography: Patrologia latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 185.1:221–224. Histoire Littéraire de la France, 14:430–451. B. HEURTEBIZE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 6.1:1227–28. DTC Tables Générales 16:1795–96. F. STEGMÜLLER, Repertorium commentariorum in Sententias Petri Lombardi, 1:111. F. STEGMÜLLER, Repertorium biblicum medii aevi, 2:332–334. J. LECLERCQ, "Les Écrits de G. d'Auxerre," Revue Benedictine, 62 (1952) 274–291; "Le Témoignage de G. d'A. sur la vie cistercienne," Analecta monastica ser. 2 (Studia anselmiana 31; Rome 1953) 174–201. M. S. LENSSEN, "L'Abdication du Bx. G. d'A. . . . Clairvaux," Collectanea Ordinis Cisterciensium Reformatorem, 17 (1955) 98–110. M. A. DIMIER, Catholicisme 4:1849.

[J. DAoust]

GEOFFREY OF DUNSTABLE

Abbot; b. Maine, France; d. St. Albans, 1146. Geoffrey studied at the University of Paris and then directed a school at Dunstable, England. For a stage production of the miracle play Ludus de S. Catherina, in 1119, he borrowed several copes from ST. ALBANS, and to compensate for their loss in a fire Geoffrey joined the community, where he became prior and then abbot. His extensive building program included a guest hall, an infirmary, a lepers' hospital, and a shrine to which he translated the remains of St. ALBAN in 1129. Geoffrey's efforts saved his abbey from demolition during the Civil Wars of King STEPHEN.

Bibliography: T. WALSINGHAM, comp., Gesta abbatum monasterii Sancti Albani, 3 v., ed. H. T. RILEY, Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores (Rolls series; London 1867) 1:72–105. W. HUNT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 7:1011–12. Ghellingck Essor 2:269.

[M. L. MISTRETTA]

GEOFFREY OF MONMOUTH

Historian, bishop; b. Monmouth, England, c. 1100; d. 1155. Little is known of his career except that he seems to have been "magister" at Oxford and was consecrated Bishop of SAINT ASAPH, Wales, Feb. 21, 1152. Because of the Welsh rebellion in 1150, he probably never visited his see. He is chiefly remembered for his literary activity as a writer of pseudo-history. His first completed work, Prophetiae Merlini, an obscure series of prophecies in a highly apocalyptic style, may well contain native Welsh vaticinal material. It is included as Book 7 of his major work, Historia regum Britanniae, completed probably between 1136 and 1139. Geoffrey said he translated the Historia from a British book given him by Walter, Archdeacon of Oxford, but there is no other evidence for the book's existence. Starting from the barest hints in the ninth-century Historia Brittonum attributed to Nennius, Geoffrey combined materials from the Old Testament, Latin writers, Continental and insular historians, and an undetermined amount of Welsh tradition (though this is vigorously denied by some scholars) with other materials and contemporary events, to trace in full and convincing detail the history of Britain from the fall of Troy to the invasions of Julius Caesar and on to the final conquest of the island by the Anglo-Saxons. His greatest achievement, the reign of King Arthur, occupies about a fifth of the whole. There is no reason to believe that the work has any value as history. Though it had little direct influence on the ARTHURIAN legends, it was widely read, and scarcely an English chronicler for the next 500 years failed to make use of it. It is found in over 200 MSS and in at least three distinct versions, only two of which have yet been published. The Vita Merlini, c. 1150, is in verse and more certainly contains Celtic material.

Bibliography: E. FARAL, La Légende Arthurienne (Paris 1929). GEOFFREY OF MONMOUTH, The Historia Regum Britanniae. . . , ed. A. GRISCOM (New York 1929); Historia Regum Britanniae: A Variant Version, ed. J. HAMMER (Cambridge, Mass. 1951); History of the Kings of Britain, tr. S. EVANS, rev. C. W. DUNN (New York 1958). A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 2:1294–95. J. S. P. TATLOCK, The Legendary History of Britain: Geoffrey of Monmouth's Historia Regum Britanniae and Its Early Vernacular Versions (Berkeley 1950). J. J. PARRY and R. A. CALDWELL, "Geoffrey of Monmouth," Arthurian Literature in the Middle Ages, ed. R. S. LOOMIS (Oxford 1959).

[R. A. CALDWELL]

GEOFFREY OF VENDÔME

Benedictine abbot, cardinal, staunch defender of the GREGORIAN REFORM; b. Angers, France, c. 1070; d. Angers, March 26, 1132. Geoffrey (Goffridus) was born of a noble family, entered the monastery of Sainte-Trinité at VENDÔME, and in 1093, while only a deacon, was elected abbot and consecrated by Bp. IVO OF CHARTRES. Hearing of the plight of Pope URBAN II in his struggle against the antipope GUIBERT OF RAVENNA, Geoffrey traveled to Rome and became a strong ally of the Pope. In 1094, with Urban finally in the Lateran palace, Geoffrey was consecrated cardinal priest of St. Prisca on the Aventine. An intimate of Urban and the succeeding popes, PASCHAL II and CALLISTUS II, Geoffrey was soon caught up in the INVESTITURE STRUGGLE. In a series of eight polemics (libelli), he followed the lead of Cardinal HUMBERT OF SILVA CANDIDA and advocated that SIMONY and lay INVESTITURE be branded as heretical. Geoffrey frequently served as papal legate and was present at the Councils of Clermont (1095), Saintes (1096), and REIMS (1131). He stayed true to his monastery and maintained the privileges of Vendôme in a period of great unrest. His letters (more than 185) remain a precious source of information for 12th-century Church politics. Other writings include several short tracts (e.g., on Baptism, on the Eucharist), 11 sermons, a few hymns, and a commentary on the Psalms (unpublished).

Bibliography: Editions. Patrologia latina, ed. J. P. MIGNÉ, 33–290. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Libelli de lite, 2:680–700, libelli. MS Paris, BN lat. 12959, for the commentary on the Psalms. Biography. L. COMPAIN, Étude sur Geoffroi Vendôme (Paris 1891). E. SACKUR, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Libelli de lite, 2:676–680; "Zur Chronologie der Streitschriften des Gotfried von Vendôme," Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichte Kunde, 17:329–347; "Die Briefe Gotfrieds von Vendôme," ibid. 18:666–673. J. J. HERZOG and A. HAUCK, eds., Realencyclopädie für protestantische Theologie 7:37–38. H. MEI-

NERT, "Die Fälschungen Gottfrieds von Vendôme," Archiv für Urkundenforschung 10 (1928) 232–325. A. WILMART, "La Collection chronologique des écrits de Geoffroi abbé de Vendôme," Revue Benedictine 43 (1931) 239–245. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (DTC), Tables générales 1:1795–96.

[R. B. PALMER]

GEOFFREY OF YORK

Chancellor of England, archbishop of York; b. England, 1152 or 1153; d. Grandmont, near Rouen, France, Dec. 18, 1212. An illegitimate son of King HENRY II, he was acknowledged by the king and reared with Eleanor of Aquitaine's children. Geoffrey's mother is unknown. His life was the stereotypical life of a royal bastard. Forced early into an ecclesiastical vocation, he received the diaconate and lucrative preferments. In April 1173 he was elected bishop of Lincoln. Supported by papal dispensations, he delayed ordination and consecration while he aided Henry against his unfaithful sons and insurgent barons. In 1182, still unconsecrated, Geoffrey resigned his bishopric, and in 1183 he became chancellor of England. In Henry's last struggle with King PHILIP II AUGUSTUS OF FRANCE, (1187–89), Geoffrey proved himself the only faithful son. As a reward he was named archbishop of YORK. His half-brother, King RICHARD I, honored the nomination, and Geoffrey was ordained (Sept. 23, 1189) and consecrated at Tours (Aug. 18, 1191). Geoffrey's undesired return to England (September 1191) and his subsequent arrest made him a potential Becket and precipitated the downfall of William de Longchamp. But Geoffrey, even though a man of abstinence and purity, was too temperamental and tactless to be a leader. His episcopacy was marked by continuous royal and ecclesiastical arguments and litigations. In 1207 he withstood King JOHN of England's demands for clerical taxes and was forced to flee England. He died in exile.

Bibliography: GIRALDUS CAMBRENSIS, "De vita Galfridi archiepiscopi Eboracensis," Opera, ed. J. S. BREWER, 8 v. (Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores [Rolls series] 21; London 1861–91) 4:355–431. W. STUBBS, Historical Introductions to the Rolls Series, ed. A. HASSALL (London 1902) 173–309. K. NORGATE, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 7:1018–1024. A. L. POOLE, From Domesday Book to Magna Carta (2d ed. Oxford History of England 3; 1955). C. R. CHENEY, From Becket to Langton (Manchester, Eng. 1956).

[E. J. SMYTH]

GEORGE, ST.

Martyr. In the Canon of Pope Gelasius (d. 496) St. George is mentioned in a list of those "whose names are justly revered among men, but whose acts are known only to God." The only historical element in the intricate tradition that has grown around his name is his martyrdom. The dubious elements include his rapid advance to high military rank, his organization of the Christian community at Urmiah (modern Iran), and his visit to Britain on an imperial expedition. The connection of St. George with the dragon, familiar since the Golden Legend of JAMES OF VORAGINE, can be traced to the close of the sixth century. At Jaffa, near Lydda, Perseus had slain the sea monster that threatened the virgin Andromeda, and George acquired the inheritance of veneration previously enjoyed by the pagan hero.

"St. George and the Dragon," woodcut by Albrecht Dürer, 15th century. (© Corbis-Bettmann)

According to a sixth-century local tradition George came originally from Lydda in Palestine, and his remains were brought back from Nicomedia to his native city, but Eusebius of Caesarea (c. 322), relating the martyrdom of a noble soldier who confessed Christ at Nicomedia before Diocletian in April 303, neither names the saint, nor mentions his country or place of burial. The deacon Theodosius (c. 530) is the first pilgrim to mention the tomb of St. George in Lydda. The fifth-century passio is pure fantasy.

St. George was popular in the East, and the crusaders revived his cult in Europe. The Synod of Oxford in 1222 ordered that his feast be kept as a national festival, but it was only in Edward III's time that he was made patron of the kingdom. He is also patron of Portugal, Aragon, Catalonia, Georgia, Lithuania, and several cities; in Italy 118 communes carry his name. In the Middle East, it is difficult to identify St. George, for at times he has replaced Adonis; more often he is linked with the Prophet Elias, under the name El Khader (the living). Until modern times, he played a most important role in popular feasts and folklore, the date of his festival being connected with the arrival of spring.

Feast: April 23.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum April 3:101–165. H. DELEHAYE, Les Légendes grecques des saints militaires (Paris 1909) 145–176. E. HOADE, Guide to the Holy Land (Jerusalem 1962).

[E. HOADE]

GEORGE HAMARTOLUS

Also George the Monk, Byzantine historian; fl. mid-ninth century. Nothing is known of his life. His Chronicle, which treats the period from the creation to 842, is edificatory in purpose; his interest is mainly ecclesiastical—he is bitterly opposed to ICONOCLASM—and his conception of historical causation is naïvely theological. His value lies in the many and varied sources from which he uncritically copied or excerpted, some of which are now lost. His Chronicle has independent value only for the first half of the ninth century. Simple in concept and popular in language and style, it was highly esteemed in the Middle Ages and often excerpted by later chroniclers. It was translated into Old Slavonic and Georgian, and a continuation to 948 was added, probably by a supporter of the deposed Emperor Romanus Lecapenus.

Bibliography: Georgii monachi chronicon, ed. C. DE BOOR, 2 v. (Leipzig 1904). Latin tr. of chronicle in Patrologia Graeca, 110:41–1260, no tr. into any mod. lang. G. MORAVCSIK, Byzantinoturcica, 2 v. (2d ed. Berlin 1958) 1:277–280, full bibliog.

[R. BROWNING]

GEORGE (THE BEARDED) OF SAXONY

Referred to also as “the Rich,” duke of Saxony, opponent of LUTHERANISM; b. Dresden, Aug. 27, 1471; d. there, April 17, 1539. The son of Albert the Brave, founder of that line of the Wettin house that bore his name, and Sidonia, daughter of Bohemian King George of Podiebrad. George was the cousin of Frederick the Wise, Elector of Saxony, who became Martin Luther's protector and strongest supporter. His excellent education was heavily weighted toward theology because he was a younger son and destined for service in the Church rather than for political life. But the death of his older brother made George the heir apparent. When he was 17, his father, while fighting in Friesland, left him behind as regent of the duchy (1488). On Nov. 21, 1496, he was married to Barbara, the daughter of the Polish king, Casimir IV. The marriage was prolific; but only one daughter survived George. Upon the death of his father (Sept. 12, 1500) George inherited the Duchy of Saxony, the Margravate of Meissen, and the cities of Leipzig and Dresden. His brother Henry was given the hereditary governorship of Friesland, which their father had received from the Emperor Maximilian. But Henry was unable to control rebellious Friesland and in 1505 traded this claim to his brother George for a pension and the districts of Freiberg and Wolkenstein. George soon found that he could control the high-spirited population no better than his brother could and sold Friesland to the Count of Burgundy for a meager 100,000 florins.

When Luther posted his attack on indulgences in 1517, George did not immediately oppose him. He was very much aware of the need for reform and spoke out against abuses in the monasteries and those surrounding the granting of indulgences. In his pursuit of truth he sponsored the Leipzig debates (1519) between John Eck, a leading German theologian, and Luther. As Luther became a defined heretic and split with Rome, George turned against the reformers. As one of the Church's strongest supporters in Germany, he did all that he could to prevent the spread of Lutheranism into his territories. Even so he did not lose sight of the fact that there was a need for reform within the Church. When the German princes of the Empire presented the Emperor with a list of grievances at the Imperial Diet of Worms in 1521, George included 12 additional complaints of his own against indulgences and annates. His opposition to Luther steadily increased as the Protestant movement grew. To counter Luther's translation of the Bible, he ordered his secretary, Hieronymus EMSER, to prepare a new translation. To this work George added a staunchly orthodox preface. He also added a ban not merely on the works of Luther but on those of known Lutheran sympathizers. He banished those holding anti-Catholic views from the Duchy of Saxony and even delivered unfaithful ecclesiastics to the bishop of Merseburg. Apostates were denied the right of Church burial.

George was a strong advocate of a universal council that would define beyond doubt Christian doctrine and introduce long overdue reforms. Until such a council could be convoked, he sought to introduce reforms in his own lands. To this end he made formal appeals to Rome for the right to make formal visits and investigations of the monasteries in the duchy. But since the Curia was not yet ready for the reforms, the Duke did not receive the authority he sought. Thus the reforms he was able to introduce, such as the consolidation of half-empty monasteries and the supervision of monastic lands turned over to the secular authority, had little effect in staving off the tide of Protestantism sweeping across northern Germany. Though he united with Protestant princes—the most notable being his cousin Frederick the Wise and his less exalted brother-in-law, the Landgrave Philip of Hesse—to put down the Peasants' Revolt (1525), he was one of the main organizers and supporters of the League of Dessau (1525), a group of German princes who defended the interest of the Church against the encroachments of the reformers and their secular allies. In 1533 it was superseded by the League of Halle with George again playing a prominent part in the organization. The League of Halle in its turn gave birth to the Holy League of Nuremberg (1538). This league was dedicated to the preservation of the religious peace of Nuremberg, which temporarily prevented open war between growing hostile parties.

One of George's greatest disappointments was that he died without sufficient assurance that the Duchy of Saxony and his other holdings would remain Catholic. His last son, Frederick, died without an heir, though he had been married to Elizabeth of Mansfeld shortly before his death, and the ducal holdings passed to George's Lutheran brother Henry. A belated attempt was made by the Duke in 1539 to secure from his brother a promise to give up his Lutheran beliefs as a condition to the inheritance, but this was unsuccessful.

Bibliography: J. JANSSEN, History of the German People at the Close of the Middle Ages, tr. M. A. MITCHELL and A. M. CHRISTIE, 17 v. (London 1896–1925). W. GOERLITZ, Staat und Stände unter den Herzögen Albrecht und Georg, 1485–1539 (Leipzig 1928). O. VOSSLER, "Herzog Georg der Bärtige und seine Ablehnung Luthers," Historische Zeitschrift 184 (1957) 272–291. J. LORTZ, Die Reformation in Deutschland, 2 v. (Freiburg 1949). H. HOLBORN, A History of Modern Germany: The Reformation (New York 1959). F. SCHWARZBACH, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche 2 4:695, bibliog. F. LAU, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 3 2:1395–96.

[J. G. GALLAHER]

GEORGE SYNCCELLUS

Byzantine chronicler; d. after 810. What is known about him is derived entirely from his chronicle and its introduction by THEOPHANES THE CONFESSOR. George was honored with the high ecclesiastical title of syncellus. Earlier in his career he had lived in the Holy Land; then during the patriarchate of TARASIVS (784–806) he acted as the patriarch's private secretary. He later retired to a monastery where he composed his chronicle. He was still alive in 810. His world chronicle relates to the period from the creation of the world to the reign of Diocletian (284). Its coverage is quite uneven: the birth of Christ and the happenings of the era of the New Testament are treated rather extensively, but the age that follows this is given only in barest outline. Its importance lies in the fact that next to the chronicle of EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA, it is the most important work for the understanding of Christian chronography, particularly the work of the two Alexandrians, Panodoros and Annianos. Indeed what is known of these chronographers, who established the Alexandrian era but whose works have not survived, is derived almost entirely from George Syncellus.

Bibliography: K. KRUMBACHER, Geschichte der Byzantinischen Literatur (Munich 1890 and 1897), 339–342. V. GRUMEL, La Chronologie (Paris 1958), 86–95. M. E. COLONNA, Gli storici bizantini dal sec. IV al sec. XV (Naples 1956—).

[P. CHARANIS]

GEORGETOWN UNIVERSITY

Situated in Washington, D.C., Georgetown University, founded in 1789, is the oldest Catholic institution of higher education in the United States. Its story is one of a traditional European collegium transplanted into a new republic on American soil, shaping and being powerfully shaped by its new environment.

Founding. On March 30, 1787, John CARROLL (1735–1815), who was shortly to become the first Catholic bishop of the United States, issued a broadside entitled "Proposals for establishing an Academy at Georgetown, Patowmack-River, Maryland." Carroll had entered the Society of Jesus in 1753 and was ordained a priest in 1761. When Pope Clement XIV suppressed the order in 1773, Carroll emerged as the leader of the former Jesuits in the Maryland area who banded together to continue their apostolic work.

Carroll's "modest academy" at the beginning followed the traditional plan of studies in Jesuit schools, the Ratio Studiorum, a five- or six-year program intended for boys from the ages of ten to sixteen. It was designed to take students who had learned the "first Elements of Letters" and provide them with a classical humanities education, fitting them for entrance into a university.

The staff was largely composed of former Jesuits, though four Sulpicians, exiles of the French Revolution, were crucial to the survival of the school in the early years. Carroll appointed one of them, William Louis DUBOURG, to serve as president from 1796 to 1798. In 1805, after a partial restoration of the Society of Jesus, Jesuits assumed the direction of the school. Through the good offices of its first student, William GASTON, who became a representative from North Carolina, the school was chartered by an act of Congress in 1815.

Carroll had no intention of restricting admission to Catholics. In keeping with the religious liberty guaranteed to all Christians in 1776 in the Maryland Constitution, he wished his school to be “open to students of every religious profession.”

Though Carroll’s 1787 “Proposals” failed in their purpose of raising funds for the academy, 69 students were enrolled for 1791 and 1792, the first year of its operation. Enrollments gradually increased over the years so that through its first hundred years they averaged about 145 students, most of whom were in the preparatory division. The college division conferred its first bachelor’s degree in 1817 and awarded an average of seven A.B. degrees each year throughout the nineteenth century.

In 1806, Georgetown College acquired a theology faculty, which was set up to teach Jesuit seminarians. The theology faculty remained at Georgetown until 1869 when the seminary was relocated to Woodstock, Maryland.

In 1849, four Washington physicians wrote a letter to James Ryder, the president of Georgetown College, indicating their intention to establish a medical school and requesting that its degrees be conferred in virtue of Georgetown’s charter. Since the physicians agreed to pay all the expenses of the venture, Ryder graciously acceded to their request.

By mid-century, the training of lawyers was beginning to shift from private apprenticeships in law offices to programs in an academic setting. In 1865, Columbian College, now George Washington University, established the first law school in Washington, prudently scheduling all its classes in the late afternoon and early evening to make it possible for federal workers to attend. Five years later, Georgetown inaugurated its own law school in the same “sunset” style.

Second Founding. When Patrick F. Healy became prefect of studies in 1868, he increased substantially the role of sciences and mathematics in the curriculum, while raising standards in the study of Latin and Greek. As president (1873–82), this son of a white planter in Georgia, Michael Healy, and his wife, Mary Eliza, a former slave, boldly moved to the task of turning Georgetown into a university on the model that emerged in the United States in the post-bellum period. In 1877, he undertook the construction of a massive building that would proclaim his ambition to make Georgetown a center of higher education in the nation’s capital. Healy, however, experienced great difficulty in finding donors for the project and, though much of the building was in use in 1881, areas like the library and the assembly hall were not completed until the end of the century. Subsequently named Healy Hall, it remains a monument to the man referred to as the “second founder” of the school and provides the architectural signature of the main campus.

New ventures followed with a certain regularity. The Graduate School of Arts and Sciences was formally inaugurated in 1893. The Dental School was added in 1901 and the School of Nursing was established in 1903. After World War One, Edmund A. Walsh began the School of Foreign Service to prepare people not only for diplomatic service but also for international business careers. This initiative led to the development of the School of Languages and Linguistics (1949) and the School of Business Administration (1950).

Tradition in Transition. The Second Vatican Council (1962–65), together with the social and political upheavals in the 1960s, set in motion a dramatic series of changes at Georgetown as the university sought to discern “the signs of the times.”

The impact of the council was felt immediately in the Theology Department, which until 1966 was staffed almost entirely by Jesuits with seminary training in Catholic theology. The department responded to the call for ecumenical openness and dialogue by hiring men and women with university training in the world’s major religious traditions. This resulted in a major revision of the department’s course offerings, enabling all students to choose from a wide variety of elective courses.

At the same time, the office of campus ministry carried one step further John Carroll’s desire that the school be open to students “of every religious profession” by bringing to campus clergy and pastoral counselors to meet the needs of a religiously diverse student body.

The School of Foreign Service made a notable contribution to interreligious dialogue by founding in 1993 with the blessing of Pope John Paul II the Center for Muslim-Christian Understanding, which is at present the only academic institution in the United States dedicated to exploring the cultural, historical, political, and theological interactions of Christianity and Islam.

The college, which had from its founding been all-male, welcomed the first women students in 1969, and in a short while became fully co-educational. A policy of open recruitment brought increasing numbers of women into the faculty and into positions in the administration previously held only by men (provost, executive vice president and dean of the Law Center, dean of the College, treasurer, general counsel).

Prominent during this period of growth was the figure of Timothy S. Healy, president from 1976 to 1989, who embarked on an ambitious plan of construction, greatly increased minority enrollments, and provided much of the incentive for Georgetown to strive for excellence in its graduate programs, giving rise to the saying that the “second Healy was Georgetown’s third founder.” It was during his tenure that Georgetown became the only Catholic member of the Consortium on the Financing of Higher Education, a group of 31 major private American universities, including Harvard, Yale, Stanford, and Chicago.

The relatively rapid rise of the university’s profile in the last third of the twentieth century was sustained by alumni support that would have gladdened the hearts of John Carroll and Patrick Healy, through great growth in annual giving and in a series of successful fund-raising campaigns. Of great significance was the change in the composition of the board of directors. What had been a board composed entirely of Georgetown Jesuits, serving under a president who was also their religious superior, who in turn reported to the provincial superior in Baltimore and the general superior in Rome, became in 1969 an autonomous external board composed of 40 to 50 men and women, including 10 or 12 Jesuits not from Georgetown, who accepted responsibility for carrying out the unfolding purposes of the university.

When in 2000 the university needed to recruit a new president, it conducted an open search, inviting applications from all qualified candidates, specifying that each “should understand and be committed to the Catholic and Jesuit tradition of higher education.” In February of 2001, the board appointed John J. DeGioia to be the first lay president of Georgetown.

Mission Statement. In September of 2000 the board of directors approved a new mission statement in which Georgetown is described as “a Catholic and Jesuit, student-centered research university . . . founded on the principle that serious and sustained discourse among people of different faiths, cultures, and beliefs promotes intellectual, ethical, and spiritual understanding.” The university is committed to justice and the common good as well as to providing education in the Jesuit tradition, “for the glory of God and the well-being of humankind.” The changes that have taken place in John Carroll’s “modest academy” could not have been foreseen, but he might recognize in this mission statement the same end he proposed for his school in a letter he wrote in 1787: “to diffuse knowledge, promote virtue & serve Religion.”

Bibliography: J. M. DALEY, Georgetown University: Origin and Early Years (Washington 1957). J. T. DURKIN, Georgetown

University: The Middle Years, 1840–1900 (Washington 1963). J. D. G. SHEA, Memorial of the First Centenary of Georgetown College, D.C., Comprising a History of Georgetown University (New York 1891). W. C. MCFADDEN, ed., Georgetown at Two Hundred (Washington 1990). R. E. CURRAN, The Bicentennial History of Georgetown University: From Academy to University, 1789–1889, v. 1 (Washington 1993), v. 2 (forthcoming).

[W. C. MCFADDEN]

GEORGETOWN VISITATION

Founded in 1799, the monastery and schools of the Visitation Nuns at Georgetown, D.C., in 1895 became officially known as the Georgetown Visitation Convent.

Growth of the Academy. The founders of this community numbered only three: Miss Alice Lalor (see LALOR, TERESA, MOTHER), and two widows, Mrs. McDermott and Mrs. M. Sharpe, all of them immigrants from Ireland who had come under the direction of Leonard NEALE, SJ, in Philadelphia. When, near the close of 1798, Bp. John CARROLL appointed Neale to the presidency of Georgetown College, the latter was deeply stirred by the total want of Catholic schools for “female youth.” (See GEORGETOWN UNIVERSITY.) He, therefore, invited his three spiritual daughters to Georgetown for the purpose of forming a religious society and of educating the young girls of Maryland. On their arrival he lodged them with a small community of Poor Clare Nuns, exiles from the French Terror. Finding the austerities and the spirit of the Poor Clares incompatible with his ideals of religious life for these women and unsuited to the task of teaching young Americans, he soon rented another dwelling nearby, where on June 24, 1799, he opened the first Catholic academy for girls in the original 13 states. The three women and their later companions, known as “The Pious Ladies,” were directed by Neale according to a modified Jesuit rule. He persisted, however, in his determination that they should be Visitandines and thus fulfill a prophetic dream he had experienced during his missionary days in British Guiana, but he was unsuccessful in his attempts to obtain Visitation Nuns from Europe or documents of affiliation with the order. Finally, in 1815, on the death of Archbishop Carroll, whose coadjutor he had been for 15 years, he petitioned the Holy See for admission of the community into the Visitation Order. Pius VII readily acceded to the request, and on Dec. 28, 1816, Mother Josephine Teresa Lalor and two others pronounced solemn vows. Six months later, on June 18, 1817, the archbishop died. It was not until Jan. 19, 1819, that the sisters received a new spiritual director, Joseph Picot de Clorivière, who saw at once the plight of both community and school, whose enrollment had dwindled alarmingly.

Reorganization. Aided by an excellent teacher, recently admitted to the community, Mrs. Jerusha Barber, Clorivière set to work to train the sisters in both the matter and the methods of education. Soon a one-page prospectus of the school was issued, which listed French, music, and drawing in addition to subjects usually offered in a good grammar school: English grammar, arithmetic, geography, history, reading, and writing. To provide finer accommodations, he drew plans for a new academy, which was completed in 1823. He also carried out two of Neale's cherished dreams, the establishment of a "Benevolent School" and the erection of a chapel in honor of the Sacred Heart. The former, built in 1819 and known as St. Joseph's School, continued to give free education to an average of 130 girls a year until 1918, when the Sisters of Mercy assumed the direction of the new Holy Trinity parochial school. The chapel was blessed on Nov. 1, 1821, and became a center of devotion to the Sacred Heart. Clorivière died in 1826, two years before the legal incorporation of the community by act of the 20th Congress.

Almost immediately he was succeeded by Michael Wheeler, SS, who thoroughly understood the Visitandine religious life. Aware of the demands of education in the United States, on his journey to Europe in 1829 he obtained from PIUS VIII indults permitting the sisters certain dispensations necessary for carrying out their work. As the community grew, it established foundations and schools in cities throughout the United States.

The 20th Century. In 1919 the sisters added a junior college that continued in existence until 1964. In 1975 the boarding school was closed and nonresident student enrollment increased. A fire in July 1993 destroyed the main academic building, 80 percent of the school's teaching area, but did not touch the monastery. Proud of its tradition of uninterrupted instruction, the school closed for only one day of summer school following the fire, and resumed classes as usual the following September. As Georgetown Visitation continued to flourish, its bicentennial in 1999 was marked by the restoration of Founders Hall and the dedication of several new buildings and programs.

Bibliography: G. P. and R. H. LATHROP, A Study of Courage: Annals of the Georgetown Convent of the Visitation (Cambridge, Mass. 1895). Archives of the Georgetown Visitation Convent, especially MS histories of the foundation and of the lives of the first Sisters by M. J. BARBER and M. S. JONES. These were compiled sometime after the Civil War and before 1879.

[M. L. WHIPPLE/M.-A. GELL]

GEORGIA, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Georgia was the southernmost of the 13 original English colonies in America, and was admitted to the Union as the fourth state in 1788. Its 58,876 square miles extend westward from the Atlantic Ocean to the Appalachian Mountains. The Archdiocese of ATLANTA covers the northern part of the state, at the end of the Appalachian chain. At the "fall line," where the rivers drop precipitously to the southern alluvial plain, the Diocese of SAVANNAH begins, taking in the "fall line" cities of Columbus, Macon and Augusta and everything to the south. If the Archdiocese of Atlanta is centripetal, focused on the city of Atlanta, the Diocese of Savannah is centrifugal, with no geographical center; the above-mentioned cities plus Savannah itself, Brunswick, Valdosta and Albany form an irregular outer circle ringing a rural interior.

The history of the Church in Georgia begins in the 16th century when the Spanish were in control of the region, but when it fell under the rule of the British early in the 18th century, Catholics were not welcome. It was only after the American Revolution that the Church structures began to take shape and parish life began to flourish.

Spanish Control. Catholic Spain sought to spread its civil and religious influence beyond its lucrative colonies in Central and South America into North America. During the 16th and 17th centuries, what later became Georgia formed part of the Spanish province of La Florida. Franciscan friars on Hernando de Soto's expedition performed the first baptisms of Native Americans east of the Mississippi River, near what is now Macon, in 1540. Father Pedro Martínez, S.J., became the first "Georgia martyr" when natives killed him on Cumberland Island in 1566. Other Jesuits followed Martínez to work among the Guale, a strong tribe with a vibrant culture whose predominance in the region led the Spanish to call the whole coastal area "Guale." Various Franciscan friars succeeded the Jesuits. In 1587, Father Pedro de Corpa, O.F.M., founded a mission dedicated to Our Lady of Guadalupe near present-day Darien, and Franciscan Father Blas de Rodríguez established another in honor of Saint Clare ten miles further north. Their efforts led to the conversion of more than 1,500 Guale. In 1595, three more missions were founded on the Golden Isles. These missions were not only religious centers, but were Christian towns where the inhabitants' physical as well as spiritual needs were met. But language barriers and the lack of necessities often caused tensions, as did Catholic moral teaching, when it ran counter to human failings or tribal customs. In 1597, when Juanillo, the heir apparent to the cacique or chief of Guale, relapsed into polygamy, a long-held native custom, Fathers de Corpa and de Rodríguez reminded him that Christian doctrine required monogamy. Refusing to give up his additional wife, Juanillo systematically planned the slaughter of the missionaries,

Interior of St. Teresa's Catholic Church, built in 1859, Albany, Georgia. (©Kevin Fleming/CORBIS)

all but one of whom were killed in mid-September 1597. On Jekyll Island, Father Francisco de Avila was held captive and enslaved for nine months before he was rescued by Spanish forces from Saint Augustine. (Nearly 300 years later, Savannah Bishop Raymond W. Lessard opened the official cause for the beatification of the Georgia Martyrs on Feb. 22, 1984.)

After the Juanillo revolt, the Spanish governor and his forces took revenge on the Guale and managed to “pacify” the area enough to allow the re-establishment of the missions. In 1606, Bishop Altamirano of Cuba visited the Florida missions to confirm converts and ordain priests. In Guale, he confirmed more than 1,000. In 1635, Fray Francisco de Ocana reported great numbers of Spanish and Guale coming to church because of miracles worked through the martyrs’ relics.

The War of the Spanish Succession (1701–1714) led to the destruction by British forces of all but one of the 14 Spanish missions in the Apalachee (northern Florida-southern Georgia) area. British settlers from South Carolina thereafter built forts in what was then Spanish territory, on the Savannah, Santee and Altamaha rivers, to protect themselves from the Spanish and their native allies.

British Rule. After the Anglo-Spanish war in 1727–28, General James Oglethorpe (1696–1785) founded the British Colony of Georgia in 1733—named after King George II—as a Utopian refuge for debtors, many of whom were Irish, and as a bastion of protection for the British colonies against the Spaniards in Florida. Although not himself anti-Catholic (indeed, there is some evidence that he may have been baptized a Catholic in infancy), Oglethorpe adhered to British law and prejudice: his colony’s charter outlawed the Catholic Church along with rum, slaves and lawyers. Georgia intended as a refuge for poor “persecuted Protestant sects” as well as for “the unfortunate but worthy indigent classes.” Austrian Lutherans, known as “Salzburgers,” and Jews were among those welcome in the colony. Catholics were not. Oglethorpe brought Anglican chaplains to his colony, including some of the leading evangelists of the day, John and Charles Wesley and George Whitefield. A Spanish attack on Saint Simons was repulsed by Oglethorpe’s forces at the Battle of the Bloody Marsh (1742). The Spanish threat to British domination of the area was effectively ended.

The idealistic provisions of the charter stood in the way of economic growth, and in 1751 the colony passed to the crown, which allowed the institution of slavery. Although Catholicism remained outlawed in Georgia until the American Revolution, a few Catholics seem to have resided in Savannah from time to time. Some 400 French Catholic “Acadians” (“Cajuns”) landed there after they were expelled from their homes in Nova Scotia by the British government in 1755, on the eve of the French and Indian War. At first they were only given permission to stay the winter. Many were then separated from their children and sent inland, while their children were distributed among Protestant families to be raised as Protestants.

U.S. Statehood. During the American Revolution, the British occupied Savannah, a hotbed of revolutionary discontent, from 1778 until 1782. Catholics on the whole distinguished themselves in the revolutionary armies, in supply and in Congress. The vital alliance of the colonies with Catholic France under Louis XVI and eventually with Catholic Spain helped dampen anti-Catholic feeling in the new United States. More than 600 Catholic French and Haitians died alongside Irish and American soldiers trying to wrest control of the city of Savannah from loyalist forces in 1779. The Catholic heritage of the Marquis de la Fayette and of Count Casimir Pulaski, who died in the Battle of Savannah, enhanced the reputation of their co-religionists. Georgia’s first state constitution (1777) granted religious toleration to its citizens, but had no effect in Savannah while it remained under British control from 1778–1782. Dissenting Protestants and even Jews were tolerated in British-controlled areas, provided they paid tithes in support of the Anglican Church, but Catholics remained officially proscribed. By the time of Georgia’s second constitution (1789), the Revolution was over, the British were gone and the last official discrimination against Catholics—a religious test required of office holders that obliged them to deny the key Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation—had been abolished. But as the plantation system prevailed, most of the arable land ended up in the hands of Protestant landowners, who in turn determined the religion of their dependents. In effect, Catholics could practice their faith only in towns and in small settlements of their own.

English-speaking Catholics from Maryland founded the first Catholic congregation in Georgia at Locust Grove about 1793 even though there was no resident priest. They built the first Catholic church in Georgia, dedicated to the Purification of Mary. Not long after the Marylanders arrived, a group of French Catholics, fleeing the insurrection of slaves in Santo Domingo, moved into the area with their priest, Father Souze, about whom little is known. Around 1793–94 another French priest, Father Jean (John) le Moyne, settled in the community as its first “parish priest,” although nothing is known about his appointment. He, too, had fled to San Domingo and then to Georgia. From Locust Grove, he traveled to Augusta and Savannah, ministering to the Catholics in both towns, and dying in Savannah in 1794.

Other Catholics soon arrived from Ireland, after Theobald Wolfe Tone’s abortive revolt against British rule (1798), and from Germany, after the Napoleonic invasion and the ensuing secularization of Church lands (1803). Around 1820, a larger group of Irish settlers, leaving the deprivations of their native land, arrived at Locust Grove. The Irish remained in the area.

At first, one priest was responsible for all Georgia. Baltimore Bishop John Carroll authorized Father Olivier le Mercier, who also came via Santo Domingo, to exercise his priestly ministry in Savannah in 1796. Father le Mercier came to be known as the “Missionary of Georgia.” By November 1796 he had settled in Locust Grove, with Savannah, Augusta, and the Golden Isles as missions. But in May 1798, Father le Mercier made the parish of Saint John the Baptist in Savannah his headquarters. The little congregation grew through the addition of immigrants and on May 30, 1799, the Mayor and Aldermen of Savannah passed a resolution reserving half a trust lot for its use. When the state of Georgia incorporated a church, it did so in the name of lay leaders, and not in the name of the pastor, giving the lay trustees legal control. This situation was not unique to Georgia, and the trustee quarrels in Georgia were minor compared to those elsewhere.

When in 1803, Father le Mercier was named pastor of the troubled Saint Mary’s Church in Charleston, the Reverend Antoine (Anthony) Carles replaced him in Savannah as “Rector and Priest” for over 16 years.

A petition for an extra lot in 1811 highlighted the parish’s growth “owing to continued emigrations from Europe and the West Indies, settling on these shores to escape death and persecution.” Augusta received a pastor in about 1810, when Augustinian Father Robert Browne arrived in Georgia’s “Second City.”

In 1820, the Holy See established the Diocese of Charleston, comprising both Carolinas and Georgia. The Reverend John England, of Cork, Ireland, became its first bishop. The presence of a bishop in the vicinity, rather than in far-off Baltimore, was of great benefit to the Catholics of Georgia. The financial support of prosperous Irish immigrants such as Dominick O’Byrne of County Mayo, who came to Savannah in 1820 and made a fortune in the lumber business, was also vital to sustaining the Catholic faith in a largely Protestant area. When he died in 1850, O’Byrne reputedly left his wife the richest widow in the South.

The growth of public works in Georgia in the 1820s, '30s and '40s brought large numbers of less prosperous Irish settlers. Arriving to work on canals and railroads, those who survived the dangerous work usually settled in the worst housing in the most unsanitary parts of Georgia's towns. The terrible living conditions of the majority of Georgia's Irish also concerned the state's priests. When Father Jeremiah O'Neill, Sr., for example, brought the Sisters of Charity of Our Lady of Mercy, many of whom were Irish, from Charleston to Savannah in 1845, he intended for them to meet the educational needs of his rapidly growing congregation. In 1835 Bishop England laid the cornerstone of a new Church of Saint John the Baptist in Savannah. On April 1, 1839, Bishop England dedicated the new brick edifice capable of seating 1,000 people. The parish at that time included about one-third of the Catholics in Georgia.

On July 19, 1850, Pope Pius IX erected the Diocese of Savannah, as the seventh provincial Council of Baltimore had requested in May 1849. At its creation, the diocese included all of Georgia and most of Florida, with a total Catholic population of 5,500, with parishes in Savannah, Locust Grove, Atlanta, Augusta, Macon and Columbus. Father Francis X. Gartland, a native of Dublin, Ireland, and vicar general of the Diocese of Philadelphia, was appointed to the new see on July 23, 1850.

In 1937 the name of the see was changed to Savannah-Atlanta, and in 1956 Atlanta was designated a separate diocese. About that time Bishop Hyland in a public statement said, "The Catholic Church has always, and will always, condemn racism in all its various shapes and forms." In 1961 he, along with the bishops of Savannah and Charleston, issued a pastoral letter announcing their intention to integrate the Catholic schools within a year. In 1962 Atlanta was raised to the dignity of a metropolitan archdiocese, with Savannah, Charlotte, Raleigh and Charleston as suffragan sees. The provincial bishops meet twice yearly and the priests are invited to an annual gathering, as are various diocesan officials.

The population of Georgia in 2000 was about 7,500,000, of whom only 397,000 (5.3%) were Catholic (320,000 out of 5,000,000 or 6.4% in the Archdiocese of Atlanta and 77,000 out of 2,500,000 or 3% in the Diocese of Savannah). Both Catholic dioceses, Atlanta and Savannah, belonged to the Georgia Christian Council, an ecumenical conference of the judicatory heads of and other delegates from the ecclesial communions in the state.

Bibliography: J. T. LANNING, The Spanish Missions of Georgia (Chapel Hill, N.C. 1935). R. M. MILLER and J. L. WAKELYN, eds., Catholics in the Old South (Macon, 1983). M. V. GANNON, Rebel Bishop: The Life and Era of Augustine Verot. (Milwaukee, 1964).

[D. K. CLARK]

Carving depicting a member of the noble family that built the church kneeling before St. Stephen, 6th-century church, Georgia, Russia. (©Dean Conger/CORBIS)

GEORGIA, CHURCH IN ANCIENT

Georgia (Georg. Sakartvelo, Russ. Gruziya) is located south of the main ridge of the Caucasus, between the Caspian and Black seas. Located to the south of Russia, Georgia was part of the Soviet Union until 1991. Georgia's historical development is part of the rich history of the east Mediterranean world.

ORIGINS

The Georgian nation emerged between the 7th and the 4th century B.C. as a result of the mingling of several older peoples of pre-Indo-European (Japhetite) linguistic affinities and is thus related to the ancient Urartians, proto-Hattians, and Hurrians (Mitanniens). Historical Georgia stretched from the Caucasus Mountains in the north to Armenia in the south, and from the Black Sea eastward toward the Caspian Sea. On its soil numerous cultural and political influences met and overlapped: Mesopotamian, Anatolian, Aegean, Iranian, Greek, and Hellenistic. From the start the territory of the Georgians was divided into two units, East and West Georgia (Kartli and Egrisi). The earliest political formation took place in West Georgia in the 7th century B.C. as the kingdom of Colchis, whose connection with the myth of the Argonauts is an indication of early Caucasian-Greek contacts. This was followed, in the 4th century B.C., by the rise of the East Georgian kingdom of Iberia (Kartli).

PRE-CHRISTIAN GEORGIA

In the 1st century B.C. Colchis was annexed to the kingdom of Pontus; this left Iberia as the point of historical continuity of the Georgian nation. In 65 and 64 B.C., as a result of the Mithridatic wars, both Iberia and Colchis became vassals of Rome and bulwarks of the Pax Romana against Iran. But in the 3rd century A.D. the Iberian throne passed to the Chosroids, a dynasty of Iranian origin. This Iranian political success was thwarted by the acceptance of Christianity, almost simultaneously with the Roman Empire's acceptance of it, on the part of the first Chosroid king of Iberia, Mirian III. It brought Iberia into a religious as well as political conformity with the Roman Empire, and sowed discord between it and Mazdaist Iran.

CHRISTIANITY IN GEORGIA

Georgian paganism was an amalgam of local astral and ancestor cults, worship of the forces of nature, imported Hellenistic syncretism, and Mazdaism introduced from Iran. Christian influences also found their way to Georgia, preceding official conversion. This was especially the case of West Georgia, a Roman province after A.D. 63, with Greek coastal cities and widely developed economic contacts with the Mediterranean world. It is, however, the conversion of East Georgia (Iberia) that is better known as the result of the apostolate of a Roman captive woman, St. Nino, Christiana of the Roman Martyrology (d. 338). Freed from the superimpositions of Georgian and Armenian legends, her story goes back to a version by RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA, who derived it near the end of the 4th century from the Iberian prince Bacurius. It is corroborated by the seemingly independent Iberian version as well as by archeological data.

Arriving in Iberia in 324 and beginning her preaching in 328, St. Nino converted first the Queen of Iberia (333) and then King Mirian himself (334). The King then asked Emperor Constantine I for clergy to organize the Church in his country, and in 337, with the baptism of the King, his family, the princes of the realm, and many of the people, Iberia became officially Christian. Though its first bishop, whose see was at the capital city of Mtskheta, received his consecration from Constantinople, the Iberian Church was under the jurisdiction of Antioch. In addition to Greek influences, the youthful Iberian Church came under the influence of Palestinian, Armenian, and Syro-Iranian Christianity.

The earliest Biblical texts, traceable to the 5th century, show a dependence on Armenian and Syriac versions; and the earliest liturgical monuments show the prevalence in Iberia of the Hierosolymitan liturgy of St. James, first in Greek, and after the end of the 6th century, in Georgian. In spite of the resistance of local paganism and especially of Mazdaism sponsored by Iran, Christianization progressed steadily, and by the beginning of the 6th century there were some 30 bishops in Iberia.

The evangelization of West Georgia was less the work of historical personages than part of the general Christianizing of the Roman Empire. Among the fathers of Nicaea I (325) there was a bishop from West Georgia, Stratophilus of Pityus (modern Pitsunda); another, the bishop of Trebizond, considered Georgian by some historians, belonged to Pontus and not to Colchis, and it was only after the 10th century that his diocese came to be called Lazica by the Byzantines, after the neighboring Georgian land of Lazica (Chaneti). By the 5th century the whole of West Georgia had become Christian, except the land of Abkhazia in the north and that of Lazica in the south, which were evangelized in the 6th century. In the 7th century West Georgia was divided into two ecclesiastical units, the Metropoly of Phasis (Poti), with four suffragan sees, and the Archdiocese of Sebastopolis (Dioscurias, modern Sukhum), both under the jurisdiction of Constantinople. Here, the liturgy was that of Constantinople, in Greek at first, but from the 8th and 9th centuries in Georgian.

BUFFER STATE

The history of Georgia hinged largely on its position as a buffer between two hostile empires, Roman and Iranian, each trying to control it. With West Georgia firmly in Roman hands, this was particularly the case of Iberia, which, though an autonomous kingdom, passed from the one imperial suzerainty to the other. The Iberian monarchy, in its endeavor to assert its authority over its great vassals, gravitated toward the centralized and autocratic Roman Empire; on the other hand, the local princes, though Christians, tended in their opposition to the crown to be pro-Iranian. King Vakhtang I Gorgasal (c. 466–522), a strong monarch, concluded an alliance with Emperor ZENO, ending Iranian suzerainty over Iberia, and accepted the pro-Monophysite HENOTICON (484). In return, Zeno recognized (between 486–488) the head of the Iberian Church as an autocephalous catholicos, but still dependent on Antioch. Mtskheta, his see, was now superseded as political capital by Tiflis. And in 505 Iberia, together with Armenia and Caucasian Albania, officially adhered to the Henoticon at a council at Dvin in Armenia.

In the course of the 6th century, East and West Georgia returned to Catholicism in the wake of Byzantium's reconciliation with Rome in 519; Armenia and Albania, however, clung to the Henoticon. In 555, at another council at Dvin, Armenia openly accepted Monophysitism, whereas Albania was to waver between it and Catholicism. The political alliance with the empire ended with the death of Vakhtang I in 522, and his successors fell once more under the control of Iran, which in 580 abolished the Iberian monarchy.

The successful anti-Iranian war of Emperor MAURICE brought Iberia back to the Roman sphere of influence and in 588, the Emperor established the office of presiding prince to replace the Iberian kingship. Within a decade, a new change in the balance of power brought Iberia momentarily under Iranian suzerainty, causing a resurgence of Monophysitism. It was due to Catholicos Cyrion I that in the 600s Iberia returned to Catholicism, as it did to the imperial political allegiance, breaking with the stanchly Monophysite sister-church of Armenia.

Although Georgian monastic communities are known to have already existed in the Holy Land in the 5th century, monasticism began to flourish in Georgia only in the 6th century. The earliest monastic foundations are ascribed to the activity of the so-called 13 Syrian Fathers, who arrived there in the decade of 560–570 and who were probably Monophysites. But the Monophysitic tinge soon vanished, and the Georgian monasteries became centers of missionary and cultural activity that greatly contributed to the growth of the Church in Georgia. A blossoming of monastic life was reached in the southwestern provinces of Iberia (Tao-Klarjeti) in the 8th and 9th centuries, owing particularly to the activity of St. Gregory of Khandzta (d. 861), as well as in the Georgian monastic communities on Mt. ATHOS, Mt. SINAI, and in the Holy Land. It was to monasticism that organized education, traceable to the 5th century, owed its growth after the 10th century.

ARAB CALIPHATE

From the mid-7th to the 9th century, Iberia, along with Armenia, was an autonomous vassal state of the Arab caliphate, and so became a buffer between the latter and Byzantium, as it had been between Rome and Iran. Tiflis was the seat of an Arab emir. In 813 the office of presiding prince became hereditary in the Bagratid dynasty, a branch of the Armenian princely house of the same name. Profiting by the temporary weakness of the Abbasid caliphate, Ashot I the Great (d. 830), first Bagratid prince of Iberia, accepted the suzerainty of the Byzantine Empire along with the title of Curopalate; and in 888 his descendant Adarnase IV assumed the title of king, restoring the monarchy.

The history of West Georgia was no less turbulent. In the mid-5th century Colchis was conquered by the Lazic princes from the south, and from a Roman province it became a vassal kingdom of Lazica, which lasted until the late 6th century and which served as a battleground for Justinian's Persian wars. From the 6th to the 8th century Lazica was again a province of the empire, but in the 790s it was conquered by the Princes of Abkhazia and became the kingdom of Abasgia (Aphazeti), though still under imperial suzerainty. In 978 the crown of Abasgia was inherited by Bagrat III of Iberia (d. 1014), who in 1008 united Abasgia and Iberia into one kingdom of Georgia. Simultaneously the West Georgian Church was united with that of Iberia under the catholicos of Mtskheta. But Constantinople was compensated in influence for this loss in jurisdiction. The Byzantine liturgy of the West Georgian Church now passed to East Georgia replacing the ancient Hierosolymitan liturgy of Iberia.

Arab overlordship had considerably weakened Byzantine influence. This and the unification of the two Georgias contributed to the birth of national consciousness, which now expressed itself in the field of religion in the purely Georgian system of chronology with a new annus mundi, a purely Georgian order of ecclesiastical feasts, of the Lessons, and of the Divine Office, as well as in a distinct character of Georgia's Byzantine rite in general. Georgian church music, traceable back to the beginnings of Georgian Christianity, has a distinct flavor.

THE GOLDEN AGE

The period of more than two centuries following the unification of 1008 is considered the golden age of Georgia. The Bagratid sovereigns, among whom the most notable were David III(II) the Builder (1089–1125) and Queen Tamar (1184–1212), both recognized as saints by the Georgian Church, transformed the country into a powerful military state. The onslaught of the Seljuk Turks, who now spearheaded Islam and who, between 1060 and 1070, had nearly destroyed Georgia, was now repelled, and Tiflis was regained from the Muslims (1122).

PAN-CAUCASIAN EMPIRE

Georgia became a pan-Caucasian empire, stretching from sea to sea, controlling non-Georgian states, and enjoying the zenith of culture and prosperity. Among its vassals it counted at different times the Greek empire of Trebizond and the Muslim kingdom of Shirvan on the Caspian. Georgia even launched a counteroffensive against the Seljuk empire, a Georgian crusade, which by diverting to the north a part of Seljuk power contributed to the First Crusade. This success was grounded in the predominance achieved by the crown over the highly feudalized nobility and to the use of mercenary troops to supplement the feudal levies. Georgia's industries and commerce profited by the unification under one sovereignty of all the important Transcaucasian commercial and industrial centers and by its participation in two great economic systems, the Saracen (transCaspian) and the Byzantine (Black Sea region). In the golden age, Georgian literature reached its apogee and the arts flourished. Georgian architecture, chiefly ecclesiastical, was marked at this period by the blending of the two hitherto distinct types, the centralized domed edifice and the basilica, into the new cruciform domed type.

A happy balance was reached between the absolutist tendencies of the crown and the feudal society of Georgia. The emergence of the Council of the State, an embryonic parliament, was a manifestation of this balance. In this great epoch the Church played a leading role. Although national success obliterated vestiges of Byzantine suzerainty, Byzantine influence was again on the increase in the domain of religion and culture, with the Georgian monasteries as centers of diffusion. The imposition of the Byzantine liturgy on East Georgia was one aspect; in the literary output of the time, likewise, translations from the Greek tended to outnumber original productions. The monasteries organized centers of higher education. In them the study of philosophy was accompanied by the Byzantine tension between anti-intellectual clericalism, admitting only mystical experience, and philosophy, especially Neoplatonist and verging on laicism. There was a struggle among the philosophers themselves, as the Georgian academies became battlefields between the Neoplatonists (led by John Petritsi, d. c. 1125) and the Aristotelians (led by Arsenius of Iqalto, d. c. 1130). This submission to Byzantinism did not fail to evoke a nationalist reaction, even among the monks themselves, both at home and on Mt. Athos.

It was in the golden age that the Church-State relations began to be formulated. Ultimately the catholicos was regarded as the spiritual king of the country, theoretically the king's equal. But he was also a temporal prince, possessed of territory, noble vassals, subjects, and armed forces, and as such he was subordinate to the king. The bishops and abbots ranked with the princes of the realm and were endowed with feudal rights. The office of Grand Chancellor of Georgia, for example, belonged ex officio to the archbishop of Chqondidi in West Georgia. The power and wealth of the Church, its involvement in the feudal order, and its national character had many negative effects. Its high offices became the nobles' monopoly. In his struggle with the nobility David III (II) attempted also to break the monopoly. With this in view he convoked in 1103 the Council of Ruisi-Urbnisi. But he was not successful. Altogether, as in Byzantium, the Church in Georgia had become a mere venerable adjunct of the nation and of the state.

Two waves of barbarian invasions abruptly terminated the golden age. The first wave, that of Genghis Khan's Mongols and of the Khwarizmian Turkomans in the first half of the 13th century, devastated Georgia and enforced on Queen Rusudan (1223–45) the suzerainty of the Great Khan. The second wave was the series of campaigns of Tamerlane at the end of the 14th and the beginning of the 15th century. It completed the ruin of the kingdom. Under the weight of the earlier wave, Georgia had lost its unity; in 1258 it split into two kingdoms, Georgia (Iberia) and Abasgia (also called Imeretia). This split was momentarily healed by George VI(V) the Illustrious (1314–46).

After Tamerlane, decline set in definitively, in spite of the countermeasures of Alexander I (1412–42). His son and third successor, George VIII (1446–65), offered to take part in Pope PIUS II's projected anti-Ottoman crusade (1458–60). But the impoverishment of the country through constant warfare and exactions of the conquerors, the general economic collapse, and the weakening of the crown furthered by the strife within the royal family, which broke out under George VIII, led to a new and final division of Georgia. It split into three kingdoms: Georgia proper (Iberia), Abasgia-Imeretia, and Kakhetia (eastern Iberia); as well as five independent principalities: Abkhazia, Guria, Meschia, Mingrelia, and Suania. This division became definitive in the years 1490–91. The Georgian Church actually anticipated this trend, since by 1390 West Georgia had withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the catholicos of Iberia and formed a rival catholicate of Abasgia with its seat at Pitsunda (ancient Pityus). Antioch sought to profit by this disunion to establish its authority over the new catholicate.

RELATIONS WITH THE HOLY SEE

The relations of the Georgian Church and the Holy See, which after the former's lapse into Monophysitism were strengthened by the catholicos Cyrion I in the 600s, seem to have continued unchanged well into the golden age. The distance and the intermediary position of Byzantium must account for the paucity of evidence regarding them. We do know that St. Hilarion the Iberian in the 9th century journeyed to Rome to venerate the tombs of the Apostles and the popes, and appears to have been responsible for the translation into Georgian—from the Latin, it seems, rather than the Greek—of the liturgy of St. Peter. The few annalistic references to the popes assign to them a place above the Eastern patriarchs, as is the case also with the dating of some manuscripts, and almost invariably apply to them the adjective holy.

Anti-Byzantine reaction in the golden age may have in part prevented the Georgian Church, which had kept aloof from the iconoclastic and the Photian upheavals, from following Cerularius in 1054. Thus, in 1065 St. George the Hagiorite, Abbot of the Iberian monastery on Mt. Athos, asserted in the presence of Emperor Constantine X the ancient belief in the inerrancy of the Roman Church. However, the isolation, aggravated by the Byzantine schism and Seljuk conquests, the nationalization of Georgian Christianity, and the continued communion with the Byzantines, with whom the Georgians shared the same rite—all this made Georgia, almost imperceptibly, drift into schism. Yet there was no formal break. In his letter of 1224, Pope HONORIUS III, replying to Queen Rusudan's announcement of her accession of 1223, invited her to participate in a crusade and granted to her and her people an apostolic indulgence. Gregory IX continued this correspondence, asking the Queen in 1233 for assistance to some Friars Minor. But when in 1240 the Queen appealed to the same Pope for help against the Mongols, she promised reunion with the Holy See; and in his reply, of that year, Gregory IX urged her to return to the union with the See of Peter. It was, accordingly, between 1224 and 1240 that the Holy See became apprised of the fact of separation.

The Friars Minor, who came to Georgia in the 13th century, were followed by the Dominicans; and their missionary effort was so successful that in 1328 Pope John XXII, who seven years previously had written to King George the Illustrious urging reunion, transferred the See of Smyrna to Tiflis and in 1329 named the Dominican John of Florence the first Latin-rite bishop of the capital. The See of Tiflis continued until the beginning of the 16th century. In 1330 an English Dominican, Peter Gerald, was named Catholic bishop of Sukhum (Sebastopolis-Dioscurias). All this hinged, obviously, on royal sanction.

There is much here that is unknown, but that may explain the curious fact that one of the titles officially accorded to the king of Georgia by the contemporary Mamluk Court of Egypt was "Supporter of the Pope." In spite of this and of the exchange of communications between the Holy See, the kings and the catholicoi that were to continue for centuries to come, no reunion was effected, and the two Georgian representatives at the Council of FLORENCE did not sign the Act of Union (1439).

SILVER AGE

The receding Mongol waves revealed what was still left standing of the cultural and political structure of Georgia. Slowly the work of restoration began. Politically, indeed, the situation had hardly improved. The internal division and consequent weakness continued; the Mongol pressure had been succeeded by two simultaneous pressures of Safavid Iran and the Ottoman Empire.

It was, however, precisely the rivalry of the two empires, both claiming suzerainty over Georgia, a geopolitical inheritance of the struggle between Rome and Iran, that made possible, despite sporadic violence, the survival and renaissance of Georgia, its so-called silver age (c. 1500–1800). The violence took the shape of religious persecution; and although there were many apostasies, there were also numerous martyrdoms, such as that of the Dowager Queen Ketevan of Kakhetia, who suffered for her Christian faith at the hands of Shah Abbas I, at Shiraz on Sept. 22, 1624, and who has since been regarded as a saint by the Georgian Church.

RELATIONS WITH THE WEST

In the silver age, under the enlightened guidance of the governing class, education was reorganized, new centers of learning were established, and literature was revived. Byzantium had long been dead and other influences now gave shape to this renaissance. In the face of the renewed Moslem danger Georgia sought a rap-prochement with the West and with Russia. The post-Tridentine development of missionary activity sent numerous religious to Georgia: Augustinians, Carmelites, and especially Theatines, to whom the Georgian mission was entrusted in 1628 by Urban VIII. They were followed by the Capuchins, who remained active from 1661 to 1845, when the Russians, then masters of Georgia, expelled them.

CATHOLIC REVIVAL

Like the Byzantine elite at the end of the empire, a number of distinguished Georgians, including kings and catholicoi, were drawn to Catholicism. In 1629 the first Georgian printing press was set up at Rome. Thomism found its way to Georgia in the works of Antony Dadiani, Archbishop of Chqondidi. The greatest figures of this Catholic revival were also those of Georgian literature: Orbeliani and Catholicos Antony I. It should be mentioned that the silver age saw a considerable decline of the Georgian Orthodox Church, worldliness of the prelates, and ignorance and immorality of the clergy in general.

RUSSIAN INFLUENCE

Georgian relations with Russia were at first exclusively political, motivated, on the Georgian side, by the need of protection against Islam—and only as a last resort after the attempts to secure the aid of the West had failed—and on the Russian side by the need of a springboard for the eventual expansion in the eastern Mediterranean. That both Russia and Georgia belonged to the Greek Orthodox communion was an additional factor; and Georgia changed somewhat, under the cultural influences of Russia, and, through Russia, of the ENLIGHTENMENT of the West.

Politically the Russian empire played an increasingly predominant role. Its growing expansionism coincided with Georgia's growing dependence on it in the face of resumed Iranian expansionism. In these circumstances on Aug. 3, 1783, King Heraclius II of Georgia (Georgia and Kakhetia had been united since 1762) concluded a treaty of protectorate with Empress CATHERINE II of Russia, which guaranteed the integrity of both the kingdom and its church. George XIII(XII), who succeeded him in 1798, was pressed by Emperor Paul I and showed a willingness to increase Georgia's dependence on Russia, but his death, on Jan. 9, 1801, before he could sign the projected new treaty, left it without legal force. Nevertheless, in that same year, Paul I proceeded to annex Georgia, weakened by the Iranian war of retaliation of 1795, in violation of the guarantees of 1783. His successor, Alexander I, ratified this act. In 1804 a protectorate was in turn imposed on Imeretia, which was annexed in 1810. The pattern of protectorate and annexation was applied to other Georgian states (Guria, 1829; Suania, 1858; Abkhazia, 1864). In 1867 the Prince of Mingrelia was allowed to abdicate in favor of Emperor Alexander II. Meschia, no longer a principedom, was acquired from the Turks in 1878.

In 1811 Russian annexationism affected the Georgian Church as well. The catholicate of Iberia was abolished, while that of Abasgia had been in abeyance from 1795. The last catholicos, Antony II, was deported to Russia and the Church became part of the Russian Church, to be ruled by the Holy Synod through an exarch. All the exarchs, save the first one, were Russians. The Georgian episcopal sees, which had numbered some 77 in the 17th century and some 30 on the eve of the annexation, were reduced to 5. The Church was impoverished through governmental confiscations of Church property (amounting to some 140,000,000 rubles) and the rapacity of the Russian-appointed hierarchs. Ecclesiastical art treasures were decimated through neglect and the rapacity of lay officialdom. The Georgian language was suppressed in seminaries, in schools, and even in the liturgy, and replaced by Russian or Palaeoslavlic. The Church, no less than the country, was subjected to Russification, a trend that was resented by the people. The collapse of the Russian empire in 1917 brought about the restoration of Georgia's political independence, if only momentarily.

In 1917 the Georgian Orthodox Church declared its independence from the Russian Holy Synod and reestablished a catholicos-patriarch of All Georgia. In 1921, however, Georgia was reabsorbed into the new Soviet empire, though accorded the status of a Soviet socialist republic, while two West Georgian lands, Abkhazia and Achara, were given that of autonomous republics. The catholicate was allowed to continue.

After the Russian expulsion of the Capuchins in 1845 the Georgian Catholics were cared for by local Catholic clergy, later principally members to the Georgian Congregation of the Servants of the Immaculate Conception, founded at Constantinople in 1861. They were placed under the Catholic bishop of Tiraspol in Russia. At the outbreak of World War I there were some 40,000 Catholics of the Latin, as well as of the Armenian rite in Georgia (the Byzantine rite was always especially persecuted in the Russian Empire) out of the population that has since risen to over 4,000,000. After the war the Holy See appointed an administrator apostolic of Tiflis and Georgia.

Bibliography: W. E. D. ALLEN, A History of the Georgian People (London 1932). M. TAMARATI, L'Eglise géorgienne: Des origines jusqu'à nos jours (Rome 1910). M. TARCHNIŠVILI, Muséon 73 (1960) 107–126, autocephalous church; "Sources arméno-géorgiennes de l'histoire ancienne de l'Eglise de Géorgie," ibid. 60 (1947) 29–50; Geschichte der kirchlichen georgischen Literatur (Rome 1955); Orientalia Christiana 39 (1955) 79–92, church and state. C. TOUMANOFF, Studies in Christian Caucasian History (Washington 1963); "Christian Caucasia between Byzantium and Iran," Traditio 10 (1954) 109–189.

[C. TOUMANOFF]

GEORGIAN BYZANTINE CATHOLICS

Historians cannot tell with precision when the Georgian Church broke ties with Rome. When contact with Rome became impossible because of the domination of the Mongols from the 13th to 15th centuries, there occurred a gradual estrangement from Rome and a turning toward the East. In the schism that had earlier separated Constantinople from Rome, Georgia remained neutral. It is known only that George of Mthatsminda (11th century), the official speaker of the Georgian Church, defended before the emperor the position of Rome. Until the middle of the 13th century it did not appear likely that the Georgian Church would be separated from Rome. In their letters to the pope, both Queen Rusudan and her minister (122–345) recognized the primacy of the pope. Thus one can conclude only that separation from Rome was not an official, juridical act. Support of Constantinople was favored by political conditions and encouraged by the century-old traditions that Georgia shared with Byzantium. However, notwithstanding the actual separation, Georgia's kings from the 13th to the 19th century always kept a desire for communion with the Roman Church.

Several Latin religious orders, chiefly the Franciscans and Dominicans, worked in Georgia for reunion. In 1329 Pope John XXII erected a Catholic see at Tiflis and appointed the first Latin bishop of Georgia, thus beginning a line that continued until 1507. The Theatines and Capuchins worked until the 18th and 19th centuries establishing a nucleus of Latin Catholics. They numbered about 50,000 before World War I. A smaller nucleus of Georgian Catholics at the end of the 19th century embraced the Armenian rite because it was forbidden by Russian law until 1917 for any Catholic to follow the Byzantine rite. In 1917, when Georgia cut off ecclesiastical bonds from the Moscow patriarchate, a small group of Georgians sought communion with the See of Rome as a fledging Georgian Byzantine Catholic community. This was a very small group that numbered at its peak 10,000 in 1920, whereas there were 40,000 of the Latin rite during that period. Two religious congregations of the Immaculate Conception were founded in 1861 in Constantinople by Father Peter Karishiaranti to work among the Catholics of Georgia of both Byzantine and Latin rites, but they had died out by the 1960s.

The nascent Georgian Byzantine Catholic community of the early 20th century was impeded by the fact that no hierarchy was ever established for them. The small Georgian Byzantine Catholic parish in Constantinople is the only surviving vestige of the small community. After Georgia regained its independence in 1991, the Latin Catholics and Armenian Catholics experienced a resurgence and renaissance. The future of the incipient Georgian Byzantine Catholic community remains uncertain.

Bibliography: R. ROBERSON, The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey, 6th ed (Rome 1999)

[A. S. MANVEL/EDS.]

GERALD OF AURILLAC, ST.

Patron of Upper Auvergne, France; b. 855; d. Oct. 13, 909. He was born into an old noble family at Aurillac and succeeded his father as count of that region, although he had wished to enter religious life and had been educated as a cleric. He made several pilgrimages to Rome and, despite many difficulties, in 894 established the Abbey of AURILLAC, which he placed under papal protection. He was celebrated for his justice as a ruler, his many devotions (including recitation of the Divine Office), his lifelong chastity, and his gift of healing. Gerald was buried in the church at Aurillac which now bears his name. Although his popular cult began immediately and has been confirmed, he is little known outside France.

Feast: Oct. 13.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Oct. 6:277–331. ODO OF CLUNY, “De vita Sancti Geraldii,” Patrologia Latina 133:639–704. E. JOUBERT, Saint Geraud d’Aurillac (Aurillac 1968). G. SITWELL, ed. and tr., St. Odo of Cluny . . . St. Gerald of Aurillac (New York 1958). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 4:104–105.

[F. BEHRENDIS]

GERALD OF BRAGA, ST.

Monk, bishop; d. Dec. 5, 1108. Gerald became a Benedictine of the Cluniac observance at the Abbey of MOISSAC. In 1086, another Cluniac, Bernard of Salvétat, abbot of Sahagún, was promoted to the archbishopric of Toledo, which had been recovered from the Moors by King Alfonso VI of León-Castile in the previous year. Then, in 1088, Bernard was named primate of Spain by Pope URBAN II. In the process of developing a capable and learned hierarchy, Bernard invited Gerald to join him, consecrating him bishop of Braga, 1096. This see, the metropolitan of Galicia before the Moslem conquest, had been reestablished by King García in 1070, and on Dec. 28, 1099, it was restored to metropolitan status by Pope PASCHAL II. On Dec. 5, 1100, at the national council of Palencia, Gerald’s cult was formally recognized by his suffragans.

Feast: Dec. 5.

Bibliography: M. DE OLIVEIRA, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche. (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:707.

[A. G. BIGGS]

GERALD OF MAYO, ST.

Abbot; b. Northumbria, England; d. Mayo, Ireland, 732. When the synod of WHITBY (664) banned the observance of the Celtic date of Easter in Northumbria, St. COLMAN left LINDISFARNE with all the Irish monks and with some 30 of the English monks, including Gerald. In Ireland they founded a monastery at Inishbofin off the Mayo coast. Strife between the Irish and English monks led Colman to establish a house on the mainland (Mayo) for the English monks. He acted for a time as superior of both houses, but then Gerald succeeded him as abbot of Mayo, which became a great sanctuary for saints. Gerald’s vita, though legendary, contains valuable material on the relations of Christians and Druids in early Ireland.

Feast: Mar. 13.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum March 2:284–288. J. COLGAN, Acta sanctorum Hiberniae (Louvain 1645; repr. Dublin 1948) 599–704. J. F. KENNEY, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland (New York 1929) 463–464. C. PLUMMER, comp., Vitae sanctorum Hiberniae, 2 v. (Oxford 1910) 1:1xxi–1xxii; 2:107–115. A. BUTLER The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 1:584.

[R. T. MEYER]

GERALDINI, ALEJANDRO

Italian humanist, second bishop of Santo Domingo; b. Italy, date unknown; d. Santo Domingo, March 8, 1524. Titular bishop of Vulturara from 1494, Geraldini spent almost 40 years in the service of the crown of Castile as a diplomat, priest, and cultured man. He brought the spirit of the Italian Renaissance to the palace of the Catholic kings. He was a prolific writer of Latin verse and prose. On Jan. 26, 1516, he was nominated for the See of Santo Domingo and personally delivered the royal letter to the Pope. Confirmed and consecrated, he left for America and wrote a letter to Charles V from Santo Domingo on Oct. 6, 1519. He described his arrival in Itinerarium ad regiones sub aequinoctiali plaga constitutas (Rome 1631) in which he gave an enthusiastic picture of the city, its culture, and its wealth. Geraldini's greatest accomplishment as bishop was the construction of the cathedral of Santo Domingo, the first in America, started in 1522. He wrote a Latin ode in honor of his beloved cathedral, in which he was buried, but nothing in the building today reflects his description of it.

Bibliography: CIPRIANO DE UTRERA, Episcopologio dominico-politano (Ciudad Trujillo 1956). P. HENRÍQUEZ UREÑA, La cultura y las letras coloniales en Santo Domingo (Buenos Aires 1936).

[E. RODRÍGUEZ DEMORIZI]

GERARD, JOHN

Jesuit missionary; b. Etwall Hall, Derbyshire, Oct. 4, 1564; d. Rome, June 27, 1637. During his education at Exeter College, Oxford, where he matriculated in December 1575, he left for Douai in August 1577 to avoid taking the oath of supremacy; he later continued his studies at the Jesuit College in Clermont, Paris. After returning to England in the spring of 1583, he was imprisoned in the Marshalsea. Shortly after his release, about May 1586, he left England and went to Rome, where on August 5 he entered the English College. About a month after his ordination (six weeks short of the required canonical age), he joined the Society of Jesus on Aug. 15, 1588. The same year, in company with Edward Oldcorne, he returned to England, landing at night in early November on a deserted stretch of beach near Happisburgh on the Norfolk coast between Great Yarmouth and Cromer. His adventures during the next 18 years are recorded in his Autobiography, perhaps the most remarkable and exciting narrative of adventure in Elizabethan literature. Between 1588 and 1594 he worked in East Anglia, first in Norfolk and then in Suffolk, Cambridgeshire, and Essex; he made many converts and established a large number of Catholic centers in the houses of the gentry. Several times he narrowly escaped arrest, but finally he was caught in London, on April 23, 1594. After close imprisonment in the Counter-in-the-Poultry he was transferred to the Clink on July 6, 1594; there he was able to say Mass, instruct converts, and establish in London a house for priests entering England from the seminaries. His success led to stricter confinement and to his transference to the Tower on April 12, 1597. He was never brought to trial; but he was tortured twice, principally that he might reveal the names of the persons who had sheltered him and the whereabouts of his superior, Henry GARNET. With the help of friends in London, with whom he communicated by letters written in orange juice, he organized his escape by means of a rope slung from the roof of the Cradle Tower over the moat to the wharf below. This was on the night of Oct. 5, 1597.

Thereafter, though closely pursued, he continued his apostolate in Northants, Bucks, and Oxfordshire. At the time of the Gunpowder Plot a proclamation was issued ordering Gerard's arrest along with that of Garnet and Father Oswald Tesimond. Although innocent, Gerard was a friend of several of the conspirators, notably Sir Everard Digby. Gerard eluded capture and on May 3, 1606, crossed from Dover to the Continent disguised as a retainer to the Spanish ambassador. Later he wrote his Narrative of the Gunpowder Plot, which remains a primary historical source. Early in 1607 he was appointed English Penitentiary at St. Peter's, and two years later he was sent to Flanders to help in the training of the novices in the English novitiate established at Louvain. In 1614 a Jesuit house of philosophy and theology was established at Liège, and Gerard became its first rector. He built it from the foundations in a fine style with alms collected from all quarters. In 1622 he visited Rome to get papal support for the new Institute of Religious Women founded by Mary WARD; and on his return to Belgium was made rector of the house of the English Jesuits at Ghent, where the newly ordained priests made their "third year" of probation under his direction. From 1627 to 1637 he was confessor to the English College in Rome, where he died.

Bibliography: J. GERARD, The Autobiography of a Hunted Priest, tr. P. CARAMAN (New York 1952). T. COOPER, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 7:1101–02.

[P. CARAMAN]

GÉRARD, JOSEF VALENCIA, BL.

Oblate missionary priest; b. March 12, 1831 Bouxières-aux-Chênes (near Nancy), France; d. May 29, 1914, Roma, Lesotho, Africa. Josef, son of peasants Jean Gérard and Ursula Stofflet, studied at Pont-à-Mousson and Nancy seminary (1851–52) before pronouncing his final vows as an oblate of Mary Immaculate (1852). After completing his studies at Marseilles, he left for Natal (1853), South Africa, where he was ordained nearby at Pietermaritzburg (February 1854). His first efforts as a missionary among the Zulus were unsuccessful. In 1862, he traveled on horseback to establish a mission in Basutoland (now Lesotho) at the “Village de la Mère de Jésus” (also known as Roma). There he won the heart of the great warrior king Moshoeshe, baptized his first converts (1865), and established a flourishing school and convent. He labored alone to found St. Monica’s Mission in the northern part of the country (1876), before returning to Roma in 1898. The Basuthos remember Gérard as a man whose prayer led him to care for the sick and weak. After praying at his tomb in Maseru, Lesotho, Pope John Paul II beatified Gérard on Sept. 15, 1988.

Bibliography: Father Joseph Gérard, O.M.I., Speaks to Us from South Africa and Lesotho, 1854–1914, ed. M. FERRAGNE, tr. G. BROSSARD (Maseru, Lesotho 1980). J. MORABITO, Jamais plus comme lui!: vie et vertus du serviteur de Dieu, le père Joseph Gérard (Rome 1980). Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1988): 961.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GERARD, MILES, BL.

Priest, martyr; alias William Richardson; b. ca. 1550, Ince, near Wigan, Lancashire, England; hanged, drawn, and quartered at Rochester, April 13 or 30, 1590. Before beginning his seminary studies at Douai, then Rheims, Gerard was tutor to the children of Sir Edward Tyldesley, at Morleys, Lancashire. He was ordained at Rheims, April 7, 1583, then was a professor at the English College there for several years. On Aug. 31, 1589 (O.S.), he started for England with five companions. When the sailors at Dunkirk refused to take more than two passengers, the priests flipped a coin. Gerard and Bl. Francis Dickenson won passage. Upon landing at Dover (November 24, N.S.), they were arrested. At first they hid their true identities. After confessing that they were Catholic priests, they were brutally tortured and condemned as traitors in London. Jesuit Father John Curry wrote shortly after their execution that they “gave a splendid testimony to the Catholic Faith.” Gerard and Dickenson were beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GERARD, RICHARD

Recusant and confessor; b. probably Staffordshire, c. 1635; d. London, March 22, 1680. Counting among his antecedents both the solicitor general under Elizabeth I (Gilbert Gerard) and the famous Jesuit missionary (John Gerard), Richard seems representative of the lesser English peerage of the mid-17th century, on whom both recusant Catholicism and conformity to the Established Church laid rival traditional claims. How he himself became a Catholic is not known, but certainly by the 1670s he had become identified as a friend of the Jesuits, having three sons at Saint-Omer and administering some small properties on behalf of the society. This friendship was to prove convenient for the anti-Catholic purposes of the “Whig” opposition to the Duke of York, for when Gerard came to London to testify in favor of the five Catholic peers who had been impeached following Titus Oates’s revelation of the Popish Plot, he found himself arrested on a similar charge of conspiracy. His acknowledged contact with Father John Gavan on Aug. 15, 1678, at Bascobel in Worcestershire, was cited by the informer Stephen Dugdale as evidence of treason; and on this charge he was committed to the Gatehouse prison by the Lords’ committee on May 19, 1679. Ten months later, in the meantime removed to Newgate prison and still awaiting trial, he died.

Bibliography: J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time, 2:432–433. H. FOLEY, ed., Records of the English Province of the Society of Jesus, 7 v. (London 1877–82), 5:434–436.

[R. I. BRADLEY]

GERARD OF ABBEVILLE

Secular master in theology at Paris; b. Abbeville, near Amiens, c. 1220; d. Nov. 8, 1272. Mentioned as a master of the university and papal subdeacon in 1254 (Chartularium Universitatis Parisiensis 1:374), he was regent master in theology and archdeacon of Ponthieu in 1262 (ibid. 1:436). His entire career was devoted to the academic life at Paris. An intimate friend of WILLIAM OF SAINT-AMOUR, he became one of the leaders of the movement to expel mendicants from the university and to suppress their privileges. After the exile of William of Saint-Amour in 1257, Gerard preserved contact by correspondence and became the recognized leader of the opposition to the mendicant orders, particularly in the second stage of the conflict. In 1256 he had already written Contra adversarium perfectionis Christianae, but it was not circulated until late summer of 1269. This was answered by both BONAVENTURE and THOMAS AQUINAS.

In January 1269 Gerard inaugurated renewed opposition in a sermon affirming that use of material goods for the sake of the Church does not place secular clerics in a less perfect state than that of religious. In his Lenten quodlibet (March 1269), he attacked the Franciscan concept of absolute poverty. In this he received strong support from his colleague Nicholas of Lisieux. Early in 1270 he addressed two critical questions to JOHN PECKHAM that were answered both in Peckham's Tractatus pauperis and in Aquinas's Quodl. 3.11–12. Later Gerard published a list of 110 false, dangerous, and heretical propositions from the Franciscan pamphlet Manus quae contra omnipotentem attributed to THOMAS OF YORK or Bertrand of Bayonne. Gerard in turn became the object of constant attack from the mendicants, particularly the Franciscans; he replied twice in 1270 to anonymous Franciscan attacks. His last defense, Liber apologeticus, appeared about the middle of July 1270. After his death the controversy relaxed somewhat. Literature directed against Gerard and his supporters has come to be known as contra Geraldinos.

Bibliography: P. GLORIEUX, Répertoire de maîtres en théologie de Paris au XIIIe siècle 1:356–360. P. GLORIEUX, “Les Polémiques contra Geraldinos,” Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 6 (1934) 5–41. G. BONAFEDE, Enciclopedia filosofica 2:664–665. S. CLASEN, “Die Duplex quaestio de Gerhard von Abbeville über den Ordenseintritt Jugendlicher,” Antonianum 22 (1947) 177–200; “Tractatus Gerardi de Abbatisvilla Contra adversarium perfectionis Christianae,” Archivum Franciscanum historicum 31 (1938) 276–329; 32 (1939) 89–200. Y. M. J. CONGAR, “Aspects ecclésiologiques de la querelle entre mendiants et séculiers dans la seconde moitié du XIIIe siècle et le début du XIVe,” Archives d'histoire doctrinale et littéraire du moyen-âge (1961) 35–151.

[A. J. HEIMAN]

GERARD OF BROGNE, ST.

Abbot, monastic reformer; b. Stave, Namur, Belgium, c. 880; d. Brogne Abbey, Oct. 3, 959. His father, Santio, was of noble birth, and his mother, Plectrude, was a sister of Bp. Stephen of Liège. While in the service of Berengar, count of Lomme, Gerard rebuilt an old oratory that was in the freehold of Brogne on the edge of the forest of Marlagne. There he placed the relics of St. Eugene that he had received from Leutger, abbot of Deuil (Seine-et-Oise, France) and from the monks of SAINT-DENIS. The translation took place on Aug. 18, 914, presided over by the Archdeacon Adelhelm, delegated by Bishop Stephen. By an act of June 2, 919, Gerard endowed this church, rededicated to SS. Peter and Eugene, with land and replaced its clerics with monks. In a charter of 923 Gerard himself appears as abbot of the new monastery; some sources say he had meanwhile made his novitiate at Saint-Denis. In 934, while his own rather small monastery was at peace and enjoying prosperity, Gerard was commissioned by Duke Gislebert of Lorraine to restore regular observance of the BENEDICTINE RULE at the Abbey of Saint-Ghislain in Hainaut. Later, at the suggestion of Bishop Transmar of Noyon and Tournai, Arnulf I, Count of Flanders, entrusted Gerard with the reform of the monastery of Saint-Bavon of Ghent (partially rebuilt after 937) and then with Saint-Pierre on Mont-Blandin at Ghent (where Arnulf reserved to himself the confirmation of the abbot elected by the monks) as well as SAINT-BERTIN, SAINT-AMAND-LES-EAUX, and SAINT-REMI in Reims. Soon Gerard's followers reformed SAINT-RIQUIER and the great Norman Abbeys of FONTENELLE (SAINT-WANDRILLE), MONT-SAINT-MICHEL, and SAINT-OUEN in Rouen. In 953 Gerard resigned as abbot of Mont-Blandin and returned to BROGNE. His only concern had been to aid princes in restoring regular observance of the Rule in monastic communities; he had never thought of founding a new congregation. Gerard's reform ideas, derived from BENEDICT OF ANIANE, differed substantially from the CLUNIAN REFORM ideal, of which he must have been ignorant. But he did, in any case, prepare the ground for the great GREGORIAN REFORM. In 1131 Alexander of Juliers, bishop of Liège, delegated by Pope INNOCENT II, elevated the body of Gerard, a ceremony equivalent to canonization. Since the 17th century, Brogne has had the name of Saint-Gerard.

Feast: Oct. 3.

Bibliography: Vita (written 1050–70) Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 15:655–673. Translatio s. Eugenii (written c. 935) Analecta Bollandiana 3:29–54; 5:385–395. Acta Sanctorum Oct. 2 220–320. U. BERLIÈRE, “Étude sur la Vita Gerardi Broniensis,” Revue Benedictine 9 (1892) 157–172. F. BAIX, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 10:818–832. P. SCHMITZ, Histoire de l'ordre de saint-Benoît, 7 v. (Maredsous, Bel. 1942–56) 1:150–151. É. DE MOREAU, Histoire de l'église en Belgique, v.2 (2d ed. Brussels 1945) 142–154. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 4:17–18. J. M. DE SMET, “Recherches critiques sur la Vita G. abbatis B.,” Revue Benedictine 70 (1960) 5–61. J. WOLLASCH, “G. von B. und seine Klostergründung,” ibid 62–82.

[J. DAOUST]

GERARD OF CAMBRAI

Theologian; b. Saxony, c. 975; d. Cambrai, March 14, 1051. After being attached to the imperial chapel and having been named bishop of Arras and Cambrai on Feb. 1, 1012, by Emperor St. Henry II (1002–24), Gerard was ordained at Nijmegen and consecrated at Reims. In loyal feudal service he accompanied Henry on several expeditions and for a while refused to enter a pact with French bishops favoring the Truce of God (see PEACE OF GOD). His relations with Henry's successors were less close. He aided the monastic reform begun in Lotharingia by Gerard of Brogne (d. 959) and turned over to Richard of St. Vanne (d. 1046) some abbeys he and his brothers had supported or founded. In Arras early in 1025 Gerard learned of the arrival of some Cathari-type heretics from Italy. He brought them before a synod there and secured the retraction of their anti-sacramental and anti-ecclesial errors. He sent, with a covering letter, his long discourse and an account of the synod to a Bishop R., who was probably Roger, Bishop of Châlons-sur-Marne (d. 1042). Book 3 of the Gesta episcoporum Cameracensium (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 7.402–498; Patrologia latina 149:21–176) is Gerard's Vita. The Acta of the synod is printed in different editions (Mansi 19:423–460; Patrologia latina 142:1269–1312). Gerard's letters, preserved in the Vita, are reprinted in Patrologia latina 142:1313–22 and 149:159–160.

Bibliography: T. SCHIEFFER, "Ein deutscher Bischof des 11. Jahrhunderts: Gerhard I. von Cambrai (1012–1051)," Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 1 (1937) 323–360. É. DE MOREAU, Histoire de l'Église en Belgique, v.2 La Formation de l'Église médiévale (2d ed. Brussels 1947). H. PLATELLE, Catholicisme 4:1867–68. H. SILVESTRE, "À propos de l'épithaphe de l'évêque de Liège, Durand (+ 1025)," Revue belge de philologie et d'histoire 41 (1963) 1136–45.

[J. N. GARVIN]

GERARD OF CLAIRVAUX, BL.

Second eldest brother of BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX; d. June 13, 1138. He originally refused to follow Bernard into the CISTERCIAN order; but after being wounded in battle, taken prisoner, and miraculously freed as his brother had foretold, he took the monastic habit at CÎTEAUX in 1112. He accompanied Bernard to the foundation of CLAIRVAUX (June 11, 1115), almost abandoned the project because of the difficulties encountered, but remained to fill the office of cellarer until his death. Bernard's lament at his loss, now sermon 26 of the Sermones in Cantica, is one of the most moving tributes to be found in medieval Latin literature.

Feast: June 13 (formerly Jan. 30).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 3:192–195. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, "Sermo XXVI," Sermones in Cantica, Patrologia Latina 183:903–912. J. B. JOBIN, Saint Bernard et sa famille (Paris 1891). R. LECHAT, "Les Fragments de vita et miraculis s. Bernardi," Analecta Bollandiana 50 (1932) 83–122.

[C. H. TALBOT]

GERARD OF CREMONA

Translator from Arabic into Latin; b. Cremona, Italy, c. 1114; d. Cremona, 1187. After completing early studies in Italy, he was attracted by the new learning available in Toledo, which had been recaptured by the Christians in 1085. Under the auspices of Raymond of Sauvetât, Archbishop of Toledo (1126–51), the city became a lively center of scientific studies and translations. By 1134 Gerard was already in Spain, first as a student of Arabic, then as a prolific translator of works that would transform SCHOLASTICISM. Unlike his contemporary DOMINIC GUNDISALVI, he was a translator exclusively.

Ancient catalogues credit him with more than 70 works, although some listed were done by Gerard Sabionetta (13th century). Almost every branch of learning was renewed and reformed because of his translations of ARISTOTLE, some of the Greek commentators transmitted through Arabic, Avicenna, AL-KINDI, ALFARABI, Euclid, and Ptolemy. Among his more important contributions were his translation of Aristotle's Posterior Analytics, with the paraphrase of Themistius; Aristotle's De naturali auditu (Physics), Liber caeli et mundi, De generatione, and Meteora (bks. 1–3); the pseudo-Aristotelian Liber de causis or Liber bonitatis purae (a compilation of extracts from the Elementatio theologica of PROCLUS); Canones medicinae of Avicenna, as well as a substantial part of Avicenna's philosophical work, Shifa; the Almagest of Ptolemy; the best complete translation of Euclid's Elementa geometriae; Alkindi's De intellectu and De quinque essentiis; and Alfarabi's De intellectu. Through these translations the West came to know a new Aristotle and the best of Greek medicine, astronomy, and mathematics that had long been known and developed by the Muslim.

Bibliography: E. H. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (New York 1955) 376–377. G. BONAFEDE, Enciclopedia filosofica (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:665. B. BONCOMPAGNI, Della vita e delle opere di Gherardo Cremonese (Rome 1851). H. BEDORET, "L'Auteur et le traducteur du Liber de causis," Revue néo-scholastique de philosophie 41 (1938) 519–533.

[P. GLORIEUX]

GERARD OF CSANÁD, ST.

Bishop and martyr; b. Sagrado, near Venice, Italy, c. 980; d. Buda (Budapest), Hungary, Sept. 24, 1046. A native of a Slav village in northern Italy, he spent a few years of his youth in the Benedictine Abbey of San Giorgio at Venice and returned as abbot after studies at Bologna. The beginning of the 10th century found him in the hermitage of Bel, Hungary, whence King STEPHEN I of Hungary sought him to tutor his son EMERIC c. 1015–23.

Stephen established the Diocese of Csanád in 1035 and appointed Gerard its first bishop with the task of Christianizing southeastern Hungary. Gerard founded mission parishes, entrusting them to monks from various countries; and at the monastery of Csanád he founded a school where monks were trained to convert the Hungarian tribes. Because of the close relations between the Polish and Hungarian monks and hermits at that time, Gerard was until the last century frequently confused with the famous Polish hermit ZOËRARDUS. All of Gerard's writings are lost except the Deliberatio Gerardi Moresanae episcopi supra hymnum trium puerorum. He was martyred at Buda by the idolatrous opponents of the deceased King Stephen as he was attempting to cross the Danube. In 1333 the Hungarian king sent the major portion of Gerard's relics to Venice, where he is revered as that city's protomartyr.

Feast: Sept. 24.

Bibliography: S. Gerardi scripta et acta, ed. I. BATTHYAN (Karlsburg 1790). Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 1:3424–28. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters (Munich 1911–31) 2:74–83. L. C. DEDEK, Leben des hl. Gerhard (Budapest 1900). J. KARÁCSONYI, Szent Gellért (2d ed. Budapest 1925). A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 3:96–101. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 3:629. J. SZALAY, Catholicisme 4:1868–69. A. L. GABRIEL, "The Conversion of Hungary to Christianity," Polish Review 6.4 (1961) 31–43, esp. 41–42. H. KAPISZEWSKI, "Eremita Swirad w Panonii," Nasza przeszłość 10 (1959) 17–69, esp. 65–68. V. D'AMBROSIO, L'uomo che asservo Satana: S. Gerardo Maria Maiella (Naples 1964). G. SILAGI, Untersuchungen zur "Deliberatio supra hymnum trium puerorum" des Gerhard von Csanád (Munich 1967). G. R. ZITAROSA, San Gerardo Maiella mistico (Naples 1969).

[L. SIEKANIEC]

GERARD OF SAUVE-MAJEURE, ST.

Benedictine abbot; b. near Corbie, France, c. 1025; d. April 5, 1095. Having been a child oblate of CORBIE ABBEY, he was cellarer there by 1050. Shortly thereafter he accompanied Abbot Fulk on a pilgrimage to Monte Cassino and Rome, where both were ordained by Pope LEO IX. Disturbed by bad health, he was cured through the intercession of St. ADALARD, a former abbot, to whom he fostered devotion and whose biography he directed. After a pilgrimage to the Holy Land in 1073, he was called by the monks of Saint-Vincent, Laon, to succeed his recently deceased brother, Raynier, as form abbot. (Some would also identify Gerard with the "Abbot Gerald" of Saint-Médard, Soissons, who lived about this time.) After five years of futile effort to reestablish regular observance at Saint-Vincent, Gerard and two monks from the abbey joined a hermit and his party of five knights, who had originally come to Gerard for advice about a new foundation. On a pilgrimage to Tours the group encountered William VIII, duke of Aquitaine and count of Poitou, who offered them a choice of land for an abbey. On Oct. 28, 1079, they took possession of a forested area, Sauve-Majeure (Silva Major), or Grande-Sauve, just east of Bordeaux, and construction began on May 11, 1081. The foundation, free from all lay feudal control and directly under the Holy See, prospered immediately under Gerard's guidance. A priory at Sémoiy near Orléans was begun in 1081, and an abbey at Broqueroie, Hainaut, Belgium, in 1082. Gerard's cult began almost immediately after his death, and he was canonized by CELESTINE III on April 27, 1197.

Feast: April 5; June 21 (Poitou).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum April 1:407–431. J. MABILLON, Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti, 6 v. (2d ed. Lucca 1739–45) 4:469; 5:100–101, 151–153. ABBÉ CIROT DE LA VILLE, Histoire de l'abbaye . . . de La Grande-Sauve, 2 v. (Paris 1844–45) v.1. R. GAZEAU, Catholicisme 4:1869–70. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 15.2:859–865.

[W. E. WILKIE]

GERARD OF TOUL, ST.

Bishop; b. Cologne, c. 935; d. Toul, France, April 23, 994. Having been a canon in Cologne, he was designated by Abp. Bruno of Cologne to replace Bishop GAUZELIN OF TOUL in 963. Gerard completed there the foundation of Saint-Mansuy Abbey, begun by his predecessor. He erected a convent for women in honor of St. Gengoult, transformed c. 986 into a chapter of canons. The founding of the Maison-Dieu of Toul is also attributed to him. The cathedral consecrated in 981, a vast edifice characteristic of Ottonian art, was rebuilt through his care. His pastoral activity on behalf of parish life is not well known but seems to have been fruitful. His successor at Toul, Bruno of Egisheim, who became Pope LEO IX, arranged for the elevation of Gerard's relics on Oct. 21, 1050.

Feast: April 23.

Bibliography: Bibliotheca hagiographicae latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 1:3431–34. Acta Sanctorum April 3:207–215. A. MICHEL, Die Akten Gerhards von Toul als Werk Humberts und die Anfänge der päpstlichen Reform (Munich 1957). E. MARTIN, Histoire des diocèses de Toul, de Nancy et de Saint-Dié 3 v. (Nancy 1900–03) v.1. P. VIARD, Catholicisme 4: 1870–71.

[J. CHOUX]

GERARD OF VILLAMAGNA, BL.

Hermit; b. Villamagna, near Florence, Italy, c. 1174; d. there, May 13, 1245. Orphaned at an early age, he took service as a page in a knightly Florentine family. As an attendant to his master, he went on CRUSADE (1220–28), was captured by the Saracens, and, after his release, traveled as a pilgrim to Jerusalem. It is possible that he may also be identified with a lay brother of the Knights of Malta named Micaty (Mercatti). After returning to Italy he joined the Third Order of St. Francis and lived as a hermit in his native town. His cult was approved in 1833.

Feast: May 23; May 13 (Florence).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum May 3:247. L. WADDING, Scriptores Ordinis Minorum 5:19. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints 2:378–379. L. BOEHM, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 4:723.

[O. J. BLUM]

GERARD OF YORK

Archbishop of York; d. Southwell, England, May 21, 1108. Gerard was probably a distant relative of England's Norman royal house; one of his uncles was bishop of Winchester, another abbot of Ely; he himself was a resolute supporter of the royal policy, a beneficiary of royal favor and for most of his career lined up as an opponent to Abp. ANSELM OF CANTERBURY. Called from the precentorship of Rouen to serve King WILLIAM II Rufus in chancery and chapel, he was entrusted with a secret mission to Rome in 1095. His success brought him the bishopric of HEREFORD, though he was not yet in deacon's orders. Anselm ordained him deacon and priest and then consecrated him bishop the next day (June 8, 1096). On the accession of King HENRY I of England in 1100, Gerard was made archbishop of YORK, but it was only after a dispute that Anselm issued the necessary letters of confirmation for presentation to the Pope. The rivalry between Henry and Anselm soon permeated the wider issues of the INVESTITURE struggle in England. Church and State, archbishop and king, each presented his case before the Pope. Three prelates, led by Gerard, represented the King, but though Gerard earned Pope PASCHAL II's praise for his able and eloquent presentation of Henry's cause, the verdict was for Anselm. It was conveyed in peremptory letters requiring the King's submission. But on his return Gerard claimed to have secret assurances that these stern demands would not be enforced. The Pope vigorously denied this and excommunicated Gerard and his associates until they had confessed the fraud and made satisfaction. At the same time Gerard was forced to profess canonical obedience to CANTERBURY, though he continued to claim coequality of dignity. This Canterbury-York quarrel over primacy was further embittered when Gerard was ordered (1103) by the King to consecrate three bishops whom Anselm had refused to consecrate on the grounds that they had received investiture from the King. When Gerard attempted to begin the ceremony, it was interrupted, his presence was challenged, and the ceremony broke up in confusion. During Anselm's exile Gerard busied himself in restoring order and discipline in his own extensive province. He received from Pope Paschal a severe rebuke for having supported the king against Anselm, and this may explain Gerard's change of attitude, for he was among those who entreated Anselm to return. And the reconciliation seems to have been complete: Gerard took his place among the prelates who officiated in the long-deferred consecration of bishops (August 1107). His conflict with Anselm and his consistent support of the royal policy made him many enemies; he is charged by the chroniclers with licentiousness, avarice, and the practice of magic. His cortege was pelted with stones on entering York; his canons refused him burial within the cathedral; his body was ignominiously buried outside its walls but later it was interred within the cathedral by one of his successors. Two of his letters are printed among Anselm's correspondence; some mediocre verses written by him are contained in a MS in the British Museum (Cotton, Titus D. xxiv. 3).

Bibliography: RAINE, Fasit Eboracenses, sources. ANSELM OF CANTERBURY, Opera Omnia, ed. F. S. SCHMITT, 6 v. (Edinburgh 1946–61). The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 7:1087–89. R. W. SOUTHERN, Saint Anselm and His Biographer (New York 1963), 35–138.

[J. H. BAXTER]

GERASIMUS, ST.

Famous Palestinian anchorite; b. Lycia, date unknown; d. Palestine, March 5, 475. Gerasimus went on pilgrimage to the Holy Land c. 451 and met St. EUTHYMIUS THE GREAT, who became his fast friend and purged him of the Eutychian (see EUTYCHIANISM) errors that Gerasimus had unwittingly embraced. Disciples flocked to Gerasimus, and in 455 he founded a monastery near the Jordan. He instituted a strict formation program for his followers. At the end of this training, those who preferred the common life remained in the monastery; those desiring solitude lived in hermitages that Gerasimus had built nearby. These hermits spent five days each week in prayer and labor, without fire or food except bread, palm dates, and water. Weekends they had to return to the common life of the monastery.

Gerasimus took only the Eucharist for nourishment during Lent and at all times set his monks a stern example of fasting and poverty. Legend tells how, like Androcles, he removed a thorn from the paw of a lion, which then served him and the monastery until Gerasimus' death.

Confusion of his name with Hieronymus (Jerome) led to the lion being an emblem for St. JEROME.

Feast: March 5.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum March 1:384–387. G. MAR-SOT, Catholicisme 4:1873. H. GRÉGOIRE, “La Vie anonyme de S. Gerasime,” Byzantinische Zeitschrift 13 (1904) 114–135.

[P. W. HARKINS]

GERBERON, GABRIEL

French Benedictine, Jansenist theologian and historian; b. Saint-Chalais, Vendôme, Aug. 12, 1628; d. Paris, March 29, 1711. He studied philosophy under the Oratorians at Vendôme, joined the Benedictines at Rennes, and taught in several monasteries. While stationed at Saint-Germain-des-Prés in Paris, the center of Maurist erudition, he prepared the works of St. Anselm for publication (Paris 1675; Patrologia latina 158–159). This excellent work caused no difficulties. However through this contact with the Church Fathers, the author had acquired a taste for sources and a taste for scholastic thinkers. He was coming closer to the view of the Jansenists, among whom he had friends, and was arousing the mistrust of his superiors. His antiroyalist position made his situation worse. In 1682, he fled to Amiens, settled in the Low Countries, and by 1689 was in Holland. In 1690, he returned to Brussels, where he was in close contact with Arnould and Quesnel. He published many theological, ascetical, and historical works and later prepared a list of them himself. The following are worth mention: Michaelis Baii . . . opera, (Cologne 1694); Lettres de M. Cornelius Jansenius (Cologne 1702); and especially the work published anonymously, Histoire générale du jansénisme (3 v. in 12, Amsterdam 1700). This history, obviously not complete but based on a rich documentation, still deserves to be juxtaposed with Rapin’s.

By their active intervention in the polemical disputes of the Low Countries, Gerberon and his friends aroused the hostility of the bishops. On May 30, 1704, Gerberon was arrested in Brussels, incarcerated, and then condemned on the evidence of his confiscated documents. He was extradited into the hands of French authorities and remained in prison until 1710.

Bibliography: C. FILLIATRE, Gerberon (Paris 1921); “Gerberon: Bénédictin Janséniste du XVII^e Siècle,” Revue historique 146 (1924) 1–54. B. HEURTEBIZE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 6.1:1290–94.

[L. CEYSSENS]

GERBERT VON HORNAU, MARTIN

Liturgist whose collection of medieval music-theory texts, Scriptores ecclesiastici de musica sacra potissimum, opened the way for scholarship in medieval music; b. Horb am Neckar, Germany, Aug. 12, 1720; d. St. Blaise (Schwarzwald), May 13, 1791. He studied philosophy and theology at the Abbey of St. Blaise and there was professed as a Benedictine (1737), ordained (1744), and elected abbot (1764). As abbey librarian he was intrigued by its MS treatises dealing with music theory and history, and thereafter he made extensive researches in France, Switzerland, southern Germany, and Italy, gathering musical and liturgical MSS of the Middle Ages (his Iter Alemannicum, 1765, recounts his travels). He projected a scholarly history of chant and sacred music, but its first printing and almost all his materials were lost in a fire at the abbey in 1768. Finally, in 1774 it appeared in two volumes as De cantu et musica sacra a prima ecclesiae aetate usque ad praesens tempus. The second volume of J. N. Forkel’s Allgemeine Geschichte der Musik borrows heavily from this work. In 1784 Von Hornau issued the three-volume Scriptores . . ., considered one of the greatest single achievements in the monastic tradition. It was continued in Coussemaker’s Scriptorum de musica mediæævi (1864). Von Hornau published also several important liturgical works, such as Vetus liturgia Alemannica (2 v. 1776) and Monumenta veteris liturgiae Alemannicae (2 v. 1777), and anticipated 19th-century church-music reforms by restoring plainchant in his own community. His position as prince-abbot, together with his musicological achievement, engaged him in correspondence and contact with many great personalities of his time, among them G. B. “Padre” MARTINI, J. J. ROUSSEAU, Empress MARIA THERESA, and Pope PIUS VI.

Bibliography: M. GERBERT VON HORNAU, Die Korrespondenz des Fürstbistums, ed. G. PFEILSCHIFTER, 3 v. (Karlsruhe 1931–34). C. GROSSMANN, “Fürstbist M. Gerbert als Musikhistoriker,” Kirchenmusikalisches Jahrbuch 27 (1932) 123–134. F. NIECKS, “Martin Gerbert: Priest, Prince, Scholar and Musician,” Musical Times (1882) 585–588, 646–649. H. HÜSCHEN, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart 4:1783. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d’archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie 6.1:1036–49. B. HEURTEBIZE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 6:1294–96. C. F. POHL, Grove’s Dictionary of Music and Musicians 3:598–599. F. L. HARRISON et al., Musicology (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1963). G. REESE, Music in the Middle Ages.

[I. WORTMAN]

GERBET, OLYMPE PHILIPPE

Philosopher, theologian, bishop, precursor of social Catholicism in France; b. Poligny (Jura), Feb. 5, 1798; d. Perpignan, Aug. 8, 1864. He studied at the Académie and the Grand Seminaire of Besançon, at Saint-Sulpice, and at the Sorbonne, and was ordained in 1822. He was an enthusiastic admirer of Félicité de Lamennais and collaborated with him in L'Avenir until its suppression in 1834; he withdrew from his circle in 1836. Meanwhile, he published several philosophical works. The first of importance, Des Doctrines philosophiques sur la certitude, dans leurs rapports avec les fondements de la théologie (Paris 1826), was a critique of Cartesianism in philosophical explanations of the acquisition of faith. His concern for the social question was evident in two published conferences, each titled Introduction à la philosophie de l'histoire (Paris 1832); anticipating the Communist Manifesto, as it were, he argued that the workers had ended feudalism by their revolutionary activity but had been deprived of the fruits of this victory. He is credited with responsibility for the initial social emphasis of L'Université catholique. In 1839 he went to Rome, where he spent ten years, publishing Esquisse de Rome chrétienne (2 v. Paris 1844–50) and adopting increasingly conservative views. After returning from Rome, he became successively professor of sacred eloquence at the Sorbonne, vicar-general of Amiens, and, in December 1853, bishop of Perpignan. He gave expression to his timidity about social change in essays published in 1850 under the title ‘‘Rapports du rationalisme avec le communisme,’’ in which he was especially apprehensive about the organizational implications of socialism. His episcopate was marked by the holding of a synod, the reorganization of clerical studies, various religious foundations, and above all a famous pastoral instruction of 1860 sur diverses erreurs du temps présent, which pleased PIUS IX and influenced the preparation of his SYLLABUS OF ERRORS.

Bibliography: Oeuvres, 2 v. (Paris 1876). C. DE LADOUÉ, Monseigneur Gerbet: Sa vie, ses oeuvres et l'école menaisienne, 3 v. (Paris 1870). L. FOUCHER, La Philosophie catholique en France au XIXe Siècle (Paris 1955).

[E. T. GARGAN]

GERBILLON, JEAN FRANÇOIS

Second superior general of the French Mission to China, 1700–06; b. Verdun, June 11, 1654; d. Peking, March 22, 1707. He entered the novitiate at Nancy of the Champagne Province of the Society of Jesus on Oct. 6, 1670. Chosen by Father de Fontaney, the superior, to be a member of the first group of French Jesuits sent to China by Louis XIV, he arrived there in July 1687. He gained the esteem of Emperor K'ang-Hsi, lived at the court in Peking, and instructed the emperor in the elements of geometry and philosophy. He was sent by the emperor with Father Tomás PEREIRA to accompany the Chinese ambassadors to Nerchinsk, where in 1689 the first Russo-Chinese peace treaty was concluded. In the negotiations that led up to the signing of the treaty the two Jesuits were interpreters and advisers. Gerbillon, who accompanied the emperor eight times into Tartary, supervised the building and ornamentation of the French Church at Peking. After its completion in 1703 Gerbillon did ministerial work in Peking until his death.

Olympe Philippe Gerbet.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus 3:1346–48. L. PFISTER, Notices biographiques et bibliographiques, 2 v. (Shanghai 1932–34).

[E. HAGEMANN]

GERHARD, JOHANN

German Lutheran theologian; b. Quedlinburg, Oct. 17, 1582; d. Jena, Aug. 17, 1637. Although strongly influenced by the theologian and mystic Johann Arndt, he became one of the staunchest supporters of Lutheran orthodoxy. After completing his studies (philosophy, medicine, and theology) at Wittenberg, Marburg, and Jena, he was appointed superintendent of the churches of Heldburg in the Duchy of Coburg in 1606. He became professor of theology in 1616 at Jena where he remained, despite many calls from other universities, until his death.

He played a prominent role from 1621 to 1630 in directing the unsuccessful work of the movement to develop a supreme tribunal of the Lutheran Church. His theological system, as contained in his Loci theologici (9 v. 1610–22), is the culmination of Lutheran dogma initiated by Melancthon and, as such, the most authoritative work of the age of orthodoxy following the Formula of Concord (1577). His Confessio catholica (four parts, 1634–37) is an extensive apology and polemic of the Evangelical creed, in which an attempt is made to prove the truth of Lutheran doctrine by citing the testimony of Roman Catholic writers. He is noted also for his exegetical and devotional writings.

Bibliography: J. GERHARD and M. CHEMNITZ, The Doctrine of Man in Classical Lutheran Theology, ed. H. A. PREUS and E. SMITS, tr. M. COLACCI et al. (Minneapolis 1962). E. R. FISCHER, Vita I. Gerhardi (Leipzig 1723). F. LAU, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 2: 1412–13. Y. CONGAR, Catholicism: Hier, aujourd'hui et demain 4:1880. H. RENNINGS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 4:724.

[C. J. BERSCHNEIDER]

GERHARDINGER, KAROLINA ELIZABETH FRANCES, BL.

In religious life, Maria Theresia of Jesus, Theresa of Jesus, founder of the School Sisters of Notre Dame; b. June 20, 1797, Stadtamhof (near Regensburg), Bavaria, Germany; d. May 9, 1879, Munich, Bavaria, Germany.

Karolina was the only child of Willibald Gerhardt, a ship master on the Danube, and Frances Huber. She attended the cloister school of the Congregation de Notre Dame until they were forced to disband by government order in 1809. Michael Wittmann, cathedral pastor and later bishop of Regensburg, continued the King's School for Girls with three apprentice teachers, including Karolina. At 15 she received her government certificate and began teaching in the parish school at Stadtamhof. At 18 she told the bishop she would like to become a nun. Only then did he reveal his wish to see founded the kind of religious institute that St. Peter FOURIER had planned but that the Church and the world of the 17th century had been unready to accept—a community of teaching sisters who would not be confined to monasteries and thus could teach in poor villages.

Rev. Matthias Siegart, who was commissioned by Bishop Wittmann to study the new pedagogy pioneered by Pestalozzi, became educational and spiritual director of the new congregation, in which Karolina's "Teresian spirit" flowered and her teaching genius matured. Only in 1833 was she allowed to take her vows, after the state and ecclesiastical authorities were convinced her community could maintain itself. Gerhardt opened the first house in Neunburg vom Wald (Oberpfalz) joined by two other women, Maria Blass and Barbara Weinzierl. They lived a common life in poverty dedicated to the Blessed Virgin Mary, the model for her sisters and young girls. The congregation received episcopal sanction in 1834 and spread quickly to small towns and villages throughout Germany, 13 other European countries, and abroad. In 1843 the mother house was established at Munich in a convent given to them by King Louis Philippe. In 1847, Mother Gerhardt and five sisters migrated to the mountains of Pennsylvania to teach children of German immigrants. Although they were unwelcome there, St. John NEUMANN paved the way for a better reception in Baltimore. In America they endured hunger and other hardships, but nevertheless spread throughout the eastern United States. After two years in the United States Gerhardt returned to Bavaria.

Gerhardt pioneered a new form of religious life. The sisters were sent out in twos or threes so that they could serve in many small communities. Mother Maria Theresia insisted that the sisters be allowed to direct themselves under a central government, rather than being placed under the control of the local bishop, in order to maintain a common spirituality without a physical community life. Although the sisters found opposition to the new concept, the institute was formally recognized by the Vatican in 1854. Pope Pius IX in 1865 approved the constitution which was the first to allow a sister to govern the members of the women's congregation. For the rest of her life she actively fostered the education of girls and oversaw the growth of her community. Pope John Paul II beatified her on Nov. 17, 1985 and named her patron of Christian educators.

Feast: May 9.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 79 (1987): 243–247. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed., no. 47 (1985). F. FRIESS, Life of Reverend Mother Mary Teresa of Jesus Gerhardt (Baltimore 1921). C. GRÖN, Eine Frau steht am Steuer (Munich 1962). M. D. MAST, Through Caroline's Consent (Baltimore 1958). Mother Caroline and the School Sisters of Notre Dame in North America, 2 v. (St. Louis 1928). T. SCHMIDKONZ, Du Gott. Gebets-Meditationen zu Worten von M. Theresia von Jesu Gerhardt (St. Ottilien, Germany 1985). Selige Theresia von Jesu Gerhardt (1797–1879): ein Leben für Kirche und Schule zum 200. Geburtstag . . . (Regensburg 1997).

[M. D. MAST]

GERHOH OF REICHERSBERG

Polemist, Gregorian reformer, statesman, theological writer; b. Polling, Bavaria, 1093–94; d. Reichersberg, June 27, 1169. He studied in Freising and Moosburg and in the school at Hildesheim. Bishop Herman of Augsburg appointed him master of the school in Augsburg and canon of the cathedral, though Gerhoh was only a deacon (1118–19). For years Gerhoh was deeply involved in the turbulent conflicts of the Church and the Holy Roman Empire (see GREGORIAN REFORM), and while still at Augsburg he sided with Pope CALLISTUS II against his simoniacal bishop who favored the imperial party. In 1122, however, Gerhoh was influential in reconciling the bishop to the Pope. After the First LATERAN COUNCIL rejected his proposal for a reform of the clergy based on a communal life for all clergy, Gerhoh withdrew (1124) to the monastery of the CANONS REGULAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE in Rottenbuch. There he immediately became an enthusiastic reformer, making a special journey to Rome with several confreres to obtain a true and complete version of the Rule of St. AUGUSTINE for the monastery. Two years later (1126) Gerhoh left this monastery and went to Regensburg at the request of Bishop Kuno, who ordained him priest. But Church-State conflict there compelled Gerhoh to flee the diocese (1128); at this time he began his literary career with the Liber de aedificio Dei, on reform of canons. After the death of Kuno, he was received into the Church of Salzburg by Archbishop Conrad I. In 1132 Gerhoh was appointed provost of the Austin monastery of Reichersberg, a position he held until his death. A frequent emissary to Rome, Gerhoh came to know BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX. During the schism of 1160, Gerhoh refused to support the imperial papal candidate, antipope Victor IV, and adhered instead to Pope ALEXANDER III. For this he was banned in 1166 by Emperor FREDERICK I and forced to flee his monastery.

Gerhoh's works (many of which are in Patrologia latina 194, 198) deal especially with the reform of the clergy and relations between CHURCH AND STATE. They discuss the validity of Sacraments conferred by excommunicated priests. Gerhoh generally opposed such prescholastics as ABELARD, GILBERT DE LA PORRÉE, PETER LOMBARD, and Folmar; his polemical writings against Abelard and Gilbert caused him often to consider the human nature assumed by Christ (see INCARNATION). His numerous letters are a valuable source of knowledge concerning Church-State relations in his epoch. Gerhoh's lengthiest and most important work, Expositio in Psalmis [ed. D. van den Eynde and A. Rijmersdael (Rome 1955–56)], is a commentary divided into ten parts of unequal length, the fifth part of which is now lost. This work, begun in 1144 or early 1145, and finished in 1169, is full of digressions that often have little connection with the Biblical text but that amount to actual treatises on dogmatic and moral theology, Church discipline, Canon Law, liturgy, and monastic life. Gerhoh borrowed his views on these matters mostly from the writings of his contemporaries RUPERT OF DEUTZ, HUGH OF SAINT-VICTOR, and Bernard. For the commentary itself he depended especially on Augustine, Gregory the Great in the collection of Paterius, and the glosses of Rupert, Gilbert, and ANSELM OF LAON.

Bibliography: Sources. GERHOF OF REICHERSBERG . . . , Libelli selecti, ed. E. SACKUR, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Libelli de lite 3:131–525. Magni presbyteri annales Reicherspergenses, ed. W. WATTENBACH, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptorum 17:490–499. Vita, in Patrologia latina E. MARTÈNE and U. DURAND, Thesaurus novus anecdotorum 193:481–488. E. MARTÈNE and U. DURAND, Thesaurus novus anecdotorum 5:1457–60. Literature. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique Tables générales 1802. D. VAN DEN EYNDE, L'Oeuvre, littéraire de Géroch de Reichersberg (Rome 1957); Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche 2 4:725–726. E. MEUTHEN, Kirche und Heilsgeschichte bei Gerhoh von R. (Leiden 1959).

[C. E. SHEEDY]

GERLACH, ST.

Hermit; b. Houthem, Limburg, Netherlands, c. 1100; d. Houthem, c. 1177. Like most young nobles of his class he was trained in CHIVALRY and knighted, but after the tragic accidental death of his wife, he disposed of his estates and set out as a poor pilgrim for Rome. Pope EUGENE III listened to his story of repentance and approved of his plan to spend seven years in the Holy Land caring for the poor and sick. On his return he sought the permission of the new pope, ADRIAN IV, to allow him to return to his native town and there continue his life of reparation and good works. At Houthem, in a PREMONSTRATIENSIAN habit, he lived as an anchorite in a huge hollow oak tree. His life of mortification and prayer aroused suspicion, and on the rumor that he had gold hidden in his cell some of his critics with episcopal approval razed the oak. Only after his death did his neighbors begin to recognize his virtues, and c. 1200 Goswin IV of Heinsberg-Valkenburg was instrumental in the establishment of a church and hospital at Houthem dedicated to Gerlach. The Premonstratensians claim the saint as one of their own, although at best he could only have been a member of the Third Order by wearing the habit. Pope PIUS IX approved his feast for the Dioceses of Cologne, Liège, and Roermond.

Feast: Jan. 5.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Jan 1:304–321. G. CRIPIO, Vita sancti Gerlaci is summarized in J. LE PAIGE, Bibliotheca Praemonstratensis ordinis (Paris 1633) 496. F. WESSELMAN, Der hl. Gerlach von Houthem (Steyl 1897). F. A. HOUCK, The Life of Saint Gerlach (London 1900). C. DAMEN, Publications de la Société historique dans le Limbourg (Limburg 1956–57) 92; 93:49–113. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 3449.

[L. L. RUMMEL]

GERMAIN, ST.

Germain, St., 6th-century bishop of Paris; b. near Autun, France, c. 496; d. Paris, May 28, 576. Germain became an anchorite early in life, was ordained by Bishop Agrippinus (c. 530), and appointed administrator by Bp. Nectarius of Paris and then abbot of the monastery of St. Symphorian near Autun. In 555 Germain was elected bishop of Paris; during his episcopate he continued to practice the rigorous life he had begun in the monastery as abbot. He presided over the third and fourth Councils of Paris (557 and 573) and attended the second Council of Tours in 566. He was credited with having miraculously restored King Childebert to health; with the monarch's aid he founded the celebrated abbey later known as Saint-Germain-des-Prés. Noted for his charity and learning, Germain befriended SS. Radegunda and Fortunatus and exerted great pressure to bring peace and stable government to the MEROVINGIAN kingdom. The last years of his life were shadowed by the crimes and scandals of Clotaire's sons. In fact he had to excommunicate Charibet as an incorrigible adulterer. Germain died in his 81st year and was buried in the chapel of St. Symphorian in the vestibule of the abbey. In 754 his relics were solemnly moved into the body of the church by Bishop Eligius, in the presence of King Pepin and his son Charlemagne, who was then only a boy of seven. The relics were destroyed in 1795. His vita was written in verse by Venantius FORTUNATUS.

Feast: May 28.

Bibliography: VENANTOUS FORTUNATUS, Vita, ed. B. KRUSCH (Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum 7.1; 1919) 332–428. Analecta Bollandiana 2 (1883) 69–98. A. RODEWYK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg, 1957–66) 4:756–757. O. HOLDER-EGGER, Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde 18 (1893) 274–281. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des jêtes, ed. by the Benedictines of Paris (Paris 1935–56) 5:546–550. Y. CHAUSSY, Catholicisme 4:1885–86. A. WILMART, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 6.1:1049–1102.

[D. KELLER]

GERMAIN OF AUXERRE, ST.

Bishop of Auxerre; b. Auxerre, c. 378; d. Ravenna, July 31, 448. This son of a distinguished Gallo-Roman family received the best education available in Gaul, completed his training in rhetoric and law at Rome, and entered the imperial civil service. In Rome he married a lady of high station. Some time later he was sent to northwestern Gaul (Armorica) as a dux, or military governor. On the death of St. AMATOR, bishop of Auxerre, in 418, he was elected, much against his will, as his successor. Germain adopted an austere way of life and spent his ample private fortune in erecting or endowing churches and monasteries and on works of charity. With St. MARTIN OF TOURS he was the founder of cenobitic monasticism (see CENOBITISM) in Gaul. In 429 he and St. LUPUS OF TROYES were sent by Pope CELESTINE I and the Gallic bishops to combat Pelagianism in Britain; and in 447 he went on a second mission for the same purpose. He felt that an educated clergy was needed to deal effectively with heretics and stressed the formation of clerics in both Britain and Gaul. He went to Arles to plead with the highest Roman authority in Gaul for an alleviation of tax burdens for his people and apparently was successful in obtaining redress. In 448, to prevent government reprisal for a revolt in Armorica, he made the long journey to RAVENNA to seek a pardon from Emperor VALENTINIAN III and his mother, Galla Placidia, who had a strong influence on the young emperor. Germain died there as he was preparing to return to Auxerre. There is a probability that St. PATRICK spent some years at Auxerre and was ordained by Amator and consecrated by Germain. Germain's vita was written by Constantius of Lyons only some 30 years after his death.

Feast: Aug. 3; July 31.

See Also: MARTYROLOGY, ROMAN.

Bibliography: CONSTANTIUS, Vita, ed. W. LEVISON. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum 7.1:1919 225–283. R. BORIUS, ed. and tr. Constance de Lyon: Vie de saint Germain d' Auxerre (Sources Chrétiennes 112; 1965). Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 3453–64. P. VIARD, Catholicisme 4:1882–84. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 3:251–253. W. LEVISON, "Bischof Germanus von Auxerre und die Quellen zu seiner Geschichte," Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde 29 (Hanover 1904) 95–175. St. Germain et son temps (studies pub. by Assoc. Bourguignonne des Sociétés Savantes after its 1948 meeting; Auxerre 1950). M. MIELE, La Vita germani di Costanzo di Lione: realt storica e prospettive storiografiche nella Gallia del quinto secolo (Rome 1996). E. A. THOMPSON, Saint Germanus of Auxerre and the End of Roman Britain (Woodbridge, Suffolk 1984). L. BIELER, The Life and Legend of St. Patrick (Dublin 1949) 93–96, 104–106. P. GROSJEAN, "Notes d'hagiographie celtique," Analecta Bollandiana 75 (1957) 158–175.

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

GERMAINE OF PIBRAC, ST.

Virgin; b. Pibrac, France, 1579; d. there, June 1, 1601. Her mother died when she was eight. Her stepmother hated Germaine, and under the pretense of protecting her own children from scrofula, which Germaine had contracted, forced her to sleep in the stable with the sheep. For most of the rest of her life the shepherdess sufferred the rigors of the seasons and family neglect. Among legendary accounts is one of Germaine's placing her staff on the ground while she attended daily Mass, her sheep remaining unharmed in a wolf-infested area. Extraordinary incidents and the girl's unusual patience and kindness brought respect and reverence from derisive villagers. Her stepmother relented also, and shortly before Germaine's death permitted her to rejoin the family. However, Germaine preferred the solitude of the stable, where she died. In 1644 when Germaine's grave was opened to receive another corpse, her body was incorrupt. The movement for beatification, interrupted by the French Revolution, was later resumed. In 1854 PIUS X proclaimed her blessed and in 1857, a saint.

Feast: June 15.

Bibliography: H. GHÉON, St. Germaine of the Wolf Country, tr. F. J. SHEED (London 1932). A. STOLZ, The Life of St. Germana, tr. N. GROTH (Little Falls, Minn. 1936).

[C. LYNCH]

GERMANIC RELIGION

The sources for the study of the religion and mythology of the old Germanic (Teutonic) peoples are few. They consist chiefly of Greek, Roman, and medieval writings, runic inscriptions, folklore, laws, and the vitae of early missionaries. The Germania of Tacitus is especially important as a source. It took more than 700 years, from the 4th century in the South (Gothi) to the end of the 10th century in the North (Scandinavia), to displace the pagan Germanic religion by Christianity, and some superstitions continued to flourish much longer. Despite the progressive differentiation in language and customs that developed among the many Germanic tribes in the course of centuries, there are many religious traits shared by all.

Gods and Forms of Worship. From the earliest times the Germani believed in a number of gods in anthropomorphic form. Although there was no uniform cult among the various tribes, many of the same deities seem to have been known to all tribes. The central figure of the cult, taking the highest place among all gods, was Wodan, the All-Father, the Scandinavian Odin. After him came Donar, the North Germanic Thor. Another important deity was Tiu or Ziu (Alemannic Zistac), the Nordic Týr. Next to these male deities was Freya, Wodan's wife, the Scandinavian Frigga. The names Tiu, Wodan, Thor, and Freya are preserved in our days of the week: Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday.

The forms of worship for these and many other deities were prayers, and sacrifices of fruit, animals, and even human beings. The Germani first worshipped under the open sky in forests and groves and later, under Roman influence, in houses and temples. Unlike the Celts, they had no special class of priests. Nevertheless, because of the intimate relationship of state, law, and religion, priests enjoyed great prestige and exercised much power; they directed the sacrifices and consulted the oracles in public assemblies.

Minor Divinities and Spirits. Common to all tribes was the primitive belief in the magic power of nature and of the spirits of the dead. Almost every natural element was personified, given human or animal form, and worshipped as a divinity. Among the unfriendly divinities were the giants of the mountains, the nixes and nixies, or water sprites, the kobolds or trolls of house and cave, the elves of the wind, the brownies of the field, the mermen and mermaids of the sea, the dwarfs under the earth, and many other demon-like creatures. Friendlier divinities or supernatural beings of lower degree were the Norns (the Norse Fates), the Valkyries (Choosers of the Slain), and numerous other familiar and attendant spirits.

According to Germanic cosmogony, in the beginning there was an original profound abyss, out of which first came Niflheim (frozen reaches), Muspellsheim (arid reaches), and then finally the giants, gods, and ultimately men. In Norse eschatology, the stars will fall from heaven, the earth will sink into the ocean; and in a bloody battle all gods, giants, and men will perish in flames, but a new and better world will be born out of the ashes.

Bibliography: D. E. M. CLARKE and N. KERSHAW, Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics ed. J. HASTINGS (Edinburgh 1908–27) 12:246–259. A. CLOSS, Christus und die Religionen der Erde: Handbuch der Religionsgeschichte, ed. F. KÖNIG (Vienna 1961) 2:267–366. G. DUMÉZIL, Mythes et dieux des Germains (Paris 1939). M. BOUCHER, “Les Germains,” in Histoire des religions, ed. M. BRILLANT and R. AIGRAIN (Paris 1953–56) 5:135–199. E. TONNELAT, “La Religion des Germains,” “Mana”: Introduction à l'histoire des religions (Paris 1944—) 2.3:321–385. C. CLEMEN, ed., Fontes historiae religionis Germanicae (Bonn 1928). R. MUCH, Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA, et al. (Stuttgart 1893—) 3:579–585. W. BAETKE, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 2:1432–40. J. DE VRIES, Altgermanische Religionsgeschichte (Berlin 1956–58).

[C. SELMER]

GERMANUS I, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE, ST.

Patriarchate 715–730, Mariologist and controversialist; b. Constantinople, c. 634. His father, Justinian, of a noble family, was a favorite of Emperor HERACLIUS (610–641) but lost favor with succeeding emperors and was executed for conspiracy in 668. Germanus was made an eunuch and forced to join the clergy of HAGIA SOPHIA, where he gradually rose to a leading position. He exercised great influence on the Emperor CONSTANTINE IV in the convocation of the Ecumenical Council of CONSTANTINOPLE III (681), which condemned MONOTHELITISM.

Germanus was appointed to the metropolitan See of Cyzicus c. 706, but was accused of yielding to the threats of Emperor Philippicus and of signing the Monothelite decrees of a synod in 712. He was made patriarch of Constantinople on Aug. 11, 715, by the Orthodox Emperor Anastasius II and in the same year rejected Monothelism in a local synod. Germanus was deposed c. 730 for his opposition to Emperor Leo III's (the Isaurian) edict favoring ICONOCLASM. He later wrote his only extant historical work (many of his works were destroyed by iconoclastic emperors), De haeresibus et synodis, treating of the major heresies from Simon Magus to the iconoclasm of his own day. He was posthumously condemned by the iconoclastic synod of 754, and his name was erased from the diptychs, but it was finally reinstated by the seventh ecumenical council (787). Three of his "dogmatic" letters controvert iconoclasm and are cited in the decrees of the eighth ecumenical council; the fourth letter, Ad Armenos, defends the Council of CHALCEDON. He is credited with nine homilies, seven witnessing the development of Marian doctrines.

Feast: May 12.

Bibliography: Germano di Capua: ambasciatore ecumenico a Costantinopoli e modello di santità per il Cassinate (Venafro, Isernia 1999). L. LAMZA, Patriarch Germanos I. von Konstantinopel (Würzburg 1975). Patrologia Graeca 98:39–454. F. CAYRÉ, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1903–50) 6.2:1300–09. B. ALTANER, Patrology (New York 1960) 634–635. F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 552.

[F. DE SA]

GERMANUS II, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

1222 to 1240; b. Anaplai (Propontis), c. 1175; d. Constantinople, 1240. As a deacon of HAGIA SOPHIA, he took refuge in the monastery of St. George of Achyranus during the Latin siege of Constantinople in 1204. The Emperor JOHN III Ducas Vatatzes had him elected patriarch in 1222. Following the fall of Constantinople to the Latins (1204) the Byzantine Empire was in danger of being split into many independent principalities; that fate threatened the Byzantine Church. Germanus attempted to prevent such schisms, and wrote to Pope GREGORY IX with a view toward union of the Churches. At the instigation of the emperor, he received envoys from Rome at Nicaea in 1231, but soon concluded to the impossibility of an understanding. In Cyprus he favored the conciliating attitude of Archbishop Neophytus, which caused difficulties between 1229 and 1231. He recognized the title of patriarch of the Bulgarians assumed by the archbishop of Trnovo in 1235, but would not concede that the Bulgarian Church should become autocephalous. He worked for reunion with the Armenians, but his death prevented a successful conclusion. He was buried in the monastery of Kyriotissa in Nicaea. Of his writings, many still unedited, those dealing with the azymes, purgatory, and the filioque display an anti-Latin feeling; but his letters and homilies testify to his zeal and pastoral care; and he may have been the author of some poetry.

Bibliography: GERMANUS II, Homiliae, Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1857–66) 140:621–751; Orationes, ibid. 98:221–384. K. BAUS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:754–755. J. A. FRABRICIUS and C. C. HARLES, Bibliotheca Graeca, 12 v. (4th ed. Hamburg 1790–1809) 9:162. M. RONCAGLIA, Les Frères mineurs et l'Église orthodoxe au XIII^e siècle (Cairo 1954). D. M. NICOL, The Despotate of Epiros (Oxford 1957).

[P. JOANNOU]

GERMANUS OF MÜNSTER-GRANFELDEN, ST.

Abbot; b. Trier, c. 610; d. Feb. 21, 675. Son of a senator and reared, after his father's death, by St. Modoald, bishop of Trier (d. c. 640), Germanus first became a disciple of St. ARNULF OF METZ. He later transferred from Arnulf's monastery at REMIREMONT to LUXEUIL, whose abbot, St. Walbert (d. c. 668), recommended him to Duke Gondo, who was seeking an abbot for a new monastery founded at Münster-Granfelden. Germanus ruled the abbey for 35 years. He vigorously opposed the oppression of the peasants by Boniface, Gondo's brother and successor. Boniface murdered Germanus and his companion Randoald c. 675. Germanus's relics, along with his crosier, are preserved in the parish church of Helsingberg.

Feast: Feb. 21.

Bibliography: Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Germanicarum 5:25–40. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 3467. Acta Sanctorum Feb3:266–269. A. REIS, Moutier-Grandval (Biel 1940). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 1:385. G. HASELOFF, "Der Abtsstab des hl. G.," Germania 33 (1955) 210–235. R. MOSSBRUGGER, Ur-Schweiz 20 (1956) 54–60. S. KOFFER, La crosse merovingienne de Saint Germain, premier abbé de Moutier-Grandval (Porrentruy 1996).

[M. B. RYAN]

GERMANY, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Located in western Europe, the Federal Republic of Germany is bordered on the north by the Baltic Sea and Denmark, on the northeast by the North Sea, on the east by Poland and the Czech Republic, on the southeast by Austria, on the southwest by Switzerland and France, and on the west by Luxembourg, Belgium and the Netherlands. Containing a wealth of natural resources—coal, lignite, salt, natural gas, iron ore and other minerals—as well as some of the most beautiful forests and meadows, Germany is also the wealthiest nation in western Europe. Heavily industrialized, its exports include electronics, automobiles, chemicals, optical and scientific instruments, and pharmaceutical products. With its fertile soil, Germany also produces agricultural crops of potatoes, sugar beets, wheat, barley and grapes, the last of which provides the basis for another of the country's chief exports: wine.

The following essay is in four parts. The first part treats the history of the Catholic Church in Germany from the period of Christian origins to 1500, the second from 1500 to 1789, the third from 1789 to 1900, and the fourth from 1900 to the present.

From the Beginnings to the Reformation

Throughout its early history, Germany and the Teutonic tribes of its traditional territory were subjected to a variety of influences from the civilizations to the south.

The Roman Period. From 58 to 38 B.C. Julius Caesar and then Agrippa forced the Germanic Ubii tribes west of the Rhine, resulting in the colonization of that area by Germans and remnant Celtic peoples. A similar situation occurred in the area of the confluence of the Rhine and the Main. Military conquests Romanized the new provinces of Belgica, Germania inferior ("Lower Rhine") and Germania superior ("Upper Rhine"), as well as the newly won provinces south of the Danube, Raetia and Noricum. To these were added the Agri Decumates, protected by the limes running from the Rhine to the Danube. Like other parts of the Roman Empire, these provinces were now opened to Christianity, which, in the period of peace and prosperity following the 2d century, gained a scattered foothold in the larger settlements through the efforts of merchants and soldiers from Lugdunum.

By the end of the 3d century there were bishops in the imperial city of Trier, and at the beginning of the 4th century in Cologne (probably also in Mainz and Augsburg). The flowering of Christianity after the Church attained her freedom (313) is seen in the participation of Capital: Berlin.

Size: 138,000 sq. miles.
Population: 82,797,408 in 2000.
Languages: German.
Religions: 31,463,015 Catholics (38%), 1,407,555 Muslims (1.7%), 30,975,440 Protestants (38%), 75,000 Jews (.01%), 900,000 Orthodox (1%), 17,976,398 other or without religious affiliation.

the bishops of Worms, Speyer, Strassburg, Augst (Basel), Metz and Tongeren in the synods of the later Arian period; the mention of bishops from Noricum by Athanasius; the erection of churches (St. Severin, St. Gereon, St. Ursula in Cologne); and in numerous archeological finds (bowls and gold glasses with Christian symbols and inscriptions). The creation of a metropolitan organization (COLOGNE, TRIER, MAINZ, MILAN and AQUILEIA) can only be conjectured; but the center of missionary activity was probably Trier. The migrations of the 5th century were indeed a catastrophe for these areas had apparently been completely Christianized. The succession of bishops for Mainz, Augsburg, and other cities was broken, but small Christian communities somehow managed to survive.

Christianization of Germanic Tribes. The Romanized Germans of these provinces were opposed to the independent pagan tribes of Germania Magna, which, after the ALAMANNI had breached the limes, had been moving to the southeast since the 3d century. These wandering tribes, by penetrating farther into the Roman Empire, could not, in the long run, avoid the strong influence of Christianity and its culture. The first contact of Christianity with these tribes was with the VISIGOTHS in connection with the border fighting along the Lower Danube. At Nicaea a Gothic bishop, Theophilus, signed the council's decrees. After 341 ULFILAS, Bishop of the Goths, led his people to Christianity in its Arian form, because the Visigoths were at that time allies of an Arian emperor.

This superficial form of ARIANISM was retained by the Visigoths in Spain, from whom it spread to the other Germanic tribes, the Ostrogoths (see GOTHs), Suevi, VANDALS, LOMBARDS and Burgundians. These tribes looked upon Arianism as a national characteristic, in opposition to the Catholic faith of the natives of conquered countries, and stressed their variant outlook on Church-State relations, rather than their theological differences. From the beginning, the king ruled the Church among the Germans, and Church property remained under landlords (see PROPRIETARY CHURCHES). Whereas THEODORIC THE GREAT was, in general, tolerant toward Catholics in the Ostrogothic kingdom, they were subjected to bloody persecution in the Vandal kingdom of Africa. However, both the Ostrogoth and Vandal states disappeared by the mid-

Metropolitan Sees	Suffragans
Bamberg	Eichstätt, Speyer, Würzburg
Berlin	Dresden-Meissen, Görlitz
Cologne	Aachen, Essen, Limburg, Münster, Trier
Freiburg im Breisgau	Mainz, Rottenburg-Stuttgart
Hamburg	Hildesheim, Osnabrück
Munich and Freising	Augsburg, Passau, Regensburg
Paderborn	Erfurt, Fulda, Magdenburg.

A military ordinariate is also located in Germany.

dle of the 6th century, the Visigoths and Lombards became Catholic c. 600, and by 532 the Burgundians were forced to accept the domination of the Catholic FRANKS.

By the end of the 5th century, the last shreds of Roman authority in Catholic Gaul were eliminated by the Franks. The baptism of CLOVIS (498?) quickly heralded that of the nobility, whereas the people were not thoroughly Christianized until probably the 7th century. Thus the German conquerors and their Roman subjects in the Frankish kingdom were for the first time of one faith, greatly facilitating their merger into one people and making Clovis, in the eyes of Catholics living under Arian rule, the champion of the Church. Also by virtue of this merger, the uninterrupted blending of the culture of late antiquity with German folk custom was made possible. The Frankish kingdom thus became the means of fusing the various tribes, which were henceforth to be held together by the bond of their common Catholic faith and ancient Christian culture. Accordingly, Burgundians, Visigoths and Suevi were quickly incorporated into Frankland, whose Church, to be sure, was forced to serve the political purposes of the nobility in the 8th century. The other great tribes—Alamanni, Bavarians, Thuringians and Saxons—came under the influence of Christianity after the conversion of the Franks as a result of Frankish conquest and missionary activity. So, in the case of the Alamanni after the loss of their political freedom, the estates of the king and of the Frankish nobility became Christian strongholds, and the ties of Alamannic magnates with the Frankish court occasioned many conversions. But the native missionary strength of the Frankish national Church, entirely dependent on the king, was quickly exhausted by upheavals from within the dynasty.

Nevertheless, the Merovingian court, as well as Austrasian Metz, became the base and starting point for Celtic and other missionaries. It was especially due to COLUMBAN, GALL and later PIRMIN that the mission to the Alamanni in the 7th century succeeded, leading to their conversion. The famous foundations of SANKT GALLEN, REICHENAU and others provided access to Christian culture and educational centers for these new converts. A Frankish migration to the area of the Main followed upon the conquest of the Thuringian kingdom in 531. The mission to this people reached its peak in the 7th century through the efforts of KILIAN, and c. 700, the East Frankish kingdom was definitively won over to Christianity. When the Bavarians entered the area bearing their name in the early 6th century, they were exposed to the strong influence of the native Roman Christian population. Nevertheless, only after they had lost political independence to the Franks was the tribe fully converted, through the efforts of Frankish (RUPERT) and Celtic (EMMERAM and CORBINIAN) missionaries. But the Church was not fully organized until the time of St. BONIFACE, the “apostle of Germany.”

The completion of the mission and the organization of the Church in Germany begun by other ANGLO-SAXON missionaries was due primarily to the efforts of Boniface. The well-organized Anglo-Saxon mission among the various Germanic tribes on the Continent marked Willibrord as the apostle of the Frisians and Winfrid-Boniface as the apostle of Germany. Having worked independently in Hesse and Thuringia since 721, Boniface declared his allegiance to the pope, and according to his native custom, sought support for his work from civil authority, viz, the Frankish mayor of the palace. As archbishop and as papal legate for Germany, he created the diocesan organization that still exists in Bavaria (Freising, Passau, Regensburg, Salzburg); founded the Sees of Buraburg, Erfurt and Eichstätt; and revised Würzburg. Newly founded monasteries (e.g., FULDA) were the first centers of mission activity, and convents (e.g., Lioba) became the first institutions for the Christian education of women. As a reformer of the Frankish Church, Boniface fought SECULARIZATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY, COMMENDATION and lay control, as well as the moral degradation of bishops and priests in the Merovingian kingdom. In numerous synods, both local and general, he worked for the restitution of CHURCH PROPERTY and the establishment of the metropolitan system, but was only partly successful. On the other hand, he was able to bring the Church, entirely dependent on sectional chieftains, into closer union with Rome at the general synod of 747, and accustomed the Frankish mayors to this association with the pope.

While Boniface’s role in the anointing of PEPIN may be doubted, the participation of his disciple BURCHARD OF WÜRZBURG in the legation to Rome that negotiated the change of authority with the pope was significant. With unselfish dedication Boniface led the mission territories to independence, revived the Frankish Church and made further efforts of foreign missionaries more or less superfluous, since the Franks themselves were henceforth capable of converting the last of the German tribes, the Saxons. This had been planned by Boniface as a later objective and had already been unsuccessfully attempted by several skilled missionaries. After 30 years of military campaigns and the preaching of the faith, the Saxons finally entered the Carolingian Empire and the Catholic Church when national-pagan opposition lost its leader through the baptism of WIDUKIND. Henceforth this territory could be organized with the help of sponsoring bishoprics and abbeys. Thus c. 800, no less than eight sees were successively established (Bremen, soon thereafter transferred to Hamburg, Verden, Minden, Paderborn, Münster, Osnabrück, Halberstadt and Hildesheim). While these new bishoprics coincided with the territory of the various Saxon tribes, the organization of dioceses in older areas generally conformed to boundaries established in the Roman period, with the exception of Windisch, which disappeared in the south, and Constance, the largest German bishopric, which came into existence in the early 7th century. Parishes with baptismal rights also began gradually to make their appearance.

Cologne Cathedral, c. 1870, Cologne, Germany. (Hulton/Archive Photos)

The Church in the Carolingian and Ottonian Empires. Merovingian royal control of the Church, which the Frankish king had based on Old Testament authority, and the union with Rome created by Boniface, were the foundations upon which CHARLEMAGNE, son of Pepin III, built the Church of the empire (Reichskirche). As king he had already assumed the task of expanding missions to the Saxons and to the Slavs on the upper Main and in the Alps, defending the faith against Arabs and Avars, and restoring and ordering the internal administration of the Church and the development of its cultural activities. Besides establishing bishoprics, he also completed the metropolitan system (Mainz, Cologne, Trier and Salzburg). Under his son Louis the Pious, Bremen-Hamburg would also become an archdiocese. The position of bishops was strengthened when Charlemagne ordered regularly held diocesan synods and employed the bishops as his missi dominici. He himself presided at imperial synods that made decisions on dogmatic questions, such as the FILIOQUE and the veneration of IMAGES. A passion for order prompted him to unify the LITURGY and monastic observance. Using his father's plans, Louis would make the BENEDICTINE Rule mandatory for the empire.

Above all Charlemagne interested himself in furthering the spiritual life and the education of both clergy and people. By numerous CAPITULARIES, he provided for sermons, Sunday observance and the erection of CATHEDRAL, MONASTIC and parish schools. The policies of Charlemagne's long administration, permeated with ideas dedicated to the advance of culture, created the "Empire of the West," over which he presided after his coronation as emperor in 800, crowned by Pope Leo III. Prescinding from Charlemagne's personal interpretation of his office, his crowning meant not only the revival of the ROMAN EMPIRE and the dawning of the Middle Ages, but also the opportunity for him and his successors to influence the occupancy of the Roman See by confirming the election of the pope. For centuries to come, this coronation also made Germany the intellectual center of Europe and the heartland of the Church. But this event likewise caused Germany, in the following centuries, to be more deeply involved in theoretical controversies and armed conflicts over the relationship between Church and empire, pope and emperor.

The spiritual unity of the West revealed the flourishing cultural life of Charlemagne's realm, and, despite later Carolingian decline, also that of his successors. It is possible to speak of a CAROLINGIAN RENAISSANCE, even though it was hardly a creative and artistic impulse, but was rather a movement that, following the example of antiquity, confined itself to organization and collection. The court school at AACHEN and the monastic school of TOURS, under the supervision of ALCUIN, were the training grounds for generations of officials and ecclesiastical dignitaries. Here they learned classical Latin, the intellectual tool needed for their profession and also for literary work. In the academic circle of Aachen, scholars gathered from all corners of the vast empire. In his Vita Caroli magni, EINHARD produced the model historical biography. RABANUS MAURUS, Abbot of Fulda and Archbishop of Mainz, made the accumulated knowledge of his century accessible to his contemporaries in great anthologies. Living in the monasteries, surrounded by valuable libraries that had been enriched by copies of ancient works produced in their own SCRIPTORIA, were Otfrid of Weissenburg, the author of a Gospel harmony; the poet and liturgist WALAFRID STRABO, at Reichenau; and among the recently converted Saxons, the author of the HELIAND—the most significant work in the German language of that early Christian period. In theology also, the first independent attempts were made to present and defend the Augustinian theory on PREDESTINATION and to settle the controversies that had risen over the EUCHARIST (GOTTSCHALK OF ORBAIS). In Church architecture, the new form of early Romanesque came under German influence (Aachen, Seligenstadt).

While Germany's contribution to liturgy and art may be considered important, its impact on the youthful Church in the area of law was even more significant. The mentality of this era was primarily realistic and intuitive. Abstract intellectual concepts could be grasped only after lengthy and involved discussions. Thus, when a church was established, emphasis was placed, not on the singular blessings attached to the new location, but on the rights of the owner of the foundation and its property. Similarly with Church appointments, it was not so much the spiritual duties of the office that were of importance as the associated benefices and the investment with rights of office. Church property, which accumulated as a result of numerous donations, was considered a special kind of crown property, to be used by the king only in time of need. The old view of a society divided by class distinctions determined at birth was carried into the Church. The most prestigious monasteries accepted only the highest nobility, and bishops were increasingly chosen only from this class. With this practice, imperial influence grew, especially in the northwest. This influence of the king seemed justifiable, since bishops and prelates, as the administrators of sizable fiefs, were gradually endowed also with political responsibility and sovereignty.

Speyer Cathedral, c. 1030, Speyer, Germany. (©Carmen Redondo/CORBIS)

The first climax of this development was reached in Germany under King OTTO I. In his struggle against the centrifugal tendencies of the hereditary duchies, Otto won the solid support of bishops and abbots. He generously invested them with royal prerogatives (REGALIA), particularly with the title and dignity of counts, entrusted them with important offices of the realm, and demanded execution of clearly defined economic and military obligations. Among the German hierarchy were a number of outstanding personalities distinguished in the affairs of both Church and State who were able to harmonize their secular and ecclesiastical functions. Nevertheless, this double role of the lords spiritual—who actually became territorial princes by the 13th century and remained such until the Reformation, and in some cases, down to the secularization of 1803—brought with it dangers and conflicts. Despite the possibility of the effectual cooperation of both authorities, to the mutual interest of Church and State, the danger continued. Both Episcopal INVESTITURE with secular possessions and sovereign rights, and the concomitant feudalization of Church property resulted from the bestowal by the king of the symbols of spiritual power: the staff and, after HENRY III, also the ring. Such investitures were not only indicative of proprietary Church law and feudal sovereignty, but also, in the light of the theories of uniformity current in the period, seemed to deny the independence of spiritual authority and to derive that authority from royal prerogative, thus making the Church dependent upon the crown.

St. Hedwig's Cathedral, Berlin. (©Eye Ubiquitous/CORBIS)

For years no one raised an objection to this situation. Otto I, who had saved Germany from the pagan Hungarian invasion of 955, revived the empire in 962 and consciously identified it with the German nation. With the new responsibility of an anointed and consecrated ruler, he and his successors frequently freed the papacy from the ignominious control of the factional Roman nobility (see CRESCENTII; TUSCULANI). While papal authority had declined, the preeminence of the emperor increased, evidenced by numerous imperial appointments of popes. Nevertheless, the Ottos and Henry III chose only worthy men. But such intervention seemed to give the appearance of dominance over the See of Peter and brought about a canonically oriented reaction against the institution of the proprietary Church and the inveterate practice of lay investiture.

The High Middle Ages. The Salian imperial house, which had recently led the CLUNIAN REFORM in Germany to victory, now witnesses a sudden outbreak of hostilities. The PAPAL ELECTION decree of 1059, by failing to mention the emperor's right of nomination, sparked the struggle, which smoldered until the days of GREGORY VII and the autocratic intervention of HENRY IV in Milan. The general investiture prohibition, decreed in 1075 for the reestablishment of "proper order" in the world, represented, in fact, a revolutionary attack on the foundations of the German empire. Its political structure was shaken and the source of the emperor's military and financial power was mortally threatened. The conflict between the two legal concepts and the empire's concern for survival explain the extreme bitterness of both sides in the INVESTITURE struggle. The undignified attitude of Henry hindered his party from reaching a peaceful compromise. The reform monasteries (e.g., HIRSAU) vigorously defended the papacy, whereas the bishops, with few exceptions, supported the emperor. Only after numerous defeats on both sides (the deposition of Gregory, the excommunication of Henry and his submission at Canossa) was the struggle provisionally settled in the Concordat of WORMS (1122). During the conflict both sides had learned to distinguish the secular from the religious elements involved and to assign them their respective officers.

The investiture controversy had thrust the anointed king into the secularized world, even though the age of St. BERNARD would again show how in practice the papacy and the empire could be harmonized. It is not surprising, therefore, that the Hohenstaufen attempted to trace kingship back to antiquity, whereas the popes continued to cling to the constitutional significance of coronation as performed by them. This opposition, strengthened by the problem of the enduring bond between the Sicilian crown and the empire, caused the controversy between the two supreme powers to flare up once again. In less than a centure the struggle reached such uncontrolled dimensions under FREDERICK II and INNOCENT IV that it could be concluded only by the exhaustion of one of the factions. It ended with the fall of the Hohenstaufen. The dependence of the papacy on France, which followed the victory, strengthened the religious estrangement of the German Empire from the Curia. In the course of the AVIGNON PAPACY, a double imperial election led to new controversies. During the imperial interregnum, JOHN XXII claimed the right to administer the empire in Italy and to intervene decisively in the controversy over the throne. The victorious LOUIS IV, the Bavarian, was excommunicated and extensive areas of Germany were placed under interdict. As a national reaction grew against the excessive demands of the Curia, the German imperial election was made legally independent of the papacy at the Electoral Diet of Rhense in 1338 (Golden Bull, 1356).

In spite of these controversies between Church and State, the German Church remained strong. Beginning in the Carolingian period, evangelization was vigorously pursued. Christianity spread from Germany into the north, to Denmark, Sweden and Iceland; in the east to the Avars; and especially from Regensburg to the Moravians and Bohemians; from Passau it spread to Hungary; and from Salzburg to the Carentanians (Slovenes). The Diocese of Bamberg, founded by HENRY II, oversaw the evangelization of the Wends along the Main and Regnitz. The mission to the Slavs on the Elbe (Wends), whose racial animus and love of freedom constituted great obstacles, was carried out by the Archdiocese of Magdeburg, founded by Otto I, but would not be successful until after the crusade against them in the Hohenstaufen period, when the Dioceses of Merseburg, Naumburg-Zeitz and Meissen were established. Like Havelberg, Brandenburg and Lübeck, founded earlier, these dioceses, too, came under the jurisdiction of Magdeburg. OTTO OF BAMBERG was occupied with the conversion of the Pomeranians, while the Prussians and Lithuanians were Christianized principally through the efforts of the TEUTONIC KNIGHTS. Since the Second Crusade, the German rulers led CRUSADES for over a century, and both secular and religious princes participated enthusiastically and in great numbers.

The religious orders in Germany played a significant role in sustaining cultural and religious life. Among the monasteries, the most outstanding were SANKT EMMERAM in Regensburg, CORVEY, WERDEN and TRIER. The reforms of GORZE and HIRSAU eventually included almost all the German Benedictine monasteries. The CISTERCIANS and the MENDICANT orders spread quickly throughout Germany. Efforts to reestablish common life among priests led to numerous organizations of CANONS REGULAR, the best known of which were the PREMON-

Kaiser-Wilhelm-Gedächtniskirche, Berlin. (©Vanni Archive/CORBIS)

STRATENSIANS, founded by NORBERT OF XANTEN. Cistercians and Premonstratensians earned special recognition for colonizing and developing the north and the northeast. In the north, foundations of canonesses soon surpassed the convents of Benedictine sisters. Throughout Germany the great martial and charitable efforts of the MILITARY ORDERS were supported by donations and volunteers. In the flourishing cities, the mendicant orders were intensively active in the care of souls (see DOMINICANS; FRANCISCANS). They successfully guided the POVERTY MOVEMENT, threatened by heresy and radicalism, back into the fold of the Church (Tertiaries). Thus, along the Rhine and in southern Germany, heretical tendencies were easily contained by preaching and religious instruction. The convents, especially the numerous houses of DOMINICAN SISTERS, became outstanding schools and centers of mysticism. The mendicants succeeded the Benedictines, among whom special mention should be made of NOTKER LABEO and HERMANNUS CONTRACTUS, as the leaders in ecclesiastical learning. ALBERT THE GREAT won for the philosophical thought of emerging SCHOLASTICISM its earliest universal recognition. His circle of students and the Dominican general house of studies at Cologne, where Albert the Great, THOMAS AQUINAS and Meister ECKHART lectured, gave direction to the new philosophy and theology. From the beginning, the young universities of PARIS and BOLOGNA attracted German students in great numbers. In 1348 CHARLES V founded the first German university at Prague and within the next two generations six others were established.

Cologne Cathedral, with twin Gothic spires standing unscathed among war-damaged buildings. (©Hulton/Archive Photos)

As a counterpart to the scholastic summae (see SENTENCES AND SUMMAE), German artistic skill in adopting Gothic style created magnificent cathedrals and churches, with a wealth of sculpture and brilliant windows. Since the days of the Hohenstaufen, a lay culture developed side by side with clerical education, often outspokenly critical of the Church (e.g., Walter von der Vogelweide).

The Pre-Reformation Crisis. During the WESTERN SCHISM almost all of Germany stood behind the Roman popes. The efforts of Emperor SIGISMUND on behalf of the Council of CONSTANCE led to the end of division within the Church. The Council of BASEL was recognized in Germany until 1438, but after a period of neutrality the emperor and the electors gave their support to EUGENE IV, who, in turn, agreed to at least some of the German demands to limit papal patronage and financial exactions (see GRAVAMINA). The Concordat of Vienna (1448) remained in force until the secularization of 1803. In the following decades, emperors and popes frequently shared the same political views. In contrast to France, Germany no longer officially promoted the tenets of CONCILIARISM.

On the other hand, while true reform of the Church was recognized as a necessity, the reform councils proved too weak to carry it out. The concordats with various princes settled only a few of the problems while creating others. The reform programs of outstanding churchmen, such as NICHOLAS OF CUSA and zealous preachers, such as GEILER OF KAYSERSBERG, had only local success. After the troops of the HUSSITES had invaded Germany, eschatological and revolutionary ideas were disseminated by pamphlets and even by more substantial works, giving expression to general dissatisfaction with both Church and empire. The princes, as far as it was possible within the limits of their concordats and privileges, carried out reform only if it could be effected in their own name and to the advantage of their dynasty. The papacy, on the other hand, was completely occupied with the urgency of combating the Turks, and spent tremendous sums of money promoting the arts and enhancing its own court. The general weakening of papal authority and the prejudiced attitude toward everything that came from Rome made the efforts of even sincere popes futile. The religious orders undertook to reform themselves, and were at least temporarily successful. Various reforms among the Benedictines (e.g., at BURSFELD and MELK) and among the mendicant Observants fought against the abuses of proprietorship, disregard of papal enclosure, etc. But the secular clergy, despite their attendance at the new universities, where generally they followed courses only in the arts, lacked thorough education and ecclesiastical training. Concubinage was widespread. The higher clergy, even the bishops, were excessively involved in disputes over property and benefices, were enmeshed in politics, and often led a wholly secular life. Among the people, there was much superstition (WITCHCRAFT) and superficial, often exaggerated, piety. Theology, moreover, was preoccupied with controversy between the various schools of thought. NOMINALISM, after its revival, sometimes associated with WILLIAM OF OCKHAM, soon became the vogue. Among its consequences were the destruction of the medieval harmony between faith and reason, and the weakening of the doctrines on grace and the sacrifice of the Mass. These were also instrumental in emphasizing excessively such nonessential practices of the faith as PILGRIMAGES, veneration of RELICS and INDULGENCES.

In opposition to numerous serious abuses, however, a great, if only superficial upsurge of piety marked the pre-Reformation era. Numerous new churches were built in town and country, and altars, chapels and tabernacles were endowed. Artists, constantly in demand, were unable to fill orders for ecclesiastical sculpture and altarpieces. Foundations of benefices, as well as of votive and anniversary Masses, multiplied. The increase in the number of specific preaching offices bore witness to the hunger for the word of God. The distribution of food, the founding of hospitals, and other charitable works testify to the self-sacrificing fraternal charity of the age, as well as to its concern for personal salvation. The new art of printing produced valuable devotional and catechetical writings, and the Bible was printed in many German translations. Compendia, Biblical commentaries (postillae) and Bibles for the poor (Biblia pauperum) also made their appearance, providing religious education for the unlettered. The BRETHREN OF THE COMMON LIFE devoted themselves to education, especially in more advanced schools, and sought to impart a deep, personal piety (IMITATION OF CHRIST). There was no lack of mystical experience and prayer, if only in the unpretentious garb of personal spirituality. New forms of devotion, such as the ROSARY and the ANGELUS, spread rapidly, and German hymns were sung with great enthusiasm. Stern DANCES OF DEATH and MORALITY PLAYS were evidence of popular piety, and in the upper class Christian humanists attempted to relate the new scientific ideas to faith and loyalty to the Church. But pre-Reformation piety was altogether too subjective, and, when scandalized by the worldly life of the clergy, gradually led to a deep and insuperable alienation from the Church as a formal institution and from its teachings. The time was ripe for the great catastrophe.

Bibliography: Sources and collections. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90). Monumenta Germaniae Historica (Berlin 1826–). J. F. BÖHMER et al., Regesta imperii (Innsbruck–Graz 1889–). P. F. KEHR, Regesta Pontificum Romanorum. Germania Pontificia, ed. A. BRACKMANN, 3 v. (Berlin 1911–). Deutsche Reichstagsakten (Munich–Göttingen 1867–), 17 v. to 1963. J. F. SCHANNAT and J. HARTZHEIM, Concilia Germaniae, 11 v. (Cologne 1759–90). Repertorium Germanicum. Verzeichnis der in den päpstlichen Registern und Kameralakten vorkommenden Personen, Kirchen und Orte des deutschen Reiches 1318–1517 (Berlin 1916–). Die deutschen Inschriften (Stuttgart 1942–). Source studies and bibliographies. A. POTTHAST, Bibliotheca historica medii aevi (2d ed. 1896; repr. Graz 1954). W. WATTENBACH, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter. Vorzeit und Karolinger, Hefte 1–4, ed. W. LEVISON and H. LÖWE (Weimar 1952–63). Die Rechtsquellen, ed. R. BUCHNER (Wattenbach-Levison suppl. 1953). W. WATTENBACH, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter. Deutsche Kaiserzeit, ed. R. HOLTSMANN, v.1.1–4 (3d ed. Tübingen 1948; repr. of 2d ed. 1938–43). K. JACOB, Quellenkunde der deutschen Geschichte im Mittelalter, 3 v. (5th–6th ed. Berlin 1952–61). F. C. DAHLMANN and G. WAITZ, Quellenkunde der deutschen Geschichte (9th ed. Leipzig 1932). Literature. H. RÖSSLER and G. FRANZ, Biographisches Wörterbuch zur deutschen Geschichte (Munich 1952); eds., Sachwörterbuch zur deutschen Geschichte (Munich 1958). Deutsche Geschichte im Überblick, ed. P. RASSOW (2d ed. Stuttgart 1962). B. GEBHARDT, Handbuch der deutschen Geschichte, ed. H. GRUNDMANN, 4 v. (8th ed. Stuttgart 1954–60) v.1. K. JORDAN, Handbuch der deutschen Geschichte, ed. L. JUST (Constance 1956–). W. NEUSS, Die Kirche des Mittelalters (2d ed. Bonn 1950). K. BHIEMEYER and H. TÜCHLE, Kirchengeschichte, 3 v. (17th ed. Paderborn 1962) v.1–2. J. LORTZ, Geschichte der Kirche in ideengeschichtlicher Betrachtung (21st ed. Münster 1964–) v.1. A. HAUCK, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, 5 v. (9th ed. Berlin–Leipzig 1958). Germania sacra: Historisch-statistische Darstellung der deutschen Bistümer (Berlin 1929–41); Historisch-statistische Beschreibung der Kirche des alten Reiches (NS Berlin 1962–). G. SCHNÜRER, Kirche und Kultur im Mittelalter, 3 v. (3d ed. Paderborn 1929–36), Eng. Church and Culture in the Middle Ages, tr. G. J. UNDRER (Paterson, N.J. 1956–), only v.1 tr. F. ZOEPPEL, Deutsche Kulturgeschichte, 2 v. (2d ed. Freiburg 1931–37). K. D. SCHMIDT, Die Bekehrung der Germanen zum Christentum, 2 v. (Göttingen 1939–40). T. SCHIEFFER, Wifrid-Bonifatius und die christliche Grundlegung Europas (Friburg 1954). L. HALPHEN, Charlemagne et 'empire carolingien (Paris 1947). J. FLECKENSTEIN, Die Bildungsreform Karls des Grossen als Verwirklichung der norma rectitudinis (Freiburg 1953). K. VOIGT, Staat und Kirche von Konstantin dem Grossen bis zum Ende der Karolingerzeit (Stuttgart 1936). K. HAMPE, Das Hochmittelalter (900–1250) (4th ed. Münster 1953); Deutsche Kaisergeschichte in der Zeit der Salier und Staufer (10th ed. Heidelberg 1949). A. SCHULTE, Der Adel und die deutsche Kirche im Mittelalter (3d ed. Darmstadt 1958). K. EDER, Deutsche Geisteswende zwischen Mittelalter und Neuzeit (Salzburg 1937). L. A. VEIT, Volksfrommes Brauchtum und Kirche im deutschen Mittelalter (Freiburg 1936). W. ANDREAS, Deutschland vor der Reformation (6th ed. Stuttgart 1959). Die deutsche Literatur des Mittelalters: Verfasserlexikon, eds., W. STAMMLER and K. LANGOSCH, 5 v. (Berlin–Leipzig 1933–55). M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31).

Mid-13th-century grave effigy of Henry the Lion, Duke of Bavaria, in the cathedral Church of St. Blasius, Braunschweig, Germany. (Marburg-Art Reference, Art Resource, NY)

[H. TÜCHLE]

1500 to 1789

With the ascent of the house of HAPSBURG at the beginning of the 16th century, Germany, after a long absence, returned to the center of European history during what became known as the confessional period. There she remained until the shift in power effected by the Peace of WESTPHALIA (1648) and the Peace of the Pyrenees (1659).

Hapsburg Power. Emperor MAXIMILIAN I's grandchildren CHARLES V (emperor 1519–58) and FERDINAND I (emperor 1558–64) united in themselves the Spanish-Burgundian-Hapsburg inheritance, along with the colonies of the New World. Germany opposed the house of Valois, which, since 1498, had been struggling for supremacy in Italy and had, in sporadic military expeditions, penetrated the western boundary of the Holy Roman Empire. Since 1558 the eastern flank of the empire was exposed to the constant threat of the Moscovite Empire and its expansion toward the sea; it was also threatened by the Turks, who were moving in the direction of Hungary. Within the empire there was need for domestic reform. To achieve this, a supreme court for maintaining public peace (Reichslandfrieden) and an imperial chamber of justice (Reichskammergericht) were established in 1495. These measures, together with the formation of Administrative Circles (Kreiseinteilung, 1500) and a general reorganization of the empire through changes made by the Peace of AUGSBURG (Reichsexecutionsordnung, 1555), were elements in the imperial constitution that kept their essential validity until the end of the Holy Roman Empire in 1806. The ever-increasing power of the territorial state became a dangerous rival for imperial central authority, and its striving for regimentation and particularism weakened imperial control, sometimes completely stifling it.

Need for Religious Reform. The conflicting religious intellectual thought of the period could not be reconciled: along with a strong sense of personal piety—which in itself showed signs of sterility, even forms of degeneration—there were evident, to an alarming extent, incidents of decline in Church life. This was manifested to some extent in the reduced vigor and productivity of theology, as well as in the absence of learning and morality among a not insignificant number of the secular and religious clergy. Strong anti-Roman sentiment in Germany increased when the papacy, under LEO X and his successors, steadfastly postponed the thorough Church reform demanded repeatedly by the intellectual class and which the parasite-ridden Curia made impossible. The Gravamina of the German Nation, first formulated in 1458 and repeatedly strengthened at the diets of Augsburg (1518), Worms (1521) and Nuremberg (1522–23), were conveyed with national emotion to large audiences by the German humanists, especially Ulrich von HUTTEN.

Role of Martin Luther. Thus the foundation was laid for an ecclesiastical revolution, which the religious genius of Martin LUTHER introduced according to his theory of subjective justification as he saw it in Pauline theology. As a result, the Protestant REFORMATION became a movement that encompassed Europe. Essentially of a religious nature and scope, the Reformation soon digressed from its original subjective-individualistic elements and led to new confessions, thereby shattering the ecclesiastical unity of the Western Church (see CONFESIONS OF FAITH, PROTESTANT). It received political assurances and at the same time considerable outside encouragement from the sovereign state, which was ecclesiastically oriented. Luther's friends and benefactors, Frederick the Wise, the Landgrave PHILIP OF HESSE, Duke Christoph von Württemberg and many other princes, utilized religious strength to expand their territories, for which the confiscation of extensive Church property provided a welcome increase of power. Its popular nature was sacrificed when Luther, in his pamphlet Wider die räuberischen Rotten der Bauern (1525), turned against the peasants, who adopted the principles of the Reformation in order to realize social emancipation. With their defeat in the PEASANTS' WAR (1524–25) this issue was eliminated as an active factor in the political life of Germany.

In the Summepiscopat (Supreme Protestant Episcopate), where the sovereign was also highest bishop, the Reformation sharply increased the absolutist thinking of the modern state; it created important external prerequisites for the development of the idea of tolerance, which stemmed from different intellectual sources (see CHURCH AND STATE). Its strongest influence in Germany was on language, schools and national culture; in the spiritual realm, it liberated numerous intellectual powers, foremost of which was the religious autonomy of the individual's conscience. However, it did not attain its original objective of Church reform, since, on the one hand, wide areas (the Rhine principalities, southern Germany) remained steadfast in their Catholic faith, and, on the other hand, the rejection of the magisterium of the hierarchical Church, resulting from the exaggeration of the Protestant principle of sola scriptura, soon led to division within the reform movements themselves (Ulrich Zwingli, John Calvin) and to a colorful variety of religious enthusiasts (Anabaptists, Socinians, Anti-Trinitarians).

Confessional Debate. The movement that followed in the wake of Luther and Philipp MELANCHTHON split, after Melanchthon's death, into different groups; the succeeding generation of theologians discarded the traces of the dialectic-existentialist theological language of Luther in order to form an alliance with Aristotelian philosophy. This led to the scholastic solidification of doctrine in Lutheran orthodoxy. The formation of a “particular” ecclesiastical system and the doctrinaire isolation of the Reformation from the existing Church only gradually made itself evident, despite the sharp antipapal polemics of Luther—indeed, many people, engulfed by the new religious mainstream, were not at all conscious of any such separation. Consequently, the defensive battle of the Catholic Church was handicapped from the very beginning. The majority of defensive measures taken were halfhearted and indecisive, generally failing in their evaluation of the scope of the revolutionary ideas and often applied with apathy by the bishops. The threat of excommunication for Luther in the bull Exsurge Domine, which Johann ECK brought from Rome in 1519, made evident the gravity of the situation, but the means used by the Curia were completely incapable of meeting the adamant demands for ecclesiastical reform. The Curia adopted an anti-Spanish policy and tried to stop the election of Charles V as emperor in deference to the candidacy of Frederick III the Wise, Duke of Saxony (1463–1525), hoping thereby to win his powerful support within Germany. This delayed the process against Luther, and gave the movement a head start of two years (1518–20), which later could not be overcome, either by the Diet of Worms (1521) or by any other measures that were taken.

Imperial Concessions. Initiative in defending Catholicism in the first half of the century lay chiefly with the emperor and the Catholic princes. Whereas the diets referred the religious question to a council or a German national meeting (Nuremberg 1523–24; Speyer 1526), the emperor and Catholic elements attempted to suppress the movement by means of political force (the treaties of Regensburg, 1524, and Dessau, 1525). As a result, political parties were formed among church factions, and evangelical princes gave them life, both in the Torgau (1526) and in the SCHMALKALDIC LEAGUE (1531). The emperor, isolated from the Empire until 1530 by the French wars, threatened by the Turks, and dependent upon Protestant support, was forced to repeatedly postpone enactment of his policies and grant further concessions. Only after the Treaty of Crépy (1544) did he win a free hand. Following initial successes in the Schmalkaldic War (1546–47), the revolt of Protestant princes, led by Moritz of Saxony, forced him to make further concessions, which, first in the Treaty of Passau (1552) and then in the Religious Peace of Augsburg (1555), led to the recognition of the ecclesiastical status quo and sealed the dualism of the confessions (see INTERIMS; PROTESTANTISM).

Territorial Churches. The fundamental principle that henceforth found common acceptance among German princes (cuius regio, eius religio) interjected a territorial and materialistic principle into the religious question, allowing them to choose Lutheranism or Catholicism as the religion of their state. This gave only a provisional foundation, one later to be repeatedly shaken by religious wars, to the coexistence of the two confessions. Another aspect of this agreement, that of ecclesiastical reservation (reservatum ecclesiasticum), should have hindered the progress of the Reformation in that it denied the prince bishop, who wanted to become Protestant, his Reformation rights and forced him to resign; this, however, proved to be an aid for Catholicism only in the Rhine-Main area, in Westphalia and in Bavaria. In northern and central Germany, two archbishops and 15 bishops were lost to the Church; by 1570, approximately sevenths of the population was Protestant. The literary-theological defense of Catholicism in the Reformation was led by polemical theologians, such as Johann Eck, Johannes COCHLAEUS, Johannes Fabri and Friedrich NAUSEA, but it rarely penetrated the fundamental issues of the Reformation. In general, such polemic was content to assume an air of superiority on the individual issues strongly attacking Catholic doctrine. The unsuccessful religious discussions at Hagenau, Worms and Regensburg (1540–41) could be traced to Charles V, who was aided by Gasparo CONTARINI. Confessional debate had become impotent by the time the Council of TRENT (1545–63) awakened Catholic thought and introduced reform. There could no longer be a general reform council embracing Christianity; it could only attain the lesser goal of Catholic reform.

Catholic Reawakening. The indefatigable efforts of Jesuits such as Peter CANISIUS, established a bulwark of the old faith in numerous foundations in Germany. Not only was Catholicism saved, but its consciousness was so strengthened that gradually a new spiritual feeling could grow, giving birth to the BAROQUE, the last stage of general European culture. Hand in hand with this inner spiritual reawakening was the movement of the COUNTER REFORMATION, whose strongest political leaders were the Bavarian Dukes Albrecht V (1550–79) and William V (1579–97). In the forceful personalities of Archbishop Jacob von Eltz in Trier (1567–81) and Julius ECHTER VON MESPELBRUNN in Würzburg (1573–1617) appeared a new type of religious sovereign, guided by a reinvigorated ecclesiastical spirit.

Thirty Years' War. Within the empire itself the religious parties expanded. Meanwhile, the new confession, LUTHERANISM, within its political context, was strongly weakened by the third confession, CALVINISM, which gained ground and made itself politically effective, especially in the Palatinate. Toward the end of the 16th century, the constitution of the empire was rendered powerless. The contradictions in the interconfessional politics led them from confessional treaties (Protestant Union, 1608; Catholic League, 1609) to the calamities of the THIRTY YEARS' WAR (1618–48). The latter spread, as a result of Spanish-French rivalry, into a power struggle that engulfed Europe. Although the cultural tradition of Europe was not destroyed in this war, a great social and economic debility was felt during the succeeding decades. The Peace of Westphalia (1648) definitively shifted political emphasis from the Holy Roman Empire to the territories; it supplemented, from the religious-political viewpoint, the Peace of Augsburg to the extent that it gave confessional recognition to the reform religions, which had not been recognized until then, and it abolished the principle that the subjects of territories should continue to be affected by the change of religion of the territorial princes after the key year of 1624.

Secular Absolutism and the Church. The Hapsburg monarchy was faced with two tasks at the outset of the 17th century: to defend itself against the conquest policies of LOUIS XIV in the west, and to defend Europe against the Turks. After the Austro-Hungarian power thrust was temporarily secured by the Peace of Ryswick (1697) and Karlowitz (1699), it suffered a new threat in the War of the Spanish Succession (1701–14). The subsequent relatively short period of tranquility was brought to an end in 1740 by the War of the Austrian Succession, from which Prussia emerged a great power in the Peace of Hubertusburg (1763). The dualism between Catholic Austria and Protestant Prussia determined the course of German politics far into the 19th century. In the age of absolutism, the structure of a unified central state began to take shape in Prussia under Frederick William I and FREDERICK THE GREAT, as well as in Austria during the reigns of MARIA THERESA and JOSEPH II. The ENLIGHTENMENT contributed less toward the intellectual downfall of feudalism in Germany than it did in France and England; it did not turn against Christianity, whose morality it sanctioned, but it did reject its claim on absolute truth (G. LESSING, Johann HERDER). Its concept of the state, which opposed a religious doctrine of an authoritative teaching mission and supreme authority over and above the state, such as in Catholicism, theoretically and practically underscored the state's supreme authority in religious matters. This theory developed, on the Catholic side, in JOSEPHINISM, a system of state protectorship of the Church that alleviated many Church abuses as a result of state aid and thus cannot be judged wholly negative. The consciousness of the scandal of the Church schism did not escape the best minds of the period. While Gottfried LEIBNIZ engaged Jacques BOSSUET in polemical correspondence, the Franciscan Bishop Cristóbal de Rojas y SPÍNOLA and the Capuchin Dennis of Werl (d. 1709) struggled in the great cause of reconciliation.

The same cause motivated the publications of the Trier auxiliary bishop, Johann Nikolaus von HONTHEIM, who, in order to re-win Christians who had lost their faith, demanded that the Church return to its original state in Christian antiquity. His vague theological position based on his practical, canonical views led to the condemnation of his works, but this by no means resolved the important problems he posed. Episcopatism, a movement that identified itself with the FEBRONIANISM of HONTHEIM as expressed in the Congress of EMS (1786), offers sufficient proof of this. Hontheim's goal was not a national church freed from Rome, but rather the curtailment of papal rights and claims by a reevaluation of the episcopacy. The structure of the German imperial Church, as it again flourished culturally in the 18th century, after the losses of the 16th century, was stamped by the mark of feudalism; the nobility, who comprised the cathedral chapters, again elected the bishop, whom the pope approved. As a conservative element of the constitution of the empire, the prince bishops were strongly favored and protected by the emperor, but nevertheless this did not prevent some of the Rhenish-Westphalian dioceses, which had become refuges for the descendants of Bavarian princes, from carrying on independent anti-imperial politics. Along with their dynastic rise to power, the bishops of the house of Schönborn (Speyer, Mainz, Bamberg, Würzburg) were especially active in cultural matters. The main Catholic contribution in the epoch of the baroque and the rococo lies in decorative art, especially architecture (Vierzehnheiligen, Wieskirche, OTTOBEUREN, St. Paulin in Trier, WEINGARTEN). The historical research inspired by the French MAURISTS gained ground in southern Germany and reached its peak in the literary work of Abbot Martin Gerbert of St. Blaise. To what extent the Enlightenment was felt either positively or negatively in the theological realm remained an area debated by scholars.

The Fall of the Empire and Reconstruction: 1789–1900

The severe treatment by the armies of the FRENCH REVOLUTION, which occupied the left bank of the Rhine until 1798, brought about the collapse of the HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE of the German Nation. The chief beneficiaries in Germany were the lay rulers who had for many years utilized Protestant and ENLIGHTENMENT propaganda to speed the downfall of the ecclesiastical principalities and the secularization of their possessions. In 1803 an enactment of the Imperial Delegation (Reichsdeputationshauptschluss) caused ecclesiastical principalities and Church property to be seized and given to secular princes, partly as indemnification for the property they had lost to France west of the Rhine. The Archdiocese of Salzburg, the three Rhenish ecclesiastical electorates, 80 abbeys and foundations, and more than 200 monasteries lost their civil independence. More than three million Catholics changed territorial rulers and generally found themselves living in Protestant states. The immediate result for Catholicism was a great loss of political and social influence, which could only be regained slowly by internal renewal. Leadership in the German Confederation, founded in 1815, was assumed by predominantly Protestant Prussia, which had been strengthened by reforms since the struggle against Napoleon for freedom. After successful wars with Denmark (1864) and Austria (1866) under the leadership of BISMARCK, Prussia established in 1870 the German Empire, in which it was the strongest state.

Protestant Domination of 19th-Century Culture.

Of perhaps most serious concern to intellectual German Catholics was the Protestant domination of German cultural life. Until World War I the intellectual accomplishments of Catholics remained on the periphery of the nation's creative activity. The ideas of German IDEALISM, as represented by men like Goethe, Schiller, Hegel, Hölderlin, Schleiermacher and Wilhelm von Humboldt, were very influential in establishing the Weltanschauung of educated Germans, at least in the first half of the 19th century; but they did not penetrate Catholic circles. German Catholic poets and writers of this period, such as Joseph von Eichendorff, Annette von Droste-Hülshoff and Adalbert Stifter, lived in isolation and were little known outside the Catholic ghettos. The philosophically less well-defined thought of ROMANTICISM did, however, affect Catholic renewal at the beginning of the 19th century. The proximity of various religious confessions resulted in numerous conversions to Catholicism or in vitalizing tensions that enriched Catholicism. Since Catholic universities and cultural centers of formation were nonexistent during this period, Catholics gathered around well-known personalities or in circles of similarly disposed friends. Thus in Münster the circle of Princess Amalia GALLITZIN included Bernard OVERBERG, Franz von FÜRSTENBERG and Friedrich von Stolberg. In Mainz the principal figures in the circle around Bishop Joseph Colmar were the Alsatian theologians Bruno Liebermann, A. Räss and Nikolas Weis. The founding of the Katholik (1821) assured the Mainz Circle of a permanent publication, primarily theological in its orientation, which was influential among Catholics.

In southern Germany the devout and mild pastoral theologian Johann SAILER, who was, together with Karl von DALBERG, the outstanding personality in the German episcopate of that period, had a wide influence on the care of souls, which was felt long afterward, thanks to his numerous pupils. The Munich Circle (or Round Table), which formed around the highly gifted Joseph von GÖR-

RES, was the most influential of these groups by virtue of the versatility of its members, the originality of their ideas, and their political stance. To it belonged the lay theologian and philosopher Franz von BAADER, who sought closer relations between the Catholic and Orthodox Churches; the theologian Johann MÖHLER; the jurist George PHILLIPS; and, above all, the Church historian Johannes Ignaz von DÖLLINGER, who cultivated international Catholic contacts, especially with England and France and who, as the eminent Catholic scholar in the 1860s, engaged in ecumenical endeavors. During the rule of Louis I (1825–48), Bavaria was a center of Catholic life and saw the revival of Benedictine monasteries. The Historische Politische Blätter, founded in Munich by Joseph and Guido Görres (1837), became the leading publication of the German Catholic press in the 19th century. Its development was especially notable under the direction of Josef JÖRG. Munich had a theology faculty from 1825, and the theology faculty in Tübingen, established in 1817, took inspiration from Protestant scholarship and flourished under Möhler, Johann HIRSCHER, Heinrich KLEE, Carl von HEFELE and Johannes KUHN. The Tübinger Theologische Quartalschrift began publication in 1819.

Ecclesiastical Reorganization. The juridical reorganization of the German Church was a slow process resulting from bilateral agreements with the Roman Curia or from unilateral decrees emanating from Rome or from the German state. Thus, a concordat was concluded with Bavaria in 1817, with Austria in 1855, and with Baden in 1859. Ecclesiastical affairs in Prussia were regulated by the papal circumscription bull De salute animarum (1821) for the ecclesiastical provinces of Cologne and Gnesen-Posen; and in Hanover, by Impensa Romanorum Pontificum (1824), for the Dioceses of Hildesheim and Osnabrück. The bull Provida sollersque (1821) erected the metropolitan see of Freiburg im Breisgau, with Rotenburg, Mainz, Fulda and Limburg as suffragans; it concerned Baden, Hesse, Darmstadt, Württemberg, Kurhessen and Nassau.

In the meeting at Cologne during the mixed marriage controversy (1837), German Catholicism for the first time became conscious of its social and political potential in the life of the nation (see COLOGNE, MIXED MARRIAGE DISPUTE IN). The pilgrimage to the Holy Garment in TRIER, which attracted a half million pilgrims in 1844, demonstrated a religiously vital Catholicism striving for a political voice in order to break the fetters of state control (Staatskirchentum). The revolution of 1848, warmly greeted by many Catholics, gave the Church new strength. Catholic representatives in the Frankfurt National Assembly even advocated separation of Church and State, as in Belgium and the United States. Although this goal had to be deferred, the Church was able to attain considerable freedom from state control.

Freedom of the press and freedom of assembly opened to the Church new possibilities of religious activity. In Mainz Catholics took the initiative by founding the Pius Associations (Piusvereine), and, under the leadership of Adam Lennig, strove successfully to unite German Catholics in the Catholic Union of Germany. The first Katholikentag met in Mainz (October 1848); it would become a permanent institution in German Catholic life. The German Bishops Conference in Würzburg (1848) was the first general meeting of German bishops; it would continued to meets in Fulda.

The project of a permanent federation of dioceses on the national level was not successful. Diocesan particularism and distrust in Rome, which was horrified by the term "National Church," destroyed Döllinger's plan, perhaps too advanced for its time. The liturgical and pastoral reforms proposed by Ignaz von WESSENBERG and the scripturally and theocentrically orientated moral theology of the conciliatory Hirscher unfortunately were rejected. Georg HERMES in Bonn and Anton Günther in Vienna sought in vain for points of departure in contemporary philosophical systems in order to overcome disbelief and to arrive at an independent theological understanding of Christian revelation. Hermes was loyal to the Church during life, but after his death his system was condemned by Rome in 1835, and his writings placed on the Index. Günther's work was placed on the Index in 1857. NEOSCHOLASTICISM won recognition in Germany in the latter half of the century under the impulse of the Mainz Katholik, whose editor was Joseph Kleutgen, SJ, and whose most eminent contributor was Matthias SCHEEBEN. After mid-century tensions developed between the Roman school, which favored SCHOLASTICISM, and German theology, whose orientation was predominately historical. This divergence led to a crisis in Vatican Council I, and to the defection of such important Catholic theologians as Döllinger and Franz REUSCH, and lay professors Friedrich von Schulte and Karl von Cornelius. It also resulted in the schism of the OLD CATHOLICS. Like Deutschkatholizismus, founded a quarter-century earlier by Johann CZERSKI and Johann RONGE, the Old Catholic sect never constituted a danger to Church life; yet it led able scholars into a defection the effects of which would be perceptible into the 20th century.

Social and Political Projects. In the social movement the work of Adolf KOLPING was extremely successful. Bishop Wilhelm von KETTELER, who made the public aware of the labor question, became the intellectual inspiration for the guilds of Catholic workers that came into being after 1892. The political organization of German Catholics found a voice after the Catholic CENTER party gained a seat in the Prussian parliament in 1852. This party attained increasing political importance in the parliaments of various states, including, after successful German Empire reunification, Jan. 18, 1871, the Reichstag under the leadership of Ludwig WINDTHORST, Hermann von Mallinckrodt and Ernst Lieber.

The self-consciousness of German Catholicism received a great stimulus from the KULTURKAMPF, which was directed by Otto von Bismarck and Adalbert Falk. The Kulturkampf's objectionable effects, somewhat overdramatized by Catholics, were more often in the intellectual than the practical life of the Church, insofar as Catholicism became more isolated intellectually than before. Directly stimulating this struggle was the concept of the state, which had grown increasingly stronger since the founding of the empire; but in the background, the driving power was LIBERALISM's concept of nationalism, which was a priori suspicious of ultramontane Catholicism, and which considered it a natural enemy of the state following the 1864 publication of the SYLLABUS OF ERRORS and the development of the movement favoring a definition of papal primacy and infallibility. Bismarck considered Catholics enemies of the empire, lacking in patriotism. Discrimination against them socially and politically was most apparent at universities and in government administrative circles. Until 1918 Catholics in the higher ranks of imperial officialdom corresponded to less than a tenth of the numerical strength of the Catholic population.

Catholic Intellectual Life during the Second Empire. A way out of this ghetto appeared in 1876 with the founding of the GÖRRES-GESELLSCHAFT and its goal of the pursuit of learning. Other scholarly accomplishments, primarily by historians such as Johannes Janssen, Ludwig von PASTOR and Franz KRAUS, were acclaimed by the public. A second generation of historians succeeded them in the 20th century: Albert EHRHARD, Heinrich DENIFLE, Franz EHRLE, Heinrich Finke, Gustav Schnürer, Sebastian Merkle and Martin GRABMANN. Much more difficult was acceptance by the nation's intellectual and literary circles, the leading representatives of which had a negative relationship with Catholicism. A new Catholic literature developed whose literary merit was dubious. Carl MUTH was the first to bring Catholic culture into a meaningful relationship with Catholic faith by founding Hochland (1903). MODERNISM made slight impression on Catholic Germany, which was still weak as a result of the intellectual losses in the Old Catholic schism. The censoring of the Würzburg theologian Hermann SCHELL (1898), who came to grips passionately with the problem of the Church and progress, did not solve the important problems he confronted.

German Church Enters the Modern World

In 1900 the German Second Empire, which consisted of 25 German states united by Bismark, was now under the rule of Emperor von Büow, an imperialist. Now the greatest industrial power in Europe and hungry for new markets, the Second Empire was viewed with concern by Great Britain and France, who felt their colonial holdings in Africa and elsewhere threatened. Germany's strong political/military alliance with the Austro-Hungarian Empire to its south threatened the balance of power on the continent. In addition, the greatly expanded German navy, now a rival of the formerly invincible British fleet, also gave Germany's European neighbors cause for concern. Against this sense of Germany as a growing menace, the assassination of Austrian Archduke Franz Ferdinand and his wife in Sarajevo on June 28, 1914 would act as a spark on dry, brittle leaves.

Growth of Religious Orders. As Germany grew in economic strength under the Second Empire, so the religious spirit of German Catholicism strengthened also. At the turn of the 20th century this was most evident in the religious orders and societies. The fruits of this revival were reaped by the Jesuits, Redemptorists, Franciscans and Benedictines, as well as newer missionary congregations, such as the Society of the DIVINE WORD founded in 1875 by Arnold JANSSEN. Among the congregations founded abroad that now flourished in Germany were the Pallottines, Marian Hill Missionaries, Salesians, White Fathers and Sacred Heart Missionaries. Still more remarkable was the growth of congregations of religious women dedicated to education and nursing: the Sisters of Charity of Münster, the Borromeans of Nancy, the Ladies of Loretto, the Gray Sisters, the Vincentian Sisters of Charity and also the congregations founded by Pauline von MALLINCKRODT, Clara FEY and Franziska SCHERVIER. Inspiring examples of Christian perfection were given by Clemens von DROSTE ZU VISCHERING, St. CONRAD OF PARZHAM and Rupert Mayer, SJ (d. 1945). Peter CAHENSLEY, general secretary of the St. Raphael Union, founded in 1871, was tireless in aiding German emigrants, despite great opposition from the state. Numerous secular priests cared for these emigrants and settled with them in North America.

The St. Vincent de Paul conferences were devoted to the practical aid of the poor. The Volksverein in München-Gladbach, founded in 1890, undertook the social and political education of German Catholics; it had 850,000 members by 1914, and 380,000 by 1932. Influential social theorists, such as the Jesuits Viktor CATHREIN and Heinrich Pesch, also appeared; their traditions would be successfully continued on a wider scale by Oswald von Nell-Breuning, SJ, after 1945.

The Rise of Nazi Socialism. After Germany joined the Austro-Hungarian Empire in declaring war on the Allied powers in 1914, German Catholic leaders unwaveringly supported their political and military leaders, putting aside long years of discrimination by the imperial government. After the collapse of 1918, members of the Catholic hierarchy and influential noblemen regretted the fall of the monarchy. During the moderate socialist Weimar Republic (1919–33) the Center party, with 20 percent of the deputies, gained control of the government for the first time, and supplied the chancellors Karl Joseph Wirth (1921–22), Wilhelm Marx (1923–25; 1926–28) and Heinrich Brüning (1930–32). As minister of labor (1920–28), Heinrich Brauns, a Catholic priest, improved social legislation along the lines that the Center party had been advocating since Bismarck's time.

The post-World War I generation was especially receptive to religious values and responsive to the LITURGICAL MOVEMENT, which centered on Abbot Ildefons HERWEGEN, an energetic promoter, whose organizational center was Maria Laach Abbey. Theodor Haecker, who entered the Church under the influence of NEWMAN and KIERKEGAARD, had great influence as a spiritual educator. Karl Adam, Theodor Steinbüchel and F. Tillmann contemplated dogmatic and moral theology from the viewpoint of contemporary problems.

One consequence of Germany's industrialization had been the growing neglect of spirituality and religion among the working classes. The owners of industry, even in predominantly Catholic areas, were primarily Protestant, and industrial cities, while Protestant, became increasingly affected by the drift toward dechristianization. Less affected were the Rhenish and southern German cities, which were predominately Catholic. By the 1930s, with the Weimar economy in chaos as a result of its requirement to pay large war reparations, unemployment rose throughout Germany, and the working classes searched for guidance as poverty tore apart their lives.

Communism and National Socialism filled the intellectual vacuum in these dechristianized circles. National socialism, taking advantage of the misery of the working classes, took control of the government under the leadership of Adolf Hitler (March 1933), who directed the terrorism of an unjust regime for 12 years. Hitler's success in decreasing unemployment and in other domestic policies could hardly disguise the totalitarian character of his regime. The warmongering of the Nazis, revealed in propagandist demands for the revision of the Versailles Treaty, led in 1939 to the catastrophe of World War II.

Hitler, once a Catholic, played opportunistic politics with the German Catholic hierarchy; he reserved the definitive solution of the religious question until after the war.

The German bishops incessantly warned against national socialism and threatened Church members with serious ecclesiastical penalties, especially after 1930; but once the Nazis were in power, it became necessary to establish a modus vivendi that would preserve at least the appearance of legality. The hierarchy accordingly accepted the concordat of July 20, 1933 concluded between Pope Pius XI and the National Socialist government (see PIUS XI), under which the Church could sustain Catholic education and maintain communication with Rome. This agreement was soon violated both overtly and covertly, but it gave the Church during this period of dictatorship a basis for existence. It was, to be sure, a precarious and ever more restricted basis, but it did make possible the Church's continued functioning.

Very frequently the bishops felt obliged to protest the violation of Catholic rights and the ruthless suppression of Catholic organizations. Cardinal Michael von FAULHABER, the leading figure in the German episcopate in the first half of the 20th century, protested in his Advent sermons of 1933 against the disparaging of the Old Testament. In 1941 Bishop Clemens von GALEN of Münster publicly denounced the race legislation, especially the destruction of "useless lives." Urged by the German hierarchy, a dying Pius XI composed the encyclical Mit Brennender Sorge, denouncing Nazi racial theory and other government actions and set it to German priests to be read on Palm Sunday, 1937; meanwhile, bishops Sproll of Rottenburg and Konrad von Preysing of Berlin were expelled from their dioceses in 1938. As the Nazi policies continued, thousands of Catholic laymen and priests would be sentenced to concentration camps or to prisons. Among those put to death were the secular priest Max Metzger (1887–1944) and Alfred Delp, SJ (1907–45). However, the tacit acceptance by many bishops and numerous Catholic laymen of the barbarous Jewish persecution by the National Socialists, especially after Kristallnacht in 1938, revealed, an undeniable moral blindness. Responsibility for this silence can be ascribed to personal factors and to special circumstances in some individual cases, but ultimately it must be sought in the historical roots of Germany's national mythology. In addition, the inability of the newly elected Pope Pius XII to take a firm stand against the German government for fear it would endanger more Jews, frustrated both the Allied powers and Catholics around the world. When he finally spoke out—in late 1942—his words sounded impotent in the face of the horrors of the Nazi Final Solution. While many felt Pius XII damaged the moral credibility of the Church, historians continued to debate the subject into the next century.

A Country, Church Divided. At the close of World War II, Germany was divided into two regions: the Federal Republic of Germany (West Germany; proclaimed May 23, 1949) and the Soviet-backed German Democratic Republic (East Germany; proclaimed Oct. 7, 1949). With the German capital now in East German territory, the city was divided into East and West Berlin; ultimately political tensions would prompt the building of the Berlin Wall in 1961, which separated families for decades before its destruction in November of 1989. While West Germany hoped for eventual reunification, East Germany gradually declined into a Soviet-backed police state, which continued until popular protest and the fall of the USSR signaled the reunification of the German republic on Oct. 3, 1990. A visit by Pope John Paul II to Germany in 1987 encouraged all Germans to come together, and he was considered to be a major leader in the effort to bring the two Germanys back under one flag.

In the years after 1945, defeated and demoralized by war, West Germany's political and intellectual reorganization depended heavily for support on Christian forces. These were organized in the Christian Democratic Union under Catholic chancellor Konrad Adenauer (1948–63). The Christian Democrats formed the governing party in the republic and in numerous states after 1948. Between the end of World War II and German reunification, West German Catholics participated intensively in the ECUMENICAL movement. Their acceptance of responsibility for underdeveloped countries and peoples was shown by generous Catholic contributions to the works of charity carried on by the organizations Misereor and Adveniat. In intellectual dialogues, Catholic academies, especially the one in Munich, served as discussion and training centers. The Federal Republic retained a Christian government despite trends among the population toward materialism and spiritual indifference.

The situation was much different in East Germany, where Catholics now found themselves living in a communist country with no way to leave. The atheistic communist-controlled government placed great restrictions on Christian life and doomed it to isolation, although fervent Catholics continue to keep the torch of faith lighted. In the 1946 census this so-called Diaspora region was 12.2 percent Catholic and 81.6 percent Protestant, with 6.2 percent belonging to other religious groups or to none.

Church Moves into 21st Century. In March of 1990 the first free elections were held in East Germany, with a Christian Democrat winning the vote. While the election results proved immaterial—the region was reclaimed by a united Germany months later—it showed that the conservative Catholic mindset had not been destroyed by more than 40 years of communist oppression. While proceedings were held against those accused of human rights abuses, of more concern to all Germany was the poverty and unemployment of the former East Germany, which had survived on state-controlled industry that no longer existed. Cases of right-wing extremism, sometimes focused against Jews and foreign citizens, followed as Germans grew frustrated with the economic downturn reunification had cost their country. Government efforts to refund the eastern Germany became increasingly successful, and a center-right wing coalition under Christian Democratic leader Helmut Kohl retained control throughout the reunification effort. In elections in 1998 Social Democratic party candidates gained control of the government. In January of 1999 Germany joined together with ten other European Union countries to adopt the euro as their common currency.

While Kohl's government was politically right of center, it supported social policies far more liberal than those advocated by the Church. In April of 1996 the German Catholic Church joined with Lutheran leaders to oppose the practice of Euthanasia by sponsoring a "Week for Life" to attract attention to the growing problem. Even more politically sensitive was the growing debate on birth control, as German Chancellor Kohl made a public statement criticizing the pope's unwillingness to allow artificial birth control. With the unification of Germany, liberal East Germany laws were expanded to permit legal abortions in Germany. Pope John Paul II responded to the changes in German law by ordering Church representatives not to involve themselves in a mandatory abortion counseling program established by the government in 1995 that in essence involved the Church in the legal abortion process through its pro-life counsel. While Catholic bishops upheld the pope's wishes, there were some defectors among the clergy.

When the pope made what would be his third trip to Germany in June of 1996, he received an unpleasant welcome from abortion activists and gay and lesbian groups that opposed many of the Church's social doctrines in support of the family. Between vehement, often ugly vocal protests, red paint was thrown at the pope's vehicle. Visiting the site of the Brandenburg Gate and the Berlin Wall, condoms and paint bombs were thrown at the pope's entourage; despite this he called on listeners to respect human rights around the world. Reflecting on this visit in 2000, the pope noted that Germany, "one of the pillars of the European house," bore a particular responsibility for promoting social and political unity. In a letter to German cardinals, dated March 2001, the pope also expressed concern over the secularization of the German

Church, and observed that while Catholicism in Germany "may appear strong on the outside, . . . [it] has no inner vitality, and has lost credibility in the process."

As a minority religion within a predominately Lutheran nation, the German Catholic Church continued to expand its ecumenical efforts. Such efforts were aided by the work of the Pontifical Council for Christian Unity in October of 1996, when it was announced that after a quarter century of discussion, Catholic and Lutheran leaders had reached a consensus on the question of justification; that justification results from the mercy of God, rather than from good works. Participating as well in the 1996 Council of European Bishops conference, Mainz Archbishop and future Karl Cardinal Lehmann considered Germany's future. "The credo of individualism should not come to mean isolation from the community," Lehmann noted, adding that while democratic governments should value diversity of all kinds, the strength created by a unity among the Christian faiths would create the moral and spiritual foundation required for modern society to flourish. Less successful than works with German Lutherans were the Church's efforts to reconcile with its own Old Catholic schism, which, in May of 1999, in its continued rejection of Catholic doctrine went even further afield by ordaining two women into the priesthood.

Bibliography: K. SCHOTTENLOHER, Bibliographie zur deutschen Geschichte im Zeitalter der Glaubensspaltung, 1517–85, 6 v. (Leipzig 1933–40; repr. Stuttgart 1956–58, v.7 1962–). G. PFEILSCHIFTER, Acta Reformationis Catholicae . . . (Regensburg 1959—). M. RITTER, Deutsche Geschichte im Zeitalter der Gegenreformation und des Dreissigjährigen Krieges, 3 v. (Stuttgart 1889–1908). G. SCHNÜRER, Katholische Kirche und Kultur im Zeitalter des Barock (Paderborn 1937); Katholische Kirche und Kultur im 18. Jahrhundert (Paderborn 1941). K. EDER, Die Geschichte der Kirche im Zeitalter des konfessionellen Absolutismus (1555–1648) (Vienna 1949). G. BARRACLOUGH, The Origins of Modern Germany (2d ed. Oxford 1957; pa. New York 1963). L. PETRY, Die Gegenreformation in Deutschland (Braunschweig 1952). A. L. VEIT and L. LENHART, Kirche und Volksfrömmigkeit im Zeitalter des Barock (Freiburg 1956). B. GEBHARDT, Handbuch der deutschen Geschichte, ed. H. GRUNDMANN, 4 v. (8th ed. Stuttgart 1954–60) v.2–4. J. LORTZ, Die Reformation in Deutschland, 2 v. (4th ed. Freiburg 1962). K. BILMEYER and H. TÜCHLE, Kirchengeschichte, 3 v. (17th ed. Paderborn 1962) v.3. H. HOLBORN, A History of Modern Germany, v. 1, 2 (New York 1959–64). H. BRÜCK, Geschichte der katholischen Kirche in Deutschland im 19. Jahrhundert, with additions by J. B. KISSLING, 4 v. (2d ed. Münster 1902–08). G. GOYAU, L'Allemagne religieuse, 5 v. (Paris 1898–1908) v.1–4; Le Catholicisme, v.5; Le Protestantisme; Bismarck et l'Église: Le Kulturkampf 1870–78, 4. v. (Paris 1911–13). C. BACHEM, Vorgeschichte, Geschichte und Politik der deutschen Zentrumspartei, 9 v. (Cologne 1927–32). L. A. VEIT, Die Kirche im Zeitalter des Individualismus, 1648–1932, 2 v. (Freiburg 1931–33). J. LEFLON, La Crise révolutionnaire, 1789–1846. Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours, eds., A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, 20 (1949). R. AUBERT, Le Pontificat de Pie IX, 1846–1878, (ibid. 21; 2d ed. 1964). F. SCHNABEL, Deutsche Geschichte im 19. Jahrhundert, 4 v. (2d–4th eds. Freiburg 1948–55), esp. v.4 Die religiösen Kräfte (3d ed. 1955). H. HERMELINK, Das Christentum in der Menschheitsgeschichte von der Französischen Revolution bis zur Gegenwart, 3 v. (Stuttgart 1951–55). K. BILMEYER and H. TÜCHLE, Kirchengeschichte, 3 v. (17th ed. Paderborn 1962). K. S. LATOURETTE, Christianity in a Revolutionary Age: A History of Christianity in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries, 5 v. (New York 1958–62) v. 1, 2, 4. A. DRU, The Contribution of German Catholicism (New York 1963). J. NEUHÄUSLER, Kreuz und Hakenkreuz, 2 v. (Munich 1946). E. ALEXANDER, "Church and Society in Germany," Church and Society, 1789–1950, ed. J. N. MOODY (New York 1953) 325–583. G. G. WINDELL, The Catholics and German Unity, 1866–71 (Minneapolis 1954). J. ROVAN, Le Catholicisme politique en Allemagne (Histoire de la démocratie chrétienne, 2; Paris 1956). Catholicisme Allemand (Paris 1956). K. BUCHHEIM, Ultramontanismus und Demokratie: Der Weg der deutschen Katholiken im 19. Jahrhundert (Munich 1963). H. LUTZ, Demokratie im Zwielficht: Der Weg der deutschen Katholiken aus dem Kaiserreich in die Republik 1914–25 (Munich 1963). G. LEWY, The Catholic Church and Nazi Germany (New York 1964). See review by W. M. HARRIGAN, American Catholic Historical Review, 50 (1965) 605–608. Deutscher Katholizismus nach 1945, ed. H. MAIER, (Munich 1964). K. S. PINSON, Modern Germany: Its History and Civilization (New York 1954). M. DILL, Germany: A Modern History (Ann Arbor 1961). R. W. SOLBERG, God and Caesar in East Germany (New York 1961). H. HOLBORN, A History of Modern Germany, v.2 (New York 1964). N. MICKLEM, National Socialism and the Catholic Church (New York 1939). G. C. ZAHN, German Catholics and Hitler's Wars (New York 1962). F. ZIPFEL, Kirchenkampf in Deutschland, 1933–45 (Berlin 1965). P. RICHARD et al., Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912—) 2:494–591. A. BIGELMAIR, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912—) 6:1524–1626. F. VERNET, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932—) 1:314–351. H. BORNKAMM et al., *Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart*³, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 2:133–154. E. MEYNEN et al., Staatslexikon, ed., Görres-Gesellschaft, 8 v. (6th, new and enl. ed. Freiburg 1957–63) 2:673–880. H. TÜCHLE et al., *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², eds., J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:280–304. Bilan du Monde 2:49–70. Kirchliches Handbuch, v.25, 1956–61 (Cologne 1963). Catholic directory and statistical record for Germany. Annuario Pontificio has annual statistics on all dioceses.

[V. CONZEMIUS/EDS.]

GERMERIUS, ST.

Statesman, abbot; b. Vardes, France, c. 610; d. Saint-Germer-de-Flay, c. 660. Of noble Frankish blood, he served as a statesman at the court of Dagobert I and Clovis II. Upon the advice of St. OUVEN, bishop of Rouen, Germerius (or Germier) founded the monastery of Isle (now Saint-Pierre-aux-Bois). As was somewhat customary in his day, he left a secular career and the married state to embrace the religious life, entering the monastery of Pentale (now Saint-Samson-sur-Risle), where he became abbot. Because of misunderstandings with his flock he left the abbey and pursued the eremitic life for five years, then he founded the Abbey of Flay (now Saint-Germer-de-Flay), where he was again made abbot.

Feast: Sept. 24.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Sept. 6:692–708. J. MABILON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti 2:455–462. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptorum rerum Merovingicarum 4:628–633. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 9:496–498. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 3:628–629. G. MARSOT, Catholicisme 4:1891–92.

[O. L. KAPSNER]

GERO OF COLOGNE, ST.

Archbishop of Cologne; d. June 28, 976. He was the son of the Margrave Christian of Lausitz and a nephew of Otto I's chaplain, Gero, who had defended the Saxon borders against the Wends. He was invested in 969 at Pavia by OTTO I and sent to CONSTANTINOPLE in 971 to request the Byzantine Princess Anna, daughter of Romanus II (d. 963), as bride for the emperor's son, later OTTO II. He received, instead of Anna, Theophano (d. 991), niece of the Eastern Emperor John I Tzimisces. At the same time Gero brought back the relics of St. Pantaleon for the monastery of that name in Cologne. With his brother Thietmar he founded a Benedictine monastery in Thankmarsfeld that was soon transferred to Nienburg on the Saale. In 972 he founded the Abbey of Gladbach. His name is associated with the beautifully ornamented Gero-codex of the Gospels, now in Darmstadt, given to the Cologne cathedral possibly by the archbishop.

Feast: June 28.

Bibliography: W. NEUSS, ed., Geschichte des Erzbistums Köln (Cologne 1964—) 1:172–173. J. TORSY, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:757–758. W. WATTENBACH, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter bis zur Mitte des 13. Jh. (Stuttgart-Berlin 1904) 1:362. R. HOLTZMANN, Geschichte der sächsischen Kaiserzeit, 900–1024 (4th ed. Munich 1961). A. SCHÜTTE, Handbuch der deutschen Heiligen (Cologne 1941) 140, bibliog. L. BERG, Gero, Erzbischof von Köln (Freiburg 1913).

[M. F. MCCARTHY]

GEROLD, ST.

Hermit; b. c. 920; d. Friesen, Germany, April 10, 978. Descended from the Rhetian family of the counts of Sax, he became a recluse at 38. He bestowed his land on the BENEDICTINE Abbey of EINSIEDELN, in which his sons Bl. Cuno and Bl. Ulric were monks, and built a hermitage on a small plot of forest ground that his friend, OTTO I, gave to him. After his death, his sons occupied his cell and watched over his tomb. Later the forest was cleared and the abbots of Einsiedeln, several of whom were of Gerold's family, established a church on the site. During the REFORMATION the church was destroyed, but in 1662 Abbot Placid erected a new structure to house the relics of Gerold, Cuno, and Ulric, as well as a six-monk priory at the village of Sankt-Gerold near Mitternach in the Walgau. The iconography of St. Gerold pictures him in ducal dress with his two haloed sons beside him, or as freeing a trapped bear from attacking hounds while the bear bows to him.

Feast: April 19.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum April 2:625–627. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 2:129. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 2:73–75. O. RINGHOLZ, Geschichte des fürstlichen Benediktinerstiftes U. L. F. von Einsiedeln (New York 1904) 661–667.

[B. CAVANAUGH]

GEROSA, VINCENZA, ST.

Cofounder of the Sisters of Charity of Lovere; b. Lovere (Lombardy), Italy, Oct. 29, 1784; d. Lovere, June 28, 1847. Vincenza's family was well-to-do and noted for its charities to the poor and to the Church, but it suffered so much from domestic disharmony that Vincenza's mother died away from the household alone and poor. Priests advised the daughter not to exchange her home for that of her uncles, lest she forfeit her patrimonial rights. Once she fell heir, with her sister, to the family fortune, she indulged her charitable zeal by transforming a house belonging to her into a hospital. In it she performed the humblest duties, leaving control to Bartolomea CAPITANIO.

Learning of the latter's intention to found a religious institute that would enable her to expand her charitable endeavors, she became cofounder and ceded all her wealth to the new congregation. When Capitanio died (1833) a year later, Vincenza, in her humility, thought herself totally incapable of carrying on the work. Local priests, however, dissuaded her from returning to secular life.

Vincenza proved sensible, penitent, and courageous enough to surmount every obstacle. To her belongs the credit for drawing up the constitutions of the Sisters of Charity, winning ecclesiastical approval for the institute, guiding it in its early years, and developing its characteristic spirit of amiability, humility, and charity. Against her wish she was elected superior when the first community was juridically established (Nov. 21, 1835). At her death there were 243 members in 24 houses. Her most characteristic saying was: "One who knows the Crucified knows all. One who does not know the Crucified knows nothing." She was beatified May 7, 1933, and canonized May 18, 1950.

St. Vincenza Gerosa.

Feast: June 28.

Bibliography: A. STOCCHETTI, Le Sante Bartolomea Capitanio e Vincenza Gerosa (Vicenza 1950).

[M. C. BIANCHI]

GERSON, JEAN

Chancellor of the University of Paris; b. Jean Charlier, in Gerson, near Rethel, Champagne, Dec. 14, 1363; d. Lyons, July 12, 1429. He became a master of theology Dec. 8, 1392, after study at the College of Navarre in Paris. Having received a D.Th., he succeeded PETER OF AILLY as chancellor of the University of Paris (see PARIS, UNIVERSITY OF) (Apr. 13, 1395). He kept this title until his death, although after the Council of CONSTANCE (1414–18) he was unable to return to Paris, taking refuge in Lyons with his brother, a Celestine. In the tradition of the great humanists, he was one of the masters of the French language. He was a renowned theologian, a spiritual writer of note, the tireless artisan of the peace of the Church. He was a poet when the muse inspired him, a recognized pedagogue, a proven mystic. His chancellorship gave unity to these varied activities, for Paris exercised great influence, and her chancellor was expected to take a stand on all the problems that touched the life of the state, the Church, or the intellectual and moral life of society. Though living in a period of bloody civil crises, e.g., Armagnacs vs. Burgundians, the Cabochian Revolution, Ordonnance Cabochienne, compounded by the Hundred Years' War, Gerson remained loyal to legitimate authority. He urged the reconciliation of the Armagnac and Burgundian parties, but did not hesitate to condemn the excesses of the French court and defend the poor against all oppressors. He opposed Jean Petit's Apologia for tyrannicide and had it condemned in both Paris and Constance, thus incurring the hatred of the Burgundians, who prevented his return to Paris after 1418.

Living in the midst of the WESTERN SCHISM, Gerson labored to effect Church unity. He opposed the use of violence, favoring voluntary resignation of the papal candidates or compromise. He did not support the withdrawal of obedience from antipope BENEDICT XIII (1398–1403), and after its restoration he was a member of the delegation (1408) sent to both popes urging an entente. Of his treatises on the Church, e.g., De unitate ecclesiae, written between 1391 and 1415, 27 are extant. At the Council of Constance, where he was head of the French delegation, his addresses created a sensation. He maintained the thesis of the superiority of the council over the pope, which was actually defined at the fifth session, but he was not an extremist. Though he applauded the election of Pope MARTIN V, he spoke very frankly on the limitation of papal power and insisted on the necessary reform of prelates, of the Curia, and of pontifical finances. During his exile from Paris (1419–29) he continued to write; at least 25 of his works, some of great length, are from this period.

In 1400, while considering resigning his chancellorship, Gerson set forth his conception of teaching in Mémoire sur la réforme de la faculté de théologie. Here he rejected purely speculative science and all theological research cut off from spiritual life or accessible only to an intellectual elite. He felt theological study should be coupled to spiritual and pastoral concerns.

This same tendency appeared in his more than 66 works on the spiritual life, e.g., De vita spirituali animae and De theologia mystica. Never losing sight of practical applications, he warned against deviations from accepted standards (his letters to Bartholomew Clantier on Jan van RUYSBROECK's De ornatu spiritualium nuptiarum), against vain curiosity, and against illusions (his correspondence with the Carthusians). He tried above all to bring such problems within the grasp of the simplest minds, especially in his informal writings, such as Miroir de l'âme, Montagne de contemplation, and Mendicité spirituelle, as well as in letters or treatises of spiritual direction, such as those he wrote for his sisters. Many of these latter writings were in French instead of Latin. He did not write The Imitation of Jesus Christ.

Gerson penned more than 100 sermons and addresses, of which some 60 were in French. He was a renowned orator, accustomed to great occasions and noble audiences, but he was equally at ease speaking to his parishioners at St-Jean-de-Grève. His series of Poenitemini and his great sermon Ad Deum vadit on the Passion are excellent examples of his direct and compelling style. Though an outstanding humanist, he avoided excesses, protesting against the paganism of the Roman de la Rose, because care for souls outweighed his concern for style. His personal life was in harmony with his teachings.

Bibliography: Opera omnia, ed. E. DU PIN, 5 v. (Antwerp 1706); centenary edition, ed. P. GLORIEUX, 11 v. in progress, v.1–6 (Tournai 1960-), biographical essay 1:105–139; bibliog. notes 1:153–166. J. B. L'ECUY, Essai sur la vie de Jean Gerson, 2 v. (Paris 1832). H. JADART, Jean de Gerson: Recherches sur son origine (Rheims 1881). R. THOMASSY, Jean Gerson, chancelier de Notre Dame (Paris 1843). J. B. SCHWAB, Johannes Gerson, Professor der Theologie und Kanzler der Universität Paris (Würzburg 1858). B.P. MCGUIRE, tr., Jean Gerson: Early Works (New York, 1998). J. L. CONNOLLY, John Gerson: Reformer and Mystic (Louvain 1928). E. VANSTEENBERGHE, "Quelques écrits de Jean Gerson: Textes inédits et études," Revue des sciences religieuses 13 (1933) 165–185, 393–424; 14 (1934) 191–218, 370–395; 15 (1935) 532–566; 16 (1936) 33–46. L. MOURIN, "L'Oeuvre oratoire française de Jean Gerson," Archives d'histoire doctrinale et littéraire du moyen-âge 21 (1946) 225–261; Jean Gerson, prédicateur français (Bruges 1952); ed., Six sermons français inédits de Jean Gerson (Paris 1946). A. COMBES, "Études gersoniennes," Archives d'histoire doctrinale et littéraire du moyen-âge 14 (1939) 291–385; 21 (1946) 331–482; Essai sur la critique de Ruysbroeck par Gerson (Paris 1945–). M. LIEBERMAN, "Chronologie gersonienne," Romania 70 (1948–49) 51–67, continued irregularly in subsequent volumes. P. GLORIEUX, "L'Activité littéraire de Gerson à Lyon," Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 18 (1951) 238–307; "Autour de la liste des oeuvres de Gerson," ibid. 22 (1955) 95–109; "L'Enseignement universitaire de Gerson," ibid. 23 (1956) 88–113. A. AMPE, "Les Rédactions successives de l'apologie schoonhovienne pour Ruusbroec contre Gerson," Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 55 (1960) 401–452. D. C. BROWN, Pastor and Laity in the Theology of Jean Gerson (Cambridge, England, 1987). M. S. BURROWS, Jean Gerson and De Consolatione Theologiae (Tübingen, 1991). J. L. CONNOLLY, John Gerson: Reformer and Mystic (Louvain, 1928). J. B. MORRALL, Gerson and the Great Schism (Manchester, 1960). L. B. PASCOE, Jean Gerson, Principles of Church Reform (Leiden, 1973).

[P. GLORIEUX]

GERTRUDE (THE GREAT), ST.

A German nun and mystic; b. Jan. 6, 1256; d. Helfta, near Eisleben, Saxony, Nov. 17, 1302, or possibly 1301.

Nothing is known of her birthplace, family, or the circumstances of her entrance into the monastery. She was committed to the care of the nuns at the monastery of Helfta at the age of five, and in the company of other oblates such as herself received a careful education. Unusually talented, she gave herself zealously to study. At the age of 25 she discovered the mystical life. She enjoyed visions and interior graces, but apart from that, little is known of her life. She certainly worked as a copyist in the monastic scriptorium. Although often too ill to be present at all the choral Offices, she served as second chantress with St. Mechtild of Hackeborn (1241–98), who was also favored with revelations. In fact, the experiences of these two saints were inseparable; both belonged to the same mystical school of the 13th-century spiritual renaissance of the Cistercians. The nuns of Helfta, however, were independent and never juridically attached to the Cistercian Order.

Gertrude's "conversion," a mystical experience that took place Jan. 27, 1281, was for her a living encounter with Christ and the revelation of a bond of love between Him and herself. The entire spirituality of the mystics of Helfta was centered on that type of union with the person of Christ. Their spirituality was essentially what is called by some theologians a Brautmystik, or a nuptial mysticism. Gertrude certainly knew the school of abstract and speculative spirituality current at the time in the Low Countries and the Rhineland, but she did not belong to it. Union with Christ was the way by which her contemplation progressed toward the life of the "resplendent and completely calm Trinity." Her Christocentric perspective found expression in a devotion to the SACRED HEART, upon the later development of which the revelations and lyrical outpourings of SS. Mechtild and Gertrude had an important influence. Another essential characteristic of Gertrude's spirituality was the unity that constant attention to God established among the activities in her monastic life—Scripture study, spiritual reading, prayer, and choral Office. For her the liturgy was not simply a duty to be fulfilled at certain hours but rather the rhythm of her life of prayer. The liturgy and Scripture furnished her with the doctrinal themes of her piety, the best of her images, and even the form of her lyricism. But more than that, it was a "mystery," a sacrament of the presence of Christ. Hence instead of being in contradiction, her liturgical and personal prayer were in profound harmony.

Three Latin works are attributed to St. Gertrude. (1) The Exercitia spiritualia. This title was probably not given to the work by Gertrude herself. These exercises represent seven affective meditations. They tend to renew in the soul a consciousness of the work of holiness accomplished by grace from baptism up to the preparation for death. (2) The Insinuationes (called also Revelationes or Legatus divinae pietatis), which is composed of five books. The essential point is to be found in bk. 2, written by Gertrude herself in 1289 as a memorial of her mystical experiences over an eight-year period. In the following years she wrote in the sense that she dictated, or perhaps simply inspired, other confidences and recollections. After her death the whole corpus of her other writings was reassembled in three other books (3, 4, 5) by a companion, another nun of the same monastery who also wrote an introduction to justify the entire work (bk. 1). This introductory book is in the manner of a biographical study. (3) Preces Gertrudianae, which is the book through which most people have known her. However, the work is not really authentic. It was composed in the 17th century, and is a flowery collection of loving effusions impregnated with the spirit and lyricism characteristic of St. Gertrude, but only some of the passages represent a faithful reproduction of her actual texts.

Feast: Nov. 16.

Bibliography: Works. Revelationes Gertrudianae ac Mechtildianae, ed. L. PAQUELIN and J. POTHIER (Poitiers 1875–77) v.1. The Exercises of St. Gertrude, ed. and tr. a Benedictine of Regina Laudis (Westminster, Md. 1960). The Life and Revelations of St. Gertrude, Virgin and Abbess, of the Order of St. Benedict, tr. M. F. C. CUSACK (Westminster, Md. 1949). Prayers of St. Gertrude and St. Mechtilde of the Order of St. Benedict (Philadelphia 1955), spurious. Literature. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:761. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique de fêtes, ed. by the Benedictines of Paris (Paris 1935–56) 11:520–536, extensive bibliog. The Love of the Sacred Heart, pref. A. GOODIER (New York 1922), contains excerpts from her writings. M. J. FINNEGAN, Scholars and Mystics (Chicago 1962). "Similitudes in the Writings of St. Gertrude of Helfta," Mediaeval Studies 19 (1957) 48–54. P. DOYÈRE, "St. Gertrude, Nun and Mystic," Worship 34 (1960) 536–543.

[P. DOYÈRE]

GERTRUDE OF NIVELLES, ST.

Abbess; b. 626; d. between 653 and 659. The daughter of Pepin of Landen and St. Iduberga, she entered the double MONASTERY of Nivelles (Belgium) that her mother, a widow, had just founded (640). There she succeeded her mother as superior (652), ruling a house in which, according to Celtic custom, the nuns and monks were subject to an abbess. Gertrude was an example of virtue and a defender of Irish monasticism; her abbey later sent the first nuns to Andenne, founded by her sister, St. BEGGA. Gertrude is invoked against mice, then the bane of the countryside. Her remains are preserved in a reliquary, a masterpiece of silverwork (dating from 1272–98), now in the collegiate church of Nivelles. The vita of St. Gertrude of Nivelles was written c. 670, and it was rewritten sometime in the 11th century.

Feast: March 17.

Bibliography: Life. Acta Sanctorum March 2:590–603. Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1826–) 2:447–474. Literature. L. VAN DER ESSEN, Étude . . . des saints mérovingiens (Louvain 1907). P. WENZEL, Die Frauenstifte der Diözese Lüttich (Bonn 1909). B. DELANNE, Histoire . . . Nivelles (Nivelles 1944). J. HOEBANX, L'Abbaye de Nivelles . . . (Brussels 1952). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:620–621. R. FORGEUR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:761–762. A. WAUTERS in Biographie nationale de Belgique, v.7 (1880–83) 680–684.

[É. BROUETTE]

GERULF, ST.

Martyr; b. Meerendra, Belgium, c. 732; d. near Ghent, Belgium, c. 750. A 10th-century legend reports that Gerulf was confirmed at the age of 18 in the monastery of St. Bavon at Gand. After the ceremony, while Gerulf and his godfather were riding home, the devil possessed the godfather, who threatened to kill Gerulf. The boy protested that he would go to hell if he did, but the man pierced him with his sword. Gerulf's mother saw the bloody and riderless horse return and instinctively knew what had happened. His body was buried first in the church of Bl. Redegund in Meerendra, but after several miracles it was moved in the 9th century to the monastery at Dronghem, Flanders, where Gerulf was venerated as a saint. His relics were frequently translated and gradually suffered dispersal until, after the Catholic restoration of 1584, only the head was left to be enshrined again at Dronghem, which was under the care of the PREMONSTRATIENSIS.

Feast: Sept. 21.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Sept. 6:250–270. A. SANDERUS, Hagiologium Flandriae (Antwerp 1625) 72–83. W. LAMPEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:763.

[B. CAVANAUGH]

GERVAISE, FRANÇOIS ARMAND

Historian, abbot of La Trappe; b. Paris, 1660; d. Le Reclus, 1751. He was the son of a Parisian physician and was educated by the Jesuits. He joined first the Discalced Carmelites, then in 1695, the reformed Cistercians at LA

TRAPPE. He was Armand de RANCÉ's successor as abbot of La Trappe (1696–98) but his restless and quarrelsome temper forced his resignation. He drifted from monastery to monastery until the end of his long life. Seeking compensation for his personal calamities in writing, he published a large number of biographies and critical studies composed with skill but with conspicuous lack of balance and objectivity. Of these only one has retained an undeserved popularity with monastic historians, the Histoire générale de la réforme de l'ordre de Cîteaux (Avignon 1746). It was printed clandestinely in Paris as a savage attack against the unreformed Common Observance of CISTERCIANS and is responsible for the transmission to posterity of a wholly unjust and distorted view of the process of reform during the 17th century. By the demand of the indignant Cîteaux a royal lettre de cachet relegated the octogenarian author to the monastery of Le Reclus for the remaining five years of his life. His two-volume biography of Rancé remained in manuscript form for more than a century and was edited only in 1866 by Abbé Dubois, Histoire de l'Abbé de Rancé et de sa réforme (Paris).

Bibliography: For a full list of works see: J. BESSE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 6:1339–40. L. J. LEKAI, "The Unpublished Second Volume of Gervaise's 'Histoire générale de la réforme de l'ordre de Cîteaux en France,'" Analecta Sacri Ordinis Cisterciensis 17 (1961) 278–283; "The Problem of the Authorship of De Rancé's 'Standard' Biography," Collectanea Ordinis Cisterciensium Reformatorum 21 (1959) 157–163.

[L. J. LEKAI]

GERVASE, GEORGE, BL.

Benedictine priest and martyr; b. Bosham, Sussex, England, c. 1569–71; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London), April 11, 1608. Although born into two well-established families (Jervis and Shelly) of Suffolk, George suffered much in his short life. He was orphaned while young. Thereafter he was kidnapped to the West Indies. During his 12-year captivity, he lost his faith. Upon returning to England he learned that his brother Henry was suffering voluntary exile in Flanders so that he could continue to practice his religion. George tracked him down and was reconciled to the Church, entered the seminary at Douai (1595), and was ordained a priest at Cambrai (1603). Immediately thereafter he began his ministry in England, which was interrupted in June 1606 by arrest and banishment. After making a pilgrimage to Rome and unsuccessfully seeking admittance to the Society of Jesus, he returned to Douai, where he received the Benedictine habit at St. Gregory's. He was arrested soon after arriving in England and condemned under the statute 27 Elizabeth. Some authorities say he did not receive the Benedictine habit until a short time before his death from Fr. Augustine Bradshaw. He is the protomartyr of St. Gregory's Abbey (now Downside). He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GERVASE OF CANTERBURY

English chronicler; d. c. 1210. The first certain date in his life, Feb. 16, 1163, marks his profession as a monk of Christ Church, CANTERBURY, in the presence of Abp. Thomas BECKET, whose burial he was to attend seven years later. Gervase seems to have spent most of his life at Canterbury, composing the historical works that are his claim to fame. A typical monastic historian of that age, he filtered all events through the screen of his own monastery's interests. His earliest work was an analysis of the controversy between his archbishop, RICHARD OF CANTERBURY, and the monks of the neighboring abbey of ST. AUGUSTINE (1179–83). This was followed by an account of a struggle between Christ Church and Archbishop BALDWIN OF CANTERBURY (1185–91) in which Gervase was an active participant, probably drawing up some of the letters justifying the stand of Christ Church. It was at this time that Gervase began his major work, the Chronica, which covered the period from 1100 to 1199; the narration was carried to 1209 by his lesser work, Gesta regum, which is especially valuable for the history of King JOHN. Gervase wrote also Actus pontificum Cantuariensis ecclesiae, a history of the archbishops of Canterbury from AUGUSTINE OF CANTERBURY to HUBERT WALTER; a topographical work, Mappa Mundi, on ecclesiastical foundations in the British Isles; and a graphic account of the burning of Canterbury cathedral, Sept. 5, 1174.

Bibliography: Historical Works, ed. W. STUBBS, 2 v. Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores (Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores 1879–80). D. M. KNOWLES, "The Mappa Mundi of Gervase of Canterbury," Downside Review 48 (Yeovil, England 1930) 237–247.

[D. NICHOLL]

GERVASE OF REIMS

Archbishop; b. Coémont, Sarthe, France, Feb. 2, 1008; d. July 4, 1067. He was the son of Aimon and Hildegard (Hildeburg), sister of Bishop Avesgand of Le Mans (d. in 1036). Gervase succeeded his uncle in the See of Le Mans and was consecrated bishop Dec. 18, 1036. He was impeded in the exercise of his episcopal office particularly by Geoffrey of Anjou (d. 1060), who imprisoned him for seven years, but in a synod at Reims in 1049 Pope LEO IX threatened to excommunicate the Count of Anjou if he did not release the bishop (Mansi 19:742). Geoffrey yielded, but only after the prisoner had turned over to him Château-du-Loir. In 1055 Gervase was promoted to the archbishopric of REIMS, in which office he functioned also as chancellor and primate of the realm. On Pentecost, May 23, 1059, he solemnly crowned PHILIP I, who swore to guarantee and defend the rights of the Church. In 1063 Gervase petitioned Pope ALEXANDER II to come to Reims on important ecclesiastical matters, but the pontiff sent PETER DAMIAN, "our eye and redoubtable bulwark of the Apostolic See," as his legate (P. Jaffé, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198 L 1:5416).

Bibliography: J. D. MANSI Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 31 v. (Florence-Venice 1757–98). Patologia latina 143:870, 1397–1404, 1547–49. Gallia Christiana 9:68–70. R. CELLIER, Histoire générale des auteurs sacrés et ecclésiastiques 13:263–266. C. J. HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. H. LECLERCQ, 4.2:1024. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours 8:22. H. G. KRAUSE, Studi gregoriani 7 (1960) 52. H. GLASER, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche 2 4:764.

[H. DRESSLER]

GERVASE OF TILBURY

Author of a medieval book of universal knowledge; b. probably Tilbury, Essex, England, c. 1140; d. probably England, c. 1220. He studied and briefly taught law at the University of Bologna; in 1177 he was an eyewitness to the peace talks between Emperor FREDERICK I BARBAROSSA and Pope ALEXANDER III. Shortly afterward he seems to have returned to England, where he had high connections at court and where he attached himself to King HENRY II's son, Henry (d. 1183), for whom he wrote the now-lost Liber facetiarum. Gervase next entered the service of King William II of Sicily (d. 1189), the son-in-law of Henry II, and it is known that he was in Salerno during the siege of Acre (1190–91). Subsequently, through his various English connections, he was taken into the service of Emperor OTTO IV, the grandson of Henry II. Otto made Gervase marshal of the kingdom of ARLES, and there he seems to have married. In 1209 he accompanied Otto IV to Rome for his imperial coronation, and in 1211, when Otto was excommunicated by Pope INNOCENT III, Gervase was already writing his famous Otia imperialia for Otto. He finished the work in 1214, the year the emperor met disastrous defeat at Bouvines, which forced him to retire to his own principality of Brunswick, while Gervase seems to have returned to England. The Otia imperialia, a book written for the instruction and entertainment of the monarch, was divided into three sections. The first, in 24 chapters, beginning with the creation of the world, includes a physical description of the earth and traces world history up to the Flood. The second section, in 36 chapters, begins with Noe and his sons and the division of the world into Asia, Europe, Africa, etc., and describes certain areas in detail, especially the regions of western Europe, listing and discussing various lines of kings. Section three, in 119 chapters, is quite eclectic, treating of such diverse topics as stones, trees, animals, serpents, the British Sea, Christ's cross, Thomas the Apostle, and water that becomes salt. The Otia is of special interest because of the insight it gives into the mental equipment of a man whom contemporary society held to be well educated, and because of its moderate stand in discussing the proper relationship of pope and emperor.

Bibliography: Otia imperialia, ed. G. W. LEIBNIZ, in his Scriptores rerum Brunsvicensium, 3 v. (Hanover 1707–11) 1:884–1004; 2:751–784; complete third section, ed. F. LIEBRECHT (Hanover 1856); selections, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 27:359–394. W. HUNT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 7:1120–21. J. R. CALDWELL, “The Autograph MS of G. of T.,” Scriptorium 11 (1957) 87–98; “MSS of G. of T.’s Otia imperialia,” ibid. 16 (1962) 28–45; “The Interrelationship of the MSS of G. of T.’s Otia imperialia,” ibid. 246–274; “G. of T.’s Addenda to his Otia imperialia,” Medieval Studies 24 (1962) 95–126. K. SCHNITH, “Otto IV und Gervasius von Tilbury: Gedanken zu den Otia imperialia,” Historisches Jahrbuch der Gö-Gesellschaft 82 (1963) 50–69.

[M. J. HAMILTON]

GERVASE AND PROTASE, SS.

Ss. Gervase and Protase, martyrs, are patrons of Milan; dates unknown. Nothing is known of the life or martyrdom of these saints; even their existence has been questioned. The tradition that they were martyred during the persecution of Nero is unreliable, since there is no evidence for a Christian community in Milan before the end of the 2nd century. Their tombs were in the church of SS. Nabor and Felix, which was rebuilt after the Peace of the Church (313). In this church St. AMBROSE OF MILAN discovered the bodies on June 17, 386, and he translated the relics to the newly dedicated basilica named after him. The identification of the bodies was based on their extraordinary size, the finding of an ampula, and the miraculous cure of a blind man. Ambrose himself described the rediscovery of the relics in an extant letter to his sister Marcellina. The cult of Gervase and Protase spread rapidly in Italy, in Gaul, and throughout Western Christendom. In the 5th century a legend describing their martyrdom was forged and ascribed to St. Ambrose. Without historical merit, the legend connects them with Nazarius and Celsus as sons of Vitalis and Valeria, who had a church dedicated to her in Milan. The earliest extant representation of Gervase and Protase is in S. Vitale, Ravenna. The relics of the martyrs are now venerated in a silver reliquary in the cathedral of Breisach in Baden, where Emperor FREDERICK I BARBAROSSA's Chancellor, Rainald von Dassel, is alleged to have translated them. The original relics, however, are still under the main altar of the Basilica of St. Ambrose in Milan.

Feast: June 19.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 4:680–704. P. FRANCHI DE'CAVALIERI, Nuovo Bullettino di archeologia cristiana, 9 (1903) 109–126. G. RAUSCHEN, Jahrbücher der christlichen Kirche unter dem Kaiser Theodosius dem Grossen (Freiburg 1897) 243–. E. LUCIUS, Die Anfänge des Heiligenkults, ed. G. ANRICH (Tübingen 1904) 153–. H. DELEHAYE, Analecta Bollandiana 49 (1931) 30–35; Les Origines du culte des martyrs (2d ed. Brussels 1933) 75–78. H. GÜNTER, Die Psychologie der Legende (Freiburg 1949) 348–.

[J. BRÜCKMANN]

GERVIN OF OUDENBURG, ST.

Abbot; b. Flanders, 11th century; d. Forest of Cosfort, Flanders, April 17, 1117. He had traveled to Rome and had also made two pilgrimages to JERUSALEM, before he became a BENEDICTINE monk and priest at Bergues-Saint-Winoc. He left the monastery to lead the life of a hermit; but while he was in the vicinity of the abbey of Oudenburg (Aldenburg) in 1095, he was elected abbot by the monks. About 1105 he resigned his office to spend his last years living alone in the forest near the abbey. The holiness of his life soon won him a reputation for sanctity.

Feast: Apr. 17.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum April 2:492. Patrologia Latina 174: 1480. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige 2:61–62. G. MARSOT, Catholicisme 4:1898–99. S. HILPISCH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:765.

[E. J. KEALEY]

GÉRY OF CAMBRAI, ST.

Bishop and patron of Cambrai; b. Carignan, France, mid-6th century; d. Aug. 11, c. 625. He was the son of Gaudentius and Austadiola. Because of his exemplary life, Magneric, Bishop of Trier (d. 596), conferred the TONSURE on Géry and according to report, he promised to ordain him a deacon as soon as he knew the Psalter by heart. Upon the death of their bishop, the inhabitants of CAMBRAI chose Géry for the episcopal office. With the approval of Childebert II (d. 596), Archbishop Giles of Reims consecrated him c. 584. Géry appears fourth in the list of bishops of Cambrai, but it is unclear whether he or his predecessor moved the episcopal residence from Arras to Cambrai. The 7th-century vita of Géry, written by a cleric at Cambrai, is too preoccupied with reported miracles to give much biographical detail. The saint was zealous in uprooting paganism, compassionate to prisoners and to the poor. He built a church in honor of St. MÉDARD, made a pilgrimage to Tours, and attended a council held at Paris in 614.

The beginnings of Géry's cult are unclear, but by the 9th century his name was in the Litany of All Saints used in Cologne.

Feast: Aug. 11.

Bibliography: Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Concilia (Berlin 1826) 1:191. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux 3.1:251. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1826—) 3:649–658. P. GAMS, Series episcoporum ecclesiae catholicae (Regensburg 1873) 526. Acta Sanctorum Aug. 2:664–693. L. VAN DER ESSEN, Étude critique et littéraire sur les Vitae des saints mérovingiens de l'ancienne Belgique (Louvain 1907) 206–211. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes 8:198–199. H. PLATELLE, Catholicisme 4:1901. B. GAIFFIER, Analecta Bollandiana 79 (1961) 288. M. COENS, ibid. 77 (1959) 386; 80 (1962) 153.

[H. DRESSLER]

GESTA ROMANORUM

A collection of exempla, or anecdotes, arranged for the use of preachers in the late 13th century. The title, which suggests historical material and Roman origin, is misleading, for the narratives are of many kinds including Oriental tales, classical fables, and Christian saints' legends, all supplied with moral application for sermon use. According to scholarly opinion, the collection was originally gathered in England, but was soon imitated on the Continent in sets of stories considerably different from the contents of the English manuscripts. The Anglo-Latin version is one of the finest of all the European EXEMPLUM books and well deserved the copying and imitation that it received. It has sometimes been attributed to John of BROMYARD, the known author of another such collection called the Summa predicantium, but he flourished too late for authorship of the Gesta. The Continental version has also been uncertainly associated, usually with the names of Hélinand or of Berchorius, a French Benedictine. The Latin narratives were subjected to translation in the late Middle Ages into various vernacular languages, the earliest English versions being made in the reign of Henry VI, c. 1430.

With the invention of movable type, the tales of the Gesta spread rapidly. The collection was first printed at Utrecht in 1472 in its Latin form and soon elsewhere in various translations. One of the most precious of such editions survives in a unique copy bearing the imprint of Wynkyn de Worde, dating from c. 1510. Containing 43 of the stories in English, it became the basis of Richard Robinson's version printed in Elizabeth's reign and possibly was known to Shakespeare, who immortalized three of the tales in King Lear, Pericles, and The Merchant of Venice.

Bibliography: Gesta Romanorum, ed. H. OESTERLEY (Berlin 1872) Lat. text; Eng. tr. C. SWANN, ed. W. HOOPER (London 1877). The Early English Versions of the G. R., ed. S. J. H. HERRTAGE (EEngTSoc 33; 1879; repr. 1962). J. T. WELTER, L'Exemplum dans la littérature religieuse et didactique du moyen âge (Paris 1927). G. R. OWST, Literature and Pulpit in Medieval England (2d ed. New York 1961).

[E. C. DUNN]

GESUALDO, CARLO

Prince of Venosa, progressive Renaissance composer; b. Naples, c. 1560; d. Naples, Sept. 8, 1613. He lived chiefly at his country estate of Venosa, although his travels in Italy (especially a three-year sojourn in Ferrara) brought him into contact with poets and musicians of the highest rank. He knew Tasso and set several of his poems as madrigals, of which seven books have been preserved. At Ferrara he probably met MARENZIO, Luzzaschi, and VICENTINO, whose experiments with subtleties of tuning and temperament may have influenced Gesualdo's sometimes bizarre harmonic vocabulary. This he used as a means of heightening expression in already vivid verbal texts, applying this in some degree to his religious music, most of which he had published in two books of Sacrae cantiones (1603) and a volume of Responsories and other compositions for Holy Week (1611). These are all of excellent quality, although somewhat eclipsed by the subsequent fame of the madrigal books. His reputation has always been clouded by the story, based on substantial evidence, that he ordered the murder of his wife and her lover.

Bibliography: Gesamtausgabe, ed. W. WEISMANN et al. (Hamburg 1960–). Tres sacrae cantiones, completed I. STRAWINSKY (New York 1960). C. GRAY, Carlo Gesualdo (London 1926).

Thomas Merton dipping his hand in holy water, Abbey of Gethsemani, Louisville, Kentucky. (©Horace Bristol/CORBIS)

G. R. MARSHALL, The Harmonic Laws in the Madrigals of Carlo Gesualdo (doctoral diss. microfilm: New York U. 1956). H. F. REDLICH, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 5:41–45. “Gesualdo and the Italian Madrigal,” Listener 48 (1952) 481. E. LAWTON, Enciclopedia della musica (Milan 1963–65) v.1. A. EINSTEIN, The Italian Madrigal, tr. A. H. KRAPPE et al., 3 v. (Princeton 1949) 2:688–717. D. ARNOLD, Gesualdo (London 1984). L. BIANCONI, “Carlos Gesualdo” in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, v. 7, ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980) 313–324. H. MEISTER, “Ausdruck und musikalische Gestalt der Madrigale Gesualdos” (Ph.D. diss. Köln, 1973); “Untersuchungen zum Verhältnis von Text und Vertonung in den Madrigalen Carlo Gesualdos,” Kölner Beiträge zur Musikforschung 74 (1973), 1–205. D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge, Mass. 1996) 304. N. SLONIMSKY, ed. Baker’s Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, (New York 1992) 616.

[D. STEVENS]

GETHSEMANI, ABBEY OF

A monastery of Cistercian Monks of the Strict Observance (Trappists) situated about 15 miles south of Bardstown, Ky., and considered one of the historical monuments of the Commonwealth. Unsuccessful attempts had been made in 1805 by Dom Urban Guillet and Trappist refugees from revolutionary France to establish a permanent community in this part of Kentucky. On Dec. 21, 1848, a colony of 44 monks from the Breton Abbey of Melleray, near Nantes, settled on this site which had been purchased from the Sisters of Loretto. Gethsemani was the first monastic community in the U.S. to be raised to abbatial rank (1851). The first abbot, Eutropius Proust, was blessed in Bardstown cathedral on Oct. 26, 1851, by Bp. Benedict Flaget.

During this early period, the strict rule, plus the rigors of the primitive and isolated life of the monks, discouraged postulants from entering or persevering. Under its third abbot, Edward Chaix Bourbon (resigned 1898), the Gethsemani community was on the point of expiring when it was revived by the energetic administration of Edmond OBRECHT (1898–1935).

Gethsemani’s history in the mid-20th century was marked by an extraordinary influx of vocations, reaching a climax in 1952 when the community numbered 279. Although it is often wrongly stated that this unusual growth began suddenly after World War II, in actual fact it had already begun by the late 1930s. Under the fifth abbot, Frederick DUNNE (1935–48), the first American-born postulant to persevere as a choir monk at Gethsemani, the first two foundations of Gethsemani were made at Conyers, Ga. (1944) and at Huntsville, Utah (1947). The next abbot, James Fox, made foundations on the Luce Plantation at Mepkin, S.C. (1949), at Piffard, N.Y. (1951), and on Vina Ranch in the Sacramento Valley of California (1955). The abbatial church of Gethsemani was elevated to the rank of a minor basilica on May 3, 1949.

Bibliography: T. MERTON, The Waters of Siloe (New York 1949). M. RAYMOND, The Man Who Got Even with God (Milwaukee 1941); Burnt out Incense (New York 1949); The Less Traveled Road (Milwaukee 1953).

[T. MERTON/EDS]

GEULINCX, ARNOLD

Cartesian philosopher; b. Antwerp, Jan. 31, 1624; d. Leyden, November 1669. He studied at the University of Louvain, where he was named professor and later dean (1654). His frankly Cartesian sympathies and his attachment to JANSENISM and later to CALVINISM obliged him to resign (1658) and take refuge in Leyden. Deeply impressed by his reading of Descartes’s works, Geulincx rediscovered in them the decisive stages of doubt and of the cogito. But he linked these with the results of an inspiration very different from that of Descartes. The cogito is not so much the affirmation of a thinking substance as the consciousness of entire dependence with regard to God: the individual spirits of men are only modes of the infinite spirit of God, just as particular things are only modes of universal extension. Whence it follows that of himself man can perceive only what God allows him to perceive and that if he himself can will, this willing is limited by the absolute inefficiency of a passive perception. “Nihil est in me praeter cognoscere et velle; nudus sum hujusce mundi contemplator: spectator sum in hac scena, non actor” (Ethica, 1). The principle of this sharing between things and self, as between God and self, is given in one of the fundamental propositions of the doctrine: “qua fronte dicam, id me facere, quod quomodo fiat, nescio” (ibid.). From this is also derived the first rule of morality: “ubi nihil vales, ibi nihil velis” (ibid.). This governs all the obligations that the rule prescribes and the unity of the virtues it retains, the main one of which is humility.

See Also: CARTESIANISM; OCCASIONALISM.

Bibliography: Opera philosophica, ed. J. P. N. LAND, 3 v. (The Hague 1891–1893). Arnold Geulincx, trans. A. DE LATTRE (Paris 1970). A. DEL NOCE, Enciclopedia filosofica 2:693–699. V. VAN DER HÄGHEN, Geulincx: Étude sur sa vie, sa philosophie et ses ouvrages (Ghent 1886). J. P. N. LAND, Arnold Geulincx (The Hague 1895). E. TERRAILLON, La Morale de Geulincx dans ses rapports avec la philosophie de Descartes (Paris 1912). B. ROUSSET, Geulincx entre Descartes et Spinoza (Paris 1999).

[A. DE LATTRE]

GEZELINUS, BL.

Cistercian lay brother; d. c. 1137. According to the legend of his life, he was a CISTERCIAN lay brother in the Abbey of Altenberg. He supposedly spent some time as a shepherd and hermit in the Rhineland. He was buried in Leverkusen-Schlebusch, and in 1814 his relics were translated to the parish church of Sankt Andreas.

Feast: Aug. 6.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Aug. 2:172–173. A. HEINTZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 4:878. P. OPLADEN, Heimatbuch Leverkusen-Schlebusch (Leverkusen 1952) 2:79–88.

[B. J. COMASKEY]

GEZZELINUS, BL.

Hermit; d. Aug. 6, 1138. He was a hermit in Grünenwald near Luxembourg and for almost 14 years lived without shelter or clothing in the mountains and forests. With incredible patience and endurance he bore the summer heat and winter cold with herbs and roots as his only food. The monk ACHARD of Clairvaux is supposed to Capital: Accra.

Size: 92,100 sq. miles.
Population: 19,533,560 in 2000.
Languages: English; Akan, Moshi-Dagomba, Ewe, and Ga are spoken in various regions.
Religions: 4,102,505 Catholics (21%), 4,300,830 Muslims (22%), 4,884,333 Protestants (25%), 6,245,892 practice indigenous faiths (32%).

have met Gezzelinus while staying at the Abbey of HIMMEROD as a master builder and to have given him the habit of BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX. On the basis of this the CISTERCIANS number him as one of their own, but in fact he never assumed the habit. He was buried in the Benedictine abbey church of Maria-Münster in the city of Luxembourg, but his relics have disappeared since the destruction of the abbey church in 1544.

Feast: Aug. 6.

Bibliography: A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige 2:544; 4:88. B. GRIESSER, ed., Exordium magnum Cisterciense (Series scriptorum sancti ordinis cisterciensis 2; Rome 1961) 202. Patrologia Latina 185.1:455–459.

[C. SPAHR]

GHANA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Formerly the British Colony of the Gold Coast, the Republic of Ghana is located in West Africa bordering the Gulf of Guinea on the south, Côte d'Ivoire on the west, BURKINA FASO on the north and northwest, and TOGO on the east. A flat region with a predominately tropical climate, Ghana rises to mountains in the southeast. The north is primarily grassland, while in the south are dense forests. Agricultural products include coco, cassava, corn and palm oil, while natural resources consist of bauxite, diamonds, gold and manganese. Harmattan winds visit the region in late winter, and periods of drought are not uncommon.

Ghana, which was formed from a merger of several British colonial holdings—on the west the Gold Coast and on the east the Togoland Trust Territory—was granted internal autonomy in 1954 and independence in 1957. In 1960 it became a republic within the British Commonwealth, and fell under a series of civilian regimes before beginning multi-party elections in 1993. Despite the wealth of natural resources in the region, by the start of the 21st century Ghana remained dependent on foreign aid due to its continued instability.

Archdioceses	Suffragans
Accra	Ho, Jasikan, Keta-Akatsi, Koforidua
Cape Coast	Goaso, Konongo-Mampong, Kumasi, Obuasi, Sekondi-Takoradi, Sunyani, Wiawso
Tamale	Damongo, Navrongo-Bolgatonga, Wa, Yendi

The Developing Church. Encompassing an ancient African kingdom known as “the land of gold” as early as 800, Ghana was discovered by Portuguese traders in 1471. Portuguese priests arrived at the coast beginning in 1482, although their efforts were hampered by the developing slave trade in the region. Ghana was captured by the Dutch in 1637, but was returned to the Portuguese in trade for Brazil five years later. Sporadic missionary work was carried on by the Augustinians (1572–76), the Capuchins (1637–84) and the Dominicans (1687–1704), although these early efforts were seriously hampered by tribal hostilities, a myriad of native languages, an unhealthy climate and the now-booming slave trade carried on by competing Dutch, British, Danish and French interests. Accra had an African priest from 1679 to 1682.

The Vicariate of the Two Guineas, created in 1842, included Ghana. In 1879, four years after the region became a British colony, the Prefecture Apostolic of the Gold Coast was erected and entrusted to the Society of the AFRICAN MISSIONS. Catholic missionary work began in earnest in 1880, following active Protestant evangelization efforts begun as early as 1737 and growing in strength through the efforts of Presbyterian and Methodist missionaries in the 1800s. In 1901 Ghana expanded northward and by 1906 the White Fathers began to evangelize this new region. In 1943 the Prefecture Apostolic of Accra was established and entrusted to the Society of the DIVINE WORD. In 1950, with 300,000 Catholics in the country, the hierarchy was established, with Cape Coast (formerly Vicariate of the Gold Coast, 1901–50) as archdiocese and metropolitan see. The Ghana Catholic Bishops’ Conference was established in 1960.

In 1956 the territory of Togoland voted for union with Ghana, and the region achieved independence from Great Britain a year later, on March 7, 1957. A republic was established under the leadership of Kwame Nkrumah in 1960, but was overthrown by a military coup in 1966. Although the civilian government was restored in 1969, its fall again within three years foreshadowed the political unrest that would plague the region for several decades.

Bibliography: R. M. WILTGEN Gold Coast Mission History: 1471–1880 (Techy, IL 1956). Bilan du Monde, 2 v. (Tournai 1964) 2:403–408.

[R. M. WILTGEN]

The Modern Church. The Second Vatican Council, held from 1962–65, inspired a re-evaluation of the Ghanaian Church’s relationship to its cultural milieu. Taking account of the socio-religious traditions shaping the country, the Church recognized the need for a dynamic interaction between the Gospels and native traditions. As a result, meaningful symbols from local cultures were introduced into the liturgy, and in catechesis Ghanaian concepts were used to transmit the message of the Gospel. Another postconciliar development was the resurgence of spiritual activity among lay people. The Spiritual Renewal Center in Kumasi and the Wanye Renewal Center at Wa were organized to support the formation of lay groups in their regions. As a result of diocesan training, lay people soon staffed national and diocesan departments and commissions.

Church Weathers Political Upheaval. Through a series of coups, a succession of governments held short-term control of the country following the fall of Nkrumah. Then, in 1979 a military government under Jerry Rawlings took power through brutal means. On Dec. 31, 1981 the brutality of Rawlings and his cadre of junior military officers reached extreme proportions, including the murder of three judges and a retired army major. The constitution was suspended, and freedom of speech curtailed. Catholic schools had been nationalized in 1950; in 1987 the teaching of Christian religion within Ghana’s public schools was further curtailed by the state, and by the late 1990s the Church role in education had been reduced to appointing and supervising teachers. In 1985 the government forced the shut-down of the Church-run Catholic Standard after it criticized state policy, and four years later, in June of 1989, required the registration of all religious bodies, although this law was later repealed. The Catholic Standard resumed publication in 1992. The Church remained active in the areas of education, medical care and socio-economic well-being. Under pressure from international organizations, Rawlings eventually restored democracy, although he won the first multiparty election, held in November of 1992 amid some controversy.

Continues Active Role in Politics, Society. The growing presence of native bishops in the Ghana Catholic Bishops’ Conference during the 1970s enabled it to play an active role in the protection and defense of human rights. The Conference maintained a good working relationship with the Christian Council of Ghana and on several instances worked together to jointly protest government injustices. In 1972 the bishops published a statement on family planning to express concern about public policy. A pastoral letter in December of 1973 stressed the right to life as fundamental to human beings. In September of 1982, a Justice and Peace Commission document drew the nation's attention to the causes of the steady desertification of the country. To stop the process, it made some important recommendations and suggested measures for their implementation. In July of 1988 the bishops issued a statement on the effects of the government's Economic Recovery Program, expressing their indignation at high taxes, the importation of drugs forbidden in the countries of their origin and the vast funds being used for Family Planning. And in 1991 they published The Catholic Church and Ghana's Search for a New Democratic System, a document that strongly advocated the promotion of human rights, the harmonization of aspects of structures and norms of traditional constitutions with modern ones, party politics and the enshrinement of the freedom of expression and of the press in a future constitution. Ghana's April 1992 constitution reflected most of the concerns in this document.

Pope John Paul II, Kumasi, Ghana, May 1980. (©Vittoriano Rastelli/CORBIS)

Into the 21st Century. By 2000 Ghana had 289 parishes, tended by 684 secular and 169 religious priests. Three major seminaries were in operation: St. Victor's at Tamale, St. Peter's at Cape Coast and St. Paul's in Accra. In 1990 the Holy Ghost Fathers opened a House of Philosophy at Ejisu and an Institute for Continuing Formation for the religious was also established. The country's 172 brothers and 767 sisters were active in the ministry of the Church, aiding in the operation of hospitals, clinics, nurses' training colleges, midwifery training schools, pharmacies and orphanages. The Christian Hospitals Association of Ghana (CHAG), Catholic and Protestant served as a liaison between religious-run service organizations and the Ministry of Health.

Among the issues facing the Church by 2000 was the continued conflict between local cultures and Christianity caused by the proliferation of syncretic churches that adopted some Christian doctrines while placing them within a native faith. Financial self-reliance, the treatment of leprosy, AIDS and other diseases, and efforts to maintain public health through the preservation of safe drinking water also received Church attention. Of particular concern to Catholics with regard to tribal religions was the prevalence of a form of religious slavery known as “trokosi” which violated the human rights of thousands of young women and children in the Ewe tribe. A pastoral letter issued in 1997 calling for an end to ethnic tensions and political corruption was followed up by Pope John Paul II in February of 1999, when he encouraged Ghanaian bishops to help the nation’s weakest people, adding that “Rivalries based on race or ethnic origin have no place in the Church of Christ.”

Bibliography: J. G. AMAMOO The New Ghana: The Birth of a Nation (2000). Common Journey, Different Paths, ed. S. RAKOCZY, (Maryknoll, NJ 1992). CHRISTIAN COUNCIL OF GHANA AND GHANA CATHOLIC BISHOPS’ CONFERENCE, The Election of President and Parliamentarians for the Fourth Republic (Accra 1992). GHANA CATHOLIC BISHOPS’ CONFERENCE, The Catholic Church and Ghana’s Search for a New Democratic System (Accra 1991). J. S. POBEE, Religion and Politics in Ghana (Asempa, 1992); Kwame Nkrumah and the Church in Ghana: 1949–66 (Chicago, IL 2000). Mission in Dialogue, eds., M. MOTTE and J. LANG (Maryknoll, NJ 1982) 537–43. K. SHILLINGTON, Ghana and the Rawlings Factor (London 1991). Missiology, 19 (1991) 59–68. Pro Mundi Vita Dossiers: Africa, 32 (1985) 2–38. PMV Bulletin, 53 (1975) 1–36. AFER, 23 (1981) 37–39. Journal of Religion in Africa, 17/1 (1987) 44–62. Annuario Pontificio has data on all diocese.

[G. A. MANTE/EDS.]

GHEBREMICHAEL, BL.

Ethiopian martyr and theologian (known also as Gabra Micha’el); b. Mertoulé Mariam, Ethiopia, c. 1790; d. Cerecia Ghebaba, Ethiopia, Aug. 28, 1855. Of Portuguese-Ethiopian ancestry, Ghebremichael (servant of Michael) was a Monophysite monk renowned for his holiness and theological learning. During a mission in 1841 to the Coptic patriarch of Alexandria to seek the election of an Abyssian metropolitan, he became acquainted with the Italian Vincentian, Giustino de JACOBIS. Afterward he visited Rome and was received by Pope Gregory XVI. Impressed by Catholic Christology, he began to recast his own theology and soon became suspect of Arianism to the new metropolitan, Abuna Salama. In 1844 he was received into the Catholic Church by De Jacobis and assisted him in the establishment of a Catholic seminary at Gaula. Ghebremichael began translating the catechism and Catholic theological works into Ethiopian languages. In 1851 he was ordained secretly by De Jacobis and was afterward admitted to the VINCENTIANS. He was imprisoned by the usurper Theodor in 1855 at the urging of Salama. After months of harsh treatment he died in chains. He was beatified Oct. 31, 1926.

Feast: Sept. 1.

Bibliography: G. GOYAU, in The Golden Legend Overseas, ed. M. M. VAUSSARD, tr. W. B. WELLS (London 1931). Acta Apostoli- cae Sedis 12 (1920) 123–127; 18 (1926) 407–411. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l’ordre du calendrier avec l’historique des fêtes. ed. by the Benedictines of Paris (Paris 1935–56) 9. 35–39. D. ATTWATER, The Golden Book of Eastern Saints (Milwaukee 1938) 136–147. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 3:465–466.

[T. P. JOYCE]

GHETTO

An enclave within a city or on its outskirts to which the Jews were confined by law. During the Middle Ages most Jews in any city lived by themselves in a special quarter (known in English as Jewry, in German as Juden-gasse), to which no legal restrictions were attached. But beginning with the COUNTER REFORMATION of the 16th century and lasting well into the 19th century, the ghetto in the strict sense, in which all the Jews of a city were compelled to live and in which no Christian could reside, was a well-established institution throughout southern and central Europe. Rome, Prague, and Frankfurt am Main were some of the cities that had important ghettos.

Usually located in the worst section of a town, a ghetto often suffered serious epidemics, and its surrounding walls severely limited the living room of its inhabitants. Egress was prohibited after sunset, and its gates were closed on Sundays. Yet religious activities flourished under the stimulus of segregated adversity. Self-contained economically and culturally, the ghetto was largely autonomous, having its own councils and its own courts, in both the secular and the rabbinical spheres.

The derivation of the term is uncertain. It is generally derived from the Italian word getto (with a soft “g”), meaning foundry, since the term was first used of the ghetto of Venice (founded in 1516), which was near the city’s foundry; yet in the Venetian dialect the word would be zetto. Less likely are the derivations from Italian borghetto (little suburb) or the Hebrew get (with a hard “g”—bill of divorce).

Bibliography: L. WIRTH, The Ghetto (Chicago 1928; pa. 1956). G. KISCH, The Jews in Medieval Germany (Chicago 1949). H. LEHMANN and R. PO-CHIA HSIA, In and Out of the Ghetto: Jewish-Gentile Relations in Late Medieval and Early Modern Germany (Cambridge, England 1995). A. LEWIN, A Cup of Tears: A Diary of the Warsaw Ghetto (Oxford 1988). D. A. SIERAKOWIAK, ed., K. TUIROWSKI, KAMIL, tr. The Diary of Dawid Sierakowiak: Five Notebooks from the Łódź Ghetto (Oxford 1996). A. TOAFF, The Ghetto of Rome in the 16th Century: Ethnical and Social Conflicts (Ramat-Gan, Israel 1984). Y. ZUCKERMAN, A Surplus of Memory: Chronicle of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising (Berkeley 1993).

[R. KRINSKY]

Aurobindo Ghose.

GHOSE, AUROBINDO

Indian philosopher and poet who wrote in English, best known under his title, Sri Aurobindo; b. Calcutta, Aug. 15, 1872; d. Pondicherry, Dec. 5, 1950. He was the third son of Dr. Krishnadhan Ghose and was educated at the Loretto Convent School, Darjeeling, and at St. Paul's School, London; he then went on to King's College, Cambridge, England, where he took first-class honors in classics. After returning to India (1893), he taught French and English at Baroda College, and while engaging in literary and political journalism he published two volumes of poetry, Songs to Myrtilla (1895) and Urvashi (1896). He married Mrinalini in 1901. He entered active politics in 1906 in order to combat English efforts to partition Bengal, but his opposition led to his arrest. His practice of YOGA enabled him to achieve an inner peace, which sustained him during his arrest, trial, and acquittal (1908–09). He thereafter withdrew from politics and retired to Pondicherry (then in French India), where he remained until his death. He edited Arya, a philosophical journal (1914–21), and published serially The Life Divine, The Synthesis of Yoga, The Ideal of Human Unity, and other works. He established an ashram (a retreat for spiritual aspirants) in 1922 and in his last years was mainly engaged on Savitri, an immense symbolic epic based on the ancient story of Savitri and Satyavan as related in the Sanskrit epic Mahābhārata.

Ghose was a poet, a mystic, and a philosopher whose ideas bear some resemblance to those of St. THOMAS AQUINAS and Pierre TEILHARD DE CHARDIN. In The Life Divine Ghose tried to synthesize all knowledge into an integrated whole; and as Teilhard posited the “omega point,” Ghose envisioned the “supermind”—arduous spiritual striving inevitably shaping the New Man in whom the divine is radiantly revealed. Ghose's English prose is rich and sweeping; his poetry includes translations, blank verse dramas (Perseus the Deliverer, Vāsavadatta, Rodogune, Eric), philosophical poems (e.g., Ahana), lyrics (e.g., Thought the Paraclete), the unfinished Iliad, a sequel to the Iliad, and the 24,000-line Savitri. In this last work the heroine symbolizes the divine force that frees the light of truth from the darkness of death. It contains (in Canto 2 of “The Book of Fate”) a significant reference to Christ's drinking the bitter cup and signing salvation's testament with His blood.

Bibliography: A. GHOSE, The Life Divine (Pondicherry 1955); Collected Poems and Plays, 2 v. (Pondicherry 1942); Savitri (Pondicherry 1954). K. R. SRINIVASA IYENGAR, Sri Aurobindo (2d ed. Calcutta 1950). P. NANDAKUMAR, A Study of “Savitri” (Pondicherry 1962). D. A. CAPPADONA, “Poetry as Yoga: The Spiritual Ascent of Sri Aurobindo,” Horizons 7 (Fall 1980) 265–284. R. A. MCDELMOTT, ed., Six Pillars: Introductions to the Major Works of Sri Aurobindo (Chambersburg, PA 1974). R. N. MINOR, “Sri Aurobindo's Integral View of Other Religions,” Religious Studies 15 (1979) 365–377. S. H. PHILLIPS, Aurobindo's Philosophy of Brahman (Leiden, 1986). K. R. SRINIVASA IYENGAR, Sri Aurobindo: A Centenary Tribute (Pondicherry, India, 1974). F. THOMPSON, A New Look at Aurobindo (Delhi, 1990).

[K. R. SRINIVASA IYENGAR]

GIACCARDO, TIMOTEO, BL.

Baptized Giuseppe Domenico Vincenzo Antonio (Joseph Dominic Vincent Anthony) Giaccardo; publisher, Pauline priest, founder of the Pious Disciples of the Divine Master; b. June 13, 1896, Narzole (diocese of Alba), Cuneo, Italy; d. Jan. 24, 1948, at Rome.

His parents were peasant farmers who began instilling in their son a strong spirit of prayer from infancy. Giaccardo met Fr. James Alberione, founder of the Society of St. Paul, while serving Mass at St. Bernard's Church in Narzole in 1908. Giaccardo entered the diocesan seminary in Alba (1917), but he received his bishop's permission to join the Paulines, despite the bishop's initial caution about the new society. Giaccardo was ordained in 1919 as the first priest of the new order, taking the name Timothy upon his profession in 1920.

Giaccardo's ministry consisted of writing, editing, and distributing religious material. In addition, he helped in the formation of younger members of the order as a teacher of theology, and served as vocation director. In 1926, he was entrusted with founding the society's first house in Rome. There he edited the weekly The Voice of Rome and managed the pressroom. He was recalled to Alba to direct the motherhouse, but sent back to Rome in 1946 as provincial superior of the Society of St. Paul and vicar general of the congregation. Recognizing the importance of prayer to support the active ministries of the Pauline Family, he established the nucleus of the contemplative branch, the Sister Disciples of the Divine Master. When the Holy See opposed the division of the Daughters of St. Paul, Giaccardo was given the delicate task of persuading Vatican authorities to approve the community, which happened in 1948.

Although Giaccardo was Alberione's chosen successor, he died shortly after the approbation of the new contemplative order. His body was laid to rest in the lower crypt of the Basilica of Mary, Queen of Apostles, next to the house he founded. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Oct. 22, 1989. He is the patron of publishers.

Bibliography: E. FORNASARI, Bl. Timothy Giaccardo: An Obedient Prophet, tr. K. D. WHITEHEAD (New York 1991). G. PAPÀ-SOGLI, Il beato Timoteo Giaccardo della Società San Paolo (Turin 1989).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GIANELLI, ANTHONY, ST.

Bishop, religious founder; b. Cereta (Liguria), Italy, Apr. 12, 1789; d. Piacenza, June 7, 1846. Born of a poor family, he attended the seminary at Genoa due to the generosity of a benefactress, and was ordained (1812). The following year he began a decade of teaching rhetoric. In 1826 he became archpriest at Chiavari, and in 1838 bishop of Bobbio. While a professor, he developed a new method of education. He gained a wide reputation as an eloquent, tireless, popular preacher, and conductor of retreats to the clergy. As a writer he published nine valuable tracts on varied subjects. Four volumes of his discourses have been printed; nine others remain in MS. His correspondence was also very extensive and helped promote many vocations. He was a member of the Società Economica, whose aims were cultural and charitable. In 1829 he founded the Daughters of OUR LADY OF THE GARDEN, or Gianelline; and in 1839, the Oblates of St. Alfonsus for clerical formation, but this group did not survive him. As bishop he continued his zealous activities, held two diocesan synods, and proved himself both a saintly prelate and a capable administrator, firm in principles. He was beatified April 19, 1925, by Pius XI, and canonized Oct. 21, 1951, by Pius XII.

Feast: June 7.

St. Anthony Gianelli.

Bibliography: C. SANGUINETI, Il beato A. M. Gianelli (Turin 1925). G. FREDIANI, S. Antonio Maria Gianelli: Profilo biografico (2d ed. Rome 1951); Bibliotheca sanctorum (Rome 1961–) 2:211–216.

[A. FERRAIRONI]

GIBAULT, PIERRE

Missionary; b. Montreal, Canada, April 7, 1735; d. New Madrid, Mo., Aug. 15, 1802. He was the eldest of five children of Pierre and Marie Madeleine (Brunet) Gibault, peasants whose ancestors had come to New France in 1663. Sometime in his youth he visited the Mississippi Valley with a fur brigade. Gibault received two years of theological training in the diocesan seminary of Quebec, where he was ordained at the age of 25. In June 1760 he went to the Illinois country, where, from the time of the expulsion of the Jesuits, the aging Sebastian Meurin, SJ, was the only priest to care for the French and indigenous people residing between Michilimakinac and the Arkansas River. Gibault settled at Kaskaskia, and from there he visited Vincennes, Ste. Genevieve, Cahokia, St. Louis, Peoria, St. Joseph (Michigan), and Michilimakinac. In 1777 he was left alone in the ministry when Meurin died at Prairie du Rocher.

When the War of Independence began, Bp. Joseph Briand of Quebec forbade any of the clergy or laity of his diocese to offer help to the revolutionists, threatening suspension of offenders among ecclesiastics and denial of the Sacraments to the laity. However, Gibault lent his support to Gen. George Rogers Clark when the Virginian appeared on July 4, 1778, to persuade the citizenry and the native Americans at Kaskaskia, Cahokia, and Vincennes to join the American cause. The priest's courageous action was the deciding factor in the success of General Clark's campaign. Gibault continued on friendly terms with American officials, but in 1782, when lawless easterners drifted into the Illinois country, making Kaskaskia their center, he left there, taking up residence in Ste. Genevieve. From there he continued to care for the religious needs of the Catholics in the Mississippi Valley. In 1789 when Bp. John Carroll acquired episcopal jurisdiction over the territory, Gibault was in a quandary regarding the source of his ecclesiastical faculties. Though Carroll treated the veteran missionary kindly, Gibault preferred to leave Ste. Genevieve in favor of New Madrid, Mo., which was then clearly within Spanish territory. He applied to Spanish civil authorities as well as to the newly appointed bishop of the See of Louisiana, and in 1792 became the pastor of New Madrid, where he died ten years later.

Bibliography: Archives of the Archdiocese of Baltimore. Archives of the Archdiocese of St. Louis. The New Madrid collection in the Missouri Historical Society of St. Louis. J. C. DUNN, JR. "Father Gibault," Transactions of the Illinois State Historical Society (1905) 15–34.

[J. P. DONNELLY]

GIBBONS, JAMES

Cardinal, ninth archbishop of Baltimore; b. Baltimore, Md., July 23, 1834; d. Baltimore, Md., March 24, 1921. He was the oldest son of Irish immigrant parents and was taken to Ireland at the age of three when his family returned, hoping to improve his father's health. However, Thomas Gibbons died in 1847, and in 1853 Bridget (Walsh) Gibbons returned to the U.S. and settled in New Orleans with her five children. For two years James worked as a clerk in a grocery store, but having decided to be a priest, he entered St. Charles College, Ellicott City, Md., in 1855. In 1857, he proceeded to St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, and was ordained for that archdiocese on June 30, 1861, by Abp. Francis Patrick Kenrick.

After about six weeks as an assistant priest at St. Patrick's Church, Baltimore, Gibbons became pastor of St. Bridget's Church, Canton, and the mission of St. Lawrence O'Toole across Chesapeake Bay. For four years he attended his two congregations and assisted as a volunteer chaplain to the Civil War troops at Fts. McHenry and Marshall. In 1865 he was appointed secretary to Martin John SPALDING, seventh Archbishop of Baltimore, and a year later named assistant chancellor of the archdiocese and made responsible for some of the preparations for the Second Plenary Council, which convened at Baltimore in October 1866. This council recommended to the Holy See the erection of new ecclesiastical jurisdictions in the U.S., among them the Vicariate Apostolic of North Carolina to which the 32-year-old James Gibbons was named. He was consecrated with the title of bishop of Adramyttium in partibus infidelium by Archbishop Spalding on Aug. 16, 1868.

North Carolina, nearly 50,000 square miles in area, had over a million people of whom only about 700 were Catholics. Although Gibbons found there only three priests and no Catholic institutions, he soon infused new life into his scattered flock. In October 1869 he left for Rome to attend Vatican Council I (December of 1869 to July of 1870), where he was the youngest of more than 700 bishops from all over the world. When he returned to North Carolina in October 1870, he found it plagued by carpetbagger rule. In 1872, upon the death of Bp. John McGill of Richmond, Gibbons was named administrator of the vacant see and in the following July was appointed successor to McGill while still being left in charge of North Carolina. Despite this double burden, which he carried for the next five years, the Church made marked progress in both states.

Gibbons drew on his missionary experiences in North Carolina and Virginia to write a simple exposition of the teaching of the Catholic Church designed to enlighten Catholics and to instruct prospective converts and Protestants. Published in 1876, The Faith of Our Fathers proved to be the most successful work of its kind in the apologetical literature of American Catholicism. When James Roosevelt Bayley, eighth Archbishop of Baltimore, sought a coadjutor, Gibbons was named in May of 1877 and given the right of succession. Bayley died on October 3, and 16 days later Gibbons arrived in Baltimore, where, at the age of 43, he assumed charge of the premier see of the U.S.

Archbishop of Baltimore. As archbishop of Baltimore, Gibbons automatically became one of the principal leaders of the American Church. Even during the eight years (1877–85) when he was outranked by Cardinal John McCloskey, Archbishop of New York, this leadership continued to grow because of McCloskey's retiring manner and increasingly ill health. In the period before the establishment of the Apostolic Delegation (1893), the occupants of the See of Baltimore performed many of the functions of that institution, acting as a clearing house for American business with the Holy See. All of this Gibbons continued to do, although in a routine way, since it was not his nature to initiate new policies or inaugurate new undertakings. Thus the event that won him a national reputation in ecclesiastical circles, the Third Plenary Council of 1884, over which he presided as apostolic delegate, was in no sense owed to his initiative, any more than was the institution that may be said to have been born during the sessions of that council.

James Cardinal Gibbons with President Theodore Roosevelt, 1918, Baltimore, Md.

The Catholic University of America. In both cases the initiative was in other hands; in fact, Gibbons was distinctly cool to the proposal for a council, and when the time came for the bishops to vote on the location of the university, he voted for Philadelphia, not wishing it in his archdiocese. However, once the more progressive and daring bishops of the West had forced the issue of a council by appeals to Rome, Gibbons assumed the leadership that his office demanded and effectually managed the difficult and protracted preparatory plans for the council. And once the council itself had voted favorably on the project of a university, he presided with balance and fairness to all groups over the committee appointed to bring into being a university.

As archbishop of Baltimore he automatically became the first chancellor of the University once it had been determined to locate it in Washington, which was within his archdiocese. Thus from a presiding official who had somewhat reluctantly attended its birth and supervised its early life, Gibbons passed to the role of a promoter and, indeed, literally a savior of the University in the dark days of 1904 when bankruptcy overtook the treasurer and threatened to close the institution. The success with which Gibbons presided over the council for four weeks to the satisfaction of the 71 bishops in attendance made him a probable candidate for further honors, and his name was mentioned for cardinal after the death of McCloskey in 1885. In May 1886 Leo XIII designated him for the cardinalate and the red biretta was conferred on him on June 30 in Baltimore's cathedral.

Cardinal. Shortly after Gibbons's advent to Baltimore the American Church entered upon the two stormiest decades in its history. The last 20 years of the 19th century were marked by an unprecedented influx of Catholic immigrants from Europe, whose coming magnified existing problems and created new ones which the bishops had to meet. Into every major problem the archbishop of Baltimore was projected, first, by reason of his office, secondly, because after 1886 he was the ranking national dignitary of the Church, and finally, because his grasp of the affairs of Church and State was commanding. While he had no part in creating the controversies of the 1880s and 1890s within Catholic ranks, he had a major share in the solution of most of them.

Secret Societies and McGlynn Affair. The problem of membership of Catholic men in secret societies reached an acute stage in the 1880s. The cardinal was anxious that Catholic men should remain apart from any secret groups that would endanger their religious faith, but he was strongly opposed to the Church's banning these groups unless there was positive proof of their harmful character, as in the case of the Free-masons. He believed that hasty condemnations were injurious to the Church's prestige in the eyes of non-Catholics, and that they often failed to attain their objectives. Accordingly, he defended the Knights of Labor (K of L) when they came under the scrutiny of the Catholic bishops of the U.S. in 1886, and of Rome in February 1887. His defense prevented the public condemnation of the K of L in the U.S., a happy contrast to what had happened in Canada three years before.

This same spirit characterized his approach to the question of whether to put the works of Henry George, author of the single tax movement, on the Index, as Abp. Michael A. CORRIGAN of New York and others advised. Gibbons was not at all in sympathy with George's economic theories, any more than he was with the action of Edward MCGLYNN, New York priest. McGlynn's defiance of his archbishop in support of George's candidacy for mayor of New York and of his economic doctrines had led to his suspension by Corrigan and his later excommunication by the Holy See. Gibbons deplored both the fallacies of George's theories and the intransigence of McGlynn, but he insisted that a condemnation of George's books would do more harm than good, since it would afford him and his constituents a publicity that they had not merited.

These views were embodied in the documents that Gibbons addressed in February of 1887 to Cardinal Giovanni Simeoni, Prefect of the Congregation de Propaganda Fide. The one prevented a public condemnation of the K of L, while the other succeeded in keeping George's books off the Index and their author from receiving a public condemnation from the Holy Office. Gibbons's action in these two cases helped to set the American Church's future policy toward the rising industrial society of which Catholic laborers were so important a part. Gibbons knew the value that his fellow Americans attached to democratic procedures. He was sensitive, too, to the danger that might arise from officials of the Roman Curia acting in a manner that would put weapons into the hands of the enemies of the American Church. Therefore, he had said to Simeoni, "To speak with the most perfect respect, but also with the frankness which duty requires of me, it seems to me that prudence suggests, and that even the dignity of the Church demands that we should not offer to America an ecclesiastical protection for which she does not ask, and of which she believes she has no need."

Nationality Conflicts and School Controversy. It has often been said that Gibbons's major contribution was his ability to interpret the U.S. to the Holy See and the Catholic Church to the U.S. This was illustrated in the controversy of the late 1880s between quarreling groups of Catholics of differing national backgrounds, mostly Irish and German, which constituted a severe internal strain on the American Church. Throughout this crisis Gibbons emphasized the oneness of their common American citizenship and its obligations, as well as the oneness of their religious faith. In the sermon he preached in Milwaukee (Aug. 20, 1891) at the conferring of the pallium on Abp. Frederick X. KATZER, the cardinal warned, "Woe to him who would breed dissension among the leaders of Israel by introducing a spirit of nationalism into the camps of the Lord! Brothers we are, whatever may be our nationality, and brothers we shall remain." In the same spirit he had sought to quiet the misgivings of President Benjamin Harrison when the latter revealed to him his uneasiness over the threat of foreign interference in the nationalist disputes of the American Catholics; Gibbons succeeded in convincing the President that the policies of German extremists would find no countenance with Pope Leo XIII.

He worked to calm his coreligionists during the controversy over parochial schools in the early 1890s while agreeing substantially with the proposals of Abp. John IRELAND of St. Paul. At the same time he made clear to his non-Catholic fellow citizens why the Catholic Church was compelled to insist on having its own school system. Finally, as the 19th century was closing, Gibbons did his share to reassure Leo XIII that there was no justification for the charges made by a few conservative Catholic writers in France that there was, within American Catholic circles, a movement tinged with heresy called AMERICANISM.

Other Contributions. Gibbons and his fellow bishops faced the problems of a growing secularization of American society along with the highly varied character of the Catholics themselves, composed, as they were, of men and women of numerous national backgrounds. When he took possession of his titular Church of Santa Maria in Trastevere on March 25, 1887, he sought in his sermon to harmonize as far as possible conflicting elements in American Catholic life. Acknowledging that the U.S. was not without defects, he stated, nonetheless, "I proclaim with a deep sense of pride and gratitude, and in this great capital of Christendom, that I belong to a country where the civil government holds over us the aegis of its protection without interfering in the legitimate exercise of our sublime mission as ministers of the Gospel of Jesus Christ." The cardinal's remarks on separation of Church and State in the U.S. on that occasion have since been echoed many times by clerical and lay representatives of the American Church.

Patriotism was a favorite theme of Cardinal Gibbons. Of few things was he more proud as an American than his country's Constitution, of which he said in January 1897, "I would not expunge or alter a single paragraph, a single line, or a single word . . ." The last article he published only a month before he died stated that as the years passed he had become "more and more convinced that the Constitution of the United States is the greatest instrument of government that ever issued from the hand of man." This conviction endeared Gibbons to Americans of all religions. On June 6, 1911, President William Howard Taft and former President Theodore Roosevelt were among the 20,000 people assembled in Baltimore to commemorate the 50th anniversary of his ordination. Gibbons's interest in national, state, and municipal questions led Theodore Roosevelt to remark to him in 1917, "taking your life as a whole, I think you now occupy the position of being the most respected, and venerated, and useful citizen of our country."

Gibbons lived to within three months of the 60th anniversary of his ordination as a priest; his 52 years as bishop and 35 years as cardinal and dean of the American hierarchy made him a symbol of the American Church, which he represented at hundreds of functions, ecclesiastical and secular, in Europe and the U.S. He was a spiritual guide for men of his time. He ordained 2,471 priests and consecrated 23 bishops, a record for the American Church until 1945. In addition to conducting the affairs of his own see, and functioning as dean of the American hierarchy in the founding of the National Catholic War Council (1917), forerunner of the National Catholic Welfare Conference at whose birth he presided (1919), he fostered the Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America, better known as Maryknoll (1911). He wrote articles for secular and Catholic periodicals and newspapers, and besides The Faith of Our Fathers, he was the author of four other works: Our Christian Heritage (1889), The Ambassador of Christ (1896), Discourses and Sermons (1908), and A Retrospect of Fifty Years (1916).

Bibliography: J. T. ELLIS, The Life of James Cardinal Gibbons, 2 v. (Milwaukee 1952), especially "An Essay on the Sources," 2:651-659, where all the leading manuscript and printed sources for Gibbons's life are listed with critical comments.

[J. T. ELLIS]

GIBERTI, GIAN MATTEO

Bishop of Verona and advocate of Church reform; b. Palermo, Sept. 20, 1495; d. Verona, Dec. 30, 1543. He was the son of Francesco Giberti, Grand Admiral of Genoa. As a young priest he served in the secretariat of Cardinal Giulio de' Medici and rose rapidly in the papal service. He was associated with the Oratory of DIVINE LOVE, a group devoted to the promotion of the austere life and reform of the Church. He was appointed datary by CLEMENT VII in 1523 and bishop of Verona in 1524. He remained in Rome for the first years after this appointment and was represented by a vicar-general in Verona. In 1527 he was taken hostage during the sack of Rome. Upon his release he took up his residence in Verona (1528).

Giberti established his reputation as a reformer by close supervision of all the responsibilities of his position. He insisted that the clergy perform their duties and live in the proper religious manner. He promoted measures of relief for the poor and the establishment of charitable institutions. His support of intellectual activity was carried out through the printing of religious works by his own printing press. He encouraged the study of Scripture and supported the work of learned men. In his own letters and in Constitutiones Ecclesiasticae he suggested various means of reform for the improvement of the Church. He was also a member of the reform commission appointed by Pope PAUL III in 1536. The report of this commission severely criticized many papal policies and recommended specific measures of reform. In 1540 Giberti served as papal legate to the conference of Catholic and Protestant theologians at Worms. His sudden death in 1543 prevented his participation in the Council of Trent.

Bibliography: M. A. TUCKER, "Gian Matteo Giberti, Papal Politician and Catholic Reformer," English Historical Review 18 (1903) 24-51, 266-286, 439-469. G. B. PIGHI, Gianmatteo Giberti, vescovo di Verona (Verona 1900). H. JEDIN, Il tipo ideale di vescovo secondo la riforma cattolica (Brescia 1950). L. BOPP, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:885.

[W. J. STEINER]

GIBIEUF, GUILLAUME

Philosopher and theologian; b. Bourges c. end of the 16th century; d. Paris, June 6, 1650. Gibieuf joined the Oratory in 1612, and became a valuable assistant to its founder, Pierre de BÉRULLE. Upon the death of Bérulle in 1629 Gibieuf became superior, then visitor of the Carmelite nuns. In 1641 after having refused the See of Nantes, he became superior of Saint-Magloire, the archdiocesan seminary of Paris, where he died nine years later. Gibieuf is important in the fields of spirituality, philosophy, and theology. His teaching and practice of the Christian life are very much of the Bérullian school. His Marian work, Vie et grandeurs de la très sainte Vierge Marie (2 v., Paris 1637), is noteworthy for its original insights, its elevated mysticism, and its theological exactitude. In philosophy and theology, his De libertate Dei et creaturae (Paris 1630) was a new attempt to solve the problem of free will and the divine concursus. Some philosophers, including É. Gilson, hold that this work possibly influenced the thinking of R. DESCARTES, particularly in the Cartesian concept of the divine freedom; others believe that Gibieuf's influence is limited to the Neoplatonic and Augustinian elements found in Descartes. Gibieuf's work has also been called a precursor of C. O. JANSSEN's Augustinus. However, even if it is true that his ideas on liberty are somewhat similar to those later held by Jansen, Gibieuf was himself no Jansenist: he adhered completely to the decisions of the Church, and he took steps to preserve his Carmelite subjects from Jansenist influence.

Bibliography: É. GILSON, Liberté chez Descartes et la théologie (Paris 1913). A. INGOLD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 6.2:1347–48. G. MARAFINI, Agli albori del Giansenismo: Guillaume Gibieuf e il suo pensiero intorno alla libertà (Rome 1947), with good bibliog.

[M. A. ROCHE]

GIBSON, WILLIAM, BL.

Lay martyr; b. near Ripon, Yorkshire, England; d. Nov. 29, 1596, hanged, drawn, and quartered at York. Arrested for his involvement in an uprising in the North, he spent many years imprisoned at York Castle where he gained a reputation for piety. He was sentenced with BB. George ERRINGTON and William KNIGHT for trying to “persuade to popery” a Protestant prisoner, who indicated an interest in Catholicism, but used it as a tool to gain freedom for himself and intelligence for the authorities. Gibson was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: MARTYRS OF ENGLAND AND WALES.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891). YEPES, Historia Particular de la persecucion de Inglaterra (Madrid 1599). STAPLETON, Post-Reformation Catholic Missions in Oxfordshire (London 1906).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GIDEON

A “major” judge from western Manasses who saved Israel from disaster c. 1070 B.C. (Jgs 6.1–8.28). Gideon's vocation to save Israel involved first the vindication of the unique cult of Yahweh against syncretist tendencies (Jgs 6.25–32). His struggle against religious assimilation was summarized in the popular explanation of his second name, Jerubbaal, “Let Baal take action against him, since he destroyed his altar” (Jgs 6.32), although the correct meaning of the name is “May Baal defend him.” Through Gideon, then, the cult of Yahweh ousted that of Baal, because Baal was powerless to defend his rights. That Gideon's name was formed with Baal, while his father's, Joash, with Yahweh, illustrates the confused religious situation of the time. Many had adopted the cult of local gods, the Baals; only a few along with Gideon remained faithful to Yahweh, and through them monotheism finally triumphed.

Annually, at harvesttime, camel-riding nomads—“Midianites, Amalekites, and the Kedemites” (Jgs 6.3)—irrupted into Palestine from the Arabian desert, ravaging the land. The avalanche of marauding nomads threatened to drive Israel from Palestine. The story of Gideon's war against Midian—the second stage in his liberation of Israel—combines a series of distinct episodes; hence, reconstruction is difficult. Yahweh's intervention and leadership were the sacred author's primary affirmation and concern. The Lord delivered Midian into Israel's hands. He was the real victor. The timid were sent away, and the army was reduced to 300 men to make the divine intervention even more striking. “For Yahweh and for Gideon!” was their battle cry. Yahweh threw the enemy camp into confusion and victory followed. The victorious Israelites, sensing their military weakness, offered Gideon hereditary principality: “Rule over us—you, your son and your son's son.” He refused because, “The Lord must rule over you” (Jgs 8.22–23). That he did, however, exercise some type of authority is indicated by his large harem, a mark of power and rule (Jgs 8.30). The eventual ruin of Gideon’s family was occasioned by an EPHOD made from the spoils of victory. Though he intended it for Yahweh’s cult in the sanctuary at Ophrah, “all Israel paid idolatrous homage to it” (Jgs 8.27).

“Gideon Testing His Soldiers,” engraving. (©CORBIS)

The story of Gideon poses some delicate problems. There are, apparently, two different traditions concerning the origin of the worship of Yahweh in Ophrah. A double convocation of the tribes is recorded and discrepancies appear in the narrative of the campaign against Midian. Many commentators attribute these apparent inconsistencies to the intermingling of two sources. Perhaps a basic narrative has been enriched by independent pieces, with several documents being used in a complementary fashion.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 846–847. H. CAZELLES, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–)

4:1403–04. R. G. BOLING, Judges Anchor Bible 6A. (Garden City, NY 1975).

[J. MORIARITY]

GIFFARD, BONAVENTURE

Vicar Apostolic of the (English) Midlands district (1688–1703) and of the London district (1703–34); b. Wolverhampton, 1642; d. Hammersmith, 1734. The most prominent of the early vicars apostolic, and greatly venerated, he lived through the reigns of 12 popes and of eight rulers of England. The second son of Andrew Giffard of Chillington, Staffordshire, he was educated at Douay College, and was the first student to enter St. Gregory’s, Paris. After taking his doctorate he went to England and began his long career of danger and hardship in the Midlands and in the London slums. He was made the first vicar apostolic of the Midland district, having been consecrated titular bishop of Madura at Whitehall on April 22, 1688. In the same year he was appointed by James II to be president of Magdalen College, Oxford, after the king had ejected the Protestant fellows. A few months later Giffard and his Catholic fellows were in turn ejected. Captured while trying to escape to the Continent, he suffered for nearly two years in Newgate prison. Fifteen years later, on the death of Bp. John Leyburn, he returned to London where until his death he remained the leader of the persecuted Catholics. Hunted by government agents, he constantly had to change his lodgings, and was five times arrested. In extreme old age he retired to the disguised convent of the Institute of Mary at Hammer-smith, where he died.

Bibliography: J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time, 5 v. (London-New York 1885–1902; repr. New York 1961) 2:454–456. W. M. BRADY, The Episcopal Succession in England, Scotland, and Ireland, A.D. 1400 to 1875, 3 v. (Rome 1876–77) v.3 passim. B. HEMPHILL, The Early Vicars Apostolic of England, 1685–1750 (London 1954).

[B. WHELAN]

GIFFORD, WILLIAM

English party leader, Benedictine, and prelate; b. Gloucestershire, 1554; d. Reims, April 11, 1629. He was educated at Lincoln College, Oxford, the University of Louvain, the English College at Douay, and the English College at Rome. After ordination in 1582 as a protégé of Cardinal William Allen, he taught theology at Reims until 1593, then served Allen in Rome and Flanders (1593–94). Upon Allen's death he was made dean of Lille in 1595. His long and violent disagreement with Robert PERSONS, SJ, was at that time well advanced.

Until all the evidence of the intricate quarrels of the English exiles is published, much will remain obscure, although this tentative character of our knowledge has not prevented widely varying partisan judgments on the protagonists. Persons accused Gifford of fomenting opposition in the seminaries to Jesuit direction and policies, and of corresponding secretly and treacherously with the English government and agents. It is generally certain that Gifford did foment trouble and conduct such a correspondence. What is still uncertain is the degree of irresponsibility and factiousness he showed, and how far he was justified in his opposition to Persons' policies. Moreover, there is no real doubt about the firmness of his Catholic faith throughout these troubles. In 1606 he was mysteriously expelled from the Spanish Netherlands and lived in Paris (1606–08) and then in Reims as a professor at the university. In 1608 he did what an increasing number of seminarian opponents of Persons were doing—joined the English Benedictines. From his profession in 1609 until 1617 he was remarkably active: in rapid succession he became Prior of Dieulouard, founded the English monasteries of St. Malo and St. Edmund's Paris, helped to form the English Benedictine Congregation, and became first president of and helped to reform Fontrevault. He was a close friend of the Guise family and supporter of the Ligue, and through their influence he was consecrated in 1617 coadjutor to Louis of Lorraine, cardinal de Guise, and archbishop of Reims. In 1622 he succeeded to the see, clearly as a Guise nominee, and ruled it until his death. After Allen and Persons, he was undoubtedly the most celebrated English Catholic of his day. His achievements included the decisive reestablishing of the English Benedictine Congregation, much solid teaching of theology and effective preaching, and a good deal of hard work to help restore the French Church after the religious wars.

Bibliography: T. FITZHERBERT, Letters, in Publications of the Catholic Record Society, v. 41, ed. L. HICKS (London 1948). The Wisbech Stirs, 1595–1598 in Publications of the Catholic Record Society, v. 51, ed. P. RENOLD (London 1958). J. MCCANN, "William Gabriel Gifford," Ampleforth and Its Origins, ed. J. MCCANN and C. CARY-ELWES (London 1952). T. H. CLANCY, Papist Pamphleteers: The Allen-Persons Party and the Political Thought of the Counter-Reformation in England, 1572–1615 (Chicago 1964)

[H. AVELING]

GIGLI, GIOVANNI

Bishop, English agent at the Roman Curia; b. Bruges, 1434; d. Rome, Aug. 25, 1498. Gigli, son of a merchant of Lucca, was a doctor of civil and canon law by 1477, when he became a naturalized Englishman. He served as a papal collector in England, and became papal subdeacon by 1483 and prothonotary apostolic by 1488. These curial connections led to his appointment as resident English proctor at Rome (1490–98). His services were rewarded by substantial preferments after 1477: he held canonries in Wells, St. Paul's, London, Lichfield, Lincoln, and Salisbury and was archdeacon of London (1482–90) and of Gloucester (1489–97). Having been provided on Aug. 30, 1497, to the See of WORCESTER, he was consecrated at Rome on September 10, and held the see until death. Although he enjoyed some reputation as a humanist, he used his literary abilities chiefly to further his career.

Bibliography: B. BEHRENS, "The Origins of the Office of English Resident Ambassador at Rome," English Historical Review 49 (1934) 640–656. R. WEISS, "Lineamenti di una biografia di G. Gigli . . .," Rivista di storia della Chiesa in Italia 1 (1947) 379–391. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the Scholars of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 2: 764–765.

[C. D. ROSS]

GIGOT, FRANCIS ERNEST

Scripture scholar and professor; b. Lhuant (Indre), France, Aug. 21, 1859; d. New York City, June 14, 1920. After his studies at the Christian Brothers' college, Le Dorat, Vienne, the diocesan seminary of Limoges, and the Catholic Institute of Paris, he joined the Society of St. Sulpice. He was ordained on Dec. 22, 1883. In 1885 he came to America, and until 1899 he was on the faculty of St. John's Seminary, Brighton, Mass., as professor, successively, of dogmatic theology, philosophy, and Scripture. In 1899 he was transferred to St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, and in 1904 to St. Joseph's Seminary, Dunwoodie, Yonkers, New York. In both of these institutions he was professor of Scripture, and he remained in that field until his death. In 1906 he resigned from the Sulpicians and joined the diocesan clergy of New York. At the time it was stated in the public press that his resignation resulted from the fact that his researches and the publication of them were being curtailed by his Sulpician superiors who were fearful of criticism from ultraconservative Vatican circles. The rector of Dunwoodie denied that interpretation of the resignation. Gigot's competence as a scripturist was acknowledged by scholars of various faiths. He contributed articles to Vigouroux's Dictionnaire de la Bible, the Catholic Encyclopedia, and the New York Review, and he translated the Apocalypse for the Westminster version of the NT. He was the author of several books on Biblical subjects, which reflected the best contemporary scholarly trends and were models of their type. The ecclesiastical spirit of the time was not favorable to the scholarship that Gigot represented, but his method and approach to scriptural study were amply vindicated two decades after his death by the DIVINO AFFLANTE SPIRITU of PIUS XII. Once widely used manuals were Gigot's General Introduction to the Study of the Holy Scriptures (New York 1900) and Special Introduction to the Study of the Old Testament (2 v. 1903–06).

[M. M. BOURKE]

GIKATILLA, JOSEPH BEN ABRAHAM

Eminent Spanish mystic; b. Medinacelli, Old Castile, Spain, 1248; d. Peñafiel, Spain, after 1305. As a youth he had studied Talmud and philosophy, but later, under the influence of Abraham Abulafia (1241–after 1291), he began his literary activity as a zealous follower of the school of prophetic cabalism (see CABALA). Throughout his life Gikatilla remained a prolific writer, and although he considered cabalism a science superior to, and the basis of, philosophy, his writings generally sought to reconcile the two and indicate that he tried to further the mystic science by philosophic speculation.

As did Abulafia, Gikatilla believed that religious doctrines and prophetic concepts can best be explained through the mystic symbolisms of the Hebrew letters, vowels, and numbers; his development of this phase of the cabala and the profundity of his cabalistic knowledge soon earned for him the reputation of being a miracle worker, and he was accordingly referred to by many as Joseph Ba'al ha-Nissim (the master of miracles).

His first work, Ginnath Egoz (Garden of Nuts, from Ct 6.11), in three parts (the various names of God, the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet, and the vowels and accents are discussed and given special interpretation in parts one, two, and three, respectively), was completed at the age of 26 and deals with the three elements of cabala: Gematria, Notarikon, and Themurah; the initials of these terms form the word Ginnath, and Egoz symbolizes the study of mysticism.

His second important work, Sha'are Orah (Gates of Light), which attempts to correlate the names of God with the ten Sefiroth of Divine manifestation, was translated into Latin by Paulo Riccio under the title Porta Lucis and quoted by Johann REUHLIN in support of his thesis against his adversaries that the cabala was in agreement with the tenets of Christianity.

Gikatilla's other writings include: Sefer ha-Nikkud (Book of Vocalization), a cabalistic interpretation of the vowels; Sod ha-Hashmal (Secret of the Electrum), a mystic commentary of Ezechiel's vision; Sodoth ha-Mitzvoth (Secrets of the Commandments), a cabalistic explanation of various commandments; Tsofnath Pa'aneah (Revealer of Hidden Things; Gn 41.45), a commentary on the Passover HAGGADAH; and Hassagoth (Criticisms; unpublished), which consists of strictures on Maimonides's Moreh Nevuhim (Guide of the Perplexed).

Bibliography: G. G. SCHOLEM, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (3d ed. New York 1954; repr. pa. New York 1961) 194–195. H. H. GRAETZ, History of the Jews, ed. and tr. B. LÖWY, 6 v. (Philadelphia 1945) 4:10, 466. M. STEINSCHNEIDER, "Catalogus Librorum Hebraeorum," in Bibliotheca Bodleiana codicum manuscriptorum orientalium, 2 v. (Oxford 1787–1833) 1461–70. G. JELLINEK, Beiträge zur Geschichte der Kabbala (Leipzig 1852) 2:57–64. S. A. HORODEZKY, in Encyclopaedia Judacia: Das Judentum in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 10 v. (Berlin 1928–34; incomplete) 7:408–411. K. SCHUBERT, in Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:889.

[N. J. COHEN]

GIL VALLS, ENCARNACIÓN, BL.

Lay martyr, teacher; b. Jan. 27, 1888, Onteniente (Ontinyent), Valencia, Spain; d. Sept. 24, 1936, L'Ollería, Valencia. Gaspar Gil and Adriana Valls had their daughter María Encarnación baptized at St. Mary's Church, Onteniente, the day following her birth. From them she and her siblings learned how to live and die as Christians. She was confirmed May 24, 1893 and received her First Communion in 1899.

Encarnación received private instruction until she studied in Valencia to become a teacher. Thereafter she was tutor in the household of Pasquala Enríquez de Navarra y Mayans de Calatayud de Valencia and a teacher at Albuixech (Valencia; 1915–22). She was beloved by her students. On the hour she would orally pray an Ave Maria, followed by some pious ejaculation. As the children did their work each afternoon, she prayed the Rosary. On Saturdays she reminded her charges of their obligation to attend Sunday Mass. She often allowed some of her students to accompany her on Saturdays when she visited her brother Gaspar at the seminary in Valencia where he was studying.

In 1922, the ownership of the school changed hands and Encarnación went to live with her brother Gaspar and assist him in his parish work. With him she founded the Patronato de la Infancia (Foundation of Infancy) and taught catechism to children. Personally she was distinguished by her simplicity, self-sacrifice, apostolic fervor, and charity, especially towards children.

She was known to rise early to spend time in meditation and to attend Mass daily. Encarnación belonged to the Nocturnal Adoration Society, Third Order of Carmelites, Daughters of Mary, and other Catholic groups. She was also secretary of Catholic Action. She exercised her social apostolate as a teacher of woman workers.

Shortly after the Spanish Revolution began, her brother Gaspar was imprisoned and their home confiscated. Undaunted, Encarnación said that they had offered their lives to God for the salvation of Spain; all she asked was that she die with her brother. On September 24, the militia came to her door telling her to accompany her imprisoned brother to Porta Coeli Hospital. She asked that a friend, Juan Recatalá Fuertes, also accompany them. They were taken instead to the marble quarry near the port of Ollería, where the brother and sister were summarily executed and buried in the cemetery of Canals. Their bodies were transferred to the cemetery of Onteniente after the war and later translated to San Carlos Church. She was beatified by Pope John Paul II with José Aparicio Sanz and 232 companions on March 11, 2001.

Feast: Sept. 22.

Bibliography: V. CÁRCEL ORTÍ, Mártires españoles del siglo XX (Madrid 1995). W. H. CARROLL, The Last Crusade (Front Royal, VA 1996). J. PÉREZ DE URBEL, Catholic Martyrs of the Spanish Civil War, tr. M. F. INGRAMS (Kansas City, MO 1993). R. ROYAL, The Catholic Martyrs of the Twentieth Century (New York 2000). L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. Ed. no. 11 (Mar. 14, 2001), 1–4, 12.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GILBERT, WILLIAM

English scientist and physician, whose book on magnetism founded the study of geomagnetism and established electricity as a separate discipline; b. Colchester, England, May 24, 1544; d. London, Nov. 30, 1603. William, the son of Jerome Gilbert, lawyer and recorder of Colchester, and Jerome's first wife, Elizabeth Coggeshall, matriculated as a member of St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1558. He received the B.A. degree in 1560–61, the M.A. in 1564, and the M.D. on May 13, 1569. He held a number of offices in St. John's College, and became a senior fellow in December 1569. Nothing is known of Gilbert's life for the next eight years. In 1577 arms were "confirmed" to him by Robert Cooke, an Elizabethan herald who had a reputation for complaisance in such matters.

By 1581 Gilbert was beginning to climb the ladder of social success in London medical circles. He lived at Wingfield House, inherited from his stepmother, Jane Wingfield Gilbert. This home, on St. Peter's Hill close to St. Paul's Cathedral, was only a few doors from the buildings housing the College of Arms and the Royal College of Physicians. Gilbert was censor of the Royal College of Physicians (1581, 1582, 1584–87, 1589, 1590), treasurer (1587–94, 1597–99), consiliarius (1597–99), and elect (1596–97). In 1600 he reached the peak of social success in his profession, becoming president of the College of Physicians and one of the physicians to Queen Elizabeth I. At her death in 1603 he was appointed physician to James I, but he died within a year, presumably of the plague.

Gilbert left, in manuscript, an unfinished cosmological work, De mundo nostro sublunari philosophia nova, which was published half a century later and consequently had little influence. His notable work, the De magnetibus, magneticisque corporibus, et de magno magneti tellure; Physiologia nova, plurimis et argumentis, et experimentis demonstrata (London 1600), was probably completed about 1583, before Gilbert became involved in the London medical world. His views were heavily influenced by the 13th-century Epistola de magnetibus of Peter of Maricourt, from which he got the idea that the "natural" shape for a lodestone or natural magnet is round. Gilbert created the idea that the earth is a giant lodestone and that a spherical lodestone was a terrella (little Earth). Specific ideas published in the De magnete that influenced later scientists were: (1) The possibility of conducting magnetic experiments in the laboratory and thereby learning about “the great lodestone, the Earth.” (2) The suggestions that weight is due to the magnetic attraction of the earth, that the strength of a magnet is proportional to its mole (mass), and that the earth exerts a magnetic force on the moon. All of these ideas affected the development of gravitational theory. (3) The clear distinction between magnetic and electric phenomena, thereby eliminating the confusion between them and establishing electricity as a field of study separate from magnetism. (4) The creation of the concept of a class of substances that behave like amber, when rubbed. He coined the name electrica (electrics) for this class, from the Greek name, “elektron,” for “amber,” thereby introducing the root “electric” into the language.

The De magnete is a highly experimental work, and Gilbert consciously appealed to experiments in support of his theories, marking his “experiments and discoveries” with marginal asterisks and urging his readers to try the experiments for themselves. His education was a classical, scholastic one, and Gilbert’s approach to the study of natural phenomena is in accord with his education. Many of his ideas, in the hands of such men as Johann Kepler and Galileo Galilei, were developed far beyond anything Gilbert had imagined.

Bibliography: D. H. D. ROLLER, The De magnete of William Gilbert (Amsterdam 1959). M. S. KELLY, The ‘De mundo’ of William Gilbert (Amsterdam 1965).

[D. H. D. ROLLER]

GILBERT CRISPIN

Benedictine monk at BEC, abbot of WESTMINSTER, 1085; d. c. 1117. Gilbert was in frequent contact with St. ANSELM and, while maintaining his intellectual independence, was deeply influenced by him. While in London with Anselm, probably during the winter (1092–93), he met a Jew of Mainz. This meeting occasioned the writing of the Disputatio Iudaei et Christiani, his most important work. He wrote also various other historical and doctrinal works, particularly De simoniacis, De Spiritu Sancto, De casu diaboli, De anima, and the Disputatio Christiani cum gentili. He is the author also of a sermon for Palm Sunday, two conferences on The Three Marys of the Gospel, and another on The Monastic Life and Profession. He was a skilled writer, more at ease in Biblical exegesis and in the handling of commonsense argumentation than in philosophical speculation. We are indebted to him for a better understanding of Anselm’s influence on his environment, his friends, and disciples. In his De anima, Gilbert tried to complete the ideas of his master on a subject that Anselm had hoped one day to elaborate. His writings, especially those in which he intervened in controversy with the Jews, give an idea—and this is their principal interest—of the intellectual milieu in which Anselm wrote the Cur Deus homo, as well as of the kind of problems he wished to resolve.

Bibliography: Gilbert Crispin’s works are in part unedited. Critical ed. of Vita Herluini in J. A. ROBINSON, Gilbert Crispin (Cambridge, Eng. 1911) 87–110; Patrologia Latina 150:695–714; De nobili Crispinorum genere, Patrologia Latina 150:735–744; Disputatio Christiani cum gentili, ed. C. C. J. WEBB, Mediaeval and Renaissance Studies 3 (1954) 55–77; Disputatio Iudaei et Christiani, ed. B. BLUMENKRANZ (Utrecht 1956). Minor works ed. in part or completely by Robinson, op. cit. and R. W. SOUTHERN, in Mediaeval and Renaissance Studies 3 (1954) 99–115. The letter on monastic life, ed. J. LECLERCQ, Analecta monastica 2 (1953) 118–123. Literature. R. W. SOUTHERN, Saint Anselm and His Biographer (New York 1963). J. LECLERCQ, “Une Doctrine de la vie monastique dans l’école du Bec,” Spicilegium Beccense 1 (1959) 477–488. S. G. A. LUFF, “Norman Sense and Sensibility: Abbot Gilbert Crispin at Westminster,” Wiseman Review 235 (1961) 374–384.

[J. LECLERCQ]

GILBERT DE LA PORRÉE

Scholastic theologian and philosopher; b. Poitiers, France, c. 1075; d. there, Sept. 4, 1154.

Life. Gilbert first studied under Master Hilary at the cathedral school of Poitiers, then became the student of BERNARD OF CHARTRES, and later went to Laon. Before 1124 he returned to Chartres, where he was made chancellor of the cathedral several times (1126–36). For a short time he taught in Paris, where in 1141 JOHN OF SALISBURY “heard him in logic and theology” (Metal. 2.10). In 1142 he was consecrated bishop of Poitiers and seems not to have continued to teach theology.

When Gilbert spoke on the Trinity at a diocesan synod at Poitiers in 1146, two archdeacons, Calon of Thouars and Arnold of Brioux, denounced his doctrine to Pope Eugenius III, who convened a consistory in Paris shortly after Easter of 1147. The accusations were supported by the Parisian Master Adam of Petit Pont and by Hugh of Champfleury. Two witnesses, Rotold, bishop of Evreux, and a Master Ivo of Chartres, denied the charges. The pope ordered Godescalc, Abbot of St. Martin, to examine Gilbert’s commentary on Boethius’s Tractate on the Trinity and adjourned the inquiry until the Council of Reims. The council opened on March 21, 1148. The trial took place at a consistory convened after the closing of the council. But since Gilbert and his followers appeared before the consistory thoroughly prepared, the debates again threatened to end in a deadlock. In order to reach a decision, Bernard drew up a profession of faith as a reply to the four errors (capitula) of which Gilbert was accused. To ensure their acceptance he arranged a meeting in his own quarters and put the matter to a vote. The cardinals of the papal court reacted indignantly to this procedure and “agreed among themselves to support the cause of the Bishop of Poitiers, saying that the Abbot had attacked Master Peter [Abelard] in exactly the same way” (John of Salisbury, Hist. pont. 9).

Gilbert was accused of saying that the divine essence is not God (Otto of Freising, Gesta Frid. 1.56; Geoffrey of Auxerre, C. Gilb. 64), of rejecting the statement that God is the divinity (Hist. pont. 8), and of saying that the divine nature was not made flesh and that it did not assume human nature (C. Gilb. 67). Another accusation was directed against Gilbert’s assertion that no divine Person can be made the predicate of a sentence (Gesta Frid. 1.50).

Gilbert agreed with St. Bernard’s profession of faith; the pope commanded him to correct any conflicting statements that might occur in his book on the Trinity. Gilbert concurred and was acquitted of the charges but made no change in his commentary. He pardoned his two archdeacons and returned to his diocese “with fulness of honor” (Gesta Frid. 1.57). Gilbert was nearly 70 years old when he faced his accusers.

Thought. Gilbert’s apparently novel views are based on his principles of speculative grammar. Following Boethius, he divided the speculative sciences into natural, mathematical, and theological. Beginning with concrete composite objects, human language or scientific terminology follows two levels of reality. Concrete terms, such as substance, animal, white, person, and Plato, belong to the first level, the realm of natural science. But the human mind cannot grasp a concrete object unless it perceives the immediate reason why the object is a substance, or an animal, or white, etc. So the mind separates the concrete object from the numerous forms that make it what it is. Abstract terms such as substantiality, corporeality, and whiteness best express the abstract realm of mathematical science. But every concrete noun or adjective connotes its form just as every abstract term connotes the corresponding concrete reality in which it inheres. The direct meaning of a concrete or abstract work is called its substance, the connotation, its quality. Grammatical position and context indicate whether the intention is to express the substance or the quality of a word. Since the predicate is always universal, the word “man” in the sentence “Plato is a man” expresses the universal form that causes Plato to be a man. However, in the sentence “A man spoke” or “I saw a man,” the same word expresses a concrete human being or even a person.

Although Gilbert was willing to make concessions to traditional patterns of speech, he transferred these rules of speculative grammar to theology. The sentence “The Father is God” would mean that He is God through His divinity and not, for instance, through His goodness or His eternity. Gilbert insisted that such insufficiency of human language must not be interpreted to the detriment of the absolute simplicity of God. According to him the sentence “The divine essence is God” is open to misunderstanding because Scripture uses the word “God” to designate either the divine nature (Mk 12.29) or a divine Person (Ps 46.6). If “God” is used in the sense of person, the statement is false. Gilbert could not accept the sentence “God is the divinity,” for the abstract term “divinity” in the predicate would convey the idea that God causes God to be God.

As John of Salisbury relates, Gilbert’s opponents maintained that his “novelty of speech” was “inconsistent with accepted beliefs” (Hist. pont. 8). He declares further that Gilbert’s “doctrine seemed obscure to beginners, but all the more compendious and profound to advanced students” (ibid. 12); Gilbert himself, however, professed in his prologue to Boethius that he thought his teaching was so traditional “that it appeared that he had stolen rather than invented it.” His doctrine continues to be the object of controversy.

Works. At his trial in Reims Gilbert demanded that he be judged on the evidence of his writings on the Psalms, on the Epistles of St. Paul, and on Boethius (Hist. pont. 10). He must have written them in that order. There are indications that his commentary on the Psalms was compiled before the death of ANSELM OF LAON (1117). It is still unpublished. The numerous manuscripts of this work are listed in F. Stegmüller, Repertorium biblicum medii aevi, 7 v. (Madrid 1949–61) 2:2511. Gilbert’s commentary on St. Paul, written before 1140 and still unpublished, is a more mature work. The many manuscripts listed in Repertorium biblicum medii aevi 2:2528 attest to its popularity. His commentary on four Sacred Tractates of Boethius, written in the early 1140s, was first published in the Basel edition (1570) of the works of Boethius (Patrologia Latina, 217 v. [Paris 1878–90] 64:1247–1412). More than 40 manuscripts of the work are known to exist. A critical edition by N. M. Haring is found in Studies and Texts 13 (Toronto 1966). Two of Gilbert’s letters are extant, one to his beloved teacher Bernard of Chartres [Bibliothèque de l’École de Chartres 16 (1855): 461], the other to Abbot Matthew of Saint-Florent de Saumur (Patrologia Latina 188:1258). Much remains to be done concerning the authenticity of numerous other works attributed to Gilbert.

Bibliography: A. BERTHAUD, Gilbert de la Porrée, évêque de Poitiers, et sa philosophie (Poitiers 1892). R. L. POOLE, Illustrations of the History of Medieval Thought and Learning (2d ed. rev. Gloucester, Mass. 1961). A. HAYEN, "Le Concile de Reims et l'erreur théologique de Gilbert de la Porrée," Archives d'histoire doctrinale et littéraire du moyen-âge 10–11 (1935–36): 29–102. M. E. WILLIAMS, "The Teaching of Gilbert Porreta on the Trinity," Analecra Gregoriana 56 (Rome 1951). N. M. HARING, "The Case of Gilbert de la Porrée, Bishop of Poitiers, 1142–1154," Mediaeval Studies 13 (1951): 1–40; "Das sogenannte Glaubensbekenntnis des Reimser Konsistoriums von 1148," Scholastik 40 (1965): 55–90. S. GAMMERSBACH, "Gilbert von Poitiers und seine Prozesse im Urteil der Zeitgenossen," Neue Münstersche Beiträge zur Geschichtsforschung 5 (Cologne 1959). F. VERNET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 6.2:1350–1358. M. MANTIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 3:210–215.

[N. M. HARING]

GILBERT OF HOLLAND (HOYLAND)

Cistercian abbot cited frequently as a source of monastic theology and medieval exegesis; place and date of birth unknown; d. at the Cistercian Abbey of Rivour, Diocese of Troyes (France), 1172. Little is known of Gilbert, called "one time abbot of Hoyland" by the Clairvaux Chronicle. The earliest record of him is in documents he attested (c. 1150–58) when he was already abbot of Swineshead, an abbey in the region of Holland, in Lincolnshire. He was still abbot there when in his Sermones in canticum (41) he referred to the "recent" death of St. AELRED (d. 1167). Claims that he was either from Clairvaux or from Scotland-Ireland appear to be unsubstantiated; he may have been sent from Rievaulx (c. 1148–49) by St. Aelred to ensure an orderly changeover to the Cistercian rule at Swineshead, and he was perhaps exiled about 1170 in the controversy over St. THOMAS BECKET. He wrote 48 Sermones (Patrologia Latina 184:11–252), continuing St. Bernard's commentaries on the Cantic of Canticles. He remains known and memorable by these sermons, which, though lacking St. Bernard's genius and grace, reveal not only practical and personal details but the developed literary culture set to serve the Biblical mysticism of the 12th century. The Bollandists [May 6 (1688) 3F] and the 1952 Menologium Cisterciense (117) list him as "Blessed Gilbert."

Bibliography: J. LECLERCQ, "Théologie traditionnelle et théologie monastique," Irénikon 37 (1964) 50–74. C. L. KINGSFORD, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 7:1194. E. MIKKERS, "De vita et operibus Gilberti de Hoylandia," Cîteaux 14 (1963) 33–43, 265–279. J. MORSON, "The English Cistercians and the Bestiary," Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 39 (1956) 146–170. J. VUONG-DINH-LAM, "Le Monastère . . . les observances monastiques . . . d'après G. de H.," Collectanea ordinis Cisterciensium Reformatorum 26 (1964) 5–21, 170–199. B. SMALLEY, The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages (2d ed. New York 1952, repr. Notre Dame, Ind. 1964). H. DE LUBAC, Exégèse médiévale, 2 v. in 4 (Paris 1959–64).

[P. EDWARDS]

GILBERT OF NEUFFONTAINES, ST.

Premonstratensian prior; b. Auvergne, c. 1100; d. abbey of Neuffontaines (Neuffons), June 6, 1152. After the failure of the Second CRUSADE (1147–49) he gave half his possessions to the poor, and with the other half he rebuilt a convent for women at Aubeterre in 1150 and a monastery for men at Neuffontaines, both PREMONSTRATENSIAN houses. The hospital and monastery completed, he joined the order in 1150 and in 1151 became the first prior, ruling wisely and living virtuously. Many cures are attributed to his intercession, especially benefiting children. In 1159 Gilbert's body was transferred to the abbey church, renamed for him. It was lost during the French Revolution. His cult was officially approved in 1725, his feast being observed on June 1 at Clermont in the Norbertine church, to which some relics had been transferred in 1615.

Feast: June 6 (formerly Oct. 26).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 1:749–754. C. L. HUGO, S. Ordinis Praemonstratensis annales 1:743–746. G. MARSOT, Catholicisme 5:9.

[M. J. MADAJ]

GILBERT OF SEMPRINGHAM, ST.

Founder of the Gilbertines; b. Sempringham, Lincolnshire, England, c. 1083; d. Sempringham, Feb. 4, 1189. The son of a Norman knight who had settled in Lincolnshire, Gilbert was destined for the Church from an early age, and to this end he was sent to study at Paris. On his return home he received the benefices of Sempringham and Tirington from his father and opened a school. He took service for a short while with the bishops of LINCOLN and was ordained a priest by Bishop Alexander in 1123. By 1131 he had returned to Sempringham as a parish priest and in that year organized seven young women who wished to dedicate themselves to a religious life into a community based on the Cistercian model. This convent was the beginning of the GILBERTINES, the only exclusively English religious order. Gilbert soon found it necessary to associate with the nuns a number of lay sisters and lay brothers to work the convent's estates. The community grew and a second foundation was made in 1139; it had reached such size by 1147 that Gilbert journeyed to CÎTEAUX to ask the CISTERCIANS, assembled in a general chapter, to assume its administration, but they were unwilling to undertake the responsibility for supervising communities of women. Gilbert then sought spiritual direction for his nuns from CANONS REGULAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE, who henceforth formed an integral part of the Gilbertine double MONASTERIES. Pope EUGENE III gave his approval to the order in 1148 and a short time later confirmed Gilbert as its master general. In 1165 Gilbert was charged by officials of King HENRY II with giving aid to the exiled Thomas BECKET, Archbishop of CANTERBURY; but he refused to clear himself of the groundless charge, as he insisted on his right to have given such support if opportunity had presented itself. Advancing age forced Gilbert to resign the office of master general to Roger of Malton; at the time of his death the order had grown to nine double monasteries and four distinct houses of canons. He was canonized by Pope INNOCENT III in 1202, and his relics were enshrined in the church at Sempringham.

Feast: Feb. 16.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Feb. 1:576–578. W. DUGDALE, Monasticon Anglicanum 6.2: *v-*xxix (between pages 946 and 947), with Eng. tr. in John Capgrave's Lives of St. Augustine and St. Gilbert of Sempringham, ed. J. J. MUNRO (Early English Text Society 140; 1910) 61–142. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 3529–38. T. A. ARCHER, The Dictionary of National Biography from Earliest Times to 1900 7:1194–96. R. GRAHAM, S. Gilbert of Sempringham and the Gilbertines (London 1901). R. FOREVILLE, ed., Un Procès de canonisation à l'aube du XIII^e siècle, 1201–1202: Le Livre de saint Gilbert de Sempringham (Paris 1943). F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church 558. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER 1:351–352. D. KNOWLES, The Monastic Order in England, 943–1216. D. KNOWLES, The Religious Orders in England.

[B. J. COMASKEY]

GILBERTINES

An extinct medieval religious order for men and women founded in England by GILBERT OF SEMPRINGHAM. The order originated in 1131 with seven young women who, under Gilbert's direction and with the support of Bp. Alexander of LINCOLN, formed a convent at Sempringham, on property belonging to their founder's estate. Gilbert seems to have copied Cistercian customs rather closely, but a general chapter of the CISTERCIANS meeting at CÎTEAUX in 1147 refused to assume the government of the community of nuns. At the suggestion of William, Abbot of RIEVAULX, Gilbert had already added lay sisters to attend to the needs of the nuns, and lay brothers for the heavy agricultural labor on their property. He then proceeded to introduce a small number of CANONS REGULAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE, who would undertake the spiritual direction of the community, and thereafter the Gilbertines usually lived in double MONASTERIES, marked by great austerity in style and decoration. Papal approval of the new order came from the Cistercian Pope EUGENE III in 1148. The nuns were to live by the BENEDICTINE RULE, the canons by the Rule of St. AUGUSTINE, and the lay brothers were to be governed by a modification of the usages of the conversi of Cîteaux. The Gilbertines founded their second house in 1139 and numbered some 13 communities in 1189, when Gilbert died. The order continued to receive special favors from the English crown, for, unlike the Cistercians and the monks of Cluny, it had no foreign connections, its priories being located for the most part in Lincolnshire, with one house in Scotland and two in Westmeath, Ireland. In time the order began to decline, and its financial status was so critical that King HENRY VI found it necessary to exempt all its foundations from payments of any kind. Even so, the Gilbertines still controlled some 25 houses, with 150 canons and 120 nuns, when HENRY VIII forced them to surrender all property in the dissolution (1538–40).

A master general, who was elected and could also be deposed by a chapter general, ruled the order with authority to make all appointments, to receive novices into the community, and to pass on all contracts entered into by the various houses. He was assisted by a number of priests and nuns who acted as visitors, as well as by the chapter general, which met yearly at Sempringham during the ROGATION DAYS and consisted of the prior, prioress, and cellarer of each house. The chief difficulty in the government of the order grew out of the continued attempts of the lay brothers to work in their own interest, and even in the founder's lifetime a serious revolt developed. The Gilbertine habit consisted of a black tunic and a scapular with a white cloak and hood for the canons; the nuns, also with a scapular, were dressed in white.

Bibliography: W. DUGDALE, Monasticon Anglicanum 6.2:947–982. R. GRAHAM, S. Gilbert of Sempringham and the Gilbertines (London 1901). The Gilbertine Rite, ed. R. M. WOOLLEY, 2 v. (Henry Bradshaw Society 59, 60; 1921–22). D. KNOWLES, "The Revolt of the Lay Brothers of Sempringham," English Historical Review 50 (1935) 465–487. D. KNOWLES and R. N. HADCOCK, Medieval Religious Houses: England and Wales (New York 1953) 171–175.

[B. J. COMASKEY]

GILBERTUS ANGLICUS

Bolognese canonist of the late 12th and early 13th centuries, date and place of birth in England unknown; with ALANUS ANGLICUS he may have entered the Dominican Order (at Bologna) after 1220.

His chief work is a collection (c. 1202) of decretal letters from the pontificate of Alexander III (1159–81) to 1202 (fourth year of Innocent III). It had two stages. In a first version he included in an appendix, outside the framework of the titles, some 32 decretals of Innocent III that in a second, definitive recension he inserted into the body of the collection under their appropriate headings; some of these texts appear to have been copied from registers in Innocent III's chancery (see PAPAL REGISTERS). In all, the collection contains some 258 decretals in 290 chapters; it falls into five books, following the classic division (iudex, iudicium, clerus, connubia, crimen) of the Breviarium (or Compilatio prima antiqua) of Bernard of Pavia, 1181–82 (see QUINQUE COMPILATIONES ANTIQUAE). A critical list of the collection has been published by Von Heckel. Gilbertus's collection was utilized by other collections, e.g., that of BERNARD OF COMPOSTELLA, THE ELDER (1208), by means of which it influenced the official Compilatio tertia antiqua of Innocent III's decretals (1210). With the collection of Alanus Anglicus it was the formal source of the compilation of JOHN OF WALES (Compilatio secunda antiqua, 1210–12); it influenced also the Compilatio quarta of JOANNES TEUTONICUS (1216–17). Gilbert glossed his own collection [one short gloss was printed by J. Junker, Summen und Glossen, Savigny-Stiftung f. Rechtsgeschichte Kan Abt. 15 (1926) 486], and these glosses were used by Albert and TANCRED when composing their apparatuses on the Compilatio secunda.

Bibliography: J. F. SCHULTE, "Die Compilationen Gilberts und Alanus," Sitzungsberichte der Akademie der Wissenschaften im Wein, Philos.-hist. Klasse 65 (1870) 595–698. Repertorium der Kanonistik 223, 225, 302, 309, 310–313, 345, 348. R. VON HECKEL, "Die Dekretalensammlungen des Gilbertus und Alanus nach den Weingartner Handschriften," Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte Kanonistische Abteilung 29 (1940) 116–357, 180–225 (critical register), 340. Historia iuris canonici latini v. 1, Historia fontinum 231. C. LEFEBVRE, Dictionnaire de droit canonique 5:966–967. See also the Bulletin of the Institute of Research and Study in Medieval Canon Law in Traditio 14 (1958) 464–466; 17 (1961) 534.

[L. E. BOYLE]

GILBY, THOMAS

English Dominican theologian, author, editor; b. Birmingham, Dec. 18, 1902; d. Cambridge, Nov. 29, 1975. Gilby was a member of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, when he chose to become a Dominican in 1919. After ordination in 1926, he did graduate work at Louvain in philosophy. He was a lector at Hawkesyard Priory (Staffordshire) and Blackfriars, Oxford; until 1935, he served as editor and frequent contributor for Blackfriars. At this time, he published his Poetic Experience (1934), and Marriage and Morals (1936, pseudonym I. G. Wayne; repr. 1952).

From 1939 to 1948, Gilby served as chaplain in the Royal Navy. With the experience of naval warfare behind him, he then acted as a representative of the British government, lecturing in American universities. During the war he wrote one book on logic, Barbara Celarent (1949) and another on epistemology, The Phoenix and the Turtle (1950). From 1948 until his death, Gilby lived in Blackfriars, Cambridge, where he served several terms as prior and published several books: Between Community and Society (1953); Principality and Polity (1958; U.S. title, Political Thought of St. Thomas Aquinas); Up the Green River (1955), and a military history, Britain at Arms: A Scrapbook from Queen Anne to the Present Day (1953).

Gilby completed his greatest work acting as editor, translator, annotator, and commentator of St. Thomas Aquinas's writing. He began modestly with an arrangement, translation, and annotation of St. Thomas Aquinas, Philosophical Texts (1955) and St. Thomas Aquinas, Theological Texts (1955). The English-Latin edition of the Summa theologiae (60 v., 1965–76) occupied him until his death. He translated, edited, and annotated vv. 1, 5, 8, 16, 17, 18, 28, 36, 43, 44, and 59 and, as general editor, handled each page of copy in all of the 60 volumes. Throughout his life, Thomas Gilby was dedicated to his quiet convert apostolate: reconciling the strayed and counseling the anguished. The greatest of his theological contributions remain in the pages of "the Gilby Summa."

[T. C. O'BRIEN]

GILDAS, ST.

Called "the Wise"; author of a history of the Britons; b. early sixth century; d. c. 570. He appears to have been a native of Scottish Strathclyde, but his early life is obscure. He was an ecclesiastic, probably a monk; he worked in Wales, visited Ireland, and is at least reputed to have founded the monastery of SAINT-GILDAS-DE-RHUYS in Brittany. Sometime before 547, at the age of 44, Gildas wrote what BEDE refers to as a "tearful discourse concerning the ruin of Britain," that is, the De exidido et conquestu Britanniae. Intended as an indictment of Gildas's contemporaries in Britain for their moral shortcomings, the work relates a course of events that seems probable. Once the Roman occupation ended, the Britons appealed for aid against Pict and Scottish marauders to the Consul of Gaul, Aetius (c. 446). When he refused aid, the Britons used their own resources against these enemies until a "proud tyrant," usually considered to be Vortigern, invited Saxons led by Hengist and Horsa to become the Britons' foederati—a common practice throughout the empire. Gildas then recounts the settling of the Saxons on the Isle of Thanet and their ensuing revolt against the Britons. He discusses the precarious condition of life in Britain and seems to suggest that town life was destroyed only at this time, a very questionable conclusion as archeological evidence points to a much earlier date. He makes no mention of permanent German settlements, though here, too, evidence indicates their existence. Much more probable is Gildas's description of a temporary British resurgence led by a certain Ambrosius Aurelianus, which culminated in the Saxon defeat at the Battle of Mons Badonicus (Mount Badon) c. 500. His failure to mention King Arthur in connection with the battle does not discount his existence since Gildas was strangely reluctant to use personal names. Gildas remained a popular saint in Brittany, where a monastery (Saint-Gildas-du-Bois) was founded near Nantes as late as 1026. He may also have written a Penitential, the hymn Lorica, and a travel prayer.

Feast: Jan. 29.

Bibliography: Analecta hymnica 51:358–364. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Poetae 4:618–619. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Auctores Antiquissimi 13:1–85. T. F. TOUT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 7:1223–25. R. G. COLLINGWOOD and J. N. L. MYRES, Roman Britain and the English Settlements (2d ed. London 1937). C. E. STEVENS, "Gildas Sapiens," English Historical Review 56 (1941) 353–373. F. M. STENTON, Anglo-Saxon England (2d ed. Oxford 1947). C. GROSS, Sources and Literature of English History from the Earliest Times to About 1485 (2d ed. New York 1915; repr. 1952) 245–246. G. O. SAYLES, The Medieval Foundations of England (2d ed. London 1952). P. GROSJEAN, "Notes d'hagiographie celtique," Analecta Bollandiana 75 (1957) 158–226. N. K. CHADWICK et al., Studies in the Early British Church (Cambridge, Eng. 1958).

[B. F. BYERLY]

GILES, ST.

Hermit, abbot, and one of the FOURTEEN HOLY HELPERS; d. c. 720. According to the 10th-century vita, Giles (Aegidius) was an Athenian who came to Marseilles and became a hermit near the mouth of the Rhone. He influenced a certain Flavius, King of the Goths, to build an abbey there, and later became confessor to King Charles of France. This most untrustworthy biography was composed to satisfy pilgrims on the road to Rome and SANTIAGO DE COMPOSTELA; the bulls for the founding of the abbey are 9th century, and seem to be forgeries invented to help the monks of SAINT-GILLES to free themselves from the authority of the bishop of Nîmes. However, the tomb of the saint at the abbey became a great pilgrimage place, making the town of Saint-Gilles prosperous. The cult of the saint spread throughout western Europe, and especially to England; he was invoked as patron of cripples, beggars, and blacksmiths. His emblem is a hind with an arrow. Because of the dubious quality of the sources, Pope Benedict XIV's commission proposed removal of this feast from the general calendar.

Feast: Sept. 1.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Sept. 1:284–304. Analecta Bollandiana 8 (1889) 103–120. F. BRITAIN, Saint Giles (Cambridge, Eng. 1928). A. FLICHE, Aigues-Mortes et Saint-Gilles (Paris 1950). G. JACQUEMET, Catholicisme 5:19–20. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:190. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 3:457–458.

[G. J. DONNELLY]

GILES OF ASSISI, BL.

Third companion of St. Francis of Assisi; b. Assisi, c. 1190; d. Perugia, April 22, 1262. Coming from peasant stock, he joined Francis at the Portiuncula on April 23, 1208, and was with him in his early missions. Very early on, Giles undertook pilgrimages to the main shrines of the times, the Holy Land, as well as an aborted trip to Tunisia where he wanted to die as a martyr. Shortly after the death of Francis, Giles spent prolonged periods in various hermitages where visions and mystical states took place. The early sources painted a conflicting picture of him. The official Legends (e.g., Celano, Bonaventure) highlighted his contemplative gifts, while the non-official sources, (e.g., the Leonine Corpus, The Chronicle of the Twenty-four Generals) saw him not only as a mystic but also as an exemplar of the early Franciscan ideal and a dissident of the evolution of the Order and its abandonment of poverty. Giles is also remembered for his pithy and pungent Dicta, or Golden Sayings (300 or so) reminiscent in style and spirit of the Admonitions of Francis and the Apopthegmata of the Desert Fathers. Pius VI beatified him in 1777.

Feast: April 23.

Bibliography: Dicta Beati Aegidii Assisiensis (Quaracchi-Florence 1905); The Golden Words, trans. I. O'SULLIVAN (Chicago 1966); La Sapienza di Frate Egidio Compagno di San Francesco con I Detti, ed. and trans. E. MARIANI (Venice 1981). R. BROWN, Franciscan Mystic (Garden City, N.Y. 1962).

[P. LACHANCE]

GILES OF FOSCARARI

Canonist; b. probably Bologna; d. Bologna, 1289. His family was prominent in Bolognese society. From 1252 to 1269 he is frequently mentioned in official documents as magister and doctor decretorum. He was the first layman to teach Canon Law at the University of Bologna. In 1267 he spent a short time in the service of Charles I of Naples. Because of the great esteem in which he was held, it was directed at his death that those assisting at his funeral or at the funeral of any canonist thereafter could be vested in scarlet, an honor usually reserved for the funerals of knights and professors of civil law. His works include De ordine iudiciario, written about 1260, which is valuable for understanding judicial practice during this period (William Durantis copied much of it in his Speculum); Lectura in Decretales; and many quaestiones and consilia, which remain scattered in various manuscripts.

Bibliography: M. SARTI and M. FATTORINI, De claris Archigymnasii Bononiensis a saeculo XI usque ad saeculum XIV, 2 v. (2d ed. Bologna 1888–96; repr. Turin 1962). 1:447–452. F. K. V. SAVIGNY, Geschichte des römischen Rechts im Mittelalter, 7 v. (2d ed. Heidelberg 1834–51; repr. Darmstadt 1958) 5:520–526. J. F. VON SCHULTE, Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des kanonischen Rechts, 3 v. in 4 pts. (Stuttgart 1875–80; repr. Graz 1956) 2:139–143. J. DESHUSSES, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 5:967–968.

[C. M. ROSEN]

GILES OF LESSINES

Dominican philosopher and scientist; b. probably Lessines (Hainaut, Belgium), c. 1230–40; d. 1304 or later. He entered the order perhaps at the convent of Valenciennes. His relations with ALBERT THE GREAT suggest that he studied under this master, probably at Cologne. His later residence at Paris and the strong Thomistic character of some of his writings make it very likely that he attended the lectures of St. THOMAS AQUINAS during Aquinas's second regency at the University of Paris (1269–72). He is known in the early lists of Dominican authors as a bachelor, so he seems not to have been a master in theology. Various treatises are attributed to him. The first is De essentia, motu et significatione cometarum, on the occasion of the comet of 1264, in which the author shows an interest for natural sciences not uncommon in the school of Albert the Great. He made use of the LIBER DE CAUSIS and propounded the common doctrine on providence and on the influence of the heavenly bodies. The De concordia temporum, or Summa de temporibus, gives a concordance of historical chronology up to the beginning of the 14th century; its authenticity is not yet entirely demonstrated. A Tractatus de crepusculis, attributed to Giles by P. Mandonnet, is in the same field of scientific investigation. The two last mentioned treatises exist in MS [University of Bologna, 957 (1845)]. There are no texts for the following works attributed to Giles: De geometria, Quaestiones theologicae, In 1 et 2 sententiarum, Flores casuum, Tractatus de (decem) praeceptis, and De immediata visione divinae essentiae; the last may be a confusion with a similar treatise attributed to WILLIAM DE HOTHUM.

Village sign depicting St. Giles. (©Robert Estall/CORBIS)

Three other writings are certainly authentic. (1) He wrote a letter to Albert the Great asking his judgment about 15 points of doctrine that were discussed among the masters of Paris. Items one to 13 coincide with points contained in the condemnation promulgated by Bishop É. TEMPIER of Paris on Dec. 10, 1270. (2) The De unitate formae is a strong defense of the doctrine of the unity of the substantial form, one of the most violently attacked Thomist teachings. Its first three chapters expose the opinion of the plurality of forms; the next seven chapters are devoted to the concept of form and its relation to matter; and the final six chapters establish the unity of form and answer the arguments of the pluralists. The treatise was directed especially against ROBERT KILWARDBY and was most likely written in 1278. HENRY OF GHENT tried to refute it, and HARVEY NEDELLEC made use of it. (3) The De usuris is the most complete study of usury in the Middle Ages. It is against the more backward theories of Henry of Ghent, and thus must have been written between 1278 and 1284 (F. Veraja). It was first attributed to Thomas Aquinas.

Bibliography: M. DE WULF, Le Traité "De unitate formae" de Gilles de Lessines (Les Philosophes Belges 1; Louvain 1901). P. MANDONNET, "Giles de Lessines et son Tractatus de crepusculis," Revue néo-scholastique 22 (1920) 190–194. M. GRABMANN, "Einzelgestalten aus der mittelalterlichen Dominikaner- und Thomisten-theologie," Mittelalterliches Geistesleben, v.2 (Munich 1936) 512–530. L. THORNDIKE, Latin Treatises on Comets between 1238 and 1368 (Chicago 1950). F. VERAJA, Le origini della controversia teologica sul contratto di censo nel XIII secolo (Rome 1960) 83–99. P. M. M. DUHEM, Le Système du monde, 5v. (Paris 1913–17), repr. 10 v. (1954–59).

[J. C. VANSTEENKISTE]

GILES OF ROME

Augustinian theologian, general, archbishop of Bourges; b. Rome, c. 1243; d. Avignon, France, 1316. He joined the Hermits of St. AUGUSTINE at the age of 14 and was sent to the order's house in Paris in 1260 for basic studies. He obtained the equivalent of a master in arts degree in 1266 and studied theology in the university, probably attending the lectures of THOMAS AQUINAS. As a bachelor he commented on the Sentences (1276), but his commentary was not published until many years later (bk. 1 after 1285; bks. 2, 3, c. 1300). He, like Aquinas, maintained that there could not be many individual angels in a single species in his Theoremata de ente et essentia (ed. E. Hocedez, Louvain 1930). This view, attacked by HENRY OF GHENT in 1276, was one of the propositions condemned by Étienne TEMPIER in 1277. Forced to leave Paris, Giles resided in Bayeux (1278–80). On returning to Italy, he was definitor of the Roman province in 1281, provincial in 1283, and vicar-general of the order in 1285. At the intervention of HONORIUS IV on July 1, 1285, he was reinstated at the University of Paris, where he became the first Augustinian master in theology. He taught as regent master from 1285 until 1291; two years later he was succeeded by his disciple, JAMES OF VITERBO. Giles was a prodigious writer, and he conducted numerous disputations rejecting the views of Henry of Ghent and of GODFREY OF FONTAINES and reflecting the concerns of his day. In 1287 the general chapter of Florence imposed his doctrines on all teachers in his order. As tutor to the young PHILIP IV OF FRANCE he wrote De regimine principum (ed. Venice 1585). His important commentary on LIBER DE CAUSIS (ed. Venice 1550) reveals a strong predilection for Proclus's theory of participation.

He left Paris in 1291 and was elected general of his order on Jan. 6, 1292. A frequent visitor to France, he was highly esteemed by the King of France, by CELESTINE V, and by BONIFACE VIII, who frequently employed his services. On April 25, 1295, he was appointed archbishop of Bourges by Boniface. When the abdication of Celestine V and the election of Boniface VIII were contested in 1257, Giles wrote a long treatise in defense of their validity, De renuntiatione papae (ed. Rome 1554). In the quarrel between Boniface and Philip he sided with the Pope, writing in 1301 his De ecclesiastica potestate (ed. R. Scholz, Weimar 1929), which inspired the bull UNAM SANCTAM of 1302. Relying on the analogy of the soul's supremacy over the body, he saw in papal theocracy fulfillment of the Augustinian ideal of the city of God. Although he championed the theory of the "two swords," his own fanaticism and pedantry helped to eliminate an outdated papal theocracy.

The legend that Giles was an authentic disciple of Thomas Aquinas originated in the 15th century, when Coriolano attributed to him authorship of Correctorium "Quare" (ed. Venice 1486; see CORRECTORIA). It is true that Giles was almost alone in upholding publicly the Thomistic doctrine of the unicity of substantial form in material creatures (see FORMS, UNICITY AND PLURALITY OF). But as E. Hocedez has shown, Giles was not condemned for this doctrinal position. Even in his defense of the doctrine of unicity, he criticized Aquinas on many points with a sharpness that later shocked DENIS THE CARTHUSIAN.

His distinction between essence and existence in finite creatures was recognized as novel even among his contemporaries. Giles admitted that it was close to the doctrine of hylomorphism. His description of essence and esse as "two things" (duae res) has been interpreted as (1) an ultrarealist caricature of Aquinas's view (Hocedez); (2) a forceful reaction to the intentional distinction proposed by Henry of Ghent and hence compatible with the Thomistic explanation (G. Suárez, A. Pattin); (3) a fundamentally essentialist position derived from BOETHIUS, PROCLUS, and AVICENNA, in which esse is metaphysically posterior and complementary to essence as a second act (P. W. Nash).

Giles's doctrine of creation seems to confirm the metaphysical priority of essence. Following St. Augustine and fearing Greek necessitarianism, he insisted on the absolute contingency of all creatures. Since creatures can be annihilated, they must of themselves tend to nothingness. Nowhere does Giles admit, as did Aquinas, any inner necessity either to the material universe as a whole or to spiritual beings. For Giles, this contingency demonstrates the real distinction between essence and esse, since in annihilation the "two things" are actually separated. The real distinction exists only between essence or forma totius (e.g., humanity) and its corresponding esse, whereas only a modal distinction is to be found between substantial form or forma partis (e.g., soul) and the esse it gives to matter. Thus Giles kept the universal validity of the formula forma dat esse by interpreting it to mean that a really distinct esse corresponds only to essence, whereas all forms, substantial and accidental, possess a modality of being.

In theology Giles was conscious of being a professional defender of the doctrines of St. Augustine. The real distinction served to differentiate creatures from God as the mutable from the immutable, the composite from the simple. For him the ultimate goal of theology is affective and the formal constituent of beatitude is an act primarily of the will.

Giles is an important witness to the unique position of Thomas Aquinas in the last quarter of the 13th century. Not only had he studied under him, but he also read his works extensively and used almost identical expressions with regard to unity of form and the metaphysical composition of creatures. Nevertheless, his use of sacred Scripture and St. Augustine distinguish his thought and that of the Augustinian school.

To his contemporaries he was known variously as Doctor beatus, Doctor fundatissimus, and Doctor verbosus.

Bibliography: P. GLORIEUX, Répertoire des maîtres en théologie de Paris au XIII^e siècle 2:293–308. É. H. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages, passim. P. W. NASH, "G. of R: Auditor and Critic of St. Thomas," The Modern Schoolman 28 (1950) 1–20. "G. of R. on Boethius' Diversum est esse et id quod est," Medieval Studies 12 (1950) 57–91. "The Accidentality of Esse according to G. of R.," Gregorianum 38 (1957) 103–115. E. HOCEDEZ, "La condamnation de G. de R.," Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 4 (1932) 34–58. Z. K. SEMI-ATKOWSKA, "Avant l'exil de G. de R. au sujet d'une dispute sur les Theoremata de esse et essentia de G. de R.," Medievalia Philosophica Polonorum, 7 (1960). A. ZUMKELLER, Theology and History of the Augustinian School in the Middle Ages (Villanova 1996). "Aegidius von Rom," Marienlexicon I (1988) 42. "Aegidius Romanus," Lexicon des Mittelalters I (1978) 178. D. GUTIERREZ, "Gilles de Rome, ermite de Saint-Augustin, théologien et Eveque, 1243–1316," Dictionnaire de Spiritualité VI (1967) 385–390.

[P. W. NASH]

GILES OF SANTAREM, BL.

Dominican preacher and ecclesiastical superior; b. Vaozela, Portugal, c. 1184; d. Santarem, Spain, May 14, 1265. Having been endowed in youth with five ecclesiastical benefices, he used their proceeds to live a dissipated life. He went to Paris to study medicine, but gave up this interest to take up necromancy, which he practiced with some attendant fame. After experiencing a religious conversion, he returned to Spain, about 1220, where he entered the Dominican Order at Palencia. When sent to study the sacred sciences, he made the acquaintance of Bl. JORDAN OF SAXONY, Bl. HUMBERT OF ROMANS, and other prominent friars. He taught and preached after he returned to Spain, and was twice elected provincial of the Spanish province. BENEDICT XIV ratified his cult on March 9, 1748.

Feast: May 14.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum May 3:400–436. J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum 1:241–244. P. ÁLVAREZ, Santos, bienaventurados, venerables de la orden de los Predicadores 4 v. (Vergara, Spain 1920–23) v.1.

[A. H. CAMACHO]

GILES OF VITERBO

Augustinian friar, Renaissance scholar, reformer, cardinal; b. Viterbo, 1469; d. Rome, Nov. 11–12, 1532. His family name was Antonini, not Canisius as many historians (including L. von Pastor) state. Giles (Aegidius) joined the Augustinians at Viterbo and in 1493, while still a student at Padua, published an edition of three works of Aegidius Romanus. From this time dates his hostility to AVERROISM; it was confirmed when he studied under Marsilio FICINO at Florence. Plato, St. Augustine, and the Bible were three sources from which he drew liberally. He became an outstanding member of the Pontanian Academy at Naples, and gave his name to Giovanni Pontano's dialogue, Aegidius. He was perhaps the most sought after preacher of his day—Popes Alexander VI and Julius II, Kings Frederick and Ferdinand of Naples, the cities of Florence and Venice, demanded his services. His most memorable oration was the appeal for reform at the opening of the Fifth LATERAN COUNCIL on May 3, 1512. His preaching had both the polish and defects of Renaissance style.

In 1503 he joined the observant movement within the Augustinian Order, became affiliated with the famous monastery of Lecceto near Siena, and on June 27, 1506, to his own dismay, was appointed vicar-general of the AUGUSTINIANS by Julius II. Thereafter, his main concern until he resigned from office (Jan. 25, 1518) was reform of the order. He secured the much-coveted Bulla Aurea in favor of the Augustinians from Julius II in June 1507 and in 1508 authorized the first printed edition of the constitutions of the order. He halted the growing division between Augustinian observants and conventuals; early in 1511 he won over a young German friar, Martin Luther, to the cause of unity. He insisted on a return to the full common life and greatly encouraged higher studies. To ensure the success of reform he personally visited houses and provinces or sent his own delegates with wide powers. He did not hesitate to suspend or dismiss priors and provincials, and he demanded monthly reports from each province. But all his efforts were hampered by the general laxity of Church affairs at that time.

His intellectual versatility was amazing: he wrote both Latin and Italian poetry, edited philosophical works, compiled a major theological commentary, attempted a survey of Christian history, and was indefatigable in his scriptural studies, particularly Hebrew, the cabala, and rabbinical literature. He defended Johann REUCHLIN and will always be remembered as the generous patron of Elijah Levita (c. 1468–1549), who later became the leading Hebrew scholar of Renaissance Europe. Aegidius was a linguist of rare ability and was credited with being the only person in Europe with a competent knowledge of Arabic. The first complete printed edition of the Bible in Greek was published at Venice in 1518, and was dedicated to Aegidius. Most of his own works remained unpublished during his lifetime; he suffered from an intellectual meticulousness.

He went as papal agent to the Emperor Maximilian in 1515, was nominated a cardinal in July 1517, and was sent as papal legate to Spain in 1518. He was a serious candidate for the papal tiara at the conclave in 1521. In 1523 he was appointed bishop of Viterbo by Clement VII. The remainder of his life he devoted mainly to scholarship, but he made one notable political effort in May, 1527 when he led an army of 2,000 soldiers to free CLEMENT VII, then besieged by the imperial troops in the CASTEL SANT' ANGELO in Rome. To the end he continued to be an advocate for reform of the Church.

Bibliography: Letters as Augustinian General, ed. C. O'REILLY (Rome 1992). Lettere familiari, ed. A. M. VOCI ROTH, 2 vols. (Rome 1990). Scechina e libellus de litteris Hebraicis, ed. F. SECRET, 2 vols. (Rome 1959). J. W. O'MALLEY, "Fulfillment of the Christian Golden Age under Pope Julius: Text of a Discourse of Giles of Viterbo, 1507," Traditio 25 (1969) 265–338. F. GIACONE and G. BEDOUELLE, "Une lettre de Gilles de Viterbe á Jacques Lefèvre d'Étaples (c. 1460–1536) au sujet de l'affaire Reuchlin," Bibliothèque d'Humanisme et Renaissance: Travaux et Documents 36 (1974) 335–45. F. X. MARTIN, "Egidio da Viterbo, 1469–1532: Bibliography, 1510–1982," Biblioteca e società (Viterbo) 4 nos. 1–2 (June 1982) 5–91. A. DE MEIJER, "Bibliographie historique de l'ordre de Saint Augustin," Augustiniana 35 (1985), 39 (1989), 43 (1993), 47 (1997). F. X. MARTIN, Friar, Reformer and Renaissance Scholar: Life and Work of Giles of Viterbo 1469–1532, ed. J. ROTELLE (Villanova 1992). J. W. O'MALLEY, Giles of Viterbo on Church and Reform: A Study in Renaissance Thought (Leiden 1968). A series of papers in English on Giles as Renaissance scholar, scripture scholar, classical scholar, and prior general, is published in Egidio da Viterbo, O.S.A., e il suo tempo, ed. Analecta Augustiniana (Rome 1983).

[F. X. MARTIN]

GILGAMESH EPIC

The longest extant Babylonian poem, an epic narrating the heroic exploits of Gilgamesh, a semilegendary Sumerian king of the 3d millennium B.C. In its latest and most elaborate redaction (7th century B.C.) the poem (Babylonian title: ša naqba imuru, "he who experienced all things") probably consisted of 12 tablets of approximately 300 lines each. The discovery that this late version contained a Babylonian story of the Flood closely paralleling the deluge narrative in Genesis was announced by George Smith in December 1872 and aroused widespread interest not only in this poem and its relation to the Bible but also in the whole new field of cuneiform studies in general. This article will treat of the contents and versions of the epic, its flood narratives, and its hero.

Contents. Despite many lacunae in the present-day editions of the ancient text, the general contents of the tale may be reconstructed with reasonable accuracy. It begins by praising the knowledge and wisdom of Gilgamesh, his long journeys in quest of adventure and immortality, and his building of the monumental walls and temple in his native city, Uruk. At the outset of the story, the people of Uruk are dissatisfied with Gilgamesh and his oppressive rule: he appropriates the young girls of the city for his court and burdens the young men with heavy labor on his building projects. The people of the city pray to the gods for deliverance, and they respond by creating a foil for Gilgamesh: Enkidu, a wild man from the steppe, who is initiated into the arts of civilization by a prostitute, comes to Uruk, and, after engaging in a heroic wrestling match with Gilgamesh, proves his constant companion in adventures, thus diverting Gilgamesh's attention from the harried people of his city.

The first adventure of Gilgamesh and Enkidu is against the giant Humbaba, appointed by the god Enlil as guardian of a great cedar forest (probably to be localized in northern Syria). When they succeed in tracking down the ogre and overcoming his magic defenses, he begs Gilgamesh for mercy, only to have the latter persuaded by Enkidu to kill the giant. When the two heroes return to Uruk, the goddess Ishtar (see ASTARTE) asks Gilgamesh to become her lover; but he refuses, tauntingly reminding her of the brutal treatment she has accorded her previously discarded lovers. Enraged, Ishtar persuades Anu, the father of the gods, to send down the "Bull of Heaven," a monster personifying seven years of drought, to punish Gilgamesh. After killing hundreds of Gilgamesh's men, the bull attacks Enkidu and is then slain by Gilgamesh and Enkidu. The subsequent triumph through the jubilant throngs in Uruk is short-lived, for that same night Enkidu sees in a dream the gods deliberating which of the two who had killed Humbaba and the bull should perish. The god Shamash comes to their aid, but can save only Gilgamesh. Enkidu becomes ill and dies.

Gilgamesh broods over the sudden death of his companion and, reflecting on his own mortality, decides to seek the secret of eternal life from Utnapishtim, the only human being who had survived the Flood. He makes a perilous journey to the far-off land “at the mouth of the rivers” and hears from Utnapishtim’s own lips the tale of how the gods in wrath had tried to destroy mankind through the Flood. But the god Ea had secretly warned Utnapishtim, who constructed a large boat and saved himself and various species of fauna from destruction. Gilgamesh inquires how he too may gain immortality, but fails to remain awake when he is put to the test. Finally, after being given the Plant of Life, Gilgamesh while bathing in a pond loses it to a snake that steals it from the shore. Dejected and disheartened, Gilgamesh returns to Uruk, recognizing in the end that his utmost achievement as a mortal will be his monumental building activities.

The 12th and final tablet of the epic is an artificial appendage to the tale and describes the descent of Enkidu into the nether world to obtain two precious possessions lost by Gilgamesh.

Versions of the Poem. The preceding synopsis of the contents of the Gilgamesh epic is based on the Ninevite recension, as known from the library of Assurbanipal, King of Assyria (668–c. 627 B.C.). This was probably the latest and most detailed redaction of the epic, and roughly half its lines are now known—with new tablet discoveries continually increasing the total.

Other redactions of the tale of Gilgamesh are known to exist. The earliest fragments are contained in Sumerian literature of the late 3d millennium, when at least five separate sagas concerning the exploits of Gilgamesh were current. By the Old-Babylonian period (18th century B.C.) some of these stories had been woven into a single larger poem; but as yet its contents are known only from five small fragments. The work enjoyed great popularity in Mesopotamia and spread through the Near East. Fragments have been found at Boghazköy, the Hittite capital, at Mageddo in Palestine, at Sultantepe in (ancient) Syria, at Nineveh and Assur in Assyria, and at Ischali, Nippur, Sippar, Ur, and Uruk in Babylonia. Hittite and Hurrian translations are known to have been made. The Old-Babylonian and Hittite versions especially differ from the later Ninevite recension in their arrangement of the various episodes and by including material not in the later edition (and, apparently, omitting tales later incorporated into the poem).

Flood Narrative. The common framework of the Flood narratives in the Gilgamesh Epic and in Genesis has attracted much attention. Both deluges are the result of divine decisions to destroy mankind and are announced in advance to a selected hero, who is directed to build a large boat of specified dimensions and to save himself, his family, and a representative selection of living creatures from impending catastrophe. The floods are both caused primarily by heavy rains, which cover the entire land with water, submerging even the mountain peaks and killing all living creatures. When the rains cease and the flood waters subside, the heroes each dispatch several birds to test whether the ground is exposed sufficiently to sustain life. Both boats ground on mountain tops, and each hero descends and offers sacrifice to his god(s), who then bestow(s) blessings on the survivors.

Gilgamesh, from sculpture in alabaster found in Khorsabad. Illustration, Louvre, Paris. (© CORBIS/Bettmann)

There are also many disagreements in detail between the two versions. In Gilgamesh, mankind is destroyed primarily because of the caprice of the gods and only secondarily because of the fault of man (the primary motive in Genesis). In Genesis, mankind is given a chance to repent before the Flood, while no such opportunity is afforded in Mesopotamia. Finally NOAH is rewarded with an everlasting covenant between God and his descendants, while Utnapishtim and his associates receive personal immortality.

Despite the great number of parallels, there is no general agreement as to the genetic relationship of the two accounts. The Biblical story does not seem to derive directly from the Gilgamesh saga. They may both stem from a common account, current in Mesopotamia by the beginning of the 2d millennium B.C.

There is good reason for thinking that in Babylonian literature the Flood was not originally part of the Gilgamesh cycle. It is probable that it was borrowed from the Babylonian Atrahasis epic, where the flood theme is obviously more central, and inserted into the Gilgamesh story only after the Old-Babylonian period.

The Hero. Little is known about the historical person named Gilgamesh, who was the fifth king of the First Dynasty of Uruk (c. 2600 B.C.). The Sumerian king list states that his father was a demon and that he himself succeeded Dumuzi (TAMMUZ) as king and reigned for 126 years. The epic, however, tells that his mother was the goddess Ninsun (supposedly the wife of Lugalbanda, Gilgamesh's second predecessor on the throne of Uruk) and that he was, consequently, two-thirds god and one-third man. In Assyro-Babylonian mythology, Gilgamesh after his death became king and judge over the people and gods of the underworld.

Bibliography: A. HEIDEL, The Gilgamesh Epic and Old Testament Parallels (2d ed. Chicago 1949). The Epic of Gilgamesh, ed. and tr. N. K. SANDARS (Baltimore 1960). Gilgameš et sa légende, ed. P. GARELLI (Paris 1960). E. SOLLBERGER, The Babylonian Legend of the Flood (London 1962). J. P. PRITCHARD, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament (2d, rev. ed. Princeton 1955) 72–99.

[J. A. BRINKMAN]

GILIJ, FILIPPO SALVATORE

Italian Jesuit missionary and ethnographer of the Orinoco region; b. Legona (Norcia), Italy, July 26, 1721; d. Rome, 1789. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1740 and went to the New Kingdom of Granada (today Colombia) in 1743. He was a missionary in the Orinoco area from the time of his ordination (1748) until the Jesuit expulsion in 1767; he then returned to Italy and lived in Rome until his death. While in Orinoco he saw much of the famous Father Gumilla; in Italy he collaborated with Hervas and Panduro; and Humboldt frequently appealed to his authority. His Saggio di Storia Americana (4 v. Rome 1780–84) made him famous. The first three volumes concern the Orinoco: religious and civil history, inhabitants and customs, religion and language; volume four is about Tierra Firme, and is a fundamental source for the history of Colombia. Saggio became a source of Americanist information in Europe, but was almost unknown to Americans until 1947. In 1782 Veigl translated into German the linguistic section; volume four was translated into Spanish by Mario Germán Romero and Carlos Buscantini (Bogotá 1955).

Bibliography: J. A. SALAZAR ORSA, "El padre Gilij y su Ensayo de historia americana," Misionalia Hispanica 4 (1947) 249–328. G. GIRALDO JARAMILLO, Estudios históricos (Bogotá 1954).

[J. A. SALAZAR ORSA]

GILLESPIE, MOTHER ANGELA

U.S. foundress of the Congregation of Sisters of the Holy Cross (CSC); b. Brownsville, Pa., Feb. 21, 1824; d. Notre Dame, Ind., March 4, 1887. She was the daughter of John and Mary (Miers) Gillespie and was baptized Eliza Maria. In her early years she moved to Lancaster, Ohio, with her widowed mother, her sister, and her brother (later Rev. Neal Gillespie, CSC). While attending Georgetown Visitation School, Washington, D.C., Eliza, as niece of Sen. Thomas EWING, participated actively in the social life of the capital. She was interested also in the apostolate and organized a parochial school, taught at a Maryland state school where her tact won acceptance of religious instruction for Catholics, opened a Sunday school for African Americans, and acted as visiting nurse for the poor.

In 1853 Eliza entered the community of Holy Cross Sisters at Bertrand, Mich., and, as Sister Angela, was sent to the novitiate in Caen, France. After taking her vows, she returned to Bertrand to direct the academy, which in 1855 was transferred to St. Mary's, Notre Dame, Ind. There she introduced advanced courses in science and higher mathematics, foreign languages taught by teachers instructing in their native tongues, art and music offered by recognized artists, and a program of philosophy and theology. In April 1860 she began to publish the Metro-politan Readers (continued as the Excelsior Series), a literature series graded for elementary, secondary, and college levels. As a translator of foreign writers and as unofficial editor of Ave Maria after 1866, she was instrumental in presenting such authors as Charles de Montalembert, François Chateaubriand, Louis Veuillot, Frédéric Ozanam, Orestes Brownson, and Isaac Hecker to American readers.

During the Civil War, Mother Angela established eight military hospitals, staffed two hospital ships, and provided for the direction of 80 sister-nurses. She was appointed provincial superior in 1869, and she founded St. Catherine's Institute, a teacher-training institution in Baltimore, Md., in 1874, staffing it with religious and lay teachers from St. Mary's and elsewhere. During the period 1855–82, Mother Angela made 45 foundations from New York to California and from Michigan to Texas.

Bibliography: M. MCCANDLESS, Family Portraits (Notre Dame, Ind. 1952). M. RITA, A Story of Fifty Years (Notre Dame, Ind. 1905). A. S. MCALLISTER, Flame in the Wilderness: Life and Letters of Mother Angela Gillespie (Paterson 1944).

[M. R. DAILY]

GILLIS, JAMES MARTIN

Editor, author; b. Boston, Mass., Nov. 12, 1876; d. New York City, March 14, 1957. He was the son of James and Catharine (Roche) Gillis. After early education at Boston Latin School, he attended St. Charles College, Baltimore, Md., and St. John's Seminary, Brighton, Mass. In 1900 he joined the Paulist fathers; he was ordained the following year and sent to the Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., where he earned a licentiate in theology (1903). He taught at St. Paul's College, Washington, D.C., until 1910, when he left to engage in missionary work.

In 1922 Gillis was named editor of the Paulist periodical the Catholic World, a post he filled until 1948. Under his direction the Catholic World retained the reputation it had acquired under such predecessors as Isaac HECKER and Augustine F. HEWIT. Gillis was noted for his vigor as a controversialist and for his outspoken and conservative opinions on political issues, which were frequently quoted. After 1928 he produced also a newspaper column called "Sursum Corda: What's Right with the World," which was syndicated in 50 diocesan papers. From 1930 to 1941 he attracted notice as a popular radio speaker on the "Catholic Hour," produced by the National Broadcasting Company. He was a prolific author, publishing his first book, False Prophets, in 1925 and My Last Book in 1957. His other works included: The Catholic Church and the Home (1928), The Ten Commandments (1931), Christianity and Civilization (1932), The Paulists (1932), This Our Day (2 v. 1933, 1949), So Near Is God (1953), On Almost Everything (1955), and This Mysterious Human Nature (1956). His numerous articles appeared in leading Catholic magazines, and he wrote for the old Catholic Encyclopedia and the Encyclopedia Americana. He was an academy member of the Gallery of Living Catholic Authors and received many honorary degrees from American Catholic colleges, including Fordham University, Fordham, N.Y. (1935), and the University of Detroit, Mich. (1940). In 1951 he received an honorary doctorate in theology from the Angelicum (Pontifical University of St. Thomas Aquinas), Rome. Illness forced him to retire in 1948, but he continued to serve as contributing editor of the Catholic World until his death. He was buried in the Crypt Church at St. Paul the Apostle, New York City.

Mother Angela Gillespie.

Bibliography: J. F. FINLEY, James Gillis, Paulist (Garden City, N.Y. 1958).

[J. L. MORRISON]

GILLOW Y ZAVALZA, EULOGIO GREGORIO

Mexican archbishop; b. Puebla, Mexico, March 11, 1841; d. Ejutla, Mexico, May 18, 1922. His parents were Tomás Gillow, of English origin, and María Zavalza y Gutiérrez, Marchioness of Selva Nevada. At age ten Gillow went to England and spent three years at Stonyhurst School. He then studied philosophy at Namur in Belgium. On a visit to Rome in 1862, he was received and honored by Pope Pius IX. In Rome he studied theology. In 1865 he returned to Mexico and was ordained in Puebla by Bp. Carlos M. Colina. Returning to Rome in 1869, he obtained a doctorate in canon law. On May 26, 1887, Pope Pius IX appointed Gillow bishop of Antequera, Oaxaca, to succeed the late Márquez Goyeneche. Gillow was consecrated on the feast of St. Ignatius, July 31, 1887, by Archbishop Labastida of Mexico; he took possession of his diocese in November. In 1890 he again went to Rome with five students for the Latin American College. Gillow returned to Mexico the following year with a papal bull elevating Antequera to an archbishopric, for which he had been made archbishop. He called a provincial council, which met in Oaxaca from Dec. 8, 1892, to March 12, 1893. His outstanding ability led to his consideration for a cardinalate, but he did not receive the appointment because of political opposition. He also assisted at the plenary council on Latin America in Rome.

In addition to his pastoral duties, Gillow worked for the material betterment of his archdiocese and helped in the development of the Mexican railway system. During a visit to San Antonio, Texas, he proposed the construction of a seminary that could be used by Mexicans in case of new persecutions. He was forced into exile when the Revolution broke out in 1910. For some time Gillow lived in San Antonio and later in Los Angeles, where he prepared his memoirs before returning to Mexico.

Bibliography: E. VALVERDE TÉLLEZ, Bio-bibliografía eclesiástica mexicana, 1821–1943, 3 v. (Mexico City 1949).

[L. MEDINA ASCENSIO]

GILMOUR, RICHARD

Second bishop of the Cleveland, Ohio, Diocese; b. Glasgow, Scotland, Sept. 28, 1824; d. St. Augustine, Fla., April 13, 1891. The Gilmour family, of Scotch Covenanter stock, came to Cumbola, Pa., when Richard was 13. At a Father Mathew temperance rally, the boy became interested in the Catholic Church (see MATHEW, THEOBALD). He was baptized in 1842 by Father Patrick Rafferty and, under this Pennsylvania missionary, began studies for the priesthood, completing them at Mt. St. Mary's, Emmitsburg, Md. He was ordained Aug. 30, 1852, by Abp. John B. Purcell in Cincinnati, Ohio. Assigned to the Ohio River area, Gilmour built churches at Portsmouth and Ironton, Ohio, visited counties in Kentucky and Virginia, and served parishes in Cincinnati and Dayton.

On April 14, 1872, he was consecrated bishop of Cleveland, where the growing Catholic population faced a bitter nativism, especially in the newspapers. Gilmour's first pastoral in 1873 showed that he would provide leadership: "Catholics are too timid; they seem to go on the principle that if they are tolerated, they are doing well."

He stressed the rights of Church and conscience, yet in all civic matters, obedience to the state. He demanded Catholic schools that were "equal to the best," and a just share of public school funds. In 1874, to strengthen the Church's voice, he founded the Catholic Universe and the Catholic Central Association for the betterment of social and religious conditions. After a two-year illness that kept him away from the diocese, he returned in 1876 to continue his leadership.

During his episcopate the number of churches increased from 160 to 233, and schools from 90 to 142; many earlier structures were replaced and four new hospitals were built. He introduced the Dominicans of New Jersey, Felicians, and Sisters of St. Joseph, Notre Dame, Charity of Cincinnati; he brought the Jesuits to Cleveland to open St. Ignatius College (later John Carroll University) in 1886. Gilmour encouraged native vocations to the priesthood: 122 priests, 55 of them American-born and about 27 of them from the diocese, were ordained from 1872 to 1892.

At this time, the question of public funds for private schools was being bitterly debated in the United States. In Ohio, Gilmour joined other bishops in calling for distribution of funds to parochial as well as to public schools; in 1873 he offered a plan of "shared control" of Catholic schools in his diocese. As secularization of public schools continued, the bishop told the American Congress of Churches at Cleveland in 1886: "Catholics object neither to State schools, nor to religion in State schools. However, they do object that any other than the Catholic religion be taught Catholic children." By 1872, Ohio, with 16 other states, had already forbidden religious school aid. Aware of this, Gilmour turned to the multiplication and improvement of Catholic schools, and required Catholic children to attend them. He successfully fought attempts to tax Catholic school property (Gilmour v. Pelton, Ohio, 1883), established a diocesan school board, and argued effectively at the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore for strong sanctions for Catholic education. The bishop himself produced the popular textbooks known as "Gilmour Readers," and the "Gilmour Bible History," published by Benziger Brothers. Gilmour participated forcefully in the discussions of the Baltimore Plenary Council in 1884, especially those on church property, secret societies, education, and the controversial subjects of irremovable rectors and consultors.

Generally conservative, he upheld the authority of the bishops. As he expressed it to Abp. (later Cardinal) James Gibbons: "The clergy need to be strengthened against the people, and the people against the irresponsible ways of the clergy, and the bishop against both." At Gibbons's request, he joined bishops Joseph Dwenger of Fort Wayne, Ind., and John Moore of St. Augustine, Fla., in presenting the conciliar acts and decrees at Rome. When the Congregation of Propaganda vetoed the decree requiring the bishop in property transactions to have only the counsel, not the consent, of the consultors, Gilmour led the American bishops in persuading Leo XIII to retain the original decree.

Experience in cosmopolitan Cleveland gave Gilmour an understanding of the dangers of nationality conflict. Although, when possible, he provided immigrant Catholics with churches and priests of their own language, he urged them to be American Catholics. While in Rome in 1885, he and Moore strongly opposed the Germanizing influence in a "Memorial on the Question of the Germans in the Church in America." In his concern over secret societies, Gilmour required the Ancient Order of Hibernians in Cleveland to break with the Ireland-based Fenians.

Gilmour's voice was that of a strong bishop, conscious that the Church's problems in the 19th-century United States could be best solved by candor, discipline, and unity. Although generally conservative, he was among the midwestern bishops advocating a plenary council and a Catholic university. He supported the first American Catholic Lay Congress (1889) and Cardinal Gibbons in his defense of labor unions. After his death in 1891, 5,000 citizens honored him at a memorial service.

Bibliography: M. J. HYNES, History of the Diocese of Cleveland 1847–1952 (Cleveland 1953). J. T. ELLIS, The Life of James Cardinal Gibbons, 2 v. (Milwaukee 1952). C. J. BARRY, The Catholic Church and German Americans (Milwaukee 1953). P. D. JORDAN, Ohio Comes of Age 1873–1900, v.5 of History of the State of Ohio, ed. C. WITTKÉ, 6 v. (Columbus, Ohio 1941–44). R. D. CROSS The Emergence of Liberal Catholicism in America (Cambridge, Mass. 1958).

[P. J. HALLINAN]

GILSON, ÉTIENNE HENRI

Historian of philosophy, Christian philosopher, Thomist; b. Paris, June 13, 1884; d. Cravant, Sept. 19, 1978. The third son of five boys born to Paul Anthelme Gilson, a Parisian shopkeeper, and Caroline Juliette Rainaud, the daughter of a Burgundian (Cravant) innkeeper, Étienne was educated in the parish school of Sainte-Clotilde, in the classical Collège de Notre-Dame-des-Champs and in Lycée Henri IV.

After a year of military service, during which he began to read R. DESCARTES, he studied philosophy at the Sorbonne under Victor Delbos (1862–1916) and Lucien Lévy-Bruhl (1857–1939) and at the Collège de France under H. BERGSON, obtaining the Diplôme in philosophy in 1906. In 1907 he married Thérèse Ravisé of Melun.

Academic Career. From 1907 to 1913 Gilson taught philosophy at lycées in Bourg-en-Bresse, Rochefort-sur-Mer, Tours, Saint-Quentin, and Angers. In 1913 he received the Doctorat-ès-Lettres from the University of Paris and taught at the University of Lille. During World War I, Gilson was mobilized in a Lille regiment and assigned to instructing recruits in central France. A year later, qualified as a machine gunner, he was sent to the Verdun front where he became a lieutenant. He was taken prisoner at Verdun in 1916 and awarded the Croix de Guerre. In 1919 he taught at the University of Strasbourg, and in 1921 he was appointed professor of medieval philosophy at the Sorbonne. The same year he became director of studies for medieval philosophy at the École Pratique des Hautes Études in Paris. In 1922 he was on a relief mission in Russia. In 1926 a chair in medieval philosophy was created specifically for Gilson at the Sorbonne. Also in 1926 he made the first of his many trips to America, lecturing at Harvard University and the University of Virginia. In 1929 he was cofounder of the Institute of Mediaeval Studies in Toronto, Canada, and became its director of studies. In 1932 he was appointed professor of the history of medieval philosophy at the Collège de France. In 1942 he was annoyed to learn that Père CHENU's brochure on Saulchoir methods had been placed on the Roman Index. He was soon to be equally disturbed at attempts to have de LUBAC's Surnaturel condemned. He was elected to the Académie Française in 1947, and the same year he was appointed Conseiller de la République. After resigning from the Collège de France in 1951, he became full-time professor at the institute in Toronto, a position he retained until 1968. Gilson retired to Cravant in 1971.

Gilson's reputation during his lifetime was nonpareil: unsurpassed respect for and trust in advanced scholarly research and commitment to the primacy of the oldest materials, read always in the language in which they were written down, in view of what the original author intended to say, and with critical distrust of intervening interpretations. He wanted medieval studies to make a fresh start, functioning primarily at the post-graduate level, rediscovering the riches of a neglected and only too-often despised Christian civilization between late classical times and the early Renaissance.

Christian Philosophy. Gilson came to medieval philosophy and to Thomism in particular through his study of CARTESIANISM. While examining the vocabulary and ideas borrowed from scholasticism by Descartes, he discovered in the medieval schoolmen an unsuspected wealth of philosophy, the knowledge of which is essential for the understanding of modern philosophy. After this discovery Gilson devoted much of his life to the study of medieval philosophy. His voluminous writings cover the whole range of philosophy in the Middle Ages, and he expounded with objectivity and sympathy the ideas of its leading thinkers, from St. Augustine to Duns Scotus. He also wrote extensively on facets of medieval humanism and modern philosophy.

In his Gifford Lectures of 1930–31, entitled The Spirit of Mediaeval Philosophy, Gilson showed that during the Middle Ages, under the influence of Christianity, new philosophical ideas were created that passed into modern philosophy. Hence he called philosophy in the Middle Ages “Christian philosophy,” which he defined as “every philosophy which, although keeping the two orders [of faith and reason] formally distinct, nevertheless considers the Christian revelation as an indispensable auxiliary to reason.”

Gilson rejected the notion of a common philosophical synthesis, or “scholasticism,” in the Middle Ages. In his view there were several scholastic syntheses in the 13th century, each of which was highly original and often in opposition to the others. The doctrinal syntheses of masters such as St. BONAVENTURE, St. THOMAS AQUINAS, DUNS SCOTUS, and WILLIAM OF OCKHAM were not primarily philosophical but theological. They philosophized as theologians and within the context of their theologies.

Gilson was a philosophical historian, seeking truth through the history of philosophy. His historical studies led him to the truth of Thomism. In Thomism he found a metaphysics of existence that conceives God as the very act of being (ipsum esse) and creatures as beings whose center is an act of existing (esse). He refused to modernize Thomism by treating its rational content as a philosophy independent of theology or by expounding it according to a philosophical order. He also distinguished between the Thomism of St. Thomas and that of his followers, such as Tommaso de Vio CAJETAN, who sometimes distorted Aquinas’s doctrine. He opposed attempts to synthesize Thomism with philosophies contrary to its spirit, such as Cartesianism and KANTIANISM. In his view Thomistic realism is irreconcilable with the methodic doubt of Descartes and the critique of I. Kant.

While seeking to understand Thomism in its medieval setting, Gilson called for the revival of its creative spirit. He championed a living Thomism that will interpret, criticize, and put into order, in the light of the Thomistic metaphysics of being, the enormous data accumulated since the Middle Ages (The Spirit of Thomism, 96). Among Gilson’s outstanding contributions to living Thomism are his philosophical analyses of the fine arts.

See Also: CHRISTIAN PHILOSOPHY; EXISTENTIAL METAPHYSICS; SCHOLASTICISM, 3; THEOLOGY, NATURAL.

Bibliography: Works. A complete bibliography of Gilson’s writings up to 1958 is contained in Mélanges offerts à Étienne Gilson de l’Académie française (Toronto 1959) 15–58. M. MCGRATH, Étienne Gilson, A Bibliography (Toronto 1982). Among his works are: La Liberté chez Descartes et la théologie (Paris 1913); Le Thomisme (Strasbourg 1919; 6th ed. Paris 1965), Eng. The Christian Philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas, tr. L. K. SHOOK (New York 1956); La Philosophie au moyen âge, 2 v. (Paris 1922; 2d ed., 1 v. 1944); La Philosophie de s. Bonaventure (Paris 1924; 2d ed. 1942), Eng. tr. I. TRETHOWAN (New York 1938); Introduction à l’étude de s. Augustin (Paris 1929; 2d ed. 1943), Eng., The Christian Philosophy of Saint Augustine, tr. L. E. M. LYNCH (New York 1960); Études sur le rôle de la pensée médiévale dans la formation du système cartésien (Paris 1930); The Spirit of Medieval Philosophy, tr. A. H. C. DOWNES (New York 1936). Les Idées et les lettres (Paris 1932); La Théologie mystique de s. Bernard (Paris 1934), Eng. tr. A. H. C. DOWNES (New York 1940); Le Réalisme méthodique (Paris 1935); Christianity and Philosophy, tr. R. MACDONALD (New York 1939); The Unity of Philosophical Experience (New York 1937); Héloïse and Abelard, tr. L. K. SHOOK (Chicago 1951); Reason and Revelation in the Middle Ages (New York 1938); Dante et la philosophie (Paris 1939), Eng. tr. D. MOORE (New York 1949); Réalisme thomiste et critique de la connaissance (Paris 1939); God and Philosophy (New Haven 1941); L’Être et l’essence (2d ed. Paris 1962); Being and Some Philosophers (2d ed. Toronto 1952); L’École des muses (Paris 1951), Eng.; Choir of Muses, tr. M. WARD (London 1953); Jean Duns Scot (Paris 1952); Les Métamorphoses de la cité de Dieu (Louvain 1952); History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages, (New York 1955); Painting and Reality (Bollingen Ser. 35; New York 1957); Peinture et réalité (Paris 1958); Elements of Christian Philosophy (New York 1960); Le Philosophe et la théologie (Paris 1960), Eng. tr. C. GILSON (New York 1962); Modern Philosophy: Descartes to Kant (with T. LANGAN) (New York 1963); Les Arts du Beau (Paris 1963); Matières et formes (Paris 1964); The Spirit of Thomism (New York 1964); The Art of the Beautiful (New York 1965); Dante et Béatrice: Études dantesques (Paris 1974); Thomist Realism and the Critique of Knowledge, tr. M. A. WAUK, foreword by F. D. WILHEMSEN (San Francisco 1986). Literature. L. K. SHOOK, Étienne Gilson (Toronto, Ont. 1984). C. J. EDIE, The Philosophy of Étienne Gilson, 3 v. (Doctoral diss. unpub., Institut Supérieur de Philosophie, Louvain 1958). J. MARITAIN et al., Étienne Gilson: Philosophe de la chrétienté (Paris 1949). A. C. PEGIS, “G. and Thomism,” Thought 21 (1946) 435–454. A Gilson Reader, ed. A. C. PEGIS (New York 1957) 7–20. H. DE LUBAC, Lettres de M. Étienne Gilson au père Henri de Lubac et commentaire par celui-ci (1986). L. A. KENNEDY and J. C. MARLER, eds., Thomistic Papers II (Houston 1986).

[A. MAURER/L. K. SHOOK]

GIMÉNEZ MALLA, CEFERINO, BL.

Also known as “El Pele,” married gypsy, martyr, lay Franciscan; b. Aug. 26(?), 1861, Fraga, Huesca, Catalonia, Spain; d. Aug. 9, 1936, in the cemetery of Barbastro, Spain. Ceferino (Zeferino) was one of over 500,000 gypsies to suffer racial and religious persecution in the 20th century. Following his marriage to Teresa Giménez Castro of Lérida, Ceferino moved with his new wife to Barbastro. The marriage, a gypsy union that was regularized in 1912 in the Catholic Church, resulted in no children of their own, but the couple adopted Teresa's niece Pepita. A successful horse trader, Giménez used his negotiating skills to settle disputes and gained a reputation for fairness. He was also known for his charity and piety. Ceferino's illiteracy and humility belied his great wisdom, which led even his bishop, Blessed Florentino ASENSIO BARROSO, who was martyred hours after Ceferino and beatified with him, to seek his counsel. He was a member of the city council of Barbastro and, as one of the first 159 Franciscan tertiaries of Barbastro (initiated by the Capuchins in 1926), elected to the advisory council of the society. Ceferino was arrested for defending a young priest who was being harassed. During his 15-day imprisonment in the Capuchin friary with 350 other detainees, Ceferino incited the guards by daily praying the Rosary. Despite the intervention of Eugenio Sopena, an influential member of the revolutionary committee and Ceferino's neighbor, he was shot by a Republican firing squad for refusing to renounce his faith. Eighteen others, mainly priests and religious, died with him and were buried in unmarked graves. Ceferino's cause was opened in Barbastro in 1993, and the decree of martyrdom was issued in Rome on Dec. 17, 1996. When Pope John Paul II beatified him on May 4, 1997, he became the first gypsy blessed and second lay martyr of the Spanish Civil War. Patron of gypsies.

Feast: Aug. 2.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 12 (1997) 599. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed. 42 (1995): 8.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GINOULHIAC, JACQUES MARIE ACHILLE

French bishop and theologian; b. Montpellier, Dec. 3, 1806; d. there, Nov. 17, 1875. In 1830, immediately after ordination, he was appointed professor of philosophy and natural sciences and in 1833 professor of theology at the seminary of Montpellier. In 1839 he became vicar-general of Aix. While bishop of Grenoble (1852–70) he conducted a careful investigation during the controversy concerning LA SALETTE before deciding in favor of the credibility of the apparitions there. In 1870 he was promoted to the archbishopric of Lyons, where in 1873 he laid the cornerstone for the basilica of Notre Dame de Fourvière. He was a good administrator in both sees and issued pastoral letters of high theological caliber. Although he was always very devoted to the Holy See, upheld the papal temporal power, and repulsed attacks on the SYLLABUS OF ERRORS, he gained the reputation of being a supporter of LIBERALISM and GALLICANISM. His intent, however, was to prevent misunderstanding between the Church and modern society. At VATICAN COUNCIL I he delivered a remarkable address advocating freedom of theological investigation. Along with Félix DUPANLOUP he was a leader among the French bishops in the minority group opposed to the definition of papal primacy and infallibility. He voted non placet (July 13, 1870) and absented himself from the public session (July 18) that promulgated the doctrines, but he subscribed to them on August 16. Ginoulhiac's reputation as a theologian was established with his Histoire du dogme catholique pendant les trois premiers siècles (2 v. 1852; 2d ed. in three v. 1865), in which he asserted that the doctrine of the Trinity did not result from rationalistic speculation but from the theological development of teachings contained in revelation. His other writings include Sermon sur la montagne (1873) and Les origines du christianisme (1878).

Bibliography: E. MANGENOT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 6.2:1371–73. C. BUTLER, The Vatican Council, 2 v. (New York 1930).

[V. CONZEMIUS]

GIOBERTI, VINCENZO

Nineteenth-century Italian philosopher and statesman; b. Turin, April 5, 1801; d. Paris, Oct. 26, 1852. Gioberti was ordained in 1825. Exiled in 1830, he stayed first at Paris, then at Brussels, where he taught for ten years in a private institute. NEO-GUELFISM seemed to triumph in the 1846 election of Pius IX to the papacy; so in 1848 Gioberti returned to Turin and became president of the chamber, then president of the ministers. In his Il Rinascimento civile d'Italia (2 v. Turin 1851) he manifested his abandonment of neo-Guelfism and adoption of liberalism. Retiring to Paris in voluntary exile, he passed the last year of his life there.

Gioberti maintained a complete identity between the first psychological principle and the first ontological principle, a consequence of his embracing the teaching of A. ROSMINI-SERBATI concerning the intuition of being as the principle of intelligibility in reality and of objectivity in consciousness. Indeed, his whole philosophy can be summarized in the formula "Being creates the existent and the existent returns to being." All of his philosophical investigation was centered upon the union-distinction of Being and the existent. At one time he emphasized the distinction between them, at another he so emphasized their unity that he resolved Being into the existent, and his philosophy became a divination about the existent, a philosophy of a simultaneously divine and human mind. Although it is disputed whether his teaching was one of THEISM or PANTHEISM, he did, in fact, end up in pantheism. His “substantive” distinction between Being and the existent is expressed in the following way: “The term ‘exist’ precisely indicates the divine reality inasmuch as, with creation, it goes outside itself, as it were, transplants itself, expresses itself, and manifests itself” [Protologia 2 v. (Naples 1861) 1:16–17]. The two cycles, namely, creation and palingenesis, are conjoined and, as it were, united: “The first act of creation and the last act of palingenesis do not subsist in themselves, since they are interminable; hence they are nothing. Therefore, they are immediate to each other; nothing is Being, Being is nothing, but only in respect to the existent. . . . However, they subsist in God, in Being, by means of His capacity to fill and reoccupy the infinite” (ibid. 1:251).

Gioberti’s concept of the history of humanity as a continuous revelation of God and elevation of man led him, especially in his Riforma cattolica (ed. G. Balsamo-Crivelli, Florence 1924), to view revelation, not as completed in the preaching of the Apostles, but as perennial and ever open, manifesting itself in history and in man’s consciousness. This doctrine has been condemned by the Church, and Gioberti’s works were placed on the Index of Prohibited Books.

See Also: ONTOLOGISM.

Bibliography: U. BENIGNI, in The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al., 16 v. (New York 1904–14; supplement 1922). C. MAZZANTINI, in Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957).

[M. F. SCIACCA]

GIOTTO DI BONDONE

Florentine painter; b. Vespignano, near Florence, c. 1266 or c. 1276; d. Florence, c. 1336. Giotto effected a revolution in Florentine painting that was to reach its apogee in the work of Michelangelo. Florentine painters had traditionally used the flat two-dimensional figures of the Romanesque and Byzantine styles as models for their forms. Giotto broke with this tradition by using sculpture as his models. He thereby gave his figures greater three-dimensional substance and enhanced the dramatic content of the episodes depicted. The Gothic style with its naturalism in painting and sculpture had begun to invade Italy. It appears in the works of Arnolfo di Cambio and of Niccolò and Giovanni Pisano, whose sculptures were to influence Giotto’s style. Giotto’s hulking “Ognissanti Madonna” in the Uffizi, for example, seated on her flimsy Gothic throne, resembles the blocky portraits of Boniface VIII by Arnolfo.

In the Arena Chapel frescoes (Padua 1303–05), the earliest authenticated frescoes by Giotto, Gothic influence is apparent not only in the figure style and the cascading drapery but also in the iconographic program of the decoration. The scenes from the life of the Virgin and of Christ, the monochrome personifications of virtues and vices painted to resemble sculpture, and the huge Last Judgment are elements characteristically present in the portal sculptures of Gothic cathedrals.

Giotto was a mature artist between 30 and 40 years of age when he painted in the Arena Chapel. What his earlier style might have been, how and where he made the break with the Byzantinized style of CIMABUE, his supposed master, and turned to sculpture as models for his figures, and where he acquired the technique of fresco painting are still matters of conjecture. The answer might well be that he went to Rome, where the fresco tradition was at home and where he would have come in contact with both classical sculpture and that of contemporary Italian Gothic artists. At any rate, his reputation there was such that he was commissioned in 1298 to execute the great mosaic of the Navicella—now completely redone—in St. Peter’s.

Ever since the 16th century the fresco cycle of scenes from the life of St. Francis in the upper church of San Francesco at ASSISI has been considered as in Giotto’s early style. This claim has been disputed pro and con in more recent times, since several hands can be distinguished in the work. The earliest literary evidence for Giotto’s presence at Assisi is an entry for the year 1305 in a contemporary chronicle. It states that Giotto’s greatness as an artist is proven by his work in the church of the Minorites at Assisi, at Rimini, and at Padua. The question then arises, where in San Francesco is Giotto’s work if not in the St. Francis cycle? Certain NT scenes, such as the “Deposition,” the “Ascension,” the “Pentecost,” and the “Madonna” roundel among the frescoes of the Roman school in the upper areas of the nave above the St. Francis series, have been attributed to him. Most recently the attempt has been made to identify him with the Isaac Master.

In the 1320s Giotto decorated four chapels in Santa Croce, FLORENCE. The frescoes of two of these are still preserved: the scenes from the life of St. Francis—recalling the Assisi ones—in the Bardi Chapel, and those from the lives of St. John the Baptist and St. John the Evangelist in the Peruzzi Chapel. These furnish examples of Giotto’s late style. The frescoes in both these chapels were restored in the 19th century, but this restoration was recently removed.

In the early 1330s, Giotto was called to Naples by Robert of Anjou to decorate the great hall of the Castelnuovo with figures of famous men. These frescoes no longer exist. The same is true for the frescoes in Santa Chiara commissioned at the same time. In 1334 Giotto was recalled to Florence to take charge of the construction of the campanile of the cathedral. Some of the relief sculptures there have been attributed to him.

Bibliography: W. HAUSENSTEIN, Giotto (Berlin 1923), lists all bibliog. before 1923. R. SALVINI, Giotto: Bibliografia (Rome 1938). R. OFFNER, "Giotto, non-Giotto," Burlington Magazine 74 (Jan.–June 1939) 259–268; 75 (July–Dec. 1939) 96–113. P. TOESCA, Giotto (Turin 1945). M. MEISS, Giotto and Assisi (New York 1960). E. T. DeWald, Italian Painting, 1200–1600 (New York 1961) 119–141.

[E. T. DE WALD]

GIRALDUS CAMBRENSIS

Archdeacon, historian, prolific writer; b. Manorbier Castle, Pembrokeshire, Wales, c. 1147 or 1148; d. 1223. Welsh by his mother and Norman by his father, William de Barri, Giraldus was of the royal family of Wales. In his early years he showed a strong interest in the religious life and in study. Since Wales lacked good schools, he first studied under Peter Comestor and then lectured on the liberal arts at Paris, returning to England in 1172. Made archdeacon of Brecknock, he worked vigorously to reform the Church in WALES. When his uncle David Fitzgerald, Bishop of SAINT DAVIDS, died in 1176, Giraldus was proposed as the new bishop, but HENRY II, KING OF ENGLAND, would allow only Norman bishops. Giraldus thereupon returned to Paris to study theology, civil, and Canon Law. After returning to England in 1180 as a master of theology, he was made a royal chaplain in 1184. He was assigned first to pacify Wales and then to accompany Henry II's son John on a military expedition to Ireland. Giraldus described his experiences in Ireland in his popular Topographia Hiberniae [first version tr. J. J. O'Meara (Dundalk 1951)], dedicated to Henry II in 1188, while his Expugnatio Hibernica (History of the Conquest of Ireland) is the most valuable of all his works. In 1188 he accompanied Abp. BALDWIN OF CANTERBURY to Wales to preach the crusade proclaimed by Henry II; he described this trip in Itinerarium Cambriae (1191). When Henry died in 1189 and Giraldus received no preferment, he decided to retire to a life of prayer and study at LINCOLN. With the death of Peter de Leia, Bishop of Saint Davids, in 1198, and his election by the chapter as Peter's successor, Giraldus tried to win the necessary approval of Abp. Hubert Walter of Canterbury. When Hubert refused, Giraldus appealed to Pope INNOCENT III and became involved in five years of litigation that ended in failure (1203). He revisited Ireland (1205–06) and made a pilgrimage to Rome (1207). He is buried in Saint Davids cathedral.

Giraldus wrote numerous works including an autobiography [tr. H. L. Butler (London 1937)] in which he explained his career and his long struggle to become bishop of Saint Davids. He was a vain man who liked to boast of his charm, of his ability as a teacher in Paris, and of the rightness of his cause. His letters, poems, and speeches are in his Symbolum electorum. His works have been published in eight volumes in the Rolls Series (ed. J. S. Brewer and J. F. Dimock, 1861–1891).

"Vision of the Fiery Chariot," detail from the Life of St. Francis of Assisi fresco cycle by Giotto di Bondone, Assisi, Italy, 1297–1299. (©Elio Ciol/CORBIS)

Bibliography: Eng. tr. of historical works, T. FORESTER and R. C. HOARE, rev. and ed. T. WRIGHT (London 1863). M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 3:622–637. H. R. LUARD, in The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900; reprinted with corrections, 21 v., 1908–09, 1921–22, 1938; supplement 1901–) 7:1268–72. F. M. POWICKE, "Gerald of Wales," The Bulletin of John Rylands Library 12 (1928) 389–410. J. CONWAY DAVIES, "Giraldus Cambrensis, 1146–1946," Archaeol. Cambrensis 99 (1946). A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A. D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 1:117–118.

[J. A. CORBETT]

GIRALDUS OF SALLES, BL.

Monastic founder; b. Salles, Bergerac, France, c. 1070; d. abbey of Châtelliers, near Poitiers, France, April 20, 1120. He was a canon regular of the monastery of St. Avit-le-Senieur at Bergerac near his home, and late in life he became a student of Robert of Arbrissel in the Diocese of Périgueux. With great reforming zeal, he founded seven monasteries for men and two for women, most notably Notre Dame des Châtelliers, where he was buried. Although some miracles were reported after his death, his feast is not widely celebrated. The Acta Sanctorum [Oct. 10 (1869) 249–267] includes details on each of the monastic foundations and a laudatory 13th-century biography.

"St. Francis Expels the Devils from Arezzo," 13th-century fresco painting by Giotto di Bondone, Assisi, Italy. (©Archivio Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

Feast: Oct. 23.

Bibliography: J. LAVIALLE, Vie du Bx. Géraud de Sales (1907). A. BORST, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*² 4:900. M. B. BRARD, Catholicisme 4:1874.

[E. J. KEALEY]

GIRARD OF ANGERS, ST.

Monk; b. Diocese of Angers, c. mid-11th century; d. Nov. 4, 1123. He was at first a secular cleric and then became a BENEDICTINE monk at the Abbey of Saint-Aubin in Angers c. 1085. In 1097 he founded the priory of Sainte-Madeline in Brossay, and then another at Bois-de-Jarze. Apparently he was much given to fasting and reported having visions after prolonged fasts. Among other things, he reputedly predicted the death of Pope GELASIIUS II in 1119 and of King HENRY I's son, William, in 1120.

A number of miracles were attributed to him, and he was canonized in 1468. His relics were enshrined in a chapel of the abbey church but were lost during the French Revolution.

Feast: Nov. 4.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Nov. 2.1 (1894) 491–509. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 3:258–260. E. C. A. LITOU, Vie de s. Girard, apôtre du pays de Brossay (Angers 1903).

[E. J. KEALEY]

GIRY, FRANÇOIS

A Minim, author of ascetical, historical, and hagiographical works; b. Paris, Sept. 15, 1635; d. there, Nov. 29, 1688. His father, Louis Giry, lawyer, scholar, and translator, was among the first members of the Académie Française. François entered the MINIMS in 1652 and made profession the following year. Under the direction of Nicolas BARRÉ (founder of the Charitable Schools of the Saint-Enfant-Jésus), he progressed in virtue and knowledge. A professor of theology and master of novices, he held the most important positions in his order. Father Barré, while dying (1686), commissioned him to care for his charitable schools, and Giry fulfilled this trust for the rest of his life. His spiritual treatises are: Entretiens de Jésus-Christ avec l'âme chrétienne; Livre des cent points d'humilité; Explications . . . sur la Règle du tiers-ordre de St. François de Paule; Méditations pour les soeurs . . . du Saint-Enfant Jésus. Among his hagiographical works are the Dissertio chronologica . . . de anno natali et aetate s. Francisci de Paula (Paris 1680), and above all his edition (following L. Lippomano, L. Surius, P. Ribadeneyra) of Les Vies des saints dont on fait l'office dans le cours de l'année, 2 v. (Paris 1683, 1687, 1715, 1719). This work, begun by Simon Martin, though lacking a critical approach, was a marked advance over earlier collections and is still in use.

Bibliography: C. RAFFRON, Vie du R. P. François Giry (Paris 1691). L. MORÉRI, Grand dictionnaire historique (new ed. Paris 1759). E. D'ALENÇON, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 6.2:1377–79.

[J. DAOUST]

GISELA, BL.

Queen of Hungary; b. c. 973; d. c. 1060. She was the daughter of St. Henry II (d. 995), duke of Bavaria, and became the wife of St. STEPHEN I, king of Hungary. The tradition according to which she died in 1095 in Passau cannot be taken seriously, nor can the tombstone preserved there be regarded as hers. She died probably in exile or in the seclusion of a convent at an uncertain date. She married Stephen c. 996 and gave birth to several children, including St. EMERIC OF HUNGARY. After the death of her husband she became deeply involved in the intrigues created by the problems of his succession. Stephen's successor, the Italian Peter I (d. 1041), is traditionally depicted as a villain, and it is possible that many of the virtues ascribed to Gisela were meant to emphasize the shortcomings of Peter, with whom she came in growing conflict. Gisela has not been canonized and is not normally honored as a saint, although her case is still under consideration by the Holy See.

Feast: May 7.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum May 2 (1863) 132. J. MABILON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti, 9 v. (Paris 1668–1701; 2d ed. Venice 1733–40) 7:803. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 2:159, 161. J. SZALAY, Catholicisme 5:36. J. ROKA, Leben der heil. Gisela (Vienna 1777). W. M. SCHMID, Das Grab der Königin Gisela von Ungarn, Gemahlin Stephans I. des Heiligen (Munich 1912). F. ZSUZSA, ed., Gisella és kora: felolvasóulések az Árpád-korból (Veszprém, Hungary 1993).

[D. SINOR]

GISLENUS, ST.

Abbot: b. c. 650; d. Oct. 9, c. 681. Gislenus (Ghislain in French) was a hermit in a forest of Hainault, France. Near Mons he founded and governed the monastery of SS. Peter and Paul, called locally "The Cell" and since renamed Saint-Ghislain. It was also originally known as Urisdongus, that is, the bear's den, from the legend that a bear he saved from the hunt showed him the site of his future monastery. It is said he influenced St. VINCENT MADELGARIUS and his wife, St. WALDETRUD, whom he helped found a convent at Mons. He also helped Walde-turd's sister, St. ALDEGUNDIS found a convent at Maubeuge and was her close friend, for they visited at each other's monasteries and, in old age, at a convenient oratory. Another legendary account of the saint's life states that he was born in Attica, became a BASILIAN monk and then bishop of Athens. He is supposed to have resigned his see after a vision, gone to Rome and then to Hainault by divine instruction, met St. AMANDUS, and settled on the river Haine.

Feast: Oct. 9.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Oct. 4:1010–37. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 4: 71. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Manuscript page from "Topographia Hiberniae," 12th century, by Giraldus Cambrensis (British Museum MS Royal 13 B viii, fol. 22v).

Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 3:154–157. J. DUBOIS, Catholicisme 4:1910.

[B. CAVANAUGH]

GIULIANI, MARIANNA, ST.

In religion Maria della Pace (Eng: Mary of Peace; Fr.: Marie de la Paix); martyr, religious of the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary (FMM); b. Dec. 13, 1875, Aquila, Italy; d. July 9, 1900, Taiyüan, China. Although Marianna's father was dogmatically anti-religious, her mother covertly taught her the faith. Her father abandoned the seven children to the care of neighbors after her mother's death in 1885. Marianna's uncle, a Franciscan priest, commended her to the care of Mother Mary of the Passion. Upon completing her studies in France, she joined the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary (1892) and took the name Sr. Marie de la Paix. At the novitiate in Paris she worked with difficult girls. Thereafter she was assigned consecutively to Vanves, where she made her first vows, Austria, and China, where she was responsible for organizing the orphanage and using her beautiful voice to enhance the beauty of the liturgy. She was killed during the Boxer Uprising. Sr. Marie de la Paix was beatified with her religious sisters by Pope Pius XII, Nov. 24, 1946, and canonized, Oct. 1, 2000, by Pope John Paul II with Augustine Zhao Rong and companions.

Feast: July 4.

Bibliography: G. GOYAU, Valiant Women: Mother Mary of the Passion and the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary, tr. G. TELFORD (London 1936). M. T. DE BLARER, Les Bse Marie Hermine de Jésus et ses compagnes, franciscaines missionnaires de Marie, massacrées le 9 juillet 1900 à Tai-Yuan-Fou, Chine (Paris 1947). L. M. BALCONI, Le Martiri di Taiyuen (Milan 1945). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 47 (1955) 381–388. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. Ed. 40 (2000): 1–2, 10.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GIULIANI, VERONICA, ST.

Capuchin Poor Clare, stigmatic, and mystical writer; b. Mercatello, Italy, Dec. 27, 1660; d. Città di Castello, Italy, July 9, 1727. She was the daughter of Francesco Giuliani, a financier, and Benedetta Mancini; she was baptized Ursula. In 1677, after brief opposition from her widowed father, she joined the austere Capuchin POOR CLARES at Città di Castello, taking the name Veronica in honor of the Passion. She was favored with mystical experiences and received the visible impression of the crown of thorns on April 4, 1694. On April 5, 1697, she received the stigmata; this recurred several times later. For a time this led to misunderstanding in the convent, yet she was respected to such an extent that she was novice mistress for 34 years and was afterward elected abbess. She remained in this post from 1716 until her death in 1727. A post-mortem showed that her heart bore the imprint of the cross. She was beatified June 17, 1804, and canonized by GREGORY XVI, May 26, 1839. Besides her personal sanctity and close adherence to the ideals of St. Francis, Veronica is known for her Diary of ten volumes, written at the direction of her confessor; it is one of the most interesting accounts of mystical phenomena known to hagiographers. Her total works cover 44 volumes, of which 42 were written in her own hand. She had great devotion to the Eucharist and the Sacred Heart, and she offered her suffering for the promotion of the missions. She is usually represented crowned with thorns, holding a cross and a heart imprinted with the instruments of the Passion.

Feast: July 9.

Bibliography: Diario di S. Veronica Giuliani, ed. P. PIZZICARIA, 10 v. (Prato and Città di Castello 1895–1928). G. CITTADINI, Lineamenti di dottrina ascetico-mistica secondo gli scritti di santa Veronica Giuliani (Turin 1992); Vita di Santa Veronica Giuliani e del suo tempo (Città di Castello 1992). M. COURBAT, Dico e ridico e non dico niente: il fenomeno del diario sdoppiato in santa Veronica Giuliani (Siena 1994). R. PICCINELLI, La teologia della croce nell'esperienza mistica di S. Veronica Giuliani (Assisi 1989).

[J. CROSBY]

GIUSTINIANI

A celebrated family, which, according to Bernardo Giustiniani in his vita of his uncle St. Lawrence, was driven from Constantinople by sedition and migrated to Istria and Venice. The Venetian branch is found in Chioggia and Fermo. A Genoese branch spread to Corsica, Naples, Sicily, and Lipara, as well as to Chios, an Aegean island ruled by Genoa. The first member of whom there is record was Bl. Nicholas, a Benedictine monk (d. c. 1180). He entered the monastery of San Niccolò del Lido at Venice in 1153. When all the male members of his family perished in a disaster at sea, he was dispensed from his monastic vows by Pope Alexander III. He married Anna Michieli, daughter of the Doge of Venice, and fathered nine children. He returned to the monastery before his death. Although he is honored on November 21 in the Benedictine Order, there has been no formal beatification.

Venetian Branch. Lawrence (see LAWRENCE JUSTINIAN, ST.), the most famous member of the family, an ascetical and mystical writer, entered the CANONS REGULAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE in 1400 and led a humble, mortified life, showing special love for the poor. From 1409 on, he served in various administrative posts in his order and in the Church, ultimately becoming superior general (1424–31), bishop of Castello (1433), and finally patriarch of Venice (1451–56). Beatified in 1524 by CLEMENT VII, Lawrence was canonized by ALEXANDER VIII in 1690.

Leonardo, statesman and poet; b. Venice, c. 1388; d. there, Nov. 10, 1446. Leonardo was the brother of Lawrence. He became head of the Council of Ten (1443) and the procurator of SAINT MARK'S. He is noted for having restored the canzonetta as a popular lyric.

Bernardo, statesman and historian; b. Venice, Jan. 6, 1408; d. there, March 10, 1489. He was the son of Leonardo, and became ambassador to Louis XI of France, PAUL II, and SIXTUS IV, as well as a member of the Council of Ten. He is known for his biography of his uncle St. Lawrence (Venice 1475) and for his history of Venice, the De origine urbis Venetiarum (Venice 1492).

Paolo, Bl., monk and spiritual author, known also as Tommaso; b. Venice, June 15, 1476; d. Abbey of St. Sylvester of Mt. Sorate, June 28, 1528. He studied philosophy and theology at the University of Padua and then c. 1505 took up a solitary existence at Murano near Venice. He was the founder of the Camaldolese Hermits of Monte Corona and in 1513 succeeded Pietro DELFINO as general of the order. Paolo is known also as the author of numerous ascetical works and the Regula vitae eremiticae (Camaldoli 1519). His cult has not been officially confirmed.

Innocenzio, scholar; d. Aug. 10, 1563. He was a Camaldolese monk, a noted theologian and the author of a vita of Bl. Paolo.

Nicolò Antonio, bishop; b. 1712; d. 1796. A Benedictine, he was named to the See of Torcello in 1754, Verona in 1759, and Padua in 1772. He also translated and edited the works of St. ATHANASIUS and of St. Lawrence Giustiniani. Two Jesuit authors, Fábrice (1530–1604) and Gerolamo (b. 1698), also are from this branch of the family.

Genoese Branch. Paolo de Moneglia, curialist and diplomat; b. Genoa, 1444; d. Budapest, Hungary, 1502. A Dominican since 1463, he became provincial for Lombardy in 1485, master of the Sacred Palace in 1490, and inquisitor general for Genoa in 1494 (see INQUISITION). In 1499 he became bishop of Chios and was named legate for Hungary by Pope ALEXANDER VI.

Agostino, bishop and Orientalist; b. Genoa, c. 1470; d. at sea off Liguria, Italy, 1536. He became a Dominican, was named bishop of Nebbio in Corsica in 1514 and participated in the Fifth LATERAN COUNCIL (1516–17). In 1517 he became the first professor of Hebrew at the University of Paris. A friend of PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA, ERASMUS, and Thomas MORE, Agostino was the first in Europe to publish a POLYGLOT BIBLE (1516), and in it, commenting on Ps 18.5, he inserted a brief notice on Christopher COLUMBUS. Quétif ascribes 15 works to his authorship.

Vincenzo, a classicist; d. 1599. He took up residence at Valencia, Aragon, and was the author of Commentaria in universam logicam and editor of the works of VINCENT FERRER. Decio (1580–1642), another Dominican, came from Messana and was bishop of Aleria, Corsica, from 1612.

Benedetto, Jesuit exegete; b. Genoa, March 16, 1551; d. Rome, Dec. 19, 1622. He served seven years as rector of the Roman College and was appointed theologian of the Sacred PENITENTIARY in 1606. Twelve works are ascribed to his authorship, of which his commentaries on the Epistles of St. Paul (2 v. Rome 1612–13) and on the Catholic Epistles (Lyon 1621) are best known.

Six other Giustiniani are numbered among the Jesuit writers: Agostino (1551–90), Giorgio (1569–1644), Vincenzo (1593–1661), Pietro (1628–1707), Gerolamo (1656–1734) and Ottaviano (1689–1768).

Giovanni, a military commander; d. Chios, 1453. He brought a Genoese contingent to Constantinople in 1453 and played a leading part in the brave but unsuccessful defense of that city against the Turkish attack.

Michele, (1612– c. 1680) was vicar to his cousin Decio, Bishop of Aleria, and also a historian of Italian affairs. Lorenzo (1761–1824 or 1825) was a distinguished scholar who became librarian of the Biblioteca Nazionale (1805) and professor of critical diplomatics at the University of Naples.

Members of the Hierarchy. There were five cardinals from the Giustiniani family.

Vincenzo of Chios, scholar; b. Chios, Aug. 28, 1519; d. Rome, Oct. 28, 1582. He was master general of the Dominican Order from 1558 to 1571 and participated in the Council of TRENT (1562–63). He was the legate of Pope Pius V in Spain and was created a cardinal in 1570. He edited the first complete edition of the works of St. THOMAS AQUINAS (17 v. Rome 1570).

Benedetto of Chios, bishop of Porto; b. 1554; d. 1621. He served under the popes from GREGORY XIII to GREGORY XV and was noted for his zeal and charity to the poor of his diocese.

Orazio of Chios, scholar and curialist; b. Chios, Feb. 28, 1580; d. Rome, July 25, 1649. He was an ORATORIAN and became librarian of the Vatican (see VATICAN LIBRARY) under URBAN VIII. He was made bishop of Montalto in 1640 and a cardinal in 1645. He also served as consultor of the Congregation for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH and of the Holy Office, as well as grand penitentiary.

Giacomo, curialist and papal diplomat; b. Rome, Dec. 29, 1769; d. Rome, Feb. 24, 1843. He was vice-legate at Ravenna in 1794, governor of Perugia in 1797, and vice-governor of Rome until he was forced to withdraw before Napoleon's troops. Reinstalled in Rome by PIUS VII, he was created archbishop of Tyre in 1817 and served as nuncio to Spain until raised to the cardinalate in 1826 by LEO XII. He was among the candidates for the papacy after the death of PIUS VIII but was opposed by the Spanish government.

Allesandro, papal diplomat; b. Genoa, Feb. 3, 1778; d. Genoa, Oct. 11, 1843. He was instrumental in the negotiation of the Concordat of 1818 with the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies and was in Naples during the revolution of 1820–21. He was created archbishop of Petra in 1822, named nuncio to Naples the same year, reassigned as nuncio to Lisbon in 1826, and raised to the cardinalate in 1832.

Two archbishops and four bishops are listed among the Giustiniani of Chios. Leonardo (c. 1395–1459), a Dominican, was vicar-general of the Congregation of Fratres Peregrinati until appointed archbishop of Mytilene in 1444. He is widely known through the account of the capture of Constantinople (Patrologia Graeca 159:923–944) that he sent to Pope NICHOLAS V. Antonio (1505–71) became archbishop of Naxos in 1562, assisted at the Council of Trent, and was later transferred to the See of Lipari. Timoteo (c. 1502–71), a Dominican, was bishop of Aria in Crete (1550), of Chios (1564), and later of Stromboli in Calabria. Angelo (1520–96), a famous Franciscan preacher, was bishop of Geneva (1568) and assisted with the edition of the Greek Fathers produced under Pope Gregory XIII. Gerolamo (1554–1618) was made bishop of Chios in 1597. PietroMario, a Benedictine, was bishop of Sagona in Corsica (1726) and of Ventimiglia (1741). He also composed a history of the Abbey of MONTE CASSINO to the 10th century.

Bibliography: General. J. KRAUS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:904–905. M. L. FENOGLIO, Dizionario ecclesiastico 2:209. Nicholas. A. M. ZIMMERMAN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige 3:343. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by the Benedictines of Paris (Paris 1935–56) 11:703. Leonardo. M. T. DAZZI, Leonardo Giustiniani, poeta popolare d'amore (Bari 1934). G. BILLANOVICH, "Alla scoperta di L. G.," Annali della R. Scuola normale superiore di Pisa 8 (1939) 99–129. Bernardo. Enciclopedia ecclesiastica, ed. A. BERNAREGGI (Milan 1942) 4:156. Paolo. P. LUGANO, ed., L'Italia benedettina (Rome 1929) 273–279. A. DES MAZIS, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 11:519–536. J. LECLERCQ, "Le Bx. Paul Giustiniani et les ermites de son temps," Problemi di vita religiosa in Italia nel cinquecento: Atti del convegno di storia della chiesa in Italia (Bologna, 2–6 sett. 1958) (Padua 1960) 225–240; Un Humaniste ermite: Le Bx. Paul Giustiniani, 1476–1528 (Rome 1951). Innocenzio. J. FRANÇOIS, Bibliothèque générale des écrivains de l'Ordre de Saint Benoît, 4 v. (Bouillon 1777–78; repr. Louvain 1961) 1:550. Nicolo Antonio. Enciclopedia ecclesiastica, op. cit. 4:156–157. Fabrice and Gerolamo. C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la compagnie de Jésus (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 3:1491–94. Paolo de Moneglia. J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores ordinis Praedicatorum (Paris 1719–23) 2.1: 3–4. Agostino. ibid. 2.1:96–100. R. A. VIGNA, I vescovi domenicani liguri ovvero in Liguria (Genoa 1887) 216–244. Benedetto. Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus op. cit. 3:1489–91. P. BERNARD, A. VACANT et al., ed. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1903–50) 6.2:1381. Other Jesuits. Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus op. cit. 3:1491–94. Giovanni. S. RUNCIMAN, The Fall of Constantinople, 1453 (New York 1965), passim. Michele and Lorenzo. N. CORTESE, Eruditi e giornali letterari nella Napoli del settecento (Naples 1922) 36–59. Enciclopedia ecclesiastica, op. cit. 4:156. Vincenzo of Chios. J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores ordinis Praedicatorum (Paris 1719–23) 2.1:164–165. Orazio. É. D'ALENÇON, A. VACANT et al., ed. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1903–50) 6.2:1381–82. Giacomo. A. EISLER, Das Veto der katholischen Staaten bei der Papstwahl (Vienna 1907) 240–242. J. BECKER, Relaciones diplomáticas entre España y la Santa Sede durante el siglo XIX (Madrid 1908), passim. J. M. MARCH, La exclusiva dada por España contra el cardinale Giustiniani (1932). Alessandro. W. MATURI, Il Concordato del 1818 tra la Santa Sede e le due Sicilie (Florence 1929), passim. J. H. BRADY, Rome and the Neapolitan Revolution of 1820–21 (New York 1937), passim. G. M. MONTE, "Stato e Chiesa durante la rivoluzione napoletana del 1820–21," in Studi storici, v.1 of Chiesa e Stato, 2 v. (Milan 1939) 335–405. Leonardo. S. RUNCIMAN, op. cit., passim. R. LOENERTZ, La Société des Frères Pérégrinants (Rome 1937–) 1:66–70. Angelo. L. WADDING, Scriptores Ordinis Minorum (Lyons 1625–54) 23:275–278. G. MATTEUCCI, Due illustri minoriti del sec. XVI (Venice 1949). Pietro-Mario. J. FRANÇOIS, op. cit. 1: 550–551.

[M. G. MCNEIL]

GLADSTONE, WILLIAM EWART

English statesman; b. Liverpool, Dec. 29, 1809; d. Hawarden, Wales, May 19, 1897. The fourth son of a wealthy merchant of Scottish ancestry, he was educated at Eton and at Oxford University, where he took a double first in classics and mathematics (1831). He was drawn to TRACTARIANISM and made friends with a number of its leaders. His selection of a political rather than an ecclesiastical career was solely in deference to his father's wishes. In December 1832, he was elected to Parliament as the member from Newark. Within a comparatively short time he became a trusted member of Peel's government. The poverty he witnessed in Naples during a visit there in 1851 is said to have led him to cast off his innate Toryism. He was prime minister four times (1868–74, 1880–85, 1886, 1892–94).

In The State in its Relations with the Church (1838), Gladstone declared that the State, no less than the individual, is bound by moral law; and that the State must have a Christian awareness. Originally, this belief led him to advocate a theocracy. His changed attitude appeared later when he led the successful struggles to disestablish the Church of IRELAND (1867) and to remove the religious tests in the universities, thereby opening positions in them to all creeds. His education Act of 1870, however, embittered the Church of England and failed to satisfy Nonconformists. It also antagonized Catholics, who were already suspicious of Gladstone for his early opposition to the Maynooth Grant and to the Irish hierarchy's schemes for university education. Gladstone's friendship with Cardinal MANNING dated from their undergraduate days. They corresponded regularly on Irish affairs, education, and social matters. It was largely Manning's influence that dissuaded Gladstone from attempting to break up VATICAN COUNCIL I by force. Gladstone's polemical pamphlets against the Council elicited written replies from Manning and one from Bishop ULLATHORNE. Relations between Gladstone and Manning became especially strained in 1885 when Cardinal McCabe of Dublin died. Gladstone was anxious to have an amenable prelate appointed. Lord Granville, Gladstone's foreign secretary, employed "Mr. George Errington . . . an active, officious, though not an official agent" to work for the British government at Rome. The matter became notorious. It was Manning, acting on information supplied by Sir Charles Dilke, who prevented the appointment of a government candidate.

Bibliography: J. MORLEY, The Life of William Ewart Gladstone, 3 v. (New York 1903). G. T. GARRATT, The Two Mr. Gladstones (London 1936). J. L. HAMMOND, Gladstone and the Irish Nation (London 1938). C. C. O'BRIEN, Parnell and His Party, 1880-90 (Oxford 1957). V. A. MCCLELLAND, Cardinal Manning: His Public Life and Influence, 1865-1892 (New York 1962). D. MCELRATH, The Syllabus of Pius IX: Some Reactions in England (Louvain 1964).

[V. A. MCCLELLAND]

GLASTONBURY, ABBEY OF

Former BENEDICTINE monastery in Somerset, England. The origins of Glastonbury are remote and obscure. The legendary founder was Joseph of Arimathea. This and other legends, e.g., that St. Patrick the Younger, King Arthur, the HOLY GRAIL, and St. BRIGID OF IRELAND were buried there, made Glastonbury a perennial pilgrimage center. In fact, Celtic monks were at Glastonbury from at least the 5th century; the BENEDICTINE RULE was instituted there probably in the early 8th century. During the Danish invasions, regular life disappeared, but Glastonbury served as the center of the great monastic revival in 10th-century ENGLAND that followed St. DUNSTAN'S installation as abbot there in 940. Glastonbury's reformed abbots and monks served as bishops and missionaries and were instrumental in spreading Benedictine life and the spirit of reform throughout England and Scandinavia.

At the Conquest, Glastonbury was the wealthiest monastery in England. The new Continental customs were resisted there, and as a result, some of the monks were killed by Norman men-at-arms. Not until the rule of HENRY OF BLOIS (1126-71) did Glastonbury obtain an administrator who was able to reorganize its finances, embark on an extensive building program, and introduce reform discipline. But Henry's rule was not entirely beneficent; he was also bishop of Winchester and more a patron than a father to his monks. Misfortune followed; in 1184 the abbey buildings were destroyed by fire, and in 1194 the bishop of Bath began his attempts to make Glastonbury an episcopal monastery. Not until 1234 was the abbey completely independent once again.

William Ewart Gladstone.

The 13th century was a golden age for Glastonbury, which reached a high point under John of Taunton (1274-90). The economic basis for this revival was the abbey's scientific farming. Glastonbury was a proponent of monastic reform in provincial meetings and led the way in eliminating many liturgical accretions and in emphasizing intellectual development. Glastonbury's library had become large and very early included works of modern theology, such as those of Thomas Aquinas. An extensive building program was completed and charitable services were extended during this period.

In the 14th and 15th centuries discipline declined at Glastonbury, though scandals were few. Community life was marred by the increasing separation of abbot and monks, the decentralization of finances, and the presence of a wasteful or superfluous household staff. However, liturgical life remained essentially unaltered.

The last abbot, Richard WHITING (1524-39), kept good order in the monastery, though he was not a disciplinarian. Despite the abbot's acquiescence in the gradual assumption of control of the English Church by HENRY VIII, the great wealth of Glastonbury made it a rich prize, and the King's spoilers were sent in. Whiting was sent to the Tower. He was executed in 1539, the abbey was dissolved, its monks were pensioned, and its treasures were delivered to the King. The abbey buildings became a quarry for the area, so that little survives today. The Church of England has owned the property since 1907 and has sponsored archeological excavations on the site.

Ruins of Glastonbury Abbey, Cornwall, England. (©Tim Hawkins/CORBIS)

Bibliography: Sources. A. WATKIN, ed., The Great Chartulary of Glastonbury, 3 v. (Somerset Record Society 59, 63, 64; London 1947–56). ADAM OF DOMERHAM, Historia de rebus gestis Glastoniensibus, ed. T. HEARNE, 2 v. (London 1727). JOHN OF GLASTONBURY, Chronica: sive historia de rebus Glastoniensibus . . ., ed. T. HEARNE (Oxford 1726). WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY, De antiquitate Glastoniensis ecclesiae (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 179:1681–1734); De gestis regum Anglorum, ed. W. STUBBS, 2 v. (Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores 90; London 1887–89). Literature. W. DUGDALE, Monasticon Anglicanum (London 1655–73); best ed. by J. CALEY et al., 6 v. (1817–30) 1:1–79. F. B. BOND, An Architectural Handbook of Glastonbury Abbey (4th ed. Glastonbury 1925). G. ASHE, King Arthur’s Avalon: The Story of Glastonbury (New York 1958), with good bibliog. A. WATKIN, The Story of Glastonbury (London 1960), short introd. D. KNOWLES and R. N. HADCOCK, Medieval Religious Houses: England and Wales (New York 1953) 66. D. KNOWLES, The Monastic Order in England, 943–1216 (2d ed. Cambridge, Eng. 1962). D. KNOWLES, The Religious Orders in England, 3 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1948–60), scattered, but excellent references.

[J. R. SOMMERFELD]

GLENDALOUGH, MONASTERY OF

Former monastery in the heart of the Wicklow Hills, Ireland, founded by St. KEVIN c. 570. The original buildings were on a level patch of ground between two lakes (glenn-dá-locha, the valley of the two lakes). When the area became too small, the community moved to a wider plain further down the valley, where the round tower and a remarkable group of churches still stand. The community’s long list of abbots stretches from the death of Kevin in 618 to St. LAWRENCE O’TOOLE in the 12th century. Mention of bishops, priests, hermits, professors, and royal burials there shows that the monastery continued to flourish despite two centuries of attacks by the Scandinavian invaders after 835. In 1111 Glendalough became the see of a large diocese, which was in turn united with Dublin (1214). The monastic buildings, which dot the valley here and there for some two miles, remained more or less intact until 1714, when they were razed by the high sheriff, at the head of troops, and by the local Protestant settlers. Glendalough was the center of a famous pilgrimage, culminating on the feast of St. Kevin (June 3), that survived until the middle of the 19th century.

Bibliography: Vita s. Coemgeni (Kevin), in Vitae sanctorum Hiberniae, comp. C. PLUMMER, 2 v. (Oxford 1910) 1:234–257. J. F. KENNEY, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland: v. 1, Ecclesiastical (New York 1929) 403–404. L. PRICE, “Glendalough: St. Kevin’s Road,” Essays and Studies Presented to Professor Eain McNeill, ed. J. RYAN (Dublin 1940) 244–271.

[J. RYAN]

GLENMARY HOME MISSION SISTERS

(G.H.M.S., Official Catholic Directory #2080); a diocesan congregation canonically established in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1952 and devoted exclusively to home mission work in the United States. In 1936 Father William Howard BISHOP, the founder, published a plan for a society of priests, brothers, and sisters to work in the then 1,000 U.S. counties without resident priests. Assigned to areas where there were few or no Catholics, the sisters were to perform social work and home and clinical nursing, and to teach religion. The first two women candidates joined Father Bishop in 1941. Eleven years later the community was officially established by Archbishop Karl J. Alter of Cincinnati. In 1953 Mother Mary Catherine Rumschlag was appointed superior general, and she then received the vows of 14 new members. In 1955 the community of 41 professed sisters elected Mother Catherine at their first general chapter. The congregation follows the Rule of St. Augustine and constitutions adapted from those of the Dominican Sisters of Adrian, Michigan, under whom the first sisters were trained. The motherhouse is in Owensboro, Kentucky.

[J. SCHMID/EDS.]

GLENMARRY HOME MISSIONERS

(Official Catholic Directory #0570) The Home Missioners of America (Societas Missionarium Domesticorum Americas), popularly known as the Glenmary Home Missioners, was established by Father William Howard BISHOP to work in United States areas without resident priests. The society is composed of secular priests, living in community under oath to their superior general, and brothers, who assist as catechists, parish administrators, counselors, pastoral associates, and youth directors.

In 1937 there were more than 1,000 counties in the United States without resident priests, located largely in the southeastern states where the birth rate is proportionately higher than the national average. That year, under the patronage of Archbishop John T. MCNICHOLAS of Cincinnati, Ohio, Bishop began publishing Glenmary's Challenge to mobilize forces to meet the urgent need of providing a Catholic priest for every U.S. community. His movement became a society when he was joined by five seminarians and Reverend Raphael Sourd in 1939.

In their evangelical outreach, the Glenmary missioners care for both the spiritual and daily needs of the people under their care. When the congregation is adequate to support a resident priest, the parish is returned to the diocese and the missioners are released for intensive activity elsewhere. Glenmary Missioners have worked in Ohio, Kentucky, Virginia, West Virginia, Oklahoma, Georgia, and North Carolina. The national Glenmary's headquarters is Cincinnati, Ohio.

Bibliography: W. H. BISHOP, "A Plan for an American Society of Catholic Home Missions to Operate in Rural Sections of the United States," Ecclesiastical Review 94 (1936) 337-47. H. W. SANTEN, Father Bishop, Founder of the Glenmary Home Missioners (Milwaukee 1961). C.J. KAUFFMAN, Mission to Rural America: The Story of W. Howard Bishop, Founder of Glenmary (New York 1991).

[R. P. O'DONNELL/EDS.]

GLENNON, JOHN JOSEPH

Cardinal; b. County Meath, Ireland, June 14, 1862; d. Dublin, Ireland, March 9, 1946. Although he was born in Ireland, the previous residence of his father in New Jersey brought him U.S. citizenship at birth. He completed his courses at All Hallows College, Dublin, at the age of 21, and went to Kansas City, Mo., to work under Bp. John J. Hogan until he had attained the canonical age for ordination. Glennon was ordained in Kansas City's cathedral on Dec. 20, 1884. A year at the University of Bonn gave him knowledge, valuable later, of the German language and people. After returning to Kansas City, he became successively vicar-general, administrator, and finally coadjutor bishop of the diocese.

The Round Tower, St. Kevin Monastery, Glendalough, Ireland.
(©Michael St. Maur Shell/CORBIS)

Less than seven years after his consecration on June 29, 1896, he was transferred to the coadjutorship of St. Louis, Mo. When Abp. John J. Kain died on Oct. 13, 1903, Glennon succeeded as the youngest resident archbishop in the U.S. The need for a new cathedral had been recognized by his two predecessors. Abp. John Ireland has been credited with suggesting its construction at the conferring of Glennon's pallium, the insignia of office, in 1905. However, Glennon himself had already called on his clergy for contributions. A St. Louis architect, George D. Barnett, was chosen; Glennon turned the first spadeful of earth in 1907; and the first Mass was offered in the uncompleted structure seven years later. Although the building was finished in his lifetime, the adornment of the massive cathedral continued after his death.

The new Kenrick Seminary was opened in 1915 and at the same time Glennon purchased a home in St. Louis for use as a preparatory seminary. In 1918, the centenary of the advent of Bp. Louis W. Dubourg, the 100th parish was established within the city of St. Louis. The system of diocesan high schools that Glennon began prior to World War I contributed much to Catholic education. He used his episcopal jubilee gifts in 1921 to erect Rosati-Kain High School for girls. Shortly thereafter a new boys' school, McBride Memorial, was built with a large benefaction connected with his jubilee. Through all these projects the archdiocese remained free of debt and Glennon's economic acumen caused his advice to be sought extensively.

Second only to Glennon's reputation as a builder was his nationwide fame as an orator. Best remembered is his address at the Eucharistic Congress in his native Ireland in 1932, although he preached also at congresses in Chicago, Montreal, Buenos Aires, and Budapest. Less well known were his significant activities in the field of immigration and colonization. He organized the Colonization Realty Company in 1905 to attract Catholic colonists from overcrowded cities of the U.S. East Coast and from Europe to the farmlands of Missouri. He also encouraged the National Catholic Rural Life Movement. In 1911 he began the organization of charity in his archdiocese through the Catholic Charities and Kindred Activities of St. Louis. He sponsored also such institutions as Father Dempsey's Hotel for the homeless and Father Dunne's Newsboys' Home and Protectorate, and he was one of the founders of the National Catholic War Council, which was later transformed into the National Catholic Welfare Conference. He was still active in his eighth decade, when he was elevated to the College of Cardinals at the age of 83. During the trip to Rome he was afflicted by bronchitis, and he died while stopping at the home of President Sean O'Kelly of Eire on his way back to the U.S. His body was buried in the crypt of the Cathedral of St. Louis.

Bibliography: Archives, Archdiocese of St. Louis. J. E. ROTHENSTEINER, History of the Archdiocese of St. Louis, 2 v. (St. Louis 1928). T. B. MORGAN, Speaking of Cardinals (New York 1946).

[P. J. RAHILL]

GLODESINDIS, ST.

Benedictine abbess; b. Metz, France, c. 570; d. c. 600. Her father, Duke Wintron of Champagne, tried to give her in marriage against her wishes; she fled and sought refuge in the cathedral of Metz. Her abbess aunt, Rotlinda, succeeded in calming the father's wrath and brought the young girl to Trier. There she was so well instructed in the rule and customs of monastic life that, returning to Metz, she founded a monastery that became known as Subterius (lower monastery) in contrast to the monastery above, Saint-Pierre de la Citadelle. Glodesindis united under her rule about 100 nuns. Her life was written at the end of the ninth century. In 840 Bp. DROGO OF METZ had her relics placed in the church in Metz that now bears her name; SS. Peter and Sulpicius had formerly been the patrons of the church.

Feast: July 25 and 27.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum July 6:198–225. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 2:496. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 7:609–610. W. GRUNDHÖFER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:966–967.

[É. BROUETTE]

GLORIA

One of the most ancient examples of hymnody in the early Church. Like its biblical counterparts, the Psalms and Canticles, it was not written on rhythmic and metrical principles. It was so highly esteemed in the early Church that it was able to withstand the later reaction against church hymns created "by merely human endeavor" [cf. Fourth Council of Toledo (633), c.13; J. D. Mansi, saeculorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio (Florence-Venice 1757–98) 10.622].

The textual origin can be traced to three principal sources: (1) the Syrian version from the East Syrian (Chaldean) liturgy; (2) the Greek version from the Apostolic Constitutions 7.47 (c. 380); and (3) the Greek version found in the Codex Alexandrinus (Fifth century) among the Septuagint Odes of Solomon.

The oldest witness for the Latin text, the Antiphonary of Bangor [c. 690; ed. Warren, HGS 4; HBS 10 (London 1892–95)], presents an almost literal translation of the Greek version of the Codex Alexandrinus. The first complete version of the present-day text, however, is found in the ninth-century Psalter of Abbot Wolfcoz of St. Gall (St. Gall MS 20).

The earliest names for the Gloria were numerous and varied. The title "Greater Doxology" (see DOXOLOGY, LITURGICAL) was used to distinguish it from the Gloria Patri or "lesser doxology." The titles Hymnus angelicus, Laus angelorum, and Laus (or Hymnus) angeli cum carmine refer to the song of the angels heard by the shepherds at the birth of Christ (Lk 2.13–14), used as the opening phrases of this hymn. The title "morning hymn" was used in the Codex Alexandrinus and by St. Athanasus (controverted) in De virginitate 20 (Patrologia Graeca ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1857–66] 28:276). The Gloria was used also as a festive hymn of thanksgiving (see GREGORY OF TOURS, De gloria martyrum 1.63; Patrologia Latina ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1878–90] 71:762) comparable to present-day usage of the Te Deum (ibid. 78:570). The Antiphony of Bangor lists the Gloria as a hymn for Vespers and Matins.

From its usage in the Office and on festivals, the Gloria passed into the Roman rite Mass. An ancient tradition has it first inserted as the angelic announcement of the birth of Christ into the Christmas Mass at Rome (see Liber pontificalis, ed. L. Duchesne [Paris 1886–92] 1:56–57, 129–130, n.5). The usage itself is highly probable, though its origin with Telesphorus (d. early second century; ibid. 1:56–57) is unlikely. A more trustworthy account of the dispositions concerning the Gloria is the notice in the Liber pontificalis (1:263) about Symmachus I (d. 514). Symmachus is said to have permitted the Gloria to be used (outside of Christmas) on Sundays and martyrs' festivals but only at the bishop's Mass [bishop = shepherd (pastor of the Church) or angel (messenger to the Church)]. The Ordo of St. Amand in the ninth century allowed a priest to intone the Gloria but only at the Mass of the Easter Vigil and on the day of his ordination [see L. Duchesne, Christian Worship, Its Origin and Evolution, tr. M. L. McClure (5th ed. New York 1903) 471, 477]. When the Gloria was no longer considered proper only to the bishop's role, its insertion into all festive Masses was demanded (see BERNOLD OF CONSTANCE, Micrologus 2; Patrologia Latina 151:976). By the end of the 11th century the present usage was established (Const. Cluniac 1.8; Patrologia Latina 149:653).

During the Middle Ages, many churches in the West were accustomed to sing the Gloria in Greek as well as in Latin. The Anonymous Turonensis [ed. E. Martène, De antiquis ecclesiae ritibus, v. 1 (Rouen 1700) 102] ascribes this practice to the influence of the large number of Greek clerics in Rome during the seventh and eighth centuries. The usage is verified by the existence of some 16 medieval MSS containing both the Greek and Latin texts. Notable instances are two MSS of the Winchester Troper (Corpus Christi College MS 473; Bodley MS 775), and a Troparium, Prosarium, etc., of St. Martial in Limoges (Paris B.N. lat. 1120). Three MSS contain not only the Greek text with a Latin interlinear translation but also the Greek melody that served as the model for Gloria 14 in the Graduale Romanum (Paris B.N. lat. 2291, ninth century; lat. 1118, tenth century, lat. 9436, 11th century).

Out of some 341 medieval MSS, a total of 56 different melodies for the Gloria have been found (cf. Bosse, 73–82). The most ancient known melodies with a reciting tone are the simple and the elaborate settings of the Milanese (Ambrosian) Gloria (Graduale Romanum 89*). The melody listed as Gloria 15 in the Graduale Romanum is an example of psalmodic recitation, parallel to the Mozarabic setting of the Pater Noster. It is generally thought to be the oldest extant Roman Gloria. Nonetheless, the richly ornamented melodies, whether using melodic motifs or completely freely composed, were already very widespread at the time of the earliest melodic notation (11th–12th century; Bosse 45–56). On the other hand, there are simple Gloria melodies extant in later MSS that are strictly syllabic but not psalmodic in form in their treatment of the text (D. Bosse, Untersuchung einstimmiger mittelalterlicher Melodien zum "Gloria in excelsis," melodies 16, 50, and 54 of the 15th century; 35 of the 16th century; 4 and 8 of the 17th century). Simplicity and syllabic melodies, therefore, are not the ultimate criteria of the antiquity of the melodies.

Bibliography: C. BLUME, "Der Engelhymnus Gloria in excelsis Deo: Sein Ursprung und seine Entwicklung," Stimmen aus Maria-Laach 73 (1907) 43–62. D. BOSSE, Untersuchung einstimmiger mittelalterlicher Melodien zum "Gloria in excelsis" (Regensburg 1954). J. FROGER, Les Chants de la Messe aux VIII^e–IX^e siècles (Tournai 1950). A. GASTOUÉ, "Le Chant du Gloria in excelsis," La Tribune de St. Gervais 3 (1897) 6–10, 41–44. M. HUGLO, "La Mélodie grecque du Gloria in excelsis . . .," Revue Grégorienne 29 (1950) 30–40. J. A. JUNGSMANN, The Mass of the Roman Rite, tr. F. A. BRUNNER, 2 v. (New York 1951–55). J. BOE, "Gloria A and the Roman Easter Vigil," Musica Disciplina 36 (1982) 5–37.

[C. KELLY/EDS.]

GLORIA, LAUS ET HONOR

A processional hymn for PALM SUNDAY, written in the early ninth century, probably by THEODULF OF ORLÉANS, a native of Spain. The original text has 39 distichs, of which the first six are now sung at the procession. The first distich serves as a refrain after each verse. According to legend (recorded by Hugh of Fleury; Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 9:363–64), Theodulf wrote this hymn while a prisoner at Angers. When the Palm Sunday procession, in which Emperor Louis the Pious took part, halted beneath the tower where Theodulf was kept, Louis heard Theodulf singing his hymn. The Emperor was moved and pardoned him. Raby regards the story as a "testimony to the popularity of this magnificent hymn, the crown of Theodulf's poetry." The text has Biblical background (Mt 21.1–3, 8–11) and Christ's reception into Jerusalem is interpreted in a mystical-allegorical sense (see the last distich of the original poem). The quantitative distichs display the influence not only of the classical tradition on Carolingian poetry, but also of the Resurrection poem Tempore florifero (Salve festas dies) of Venantius FORTUNATUS, the chief model for later processional hymns down to the close of the Middle Ages.

Bibliography: Analecta hymnica 50:160–163. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Poetae 1:558–559. J. CONNELLY, Hymns of the Roman Liturgy (Westminster MD 1957) 84–86. F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (Oxford 1953) 174–176. J. GAILLARD, Catholicisme 5:58–59. F. BRUNHÖLZL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:967. J. SZÖVÉRFY, Die Annalen der lateinischen Hymnendichtung (Berlin 1964–65) 1:202–204.

[J. SZÖVÉRFY]

GLORIFIED BODY

Here understood as the physical body of the just reunited at the RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD with the soul that formerly animated it and that at the moment of reunion is already enjoying the BEATIFIC VISION.

Fact. That at the end of time there is to be a universal resurrection of both the good and the evil is a dogma of the Church. This truth is explicitly set forth in all the major creeds and symbols, and formally defined in the BENEDICTUS DEUS of BENEDICT XII (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [32d ed. Freiburg 1963] 1000–02). It is found in the formal teaching of Christ: “. . . the hour is coming . . . when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God. . . . And they who have done good shall come forth unto resurrection of life; but they who have done evil unto resurrection of judgment” (Jn 5.25–30). St. Paul’s teaching is replete with references to the resurrection; for instance, he witnesses to the common faith: “. . . I serve the God of my fathers; believing all things that are written in the Law and the Prophets, having a hope in God which these men themselves also look for, that there is to be a resurrection of the just and the unjust” (Acts 24.14–16). The classic text for the resurrection of the just is, of course, 1 Cor 15 (see below).

Besides the two dogmas mentioned above, namely, the fact of the resurrection, and its universality, there is a third truth, also dogmatic, the identity of the risen body with that which each individual now has as his own. Thus Lateran Council IV defined that Christ “will come at the end of the world . . . and all will rise with their own bodies which they now have so that they may receive according to their works, whether good or bad” (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 801). How this identity is to be explained has exercised theologians over the centuries. It is clear from St. Paul that Christ’s own Resurrection is not only the cause but also the model of the Christian’s (1 Cor 15). Finally, the body of the just man, while remaining in some mysterious way materially identical with his body of the present life, will, nevertheless, be transformed and made immeasurably superior to its present condition; the fact of this at least is the unambiguous teaching of St. Paul (ibid.). What can be said about the nature of this transformation can now be set forth; here theologians are sometimes in the realm of speculation and conclusions that carry no more doctrinal weight than is warranted by the intrinsic validity of the argumentation itself.

Nature of the Glorification. In light of 1 Cor 15 theologians traditionally teach that the characteristic qualities of the glorified body are four: impassibility—“What is sown in corruption rises in incorruption”; clarity—“what is sown in dishonor rises in glory”; agility—“what is sown in weakness rises in power”; and subtilty—“what is sown a natural body rises a spiritual body.” These qualities follow from the body’s repossession and complete dominance by the soul already in full blessedness.

It is against the nature of the soul, the form of the body, to exist without its body (C. gent. 2.68, 83; 4.79); indeed the soul separated from the body is in one way imperfect, as is every part existing outside its whole, for the soul is naturally a part of the human composite. The scholastics accordingly speak of the separated soul as in statu violento. For this reason Aquinas says the resurrection is natural in that its purpose is to reunite soul and body, though of course the cause of the reunion is supernatural (C. gent. 4.81). Since, however, the soul of the just person, once completely free from all stain of sin, is from that moment in the state of perfect beatitude (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1000), it follows that, reunited with the body, it shares with it its glory. St. Thomas says repeatedly that the glory of the body derives from that of the soul. He lays down the principle “In perfect happiness the entire man is perfected, but in the lower part of his nature by an overflow from the higher” (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 3.3 ad 3). Concretely, “it is by divine appointment that there is an overflow of glory from the soul to the body, in keeping with human merit; so that as man merits by the act of the soul which he performs in the body, so he may be rewarded by the glory of the soul overflowing to the body. Hence not only the glory of the soul but also the glory of the body is merited” (Summa theologiae 3a, 19.3 ad 3; cf. 3a, 7.4 ad 2). On the other hand, the body now perfectly vivified will also be most fully responsive to the soul. No longer impeded by the imperfections and limitations of matter still in captivity to sin (cf. Rom 8.23), it will be not only the soul’s docile instrument but also most completely itself. St. Thomas addresses himself to this point:

The soul which is enjoying God will cleave to Him most perfectly, and will in its own fashion share in His goodness to the highest degree; and thus will the body be perfectly within the soul's dominion and will share in what is the soul's very own characteristics so far as possible—in the perspicuity of sense knowledge, in the ordering of bodily appetite, and in the all-round perfection of nature; for a thing is the more perfect in nature the more its matter is dominated by its form . . . just as the soul of man will be elevated to the glory of heavenly spirits to see God in His essence . . . so also will his body be raised to the characteristics of heavenly bodies—it will be lightsome, incapable of suffering, without difficulty and labor in movement, and most perfectly perfected by its form. For this reason the Apostle speaks of the bodies of the risen as heavenly, referring not to their nature, but to their glory [C. gent. 4.86].

Since the RESURRECTION OF CHRIST is not only the cause of the Christian's but also its model, what the Scriptures relate concerning the perfections of His body are also to be predicated, with due proportion, of the body of everyone who shares in His victory and with Him rises to glory: "For as in Adam all die, so in Christ all will be made to live. But each in his own turn, Christ as first-fruits, then they who are Christ's" (1 Cor 15.22–23). St. John perhaps has given the best epitome of the whole man's future glory: "We know that, when he [Christ] appears, we shall be like him for we shall see him just as he is" (1 Jn 3.2–3).

See Also: HEAVEN; SOUL, HUMAN; IMMORTALITY; SOUL-BODY RELATIONSHIP; TRANSFIGURATION.

Bibliography: J. RATZINGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:1052–53. A. CHOLLET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 3.2:1879–1906. A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 13.2:2501–71. A. WINKLHOFER, "Eschatologie," H. FRIES, ed., Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe, 2 v. (Munich 1962–63) 1:327–336; The Coming of His Kingdom (New York 1963). F. X. DURRWELL, The Resurrection: A Biblical Study, tr. R. SHEED (New York 1960). M. A. GENEVOIS, Entre dans la joie (Paris 1960). R. GUARDINI, The Last Things, tr. C. E. FORSYTH and G. B. BRANHAM (New York 1954).

[C. J. CORCORAN]

GLORY (IN THE BIBLE)

In English versions of the Bible, glory stands for various words in the original languages, but basically it construes the word kābôd in Hebrew and δόξα in Greek. This article traces the use of these words through the OT and NT.

In the Old Testament. Every OT writer knew that to see God was beyond man's capacity; as Moses had been told, "But my face you cannot see, for no man sees me and still lives" (Ex 33.20). Yet in very primitive times God was thought by the Hebrews to manifest Himself somehow in spectacular thunderstorms.

"Eternal Father," by Pordenone. (©Elio Ciol/CORBIS)

The earth swayed and quaked; the foundations of the mountains trembled and shook when his wrath flared up. Smoke rose from his nostrils, and a devouring fire from his mouth that kindled coals into flame. And he inclined the heavens and came down, with dark clouds under his feet. He mounted a cherub and flew, borne on the wings of the wind. And he made darkness the cloak about him; dark, misty rain-clouds his wrap. From the brightness of his presence coals were kindled to flame. And the Lord thundered from heaven, the Most High gave forth his voice; He sent forth His arrows to put them to flight, with frequent lightnings he routed them (Ps 17 [18].8–15). Fire goes before him and consumes his foes round about. His lightnings illumine the world; the earth sees and trembles. The mountains melt like wax before the Lord, before the Lord of all the earth. The heavens proclaim his justice, and all peoples see his glory (Ps 96 [97].3–61).

To express this awesomeness of YAHWEH's self-disclosure, the Hebrews favored the word kābôd in this special sense, although it originally meant weightiness or impressiveness. Some of the same lightning-storm imagery is used to describe the Lord's presence on Mt. Sinai: "On the morning of the third day there were peals of thunder and lightning, and a heavy cloud over the mountain, . . . Mount Sinai was all wrapped in smoke, for the Lord came down upon it in fire. The smoke rose from it as though from a furnace, and the whole mountain trembled violently” (Ex 19.16, 18). “After Moses had gone up, a cloud covered the mountain. The glory of the Lord settled upon Mount Sinai. The cloud covered it for six days, and on the seventh day he called to Moses from the midst of the cloud. To the Israelites the glory of the Lord was seen as a consuming fire on the mountaintop” (Ex 24.15–17).

God’s glory—a formless, flashing fire—is always cloaked in cloud to protect man from gazing directly upon it, lest it overwhelm him. Another site of divine encounter was the TENT OF MEETING, where God would descend to render judgment, deliver an oracle, or entertain some request: “As Moses entered the Tent, the column of cloud would come down and stand at its entrance while the Lord spoke with Moses” (Ex 33.9). “When he came down from offering the sin offering and holocaust and peace offering, Moses and Aaron went into the Meeting Tent. . . . Then the glory of the Lord was revealed to all the people. Fire came forth from the Lord’s presence and consumed the holocaust” (Lv 9.22–24).

Another ancient tradition pictured the kābôd as abiding permanently in the cloud-enveloped fire upon the ARK OF THE COVENANT. The top of this wooden chest was a plate of gold surmounted by two golden cherubim, whose outstretched wings formed a throne for God’s glory. The Lord came to be called “He who sits upon the Cherubim” (2 Kgs 19.15). Later when the Ark was brought to grace the sanctuary of Solomon’s new Temple (see TEMPLES [IN THE BIBLE]), the glory took up residence there: “And it came to pass, when the priests were come out of the sanctuary, that a cloud filled the house of the Lord. And the Priests could not stand to minister because of the cloud: for the glory of the Lord had filled the house of the Lord” (1 Kgs 8.10–11).

As time went on the idea of the glory was developing. I. Abrahams observes: “The clouds have gone, the earthquake, the wind. Out of the primitive storm associations the only physical feature that endured was the illumination” (56). Ezekiel adds a further insight; in his inaugural vision he sees the glory riding a heavenly chariot in fiery tumult, drawn by four chimeric creatures: “Upon it was seated, up above, one who had the appearance of a man. Upward from what resembled his waist I saw what gleamed like electrum; downward from what resembled his waist I saw what looked like fire; he was surrounded with splendor. Like the bow which appears in the clouds on a rainy day was the splendor that surrounded him. Such was the vision of the likeness of the glory of the Lord” (Ez 1.26–28). Thus a further step has been taken toward personalizing the glory. Some years later the author of Isaiah ch. 56 to 66, while not abandoning the ancient fire symbol for a simply spiritual kābôd, does begin to blend into it the ideas of God’s power and lordly majesty:

Rise up in splendor! Your light has come, the glory of the Lord shines upon you. See, darkness covers the earth, and thick clouds cover the peoples; But upon you the Lord shines, and over you appears his glory. Nations shall walk by your light, and kings by your shining radiance (Is 60.1–3).

After returning from Exile the Jews grew to realize that Yahweh’s rule must somehow extend over all the earth, and the sense of “glory” overflowed more and more the bounds of the old fire-and-cloud imagery, to become a symbol for His universal triumph: “Be exalted above the heavens, O God; above all the earth be your glory!” (Ps 56 [57].12). “Tell his glory among the nations; among all peoples, his wondrous deeds” (Ps 95[96].3). Very late in the OT period the author of Daniel foresees that the oppressed Jewish people (portrayed as “One like a SON OF MAN”) would one day be invited to share in the Lord’s glory:

I saw One like a son of man coming, on the clouds of heaven; When he reached the Ancient One and was presented before him, He received dominion, glory, and kingship; nations and peoples of every language serve him. His dominion is an everlasting dominion that shall not be taken away, his kingship shall not be destroyed. (Dn 7.13–14)

Already in the 3d century B.C., the existing books of the OT were being translated into Greek for the numerous Jews living abroad in Greek-speaking areas. This version, called the Septuagint (LXX), proved more than a simple translation; the added resources of Greek language and thought permitted even further continuance of the theological development begun in Hebrew. The word kābôd had become a highly technical term; its Greek equivalent, δόξα, became even more specialized. Δόξα, stripped of its original meaning of “opinion,” served in the LXX to signify only such meanings as might be included within the span of kābôd. More and more emphasis was laid on God’s power to work wonders and to save, and on His majesty as King.

In the New Testament. The term in the NT is still found in its classic sense of the radiant fire of Yahweh’s presence, e.g., “my brethren, who are my kinsmen according to the flesh; who are Israelites, who have the adoption of sons, and the glory and the covenants and the legislation and the worship and the promises” (Rom 9.3, 4). Yet the remarkable development in the NT is that the traditional glory of Yahweh becomes the glory of Christ; indeed, the application of δόξα to Jesus is one of the chief literary techniques used to suggest His Divinity. The SYN-OPTIC GOSPELS, recognizing that Jesus' divine radiance was concealed during His earthly ministry, observe its outburst only after the Resurrection: "His countenance was like lightning, and his raiment like snow" (Mt 28.3). See also Mk 14.61–62. Yet on certain occasions the presence of the divine δόξα is suggested in a cloud or radiance: at His baptism, when Jesus was commissioned as Savior, and at the Transfiguration, when His disciples were shown the significance of His coming death. Also, Luke in his infancy narratives inserts several allusions to the δόξα designed to hint at Jesus' divine origins: "the power of the Most High shall overshadow thee" (Lk 1.35); "an angel of the Lord stood by them and the glory of the Lord shone round about them, and they feared exceedingly" (Lk 2.9; the presence of angels, perhaps reminiscent of the Ark's cherubim, and the fearful reaction are standard biblical accompaniments to the δόξα). John, on the other hand, considers that Jesus' glory is always there to be perceived, but only by those who believe. His works are not presented so much as miracles, as in the Synoptics, but as "signs," which mysteriously show forth His glory to the eyes of faith: "He manifested his glory and his disciples believed in him" (Jn 2.11). "'Have I not told thee that if thou believe thou shalt behold the glory of God?'" (Jn 11.40). Yet John also realizes that only after the Resurrection will Jesus be glorified with the glory he had with the Father before the world existed (Jn 17.5). Paul, who had been called to apostleship by a vision of Jesus surrounded with glory, makes frequent references to Ex 34.27–35, where Moses has to veil his face, so dazzling is the radiance beaming from it after he has spoken with the Lord. So, too, the Apostolic life is a reception of light in order to reflect the "glory of God, shining on the face of Christ Jesus" (2 Cor 4.6). "But we all, with faces unveiled, reflecting as in a mirror the glory of the Lord, are being transformed into his very image from glory to glory, as through the Spirit of the Lord" (2 Cor 3.18).

See Also: SHEKINAH; THEOPHANY.

Bibliography: G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 2:236–256. G. VON RAD, Old Testament Theology, tr. D. M. G. STALKER (New York 1962–) v. 1. L. H. BROCKINGTON, "The Septuagintal Background to the New Testament Use of 'Doxa,'" Studies in the Gospels, ed. D. E. NINEHAM (Oxford 1955). C. MOHRMANN, "Note sur 'doxa,'" Sprachgeschichte und Wortbedeutung: Festschrift Albert Debrunner (Bern 1954). I. ABRAHAMS, The Glory of God (London 1925).

[J. T. BURTCHAELL]

GLORY OF GOD (END OF CREATION)

The glory of God is a favorite theme of the Old and New Testaments. Its roots lie in the presence of the kebôd Yahweh, the δόξα τοῦ θεοῦ. The theological interpretation of the glory of GOD as the purpose of CREATION must reflect the scriptural data, which basically reveals two mutually related and complementary themes: the glory of God as the divine perfection and as the divine praise.

Divine Perfection. Scripture identifies the glory of God with God Himself, with His power whereby He tramples His enemies underfoot and terrifies men, with His beauty, with the image of light and splendor that includes a sweetness and attraction, so that whoever beholds the glory of God is filled with joy and lightness. This sweetness and attraction is especially perceived in God's generous benevolence, in the pouring out of His divine goodness, in His mercy and fidelity toward all His creatures. It takes shape in the production of a likeness or an image of the divine goodness in creatures. The Old Testament expresses this in describing the wisdom of God as the pure emanation of the glory of the Most High (Wis 7.25–26). Isaiah says that "all the earth is filled with his glory!" (Is 6.3). Creatures, therefore, are the image and glory of God. All created things, especially men, are filled from the expansive fullness of the glory of God (cf. Eph 3.16). By their very existence they announce this glory [Ps 18(19).2].

The glory of God is poured forth in Jesus Christ in a very special way. He is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of every creature (Col 1.15). He is the effulgence of His splendor and the stamp of God's very being (Heb 1.3). In Him and through Him all things are (Col 1.16–17), and are redeemed (Eph 1.3–14). Through the knowledge of Christ the Savior, the glory of God is diffused to all Christians. The gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the very image of God, dawns upon us and brings us to the revelation of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ (2 Cor 4.4, 6). The result of this influence of the Lord who is spirit (2 Cor 3.17) is that we all reflect "as in a mirror the glory of the Lord" (2 Cor 3.18). Christ Himself tells us that He shares with us, His friends, the glory He has received from the Father (Jn 17.22). Our life in Christ is not merely a new birth—it is a new way of life. The glory of God in the just is not only the divine INDWELLING (1 Cor 6.19) but likewise all the good actions of the just (1 Cor 10.31).

Divine Praise. The most frequent meaning of the word glory is the fame, praise, and good reputation that comes with the recognition of one's excellence. Frequently Scripture exhorts man "to give glory to the Lord.” Revelations tells us that the Lord is worthy of receiving glory (4.9–11). The glory of God is contrasted with and opposed to the glory of men (Is 42.8; Jn 7.18; Rom 1.23). Here the glory of God is the admiration of the grandeur of God, an admiration that is expressed in praise, not only by the words of men, but much more by the Christian way of life. For our lights are to shine before men, so that they may see our good works and give praise to the Father (Mt 5.16). Indeed, all creatures “declare the glory of God” [Ps 18(19).2]; and in this sense all the works of the Lord ought to bless Him, to praise and exalt Him (Dn 3.52–88). It is because of this dumb, yet eloquent, praise that the greatness of God is so visible in creation that for man not to recognize it and to join in it is inexcusable (Rom 1.21–23).

Glory of God and the Purpose of Creation. Confronted with this double facet of the glory of God as identified both with the divine perfection and the divine praise, the theologian must beware lest he give undue importance to one over the other.

The supreme purpose of God in creating is the divine intrinsic goodness and glory. God’s purpose in creating cannot be any created good because God cannot be moved by anything outside Himself. Rather, God’s purpose or intended end in creating is Himself, His divine intrinsic goodness and glory. For the divine goodness is the sole adequate object of the divine volition, and love and is the sole adequate reason for which God freely willed to produce creatures. Creatures exist because of the divine goodness, because God wishes in His superabundance of love freely to communicate this same divine goodness to them and to manifest it externally through them. The finite communication and manifestation of the divine intrinsic goodness and glory in creation are but conditions for the production of creatures and are not to be identified with the purpose or object of the creative will as such. Hence, God does not create because He desires some gain for Himself from creation. His extrinsic glory is in no wise the good on account of which He produced creatures.

The supreme purpose of creation is God Himself. The divine intrinsic goodness and glory is also the ultimate good toward which all creatures are ordered as their supreme purpose. For God’s own supreme purpose in creating and the ultimate purpose of creation must be one and the same. In fact, all creatures by their innate sensitive or rational appetites tend toward God as the supreme GOOD, as that which ultimately perfects them. Thus, all creatures have the very same ultimate objective end, God Himself. They do, however, have specifically different ultimate intrinsic ends, for each attains God in its own way. Only man, because of his spiritual faculties, is capable of attaining God directly as He is in Himself. All other creatures attain God in their service of man.

The extrinsic glory of God is a true end of creation (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [Freiburg 1963] 3025). God’s extrinsic glory is a reflection and manifestation through creatures of the intrinsic and substantial glory that is God Himself. As such, God could not create without ordering all things to His extrinsic glory. He is free, nonetheless, to choose any universe with any extrinsic glory, because extrinsic glory is something on which He in no way depends. Extrinsic glory, however, is a consequence of creation and at the same time is the last created end of creatures. For in attaining its ultimate intrinsic perfection, a creature attains that participation in and manifestation of God’s goodness to which it is ordered by God as a part of the total universe. In this way the creature’s own intrinsic perfection is really the same as the extrinsic glory of God.

See Also: GLORY (IN THE BIBLE).

Bibliography: Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) Tables générales 1:1817. E. PAX, ed. H. FRIES, Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe (Munich 1962–63) 1:680–685. M. FLICK and Z. ALSZEGHY, Il creatore: L’inizio della salvezza (2d ed. Florence 1961); “Gloria Dei,” Gregorianum, 36 (1955) 361–390. P. J. DONNELLY, “St. Thomas and the Ultimate Purpose of Creation,” Theological Studies, 2 (1941) 53–83; “The Vatican Council and the End of Creation,” ibid. 4 (1943) 3–33. D.-J. EHR, The Purpose of the Creator and of Creatures according to John of St. Thomas (Techny, Ill. 1961). G. PADOIN, Il fine della creazione nel pensiero di S. Tommaso (Rome 1959).

[D. J. EHR]

GLOSSA ORDINARIA

A designation given during the Middle Ages to certain compilations of “glosses” on the text of a given manuscript. The earliest glossa ordinaria is that made on the Bible, probably in the 12th century (see GLOSSES, BIBLICAL). However, the term glossa ordinaria was most commonly used in the field of law, particularly Canon Law.

Several glossa ordinaria (also referred to by medieval canonists as the glossa) were produced in the field of law during the 13th and 14th centuries. These works were generally held by the schools and courts as containing the best selection of commentaries and explanations on the legal texts contained in various collections. These glosses were endowed with a certain authority, though not of an official nature. Presumed to be the most correct, they were the ones most likely to be adopted by the Roman Curia and the ones every student had to know and of which every author had to take cognizance. These legalistic glossa ordinaria had their immediate origins in the works of the glossators from the middle of the 12th century, and particularly in their apparatus glossarum (systematic compilations of glosses: see GLOSSES, CANON LAW).

The glossa ordinaria of this period are among the most important and influential treatises of the classical period of Canon Law. They are based upon those collections of law that formed the principal legal texts of the period. The first canonical glossa to become known as a glossa ordinaria is that of JOANNES TEUTONICUS. It was completed shortly after Lateran Council IV (1215–16) and is a commentary written in the form of a marginal gloss on the text of GRATIAN'S Decretum. It is not printed as Joannes made it. Another Bolognese master, BARTHOLOMEW OF BRESCIA, c. 1245 adapted it to the later decretals. It was later included in the printed text of Gratian's Decretum.

The work that came to be considered as the glossa ordinaria on the QUINQUE COMPILATIONES ANTIQUAE was that of TANCRED OF BOLOGNA. This commentary covered only the first three compilationes; its final edition came out c. 1220. Joannes Teutonicus also produced the glossa ordinaria for the Compilatio quarta, c. 1217; JAMES OF ALBENGA produced the one for the Compilatio quinta. This latter is probably the least important of all, since the Compilatio quinta was in force only a short time.

The glossa ordinaria on the Decretals of GREGORY IX was produced by BERNARD OF PARMA. It underwent at least four recensions (1234–63) during Bernard's lifetime, and it later received several additions, especially from Joannes Andreae. The glossa on the LIBER SEXTUS was produced by JOANNES ANDREAЕ c. 1301. He produced also the glossa ordinaria on the Constitutions of Clement V shortly after they appeared (1322). The remaining part of the CORPUS IURIS CANONICI, i.e., the Extravagantes, had glosses on individual sections, but none became known as the glossa ordinaria (see CANON LAW, HISTORY OF, 4).

The practice of glossating texts was popular also in the schools of Roman law. The glossa ordinaria on the basic text of Roman law, the Corpus Iuris Civilis, was produced by Accursius (d. c. 1260), a professor of the Roman law school of Bologna. It was produced at the same time as the first glossa ordinaria of Canon Law.

Bibliography: J. SCHMID and A. M. STICKLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:968–971. G. MOLLAT, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ (Paris 1935–65) 5:972–974. A. VAN HOVE, Commentarium Lovaniense in Codicem iuris canonici I, v.1–5 (Mechlin 1928—); v.1, Prolegomena (1945) 1:412 and passim. J. F. VON SCHULTE, Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des kanonischen Rechts (Graz 1956) 2:86–88. W. M. PLÖCHL, Geschichte des Kirchenrechts, v.2 (Vienna 1962) 504 and passim.

[J. M. BUCKLEY]

GLOSSES, BIBLICAL

The term “gloss,” it has been said, may be applied to almost every form of biblical exposition. This article points out the several ways in which it has been used.

A biblical gloss may be defined as one or more words, usually only a few, added in the margin or between the lines of a text, in explanation of an obscure word. Although generally helpful to the exegete, it cannot always be relied on as a correct clarification. The glossator, or author, of the gloss may be well intentioned but in error or purposely tendentious.

As glosses multiplied it was found convenient to gather them into separate books, either in the order of their occurrences or alphabetically. A collection of this sort forms a glossary, also at times called a gloss. Among the principal glossaries containing biblical terms are the lexicon (preserved in a much interpolated MS of the 15th century) of the fourth-century Alexandrian lexicographer Hesychius, the ninth-century lexicon of PHOTIUS, the tenth-century lexicon of the Suidas, and the 12th- or 13th-century Etymologicum Magnum. For a printed collection, see F. W. Sturz, Glossae sacrae N.T. illustratae (Leipzig 1818–20).

Although glosses originally consisted of only a few words, they grew in length as glossators enlarged them with their own comments and quotations from the Fathers. Thus the tiny gloss evolved into a running commentary of an entire book. The best-known commentary of this type is the vast Glossa ordinaria of the 12th and 13th centuries. Its marginal glosses were formerly ascribed to WALAFRID STRABO (d. 849), but recent studies demonstrate that both its marginal and interlinear glosses were compiled from Latin translations of Origen and Hesychius, from Latin Fathers, and from medieval glossators under the direction of ANSELM OF LAON (d. 1117). In appearance, a page contains a very few words of the Latin Vulgate text at the center surrounded by extensive marginal and interlinear glosses. So great was the influence of the Glossa ordinaria on biblical and philosophical studies in the Middle Ages that it was called “the tongue of Scripture” and “the bible of scholasticism.” Of the many printed editions, one of the best is that of Leander a St. Martin (6 v. Antwerp 1634).

The term “gloss” is also used of words in the Bible itself that were not part of the original writing but were accidentally or intentionally embodied into the text by a transcriber. The existence of glosses in biblical manuscripts is universally admitted but often difficult to discern. Differences in style and vocabulary or an introductory phrase (e.g., "that is") are signs of a possible gloss. It is one of the tasks of the textual critic, frequently quite difficult, to disentangle a gloss from the genuine text.

See Also: EXEGESIS, MEDIEVAL.

Bibliography: J. SCHMID, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 4:968–970. B. SMALLEY, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 2:1627–28; The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages (2d ed. New York 1952; repr. Notre Dame, Ind. 1964) 46–66. F. VIGOUROUX, Dictionnaire de la Bible, ed. F. VIGOUROUX (Paris 1895–1912) 3.1:252–258.

[C. O'C. SLOANE]

GLOSSES, CANON LAW

The practice of glossing owes its chief popularity among medieval jurists to the specifically juridical turn of mind and method of operation requisite for the interpretation of laws, the chief function of jurisprudence. When Canon Law as such began to flourish after the Decretum of GRATIAN and the inception of papal decretal legislation, the canonists borrowed from the civil jurists who were treating Roman law the method of glossing that seemed the most promising way to cope with the growing mass of ecclesiastical legislation. Each individual passage of any source had to be given a meticulously accurate interpretation, and the gloss was the most appropriate method.

Form and Content. The glosses were entered either between the lines of the text (interlinear gloss) or in the margin (marginal gloss) beside the word being glossed; as the glosses became more extensive, they were entered also in the free space at the top and bottom of the page. If there was still space available, later copyists often added further glosses; in this process older glosses were often erased and new ones were entered in their place. There are manuscripts that have three, four, and even more layers of glosses.

With regard to content, the glosses developed very quickly from a primitive form to the highest degree of perfection. The earliest glosses are the allegationes, collections of concordant or discordant capitula (concordantiae and contraria, respectively). These glosses, representing simple citations, became the basis and set the problems for later presentations. The passage glossed is made to yield a brief legal rule, usually in the form of an argumentum, and parallel passages are adduced. Especially important legal axioms are prefixed with such notations as nota. The glosses give rise, upon addition of contraria, to the later Brocarda or Generalia collections. The content of the chapter being glossed or sections with still wider implications are briefly summarized. This sort of purely reportorial gloss is closely allied with the casus, which gives the facts of a case and the ruling of a passage in a law. But this summarizing individual gloss also becomes the nucleus for the systematic textbook summae. Continuationes elaborate the connection with preceding material. Individual words are explained philologically or juridically.

Glossing arrives at a more advanced stage as soon as it proceeds to the interpretation of the law itself, to a commentary that is analytic as well as systematic. This kind of gloss examines the internal connection of the parallel passages adduced, subsumes one passage under another, or deduces one from another. The collection of discordant passages is accompanied by a gloss offering a solution that will reconcile the contradictions, usually by way of distinctions. These steadily increasing commentary glosses become more and more important; instead of providing explanations of individual words, they might enter into greater detail on a legal question touched upon in the passage being glossed. Here it is often difficult for the modern historian of law to grasp the connection seen by the medieval jurist between the problem treated in the gloss and the legal text being glossed; this is why it is difficult to find the sedes materiae of a legal problem in the glosses. These discursive glosses take various forms. The individual glosses containing a simple statement of content are enriched by explanations of the juridical significance of that content; and this gives rise to the summae on the individual chapters (capitula) and to summae on still more extensive sections of the text (the causae, quaestiones, and distinctiones of Gratian and the titles of the decretal collections). Summaries of these sections necessarily entail a summary and systematic presentation of the maxims drawn from them. Other glosses contain the distinction in the form of a schema or continuous text. A generic concept in the source, a legal rule, is analyzed into subordinate specific concepts by the use of distinctive characteristic features. Finally, many glosses contain juridical explanations having no definite form.

Apparatus Glossarum. Eventually the glosses of all sorts became more numerous and extensive until the more connected commentaries and finally the outright glossary apparatuses developed. The glosses of many authors (DECRETISTS, DECRETALISTS) are sometimes anonymous; sometimes they bear the initial or initials of the author. These logograms are not very reliable, and it is not known in many cases for what name they stand. The master writes the glosses in his copy of the text, so that they can then be transferred into other copies and disseminated. The universities provide another opportunity for their dissemination, the students copying glosses into their own texts from the copy loaned out by the master. The students also make copies of the lectures (reportationes). And finally, there are manuscripts with glosses privately authored by their owners.

About the end of the 12th century, there began a collection of the glosses that had by then become quite extensive; less important elements were deleted, and the remainder was systematized, the compiler and reviser adding his own glosses, so that there came into existence a continuous comprehensive commentary, a melting pot of the glosses, the apparatus glossarum. This apparatus was subject to constant revision and expansion; thus there are several editions of many apparatus glossarum. The schools and courts recognized as the GLOSSA ORDINARIA the one that was generally held to have made the best selection and provided defensible original opinions, while preserving completeness and distinguishing itself by succinctness and clarity. Such recognition was often very swiftly forthcoming, and the glossa ordinaria for the most part quickly and almost totally supplanted the preceding pertinent glossaries to become the final authority. Later canonists comment on the glossa ordinaria on an equal footing even with the text it glosses.

The importance of the glosses for medieval Canon Law can hardly be overestimated. Almost all the types of writing of medieval jurisprudence have their origin in the activity of glossing. The gloss was for the student the door to the whole realm of law; for the scholar, the prime means for coping with the material and enriching it with his own thoughts; for the judge, a tool to be used to prepare for and facilitate the application of the law. The glosses written from mid-12th century to the first half of the 14th century represent, in form and content, the foundation of the prodigious edifice of medieval Canon Law, the classical law of the Church.

Bibliography: F. K. V. SAVIGNY, Geschichte des römischen Rechts im Mittelalter, 7 v. (2d ed. Heidelberg 1834–51; repr. Darmstadt 1958) 3:552–574. J. F. VON SCHULTE, Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des kanonischen Rechts, 3 v. in 4 pts. (Stuttgart 1875–80; repr. Graz 1956) 1:212–220; 2:456–484; and passim. J. JUNCKER, “Summen und Glossen,” Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung 14 (1925) 384–474. E. GENZMER, “Die Iustinianische Kodifikation und die Glossatoren,” in Atti del Congresso internazionale di diritto Romano, Bologna e Roma, 1933, 4 v. (Pavia 1934–35) Bologna, 1:345–430. S. KUTTNER, Repertorium der Kanonistik (Rome 1937) 1–12 and passim. A. VAN HOVE, Commentarium Lovaniense in Codicem iuris canonici 1, v. 1–5 (Mechlin 1928–) 1:412–465, esp. 412. A. M. STICKLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65)

4:970–971. Bulletin of the Institute of Research and Study in Medieval Canon Law, ed. S. KUTTNER, in each v. of Traditio since 1955.

[K. W. KNÖRR]

GLOSSOLALIA

Glossolalia denotes the gift of speaking in a language in which facility has not been achieved through the process of human learning. The phenomenon appears three times in Acts (2.4, 6; 10.46; 19.6), where it is always a “corporate, church-founding, group-conversion phenomenon, and never the . . . Spirit-experience of an individual” (cf. Bruner p. 192). In 1 Corinthians 12 to 14 there is a different understanding of glossolalia. It is presented as an individual prayer gift to be used in private devotion for personal edification (1 Cor 14.2–4) or, if there is an interpreter, in the public assembly. It is considered inferior to prophecy (1 Cor 14.5). Mk 16.17 speaks of “new tongues” but 16.9–20 seems to be addition to the Gospel. Some scholars hold that Rom 8.26 refers to tongues but this is unlikely as here the Spirit is said to pray within one “with sighs too deep for words” (stenagmois alalētous).

Glossolalia has accompanied many religious revivals throughout history and is not unknown outside Christian circles. There appear to be three sources of the phenomenon: First, the genuine gift received from God and as experienced by such Christians as Teresa of Avila, Catherine of Siena, Francis Xavier, etc. Secondly, a “hypnotically” induced glossolalia which is not the authentic gift but probably akin to xenophoneo (strange speech) found among the second century Montanists (Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 5, 16, 167). Similar to this are the ecstatic utterances acknowledged within many religious traditions. Thirdly, “tongues” may be due to diabolical obsession or possession.

The phenomenon in the Roman Catholic Church has become widespread since the recent public manifestations of the neo-pentecostal movement. Both the genuine and the hypnotic type appear to be present. The hypnotic type produces the characteristics of divisiveness, projection of anger, group camaraderie, histrionic display, preoccupation with glossolalia and, most importantly, a regression of the ego which results in subordination to the authority figure who introduces the recipient to “tongues.” In the light of this danger it would seem advisable to refrain from imposition of hands and repetition of syllables after leaders in order to help in yielding to tongues lest the hypnotic element be inadvertently introduced.

When the gift is genuine it facilitates prayer, especially that of praise and intercession, and is accompanied by fruits of the Spirit, especially peace and joy. Sometimes it endows the recipient with poetic and musical powers which he did not originally possess. Private interpretation may also be received. The gift is under the control of the will and may be used or not as desired (cf 1 Cor 14.27). According to Samaritan even the genuine gift of tongues does not appear to be a language in the technical sense of the term but it is a "non-cerebral" means of communicating with God akin to silent prayer, well-known liturgy, the Jesus Prayer or the rosary (Baer).

See Also: PENTECOSTALISM.

Bibliography: R. BAER "Quaker Silence, Catholic Liturgy and Pentecostal Glossolalia—Some Functional Similarities," Logos International (1973). F. D. BRUNER, A Theology of the Holy Spirit (Michigan 1970). S. D. CURRIE, "'Speaking on Tongues' Early Evidence outside the New Testament bearing on 'Glossais Lalein,'" Interpretation 19 (1965) 274–294. J. D. DAVIES, "Pentecost and Glossolalia," Journal of Theological Studies 3 (1952) 228–231. J. M. FORD, Baptism of the Spirit (Illinois 1971) 79–133, or Theological Studies 32.1. R. H. GUNDRY, "Ecstatic Utterance," Journal of Theological Studies 17.2 (1962) 329–360. M. KELSEY, Speaking with Tongues (1964). J. P. KILDAHL, The Psychology of Speaking in Tongues (New York 1972). W. J. SAMARIN, Tongues of Men and Angels (New York 1972). F. STAGG, E. G. HINSON, and W. E. OATES, Glossolalia (1967). J. P. M. SWEET, "A Sign for Unbelievers: Paul's Attitude to Glossolalia," New Testament Studies 6 (Nov. 1968) 173–179.

[J. M. FORD]

GLOUCESTER, ABBEY OF

Monastery dedicated to St. Peter in the county of Gloucester and the Diocese of WORCESTER, England. The site was occupied c. 681 by a nunnery established by Osric of Mercia, and later by seculars and Benedictine monks. It never flourished until William the Conqueror appointed his chaplain, Serle, as abbot in 1072. The king and his sons gave ample endowment for 80 monks. The abbey was noted for fine building, especially when funds were obtained from pilgrims visiting the tomb of Edward II (d. 1327), whose body was brought there by Abbot Thokey. The builders were pioneers of the perpendicular style (see CHURCH ARCHITECTURE). The abbey was dissolved in January 1540, and the following year the church became the cathedral of the new diocese established by HENRY VIII.

Bibliography: W. H. HART, ed., Historia et cartularium monasterii sancti Petri Gloucestriae, 3 v. (Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores 33; 1863–67). The Victoria History of the County of Gloucester, ed. W. PAGE (London 1907–) v. 2.

[F. R. JOHNSTON]

GLUBOKOVSKIĬ, NIKOLAĬ NIKANOROVICH

19th- and 20th-century Russian lay theologian; b. N. Russia, Dec. 6, 1863; d. Sofia, March 18, 1937. Of a poor family, Nicholas studied at the Moscow Ecclesiastical Academy and obtained a degree in theology. He became a professor in the Ecclesiastical Academy of Petersburg, but left Russia in 1921 and taught at the University of Belgrade (1921–23), then at Sofia until his death. He also lectured at the Orthodox Russian Institute of St. Sergius in Paris. His theological teaching was traditional in tendency, but he took an active part in Russian Church affairs and in the nascent ecumenical movement.

His first important work was a study of THEODORET OF CYR (2 v. Moscow 1890). On the death of A. P. Lopukhin (1905) he became the responsible editor of the Russian Theological Encyclopedia, and published down to the letter L. A commentary he wrote on the Epistle to the Hebrews was published in the Theological Annual of the University of Sofia (Godišnik 6.1–14: 1923–37); he wrote also a tract on the Orthodox Church and the Reunion of Christians (1924). He also published exegetical essays in Pravoslavnaia Mysl' (Orthodox Thought) on St. John's Gospel 1.1–18 (Paris 1928) and on the Epistle to the Philippians 2.5–11 (Paris 1930).

Bibliography: I. LAGOVSKY, Viestnik 3–4 (Paris 1937) 17–21.

[B. SCHULTZE]

GLUCK, CHRISTOPH WILLIBALD

Eminent composer whose operatic reform initiated the classical operatic style; b. Weidenwang (Upper Palatinate), Germany, July 2, 1714; d. Vienna, Nov. 15, 1787. He studied music privately in Prague and later, for four years, in Milan with Sammartini. His first dozen operas (1741–46), some with librettos by Metastasio, contained the conventional features of the current Italian style. With a new librettist, Calzabigi, he initiated his "reform" with Orfeo ed Euridice (1762). His principal goals were to subordinate musical effects to dramatic truth by avoiding complicated plots, superfluous melodic ornamentation, and vocal display; and to unify the hitherto disparate elements of aria and recitativo secco. Encouraged by the marriage of Marie Antoinette, his former pupil, to the heir of the French throne, Gluck composed a series of works for the Paris Opéra incorporating these reforms: Iphigénie en Aulide (1774), Orphée and Alceste (revisions of earlier works), Armide (1777), and Iphigénie en Tauride (1779). The last named won out in the bitter controversy between Gluckists and Piccinists that climaxed the “war” between French buffonists (partisans of traditional Italian opera) and antibuffonists (admirers of Lully and Rameau). Irritated by the failure of Echo et Narcisse (1779), Gluck retired to Vienna. Apart from its historical importance Gluck’s music is outstanding. His symphonic instrumentation, dramatic use of the chorus, and incorporation of the overture into the general mood of the work are particularly noteworthy.

Bibliography: Sämliche Werke, ed. R. GERBER (Kassel 1951–); O. STRUNK, ed., Source Readings in Music History (New York 1950) 673–675, 681–683. M. COOPER, Gluck (New York 1935). P. HOWARD, Gluck and the Birth of Modern Opera (New York 1964). A. A. ABERT, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 5:320–380. N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker’s Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (5th ed. New York 1958) 574–577. D. J. GROUT, A Short History of Opera, 2 v. (2d, rev. and enl. ed. New York 1965). I. A. BRANDENBURG, “Le Cinesi di Pietro Metastasio e Christoph Willibald Gluck: Un primo avvicinamento del futuro riformatore al genere comico,” Esercizi: Musica e Spettacolo 13 (1994) 17–32. G. CROLL, “Glucks Alceste in Wien und Paris,” Österreichische Musik Zeitschrift 48 (1993) 231–236; “. . . mit Leben und Geschick arrangiert . . .” Zu Glucks Iphigénie en Tauride,” Österreichische Musik Zeitschrift 49 (1994) 283–288. P. HOWARD, Gluck: An Eighteenth-Century Portrait in Letters and Documents (Cambridge, Eng. 1995).

[R. W. LOWE]

Christoph Willibald Gluck, painting by Carl Jaeger. (©Austrian Archives/CORBIS)

GLUTTONY

The sin and vice opposed by way of excess to the virtue of abstinence, whose function it is to control the desire and use of food and non-intoxicating drink. The virtuous man will take nourishment of proper quality and sufficient quantity to maintain his physical life and well-being (somatic, psychic, and social), but without exceeding the limit set by PRUDENCE with a view to that same end.

In the OT little is said with direct bearing on the vice of gluttony. Fasting is commended in connection with prayer and repentance, but not so much, it would seem, as a corrective of intemperance in eating as a kind of self-humiliation, a bowing down of the soul, likely to lend strength to one’s prayers. In Sirach gluttony is called an evil (31.13), and moderate eating that ensures sound slumber and a clear mind next day on arising is encouraged (v. 20). However, it is understood in the context that food is good, and blessings are invoked on the man who is generous with it (v. 23). Although immoderateness brings distress and anguish, gives offense to others, and causes a man to be looked down upon (31.17–18), the pleasures associated with good meals, so long as they are indulged with moderation, are considered with approval (v. 29). In Deuteronomy, God’s mercy to His chosen people was illustrated by the good things He had given them to eat—honey oozing from the rocks, olive oil, butter, milk, fat cattle, the finest wheat, and the foaming blood of the grapes—although, to be sure, there is warning in the passage, too, for God’s gifts were abused; His darling became fat and gross and gorged and then spurned the God who made him (32.13–15). The good things provided by God’s extraordinary providence were also delectable to the taste: the bread He sent in the desert was endowed with all delights and conformed to every taste (Wis 16.20), and, later, the wine at Cana was excellent (Jn 2.10).

The NT records Our Lord’s fast at the beginning of His public ministry, but this appears to have been an event of religious and perhaps even messianic significance and not merely a disciplining of the sense appetite (see Vann and Meagher, 54–55). For the rest, little stress is laid upon fasting in the NT, though Jesus did say that His Disciples would fast when the Bride-groom was no longer with them (Mt 6.16–18). Not much is said about excessive eating. The rich man who feasted every day in splendid fashion was buried in hell, but more, it would seem, because he was so preoccupied with his self-indulgence that he had no compassion toward the poor who were in need (Lk 16.19–31) than because of simple gluttony. In St. Paul, however, gluttony is more explicitly condemned, and the Philippians were exhorted not to imitate those whose god is the belly, who mind the things of earth, and whose end is ruin (3.19).

"Gluttony," mid-19th century drawing by Louis Boilly.
(©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

As the various forms of ascetical practice evolved among Christians, particularly under the influence of the eremitical and monastic ways of life, fasting and abstinence from particular kinds of nourishment, especially meat, assumed a prominent place among them. It is a simple and effective way to practice MORTIFICATION and SELF-DENIAL and to subdue the powerful stirrings of the sense appetite. The Fathers of the Church, the theologians, and ascetical writers urged its practice and have been vigorous in their condemnation of gluttony, which has been traditionally classified among the capital SINS.

However, in spite of the disfavor with which gluttony was viewed because of its status as a capital sin and particularly because it was supposed to contribute to sexual disorder, it was nevertheless not considered to be per se a grave sin even when carried to disgusting lengths (ad vomitum). It consists in the excessive use of things in themselves legitimate. It does not therefore necessarily involve a basic disorder with regard to the goal of human life or imply the pursuit of an end unworthy of a Christian or a man. Hence it lacks the element of aversion from God that is always present in mortal sin. Nonetheless, because of incidental circumstances, aversion from God may in fact occur in gluttony, and in that case it becomes mortally sinful. This happens if one prefers the satisfaction of his appetite for food to God, and, in effect, makes his belly the god he serves (Phil 3.19). This he could do by preferring high living to the payment of his just debts, or by being so dedicated to the pleasures of eating that he is prepared to commit acts of injustice, or to violate serious obligations, rather than to forgo them.

There are many ways, as the scholastic theologians pointed out, that one can fail to keep his eating or his will to eat within reasonable bounds. One can offend by eating: praepropere, i.e., by anticipating the time or hour when eating is allowable; laute, i.e., more sumptuously than is appropriate to one's means; nimis, i.e., too much; ardenter, i.e., in a voracious manner; and studiose, i.e., with an excessive fastidiousness about what one eats.

The virtuous mean that gluttony violates does not consist in an indivisible point short of which there is culpable defect and beyond which there is culpable excess. It has, on the contrary, a certain amplitude within the limits of which there can be a considerable variation of more and less without fault. Again, the mean is not static, but varies from occasion to occasion according to one's needs. Moreover, it has a certain elasticity. Festive occasions and the special need for relaxation and agreeable fellowship can justify at times a more generous interpretation of how much and what kinds of food fall within its limits.

Much that is said in ascetical literature on the subject of gluttony should be understood as directed not against the sin of gluttony as such, but against the imperfect dispositions of those who are unreasonably reluctant ever to mortify or deny themselves in matters of food or drink. Voluntary self-denial of some legitimate satisfactions has a value that no Christian can afford to overlook, and pleasures of the table provide obvious and acceptable material for sacrifice. Recognizing the common tendency to neglect this opportunity, the Church imposes on the faithful the laws of fast and abstinence.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, ST 2a2ae, 148. G. VANN and P. K. MEAGHER, The Temptations of Christ (New York 1957). V. OBLET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique. ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903—50) 6.2:1520—25. G. JACQUEMET, Catholicisme 5: 124—125.

[P. K. MEAGHER]

GLYCAS, MICHAEL

Twelfth-century Byzantine theologian and exegete, called also Sicidites; b. Corfu, c. 1118; d. c. 1200. Glycas came into prominence as secretary to Emperor Manuel I Comnenus (1143–80). In 1159 he was accused of practicing magic and was condemned and half blinded. His crime seems rather to have been an attack on the emperor for his addiction to astrology and the use of false patristic citations in one of Manuel's writings. In prison Glycas was allowed to seek the authentic citations. On release, he became a monk and participated in the theological controversies of the era.

He wrote a World Chronicle from Creation to the death of Emperor ALEXIUS I COMNENUS (1118), in which he combined a rare blend of theology and antiquarian curiosities. His Kephalaia, or Chapters of Scriptural Difficulties (Aporiai), is a complex work that is devoted both to exegesis of the Bible and to a sort of universal theology. It contains 95 solutions (Luseis) to problems and includes historical and cultural information; it is of great interest for its sound skepticism as well as for its illumination of the humanistic concerns of its age. In an orthodox manner, he treated of the Assumption of Mary, the Immaculate Conception, the procession of the Holy Spirit, and the interpretation of Christ's statement "The Father is greater than I." His teaching regarding the presence of Christ in the Eucharist was challenged as unorthodox, however, for he maintained that the liturgical celebration reenacted the life of Christ and that the pre-Resurrection body of Christ was present before Communion and became the resurrected body at the moment of Communion. A patriarchal synod (1199–1200) dealt with this doctrine, ascribing it to Myron Sicidites, who was identical with Glycas. Glycas wrote also political verse and letters; many of his writings are still unedited.

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca 158:648–958. Catalogus codicum astrologorum graecorum, ed. F. CUMONT and F. BOLL, 5.1 (Brussels 1904) 125–140. S. EUSTRATIADIS, ed., Aporiai v.1 (Athens 1906), v.2 (Alexandria 1912), in Gr. V. GRUMEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 10.2:1705–07. H. HUNGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 7:396. M. JUGIE, Theologia dogmatica christianorum orientalium ab ecclesia catholica dissidentium 1:413–414. K. KRUMBACHER, Michael Glykas (Sitzungsberichte der Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu München 1894). H. PACHALL, Byzantinische Zeitschrift 18 (1909) 422–423. Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich 343, 654–655, 665.

[F. CHIOVARO]

GNECCHI SOLDO, ORGANTINO

Jesuit missionary; b. Casto (Brescia, Italy), 1532; d. Nagasaki, April 22, 1609. He entered the Society of Jesus at Ferrara in 1555, was ordained in 1561, and became rector of the College of Loreto in 1565–66. Assigned to Goa, he arrived there in 1567. He was assigned to Macao in 1568 and Japan in 1570; there he remained until his death. He settled in Miyako (Kyoto), the capital at that time, where he was local Jesuit and remained superior, even during the anti-Catholic persecution. He was distinguished for his administrative skill, prudence, zeal, and care of Christians. He gained the confidence of the local rulers and was able to build a beautiful church, dedicated by him Aug. 15, 1576, to the Assumption (this was the day in 1549 when Francis Xavier landed in Japan). In 1582 at Azuchi he opened a seminary for the education of native clergy. He was a decided friend of adaptation and integration of native practices with Christian teaching. A number of his letters are extant.

Bibliography: R. STREIT and J. DINDINGER, Bibliotheca missionum (Freiburg 1916–) 4:405, 564; 5:1030. J. F. SCHÜTTE, Valignanos Missionsgrundsätze für Japan, (v.1.1–1.2; Rome 1951–58), best study. C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 5:1932–34.

[J. WICK]

GNESIO LUTHERANISM

A term used since c. 1700 to designate pure Lutheranism as opposed to the conciliatory and moderate interpretation of Luther's theology made by Philipp MELANCHTHON, and adopted by many during the 16th and 17th centuries (see PHILIPPISM). Mainly concerned with keeping the church faithful to Luther without Melancthonian additions, the tendency of the Gnesio (genuine) Lutherans was less generous than that of Luther, who considered Melancthon indispensable to his reform, even when not altogether in agreement with him. In the ensuing controversies were discussed the questions of the necessity of good works for the believer (see MAJOR, GEORG; MAJORISTIC CONTROVERSY), the Lord's Supper (see CRYPTO CALVINISM), freedom of the will (see SYNERGISM), and ecumenism (see CALIXTUS, GEORG). The heat and bitterness of some Gnesiolutherans, at times matched by their opponents, likely owed something to the fear of the German princes of Philippism as a danger to their power. While they put ecumenism in peril, Gnesiolutherans helped preserve some of the essential Protestant emphases for a later era in which the spiritual climate was more properly favorable to it. The leading Gnesiolutherans were: Matthias FLACIUS ILLYRICUS, Nikolaus von AMSDORF, Joachim Westphal (1510–74), Johannes Timan (?–1557), Tilemann Heshusius (1527–88), Nikolaus Gallus (1516–70), Johannes Wigand (1523–87), Joachim Mörlin (1514–71), Aegidius Hunnius (1550–1603), and his son, Nikolaus Hunnius (1585–1643).

Bibliography: O. RITSCHL, Dogmengeschichte des Protestantismus v.4 (Göttingen 1908–27). H. W. GENSICHEN, Dammamus: Die

Verwerfung von Irrlehre bei Luther und im Luthertum des 16. Jahrhunderts (Berlin 1955). W. LOHFF, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–64) 4:1018–19.

[Q. BREEN]

GNOSEOLOGY

From the Greek γνῶσις, a term used to designate the science or the study of KNOWLEDGE. Originally signifying any investigation of a cognitive procedure, it took on a more specific meaning as the critique of knowledge assumed importance in philosophical inquiry; eventually its cognate forms in Italian, Spanish, and French came to have the same meaning as the German Erkenntnistheorie and the English EPISTEMOLOGY. This shift from a purely psychological signification to one stressing the value of knowledge began, however, only after R. DESCARTES and I. KANT had emphasized the critique of knowledge as primary and essential—an emphasis that not all philosophers have been able to accept. The term gnoseology is frequently used in Italy and Spain to designate the study of knowledge in general, and in this sense it is opposed to epistemology, which is usually applied in these countries to the study of knowledge deriving from modern science alone. With the introduction of the term criteriology by J. L. BALMES and its popularization by Cardinal D. J. MERCIER, the use of the term gnoseology has tended to decline among Catholic philosophers.

See Also: CRITERION (CRITERIOLOGY).

Bibliography: P. COFFEY, Epistemology, 2 v. (New York 1917; repr. Gloucester, MA 1958). D. J. MERCIER, Critériologie générale ou théorie générale de la certitude (His Cours de philosophie 4; 8th ed. Louvain 1906). P. PRINI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:813–840.

[G. C. REILLY]

GNOSIS

Of the several Greek words for knowledge, γνῶσις is frequently left untranslated, as Gnosis, when referring to early Christian literature, to indicate a particularly significant form of knowledge of God, of Christ, of heavenly “mysteries” and the like. In heterodox circles this was the esoteric, salvific knowledge of Gnosticism. Whether in reaction to Gnosticism or independently of it, some New Testament and other early Christian writers also developed a doctrine of Gnosis.

Gnostic Influence on the New Testament. No passage of the New Testament can be said with clear certainty either to be directed expressly against Gnosticism on the one hand or to have derived its vocabulary from Gnostic sources on the other. There are many more or less probable instances of Gnostic background, however. The logion of Mt 11.25–27, though difficult to interpret in its Matthean setting, may be traced to a Jewish background without appeal to Gnostic ideas or language [see W. D. Davies, “‘Knowledge’ in the Dead Sea Scrolls and Matthew 11:25–30,” Harvard Theological Review 46 (1953) 113–139]. The early heresiologists attributed the founding of Gnosticism to the Samaritan SIMON MAGUS, and yet nothing in Acts 8.9–24 unmistakably marks him as a Gnostic. St. Paul’s Corinthian opponents (1 and 2 Cor), who gloried in their charismatic “Gnosis,” may have been affected by an early form of Gnosticism or may simply have been other errant Judeo-Christians; the many allusions are not decisive and are still disputed. The “Colossian heresy” corresponds much more closely to what is known of some types of Jewish Gnosticism (see Gnosticism, Jewish), and it is not improbable that in both Colossians and Ephesians some of the vocabulary is adapted in conscious opposition to at least an early form of such Gnosticism. In 1 Tm 6.20 there is a specific warning against a “falsely named Gnosis,” and many references in the Pastoral Epistles can be understood of some early form of Jewish Gnosticism. In Jude 5–19; 2 Pt 2.1–22; Rv 2.2, 6, 14–15, 20–23, groups that may very probably be identified as antinomian (Jewish) Gnostic ones are vehemently opposed; one group, the NICOLAITES, are named in Rv 2.6, 15. The extent of Gnostic influence upon the Johannine writings has been a very disputed question. St. John repeatedly uses the verb “to know” but never the noun “Gnosis”; he does not betray familiarity with Gnostic mythology any more than does St. Paul. Increased recognition (partly through the Dead Sea Scrolls) of the Palestinian elements in the Fourth Gospel does not preclude some material influence on his vocabulary from the side of early Gnosticism. But the Johannine Epistles openly combat “false prophets” (1 Jn 4.1), who can perhaps best be understood as Gnostics.

Meaning of Gnosis for Paul and John. Whatever their debt to nascent Gnosticism, both Paul and John evolved doctrines of Christian Gnosis that could well have been partly inspired by elements current in the syncretistic world about them but are certainly original because they focus on the person of Christ. The principal sources of New Testament Gnosis are in fact the Old Testament and Jewish concept of knowing God and the revelation of God made by Jesus Christ. Unlike the Gnostics, Paul understands Gnosis as directed toward God, not toward self; it is self-knowledge only insofar as knowing God, and thus being known by Him, place one’s awareness of self in a new perspective (1 Cor 8.2; Gal 4.9). In the Old Testament, knowledge was practical, not theoretical; it was personal, not discursive; it was mediated by knowledge of the Law, not mystically infused. So for Paul it involves man's personal religious response, his attitude as well as his conviction (Col 1.9–10); it is a gift of God communicated through knowledge of the gospel message (1 Cor 1.4–6). Thus true knowledge of God is first and necessarily knowledge of Christ (2 Cor 4.6; Phil 3.8–10). Gnosis in the New Testament is distinct from Gnosticism also in that it has historical and eschatological dimensions (Ti 1.1–3; Phil 3.10–11; 1 Cor 13.12). Paul further presents Gnosis as pertaining to the mysteries of God, a higher degree of contemplation of the same gospel message that is the object of faith (Rom 16.25–26; Eph 3.2–12; Col 1.25–28; 2.2–3). But precious as it is, the gift of knowledge must yield before the higher gift of love of God (1 Cor 8.2–3; 13.2, 8).

The Johannine "Gnosis" is fundamentally the same as the Pauline; if anything it assumes an even more prominent role (Jn 17.3) and is more closely allied to love (1 Jn 4.7–8). Knowing God is eternal life; it is loving God, obeying His commandments (1 Jn 2.3–4), entering into communion with Him (Jn 14.20). John's juxtaposition of knowledge and vision is a Hellenistic rather than an Old Testament feature (Jn 14.7–9), but it is unique in its association with faith (Jn 8.28–32; 10.38; 17.8) and especially with John's insistence on the mediation of knowledge by the incarnate Son of God (Jn 8.54–55; 10.14–15; 17.3; 1 Jn 5.20).

Christian Gnosis of Early Church Fathers. In the early patristic period, the APOSTOLIC FATHERS and the Greek APOLOGISTS for the most part continued the understanding of Christian Gnosis found in the New Testament. The most distinctive development comes with the Alexandrians CLEMENT and ORIGEN who, though bitterly opposed to Gnosticism, nevertheless profess doctrines of "orthodox" Gnosis that have their roots in a blending of Biblical tradition, Jewish apocalyptic, and Hellenistic philosophy (Middle Platonism). For Clement, Gnosis is related to faith, but is a higher knowledge of God and all revelation leading to perfection in love and unitive vision. It is based on an understanding of Scripture and an esoteric secret tradition supposedly handed down from Christ. Knowledge of the angels and of the ascent of the soul is derived from a Hellenization of Jewish apocalyptic themes. Origen professes a similar higher degree of knowledge reserved for the "perfect," but he derives it exclusively from an esoteric exegesis of the mysteries concealed in Scripture.

Bibliography: R. BULTMANN, "Gnosis," tr. J. R. COATES, in Bible Key Words, ed. G. KITTEL, v.1–5 (New York 1951). L. CERFAUX, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT et al. (Paris 1928–) 3:659–701. R. SCHNACKENBURG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:996–1000. F. NÖTSCHER, "Gnosis," Zur theologischen Terminologie der Qumran-Texte (Bonn 1956) 15–79. R. P. CASEY, "Gnosis, Gnosticism and the New Testament," The Background of the New Testament and Its Eschatology, ed. W. D. DAVIES and D. DAUBE (Cambridge, Eng. 1956) 52–80. J. DUPONT, Gnosis: La Connaissance religieuse dans les épîtres de saint Paul (Louvain 1949). C. H. DODD, "Knowledge of God," The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge, Eng. 1953; repr. 1960). L. BOUYER, "Gnosis: Le Sens orthodoxe de l'expression jusqu'aux Pères alexandrins," Journal of Theological Studies NS 4 (1953) 188–203. J. DANIELOU, Message évangélique et culture hellénistique aux II^e et III^e siècles (Tournai 1961) 405–460. T. CAMELOT, Foi et Gnose: Introduction à l'étude de la connaissance mystique chez Clément d'Alexandrie (Paris 1945). W. VÖLKER, Der wahre Gnostiker nach Clemens Alexandrinus (Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 57; 1952). H. CROUZEL, Origène et la "connaissance mystique" (Bruges 1961).

[G. W. MACRAE]

GNOSTICISM

The term Gnosticism usually designates a widespread religious philosophy, current especially in the early centuries of the Christian era, which was characterized by the doctrine that salvation is achieved through knowledge or γνῶσις.

Problem of Definition

The obvious inadequacy of this definition is necessitated first by the historically changing views of what Gnosticism is and secondly by the extreme complexity of the religious phenomenon itself. The term was first applied by 2nd- and 3rd-century patristic writers to a large number of pseudo-Christian teachers and sects such as VALENTINUS, BASILIDES, and many others, all of whom were regarded as Christian heretics. In various forms their "heresies" persisted up to the 7th century, and the name Gnosticism was limited to them until modern times. In the 18th and 19th centuries the term began to receive a much broader scope when historians observed many of the distinguishing features of Gnosticism, particularly its myths and its images, in a host of other religious movements, some of them decidedly non-Christian.

Hermetic and Mandaean Writings. A purely pagan body of philosophico-religious literature, the Hermetic writings, had come to be classified as a pagan Gnosis. HERMETIC writers, it was found, needed but some mention of Christ, and the role Gnostics traditionally ascribed to Him, in order to parallel very accurately some of the Christian heresies. Mandaeanism also, the anti-Christian baptist sect of Iraq which continues to exist even today, falls in the broader category of Gnosticism. The name MANDAEAN is itself derived from a word in the Mandaean dialect of Aramaic meaning "knowledge." Though the time and place of origin of this religion are still matters of uncertainty and dispute, Mandaism may safely be regarded as a late form of Gnostic religion, perhaps originating in the 5th century A.D. The great and dangerous heresy of the 3rd and subsequent centuries, Manichaeism, is generally regarded as the direct heir of some of the leading Gnostics. Its origins lie in a mingling of seemingly Christian ideas with Iranian, and possibly even Buddhist, ones.

Among the Jews, too, there were traces of Gnostic ideas, first in the DEAD SEA SCROLLS and some of the Jewish apocrypha, as well as in the writings of the Hellenistic-Jewish mystic PHILO; then in Christian times in the Merkabah speculations of the school of Rabbi JOHANAN BEN ZAKKAI, in the Hekalot treatises, and in the medieval Cabala. Certain late heterodox forms of Islam, some aberrant forms of medieval Christianity such as CATHARISM, and even several modern types of occultism or theosophy deserve inclusion in the broader category of Gnosticism.

Gnosticism in the broadest sense that would embrace all the above-mentioned religions and sects over the past 2,000 years can be distinguished from Gnosticism in a much stricter sense that rejoins in extent, if not precisely in intent, the usage of the Church Fathers. Since Hermeticism, Mandaism, Manichaeism, and Jewish mysticism are treated elsewhere, the present article will limit itself to the pseudo-Christian sects of the 2nd to the 7th centuries A.D.

Gnosticism Not a Christian Heresy. But even with this limitation, is Gnosticism correctly viewed as a Christian heresy? Here again modern scholarship has effected a significant change, one which can best be illustrated by the general rejection of Harnack's famous description of Gnosticism as "the acute Hellenization of Christianity." The Gnostics can no longer be considered Christians, half-formed ones perhaps, who tried to absorb into Christianity certain mythological and speculative currents of the Hellenistic world at large. The process was almost the reverse, described in the phrase of one modern scholar as "the verbal Christianizing of paganism." However many Christian ideas are used or misused by the Gnostics, Gnosticism remains essentially a form of paganism. Its Christian elements are on the surface only. The language and images of Christianity are used, but the essence of the Christian message is ignored completely. One must think of a vast religious spirit or atmosphere, the origins of which will be treated later in this article, a spirit essentially pagan which absorbed select elements from Christianity as indeed it absorbed something from most of the other religions it encountered.

The rejection of the patristic understanding of the Gnostic movement is not meant, however, to minimize the danger that Gnosticism offered to early Christianity in its own confrontation with the Hellenistic world. Gnosticism was assuredly one of the worst dangers ever faced by Christianity, one which the efforts of the Church Fathers managed to overcome successfully only after a prolonged struggle. Yet, like all great threats to Christian faith, it provoked many theological precisions and clarifications of value to the Church's own development within the world of Hellenistic thought.

The Sources

The documents that furnish information on the Gnostic sects and doctrines fall readily into two main categories distinct not only in nature but in the time in which they have become known to scholarship. The first category consists of the descriptions, fragments, and short works of Gnostics contained in the extant refutations of the great patristic writers. The second category embraces the highly significant Gnostic works themselves that have been discovered in recent decades.

Patristic Polemics against Gnosticism. The first and greatest of these works to come down to us in its entirety is the Adversus Haereses or Unmasking and Refutation of the False Gnosis, written late in the 2nd century by St. IRENAEUS OF LYONS, and extant in Latin translation. A somewhat earlier foe of Gnosticism was HEGESIPUS, whose extensive travels gave him firsthand knowledge of Gnostics. His major work, the Memoirs (Hypomnemata), is lost but is quoted frequently in Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History. TERTULLIAN (d. after A.D. 220) wrote five books against MARCION, one against Valentinus, and the Scorpiace ("remedy for the scorpion's sting" of Gnosticism). Besides numerous quotations from Valentinus and other Gnostics in his Stromata, CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA (d. before 215) preserved extensive Gnostic passages in an appendix to that work, the Excerpta ex Theodoto. HIPPOLYTUS OF ROME (d. 235) is very probably the author of the long collection of Philosophoumena or Refutatio omnium haeresium, which is partly dependent on Irenaeus. This last-mentioned refutation of the Gnostics came to light in 1851 and was for a time wrongly attributed to ORIGEN. The works of Origen (d. 253–254), especially his Commentary on John, contain relevant citations from the Gnostic HERACLEON and others.

From the 4th century come the attack on the Manichaeans in the Acts of Archelaus of Hegemonius, much useful information in the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius, and the monumental Panarion (medicine-box) or Haereses of St. EPIPHANIUS OF SALAMIS (d. 403). The last-named refutation, which combines firsthand information with wide use of the earlier writers on heresies, cites in full a valuable Gnostic composition, the Letter of Ptolemy to Flora. There is also much information on Gnostic heresies in the Syriac works of St. EPHREM (d. 373) and on the survival of Gnosticism in a later Syrian author, Theodore bar Konai, who lived in the 8th century.

Original Gnostic Writings. As sources for our knowledge of Gnosticism, all the above works suffer from a double disadvantage. Not only are they all second-hand sources, but the picture of Gnosticism they give is one seen through the eyes of its resolute enemies. Such a picture had to suffice, however, until in the mid-18th century there began a series of discoveries of original Gnostic texts culminating in the great collection of Gnostic documents found near the site of the ancient village of CHENOBOSKION (modern Nag-Hammadi), Egypt, in 1946. All of these papyri are written in Coptic, but are presumably translations from Greek originals. What is most significant is that they are the writings of the Gnostics themselves, many of them known already by title or in fragments. Though detailed study of them will continue for a long time, it is already established that they reinforce the reliability of the patristic descriptions of the sects.

The first of the three codices found prior to the Chenoboskion collection is the Askew Codex, acquired by the British Museum in 1785 and published in translation some 65 years later. Of the five works contained in it the best known is the Pistis Sophia, named after a mythical figure in the Gnostic world of Aeons. The work, in two books, purports to narrate conversations of the risen Jesus with His disciples, revealing esoteric knowledge of the world. The contents of this codex were composed probably in the 3rd century by members of one of the popular and somewhat decadent Gnostic sects. Equally fantastic in content is the Bruce Codex, discovered in 1769 and first published in 1891. It contains two principal works, the two books now generally recognized as the Books of Jeû cited in the Pistis Sophia, and an anonymous treatise apparently of the Sethian Gnostic sect. The third document is Berlin Codex 8502, discovered in 1896. It contains a Gospel of Mary, a Sophia of Jesus Christ, and a very important Apocryphon, or Secret Book of John, which was used as a source by Irenaeus in his description of the Barbelo-Gnostics. By the time this codex was finally published in 1955, all previous Gnostic material was dwarfed in extent and importance by the Chenoboskion discoveries.

The Chenoboskion find consists of 13 codices containing some 51 Gnostic works in Coptic dialects. Included in this collection are two works previously known, the Apocryphon of John and another writing of the Berlin Codex; several works known by name but thought lost, such as the very important Gospel of Truth of Valentinus; and others hitherto completely unknown, such as the now celebrated Gospel of Thomas. The codices seem to have formed the library of a 4th-century Sethian group but include Hermetic as well as Valentinian compositions.

Gnostic Elements in Apocryphal Gospels and Acts. A third category of sources for knowledge of Gnosticism, which is not, however, on a par with the others, is some of the apocryphal gospels and acts which remain from that vast post-Biblical pseudonymous literature that circulated so widely in the early Church. It is not easy to distinguish in this literature what is definitely Gnostic and what is merely part of the speculative world of early Christianity. The Acts of Thomas fall into the Gnostic category, and the famous "Hymn of the Pearl" contained in them marks a high point in Gnostic literature—which, in general, is of very poor literary quality. It is still a matter of dispute whether the apocryphal Odes of Solomon, a 2nd-century work extant in Syriac, is predominantly Gnostic or not.

Gnostic Doctrines

In speaking of only one of the many Gnostic sects, the Valentinians, St. Irenaeus begins: "Let us look now at the inconstant opinion of these, how when they are two or three they do not say the same things about the same subject, but give answers contrary both in words and in meanings" (Adv. Haer. 1.11.1). Such diversity is both a symptom of the disorder of Gnostic teachings and a logical consequence of one of its basic doctrines. If knowledge is given absolute salvific value and is counted the prerogative of a minority, then there is nothing to prevent the multiplication of esoteric systems of knowledge wherever the movement takes root. And that is precisely what happened, especially after the first generations of Gnostic teachers.

It must be understood, then, that it is impossible to sketch the contents of Gnostic teaching in such a way as to include all the pseudo-Christian forms, much less the later Christian and non-Christian forms. One can, however, detach from these many systems a series of assertions and attitudes that reflect the common atmosphere of Gnosticism. The scheme suits no one branch but is not completely foreign to any of them. The basic structure of Gnosticism may be grouped around five headings: God, the world, man, salvation, and morality. Through these categories are indicated what are commonly considered distinguishing traits of Gnosticism: dualism, emanationism, and salvation through esoteric knowledge.

Theology. The God of the Gnostics is often described as the alien God, the unknown God, the nonexistent God, the absolutely transcendent God, or the totally

Other. All these expressions are an attempt to stress the complete separation of God from the world of men and angels and semidivine beings. God is not the creator of the world and has nothing to do with the world's continued existence or its government, despite the fact that the powers responsible for the world in some systems have issued from God in some mysterious way. He is unknown in the sense that man in the world cannot really know Him, and even when the spark of divinity in man is enlightened by revelation he cannot make any positive assertion about God. It is in this sense that God is said to be nonexistent.

The Gnostic concept of God presents the first facet of the absolute ontological DUALISM that in some form or other underlies every Gnostic tendency. God and the universe of other beings are unalterably opposed as light to darkness and as good to evil.

Cosmogony. It is proper to speak of the Gnostics' "COSMOGONY" rather than "cosmology" because their speculation most often took the form of a mythological explanation of the origin of the universe rather than a philosophical consideration of its composition. The first element of this cosmogony was a vast area of beings intermediate between God and men in which the Gnostic delighted to multiply names, personages, and relationships. Sometimes there is a fairly coherent distinction between the two worlds: the noumenal one in which a series of such beings, the purely spiritual Aeons, inhabit the Pleroma (fullness) near God Himself, and the phenomenal, the visible universe and its rulers. The creator of the visible world, if an individual, is called the Demiurge, after Plato's Craftsman, or if a group, the Archons, "rulers." These are often seven in number (the Hebdomad), patterned on the Babylonian planetary gods, but often given names derived from Old Testament names for God such as Iao, Adonai, and El Shaddai. They rule over the spheres that successively envelop the earth. All these powers come into being by a series of emanations, sometimes traceable back to God Himself, but without compromising His transcendence.

The shaping of the material world results, according to a frequently recurring myth, from the fall of one of the higher powers, Sophia (often called Achamoth from the Hebrew word for wisdom). As a result of her fatal attraction to evil matter, Sophia brings into being or into action the Archons who in turn produce by emanation the material world.

The powers of the spheres and the world of matter are all essentially and primordially evil, and here again appears the basic dualism. Their evil nature results primarily from the fact that they represent separation from the alien God, and each plays his role in preventing man's ascent to God. They are darkness compared with the God of light. The Archons rule the world with an almost inexorable fatality which grips men and binds them to the earth even through successive reincarnations.

Anthropology. There is a divine spark in man, according to Gnostic anthropology, which descends from the Pleroma, from God Himself; and the problem of human existence is the struggle to ascend again from the evil world of matter to the good God through knowledge. Man is in fact composed of not two but three elements: a material body, a soul (psyche), and spirit (pneuma). According to whichever of these elements dominates in him, he falls into a particular category of existence. The "hylics," the material ones, are those dominated by the body, swallowed up in the cares of life on earth. The "psychics," dominated by the soul, are but one short step removed from the hylics, for the soul like the body is created by the lower powers, is subject to their rule, and is basically evil. The pseudo-Christian Gnostics identified the psychics with the majority of Christians who aspired by faith and obedience as well as by the sacramental life to join their God in eternal bliss. But those in whom the spirit or the divine spark had been rekindled, the "pneumatics," the Gnostics themselves, were destined to rejoin the divine world to which they really belonged, once they had been liberated from this world.

There can be no mistake about this process of liberation: it takes place through the instrumentality of Gnosis, knowledge. It has been observed that Gnosticism in contrast to other religions is more outspokenly man-centered than God-centered. A celebrated passage from the Excerpta ex Theodoto (no. 78.2) illustrates this tendency and describes the object of Gnosis: "It is not the bath [baptism] alone which liberates, but it is knowledge of who we were, what we have become, where we were, into what we have been cast, whither we hasten, whence we are redeemed, what birth is, and what rebirth is." The process of divine descent and reascent in Gnostic anthropology provides the answers to these questions.

Soteriology. Gnosticism is a religion of redemption, salvation, liberation. Its most distinguishing feature is that salvation is accomplished, not by the power of God nor by human faith nor by cooperation with the will of God, but by the assimilation of esoteric knowledge. The various Gnostic systems gave a central place to the figure of a redeemer whose essential task was to come among men and communicate or reveal to them the saving knowledge. The Gnostic savior is scarcely recognizable from the New Testament point of view. He is a semidivine personage, a messenger from God Himself. But Christ does not become man; Gnosticism is Docetic in holding that the redeemer merely seems to become incarnate. Various devices are used to explain away the Passion and death of Jesus.

The necessity of a redeemer tells us something more about the nature of Gnosis. For the Gnostics, knowledge is not philosophical speculation but a revelation from God, hence the popularity of the many “revelations” and discourses of Christ or other divine and semidivine powers to the disciples or the legendary heroes of Gnosticism. Further, Gnosis is an esoteric knowledge; not only is it not available to everyone, but it is intended only for those capable of being saved by it. Thus, unhampered by the demands of rigorous philosophical coherence and cloaked by esotericism, the Gnostics’ imaginations could be given free rein to create and develop new systems.

Morality. One of the most common charges leveled against the Gnostics by patristic writers was immorality, made more heinous because the Gnostics defended their practice. St. Irenaeus says of them in a memorable passage: “As gold sunk in filth does not lose its beauty but preserves its own nature, the filth being unable to harm the gold, so they say of themselves that even if they be immersed in material deeds, nothing will injure them nor will they lose their spiritual essence. Therefore ‘the most perfect’ among them do unafraid all the forbidden things of which Scripture tells us that ‘they who do such things will not inherit the kingdom of God’” (Adv. Haer. 1.6.2–3). This practical attitude, which has been called an antinomian libertinism, is but a consequence of the Gnostic theory.

In their role as pneumatics, the Gnostics considered themselves withdrawn from the domain of the world and its powers. Their true life was the divine life of the spark of Pneuma within them. Their life on earth was meant to be an ever more complete withdrawal from matter. Paradoxical though it may seem, this withdrawal could be practiced in the two opposite extremes of severe ascetical abstention from the pleasures of life, such as we find in Marcionism, or reckless indulgence in them, which was the more common attitude of the popular sects. Contempt for the material and the laws that govern it, the latter felt, could best be shown by almost systematic flouting of all earthly standards of morality. There was no law but that of the spirit within them. While Gnostic writings show disdain for marriage and sexual relations, their authors practiced sexual promiscuity without fear of either convention or consequences. Precisely how widespread was the actual practice of immorality among the Gnostic sects, however, it is impossible to say.

Information on the religious life of the Gnostic groups is likewise very limited. It is clear that they all practiced baptism but in various disguises. Widespread among the later sects especially were the performance of magic rites and the use of magic formulas. Inscriptions and drawings of the period illustrate their delight in repeating magical names, or formulas (e.g., Abraxas), series of vowels, phrases, and the like. There is evidence also that many were devoted to astrology and that some sects carried on mystery rites similar to those of the pagan mystery religions.

Gnostic Leaders and Sects

After this general sketch of Gnostic teachings and practice, it will be useful to mention some of the leading ancient Gnostic teachers and schools or sects. No effort will be made to be complete in the enumerations as they are found in the patristic sources, since in many cases the groups are known by name only.

Early Gnostics. According to the Fathers the founder of the Gnostic movement was SIMON MAGUS, the Samaritan, who appears in the New Testament in Acts 8.9–24 as a magician interested in Christianity. He was said by the Fathers to have written a work called the Great Tidings and to have influenced numerous disciples toward a Gnosticism with a practical libertine aspect. One of these was Menander, a Samaritan who taught in Antioch and claimed to be a savior sent from above. Simon probably represents the transition between the general current of Gnostic ideas in the 1st century and what we have called pseudo-Christian Gnosticism.

Another forerunner of the classical Gnosis was Nicolas, originator of the sect of NICOLAITES mentioned in Rv 2.6, 15. Little else is known of him. Another Samaritan pre-Gnostic leader was Dositheus, founder of a sect of Dositheans and said to be the teacher of Simon Magus.

Classical Period of Gnosticism (2nd Century). Simon’s pupil Menander had two outstanding disciples, Saturnilus and Basilides, at Antioch according to the patristic accounts. Our knowledge of the former comes from Hippolytus, who attributes typically Gnostic themes to him. Saturnilus may have been the first of the Gnostics to find a place for Jesus Christ within his system.

Basilides. About BASILIDES we are much better informed. He and his son Isidore inaugurated a sect at Alexandria in Egypt. The Fathers provide sharply contrasting descriptions of Basilides’ teaching, which seems to have been characterized by some philosophical subtlety.

Carpoocrates. St. Irenaeus reports that it was an Alexandrian contemporary of Basilides, CARPOCRATES, who with his son Epiphanes established the sect called simply “the Gnostics” (Adv. Haer. 1.25). Among other things, they were noted for their reverence for Epiphanes, who died in his youth, and for their veneration of icons and the practice of magic.

Valentinus. The most famous and probably the most influential Gnostic teacher of the 2nd century was the Egyptian VALENTINUS who taught at Rome. He was the author of many works, all lost except the Gospel of Truth and a Letter to Rheginus, possibly from Valentinus, in the Chenoboskion collection. His mature doctrine, as described by the Fathers, was based on a careful distinction between the spiritual and phenomenal worlds and on the tripartite classification of men. Valentinus's numerous disciples formed two schools that differed in considering the body of Jesus as psychic (the Western or Italian School) or spiritual (the Oriental School). To the former group belonged Ptolemy, author of the Letter to Flora preserved by Epiphaneus; HERACLEON, who wrote the first known commentary on John often cited by Origen; and a Roman presbyter named Florinus. Among the teachers of the Oriental group were THEODOTUS, excerpts of whose work are found in Clement of Alexandria, and Marcus, who taught in Asia Minor and whose disciples were said to have penetrated as far as Gaul.

Marcion. One of the most distinctive of the heretics commonly included among the Gnostics was MARCION, a native of Pontus who came to Rome in A.D. 140. Unlike many of the other teachers mentioned, Marcion aimed not merely at devising a saving doctrine, but at founding an organized church. His only known work, the Antitheses, has not survived. The New Testament of his sect was one which he had revised with many omissions from the traditional one. Though his system lacked many of the familiar Gnostic ideas, Marcion taught that the evil material world was the work of a Demiurge whom he identified with the God of the Old Testament. Whatever the Gnostic views of Marcion himself, there is no doubt that the sect of Marcionites, spread by a disciple Apelles, and others, was plainly Gnostic. Strong opposition to the Old Testament and rigid asceticism were two of its characteristics.

Bardesanes. Doubt has been cast also on the classification of the Syrian Bar Daisan (Bardesanes) as a Gnostic, but here again the sect founded by him and much later opposed by St. Ephrem was undeniably Gnostic. BARDESANES himself, author of various hymns and treatises including the extant Book of the Laws of the Countries, may once have been a Valentinian, but he opposed this sect later. His most notable disciple was his son Harmonius.

The Popular Gnostic Sects. It is neither feasible nor useful to enumerate all the Gnostic sects listed by Irenaeus, Epiphanius, and the other patristic writers against heresies. In many cases it is possible that individual sects were known by more than one name or that many of the names designate only minor variations within the same general groups. The date of origin of these sects is uncertain; some of them may have paralleled the work of the great Gnostic teachers, and many of them certainly lasted for a few centuries longer. As far as is known, they all seem to be characterized by excessive and fantastic mythologies and by elaborate, often repugnant rites.

Some of the sects were named after an Old Testament personage who was held to be the first prophet of their particular teachings and, therefore, was especially venerated. Thus there are such groups as the Cainites, the Sethians, and the Melchisedekians. The Sethians especially are now becoming much better known through the library of one of their adherents found near Chenoboskion in Upper Egypt. Another group, the Barbelo-Gnostics, takes its name from a mythical figure prominent in its cosmogony, the female word for the Father, Barbelo. Irenaeus infers that the Apocryphon of John stems from this sect, which appears to some to be a popular outgrowth of Valentinianism.

Several descriptions are available of groups called Ophites and Naassenes, whose names reflect respectively Greek and Hebrew words for "serpent." A cult of the serpent, presumably borrowed from the mystery religions, was a prominent part of their ritual. It is a matter of dispute whether these were really distinct sects. The Peratae described by Hippolytus may have been a branch of a more general category of Ophites. Among the sects mentioned by the 8th-century writer Theodore bar Konai were the Audians, followers of the Syrian heretic Audius.

Gnostic Origins

The uncertainty and vagueness encountered in the effort to define Gnosticism reappears in a related but more exaggerated manner in the task of discovering the origins of the Gnostic movement. Here a careful distinction must be made between the psychological origins of Gnosticism as it has been described above and the ideological origins of the syncretistic movement behind it.

The Question of Jewish Origins. It has been proposed that the great Gnostic systems arose out of the disappointed apocalyptic hopes of late Judaism. In New Testament times the messianic expectations of Judaism were high, and the fall of Jerusalem and consequent scattering of the Jews dealt them a decisive blow. Out of their profound discouragement over their present situation in the world, many Jews turned for religious solace to a sort of other-worldliness, imagining the true life of man to be lived on another plane entirely. Esoteric knowledge of this life supplanted fidelity to the faith of Israel. Novelty was sought in the religious currents abroad in the Hellenistic world, including the current of nascent Christianity.

There appears to be much truth in this sort of explanation of the origins of Gnosticism, but it prompts two cautionary remarks. The first is that it explains only the psychological state which made certain types of men receptive to the phenomenon of Gnosticism. It does not explain the origins of the varied religious and philosophical ideas which go to make up Gnostic doctrine. Secondly, this explanation runs the risk of exaggerating the role played by Judaism in Gnostic origins. It cannot be denied that there are Jewish elements in the pseudo-Christian forms of Gnosticism even though these sometimes show a strong anti-Jewish bias. Moreover, Jewish influence is often present in non-Christian Gnoseis, and there is a characteristically Gnostic strain even in heterodox Judaism itself. While the question remains a disputed one, the limited information available does not warrant the attribution of a primary role in the movement to Judaism.

Other Sources. As for the sources upon which Gnosticism drew for its strange mixture of ideas, only the following general observations can be made. Gnosticism grew out of the confrontation of a broad syncretistic movement which flourished especially in Egypt, Syria, and Asia Minor, and eventually in Rome, with Christianity. The syncretism consisted in a tendency to adopt into one pattern of thought elements from all the religions and philosophies current in the Hellenistic world. To this amalgam ancient Iranian religion contributed the cosmic dualism that forms a basic element of nearly all varieties of Gnosticism. From Egypt came elements of the cult of Isis and Osiris; from Babylonia the influence of astrology and the planetary gods; from Syria, Greece, and Rome cultic features of the mystery religions and magic; from Judaism a host of Old Testament figures and many variations on the creation story; and from Greece, again, the philosophical currents of Stoicism and Neo-Pythagoreanism. Platonic influences felt in Gnosticism were transmitted only through the medium of later popularizations; Gnosticism was never a rigorously philosophical system of thought. Finally, Christianity lent to the syncretistic movement the role of the Savior Christ.

This is but a brief list of the currents that entered the syncretistic movement of Gnosticism, but little more can be said with certainty at the present stage of research. It is disputed whether or not there was a pre-Christian Jewish Gnosticism or even whether it is proper to speak of Gnosticism at all before the encounter with Christianity. The second question may be resolved in part by adopting the terminological distinctions suggested at the beginning of this article.

See Also: GNOSTICISM, JEWISH; GNOSIS.

Bibliography: Sources. W. VÖLKER, ed., Quellen zur Geschichte der christlichen Gnosis (Tübingen 1932). R. M. GRANT, Gnosticism: A Sourcebook of Heretical Writings from the Early Christian Period (New York 1961). C. SCHMIDT and W. TILL, Kop- tisch-gnostische Schriften (Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte 45; 3d ed. Berlin 1959). W. TILL, Die gnostischen Schriften des koptischen Papyrus Berolinensis 8502 (Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 60; Berlin 1955). G. HORNER, Pistis Sophia (London 1924). Studies. C. COLPE, et al., Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (3rd ed. Tübingen 1957–63) 2:1648–61. K. PRÜMM, et al., Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg, 1957–66) 4:1021–31. J. QUASTEN, Patrology (Westminster 1950) 1:254–277. J. DORESSE, The Secret Books of the Egyptian Gnostics, tr. P. MAIRET (New York 1960). R. M. GRANT, Gnosticism and Early Christianity (New York 1959). H. JONAS, The Gnostic Religion (2nd. ed. Boston 1963). R. M. WILSON, The Gnostic Problem (London 1958). W. C. VAN UNNIK, Newly Discovered Gnostic Writings (Studies in Biblical Theology 30; Naperville, Ill. 1960). H. CORNÉLIS and A. LÉONARD, La Gnose éternelle (Je sais, je crois 146; Paris 1959). H. A. WOLFSON, The Philosophy of the Church Fathers, v.1 (Cambridge, Mass. 1956) 495–574. F. L. SAGNARD, La Gnose valentinienne et le témoignage de saint Irénée (Paris 1947). G. G. SCHOLEM, Jewish Gnosticism, Merkabah Mysticism, and Talmudic Tradition (New York 1960). H. C. PUECH, “Gnosis and Time,” Man and Time: Papers from the Eranos Yearbooks (Bollingen Series 30, v. 3; New York 1957) 38–84. R. M. WILSON, “Some Recent Studies in Gnosticism,” New Testament Studies 6 (1959–60) 32–44. S. SCHULZ, “Die Bedeutung neuer Gnosisfunde für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft,” Theologische Rundschau 26 (1960) 209–226, 301–334.

[G. W. MACRAE]

GNOSTICISM, JEWISH

Under the influence of Hellenism certain Jews of the Greco-Roman period indulged in speculations that can rightly be called Gnostic, even though this Gnosticism had its own typically Jewish character. Its early manifestations can be seen in the esoteric traditions contained in the Jewish apocalyptic writings and in the DEAD SEA SCROLLS; its later development is evident in the mystical speculations of the rabbis of the Talmudic period and in the so-called merkābā mysticism; its climax is reached in the Book of YESIRAH and in the Gnostic elements of the Book of Bahir.

Jewish Hellenism and the Phenomenon of Gnosis.

After the 3rd century B.C., Judaism came in contact with Hellenism. The first result of this contact was the Septuagint, the Greek translation of the Bible made in Egypt. In the field of philosophy, Stoicism and Platonism had an especially strong influence on Judaism. The Platonic concept of God came the closest to the Jewish concept of a divine Creator supreme over all, while Stoicism allowed Judaism to identify the laws of the Torah (Mosaic Law) with the laws of the universe according to which nature is governed and man should live; God conceived the order that, as the natural law, is inherent in the world and, as the Torah, is binding for man. This idea, intimated as early as the middle of the 2nd century B.C. in the commentary on the Pentateuch by the Alexandrian Jew Aristobulus, was then further developed by PHILO JUDAEOUS. Following the speculation on wisdom in Prv 8.22–30 (see also Jb 28.27) according to which wisdom was created by God before the creation of the world as “the firstborn of His ways,” Jesus ben Sirach, at the beginning of the 2nd century B.C., equated this wisdom with the Torah (Sir 24.22–27). This led then in rabbinical speculation to the notion, already present in a similar form at the beginning of Philo’s De Opificio Mundi, that the Torah was the instrument used by God in creating the world (e.g., Pirke Avoth 3.14; Midrash Gen. rabba 1.2). Similar ideas were in the Manual of Discipline of the QUMRAN COMMUNITY (1QS) 3.15–17; 11.11 (see Schubert, Die Religion, 13–25).

Especially clear was the influence of Hellenism on the anthropology of Judaism. Ancient Israel, as the ancient Near East in general, did not yet have the concept that became current in Greek philosophy, of the soul as a vital principle existing independently of the body. The rabbis, however, were already familiar with the idea, as seen, for instance, in Sanh 91b (2nd Christian century): “Antoninus asked Rabbi, ‘When does the soul enter into man? At the time of conception or during the formation of the embryo?’ He answered, ‘During the formation of the embryo.’ But the other objected: ‘Without salt can any piece of meat be kept for three days without spoiling? It must be at the time of conception.’ Rabbi said that Antoninus had convinced him in this matter.” [See R. Meyer, Hellenistisches in der rabbinischen Anthropologie, Beiträge zur Wissenschaft vom Alten (und Neuen) Testament 4.22 (Stuttgart 1937).] Also in the field of art the influence of Hellenism was unmistakable. [See B. Kanael, Die Kunst der antiken Synagoge (Frankfurt am Main 1961).]

Motifs Common to Jewish and Non-Jewish Gnosticism. Jewish Hellenism had the following seven distinctive motifs of Gnostic thought, without, however, their having here the specific significance that they had for the pagan or Christian-pagan Gnosticism. (1) Aristobulus and Philo made a distinction between the all-high God outside the world and a divine power that produced the world; in Gnosticism there was a radical opposition between the all-high God and the power that created the world. (2) A distinction was made between body and soul whereby the body was judged the lower and the soul the higher; thus, e.g., in Midrash Lev. rabba 4.5 (end of the 2nd century B.C.): “Rabbi Hiyyah said . . . , ‘In the world to come soul and body will stand before the judgment seat. What then will the Holy One (glory be to Him!) do? He will leave the body aside and deal with the soul. Then the soul will say to Him, ‘Lord of the world, we both sinned together; why do You put the body aside and deal only with me?’ He will say to it, ‘The body is of the lower regions where sin is committed, but you come from the upper regions where no sin is committed before me. That is why I leave the body aside and deal with you.’” The idea, however, that the soul, in order to be free, must release itself from its confinement in the body, remained alien to the Jews. In clear opposition to this, Judaism developed the idea of the resurrection of the body. (3) Radically dualistic ideas appeared in the apocalyptic literature and the Dead Sea Scrolls. Here, however, in opposition to Gnosticism, dualism was eschatologically limited, whereas Gnosticism, instead of postulating an apocalyptic waiting, purported to show the way here and now to the transcendent realm of light. The dualism of Gnosticism was absolute and cosmic and, therefore, in many cases entailed the removal of moral teachings, whereas the dualism of the apocalyptic writings and the Dead Sea Scrolls was more relative and ethical and sought a strict compliance with the traditional law. (4) Gnosticism and apocalypticism had an equally negative attitude toward the concrete world; however, whereas the Gnostic wanted to flee from the world, the apocalyptic writer hoped for a glorified world, a “new” world. (5) Both Gnosticism and apocalypticism, especially in the Dead Sea Scrolls, entertained the notion of a hidden knowledge that was limited to a small group of the saved. In Gnosticism, however, this knowledge meant salvation itself or at least the way to salvation, whereas in the apocalyptic writings and the Dead Sea Scrolls salvation was the possession of the elect community exclusively. Here the emphasis lay less on knowledge or knowing in itself than on the idea of election. The knowledge proper to apocalypticism was the insight of those who belonged to the remnant of Israel. (6) Both apocalypticism and Gnosticism had a keen interest in angelology and cosmology. To be sure, Judaism, too, had the notion of fallen angels who seduced men and ensnared them in sin. But according to Judaism, their power was not absolute, and as they were created by God, they would be stripped of their power and destroyed at the end of time. (7) In individual Jewish texts, to be treated later more in detail, certain motifs appeared that were current in pagan Gnosticism, but they were regularly adapted in the Jewish texts to the presuppositions of Biblical monotheism.

It is impossible to determine here with certainty whether in these cases the Jewish texts were influenced by developed forms of pagan Gnosticism, or whether, on the contrary, the influence was in the direction from Jewish circles to Gnosticism, or whether it was merely a matter of parallel developments. In one basic case, however, that of the portrayal of man’s ascent to the vision of God’s throne, this motif, which later became important in Gnosticism, though in a form adapted to specifically Gnostic dualism, can be traced back in Judaism as far as the first half of the 2nd century B.C. (e.g., in Ethiopic Enoch 14). On the basis of this fact, much can be said for the statement of Scholem: "Initially, Jewish esoteric tradition absorbed Hellenistic elements similar to those we find in Hermetic writings. Such elements entered Jewish tradition before Christianity developed, or at any rate before Christian Gnosticism as a distinctive force came into being" (Jewish Gnosticism, 34).

Possible Development of Gnosticism under Jewish Influence. Several attempts have been made to regard Judaism as the source of Gnosticism as such, since this is first evidenced in the Syro-Palestinian and Anatolian area. But all these efforts, plausible though they may seem individually, are not entirely satisfactory. G. Quispel [Gnosis als Weltreligion (Zurich 1951); "Der gnostische Anthropos und jüdische Tradition," Eranos 22 (1953) 195–234; "Christliche Gnosis und jüdische Heterodoxie," Evangelische Theologie 14 (1954) 474–484] calls attention to Jewish anthropological speculations according to which the fall of Adam was conceived of as a falling from Paradise's realm of light into the world of birth and death. In this, however, he is relying heavily on rabbinical citations that are more recent than the Gnostic teachings that are supposed to depend on them. In these cases it is a matter of rabbinical HAGGADAH being influenced by Gnostic material rather than of Gnostic concepts being influenced by Jewish motifs. J. Doresse himself [Les Livres secrets des gnostiques d'Égypte (Paris 1958) 324–329] describes as merely hypothetical his theory according to which the Essene settlement of Qumran may probably be meant by the place name Gomorra in the so-called Holy Book of the Great Invisible Spirit that is found among the still unpublished Coptic texts of Chenoboskion. R. M. L. Wilson ["Simon, Dositheus and the Dead Sea Scrolls," Zeitschrift für Religions- und Geistesgeschichte 9 (1957) 21–30] and, following him, J. Daniélou [Théologie du Judéo-Christianisme v.1 (Tournai 1958) 82–85] see in the strange and much-discussed figure of DOSITHEUS OF SAMARIA the missing link between the Essene community of the Dead Sea Scrolls and later Gnosticism. Although the theory is certainly intriguing, the evidence, nevertheless, appears too weak to permit its being followed without reservation. The statement of the PSEUDOCLEMENTINE Homilies that SIMON MAGUS and Dositheus were disciples of John the Baptist does not bear an unqualified stamp of historic credibility [see T. Caldwell, "Dositheus Samaritanus," Kairos 4 (1962) 105–117]; moreover, the historical contact in ideas that no doubt existed between John the Baptist and the Dead Sea Scrolls should not be overrated. R. M. Grant [Gnosticism and Early Christianity (New York 1959) esp. 34–35, 41] is of the opinion that the collapse of the apocalyptic eschatological hopes in Judaism, especially after the destruction of the Temple in A.D. 70, had a stimulating effect on Jewish Gnosticism. Here, indeed, the psychological agreement between apocalypticism and Gnosticism in relation to the concrete world has been rightly perceived; but sufficient consideration has not been given to the fact that, although the year 70 is a landmark in the history of the Jews, such is not the case in the history of Gnosticism. The thesis, nevertheless, is supported further by the fact that between apocalypticism and the special phenomenon of Jewish Gnosticism there is an undeniable relationship. At any rate, the relationship of "Jewish" Gnosticism to the rest of the Gnosticism is much less clear than would be wished.

K. Rudolf [Die Mandaer v.1 (Göttingen 1960) 266] sees in the community of the Dead Sea Scrolls "a heretical Judaism already influenced by Gnostic trends." The Qumran people offer, according to Rudolf, "a valuable example for showing the existence of a syncretistic form of Judaism that lost essential roots of its own parentage and therefore gave in to other influences." However, one cannot speak of a heretical Judaism in these early times, because there was no normative "orthodox" Judaism until after A.D. 70. However, since the Essenes, about whose APOCALYPTIC character the Hellenizing Flavius JOSEPHUS is silent, went back to the movement of the HASIDAEANS or so-called early ḥāsīdīm (pious) more radical than the Maccabees, the Essenes were deeply rooted in the apocalyptic tradition of Judaism. They cannot therefore be taken as an example of a form of uprooted syncretistic Judaism. In spite of this, however, it is again admittedly difficult to overlook the fact that there is an intimate connection between the Dead Sea Scrolls and Jewish Gnosticism. Moreover, many ideas in the Dead Sea Scrolls go back to foreign influence also. All these theses attempt, therefore, to offer explanations for the state of the case that is not yet completely explainable concerning the relationship of Judaism to Gnosticism, and so it is well for the time being to treat Jewish Gnosticism as a phenomenon sui generis; only as such was it, in any case, of significance for the development of the later CABALA.

Esoteric Traditions in the Apocalyptic Writings and the Dead Sea Scrolls. In Dn 11.33, 35; 12.3 the members of the group behind the historico-apocalyptic parts of the Book of Daniel (most likely the Hasidaeans) are called maskilīm (the wise, the understanding ones), which is equivalent to saying that they were those who were initiated into the apocalyptic traditions of the community of the elect. In the ten-week apocalypse of Ethiopic Enoch, which, like the historico-apocalyptic parts of Daniel, was written about the time of the Maccabean revolt (168–164 B.C.) and likewise arose in a Hasidaean milieu, it is stated that, at the end of the period represented by the seventh week, “the just elect of the eternal plant of justice [cf. Is 60.21] will be chosen to receive the sevenfold instruction on the whole creation” (Enoch 93.10). The apocalyptic groups were, therefore, of the opinion that they were the guardians and preservers of esoteric traditions. Included among these traditions were speculations on the heavenly world, the related questions about the calendar, and detailed accounts of the fall of the angels and the destructive power of these fallen spirits. The Essenes of Qumran carried this esoteric character to the extreme. Flavius Josephus spoke of this in his well-known account of the Essenes (Bell. Jud. 2.8.7), and in the Manual of Discipline of Qumran [1QS (DSD) 4.5–6] it is said of the just: “They conduct themselves humbly with all prudence and with ability to conceal the true secrets of knowledge.” The word knowledge has a strongly Gnostic character in the Thanksgiving Psalms of Qumran. The Qumran psalmist, for instance, thanked God that He let him “know the mystery of His truth and understand His marvelous deeds” [1QH (DST) 11.4].

In connection with Ezechiel ch. 1 the motif of the ascent to God’s throne is found already in the older apocalyptic writings. The oldest piece in question, Enoch 14.8–25, which most likely was written in the first half of the 2nd century B.C. and knew only three heavens, in contrast to the later notion of seven, is composed as follows. After traversing the first two divisions of the heavens, the heavenly wanderer enters the third and highest heaven. “Its floor was like fire, its upper part was formed by lightning flashes and whirling stars, and its ceiling was blazing fire.” There stood the throne of God, on which the kābôd, the Splendor of God, was visible. “His raiment was more splendent than the sun and whiter than pure snow. None of the angels could enter this house and look upon His face because of the glory and majesty, nor could flesh behold Him. Blazing fire was all around Him, and none of the angels drew near Him.” A similar motif is found also in the Testament of Levi ch. 2–3 and in Enoch ch. 71. In the Dead Sea Scrolls that are so far known such description of an ascent to God’s throne, with God’s glory made visible, has not yet been found. But there is indirect testimony to it in the Manual of Discipline. There [1QS (DSD) 11.3–8] it is said that the initiated man “beholds a salvation that is hidden from the man of knowledge . . . a fountain of justice, a pool of strength, and a spring of glory” (ma’yan kābôd). The spring of glory is apparently the same as the glory of God revealed on the heavenly throne and surrounded by angels. This knowledge is exclusively the secret salutary possession of the elect, for “to those whom God chose from among the men of flesh He gave this knowledge as an eternal possession; He let them participate in the lot of the saints and united their community with the sons of heaven (i.e., the angels) to form the council of the assembly.” Possibly a certain angelic liturgy, which is supposed to be an early form of the later rabbinical merkābā visions, belongs in this context. See J. Strugnell, Vetus Testamentum Supplement 7 (1960) 318–345.

Mystical Speculation of the Rabbis. While the notions discussed in the preceding section reach back as far as the 2nd century B.C., the corresponding rabbinical traditions are known from the 1st Christian century on. Apart from individual, and in parts very obscure, data in the TALMUD and in the great midrashim (see MIDRASHIC LITERATURE), there are available a number of smaller tractates from rabbinical circles that are of inestimable value as references. (They are cited and briefly discussed by Scholem, Jewish Gnosticism, 5–7). It is advisable not to date the ideas contained in these tractates too recently. The oldest ones come probably from the tannaic or early amoraic period, i.e., from the 1st to the 3rd century (Scholem, Jewish Gnosticism, 40). These texts belong to the Gnosticizing circles of normative Judaism that was the successor of Pharisaism, while the apocalyptic writings and the Dead Sea Scrolls came from non-Pharisaic circles. Like the latter, the rabbinical Gnostics were pure monotheists who rejected the absolutely dualistic character of pagan Gnosticism. Even if these rabbinical Gnostics may have been able to form their own separate conventicles, they shared with the whole of Judaism the high esteem for the Mosaic Law and rejected every kind of antinomianism. In one of the rabbinical Gnostic tractates (Hekalot rabbati 20.1) it is expressly demanded of one who aspires to a vision of the divine throne-world that he should apply himself to the whole Bible, as well as the Mishnah and Midrash, and he should strictly observe all the commands and prohibitions of the Jewish law. Rabbinical tradition knew quite well how to distinguish such Gnostic teachings as were possible within the framework of official Judaism from those that would necessarily lead from it to general Gnostic dualism and antinomianism. The example of the great scholar of the 2nd century, Elisha ben Abuya, who, after his fall into dualism and antinomianism, was known only as Aher (another), shows this quite clearly. The fact, however, that Aher (according to Hagigah 14b), like other authorities who remained within the bounds of normative Judaism, entered “into paradise” and thereby became a sinner, proves how close to its pagan counterpart official rabbinical Gnosticism must have stood.

Speculations on the “Glory.” In the Mishnah Hagigah 2.1 it is stated: “One is not permitted to lecture to three on the laws of incest, to two on ma’āšê berê’sît (story of creation, i.e., esoteric speculations in connection with Genesis ch. 1), or to one on merkābā (chariot, i.e., esoteric speculations in connection with Ezekiel ch. 1), unless he is wise and knowing because of his own knowledge. For anyone who speculates on [the] four [following] things, it would have been better if he had never been born: what is above, what is below, what is ahead, and what is behind [cf. Eph 3.18]. For anyone who does not have the proper respect for the glory [kābôd] of his Creator, it would have been better if he had never been born.” Therefore, the special subject of rabbinical Gnosis pursued in the esoteric circles was again the kābôd, the “glory” of God. As is perfectly clear from a comparison of Tosephta Ḥagigah 2.1 with Ḥagigah 14b, the concepts of kābôd and ma‘asê merkābā (story of the chariot) could be used synonymously. Studies on kābôd or merkābā, therefore, were considered unusually dangerous and were thought possible only when extraordinary measures of prudence were employed. As in Enoch 14, so here again fire was a characteristic accompaniment of the sphere of the kābôd. Used synonymously with kābôd and merkābā was the term paradise, a concept that was already used in the oldest esoteric literature as a technical term for the heavenly paradise (Scholem, Jewish Gnosticism, 16–17, where reference is made to 2 Cor 12.2–4). According to Syriac Baruch ch. 51, the resurrected just ones dwell in the heights of the heavenly world and are like the angels and the stars. Also, “the expanse of paradise will be spread before them, and the beauty of the greatness of the living beings under the [divine] throne will be shown them” (51.11). What the just all together will come to know after the resurrection, the rabbinical Gnostic wished to attain in his own lifetime. Only in this sense can the well-known passage of the Tosephta, Ḥagigah 2.3–4 and Ḥagigah 14b be understood: “Four entered into paradise: Ben Aṣai, Ben Ṣoma, Aḥer, and Rabbi Akiba.” That this is concerned with nothing else than the notion of an ascent to the glory (kābôd) of God that appears on the heavenly throne surrounded by the heavenly living beings, follows from two definite indications. In the tractate Ḥagigah 15b it is stated in this connection: “Rabbi Akiba ascended in peace and in peace descended again”; and shortly after that it is said: “The ministering angels also wanted to drive even Rabbi Akiba out again. Then the Holy One (praised be He!) said, ‘Let this old man, who is worthy, enjoy my glory (kābôd).’”

Speculation on the Seven Heavens. The scanty information in the Talmud and Midrash is supplemented in a valuable manner by a few remnants of the rabbinical Gnostic literature that have been preserved. In the Hekalot rabbati ch. 15–23 the journeys of the Jewish Gnostics are extensively described as leading through the seven palaces that are in the seven heavens, in the seventh of which stands the throne of God. Just as in the non-Jewish absolutely dualistic Gnosticism the one ascending is hindered by the hostile rulers of the seven planetary spheres, so in monotheistic Judaism, the one ascending is restrained by the ministering angels who guard the gates to God, unless he can show seals inscribed with secret names. In Hekalot rabbati 15.1 it is stated: “According to Rabbi Yishmael, Rabbi Neḥunyah ben Hakanah said, ‘In the seven palaces lives Totrosiah, the Lord, the God of Israel, in room inside of room. At the entrance of each palace are eight gate keepers, four to the right of the threshold and four to the left.’” The further the Gnostic advances, the greater become the dangers that threaten him. The sixth and seventh palaces are especially dangerous. According to the Hekalot sutrati, the dangers at the gate of the sixth palace consist in the fact that the shimmering marble stones there are mistakenly taken for water (Scholem, Jewish Gnosticism, 14–15). That a well-known motif from as early as the 2nd century is involved here is clear from Ḥagigah 14b: “Rabbi Akiba said to them, ‘When you come to the stones of pure marble, do not say, ‘Water, water!’ For he who tells lies has no standing in my eyes.’” However, in Hekalot rabbati 23.4 it is said of him who passes the dangers that he “enters and stands before the throne of His glory (kābôd).” Another dangerous moment in the ascent to kābôd of God is the fire of the merkābā sphere. In Hekalot rabbati 3.4 it is said: “The fire that issues from the man who looks down burns him and consumes him.” This fiery characteristic is especially stressed in Hebrew Enoch, which is evidently somewhat more recent than the Hekalot sutrati and the Hekalot rabbati, since it comes from the 5th or 6th century (Scholem, Jewish Gnosticism, 7): “Rabbi Yishmael said, ‘Metatron, the prince of the [divine] presence, said to me, ‘When I was taken from the sons of the Deluge generation, I was brought up to the highest heaven on the pinions of the breath of the SHEKINAH. I was allowed to enter the great palaces that are in the heights of the arabot heaven [arabot being, according to Ḥagigah 12b, the seventh heaven], where there were the throne of glory [kābôd], the Shekinah, and the merkābā, the hosts of fire, the flaming armies, the blazing sparks, the fiery Cherubim, the glowing Ophanim [angelic “wheels”], the flaming ministering angels, the flashing lightnings, and the Seraphim. There I was placed, to serve day by day before the throne of glory [kābôd].’ [A. Jelinek, Bet ha-Midrash 2nd ed. (Jerusalem 1938) 173–174].

The connection between the rabbinical Gnostic speculations on the ascent to the kābôd-merkābā sphere and the old apocalyptic writings is becoming clear through the eschatological significance of the kābôd-merkābā vision. In Hekalot rabbati 16.5 it is said: “When will he descend who descends to the merkābā? When will he see the heavenly Majesty? When will he hear the last day of redemption? When will he see what no eye has yet seen?"

Gnosticism in the Book of Yeşirah. The book of Yeşirah (creation), c. A.D. 500, is, in spite of its short length, one of the most difficult works of all Jewish literature to understand. It shows strong late-Hellenistic and Gnostic influence. It is based on a magical picture of the world. In the view of its author, the numbers and letters, as well as their combinations into different words, have creative power. The abstract figures are considered as metaphysical principles of the universe and stages of creation. In the Yeşirah they are called Sefirot, a term that later in the Cabala signified the stages of the divine creative development. The creative letters are called 'ôtiyôti yesôd (element letters), that is, letters of the alphabet that represent the elements and correspond, therefore, to the Hellenistic-Gnostic idea of στοιχεῖα, which can mean also elemental spirits and constellations, as well as elements (cf. Gal 4.3; Col 2.8, 20). God achieved the work of creation with the help of 32 hidden ways of divine wisdom, 10 Sefirot and the 22 letters of the Hebrew alphabet. The latter were subdivided into three "mothers" (aleph, mem, and shin), seven letters with double pronunciations (the six begathkephat letters and rêš), and 12 simple letters. It is said of them in Yeşirah 2.2: "He engraved, fashioned, purified, evaluated, and exchanged the 22 letters, and He formed with them the entire creation and whatever else was to be created." The idea behind this is evidently ideal creation through ideal and abstractly conceived Sefirot (Sefirot be'limâ, of abstraction) and real creation through the combination of the letters as elements of speech.

Although the Sefirot doctrine includes no logically developed theory of emanation, yet for the first four Sefirot the emanation of one out of the other is expressly affirmed. The first Sefirah is the "breath [spirit] of the living God," the second is "the breath of the breath" and is considered the principle of the air, which results from the condensation of the "breath of the living God." To it correspond the 22 letters of the alphabet. The third Sefirah, the principle of water, proceeds from the air. Here is the place of cosmic chaos. The fourth Sefirah, the principle of fire, proceeds from the water. Here is the world of God's throne that is described in Ezechiel ch. 1; the fourth Sefirah corresponds, therefore, to the merkâbâ sphere. Particularly the three "mother" letters correspond to the functions of the second, third, and fourth Sefirot. The points of correspondence are aleph for 'âwîr (air), mem for mayim (water), and šin for 'êš (fire). The remaining six Sefirot correspond to the six directions of space (up, down, east, west, south, and north). To the six spatial dimensions correspond six of the seven letters with double pronunciations, while the seventh, the "Place of the Sanctuary," contains them all. The ten Sefirot are not Neoplatonic stages of emanation, but rather dynamic powers that, even where explicit mention is made of an emanation process, are united with each other, despite the distinction into stages, to form a single unit. In Yeşirah 1.7 it is said of them: "Their end lies in their beginning, and their beginning in their end, just as the flame is united to the coal." In all of them the one God is operating.

Combined in different ways, the letters, which are all consonants, can give opposite meanings, e.g., ' n g can be either 'onēg (pleasure) or nega' (plague). To the three "mother" letters of air, water, and fire correspond, in the universe, heaven (fire), earth (water), and air, which lies in between. Likewise in correspondence to them are summer (fire), winter (water), and the temperate seasons (air), as well as the head (fire), the stomach (water), and the trunk of the body (air). The seven letters with double pronunciations give occasion for the Yeşirah to develop the doctrine of the opposing pairs, which is already evidenced in the dualistic doctrine of the Manual of Discipline (1QS) of Qumran and Hagigah 15a. In Yeşirah 4.1 (4.3) it is said: "Doubles that complement each other: the complement of life is death, the complement of peace is evil, the complement of wisdom is stupidity, the complement of riches is poverty, the complement of attractiveness is ugliness, the complement of sowing is destruction, and the complement of lordship is servility." To the seven letters with double pronunciations correspond also the seven planets, the seven days of the week, and the seven organs of sense (two eyes, two ears, two nostrils, and one mouth). The 12 simple letters, too, have their equivalents in the cosmos, in time, and in man.

Certain traditions, as they are developed in the Yeşirah, are evidenced as early as the time of the Talmud (3rd to 4th centuries), e.g., in Sanhedrin 65b, 67b. They are connected with the Golem doctrine, that is, with the notion according to which living creatures can be produced from lifeless matter by the proper recitation of the creative letter combinations. See G. Scholem, "Die Vorstellung vom Golem in ihren tellurischen und magischen Beziehungen," Zur Kabbala und ihrer Symbolik (Zürich 1960) 209–259.

Gnosticism in the Book of Bahir. In the early cabalistic book of Bahir are contained elements of an otherwise forgotten Jewish Gnosticism. While in the Hekalot tractates the Gnostic doctrine of Pleroma (fullness) was modified into the realm of the "Throne of Glory" and the doctrines of the AEONS, in connection with Ezechiel ch. 1, into the "merkâbâ world," in the Bahir the originally Gnostic terminology is found extensively. The Greek word πλήρωμα (Pleroma, fullness) is rendered in Hebrew either literally as hammālē (the fullness) or as hakkōl (the entirety, all). In Bahir ch. 14 “all” is equated with the cosmic tree from which the spirits proceed, and in Bahir ch. 85 it is written: “And what is this tree? He said to him, ‘All the powers of the Holy One (blessed be He!) lie one above the other and resemble a tree. As this tree brings forth its fruit by means of water, so the Holy One (blessed be He!) increases the strength of the tree with water. And what is the water of the Holy One (blessed be He!)? That is wisdom.’” In contrast to the idea of the Pleroma, there is no exact Hebrew equivalent for the concept of the Gnostic Aeons, the powers of the Pleroma, even though the Aeon doctrine is distinctly and extensively evidenced in the Bahir. Instead of the term Aeon, a number of symbolic designations are used. The Sephirot of the Book of Yeṣirah are the Aeon for the Bahir. Although the term Sephirot itself is found only in Bahir ch. 87, it is presumed as something well known. The ten fingers on the hand are “indications of the ten Sephirot with which heaven and earth are sealed.” These ten Sephirot correspond also to the ten commandments, which include the 613 commandments. The Bahir is acquainted with the ten Aeons. Like the older rabbinical Gnostic texts, the Bahir rejects all absolute dualism. Evil comes from the left side of God. Out of these assumptions the later Cabala developed the concept of sitrā aḥera “the other side” of God, a concept that became decisive for its image of the world.

Bibliography: L. BAECK, “Zum Sepher Jezira,” Monatsschrift für Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judentums 70 (1926) 371–376; “Die zehn Sephirot im Sepher Jezira,” ibid. 78 (1934) 448–455. M. FRIEDLÄNDER, Der vorchristliche jüdische Gnosticismus (Göttingen 1898). L. GOLDSCHMIDT, Das Buch der Schöpfung (Frankfurt am Main 1894). G. G. SCHOLEM, Das Buch Bahir (Leipzig 1923); Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (3rd ed. New York 1954); Jewish Gnosticism, Merkabah Mysticism, and Talmudic Tradition (New York 1960); Ursprung und Anfänge der Kabbala (Berlin 1962). K. SCHUBERT, Die Religion des nachbiblischen Judentums (Vienna 1955); “Problem und Wesen der jüdischen Gnosis,” Kairos 3 (1961) 2–15; J. HÖFER and K. RAHNER Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, (Freiburg, 1957–66) 4:1024–26. J. MAIER, Vom Kultur zur Gnosis (Salzburg 1964).

[K. SCHUBERT]

GOA

A former Portuguese enclave on the west coast of India, a metropolitan see since 1558. Captured by Afonso de Albuquerque from the Muslims of Bijapur on Nov. 25, 1510, Goa was once the capital of Portuguese India and of the entire Portuguese empire in the East. In 1759 cholera epidemics forced the removal of the capital five miles west to Pangim (New Goa), and Old Goa became a city of ruins. With the rise of the Dutch and English as maritime powers in the late 17th century, Goa declined. It was annexed by India on Dec. 18, 1961, and attained full statehood within India in 1987.

Fresco painting, depicting a male saint holding a sword, Goa, India. (© Paul Seheult: Eye Ubiquitous/Corbis/Bettmann)

Beginnings. After Vasco da Gama’s arrival in India in 1498, Portugal began to acquire small coastal areas (Goa in 1510 and Daman [Damão] in 1559) to create Portuguese India. Until 1514 the area was ecclesiastically under vicars-general of the Order of Christ, which was entrusted with the overseas Church. In 1514 it came under the newly created diocese for overseas lands, Funchal on Madeira Island, whose bishop resided in Lisbon. Pope Clement VII erected the Latin See of Goa on Jan. 31, 1533. In 1534 Goa was made a suffragan see to Funchal with territory reaching from the Cape of Good Hope to the Moluccas. On Feb. 4, 1558, Pope Paul IV detached Goa from the province of Lisbon and raised it to a metropolitan archdiocese, having as suffragans the dioceses of Cochin and Malacca (Melaka). On March 15, 1572, Pope Gregory XIII acknowledged the archbishop of Goa as the Primate of the East. As Goa grew in prestige, other suffragans were added: Macau (1576), the short-lived Funai in Japan (1588), the former Syro-Malabar Metropolitan See of Angamaly (1600), and Mylapore (1606). In 1612 the prelate of Mozambique was attached to Goa. In 1690

the newly created sees of Peking (Beijing) and Nanking (Nanjing) in China were made suffragan to Goa, which with its suffragans came under the Portuguese padroado (see PATRONATO REAL). Provincial Councils of Goa have established ecclesiastical discipline for Catholics in the East (1567, 1575, 1585, 1592, 1606, and 1894). The Inquisition was established in Goa in 1560 and operated until its suppression in 1812.

Goan (Indo-Portuguese) Schism. The apostolic vicariates established by the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith from 1637 conflicted with the padroado jurisdiction of Goa. In Bombay, which Portugal had earlier ceded to England in 1661, this conflict became particularly acute and resulted in the Goan Schism of 1838. The immediate cause of the schism was Pope Gregory XVI's decision in the papal bull Multa praeclare (April 24, 1838) which withdrew Cochin, Cranganore, and Mylapore (all of which were British colonial territories) from the jurisdiction of Goa and assigned them to vicars apostolic under the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. Subsequent interpretation and enactments further restricted Goa's jurisdiction to the Portuguese territory. The bull was rejected as spurious or surreptitious by the padroado clergy in these three suffragan sees who were loyal to the archbishop of Goa. They had argued that even the Holy See could not legislate thus without the consent of the king of Portugal, as was stated in original earlier bulls.

The resistance that ensued in Bombay and elsewhere in India was called the Goan (or Indo-Portuguese) Schism by many historians; and the term "schism" appears frequently in papal pronouncements, which, however, do not call the Goans schismatic (except four priests in Bombay), only "openly disobedient." The padroadists consistently rejected the label "schism," arguing that the vicars misinformed the Holy See and that they were only defending their canonical and natural rights. The basic difficulty was the inability of the Portuguese crown and the Holy See to communicate with each other, let alone negotiate an acceptable solution to the crisis. The Concordat of 1857 brought some peace, but opposition continued until 1862. The Concordat of 1886 restored jurisdiction over Cochin and Mylapore and added a new suffragan, Daman (Damão). On Jan. 23, 1886, Pope Leo XIII invested the archbishop of Goa with the title of Patriarch of East Indies. After the diocese of Daman (Damão) was merged with Goa in 1928, the reconstituted See became known as the archdiocese of Goa and Daman (Damão).

Delinkings and Restructurings. The 20th century witnessed further delinkings of suffragan sees from Goa. Mozambique was detached in 1940. In the wake of India achieving its independence in 1957, it became increasingly untenable for suffragan sees to remain under the jurisdiction of a past colonial power. Therefore, Cochin and Mylapore were separated in 1950, and the vicariates general of the Ghats (covering Belgaum, Sindhudurg, Ratnagiri and Sangli) and of Canara were separated in 1953. The Indian annexure of Goa and its dependencies of Daman (Damão) and Diu resulted in the collapse of the last vestiges of the padroado system in India. In 1962, the last Portuguese patriarch-archbishop of Goa and Daman, Jose Vieira Alvernaz, resigned and returned to Portugal. On Jan. 1, 1976, the Holy See restructured the archdiocese of Goa and Daman as an archdiocese immediately subject to the Holy See.

Historical Churches. The Chapel of St. Catherine (1512–31) was the first of many religious edifices in Old Goa. In Bom Jesus Church (1594–1605), a minor basilica in 1946, are the relics of the Jesuit St. Francis Xavier. The churches of St. Francis of Assisi (1517–21, rebuilt in 1661) and St. Cajetan's (1651, once Theatine) are noteworthy. The Augustinian convent of St. Monica (1606) and the Jesuit College of St. Paul, taken over from the Franciscan College of Santa Fé in 1542 and made the headquarters of Jesuit missions in the East, are in ruins.

Bibliography: For bibliography, see INDIA, CHRISTIANITY IN.

[J. WICKI/K. PATHIL]

GOAR, JACQUES

Historian of Eastern liturgies; b. Paris, 1601; d. Sept. 23, 1653. He joined the Dominican Order in 1619. As prior of Chios in Greece, he studied the Greek liturgy for nine years. In 1637 he was prior of St. Sixtus in Rome and in 1642 at Paris. Of his many works on the Greek rite, his greatest was Euchologium seu Rituale Graecorum (Paris 1647), which has not yet been superseded. It reproduces the original texts and provides a Latin translation and valuable notes.

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum 2:574–575. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae 3:121. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie 6.1:1368–74. A. STRITTMATER, "The Barberinum S. Marci of J. Goar," Ephemerides liturgicae 47 (1933) 329–367. R. COULON, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 6.2:1467–69.

[J. H. MILLER]

GOAR OF TRIER, ST.

Priest and hermit; d. c. 575. The Vita Goaris, written probably by a monk of PRÜM in the eighth century, states that the saint came from Aquitaine in the days of Childbert I (d. 558), king of the Franks; and with the permission of the bishop of TRIER (Fibicius or Felicius), he built a chapel and hermitage along the Rhine near Oberwesel. Reports of Goar's hospitality allegedly aroused the suspicions of a later bishop of Trier named Rusticus, who decided to put the hermit to the test. Summoned to Trier, Goar was ordered by the bishop to command a three-day-old foundling to name its father and mother, but the test proved to be the undoing of Rusticus, who was named as the infant's father. The problems of fitting the persons named in the vita into a chronologically accurate account have given rise to conflicting opinions on the dates of Goar, for some place him in the sixth century while others put him as late as the eighth century. The difficulties are compounded by Wandelbert's reworking of the vita in 839, but in spite of these uncertainties, the local cult of Goar, venerated as the patron of innkeepers, is one of long standing.

Feast: July 6; July 9 (Diocese of Limburg); July 24 (Diocese of Trier).

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina ed. J. P. MIGNE 71:639–654. Acta Sanctorum July 2:327–346. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum 4:411–423. A. SCHÜTTE, Handbuch der deutschen Heiligen (Cologne 1941) 145. E. EWIG, Trier im Merowingerreich (Trier 1954) 88. M. COENS, "Un Martyrologe de Saint-Géréon de Cologne" Analecta Bollandiana 79 (1961) 78; "Coloniensia" ibid. 80 (1962) 152, 159, 162. J. DUBOIS, "Le Martyrologe de Wandelbert" ibid. 79 (1961) 288. R. GAZEAU, Catholicisme 5:75. F. PAULY, "Der heilige Goar und Bischof Rustikus" Trierer Theologische Zeitschrift 70 (1961) 47–54. H. E. STIENE, Wandalbert von Prüm, Vita et miracula Sancti Goaris (Frankfurt am Main 1981).

[H. DRESSLER]

GOBAT, GEORGE

Jesuit moral theologian; b. Charmoille, France, July 1, 1600; d. Constance, Germany, March 23, 1679. Gobat entered the Society of Jesus on June 1, 1618, and was ordained in Eichstadt in 1629. He taught humanities and sacred sciences at Fribourg (1631–41) and moral theology at Munich (1641–44), at Ratisbon (1651–54), and finally at Constance (1656–60). Appointments as rector at Halle (1647–51) and at Fribourg (1654–56) interrupted his career as professor of moral theology. During his last period of teaching at Constance, he was made penitentiary at the cathedral at Constance. In addition to various other writings, Gobat published a number of works on moral topics. He answered the attack upon the Jesuits' use of probabilism contained in Pascal's Provinciales with Clypeus clementium iudicum (1659). At the end of his teaching career he began a series of casuist studies on the Sacraments and the vows; these appeared between 1659 and 1672 under the title Alphabetum. Some of these he revised and republished together in Experientiae theologicae sive experimentalis theologia (1669). Still later, in the year of his death, these reappeared in Opera moralia (v. 1, 1679) and in the second and third volumes, published posthumously (1681). His writings reflect vast experience in the confessional and in the classroom, where he taught candidates for the priesthood who, for want of money or talent, could not go on to the universities. Pedagogical techniques acquired through teaching supplied the format he used in his books in which he presented first the conscience problem and then the general theory and principles by which it was to be solved. Although he based his opinions on solid authority, his cases, enriched by profound knowledge of local customs, were criticized as unsuitable for theological writing; and some of his solutions, based upon principles of probabilism, were judged too lenient. Accordingly, on March 2, 1679, three weeks before his death, Innocent XI condemned several of his doctrines. More than two decades later, when a Douai firm republished Opera moralia (1700–01), Bp. Guy de Sève de Rochechouart of Arras censured 32 of its propositions (1703) and thereby sparked adversaries to further attacks on the moral teaching of the Jesuits. Springing to their defense, and that of Gobat among others, Gabriel Daniel, SJ, published Apologie pour la doctrine des Jésuites at Liège (1703). Specifically in defense of Gobat, Christopher Rassler, SJ, wrote Vindiciae Gobatiana at Ingolstadt (1706). Despite the dispute, Opera moralia appeared afterward in Venice (1716) and again for the last time in the same city (1744).

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932 v. 12, supplement 1960) 3:1505–12; 9:417. W. KRATZ, Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 39 (1915) 649–674. P. MECH, in Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET (Paris 1947–) 5:76. R. HOFMANN, in Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1032–33. P. BERNARD, in Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 6.2:1469–70.

[J. D. MORRISSY]

GOBEL, JEAN BAPTISTE JOSEPH

Constitutional bishop of Paris; b. Thann, Alsace, Sept. 1, 1727; d. Paris, April 26, 1794. He became a canon in Moutiers-Grand-Val in 1741, studied at the German College in Rome, gained a doctorate in theology, and was ordained. In 1755 he was made a canon in Basel and vicar-general of the diocese and, in 1772, coadjutor for Alsace to the bishop of Basel. His ambition led him to scheme for the detachment from the Diocese of Basel of that section of Alsace that was under its jurisdiction, and for the creation of Colmar as a diocese with himself as bishop. In recompense for these efforts, the French government gave him a pension of 8,000 livres. He was a deputy to the Estates-General (1789). In the Constituent Assembly he tried vainly to conciliate the three orders and to have the Assembly reach an agreement with the Holy See before instituting religious reforms. Once the CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY became law, Gobel supported it, took the oath to uphold it (Jan. 3, 1791), and was elected metropolitan bishop of the Seine, whose seat was in Paris. He was enthroned in Paris at Notre-Dame (March 27, 1791) and became vice president of the Jacobins. His efforts in starting an uprising in the principality of Basel against its prince bishop, resulting in its union to France, caused him to be sent there by the National Convention as commissioner when a republic was proclaimed at Porrentruy. He was too lacking in firmness to resist the attempt at dechristianizing France under the Terror. After displaying his weakness by disregarding the protests of several other constitutional bishops and giving a cure of souls to a married priest (May 1793), he abdicated his priesthood to the tribune of the Convention (Nov. 7, 1793). Along with the Hébertists he was handed over to the Revolutionary Tribunal by Robespierre (April 13, 1794) and was condemned to death. While in prison, Gobel was reconciled to the Church just before his decapitation. He died courageously, crying: “Vive Jésus-Christ.”

Bibliography: P. PISANI, Répertoire biographique de l'épiscopat constitutionnel, 1791–1802 (Paris 1907); L'Église de Paris et la Révolution, 4 v. (Paris 1908–11) v.1–2. G. GAUTHEROT, Gobel, évêque métropolitain constitutionnel de Paris (Paris 1911).

[J. LEFLON]

GOD, ARTICLES ON

The principal theological articles are GOD (which treats of the one God as He is considered in revelation and in Christian tradition) and TRINITY, HOLY (for subsidiary and related articles, see TRINITY, HOLY, ARTICLES ON). The principal philosophical article is GOD IN PHILOSOPHY (the place, existence, and nature of God in philosophy); see also GOD, PROOFS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF and GOD IN PAGAN THOUGHT. There are articles on the divine attributes (e.g., OMNIPOTENCE; OMNISCIENCE; INEFFABILITY OF GOD) and the divine operations (e.g., WILL OF GOD, PROVIDENCE OF GOD [IN THE BIBLE]; PROVIDENCE OF GOD [THEOLOGY OF]; PREDESTINATION [IN CATHOLIC THEOLOGY]). The main articles on Jesus Christ are JESUS CHRIST (IN THE BIBLE) and JESUS CHRIST (IN THEOLOGY). For articles subsidiary to or related to these, see JESUS CHRIST, ARTICLES ON.

[G. F. LANAVE]

GOD

The Supreme Being, Pure Act, First Cause of all, provident conservator and governor of the universe; the Absolute—infinite, eternal, immutable, intelligent, omniscient, all-powerful, and free; the Creator, to whom creatures owe homage, respect, and obedience; the Sovereign Good, diffusive of all goodness, toward which everything tends as to its ultimate final cause; the supernatural source of revelation; the Godhead composed of three Divine Persons in one divine nature—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. This article treats of God in revelation and in the Christian tradition. Christian philosophical reflection on God is described here as flowing from the Christian tradition; for a fuller treatment of the place, existence, and nature of God in philosophy see GOD, PROOFS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF.

1. In Revelation

The Christian Scriptures present for us the God of revelation, the God who makes himself known and gives himself to mankind through his words and deeds. The content of this revelation is nothing other than the personal self-disclosure of God himself, calling forth a corresponding self-giving to God from those with ears to hear it. God's self-communication invites and requires a response of covenant and communion. Yet God's unveiling of himself as love and mercy in the Scriptural narrative never occurs at the loss of God's fundamental mysteriousness and incomprehensibility; the God revealed is the present but hidden God. In this way the God who speaks and acts in creation and history is both one who humbles and accommodates himself for his people, and also one who in that self-revelation remains beyond man's power to categorize and control. Divine self-disclosure never reduces God to man's disposal. In freely revealing himself God remains free; in being present in the midst of his people and acting on their behalf God remains transcendent. The corresponding anthropological truth is that every glimpse of the glory of God and every taste of the divine sweetness inspires within the human person an ever-increasing desire to behold God's beauty and savor his mystery. Revelation therefore also reveals man to be made for the God who exceeds him. Though the human mind and heart are created with a dynamic capacity for self-transcendence, only the self-disclosure and gift of the ever-mysterious God can fulfill their deepest aspirations.

The very notion of revelation implies some fundamental truths about God not generally found in pagan religious myths: that God has an ongoing concern for creation and a special regard for man, that he wishes to be known and loved, that he takes the initiative and is active in developing this relationship, and that this relationship has a crucial moral dimension. It also presupposes certain premises not generally accepted in the modern view of the notion of revelation: that it is ultimately God, not man, who is the author of the human words and historical deeds attributed to him in the Scriptures, that man cannot have sufficient knowledge of either God or the meaning of human existence simply on the basis of reason's grasp of the natural world, and that the primary concern of human life ought to be coming to know and be known by this God who discloses his mystery in revelation (cf. Jer 32:34; 1 Cor 8:3, 13:12). The reduction of God to simply an idea to be understood, especially when it assumes that one can truly know God apart from a wholehearted response to him, is completely antithetical to the nature and purpose of the revelation in both the Old and New Testaments.

OLD TESTAMENT

Basis for a Theology of God. The God of the Old Testament is primarily and always Yahweh, the God of Israel (Ex 5:1, Is 45:15). The revelation and understanding of God contained therein is thus inseparable from the history of that people, rooted in the covenantal relationship between the Lord God and the people he has chosen to be his own. Its historical and covenantal character means that God reveals himself gradually in the ongoing encounter with his people, through a series of divine manifestations and actions on their behalf that in turn also shape and define the people's identity. Since the medium includes a history of events, Israel's understanding of God is expressed, as one might expect, in functional terms, in contrast to the essentialist approach (i.e., divine being or nature) of Greek philosophy. Likewise, Israel's knowledge of God grows and deepens as the history of God's actions unfolds. This progression is organic and, significantly, never requires rectification or refutation of earlier theological affirmations. In general, biblical understanding of God develops from a more immediate understanding of God as the Lord of the nation of Israel and active in its history to include a more universal understanding of God as the Lord of all creation and beyond all history.

Biblical language is well suited to express the dynamic character of God and the intensity of his love for Israel, and hence is often unabashedly anthropomorphic—e.g., God is said to have eyes (Am 9:4) and see (Gn 1:4), ears (Ez 8:18) and hear (Nm 11:18), a mouth (Jer 9:12) and speak (Gn 1:3), etc. There are even striking anthropomorphisms—e.g., “I the Lord your God am a jealous God” (Ex 20:5; Dt 4:24; Zec 8:2), and, “the Lord was sorry that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him to his heart” (Gn 6:6; Jon 3:10). Yet any tendency to take this simple and direct way of speaking about God as literal descriptions is countered by the commandment forbidding all images and representations of him (Ex 20:4), and the recognition that God's ways and thoughts are as high above human ways and thoughts as the sky is above the earth (Is 55:8-9; cf. Hos 11:9). Biblical language never intends to reduce God to human characteristics but simply to make God accessible to human beings, even to those with the simplicity of children (Mt 11:25). The concreteness and immediacy of its style demonstrate that God is the personal and living God who is known through his interactions with the people dear to him.

God of the Covenant. Promise to Abraham. The history of the people of God begins with Abraham and his call by God to walk in his presence and be blameless (Gn 17:1). From the beginning God reveals himself as a God of blessing, promise and covenant. The blessings are concrete—land and posterity—and reflect the major concerns of a semi-nomadic people and God's intimate involvement in the lives and fortunes of the patriarchs. In promising a son to an elderly Abraham and a sterile Sarah, God demands trust that there is nothing “too difficult for him to do” (Gn 18:14). Then in testing Abraham to sacrifice this son, God demands an obedience which withholds nothing from him (Gn 22). God demonstrates his freedom and the primacy of his election in favoring Jacob (Israel) over Esau (Gn 25:21–23; cf. Mal 1:2–3 & Rom 9:10–13), and Joseph over his brothers. The story of Joseph (Gn 37–50) exhibits how God's providential foresight brings Joseph through the many betrayals of his life to saving stewardship in time of famine (Gn 45:5–8, 50:20). These early stories of God's presence and activity in the lives of their ancestors provide the foundation for the theology of Israel. Appropriately, Israel will continue to know their God as the “God of your ancestors, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob” (Ex 3:15, 4:5), reflecting the tribal character of their faith and that even across the generations their God is one and the same. Addressing God this way reminds them that their own history is a fulfillment of the promises God made to their ancestors, inspiring a confident assurance that God will in turn be true to all his future promises.

These early narratives in some ways borrow, and in many ways transcend, the diverse understandings of deity found in the ancient near East. Abraham's ancestors worshipped many gods (Jos 24:3), and God's call to him to leave the land of his fathers (Gn 12:1) is also a call to faith in the one God. The patriarchs used common words and ancient titles for God (cf. Ex 6:3), such as El (likely from the Semitic for “strength”), the father of the gods and lord of heaven in Ugaritic and Canaanite religions. This name was readily combined with various modifiers: El Elyon – “God most high” (Gn 14:18–19), El Shaddai – “God almighty” / “God of the mountains” (Gn 17:1), El Ro’i – “God of seeing” (Gn 16:13), and El Olam – “the everlasting God” (Gn 21:33). Early Israel continued to use these ancient names because they invoke divine greatness and transcendence. However, what was not appropriated from the surrounding religions were the ideas that God was head of a pantheon of other gods, had a consort or equal, or could be identified with some element or force of nature. Again in contrast to the norm in ancient religions and cosmogonies, never is there an attempt to explain God’s origins, or any suggestion that there are powers that threaten him. God is one and supreme, and Abraham’s faith was monotheistic at least in the tribal and personal sense: if the existence of the gods worshipped by other peoples was never explicitly denied, nonetheless they have no meaning or value to those whose only Lord is the God almighty. Even the word Elohim, used more than 2,500 times in the texts to indicate not only “God” and “the God” specifically, but also “a god” and the “gods” generically (e.g., Ex 20:3), need not imply any genuine form of polytheism. When used to refer to the God of Israel’s faith (Gn 1:1) the plural Elohim always takes a singular verb, indicating that, like the royal we, the plural of excellence, not number, is meant. “To you it was shown, that you might know that the Lord is God (Elohim); there is no other besides him (Dt 4:35).

Yahweh. The most definitive event of Israel’s history, the exodus from Egypt, and the revelation of the most prominent name for God in the Hebrew Scriptures coincide. Yahweh (scholarship has proven “Jehovah” to be a mispronunciation) is revealed to Moses in the great theophany of the burning bush (Ex 3–4), and thus in the context of God’s solicitous regard for his people enslaved in Egypt. Yahweh occurs over 6,700 times and appears in almost every book of the Old Testament. Unlike other names of ancient deities, like “Baal” (possessor) or “Adon” (master), “Yahweh” is not also a title or derived from one; it is only a name, and unlike a title, cannot be transferred to another. Etymologically related to hwh (“hayah”), the Hebrew verb “to be,” Exodus 3:14 renders the name as “I am who am,” and more simply as “I am.” The meaning is mysterious as well as manifold, depending upon the sense given the verb. Indicatively, Yahweh means “He who is,” a meaning which later Christian theology will find particularly significant when it engages Greek philosophy. But the verb can also be taken in the causative sense (which conforms more closely with the Hebrew understanding of God as active Creator), in which case Yahweh can mean: “I cause to be what ever comes to be.” The richness of the name allows even a third possibility: “I will be there as who I am (will I be there).” This meaning fits closely with the context in which it appears—that is, with God telling Moses his intentions to deliver Israel from slavery and to be with Moses as he contends with Pharaoh and leads the people. Every sense, however, suggests that God is unique and incomparable, and therefore his very name is beyond comprehension. In their great reverence for God, and the Semitic mentality that the name itself is identical to the reality named, the Israelites avoided pronouncing the name Yahweh. Their substitution for the name, Adonai, meaning Lord, expresses the power and reign of Yahweh over all things, as well as the claim he has on his people. At the same time, the substitution respected the ineffability of God’s name and mystery, while avoiding the risk of taking the name in vain (Ex 20:7).

Moses and the Israelites quickly learn that Yahweh is the God who does great deeds on their behalf. Initially, God’s acts include the deliverance from slavery in Egypt, the giving of the law and covenant on Mt. Sinai, leading Israel into the promised land, and granting victory or defeat in Israel’s battles. Through these deeds Israel comes to understand God to be in their midst (Ex 40:34–38), demonstrating his supreme greatness and power (Dt 4:32–40), acting for their good (Dt 5:33, 8:2–10), fulfilling his promises to their forefathers (Dt 5:37, 9:5), and expressing his choice for them as a people for his own possession (Dt 7:6–8). These saving deeds become the foundation for the covenant, not only in the sense that God plagues Egypt because of Pharaoh’s refusal to let Israel go and worship God on Mt. Sinai (Ex 7:16, 8:25–28), but also in that the favor God shows to Israel in these wondrous deeds serves as the basis for the covenantal obligations God expects from them (Dt 6:21–25, 11:1ff.). “I am the Lord your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, to be your God: I am the Lord your God” (Nm 15:41). As acts expressive of his gracious favor, they invite Israel to respond with likeminded love and loyalty. As acts expressive of his power, they give Israel reason to revere and fear him, and to believe that there is no other god like him. God’s merciful goodness is reason to pay him heed, as is evident in the great and intimate theophany given to Moses upon Mt. Sinai during the making of the covenant: “The Lord, the Lord, a God merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and abounding in steadfast love and faithfulness, keeping steadfast love for the thousandth generation, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin, yet by no means clearing the guilty, but visiting the iniquity of the parents upon the children and the children’s children, to the third and fourth generation. And Moses made haste to bow his head toward the earth, and worshiped” (Ex 34:6–7; cf. Dt 7:9–11 & Jon 4:2).

Through their encounter with God in history and covenant Israel learns that God is holy (Ps 99:3, 5, 9; Is 6:3), “the holy one of Israel” (Is 1:4, 5:19, 30:15, 31:1). Originally referring to ritual items reserved and set apart for worship, holiness applied to God designates his uniqueness, his exalted otherness, his incomparability (Hos 11:9). One of Yahweh’s most distinguishing characteristics, divine holiness sets him apart from all other gods, from all that he has made, from the wicked and from every evil. It means that God is unapproachable, that no one can see his face and live (Ex 33:20; Is 6:5). “Who is able to stand before the Lord, this holy God?” (1 Sm 6:20). As exalted in holiness over all, he is not to be tested or provoked (Dt 6:16; Ps 95:8–9), nor his determinations gainsaid (Jb 38–41; Is 45:9–13; Jon 4). As holy, his name is great and terrible (Ps 99:3), and the earth trembles at his approach (Jgs 5:4). Yahweh is “the great, the mighty, and the terrible God” (Dt 10:17; Dn 9:4), in the sense of inducing awe and fear by his powerful deeds on behalf of his people (Dt 10:21; 2 Sm 7:23; Ps 106:22), and the fearful natural events of violent thunderstorm and earthquake (Ex 19:16–19; Ps 29; Is 10:33). Thus, a decisive feature of the biblical understanding of Yahweh is that the same God who is immanently present and compassionate towards Israel is transcendentally exalted far above the heavens in glory.

Israel’s Response. Because “great in your midst is the Holy One of Israel” (Is 12:6), the people of God are set apart as well: to be holy unto the Lord (Nm 15:40; Dt 7:6), and to be a light to the nations (Is 42:6, 49:6). In the covenant God commands Israel to be holy because Yahweh is holy (Lv 11:44–45, 19:2), just as he demanded their forefather Abraham before them (Gn 17:1). Their call to holiness is contained in the twin obligations of the covenant: the religious commandments in regards to God and the moral ones concerning neighbor. Though fittingly expressed in the form of law, since obedient action is the heart of the matter, the covenantal demands of the Torah are essentially a teaching of wisdom, a way of acting that leads to life and blessing (Dt 30:15–20; Ps 1). Israel was called to listen to God, and respond with the whole of heart and life, as the daily praying of Shema reminded them: “Hear, O Israel: The Lord is our God, the Lord alone. You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your might” (Dt 6:4–5). The covenantal relationship requires them “to fear God”—that is, to walk in all his ways, to love him, serve him, and keep all his commandments and statutes (Dt 10:12–13). Living truthfully is to seek the face of the Lord (Ps 24:6). The fear of God, the reverential acknowledgement of God’s claims upon man (Ex 20:20), is the beginning of wisdom (Ps 111:10), for the carrying out of God’s commands is the whole duty of man (Eccl 12:13). In contrast, it is the fool who says in his heart there is no God (Ps 14:1), who convinces himself that God does not see human behavior or will require an accounting for it (Ps 36:1–2, 94:4–11; Is 47:10–11). This is not atheism in the strict and ideological sense, where the existence of God is denied outright, but a functional or performative kind of atheism that ignores God and thereby denies his Lordship and right to judgment.

Israel’s theology of God, therefore, is a lived one, formed and sustained by moral obedience to God’s commands. Equally important in this formation are the cultic practices required by the covenant: the offering of sacrifices of expiation and thanksgiving, the petitions, praise and prayers of the psalms, and the rites of the yearly calendar of feasts through which they remembered the saving deeds of God and sang: “Praise him for his mighty deeds, praise his surpassing greatness” (Ps 150:2). These religious rituals were performed in the family setting, at specific religious shrines of ancestral significance, and eventually in the temple of Jerusalem above all. Central too is the conviction that Yahweh is present in the midst of the people (Ex 25:8), especially in his shekinah (presence) over the ark of the covenant, at first in tent (Ex 40:34–38), later in temple (1 Kgs 8:10–11). This deep confidence that God was with them communally is an ongoing realization that the name of Yahweh means, “I am he who will be there for you.”

God of Creation. As Israel understands Yahweh as the author of wonderful historical deeds on their behalf, in like fashion they conceive the coming to be of all things as a great work of Yahweh. The making of the heavens and the earth by calling them into existence and placing all things in their proper setting is the first of Yahweh’s saving deeds, and thus the beginning of salvation history. Creation is a divine act integrated with, and never separate from, the divine work of the covenant. As his own proper act—the Hebrew verb to create, bārā (Gn 1:1), is chiefly reserved for God alone—the work of creation displays God’s power and gives evidence of his greatness, beauty, and artistry (Wis 13:1–9). Creation gives God glory (Ps 19:1), and like his saving historical deeds, inspires Israel to worship and praise him (Ps 95:5–6, 104:31–35).

The work of creation is accomplished by the powerful word (dabar) and wind or breath (ruah) of God (Gn 1; Ps 33:6), and the resultant good depends upon God’s wisdom and love (Prv 8:22–31; Wis 11:24–26). While one can find early mythopoetic representations of God’s act of creation as a victory over the restless sea (Ps 93:3–5), personified as the sea-monster Leviathan (Ps 74:12–15) or Rahab (Jb 26:12; Is 51:9–10), the first chapter of Genesis presents it more simply as God bringing order to what is unformed (Gn 1:1). Only after contact with Greek thought is creation expressed as a making ex nihilo (2 Mc 7:8). In striking contrast to other cosmogonies, biblical creation is never portrayed in the terms of some life-giving process found within the world—i.e., sexual reproduction or the natural cycle wherein death leads to life. Because Yahweh has no consort or rival, the creation account is conspicuously monotheistic. The transcendent Yahweh creates without strain by simply commanding, and thus like the lawgiver Israel knew him to be.

As a work of the Lord, creation has a definite beginning, yet it never means a cessation of divine activity. By the same command and power he made all things, God sustains all things in being, prevents their disintegration, and provides for their needs. As the “living God” (Dt 5:26; Jer 10:10), he is the source of life (Nm 27:16; Ps 38:9), who gives breath (Gn 2:7) and takes it away (2 Sm 12:14–23; Ps 104:29). In his untiring stewardship over creation Yahweh is the cause of daily events and changes in nature: he authors day and darkness (Am 4:13, 5:8); he calls forth the movements of the heavens (Is 40:26, 45:12, 48:13); even the wind, rain and snow go forth at his command (Jb 37:9–11; Ps 147:15–18). In particular, Psalm 104 praises the Creator for his ongoing care of creation, in watering the earth, giving food for the hungry, sending and taking away the breath of life (cf. Jb 38:39–39:30).

Since nature is completely subject to the God who made it, and natural events can spell either blessing or misfortune for man, timely rains that bring forth the earth’s bounty indicate God’s reward for Israel’s covenantal fidelity (Lv 26:4; Dt 11:13–14), while drought and natural disasters are punishments from God for the people’s unfaithfulness (Jer 5:24–25; Am 4:7; Jl 2:1–11). Therefore God’s relation to creation, too, is covenantal (Gn 9:9–17; Hos 2:18). This understanding of the world stands in stark contrast to, and often intentionally subverts, the pagan tendency to identify natural forces with gods. It is also differs markedly from later conceptions of nature as autonomous, mechanical and impersonal. Creation manifests God’s wisdom and goodness, but the order discernible in its unfolding is not due to absolute, inviolable natural laws, but to the constancy and justice of Yahweh. Not only does Hebrew lack a word for “nature,” there is little Semitic concern to distinguish between natural causality and divine agency. The one prominent exception is that genuine human deliberation and moral responsibility is always recognized, since it is a necessary presupposition for Israel’s participation in the covenant.

Israel’s Disobedience and God’s Response. As the history of Israel unfolds Yahweh continues to act according to the covenantal relationship, both in the communal fortunes of the nation and in the personal lives of individuals. At the forefront of the covenant is the commandment to worship Yahweh alone (Ex 20:1–6), and the events of Israel’s history are interpreted in respect to the people’s wavering fidelity to their one God, so that a cycle of apostasy, divine punishment, petition, divine deliverance, and repentance is repeated over the generations. God raises up “judges” who deliver Israel from their idolatry and thus from their subjection to their enemies (Judges). Though Yahweh is Israel’s true King (1 Sm 8:7), he allows the establishment of a monarchy, himself appointing the first kings, and, in response to David’s religious loyalty and obedience, secures his lineage as a dynasty (2 Sm 7:8–16). When the kings and people of Israel succumb to the polytheism present in and around Israel, God responds by sending prophets. Led by the spirit of God to proclaim his judgment, they call Israel back to the demands of the covenant: to worship Yahweh alone, to trust him exclusively for the nation’s welfare, and to act justly toward neighbor. Since Yahweh is the protector of widows, orphans and aliens (Dt 10:18; Ps 68:5–6), acts of injustice to the poor, innocent and defenseless of society are especially condemned by the prophets. The history of Israel proves that the abandonment of the coherence of covenantal monotheism leads inevitably to ritual hypocrisy (Is 1:10–17; Am 5:21–25), moral degradation (Is 5:20; Hos 4:1–2; cf. Rom 1:18–32), societal injustice (Jer 6:13; Am 8:4–8), and loss of the nation’s identity and independence (2 Kgs 24–25; Is 5).

Certainly Israel’s disobedience provides the context for one of the most misunderstood and maligned anthropathisms in the Old Testament: the fierce anger of God (e.g., Ez 5:13–17). God’s anger in the Scriptures expresses and personifies the justice of God, but this divine displeasure, unlike parallels in ancient Near Eastern religions, is never capriciously without grounds or purpose. The anger of Yahweh is always in response to covenantal unfaithfulness, and always presupposes the holiness of God wholly incompatible with sin. On account of his righteousness which the covenant must manifest (Is 5:7, 16), the holy God is intolerant towards disobedience in the people he desires and commands to be like him, for their own good and that they may be a blessing to the nations (Gn 12:3; Is 19:24). It is always and only as a consequence of their unfaithfulness to the covenant that God punishes the people of Israel (Jer 21:11–22:9). They come to experience his “wrath” (Jer 6:11; Ex 7:8; Hos 5:10)—that is, the negative consequences of their own idolatry, immorality and injustice. In this way the natural and human disasters of their history (e.g., famine and conquest) are understood theologically. It is Yahweh who through natural calamities and foreign armies accomplishes the demands of his covenantal justice, even to the point of the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, and the deportation of the people into exile (Is 46:6; Jer 21:3–7, 27:5–11). Again this reflects and affirms the radical monotheism of Israel, who is Lord over every natural and human power.

Yet the drama of Israel's failure to keep the covenant and God's punishing mercy upon his people allows for a deepening of the Bible's portrayal of Yahweh as the one and holy God. The divine quality that comes most to the fore through all this turmoil is the hesed of Yahweh: God's loving faithfulness or steadfast love (Ex 34:6; Ps 106:45, 108:4). The prophets, especially Hosea, characterized Israel's exclusive covenantal relationship with God as that of a marriage of love and fidelity between husband and bride. Even as they equate Israel's idolatrous pursuit of other gods with adultery and harlotry (Ez 16; Hos 4:10–19), the prophets affirm the constancy of Yahweh's love and tenderness for Israel his beloved (Is 62:1–5; Hos 2:14–20). While Israel repeatedly breaks the covenant, God remains true to it, certainly by justly punishing wickedness, yet more so by mercifully forgiving, preserving and restoring Israel. Though God always acts for the good of his people, he acts on account of who he is: justice and mercy and love. "For my own sake, for my own sake, I do it, for why should my name be profaned? My glory I will not give to another" (Is 48:11; cf. Ez 36:22–23). Thus, after originally choosing Israel as his own, God ever after favors them because his love for Israel has become inseparable from faithfulness to his own name. Having punished Israel's idolatry, Yahweh forgets their iniquity but remembers his loving faithfulness which cannot pass away. As the reason for Israel's hope in the goodness of God to them, the hesed of Yahweh elicits Israel's gratitude and praise: "O give thanks to the Lord, for he is good; his steadfast love endures forever" (Ps 107:1, 117:2, 118:1–4, 138:2).

Thus the prophets who foretell Israel's pending destruction always also proclaim God's subsequent mercy upon them (e.g., Jer 33; Hos 2:14–23; Am 9:11–15). Indeed, in the very nadir of Israel's history, the exile of Judah into Babylon, there occurs a profound renewal in theological thought, particularly evident in Second Isaiah (Is 40–66), towards a more universal and eschatological understanding of Yahweh's steadfast love for Israel. At this time, after the bankruptcy of religious syncretism, Israel's faith becomes explicitly and absolutely monotheistic—not only is Yahweh the only God for Israel, he is the only God, period. "I am the Lord, and there is no other" (Is 45:18; cf. 44:6–8; 46:9). As the Creator of all things, he can be Israel's savior outside the confines of the Promised Land, even in the midst of a people whose gods are nothing more than lifeless idols (Ps 134:15–18; Is 44:9–20; Jer 10:14). Because Yahweh alone is God, he is the Lord of history ruling over all nations, commissioning foreign powers in the work of returning Israel to the land as surely he had used them to drive them from it (Is 45:1–7; Jer 29:4–14; Zec 10:3–12). Rejecting the common belief that the gods of each nation were responsible for its fortunes, the prophets dare to ascribe the destinies of all peoples to the one and only Lord of heaven and earth.

God and the Future Hope. In the honest acknowledgement of Israel's guilt a hope is born for a future great work of the Lord. This hope of the prophets looks forward to a messianic and eschatological future in which God will definitively act to deliver Israel from its own unfaithfulness and establish an everlasting covenant of God's universal reign. In order to express this future hope of what the Lord will do, the prophets speak in terms of what he had done in the past; hope is grounded in and transforms memory. God will act and there will be a new creation of justice and peace (Is 11:6–9), a new heavens and earth (Is 65:17–19), and the desert representing human spiritual lifelessness will become verdant and fruitful (Is 42:17–20; Ez 47:1–12). God will establish a new covenant (Jer 31:31–34), so that his people, with a new heart and spirit (Ez 36:22–32), will all have knowledge of and steadfast love for God (Is 11:9; Hos 2:18–20, 6:6). There will be a new Jerusalem (Is 66:7–16) and temple (Ez 40–47), honored and sought by the nations. God will send his anointed and chosen one, his Messiah, who as a suffering servant (Is 52:13–53:12), will expiate faithlessness by his redemptive suffering, and as a king in the line and example of David (Jer 33:14–18; Ez 34:23–24, Zec 9:9–10) will restore Israel to glory. In these ways not only God's original intentions for Israel will be realized, but through Israel's restoration, the whole world will come to salvation (Is 2:2–4, 49:6; Zep 3:8–13). For the new deliverance of Israel will lead all nations to acknowledge and worship Yahweh alone (Is 45:8–25, 56:6–8; Jer 16:19–21), and so demonstrate the universal dominion of the one God.

The true character of the God of the Old Testament, Yahweh, is thus to be known through his intimate regard for Israel, which in its very particularity opens up to a true universality, and in its activity in time moves forward to a future beyond history. God is present among and active for his people, yet in his very immanence God remains wholly transcendent. Even as he reveals his glory to Israel (Dt 5:24), he remains hidden, mysterious (Is 45:15). In antithesis to the disregard of pagan deities for what is beneath them, Yahweh is mindful of Israel, with the tenderness of a mother's love for her child (Is 49:15, 66:13). He is their personal and communal shepherd (Ps 23; Ez 34), rock (Ps 18:2; Is 17:10), refuge and shield (Ps 3:3, 27:1).

Yet his closeness to those who fear him involves no reduction of his greatness but always affirms his otherness. God has power over all he has made (Jb 12:7–25), does whatever he pleases (Ps 115:3), and is in no way subject to the constraints that limit the actions of creatures, such as frustration of will (Jb 42:2; Ps 135:5–7; Is 55:11) or weakness (Is 40:28; Jer 32:17). Responsive to the choices of men and women, still, in contrast to them, God does not change his mind but remains resolute in his determinations (Nm 23:9; Ps 110:4, 132:11; Ez 24:14). While the human heart and its secret thoughts are completely open to him (Ps 139:1–4, 12, 15), God’s own thoughts and ways remain incomprehensible to human minds (Jb 42:3; Ps 139:6; Is 40:28). Even as he abides in the temple that cannot contain him (1 Kgs 8:27), God is enthroned above the heavens, and the earth is his footstool (Is 66:1). God is present everywhere (Ps 139:7–10; Jer 23:23–24), unchanging and everlasting in every age (Ps 90:1–4, 102:26–27), and blessed forever (Ps 41:13, 89:52, 106:48). Thus, while no other god than Yahweh acts so solicitously, yet in doing so Yahweh acts as he is, which is unlike all that he has made.

In summary, the God of the Old Testament is the only living God, before whom all other gods are naught (Is 34:18, 46:9), to whom nothing compares. “Who is like the Lord our God, who is seated on high, who looks far down upon the heavens and the earth?” (Ps 113:5–6). He is Yahweh, the one true God, maker of heaven and earth, Lord of all that he has made. Eternal, almighty, dwelling in the heavens, he chooses Israel as his own people, and delivers them from slavery to live his Torah in the land he promised their ancestors. Even as they fail to love the Lord alone and their neighbor in justice, the God of Israel remains true to his name, punishing iniquity while remaining merciful. In loving faithfulness he preserves a remnant of his people until the day when, in a new act of deliverance that establishes a universal and everlasting covenant, all nations will acknowledge, worship and obey the one true God.

NEW TESTAMENT

Continuity and Difference with the Old Testament. In the New Testament the God of the Old Testament is confessed in light of a new revelation and praised for a new work of salvation. Many passages make it clear that “God” designates the same one attested by the Scriptures and believed by the Jewish people (e.g., Mt 4:10; Mk 7:8; Jn 8:54; Rom 3:2). The Jewish faith is the foundation for the Christian, and the Scriptures of the former are essential to the latter, precisely because the same God acts in a way that reflects but also transcends what he did before. The God of the New Testament is the same God “in whom [Abraham] believed, who gives life to the dead and calls into existence those things that do not exist” (Rom 4:17). He is the “living and true God” distinct from all idols (1 Thes 1:9; Heb 3:12), the “God of Israel” who has fulfilled the promises he made to their ancestors by doing something amazing and scarcely to be believed (Acts 13:17–41).

All the key elements of the Old Testament theology of God are present (often operating to clarify who Christ is): the oneness of God (Jn 17:3; 1 Cor 8:4–6; Eph 4:6; Jude 25), God’s holiness (Mt 6:9; Heb 12:10, 14, 29; 1 Pt 1:15–16), condemnation of idolatry (Acts 14:10–17, 15:29; 1 Cor 8:4–6; 1 Thes 1:9), God working wonders and delivering his people (Acts 2:22–36; Rom 6:15–23; Col 1:13–14; 1 Pt 1:18), the presence of God dwelling in the midst of his people (Jn 1:14, 2:21; 1 Cor 3:16–17; Rv 21:3), the theme of election (Lk 9:35; Eph 1:4; 1 Pt 1:2), the establishment of a covenant (Mt 26:26–28; Heb 9:11–28, 13:20), communal identity centered around the praise and worship of God (Acts 2:42–47; 1 Cor 11:23–32; Eph 5:18–20), a spiritual and moral way of life in accordance with the covenant (Mt 5–7; Col 3:1–4:6), divine judgment and punishment as a real possibility to be feared (Mt 13:40–42, 18:7–9; Mk 9:42–48; Rv 20:11–15), a still greater emphasis upon divine mercy (Jn 3:16–17; Rom 4:20–21; Ti 3:3–7; 1 Jn 3:19–22), and an eschatological hope for a final glory (Rom 8:22–25; 1 Cor 15:51–57). As before, the God who saves in time is also the God who creates, sustains and rules over all things as Lord of heaven and earth (1 Cor 1:15–20; Heb 2:10–11). Not only is God understood as remaining faithful to the covenantal promises made to the patriarchs and people of Israel (Rom 11:25–32), but all the promises put forth by the prophets of God’s future work of salvation are understood as reaching fulfillment in the advent and life of Jesus Christ (Jn 19:28; 2 Cor 1:18–20). Indeed, a deep, inspired understanding of the Old Testament Scriptures is considered absolutely essential for understanding Christ and his mission (Lk 19:31, 24:27, 45; Jn 5:39, 45–47).

Yet the New Testament bears the additional influence of Greek modes of thought and expression, reflecting the language it was written in, the Greek translation of the Old Testament (LXX) it often quotes, and the cultural background of its main audience. In contrast to the Hebrew Scriptures, anthropomorphic and anthropopathic language is atypical (yet cf. Lk 11:20; Rom 1:18; Ti 3:4). The positive vitality of Old Testament descriptions of God are sometimes refined into simple negations of divine imperfections—e.g., “the living God,” “whom no man can see and live,” is “immortal” and “invisible” (Rom 1:20, 23; 1 Tm 1:17). The God enthroned on the clouds of heaven is “the blessed and only Sovereign, the King of kings and Lord of lords, who alone has immortality and dwells in unapproachable light, whom no man has ever seen or can see” (1 Tm 6:15–16). When familiarity with Old Testament history cannot be presumed, emphasis is given to the universal dominion of God the Creator and Savior (1 Cor 15:24–28; Eph 1:20–23), “who desires all men to be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth” (1 Tm 2:4). God is Pantokrator, the Almighty (2 Cor 6:18 [citing the LXX]; Rv 4:8), whose power and reign is expressed more generally and on a cosmic scale. “For from him and through him and to him are all things” (Rom 11:36). As the “Alpha and Omega who is, and who was and who is to come, the Almighty” (Rv 1:8), God “accomplishes all things according to the counsel of his will” (Eph 1:11; cf. Rom 8:28). The divine favor shown to the Gentiles is not part of the particular election of Israel, but the manifestation of a mystery hidden for all ages (Col 1:26), a plan of God from the foundation of the world to predestine them to glory (Rom 8:28–30; Eph 1:4; 2 Thes 2:13; 2 Tm 1:9). This appropriation of Greek modes of thought about God in the task of evangelization can be seen in Paul’s sermon to the Athenians at the Areopagus: “The God who made the world and everything in it, being Lord of heaven and earth, does not live in shrines made by man, nor is he served by human hands, as though he needed anything, since he himself gives to all men life and breath and everything. And he made from one every nation of men to live on all the face of the earth, having determined allotted periods and the boundaries of their habitation, that they should seek God, in the hope that they might feel after him and find him. Yet he is not far from each one of us, for, ‘In him we live and move and have our being;’ as even some of your poets have said, ‘For we are indeed his offspring.’ Being then God’s offspring, we ought not to think that the Deity is like gold, or silver, or stone, a representation by the art and imagination of man . . .” (Acts 17:24–29).

God as Father. Given this foundation in the Old Testament and context in the Greco-Roman world, the New Testament is entirely distinctive in its theology of God because of its confession of faith in Jesus Christ. The revelation of God in these Scriptures is grounded in the relationship that Jesus Christ has with God, and the work of salvation God accomplishes in and through him. While “God” (theos) is used a few times to refer to Jesus (Jn 1:1, 20:28; Rom 9:5; Ti 2:13; 1 Jn 5:20), “the God” (ho theos) is always used in reference to his Father; this usage is evidence that the primary meaning of “God” in the New Testament is “Father.” First and foremost, God is “Father” in relation to Jesus Christ, his Son. Paul especially speaks this way in his greetings: “the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ” (Rom 1:7; 1 Cor 1:3; Gal 1:3; Thes 1:1). “Father” is the most common appositive for God, and “God” alone or “God the Father” alternate in being frequently paired with “Jesus Christ” (Jn 17:3; 1 Cor 8:6; 2 Thes 2:16; 2 Tm 4:1). In the Johannine writings, “the Father” and “the Son” are indissolubly linked (Jn 5:19–23, 14:13; 1 Jn 1:3; cf. Mt 11:27). In an important secondary sense, dependent upon the first and which encapsulates the meaning of salvation in the New Testament, God is “Father” of all those who through faith in his Son become his children by the Holy Spirit (Rom 8:14–17; Gal 3:26). Hence, God is frequently named and invoked as “God our Father” (Mt 6:9; Eph 1:2; Col 1:2; Philm 3).

To understand the God of the New Testament, then, requires understanding both these meanings to God the Father. As much as the Old Testament theology of God is rooted in the meaning of Yahweh, so the theology of God in the New Testament centers on the meaning of “God the Father.” Again as before, the revelation of this most definitive name for God occurs through great works in history that bring about deliverance and salvation, albeit now universal and eternal in scope. The revelation of God as Father occurs in and through the life, death, resurrection, ascension, glorification of his Son, and his sending of Holy Spirit in the Father’s name to make us children of the Father by grace. Moreover, as in the Old Testament too, the fullness of the divine mystery, while truly active and immanent in of salvation of his people, remains transcendent and irreducible throughout that great work. God saves as God is, which means that the temporal and finite conditions under which he saves us are not the conditions of his own eternal being.

Although “Father” as a designation of God is found in the Old Testament (Is 63:16; Tb 13:4; Sir 23:1, 4), it is not foundational or prevalent. God is “Father” for being the Creator and source of all life (Dt 32:6), and in terms of the election of Israel. The angels are “sons of God” because their life is directly from God (Gn 6:4; Dt 32:8; Ps 82:6). God is the “Father of Israel” (Jer 31:9), and Israel his “son” (Ex 4:22; Hos 11:1), not because he has sired them in any natural sense, but because of the covenant in which he claims them as his own, like a father adopting a child into his family, with all the responsibilities and blessings that accrue therefrom. This sense of God’s Fatherhood, specific to the chosen people of Israel, continues in the New Testament (Rom 9:4, 11:29). Yet it is radically surpassed in regard to the identity of Jesus Christ, who is the Son of God (Mt 16:16; Mk 1:1; Rom 1:3–4), indeed the only Son of God (Jn 1:14, 18, 3:16, 18; 1 Jn 4:9). Though he is, like Israel, chosen (Lk 9:35, 23:35) and beloved (Mt 17:5; Col 1:13), more than this he alone is begotten by or born of God (Acts 13:33; Heb 1:5–6, 5:5; 1 Jn 3:9, 4:2, 5:1), chosen before the foundation of the world (1 Pt 1:20), and “in the bosom of the Father” (Jn 1:18).

The Father of Jesus. Foundational to the New Testament, therefore, is the unique relationship that exists between the Father and the Son, one that preexists before his becoming man, one that defines everything the incarnate Son does and says, and one that reigns in glory after his death and exaltation. The Father acts towards his Son in a distinctive manner, authorizing and empowering the Son through the Holy Spirit to act in the Father’s name as the agent of our salvation. God the Father sends the Son into the world (Lk 4:43; Jn 6:29; Gal 4:4; 1 Jn 4:9–10), declares him to be his chosen beloved (Mt 12:18; Mk 1:11; Lk 20:13; 2 Pt 1:17), commands the Son what to do and say (Jn 5:36, 12:49–50, 14:31, 17:4, 8), gives all things to the Son (Mt 11:27; Jn 3:35, 13:3, 16:15) including all those who believe in him (Jn 6:44, 17:2, 11), gives up his Son to death (Acts 2:22, 3:18; Rom 8:32), raises the Son from the dead (Acts 2:24, 10:40; Rom 10:9; Col 2:12), and glorifies him by seating him at his right hand in heaven (Jn 17:5; Acts 3:13; Eph 1:20; 1 Pt 1:21), thereby giving him perfect authority over all powers and peoples (Mt 18:18; 1 Cor 15:24–28; Phil 2:9–11; Eph 1:21, Col 2:10; 1 Pt 3:22), as well as all judgment (Mt 25:31–46; Jn 5:22–23, 27; 2 Cor 5:10).

Conversely, in relation to the Father the Son is said to be the perfect image and radiance of the Father’s glory (2 Cor 4:4; Col 1:15; Heb 1:3), and the fullness of God dwells in him (Col 1:19, 2:9; cf. Jn 1:14; Eph 1:23; Phil 2:6). It is from his fullness that we receive the riches of his grace, life, truth and love (Jn 1:16–17; Phil 4:19; Col 2:9–10). Anointed in full with the Holy Spirit (Mk 1:10; Lk 4:1; Jn 3:34), Jesus reveals the Father whom he alone knows and sees (Lk 10:22; Jn 1:18, 6:46, 10:15). In a striking and unprecedented manner, Jesus addresses God as “Abba,” evocative of his great intimacy with one whom he spent long hours in prayer (Lk 5:16, 6:12, 11:1). To express the uniqueness of his relation to God, he says, “my Father” (Mt 7:21, 10:32–33), while to his disciples he says, “your Father” (Mt 5:16, 45); never does he collectively say with them, “our Father” (Jn 20:17). The Father and Son are so inseparably conjoined (Jn 10:30), that to accept and receive the Son is to accept and receive the Father (Lk 9:48; Jn 13:20), to deny or reject the Son is to deny or reject the Father (Lk 10:16; 1 Jn 2:22–23, 5:10–11). In short, one’s relationship to God is in and through one’s relationship with Jesus Christ, for “through him we have access in one Spirit to the Father (Eph 2:18; cf. 2 Cor 1:20). “For there is one God, and there is one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself as a ransom for all” (1 Tm 2:5–6).

In his teaching, especially the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus expresses who God the Father is. God the Father is in heaven (Mt 6:9, 18:14), enthroned (Mt 5:34; Rv 7:10), in secret (Mt 6:6, 18), Lord of heaven and earth (Mt 11:25). The Father is perfect and holy (Mt 5:48, 6:9; 1 Pt 1:15–16), for whom all things are possible (Mk 14:36; cf. 9:23), and nothing impossible (Lk 1:37). God the Father, who knows everything (1 Jn 3:20) because everything is open and laid bare before him (Heb 4:13), even the hearts of men (Acts 1:24; Rom 8:27), knows what we need before we ask him (Mt 6:8, 32). The Father knows how to give good things to his children, and thus can be trusted to provide for daily needs (Mt 6:25–34), give abundantly for every good work (2 Cor 9:8), and to reward what is done for love of him (Mt 6:6, 18). “If you then, who are evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more will the heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to those who ask him!” (Lk 11:13).

God alone is good (Mt 19:17; Lk 18:19; Jas 1:5), blessed (1 Tm 1:11, 6:15), even “kind to the ungrateful and the selfish” (Lk 6:35), making his sun to rise and his rain to fall on the just and the unjust (Mt 5:45). Jesus’ miracles of healing “the lame, the maimed, the blind, the dumb, and many others” (Mt 15:30) reveal that the Father is compassionate (Lk 6:36). Jesus’ eating with tax collectors and forgiving the repentant (Mt 9:9–13; Lk 7:36–50) demonstrate that God is forgiving (Mt 6:14; Mk 11:25). Indeed, the Father is superlatively merciful (Lk 1:72, 78, 6:36; 2 Cor 1:3; Eph 2:4; Ti 3:5; 1 Pt 1:3), and the source of grace, mercy and peace (1 Tm 1:2; 2 Jn 3; Jude 2). He is patient with sinners (Rom 2:4; 2 Pt 3:9), desiring that all repent and come to salvation, unwilling that any should perish (Mt 18:14; 1 Tm 2:4; 2 Pt 3:9). Still, he is to be feared because he “has the power to cast into hell” (Lk 12:4–5; 1 Pt 2:17). Most of all, the Father is gracious (Mt 11:26), for it pleases him to give the greatest gift: “Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father’s good pleasure to give you the kingdom” (Lk 12:32). In sum, there is simply nothing that we have that we have not received from God our Father (1 Cor 4:7), for “every good endowment and every perfect gift is from above, coming down from the Father of lights with whom there is no variation or shadow due to change” (Jas 1:17).

The Father of All. In his passion and death Jesus reveals the depths of his Father’s generous love and mercy. Divine love for men and women in danger of perishing in death is the motive for the sending of the Son (Jn 3:16), and his sacrifice for the unworthy the fitting manifestation of the depth of that love: “God shows his love for us in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us” (Rom 5:8; Eph 2:4–7). “In this the love of God was made manifest among us, that God sent his only Son into the world, so that we might live through him. In this is love, not that we loved God but that he loved us and sent his Son to be the expiation for our sins” (1 Jn 4:9–10). In this way the “God of love” (2 Cor 13:11) reveals himself to be love itself: “God is love, and he who abides in love abides in God, and God abides in him” (1 Jn 4:16). The sacrificial suffering and death of Jesus is thus the definitive divine act expressing the mystery of God and his immeasurable love for the human race. Upon this “rock” (cf. 1 Cor 10:4) lies the Christian faith and hope in God which cannot disappoint (Rom 5:1–11; Heb 11:1). It is a love which no tribulation or power can overcome (Rom 8:31–39), which promises all good things: “He who did not spare his own Son but gave him up for us all, will he not also give us all things with him?” (Rom 8:32; cf. Eph 1:3).

Through Jesus’ suffering and death, the Father, the “God of peace” (Rom 15:33; Phil 4:9; 1 Thes 5:23), reconciles the world to himself (2 Cor 5:19; Col 1:20), and all peoples to one another (Eph 2:13). “God our Savior” (1 Tm 1:1; Ti 1:3, 2:11; cf. Lk 1:47) has freed men and women from the reign or power of sin and death (Rom 8:2), ransomed them from a futile way of living (1 Pt 1:18), and in the end, will deliver them from death and bodily corruption (Rom 7:24; 1 Cor 15:53–57; 2 Cor 5:4–5). This work of salvation is accomplished in us by the Holy Spirit, “the promise of the Father” (Lk 24:49), sent by the glorified Jesus exalted at the right hand of the Father (Jn 7:39, 16:7; Acts 2). “God’s love has been poured into our hearts through the Holy Spirit which has been given us” (Rom 5:5). Through the Holy Spirit believers are able to cry, “Abba, Father,” for as the “spirit of sonship” he makes us children of God, fellow heirs with Christ (Rom 8:14–17). Through the Holy Spirit abiding in us the Father of Jesus Christ is truly our Father as well, who in the gift of the Spirit pledges his promised inheritance to his children (Rom 8:17; 2 Cor 1:21–22; Gal 3:18, 29; 1 Pt 1:3–5), nothing less than the a sharing in the eternal glory of his Son (Jn 17; Rom 8:29–30), a graced participation in the divine nature itself (2 Pt 1:4). “See what love the Father has given us, that we should be called children of God; and so we are . . . Beloved, we are God’s children now; it does not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when he appears we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is.” (1 Jn 3:1–2).

To truly know God as Father and be his child requires living the commandment of his Son to love others (Jn 13:34–35, 15:8–17; Rom 13:8–10; 1 Jn 4:7; 5:1–2), and thus imitate the Son of the Father. “By this we know love, that he laid down his life for us; and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren” (1 Jn 3:16, 4:11). Those who despise their neighbor cannot be said to be children of the loving Father, for it is impossible to know and to love God unless one love and serve others (1 Jn

4:8, 20–21). Because Jesus is the definitive revelation and saving work of God, the response must be wholehearted, transforming the mind (Rom 12:1), and bearing fruit in good works (Gal 5:13–25). “Only let your manner of life be worthy of the gospel of Christ” (Phil 1:27). The calling is from repentance (Mk 1:15; Lk 13:1–9; 2 Cor 7:10) to the Father’s perfection (Mt 5:48; Eph 5:1; Heb 12:23), to be holy, by the power of the Holy Spirit, as God is holy (2 Cor 7:1; 1 Pt 1:16). Since “our God is a consuming fire” (Heb 12:29; cf. 1 Cor 3:12–15), nothing less than absolute purity of heart and freedom from all sin is required for the children of the Father to see God and enter into his glory (Mt 5:8; Heb 12:14).

For this purpose, our loving Father treats us as his children when he chastises and “disciplines us for our good, that we may share in his holiness” (Heb 12:7, 10). Suffering and trials, persecution and the world’s rejection, are to be expected of followers of the Son whose destiny was the cross (Mt 5:11, 16:21–28; Jn 15:18–21). Suffering purifies faith (1 Pt 1:6–7, 4:1–2, 12–16), for through the trial of affliction humbly accepted one places God the Father’s will over one’s own (Mk 14:36; 1 Pt 4:1–2). Since “all who desire to lead a godly life in Christ Jesus will be persecuted” (2 Tm 3:16), suffering is the great opportunity to follow the Son in trusting in the goodness of the Father, by repaying evil with good (Mt 5:28–42; Rom 12:14–21), forgiving, blessing and praying for one’s enemies (Mt 5:43–48; Mk 11:25), and rejoicing that one’s reward from the Father will be great (Mt 5:12; Jn 16:33; Jas 1:2–3). “Therefore let those who suffer according to God’s will do right and entrust their souls to a faithful Creator” (1 Pt 4:19). God, who protects and guards those who believe (1 Pt 1:5), will sustain them with a peace that surpasses all understanding (Phil 4:7; cf. Jn 14:27), for he is the “God of steadfastness and encouragement” (Rom 15:5). And after having tested them through temptation or suffering, God “will restore, establish and strengthen” his children (1 Pt 5:10; cf. Mt 4:11).

The Father is worthy of such trust because “God is light and in him is no darkness at all” (1 Jn 1:5). Though no one can know the mind of the Lord for no one can counsel him (1 Cor 2:16, quoting Is 40:13), his judgments are just and true (Rv 16:7, 19:2), and he judges impartially (1 Pt 1:17). “O the depth of the riches and wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments and how inscrutable are his ways!” (Rom 11:33). He alone is wise (Rom 16:27), and he is incapable of deceit, for lying and being proved false are impossible for him (Ti 1:2; Heb 6:18). God is faithful (1 Cor 1:9; 2 Cor 1:18; Heb 10:23), and even when we are faithless, “he remains faithful, for he cannot deny himself” (2 Ti 2:13; cf. Rom 3:3). Therefore, even in the experience of anguish and tragedy one is called to trust and “know that in everything God works for good with those who love him, who are called according to his purpose” (Rom 8:28). We “must consider that the sufferings of this present time are not worth comparing with the glory that is to be revealed in us” (Rom 8:18), “an eternal weight of glory beyond all comparison” (2 Cor 4:17). We must be patient and hope for what is beyond our understanding: ““what no eye has seen, nor ear heard, nor the heart of man conceived, what God has prepared for those who love him”” (1 Cor 2:9, quoting Is 64:4). In the end, God, “the Father of mercies and of all comfort” (2 Cor 1:3–4, 6:6), “will wipe away every tear” and “make all things new” (Rv 21:4–5).

In summary, the God of the New Testament is revealed to be the Father of an only Son, Jesus Christ, whose life, death and glorification manifest the Father’s great love for us. God is also Father of those redeemed by his Son, and this relationship is realized in us by the work of the Holy Spirit, who makes us children of the Father in the Son. The word “Father” expresses simultaneously that God is the source and destination of all things, the authority over all things, the merciful and compassionate provider for every good, and the giver of an eternal and glorious inheritance to his children. The greatness of his love for us means that God does not in this life deliver us from suffering, but saves us through suffering, so that the perfection of the Father’s love for all and the Son’s self-denial for others may be realized in us. This God cannot be truly known or rightly understood apart from the experience and living of the salvation won for us. And yet because this salvation is the Father’s eternal plan accomplished by his Son and Spirit sent from heaven, God acts for us as God truly is in his own mystery. Therefore, the God of the New Testament, though nearly always addressed simply as “Father,” is indeed the one God with the single name of “Father, Son and Holy Spirit” (Mt 28:19).

Bibliography: W. KASPER, The God of Jesus Christ, tr. M. J. O’CONNELL (New York 1997). L. KÖHLER, Old Testament Theology, tr. A. S. TODD (Philadelphia 1957). K. RAHNER, “Theos in the New Testament,” Theological Investigations, v. 1, tr. C. ERNST (Baltimore 1961) 79–148. E. L. MASCALL, He Who Is: A Study in Traditional Theism (London 1962). R. SOKOLOWSKI, The God of Faith and Reason: Foundations of Christian Theology (Washington, D.C. 1982, 1995). G. WAINWRIGHT, Doxology: The Praise of God in Worship, Doctrine and Life: A Systematic Theology (New York 1980). T. G. WEINANDY, Does God Change? The Word’s Becoming in the Incarnation (Still River, Mass. 1985). T. E. FRETHEIM, The Suffering of God: An Old Testament Perspective (Philadelphia 1976). J. LAMBRECHT and R. COLLINS, eds., God and Human Suffering (Louvain 1990).

[M. A. HOONHOUT]

2. In Christian Tradition

The formation of an intellectually mature concept of God is one of the principal goals of theology. This notion has been the fruit of a long evolution of human reason seeking to understand divinely revealed truths. The evidences of this progress and development are present in the writings of the Fathers and ecclesiastical authors as well as in the formal statements of the Church. This development occurs within a process where the subject and methodology of theology itself, as well as the philosophical wisdom it employs, evolves and changes. While this growth in understanding is organic, building upon the achievements of earlier generations, still, it is not without regression—over time there occur various failures to maintain the multi-faceted fullness of who and what the God of Christian faith is. Thus one must attend to the overall dynamics of each era that shapes and limits the way the one, enduring Christian faith in God is explained theologically. This section will trace this development through four distinct periods: patristic, medieval or scholastic, modern, and contemporary, as it focuses upon the growing understanding of God’s attributes and existence, his relation to the world, and in what sense his ineffable mystery can be understood and expressed by us.

The Patristic Period. In the early centuries the Church had the double task of transposing the Hebraic, biblical portrait of God to fit the cultural mindset of the Greco-Roman world and defending the faith against external criticisms and internal corruptions. While remaining devoted to and grounded in the revelation of the Sacred Scriptures, early Christian writers appropriated the reasoned wisdom of Greek philosophy as they engaged in controversies with Judaism, paganism, and heretical alterations of Christian belief. The polemics of the time required both clear presentations and forceful arguments, and it is not surprising that the most literate and able apologists for the faith often had learning in classical philosophy and rhetoric. At this point faith is seeking primarily the understanding needed to refute the criticisms put against the faith. Because the philosophy used in these first theological endeavors was for the most part that of Plato (ORIGEN and AUGUSTINE) and NEO-PLATONISM (PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS), the mystery of God was primarily expressed in essentialist terms. This usage, however, was not uncritical, for naïve appropriations of philosophical ideas judged to compromise the revelation of God always merited vigorous opposition by the Church fathers.

In the first few centuries of the Church, Christian writers such as the apologists had much to do in defending the monotheism, and thus the overall integrity, of the Christian faith. Against Jewish critics and in a wider climate of pagan polytheism they had to refute the charge that Christians believed in three gods. Against the dualism of gnosticism which disparaged the material creation, they had to affirm that creation and salvation are the work of the one God revealed in both Testaments. Emphasis is given to the one monarchy of God, ruling over all things. Thus the creeds of the Church begin the confession of the faith by declaring the one God is Pantokrator, the Almighty, who redeems and restores that which he made. To counter widespread belief in fate and astrology, the Church fathers spoke of the divine economy of salvation and the mystery of divine providence—God’s pronoia or foresight to order all things so that his plan for creation is accomplished. In God they knew of a hope beyond fatalism, and emphasized human responsibility against those who used the alignment of celestial bodies or the existence of evil gods as excuses for immoral behavior.

Early patristic literature was content to describe God by his attributes of omnipotence, goodness, and mercy—i.e., those which God must have to be the one Author of creation and salvation. At this stage little attempt was made at transforming the metaphorical language of the Scriptures themselves. The first conciliar creeds (Nicene and First Constantinople) reflect this language in their simple affirmation of divine unity, omnipotence, and causality (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 32nd ed. 125, 150). But by the fourth century there is evidence of both wider investigation and more penetrating analysis into God’s nature and the proper expression of it. Both Eastern and Western fathers, writing in Greek and Latin respectively, worked towards a purification of thought regarding the understanding of God. The eternity of God beyond all change comes to the fore, and more abstract language regarding the perfection of the divine essence in itself becomes more common. This is in large part owing to the controversies with Arius and Eunomius. The Arian controversy required the Church to unequivocally declare the absolute equality of the three divine persons, and thus their possession in common of one eternal divine substance or nature. Whatever transcendent, essential qualities that had tended to be reserved to God the Father (ho theos)—eternity, unknowability, absolute unity and supremacy—now passed to the divine nature according to the demands of homoousios. In contrast to Eunomius who taught that the divine essence could be adequately comprehended, orthodox theologians stressed the utter mysteriousness and ineffability of God’s nature, a position confirmed in the later creedal statements (D.S. 294, 501).

In order to speak of the eternal mystery of God and not betray his incomprehensibility Christian thinkers contrasted God with the world that he made, using terms of negation that excluded from the divine nature the conditions and limitations that mark our existence. Creatures suffer, but God is impassible; creatures die, but God is immortal, etc. Theologians also took the various positive qualities or faculties present in the world and applied them to God in a supreme manner: an elder may be wise, but God is supremely wise; a king may be powerful, but God is all powerful. Now it is natural to give special prominence to one aspect above all others that is most uniquely true of God, the quality proper to him whereby he is distinguished from all other beings. In the light of the revelation of God’s name in Ex 3:14, the Fathers considered existence to be that which is most characteristic of him. EPHREM THE SYRIAN, commented, “by this one exclusive name [God] let it be known that he alone is Being, which can be said of no other” (Adversus haereses serm.; Assemani ed. 2:555, cf. Enchiridion patristicum 729). After reading the words of this passage Hilary of Poitiers confessed that:

I was amazed to find in them an indication concerning God so exact that it expressed in the terms best adapted to human understanding an unattainable insight into the mystery of the Divine nature. For no property of God which the mind can grasp is more characteristic of Him than existence, since existence, in the absolute sense, cannot be predicated of that which shall come to an end, or of that which has had a beginning, and He who now joins continuity of being with the possession of perfect felicity could not in the past, nor can in the future, be non-existent; for whatsoever is Divine can neither be originated nor destroyed. Wherefore, since God’s eternity is inseparable from Himself, it was worthy of Him to reveal this one thing, that He is, as the assurance of His absolute eternity. (De Trinitate 1.5; Patrologia Latina 10:28)

Recognizing the parallels between the God of revelation and the God of the philosophers and scholars, Augustine too was intrigued that God revealed his name as a declaration of his existence. Reflecting on this passage from Scripture he wrote, “perhaps it ought to be said that God alone is essence. For He alone truly is, because He is unchangeable, and it is this He declared to Moses, His servant, when He said, ‘I am who am’” (De Trinitate 7.5.10; Patrologia Latina 42:942). In Augustine’s judgment the name “I Am” is best translated by the abstract term essence, meaning above all else, God’s perfect immutability. If God is that which is then God is beyond the flux of coming into and passing out of existence, and to be contrasted with all things that have their existence from him:

I considered all the other things that are of a lower order than yourself, and I saw that they have not absolute being in themselves, nor are they entirely without being. They are real in so far as they have their being from you, but unreal in the sense that they are not what you are. For it is only that which remains in being without change that truly is. (Confessions VII, 11)

While Augustine clearly recognized the incomprehensibility of God's being, he also labored to correct misconceptions of God's mystery, remembering from his own experience the tendency to apply spatial and temporal categories to our thinking about God. With the help of philosophy he had come to realize that what is immaterial is more genuinely real, true and good, and from the sorrows of loving the mutable good of fleeting pleasures and friends who had passed away, he learned the attractiveness of the beauty which cannot fade and the good that cannot be lost. It is important to appreciate, therefore, that Augustine stressed divine immutability because it ensured the incomparable desirability of God's goodness. As the unchanging Good, the "Beauty ever ancient, Beauty ever new" (Confessions X, 27), God alone could be sought as the true light and love of the human mind and heart, the one alone in whom our restless hearts can finally find peace. God's immaterial greatness means he must always be pursued because he cannot be comprehended, while his immutability guarantees that he cannot disappoint when he is finally beheld in glory. "Eternal Truth, true Love, beloved Eternity—all this, my God, you are, and it is to you that I sigh by night and day" (Confessions, VII, 10). In this way God serves to anchor all human aspirations and pursuits, in that he alone is to be enjoyed and loved for his own sake. In turn, all other things are to be used only insofar as they help one attain the enjoyment of God, and all other persons loved only for the sake of the love of God. "For he is the best man who turns his whole life toward the immutable life and adheres to it with all his affection" (De Doctrina Christiana, I, 22).

A representative expression of the understanding of God found in the thought of the Fathers can be found in this quotation from Augustine, one which underscores that in all that God is and does for his creatures he remains perfect and unchanging in his transcendent greatness:

What, then, is the God I worship? He can be none but the Lord God himself, for who but the Lord is God? What other refuge can there be, except our God? (Ps 18:31). You, my God, are supreme, utmost in goodness, mightiest and all-powerful, most merciful and most just. You are the most hidden from us and yet the most present amongst us, the most beautiful and yet the most strong, ever enduring and yet we cannot comprehend you. You are unchangeable and yet you change all things. You are never new, never old, and yet all things have new life from you. You are the unseen power that brings decline upon the proud. You are ever active, yet always at rest. You gather all things to yourself, though you suffer no need. You support, you fill, and you protect all things. You create them, nourish them, and bring them to perfection. You seek to make them your own, though you lack for nothing. You love your creatures, but with a gentle love. You treasure them, but without apprehension. You grieve for wrong, but suffer no pain. You can be angry and yet serene. Your works are varied, but your purpose is one and the same. You welcome all who come to you, though you never lost them. You are never in need yet are glad to gain, never covetous yet you exact a return for your gifts. We give abundantly to you so that we may deserve a reward; yet which of us has anything that does not come from you? You repay us what we deserve, and yet you owe nothing to any. You release us from our debts, but you lose nothing thereby. You are my God, my Life, my holy Delight, but is this enough to say of you? Can any man say enough when he speaks of you? Yet woe betide those who are silent about you! For even those who are most gifted with speech cannot find words to describe you. (Confessions I, 3)

The Medieval Period. The medieval period of Western Christianity sees the emergence of theology as a distinct field of study with its own highly developed methodology. Whereas within the patristic period development in theological understanding is closely connected with the process of clarifying the faith against heretical distortions, development in the Scholastic period is free to be more purely speculative, the pursuit of theological understanding and subtler distinctions for their own sake. Like the early Fathers, the great medieval theologians continue to write commentaries on Scripture, but this primary responsibility is at first supplemented with, and only much later supplanted by, the task of writing highly organized summaries of theology. The systemization of scholastic theology began with Peter Lombard who collected and arranged by topic biblical and patristic statements on the diverse elements of the faith. His Sentences set off a new application of dialectical reasoning, in which seemingly contradictory statements from different sources were reconciled according to higher, more distinguished, viewpoints. In the process a method of discussion evolved: an article of faith was broken down into a series of questions, an authority quoted supporting the proper conclusion, counter-arguments arrayed against it, an answer developed elaborating the principles at stake, and refutations of the objections given. Through the theological influence of Augustine and Pseudo-Dionysius, theology continues to depend upon Platonic and neo-Platonic philosophical ideas for its expression. Yet at this time theology begins to make use of the philosophy of Aristotle, and through the exemplary achievement of THOMAS AQUINAS his metaphysics will provide the standard explanatory categories employed by Catholic theology for centuries to follow.

The Sentences of PETER LOMBARD begins with the mystery of God, discussing the one divine nature and the three divine persons together. As his ordering of the subject matter of theology came to be improved upon, these different aspects of our knowledge of the one divine mystery came to be delineated into two distinct treatises. In part this was justified as a better way to handle the material; another justification was that the delineation made clear what could be known by the demonstrations of reason, and what could be known only by revelation. The discussion of the divine nature, which concerns us here, focused upon the attributes and operations of that nature which express why God is wholly other than all things in this world. As the Fourth LATERAN COUNCIL of 1215 confessed, “We firmly believe and profess without qualification that there is only one true God, eternal, immense, unchangeable, incomprehensible, omnipotent, and indescribable, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit; three Persons but one essence, substance, or nature that is wholly simple” (H. Denziger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 800). Other essential attributes include his goodness, beatitude and omnipresence, while perfections of his eternal operations of knowing and willing include his omniscience and wisdom, and the benevolence, justice, mercy and absolute efficacy of his will. These affirmations about God say as much about our inability to comprehend God’s essence as they truly point to what God must be, for they are put forth with an awareness of how we may properly speak of God. What the early Fathers practiced often implicitly is now itself discussed and made explicit: all human knowledge of God, whether by way of reason or by faith, is analogical: whatever perfections found in creation are present in God in a manner that completely transcends all limitations in creation, including the way we understand them. ANALOGY affirms a positive correspondence of what is true and good in creation to its Maker, for it can only reflect its Source, while maintaining a much stronger denial: no thing in creation or concept in human understanding is in any way comparable to God, who is not delimited in any way. Again the Fourth Council of Lateran: “between Creator and creature there can be found no similarity in which an even greater dissimilarity cannot be found” (H. Denziger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 806).

The key difference between the perfections of creatures and that of God is not intensity of degree, as if creatures and Creator could be placed in the same scale of proportion. Rather, the difference lies in God’s absolute simplicity. Whereas perfections like wisdom and goodness in a creature are qualities that enhance, and thus are added to, its basic constitution, wisdom and goodness in God are identical to the whole of his very essence, for he cannot but be perfectly wise and good. Therefore, God does not have a quality that makes him wise or good; rather, God is his wisdom and God is his goodness. The one and indivisible God is his every perfection. Although we must distinguish every attribute in God from every other because our minds can grasp only what has been delineated, in the divine mystery, every perfection we name is in the reality of God absolutely and simply identical to God himself. God is mercy and God is justice, and because it is his essence to be both perfect and simple, his mercy is his justice and his justice his mercy. What in human situations are often irreconcilable opposites are in God one mystery without requiring any reconciliation or dilution.

Theological refinement of the understanding of God advanced by the double process of removing all imperfections from the divine essence (the way of remotion), and by affirming the incomparable manner in which God simply is his every perfection (the way of eminence). For ANSELM OF CANTERBURY, this process of correcting and uplifting our thoughts about God is expressed in his judgment that God is aliquid quo maius nihil cogitari potest—that than which nothing greater can be thought. In addition to serving in his demonstration that God must exist or else he would not exceed the best we can think of him, this principle inspired a theological pursuit of the reasons we can surmise why God has revealed himself and saved us as he has. Since theology is faith seeking understanding, Anselm strived to show, for example, how the humiliation of God in becoming man and dying on the cross does not disparage but is indeed in perfect accordance with God’s transcendent greatness. Other theologians influenced by Anselm would probe divine mysteries further.

For Thomas Aquinas, the utter simplicity and fullness of perfection that is the divine essence are also central to his theological presentation of God’s mystery. Demonstrating God’s existence, not from the idea of God as with Anselm, but from the insufficiency of created reality to explain why anything exists, is good, and acts in an orderly fashion, Thomas concludes that only as the simple, pure act of existence itself can God be the true cause of all that is. His judgment is that God is ipsum esse subsistens—subsistent existence itself—utterly without composition, potency or imperfection since any of these conditions would render God in need of something greater to perfect him (Summa theologiae, I, q. 3, a. 4). “Existence” here is not a quality or even a state but the dynamic act of be-ing—“what God is” is that he is. Like the Fathers before him, St. Thomas appealed to the revelation of God's name in Ex 3:14 to confirm this demonstration of reason.

God's essence is therefore His act of being. Now this sublime truth God taught Moses, when Moses asked what to reply if the children of Israel should ask His name. Thus He showed that His proper name is "Who is." Now every name is intended to signify the nature or essence of something. It remains then that the divine act of being itself [ipsum esse divinum] is the essence or nature of God. (Summa Contra Gentiles, Bk I, 22)

The judgment that God's essence is "active existing" functions as the foundational premise for the rest of Thomas' theology. First of all, it is the touchstone for all theological judgments about what is and is not true about God. Every perfection is contained simply and every limitation excluded absolutely in the Is that God is. Secondly, it sets God apart from all else, for everything created is a composition of its essence (what it is) and its existence (that it is). God alone is existence itself; all created things have existence. In contrast to God who is ipsum esse per se subsistens, creatures have esse per participationem—existence by a direct participation in God's own existence (Summa theologiae I, q. 44, a. 1). Thirdly, since God is pure Act, he actively relates to creation in the most dynamic manner conceivable, and creation is nothing apart from the continuous extension of God's Act to it. It is true that Thomas repeatedly affirms that God has no "real relation" to creation (Summa theologiae I, q. 6, a. 2, ad 1; q. 28, a. 1, ad 3; q. 45, a. 3, ad 1)—meaning that it is not necessary for God to create in order to be truly God. Yet the whole of his thought is suffused with the active presence of God operating in, through and with all things, for to Aquinas the subject of theology concerns God and all things in their relation to God as their origin and end (Summa theologiae I, q. 2, a. 7). Even as he labors to express more than any other theologian before him the integrity and causal responsibility of the natural order, he always sees all things in their fundamental dependence upon God's active esse. Given that Thomas consciously developed the systematic order of the Summa theologiae so that primacy is given to that which is most fundamental and consequential, the entire discussion begins with God so that all things distinct from God can be understood as always inherently and necessarily related to God.

With Thomas there occurs a fundamental shift in theological thinking, away from an essentialist understanding of God and things which tends to see created reality primarily as symbolic representations of the divine essence, to a metaphysical approach that emphasizes the existence and causality of things as instruments of God's agency. Thomas puts to wide-ranging theological use the different kinds of causality outlined in Aristotle's metaphysics in order to give expression to how God actively relates to his creation. God is the First, Exemplary and Final Cause of all that is: the universal Cause of all causes, the one Exemplar of all diverse forms and perfections, and the ultimate End to which all things tend. Every existence, every nature, every action, every good pursued is such because of its created participation in God. Created reality proceeds forth from God the Creator endowed with natural capabilities which make them genuinely co-responsible for the perfecting of the universe under the direction of God's providence. Human beings, through the further perfection of God's grace, are called to the redemption and perfection of their nature in their living, knowing and loving, so that through them, creation returns to God. Since God is Act, the world and the human are dynamically conceived: the realization of creation's perfection and human salvation is a matter of acting well, and in the end the final state of the glorified is the perfect activity of knowing and loving God in the beatific vision.

Thomas has been appropriately described as a theologian of the Creator, since everything in his thought is always considered as so radically related to and dependent upon God's agency, even as created nature is acknowledged to be distinct and integral in its own existence and operation. His use of ARISTOTLE was controversial at the time, however, not just because it moved beyond the neo-Platonism of Augustinian theology, but especially because some Christian thinkers were using Aristotle to demonstrate that the world was eternal and necessary. Ironically, the philosophy Thomas used to give deeper expression to the meaning of the relationship of creation to God came under ecclesial condemnation for denying the gratuitous non-necessity of the creation. These censures and their emphasis upon the Creator's freedom and omnipotence to make all things as he pleased contributed to the rise of nominalism. This was a late medieval mode of thought that in theology preserved the transcendent freedom of the Creator at the expense of his other attributes—namely, the wisdom and goodness of God to act providentially and purposefully through the created natural order. Thinkers like WILLIAM OF OCKHAM gave such theological precedence to God's absolute will and power to do anything that little could be said about the character of God from the nature of things, since God could just have easily made all things differently than he did. This loss of a proper theology of the Creator and his providence would have a deleterious effect in the ensuing periods as the relation of the world to God came to be such a crucial issue with the rise of modern science.

In organizing the subject matter of theology into a discipline, scholastic theology of the Medieval period tended to discuss God and the works of God not in the historical order of the economy of salvation, but in a systematic or synthetic order in which terms and topics are related to one another. The dialectical reasoning and the metaphysical framework gave precision in defining and relating theological doctrines for the sake of clarity in understanding. A natural consequence of its abstract, universal and technical language was that it was hardly suited to express the immediacy and vitality of the experiential, concrete and historical through which God is encountered. Since its rational investigation of the divine mystery always presupposed the foundational necessity of faith and never claimed to comprehend the ineffable God, scholastic theology in no way replaced the God of revelation with the God of philosophy. Even as the task of interpreting Scripture remained the primary responsibility of the medieval theologian, theology sought not to reiterate the historical manifestation of God in the economy of salvation but to explicate the attributes and operations of God such an economy presupposes.

The Modern Period. The period from the Reformation to the First VATICAN COUNCIL at the end of the nineteenth century sees a gradual break-up of the medieval synthesis, as new discoveries and new questions lead to fundamental revisions in how the world, society and the human individual are conceived. In an era that saw the loss of the religious unity of western society, the emergence of the modern scientific understanding of nature, and the development of nation states, political rights, and the industrial economy, the centrality and universality of God for the understanding of the world and the human weakens over time. The emergence of secular society and atheistic totalitarian states by the twentieth century will be due in large part to a growing opposition between reason and faith and a more autonomous understanding of the world and human existence. Over time the idea of God becomes a “problem” for intellectuals who have difficulty considering revelation as anything more than a primitive, man-made conception of God, and who deny human reason the ability to know anything definitive about God, including whether he exists.

In the heritage left by NOMINALISM, it is not surprising that major Reformation writers like Martin LUTHER and John CALVIN have little place in their thought for a theology of creation. In their defense of the utter gratuity of salvation they tended to exalt God over and against natural causality, with the God of revelation placed in opposition to the God of philosophy and the life of grace opposed to the life of natural virtue. Luther was dismissive of the contribution Aristotle or philosophy could make to theology, and sought to develop a purely Scriptural theologia crucis which in its focus upon the paradox and foolishness of the crucified God overturned the theologia gloriae of scholastic theology. For Calvin, the sovereignty of God, divine honor and glory, and the determinations of his will are central to his theology. Providence is not the Creator working through and with creatures so that they might act for the greater good, but God acting arbitrarily either with, without or even against natural means in order to manifest his sovereign glory (Institutes of the Christian Religion, Bk 3, 17). The clear opposition in Reformation thought between grace and nature, faith and reason reflects an assumption that affirmations of the created good come at the expense of God’s greatness. The “world” in their thinking is not the goodness of God’s creation, but another sense found in Scripture: the world as “all that is opposed to God.”

From its beginnings and throughout much of its progress modern science was the achievement of men who were quite religious in their thinking. They saw nature as the creative work of God, and studying it as a way to know the ways of God. Yet their tendency to conceive of nature as inert matter subject to mechanical forces ordered by absolute, universal and immutable laws ultimately fostered a worldview in which the historical actions of the personal God of the Scriptures could only be an alien interference. As science endeavored more and more to explain all reality with totally natural explanations, the universe came to be understood as a closed system, the cosmos a giant mechanism of rigidly determined outcomes, with God’s role reduced simply to setting things up. This was the God of deism, and as science advanced further and found the origins of the universe and life to be different than that of the biblical account, nature came to be seen as the only necessary and reliable “revelation” of God. Miracles were denied outright not only because the biblical accounts could not be trusted in their historical accuracy or understanding of nature, but also because they were seen only as violations of the laws of nature, reflecting badly on God the perfect engineer and lawgiver. Even though the theories and discoveries of twentieth-century science led to a correction of the closed, mechanical worldview of early science, there survives the propensity to limit reality only to what is material (i.e., natural materialism) and knowledge only to what science can demonstrate (i.e., positivism or scientism). Gradually the cosmos loses its sacred character, as science no longer considers it to be the creation authored by a personal God, the arena in which God is providentially active, and the symbol and image of a greater, heavenly reality that is the true home for the human spiritual animal. Religion and science come to be seen as opposed or irrelevant to one another, to the detriment of both.

Parallel to the development of modern science is the emergence of modern philosophy which again at first was the work of believers but contained within it principles that tended toward atheism. Modern philosophy was concerned most of all with epistemological questions and politics, and in both a dualism develops between what is rational and what is religious. God was central to the thought of early modern philosophers like René DESCARTES and Benedict Spinoza, who variously endeavored to demonstrate his existence and the implications God has for knowledge and ethics. But Descartes would contribute to the future split between reason and faith by rejecting all previous philosophy, espousing a radical dualism between mind and matter, and practicing a radical skepticism of all that is not innately clear to the mind or demonstrably proven. In his pantheism Spinoza would collapse the distinction between God and the world and labor to replace what he considered to be the weaknesses of Scriptural revelation with a more rational philosophical conception of God. In both thinkers faith is not an admirable form of knowledge, and the incomprehensibility of God's mystery does not temper the reliance upon reason.

The philosopher Immanuel KANT, on the basis of his epistemological critique of pure reason, came to deny the very legitimacy and value of metaphysics, throwing into doubt whether it is possible to know any reality beyond the appearances of things. Because his position ruled out all cosmological proofs for God's existence, Kant developed one on the basis of practical reason. Moral behavior depends upon an absolutely universal or "categorical imperative" which points to the existence of a God who alone is in position to posit such a law. The net effect is to remove God from the dimension of what is true to what is valued. Eventually the fact that human knowledge is acquired in a subjective process leads to the conclusion that objective knowledge of God is impossible; the human encounter with God can only take place in the will and the emotions. By the nineteenth century, this agnosticism flowers into an explicit atheism of radical autonomy. Ludwig FEUERBACH reduces theology to anthropology by claiming God is the projection and image of human ideals and aspirations. Karl MARX considers religion to be a man-made illusion, numbing mankind to tolerate political and economic injustices in the false hope of a heavenly kingdom to come. Friedrich NIETZSCHE proclaims that "God is dead for we have killed him," an indictment of the insignificance God has for modern culture as much as an acknowledgement that the idea of God is no longer tenable. In all of these ideologies there lies an assumption that atheism indicates a new maturity in human thought, and a hope that men and women emancipated from their childish dependency on God can create an ideal human future.

The ecclesial divisions arising after the Reformation and the warfare between Catholics and Protestants initiated a search for civil peace and social cohesion that did not have to depend upon a unity in belief, a major contributing factor to the eventual displacement of God from the center of human political life. The bad example of violent persecution given by both sides promoted a distrust of religious authority and extremism, and as tolerance of diversity in belief became a social necessity religious faith moved from the category of universal, binding truth to that of personal opinion. The Reformation's call for emancipation from religious authority was extended to unwanted civil authority, and over time a theory of individual, inalienable rights and government established by the will of the people replaced the more medieval politics of monarchial rule established by the will of God. The organization of industrial production and the application of scientific discoveries in new technologies supported the new hubris that man has mastery over nature and can redeem himself from problems and miseries that in the past he could only pray to God to alleviate. These great political and economic changes confirmed that the modern world was indeed a new age, making it easier for many to believe more in human progress than in any religion from the past.

Catholic theology in this period solidified into a practice and a posture better able to critique the erroneous than appreciate and engage what was novel and worthwhile in the modern era. Theology corrected the mistaken notions concerning God's nature, existence and action, refuting PANTHEISM, DEISM, ATHEISM and denials of revelation and the supernatural. It also challenged the opposition modernity put between faith and reason in human knowledge of God, countering the RATIONALISM, FIDEISM and AGNOSTICISM of the age. Yet even as theology disputed modern ideas and values there was often an unrecognized assimilation of some of its principles or perspectives. For example, the Cartesian quest for indubitable certainty influenced theological practice as it became as much concerned about the varying degrees of credibility and authority of different doctrines as their understanding. And the arguments theologians gave for God's existence and relevance favored the abstract, universal and thus rather impersonal ways of reasoning that were closer to the tone and language of their opponents than that of the biblical revelation. There was much reliance upon demonstrations of the truth and refutations of error to convince, less upon showing the meaning, beauty and contemporary significance of divine mysteries in order to inspire and move the heart. The success of scholastic theology in organizing the subject of theology discouraged different ways of arranging and discussing the material more suitable for the times, and eventually its distinctions calcified into divisions that often left the doctrines isolated from one another and their interconnections.

Vatican Council I, echoing the teaching of St. Paul in the Epistle to the Romans, declared that God's existence can be "known with certainty by the natural light of human reason from the things that have been made." In response to the extreme IMMANENTISM so conducive to agnosticism and the equally perilous fideism of extreme traditionalism, ecclesiastical documents were forthcoming to express Catholic teaching more specifically. Against traditionalism, Gregory XVI taught that "reason can prove with certainty the existence of God" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 2751; cf. Pius IX, Denzinger 2812). Pope Pius IX taught that "human reason . . . perceives and well understands . . . many truths such as the existence of God . . . [and] demonstrates these by arguments drawn from its own principles" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 2853). Pope LEO XIII in the encyclical letter Aeterni Patris taught that "certain truths that are either divinely proposed for belief, or are bound by the closest ties to a doctrine of faith, were known by pagan sages with nothing but their natural reason to guide them, were, moreover, demonstrated and proved by suitable arguments" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 3136). He affirmed that the demonstration of God's existence is a great and noble fruit of human reason. With particular reference to the Modernists, Pope St. PIUS X insisted on this explicit statement of Catholic belief "that God, the origin and end of all things, can be known with certainty by the natural light of reason 'from the created world' [cf. Rom 1.20], that is, from the visible works of creation, as a cause from its effects, and that His existence can even be demonstrated" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 3538). Pope Pius XI in his encyclical Studiorum ducem [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 15 (1923) 317] called this an outstanding statement of the dogma solemnly defined by Vatican I, although it is true that the Council for reasons of its own used its own expression and omitted the word demonstration. Yet to say that man can know God with certainty by the light of human reason by means of things that are made implies at least the kind of intellectual operation that man ordinarily calls proof.

Nevertheless, Vatican I reminded theology that its primary task is to shed light upon the mysteries of the faith and their interrelations, not to determine their credibility: "Nevertheless, if reason illumined by faith inquires in an earnest, pious and sober manner, it attains by God's grace a certain understanding of the mysteries, which is most fruitful, both from the analogy with the objects of its natural knowledge and from the connection of these mysteries with one another and with our ultimate end" (Vatican I, Dei Filius, chap 4; H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 3016).

The Contemporary Period. As with the preceding eras, the contemporary understanding of God is an understanding of the Christian revelation of God by means of certain forms of thought characteristic of the times. The contemporary way of thinking theologically is well represented in VATICAN COUNCIL II, a pastoral, as distinct from a dogmatic, council, called for the purpose of better communicating the Gospel to the modern world. Although the council did not concern itself with a further elaboration of the Church's doctrinal teaching about God's nature in himself, in its declaration on Divine Revelation (Dei Verbum) the council presented a summary of the biblical revelation of the God of salvation. While the council considered its teaching in perfect conformity with that of Vatican I, there is a marked shift in the style and language of theological presentation. Instead of listing the essential attributes of the eternal God in the terminology of scholastic theology, Vatican II returns to language of Scripture to emphasize who God is for us and how the good news remains relevant for the modern world. Vatican II acknowledges that Christian understanding of the faith has undergone historical development, and that communication of the truth of God must include a process of enculturation in order to be effective. In the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (Gaudium et spes), the Church enters into dialogue with the modern world, distinguishes different kinds and causes of modern atheism, and through a theological anthropology revealed in the humanity of Jesus Christ makes the counter-argument that only faith in God manifests, preserves and upholds the greatness of human dignity.

This conciliar change in theological presentation is symbolic of a wider, methodological shift within the contemporary practice of theology: a change from metaphysical formulations and categories (being, causality, relation) to historical descriptions and the categories of personal experience (event, meaning, relationship). In the effort to promote the relevance and meaning God should have for the modern person, and thus to counteract modern ideological atheism and secularism, theology after the Council has made great effort to connect the mystery of God with the mystery of the human person and salvation. This is done with explicit attention to the human contribution in the mediation of revelation and tradition and consideration of the way God is experienced within the conditions of human subjectivity. Consequently, God is considered less in terms of the eternal perfections of his own being expressed in an unchanging, technical vocabulary purged of historical referents, and more in terms of the meaning and transformative effect he has upon those whom he encounters. The challenge is to reaffirm God's active immanence in the world without compromising his transcendence, and to express the meaning he represents while not reducing his mystery to that meaning or making it entirely relative to the disparities of times, cultures, and individual experiences.

Within contemporary Catholic theology there are different approaches that try to bridge the gulf that has appeared between God and modern experience. Historical theologians like Henri DE LUBAC and Yves CONGAR contributed much to the renewal of theology by initiating a project of ressourcement that sought to recover the richness and diversity within the long Catholic tradition. De Lubac in particular argued against atheism and secularism not by rational demonstrative proofs of God's existence but by giving expression to the deep-seated experience of and orientation to God, fundamental to the human creature made in the image of God. The principle that it is natural and constitutional, not extrinsic or supplemental, for the human person to desire and seek God is the premise of his repudiation of a dualistic conception of the natural and supernatural within neo-Thomistic theology, a dualism that facilitated and reflected the modern tendency to divorce the human good from eternal blessedness.

In a manner more epistemological and psychological, Karl RAHNER and Bernard LONERGAN also made the openness of the human person to the transcendent fundamental to their theological approach. For Rahner, human experience in the world involves an engagement with finite being that presupposes an unrestricted openness of the human mind to Absolute Being; God is the transcendental a priori—the condition for the very possibility—of human knowing. Because of his infinite transcendence beyond all human conceptions, God who is Absolute Being is also Absolute Mystery. In order for man to fulfill his inherent orientation to God he stands in need of divine revelation, in which God communicates himself while remaining wholly mysterious. Along similar lines, Lonergan built upon his historical research in the thought of Thomas Aquinas on grace and the word of understanding (verbum) in order to represent and advance that achievement within the modern context. His work on grace and freedom resolved the centuries old De auxiliis controversy between the positions of Luis de MOLINA and Domingo BANEZ on how to reconcile God's eternal knowledge and will with the contingent free acts of human beings, and prepared for further work that outlined how a world that develops according to statistical probabilities and the dynamics of human behavior can be understood in a theology of God's providence. His work in epistemology recovered the critical realism lost in modern philosophy's collapse into subjectivism, reaffirmed the possibility of metaphysics, and showed how human reasoning retains its natural authenticity as it moves on to and is transformed by the act of faith.

All these theologians whose work straddle Vatican II were aware of the inadequacies of neo-scholastic theology, and they developed new theological methods in order to overcome its deficiencies. Though they considered a strictly metaphysical approach incomplete, still they did not doubt its legitimacy. It is evident, however, that many theologians after them are less discriminating in their dismissal of this earlier theological method and its achievements. One finds today a rather widespread rejection of the God of "classical theism" (i.e., medieval scholasticism) and its philosophical presentation of the attributes of God's being. As theology has become so firmly rooted in human experience that God is only considered in relation to us, an approach that seeks to relate God and creation through the universal category of being is found to be rather alien and too impersonal. Yet the God of classical theism is primarily rejected for more specific reasons: the attributes of absolute divine immutability and impassibility central to its understanding of God are denounced as incompatible with the God of Christian faith. A fundamental theological revision of God's perfection first proposed at the end of the nineteenth century has been embraced by a growing majority of both Protestant and Catholic theologians at end of the twentieth. Much of recent contemporary theology is beholden to the idea that God indeed changes and suffers, whether in the sense that it is his eternal nature to do so, or because he freely chooses to make himself be affected by creation and its outcomes. There are many and various contributing causes for this, including biblical hermeneutics, process philosophy, and an extension of the dynamics of relationship which constitute the Trinity to God's relationship with the world.

The justification for divine mutability and passibility in some contemporary biblical exegesis arises when the anthropopathisms of the biblical language are considered not as an accommodation to its human audience but as expressive of the true character of God. The Old Testament revelation of a God who so intimately covenants with his people that he grieves over their infidelity is taken to mean that the Scriptures reveal God to be truly affected and changed by his relationship with humanity. Similarly, the crucifixion of Jesus in the New Testament, when considered as the definitive moment of God's self-revelation, indicates that suffering is at the very center of the mystery of God. Influential here are Luther's theology from the cross (kreuzestheologie) and kenotic Christology of the nineteenth century, leading Eberhard Jüngel, Jürgen Moltmann and others to argue that the passion and death of Jesus, one who is God, occurs in and impacts the divine nature. For God to truly suffer on the cross, he must suffer divinely, and so the cross becomes expressive of the mysterious nature of divine suffering itself.

These readings of Scripture are bolstered by the historical claim that the Christian tradition compromised biblical revelation when it accepted the influence and principles of Greek philosophy. Briefly stated, the early Church fathers replaced the passionate God of the Hebrews with the more rationally appealing Unmoved Mover of the Greeks, and only now is theology correcting this mistake by once again daring to uphold that God truly changes and suffers. Despite the growing acceptance of this understanding of revelation and tradition, it is ultimately untenable. Biblically, it fails to account that Yahweh is always immanent in creation and covenant in a completely transcendent manner, and that the kenosis of the Logos is the assumption of a human nature which according to Chalcedon remains integral and unconfused with his divine nature (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 300–302). (On the cross God did indeed suffer and die, but precisely as a man did the Son of God do so.) And in regard to the early tradition, not only would such a fundamental distortion of the Gospel be impossible to reconcile with the Holy Spirit's guidance of the Church, it is wholly incongruent with the great effort of the Church fathers to refute many Greco-Roman ideas about God precisely in order to remain true to the Scriptural revelation.

In process thought, developed by Alfred WHITEHEAD and applied to theology by Charles HARTSHORNE and John Cobb, Jr., “becoming” replaces “being” as the fundamental category of reality. God is reconceived as absolute infinite possibility in the process of realization through the world's becoming. Though distinct from the world in his necessary primordial nature, God in his conditional consequent nature is identified with the world (PANENTHEISM), as he actualizes his possibilities in and through the good that comes into concrete existence in the world. Process thought is favored by many endeavoring to rework theology in the light of modern science, convinced that a God in process with the world corresponds to the current scientific worldview of the natural world as fundamentally evolutionary. The immutability, omniscience and omnipotence of the classical God of theism may have fit a static world proceeding whole and complete from its Creator, but such attributes could only preclude a true divine openness to and involvement in a world of random, undetermined outcomes. Thus process theology is considered a better alternative for contemporary theology than traditional metaphysics for explaining the God-world relation, even though it is incompatible with official Church teaching on the absolute perfection and immutability of God. Yet in compromising the transcendence of God for the sake of his immanence, process theology loses the full sense of God as Creator and Lord (Pantokrator), and changes the meaning of salvation from a free work on our behalf to a necessary process needed as much by God as by us. And in preferring the God of becoming over the God of pure act, process theologians sacrifice the distinction between God and the created order, that which is precisely so crucial for a genuine dialogue between theology and science.

Finally, the God of absolute perfection without need of or real relation to the world is also critiqued and dismissed upon the basis of the renewal in Trinitarian theology. One of the positive developments in contemporary theology has been to make the TRINITY once again central to all theological discussion. Yet following Rahner's rejection of the traditional procedure in Western tradition to discuss the divine essence before the distinction of the divine persons, contemporary discussion of the Trinity usually begins and stays focused upon the dynamics of the divine persons in relation to one another. While this allows a proper characterization of divine nature within the terms of relationship and being-for-the-other, it is not complemented with discussion of the divine essence in contrast to the created order. Instead, under the influence of Rahner's axiom that the immanent Trinity is the economic Trinity and vice versa, the essence of God to be intrinsically relational is often applied without proper qualification to the God-world relation. It is argued that since God is love, and to love is to be for the other, for God to truly love the world as he has revealed is for him to make himself open to its response and vulnerable to its rejection. The relationship between God and the world must therefore be genuinely mutual, co-defining to both, in which each is deeply affected by the other. Classical theism, therefore, was mistaken to place God's perfection in his being complete in himself and unaffected by the world, for divine immutability and impassibility are antithetical to his Triune nature as pure relationship and love.

The current judgment within theological circles that divine IMMUTABILITY and IMPASSIBILITY are actually imperfections, suggesting that God is aloof, apathetic and unsympathetic to the tragic suffering in the world, is, however, simply mistaken. It reflects a failure to truly engage and appreciate the concerns and achievement of patristic and medieval theology, which focused upon the revelation of God as existence (Ex 3:14) in order to relate all creation, including that which is impersonal and thus outside the category of relationships, with the transcendent and actively immanent Creator. The strength of traditional theism to properly express the dynamics of the Creator-created relation should not be abandoned. The created order is the necessary foundation for rightly understanding the economy of salvation in which God is revealed as Trinity. Without the judgment that God is pure Act, achieved through the analogical contrast of God and his creation, the perfection of the triune God as purely relational risks the reduction of God's transcendent mystery to the conditions of human experience and finite existence. As God is, so does God save us, but under conditions that are not the equal of him; Yahweh is indeed present in the midst of his people, but always as wholly other.

What is needed today is a theology of God that can effectively combine the traditional and contemporary emphases together: the one God who as the act of existence itself is also and therefore the triune God of pure relation. God is, and so the Father, Son and Holy Spirit who are for each other so perfectly that their love cannot be lessened or augmented, act through the missions of Son and Spirit to bring human creatures into the fullness of who they are. Divine immutability and impassibility function here in the positive manner in which they were originally affirmed: as a safeguard which preserves divine transcendence and consequently allows the immanent Trinity to act economically, not by readjusting their nature but in complete conformity to it. In this way salvation is the perfection of human creatures by graced participation in the perfect life God is as Trinity, not the completion of God by what human beings can do to God. How much the world matters to God is shown not by how much it changes him, but that in perfect fidelity to his unconditional mystery God the Father has loved us with and in the love he always has for the Son. In turn, his receptivity to the perfect love of the Son has always included an eternal openness to the love of those whom his Son redeems.

Bibliography: Y. CONGAR, A History of Theology (Garden City, N.Y. 1968). G. L. PRESTIGE, God in Patristic Thought (London 1936). L. SCHEFFCZYK, Creation and Providence (New York 1970). D. F. FORD, ed., The Modern Theologians: An Introduction to Christian Theology in the Twentieth Century, 2nd ed. (Oxford 1997). T. G. WEINANDY, Does God Suffer? (Notre Dame, Ind. 1999). H. DE LUBAC, The Discovery of God, tr. A. DRU; footnotes tr. M. SEBANC and C. FULSOM (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1996); The Mystery of the Supernatural, tr. R. SHEED (New York 1967). M. J. BUCKLEY, At the Origins of Modern Atheism (New Haven 1987). D. B. BURRELL, Aquinas: God and Action (Notre Dame, Ind. 1979). W. J. HANKEY, God in Himself: Aquinas' Doctrine of God as Expounded in the Summa theologiae (New York 1987). A. F. KIMEL, JR., ed., Speaking the Christian God: The Holy Trinity and the Challenge of Christian Feminism (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1992). B. J. F. LONERGAN, Philosophy of God, and Theology (London 1973). T. C. ODEN, The Living God: Systematic Theology, Volume 1 (San Francisco 1987). K. RAHNER, "The Concept of Mystery in Catholic Theology" in Theological Investigations, v. 4, pp. 36–73, tr. K. SMYTH (New York 1982). J. M. STEBBINS, The Divine Initiative: Grace, World-Order, and Human Freedom in the Early Writings of Bernard Lonergan (Toronto 1995). P. S. FIDDES, The Creative Suffering of God (New York 1988). C. HARTSHORNE, Omnipotence and Other Theological Mistakes (Albany 1984). E. JÜNGEL, God as the Mystery of the World: On the Foundation of the Theology of the Crucified One in the Dispute between Theism and Atheism, tr. D. L. GUDER (Edinburgh 1983). J. MOLTSMANN, The Crucified God: The Cross of Christ as the Foundation and Criticism of Christian Theology, tr. R. A. WILSON and J. BOWDEN (London 1976).

[M. A. HOONHOUT/J. R. GILLIS/R. J. BUSCHMILLER]

GOD (FATHER)

The order of treatment is God as father in the Old Testament, God as father in the New Testament, and, finally, God as father in doctrinal development and theology.

God as Father in the Old Testament. Contrary to what one might be inclined to presume, explicit use of the father symbol to designate the Deity was extremely rare in the Old Testament. Nor was explicit use, when and as it did occur, original with the Hebrew people. However, neither of these considerations is so significant as would appear, for, quite aside from instances of formal designation, there is the far more important personal and clearly paternalist dimension that marked such concepts as that of lord and sovereign, creator, deliverer, and partner in covenant relationship. But this brings one to the heart of what was both distinctive and original in the Hebrew monotheistic faith.

The simple fact of more ancient, as well as broadly contemporary, parallels—Babylonia's Father of the Land, Greece's Father Zeus—points up the ultimate normalcy and spontaneity of conceiving a god as a father in human psychology. Further, this basic expectation is intensified when one turns to the cultural ancestors of the Hebrews specifically. For, as J. Jeremias has noted (The Lord's Prayer 17–18), here the paternal deity is no mere procreator but a merciful and gracious father. Nevertheless, all of this is still quite remote when compared with the highly developed and nuanced father symbol that emerged from within the strictly Hebraic concept of a God of history—a history that was itself conceived not as of men exactly but as of Yahweh-with-us.

A God who was lord and sovereign was by that alone, implicitly, and to some minimal extent, father. But the sovereignty of this God extended to the activity of universal creation, thus making His fatherhood more concrete and more meaningful. Finally, though in the revelation of SALVATION HISTORY it was actually prior, this Creator-Lord was Israel's very special deliverer and covenant partner. This specification of the fatherhood of Israel's God is brought out very neatly in Mal 2.10: "Have we not all one father? Has not one God created us? Why then are we faithless to one another, profaning the covenant of our fathers?" It was in the Sinaitic covenant that Israel was bound together as sacred family whose head and father was the God who had delivered them from the bondage of Egypt and taken them unto His own. Hence, it is only in the same covenant relationship that the divine fatherhood as conceived by the Israelites—with its overtones of unique beneficence, intimacy, personalness—can really be appreciated. Even the righteousness of God, since essentially it was fidelity to His covenant promises, was reduced to the sustaining, as it were, of this fatherhood of unique and gratuitous election.

Scenes from Genesis showing God (the Father) with Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden, detail of a 13th-century mosaic in the narthex of the Basilica of St. Mark, Venice.

God as Father in the New Testament. The New Testament witnesses a twofold development. First, there is a highly significant deepening of the symbolism in the area of intimacy and familiarity. From the studies of J. Jeremias, who relies mainly on the testimony of the Antiochene Fathers, it appears (op. cit. 18–21) that the Aramaic term 'abbā' must have been used by Jesus Himself and that the intimacy which it connoted was of far-reaching theological importance. "He, to whom the Father had granted full knowledge of God, had the messianic prerogative of addressing Him with the familiar address of a child" (ibid. 20). But Jesus did not reserve this prerogative to Himself. If Jeremias is correct (ibid. 17), Jesus Himself authorized His disciples to address the heavenly Father with this same term when He gave them the famous Lord's Prayer instruction. In any case, in Rom 8.15 and Gal 4.6 it is the name the believer is empowered to utter in virtue of the indwelling Spirit.

It would be incorrect, however, to consider the evidence for this deepening of the father symbol as resting exclusively, or even chiefly, on the interpretation of a single word. The argument would seem to be strong that 'abbā', the child's name for its father, is the form of address, and behind that the mentality, authentically distinctive of the new covenant. But as such, it merely condenses and renders explicit what is already present in the essential features of the new covenant even apart from the term 'abbā'. For over and above the covenant intimacy characteristic of the Old Testament, it is the key message of the New that the believer, made one with Christ through possession of Christ's very own imparted Spirit, is thereby rendered adopted and true son of the Father. As in the Old Testament, so likewise in the New, the father symbol is a function of covenant relationship.

But the New Testament makes another and far more radical addition. Yahweh is father in the Old Testament exclusively with respect to creatures. In the New Testament His fatherhood is revealed as extending back into the recesses of the Godhead itself. It is only now that the Father as one distinct first emerges for to say that the Father was revealed in the Old Testament, Son and Spirit in the New, is actually, but perhaps unwittingly, to presume knowledge of the Trinity for the Old Testament. In referring to the Old Testament, it is more correct to say not that the Father was revealed but that God was revealed as father.

From the New Testament, however, one learns that God is father not only with respect to creatures but also, first and foremost—eternally—with respect to His own divine Son. It is this eternal sonship upon which the sonship of adoption, the sonship of the new covenant, is based and in which it is made to share.

God as Father in Doctrinal Development and Theology. In the great period of the evolution of Trinitarian dogma leading up to Constantinople I in 381, and thereafter, attention became focused on what might be called the ontological, rather than historical, concept of divine fatherhood. This happened as the Christian consciousness began to wrestle with the problem of a true plurality in the Godhead. In a sense God was one. In another and necessarily different sense God was nevertheless three—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. God was one, it was eventually determined, in the sense of being, majesty, power; or somewhat more technically, in the sense of NATURE or essence. And God was three in the sense of Person or HYPOSTASIS. The reason, moreover, why this was not a contradiction, though it remained very much a mystery, was that Father and Son, to take the first two members, differed from one another not in nature or essence but only in the relative property of fatherhood and sonship respectively. Everything the Father was, the Son was also, excepting only fatherhood.

Two things can be said in historical retrospect of this concentration on the ontological aspect of the divine fatherhood. First, it was necessary. The ancient Christian spirit could not go on confessing one God, distinctly Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, if there were no satisfactory reply to both the subordinationist and Sabellian oversimplifications. Second, however, the concentration meant that everything else that was to be said of God's fatherhood—as drawn from the revelation of both the Old and New Testaments—was being presupposed or taken for granted. But this created a risk. Eventually one can lose sight of what is presupposed and taken for granted in matters of Christian belief and theology. It simply has to be recalled, quite explicitly. A proof of such a need, and one that touches directly on the subject of God the Father, is seen in the strange fact that Roman Catholics often take the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man to be a Protestant rather than a Catholic point of doctrine. Fortunately, however, and with profound ecumenical consequences, this naive attitude is in the process of being corrected in the wake of the Roman Catholic, as well as Protestant, Biblical revival.

The fatherhood of God has a special significance in the question of the divine plurality, but this is neither its only nor its primary significance. In the drama of salvation we return to the Father—and return is the right word inasmuch as the Father is source as well as end of all reality, even in the Godhead—we return, therefore, to the Father, to our Father, as one with Christ Jesus, sharing by adoption in His own sonship in virtue of His indwelling Spirit (see INDWELLING, DIVINE). Such is the ultimate perfection and consummation of the Old Testament covenant relationship as achieved in the New.

See Also: AGENNĒTOS; GOD, 1, 2; LORD, THE; PATERNITY, DIVINE; PERSON (IN THEOLOGY); PERSON, DIVINE; REDEMPTION (IN THE BIBLE); TRINITY, HOLY; TRINITY, HOLY, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: B. W. ANDERSON, in G. A. BUTTRICK, ed. The Interpreters' Dictionary of the Bible, 4 v. (Nashville 1962) 3:407–430. J. JEREMIAS, The Lord's Prayer, tr. J. REUMANN (Philadelphia 1964), esp. 16–21; The Parables of Jesus, tr. S. H. HOOKE (New York 1963), esp. 190–191. J. MUILENBURG, The Way of Israel (New York 1961), esp. 38–40.

[R. L. RICHARD]

GOD (HOLY SPIRIT)

The entire teaching of the Church regarding the Holy Spirit, the Third Person of the Blessed Trinity, is contained formally, either explicitly or implicitly, in Sacred Scripture (see SPIRIT OF GOD). Early Christian writers, the Fathers, and theologians of the Church under the guidance of the teaching authority of the Church, gradually made more explicit that which was contained only implicitly in the original revelation. Thus the infallible Church, in the course of time, penetrated more deeply into and became more acutely conscious of what it possessed and, gradually, solemnly defined its faith.

Catholics have always believed that the Holy Spirit is true God, a distinct Person of the Blessed Trinity, con-substantial with the Father and Son, eternal, and in every respect equal to the other two Divine Persons. Such is the profession of the earliest CREEDS (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1–75), including the so-called Creed of Epiphanius (ibid. 42–45) and the so-called ATHANASIAN CREED (ibid. 75–76). It is also the profession of the NICENE (ibid. 125–126) and Constantinopolitan (ibid. 150) Creeds. In the early Church, however, there were not yet formulated clearly the manner of the Spirit's procession, the source from which He proceeds, and the role of the Son in the procession of the Holy Spirit.

Patristic Teaching. The early Christian writers, St. Clement of Rome (c. 95) and St. Ignatius of Antioch (d. 107) join the Holy Spirit with Father and Son as one God. Justin Martyr (d. c. 167) and Athenagoras (c. 177), relying on the baptismal formula (Mt 28.19), clearly teach that the Spirit is God. Tertullian (d. c. 222) adds that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father through the Son. Gregory Thaumaturgus (d. 270) stresses the inseparability of the Divine Persons. From the Holy Spirit's giving man a share in the divine nature St. Athanasius (373) proves His divinity and says that the Spirit has the same relation to the Son as the Son to the Father. St. Cyril of Jerusalem (386) insists on the one nature in three Persons and that the Father works through the Son in the Spirit. In the West, St. Hilary (366) continues this teaching in his De Trinitate. In the East, the Cappadocian Fathers, SS. Basil (c. 379), Gregory of Nazianzus (c. 390), and Gregory of Nyssa (Basil's brother, c. 394), develop past teaching by stressing that the Spirit proceeds and is not begotten as is the Son. In the West, St. Augustine (430) develops the doctrine of the Spirit. As true God, He proceeds from Father and Son as from one principle, as their bond of union in love. St. Cyril of Alexandria (444), like Athanasius, puts his doctrine of the Spirit into the context of sanctification. St. John Damascene (end of 7th century to before 754) emphasizes the equality of the Spirit with Father and Son, since the Son and Spirit have everything the Father has except to be unbegotten. The Spirit is not the son of the Father, but His Spirit, and the Son's, also, because He proceeds from the Father through the Son. This patristic teaching developed in the life of the Church and later was embodied in conciliar teaching.

Conciliar Formulations. The first adversaries of the dogma were the Macedonians or Pneumatomachoi (Adversaries of the Spirit) condemned as heretics by the Second Ecumenical Council, Constantinople I, in 381 (Enchiridion symbolorum 151).

In 382 Pope St. Damasus presented a collection of canons (the famous Tome of Damasus) to bishops gathered at a local council in Rome. In these canons the Holy Spirit is said to be of one power and substance with the Father and the Son. The Spirit is eternal, from the Father, of the divine substance, and true God. The Holy Spirit can do all and knows all and, as Father and Son, is everywhere. The three Persons, having everything in common, are perfectly equal to one another in all things and have complete dominion over all creatures. Hence, the Holy Spirit must be adored by all creatures, just as must Father and Son (ibid. 153, 162, 169, 170, 173, 174).

In 675 the Eleventh Council of Toledo (see TOLEDO, COUNCILS OF) proposed:

We also believe that the Holy Spirit, the Third Person in the Trinity, is God, and that he is one and equal with God the Father and God the Son, of one substance as well as of one nature. However, he is not begotten nor created, but he proceeds from both and is the Spirit of both. We believe that the Holy Spirit is neither unbegotten nor begotten: lest, if we said unbegotten we should be asserting two Fathers; and if we said begotten we should appear to be preaching two Sons. He is called the Spirit, not only of the Father nor only of the Son but equally of the Father and of the Son. He proceeds not from the Father into the Son nor from the Son to sanctify creatures; but he is shown to have proceeded from both equally, because he is known as the love or the sanctity of both. This Holy Spirit therefore, is believed to be sent by the two together as the Son is sent [by the Father]; but he is not considered inferior to the Father and the Son in the way in which the Son, because of the human nature which he has assumed, testifies that he is inferior to the Father and the Holy Spirit. (ibid. 527)

The Fathers in the East had long held that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father through the Son. It was in the West, however, that the word FILIOQUE was added to the symbol of Constantinople by the Fourth Council of Braga (675; Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 4:126); subsequently it was put into the liturgy of the Western churches. Rome, although holding the Filioque, hesitated and only later on incorporated it into her liturgy, probably around 1013.

The abbot JOACHIM OF FIORE (1130–1202) accused Peter Lombard (d. 1160) of introducing four elements into the Blessed Trinity. The Fourth Lateran Council (1215) first stated the doctrine of the Trinity against the ALBIGENSES and other heretics:

. . . there is only one true God . . . the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit: three persons, indeed, but one essence, substance, or nature that is wholly simple . . . the Holy Spirit is from both the Father and the Son equally. (Enchiridion symbolorum 800)

Then, against the Abbot Joachim the council maintained its belief in that

. . . certain one supreme reality . . . which truly is the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit. That reality is the three persons taken together and each of them taken singly; and hence, there is in God only a trinity, not a quaternity . . . the same reality is the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit who proceeds from both. (ibid. 804–805)

The Second Council of LYONS (1274) is most explicit:

. . . we confess that the Holy Spirit proceeds eternally from the Father and the Son, not as from two principles, but as from one; not by two spirations but by one . . . we condemn and reprobate those who presume to deny that the Holy Spirit proceeds eternally from the Father and the Son, or those who injudiciously dare to assert that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son as from two principles, and not as from one. (ibid. 850.)

And the council concludes:

And we believe that the Holy Spirit, completely and perfectly true God, proceeding from the Father and from the Son, is coequal, consubstantial, coomnipotent, and coeternal with the Father and the Son in all things. (ibid. 853)

The Council of FLORENCE (1439–45), sums up the doctrine:

. . . there is one true God, all-powerful, unchangeable, and eternal. Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, one in essence, but three in persons. The Father is not begotten; the Son is begotten of the Father; the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son.

After carefully teaching the distinction of one Person from another, the council says:

. . . the Holy Spirit alone proceeds both from the Father and equally from the Son. These three persons are one God, not three gods; for the three persons have one substance, one essence, one nature, one divinity, one immensity, one eternity. And everything is one where there is no distinction by relative opposition. (ibid. 1330)

The council then teaches the doctrine of CIRCUMINCESSION, that the three persons are wholly within one another without losing their distinction. And, finally we read:

All that the Holy Spirit is and all that he has, he has from the Father and equally from the Son. Yet the Father and the Son are not two principles of the Holy Spirit, but one principle, just as the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are not three principles of creation but one principle. (ibid. 1331)

In conclusion, the council condemns, among others, those who say that only God the Father is true God and classify the Son and the Holy Spirit as creatures (ibid. 1332).

Summary of Conciliar Teaching. It is the teaching, therefore, of the Church (1) that the Holy Spirit is true God is of faith from the various creeds, as well as from the Fourth Lateran Council, the Second Council of Lyons, and the Council of Florence; (2) that the Holy Spirit is not begotten (see GENERATION OF THE WORD) but proceeds is a dogma of faith contained in the so-called Athanasian Creed (Ouicumque), the Eleventh Council of Toledo, and equivalently from the Fourth Lateran Council and the Council of Florence; (3) that He proceeds from the Father is set forth in the anathemas of Pope Damasus and in the Constantinopolitan Creed. The procession of the Holy Spirit from both Father and Son was defined (and that according to the Latin formula Filioque, not just per Filium) in the Fourth Lateran, Second Lyons and the Council of Florence; and (4) That the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son as from one principle and by one SPIRATION has been defined by the Second Council of Lyons in a formula repeated by the Council of Florence.

Manner of Spiration, Work of the Spirit. The manner of the breathing forth of the Holy Spirit is not a matter of faith. Theologians commonly hold that, whereas the Son is begotten by intellectual generation, the Holy Spirit proceeds from the mutual love and will of Father and Son. The Eleventh Council of Toledo repeats the saying of St. Augustine that the Holy Spirit proceeds from both Father and Son, because He is the love or holiness of them both (ibid. 527). The Catechism of the Council of Trent (1.9.7) speaks of the Holy Spirit as proceeding from the divine will inflamed by love. The encyclical DIVINUM ILLUD MUNUS of LEO XIII speaks of the Holy Spirit as being the love between the Father and the Son (Enchiridion symbolorum 3326).

The Holy Spirit is the SOUL OF THE CHURCH, the MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST and dwells (see INDWELLING, DIVINE) within the soul of the person in the state of sanctifying grace (Divinum Illud Munus, Enchiridion symbolorum 3329–3331; Pius XII, MYSTICI CORPORIS, Enchiridion symbolorum 3807–3808; 3814–3815). This does not mean that the Father and Son do not also give life to the Mystical Body. This activity is appropriated to the Holy Spirit, because the work of sanctifying the Mystical Body and the individual soul bears a special resemblance to the particular personal character of the Holy Spirit (love and sanctification).

The doctrine of the Holy Spirit is developed in the works of the great theologians, such as St. Thomas's In I sent. of Peter Lombard (dd. 10–18; 31–32); C. gent. 4.15–25; Comp. theol. 45–49, 58; Summa theologiae 1, 36–38; 1, 43. Modern theologians, in general, follow the teaching of St. Thomas, adding to their treatises further developments that have been motivated by the authentic teaching of the Church.

See Also: TRINITY, HOLY, ARTICLES ON; GOD (FATHER); GOD (SON); MISSIONS, DIVINE.

Bibliography: A. PALMIERI, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 5.1:676–829. R. HAUBST, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:108–113. J. GALOT, L'Esprit d'amour (Paris 1959). A. HENRY, The Holy Spirit, tr. J. LUNDBERG and M. BELL (New York 1960). E. LEEN, The Holy Ghost . . . (New York 1937). G. GENARO, Lo Spirito di Cristo (Rome 1957). R. KOCH, Geist und Messias: Beitrag zur biblischen Theologie des Alten Testaments (Vienna 1950). L. LABAUCHE, Traité du Saint Esprit (Paris 1950). J. LEBRETON, History of the Dogma of the Trinity, tr. A. THOROLD (New York 1939). M. JUGIE, De processione Spiritus Sancti ex fontibus revelationis et secundum Orientales dissidentes (Rome 1936). J. MCMAHON, The Gift of God (Westminster, Md. 1958). T. MAERTENS, Le Souffle et l'Esprit de Dieu (Paris 1959). F. BOURASSA, "Le Saint-Esprit unité d'amour du Père et du Fils," Sciences Ecclésiastiques 14 (1962) 375–415. M. A. FATULA, The Holy Spirit: Unbounded Gift of Joy (Collegeville, Minn. 1998). A. HOLL, The Left Hand of God: A Biography of the Holy Spirit, tr. J. CULLEN (New York 1998). The Holy Spirit, Lord and Giver of Life, tr. A. BONO (New York 1997). Y. CONGAR, I Believe in the Holy Spirit, tr. D. SMITH (New York 1997); The Word and the Spirit, tr. D. SMITH (San Francisco 1986). J. MOLTSMANN, The Source of Life: The Holy Spirit and the Theology of Life, tr. M. KOHL (Minneapolis 1997); The Church in the Power of the Spirit: A Contribution to Messianic Ecclesiology, tr. M. KOHL (Minneapolis 1993). H. U. VON BALTHASAR, Creator Spirit, tr. B. MCNEIL (San Francisco 1993). On the Holy Spirit in the Life of the Church and the World: Encyclical Letter of the Supreme Pontiff John Paul II (Boston 1986). P. B. T. BILANUK, Theology and Economy of the Holy Spirit: An Eastern Approach (Bangalore 1980). K. RAHNER, The Spirit in the Church (New York 1979).

[M. J. DONNELLY]

GOD (SON)

The following consideration deals with the Father-Son relationship Christian faith professes to be found within the immanent life of God Himself. The context is thus Trinitarian; the one to whom both FILIATION and divinity are attributed is such independently of the INCARNATION since God cannot but be Father and Son, each distinct from the other. And yet man encounters that strictly divine Son of a natural, divine Father only in the historical figure Jesus of Nazareth. Until enfleshed in the latter, that relation of filiation, or concretely God the Son in His distinction from the Father, is simply not a reality affecting man sufficiently to evoke recognition and acceptance. It may be asked whether, prescinding from God as the Word of Revelation to man historically, there is within the Deity a Word distinct from the Father. An affirmative reply does not by any means deny the fact that God the Son is known in His eternal and necessary relationship to GOD THE FATHER only through the manifestation, or Word, that He is not merely in relation to the Father's thought but also in reference to historical man.

Sacred Scripture. The New Testament in particular serves as source for human knowledge of God's inner life; its perspective, however, is anything but direct in this case. The preoccupation quite clearly is not with divine vitality in itself and in its implications. Far more than being, action is in focus; and that is divine action. The question "Who is Jesus of Nazareth?" is answered in response to the query "What does He do in relation to mankind?" For it is precisely His salvific-illuminative creative function that presents Him in a frame of reference in which He occupies an utterly unique relation with God His Father or the Father.

His preexistence is asserted (Jn 1.1–3). If He is already the WORD before creatures exist, He is no less Son (Jn 1.14, 18). That same state is not one of inertia; it is represented as involving activity. In this way, Scripture associates Him with Creator rather than creature (Col 1.15–17; Heb 1.1–3, 10–12). Let it be noted that He is the intermediary or guide through whom all things have their reality, in distinction to the Father as the source, or one from whom (1 Cor 8.6). Both are said to be goal, or one to whom all things are ordered (Col 1.16; Rom 11.36), without a denial that even in this the Son depends on the Father (1 Cor 15.28). Nor is His function of guide or intermediary denied of God (the Father)—Romans 11.36.

Thus Jesus stands in relation to God before becoming a son of Mary (Phil 2.6–7). Before the world came to be, the Son was in glory with the Father, who loved Him (John 17.1, 5, 24).

The glorified Jesus is also presented, in retrospect, as endowed with a role in universal origins, and therefore not only in terms of a preexisting Son but as well in those of a preexisting Lord actually reigning (1 Cor 8.6). If all this points to equality with the Father in the order of operation (Jn 5.17, 26) and unity with Him (Jn 10.28–30; 14.10), it unmistakably as well implies a definite dependence in the Son (Jn 5.19).

The perspective of the Synoptics is somewhat different. Still Jesus is presented as Son in a unique sense (Mk 12.1–11; 13.32). Though SON OF MAN appears frequently, it introduces Him into contexts where He exercises divine prerogatives: forgiveness of sins (Mk 2.10), mastery over the law of Moses (Mk 2.28), Redemption (Mk 10.45; Mt 26.28), ultimate jurisdiction (Mk 13.26), exigence of love from men for their salvation (Mt 19.17–18; 25.40; Lk 10.27–28). His sonship is not the same as that of others in relation to the same Father.

It has not only ontological implications but psychological repercussions. Concretely this involves a mutual interchange between personal beings, at once intellectual and affective (Mt 11.25–27; Lk 10.21–22). United completely with His Father (Jn 4.34; 6.38; 10.17; 10.29–30), He is convinced that He has ready access to that Father's hearing (Jn 11.42), approval (Mk 1.11), and efficacious assistance (Mt 26.53). Thus His sonship is found connected with reverence and obedience (Heb 5.7–8).

To ask whether the New Testament presents Jesus as God the Son (see the variant reading of Jn 1.18; see also Jn 3.16, 18; 1 Jn 4.9) is to inquire about His CONSUBSTANTIALITY and seek a frame of reference for Him that was developed only later. In the Biblical context a pre-existent Son is related uniquely to the Father in counter-distinction to creatures; this in terms of their mutual activity with regard to the welfare of mankind. Consubstantiality, however, is a different perspective; in it Father and Son are related to each other as identified with a single divine substance and prescinding from their relations with humanity. To assert a difference of perspective is necessary; it is, however, the same utterly unique relationship that is expressed in both.

Patristic-Conciliar Development. If the New Testament identified Jesus with God's eternal Son, the Fathers early asserted His divinity [see Ignatius of Antioch: F. X. Funk, Patres apostolici (Tübingen 1901) 1:218, 226; Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 5:649, 660]. Divine sonship involved divinity but also origin from God. To this the Apologists applied themselves and drew a similarity between the Son or Word originating from the Father and speech arising from mind or thought in man (see Theophilus of Antioch, Ad Autolychum 2.22; Enchiridion patristicum, ed. M. J. Rouët de Journel, 182). Such attempts were accompanied by protests that to inquire into the Son's generation was beyond man (see Irenaeus, Adversus haereses 2.28.6; Patrologia Graeca 7:808–09). If the Son was still considered in relation to the Father, His filiation as prior to and independent of creatures was of far more direct concern than was the case in the New Testament.

It was, however, at the Council of NICAEA that the Church was constrained by circumstances to introduce non-Biblical categories into its authentic description of the Son's relation to the Father. The Arian controversy occasioned this determination. Consubstantial; taking origin neither from nothing nor from preexisting beings but from the Father's own substance; begotten, not made—these are His characteristics (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer, 125–26). The Cappadocians emphasized that the difference between Father and Son rests not in the one's positing and verifying in Himself a perfection the other lacks; rather in a relation by which the same Godhead exists in Father and Son, but in the latter from the former (see Gregory of Nazianzus, Orat. 29.16; Patrologia Graeca 36:96). Augustine sought in man's psychology or way of knowing the natural analogate for understanding the eternal generation of the Son (Trin. 12.6.6 and 15.11.20; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 42: 1001, 1072).

Subsequent Theology. It was the contribution of the Latin Middle Ages to develop this analogy further. The Son's consubstantiality and procession were put into an intelligible and interrelated whole by Thomas Aquinas when he introduced the hypothesis of intellectual emanations within the Godhead (Summa theologiae 1a, 27.1; see PROCESSIONS, TRINITARIAN).

Contemporary Christian theology has focused attention on the danger that exaggerated emphasis of the immanent aspect of Trinitarian life may be detrimental to a balanced view of the roles played by Divine Persons in the economy of salvation. Special interest has been regenerated in the fact that man's sonship of adoption is connected with the sonship of Jesus Himself. The former is a share in the latter, man acquiring a filial relation to the Father. This, however, involves no divine action of the Son distinct from that of the Father (Enchiridion symbolorum 1330).

What is required for God the Son to become man in Jesus Christ, what, in other words, the mission of God the Son involves besides His eternal procession, is another theological question that has aroused interest in the past few decades; the hypotheses of quasi-formal causality and contingent predications have been introduced in this context (see B. Lonergan, De Deo trino v.2:217–60).

If the modern world has investigated the relationship between person and consciousness, the same question has been asked about Divine Persons (ibid. 186–93). The answers that have been given indicate a diversity in the way consciousness is understood.

See Also: TRINITY, HOLY, ARTICLES ON; GENERATION OF THE WORD; HOLY SPIRIT; LOGOS

Bibliography: P. RICHARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–5) 5.2:2353–2476. H. DE LAVALETTE et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed., J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:543–62. S. MORENZ et al., Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 6:118–25. F. BÜCHSEL G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 4:747–49. B. LONERGAN, De Deo trino, 2 v. (v.1 2d ed., v.2 3d ed. Rome 1964). V. TAYLOR, The Person of Christ in New Testament Teaching (New York 1959). P. MCSHANE, "The Hypothesis of Intelligible Emanations in God," Theological Studies 23 (1962) 545–68.

[C. J. PETER]

GOD, INTUITION OF

The intuition of God refers to an immediate apprehension of God as He is in Himself. Since God is a spirit, this intuition cannot be a sense perception, but must be an act of the intellect knowing God directly, immediately, as object.

Some modern philosophers speak of an obscure intuition of God in that primordial intuition of self as contingent being (being-with-nothingness) and as part of a larger whole that is also being-with-nothingness. This whole demands as sufficient reason for its existing, the existence of another being, who is being-without-nothingness, Absolute Being. This is not a direct apprehension of God as object, however, but rather an intuitive experience of the contingency of being-with-nothingness, which leads the mind to recognize the necessary existence of Absolute Being.

The mystics speak of an intuition of God in infused CONTEMPLATION, but all admit that this supernatural experience of God as He is in Himself is given in the darkness of faith and is not an immediate, direct apprehension of the divine essence. If this is so, is intuition of God possible for a created intellect?

Revelation. Man's vocation to the intimacy of friendship with God is found in the OT. The full revelation that those who love God will so share in His life and beatitude that they will "see" Him in His Godhead is not given until the coming of the WORD into the world as God-Man, and the special mission of the Holy Spirit to the New Israel. The intuition of God, in the strict sense, is realized only in this supernatural intellectual vision of God as He is in Himself, known as the BEATIFIC VISION, because it gives its possessor a created share in God's own happiness. This immediate and intimate knowledge of the triune God and of the Word Incarnate is, in fact, the fullness of eternal life (cf. Jn 17.3; 1 Jn 3.2). Except for Christ [see JESUS CHRIST, III (SPECIAL QUESTIONS), 1, 6], the God-Man, this vision is reserved to the next life and is given only to those who die in the friendship of God and after their purification, should they need such purification (cf. 1 Cor 13.12; Mt 5.8; Heb 12.14).

Development. The Church's faith in the beatific vision as the ultimate end of all who die in Christ was firm from the beginning. In the development of this doctrine, she became fully aware that since the Ascension of Christ into heaven, the beatific vision is given to souls who die in grace as soon as they have been purified and before their resurrection. In his definition of the immediacy of the beatific vision, since the Passion and death of Christ, for all who die in grace (including those who died before the Incarnation), Pope Benedict XII declared that even before the resumption of their bodies and the general judgment, these souls "have beheld and do behold the divine essence with intuitive and face-to-face vision, with no creature mediating in the manner of object seen, but the divine essence immediately showing itself to them plainly, clearly, and openly, and seeing in this way, they have full enjoyment of that same divine essence." Moreover, this "intuitive, face-to-face vision and enjoyment . . . exists continuously without any interruption . . . to the last judgment and from then on forever" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [32d ed. Freiburg 1963] 1000–01). The Council of Florence gave further precision to this doctrine by defining that these souls "see clearly the triune and one God Himself, just as He is, yet one more perfectly than another, according to the diversity of merits" (Enchiridion symbolorum 1304–05).

Theology. All knowledge requires a union of knower and known on the ontological level of the knower, but no created idea of God can be God known as He is in Himself. Therefore, for a created intellect to know the divine essence, that intellect must be united directly to God so that the divine essence itself, as the object understood, actuates the intellect to the act of knowing. For such an act of knowing, the knower must be assimilated supernaturally to the triune God. Now all created gifts of grace are effected in the soul by God both as the consequence of, and the disposition for, His gift of Himself to His intellectual creature. Grace and charity are a beginning of assimilation to the Godhead and have as their finality the beatific vision. For this vision, however, the intellect must be further strengthened and perfected by the light of glory, that supernatural actuation of the created intellect which disposes it for the act of seeing God and for immediate union with God seen. Although only God can know Himself as much as He is knowable, all the blessed know God as He is in Himself, but some more perfectly than others. Those who love God more, share more in the light of glory, and so have a greater power of knowing Him (cf. Council of Vienne, Enchiridion symbolorum 895; Summa theologiae 1a, 12; 2a2ae, 23–28; 3a Suppl., 92, 93; C. gent. 3.52, 53; Comp. theol. 2.8–10).

See Also: BENEDICTUS DEUS; CREATED ACTUATION BY UNCREATED ACT; DESTINY, SUPERNATURAL; ELEVATION OF MAN; GLORIFIED BODY; ONTOLOGISM; RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 7.2:2351–94. R. SCHNACKENBURG and K. FORSTER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:583–591. M. J. SCHEEBEN, The Mysteries of Christianity, tr. C. VOLLERT (St. Louis 1946). M. DE LA TAILLE, The Hypostatic Union and Created Actuation by Uncreated Act (West Baden, Ind. 1952). K. RAHNER, "Some Implications of the Scholastic Concept of Uncreated Grace,” Theological Investigations, tr. C. ERNST (Baltimore 1961) 1:319–346.

[M. J. REDLE]

GOD, NAME OF

The biblical use of the names for God provides a valuable insight into the richness and complexity of Semitic thought. For the Semitic peoples, an unnamed thing was a nonexistent thing; names were considered to identify and describe the very being and function of their bearers (Eccl 6.10; Gn 1.3–10; 27.36; Is 40.26). A man’s name represented him wholly, was his alter ego. To know a name was to be able to exercise influence over the owner by using it. To change a man’s name was to show one’s power and authority over him (2 Kgs 23.34; cf. Gn 2.19–20; Dt 28.10). To cut off a man’s name was the same as destroying him (Jer 11.19; Ps 82[83].5).

In religious matters, knowledge of the name of a god was considered the most effective way of establishing contact with him. The priests of BAAL tried to obtain Baal’s intervention by the repeated shouting of his name (1 Kgs 18.26–28). In Israel, where one also called upon the name of the Lord (1 Kgs 18.36–37), belief in the magical properties of the divine name never took root. The divine name was not a carefully guarded secret, whereas secrecy was an essential feature of magical names and formulas. Moreover, the Lord had freely revealed His name and commanded that He be addressed by it and by no other (Ex 3.15; 23.13). It was a name that should not be profaned (Ez 36.21). Legislation against its misuse was quite explicit (Ex 20.7).

The divine name was evocative, not only of God’s being, but of His relationship with His people. He was not the God of a land, nor of a particular city, but the God of the people of Israel, into whose life He intimately penetrated. In Israel His name was held in great esteem, and became an all-embracing part of the religious life of the nation. The “name of the Lord” was loved (Ps 5.12), praised (7.18; 148.13), and used in prayer (Jer 14.21); it was blessed (Jb 1.21), proclaimed (Dt 32.3), and thanked (Ps. 96[97].12). Israel lived and acted in His name (Mi 4.5), trusting in His help and interest (Ps 123[124].8). The divine name was synonymous with God’s glory (Is 42.8; Jer 10.6; Ps 101[102].16). Prophets spoke “in the name of the Lord,” with all His authority and power (Jer 11.21).

The Temple was built to honor the Lord’s name (2 Sm 7.13; 1 Kgs 8.16, 29). Not only did the Temple bear His name (Jer 7.10, 14); it was also His name’s abode (Dt 12.5, 21). All nations would honor the Lord’s name in Jerusalem (Jer 3.17). Isaiah declared (30.27) that the divine name comes from afar to punish Assyria. Such personifications reconciled the transcendence of Yahweh with His presence in the Temple. Eventually, Yahweh was referred to simply as “the Name” (Lv 24.11) without any further specification.

See Also: ADONAI; EL (GOD); ELOHIM; ELYON; JEHOVAH; SHADDAI; YAHWEH.

Bibliography: H. GROSS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1127–29. W. EICHRODT, Theology of the Old Test., tr. J. A. BAKER (London 1961–). E. JACOB, Theology of the Old Testament, tr. A. W. HEATHCOTE and P. J. ALLCOCK (New York 1958). J. P. E. PEDERSEN, Israel: Its Life and Culture, 4 v. in 2 (New York 1926–40; repr. 1959). P. VAN IMSCHOOT, Théologie de l’Ancien Testament, 2 v. (Tournai 1954–56). T. VRIEZEN, An Outline of Old Testament Theology, tr. S. NEUIJEN (Newton Centre, Mass. 1958).

[R. T. A. MURPHY]

GOD, PROOFS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF

The classic text presenting proofs for the existence of God is that of St. THOMAS AQUINAS (Summa theologiae 1a, 2.3). Known as the quinque viae or “five ways,” these demonstrations are proposed by Aquinas as a foundation for his systematic development of sacred theology. This article analyzes the arguments of each of the five ways, prefacing this by an introduction that explains the need for the proofs, the methodology that underlies them, and the general characteristics of the line of their argument.

Introduction

Many feel that man’s innate desire for happiness, which can be only satisfied in God, makes sufficiently evident the existence of God. Although God truly implants this desire in man, the fact is that many men do not seek their happiness in God. Hence, this desire for happiness of itself is too vague to evince conclusively and clearly the existence of God (Summa theologiae 1a, 2.1 ad 1). The same must be said to those who hold that the existence of truth, which in general is self-evident, makes God’s existence obvious (ibid. ad 3). Men, particularly in recent times, have frequently rejected the proposition that God exists, which could not be the case if the statement were immediately evident.

Need for proof. A self-evident proposition is one wherein “the predicate forms part of what the subject means” (Summa theologiae 1a, 2.1). “God exists” is such a proposition in itself since the divine essence and existence are identical. Yet, the statement is not self-evident to the human intellect because man does not grasp the divine nature as such. Clear-cut evidence of God's existence is so apparently lacking that the genuine problem concerns whether His existence can in any way be shown.

On the other hand, God's existence is not so deeply embedded in mystery that only faith can make it known. Rather, God's existence is attainable through the natural powers of human reason and is a presupposition to revealed truths (Summa theologiae 1a, 2.2 ad 1). In other words, both philosophy and theology may ask the question of God's existence. Philosophy asks the question in the supreme branch of natural wisdom called metaphysics and does so in order to discover the principles of its own subject matter, being in common (ens in commune). In theology the question is asked to ascertain whether the science has a subject matter at all. Whereas philosophy terminates its investigations of truth by arriving at God, theology initiates its study with God and uses revealed principles as it analyzes all of reality.

Since the five ways are found in a treatise that is theological and not philosophical, to expect the proofs as given in the Summa by St. Thomas to expound the full metaphysical implications would be to confuse theology with philosophy. Yet the five ways are truly proofs; "way" is not meant to indicate some weak expression, but rather the strong work of the theologian in his rational approach.

The five ways are meant to be demonstrations of the conclusion: God exists. Demonstration is needed when some fact or truth is not evident. Proving the obvious is not merely a waste of argument but quite impossible. God's existence is not obvious. The danger seems to be that the supposition of His existence is so remote and beyond man's intellectual capabilities that no method can be found to establish it. The difficulty would be insurmountable were the proofs to go beyond the fact that God exists. Once an attempt is made to investigate the very nature of God, the limits of the proofs for His existence are exceeded.

Methodology. The question, then, is not why God exists, which rationally cannot be asked, but whether or not God exists. St. Thomas follows an Aristotelian methodology based on the Greek philosopher's logic, physics, and metaphysics. Having answered affirmatively the question whether God's existence is demonstrable, St. Thomas presents the five ways.

DEMONSTRATION is a categorical SYLLOGISM that intends to produce certain knowledge. This syllogistic device employs a middle (or connecting) term to establish the fact that a designated predicate belongs to the subject under consideration. This middle term, called the medium of demonstration, is a DEFINITION. If the definition is based on one of the four causes, the demonstration is a priori in the sense that it gives the reason or cause why the predicate can be said of the subject. Clearly demonstration of this kind is impossible relative to God, who is beyond definition, exceeding as He does all human categories of thought.

Instead, the demonstration must be a posteriori; it must proceed from effect to cause and employ a nominal definition rather than a causal one. In the present consideration an effect serves as a nominal definition of the cause. St. Thomas concedes that the effect is by no means proportionate to the cause; yet, no difficulty arises since the only point the proof intends to establish is the existence of the cause (Summa theologiae 1a, 2.2 ad 3). For example, one who detects a fragrance need not know what the nature of the odoriferous object is in order validly to conclude that some fragrance-giving thing does exist. One author (O'Brien) suggests a brief outline of the demonstration of the first way as follows:

God is the First Unmoved Mover (nominal definition imposed from movement); But the First Unmoved Mover exists (effect, movement demands this); Therefore God exists.

General Characteristics. All five ways begin with evidences of sense experience that are effects, as it develops, of God. Basic to the cogency of the proofs is the fact of limitation within the actualities studied, a concretion of act and potency that means dependence and thus leads to an independent being free of potency in any form. The first, second, and fifth ways consider the world of operation: motion, efficient causes, and finality. The third and fourth ways start from the actuality of being and show its extremes of contingent and necessary, and of more and less good, true, or noble.

Since all the proofs deal with effects, the notion of efficient causality is present not only in the second, as is obvious, but also in the other four. Nevertheless, in the resolution of each proof, the particular effect leads to a determined actuality of the cause that alone adequately explains the effect. The five ways are therefore truly distinct, not mere variations of one proof.

Each proof terminates in a cause that alone sufficiently explains the effect used as the middle term of the demonstration and as the nominal definition of God. In particular, this means that (1) motion is explained only by a mover not subject to motion; (2) subordinated causes are intelligible as causing only if there is a cause that is uncaused; (3) the possible or contingent must depend on a cause not merely necessary, but with no cause of its own necessity; (4) graded perfections are limited perfections, and only an unlimited perfect cause could be responsible for them; and (5) directed things moving toward determined ends depend on an intelligent ruler. In each way the crux of the proof lies in the truth that the cause reached produces a formality in the effect that the cause itself transcends. If this were not the case, the problem would still remain for solution.

Two observations from the commentary of CAJETAN on the five ways are worthy of mention. Although each proof establishes a predicate that in truth is proper to God, the proof as presented in this theological context merely establishes the need of a first mover unmoved, a first efficient cause uncaused, etc., without caring what else can be said of its nature. Secondly, the direct conclusion of the five ways is simply “God exists” and not “God as God exists,” for the latter assertion would exceed the premises; each way concludes to the proper cause of the effect adopted as the middle term, but God as God is much more than that.

Proof from Motion

The point of departure is the fact of experience that MOTION exists. “The senses clearly perceive that some things in the world are being moved.” Local motion is the most obvious, although as the proof unfolds, every motion or change in its totality is embraced, that is, any transit from potency to act. Were the proof restricted to physical movement, the demonstration could stop at some physical first mover. Yet any going from potency to act constitutes a real change and so falls within the definition of motion.

Argument. The force of the proof rests on the nature of motion as an incomplete act, an actualization of what is potential. Unless motion is understood to be a dependent actuality requiring something else already in act to explain it, the cogency of the proof is lost. The argument depends upon the Aristotelian concept of motion and its corollary, “Whatever is being moved is being moved by another.” Also rooted in the proof is the doctrine of potency and act (see POTENCY AND ACT). Nothing can be at the same time in potency and in act relative to the same reality, and consequently nothing can reduce itself to act in respect to that potentiality. To do so would be a contradiction. To produce motion is to give act, but nothing can give what it does not possess. Hence, the mobile thing cannot produce its own motion; it cannot give itself the very act it lacks, for otherwise it would not be in potency to it.

Motion is an effect that depends intrinsically on a cause. In other words, without the cause here and now causing, the motion would not exist. Thus the proof is not considering a motion given independent existence, as when one man generates another and he in turn generates a third, and so on. The father can die and his son continue to live and even generate, for the dependence here is accidental, limited to communicating the original viable material for conception within the mother. An immediately subordinated motion, on the other hand, ceases with the cessation of the prime mover; for example, “if the hand does not move the stick, the stick will not move anything else.” In moved movers an infinite regress is repugnant. St. Thomas succinctly states his reasons: “We must stop somewhere, otherwise there will be no first cause of the change, and, as a result, no subsequent causes.”

The conclusion of the proof is that a first mover exists who is not subject to change but who is the source of all motion: and in the time of St. Thomas, at least, “all understand this to be God.” The causality of the first mover is necessary for every motion that occurs; for whatever may seem to be an ultimate mover within some frame of reference is itself also subject to the definition of motion and thus in the end is dependent on another mover.

The first mover must be completely above the limitations of motion. If not, the problem would still remain. From the first mover comes the act that is responsible ultimately for all motion here and now occurring. To appreciate the implications of the first way, as conceived by St. Thomas, the first mover has to be viewed as the principal agent of motion; all other agents are secondary. The divine causality of motion is seen as universal and necessary, and the prime mover is but one since He is PURE ACT, devoid of the potency that makes for multiplicity.

The first proof does not rest on this or that motion, but treats of motion in itself as something that by nature depends on a cause. Consequently, the proof from motion does not depend on the positive physical sciences, which deal with particular cases and kinds of motion. Difficulties raised against the proof on the basis of positive science should, of course, be faced; but they can be given more adequate treatment under a separate heading (see MOTION, FIRST CAUSE OF).

Difficulties. At this point, it may be useful simply to mention a few common difficulties, most of which pertain to the other ways as well as to the first. One such objection is based on a misconception of what is being proved. It is asked: Why not arrive at a finite being? Why could there not be many unmoved movers? Why is not nature itself a sufficient answer to motion? These questions are really not concerned with the fact of the existence of God, but attempt instead to discuss the nature of God. In the theological context of the proofs, St. Thomas takes up the question of God’s nature immediately after establishing his affirmative answer to the question of God's existence. In metaphysics, on the other hand, these objections would be ridiculous; they would indicate that the philosopher had not even reached the heart of the problem concerning the principles of his science. Finitude, multiplicity, and a self-contained reality themselves encourage the quest for a more profound solution.

A second series of difficulties claims that the proofs are arbitrary. If everything requires a mover, why contradict that statement by concluding to an unmoved mover? Or if everything has a cause, why does not God need a cause? These objections arise from an inaccurate reading of the proofs. The first way maintains that whatever is being moved is being moved by another; in no way does it claim that everything must be in a state of being moved. The second way, as will be noted below, is not a study of causality as such, but is restricted to the order of efficient causality.

Thirdly, a most frequent difficulty is that if God is outside nature, that is, completely unlike it, man has no way of knowing Him. Knowledge based on nature would be insufficient, inadequate to attain the supranatural. In reply it has to be said that all knowledge of God is analogical. ANALOGY is an intellectual construct whereby the human reason touches, at least in some way, on areas of reality otherwise closed to it. Thus man's very intellect is not an observed organ as is his eye. As a result, philosophers employ analogy to make evident something of the operations and even the nature of the intellect by comparing it to the functions of the better-known eye. A man says he "sees" a truth; and by this he means that—just as his eye perceives its object after its fashion of knowing, sense knowledge—the mind comprehends its object in its proper mode, intellectual knowledge. Thus to talk of God's existence does not mean equating the finite existences of beings known in the universe to God's existence; it means, rather, that as existence is a perfection found in a limited way in things, it is also found in an unlimited way in God. Man talks, writes, and thinks of God in this dark manner called analogy. Even faith does not remove analogy.

Finally, a word of caution may save time and prevent confusion. The first way concludes eventually to the truth that God is always involved in the reality of motion. However, to pick out a falling leaf and ask how God is immediately implicated in its motion is to ignore the world of secondary causes also at work. Further, particular mobile things do not yield certitude in and of themselves. For incontrovertible truth, the universal and necessary are required. Demonstration takes its initial step at the sense level, but has to soar high above this level to produce a stable body of certain knowledge.

Proof from Efficient Causality

Once again St. Thomas appeals to the evidence of experience wherein men find an order of efficient causes in the things they observe. No claim is made that every cause must have a cause. In fact, the consideration of efficient causality is made not in any way whatsoever, but precisely under the aspect of the order among such causes discovered in reality. Although this activity is evident to the senses, the intellect must reason over it and comprehend its meaning to give the proof metaphysical depth.

Argument. Two important truths are prerequisite to the proof. The first is that nothing is its own efficient cause, either in being or in operating, since this would involve a contradiction—the thing would be prior to itself, in order to cause itself to be or to operate. The second is that in an ordered arrangement of efficient causes, an infinite regress is impossible. When efficient causes are in an ordered series, one cause is the cause of the next; thus, were the first or an earlier or middle cause removed in the series, the final effect also would be removed. If there were no first efficient cause, no middle efficient causes would be communicating their act, and thus no effects would be produced—a condition that man's senses clearly perceive as false. One need but think of a mechanical device such as an automobile to see the implications of efficient causality operating in a subordinated series; or one can look within himself for endless examples of subordinated efficient causality. For instance, each man is the cause of his own speaking, and this involves his intellect, will, brain, nervous system, emotions, vocal cords, mouth, and tongue. Remove the first efficient cause and none of the middle causes will function; consequently no effect will result. While the effect is being produced, it should be noted, the entire series of causes is operating.

An observation of Cajetan can be added for clarification. An intermediate cause must be under the influence of the first cause; otherwise the full efficacy of the intermediate cause is lacking. The intermediate cause is by definition not merely a prior cause but a medium (Lat.), that is, a means, for communicating the causality of the first efficient cause. From this it also follows that if there were no first cause, any discussion of intermediate or middle causes would be pointless. Without a first there is no intermediate cause, for the first cause is alone the cause of the intermediate's causing.

Clarification. St. Thomas's own words are the clearest reply to the repeated objection against the first two ways that if the world were eternal an infinite regress would be possible. "In efficient causes it is impossible to proceed in infinity per se. Thus, there cannot be an infinite number of causes that are per se required for a certain effect, for instance, that a stone be moved by a stick, the stick by the hand, and so on to infinity. But it is not impossible to proceed to infinity accidentally as regards efficient causes. For instance, if all the causes thus infinitely multiplied should have the order of only one cause, their multiplication being accidental, as an artificer acts by means of many hammers accidentally, because one after the other may be broken. It is accidental, therefore, that one particular hammer acts after the action of another. Likewise it is accidental to this particular man as generator to be generated by another man; for he generates as a man, and not as the son of another man. For all men generating hold one grade of efficient causes, namely, the grade of a particular generator. Hence, it is not impossible for a man to be generated by man to infinity. Yet such a thing would be impossible if the generation of this man depended upon this man, and on an elementary body, and on the sun, and so on to infinity” (Summa theologiae 1a, 46.2 ad 7).

In this way, as in the first, only the existence of the first efficient cause is established by the proof. No implication as to the nature of the first cause is mentioned, although philosophically a number of notions are derivable from the demonstration. Clearly, God is an uncaused efficient cause; otherwise the same contradiction would be involved in Him as in any cause that is a cause to itself. Pushed further, this proof as well as the others is meant to establish that God is the total cause of all being, even though secondary causes genuinely exercise causality. The secondary causes are only partial; the activity of God as first efficient cause is constant. Hence the concept of God as “winding up” the universe (as though it were a toy top) and letting it go to unwind is erroneous; for the proof from efficient causality makes it clearly evident that intermediate causes really depend on the first cause here and now. The first efficient causality’s act always has an influx into whatever is or operates, since the dependence of the secondary causes on the first efficient cause never ceases. (See CAUSALITY; EFFICIENT CAUSALITY.)

Proof from Contingency

Of the five ways, the third is the least popular and probably the most controverted—both by reason of the argument proffered and because of textual difficulties. Nevertheless, eventually modern scientists may well find this proof closest to their own kind of thought. The demonstration is based on being rather than on operation and has at least a remote affinity to notions of probabilities.

Argument. The third way begins from the observable fact that some things have a CONTINGENCY surrounding their existence. Contingent in the present context is understood as meaning possible to exist and not to exist. An obvious illustration of contingent existence is the constant generation and corruption of plant life. If all things have this intrinsic potency to be and not to be, then, carrying the supposition to its ultimate limits, at some moment in the past nothing at all existed. This validly follows because whatever has an intrinsic existential contingency has a limited duration, a beginning and an end.

St. Thomas has deliberately placed a false hypothesis: “If all things (that exist) are possible to exist and not to exist, at some time nothing existed in reality.” The assumption that nothing existed at one time leads to the absurdity that nothing exists now; for nothing can come to be except through something already existing, and this has by supposition been ruled out. Only after squarely facing reality does St. Thomas deny universal contingency and draw the obvious inference that some necessity is demanded in things.

Difficulties. Conveniently, at this phase of the demonstration a number of difficulties can be mentioned. First of all, some have objected that the doctrine of creation is a necessary element for the cogency of the proof. On the contrary, introducing creation would mean penetrating into the nature of God when only His existence is at issue; further, the doctrine of creation is not required for the force of the proof, since the next step of the demonstration leads to the cause behind contingency. Secondly, St. Thomas cannot be accused of arguing gratuitously that all things are contingent or even that contingent things cease to be through annihilation. The argument looks to the past and not to the future in its first premise; its forward motion comes as the reasoning seeks out the necessary element in reality. Finally, the objection that St. Thomas is guilty of the error he himself noted as a weakness in the ontological argument, that is, that he argues from the possible order and concludes at the level of reality, is not justified; for the hypothesis is presented as false.

Contingent beings, then, are not sufficient to explain the existence of reality. Also, an infinite regress among contingent things of this kind is impossible. This would demand a series of infinite duration composed of things having only a finite duration; such a concept is absurd. Appeal must therefore be had to NECESSITY in things. Things are said to be necessary if they cannot not be, that is, there is not present in them a potency not to be.

Necessary Being. Many philosophers unable to discover any evidence of necessity in things protest that the proof is therefore invalid. Necessity in propositions they concede, but not necessity in existence. Nor can their objection be refuted by recourse to necessity in operations, as breathing is necessary for life. The third way rests on necessity in being, not in operation. One accepting the hylomorphic theory might point to primary matter, not as necessary in being, but as the necessary underlying principle of change. One can offer the human soul as an illustration of a being that has a necessary existence by reason of its simplicity in essence.

However, the validity of the demonstration does not demand an unequivocal answer to the question of the existence of some necessary being in the universe of immediate experience. The proof has led to the conclusion that necessity is demanded in things because contingency is inadequate for the work of sustaining dependent beings. Once this is established, then the next step is that whatever is necessary is so either from another or not. As in efficient causality, likewise here, nothing can be the cause of its own necessity, and an infinite regress is impossible. This means that a being must be posited that is intrinsically necessary, with no dependence from outside to account for its own necessity in existence. Indeed, this being is the cause of necessity in others; it is the being men call God.

The argument treats mainly of necessity in regard to existence as such. Whether some observable things always existed or not does not affect the course of the reasoning. If planets were eternal, that is, have had an infinite duration in existence, the problem of what caused their existence and permitted this endless duration would still remain. On the other hand, if all things really are contingent in their existence then a necessary being is still needed to explain how they came into existence at all and continue to be.

Textual Variants. As mentioned above, the proof has various readings. The Leonine (1880 edition) has: Impossibile est autem omnia quae sunt talia, semper esse: quia quod possibile est non esse, quandoque non est. “It is impossible, however, for all things which are such (possibles), always to be: because what is possible not to be, sometimes is not.” All the other codices, dating back to Vaticanus of the 13th century, read: Impossibile est autem omnia quae sunt, talia esse, quia quod possibile est non esse quandoque non est. “It is impossible that all things are, be such as these (possibles): because what is possible not to be sometimes is not.” This second reading seems the more accurate because it follows the movement of the thought of the demonstration more closely. In practice, commentators using either version come to the same conclusion.

Proof from Grades of Perfection

Man clearly sees that some things are better than others. Much advertising is based on this truth—even the same kind of product, such as soap, will have claimants declaring one brand superior to all others. The point under consideration is a perfection that admits of more and less, not one that is indivisible such as humanity, which one either has or does not have. Further, in the realm of transcendental perfections involving analogical concepts—such as good, true, and noble—degrees of perfection are even more pronounced.

Argument. The fourth way is clearly in the setting of these TRANSCENDENTALS, which are perfections without any intrinsic limitation in themselves and yet are found in diverse things in different degrees or modes. These perfections of good, true, and noble as found in sensible reality do not flow from the nature of the things themselves. Whatever flows from the nature of a being cannot be had according to more or less; thus all men by nature have the perfection of humanity absolutely, whereas beings that are not men do not have this perfection at all. If the things of experience possessed the transcendental perfections in the way that man possesses humanity, they would have these perfections in a full, absolute way; in other words, one should expect the things he encounters to be good, true, and noble without limitation. Since this is evidently not the case—since the things of this world have goodness, truth, and nobility in varying degrees—one must conclude that these things do not possess the transcendental perfections by their nature. And, therefore, they must receive these perfections from outside, from some absolutely perfect cause that is not merely exemplary but also efficient.

The conclusion that the being of supreme perfection must be the efficient cause of perfection in all others is reached with the help of an Aristotelian principle: Whatever is the greatest in any kind (genus) of being is the cause of all that are of this kind (genus). Since this principle is somewhat subtle, St. Thomas introduces a vivid illustration. Fire is hot by its very nature, while other things, such as water and metal, become hot by participating in the heat of the fire, more or less intensely so by reason of their proximity to the fire. This participated perfection can be retained only so long as the being in which the perfection properly exists is efficiently causing the perfection in others; as soon as the fire is withdrawn, the water begins to cool. Likewise, the being in which all transcendental perfections are realized absolutely must be the efficient cause of whatever participation of these perfections is found in other things. And this supreme source of all perfection is the being men call God.

Use of Plato and Aristotle. Although the reference to efficient causality and the example of the fire are based on ARISTOTLE, a Platonic notion is really at the heart of this fourth way. In the Summa St. Thomas does not mention PLATO, but in another work (De pot. 3.5) he acknowledges his indebtedness to the author of the Dialogues. St. Thomas actually invokes an analogy of proper proportionality, and Plato's doctrine supplies him with the basic insight.

Plato's own words should make evident what St. Thomas took from him. "He who has been instructed thus far in the things of love, and who has learned to see the beautiful in due order and succession, when he comes toward the end will suddenly perceive a nature of wondrous beauty . . . a nature which in the first place is everlasting, not growing and decaying, or waxing and waning; secondly, not fair in one point of view and foul in another . . . but beauty absolute, separate, simple, and everlasting, which without diminution and without increase, or any change, is imparted to the ever growing and perishing beauties of all other things" (Symp. 211). As with beauty, so too with good, true, noble, a supreme or greatest must exist.

Plato carried his theory to what is known as the world of Forms and Ideas, some kind of separate world where genuine archetypes apparently existed as distinguished from the "shadows" of them in this material world. Whatever Plato really meant is not at issue in this proof. St. Thomas does not accept any extreme presentation of the Platonic theory. What he does see in it are the elements basic to the analogy of proper proportionality and the truth made evident through this analogy, namely, that there is some one First to which all others are referred and from which they derive their share of truth, goodness, beauty, etc.

Having discovered, or perhaps inserted, analogy in Plato's doctrine, St. Thomas turns to Aristotle in order to show that what is supremely true and good must be supremely being. In the text explicitly cited at this point (Meta. 993a 30-b 30), Aristotle's context is different from that of St. Thomas. Aristotle is discussing the arduous effort involved in investigating truth and concludes with the observation that "the principles of eternal things must be always most true . . . so that as each thing is in respect of being, so is it in respect of truth." St. Thomas borrows this thought in order to arrive at God, who is First Truth and First Being. Finally, as has already been noted, it is to Aristotle that St. Thomas appeals in order to establish that the God who is First Truth and First Being is the efficient source of the truth and the very existence of all other things.

Proof from Order

Another evident fact of experience is the orderly operation of nature. In the overwhelming majority of cases, the earth brings forth her fruits and is thoroughly predictable as to her activities. Although lacking knowledge, the acorn is moved almost without exception toward its proper end of becoming an oak. Such uniform and consistent attainment of goals by nescient beings requires an explanation. To attribute it all to CHANCE would be hopelessly naive, since chance by its own connotation means something out of the ordinary, something not within the normal order of procedure. A more profound explanation must be sought.

Argument. The fifth way is carefully restricted to natural things lacking knowledge. Hence the proposition that a watch requires a watchmaker to design and make it is really not pertinent to the present demonstration, nor indeed is it the most helpful illustration with which to suggest the existence of God. For one thing, unlike nature, the watch continues to exist independently of the watchmaker once he has made it. Likewise the present proof is based rather on the notion of the government or guidance of natural things, rather than on design as such.

St. Thomas's example, chosen with his customary precision, is that of an arrow moving toward a target. The arrow is directed toward its end; so is nature. The arrow depends entirely on the archer for its operation; nature depends entirely on something outside herself. Lack of knowledge is a definite limitation in a being acting for an end; the lack must be supplied in some way from without by a knowing being.

Thus the orderly movement of natural things toward their proper ends indicates the presence of an intelligent being. Order demands intelligence, because order is the arrangement of things in a definite series according to a norm, and only an intellect can conceive the relationships involved in such arrangement. The establishment of means to an end requires some foresight, some comprehension of relations, and even more primary, a conception of the end itself. Only an intelligent being satisfies these conditions.

A deeper insight into the argument is obtained when it is recalled that GOOD and END are convertible terms. For St. Thomas, the best evidence that natural things act for an end is the fact that they tend to act in such a way as to achieve what is best for them. The conclusion to an intelligent being rests, in the final analysis, on the need for an agent by whose intention the things of nature are directed toward their good. Thus the proof begins by considering natural things as passively governed in their movement and ends with an intelligent agent or efficient cause that actively governs them.

Clarifications. Certainly there are numerous cases in which natural things fail to attain their end, but the failure is due to what may be called accidental interference; thus the acorn will die in the earth if conditions for its survival are not present. At any rate, instances of failure can never outweigh the overwhelming evidence that exists for order and finality. The fact that nature does consistently attain her goals argues to the existence of an intelligent being. Furthermore, the constant achievement of the end means that the intellect responsible for the operations is never idle, but is exercising its causality continuously. And the intelligent ruler who exercises universal and constant direction over nature is the being men call God.

Much confusion over the fifth way is avoided if one remembers that the demonstration is concerned only with internal finality, not with external finality. An acorn is of its own intrinsic nature potentially an oak tree; it has a tendency to attain that end in a favorable environment. Later the tree may be chopped down and made into tooth-picks; but that involves another scheme of things not pertinent to the fifth way. Hence the answer to the question whether the purpose or end of the egg is to be a chicken or an egg sandwich is: the intrinsic end of the egg is to be a chicken; the external ends of the egg are as limitless as its possibilities (See FINAL CAUSALITY).

See Also: GOD IN PHILOSOPHY, 2; AGNOSTICISM.

Bibliography: Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 1a, 2, Eng. tr. and comment. v. 2, ed. T. MCDERMOTT (New York 1964-), 60 v.; Suma teologica, 16 v. (Biblioteca de autores cristianos dispersed nos. 29-197; 1947-60) v. 1, q. 1-26, with notes on the proofs by F. MUÑIZ. T. C. O'BRIEN, Metaphysics and the Existence of God (Washington 1960). J. MARITAIN, Approaches to God, tr. P. O'REILLY (New York 1954). R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, God: His Existence and His Nature, tr. B. ROSE, 2 v. (St. Louis 1934-36).

[R. C. SMITH]

GOD IN PAGAN THOUGHT

The concept of God in primitive religions has been the subject of considerable dispute. Suffice it to say that the evolutionary theory whereby all primitive peoples are regarded as slowly developing from an initial polytheism toward a gradual monotheism has met with sufficient modifications in actual case studies as to have fallen somewhat out of favor. In addition to belief in a plurality of spirits, many primitive groups give evidence of a belief in a high god, in the sky or at a great distance, supreme, uncreated, molder of the present world, but often somewhat remote, and not regarded as interfering much, if at all, with the lives of men. Such a high god appears early in the creation myths of such peoples as the Australian aborigines and primitive Indians.

Primitive Religions. From Egypt come more sophisticated accounts of creation, with the self-emergence of the creator-god Atum and his organization of a pre-existing chaos represented by four pairs of primordial

"Polyphemus and Galatea" by Annibale Carracci, c. 1604, detail of "Love Scenes of the Pagan Gods," on the ceiling of the Farnese Palace, Florence, Italy. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

"gods." A cosmogony is effected by Atum's production from himself of another four pairs of gods who represent air and moisture, earth and sky, and the creatures of this world. In the so-called Memphis Theology, an attempt is made to go behind these physical terms to an account that stresses internal thought and external utterance as the process of creation, although the originator of the process, the Memphite god Ptah, is equated with the primeval waters out of which Atum emerged.

In Mesopotamian myth there is a gradual overcoming of the powers of chaos, culminating in the decisive victory of the god Marduk, a later version of the storm god Enlil, and himself to be replaced by the god Assur in subsequent accounts, when the power of Assyria had become dominant.

The Sumerian, Egyptian, and Assyro-Babylonian myths are of considerable interest to Hebrew scholars, and their literary forms provide parallels with the Book of GENESIS. More information on this subject is found elsewhere, as also on the Indian concept of Brahman and the origins of JAINISM, BUDDHISM, and HINDUISM. Space limits the scope of this article to a survey of Greek thought.

Ten avatars of the Hindu God of Vishnu. (Archive Photos)

Pre-Socratic Thought. The Babylonian, Egyptian, and Hittite myths are not without parallels in the earliest Greek cosmogonies, as found in Homer, Hesiod, Pherecydes of Syros, and the Greek lyric poets. The account of Oceanus as a broad stream encircling the earth and as the “begetter of gods” and the story of the mutilation of Ouranos by Kronos strongly suggest common sources. Again, the paramount figure to emerge from a succession of deified cosmic constituents is the god of thunder and lightning, Zeus, on a par with the storm gods Enlil and Marduk.

The pre-Socratic philosophers present no sharp break with the mythologists and cosmogonists who were their forerunners. They are representative of a gradual change toward processes of discursive reasoning in accounting for physical phenomena. Thus the view of Thales that the earth rests on water or that water is the principle of all things and that “all things are full of gods” has obvious parallels in Egyptian creation myths and in the typical Mesopotamian attitude to the surrounding physical world. To his first principle, the “Indefinite,” Anaximander applies the Homeric epithets reserved for the gods, i.e., “eternal (or immortal) and free from old age.” For Anaximenes “air” or “mist” was divine and the source of all the gods. Thus the Milesian thinkers closely identified their prime cosmological constituents with the divine, apparently while continuing their adherence to the gods of traditional religion.

With Xenophanes of Colophon and HERACLITUS OF EPHEBUS, however, one meets with some outspoken criticism of accepted religious belief and practice. Xenophanes criticized the concept of the gods in Homer and Hesiod as anthropomorphic, and their behavior as immoral. In their place he posited one God, completely unlike mortals, who moves all things by the thought of His mind. Heraclitus, on the one hand, identified God with the Logos, or principle of balance in all things, and with cosmic fire or Zeus; on the other hand, he criticized the excesses of superstition and obscenity in traditional cults.

Other thinkers, such as PYTHAGORAS and PARMENIDES, do not seem to have made any explicit equation between their first principles or view of reality and any divinity. EMPEDOCLES personified the cosmic forces of love and strife and made Aphrodite prior to the other gods, but he was sharply critical of the anthropomorphism and cruel bloodshed embodied in religious mythology. ANAXAGORAS made the important contribution of considering that the whole cosmological process is controlled by a transcendent Mind, which he termed “infinite” and “self-ruled,” but did not explicitly describe as “divine.” Finally Diogenes of Apollonia reverted to the notion of “air” as the basic substance, but this “air” is both intelligent and divine.

In summary, these pre-Socratic thinkers tended to identify God with their primary cosmological principles, much in the tradition of the earlier mythologies, but criticism of traditional religion and refinement of the notion of deity was also current among some of them, as among some of the Greek poets who were their contemporaries. The poets had received from Homer and Hesiod the notion of Zeus as a god of justice and retribution, along with less edifying stories about the Olympian deities. All of this was accepted more or less uncritically by Pindar; but especially with the Greek tragedians problems of human suffering, in particular fortuitous suffering on the part of the innocent, and questions of conflicting obligations in the moral order became paramount. There was a deep interest in human pride and in the workings of divine justice. The idea of the supreme deity was exalted and criticism of the inconsistencies of traditional religion became evident.

Greek Religions. Before going any further with this account, it is necessary to stress that the distinctive views of the Greek philosophers on God represent the thought of only a select minority. Throughout the period from the seventh century B.C. to the fourth century A.D. the various Greek communities lived a life that included social and personal religious worship, centered around a traditional plurality of gods, with special local cults and various modifications and accretions over the centuries, as well as the various equations made with Roman deities in the late republic and under the empire. The traditional Olympian gods, as established by Homer and Hesiod and hymned by later Greek poets, continued to be objects of worship, with Zeus assuming the role of father figure. The ecstatic worship of Dionysos, the cult of Demeter and Persephone at Eleusis, the teachings of ORPHISM, the consultation of Apollo at Delphi, and the religious brotherhood of the Pythagoreans were more particular manifestations of the religious spirit in close association with individual figures and localities. Alongside the legalistic and ritualistic relationship between the god and his worshiper ran an element of personal devotion and the desire to achieve purification of the soul by initiation into the mysteries, or even to achieve ecstatic union with the deity. This vast area of religious belief and practice provided a constant background to the views of the Greek thinkers. [See GREEK PHILOSOPHY (RELIGIOUS ASPECTS).]

Socrates and Plato. With SOCRATES, one finds a belief in the conventional plurality of gods going hand in hand with references to “God” or “the god” in the singular. Socrates was too wise a man to think that human reason could settle every question; some matters were beyond it and needed the help of divine guidance (Xen. mem. 1.1). The final passage of Plato’s Apology contains references to both “gods” and “God,” and Socrates’s last words in the Phaedo, “Crito, we owe a cock to Asclepius; do not neglect the debt but pay it,” are no doubt meant to show his careful observance of traditional ritual.

In the writings of PLATO the role assigned to God gradually becomes more prominent. The Ideas, including the Idea of the Good, are universals or natures, whereas God is a being having a nature in a supreme degree. He is thus not to be confused with the Ideas, nor does he appear to be the cause of them, in spite of Republic 597, where for the sake of comparison God is said to have wrought the Ideal Bed. As the demiurge or “creator” of the Timaeus, it is his function to take over the chaos of disorder and reduce it to order, but he is limited by “necessity” and has to work with materials not created by him. The WORLD SOUL and the heavenly bodies are also divine, although in a lesser degree. Man as the microcosm is to achieve happiness by regulating his actions on the model of the universe. This is what “becoming like to God as far as possible”—originally a reference to righteousness and wisdom (Theaet. 176A)—tends to become in the Timaeus, and this cosmic view of religion is emphasized in the Epinomis. Yet God is not merely some impersonal cosmic principle, but a person who is good and providential, the cause of good but not of evil, with whom a relationship of love may be cultivated (Leges 716). Indeed in some sense man’s highest purpose is to be God’s plaything (Leges 803C–E).

Certainly the overall impression given by Plato’s writings is an atmosphere of great reverence for the divine, an exalted notion of it, and a strong desire for assimilation to it in some intimate personal relationship. To be more precise than this would be to state explicitly what Plato merely hints at implicitly.

Aristotle. There may be something of an evolution in the theology of Aristotle. Fragments of his early dialogues give evidence of an argument from the degrees of being for the existence of God, an argument from the order within the universe, and arguments from human experience in dreams, premonitions, and inner presentiment. There may be some traces of a divine providence in the early theory of star souls endowed with sight and hearing, and in the Eudemian Ethics the ultimate norm of human action is the service and knowledge of God. In several texts, however, Aristotle links nature and the divine and so paves the way for Stoic insistence on “life according to nature.” In his later emphasis on cosmic religion, Aristotle undoubtedly follows the lead given by Plato in his Timaeus and Laws. God becomes the "Unmoved Mover" of the Physics, as required by current astronomical theories, a pure Intellect who moves the outermost sphere by desire, the desire finding realization in the perfection of circular movement as an imitation of the eternal "thinking upon thinking." God is identical with eternal life, because the actuality of thought is life, and this life is most good and self-sufficient. He is his own well-being, whereas man's good lies outside himself. Each of the heavenly spheres requires its own unmoved mover to account for its particular motion; what relationship exists between the Prime Mover and these other unmoved movers is not clear. There are traces in Aristotle of an interest in mystery religions and of a personal approach to God, but the main emphasis in his treatises is on a cosmic principle removed from any preoccupation with the universe or the men in it.

Stoicism and Epicureanism. The Stoics followed the emphasis in the later Plato and Aristotle on cosmic religion, while at the same time they looked back to Heraclitus. For them God is the active principle in the universe, the Logos, Fate, but also a creative fire, immanent and material in the sense of not separable from matter. The Logos contains within itself the seminal grounds of all things. God is also called Zeus and "Nature," as the law of the universe and universal providence. Other gods are admitted as names for the different aspects of the world. (See STOICISM.)

For EPICURUS, perhaps influenced by Aristotle's Unmoved Mover, God is a living, incorruptible, and blessed being. Epicurus rejects popular theology as attributing to the gods qualities and characteristics incompatible with their nature. They are not concerned with the universe or with human affairs, since freedom from toil and disturbance are necessary prerequisites of happiness. In any case the universe contains so much evil that it could not be a work of the gods. Man is aware of the gods by means of fine mental images or effluences that come to him from them in sleep. They are an example for him to imitate in achieving tranquillity of soul. The wise man marvels at their nature and disposition, tries to draw near it, and even desires to achieve contact and union with it. Thus he is a friend of the gods, and they of him. Epicurus admits the gods of popular religion, suitably purified from superstitious notions, and even many deities besides. (See EPICUREANISM.)

Later Greek Thought. The last century B.C. and the first two centuries A.D. were a period of conflation in Greek thought. The resurgence of interest in Plato's dialogues and Aristotle's treatises resulted in attempts to harmonize their views on God on the part of the Middle Platonists, who adopted the ways of negation, eminence, and analogy in speaking of the deity, and described the Platonic Ideas as the "thoughts of God." It remained for PLOTINUS to bring this process to its culmination, but he was not an adherent of popular religion. He was more the philosopher of optimistic rational contemplation than a religious person. He refers to his supreme principle, the One and the Good, as "God" almost incidentally and uses both neuter and masculine pronouns with reference to it. The second hypostasis, "Nous," is referred to as "God" somewhat more readily. Yet the culmination of the soul's return is undoubtedly a personal and mystical union in the highest degree. PORPHYRY says that Plotinus actually attained this state four times while in his company.

The tendency to make God ineffable and totally transcendent, evident even among the Middle Platonists, was pushed much further by the Gnostics, Hermetic writers, and later Neoplatonists. Faced with the task of reconciling Greek thought with a strictly monotheistic and creationist theology, the Arab thinkers who followed in the footsteps of the later Neoplatonists and Aristotelian commentators were the first, apart from St. Augustine, to build up a body of thought describing God's essence, causality, and relation to the world and men in philosophical terminology. The Christian medieval theologians and philosophers owe them a debt far greater than is generally appreciated. (See NEOPLATONISM; PATRISTIC PHILOSOPHY.)

Yet, throughout the long history of Greek thought, the notion of a strict monotheism does not seem evident. In company with other, more primitive peoples, the Greeks preserved a tradition of belief in a plurality of gods, with a special position assigned to Zeus as "high god." The tendency to deify cosmic forces carried over from mythology into rational thought. In addition, some of the foremost Greek thinkers produced concepts of supreme metaphysical entities, hardly personal at all, whose identification with the deity is somewhat casual, although the notion of the deity itself underwent considerable refinement.

See Also: RELIGION; GREEK PHILOSOPHY.

Bibliography: F. M. CORNFORD, From Religion to Philosophy (New York 1912). W. W. JAEGER, The Theology of the Early Greek Philosophers, tr. E. S. ROBINSON (Oxford 1947). R. K. HACK, God in Greek Philosophy to the Time of Socrates (Princeton 1931). W. K. C. GUTHRIE, The Greeks and Their Gods (London 1950). E. R. DODDS, The Greeks and the Irrational (Berkeley 1951). A. M. J. FESTUGIÈRE, Personal Religion among the Greeks (Berkeley 1960); La Révélation d'Hermès Trismégiste, 4 v. (Paris 1944-54); Epicurus and His Gods, tr. C. W. CHILTON (Cambridge, Mass. 1956); Contemplation et Vie contemplative selon Platon (2d ed. Paris 1950). F. SOLMSEN, Plato's Theology (Ithaca 1942). P. MERLAN, "Aristotle's Unmoved Movers," Traditio 4 (1946) 1-30. A. H. ARMSTRONG and

R. A. MARKUS, Christian Faith and Greek Philosophy (New York 1962).

[W. H. O'NEILL]

GOD IN PHILOSOPHY

This article deals with the place, existence, and nature of God in philosophy, as philosophy has come to be understood since the High Middle Ages. For the ancient Greek philosophical views of God, see GOD IN PAGAN THOUGHT. For the rise of Christian philosophical reflection on God, see GOD, 2. CHRISTIAN TRADITION.

1. Place

A survey of views on the place of God in philosophy would have to be as universal as the history of philosophy itself. While there is no consensus on this matter, one generalization based on the history of the question does seem valid. The term or idea "God" has most often been a religious, cultural, or theological presupposition accepted anteriorly to the philosophical enterprise. Philosophers have built their systems on this presupposition; or they have sought to justify it or to demolish it or to show that it lies outside reason's grasp. Often enough the prephilosophical assumption has led to nonphilosophical procedures and conclusions. There is, then, need to separate what is assumption from what is truly philosophical discovery in dealing with this question.

Catholic Views. Among Catholics there are widely accepted attitudes toward God's place in philosophy. For the Catholic to speak of God at all means the one true God, Creator of all things, visible and invisible. "God in philosophy" means this much before any particular philosophical endeavor, namely, that the God of the Creed can, by the resources of reason alone, be shown to exist and to have certain attributes, that this knowledge can be knowledge derived only through God's effects, and that it is not a direct understanding of His proper nature. These are religious teachings, the principal points of Catholic doctrine on the question of God and human reason [H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer (Freiburg 1963) 3026, 3041; cf. 2841–47]. They need not jeopardize the authenticity of the philosophical procedures; they should, however, be acknowledged as presuppositions that serve to orient the Catholic who philosophizes about God toward reaching God the Creator, to disorient him from any alleged direct experience of the divine, and to suggest the search for proofs that proceed from sensible effects to a transcendent cause.

The way in which the neo-scholastic tradition in philosophy among Catholics has matched these indications came to be quite common, at least in its general lines. God is reached through METAPHYSICS, in its highest phase, called natural theology (see THEOLOGY, NATURAL). There is also basic agreement that metaphysics attains a knowledge of God by its answer to the question: Does God exist? From the way this question is answered, the rest of reason's yield about God is shaped. The methodology employed in facing the basic problem is simple. A PROOF rising from effect to cause is required. The conclusion of the proof is a proposition, "God exists," "God" being the subject and "exists" the predicate. In such a proof the medium of DEMONSTRATION, the middle term, is a nominal DEFINITION of the subject, i.e., one that merely expresses what the term "God" means. The proofs developed amount to this: God is first mover, or first cause, or first necessary being, or most perfect being, or governor of the universe; now one, or more, or all of these exist; therefore God exists. The burden of the proof is in establishing the second, or minor proposition; this is usually done by referring to the "five ways" of St. THOMAS AQUINAS (see GOD, PROOFS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF). What is involved is an analysis of the dependencies found in the beings of experience, which the terms themselves suggest. The conclusion signifies God under all these "names," and from its implications the rest of the philosophical discoveries about the divine nature and attributes are derived.

There is no doubt that this mode of proceeding satisfies the religious presuppositions of Catholics. But the demand has been felt to justify a philosophical encounter with God on the basis also of philosophy's own epistemological canons. Generally this has been done by stating that the question of God belongs to metaphysics, since God is "given" in the very division of being into created and uncreated; thus a part of philosophy must be devoted to God. But since this way of proceeding seems already to presuppose God's existence, at least implicitly, another has been more recently espoused. A Christian philosophizes as a Christian; the Christian experience of God is the basis for philosophy and should be frankly admitted. On this basis any proof of God's existence must lead to the "I am who am" of Exodus. Thus, in the one case a questionably "pure" philosophical approach to God rests on an implicit religious assumption; in the other, the religious assumption is made explicit in a CHRISTIAN philosophy of God.

Thomistic Teaching. One can, however, formulate a philosophical approach different from the foregoing. This views metaphysics as a purely rational, philosophical account of experienced reality that proceeds along lines demanded by the human mind's gradual opening upon the world of experience. The statement of Aquinas that the SCIENCE (scientia) of metaphysics considers God not as its subject, but as a PRINCIPLE of its subject, implies this sort of inquiry about God (In Boeth. de Trin. 5.4). Metaphysics does not set for itself the task of discovering God; the task is thrust upon it by its subject, BEING. But this is not based on a presupposition that being is created or uncreated. Nothing is presupposed; metaphysics remains a process of discovery throughout.

The first step is the discovery of being as an intelligible value of the experienced real, one that is not attained properly by the natural philosopher's consideration of the things of experience as changeable or animate. With this initial discovery comes the realization that things need to be evaluated as they are existents, and further that through this distinctive grade of intelligibility something of the nature of any reality whatsoever can be known and expressed. At this point metaphysics is already self-conscious of its status as first philosophy, of its being an ultimate and absolute account of all reality. In its apprehension of being as such, it is already on the way to being self-vindicating through its awareness of being's own evidence. On the basis of the distinctive character of the subject of the science, metaphysics proceeds to evaluate the beings of experience, those at the level of the corporeal and the human. Through observation and experience of the ways in which these are beings, there is a discovery of composition, imperfection, and limitation. With this comes the knowledge that such beings are not self-explanatory. It is then that the inquiry for an explanation leads to the affirmation of their dependence on a first cause. This very dependence demands that the first cause be free of the same dependence; as cause, the first cause must be a being not composed of essence and existence (esse) as really distinct principles. From this truth, in turn, metaphysics is in a position to demonstrate that being in every other case is so composed, and thus must necessarily manifest all the aspects of limitation that started the inquiry in the first place.

Such a process does lead to philosophical knowledge about God, but not by presuppositions of a non-philosophical nature. No nominal definition of God need be tailored to fit these assumptions. The knowledge of God is really the knowledge of the dependence of all being upon Him. The Christian's recognition of God in this discovery does not have to be incorporated into the philosophical enterprise. The basis and vindication of metaphysics are autonomous, relying on the self-assurance afforded by being, the subject of the science. A metaphysics that remains true to itself and has its own interior criterion does lead to certitude about its affirmations concerning God, that these are not pure equivocation, and to the awareness that the proper being of God can be neither experienced nor directly known by reason alone. It faces any denial of God's existence with the resources of its own apprehension of being. The religious presuppositions of the Catholic are served; but they do not substitute for, or distort the fulfillment of, the task to which they point, viz, to achieve an authentically philosophical knowledge of God.

Contemporary Thought. The problem of knowing God shifted in the late twentieth century from metaphysics to the question of religious language, i.e., whether non-empirical language can express any meaning whatsoever. Ever since Ludwig Wittgenstein overthrew Hume's epistemological principle (that the meaning of any assertion can be sought only in its verification) by distinguishing truth from meaning and locating meaning in usage, theistic endeavor has been directed to establishing the truth value of God-talk as something more than emotive or performative language by authenticating how it can refer to a Transcendent which really exists outside consciousness. This has had implications for both theology and philosophy.

Faith Alone. The classical Protestant distrust of natural theology continues to allow affirmations of God's existence and nature only from within an ambit of faith, even though the discussion has recently moved beyond the Barth-Bultmann axis into hermeneutical and eschatological theology. The former emphasizes faith as language event and, using categories of the later Heidegger, allows for knowing God not as object but as subject, to which the believer relates himself (by way of Scripture and exegesis) in a stance of nonobjectified "primal thinking" (Heinrich Ott). Eschatological theology prefers to equate faith with universal history, refusing the distinctions between the events of history (Historie) and their appropriated meaning (Geschichte), and contends that history delivers its own interpretation. According to this view, the ultimate meaning of all human history is proleptically offered in the Resurrection of Christ, in which God manifests who he is for man (Wolfhart Pannenberg).

Reason Alone. Some theologians have dismissed the above approaches as fideism, and have sought to ground the knowledge of God in human rationality. Negatively, this has issued in new dismissals of the logic and intellectualism of traditional theism (Anthony Kenny). Positively, these efforts have taken several directions: 1) Charles Hartshorne and Norman Malcolm have tried to rehabilitate the ontological argument by arguing that if "necessary being" has any meaning then what it means must actually exist. 2) Process thought establishes a knowledge of God by extrapolating from a metaphysics of becoming in which God, who really exists in both a primordial nature and a nature which undergoes change through the processes of finite existents, is understood to perfect the world and himself through realizing in himself whatever of value is achieved within the world (Alfred Whitehead, Charles Hartshorne, John Cobb, Jr.). 3) In Anglo-Saxon circles linguistic analysis often substitutes for metaphysics, but presses beyond the narrow positivism inherited from Hume (Bertrand Russell, early Wittgenstein) to justify a rational but nondemonstrative “logic of reasoned beliefs.” This approach employs epistemological techniques of emergent probabilities, etc., in an empirically based knowledge of the non-empirical in which knowing God is regarded as interpretative knowledge, analogous to knowing, for instance, that something is beautiful (John Wisdom, Anthony Flew, James Richmond).

Reason under Faith. By and large contemporary solutions have assumed some form of coherence between faith and reason. In the tradition of American Empiricism the notion of experience has been broadened to include the encounters of faith, experienced as offering answers to questions of ultimacy posed by human existence on the plane of immediacy (John Smith). In phenomenology, human existence comes to appearance within consciousness as radically contingent and precarious, thereby pointing to God as necessary, not by way of rational inference from the finite but as a discernment within the finite of clues of a Transcendent. God is signaled in a purely symbolic knowledge, therefore, not as Cause but as Presence (Langdon Gilkey, Louis Dupré). The empirical approach suggests Tillich’s principle of correlation between the evident realities of man’s existential situation and any philosophical/theological solution, reduced, however, from the ontological to the ontic realm. Phenomenology, on the other hand, seems to surmise God somewhat after the fashion in which the Transcendental Ego is surmised as undergirding the Empirical Ego (Husserl).

Among Catholic thinkers, this outlook surfaces in a marked tendency to understand Romans 1:18–20 and the dogmatic constitution Dei Filius of Vatican Council I (DS 3004), in which the natural knowability of God is asserted, as referring to something that is achieved, historically and in fact, only by those who already believe; the claim then is one of possibility not of fact. This amounts to reconstruing natural theology as a movement wherein prior faith knowledge, through conscious reflection, articulates itself in structures which in themselves are not rationally convincing or probative.

Significant attempts at implementing this project are represented by Karl Rahner, Bernard Lonergan, and Emerich Coreth. Each has, in his own way, evolved a critical epistemology, loosely designated as Transcendental Thomism. In this approach, all explicit knowledge is a conceptual explicitation of a prior nonconceptual pre-understanding of the totality of Being. This preunderstanding is rooted in a prehension (Vorgriff) by finite spirit of Being as the unrestricted horizon of its consciousness, on which basis knowing is a “performing” of Being. Thus, all knowledge is a subjective dynamism of spirit toward God, affirmed not by demonstrative logic in service of faith but by the method of transcendental reduction. An analysis of this unthematic preknowledge, insofar as it is the condition for the very possibility of all other knowledge, enables the believing theologian to recognize this unlimited horizon as materially identifiable with God (Rahner). So conceived, knowledge is heuristic, first posing the question of God conditionally and then, upon intelligent satisfaction of the conditions, rendering the affirmation of God as a condition for the intelligibility of the real which is only virtually unconditioned (Lonergan).

Dominic DePetter and Edward Schillebeeckx have presented an alternative to this approach, rejecting the analysis of subjectivity in favor of an objective dynamism of knowing wherein judgment is a nonconceptual activity that implicitly intuits, in its own order of intentionality, the realm of real, extramental, finite Being. This implicit intuition of the real in its very finiteness and contingency releases a dynamism on which basis the intellect is led to affirm God as Infinite Cause. The intellect is led to this affirmation objectively and noetically, i.e., from within the intelligible contents of its own concepts (the transcendentals) as these provide a perspective out of which God can be designated without being represented. Underlying this is a metaphysics of participation whose epistemological counterpart is analogy, sc., the expansive and projective power latent in human intelligence to affirm the Unknown in its pure relationality to what it does know.

Bibliography: T. C. O'BRIEN, Metaphysics and the Existence of God (Washington 1960) 264–269, complete bibliog. W. A. WALLACE, “Metaphysics and the Existence of God,” The New Scholasticism, 36 (1962) 529–531. J. OWENS, “Existential Act, Divine Being, and the Subject of Metaphysics,” ibid. 37 (1963) 359–363. W. J. HILL, Knowing the Unknown God (New York 1971). L. GILKEY, Naming the Whirlwind (Indianapolis, New York 1969). J. RICHMOND, Theology and Metaphysics (New York 1971). L. DUPRÉ, The Other Dimension (Garden City, N.Y. 1972). R. J. ROTH, ed., God: Knowable and Unknowable (New York 1973).

[T. C. O'BRIEN/W. J. HILL/EDS.]

2. Existence

God is not an object of human experience, and hence His existence is not immediately evident to man and must be demonstrated. Thus arises the problem of God’s existence, a problem that lies at the summit of philosophical endeavor and whose solution has direct bearing on the meaning and purpose of human life. If God does not exist, then man becomes a law to himself and the norm of his own acts; but if God exists, man must acknowledge his essential dependence on a creator, who is also his conservator, legislator, and judge, to whom he is responsible for all his acts and operations. This is the striking disjunction that somehow or other confronts every individual with a cogency that admits no delay or alternative.

Philosophers are acutely aware of the importance of this problem and attempt to offer a solution in line with their own systems. Their attitudes toward God's existence may be reduced to three: theists affirm it, atheists deny it, and agnostics question it. Along with these three main positions there are systems of philosophy that admit the existence of God but deny some of the basic characteristics of the Supreme Being, such as His personal nature, transcendence, and providence. There are also those who refuse to admit the problematic nature of the issue and claim that man has a quasi-intuitive knowledge of God or a direct experience of His presence. This article sketches, in broad outline, various philosophical errors regarding the existence of God, alternative approaches to the existence of God that have been advanced by philosophers, and philosophical proofs for God's existence.

Philosophical Errors. The chief errors of philosophies with regard to the existence of a Supreme Being may be classified under the headings of atheism, agnosticism, and ontologism.

Atheism. ATHEISM is the theory of those who deny the existence of God. This definition does not apply to practical atheism, which is a way of life rather than a philosophical theory, or to negative atheism, i.e., the attitude of those who have no knowledge of God or do not care to acquire it. The definition applies only to positive theoretical atheism, or the kind of atheism that presents a problem to the philosopher inasmuch as it attempts to destroy belief in God by demolishing its rational foundation. Whether or not it is possible for a man to be absolutely convinced of the nonexistence of God, at least for an extended time, is questionable. But the fact remains that there have always been philosophers who have challenged belief in a Supreme Being and who have worked to recast and reconstruct their thought and estimation of human values on a purely atheistic, or antitheistic, basis. This is particularly true in an age that has witnessed the tragic and solitary atheism of a man such as F. W. NIETZSCHE, the literary and fashionable atheism of some extreme existentialists, and the revolutionary atheism of dialectical materialism.

Agnosticism. The major threat to theistic belief is not so much atheism, with its ruthless and irrational attacks on God, as it is the more subtle and therefore more insidious form of error named AGNOSTICISM. The term means literally "lack of knowledge," and was coined by T. H. Huxley in 1869 to describe the attitude of a person who asserts the inability of the mind to know the realities corresponding to man's ultimate scientific, philosophical, and religious ideas. There are various types of agnosticism. Modern religious agnosticism assumes two principal forms, the rigid and the moderate. Rigid, or pure, agnosticism considers the problem of God as being entirely beyond the reach of human intelligence. Man can know absolutely nothing about God, not even whether He exists or not. Moderate or dogmatic agnosticism believes in the existence of God, but denies any rational foundation for such a belief. As far as the nature of God is concerned, moderate agnosticism goes along with rigid agnosticism in professing complete ignorance.

Two antimetaphysical schools of thought have contributed to the affirmation and spreading of modern agnosticism, viz, Comte's POSITIVISM and Kant's criticism (see CRITICISM, PHILOSOPHICAL). Although the two doctrines differ widely from each other, both are indebted to Hume's subjective EMPIRICISM and both attempt to reduce the notion of knowledge to scientific knowledge. Since God is not the object of empirical observation, it follows that in their view man cannot have any concept of Him. But whereas for COMTE the belief in God is useless and even harmful to mankind, inasmuch as it hampers the natural development of human reason, for KANT it becomes an act of faith for which no rational justification is given. Comte is a pure agnostic; Kant a dogmatic agnostic.

The impact of these two philosophies is manifest in Herbert Spencer's theory of the Unknowable. SPENCER admits the existence of the ABSOLUTE as a necessary postulate for the intelligibility of the relative objects of human experience, but he denies any knowledge of the Absolute. The mentality created by Spencer and his predecessors influenced the religious theory of William JAMES. Following the pragmatic principle that an idea is true if it works and produces good results, James maintains that the belief in God, which is largely a matter of feeling, is true because it has a definite value in concrete life. The empirical study of such belief shows in effect that it expresses confidence in the promise of the future and has beneficial results for one's life, both as an individual and as a member of society. James spurns the traditional proofs of God's existence and settles for the "hypothesis of God" as more satisfactory than any alternative hypothesis. Truth is thus sacrificed to expediency; and belief in God, whom James prefers to consider as a finite Being with limited power, is deprived of any metaphysical foundation.

The intellectual movement known as Modernism was influenced by similar ideas. As St. Pius X's encyclical PASCENDI indicates, agnosticism is at the basis of the religious philosophy of Modernism. Because of their fundamental PHENOMENALISM, the Modernists make it impossible for human reason to attain any supersensible and transcendent reality. While eliminating all rational demonstration of God's existence, they also attempt to discredit the historical fact of God's actual intervention in the world. Hence Modernism is a theological error as well as a false philosophical system.

Among more recent versions of agnosticism mention may be made of LOGICAL POSITIVISM, according to which a proposition is meaningful, and therefore true, only if its composing elements can be reduced to experimental data by careful linguistic analysis. In this conception of philosophy—if one can still speak of philosophy—all statements about God are meaningless because they are incapable of experimental verification.

Modern agnosticism, under whatever form, distrusts the power of human reason. Such distrust is based on an erroneous conception of the limits and value of KNOWLEDGE in general and of inferential knowledge in particular. Thus in the last analysis agnosticism is the consequence of a false epistemology. By way of criticism it may be pointed out that although human knowledge starts with the particular data of sense experience, man can form ideas that abstract from all individuating notes and represent the nature of a thing as it is in itself. These ideas have the characteristic of universality, which is in direct contrast with the datum of sense experience. Just as man can form ideas of the essence of sensible things, so he can form ideas of spiritual substances, such as the soul and God. The existence of these substances is proved by rational inference from the nature of their effects. Since every effect demands an adequate cause, from the nature of an effect one can infer the nature of its cause. The fundamental principle of positivism, as well as of Kantian criticism, viz, that the sensible alone is knowable, is a gratuitous assumption that is neither demonstrated nor demonstrable. It is in effect a self-destroying principle, for all attempt at demonstration leads to a rejection of the principle itself.

Ontologism. At the other extreme from agnosticism stands ONTOLOGISM, which maintains that since man has a quasi-intuitive knowledge of God, all rational demonstration of His existence is unnecessary. According to one of its chief exponents, Nicholas MALEBRANCHE, man envisions all things by means of a direct intuition of God's ideas. Since there is no distinction between the divine essence and its ideas, it seems to follow that God is present to the human mind in every act of knowledge. Vincenzo GIOBERTI defined and developed Malebranche's mild ontologism and identified the ontological order with the logical order of knowledge. Thus, for him, God is the first object known by man's mind. Antonio ROSMINI-SERBATI, whose name is often associated with the ontologists, held that all knowledge is through the innate idea of being in its supreme ideality (l'essere ideale), and this makes the soul intelligent. The idea is not the result of abstraction or reflection, nor is God Himself. Rosmini called it an "appurtenance of God," or something divine and pertaining to God, which may be compared to the impression of the divine light on man's soul. Since the ideal being is for man the vehicle of ascent to the Real Being (Essere Reale), God, it is only improperly that Rosmini is classified as an ontologist.

Ontologism in the strict sense of the term has never been a popular system. It runs against man's experience and does not account for men's persistent errors concerning the existence and nature of God. Moreover, if man had an intuitive knowledge of God or the divine ideas, his knowledge would always be infallibly true, which evidently is not the case.

Approaches to the Existence of God. Although there are many approaches to the problem of God's existence, not all have the same value and appeal. Along with the highly rationalized metaphysical arguments suitable to a philosophically trained mind, there are other approaches of a more subjective nature, as well as a spontaneous, prephilosophical knowledge of God that precedes any scientific elaboration. The nature and value of such knowledge is the subject of the present discussion.

Prephilosophical Knowledge. Knowledge of God's existence is so deeply rooted in human nature that St. JOHN DAMASCENE speaks of it as being "implanted in man" (De fide orthodoxa 1.1.3), St. BONAVENTURE calls it "innate to the rational mind" (De mysterio Trinitatis 1.1), and St. THOMAS AQUINAS explains that "it is through principles which are innate in us that we are able to perceive that God exists" (In Boeth. de Trin. 1.3 ad 6). Aquinas goes so far as to say that "all knowing beings know God implicitly in every known object" (De ver. 22.2 ad 1), while Duns Scotus affirms even more emphatically that "in the knowledge of any being as this particular being, God is conceived in a most indistinct manner" (Opus Oxon. 1.3.2.3). While it is wrong to interpret these statements as meaning that the idea of God is innate to man in the way that the idea of the infinite is for R. DESCARTES, they do point to the natural and innate facility with which the human mind can attain the knowledge of the Supreme Being.

In the teaching of the schoolmen, such knowledge is at first obscure and confused, and is the result of INTU-ITION rather than of an inferential JUDGMENT. It becomes gradually more distinct as man begins to think of the magnitude and wonders of the universe, the inexorable laws of nature and his own helplessness in the face of natural events and calamities, the many evils that go unpunished, and his unsatisfied craving for unlimited truth, goodness, and happiness. These reflections, which arise naturally in the mind of every man regardless of his background, milieu, and education, suggest the idea of a superior Being who is the cause of the universe and judge of mankind. This is roughly the idea of a personal and transcendent God, whom man has tried to propitiate by prayer and sacrifice from the dawn of history up to the present. As man progresses and develops his intellectual abilities, this primordial idea of God acquires new traits and more closely approximates the reality of the Supreme Being. Imperfect though it may be, this spontaneous, pre-philosophical notion of God can hardly be overrated, since upon it a large segment of humanity will be judged by the same God who chose this way to reveal Himself to their minds.

Subjectivist Approaches. Many persons are content with the idea of God obtained as a result of spontaneous thought or acquired through faith and education. A philosopher wishes to go further and analyze the contents and ultimate foundation of such an idea. In so doing he may start from himself and his personal experiences, or from the nature and existence of extramental reality. In the first case, one has the subjectivist approach to God; in the second, the objective, traditional approach of scholastic philosophy. The subjectivist approach, which goes back to St. AUGUSTINE and is strongly emphasized by Descartes, has assumed various forms in modern and contemporary philosophy. One of these is the sentimental school of thought, so called because of the importance attached to sentiment or subjective feeling in human knowledge. Its chief exponents are Pascal, Schleiermacher, Ritschl, and Otto.

B. PASCAL challenges the demonstrative value of traditional metaphysical proofs of God's existence on the ground that their abstract and purely intellectual character fails to convince man in his state of fallen nature. Instead he appeals to the heart, which grasps intuitively the truths that escape rational demonstration. The heart is for Pascal a complex faculty having the immediacy and certainty of sense perception and the intellectual apprehension of first principles, as well as the appetitive acts of desire and love. The heart has a logic of its own that includes all the foregoing acts but consists preeminently in supernatural faith. Here is where Pascal's sentimentalism comes close to FIDEISM, a system holding that faith alone is the source of man's knowledge of God.

F. D. E. SCHLEIERMACHER, a 19th-century German theologian, reduces the essence of religion to what he calls "a sense and taste for the Infinite," or "a feeling of absolute dependence." God's existence cannot be demonstrated by human reason, but man feels and experiences his dependence on God, whose existence he admits only because of the inclination of his heart and will. Schleiermacher is considered a forerunner of Modernism. So also is Albrecht RITSCHL, for whom the idea of God is the result neither of intuition nor of rational inference, but is rather a necessary postulate of human nature in its attempt to establish spiritual supremacy over the inferior world. Rudolf OTTO distinguishes between the rational and nonrational elements in religious experience, the unique quality of which is holiness. While the rational element is indispensable for understanding some characteristics of the "holy" or the divine, it tends to overshadow the deeper nonrational core, which he calls the "numinous," the "awe-inspiring and fascinating mystery." To grasp the nonrational element in the divine, man has a sensus numinis. This is not mere emotion or natural feeling but an affective state of mind involving some kind of preconceptual knowledge. Otto links it to the "faculty of divination," a special faculty enabling man to know the "holy" in its appearance. Both the rational and nonrational elements of religion are described in Kantian terms as an a priori category.

Another subjectivist approach to God is contained in the philosophy of IMMANENCE of H. BERGSON, who conceives reality as a dynamic, creative becoming, a vital impetus (élan vital). In its evolutionary process the vital impetus is continuously striving to overcome the drag of inert matter, which in a way is its own by-product. In so doing, it gives rise to different levels of being, inanimate nature, plants, animals, and men. Thus the vital impetus appears to be the source of all reality, the God of Bergson's philosophy (although not all interpreters agree on this point), whom he describes metaphorically as a center from which worlds shoot out like rockets in a display of fireworks. Man grasps this all-embracing reality by intuition, a self-conscious instinct that can actually feel the flow of becoming because of a certain "sympathy." Intuition is superior to intellect, the chief function of which is to form concepts that furnish mere "snapshots" of reality. To prove his doctrine of man's knowledge of God, Bergson appeals to the experience of the great Christian mystics and attempts to show the superiority of a dynamic religion stemming from vital intuition over the static religion of conceptualized knowledge.

Edouard LE ROY, Bergson's disciple and a leading figure in the Modernist movement, tried unsuccessfully to reconcile the doctrine of immanence with Catholic teaching. Like his master, he reduces all reality to becoming. God himself is not, He becomes. After questioning the ontological validity of abstract knowledge and attacking the classical arguments for God's existence, he claims that the only way to arrive at God is by analyzing CONSCIOUSNESS. This manifests to man an exigency for a growing realization, an infinite progress, and a perfect spiritual life. At the root of such moral exigency there is an absolute: to recognize this is to affirm the existence of God. Briefly, there is no metaphysical certitude of God's existence but merely "a moral certitude based upon a direct experience of a moral reality." Yet Le Roy, like Bergson, rejects the charge of PANTHEISM.

Still another form of subjectivist approach to God is the "method of immanence" of M. BLONDEL; this may be defined as a psychological way of stating all religious and philosophical problems, starting from the self. It differs from the "theory of immanence" in that the source of religious truth is held to be internal observation rather than consciousness or subconsciousness. According to Blondel, man arrives at God not by mere speculative thought but by action. Action includes thought, but it is much more than that. It is the entire human experience conceived within the framework of man's basic needs and tendencies; it is the synthesis of thought, will, and being itself, the activity of the whole man. The infinite disproportion that man observes between his exigencies in life and his ideals makes him realize his deficiencies and the need for a transcendent and necessary Being. Thus the order of nature finds its integration in the supernatural order of grace and revelation as manifested in the Christian religion.

The foregoing theories must be credited for their emphasis on the important role that subjective factors play in man's knowledge of God. However, they overlook the fact that feelings and emotional states are relative to individuals and subject to change, while intuition and, especially, mystical experience are the privilege of the few. Hence it is wrong to consider them as a universal criterion of man's knowledge of God. The traditional theistic arguments of scholastic philosophy retain their demonstrative value even without subjective elements. This holds true also with regard to Blondel's method of immanence; although of unquestionable merit, it cannot be considered a substitute for more objective reasoning.

Phenomenological and Existentialist Views. PHENOMENOLOGY, worked out chiefly by Edmund HUSSERL and Alexius Meinong and consisting in a descriptive analysis of the essence of the given, the phenomenon, is explicitly applied to the problem of God by Max SCHELER. Scheler holds that God, like any other essence, is reached by man through emotional acts of a religious nature, such as faith, worship, fear, and love. By these acts man attains to God, not merely as being in the ideal order but as a supreme value in the order of existence. The starting point of man's knowledge of God may be any object of human experience, for all things are effects of God in such ways that they have a symbolic relation to Him. This relation is grasped by an intuitive emotional act apart from any discursive reasoning. Yet a religious predisposition is necessary, and God has to reveal Himself through some sort of illumination.

The phenomenological method of investigation has found supporters even among the existentialists, who apply it to existence rather than essence, and especially to man in his concrete existing reality. The results of their investigation are quite different, just as their systems are different, for one can hardly speak of a unique and homogeneous EXISTENTIALISM. As far as the problem of God is concerned, one can roughly draw a line between theistic and atheistic existentialists, even though some existentialist philosophers defy any strict classification. Theistic existentialists, such as S. KIERKEGAARD, G. Marcel, L. Chestov (1866–1938), and N. BERDIAEV, have certain traits in common. They all believe that God is discovered or encountered by the individual as he strives for the free realization of his true self rather than as the term of impersonal objective reasoning. Thus God is for them the foundation of existence in which man, like all other beings, participates. Atheistic existentialists, such as J. P. Sartre and A. Camus, consider the idea of God as contradictory and describe, in vivid and often crude terms, the irrationality and ABSURDITY of the world and human existence. M. Heidegger and K. Jaspers, the two main representatives of German existentialism, seem not to exclude God from their philosophy and strongly resent the charge of atheism, but at the same time they develop a system in which there seems to be no room for the God of traditional philosophy. Heidegger's "Being" and Jaspers's "Transcendent" are such vague and ambiguous terms that they inevitably perplex the reader as to their real meaning. Inadequate as it is, existentialism under all its forms has served at least one purpose: it has proved beyond doubt that God is at the center of all solutions to the problem of human existence. With God, life has a meaning and a purpose; without God, life and the world itself become meaningless as well as absurd.

Proofs for the Existence of God. In his Summa theologiae (1a, 2.2) St. Thomas asks whether it can be demonstrated that God exists. He answers in the affirmative, explaining that from the knowledge of the effect it is possible to infer the existence of its proper cause, since no effect can exist without a preexisting cause. Hence, insofar as the existence of God is not self-evident to man, it can and must be demonstrated from effects that are known to man. Such DEMONSTRATION must utilize arguments a posteriori, i.e., from effect to cause, and thus presupposes the ontological and transcendental validity of the principle of CAUSALITY.

Traditional Arguments. Using this principle, St. Thomas sets forth his “five ways” (Summa theologiae, 1a, 2.3; Summa contra gentiles, 1.13, 15), or “the arguments by which both philosophers and Catholic teachers have proved that God exists” (Summa contra gentiles, 1.13). The structure of each of the five ways is basically the same. Each starts from a fact of experience—motion or change, caused existence, corruptibility, composition and imperfection, finality—and they all lead to the existence of a self-subsistent Being considered as the ultimate cause or explanation of that particular experimental datum—Immovable Mover, Uncaused Cause, Necessary Being, Absolute Perfection, Supreme End. Aquinas applies the principle of causality when showing that in a series of essentially subordinate causes one cannot proceed in infinity, but must rather come to a first cause that is independent of all other causes and responsible for the causality of the entire series. In such a series the causes are so dependent on one another that no inferior cause can exert its causality without the actual influence of the superior cause. If no first cause existed over and above the entire series and as the actual source of all causality, there would be no effect now, and hence no being, which is obviously not the case. The five ways can perhaps be reduced to one single proof expressed by the axiom that “the greater cannot proceed from the less,” or that a limited and contingent being finds its ultimate explanation only in an infinite and self-subsistent Being. (See GOD, PROOFS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF.)

As to whether, in view of the many discoveries of modern science, the traditional arguments for God’s existence are still valid, the answer can only be in the affirmative. Philosophy and science are two distinct fields of knowledge; they follow different methods and pursue distinct objectives. The problem of God’s existence is philosophical, and its solution rests on metaphysical principles that are not subject to change. Thus to reject the existence of God in the name of physical science is to give a scientific answer—and a wrong one at that—to a philosophical question. Besides, far from invalidating the traditional theistic arguments, the findings of modern science seem to confirm their conclusions. (See GOD AND MODERN SCIENCE.)

Confirmatory Arguments. Other arguments for God’s existence do not have the cogency of the traditional metaphysical proofs but perhaps have greater appeal to the philosophically untrained and to thinkers who are not metaphysically oriented. The argument from moral obligation, also known as the argument from conscience, is a case in point. It is a fact of experience to which the conscience bears witness that man perceives within himself a law commanding him to do certain acts because they are good and avoid others because they are evil. This law is not merely subjective and artificial; it is imposed upon man by virtue of his very nature, and violation of it brings a sense of guilt and remorse. It is an absolute command, a CATEGORICAL imperative, to use Kant’s terminology, that admits of no exception, and is found in every man having the use of reason. Training and environment may help to develop knowledge of this law, but a general agreement seems to exist among men concerning its most universal principles. Since there is no law without a lawgiver, and man cannot possibly be held responsible for imposing upon himself an obligation that restricts his own freedom, it must be concluded that the natural law owes its origin to the author of human nature, a supreme lawgiver, God.

The same conclusion can be arrived at from consideration of the need of sanctions to ensure the observance of the natural law. A law that cannot be enforced loses all practical value, and the only way to enforce it is by adequate rewards and punishments. Yet cases in which the good suffer and the wicked prosper throughout life are not rare, showing that proper sanctions are not attached to the natural law in this life. Must one admit that in this world—where all things act according to a rational plan obeying the laws of nature—only man is free to violate with impunity the natural law he discovers within himself? An affirmative answer would be inconsistent with the entire plan of the universe. The only explanation is that since perfect justice is not done in this life, there must be a future life where adequate justice is done by a supremely wise and all-powerful judge, namely, God.

A related theistic proof is man’s desire for happiness. Man is so constituted that he always strives for happiness but never completely attains it. He does not seek just any kind of happiness but happiness to the utmost degree. Since this tendency cannot be fully satisfied in this life, where all goods are limited and imperfect, a supreme good must exist that completely satisfies man’s aspirations, and that is God. To hold the contrary is to admit in man a natural tendency destined for frustration rather than for fulfillment because of the absence of an object to satisfy it. Man would find himself in a more miserable condition than brutes and animals, since they can obtain in this life all the satisfaction of which they are capable, whereas man would be prevented from attaining the good toward which he strives.

Another subsidiary proof for the existence of God is the argument from universal consent. The human race as a whole has always recognized the existence of a superior

Being deserving of worship and on whom man and the world depend. But mankind cannot be wrong in a matter of such importance without jeopardizing the trustworthiness of the human mind and man's final destiny. Hence God's existence is demanded as a sufficient reason for that universal conviction. Needless to say, this argument, like all other confirmatory proofs, has only a relative value inasmuch as no strict metaphysical reasoning goes to support it. However, it cannot simply be dismissed on the ground that universal convictions, such as popular belief that the sun revolves about the earth, have later proved to be wrong. A scientific theory of this type has no direct bearing on man's final destiny. It is therefore conceivable that man be mistaken about it as long as no adequate means of verification are available. Nor can it be objected that individual persons or tribes may never have had a notion of a Supreme Being, and that many people even today refuse to accept the existence of God as a well-established doctrine. Universal consent does not preclude the existence of individual men or groups of men who do not share the common belief. The credence of the vast majority of the human race is a sufficient ground for the argument under discussion.

Ideological Argument. Known originally as the argument from eternal truths, which was hinted at by PLATO and suggested by St. Augustine in De libero arbitrio (2.2–15), the ideological argument has assumed different forms in the course of history. Its proponents seem to agree that the argument is an attempt to prove the existence of God from the nature of the intelligibles. These are either the possible essences of things (argument from the possibles), or the eternal truths, namely, those statements that express necessary relations among the possibles or the first principles of reason (argument from eternal truths). The argument may be stated as follows. There are intrinsically possible beings whose essence and essential principles are necessary, immutable, and eternal. But such beings demand as their ultimate foundation an actually existing being that is absolutely necessary, immutable, and eternal. Therefore such a being exists, and men call this being God.

The ideological argument, its defenders maintain, is not based on ideas considered only in their logical or analytical order. Rather, ideas are considered from the point of view of mental concepts with a foundation in reality; not inasmuch as they represent an actually existing thing or the truth of an actually existing object, but inasmuch as their content reflects a being or truth in the essential order. They are ideas of a possible or potential essence for which an ultimate reason is sought in a necessary and eternal being. Thus understood, the argument keeps its distinctive feature as an argument from the ideal order, and at the same time it obviates the inconsistency of involving an illicit passage from the ideal to the real order. The ideal, in this case, is also real; it belongs to the realm of the intelligibles, and the transition is simply from one order of reality to another order of reality. The principle of demonstration used for such a transition is either the principle of sufficient reason or the principle of causality. When the principle of causality is used, then the argument is conceived within the framework of St. Thomas's five ways, especially the fourth way, which argues to God from the various degrees of being.

To the objection that the possibles and their characteristics of necessity, immutability, and eternity can be sufficiently explained through an abstractive intellect and the object, the upholders of the argument answer that the human mind and the object are the proximate causes and foundation of the possibles, but not their ultimate reason. Indeed, by their very nature, the possibles transcend all created mind and reality; they are such even if no contingent being or human intellect ever existed. Far from being the ultimate foundation of the possibles, the human mind and all created beings would not exist at all, were they not intrinsically possible.

A similar answer is given to the objection that truth depends on the existence of contingent being and is therefore purely hypothetical. The existence of contingent things, the defenders of the argument rebut, is the immediate cause of man's knowledge of truth, but it is not the ultimate foundation of truth, which prescind from both contingent reality and the human mind. If nothing ever existed, there would be no truth; but there is TRUTH, and so there must be an eternal and necessary foundation without which truth and its properties of eternity and necessity are inconceivable. The foundation is God.

See Also: DEISM; THEISM.

Bibliography: R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, God: His Existence and His Nature, tr. B. ROSE, 2 v. (St. Louis 1934–36). É. H. GILSON, God and Philosophy (New Haven 1941). F. J. SHEEN, God and Intelligence in Modern Philosophy (New York 1925); Philosophy of Religion (New York 1948). C. HARTSHORNE and W. L. REESE, eds., Philosophers Speak of God (Chicago 1953). American Catholic Philosophical Association. Proceedings of the Annual Meeting (Baltimore 1926) 28 (1954). J. MARITAIN, Approaches to God, tr. P. O'REILLY (New York 1954). J. D. COLLINS, God in Modern Philosophy (Chicago 1959). M. R. HOLLOWAY, An Introduction to Natural Theology (New York 1959). T. C. O'BRIEN, Metaphysics and the Existence of God (Washington 1960). J. A. BAINÉE, Readings in Natural Theology (Westminster, Md. 1962). G. L. ABERNETHY and T. A. LANGFORD, eds., Philosophy of Religion (New York 1962). J. MACQUARRIE, Twentieth-Century Religious Thought (New York 1963). B. M. BONANSEA, "The Ideological Argument for God's Existence," Studies in Philosophy and the History of Philosophy 1 (1961) 1–34. M. CHOSSAT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951) 4.1:874–948. P. ORTEGAT, Philosophie de la religion, 2 v. (Gembloux 1948). F. VAN STEENBERGHEN, Dieu caché (Louvain 1961). M. F. SCIACCA, Il problema di Dio e della religione nella filosofia attuale (Brescia 1953).

[B. M. BONANSEA]

3. Nature

The proofs for God's existence, each in its own way, lead one to knowledge of God as first on all levels of existence, as Ipsum Esse Subsistens. The aim of the present section is to make explicit what is implicitly contained in this concept. One may well wonder to what extent such explicit knowledge is possible. All Christian thinkers have recognized the depth of this "sublime truth," possessing as it does an infinity of intelligibility—far more than man can grasp. Thus GREGORY OF NYSSA wrote: "To have true knowledge is to understand that seeing is really not seeing, because God transcends all knowledge." God, moreover, cannot be defined. Man may indeed name Him, but this is not to define Him. For DEFINITION would assign Him to a GENUS, and since God calls Himself "He who is," the genus would have to be BEING. Now being is not a genus, for a genus is determined by specific differences that are not contained within itself. Nothing can be added to being, since outside of being there is nothing (St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae, 1a, 3.5). Is one therefore constrained to silence and reduced in the final analysis to affirming that in a philosophical sense man can know nothing of God? Catholic thinkers respond in the negative: God can be known, to a certain degree, yet not to His innermost depths. This reply need offer no stumbling block to reason; rather the human mind's inability to comprehend God may itself be taken as a sign of truth.

Extreme Views. Though man is unable to define God, he may at least indirectly "characterize" Him, using the conclusions of the proofs of His existence. In this attempt, however, two extremes are to be avoided, viz, ANTHROPOMORPHISM and AGNOSTICISM.

Anthropomorphism. The first consists in thinking of God and man under the same univocal concept. Sometimes such univocity is mythological and psychological in origin: this is the anthropomorphism of the masses who attribute to God the feelings and reactions of man and judge Him according to human standards. At other times the conception presents itself under an intellectual guise, crediting God with all the perfections of which man has knowledge. Between God and man, in this view, there is no difference of nature but only one of degree—a position very close to that of PANTHEISM, which identifies God and the world of human experience. To avoid this extreme, one must constantly refine his concept of God, who is in fact far beyond man's representations and concepts. The safeguard against anthropomorphism is therefore purification; but solicitude for purification should not lead to the other extreme, that of agnosticism.

Agnosticism. This maintains the possibility of a type of demonstration of the existence of God, but denies that man is able to affirm anything about God's nature. It invokes EQUIVOCATION rather than univocity. What one says of God, in this view, is either attributed to Him in a purely negative fashion or signifies only that He is a cause; for God is unknowable in His nature. Certainly this position is not new; it was found among the Neoplatonists and during the Middle Ages, especially in MAIMONIDES. But in recent times it has assumed a new form, that of Modernism. One should, of course, seek always to refine his concept of God, but must beware of refining that concept to nothingness in the process. Analogy is the surest means to attain such refinement, for it allows man to consider the universe as a screen through which he may come to know divine being and life (cf. Rom 1.20).

Means of Knowing God. To know God philosophically, two means are available: negation and analogy. The passage from the world to God is assured by a two-fold dialectic, one negating and the other constructing. One is suppressive, the other progressive; yet their movements enmesh so that the one cannot function without the other.

Negation. The way of negation consists in denying of God anything that belongs to a contingent being as such. Thus, to know God through this way is not to show what He is, but rather what He is not. Instead of beginning with an inaccessible essence to which are added positive differences leading to better and better understanding, one collects rather a series of negative differences that indicate what this essence is not. Such a method leads to knowledge that, admittedly, is not positive; it is imperfect. Yet, by denying all the limitations found in creatures, it allows one to say with ever greater precision what God is not and what He cannot possibly be. Thus, by distinguishing God from what is not God, one attains some knowledge of His essence (see St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa contra gentiles, 1.14).

Analogy. The way of ANALOGY consists in attributing to God, to an eminent degree, everything that can be considered as a PERFECTION pure and simple, that is, a perfection that is without any trace of imperfection. To describe the nature of God is to name Him variously as just, powerful, wise, etc. The principle behind such predication is this: because God is First Cause, He must possess to an eminent degree all the perfections found in creatures. The problem is to discover how these perfections may be predicated of God. One may not attribute them in a univocal sense, for God does not produce creatures as one man engenders another. The human offspring has the same nature as his parents, whereas the effects produced by God do not conform to the divine nature. Nor is the equivocal sense applicable, for the mere sharing of a name implies no real relation, no resemblance at all between the things compared. When it obtains, knowledge of one through the other becomes impossible.

A certain likeness, however, must exist between things and God, and this is the likeness of an effect to its cause. This relationship is the basis for analogy—the only way one may speak of the Uncreated while avoiding both anthropomorphism, which pretends to understand God as He knows Himself, and symbolism. Analogy is a relationship between two beings that, while different, bear a certain likeness to each other. Just as there are different types of resemblance, so too there are different analogies: metaphorical analogy, analogy of simple attribution, and analogy of proper proportionality. In speaking of God, there is no question of metaphorical analogy, which involves a simple likeness of relations. Such a comparison reveals no more than the accidental aspects of things. Nor can analogy of attribution be involved; things said to be analogical in this sense share in the relationship to a single term that properly, by its intrinsic nature, possesses the perfection being considered. Between God and man there are no common denominators. The only type of analogy left is that of proper proportionality: the application of a concept that is analogous in itself to two subjects that are essentially different; an application based on their proportionate participation in the ontological reality signified by the concept. It is this analogy that allows one to say, for instance, that in God there is something that bears the same kind of relationship to the divine nature as intelligence does to human nature. This expresses a parallel relationship between divine nature and divine intelligence on one hand and between human nature and human intelligence on the other.

Since effects manifest their causes, those perfections that denote positive realities in creatures (e.g., life, intelligence, and will) are found also in God. It is not sufficient, however, to affirm that God is intelligent, just, or wise simply as man might be. The likeness between divine and human perfections must be stated in these terms: a perfection that is realized in a finite being to the degree consonant with its proper mode of being is similar to that found in God according to His mode of being. This analogy is legitimate, for any being or perfection that can be assigned to a creature must have its root in God. Consequently, one cannot remove from God the positive value of this being or perfection, no matter what the form (or lack of form) it may take in God.

Divine Attributes. The foregoing furnishes a basis for understanding what is meant by a divine attribute. In general, a divine attribute may be defined as an absolutely simple perfection that exists in God necessarily and formally, and that, according to man's imperfect mode of knowing, either constitutes the essence of the Divine Being or is deduced from this essence. Divine attributes that do not constitute the divine essence are further divided into entitative attributes and operative attributes. Entitative attributes relate to the very being of God; they are perfections such as unicity, truth, goodness, infinity, immensity, ubiquity, and eternity that in themselves bespeak no relation to contingent being. Operative attributes, on the other hand, relate to the divine operations, i.e., to the immanent operations of God's intellect and will, from which proceed effects that are extrinsic to God, namely, creation and conservation.

The divine attributes do not designate perfections really distinct from one another; rather there is only a virtual distinction among them, in the sense that each perfection explicitly states what is implied in the others (see DISTINCTION, KINDS OF). Thus, all the divine attributes designate one and the same, absolutely unique, Entity, but as understood under multiple and diverse aspects. Moreover, such multiplicity does not impair the divine perfection, because if God appears to human reason as simultaneously one and many, this is owing only to the limitations of man's intellect.

Divine Essence. Among the divine attributes it is possible to isolate one or more that can be said to be the formal constituent of the divine essence. This manner of speaking refers only to a logical determination of the divine essence, for in God all reality is His very essence. The formal constituent, in this sense, is the fundamental perfection from which all others can be logically deduced. Such a perfection must appear to man as absolutely first, prior to any other attribute, and should be the basis for his distinguishing God from what is not God.

It is commonly taught that God is Being itself, subsistent by itself, and that this ASEITY (ASEITAS), or "by-itself-ness," is the constitutive perfection of God. Aseity is fundamental, for God's fundamental perfection consists in being absolutely independent, self-sufficient, and self-existent. Everything else is said of God precisely because He exists of Himself. The perfection of aseity, furthermore, properly belongs to God and distinguishes Him clearly from His creatures. Though all other divine perfections can be imitated analogically, only existence of Himself is absolutely proper to God. This perfection, moreover, does not allow any equivocation. Finally, it can be said that the divine attributes are implied one in the other only because each one contains being. Infinity, for example, implies intelligence, eternity, etc., because infinity is nothing more than an infinity of being. "Absolute being contains all other perfections eminently within itself” (St. Thomas, Summa theologiae, 1a2ae, 2.5 ad 2). Divine aseity thus fulfills all the conditions necessary for it to be considered the formal constituent of the divine essence. God is indeed Ipsum Esse Subsistens, and St. Thomas adds that the name most proper to God is “He who is” (Summa theologiae, 1a, 13.11), that is to say: He in whom essence and existence are one.

There are some, however, who do not accept this teaching. The nominalists, following WILLIAM OF OCKHAM, deny that in God one attribute can be the source of all other perfections, since the divine essence is the complexus of all these perfections. From the nominalist point of view, the universal is but a collective term; thus, the formal constituent of the divine nature serves only to designate the collection of divine perfections. Moreover, for them, this synonym for the ensemble of divine attributes is purely equivocal and has no proper content. It is only a symbol for a reality that is in itself unknown and unknowable. Such a position borders on agnosticism.

Duns Scotus maintains that the formal constituent consisted in a radical infinity, that is, in a demand for all the perfections possible (Op. Oxon. 1.3.2). It must be admitted that infinity is one of the concepts that better explain the divine nature, for all God’s perfections do flow from it. But one can say as much for any of the divine attributes, since each implies all others. The logical essence must not only imply all the divine perfections, but must express their radical source and basic explanation.

JOHN OF ST. THOMAS places the formal constituent of the divine essence in subsistent intellection; for in God, as in man, intelligence is the perfection upon which all others depend (In Summa theologiae, 1a, 16.2.10). Yet intellection presupposes a subject or essence, as John of St. Thomas undoubtedly intends when he speaks of subsistent intellection. But if one considers essence as more fundamental than its operation, then one must hold that Subsistent Being itself is the formal constituent of the divine essence.

Entitative Attributes. Among the attributes related to the very being of God, simplicity and infinity give man direct knowledge of God’s personal nature.

Simplicity. God is absolutely one in Himself, perfectly simple, that is to say, excluding any composition, whether physical, metaphysical, or logical. (1) Since God is PURE ACT, He cannot, on the physical level, be composed of matter and form, both of which necessarily imply potentiality and essential imperfection. A fortiori, He is not composed of quantitative parts since these indicate indetermination and passivity. (2) On the metaphysical level, God cannot be composed of essence and existence since He is Being of Himself (Esse per se); neither can He be composed of substance and accident, since He is Pure Act and thus not in potency to further determination. (3) On the logical level, God is not contained in a genus or a species because, as universal principle, He transcends all genera and all differences of being. (See SIMPLICITY OF GOD.)

One must understand clearly the significance of this divine simplicity. It is not by eliminating the limitations found in creatures that one arrives at Esse Subsistens per se; this would be to place this Being in the same genus with creatures, undoubtedly to an eminently superior degree, but nonetheless sharing a common nature with them. Such a position leads directly to contradictions. Thus, to pretend to eliminate any limitation is to consider essence and existence as two realities, separable at will. Similarly, one cannot consider Subsistent Being as entering into the genus of created being. For created being is properly characterized as a composition of essence and existence, of potentiality and actuality. Consequently, if Pure Act were found in this genus, it would no longer be Pure Act, that is to say, identifiable with itself, which is obviously a contradiction. Thus, divine simplicity is the mark of a Being in which essence and existence are identified without any limitation. Here one is no longer concerned with a relation between essence and existence; such a relation is swallowed up in identification—the essence of God is none other than His existence (St. Thomas, De ente 5).

The UNICITY OF GOD is a necessary result of the absolutely divine simplicity. If divinity were multiple, one would have to distinguish, in divine beings, the divinity common to all as well as their individual differences. In consequence, one would find in these beings a composition of genus and difference; thus, no one of them could be termed Ipsum Esse Subsistens, and no one would be God. Moreover, on these terms God, being His very nature, would have no cause to multiply Himself. If a man were what he is by reason of human nature rather than by reason of individual characteristics that distinguish him from other men, he would be humanity itself; thus, there could be no other men besides him. The same reasoning applies to God: He is His very nature. Thus there can be only one God (Summa theologiae, 1a, 3.3).

Infinity. Infinity means the same as “without limits.” But there are many ways of being without limits. Thus, matter is infinite in a privative sense: it cannot be completed by itself. In this sense, the infinite connotes indefiniteness or basic indetermination, and therefore essential imperfection. In a contrary sense, the infinite can also bespeak something that is without limits by reason of its very perfection. From this point of view, one can distinguish (1) the relative infinite, which has no limits within the genus of a certain perfection, and (2) the absolute infinite, which has no limits within the genus of all perfections possible.

The latter infinity of perfection is the type attributed to God. In fact, God is infinitely perfect insofar as He is Esse per se. In Him, existence is not received as in an essence capable of existing; God is unreceived, and therefore absolutely unlimited existence. From another viewpoint, moreover, one can say that if God had limitations, He would be susceptible to some new perfection; He would be composed of act and potency, which is a contradiction. Again, if He had limitations, He would be subject to them, and therefore, in a sense, passive. In either case, He would no longer be Pure Act. God is therefore infinite by His essence and by the fulness of infinity. His infinity is not to be understood as indetermination, since all indetermination is imperfection. Divine infinity, since it is that of Pure Act, is rather absolute determination; that is to say, it implies the total and perfect actuality of all perfections. (See INFINITY OF GOD.)

Operative Attributes. These attributes refer to God's immanent operations, or, in other words, to the divine life as this is known to natural reason. Emphasis here is on God's intellect and will, for these attributes enable man to conceive of God as a personal being.

Divine Intelligence. God's intelligence can be deduced from His infinite perfection and supreme actuality. Since God possesses all perfections to an absolute degree, science, the perfection of the intellect, is His first operative attribute—it specifies the divine nature, the principle of divine operation. Again, God is known to be immaterial from His excluding all potentiality. Now knowledge is proportionate to the degree of immateriality, and a being is intelligent to the degree that its being is pure. God, the Pure Spirit, therefore possesses supreme and absolute knowledge (Summa theologiae, 1a, 14.1). Furthermore, since the act of knowing is essentially immanent and since whatever is in God is the divine essence, divine intelligence is identified with the divine essence; it is, properly speaking, subsistent intellection.

To say that divine intelligence is subsistent intellection is to affirm that God understands Himself perfectly, that He is Thought Thinking Itself (cf. Aristotle, Meta. 1072b 13–30). Knowing that the degree of a being's intelligibility increases with its immateriality, one may conclude that any being that is fully immaterial is fully intelligible. In God the supreme degree of knowledge and the ultimate degree of intelligibility merge within His essence. It is quite true to say, then, that God knows Himself perfectly (De ver. 2.2). This is not to say that God knows nothing apart from Himself. To know a thing perfectly is to be fully aware of its power, and consequently, to grasp fully the effects to which this power extends. In knowing Himself, God knows everything else. He knows things in His essence, which He understands to be imitable to different degrees of PARTICIPATION. He knows all singular beings, since whatever shares in being finds its origins in the divine essence: Ipsum Esse Subsistens.

To clarify further the field of objects comprehended by divine knowledge, one may inquire whether God knows (1) possibles, that is to say, things that do not actually exist but can exist and (2) future contingents, namely things that can be made to exist or not, at will. As for the first type of objects, it is commonly taught that since God is the source of all existence, and knows everything that exists, whatever the kind of existence it may possess, He does know possibles. The teaching with regard to contingents is more complicated. Since God is by nature outside of time, His knowledge bespeaks a relation to ETERNITY. Now eternity embraces all of time in an immobile present. God, therefore, knows future contingents as actually present and realized (Summa theologiae, 1a, 14.13); yet the necessary knowledge He has of them does not in any way affect their contingent character.

Divine Will. From the fact that God has the power to know, one may conclude that He also has the power to will. Indeed, since the GOOD as known constitutes the proper object of the WILL, once any good becomes known it must also come to be desired. Thus, a being that knows the good must be endowed with a will. Now God, as perfectly intelligent, knows being under its formality of goodness. From the very fact that He knows, He also wills (St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa contra gentiles, 1.72). Just as God's intellect is identical with His essence, so too is His will, since He wills insofar as He is intelligent. The will of God is His very being.

Since the object of the will is the good as apprehended by the intellect and since the divine intellect apprehends the divine essence directly, this essence is in consequence the primary object of the divine will. Further, every being endowed with a will naturally tends to communicate to others the good it possesses. But if natural beings communicate to others their own proper good, with greater reason does the divine will communicate its perfection to others, to the extent that such perfection is communicable. To say this is to assert that God loves all being, for LOVE is nothing other than the first movement of the will in its tendency toward the good. Again, for God to love His creatures is for Him to love Himself. For creatures possess goodness only to a degree proportionate to their being, i.e., a degree that corresponds to their perfection (Summa theologiae, 1a, 20.2).

Thus is God's FREEDOM manifested. In fact, God is supremely free: on the one hand, God is free relative to all contingent beings, for divinity as the absolute good is sufficient unto itself; on the other, God is free regarding the means He uses to achieve the goals of His infinite wisdom. One could say that God is bound only by His science, by His wisdom, and by the natural necessity of things. God's science and wisdom, however, are not something foreign or superior to Him, for they are His very self. In like manner, the natural necessity of things cannot limit God's liberty, for this necessity flows from His perfection and from His free decision. God is therefore not only supremely free, He is freedom, for this also is His very being.

Transcendence and Immanence. From the foregoing it is evident that God, if He exists at all, must be Infinite Being, radically distinct from the universe He has created and maintains in existence. The conception of this distinction became a matter of much discussion in the late twentieth century. The specific problem connected with divine transcendence and immanence is not God's existence but His identity in relationship to the world, i.e., does His reality bear some continuity to things of the finite order or is it so disparate in kind as to remain unknown?

Biblical man, in the immediacy of religious experience, encountered God at work effecting salvation within a people's concrete history, but a history God entered only at His own initiatives. This assumed God's transcendence of first, history, and second of the natural world He had summoned into being. Beyond this the question was not urged until later confrontation with Hellenic thought necessitated posing the ontological question. Here, the Platonic categories adopted, in preference to Stoic ones that tended to divinize the logos element immanent in the cosmos, allowed a dualistic conception of God who was independent of the cosmos in Himself, yet operative in it by way of a divinely decreed "economy." Thomas Aquinas, modifying Aristotle's metaphysics into a notion of being as "act" (esse), viewed God as the Pure Act of Being, qualitatively different from all finite essences yet necessarily omnipresent within them as the exclusive cause of their beingness (Summa theologiae, 1a2ae, 3, 8), thus emphasized the simultaneity of God's transcendence and immanence. The Reformation, insisting upon the absolute autonomy of faith, introduced a new dichotomy: God, remaining transcendent in His wrath, becomes immanent only in the offer of forgiveness in Christ (Luther). In the nineteenth century, Schleiermacher's Pietism compromised this absolute otherness of God by allowing for a religious a priori within human consciousness, a "feeling" (Gefühl) of dependence upon the Infinite. This led to a collapse into pure immanentism, notably with the use of Hegelian thought by thinkers such as Feuerbach; God was now constrained to remain within the processes of human consciousness as Absolute Idea objectifying itself in the dialectical moments of thought.

A restoration of transcendence, inaugurated by Kierkegaard, was achieved within Protestant theology with Karl Barth's Church Dogmatics in the twentieth century, and furthered in the U.S. by H. Richard Niebuhr. Barth urged an understanding of God's Word as antithetical to any word of man. Thus God's radical otherness makes impossible any disclosure of Himself from within the structures of nature or culture. Encounter occurs only through God's initiatives in faith (not religion) in which language itself is "appropriated" to bear meaning discontinuous with that available outside of faith-experience. Rudolf Bultmann, accepting this faith, founded in the existential meaning of history, insisted upon rendering the "message" into the language of contemporary man, in such a way however that its content became existential self-understanding rather than understanding of God's own reality. Paul Tillich pushed this approach into the search for the God beyond theism.

An abrupt reversal to this radical removal of God from nature, history, and culture occurred in the 1960s with what was known in the U.S. as the "Death of God Movement" (Paul Van Buren, Thomas Altizer, William Hamilton). Theology, already collapsed into Christology, collapsed further into anthropology in which the New Testament was interpreted as summoning man to authentic living with Jesus independently of all theistic considerations. The emptying kenosis of God in the man Jesus was meant to denote a shift in the meaning of the name "God," sc., from designating an existing Transcendent Being to a mere symbol of human values realized in Christ as the "man for others."

An alternative to this was Christian secularity in which the death of God was recast in terms of understanding only a cultural eclipse of the idea of God, but one manifesting the intentions of God Himself for mankind come of age. God's transcendence was affirmed not in categories of power posing a threat to the autonomy of the world, but outside all perspectives of nature or cosmos and primarily in categories of love and freedom; God's immanence within the finite order was precisely His freeing of the world to be worldly, i.e., nondivine, and to pursue its own values in true evolution rather than merely executing the predetermined designs of Divinity. Yet the pursuit of these values would ultimately bring the world to God as its "Omega point" (Dietrich Bonhoeffer, Teilhard de Chardin, J. B. Metz, Edward Schillebeeckx).

A distinct nuancing of man's historicity gave birth to "theologies of hope" in which the utter transcendence of God is preserved precisely by deferring it to the future.

God is thus seen not as the Totally Other but as the Totally New. Immanence is explained as God's presence within the radically altering processes of history, operative in a proleptic way in fidelity to His promises (Jürgen Moltmann, Wolfhart Pannenberg).

Vastly different in kind are theological adaptations of Whitehead's philosophy of becoming in which the transcendence of God is acknowledged to be merely relative. God, while superior to the world, is necessarily dependent upon it, forming with it the larger whole which is process itself. Within the metaphysical system reintroduced here, the notion of God is no exception but a component part extrapolated from it. Obviously, this Christian use of process thought marks a new return to immanentism (Norman Pittenger, John Cobb, Jr.).

Recent Catholic thought continues to affirm the simultaneity of God's transcendence and immanence through the use of classical metaphysics, shifted however to the plane of subjectivity in which Being is viewed more as Meaning, of which man is coconstitutor (Karl Rahner, Bernard Lonergan). This transcendental THOMISM defines man as "spirit in the world," as God's self-communication into the Void, so that God is at once immanent to man's process of bestowing meaning and at the same time the Infinite and Transcendent Meaning always "intended."

Conclusion. At a philosophical level, one cannot penetrate into the intimacy of the divine nature. Although man can know that God exists, that He is perfect, intelligent, free, etc., he does not know what it means for God to exist or to be perfect, intelligent, and free. The "how" of all these attributes escapes him. In view of this, one can say that the more man penetrates into the infinite, the better he understands that it is beyond him. What little he knows of God is but a small fraction of all there is to know. And yet his intellect, in its philosophical search, neither destroys nor diminishes the mystery, but rather deepens it. Doubtless, this is the justification for his intellectual efforts, for reflection is always a deepening of thought, a springboard to higher truth.

See Also: PERFECTION, ONTOLOGICAL; OMNIPOTENCE; OMNIPRESENCE; OMNISCIENCE.

Bibliography: M. CHOSSAT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951) 4.1:1152–1243. R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, God: His Existence and His Nature, tr. B. ROSE, 2 v. (St. Louis 1934–36); Les Perfections divines (Paris 1937). R. JOLIVET, The God of Reason, tr. M. PONTIFEX (New York 1958). H. DE LUBAC, The Discovery of God, tr. A. DRU (New York 1960). J. DANIÉLOU, God and the Ways of Knowing, tr. W. ROBERTS (New York 1957). G. WEIGEL and A. G. MADDEN, Religion and the Knowledge of God (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1961). D. J. B. HAWKINS, The Essentials of Theism (New York 1949). É. H. GILSON, God and Philosophy (New Haven 1941); The Philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas, ed. G. A. ERLINGTON, tr. E. BULLOUGH (St. Louis 1939). J. MARITAIN, Approaches to God, tr. P. O'REILLY (New York 1954). C. TRESMONTANT, Essai sur la connaissance de Dieu (Paris 1959). C. JOURNET, Connaissance et in-connaissance de Dieu (Fribourg 1943). W. J. HILL, Knowing the Unknown God (New York 1971). E. L. MASCALL, The Openness of Being (London 1971). J. COBB, JR., A Christian Natural Theology (Philadelphia 1965).

[R. LE. TROCQUER/W. J. HILL/EDS.]

GOD-MAN

The term expresses the fundamental Christian belief in the one Lord, Jesus Christ, who is both God and man—man, born of Mary of David's lineage, and God, the only begotten Son of the Father. The special claim that Christianity makes for its founder can thus be distinguished from those of other religions. Jesus is more than a man specially favored by God, one in whom God dwells in a higher degree than in any other human being. This does not mean that He is a marvelous being higher than man, yet still less than the almighty God, one who is neither God nor man. Jesus is fully God as well as fully man. His being God does not imply any denial of His manhood. One sometimes speaks of God dwelling among men, sanctifying humanity by the HYPOSTATIC UNION, but this is not meant to signify that God only pretended to be man, as if He simply put on the outward appearance of man as one reads about in some of the legends of the pagan gods. No, He is like us in all things except sin. This mysterious nature of Jesus impressed itself from the beginning on those with whom He came in contact. Later theological reflection expressed it in terms of two natures, the divine and the human, united in the one Person of the Word. This formulation simply serves to preserve accuracy in speaking of Christ. The mystery of the God-Man remains.

See Also: JESUS CHRIST, ARTICLES ON.

[M. E. WILLIAMS]

GOD THE FATHER, ICONOGRAPHY OF

By God the Father is understood the creator of the world and sole reigning deity of the Old Testament as well as the first Person of the Holy TRINITY. He has been represented in successive periods of Christian art chiefly as the divine hand, a beardless young man, the Ancient of Days, and the celestial pope or emperor. In the late Middle Ages in representations attempting a literal translation of the consubstantiality of the Trinity the physical traits of God the Father are identical with those of Christ.

“God the Father,” ceiling painting c. 19th century. (©Paul Almsy/CORBIS)

In the earliest Christian iconography God is symbolized by a hand issuing from a cloud or nimbus. This was a workable compromise between the injunction of the Second Commandment and the need in art for an effective symbol of the divine power in its various manifestations. The hand appears expressively in a variety of scenes from the Old Testament. It orders Noah to build the ark; it prevents Abraham from sacrificing Isaac; it delivers the Commandments to Moses on Sinai; and it transports the Prophet Ezekiel from the valley of the dry bones (3d-century fresco, Dura-Europos, Syria). On the bronze doors of Hildesheim the hand of God presides in a scene depicting the offering of Cain and Abel. The appearance of the divine hand is not so common in New Testament scenes. Still, it blesses Christ at the moment of baptism in the Jordan, consoles Him during the Agony in the Garden, and assists Him in the Ascension. The hand of benediction occurs also in many scenes of dying saints.

The representation of God the Father as the most venerable of Patriarchs, the Ancient of Days, stems from a graphic passage in the Book of Daniel (7.9): “As I watched, thrones were set up and the Ancient One [Antiquus dierum] took his throne. His clothing was snow bright, and the hair on his head as white as wool.” A full beard completed the figure in the Middle Ages. The earliest examples occur in Byzantine art of the 11th century, and by the end of the 12th century the type had taken hold in western Christendom (fresco in the crypt of the chapel of Saint Blaise, Brindisi).

With the heightening of realism in the later Middle Ages God the Father was represented in the guise of a pope or emperor, wearing the papal tiara or imperial crown. The celestial ruler of all thus was endowed in art with the costly and impressive garb of His temporal delegates. This lavish iconographic type was abandoned in the Renaissance. Michelangelo combined the medieval type of the Ancient of Days, revived by antique portrayals of Jupiter, with the divine hand of early Christian art. In his remarkable synthesis of elements in the SISTINE CHAPEL creation scene the whole figure of God in a supreme gesture of divine creativity issues from heaven with right arm, hand, and forefinger outstretched in a dramatic moment of imparting life to the form of Adam. The Michelangelesque type of God the Father remained dominant in his own time and provided the model for later generations of artists.

See Also: TRINITY, HOLY, ICONOGRAPHY OF.

Bibliography: A. N. DIDRON, Christian Iconography, tr. E. J. MILLINGTON, completed by M. STOKES, 2 v. (London 1886). A. JAMESON and LADY EASTLAKE, The History of Our Lord as Exemplified in Works of Art (4th ed. London 1888). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 4:821–824. L. HEIMAER, Die Gottheit in der älteren christlichen Kunst (Munich 1922). K. KÜNSTLE, Ikongraphie der christlichen Kunst, 2 v. (Freiburg 1926–28) 1: 221–239. L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, 6 v. (Paris 1955–59) 2:3–29.

[L. P. SIGER]

GODARD OF HILDESHEIM, ST.

Benedictine abbot and bishop; b. Reichersdorf, lower Bavaria, 960; d. near Hildesheim, May 5, 1038. Godard (Godehard, Gothard, or Gotthard) was a monk at NIEDERALTAICH, where he became abbot in 996. Because of his advocacy of the exemplary spiritual life of the CLUNIAN reform, he was made reform abbot of TEGERNSEE (1001) and HERSFELD (1005) abbeys. In 1022, Emperor HENRY II induced him to succeed BERNWARD as bishop of HILDESHEIM. Godard defended Hildesheim's rights against ARIBO OF MAINZ in the GANDERSHEIM dispute initiated by St. WILLIGIS OF MAINZ. Although a gifted administrator, builder, and promoter of learning, Godard was primarily a stern spiritual ruler. INNOCENT II canonized him in 1131. The Saint Gotthard Pass bears his name.

Feast: May 4.

Bibliography: Vita, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores (Berlin 1926–) 11:167–218. A. HAUCK, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands (Berlin-Leipzig 1958) 3:451–455, 549–552. W. WATTENBACH-R. HOLTZMANN, Deutschlands Geschichtquellen im Mittelalter bis zur Mitte des 13. Jh (Stuttgart-Berlin 1904)

1.1:62–65; 1.2:287–288. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 2:231–232. O. J. BLECHER, Das Leben des heiligen Godehards (2d ed. Hildesheim 1957). J. FELLEBERG GEN. REINOLD, Die Verehrung des Heiligen Gotthard von Hildesheim in Kirche und Volk (Bonn 1970). W. HALLER, Bischofsamt im Mittelalter (Hildesheim 1970).

[R. H. SCHMANDT]

GODDEN, THOMAS (TYLDEN)

Catholic controversialist; b. 1624; d. 1688. He was educated at Oxford and then Cambridge, where he was converted to Catholicism by John SERGEANT, himself a convert. In 1642 both went to the English College in Lisbon, where they were ordained. There, after 1650 Godden became successively lecturer in philosophy, lecturer in theology, prefect of studies, vice president and president, and also won fame for his eloquent sermons in Portuguese. In 1661 he was appointed chaplain and tutor to Princess Catherine of Braganza, destined consort of Charles II, and accompanied her to London, where he engaged in controversy with Edward Stillingfleet, the king's chaplain. In 1678 Godden was falsely accused of complicity in the murder of Sir Edmund Berry Godfrey at the time of Titus Oates's alleged Popish Plot. Godden escaped to Paris, but returned, under James II, as chaplain to the Queen Dowager. In 1686, in the presence of the king, he publicly defended the Catholic doctrine of the Real Presence against Dr. William Jane, the Protestant dean of Gloucester.

Bibliography: J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time, 5 v. (London-New York 1885–1902; repr. New York 1961) 2:503–506, lists and summaries of Godden's writings. J. D. CARR, The Murder of Sir Edmund Godfrey (London 1936). J. LANE, Titus Oates (London 1949).

[G. ALBION]

GODEAU, ANTOINE

Bishop, man of letters, orator, one of the first members of the Académie Française; b. Dreux, Sept. 24, 1605; d. Vence, April 21, 1672. While still in his early 20s Godeau settled in Paris, where he eventually became one of the favorite habitués of Hôtel Rambouillet. He was known as “le nain de princesse Julie,” and his wit, good cheer, and literary criticism generally overcame his physical unattractiveness. Surprisingly, Godeau turned to the Church and was ordained in 1636. That same year Richelieu appointed him to the rather small but strategically located Diocese of Grasse. Godeau became also bishop of Vence in 1644, but he relinquished the See of Grasse in 1653 to quiet the dissatisfaction of the clergy of Venice. From 1636 to his death, Godeau was a pious and model bishop. By sermons, synods, visitations, and publications he sought the welfare of his entire flock. Godeau's pastoral outlook followed closely the theology of the Council of Trent. As a layman and as a prelate, Godeau demonstrated remarkable literary productivity. Among his better known works are Discours sur les oeuvres de Malherbe (1629), Oeuvres chrétiennes, vers et prose (1633), and Histoire de l'Église (2 v., 1653).

Bibliography: G. GREUTE Dictionnaire des lettres françaises (Paris 1954–60) A. ADAM, Histoire de la littérature française au XVII 5 v. (new ed. Paris 1958–62). P. BROUTIN, La Réforme pastorale en France au XVII 2 v. (Tournai 1956). K. HOFMANN, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche 4:1034. P. SAGE, Catholicisme 5:78. G. DOUBLET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 6.2:1470–71.

[R. J. MARION]

GODFREY, WILLIAM

Cardinal, seventh archbishop of Westminster; b. Liverpool, Sept. 25, 1889; d. London, Jan. 22, 1963. The younger son of George and Maria (Garvey) Godfrey, he was educated at Ushaw College and at the English College in Rome. After ordination (1916) he gained his doctorate in theology (1917) before returning to England. He taught successively classics, philosophy, and theology at Ushaw between 1918 and 1930 and then served as rector of the English College in Rome from 1930 to 1938. Appointed the first apostolic delegate to Great Britain, Gibraltar, Malta, and Bermuda (1938), he fulfilled this difficult assignment with notable tact. Godfrey was archbishop of Liverpool from 1953 until 1956, when he succeeded Cardinal GRIFFIN at Westminster. To this position he brought wide experience, and in it he distinguished himself by his gentleness, dignity, deep spirituality, broad sympathy, and inflexibility on matters of principle. His publications, The Young Apostle (1924) and God and Ourselves (1928), reflected his constant preoccupation with priestly education and the care of souls. He was raised to the cardinalate in 1958.

Bibliography: D. WORLOCK, Wiseman Review 237 (1963–64) 3–15.

[D. MILBURN]

GODFREY GIFFARD

Chancellor of England, bishop of Worcester; b. c. 1235; d. Jan. 26, 1302. The son of Hugh Giffard of Boynton in Wiltshire, a royal justice, he was the younger brother of WALTER GIFFARD. When Walter was appointed chancellor of England (1265), Godfrey was soon thereafter chancellor of the exchequer. Walter's translation to YORK (1266) and resignation from the chancellorship opened the way for Godfrey's appointment to that high office (1267–68). Godfrey was elected to the See of WORCESTER in 1268. King EDWARD I subsequently employed him on diplomatic missions and as an itinerant justice. As bishop of Worcester, Godfrey engaged in long-drawn controversies with the monastic chapter of the cathedral about control of properties. He disputed with the abbot of WESTMINSTER over the right of visitation at MALVERN. Joining with other suffragans, including THOMAS OF CANTELUPE, he resisted Abp. JOHN PECKHAM's excessive claims of metropolitan jurisdiction within the province of CANTERBURY. Litigation with his chapter troubled his last years: William of Gloucester charged him on some 36 counts before Abp. ROBERT OF WINCHELSEA. Among other things, it was claimed that Giffard had manumitted serfs without the consent of the chapter. But this and other charges he answered satisfactorily. Giffard contributed to the decoration and pavement of Worcester cathedral and completed and fortified Hartlebury Castle.

Bibliography: Register of Bishop Godfrey Giffard, ed. J. W. BUND, 2 v. (Oxford 1898–1902). Annals of Worcester in Annales Monastici, ed. H. R. LUARD, 5 v. (Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores 36; 1864–69) v.4. J. C. CAMPBELL, Lives of the Lord Chancellors . . ., 12 v. (7th ed. Jersey City 1881–85). T. F. TOUT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 7:1172–73. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500 2:761–762.

[A. R. HOGUE]

GODFREY OF AMIENS, ST.

Bishop, abbot; b. near Soissons, France, mid-11th century; d. Saint-Crépin Abbey, near Soissons, Nov. 8, 1115. At the age of five, Godfrey entered the Benedictine abbey of Mont-Saint-Quentin; he was later professed and ordained there. Despite the opposition of the previous superior, Godfrey was elected abbot of Nogent-sous-Coucy, a small house in Champagne that prospered under his rule. He was elected bishop of Amiens in 1104, partly because he was so adept in business affairs. Godfrey's successor at Nogent, GUIBERT, praised Godfrey's career as abbot but suggested that as bishop his promise was greater than his performance. Godfrey's severity made him unpopular. Attempting to resign his see, he retired to La Grande Chartreuse. Despite the opposition of his clergy and people, he was summoned back to Amiens by his archbishop but died within the year. During the GREGORIAN REFORM, he was particularly zealous in combating the prevalent evil of SIMONY

Feast: Nov. 8.

Bibliography: GODFREY OF AMIENS, Letters, Patrologia Latina (Paris 1878–90) 162:683,735–748. Acta Sanctorum, Nov. 3:889–944. C. BRUNEL, “Les Actes faux de l’abbaye de Saint-Valery,” Moyen-âge 22 (1909) 179–196. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l’ordre du calendrier avec l’historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 11:274–278.

[E. J. KEALEY]

GODFREY OF BOUILLON

First Crusader king of Jerusalem; b. probably c. 1060; d. July 18, 1100. Godfrey, the second son of Eustace II, Count of Boulogne, and Ida, daughter of Godfrey II, “the Bearded,” of Upper Lorraine, could trace his descent on each side from Charlemagne. In 1076 his maternal uncle Godfrey, the “Hunchback” of Lower Lorraine, named him his heir. Thus he acquired the castle of Bouillon, about 50 miles north of Verdun, and certain other smaller allodial holdings. In 1087 he was invested with the Duchy of Lower Lorraine by Emperor Henry IV. Although not, perhaps, as deeply religious as contemporary chroniclers indicated, Godfrey did possess a simple piety. This, combined with the spirit of adventure, which was then strong among his French neighbors, no doubt prompted him—alone among the major princes of the Empire—to join the First CRUSADE. The army that he led across Europe through Hungary numbered about 1,000 cavalry and 7,000 infantry. Notable among his associates were BALDWIN, his younger brother and successor as King of Jerusalem, and Baldwin of Bourq. Godfrey's role in the Crusade reveals him as somewhat lacking in administrative capacity and as capable of occasional pettiness and obstinacy. Nevertheless, he won general respect; and when RAYMOND OF TOULOUSE refused the crown of Jerusalem, he was the choice of the other leaders. He was doubtless entirely sincere in believing that the Holy City should be under ecclesiastical rather than lay jurisdiction, and thus in also assuming the modest title of Advocate of the Holy Sepulcher (July 22, 1099). Similar feelings, combined with his desperate need for reinforcements, no doubt prompted him to accept the investiture of Jerusalem from the patriarch and papal legate, Daimbert of Pisa. Godfrey was not a strong ruler, but with extremely limited resources he preserved and stabilized a state that, despite his promises to Daimbert, was to survive him as a lay kingdom (see JERUSALEM, KINGDOM OF). He died after governing the infant state a few days less than one year.

Bibliography: J. C. ANDRESSOHN, The Life and Ancestry of Godfrey of Bouillon (Bloomington 1947). S. RUNCIMAN, A History of the Crusades, 3 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1951–54) v.1. M. W. BALDWIN and K. M. SETTON, eds., A History of the Crusades (Philadelphia 1955) v.1.

[M. W. BALDWIN]

GODFREY OF FONTAINES

Scholastic philosopher and theologian, known as Doctor venerandus; b. Liège, before 1250; d. Paris, Oct. 29, 1306 (1309?). Studying arts at the University of Paris during the second regency of THOMAS AQUINAS, he may have been a student of SIGER OF BRABANT in Arts and HENRY OF GHENT in Theology. A master in theology by 1285, he taught at Paris until 1304 or thereafter, apparently with an interruption for some time after 1297. Together with Henry of Ghent he took an active part in opposing the privileges of MENDICANT ORDERS. On March 15, 1292, he was appointed by Pope Nicholas IV to examine the complaints of the university against its chancellor, Berthaud of Saint-Denis. In 1300 he was proposed for the See of Tournai, but renounced his rights before the appointment of Guy of Boulogne.

His most important contribution to scholasticism consists of 15 Quodlibeta, all of which have been published (Louvain 1904–37), and a number of disputed questions, only some of which have been edited. He rejected the real distribution between essence and existence, apparently as defended by GILES OF ROME, and Henry's theory of intentional distinction. Identifying essence and existence, he multiplied existences to correspond to substantial and accidental essences. For him, nature is merely the abstract term for the concrete supposit, and SUBSISTENCE is simply the existence of a substantial nature that has not been assumed by a higher supposit. In Christ, in whom human nature was assumed by a divine person, there is only one supposit and one subsistence, but two existences.

In his theory of knowledge, he was strongly Aristotelian and highly critical of Augustinian and Neo-Augustinian theories of knowledge (see KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF). Insisting on the impossibility of created powers to reduce themselves to act, he emphasized the passivity of sense and intellect in cognition and of will in volition. For him, an object as ultimately presented to the will by the intellect is the efficient cause of volition. Agreeing with Aquinas that no created substance is immediately operative, he maintained a real distinction between the soul and its powers (see FACULTIES OF THE SOUL). While open to the possibility of an eternal world, he rejected the possibility of an actual infinite multitude of souls that might result there from, proposing instead the possibility of TRANSMIGRATION OF SOULS.

For Godfrey, as for Aquinas, primary matter is pure potentiality, incapable of existence without substantial form. He opposed every form of universal HYLOMORPHISM defended by 13th-century AUGUSTINIANISM. Since primary matter is the root of corruptibility, he suggested that the incorruptible heavenly bodies had no primary matter. He was sharply critical of the various theories of plurality of forms (see FORMS, UNICITY AND PLURALITY OF). For him, despite possible theological difficulties concerning Christ's body in the tomb, plurality of forms tends to destroy the substantial unity of matter-form composites. Since substantial form serves as the principle of transcendental unity in created substances, it is also the formal principle of INDIVIDUATION. However, since quantity is the principle of numerical unity in material substances, it is also the material dispositive cause of individuation.

Among his followers may be listed John of Pouilly, PETER OF AUVERGNE, Gerard of Bologna, and Guy Terrena of Perpignan. Among his critics were BERNARD OF AUVERGNE and John DUNS SCOTUS. His influence declined after the middle of the 14th century, perhaps because there was no religious community to espouse his cause.

Sometimes styled a Thomist, sometimes an eclectic, he was an independent and critical thinker, often favorable to THOMISM. More Aristotelian and no less platonic than Aquinas, he sometimes departed radically from Aquinas because of a more extreme interpretation of Aristotle, frequently that of Averroës. Generally he was highly critical of the Neo-Augustinian tradition, especially of HENRY OF GHENT.

Bibliography: P. Glorieux, Répertoire des maîtres en théologie de Paris au XIII^e de siècle 1:396–399. B. NEUMANN, Der Mensch und die himmlische Seligkeit nach der Lehre Gottfrieds von Fontaines (Limburg 1958). É. H. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (New York 1955). R. J. ARWAY, "A Half Century of Research on Godfrey of Fontaines," New Scholasticism 36 (1962) 192–218. P. STELLA, Enciclopedia filosofica 2:854–855. O. LOTTIN, "Le Libre arbitre chez Godefroid de Fontaines," Revue néo-scholastique 40 (1937) 213–241; "Le Thomisme de Godefroid de Fontaines en matière de libre arbitre," ibid. 554–573. J. F. WIPPEL, "Godfrey of Fontaines and the Real Distinction between Essence and Existence," Traditio 20 (1964) 385–410; The Metaphysical Thought of Godfrey of Fontaines (Washington DC 1981). M. DE WULF, Un Théologien-philosophe du XIII^e siècle: Étude sur la vie, les oeuvres et l'influence de Godefroid de Fontaines (Brussels 1904).

[J. F. WIPPEL]

GODFREY OF SAINT-VICTOR

Philosopher, theologian, and poet, b. c. 1125; d. after 1190. Godfrey studied the arts at Paris, where he was influenced by the dialectician Adam of Balsham (Adam Parvi Pontis). After his theological studies, he probably taught a few years prior to entering the Abbey of Saint-Victor, before 1160. He is to be distinguished from Godfrey of Breteuil, who lived in the second half of the 12th century and was subprior of Sainte-Barbe-en-Auge in Normandy. The abbey in which Godfrey became a canon was a center of piety and of the intellectual life; the influence of HUGH OF SAINT-VICTOR was maintained by the prior, RICHARD OF SAINT-VICTOR, and Godfrey could develop his cultural humanism. However, in 1173, at the death of Richard, the priorship was given to WALTER OF SAINT-VICTOR, a narrow-minded and violent character. Walter hounded Godfrey for his humanistic tendencies, and finally obliged him to leave the abbey for the solitude of a rural priory c. 1180. It was there that Godfrey wrote his principal work, the Microcosmus. After Walter's death c. 1190, Godfrey returned to the abbey and took up the duties of sacristan until his death.

Works. Godfrey's literary legacy is varied. Still extant are 32 of his sermons, one series dating from his early stay in Paris, the other after his return from exile; these use doctrinal explanations to excite devotion to the person of Christ, the Virgin Mary, and the saints. Godfrey was also a poet, composing a panegyric to St. Augustine that paraphrases the principal subjects treated by that doctor and a canticle of the Virgin Mary, inspired by Biblical themes. Shortly before 1176 Godfrey dedicated to his friend Stephen of Tournai a compilation of works that are varied in form and content. The collection is called the Fons philosophiae after the first of the works, an allegorical account of the sources of Godfrey's formation symbolized as a flowing stream from which he drew water as a student. It presents an interesting tableau of Parisian schools in the mid-12th century and epitomizes the ideals of Victorine culture as formulated by Hugh. Also noteworthy is the third work, the Anatomy of the Body of Christ, a long poem wherein Godfrey describes in detail each member and organ of Christ's body. This merits a place in the history of Christian symbolism, especially since it gathered together a long series of allegories used by the Fathers and helped form medieval devotion to the humanity of Christ.

Godfrey's masterpiece, however, is the Microcosmus. The work's theme is traditional in philosophy and in the Fathers, viz, that man is a miniature of the universe, a microcosm. The first part is an allegorical exposition of the Hexaemeron (the account in Genesis describing creation within six days) to explain how God produces each human soul. The work of the first three days corresponds to the nature God gives man; that of the last three days, to the crowning of man's nature by supernatural grace. The second part explains the gifts of God's grace and their relation to man's affective life, showing how the Christian regulates his affections and conforms their movements to God's will.

Influence. Godfrey represents the flowering of the richest elements in the Victorine tradition concerning man. His work, however, neither enjoyed a wide reading nor exercised direct influence on later thinkers. It came too late, at the moment when the brightness of the great abbey of Paris had begun to dim, but Godfrey's basic points, the distinction between grace and nature and the positive value of nature in a unified Christian and religious life, were to be recognized and reaffirmed in the high SCHOLASTICISM of the 13th century.

Bibliography: GODEFROI DE SAINT-VICTOR, Fons philosophiae, ed. P. MICHAUD-QUANTIN (Namur 1956); The Fountain of Philosophy: A Translation of the Twelfth-Century Fons philosophiae of Godfrey of Saint Victor, trans. E. A. SYNAN (Toronto 1972); Godefroy de Saint-Victor: Microcosmus. Texte, ed. P. DELHAYE (Lille 1951). F. BONNARD, Histoire de l'abbaye royale et de l'ordre des chanoines réguliers de Saint-Victor de Paris, 2 v. (Paris 1907). J. CHATILLON, "Sermons et prédicateurs victorins de la seconde moitié du XIIe siècle," AHDLM 32 (1965) 7–60. P. DAMON, "The Preconium Augustini of Godfrey of Saint Victor," Mediaeval Studies 22 (1960) 92–107. P. DELHAYE, Le Microcosmus de Godefroy de Saint-Victor: étude théologique, (Lille 1951); "Les sermons de Godefroy de Saint-Victor: leur tradition manuscrite." RTAM 21 (1954) 194–210.

[P. MICHAUD-QUANTIN]

GODO, ST.

Abbot; d. Oyes, Belgium, May 26 c. 690. He was the nephew of St. WANDRILLE, founder of the monastery of FONTENELLE (now Saint-Wandrille). Godo (or Goan) was a member there until 661. He left to found a new monastery at Oyes, later known as Saint-Gond. His relics were transferred to the cathedral at Langres. He is patron of glove makers.

Feast: July 24.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum May 6:440–442. Gesta sanctorum patrum fontanellensis coenobii, ed. F. LOHIER and J. LAPORTE (Rouen 1936) 9–10. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 5:514–515. A. M. ZIMMERMANN Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 2:493–494. R. GAZEAU, Catholicisme. Hier, au jour d'hui et demain., ed. G. JACQUEMET, 5:94.

[O. L. KAPSNER]

GODOY, PEDRO DE

Dominican philosopher and theologian; b. Aldeanueva, Spain, c. 1600; d. Segontia, Nov. 2, 1677 (1687?). He studied at the College of St. Gregory at Valladolid and, in 1638, held the first chair of theology at the University of Salamanca. After 25 years there, King Philip IV rewarded him with the appointment to the bishopric of Osma (1663), a choice ratified by Pope Alexander VII on March 31, 1664. In 1672 Godoy left Osma to become bishop of Segontia, a position he held until July 12, 1677, when Pope Innocent XI named the Dominican Thomas Carbonel his successor. Included in his writings, some of which are lost, are three collections of Disputationes theologicae in 1am, 1am 2ae, et 3am partem D. Thomae, published separately between 1666 and 1672 (composite ed. Venice 1686, 1696, 1763). The last edition contains appendices by J. B. GONET, sometimes considered a plagiarist of Godoy's lecture notes, but credited with providing the stimulus that Godoy needed to publish his work at all.

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (New York 1959) 2.2:673–674. R. COULON, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 6.2:1472–1473. G. GIERATHS, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche 4:1036. L. GETINO, Enciclopedia Universal Ilustrada Europa-Americana 26:453. H. HURTER Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae 4:7. P. GAMS, Series episcoporum Ecclesiae Catholicae 57, 75. V. M. FONTANA, Sacrum theatrum dominicanum (Rome 1666).

[F. J. ROENSCH]

GOESBRIAND, LOUIS DE

Bishop, author; b. St. Urbain, France, Aug. 4, 1816; d. Burlington, Vt., Nov. 3, 1899. He was the son of Marquis Henri de Goesbriand and Emilie de Bergean. After his education at the seminaries of Quimper, France, and Saint-Sulpice, Paris, he was ordained on July 13, 1840. His interest in the American missionary field brought him to the U.S., where he engaged in parochial work in the Diocese of Cincinnati, Ohio, from 1840 to 1847. When Cleveland, Ohio, became a diocese in 1847, Goesbriand became its vicar-general and served until he was named first bishop of the newly established Diocese of Burlington, Vt., on July 29, 1853. He was consecrated on Oct. 30, 1853 in New York City, and arrived in Burlington on November 5. At that time there were only 20,000 Catholics and five priests in Vermont. With the exception of eight churches and a small parochial school taught by lay teachers, there were no institutions of any kind. Between 1853 and 1891 the number of priests increased to 52 and the number of churches to 78; eight academies and 16 parochial schools were established; and seven congregations of nuns were brought into the diocese to teach. In addition to his work as bishop, Goesbriand also wrote or translated a number of books and pamphlets, among which were: Catholic Memoirs of Vermont and New Hampshire (1886); Christ on the Altar (1890); History of Confession (1889); and St. Peter's Life (1893).

[J. D. SULLIVAN/G. E. DUPONT]

Johann Wolfgang Goethe. (Archive Photos, Inc.)

GOETHE, JOHANN WOLFGANG VON

Poet, dramatist, philosopher, scientist, and statesman; b. Frankfurt am Main, Aug. 28, 1749; d. Weimar, March 22, 1832. Goethe grew up in an atmosphere of enlightened, refined cosmopolitan culture. His father, a well-to-do Frankfurt lawyer who bore the honorary title of imperial councilor and who lived in self-imposed retirement, was a well-educated man of a serious and rational bent. From his mother Goethe inherited a "gaiety of spirit and delight in story-telling." He received his early education from his father, later from private tutors, concentrating on humanistic studies, chiefly French and Latin literature, but enjoying enough freedom to pursue his own intellectual and spiritual interests.

Early Work. At the age of 16 Goethe went to Leipzig to study law but he had little motivation to acquire systematically an abstract body of knowledge. He enjoyed Leipzig's society and its enlightened rococo style that was fashioned after Parisian patterns. His early lyrics were some elegant Anacreontic poems with little originality. A delirious love affair with an innkeeper's daughter, Kätchen Schönkopf, inspired a short pastoral play, Die Laune des Verliebten (1767), a collection of songs titled Annette, and later another play with moralistic overtones, Die Mitschuldigen (1769). His earliest lyrical diction was distinguished by a striking visual quality; Goethe was aware that “it was particularly the eye with which I conceived the world.” He gained a number of lasting impressions of Greek art from A. F. Oeser, who taught drawing and etching at the Leipzig art academy. In 1768 Goethe returned to Frankfurt gravely ill and exhausted. During a long period of recovery he was influenced by a pietistic circle headed by Susanne von Klettenberg, an intimate of his mother. He also became interested in mystical philosophers, including Paracelsus, SWEDENBORG, and Giordano BRUNO. (See PIETISM.)

New Perspectives. A new period of life began in 1770 with his departure for Strassburg to complete his juridical studies. Goethe shook off the influence of the artificial social conventionalism of rococo culture, encountered the beauty of nature, and found grandeur in simplicity of life and the direct appeal of art. He wrote an enthusiastic essay praising the Gothic architecture of the Strassburg minster as characteristic German style. Of lasting consequence was his friendship with J. G. von HERDER, a young theologian and budding literary critic. Herder’s aesthetic and historical writings were rooted in the Sturm und Drang reforms, were directed against the arid enlightened rationalism of his time, and pleaded for genuine expression of feeling and the truly human creative forces. Herder acquainted Goethe with the more realistic and effective concepts of art; these Herder recognized in the religious and poetic creativity of the human soul whose expression he found in history, in the symbolic language of folk songs, and in the works of great genius, such as Homer, Ossian, Sophocles, and Shakespeare. Under these influences and inspired by his affection for Frederike Brion, a pastor’s daughter from the village of Sesenheim, Goethe created a new lyric diction that united the expression of strong personal feelings with an intense experience of the immediate situation. Among these early poems, Willkommen und Abschied and Mailed are notable.

Goethe concluded his legal studies, was awarded the licentiate, and returned to Frankfurt to practice law, but devoted insufficient time to develop his practice. Instead, he worked on the dramatization of the autobiography of the 16th-century knight Götz von Berlichingen, whom he portrayed in a series of dramatic pictures. Götz von Berlichingen (1771) reflects the revolt of the young Goethe against stagnant institutionalism and courtly egotism, against inhuman betrayal, suppression, and anarchy. As such, and as the first drama with a national subject matter and a penetrating ethical spirit, it was enthusiastically received by the younger generation when it appeared anonymously in 1773. Other similar works, with such titles as Caesar, Mahomet, and Prometheus, remained fragments. Goethe was quite aware of the historical and social necessities that prevented him from idealizing self-centered individualism and demonic heroism. The motif of the wanderer, the man in search of an immediate and formative experience as the central principle of his creativity, recurs frequently in the large hymnic poems of these years. This seeker does not simply strive to assert his ego but to liberate the true impulses of his soul in response to all operative natural and cosmic forces, through which he tries to share the rapture of creative enjoyment. Here lie the beginnings of Faust, which were “stormed out” in these months: a compulsive yearning for growth within his boundless urge to be active and creative, an attempt to embrace the totality of existence through restless aspiration and to fuse knowledge and feeling, nature and spirit.

Fame with Werther. While spending a few months in Wetzlar at the imperial court, Goethe fell in love with Charlotte Buff, the fiancée of his friend Kestner; a similarly confusing infatuation with Maximiliane Brentano, together with the suicide of a Wetzlar colleague, gave the impetus to his first novel, Die Leiden des jungen Werthers (1774). This epistolary novel, written in the manner of Richardson and Rousseau, but more intensely personal and psychological, reflects the painful contrast between sentiment and the reality of life, between inner vitality and the moral principles of society. This book made him at 25 the most popular author in Europe. Such powerful emotional impulses, such vibrating interrelations between internal and external forces had never before been depicted in a language so succinct and emotionally saturated. Goethe was admired by his younger contemporaries, and especially by the writers of the Sturm und Drang movement. He won new friends, such as the theologian Johann LAVATER, the pedagogical writer Johann Basedow, the philosopher Friedrich JACOBI, and the brothers C. and F. Stolberg. He was greatly attracted by the philosophy of SPINOZA, with whom he believed that one could “visualize God in nature, nature in God.” Closer to LESSING’s ideas of dramaturgy were the two plays Goethe completed at Frankfurt, Clavigo (1774) and Stella (1775), both of which reflect the conflict between individual freedom and middle-class morality.

Two Tragedies. More significant, however, than these pieces were the beginnings of the two tragedies, Faust (1790) and Egmont (1787). The old moralistic legend of Faust’s sin and damnation, which Goethe knew through the chapbook of 1725 and a popular puppet play on this theme, was now converted into a symbolic drama of man’s inner struggle toward light and his restless search for a greater creativity. Faust’s urge to comprehend “what holds this world together in its in-most fold” leads him to tragic error and destruction; this striving for the highest stage of human perfection, however, transcends mere titanic self-assertion and appears in Goethe's metaphysical perspective as an essential development toward a superior form of capability, finally achieved through love and grace. (See FAUST LEGEND.) The tragedy Egmont shows a significant transition in the hero's development from youthful individualism to self-sacrificing altruism within the context of the historical and political reality that is characteristic of Goethe's classical style. Egmont realizes a truly creative mission by defending the rights of his Dutch people against the increasing suppression by the Spanish duke Alba. Egmont's attitude culminates in an inner struggle to convert his zest for life into the highest ethical activity of committing himself uncompromisingly to the principle of freedom and human integrity that alone justifies and impels his people's liberation.

Public Offices. Goethe developed such idealistic concepts and images of personal fulfillment during his first decades in Weimar. The young duke Carl August (1757–1828) had in 1775 invited the author whom he admired so greatly to his small provincial residence, where the duke and his mother had gathered a group of intellectuals. This chance companionship with the duke soon grew into a more serious relationship when Goethe accepted a series of administrative responsibilities. He became a member of the minister's council, was put in charge of the departments of mining, military affairs, and public improvements, and later was given charge of the financial affairs of the state. He received his patent of nobility in 1782. In conjunction with his offices he engaged in various scientific studies, which finally led to important morphological treatises. Of great significance for his personal development was his friendship with Charlotte von Stein, the wife of the court equerry; she helped him establish a more mature perspective and to appreciate inner beauty and social decorum. Being convinced that "we all have to complete our life's circle according to eternal, unchangeable, and all-encompassing laws," Goethe became increasingly receptive to universal problems and social demands that transcend personal initiative. His lyric poems began to reflect a new sense for classical simplicity and beauty as well as a genuine feeling for all fundamental forms of human destiny. The drama Iphigenie auf Tauris (1786) is conceived in the idealistic and ethical spirit of these years. Its climax is Iphigenie's decision to choose personal sacrifice to atone by her "pure humanity" for her family's guilt rather than expediently abandon her moral integrity. The tragedy of the passionate, oversensitive artist in Torquato Tasso (1789) also originates in these productive years, indicating Goethe's own inner danger in his attempt to practice restraint and achieve his proper place in the social and ethical order. The geniuslike exuberance and demonic drive of the young poet, whom Goethe later called an "exaggerated Werther," tragically disrupts the context of life at court but also reveals the stagnant limitation of an unproductive formalism imposed upon a creative mind.

Italian Experience. Overwhelmed by the suppression of his literary and scholarly pursuits under his mounting official duties and the demands of personal relationships, Goethe secretly departed for Italy. "I count a true rebirth from the day I entered Rome," he wrote in 1786. He acquired a new and immediate relationship with the objective world as he visualized an identity between the human mind and the intrinsic principles of nature. He not only gained a more tangible appreciation of antique beauty but also found an intensive perceptiveness of the fundamental forms of life. Realizing that "one should seek nothing behind the phenomena—they themselves are the theory," he conceived the idea of "Urphänomene" or symbolic principles that contain all developmental possibilities of any given species. Close to nature, to the simplicity and grandeur of classical art, and to the unpretentious life of the people, he developed firmer concepts of humanity and aesthetic perspectives.

A unique precipitate of the Italian experience were the Römische Elegien (1788), which combine classical plasticity and sensual fullness of life, spiritual rigor and realistic feelings. These distichs also reflect the new love for Christiane Vulpius, whom he took into his home shortly after his return to Weimar in 1788. She became the mother of his son August, and Goethe married her in 1806. The following years were marked by a period of social isolation. With the consent of the duke, he devoted more time to cultural than to administrative functions and also assumed the directorship of the Weimar theater. He felt keenly the spreading unrest caused by the French Revolution and experienced its aftereffects when he accompanied the duke into the campaign of the Coalition against the revolutionary forces that ended in the defeat of Valmy (1793). In the midst of the far-reaching social and historical changes that evolved from these events, Goethe remained skeptical, supported peaceful evolution rather than revolution, and concerned himself primarily with preserving all distinctly human values. The idyllic epos Hermann und Dorothea (1797) depicts the overcoming of external danger through simple human bonds and sound social conditions. Similar expressly humane ideas appear in novelistic form in Unterhaltungen deutscher Ausgewanderten (1797) and in some shorter plays. He later attempted to give lasting expression to his experience of the revolution in the drama Die Natürliche Tochter (1803).

New Creative Impulse. His friendship with the great dramatist Johann Friedrich von Schiller began a new creative phase in Goethe's life. Their famous correspondence attests to their mutually inspiring search for aesthetic principles in accord with the cultural and philosophical tenor of the time. They wrote a series of ballads, chiefly in 1797, and collaborated in the epigrammatic Xenien and some theoretical essays. Schiller gave Goethe a greater awareness of his intellectual mission; he urged him to complete Faust I (1808) and particularly the "novel of development" Wilhelm Meister (1796), which evolved from an earlier 1786 fragment. In the first part, Wilhelm Meisters Lehrjahre, Goethe recognized art and the theater as significant means of education, but more personal commitments and social functions lead the hero to mature humanistic ideals. The center of Goethe's concern is the formative influence of all the effective, aesthetic, intellectual, and ethical spheres of life, radiating the conviction that "deep in us lies the creative power which enables us to bring forth what ought to be." The second part, Wilhelm Meisters Wanderjahre (1829), shows the hero in a more advanced industrial world that had outgrown the old aristocratic order. Broad universal education is replaced by practical specialization designed to cope with the technical and social problems of a new era. In his final stage, Meister leads an active and altruistic existence within a thriving community that serves broadly human rather than individualistic needs.

In the tendencies of the new Romantic movement, arising in neighboring Jena, Goethe saw a return to the individualism of the Sturm und Drang period in spite of the homage that the young generation of poets and critics paid to his Wilhelm Meister. The attempt of the Romantics to identify life and art seemed to contradict the notion of form that he fervently upheld in his later years. His novel Die Wahlverwandtschaften (1809) can be taken as a protest against the Romantics' disregard for social institutions. Even the most passionate content, the theme of adultery and divorce, could be combined with a stern adherence to objective moral demands and inner beauty. In depicting an intense struggle between the elemental power of love and the binding moral order, Goethe symbolically recognized the tragic incompatibility of these opposing forces but found no other human solution than renunciation and either ethical, religious, or self-immolating transformation of the basically insoluble dilemma.

Biographical Work. After the death of Schiller in 1805 Goethe began to see his own life in a historical and symbolic way. This stimulated his Dichtung und Wahrheit (1809–14; 1830–31), a synthesis of autobiography and philosophical interpretation of his life in its essential interrelations with the determining currents of his time. This autobiography, which covers only the period of his youth, is supplemented by other biographical writings: Italienische Reise (1816–17), Campagne in Frankreich (1822), and his correspondence and conversations with Schiller, Zelter, Riemer, Von Müller, and Eckermann. The style of his old age was determined by problems of wide human application expressed in a symbolic and allegorical language whose aim was the fullest possible representation of reality. His lyric poetry now achieved a complete unity of thought and form. Characteristic of this phase is the lyric cycle Westöstlicher Divan (1819), inspired by his love for Marianne von Willemer, and the Marienbad Elegie (1823), where his unrequited feelings for the young Ulrike von Levetzow found sublime expression. Creative and spiritually transcending renunciation, and not withdrawn resignation, is the key to this late expression of love and wisdom.

Faust, Part 2. As Goethe was writing the final books of Wilhelm Meister, he began the "principal occupation" of his last years, the second part of Faust, completed a few months before his death. This enormous tragedy had absorbed all the essential impulses and insights of his life. It began as a subjective "fragment of a grand confession" revealing his youthful convictions about knowledge, love, nature, and God; its second phase, after 1788, includes more mature views on moral and religious problems. Individualistic expressionism changed to a symbolic drama of mankind, a mystery play in its own right. Schiller praised its "duality of human nature and the tragically miscarried attempt to unite divine and earthly realities in man." Goethe, however, regarded such a discrepancy as the basis for any creative development. Higher maturity means an infinitely active search for the realization of new forms of existence. The polarity between Faust and Mephistopheles, between active, spiritual longing on the one hand, and the arresting power of sensual drives on the other, forms a creative rhythm, a productive interplay and intensification of his potentials. Since, for Goethe, God does not stand outside the creative process of life but moves the world from within, constant activity and aspiration draw Faust closer to perfection. This positive and partly redemptive aspect of Faust's destiny, which Goethe added in his middle years, is countered by the destructive boundlessness of his actions, the passionate urge to experience and enjoy "whatever is allotted to all mankind." Such a spiritual titanism can only lead to self-destruction and despair. The tragedy of Gretchen is the most intense objectivation of this process.

Part 2 leads Faust into the world at large, to higher and purer spheres of activity. Goethe admits that allegorical and ideological elements prevail: "The treatment had to proceed from the specific to the generic, because specification and variety belong to man's youth." All persons and actions presented are to be understood as symbols of comprehensive experiences or universal ideas. Faust travels through an expansive and multiform world, at first as an artist exploring the life of the court, then as a wanderer through the mythological world of the classical Walpurgis Night in search for beauty and knowledge; he allies himself in ancient Greece with Helen of Troy, the symbol of womanly perfection. The climactic but tragically limited union of Faust and Helen indicates Goethe's own synthesis of classical and northern elements. Fulfillment is attained only momentarily beyond time and space, and the continuing development is represented by their allegorical offspring, Euphorion, whose boundless flight and self-destruction again reflect the fate of Faust himself as well as that of the advancing times.

In his final phase of life Faust is shown as warlord, colonizer, engineer, free and absolute master of his own territory, yet still unsatisfied and full of inner conflicts. He cannot achieve his goal without destroying part of the inner realization of the divine power of man's soul. Guilt, error, and care accompany him to his death and remind him of the earthly limitation of all human existence. Goethe saw in the full acceptance of the limits imposed by the formative part of man's nature and in the compromises that his existence requires the prerequisite conditions for his attaining perfection. Freedom to act, ceaseless striving, keen awareness of change and continuity throughout the universe are his means of approaching the creative process of life that is one with the divine principle. Faust finally "dies to live anew," his spiritual entelechy becoming part of the all-embracing powers of existence, and with the help of love and divine grace he transcends the sphere of mundane tragedy. His transformation and ascent to heaven can be affected insofar as his inner substance, the impetus of his aspiration, is not sacrificed to the expansion of his being in total action and blind enjoyment. Goethe thus concludes his life's work with the poetic representation of the mystery of human salvation, shrouded in the symbols of Christianity and reaffirming his belief in the continuation of life after death. But the poetic symbolism of heavenly harmony and perfection also contains an element of mystical silence and inexpressible awe before the inscrutable, which Goethe revered and acknowledged throughout his long and unusually productive life.

Religious Attitudes. In all phases of his development Goethe expressed deep religious convictions without binding himself to any of the traditional denominations; neither did he practice a mere theological eclecticism. Fundamental to his faith is his concept of God's omnipotence within the process of nature, and of man's inborn ability to recognize God both as force and mind, substance and form, uninterrupted motion and fixed order. For Goethe, God and world, spirit and matter were neither identical nor could they exist separate from one another; they formed, as it were, a "united polarity of being." Within the dynamic order of life, man's spiritual growth depends upon his active participation in God's continuous self-realization in the phenomenological world. Any particular form of religion or image of God, in Goethe's thought, would mean a narrow humanization of God's greatness: "Being engaged in natural sciences, we are pantheists, in poetry polytheists, morally monotheists." He believed in various forms of revelation that correspond to man's characteristic realms of activity. He admitted that the "worshipful awe" of the "highest principle of morality" as revealed in Christ was as natural to him as his reverence of the sun as the mightiest revelation of God's procreative power. He considered this attitude as "world piety." In contrast to most of the 18th-century European philosophers, Goethe developed a complex of religious feelings and insights; he saw no need, however, to confess more than his resignation to God's incomprehensible will and he remained convinced that man is made to see what is illuminated but not the light itself, to behold God in his works, not God himself. In Christian thought, this is true for this world, but it denies, or at least prescind from, the ultimates of revelation, which promises a face-to-face vision of God. In this sense, Goethe was no nearer to Christianity than some of the great pagan thinkers had been.

Bibliography: Editions. Werke: Vollständige Ausgabe letzter Hand, 40 v. (Stuttgart 1827–30), continued as Nachgelassene Werke, 20 v. (Stuttgart 1832–42); Weimarer Ausgabe, 133 v. (Weimar 1887–1919); Jubiläums-Ausgabe, ed. E. VON DER HELLEN, 40 v. (Stuttgart 1902–07; index v. 1912); Propyläen-Ausgabe, ed. C. HÖFER and C. NOCH, 49 v. (Munich 1909–32), in chronological order; Gedenkausgabe, ed. E. BEUTLER, 24 v. (Zurich 1948–54; suppl. 1960); Hamburger Ausgabe, ed. E. TRUNZ, 14 v. (Hamburg 1948–60); Akademie-Ausgabe, ed. E. GRUNACH et al. (Berlin 1952–). Literature. G. H. LEWES, The Life and Works of Goethe, 2 v. (London 1855). H. GRIMM, Goethe (Berlin 1887). R. M. MEYER, Goethe (Berlin 1895). A. BIELSCHOWSKY, Goethe, 2 v. (3d ed. Munich 1902–04). G. WITKOWSKI, Goethe (Leipzig 1899). G. SIMMEL, Goethe (Leipzig 1913). F. GUNDOLF, Goethe (Berlin 1916). P. H. BROWN, Life of Goethe, 2 v. (New York 1920). G. MÜLLER, Kleine Goethebiographie (2d ed. Bonn 1947). B. FAIRLEY, Goethe as Revealed in His Poetry (London 1932); A Study of Goethe (Oxford 1947). K. VIĚTOR, Goethe, the Poet, tr. M. HADAS (Cambridge, Mass. 1949); Goethe, the Thinker, tr. B. Q. MORGAN (Cambridge, Mass. 1950). E. STAIGER, Goethe, 3 v. (Zurich 1952–59). H. A. KORFF, Geist der Goethezeit, 5 v. (Leipzig 1956–62), various eds. R. FRIEDENTHAL, Goethe: His Life and Times (London 1965). LOEWEN, H., Goethe's Response to Protestantism (Berne and Frankfurt, 1972). H. PLENDERLEITH, "An Approach to Goethe's Treatment of Religion in Dichtung und Wahrheit" German Life and Letters, v. 46, no. 4 (1993), 297. J. J. PELIKAN, Faust the Theologian (New Haven, Conn. 1995).

[K. SCHAUM]

GOGARTEN, FRIEDRICH

Theologian and defender of secularization; b. Jan. 13, 1887; d. Oct. 16, 1967. Gogarten was educated at the universities of Berlin, Jena, and Heidelberg in the typically liberal Protestant theology characteristic of German university faculties at the turn of the century. During his time as pastor in a small country parish in Thuringia, he steeped himself in the thought of Martin Luther and began to question the optimistic assumptions of liberal thought. In an intellectual shift similar to that of Karl Barth, Gogarten rejected the historicism of theologians such as Ernst Troeltsch which seemed to be based upon an individualistic understanding of man and an identification of the Word of God with human conscience. Instead, especially during his career at the University of Göttingen (1935–55), Gogarten insisted that Christianity is not found in a realm of ideals or universal truths but in a summons to historical self-understanding in which the believer accepts responsibility for his existence under the Word of God addressed to him in Christ. Thus human beings encounter God not in abstract categories but in a personal Thou-I relationship within the relativity of history and the gratuity of the divine initiative.

Gogarten departed somewhat from his earlier neoorthodoxy by supporting the demythologizing of Rudolf Bultmann. He affirmed the existentialist position that faith is not the affirmation of objective historical truths but the personal acknowledgment of the efficacy of God's present action within the believing community.

Gogarten later came to insist on the value of secularization. The Christian must avoid any divinization of the historical process and is thereby rendered free to assume a radical concern for the world in its meaning-filled yet less-than-ultimate significance.

Bibliography: F. GOGARTEN, Demythologizing and History (New York 1955); Christ the Crisis (Richmond 1970); The Reality of Faith (Philadelphia 1959). L. SHINER, The Secularization of History (Nashville 1966).

[T. M. MCFADDEN]

GÓIS, DAMIÃO DE

Portuguese humanist, musician, composer; b. Alenquer, 1502; d. Alenquer, 1574. While still a page at the court of King Manuel I, Góis found his interest in Eastern Christianity stimulated by Matthew, the Ambassador from Ethiopia (1514). This interest was further stirred in 1523, when, after his appointment to the Portuguese commercial headquarters at Antwerp, he became more directly familiar with the Eastern and Portuguese deeds therein. In 1529 he journeyed briefly through Eastern Europe and obtained information about the Lapps from John Magnus Gothus, Archbishop of Uppsala, then in exile in Danzig. This information inspired him to call attention to the missionary opportunities among the Lapps at a time when the Reformation was imminent. He also made information about the Ethiopians available in a Latin treatise, published without his knowledge in 1532 in Antwerp (printed in London the following year in an English translation by St. Thomas More's son, John).

After visiting Denmark and Poland, Góis registered (1531) at the University of Louvain. In 1533 he visited Erasmus in Freiburg im Breisgau, returning to Lisbon in expectation of his appointment as treasurer of India House. He became dissatisfied, however, and returned to Flanders the following year, spent several months with Erasmus in Freiburg, and proceeded to Padua, where he stayed until 1538. He returned to Flanders, married, and studied again at Louvain, where his definitive work, Fides, Religio, Moresque Aethiopum, was published in 1540 (English translation in Joannes Boemus, comp., The Manners, Lawes, and Customes of All Nations, tr. Edward Aston, London 1611). In it he incorporated material gathered in Lisbon from Ethiopia's second ambassador, Zagazabo, who had arrived in 1527 with Francisco ALVARES.

Although the great book was reprinted several times in Northern Europe, its charity toward non-Latin Christianity displeased the Inquisition in Portugal, and it was condemned (1541). Moreover, Góis, who had been recalled to Lisbon from Belgium in 1543, returned only in 1545, an object of suspicion because of allegations concerning his Protestant associations abroad. In the meantime, however, a number of his brief works on Portugal and Portuguese deeds in the East were being published in Louvain: Commentarii Rerum Gestarum in India citra Gangem a Lusitanis Anno 1538 (1539); Hispania (1542); and De Bello Cambaico Ultimo Commentarii Tres (1549).

Góis's greatest work, Chrónica do Felicíssimo Rei Dom Emanuel, a long history of the reign of King Manuel (4 v. 1566–67), was followed in 1567 by his one-volume chronicle of Prince João (later King João II), Chronica do Principe Dom Ioam. Disparaging references in these works to the royal family and various nobles brought about his arrest by the Inquisition in 1571; the charges went back to his friendships with Protestants. He repented after a year and a half in prison, was released as a penitent, and died shortly afterward.

Bibliography: G. J. C. HENRIQUES, ed., Ineditos Goesianos, 2 v. (Lisbon 1896–98). M. BATAILLON, O cosmopolitismo de Damião de Góis, tr. C. B. CHAVES (Lisbon 1938); this originally appeared as "Le Cosmopolitisme de Damião de Góis," in Revue de littérature comparée 18 (1938) 23–58, and was reprinted in his Études sur le Portugal au temps de l'humanisme (Coimbra 1952). F. M. ROGERS, The Quest For Eastern Christians: Travels and Rumor in the Age of Discovery (Minneapolis 1962).

[F. M. ROGERS]

GOLDEN AGE

A theme common to all the myths concerned with the early history of mankind is the assumption of a continuous deterioration. Its ultimate source is the pessimistic feeling of regret for a lost paradise and of sorrow for a fall from a high estate. The first age of the world is thought of as a period of innocence and happiness. This “Golden Age” is one of the oldest ideas of mankind. In Greece it is certainly earlier than the Odyssey, for the narrative of Eumaeus (15.403–) seems to be an ironic imitation of a tale on the Golden Age. The oldest tradition probably, as in the Sanskrit texts, distinguished four ages or stages in the steady deterioration of mankind, the Ages of Gold, Silver, Bronze, and Iron.

In Hesiod and Later Greek Poets. In Hesiod (Op. 109), the earliest Greek source, the races of gold and silver are mythical human beings, closer to the gods than to men, whom the earth supported in miraculous fashion. Hesiod’s description of this Eden-like existence assumes an original human state of happiness and piety. The use of meat is not forbidden, but a “Pythagorean” tradition of vegetarianism is found in Empedocles (Frag. 128D) and in Theophrastus (ap. Porph. Abst. 2.20). On the other hand, the comic poets Pherecrates in his Wild Men, and Moschio, in Frag. 6 (ed. Nauck TGF²), echo legends of a primitive life in which there is a ceaseless struggle for animal flesh as a food, with human flesh even being substituted for it in case of necessity. This is the ἀλλήλοφ-αγία (an eating of one another) mentioned in Plato’s Epinomis (975A; cf. Orphica, Frag. 292, ed. O. Kern). The transition from savagery to civilization was made only very slowly, and the process was even interrupted by catastrophes.

In Plato. Plato’s Laws (bk. 3) opens with a tableau of mankind immediately after the Flood, again forced to start from the very beginning. With this description it is necessary to compare the myth of the Protagoras (321C), and that of the Statesman (Politicus 274A–D), which depicts the world without God. Earlier, the Statesman had given an idyllic description of a life of men with God as their shepherd (271D–272B)—the Golden Age that is sketched more briefly in bk. four of the Laws and in the Critias. In his narrative of the rule of Cronus in the Statesman and in Laws (bk. 4), as well as in his account of the beginnings of Zeus’s reign in the Statesman and of the survivors of the Flood in the Laws (bk. 3), Plato does not hesitate to give his own form to traditions that were differently presented by earlier writers.

Among the Romans. In the Latin world, bk. three of the SIBYLLINE ORACLES, which dates from c. 140 B.C., spread the idea of a peace among animals (verses 788–794), an idea from Isaiah (11.6–). This feature of the Golden Age reappears in the descriptions of Vergil (Ecl. 4) and Horace (Epod. 16; cf. Od. 3.18.13). Saturn succeeds Cronus, the reign of Cronus becomes the Saturnia regna (Georg. 4.6); the Cumaeum carmen of verse 4 alludes to the Cumaean Sibyl, and the gens aurea of verse nine refers to the first race of men in Hesiod. However, there is no warrant for attributing to Vergil the role of pagan prophet of the Messiah; the tradition that leads him to the Manger in company with the prophets of Israel is to be regarded not so much as a “presentiment” as rather a certain “delicacy and fineness of feeling on the part of souls who were soon to receive the gift of God” [M. J. Lagrange, RB 35 (1922) 572].

Bibliography: W. K. GUTHRIE, In the Beginning: Some Greek Views on the Origins of Life and the Early State of Man (London 1957). H. GRAY, et al., J. HASTINGS, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908–27) 1:183–210. J. HAEKEL, Religionswissenschaftliches Wörterbuch, ed. F. KÖNIG (Freiburg 1956) 641–644. M. ELIADE, Myths, Dreams, and Mysteries, tr. P. MAIRET (New York 1960). H. JEANMAIRE, Le Messianisme de Virgile (Paris 1930). J. CARCOPINO, Virgile et le mystère de la IV^e églogue (Paris 1930). W. H. ROSCHER, ed., Ausführliches Lexikon der griechischen und römischen Mythologie, 6 v. (Leipzig 1884–1937) 6:375–430. S. THOMPSON, Motif-Index of Folk-Literature, 6 v. (rev. and enl. ed. Bloomington, Ind. 1955–58) 1:A1101–03.

[E. DES PLACES]

GOLDEN ROSE

The golden rose is the symbol of papal recognition of some outstanding service to the Church. Its symbolism is linked with the mid-Lent (or Laetare Jerusalem) Sunday, on which the pope traditionally blessed a golden rose in the church of Sta Croce in Gerusalemme and bore it in procession to the LATERAN PALACE. In modern times the ceremony takes place within the Vatican, the blessing in the Hall of Vestments and the solemn Mass in the papal chapel. At first (from the late 11th century) the rose was a single flower of red-tinted gold, but it was later embellished with gems, and at least from the mid-15th century it comprised a branch of gold with leaves and roses and a principal rose at the top. The meaning of the rose was explained by Pope ALEXANDER III to King LOUIS VII in Ex antiqua (L. Jaffé, Regista pontificum romanorum condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. Löwenfeld, 882–1198; 10826) in 1163: the flower is the symbol of Christ the King, the gold of His kingship, the red of His passion, its fragrance prefiguring His Resurrection and glory. The practice grew of dispatching this rose to a Catholic king or ruler, basilica or sanctuary, republic or city, indeed to any place or person, and most commonly in modern times to Catholic queens, in recognition of some outstanding service to the Church. The origin of the tradition is uncertain; the earliest sure reference dates from 1049, when Pope LEO IX described it as an ancient custom; and the first recorded example dates from 1096, when URBAN II dispatched a rose to Fulk of Anjou. The more recent recipients have included the American M. G. CALDWELL, who gave $300,000 to the Catholic University of America in 1887, the Queen of the Belgians in 1925, the Queen of Italy in 1937, and the shrine of Our Lady of FATIMA in 1964.

Golden Rose presented to the Republic of Siena by Pope Pius II, made by goldsmith Simone da Firenze in 1459. (©Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

Bibliography: A. SHIELD, "The Golden Rose," Month 95 (1900) 294–304. E. MÜNTZ, "Les Roses d'or pontificales," Revue de l'art chrétien 44 (1901) 1–11. J. KREPS, "La Rose d'or," Ques- tions liturgiques et paroissiales (Louvain 1921–) 11 (1926) 71–104; 149–178. F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 570. J. A. JUNGSMANN, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1041. E. BARNIKOL, *Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart*³, 7 v. (Tübingen 1957–65) 5:1183.

[C. DUGGAN]

GOLDSTEIN, DAVID

Apologist, author; b. London, England, July 27, 1870; d. Boston, Mass., June 30, 1958. He was the son of poor Dutch Jewish parents who were married in London. They brought him to New York City in 1871, where he lived for 17 years attending public school, the Hebrew Free School, and the Spanish Jewish Synagogue, where he studied Hebrew. At the age of 11, Goldstein began work as a cigar maker, following his father's trade. He was allowed to attend the meetings of the Cigar Makers' International Union, with which he became affiliated, and continued his membership for life.

In 1888, the family moved to Boston, where David joined the Socialist Labor Party. He became the party's first candidate for mayor of Boston and one of the seven members of its national board of appeals. Here he met Mrs. Martha Moore Avery, prominent in the Socialist movement, who ultimately influenced him toward Catholic principles. Impressed with Catholic teaching on marriage and divorce, he undertook considerable reading and instruction, which culminated in his baptism in the Immaculate Conception Church, Boston, in 1905.

Goldstein had resigned from the Socialist Party in 1903 (the year Mrs. Avery joined the Church) after eight years of campaigning upon the soapbox and Lecture-debating platform. In 1906 he began, with Mrs. Avery, the first modern lay apostolate to the man in the street, first known as the Catholic Truth Guild (since 1935 Catholic Campaigners for Christ). As the first Catholic layman to devote full time to defending the Church against attack, he spent more than 25 years lecturing across the country.

Among the honors he received were a degree of doctor of literature (1939) from Niagara University, Niagara, N.Y.; the Catholic Action Medal (1946) from St. Bonaventure's College, St. Bonaventure, N.Y.; the Distinguished Service Medal of the Franciscan Order (1947); and Knight of the Order of St. Gregory (1955). He was a columnist for the Boston Pilot (1945–58), and his other published works include Socialism: The Nation of Fatherless Children, an exposé of false doctrines of Socialism (with Mrs. Avery); Bolshevism: Its Cure (1919); Campaigner for Christ Handbook (1934); and Letters of a Hebrew-Catholic to Mr. Isaacs (1943).

Bibliography: D. GOLDSTEIN, Autobiography of a Campaigner for Christ (Boston 1936).

[J. LLOYD]

GOLDWELL, JAMES

English canonist, civil servant; b. Great Chart, Kent; d. Feb. 15, 1499. Son of the lord of the manor, he became a fellow of All Souls College, Oxford, in 1441, and doctor of Canon and civil law by 1461. Goldwell was commissary general of John KEMP when Kemp was archbishop of Canterbury (1452–54) and subsequently enjoyed the patronage of his nephew Thomas KEMP, Bishop of London. In 1460 Goldwell appears to have been appointed secretary to King HENRY VI by the King's "Yorkist" captors. He afterward served King Edward IV as registrar of the Order of the Garter, master of requests, clerk of the council, and diplomat to several European monarchs. He was the King's orator at the Roman Curia in 1468–69 and 1471–72, and was consecrated there as bishop of Norwich, England, in 1472. Thereafter he was occasionally a councilor of Edward IV and King HENRY VII. Goldwell was a munificent benefactor to Norwich Cathedral, Leeds Priory, Great Chart Church, and All Souls College library (MSS listed in Emden 2:785).

Bibliography: The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900 8:96–97. A. B. EMDEN A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A. D. 1500 2:783–786. J. R. LANDER, "Council Administration and Councillors, 1461 to 1485," Bulletin of the Institute of Historical Research 32 (1959) 138–180.

[R. L. STOREY]

GOMARUS, FRANCISCUS

Calvinist theologian; b. Bruges, Jan. 30, 1563; d. Groningen, Jan. 11, 1641. He studied at Strasbourg under Johann STURM, at Neustadt under Franciscus Junius, Zacharius URSINUS, and Hieronymus Zanchius, and at Oxford and Cambridge. He became pastor of the Dutch congregation at Frankfurt am Main (1586–94), then professor of theology at Leiden (1594–1611), and was pastor and teacher in Middelburg (1611–14), when at the invitation of Du Plessis Mornay he became professor of theology at Saumur. Here, as a right-wing Calvinist, he felt uncomfortable, and returned to the Netherlands, where he taught theology at Groningen. He was now the leading opponent of the followers of ARMINIUS, whose appointment to succeed Junius at Amsterdam he had hesitatingly approved in 1602. He was prominent at the Synod of Dort (1618–19), which condemned the Arminians but did not affirm his own supralapsarian position. His numerous writings are learned but chiefly polemical. In 1594 he edited, with a commendation to Henry IV, the Defensor Pacis of Marsilius of Padua. Some of his weightier treatises, including the De divinae praedestinationis hominum objecto (1650), were posthumously published.

Bibliography: Opera theologica omnia, 3 v. (Amsterdam 1644; 2d ed. 1664). G. P. VAN IJTERZON, Franciscus Gomarus (The Hague 1929). W. F. DANKBAAR, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 2:1691–92.

[J. T. MCNEILL]

GOMBERT, NICOLAS

Renaissance polyphonist of the Franco-Flemish school; b. Bruges or south Flanders?, c. 1500; d. Tournai?, 1556. This distinguished disciple of Josquin DESPREZ became first a singer (1526), then master of the children (1530) in the chapel of Charles V, and traveled in Spain, Italy, Austria, and Germany. He obtained ecclesiastical benefices in Lens, Courtrai, Béthune, and Metz and a canonry in Tournai (1534). His works comprise ten parody Masses for four to six voices (including one for the coronation of Charles V), 169 motets for four to eight voices (mostly Marian, but occasionally political), about 60 chansons for three to six voices, one Italian piece, and one Spanish piece. Hermann Finck (1527–58) praises Gombert for his technique of imitation (fugas) as well as for his avoidance of pausas (variously interpreted to mean rests, paired imitation, or full cadences that would interrupt the polyphonic continuity). Indeed, his voices are almost constantly active in points of pervading imitation. By amalgamating traditional Franco-Flemish characteristics with his personal style, Gombert greatly developed the art of polyphony and may be considered one of its leading exponents in the generation preceding PALESTRINA.

Bibliography: Opera omnia, ed. J. SCHMIDT-GÖRG, Corpus mensurabilis musicae, v. 6 (Rome 1951–). J. SCHMIDT-GÖRG, Nicolas Gombert (Bonn 1938). R. MANIATES, "The Sacred Music of Nicolas Gombert," The Canadian Music Journal 6.2 (1962) 25–38. H. EPPSTEIN, Nicolas Gombert als Motettenkomponist (Würzburg 1935). D. VON BARTHA, "Probleme der Chansongeschichte im 16. Jahrhundert: Nicolas Gombert—Benedictus Appenzeller," Zeitschrift für Musikwissenschaft 13 (1930–31) 507–530. A. EINSTEIN, The Italian Madrigal, tr. A. H. KRAPPE et al., 3 v. (Princeton 1949). J. RAVELL and S. BROMAN, Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. E. BLOM (London 1954) 3:705–706. Histoire de la musique, ed. ROLAND-MANUEL, v. 1 (Paris 1960–63). G. REESE, Music in the Renaissance, (rev. ed. New York 1959). E. JAS, "Nicolas Gombert's Missa Fors Seulement: A Conflicting Attribution," Revue Belge de Muisologie 46 (1992) 163–177. G. NUGENT, "Nicolas Gombert" in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, v. 7, ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980) 512–516. D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge 1996) 321. N. SLONIMSKY, ed. Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (New York 1992) 647.

[I. CAZEAUX]

GOMENSORO, TOMÁS XAVIER DE

Argentine priest and supporter of Uruguayan independence; b. Buenos Aires, Dec. 20, 1770; d. there, April 2, 1841. He studied at the Real Colegio de San Carlos, was ordained to the priesthood in 1799, and in 1803 was appointed vicar of Santo Domingo de Soriano, in the Banda Oriental. Having taken part in the Soriano uprising known as Grito de Asencio on Feb. 28, 1811, Gomensoro was persecuted and finally replaced in his own church. He moved to Buenos Aires and engaged in agriculture and cattle raising near Rosario. He was appointed priest of Canelones in 1814, and remained there for nine years. Recognized as a "worthy man by reason of his distinguished accomplishments and great learning," in 1824, he was appointed acting rector of the Colegio de Estudios Eclesiásticos. He was also professor at the university founded by Rivadavia. With his brother Loreto, delegate of the revolutionary government, Gomensoro worked in Buenos Aires with great zeal for the revolutionary cause that led to the independence of the Republic of Uruguay in 1825. He served in the Argentine Congress in 1825, voted for Rivadavia for president of the United Provinces, and in 1826 was appointed pastor of the San Ignacio church in Buenos Aires. He was acting pastor of the cathedral of the same city and was appointed honorary canon in 1840.

Bibliography: J. GOMENSORO, "El canónigo Tomás Xavier de Gomensoro," Revista Nacional 30 (Montevideo 1945) 257–281.

[A. D. GONZÁLEZ]

GOMES, ANTONIO CARLOS

South American opera composer; b. Campinas, Brazil, July 11, 1836; d. Belem, Sept. 16, 1895. Gomes, son of a band director, had composed a Mass by the time he was 18. At 23 he entered the Rio de Janeiro Conservatory and, after winning the favor of Emperor Pedro II with a Calvary cantata and two youthful operas, continued at the Milan Conservatory (1864–66). Of his six mature operas—Il Guarany (1870), Fosca (1873), Salvator Rosa (1874), Maria Tudor (1879), Lo schiavo (1889), and Condor (1891)—four had their premieres at La Scala, Milan, gaining for him the greatest international renown ever won by an American opera composer. Although Il Guarany, his greatest success, was South American in its subject, his operatic idiom was purely Italianate. He also composed songs, piano works, and, for the fourth centenary of America's discovery, an oratorio, Colombo (1892). In 1895, after many years in Italy, he made his last trip to Brazil to head the Pará Conservatory, but died within six months of arriving.

Bibliography: Revista Brasileira de Música, special centenary number, 1936. M. DE ANDRADE, Carlos Gomes (Rio de Janeiro 1939). K. PAHLEN, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 5:512–513. G. BEHAGUE, "Carlos (Antônio) Gomes" in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, v. 7, ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980), 517–518. W. J. COLLINS, "Antônio Carlos Gomes" in International Dictionary of Opera, 2 v., ed. C. LARUE (Detroit 1993) 535–536. M. GÓES, Carlos Gomes: A Força Indômita (Belém 1996). D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge 1996) 321–322. N. SLONIMSKY, ed. Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (New York 1992) 647–648.

[R. STEVENSON]

GOMEZ, JOSÉ VALENTÍN

Argentine ecclesiastic and political figure; b. Buenos Aires, Nov. 3, 1774; d. there, Sept. 20, 1839. He began his studies at the Colegio de San Carlos and took his doctorate in theology at the University of Córdoba in 1795. He received his bachelor's degree in Canon and civil law in Chuquisaca. At the age of 23 he was an ecclesiastical attorney general, and in 1799, through competition, he obtained the professorship of philosophy at the Colegio Carolino, which he held for three years. He was a canon of the cathedral of Córdoba. From 1805 he was in the parish of Morón, until he took over that of Canelones in the Banda Oriental in 1808. Gómez served as military chaplain in the armies of the revolution and fought as a soldier in the battle of Las Piedras in 1811. Then he became a canon of the cathedral of Buenos Aires. In 1813 he was one of the deputies of the National Assembly, where he became known as a great political orator. He was chosen governor of the bishopric. The Directorate was created at his suggestion and became a part of the Council of State in 1814. Gómez was very active until the fall of Alvear, when Álvarez Thomas had his property seized and exiled him to Europe in 1815. He returned to become a councilor of state in the government of Pueyrredón, and in 1818 he was sent to Brazil and to the courts of London and Paris to gain recognition of independence. Gómez represented Buenos Aires in the general constitutional assembly of 1824 and was one of the signers of the constitution adopted in 1826.

[V. O. CUTOLO]

GONÇALVES, VITAL MARÍA OLIVEIRA DE

Capuchin bishop of Olinda and Recife; b. Pedras de Fogo, Pernambuco, Brazil, Nov. 27, 1844; d. Paris, July 4, 1878. Vital, the son of Capt. Antonio Gonçalves and Antonia Albia de Oliveira, attended school in Itambá and Recife, the seminary in Olinda, and Saint-Sulpice in Paris. On July 16, 1863, he entered the Capuchin Order in Versailles, and on Aug. 15, 1863 received the habit and the name Frei Vital María de Pernambuco. He was ordained on Aug. 2, 1863 and returned to Brazil in November. Frei Vital taught philosophy in the seminary of São Paulo until he was nominated by Pedro II to the bishopric of Olinda and Recife on May 21, 1871. He was consecrated in the cathedral of São Paulo on March 17, 1872, and made his solemn entrance into his diocese on May 24. As bishop he was destined to play a pivotal role in the major Church-State crisis of the Brazilian empire, the religious question that disturbed Brazil between 1872 and 1875. The first overt attack of Masonry on a Brazilian bishop was occasioned after the disciplinary action Bp. Pedro Maria de Lacerda of Rio de Janeiro took against a priest in March 1872 for public participation in a Masonic festival. Brazilian Freemasonry began an all-out campaign against what the fraternity called the ultramontanism of the Brazilian hierarchy, with the French-educated Vital as the chief target. The second phase began when the Masonic press of Recife announced that on the Feast of SS. Peter and Paul, June 30, 1872, the Masonic lodge of Recife would commemorate the anniversary of its founding by having a Mass celebrated in St. Peter's church. Vital ordered the clergy not to participate, and no Mass was celebrated. In reprisal, the fraternity published the names of clerical and lay members of the Catholic brotherhoods who were affiliates of Masonry. Bishop Vital ordered all clerics to abjure Masonry and directed the brotherhoods to expel members who refused to abandon Masonry. When a brotherhood challenged the bishop's directive by availing itself of its constitutional safeguard, the right of recourse to the crown, the crisis moved from a contest between Freemasonry and the episcopacy to a Church-State issue involving the right of the government to control the spiritual prerogatives of the Catholic hierarchy.

The imperial government attempted settlement by an indirect appeal to Vital, presented to him by an imperial minister who was also a relative, urging him not to meddle in the affairs of the Masonic lodges. Vital, unintimidated by the government's action, placed recalcitrant religious associations under interdict. The imperial committee that reviewed the brotherhoods' recourse to the crown charged Vital with violation of the constitution. He was tried Feb. 18, 1874, found guilty, and sentenced to four years of hard labor, which was commuted to a four-year imprisonment. Vital had been joined by Bp. Antonio de MACEDO COSTA of Pará, who was similarly charged, indicted, tried, and then imprisoned.

Popular reaction embarrassed the imperial government to the point that it dispatched a special mission to Rome to persuade the Holy See to force the bishops to retract their spiritual penalties against the Masonic-infiltrated brotherhoods. The mission failed and the Emperor extracted himself from the impasse by granting amnesty to the two bishops, Sept. 17, 1875.

Vital, knowing that many false impressions had been created in Rome, left on Oct. 5, 1875 to present his case at the Vatican. He died in Paris. In 1882 his body was returned to Brazil and buried in Recife. On July 25, 1953, the diocesan process for his beatification was initiated.

Bibliography: F. GUERRA, A questão religiosa do segundo império brasileiro (Rio de Janeiro 1952). F. DE OLÍVOLA, Um grande brasileiro (Recife 1936).

[C. THORNTON]

GONDULPHUS OF METZ, ST.

Bishop; d. Gorze Abbey, Sept. 6, 823. The See of Metz fell vacant after the death of Bishop ANGILRAMNUS (791). It was filled only upon Gondulphus's accession, probably Dec. 28, 816, although the Annales S. Vincentii Mettensis give the date as 819. During Gondulphus's episcopate, which lasted six years, eight months, and seven days according to the old episcopal catalogue, ALDRIC OF LE MANS spent five years in Metz. Gondulphus attended the synod held at Thionville in 821. He was buried in GORZE ABBEY, where his relics are still honored. His successor was DROGO OF METZ.

Feast: Sept. 6 (Metz).

Bibliography: Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptores (Berlin 1926—) 2:269. Acta Sanctorum, Sept. 2:782–784. L. DUCHESNE, ed. Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule (Paris 1907–15) 33:58. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–35) 1:831–832.

[G. J. DONNELLY]

GONET, JEAN BAPTISTE

Dominican theologian; b. Béziers, in southern France, c. 1616; d. there Jan. 24, 1681. After receiving his early education in his native Languedoc, he entered the Toulouse province of the Dominicans at the age of 17. He received his doctorate in theology from the University of Bordeaux, where he was to spend the major portion of his life as professor of theology and where he became famous as a champion of Thomistic theology. He retired from teaching in 1677 and spent his remaining years in Béziers, where he corrected his writings.

In 1660 Gonet was one of three professors who, free of Jansenism themselves, declared Blaise PASCAL's Lettres provinciales exempt from the heresy of Jansenism. When some bishops and the University of Paris found heresy in the work, it was condemned, and the King suspended Gonet and his companions from teaching for three years. They had not approved the contents of Pascal's work, but had merely stated that the work contained no heresy. In 1663 Gonet joined his colleagues in signing the six Gallican articles promulgated by Louis XIV. This did not imply a denial of papal authority, however, for in 1665 Gonet and the others signed Alexander VII's formula demanding acceptance of papal condemnations of Jansenism.

Gonet is best known for his Clypeus theologiae thomisticae contra novos ejus impugnatores (Bordeaux 1659–69; Lyons 1681, contains corrections made by the author and is his definitive work; Paris 1875, six volumes). In this work Gonet was especially indebted to his contemporary Peter Godoy (d. 1677), a Dominican professor at Salamanca until his elevation to the See of Osma. Even before Godoy's commentaries were published, manuscript copies of his lectures spread his fame as a theologian throughout Spain, France, and Italy. One of these manuscripts reached Gonet, who was then composing Clypeus. Finding agreement with his own ideas, he incorporated Godoy's works into his own. Gonet was most conscious of his debt to Godoy and in his prologue he had the highest praise for him. Without the stimulus provided by the incorporation of his works into Gonet's writings, perhaps Godoy would never have published his Disputationes theologicae (Venice 1686).

Gonet was one of the Neo-Thomists who preferred to compose theological treatises on various subjects rather than to comment upon each article of St. Thomas. His work was intended to shield Thomism from the charge of Calvinism, to reply to the questions raised by JANSENISM, and to defend PROBABILISM against what he took to be the laxities of certain casuists who were probabilists.

Bibliography: R. COULON, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 6:1487–89. Quéatif-Échard 2.2: 692–693. J. FINKENZELER, Die Lehre von den Sakramenten der Taufe und Busse nach J. B. Gonet, O.P. (Munich 1956).

[R. P. STENGER]

GONFALONIERI

An archconfraternity under the name of the Mother of God, founded in 1264 at St. Mary Major in Rome by 12 noblemen, or standard-bearers (gonfalonieri), as the Compagnia de' Raccomandati di Madonna S. Maria. It undertook the ransom of the Christian captives of the Saracens. Until forbidden by PAUL III IN 1549, it presented a dramatization of the Passion of Christ during Holy Week in the Coliseum. In 1588, SIXTUS V made it a kind of third order. Today it exists under the name Arciconfraternita del Gonfalone at S. Lucia del Gonfalone. The garb is a white habit with a red cross on the right shoulder. Its works now include marriage counseling, caring for the sick, and attending funerals. Similar confraternities, affiliated with the one at Rome, exist throughout the world, especially in France.

Bibliography: M. NOIROT, Catholicisme 5:99. R. HINDRINGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, eds. (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1050.

[J. F. JOLLEY]

GONSALVUS HISPANUS

Philosopher, theologian, and the 15th general of the Franciscan Order; b. province of Galicia, Spain; d. Paris, April 13, 1313. He is not to be identified with another Spanish Franciscan, Gonsalvo de Vallebona or de Balboa, with whom he was confused by a 16th-century chronicler, Mariano da Firenze (L. Amorós). After preparatory studies in Spain, Gonsalvus became a bachelor of theology at Paris (1288), where he commented on the Sentences of Peter Lombard; his commentary, however, is not extant. In 1289 he was member of a delegation sent by Sancho IV, King of Castile, to Pope Nicholas IV; the following year he was elected provincial minister for the Franciscan province of Santiago of Compostela. He returned to Paris (c. 1297) to become a master of theology, and in 1302–03 was regent master of the Franciscan studium; there John DUNS SCOTUS commented on Lombard's Sentences during his regency. On June 25, 1303, both Gonsalvus and Duns Scotus were obliged to leave France because they had refused to sign Philip the Fair's appeal against Boniface VIII (E. Longpré). Shortly thereafter Gonsalvus became provincial minister for the province of Castile and, on March 17, 1304, general of the order.

Gonsalvus's literary legacy is not extensive. He compiled the Conclusiones metaphysicae (once attributed to Scotus), whose importance lies more in their practical usefulness than in their doctrinal content. His Quaestiones disputatae et de quolibet, dating from his regency in Paris, reflect heated discussions with the Thomists JOHN (QUIDORT) OF PARIS and PETER OF LA PALU, with Meister ECKHART, and with GODFREY OF FONTAINES and his students. Gonsalvus supported the traditional Augustinian theses on the supremacy of the will, the hylomorphic composition of angels and souls, the plurality of forms in the human compound, etc., but denied the need for divine illumination in intellectual knowledge, as PETER JOHN OLIVI had done before him and as Scotus would do later.

Gonsalvus's generalship, which lasted until April 13, 1313, was eventful. The conflict over Franciscan poverty had reached a new high, and Gonsalvus was obliged to combat not only laxity but also the extreme austerity of the spirituals and of the fraticelli. Some of his letters, most of them to various provincials of the order, have been preserved. He wrote also a small treatise concerning the precepts of the Franciscan rule, and engaged in polemics with the followers of Olivi [see Archivum Franciscanum historicum 7 (1914) 659–675; 8 (1915) 56–80; 10 (1917) 116–122]. He sponsored the compilation of the Catalogus Generalium Ministrorum, known as the Gonsalvinus, and the catalog of the cardinal protectors of the order. He also took an active part in the Council of Vienne (1311–12).

Gonsalvus's merit as general lies in his success in having preserved the order, during extraordinarily difficult times, from the dissolution that threatened it.

Bibliography: GONSALVUS HISPANUS, Quaestiones disputatae et de quodlibet, ed. L. AMORÓS Bibliotheca Franciscana scholastica mediaevi 9: 1935, complete bibliog. to 1935. For later additions, see E. MÜLLER, Das Konzil von Vienne 1311–1312: Seine Quellen und seine Geschichte (Vorreformationsgeschichtliche Forschungen 12; Münster 1934). Archivum Franciscanum historicum indexes to v. 1–50 (1908–1957), where Gonsalvus appears 38 times. E. LONGPRÉ, Le B. Jean Duns Scot, OFM, pour le Saint Siège et contre le Gallicanisme (Quaracchi-Florence 1930). R. LÓPEZ DE MUNAÍN, “El problema de la libertad y los doctores franciscanos del siglo XIII,” Verdad y Vida 5 (1947) 283–307. B. MENDIA, “Influentia de los maestros franciscanos en la psicología del conocimiento intelectual de Suarez,” ibid. 6 (1948) 421–453. A. PISVIN, “Die Intuitio und ihr metaphysischer Wert nach Vitalis de Furno (+ 1327) und Gonsalvus Hispanus (+ 1313),” Wissenschaft und Weisheit 12 (1949) 147–162. G. MURANA, “Il pensiero de Gonsalvo di Spagna,” Italia Franciscana 26 (1951) 25–37; “Cenni sul pensiero di Gonsalvo di Spagna,” Revista Rosminiana 47 (1953) 15–21. É. H. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (New York 1955) 698.

[G. GÁL]

GONZAGA

Ruling family of Mantua, Italy. It was a century and a half after the family arrived in Mantua that Luigi was elected captain general of the city (1328). This was the beginning of almost 400 years of Gonzaga rule there: the years 1328 to 1407 were marked by four Gonzaga captains general; the years 1407 to 1587 were a brilliant period in which the family produced rulers of ability; and the years 1587 to 1707 were a period of decline. Mantua's very location demanded vigilance and often involved the city in war, yet the rulers built palaces and churches and made Mantua a cultural center.

Painting of Vincenzo I. Gonzaga, Duke of Mantua, by Frans Pourbus the Younger, 1600. (©Ali Meyer/CORBIS)

Gianfrancesco (ruled 1407–44) was the first marquis in the family (under Emperor SIGISMUND) and was also the first ruler to bring an eminent personage to Mantua, namely the educator VITTORINO DA FELTRE. Ludovico (1444–78) brought Leone Battista Alberti and Andrea Mantegna; Federigo II (1519–40), Giulio Romano; Vincenzo I (1587–1612), Peter Paul Rubens. Francesco (1484–1519) and Isabella d'Este were the parents of three able sons: the above-mentioned Federigo II, Cardinal Ercole (see below), and Ferrante (d. 1557), who became viceroy of Naples and governor of Milan. Federigo II, who became the first Gonzaga duke in 1530, added Montferrat to the family domain. It was under his second son, Guglielmo (1550–87), that Mantua had its greatest prosperity. Competition in industry from other states and the extravagance of Vincenzo I precipitated the decline of the family. After the reigns of Vincenzo's three sons, the main branch ended in 1627. One evidence of the family's status was the sale of paintings from the Gonzaga gallery in that same year. The Gonzaga-Nevers or French branch ruled from 1627 to 1707, when the last duke went into exile and Austria annexed Mantua.

Rivalry between Ludovico and his brother Carlo just prior to 1444 resulted in the practice—common in noble families—of having the second son and sometimes other younger sons seek careers in the Church. Hence, in four of six consecutive reigns the second son became a cardinal; in the other two reigns there was a valid reason for the exceptions. In all, while the family ruled, there were ten cardinals (the first date given being that of their cardinalate); Francesco (1461, d. 1483), son of Ludovico, served as bishop of Mantua and as legate in Bologna and Ferrara. He has been criticized for his worldly ways and for his friendship with Angelo Poliziano. His nephew Sigismondo (1505, d. 1525) was bishop of Mantua and legate in the Marches and Bologna. Sigismondo's nephew Ercole (1527, d. 1563) was appointed bishop of Mantua in 1521. He spent the next three years studying at the University of Bologna. After 1527 he held appointments in four minor cities and was legate to Emperor CHARLES V when he came to Italy in 1530. The ideas of two friends, Gasparo CONTARINI and Gian Matteo GIBERTI, Bishop of Verona, guided Cardinal Ercole in reforming the Diocese of Mantua: e.g., before the decrees of the Council of Trent, Ercole ordered a careful visitation of churches in his diocese and repeated the visitation at intervals to ensure that proposed improvements had been made. When Duke Federigo died, the cardinal was the chief regent for his two nephews (1540–56). He governed the duchy well, improving the city, promoting industry, curbing extravagance, and systematizing weights and measures. His last appointment was as legate and president of the Council of TRENT (1561–63), but he died before it closed. Esteemed by his contemporaries and historians for his administration of diocese and duchy, he has also been praised for less public actions. He paid for the education of young men who were not his relatives. In his will he left money for the MONTES PIETATIS. Pirro (1527, d. 1529) became bishop of Modena. Francesco (1561, d. 1566) and Gianvincenzo (1578, d. 1591) were the sons of Ferrante and nephews of Cardinal Ercole. Francesco was bishop of Mantua. Duke Guglielmo valued particularly the advice of Gianvincenzo. Federico (1563, d. 1565) became bishop of Mantua. Ferdinando (1607, d. 1626) and Vincenzo (1615, d. 1627) were sons of Vincenzo I, and they renounced their cardinalates to become the last two dukes of the main branch of the Gonzaga family.

Scipione (1587, d. 1593) was the son of the marquis of Gazzolo, a collateral branch. Well educated and generous with his time, Scipione advised several writers, among them Torquato Tasso. He supported the entrance of his nephew ALOYSIUS GONZAGA into the JESUITS. His brother Annibale (Francesco) was the minister general of the Franciscan Observants (1579–87; d. 1620) who wrote the De origine Seraphicae religionis et progressibus (Rome 1587).

Bibliography: P. LITTA, Famiglie celebri italiane, 14 v. (Milan 1819–1923) v.7. G. MORONI, Dizionario de erudizione storicoecclesiastica, 103 v. in 53 (Venice 1840–61) 31:282–288. L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes From the Close of the Middle Ages, 40 v. (London-St. Louis 1938–61): v.11 (3d ed.) 11:505–508. A. LUZIO, La Galleria dei Gonzaga . . . (Milan 1913). S. J. C. BRINTON, The Gonzaga—Lords of Mantua (London 1927). G. FOCHESSATI, I Gonzaga di Mantova e l'ultimo duca (rev. ed. Milan 1930).

[M. L. SHAY]

GONZÁLEZ, ROQUE, ST.

Jesuit missionary and martyr; b. Asunción, Paraguay, 1576; d. Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil, Nov. 15, 1628. He was probably ordained on March 25, 1599; he dedicated his life to the evangelization of the Native South Americans. He was appointed priest of the cathedral and, in 1609, vicar-general of the diocese. On May 9, 1609, he entered the Society of Jesus. In 1615 he began his missionary work by founding the Reduction of Itapúa and in subsequent years other such settlements, until in 1620 he was appointed by his superiors to give religious instruction to the inhabitants of the area that is now the Brazilian state of Rio Grande do Sul. There he was martyred at the Reduction of Todos los Santos, the last one he founded. He was beatified in 1934 and canonized in 1988. He had two companions in his martyrdom. The first, Alonso Rodríguez, was born in Zamora, Spain, on March 10, 1598. He entered the Society of Jesus on March 25, 1614, and arrived in Buenos Aires on February 15, 1617. After completing his studies, he gave religious instruction to the native peoples for four years. Two days later, Juan del Castillo died at the Reduction of La Asunción. He was born in Belmonte, Spain, September 14, 1596, and he entered the Society of Jesus on March 22, 1614. Assigned to Paraguay, he arrived in Buenos Aires with Rodríguez and worked among the natives there for three years.

Feast: Nov. 17

Bibliography: H. THURSTON, "The First Beatified Martyr of Spanish America," Catholic Historical Review 20 (1934–35) 371–383. L. G. JAEGER, Os-bem aventurados Roque González, Alfonso Rodríguez e João del Castillo: Mártires do Caaró e Pirapó (2d ed. Pôrto Alegre 1951).

[H. STORNI]

GONZÁLEZ DÁVILA, GIL

Historian of Spain and the New World; b. Avila, c. 1570; d. there, April 25, 1658. He was the son of Agustín González and María Morales. While still a boy, he went to Rome in the service of Cardinal Pedro de Deza and studied there. In 1592 he returned to Spain with the papal appointment as prebendary of the cathedral of Salamanca. He was appointed archivist of the cathedral chapter in 1607 and was given the task of writing books or registers about the houses and estates of the cathedral. He published De la antigüedad del Toro de piedra de la puente de Salamanca y de otros que se hallan en otras ciudades y lugares de Castillo (Salamanca 1596), Historia de las antigüedades de la ciudad de Salamanca (1606), and Vida de Don Alonso Tostado de Madrigal (1611). He then began working on his principal work, an ecclesiastical history of Spain. He published the volume on Salamanca in 1617, the year in which he was appointed chronicler of the kingdoms of Castile. This work was also contained in the first volume of the Teatro eclesiástico de las ciudades e iglesias catedrales de España: Vida de sus obispos y cosas memorables de sus obispos (1618). Later he went to the court, and there in 1623 he published Teatro de las grandezas de la villa de Madrid, then gradually published sections of his Teatro eclesiástico (1643, 1647, 1650), the last volume of which did not appear until 1700. In 1643 he had been named chief chronicler of the Indies "to write the ecclesiastical history of those areas and what the Gospel and its ministers have done to augment the honor of the Holy Catholic Faith and the number of those it had saved by religious instruction." As part of his work on Spain he had had to work on the New World, since it was impossible to study one independently of the other, and this background enabled him to finish the study on the Church in Michoacán by 1644. In 1649 appeared the first volume of the Teatro eclesiástico de la primitiva iglesia de las Indias Occidentales, vida de sus arzobispos, obispos y cosas memorables de sus sedes, and in 1655 the second volume. By then, González Dávila, almost 90, was deaf and blind; in April 1656 he suffered an attack of paralysis that left him unable to speak.

Bibliography: A. MILLARES CARLO, Tres estudios biobibliográficos (Maracaibo 1961). F. ESTEVE BARBA, Historiografía Indiana (Madrid 1964).

[H. PEREÑA]

GONZÁLEZ DE SANTALLA, TIRSO

Theologian and 13th general of the Society of Jesus; b. Arganza, Spain, Jan. 18, 1624; d. Rome, Oct. 27, 1705. He entered the Jesuits in 1643 and taught philosophy and theology at Salamanca (1655–65, 1676–87). He preached popular missions (1667–76) and was general of the Jesuits from 1687 to 1705.

In the late 17th century the Jesuits, most of whom held probabilism, were under attack for a lax interpretation of moral matters. In 1674 González wrote a book strongly opposing probabilism in favor of stricter doctrine. The book was refused publication by Jesuit reviewers. He continued to urge probabilism and received the support of Innocent XI. At the urging of Innocent, González was elected general of the Society of Jesus. He then attempted to publish his previously rejected book, but his assistants blocked publication. The controversy caused considerable dissension in Jesuit circles. Innocent XII ordered a new examination, and a much-revised edition was published in 1694, a work applauded by the strict Bossuet, but judged excessively rigorist by St. Alphonsus Liguori. When the controversy continued, a general congregation of the Jesuits considered the case in 1696. A solution reaffirmed the freedom of Jesuit moral theologians to hold either system. Although muted for several years by this controversy, Jesuit moralists recovered to continue among the foremost advocates of probabilism.

González's most important work was the controversial Fundamentum Theologiae Moralis (Rome 1694). He also composed apologetical works, among which are Selectae disputationes ex universa theologia (4 v. Salamanca, 1680–86), directed against Neothomists and Jansenists; Manductio ad conversionem Mahometanorum (2 v. Madrid 1687); and treatises on the Immaculate Conception and on papal infallibility.

Bibliography: A. ASTRAIN, Historia de la Compañía de Jesús, 7 v. (Madrid 1902–25) 6:172–372. Pastor 32:435–441, 621–633. M. P. HARNEY, The Jesuits in History (New York 1941; repr. Chicago 1962). Sommervogel 3:1591–1602. P. BERNARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 6.2:1493–96.

[W. R. CALLAHAN]

GONZÁLEZ FLORES, ANACLETO

Mexican journalist, orator, organizer of Catholic lay action; b. Tepatitlán, Jalisco, July 13, 1888; d. Guadalajara, 1926. He was the son of poor parents, second in a family of 12. He attended the Seminary of San Juan de los Lagos but decided that he did not have a vocation to the priesthood and left for Guadalajara to study law. Because the state schools refused to validate his seminary courses, he was obliged to resume his studies on the preparatory level. He taught history and literature in private schools, while organizing Catholic worker groups on the principles of Pope Leo XIII. From 1914 to 1916 he formed a series of Catholic study circles in sociology, philosophy, and literature, inspired by such figures as Ketteler, Windhorst, Manning, Count de Mun, Daniel O'Connell, García Moreno, and even Mahatma Gandhi. This activity was interrupted when the revolution spread to Guadalajara, and he took refuge with a brother who had settled in the southern part of the state. There he joined the troops of Delgadillo, a partisan of Villa, as secretary. In December 1915 Delgadillo was captured and shot for treason, and González returned to Guadalajara, disillusioned with warfare.

By 1916, he had become a local leader, popularly known as El Maestro, in the Asociación Católica de la Juventud Mexicana, a national organization aimed at restoring a Christian social order in Mexico. He was admitted to the practice of law in 1922, and shortly thereafter he married. Upon the government's closing of the Conciliar Seminary of Guadalajara, he organized the Catholic Committee of Defense, and in early 1925 he consolidated this into a permanent Unión Popular, or united front, against the antireligious campaigns that raged from 1926 to 1929. He edited the weekly Gladium, which reached a circulation of 100,000.

When in 1926 the national government under CALLES determined to exterminate the Church through enforcement of the antireligious articles of the 1917 Constitution, González called upon Catholics in an article in the national newspaper El País to resist. He led the ensuing passive resistance to the government program, which accompanied the hierarchy's decision to suspend public worship. When the intransigent attitude of Calles made it appear that passive resistance was inadequate, Catholic leaders decided to resort to armed resistance. From this came the Liga Nacional Defensora de la Libertad Religiosa, setting off the Cristeros rebellion, so-called from the cry of the Catholic guerrilla warriors "Viva Cristo Rey." González found himself swept into this movement. Working from secret quarters in the home of Dr. Vargas González, he was discovered and arrested on April 1, 1926. After being brutally tortured in a vain effort to extract his secrets, he was bayoneted and shot, together with his companions Luis Padilla and Jorge and Ramón Vargas González. The public funerals accorded him and his associates were a spontaneous general reaction to his final words: "For a second time, may the Americas hear this holy cry: I die, but God does not die. 'Long live Christ the King!'"

Bibliography: A. GÓMEZ ROBLEDO, Anacleto González Flores: El maestro (2d ed. Mexico City 1947). A. RÍUS FACIUS, Méjico cristero: Historia de la ACJM, 1925 a 1931 (Mexico City 1960). J. H. SCHLARMAN, Mexico: A Land of Volcanoes (Milwaukee 1950). J. HERRERA ROSSI, Cinco retratos (Mexico City 1949).

[J. A. MAGNER]

GONZÁLEZ GARCÍA, MANUEL, BL.

Bishop of Málaga (1920–35) and Palencia (1935–40), founder of the Eucharistic Missionaries of Nazareth; b. Feb. 25, 1877, Sevilla, Andalucía, Spain; d. Jan. 4, 1940, Palencia, Castilla y León. Manuel was the fourth of the five children of Martín González Lara, a carpenter, and his wife, Antonia. He paid for his education by working as a domestic servant in the seminary. Following his priestly ordination (Sept. 21, 1901) at the hands of Bl. Marcelo SPÍNOLA Y MAESTRE, he was assigned to a mission in Palomares del Rio (1902–05) near Sevilla, then Huelva (1905–16).

Profoundly affected by the vision of an abandoned tabernacle, the bishop dedicated his life to promoting the Real Presence in the Eucharist. On March 4, 1910, he petitioned a group of his faithful collaborators to undertake the "Obra para los Sagrarios-Calvarios" (Work of Sacred Calvary) to make reparations to the Eucharistic Jesus. From this Eucharistic Union for Reparations developed Marys of the Tabernacle for lay women, the Disciples of St. John for laymen, the Children's Eucharistic Reparation Society, Eucharistic Missionaries for priests (1918), Eucharistic Missionaries of Nazareth for women religious (1921), the Institute of Nazarene Missionary Helpers (1932), and the Youth Eucharistic Reparation Society (1939). These societies quickly spread to other dioceses in Spain and the Western Hemisphere through the periodical El Granito de Arena (The Grain of Sand). Fr. Manuel's work received the approval of Pope Pius X in 1912. This love of the Eucharist also moved the priest to relieve the suffering of his flock and open schools.

On Jan. 16, 1916, Fr. Manuel received episcopal ordination as the auxiliary bishop of Málaga. His elevation to bishop of the same diocese (1920) was celebrated with a banquet for 3,000 poor children—served by dignitaries, priests, and seminarians—rather than the usual gala for the elite. As bishop he visited each parish, improved the educational system for both secular and religious training, and labored to encourage more priestly vocations.

The arrival of the Spanish Republic threatened the work he had accomplished. On May 11, 1931, the episcopal palace was burned, forcing the bishop to direct his diocese from Gibraltar, then Madrid (1932–35). On Aug. 5, 1935, Pope Pius XI named him bishop of Palencia.

Throughout his career, González shared his love of the Eucharist through his writings, which include Lo que puede un cura hoy, El abandono de los Sagrarios acompañados, Oremos en el Sagrario como se oraba en el Evangelio, Artes para ser apóstol, La gracia en la educación, and Arte y liturgia.

He died after patiently enduring years of ill health. The epitaph marking his remains in the Blessed Sacrament Chapel in Palencia's cathedral reads: "I ask to be interred next to a Tabernacle, so that my bones after death, as my tongue and pen during life, will always say to those who pass by: Jesus is there! He is there! Do not abandon him!" Pope John Paul II declared him venerable (April 6, 1998), approved a miracle attributed to his intercession (Dec. 20, 1999), and beatified him (April 29, 2001).

Bibliography: L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. Ed. 18 (2001), 1, 6–8; 19 (2001), 7, 10.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GONZÁLEZ HOLGUÍN, DIEGO

Jesuit linguist; b. Cáceres, Spain, 1552; d. Mendoza, Argentina, 1617 or 1618. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1568. In May 1581, he arrived in Lima and in 1584 he went as a missionary to Cuzco. Assigned to the group who were to establish the society in Ecuador, he went to Quito in 1586. In 1600 he was rector at Chuquisaca (today Sucre, Bolivia), and later held the same post at Asunción, Paraguay. Devoted by preference to academic work, on occasional excursions as a missionary he made close contacts with the Indian world, and became a specialist in Quechua. He composed a grammar of the language and a dictionary, along with an account of the privileges granted to the Indians. As a moralist, in 1611 he published a treatise defending the compulsory character of obedience to royal orders and an instruction on "the conduct that should be observed in the tribunal of penance with the encomenderos." He achieved a balanced Indianist judgment, rare among the extreme tendencies usually shown by jurists dealing with the disputes over the encomiendas at the beginning of the 17th century.

Bibliography: A. DE EGAÑA, Monumenta Peruana (Rome 1954–61). E. TORRES SALDAMANDO, Los antiguos jesuitas del Perú (Lima 1882).

[A. DE EGAÑA]

GONZÁLEZ SUÁREZ, FEDERICO

Ecuadorian bishop and historian; b. Quito, April 12, 1844; d. Quito, Dec. 1, 1917. González, grew up during the upheaval of civil war that followed the Wars of Independence. As a young man he witnessed the power struggles between García Moreno and his opponents, Julio Arboleda and Tomás Cipriano Mosquera. González left the army and joined the Society of Jesus. By temperament he was unsuited for community life; he left the society after ten years and was later ordained by the bishop of Cuenca. Thereafter, he devoted himself to historical studies and to preaching, distinguishing himself not only by his eloquence but also by his strict judgments, which at times occasioned violent reaction from opponents.

Federico González Suárez.

His years in Cuenca were marked also by an interest in the prehistory of the aborigines of the region. His Estudio sobre los Cañaris was the fountainhead of new research into the past of America. Before publishing his study, González had been elected to Congress. He moved to Quito and became a well-known and respected figure in public life. He planned to write the history of the Church in Ecuador and published the first volume in 1881. Then he became interested in a general history of the nation. The archeological study in volume one (1890) failed again to attract readers. Only when volume four appeared did González's work gain attention, because of the scandal created by his description of the bad conditions prevalent in convents during the colonial period. The Roman Curia, to which the matter had to be referred, required no changes. Even before the decision, Pope Leo XIII had, in 1894, designated him bishop of Ibarra. González wrote his response in the work, published posthumously in 1937, Defensa de mi criterio histórico.

As bishop of Ibarra, he was forced to the political upheavals of the time. The ousted Ecuadorean party tried to regain power with the aid of Colombians who fought the war in the name of religion. When required by the government to take part in a patriotic celebration, the bishop left his vicar instructions for action in case of emergency, saying, "We ecclesiastics must never sacrifice the Fatherland in order to save religion." He opposed a bishop of a neighboring diocese who had tried to interfere in a school in Tulcán and had threatened its members with excommunication. González made it clear that he and he alone would dictate policy in the diocese and that all other orders were void. His position was upheld by Rome.

Seven volumes of his history, covering the whole colonial era, were published. Later he published Estudios literarios on well-known figures whose lives somewhat resembled his own.

[I. J. BARRERA]

GONZÁLEZ Y DÍAZ TUÑÓN, CEFERINO

Dominican cardinal and philosopher; b. San Nicolás de Villoria, Asturias, Jan. 28, 1831; d. Madrid, Nov. 29, 1894. Entering the Dominican Order for the province of the Philippines in 1844, he was sent to Manila in 1849, where he studied and was ordained in 1859. He taught at the University of Santo Tomás (1859–66) and returned to Spain in 1867. Consecrated bishop of Córdoba in 1875, he was made archbishop of Seville in 1883, cardinal in 1884, and archbishop of Toledo in 1886. Through his teaching and many publications he contributed substantially to the restoration of THOMISM prior to AETERNI PATRIS. To a profound knowledge of Thomistic philosophy he added a wide knowledge of modern thinkers and a deep interest in the physical sciences. For him, Thomism was not a closed system, but a progressive, living tradition capable of renewing itself and of assimilating the progress of science. His first work was Estudios sobre la filosofía de Santo Tomás (Manila 1864). Later he wrote Philosophia elementaria, 3 v. (Madrid 1868; Spanish tr., 2 v. Madrid 1873); Estudios religiosos, filosóficos, científicos y morales (Madrid 1873); and Historia de la filosofía, 3 v. (Madrid 1878–79). In his last publication, La Biblia y la ciencia, 2 v. (Madrid 1891, 1894), he presented the scriptural problem clearly and formulated solid principles of resolution that were adopted by J. LAGRANGE in his preface to Revue Biblique (1892) and by Leo XIII in his PROVIDENTISSIMUS DEUS.

Bibliography: A. FRÜHWIRTH, Analecta Sacri Ordinis Praedicatorum 2 (1895–96) 34–41. N. DEL PRADO, Revue thomiste 3 (1895) 85–94. G. FRAILE, Revista de Filosofía 15 (1956) 465–488. F. DIAZ DE CERIO, Pensamiento 20 (1964) 27–70.

[G. FRAILE]

GOOD

In general the term "good" refers to something of value, or anything that fills a need or desire and thus affords satisfaction. Philosophers refine this notion and use it in several different senses. In speculating about God as Absolute Perfection, the ultimate end of man and the universe, they refer to the Supreme Good (see GOOD, THE SUPREME). In the context of social and political thought they sometimes speak of the motivating force behind all human activity as the common good. In metaphysical analysis they identify the good with being considered precisely as an object of desire or appetite, and thus enumerate it among the TRANSCENDENTALS. In ethics, finally, they speak of any action in conformity with a norm of MORALITY as itself good, and thus conducive to man's fulfillment and happiness. In what follows major consideration will be given to the last two meanings, under the headings of ontological good and moral good, respectively.

Ontological Good

The good, viewed metaphysically, expresses something so fundamental that it is impossible to define it in terms of anything more basic. The unsuspected depth and diversity of meaning that follow man's initial understanding of what constitutes the good can best be exposed by tracing the development of this concept throughout the long history of philosophy.

Platonic Origins. Discussing the good primarily in an ethical context, PLATO sees it as the action man ought to perform. If a man acts for the sake of something, this something is what he wills and seeks precisely as conducive to his good. The good is what will make him happy. This may be the useful or the pleasurable; but even the unpleasant, e.g., punishment, can be good if it is the remedy that cures diseases of the soul, such as injustice or intemperance. The good then is primarily a virtue of the soul, a kind of knowledge: the knowledge of good counsel, or of the just and unjust, the temperate or intemperate, etc. This knowledge is a certain synthesis of all the virtues, but one according to a pattern elaborated through reason. A knowledge so elaborated implies for Plato knowledge of an absolute norm or form of good action. This norm defines the good.

Yet Plato is aware that this does not fully solve the problem. Though it seems reasonable that a man should be just and act justly, yet when such action presents many and immediate disadvantages there must be some reason why virtuous action is good in spite of these. This requires a deeper notion of the good that makes the goodness of virtuous action a good in itself. In the Symposium

Plato indicates that the ultimate principle is some nature that is absolute unity, harmony, and perfection. Again, in the Republic, he specifies that the unity of knowledge is founded in the good, for the good is the author of all known things and is their very essence. Yet the good itself is not essence, but transcends it in dignity and power. He does not further elaborate the character of this ultimate good, nor does he explain how it is related to the multiple virtues of the soul.

Aristotelian Development. For Aristotle, since every act, inquiry, or pursuit seems to tend to some good, the good is said to be that at which all things aim. The good is the end of human action, and as such might be either a product of that activity or the activity itself. Among good ends, Aristotle notes a hierarchy in which the lower is desired as a means to the ultimate. The existence of lower ends permits him to identify some good things with the useful. But there must be a highest good or ultimate end, for otherwise man would never wish to act. This ultimate end is a good not identified with the useful but one desired for its own sake.

The Highest Good. Aristotle sees the supreme good as the end of man's highest action or the end of that action that is the reason of all other actions. For Aristotle, as for Plato, man's highest activity is knowing. But the former makes a clear distinction between speculative knowledge and practical knowledge. Speculative knowledge bases its principles in things, and its end is the truth of these things. Practical science, or the knowledge of doing or making, takes its principles from the one knowing and the goal envisaged, and its end is the truth of something yet to be done or made. Again, for Aristotle, man is not an isolated individual but a social animal who cannot achieve his end independent of society. So the good of man's highest practical activity is not an individual good but the good of man. Thus he identifies the good of man with the good of the state. Man, see what should be his aim or end as a member of a city-state, thereby determines his highest good.

Aristotle realizes that the term good has as many meanings as being. Yet, even though it can be predicated of all the categories, it somehow transcends them. Moreover, if some one good exists that is itself totally good, it cannot be reached by man; nor can knowledge of it, transcending as it does the field of action, clarify knowledge needed by man to achieve a particular end or good.

Human Happiness. Such considerations, however, lead Aristotle to the question: Is there one final end for man, or are there many? In his understanding, "final" is something not desired for the sake of something else, although not necessarily ultimate in the sense of transcendent. He answers that happiness is such a good, since it is always chosen for its own sake, and he equates this with virtuous action that is the strictly human good. However, this action cannot consist in just one act, but entails action of the highest virtue during a "complete life." Nor can this happiness of virtuous action be complete without some other gifts of FORTUNE such as health, a certain prosperity, friends, and a long life. The whole complex state entitled "happiness" varies somewhat with different abilities and types of men, and thus is not identical for all.

For Aristotle, then, the good is what man rationally judges should be done to achieve his happiness as a social being in this life. He does not develop the notion of an independent existing object, such as that implied by Plato, which would be ultimate in the order of good.

Epicureans and Stoics. The Epicureans saw the good as relative bodily pleasure; the Stoics identified it and virtue with passionless nature lived rationally (see EPI-CUREANISM; HEDONISM; STOICISM).

Plotinus and the Good. It is PLOTINUS who stresses the good in terms of the ultimate ontological principle suggested by Plato. His whole philosophy is a search not merely for the good as moral but also for the supreme principle of both speculative and practical knowledge. This principle he terms the nature of the good. It is the ultimate source of all things.

Plotinus speaks of being as a Platonic form, i.e., as an object that is logically prior to intelligence even though correlative to it. Yet intelligence and the objects it understands constitute a multitude; they are unintelligible unless reduced to some unity. This unity, because it is above being and intelligence, cannot be grasped by intellect, since this would immediately delimit it and make it a "this" and not "that." The resulting One he identifies with the Good. It is the source of the being of all other things, for these are beings by emanation, obtaining their perfection from the Good.

Plotinus thus teaches that: first, the good is identified primarily with reality in the fullness of its perfection; second, all other things, as emanations, are in that degree good; and third, a comprehension (not of the existence, but) of the nature of the Supreme Good is beyond the capacity of intelligence; which is itself a limited emanation. The meaning of the nature of the Supreme Good is therefore reached by man only in a negative way, by a sort of intuitive experience.

Augustinian Teaching. St. AUGUSTINE synthesizes Plotinian philosophy with Christian Revelation, for the latter clearly reveals the notion of a sovereign transcendent good and identifies this with God. All other things, having been created, are by God but not of Him. They are good but not as an emanation of God's goodness. Rather, God creates a being, making it this nature or that; since it is a nature, it is good. For St. Augustine the good is not primarily end or something desired, but rather being and a degree of perfection. He holds that being has measure, form, and order.

First, all natures are ordered, that is, are intelligible and related in an intelligible fashion to all other beings. If a nature dynamically maintains its order it should attain its end. The mode of a being implies order: it also expresses the measure of being, while form, or species, expresses the particular character of that measure. Each nature, as a kind of ordered measure, is in itself a degree of reality and so "good."

St. Augustine does not identify this objective order of the good with the de facto end of man and his knowledge of that end. Revelation tells him that man's end or good is unattainable by natural powers. Only by the assurance of Revelation is the objective Supreme Good, hinted at by Plato and considered as out of man's reach by Aristotle, reintegrated into the objective moral order. The supernatural order requires man to love God for Himself as The Good, and all else as means.

Neither does St. Augustine identify the morality or goodness of human action with man's practical knowledge of the good. Such knowledge and virtue are not the same thing. He recognizes the difference between knowledge of what is, knowledge of what ought to be done, and the willing of the directive to action. Unlike earlier thinkers he sees voluntary choice rooted in knowledge as basic to virtue. This distinction between knowledge and will gives rise to the thorny problem of the difference between the objective moral good and that which, in the light of a good intention, may be mistakenly judged to be a means and so a good. From this distinction one can understand how conscience can make its demands to be itself respected as a good.

Thomistic Doctrine. St. THOMAS AQUINAS's meaning of the good, often identified with the Aristotelian phrase as "that which all things desire," is rather one that embodies not merely Aristotle's thought but also the further contributions of PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS and St. Augustine. His essential contribution lies partly in his treatment of the good in general, making it an integral part of his metaphysics, and partly in his subtle explanation of the connection between the first principles of ethics and those of metaphysics, and so of the relation between ontological good and the good of moral action.

Being and the Good. St. Thomas seems to make two approaches to the understanding of being. The first is a deepening of experience through which he sees that "to be" is to be this something, which, through change, can become other; and again, that "to be" is to be many kinds, measures, or modes.

The second view develops when, from the fact of change and multiplicity, he establishes that there must be a First Cause, a First Necessary Being, a First Truth, etc. (see GOD, PROOFS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF). Considering the character of this "First," he then establishes its utter simplicity by way of negation. Simplicity in being is to be the Act Itself of Existing, the principle of all other modes. This leads him to reflect on finite things and see them as beings precisely because, by creative act, they are given existence.

Emphasizing existence as the perfection of all perfections, St. Thomas attains a deeper understanding of being and its transcendental properties. First, he holds that "to be" is to be an existing something; but this exists as itself and not other: thus it is one. The mind also apprehends being as intrinsically intelligible and, in its highest mode, as an intellect in act: thus being is true. As true, it is correlative to mind and the good of mind. But the true as good is not good merely for the intellect, but also as existent in its own right; it is that to which the intellectual appetite or will tends, and in which it rests. Being is thus seen as both perfective and perfection. It is good because it perfects and fills the intellectual appetite; it is good and loved because its actuality is perfection. In its highest mode the good of the will is seen as identical with its love.

Aquinas thus shows that the Highest Being, God, Existence Itself, is at the same time a pure act of intellectual understanding and a pure act of delight and love. Existence Itself, as perfectly lucid Love, is the Good. But its mode of existence transcends our positive comprehension.

Ontological and Moral Good. For man, to be is not only to exist, but also to develop, and this by the absorption of being. Yet, though all things can be seen intellectually as good in themselves, not all ontological goods are good for man's development here and now. Thus the ontologically good is morally good only insofar as, in a given situation, it becomes a proper means to man's ultimate end. Man by his choice so relates other beings to his being that he develops his own being in the process. In so doing he gives expression to the primary principle of being, viz, that being must be and is good. Seeking through action this affirmation of being, man has it in his power to tend toward his ultimate end and good.

But man cannot use being for his development by a mere mechanical relating of the ontological good to himself; rather, through understanding and choice, he must employ a limited creative act. Man's free action is based on a spiritual synthesis made by himself as a distinct person. Thus the moral good must be seen as bearing the stamp of his personality. Respect for the person and his action, which depends in turn on complicated judgments inspired by love of the good and yet is perfectible in various degrees by moral and intellectual virtues, causes St. Thomas to hold that the conscientious judgment is itself good—even though from the theoretical and objective point of view it might be judged erroneous and imperfect. Following St. Augustine, St. Thomas regards the personal act of conscience as a good to be respected. The moral good, then, is not necessarily identical with the ontological. In a certain sense, the ordering of the ontological good to the ultimate end is potential to man's creative act of choice.

Spinoza and the British Moralists. Among modern philosophers SPINOZA makes almost complete identification between moral and ontological good. His philosophy is based on the principle "that the order and connection of ideas is the same as the order and connections of things" (Ethics 2, prop. 7). We seek, through reflection on our understanding of things, a knowledge of the intelligible principle involved in their intelligibility. For example, various figures or modes of thought involve intelligible extension or thought respectively. Both extension and thought can be conceived as intelligible expressions of substance; yet substance itself, a principle implied in the understanding of everything else, implies no further principle. The order of thought and reality being the same, the ultimate principle, substance, is also the Supreme Reality. And man finds his good, contentment, and peace in the gradual comprehension of what is, which reaches its culmination in an intuition of the unitive whole of substance, or God. This intuition, being a conscious affirmation of mind, is identical with love, which is the very spontaneity of the mind. The wise man being "conscious of himself and of God and of things by a certain eternal necessity, never ceases to be, but always possesses true acquiescence of spirit" (Ethics 5, prop. 42n). This is man's Good: to be absorbed in what is.

The BRITISH MORALISTS of the 18th century attempted to found their idea of the good on moral phenomena experienced in the life of the ordinary man rather than on a metaphysical basis. All agreed that happiness was the good sought. The intellectualist school saw happiness as resulting from man's respect for reasonable relations that express things as they are; the sentimentalists stressed those relations they felt were apt to produce the well-being of oneself or the majority. The good was really the state from which happiness results.

Kant's Notion of Good. Immanuel Kant regarded this phenomenal idea of the good as relativistic and purely subjective. Instead, he sought a moral relation that would be universally valid and based on something absolute in the person. This he found in the good will or good intention. Kant's will is a subjective extreme opposed to Spinoza's objective position. Hegel synthesizes both views.

In his Critique of Pure Reason Kant criticized all metaphysical knowledge of being; in his view, we know only the effects or appearances of things. Both nature and the self become syntheses of appearances. Therefore it is meaningless to say that one understands or loves a thing because of its inherent perfection. The moral good cannot be based on the ontological good. The only good is a will that wills with all its power, even if it fails of its purpose. There is "an absolute value in the mere will" [Fundamental Principles of the Metaphysics of Morals, sec. 1; tr. T. K. Abbott (London 1927) 10].

Such a will is not an act of love but an imperative expressing itself in a dictate of the rational will determined solely by itself; it is an autonomous dictate, an "ought" that is absolutely pure when it is expressible in a categorical imperative (see CATEGORICAL IMPERATIVE). Such a spontaneous dictate of the will, being independent of objects or consequences and thus purely formal, is the only absolute good. It is a demand that the "will" be "will," for only thus can man be man. The good as end is not a norm but a subjective good, such as the useful or pleasurable; this is relative to the individual in the changing conditions of sense and so is not good in itself.

In a priori fashion Kant holds that a good will should produce happiness. But happiness is not the result of one act alone. It is possible only on the supposition "of an endless duration of the existence and personality of the same rational being," i.e., on the supposition of immortality [Critique of Practical Reason, 2.2.4; tr. T. K. Abbott (London 1927) 218]. Moreover, although the virtuous man is worthy of happiness, experience shows that happiness is not necessarily connected with virtue. Happiness can in fact follow virtue only if one also assumes the existence of an intelligent cause of both nature and rational being. On such a supposition the Summum Bonum, the sum of virtue and happiness, is possible. These suppositions are thus the a priori condition of the possibility of the Highest Good, although they are not the a priori conditions of a good will as such.

Hegelian Teaching. With HEGEL there is no dichotomy between knowledge and the real. Knowledge is knowledge of the real and the real is what is known. Like Spinoza, Hegel has no criterion of the truth beyond reflective consciousness of truth itself. The life of the mind is nothing other than reason, or reality, expressing itself in a dialectical process of understanding, reflecting, distinguishing through reflection, and synthesizing to form a higher object that leads to Idea or Reason as the Absolute. In other words, consciousness through self-reflection transcends itself and its object. As limited, such action is autonomous and free insofar as it becomes an expression of Spirit and Reason, or a manifestation of the Absolute.

The recognition of this unity of self-consciousness and being is also a recognition of "ethical substance." Self-consciousness at different levels yields moments of this substance and so "the healthy natural reason knows immediately what is right and good." A healthy reason knows the law immediately as: "this is right." But the right is never something related to an individual as individual; it must be an expression of the universality or community of Reason. Yet Reason at the stage of ethical action, since this stage is a moment in process, is an autonomous, universal willing of several things. It intends, first, the consciousness of the family as a community; this consciousness secondly involves seeing the family in relation to the greater community, the nation; and this in turn is related or absorbed in the unity of Absolute Spirit.

The Hegelian position is thus much like that of Spinoza: a metaphysical explanation is also an ethical view of reality. The Ultimate Good is Reason, or Absolute Spirit, or the spiritual as embodying all reality. Every expression of that Reality can be said to be good since each is implicitly Reason. Moral life is the progressive effort consciously to realize Spirit, just as for Spinoza it is progress toward the understanding of the Ultimate Principle, Substance. Virtue becomes identified with this dynamic understanding. But, for Hegel as for Kant, progress is an act of the self and is one entailing a hierarchy of levels. On each level the understanding makes the self explicit in its universal communal relations, and this too progresses in time, rather than unfolding in the Spinozistic mode in a linear series of implications.

Bergson and Sartre. Contemporary philosophy sees all of reality from an evolutionary, dynamic viewpoint. For the most part, the existentialist, creative character of action is stressed in reaction to the over-rationalized character of the Hegelian concept. In the philosophy of BERGSON the ontological good consists in action begetting the new through the élan vital. In line with this the moral good is embodied in the life of the model person or saint. Just as being or action expresses the unique, original character of existence, so it expresses the good.

The most radical expression of the existentialist trend is found in the work of Sartre (see EXISTENTIALISM). For him being is neither consciousness nor object, but what is presupposed to both thought and phenomena. It simply is, without meaning, and is identical with the absurd. Though being is neither good nor evil, Sartre speaks of it in terms of disgust. Man's act of consciousness or decision generates something intelligible, or an essence. In the order of moral action spontaneous decision is the free creation of the good bound by no rule. This is inherently contradictory and the negation of the good in its own terms.

See Also: PERFECTION, ONTOLOGICAL; OPTIMISM; EVIL; PESSIMISM.

Bibliography: E. G. SALMON, The Good in Existential Metaphysics (Milwaukee 1953). E. SMITH, The Goodness of Being in Thomistic Philosophy and Its Contemporary Significance (Catholic University of America Philosophical Studies 98; Washington 1947). C. HOLLENCAMP, Causa causarum: On the Nature of Good and Final Cause (Quebec 1949). L. DE RAEYMAEKER, The Philosophy of Being, tr. E. H. ZIEGELMEYER (St. Louis 1954). R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927-30) 1:611-18. M. J. ADLER, ed., The Great Ideas: A Syntopicon of Great Books of the Western World, 2 v. (Chicago 1952) 1:605-38.

[E. G. SALMON]

Moral Good

Man's ontological good is his corporeal-spiritual being with its existent perfections and activities. An individual's good, in this sense, can be compared to an anthropological exemplar to see whether he falls short of the average, as would a blind, maimed, or insane person. But we do not say that a man is good or bad on the basis of such perfection or defect. For, although one's ontological good is desirable for its own sake, it is impermanent and does not represent the ultimate state of human well-being. Moral good refers to a man's ultimate good and whatever is directly connected therewith.

Notion of Moral Good. Moral goodness is the goodness of man as man, and basically consists in a relationship to his ultimate end. This relationship can exist: (1) in man's total being, (2) in his acts, and (3) in his habitual dispositions. Now the whole man is correctly and habitually related to his last end only when he possesses sanctifying GRACE. However, a radical orientation to this end is not enough in the case of the adult. For ends are actually attained by acts proper to the agent; and the characteristic act of man is the human act, the act of which man is master. An act of man is human when done with knowledge of the purpose of the act and freely placed (see HUMAN ACT). As a free being, man has the power to affirm his being and choose what leads to the end; or he can deny his being and choose what defeats his end. The former acts are good and right; the latter bad and wrong.

Without freedom there is no man; so, without freedom there is neither moral good nor moral evil. We ordinarly speak of moral good as existing in man's rational choices. These, however, will lead to the vision of God only if they are vivified by actual grace. In another common meaning moral good refers to the person of the human agent; thus he is called morally good (virtuous) if habitually disposed to perform good acts; he is called morally bad (vicious) if habitually disposed to perform bad acts (see VIRTUE).

Moral theology studies human acts and habits in relation to the last end. It teaches how one may maintain himself in the state of grace, acquire virtues, and identify the chief good and evil acts. Since early Greek times, philosophers have concerned themselves with problems about the virtues and the acts. The following discussion is for the most part about acts.

Theories about Moral Goodness. The perennial problem is one of determining the ultimate difference between right and wrong conduct. In theory, that is right which leads to the end, that is wrong which defeats the end, so that attainment of the end is incontestable proof of the rightness of a given course of action. We cannot, however, use attainment of the end to judge the rightness of conduct, because we have no experiential knowledge of people attaining their last end. Although the concepts of goodness and rightness differ (for goodness is suitability to nature, rightness rectitude toward an end), nevertheless, in the concrete the good act is the right act and the bad act is the wrong act. Hence the problem is soluble only if one finds why good acts are good and bad acts are bad.

Non-Normative Systems. The answers that they give to this question have been used to characterize some moral systems (see ETHICS, HISTORY OF). Thus the intuitionists are those who say that we simply see one act to be good and another to be bad. Some forms of this theory postulate a special moral sense that enables us to discern moral goodness in much the same way as sight tells yellow from blue. This doctrine is moral sensism. Phenomenologists, following HUSSERL, say that we immediately perceive the negative or positive value of a human act, not by operation of an intellect, but by an emotional act of value-appreciation. Some existentialists say that in a given situation we create the morally good act by our choice of whatever in a given situation promotes our value as existent persons. This is a form of situational ethics. These views dispense with a norm of morals.

Normative Systems. Many systems, however, hold a norm. Thus WILLIAM OF OCKHAM said that the positive will of God denominates certain acts as good and certain others as bad, and these labelings He could change at pleasure. Some modern Protestants reecho this doctrine and say that the sovereign Will of God, which may differ with each occasion and which can neither be contained within universal principles nor known by reason, is the sole norm of goodness. This function HOBBS attributes to the law of the state. According to Kant an act is good if it conforms to a dictate of the autonomous reason from the sole motive of devotion to duty. The supreme dictate upon which he based all others is: So act that thy motive may be made a universal law for all men. The hedonist, ancient and modern, judges the goodness of an act by its capacity to afford him pleasure (see HEDONISM). The 19th-century utilitarian pronounced an act good on the basis of its utility to serve the greatest good of the greatest number of men and animals. One of the most commonly accepted norms is the current practice of a given community based upon public approvals and disapprovals.

Naturalism and Positivism. The naturalists hold that morals is a natural science akin to biology or psychology, that moral goodness is a physical property inhering in some object, and of the same kind as color, shape, or feeling, to which many give the name of "V-property." This is identified by some as a bodily process such as a pleasant titillation of the nerves, as that which the agent likes or prefers or which arouses his interest, as that which assists evolution, or the life-process, or the continuing social process by relief of tensions. Nearly all such systems are at one in shying away from the question of man's ultimate end. (See INSTRUMENTALISM.)

Logical positivists think that the problem of moral goodness is a pseudo problem on the ground that moral concepts and statements are not addressed to the intellect and make no sense; they merely evince emotion. Hence a statement asserting an action to be good or bad is either an exclamation of approval or disapproval, a hidden command, a gerundive, or a prescription. (See LOGICAL POSITIVISM.)

Scholastic Analysis. Scholastics commonly teach that the basic difference between good and bad is natural and not arbitrary. First, some actions of themselves defeat human ends and are bad and must be forbidden; others are so necessary to human existence that they are good in themselves and must be commanded. Not even God could sanction the former and prohibit the latter; for in that event human life would be impossible. Second, the reason why some acts are good in themselves and others bad in themselves is because human nature is what it is. Consequently the norm of human goodness is the complete nature of MAN. Here is obvious application of the ontological principle that action is proportionate to being. As the activities that allow a plant or an animal to come to maturity and perfection are only those that accord with the nature of the plant or animal, so man, if he is to arrive at the perfection of his nature, must choose to do only that which accords with his nature.

The Norm of Nature. To say that the norm of moral goodness is man's nature is a fuller explication of: (1) Aristotle's thought that the golden mean of virtue is right reason; for whoever acts in accordance with his nature is following right reason; and (2) St. Thomas's doctrine that the ultimate rule of conduct is the eternal LAW. For the provident Creator guides His creatures to their destiny by means befitting the nature of each. It is fitting that the rational creature be directed by moral law addressed to his intelligence and guiding his free will; and the content of this law is the prohibition of those actions that run counter to man's nature, and the command to do those things essential to the realization of that nature.

Moral Evil. The norm that discerns the good discerns the EVIL; for evil is the contrary of good. Ontologically evil is a nothing, the absence of a perfection that ought to be present. Man's ontological evil is lack of being, such as pain, mutilation, death, loss of power, that militates against his wholeness as a natural unitary being. Moral evil exists only in human choices; it consists in a lack of rectitude whose basis is that the act is not befitting the nature of the agent. Appetite must seek good, but in choosing moral evil it seeks what is only apparently good. While this may be an ontological perfection of the faculty whence it proceeds, it is unbecoming the total man and cannot be ordered to the last end. Formal moral evil is choice of what the agent thinks to be wrong; material moral evil is the choice of a wrong object that the agent thinks to be right.

Moral Objectivity. The essential goodness or badness of the will-act does not depend upon the subjective perfection by which it issues from the agent, as might an act of singing or running, but upon the object directly chosen, for the object specifies the will-act. This statement contradicts those existentialists who say that what a man chooses is of little or no consequence if only he chooses freely, sincerely, authentically. But the intensity or remissness of the will adds only accidental perfection or defect to the human act. The act is good if a morally good object is chosen; it is bad if a morally bad object is chosen. We carefully note that the total object of the will includes both what a man chooses to do and why he does so. The why is the motive that prompts the action; the what is the action, with its modifying circumstances, by which a motive is to be realized. Now in order to be good the act must accord with the norm, both as to what a man does and why he does it. This common teaching is also contested by existentialists who say that the nature of our action is not to be reckoned, if only one acts from the motive of the love of God. The most fundamental rule of morals is that the will may never seek, or rest in, moral evil. Therefore, an action wrong in itself does not become good when it is chosen as a means to a noble end; and an action good in itself is vitiated whenever it is made a means to an ignoble end. (See MORALITY; CIRCUMSTANCES, MORAL.)

Morality of Consequences. While certain moderns, contrary to Kant, consider consequences to be of the essence of morality, scholastics do not teach a morality of consequences except so far as consequences known and willed are part of the nature of the moral act. Since, therefore, the true human act is the inner act of the will, whenever one intends to do a wrong external act he is at once guilty of a moral wrong, even though he may later fail to carry out his wrong intention. Fulfillment of a wrong or right intention adds nothing essential, only a quantitative goodness or badness, to the right or wrong intention elicited. Consequences, however, have this peripheral importance: bad consequences, which though unintended are foreseen as following from what is directly intended, may be reason for forbidding an act innocent in itself. The principle of double effect, based on equal immediacy of resultant good and on proportion of evil allowed, illumines difficult cases in this area (see DOUBLE EFFECT, PRINCIPLE OF).

Good as the Goal of Human Action. Even though no law enjoined it, right reason must ever direct man to choose his real good in preference to his apparent good. Man is in a situation where he must constantly choose, for he is a complex being with many needs and many corresponding goods. Conflicting desire is the universal experience. How is such conflict resolved? While an immediate rule of thumb is that necessary good (i.e., what is required to prevent moral evil here and now) is to be preferred to good that is not so required, yet the general principle of solution is that goods are to be esteemed not for their power to attract but for the place they hold in the hierarchy of being. Since every good chosen adds a peculiar human luster to the agent, the act that affords more being is, other things being equal, more to be preferred than the act that affords less being. The nobler the object chosen, the nobler will be the act.

Varieties of Good. The Greeks distinguished perfective, delectable, and useful good. Perfective good is that object of desire that when had makes a man more a man. Man's perfections are his substance with its faculties, acquired skills, and all acts that improve his substance, faculties, and skills. These are intrinsic values desirable for their own sakes. Each man's problem is to recognize what things are worthy of choice, and the order and measure in which they are to be sought.

Delectable good is the pleasure or satisfaction one experiences upon the fulfillment of a want or the exercise of a faculty. Since nature attaches pleasure to our activities in order to induce us to seek our proper perfective goods, pleasure is a natural object of desire. One ought not to be without some measure of pleasure, but pleasure sought merely for pleasure's sake is unreasonable.

Useful good is a pure means to a perfective good or pleasure. Useful good and delectable good become moral good when they are sought in subordination to perfective good and directed by reason to the last end. A man ought not to regard useful good as having intrinsic value nor make pleasure the sole end of action.

Subordination of Goods. In dealing with self, the rule is that what satisfies vegetative needs is less important than what satisfies sensitive needs; both of these in turn are subordinate to rational and spiritual needs. Moreover, each man requires a skill whose highest exercise is wisdom in discerning the true ends of life and the appropriate means of attaining them. Another needed skill is restraining within the bounds of reason appetite striving after sensitive pleasure. Still another skill is spurring on or restraining appetite that is faced with difficulty.

In dealing with things less than himself, a man should comport himself as a faithful steward of the divine bounty. Dealing with other men he must maintain the natural equality of all men and do justice by respecting their goods. Justice regulates not only the private good of each but especially the common good of all. The common good implies two things: (1) the one goal toward which the Creator draws all men; a common nature requires that men love one another by helping, never hindering, each other in their quest of this goal; (2) that sum of helps and advantages to be produced by mutual cooperation that is necessary for the individual to realize himself and his potentialities. Foremost among these helps is society in general and all particular natural and supernatural societies. Each one is to contribute his due share to the common good as determined by law of God or man; each one is entitled to a proportionate share in the social advantage.

One is to prefer the common good to his individual good except when he would be called upon to lose or endanger his supreme good. In dealing with God, one must observe the relation of complete dependence upon the source of all being. Since God is Infinite Goodness, things that directly unite man to God, such as acts of faith, hope, and charity, are better for man than those whose purpose is human perfection, such as acts of prudence, justice, temperance, and fortitude. Charity is the supreme skill uniting one most closely to God and directing all activities to the final end.

Highest Good. By observing these relations to self, to lower beings, to his fellow man, and to God, a man moves toward his final end, which is his supreme good (see GOOD, THE SUPREME). This is, first, a state of perfect happiness consisting in the unflawed exercise of his characteristically human faculties of knowledge and love, and the delight resulting therefrom. Second, since man cannot make himself happy, his happiness is in the possession of some all-satisfying object, which can be only God. For man has unlimited yearnings that only God can satisfy.

This final end is above man's nature and exceeds his natural capacities. It is wholly supernatural, for it is a sharing in the proper life of God, a knowing of God as the Triune God knows, and a loving of God as the Persons of the Most Blessed Trinity love one another. We call it the vision of God because God is known, not as He is reflected in creation, but as He is in Himself (see BEATIFIC VISION). Now in order that man may do what is proper to God he must be lifted to the divine level. This happens when sanctifying grace, a share in the divine nature, is infused into a man. The infusion of this grace in this life is the real beginning of the vision hereafter. The practical aspiration of the Christian and the sole criterion of a successful life is to die when in the possession of sanctifying grace.

No naturally good acts have a direct bearing on attainment of the beatific vision. What is required is good acts elevated to the supernatural by either actual or sanctifying grace, i.e., supernatural acts. Yet the vision is granted as a reward for a good life. Hence arises the concept of the meritorious act. Not every supernatural act bears the character of MERIT, because the agent performing it may have the support of actual but not of sanctifying grace; he may not be a friend of God. To be meritorious, then, the act must be done by one who has sanctifying grace, it must be morally good, and in some way directed to the beatific vision. Hence the highest type of moral act is the meritorious act. Meritorious acts differ among themselves accordingly as one act is more free, more intense, aimed at a nobler object, more permeated with charity, and produced by a more worthy moral agent.

Relation of Good to Value. The modern tendency is to substitute the term "value" for "good," and evolve a philosophy of value (see AXIOLOGY). Although no fresh insights into the problems of the good have come from introducing the word "value," yet "value" is a more manageable term. Thus one could not convey what is meant by a VALUE JUDGMENT (which is opposed to a judgment of fact) by calling it a "good" judgment. "Goods" has become obsolete except where it designates articles of commerce; whereas "values" now covers the whole field of human desires.

When this philosophy first arose, value usually meant a pleasant reaction to experience, a subjective state like delectable good. Later theorists, however, attribute an objective character to values, and divide them into instrumental and intrinsic values corresponding to the scholastic useful and perfective goods. They identify the chief intrinsic values as truth, beauty, talent, meaning, health, rest, play, morality, and religion. A value then represents a wide area of interest and desire, and not merely single acts or single objects of desire. But it refers to fewer things than good; for value belongs only to persons capable of appreciating and distinguishing sub-human, human, and moral values.

See Also: END; MAN, NATURAL END OF; FINAL CAUSALITY.

Bibliography: T. J. HIGGINS, Man as Man (Milwaukee 1963). T. E. HILL, Contemporary Ethical Theories (New York 1950). A. C. EWING, The Definition of the Good (New York 1947). D. VON HILDEBRAND, Christian Ethics (New York 1953) 23–166. M. V. MURRAY, Problems in Ethics (New York 1960) 72–178. J. A. OESTERLE, Ethics (Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey 1957) 101–15. H. RENARD, The Philosophy of Morality (Milwaukee 1953). M. CRONIN, The Science of Ethics, 2 v. (Dublin 1939) v. 1. J. WILD, Introduction to Realistic Philosophy (New York 1948) 39–175.

[T. J. HIGGINS]

GOOD, THE SUPREME

The positive reality of anything is considered as GOOD when it is viewed as the fulfillment of some inclination or tendency. If the inclination in question is that of each thing to its own full REALITY, the comparison of goods is identical with the comparison of beings, and the highest good is the first being, GOD. If the inclination in question is the human WILL, the comparison of goods is preference or desirability, and the highest good is the ultimate perfection to which man can aspire. The expression, “the supreme good,” is used in both of these senses.

Supreme Good in reality. The question of the supreme good in reality arises only if the whole of BEING is viewed as a single, orderly system. POSITIVISM and pragmatism generally involve a rejection of such a synoptic view. PANTHEISM and dialectical philosophies like that of HEGEL, on the other hand, insist so strongly on the unity of being that only reality as a whole or the ABSOLUTE is considered to be good.

Creator and Creatures. PLATO and ARISTOTLE both attempted in different ways to understand reality as a hierarchy of really diverse beings unified in an orderly system. Christian thinkers, working in the light of divine revelation, perfected these philosophical conceptions by developing a balanced notion of the TRANSCENDENCE and IMMANENCE of God, and by clarifying the relationship of the Creator and provident Lord to His creatures.

God has in Himself the fullness of being that includes all perfections. He creates freely out of pure generosity, merely as a self-expression of His own perfection, and He directs all things to their own full reality, which is an imitation of His infinite perfection. Thus God is good in Himself, and in comparison with creatures He is the supreme good, for all created goods preexist in Him in a perfect way, and the fulfillment of every creature is a likeness of His fullness. (See PERFECTION, ONTOLOGICAL.)

Hierarchy of Goods. Two implications of this understanding of the supreme good should be noted. First, because God is the supreme good in virtue of His fullness of being, the dualism of MANICHAISM, which posits a supreme evil opposed to and struggling with the supreme good, is excluded. Second, because God exists in His own uniquely perfect way and gives His creatures a way of being of their own, created beings have a real goodness that belongs to them in themselves. Hence a real hierarchy of goods exists, for each creature has a genuine goodness of a certain degree, while God has the fullness of perfection without measure.

Among created things, the highest good belongs to the order of creation as a whole, for this includes every created perfection. Insofar as it relates creatures to God in a special way, each supernatural gift of God is a higher good than every natural perfection. Comparing the kinds of created beings with one another, we consider that angels and men, who have intelligence and freedom, surpass other creatures in worth and dignity, for only intellectual beings can extend their own perfection in order to encompass in some way the full range of reality.

Supreme good for man. In the history of moral thought, the first question in most theories has concerned the supreme good for man. Since KANT, positions on this question have divided between eudaemonistic and deontological theories—i.e., those that put the highest human perfection in satisfaction and those that put it in the fulfillment of moral obligation (see EUDAEMONISM; DEONTOLOGISM). For Kant, the highest good combines virtue and happiness, but morally good action is determined solely by moral law, not by a desire for the good.

Many ancient philosophical theories—e.g., EPICUREANISM and STOICISM—are characterized chiefly by their theories of the supreme good for man. The best classical theories, those of Plato and Aristotle, transcend the modern distinction between satisfaction and morality by uniting both in a view of the end of man. Christian thought, with its conception of HEAVEN, transcends this antimony even more perfectly.

According to Catholic faith, the highest good for man is that of being admitted by divine GRACE to a share in God’s own inner life. The fullness of this supernatural life is variously called beatitude, eternal life, the kingdom of God, and heavenly glory.

See Also: MAN, NATURAL END OF; BEATIFIC VISION; GOD; CREATION; PARTICIPATION; GOOD.

Bibliography: G. P. KLUBERTANZ and M. R. HOLLOWAY, Being and God (New York 1963) 171–183, 202–208, 334–336. J. MOUROUX, The Meaning of Man (New York 1948). J. BUCKLEY, Man's Last End (St. Louis 1949). THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 1a, 5–6; 1a2ae, 1–5; C. gent 1.37–41; 2.45; 3.1–63.

[G. G. GRISEZ]

GOOD FRIDAY

From earliest times this has been a day given over to the remembrance of the Crucifixion of Our Lord. The official, somewhat redundant name for Good Friday since 1955 is “Friday of the Passion and Death of the Lord”; before then it was “Friday of Preparation [for the Pasch].” This name was derived from Jewish usage. In the third century Good Friday was known as the Pasch of the Crucifixion as Easter was the Pasch of the Resurrection; the Eastern Churches have retained this use up to the present time. St. Ambrose called it “Day of Bitterness.”

As it now stands in the Roman rite, the liturgical celebration of Good Friday differs little from what it has been for centuries. The dominant theme of the whole Good Friday liturgy is the mystery of the cross and its place in the overall paschal mystery of Redemption.

The solemn evening liturgical action consists of three distinct parts: (1) the service of readings and prayers, (2) the veneration of the cross, and (3) the Communion service. Until the late Middle Ages the aliturgical synaxis was held in the afternoon, but by the sixteenth century it had been pushed back into the morning hours. The decree of Pius XII in 1955 restored the earlier custom, allowing the service to begin between 3 P.M. and 8 P.M.

Service of Readings and Prayers. On this one day of the year, the Roman Church has retained the ancient custom of having only a service of reading and prayer on the stationary days. Not only that, the first part of the Good Friday service has preserved many features of the first part of the early Roman daily eucharistic liturgy.

The first part of the service (except for the Prayers of the People) recalls the Passion of Our Lord. The reading service concludes with the Prayers of the People according to the ancient Roman solemn collect form. Certain significant changes were made in this Service of the Word by Pius XII's Holy Week Ordinal. The celebrant remains at the bench for everything except the Solemn Prayers; he sits and listens to the Lessons and joins in the chants. The people kneel for a short time before he says the Collects, and so forth.

Veneration of the Cross. When the Solemn Prayers of the People are over, the deacon brings from the sacristy a large veiled crucifix. The celebrant receives it from him and unveils it in the sight of the people singing the Ecce lignum crucis, inviting all to contemplate the mystery of the cross and the world's salvation. All venerate the sacred sign of our Redemption. After this general adoration of the cross, three times repeated, an individual veneration is made by all present.

While this is going on, the Reproaches or IMPROPERIA are sung, then other antiphons and the splendid hymn of “Venantius Fortunatus,” Pange lingua, which sings of the triumph of the cross and the victory of Christ. The rite concludes with Crucem tuam, borrowed from Byzantine sources.

The veneration of the cross, like other Holy Week rites, had its beginning in Jerusalem, where at first it was a popular devotion in the true sense of the term. The Spanish pilgrim nun Egeria (see under EGERIA, ITINERARIUM OF) tells us that in Jerusalem toward the end of the fourth century all the faithful of the city went out to Golgotha on Good Friday morning. There the bishop was seated on his chair surrounded by the deacons while a table covered with a white linen cloth was placed before him, and on that the relic of the true cross. He held the ends of the cross in his hands, while the deacons stood guard around the table. Then the faithful and the catechumens filed past and venerated the cross. All this was done in complete silence; no hymns or prayers accompanied the action [Ethérie, Journal de Voyage, ed. Hélène Pétré (Sources Chrétiennes 21; Paris 1948) 37.1–3].

In time other churches imitated the pious custom of the Church of Jerusalem, especially those fortunate enough to possess relics of the true cross. Those who did not use a wooden cross instead. It is important to remember that the rite of Veneration of the Cross was originally directed to the true cross itself.

We do not know for certain when this practice spread to Rome, but it must have been sometime about the middle of the seventh century, probably under Byzantine influence. The first description of the veneration as an element in the Good Friday services in Rome occurs in the eighth-century Roman Ordinal 23 (12–17; M. Andrieu, Les 'Ordines Romani' du haut moyen-âge, 5 v. [Louvain 1931–61] 3:270–271).

At two o'clock in the afternoon, the pope and the clergy went in procession from St. John Lateran to the nearby basilica of Holy Cross, carrying the relic of the cross in a silver casket, the pope walking barefoot before it, carrying a smoking censer. During the procession Psalm 118 was sung with Ecce lignum as a refrain.

When they arrived at Holy Cross, the stational church for Good Friday, they placed the relic upon the altar, where it remained while the pope and the clergy venerated it. The subdeacons then carried the relic to the people. While the adoration by the people was in progress, the synaxis began. Like the original practice of the Church of Jerusalem, the Roman veneration of the cross was really a private devotion.

Only gradually were psalms, hymns, and antiphons introduced to accompany the veneration. Most of the elements of the modern rite appeared for the first time in the tenth-century Romano-Germanic Pontifical of Mainz. During the twelfth century the showing of the cross to the people, with the Ecce lignum, was added; not long after that this showing took the threefold progressive form we know today. The evolution of the rite was completed in the fourteenth century by the change of place and the progressive raising of the voice during the singing of the Ecce lignum.

Communion Service. The last part of the Good Friday action is the Communion service. Historically, as a sign of mourning there was no Eucharistic celebration of any kind throughout the ancient Church on Good Friday, nor did anyone even receive Communion. Yet it would seem that on the day that recalled Our Lord's Passion, Christians would want to receive communion. And indeed it appears that in the course of time the consciousness of its fitness did bring about the desire to receive Communion on this day. Nevertheless there is no mention of Communion in the Roman rite before the eighth century; even then it appears to have been a custom recently introduced in the environs of Rome. Roman Ordinal 23 (21–22; Andrieu, 3:272) says that while neither the pope nor the clergy received Communion, the people could do so if they wished; if they did not go at Holy Cross they might go at any of the other "titles" in the city. Evidently then while Communion had no official place in the papal service, it was allowed to people in their parish churches. They were free to receive or not. But by the end of that same century, the Gelasian Sacramentary states simply, "all communicate" [ed. H. A. Wilson (Oxford 1894) 77], which seems to indicate that it was expected. Later the thirteenth-century Papal Pontifical says "only the Pontiff communicates" (43, 18; Andrieu, Le Pontifical Romain au moyen-âge, 4 v. [Rome 1938–41] 2:469). The Communion of the faithful had become increasingly rare by the thirteenth century. So at first they just stayed away and finally were forbidden to go at all. This prohibition was repeated several times during the seventeenth century, showing that at least in some places people continued to receive.

During the Middle Ages the earlier Communion service, much like that of today, was transformed under Gallican influence into the Mass of the Presanctified, which was obviously designed to give the service the appearance of a real Mass. Pius XII's Holy Week Ordinal suppressed this and restored the original Communion service with the significant difference that Communion is not distributed in silence as it once was, but accompanied by singing. Here we see the influence of the liturgical revival, which has tried to bring into relief the fact that the Eucharist is a communal Sacrament and so should be received in a communal setting.

Bibliography: W. J. O'SHEA, The Meaning of Holy Week (Collegeville, Minn. 1958). J. GAILLARD, Holy Week and Easter, tr. W. BUSCH (Collegeville, Minn. 1954). L. BOUYER, The Paschal Mystery: Meditations on the Last Three Days of Holy Week, tr. M. BENOIT (Chicago 1950). A. LÖHR, The Great Week, tr. D. T. H. BRIDGEHOUSE (Westminster, Md. 1958). H. A. SCHMIDT, Hebdomada Sancta, 2 v. (Rome 1956–57). T. J. TALLEY, The Origins of the Liturgical Year (Collegeville, Minn. 1991). A. J. MARTIMORT, ed., The Church at Prayer IV: The Liturgy and Time (Collegeville, Minn. 1986); A. NOCENT, The Liturgical Year (Collegeville, Minn. 1977) v. 1. Advent, Christmas, Epiphany.—v. 2. Lent.—v. 3. The Paschal Triduum, the Easter Season.—v. 4. Sundays nine to thirty-four in ordinary time. J. M. PIERCE, "Holy Week and Easter in the Middle Ages," in Passover and Easter: Origin and History to Modern Times, eds. P. F. BRADSHAW and L. A. HOFFMAN (Notre Dame, Ind. 1999) 161–185. A. ADAM, The Liturgical Year: Its History and Its Meaning after the Reform of the Liturgy (New York 1981).

[W. J. O'SHEA/EDS.]

GOOD SHEPHERD

One of the oldest and most favored subjects of early Christian art is the Good Shepherd. It appears among the paintings of the catacombs of Rome, Naples, Sardinia, and Sicily and on sarcophagi of the East and West. However, it is by no means limited to the sepulchral field. As early as 210, Tertullian (De pud. 7.1; 10.12) spoke of chalices decorated with the picture of the Good Shepherd, and the number of lamps showing the same is considerable. It is found on ancient rings and gems, on glasses, and on medals. Among the remains of early Christian sculpture, statuettes of the Good Shepherd are the most beautiful pieces, such as the famous marble statuette now in the Lateran Museum in Rome. The picture of the Good Shepherd appeared at an early time among the paintings of liturgical buildings. Thus the frescoes of the baptismal chapel on the rear wall above the font at DURA-EUROPOS (Before 256) depict the Good Shepherd standing behind his flock, carrying a huge ram. About a century and a half later, four mosaics decorating the interior of the baptistery of S. Giovanni in Fonte (Naples) are representations of the Good Shepherd.

Though the picture of the Good Shepherd carrying the lamb on his shoulders is the most frequent type, He is depicted from the beginning in a great variety of scenes. The paintings of the catacombs display the Good Shepherd usually as a young and beardless man wearing a tunic, a shoulder cape, and high stockings—sometimes seated among his flock, sometimes with the shepherd's flute, sometimes protecting his lambs from aggression, and sometimes carrying a milk pail. But the favorite picture is that of the Good Shepherd with the animal on his shoulders. This figure has a long pre-Christian tradition. In early Christian art the Good Shepherd illustrates the Gospel parable of the lost sheep carried back to the fold (Lk 15.3–7; Jn 10.1–18) in a time-honored type.

Archeologists have drawn attention to many surviving statuettes of Hermes Criophoros, the protector of flocks, who carried a ram on his shoulders; and the representation of this subject is found not only in Greco-Roman times, but much earlier. In Syria and Assyria, reliefs have been discovered from the 8th and 10th centuries B.C. that portray a man bearing a gazelle on his shoulders. These older figures represent worshipers bringing animals for sacrifice. At least by the time of the ram-bearing Hermes of Greece, and perhaps even earlier, the thought of the Good Shepherd was introduced as a symbol of philanthropia, the great civil virtue. This explains the appearance of the figure of a good shepherd on pagan sarcophagi. In Christian art the type was conceived anew and filled with Christian meaning. The good shepherd became Christ Himself, especially as the Savior of the soul and of mankind.

Bibliography: J. QUASTEN, Heilige Überlieferung: Festschrift Ildefons Herwegen, ed. O. CASEL (Münster 1938) 51–58, Logos theology; Pisciculi: Festschrift Franz Joseph Dölger (AntChr Suppl 1; 1939) 220–244, baptismal liturgy; “The Waters of Refreshment,” The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 1 (1939) 325–332; Miscellanea Giovanni Mercati, 6 v. (Rome 1946) 1:373–406, Liturgy of the Dead; Mediaeval Studies 9 (1947) 1–18, Dura–Europos. A. PARROT, Mélanges Syriens offerts à R. Dussaud, v.1 (Paris 1939) 171–182. P. BRUUN, Acta Instituti Romani Finlandiae 1.2 (1963) 146–149.

[J. QUASTEN]

GOOD SHEPHERD, SISTERS OF OUR LADY OF CHARITY OF THE

The Religious of Our Lady of Charity of the Good Shepherd (RGS, Official Catholic Directory #1830), popularly known as Sisters of the Good Shepherd, traces its origin to a group of women organized by (St.) John EUDES at Caen, France, in 1641 to reach out to wayward women and girls. This institute became known as Religious of Our Lady of Charity of the Refuge. Seven Houses of Refuge, each an autonomous community, had been established but were dispersed at the time of the French Revolution. The Refuge at Tours was struggling to reestablish itself when Rose-Virginie Pelletier entered the community in 1814. As Sister Maria Euphrasia, she revitalized the community when she became its superior at the age of 29 (see PELLETIER, MARIA EUPHRASIA, ST.). In 1829 she established a flourishing convent at Angers, followed by four additional foundations within five years. So successful was Mother Euphrasia's work among her charges that a complete transformation of life was effected for many of the girls. For some of these young women who wished to devote themselves to a life of prayer and penance, Mother Euphrasia established the religious community of Sisters Magdalens, which she regarded as the crown of her work.

Through her experience Mother Euphrasia recognized that a central motherhouse and novitiate would ensure unity in religious spirit and a sharing of resources and personnel. Her plans met with bitter opposition because some felt that her efforts were motivated by personal ambition. In 1835 Gregory XVI granted permission for a unified administration; and the convents of Angers, Grenoble, Poitiers, and Metz were united under the title of Sisters of Our Lady of Charity of the Good Shepherd. This new development, alive with the spirit of St. John Eudes and the zeal of Mother Euphrasia, enjoyed a phenomenal growth. In Mother Euphrasia's own lifetime, 110 foundations were made. In December 1842, five sisters, each of a different nationality, arrived from Angers to make the first American foundation at Louisville, Kentucky. Within 25 years convents were established at St. Louis, Missouri; Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; Cincinnati and Columbus, Ohio; New York and Brooklyn, New York; New Orleans, Louisiana; Chicago, Illinois; Baltimore, Maryland; Boston, Massachusetts; and St. Paul, Minnesota.

The apostolate of the Sisters of the Good Shepherd is rooted in the appreciation of the dignity and worth of each individual. Mother Euphrasia taught each of her sisters how to be a true mother to the girls in her charge. Included in the heritage of the foundress is detailed advice regarding the approach to girls of varied emotional needs, in some ways anticipating modern psychotherapeutic techniques. For their specialized work, the sisters are trained as social workers, group mothers, psychologists, guidance counselors, teachers, recreation leaders, nurses, chaplains, and youth ministers.

Bibliography: B. STASIEWSKI, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:389. G. BERNOVILLE, Saint Mary Euphrasia Pelletier: Foundress of the Good Shepherd Sisters (Westminster, Maryland 1959).

[M. ANDREOLI/EDS.]

GOOD SHEPHERD SISTERS OF QUEBEC

A congregation whose official title is Sisters, Servants of the Immaculate Heart of Mary (SCIM, Official Catholic Directory #3550). They were founded in Quebec, Canada, in 1850 by Genevieve Fitzbach Roy, who became first superior as Mother Mary of the Sacred Heart. The U.S. province with headquarters in Saco, Maine, was established in 1933, but the sisters have been in New England since 1882. Besides the personal sanctification of its members by the faithful observance of the three vows of religion, the chief work of the institute is the rehabilitation of wayward girls and the Christian education of youth. In the United States, the sisters work in parishes, schools, hospitals, homes for the aged, homes for unmarried mothers and adoption agencies. Their ministries include catechesis, youth ministries, counseling, retreat and spiritual direction.

Bibliography: ST. B. UPHAM, Years of Shepherding (Quebec 1950).

[M. G. LIRETTE/EDS.]

GOOD WORKS

Human acts, either internal or external, that are in conformity with the norms of morality are good works. This article discusses the nature of such good works and certain doctrinal questions about the relation of GRACE to these works.

Nature of Good Works. In some of his actions man acts by necessity. Thus sensation, respiration, and similar acts proceed indeed from man but not in his distinctively human mode of conduct. Other actions, properly called HUMAN ACTS, come from him precisely as he is intelligent and capable of free choice. These actions are expressions of his spiritual nature and are also called moral acts, for such deliberate choices involve a relationship to the norms of morality. Acts that conform to the norms of morality are called good; those that do not are evil. Theologians dispute whether INDIFFERENT ACTS form a distinct category of morality. Such human, or moral, acts include purely interior acts, as a particular act of choice, and external actions, as giving alms.

A standard, or rule, by which the goodness or evilness of an act is measured is called a norm of morality. Besides the immediate, subjective norm—the particular act of moral judgment called CONSCIENCE—there are objective standards of morality. The proximate, or created, norm is described in various ways by different Catholic theologians: for St. Thomas Aquinas it is right reason (Summa theologiae, 1a2ae, 19.3), for F. Suárez it is human nature. This norm is subject to a higher standard: the eternal law, which is the ordering by divine wisdom of all things to their goal. Aquinas explains the relation of the two norms: “Now it is from the eternal law, which is divine reason, that human reason is the rule of the human will, that is, that from which its goodness is measured” (Summa theologiae, 1a2ae, 19.4).

Various aspects of the human act must be examined in determining its morality: its object, the circumstances in which it is done, and its purpose, or motive. For an act to be morally good, all three aspects must conform to the norms of morality. Catholic theology recognizes that the most basic of these moral determinants is the object of the act, that to which the act by its nature is ordered. In recent years new emphasis was given to this recognition by the Holy See’s condemnation of the theory of morality known as ethical existentialism or situational ethics. This theory tends to ignore objective moral standards and judge the moral act purely in terms of its individual circumstances [see J. C. Ford and G. A. Kelly, Contemporary Moral Theology, v.1 (Westminster, Md. 1958) 104–140].

Relation of Grace to Good Works. Pelagianism (5th century) and the teaching of the reformers (16th century) occasioned sharp controversies concerning the relationship of grace to good works. Three questions need to be answered: (1) Can any good works be done without grace? (2) Is grace necessary for every SALUTARY ACT (work)? (3) Are the good works of one already justified meritorious of SALVATION? This discussion is limited to the case of subjects capable of human acts and does not treat the question of the salvation of infants or others incapable of moral acts.

The answer to the first of these questions involves the distinction between natural and SUPERNATURAL acts. The validity of this distinction, common to Catholic theologians, is affirmed by the condemnation [H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer (32d ed. Freiburg 1963) 1934, 1961] of the doctrine of Michel de Bay—known commonly by the Latin form of his name, BAIUS. Man, even in a state of fallen nature, can do some naturally good works, although he cannot do all natural good works collectively taken. At least part of this teaching may be restated thus: Not every act of a sinner is a sin. The reason advanced by theologians for the sinner being able to do some, but not all, naturally good works is that man's nature is not totally corrupted by sin, even though his inclination to virtue is weakened (cf. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 85.1–2; 109.2). St. Paul teaches that Gentiles did good works (Rom 2.14), and St. Augustine notes that sinners do some good works even though these do not lead to eternal salvation [Spir. et litt. 28.48; Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum (Vienna 1866–) 60:203]. Exaggerated notions about the necessity of grace for every ethically good work have been rejected by the Church in the condemnation of the doctrine of Hus (H. Denzinger, ibid., 1216), Luther (H. Denzinger, ibid., 1481–82, 1486), Baius (H. Denzinger, ibid., 1927–28, 1930, 1937), the Jansenists (H. Denzinger, ibid., 2308, 2311), and Quesnel (H. Denzinger, ibid., 2401, 2438).

The second question is concerned with the necessity of grace for salutary works, that is, those that are ordered in some way to supernatural happiness, or salvation. The impossibility of any supernaturally good work without the assistance of grace is clearly part of Catholic doctrine. For example, Christ explicitly affirms dependence on Himself (Jn 15.5), and St. Paul reminds his readers of their dependence on divine assistance (Phil 2.13; 2 Cor 3.5). St. Augustine, faithful witness to tradition, writes: “We can do nothing toward the good works of piety without Him [God] either working that we will or working with us when we will” [Grat. et lib. arb. 17.33; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 44:901]. In particular the Church teaches the necessity of actual grace for the beginning of justification. The good acts that dispose for habitual, or sanctifying, grace are the result in men of actual grace. See, for example, the doctrine of the Second Council of Orange (H. Denzinger, ibid., 375–377) and the Council of Trent (H. Denzinger, ibid., 1525, 1553, 1559).

The third question concerns the good works done after JUSTIFICATION. This particular problem received great attention because of Luther's assertion that man is saved by faith alone (sola fide) and that good works contribute nothing to salvation. In part this position represents a violent reaction to the writings of some theologians who tended toward Semi-Pelagianism. More basic, perhaps, is the Lutheran idea of justification, which denies any intrinsic transformation of man by God's justifying grace. Thus Luther would deny that man, when justified, is capable of performing works truly proportioned to his supernatural DESTINY.

Catholic theology, on the other hand, stresses the fact that the meritorious works are truly proportioned to man's supernatural goal but that they are possible only as a result of grace (see MERIT). They presuppose an ELEVATION and perfection of man and his powers through habitual grace and the infused virtues. Thus, justification intrinsically modifies man, changing him from a sinner to one who is holy (i.e., one who loves God above all). Divine assistance (i.e., actual grace) is also required for the actual performance of meritorious works. The Council of Trent sets forth the doctrine of justification in a prologue, 16 chapters, and 33 canons (H. Denzinger, ibid., 1520–83). Canons 26 and 32 (H. Denzinger, ibid., 1576, 1582) especially regard meritorious action.

See Also: IMPUTATION OF JUSTICE AND MERIT; GRACE, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 18–21, 109–114. J. RIVIÈRE, “Justification,” Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 8.2:2164–92; “Mérite,” Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 10.1:574–785. L. MARCHAL, “Moralité de l'acte humain,” Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 10.2:2459–72. C. JOURNET, The Meaning of Grace, tr. A. V. LITLEDAL (New York 1960). “Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification,” Origins 28:8 (1998): 120–127.

[J. HENNESSEY]

GOODIER, ALBAN

Archbishop and spiritual writer; b. Great Harwood, Lancashire, England, April 14, 1869; d. St. Scholastica's Abbey, Teignmouth, March 13, 1939. He was educated at Stonyhurst, joined the Society of Jesus in 1887, was ordained in 1903, and made his solemn profession in 1906. In 1915, when superior of the Jesuit students in London, he was called to face the wartime crisis caused at the Jesuit Bombay University by the withdrawal of the entire professorial staff of German Jesuits. His tact in management soon established him as fellow and syndic of the university and a justice of peace. Appointed archbishop of Bombay in 1919, he was consecrated in Westminster Cathedral and took possession of his see Jan. 27, 1920. The administration of the Poona Diocese was added to his responsibilities in 1924. In Bombay, he was much loved by the people for his practical charities. However, the thorny politico-religious situation weighed heavily upon his sensitive nature, and on his quinquennial visit ad limina, he reported the facts to Pius XI. Advised not to return, he resigned Sept. 8, 1926, becoming titular archbishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia. After acting as auxiliary in London for Cardinal Bourne, he finally made St. Scholastica's Abbey his headquarters, and devoted himself to writing and to the giving of retreats, lectures, and sermons. His scholarly bent, simplicity, and deep piety are revealed in his writings, which have exercised a profound influence on many. Among his better-known works are: The Public Life of Our Lord Jesus Christ (1931); The Passion and Death of Our Lord Jesus Christ (1933); and Introduction to the Study of Ascetical and Mystical Theology (1939).

Bibliography: E. GRAF, "The Archbishop of Hierapolis," Dublin Review 205 (1939) 1–15. H. KEAN, "Alban Goodier (1869–1939)," Month 173 (1939) 408–415.

[W. PEERS-SMITH]

GOODMAN, GODFREY

Protestant bishop of Gloucester, only bishop of an English see since the Reformation reputed to have died in the Roman Catholic Church; b. Ruthin, Denbighshire, March 10, 1583; d. Westminster, Jan. 19, 1656. He was born of wealthy parents, Godfrey Goodman and his second wife, Jane Cruyton, and was educated at Westminster School (1592–99), under the care of his uncle Gabriel, who was dean. Godfrey took the B.A. (1604) and M.A. (1607) degrees at Trinity College, Cambridge. From 1606 to 1620 he was rector of a country parish at Stapleford Abbots in Essex. He held a number of livings in Berkshire, Gloucester, and Wales. An excellent preacher, writer, and stylistic disciple of Lancelot Andrewes, Goodman first achieved notice at court with the publication of The Fall of Man (1616). Appointed a canon of Windsor in 1617, he quickly rose in preferments to dean of Rochester (1621), then bishop of Gloucester (1625). His appointment to the bishopric through the influence of George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, rather than by the nomination of William LAUD, then bishop of St. David's, later archbishop of Canterbury, earned him Laud's lifelong enmity. A sermon Goodman delivered before the King in 1626 "pressed so hard upon the point of the Real Presence, that he was supposed to trench too near the borders of Popery" (Peter Heylin, Cyprianus Anglicus). Although censured in convocation by Laud for the sermon, Goodman continued in good standing in the House of Lords. In 1628, the Puritan element in Commons (William Prynne, Henry Burton, and John Bastwick) petitioned against his Romanism. Lucius Cary, Viscount Falkland, undoubtedly referred chiefly to Goodman in his speech against bishops in the Long Parliament some years later, when he spoke of some who have "found a way to reconcile the opinions of Rome to the preferments of England, and to be so absolutely, directly, and cordially Papist, that it is all £1,500 a year can do to keep them from confessing it." Only in his will did Goodman openly confess his spiritual allegiance to Rome.

The date of his conversion is not known, although it is thought to be as early as 1636, through his longtime friend the Jesuit William Claybrooke (alias Hanmer). In that same year, Gregorio PANZANI, papal emissary to England, noted Goodman's great desire for reunion with the Church of Rome. In convocation in 1640, Goodman refused to sign, or accept, canons requiring greater efforts in the detection and punishment of Catholics. He was deprived of his see by Laud, and committed to the Gate-House, where he was kept until he subscribed to the canons three months later. Ironically, Goodman was then impeached, committed to the Tower, and fined £2,000 by the House of Commons for his share in framing the same canons, which was considered an illegal infringement on Parliamentary rights. Goodman joined in the protest of the bishops in the House of Lords in December 1641, and was again committed to the Tower on a charge of high treason. While he was imprisoned, his property at Gloucester was plundered, and he was ejected from his canonry and bishopric. On regaining his freedom, Goodman retired to the home of a Catholic, Mrs. Silbylla Agliomy, at Westminster, where he died, attended by his friend and confessor, the Franciscan Christopher Davenport. Though wanting in moral courage, Goodman was noted for kindness, tolerance, and great charity. A noted historian, he wrote The Court of King James the First, which is still of considerable historical value.

Bibliography: G. GOODMAN, The Court of King James the First, ed. J. S. BREWER, 2 v. (London 1839). G. I. SODEN, Godfrey Goodman, Bishop of Gloucester, 1583–1656 (London 1953), bibliog. S. LEE, The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900), 8:131–134. J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time (London and New York, 1885–1902), 2:528–530, some errors.

[J. O. HANLON]

GOOSSENS, PIERRE LAMBERT

Archbishop of Mechelen, organizer of Catholic education in Belgium; b. Perck, Belgium, July 17, 1827; d. Mechelen, Jan. 2, 1906. From his family, which was in comfortable circumstances, he inherited distinguished manners. After a solid humanistic training, and his ordination (Dec. 25, 1850), he acted as professor (1851) and pastor at St. Rombaut in Mechelen, where he demonstrated great pastoral zeal and administrative ability. He became secretary to the archbishop of Mechelen (1856), vicar-general (1878), bishop of Namur (1883), archbishop of Mechelen (24 March 1884), and cardinal (1889).

During the politicoreligious difficulties in Belgium caused by the pressures of secular liberalism, and the disagreement between liberal and ultramontane Catholics, he was entrusted on different occasions with conciliatory missions by the government and the Holy See. As archbishop he upheld the Catholic party. He maintained unity by taking inspiration, although only after some delay, from Leo XIII's RERUM NOVARUM; and by keeping peace between conservatives and democrats. He promoted social works and favored the political advancement of the working class. Convinced, however, of the necessity of having the bourgeoisie in the directing role, he created for their benefit ten establishments for instruction in the humanities. Penetrated as he was with a sense of authority, he slowed the renewal of THOMISM and the personal efforts of Mercier.

Bibliography: J. MUYLDERMANS, Zijn Eminentie Kardinaal Goossens (Mechlin 1922). P. PIRRI, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957), 2 4:1055.

[A. SIMON]

GORDIAN AND EPIMACHUS, SS.

Martyrs; d. c. 362 and 250, respectively. The cult of Gordian and Epimachus has been well attested in Western Christendom since the sixth century; the Roman MARTYROLOGY and most of the other martyrologies commemorate them on May 10. There is no doubt about their historic existence and early cult, but their legends are fictitious and even their identity is uncertain. Gordian is known to have been a young boy, but legend made him a judge in Rome who embraced Christianity during the reign of JULIAN THE APOSTATE and was decapitated in 362. He was buried in the tomb of St. Epimachus.

Epimachus may have been an Alexandrian martyr thrown into a lime kiln in 250 whose remains were subsequently translated to Rome, or a Roman martyr of the same name of whom nothing is known. Another unsubstantiated legend states that the relics of Gordian and Epimachus were subsequently translated by Bl. HILDEGARD OF KEMPTEN, Charlemagne's wife, to the Abbey of Kempten in Bavaria.

Feast: May 10.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum, May 2:549–553. E. JOSI, Revista de archeologia cristiana 16 (1939) 21–37, 42–47; 17 (1940) 31–35. W. HOTZELT, Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumskunde und für Kirchengeschichte 46 (1938) 1–17.

[J. BRÜCKMANN]

GORDON RIOTS

The Gordon Riots occurred in June 1780, beginning as an anti-Catholic demonstration and ending in mob violence that terrorized London for ten days. The proximate excuse was the first Catholic Relief Act of June 1778, a moderate measure that freed priests from the threat of imprisonment and enabled Catholics to take an oath of loyalty to the Crown. Catholics were apprehensive of the effect of the Act on extreme Protestants, but at first all seemed to pass quietly. When it was proposed in the following year to apply the Act to Scotland, these fears were justified. The rioting that broke out in Edinburgh and Glasgow was suppressed with difficulty and caused the Scottish Act to be withdrawn. Opposition to the English Act was stimulated by this Scottish success. A Protestant association was formed in London in February 1779 led by Lord George Gordon, 27-year-old Member of Parliament, whose eccentric behavior often amused his fellow members and indicated a mental unbalance verging on derangement. The association was supported by many middle-class nonconformists who had no thoughts of violence, including John Wesley, who wrote a pamphlet in its support.

It was decided to draw up a petition and present it to Parliament in the most public manner. Supporters gathered in St. George's Fields, Southwark (where the Catholic cathedral now stands) on Friday, June 2, 1780. The petition, said to contain 120,000 signatures, was taken in procession to Westminster. The participants in the march, variously estimated from 20,000 to 50,000, were at first orderly, but by the time they reached the Palace yard they had been joined by ruffians who turned the march into a mob, assaulting Peers and Commoners as they entered the Houses of Parliament. Gordon presented the petition in the Commons, but his hysterical rushing back and forth to report to the mob incited it to violence and alienated his more respectable supporters who returned to their homes. While a troop of guards cleared the approaches of the besieged Parliament, detachments of the mob looted and burned the Catholic chapels in Golden Square, Lincoln's Inn Fields, and Moorfields. The Lord Mayor, the Council of the City of London, and the magistrates took no serious steps to quell the rioting. Many refused to act, as they sympathized with the "No-popery" cry. Some of the mob sought out 89-year-old Bp. Richard CHALLONER, Vicar Apostolic, but he was taken to a friend's house in Finchley.

The rioting, which was less violent on Saturday and Sunday, increased during the next two days, making it clear that by now anti-Catholic feeling was being replaced by mob hooliganism. Newgate prison as well as the houses of magistrates and of unpopular public figures were burned. Even Lambeth Palace was threatened. Lord Stormont, the Secretary of State, had urged from the beginning that the Lord Mayor and the military authorities take firm action, but his repeated appeals resulted in the ineffective use of inadequate forces. The military believed they could act only at the request of a magistrate.

Caricature depicting soldiers marching over victims in the Gordon Riots, 1787. (©Corbis)

At a privy council on Wednesday, June 7, this idea was corrected and King George III gave orders that the utmost vigor be used to restore peace. Troops were at once moved to London, and that night they drove off an attack on the Bank of England, but not before the three prisons—the King’s Bench, the Clink, and the Fleet—had been set in flames. A distillery in Holborn was also set on fire, resulting in an orgy of drunkenness. Meanwhile, now that private property was endangered, the citizens organized patrols for their own protection. On Thursday the troops took effective control and the worst was over. The official number of those killed or dead of injuries was 285, certainly an underestimate. Fifty-nine prisoners were sentenced to death, of whom 21 were hanged.

Lord George Gordon was sent to the Tower on June 9, brought to trial on Feb. 5, 1781, and acquitted of the charge of treason, a verdict endorsed by modern legal opinion. He was later converted to Judaism and died in the rebuilt Newgate in 1793 during imprisonment for libel. Though the riots were confined generally to London, there were minor outbreaks in Hull and Bath, where Catholic chapels were burned. The Common Council of the City of London petitioned Parliament without success to repeal the Relief Act. The riots made Catholics more circumspect than ever in the exercise of their religion, and a decade was to pass before another modest installment of relief from penal legislation was granted.

Bibliography: T. HOLCROFT, A Plain and Succinct Narrative of the Late Riots (2d ed. London 1780). W. MAWHOOD, The Mawhood Diary (London 1956). T. R. HOWELL, ed., A Complete Collection of State Trials and Proceedings for High Treason and Other Misdemeanours 22 (London 1814) 485–652. J. P. DE CASTRO, The Gordon Riots (London 1926). The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900; repr. with corrections, 21 v., 1908–09, 1921–22, 1938) 8:197. C. HIBBERT, King Mob (London 1958). R. WATSON, The Life Of Lord George Gordon (London 1795). P. COLSON, The Strange History of Lord George Gordon (London 1937).

[E. E. REYNOLDS]

GORE, CHARLES

Anglican bishop, theologian; b. Wimbledon, Surrey, England, Jan. 23, 1853; d. London, Jan. 17, 1932. Of aristocratic descent, Gore was educated at Harrow and at Balliol College, Oxford (1870–75). After ordination (1878) he served as a curate in various parishes until he became vice principal of Cuddesdon Theological College (1880). As warden of Pusey House at Oxford (1884–93), he made a notable impact on the undergraduates, took an interest in social questions, and was active in the Christian Social Union. His visit to the Oxford Mission in Calcutta and his resultant experience of India profoundly influenced his life and spirituality. He founded at Oxford in 1892 an Anglican religious order, the Community of the Resurrection (which moved later to Mirfield, Yorkshire), and acted as its superior until 1901. In 1894 he became a canon of Westminster, where his preaching drew large crowds. Despite protests of conservative churchmen, he was named bishop of Worcester (1902). After a division of his diocese, he became the first bishop of Birmingham (1905). He was bishop of Oxford from 1911 until 1919, when he resigned to become dean of theology at Kings College, London. Gore's Anglo-Catholicism was tinged with a degree of Modernism that distressed conservatives such as Henry Parry Liddon. They were disturbed especially by Gore's views on the limitation and growth of Our Lord's human knowledge (kenotism). Gore was strongly anti-Roman; indeed his rigidity as episcopal visitor of the Anglican Benedictine community at Caldey contributed to their submission to the Holy See in 1913. Abp. Randall DAVIDSON sent him to the MALINES CONVERSATIONS to exert a moderating influence on the more extreme ANGLO-CATHOLICS there. Gore also opposed the Lambeth Conference of bishops in their plans for reunion with the church of South India and on contraception. Gore edited LUX MUNDI (1889) and A New Commentary on Holy Scripture (1928), both expressive of a somewhat Modernist viewpoint. Among his own writings, the most notable are Roman Catholic Claims (1888), The Ministry of the Christian Church (1888, new ed. 1919), The Incarnation of the Son of God (1891), The Body of Christ (1901), and The Reconstruction of Belief (1926).

Bibliography: G. L. PRESTIGE, Life of Charles Gore (London 1935). A. DUNELM and A. T. P. WILLIAMS, Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1931–40) 349–353. F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 571–572.

[W. HANNAH]

Charles Gore. (©CORBIS/Bettman)

GORETTI, MARIA, ST.

Martyr; b. Corinaldo (Ancona), Italy, Oct. 16, 1890; d. Nettuno (Roma), Italy, July 6, 1902. Maria, or Marietta as she was familiarly known, was born of poor, pious parents. Luigi, the father, moved with his family to Colle Gianturco in the region of the Pontine marshes and in 1899 to Ferriere di Conca, where he lived as a tenant farmer on the estate of Count Mazzolini. In 1900 Luigi died, leaving his wife Assunta with six small children. While the mother labored in the fields, Maria took care of the household. She never had the opportunity to attend school and was unable to read or write. The pious young girl received her first Communion May 29, 1902. The neighboring Serenelli family had a son Alessandro, aged 19, who sought in vain to seduce Maria and threatened her with death if she revealed his designs. On July 5, 1902, Alessandro entered the Goretti home with a dagger during the mother's absence. Maria repulsed his advances and told him: "No, God does not wish it. It is a sin. You would go to hell for it." The youth then stabbed the girl repeatedly. She died the next day in the hospital at Nettuno after forgiving her murderer. Many miracles were reported at her tomb. For some years Alessandro was noted by the prison authorities for his surly, brutal disposition. When he eventually repented, he attributed his conversion to the intercession of his victim. After his release from prison he worked to advance her cause for beatification. Maria was beatified April 28, 1947, and canonized June 24, 1950, at a ceremony held (unprecedentedly) in St. Peter's Square and attended by some 250,000 persons, including the saint's mother. Maria's remains repose in the church of Our Lady of Grace in Nettuno.

Feast: July 6.

Bibliography: M. C. BUEHRLE, Saint Maria Goretti (Milwaukee 1950). A. MACCONASTAIR, Lily of the Marshes: The Story of Maria Goretti (New York 1951)

[M. C. BUEHRLE]

GORGONIA, ST.

Matron and martyr; d. c. 375. Gorgonia was the daughter of St. Gregory Nazianzen the Elder (bishop of Nazianzos, c. 328–374; b. c. 276; d. 374) and of St. Nonna (d. 374); she was also the sister of St. GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS. The only significant source for her life is her funeral oration, which was preached by her brother, Gregory (Patrologia Graeca 35:789–817). Gorgonia appears to have been married and the mother of at least three children. She is said to have been twice cured of severe illness through faith in the will of God, but appears to have put off baptism until the end of her life. An incident described by Gregory has been taken to refer to the reservation of the Blessed Sacrament, but modern scholars question its significance.

Feast: Dec. 9.

Bibliography: F. L. CROSS The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 572. H. THURSTON, Journal of Theological Studies 11 (1909–10) 275–279, Eucharist.

[J. BRÜCKMANN]

GORKUM, MARTYRS OF

Nineteen priests and religious hanged by Calvinists because of their Catholic beliefs, in Briel near Dordrecht, Holland, July 9, 1572. They were beatified Nov. 24, 1675, and canonized June 29, 1867: Nicholas Pieck and Jerome Weerden, guardian and vicar of the Franciscan monastery of the Observance in Gorkum, and nine other Franciscans from Gorkum; a Canon Regular of St. Augustine, John Van Oosterwyk; a Dominican, John Van Hoornaer from Cologne, who had gone to the aid of the Franciscans when he heard they had been taken; two Premonstratensians, Adrian Van Hilvarenbeek and James Lacops; and four secular priests, Godfrey Van Duyen, Nicholas Janssen-Poppel, Leonard Vechel, and Andrew Wouters Van Heynoert. The anti-Spanish Calvinist "Sea Beggars," in the struggle for independence from Spain, seized Gorkum June 26, 1572, and imprisoned the religious, who were treated with cruelty by soldiers on the hunt for sacred vessels. On July 7 at the order of Admiral Lumaye, Baron de la Marck, they were marched to Briel half-naked in procession, singing the Litany of the Saints. There they were confronted with Calvinist ministers and subjected to lengthy interrogation. They were offered their liberty if they would abandon belief in the Real Presence and papal primacy. The magistrates of Gorkum and the Prince of Orange protested the illegal detention of the prisoners and demanded their release, but the admiral refused unless they would abjure the primacy of the pope. When they again refused, they were taken to a sacked and deserted monastery on the outskirts of Briel and hanged. One of the Franciscans was 90 years old, and two other martyrs were 70.

Feast: July 9.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum, July 2:736–847. F. VAN DEN BORNE, De Katholieke Encyclopaedie 12:96–97. W. LAMPEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 4:1057–58. G. MARSOT, Catholicisme 5:104.

[F. D. S. BORAN]

GÖRRES, JOHANN JOSEPH VON

German Catholic publicist, lay theologian, political philosopher, and romantic mystic; b. Coblenz, Jan. 25, 1776; d. Munich, Jan. 29, 1848. He was the single most influential and formative force in the 19th-century German Catholic thought. Although he was a typical product of the ENLIGHTENMENT, hostile to all religion, and an enthusiastic supporter of the French Revolution, his books and editorial activities mark his progress toward a deep Catholic mysticism and a moderate conservatism. He was the author of Glauben und Wissen (1805), Mythengeschichte der asiatischen Welt (1810), Deutschland und die Revolution (1819), Die christliche Mystik (1836–42), Athanasius (1837), and Die Wallfahrt nach Trier (1845). He founded (1814) and edited the Rheinische Merkur until its suppression in 1816, and published a collection of folktales, Deutsche Volksbücher (1807). In 1827 he became professor and dominating spirit at the University of Munich. Here, he and his circle published two journals, Eos (1828–32) and the Historischpolitische Blätter (from 1838). Görres became a leader in the renewal of Catholic life and thought that accompanied the Romantic movement. He demanded a free Church, independent of the State, but at the same time he rejected ULTRAMONTANISM. His thought was vague and sentimental and his mysticism verged on the fanciful, but his "Munich circle" energized the whole of German Catholic Life.

Bibliography: Gesammelte Schriften, ed. M. GÖRRES, 9 v. (Munich 1854–74); critical ed. W. SCHELBERG (Cologne 1926–). J. GALLAND, Johann von Görres (2d ed. Freiburg 1876). J. N. SEPP, Görres und seine Zeitgenossen (Nördlingen 1877). A. DRU, The Church in the Nineteenth Century: Germany 1800–1918 (London 1963). L. JUST, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–), 2 4:1058–60, esp. bibliog.

[S. J. TONSOR]

GÖRRES-GESELLSCHAFT

A German Catholic society devoted to scholarly research and publication. It was founded by Georg von Hertling in 1876, the centenary of the birth of Johann von GÖRRES. It soon formed a bulwark of Catholic scholarly resistance to the KULTURKAMPF. The presidents of this private organization have been: Georg von Hertling (1876–1919), Hermann von Grauert (1919–24), Heinrich Finke (1924–38), and Hans Peters (1940–). The society relies on scientific teamwork and international collaboration continued from generation to generation. The original four sections have increased to 12: philosophy, natural science and technology, history, civil and canon law and political science, economics and social sciences, pedagogy, psychology and psychotherapy, archeology, linguistics and literature, Christian Oriental studies, fine arts, and folklore. Theological topics are pursued solely in their historical aspects. After being suppressed in 1941 by the Nazis, the society revived after World War II. In 1964 it had 1,650 members. Annual meetings are held in various German cities or outside the country (as in 1963 at Trent). Abroad the society maintains the Roman Institute (since 1888), the Oriental Institute in Jerusalem (1908), and the Spanish Institute in Madrid (1926). In 1957 the International Institute for Relations between Natural Science and Faith opened in Munich.

The society continues to publish the following periodicals: Historisches Jahrbuch (founded in 1880), Römische Quartalschrift (1887), Philosophisches Jahrbuch (1888), Oriens Christianus (1911), Literaturwissenschaftliches Jahrbuch (1926), Kunstwissenschaftliches Jahrbuch (1928), Volk und Volkstum. Jahrbuch für Volkskunde (1936), and Jahrbuch für Psychologie und Psychotherapie (1952). Between 1887 and 1963 the society sponsored six editions of the Staatslexikon (6th ed. 8 v. 1957–63). It also sponsored the first three volumes of Konrad EUBEL, Hierarchia catholica medii aevi (1898–1910). Between 1901 and 1965 the society published 12 volumes of the acts of the Council of TRENT, Concilium Tridentinum. Other collections of sources and results of research that have appeared under the same auspices are: Quellen und Forschungen aus dem Gebiet der Geschichte (1900–), Studien und Darstellungen aus dem Gebiet der Geschichte (1901–), Studien zur Geschichte und Kultur des Altertums (1907–), Collectanea Hierosolymitana (1917–), Schriften zur deutschen Literatur (1926–), Spanische Forschungen (1928–), and Forschungen zur Geschichte der Philosophie der Neuzeit (1931–). Utilizing the Vatican Archives, the society has been publishing Vatikanische Quellen zur Geschichte der päpstlichen Hof- und Finanzverwaltung im 14 Jahrhundert (1910–) and Veröffentlichungen zur Kirchen- und Papstgeschichte der Neuzeit (1929–). The society's section for legal and political studies has issued volumes since 1908, and the section for social and economic subjects, since 1927. Sixteen volumes have appeared since 1926 in the complete edition of the works of Görres.

Bibliography: W. SPAEL, Die Görres-Gesellschaft, 1876–1941 (Paderborn 1957) J. SPÖRL, Staatslexikon 3:1007–09.

[N. BACKMUND]

GORRITI, JUAN IGNACIO DE

Argentine priest and politician; b. Jujuy, Argentina, 1766; d. Sucre, Bolivia, 1842. After receiving his doctorate in Córdoba, he served in various parishes. Later he was archdean of the Cathedral of Salta and for several years served as chaplain in the army of Belgrano. Gorriti was one of the most able political thinkers in the Argentine independence movement of 1811, winning many capable men to the cause through his political tracts. He was one of the first to support the idea of a federal form of government for the new nation, similar to that of the U.S., but reserving autonomy to the states. He served as deputy to Buenos Aires from Jujuy and later was active as a member of the house of representatives in Salta. In 1829, having changed to the Unitarian party, he was elected governor of Salta. Soon afterward he fled to Bolivia for fear of reprisals by the Federalists. In Bolivia he was protected by Santa Cruz and became rector of the Colegio Junín in Sucre. In exile he wrote his famous Reflexiones on sociology, pedagogy, and government (1836). As a governor, he was concerned with the general well-being of the people and with furthering public education. He was an effective political orator and an excellent preacher.

Bibliography: J. I. DE GORRITI, Papeles del Dr. Juan Ignacio de Gorriti, ed. M. A. VERGARA (Jujuy, Arg. 1936).

[M. A. VERGARA]

GORZE, ABBEY OF

A former BENEDICTINE monastery on the Gorze River in the arrondissement and Diocese of Metz,

France. It was founded in 749 by Bp. CHRODEGANG OF METZ and soon flourished. It was responsible for the reform of Gengenbach in 761 and the settling of LORSCH in 765, and soon over 25 villages and 45 parishes made up its secular and religious domain. Decline set in with the introduction of COMMENDATION in 825 until finally Bp. Adalbero I of Metz in 933 gave the ruined monastery to the archdeacon Einold of Toul and to JOHN OF GORZE, who wished to establish a more austere community. The reform movement that had its start in Gorze as well as in Saint-Evre in Toul and SAINT-MAXIMIN in Trier came to be known as the reform of Gorze when numerous communities adopted its customs under the Abbots Einold (933–967), John of Gorze (967–976), Immo (976–1016), Siegfried (1016–55), and Henry the Good (1055–93). This monastic federation, eventually counting over 170 houses, did not seek exemption from episcopal authority, nor did it tend toward centralization, as was the case with the equally famous reform movement instituted by CLUNY. Besides Gorze, whose immediate affiliation counted 31 monasteries, the principal centers of the movement were Saint-Maximin in Trier, SANKT EMMERAM in Regensburg, NIEDERALTAICH, Lorsch, Fulda, Mainz-St. Alban, EINSIEDELN, Schwarzach on the Main, and Ilsenburg. Emperor HENRY II imposed the customs of Gorze on several unwilling communities such as the Abbey of REICHENAU in 1006. As Gorze's spiritual power declined, it became a feudal principality, gaining the right of minting in 1095 and of fortifying the abbey in 1173. The monastery, again under commendatory abbots after 1468, saw French and Spanish troops fight over its territories from 1543 to 1552. At the request of Gorze's abbot, Cardinal Charles I of Lorraine (d. 1574, see LORRAINE, CARDINALS OF), Pope GREGORY XIII secularized the monastery in 1572. In 1580, 12 canons with their abbot took the place of the monks. Duke Charles IV of Lorraine ceded the territory of Gorze to France in 1661, and the chapter was suppressed in 1790. The various buildings that still remain have been put to other uses.

Bibliography: Sources. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores (Berlin 1826–) 4:333–377; 15:973–977. Literature. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1303–04. C. WOLFF, “Die Gorzer Reform in ihrem Verhältnis zu deutschen Klöstern,” Elsass-lothringisches Jahrbuch 9 (1930) 95–111. W. WATTENBACH, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter. Deutsche Kaiserzeit, ed. R. HOLTZMANN, v.1.1–4 (3d ed. Tübingen 1948; repr. of 2d ed. 1938–43) 1:180–186, 596–597. K. HALLINGER, Gorze-Kluny, 2 v. (Studia anselmiana 22–25; 1950–51); Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 2:1695–96. H. BÜTTNER, “Verfassungsgeschichte und lothring. Klosterreform,” in Aus Mittelalter und Neuzeit: Festschrift G. Kalten (Bonn 1957) 17–27. L. GAILLARD, “Gorze et St-Riquier,” Mélanges de science religieuse 17 (1960) 143–151. J. FLECKENSTEIN, Lexikon Für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1061–62. R. GAZEAU, Catholi- cisme. Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET (Paris 1947–) 5:110–111.

[A. A. SCHACHER]

GOSLING, SAMUEL

Liturgist; b. Stone, Staffordshire, England, April 18, 1883; d. Oct. 8, 1950. He was ordained in 1908. While serving as an army chaplain in World War I, he became convinced that the retention of Latin as the sole liturgical language of the Roman rite was a serious handicap to pastoral work. In those days, such a view was so novel as to seem revolutionary and even shocking. For some years Gosling spread it only by word of mouth among trusted friends, but in 1942 he ventured to write an article on the subject and offered it to the English Catholic Herald. The editor risked publishing it, and the result was such a spate of letters in the correspondence columns that Gosling felt the time was ripe for action.

In 1943, he founded the English Liturgy Society for priests and laity who “desired to promote the use of the mother tongue in public worship so far as is consonant with the doctrines and traditions of the Church.” In 1944, he launched a small periodical, The English Liturgist, which he edited until his death. He wrote many articles for other periodicals, courageously advocating, against bitter opposition, the need for English in the liturgy. After his death his views continued to spread, and were finally vindicated by Vatican Council II in its Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, Dec. 4, 1963. The foundation of the American Vernacular Society in 1946 is attributed largely to the influence of this far-sighted and apostolic priest.

[C. W. HOWELL]

GOSPEL

The good news about Jesus Christ and the salvation that He brings to mankind. The English word gospel comes from the Anglo-Saxon term gōd (good) spell (tale), a correct translation of the Greek word εὐαγγέλιον (good news), which was taken over bodily into Latin as evangelium.

In the New Testament. The New Testament usage of the term εὐαγγέλιον depends less on the usage of the word in classical literature, where it seldom has a religious connotation, than on its usage in the Septuagint, where the cognate verb εὐαγγελίζω (to announce good news) is employed to translate the Hebrew verb bissēr, especially in the Deutero-Isaian sense of announcing the glad tidings of Yahweh's eschatological salvation (Is 40.9; 52.7; 60.6; 61.1).

Jesus used the word gospel only in this sense, as the fulfilling of the prophecy of Deutero-Isaiah: He was God's messenger announcing the good news of divine salvation to the poor (Lk 4.16–19; 7.22; Mt 11.5). The good news that He proclaimed was “the gospel of the KINGDOM OF GOD” (Mk 1.14–15; See also Mt 4.23; 9.35; 24.14). It was a message, not of something that had happened (the ordinary non-Biblical sense of the word), but of what was about to take place.

For the Apostles, however, the gospel was the glad tidings of the divine salvation that Jesus as the Messiah had won for men by His Passion, death, and Resurrection (Acts 5.42; 14.6, 20; 15.20; etc.). Such use of the term is common especially in the writings of St. Paul, who employed the noun εὐαγγέλιον about 60 times (Rom 1.1, 9, 15–16; etc.) and the verb εὐαγγελίζω about 20 times. He called his message “the gospel of God” (Rom 1.1; 15.16; 2 Cor 11.7; etc.) because it came from God, “the gospel of Christ” (Rom 15.19; 1 Cor 9.12; 2 Cor 2.12; 9.13; etc.) because it concerned Jesus Christ and His redemptive work, and “my gospel” (Rom 2.16; 2 Tm 2.8; etc.), not as if Paul's message of salvation differed in any essential way from that of the other Apostles (Gal 1.6–9), but because he received it directly from Christ (Gal 1.11–12; 1 Cor 15.3), who made him an outstanding “minister of the gospel” (Col 1.23).

Although the gospel that the Apostles proclaimed was concerned primarily with the mystery of Redemption, the earthly life of Jesus as far as it was known to them, i.e., His public ministry, formed part of their preaching also (Acts 10.34–43). This is the meaning of the word gospel as it is used in verse 1 of St. Mark's Gospel: “The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God,” which means: this is how the good news concerning Jesus Christ begins. Neither here nor anywhere else in the New Testament is the term used in the sense of a written Gospel. The custom of using the term as the name of a book began in the second century (Justin, Apol. 1.66; Dial. 10.2). The early Church always remembered that there was only one gospel; the New Testament never employed the term in the plural. Therefore it spoke only of the four-fold form of the one gospel: “the Gospel according to Matthew [κατὰ Ματθαίου],” “the Gospel according to Mark,” etc.

In the Liturgy. The public reading or singing of a PERICOPE or selection from the Gospels before the celebration of the Eucharist forms part of the liturgy in all Christian rites. The importance of this ceremony is shown by the special reverence that is given to the Gospel Book, e.g., by its being carried in procession with candles and incense at more solemn services, by its being read from a special ambo or pulpit, by its reader having to be at least a deacon, by the standing of the congregation during its reading, and by other ceremonies (at least in the Roman rite, the greeting to the faithful before the reading, the doxology—“Glory be to you, Lord!”—at the end, and the kissing of the book by the reader). The term Gospel is also applied to the selection read.

Bas-relief with gospel scenes from Cathedral of Altamura, Altamura, Italy, 1232. (©Vanni Archive/CORBIS)

In the 13th century the custom arose of reading Jn 1.1–14a as the so-called Last Gospel at the end of the Roman Mass as an additional blessing on the people. Later, some other selection from the four Gospels was occasionally substituted for Jn 1.1–14a as the Last Gospel. The Roman Missal (1570) of PIUS V made the reading of the Last Gospel obligatory for almost all Masses of the Roman rite, but this custom was abolished in the liturgical reform of 1964.

See Also: EVANGELIST; LECTIONARIES.

Bibliography: J. HUBY, L'Évangile et les Évangiles (3d ed. Paris 1954). J. SCHMID and J. A. JUNGSMANN, The Mass of the Roman

Rite, 2 vols. (New York 1950). Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 888–890.

[L. F. HARTMAN]

GOSPEL SONG

A type of popular religious song that emerged in the U.S. during the 19th century (also called gospel hymn or gospel music). As early as 1644 the term “Gospel Music”—used as the title of a Puritan tract by Nathaniel Homes—was taken to mean the kind of popular congregational song inspired by “Not Art, but heart” (Homes’s phrase). In the early 1800s gospel hymns were published in the U.S. by Seth Y. Wells (Millennial Praises, Containing a Collection of Gospel Hymns . . ., 1813) and by John Putnam (Revival Melodies, or Songs of Zion, 1842), but it was in the last quarter of the century that the form achieved widespread acceptance in the U.S. and Great Britain as a feature of the revivalist movement dominated by Dwight L. MOODY (1837–99) and Ira D. Sankey (1840–1908) and continued into the 20th century in the work of such men as William A. (Billy) SUNDAY and H. A. Rodeheaver. The name “gospel” was assigned to these songs because their texts were often directly taken from the Gospels, or dealt with the teachings of Jesus and his Church.

The gospel song is evangelical and nonsectarian, and its popularity cuts across racial boundaries. Unlike the spirituals, whose roots lay in the cotton fields and rural camp meetings, the gospel song took root in urban settings. Since its purpose is to admonish and instruct the listener, the gospel song makes judicious use of biblical texts and frequent repetition to convey its message. To appeal to its urban audience, its musical style is often patterned after familiar sounds and genres, e.g., marches, waltzes, sentimental ballads, and even jazz rhythms. While more dignified Protestant denominations regarded gospel songs as common and vulgar, they were beloved by many, especially the poor for whom the power lyrics and attractive music were their comfort and strength. From the mid-20th century onwards, the popularity of the gospel song spread to the more sophisticated churches. During the 1950s and 1960s, many professional gospel groups emerged and toured the country, leaving a lasting imprint on the musical consciousness of many churches. In the wake of the Second Vatican Council, many African-American Catholic parishes started using the gospel song and forming gospel choirs. Gospel songs are prominently featured in the African-American Catholic Hymnal, Lead Me, Guide Me (Chicago: GIA, 1987), as well as the African-American Episcopal Hymnal, Lift Every Voice and Sing: An African American Hymnal (New York: Church Hymnal Corporation, 1993) and the ecumenical Black hymnal, African American Heritage Hymnal (Chicago: GIA 2001).

Bibliography: M. P. BANGERT, “Black Gospel and Spirituals: A Primer,” Currents in Theology and Mission 16 (1989) 173–179. J. J. CLEVELAND, “A Historical Account of the Black Gospel Song,” in Songs of Zion (Nashville, 1981). P. K. MAULTSBY, Afro-American Religious Music: A Study in Musical Diversity (Springfield, Ohio 1981). J. R. HILLSMAN, The Progress of Gospel Music: From Spirituals to Contemporary Gospel (New York 1983). C. M. HAWN, “A Survey of Trends in Recent Protestant Hymnals: African-American Spirituals, Hymns, and Gospel Songs,” Hymn 43 (January 1992) 21–28. D. LARSON, “‘When We All Get to Heaven’: The Ecumenical Influence of the American Gospel Song,” Restoration Quarterly 36 no. 3 (1994) 154–172. P. K. MAULTSBY, “The Use and Performance of Hymnody, Spirituals, and Gospels in the Black Church,” The Hymnology Annual (Berrien Springs, Mich., 1992) 11–26.

[A. M. GARRETT/EDS.]

GOSSEC, FRANÇOIS JOSEPH

Early symphonist of the classical school (also Gossé); b. Vergnies (Hainaut), France, Jan. 17, 1734; d. Passy, Feb. 16, 1829. Gossec had been a choir boy at the Antwerp cathedral and at age 17 was sent to Paris with an introduction to RAMEAU. Through him he was accepted by a musical patron, Le Riche La Pouplinière, a rich “fermier général” who maintained a private theater and a fine instrumental ensemble. For this “veritable musical laboratory,” as it has been called, Gossec composed some of Europe’s first symphonies (his early works predate F. J. Haydn’s), as well as string quartets and trio sonatas, and also conducted the orchestra. At the patron’s death in 1762, Gossec (then 28) embarked on a career of royal then public acclaim. He served princes through the monarchy, conducted the National Guard band during the Revolution, and became a director of the Conservatoire in 1795. He was also associate director of the Opéra, founded Le Concert des amateurs (1770), and helped reorganize Le Concert Spirituel (1773). In 1802 he became a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor. Despite political upheavals he maintained a prodigious output. His symphonic works were famous for their instrumentation. He introduced horns and clarinets into the opéra orchestra and experimented with multiple groups, in a Mass (1762) and an oratorio, La Nativité.

Bibliography: J. G. PROD’HOMME, François Joseph Gossec (Paris 1949). L. DE LALAURENCIE, La Musique française au XVIII^e siècle (Paris 1910). G. CHOUQUET et al., Grove’s Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. E. BLOM (5th ed. London 1954) 3:720–722. B. BROOK, D. CAMPBELL, and M. COHN, “François-Joseph Gossec” in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, v. 7, ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980) 560–563. D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge 1996) 324–325. N. SLONIMSKY, ed. Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (New York 1992) 651–652. W. THIBAUT, François-Joseph Gossec: Chantre de la Révolution Française (Brussels 1970).

[E. BORROFF]

GOSWIN, ST.

Benedictine abbot, scholar (known also as Gossen, Goduin); b. Douai; d. ANCHIN, Oct. 9, 1165 or Oct. 10, 1166. Goswin studied at Paris. Despite the attempts of his master Joscelin, later bishop of Soissons, to dissuade him, he became a fierce opponent of Peter ABELARD on Mont St. Geneviève. Goswin then taught as a canon in DOUAI. He entered the monastery of Anchin, near Douai, c. 1112, under Abbot Alvisus and took an interest in monastic reform, notably in the monasteries of St. Crispin and St. Médard of Soissons, and of St. Remigius of Reims. As prior of St. Médard, Goswin received Abelard after the latter's condemnation at the Council of Soissons in 1121. In 1131, Goswin succeeded Alvisus as abbot of Anchin. During his abbacy, Goswin encouraged his monks to produce manuscripts and to illuminate them. Some splendid examples survive in the library of the city of Douai. He remained at Anchin until his death. Goswin's cult was propagated early at Douai and Saint-Amand.

Feast: Oct. 7 and 9.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Oct. 4:1084–94, two vitae written very soon after his death, excerpts. V. COUSINS, ed., Petri Abaelardi opera, 2 v. (Paris 1849–59) 1:43–58. L. H. COTTINEAU Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:91–92. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 10:294–295. M. G. BLAYO, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912) 2:1516–24. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum (Metten 1933–38) 3:149–151.

[V. I. J. FLINT]

GOTHS

An East German tribe that migrated into southern Russia in the 2d century A.D. and overflowed into Dacia after the Romans left, c. 271. They split into the western Visigoths (Ammianus' Thervingi) and the more progressive eastern Ostrogoths (Greutungi), on separate sides of the Dniester River.

The Ostrogoth King Ermanarich (c. 350–370) created a huge empire that fell to the Huns, who dominated the Ostrogoths until 455. Allowed into the Roman Empire, the Ostrogoths settled in Pannonia until THEODORIC THE GREAT accepted Emperor Zeno's commission in 488 to attack Odovacar in Italy, where the Goths established themselves. Theodoric's wise reign (489–526) marked the apogee of Ostrogoth power. Although his successors, Witigis and Totila, fought Justinian's armies bitterly (535–554), they were defeated and the Ostrogothic state and people disappeared together.

The Visigoths at first lacked tribal unity. They were ruled by petty chieftains or "judges," such as Athanaric, who warred against the Emperor Valens (367–369) and cast off the status of foederati. Unsuccessful against the Huns, Athanaric was replaced. In 376 Fritigern led the Visigoths into Moesia as foederati. In 378 they rebelled because of bad treatment and defeated Valens at Adrianople. By 382 Theodosius I came to terms with them. Under Alaric they rebelled repeatedly, invading Italy and in 410 sacking Rome. Athaulf (410–415) and Wallia (415–418) won lands around Toulouse in Aquitaine. Under Euric (466–484) conquests expanded their rule from the Loire to the Alps and central Spain. Alaric II (484–507) promulgated the important Lex Romana Visigothorum for Roman subjects. Defeated by Clovis in 507, the Visigoths concentrated their kingdom in Spain, where it lasted until 711 to 712.

Early archeological evidence of Christianity in Gothic lands of Eastern Europe pertains probably to pre-Gothic Christians, not to the Goths. Bishop Theophilus of Gothia at the Council of Nicea came from the Crimea, where there may have been some Christian Goths. The Goths learned of Christianity from missionaries in the 3d century and from Roman prisoners of war. Bishop Ulfilas (311–c. 381), an Arian who was the grandson of such a prisoner, was the most important figure in the Christianization of the Goths. There were Christian martyrs in the persecution by the Visigoths (348, 369–375). Ulfilas led many Christians into the empire, where they were known as Little Goths. It is not clear when the Visigoths as a tribe embraced Christianity, which played a part in the controversy between the pagan Athanaric and the Christian pro-Roman Fritigern. By 400 the Visigoths and by 450 the Ostrogoths were Christian. Through the Goths other German tribes accepted Arianism, which was an impediment to assimilation into Roman society. The Ostrogoths never abandoned Arianism. The Visigoth King Leovigild (571–586) persecuted Catholics, but his son Recared (586–601), under the influence of St. LEANDER OF SEVILLE, officially adopted Catholicism in Spain in 589.

Bibliography: E. SCHWARZ, Germanische Stammeskunde (Heidelberg 1956). E. A. THOMPSON, "The Date of the Conversion of the Visigoths," The Journal of Ecclesiastical History 7 (1956) 1–11. P. B. GAMS, Die Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, 5 v. (Regensburg 1862–79; reprinted Graz 1956).

[R. H. SCHMANDT]

GOTTI, VINCENZO LODOVICO

Dominican philosopher, theologian, apologist, cardinal priest of St. Sixtus, and patriarch of Jerusalem; b. Bologna, Sept. 5, 1664; d. Rome, Sept. 18, 1742. The son of Jacob Gotti, professor of law at the University of Bologna, he entered the order at 16 and studied philosophy at Forlì and theology at Salamanca. He lectured in philosophy at Mantua, the Roman College of St. Thomas (Minerva), and Bologna, and in theology at Faenza and Bologna. Gotti was three times prior of the Dominican convent at Bologna and twice provincial of the Lombardy province. His first significant work in apologetics dates from his two-year sojourn in Milan (1715–17) as inquisitor general; entitled La vera chiesa di Cristo (Bologna 1719, 1750; Milan 1734), this is a systematic treatise refuting the errors of the Swiss Calvinist minister Jacques Picenini. On April 30, 1728, Pope Benedict XIII named him titular patriarch of Jerusalem and added him to the college of cardinals, conferring the red hat on June 10 of the same year. In addition to his administrative duties as a member of no fewer than ten sacred congregations, Gotti continued writing on questions of clerical reform and in defense of the authority of the pope. In all his works the apologetical method predominated; he drew his dogmatic defense against Jansenistic, sectarian heresies from the writings of St. Thomas Aquinas.

Bibliography: V GOTTI, Colloquia theologica polemica in tres classes distributa (Bologna 1727); Theologia scholasticodogmatica juxta mentem Divi Thomae Aquinatis ad usum discipulorum (Bologna 1727–35; 2d ed. Venice 1750; 3d ed. 1783); De eligenda inter dissidentes Christianos sententia adversus Joannem Clericum reformatae. . . , 2 v. (Vienna 1750). R. COULON, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 6.2:1503–07. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae (Innsbruck 1903–13) 4:1353–57. J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (New York 1959) 2.2:814. A. WALZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1142. T. A. RICCHINI, De vita et studiis Pr. Vincentii Ludovici Card. Gotti. . . (Rome 1742).

[F. J. ROENSCH]

GOTTSCHALK, ST.

Martyr; d. Lenzen on the Elbe, June 7, 1066. He was an Abodrite prince and was educated at St. Michael's monastery in Lüneburg, but left c. 1030 to avenge the murder of his father, Uto, killed by the Saxons. After this uprising had been put down, Gottschalk was forced into exile and went to England in the service of King Canute, whose daughter he married. In 1043 he was able to return and rule his people. He administered an extensive area that he attempted to Christianize, with the help of ADALBERT OF BREMEN; the Dioceses of Mecklenburg and Ratzeburg were founded during his reign. Upon the collapse of Adalbert's political fortunes in 1066, Gottschalk fell victim to the pagan reaction and was martyred.

Feast: June 7.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 2 (1867) 40–42. ADAM OF BREMEN, Monumenta Scriptores rerum Germanicarum (Berlin 1826–) v. 7. HELMOLD OF BOSAU, ibid. STEINDORFF, Allgemeine deutsche Biographie (Leipzig 1875–1910) 9:489–493. K. JORDAN, Neue deutsche Biographie (Berlin 1953–) 6:684. B. STASIESKI, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1144. W. BRÜSKE, Untersuchungen zur Geschichte des Lutizenbundes (Münster 1955). W. H. FRITZE, in Siedlung und Verfassung der Slawen zwischen Elbe, Saale und Oder, ed. H. LUDAT (Giessen 1960). F. DVORNIK, The Slavs: Their Early History and Civilization (Boston 1956) 297–300.

[L. KURRAS]

GOTTSCHALK OF LIMBURG

Monk and poet; b. c. 1010 to 1020; d. Nov. 24, 1098. Information concerning this poet comes from three sources. From his own works it is known that Gottschalk (Godescalcus) was a monk at the monastery of Limburg, studied under the direction of a monk named Henry, preached to the community, and was criticized by his fellow monks for some of his sermons. He also wrote that he composed and set to music an Office in honor of SS. IRENAEUS and ABUNDIUS, patrons of his monastery, as well as several SEQUENCES, five of which he cited by their opening words. From the De hymnorum et sequentiarum auctoribus brevissima eruditiuncula, published by Jakob WIMPFELING in 1499, it is known that there was in the monastery at Klengenmünster a collection of Sequences dedicated to HENRY IV written by Gottschalk, court chaplain and provost of AACHEN, but only five Sequences were published in this work. The date of the author's residence at Klengenmünster is uncertain. The Anonymus Mellicensis (ed. E. Ettliger, 1896) states that Gottschalk wrote, among other works, a book of sermons. Gottschalk's claim to renown rests primarily on his authorship of 22 or possibly 23 Sequences. These compositions, almost all handed down with their melodies, were written for use at Mass on the feast days of angels and saints, particularly the Blessed Virgin, and for the feasts of Christmas, Epiphany, Pentecost, Transfiguration, and the Exaltation of the Cross. The content of the Sequences is at times heavily dogmatic; yet a certain mystical approach and a touch of tender poetic feeling are not lacking. The use of biblical imagery is truly impressive, and rhetorical figures frequently enhance the compositions. There is a great striving for assonance both within and at the end of the line. Gottschalk was no innovator, but his work is in no way inferior to the great tradition of NOTKER BALBULUS.

Bibliography: H. A. DANIEL, Thesaurus hymnologicus, 3 v. in 1 (Leipzig 1855) 2:37–49. Analecta Gregoriana (Rome 1930–) 50:339–369; 53:274–276. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters (Munich 1911–31) 3:998–1000. F. J. E. RABY, A History of Secular Latin Poetry in the Middle Ages 2 v. (2d ed. Oxford 1957) 224–225. J. SZÖVERFFY, Die Annalen der lateinischen Hymnendichtung. Ein Handbuch 2 v. (Berlin 1964–65) 1:409–414. B. STÄBLEIN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1143–44. Godescalcus Lintpurgensis, ed. G. M. DREVES (Leipzig 1897). L. GUSHEE, “Gottschalk von Limburg” in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, v. 7, ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980) 574.

[H. DRESSLER]

GOTTSCHALK OF ORBAIS

Benedictine theologian and poet, whose teaching on predestination disquieted the Church in France and Germany; b. c. 803; d. Abbey of Hautvillers, near Reims, France, between 867 and 869. The son of Berno, a Saxon noble, Gottschalk was offered by his father as an OBLATE in the Benedictine abbey of Fulda. After reaching his majority, he was released at his own request from his monastic obligations by the Synod of Mainz in 829, but LOUIS I THE PIOUS, on the appeal of his abbot, RABANUS MAURUS, reversed this decision. Gottschalk was forced to lead a monk's life and moved to the monastery of Orbais in the Diocese of Soissons, where he studied diligently the writings of St. AUGUSTINE and Fulgentius of Ruspe. With disregard for the rights of the bishop of Soissons, he was raised to the priesthood by the chorbishop Rigbold of Reims. He made a pilgrimage to Rome (c. 847) and on his return journey discussed with Count Eberhard of Friuli and Bp. Noting of Brescia his views on the twofold PREDESTINATION of the elect to life and of the reprobate to death. Shortly afterward Noting alerted Rabanus Maurus, then archbishop of Mainz, of these theories and the danger of their diffusion in upper Italy. After a period of missionary activity in the Balkan regions, Gottschalk appeared before the Synod of Mainz, which in 848 condemned him for HERESY and committed him to his metropolitan, HINC MAR OF REIMS. In 849 Hincmar convoked another synod at QUIERCY-SUR-OISE, which again condemned Gottschalk; he was degraded from the priesthood, flogged until he was half dead, and imprisoned for life in the monastery of Hautvillers in the Diocese of REIMS. Toward the middle of 849 Hincmar wrote a small work to counteract Gottschalk's influence and to explain the passages from Scripture and the Fathers of the Church that he had used. This work aroused a storm of opposition from illustrious churchmen who, without openly siding with Gottschalk, defended twofold predestination; but Hincmar prevailed at the synod of Quiercy-sur-Oise in 853, and the doctrine of twofold predestination was condemned. His opponents declared against his teaching at the synods of Valence (855) and Langres (859) and proclaimed the doctrine of twofold predestination. The controversy ended with the deliberations of the national councils of Savonnières (859) and especially of Toucy (860), which enunciated generally acceptable principles and avoided explicit reference to the predestination of the reprobate to death. During this phase of the dispute over Augustinian predestination Gottschalk languished in prison almost overlooked; but, as his reputation became more widely known, his plight was brought to the attention of Pope NICHOLAS I. When pontifical envoys were sent to Metz in June of 863 to discuss the divorce of King Lothair II, they were commissioned to get further information on the imprisoned monk. On their return to Rome the citation of Gottschalk before the Roman Curia was discussed; and in 866 a monk of Hautvillers, Guntbert, fled the monastery to bring to Rome an appeal on behalf of Gottschalk. Hincmar charged his representative at Rome to present to the Holy See in a favorable light his role in Gottschalk's imprisonment, but Nicholas's death ended the desires of the Roman Curia to have the controversial monk brought to Rome for a review of his trial and condemnation. From his arrival at Hautvillers Gottschalk had been deprived of the Sacraments; and as his end approached, Hincmar was anxious to admit him to their reception but only on condition he abjure what he considered his errors. Despite increasing insistence he remained inflexible. Stubbornly adhering to his views and embittered by the harsh treatment accorded him, the cause of the hallucinations that clouded his last years, Gottschalk resisted his archbishop to the end and died unreconciled. He taught a positive reprobation that supposed the prevision of future misdeeds, denied a universal salvific will in God after the sin of Adam, and limited the efficacy of the sufferings of Christ for salvation to those predestined to life. The interpretation of his words and the exact import of his theses needed more explanation and clarification than he was able to give them and are subject to discussion. He opposed the Eucharistic teaching of PASCHASIUS RADBERTUS and attacked Hincmar for replacing with Summa deitas the expression Trina deitas in the Vesper hymn SANCTORUM MERITIS, from the common of many martyrs. Gottschalk left several well-written poems that rank among the best Carolingian verse and reveal depths of poetic feeling and a delicately sensitive use of rhyme.

Bibliography: Monumenta Germaniae Poetae (Berlin 1825–) 3:707–738; 4:934; 6:86–106. C. LAMBOT, Oeuvres théologiques et grammaticales de Godescalc D'Orbais (Spicilegium sacrum Lovaniense 20; Louvain 1945). M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters (Munich 1911–1931) 1:568–574. B. LAVAUD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1903–1950) 12:2901–35. F. CHATILLON, “Augustine in G. and Peter the Venerable," Revue de moyen-âge latin 3 (1949) 234–237. K. VIELHABER, Gottschalk der Sachse (Bonn 1956). J. JOLIVET, Godescalc d'Orbais et la Trinité (Paris 1958). K. VIELHABER, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–) 2 4:1144–45. SZÖVÉRFY, Die Annalen der lateinischen Hymnendichtung (Berlin 1964–65) 1:235–244.

[J. M. O'DONNELL]

GÖTTWEIG, ABBEY OF

Benedictine abbey in the Diocese of St. Pölten, near Krems, Lower Austria. It was founded (1083) for Augustinian canons by Bishop St. ALTMANN OF PASSAU, who is buried there. Bishop Ulrich I of Passau (1092–1121) settled it with Benedictines from SANKT BLASIEN; an attached convent of nuns survived to c. 1550. SANKT LAMBRECHT in Styria, Garsten, and SEITENSTETTEN were founded in part by Göttweig, which participated in Benedictine reforms of the 15th and 17th centuries. The abbey was always devoted to pastoral care and warded off the inroads of Protestantism under Abbots Michael Herrlich, Georg Schedler, and David Corner. Scholarship flourished in the 18th century, especially under Abbots Gottfried von Bessel and Magnus Klein. Only the church and a tower survived a fire of 1718. The grandiose plan of baroque reconstruction by Johann Lukas von Hildebrand (1668–1745) was not completed. The library has 60,000 volumes, 1,100 incunabula, 1,111 MSS, music archives, and important collections of prints and coins. In 1964 the 38 monks included 32 priests; the abbey cares for 34 parishes.

Bibliography: L. KOLLER, Abtei Göttweig (Göttweig 1953). Österreichische Ordensstifte (Vienna 1961) 24–27. E. RITTER, "Neue Forschungsergebnisse zur Bau- und Kunstgeschichte des Stiftes Göttweig," Mitteilungen des Kremser Stadtarchivs (Krems 1961) 57–104. M. SCHMID, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1145–46. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1307–08.

[M. H. SCHMID]

GOUDIMEL, CLAUDE

Renaissance composer and music editor; b. Besançon, France, c. 1514; d. Lyon, 1572. He studied at the University of Paris and was Du Chemin's music editor and partner until 1555. His residences include Metz, where he became a Huguenot (1557–c. 1565), Besançon, and Lyon, where he died in the St. Bartholomew's Day Massacre. Among his works were five Masses, three Magnificats, about ten Latin motets, psalm-motets (1551–66), psalms, about 60 chansons, Horatian odes (lost), Muret's spiritual songs (lost), and bowdlerizations of Arcadelt chansons. Although he composed for the Catholic church, his Calvinist psalms in the Marot-Bèze translations (some homorhythmic, with the Genevan melodies in the tenor, and others, more florid, with the tunes in the superius cantus) are his most famous works.

See Also: PSALTERS, METRICAL; HYMNS AND HYMNALS.

Bibliography: C. GOUDIMEL, Psaumes de David, ed. H. EXPERT, 3 v. (Les Maîtres musiciens de la renaissance française 2, 4, 6; Paris 1895–97). F. LESURE, "Claude Goudimel, étudiant, correcteur et éditeur Parisien," Musica Disciplina 2 (Rome 1948) 225–230. E. M. LAWRY, The Psalm Motets of Claude Goudimel (Doctoral diss. microfilm; New York U. 1954). P. PIDOUX, "Notes sur quelques éditions des psaumes de Claude Goudimel," Revue de musicologie 42 (Paris 1958) 184–192. P. A. GAILLARD, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 5:584–589. G. REESE, Music in the Renaissance (rev. ed. New York 1959). M. EGAN-BUFFET, Les Chansons de Claude Goudimel: Analyses modales et stylistiques (Ottawa 1992). P.-A. GAILLARD, "Claude Goudimel" in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, v. 7, ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980) 578–579. R. HÄUSLER, Satztechnik und Form in Claude Goudimel's lateinischen Vokalwerken (Bern 1968). D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge 1996) 325. N. SLO-NIMSKY, ed. Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (New York 1992) 654.

[I. CAZEAUX]

GOUDIN, ANTOINE

Dominican philosopher and theologian; b. Limoges, c. 1639; d. Paris, Oct. 25, 1695. He entered the order in 1657 and achieved recognition first as a student and later as a master at the Limoges convent. Sent to Avignon to reorganize theological studies, Goudin rendered a considerable service to scholastic philosophy in his interpretations and expositions of the schoolmen. In 1669 he was elected prior at Brives. He taught theology at Saint-Germain, Paris, and later became a doctor of theology at the University of Paris. He joined the faculty at Saint-Jacques and subsequently became its prior. Goudin remains a controversial figure in the 17th-century struggle between Molinists and Thomists over physical PREMO-TION and efficacious GRACE. In spite of the famous letter of R. Simon remonstrating with Goudin for his theological treatises, an exact evaluation of Goudin's position in reference to St. Thomas's doctrine awaits the discovery and publication of his own MSS. His most frequently published work is Philosophia juxta inconcussa tutissimaque divi Thomae dogmata (Lyons 1671; Paris 1674, 1692, 1851, etc.), which constitutes a representative compendium of scholastic-Thomistic philosophy. At the time of his death, Goudin was preparing a Cursus theologiae; its doctrine on such subjects as knowledge, ideas, will, freedom, providence, predestination, grace, and reprobation may be gleaned in part from certain Tractatus theologici published posthumously in Cologne (1723) and Louvain (1874).

Bibliography: QUÉTIF-ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (New York 1959) 2.2:739–740. R. COULON, Dictionnaire de Théologie Catholique (Paris 1903–1950) 6.2:1508–1515. E. FILTHAUT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–) 2 4:1149. L. PAGELLO, Enciclopedia Filosofica (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:871. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae (Innsbruck 1903–1913) 4:320. Enciclopedia Universal Illustrada Europa-Americana (Barcelona 1908–1930) 26:778.

[F. J. ROENSCH]

GOUNOD, CHARLES FRANÇOIS

Prominent figure in romanticist music; b. Paris, June 17, 1818; d. Saint-Cloud, Oct. 18, 1893. The boy was heir to a long artistic tradition; his father was a Prix de Rome painter; his mother, an excellent pianist. Young Gounod took his B. ès Lettres at the Lycée Saint-Louis, then entered the Paris Conservatory, winning the Prix de Rome in 1839. After experience as church organist in Rome and Paris, he studied theology for two years before deciding finally upon a career as composer. As with his life, his creative work moved along two lines—the opera and the Church. Among many operatic failures, his Faust remains a landmark of the lyric stage despite its theatrical absurdities, and Romeo et Juliette was one of the first French coloratura operas. His religious works—notably the four Masses and the oratorios Rédemption and Mors et Vita—have certain fine moments, and betray a marvelous gift for vocal writing as well as unflinching workmanship and earnestness of purpose; but they lack virility and humility and are aesthetically banal. After a period of Victorian popularity they have all but disappeared. His best (because simple and unpretentious) church music may be found in the Anglican anthems and other pieces composed while he was in England during the Franco-Prussian War.

Apart from his fine musicianship, he had a serious musical outlook unusual for the period. His first envoi as a Prix de Rome winner was an unaccompanied Te Deum for ten soloists and two choruses in Palestrina style, at a time when Palestrina was an unknown quantity in France. When he discovered Bach's Well-Tempered Clavichord and brought it back to Paris, he caused consternation at the conservatory. He was also generous and encouraging toward young composers. Church music has since acquired a dignity that cannot be detected in Gounod's Masses; yet these works remain emblematic of the romanticist period.

Bibliography: C. F. GOUNOD, Memories of an Artist, tr. by A. E. CROCKER (New York 1895); Autobiographical Reminiscences, Charles François Gounod.

with Family Letters and Notes on Music, tr. W. H. HUTCHINSON (London 1896). N. DEMUTH, Introduction to the Music of Gounod (London 1950). H. BUSSE, Charles Gounod (Lyons 1961). E. HARASZTI, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 5:593–604. G. CHOUQUET and A. JULLIEN, Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. E. BLOM, 9 v. (5th ed. London 1954) 3:729–735. N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (5th ed. New York 1958) 594–596. M. COOPER, "Charles Gounod and His Influence on French Music," Music and Letters 21 (1940) 50–59; French Music (London 1951; pa. New York 1955). A. G. GANN, "Théophile Gautier, Charles Gounod, and the Massacre of La Nonne sanglante," Journal of Musicological Research, 13 (1993) 49–66. C. F. GOUNOD, "Composers as Conductors," introduced by M. KELKEL, tr. W. ASHBROOK, Opera Quarterly, 12/1 (1996) 5–17. W. E. GRIM, "Faust," in International Dictionary of Opera ed. C. S. LARUE, 2 v. (Detroit 1993) 421–423. J.-M. GUIEU, "Mirèio and Mireille: Mistral's Poem and Gounod's Opera," Opera Quarterly, 10/1 (1993) 33–47. S. HUEBNER, The Operas of Charles Gounod (Oxford 1990). L. SNYDER, "Mireille," in International Dictionary of Opera ed. C. S. LARUE, 2 v. (Detroit 1993) 880–882. L. A. WRIGHT, "Gounod and Bizet: A Study in Musical Paternity," Journal of Musicological Research, 13 (1993) 31–48.

[N. DEMUTH]

GOVERNANCE, POWER OF

Since the Second Vatican Council, the expression "power of governance" is preferred in place of "power of jurisdiction.” The broad concept “power in the Church” (of governance and of orders) formed a greatly debated topic at Vatican II. This debate continues today and certain important questions remain unanswered.

Presupposition. Traditionally, the power of jurisdiction (or of governance or of government) refers to the “public power of governing or ruling belonging to a supreme and independent society” (Abbo – Hannon, I, 251). The change in terminology to “power of governance” better reflects the Vatican II teaching concerning the triple munera (functions) of Jesus Christ as priest, prophet and ruler. All of the faithful, in virtue of baptism, participate in the mission of the Church through sharing in these functions of Jesus Christ. Thus, all of the Christian faithful, depending on each one’s particular condition, exercise the common or ministerial priesthoods; share in the proclamation of the Word of God; and cooperate in the governance of the People of God.

The power of governance is distinct from the power of orders, which derives from the sacrament of order and is the power to celebrate the sacraments. Both powers exist in the Church by the intention of Jesus Christ. Lumen gentium 8 establishes an analogy between the Incarnation of Jesus Christ and the Church as incarnated in the world. Through the will of Jesus Christ, the Church exists both as a hierarchically structured society and the mystical body of Christ; both a visible assembly and a spiritual community. The two cannot be separated from each other. The distinction between power of governance and power of orders fundamentally reflects the nature of the Church as one reality consisting of both dimensions. As an organized society, the Church requires the power of governance in order to fulfill its divine mandate to proclaim the gospel of Jesus Christ. But priority must be given to proclamation of the gospel: governance exists to serve this mission.

A major debate both theologically and canonically continues concerning the relationship between the power of jurisdiction and the power of orders. Canon 129 states that the ordained “are qualified for the power of governance” whereas the laity “can cooperate in the exercise of this same power.” To what extent, therefore, may the laity exercise the power of governance? The answer to this question incorporates complex theological, canonical, and historical issues as well as differing ecclesiologicals and ecclesiological pre-suppositions. Vatican II, which generally referred to “power” (either alone or with the adjective “sacred”) neither explicitly addressed the issue nor resolved it, and it would appear that debate will continue for the foreseeable future. Nonetheless, two significant points must receive due emphasis. (1) According to the present canon law, lay people may hold ecclesiastical offices; these are no longer limited only to clergy. Further, lay members of institutes of consecrated life, societies of apostolic life, and secular institutes may hold offices within these institutes and societies. (2) The present law seems to imply (at the very least) that lay men and women do exercise some power of governance in certain offices, for example, the diocesan bishop may appoint a lay person a judge on a collegiate tribunal (c. 1421, §2); he may also entrust the pastoral care of a parish to a lay person (c. 517, §2); a lay person may be appointed the administrator of ecclesiastical goods (c. 1279). The type of power exercised by lay superiors and moderators in societies and institutes of consecrated life forms another greatly discussed topic (c. 596).

Exercise of the Power of Governance. The power of governance is subdivided into legislative, executive, and judicial powers. In distinction to the common law tradition, the civil law tradition does not necessarily accept the ‘separation of powers’ as evidenced, for example, in the United States (on the federal level, for example, the President exercises executive power; the Congress, legislative power; and the Supreme Court, judicial power). All three powers may be held and exercised by one individual, for example, a diocesan bishop (although he usually exercises judicial power through judges whom he appoints).

Usually, the power of governance is exercised in the external forum, that is, in the realm of public, juridically verifiable activity, for example, the celebration of baptism. However, the power of governance may also be exercised in the internal forum, which is either the sacramental internal forum (that is, the sacrament of penance) or the internal non-sacramental forum.

‘Ordinary power of governance’ is power “‘joined to a certain office by the law itself” (c. 131). This ordinary power is proper if it is exercised in one’s own name; vicarious, if exercised in the name of another person. For example, a diocesan bishop, through appointment to and installation in the office of bishop, receives all the ordinary, proper and immediate power necessary to fulfill this function (see c. 381 which also includes the important nuance, “except for cases which the law or a decree of the Supreme Pontiff reserves to the supreme authority or to another ecclesiastical authority.” “Immediate” indicates that he can exercise this authority directly over the Christian faithful, not through a mediator). A vicar general, on the other hand, has ordinary but vicarious power: ordinary, because it is attached to the office by the law itself; vicarious, because he exercises it in the name of the diocesan bishop. Ordinary power—both proper and vicarious—ceases when the office is lost (c. 143).

“Delegated power of governance” is power granted to a person by means other than appointment to an office

(c. 131). The delegation of power generally applies only to executive power—legislative and judicial power can be delegated only in limited cases: when the law specifically allows for the delegation of legislative power or for the performance of certain activities preparatory to the issuance of a judicial decree or judicial sentence (canon 135). Further, in general and unless specifically disallowed by the law, delegated power can also be sub-delegated. The specific subject of who may receive delegated power is not resolved by the Code; therefore, the question remains debated as to whether or not lay persons can receive the power of governance through delegation. According to canon 142, delegated power ceases in a variety of ways, dependent upon the grant of delegation – by the completion of the mandate; by lapse of time; by cessation of the purpose of the delegation; by revocation (of the one delegating); by resignation (of the one delegated).

The exercise of the power of governance also involves subjects, that is, individuals subject to such exercise. As a general rule, laws bind those for whom they were enacted (canons 11–13) and canons 1404–1416 and 1673 establish competency for judicial matters. Executive power is exercised only over those who are subject to the one exercising this power.

In his apostolic constitution promulgating the new code, Pope John Paul II described the purpose of the Code as “to create such an order in the ecclesial society that, while assigning the primacy to love, grace, and charisms, it at the same time renders their organic development easier in the life both of the ecclesial society and the individual persons who belong to it.” (Sacrae disciplinae leges in The Code of Canon Law). This same rationale underlies the exercise of the power of governance.

Bibliography: M. WILENS, “The Power of Governance [cc. 129–144],” in New Commentary on the Code of Canon Law, ed. J. BEAL, J. CORIDEN, T. GREEN (New York and Mahwah 2000), 183–194. J. ABBO and J. HANNAN, The Sacred Canons (St. Louis and London 1952). J. BEAL, “The Exercise of the Power of Governance by Lay People: State of the Question,” The Jurist 55 (1995) 1–92.

[R. J. KASLYN]

GOVERNMENT

The terms “government” and “STATE” are frequently confused. Broadly considered, government is the concrete system through which the objective of the state—the common good—is attained. This article discusses the definition of government, the nature of political power, and historic classifications of the forms of government.

Definition. Man is a social animal, and he requires various kinds of social organization to achieve his specific and varied objectives. One of these is the state, whose end is broader than that of any other element of society. As Jacques Maritain says, “it specializes in the interests of the whole” (Man and the State [Chicago 1951] 12). Nevertheless, it is to be distinguished from society, whose discrete and varied objectives are only partially achieved by the state as such. Traditionally, the state is conceived as including population, territory, SOVEREIGNTY, independence, and government. Robert MacIver defines it as “an association which, acting through law as promulgated by a government endowed to this end with coercive power, maintains within a community territorially demarcated the universal external conditions of social order” (Modern State [Oxford 1926] 22).

Government, as one of the several elements that constitute the state, is the machinery through which the state operates. Concretely, it consists of the combined organisms and mechanisms such as the legislature, the courts, the executive branch, the bureaucracy, and the political parties that shape and implement public policy. While government is an apparatus, it is also a process through which the people of the state seek to meet the common problems that inevitably arise in the course of social living. Since the problems that face man in the course of history change and since government is a social invention of man designed to meet his needs, it is obscurantist to conceive of government as unchanging in form or frozen in its functions.

Power and Government. While man is a social animal, as Aristotle described him, he is also, in Christian terminology, the product of original sin. The extent to which man’s social nature predisposes him to orderly living in society and the extent to which his individual egoism prompts him to seek personal aggrandizement at the expense of others have become opposite poles of reference for political theorists in expanding or contracting the extent of power to be allowed to government. Thus, Thomas HOBBS (1588–1671) conceived of man as reflexively selfish, compelled only through fear of coercion to live an orderly life in society. On the other hand, Jean Jacques ROUSSEAU (1712–78) in some of his works conceived of man as naturally good and presaged the Jacksonian view of man as fully capable of self-government and properly subject only to minimal restraints.

If power is defined generally as the capacity to make and enforce decisions (rules and regulations) affecting the behavior of individuals or groups, it is apparent that it is possessed by many individuals and subsocieties, including the family. Without the ability to enforce decisions, one cannot speak realistically of power or of government. But power is not to be conceived of solely in terms of physical coercion. Custom, tradition, education, and habit develop attitudes of compliance as well as pomp, pageantry, and charisma of leadership. Power is more than force, and the state is more than power. And although these are shared with other groups in society besides government, nevertheless, in modern times only the government in the name of the state may legitimately use physical coercion. Government is distinguished in this facet of power both by the intensity and the extent to which it may apply it.

The philosophical tradition of the West has admitted the need for some kind of coercive power to be possessed by government as a necessary condition for minimal order. Individual interests no less than those of corporate bodies within the state must bow to the legitimate broader ends of the state, preferably through conviction, but if necessary through coercion. In his Disquisition on Government even John Calhoun (1782–1850), who was congenitally concerned about checks and balances in government, defined government as “controlling power” in society (Works [6 v. New York 1854] 1.4).

But while most schools of political thought grant the use of coercive power to government, few grant it without qualification. PLATO (c. 427–347 B.C.) believed that until philosophers are kings and kings are philosophers, the world will never cease from ill. In this view, wisdom rather than consent of the people is the legitimate condition for the exercise of power. For a considerable period of history primogeniture in hereditary succession was the badge of legitimacy. In more modern times and under the influence of the modern natural right school, selection by the people and acceptance of contractual limitations are the necessary conditions for the exercise of coercive power. Thus, for most nations of the West (Russia included) some kind of constitution, written or unwritten, forms the basis for government and spells out the structure and conditions of governing. What that structure is and what the conditions are depend upon the historical experience of the people, the prevailing political philosophy, and perhaps the social milieu in which the government is formed. To invest the political power with authority, that is, to make it legitimate by meeting the expectations of the governed concerning the wielding of authority, is the central goal of all government and politics.

In Western culture, the basic condition for the legitimate use of power has been that it be used for the good of the people. What that good is depends, of course, upon the particular nature of man as conceived by any particular society. The Greco-Roman-Christian tradition would reject a concept of absolute sovereignty in the state. Government has to be morally responsible and its powers are limited by the nature of man and the common good. As the Apostle Paul said, “There exists no authority except from God, and those who exist have been appointed by God” (Rom 13.1) and are responsible to a higher power. Even Plato’s philosopher-king, who is above positive law, remains subject to the moral law. The right to power, therefore, in the Western tradition—ignoring the aberrations of some of the German idealists and of MACHIAVELLI (1469–1527) and Hobbes among others—has always been a qualified right. Absolute sovereignty, as Maritain says, is not a characteristic of government in the West. Might never makes right. (See AUTHORITY, CIVIL.)

Historic Classifications. Governments have been grouped according to different criteria ever since Aristotle attempted the first systematic classification in his famous studies of Greek constitutions. The great Greek classified them according to the number of men involved in governing, ranging from one-man rule (MONARCHY) to rule by the majority (polity). He also distinguished government according to the interests served. Thus, one man rule in the interest of the whole community is called monarchy; but if it is conducted in the interest of the ruler himself, it is termed “TYRANNY.” By the same reasoning, ARISTOCRACY is opposed to oligarchy and polity to DEMOCRACY, then defined as the rule of the many for their own selfish benefit. This classification persisted through many centuries, being used variously by Roman political theorists and by many medieval writers, including St. THOMAS AQUINAS (c. 1225–74).

Logically, there are other possible classifications that might more accurately reflect the true nature of contrasting governmental forms. For instance, the parliamentary form may be distinguished from the presidential form, best exemplified by England and the United States, respectively. The parliamentary system fuses legislative and executive powers by making the executive in theory the creature of the legislative body, but often in practice, because of party discipline, the executive actually is master. Also, the titular head of the government is most often a purely ceremonial figure without power, such as the monarchy in England. Only the maximum time is fixed for terms of office and the legislative product is not subject to judicial review.

The presidential system, on the other hand, makes the president independent of the legislative branch and elects him or her from a different constituency than that of the legislators. Terms of office are fixed, judicial review is provided in some instances, and separation of powers is prescribed in the basic instrument. There is no guarantee that the same party will control both the presidency and the Congress, or even both houses of Congress.

Another classification is made according to the concentration or dispersal of authority over a geographical area. The so-called unitary state, for example, has a central source of authority. Local governments are merely the creatures of the central government and owe their legal existence to it. Their powers and even their boundaries are subject to the higher authority, as is the case in the relationship of municipal government to state governments in the United States. Great Britain and France have unitary governments. It should be noted that unitary government does not necessarily imply highly centralized government, since authority may be freely decentralized through delegation to subunits.

In contrast is a form by which unity is achieved, in the midst of diversity, through federalism. The United States is one example; Canada and Russia are others. Federalism is simply the distribution of powers and functions of government between two or more semi-independent levels of government in the same state. It is differentiated from the separation of powers, which is the division of powers and functions at a particular level of government.

Normally, all levels of government in a federal system have some independence of action and each possesses its own three organs. Like the separation of powers, federalism poses some obstacles to the solution of modern problems that are intergovernmental in character but the solutions to which are not legally located at any single level. Such problems as control and conservation of river systems, labor-management relations, and interstate crime have perplexed the advocates of strict federalism, since the problems transcend the jurisdiction of state governments but are not clearly the responsibility solely of the central government. A cooperative approach is sometimes called "cooperative federalism," although both Congress and the federal courts have in recent years been willing to concede rather large areas of jurisdiction to the central government where the jurisdiction is not legally clear-cut, or where the states are obviously incapable of attacking the problem effectively. In the cases of some states, such as Russia, the system is formally federal but actually highly centralized because of the tight discipline of a pervasive party system.

A fourth classification is made according to the groups that exercise power in the state, namely, political parties. This involves a description of the basic party system as a one-party, two-party, or multiparty structure. A one-party system such as that of the Soviet Union or Nazi Germany obviously can corrupt the formal structure of the government as defined in the constitution. The existence of a single party state is considered by most political scientists as more revealing of the real dictatorial nature of the state than the existence of traditional checks on power such as judicial review or representative assemblies. Two-party systems have proved to promote stability more than multiparty systems; France prior to Charles de Gaulle provided the best modern illustration of party-induced instability.

Finally, governments have been classified according to the scope of power resident in them. Anarchy at one extreme considers coercive power in government as an undiluted evil and reserves to society itself or to associations within it the functions normally given to government. Underlying ANARCHISM is a denial of fallen human nature. As Thomas Paine put it, "Government, like dress, is the badge of lost innocence" ("Common Sense," Complete Writings, ed. P. S. Foner [New York 1945] 1.4).

Totalitarianism, on the other hand, places the totality of functions that society has to perform for man in the hands of the government rather than judiciously distributing them between the government and subsocieties within the state. Nothing is properly exempt from government regulation; voluntary groupings such as church and school are regarded in Hobbesian terminology as "worms in the entrails of a natural man" (Leviathan 2:29).

All types of government line up somewhere between these two extremes including the laissez-faire government of the classical economists. Philosophically the battle continues to rage over whether government is, as Jefferson regarded it, "a necessary evil," or whether, as in Aristotle, Thomas Aquinas, and modern papal teaching, it is a positive help in reaching the good life.

Bibliography: R. RIENOW, Introduction to Government (3d ed. New York 1964). S. H. BEER and A. ULAM, Patterns of Government (2d ed. New York 1963). R. M. MACIVER, The Web of Government (New York 1947). A. D. LINDSAY, The Modern Democratic State (New York 1943). R. W. BREWSTER, Government in Modern Society (2d ed. Boston 1963). C. J. FRIEDRICH, Constitutional Government and Democracy (rev. ed. Boston 1950). W. ELLIOTT and N. MCDONALD, eds., Western Political Heritage (New York 1949). J. MARITAIN, Man and the State (Chicago 1951). G. SABINE, A History of Political Theory (rev. ed. New York 1950). E. S. CORWIN, The "Higher Law" Background of American Constitutional Law (Ithaca, N.Y. 1955).

[E. L. HENRY/EDS.]

GOWER, JOHN

English poet; b. probably in Kent, c. 1330; d. 1408. It is untenable that he was a member of the clergy, a lawyer, or a physician; records would indicate, rather, that he must be identified with the merchant class. He was a friend of Chaucer, and was known to Richard II and Henry IV. He became blind seven years before his death, and was buried in the chapel of St. John the Baptist in St. Savior's Church (Southwark Cathedral), originally the church of the Priory of St. Mary Overey, of which he had been a substantial benefactor. The effigy on his tomb represents him resting his head on three large volumes entitled Vox Clamantis, Speculum Meditantis, and Confessio Amantis. Each is a major work in a different language, and in each he is a moralist concerned with the ills of contemporary society, particularly in England, brought on by man's departure from virtue, reason, and good order.

Speculum Meditantis or Mirour de l'Omme, the earliest work, consists of about 30,000 octosyllabic lines of French verse. Through allegory it treats the vices and virtues, reviews the state of society since the time of Rome, and finds all classes corrupt because of man himself; it urges repentance and amendment through the intercession of the Blessed Virgin Mary and concludes with a life of her and a series of praises to her under various titles.

Vox Clamantis, in Latin elegiacs, consists of more than 10,000 lines. Introducing his subject with a dream allegory picturing the Peasants' Revolt of 1381, Gower pointedly exposes corruption on the various levels of society, and laments the loss of ideals and the evils of the country.

Confessio Amantis, written in English and comprising more than 34,000 lines in short couplets, also advocates a moral order preserved by wisdom and virtue, but the book is intended for pleasure as well as instruction. The poet, or lover, is told by Venus to confess to Genius, her priest, who instructs him concerning the Deadly Sins as applied to love. There is a profusion of illustrative stories drawn from classical and medieval sources. Gower was a poet, not of revolt, but of reform within the existing framework of society. His talent was notable, but he lacked genius; he did not transcend his own time and his reputation has waned.

Bibliography: Complete Works, ed. G. C. MACAULAY, 4 v. (London 1899–1902); The Major Latin Works of John Gower, tr. E. W. STOCKTON (Seattle 1962). G. R. COFFMANN, "John Gower in His Most Significant Role," University of Colorado Studies Series B 2.4 (1945) 52–61.

[P. E. BEICHNER]

GOYAU, GEORGES

Ecclesiastical historian; b. Orléans, France, May 31, 1869; d. Bernay (Eure), France, Oct. 25, 1939. After studying at the Lycée Louis le Grand and the École normale, he received his university degree in history and was sent to the École française in Rome for further studies. During World War I he served in the Red Cross because his physique was too frail for combat duty. From 1927 until 1938 he was professor of mission history at the Institut Catholique de Paris. He served the Roman Congregation of Rites as a consultant in historical matters. He married Lucie Félix-Faure (b. 1866), a writer, in 1903. After her death in 1913 he married Juliette Heuzey (1862–1952), also a well-known writer, who later published a biography of her husband.

Goyau's prolific pen produced nearly 100 works on diverse topics of religious history, including biographies, the missions, and social Catholicism. His Histoire religieuse de la France (1922) formed the seventh volume of the Histoire de la nation française, edited by Gabriel Hanotaux. His best-known books were his nine volumes on the Church in modern Germany, Allemagne religieuse (1898–1913). Goyau contributed about 170 articles to the Catholic Encyclopedia. Many of his writings were aimed at a wide popular audience, but all of them were characterized by accuracy and by esteem for the Church. He was elected to the French Academy in 1922 and was the recipient of many other honors, including membership in the Order of Leopold, in the Order of St. Gregory as a commander, and in the Legion of Honor as a chevalier. Throughout his life he was a fervent Catholic. After his death Pius XII praised him as a model of charity.

Bibliography: F. VEUILLOT, G. Goyau (Paris 1942). J. P. HEUZEY, G. Goyau: Sa vie, son oeuvre (Paris 1948). J. MORIENVAL, Catholicisme 5:128–129, 711; 4:1161–62.

[M. H. QUINLAN]

GOYENECHÉ Y BARREDA, JOSÉ SEBASTIÁN DE

Peruvian prelate; b. Arequipa, Peru, Jan. 20, 1784; d. Lima, Feb. 19, 1872. He was successively in charge of the Diocese of Arequipa and the Archdiocese of Lima for 54 years during the period of transition between the viceroyalty and the republic. He completed his studies in Lima, and in 1804 and 1805 the University of San Marcos granted him the licentiate and the doctorate in theology and law. He practiced law for some time, but, having a vocation to the priesthood, he received Holy Orders in 1807. He was appointed bishop of Arequipa on April 14, 1817, and was consecrated on Aug. 2, 1818; he took over his see three months later. He rendered invaluable services to both Church and State as a participant in the historical process of the country's emancipation, contributing, at the ecclesiastical level, to the consolidation of the republican institutions. In contrast with many others, he knew how to separate the highest interests of religion from political events. Once the revolution was accomplished, he collaborated loyally with the authorities. Because of the prudence of his actions and his tact, he was respected by all, even though he was occasionally forced to maintain inflexibly the rights of the Church to safeguard the integrity of faith and discipline. In all conflicts provoked by the regalist civil power he showed his pastoral virtues and canonical knowledge.

Seal and signature of José Sebastián De Goyeneche Y Barreda.

As one of the few bishops who remained at their posts during the crisis of emancipation, he was able to attend to the needs of the other dioceses of Peru and neighboring republics. This task became easier when Pope Gregory XVI designated him apostolic delegate to Peru in 1832. He was promoted to the Archdiocese of Lima on Sept. 26, 1859, where he undertook the reform of the religious orders and continued the restoration of the seminary that had been started by his predecessors.

Bibliography: P. J. RADA Y GAMIO, El arzobispo Goyeneche y apuntes para la historia del Perú (Rome 1917), with an appendix containing documents and some illus. R. VARGAS UGARTE, Historia de la Iglesia en el Perú 5 v. (Lima 1953–62) v.5.

[E. T. BARTRA]

GRABMANN, MARTIN

Theologian and historian of scholasticism; b. Winterzhofen, Bavaria, Jan. 5, 1875; d. Eichstätt, Jan. 9, 1949. After his philosophical and theological studies in the seminary at Eichstätt, he was ordained in 1898. In 1900 he was sent to Rome to specialize in medieval theology; he obtained his doctorate from the College of St. Thomas in 1902, writing on Die Lehre des hl. Thomas von Aquin von der Kirche als Gotteswerk (Ratisbon 1903). In Rome he enjoyed the esteem of F. EHRLE and H. DENIFLE. During his parochial assignment in Eichstätt, he continued to study and publish. His desire for study destined him to an academic career. He became professor of dogma at Eichstätt (1906–13), of Christian philosophy at the University of Vienna (1913–18), and of dogma at the University of Munich (1918–39; 1945–48). Through assiduous research in European libraries, he unearthed a wealth of original material in MSS containing lost works of Siger of Brabant, St. Albert the Great, Peter of Spain, Boethius of Sweden, Peter Abelard, and Meister Eckhart. His principal interests centered on the works of St. Thomas Aquinas, the development of SCHOLASTICISM, ARISTOTELIANISM, THOMISM, and German mysticism. He received honorary degrees from the universities of Louvain, Innsbruck, Milan, and Budapest; in 1935 Pius XII made him an apostolic prothonotary. M. Schmaus, his successor, founded the Grabmann-Institut at the University of Munich in 1954 to promote the study of medieval philosophy and theology.

Bibliography: Works. Die Geschichte der scholastischen Methode, 2 v. (Freiburg 1909–11); Thomas Aquinas, tr. V. MICHEL (New York 1928); Introduction to the Theological Summa of St. Thomas, tr. J. S. ZYBURA from 2d rev. Get. ed. (St. Louis 1930); Die Werke des heiligen Thomas von Aquin (3d ed. Münster 1949); Mittelalterliches Geistesleben, 3 v. (Munich 1925–56) bibliog. 3:1–35. Literature. J. VAN DER MEERSCH, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1903–1950) 16.1:1843–44. R. BÄUMER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–) 2 4:1156.

[A. M. WALZ]

GRACE, ARTICLES ON

The articles on grace deal with various aspects of the divine gift whereby God intervenes in the created universe and transforms the human person. The principal articles are: GRACE (IN THE BIBLE) and GRACE (THEOLOGY OF); see also CHRISTIAN ANTHROPOLOGY. Shorter articles treating of the nature of grace include GRACE, CREATED AND UNCREATED; INDWELLING, DIVINE; HABIT (IN THEOLOGY). There are also individual articles on grace in its various infused forms: e.g., FAITH; HOPE; HOLY SPIRIT, GIFTS OF.

Many of the articles on grace are grouped around the antinomies that prompted the great historical controversies (see GRACE, CONTROVERSIES ON; CONVERSION AND GRACE, CONTROVERSIES ON). There are primarily three such antinomies. For grace and human cooperation, see, e.g., JUSTIFICATION; JUSTICE, DOUBLE; PELAGIUS AND PELAGIANISM; SEMI-PELAGIANISM; IMPUTATION OF JUSTICE AND MERIT; SYNERGISM; see also MERIT. For grace and human freedom, see, e.g., FREE WILL AND GRACE; BAIUS AND BAIANISM; JANSENISM; MOLINISM; BAÑEZ AND BAÑEZIANISM; CONGRUISM; CONGREGATIO DE AUXILIIS; PREMOTION, PHYSICAL; GRACE, EFFICACIOUS; GRACE, SUFFICIENT; PREDESTINATION (IN CATHOLIC THEOLOGY); PREDESTINATION (IN NON-CATHOLIC THEOLOGY). For grace and human nature, see, e.g., GRACE AND NATURE; PURE NATURE, STATE OF; SUPERNATURAL EXISTENTIAL; ELEVATION OF MAN.

There are other articles as well that deal with the acquisition of grace and its effect on the human person. See especially CONVERSION, II (THEOLOGY OF); CONVERTS AND CONVERSION; REDEMPTION (THEOLOGY OF); and the numerous articles in sacramental theology (see SACRAMENTS, ARTICLES ON).

[G. F. LANAVE]

GRACE (IN THE BIBLE)

The concept of grace as it appears in the Bible is treated here by considering its terminology, its effects, its recipients, the condition for its reception, and the problem of grace and merit.

Terminology. In the New Testament the Greek word that corresponds to the English word grace is χάρις, when used in the technical sense of a gratuitous supernatural gift of God to man (e.g., Jn 1.14, 16; 2 Cor 12.9; Rom 1.5). Etymologically, χάρις denotes that which causes joy (χαρά), hence, graciousness, attractiveness, a common meaning of the term in non-Biblical Greek that is also found in Lk 4.22 and Col 4.6. From this basic meaning, χάρις developed the notion of gracious care or help, goodwill, or favor, often with special signification in the New Testament, such as the favor of the new Christian economy of grace (Rom 5.2; 6.14; Gal 2.21; 5.4), the favors of God's external providence that dispose to grace (1 Pt 2.19), divine help on a mission (Acts 14.25; 15.40), and divine favor in itself, which is the source of grace (Lk 1.30; 2.40). The word χάρις can also mean favor of men (Acts 2.47), favor of a collection (1 Cor 16.3), and even gratitude for a favor received, as in the phrase χάρις ἔχειν (to give thanks, to be grateful: Lk 17.9).

In the Old Testament there is no term to match the New Testament technical sense of χάρις. The Septuagint (LXX), however, often (61 times) uses χάρις to translate the Hebrew word hēn, which sometimes means grace in the sense of charm, attractiveness (e.g., Prv 11.16; 22.1; 31.30), but more often denotes favor, goodwill, especially in the phrase māšā' hēn be'ēnē, "to find favor in the eyes" of someone, i.e., to be pleasing to someone who thereby becomes favorably disposed (e.g., Gn 6.8; 18.3; 19.19; 30.27; etc.). The Hebrew noun hēn is connected with the Hebrew verb hānan (to be gracious, kind, compassionate), used especially with God as the subject (Gn 33.11; 43.29; Ex 33.19; etc.). These Hebrew terms, however, never reach the technical sense of New Testament χάρις. In the LXX, χάρις is used at times also for other Hebrew words, e.g., twice for rahāmîm (tender mercy, compassion), three times for rāšôn (benevolent love), and twice for hesed (loyalty, the dutiful love by which kinsmen or those bound by COVENANT should help one another, or the deeds rising therefrom). The Hebrew word hesed, however, is generally rendered in the LXX by ἔλεος (mercy). Although the concept of mercy fails to express the mutual bond God entered into through His covenant with Israel, yet, since He did make His covenant out of mercy and does not owe anything to men (although He does owe it to Himself to keep His covenanted word), ἔλεος is not an entirely unfitting term, and it approaches the New Testament concept of grace.

Effects of Grace. In describing the effects of divine favor, Scripture speaks at first chiefly of exterior and general effects, but in time it comes to penetrate increasingly into particular effects within man's soul. The Old Testament first stresses the favor of being God's chosen people, who lived in the hesed bond with Him, since by covenant—as the sprinkling of blood in Ex 24.8 testified, for life is in the blood [Lv 17.11]—He bound Himself to act toward them as a blood kinsman and as the gō'el (redeemer) who is committed by covenant to rescue them from their straits. Yet the Old Testament speaks at times of other effects of divine favor. The most general word is berākā (blessing) by which men receive joy, strength, fullness of life, and a special relationship to God. More specific interior effects are mentioned at times, especially wisdom, which makes one spiritually perfect.

In the Synoptic Gospels, χάρις occurs rather rarely (eight times in Luke, never in the others). The picture of grace in the Synoptics is much like that of the Old Testament in that God's favor invites men to belong to His kingdom (Mt 22.1–14; 13.3–50), to be under a new covenant (Mt 26.28), and to be His children (Mt 6.9–10). They must imitate Him (Mt 5.48) and bear much fruit (Mt 7.17; Lk 8.4–15).

The Epistles of St. James and St. Jude do not penetrate further to describe effects of grace interior to man. James, like the Old Testament, speaks much of wisdom and the law. The Petrine Epistles for the most part remain at the same level, speaking of the effects of grace as salvation (1 Pt 1.10), light (1 Pt 2.9), and sanctification (1 Pt 1.2). Some texts go further, speaking of a sanctification that must be interior since it imitates the sanctity of Him who called the faithful (1 Pt 1.15–16) and is a rebirth (1 Pt 1.3). The penetration is deeper if the words about a Christian's participation in the divine nature (2 Pt 1.4) refer to the present life.

The Johannine writings speak of effects of grace as light and truth, but also as passing from death to life (Jn 5.24; 1 Jn 3.14) and an abundant sharing in Christ's life (Jn 10.10) through a rebirth in the Spirit (Jn 3.3). Insofar as man lives this divine life, he cannot sin (1 Jn 3.6, 9). The Father and Son (Jn 14.23), and the Holy Spirit too (1 Jn 4.13), dwell in him.

By far the deepest and richest penetration of grace is described in the Pauline Epistles. In a progressive transformation (2 Cor 3.18) men dedicated to the Christ-mystery become a new creation (Gal 6.15; 2 Cor 5.17) and the temples of God (1 Cor 3.16–17). They live as members of Christ (1 Cor 6.15). They are sons of the Father (Rom 8.14–17; Gal 3.26) and are no longer coerced by the Mosaic Law from without (Rom 7.4–6), but rather are moved interiorly by God's Spirit (Rom 8.14, 26–27) who moves the faithful, not only to the exterior performance of good works, but even to the inner act of will, which God works in them (Phil 2.13). On Him Christians depend for the very thought of good (2 Cor 3.5). Paul distinguishes different effects of grace: there are the greater gifts (1 Cor 12.31), accessible to all, i.e., the abiding state of transformation and the movement to good acts spoken of above. There are also other CHARISMS or charismatic gifts, that are not given to all. Some receive diverse external roles, as those of apostles, prophets, and teachers (1 Cor 12.27–29; Eph 4.7–13); some receive the gifts of tongues, of interpretation, of healing, etc. (1 Cor 12.30).

Recipients of Grace. The Old Testament does not teach clearly to whom God shows favor or gives grace. Two themes, at first sight contradictory, run through the entire Old Testament. Israel knows itself to be the special possession of God, dearer than other nations, because God has bound Himself by covenant to show favor to them (Ex 19.5). The favor of belonging to the chosen people is not extended to all; rather, God says to Moses, "I . . . show favors to whom I will, I . . . grant mercy to whom I will" (Ex 33.19), and to Malachi (1.3), "I loved Jacob, but hated Esau." Yet, the apparently opposite theme also is primitive. Already in the call of Abraham, Israelite tradition represents God as saying, "In you shall all the nations of the earth be blessed" (Gn 12.3). Of the Servant of the Lord, God says, "I will make you a light to the nations, that my salvation may reach to the ends of the earth" (Is 49.6; cf. Is 42.6–7; Jer 16.19–21), for "the Lord's mercy reaches all flesh" (Sir 18.11). He loves even the Assyrians, the worst of men (Jon 4.11).

The theme of the restriction of divine favor appears but little in the Gospels (Mt 10.5–6; 15.24), and then only in such a way that it seems to be but a temporary arrangement. The parable in Lk 17.7–10 seems to imply that one cannot earn a place in the kingdom. In contrast, the theme of universal favor, grace, and mercy is strongly reaffirmed and developed in the Gospels. The Father's love is such that He gave His only Son (Jn 3.16). He loves all, including sinners (Mt 5.45), even the greatest sinners (Mt 18.23–5; Lk 15.12–32; 18.13–14). He searches for sinners (Lk 15.3–9). He is not content merely with doing good to men, but, like a man whose intensity of love leads him to bind himself by a vow, the Father wills to bind Himself by a new and eternal covenant in the blood of His Son, for the "many" (Mt 26.28; the concept of rab-bîm, "many," is more extensive and forceful than the English connotation). Although He does not really owe anything to man, He does owe it to Himself to keep His covenanted word. The Apostles are ordered to preach to all nations (Mt 28.18–20).

Both themes appear in clearly marked fashion in St. Paul. God wills all men to be saved (1 Tm 2.4), for He has bound Himself in a new covenant (1 Cor 11.25) in which an infinite price (1 Cor 6.20; 7.23) testifies to infinite love, in favor of each individual man (Gal 2.20) so that He who has not spared even His Son will also give to believers all things with Him (Rom 8.32). He will give even the grace to persevere until the end (1 Cor 1.5–8; 1 Thes 5.23–24; Phil 1.6), for He who has begun a good work in them will not leave it unfinished. The theme of restriction appears chiefly in Paul's teaching (Romans ch. 9; 1 Cor 1.26–31) that God's call and predestination are not given to all, and that it is not given according to human merits. The rule is: "I will have mercy on whom I have mercy" (Rom 9.15), as seen in the Old Testament example: "Before the children had yet been born or had done aught of good or evil . . . , it is written: 'Jacob I have loved, but Esau I have hated'" (Rom 9.11–13). Yet Paul does not contradict himself. The quite diverse statements belong to different contexts, and refer to quite different effects of divine favor. The texts of universal grace, considered in their context, refer to eschatological salvation; while in Romans ch. 9 the problem is: How does God choose nations for membership in the chosen people of both covenants? The solution is: Not by merits does God choose them [although those who do receive the special call can cut themselves off by infidelity, as did the Jews (Rom 11.20)]. Even without the privileged condition of full membership in the chosen race, a man can be saved (Rom 2.14–16). Paul knows that God wants all men to have even this privileged state, for He has sent Paul to preach to all the Gentiles (cf. Mt 28.18–20). In view of the limitations of human means, not all can have it; a choice must be made. Thus, the clarity of Paul explains and illumines the merely apparent contradiction in earlier Scriptural passages.

Condition for the Reception of Grace. St. Paul stresses greatly the gratuity of the call to full membership in the chosen people and of the grace of justification, the first step to eschatological salvation (Rom 11.5–6; 4.1–6;). Justification does not depend on the works of the Law (Rom 3.20, 28). Yet, with John (Jn 6.29; 3.18–21; 8.44–47), Paul teaches also that the reception of justification depends on man's recognition and acceptance of God's favor, i.e., on FAITH (Rom 3.28; 4.3; Gal 3.6). Grace comes to man through faith; the just man lives by faith (Rom 1.17). This faith is not just an assent of mind, but includes also an act of obedience of one's will adhering to God (Rom 10.16; 2 Thes 1.8) and active charity (Gal 5.6; cf. 1 Cor 7.19).

A seeming contradiction appears in the scriptural teaching on this faith. On the one hand, all Scripture takes for granted that man can decide whether or not he will adhere to God in faith. Otherwise, all the exhortations of the Prophets, the Apostles, and Christ Himself would be vain. Nor could one deserve to be condemned (Mk 16.16) for that about which he could not do anything. Paul, too, presents faith as a condition in man's power, and exhorts all "not to receive the grace of God in vain" (2 Cor 6.1; cf. Jn 6.28–29). He urges the believers not to grieve the Spirit (Eph 4.30).

On the other hand, faith is a gift of God (Jn 6.37, 43–47, 65–66; Eph 2.8; Phil 1.29) and, inasmuch as Pauline and Johannine faith involves an act of the will, Paul adds that it is God who works in man both the will and the performance (Phil 2.13) and even the good thought by which man sees the good that grace presents for his acceptance (2 Cor 3.5). The seeming contradiction vanishes if one holds fast to the precise words of St. Paul and does not go beyond them: unaided, one cannot earn the gift of grace (Eph 2.8); but it is offered abundantly to all, for God wills all men to be saved (1 Tm 2.4), and His love has even engaged itself in a new covenant (1 Cor 11.25) with its price in Christ's blood (1 Cor 6.20) in order to offer all graces (Rom 8.32) to every man. He is faithful and will do this. It is true, then, that without His aid man cannot even move his will to accept God's grace or conceive the good thought of doing what leads to salvation; it is God who works in man both the will and the performance (Phil 2.13) and gives man the good thought (2 Cor 3.5).

Yet the outcome is in man's control, for man can reject God's offered gift. Paul entreats the faithful not to reject it (2 Cor 6.1). If man does not reject it, God will work in him both the will and the performance. Paul does not mean, of course, that man can of himself make a decision saying, as it were, "I will not reject this grace," for that decision would be a good will. It is God who works such a good will in man. There must be another sense in which man can keep from receiving grace in vain, for Paul urges man to do just that. It is not hard to see; it is grace that begins the work, showing man a good thought, and giving him a favorable attitude. Grace can and does go thus far without man's aid (although it will not go as far as consent without him). Since grace is already at work making this start without man, no decision, nothing at all from man is needed for the good thought and favorable attitude that grace makes to continue (although men could do something to remove them). This lack of interference, without any decision, is enough to be a condition on which grace will continue and work both the will and the performance. Of course, man cooperates in this completion even though grace began without him. Other interpreters, adhering less closely to the precise words of St. Paul, simply say that grace at once, at the outset, makes man able to move his will to accept it. In both views, although without grace man is helpless (Rom 7.14–25), man can do all things in Him who strengthens him (Phil 4.13).

Grace and Merit. The gratuity of grace does not preclude merit. For although the word merit is found neither in the Old Testament nor in the New Testament, yet the chief foundation of the notion of merit, God's promise to reward good, is already seen throughout all the Old Testament (although retribution in a future life is not clearly mentioned until the second century B.C.). Paul's emphasis on the gratuity of grace does not prevent him from teaching that, after gratuitously receiving the means of merit, grace, the Christians who long for the PAROUSIA are given a crown of justice from the just Judge (2 Tm 4.8; 2 Cor 5.10). However, Paul insists that man does not earn reward in the same full and fundamental sense in which he earns punishment. He merits in a lesser, secondary sense, since the graces that make him holy and move him to do good are a gift: "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is life everlasting in Christ Jesus Our Lord" (Rom 6.23).

In making this distinction, Paul is bringing out an implication of the fact that God is the Father from whom all fatherhood takes its name (Eph 3.15; Gal 3.26). Children can, in the fullest sense, earn punishment, even disinheritance, but they need not and cannot merit the basic love and care of their father. Similarly, man's hope of reaching the Father's mansions is based on the truth, "if we are sons, we are heirs also" (Rom 8.17; Col 3.24). However, the Father requires that the faithful be conformed to His Son, Jesus Christ (which entails merit), for they are "joint heirs with Christ, provided however we suffer with him that we may also be glorified with him" (Rom 8.17). Just as the very merit of Christ did not strictly move the Father to grant mercy and grace (for He did not need to be moved, since He always loved men, and His spontaneous love sent His Son), so neither do man's works move the Father. His unearned love is the basic explanation of all the good men are and have. Meritorious obedience is a human condition, which, in His love of goodness and of mankind, the Father wills to regard (although He gains nothing) as man's fulfillment of the covenant founded by and on God's love that man has not earned.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 897–903. R. BULTMANN, G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 2:475–479. J. HASPECKER and F. MUSSNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 4: 977–984. P. BONNETAIN, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 3:701–1319. E. WÜRTHWEIN and G. STÄHLIN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 2:1632–37. J. GUILLET, Themes of the Bible, tr. A. J. LAMOTHE (Notre Dame, Ind. 1960) 26–93. L. CERFAUX, "La Théologie de la grâce selon saint Paul," La Vie spirituelle (Paris 1919–) 83 (1950) 5–19. J. BONSIRVEN, The Theology of the New Testament, tr. S. F. L. TYE (Westminster, Md. 1963) 34–127, 130–139, 251, 270–351.

[W. G. MOST]

GRACE (THEOLOGY OF)

The theological usage of the term "grace" directly corresponds with that of its Latin equivalent, gratia, from which it is derived. It is notable that the English word has also absorbed the peculiarly Christian character given by St. Paul to the Greek word χάρις. Thus grace is "the free and unmerited favour of God as manifested in the salvation of sinners" (A New English Dictionary, ed. J. A. H. Murray, 5.1:326), or simply "the free and unmerited favour of God" (The Shorter Oxford English Dictionary, ed. C. T. Onions, 817), or even, according to the Shakespearean usage, the very source of favor, God (cf. the phrase "grace of Grace," Macbeth 5.8.72). It is this fundamental emphasis on the total gratuity of grace that effectively relates the totality of its Catholic theological exposition to the affirmations of Christian revelation.

Yet, in addition to this common note, there are connotations. Generally these arise from the fact that historically there are certain problematics that have brought other aspects than gratuity to the fore. As a result, a full grasp of the notion of grace must indicate these emphases. Perhaps the broadest of these would be the antithesis of grace and sin, which has frequently tended to emphasize and even overemphasize the medicinal aspect of grace. Almost equally important has been the problematic of GRACE and nature, which at times would move in the direction of making grace simply an aid or completion or perfection of nature. Correlative to this would be the controversies engendered by Calvinism, Baianism, and Jansenism concerning "corrupt" nature and "pure" nature (see PURE NATURE, STATE OF), and thus the concern with naturally, or ethically, good acts. Noteworthy too are the lengthy debates over JUSTIFICATION, which often seem to equate grace and justification. The long, heated conflict over freedom and grace in terms of divine and human causality accentuates grace and the specific concrete act or the divine motion involved and the human response to that motion (see FREE WILL AND GRACE). Added to this would be the trend of the manuals to encompass all of the doctrine of grace under the scholastic categories and so conceive of it almost solely in terms of habitual and actual grace [see HABIT (IN THEOLOGY)]. Finally, there is the extensive discussion that begins with Denis PETAU (d. 1652) on the role of the Holy Spirit in the divine indwelling and His relation to grace. The interchange becomes quite concentrated on this point and appears eventually to give a kind of tangential character to the relation between the divine INDWELLING and grace, the uncreated almost obscured by the created. Some other historical contrasts could be included, but these are central and suffice to set the scene for the modern understanding and emphasis.

For in the light of biblical theology and a deeper appreciation of the history of theology, a much larger perspective has been given. In it the term “grace” is seen not only as a personal gift but as a whole economy. Seen in this perspective, the various aspects stressed as a result of particular historical situations are judged to be derivative and secondary. Grace, then, rather comprises the whole history of God’s saving dealing with man. It signifies essentially an economy of love. As such it denotes the Holy Trinity—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit—giving itself freely to man and calling for man’s free response through faith, hope, and charity. It connotes at the same time Christ in the supreme moment of the encounter and this in turn embodied in the Sacraments and the Church, His Body. This approach is thus more comprehensive and more fully expressive of the theology of Scripture and the fullness of the Christian tradition.

History of the Catholic Doctrine of Grace

The Catholic doctrine of grace calls for a considerable history of its theological development if it is to be fully understood. In fact, it may well be argued that this historical aspect is more necessary to the understanding of grace than to the understanding of any other doctrinal area in Catholic teaching. Yet, if such a history is to look to understanding rather than be a mere cataloging of events, this development must be regarded as a properly theological enterprise. This means that for the Catholic this theological development results from the effort undertaken by the believer to understand better what he believes. By faith he assents and consents to God’s revealing Himself through Christ and the Church, and seeks to understand the divine meaning by bringing to bear rational and philosophical notions and perspectives. Because of this, his theologizing will necessarily have an element of relativity and contingency. In any age the theologian is bound to time, to history, and to the vital exigency of development in understanding. This contingent aspect stands in relation to a permanent element, i.e., the DOGMAS defined by the Church, all that is contained in Scripture, as well as the total Catholic doctrinal tradition. To this will be added certain fundamental metaphysical acquisitions that constitute the basis of a Christian metaphysical horizon. In seeking to understand or apply these, the theologian will make use of contingent representations or notions or even systematizations, for the theologian must draw upon what he knows. He must seek intelligibility through the natural structures that are open to him in his own cultural milieu. In view of this, a few generalizations may help in understanding the very complex history of the theology of grace in the compressed form in which it must be treated here.

First, there is always a hazard that in the light of an effort of genius men will be tempted to bind the revealed and defined affirmations to a particular theology. It is easy to forget that there can be a number of theologies developed about them and that the only fully realized theology is that of the blessed in heaven. This does not deny the fact that a particular theological effort may arrive at understanding, in particular areas, which becomes a permanent part of the Catholic doctrinal tradition.

Second, often and particularly in the matter of grace the theological formulations rise out of a contemporary and immediate concern, confusion, controversy, or error. Frequently, therefore, the theological representations and formulations may concentrate on only one aspect of the doctrine and so form themselves into counterpositions to the positions taken by the opposition. As a result, both Scripture and the Catholic doctrinal positions may very well be read and understood in the light of these counterpositions. This understanding may then tend to set other elements of the doctrine into the background or to obscure them.

Third, to understand the history of a theological development it is of the essence to ask precisely what the problem was that was the central concern. Why was it a problem, and exactly what were the questions being asked about it? How far was the answer given circumscribed by the particular problem or controversy out of which it came? Finally, were all the biblical possibilities open to the theologians, and were they acquainted with the full doctrinal tradition on the matter?

Fourth, necessarily integrated into this whole approach is the underlying historical fact of development, namely, the theological acceptance that growth in Christian understanding finds its dynamism in the revealed Word of God manifesting itself to men. Hence, for the believer, its past is necessarily incorporated into the living Church here and now. The theologian thus judges, evaluates, enlarges, and reconstructs the theological presentations of the past in the light of this development at once truly historical and truly theological (see DOCTRINE, DEVELOPMENT OF).

General patristic. Central to understanding the teaching of the early Church on grace is a grasp of the basic problematic that determines much of its form: how to harmonize the religion received out of the Jewish-Christian religious life with the Greco-Roman culture? [see J. Daniélou, Message évangélique et culture hel- lénistique au II^e et III^e siècles (Tournai 1961)] The Christian teachers were faced with an abundance of religious and philosophical ideas and images and representations out of the Greco-Roman world. Among these they endeavored to find ways to affirm and present what was primarily an experienced way of life rather than a theory (see THEOLOGY, INFLUENCE OF GREEK PHILOSOPHY ON). And so, in the earliest writings, what is stressed is that a new life, a new kind of knowledge and immortality, are revealed through Jesus Christ (cf. Didache 9.3; 10.2). Ignatius of Antioch presents salvation as actually achieved through union with Christ, through whom newness of life flows into men so that He is their true and inseparable life (cf. Eph. 15.3; 3.2; Magn. 14; Rom. 6.3; Smyrn. 4).

Greek Fathers. It is with Justin Martyr that two main themes are opened up that directly relate the patristic teaching to the Pauline doctrine on grace. The first is the notion of freedom and responsibility, which will be seen presently. The second thematic comes to the fore in Justin's explanation of the redemptive character of Christ's death on the cross.

Divinization-Recapitulation. Justin explains that because of His redemptive work, Christ has become the source of a new humanity that He has regenerated through water, faith, and the cross (cf. Dial. 40). It is this profoundly biblical perspective that Irenaeus takes up from Justin and develops into a comprehensive theory of RECAPITULATION: "He recapitulated in Himself the long history of man, summing up and giving us salvation in order that we might receive again in Christ Jesus what we had lost in Adam, that is, the image and likeness of God" (Adversus haereses 3.18.1; cf. J. Quasten, Patrology 1:295–297). It is this basic theme set deeply into a Trinitarian context that gives meaning to the whole patristic emphasis on divinization (θέωσις, θεοποιεῖν). Thus it is the Son who makes men participate in His eternal generation through the gift of filial adoption. This runs through from Irenaeus (cf. Adversus haereses 3.19.1) to Cyril of Alexandria [cf. Jo. 1.9 (on Jn 1.13)]. Into this notion of divinization is assumed the understanding of 2 Pt 1.4, "sharers of the divine nature." This is understood as a participation in and a communion with the Triune life itself [e.g., by Cyril of Alexandria, Jo. 9.1 (on Jn 14.11–20)]. Integrated into it is the Johannine and Pauline theme of REBIRTH and regeneration. To be noted also is the explanation of this participation in terms of a form impressed on the soul as in Basil of Caesarea and Gregory of Nyssa (Hom. 2 in Cant.). Throughout, as H. de Lubac, SJ, has noted, the SUPERNATURAL character of grace is developed with increasing clarity [Surnaturel: Études historiques (Paris 1946) 325–394].

Grace and Liberty. Here again the teaching of the Greek Fathers is closely related to a basic affirmation of St. Paul. It is the proclamation that the economy of grace has made the Christian truly free, has freed his liberty that he may act in love. In part this emphasis is to confront the widespread and contemporary Greek fatalism with clarity and assurance. However, its inner emphasis has its source in the conviction that it is precisely through his liberty that man is in the image of God (see, e.g., Irenaeus, Adversus haereses 4.4.1, Patrologia Graeca 7:981; Gregory of Nyssa, Hom. opif. 16, Patrologia Graeca 44:184). Accordingly, it is by man's free choice of light instead of darkness that he renews himself and remodels himself (Gregory of Nyssa, V. Mos. 2.54). It is God's love that places His liberty on the same level as man's (cf. Basil).

As can be seen, the Greek Fathers (with many nuances that cannot be treated here) clearly delineate the main lines that will structure the history of the theology of grace. The notion of divinization and the notion of Christian liberty will be obscured in various ways. At times, aspects of each of these themes will be so emphasized as to distort them, even dangerously so. Yet around these two poles the doctrinal history of grace will revolve.

St. Augustine. The name of St. AUGUSTINE rather than that of the Latin Fathers in general is used here simply because in fact for the Western Church he is the "Doctor of Grace." As with the Greek Fathers, divinization through grace is a basic theme in St. Augustine, although his Trinitarian context has another accent. The theme of grace and liberty is integrated in a very important way with the dimension of sin.

Divinization. Of special importance here is the Christological aspect that Augustine stresses. In a sense, it is the development of one aspect of recapitulation. This is found in his teaching on the totus Christus, the whole Christ. For Christ is not only in the head and so not in the Body, but the whole Christ is in the head and Body (cf. In evang. Ioh. 28.1). "So the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us, and to that flesh the Church is joined so that there comes into being the whole Christ, head and Body" (In epist. Ioh. 1.2). This solidarity and community of the redeemed with Christ is a very important element in the theology of Augustine concerning grace, as will be seen shortly.

In the specifically Trinitarian aspect of the economy of grace, St. Augustine gives a prominent place to the presence or indwelling of the Trinity in the souls of the just. It is this indwelling proper to the regenerated that enables the Christian in grace to know and love God in a special way (Trin. 4.20.28–29). In this life of grace he attributes to the Son, or Word, illumination, which the Greek Fathers attribute to the Holy Spirit. To the Holy Spirit, following St. Paul (Rom 5.5), he attributes charity, since the Holy Spirit is the gift by which men love God. "Love itself which is of God, which is God, is especially the Holy Spirit, by which the love of God is diffused in our hearts, by which love the whole Trinity dwells in us" (Trin. 15.18.32). And so, according to Augustine, to live well is to adhere to the whole Trinity by Christ and the Spirit. In this very personal reflection on the mystery of the Trinitarian indwelling, St. Augustine gives to his doctrine of grace an orientation that will deeply color later Latin theological thought. On this point, however, a number of theologians following De Régnon have felt that Augustine is attempting to balance unity and transcendence, and that this has led to far too strict a formulation of APPROPRIATION [see H. Rondet, Gratia Christi (Paris 1948) 162]. In addition to these aspects peculiar to himself, St. Augustine clearly teaches other elements that are found in the Greek Fathers; e.g., men's union in brotherhood with Christ by reason of a filial adoption by God. They are divinized because they are sharers of the divine nature of the Son, who has become a sharer of men's nature (Epist. 140.10).

Grace and Liberty. It is in the development of this Pauline thematic that St. Augustine exerts his deepest and most pervasive tutorial influence on Western theological thought. For reasons both personal and doctrinal, the grace of Christ strikes him above all as liberative. It is the grace of Christ that heals the effects of ORIGINAL SIN and personal sin and so frees men to live a genuinely Christian life. More than anyone else, St. Augustine elaborates the Pauline teaching on the supernatural polarity of original sin and the grace of Christ. Yet it is evident that in the doctrinal history of grace his teaching on this polarity has been a source of deeply divisive debate. In the name of his teaching on grace, erroneous positions have been formulated, and in some cases those claiming him as their authority have been authoritatively condemned by the Catholic Church. In view of these facts, therefore, it might be well to apply specifically the principles set down earlier in this article. First, in studying the texts of St. Augustine it must be kept in mind that he is to be read historically, i.e., in the light of his own preoccupations. He is not trying to formulate a theory of sufficient and efficacious grace. Neither is he trying to construct the metaphysical elements proper to the free act. Finally, he is not, as such, concerned with the basic problematic of the Jansenists: to establish a theory reconciling free will with the primacy of predestination. In fact, St. Augustine simply does not eliminate free will as the Jansenists would like to have him do but insists on it even when he insists most strongly on the necessity and power of grace. At the same time, he admits frequently the difficulty of reconciling both these insistences [Grat. Christi 47.52; see G. de Broglié, "Pour une meilleure intelligence du 'De correptione et gratia,'" Augustinus magister (Paris 1954) 2:317–337].

Perhaps the best view of the problematic as St. Augustine himself sees it is found in his De correptione et gratia. Here he affirms that it is the sin of Adam that calls forth the just wrath of God and that man renews his solidarity with sinful Adam by his own personal sins and thus evokes God's wrath on them (Corrept. 7.12, 16; 9.25). All this involves, then, a hereditary and collective responsibility along with personal responsibility. Augustine is not concerned with human nature in the abstract but specific man in a concrete historical situation. In Augustine grace, therefore, refers to the actual states of man: Adam before sin acting in accord with his God-given powers fully free; the present state of man called to eternal life so that any salutary activity absolutely requires the grace of Christ; lastly, redeemed humanity joined with God in the heavenly city. In this present state, then, sin or salvation, merit or demerit, must be recognized as the fruit of men's solidarity with the first Adam or with Christ. Only the grace of Christ enables men to tend freely to eternal life (G. de Broglié, op. cit. 334–335). It is in the light of these doctrinal perspectives drawn from Scripture itself that the Augustinian teaching on grace and liberty must be weighed.

Basic to this perspective on Augustine is his distinction between freedom (libertas) and free will or free choice (liberum arbitrium). Freedom, or libertas, is the effective engagement of all man's powers in tending to his only true end, God; it is love fully implemented. Thus, fallen man possesses free choice (liberum arbitrium), but he is not truly free (libertas) to accomplish his true purpose. And this purpose is to participate in God's freedom and love Him as He loves us. Only through the grace of Christ can he overcome sin and be free to love God. As long as free choice remains, this freedom can be regained through grace (see Enchir. 32; C. Iulian. 6.11; C. Pelag. 1.3.5; Quaest. Simpl. 1.1.14). Fallen man can act or not act under grace; but if his action is to be free in the Christian (and what one may term supernatural) sense, then grace is absolutely necessary. Sin has caused the loss of freedom, the power to do that which deserves eternal life, the freedom to love God (Corrept. 12.33). Only God can restore this because God is love and only God can give love (Lib. arb. 2.20.54).

This approach serves to bring out a matrix of the conflict with the Pelagians (see PELAGIUS AND PELAGIANISM). It is not a question of the Pelagians championing free will and Augustine rejecting it, but rather of Augustine insisting on degrees of freedom rather than a simplicite, undifferentiated idea of it. For Augustine freedom is what St.

Paul calls Christian freedom, the freedom of the children of God. Man is in sin, hereditary and personal in solidarity with Adam. Through divinely engraced solidarity with Christ, he is healed and is now truly capable of exercising the freedom of a son of God through love (Corrept. 11.32). For a Pelagian such as Julian, liberty is a matter of indetermination of choice, but for Augustine it is the manifestation of the very nature of man himself, the option that determines his whole fulfillment. Grace alone can give this to sinful man so that, while it is difficult, he is truly free.

Once this is seen, it is also clear why Augustine places so much stress on the gratuity of grace. “After man’s fall God willed that man’s approach to Him should only be because of His grace, and it was only because of His grace that man did not depart from Him” (Persev. 7.13). So the power of free choice is healed by grace, but man is not exempt from willing—but to will the good and to achieve it, this is the work of grace (libertas; Corrept. 2.4).

It is in this properly Augustinian context that his usage of delectatio victrix and the so-called gratia indeclinabilis must be evaluated. The delectatio victrix has to be set in the framework of Augustine’s own psychological theory of choice. First, the will never decides anything without a motive, and evidently some motives are more effective than others (Spir. et litt. 34.60). Second, it is from God that one receives his first thoughts, and so the providential design of God makes it opportune that certain thoughts enter one’s mind (Persev. 8.20). Finally, God knows what reaction a man will have to a particular motive. Grace does not cause one to act but evokes the desire to act. It does not dispense with willing but brings one to love the true good and so to act. The delectatio is part of the total free act. In the case of indeclinable grace, or what some have called irresistible grace, the passage in question reads: “Aid has been brought to the weakness of the human will so that divine grace might act indeclinably and invincibly [indeclinabiliter et insuperabiliter ageretur]” (Corrept. 12.38). This has been treated as though the antithesis rested on the adverbs, whereas, in fact, as De Broglie points out, in the light of the total theology of Augustine, the emphatic word is ageretur. It is this that centers the distinction between the primitive state of Adam in his full power and man’s present condition enabled to act by grace but without loss to his power of free choice (liberum arbitrium) [see G. de Broglie, op. cit. 334; M. T. Clark, Augustine: Philosopher of Freedom (New York 1959) 55–75.]

St. Anselm. The “father of scholastic theology” is introduced here for two reasons. First, because of his mediatorial relationship between the world of Augustine and the scholastic world that is on the horizon. Second, in this matter of grace he reflects and brings to the fore the thematic on grace and liberty present in the traditional teaching. This second point is of considerable importance because the later debates over sufficient and efficacious grace have served frequently to obscure the primary doctrine with a secondary issue.

